"Did I know about Jack's ill-conceived attempt to make an alliance between Hoffman and himself? Yes and no. When we started Spinshot, I had no idea. Before we left for Cologne, I knew they were talking, and I assumed they were in the preliminary stages. I had not realized it had gone that far. I certainly did not expect to see Jack there. He normally very...hesitant to approach unsavory political figures." Lacroix returned at a lazy loping pace with two cups of coffee. He handed you one and it looked right. "If I had known, I would have discouraged Jack from attempting that alliance."

You turned that explanation over in your head and took another drink of coffee. It also tasted good. Not at all like strychnine. Lacroix's explanation was very convenient. Believable, yes, but was it probable? You could see him casually advising Jack to drop a potential ally and suggesting someone new. You could see Lacroix skipping the talking, removing the obstacle, and maybe suggesting someone new later down the road.

"You do not believe me," Lacroix wrinkled his nose at you, like he was offended by your skepticism. Which was ridiculous.

"I don't disbelieve you," you said. "But I suppose I need to think about it more." You weren't sorry that Hoffman was dead. But you wouldn't have crossed Jack to make it happen. Lacroix didn't have that reluctance. But he was smarter than Ziv. He wasn't about to off Hoffman in front of the damn Strike Commander.

"I have a meeting with Ana later today. There is no guarantee that I will return alive, Chanceux. Now is the time to ask your questions."

"Amélie, is he feeding me a line?"

Amélie arched a perfect brow. "Honestly, Chanceux, you should know by now that Gérard does not lie to you and Ziv. He may not tell you the whole story, but he will not outright lie to you. He values your trust too much."

You leaned back in your seat and lifted your cup to your mouth, not drinking, just blocking your expression as best as you could. Because you didn't trust Lacroix. Not in the conventional sense of the word. Your "trust" in him had well-defined boundaries and multiples caveats. Those legalistic tendencies normally kept your interactions running smoothly.

You trusted Jack, and you hoped he still felt the same way about you. But you didn't have the same kind of borders and contingencies in place. It was an odd realization that you had spent more time defining your relationship with fucking Lacroix than with Jack and Gabriel. You just tried to be with them. The pressure of analyzing and planning the logistics of romantic relationships was daunting, especially when you were the plus one to their partnership. But now you were realizing that some of these issues would be necessary to talk about.

"Are you all right, Chanceux? I didn't really put strychnine in your coffee. We are out of that too," Lacroix said, amusement brightening his voice.

"Trying to figure out how to handle Jack. I know I made things worse for myself yesterday, but-"

"It would be possible for Jack to reinstate Ziv after discharging him, but that would draw unnecessary attention. It was unwise of you to interfere, but it did serve to protect Ziv better. And I think this will be an excellent learning experience for him."

"Which part? The "don't assassinate people in front of the Strike Commander" lesson or the "let's ignore the experienced agents, go rogue, and see how that turns out" experiment. Because he should have known that shit already!"

"Among other things, yes," Lacroix said. "But you can't tell me you've never gotten carried away in the moment, even though it was detrimental to the mission." Lacroix drank his coffee and sighed. "We've all done it. This was Ziv's experience. He will learn from it." There was no room for any other alternative in Lacroix's voice.

"Do you need to know where he's at?"

"No. We will avoid him for a few days. He can take the time to evaluate his actions. We do not need to draw attention to his hiding spot. Jack will cool down, hopefully, and he can come back. I must ask, how are you faring?"

"Jack's pissed. Gabriel says I need to give him some time and then apologize." You didn't go into any detail about the sparring.

"Wise advice. I'm afraid Captain Amari is more difficult to placate."

"Yeah, my excuse is heat of the moment stupidity. You planned a blackbag op and didn't inform her or Gabriel. She's going to be livid." You enjoyed watching him pale. "I know you can apologize and schmooze with the best of them, and she'll let you, right up till she shreds you for all the rules you broke."

"Mmm, Amélie, perhaps I should take her some of those expensive chocolates?"

"Non, mon loup. She will know you are trying to bribe her and the slight to her integrity will just make her angrier." Amélie winked at you. "Maybe Chanceux can take her some beforehand, to soften her up, and in return, you can work on Jack for her."

"...This is getting weird," you said, but didn't outright refuse.

"All is fair in love, war, and placating Ana," Lacroix said with a straight face.
"...This is still weird," you said. "And how are you going to calm Jack down? You're on the shit list too."

"Let me worry about that. Remember what I told you in Cologne," Lacroix said dryly. "Try to make him see your perspective and appeal to his better nature. Don't make it a battle; you will regret it."

You gave Amélie a long appraising look while she smiled cryptically.

Well, it was the best relationship advice you'd received, and taking into account your circle of friends, it was probably the best you were going to get.

That Lacroix was out of food, but still had coffee and expensive chocolates, did not surprise you at all. You wondered if this was a trap and that he was hoping Captain Amari would spend her fury on you first, and then forget about him. You suspected that was not likely, as she was more methodical than that and had not yet summoned you to her office.

Box of chocolates in hand, you made your way down to her office and found her drinking tea and reading mission reports.

"Is there something you need?" She asked, not looking up.

"I uh..." You wouldn't lie to Captain Amari, and expect the survive the experience.

"Advice, ma'am."

She set her tablet down and gave you a knowing look and sharp smile.

You almost backed up.

"Come in," she said, tone friendlier than you expected. You obeyed, shutting the door behind you.

"Amélie gave me some chocolates for you. She didn't want to send them with Lacroix because she didn't want to give you the wrong idea." You set the box down.

"Oh, those are the nice ones. She is definitely bribing me not to murder him," Captain Amari smirked. "I suppose I may consider letting him live."

You shrugged as she retrieved a cup and saucer and poured you some tea.

"Thank you." You took it, somewhat surprised that it was peppermint.

"Athena, full privacy please. Yes, I have already read your report. I understand your concerns about Agent Mihret. You made several valid points that I assume you were unable to vocalize to Jack."

The tea was too hot to guzzle, so you stared at the bone china for a moment. "He didn't really let me do any explaining. Made me wait for Lacroix and Ziv to arrive, then let us all have it. I might have overstepped when I interrupted him. But it was a bad call and while I stand by that, I understand that maybe I shouldn't have interceded."
“Mmm.” Captain Amari opened the box of chocolates and offered you one. You took it.
“You obviously know the gravity of your actions. Say it was me giving the order, and not your lover. Would you have still protested?”

“With all due respect, of course, ma’am,” you said. You almost added a comment about “bad orders” and “not hanging people out to dry,” but you realized that would not be diplomatic, and right now, you needed to avoid stepping on any more toes.

“I see,” Captain Amari said, her placid expression betraying nothing.

“Ultimately, responsibility falls on Gérard. Agent Mihret disobeyed a direct order. He was already skirting the line, Lucky. His prior service does count for something, and I know how fond of him you are. But Gérard needs to reign him in. Failing that, someone else will have to do it.”
She smiled thinly. “Jack doesn't have the time to break down the hard cases. And he isn't quite as good at it as I am. I suppose that's why I always end up with troublesome ones.”

You managed a weak smile. “Sorry, ma’am.”

“For your actions?”

“For being troublesome.” You weren't sorry about Hoffman and you couldn't quite bring yourself to be sorry about sticking up for Ziv. The Strike Commander had to discipline agents, and you understood that. But you didn't adhere so strictly to rank, and Ziv was one of yours.

She leaned forward, chin resting on the back of her hand. “So what did you want advice on?”

“...Ziv is one. I don't know if there's anything else I can or should do. Or if I need to let you and Lacroix handle it.”

“I am going to handle Gérard, and if there's anything left afterward, we will deal with Agent
Mihret together. Expulsion is severe, but not unwarranted. That is ultimately up to the Strike Commander. Understand that even if he isn't terminated, he will have consequences.”

“That's fine. He deserves to suffer,” you said. “But don't kick him out, please.”

Captain Amari laughed. “Where is he, by the way?”

You shrugged. “I haven't seen him since yesterday.”

“But you know where he is.”

You took a drink of your tea. “I have an idea.”

Captain Amari raised a brow. “I see. What interesting is he's missing on a lot of the In-Sec monitors. Now, I realize Athena is very fond of him. Do you know anything about this?”

“Nothing about security footage. I might have...ordered him to keep a low profile while we lobby for him.”

“Very low. Athena doesn't even know exactly where he is,” Captain Amari said dryly. “Am I dealing with a rebel AI?”

“...Maybe a teenager,” you said, because it seemed Athena was growing in leaps and bounds.
"A teenage AI?" Captain Amari exhaled slowly.

"She's cycling through developmental stages faster than I expected. Not that I know much about children, ma'am."

"Interesting analogy. So was that all, Lucky?"

You set your tea down. "I don't know what to do about Jack."

Captain Amari sat back in her chair. "What part?"

"We have a...safe word for situations where I think they're out of line, but can't come out and say that. It was originally meant for when Jack and Gabriel get into it. I used it when he was getting ready to kick out Ziv. Jack was...incensed."

"I see." Captain Amari sipped her tea.

"Gabriel said to give it some time and apologize. I will. I just...I know it was out of line, but I still think he was wrong to move to kick Ziv immediately."

"That is...more extreme than I was expecting from him," Captain Amari acknowledged. "But dismissing an agent for insubordination, is his prerogative as Strike Commander." She poured herself more tea. "As an agent, you were in the wrong. As his lover, that gets trickier, especially given the parameters of the situation. Jack is not a tyrant. Once you get through the mess of apologies and reconciliation, you can hammer out the details."

"How?" You pinched the bridge of your nose.

"I distinctly recall how you handled Gabriel over the compromised systems issues. At the time, direct confrontation was a poor choice, though to be honest, his communication did need work. However, you managed to turn it around and prove your case without needing to engage him in a battle of wills. Granted, you were friends, not lovers then. But I'm sure you'll figure out a healthy way of making your case to Jack."

"OK," you said, because while her faith was heartening, you weren't so sure that it was helpful.

"Jack needs time. Make sure he eats before you talk to him and try not to catch him in the wake of some other frustrating incident. Other than that, I'm sure you'll be all right," Captain Amari said. "You handle Gabriel just fine and he is...moodier."

"Jack's different," you said.

"Not really. In fact, Jack's easier. You just have to wait for him to cool down before initiating. Once the cool off begins, he is far less hostile than Gabriel," Captain Amari told you. "I realize waiting is not easy, but that is your wisest course of action."

"Thank you," you said, because while you realized she was right, you didn't particularly like it.

__________________________________________

You hit the padded wall upside down, stuck for half a second, then slid down, your damp skin making a shrill squeak against the mats. You came to rest on your shoulders, knees bent over your head, and you blinked as you stared up at Hanzo.

He glared back crossly. "Is that the best you can do, weakling?"

With his brows drawn together and his severe expression of disapproval, he should have been intimidating. But after all this time of dealing with his moodiness and constant griping, you just found his irritation funny. You started snickering even as you folded into a heap on the ground.

"This isn't funny," he scowled harder and you unrolled yourself flat on the mat, still giggling. "What is wrong with you?"

"Maybe you hit her too hard," Genji said, sitting on the sidelines. He stretched, in full splits, and you envied his flexibility.

"Are you damaged?" Hanzo snapped, bending over you.

You just laughed harder, trying to sit up. Because it was like Genji back in the beginning, all sullen expressions and judgmental sniping. At least Genji seemed to have a sense of humor underneath it all.

"I went splat-squeak!" You said when you had yourself back under control. "Like a cartoon."

Hanzo squinted at you. "What?"

"Hanzo didn't watch frivolous things like cartoons, Lucky. I once came in on him watching the weather channel naked. I never asked why. I was too scared."

Hanzo wrinkled his nose. "What?"

"Are you sure it wasn't one of those weird pornos with the hot weathergirl?"

Genji sat back on his heels. "Oh. I didn't think of that. I was too young at the time and probably blanked out the trauma."

"...You can both stop talking now," Hanzo muttered.

"Were you watching weatherlady porn? Or weatherman porn? Because that just sounds hilarious. Today is going to be soooo hot and wet."

Hanzo's brows knit together in a distinct expression of disapproval, his jaw twitching.

Genji snorted.

"Can you predict how many inches I'm gonna get? How long's it going to last? Maybe it'll all just blow over!" You didn't have very many dirty meteorological jokes, but that wasn't going to stop you from being appalling.

"...You are an uncouth pest," Hanzo said. "I don't know how you've survived this long given your mediocre combat skills."

Your smile wavered. Friends mocking your survival ability was one thing. But you and Hanzo didn't have that relationship. Your friends knew your background and understood your baggage. Hanzo was just some spoiled Yakuza punk who got the best training money could buy along with an awful attitude. The stress of your worry over Ziv and your fight with Jack gave you a lot less patience for Hanzo's unpleasantness. You kept swallowing pointed remarks, and they cut you the whole way down.

"You did see all those dead cyborgs she left at the spa," Genji said offhandedly. "Enough to give me nightmares."

Oddly enough, you felt the same way. The memory jolted you out of your frozen anger.

Hanzo pressed his lips together tightly. "So then, it is me that you do not take seriously?"

That was a loaded question. Because if you took Hanzo's jabs seriously, you'd probably punch him in the face a lot and that wouldn't be very diplomatic. It was best to view him as Genji's annoying brother whom you were obligated to humor.

"All right, all right." You climbed to your feet. "Let's try again. You're so fast, I'm trying to track your moves to see how you do it, but then I'm flipping through the air and wondering "what happened, why did gravity stop work- oh no, there it goes." Yeah."

Hanzo's expression mellowed a tiny bit. "You can take more damage than I expected."

"That was a compliment," Genji told you.

"Really?" You wondered. "Compliments? Have I been misjudging his conversation this entire time?"

Genji's mouth didn't move, but his eyes gleamed with amusement.

"That's enough. You wanted me to spar with you. Come on."

Actually, he wanted a turn to "instruct you" after watching Genji kick you around the mats. Because Genji obviously wasn't doing a good enough job teaching you. But somehow it was all your fault. Yeah, Hanzo was going to be single for awhile. It was definitely for the best. You gave yourself a few moments to picture the glorious awkwardness of a date between Feng and Hanzo. You couldn't think of anyone less compatible.

"Hajime," Genji said lazily.

There was now a strange tension between the brothers, you reflected as you dropped into a defensive stance. It didn't surprise you; their issues wouldn't be solved by one night of conversation, no matter how heartfelt or honest. But some kind of rivalry sparked between them, a revival of old ways perhaps, and Genji was more aggressive with Hanzo than before. He probably just had his fill of all the attitude. But you weren't certain that was the only factor. Genji hadn't offered you any information on what had been discussed, and you hadn't asked. Hanzo had just continued being borderline rude to you, and you continued utilizing a combination of Lacroix-couple passive aggressiveness and Blackwatch petty.

Hanzo lunged this time. He was going slower than before, but he was still stupidly fast and you ducked under his strike, blocking his follow-up and countering with your left hand. Your knuckles hit his throat and he gasped, grabbing his neck as he staggered backward. His eyes bulged and he dropped on his ass, coughing and you tried not to smile. Because that hadn't just been luck.

"Lucky, don't break my brother," Genji said, not actually sounding upset.
Hanzo wheezed indignantly.

"Mmm, sorry," you said, trying to sound earnest. "I didn't actually expect to hit you."

"Don't believe her," Genji said, with a smirk. "She says that every time."

Hanzo gurgled, giving you a nasty look.

You just shook your head, trying not to look smug. It was good to see that after all this time, healing, and emotional honesty, Genji was still a shit.

"You know he's not going to just end things over this, right?" Gabriel mused while you lay across his chest.

"I wasn't thinking that," you said too quickly.

Gabriel just laughed. "Of course not."

You just rested your chin on his shoulder and studied the pillowcase. A few strands of blonde hair shimmered and you traced them with your fingers. Gabriel had made it clear that he wasn't going to talk about Ziv with you, and that was fair. Because as far as you knew, he was still in Torby's workshop and you weren't going to volunteer that information either.

"I'm not sure what I'm supposed to do with you sprawled on top of me like this," he complained, one hand resting on your back.

"Lay there and take it," you muttered darkly.

"All right," Gabriel chuckled and reclined, a book in hand. "He was still pretty annoyed when we finished sparring, but less enraged."

"...OK," you said, because you hadn't asked and it was a bad sign that Gabriel could tell exactly what you were thinking.

"I'd give it another day. I'll order some pizza and we'll go up together tomorrow night, all right?"

"...OK," you said, not entirely sure that you should be relying on Gabriel to mediate. Not that he couldn't. Of course he could. But this mess was between you and Jack and shouldn't you figure it out?

"The correct answer is "thank you, papi. I'm clueless and need all the help I can get. Except I'm too busy moping to see that you're walking me through this because I'm an idiot..."

You snorted and smiled despite yourself. "Yeah, OK. Thank you." Gabriel had been here before. He and Jack had all kinds of spats. You could do worse for a guide.

"You're never this way when we fight," he said, flipping through his book.

"Used to it, I guess. Our...interactions are better defined. That first time with the intel breaches and you blowing me off, that was rough."
"Only because you were an idiot," Gabriel said, one hand massaging your scalp. "You didn't have to sleep at your desk."

"I was trying to get the work done."

"You were trying to prove a point and guilt me."

You shrugged. Maybe a little. "I guess I'm not used to having the boy scout mad at me. It's unsettling."

"You're going to tell me that you aren't peeved at him too?"

"I am. It's all...prickly and stressful. Not exactly like fighting with you."

"The difference in rank?"

"Some of it. You and I have been able to keep it behind closed doors. Ziv and Lacroix were smack in the middle of this."

"I don't know what you're talking about. Ana was right there when you went off on me about the mainframe and briefing Winston."

You chewed on your lip. "I'm worried about Ziv too. But I'm not used to fighting with Jack and it feels weird."

"After Lucerne, you needed space from me, and rightfully so. Jack needs it too, definitely not as much, but just enough to get his head on straight. This isn't a dealbreaker, baby. Stop fretting." He shifted, and suddenly you were on your back. Gabriel propped himself over you, setting his book on the pillow. "You been practicing that move I showed you?"

You blinked, and it took you a moment to follow his train of thought. "I...just with you. I don't really want to explain the handcuffs to anyone else."

Gabriel chuckled. "Anything you want to try? Because now that you've green lighted toys, I guarantee that you'll be getting more."

You swallowed. "...I have some already."

"You should bring them out some time. Show us how you play," Gabriel kissed your throat. "I know I'd enjoy that."

"OK," you agreed, a little breathless. "You seem to like anal sex a lot. Do you prefer it or...?"

"It's what I've been used to, baby. Not that I'm complaining about how your sweet little pussy feels. I like how quickly you're ready to go. I love how I bottom out inside you and you just start shaking and clawing at the bed, like you can't take it." His breath was warm in your ear. "And I keep thinking about those outfits you bought but wouldn't show me. You going to wear some for me soon?"

"You're just going to ruin them," you muttered, turning your head to the side. Your heart beat faster and you shivered.

"Maybe the lingerie," he conceded. "But I like seeing you dressed up too." He nuzzled the side of your neck. "You're beautiful. You deserve to showcase it."
You remembered how dumbstruck you'd been at the ball when he'd shown up in a three piece suit. You understood that. "Right back at you."

"That cheap shot doesn't count as compliment, baby." Gabriel slid your t-shirt down your shoulder, his mouth hot against the exposed skin.

"Maybe not, but it definitely applies to you too. Can't think when you're doing that," you muttered.

"I'll stop then," he purred, sitting back so that he straddled your hips. He didn't put his full weight on you, but you weren't getting up.

"Tease." You glared up at him.

"So I know one of Jack's fantasies is to have you working in his office one day, dressed professionally, but definitely in a skirt and heels. Stop me if you know this ends..." Gabriel continued like you weren't shooting him dirty looks.

You swallowed your smartass comment, mind momentarily filling in that blank.

"You're so cute when you're startled. Te amo, corazon."

You turned the words over in your head and your eyes widened. "Hey!"

"I told you, you're going to have to get used to hearing it. Now where was I? Oh, yes. My book. I was reading poetry." He reached for it and grinned when you snapped your teeth at him. "Something wrong? Oh no, we can't play tonight, baby. You're going to want to be in fighting shape for tomorrow. Trust me on that."

You threw one hand over your face, squeezed your thighs together, and tried to ignore Gabriel's evil laughter.

Chapter End Notes

Phone interview bright and early tomorrow morning, suspect it may run an hour. I'm going over potential questions because I frequently freeze up and say the wrong thing. Then spend the rest of the day doing that l'esprit d'escalier bullshit and kicking myself mentally. This level of performance anxiety is unique to job interviews. If they like me, I'll have to go up to their HQ for an interview (maybe two) and then do a roleplay demo utilizing their software. (I get to learn it on the fly, that's part of the demo, I've been stalking their interview reviews on Glassdoor.)

But first, I must pass the gatekeeper interview. screeches

Dogs are well, a little stir crazy because I have runner's knee and we haven't been jogging.

I had Boston cream pie for Pi Day. My cousin requested it, and the bakery by me does a nice (not too sweet) version. When I was in line, the lady in front of me, and the lady behind me, were both buying pie for Pi Day.

Today wasn't bad. Yesterday, I was filled with rage and torn between committing homicide and jumping on the counter and screeching in someone's face. It was a very close thing. Both homicide and screeching.

I feel that I must add: if you want to message me on tumblr, do eeeet. You are not bothering me. Do not feel guilty and apologize profusely. It's all good. I can't promise I'll be on when you do, but I will get back to you. Also, I'm usually writing so my answers will be sporadically timed. Because writing. But don't worry that you're "bothering" me. It's all good. Unless you're messaging me 12 pages of Ugandan Knuckles memes. You know who you are. You monster. =P
Chapter 47

Chapter Summary

After the verdict on Ziv, you have to deal with Jack.

Chapter Notes

W.Jaksina made a cool sketch of Gabriel and Lucky from Chapter 3. Those thighs...
Unf.

We're coming up on the 5 month anniversary and I broke 400k in the rough draft today. Sweet Jebus. I have a minor arc and a major arc to go, with heavy doses of fluff.

You loitered in the hall, arms crossed. Torby, Winston, and Jesse lingered, all pretending to look busy. Jack, Gabriel, Lacroix, and Captain Amari were all sitting in Jack's office with Ziv. You had to really fuck up to get all of them on your case. In retrospect, you were surprised this hadn't happened sooner. Because Ziv was an unrepentant little shit.

Winston kept plucking at his wrists. Torby tinkered with something metal and round and you squinted at it trying to decide just how dangerous it was. Jesse kept twirling his revolvers, and you really wished they weren't loaded.

"You're spinning loaded guns indoors," you said, one eye twitching.

"I'm always careful, sugarpie." Jesse grinned, tilting his hat at you.

You bit your tongue, because that was such a blatant lie it didn't deserve a response.

Torby grunted something unflattering in Swedish. Winston flashed a pained look, though maybe you weren't an expert at gorilla facial expressions.

"Jesse's right though," you admitted as Winston continued to rub his forearms, the hair looking a little thin. "They aren't going to get rid of him. Probably."

Time dragged. You could feel the seconds slowing down just to spite you. Your heart rate was too fast. Your nerves were too receptive. Your patience was gone.

It didn't matter. Ten minutes. Fifteen minutes. Twenty minutes. Thirty minutes. Forty five minutes later, Jack's office door opened, and you straightened up.

Ziv slunk out, shoulders drawn tight. You rushed up to him and he gave you a weak smile.
"Well?"

"I'm not out," he said softly, scratching the back of his head. "But...it's not pretty."

"You're not pretty," you said cleverly and hugged him.

"Mihret has passable instincts, but he lacks discipline. So it's back to basic for him. I've called in some favors and he'll be doing a special regimen in Coronado. He'll be offsite for only a few weeks, so he's not getting the full Navy SEAL training, but they'll bludgeon the attitude out of him. This program came highly recommended from Chang," Gabriel said cheerfully as he exited the office. "She picked it out especially for difficult young men in need of attitude adjustments. Mihret wasn't the candidate she had in mind, but if the shoe fits..."

You winced in sympathy. Chang on her own was scary enough. If she'd chosen a program with Michael in mind... Well, you did not envy Ziv.

"And then, when he comes back, he'll be juggling your missions, assisting Winston in integrating another tech update, and whatever else Ana wants to throw him at." Gabriel actually laughed. "I suggested a wall, but she already had some ideas. Let me tell you, her live fire exercises are a terror to behold."

Ziv shuddered.

"And then," Gabriel placed an arm around Ziv's shoulders, his gleeful smirk downright evil. "He'll be teaching Reinhardt how to best use social media for his admin work, program his cookware, and whatever other minute tech support the asshole needs. Because what better punishment for an IT guy than troubleshooting technology for the old farts?"

Torby did not look impressed, but you and Winston flinched.

"You deserve that, and more," you told him.

Ziv rested his face in his palm, unable to bring himself to look at Gabriel. "Ben-zona, Lucky, you should've just let them kick me out."

Gabriel did not actually try to talk to Jack when he was like this. They just set up the mats quickly and Gabriel steeled himself for a hard fight. It did not feel the least bit strange for him to have started the evening cuddling you, and moved on to sparring with a furious Jack. What exactly that said about him and his relationship dynamics, he wasn't certain, but he would not trade it for anything.

Jack was the faster one, and he pummeled Gabriel's abdomen with a flurry of punches. Gabriel kicked him backward, grinning as Jack's lips twisted into a snarl. Jack pushed this far was a sight to behold. Cold, efficient, verging on cruel, he was a treat to fight. Gabriel didn't have to hold back right now, and he slammed his knee into Jack's stomach. The younger man grunted, but did not stagger.

The smartest thing would be to fight defensively, let Jack wear himself down. But it was normally Gabriel having the fits of pique and he didn't have the mindset to appreciate how enjoyable it could be to stop holding back. Fighting Jack when he was angry, and not angry at Gabriel, was actually a lot of fun. He let it all go and both of them were soon bleeding from numerous hits.

It was a few rounds of just striking before Jack finally spoke.

That had been a...bad day. Jack had ignored orders, almost gotten himself killed, and then had to come home and face the consequences. Gabriel had been so enraged, he nearly threw Jack off the damn battleship and told him to swim home. Ana and Gérard had stopped him of course, if only by reminding him that Jack had a broken arm, among other injuries, and would take forever to get anywhere.

"He's a slippery son of a bitch," Gabriel acknowledged, neatly dodging Jack's front kick. "You could probably invite him onto the mats for a round."

"I'd break his neck right now," Jack said, and gripped Gabriel's arm, using his hip as a fulcrum to throw the older man.

Gabriel hit the mats hard and winced as Jack dropped on top if him, knees digging into his ribs.

"You did fuck up with that suicide charge, Jack," Gabriel said, seizing Jack's wrists. "Me and Ana were in agreement that you were an idiot in need of a good ass-kicking."

"Not the point," Jack snapped. "I wasn't expecting Gérard to use that one against me."

Gabriel hooked his leg around Jack's and raised his hips, throwing Jack off him. He rolled, pinning Jack underneath him. "Lacroix has the advantage there. He keeps score. You're a better friend and just forget who owes whom."

"I haven't forgotten," Jack snapped, clicking his teeth. "I'm past caring how much everyone owes me and vice versa. That doesn't condone that little shit's blatant insubordination, just like it doesn't excuse Lucky for abusing the kill-switch."

Gabriel nodded, more in acknowledgement than agreement, and used his heavier weight to try to pin Jack. He dug his heels into Jack's biceps, trying flatten him against the ground.

"So what are you going to do?"

"I was going to boot Mihret. He went too fucking far and we all know it."

"But...?" Gabriel didn't agree with that decision, but he'd talk to Jack about it after he'd cooled down some.

"Lucky pissed me off so much that I know that I'm not thinking straight. And then Gérard fucking offered me his resignation. It's goddamn symbolic and I know he's bluffing, but still..."

Gabriel blinked in surprise and Jack wiggled free. His foot hit Gabriel square in the chest and Gabriel fell backward. Jack was on him in seconds, his hands squeezing Gabriel's throat.

Gabriel slapped Jack's wrists away and snapped forward, his forehead smashing into Jack's nose. It began to gush. Cursing, Jack slammed his fists into Gabriel's jaw. There hadn't been much windup, and Gabriel shook it off, jerked his hips off the ground, and unseated Jack. The blonde man rolled backward, hands raised for the counterattack.
"Warned her not to push that. That it was only for private situations. She fucking knew better-
"

"Come on, Jack. You going to talk or you going to fight?"

Jack's eyes narrowed and he gritted his teeth. "Now you're asking for it-"

"I know." Gabriel's tongue was swollen and he knew he was going to hurt worse in the morning. He tasted blood, unsure if it was his or Jack's. It didn't matter right now. They'd punch it out, and then they'd talk about what to do about you and Ziv.

Jack glared savagely at him, eyes flashing, teeth bared. He radiated violent energy with his arms up and a thin sheen of sweat coating his flushed skin. He did not resemble the composed figurehead war hero made for public consumption. This Jack was a wild thing, fierce and unrestrained.

"Bring it on, mi cielito. You're so goddamn beautiful when you're angry."

Gabriel lay on his side, facing Jack. Jack was beside him on his back. The mats were slippery with sweat and blood. Gabriel was still breathing hard and shallow, but Jack had leveled off.

"You seen Mihret?" Jack rolled onto his side.

"Nope. He's laying low. Athena isn't even sure where he's at." Gabriel had not pursued the inquiry further. It shouldn't have surprised him that you knew the AI's blindspots.

Jack growled. "Goddamnit, Lucky. She just had to interfere-"

"I'm not sure why you're surprised. You're the one who pointed out her obvious soft spot for renegade hackers and what happens when someone goes after one of hers."

Gabriel could feel Jack's scowl in his direction.

"And you know what's going on with her first one," Gabriel said softly.

Jack groaned. "Goddamnit, Gabe. I thought we were really going to try to keep these things separate."

"We are," Gabriel chuckled. "That's a tertiary reason. You know how it is. The three of us pretty much live on-duty. The wires would have gotten crossed even if she never slept with us."

Jack muttered something rude under his breath.

"Didn't catch that, baby."

"I'm still pissed."

Gabriel just lay there, waiting for Jack to expand on it.

"Two months of maneuvering down the drain, with nothing to show for it except a fucking
Gabriel didn't remind Jack that Hoffman was a bad candidate. Jack had to know it after reading your dossier. But that was salt in the wound. Jack would let it go eventually. Now wasn't the time to remind him that his hard work would not have been as fruitful as he anticipated.

"Mihret's an obnoxious little shit," Gabriel said. "But I'm hard-pressed to name anyone who is closer to her. We've all noticed how she dotes on him, like a younger sibling." Gabriel glanced over at Jack, who was staring at the ceiling.

"I can't allow such blatant favoritism," Jack said. "She knows better."

"You remember all those times we stepped out line?" Gabriel asked quietly. "And Aishani went to bat for us? She was a stickler for hierarchy. Rank dictated everything. But in those instances, she threw it out the window. It wasn't about nepotism, even if some people would claim that."

"Yeah." Jack exhaled slowly.

"We still got punished." Gabriel snorted. There were consequences, because Aishani was a hardass and she pushed them even further, because she loved them. But she didn't abandon her people when they screwed up, she just took it upon herself to make sure they learned never to do that again. "Mihret's insubordination isn't common knowledge. You're not breaking ranks by keeping him here."

"Gérard already laid out all the logical reasons not to throw him out: everything from his outrageous Talon bounty to his high security clearances and specialized tech knowledge. Still pisses me off that the bastard tried to resign. Such a melodramatic move. I mean, I've seen him pull some shady bullshit, but I guess I expected better."

Gabriel sighed, a pretty irritated that he had to defend Gérard. "It wasn't a threat, Jack. If Gérard wanted to guilt or threaten you, he has ample information to pull from."

Jack gave him a hard side eye.

"That was Gérard declaring for Mihret. Showing he was serious, that he thinks the kid is worth it. He kept referencing the Aleutians, remember? I offered to resign if they court-martialed you."

"We were fucking," Jack said tightly.

"Really? I thought we were making sweet, sweet love. I feel so used..."

That got a reluctant smile.

"My advice is let them all stew a few days. They deserve to sweat, but keep Mihret. He's a pain in the ass, but he is useful. I guess Lucky still has McCree as a backup sibling if you kick Mihret. And in a pinch, our Shimadas might be willing to adopt her. Genji could do worse for a sibling. Though I'm not sure about pushing her into closer proximity with the elder Shimada. He's obviously not good at brothering."

"I'll think about it," Jack muttered.

"Let Ana handle Gérard. She's the only one of us who faces off with him and routinely comes out on top. I think she's the only one of us that he's actually scared of."

Jack groaned. "You're right. But Lucky..."

"She's pretty sorry," Gabriel said, keeping his tone neutral. "But I understand why you're pissed. You have a right to be."

"I'm still pissed," Jack said. "I'm just not sure if this is more a personal or professional issue."

"It's both, and we know it." Gabriel chuckled softly. "You know we wouldn't like her so much if she was the type to hang Mihret out to dry."

Jack groaned. "Not you too-"

"Just reminding you. Doesn't get her a free pass, but it's helpful to remember that no matter how much it seems that way, the intransigent jackass doesn't actually do this shit to intentionally piss us off."

You and Jack had a different dynamic and rarely fought. It was past time for the two of you to really butt heads and sort out more boundaries. Gabriel wasn't worried. The two of you had been here before. And he and Jack had fought this fight as well. It was a growing pain, and easier to appreciate when he was outside the mix.

Jack's glare was too tired to be remotely intimidating. "You're enjoying this."

Gabriel wasn't going to admit that right now. "Nah, I'm just thinking up punishments for Mihret. That little shit's been pushing me for far too long. If you need ideas..."

Jack's fingers traced Gabriel's shoulder. "I don't want to think about that asshole right now. Got to deal with her too. Going to need some time to figure out how we're going to handle this."

"I'm sure you'll come up with an appropriate solution," Gabriel purred and rolled over to nip Jack's exposed throat.

"Poor Chanceux, she's been so worried that she'll lose her lover and her "brother" in one fell swoop."

Jack's jaw tightened. He was calm. This was business. He was focused on work, and certainly not wondering what you were up to. "You're on thin ice already, Gérard. This has nothing to do with her."

Gérard just smiled that smug little smile that made Jack want to punch him out his chair again. He didn't, but it was near thing.

"She's fine," Jack said, stubbornly, even though he had not spoken to you since the confrontation. It rang false, but Jack was not going to dwell on that. Not right now.

"Of course," Lacroix said, like butter wouldn't melt in his mouth. "You've been most reasonable and she's so well-adjusted."
There was a moment of pointed silence while Jack counted to ten. Then he counted to twenty. Then he just gave up and glared at Gérard. The bastard looked dapper and fresh in an ivory suit with a cheerful pink carnation in the buttonhole. He beamed at Jack, and Jack considering firing Gérard and Mihret, leaking scandalous photos of Petras, and then resigning. Ana could take over. It would all be her problem. He would get a farm. Gabriel would bring you to visit, and he would get a dog and the best cake he could find, and that would make you forgive him. Somehow.

"You're not making me the villain in this, Gérard."

"It never crossed my mind, Jack. But you certainly see my point."

"Lucky and Mihret are two different issues," Jack said, sharply. It didn't help that Gérard had a point. Treating you and Mihret as separate problems worked in theory, but Jack had to admit, if only to himself, because Gérard did not deserve the satisfaction, that it was more complicated than that.

"Of course, Jack. I'm sure Chanceux will be fine. She's much better than she used to be. She's only gone a day or two thinking the worst."

"Gérard..."

"Is he giving you trouble, Jack?" Ana asked as she entered the office.

Gérard whitened, and his smile froze for half a second, before he was on his feet to pull out a chair for Ana. "I wouldn't dream of it, Ana."

"That's what I like to hear," Ana smiled wolfishly at him and Jack felt the hair on the back of his neck stand up. What had Ana said to Gérard? Or was he happier not knowing? He knew that look intimately. It was like a rattler shaking its tail, or a hippopotamus opening its mouth, or lion's ears pricking up. It was a warning sign to keep on moving lest something very bad happen. Yes, he was much better off not knowing.

Ana took her seat and Gérard followed in suit, suddenly more subdued. He didn't droop, but he didn't look quite as jaunty as he had before.

"We were just discussing Chanceux as...collateral damage," Gérard said, his tone somber.

Ana just smiled that Mona Lisa smile, the patient, smug, all-knowing one that made Jack want to check to ensure he had remembered to wear pants this morning. Yes, he had, damn her.

"She is most distressed. Won't come out and say it, of course, far too proud. But after all this time, one can tell."

"Gérard, stop trying to distract Jack. Just because Lucky finally had to come to me for advice, and a refresher on policy and procedures, does not mean she's handling this badly. In fact, I think this is progress."

"She went to you?" Jack's voice came out strangled. "What for?"

"You know that's confidential, Jack." Ana's dangerously pleasant expression did not change at all. "Though I can say it would not have been necessary if you'd just talked to her before deciding to sack Agent Mihret."

"...Ana," he said, tone cautioning.
"Jack," she replied, smile sharp.

"We're here to discuss Agent Mihret."

"Of course, we are. You're the one asking about Lucky."

Jack swallowed his retort, unwilling to walk any further into that trap. He settled for giving Ana a disapproving frown.

She ignored it and leaned forward, resting her elbows on his desk. "All right then, back to business. After reviewing the circumstances of Operation Spinshot, here are my recommendations regarding Agent Ziv Mihret..."

You had not seen Jack yet today. After alternately fussing over Ziv and berating him for his stupidity, Winston, Torby, Jesse, and you took him to get coffee and dessert and let yourselves unwind. You were somewhat surprised to when Torby threw out a couple compliments about Ziv's technical skills. Actually, you were surprised Torby hadn't murdered Ziv. But that was best left unsaid.

Yes, Ziv was getting shipped off to America for a few weeks, but he was going somewhere warm, with beaches, and you were a little jealous. Not that you could bask in the relief just yet.

Because you still had to deal with Jack. So you muddled along with your subdued celebrations. Having Ziv off site wasn't the worst that could happen, but it did put a damper on things. Ziv was shaken, but too much of an ass to admit it, so he just ate too much dessert and belted out extra obnoxious comments.

To be honest, Chang's penal regimen would probably be good for him. Or at least it would be good to get him out of your hair for a few weeks. You wouldn't have to worry about him pissing off some bigger, tougher, more psychopathic operative and then have to go around smoothing things over or making quiet threats. Ziv was your hacker, but there was no denying that he was a massive pain in the ass.

You were actually relieved when you got the invitation to go out from Gabriel.

Gabriel picked up the pizzas and you tagged along, hood up, hands jammed in your pockets. You were probably going to get your ass kicked tonight. You'd been too worried about Ziv to focus on how annoyed you were at Jack, but that was rising to the surface now.

He'd threatened to boot Ziv. He'd blown you off and pulled rank instead of talking to you like a person, in private. He'd listened to everyone, but you.

"You're awfully quiet. I thought you'd be happy about Mihret," Gabriel said as the two of you made your way to Jack's quarters.

You shrugged. "Gotta sort things with Jack now."

"It's not that bad, baby." The bastard sounded amused. "The makeup sex will be worth it," he purred in your ear, and you almost dropped the pizzas.
When you got in, you had to do a double take, because the couch and coffee table had been shoved against the wall and there were thick blue practice mats already laid out. Jack crouched in the middle, stretching. He'd foregone shaving for a few days and he had visible stubble shadowing his jaw line. Most distractingly, Jack had stripped down to just a pair of shorts and no shirt. You bit your lower lip, trying not to openly stare at his chest and abs, as a flush worked its way across his pectorals.

"Hey." He greeted you both coolly, his eyes flicking to your face and then the pizza. "You want to eat first?"

"You should," Gabriel said, cracking open a beer. "You hungry, Lucky?"

"I'm good," you said, kicking off your shoes.

"Give me a moment," Jack said. He took the stack of pizza boxes from you and set them on the coffee table. He opened the top one and took two slices, eating them with the mechanical efficiency of a soldier.

You pulled off your hoodie. You had sparred with Jack enough times to know how to dress: tight compression shirt, athletic pants, and basic prostheses - nothing overly revealing. Skidding across the mats made for some unpleasant rashes, so it was better to keep your skin covered.

Stretching out on the mats, you caught Gabriel smirking at you. He seemed amused by this entire situation, and at this point he wasn't even trying to hide it. Irritation made you clench your fists, but you weren't going to pick a fight with him tonight. Not when Jack was first in the queue and had already set everything up to kick your ass. Well, he was going to have to work for it, because he wasn't the only one who was pissed off.

There was electrolyte solution on the table and an emitter already in its stand. Boy Scout was sure prepared. He finished his third slice of pizza and a bottle of the solution.

You didn't even need to ask what to expect. You'd done this enough times under friendlier circumstances.

Jack wiped his hands. "You sure about this?"

You shrugged. "Same rules apply? We stop if someone taps, uses safe words, or gets hurt."

"Yeah," Jack said, narrowing his eyes. "You don't have to do this. Give it a few days and we can sit down and talk."

"Stop being a chickenshit and let's get this over with."

Jack sucked in a breath. "Oh baby, you don't want to goad me right now."

"You obviously don't know what I want." The threat in his voice actually relaxed you. Jack was angry. You were angry. And while it seemed counterintuitive, both of you could set and follow the rules, making sparring a healthy outlet. You were venting your frustration within accepted limits.

It went unsaid that Jack had to hold back when he fought you. You weren't sure how much he was actually going to get out of this, but you didn't quite care.

You raised your hands, loose fists protecting your face. Knees bent, weight on the balls of your feet, you watched as Jack stalked onto the mats.

"You're going to be sorry," he said. "Don't say I didn't warn you when you're hurting tomorrow." He smiled coldly. "Or you can apologize now and maybe I'll go easy on your ass."

Now he was just trying to piss you off. "You wish. Now quit stalling and let's go."

There was a trick to sparring with super soldiers. You could not fight fair. You could not pit your strength directly against theirs. You kept your distance. If Jack straight punched you or got you in a chokehold, it was over. Your best strategy was a combination of attrition and precision strikes. You had to wear him down till he got clumsy and gave you an opening, provided you lasted that long.

You and Jack circled. He gave an experimental jab, stepping forward in a blink. You slid to back and to the side, and drove your metal knuckles into his floating rib.

Jack grunted and you had to move fast, dodging a side kick that would have sent you into the wall. He stepped forward, and you raised arm against your head, barely blocking an open palm strike aimed at your ear. It did less damage than a closed fist, but if it landed, it would have fucked up your equilibrium. So you couldn't bring yourself to "appreciate" the gesture.

Too close for comfort, you jumped backward, narrowly avoiding his follow-up attack on the other side of your head.

Jack was holding back, but he wasn't playing nice. He watched you without humor, and you pursed your lips. making a kissy noise at him. The set of your mouth slanted too vicious to be considered smiling.

Jack shook his head. "Now you're just asking for it."

"See, you think you're good at communication, but you're really not," you said.

"Says the one who'd rather shoot people than talk about her feelings. Don't give me that look. We all know it's true." Jack flashed you a nasty little smile.

"Fuck you. I've been in therapy since I got here. I talk about my feelings with people who listen and don't pull fucking rank to shut me down!"

Jack bristled, eyes cold. "Well then, come over here and talk to me."

"Is that an order?" You scowled. "Because you don't seem to be learning from your mistakes, sir."

"I'll come to you then." Jack lunged and you swore as he tackled you to the mats, the impact knocking the wind out of you. He rested his weight on you, his body solid and heavy against yours. He bared his teeth at you, a cocky set to his chin. "For such big talk, you're really not putting up much of a fi-"

You slammed your forehead into his nose and his head snapped back; he should have known better than to get into your headbutt range. Arrogant prick. Grinning savagely, you drew your knees up to your chest and drove your feet into his solar plexus, shoving him off you. He staggered backward, blood dripping from his nose. You got back on your feet, and swung your leg forward, nailing him in the throat with a front kick. You pulled it, holding back some, because the throat was a delicate point. You weren't trying to cause permanent damage.
Jack coughed, but didn't fall.

"What was that, baby? Having trouble understanding you. You need a moment?"

Jack wiped his face with the back of his hand, blood dripping down his arm. Eyes hard, shoulders back, he stared at you. "That was a mistake, sweetheart," he rasped. "Should've brought me down when you had the chance. I won't give you another one."

You just curled your left hand into a fist. "You know what you didn't give me a chance at? You didn't let me explain anything. You just jumped to dismissing Ziv. I wasn't asking for special treatment, Jack. If Captain Amari did what you did, I would have gotten into it with her too. Whatever my feelings, Ziv plays a crucial role on my team. I'm not about to ignore that."

Jack inclined his head back. He took a few deep breaths. "I know."

You dropped your guard. "And?"

"And you still should have taken me down when you had the chance," he said, charging forward. He grabbed your arm, already moving to throw you. You turned into it the lock, pivoting against him so your back was against his chest. You slipped your leg between his thighs and shoved him backward, knocking him off balance. He didn't release you though, and both of you went down. You immediately dropped your elbow as he hit the mat, and were satisfied to hear him wheeze as you knocked the air out of him.

He gripped your waist and you tried to wriggle free. But he began to squeeze you in a bearhug and you couldn't get loose. The pressure grew tighter and you winced, your ribs starting to creak.

"Tap, you stubborn thing."

You jerked your head backward, aiming at an angle for the general vicinity of his nose.

Jack just laughed as you fell short, the back of your head grazing his chin. "Just tap, baby."

"You think I'll do things...just because you tell me to." You dug your metal fingers into his arm, till they found and compressed the nerve that made him loosen his grip. You slid free and spun around, your left hand on his throat. You rested your knees on his arms, acutely aware that Jack wouldn't be in this vulnerable position if he'd taken you more seriously.

He watched you with thoughtful eyes, making no move to throw you off.

"I'd start squeezing, but you look like you have something to say." You were breathing hard, waiting for him to counterattack.

"Do you honestly think you're the only one who wants to protect your people?"

You said nothing, waiting for Jack to expand on that.

"I didn't give a shit about Hoffman. But she was a means to an end."

"Yeah, I know we need to get Epsilon Squad out of the line of fire. I really do feel bad about that, Jack-"

"Petras didn't threaten Epsilon Squad. He threatened you, you goddamn idiot!" Jack snapped. "Did you seriously expect me to sit by and do nothing?"
You blinked, relaxing your grip on his neck. "You were going to discharge Ziv-"

"I was pissed off," Jack scowled. "I would have reinstated him, eventually."

"...Because that's so reasonable."

"I don't know why you think we're reasonable about this. Was it reasonable for you to ignore me and take point in Paris? Was it reasonable for you to charge into a building alone after an unknown enemy in Belfast? Was it reasonable for you to volunteer to torture the sniper after he'd already told us everything he knew? Please, tell me if I need to define that word for you. I think it's very "reasonable" to be mad that two months of work ended up splattered all over the streets of Cologne."

"...You blew me off when it was important," you said, voice small.

"I'm sorry," he huffed. "That wasn't reasonable or OK."

You looked away, gnawing on your lip.

"You still shouldn't have used the kill switch."

"You were overreacting. What else was I supposed to do?"

There was a long silence and Jack began to stroke your calves. "Use your safe word next time," he muttered. "Kill switch is for policy issues. Usually conflicts between Gabe and me."

You blinked, because while that was weirdly legalistic, you understood where he was coming from. "Firing an agent is policy-"

"This was personal and you know it," Jack said, and he was right. He scooted out from under you, and sat up. "Safe word next time. It'll put me in a different headspace."

"...OK," you said, rubbing the back of your neck. "I'm sorry I fucked up your op."

"And?"

You looked at Gabriel for help, but the bastard just grinned at you and took a big bite of pizza. It was enormous. He crammed three quarters of the slice in his mouth.

Jack lightly shoved you onto your back.

"I'm sorry I tackled you in public and tore your suit?" You wondered, propping yourself up on your elbows.

Jack shook his head, smile smug. "You're so bad at this." He picked up your left hand, and kissed your knuckles. "Thank you for not running off and ghosting me when I know that's your first instinct."

"Thank you for not firing Ziv?" You wondered, because he hadn't just done that for you. Other people had lobbied for Ziv's retention.

Jack rolled his eyes and you knew you'd gotten the answer wrong again.

"Thank you for being understanding and coming up with a solution instead of staying mad at me and making it about rank?"
Jack's face softened. "Not what I was getting at, but you're welcome." He blushed a little. "Gabe had to remind me of some of our...previous issues. It wasn't only my overwhelming brilliance that solved everything."

You stared, unsure of what else you were supposed to say. You could think of several smart ass comments about Jack's brilliance, but you were pretty sure those were not going to be helpful.

"Thank you for watching her back, even though she's too dumb to realize it," Gabriel said with his mouth full.

You glared over your shoulder at him. "Really Gabriel?"

"If we waited for you to get it right, we'd be sitting here all night."

"You're not wrong," you admitted, and that stung. "But did you have to announce it with a mouthful of pizza?"

"We don't have any popcorn." He shrugged and took a big bite out of a new slice, chewing happily.

Jack laughed, his smile lopsided.

"Thanks," you said, reaching out to stroke his cheek. "For trying to get rid of Petras for me."

Jack shrugged. "Didn't work," he said with a single head shake. "Probably wouldn't have worked out like I wanted. Still-"

You reached up and kissed him, breath catching when he hungrily returned the gesture. He pushed you flat against the mat, eyes bright.

"I'm still pretty worked up, baby. You want to do something besides spar?"

"Yeah, I could go for some chess," you said and grinned at Jack's disgruntled look.

"You don't really want to...play chess right now, do you?" Jack asked, brows furrowed. "I mean, we can but..."

"What else did you have in mind?" A slow grin crossed your face and your eyes widened as Jack gripped your collar, and then jerked his hands downward, tearing your shirt open from neck to navel. "Damnit, Jack!"

"I'll buy you a new one," he said, pushing you back down against the mat.

You swallowed as he leaned over you, tongue darting out to flick against your lips. One hand cupped your breasts through your bra and the other began pulling your pants down your hips.

"You've been so cocky today. Need to pound your rebellious ass into the mats. You up for that? Just going to hold you down and fuck you till you're screaming-"

"Hold on-" You kicked your pants off and stripped off your bra before he could destroy that too. He gave you a half second to finish undressing before flipping you onto your stomach.

"Goddamn, you're already wet," Jack growled, his tongue trailing along the side of your neck. "Do you see this, Gabe? Someone likes being manhandled. I still think about it, you know.
What would have happened if you'd stuck around for me and Gabe that night you two first sparred. I'm a little sad I missed you two playing with knives on the farm.

"Practice knives," you moaned as he ground against your ass, his cock pressing hard against the cleft. Your inner thighs were already slick, and you shivered as Jack bit the back of your neck.

"Close enough. I want a turn," he said, fingers brushing against your clit. "Look at you. Didn't think you liked being rolled that much. Should I be jealous of all the other guys you drag to the mats?"

You gave him a skeptical look over your shoulder. "Really, Jack?"

"Give how hard we both raw her, do you think she has the energy to look at other men?" Gabriel smirked from the sidelines.

Jack's clever fingers slid inside you, spreading you open for him. "You always like this after a round?"

You shook your head. "Different with you two. Don't have a reputation to protect. With you I just get to play..." You shivered as Jack's thick fingers pumped in and out of your pussy. "And when you're touching me...ah!" Jack's teeth sunk into your shoulder, his body covering yours, his bare skin hot against your back. "Love how you feel," you panted. "You have no reason to worry-"

Jack gave a pleased hum, kissing your shoulder. "I know," he purred. "I just wanted to hear you say it."

Your smart retort dropped away as he pulled his fingers out and he rubbed the head of his cock against your lower lips.

"Look at you just presenting yourself to me, all primed and ready to go-"

"Bottomed out already, and I'm not even all the way in. But your pussy just keeps trying to suck me inside," Jack groaned. "Going to have to bend you over more often. Like seeing your face, but the way you clench around me-" He hauled your hips up, your face still resting on the mat, most of your weight on your knees. "There we go." He shifted and suddenly he was deeper, and you were fuller, impaled on him.

"Damnit Jack. Wasn't ready-" your fingers dug into the mats as he began move.

"Yeah, that's it. Take it all the way-" The was a sharp slap across your ass and you jolted forward.

"Jack!" You shuddered, because while it stung, you could feel his cock twitching inside you.

"Again?" He chuckled and you keened as he smacked the other cheek, the sound sharper than the sensation. You still flinched and he took a moment to rub the area, soothing the sensitive skin.

"Damnit, Jack," you closed your eyes, breathing hard.
"I think the correct response is, "thank you, sir," he said, voice low and rough in your ear. "Look at that needy cunt drooling around me. Can't get enough of this. You're always so eager to have your holes filled. Makes up for how difficult you like to be." He pushed against your ass, sinking further inside you.

"You're too deep!" You rested your forehead against the mat, legs shaking as he stroked your back.

"No such thing," he sighed, drawing back and then snapping his hips forward. "Though if you're begging for me to go easy on you already-"

"Fuck you, Jack!" You snarled, and pushed back against him, squeezing his shaft with your inner muscles.

"That's what I want to hear," he growled softly. "You just keep being stubborn. It'll make fucking the defiance out of you that much sweeter."

"That'll take more than you've got."

"Then I'll settle for fucking you into an incoherent mess on the ground," he snapped and increased the tempo, his cock driving into you at a hard rhythm.

His skin burned hot against yours and sweat beaded on your forehead. You bit your metal fingers, trying to muffle your squeaks and moans. You weren't just taking it, you were practically bouncing off his thighs, but he kept a hard grip on your hips, not letting you get too much control.

"Stop that." He tugged your hair, lifting your head off the mats. You groaned as his fingers began to press on your clit. "I want to hear you coming apart. No need to be quiet here."

"Who says you deserve the satisfaction?" You panted, voice going high as he began moving his hips in a figure eight pattern. With each motion his cock dragged against your walls, and the pleasure of the being stretched out had you gasping.

"Fight me on this if you want. I'll just tie you up. I know you like that, but do you really want to be helpless when I'm this worked up?" He said roughly in your ear.

You whimpered involuntarily.

"-Because it'll just make things easier for me. I'll get to do whatever I want to you. Going to wreck that sweet pussy, baby. You give me as much attitude as you want. It just makes me want to fuck you harder."

He shifted his angle once more, the crown of his cock stroking your g-spot with each thrust. His fingers moved faster on your clit.

"Love watching you swallow up my cock, baby. All the smartass remarks don't change the fact you're soaking wet for my dick."

You were certain people would laugh at you if you told them Strike Commander Morrison had penchant for dirty talk and a filthy mouth.

You moaned as he pounded you into the mats like he promised, his arm around your waist the only thing holding you up. You were sopping wet, and you could hear the slick sounds of his shaft sliding into you.
"I was so fucking mad at you, baby. Still laid in bed jerking myself off, thinking about having you like this," he breathed in your ear. "This is better than the fantasy." His fingers worked frantic pattern against your clit and your channel tightened, trying to pull him deeper inside. "You're so close, aren't you? Want it harder, then?"

"Yes," you nodded even as he set a savage pace, cock battering at your walls with punishing force. "Jack, I can't-"

"That's it, sweetheart. You just lay there and take it. I want to hear you scream for me while I plow that tight little pussy. Want to watch my cum pour our of your freshly fucked hole. Want to see you lying under me, shaking and crying because you can't take it any more-"

You were wound too tight and brittle after the day's events. He broke you down, your body trembling underneath him. Your cries had him growling and thrusting wildly while you clenched around him. He was hell-bent on tearing you apart and you didn't care so long as he didn't stop. You clamped down on him, the pleasure wringing you out at a merciless rhythm. Your body tensed too hard, muscles in your calf knotting into a cramp.

Jack swore, burying his face in your hair and sheathing himself to the hilt. His cock twitched inside you, and you gave a strangled moan as his cum gushed inside you.

Mind hazy, you lay on the mat, Jack resting against you, one arm by your head keeping his full weight off your body. You were almost comfortable, but the pain in your calf became more and more insistent. You moved your arm back, trying to reach it, but the angle was all wrong.

Jack growled and yanked you up, flush against his chest.

"J-Jack." You wiggled against his lap, still impaled on his shaft.

"Shh," he murmured, pressing his mouth to the back of your neck. "Want to tell me what you thought you were doing, agent?"

"Cramp. Left calf." You said shakily.

Jack's fingers pressed against the taut muscle and you groaned as he carefully loosened the knot in your leg.

"Better?" He asked and you nodded.

"Thanks," you sighed, resting the back of your head against his chest. He stroked your hair. "I uh...mess on you-" You said as a mix of his cum and your juices began to dribble out.

His half-hard cock twitched inside you and you gulped.

"Now that we've gotten the warm-up out of the way, are you going to behave me for me?" Jack asked, tongue flicking your ear.

You shuddered against him.

"I asked you a question, agent." One of Jack's arms stayed around your waist, but his free hand began to squeeze your breasts and you panted softly.

"Yes, sir," you exhaled.

Jack's satisfied chuckle made you rub your thighs together.
"Good to see that you remember how to address me," Jack purred. "Even with my cum oozing out of you."

"Only because you like it so much, sir." You were going to have to be careful about what inflection you used in public. Because whenever you called Jack "sir" in private, you loaded it with as much innuendo as possible.

"On your back, agent," Jack said, ignoring your jibe. "I know it's hard to get off my dick, but I'll have it back inside you soon enough."

Your cheeks heated up and crawled off Jack's lap, teeth worrying at your bottom lip as you pulled yourself off of him. You rolled onto your back, eyes widening when you saw the thick streams of cum draining out of you.

"Don't worry, baby. There's plenty more where that came from, and I'll be generous with you." Jack leaned over you, his face flushed, eyes fever bright. He cupped your face, kissing you hard, tongue curling against yours, teeth grazing your lips. His skin glistened with a thin sheen of sweat and he radiated warmth.

"I won't last if you're going to go that hard again," you murmured.

"You don't have to last. Gabe's here too. I just want to mess you up tonight, agent. And with my stamina, you don't stand a chance. You don't have to go all night long, you just have to take it till I've decided you've had enough." His smile was harsh, and you rolled your eyes.

"You're just insatiable-" you managed to get out and were rewarded with a sharp bite on the shoulder. You squealed and he laughed in your ear.

"You were a pain in my ass, so I'm going to fuck you silly. Seems like a fair trade." He lifted your legs over his elbows. "Status, agent?"

"Green," you said, breath catching as a calloused finger traced your slit. Jack pressed a kiss to your belly. He cupped your ass, raising your hips.

"It's a good thing you're pretty, agent. I normally administer harsher punishments for insubordination. You keep up the attitude and you can report to my office at 0600 tomorrow morning. I'll give you something to be sore about." He said in low tones, sounding more like your CO than the man who'd just made you come all over his floor.

You still shivered at the timbre of his voice. "Is this how it would have gone if you got me alone right after Belfast?"

"Probably." Jack snapped his hips forward and you fell back against the mats as he pushed inside you. He gritted his teeth and your eyes fluttered shut as you tried to adjust to him again. He made you ache, his fullness and heat throbbing between your thighs. You arched off the ground as he worked himself in.

"Goddamnit, agent. How the hell did you get tighter after I fucked you open?"

"You're used to anal. Vaginas work differently," you said, not a little smug.

He snarled and buried himself all the way inside you. You dropped your head against the mats, grateful for the padding. They were actually a lot more comfortable than the cheap carpet.

"Speaking of which, can't do that to my ass without prep, OK? I'm not going to be able to "Shut up, sweetheart," he said softly, and you watched him pull out, cock shiny with your fluids. "You talk like I don't know what I'm doing. Now the only things I want to hear out of your mouth are "please, sir," or, "thank you, sir," or "I can't take any more, please have mercy, sir." He kept the slow hard strokes, eyes on your face.

"Is that an order?"

"You really going to sass me right now? Because I can stop..." He pulled all the way out, cockhead lightly bumping against your clit, because he was a goddamn tease.

"Please, Jack," you panted. He grinned down at you, sweaty blonde hair falling in his face.

"Nuh-uh," he said with a headshake. "That's not how you ask."

You bit your lip and rocked back against him, feeling him slip between your thighs. You ground against his hips and he groaned, hands kneading your ass cheeks.

"Please, sir," you moaned, licking your lips. "I'll be in your office tomorrow. I'll even dress up-"

"Is that so?" Jack's voice dropped an octave. He pushed his hair out of his face, his gaze piercing.

You nodded rapidly. "Just...maybe not at 0600 hours, sir. Not with how you're looking at me right now."

"That is...acceptable, agent." Jack's voice came out strained. He slid back inside you, and you sighed in contentment.

"Thank you, sir."

A shadow fell across you, and your eyes widened as Gabriel settled down beside you, naked. He fisted his cock, slowly stroking it while he watched Jack thrust inside you.

"Do you want a turn?" Jack asked.

"I'll watch, for now." Gabriel grinned at you both. "You two are just too damn entertaining..."

You had accidentally punctured the mats with your left hand, your metal fingers digging too hard into the foam. Jack stroked your forehead as you lay sprawled against the ground, your knees jelly.

"Let's get you cleaned up," he said, nuzzling your throat.

"I can nap here," you said sleepily. "It's comfortable."

"Nah, going to rail Gabe next. You won't get much sleeping done," Jack chuckled and you struggled to keep your eyes open. He picked you up, looking unbearably smug. But you were too tired to care. "Are you really going to come to by the office for me tomorrow?"

"Mmm, yeah. I'll help you with paperwork," you said as he set you down in the shower. Gabriel lingered in your periphery, but still seemed more interested in watching you and Jack than joining in.

"I'd like that," Jack said, turning on the water. He lathered you up, being thorough to the point of ridiculousness. You almost kicked him when he tried to soap between your toes. But he caught your leg and kissed you inner thigh. "Behave, sweetheart. Unless you want me to fuck you against the wall."

You gave short laugh. "I've got no energy left."

"I can do all the work. You can just cheer for me," Jack laughed, helping you rinse off.

"We're good now, yes?" You asked after a moment.

"Yeah, we're good," he said, touching his forehead to yours.

"OK," you sighed in relief.

"We were good before I actually started undressing you," Jack added as he shut off the water and helped Gabriel towel you off. "I just wasn't going to talk about it while balls deep inside you."

"I figured," you said dryly. "But checking on it anyway. You owe me a new shirt and a new negligee."

"I'll get you a whole new wardrobe, just make sure you show up in my office tomorrow."

Your orchid sat blooming on the sink, next to the toothbrushes, its lavender petals plush and vibrant, the leaves a glossy green. You glanced at Jack for a moment, realizing it was doing better with him than in your room.

"It's doing fine. Ana gave him some pointers," Gabriel said, when he noticed your gaze.

"Thanks," you told Jack. "I think it likes you better."

"You're welcome." Jack kissed you, looking very pleased with himself.

You limped to the bed, unable to get Jack to stop fluffing your hair with the towel. Gabriel set up the emitter and Jack tucked you in.

"I told you it was going to be fine," Gabriel rumbled in your ear.

You nodded, eyes drooping shut as you heard Gabriel swear and Jack chuckle. Jack embraced Gabriel from behind, before pushing him onto the bed beside you. It was a shame you were so tired. Maybe next time...
So I bombed the interview. Which is OK. I've mopped up my ego, had some cake, and mapped out where I went wrong. (Spoiler: I panicked and my charisma took a -10 penalty). But there are plenty of jobs in that city and I'm getting ready to weed through them and apply. I do appreciate all the good wishes though. You guys are great. Your comments give me life, and I'm not ashamed to say that I've had some rough writing days and after reading the thoughtful things you post, I'm like "Yeah! I'll write more!"
Chapter 48

Chapter Summary

A day in the Strike Commander's office.

Chapter Notes

Mamimi decided to jump on the "what if they had kids together" headcanon and ride it into the sunset. I admit, that is kind of terrifying, given Lucky has just gotten comfortable with the idea of having plants and she knows she isn't around enough to take care of a pet. Though there are some pet subplots coming.

Lucky with Gabriel's daughter and Jack's son
Gabriel's daughter as an adult

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You awoke to Jack's alarm going off, your face pressed to his chest. He lay between you and Gabriel, groaning as he vainly reached for the nightstand.

"Hit snooze, Gabe," Jack muttered.

"You'll oversleep," Gabriel said gruffly, but the beeping stopped.

"Athena?"

"Yes, Strike Commander?"

"Do I have any meetings before nine?"

"No, Strike Commander."

"Then let me sleep till eight, OK?" Jack tightened his grip around your waist. "You still coming in today, Lucky?"

Gabriel just laughed, giving Jack a loud kiss. "You two are ridiculous."

You made a quick stop at the cafeteria for breakfast. You'd get coffee for you and Jack out of Gabriel's office before you went up. The cafeteria coffee was passable if you liked tarry sludge or had no taste buds. It was potent as hell, and you suspected someone was spiking it with a turbo-charged experimental stimulant, so you only drank it in emergencies. And to be honest, Jack didn't need that much caffeine.

Once in your room, you were tempted to change into the Assassin Butler outfit, and while it was still cool as hell, it didn't quite suit your plans. You already had an outfit in mind, and you had Captain Amari to thank for ever so casually picking it out. When Amélie purchased the outfit, along with way too many other pieces, they had just seemed like more articles of flattering clothing to improve on your functional, but not fashionable, wardrobe. Now you were left wondering if Captain Amari had known exactly what she was recommending.

...Well, shit. Given how well she knew Jack and Gabriel, of course, she knew what she was doing.

Damn, you were slow. How much of this new wardrobe was tailored to...entice Jack and Gabriel? You rested your face in your palm. Not all of it. But enough.

Muttering under your breath, you fixed the garter belt, the flesh-toned stockings not quite concealing the scarring on your left leg. Whatever, everyone had seen your scars by now. You had nothing to hide. The black back seam made it easier to orient the hosiery correctly, but Amélie swore up and down that it was sexy. You just shrugged and took her word for it. She was the expert on the subject.

The fitted black pencil skirt went to your knees, but the back slit was just high enough to give you a decent range of motion. You'd tear it if you had to fight in it, but it would do for walking across the Overwatch grounds.

The white collared shirt had a lacy ruffled trim along the top few buttons. It was not something you would have chosen, but Captain Amari claimed it was flattering. She wasn't lying. It was also too transparent to wear with just a bra. You could put on a camisole, but you weren't exactly aiming for modesty.

The blazer matched the skirt, and it buttoned at just the right level to emphasize the ruffles of the shirt. You'd seen some very ugly skirt suits in your day, but this one cut a fashionable silhouette. Both Captain Amari and Amélie had impeccable taste. You fastened the ankle strap on your three inch black heels. Amélie had picked them out, saying that ballroom dancers used them and they were far more comfortable and secure than they looked.

You stood, taking an experimental step. She wasn't wrong, though you didn't want to ever fight in them. On a whim, you put in the earrings Jack gave you for Christmas and went in the bathroom to finish up your makeup. Amélie had recommended "bold" and "classic" looks with this outfit. And while that day had been trying, you had been paying attention. You chose black mascara, eyebrow pencil slightly darker than your natural color, and a dark shade of red lipstick that wasn't entirely professional. It wasn't blatantly sexual, but it was pushing the boundaries.

You put your hair back in a professional, if restrained style that required pins and some product you'd "borrowed" from your lovers' bathrooms. Taking a look in the mirror, you were slightly surprised, not that you looked good, but that you managed to appear both professional and dangerous in such a polished manner. You pulled on your leather gloves, feeling like a very well-dressed assassin.

Maybe Amélie and Captain Amari were onto something.
You stopped by the office to pick up decent coffee, and Jesse choked on his drink when you walked in. Gabriel wasn't there and you were slightly disappointed that you didn't get to showoff your new outfit, considering he'd been so intrigued in the first place.

"...You uh...you got some kind of event today?" Jesse patted at his face with a napkin.

"Just helping Jack out with some office work." You kept your face blank, but you knew you weren't fooling Jesse.

"Is that what they call it nowadays, honeycakes?"

"I guess you wouldn't know," you said dryly.

Jesse dropped his head sighing heavily. "You know, you don't have to rub my nose in it, sugarpie."

"...Yeah, you're right. Sorry." You made coffee and filled up two travel mugs, adding plenty of sugar to Jack's. You carried a black leather briefcase that locked, instead of a purse.
"You talk to her about...things yet?"

"Yeah." Jesse gave a half-hearted shrug. "She needs time to think it over. Still says she's too old, that rank and abuse of power are issues, that she has to focus on work and her daughter... I ain't asking her to quit, Lucky. I'm certainly not trying to get between her and Fareeha. It feels like maybe I'm not so important to her and really, why should I keep hanging on when she don't feel the same way?"

"Maybe you shouldn't," you acknowledged. "You deserve to be cared about, Jesse. You can't make Captain Amari do one thing or another, but you don't have to hang on if it's hurting you.
Just like you don't have to walk away if you're not ready. Unless she's told you to. Except, I'm pretty sure if she told you to, you already would have."

"Yeah," Jesse said, dropping his hat over his eyes. "Would've come straight to you for whiskey and waffles."

"Don't tell Ziv, but I've still got some maple syrup left. We can have whiskey and waffles when you need it."

"Much obliged." Jesse flexed his fingers. "Maybe I'm just bad a love, Lucky. I mean, look at me. Sure, I'm amazing in bed, but I don't have that kind of stable background that makes people think I'll be good at commitment or making other people happy."

That fear was a familiar one. You weren't sure about stability or how good you were at making other people happy. But you tried, and Jesse was trying too.

"We've all got rough edges, and you're a doll. You've been at this for as long as I've been here. So I don't think you have issues with commitment; you're damn loyal. Besides, it's not you, Jesse. I think if Captain Amari had doubts about your sincerity it never would have gotten this far."

He dipped his head in acknowledgement.

You paused. "Though if you're on the rebound, I think Shoal was interested. Diallo's asked me a few times about your status. Tataryn too. Hell, you could hit on Hanzo and see what happens." Probably outrage and tons of awkwardness, but it was a funny thought.
Jesse snorted. "Not in this lifetime, sugarpie. Not after what he did to Genji."

"Loyalty, see?"

"Ain't the same, sweetpea. But I do appreciate the sentiment."

You felt the eyes on you as you passed, but you took Amélie's advice, you led with your hips, with your shoulders back and your head held up high. Your face was all business, though you kept your expression in check, shying away from being overtly threatening. Yes, you were attractive, but you were also clever, dangerous, and prone to stabbing enemies in the neck. There was no point in hiding it any more. Those Overwatch killjoys could suck it.

Except when you actually made eye contact, it wasn't scorn or hostility on their faces. There was fear and discomfort on some, but one younger rookie in combat blues had to look away, blushing a fierce shade of crimson. A few of the cockier ones winked at you and saluted, their looks admiring, but their behavior respectful.

...Well, they had all seen you almost-naked and stabbing a cyborg. Apparently, it wasn't just Jack, Gabriel, and Tataryn who were turned on by homicidal women.

It was a stark contrast to what people were saying when you first arrived.

So you walked tall, and didn't hesitate to key in the code to Jack's office. The door opened and you strode in. Strike Commander Morrison sat at his desk, posture tight, hands clasped under his chin as he glared at his computer screen. He was in full gear, and wasn't that overkill if he just had paperwork to do?

"It's about ti-" Jack trailed off as he looked up, his pupils widening as he took in your appearance. His nostrils flared, and he inclined his head back, sitting with his legs spread. "You're later than I expected, Agent Strike."

Oh, was that how it was going to be?

"Sorry, sir. Rough night," you said, deadpan demeanor locked in.

"I don't need to hear your excuses, agent," he rumbled, eyes still traveling up and down your form. "And I certainly don't care what you get up to in your free time. But I hope you don't have plans for the evening, because we have a lot of ground to cover. It's going to be a late night." His voice was gruff and while you caught plenty of innuendo in the words, his delivery remained firm verging on harsh.

"As you say, sir." You set the coffee on the desk.

He nodded curtly. "I've forwarded the bulk of the black ops post-mission reports to you. Prioritize them for me. Summarize anything Routine and lower. The shorter the better."

Well, that was irritating. The work was necessary, and something Athena or even Jesse could do, though you understood why the Strike Commander might be hesitant to make the AI his personal assistant.
You did not sit directly across from him. Instead you took a seat at one of the chairs against the wall. You crossed your legs, not missing Jack's sharp intake of breath as your skirt rode up just high enough to show off the lacy tops of your stockings. Ignoring him, you opened your briefcase, pulling out your tablet, and closed the case quickly, before Jack could see the contents.

Normally you didn't use a stylus, you didn't need to, but you rolled one between your fingers, absently resting it against your lips. Jack didn't say a word, and if he wanted to play like this, that was fine. You would focus on the paperwork first.

You focused on the screen in front of you, even though you could feel Jack's eyes on you. The work was tedious, but Jack actually needed the help, and you had offered. Though maybe this wasn't what you had in mind. Still, you were an old hand at sorting reports, and it did not take you very long to forward the important ones to him.

"Agent, why is this marked "Priority?" Jack stood and stalked over to you. He loomed over you, frown severe,

You looked up at him, chin raised. His gaze flicked to the column of your neck and then down to your swell of your breasts. You smiled politely.

He leaned over, close enough that you got a whiff of his cologne. "Since when was a scavenging-retrieval mission "Priority?" The agent in question didn't even locate anything particularly interesting."

"The agent in question is Vo Min, yes that one. And she nearly caused an international incident involving some of the salvage and her penchant for solving every problem with high-powered explosives. Personally, I don't blame Vo. She has a highly specialized skill set and probably shouldn't have been let off leash alone. The issue isn't the mission, the issue is mending fences in Finland. Captain Amari already made a trip out there, but I thought you should be aware of the implications."

Jack narrowed his eyes at you. "You failed to include that summary."

"But you told me to summarize anything lower than-"

"I didn't ask for you backtalk, agent, or your excuses. I realize Blackwatch doesn't maintain the same level of discipline as Overwatch, and I will be taking Commander Reyes to task for that. But apparently I'll have to start with you. On your feet, agent."

You were breathing harder now, giving Jack a dark look.

"Did I not make myself clear? Get up, now."

You set your tablet aside, and stood, Jack's face only inches from yours, heat radiating from his body. He did not back up, instead standing over you, a slight sneer marring his features.

"Get over there." He jerked his head at the desk. "Palms flat on the desk."

You obeyed, wiggling your hips as you bent over. You glanced up at him over your shoulder.

Jack gave you a humorless smile. "Only putting forth the bare minimum, I see. It's that kind of attitude that pisses me off, agent. You really need to work on giving it your all."

You glared up at him.
He came up behind you, gloved hand resting on your low back. "Don't like that? Too bad. Down, girl." He pushed you flat against the desk, the metal cool against your cheek. His other hand went lower, stroking your hips and you squirmed. "Cute outfit, agent. Not regulation, but you like to flaunt the rules, don't you? That takes a lot of nerve, coming right into the Strike Commander's office, dressed like this. It's almost like you're determined to keep on pushing me."

"This is professional business attire, sir. I'm afraid I don't see what your problem is," you said, struggling to keep your voice even.

His hand rested on the curve of your ass and your eyes fluttered shut. "Oh, your skirt might be long enough, but just what are you wearing underneath?" He hiked your skirt up, fingers tracing the tops of your stockings. "Are you going to tell me this is professional, agent? Because I'm going to have to inquire about what kind of activities your profession entails." He was practically growling in your ear.

"Don't like it, don't look," you panted.

"Completely unrepentant. Honestly, Agent Strike. What am I going to do with you?" Jack let your skirt fall back down. He rounded his desk, opening up a drawer. You caught sight of a familiar bottle of lube and a pretty purple egg vibrator. Your eyes widened as he picked it up. Did he just normally keep that in there? Or was he already planning on doing this today?

You swallowed roughly, as he came back around, hand resting on your ass.

"Spread your legs, agent."

Biting your lip, you obeyed, eyes fluttering shut as he shoved your skirt up around your hips.

"These definitely aren't regulation," Jack muttered, as his bare fingers stroked the crotch of your lacy black panties. "I realize they're pretty, agent, so I guess you can keep them on, for now."

You whined softly as he kept stroking you through your panties. "Sir-"

His blunt fingers pushed the fabric aside and he blew gently on your slit. "Of course you're already wet," he scoffed. "You're completely shameless."

You moaned softly as his fingertips parted your folds. "Sorry, sir-"

You rested your weight on the desk, breathing hard as you felt his tongue glide against your pussy lips. "Oh god."

Jack's laugh was mean. "Just a few touches and I have you mewling. Making you beg won't take any time at all. I'm really not impressed by Blackwatch discipline, agent. You're going to have to do much better than that." He rubbed the silicone toy against you and your legs shook. It wasn't on, but you were very aware that he could start the motor at any moment.

Once it was slippery enough, he pushed it inside you.

"Look at that greedy cunt just swallowing it up. Well, agent, you've gotten past the first hurdle." He stood, wiping his slick fingers on the backs of your thighs. "What are you just laying there for? Get back to work."

You shivered, smoothing your skirt back down as you straightened up. Jack stood behind you, stance rigid as he watched you put yourself back together. Hands balled in fists by his side, his gaze was positively icy, his erect cock clearly outlined against his combat pants. It was good to see that he was affected too.

"Open," he ordered.

You parted your lips and he offered you his fingers, still damp with your juices.

"Clean up your mess, agent."

You licked his fingers, watching his jaw clench with every stroke. Yeah, Jack was a shit and you were going to enjoy paying him back.

"Status, agent?"

"Green, sir," you sighed as he withdrew his fingers.

"Then get back to work," he growled, stalking back to his desk.

"Lucky Lady! You look so lovely!" Reinhardt boomed as he entered the office. You sat in your chair, pretending to ignore Jack as you sorted through the reports. You were still only summarizing the Routine level ones. If Jack wanted to hit you with trumped up accusations, nothing you did would matter. So you just stuck to the original instructions.

The low key vibrations began right as Reinhardt stomped in, his greeting echoing in the office.

"Hello Rein," you said, waving. Your core clenched as the vibrations grew stronger and you fought the urge to glare at Jack.

"Indoor voice, Reinhardt," Jack sighed, shaking his head. "I've got a headache, so we have to keep the meeting short."

Reinhardt gave you a long look, his eyes darting between you and Jack. "You seem tense, Lucky. Is everything all right?"

"Jack dumped a bunch of paperwork on me. It's all the irritating minutiae that he needs to know but doesn't want to handle."

Reinhardt nodded sympathetically and you bit your lip as the egg shook inside you.

"She volunteered for this," Jack said dryly. "So I don't know what she's complaining about."

"Jack, I realize you need the help and she offered, but this is not romantic. This not how you show your lover that you appreciate her," Reinhardt said, shaking his head. "Making her do your paperwork...Americans."

Jack gave you both a dirty look.

You choked on a laugh, and the egg briefly stopped before speeding up with a vengeance. Jerking forward, you caught yourself, breathing unsteady.
"Everything all right, Lucky?" Reinhardt asked with concern.

Your legs were crossed, and that just increased your sensitivity. But you couldn't exactly shift positions with Reinhardt standing right there.

"Just tired," you admitted, trying not to squirm. "It's been a busy week."

Reinhardt nodded slowly, like he knew something was off, but he was too polite to ask. "Well, I won't keep you. She can be in here while we discuss business, yes Jack?"

Jack nodded. "She's cleared."

Reinhardt pulled up a chair, his back to you while you tried to focus on the work in front of you. But the motor in the sex toy kept running. Thankfully, it was quiet, but it moved in a pattern, strong and hard, then light and teasing, then pulsing back harder than before. It continued and you ground your teeth, willing yourself to be silent. You weren't listening to Jack and Reinhardt, and you could not actually focus on reading the reports any more. You just went through the motions, conscious of Jack's eyes on you, a satisfied smile playing at the corners of his mouth.

"It was good seeing you, Lucky," Reinhardt said, as he rose to leave. "Maybe you should consider transitioning to the Overwatch side. You have a flair for dramatic television appearances and if you dressed like that..."

"My media appearances will never top "Eichenwalde: Nach Einer Wahren Begebenheit."

So what's the point?"

Reinhardt flashed you a delighted smile. "You saw it?!"

You nodded vigorously. "It was...indescribable."

"It did not really happen that way," he said, giving you a conspiratorial wink.

"You'll have to tell me the real story some other day," you said, breath catching as Jack turned up the power on the egg.

"Reinhardt, we need to get back to work," Jack said, sounding a tad exasperated.

"Oh, yes," Reinhardt shook his head. "That's what he wants to do?" He muttered something wearily in German, and sauntered out of the office.

You waited for the door to shut before uncrossing your legs, parting your thighs. You glanced over at Jack, expecting him to be watching you smugly. Instead, he was on his feet, eyes icy, remote in hand.

"Come here, agent." His voice was rough and dangerously quiet.

"I thought you needed me to work on-"

The vibrator rattled inside you, humming against your inner walls. You doubled over, panting.

"I'm going to keep turning it up. You might want to walk over here now, unless you'd prefer to crawl."

You put your work aside and stood on shaky legs. It was only a few steps, but the edge in Jack's smile sharpened as the power in the little toy increased. You panted as you reached his desk, hands resting flat on the metal surface.

"Get on the desk," Jack ordered, words clipped. "On all fours."

You climbed on top, eyes squeezed shut as the toy shifted inside you.

"You're really pushing it, agent. Never realized you were such a tease."

"You're one to talk...sir." Your thighs shook as Jack tilted your chin up.

"I didn't ask for your opinion, agent." Jack released you and walked behind you, his fingers tracing the seam of your stockings. Your skirt went back up and he yanked your panties down around your knees.

"You put some thought into this, agent. You're wearing your panties over your stockings, almost like you expected them to come off." Jack's warm hands kneaded your ass and you moaned the toy sped up. "Did you think it would be a good idea to come here and tease me, agent? Did you think there wouldn't be consequences? I should make you accompany me while I do my rounds. See how long you can last with that vibrator running inside you."

"You'll have a difficult time walking around with that prominent hard-on...sir," you hissed.

"I have a few ideas on how to take care of that." Jack pushed a finger past your lower lips and you dropped your head, whimpering as he brushed up against the toy. "You're dripping all over my desk, agent," Jack murmured. "Such a sloppy pussy." He curled his fingers and your breathing grew ragged. "Still a pretty picture though. Is that why you came here dressed like this, agent? Did you want your commander to fuck you? Or did you just plan on provoking me?"

You clutched the edge of his desk, head hanging down while he withdrew his fingers.

He ran his hands down your flank, fingers tensing and you bit back a squeal as he slapped your ass. "I asked you a question, agent."

"Thought you'd like it, sir. Was I wrong?"

Jack gave a humorless laugh. "I like it too much, agent." His fingers stroked your thighs before he landed another blow that was more sound than force. "Well agent, as entertaining as it would be to have you come all over my desk, I think you should finish what you started. Get on your knees."

He sat down in his chair, legs spread wide. He held the remote in one hand, his chin resting on his other fist.

You slid off the desk, kneeling between his thighs. Jack running his thumb across your cheeks. "Your makeup is nice today, agent. It's going to be a pleasure messing it up. I can't wait to see your lipstick rubbed off on my cock."

Jack just flashed you a tight smile. "Go on agent, wrap those pretty lips around me. You don't get to come till I do." The vibrator whirred inside of you, stirring you up, but only holding you on edge. It was quiet, thankfully. You just had to keep yourself in check.

You unfastened his belt, your fingers digging into his thighs. Jack groaned as you carefully untucked his cock. "Say what you like about my underwear, sir, but at least I wore some."
"You know agent, the only thing I want to hear out of your smart mouth is the sound of you slurping on my cock."

Oh yes, payback was going to be so much fun. Jack’s cockhead dripped pearly fluid and you ran your tongue along the underside, palming his balls in your gloved hand, and Jack hissed. Grinning, you licked the head, gradually taking a few inches in your mouth.

"You don't want to keep teasing me, agent."

You just sucked on the crown, your eyes meeting his blue ones. Jack bit his lower lip, his expression harsh. He shook his head at you, fisting your hair, and he thrust his hips forward, pushing himself in to the base.

Gagging, you forced yourself to relax, as your eyes watered. Breathing heavy, Jack's thighs shook. Swearing, he tilted his head back. "Tap if it's too much, agent."

You rolled your eyes and began bobbing your head, conscious of Jack's grip on your hair. He didn't let you set the pace, alternately holding you in place with your hair and thrusting his cock till your nose was pressed against him. The vibrator buzzed inside you the entire time and you squeezed your thighs together.

"You've been practicing. You do this for Commander Reyes too? Do you let him throat fuck you before he bends you over his desk?" Jack's voice wavered. He pushed hard, not caring that his shaft scraped lightly against your teeth. "Damn, that's hot, sweetheart. Want to walk in on that some time."

Jack began to rock his hips faster, making it difficult to breathe. You tried to keep up, but his length kept hitting the back of your throat too hard. You tapped and Jack immediately released you, letting you settle back on your knees. You coughed, sucking in air. Your lipstick was smeared along his shaft. You blinked and eyes damp, and hoped your mascara was as "waterproof" as advertised.

"You all right?" Jack asked, studying your face.

"We actually work in Commander Reyes' office, sir," you said, voice uneven.

Jack gave you a hard look. "You just don't know when to quit, do you agent? Guess I'll have to keep using that smart mouth of yours. The real question is are you going to swallow or should I paint that pretty face of yours with my cum?"

"I'd prefer if you didn't mess up my suit, sir," you murmured. "Not if you want me to wear it again..."

"Message received, agent," Jack said dryly. "Now get back to work." The toy inside you began to rumble harder and you braced yourself against Jack's knees, hips shaking. "And if I catch you touching that greedy pussy, I'm going to put you over my knee and ensure you can't sit down for the rest of the day."

Obediently, you took him back in your mouth, his cock still coated in your saliva. He went slower this time, letting you adjust.

Jack groaned as you wrapped one hand around the base, squeezing and pumping while you worked the top half in your mouth. Your other hand lightly massaged his balls. It took some coordination to keep it neat, especially since you were drooling down his shaft.
"That's it, sweetheart. Fuck, I still remember the last time you did this. We'll call Gabe, later. Let him listen in. He'll make it up here this time-" Jack's voice grew shakier, his breathing ragged. "He hasn't seen this outfit yet, has he? Because papi would already be here, rawing that needy cunt while you choke on me-"

With a harsh groan, Jack's eyes closed, and he gave two more hard strokes as his cock started to twitch. You opened as wide, swallowing as fast as you could as his cum flooded your throat. Some of it dribbled down your chin and you cupped your hands, catching the excess as you let Jack fall out of your mouth.

He watched you through half lidded eyes as you slurped it off your gloves, his breath hitching. "Goddamnit, baby. You're killing me." You bit the fingers of your gloves, slowly removing them, because, if it was going to get messier, you didn't want to worry about cleaning the leather. The vibrator hummed insistently, but he had turned down the power. "Come here so I can give you your reward-"

A knock sounded and then the keypad chimed as someone began to input their entry code. Swearing, Jack nudged you under his desk, scooting his chair in before he had a chance to fasten his pants.

The door opened and a pair of heels clicked against the floor.

"It's happened again, Jack. I know you said that it's probably not a big deal because Athena is monitoring any outgoing traffic, and there's no evidence of an external data breach or even an upload, but I really don't like the implications."

You blinked, recognizing Angela's voice immediately. The door clicked shut behind her. Jack rolled his chair forward, and you had to scrunch up under the desk, your arms resting on Jack's thighs, his softening cock right under your nose. You licked it, experimentally, and were rewarded by him stiffening against you with a sharp intake of breath.

"I know, it's alarming," Angela said, mistaking his reaction. "Because if it's not external, someone in my division is snooping in things that they have no business in...and I really don't want to get Commander Reyes involved. Not that Gabriel is bad at his job, but he will terrorize my staff, bother my patients, disrupt my infirmary... And I'm not entirely certain this situation warrants his attention, yet."

"What kind of data was accessed this time, Angela?" You listened, and debated jerking Jack off. No, that would be too loud. You'd have to be discrete while playing with your boss's cock under the desk. Grinning, you opened your mouth. He was easier to take when soft, and you laved the salty skin. The desk creaked, and Jack gripped the edge.

"Basic medical records, for both Overwatch and Blackwatch agents, so I can't tell if they were looking for something in particular. Winston installed higher security on critical personnel files so you and others in leadership weren't affected, but I'm not sure how long that's going to hold. Not to mention, something tried to brute force the crypto on Agent Lao's files. Nothing on Candle Arc, but her pre-captivity ones."

Jack winced as your metal fingers dug into his thigh. You rubbed the spot apologetically.

"I see," he said, voice stern.

"Winston and Agent Mihret say both Genji and Lucky's files were targeted as well, but I keep those on a different server, for obvious reasons."
"What action do you want me to take, Angela? Because I would have put Gabe on this one already. He can farm it out if you prefer."

You listened, one hand idly massaging Jack's thigh as you lazily bobbed up and down on his cock.

"That should work. Just pick someone who won't draw as much attention," Angela said. "Genji, Agent Lacroix, Agent McCree, Agent Strike. They're all black ops and good at it, but they won't cause the same furor if they hang around the infirmary. Though I am personally requesting you do not let Agent Tataryn handle this. While I am not questioning his investigatory skills, he needs to sit through another one hundred hours of workplace harassment training seminars before I let him around the new nurses. That or I could chemically castrate him - temporarily of course. Sorry. I am... stressed. I am not complaining about Agent Tataryn. Formally, anyway."

Jack blew out a long breath, sounding terribly impatient. Fortunately, Angela seemed too focused on the potential data breach to notice.

Even while you were sucking off Jack, your mind connected the dots, and you did not like the picture they formed. It was all theory, and there was nothing you could do about it under the goddamn desk, so you just kept on tonguing Jack. It was better than a stress ball, because you could feel him struggling to keep his reactions under wraps. The vibrator still hummed lightly against your walls, but you were easily distracted by tormenting Jack.

"Are you all right, Jack? You're looking a little flushed."

"It's hot in here," he muttered. "I'll take off my coat in a minute."

You swirled your tongue around him and smirked when he grunted uncomfortably.

"Are you staying hydrated? I know your metabolism defies science and that you don't need someone to fuss over you," Angela said, tone sardonic. "But I have to break it to you, I've seen your medical records, and you're still human."

Very human and very warm in your mouth.

"You're hilarious, doctor. I'll talk to Gabe about it. You just keep monitoring the situation." The strain in his voice grew. "Winston and Agent Mihret have already submitted their reports. I'll take a look at it and have something in the works by tomorrow."

"...All right, Jack. Are you sure I can't get you anything? You sound funny." Her tone was accusatory and you had to really work not to giggle with your mouth full.

"I'm actually kind of tired. I was planning on taking a short nap right before you came in."

"Ohhh, sorry." The chair creaked as she rose. "Well, get some rest, Jack. We need you in prime condition."

"Thanks, Angela," Jack said. And you waited as the door opened, then clicked shut.

Jack gave a soft sigh of relief before his chair rolled backward, his fully-erect cock slipping out of your mouth. He hauled you out from under the desk, eyes hard, teeth gritted.

"You sneaky little bitch," Jack growled, pushing you back against his desk. "Enjoyed that, did you?"
"You didn't...sir?" You smirked up at him and he dragged you against him, capturing your mouth with his. He nipped at your lips, tongue slipping across yours. You moaned softly as he cupped your breasts.

You quickly stripped off your blazer, your lacy black bra visible underneath the white shirt. Jack groaned, his cock twitching against your thighs.

"Sorry, sir. I thought you would have liked it," you said, not sounding the least bit sincere.

"Don't apologize yet, baby." He spun you around, bending you over his desk. Make sure you're damn good and sorry before you even think about it."

"Fuck you, Jack," you said, cheerfully. "I'm not sorry, you liked every second of it, and I'd do it again in a heartbeat."

"Good," he said. "Because that's going to make this all the more fun. I should let you suffer, sweetheart," Jack said, voice rough. "You don't deserve any relief from me." He hiked your skirt up and pushed your panties down. "You've made quite the mess, agent."

You panted against the desk as his thick fingers slid into your pussy, and he slowly dragged the vibrator out.

"I can feel you clenching, honey. Like your body doesn't want to give up the toy. Don't worry, I'm about to give you something much better."

He shut it off and set it on the desk right in your line of sight, the egg coated in your slickness. You squirmed as you felt him press against you.

"Is this what you wanted, agent?"

"Yes, sir." You whined as he tangled his fingers in your hair and pushed inside you, his length stretching you as it dragged against your sensitive walls. "Yes, sir. Oh fuck, this is exactly what I wanted."

Jack's thighs slapped against your ass and you rested your face on your forearms, your legs spread wide. He buried himself inside your heat, his cock stroking that sensitive spot that made your eyes roll back in your head.

You rocked your hips, pushing against him, trying to get him to speed up.

"Not yet," he said in your ear, his mouth traveling down your neck. "One more thing to do."

You blinked as he picked up the phone, dialed a number, and switched it to speaker.

"Reyes," Gabriel rumbled.

"Hi Gabe," Jack said, his tone light. Then he pulled out and slammed his hips into you, one hand on the back of your neck, keeping you down.

You gasped sharply, a whine escaping the back of your throat.

"What was that?" Gabriel asked, voice dropping even lower.

"Tell papi "hi," sweetheart. You're on speaker, Gabe," Jack said, grunting as he kept up the hard strokes.
"...No. Go get those files. Yeah, out. Get me some coffee too. Yeah, cafeteria's fine. Your coffee still tastes like raw sewage." Papers shuffled and then the door slammed. "Sorry, had to boot the kid." Gabriel's rich voice made you clench harder around Jack. "Now what are you two up to?"

"Just have our favorite girl bent over my desk. Come on, Lucky, weren't you full of smart ass comments a minute ago?" You gave a soft moan as he began to rub your clit. "Guess not, I must've knocked'em out of her with my cock. Come on, let papi hear you."

"Hi papi," you whimpered, Jack's cock hitting deep inside you.

Gabriel gave a low chuckle. "I thought you were working today, baby."

"Working my last nerve is more like it," Jack said tautly. "Showed up all dressed up in a tight little skirt and fancy lingerie. You would've like it. Got her lipstick all over my cock, but she still looks so pretty. That's it baby, shake that ass." He canted his hips, rolling them at a sharper angle. You dug your fingers into his desk, panting.

"Jack's...mean," you got out, having no choice but to ride out his thrusts.

"I don't know what she's talking about Gabe. The little sneak had the audacity to try to suck me off under my desk while Angela was in here." Jack's tone was harsh.

"Is that so? Gabriel purred. "Why don't you ever do that for me, baby?"

"It was revenge. Jack's made me sit here for over an hour with a toy inside me," you panted. "Wouldn't touch me, wouldn't let me come."

"So what I'm hearing is that you two are both troublemakers," Gabriel rasped. You weren't sure if he was touching himself. You hoped not. He needed to come over here and do something. "What's she wearing? Been hearing she looked nice."

"Stockings. Lots of lace. Her skirt up around her waist." Jack growled as he sped up. "Already watched her swallow a load, so I'm going to outlast her now."

You quivered as he pounded you, using you hard. He was right, you were close to the edge and you could last.

"She's so wet, Gabe. You know how she feels, silky and hot inside. Always looks so good with our cum dripping down her legs. Might just send her back to you like that."

Tension wrapped around your core and you whined softly. "Jack-

"Yeah, sweetheart?" Electricity sparked in your spine as he nibbled on the back of your neck.

"I'm so close."

"I know," he said smugly, and slowed down, his fingers leaving your clit.

"Damnit, Jack!" You gave a cry of frustration and Gabriel laughed.

"You know, I'm only responding to "sir." In case you want to plead for mercy." His hand stayed on your neck and you couldn't move.

"Please fuck me harder, sir. Please let me come."
"What do you think, Gabe?"

"She sounds pretty desperate, Jack," Gabriel said, voice raw. "I know what I'd do if I were there but, I'm all the way across the building..."

"Please, sir-" you begged, bucking your hips. "I love it when you raw my pussy. I need you to fill me up..." Writhing underneath him, you clenched around him, doing your best to goad him into moving.

Jack groaned and started up again. His thrusts urging you on. "She looks so good like this, Gabe. Wanton and needy, her ass bouncing while I fuck her into my desk."

It didn't take long for him to wind you up again. Each stroke ratcheted the tension higher. And his nimble fingers continued to rub against your clit.

"Come on, agent. Let Commander Reyes hear you come all over my dick-"

Eyes squeezed shut, you shook as your muscles froze for one painful second, then you began to unravel, sobbing as liquid heat flooded your body and you came on the Strike Commander's desk.

Jack kept thrusting, one arm still holding you down, the other reaching up to squeeze your tits. You gave a weak moan and to your surprise, Jack pressed against you, his lips on your neck as he spatred inside you.

"You all right, hermosa?"

"He just came inside me, Gabriel," you said, voice shaky.

"Couldn't help it," Jack murmured, kissing your neck. "She looks so good like this, Gabe."

There was a pause on the other end of the line. "You know, leaving you two alone is a recipe for disaster. I've got some actual work to wrap up, but I'll be over there as soon as I'm done."

"Mmm, see you soon," Jack sighed, and ended the call. "You OK, baby?" He nuzzled the back of your neck, embracing you from behind.

"Gotta get cleaned up, don't want to ruin this outfit," you muttered.

Jack chuckled. "You're going to want to lose the panties then." He pulled out and you swallowed roughly as his cum puddled on the floor beneath you, some of it staining your thighs and panties. He let go of you and you pulled off your underwear. To your surprise, Jack took them, balled them up, and slipped them into his pocket.

"Really?"

"I earned them," he said smugly, leaning over to kiss you. He got out a hand towel and began to clean you up. The office smelled heavily of musk, sweat, and sex, and you noted the "aromatherapy candles" on the shelves. Hmm.

Once he'd tucked himself back in his pants he sat in his chair and pulled you onto his lap, hands gentle as he stroked your mussed hair.

"Thank you, sweetheart. For the coffee, the help, and the roleplay. That was...really good."
He sighed happily. "Gabe share my fantasy with you?"

"Yeah, though you did too the other night..."

Jack chuckled. "Too rough?"

"Mmm, nah. Just give me a minute." Jack rested his head on your shoulder, rubbing your back.

"Want me to light the candles?"

"Probably a good idea. Athena has a candle protocol for my office, so it shouldn't trigger the fire alarms."

You rose, noting your shirt was now missing a few buttons and your skirt was wrinkled, but your clothes were otherwise intact. Jack slumped in his chair, a content smile on his lips and you sauntered over to your briefcase, because you only needed one thing out of it.

You picked it up, even as Jack's eyes closed. You slipped the item into your waistband, and lit the candles.

"You don't have any more of those fancy French cigarettes you get from Gérard, do you?" Jack asked.

"Let's get your coat off," you murmured and Jack stood, shrugging the overcoat off one arm. You worked it down, shaking your head, because Jack was making this too easy. You freed his left arm, and reached behind you, getting the cuffs off your waistband. Then you focused on his right arm, pretending to have trouble getting the sleeve off.

It was over in two quick motions. You clapped the four inch wide cuffs around his wrists and activated the magnetic lock.

"What the-?"

Smiling, you pushed him against the desk. "Safe word?"

"...You sneaky little bitch," Jack growled and flexed, trying to free himself, but the metal held.

"Learned my lesson last time. These are the omnic-grade ones. Too tight?"

"Lucky-" he growled, tone warning.

"Jackie," you purred.

"You've been planning this," he said slowly, realization sneaking up on him like you did. It wasn't fair to ambush him after sex, but then you were Blackwatch. You certainly didn't play fair.

"You like surprises." Laughing, you embraced him from behind, pressing kisses against his back, your hands rubbing his chest.

"Give me a safe word, Jack. Otherwise, I'll take them off."

There was a long pause.

"Kandahar," he said, voice thick. You stood back, admiring his skintight black shirt, the straps of his holsters emphasizing his broad chest and immaculate musculature.

"You got a warning one?"

"No, I'm good till I'm not." Jack shuddered. "You know you're going to pay for this later, sweetheart."

"I don't mind," you admitted.

"You will. I'm going to-"

"I know you like to talk, Jackie, but this is my game. So don't make me gag you."

Jack snarled. You peeked at his face, already well acquainted with the icy expression as he fixed his eyes straight ahead at a point in the distance.

You stroked his hair, pleased that he obeyed you. He was so much stronger and quite a big bigger than you, and it gave you a heady thrill to command him. He was right, you would pay for it later, but that thought didn't bother you in the least.

"Turn around." Your voice was soft, but there was no mistaking the order.

Jack complied, glaring down at you as he flexed his shoulders.

"Too tight?" You asked.

"I'm fine," he said stiffly.

"On your knees, soldier," you said, tasting the word. It fit. Jack glowered at you, going down slowly, bending one leg at a time.

"You look good down there," you said, scooting the chair back. Thanks to the missing buttons, your shirt no longer fastened all the way up, so you draped his coat over your shoulders and sat down in his chair, one knee hooked over an armrest. You dragged one finger over your bare slit, stroking yourself a few times before you slipped one inside.

Kneeling in front of you, Jack's eyes followed your hands, his lips parting slightly as he watched you play with yourself in his chair, wearing his overcoat. While it was too big for you, you treated it like a blanket. It was still warm and smelled like him.

"Are you just going to sit there and tease me?" Jack rasped. He inclined his head back, stormy eyes on your face. His hair stuck up at odd angles, sweat-mussed.

"Is that how you ask for something, soldier?" You arched a brow at him.

To your surprise, he began to turn an attractive shade of pink. "No, ma'am," he said, gruffly. "Sorry, ma'am." Apparently, he liked that designation. You weren't sure about him addressing you as "ma'am," like he was a recruit, but you couldn't think of a better title.

You tilted your head to the side, expectantly.

Jack lowered his head kissing a trail up your inner thighs. "I love how you taste. May I please eat you till you come all over my face, ma'am?" He kept an earnest recruit inflection while staring up at you hungrily.

"Don't call me, "ma'am," soldier." You rolled your eyes. Because when you heard him say it like that, you had to resist the urge to check the area for Captain Amari. And that kind of ruined the mood for you.

"I don't need a title," you said.

"Whatever you say, boss," Jack grinned.

"Stop talking," you scowled, draping your legs over his shoulders. You kicked off your shoes and crossed your ankles, breath quickening as Jack dipped his head. He went in hard, nose bumping against your clit as his tongue wiggled inside you. Your right hand gripped his hair and you rolled your hips, grinding against his face.

Jack did not have much leverage, but he made up for it with sheer enthusiasm and he had always been good with his mouth. Sitting in the Strike Commander's chair, wearing his coat, while he was on his knees, eagerly giving you head, made the experience all the more potent.

"That's it, soldier," you cooed, digging your stocking-clad heels into his back.

Jack redoubled his efforts, sucking on your clit while you squeezed your breasts, lightly pinching your nipples.

It would have been easier if he could use his hands, but you didn't mind watching him work for it. Jack didn't seem to need to come up for air. He just focused on consuming you, his tongue pressing hard on your clit, and it wasn't long before you tensed, your thighs squeezing his head as you came all over his face.

Jack drew back, panting, the lower half of his face smeared with your juices. He smiled smugly up at you and licked his lips. "You like that, boss?"

You leaned over and kissed him, mostly to shut him up. "Adequate, soldier," you said. "I guess you've earned some relief. Get up and bend over your desk."

Jack rose, cheeks flushed. He towered over you, biting his lower lip, pupils too big. He looked like he wanted to say something smart, but he swallowed the comment and obeyed, turning his head to watch you as you climbed out of his chair, legs still wobbly.

"Do you need a cushion? Your desk is awfully hard."

Jack grunted as you pushed him down against the metal surface, his ass in the air. "I can take it," he said.

For a moment, you were worried that he was just humoring you, that he didn't actually like what you were doing to him. But as you reached around to unfasten his pants, you felt his erection already straining against the fabric. You rubbed lightly, and his breath hitched, hips wiggling as he tried to get more friction.

"Did I say you could do that?" You laughed and slapped his ass.

Jack swore and you felt his cock twitch, already hot and leaking against your fingers. "I thought this was a reward," he groaned, desperation elongating his words. "Please, boss. You looked so good in my coat. Nearly came in my pants feeling you ride my face. I could do that all day..."
Your hands skimmed his bare hips and you opened his desk drawer pulling out the lube. Jack took a shaky breath. "You know you probably shouldn't use the egg inside me."

"I am very aware, soldier." That was a given. Anal toys needed to have an easy retrieval method. But you didn't need to borrow any toys for Jack. You had something else in mind. You poured a generous amount of lube into your hands. Your flesh one ghosted along his shaft as you pressed biting kisses along his spine.

Jack shivered against you, his breathing already ragged.

"What do you say, soldier?"

"Please," he breathed, and he tensed as your hand wrapped around his cock, your strokes smooth, languid, and far too light.

He thrust against you, groaning as his hips jerked and he tried in vain to get more friction, more stimulation, more attention.

"Stop that," you said coolly.

"You earned it."

"Because I messed you up earlier?" Jack said, sounding too pleased with himself.

"Obviously not enough, since I'm the one whose got you bent over, cuffed underneath me, and begging for release. Now hold still."

Your metal fingers traced his puckered hole, and he trembled slightly as you worked the lube against the opening.

"You can be rougher, boss. I can take it," he exhaled. "I know we go slow with you, but I like it hard and don't need nearly as much prep- damnit!" He swore as one digit slid inside him.

"I know, it's only one finger," you teased. "I've seen your ass swallow up Gabe's entire cock, and that thing is massive." You drawled the last word and Jack gave a strangled cry as you began to pump his cock at the same slow rhythm you moved your finger.

"More," he said softly. "Please."

You laughed, watching Jack's thighs tense. He rested his cheek on the desk, eyes watching you eagerly, tongue licking those pretty pink lips. He groaned under your touch, the filthy sound so very satisfying.

You worked a second finger in, scissoring them and Jack expression shifted to ecstatic, eyes closed, mouth gulping down air. Any words were lost to a chain of staccato breaths. Your right hand clasped his cock tighter. His passage was still snug and you went slowly. Curling your fingers, you pressed against his walls and found the spot that had him panting.

"That's it, oh fuck yes..." Jack whipped his head from side to side, hips moving of their own accord. "I can take another one, baby."

"So greedy. It's a good thing you beg so nicely." Your fingers were slick enough, but you stopped stroking his cock long enough to pour more lubricant onto your left hand. Your fingers were smaller than Gabriel's but that was no excuse not to be careful. And if he considered that to be too teasing, well, that was a plus.

"Please," he groaned. "Please go faster. Harder. Stop holding back."

"Such a shameless slut," you leaned over and nipped his ear. "All right." You fisted his cock, thrusting your three metal fingers inside him. Jack wasn't trying to be quiet any longer, his gasps and moans drowning out the slick sound of your hands working him over.

There was a familiar rhythmic knock, and then the keypad chimed.

"Damnit!" Jack swore, but you kept it up, pulse jumping as he clenched around your fingers.

"Keep it down, soldier. Unless you want the whole base to hear you begging for it" you said, coolly, because you recognized the knock. Jack should have too, but he was too distracted to focus. He couldn't hold in his noises; those sweet whimpers and heavy breaths made your pussy twitch. He shook beneath you, squirming as you increased the tempo.

The door opened, and Gabriel stepped in, wearing a tight black t-shirt, his fatigue pants, and beanie. He stared openly for half a second, mouth open, eyes comically wide, before slamming the door shut behind him.

"Gabe-" Jack moaned, lifting his head off the desk. "I know you helped her-"

You flexed your metal fingers then, spreading them against his walls. The vibrations started up, and you flexed again, increasing the power.

"What the- Goddamnit!" Jack shouted as you sunk your prostheses inside him, your right hand jerking him harder. His hips shook and he tried to thrust wildly against your palm, choked sounds escaping the back of his throat. He did not last. You felt his muscles lock up, then he began to shake against you. Jack gave a low desperate howl and as he came, but you didn't stop. You just kept going, your fingers vibrating hard as they stretched his asshole.

"You all right, Jack?" Gabriel growled as he sat down on the desk, lifting Jack's chin and kissing him.

"Her fingers-" Jack panted. "Oh my God, did you know?"

"What?" Gabriel raised a brow. "What about her fingers, mi cielito?"

"They fucking vibrate-" Jack panted. "She's jammed three inside me and, fuck, I can't...can't take it-"

You kept stroking his half-hard cock, not caring that he was too sensitive.

Gabriel's nostrils flared. "...You mean the Swede actually made them for you?"

"As a...joke," Gabriel trailed off, a slow smile spreading across his face. "You mean to say you've had them this long and you didn't tell us? Oh you wicked thing..."

"You continued to stroke Jack inside and out, curling your fingers so the pattern of the vibrations complemented the rhythm of your strokes. Hard and fast, slow and teasing. You alternated, smiling as his cock hardened and twitched again.
"Lucky, please, I can't-" Jack shook violently.

"Too much?" You didn't even try to hide your amusement. "But Jack. You like too much."

"It's true. I've heard you say it," Gabriel chuckled.

Quaking, Jack just buried his face in Gabriel's lap and babbled incoherently.

You cleaned off your hands with sanitizer and a paper towel. Jack had made quite the mess on the floor and he still lay bent over his desk, breathing ragged.

"That is a pretty outfit," Gabriel murmured, leaning over to kiss you. "I want to fuck Jack and you've done a good job prepping him for me, but maybe we should give him a breather. Why don't you ride me first, and then we can put him between us."

You rubbed Jack's back. "Your arms, OK?"

"Stiff, but I'll be fine." He exhaled slowly. "Never thought you'd take it this far, sweetheart. But I like it. I like it a lot."

"Not sure how I feel about you underestimating me like that, Jack," you said archly.

"Always knew you had it in you, just...didn't expect to be bent over my own desk the first time," he sighed. "And your fingers... Goddamnit, sweetheart. You're trying to kill me." He eased back into his chair, face red, skin covered in sweat and other fluids. "Need a moment to recover. Then you and Gabe can do whatever you want to me."

"That means the greedy bastard will be ready in like ten minutes." Gabriel nibbled on your shoulder. "Want to fuck on his desk while he watches?"

"Only if I get to be on top."

Gabriel laughed, but he did as you told him.

"You did a good job working him open for me," Gabriel said as he pushed slowly into Jack. He knelt on the floor and Jack shivered between you, arms still cuffed, his ass in the air, his face buried in your lap.

"I had good teachers," you stroked Jack's hair as he began to kiss your inner thighs. He pressed hungry kisses against your pussy lips.

"You taste like Gabe," Jack rasped, his voice raw. His tongue flicked out and you tensed. He shut his eyes, still panting as Gabriel leaned forward to kiss you. You accepted, watching as Gabriel began to drive harder, concentration furrowing his brow. Jack began to push back, and you tilted his chin up, forcing him to look at you. Quiet desperation filtered through his eyes and his mouth was curved in a silent "o." Each breath he drew came out shaky, and while you'd seen Jack wrecked more than once, before today you'd never had the satisfaction of being the primary cause.

"Come on, soldier. Aren't you going to thank Commander Reyes for giving you all the cock you've been craving?"

"Th-thank you, papi," Jack said as Gabriel snapped his hips forward.

Gabriel gave you a wide smile, too ferocious to be polite. You liked it though, it looked good on him. "If you don't want to ride him right now, I bet he'd really enjoy feeling those vibrating fingers around his dick," Gabriel groaned as Jack squirmed beneath him. "You're not too sensitive, still? Are you Jackie?"

"Please, whatever you want, it's all so good," Jack moaned.

Gabriel hauled Jack onto his knees. Jack's abs tensed with every thrust, his skin pink and glistening. And that long lovely cock stood at attention, still willing to go.

"And this is how you fuck the defiance out of someone, Jack," you teased. "In case, you needed a refresher."

Jack's eyes flew open and his smile was slow, too confident for a man tied up between you and Gabriel. "No, sweetheart, this is how you wise up, shut your smart mouth, and enjoy what you're being given. Figured you needed me to show you how it's done, for next time."

Gabriel gave a hearty laugh and you just smiled, cupping his balls in your hand.

"All right, Jack, I'll watch very carefully." You flexed your fingers, and the motors started up. "I do so respect a man who leads by example."

Seeing his eyes roll back and hearing him choke on his own voice, was worth the taunt.

"I think we've created a monster," Gabriel said, kissing Jack's temple. Jack's head lolled back against Gabriel's shoulder. "But you certainly aren't complaining, are you?"

---

You massaged the feeling back into Jack's arms, feeling very guilty. His wrists were red and his elbows creaked. "You should have said something," you scolded.

"Didn't even notice. Was having too much fun," he sighed, nestled on the floor between you and Gabriel. "It's fine, I promise."

You looked at Gabriel.

"He can take more damage, corazon. We both should have picked up on it, but as the idiot said, he's fine."

You'd taken off the rest of your suit, in an effort to preserve it. Your stockings were shredded, but you'd expected that. Gabriel stroked Jack's hair as Jack kissed his throat.

"Didn't think you were going to wreck Jack without me," Gabriel teased, reaching over to stroke your forehead. All of you were covered in a sheen of sweat, you were glad that you'd brought spare clothes.
"He deserved it," you said, kissing his nose.

Jack gave a happy sigh and leaned back in Gabriel's arms. "I hope you know I barely got any work done today, sweetheart."

"Whose fault is that?" You crossed your arms.

"...Kind of implying it's all your fault," Jack said, his attitude returning.

"Well, I finished sorting your black ops reports, so I don't know what you were doing while I was working. Also, you're welcome."

Jack sighed, rolling his eyes.

The keypad chimed. And you dove behind Jack's desk, because you had no desire to face Angela while naked.

Jack and Gabriel scrambled for their clothes as the door opened, and you would have laughed, except you didn't want to give away your hiding spot.

"...Really?" Was all Captain Amari said, as she stepped into the office. She shut the door behind her and you huddled behind Jack's desk.

"You could try knocking, Ana," Gabriel said grumpily.

"It's nothing I haven't seen before," she said. There was an awkward silence and you really wished you could see their faces. But it was best to avoid attention. "Well, anyway, I need you to review this report on omnic activity on the Mani peninsula. Cape Matapan to be specific." She paused, and your heart sank, because you knew, as the silence dragged on, that she had noticed your clothing, neatly placed on one of the chairs. "...Hello, Lucky," she said, after a moment.

Still crouched behind the desk, face buried in one hand, you raised your other arm and waved. "Hi, Captain Amari."

Chapter End Notes

Extra long chapter for you! Everyone has been asking about the vibrator fingers forever and it took me a long time to get to the scene I wanted to write. I am satisfied with this, hope you guys are too. Because damn that was a lot of smut. And while there were some tiny bits of plot here, it was mostly NSFW.

Need to figure a better way to balance this. Recently spent too long trying to churn out 1k/day, and I still haven't watched Shape of Water or played FFXV since the first time I opened it. I now feel guilty if I don't put out at least 1k day and frankly, I need to do more if I want to stick to this release schedule. I don't have set release days, but every 3-4 days is the regular rate.

Got my formal rejection from the interview. Meh. Need to go back to hunting, but it takes mental stamina and I'll admit that I'm dragging a little. My current job is easing up since they've hired 5 people (finally).

We are just past 5 months and I am at 412k in the rough drafts. Yeesh.
Chapter 49

Chapter Summary

Playtime is over. The work continues. And nothing goes according to plan.

Chapter Notes

Yumi made skirt suit Lucky.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You sat on the bench outside the infirmary munching chestnuts while Bayan sipped his tea. He still looked rough, and you offered him a croquette sandwich. He took it, nodding his thanks.

"How was your day?"

"They're transferring her soon," he said softly.

"That's really not what I asked," you said, popping another chestnut in your mouth. You knew that already, though you didn't share that fact with Bayan. "I realize a starch sandwich might be kind of strange, but they're really good. Vegetarian too, if that's your jam." Bayan wasn't vegetarian, but he was more health-conscious than you.

Bayan unwrapped the sandwich and took a bite. It was a golden, panko-coated, fried potato croquette, with lettuce and bulldog sauce on a brioche roll, but it was comfort food. All the yoshoku-style Japanese food was, and you blamed Shin for it.

"Thanks," he said after a moment. "You don't have to do this, you know."

"I feed all my friends," you said, watching him stiffen out of the corner of your eye. "It's the least I can do for the guy who kept my plants alive. They are still living too, though I'm really terrified of the orchid. If it dies, Amélie will know, and she will give me this disappointed look that will drop me three social classes. Are there more than three social classes? I'm sorry, they all look the same from the bottom."

Bayan snorted. "And the bonsai from the Shimadas isn't pressure enough?"

"...It's actually pretty hardy," you said. "It's like they know me and they picked something Lucky-proof. Well, Genji knows me. Hanzo just expects the worst."

Bayan laughed at that. "Well, if you need help catching flies, Min might actually like feeding the flytrap. She doesn't like insects."

You hadn't known that, but Bayan had enlightened you about a lot of Vo's preferences. She preferred written messages, but her English wasn't great, so you'd taken to making French translations of your letters and were getting more detailed responses. Sure, Athena could instantly translate things for you, but you needed the practice. It was actually odd, because you had used Vietnamese translations for her before, and she'd ignored you for a month. According to Lacroix and Athena, your message had not been mistranslated or accidentally insulting, so you really weren't sure what that was about.

You knew there was malnutrition in her past, hence her relentless food aggression, but Bayan was able to list her favorite healthy foods (she had an avaricious love of durian), and recommended giving her heavy blankets when she was distressed. All in all, good advice. But it struck you as odd that he mostly talked to you about Vo or Lao.

Except, you got it now. You just weren't sure what to do about it.

"You know, if something's bothering you, you can just say it." You ate another chestnut. You glanced over at him.

"You don't have to pretend to be my friend any more, Lucky. They're transferring her to a secure ward. She doesn't need medical care any more."

"I'm not pretending," you said, giving him a sharp look. Bayan usually had better social graces than this. You offered him a chestnut and he just stared at it. "We have an upcoming Blackwatch poker game. You're invited. We all cheat shamelessly, and that's the entire point, so don't bet anything valuable."

Bayan shook his head. "I'll pass, thanks. I'd like to keep my pants, soul, and what's left of my virtue."

You shrugged. "Your loss."

He sighed. "I'm sorry. That was shitty of me. I'm just really tired."

"You know, you can talk to me. I can tell Angela she's working you too hard, and that will give you a ten second head start while she obliterates me before she comes chasing after you."

That garnered a laugh.

"I like you better than I thought I would," Bayan said after he took a chestnut.

"Was Vo badmouthing me? Because I swear, she can deal with it. I clean up more of her messes than I do anyone else-"

Bayan shrugged. "Min's not like the rest of Blackwatch, and you know it. Blackwatch has a reputation. You have a reputation."

"Oh God, what have you heard now?" You massaged your temples, because while Athena was good at giving you trends and composite gossip, she censored some of the more outrageous rumors, claiming they were not credible enough to be repeated. Which was annoying, because you wanted to know.

"It's actually been complimentary, lately. You know "she's crazy and scary, but kind of hot." That sort of thing. You're mostly known for being...trouble. Not that you cause it, more like you're a harbinger."

You couldn't actually argue with that. So you ate another chestnut. "How do you like the sandwich?"
"It's good," he said. "Thanks. I'm sorry about being rude. I'm just stressed."

You nodded, sitting back on the bench and wondered what you would do next.

You sat in the office, Jack on the couch, Gabriel at his desk, and you read the transcripts of Gabriel's interrogation of Lao. Both of them wore grim looks and you gritted your teeth. Because Gabriel had not been kind to your little hacker. You understood why, you understood that half the shit he said he probably didn't mean. But you suspected he meant the crueler half.

Gabriel and Lao had talked about you, and that didn't surprise you, though it was strange seeing your name in the conversation. And when it got to the part where Lao admitted to her crush on Shin, you winced. It only went downhill from there.

When you were done, you set down your tablet and looked at Gabriel.

"I still want to see her."

"Not alone, for obvious reasons," Gabriel said gruffly.

"Fine." You were peeved by how harsh he'd been, though you couldn't actually fault him for it. So you took a deep breath and reminded yourself that your logic had to be in charge right now, not your feelings.

"Are you sure that's wise?" Jack asked after a moment. "Between her confessions about—"

"None of this is news to me." You looked Gabriel in the eye. "Shin and I both knew she had a crush on him. The whole squad did. But after she hooked up with Valdez, she was with Valdez."

Gabriel blinked. "You never mentioned that—"

"It wasn't important," you said dryly. "She was a teenager with a crush on a hot CO and nothing ever came of it. It's not a particularly original tale."

Gabriel pinched the bridge of his nose. "You should have still included that in the psyche profile."

"...You're right. It just slipped my mind." Because had never been important. She was a kid. She never acted on it. Shin had been with you and there was never any doubt how he felt about both of you.

"She threatened to kill you. She admitted she hates you," Gabriel said, tone mellower than you expected. "It's heavy stuff."

"She's scared, hurt, and traumatized. I wouldn't be happy with me either," you said. "And while I know it's not my fault, I understand her feelings and am taking her declarations with a whole shaker of salt. No, I won't be alone with her, but if you think I'm just going to abandon her because she isn't fawning and falling over herself with gratitude, I have news for you."

You had already discussed a lot of potential outcomes with your shrink, and to her credit, she had prepared you for this one. Maybe Lao would hate you forever. Maybe Lao would never forgive you. Maybe she was just lashing out because after a whole day of being interrogated by Gabriel, she wasn't thinking clearly. It didn't matter. You would do what you could for her, because you loved her. But you would also have to remember where your responsibility ended. You had helped rescue Lao, and you would be there to support her during her recovery. But you could not fix her, no matter how hard you tried, and you could not make all her problems go away, and that was not your job, nor your obligation, and you did not have that power. You had to remind yourself of that over and over again. But it was starting to stick.

Jack just gave a longsuffering sigh. "All right, baby. Your gamble with Athena worked. She reacted strongly to Gérard entering the room and identifying himself, but she was unable to move. Athena "riding along" has been a good, if ethically-questionable way, of keeping her in line. I'm still not depending on that as your only form of defense. You don't go in alone."

Gabriel looked like he wanted to add more, but he took a deep breath and shook his head. "It's such a waste. I see why you liked her so much. She would've made a hell of an agent," he said after a moment.

"She still might," you told him. You paused, disliking Gabriel's skeptical expression, but there was no point in fighting about it now. "On an unrelated matter, I need authorization for Athena to monitor something else." You rubbed your forehead. "I think I have a handle on that problem we discussed earlier, but I don't want to move till I'm absolutely certain I understand the situation."

Jack cocked his head to the side. "That was quick."

Gabriel narrowed his eyes. "You aren't soloing this one."

"I just asked for Athena's backup, didn't I? That's like a legion of people."

Jack gave you an odd look. "An AI is different."

"...But perfect for the task." You realized that most agents didn't talk to Athena like you and Genji did, but it was strange to see the surprise on Jack's face, like he didn't quite realize she wasn't just a machine.

"I still want a report," Gabriel said. "There's a good chance this ties into Shit Spiders."

"...OK, but I'm going to ask that you don't take any action yet, because the situation is delicate."

Gabriel raised a brow. "That's not your call."

Jack just leaned back, inclining his head. "Make your case in the report. We'll discuss it afterward, before anyone does anything."

"But I want the report today, before you try to pull anything sneaky," Gabriel said.

You nodded, wondering how two men who openly hated paperwork so much always managed to make more for you.
"I see they already gave you the news," Lacroix said when you plunked down in the chair across from his desk.

"It's not a total surprise," you said.

Lacroix skimmed some reports and sipped his coffee.

"You've deprogrammed people before," you said after a moment. You hadn't been able to get the details, but Captain Amari had recommended Lacroix as a resource.

Lacroix blinked, and set his cup down. "Not very well, Chanceux." The bite in his words surprised you.

"Yeah, well I'm sure you made some awful mistakes and managed to learn something from them. Tell me."

He waved his hand dismissively. "There is too much to tell and I am not an expert. It is a task best left to the professionals. In that case, we didn't have the resources and I had no choice but to try. There were...lasting scars. Though to be honest, the subject would never have been classified as "normal" to begin with, so the damage is difficult to assess." He gave you a long look. "What Talon has done to Agent Lao is on a completely different level. Athena is working on some of the commands hardcoded in her cybernetics, but how the bioweb interface has affected her neural processing is still being investigated."

Meaning had the computer code actually infected her thinking, or was it just a Pavlovian leash that would fade with time?

"And she does place some blame on you, and that isn't entirely a result of the conditioning."

"That's a good thing," you said stubbornly.

Lacroix laughed. "That is uncharacteristically optimistic of you."

"They subjected her to high intensity reconditioning, but she's still in there. They didn't break her. And even if she's damaged, that resentment is Lao, not Talon's behavioral modifications. That's something she can fix on her own, if she chooses."

"And you think she will?"

You crossed your arms. "I have no idea. But it's better than if she were just a puppet."

"I think you'll find their programming more devious than that. It's not one layer that you can just strip away, Chanceux. Their modifications are interwoven with whom she is. She may some day be functional, but she will never again be the girl you knew."

"I am well aware of that," you said. "None of us have faced our enemies and walked away unchanged."

Lacroix gave you a thoughtful look and opened up a box of Gitanes. He gave you a wry smile. "If Ana catches us..."

"These are terrible for us," you agreed, taking one anyway.

"Fa Hai is moving against Zhai Feng. He's garnered a significant amount of support."
Lacroix lit both your cigarettes. "Neither of them will resort to open warfare, not after what just happened. But I suspect he'll cripple her politically before he manages to cause an "accident" and consolidate power."

"I saw the reports. You recommended that we don't interfere and that seems to be the policy."

"You disapprove?"

"Not my business. I think leaving Zhai in charge is a big gamble, but she's smarter than she acts. Still, she comes off as a loose cannon. That's not inspiring leadership."

"You like her," Lacroix said with a sigh.

"More than Fa. But in this business "like" is a luxury we don't have. It's all butterfly wings, dominoes, and probable outcomes."

"Unfortunately, you are correct."

The two of you sat there in silence, smoking. "It'd be interesting to see what kind of On Sing she'd build."

"That is true." Lacroix shrugged. "You are more optimistic about her ability than I. I think she is a little too mad to accomplish her lofty goals. But we are anarchists at heart, Chanceux, much better at destruction than creation, no matter how hard we try. That distorts our vision."

You couldn't disagree with him. But watching Zhai Feng die did not quite sit right with you. Yes, you understood the politics and dangers of getting involved. Hell, there was no guarantee she'd be any good for the world. In Blackwatch, you did things smart. Even if they were morally questionable. And supporting Zhai Feng was not smart.

For the first time, in a long time, you envied Overwatch agents for their moral superiority. You finished your cigarette, conscious that Lacroix was well aware of your discomfort.

"Heard from Ziv?" You decided a change of subject was necessary.

"He keeps sending me "last wills and testaments" in the footnotes of his reports. It is very cute. I will get his books. Agent Shimada, the younger, and Agent McCree will split his gaming miniatures and may have to engage in combat for them. And you get...nothing. He seems to still be harboring a bit of resentment toward you for saving his job."

You took a cigarette, shrugging. "As you can tell, I'm used to ungrateful hackers."

Lacroix just laughed, though it did not seem nearly as mocking as usual.

You brought wasabi peas, an assortment of vegetarian Hot Kiss snacks, and those Meiji pink and brown strawberry chocolates. For a moment you stressed about what to wear, but finally decided that your Blackwatch fatigues and a hoodie would suffice. Everything else just seemed disingenuous.

Tataryn and Captain Amari waited for you outside the interrogation room. While they weren’t normally used for visitation, Lao’s cybernetics made extra precautions necessary.

Tataryn had his hair back in a ponytail, and with the stubble and bags under his eyes, he looked a little rough around the edges. He was dressed down in Blackwatch exercise gear, and the compression pants really hugged his ass in a distracting manner. You didn't actually want him here, but Gabriel had never rescinded Tataryn's bodyguard order and you suspected Gabriel told him to show. Captain Amari looked polished and pleasantly nonchalant in her uniform.

"Do we all need to be in there?" You asked, giving Tataryn a wry look.

"No, the captain and I can take turns visiting the girl and you can sit out here," Tataryn said with a cheeky smirk. "Much less danger that way."

"Fedya's just here in case we need another body. He'll wait outside."

Tataryn's smile flickered for a moment. "As you say, captain." Captain Amari input a code and went in first. Tataryn held the door for you.

"We still having our tea party without Mihret?" Tataryn asked as you passed by.

"Damn straight we are. He got his ass shipped off to California. We'll send him pictures."

Your grin faded as you walked into the interrogation room. There was a table and chairs, and the toolkits had been...moved, so it almost seemed like a normal, average, run-of-the-mill, government-issue, windowless room that happened to have a drain in the floor.

Captain Amari took a chair against the wall, seeming at rest. But you knew better than to fall for that trap.

Lao sat there in leg irons, wearing an orange jumpsuit with a gray jacket draped over her shoulders. The prosthetic arm was disconnected, the sleeve flat where it should be. Her flesh arm was free, and she looked at you impassively. Her cheeks were too hollow, her lips chapped, but her hair was getting longer and the scars looked less severe than before.

You studied her, she still looked young, but there was a weight to her gaze, a slump to her shoulders, that hadn't been there before. Sure, you'd seen glimpses of the brokenness when you encountered her on missions. But now, in the relative safety of the base, the difference seemed more pronounced. Lao was safe. Lao was here. But Lao was not OK.

"Hi," you said. Because that's where normally people started conversation. "How are you?"

She shrugged, staring down at the table.

You set the snacks on the table, opening the packaging for her. You took a wasabi pea.
"This is all I had on hand. Some of the other agents are always raiding my stash. I brought the fried gluten kind of Hot Kiss, because I don't think you need the konyaku version. You're skinny enough."

Lao swallowed. The burn scars discolored the left quarter of her face, but they no longer looked quite as painful and Angela said she could repair any nerve damage. Most of the circuits had been easy to disconnect, but some bits of metal still shone on the skin. It would take another few sessions to remove them.

"Ziv wanted me to say "hi" for him. He's the other hacker you met." You glossed over the part where she tried to shoot him in Shanghai. "He's Rivka's favorite grandson, in case you were wondering."

Lao's eyes widened briefly. "I didn't know."

"He doesn't have the gravitas she did, but he's got the sharp tongue." You shook your head. "He's still smart, though. Skews more electrical engineering than software, but he'll do in pinch."

She nodded, still not looking at you.

"Do you want me to bring you anything? Books? Snacks?" You sat back in your chair, trying to coax a response out of her. "The food here is much better than the Ninth Circle. I still cook, Shin's recipes, but... yeah, I'll make you some curry ramen later."

Lao just stared at the chocolates, and you knew she wanted one, so you pushed the box closer to her. She did not move.

"Did you like the book?"
"That book was good," Lao said after a moment. "Depressing, but good."

"Yeah," you agreed.

"Is that where you got the idea to have your AI lock me out of my own body?" She sat up straight, dark eyes accusing as they met yours.

"Yes," you said, because there was no point in lying about it.

"I never thought you were that cruel. Did you figure since I've had my will stolen once, doing it again wouldn't be a big deal? Don't you think I've had enough of being everyone else's puppet?"

"I hope it's only a temporary measure," you said.

"Should've just shot me if you couldn't trust me, Lucky. This isn't home. You lied the entire time. This is a trap. I've gone from one prison to another."

You sat back in your chair, hands folded in your lap. It was a bad comparison and you knew it, but you weren't sure Lao was in the frame of mind to hear your reasoning. And now, in the face of her pain, you weren't sure your reasoning would hold up.

"We both know you're not in control of your actions. I'd rather cross into some philosophical gray areas than let you or anyone else get hurt. But I admit, my morals have always been shaky. Maybe it was the wrong call. I'm sorry."

Lao flinched. "You should have killed me, Lucky. Commander Reyes had the right idea."

You schooled your expression. "Commander Reyes is a tactician, and by his calculations, you're a threat and he has a very permanent way of dealing with threats. I'm your friend, whether you like it or not, and I don't care if you're dangerous. I want you to have a chance."

"No, you just want to clear your conscience by saving me. You think if you fix me that you'll make up for letting Shin, Julio, and the captain die. Well, I have news for you, Lucky, it doesn't make up for it. You failed them and you fucked up with me. Captain Patel should have left you where she found you."
You felt Captain Amari tense behind you. The words hurt, but once you'd read Gabriel's report, you knew to expect them. You knew Lao would lash out. You knew she would find your most obvious trigger. And you knew she would hit you hard with the lowest blow she could stomach.

Prepared as you were, it still hurt. That blow was much lower than you expected.

"I'm sorry you feel that way," you said softly. You looked down at your boots. "But we both know that's not true."

Lao made a choked growl. "I don't want you to visit me any more. Your face makes me sick. Hooray, you "rescued" me from Talon. Good job. Take your medal and get out of my life. You weren't there when I needed you. I certainly don't need you now."

You rubbed your forehead. "Can I leave the snacks?" You asked Captain Amari.

"I don't want your crap. Take it with you!" She shouted.

"You can," Captain Amari said, ignoring her outburst.

"All right." You stood up. "I'm not going to make you visit with me, but I'm not just abandoning you either. I'll try to see you next week, OK? If you're not feeling up to it, I'll give you more space. I've been told I can write and send you stuff. So I'll do that."

"You shouldn't come back, Lucky. I tried to kill you once. AI or not, I could do it again." Panic laced her voice and you looked up, her brown eyes full of tears. Underneath the anger was something broken and fearful. Seeing that look on her face did not make you feel better, but you thought you understood.

"A lot of people have tried, Lao. It didn't take." You smiled at her, your lower jaw a little wobbly. "It wasn't your fault, and I'm not sore about that, just so you know."

"Don't patronize me!"

You shrugged, knowing now that nothing you said would be right.

"Get out!" She snarled, breathing hard. She rattled to her feet and backhanded the snacks off the table, scattering chocolates and peas all over the floor. Well, it was a good thing the room had a drain.

You swallowed your clever retorts. "You take care of yourself, Lao. I'll see if I can get those rice crackers you like." You turned on your heel and quickly walked out of the room, unsure of how neutral you could keep your face.

Tataryn was gone, but Gabriel leaned against the wall, waiting for you. You looked around; Overwatch agents rarely came down here. The coast was clear. You walked straight up to him and hugged him, burying your face in his chest.

He rubbed your back, hands gentle. "That bad then?"

"It wasn't pretty," you said, looking up at him. "But I knew that before I went in there."
You took a couple shaky breaths. "It sucked. I was hoping it wouldn't go that way, but..." You shrugged.

"It's not on you," Gabriel said. "You keep extending the rope for her. She'll come around or she won't. But you don't jump in after her, you hear? That's where your responsibility ends, corazón."

You snorted at Gabriel's metaphor and how well you understood it. "I know."

"You want some food? I have the ingredients for tortas."

"Those are just fancy sandwiches," you said. You and Gabriel had all kinds of supplies in the kitchen.

"You don't like fancy sandwiches?" He asked, a little huffy.

"I didn't say that..."

You did not want to talk about it, not yet. And after Gabriel made you some tortas, filled with chicken, refried beans, pickled jalapenos, and avocado, you both went up to Jack's room. Jack had left you cake in the fridge, and Gabriel packed several tortas for the three of you. You ate in Jack's bed, and Gabriel put on a popular spy drama so the two of you could laugh at the implausibility of it all.

The sandwiches were hot and strangely comforting. Or maybe it was just that Gabriel prepared them for you and then held you while you ate.

When Jack finally got in, you were half asleep with a pillow propped against Gabriel's chest.

Jack stripped off his coat, took a cold torta and a beer, and climbed into the bed beside you.

"How'd it go?" He asked so carefully that you knew he was already aware of what happened.

"It was rough," you yawned. "Not a surprise, but... it still sucked. Meh. Just want to cuddle and eat cake."

Jack leaned over you to kiss Gabriel.

"How'd your day go, amor?"

"Had to catch up on paperwork," he said dryly and you snorted. "Also had to treat my carpet. The janitor left a sharply-worded note tacked to the break room bulletin board about cleaning up your drinks after you spill them so the stain doesn't set."

You giggled, but Gabriel just shook his head.

"You're such a slob," he told Jack.
Jack just took a bite of his torta, scattering crumbs on the comforter.

You woke up to Gabriel climbing out of bed. He got dressed efficiently and kissed both Jack and you goodbye. Curled up against Jack, you were almost asleep again when the comm chimed.

"Strike Commander Morrison, this is Aunt Zheng." The voice was familiar, and you lay still while Jack sat up, flipping on the tablet screen.

"...my devices don't usually accept calls like this, Aunt Zheng," he said quietly.

"I would not have intruded, but I have a need." Her voice was carefully modulated, and almost seemed concerned. She still sounded more distant than Athena ever did, even if she had once been human.

"I'm listening," Jack did not look back at you.

"I seem to have miscalculated on my heir."

Jack diplomatically said nothing.

"She is...in trouble."

"We agreed that Overwatch would not intervene with On Sing's internal politics," Jack said, after a moment.

"We did. But you swore a blood oath to me and Feng. I don't know if that counts for anything in your culture, but it means something to us. Even if you left Overwatch, if you called us, we would have come to your aid."

"...Is that so?" Jack asked, managing to not sound as skeptical as you felt.

"I cannot force you. I cannot even formally ask this of you, but you are the closest ally to her situation, and young Fa has gone too far."

"What'd he do?"

"Captured her brother and used him as bait to lure her in to for a "talk" about peace," Zheng said. "While Feng and her brother Li are estranged, she is still the type to charge in and rescue him. She went alone, of course, and I have not been able to break the shielding on the location. It seems Fa constructed a modified Faraday cage within the entire base as a trap, just to keep me out. It has worked. He has filled the base with shocktroops loyal to him."

"Overwatch cannot be seen interfering, Zheng."

"Which is why I am imploring you, Commander Morrison. I will owe you a great debt. Feng will too."

"Why did you let it get this far?" Jack asked.

"I do not like killing family," Zheng said. "Now more so than ever. But it seems I should have taken care of young Fa a long time ago. Saving Feng is what matters now. I have coordinates and drones. If you can get my proxies inside, I can do the rest."

"...Where are the rest of your...group?" Jack asked.

There was a long silence.

"...They are illusions. I am the only one who made it through the transition. The other projections are programmed to act like my consort and children, but they did not survive the translation process. Feng is the only one who knows this. And she is the closest family member I still feel fondness for. She is my anchor, the one who keeps me sane. Save her, Commander Morrison, and I will do anything you ask."

Well...shit. A grieving genius madwoman with the reach of an extremely powerful AI was the last thing this world needed.

Jack heaved a deep sigh.

"Give me a moment." Jack rubbed his forehead. "Athena, can you trace the signal?"

"Yes, commander."

"That is unnecessary. I will forward you all the coordinates. I will give you everything I know."

"How is she bypassing security?" Jack asked Athena.

"She tweaked the settings on the server side of your comm-app to force your device to take the call. She has not actually hacked Overwatch security."

"What kind of opponents are we looking at?"

"At least two dozen Red Pole omnics, several Triad foot soldiers, and a few cyborgs. Not like Nguyen's," Zheng added quickly. "Ours are strictly voluntary. He lured her to a facility in the steppes of Inner Mongolia. We knew it was a trap, but we... underestimated how well-shielded it was. It runs on a completely closed network. I have no way in except physically."

"This is a terrible idea," Jack said.

"Feng just turned twenty one. She is a student, not a fighter. The only reason she got involved was because one of the Southern families tried to assassinate her parents. Her immediate family disapproves of her life choice, and her brother most of all. She ran track at a high school in America. She barely scraped by onto National Honors Society. She still sleeps with her stuffed turtle-"

"That's enough." Jack rubbed his face. "OK, let me take care of some things, and I'll go. Obviously this can't be an official Overwatch op. But I'll see what I can work out."

"Time is not on our side, commander." The call cut out.

Jack swore and stood. "I know you're awake. I need you to cover for me while-"

"Oh hell, no," you said, sitting up.

Jack shook his head. "I know Feng isn't your favorite person, but we talked and she apologize."
"Who do you think told her to do that?" You scowled. "I liked Feng just fine. But this issue is bigger than your guilt, my likes, and Feng's life."

"You want to be allied with a guy like Fa?"

"He's stable and responsible," you said, the words tasting bitter on your tongue.

"He also uses civilians as hostages and kills his own family members while lying through his teeth about it."

"...What kind of things do you think we do in Blackwatch, Jack?"

"That's different." Jack huffed angrily. "We both know her and I'm not just going to sit by and watch." He pulled on some clothes. "I'm going, and you can keep your mouth shut for a little while, OK?"

"Is that an order?" You watched him wince.

"...No, unless it needs to be, to cover for you. But at least give me a head start."

You laughed then. "What are you going to do, Jack?"

"I'm just going to get Zheng to the facility so she can break in, save Feng, and then I'm going to come back home for lunch. I'm in the mood for burgers, if you're cooking."

"You're always in the mood for burgers." You rubbed your forehead. "If I call Gabriel, Lacroix, or Captain Amari-"

"Don't." Jack looked at you, eyes hard. "Please." The stiffness in his neck and tension in his shoulders were more aggressive than pleading. It was less an request than an order.

You flinched, because suddenly you had a vision of him knocking you out and taking off. "You're not really giving me much of a choice." You climbed out of bed, on the opposite side from Jack. "Give me a moment to get geared up. I'll meet you in your hangar. But if you try to leave without me, I'll sic all three of them on you, and you and your hand will be very lonely for a long time."

Jack blinked, the corners of his mouth slowly turning up. "...OK."

"You got something to disguise the fact that the Strike Commander is riding to the rescue of a gang boss?"

"Yeah," he said, looking very pleased. "I've been putting together some gear. I think you'll find it satisfactory."

"Athena, I need you to relay this message to Genji." You thought about going to Jesse, but it was better not to depend on him to choose between you and Gabriel. You already knew where his loyalties were and while logically, you couldn't fault him, it would be a lie to say you weren't a little hurt. But there was no point in hashing that out now. What was done was done, and Jesse was still your friend.
"If you haven't heard from us in three hours, here are our coordinates and the mission details. I didn't name it. The Strike Commander classified this as priority Flash, clearance Top Secret, and compartmentalized it under BW Eyes Only, as well as Shit Spiders and Legion. Only agents with clearance for both can access it. The details are in the attached brief." You grabbed your go-bag, and hurried to the designated hangar, certain Jack would leave you behind if he thought he could get away with it.

The Strike Commander had his own hangar, usually for running diplomatic missions. He rode along with regular transport for Overwatch operations.

The man waiting in there wore black and red, his armor a modified Blackwatch variant underneath a black leather jacket. Carrying a massive assault rifle in the same colors, he looked like some kind of cyberpunk mercenary with a leather kink. He wore a black full face mask with red trim, the crimson light of the visor glowing in the dimness. You would not have recognized him, except the shock of blonde hair gave him away.

You followed him up the ramp of the small dropship.

"...That's uh...very bondage rave-night at the army surplus store."

"...You don't like it," Jack muttered, his voice more guttural behind the mask.

"...It's very edgy," you said, covering your smirk. "Like something Gabriel would wear. Or design." For a biker bondage club. You left that last part out, because you were getting better at diplomacy.

There was a pause. Jack shrugged. That was exactly it.

"It's not bad. At least it's not red, white, and blue and emblazoned with eagles or American flags."

The mask made it impossible to read Jack's expression, but from the set of his shoulders, you suspected you'd offended him. You just weren't sure if it was because he would never wear something like that, or because that was his original idea.

Chapter End Notes

If you're wondering, I'm referencing Soldier 76's Jet outfit with some modifications.

Kind of meandering through right now. Very sleepy. Need to summon motivation to get back to job hunting but honestly kind of tired. Bleagh.

Hope everyone else is having happier or at least more productive weeks? Be healthy out there!
Chapter 50

Chapter Summary

Operation I Need Coffee is live and unauthorized.

Chapter Notes

Maya drew Ziv pretending to be a good boi.

Mamimi ran with the baby train and made Lucky with Gabriel's grownup daughter and Jack's grownup son.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Jack removed the mask as the ship took off, the seals hissing when he pressed the release mechanism. It was a small craft, stealthy and fast, with a bunk, a seating area for four, a few rows of cabinets, and a partitioned off area for the pilot. You peeked around the corner and blinked at the omnic pilot sitting at the helm.

"Relax, it's Athena," Jack said. "She's in the body and the ship."

You pursed your lips, because that reasoning really bothered you. She was navigator, gunner, engineer, and pilot. You were used to having more overlap in roles. "Are you cleared to fly?"

"Technically, no," Athena admitted. "I am an authorized copilot with excellent flight sim test scores. I am aware that we do not usually place a craft in a singular individual's care. Granted, I am not subject to the usual body limits that most humans and omnis have. I realize there are also biases against letting AIs control human transport. However, I can assure you Lucky, that you are secure in my chassis. I have superior reflexes, multiple failsafes, and would never casually risk your safety," she said earnestly, like she was afraid you were going to ground her.

You sighed, realizing just how accurate the teen metaphor was. Athena was growing up, Jack had given her the keys to the dropship, and she was grounded if she so much as scratched the paint. You nodded. "It just surprised me."

Jack set his assault rifle aside. "Athena can drive and we can neck in the back."

"...Shut up," you scowled, already pulling off your hoodie. You claimed the seat across from him.

Jack grinned at you, eyes bright and pleased, and it still made your heart skip a beat. The mask rested in his lap. "The view is great."

Shaking your head, you quickly changed into your combat gear, taking a moment to swap out your prostheses. Comm unit, blade, EMP pulse. Jack said you were just dropping Zheng's drones off. But who knew if he'd decide to charge off into battle? Or if this was some kind of elaborate trap? Because while Lacroix and the analysts were all impressed by the blood oath and the fancy ceremonial bullshit, you weren't entirely convinced of On Sing's sincerity. You didn't see how betraying Overwatch would help them in the long run, but you didn't rule it out as a possibility.

"For the record, I think this is a mistake," you said, after you'd gotten changed. You bit into an energy bar and tossed one to Jack. He caught it, brow raised.

"Noted." He did not sound offended. "I realize it's not the smartest political move. But I didn't do all this work just to play politics. What's the point of all this if I can't save the life of a stupid teenage girl?"

You shrugged, because you didn't have a good answer. You knew the logic. You'd already kind of had this discussion with Lacroix. You were also pretty sure that Feng was in her early twenties, though she certainly didn't act like it. But Jack wasn't wrong.

Jack leaned forward, his knees almost touching yours. "Talk to me?"

"We do the smart thing in Blackwatch. It isn't always the right thing, but in the long run, it kind of is." You rubbed your forehead. "I'm not a hero, Jack. I actually do like Feng and I don't want to see her killed off, but..."

"But you've gone so long doing the "smart" thing that the "moral" feels wrong," he said quietly. "And that makes you feel worse."

"I guess." You shrugged helplessly. Saving Lao had been the smart course of action, given what a good resource she would be. And it had been personal. You rubbed your forehead. You did not want to think about what would have happened if the mission objectives had come into direct conflict.

"You're wrong, you know." Jack stood up, and crossed over the aisle to sit beside you. "You are pretty heroic. Saving Gabe. Putting all that effort into saving Agent Lao. Jumping on top of me in full view of the cameras-"

"I'm pretty sure there are memes of us now," you said.

Jack just snorted. "There's a whole Overwatch-admirers subculture that you are happier not knowing about."

You shook your head as he rested an arm around your shoulder.

"So you really advised Feng to apologize to me?" Jack asked.

"Yeah, she cornered me in the bathroom and talked my ear off." You sighed. "She's a dumb kid with lofty aspirations. And I'm like "that's ridiculously naive." And she's all, "I know, but I can do it. And here's how." By the end of it I'm left going "yup, she's insane, but maybe she can pull it off." You know, if she doesn't get killed in the process."

Jack laughed. "You didn't get a little jealous?" He nuzzled your neck. "Not even a tiny bit?"

"I didn't like her making passes at you," you admitted.

Jack flashed you a smug grin. "You know, you're the only woman I'm interested in." He leaned back. "And Gabe's the only man."

"Well, if Gabriel and I aren't enough to keep you occupied, I don't know what we're going to do," you sighed.

"You'll just have to dress up and jump me in the office with bag full of sex toys."

You wrinkled your nose. "...Those are not what I would choose to bludgeon you with. But if that's what you want..."

Jack's face lit up with delight, like he was happy you were a little jealous. That idiot. "I just look at Feng like a really unhinged Maggie. Honest."

You raised a brow. You could see that. "Guess it's hard to stand by when she reminds you of your baby sister."

Jack grimaced. "Ten years ago, I wouldn't have hesitated, neither would Gabe. Now? Yeah, I feel the same way you do. But I'm tired of it, Lucky. I'm tired of the command, the loss, the regrets." Jack sighed and you took his hand. "I know Gabe is too. He won't come out and say it. But running Blackwatch has taken a toll on him. He's a guy who'll do what has to be done: plan assassinations, torture people, bully traumatized kids. But he's got a limit. The more he does, the easier it gets, and none of us like the person he becomes when he crosses those lines. I know it's necessary, but..."

But you wished it was not.

"Things had gotten pretty bad between us before Black Base Delta. It was mostly the job," Jack said. "Some of it was my willful obliviousness, Gabe's pettiness, and both our egos. But the longer I do this, the more time, focus, and sacrifice it seems to require. I'm running out of things to give up."

You nodded, because while you were perfectly content to go on killing enemies and plotting your revenge, you understood that Jack's work took more out of him. "You know, you could always quit. Leave Captain Amari in charge and get that farm. Come out for special occasions when you feel like busting heads. So maybe once a week?"

Jack laughed. "Ana would murder me."

"...I hate to break it to you, but you're not the only amazing person in Overwatch, Jack." You began loading your carbines. "Between the leadership team, Athena, and the structures Lacroix's been implementing, I don't think Overwatch should or does depend on any one person."

You paused. "You know, in case you thought Overwatch couldn't make it without you."

Jack snorted. "Thanks, baby."

"I don't want to picture Overwatch without you. But you should know you're obviously pretty important to Gabriel and me." You closed your eyes. "And your value isn't contingent on what you do for Overwatch. Especially when you've already done so much."

Jack blew out a long breath. "Thanks." He rested his head on your shoulder. "I knew that, but it's good to hear it."

You shrugged. "It's something Gabriel's been trying to convey to me. I guess in my case, it's a little more severe. Like I have to continuously prove my worth to myself. It's not a standard I hold anyone else to, just me. And I know it's not healthy. It's just...when I survived and a lot of other people didn't, I was left searching for some kind of justification." Revenge was the best compromise you had reached, but you didn't need to say that out loud. "I know it's not right and it certainly isn't logical, but that's a lesson I'm still trying to absorb."

"...I know," Jack said softly, gripping your hands.

You closed your eyes. Of course he did. Jack had buried a lot of people too.

"You know you can talk to me too," he said. "I'm not as good at this counseling stuff as Gabe. But for what it's worth, I'm here and you don't have to prove anything to me." He was so painfully earnest that you had to look away.

"This is how it usually goes with Gabe. I don't announce "I'm ready to talk about my issues!" He gets me comfortable, maybe asks a question, then I blurt too much, and he doesn't bat an eye, just continues the conversation like we're discussing what to make for dinner and gives out advice from personal experience."

Jack's smile was soft, gentle, and completely at odds with his outfit. "Just like this, huh? So I don't have to get out the thumbscrews or drugs. You'll just start talking about things if I ask?"

"Sometimes," you said, and realized it was true.

"I'll keep that in mind." Jack said. He leaned over, lips brushing your nose. "And I'd still like you, even if you weren't running around in bloody towels slaughtering cyborgs terrorists."

You rolled your eyes, because you were never going to live that down.

"And thanks, for coming along and not calling in Gabe or Ana."

"You know, we're both going to be in so much trouble." You didn't want to think about how either of them would react when they found out what was going on. And they would find out. You had no illusions about that.

"Nah, just me. I ordered you to keep your mouth shut and dragged you along. That's the story and we're sticking to it." Jack leaned over and kissed you. "You really don't like the outfit?"

"It's like an evil version of you, and the mask is not what I expected," you said. "Very comic book superhero style. Protecting your identity is important and no one's going to suspect that it's you under there. I hope."

"But is it a sexy evil version of me?" Jack asked.

You were unsure if there was a version of Jack that wasn't sexy. If there was, you hadn't seen it yet. "Sure."

"Really?"

"Uh-huh," you said.

"Come on. You can tell me if you don't like it."

"It's different is all."

"Gabe designed it!"

"Yeah, for like a fetish club."
"What do you know about fetish clubs?" Jack asked, sounding way too interested.

"...I've run a couple missions at some. You'd blend right in."

Jack squinted at you. "I can't tell if you're joking or not."

You almost told him to ask Jesse or Genji about those missions, but decided that would just be cruel. "You look good. Different, but good. And it's obvious Gabriel designed those pants. They look painted on your ass."

Jack sat back with a grin, vanity satisfied.

You mentally congratulated yourself for giving a good compliment. Even if he had fished for it. Amélie would be proud. Lacroix would have brought up Genji, Jesse, and made up a spicy story about Tataryn. You had taken the Amélie route, and that was the better choice in the long run.

Two slender omnics waited for you on the rocky steppes of the Yin Mountains. The day was bright and cold. Sparse wiry shrubbery dotted the ground and you blinked at the harsh sunlight. You didn't like the temperature or thinner air, but at least there was no snow. Instead the landscape came in shades of tan and brown with hints of muddy resentful green. But the sky was a pretty shade of blue, and with wilderness spanning into the horizon, the sky seemed closer than before, the clouds lower, the vault of the heavens almost within reach.

The effect was humbling: the steppes were vast, and you were so small. Not the pep walk you needed right now. You found yourself craving tea or cigarettes. This wasn't the kind of place for cake, though you wouldn't turn it down.

Jack stepped off the transport, massive assault rifle slung over his shoulder. "Stay cloaked, we'll be back soon." The visor was locked firmly in place, and Jack probably didn't have to squint to see through the glare. You considered a face mask then. It was something to look into. Maybe Gabriel could design you an outfit, with a little less kink.

"Strike Commander." The omnic on the left spoke. "I am grateful for your assistance." Their heads swiveled to acknowledge you. "Agent Strike. I did not realize you would be here too."

"She's discrete," Jack said, all business. "You just need an escort, correct?"

There was a moment of silence as the omnics regarded you. They moved in tandem, and it was a little dizzying to think that there was one person in both bodies. "I do not know if I will be able to seize control of the facility. If I can, then there is no need for further intervention." The one on the left continued to speak, and the one on the right stayed silent. You were glad you weren't getting her in stereo and that she wasn't alternating bodies. That would be distracting.

"...But if not, since we're already here, maybe we should rescue Feng?" Jack said, unamused. "Funny how you keep piling on the favors."

"Desperate times," Zheng said, not sounding the least bit sorry.
"For the duration of the mission I'm "Paladin." She's "Ranger." Since we don't want to advertise our affiliations."

"Perhaps "Ranger" should find a less distinct style of armor in the future. She is already well-known to us," Zheng said. "Not to sound ungrateful, Ranger. I do appreciate your willingness to help."

You nodded, but did not respond, wanting to keep your interaction with Zheng to a minimum.

Thankfully both omnis turned away. "The facility is about four kilometers out. It is housed inside a partially-hollowed out mountain."

You rolled your eyes. "That mountain isn't a dormant volcano, is it? Or the legendary home of a mythical demigod? Or a gateway to another world?"

"I should hope not," Zheng said, unfazed. "Young Fa is not prone to being that dramatic."

"Or stylish," you said, elbowing Jack lightly.

He remained quiet, and you wondered if he was grinning behind the mask. Maybe not. He'd been super serious in Belfast.

"Young Fa does lack a certain...flair," Zheng said.

"Did you bring your cloak, Ranger?" Jack asked.

"Of course," you said, flicking it on. Torby had made some small improvements to your gear, and you were supposed to be able to use your EMP pulse without shorting out the suit now.

The omnis beside you froze for a moment, then tilted their heads. "Interesting effect, Ranger. Lindholm's work?"

"Yeah," you said, and her omnic bodies turned to face you, using auditory sensors to zero in on your location.

"These optics cannot track you, and therefore, Fa's probably won't either. Good choice, Paladin."

You realized Zheng was a Chinese elder, used to respect and authority. You weren't sure if she meant to sound as condescending as she did, or if she even cared. Maybe it was just a rich mad scientist thing. Well at this point, her demeanor was the least of your worries.

"We cannot go in the front door, however I have acquired the blueprints and there should be access tunnels to the west."

"Lead the way," Jack said.

"...What?" Gabriel sat at his desk. It was far too early for this bullshit. "What do you mean "they're gone?" I just saw them just a few hours ago. For fuck's sake, they were still in bed when I got down here." His voice got louder with every sentence and now he was yelling, but Ana didn't
She just shrugged. "Jack and Lucky are not on the grounds. Athena has verified this. Unfortunately, while she might know their locations, their GPS tracking is locked down. Jack’s doing, I'm sure. Lucky's clearances don't go that high."

"Have you talked to Gérard?" Whenever something shady went down and Gabriel knew nothing of it, Gérard was the prime suspect.

"He claims ignorance, and I believe him." Ana paused. "You don't think they've gone to assassinate Petras, do you? Because I don't know how well we can cover that up, Gabe."

"If they did and didn't invite me, I'm going to be pissed," Gabriel muttered. "No, not Petras. Not yet."

Ana uncrossed her arms. "I have a few ideas, none of them good."

Gabriel yawned, confident you had not gone to off Petras without him. Jack normally wasn't that spontaneous and you would at least leave a note. "What, you don't think they snuck out to plan a surprise party for me?"

"...Jack isn't that considerate and Lucky isn't that civilized."

Gabriel narrowed his eyes, maybe just a little defensive. "Ana."

"We both know it's true." She shrugged. "Give them a few years, maybe they'll learn. Lucky, anyway."

Gabriel sighed. "He's getting better."

"Yes," Ana agreed. "He isn't hopeless. Having both of you is good for him."

Gabriel could feel his expression softening. "Yeah."

"It's good for you too," Ana said. "And her as well. But maybe not Jack's office carpet."

Gabriel didn't mind Ana's smug look. He certainly wasn't ashamed. And if she didn't like it, she could knock next time. "I know."

There was a knock at the door before Jesse walked in carrying two mugs of coffee and a letter. "So...Genji gave me this and told me that my eyes would explode if I tried to read it." He nodded at Ana and handed the paper and a cup to Gabriel.

Gabriel unfolded the paper and read the note. "Operation I Need Coffee. What the..." Swearing, Gabriel took the op name and pulled up the briefing on screen. As he read the contents, he switched over to lengthy diatribe in Spanish. Ana came behind his desk and let loose a stream of curses in Arabic.

"That...idiot!" Ana exhaled sharply.

"I'm going to kill him," Gabriel said, when he had recovered his ability to use polite words. "Maybe both of them."

"I'm going to help," Ana said.

Jesse took a step backward, a conflicted expression on his face.
"What is it?" Gabriel asked, recognizing that look.

"Uh...well...you see, I don't know what's going on, but..."

Jack remained silent as the two of you followed Zheng's omnics through the rocky steppes. The cold dry air made the inside of your nose burn.

"We're here," Zheng announced, and the four (three?) of you stopped before a large sheer cliff face that went up a few hundred feet.

You eyed the small mountain with skepticism. "How can you tell?" You asked.

"This spot is a blackhole of signals emissions," she said, seemingly unaware of your sarcasm. "It's not a good concealment technique, but it does serve to keep me out. There's a tunnel this way. I can sense the digital cover programs to the west. It isn't hardlight tech, simple reflection projections. Very handy illusions that don't take much effort to maintain."

You glanced at Jack.

"Are you saying On Sing has a functional invisibility cloak?" Jack asked.

"Not quite. The projections don't work as well for objects in motion, but they can be programmed to blend in with all kinds of weather and light conditions in set locations. We're still working on the personal optical cloaking devices. The processors have to be lightning fast to change pigment and texture."

"Does it fool wildlife better than more primitive version of camouflage?" Jack asked.

"Creatures whose sight stays within the visible light spectrum buy into the illusion. But insects and other invertebrates don't seem to be fooled. It's a minor weakness," she acknowledged.

You filed that away for future reference, wondering if Winston or Torby could design insect-based omnics as countermeasures.

"I admit, I tried bioengineering it, mimicking chameleons and cephalopods. I could replicate the effect with living tissue, and it was thin enough to make suits out of, but it required a neural interface and the feedback loop left a lot of users oversensitized. Basically it became too painful to wear after an hour or so. I suppose I could always pick the project back up, given what I've learned about neural processing algorithms and tweaking brain chemistry..."

"I'd like more information about the resistance we'll be facing. I will admit I've skimmed your blueprints and notes," Jack said. "But I assumed the "Mongolian Death Worm Project" was a faulty translation."

Zheng's talkative omnic fell silent for a moment. "Aiya. I'd forgotten about that one. Well, it's not as bad as you think. It's more an experiment than a security measure. Still, don't try to pet them."

You rubbed your forehead. "Wait, what?"

"I don't even know if that project is still active. Honestly, it's the least of your worries. Fa has stationed a fair amount of Red Pole omnics here. He was supposed to get rid of them, but falsified the reports. There are a few cyborgs loyal to him. The unenhanced humans won't be a problem. They are weak and Feng can probably clean them up on her own."

You rolled your eyes, because apparently Zheng had forgotten what you were. Or she just didn't care. Though it made you wonder what kind of add-ons Feng had.

"You seem awfully certain Feng is alive," Jack said.

"...This is not the first rescue party sent after her," Zheng said after a moment. "But I lost contact with my other bodies once they made it a quarter of the way into the facility. I suspect it was a controlled EMP, though I am not entirely certain. The maps are accurate, Paladin. I know from firsthand experience."

Zheng's silent omnic reached through the rock face and something beeped. An airlock hissed, and metal hinges groaned, all out of sight. The omnics disappeared first, and Jack followed. You shook your head and stepped through the illusion.

The narrow metal tunnel was tall enough for Jack to stand up straight, but you had to walk single file. Emergency LED lights dotted the walls. The air was stale and you caught whiffs of death and melted plastic. It was hard to tell if that was because of poor ventilation or if this was a murder scene. You did not shut the door behind you.

"We originally came in a different route," Zheng said. "But that way is closed to us now. This part of the facility is not actually in use yet."

"Comm units on. Zheng. Can you transmit directly to Red Channel?"

"Of course," she said, now a voice in your ear, her omnic bodies both silent. "The perimeters guards will be sparse. Fa has not sent reinforcements. But the Red Pole omnics here have been upgraded."

Jack tensed beside you.

"Swords still?" You asked.

"They have yǎnyuèdāo as well. Reclining moon blades. They are polearms, like glaives."

"Great," you said, not holding back the sarcasm. "Because those giant killer robots just needed a little more range."

"If you can lure them into the tunnels, it will reduce their mobility."

You'd just be up close and personal with a few tons of homicidal articulated metal. That seemed so much safer. You were grateful for the high metal collar that blocked off half your face. Because you knew your expression wasn't very polite.

"I read Winston's workup on the one you brought back. My rifle should do the trick, Ranger. Yours won't, but you're more than equipped to handle the cyborgs." Jack's voice was dry, all business, and yet you recognized the playfulness of his last comment. Oh boy.

"Just don't be stupid and try to punch one to death, like someone else we know."

Jack actually laughed. "No promises, Ranger."
"Is that a pulse rifle?" Zheng asked Jack.

"Yes," Jack said.

"That should do well against the Red Poles," she said. "They were constructed to withstand kinetic small arms fire and some ordnance."

"Reach Feng is priority," Jack said. "We can shoot our way out, unless this facility has a self-destruct option or Fa is capable of orbital strikes."

"Neither of those will be a problem. Fa is trying to be subtle, and I have a handle on all his works now. Except for this one. Anyway, who builds self destruct mechanisms into their own homes?" Zheng asked. "That's ridiculous."

"It's an understandable mad scientist trope," you said. "Especially if they have Mongolian death worms just lying around."

"I am aware. It is foolish. We have well-tested containment procedures for that. And they actually work. This isn't Jurassic Park, Ranger."

You stood there, for a moment, wondering if On Sing would bring back dinosaurs. Or any other prehistoric life forms. Or even engineer dragons. If you saved Feng, maybe she would be amenable to making you a-

What the hell? Was there something in the air? Because that was an insanely stupid idea. Awesome, but incredibly stupid.

"So we only need to worry about ground troops, not air support," Jack said. "Where do you think Feng is?"

"Feng planned on holing up in the panic room. We are on the first level. The finished panic room is on the fourth level. This facility has seven aboveground levels and several more beneath the surface. Those are still under heavy construction though."

Jack nodded. "Was it wise to build so many pneumatic tube transports?"

You blinked, because apparently you were old school. You just took the stairs most of the time. Elevators were too vulnerable. You'd done so many elevator ambushes. Whooshing freely through tubes to get around? That was cool in theory. But you could poke a lot of holes in that theory, starting with all the things one could do to compromise the tubes.

"...that was not my idea," Zheng said, somehow sounding embarrassed. "The younger generation was enamored with the idea of "zooming" and "slides." I strongly recommend not using any of them. Both sides have left unpleasant traps in them. Caltrops, focused plasma beams, proximity mines, dead fish, itching powder..."

"Those last two, those were Feng, weren't they?" You could not stop yourself from asking.

"...Yes, on top of the caltrops and proximity mines." Zheng's omnic stopped in front of another large circular sealed door.

"This time, I will stay out of the firefight. These bodies are not ideal for combat. We will work on breaching the mainframe from a few access points. We would be more efficient if you wished to advance in search of Feng."
You gave Jack a look. Because it went from "get me in" to "maybe we could look for her" to "you go ahead and get shot at while I play video games."

"We will scout ahead. Can you monitor incoming omnic forces?"

"There are a few ahead, but they may start attacking once I start my assault on the system."

"Do we need to defend you?" You asked, not liking the idea of making some kind of last stand against a mad scientist's hive.

"You need to find Feng," she said. "We are better situated to take control of the system this time." She opened the door, the seals hissing. You advanced into some kind of server room, several lights blinking red at a slow pace.

"What is this?"

"Backups," she said, no longer facing you. The silent omnic knelt unfolded itself, like an origami figure. It went from vaguely humanoid to a modified console, joints splitting, chest opening up, and head blooming like a flower into a satellite dish. It was all very artistic, efficient, and unsettling. Zheng's verbal omnic plunged both hands into the contact point inside the transforming omnic's chest. "We will begin here. Good luck, Paladin, Ranger."

You stared for a moment, shaking your head.

"Let's move," Jack said. "There are stairs along the western perimeter."

You'd gotten a look at the facility blueprint. The facility was dome-shaped within the mountain, stairs running along both eastern and western sides, pneumatic tubes crisscrossing in central locations, and freight elevators on the northern and southern points.

You took one last look at Zheng's omnic bodies, a cool blue light suffusing them both, and went out the doors.

Jack took point. You didn't argue, instead studying the metal hallways. It wasn't so much futuristic, as unnatural and claustrophobic, but there were still exposed wires and half the hall LEDs did not light up.

"...You knew this was going to happen, right?" The hall was wide enough that you could walk next to him, but you stayed behind him, keeping an eye out for trap doors or slithery shadows. The ceilings were high enough that neither of you were going to bump your heads. Reinhardt might, but that was normal everywhere.

"Yes," Jack said. You passed through another doorway, the lights brighter now. "Doesn't change what we're here to do."

"I'm really not liking some of the implications." Mostly about Zheng's sanity.

"...We'll deal with that later," Jack said. He raised a hand and you fell silent.

He drew his gun, and you had to back up because it was massive. Probably weighed half as much as you did. Jack handled it with thoughtless ease.

You bit your lip and continued down the hall, ducking to avoid loose cables dangling from the ceiling. You held your carbine in your right hand, wondering what you would encounter first: Red Poles, cyborgs, Mongolian death worms? Well, it was an excuse not to think about Lao.
You went through another door, and the quality of the area continued to improve: finished rooms, working lights, decorative plants and scrolls placed along the walls. You admired a silk hanging portraying koi eating jellybeans. How untraditional. And probably bad for the fish. This area was obviously no longer under construction.

"They are not yet aware of my presence." Zheng's voice sounded in your earpiece. "But I suspect that will change in another two minutes."

"Understood." Jack nodded at you. "Try not to get yourself killed."

"That is usually what I'm doing," you scowled.

To your surprise, Jack leaned down, the metal of his mask brushing lightly against your bare cheek. "This is worked better in my head."

"So much for the sexy kiss while blowing up tons of enemies," you shrugged.

"Maybe later."

Something large and metallic clomped in the distance, closing in on you. Jack stood in front of you, blocking your sight lines.

"Stop man-spreading and pick a side," you said, kneeling. Jack shifted slightly to the right.

A familiar red-armored omnic entered the hallway. Jack shot first, the assault rifle nowhere near as loud as you expected. You lay down cover fire, EMP rounds flaring as they struck its chassis. Jack fired another energy bolt and the Red Pole dropped its polearm, before staggering backward. Another blast of red energy cut through its thick plating and it fell, the clatter deafening. The floor shook and you rose, with serious gun envy.

"What do you think?" Jack hefted the gun over his shoulders, head tilted at a cocky angle.

"It only takes Gabriel two shots," you said, smirking behind your metal collar.

"...I have better range," he said, sounding just a wee bit defensive.

"And the bigger gun. Not feeling...self conscious, are we?" You winked at him.

"...You're going to get it on the way home," Jack growled. You weren't fooled. You could hear the amusement in his voice.

"It's OK, sir. Size isn't everything." You patted his shoulder.

"Keep it up, agent." He shook his head. "I've got a long memory."

"And a longer gun, one that certainly isn't any kind of psychological compensation for anatomical features." You chuckled as Jack gave an exasperated groan and turned on his heel.

You examined the fallen Red Pole, the yānyuèdāo taller than Jack. You shook your head. You were staying very far away from those things. Jack could shoot them and you'd provide immoral support and gun innuendo.

"They know we're here," Zheng said over the comms. "But they can't pinpoint your location. Unless you stand around and chat for an inordinate period of time."

"Why are we stopped, agent? Let's move."
Jack picked up the pace and you had to shift gears to keep up. Even carrying that massive gun, he was still faster than you. The two of you sprinted through the hall, Jack's heavy metal boots clanging against the floor. You could hear the omnis in the distance, but Jack got you to the stairs without further incident.

"Hold up." He raised a hand and opened the metal door. "Watch out for the tripwire. Crude, probably allied work."

You glanced down at the thin wire glistening a foot over the threshold. You followed the path until you spotted a sealed metal pipe. You'd seen enough of Vo's "party blaster specials" to recognize that there could be anything in there: ball bearings, nails, probably not hard candy, but she'd done a less combustive version of that at the Blackwatch New Years potluck and you'd never realized Everlasting Gobstoppers could hurt so much.

"The steps are clear," Jack said, and you wondered what other things that visor could do. The two of you went up the first flight of stairs, Jack keeping an eye out for traps. Did he view you as more of a hindrance than a help, given the fact he kept looking back over his shoulder to make sure you were behind him?

"I'm not going to wander off," you said.

"You're real quiet, agent."

"Well, I thought we were supposed to cut down on the banter-"

"No, you walk quietly. You breathe quietly. Guess you've picked something up from the Shimadas. Didn't expect it was all."

That was an odd compliment.

"Especially considering how loud you get when I've got you under me," he added, taking three steps at a time.

You felt your face heating up. It was probably all the cardio. Yeah, that was your story and you were sticking to it. "You want to talk about that, now?"

"We could talk about Agent Lao instead, if you like," he said, as you cleared the third flight of stairs.

You glared at his back. "It's not necessary." You realized you'd told him that you would talk about things when he asked, but now was not the time for you to think about Lao.

"Sure, that's why I came back to you bundled up against Gabe, looking like someone kicked your dog."

"I'd actually be super pissed if someone kicked my dog. That I don't have. My hypothetical dog. Who fucking kicked my hypothetical dog? This was just a hypothetical kick, right?"

"...You know what I mean, sweetheart." Jack did not sound amused by your panic-babbling.

"...Do you and Gabriel usually talk about feelings during combat?"

"You recall all that sparring we do, yeah?" Jack sounded smug.
Oh, yeah. Duh.

"I appreciate it, but I would rather focus on finding Feng and not walking into any traps."

"You're good at multitasking." Jack stopped in front of the entryway to the fourth floor. "Humor me too while you're at it."

"Don't I always?" You glanced down, still looking for tripwires.

Jack cleared his throat. "Would you rather talk to Gabe about it? I know he's better informed on the subject, but...this is important to you and so it matters to me." Even when you couldn't see his face, you could fucking hear the rueful expression he was wearing.

"...She said some shit. It hurt." You shrugged. "Honestly, I haven't processed it yet. I wasn't exactly surprised, but it still put me off balance and I didn't know how to react. So I just made polite face and left. I'll figure it out over time. Or I will once we've rescued Feng. It's honestly too much for me to think about while I'm on a mission, Jack."

"...That's fair." He sounded slightly sheepish. "You've got me and Gabe to bombard you with questionable advice. Just ask away. Even if I'm not a genius about feelings, I can make you laugh at what not to do. That counts for something right?"

"You're being ridiculous."

"And, I'll have cake and beer on hand, just for you."

That was an offer you couldn't refuse. Equal parts honest support and self-deprecating humor, what really clinched Jack's delivery was the overwhelming sincerity of it. Amélie and Jack probably attended the same damn charm school. Jack just went to the rural satellite location, less polish, but the same curriculum.

"We can talk about it later, promise," you said, relenting.

"You're getting pretty good at compromise." Jack chuckled and opened the door.

You grumbled under your breath, fully aware that Jack had finessed you, and that you let him.

The door led you into a wide hallway with a vaulted ceiling, cracked plaster and scorch marks covering much of the area. You eyeballed the large furrows dug into both the walls and floors, pretty sure that it was a damn omnic polearm that did the damage. You sniffed the air, catching whiffs of cordite, smoke, and rotting flesh. The hall curved. Around the bend, a badly-burned cyborg corpse lay ripped into quarters. The parts removed were all metal, but when you squinted, you saw the skull had been caved.

"Feng could do something like this," Jack said, kneeling beside the body. "I think your methods are more efficient and restrained."

"...I should hope," you scowled. "I have more restraint most of the time."

"You can have more restraints any time," Jack chuckled and you rolled your eyes so hard, the inside of your skull chafed.

"Spare me," you muttered. "I think I miss the stick-up-his-fine-ass Strike Commander."
"That can be arranged too, agent," Jack growled at you. "I owe you a great deal of payback. Complete with restraints and up-the-butt stuff." And then he had the audacity to laugh.

You shook your head. This wasn't a date. This was a rescue mission. But despite omnis, crime lords, and alleged Mongolian fucking death worms, Jack was making time to flirt. Worse, you liked it.

He rose and you both continued down the hall, checking out cracked walls and alcoves.

The hall opened up into an enormous, circular, multilevel chamber, with terraces and overhead walkways. A reflecting pool gleamed from the bottom level, an assortment of plants spilled down the graduated terraces starting at the top of the room and going all the way down to the reflecting pool, the greenery mimicking a waterfall. There was a skylight of some sort letting in the familiar harsh sunlight, though the air remained warm and slightly humid.

You looked down, calculating at least a forty foot drop. You saw red metal moving below, and watched the half dozen omnis patrolling the first floor, their motions almost clockwork.

The halls ran in circles, rooms and exits built along the way. The panic room was up ahead, but you already had a bad feeling about this.

"I don't think she's up here," you said after a moment. "We've encountered so little resistance."

"Noticed that." Jack stayed in the front. You hadn't heard from Zheng, though you hesitated to reach out and inquire.

"Wild goose chase?"

You came upon the location of the safe room, and your heart sank. The heavy vault door had been smashed in, rubber seals scorched, locks melted.

Jack entered first, half crouched, his gun raised. You followed, keeping a careful eye out for ambushes.

A Red Pole lay sparking on the ground, its chassis torn open by some kind of piercing weapon. The room itself bore the same style combat scars as the hallways. The once expensive furniture lay scattered across the floor, a mash of splintered wood, burnt fabric, and crumpled metal. You and Jack cleared the room, finding no signs of life.

"She's not here," Jack said into the comms.

There was no reply.

You sighed. Because it figured. "Next move?"

"Follow the omnis," Jack said. "We can try to rendezvous with Zheng and back her up."

"Back down then?"

"Yeah," Jack sighed. "Some of the lower levels had decontamination rooms and isolation chambers. She could have holed up in one of those too."
You and Jack headed back out. Jack bring up the rear. You examined some gouge marks in the doors, like someone had just dug their fingers into the lock system and just pulled. Wires hung out of the broken metal.

"Down!" Jack shoved you to the ground, one arm wrapped around your head as he covered you. You heard the shots strike the walls, plaster and fragments of metal raining down on you.

A bullet pinged off Jack's armor and you cursed. Given the angle of attack, they were shooting from a higher level.

"Go!" Jack ordered and yanked you to your feet. The two of you rushed out of the open area, heading back to the relative cover of the enclosed hallway where a trio of Red Pole omnis waited.

Your stealth field was up, but they had lined up shoulder to shoulder, polearms raised. You could sneak by, but Jack's heavy steps would give him away. You raised your gun.

"Maintain suppressing fire. I'll work my way down the line" Jack said and you started shooting. Your carefully-spaced EMP rounds slowed the line down as you backed up, trying to keep a safe distance between yourself and their wide swing range.

This time Jack went for the red light near the main optic sensors, and it only took two shots for him to bring down the first one. "Did you see that?" He called out.

"Are you trying to impress me?" You snorted.

"Is it working?" He laughed, having way too much fun.

"Ask me when they're all dead," you shouted, as you jumped backward, narrowly sliding out of the path of the yānyuèdāo strike. It was wrong for something so big to be so fast. One hit would obliterate you.

But you had to keep backing up, well aware that the moment you left this stretch of hall, you'd be in sniper range once more.

Jack took more shots for the second one, and you concentrated fire on the third one, watching it skitter to a halt.

"Hold fire!" Jack rushed it from the side, and swung his gun like a bludgeon. You winced at the sharp clang of metal on metal, but the Red Pole dropped and Jack sent a bolt of energy through its processing panel. With every omnic he brought down, your gun envy got a little bit stronger. Why was he such a damn showoff?

"And stay down."

His gun smoked, as did the remnants of the vaguely humanoid piles of scrap metal on the ground. Jack unsealed his mask, as you knelt over your enemies, looking for anything out of the ordinary. The armor patterns were the same as the ones you'd encountered in Hong Kong and maybe Belfast. But there were dents and char marks that you were pretty sure had not come from your guns.

"Hey."

You looked up, Jack's bright blue eyes on yours.
"What's wron-?"

Jack's gloves gripped the back of your head, his fingers working your collar loose, and you gave a startled gasp as he leaned in, kissing you hard. He nipped at your bottom lip, tongue slipping into your mouth. You moaned softly as he ran his gloved fingers across your cheeks.

"I realize it's not a sexy mid-battle kiss, but maybe you can make do with this little victory celebration," Jack chuckled, even as he slid the mask back on.

You stared at him for a moment, before slowly adjusting your armor. "Damnit, Jack."

"So, impressed yet?" He preened under your astonished look.

"...Yeah," you said, begrudgingly.

"Well, don't lose your panties yet sweetheart, I'm just getting started." He swaggered to the stairs and you seriously contemplated shoving him.

There were three more Red Poles waiting for you on the landing of the second floor. You were tempted to just turn around and go back to the third floor, but Jack lowered his pulse rifle and began firing.

They charged this time, three massive yǎnyuèdāo wielding robots moving too fast for you to use grenades. So you had to retreat up the stairs, shooting over your shoulder.

"We can lose them on the third floor," you said, holding open the door.

"We can take them down," Jack said. "No point leaving them for later." The two of you spun around the corner. Jack raised his rifle, put three energy bolts into the first omnic. The door was only wide enough for them to emerge single file, but the second one used its smoking companion as a shield, and the third one rushed forward, swinging the polearm in an arc.

You flattened yourself against the wall, but Jack ducked under the strike and slammed his gun into the omnic's chassis. Swearing under your breath, you lifted your carbine and began firing.

The omnic ignored you, spinning its weapon. It swung again, the pole part striking Jack across the shoulders. He staggered, and the omnic, probably judging the distance by sound, lashed out, metal arm punching Jack in the gut. He dropped to his knees with a grunt.

Your EMP bullets shattered the red plate and the omnic began to jerk erratically as it lost control of its body.

The second omnic attacked then, its yǎnyuèdāo stabbing through the air, past Jack's ear. When it found no purchase, the omnic rushed forward, slamming Jack through the wall, and into the main fountain chamber.

"Jack!" Your mind flashed to the sniper, but the Red Poles were the immediate threat. You followed, hoping the omnic you had been facing was down for good.

The Red Pole dropped its weapon, lifted Jack over its head, and threw him off the parapet.
Snarling, you bit into the finger your left glove, yanking it off, shut off your stealth field, and slammed your middle finger into the omnic's back. Your fingers twitched and you brought up your carbine in your right hand, firing point blank into its processing panels.

The omnic shuddered, and teetered there. You rammed into it with your shoulder, knocking it off walkway. Oh shit, what if it landed on Jack? There was a crash of metal hitting the ground and you cringed, hoping Jack hadn't been in the middle of that.

Swearing, you leaned over the edge, almost afraid to look.

"Jack!" You searched the ground vainly for any sign of him. You saw his enormous gun on the ground, but of course, you wouldn't be able to see him if he was buried under a goddamn Red Pole... "Answer me!"

"You're so loud, agent."

You looked down and to the left. Jack dangled from the edge of the second floor railing. He waved with one hand and then hauled himself over the low wall with ease.

"Goddamnit, Jack!"

"You need to be careful about throwing omnics off ledges, agent. That is way more serious than tossing coins off skyscrapers." He laughed and you sagged in relief. "Get back into cover," he said, as if he only now remembered the sniper.

You headed back to the stairwell, taking a moment to put a few more rounds in the still-twitching omnic on the ground.

Jack waited for you on the landing by the second floor. You gave him a quick once over, taking a moment to poke his ribs. He just shrugged. "I would've been fine from that height. Not if you dropped an omnic on me afterward, but the fall itself wouldn't have killed me."

You exhaled slowly. "Next time don't let them get so close."

"Mmm, I think I recall telling you something similar." He nodded to himself. "Yes, this all sounds very familiar..."

What a dick. "I definitely remember telling you that we could lose them. No need to engage every enemy we see. What if that sniper had taken a shot at us while we were fighting?"

Jack took off his mask, his grin wide. "I'm fine, sweetheart. Stop fretting."

"No, stop taking stupid risks. I realize you don't normally get to just be an agent in the field but-"

He kissed you hard, tongue prodding against yours and it was a few seconds before you shoved him off.

"Quit using your sneaky sex-wiles on me, Jack! I'm telling you to stop being so damn reckless!"

"Oh yes, we've definitely been here before, baby. Sucks being on the other side, doesn't it?" His voice dripped with smugness, and he crossed his arms. "But unlike you, I can take the damage. So you just stay behind me, OK?"
"I should have dropped that damn omnic on your smarmy ass."

"Kinky," Jack murmured, leaning over to nip your ear. "You don't mean that."

"Every word," you said through clenched teeth.

Jack just gave a low, pleased laugh. "You're so sexy when you're angry, sweetheart."

"Does that line ever work for you?"

"Gabriel usually just punches me after the first time I say it," Jack admitted. He flicked your nose. "And then we roll around and fight for awhile. And after that, yeah, it works." A silly grin spread slowly across his face. "It works just fine...."

You flung your hands into the air and shook your head. "Jack-

"I'll be more careful. You use up your EMP attachment?"

"Yeah." You flicked your suit back on, happy to find that it still worked.

"I'll be a lot more careful then," he said, one hand resting on your waist. "I'm afraid I have to be. My rifle ended up on the ground floor."

"Your gun looked intact," you said.

"I'm sure it's fine. Unless you dropped that omnic on it."

You took point, entering the central fountain area of the ground floor. It was built to impress and you took half a second to admire the architect's aesthetics. Greenery and water flowed from the terraces overhead. The floor, the parts that weren't burnt out, or cracked, or smashed up because of irresponsible jerks dropping omnics from high up, was a mosaics of glass and colorful stones, forming a pattern you'd probably have to be high up to appreciate. It had a very "expensive greenhouse" vibe. You half expected to see colorful birds flying around. Maybe there had been, until someone shot them down and possibly ate them. You could see Feng getting hungry and doing just that.

The omnics that had been patrolling the ground floor were gone, probably the same ones that attacked you. You kept an eye out for the sniper, hugged the walls, and stuck behind pillars. Cover was essential. Jack retrieved his gun with no issue and gave it a test fire. It still worked and took a hefty chunk out of the masonry.

"Let's go find Zheng."

You backtracked, and came upon her omnics, still linked in their user/console formation. But the lights had gone dark, and you studied the server room.

"Zheng, are you still here?"

"That question is difficult to answer precisely," a voice said over the comms. "But I am present and slowly penetrating the system mainframe. The omnic shells are no longer necessary. You'll want to head for the lower levels. There's fighting down there."
"What kind of opposition are we facing?"

"A rough estimate is about a dozen Red Poles. I can't track the cyborgs, and I believe all the unenhanced human personnel are dead."

"We got sniped at earlier," Jack said. "Red Poles carry guns?"

"No." There was a pause. "...Perhaps it was a case of mistaken identity."

"What?" You crossed your arms, unsure of where to aim your disapproving look.

"You may encounter a pair of mercenaries," Zheng sounded all too calm. "I did not call them. But Feng is not without allies. Please try not to kill them. I would ask them to extend the same courtesy to you, but they are out of my range of influence."

"Who are they?" Jack pressed.

"I am honestly not certain. I have suspicions, but I would hate to give you inaccurate information. I will try to reach them before you. I will be in touch when I know for sure."

"Really?" You scowled.

There was no answer.

Chapter End Notes

So Costco has this large tres leches cake for like $13 and it's pretty damn good for the price (and the fact I don't have to make it.)

Prior has kindly pointed out to me that "Chanceux" should be "Chanceuse" because French adjectives have genders and yeah. Duh. Facepalm. After much deliberation I'm leaving it for the moment to maintain continuity. I planned to edit the finished work (keep finding grammatical errors, etc, and going back and editing right now is not on the agenda, not with the word count I'm trying to maintain). So for now, it is going to be incorrect, and I am sorry.

Working all Easter weekend, which is kind of annoying. Meh.

Nothing interesting to report. Will try to be more productive (with IRL stuff) next week.
Chapter 51

Chapter Summary

Wrapping up Operation I Need Coffee.

Chapter Notes

I think Jack's sister Jane is paying Mamimi to make children art. Easter outfits!

I got thrown on the angst train headed for Destination Tragedy and Heartbreak. Fine, I'll write an angst AU later on. It'll be a (long) oneshot. But seriously, I am bad at juggling writing projects, so I'm going to finish this first. Not to mention it would have spoilers for later events in IAL. Angst!anons are dangerous.

You took a different staircase downward. Aboveground, most of the facility was actually quite spacious and well-decorated. Belowground, you could see the framework of what could become a habitable space, but that's all it was. It resembled the maintenance tunnel, more functional than welcoming. The halls had been carved out of stone and reinforced with some kind of composite. Metal panels lined parts of the walls, covering pipes, wires, and ventilation ducts. Harsh LEDs sat recessed in the ceiling and the air grew cooler and staler as you descended.

"You think we need a secret mountain base?" Zheng had given you the blueprints. You were sure that Winston could make some cool improvements to the design. You just had to pick a mountain and not a dormant volcano.

"...I'm pretty sure we don't have one in the budget," Jack said. "Unless you have suggestions on ethical ways to make money."

"We could let Athena start playing the stock market or partner her with Tataryn to rip off casinos. Most of them are tied to organized crime and Tataryn would get a kick out of it. Hell, I think half of Blackwatch would be up for it, provided we got a cut."

Jack stopped. "...I said "ethical ways." Though I suppose investing isn't a bad idea. Winston, Torby, and the rest of the technical department already market some of their modified inventions for civilian use. Overwatch gets a percentage and retains partial rights for everything they do using agency resources."

"You're asking me about "ethical" methods, Jack. I'm kind of shaky there." You rubbed the back of your head. You didn't bring up that Blackwatch sometimes confiscated ill-gotten gains for funding. Jack knew that of course, and maybe he even saw the real budget numbers.

You and Gabriel kept a couple sets of books. Official. Semi-Official. And a coded actual tally, because Blackwatch agents needed ratlines, just in case, and that's one of the things you loved about Gabriel. He took care of his people, even if they were more than a little questionable, like Safehouses, escape methods, new identities if the heat got too strong. It wasn't always unethical stuff. Genji and Tataryn needed new civilian identities when they joined Blackwatch. And you, you'd need one too if you ever had to disappear, because of politics or worse.

"You actually have a pretty good idea of the difference between right and wrong, even if your actions are morally gray," Jack said, not sounding judgmental. "Anyway, what would we do with a secret mountain base?"

"What wouldn't we do with a secret mountain base?" You laughed, because you hadn't really thought beyond the cool supervillain factor. Maybe it was a bad idea. Lacroix and Ziv would get really into it, and the next thing you knew, they were holding the world hostage until the UN outlawed fanny packs and socks with sandals.

"I'd like more sunlight," Jack said. "You know, if we're talking about living there."

"Pfft, you just want a bunch of flat land for your corn." You began to reload as you walked. You were down to half your ammo reserves. Not a problem if it was Jack's gun you were relying on.

"I wouldn't mind some forest, maybe a lake. I don't actually want to grow acres of corn, Lucky," he said, sounding a little annoyed. "Just enough to grill and have at cookouts." He looked over his shoulder at you, and you wished he wasn't wearing that mask. "Is a mountain fortress your ideal house?"

You shrugged. "It'd be secure and pretty cool. But no, I haven't really thought about it."

Jack fell silent. You kept walking, and it felt like these stairs went on forever. Your ears had popped a few times and you were at least three stories underground now.

The silence was not quite comfortable. You wondered if it was something you said. "There's nothing wrong with what you want, Jack. I know I give you a lot of crap about corn, but--"

"You just want a big bathtub," he said. "Maybe a bigger kitchen, so you aren't always bumping into Gabriel or whoever's in there with you."

"I..." You stared at his back, heart beating a little faster. "Yeah, I guess."

"A treehouse maybe? You know, one of those hexagonal expensive models with the wraparound porch and a spiral staircase?"

"Now you're just being silly; how am I going to get a big bathtub up there?" You touched your tanto. "Anyway, property prices in Zurich are ridiculous. I thought about an apartment for awhile, but I couldn't justify it. I get what I need on base, I don't mind people popping by my room to visit, and I spend half my time in you and Gabriel's rooms anyway."

"I guess you do," Jack said, sounding oddly satisfied. "About Athena: you don't just see her as a facility caretaker, do you?"

"We talk," you said, unsure of where he was going with this.

"You just sit there and talk to the AI?" Concern permeated his words.

"She asks me questions. We have conversations. You don't?"

"No." It came out slow and deliberate. "What do you talk about that isn't work-related?"
'Boundaries, human behavior, our mutual friends. Like "Winston needs to get out more."
"Oh Lucky, I agree, but you do too. Might I suggest Capri. I hear it is lovely this time of year.
You should take Winston and confiscate his computer." "Ha, ha, ha. You know a full-grown gorilla can rip off my arms and beat me to death with them, right?" "Oh Winston wouldn't do that.
Probably. Unless you took his peanut butter." Stuff you talk about it with your friends." You shrugged.

"...She helps you plan vacations?"

"Well, she can. I take her recommendations with a grain of salt. I once told her I wanted to go somewhere warm and quiet, and she recommended Centralla, Pennsylvania. You know, that place where the coal fires are still burning underground and have been for decades? Yeah. I think she was trolling, because she mentioned the dangerous levels of toxic gas, but I'm really not sure. I got the feeling she wanted to see it up close."

"I didn't realize she had developed that strong of a personality," Jack said, thoughtfully.

"Problem?"

"I hope not," he said. "She knows to keep her sentience under wraps. That's a PR disaster I'd like to put off for the next Strike Commander."

The two of you lapsed into companionable silence. The quarantine chambers were closer, and you thought you heard the rhythmic thumping of metal battering against metal in the distance.

"Looks like we're up. Can you hear us, Zheng?" Jack asked.

Radio silence, big surprise. You were starting to suspect that she was doing this on purpose so she could eavesdrop. You couldn't feel her ghosting along your prostheses, but your paranoia was acute enough that the idea did not seem like an outlandish ploy.

You pushed open the metal door, and the sound grew painfully louder and more strident.
Jack went through first. The area maintained the half-finished evil laboratory feel. Exposed wires hung from the ceiling. The lights were too bright, and everything was covered in a combination of plaster dust and soot. Keeping an eye out for Mongolian death worms, you followed the clatter as it grew louder.

You and Jack rounded a corner, that opened into a wider corridor. About six yards out, gathered around another sealed vault door, were six more Red Poles. Three in the front had left their weapons on the ground, and battered at the metal door with their shoulders. The hall was too narrow for them to generate much momentum, but they didn't seem to be tiring either.

"Grenades?" He kept his voice low.

"EMP," you said. pulling one off your belt. "I've got three. I think two will do to slow them down."

"You stagger, I'll break. We have to be fast. Take out the armed ones first. They're closest."

"Got it." That was your instinct, but it was wise to coordinate before you went in guns blazing.

He rested a hand on your shoulder. "Behind me."

"Your stupidly tall body messes up my throw. I'll use you for a shield, afterward."
Jack was silent for a second. "All right. Time to get on it. No one else is going to do it for us."

"Sir," you said, infusing the word with as much insolence as you could.

"I am going bend you over the seats on the ride home, agent," he said calmly. "Now let's finish this up."

Your opening salvo was the EMP grenade, it sailed between the two rows of omnics. You backed up as soon as it left your fingers, and began firing at the closest Red Pole. Jack started shooting, his pulse rifle giving off a higher whine than before. The first omnic went down without a fight. The second made it halfway down the hall before you felled it. The third one hefted its yānyuèdāo and threw it at you, like a giant javelin.

Jack slid to the side and slammed his gun into the pole midair, and shifting its trajectory away from you and into the wall.

Sparks flew as the massive polearm embedded itself in a nest of wires and the lights flickered. You threw the second grenade, and resumed shooting. Your EMP rounds sparked and pinged when they struck a chassis. Jack advanced, putting more energy bolts into the third Red Pole.

The ones focusing on the door had already turned. One flipped its sword into the air with its foot, caught the blade in one hand, and charged you. You backed up, maintaining a steady rate of fire.

"Shit, get down!"

Jack squeezed the trigger of his gun, but nothing happened. Of course. There was delicate tech in there. It wasn't supposed to get slammed around like a hammer. Or thrown off a balcony.

Swearing under your breath, you ducked the first swipe, wondering if you should risk a grenade at this proximity. Your pulse finger was dead and your gun lacked the power to stop a Red Pole in its tracks.

The omnic swung the sword downward and you threw yourself sideways, and rolled across the floor. It was on you in a flash, sword descending.

Jack was faster, and he blocked the stroke with his rifle.

"You OK, sweetheart?" Jack asked, breathing heavy.

"Fine!" You yanked the grenade off your belt. "We need to put some space between-

The Red Pole disengaged and swung again, the sword striking Jack's rifle and smashing it into his face, shattering his mask. Time slowed. The blade flicked forward, not a full sword stroke, but a whippy flourish that could still quarter Jack's skull. Your mind blanked, as Jack staggered into the wall, blood leaking down his face. For a few agonizing seconds, you were back in the Ninth Circle and you were frozen in place while he went down and you were too late, too late again. Your voice withered in your throat and you squeezed your left fist so hard, your bones creaked under your metal fingers. The pain drove the moment away, and you could feel your legs again.

Mask fragments crumbled away. You couldn't see Jack's face through all the bleeding. But you could see that he was still breathing, and you had to move fast if you wanted to keep him that Climbing to your feet, you took a running jump and leapt onto the omnic's back, hands gripping its textured armor, metal fingers sinking into its cooling tubes. It swung its sword, but could not reach you. You searched frantically for a crevice of the right size. You found one between the shoulder plates and the articulated joints on its back. Metal clanged as it dropped the sword and began swatting at you. Its palm hit your right hip hard, and you winced. Pulling the pin out with your teeth, you wedged the grenade into the slot and jumped off, landing on your feet, then stumbling because of the pain in your hip.

There was a moment of silence, and then the grenade went off, catching you in the small radius, and shorting out your suit and fingers. The Red Pole teetered and fell, and you stood over it, firing one-handed into the glass panel where its optics were and then into the processing area, just to be sure. The other two were still frozen in place from multiple consecutive EMP blasts, and you walked up to them, and gave them the same treatment.

You turned to see Jack slumped against the wall, ruined rifle sparking, the remnants of the mask only covering the lower half of his jaw. Blood still flowed down his face.

"Jack!" You were at his side immediately. He was still breathing. There was a long slash that started over his left eye and slid down his right cheek. You fumbled one-handed with the seals, carefully prying the broken headpiece off. "Jack, come on."

"Not dead yet." He wheezed, hand reaching up to pat your cheek. "Did you get them all?"

"I think so." You tried to wipe the blood up, but head wounds always bled heavily. It wasn't deep, but it was long. "That's going to leave a mark. Think you're going to need stitches-"

"Don't care," he rasped and leaned forward, and kissing you, his aim off, and his lips pressing a bloody stain to your metal collar. He laughed at his clumsiness and wiped the blood out of his eyes. "You OK?"

"Bruised, but fine," you said. He adjusted your collar and yanked you down for a real kiss this time, one that tasted like copper and desperation. You let him, too relieved that he was alive.

"I'm concussed," he admitted. "But give me a second. I can power through it. Think my rifle is done for. Torby's going to bitch me out so hard..."

"OK, we just need to find Feng and get out of here," you said, kissing his cheek.

"I'm right here!"

You blinked and turned your head.

Feng crouched on top of the nearest busted-up omnic, her hair slightly mussed, her face smeared with grime. She wore ragged black fatigues and a green tank top coated in black stains. Her tattoo went from wrist to shoulder, spiraling green and black lines vanishing under her clothes. Feng's green eyes were huge and gleaming, and her delighted smile stretched from ear to ear.

Oh fuck. How much had she seen?

"So you and Jack?" She held up both hands, index and middle fingers twined. "I don't care about formalities, I'm calling him "Jack" now. It's just weird to use titles after you've drank someone's blood and vice versa, you know? Actually, you probably don't know, because you don't have to go through stupid archaic rituals for reasons." She stood up. "I'd heard rumors, but there are all kinds of rumors about you Lucky, and the majority seemed to think you were with Genji. Oh shit, you're not cheating on Genji, are you?"

"Genji and I are just friends," you sighed, helping Jack to his feet. Your hip ached and you did not look forward to taking the stairs.

"Wait...I kept hitting on him in front of you. You're not mad, are you? I'm really sorry. I didn't know," Feng said rapidly. "Because that wasn't cool and I would never try to break up a happy couple. You are a couple right? This isn't one of those finally-resolved sexual tension moments that I interrupted, because if so I am really sorry. I can go back into the vault and give you fifteen minutes-"

"Feng, shut up so we can rescue you," you said.

"You came to rescue me? Oh my God. That is...touching. I'm touched. But I've also been stimed up for the last 48 hours and am super extra hyper-focused. Like you are all vibrating rainbows and it's really distracting. Plus, I've just realized that you must not be that mad at me for hitting on him in front of you if you came all this way to rescue me. I always knew you were cool. Like, awesome, but relatable. Captain Amari is amazing, but she scares the shit out of me. You and me, we could get drinks, and it would be fun!"

"Do you have any spare weapons?" You were out of grenades now, and while Jack probably had a sidearm, a pistol wasn't going to do enough against the Red Poles.

"Yes!" Feng grinned and disappeared into the open vault. "Do I have weapons? Do I have weapons?!" She paused dramatically. "Yes, yes I do! Let me show you! Come on!"

Jack leaned over and kissed your cheek, nuzzling your neck. "You smell good."

"Jack, focus." You stiffened as he stroked your waist.

"I am, but this isn't hard. I can do it with my eyes closed." He grabbed your butt, chuckling softly in your ear.

"Jack!"

"Can't wait to get you home-"

"Are you coming? Like following me in here, not like-?" Feng popped her head out, and gave you both a speculative look.

"He's concussed," you scowled, pushing his arm off your shoulder.

"She's really shy," Jack grinned and followed you.

"This is adorable! I ship it! I do!" Feng giggled as she entered the vault. She went to a rack tossed you each a five foot long spear and you stared very hard at her. "Don't look at me like that! This is cool, I promise."

She picked up and went back out to the omnic body. She held it overhead, and squeezed a button. The head shot out like a harpoon, punching a neat hole through the armor. She hit another button and electricity arced along the metal, sizzling as it came in contact with the Red Pole.

"Black button is extend. Red button is electrocute. White button is retract. Keep your hands on the rubberized grip and you won't get shocked!" She yanked the spear out with no trouble. "Should have about an hour's worth of zapping power. They cornered me when I retreated in here to resupply, and I realized that six on one was not good odds."

"Zheng said your brother was hostage," you said, wincing as Jack spun the spear, his expression too gleeful.

"Yeah, I locked him in a specimen habitat for his own safety. He's useless in a fight." Feng shrugged. "He's probably not too happy with me, but the Mongolian death worms aren't that bad."

"...You locked your brother in the Mongolian Death Worm containment cell?" You asked, voice going oddly high.

"Oh, you haven't seen them. They only do a little bit of elecroshock, and we took away the spitting venom feature. That was corrosive as fuck. One of the techs got his arm melted off. But he was an omnic and modular parts made it an easy enough fix." Feng shrugged. "As long as Li stayed put, he'll be fine."

"...I'll take your word for it."

"Really, they're not that bad," Feng said.

You watched Jack do a lunge, and the spear extending another two feet as he thrust it forward, throwing in a fancy baton twirl at the end. Oh boy.

"He's not normally like this, is he?" Feng asked, clapping her hands together.

"No," you sighed. "He's not."

"Can I keep this?" Jack grinned at Feng.

"Totally! Now let's get Li and get out before Zheng does something drastic." Feng paused. "She didn't so something drastic to get you to come here, did she?"

"She emotionally-blackmailed Jack into rescuing you," you said.

"That's better than what she could do," Feng said, shaking her head. "Not that I'm excusing her behavior. I'm just trying to gauge if we've reached DEFCON 2 yet. She's really...attached to me. In an obsessive mom way." Feng shuddered. "And yet, she's still nicer than my mother. That is an alarming realization..."

"She admitted her consort and the twins are illusions. Claimed you were the only thing keeping her sane," you said.

"She told you that? Shit." Feng narrowed her eyes. "You two stick really close to me. OK?"

"Because Zheng guards her secrets zealously?" Jack stopped twirling the spear, his face serious.

"...Yeah, that's an understatement," Feng said grimly. "It could be nothing. We're all a bunch of accomplished, yet charming badasses here, but I'd still rather not risk it."
Feng led you up a level, her demeanor completely different. She still smiled at you and Jack, but there was worry etched in her brow. Jack stayed close to you, reaching out to pat your head, or rub your neck, or grab your ass, when he thought Feng wasn't looking. She was looking. She'd start giggling and Jack would sheepishly paste on an innocent grin, and it was everything you could do not to hit them both with your electric harpoon.

You came upon another sealed door, and Feng pressed a palm to the reader.

"Try not to make any sudden movements, and please don't hurt them, OK? They can't help it. They're good babies," Feng said.

You stared as the door opened into a sandy habitat, the UV light raising the temperature by at least ten degrees.

"Li! I'm back! And I brought friends!"

"Fuck you! Fuck your stupid lizards! And fuck your friends!"

Feng grinned at you over her shoulder. "He's a little pissy. I promise he's not always like this. Just most of the time."

Li was slender young man, with the same fine bone structure as Feng. He wore his hair in a long ponytail, and his blue business suit was torn, stained, probably unsalvageable, unless he was going for the post-apocalyptic look. He huddled on large rock formation and surrounded by half a dozen blood red creatures. They ranged from four to six feet long and you squinted. They were not worms, rather some kind of fat snake-like reptile with no visible neck and little skinny vestigial limbs you were certain could not carry their weight.

"Come on, Li. We're getting out of here. We don't have all day!" Feng yelled through cupped hands.

"Fuck you and fuck your giant electric skinks! I'm telling mom about this and I'm done letting her think that it was me who broke that urn in sixth grade! That was you! The tea set was you! The burnt quilt was you! The gym teacher's car was you! And I'm telling her so!"

"Quit your bitching, narc-y-pants. No one took the fall for the car! No one else knew! And I did this to save your ungrateful life! Now come on!" Feng marched in there and lifted a smaller "Mongolian death worm" under her left arm. It hissed and electricity started to spark off its skin. Feng just ignored its obvious displeasure and set it aside, clearing a path for Li.

"You need help?" Jack asked.

"Nah, they bite strangers. It's septic as fuck, and the med wing got blown up yesterday, so we don't want to mess around with that."

Zhai Li stumbled down the rocks, glaring daggers at his sister. Feng just ignored him and reached over to pat a death worm. It snapped its teeth at her, but she was too quick and scratched the top of its head while it hissed at her.

"Who's a good fat lizard baby? You are! Yes, you are! Don't you worry, I'll bring you back some camel meat, I know it's your favorite!"

Li was drawn and pale, his face an uncomfortable blotchy red, and you wondered if Feng had remembered to leave him any water. That seemed like a detail she would overlook. You pulled your canteen off your belt, and handed it to him. Li stared at it for a moment.
"Dehydration sucks," you said.

"Thank you," he said, taking it. He gulped it down, wiping his mouth on the back of his sleeve. "I've been in there for over a day. She just shut me in and shouted 'Don't make any sudden movements! The babies are easily startled!' And then slammed the door, startling the goddamn mutant skinks." Li glared at Feng in disgust and finished draining your canteen.

"There were hostile Red Poles coming. I'm sorry. They didn't even bite you," Feng said, not sounding sorry at all.

"I'm not talking to you." He handed you your canteen back. "Thank you."

"If he's not talking to me, than how is he telling me he's not talking to me?" Feng asked you, sotto voce. "Or is he using telepathy? Am I the only one who heard that?"

"I'm not getting paid enough to mediate this," you said, reattaching your canteen.

"Mmm, you want a Death Worm? They don't do much besides eat, though..."

"Make it a small feathered dinosaur, preferably tinier than they originally came, and housebroken, and I'll think about it."

Feng gasped. "You're a genius! I loved Jurassic Park, the original one, not the remake! Oh my God. Mini-designer dino pets. Way less chance of them eating everyone alive! We can do all kinds of pretty colors and patterns, like shiny Pokemon. We'll make a goddamn fortune!"

Jack coughed. "Really sweetheart?"

You shrugged. "Well I don't have room for a full-sized one."

"Maybe if you got a house," he said.

You rolled your eyes.

Feng glanced between the two of you, her smirk all too telling. "Well, let's get out here before the rest of the Red Poles find us. Until Zheng gets the facility locked down, we're on our own," Feng said. "I'll go first and Li should bring up the rear."

Li was too weary to converse. He just shot dirty looks at his sister and you wondered if you would eventually have to save her from him. Probably not, he looked too weak and wrung out to be a real threat.

Jack held a spear in one hand, and gripped your immobile prosthetic fingers in the other. Feng sneaking hysterically amused looks at you, her cheeks puffing out as she smothered her laughter.

For one dizzying moment, you remembered when Lao used to look at Shin and you that way. Feng and Lao looked nothing alike, but that manic amusement, that cheerful openness, that was deja vu. It hurt, because you doubted Lao would ever look at you like that again. The memory was a shock to the system, and you nearly yanked your hand away from Jack.

Jack raised a brow.

You shook your head, and left your hand where it was.

You made it back to the stairwell without incident. Going up the stairs after all the combat made you groan internally. Your right hip ached. And would Li be able to make it? The four of you climbed, Li huffing, puffing, and muttering angrily in Mandarin under his breath.

In contrast, Feng practically skipped up the stairs.

You were only one floor away from the ground level, when Feng stopped cold. "Spears out. Li, you might go down a floor."

"No. I'm not climbing this damn staircase aga-" He froze.

Another dozen omnis stood at the top of the stairs, swords and polearms angled down at you.

You sighed, because Zheng had not given you an accurate count of the Red Pole population. You folded your metal fingers to better grip the spear. "How's your shooting?"

"He's shit at it," Feng said.

"Shut up."

"Wouldn't trust him not to shoot us on accident. Well, you on accident, me on purpose. If he could shoot."

"You can provide cover fire. Slow them down." Jack took your spear, leaning over to kiss your forehead. "Feng and I can work through them."

"You're concussed." You eyed the slowly advancing phalanx of omnis.

"I'm still stronger and faster than you, sweetheart." He gave you a cocky grin. "And we both know I can take more damage."

"Quit showing off and let's finish this," you said, with more confidence than you felt. "I'll focus on the left." You pulled your carbine off your back and began to shoot, bracing the gun against your left arm since your fingers were out of commission.

Jack and Feng took the two on the right. Feng and Jack lunged forward, their speeds comparable. Jack slammed both spears into his target and you could hear the crackle of electricity as he fried their circuits.

Feng wasn't as graceful but she brought hers down at a sharp angle, then struggled to yank the spear loose. Jack tossed her one of his and kept going.

"I'm invited, right?" Feng asked.

"To what?" You switched places, giving Feng and Jack a chance to take down the ones you'd stunned and keeping them out of your line of fire. You went to the right, aiming at the next row.

"The wedding, duh."

"Feng, you can stop talking right now!" You gritted your teeth, bullets bringing down another omnic. You'd moved to your next target when you carbine clicked empty. "I'm out!" You scowled at your gun. You'd packed for a blitz rescue mission, not a miniature Omnic Crisis.

"Then stay back!" Jack ordered, parrying two strikes. "Looks like we might have to hole up again-"
Feng cursed a blue streak as the flat of a sword blade knocked her down the stairs. She hit the wall with an unpleasant crack. Jack fell back, holding a defensive line, as you tried to help her up.

"We need to move, now!" You shouted.

There was another crash, and you stared as an omnic flew into the air, bounced off the ceiling, then crashed back to the ground.

"The dragon becomes me!" A terribly familiar voice shouted.

"They fall before me!" Another far more unwelcome voice announced. And goddamn arrows flew through the air, thunking as they struck the metal chassis.

"You're in my way, Yakuza scum!" A woman snarled and you wracked your memory for a name. Nope, you didn't know her.

Beside you, Feng paled. "Oh no."

"Oh shit," Li said, crouching beside his sister. "Shit, shit, shit."

Feng drooped, closing her eyes.

"Are you OK?" You patted Feng's cheek.

"Shh, don't make any sudden moves. Also, I'm unconscious," Feng whispered, cracking open one eye and then quickly shutting it.

"What?"

"It's better this way," Feng said out of the corner of her mouth.

You and Jack stared as Genji and Hanzo cut through the remaining Red Poles from behind. A petite Chinese woman in red martial artist pajamas leapt overhead, driving her spear into a Red Pole's optic sensor.

You sat down and just watched as Genji, Hanzo, and the middle-aged mystery woman decimated the Red Poles. Jack leaned against the wall beside you.

"Did you-?" Jack raised a brow.

"Yeah, I wasn't running off on some crazy rescue mission for On Sing with the damn Strike Commander, and not telling someone where we went."

"...Gabe's going to kill me, you know. Ana too," he said, suddenly sounding very tired.

"Well, better you than me." You stood, moving in front of Jack as you watched a Red Pole drop for seemingly no reason. Then you caught sight of the dark bullethole in its back.

"Yeah, they would have found out anyway," Jack said, shaking his head. He wrapped one arm across your chest, resting his chin on your shoulder. "Goddamn, look at them go."

"They have a sniper," you said, because he hadn't noticed.

Jack stiffened behind you. "You're not my shield, Lucky." He released you stepping forward to stand beside you.
You waved at Genji and to your surprise he waved back. The angry middle-aged woman thrust her spear through a still twitching omnic then stalked down the stairs, her eyes on Feng.

"Li? Are you all right?"

"Fine, mother. Thank you for asking," Li said demurely, all the attitude gone.

"What have you done to my daughter?" She snapped at you, and you quashed the urge to back up. She was small, angry, and looked too young to have children in their twenties.

"She got thrown. She's alive, probably concussed," you said.

The woman crouched down and glared at Feng. "Wake up, you stubborn brat!"

"Hi, Ma..." Feng said weakly, her feigned feebleness actually quite convincing.

"You should have called us, you idiot!"

"Relax, Shi," a reed-thin, red-headed man, slinging a long rifle, sauntered down the stairs. "We can berate them later. Let's just get out of here before your creepy aunt starts issuing orders."

"Wayne, don't you start making excuses for her! She should have-" Shi snapped.

"I love you too, bunnycakes," he said cheerfully. "But we all know your aunt is batshit insane. So let's go before she decides to off all the witnesses." Wayne gave you an easy smile, freckles dotting his boyish face. But the mirth did not reach his eyes. He took a long look at Jack, smile fading. "Is that-"

"Yes," Feng sighed. "It's a big secret and they did me a huge favor."

"Wait...what?" Li glanced between Jack and Feng. "Holy shit, you mean "Jack" as in "Jack Morrison?!" Feng what have you been doing to get Overwatch involved?"

"Jack and me are buddies. I'm invited to the wedding, right?" She beamed at you both.

"...Feng, I'm not having this conversation with you," you said flatly.

"Wedding?" Hanzo glanced between you and Jack. "You're engaged? But...Are you two-timing Commander Reyes? With the Strike Commander?!" His voice got higher with each perceived outrage. "Genji, did you know about this?"

Feng's eyes got even bigger. "Wait, whaaaaat?"

You looked at Jack whose shit-eating grin just widened. He would be no help to you. So you buried your face in your hands and prayed for a Mongolian death worm to drop on your head.

"We're in a relationship, all three of us," Jack said, putting an arm around your shoulder. Was that the concussion talking? You weren't sure, but Jack was definitely bragging. And that annoyed you, because you had worked very hard to keep things under wraps, especially since not everyone here was confirmed as friendly. "And yeah, Gabriel and I are together too, if that's what you were wondering."

"That's amazingly hot. I ship it," Feng said immediately. "I ship it all across the world. I ship it to the fucking moon."

"Watch your mouth," Shi snapped, but she turned to give you and Jack a disapproving
"I can do that for real, you know. Ship things to the moon. But it's not worth it." Feng turned her speculative look upward. "Yet."

Hanzo just gaped at you.

Genji patted his shoulder. "Yes, brother, of course I knew. You mean to say that you didn't?"

Introductions made, relationships revealed, and rescuers thanked, you and Jack stepped over the smoldering heaps of expensive scrap into the main chamber. Feng led the way, followed by her parents. You and Jack went behind them and the Shimada brothers brought up the rear.

"Ah, Feng. There you are." Zheng's voice echoed over the loudspeakers. There she was. Right in time to do nothing helpful. "You are intact?"

"Yeah. Until Mother gets a hold of me," Feng said that last part under her breath.

"Our parents are private personal defense contractors with highly-specialized skills, something they hid from us till recently," Li said quietly. "And yet, we were far less surprised by their news than they expected."

"Mother is too terrifying to be a convincing housewife," Feng said. "I guess I'd be crazy pissy too if I had to pretend to like children, clean the house, and go to PTA meetings, instead of swaggering around smashing heads and stabbing things."

You blinked. "Wait, why did you call us if her estranged parents are fucking mercenaries?"

"They're retired," Zheng said. "And they aren't speaking to me."

"My daughter was not supposed to be a crime lord, Auntie!" Shi said loudly. Wayne just rubbed her shoulders, shaking his head. "I sent her to college! She was supposed to be respectable! Instead she picked a useless major and now she's a Triad boss!"

You actually thought that was a pretty impressive career move on Feng's part.

"Feng, why don't take your parents and go? I have business with the Strike Commander and his entourage." Zheng sounded mild, almost harmless. You bristled.

"Oh no, Auntie, you aren't pulling a fast one now. You swore-" Feng said.

Zheng said something sharp in what sounded like a Wu dialect.

You tensed beside Jack and noted that both Genji and Hanzo had their hands on their weapons.

"-a blood oath," Feng said, sounding disgusted. "We both did. Also, they totally saved me and Li. I'll adopt them all if that's what it takes. I'm serious. Nothing better happen to anyone here, my family included. Because I know you're sneaky and you-"
"Zhai Feng." Zheng's voice was hard.

"Auntie, you're acting crazy. Now why don't you take a moment to think about what you're proposing, and what you told me to do if you were being crazy. Should I leave you here to cool off? Because the Faraday cage is still up, and you can't leave here without some help."

There was a long silence.

"Maybe...maybe it would safer," Zheng said without inflection.

There was a long moment where you could feel Feng's parents communicating silently. Genji and Hanzo's eyebrows and fingers moved in rapid signals, planning a full-out ninja strike through elaborate nonverbals. Jack casually shifted his grip on the spear and you knew he was considering the backup server room and how much damage he could do.

"Nah." Feng began to laugh. "You'll go really bugnuts crazy on your own. Come on. Get back in your omnics. We'll have a long talk on the way home and you can apologize to our friends later, OK? But first, we need to take care of Fa and then figure out how to make friendly, miniature dinosaurs."

"Fa's dead. Elevator accident," Zheng said, sounding oddly regretful. Yeah, those seemed to happen a lot in your line of work. That's why you took the stairs. And you decided then that you really didn't like Zheng. Oh sure, be sorry that you killed the guy who started this shit with your favorite family member. But also plot to kill the people you asked to come in and save said family member from his machinations. Crazy bitch.

"Please tell me you lit up all the floor buttons before you dropped him. So he died in a state of extreme frustration," Feng said.

"I actually overloaded the circuit panel he was standing beside. Less civilian casualties."

"Well, OK. Guess that was responsible of you," Feng sighed. "I was gearing up to make falling jokes, but now I'll just have to express my regrets on this shocking turn of events."

You groaned inwardly. There was a very awkward silence, broken by Jack, and Jack alone, snickering.

Feng beamed at him. "Thank you, I'm glad someone appreciated that. Anyway, I'll have to write a really genuine-sounding letter of condolences and then laugh a lot at how terrible it will be. Oh Hell, I'll probably have to go to the funeral, and do all the bowing, and burn offerings. How am I going to do that with a straight face?" Feng began to laugh hysterically. "Killing Fa won't get me in trouble with the cousins, but laughing at his funeral? Breaking that taboo? They'll all rally against me. Damnit!"

It was not lost on you that despite her tangential babbling, Feng had backed Zheng down, and that in itself was something you weren't sure anyone else could do. You and Lacroix had not factored into your assessment of the On Sing political situation. That was fine, in this case, you didn't mind being wrong, especially since you'd had a chance to rectify your mistakes.

"Anyway, I'm going to help Auntie Zheng get back into her omnic bodies and then we can all go home, all right?" Feng didn't wait anyone to agree, she just started walking, and you wondered if she knew where she was going.

"Feng, after you're done with Aunt Zheng, we are going to have to sit down and talk about some things," her father said to her retreating back.
"Sorry, can't hear you, I'm not wearing my glasses!" Feng shouted back.

"That excuse did not work in high school, it isn't working now!" Her mother shouted. "You don't even wear glasses!"

"No glasses!" Feng sang out, walking faster.

"This is your fault," Shi said, turning to her husband. "You spoiled her."

The red-headed man just smiled, not at all disturbed by Feng's diatribe or his wife's accusations. In fact, he looked exceptionally proud of Feng, which while sweet, kind of explained her cheerfully dubious morality. "Of course, dear."

"Were you the one who took the shot at us earlier?" You asked as you walked behind Feng's father.

He chuckled. "There are omnis all over this mountain. Why would you think that?"

"I've only seen Red Poles and they don't carry guns." You didn't quite make it an accusation, but Zheng had already confirmed your suspicions.

Wayne, no-last-name-mentioned just shrugged. "There were cyborgs."

"Long dead," you smiled thinly.

"...Well, if I had taken a few shots at some figures scrambling around hostile territory, it would have been because I was unaware that we were allies." There was a hollowness to his pleasant expression, like the mask had stretched too thin. "And if I had actually been trying to kill you, we wouldn't be having this conversation right now." He tilted his head to the side. "Do we understand each other?"

"It's interesting that you would choose such an undiplomatic tactic with my friend," Genji interposed himself between the two of you, his face mask still on. "I remember you having better manners."

There was a pause as the men looked each other over. It wasn't quite a challenge, more an open examination.

"Soujiro's younger son would remember me. Of course." Wayne groaned.

"You brought such nice candy when you visited," Genji said lightly. "And you always remembered to take off your shoes. It surprised the uncles."

There was an awkward pause. Did everyone in the criminal underworld know each other? Did they have parties? An exclusive social media network? Or was Feng's father an infamous hitman that you were going to have to research?

"I've been awake for 48 hours," Wayne grumbled. "Makes me mean. Sorry. I appreciate you coming to my daughter's rescue and if I shot at you and the goddamn head of Overwatch, it was an honest mistake, because that's a fight I don't want to pick." He gave you a curt nod and walked faster, to catch up with his wife. It wasn't lost on you that he still hadn't admitted anything and that his apology was crap.

"Don't let his friendly face fool you. He's wanted in about twenty countries for all kinds of tricky assassinations. If Captain Amari knows you let him go, she'd cut off your ears," Genji said casually. "So if I were you, I would pretend this never happened."

"What?" You facepalmed then. "I can't go after Feng's dad. Not now!"

"Mmm, that sounds problematic," Genji said. "For you anyway."

"I guess you've maxed your helpfulness quota for the week," you sighed. "But thanks for backing us up and for defusing that confrontation."

"I will forever cherish the look of confusion and outrage on Hanzo's face when Morrison announced your relationship status. He kept adding one plus one plus one and trying to make it equal two."

You snorted. "Jack's concussed. He really shouldn't have done that."

"Too late to worry about it now. And from what I hear, Commander Reyes and Captain Amari are furious."

Oh. Well. Shit.

"You should start planning your exit strategy now. Maybe consider changing your identity," Genji continued. "Or perhaps you could move into Lindholm's workshop for a week or two. I hear Ziv's crate is up for grabs." He sounded far too amused and you couldn't even be mad at him because he'd come all the way to Inner Mongolia to save your bacon and dragged his stupid brother along for the ride.

"Fucking hell." You rubbed your face and tried to ignore Hanzo's deepset frown. You had gotten out of bed for this?

"-And then Great Aunt Zheng and I are going to have a long talk about boundaries and not doing shady shit to our allies because that devalues the worth of our word, and really, what social capital is worth more than your reputation?" Feng took a deep breath.

"...Just, try to keep her in line," Jack said, probably deeming this a bad time to make threats about what you would have to do if Zheng went crazier. You weren't entirely sure that this was an indication of madness, just ruthlessness.

"Also, I'm really sorry about waking you up, mucking up your "no meddling in the On Sing politics" rule, and that whole thing where she was planning to permanently silence you keep her secrets safe, even though I suspect Lucky probably filed that information in a report before she left the base, and it wouldn't have done any good, but obviously she wasn't thinking clearly, and we won't be having a repeat incident, and we owe you big. Plus, I will be having a talk with my dad about how he treats my friends." Feng had a fist clasped in one hand and raised it to her forehead.

"Apology accepted," Jack said. "Just...we're not going to be able to get away with doing this again, so please ensure it's not necessary."
"Got it!" Feng said. "Hey, we are friends, right? Because you totally just saved my life, and met my whole family, and if you were single I would buy you dinner and proceed to flirt with you till you poured your drink on my head and left in huff. We can still do that part," she said, smiling brightly at Hanzo.

Hanzo angrily pretended not to notice.

You knew Genji was enjoying this. Something about the tilt of his head and the slight angling of his hips gave him away. At this point, you knew you weren't projecting; Genji’s body language spoke volumes.

"Umm...our relationship status isn't common knowledge for a multitude of reasons. It needs to stay that way," you said.

"For now," Jack added.

"Got it. My family knows how to keep secrets. In fact, my parents lied to Li and me for most of our lives! So don't worry, we are so good at secrets and lies, we probably wouldn't recognize honesty if it bit us in the ass!"

For some reason, that did not reassure you.

The sun was setting now. Feng had driven you through the motor pool exit to where Athena's cloaked craft waited. Genji and Hanzo had also left their transport in the area. Feng family's remained at the base, and Zheng was keeping a low profile. Which was fine. Because you were really contemplating how one could strangle an AI. Granted, Zheng wasn't an AI, but the lack of an organic body made the classification close enough.

The five of you stood outside. The sun was starting to set, and Feng watched you all sheepishly.

"Who designed that base?" Jack asked, after a moment.

"It was a group effort. I picked out the artwork. And designed the great hall. And sponsored the Mongolian Death Worm program," Feng said. "That's partially why I was so pissed. Like Fa totally hijacked my project. Why? Do you want one? Because I could sell this one for pretty cheap..."

"...Tempting," Jack said, nudging you with his elbow.

"You wanted more sunlight," you said.

"I can knock out part of the mountain and make a skylight!" Feng said enthusiastically.

"Mmm, it's probably outside my price range," Jack said. "And I'd have to consult Gabe."

Feng's expression grew shrewd. "So invitations...?"

"Earlier you were talking about dinosaurs," you said, hoping that would send her racing in another mental direction.

"Yeah! I haven't forgotten the dinosaurs! Lucky, you have the best ideas. Are you sure you don't want to come work for me? Not like quit Overwatch. Just consulting on weekends or something? Or maybe we can just drink tea and eat...whatever you like to eat, and hang out?" Feng trailed off awkwardly. "I'm not hitting on you, but I'm making this really awkward, aren't I?"
"Yes, Feng. We can hang out some time," you said, wondering what kind of grievous mistake you were making. But then, Feng was right. You had come to her rescue, met her family, and given her personal advice. You were kind of friends now. "I'm sure Genji and Hanzo would love to come."

Feng's face lit up and she turned to the brothers. "You're invited too!"

Hanzo muttered something under his breath. You suspected it was rude.

"I think that's a marvelous idea," Genji said. "Hanzo needs to get out more."

You nearly choked on your tongue. Hanzo started sputtering.

"Look, he's speechless with delight," Genji continued in a flat, almost disinterested tone. "We better get going, before he embarrasses himself. Keep in touch, Feng." He gave her a nod. "And he likes strawberry cake best."

Hanzo stalked off to their transport, while Genji strolled behind him.

Feng's smiled covered half her face. "We're going to go out. And we're going to eat food. And we're going to talk shit. And it's going to be great!" She chanted in a sing-song voice and hugged herself, making gleeful high-pitched noises. "You're coming too, though, right? Because this isn't a date. And I'm not going to try to bang either of them! Pinky swear! This is just a friendly...friendshippy friend-thing of friendliness. OK?"

"...Hanzo is terrible at social events," you said, because he was out of hearing range. "And Genji is kind of a shit."

"I don't care! This is going to be awesome!"

Jack patted your back gently. "We should get going."

"...You're invited too, Jack, though I guess, it's hard for you to go out and stuff, so I understand if you can't. We'll figure something out though! Anything for my blood-brother guy who is way more reliable than my actual brother. The moron."

"Thank you," Jack said solemnly, he extended his hand and Feng shook it enthusiastically. The air was cold, and his face was smudged with blood, but the sunset lent him a golden glow. "Just make sure Lucky has fun, all right? She doesn't get to go out enough." Then he smiled at you, eyes soft, hair blowing with the wind, just looking happy to be there, you felt your breath catch.

"Definitely!" Feng's voice got squeaky and she turned around. "...Why is he so hot?" She asked, somehow vocalizing your thoughts to herself. "How is he so hot? I can't even look directly at him. Can't breathe. My brain is seizing up. My chest is going to explode. It's like a flaming ice cream headache in my ovaries! Now it's spreading through my tubes to my uterus! Ugh..."

You could empathize, but you could have really done without the graphic description of the state of her reproduction system.
I have very little motivation right now. Ugh. I blame all the angst.

I do enjoy all the comments. You guys give me life. Except when you give me buckets of angst and leave me to cry alone in a corner. Need more cake and time to cook. Seriously crave karaage and it shows in later chapters...
Chapter 52

Chapter Summary

Feelings and some of the fallout from Operation I Need Coffee. More like "I need a place to hide."

Chapter Notes

In celebration of Retribution and the new skins/map, here's the chapter a little early.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Get over here and heal up," you said as soon as Jack boarded the transport. You set up the emitter and got out electrolyte solution, your hands starting to shake.

"That's my line," Jack said, dropping into a seat.

"I'm not the one who nearly got their face cut off by a giant omnic." You opened up the first aid kit and examined his face, knowing you were too unsteady to try sutures one-handed. The wound had stopped bleeding, but it hadn't closed. "I'm not sure I should be using a needle so close to your eye. Not with one hand out of commission." You looked at the medical stapler. Also a bad idea so close to the eyes and nose.

It was annoying that you could do so little for him now and you had to take deep breaths, reminding yourself that the damage was cosmetic. That Jack was going to be OK, that you hadn't let him down. Jack wasn't Shin, though you felt the echoes in your bones. The situation had only the faintest similarities, but the fear had been identical.

You could keep the mask up in front of your enemies, but now that it was just Jack and you, the reality was starting to sink in. Jack had put himself between you and a Red Pole's sword. Jack had gone down. You could have lost him there. You stared at the wound, swallowing roughly.

"I'll be fine," Jack said, touching a ragged edge of the cut.

"It's going to scar if we don't-"

"It's fine," Jack peeled off his gloves. "Unless you won't like me if I'm not pretty any more?"

"You're still too pretty," you scowled and he laughed.

"Angela can fix this when we get back. If not, then Gabriel doesn't get to be the only one with cool facial scars."

You cleaned the wound silently, trying not to think about what would have happened if that blade went an inch deeper or if the Red Pole had swung just a little harder. It was not hard to imagine the outcome and you shuddered, knowing that Jack had been fortunate. Steadying yourself, you soaked in the soothing heat of the emitter, and tried to will yourself calm. The cut was about five inches long and grooved deeper along his forehead.

Jack nudged you, breaking you out of your reverie. "You got hit a few times too. Let me see."

"You got hit way more times-"

"Accelerated healing, sweetheart. Now stop arguing. Let me see your right side. You've been limping since we rescued Feng." He reached up, already loosening your armor. You shrugged it off along with the rest of your gear. Torby was going to be pissed about the suit. But then Jack had wrecked the pulse rifle and left it at the mountain base. Torby would probably overlook your comparatively minor sin.

Stripped down to your underwear, you hissed as Jack rested his hand on your hip, a large greenish bruise already formed along your side and thigh. He frowned, and ran his hands over you, picking out sore spots you hadn't yet noticed. He was thorough, fingers pressing lightly along your body as he checked you for injuries. It was a firm professional examination, despite the heat of his skin against yours.

"I'm fine, Jack."

"I need to see for myself," he said. "You can look me over next." His voice was low and rough, and you shivered.

"...Places besides your dick?"

"My eyes. You can't really see my dick when I'm balls deep in you."

Heat flared between your thighs. "Jesus, Jack."

"Look at you, already unwrapped for me." Jack drew you into his lap, your knees resting on either side of his thighs. He was hard against you. You shook your head. "You have a concussion."

"Not a bad one. I've still managed myself through the bad ones." He pressed his lips against your throat. "And as you can tell, my cock is just fine."

"Yeah, I'm sure your massive ego cushioned your skull pretty well-"

He raised a brow. "You're upset."

You scowled down at him, pulse quickening. "You are so damn reckless. Running halfway across the world at Zheng's behest. Engaging those omnics in the stairwell. Jumping in front of a giant sword-"

"Were you worried, sweetheart?" Jack leaned back, his smile easy.

You bit your lip. It was a struggle not to lash out. Jack had been reckless, and while he deserved some of your ire, your scathing comments would not actually help the situation. "Yes."

"It's no fun watching your lover get hurt, is it?" He didn't quite sound smug, just certain.

You almost climbed out of his lap and got dressed right then. But he cupped your face in his hands, eyes locked on yours.
"That wasn't a dig, just a reminder. I've had to sit out a lot of missions while you ran into danger."

You glared at him.

"I'm sorry I worried you," he said. "I never trusted Zheng and you're right, engaging those omnics in the stairwell was a mistake. Shielding you wasn't. You're not going to change my mind on that."

"You can't just-"

"Tell me I'm wrong," he said, suppressed smugness finally leaking out.

"You're an idiot, Jack Morrison," you snapped.

"You're welcome," he said, smile widening. "Just like you're welcome to show me exactly how frustrated you are."

You bit him then, your teeth clamping down on the base of his neck. He growled, fisting your hair.

"Don't want to throw you down right now, sweetheart. Not with all those bruises. You're going to be sore enough tomorrow."

"Who says I'd let you?" You unbuckled his belt while he unzipped his jacket. You slid your panties off, and rubbed the crown of his cock against your slick entrance.

"You're awfully wet for someone who isn't interested," Jack chuckled, slipping the jacket off.

"Oh I'm interested, just not in a yielding mood right now."

"I got that." He pulled off his shirt and you did not like the look of the bruise on his chest. "Eyes up here, sweetheart," he tapped between his eyes, then winced.

"Idiot, you're a walking contusion," you said sharply.

"You have a funny idea of sweet talk." Jack ran his hands up your ribs and under your breasts, never losing that easy smile.

"Athena, privacy mode, please," you said through clenched teeth. "Stop pushing me, Jack. Too raw for that right now."

"Ah." Jack placed your right hand on his shoulder. "Then let me put you in a better mood." He raised his hips, pushing straight up inside you, his shaft stretching you out. "Oh sweetheart-"

You rolled your hips and he buried his face in your breasts. "Fuck," you whined. He filled you so well, and you ground against him, unable to stop yourself.

"That's it, baby. Look at those tits bounce." He took a nipple in his mouth, sucking hard, while he stroked your hips. You took him all the way, savoring how he felt against you. He was an idiot. But he was here. He was alive.

"You're a reckless jerk-"
He just grinned up at you, panting. "I'm not going to argue with you, not while you have that sweet pussy clenching around me."

He was so smooth, and relaxed, and infuriating. You knew on some level that you weren't being entirely reasonable, but you couldn't think straight enough to care. He was beautiful, and aggravating, and such a damn shit. So much that you couldn't stand it right now. You gave a cry of frustration and Jack reached over to stroke your clit.

"That's it, baby. Let it all out." He nuzzled your neck. "You're so beautiful. Don't want you to hold back."

Your thighs shook as you rode him. A jumble of feelings knotted in your belly, and maybe, just maybe a good hard fuck would dislodge the tangle. Jack's fingers rubbed tight circles against your clit, the sensitive bundle of nerves throbbing under his touch. You sped up, lifting yourself up and dropping back down to the hilt.

"Look at you thrashing in my lap," he groaned. "You need it that bad? I know how it is. Every time you come back, bruised and smiling, I just want to hold you down and fuck you till you're too exhausted to get into trouble. Have to see for myself that you're OK. Need that extra control because you've left my head spinning-"

"You talk too much!" You snarled, kissing him hard, teeth worrying at his bottom lip. You had him inside your body already, you didn't need him inside your head.

"Gabe gets this way too. So fierce and brittle I have to cling to him to make sure he knows I'm still here with him. So come for me, sweetheart. Know that I'm here for whatever you need."

You bit him again, feral and shaking.

He shivered, one hand stroking your back, the other firmly pressed against your clit. "Come for me baby, and after this, it'll be my turn to show you how much I need you. I promise you'll like it."

You were too tightly wound to last. And you came hard, right hand clawing at his back and your orgasm tore through you. Muscles weak, you nearly fell off Jack's lap, but he pulled you against him and you clung to his chest, trembling.

"Feel better?" He asked when you stopped shaking.

You nodded, words not coming out properly.

He lifted you and carefully laid you back against the seat, before resting your knees over his shoulders.

"My turn," he said, and snapped his hips forward, his cock filling you once more.

You threw your head back, eyes squeezed shut, a muffled whine coming out of the back of your throat. You were too sensitive, and he went so deep, hitting your cervix.

"You OK?"

You nodded, eyes still shut.

Jack paused, dragging his knuckles across your cheek. "Look at me, sweetheart."
You opened your eyes, meeting his worried gaze.

"Want me to stop?"

You shook your head. "Need you."

"You have me," he murmured, and kissed you again. He went slow and hard, a small smile on his face as you writhed beneath him. The angle was almost too much, each stroke bottoming out inside you while you clawed at his arms.

"Jack, harder, please-" It hurt, but it was a good pain intertwined with the pleasure. Sex as catharsis you could do in good conscience.

"Since you asked so nicely." He slammed his hips into you and you shrieked, composure already shattered. "You like that?"

"Don't stop. Please, don't stop. Need you to fuck me," you sobbed.

"Whatever you want, sweetheart," he growled, and suddenly he shifted angles. One leg was still over his shoulder, but he lowered the other. Now he was grinding against you, his balls slapping against your ass.

He wasn't gentle, and you didn't want him to be. You just took it, chasing your release once more.

"Want me to come inside you, sweetheart? Remind you who you belong to?"

"Please, Jack-"

"Love how you say my name, so desperate and hungry. You're mine," he chuckled in your ear, voice raw with lust. "Mine and Gabe's. And since he's not here, I'm going to have to fuck you twice as hard, to make up for it."

"Jack-"

"Scream for me," Jack ordered.

And you did. You screamed as he fucked you into the seat, his grip bruising, his cock going so deep. The force and the friction drove you over the edge and Jack came with you, his mouth on your throat leaving bite marks and hard kisses.

You lay there, feeling his seed pour inside you, and you hugged him tightly.

He pulled you against him, sinking onto the floor, with you on his chest. You sniffled, eyes watering from the intensity of it.

"Are you all right?" Jack's hands rested on your back.

"I think so," you said, hoarsely.

"Did I hurt you?"

"No." All your pain was your own, and Jack's touch soothed the sting.

"OK," he said. His gaze was gentle and you understood Feng's last comment all too well. Right now, it hurt just to look at him, but you couldn't let go either because that thought was too
"Everything's hitting me now," you said, burying your face in his chest.

"I noticed." He tilted your chin up. "There's nothing to be ashamed of." Those bright blue eyes stayed on your face, hypnotic in their focus. "Just let it out. We're both here. We survived. It's going to be fine."

You curled up against him, still having trouble looking at him. He was too much and you were too vulnerable. You ached all over, muscles battered, insides a jumbled mess of broken glass. You took slow deep breaths, your core stretched so thin that even air felt like too much. Jack rubbed your back.

"I'm sorry," he told you. as you tried to calm yourself. "Tell me about it?"

"Shin," you said, not looking up. "I got there too late. In time to watch, but too late to do anything. Today..."

"Oh." Jack's voice was quiet. "I'm sorry, sweetheart. I...didn't think about that."

"Not your fault. My baggage," you said, talking to his nipple. It was easier than looking him in the eye. "You were saving me. I can't complain."

"But you can tell me that it upset you." Jack stroked your hair, his warmth so comforting, and you sighed softly, your heartbeat gradually slowing down.

"The recklessness bothers me. And that close call, that really put me through the wringer," you said, hating that you had been on the receiving end of this talk so many times before. Hating that maybe you'd made Gabriel and Jack feel this way. Hating that everything was complicated and multi-faceted, and you were just a simple person who didn't know how to navigate this storm of feelings, responsibility, and guilt.

Jack just leaned over and kissed your forehead. "Hey, I get it." And to his credit, he didn't remind you that you'd put him through this too. Maybe he didn't have your issues, but you understood that this kind of anxiety and helplessness wasn't fun for anyone.

You raised your head, meeting his concerned gaze. "I'm a mess. Sorry."

"Only because I fucked you silly," Jack said, running a finger across your cheek.

"Thank you for taking care of me."

"Thank you for protecting me," Jack said. The soft press of his lips against your cheek shot your heart into your throat. There was a tenderness on his features that choked you up and made you think of Gabriel. "You shouldn't have to, but I'm not arrogant enough to think I can do everything on my own. Wish I could. Wish I didn't have to put you in these situations."

"Shocking as it sounds, it isn't all about you," you muttered

He laughed. "You know what I mean."

"We should've brought Gabriel," you said, after a moment. "He'd have kept you in line."

Jack laughed at that. "Wishful thinking, sweetheart."

"Yeah, I know. Just feel like he would've...done a better job."
"Having another person on site would have made this mission easier, and I still think the three of us should go out together. But I'm grateful you came with me." Jack kissed your forehead. "And you did a good job. There's no question about that."

"OK," you said, relaxing just a little. "Having Gabriel would have been fun."

"Yeah. But I'm glad you were here."

"Me too. Just..." You trailed off, not sure how to add to what you said without sounding pathetic.

"You climbed onto an omnic's back, wedged a grenade under its armor, then proceeded to single-handedly, pun not intended, execute the other ones, and keep me alive. You're being silly and Gabriel would say the same thing."

"Yeah, OK." When he put like that, you were kind of ridiculous. "Just...you got hurt. I don't like that."

He laughed softly. "Me neither." He stretched out, shifting beneath you. "But you didn't let me down, baby. When Gabe eventually calms down, he'll tell you the same thing."

"It should be weird that we talk about him so much after sex. But...it's not." You folded your forearms and rested your chin against them, looking down at Jack's face. You didn't want to talk about your insecurities, and baggage, not when he was holding you like this.

"We talk about you too," Jack said. "And I know you and Gabriel talk about me." He rubbed your back. "It's natural to think of the one who's missing."

"...Yeah." You reached up and brushed Jack's hair out of his face. "Gabriel's pretty awesome. This is all his fault."

"He instigated, for sure, but I think we each did our part to get here." Jack gave a contented sigh. "Can't give him all the credit. You punched me in the face, and I won you over with my thick-headed blundering. It makes me irresistible." He whispered the last sentence like it was a big secret.

"Huh. That's uh...that's not how I remember it. Maybe that's how you got Gabriel. But you are concussed after all."

"I would have to be very confused to mistake you for Gabriel. Our relationship is a little different than his and mine or yours and his."

"Yeah," you said hesitantly, because you were unsure of what he was getting at.

"What we have is important," Jack said quickly.

"Definitely. And we both adore Gabriel. That's a critical common interest."

Jack's expression softened. "Gabriel is the air I breathe. He's my anchor and my rock. He has a goddamn mortgage on my soul, and I love him with everything that I am. But you've got your fist around my heart. And I-"

Your eyes widened, pulse hammering in your throat. "You're concussed," you said rapidly, pressing your fingers to his lips.
A flash of hurt crossed Jack's face and you flinched. You dropped your gaze, realizing that you had made a mistake.

Jack drew a deep shuddering breath.

"I'm sorry," you said.

"No. I am concussed." Jack rubbed your back gently. "I...It's OK."

"I'm sorry," you repeated. "I'm still..."

"It's OK," Jack said, sounding more confident. "It's been a rough day. I think I've pushed you too hard already."

You said nothing, loathing your cowardice. "Jack-"

"Just let me hold you," he said. "We can nap, then we'll eat some of those awful ration bars, and then we need to strategize about how we're going to handle Gabe and Ana."

---

"I'm sorry," you said when you woke up and found Jack already awake, idly rubbing your shoulders.

"What'd you do now?" Jack asked, a single brow raised.

"About earlier."

"It's OK, sweetheart. We can talk about that stuff later. I shouldn't have pushed."

"I don't mean to be-"

"You don't have to explain. I get it." Jack kissed your cheek. "I like what we have. It's important to me. That's what you need to know. Anything else, we can work on later."

You nodded. "OK."

"That's my girl," Jack said. "Now, why don't we figure out how to keep Gabe and Ana from skinning me alive?"

"Power armor or a miracle. I'm voting power armor."

"You're hilarious," Jack said.

"We can hide you," you said.

"Mmm, no that doesn't work. Ana just gets angrier..." Jack said, ruefully. And you really wanted to ask how he knew that and what exactly he had done. Later, maybe.

You slowly dressed yourself, wincing as you moved. The emitter had dulled your aches and the bruising was fading, but you were still sore and it was going to get worse. Jack dressed quickly and efficiently, before stopping to help get your hair into a more manageable state.

Athena gave you periodic updates. And you trusted she would warn you if Captain Amari was boiling a giant cauldron of oil or Gabriel was building a gibbet. No one outside Shit Spiders clearance even knew that Jack had taken off on a secret and highly controversial mission. Things seemed normal enough, excluding the fact that Captain Amari and Gabriel had reached a transcendent level of fire-breathing fury.

Jack had already sent a short communication letting them know everything was fine and that he'd brief them when you returned to base.

You watched Jack carefully, and though you knew you'd hurt him, he wasn't showing it. He kept touching you, gentle caresses across the back of your neck, kisses when you weren't expecting them, and several times he just held you in his lap, and you let him. Jack was important to you. There was no question about that. But after today, you weren't equipped to process any more gut-wrenching epiphanies.

You dictated a report, emphasizing the previously unknown aspects of Zheng's mental state and Feng's ability to handle her. You also gave a detailed description of the base, the projects you had seen, Feng's parents, and her combat capabilities. Laid out professionally, you could almost pretend this was a good policy choice. You submitted it, hoping that it would be enough to justify Overwatch involvement in On Sing internal politics. Lacroix wouldn't be happy, but then the influx of new information would make your case, and frankly, Lacroix was not the one you were worried about.

Jack sat beside you, typing up his own report.

"Shit."

"What's wrong?" You would have to swap out augments when you got back to base, and probably see Angela about your fried ones. You could submit a report to Torby, avoid a face-to-face confrontation. But it would all take time and you suspected you would not be up for cooking tonight.

"I need to be in Geneva tonight for a UN briefing." Jack sighed. "I have enough time to get checked up, chewed out, and changed. Wanted to invite you back to my room, but..."

"It's OK," you said, kissing his cheek. "I get it. Work's a bitch and the boss man's a slave driver."

Jack narrowed his eyes at you. "Are you referring to a specific commanding officer?"

"Who, me?" You made a polite face and shrugged. "I don't know what you're talking about. But I had this one CO who was a real stickler for paperwork and the dress code. Got pretty tetchy about me wearing a suit into his office."

"Shut up," Jack grinned, leaning over to kiss you. "Gabe's so pissed. Ana too. You should prepare yourself for some shouting. Because make no mistake, we are in trouble."

"Mmm, you're in trouble. I left a note."

"I know Gabe. He's going to be too enraged to care."

Jack was right. "Well, I guess we're both going to have to apologize and give him time to cool down," you said, wondering if that would be enough.

"You're learning," Jack said, and leaned back against the seat. "We should've bribed someone to feed him..."
"Oh, yeah." You shook your head. Gabriel often forgot to eat when he was angry, and if no one reminded him, well, he just got angrier, in a vicious cycle of wrath and starvation. You could picture him now: Gabriel Reyes single-handedly fulfilling the roles of apocalyptic horsemen Death, Famine, and War. Hanzo could be Pestilence, sneezing angrily at everyone because they shortened his name to "Pest." Heh.

"Judging by the timestamp on the angry messages I've received, he's been this way since morning." It was early evening back in Zurich.

_Great._

Gabriel and Captain Amari were waiting for you in the hangar. That you expected. Angela was there too, which was for the best. It was good to have someone there who could surgically extract Captain Amari's boot from your asses. And then there was Lacroix. Oh boy.

Captain Amari stood front and center, her flat expression, dead-eyed expression worrying you the most. Lacroix was smiling, but it wasn't a nice smile and it was aimed at you. Shit. Gabriel loomed there, arms crossed tight, stormy glare ping-ponging between you and Jack. The harsh anger on his face surprised you. His jaw clenched and you almost took a step backward. He was really mad. You probably should have invited him, or at least sent Jesse a message to make sure he ate.

It took all your self-control not to yell, "it was his idea!", then shove Jack at them as a distraction, and run away. Ziv's crate was sounding awfully cozy right about now.

"I would really like to know what the Strike Commander thought he was doing, haring off on his own, on an unsanctioned mission, with only one Blackwatch agent as backup? And don't worry, I have plenty to say about your choice in missions, Jack, but let's start with your stupidest mistake first," Captain Amari said, each word popping emphatically between her lips.

"Let's walk and talk. I have a meeting in Geneva in two hours," Jack said, with the calmness of a man resigned to being shot at for a living.

Captain Amari gave him a hard look, but nodded slowly, like she was letting him dig an even deeper grave.

"We need a moment first, Ana," Gabriel said, voice low.

"A moment, Gabe," Captain Amari said, her tone just on the polite side of impatient.

"I only need a few seconds to knock some sense into this _pendejo_." Gabriel stalked forward, fury etching grooves on his face. He gripped the collar of Jack's coat, nearly lifting him off the ground. "Just what the hell were you-"

"Don't punch him! He's concussed!" You blurted out.

Gabriel narrowed his eyes at you. "You can wait your turn."

"It's fine, sweetheart," Jack said, and leaned forward to kiss Gabriel's cheek. "I'm sorry, I worried you, Gabe. I didn't mean to bring Lucky along. She caught me trying to sneak off and so I
"That doesn't make it any better!" Gabriel dropped Jack and shoved him backward. "You can't charm your way out of this one, Morrison! Of all the shit-brained, irresponsible, dim-witted things you could have done-"

"Mmm, very touching reunion, but if the Strike Commander is concussed, I should probably check him out," Angela said, raising her scanner. "This will just take a moment, and then you can return to your regularly scheduled drama. Lucky, how are you feeling?"

"Sore," you admitted. "Got hit in the hip by an omnic."

Gabriel's head whipped around. "You left that out of the report-"

"I submitted an On Sing situational analysis, not a post-mission report. Sorry. Will do that next."

"Minor concussion, no swelling or internal bleeding. That laceration needs to be treated though." Angela clucked her tongue and got out a tube of medical gel. She applied it to the cut on Jack's head and then flashed her scanner over it, the UV light speeding up the sealing process. She opened up her kit and applied more ointments and at least one injection. "This might scar, Jack."

"That's OK. Lucky's prostheses were out of commission, so we couldn't quite suture it shut."

Gabriel's expression grew grimmer with each admission.

You were up next and Angela sighed. "Bone bruise on the greater trochanter. You were fortunate that you didn't break it."

"That would have been bad," you agreed, recalling all those damn stairs.

"Going to have to give you a localized nanite injection and keep you off combat duty for a week so you can heal up. We'll see to your prostheses later."

"Yes, ma'am," you said. "Thank you, ma'am." You were relieved she wasn't taking you to task for frying yet another set. But then, if she wanted to chew you out, she'd have to get in line, wouldn't she?

"So...Lucky left a message?" Jack asked, like he didn't know. Sneaky bastard was upholding his end of the bargain though.

"With Agent Shimada, and he let Agent McCree know what was going on, right before he left to fulfill his part of Operation I Need Coffee." Captain Amari did not sound amused. "While Agent Strike can claim she was just following orders, I think we all know that she applies those rules selectively," Captain Amari said dryly. "I will say that I appreciate you at least having the sense to make a contingency plan for backup, unlike our fearless leader."

"I uh...tried to do the best I could...given the circumstances," you said, not sounding very confident, because she had just called you out, and you could not deny a word of it.

"Yes, well, I know Commander Reyes and I both would have appreciated you directing that message to one of us, personally. And I know you knew that too. While I'm sure the Strike Commander ordered you not to contact anyone else, you ignored that directive by requesting backup from Agent Shimada. Honestly, you've managed to disregard all our wishes in one day, and that is quite a feat."

Your gaze shot between her and Gabriel. The veins in his neck bulged, and he looked like he was going to bite through his own teeth.

"...Sorry, ma'am," you hunched over, really not liking Gabriel's expression of barely constrained fury.

"I'm going to have to think about what kind of consequences you'll be receiving for your part in this debacle, but I can definitely say that I expected better from you, Lucky. At the very least, if you're going to defy your commanding officers, you should demonstrate better judgment."

You flinched, because you realized then that even Jack's direct intervention wasn't going to get you out of hot water. "That reeks of premeditation, ma'am. I assure you, I cobbled this together as I went."

"Write up your report. Commander Reyes and I need to have a little chat with the Strike Commander."

You glanced at Jack who just gave you meek smile, because he had to know now that he wasn't going to get you off scot free.

"Let's walk and talk, Jack," Captain Amari said in a silky tone. "I have so much to say. Because out of all the witless, naive, ludicrous things you have done, Jack Morrison, and believe me, I have tried to keep count, running off to a secret desert Triad base truly surpasses my expectations. And persuading another agent to go with you? Please Jack, I'm dying to know what you consider "a good reason" for this sort of behavior."

"I uh...you know, it's hard to concentrate on giving logical answers when your laser eyes are drilling through my skull, Ana."

Captain Amari did not look the least bit amused. And you weren't entirely sure she did not have laser beams in her eyes. "Keep digging, Jack. And what are you even wearing? That is a gross crime against discretion-"

"There was a mask," Jack said, somewhat chastened. They began to walk out of the hangar, Jack bookended between an angry Captain Amari and a furious Gabriel.

"No better than Agent Mihret...Simpleminded...ill-advised...shortsighted..." You didn't try to follow Captain Amari's verbal evisceration of Jack. You were too afraid that you might attract her attention.

"Well, wasn't that entertaining, Chanceux? Let us get you to infirmary, because I have words for you as well." Lacroix uncrossed his arms, eyes gleaming.

Goddamnit.

You limped to the infirmary, Angela muttering under her breath about the stupidity of field agents and Lacroix strolling along like he didn't have a care in the world. You knew better than to start offering excuses or apologies. Lacroix would rip you a new orifice if he was angry.
Otherwise he could also just set a trap, and let you walk yourself into it. Silence was the wisest course.

"Interesting report about Feng's role," he said, when you were sitting down and Angela was jabbing a two inch needle into your hip. An icy sensation spread through your side and thigh. Then heat flared and you could feel the blood start to rush to the area.

"Zheng confessed it. Justified the mission to me, considering the potential ramifications."

"Mmm." Lacroix steepled his fingers. "And it had nothing to do with the fact that you like Feng?"

"That played into it too. Jack was the one who wouldn't let it go. But I admit, I wasn't that hard to persuade."

"Mmm."

"I'll have a new set of augments calibrated for you tomorrow. Just dispose of the old ones," Angela said briskly. "Eventually Torby will come up with better shielding, or he won't. Either way, I know I can't depend on you to be careful."

"Sorry, Angela."

Angela handed you a temperature pack. They could be set at hot or cold and lasted a few days. "Elevate. Rest. Apply heat at night. Apply cold after exertion. You know the drill. I'm not going to bother telling you to avoid sparring or strenuous activity, because you obviously aren't going to listen anyway."

"Thank you, doctor," you said, hoping it sounded sincere. "I do appreciate you patching me up. I honestly don't like getting hurt and really do try to avoid it. I'm just really bad at dodging."

"Dummkopf," she said with a tired smile. "Just fix that problem for me and we will be fine." She walked out, shaking her head.

"Yes, ma'am," you called earnestly at her back. "Thank you, ma'am!"

Lacroix gave you a mild look. "You are getting better at finessing her."

"That is one person you do not want mad at you," you said, voice returning to a neutral tone. "She controls the painkillers and how sharp the needles are. I am going to stay on her good side."

"How uncharacteristically prudent of you."

"...OK, stop being a weasel. If you're upset, just say it." You crossed your arms.

"Not particularly, Chanceux. You made the best of a difficult situation, and while that is not how I would've handled it, your results are not to be denied." Lacroix lounged in his chair, looking actually quite relaxed. That worried you a little, but you didn't see any trace of that coiled energy he exuded when he was getting ready to spring a trap.

"What would you have done?"

"Informed Ana immediately, then feigned surprise when she caught the Strike Commander attempting to leave. But I am not the Strike Commander's bedmate, and so my consequences would be far different than yours. Though, Gabriel does look quite unhappy. I would give him wide berth for now."

"Yeah, OK." You didn't disagree. "So if you're not going to tell me off, why did you come along?"

"Ostensibly to upbraid you for your part in this. Selectively obeying potentially conflicting orders does not reflect well on you in a military setting. And in an espionage one, well, you were a step or two away from being considered rogue. Not quite at Ziv's level, but then you are slightly subtler than him. A shock, I know, considering all your social blundering, your blunt, soldier-like tendencies, and your penchant for rash action."

"You know, at this point, you're just beating a dead horse."

"Such a droll idiom. Very picturesque." Lacroix took a moment, presumably to imagine himself hitting a deceased equine. "You must realize that people will talk if both my pupils get reprimanded for insubordination and worse, for getting caught at it."

"O-K," you said, because while listening to Lacroix monologue was annoying, he wasn't really disciplining you. "I suspect if you were going to let me have it, you already would have." The fact that all those insults didn't faze you spoke volumes about your relationship with Lacroix. "So you just came down to deliver a lecture?"

Lacroix chuckled. "Honestly, I only wanted to watch Ana castigate Jack. It's a rare sight and usually worth the price of admission. Reprimanding you was just an excuse to be in the hangar. I plan to relay some of the choicer moments to Ziv. He will appreciate stories from home."

You rolled your eyes. Of course.

"I know, it is terribly petty of me, but you of all people have no room to judge, Chanceux."

He was right. And you shrugged, avoiding any demonstration of outward agreement. You might both know it was true, but he didn't deserve the satisfaction of your acknowledgment. Because yes, QED, you really were that petty.

Chapter End Notes

I am so unmotivated right now. It's meh. Oh well. I have cake and my teenage cousin is coming over tomorrow to clean and berate me for my lack of housekeeping skills. He's a good kid. I'll feed him and pay him, no worries and we'll probably watch the Shape of Water, because I still haven't watched it.

Work is blah. Life is blah. Writing is fun, but not quite going in the direction I wanted. Damn Angst!AU taking up my thoughts. Slightly concerned about how Retribution is going to change my timeline, but I'm already committed to the the IAL timeline, so if it contradicts, I guess I just have to accept it.
Chapter 53

Chapter Summary

You can't hide from Gabriel forever.

Chapter Notes

I'm super excited about the Blackwatch Lore release. I mean, it's totally fucked my timeline but you know what, that's OK. This is an AU and at 470k in my drafts and I'm not turning back now. :D

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Ziv had finally deigned to send you a message, and you had to stare at the screen for a few seconds. He hadn't actually written you. He just sent you pretty pictures of the ocean, the white sand, the skies. It would have been thoughtful, except in the center of each frame was his hand raising his middle finger to the camera.

You just shook your head. Forget your guilt. Putting up with Ziv was the price for all your sins. You were laying low, eating a hastily-grabbed salad and drinking the awful cafeteria chicken soup straight from the thermos. That was penance enough.

The post-mission report was done. And while you hadn't heard from Jack, you assumed he was either on his way to Geneva or melted into a slurry from the combined heat of Gabriel and Captain Amari's anger. You hadn't heard from Gabriel yet, and that was probably for the best. You'd give him at least another day to cool down.

You still weren't sure what to do about Lao. No, that wasn't right. You knew, you just didn't like it. But you would be supportive. You would visit. You would give her space if she wanted it. But you had to understand that you could not make her forgive you. You could not fix her or change what had happened to her. You wanted to reach out, hug her, and magically make everything better. And worse, on some level, you still had trouble accepting that you could not single-handedly fix things. You had to remember to balance fault and responsibility within realistic parameters. Half the trouble was coming to terms with your own limitations.

Your other problem was the data breach. You had most of the pieces in place and Athena had prevented any further leaks from the source. But you still weren't sure how you wanted to handle it. Gabriel was already getting impatient, and relationship issues aside, he was angry about the leak. And while you were too, you wanted to make damn sure you had exhausted all options, before he did anything irreversible.

There were more messages than Ziv's scenic "fuck you" montage. Gabriel had sent you a tersely worded "Where are you?" message this morning. You knew better than to answer that now. You had to confirm the date of the tea party with your Blackwatch friends; it had to be pushed back because Jesse and Genji had scheduling conflicts. On a whim, you invited Amélie, warning her not to expect anything formal. Shoal wanted everyone to go drinking again. And, surprise, surprise,
Feng had already sent you an invitation to some social event in Shanghai. She'd asked you to pass it on to Genji and Hanzo, so you dutifully forwarded the message. You sent off your weekly chat to Michael and Maggie.

Michael had sent the digital file of his portrait of Jack and their dog Atticus awhile ago. The print out and frame had been delivered, after you and Jack had made up. So you had a gift for him instead of a bribe. Maybe you could just give it to him when he got back. As an apology for interrupting his...well. You sighed. Jack had caught you off guard. And maybe he wasn't going to say what you expected. But you'd reacted and now... If he said it, and you didn't? That would be bad. If you said it and didn't mean it? That would be worse. And if you said it and meant it, well, that would mean you had some things to think about now. And you had enough things to think about. This could wait.

With Hoffman dead, Lacroix had some bright plan to push the Numbani delegate into greater political prominence. UN Undersecretary General Gabrielle Adawe's protégée, Adaeze Kwento, was a rising star, and from what you could tell, an actual decent person. Meeting with Kwento was going to be tricky. Everyone was keeping an eye on her, whom she met with, and what she did. Lacroix's eyes had lit up when he described some of the formal affairs she would be attending this year. You didn't like that look. It spoke of fancy clothes, good posture, and expensive cover stories.

The whole world was watching Numbani's development, but while omnis concerned you (and everyone else), Oasis worried you more. Sure, it was rich and actually pretty safe. And so very rich. That alone set off alarms. The founders of the city were checked out clean and spoke only of wanting to encourage scientific progress and the art of learning, but where exactly had all that money come from? And how were they recouping it? Being a brain didn't equate riches. But this was your personal geopolitical warning list, and you did not set policy. You just kept an eye on problems. And your problems had gone from individual names like "Nguyen Anh" and "Director Petras" to having their own postal codes.

It was late, and you sat in bed trying to focus on the poetry anthology Gabriel loaned you. The warm glow of the emitter was making you sleepy and you didn't really want to read any more. Some of the works actually rhymed, and they were fun to read out loud. The first time you did it, Athena had been worried about your mental health. The second time you did it, she joined in, doing a better job than you of keeping the weird rhythm of Edmund Spenser's "Faerie Queene." You read an excerpt aloud, only because it was fucking difficult to keep straight in your head. Athena correcting your pronunciation didn't help, but you thanked her anyway, because she was so excited that she got to play too. She then bombarded you with terms like "Spenserian stanza" and "iambic hexameter," prompting you to switch over to "The Raven."

Your door opened, and you stiffened, knowing it could be Jack, but he was supposed to be in Geneva, so in all likelihood it was Gabriel, and you had nowhere to hide. You were in your pajamas, a blue camisole and shorts set that Captain Amari had pointed out to you. And you wondered if you had time throw your armor on over it.

Gabriel walked in, shutting the door behind him. He didn't look at you, didn't speak. He just rested his head against the door for a half a minute. When he turned around, his expression was grim. You froze, eyes darting from his face to his clenched fists.
You carefully set the book on your nightstand. "Do we need to-"

"Sinaga's dead." The words came out clipped and forceful.

Oh. Malik Sinaga was one of Tataryn's crew. He was clever and quiet, a cat burglar as well as a decent medic. You swallowed your questions, pushed off the covers and rose. Gabriel was staring so hard at you that it seemed he was looking straight through you. You padded over to him.

"Can I get you something to drink?"

"Water." His tone did not change.

You grabbed a bottle and handed it to him. Gabriel took it mechanically, motions tightly controlled. He downed the water and you got him another bottle.

"He was out with Vo and Diallo in Kalkan. They were supposed to be acquiring some contraband from an arms dealer."

Diallo and Vo's presence meant the arms dealer wasn't necessarily amenable to giving up the goods.

"They were going in quiet, but according to Diallo, a dozen OR-14s came out of the sea. Went straight for the villa. Diallo was able to shield Vo with her suit. But Sinaga got caught on the premises during the attack. Arms dealer and her entourage were slaughtered. Diallo recovered Sinaga's body and some of what we sent them there for, but..." Gabriel took off his hat. "Tataryn's been drinking since the news broke. Jesse's with him now."

You sighed. You weren't close to Sinaga. He came to poker night sometimes. He was quiet. But he was a solid Blackwatch agent, and that mattered as much as any personal relationship you might have had with him. "Funeral?"

"Soon. He was Sunni. From Surabaya. No family left after an omnic raid... He was one of my recruits." Gabriel's voice was dry and quiet, like the rustle of dead leaves.

"Do you want to talk about him?" You asked, sitting down on the bed.

"...Not yet." Gabriel took off his hat and then his hoodie. He stripped down to his pants. He didn't look at you. "My head hurts."

"Come here." You scooted back in the bed, and he climbed in, resting his head against your chest. You massaged the back of his neck, already familiar with the tension headaches Jack got. Gabriel shuddered against you, and closed his eyes. He was heavy and warm so you left off the covers.

"Thank you," he said.

"You're welcome." You scratched his scalp and he groaned. "Have you eaten?"

"No appetite."

"I have some cake left."

"Later," he said, face buried in your shoulder. "I just...need to rest."

"OK," you said. "Athena, dim the lights all the way, please."
The room went mostly dark, the emitter still on, and you dropped back against the pillow, Gabriel's arms around your waist. He was too tense and you squeezed his shoulders, working the knots out of the areas you could reach.

Since coming to Zurich, there had been Blackwatch funerals. But you'd never seen Gabriel like this. Granted, there hadn't been any Blackwatch deaths since you began the relationship. This was the first.

"I'm still mad at you," he mumbled sleepily.

"I'm sorry," you said.

"I know. I'll probably forgive you. Just let me lay here for a few."

You nodded, even though he obviously couldn't see you. "Of course. Just relax. Athena will notify us if you're needed, OK?"

He said something unintelligible, and you felt your lips quirk up. It was late. You could use the sleep too. Embracing Gabriel, you closed your eyes and settled down.

Something slid across your inner thigh, then blew gently on the damp skin and you blinked sleepily. The room was still dark, but the familiar weight of Gabriel had shifted. He lay between your knees, pushing the fabric of your shorts aside while his tongue licked a trail upward.

You sat up slowly. "Gabriel."

"Want me to stop?" He rasped.

"No, but-" He yanked your shorts down and tossed them on the floor.

"You're still uh...mad at me, remember?"

"Working through that," Gabriel said.

"Is that what we're calling this?" You raised a brow.

"If you don't want me to-"

"I didn't say that." Digging your fingers into the pillow, you rested your weight on your elbows, trying to hold yourself up. "Just...not sure where your head's at."

"I won't be too rough. You're still sore. Anything else I should know?" His fingers traced the edges of your panties and you were having trouble thinking now.

"Have to keep it down. Got noise complaints last time." Gabriel's face was in shadow and you wished you could see his expression.

"Got it." He yanked and the fabric of your underwear tore, the sound louder than you expected.
"Gabriel!" Outrage colored your tone.

"Shh. You have to be quiet, remember?" He laughed softly and leaned down, pressing his tongue against your slit. You bit back a moan, already breathing hard as he licked you. He pushed two fingers inside and you whined at the suddenness of the intrusion. Gabriel leaned over you, mouth hot against your ear. "Guess we're going to have to use the floor. Your bed squeaks. Or was that you?"

He spread his thick fingers and you dropped flat against the bed.

"Gabriel-

He kissed you hungrily, tongue prodding your lips open.

"Think you're ready, hermosa?"

"That's a trap," you said as he withdrew his fingers. "I'm never ready for you."

Gabriel gave a pleased laugh. He tossed a blanket on the floor and set a pillow in the middle. "Knees on that," he ordered.

You took off your camisole before he had a chance to rip that too, your nipples hardening in the cool air. Grabbing your other pillow, you got on all fours, and set the pillow under your head.

Gabriel ran his hands along your right hip. "Is this where it hurts?"

"Yes."

He kissed the skin gently. "All right." He rubbed the head of his cock against you, collecting your slickness. You pushed back against him and he tensed. "So eager? Didn't you get fucked nice and hard a few hours ago?"

"Missed you too," you sighed, unsure if you should bring up Jack right now.

"You're just spoiled," Gabriel said gruffly, and snapped his hips forward.

You squealed, head dropping as you fisted the blankets. Gabriel chuckled behind you, and slowly pulled out, almost all the way before filling you up again. You buried your face in the pillow, biting the fabric as he kept a steady rhythm. He wasn't going as hard as he could, but Gabriel was big and it didn't take much for him to reduce you to a frantic needy mess.

He leaned forward, the heat of his chest warming your back, those strong hands squeezing your breasts while he rocked against you. His beard rubbed against the back of your neck as his teeth glided over your ear.

"We're going to play a little game, hermosa." The words sounded so casual, but you could feel the undercurrent of something wolfish.

You swallowed, glancing warily over your shoulder. "What kind of game?"

Gabriel's smile bordered on vicious and you shivered. "You already made the rules, baby. I'm just enforcing them." He grunted as he hilted inside you, hips flush with your ass. "I know the walls are thin." Gabriel's smile widened. "But I'm not the only one who gets loud. You're just going to have to show some discipline. If you can't, well, I guess I'll have to stop what we're doing "and fuck that pretty mouth instead."

"Damnit, Gabriel-" you snapped as he drove his hips into you.

"That's one outburst, hermosa. Two more and your sweet little pussy will be going without."

Bastard. You almost protested how unfair that was, but realized he'd just use that against you. Biting your lip, you dropped your face into the pillow, hoping to muffle your noises.

"Ah ah ah," he murmured, gripping the back of your neck. "If I wanted to gag you, I would have already. You'll just have to control yourself," He released you, hand tangling in your hair. He thrust hard against you and you clenched your teeth, a high-whine scraping against the back of your throat.

"Good girl," he chuckled. "At least you're trying now."

"So mean," you whispered.

"Mmm, not at all, I'm just following your rules, hermosa." He nuzzled your cheek. "You're just used to getting your way. I've been far too lenient with you." He rolled his hips, and you closed your eyes, panting hard.

He started up slow again, cock stretching you at an easy pace, each thrust stroking you sweetly. Your eyes flew open as his fingers ghosted along your clit. "That's...that's not fair," you said, breathlessly.

"You don't like it when I touch you?" He asked, feigning innocence.

"You're the worst," you told him.

"If you're going to be insulting, I'll stop being nice," he said, and you could hear the smirk in his voice. He was goading you into this and you were too far gone to care. He gripped your hair and sped up, cock pistoning smoothly in and out of you, each stroke going deeper than before.

You gave a startled cry, and he leaned over, keeping the harder pace. "That's two, hermosa. You're really not very good at this."

"Fuck you, Gabriel," you snarled.

"And three," he laughed in your ear and released you. He pulled out and you lay against the pillow, grinding your teeth. "Let's see if you can do better with that smart mouth. Get me off and maybe I'll return the favor. Otherwise, you can get dressed."

You almost called his bluff. But he had you wound just tight enough that you wanted his cock inside you, you wanted him fucking you into the carpet while you screamed into the pillow. You didn't care who heard you right now, and that was exactly the state Gabriel wanted you reduced to, the goddamn bastard.

"You're an asshole." You rolled over and glared at him.

"I'm just following your rules, corazon." He gave you an innocent smile. "Applying them equally, in the spirit of egalitarianism." He rose, standing there naked, erect cock bobbing. "What's it going to be?"
"I'll take the penalty," you said through gritted teeth.

He sat on the bed, thighs spread wide enough for you to kneel between them. You didn't look at him, already knowing the exact slant of his mouth, the infuriatingly smug look he'd be wearing while you licked your juices off his shaft. Digging your nails into his thighs, you swallowed him down, taking him halfway, then to the hilt. You hollowed your cheeks as you raised your head, tongue laving his tip before you returned to sucking him off.

He groaned, gripping your hair. "That's it. Put that loud mouth to good use. Love how you look when your lips are wrapped around my dick." He began to thrust slowly, and you tried to relax your throat, but he was thick and you gagged. "Tap if you have to," he reminded you.

Your eyes watered, but you kept him in your mouth, the heat of his velvety skin warming your throat and traveling down to your core. Your fingers massaged his balls, and he groaned softly. You encircled his shaft with your other hand, and began to jerk him, sucking hard on the head.

"Look at you actually trying this time. You want to come that badly, baby?"

You didn't answer, because if the jackass could formulate smarmy remarks, you weren't doing your job well enough. Instead you sped up, your jaw starting to ache from his girth.

"Yeah, it looks like you do." He laughed. "Going to swallow my load or do I get to blow it all over your face?"

You ignored him, because while he seemed to enjoy your outrage, it wasn't actually getting him off.

"I asked you a questions, baby." He pulled out with a wet pop and you touched your throat and wiggled your jaw side to side.

"Doesn't matter as long as I get you back inside my pussy," you rasped, throat raw.

"...Such a greedy little cockslut," Gabriel said. He pushed back into your mouth and you continued suck him, moaning softly as he massaged your scalp. "That's it. Keep drooling around me. I like it when you get wet and messy. Bet your cunt is soaked right now. No, you can't touch yourself. Finish me off, and maybe afterward-"

You nearly bit him. But that wouldn't do any good in the long run. Instead you channelled that fury into working faster, your fingers squeezing and rubbing his length while you pushed back the foreskin with your tongue and focused on laving his crown.

Gabriel shuddered, his hold on your hair tightening. "That's it, baby. I'm real close. Going to have to put you on your knees in the office. Like the idea of having you under my desk..." The words trailed off and he tensed beneath you before his cock started to spurt. You continued jerking him off while keeping your lips sealed around him. His hot cum flooded your throat and you had to rapidly swallow or choke.

"Good girl," Gabriel groaned. He gave a few shallow thrusts, and you let his half-hard cock drop. Still glaring, you wiped your mouth with the back of your hand.

"You're a jerk."

"So impatient," he rumbled, leaning over to kiss you. "Maybe I should just let you touch yourself. See how you frantically rub that needy pussy-"
"Don't you dare!"

"Maybe I need a minute to recover. You still have those toys-"

"Gabriel Reyes, if you don't fuck me right now-"

"Get on your back, then." He began to stroke himself as you reclined on the floor. "Have any more rules you want to throw out there?"

"Stop being difficult, that's an order!"

"So demanding," he laughed, and pushed back inside you, the heat of him soothing your need. "Wrap your legs around my waist, corazon. You'll get your reward, even if you don't deserve it."

"Worked hard to-"

"You were wrong today and you know it," he rumbled. "Was furious at you. Still not happy. But getting there." He rested his forehead against yours, eyes dark, but holding your gaze. The tension in his jaw startled you. "Ready?"

You squeezed your inner muscles around him and Gabriel growled. "Been ready."

"If you weren't injured..." He slammed into you, and you cursed. "Yeah, my thoughts exactly."

You just clawed at the floor, head thrown back while he maintained a hard rhythm. He hit your sweet spot with each thrust and your eyes widened when he covered your mouth with one hand.

"Since you can't do it on your own, I'll help you keep quiet." He leaned down, moving his hand and kissed you hard, his hips moving faster as he pounded you into the floor. It grew rougher than you intended, but you sure as hell weren't going to tell him to stop. You were going to be so sore tomorrow and you didn't fucking care. You just locked your ankles around his waist and took everything he had to give. You slid one hand down to stroke your clit. It didn't take much to finish you and you came around him as he swallowed up your cries. He paused as you shook beneath him, your legs slack, and your head tilted back as you tried to regain control of your body.

He kissed your forehead, not even bothering to hide his satisfaction. "Again?" Was all he murmured as he stroked your hair.

"Again," you agreed.

You were pretty sure the entire hall heard the two of you. And you didn't really care, because you were boneless and sated. You lay stretched out of the floor, Gabriel gently massaging your bruised hip.

"I'm sorry," you said as you struggled to keep your eyes open. "This morning, all I could think about was not letting Jack go on his own. It was stupid of us both, but I'm not sorry we saved Feng. Especially given what we learned about Zheng."
"...If you think that's what pissed me off, you're dumber than I thought," Gabriel said, no anger in his voice. "Jack knows better, but what you did was just as bad."

You blinked. "Not to make an excuse, but I wasn't so sure he wouldn't tie me to the bed and leave. I agreed to help and once I did, I wasn't going to renege."

"You do realize that agreements made under duress aren't binding, right?"

"...He didn't threaten me, I just... I-"

"Jack would've tied you up," Gabriel acknowledged. "He already admitted that he wasn't going to let you stop him. And while I'm furious at him for dragging you into it, you're still an idiot and I thought you had more sense than that."

You flinched. "I don't know what I was supposed to do."

"...Yeah, I know you're dumb when it comes to feelings," Gabriel sighed, kissing the back of your neck. "Why do I like them pretty and emotionally oblivious? That's rhetorical, don't try to answer it."

You snorted. "I'm sorry, it's been a long day."

"For both of us." Gabriel paused. "So it never occurred to you that if both you and Jack were so hellbent on rescuing this girl, if it mattered so much to you, that I'd understand? I don't give a shit who's in charge of On Sing, as long as they aren't coming into conflict with us. But if you and Jack care enough to flaunt the rules, don't you think I would listen? I might not initially agree with a plan, but we've been able to sit down and talk it through, when you actually deigned to tell me what was happening. Or am I mistaken?"

He didn't directly compare Cambridge to Lucerne. He didn't bring up that he was letting you take the lead on Angela's data breaches, despite his own misgivings. He didn't even mention Spinshot. But you remembered.

"Oh," you said quietly as the realization reared up and slapped you across the face. "I... Damnit."

"So you realized it was a bad political move, and maybe that made you hesitate to ask, so on a professional level, you obviously knew you were in the wrong. On a personal level, you didn't even consider that maybe I would be reasonable about this, did you?" He didn't sound angry any more, just tired, and you instantly understood that weariness only masked the fact that your lack of faith had hurt him.

You shrunk into the blankets, heart dropping through the floor.

"Both you and Jack decided that no one else would understand and went off on what you knew was a stupid move that could have turned out to be a trap. While you at least had the sense to tell someone where you were going, he was willing to go it alone. Wasn't that your first clue that he wasn't thinking straight? Or was your tunnel vision so bad that you didn't take that into account?"

You put the pillow over your head, because Gabriel had nailed it without even raising his voice. "You can give me the coup de grace now," you said. "I have no excuses and am utterly defenseless."

"You don't get off that easy." Gabriel sighed. "Even if Ana, Gérard, and Wilhelm disapproved, I would have at least prepped a better op than the two of you did, rushing in to what could have been an ambush. And I would've liked to go out with you both.” That last bit was wistful and you winced. You hadn't meant to exclude him.

"I'm sorry," you said, because you were the worst girlfriend ever. Not only were you bad at relationships, you were bad at people. "I uh...fucked up a lot today."

"Yes," Gabriel nodded. "You did."

"And I'm hoping you'll forgive me, because yeah, I...tunnel-visioned. It wasn't just about Feng. I didn't want to let Jack down either."

"...I know," he said softly. "I know that when you're in his orbit and he gets a harebrained idea, it can be very easy to go along with it. He's extremely persuasive. You just trust him, follow his lead, and forget to give the plan the critical examination it deserves. I've had that experience too."

"I just...was dumb and didn't think about things."

"I know."

"I'm sorry."

"I know."

"I didn't mean to hurt you."

"I know, baby." He laid down beside you, and you hugged him, tucking your face against his neck. "But you can't operate like that. Not if you want us to work."

"I get that," you said. "I was stupid. I'll try to do better."

"All right." Gabriel just sounded exhausted now and you were awful for contributing to that weariness. "I forgive you. And I love you, idiocy and all."

You blinked rapidly and just held on to him tighter.

"Mmm, what's wrong?"

"Jack..." You exhaled slowly. "I thought Jack might say something like that while cuddling on the ride back... I told him he was concussed and shouldn't talk."

There was a long pause, and Gabriel sighed. "You actually did, didn't you?"

"Yeah. I mean...he might not have intended to say anything like that. I don't know."

"Do you know why?"

"I panicked! There'd been too many emotions already. I just...I panicked."

"...Mmm." Gabriel snorted. "Tell me about it."

So you did. You told him about the mission, about your nascent friendship with Feng, about Jack's obsession with houses, and all the stupid risks you both took. You told him, against your instincts, because Gabriel was right, this wouldn't work if you kept secrets and assumed he wouldn't work with you. This wouldn't work if you told him the truth and he shut you down for it.
This wouldn't work if you couldn't form compromises or trust each other. And now more than ever, you wanted this to work.

You told him about your flashback, about Shin, and Lao, and all those things you didn't want to think about, including Jack's big relationship reveal. And he listened, obviously displeased by some parts of the story, but he let you tell it, keeping his interruptions minimal and confined to frustrated interjections. And when you were done, you closed your eyes, worried that you'd gotten it all wrong again.

"I love you, but next time, bring me along," he said kissing your forehead. "You and Jack are too reckless together. He's a showoff and you're far too permissive of him."

"He says the same thing about you." You rolled your eyes. "The permissive thing. He hasn't actually called you a "showoff" to me." You drew in a deep breath. "And I love you too. Even if I'm bad at it." You weren't sure what to say about Jack just yet.

"Jack gets it. You were open. Not saying it didn't sting, but you're not withholding affection to manipulate or punish him, are you?"

"No! Why would you-"

"It was rhetorical." Gabriel rubbed his eyes. "Back in SEP, there was a girl, support staff for the chem camp. She was beautiful, whip smart too, but had some damage. Me and Jack were both...interested in her. We were already together and that really got her attention."

"This...girl have a name?" Because you were damn sure this was the bad experience they referenced in the beginning, and the "crazy bitch" Chang mentioned.

"We'll call her "Tara," not her real name. Don't need you hunting her down later." Gabriel chuckled. "Don't give me that look. You think I don't know how you operate?"

You pretended to be too dignified to answer that.

"Anyway, Jack, me, some other guys, a few girls, we were all pretty open about our interest in her. And she took a shine to Jack. Liked me too, though... it was more an unhealthy thing." There was an almost melancholy dreaminess to his tone. You could feel his nostalgia in the rare instances that he spoke of SEP, but it always tinged with sorrow. You thought you understood why: there weren't a lot of super soldiers left.

You reached out and stroked Gabriel's cheek. "How so?"

"She'd play me and Jack against each other. I was the mean one. Jack was the good one. I was the one who played rough and dirty with her. Jack was the one who wiped away her tears and cherished her." There was a sardonic grin on his face, but it wasn't the least bit happy.

"...Uh..."

"Well, it didn't actually go down like that," Gabriel huffed. "That was just how she liked to see it. Jack was blonde and angelic. I was big, black, and scary."

"Stupid bitch," you muttered. "It's obvious that Jack is the evil one and you're a fluffy teddy bear."

Gabriel laughed at that, because he knew you were joking. All three of you were awful and cuddly in varying amounts. "She played games. Liked to watch Jack and me. Liked being in the center of things even more. She was kinky, I'll give her that. But she got jealous easily. Tried to make everything into a competition. It turned toxic pretty quick. I'm not proud to admit that I fed into some of the drama. Jack did too. Chang almost stepped in, but Jack begged her not to. Granted, Chang wanted to beat up both Tara and me, so don't think she was some kind of saint."

"Saint Chang the Pitiless, Patron Saint of Harsh Truths and Ass Kickings, Protector of the Morrison line," you said. "It actually suits her. I want to see a stained glass window of that."

Gabriel gave you a wry grin. "Anyway, if things had continued in that vein, Jack and I probably would have ended up hating each other, but two things happened. Aishani stepped in and force-fed us our egos till we choked. And Tara slept with Galanos."

"The one whose funeral we went to...?"

"Yes, that one," Gabriel said, not looking the least bit perturbed. "He tried to act like he was the better man and had won some kind of prize, but Tara had done it to make us jealous. And after Aishani kicked some sense into us, Jack and I realized we didn't need to deal with that bullshit. Tara stuck with Galanos for a little while after, and he lorded that over us for years. But we were better off without her."

"...Yeah. What exactly did you see in her?"

"She wasn't a completely shallow evil bitch, baby. She was clever, pretty, and funny when she wanted to be. But she was also damaged, insecure, and ultimately unwilling to accept that she caused most of her own problems. She wasn't a bad friend, but she wasn't a good partner. Jack and I really did like her, but sometimes the situation just becomes unsustainable. We were better off walking away than trying to fix things, and we knew it."

"That's a lot nicer than I was expecting you to be."

"I never want to see her crazy face again," Gabriel admitted. "But it's tacky as hell to trash your ex-girlfriend to your current one."

"...Fair," you said, even though you kind of wanted him to. But this was the classier path. If Gabriel had held onto that grudge after all these years, well, that would have been bad for him. And you were glad he had moved past that.

"My point is, Jack and I know when someone's jerking us around. You're not. If you need time to sort through things, that's fine. When have we not given it to you?"

"You've been great," you said.

"So yeah, you could have been more graceful about it, but honestly, probably not much more."

You wrinkled your nose. "Really?"

"Yeah," Gabriel grinned. "You're not smooth, baby."

"Yeah, OK," you sighed. He had you there.

"Anyway, you're doing better. We'll get there." Gabriel kissed your cheek. "You're trying, and you accept constructive criticism. If you really want to make it up to me, you can make some of that pork cutlet on rice that I like."
"...Out of pork, I can do the chicken katsu."

"That'll work. Do the version with seven spice powder and the sriracha mayo on rice. Lots of cabbage. Top it with bulldog sauce. Yeah. That sounds really good right now." Gabriel sighed happily.

"You want some karaage too?"

"Is that the extra crunchy, bite-sized, marinated fried chicken?"

"Yeah," you said, stomach rumbling.

"Hell yeah," he said. "And don't let fucking Jesse steal it all this time." It hadn't all been Jesse. Last time you made it, Genji, Vo, and Jesse had all hung around to snatch bites off the cooling rack. Gabriel had not been pleased, and you just didn't tell Jack, because there wasn't enough.

"Rice or banh xeo?"

"Both," Gabriel said. "You just keep talking dirty to me, baby. I'm a man deprived," he growled in your ear. "I'll drag you to the kitchen, we'll cook, we'll use fresh ground spices, and we'll eat till the itis kicks in."

You laughed. "I love you."

"I know," he chuckled. "I knew long before you ever said it. Maybe before you admitted it to yourself." He held you against his chest, yawning as he stroked your hair. "And in case you haven't noticed, Jack can be just as insightful."

Chapter End Notes

You guys are awesome, by the way. This month has been just bleagh, and I'm trying not to be all boring and depressing.

Yes, Hanzo's Scion skin is super sexy. Yes, I love Moira's hat, even though I don't think she does. Yes, Gabriel is still sexy at fucking 50+. Yes, I love that Gérard and Gabriel are obviously friends. :D I do wonder why Jack was acting all reticent about Blackwatch going on "unsanctioned" missions, but I'm going to say that it's probably because the Oslo attack was high profile and they have to be more circumspect.

I know everyone was excited about Gabriel yelling at people, but I hope this doesn't disappoint too much. There are still consequences, but Gabriel isn't just going to lash out because he's (rightfully) angry. He's a complex guy and while having kinky sex is one way to work through your issues, I suspect that talking is also important. :P And there are more consequences to come...
Chapter 54

Chapter Summary

Sorting out other people's feelings is not part of your job description, but then your job description is pretty vague and that excuse won't fly with Captain Amari, now will it?

Chapter Notes

Some cool artsy anon made a moodboard! All that detail. ■ ■

So thirsty for Soldier 24. Also, yes, I <3 Retribution dialogue. So good.

Warning, long pointless rant in the end notes. You have been warned.

Also, Pun!AU is way worse than Angst!AU and I draw the line there. There is only so much suffering I can bear.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Sorry, if the arguing kept you up," you said to Jesse, gauging how much he knew. You sat in the cafeteria, watching him drink coffee-sludge. He had bags under his eyes and gave you a blank look.

"No, you didn't disturb me last night. Was too busy trying to keep Tataryn from getting arrested, puking in the cemetery, and drinking vinegar. Didn't get in till this morning."

...Goddamnit, you'd forgotten about that. And Vo was still out of town. And who knew what Genji was up to? Gabriel. Gabriel knew. Gabriel knew everyone was out and the quiet game was just a way of getting back at you. Goddamnit.

"...Never mind. We sorted things," you said, vaguely.

"Yeah, boss wasn't happy yesterday." Jesse slumped at the table. "I can't do the office today, Lucky."

You thought about telling him that Gabriel would be in a better mood today, but decided that would be too revealing.

"Between a long night watching Tataryn drink and how on edge the boss is going to be over Sinaga- Shit. He can't believe he's... I owed him money." Jesse sighed. "Guess I better donate it to his mosque or something."

"I didn't know him very well," you said. "Seemed nice. For being one of us."

"He wasn't bad at all. Boss recruited him off the street when he caught Sinaga trying to pick his pockets. He was on his own, rough situation. But you know about those," Jesse said. "At least Vo and Diallo made it." Jesse set his hat on the table. "Sinaga was more like you. Less a fair fight guy, more a knife in the back, or something sneaky. Didn't stand a chance against all those omnis."

"...Yeah." You stared at Jesse's bagel and he pushed the plate at you.

"Not really hungry," he said.

"Split it?" Because Jesse still needed to eat.

"Yeah, OK." He cut the bagel and spread some garlicky cheese on it. You took half and watched as he took a bite and ate mechanically, obviously not tasting the food.

"Call out. Get some sleep. Tell Gabriel I'll be in to cover for you later. I'm on med-leave anyway."

"Really?" Jesse perked up. "You'd do that?"

"Got to get back on his good side anyway," you lied.

Jesse gave you a measured look, his grin widening. "If he was in your room last night, we both know you're on his good side and-"

"Pizda! Lucky Strike! Or whatever your real name is!" The voice was harsh and slurred, and you glanced up, a little surprised to see Tataryn staggering toward your table, shoving chairs out of the way. His normally sleek hair was a bird's nest, and his face was rough with stubble. He glared at you through bloodshot eyes. Jesse groaned.

"How is he even upright, Lucky? I swear to god, he should have been dead from alcohol poisoning six hours ago."

"Lucky, you dumb bitch. If the boss didn't have me babysitting your stupid ass, I would've been out there with my team! Malik would still be alive! I should kick your fucking ass!"

Jesse was on his feet immediately.

You blinked. Well, this was unexpected. He pushed past a few concerned blues, and slammed his hands on the table. His fists shook and you knew he was on his feet through sheer willpower alone. It wouldn't be hard to lay him out and you probably wouldn't even get in trouble for it.

"Tataryn, you're out of line-" Jesse snapped.

"Poshel na huy," Tataryn spat. "Well, what'll it be, pizda?" You just going to hide behind McCree? Because I'll kick his ass too!"

You stood, very conscious of the eyes on you and of the desperation in Tataryn's voice. He was drunk. He was hurting. And he wanted a fight. You knew intimately how that felt. Hell, he'd picked you, and that only worried you because he knew better. He'd seen what you could do. He knew you weren't weak. And he had to know exactly how Gabriel would react if he laid hands on you. Yeah, Tataryn was trying to play chicken with a hypertrain, fully aware that he would lose.

"You sure want to do this here, Fedya? Too many witnesses. Makes Blackwatch look bad." You kept your tone even.

"Po khuy!"
"Come on, you know the Overwatch agents will break it up before it even starts." You were very conscious of the surrounding Overwatch agents debating whether or not to get involved. That was actually wise of them. You were Blackwatch, and you could handle yourselves. There was no need for them to interfere.

Tataryn eyed you suspiciously. "Yeah."

"Let's go somewhere else." He wasn't yelling any more, and if you get could get him to agree with you, you had cleared the first hurdle.

"Yeah," he said. He sneered at Jesse. "Suka."

You pushed the plate at Jesse. "I got this. You get some sleep. If I need help, Athena can cover."

"That's a bad idea, sugarpie," Jesse said, swiping his hat off the table. Sure, Tataryn was bigger and maybe meaner than you. But those kinds of odds didn't bother you any more.

"...Nah. This is between Fedya and me."

"Yeah!" Tataryn snapped. "Fuck off, McCree. I don't have a problem with you. Except that you can't hold your liquor."

You stood, pushing in your chair. Tataryn wobbled beside you.

"A good fight never hurt anyone," you told Jesse and he gave you a very skeptical look. "I got this. Trust me."

You clapped Tataryn on the back and he stumbled. "Come on, Fedya."

"Don't tell me what to do," he mumbled as you walked out of the mess hall and down the kitchen corridor.

"Sorry," you said. "You look kind of pale. When did you eat last?"

"...Last night. Threw it all up." He closed his eyes and braced himself against the wall. Yeah, in this condition, Tataryn wasn't much of a threat.

"You can't fight on an empty stomach, Fedya." You stopped at the kitchen. "Want some eggs? Maybe crepes? I haven't eaten yet either. Hate exercise on an empty stomach, never have enough energy. Want to eat first? We can punch it out after. Loser does dishes."

Tataryn drew a deep breath and slowly blew it out. He smelled like too much cologne and alcohol. Eyes still shut tight, he laughed bitterly. "I think we both know I'm in no shape to fight you, Lucky."

You shrugged. "I'm still hungry. You interrupted my breakfast. I had negotiated half a bagel out of Jesse. He even put cheese on it for me. Some of that fancy French crumbly cheese with the herbs and garlic."

Tataryn's stomach growled. He turned away. "Lucky-"

"The least you can do is keep me company, after dragging me away from my cheesy bagel. Come on." You went into the small kitchen and Tataryn trailed behind you, now cringing like a kicked dog.
"You were supposed to jump up and punch me," he grumbled. "One-two, lights out, and I wouldn't have to think about Malik."

That was exactly what you suspected and you were glad you hadn't reacted rashly. "...I'm sorry about Sinaga," you said. "Losing squadmates is hard. Worse when you feel responsible for them."

"What do you know about-" And miraculously he stopped, then dropped his head against the table. "Korva. I am an ass."

"Yes, but that isn't news." Tataryn had been briefed on Shit Spiders after the spa incident. You put the kettle on, then you melted the butter and began mixing up the crepe batter, which apparently was your go-to recipe for talking to men in difficult straits.

"Should've been there," he muttered.

You didn't say that ever so helpful phrase, "oh, well then you'd be dead too" or worse, "what could you have done?" He had not been there, and that haunted him. That you understood. You drizzled the melted butter into your mixing bowl and stirred till the batter had emulsified.

"He was one of mine."

"He was." You understood. You found some eggs, some fresh mozzarella, and prosciutto. You stirred mayonnaise and sherry into the eggs. In one pan, you threw together scrambled eggs. In the other, you began the crepes.

"...Malik was young. Shouldn't have been on his own." There was a rawness to Tataryn that you had not seen before. Before he had always been laughing and flippant, even when he killed. You had misjudged him badly. Tataryn cared. Tataryn cared a whole lot, and you understood then why Gabriel trusted him so much.

"Sinaga was an accomplished agent. Wouldn't have been on your team otherwise," you said, voice mild. "You don't babysit incompetents, Tataryn. You're the one Gabriel goes to when he needs a job done right."

"Well, I obviously can't keep my people alive!" Tataryn snapped. And you remembered a variation of those words coming out of your mouth.

"I think we both know that even you or I wouldn't have been prepared for what happened in Kalkan. The mission was an acquisition. No one expected a tidal wave of omnics. It's a miracle Diallo and Vo got out alive."

"The boss would have been prepared," Tataryn said.

His faith in Gabriel surprised you. Not because Gabriel didn't deserve it, but because Tataryn was such a practical cynic. But you didn't comment, having been on the other side of this discussion before. Instead, you let him talk, and maybe you would be able to say a few things that had eased your grief.

"Maybe. But you and me are mere mortals, Fedya. We do our best. Sometimes it's not enough, but it's all we've got. There's no shame in doing your best, even if you fail." You had not entirely embraced those words, though you knew them to be true. You just worked hard to make your best better. You would be strong enough. You would be fast enough. And everyone would come home, you would make sure of it.
You went to the pantry and got down a blend of hibiscus herbal tea. Jesse said it was good for hangovers, and he probably wouldn't mind if you pinched a little. After all, you were taking his office shift today. You made a cup for Tataryn and a cup for yourself. You set the mug in front of Tataryn and flipped the first crepe onto a plate. After starting the next one, you gave the first one to Tataryn, then got out the cream cheese, Nutella, and strawberry preserves.

Tataryn silently put all three on his crepe and then got out the powdered sugar. He dusted the whole thing with it, rolled it up, and began to eat.

You added the cheese and prosciutto to the eggs and scooped out a plate for Tataryn, hoping he wouldn't sugar those too.

"It's good," he said after a moment.

"How can you taste anything under all that sugar?"

"It is how my daughter likes her crepes. Makes me think of her."

You blinked. You really needed to start reading people's personnel files. You weren't so much surprised that Tataryn had reproduced, just that he had cared enough to stay in contact. And that was kind of judgmental of you.

"What does she do?" You asked, trying to keep the question general. You moved between the table and the stove, steadily building up a supply of crepes.

"She goes to a private boarding school in here in Switzerland. Very expensive. The boss arranged it." Tataryn looked smug. "She is smart. And beautiful. And very sneaky. Just like her father. With the right connections, she will be much better off than him."

"How old is she?"

"Eight." Tataryn sighed. "She is not happy about being sent away, but it is for the best. What do I know about children?"

"I don't know. I don't know anything about children," you agreed.

"Mmm. One of life's great mysteries," Tataryn said. To his credit, he didn't ask you if you wanted any. You would have said, "yes, everything goes well on crepes."

The kitchen door opened and Gabriel stood there, expression hard. Of course, Jesse had gotten him. You sighed.

"Boss," Tataryn gave a half-salute, powdered sugar smeared across his jaw.

"...Tataryn." Gabriel glanced between the two of you.

"Are you hungry?" You asked, with a half smile.

Gabriel gave you a long look. It was a silly question. Gabriel was usually hungry. And he hadn't stayed very long this morning. He'd scooped you off the floor, tucked you back into bed, and kissed you goodbye, while you sulkily muttered about not wanting him to go because he was nice and warm, damnit.

Gabriel had been amused then, but not so much now. He frowned at Tataryn, expression harsh.
Tataryn hunched over his plate, not saying a word.

"Eggs?" You asked and Gabriel looked up, frown softening.

"Please."

You made him a small plate of eggs, making sure to put more crepes on Tataryn's plate. Tataryn put his eggs in the next crepe, rolled them up, and began to eat. No powdered sugar this time, thank god.

Gabriel ate the eggs, leaning against the door frame, gaze drifting back to Tataryn, the corners of his mouth dropping. The tension in his shoulders worried you.

"Strawberry or Nutella?"

"One of each." You spread cream cheese on the strawberry one for him. Your eggs were getting cold, but you kept shoveling food at both of them, not because you were some kind of homemaker, but to keep the peace. Tataryn couldn't say anything stupid if his mouth was full. And Gabriel would probably be in a better mood with food in his stomach.

"Here you go," you gave him another plate of crepes, taking his empty plate and putting it in the dishwasher.

"Thanks."

Tataryn swallowed roughly, looking paler now, like he expected to be taken out back and shot.

"I'll be by the office later. Do you want me to bring you something?"

"Chicken katsu," he said, studying Tataryn. "You know how I like it."

"All right. I'll make that next. Jesse's going to be out today. I'll cover."

"Yeah, all right." Gabriel exhaled. "Tataryn, eat your breakfast, and go get some sleep. That's an order."

"OK, boss," Tataryn said, meekly.

"See you in the office," Gabriel said, and exited the kitchen, shutting the door behind him.

There was half a minute of silence while you sipped your tea and Tataryn waited for Gabriel to come back and do something terrible.

When that did not happen, he gave a deep sigh of relief. "Thank you, Lucky."

"I'm glad you liked the food," you said. "But I was hungry too." You picked up your eggs, and began to eat.

Tataryn blinked in surprise, and then sat back in his seat, shaking his head. "You are formidable woman. No wonder they like you so much."

You almost asked whom "they" were, but decided against it. "You're just saying that because you want more food. Help yourself. I have to cook something else anyway."

"I can do dishes," Tataryn said after a moment. "Because you will just leave the dirty ones in the sink. I know it is you who does that."

"Hey, I cooked. I shouldn't have to clean up!" You grinned. "Yeah, you can do dishes. Just go get some sleep first, all right?"

"You are just planning on making a bigger mess," Tataryn sighed, serving himself the rest of the eggs. "You will make more delicious food, and eat it all while I sleep. And then you will laugh at your poor Fedya, slaving away in the kitchen, scrubbing dirty pots, and wasting away into thin air."

You just smiled and ate another crepe.

You carried a large container of chicken katsu on rice, with shredded cabbage, and sauce on the side, into the office. Gabriel didn't look up when you came in. He just glared at his screen. "I don't like this, Lucky. They've been too quiet. Now that they can't get access to our systems, they're angling for something else."

"Of course," you said. Lacroix had already flagged three new recruits as potential security issues and was changing the security clearance vetting process as well as the three year renewal process.

"They're still hitting us with the budget. There's Angela's little problem. You're sending off doctored reports to Petras. And backdated "concerned" memos about Blackwatch keep popping up in the periphery. Lacroix and Mihrat have been using Athena to track them. It's a goddamn setup. They're pushing us toward something big and I can't tell if it's Jack or me that's supposed to take the fall. I'm the more convenient scapegoat, but..."

"Let's assume both," you said. "Hell, if they're really clever, they'll just pit you two against each other. Push you to a breaking point. Make it look like the two of you were the cause of the whole thing." And if they were both dead, then they wouldn't be able to refute the charges. Petras would be free to spin whatever narrative he wanted. The realization chilled you.

Petras still wanted Jack, for some reason. But he was courting Gabriel too, though it seemed he was more interested in stringing Gabriel along. He kept throwing unsanctioned and unpleasant missions Blackwatch's way and trying to see how hard he could push for compliance. For example, he wanted dirt on tech conglomerate that happened to be a rival for his brother-in-law's firm. Claimed they were funneling money to omnic hate groups, but wanted to the work done off the record. You'd done the preliminary research and found nothing of the sort. Still, you'd sent off a stalling report claiming that it was being worked on and discretion took precedence over speed.

"I can't fucking run a black ops division and parry a UN conspiracy at the same time!" Gabriel snarled, and while you knew he could, you also knew that wasn't the main reason he was in such a foul mood.

"Consult Lacroix. He's the criminal mastermind." You set the food down on his desk. You opened it up and pushed it in front of him with chopsticks and sauce in little dipping cups. "Eat first. I'll make some coffee."

Gabriel took the food and began to eat, his eyes not leaving the screen. "He said he'll get back to me. Has to check up on some sources. Said you were planning to arrange a discrete meeting with Kwento. There's been some traffic about her lately. She's making waves and that's earning her enemies." His analysis would have been unremarkable, except for his admiring tone.
Gabriel liked Kwento. Huh.

"You know you're cynical when you think that's a good sign."

"Yeah." Gabriel chewed thoughtfully, his tension easing up as he ate. "This is good.
Thanks."

"You're welcome."

"Want some?"

"If there's any left later."

"There won't be. Have some now." Gabriel cut off a generous piece of chicken, dipped it in the sauces and gestured for you to come over. You rolled your eyes and leaned across his desk.
He fed you a bite of chicken and then rice.

"What do you want me to do first?"

"Sift through reports. Forward me anything problematic." Gabriel cut up another piece of chicken and offered it to you. You shook your head.

"I'm good. If I eat any more I'll just fall asleep."

"More for me," he said, and happily continued eating.

You filtered through the reports quickly and returned to your own workload. Kwento was your main focus now. You'd seen some of the extremist media caricaturing Adaeze Kwento.
There'd been a particularly unflattering comic portraying her as a gorilla that managed to be offensive on numerous levels, but the artist swore up and down that race had nothing to do with it.
It was just a political statement. Why were people so sensitive?

Uh huh.

But more importantly, you'd seen her voting record, her public works, and her penchant for solving problems through collaboration, charismatic leadership, and uncompromising advocacy for civil liberties, for both humans and omnics. And while you were no fan of omnics, you understood that they weren't just overpowered blenders and toasters, and if they were people, after a fashion, they deserved some kind of recognition complete with rights and civil protections. But wading into that sort of legalism and philosophy wasn't your forte. That's what people like Kwento were for.

Kwento held the international conglomerates accountable, pushing for more humanitarian distribution of the Omnica Corporation's seized assets. She channeled aid relief into the areas hit hardest by the Omnic crisis, no matter the continent. And she kept the kept the multinational profiteers out of Numbani, which was a feat in and of itself.

Undersecretary Adawe was not a fan of Blackwatch and since she was already on her way out, Lacroix said it wasn't worth it to try to change her mind. Kwento though, Kwento might be worth the risk. Because of her connection to Adawe, she probably knew about Blackwatch and was not predisposed to look at it favorably. You weren't sure how to change her mind. Lacroix was still brainstorming and your team was digging up everything they could on her.
You were still running background financials, searching for any whiff of corruption. Because if you were going to back this candidate, you did not want any surprises. Bolstering Kwento was far riskier than assassinating Hoffman. That had been a one-time thing. This would be a sustained alliance and possibly an on-going operation. Any kind of prolonged contact increased the chances of getting caught.

You glanced at the clock. It was late afternoon now and your hip was starting to ache again. You stood and stretched.

"Is Jack back from Geneva yet?"

"No." The empty food containers sat neatly stacked on the floor beside Gabriel's desk.

"You going to be up for seeing him when he gets back?" You sat on Gabriel's desk, and he crossed his arms.

"I'll deal with him tonight."

"Am I invited?"

"I guess." There was a pause. "You going to behave?"

"...I want you two to make up," you said.

"It's not always pretty."

"Well then, you'll need me on hand to separate you two if it gets ugly," you said, hoping it would not go that far.

"...I suppose," Gabriel sighed. "How's Tataryn?"

"Walked him back to his room. He's pretty broken up about Sinaga."

"Yeah." Gabriel shook his head and you saw the weariness in his eyes. "I sent Sinaga out. Was just supposed to be a B&E. Diallo and Vo there if things got heavy. Proportional force. Didn't expect the omnis."

"No one did." You shrugged. "Tataryn is still blaming himself."

"...That idiot. Tried to self-destruct in the middle of the mess hall, did he?"

"I handled it." You shrugged again, arms crossed, fingers splayed across your shoulders. "You know how it is."

"...Yeah."

There wasn't much more you needed to say. "I know there have to be consequences, but don't be harsh on him."

"...What would you have me do?" Gabriel asked, though there was no anger in his voice. He looked at you thoughtfully. "I'm not being sarcastic. I'm curious."

"Tataryn pretty much admitted that he wanted me to knock him out, so points to him for picking a fight with someone who can defend themselves."

"He knows you're my woman. He had a goddamn death wish."
"Yeah, he's a dumb drunk." You shrugged. "We're going to need to replace Sinaga. Put Tataryn on Overwatch rookie duty for a few weeks. Nobody likes that. See if anyone works well with him. Don't tell him to scout, just keep an eye on him. If he likes someone, great. If he doesn't, well, you've at least got a competent agent training them."

Gabriel raised a brow. "You're learning."

"I had a good teacher."

Gabriel gave you a wide grin. "Oh?"

"Yeah, Captain Patel was the best."

Gabriel snorted, but he didn't argue.

"So, if I came to ask you for advice, would you just laugh at me or-"

"...I'm not going to overclock your space heater, Lucky. That's a fire hazard, I don't care how cold your room is, just put on another layer." Torby glared up at you as he scooted out from underneath Reinhardt's suit. "The lasers still aren't ready. And no, I won't make you dildo-fingers. I draw the line at the vibrators."

"...I...what?" You tucked your left hand behind your back, unable to banish the mental image of "dildo fingers" attached to your hands. Just what kind of implications was he making about your private life anyway? "I...can't even process that. No, I didn't come here for tech help or custom sex toys. I uh...I don't know what I was thinking. I'll just be going now..."

"Hold up, eelhead."

"...Eww," you said. "Torby, you have the weirdest descriptors for body parts and I don't know if that's an "engineer" thing or a "you" thing, but please stop."

"You wanted advice," he said gruffly. "Why would you come to me?"

"...I'm desperate, obviously." You clapped a hand over your mouth. "OK, not quite desperate, but I'm hitting my head against a wall. You're a smart guy, and you have a lot of experience weighing the potential far-reaching consequences of your actions. I need help doing that." At least, you expected he did, considering all the groundbreaking weaponry he designed. Torby was very aware of how it had been used badly.

"What have you done?" Torby climbed to his feet and began to scale Reinhardt's armor. It was a terrifying thing to watch, knowing that the dwarf could climb so nimbly.

"Nothing yet. Someone else has done something bad, and I'm trying to figure out how to fix it."

Torby sighed. "Are you going to have to kill them?"

"It's the most likely outcome. But I actually don't want to."

Torby paused. "Huh."
"They fucked up. They compromised us, but there are extenuating circumstances."

"But you can't just let it slide and Reyes is going to want blood."

"Yeah," you said. "I could go to Jack, but...that's the nuclear option. I'd rather not. It would just complicate things. You know how he is."

"Yeah, Rein is like that. Too...optimistic about our fellow man." Torby shook his head and looked down at you like he really knew the moral quandary you were facing. "It's not Mihret, is it?" He actually sounded worried.

"No. He's loyal. Just a fucking pain in the ass."

"They can't stay."

"...Yeah, I figured." You sighed. "It's complicated. And I really don't want to kill them, but what they've done isn't really forgivable."

"...Forgiveness is a personal thing, Lucky. You can forgive someone for wronging you. But that doesn't mean you retain them professionally." Torby began banging on a dent in the chestplate. "How personal is this?"

"I take betrayal pretty personally," you admitted.

"Was it you or all of Overwatch? Give me a scale."

"Both...ish. Like the amount of harm caused is minimal, but it could have been a lot worse."

"I don't know anything about intel protocols, Lucky. But if you don't want to kill this person, then don't. And if you feel strongly enough about it that you have to find me to confirm that for you, then what the hell is wrong with you?"

"...Thanks Torby." He wasn't exactly wrong and you grinned up at him. "You should write greeting cards."

"Pass me that spanner, will you? This one is too small to knock sense into your thick dumb skull."
"Well how is Gabriel going to know if he works well with any of them? Fedya probably isn't going to praise them. I don't even know if he'll be in the right state of mind to train them. And you could do with a refresher on Overwatch discipline."

Sighing heavily, you nodded. It wasn't unfair. It was just going to suck getting up at 4 AM every morning. "Understood, ma'am."

"You'll just be covering the intro to black ops classes. Maybe a few PT courses with them. Definitely the live fire exercise. We're not leaving you and Tataryn alone with the green recruits, Lucky. We don't want them going rogue on the second day."

"Ma'am," you acknowledged, quirking your lips.

"It's one week out of the entire training," she said. "You deserve a much longer sentence, but Gérard claims he needs you on hand for a mission. So I suppose you'll just have to make sure you do a good job. Otherwise, I'll assign you to the next batch for the full training period."

"Yes, ma'am," you said.

"Jesse has helped me run the marksmanship portion. Liaise with him if you have questions about the course material."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Mmm, that is all." She paused. "Would you like a cup of tea?"

"Please," you said, perking up.

"And if I give a Lucky a cup of tea, she's going to want a biscuit to go with it, isn't she?"

You just smiled. "As you say, ma'am."

---

You studied the scar across Jack's forehead. It had faded from angry red to a pink toned line, but it was still very noticeable.

"Got a lot of thoughtful looks. Guess those crusty fucks forgot that I still go out in the field."

"Maybe it's bad to remind them that you're mortal."

"No, it's good to remind them that I fight metal monsters the weight of semi-trucks on a regular basis, and that maybe they should consider that when they talk to me." Jack sat on his couch eating chicken katsu. You had put some aside for him too. Gabriel seemed incapable of leaving leftovers. You sat beside him drinking beer and eating cake. "How's Gabe?"

"Cooled down somewhat. Lost one of Tataryn's agents. Random omnic attack on one of our ops. He came to me last night. He was pretty upset over it." You should have felt weird telling Jack this, considering that Gabriel was still mad at him. But being dishonest didn't sit right with you and you didn't think Gabriel would mind once they sorted things.

Jack looked at you, frowning. "What'd you do?"
"Cuddled, fell asleep, had sex, then talked about everything."

"So you softened him up for me?" Jack didn't seem bothered at all. In fact, he was grinning now.

"Oh, he's still mad at you."

"But he's coming over tonight." Jack's look was downright smug. "That's a pretty fast cooldown."

"He's just... tired. Sinaga was one of his personal recruits."

"Ah." Jack's smile flattened. "When's the funeral?"

"Tomorrow. 1400 hours."

"I'll be there." Jack sat back. "That region's becoming problematic." He rubbed his temples. "I'm guessing you fed Gabe?"

"Oh yeah," you nodded. "Definitely."

"Yeah..." You shrugged. "That's my punishment for my role in I Need Coffee."

"Better than mine. Ana said if I had time to run across the world and take on stupid missions, I had time to make a comprehensive facilities review and check over the maintenance budget. Lucky, how are individual pipe-fittings thirty credits now? Like, I can walk into a home improvement store and get a dozen for ten credits."

"Or they'll give them to you for free, because you are the Jack Morrison."

"Shut up," he scowled.

"Heh." You leaned against him and he offered you a bite of his chicken. You took it. "So, any advice?"

"Wait, you've never trained raw recruits before, have you?"

"Nope," you shrugged. "I'm sure it'll be a learning experience."

Jack chuckled. "Never let them see you sweat. Your job is to be a scary as possible."

"...I see."

"You're doing the black ops course. That's basically an excuse to terrorize them." Jack looked amused. "You have to weed out the weak. Let them know how much easier it is to be a rank and file agent. It's a Blackwatch tradition, or so I'm told."

"...What?" You sighed. You knew hazing the recruits was standard fare, but you weren't so sure about Jack's idea. "I'll review the course material tomorrow. I have time."

"If you need ideas, I can ask Ray. She's always up for sadistic training exercises."

"I'll keep that in mind." You shook your head. Jack was way too excited about this. And then you remembered how much he enjoyed you bossing him around. Oh. You could work with that.

The door opened and Gabriel dragged himself in, shoulders hunched. He kicked off his boots, sniffed the air, and then shot a hard look at you.

"There was more?" The accusation bordered on outrage.

"I uh...saved some for Jack?"

Gabriel pursed his lips. "I'm still hungry. Didn't eat right yesterday because I was too worried about someone who put on a mask and decided to play vigilante."

Jack looked down at his bowl, conflicted. You rolled your eyes. He stood, walked up to Gabriel, and extended his chopsticks, holding up a generous slice of breaded chicken. "I can share."

"I'll fight you for it, Morrison. Don't think that I won-"

Jack shoved the chicken into Gabriel's mouth, a delighted smile on his face. "I haven't set up the mats yet, hey-"

Gabriel snatched the bowl out of Jack's hands and sat down on the couch beside you. "Give me those chopsticks."

Jack sighed and handed them over. He sat down on Gabriel's other side, shaking his head. Gabriel cut off a piece of chicken and elbowed Jack. "Open up."

"Whatever you say, sir," Jack said, lips quirking up in a smile.

"Don't get cocky, Morrison." Gabriel fed Jack a bite. "I'm still sore at you."

"I am sorry, Gabe. Next time we'll drag you along. We missed you." Jack gave Gabriel a peck on the cheek. "I shouldn't have taken off like that. I shouldn't have pressured Lucky into going along. And I shouldn't have bypassed you, and I was an idiot. Feng just reminds me of Maggie and I didn't want to sit by and do nothing because of politics."

Irritation flickered across Gabriel's face. He took another bite of chicken. After he swallowed, he looked at you. "You warned him, didn't you?"

You shrugged. "I just pointed out all the things we overlooked and explained that, yes, we were, and probably still are, amazingly stupid."

Gabriel shook his head. "And what have you learned, Jack?"

"...That I should've left Lucky tied to the bed so she couldn't warn anyone. Then she could have distracted you when you noticed I was missing." Jack began to laugh as Gabriel choked. "I'm kidding! I'm kidding! I didn't actually learn anything, because I should have known better to begin with. I just got carried away. Like the old days, because I miss them. I know. It was stupid and I'll reign it in. I just...it felt good to be out there as an operative, and not the Strike Commander... Next time, I won't try to solo it. I promise."

"There better not be a fucking next time, Morrison."

"...Next time I go out," Jack amended quickly.
Gabriel handed Jack his bowl and sat back, an arm around you. "You know snitches get stitches, right baby?"

Jack began to shovel the food into his mouth, in case Gabriel changed his mind.

"Mmm, definitely. But I seem to remember a very smug man advising me on how to handle a relationship hurdle, because I was too dumb to figure it out on my own. I was just following his example."

"Wait, what are you implying?" Jack asked, looking up from his bowl, mouth full, cheeks puffed out, and brow furrowed.

"Mmm, all right then." Gabriel kissed your cheek. "I suppose I can let it slide this once. I know I'm too tired to give him the ass kicking he deserves."

"Besides, I know it was you who gave Captain Amari the idea to have me "help" with the trainees."

Gabriel grinned. "It'll be good for you. Think of it less as punishment, and more as a leadership building course. You're gaining important new skills."

"Oh, it's punishment," Jack grinned, setting his empty bowl on the table. "But on the bright side, you get to spread that misery around." He leaned against Gabriel. "So are you going to forgive me or not, papi? Because I can grovel if you want." The cheeky bastard knew Gabriel had already let it go. That's the only reason he was being such a smug shit.

Gabriel turned to Jack. "You're an ass. And you got that pretty face fucked up. What am I going to do with you?" He pressed a kiss to Jack's forehead. "Let me plan a mission for the three of us, all right?"

"...That sounds good," Jack murmured, cupping Gabriel's chin.

"He flirts, a lot," you said.

"She gets so riled up, it's adorable."

"You're both ridiculous." Gabriel kissed Jack. "Any other news?"

"Lucky's getting a pet."

"What? There are no pets in the Blackwatch dorms. Not after the goddamn ant farm incident."

"I heard it was termites," you wrinkled your nose.

"It didn't matter. Vo took it upon herself to exterminate the colony with extreme prejudice. Didn't actually kill them all, blew through two walls, dispersed them through the building, and we had to get fumigated all while Agent Findlay cried inconsolably over her damn ant farm." Gabriel shook his head. "No pets."

"She offered me a Mongolian death worm, which are apparently giant mutant skinks that shoot electricity and eat camels. I said "no, thank you." Obviously."

"...I read that part three times. I'm still having trouble with that," Gabriel said.

"It's true, saw them myself." Jack hadn't actually been against you having pets. Maybe if something caught your fancy, it could live with him. Like your orchid. "Anyway, Feng said she'll make Lucky a small dinosaur."

Gabriel snorted. "That girl is deranged. If she actually creates a dinosaur, yeah sure, you can have one. Otherwise, no pets."

"I'm not the one lobbying for pets. I can barely keep my plants alive."

Jack just looked smug. He nuzzled Gabriel's cheek. "You want a back rub?"

"Sure." Gabriel's voice was tired. He sat sandwiched between you and Jack, head resting on Jack's shoulder, you curled up against his side. Jack reached over and clasped your hand, winking at you behind Gabriel's back.

It was not lost on you that no one had raised their voice or thrown any punches. And you wondered if that was a sign of problems or progress.

Chapter End Notes

Wednesday was...soul-draining. I answered the phone and an older man with a heavy Appalachian accent asked me if we carried books of "a sexual persuasion." Oh boy. I said yes and asked what he was looking for specifically, dreading the answer. "Well, I've spent my whole life thinking I was one way and now realize I'm another way." OK, not what I was expecting, but OK. So I asked if he was trans or coming out of the closet. There was a long pause. "I'm not the first, but I'm...bisexual. I'm trying to figure out how I'm supposed to live now."

Oh boy. I'm a retail employee, not a counselor. Now I've given some impromptu comfort for strangers at work, from "my boyfriend just dumped me" to "I'm pregnant out of wedlock and Jordanian, if I don't get an abortion, my dad will disinherit me" to "my mother has Alzheimer's, I don't know what to do." (That one is actually really frequent). Sometimes, I've had nothing good to add and just nodded politely. December 26, a woman came in to return over $200 worth of books. Her reason? "My husband gave me the divorce papers Christmas day. I'm returning all his presents."

But yeah, I'm not qualified to give anyone life advice over the phone and honestly, I don't get paid enough for this. However, I gave him some recommendations out of our LGBTQ section and he was like "I've tried to keep it under control my whole life, but the monster keeps rearing its head." And I was like...well shit. So I told him, that it's not a big deal, that's just my young, liberal opinion, but if that's whom he is, there's nothing wrong with it, and maybe he should join a support group. He thanked me, asked me for a number (which I didn't have and told him he could google ), and he told me his sister had google on her phone and he'd ask her to do it. But he would be in later today with his girlfriend, would I be there?

He did come in. The woman he came with did not look happy. He asked me if a book called "How to Create Chemistry with Anyone" would work for men and women. I'm not sure he was shopping for books on identity as much as kink, but...yeah. None of my business. Just...yeah. I don't always have the emotional depth to want to help people, but I try to at least be compassionate and it's fucking hard.
The real kicker was the bitchy older woman who put "No Ego" on reserve then told me off because she wanted two copies. So I grabbed her another one, came back, and she told me she didn't want it because it was too expensive, but she was going to buy one. Obviously, she needed to read it.

Then I went to cover a cafe break, and she was there, demanding chai with no sugar. We make our stuff from concentrate. There is no sugar-free chai from us. I explained we had two sugar free syrups, but if she needed to avoid sugar, she should also not get frappes or soy milk, because ours contain sugar. I explained this multiple times. She wouldn't clarify if she couldn't have sugar or just didn't want it. Then she asked me what I could make, and I gave her a rundown: lattes, cappucinos, americanos, drinks with sugar free syrups, hot tea... Anyway, she told me it was too complicated so I defined every drink for her. I was getting a line and she was being a bitch, but whatever, I was polite. She then told me she didn't want anything that tasted like coffee. I nearly facepalmed, but I ended up getting her a sugar free vanilla latte with almond milk. Hooray?

No, she called back half an hour later to complain to my manager that I'd been condescending and demanded he send her a $5 gift card because she was too busy to stop in the and the drink tasted like coffee. This manager looks like Sid from Ice Age and he caved, and I was so mad for the rest of the day that I threw things in the air going "I'm done! I'm done! I don't care any more! I'm done!" I didn't get in any trouble, because yeah, lady was a bitch, but I'm still seething. (The other managers aren't happy with him, so I don't feel as bad.)

I went grocery shopping after work, to try and get a win. I did get lots of veggies, fruit, and meat on sale, so I feel better. But then I went home, took a bite of something, and couldn't pull the fork out. Two of the tines had gotten stuck in the lining of my mouth under my lip. It didn't hurt, they just had to be pulled out slowly. I'm still like "WTF, how did that happen?" And pictured myself going to Urgent Care with a fork stuck in my mouth. I'm fine now, but yesterday was so stupid.

But I made Japanese-style Bulgogi tonight and it was good, so I'm OK. I'm OK. I hope you are too.
Chapter 55

Chapter Summary

Funerals, friendship, and near-death experiences.

Chapter Notes

There's some heavy bits in here, so warnings for discussions of death and suicide attempts.

You guys are so nice. I didn't mean to rant like that, but I hadn't rebuilt my mental armor to deal with stupid and it all came out like word vomit. Sorry!

Story got extended again. I know you're all shocked. I'm at like 460k and facepalming. But don't worry, I'm making notes for the Angst!AU and reshaping a few things. Because my headcanons just like to go wild.

A very intrepid anon put together a playlist. I am listening to it now. ヽ(●_●)ﾉ♪

You guys are so awesome and I'm making fist clenches and staring off into the distance overwhelmed by emotion. (Not sure which one, they are all kind of confusing.) :P

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was a bright and clear spring afternoon, sunny, but still chilly. You wore your funeral suit and walked alongside Gabriel and Tataryn. Diallo, Jesse, and Riggs were behind you. Genji and Hanzo were already seated in a row of folding chairs at the service site. Every Blackwatch agent that was not out on a mission should be here.

To your surprise, Lacroix and Amélie were already seated in the second row. Jack, Reinhardt, and Captain Amari were in the first row, where you, Gabriel, Tataryn, and the rest of his squad would sit.

It would not be a traditional Islamic service. Blackwatch had its own quirks. Sinaga had referred to himself as "Muslim-lite." He occasionally drank alcohol, borrowed money, and engaged in relations outside of marriage, but he abstained from pork and regularly attended a local mosque. The imam was not entirely comfortable presiding over a Blackwatch service, and though he was in attendance, it was an Islamic Overwatch chaplain who would be conducting the service. Sinaga had no family left outside of Blackwatch.

The casket was at an angle, facing southeast toward Mecca. In front of the chairs was a podium. There was a portrait of Sinaga in dress uniform, flashing a crooked smile at the camera. He had been young, close to Jesse's age, and no one had expected him to... Well, your obituary could read the same. You did not like how at every funeral, you ended up wondering about your own mortality.
What would they say? She did her best? She was a good agent? She liked cake? No one is surprised, she took stupid risks?

Everyone else did too; it's why most of the off-duty Blackwatch agents would be falling down drunk before dinner tonight. Sometimes it was easier not to talk or think about it. Maybe not healthier, but definitely more palatable.

You took a deep breath and schooled your face. Tataryn's jaw was clenched and Gabriel wore that blank officer expression that worried you just a little. You sat down beside Gabriel, not touching, but close enough. He was between Jack and you. And Diallo sat beside Tataryn, her hand on his shoulder, Sinaga's watch on her arm. She took it off then and placed it on Tataryn's wrist, and he let her, though he didn't look anywhere but at that flag-draped coffin.

You wondered then if Sinaga and Tataryn had been lovers, or if you just saw shades of your own life reflected in everyone else's. It didn't matter. Tataryn was mourning Sinaga, and that was real enough. Diallo was mourning Sinaga, and Vo... Well, where was Vo? You raised a brow, but said nothing. Vo didn't like social gatherings, but she usually made it to funerals.

"She wouldn't come out," Tataryn said, hoarsely, when he noticed you staring at the empty seat. "I couldn't make her."

"I'll talk to her afterward," you said.

"Just make sure she eats," he mumbled, staring down at his wrist.

There was praying, and Sinaga's imam read from the Qur'an as he sat beside the casket. It was closed, as per tradition, and not because of the state of the body. You knew, because, well, you knew things.

Gabriel spoke first. "I met Agent Sinaga late at night, on the streets of Surabaya, with his hands stuck in my pants."

There was a pause and some nervous laughter from people who did not know the story.

"He was trying to steal my wallet. I was impressed that he'd managed to get that close. I still punched him in the face for getting fresh with me-" The laughter was more confident. "-And then I offered him a job, because he was fast, smart, and actually the most well-mannered pickpocket I've ever encountered. Malik Sinaga went on to become one of our most decorated spec ops scouts. He managed to do translation work, supply logistics, and earn his MBA on the side. And while he lost his family to the attack on Java, he started a charity for other war orphans there, so I couldn't go back to the city and recruit them all. In lieu of flowers, he requested that the money be donated to that fund."

You knew that most of you would give and that the details would be sent out later.

"Most people won't ever hear about Agent Sinaga's heroics, about his actions at the invasion of Algiers, or the bombardment of Kandahar, or even the massacre at Shaki." Because of the mixed crowd, Gabriel only mentioned Overwatch operations. "But he was there for them all, and we will remember him, even if the world does not. Because we are Blackwatch: we do what we must, we do not forget, and we are always vigilant. De oppresso liber." He turned to salute the casket, then walked away from the podium.

Jack was up next, though he took a moment to clasp Gabriel's forearm in a manly hug, instead of saluting. It surprised you, and probably several of the other attendees, for different reasons, but Jack was actively trying to mend fences with Blackwatch.

As Strike Commander, he touched on sacrifice and honor, but focused on inspiration, talking about the good that Sinaga did and how he changed his corner of the world. It was a rousing speech, meant to lift spirits and remind everyone what they were fighting for. His speech did not quite apply to you, because sure, you were fighting to protect your people, but you were also here for revenge. You were going to make sure Talon, Petras, and all of their ilk paid for what they did at the Ninth Circle.

And then Tataryn was up, pale, but clean-shaven and dressed in a suit. He gave you a panicked smile and nearly tripped over his feet going up to the podium. You didn't laugh, because this was a funeral.

"I uh...after that lineup, I might be the only one who actually has to introduce himself. I am Fedor. I was Malik's direct superior, at least in rank." Tataryn took a steadying breath. "But he was the better singer. And cook. And he was very good at calligraphy, beautiful penmanship. It's a lost skill." Tataryn's voice wobbled and while some would think it nerves, you had seen Tataryn under pressure. This was grief. "Malik was a better man than most: honorable, kind, and trustworthy, which is why he always lost at cards." His eyes widened as he glanced at the imam, probably remembering then that good Muslims were not supposed to gamble.

There was a smattering of laughter.

"Korva! I mean... Malik was my friend. I do not have a lot of those left. He was a good man, and you can go a long time in a world like this without finding one of those. He was a soldier, yes, but he wanted to go back to Surabaya and teach children. He made me pecel lele and rawon, then laughed when it burnt my mouth. He was brave, clever, and talented, and we are poorer for his loss." He saluted then, back straight, and eyes hard. "Все, що було зроблено, зроблено, тепер ми повинні жити з наслідками. Вічна пам'ять."

He abruptly returned to his seat and the service continued.

When the time came, it was Jack, Gabriel, Tataryn, and Diallo who carried the casket to the gravesite. You and the other agents followed. This was done in silence, the burial beginning. Gabriel threw on the first shovelful of dirt, and Jack the second. Tataryn took a long look at the wooden box before adding to it. Diallo followed in suit. And then those in attendance had their turn. Because if Blackwatch was good at anything, it was burying things.

You sipped the jasmine tea and sighed. "Thank you. I needed this."

"It has been a trying day," Captain Amari said and broke out a packet of savory-sweet rice crackers. You accepted them gratefully.

"I have a problem."

"Mmm," was all she said, eyeing you carefully. Or like she was trying to hold back all observations about what your problem could be.

"It's purely professional," you clarified and she nodded, like she was expecting another sordid story about Jack and Gabriel and you wanted to say that not everything revolved around them, but then Gabriel was a periphery issue here and that invalidated your point. So you took a deep breath and laid the whole thing out for her. And then you ate too many rice crackers, because the crunchiness was addictive.

"I'm curious, you're one of the "wronged" parties. How do you feel?"

"...A little betrayed," you admitted. And you did not handle betrayal gracefully, or gently.

"So why the hesitation? We both know you're not cowardly."

You held the teacup in both hands, absorbing the warmth in your palms. "Doesn't feel right."

"And your other kills have?"

"Yeah. Mostly." You shrugged. "It's not a clear cut case. I think the difference is intent.
And my feelings kind of don't matter. I'm supposed to fix this and do what has to be done. That's the Blackwatch way."

"You need eliminate the leak, sure. But does that require a death?"

"...Maybe not. But that sends the wrong message. And honestly, someone else will probably get them. I could let nature take its course, but I can't pretend I don't have some responsibility there." You shrugged. "I don't have a good solution."

"And there are other aspects to consider. What kind of message are we sending to our own people?" Captain Amari leaned forward. "You have a point, Lucky. Give your endgame more consideration. Your time isn't limitless, but make sure you're at peace with whatever decision you make."

"Vo, it's me. I have food. Will you open the door?" You carried a tray.

There was silence.

"I have Nutella."

You heard something move inside the room. The door opened a crack.

"Can I come in?"

The door opened a little more, but not wide enough for you to enter. Sighing, you passed Vo one cafeteria croissant, slathered in Nutella. Her small hand snatched it from yours. There was a long moment, and finally she opened the door the rest of the way.

You knew better than to take off your shoes. While Vo's room wasn't packed full of things, she kept a lot of her supplies on hand. Nails, ball bearings, pipes - nothing explosive was allowed in her quarters any more, but you doubted that she actually followed that rule. Vo was a hoarder, and you'd found her packets concealed all around the base. As long as they were nonperishable, non-explosive goods, you left them alone.

Vo backed up and sat on the floor, wrapping herself in swathes of blankets. She was a small woman, her hair steely and bobbed. She was tiny, barely clearing four feet and too skinny, resembling a child or a gnome. She had a starburst scar on her left cheek, and wore her sleeves too long, either to hide the numerous scars or maybe because she was so small that none of the standard issue clothing fit properly. Her skin was leathery and tanned and she had heavy eyelids that made her look like she was always half asleep. She could have been anywhere from forty to seventy, you didn't have a clue. Vo didn't talk about her history, though evidently she'd somehow been cleared for Blackwatch.

Very carefully, you set the tray down in front of her. She eyed the jar of Nutella, the apple slices, and the croissants. "Porquoi?" She asked in her accented French, her voice rusty and soft.

"You missed the funeral," you said.

Vo shrugged, not making eye contact.

"Tataryn and Diallo were looking for you."

She shrugged again. "Trop de gens."

You sighed, rubbing your forehead. "It was a funeral: everyone in Blackwatch tries to show. It was nice, I guess. Gabriel spoke about meeting Sinaga and what he accomplished. Morrison gave a speech about making a difference. Tataryn talked about Sinaga as a person. It was a very well-rounded summary of a life. But yeah, it wasn't fun. I guess I can't blame you for skipping out."

"Il était gentil."

"He was a good guy," you said.

Vo took an apple slice and dipped it in the chocolate hazelnut spread. She tasted it, found it acceptable, and proceeded to eat the rest of the apple slices with varying amounts of Nutella. "Il serait vivant si je restais à Zurich."

You sighed. "That's not true. There's no guarantee Diallo could have reached him in time or even survived that onslaught. You leaving Zurich didn't change a damn thing and you certainly didn't get Sinaga killed."

"Qu'est-ce que tu sais?"

What did you know? Not enough, about saying the right thing, to be doing this on your own. "Vo, it's not your fault. No one is blaming you. And if they try, send them to me or Gabriel, OK? We'll straighten them out. That goes for Tataryn and Diallo. If they've said anything..."

Vo shook her head. You didn't think Tataryn or Diallo would have lashed out at Vo, but you also hadn't expected Tataryn to pick a fight with you.

You were not the best at handling Vo. She was not...like anyone else in Blackwatch, her needs very specific, and her behavior unabashedly child-like. Everyone in Blackwatch knew it, just like they knew it was in bad taste to point it out. But she built amazingly intricate bombs, capable of anything from leveling a building to harmlessly dispersing glitter throughout a room. She made things that you didn't know you needed as well as devices to your exact specifications, and really, even if she was fussy and eccentric, did you need any more out of a demolitionist?

Vo just stared at her tray.
"I'm sorry you're sad, Vo. I know words can't make it better. But sometimes talking about it helps."

She tore a croissant into pieces and proceeded to dip them into the Nutella. Vo refused to make eye contact with you, but that wasn't anything out of the ordinary.

"Tataryn was really upset. Got drunk and tried to get me to punch him yesterday. I didn't, obviously. But he was a mess. I made him some food."

Vo nodded. "Fedya not eat enough." Her English wasn't as fluent as her French, but it was a good sign when she used it with you.

"You don't eat properly either," you said. "Nutella is not a food group." You said it lightly, rather than as an admonishment. Vo didn't handle scoldings very well.

"If you make crunchy chicken again, invite me," she said, clearing her throat. "I like it. And banh xeo. Make banh xeo. I like that too."

"OK," you said.

"You can go now," she said. "I will take plate back. I will see Fedya and Fatou later."

"All right," you said knowing that plate would never make it back to the kitchen. "Please do. Tataryn is very sad and I think seeing you would help."

"Yes," she said solemnly, looking up at you, her eyes huge in that wizened face. "I will help."

You skimmed the highbrow science fiction that Gérard seemed to secretly favor. He projected an image of literate sophistication, but you could totally see him on his couch, perusing trashy novels, drinking wine, and reading the spicy excerpts to Amélie while they both laughed. His taste in sci-fi was still over your head.

You had read the collected works of Yoon Ha Lee, finding the underlying themes to be less about speculative science and more about human nature. You were coming to understand that all good sci-fi interwove those aspects. Though the outrageous tech like origami folding weapons and amputation guns did increase the entertainment value and gave you ideas about the kinds of things you should be requesting from R&D. You might try writing some proposals and see what happened. Most likely Torby would come to the office and break your ankles for wasting his time, but there was a miniscule chance you could inspire him to make something...catastrophic.

There were a great deal of improbably mathematics, double-dealing, and creative problem solving. Some of it was pure fantasy, neat solutions to hard problems, balanced and predictable like the Pythagorean theorem. Your life was never that orderly. But some of the ideas felt raw and realistic, like the extra few steps you had to take to find least common denominators to balance fractions and the use of imaginary numbers, involving concepts like the square root of negative one. They were twisty-turny and not entirely intuitive units, but they made sense after you looked at them sideways. They too were solutions to your equations, and you had to think a step deeper and sharper.
You weren't certain if you were stretching the facts to fit the situation or at least justify your concerns. But you did know that in this instance, it wouldn't hurt for you to explore other options and different angles to fix your problems. Because head-on confrontation and sneaky assassination were the exact things you were trying to avoid.

How odd.

You went for a run around the grounds. It was relaxing to just follow the walkways, able to set yourself on autopilot and just think. It would have been more relaxing to ask Genji or Jesse to spar, but you did not actually desire to speak with anyone right now. Funerals put all of you on edge, and you were better off leaving them alone while you collected your thoughts.

...In war, the ideal must be a bloodless engagement upon an empty battlefield.

You remembered that line from the book you read to Lao. At the time, you had not really understood it, taking it to be artistic pseudo-Zen sentiments. Both Lacroix and Gabriel had been pushing you to read things like The Art of War, The Book of Five Rings, and the Heiho Kadensho. You had finally given in, not because Gabriel recommended them, because he recommended a lot of books and you honestly could not keep up. Not just because Lacroix made you feel stupid for not knowing the literature by heart. But because once upon a time, Shin had those books on his shelf, though you had never picked them up or discussed them with him.

You didn't share your reasoning. You just read them on your tablet and tried not to get frustrated. They were deceptively simple books, with maxims that encompassed a lot of situations. Honestly, you couldn't take them literally, as warfare had changed since they were written, but when you looked at them sideways, you understood some of the principles behind the laws.

But the idea remained that open confrontation and death were a last resort, and once you reached that stage, you had already fucked up.

All right, how were you going to fix this now?

You bent over to tighten your shoelaces.

No one ever said you had to do it alone. And to be fair, you had not. You had asked for advice and you knew what you could not do. All right, you had to take that one step further. What were you trying to accomplish? And who could help you get there?

You rounded a corner, the Blackwatch dorms in sight.

Jack could. He had the power to make things happen. But that verged on nepotism and Overwatch could not be seen doing things in that fashion. As much as you were tempted to, you could not build on favoritism and there wasn't much Jack could directly handle outside of Overwatch. In fact, involving him would cause more trouble than help. For this particular problem, Overwatch had too many morals and Blackwatch had too few qualms but... Oh. There were other ways to get things done. You just weren't being flexible enough.

Huh. You didn't want to kill anyone. You wanted to stop the leak. And you wanted to take care of your friends. You applied the idea to your problem, twisting and angling till you had a tangible plan. It was neat. It upheld your goals. There was no contradiction.

Now you just had to convince everyone else.
"If you take all those, Gabriel will murder-eat you," you told Genji. "And I will let him."

Genji just snatched two more pieces of karaage off the cooling rack and dropped them into his rice bowl. "You're just too slow at this," he said. "We're hungry now."

Hanzo sat at the kitchen table, silently watching. He had a bowl of rice and oyakodon, which is what you had made for everyone else. Genji had a bowl of that and was still stealing your fried chicken. The karaage was for Gabriel, Jack, and Vo. Tataryn and most of Blackwatch were out getting drunk, so you could count on them not invading the communal kitchen.

Jesse leaned against the sink, waiting for you to turn back around so he could steal another piece without getting yelled at. You glared at him and he just tipped his hat at you.

Vo sat the table, occasionally shooting dirty looks at Hanzo.

"Look, if you want some, you can help make them. Otherwise, fuck off."

Genji rolled his eyes. "That's no fun."

"Shimadas don't cook," Hanzo said and you nearly threw the pot of hot oil at him.

"Shimadas who want to eat my cooking can help!" You jabbed your metal chopsticks at him. "Otherwise, they can find their own food!"

Hanzo wisely looked away, pretending like you weren't going to stab him in those judgmental eyes.

Vo silently ate her banh xeo. She'd wrapped the rice flour and coconut milk crepe around three pieces of karaage, and you'd managed to get some lettuce in there as well. She smacked her lips as she downed some of Jesse's tea.

Hanzo stared at her like she was an alien.

She just gave him a flat unfriendly look and took an aggressive bite out of her wrap. "Casse-toi."

"Je parle français."

"Quelle importance?" Vo crunched her chicken. "Je m’en fous."

"Stop bickering," you said. "Hanzo's a ninja. Vo's a demolitionist. This kitchen will not survive your clash and I'm trying to cook."

Vo gave you a mildly resentful look, but went back to eating. Loudly.

Hanzo stared at her in disgust.

"Have some tea, sweetpea," Jesse winked as he poured you a cup of hot water from the electric kettle. "It'll be fine. I'll keep these scavengers at bay."

"And in exchange, you just want some chicken?"

"I'm helping!" Jesse laughed.
You sighed and began dredging the marinated chicken: it had been sitting in a mix of soy sauce, garlic, wine, ginger, red pepper. Then you rolled it in rice flour. Then you wrapped strips of salted chicken skin around the meat and dredged it again. Once you had a plate full, you could start deep frying again. "I'll call Gabriel down here, don't think I won't-"

Genji just laughed and stole another piece. That was it. You had been working on this all afternoon for Gabriel and Jack. These parasites needed to stop now. He reached over again, obviously not taking you or your warnings seriously.

So you stabbed him in the arm with one of your chopsticks. It was the metal arm and the chopstick just got caught in the plating around the wrist joint, but he stared at the utensil, eyes wide, like he couldn't believe that you had done that.

"I will go for flesh next," you said, yanking out the chopstick.

There was a long moment of silence, interrupted only by Vo's loud eating.

"...I can wrap and flour the chicken," Genji said, looking between the chopstick and the raw chicken. "Just let me finish this bowl."

Rolling your eyes, you flipped another banh xeo and put it on Vo's plate. With Genji's superior manual dexterity, the process went faster, and while there wasn't nearly as much as you wanted, Jack and Gabriel would have to make do. They were fortunate to get any with this crowd hovering around.

You ate as you worked, refilling your small bowl of rice and occasionally wrapping the chicken in banh xeo. Shin had explained his process to you in loving detail, and you had yet to find a way to improve his recipe. The chicken was juicy and flavorful, the skin crispy, and served with the rice? It was incredibly satisfying. You packed a smaller container for Lao. Jesse could take it to her.

You packed a large container of rice for Jack and Gabriel, as well as one of banh xeo. You grabbed several leaves of lettuce and packed the chicken as well. It was best fresh, but some people around here actually worked and couldn't just get up and leave their stations.

Vo left as soon as she finished her food, stopping to pull faces at Hanzo as she exited.

Genji didn't even try to hide his amusement.

"You freeloaders can clean up. I'm done here."

"I have to deliver this to Agent Lao before it gets cold," Jesse said.

"I have an appointment with Angela," Genji said. "I cannot be late."

Hanzo stared at the pile of dishes in the sink. "Wait a minute-"

"Thanks, Hanzo. I knew I could rely on you, despite what Genji said," you called out over your shoulder. "I'll let Gabriel know you volunteered to clean up. He'll really appreciate it!"

And the three of you hightailed it out of the kitchen, before Hanzo could protest.
Gabriel grumbled as he served himself. You sat on his couch, the food spread out on the coffee table. Jack was due in soon.

"Bunch of thieving weasels," he muttered. "Taking my food. That damn ingrate..." You laughed as he angrily bit into his chicken.

"You could just help me guard the payload next time."

"Vo, the Shimadas, Jesse: I'll ship them all out to Antarctica tomorrow."

"You didn't eat earlier, did you?"

Gabriel shrugged. "No appetite before the funeral."

Your smile faded. "Of course."

Gabriel picked at the rice for a moment. "...Was it really necessary for you to hug Tataryn in front of everyone?"

You blinked. "It was a funeral. It wasn't inappropriate." You narrowed your eyes. "And yes it was necessary. A lot of people saw him call me out yesterday. I needed to show that there was no bad blood between us, that Blackwatch is united, especially in the face of tragedy. That seemed the simplest way to demonstrate it."

Gabriel sighed. "Yeah. All right. That's a good reason." He put down his bowl. "I'm not trying to tell you whom you can and can't be affectionate with. I just...there are already rumors about the two of you, and maybe it irks me that I can't be demonstrative with you and Jack in public. And I'm still grumpy from...everything. Sorry." He shook his head.

You straddled his lap and cupped his face. "It's OK. I get it."

"Do you?"

"Yeah." You kissed him gently. "You wanted to hug Tataryn too and maybe cop a feel. But you know that Jack and I will kick your ass," you said.

"...That's exactly it," Gabriel drawled. "Except I generally beat his ass, and you know it."

It didn't always go down like that, but you chose not to point that out. "Well, then I'll kick your ass. Jack will just watch and laugh."

Gabriel chuckled, leaning over to kiss your cheek. "You have nothing to worry about. Tataryn is pretty enough to look at, but I already have a pretty blonde boyfriend and a jealous dangerous girlfriend. That's enough for me."

The door opened and Jack walked in, tossing his jacket onto the kitchen chairs and kicking off his boots.

"I hate Petras. I hate the UN. Rocks can fall and they can all die," Jack muttered.

"I second that motion," Gabriel said.

You paused, taking a moment to picture the UN building buried under rocks. It was strangely soothing. You pictured Petras screaming while the stones piled on. Wow, that was therapeutic.
"If you want food, you better hurry," you said.

"Oh, what's that?" Jack squinted at the karaage. "Smells good."

"Help yourself," you said and Gabriel stifled a groan.

Jack vaulted over the back of the couch and grabbed a piece of chicken with his fingers. He sniffed it then popped it into his mouth. "Oh wow, that's delicious." His eyes widened and he grabbed a banh xeo then wrapped a few more pieces of chicken.

"This is really good. How come you've never made this for me before?"

You started laughing, a note of hysteria creeping into your voice, and Gabriel just sighed.

"Lucky, I'm sorry to intrude, but you are needed."

You yawned as Athena's voice roused you from your sleep. You were in Gabriel's bed, Gabriel curled against Jack's chest with you embracing him from behind. You were not very good at being the big spoon, but Gabriel had trapped your arm against his body. You weren't entirely comfortable, but you'd fallen asleep this way.

Athena was technically not allowed in Gabriel's quarters. You frowned.

"It's regarding Agent Nergüi Bayan."

"...Shit." You pulled free of Gabriel and he grumbled.

"I'm not hearing that damn AI in my bedroom, am I?"

"Mission critical alert. I got it." You kissed the back of his neck. "I was going to deal with it yesterday but with the funeral..."

Gabriel grunted, already falling back asleep.

"Need us for anything?" Jack mumbled.

"No." You did not want Gabriel there, for multiple reasons. "I can handle it. You guys rest."

"OK," Jack sighed and began to snore lightly.

You pulled on your clothes, putting your hair back and popping the coin sized comm unit in your ear. "Brief me."

"He's on the roof of the main building," Athena said. "He has been praying."

You ran out the door, down the hall, across the cafeteria, and rapid-pushing the elevator buttons before you realized that Athena was still talking.

"-no alcohol, but his behavior has been erratic for the past week and-"

"Get Genji on site. Tell him we might have a jumper."
"Genji is currently with Dr. Ziegler for maintenance," Athena said. There was silence. "He says he'll get it covered. I will...override the elevator protocols."

"...That doesn't sound safe," you said, shaking your head but not actually telling her to stop.

"We are just avoiding involving anyone else," Athena said. "You will still be traveling at scientifically safe speeds."

You did not want to ask what that meant. The elevator opened, and made a straight shot to the highest floor, stopping for no one. The roof access door was unlocked and you took a deep breath, hoping your backup got there in time.

You climbed the stairs and opened the door. It was still dark, though there were floodlights set up on the roof.

Bayan stood at the edge of the building in shadow, still in his blue scrubs, staring down, his back to you.

"Hey Bayan. It's kind of cold out. You should've brought a jacket. I should've brought a jacket." You crossed your arms and stepped onto the roof, the door slamming shut behind you.

He turned, not moving away from the low wall that edged this part of the roof. He was about six meters out. "I..." His voice was a raw whisper and you could not see his face. "What are you doing here?"

"Roof's a good place to think or drink. Maybe sneak a cigarette." You took another step. "I have to be careful. If Captain Amari catches me smoking, she'll gut me."

Bayan gave a humorless laugh. "Smoking will kill you. You should quit."

"At this point in my life, I'm far more likely to die from lead poisoning," you said, moving slowly.

"But the water- Oh you mean bullets. You're not funny," Bayan said.

"I'm hilarious," you said. You took another step. "So I came up here to sneak a cigarette. You want one? I won't tell Angela." One more step forward. Bayan was now three meters away.

"That's close enough," Bayan said sharply. "I don't smoke."

"I haven't lit up yet," you said, taking another step.

"They're terrible for you, even with all the chemical filtration and fiberweave filters," Bayan said.

"Well, if you were planning on jumping, I figured you weren't concerned about the health risks."

Bayan flinched and turned away from you. "Not another step Lucky. I'll do it and it'll be on your conscience along with Agent Lao and whoever else you're dragging along."

"Ouch," you said, and inched forward.

"That...that was cruel. I'm sorry." Bayan's voice was reedy in the wind. "It isn't your fault. I know Agent Lao wasn't your fault. I shouldn't' have said that."
"Agent Lao was my fault. You know her story, right? My old squad, presumed dead. Got picked up by the enemy. They did some shit to her. I found her, but...it took me too long to free her. She doesn't want anything to do with me now."

"She'll come around," Bayan said, back still to you. "When she woke, all she would do was ask me about you. I couldn't tell her you survived, but it was obvious that she still cares about you."

"Maybe. Maybe she just feels guilty about almost killing me."

"It wasn't just that," Bayan said.

"Still should've been there for her," you said.

"Not your fault," Bayan murmured. "You did your best. And you brought her home. " Your heart clenched, because even now, teetering on the precipice, Bayan was trying to be a healing influence.

He took a deep breath and tilted his head back.

"I know about your younger brother," you said quickly. "I know he got a job at one of Nguyen's tech companies here in Switzerland. I know about a month ago something bad happened. They didn't involve the police, but he called you for help. I'm assuming they leaned on him to get to you."

"...Blackwatch." Bayan shook his head, shoulders tight. "I'm not even going to ask how you know all this. But yes, Jalair was excited about the job at Pan Tek. They asked him to do some...unethical things: mostly falsifying documents. He's not proud of it, but then they turned around and nailed him for it. Threatened to prosecute. There was a lot of jail time on the table and my brother is only nineteen. They said I could make it go away. All they needed was a little medical information. They made it sound like corporate espionage. At first, I let myself believe that. It was innocent enough: what kind of cures were coming down the pipeline? Which supplier was Overwatch favoring and could they undercut them? Then they started asking about things they had no business knowing: Genji, Min, Lao, you."

"Why didn't you tell us?"

"They already have people within Overwatch. They knew where I went, what I was doing. They sent me pictures of Jalair in the center of crosshairs. I didn't know whom I could trust. Hell, for all I know, you work for them and are here to silence me."

You stood there for a long moment. "I am so glad you are a medic and not a spy. Because you are very bad at it."

Bayan gave a bark of laughter. "Even if you don't say it, we all know what happens to traitors. I know Ivanov and Montero didn't just quit."

"Yeah, Commander Reyes personally executed them both."

Honesty was your best policy, though it didn't feel like it. "They were taking money from terrorist groups and actually getting people killed. Different circumstances."

"...I've broken my oath, Lucky. I was here to help people. I was supposed to take care of my brother. I didn't mean to aid the enemy. I didn't—" He shook his head. "The damage is done. I can't do a trial. I can't shame my family, and once I'm dead, they'll have no reason to go after Jalair. This is the best way." He stepped onto the low wall.
"Your brother-"

"He'll be fine," Bayan said firmly. "After this, it will all be fine-"

You lunged then, hands grasping at air as he fell forward. Heart pounding in your ears, you snarled, already knowing you were too slow. You skidded to a halt, forcing yourself to look over the edge of the building, knowing that no matter what Bayan said, this failure would haunt you as much as-

Whumpf!

Something flew overhead and you blinked as Hanzo slammed Bayan onto his back against the roof tiles.

"You fool! If you killed yourself, your brother would not be fine! He would carry your death for the rest of his life! Suicide would fix nothing! If you are an honorable man you will throw yourself at the mercy of those you have wronged! You would atone for your sins!" Hanzo shouted, and you wondered how long he had been listening and if he'd actually tried doing any of those things yet.

Well, Genji had not complained about Hanzo to you recently. So maybe he had?

Bayan wheezed on the ground, because Hanzo had not saved his life gently.

"Come on, let's get him to a holding cell." You patted him down for weapons and found nothing.

"Please-" Bayan's voice broke. "No trial. Make it quick. If you ever meant it when you said we were friends-" The painful desperation in his words made you flinch.

"We're still friends," you said with a sigh. "But now we've got some problems to work out."

Chapter End Notes

Trying to work out the kinks in a new minor arc. It's making me mad. I know I'll sort it out, but right now it's like "...RAWR."

I finally showed Vo, I know. She's been mentioned for chapters and finally got a real appearance. Bayan's arc is coming to a head. Hanzo is trying.

It was nice and warm all weekend, and today it is snowing. Snowing big honking pellets. I made beef stroganoff with miso and goat cheese, because I watched a cooking video with a subpar version and wanted to do it right. Got estimates for doggy surgeries. About what I expected. One has a sebaceous cyst, which isn't a big deal. I'll probably hold off a few months, because the other has a fatty tumor/possible hernia and it's in an inconvenient spot. But other than that, the jerks are healthy.
Chapter 56

Chapter Summary

Consequences, for all.

Chapter Notes

Stephychanng made another compilation of the music!anon's playlist. I enjoyed it. :D

See the end of the chapter for more notes

You made Hanzo breakfast for a job well done. And you were pleasantly surprised to find the sink empty of dishes. Whether he actually hand-washed them, loaded the dishwasher, or threw them away, you weren't sure. But your skillet looked clean, so you cooked omurice with the leftover rice and made mentaiko sauce, while Hanzo sipped some of Jesse's oolong tea.

"Thank you for the assist," you told him as you put the food in front of him. The seasoned rice and chicken had been covered in a sheet of egg. You decorated it with kewpie mayo, ketchup, furikake, and put the savory mentaiko cream on the side. "I was too slow and-"

"You called for backup. Genji asked me to come. He informed me of the protocol." Hanzo bowed his head. "It went exactly to plan."

"...You're right," you said. Because one person would not have been enough. "Thanks, though. I uh...I have enough guilt. I didn't want Bayan's death on my conscience."

"Will they kill him?" Hanzo asked as you made yourself a plate. He hadn't touched his food yet.

You poured yourself some tea. "I hope not. I took over this op because I didn't want to have to kill him."

"He made a mistake and it snowballed. He...tried to protect his brother. That is admirable." Hanzo waited for you to take a bite before he started eating. He'd seen you cook it, it obviously wasn't poisoned- Oh. This was polite Hanzo showing manners and waiting for you. Huh.

You sat back in your chair. "I know. Lacroix is debriefing him now. We've already sent a team to pickup the brother. He can't stay, though. As much as I like him, that's not a good idea."

"It sets a bad precedent," Hanzo agreed. "This is...good. Thank you."

"Yes, and you're welcome." You sighed. Of course, Hanzo would see shades of his own life in that story, if only because Bayan stood by his brother when Hanzo did not. "He still should have come to one of us in the beginning. If not me, then Angela or Gabriel." You shook your head and ate your food. You would make more for Gabriel and Jack, and maybe there was still time to salvage this.

"Commander Reyes is not known for being...merciful to traitors."

"...True," you said.

"I don't think he should die," Hanzo said.

"Me neither." You took another bite. "If you want to help, there are still things you can do."

Hanzo gave you a firm nod, hair streaming down his shoulders, fire in his gaze. "I will assist."

You just smiled, because you knew he wouldn't like this plan once he heard it, just like you knew that he wouldn't back out now that he'd committed to this course of action.

"No, absolutely not." Gabriel set his chopsticks down. "That's a terrible idea."

"So you'd rather have a messy circus of a trial?" You sat on his desk. Lacroix had pulled up a chair and sat there with a satisfied smirk on his face.

"No trial necessary. He admitted to everything. We can just take him out back and-" Gabriel trailed off.

"Vo is really fond of him," you said.

"Then we can ship him off to-"

"And there are extenuating circumstances."

"He should have come to us," Gabriel said sharply.

"I agree. That's why he should lose his job, but not his life. I don't want him in prison where Nguyen can reach him either. He did minimal harm, and it was under coercion." You sipped your coffee. "The brother corroborates the story and Ziv is taking a break from penal pushups to hack Pan Tek. If we can verify the story, well, I'd advise that yes, we make an example of Bayan. We spin it that we could have saved his job if he just worked with us."

"And I think Chanceux's plan is really quite elegant," Lacroix said, sounding pleased. "She has handled this investigation deftly."

You frowned, realizing that Lacroix had given you two compliments. You waited for the other shoe to drop.

"And our hands are clean if they decide to execute-"

"No, Lacroix, that's not what we're doing," you scowled.

Lacroix pursed his lips. "Of course not. Someone else is doing our dirty work."
"No, Lacroix, that's not what we're negotiating for."

He crossed his arms and rolled his eyes. "I take it back. Chanceux is stupidly sentimental and ruined a perfectly good plan by inserting maudlin drivel into it. I vote we keep her away from Jack and Reinhardt. They are a disgusting influence."

"Would you be doing this if he wasn't your nurse when you were in the infirmary?" Gabriel asked, leaning back in his chair.

"...Probably not. I mean, the facts of the case don't warrant a death sentence. But would I have taken on the extra work? No. But you're the one who tells me not to dwell on speculation. I took the op. I did the work. And this is my recommendation."

"I will admit, this isn't what I expected from you," Gabriel said after a moment. "I thought you would just take him out back or let him fall off the roof."

"That would have attracted too much attention. Obviously, he wanted us to investigate posthumously. He left a very detailed note."

"...So you're saying "don't kill him" that's what he wants?"

"No, I'm saying he doesn't deserve to die, and I like him, and other people like Angela and Vo like him, so we should tread carefully."

Gabriel exhaled slowly. "Is this forgiveness?"

"I think so," you said, though there was not much to forgive. But it was a step in the right direction and you let yourself have that.

Gabriel pondered that. "That's...more progressive than I was expecting."

"...You're the one who sent me to therapy. It's your fault."

Lacroix laughed at you both. You weren't sure how you could tell, you just knew.

Gabriel ignored him. He looked at Bayan's dossier. Then at you. Then at the wall. He took a deep breath, and from the loosenning of his shoulders, you knew you'd won. "Run it by Ana. If she approves, then I won't contest it."

"This is the only way?" Hanzo asked. He was dressed in his formal kyudo-gi, nipple exposed, and yes, that would help make your case.

The two of you sat in front of the camera. "If you have a better idea, please let me know. But this is the plan Gabriel and Captain Amari approved. Everything else was imprisonment, or a doubletap to the back of the head, or leaving him in the open where Nguyen can reach him."

Hanzo sat there for several minutes. "...I have nothing."

"If you don't feel comfortable-"

"I said I'd do it," Hanzo said tightly.
"All right then. I'll explain. You appeal. Got it?"

"...Yes."

You opened the line.

"Lucky! And Hanzo! Wow! And that is a really nice kyudo-gi. Have I ever told you how awesome your tattoo is? Like seriously. Is the artist a Shimada exclusive or do you think I could get him to ink me too? Not the same design of course, that would be tacky as fuck. Me copying you. Not your tattoo design." Fen sat in an egg-shaped chair eating shrimp chips. She was wearing a conservative navy blue suit and sensible shoes.

"Is this a bad time?"

"Nope. You just saved me from a meeting with the cousins about how to divvy up Fa's research projects. Honestly, they were mostly dumb and boring. I'm happy to let most of them die in development hell. But yeah, official Overwatch business totally trumps their petty concerns!"

Feng grinned. "What can I do for you today?"

You explained the Bayan situation, and to her credit, and your surprise, Feng didn't interrupt. She just nodded, shouted things then covered her mouth, and began to scribble notes.

"So...did you want me to arrange for an accident or...?"

"No!" Hanzo snapped. "We want you to hire him."

"...Wait, whaaaaaaaat?" Feng narrowed her eyes. "You want me to invite a known-traitor into my house? Like, this is a fucking Triad, a goddamn secret society! Not some kind of corporate free-for-all! Yeesh."

"We want him out of Nguyen's reach. He was an exemplary medic till they leveraged his family." You paused there to let Feng digest that. "I'll forward you his service record."

Feng began to spin in her chair as she read. "Oh, he's cute. Good bedside manner. Excellent nurse. Worked on Dr. Ziegler's advanced cybernetics augments program. Not too shabby." Feng paused. "And you want me to take the brother too?"

"We don't want him extradited if Nguyen tries to get them back."

"Paralegal, fluent in Mongolian, English, French, and Chinese, specializes in international IPR... Hmm. Actually, the brother is a good candidate too." Feng gave you a shrewd look.

"We wouldn't send you incompetents," you said.

"I guess not. So what happens if I say "no"? Because I'm not convinced this is a good idea." Feng crossed her arms. "Will that affect our alliance?"

"No. You asked me to find you some people. I did. It's a nonzero sum game. You get good employees, with some black marks, but who will owe you their lives, and I'm fine making them contractually stay with you-"

"Not indefinitely, and you cannot mistreat them," Hanzo said.

Feng raised a brow. "You really want me to do this."

"Yes," Hanzo said. "He did it for his brother. That is something...admirable. And something I think you understand."

    Feng tilted her head back. "I see."

    "I...would take it as a great favor if you did us this kindness," Hanzo said formally. "You are the only one we can turn to and the only one we can trust to handle this correctly."

    Feng blinked. "Wow, those are the most polite words I've heard you string together, ever. Like who are you and what'd you do with Grump-Grump Hanzo?"

    Hanzo winced, like this conversation actually caused him physical pain.

    You smothered a snort.

    "Joking aside, I see that you are very serious and that changes things. Can I confer with Lucky for a moment?" Feng leaned forward, expression suddenly neutral.

    Hanzo glanced at you in confusion. "I will step out." The door clicked behind him.

    "...Do you really want me to spare them?"

    "Yes. I would have said otherwise."

    "Huh." Feng studied your face.

    "I can do my own killing," you said.

    "Hanzo really wants to save this guy, huh?"

    "Yup." You yawned. "Bayan jumped off the roof. Hanzo caught him and dragged him back up. Then proceeded to yell at him about honor, redemption, and brotherhood. I'm not sure that helped matters, but it was quite the demonstration."

    Feng's eyes widened. "That's so dramatic. I didn't realize I'd have to put him on suicide watch. Well, I'd keep him under close surveillance and away from weapons anyway, so it's not like it's an extra hardship. Hmm...And all this is true?"

    "I wouldn't lie to you at this point, Feng. I'd just leave out information. But in this case, I didn't."

    "I appreciate the honesty. It's an important aspect of any friendship." She studied her nails. "I notice that you didn't mention that part of our relationship."

    "...This is business. I'm not going to leverage our friendship for that." Which was kind of true. "I'm inclined to trust you because of it, sure. But I'm not using that against you. Anyway, while I like Bayan, Hanzo's really stuck on this. I'm certainly not using him as leverage either. He's genuinely invested."

    "I can tell." Feng shook her head. "And I guess if I say "no" he'll be salty at me when we go out to dinner."

    "It'd be bad form, but probably," you agreed. "I figured you'd like the chance to do Hanzo a favor. It's taken me months of work to get him to be civil. You had him behaving right off the bat."

    Feng chuckled, clapping her hands together. "I see what you did there, Sneaky Pants. Very clever. If I do this, I win some approval from Hanzo. And then I have you to thank for it."

You shrugged. "Every once in a while, I get something right."

"I like it. You're right, it's a win-win. And they do look good on paper. I'll give them a chance and if they fuck up I'll just send them off to a minor, less profitable business. And if they really fuck up, well, I can't keep them." She gave you a grave look.

"Fair," you said.

"Hanzo! You can resume listening!" Feng shouted.

You rolled your eyes and got up and went to the door. Hanzo loitered in the hallway, glaring at cowering Overwatch agents who passed by. You gestured for him to come back into the comm room.

"OK, Hanzo. I'll do it for you," Feng said. "And I'm not asking for anything in return. You don't even have to come to dinner. Though Genji RSVP'd for both of you and I'll admit, I'll be salty if you don't make it, because Caridad's is a pain to get reservations for."

"...That is the new Cuban-Chinese restaurant in Shanghai, right? It looked interesting," Hanzo said. "I will attend, provided I am not needed for a Blackwatch operation. Most of my involvement has been...unplanned."

Feng beamed at you. "Oh. Cool. Well, I'll uh...I'll make arrangements for...your people. My people? Whatever. If this goes well I might even have to pay you a headhunting bonus."

She didn't specify if that was for Bayan or Hanzo, and you decided not to ask.

Lacroix waited for you in the hallway. You waived Hanzo off and he actually looked relieved.

"Judging by your expression, your proposal was a success."

"Yup." You crossed your arms. "Here to disparage my grievous amount of ethics?"

"Not at all. I said all that pseudo-Machiavellian drivel purely for Gabriel's benefit. He likes to be the white hat occasionally, you know."

Lacroix claimed he was being a dick, so Gabriel would realize that killing Bayan was dickish, and change his stance. You squinted at him, not entirely buying his argument. "I don't know what actually goes through your brain, Lacroix."

"Mystery keeps the romance alive," he said.

"Now you're just baiting me," you said, as he fell into step beside you. "So, what is it really?"

"Ziv has acquired an interesting batch of documents from Pan Tek. Some of them verify your nurse's story. Others tell a very interesting, if unrelated tale. Things going back to Hanoi and also our new favorite UN delegate."
"...You're not going to tell me about them in the hallway."

"I'm still reviewing the data. I'll share after I've formed a better picture of the situation. I just came by to see how your operation went."

"I can't complain. I got what I want, and once I get Gabriel's go-ahead, I'll give Bayan the good news."

"Good job, Chanceux," Lacroix said brightly and handed you a cigarette.
You tucked in your front pocket. "That's condescending as fuck, you know."

"I can take it back."

"...You can try."

"It's true that you did good work. Whether or not you choose to accept the compliment is up to you."

"I can never tell how sincere your compliments are," you admitted.

"You've managed to solve the leak, strengthen our ties with On Sing, deny Nguyen retribution, keep Angela and Min happy, and used the elder Shimada to do it." Something like pride colored his tone. "It was a elegantly maneuvered. I won't even comment on how soft you are to jump through all those hoops for someone who doesn't deserve it." Well, there it was, the critique. You weighed it against the positive bulk of the statement. Huh. OK, it seemed Lacroix probably meant this compliment.

"Nowhere in the Espionage Handbook does it say that I have to make every decision broody, ruthless, and painful. Sure, I'm bending the rules, but isn't that our prerogative in Blackwatch?"

"Sentimentality is considered a weakness, Chanceux."

"Being ruthless, because you're afraid to be seen as weak, isn't strength."

"Obviously, but you have to be aware of how your adversaries read your actions."

"Fair. I see letting Bayan live as a great big "fuck you" to Nguyen. Not only are we better than you, you can't touch him. Also, your plan didn't work, we're not bringing down morale, and we're still the better people. Suck it."

Lacroix laughed. "Now you are just making things up."

"Maybe, but buzzwords and toxic intel community standards aside, aren't we trying to guarantee the best outcome? Doesn't that sometimes take some creative problem solving? We're black ops agents, Lacroix. We don't blindly follow anyone else's rules. After all, what's the point of having questionable morals, if they don't make you happy? If you're just going to feel bad about everything you do, you might as well stick to conventional thinking and methods. Join one of those self-flagellating religions while you're at it. Ugh."

Lacroix blinked, his mouth open, but no words coming out, like you'd genuinely shocked him. He closed his eyes, opened them, and then he reached into his front pocket and handed you the whole pack of cigarettes.
You made your way down to the holding cell and were slightly surprised to find Tataryn and Vo waiting outside. Vo glared up at you, her anger twisting her features, making her resemble a very sinister lawn gnome. Tataryn placed a hand on her shoulder. She snapped her teeth at him, but he looked at you.

"How bad?" Tataryn's accent was heavier than usual and you realized you were used to the flippant and cheerful Tataryn. His grave expression surprised you. You knew he liked Vo, but you now realized that he liked Bayan as well.

"We're not taking him out back with a shovel," you said, looking at Vo. "And we're not putting him through a lengthy trial. But he can't work here any more."

Vo actually hissed at you, and shook off Tataryn's hand. "Not send him away!"

You gave Tataryn an irritated look. What was he thinking bringing Vo here?

"It was that or let Gabriel do something drastic. He and his brother are going to go work legitimately for an On Sing company, no accidents, no espionage, and protection from Nguyen. I've had to work very hard to broker this deal, and let me tell you, it was the best outcome I could arrange."

"Nguyen? Nguyen Anh?" Vo snarled.

"...Yeah."

Vo spat on the floor and stalked off. You stared at the glob of saliva on the ground, wondering, not for the first time, how Vo processed information.

You glanced up at Tataryn, and he shrugged. "She was coming to see him no matter what anyone said. I thought you wouldn't want to deal with her on your own."

"Yeah, well...yeah. Thanks." You shook your head. "It's the best I could do. He gets to live and he gets a decent job that offers protection, provided he doesn't slip up."

"...Min will calm down. She just needs time." Tataryn sighed. "I am glad to hear it, Lucky. I had feared the worst."

"If he'd been profiting off this arrangement, I would have killed him myself. But that wasn't the case." You shook your head. "It's still messy."

The door opened and Angela walked out shaking her head. She gave you swift nod and kept going, muttering under her breath in German.

Bayan sat in the chair resting his head on the table. From the rumpled state of his scrubs to the bags under his eyes, he looked as exhausted as you felt. His cuffed hands were in his lap, and he raised his head when you walked in, blinking rapidly.

"I don't think Angela will ever speak to me again."

"...She'll probably get over it. She just needs time and two, maybe three more capable nurses to replace you with."
Bayan stared at the table. "My brother didn't-"

"I know."

"I never meant-"

"I know."

"I fucking hate it when you don't let me finish my sent-"

"I know." You grinned.

Bayan huffed. He turned his attention to Tataryn. "Where's Min?"

"She got mad at Lucky and stormed off. She'll be back." Tataryn leaned against the wall and you sat down.

"How did you know?" Bayan asked after a moment.

"You wore your guilt on your face," you said. "Honest men make terrible spies, unless they're flexibly honest men. Which you aren't."

"Thanks. I think." Bayan wrinkled his nose at you.

"Good news or bad news first?"

"Bad news."

"You're fired." You shook your head. "Should've gone to Angela or Commander Reyes. They were the least likely to be corrupt." Because if Angela was working for them, they wouldn't have needed Bayan.

"...I kind of figured. Angela said as much." Bayan gave a heavy sigh. "Lost my job and a good friend. Don't tell me it's going to get worse..."

"Possibly? That's up to you. Here's the good news. There will be no trial and you aren't getting arrested or executed, and neither is your brother." You folded your hands in your lap. "I know Nguyen will go after you if you stay in Switzerland. So I've made arrangements. How would you like to work for one of On Sing's legitimate businesses?"

"That's rhetorical, isn't it?"

"He's quick, Lucky. He might still learn to be a spy." Tataryn chuckled.

"Nah, he's still too nice. Hanzo called in some personal favors and Zhai Feng is willing to shelter you in exchange for you being an excellent employee. The offer extends to your brother as well."

Bayan gave you a long look. "...Am I supposed to survive this employment?"

"Why does everyone keep asking me that? For fuck's sake, I've spent my morning trying to keep you alive, you moron. I could have gone back to bed! Or at the very least I could have avoided arguing with the commander! If we wanted you dead, we would do it ourselves. Blackwatch takes care of its own problems. We don't need to farm you out to a friendly Triad."

Bayan had the grace to look embarrassed. "I...yeah. You're right. I'm not good at thinking
"So those are your options. Go out in the world and try to hack it on your own - I don't suggest it because Nguyen has long reach. Or take On Sing employment which includes a reputable job, fair compensation, and protection for you and your brother. Either way, you need to be out of Switzerland soon."

"...I've heard of Zhai Feng in passing. I thought she was some kind of eccentric heiress and tech mogul."

"That too," you agreed. "And she's a pretty OK girl. But she'll kill you if you betray her, so...I'm just going to put that out there for you and your brother."

"I'll need to talk to Jalair, but...this is far better than I expected. Thank you." He looked at you with warm damp eyes and you rubbed the back of your neck.

"Just don't do it again. I can't save you from Feng. And you should probably thank Hanzo before you go. I know it's a shock, but he actually has feelings underneath all that nitpicking bitchiness. They're pretty underdeveloped and kind of squishy, but they're there."

"I...You know, you throw a lot of information at a guy. I don't even know where to start."

"Get used to it. Feng is ten times worse than me."

Bayan gave you a pained smile. "Oh. OK."

"Like a rabid hamster with ADHD," you said. "Oh, I guess that's not very reassuring. She's pretty decent. Just...you know, let her talk and ask questions when she takes a breath. Maybe take notes."

"...I'll thank Hanzo, don't worry. I...Angela really let me have it. I think she was more upset about the roof thing than my...betrayal."

The "roof thing" was an interesting way to reference his suicide attempt. "Feng is aware of your...stress levels," you said.

"I'm sorry for the things I said. They were really shitty. But...I don't think you're going to have to worry about that. I...cracked under pressure. Maybe it's for the best that I'm leaving."

"Bayan, you stared too closely at the problem for too long until you couldn't see any other options. If you'd taken a step backward and gotten a second opinion, you'd have realized that. It was a matter of perspective and yours was shortsighted. It's another reason you'd make a bad spy. Contrary to all those terrible movies I'm sure you've seen, death is not absolution. You have to solve those soul-crushing problems creatively, and self-destructing is not a particularly clever or effective resolution. You were in over your head, but you're not broken," you said. "Things will get better, just don't try to go it alone, idiot."

Tataryn snorted.

"Your pep talks are strangely touching, Lucky. Not too sweet, not too bitter, with plenty of salt and sourness."

"The best foods in life are complex," you said. "And by complex, I mean "cake." In case you were wondering. I'm no expert, but I think you'll be OK, you just need time and maybe an opinion gentler than your own."
Bayan nodded. "I...yes. Maybe you're right."

"Great. And now I have the unenviable task of figuring out how to cheer Vo up."

"...Chocolate," came the raspy voice. Vo slunk into the interrogation room and made a beeline for Bayan. She patted his arm. "Want you to stay."

"I can't," Bayan said. "I made a bad mistake and now I can't stay. I'm sorry. But I can write you. Call. Send snacks."

Vo gritted her teeth. "How bad? I blew up someone's room once. Killed her bugs. Made her cry. They not send me away."

"...Very bad in a very different way, Min. Lucky and Hanzo got me out of a tough spot. Please don't be mad at them."

Vo took a deep breath, resting both hands on top of her head. She took another steadying breath and then turned to you, brow furrowed. "He will send me things. If he stops, we need to go investigate."

"You hear that? You have to send Vo regular care packages. It's part of your penance."

Bayan gave a hoarse laugh. "All right."

"Maybe if he's good we can arrange visits, OK?" You immediately regretted the suggestion because who knew how Vo would react to Feng?

Vo nodded. She turned back to Bayan. "Be good. I will make you a present."

Bayan nodded. "No property destruction please."

"Glitter," she said.

"That's OK."

With that, Vo turned on her heel and walked out.

"Fucking Nguyen," you said, shaking your head. "The sooner we do something about her, the better."

"You know I never dealt with anyone named Nguyen." Bayan shrugged. "But judging from the look on your face, I should not ask questions."

"...I read your debrief. We have all those other names on file." You glanced at Tataryn. "Hey, what do your weekend plans look like?"

"Let's see: I have two hot dates, a potential orgy, and at least one session of steamy, mindless, no-strings-attached sex, but other than that, I am free."

"You want to go out and get some good old fashioned petty revenge?"

Tataryn's smile was a cold hungry thing, his eyes flat and looking through you. "I thought you would never ask."
"Now that you have progressed onto subtler methods, I have a job for you. We will be making contact with Kwento in two weeks."

You sipped your coffee and lit a cigarette.

Lacroix patted his front pocket, and frowned, suddenly recalling that he had given all his Gitanes to you.

"You will be accompanying Amélie to the party in Lyon."

"Bodyguard?"

"Date." Lacroix smirked.

You choked on your coffee and it was a few seconds before you could stop your coughing fit. Lacroix just sat by smugly, the points of his mustache mocking you.

"I uh...was not expecting that." You raised a brow as Lacroix extended an open palm. "Oh, you want a cigarette? Tell me your clever plan first."

Lacroix actually rolled his eyes at you. Which was kind of your thing. Huh. "You're just going to set up a meeting. You don't even have to do the talking. This is a practice run. You begin your foray into polite society, and we can gauge how much progress you've made."

"...Can I wear a suit?"

"No."

"Can I-"

"For every foolish question you ask, you get another hour of finishing school practice," Lacroix said. "Now give me a cigarette and I'll pretend you're not making that ridiculous face."

Sighing, you handed him a cigarette.

"So I have blackmail on all four of these guys, courtesy of Ziv," you said. "How far do you want to take this?"

"Boom," Vo said.

"...I'll vet that," Tataryn said, looking down at her with a wry grin.

"I have no objection to permanent solutions." Hanzo poured everyone tea. "Is this kind of unsanctioned operation common?"

You held up your hand and wiggled it from side to side. "Don't ask, don't tell, don't get caught."

"Don't get caught doing what, agent?" Gabriel growled as he entered the kitchen. Vo immediately disappeared behind Tataryn. Hanzo stiffened.

"Don't get caught borrowing Jesse's tea sachets. He doesn't count them, but if you get greedy, he'll notice."

Gabriel did not smile. "Out, all of you. And if I get so much as a hint that you've been taking on unsanctioned missions, you will be having a visit to Coronado for a very special training session, courtesy of SEP Sergeant Ray Chang."

Hanzo, Tataryn, and Vo dutifully filed out.

"Gabriel-"

"You don't get to just run amok, agent. I don't care how much Nguyen's people deserve it. This leak was a big problem and while I'd love to escalate the fight, Overwatch needs to be circumspect," Gabriel scowled, obviously parroting someone else's words.

"...We have names, Gabriel. Are we just supposed to sit on that?"

"What did you have in mind, beside bloody murder?"

"...That. But I can...adapt. We are Blackwatch, we are petty, and we liked Bayan. We need an outlet, Gabriel."

"...I'm listening," he said.

"So what if we...just made their lives miserable? I mean, I have blackmail material on most of them, sure. But we can start small: slash their tires, laxative their coffees, put dead fish in their air vents. Little things. Till they wish for the sweet sweet release of death..."

"Huh." Gabriel raised a brow. "You are petty."

"...Yes," you agreed, and very wisely did not point out that he had no room to judge.

"I'll...think on it."

You kissed his cheek. "It'll be fun. Blackwatch fun!"

"...I said I'll think about it," he scowled.

You just smiled up at him. "You're invited too. We'll call it the Blackwatch Petty Prank Club and it will be a training exercise, morale booster, team cohesion builder. And there can be snacks."

Gabriel just gave an exasperated sigh. But he would give in, you knew it. He couldn't resist snacks.

---

Getting up at 4AM was about as fun as you expected. You drank your coffee, muttered angrily to yourself, and checked your gear. You couldn't afford to look weak or silly in front of the new recruits. Today you would be lecturing, briefly, about what not to expect from black ops missions: fame, fortune, or bragging rights. You figured you'd cover some of the downsides like trauma, paperwork, and the frequentness of bad hygiene. They didn't have hot showers on surveillance runs and when it came to close combat, the blood got everywhere.

And then there were the exercises. You didn't have to run alongside them, thankfully, but you had to be outside yelling at them and reminding them not to eat rocks off the ground or whatever stupid things cadets did.

You got to the classroom, a little annoyed to see Tataryn looking polished and professional in a Blackwatch henley and khakis, a bright smile on his stupid pretty face. Worse, it looked like all twenty rookies, uniforms pressed and starched, were sitting straight in their seats, watching you attentively.

"Ah, Agent Strike." Tataryn smirked at you, and you suddenly had the urge to punch him the face. "I was just informing the recruits of your high standards. Please remember that they are new, and none of them have formally petitioned to join our black ops programs, so perhaps you can go a little easy on them?"

You blinked, your gaze sharpening. Did he make you the bad cop? Really? Well, it was too late to change it now. Damn, you should have gotten here first. You remembered Captain Patel, the brusque way she cut through protocol and while she didn't use fancy words, she didn't bully anyone either. She went straight to the point, and while you weren't like that, not with all your espionage training, you could still mimic her demeanor.

"Agent Tataryn, we are not here to babysit children. We are an elite fighting force. These recruits are supposedly the best of the best. If they don't have the mettle for our black ops programs, I'm not wasting my time coddling them. Either they make it on their own merit or they don't make it at all."

To their credit, your class didn't shrink, murmur, or complain. Their eyes just got rounder and they leaned forward attentively.

Tataryn's shit-eating grin also got bigger.

"Yes, ma'am." He saluted you, and you had to quash the urge to feed him his teeth. You really hadn't had enough coffee for this.

It was unnerving having twenty pairs of eyes focused on you every time you moved or spoke. Most of them were young - had you ever been that young? Chronologically, sure. That stupid, also a yes, but not that earnest, that bright-eyed and hopeful. At least you didn't think you had been. Maybe Captain Patel would have told another story.

They hung on to your every word, as you explained the actual types of ops that Overwatch ran. You didn't mention Blackwatch by name, choosing instead to keep to the military classifications. After all, Overwatch did plenty of top secret operations that were ethically-sound, just sensitive.

"...Any questions?" You asked, after what you were certain was a boring lecture. Hell, you just summed everything up as, "If you have to fight, someone's screwed up along the way. But if you have to fight, you fight to win."
"Is it true you took down an omnic assassin in single melee combat?" One girl asked timidly. They had their names embroidered on their uniforms, which was useful.

"What the hell does that have to do with anything that I just said, Jeong?"

"Ma'am, sorry, ma'am. Uh...Agent Shoal said to ask you about it. She cited it as an example of black ops tactics versus conventional squad tactics."

...Goddamnit, Shoal. You hadn't realized she was teaching too. You were going to have words with her.

You could see Tataryn still wearing that smug, oh so punchable grin, a few trainees shooting him admiring glances.

You ran through your knowledge of Cobblestone Dust. What the hell had Shoal been thinking? "The details of that mission are classified. I'm going to cite that as an example of black ops discretion versus conventional squad braggadocio. You don't get to tell everyone what you've done."

You expected Jeong to deflate, but you saw her eyes widen with something like awe. "Oh, of course, ma'am. I understand, ma'am. My apologies, ma'am."

Oh god, you'd just confirmed it. You resisted the urge to facepalm.

Another rookie raised his hand. Maeda Vargas: he was lean and very tan, excitement gleaming in his eyes.

You were getting a headache now, and you wondered if one of them would just challenge you to single combat so you could intimidate them into silence and good behavior. "Yes?"

"Ma'am, I think what Jeong meant to ask was, do you have any tips for facing down omnics in single combat?"

"Yeah, don't do it. It's stupid and a good way to get yourself killed," you scowled.

Tataryn fidgeted beside you, looking entirely too gleeful.

Another one, Forrester, raised her hand, and you realized then that you would probably have to learn their names eventually, because they wouldn't always be labeled. Goddamnit. "Yes?" You asked, wishing for more coffee.

"What about cyborgs, ma'am?"

You slowly turned your head to give Tataryn a hard look.

He was smiling so wide that you could probably fit both your fists in his mouth.

You almost yelled at them then, but you stopped, turning some ideas over in your head. All right, they wanted knowledge? You could give it to them and increase their chances of survival. Fine. Because you were never going to get anything done if they just fixated on your checkered background. And, if they were motivated... Hmm.

"It seems like you want me to cover information not given in the basic lesson plan."

Multiple heads nodded vigorously at you, their enthusiasm almost painful.
"If you can cover the assigned work, and we can finish it in a timely manner, I will make some unconventional additions to the class. If you can't handle the basic course material, then you're just wasting everyone's time."

At this point, you realized, your severity wasn't actually dissuading them. Goddamnit. Now you were going to have to put together a lesson plan on how to survive close combat with omnics and cyborgs, just like Lacroix predicted. This was way more work than you'd signed up for. But then you remembered Captain Amari's threat to put you on permanent teaching duty if your results were shoddy.

You were going to make the best damn modules on killing things, ever.

They were smarter than you ever were, and simultaneously more helpless. They thought in grids and formations, in trajectories and straight firepower. Some of them had degrees in quantum engineering, molecular genetics, material sciences: things that went beyond your limited education. They were sharp, clever, and hungry to learn. Most of them had a few years of national military service and even some combat experience. But they saw the world in straight lines and military tactics. They thought in terms of glory, honor, and sacrifice. They viewed facing death as an uncomplicated stepping stone to validation. You were going to beat that out of them, or at least give them second thoughts about making stupid last stands.

There were a few exceptions and you thought maybe a fifth of them had potential in Blackwatch. Jeong had served in the Korean military, but she worked logistics and had a keen understanding of the chokepoints on a map. She was a quiet intense girl, and after reading her files, you learned her family had been wiped out in an omnic attack.

Maeda Vargas had grown up poor in a favela: you recognized the way he sized up the room before he walked in, the sardonic smile he wore when his more affluent classmates talked about first world problems. Tataryn had to take him aside and gently remind him not to pickpocket the other recruits, even if he returned the goods unasked and only did it as a parlor trick.

Chey was a bulky self-educated combat mechanic out of Siem Reap, specializing in jerry-rigging power armor and bludgeoning omnics with his tools. He was a bit older than the rest, and he watched them with that same resigned tolerance that you tried not to show on your face.

Lowell had been a student who helped foil an anti-omnic terrorist attack on their university. You weren't actually sure why they were here, because their PT scores were the lowest in the class. But they had excellent range scores and a medical degree. Versatility was always a plus, but those PT scores needed to go up.

Tataryn was a better co-teacher than you expected. He seemed to be giving the students individual instruction and charming them, but not actually building a rapport with any. Well, the week was half over. There was still time.
Now when people ask me what I'm doing at work I just say, "Disassociating."
Sometimes I smile vaguely. Sometimes I do my creepy smile.

I have a lot of nicknames for my pets and my cousin and I do voices for all of them. I realize this is probably a sign that we need to get out more, but you know. Whatever. But Shepard is my asshole dog. He is clever. He is food-motivated. He's stolen my breakfast so many times, I can't even. He loves to poop in my dining room because he hates standing in wet grass. So yeah, I have taken to promising him cookies and other treats if he poops outside while we are outside and it fucking works. That asshole knows exactly what he's doing and the fucker will hold out till I promise him something and then he does his business outside. Yeah, yeah, who's trained whom?

I say "cookie" and they all know. (I give them dog cookies, biscuits, not human ones. Though once I offered him cake and had to deliver. He knows. He's smart. He just uses his intelligence for evil.)

Need to get back on the job hunt. fkJdadfkfjdkakdfkdk It's the worst. Have some flight credit from last year that I need to use up. So maybe I'll take a much-needed vacation soon. (Like fly to visit friends because I'm not at "pay for hotel" level vacation budget.)
Chapter 57

Chapter Summary

Teaching is a learning experience, one you really rather would have skipped.

Chapter Notes

We have passed the six month anniversary and I am face-palming. Mostly because it was not supposed to drag on this long. And then after this there's a few oneshots I hope I can do and the Angst!AU. I keep doing little drabbles on my tumblr, and I need to cut back and finish this. Not that I'm shirking, obviously. glares at the 478k word count

I have three missions I want to cover with minor arcs in-between. But I need to set an end goal, because otherwise this is going to go on forever.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Well, he didn't say "no" to this plan," you told Hanzo.

"What exactly did he say?" Hanzo sighed and sipped his tea.

"You shouldn't ask," Tataryn said, biting into a glazed doughnut. "Plausible deniability and all that."

"He said, and I quote, "I'll think about it." So if we want to get started on recon..."

"That isn't explicit permission," Hanzo said, eyeing the box of doughnuts. You nudged it toward him and he took one.

"Just recon," you said. "If he doesn't say "no" right off the bat, that's a good sign."

"She's right," Tataryn said, nodding sagely.

"Unless this is too beneath you. I get it. Killing people is way more satisfying and as the scion of a great house, you probably can't be bothered to-"

"I help him," Vo said, patting Hanzo's arm.

You blinked as she pulled herself into a chair and grabbed a jelly doughnut out of the box on the table. Vo had never hidden her dislike of Hanzo, but apparently the fact he'd saved Bayan had won him some grace.

Hanzo eyed her suspiciously. "What did you have in mind?"

"Start small. Fill sugar bowl with salt. Soap in the ice machine. Leave fireworks in toilet." Vo laughed her raspy little chuckle that sounded more like emphysemic coughing than happiness.
"This sounds like something Genji would have done. When he was six."

"And remember how angry it made you?" You beamed.

Hanzo stared at the table thoughtfully. "Little deaths."

Vo nodded. "Then big messy ones."

"Never underestimate Blackwatch petty," Tataryn yawned and drank his coffee. "They can't give us all these cool toys, AI friends, and high end training, then not expect us to use it. That's such a waste it's practically criminal."

You and Tataryn had taken a shift scouting Harvey Beringer's condo and Betty Junger's house. Those two lived within close proximity and they had basic security systems, but with Athena's drone, you'd had little trouble diverting the feeds. It was broad daylight, but your targets had corporate day jobs and the two of you had no trouble slipping in and out of their homes, just to see what you could learn.

"Junger has good taste in ice cream," you said, to sum it all up.

"Beringer has horrible taste in pornography," Tataryn wrinkled his nose. "And I'm not normally a judgmental man-"

"They both have terrible security," Athena said. "I must warn you. If Winston finds out what I am up to, we are all going to be lectured about boundaries."

"Mmm," you said. "Well, Winston's not the one we're worried about finding out."

Tataryn laughed as you started up the car. "You can disconnect, Athena. I don't want Winston to worry."

"OK. See you back at the base," the fish torpedo chirped, before the lights dimmed and the signal cut out.

"I will never get used to that," Tataryn sighed. "Tracker is turned off, yes?"

"Yup," you said and then gave Tataryn a questioning look. He smiled brightly at you, all princely charm and refined good looks. He'd worn khakis and collared shirt. For some reason, he brought a blazer. You'd stuck to black turtleneck and cargo pants.

"We are...friends, are we not, Lucky?" Tataryn asked, his smile too easy as he pulled on the blazer.

"...Now I'm worried," you said, rubbing your forehead. "Yeah, Tataryn, I think we're friends, despite the fact you made me take the role of the mean teacher. That doesn't mean I'm going to loan you money or help you declare war on the Albanian mafia."

"Pfft, Albanians." He laughed and you sighed, not sure if there was a joke there or if he was just being difficult. "You are very good at teaching through intimidation," he said, glossing over your jibe. "Much more convincing than me. And I thought we were, but sometimes it is hard to tell." He shrugged. "I did not want any miscommunications. I appreciate you standing up for me with the Commander. I know you intervened. On his own, the boss would not have let me off this easily for picking a fight with you."

You shrugged. "You're welcome."

"I want to ask you to go somewhere with me."

"...Oh boy."

"It is not a duel or anything sordid. We are only half an hour away. I can give directions."

You eyed him. "Am I going to regret this?"

"I think I am the one in more danger," he said without any visible anxiety.

"Gabriel isn't-"

"I am not referring to the commander or you," Tataryn shook his head. "Turn left up here."

---

You stopped outside the wrought iron gates of a fancy campus. There was a lot of open green space and several expensive buildings dotted the idyllic setting of the Institut Montana. Tataryn got out and pressed his palm to a reader. You watched as he typed in a code and the gates opened.

"Drive slowly. The guards are always nervous around me for some reason." You shook your head and noted the presence of half a dozen people in crisp uniforms carrying automatic weaponry.

You parked in the designated area, and followed Tataryn up the scenic walkway. This was a very expensive boarding school and you straightened your posture, recalling Amélie's many tiresome lessons on how to behave around the rich. Affecting an air of boredom, you let Tataryn lead. Something about him shifted too, suddenly he was no longer nervous or pensive. He smiled brightly, looking carefree and you could feel the charisma already beginning to pour off him in waves.

"Mischa Petrov and guest, here to see Kseniya Petrova," he said to the door guard, and the man opened the door, not making eye contact with either of you.

"...If you try to introduce me as her new mother, I will kill you slowly," you said, a polite disinterested smile fixed firmly in place.

"If I tried that, she would kill me first," Tataryn replied, his expression not changing.

You walked up a grand staircase, and Tataryn led you to the third floor. The kids had fancy room, bigger than your dorm, and you observed all kinds of amenities, including pools, tennis courts, and was that polo field? How had Gabriel gotten Tataryn's kid in here? Maybe Tataryn was independently wealthy. Tataryn stopped in front of a door, and knocked.

"Ksenya?"

There was a pause, and then you heard footsteps. You watched the hall, suddenly paranoid. You could do civilian things without being attacked, but...

The door opened, leading to a well-furnished cream bedroom, trimmed with gold and pink. The girl at the door was dark, her hair gathered in two round puffs atop her head. She was very small, with sharp amber eyes and maybe Tataryn's nose. You weren't sure. She didn't look a thing like him.

"Who's that?" She asked in unaccented English.

"This? This is one of my friends, from work. Lucky, this is my daughter Kseniya."

She blinked at you owlishly. "Why is she here?"

Tataryn muttered something in Ukrainian. "You remember Uncle Gabriel? She is a very close friend of his."

Kseniya stepped back, allowing you both to enter her room. It was filled with books, and despite the princess color scheme, it seemed more like a library than a bedroom.

"You missed the visitation day," she said, sitting at her desk. You leaned against the wall, noting that the windows had kinetic shields. Tataryn sat down on the bed.

"There was a funeral," Tataryn said. "I am sorry."

"Who?"

"Malik."

The girl nodded, like she knew the name but not the man.

"Lucky is my friend. I thought you should meet her," Tataryn said.

The girl looked at you, and Tataryn had said she was eight. She was so small and you guessed that was what an eight year old was supposed to look like. You stared back, unsure of what to say.

"He's never mentioned you before," she said.

"Most of what I do isn't fit for polite conversation." You stopped, realizing how that would sound to a child.

But she just smiled shyly. "He cheats at cards."

"We all do," you said.

"He eats too many sweets."

"Guilty," you said.

"I hope you are not in love with him."

You began to laugh, and to his credit, Tataryn joined in. "Oh no. No. My love life is very full. As...charming as he is, no."

"Good, because he is still in love with my mother, and he is too stupidly stubborn to move on," she sniffed.
You raised a brow.

Tataryn shrugged, as if to say, "Children? Who knows where they get these ideas?"

"Well, I suppose I'll see you around," you said, giving Tataryn a quizzical look.

"Sure," she said, already losing interest.

"Do you mind waiting in the car?" Tataryn asked.

"No problem. Nice meeting you," you said, and showed yourself out.

It was only on the way down the stairs did you realize what Tataryn had done. And you shook your head, trying to tell yourself that it was just your imagination. That Tataryn was only being polite inviting you up. That since he was in the area, he only wanted to make a quick visit to his kid. That he wasn't introducing you to her just so you would be a familiar face if something happened to him.

"So I volunteered to teach, partially because Jemmy didn't want to, and promised me a month's worth of pie if I did it for her, and partially because yeah, it looked like fun." Shoal nodded to herself. "I did overlook the early hours, but...I guess I don't mind."

"...What the hell is wrong with you?" You asked, inhaling the steam coming off your travel mug. The coffee smell went straight to your brain and you opened your eyes a little more, and stood up a little straighter, your spine no longer scrunched up like an accordion.

"Pie, Lucky. All the pie I can eat for a month. And I can eat a lot of pie." Shoal grinned at you, running her fingers through her short hair. The color was too bright. Like her smile. Like the sun. Goddamn sun. Ugh. Why the hell were you even up?

"That's incentive," Jesse said, nudging you with his elbow.

"OK, I can see that," you agreed, brain not quite processing everything yet.

"Doing it for the pie or me eating a lot of pie?" She asked, narrowing her eyes.

"...Both?" You shrugged.

Jesse stifled a laugh.

"You're not actually awake, are you?"

"Getting there," you said, watching the trainees run laps around the track.

"So wait, how did you get teaching duty?" Shoal asked while you sipped your coffee.

"I pissed off Captain Amari and Commander Reyes," you said.

"...You know, Lucky. For someone so likeable, you're surprisingly good at making your COs mad." Shoal grinned at you. "It's like a supernatural talent or something. How have you not been shipped off to Antarctica yet?"
"They'd have to shoot me first. Fuck the cold."

"She's too useful," Jesse said. "No one else wants to deal with Commander Reyes when he's pulled a triple shift, forgotten to eat, and is drowning in paperwork."

"I don't want to deal with him when he's like that," you said. "I just prevent it from ever getting that far."

Shoal nodded. "It's a good thing Reyes likes you, considering how much you piss off Morrison. I'm serious, McCree. I have never seen the Strike Commander that enraged before. And she did it twice! Like, how did you not get demoted or fired?"

"Blackmail." You drank your coffee and watched Lowell lag behind everyone else.

Shoal blanched. "Really?"

"Nah." Jesse flashed a grin. "This may come as a surprise to you, but Morrison actually likes Lucky." When Shoal gave him a skeptical look, he nudged you with his elbow. You blinked at him. He nudged you again. "Tell her."

You nodded slowly. "It's true. Most of the time."

"...Huh. He hides it well," Shoal said, shaking her head. "Well, Morrison is a decent guy. He isn't going to hate someone who keeps saving his life."

You winced, recalling Cologne. "I think you're exaggerating things, Shoal."

"I am not! Like the way you went after that sniper in Belfast. It was like two minutes of Morrison yelling, ordering us to hold position, and looking like he was going to go in by himself to kick your ass for taking off. I thought he really would and then suddenly you were slinking back out of the building, dragging an unconscious assassin behind you. It would've been hilarious if I wasn't so scared Morrison was going to throw you out of the Orca on the trip back."

Jesse had the nerve to laugh at you. "You haven't told me this story, sugarpie."

"It was a long, stupid day," you said, watching Maeda Vargas easily outpace everyone else. Jeong and Chey were middle of the pack.

"Hmm, thoughts on who's going to wash out?" Jesse asked.

"None of them," you said. "But there are only a few with Blackwatch potential."

"Maeda Vargas," Shoal said. "He wears that same half-feral look you get in the field. But he's not very motivated."

"What?" You blinked, thinking about all the questions, extra training, and work he'd been putting in. "Are we talking about the same kid?"

"He does all right for me," Jesse said. "Good shot, steady hand, doesn't fool around. He's not a kid, Lucky."

You waved your hand. "Chey is the only adult in there. The rest of them are kids. They're earnest, mostly untried, and still in their teens. They're kids."

"Well, as I was saying, Maeda Vargas is not bad," Shoal said. "He just doesn't participate any more than he has too."
"...Uh...that one, the one at the head of them?"

Shoal blinked. "Yeah... Huh." She looked sideways, like someone was playing a trick on her. "He's been a solid if mediocre trainee for the past several weeks." Shoal was covering the entire training course, which was stupid. You were glad you only had this week to finish up.

"He's always raising his hand," you said. "Takes extra combat modules."

Jesse chuckled. "Tataryn says you terrorized the good behavior into them."

You shrugged. "Yeah, well, what he didn't tell you was that I walked in to him saying "Oh I'll be your buddy, but Lucky Strike is scary and mean. She isn't going to go easy on you. And she eats babies. Raw."

"He did not!" Shoal laughed.

"I only exaggerated a little. But yeah, I got stuck as the disciplinarian. Wasn't my idea."

"Well, whatever you did, it helped. He's definitely applying himself now." Shoal shook her head. "I might have to get you to guest lecture next time I do this. I'm not a convincing bad cop." Shoal squinted. "Are you sure we're going to keep Lowell? They're kind of...scrawny."

"They're deadly with a rifle. Could probably qualify for advanced sniper courses," Jesse said. "Compensates for some of the weakness. And they can pull double duty as a field medic."

"Fair enough." Shoal shrugged. "I like Forrester. She's got some real leadership potential. Lots of spirit, good balance of skills. Gotta say though, Chey is pretty cute."

"Cuter than me?" Jesse asked with a wink and Shoal began to turn red.

"Ah, there you are Lucky." Captain Amari strode over to the benches and Jesse looked away. "I reviewed your combat modules and found them most informative. I'm not sure we should be giving cadets this information during initial training, but I'm willing to test it out. I am impressed that you convinced Torby to repurpose some omnic shells for combat dummy practice."

You blinked. It wasn't just you and Torby but- oh. You'd designed a few exercises, asked Torby for spare parts, and requested Athena to puppeteer some uninhabited omnic bodies. But Athena's sentience was still a big secret and Torby's "involvement" made a good cover.

"Honestly, Genji should be teaching this part," you said, because you had consulted him and Hanzo quite a bit, because of their formal melee training. "I just compiled the data and made it digestible."

"Your personal experience shows," Captain Amari said, looking pleased. "I really didn't expect you to put this much effort into training the recruits, considering your initial reluctance. I'm very impressed. Keep it up and we might have a position for you as a permanent instructor."

You stared at her in horror, wondering how exactly your clever plan backfired.

"Again," you said, watching Maeda Vargas pick himself up off the mats. He was of an average height and on the skinny side, and like most humans, not really suited for facing an omnic in direct combat. You had balanced the exercise by providing metal batons. Athena controlled a generic chassis, bipedal and human-sized, and she was supposed to let up once they caused enough damage to disable the shell. "You've got the right idea, but you need to find a weak spot: joints, optics, processing panels. And remember that while the anatomy might correspond with a human, omnics can store their processing units anywhere."

He nodded at you, firmly. "Yes, ma'am! I'll remember that! Thank you, ma'am!"

You squinted at him, trying to figure out if that was mockery, because Maeda Vargas wasn't really the type to embrace hierarchy. But he had already turned his gaze back to Athena's combat omnic. His eyes were on his opponent, and he licked his lips, bouncing on the balls of his feet.

No, he wasn't being sarcastic. The kid was exhilarated. Great, another adrenaline junkie.
You sighed. Eager students were better than bored combative ones, but they still exhausted you.

Thus far, the only one who'd actually won a battle was Chey. He'd taken off his shirt and managed to wrap it around the omnic's optical sensors, before dragging it to the ground and smashing its head against the floor. He'd smirked at you afterward, like somehow you were going to take offense that he'd done it all on his own. You had just filed that move away for later, and given him the praise he deserved.

Lowell and Jeong got their asses handed to them, along with most of the class. Oddly, no one seemed too discouraged, they just kept trying.

Tataryn nudged you as you watched Maeda Vargas dodge the hits, blocking with his baton.
He had a good chance of winning, but he got cocky, winking at you and Tataryn, right before he get thrown again.

You stifled a snicker.

Tataryn poked you again, and you looked up, a little shocked to see Jack and Gabriel watching from the doorway of the gym. Jack was elbowing Gabriel and whispering something.
Then they played rock-paper-scissors. Jack picked scissors. Gabriel picked rock. And you sighed, knowing whatever was going to happen next, you probably wouldn't like it.

Gabriel swaggered into the gym, Jack following behind, shaking his head.

"Tataryn, Strike." The two of you saluted and you could feel the chill of Tataryn's evil amusement.

"Commander Reyes, Strike Commander" was all you said. Because you didn't trust yourself not to say something incriminating in front of the recruits.

You sighed as Athena threw Maeda Vargas again. He would win eventually, but not today.

"Athena, halt exercise. Maeda Vargas, good effort, you're getting closer." You did not look away from Gabriel whose smile was a little too wide. "What can I do for you today, sir?"

Jack surveyed the students. "Have you demonstrated your technique?"

"I didn't think it would be helpful," you said, suddenly seeing where this was going and not liking it one bit. "Considering this is a basic course for beginners." You glared at Gabriel, because you were not going to spar with him or Jack in front of all the rookies. There was way too much sexual tension and not everyone was oblivious as you had been.

"Come on Agent Strike, you can show them how it's done. Give them a goal to work toward," Gabriel said. "Athena, shift to advanced mode." Gabriel grinned at you and you decided that he was going to pay for this. You weren't sure how or when, but you were going to get him.

But for now, you had to make due with giving him long blank look and then you took your gloves off. No sense ruining another pair. There were a few sharp gasps as you handed the gloves off to Tataryn. So your war wounds still weren't common knowledge. Given how Overwatch agents gossiped, the news would be across the base by the end of the day. Well, whatever. You picked up a baton and stepped onto the mat. Athena's practice chassis wasn't combat-rated, but it was still metal and getting hit would hurt.

"Begin," Gabriel said.

Athena leapt forward in a flying kick, a move she must have learned from Genji. You rolled sideways, and spun, striking the optical panel with your baton. The blow wasn't hard enough to break anything, and you had to slide backward to avoid her counterattack. She didn't stop though and you blocked a flurry of hits with your baton, sparks flying. Growling, you slipped the baton between the inside of her left arm, gripped both ends, and twisted as she tried to extend the limb. Torquing against the joint, you pushed till something snapped. Some omnis had joints that bent in multiple directions, but this model wasn't one of them. You had noticed that the more flexible joints weren't quite as durable, thankfully.

The limb dangled uselessly in front of her body, but she didn't stop, and the right hand smashed into your face.

You tasted blood, and dodged sideways, narrowly avoiding a follow-up strike.

"The thing about combat omnis is that they don't feel pain. You can hit them all you want, but unless you actually disable something, you're wasting your energy. Strike was nice enough to have them throw you, so you could see what kind of reflexes you're trying to match. But in combat, they're not going to bother with throws and locks. They're going to focus on strikes and trying to smash your puny meat forms."

You tried to ignore Gabriel's lecture, circling Athena's one-armed body. She lunged forward, and metal foot grazing your stomach as you danced backward. What the hell? You were going to have to set clearer restrictions on "advanced mode."

Athena reached for you, and you kicked her wrist aside and slammed the baton into her optics. The bludgeon cracked the glass plating. Not waiting for her to recover, you straightened your metal fingers and drove them straight through the processing panel on her chest.

There was a moment as the omnic stuttered to a halt, sparks flying from the impact. You gave it a shove and it fell harmlessly onto the mats. Your augments would need to be checked, but you had dropped the practice omnic in front your students and managed not to look like a complete failure.

"Omnics, while programmed with all kinds of useful combat software, are only as strong as their chassis," you said wiping the blood off your mouth. "You might be able to get away with this against a human-sized one. Bastions, OR-14s, anything much bigger than you, and you're royally fucked." You half-expected the Strike Commander to reprimand you for language, but you were too annoyed to care.
You could hear Tataryn's smothered snickers behind you.

There was a moment of silence and most of your students were staring at your left hand. You looked down at your prosthetic fingers, wondering if your middle finger had gotten stuck in the upright position or something. No, but your wrist was bleeding pretty badly, probably scraped on the jagged edges of the metal.

"Are you OK, ma'am?" Jeong asked, eyeing your torn up wrist.

"One of my COs once told me that if your sparring doesn't end in blood, you're doing it wrong," you said, staring blankly at Jack and Gabriel.

"What Agent Strike means to say, is that what is the point of sparring if you're not actually practicing your combat skills?" Tataryn said smoothly, handing you a towel. "The point isn't to bloody your partner. The point is to develop good reflexes."

"Yeah, what he said," you muttered, wiping your face again. You were still bleeding. She'd gotten you good, and you made a note to talk to Athena about safe levels of aggression after this.

Still grinning, because apparently you were the most hilarious thing he had ever seen, Tataryn gestured to the mats. "You made a mess, Lucky."

You glanced blankly at your class and sighed as Lowell hesitantly came up with a first aid kit, their expression concerned. Chey eyed you speculatively, like he finally believed that you weren't bullshitting them. And Maeda Vargas stared at the space between you and the downed omnic, like he was revisualizing the fight. You wouldn't be surprised if he tried to mimic the joint lock next time. Jeong and Forrester had big admiring grins on their faces now, and you just shook your head.

"Ma'am, maybe you want to get that cleaned and sealed," Lowell said in a soft voice.

"Thanks, Lowell." You accepted the kit and to your surprise, Gabriel took it from you.

"Let me help you with that, agent. Tataryn, you can handle the rest of the lesson while Strike gets cleaned up." The order was clear and Tataryn sighed.

"Of course, boss. I mean, sir." He winked at you and turned to the class. "Just because Agent Tataryn is now on the deck, doesn't mean you lot get to run rampant. I will report you to Agent Strike, and now you've seen firsthand what happens when things annoy her."

"And yet here you are, still alive," you said under your breath.

Gabriel chuckled. "Go sit down. It'll be easier if someone with two good hands assists you." You walked with Gabriel and Jack, watching as Tataryn easily took control of the class.

"-can I do that? Oi, do I look like I'm some kind of masochistic melee fighter? I just shoot them," he said with a laugh. "Which is what any of you should do. Agent Strike has been in some dire situations and had to learn her skills the hard way. That kind of thing is a last resort. As she says, don't let things go that far."

You sat down on the bench, pointedly not looking at Gabriel as he took your forearm in his hands, gently cleaning the abrasion with an antibacterial wipe.

"It's not too deep," Gabriel said. "You don't have to go to the infirmary."
"Good, because I'm not up for explaining this to Angela."

"That was pretty impressive," Jack said casually. "Been practicing with the Shimadas?"

"I think Hanzo has caught on to the fact that I've been trolling him this entire time. I suspect our sparring sessions are his way of getting me back."

"You're very serious," Gabriel murmured, applying ointment and then a UV sealant to the wound. "Instructor Strike is such a strict teacher."

"It's pretty hot. Makes me want to act out," Jack said out of the corner of his mouth, expression remaining flat and verging on bored. He didn't look at you; he just continued to watch Tataryn lecture the recruits. To any observers, Jack was just doing his job, his demeanor remaining professional and disinterested.

"It's Tataryn's fault. He decided I was going to be the scary one on the first day," you sighed. "I know, that's completely wrong. He's the ruthless, sneaky, amoral one. I'm...the sneaky, less ruthless, amoral one."

"Yes, you're completely different and morally superior," Gabriel laughed softly. "I didn't realize you hadn't programmed them not to draw blood."

"Did you read my module description? That's Athena in there."

Gabriel stiffened. "Wait, what?"

"Yeah, and she's been emulating Genji's style."

Shaking his head, Gabriel wrapped your wrist up, his hands warm on your skin. He gave you a steady look. "That's dangerous, Lucky."

"I'll talk to her, make sure she knows to be more careful with the rookies."

"That's not what I meant," Gabriel said. He patted your back. "Come by the office later. I have a mountain of reports to sort." He paused, watching Tataryn demonstrating some kind of knife trick. "We miss you."

"...Well, if someone hadn't put me on newbie duty, I would have time to help out," you said, not a little sourly. "This shit eats up my entire morning."

"Next time don't run off on unsanctioned missions," Gabriel said, giving Jack a hard look.

"Well, I'm satisfied with her work," Jack said so dryly, you could smack him too.

"It's a good thing he's wearing that coat," Gabriel told you as you stood. "Because otherwise you could see just how much he appreciates your performance."

You fought the urge to facepalm and took the first aid kit back, shaking your head.

"Lucky, I am so sorry. I did not mean to-"
"Meh, Gabriel put you on advanced mode. It's OK. I know you weren't trying to hurt me." You sat on your bed, soaking in the emitter radiation and drinking water. "Guess we should have set more specific parameters for advanced mode. Didn't think we were going to use it though. I was more worried about the trainees."

"I'm sorry," Athena said, sounding miserable. "I was focused on fulfilling my mission, which was winning. I did not realize how dangerous it had gotten till after I bloodied your nose and kept going-"

"Yeah you were using some of Genji's moveset. That's pretty impressive and scary."

"He has been kind enough to give me access to his training videos. Emulating the kinetics is fascinating. I...had not realized how powerful those strikes could be in a basic chassis," Athena said. "And...perhaps I was feeling a little competitive."

"I got that," you said, rubbing your tender nose. "I'm not marked as a hostile unit now, am I?"

"I would never- That's not funny, Lucky!"

"Hey, I'm the one with the bruises and pain. It's a legitimate question."

"I would never intentionally cause you damage," Athena huffed. "Even if you are very mean and using guilt as an emotional weapon."

"It's all I've got." You laughed softly. "Me punching you does not have the same effect as you punching me. So let's not pretend like both acts are equal."

"Maybe you should just get better," Athena sniffed and for a moment you forgot that Ziv was halfway across the world. That ass. Because he'd obviously been teaching your AI rude things.

"I tore you up today, didn't I?"

"You keep it up, Lucky. I will remember this for our next match."

Tired and sore, you dragged yourself into the office, and had to quickly shut the door behind you. Gabriel sat in his chair, and Jack knelt between his legs, in full overcoat. Gabriel didn't even look up from his screen, but his fingers tightened in Jack's hair and you took a minute to appreciate the Strike Commander on his knees.

"You just going to stand there and gape?" Gabriel asked gruffly.

"Well, I have work to do and I'm very behind," you said, making your way to your desk. "Because not only did someone assign me a class of trainees, they also made me go hand to hand with an omnic on hard mode. I had to take some time off to heal." You could hear Jack now, slurping at Gabriel's cock. You picked up your coffee and took a long drink, trying to center yourself.

"Didn't realize it was our AI in there. Figured it was something simpler," Gabriel rumbled.
"I'm sorry about that. You still looked good out there."

Jack lifted his head. "I wanted to spar with you," he said, voice gravelly. "But Gabe vetoed it."

You looked between them. Gabriel's plan had actually been less stupid than Jack's and you shook your head, wondering how Captain Amari's hair had not yet turned completely white from dealing with the two of them, Reinhardt, and Lacroix.

Jack smiled at you then lowered his face back between Gabriel's thighs, licking the shaft without breaking eye contact.

"Just come sit with us," Gabriel sighed, leaning back in his chair. He stroked Jack's hair, the blonde man swallowing him back down. You set your coffee on a filing cabinet and drifted over to them. Gabriel patted a free spot in front of him and you sat on the desk. He took your left arm and kissed your bandaged wrist. "Sorry baby. I didn't mean for you to get hurt."

"It's fine," you said. "Sorry I'm so grumpy. I just...they keep looking at me like I'm some kind of hero and that's crazy pressure. I know, I know you guys get it all the time but...it's new and weird for me." You stopped for a moment, studying your gloves. "I figure if what I'm teaching them will help them survive, then I better take it seriously. And I'm sick of getting up at 3 AM, because I have to get there extra early, otherwise who know what Tataryn will get up to with them?"

"It's a lot of responsibility." Gabriel nuzzled your hand and you leaned forward to kiss him.

He groaned into your mouth, not quite drowning out the slick sounds of his cock in Jack's throat. You bit his lip and he tightened his hold on your arms. He was close then. He broke away, grinning at you. "Watch Jack choke on me, hermosa. This is your fault. Seeing you play rough always gets us going."

"I wasn't planning on doing any of that! You interrupted my class! It's your own fault!"

Gabriel stiffened in his chair, teeth clenched as he thrust slowly into Jack's mouth. Jack took it all down, an obscenely pleased smile on his face, his eyes glazed with lust.

"That's it, Jackie. Love seeing you on your knees. You look so good with your pretty lips around me. That needy face you're making, no you can't touch yourself. This is punishment, amor. You shouldn't have run off to Mongolia without me."

Your pulse quickened as Gabriel tightened his grip on Jack's hair, his motions growing rougher.

"I already punished Lucky. Did she tell you about it? We played the quiet game, and she is bad at it. Next time I'll get her a gag." Gabriel locked eyes with you, his smile too playful. "It was fun. Get ready for it-" Gabriel growled as his hips shook. "Take it all, Jackie. Try not to get any on your fancy uniform."

Jack had less trouble swallowing than you did, and he moaned around Gabriel's cock. Gabriel pulled out, letting Jack lick him clean, before tucking himself back into his pants.

"Hmm, damn it's already 1400 hours Jack. Don't you have to leave for that meeting soon?" Gabriel gave a low chuckle and you knew instinctively that he'd timed it this way on purpose.
"Gabe, please. I've been walking around like this for the past two hours-" Jack groaned, resting his head against Gabriel's thigh.

"But our girl hasn't had a turn, and she's the injured party," Gabriel stroked Jack's cheek. "Are you really going to be that selfish?"

Your breath hitched as Jack nuzzled your calves. "Please sweetheart, I can't go all day like this. Let me come now and I'll make it up to you later, I swear."

"He's really going to be that selfish," Gabriel said, but there was no sting in his words. "Your call, baby."

"If either of you complain about the amount of work I'm not getting done-"

Jack rose, bending over to kiss you. "Wouldn't dream of it." He tasted of Gabriel, a little salty and bitter and he ground his hips against you. "Wish I had time to bend you over your desk," he said, nipping your ear.

"Couch," you said, because your desk had work on it, and you knew how messy things could get.

"Ten minutes," Gabriel called out. "Better hurry."

"That bastard. He's going to pay for this," Jack said, kissing the side of your neck. "Are you OK with this?"

"You're making it up to me, yeah?"

"I promise," Jack nodded vigorously.

He sat on the couch and you lay on your stomach, amused as Jack eagerly fumbled with his belt.

Gabriel sat on his desk, watching while you licked Jack's leaking cock.

"Don't tease," Jack groaned, gloved hands fisting your hair. "Please, baby." He squirmed underneath you and you took him all down, nearly choking as he began to thrust. "Such a good girl," Jack exhaled. "Not a cocktease jerk like a certain Blackwatch Commander."

Gabriel laughed. "Serves you right, Jack."

"Come to my room tonight," Jack groaned. "I know you have to get up early, so I won't get rough. I'll eat that sweet pussy till you're satisfied, then I'll take my time with you. Whatever you want sweetheart."

Jack moved at a frantic pace, and you struggled to take it all. Had Gabriel been edging him before they even got to the gym? That was likely and Jack was so easy to get going. You gagged as he sped up, one hand in your hair, the other rubbing your shoulders.

"Oh god, baby. I'm so close." Jack's breathing grew ragged, and you felt him tense, his thighs shaking as he began to spurt in your throat. You took as much as you could, and pulled away with his cum dripping down your chin. You wiped your mouth, breathing hard.

Jack leaned over and ran his thumb along your lower lip. "You got some right there," he growled, pushing his thumb into your mouth and you sucked it clean. "Fuck, sweetheart. You do that and I'll be ready to go again here in a moment-

"You're just insatiable." You shook your head, smiling as he leaned over to kiss your cheek.

"It's you and Gabe. Drives a man to distraction. Thank you, baby."

"She had you coming in minutes, Jack," Gabriel chuckled. "You're getting sloppy. Maybe all this office work is making you soft."

"Fuck you," Jack glared at Gabriel. "You've been teasing me for hours."

"And look at that. It's 1415 and time for you to head off to your meeting," Gabriel smirked.

Jack bent over to kiss you again, his tongue flicking against your lips. He winked and fixed himself up, buckling his pants and smoothing his hair. "See you tonight, sweetheart."

You could feel the stupid grin on your face as Jack waved and headed out the door. When you looked up, Gabriel was beside you. He sat down, giving you a wry smile. "You were supposed to let him suffer. Spoiling my fun."

"Pfft, you've been mean enough today," you said, holding up your left arm.

He kissed the bandage. "That wasn't intentional, but I am sorry. Let me make it up to you," he said, pulling you onto his lap. He'd enjoyed watching you and Jack, and you could feel just how much.

"I-I have work to do," you stuttered as his mouth latched onto your throat, his beard brushing back and forth against the sensitive skin.

"You'd rather work than do this?" Gabriel asked, as he rolled his hips. His hands ghosted along your sides and he cupped your breasts, squeezing gently while you shivered.

You moaned softly and your eyes fluttered shut, hands already moving to your pants.

"I didn't think so," he said, obviously pleased with himself.

Chapter End Notes

I booked my trip. It's just a long weekend at a friend's house, but I haven't seen her in years and she moved away like 10 years ago, and I have never been down to visit her. So, yeah. It might effect the update schedule next month, but only by one chapter, if that happens.

I need to get back on the job hunt. The hesitance is partially I don't know what I want any more/fear paralysis. I know I don't do convincing interviews if I don't actually believe in what I'm doing. And that's a childish problem, I know. I should be a better actress, but honestly, I'm terrible at faking enthusiasm. I can hide emotion waaaaaaaay better. :D

Anyway, dogs got a doggy playdate last weekend. Went to another friend's house and she has a fenced yard and four dogs and so there were seven dogs in one yard and it was just nice to sit in the sun and watch them be dogs.

I sound old. Ugh. :P
Chapter 58

Chapter Summary

Porn, puns, and precocious pupils.

Chapter Notes

There is some slightly more graphic anal play in the form of rim jobs.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

You rolled up the print Michael had made and brought Gabriel's present in a little box. You briefly wondered if they were a mistake, but decided that they were such a small thing, he wouldn't mind.

Comm unit in ear, you let Athena know you were on the move, and headed up to Jack's quarters.

You let yourself in, set your bag down, and were pleasantly surprised to find Jack and Gabriel already on the sofa, unpacking boxes of kebabs and shawarma.

"You like hummus, right?" Jack eyed it warily. "Because there's a lot of it and I don't know if I like hummus that much."

"Yeah," you said, thinking of Rivka for a brief moment. "I like hummus," your voice wavered.

Jack blinked and gave you a second look. "Baby, if you don't like hummus-"

"Ziv's grandmother used to make it for me," you said. "I like hummus."

"Oh." Jack gave you a nod, looking like he wanted to say more, then thought better of it. "OK."

Gabriel's jaw tightened briefly, but he swallowed whatever bitter words were on his tongue and leaned over the sofa. "What do you have there?"

You looked down. "Stuff."

"Come sit down," Jack said. "There's yogurt salad - which I think is just yogurt and cucumbers, shawarma, more mystery meat."

"It's lamb, Jack," Gabriel said rolling his eyes.

You smiled and vaulted over the couch, noting that Jack had tucked a plaid blanket into the cushions, covering up the stain. It looked silly, you liked it. You handed Jack the rolled-up print and Gabriel the small box. "I uh...presents. Just because. They aren't bribes. I haven't done anything, I swear."

Gabriel raised a brow and took the box. Jack slowly unfurled the print of himself with an elderly lab. Atticus, if you remembered correctly.

"Michael painted it. I thought you'd like it," you said quickly as Jack studied the picture. It was big enough to frame, though now that you thought of it, who kept pictures of themselves on the walls? Narcissists, that's whom. Jack could be vain, sure, but he didn't take it that far. "It was supposed to be for something else and then I didn't give it and well, I figured I didn't need an occasion. Because sometimes you just give people gifts, to show you care, right?"

"Thank you," he said softly. "I...this is a surprise." He gave you a crooked smile, leaning over to kiss your forehead. "I like it. It's very thoughtful. Thank you." He looked back at the dog and gaze wavering. He sighed, and you realized that reminding him of his dead dog was probably a mistake. What were you thinking? How was this a good idea? Bringing up the dead dog was never a good idea...

"I'm sorry," you said. "If you don't like it-"

"Nah, just haven't thought about Atticus in a long time." Jack gave a little half shrug. "There isn't a lot of room for a dog in the Strike Commander's world." He carefully rolled the print up and you wondered if you should have gotten him a puppy. But he was right. Who would take care of it? Not you.

A little depressed, you looked over at Gabriel who was eyeing the cufflinks suspiciously. Well, it was official. You were bad at presents.

"Sorry-"

"Stop apologizing. I really like it. It just...it caught me off guard." Jack smiled at you gently. "You're not bringing up bad memories. It's a good memento. Thank you." He got up and pulled down a framed picture of an Orca and stuck the picture over top it. It wasn't crooked, but it didn't look quite right here.

"Jack, that's not how you frame-"

"Gabriel, you can decorate however you want when we live together. But until then, I'm doing things my way!"

"The wrong way," Gabriel muttered under his breath and you laughed, some of the tension seeping out.

"Thank you," Jack said, and sat back down on the couch, a pleased smile replacing any trace of sadness.

"Corazon?" Gabriel held the cufflinks in his palm.

"Yes?"

"Are these...platinum?"

"Yes."
He gave you a confused look. "Jack gets a sentimental personalized gift and you bought me expensive cufflinks?"

"I didn't buy them," you said, rubbing the back of your head. "Umm..."

Gabriel raised a brow. "...Did you steal them?"

"No." You shook your head.

"Whose cufflinks are these?"

"Yours now," you said. "Unless you don't like them. Then they were Lacroix's. I won them off him in a poker game in Cologne. He stopped playing with me after that."

Gabriel stared at them for a moment.

"I thought you would find it funny to wear them in front of him and...maybe that's in bad taste..." you trailed off.

"You beat that James Bond wannabe at cards?" Gabriel laughed.

"He does too," Gabriel smirked. "You mean you want me to wear your trophies and flaunt them in his face?"

"If you want to." You looked over at Jack who was laughing behind his hand. "I guess you could always trade them back to him."

"God, you're petty," Gabriel laughed. "Thank you, baby. I'll save these for when he really pisses me off." He leaned over and kissed you, as one of Jack's arms snaked around your waist.

"Aren't you hungry?" You asked, a little bewildered as Gabriel began unfastening your belt.

"The hummus can wait," Jack said, his teeth grazing your ear. "I have some things I need to make up for, and I want to make sure you know just how much I appreciate you."

---

You leaned against Gabriel, sighing happily as hot water rained down on you. The food had to be cold by now and it sat, untouched on the coffee table. The three of you were in the shower with you in the center.

Jack was soaping you down, his fingers wandering as he "cleaned" you up.

"I'll change your bandage when we get out," Gabriel said, rubbing your shoulders.

"OK," you said, shivering as Jack pressed hot open-mouthed kisses to your back going lower and lower. "Don't know if we're ever getting ou-" Your voice went high as something warm and wet probed your back passage. "Jack, what are you-"

"Relax. Already got you cleaned up. Just see if you enjoy it, OK?" Jack murmured, before he slid his tongue against the tight ring of muscle.

You glanced at Gabriel, a little alarmed, but Gabriel just smirked down at you.
You whined softly as he licked, the area so very sensitive. He had you panting as you braced yourself against Gabriel's arms, the slippery muscle teasing you open.

"Do you like it?" Gabriel asked, kissing you. "Because he likes doing it."

You clung to Gabriel. "It's...good. Just..."

"Dirty?" Jack laughed, a finger sliding inside your puckered hole. He sunk his teeth into your cheek and you squealed. "Don't care. Look at you squirming."

Gabriel chuckled. He nipped your ear. "And we just got you cleaned up too. If you let him, Jack'll work you open for us, and we can put you in the middle."

"O-OK," you stuttered. Now two fingers pushed inside your ass and your knees buckled. Gabriel held you up, grinning as you writhed against him. You buried your face against his chest. Jack kept playing with you and soon enough he'd comfortably fit three fingers inside.

"Almost ready-" Jack chuckled.

"Don't worry, he has plenty of mouthwash," Gabriel said.

You ended up on Jack's lap, Jack holding you from behind, your head tucked against his shoulder, your legs tangled with Gabriel's. Gabriel played with your nipples, teeth grazing the hardened points, while Jack tilted your head back for a kiss.

"I still owe your ass a good pounding," Jack purred, one hand cupping your face. "I know, not tonight, sweetheart, but I just want you to know I haven't forgotten what you have coming to you." You moaned as he sucked a mark onto the side of your neck. "You won't be walking the next day, I promise you that."

"Probably because we'll pass out afterward and forget to put up an emitter," you said, breath hitching as Gabriel rubbed your clit.

"Smart ass," Jack snorted, his cock pressed against your cleft. Gabriel was hard between your thighs. "Get on Gabriel's lap. I need to get more lube."

"And by "lap," he means "cock." In case you were confused," Gabriel leaned forward and bit the other side of your neck, a line of rough kisses bruising your skin.

You shifted forward, trying to shove Gabriel onto his back, but he caught you against his chest, lowering his head to nuzzle your cheek. "Gabriel-"

"Nope, you don't get to push me around," he laughed. "Now sit on my cock like I told you."

You huffed in frustration and rose to reposition yourself. With both hands on his shoulders, you straddled him, eyes widening as you lowered yourself onto him. Gabriel held still, letting you move at your own pace, till he was in to the hilt. Breathing hard you wrapped your arms around his neck and you closed your eyes, loving the way he filled you, the way his cock twitched inside you, even though he was holding very still. His chest hair scratched against your skin, and he was always just a few degrees warmer than you expected. You didn't mind.

"So eager," Gabriel murmured, one palm splayed against your back, the other sliding... between your thighs. "I took you twice in the office and Jack just tongue-fucked you on the couch. Are we not meeting your needs, hermosa? Do we need to have these trysts more frequently?"

"Uh-" This was the most sex you'd had in your life. And he wanted to know if you needed more?

"Yes!" Jack said, leaning over your shoulder to kiss Gabriel. "That's a great idea. And while you're at it, come see me during office hours. Reviewing the facilities budget is killing me."

"Get a couch," you said. "Or better chairs. Yours suck."

"It's to discourage certain types from loitering," Jack said. "You don't need a chair if you're under my desk." He nipped your shoulder and you could feel him smiling at you, his hands kneading your hips.

"I'm not sitting under your desk to do paperwork, Jack."

Gabriel snorted.

"If I get better chairs, will you come work for me more often? You'll need to show off that new wardrobe," Jack teased. "I have a dress code, you know."

"We don't all own silly jackets," you told him as he spread you open.

"I don't care about your coat, baby. But in the Strike Commander's office, we go Strike Commando," Jack said proudly.

You froze, staring at Gabriel. "Did he just-?"

Gabriel rested his face in his palm. "Yes, corazon. He just killed my boner."

Jack laughed. "Come on, it was funny."

"Morrison, please stop talking," Gabriel said.

"Are you telling me to Overwatch myself?"

"I'll put my clothes on and go eat hummus," you said.

Jack chuckled, kissing the back of your neck. "It wasn't that bad-

"We're pretending that never happened," Gabriel said, rolling his hips and you gave a sharp gasp. "Now are you going to sit there making stupid jokes or are you going to join us?"

Gabriel reclined, taking you with him, and Jack held you open, dribbling a generous amount of lube inside you. Jack's slippery cock pressed against your ass. You rested your chin on Gabriel's shoulder, reaching back to spread your cheeks. Jack rubbed the crown against your hole and began to slide in.

"So much tighter when we don't use the plug-" Jack groaned and you whimpered, already so full of Gabriel, that you weren't sure you could take Jack. "Are you OK, sweetheart?"

You nodded, biting your lip as Gabriel gently rubbed your back. There was a little more resistance than usual, but Jack had been generous with the lube. "Just go slow, please."
"Fuck, I can feel Gabe's cock twitching inside you. You sure you're OK?"

"Still recovering from that terrible joke, but I think I can handle this."

Jack chuckled, wrapping one arm just under your breasts. "I'm going to enjoy gagging you again." He nipped your shoulder and you squeaked, jerking forward. "There we go." He pushed and you gave a cry as he got all the way in, his body flush with yours. "Fuck you're tight, baby," he groaned. "Going to have to take it easy tonight."

"Hold her, Jack."

They shifted in tandem, Jack pulling you upright while Gabriel sat up. You closed your eyes, head against Jack's chest while Gabriel rocked his hips. You braced yourself against Jack, shaking as he rolled your breasts in his hands.

"You can go harder," you said, moving with Gabriel. Taking them from this angle was easier and you tried vainly to quicken the pace.

"I don't want to," Gabriel said, with a low groan. "Want to take it slow tonight. Sometimes I just like seeing you melt."

"And he still feels guilty about earlier," Jack said, tongue flicking against your ear.

"We don't always have to play rough," Gabriel said, leaning forward to kiss you. "Unless you don't like this-"

"I always like being here with you," you sighed, reaching out to stroke his face. Gabriel caught your hand and kissed it.

"Don't usually get to do this unless something big has happened," Gabriel murmured. "Want to just enjoy having you and Jack. Just because."

Before you could formulate a response, Jack canted his hips and began to move. You wrapped your arms around Gabriel's neck for stability, but Jack didn't release you. Both of them held onto you, their touches firm, but not restrictive.

"I don't know, Gabe. She gave us presents for no reason. That's a pretty big thing."

"Maybe," Gabriel said. "Or maybe it's normal, you're just lousy at gift-giving."

Jack chuckled, pressing you tighter against Gabriel while he leaned in to bite the other man's shoulder. "I don't mind taking it slow either, baby. Now that I know you aren't going to sneak out afterward, there's less pressure to fuck you into exhaustion."

"What?" You gave a choked laugh as both men began to thrust in alternating strokes. They didn't rush, letting you savor both the fullness and the drag of them against your inner walls.

Jack began to move a little faster, one hand sliding between your thighs to rub your clit. "I like waking up next to you, almost as much as I like wrecking you. You're so pretty spread out underneath me, making those cute noises while I see how many times I can make you come." His voice grew rough and the pressure of his hands grew heavier.

"Jack-"

"But this is nice too," he said, cheerful and light again. "I like looking Gabe in the eye while we're both inside you. Having both of you together makes everything so much better."

Even though they were not going hard, both men were already slick with sweat. Pressed tightly between them, you relaxed, pleasure washing over you in warm waves. It was a gradual climb, both men taking their time while they caressed your bare skin and kissed whatever parts of you they could reach. You tried to give back in equal measure, but it was two against one, and you squirmed between them, panting softly as they teased another orgasm out of you, Jack's fingers on your clit, Gabriel's mouth on your throat. You bucked your hips, falling against Jack as they held you upright.

Jack came next, purring your name while he filled you from behind, his strokes languid and hard. Gabriel didn't last much longer, and he yanked Jack closer. You couldn't see what he was doing, but Jack moaned against you, and Gabriel growled something filthy in Spanish as you he lost himself in you.

Gabriel lowered his head and kissed you gently. When he released you, he leaned over your shoulder to kiss Jack again.

"Mmm," Jack embraced you from behind. "You want to go again?"

"She has another early morning. So no, she needs to eat and get some rest," Gabriel said, firmly.

"But papi-" Jack teased.

"Go get cleaned up," Gabriel scowled. "I'll change the sheets and reheat the food."

You were back in the shower, giving a longsuffering sigh as Jack soaped everywhere. He had even gotten behind your ears.

He grinned down at you, his sudsy hair falling in his eyes. "You made it here unassisted. I feel like I haven't done my job right." He trapped you against the wall, palms on either side of your head.

"I have to train recruits tomorrow," you scowled.

"I know. But are you sure I can't interest you in a roll in the hay?"

"Eww," you laughed as he brushed his lips against yours. "Did that line ever work for you?"

"You're still here, aren't you?"

"We need to get Gabriel," you said.

"Oh?" Jack raised a brow. "You want all three of us to have sex in the shower? It'll be cramped but we can all fit-"

"No, not tonight. I mean we need to ambush him."

Jack's face fell, but he recovered quickly. "I see. Well, I guess that'll be fun too. You already said you wanted to see me dom him. And you've missed out the last few times.” He didn't elaborate, so you assumed it was after Candle Arc went to shit. "But you want to collaborate, like you and him did to me?"

"Yup," you said. "And don't you act surprised. You two gang up on me all the time."

"Yeah, because it's fun," Jack laughed, kissing you again. "But I like this idea too. All right. What did you have in mind? Because I have plenty of suggestions..."

You were back in Jack's bed, with a clean dry bandage on your wrist, wearing one of Jack's t-shirts, and sandwiched between Gabriel and Jack, eating hummus on reheated pita. Neither of them had bothered to get dressed, instead they had the covers pulled up over their laps and you were treated to the sight of both of them shirtless, lounging around the bed while you ate dinner.

Gabriel would give you bites of kebab while Jack shared his shawarma. They had plenty and could have easily given you your own plate, but they held onto the takeout boxes, forcing you to let them feed you or steal from their portions. Which you did, liberally, though neither seemed to mind, and you weren't above eating with your fingers, but the pita made a good scoop. You were careful not to get anything on the blankets, but Jack...well, Jack kept crumbling pita on the covers. "You could have just made me a plate," you told Gabriel.

"Mmm, but this is more fun," he said, offering you a forkful of roasted lamb. You bit into it, shaking your head.

"See, if anyone here doesn't deserve to feed themselves, it's Jack." You gestured over to him picking the seasoned grains of rice off the comforter and eating them with a happy head bob.

"I don't know what you're talking about," he said, and stuck a spoonful of rice in your face. "This is really good."

"It's better in your mouth than on the blank-"

Jack just cheerfully pushed the spoon into your mouth. You took the rice, rolling your eyes.

"It would be less messy if-"

"More cucumbers?" Gabriel asked, with a smirk. "We've got hummus for days."

"At least admit that I'm not the messy eater."

"You're not the messy eater," Gabriel said, agreeably and gave you another bite of meat. "We can spoil Jack another night. Another night when I'm sleeping next to him and have to worry about his mess."

"I'm not that bad. I'm not getting any on the sheets, what more do you want?"

"That is an improvement," Gabriel said, rolling his eyes. But Jack missed that, swooping down to kiss your neck.
"See? Stop complaining," Jack said. "Or I won't share my rice."

Reluctantly, you stopped arguing and went along with it. Normally after sex with both of them, you were far too exhausted to talk for very long or do anything besides cuddle and pass out. This was different. Both of them were relaxed, but still wide awake. Gabriel radiated contentment, smiling and laughing more than you'd seen since Candle Arc went to shit. The last time he looked this happy was Christmas.

Jack just kept leaning over you to kiss Gabriel, or ruffle his hair, or steal his food. But he made a point to kiss and cuddle you on the way back. And he couldn't keep his hands to himself, rubbing your shoulders, tweaking your ear, and playing with your hair. You were worried that he was going to get food in it, but he looked so happy, so carefree that you just sighed and let him.

"Are you getting enough to eat?" Gabriel asked, holding out another bite of cucumber.

"Yup." You yawned. "I'm getting sleepy."

"Good," Jack said. "Then I can eat the rest of the shawarma."

"Not so fast, boy scout-" Gabriel reached over you, stabbing a large slice of meat and taking it for himself.

"Gabe-"

"You've been eating all my "mystery lamb." You can share."

"Lucky was eating my shawarma-"

"Don't blame me, Jack. One, you guys didn't give me a plate. Two, if I didn't eat it, it would have ended up on the blankets."

"She's still sassing me, Gabe. We didn't fuck her hard enough. I bet if we'd gone another round, she would've been too tired to eat."

You facepalmed.

"Then I would've been twice as hungry," Gabriel said, and took another piece of Jack's shawarma.

"So wait a minute: all those times before, were you really trying to wear me out so I'd spend the night?" You glanced up at Jack.

"It wasn't the only reason," he said with a shrug. "I like doing it anyway. But it was side benefit. Didn't want you waking up, panicking, and running off."

"Gabriel-?"

"Don't act surprised. I told you that was the plan back at the hotel on the first night," he said, not looking the least bit ashamed. He fed you some rice and yogurt salad. "It worked out well."

"...You could have just asked me to stay," you said. "I wasn't sure if you actually wanted me to-"

"Stay?" Jack asked, grinning down at you, while he nudged you in the ribs with his elbow. "Please?"
"I planned to, anyway!"

"Unless he keeps getting food in the bed, corazon. Then we're both leaving."

"So, tea party after Mihret returns?" Tataryn asked while you belly crawled across the grass.

"Probably. Genji and Jesse keep having scheduling conflicts, and they've both threatened me with grievous bodily harm if I go ahead without them." You lifted your viewing specs and sighed. "What the hell do they think they're doing?"

"...I don't know, but I'm not letting Ana blame us for that." Tataryn sounded amused.

Today was one of the hands-on exercises. It was a combat-sim with real omnics who had to "tag" the trainees with lasers. The guns had real weight and recoil, while the omnics were instructed to engage in touch-combat as well, which was like touch football. If the omnic tapped you, you went down, because that's what would happen in real life. The human team got two hours to prepare their side of the field. It was a capture-the-flag style game and you watched them drag branches, metal, and tarps into the woods.

"Where the hell did they get sheet metal?"

"Mmm, my money is on Chey or your boy Maeda Vargas."

"My boy?" You wrinkled your nose. "He's still a teenager, Tataryn. I don't know what you're implying but-"

"Not like that. I don't know if you've noticed, but he watches your every move like a hawk, and then tries to emulate them himself. He isn't as smooth, of course, but the will and the potential are there."

When you asked questions, Maeda Vargas always had his hand up to answer. At the end of class, he had often stayed after to ask you to clarify a point or give more detail about a strategy. He kept trying to coax war stories out of you... You sighed, watching your batch of trainees trying to construct some kind of trap. "I just assumed he was an eager pupil."

"Not quite. No one else has gotten that response out of him. Shoal and McCree both agree he's smart and paying attention, but he's trying to impress you. Me as well, but definitely you."

It fucking figured it would play out like this. The entire point of you and Tataryn being here, aside from someone's clever idea of punishment, was to find Tataryn a replacement squad member.

"I'm not forming my own team, Tataryn."

"Mmm, you mean you, Mihret, and Lacroix aren't a team? Is it just you, McCree, and the Shimadas then?"

"I'm flexible," you scowled. "I work well with others." Maybe you didn't play well, but work was a different matter. "Anyway, I meant I'm not looking to run my own squad. Obviously, I
"Well, if you want to mentor any of them, Jeong and Forrester both like you a lot, though I think Forrester likes me better," Tataryn sighed, and to your surprise he did not sound pleased by that development.

"Problems?"

"Not yet, but I am too old for teenagers, Lucky. And that realization is depressing in and of itself."

"...Huh," you said and frowned. "Like you just realized this or...?"

"I have known this for awhile," he said, giving you a dirty look. "But when I was younger, it was flattering. Now it just feels...uncomfortable."

"That is a lot more mature than I expected from you," you said.

"Are you making jokes about my feelings?" Tataryn asked, sounding slightly outraged. "And my age?"

"Yes," you said. "Now we should probably get closer and see what they're doing. Because I don't trust Chey not to teach them something crazy." Chey was sharp, and you figured he was the best candidate for Tataryn's squad. Maeda Vargas was a little young for Blackwatch; Jesse had been younger when he joined, but you still felt weird about that situation, just like you felt weird about inviting a teenager onboard.

"...He's smart and capable. But I'm not sure about him." Tataryn said.

"Really? I don't have any strong feelings. He has a lot of Blackwatch potential, but-"

"Life has made him hard. He is not the kind of man I trust with power."

"We don't trust anyone with power," you said. "Especially over us."

"We do. The boss. Ana. I think you trust Morrison," Tataryn said, without a trace of irony. "I want to be very careful about whom we invite in. Especially given what I have learned about Shit Spiders."

"...Yeah, OK." You nodded. "I noticed the attitude, but I'll keep an eye out."

The two of you crept closer, your stealth field up, and Tataryn's face smeared with grease paint. The rookies stood out in Overwatch blues, but the two of you had on camouflaged armor Tataryn wore a cap to cover his golden hair.

"You call that a hole?" Chey scoffed. "That wouldn't hold a rabbit, let alone an omnic."

"Not all of us have your biceps," Lowell snapped. They were knee deep in a trench, Jeong and some of the other trainees helping to dig.

Rolling his eyes, and muttering in Khmer, Chey dropped into the ditch and began to shovel. He moved fast, and while he was no Reinhardt or even Gabriel, he was a tank and the hole rapidly expanded.

You nudged Tataryn.
He shook his head and the two of you watched them dig, cover the holes with metal, then branches. They bickered, usually Chey butting heads with Forrester or Lowell, but it never got out of hand. You could sympathize with Chey's frustration. You'd been older than a lot of the other recruits in basic, not as old as him, but enough to feel the difference in maturity levels.

Maeda Vargas was a quiet one. He just watched them, eyes narrowing as he focused on Chey. He scanned the horizon, and turned to Jeong. "Did you bring the stuff?"

"Of course," she said, winking at him, her smile more playful than you'd seen in class.

Maeda Vargas grinned back mischievously. "All right, so we'll set these in the pits..."

You caught sight of the proximity mines and facepalmed silently. This was not a live fire exercise, damnit. You signaled to Tataryn to back up. The two of you melted back into the forest and headed for the edge of the tree line.

"...I am curious to see what happens," Tataryn said after a moment.

"...Captain Amari will skin us alive."

"But they might not let us do training ever again." Tataryn looked pensive. "I am fine with that."

You thought about it. He had a point. "But one of them could get hurt."

Tataryn shrugged. "Teach them to play with proximity mines."

You shook your head. "Tataryn."

"Lucky." He winked.

"Think about the paperwork." And the fact if there were serious injuries, they would have to get Jack and Gabriel involved.

Tataryn rolled his eyes. "Of course you are right. Boring, but right."

"Let's circle around, like we're checking on their progress. See what happens."

Tataryn grinned, wiping the paint off his face. "Oh, I see where you're going with this. All right."

The two of you strolled into the forest, taking another route. You didn't attempt to hide your presence, making a beeline for the recruits.

They had finished laying the branches over the sheet metal and had covered the area with leaves. It looked stable enough, and you approved of the measure, because the metal would hold humans, but crumble under an omnic's weight. Still, you weren't going to walk onto it.

You caught sight of Jeong, in a tree, while Maeda Vargas strung razor wire across the pathway. This was not your fault. This was not your fault. You didn't provide them with proximity mines and razor wire. You didn't tell them to use disproportional force on a goddamn training exercise. Sure, you had covered these techniques in class, but where had they even gotten this shit?

Tataryn was beaming with pride, and for a moment you wondered if he was their supplier. Because despite his good cheer and friendly demeanor, he really did not want to teach another unit ever again. He was just too smart to show it.

"Agent Strike!" Lowell shouted as you stopped right in front of the pit. Jeong and Forrester's eyes widened, and panic crossed Maeda Vargas' face. But Chey just stood there, watching, expression very neutral.

"We just came to check up on your preparations," Tataryn said, hands on his hips. "Everything going well?" He stepped onto the metal and frowned, looking down. "What's this-"

"NO!" Forrester shouted. "Get off of it!" Her eyes were comically wide and you smothered a laugh as Jeong nearly fell out of her tree.

"What? You dug a pit. How deep?" Tataryn began stomping on the metal, and you raised a brow.

"Uh, you might not want to do that sir," Lowell said. "Please take a step backward."

"Oh?" Tataryn looked at you. "Did you put in punjee spikes? Wood isn't going to pierce omnic armor."

He was enjoying this. You rolled your eyes.

"Uh...not spikes, sir. Please get off the trap, please?" Lowell asked.

Tataryn made a face. "Why?"

"Because we put live proximity mines in there?" Lowell said in a small voice. They winced as Chey glared at them.

"Huh, that is a good reason," Tataryn said, not moving.

"Who has the flag?"

Maeda Vargas waved the blue Overwatch flag at you from his tree. Razor wire glinted in the sunlight and you squinted at him. "Who gave you razor wire?"

"I...found it," he said, cringing.

You waited.

"Uh...in the armory..." He slowly slid out of the tree. "When someone left the door open..."

You sighed. "This is not a live fire exercise. I appreciate the effort you've put into this, but if any of you get blown up or shredded, there are going to be problems."

"And paperwork, lots of paperwork, and that makes Strike Commander Morrison, Commander Reyes, and Captain Amari very, very unhappy," Tataryn said with a stage whisper. "And I have seen what happens to agents unfortunate enough to incur the wrath of the Overwatch founders." He gave you a grave look, and you nodded solemnly, thinking of Ziv.

Several of them blanched.
"Can we get a do-over?" Lowell asked.

"...Nope, the game begins in thirty minutes. I want all unauthorized implements off the field before then," you said. They were going to lose, and they were going to lose badly, which while unfair, might give them more ideas on how to improvise. And really, that was the point of this exercise. You did appreciate them planning beyond the rules, but when you saw Lowell handling proximity mines with shaking hands, you were confident that you were doing the right thing. Even as one of them lit up and began beeping.

Tataryn moved faster than you, grabbing the disk out of Lowell's hands and hurling it away from the group.

You clenched your teeth as an explosion rocked the forest. It only brought down a tree or two, but now you were going to have to explain this to Captain Amari and the idea of that conversation made your stomach churn.

"Right, so whom here is actually certified to handle ordnance?" You asked, already knowing the answer.

"Uh..." Lowell carefully set the mines down and backed up.

"Jeong, Tamboli, and Hristov," Forrester said, standing ramrod straight, her black hair falling in her face. "They handled the setup. We were trying to stay within regulations, ma'am."

"Are there any other prohibited surprises you have for our friendly omnic training partners?" You asked, staring directly at Maeda Vargas who was partially concealed behind his razor wired tree. Tataryn smirked at Chey who glared at you both. Maeda Vargas shrunk under your gaze and you waited. He slunk over to you and handed over three EMP grenades.

You sighed and pocketed them.

Jeong had already began carefully take down her side of the razor wire.

"Well, the exercise is going to proceed as planned," you said, getting several groans and dark looks from the group. "And afterward, we're going to sit down individually, and talk about what you've been up to, and just how you got access to some of these items."

Several of them paled and you shook your head. What the hell had they been thinking?

Chapter End Notes

The summary was kind of a lie, because there's a lot of fluff too.

Sorry about the late update. I kept getting distracted this week by tumblr anons with their fluff, angst, and puns. Uh huh, that's my excuse, blaming those anons. Yup. :P

That being said, headcanons and drabbles keep popping up on my tumblr. They’re too short to add here right now, and kind of unpolished, but if you're looking for little bits of angst, fluff, and humor in the IAL world, come on over.
Chapter 59

Chapter Summary

In which you face multiple dilemmas and Genji is more of a shit than usual. (Tataryn and Lacroix are shits, but that is to be expected.)

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Your class got trampled by the omnis. They put up a spirited fight, considering their resources. But judging from the recordings Athena made, they were too busy bickering over whose fault it was that they got caught and cursing you and Tataryn, to bounce back. They had made plenty of mistakes, and now it was your job to make sure they learned from them.

You and Tataryn sat in Captain Amari's office, watching her read your report. She remained impassive as she read and when she finished, she shut off her screen, rubbed her forehead, and stared at the wall for an uncomfortably long period of time.

"...They show a lot of initiative," Tataryn offered.

"Good problem solving skills," you added.

"Excellent stealth and acquisition abilities," Tataryn said.

"Went above and beyond," you said.

"Weren't so good at improvising on the fly," Tataryn acknowledged.

"Team cohesion does need work," you agreed.

Captain Amari held up her hand and you both feel silent. "You know, I was only joking about you corrupting the new class. Obviously, I was mistaken."

You shot Tataryn a worried look.

She clasped her hands under her chin. "I'm concerned that allowing you to continue working with them will do more harm than good."

You felt a pang of disappointment. Sure, you didn't like getting up at 3AM, but you'd come this far...

"We can't un-teach them, Ana," Tataryn said. "You tasked us to show them how we do things on the black ops side, and we did. Maybe they were not ready for that knowledge, or maybe they are more talented than we anticipated, but we did what you asked and we did it well."

"Too well, Fedya," Captain Amari said, narrowing her eyes. "What passes for discipline in Blackwatch is not going to fly in Overwatch. I don't need an entire class of brilliant hothead mavericks running amok."
"So we rein them in. Teach them discretion," Tataryn said.

"Do you actually know enough about that concept to teach others?" Captain Amari's eyes were on you.

"I don't know," you admitted. "But even on a bad day, I wouldn't have added ordnance to a glorified laser tag training exercise."

"...So are you asking me for another week?" Captain Amari asked, silkily, and you glanced over at Tataryn. He gave deliberate nod.

"Yeah, we can do that," you said.

Captain Amari smiled thinly at you. "Don't disappoint me."

It was only after you and Tataryn slunk out of her office that you realized she'd gotten you both to ask her to extend your sentence. Son of a bitch, she'd played you like a zither.

"Well, we weren't burnt to ashes," Tataryn said after a moment. "That is a plus."

"Yeah," you agreed. "But we've been...manipulated."

"I know. It is wiser to give her what she wants, Lucky." He paused. "I am sorry, I have been meaning to ask you. Is that...rice in your hair?" He pointed to the spot and you reached around, and a few sticky grains came away in your hand.

"Goddamnit, Jack." You facepalmed then. "Don't ask."

"...The Strike Commander has some strange proclivities."

"No, he's just a messy eater," you said, patting the back of your head and combing your fingers through your hair.

Tataryn raised a brow, stifling a laugh. "I see. None of my business what you get up to in your spare time."

"I'm serious! He was eating and- Stop making that face at me, Tataryn!"

Tataryn's shit-eating grin just widened. "I am not judging you," he said brightly. "Congratulations on being so...open-minded."

Huffing in frustration, you stomped off to find Lacroix. He had a better understanding of how to motivate people and while you had the shape of a plan in your head, you knew his input would be invaluable. But first you had to make sure you didn't have any more of last night's dinner on your person.

Lacroix laughed for a minute straight when you told him what happened. Wiping tears from his eyes, he handed you a cigarette and then proceeded to laugh at you some more. You lit the cigarette and waited for him to calm down.

"They had proximity mines, punjee pits, razor wire, and EMP grenades for a training exercise? Obviously they are so smart, they are idiots. No one asked them to reinvent the wheel."

"Lacroix." You scowled at him. "Focus."

His eyes widened. "So defensive... Oh, I see, you are protective of your pupils. How adorable."

You rolled your eyes.

"Yes, I have looked over this crop. Chey and Maeda Vargas are my top picks for ringleaders, but I suspect there were others?"

"...Yeah. There are a disproportionately high number of unorthodox thinkers, Lacroix." You narrowed your eyes, pieces coming together. "You vetted several of them. Did you know-"

"One way, or another, Blackwatch needs capable agents. I'd prefer to get them and train them before they're scooped up by less competent agencies. Yes, I had some input. Just like I had some input about you taking on an instructor position."

"...And what did you recommend?" Of course, he hadn't warned you. He'd just carried on, satisfied that everything was going according to his sneaky little plans.

"Against it, of course. You don't have the temperament to teach," Lacroix said, looking you in the eye, a shrewd smile spreading across his untrustworthy face.

"Obviously, you were wrong about that."

"I was, wasn't I?" He said, and you cast a doubtful eye on his claims. No, Lacroix wanted you teaching them, just like he wanted more potential Blackwatch agents. He was just needling you now. The real question, was what did he want you to show them?

"And now?"

"Now, they have made a mistake. You will rake them over the coals. You will make it clear that this behavior was unacceptable. And then you will show them how they should have done it. You will not hold back."

"I'm going to really let them have it or really tell them what they should have done?"

"Both," Lacroix said, smugness oozing from his tiny pores. "Not all of them are Blackwatch material. But if they can learn from this mistake, they are one step closer."

"...That's a dangerous game, especially since we're already on thin ice with Captain Amari."

"It's the game we play, Chanceux." Lacroix smirked at you. "And you are getting rather good at it."

"They...dear god." Jack pinched the bridge of his nose. He'd shed his overcoat, and it hung on Ana's coat rack. He sat on the floor shaking his head. "Was anyone hurt?"

"Just their egos. Lucky and Tataryn have been more conscientious than I expected. They..."
caught it early on.” Ana tossed her hat onto the coat rack and put her feet on her desk. "There's some damage to the trees. We might have to chop some down for safety, but I think we can make them do that."

"It is good that they are...creative," Wilhelm said, carefully pinching the handle of the teacup between his thumb and forefinger and delicately sipping it. Hunched over in a chair too small for his frame, he held the saucer in his other hand. "I laud their enthusiasm."

"You surprise me, old friend." Gérard sat in the other chair, looking far too pleased with himself. "I would have thought you would be upset about how they made...unauthorized requisitions."

"I am not condoning their thievery," Wilhelm said, blowing gently on his tea and managing not to spill it. "But I am moved by their dedication. I know what it's like, trying to impress your superior officers. We were all young and foolish once."

Gabriel snorted, leaning against the door. Wilhelm had never grown past the foolish phase. Jack was snacking on a box of shortbread, while Ana made more tea. Cramming everyone in her office was tricky, but Wilhelm's still wasn't set up, Gérard's was far too small, and you had access to both his and Jack's office. They didn't want you walking in on this meeting.

"I warned you Tataryn and Lucky didn't have the experience to do this unsupervised," Gabriel said.

"You underestimate her, Gabriel," Gérard said so mildly, it couldn't be anything but a rebuke.

"I'm not saying she can't do the job. She can, obviously," Gabriel said, annoyed at Gérard's smug little smile. "But between integrating her omnic and cyborg combat module, and this, she's giving them too much, too quickly, and miscalculated how far the recruits would go. They need more oversight."

"A growing pain," Ana said. "One I've tasked her to remedy. Tataryn, is providing support, but Lucky is the one running the show. Which surprised me. He has more leadership experience, but he's taking the subtle approach and letting her direct the class."

"He's pulling his weight, right?" Jack asked, giving Gabriel a look.

"Yes, they're getting along very well," Ana said, lips quirked upward. "So you can imagine what the rumor mill sounds like."

Wilhelm and Gérard exchanged amused head shakes. Gabriel glanced at Jack who had stopped mid-bite, eyes icy. Jack gave him a pointed look. Gabriel had already had this conversation with Jack. Yes, he realized he'd assigned you a very "pretty" bodyguard. Maybe he had underestimated the attention Tataryn's proximity would draw, but he wasn't wrong to do it. Not after what happened at the day spa.

"It'll die down. Both Lucky and Tataryn have reputations that they don't actually live up to," Gabriel said sharply. He knew you only had platonic feelings for Tataryn, just like he knew Tataryn rarely fraternized any more. When necessary, he took his indiscretions off base. But his flirtations gave everyone the wrong idea.

"That is unnecessarily harsh," Wilhelm said, shaking his head. "I do not know Agent Tataryn, but Lucky's growing reputation as a capable agent is well-deserved."
"...That's not what I'm talking about, Wilhelm, and you know it," Gabriel snapped.

Gérard just chuckled. "Reinhardt is too noble to pay attention to gossip."

"No, I have just made it clear that Lucky is an exemplary agent and I will not tolerate anyone slandering her in my presence," Wilhelm said.

Gabriel raised a brow, frown deepening. He had not been aware of this. And he still wasn't sure why Wilhelm decided he liked you so much. Your interactions with him were minimal and you'd only been on two combat ops together: Gérard's Code White in the Alps, and the day spa incident. Even then, the two of you had not worked together closely on either of those missions.

Ana and Gérard did not look the least bit surprised. And Gabriel realized he would have to ask Ana about it.

"You are a stalwart friend, Reinhardt," Gérard said with a small laugh, that somehow managed not to be mocking.

"I am a Crusader at heart," Wilhelm murmured. "Lucky has made it clear that if she attempts to contradict the rumors, it just makes them worse. Her situation requires that she leaves many things ambiguous. I am free to straighten out misconceptions and my reputation is somewhat different than hers. I do not have the skillset for deception and long games. I am not suited for secret missions and deep cover." He gave Gérard a rueful look. "But in this, I can be her shield."

"It is a good metaphor," Gérard said giving Gabriel a sly look. "Don't you agree?"

Gabriel cocked his head to the side, surprised by Wilhelm's confession. He really was going to have to ask Ana about this later. He remembered Wilhelm delivering you that giant bear after Candle Arc. What exactly had you done for the Crusader? Gabriel gave a slow nod.

"Yeah." He looked at Jack, who actually liked Wilhelm. Jack was smiling gently at the other man.

"We appreciate it, Reinhardt." Jack offered him some of the shortbread and Wilhelm carefully plucked one piece out of the box.

"It is what friends do." Wilhelm shrugged. "Now, what are we going to do about this batch of excitable youths?"

Gérard laughed. "I am so glad you asked..."

Reinhardt Wilhelm was a blowhard simpleton, in Gabriel's opinion. His values were archaic, his attitude ridiculous, his laugh, annoying. He was best suited as a figurehead, far away from those who did the real work. He was a modern Don Quixote, and far less charming because there was no excuse for that level of naïveté in this day and age. Gabriel's opinion on all that had not changed. But, Gabriel conceded, maybe after today he disliked Wilhelm just a little less.

You and Tataryn made them clean up the practice area. They chopped down the damaged trees, dragged the debris away, and put away the spools of razor wire. They grumbled under their collective breaths while you and Tataryn oversaw the process.
If you had been feeling extra cruel, you would have eaten dinner in front of them. As it was, you just watched them with a flat unimpressed gaze, drinking your fifth mug of coffee, while Tataryn cheerfully called out instructions.

Afterward, you'd sent them back to their barracks, privileges restricted. Tomorrow you would deal with them individually.

Once they were done, you headed back inside. The sun was setting, and you'd have to meet with Shoal and Jesse. Next week's classes would be shorter than this week's. And both Ziv and Genji should be back from their rotations soon. Then you could finally have the tea party.

You swung by the cellblock, knowing the guards wouldn't let you see Lao alone. That was fine. She still wasn't taking your visits. You'd stand outside and say a few words to her, and sometimes she would look up and tell you to "go away." Sometimes there would be no response. Tonight it was the latter.

Shrugging, you left, intent on heading back to your room for a shower. But then you spotted Maeda Vargas tailing you in the cafeteria. He was trying to be sneaky, and to be fair, he was better at it than Ziv, but he had no reason to be on this side of the complex at this hour.

...Of course. You were probably better off talking to him alone. He liked Tataryn, but you'd been watching him all day, and Tataryn's assessment had not been wrong. You were the agent he wanted to impress.

You ducked into the kitchen and turned on the kettle. Arms crossed, you leaned against the counter, waiting for him to arrive.

The teenager set one foot over the threshold and his eyes widened as he saw you standing there. He froze for a moment.

"Uh..."

You raised a brow.

"I uh...wanted to talk to you, ma'am," he said, fidgeting, but not backing off. He wasn't done growing. Wiry and very tan, he had thick dark curls and almond-shaped hazel eyes. He would be a heartbreaker when he was older. It wasn't just the genetics. One look and you recognized that cavalier disregard for conventional authority, it was the angle of the eyes, the set of the mouth. Some people found it compelling, but you just knew that look from your own face.

"We are going to have individual sessions tomorrow, Maeda Vargas."

"That's really a mouthful," he said nervously. "You can call me Távio. My full name is-"

"-Octávio Felipe Maeda Vargas," you said, because you knew that they would not stay labeled forever and how the hell were you supposed to grade them if you didn't know them on sight? "I'm your instructor. You're Maeda Vargas, unless my understanding of Portuguese surnames is wrong."

"No, no you're right," he said. "I..."

You gestured to the table and went to the pantry to grab yourself a sachet of chamomile tea. Yes, you really needed to stop filching Jesse's teas. You'd buy him more later. You filled your mug and sat down, not offering Maeda Vargas any. Inhaling the steam, you watched him squirm in his seat. Now that you were no longer in the hot seat, you wondered if this was how Captain Patel had viewed you, a talented kid with more luck and grit than sense.

Probably.

"I'm sorry we fucked up," he said. "I...It was mostly my idea. I got into the armory. I convinced Jeong and Forrester that we were going to show everyone what we could do. I got carried away."

You nodded, but didn't speak, watching him shrink with each admission.

"Lowell...had qualms. But I told them that we needed to show initiative and they should stop being such a wimp. They were probably the only one who openly protested our tactics as a bad idea." Hmm. You hadn't expected that.

"Are you falling on your sword?" You asked, tone flat.

"No! Maybe? I don't know. I just wanted to make sure you knew the truth. Forrester is overly responsible. And so is Jeong. I don't want them trying to take the blame for something they didn't do."

"What about Chey?" You asked, casually.

Maeda Vargas' eyes darkened. "He's just a bastard."

You took a sip of tea. "So you broke into the armory alone?"

There was a long silence as he stared at the table.

"I gained unauthorized access to the armory. It was my idea."

He didn't lie to you, but he didn't give anyone up. You smiled inwardly. "So are you willing to be expelled in place of your peers?"

He looked up, alarmed. "I-I don't want to be. But I am the most culpable."

You nodded. "I see. Is there anything else you wish to say?"

"I'm sorry I let you down, ma'am." He swallowed thickly, Adam's apple bobbing. "It was a stupid risk, and I didn't realize it till Lowell almost blew themself up."

"It was," you agreed.

"I'm sorry." His voice cracked.

You watched him. The slump of his shoulders, the shakiness of his breathing, the way he couldn't quite meet your eyes. Maeda Vargas was a decent actor, but too proud to pretend to be ashamed when he wasn't. So yeah, you believed that he was sorry. You still let him hang there in silence.

"But that doesn't fix anything, does it?" He concluded.

"It's the correct sentiment and a good start. But it's more important to own your mistakes and learn from them. And you can't convince me of that through words alone."

You finished your tea. "Go to bed. We will talk in the morning."

"Ma'am," he said, standing up and saluting.
"Why the tension?" Gabriel asked, rubbing your shoulders. You lay facedown on his bed, already melting under his touch. "Your trainees already out of control?"

"It's already been a week. We expected this much sooner," Jack said with a laugh.

"Quit pretending like you don't know all about it," you griped. "This was a bad idea and I'd rather be out in the field being shot at."

"Yeah, it is kind of soothing, isn't it?" Jack said, leaning over to kiss your cheek. "Compared to UN budget meetings, paperwork, teaching..."

"You're not helping, Jack." Gabriel's strong fingers kneaded your back and you groaned as he began to work your too tense muscles. "Are they unrepentant?"

"Worse, they're a bunch of kicked puppies. Chey excluded." You shook your head. Tataryn might have better luck with the other man. Chey didn't precisely disrespect you, but there was no connection there. He knew you were skilled, but you were younger than him and you wondered if that played into his apathy. "Maeda Vargas followed me into the kitchen to apologize. I suspect to clear his conscience more than anything. I didn't absolve him. Just listened and told him to go to bed."

"Oh, harsh," Jack laughed. He sat on the opposite side of Gabriel, gently rubbing your thighs. They weren't sore, but you weren't going to tell Jack to stop.

"It was. He poured out his heart and everything." You shook your head. "The kid wants my approval and I certainly don't approve of what he did, but I'm pleased to see that he can at least offer a decent apology. He knows he fucked up."

"A little fear is good for them," Gabriel said. "Let them think about what they've done. You can be terrifying." He nuzzled your neck. "But your strong point isn't screaming at people. You're better off wielding silence like a weapon."

"You're very good at harsh truths too. Said bluntly and without any mercy," Jack added.

"But you're just too cute when you're angry, corazon. A hissing spitting kitten." Gabriel continued massaging your back, the tension slowly draining away.

"Really, Gabriel?" You looked at him over your shoulder and scowled.

"Yeah, you're fucking adorable when you're bloodthirsty," he said, digging his thumbs into your low back and you dropped flat again, groaning under his touch. "But I might be biased."

You recalled how he looked at you at the day spa and concluded that yes, Gabriel was biased, and you probably weren't that cute when you were angry. He was just weird.

"From what I can tell, the recruits really like Tataryn and you've put the fear into them."
Jack moved down to your calves. "Your disappointment is as cutting as any anger you might demonstrate. But I think you've learned that from Aishani and Ana," he continued. "It's a good technique."

"...I guess," you said.

"My advice is to tailor the approach to each one. Maeda Vargas responds to you? Then you should be one of the instructors sitting in on his session."

"Yeah, I have a plan," you said. "Going to pair them up with people they don't normally work with, preferably someone with opposing viewpoints. Assign them two things. The first is an individual essay: they have to write a report telling me where they went wrong, the possible ramifications, and how they should have done it. Then they work together to analyze the op and to compensate for where they both screwed up."

"That's...more complex than I was expecting," Jack said.

"Shoal and Tataryn's idea," you said. "Need to build better cohesion anyway."

You didn't specify that your input was to make the recruits angle the re-plan as if they were still going to conduct a surprise live fire exercise against the omnis. You wanted to see how creative they would be about not getting caught. Inevitably, some would choose just not to do that. That was fine. You would grade them on how convincing and well-thought out their methods were. That would satisfy Lacroix's curiosity and give you a better glimpse into their thought processes.

After all, if they were going to break the rules, they should do it right.

---

Shoal, Jesse, Tataryn, and you split them up based on whom they were most likely to connect with: the meetings were two instructors, one student. Forrester was partial to Shoal and Tataryn. Lowell seemed to like Jesse and you best. Jeong and Maeda Vargas favored Tataryn and you. Chey seemed to respect Tataryn the most, and Jesse sat in on his session.

Through the numerous meetings, the truth slowly trickled out. Chey, Jeong, Forrester, and Maeda Vargas had waited for some idiot to leave the armory door ajar, walked in liked they belonged, and walked back out with the goods. You'd already confirmed this from Athena's review of the security footage, but it was good that all involved were admitting their culpability.

Chey told Tataryn he was just curious if they could pull it off. You didn't like that attitude, and neither did Tataryn, because he was old enough to know better.

Forrester blamed herself, like she was already their CO. You rolled your eyes. Her sentiment was genuine, but she definitely wasn't Blackwatch material.

Jeong said she handled the explosives, therefore she was the most at fault, because Lowell never should have been near them. She spent most of the meeting staring at her boots and apologizing profusely. You weren't sure if she had the temperament for Blackwatch, but she was at least smart enough to know where she went wrong and you suspected she wouldn't be making this mistake again.

Lowell apologized for going along with it, never actually coming out and saying that they had opposed the strategy or tried to talk their peers out of it. But then, they hadn't gone beyond that. You found their judgment to be sound, but their actions to be lacking. Still, Lowell didn't make excuses and you respected that much.

The spare instructor offices had just enough room for a large desk, and a couple of chairs. You and Tataryn sat on one side, Maeda Vargas on the other. He looked rough, eyes bloodshot, hair lank. Obviously he hadn't slept well last night. You'd made him wait till last.

"For someone so clever, you're an idiot," you told him. You'd been on the receiving end of that statement so many times, and yet, it was amazing that it fit another person so well. Hmm. You didn't need to think too hard about that realization.

Maeda Vargas looked torn, like he was happy that you acknowledged his intelligence, but also could tell, by the tone of your voice, that you were still displeased with him.

"I have to agree with her. You think circles around some of the others, but you end up disorienting yourself."

"Our practice omnics do have escape routes, but they are allies and self-aware. You were just going to blow them up...?"

"...I didn't realize. I thought they were just bots." He tucked his chin against his chest.

"And you didn't think to check?" You tapped your gloved fingers against the desk. "That's unforgivably sloppy."

"I-I...yes, it was." He did not raise his head.

"We can't afford those kind of mistakes in the field."

He nodded forlornly.

"What did you think was going to happen once you "won" the game?"

"We...well, I thought we'd be the class that broke the mold. We're clever and we won, and while we might get in trouble, we'd still have been impressive. Maybe gotten picked for good assignments right off the bat. Like maybe we'd impress Commander Wilhelm, or Captain Amari, or even you...ma'am." Even as he explained the sentences trailed off, like the rest of the realization was hitting him.

"And what would you have done if someone got hurt, or worse?"

"...We were being careful, up to the point when you found us. Then we...panicked."

"That's how battle works," Tataryn said. "Plans often don't hold up."

"I get that. I...I am sorry." He shrugged. "I...don't know how to fix this."

"Well, the good news is nothing is actually broken. You fucked up big time, but no one is hurt, and there was minimal property damage. You have, however damaged our trust in your good sense," you said and he flinched.

"We are going to do two things. You and Lowell are going to write individual reports explaining what you did wrong. Then you two are going to work together to fix all the mistakes you made in the exercise. If you're theoretically still going to break the rules, fine, but you both need to make an argument and a plan the entire thing better," Tataryn said, leaning back in his chair. "And you need to be prepared for the potential consequences."

"And then, we will be having a live fire exercise at the end of the week," you said. "Where you will only use authorized implements. But I'm sure you can see how this all ties together."

Maeda Vargas raised his head, eyes wide. "You mean I'm not kicked out?"

"Not yet, but there's still time," Tataryn said with a smile.

He looked at you, hesitantly. "I haven't ruined everything yet, have I?"

"No," you said. "You made a mistake, and you're lucky the consequences weren't more severe. Now you're going to show us that you have learned from it and we can trust you to make better calls in the future. The brass are watching us all more closely. Show us that our faith in you isn't misplaced."

Straightening up in his seat, Maeda Vargas nodded vigorously at you, eyes wild. "I understand, ma'am! Thank you so much! I won't let you down! Thank you!"

"Go coordinate with Lowell. They're very nervous about this upcoming exercise, I think you of all people understand how important team cohesion is, even if you disagree with a person's viewpoint," Tataryn said.

"Yes, sir! I'll consult them thoroughly! You can count on me!" Maeda Vargas saluted you both and nearly ran out of the room, completely reinvigorated by the new mission.

You glanced at Tataryn. The mood swing and abrupt change in gears left you shaking your head. "I feel old."

"I feel sorry for Lowell," Tataryn said, but he was smiling.

---

Hey Lucky!

Super excited about this weekend! I was just checking to see what you were wearing, because I don't want to be the only person wearing a dress. I mean, I guess if Hanzo or Genji decide to wear dresses, I won't be the odd one out, so maybe while you're at it, you can tip me off to what they're wearing too? (Dress? Suit? Pajamas?) I know the restaurant is cocktail level, but I'm a disgustingly rich entrepreneur and the head of a secret society. What's the point in all that power if I can't dress how I like? (But seriously, I don't want to clash with the group. I'd really appreciate a heads up!)

Thanks,

Feng

P.S. I haven't forgotten about the dinosaur! We're still mapping genome composites!

P.P.S. The Bayan brothers are fucking adorable, Lucky. Like, they're such sweet cinnamon rolls, I just want to punch Nguyen in her stupid face for them! I totally owe you.

P.P.P.S. Tell Jack I said "hi!" Like in a cool mature way, not a creepy fangirl way.

Well, fuck. You stared at the message on your screen. You'd forgotten all about that. You were supposed to go out with Shoal, Jesse, and Tataryn this weekend as a celebration for the end of your teaching sentence. Was this the dilemma of a social life? You wracked your brain, trying to come up with the last time something like this had happened. Usually it was missions that interrupted your social gatherings.

You had agreed to Feng's invitation first, and to be fair, you were going to Shanghai. You'd just have to bring them something back. Sighing you sent them messages of your regret and went across the hall to Genji's room.

You knocked, and he opened the door, clad in sweats.

"Hey, what are you and Hanzo wearing?"

"...That is a very odd question, Lucky." Genji looked down. "Obviously, I am wearing exercise gear. I'm a little concerned as to why you have a sudden interest in my brother's clothes-"

"I meant to the thing in Shanghai this weekend."

Genji laughed. "Oh, good. I was afraid you were trying out some weird new pickup line."

"...Fuck you." You sighed. "Feng wants to know if anyone is wearing a dress."

"I probably will not," Genji said. "I can ask Hanzo to, but it is unlikely. His shoulders are rather broad. Maybe he will try a skirt but-"

"Look, what are you guys wearing? I need to know if I can get away with the Assassin Butler outfit or what."

"You and Hanzo might match if you go with the blue one."

Eww. No Assassin Butler then. And if this was a fancy restaurant, you might be mistaken for the help. Again.

"So he's going to wear a suit?"

"Probably," Genji shrugged.

"You?"

"I don't know." He shrugged again. "If I wear this, he'll have a meltdown. What do you think?"

"Oh definitely. But Feng's so excited about dressing up..." You shrugged. "Your call."

Genji sighed. "You know how this is going to look, yes?"

"I can pretend to be Feng's date, if you're worried," you said.

"...We both know Feng's going to be drooling over Hanzo."
"I'll be Feng's really disgruntled date," you said with a shrug.

"It's not going to be fun."

"You're the one who volunteered to go," you said. "And I don't know if you've noticed, but Feng is insanely excited about this."

Genji shook his head. "Lucky, I haven't gone to any of these trendy hotspots since..."

Since before.

"Oh. I see." You leaned against the door. "I can make an excuse for you then."

"Unnecessary. I'm just not looking forward to going out there...like this." He didn't look at you.

"I know there's a way to rock that. Gabriel and Amélie are both more accomplished...fashionistas than me. You want their input?"

"I know how to dress, Lucky," he said, a little exasperated. "I just choose to avoid the general public. I scare them."

"Me and Feng will beat up anyone who looks at you funny."

Genji just shrugged. "Thanks. Oh where would I be without your expert defense?"

You rolled your eyes. "You're such a shit."

"Wear a dress, Lucky. I'm sure you'll look great," he said and shut the door in your face.

You stared at it for a moment, fuming. "You're damn right I will!"

"Chanceux, you really should petition for...larger quarters. I know Jack could make it happen."

You shrugged. "I'm fine. I kind of like my neighbors and I don't need that much space." Yes, you liked Jesse, Genji, and Vo, even if they were all unnecessarily difficult.

Amélie sat on your bed looking skeptically at your desk and chair. Reinhardt's bear took up an entire corner and your plants sat on your dresser. She narrowed her eyes as she noticed the one that was missing.

"The orchid is in Jack's bathroom, better humidity," you said quickly.

Her frown faded. "Jack takes care of it?"

"Err...he does a better job than me."

Amélie cocked her head to the side. "I would not have expected it."

"He's got surprising depths."
She just laughed. "So you are going to a fancy night spot and the dress code is on par with a cocktail party. You know Hanzo is wearing a suit, and Genji is being difficult. Ms. Zhai wishes to wear a dress as well?"

"...Yeah. I was going to wear Assassin Butler, but-"

"No. You should wear a dress, so Ms. Zhai does not feel self-conscious," Amélie said, and you understood that statement actually meant, "No. You should wear a dress because I spent all that money, so you could look like a civilized human being."

"Fair enough." You got the message, loud and clear.

"I think the midnight blue one would work. Hair loose. Smoky makeup. You have the matching shoes, right?"

"...I wasn't sure which stockings would match. I have gloves."

"Don't bother. You said Genji is self conscious about his cybernetics. How is it going to make him feel if you can cover your scars and he cannot? If he is going to be brave and expose himself, the least you can do is be supportive."

You blinked slowly. Motherfucker. That hadn't even occurred to you, because you were kind of dumb. It wasn't fair of you to expect Genji to go out there and deal with people's stares alone. Sure, you and Feng could beat them up, but... Some battles could be won before there was ever a real confrontation.

"Yeah, you're right," you said. "I...I can do that," you said with more confidence than you felt.

"And honestly, Chanceux, your scars are nothing to be ashamed of," Amélie said, a little exasperated. "You are a woman of character and grit. Anyone who cannot see that is not worth your time. Anyone who is squeamish about the stories written in your skin, is too weak to waste your thoughts on. They have no power over you. And you should give their opinions the regard it deserves: none."

"It's not like that," you said. "I'm just more comfortable not drawing attention to myself."

Amélie's skeptical look made you wince. Because she wasn't entirely wrong. You were self conscious of some parts of your body, especially standing next to her.

"I understand that sometimes you must be subtle and avoid attention, but when you go out with the On Sing Dragon Head and the scions of the Shimada clan, you are not trying to blend in. You will stand out. You should stand out. You should look beautiful and dangerous. And you will."

"I don't think Genji is advertising his status-"

"Not the point, Chanceux!" Amélie threw her hands in the air. "You are going out with Hanzo Shimada, Zhai Feng, and a mysterious cyborg. You are going to attract attention. So you will look your best. Obviously, you don't need expensive clothes to validate your worth, but you will feel better if your garments are flattering."

You sighed. "You are not wrong."

Amélie wrinkled her nose at you. "Of course I am not!"
"...I mean, you're right. I just...you know, it takes me awhile to process things." You shook your head. "OK, I'll wear the dress. I'll leave my gloves and stockings off. I'll strap on my back sheathe for my tanto-"

"Thigh holster," she said. "Back holster for your gun. Everyone will think the blade is for show. It is sexy and given your companions and the venue, no one will try to take it from you."

You nodded slowly, because that was good advice.

"And I will see if Genji needs any recommendations. I am sure he will do fine, but it would be striking if you could coordinate complementary looks."

You almost told her not to, because Genji would take offense. But then, Amélie could finesse just about anyone. And she even if she could not convince Genji to bend to her sartorial whims, she would not give offense. So you bit your tongue and nodded.

"Thank you," you said.

"I am very excited. This will be your warm-up for our Lyon date." Amélie clapped her hands together.

"...Wait, what?"

"I know Gérard mentioned it to you, Chanceux." Her voice was soft and suddenly you had visions of alarm klaxons.

She was talking about the upcoming Kwento mission. You'd forgotten about that. Oh. "Yeah..." you said weakly. "I remember. It just slipped my mind..."

Amélie huffed. "I realize I am no jet-setting crime lord heir, but honestly Chanceux, that stings!"

Shitshitshitshitshit. "I didn't forget! But I can only deal with one big social thing at a time. I'm just not getting enough sleep, Amélie. I've been coaching new recruits for over a week and I'm getting up at 3AM every morning. And I'm still trying to keep them from blowing themselves up! I'm just...really kind of dumb right now."

"Gérard did say they were...spirited." Amélie examined on flawless violet nail.

"And I have to standup Shoal, Tataryn, and Jesse, because...I might have accidentally double-booked for this weekend."

Amélie arched a brow. "Chanceux!"

"I know! I fucked up!"

"You're becoming such a social butterfly, so in demand," she sighed, hands clasped in her lap, a soft smile on her face. "You've come so far, you're making me proud." She beamed at you.

You blinked. You would never truly understand this woman. But you were so very glad that she was on your side.

Chapter End Notes
Keeping stupid hours and trying to be productive. Writing a smut scene that won't end and damnit it's making me angry because smut scenes take me 3x as long to write.

Work is work. New fiscal year, so who knows what happens next?

Realized that maybe I need to figure out what I want in life, but also I should fix my personal habits first. Like not caring that all my college friends are more "successful" than me. Like forgiving my sister for being...herself. Like getting out there, grabbing the world by the throat, and squeezing. Things like that. But fuck, it's hard. I'm petty by nature.
Chapter 60

Chapter Summary

You can't separate work from your love life or your social life.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You stared at the document on your screen. O-K. Lowell and Maeda Vargas had gone...further than necessary. They had written their essays and turned them in early, also submitting battlefield diagrams, formal apologies, and a video of them reading said apologies.

Their individual essays covered different topics. Lowell addressed their lack of fortitude in the face of peer pressure and also the stupidity of handling proximity mines when one did not have the training. Maeda Vargas seemed to have a good grasp of where he went wrong, covering the things you had chewed him out for and then, it looked like he had consulted Lowell to talk about unit cohesion, communication skills, and not being an intransigent dickhead.

You rubbed your forehead.

"What's wrong? Did Vo destroy something expensive again?" Gabriel asked, glancing over at you.

"Here, take a look at this." You forwarded him the entire submission.

Gabriel played the videos first, squinting at the screen. "...Huh."

"I just asked for two essays," you said. "I got those...and more."

"...You need to wear them down more. If they have this much energy, you aren't working them hard enough. You have Chang's contact info in the directory, ask her for recommendations."

"...Yeah. Good idea," you said, still in a daze. You read their collaborated solution. They had put together two plans. One was how to keep the class in line. It required a bit of social engineering, but since Maeda Vargas had been the ringleader, you figured he could convince his peers of either argument. Interestingly, enough, their second plan involved using live nonlethal munitions to stun and capture the training omnis. It was a decent plan. You could spot a few holes, but it was a hell of a lot better than what they had tried to pull.

Maybe you wouldn't have to call Chang after all. That would be a hell of an awkward conversation. "Hi, how are you? Yes, I wanted advice on tormenting overeager youth through physical activity? Yes, I have seen the light, and find great joy in the suffering of others. Please, teach me your ways."

Hmm. Yeah, you weren't going to call Chang. Not unless they really fucked up.
Tataryn brought cracklings to the live fire exercise. It was rubber bullets and laser grenades, but still, someone could get hurt and probably would. Jesse had large bags of popcorn. Shoal procured a large bag of ketchup-flavored chips, which really made you wonder about her. Your offering was spicy garlic shrimp chips, and the four of you sat on the sidelines, checking the view screens, snacking, and getting updates from Athena.

"So how did you like handling all those porous young minds?" Tataryn laughed, because he already knew the answer.

"I am never doing this again." You shook your head. "It was exhausting and I can't even look after all my plants, let alone people."

"What's this I hear about you bailing on us tomorrow?" Shoal demanded.

"...I had a prior commitment I forgot about."

"She's going to Shanghai with Genji and Hanzo. Apparently, Zhai Feng wants to show them around town," Jesse said, a little too cheerfully to be genuine.

You raised a brow, unsure where that pettiness came from.

"Huh. Wait...the fucking Triad head? That crazy blood-drinking girl? The one you didn't think was going to last the year?" Shoal stared at you incredulously.

"...Things have changed," you said, resting your face in your hand. "We are now actively rooting for Feng."

"We...as in you and Blackwatch? Overwatch as a whole?"

"Yes," you said.

Shoal thought about that for a moment. "Is this work or fun?" Shoal demanded, outrage coloring her cheeks.

"...Both? I don't know." You shrugged. "I have to dress up and wear heels, and Genji is already acting squirrelly about the whole thing. And I'm sure you've seen how "fun" Hanzo is."

"I know the kind of fun I'd like to have with him," Shoal muttered, and you couldn't tell if that was sexual or not. "So why are you going? Wait, is this some kind of top secret mission?"

She leaned back in her seat.

"I'll call it a diplomatic endeavor, and leave it at that," you said.

"...That is a bullshit answer," Shoal said. "But I will accept it. If only because I don't want to buy you any drinks, you jerk."

Tataryn just laughed and ate more chips. "I am sure we can find ways to entertain ourselves without Lucky," he said, winking at Shoal and she grinned back at him. Then looked at you quickly to see if you were going to react. Later she would ask if you and Tataryn were a thing, if only to make sure she wasn't stepping on your toes.

You waved your hand. "Go for it. I'll bring you back some souvenirs or something." You shook your head. "Unless it goes like my last Shanghai trip. Then I'll just be annoyed."
"What happened?" Shoal asked.

"She got shot and two other agents were ambushed," Jesse said, now looking slightly concerned. "Are you sure this is a good idea, sugarpie?"

"No, but not for those reasons. Feng is more trustworthy than I expected," you said. "But we're going to be in public and both she and Hanzo are big targets."

"Yes, you can't go anywhere nice," Shoal said. "Corporate buildings, patisseries, day spas, trade conventions..."

"Shut up." You threw a shrimp chip at her and she caught it in her mouth, grinning. Jesse's frown deepened. "You are going armed."

"Yeah, this isn't going down like the goddamn day spa," you scowled. "...What is that idiot doing?" You stared at the screen.

"Oh, Maeda Vargas. He's...climbing the tank. Fast little bugger," Shoal said, leaning forward.

The four of you watched as he lifted the hatch, tossed in a laser "grenade" and neatly ran across the field right smack into a force of training omnis. One tapped him and he dropped dramatically.

"Avenge me, Lowell!" He shouted, one hand over his heart as he sprawled out in the grass.

And then a second party, including Lowell and Jeong blindsided the omnis from the opposite direction. You smiled wryly. So he hadn't just been running haphazardly through the field. The squad took down the omnis, Maeda Vargas cheering from the ground.

"That boy is having too much fun," Tataryn said.

"Yeah...I hated basic," you said.

"We are much more engaging than basic ever was," Shoal said. "So anyway, what I'm hearing is that you're ditching us, the ones who actually know how to party, for junior crimelords at some stuffy shindig in Shanghai? You're ditching us? Your fellow instructors?"

"I said I'll bring you something," you said, throwing your hands up in the air. "I'm sorry!"

"Can't believe she's bailing on us, McCree. Now we have to have a super epic party without her."

"We could just have an orgy," Tataryn said with a straight face.

"...You're going to miss the orgy, Lucky. Wow. What a loser," Shoal giggled.

"Yeah. Well, my reputation has more sex than humanly possible so-"

Jesse snorted but didn't comment.

Tataryn nudged him with his elbow. "You think that's true?"

"Look, no single human being is going to get laid as much as Lucky's reputation. If rumors are to be believed, she's banged pretty much everyone in the upper hierarchy, most of Blackwatch, Gérard and Amélie Lacroix, some of the medical staff, and everyone here. Like even if you were in a committed relationship with one very active person, you still wouldn't be able to keep up with the rumors," Shoal said, laughing at your face.

Jesse and Tataryn started laughing, for admittedly different reasons.

You just ate a whole handful of shrimp chips and turned your attention back to the viewscreens. Because you did not need to hear this bullshit.

Your trainees killed it and managed to follow the rules. Captain Amari would not be mounting your head on a pike or making you stick out the remainder of the training period. Hooray!

You hung around to congratulate them, noting that Lowell and Maeda Vargas were getting along very well now, an odd combination to be sure, but hey, as long as they kept the peace and didn't break into the armory or blow themselves up.

"So wait, this is your last week teaching us? We have two weeks of training left!" Maeda Vargas crossed his arms.

You pursed your lips, noting that Jeong and Lowell had gravitated to your discussion. "The black op session was only supposed to last a week."

"So if we screw up again..." Maeda Vargas grinned, his smile a little too sharp for your tastes.

"I will personally take you out back with a shovel," you said, your cadence eerily like Captain Patel's. The trio flinched. Hell, you would have too, except that would have ruined the scariness you were trying to convey.

"So, do you have advice for us?" Lowell asked.

"Rein this idiot in," you said, looking at Maeda Vargas. "Put yourself out there more. You do better work together."

A shy smile spread across Lowell's face and they stared down at the shoes.

"So if we want to join the black ops program...?" Maeda Vargas exhaled slowly.

"We don't usually take green recruits," you said and his face fell. You felt like you'd kicked a puppy, a bad puppy who ate your candy and peed in your shoes, but a puppy nonetheless. "But, we will be watching your first year as agents very closely. And the three of you have a lot of potential."

"What does that actually mean?" Maeda Vargas asked.

"Don't screw up and come talk to me in six months. You need some basic Overwatch agent experience before I feel comfortable bringing you in."

"What about Chey?"
You squinted at him. "Chey isn't your business. And he has field experience. You don't. But after six months as a full agent, you will. We'll see if you're ready then. This isn't a guarantee. You have to put in the work and you've got some distance to cover. It could be six months, it could be two years, it could be never. But I expect that the three of you will catch on fast."

Maeda Vargas nodded slowly. Jeong cocked her head to the side. Lowell shifted back and forth on their heels.

"Can we...message you if we have questions?" Jeong asked.

"We learn better face to face," Maeda Vargas said quickly.

"Yes, that would be better," Jeong amended, nodding vigorously.

You stared at their hopeful faces and sighed. "Yeah, message me if you want to talk. I'm not always on site though, so there might be a delay."

"Since you and Agent Tataryn aren't going to be our instructors any more, do you want to come to our celebration tonight?" Lowell asked.

You blinked.

"...We understand if you can't," Jeong added quickly.

"But you should. You should totally drink with us, ma'am. We'll buy!" Maeda Vargas said.

"I'm afraid I have a prior commitment," you said, shaking your head.

Lowell stared at the ground.

"Oh," Jeong said in a small voice.

Maeda Vargas bit his lip, looking like he wanted to say more. And you realized then that while it was true, you sounded like you were blowing them off. Well shit.

"...But I will try to make your post-graduation celebration," you said. "No promises though, because I have at least two field ops coming up and...well, that's black ops. Your personal life comes second."

"So wait, drinking with us counts as a personal and not professional?" Jeong asked.

You sighed deeply, as the three of them smirked gleefully at you. "Drinking is only professional if you are maintaining cover or engaging in diplomacy."

"That's a yes!" Maeda Vargas said, elbowing Lowell.

Jeong giggled.

And you didn't have the heart to contradict them.
You put in your hoops, the ones Jack gave you for Christmas, wondering if they would survive the night. The dress fit perfectly, and the heels were far more comfortable than you anticipated. Maybe that would change after an hour. You took Amélie's advice on smoky, dramatic eye makeup, loose hair, and red lipstick.

The dress shimmered even in the lowlights of your room, and the crystal beads should have been too much, but they were the same shade as the fabric, so they lent it sparkle without being gaudy. You stared at the gloves on your dresser. You had dark blue satin ones that would match. Hell, the black leather ones would look fine.

You glanced down at your leg. The mottled skin no longer looked painful, but it was still warped and unpleasant. You shook your head. Jack and Gabriel never looked at your wounds with pity or disgust. None of your friends did. Amélie was right, of course, and you knew that on an intellectual level.

But the extra attention...That would bother you and you knew it. However, sometimes sacrifices needed to be made, and this was a small one.

You strapped your tanto to your right thigh and looked at yourself in the mirror. This wasn't like the suit. Professionalism had gone out the window along with subtlety. You looked pretty and dangerous, pure femme fatale. Your scars only added to that.

All right then. It was almost time to go. Feng had sent a private shuttle to pick you up, and that seemed a little extreme for a night out, but then you pictured sitting on an Orca, trying to keep your dress nice. Nope.

You pulled on the knee-length black dress coat, Amélie had purchased for you, and realized that you still had to walk to the shuttle bay. Great. Taking a deep breath, you looked into the mirror, staring yourself in the eye. "I do stupid things for friendship," you said. "But so do my friends."

Nodding to yourself, you grabbed your matching clutch, went across the hall, and knocked on Genji's door.

There was a shuffle and the door opened. Genji stood there in a three piece suit, red tie, pocket square, and scarf, black waistcoat and jacket. There were holes for his tubing, and the metal plate of his jaw was still in place, red lights matching the his accent pieces. His hair was spiked as usual, and he wore a long black coat. You could see the wakizashi on his belt. He must have the katana in a spine sheath - it wouldn't show as obviously under the coat.

He looked at you with uncertain eyes, the scars of his face very prominent.

You cocked your head to the side. "Very nice," you said.

Genji gave you a once over, his eyes lingering on your left leg and then your bare hands. There was a moment of silence and he looked at your face solemnly.

"Do I have lipstick on my teeth or something?" You gave a wide, panicked smile.

He shook his head.

"Do I look bad?" You wondered aloud. "Because Amélie and Captain Amari swear this color and cut are flattering."

Genji gave you a small smile, and shook his head. "You still match Hanzo," he huffed,
"Well, shit," you said, crossing your arms. "Amélie made me wear this."

"You look good," he said.

"You do too," you said. "I'm still feeling awkward as fuck, but at least I don't look it, right?"

Genji nodded slowly. "And I?" He spread his arms, letting you inspect the cut of his suit. It was all very flattering. But it wasn't the suit he was worried about, now was it?

"Dude, you look like a fucking anime boss," you said. "You're effortlessly channeling the stylish badass thing. And maybe you do look a wee bit like a mafia don." You held your thumb and forefinger about half an inch apart. "Just a little, and in the best way possible."

He exhaled. "Not entirely what I was going for, but thank you." He stepped out of his room, shutting the door behind him. "You realize we still have to walk to the docking bays, yes? Dressed like this? The rumors are going to get worse."

"Pfft, I don't even care any more," you said. "Besides, the current contender is Tataryn. I'm really good with switching out soon."

Genji chuckled. "You match Hanzo."

"Oh. Yeah, well, whatever," you said cleverly. Shrugging, you and Genji headed out, both of you standing a little straighter than before.

There hadn't been a lot of people hanging around the halls, but there had been enough, and you wondered what the rumor mill would look like next week.

Hanzo was already in the waiting area, tapping his foot impatiently. And you were suddenly glad you had not worn the Assassin Butler suit, because Genji was right, you would have matched. The dress might have coordinated with his outfit, but you didn't match, thankfully.

Hanzo looked good too. Not that you needed to tell him that. Clean-shaven, with his hair in a ponytail, he was already pretty. He wore a black pinstriped waistcoat with blue trim and a blue tie and pinstriped pants. Underneath the vest, he had on a white collared shirt, blue kanji on the left sleeve; the right sleeve was covered in black leather, a reinforced pauldron on his shoulder, and his bow was in a leather bag slung over his shoulder.

"Genji, we don't match. You had me panicked for nothing."

"You coordinate," Genji said.

If Hanzo was surprised by your appearance, he didn't show it.

"There you are."

You turned around to see Jack and Gabriel entering the room, still in their work clothes. Jack's eyes widened as he took in your form, his gaze lingering on your exposed skin. A small smile crept across his face.
"You look good, sweetheart," he murmured, ignoring the Shimadas.

You glanced at Gabriel, who was watching you hungrily, his nostrils flared, and eyes dark. Suddenly, you wanted to stay in tonight.

"Doesn't she look good, Gabe? You're awfully quiet..." Jack chuckled.

"Shut up, Jack." Gabriel crossed the distance and leaned over to kiss you, his hands warm on your shoulders.

"So do you like it or not?"

"Don't know yet. Let me see you without the jacket." Gabriel just smirked at your breathless glare.

You pulled the jacket off and let it hang over your arm. The dress caught the light and you obligingly spun around in place so they could inspect it.

Gabriel tilted his head back. "Are you sure you have to go to Shanghai tonight, hermosa?"

"Yes, I already agreed to go, too late to back out now," you said regretfully.

Jack came up behind you, leaning over to kiss your neck. "Wish we could come."

"You are both invited," you said.

"...Maybe next time," Gabriel said, thoughtfully. "When will you be back?"

"Tomorrow, probably," you said.

"Have fun," Jack chuckled, and nipped your ear before running his fingers along one earring and down the side of your neck. "I'm glad you like them." He lightly tugged the earring for emphasis.

"We'll just be here thinking about all the fun you'll be having and how we're going to top that," Gabriel purred in your ear.

You smiled. "OK."

"Don't get arrested," Gabriel said as he turned to look at the Shimadas. Hanzo had averted his eyes and Genji was staring at the wall, an exasperated look on his face. Like your PDA bothered him. Which actually, now that you thought about it, it might.

"Yes, we'll try to keep her out of trouble, sir," Genji said dryly.

"Good luck with that," Jack said. "We don't expect miracles."

"Hey!"

"Behave," Gabriel said, voice gravelly as he leaned over for another kiss, his mouth was insistent against yours and you were not actually the one who needed the reminder on how to behave. Eventually, you had to break away, unwilling to get hot and heavy in front of Hanzo.

The bay door opened and to your surprise, Feng stepped out in a knee-length jade green wrap dress, her arms bare, and her hair up in a high ponytail.
"...You guys look fabulous!" She squealed, and to her credit, did not openly drool at Hanzo. "Hi Jack! Hi Gabriel! Can I call you Gabriel? I've heard so much about you and it's all pretty damn adorable! Oh, should I not have said that in front of your subordinates? Well, sorry about that. I'll uh, reign it in, and...huh." She paused. "Well, no matter. You do you."

Gabriel's brows knitted together. "What?"

"We should go now," Genji said, nudging Feng. Hanzo was already boarding the shuttle.

"Oh? We should? OK! Hi Jack! Bye Jack! Nice seeing you! Don't worry, I'll have them home tomorrow. I'll make sure Lucky has fun, and I have plenty of bail money! You can count on me!" Feng looped one arm around yours, and giggled.

You waved, and suddenly saw what had Feng so amused. Turning your head you covered your mouth. The two of you hurried onto the shuttle.

"You look fine," she said in your ear. "You can touch up your makeup on the ride over, since he is wearing most of your lipstick."

"I've got snacks, drinks, candy, card games, and...oh. That's not mine!" Feng said and hurriedly shoved something under the seat cushions.

The four of you were spread out on three plush red couches, seatbelts discretely affixed between the cushions. There was a bar, a bolted down table, and a very large view screen. You sat beside Feng, watching Hanzo lounge and Genji try to look relaxed. They both just looked stiff.

"Don't play cards with these two. They cheat," Hanzo said, maintaining a polite, if disinterested demeanor.

Feng's eyes brightened. "Really?" She gave Genji a bright smile. "You want to hit up the casinos in Macau?"

"...Then we really will get arrested," you laughed.

"Only if we get caught," Genji said, examining his gloved hands.

"Can I get you some sake? I have dry and sparkling variants. Maybe some passion fruit, guava, or pineapple mochi to go with it?"

"I like mochi," Genji said. "Is this Hawaiian style?"

"Yup, it has a butter mochi base, so there's plenty of coconut milk in it, but I guess the tropical fruit gave it away. Had a client bring some in and now I'm hooked. Ordered more. A lot more." Feng got up and went behind the bar, grabbing bottles, glasses, and boxes as she went.

You wondered if Zheng was listening in. No, you knew she was, you just wondered if you were supposed to pretend otherwise.

"Can I just say you all look amazing? Like Genji you are the best dressed cyberpunk ninja I've ever seen. It's a great look. And Hanzo, I don't know where you got that suit, but I want one." Feng bustled around, setting boxes of mochi on the table and then the little sake cups. "Lucky, I was expecting you to be all formal and intimidating, but instead you look super hot and gorgeous, but also like you're going to snap someone's neck between your legs and I'm totally good with that. What did you want to drink?"

"Sparkling sake, please," you said as she poured a glass for you and herself. Hanzo and Genji chose the drier, more astringent stuff and you took a bite of the pineapple mochi, enjoying the chewiness and the subtle coconut milk richness, blending with the sweet pineapple filling. "That's nice."

"I know. I want to buy that company! But they're not for sale. So I just placed a massive order and am now eating my way through it. I probably should not be allowed to shop late at night. I don't need to buy desserts in bulk." She shook her head. "I also don't need to buy office supplies, candy, and travel mugs in bulk. Hey, do any of you need pens? Because I bought a pack of like 400 gel pens and honestly they're going to dry up before I get around to using them all..."

You blinked.

"That was too much information," Feng sighed and drained her sake. "Sorry. I just get excited and talk. And then everyone is like "...wow, Feng. You're insane." And I just shrug sheepishly, like "why are you even surprised? At what point did I claim to be the stable responsible one?"

"Have some more mochi," Genji said, nudging a box toward her.

"I could use some pens," Hanzo said, after a moment of sipping his sake. He gave himself a refill, not actually making eye contact with the rest of you.

"They are really nice pens," Feng said. "Not expensive works of art that you keep in the boardroom as pseudo-dicks to brag about, just very smooth for writing. And coloring. I like coloring." Feng paused. "Don't judge me, it's soothing, OK?"

You leaned back on the couch, and downed your sparkling sake. It was light and subtly sweet. "So, how are things?"

"Busy." Feng rolled her eyes. "Everyone simultaneously wants me to take charge and make things work efficiently, while also catering to their individual concerns and having me reassure them that yes, they are special. We are...working on a balance. But at least Fa is gone, yeah?" She frowned at the wall. "Wish he hadn't pushed it this far, you know? He wasn't a total incompetent. Really could have used his help on the boring shit. But what's done is done and you know, it's nice being able to take a bath without someone trying to kill you."

"Yes, it's good help or peaceful baths. You can't have both," Genji said.

"You are a much bigger smart ass than I was led to believe," Feng said, pointing at him. "I approve."

"You are less of a fool than I expected," Genji said. "But only just."

"Pfft, I have the rest of the night to impress you with my foolery," Feng laughed. "So what's up with you guys? Or is it all classified, if-we-told-you-we'd-have-to-murder-you stuff?"

"Yes," Genji said, sipping his sake flashing a cheeky grin.

"Well fine, I can just talk about my life," Feng shot back.
"How is Bayan adjusting?" Hanzo asked quickly, finally reaching for a piece of mochi.

"He's doing OK. Misses his friends. Still gets a little mopey about everything, and that's to be expected. But damn, he's a good guy. So smart and helpful. I think he's fitting in well. Jalair is actually really excited to join the White Rabbit legal department. I got some passive-aggressive inquiries from some of Nguyen's people. I just told them that yeah, the Bayan brothers work for me now, and really do they want to come to my house and pick a fight with my people? I know she's not going to forget this, but whatever. Nguyen's cybernetics team is shitty anyway. Too much emphasis on combat-readiness and not enough focus on versatility. Like those prostheses can't be comfortable." Feng shook her head. "Yeah, you can kill half a dozen men with your enhancements, but they're too bulky to let you tie your shoelaces. That's not good engineering. That's just...dumb."

Genji raised a brow. "I did not realize you were getting into the cybernetics business."

"We do a little bit of everything," Feng said, with a modest shrug. "I'd rather just produce them in-house for our people, for security reasons, but since we're already investing a significant amount of resources into the project, we might as well see how we can do on the market." She looked at your fingers for a moment, blinking, like she hadn't realized they were inorganic.

"You want to form a keiretsu?"

"We've had an equivalent for a long time," Feng shrugged. "I'd like to be doing more on the R&D side. You know, we have the supplies, the research power, and the money. Why not?"

"You were a history student?" Hanzo asked after a moment, like he was trying to reconcile the image of who Feng used to be and what she was now.

"...Yeah, totally unrelated to my current field, I know. I've been doing my MBA on the side, and some other relevant business degrees, because it makes the cousins happy. Mostly I just throw out ideas, show the company how to get to where I'm visualizing, and keep people in line. Yeah, Aunt Zheng's been giving me some hardcore science lessons, but I'm never going to be a geneticist. I will however, know what they're talking about when they give me research proposals and grant requests."

"That's impressive."

"I'm motivated. Because as long as we're successful, I get to stay in charge and keep my family at bay. If I fuck up, well...it won't be pretty."

You weren't sure if she meant the cousins or her parents, but either way, she was right. It would not be pretty.

"And I convinced Li to get on board and try to help me run White Rabbit. It isn't going so well, because he's boring, naggy, and has a stick up his ass. There's a learning curve, but he's the anal retentive type you can trust keep things running. Really. I just replaced Fa with Li, but...I can't do anything bad to Li, he'll tell Mom," she said shaking her head. "Honestly, he just needs to get laid, and he's just too shy about meeting guys, but whatever. Not my problem."

"Brothers," Genji said with a head shake.

Hanzo gave him a sharp look.

"Brothers," Feng commiserated. She looked at you. "Sorry, don't mean to leave you out of the conversation."
"Oh no, Lucky has Mihret and McCree. She understands," Genji laughed.

"McCree isn't...Whatever. And Ziv definitely isn't a brother. More a burden I have to bear, for the rest of my life," you sighed and poured yourself more sake.

"...That is the definition of "brother,"" Feng muttered and Hanzo flinched.

Genji watched Hanzo squirm, not quite reveling in it, but not diverting Feng either.

"They're not all bad," she said as she saw Hanzo staring at his shoes. "You have some insanely rocky patches, sure. Hell, I went years without talking to Li because...well, for reasons that seemed good at the time. But now aren't so important. If you get past those issues, mainly pride, maybe you can do cool things together. Like reengineer dinosaurs. Take over the family business. Eat lots of desserts. You can't just erase siblings, not if there's blood and history between you. They know too much and there's no one else in the world who remembers your childhood tribulations and your parents' quirks quite like they do."

Genji's expression softened.

Hanzo raised his eyes, hesitantly.

The brothers stared at each other, but no words were exchanged. Hanzo looked away first, but Genji's expression was contemplative, not angry.

"It's a good goal," you said after a moment.

"Yeah. And we might actually accomplish things, if my brother can get his head out of his ass." Feng laughed. "Stranger things have happened." She poured you all more sake and bit into a square of mochi, grumbling to herself.

You knew Feng could not be as oblivious as she pretended and you wondered then what her angle was.

"So, I've never been here before, but it has rave reviews," Feng began as you walked into the restaurant, colorful glass fractal sculptures hanging from the ceiling. They looked like someone had gotten a little too excited with a cake decorating tool and decked the halls with glossy multicolored frosting flowers, ribbons, and curlicues.

You were high up in a skyscraper, one with a shuttle dock and sky bridge, just off the Bund. You glared across the river, recalling your last trip here.

Genji was getting sidelong stares and not-so discrete looks, but then, so were you. You just squared your shoulders, and gave Genji a pained, but tolerant smile. He nodded. To your surprise, Feng looped her arm in yours and walked straight up the maître'd. You glanced over your shoulder, Hanzo and Genji strolled behind at a leisurely pace.

"Zhai, party of four," she said. The woman nodded, not quite making eye contact and led you to a round table off to the side of the open dining room. The color scheme was indigo and white, and there was a lot of glass, but you were high up and meant to enjoy the view. The skyline was bright and you sat down beside Feng, a little surprised that she hadn't tried to get closer to "So Lucky, inquiring minds are dying to know," Feng grinned as the maître'd distributed menus, bowed, and quickly backed away.

"...Just you, Feng. Just you. I'm happier not knowing," Genji said surveying the open dining room. He sat on your other side, posture stiff.

"So maybe it's just me who wants to know, because Genji is a mad spoilsport, but how serious are you, Jack, and Gabriel?"

You were glad you weren't drinking anything just yet, because you would have choked.

"That's kind of personal," you muttered.

"We're friends! Friends ask personal questions! It's like, part of the job description! Do you want to talk about the weather all night? It's warm and smoggy out there with a chance for acid rain. Oh boy, that's so exciting." Feng rolled her eyes.

"We're the kind of friends who drink, watch films together, and don't talk about feelings," Genji said.

"Oh," Feng said, sounding a little disappointed. "Well, I'm not trying to make you uncomfortable. Sorry."

"Jack and Gabriel have been together for a long time. I'm just...going with it," you said, staring at your wine glass.

"You're happy right? Because as hot as they are, if they don't make you happy-" You looked over at Feng who studied your expression with great intensity. She leaned too close, inches from your face, squinting at you, like maybe she could see into your skull and pick out the truth.

"Yeah. They make me happy." You fought the urge to back up.

"I am making you uncomfortable," she said with a headshake. "Wow, I'm sorry. You're usually so professional and cool. I didn't realize feelings were your weakness."

"Feelings and cake," Genji said.

"What kind of cake?" Feng perked up.

"All cakes," Genji said with a smirk.

You nodded solemnly. "All cakes."

Feng grinned at you. "I bought this really awesome strawberry cake for tonight. It's at my condo. We can totally swing by after for cake, drinks, and Super Smash Brothers. Because I know you're awesome as Samus, Genji."

Genji blinked slowly. "...Yes." He stared at her for a moment too long.

You leaned back in your chair, a little surprised by how tame Feng had been tonight. Sure, she still spouted off most of the thoughts that went through her head, but she hadn't actually gone on tangents about how attractive Hanzo was or behaved inappropriately. It was a pleasant surprise.

The waiter cleared his throat, sweating as he stopped in front of the table.
"I am sorry for the wait. I am Xie. I would be happy to take your order. But if you're not ready, I can go stand over there." His eyes darted between Feng and Hanzo and then flinched as you and Genji turned to look at him. He was round guy, soft and baby-faced. And he smiled weakly, his chin wobbling.

"I'm ready," Feng propped open her menu. "I want to try the chicharrones de pollo sin hueso marinated in mushroom soy sauce, pomelo juice, and shàoxīng jiǔ."

"I'll have the five spice spare ribs in black bean sauce and the stuffed chayotes in garlic sauce," you said.

"I want the spare ribs as well," Genji said. "And the fried plantains with málà seasoning and dry chilies."

"I would like the bistec de palomilla with Sichuan spicy bean sauce and garlic chives." Hanzo closed his menu, bearing suddenly regal and eyes sharp. "What kind of Malbecs do you have?"

The waiter stuttered as he recited the wine list and you looked over at Genji who wore a faint smile, like Hanzo being a wine snob was old hat. Well, it didn't actually surprise you.

Feng raised a brow.

Hanzo picked one, and while you recognized the brand name, you didn't know enough about vintages to make any judgment, except that it was expensive.

"Yeah, we're going to need some baijiu too. I don't think a malbec is going to go well with my chicken."

"I know what I'm doing," Hanzo said with a huff.

"Yes, dear," Feng said, rolling her eyes.

"It will pair well with strong meaty flavors. I realize you think that you can only drink whites with white meat however-

"Please, tell me all about it, dear," she said caustically.

Hanzo glared at her. "You can order your baijiu, woman. No one's stopping you."

"You're so generous, dear," she said, smirking now.

Hanzo's expression was thunderous. His brows knitted together and for a moment, you glimpsed the man who would have run the Shimada clan with an iron fist.

The waiter quaked.

Feng yawned, patting her mouth. "I'll take a bottle of Màotái too."

The waiter looked helplessly between Hanzo and Feng.

"Why are you looking at me?" Hanzo snapped. "If she wants Màotái, she can have Màotái. I'm not her father."

"He's afraid to offend your expertise," she said with a sardonic grin. "Stop worrying, Xie. This is a culinary disagreement between Hanzo and me. He is too professional to retaliate against bystanders. We will resolve it by ordering both. See? No problems."

The waiter nodded weakly. "Yes, ma'am."

"Hanzo, get that look off your face. You're terrorizing the staff."

Hanzo glowered at her, but forced himself to relax, pursing his lips, like he'd eaten something sour. It was no happier, but far more comical and maybe a smidgen less intimidating.

Feng just leaned forward, resting her chin on her hands and she batted her lashes at Hanzo. It was definitely more a taunt than a flirtation.

Genji snorted.

"What's going on with you and McCree?" Genji asked as the two of you watched Feng and Hanzo square off.

"Nothing," you said, with a shrug.

Genji sipped his water. "You used to spend a lot of time with him."

You shrugged. "I still do. Just busier with all the work I'm doing."

"...You know what I mean. The two of you used to always be laughing and joking together. Now I rarely see you alone with him."

"It's nothing like that. You know whom he's pining over," you said sharply.

"That's not what I meant," Genji said. He looked at Hanzo who was now back to giving Feng a murderous glare. "Things haven't been the same between you two since Lucerne."

You sat back in your chair, a little shocked that Genji had called you out, in a fancy restaurant no less. You shrugged. "OK."

"You should talk to him," Genji said, after a moment.

You studied your cloth napkin, folded like a swan, or maybe a duck. Hell, it could have been a Loch Ness monster. The fact Genji, of all people, was bringing this up meant that maybe you were more obvious than you thought.

"I'm not mad at him. I have Jesse's back, you know that. He does too."

"Things aren't right between the two of you. He knows. You know. Stop pretending like that's not the case. It's been a few months. You should talk about it while the rift is still small." Genji studied his metal arm.

"...I don't think there's anything to say."

"You made up with Reyes awhile ago. Just because you didn't get into it with McCree, doesn't mean everything is fine."

You frowned at him. "Didn't think you were so meddlesome." Or insightful.

"It's no fun when people interfere in your business, is it?" He laughed at you and you were tempted to throw your drink at him. "What's wrong? Can't handle the taste of your own medicine?"
"You're such a shit, Genji."

"You're welcome, Lucky."

The food arrived faster than you expected, a side bonus of eating out with mafia heirs. Feng got out some kind of pen-sized scanner and discretely checked each dish and drink. She then smiled brightly at all of you and nodded.

You had a water glass, a wine glass, and a small ceramic cup for the baijiu.

The ribs were falling off the bone soft, cooked in an umami-rich, savory sauce and fragrant with anise, cinnamon, pepper, fennel, and garlic. You sighed happily. The meal was served family-style, and you used the serving spoons to ladle the plantains and chayote onto your plate.

"You can use your chopsticks; you don't even need to reverse them," Feng said. "I can't catch anything from you and vice versa."

Hanzo sipped his malbec and made a point to take some of her chicken. "This goes fine with the malbec. In case you were wondering."

"It's really nice with the bai jiу," she said cheerfully.

Hanzo just took a big drink of his wine.

Genji had been drinking baijiu, and he seemed slightly less tense. "Good choice in restaurants, Feng. I've never had Cuban-Chinese and I thought you couldn't really get much of it outside New York or Havana."

"I don't know how culturally authentic it is. I think the chef just likes fusing Latin and Chinese dishes, but I'm not complaining. It's still tasty."

"These ribs are great. I should order some to go for Gabriel," you said.

"Get some for Jack too," Feng said. "How do you like the Máotái with your ribs?" She poured you a little cupful, her smile angelic.

The hair on the back of your neck stood up straight.

Suddenly Hanzo was pouring red wine into your glass. "Try the malbec; this was an excellent vintage." He stared at you expectantly.

"Genji, you got to taste this with me..." you said slowly.

"I like the baijiu," he said, not even looking up from shoveling plantains into his mouth.

Hanzo gritted his teeth. "Genji will eat anything. You have culinary skill. Your professional assessment is required."

You never though Hanzo would actually ask for your opinion. It was surreal.

"Well?" Feng giggled, because she was a troublemaker.
Glass shattered then, someone screamed, and you heard the familiar crack of a gunshot. You were halfway out of your chair when the man in the rabbit mask began to shout. Three more gun-toting men in tracksuits, wearing squirrel, raccoon, and panda masks rushed in forming a perimeter. Rabbit had a semiautomatic rifle. The rest carried mid-range pistols.

Feng tugged on your wrist and lowered her hand, palm downward. You sat.

"Nobody move! This is a robbery. Just throw your purses and credit chips into the bag and no one gets hurt!"

"Are they serious?" You tilted your head sideways. You figured there were more discrete ways to try to assassinate Feng or Hanzo.

Feng shrugged and went back to eating her chicken. "Fuck if I know." She chewed, watching them lazily.

Genji and Hanzo looked at each other and kept eating, though Genji adjusted his coat and Hanzo angled his chair outward a few degrees. The docking bay wasn't far from the restaurant. Well, if they had the right kind of transport, yeah, they could rob the restaurant on a skyscraper and not worry about elevators. You mentally mapped the route and wondered if they could get out in time.

The food on your plate still steamed with heat, and the aroma made you salivate. You took another bite of fatty rib meat. It half-melted on your tongue, the flavors well-balanced, smoky, rich, and savory, with a hint of sweet. You probably should have been paying more attention to the robbers, but these were some really delicious ribs.

Hanzo poured himself more malbec, and eyed your glass. Genji refilled his baijiu cup and you knew he had to be doing this just to annoy his brother. Not that you blamed him.

"He said not to move!" Panda snarled as he waved his gun at your table. "Hands where I can see-"

Feng's elbow shot out and suddenly Panda was on his ass, gasping for air. He dropped the gun, and Feng discretely kicked it under another table. Then she took another bite of chicken and a swig of baijiu.

"Hey, what's going on here?" Squirrel came over to help his comrade up, and Hanzo poured the rest of the malbec into Feng's empty wine glass and whirled, smashing the bottle into the side of Squirrel's temple. The robber dropped, broken glass littering the floor. Hanzo wiped his hand on the napkin and went back to eating his beef.

"I'm not drinking all that," Feng said, pointing at the wine glass and pouring herself more baijiu.

"You should at least try it," Hanzo said, looking exasperated. "Lucky, taste it and tell her it's good."

"No, she needs to try the baijiu first," Feng said. "It's not as heavy."

"Just cleanse your palate in between," Genji said, hogging all the fried plantains.

"What the fuck is going on here?" Rabbit and Raccoon sidled up to the table.

"We're eating dinner, obviously," Feng said.
"This is a robbery, bitch!" Raccoon shoved the barrel of his gun in Feng's face. And she stared at the barrel, as it blocked the route from the plate to her mouth. "You stupid rich fucks. You wouldn't survive a day in the real world! You don't even know when you're in danger-"

You smacked the barrel upward with your right hand. Feng leaned backward her chair, balancing it on the two back legs, as you smashed your left fist into Raccoon's face and down he went.

"What the-" Rabbit never finished that question.

Genji slammed the pommel of his katana into Rabbit's nose. The man dropped and blood began to seep through the mask.

"Be careful, Genji. No leakage near the table. We're trying to eat," Hanzo scowled.

"I will be more conscientious of such things in the future," Genji said with a mock bow.

Hanzo just shook his head.

Feng got up and delicately kicked the guns out of Rabbit and Raccoon's reach. Quickly, a group of waiters rushed the downed robbers while the hostess collected the guns. The dining room was oddly silent, and while you could feel the stares of the other patrons, something worse was brewing nearby.

"Now, you need to try the baijiu," Feng beamed, taking another bite of chicken.

"And the malbec," Hanzo said, sternly.

Out of excuses, and robbers to take down, you complied. You took your time, trying not to flinch as Hanzo and Feng watched you eagerly. The Máotái brand baijiu was a smooth rice liquor and you liked it. You took a bite of rice and a sip of water before trying the malbec. Silently, you prayed to St. Lacroix the Refined for inspiration.

Genji was laughing at you. You could see it.

Feng and Hanzo leaned even closer. You weren't sure if they were even in their chairs any more.

"The baijiu really complements the richness of the meat, but the malbec blends well with the spice of the sauce. They are both excellent choices," you said, palms clammy.

"Oh, you are smooth when you want to be," Feng laughed.

"For such a crude mouth, she actually has a refined palate," Hanzo said, and you rolled your eyes at him while he drained the rest of Feng's untouched malbec.

You took the rest of your food to go. Poor Xie looked like he was going to cry when he came over. Feng just asked for the check, all grace and pleasantries. But her shoulders tensed as you and Genji boxed up the food.

Quaking, with his arms tucked close to his body, Xie brought the check in a leather folio.
Hanzo reached for it.

Feng deftly batted his hand away.

Genji made grab for it, faster than you could.

Feng tried to block him, but Hanzo intercepted her hand.

You made another lunge for it.

But this was Feng's territory and Xie practically threw the folio at her and ran.

"I'm the eldest-" Hanzo said.

"Are you sure you're older than Lucky?" Genji smirked.

"That's rude and you shouldn't be speculating about her age," Feng said with a laugh, keeping the invoice just out of their reach. "No, I'm the hostess! You came all the way out here to visit so it's my treat."

"I ordered the malbec," Hanzo said.

"Yes, we know." Feng stuck her tongue out at him.

"It was more expen-"

"How would you know? You don't have the check, I do. The Máotái brand is actually more expensive."

"You're overpaying then," Hanzo sniffed.

"For the malbec, sure. But I'll do what I can to keep my guests comfortable," Feng said. "Even put up with their mediocre tastes."

Genji covered his mouth.

Hanzo blinked, and in the time frame he was too stunned to react, Feng waved down Xie, paid the bill, and crossed her arms triumphantly.

Hanzo gawped at her.

"The bill's paid. If you're sore about it, you can spring for the xiāo nóng bāo on the way home."

"Oh, I should pick some of those up too. Gabriel likes soup dumplings. Jack just scalds his mouth on them..."

Feng snorted.

The restaurant presented you with a couple more orders of ribs, fried plantains, and four bottles of Máotái. You weren't sure if that was them being generous or Feng getting them to troll Hanzo. Either way, the four of you left before the police arrived.

You boarded Feng's shuttle and on a whim, fished around the couch cushion she'd buried something under. That thing she swore wasn't hers. You found a large well-worn blue sea turtle plush and promptly adjusted the cushion, pretending like you hadn't seen it. It was really cute though.

Feng's chosen xiǎolóngbāo vendor had a small outdoor stall open late and the order was already prepped to go. Hanzo paid, and you wondered, not for the first time, the state of his finances. But Genji didn't look worried, so you wouldn't be either.

"Did you guys want to go clubbing or see a show?" Feng asked as you got back into the transport. "There's opera, which is an acquired taste. We can see some movies. Do a VR experience. Wander the Bund like knights errant..."

"I heard you had cake," you said.

"Strawberry cake," Hanzo murmured.

"I've got ice wine, champagne, and moscato if you're feeling a dessert wine pairing," Feng said.

"Champagne," Hanzo said sharply.

"Cretin," Genji said in a high-pitched voice. "That's just what the nouveau riche would say!"

To your surprise, Hanzo laughed. You chalked it up to the bottle of malbec, he had, after all, drank most of it on his own.

Chapter End Notes

There was a mixup with the flight stuff, but I think I got it sorted. Oh boy.

Yes, I described Scion outfit Hanzo with Young Master face and hair.

Not much to report. I'm trying to reign in the petty tendencies at work and weeded for the first time this year. Ugh. I hate yard work. If only because come summer, there are all kinds of bugs in the grass and they love me. I am delicious. My cousin and I can be outside with the dogs for ten minutes and when we go inside, he's fine and I have like ten bites. Mosquitos like the shadiness, and we have chiggers and clouds of biting gnats.

Trying to get the plot back on track. All this fluff is making me soft. ( ° _ ° )
Chapter 61

Chapter Summary

Slumber parties and the hint of normalcy.

Chapter Notes

I broke 500k yesterday. Yeesh.

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Feng's condo was deceptively normal, despite being high up and having access to a shuttle dock. It was a little cluttered, with golden hardwood floors and an expensive entertainment system. You eyed the vault on the wall, and the kinetic barriers around the windows. It was mostly western in furnishings, but you still took your shoes off at the door and put on a pair of house slippers, there were an assortment, and they all had a weird onion-octopus on them. Feng had a lot of cute things on display: stylized chubby animal teapots, Sanrio-themed coasters, sushi-shaped throw pillows. There were several gaming consoles in the entertainment center.

"Hey, turn on the view screen and the Nintendo, will you?"

You suspected it was Zheng who powered everything on. Feng set all the food down on the coffee table. There were large onion-octopus cushions on the floor and you watched Genji take off his coat, set it on the rack, and settle down on one of them. He grabbed a controller off the shelf and began flicking through the game selection.

Hanzo began unpacking some of the soup dumplings and Feng returned with plates, utensils, and a large pink and white cake, covered in whipped cream and strawberries.

Hanzo settled on the loveseat, closest to Genji and watched the screen with some interest. Genji handed him a controller. Feng sat down beside you and began picking at the dumplings. You were a little surprised that she was hungry still, but then you remembered that she had some kind of enhancements and it probably fucked with her metabolism.

"I feel bad, like you came all the way to Shanghai just to eat and hang out in my living room. You sure you don't want to go out and look for crime to fight or buildings to bungee jump off of?"

"Nah, it's been eventful already. I don't mind just staying in and gaming. We don't...normally."

"Does Athena cheat? Because I know Aunt Zheng does," Feng said.

"No, we're just really hard on controllers..." You did not look at Genji, but he was the main culprit, though Gabriel had been known to accidentally destroy them when playing Mario Kart with Jack.
"Oh, yeah, the metal prostheses. Hey, you should be fine with these. I...uh...sometimes I get rage-y and would squeeze the normal ones too hard and well, I was spending a fortune on controllers. Had some of the R&D guys improve the ergonomics, structure, overall design. Mine are pretty durable now, and universal. They can be calibrated for all gaming systems. I can't sell them yet because of IPR bullshit, but most everyone in On Sing has them and we've patented the shit out of them. We'll get them on the market eventually."

"That's...impressive," you said.

"I didn't do the work. I just emphasized that having a dozen different controllers was stupid and expensive, and couldn't we stick it to all those other companies? Spite is a great motivator." Feng poured herself some Máotái and you held out a glass.

"Are you feeling all right? You've been kind of...reserved."

"Me? Reserved? Did you not hear all my bizarre stream of consciousness rants? Or are you just that good at tuning people out?" Feng stared at you incredulously.

"There has been a distinct lack of flirtation from you," you said.

"Oh Lucky, I would, but I think Gabriel would kick my ass. It'd probably be a sexy ass-kicking, but then Jack would also be disappointed in me and that would make me sad." She giggled. "No just kidding, I know what you meant." She stared thoughtfully at her nails. "A lot of that stuff was said when I was trying to be formal, and got really fucking nervous, and just...panicked. I might have blanked out just how much I word-vomited. Not really an excuse, but for the most part I don't actually like making people uncomfortable. Also, you're all my guests and that would just be rude. Want me to cut the cake?"

"Please," you said.

"I'm less nervous now," she said. "Yes, you're all very pretty, but...I think I'm getting used to it." She winked at you as she handed you a plate of cake. "Sorry, you just don't dazzle me any more."

"Well, it was fun while it lasted." You just took the large slice of cake from her and drank your baijiu.

"So how did you know I used to play as Samus?" Genji asked.

"...Aiya, I knew you forgot," Feng sighed. "And to be honest, I'm probably weird for remembering. But one time, when my mother was doing who knows what, Dad had Li and me with him for a visit to Hanamura. We were both really young, I don't think I was in school yet. He said it was for work, and he had a cover job as a university professor..."

"And for whatever business reason, he had a meeting with Father. We saw your father around periodically," Genji said. "I...remember him leaving you two in the garden."

"And you invited us to go play Smash Brothers," Feng said. "And Li said something dickish about not wanting me to play and Hanzo ripped him a new one, verbally. Chastised him about being a good older brother and how could he be the eldest with that kind of attitude?" Feng gave a wry grin. "It was a turning point for Li. Sure, he got the lectures from our parents, but having an older, cooler boy call him out like that? He became a better brother. It didn't stick his entire life, but we were pretty close till he went off to college. But that's not a very interesting or original tale."
Hanzo blinked.

"So yeah, I think fondly of you both, even if we were kids and we never really knew each other." Feng shrugged. "No, I'm not nursing a lifelong crush. I just remember thinking, "that Hanzo is a good brother. And that Genji is a cool guy." I didn't make the Yakuza connection till I joined On Sing." Feng laughed and served everyone cake. "And by then...well, things had changed."

"I don't remember any of this," Hanzo said slowly.

"I didn't expect you to," Feng said with a shrug. "It just stuck with me, that time when you were a good, dutiful big brother and you gave my brother shit for not being one; just like I remember Genji being fun and silly. We've all changed a little," she said, picking up her fork.

You cut your cake with your fork, admiring the alternating layers of whipped cream, sponge cake, and strawberries. Asian sponge cakes skewed on the fluffier side and it felt like air on your tongue.

"This is good cake," Hanzo said.

"It is," you agreed.

Genji just held out his plate for another slice.

None of you could beat Genji at Super Smash Brothers, now that his controller could withstand his grip. Hanzo just buckled down and tried harder, button mashing at an amazing speed. Feng played as Kirby, seeming to enjoying eating everyone more than actually trying to win. You cycled through the characters, regularly coming in at last place.

That was OK. The controllers held up, even when Hanzo threw his and you squeezed the d-pad just a little too hard.

The xiāolóngbāo had cooled a little and you grabbed a pair of chopsticks, taking a break to bite into the juicy dumplings. The wrapper was chewy, the filling a burst of savory meat and vegetables, and the "soup" was just the right temperature now, no longer scalding hot. You got blown off the screen in the game, your avatar screaming as they went splat, so you happily ate the dumplings instead.

"Think we could get some of these controllers for the rec room?" Genji asked.

"Yeah," Feng grinned. "I'll send some back with you. I know you have to have them inspected, but no selling proprietary secrets, OK?"

"On second thought, I'll just keep them all," Genji said, not looking up from the screen.

"You don't understand how many handhelds he's gone through," you laughed. "He's not allowed to game on his Blackwatch phones any more, because he breaks them."

"So what I'm hearing is that the market needs more cybernetic-friendly accessories." Feng got out a tablet and scrawled a few notes. "Hey, you want to be one of our play-testers? I'll send
"...I might be able to do that," Genji said, not looking up from the screen.

Hanzo reached over and grabbed a dumpling. "So are you legalizing most of your businesses?"

"Yes and no. We're taking advantage of some of the Special Economic Zones to really maximize our wiggle room, and we have different charters and identities registered in tax havens abroad. You know, the usual gray areas. But by nature, we are...secretive and prone to acting outside the law. Hence all the moral charters and oaths to keep us from going too far. I'm trying to stay within the spirit of the Triad way, but our patron deity, left-handed Guan Yu, is kind of a dick. So by nature, we're not exactly used to being the "good guys." I'm trying, but I'm still not sure how we're doing." Feng shrugged.

"Your foray into med-tech and entrepreneurship is further than I ever got," Hanzo said, staring at his hands. "But I had more...familial constrictions."

"Oh I have those too," Feng scowled at the ceiling. "But I have figured out how to bulldoze my way through the cousins and that is progress." Feng nodded to herself. "White Rabbit Enterprises is my brainchild. I want to do cool, legal things that will give some of the family the option of going legit."

"That's an admirable goal," Hanzo said, and you discretely looked to see how much he'd had to drink. There was another empty wine bottle on the table, and it wasn't you who drank it. "I...wish to do something similar with the Shimada, should I seek to reclaim my seat."

Genji did not look up from the game.

"You make it sound nobler than it is. We're criminals, no question there. And yes, it is glorious to get rich. But, I know we can turn a profit, gloss over some of the more annoying laws, and make the world a better place. For On Sing, it's just a matter of diversifying our portfolio, you know?"

"Triads and Yakuza are not so different," Hanzo said. "We are outsiders with a warrior code."

"Yeah," Feng said. "Though, that's changed. Or maybe we were never as benevolent as we like to pretend." She gave a wry smile, popping a dumpling into her mouth. "Still, I can sympathize with Blackwatch. Sometimes you have to break the law to do the right thing. Sometimes you have to pick the lesser evil. But you can't ever get comfortable with that mindset, because it just pushes you further and further down the rabbit hole." Feng nodded. "I know I have extremely questionable ethics. And that's OK. Li, for all his whining and moaning, has a pretty decent moral compass, even if he's prone to being a shitty brother. Though, honestly, I like listening to Bayan more. He's cuter, nicer, and got a better delivery." Feng inclined her head at Hanzo.

"I wouldn't mind seeing him next time," you said, testing the waters and Hanzo looked between you and Feng with great interest.

"I invited him tonight. But he declined, said he wanted to monitor some of the new cybernetic recipients. He's got a great work ethic..." She trailed off. "But yeah, I know he was making excuses." She shrugged again. "You're welcome to drop by the lab for a visit. I was hesitant to force the issue. He's still pretty embarrassed about what happened."
"Next time then," Hanzo said, and he looked like he meant it.

"Someone play Mario Kart with me," Genji said, staring straight at you.

Rolling your eyes, you helped yourself to cake and champagne, before scooting over in front of the screen.

Feng poured everyone more drinks. Hanzo and Feng started discussing the structural differences within their family businesses while Genji pretended not to be listening in. You still continually lost to Genji, and that was OK, you were pleasantly buzzed, and there was cake. What more could you ask for?

Feng was a surprisingly good hostess. Though, maybe your standards were a little low. She had pajamas for all of you: t-shirt and long pants with that weird little onion-octopus on it. And she got out the sleeping bags, though it didn't look like Genji was getting off the Nintendo any time soon. He'd found the newest Fire Emblem game.

You took the floor, while Hanzo sprawled out on one couch, and Feng sat on the other. You had not expected the night out to turn into a gaming slumber party. It was so painfully normal, but so alien, you didn't comment. You just went with it.

"So how does it work?" Hanzo asked, sleepily while you fluffed your pillow.

"How does what work?" You asked.

"Three people?" Hanzo said, turning over and away from you.

Feng snickered and you saw Genji actually pause the game.

"Are you asking about sex?" You wondered, staring at Feng's ceiling.

"No! I know how- Forget I said anything," Hanzo mumbled.

"I don't know how the relationship works," you said. "Because I'm pretty aware that I'm in over my head." You adjusted your blanket. "I mean, I like both of them. They like each other. They like me. We're not all at the same stage, but...we're getting there. I think. I'm the slow one."

"Yes," Genji said, not even turning around.

Feng giggled in the darkness.

"Fuck you," you muttered.

"That period before she actually figured it out was agonizing for the rest of us. The sexual tension was ridiculous, and there she went, in complete denial about it for months. In fact, she would still be at it if McCree hadn't finally sat her down and told her to do something about it." Genji sounded slightly disgusted. And you remembered Jesse's visible frustration at your hesitance. It had been awhile since the two of you had just been...buddies. You winced. Genji wasn't wrong about any of it.

"It's not just chemistry," you said.
"Really? Because all that flirting between you and Jack was definitely not just friendly banter." Feng leaned over the couch, reaching for another dumpling with her bare hands.

"There's plenty of sex, and it's the best damn sex I've ever had," you said, partially because you'd had too much alcohol, partially because on some level, you'd been dying to admit it to someone else. "But I don't know, we just...spend time together. We eat, talk, watch bad movies. Gabriel reads to me. Jack and I play chess." You blew out a breath. "It gets messy some times, but in this case, having a third person to mediate actually seems to help."

The following quiet was contemplative. For a moment, you expected Hanzo to say something bitchy. But then snoring began. You'd poured out your deep dark secrets, and put him to sleep. That ass weasel.

"I find putting a pillow over his face to be an effective muffler," Genji said, returning to his game.

Feng started laughing then. "I have extra ear plugs..."

She'd put on more weight, which was a good sign, and Angela had made progress with the skin grafts and some of the cybernetic removal. She stared at him flatly, her expression pinched and hard.

Gabriel leaned forward, not the least bit impressed by her attitude.

"I was expecting to see more progress."

"Sorry, I'm failing to live up to your expectations, sir," she snapped. "I thought you were just going to lock me up and forget about the embarrassment that was Bái Shé. Or did Lucky manage to pull some of her tricky shit and get you to think you'd changed your mind?"

Gabriel wondered, for only a moment, if she knew about your relationships. "And how would she do that?"

"Come on, Commander, you're not blind. She's fucking sneaky. Gives lip service to the brass, does what she wants, and talks everyone else into her too-clever plans. Makes you think there's no chance of them failing." Lao glared at him.

"She comes up with flexible solutions," Gabriel said with a frown. "That's not such a bad thing in Blackwatch. But no, Lucky didn't want to force you into therapy. That was my call."

Lao deflated a little. "Why?" She gritted her teeth. "I thought I was a treacherous lost cause that got her unit killed."

"You know some of the shit I said was just part of the interrogation, right?" Gabriel put his hands flat on the table. "You were a Blackwatch agent once. Whether or not you can be again is another matter. But you were one of mine and the least we can do is try to get you to the point where you can live a life outside of confinement."

Lao stared at him, her expression lost. "But you said..."
"I said a lot of shit," Gabriel said sharply. "I even meant some of it. But I know you saw Captain Patel and Lieutenant Sato perform an interrogation or two. Remember all that it entailed? After what happened, you had to expect a rough reception."

The girl put her head down on the table.

"I hate you," she said without feeling.

"I don't care," Gabriel said.

"I hate myself more," she kept her face on the table. "I did a lot of shit as Bái Shé. And it was my fault she almost died."

"...Somewhat. Agent Strike is also a goddamn idiot who was fully aware of your capabilities and still faced you down without waiting for backup. She bears some of the blame." Gabriel tried to keep his voice even, but some of the anger slipped out.

"No, she was just trying to help," Lao sniffled, not looking up. "She's not in trouble, is she?"

"She was," Gabriel said sharply.

Lao winced.

"What's it matter to you now? You aren't taking her visits," Gabriel said, neutrally. "I thought you hated her."

"I do. I don't care if she got in trouble or not," she added quickly.

There was a long silence as Gabriel watched her sit up, wiping her face discretely.

"I don't care," she said. "I was just curious."

Gabriel said nothing, watching her tuck her chin against her chest and stare at her lap. He rubbed his temples, wondering how much he'd missed in the first couple of interrogations. That wasn't quite right. He had been thorough and mission-focused. He had torn her apart for relevant Talon information, leveraging her feelings for you and your dead squad to get her to talk. But he had done so with disregard for her fragile psyche. He'd broken her down a little too well, and now that sat badly with him.

"I don't...blame you for stabbing her." Not any more, anyway. Not since you were alive and reconciled with him. If it had gone any other way, Gabriel knew he might not have been able to let go of that grudge, but as it was, he could put his feelings aside and do the right thing. "I am fully briefed on the conditioning and the kill orders."

"You don't know Lucky very well then. I'm pretty sure at some point, all her friends have wanted to stab her. Or at least punch her in the face," Lao said sullenly.

Gabriel laughed. "Oh?"

"She must be on good behavior around you, commander," Lao said, a faint smile playing on her lips. "She has this way of finding the worst trouble and ending up in the middle of it, all while proclaiming her innocence."

"...I may have noticed something like that," Gabriel said, inclining his head to the side.
"The jury is still out on whether or not that's intentional."

Lao shook her head. "I know...I know it's not all her fault. She's just a shit magnet." She gnawed on her lip. "You were there for the Ninth Circle. I mean Black Base Delta. What happened?"

Gabriel took a deep breath. "That information is classified. But I'll tell you what happened to your squad mates, if that's what you're asking."

She nodded slowly. "I think it's time."

So Gabriel told her what he knew. Half a dozen mercenaries stormed the med ward and gunned down everyone inside. He couldn't confirm that Agent Razafindrandriatsimaniry had been there, but he was listed as on-duty at the time. Agent Nwazue had lured several mercs into a lab and blown it up. Agent Valdez had gone down fighting, you and Lieutenant Sato rushing to his aid. Sato had fallen in combat next. Then you had found Aishani mortally wounded and ready to make her last stand. And after that, you'd both cut it far too close. He glossed over the details of that last part, just mentioning that you'd sustained some serious injuries.

Each death was a blow, and halfway through she squeezed her eyes shut, unwilling to look at him, her breathing ragged. But when he paused, she waved her hand, asking him in a hoarse voice to keep going.

When he was done, they sat in silence. He slid some tissues across the table and she took them, not making eye contact.

"I...didn't realize it happened like that. I figured Lucky was in the woods hunting or something and missed the whole thing. She used to sneak off all the time. I mean, not shirking, just...wandering off on her own."

Gabriel nodded.

"I didn't blame her for surviving. Logically, I knew even if she had been hiding in the woods, there wasn't much she could have done to save anyone. But, I guess it kind of makes me feel better to know that she was there. That she didn't miss it all. I know that's fucked up, but..." She sighed.

"But it makes it easier to accept."

"Yeah. I still can't see her right now. It's too much."

"Do you want to request to have her banned from visitation?"

Lao stared at him hopelessly. "That's an option?"

"It's within your rights," Gabriel said carefully.

"...I don't think that will be necessary. She leaves when I tell her to." Lao crumpled the tissues in her flesh hand. "So what's next, commander? Where do we go from here?"

"I can't afford to trust you. But I do believe in giving you a chance."

"Or enough rope to hang myself," she said.

He gave a slow nod. "Yeah, that's a possibility too."
"And Lucky didn't put you up to this?"

"She may be my assistant, but she doesn't know my every move, agent."

Lao froze at the title, her eyes widening slightly.

"You go to therapy. You shake that programming. You keep having those sessions with Agent Lacroix. Prove yourself, agent, and there's a light at the end of this."

The three of you got back mid-afternoon. Hanzo had changed back into his suit, and it still managed to look wrinkle-free and nice. You and Genji still had on your onion-octopus pajamas. Feng said they were "Pachimari" and Genji seemed unusually pleased with his. Your fancy clothes were in a nice dress bag, and you had food for Jack and Gabriel, and two bottles of Máotái - Hanzo had given you his right in front of Feng. Which was fine, she'd gifted it to him with a smartass comment about how he needed to develop taste.

Genji had kept his, and a few gaming controllers.

All in all, that was the best mafia slumber party you'd ever been to.

You got back to your room and hung up your dress, pleased that it had taken no damage from the robbery. You found a vase of white lilies, with violet speckled centers, on the dresser with a note:

Something came up. Have to make a visit to Helsinki. Sorry, I couldn't be here to show you just how much I liked seeing you in that dress. We are going out soon. Don't worry, I'll pick Jack's outfit.

Love,

Gabriel

You stared at his signature, cheeks warm. You tucked the note into your drawer and checked your messages.

Ziv had sent you one with a date, underlined. That was it. You assumed that was the day he would be returning. You'd try to schedule the tea party for after it.

Jack was off-site too. There was urgent politicking to be done in Geneva. You could hear the resentment in his angrily typed words. The undertone of "I'm not going to kill Petras, I'm not, and it's killing me instead" bled through the entire message. You could empathize. You had a whole mental file of Petras death scenes compiled. Right now your favorite one involved staking him out for teams of rabid weasels while coated in hot sauce. The capsaicin would burn his skin and send the weasels into an even more volatile frenzy. It didn't have to be weasels. It could be raccoons. Or monitor lizards. You weren't that fussy.

Lacroix wanted a meeting when you had time. Sighing, you changed out of your fun new pajamas and left to discuss your next outing.
You put the food in Jack's fridge. Neither man was due in tonight, but Jack's bed was the most comfortable and you didn't think he would mind you sleeping here. There was still a toothbrush for you in the bathroom and while it was strange to be here without Jack, it didn't feel wrong.

His bed was unmade, big surprise, and you straightened the blankets before getting in and fluffing the pillows. It was soft and welcoming, but you weren't quite warm enough. Sighing, you got up, grabbed one of Jack's Overwatch hoodies out of a drawer, and put it on. The pillows smelled faintly of Jack's soap and Gabriel's curling custard. You pulled the blanket over your head and closed your eyes.

The low voices woke you, if only because you hadn't expected to hear anyone in the Strike Commander's quarters. You reached under the pillow, gripping your tanto.

"Why is she here?" Gabriel asked, sounding irritated.

You released your grip on your tanto, relaxing until you thought about what he said. Did they need some more alone time? Were you imposing? You exhaled slowly. You hadn't exactly asked to use Jack's room while he was away. Maybe you had overstepped.

"Because my bed's better," Jack said sounding incredibly smug. "She likes big heavy blankets, Gabe. And I leave cake and beer in my fridge for her. I set some pretty irresistible bait."

You blinked. Wait, what?

"I have better food," Gabriel grumbled.

"You do." You heard the familiar smack of one of Jack's obnoxiously loud kisses. "But she gets cold. If it's bothering you, ask her about it."

"...It's not a big deal," Gabriel said, tone still a bit sharp.

"Then why are you looking so sore?"

You could easily picture Gabriel's sullen expression in the face of Jack's amusement.

"Just get some more blankets," Jack laughed, like he expected Gabriel to be contrary and ignore the advice, solely because he'd recommended it. Clothing rustled and you heard the heavy thud of Jack's overcoat hitting the floor.

The mattress sunk as someone climbed into bed beside you.

"Hey honey, we're home," Jack murmured, pulling the covers back. You blinked rapidly, feigning like you were just now opening your eyes. "Aww, did I wake you?"

"That's a stupid question," you said, yawning. "You don't just yank the blankets off someone's head if you plan on letting them sleep."

He chuckled, and curled against you, kissing the side of your head. He paused, eyeing the hoodie. "Did you get cold, baby?"

You shrugged. "A little."
"I'm sorry," he said, looking unspeakably pleased and you weren't entirely sure why.

Gabriel sat down on your other side, still in his Blackwatch hoodie and fatigue pants. You sat up, leaning forward to kiss him. Instead, he pulled off his beanie and put it on your head. He pulled it too low over your eyes and you huffed.

Then he kissed you, warm hands pressed against your cheeks, mouth gentle against yours. You sighed happily, glad that you hadn't misread the situation. Jack wanted you here. Gabriel did too. You were just exceptionally dumb when you first awoke.

"You're back early," you said lifting the hat up.

"Had a girl to we wanted to see," Jack said, running a hand along your side. You bit your lip as he kissed the back of your neck.

"I bet you thought you were funny, running off with your lipstick on my face," Gabriel growled softly.

"It looked good on him," Jack said. "I was tempted to let him walk around like that."

You couldn't hide your grin. "You were the one getting me all hot and bothered before I had to go out."

"Did you have fun?" Gabriel asked, reclining on his side, propped up on one elbow, his other arm draped over your waist. "I didn't hear about any terrorist attacks. And obviously you didn't need us to come bail you out of jail or back you up in some ridiculous hostage situation."

"Yeah, we went out to eat and then..." Oh. Yeah. You'd forgotten about the robbery attempt. For a moment, you contemplated not telling them that part. But then you couldn't count on Genji, Hanzo, or Feng to keep quiet about it. Honesty was probably the best policy.

"What else? Did Feng spend the night throwing awkward pickup lines at the Shimadas?"

"...No, she was actually pretty well-behaved, considering. Says it's nerves that make her spout the really awkward stuff. She reined herself in this time. Still flighty as a hummingbird on speed, but kept it mostly platonic."

"So it was completely uneventful?" Jack asked, skepticism plain on his face.

You sighed. "There was an armed robbery in the restaurant. We uh...took care of it."

Gabriel snorted. "You're joking."

"...We kind of sat there and took turns disarming the gunmen when they came over to our table. They weren't very good robbers," you said with a shrug. "Hanzo and Feng were actually more focused on their proxy war over which drink paired better with the meal. That part was...uncomfortable. They made me judge the taste test. The pressure was pretty intense."

There was a half a minute of silence.

"The dress is intact, right?" Gabriel said. "Because if anyone gets to rip it off you-"

"Nobody is damaging that dress. It was insanely expensive!" You scowled.

Jack laughed. "So then what? A night of clubbing? Did Feng hire a troupe of acrobatic strippers and burlesque dancers to act out a musical based on the Kama Sutra? Did you attend underground bare knuckle death matches? Did she finally get Hanzo Shimada to make the dragon dance?"

You snickered. "We went back to her condo for cake, snacks, and video games. Then we all fell asleep in the living room in sleeping bags, except Genji. I think he stayed up all night playing Metroid. Maybe it was Fire Emblem. I don't know."

There was a longer silence this time.

"You had a...mafia slumber party? With video games and cake?" Gabriel said the words with a soft, almost reverent incredulity.

"Yeah, it was fun," you said. "Genji beat everyone at all the video games. But that's OK. I had cake. Oh, and I brought food home. There were these really delicious ribs and soup dumplings..."

"You know...I was a little worried when you said you were going to Shanghai to hang out with Zhai Feng the fucking bio-hacked Dragon Head of the On Sing Triad. I was expecting assassination attempts, or AI terrorism, or even a hybrid omnic-kaiju attack. You just...talked, ate a bunch of food, and played video games?"

"I swear. You can ask Genji. Or Hanzo. Or Feng. She offered to take us clubbing, or to the opera, or other shit, but we went back to her place for cake and-"

Gabriel laughed. "OK, I get it. Say no more. It must have been good cake."

"It was nice," you said. "Normal. I think. Though I'm not really sure what that means any more." At least it was more normal than any co-ed, international criminal syndicate, cyborg ninja slumber party had a right to be. "I had a good time. I think Genji did too."

Gabriel's gaze softened. "That's good. I wasn't sure if keeping his brother here was a good idea. But..."

"I think it's progress," you said.

"Yeah." Gabriel sighed. "Good to hear."

Jack kissed your neck.

"Aren't you hungry? The food was really good."

"Oh, we both have something we've been craving since yesterday. But it isn't food, hermosa."

You swallowed your words as Gabriel pulled off his shirt, Jack's hands already sliding under your clothes.

Chapter End Notes

Super fluff ending! It was inspired by an anon who mentioned Lucky should sleep in Jack's hoodie and Gabriel's hat while they were away.
Was super sore from weeding last Friday. (Because I'm old?) And then had terrible stomach pain whenever I ate starting Saturday and ending yesterday. (I think the Witch Baby cursed me again, but I digress). I reluctantly took the dogs for a run, even though my legs were still annoyingly sore, and when I got back, there was a little soreness, but now I feel better. WTF? Lactic acid buildup? Or a body conspiracy?

I'll be out of town 5/18-5/22, so I don't know what my update schedule is going to look like. The smut chapter is 11k+ so it's about two chapters in one. So between being sick, fighting the chapter, and going on a short vacation, I'm pretty sure that's going to interrupt the twice/week update schedule further along. Just a head's up.
Chapter 62

Chapter Summary

There are people out there worse at diplomacy than you are, not a lot, but they're there.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"You are slouching. If you keep that up, I will have to tape you in place like we did your breasts," Amélie giggled her arm looped with yours.

You rubbed your forehead.

Amélie smacked your hand. "Stop that! You will smear your makeup!"

"I'm not even wearing-"

"Look less constipated, Chanceux. We are having fun. You are sexy. I am elegant. Everyone wants to be seen with us. We are beautiful, mysterious, and completely unattainable. But they can bask in our glory and maybe we will deign to smile at them and make their night just a little more fabulous." Amélie tossed her head, her pale slender neck drawing several looks. She wore a blue sheath dress with a halter neckline, its dramatic cut showed skin, but stopped on the right side of scandalous. The hem was asymmetrical, ankle-length in the back, but around the front it gradually shortened to above the knee to show off her legs. Her stilettos matched the dress, and she walked with inimitable grace. Her hair was up in a chignon, and her gold wrist cuffs matched her earrings and the pins in her hair.

You were in the purple dress, the one with the plunging neckline but a long skirt, discrete slits cut in the fabric for freedom of movement, or more likely so you could show off your legs. It was a flattering shade of purple for your skin tone, and Amélie insisted that you wear gold jewelry as well. She loaned you a cascade of gold chains that layered from your neck to between your carefully taped breasts. Your hair was up, and she had chosen a pair of earrings for you, gold pendulums on long chains that you simply threaded through your ears.

You still weren't sure how to persuade Amélie to see things from your pragmatic, but less stylish standpoint, and appealing to her better nature had not helped. So you were unable to convince her to let you attend as the Assassin Butler and were now stuck in an evening gown, at some terribly haughty ballroom in Lyon, with minimal weaponry. Sure, your gloves matched the dress, and your prostheses were primed. You'd come armed, a pistol in the small of your back, your tanto strapped to a sheath on your thigh, so as not to interfere with the lines of the gown.

Making a half circuit of the ballroom, you kept an eye out for Lacroix. You were Amélie's "date" feeding into the rumor that they were separating. You weren't sure what made them choose that cover story, but both of them seemed terribly amused by the idea, like it was so outrageous that people would be fooled. Amélie had made a point to be seen out in staged scenes with a variety of people. Tataryn, Jesse, and Diallo had all been photographed with her, their faces carefully concealed. It must have been a slow news cycle, because the gossip rags ate it up, loving that the prima ballerina might return to the stage after her marriage disintegrated, and they openly wondered if she could displace any current leads all over Europe.

You flinched as Amélie playfully bit your ear. "Really?"

"Look less unhappy, Chanceux, or I'm going to start taking it personally." Amélie leaned over, her perfume winding around you, not too heavy, but impossible to ignore. "You are my escort. I paid good money to get you here."

She laughed as you nearly choked on your tongue.

"You're awful," you said, shaking your head.

"Relax. You are so tense. Would you like a drink?"

"Not while I'm working."

"Tsk, you need to take a deep breath. You are wound too tight. Tonight, we just blend in. Make contact. You don't have to treat it like a combat mission."

You sighed, because Amélie was right. You were a civilian. You were undercover. You were not at all waiting and hoping for a random terrorist attack to interrupt all the hobnobbing. Nope. Not you.

You leaned against her arm, pretending for a moment, that she was someone else. If you and Gabriel were at a fancy function, you would still have to be business-like. The same went for Jack. It was hard to relax in a room full of people, most of them with wardrobes that would feed a small family for a few years.

"You are slouching again. Next time you are wearing a corset."

"Amélie, you are merciless."

She laughed, a throaty bedroom sound. A few heads turned your way. "That is precisely what Gérard says. Usually in private."

You shook your head. "I don't need to know that."

"You are silly, Chanceux. It is so very cute. Oh, what is he wearing? That fits him like an apron fits a cow."

You watched a delegate in a bad suit slink by. The material was good quality, but it obviously didn't fit him properly and the cut was ten years out of date. ...How did you know this? Which Lacroix had infected your brain? Shaking your head, you realized you had some soul-searching to do.

"I think the apron on the cow would be cuter."

"True," Amélie laughed. "Ah, there she is. Oh, I like that. I couldn't pull that off, but she does it so well."

Adaeze Kwento wore an off the shoulder gown in black, with red and green accents, and a vibrant emerald gele covering her hair and fanning out in a halo around her head. Her jewelry looked like rough cut rubies set in gold. In her mid-forties, Kwento was an attractive woman, tall, with full lips, a broad forehead, and sharp eyes.

Kwento turned from the diplomat she was speaking to, her gaze falling on Amélie and you.
You tilted your head in acknowledgement. You didn't see what Amélie did, but you felt her move beside you.

Kwento smiled at Amélie, her expression friendlier than you expected. Of course, Amélie had a way with people. Then she began to make her way over to you.

"So pleased to finally meet you Ambassador Kwento," Amélie reached out, firmly grasping Kwento's hand and shaking.

"I have not had the pleasure...?" Kwento had a rich voice and she smiled at you both.

"I am Amélie Lacroix, née Guillard," she said brightly.

"The ballerina!" Kwento raised a brow. "I had not expected to see an artist at one of these events. How charming. And please, introduce me to your friend." Kwento released Amélie's hand and extended hers to you.

"This is Chanceux. She is my very good friend," Amélie beamed, and neither you nor Kwento were sure how to take that.

Kwento studied your face, like she thought she should know you. Her smile was relaxed, so obviously she didn't recognize you.

You pressed the q-drive into her hands and she hesitantly stopped shaking, discretely slipping the device into her sleeve.

"Should I be worried?" Kwento asked, still keeping a light tone.

"Not about us," you said with a smile.

---

Both of you had imbibed a few flutes of champagne, but you didn't think Amélie would be this affected.

"No, no, Chanceux! Blow kisses at me! Like this!" Amélie giggled and puckered up, batting her lashes. Lithe and playful, she looked sexy doing it. You felt ridiculous in comparison. "Come on! Don't be shy!"

Rolling your eyes, you air-kissed your hand and flung the imaginary kiss across the sidewalk.

"...That is a truly pathetic attempt, Chanceux. Like this." Amélie licked her lips and it was almost obscene the way she moved her mouth. You couldn't do that in public. Hell, you weren't sure your tongue moved like that. "Come on! Do better, or I shall be cross at you all night."

Cocking your hip out, you leaned forward, knowing the tape would hold your breasts in place. Smiling sardonically, you pursed your lips, looked her in the eye, and blew.

Amélie held up her phone.

"I knew you could do it! Gabriel will love this shot!"
"Wait what?! No!"

"Too late. Already sent!" Giggling, and obviously not as drunk as you thought, Amélie looped her arm in yours and continued the walk to the hotel.

Shaking your head, you sighed. She enjoyed this way too much.

You had a missed call and single message from Gabriel that read "Call me." Rolling your eyes, you sat down on the bed and kicked off your heels.

"What?" You said, when he picked up the line.

"I missed you too," he said, voice throaty. "What exactly are you wearing?"

"An evening gown and tape. Lots of tape..."

"So nights out with Zhai and Amélie warrant fancy clothes, but how come you never dress that way for me?"

"Because it's a pain in the chest and we don't go to fancy places. I'm on a mission-"

Gabriel chuckled. "So what I'm hearing is that I need to plan a business trip with formalwear."

"Please don't. You guys would look great, but Amélie keeps threatening me with dire consequences every time my posture slips. I have been menaced with a smoking curling iron, a corset, and lots of socially-correct things that I don't understand. Send help."

"Is that all you wanted help with, hermosa?" Gabriel's tone was buttery smooth and rich with promise. You shivered.

"They're in the next room," you said.

"And? You can't keep it quiet?"

"They're adjoined rooms," you scowled. "I'm Amélie's date."

"Really?" Gabriel didn't sound quite so pleased. "And you made contact tonight, as her date?"

"Ambiguously, yes. Amélie is the star attraction, not me."

"I would argue that."

"I hate playing the honeytrap," you said tautly. "Amélie has more charisma and the role suits her better."

"All right," Gabriel said, sounding too amused by your discomfort.

"She's really good at it," you said, a little defensive.

"Amélie has her charms, but she's not the one I'm interested in. Are you planning on sending me any more pictures?" Gabriel murmured. "Or are you going to leave me hanging?"

"...I'm not sending nudes, Gabriel." You rolled your eyes. "What are you, sixteen?"

"Didn't ask for nudes. I like pinup shots just fine. You don't make that pouty sex kitten face nearly enough." he laughed.

"It wasn't that bad," you scowled.

"On the contrary, I like it a lot. Amélie sent quite the picture. Didn't you pose for it?"

"She tricked me! And I'm terrible at selfies. Look, I'll dress up for dinner or something, OK? Now I need to get some sleep because I have socializing to do tomorrow and you're supposed to look well-rested or something. I don't know. Half these people drink mimosas for breakfast and subsist on sneaking nips of alcohol all day. I doubt they'll notice all my slipups. But Amélie will."

"I guess that will do," Gabriel sighed, sounding terribly disappointed. "I miss you. Jack misses you. He keeps stopping by the office, sleeping in my room, and asking if he can requisition you for office work."

"Like real office work or...?"

"I'm sure he intends to get work done, but I already know how you two clowns operate." Gabriel laughed. "He likes having you around. I think he gets lonely in that big ugly office of his."

You smiled. "I miss both of you too," you said, suddenly feeling very alone. When had you gotten to the point where you said things like this? It was a short mission and you weren't even that far away... "I should get some sleep," you said, even though you didn't want to hang up.

"All right. Good night baby. Look forward to seeing you at home."

"Yeah," you said. "Me too."

Going to sleep that night, the expensive hotel bed felt too cold, and your thoughts drifted to Zurich and the men waiting for you there.

---

You were doing brunch at some boring old-money restaurant. The staff knew Amélie and the two of you were ushered to a table with a pristine white tablecloth and cloth napkins in a silver napkin ring. You eyed the napkin ring, discretely weighing it your palm. It was a little big to slip over your finger, but in a pinch, it was heavy enough to punch someone with.

"Chanceux, ma chérie, stop weaponizing everything," Amélie sighed as she sipped a Turkish coffee in a tiny little mug.

You eyed the silverware. "How do you know I'm not plotting to steal everything?"

"Because we both know that isn't real silver. And you get this uncivilized look in your eye." Amélie covered her mouth as she yawned. "What are you in the mood for?"

"I'm hungry," you said. "But I don't want anything too heavy."
"Then I recommend the eggs Florentine. I shall have their house strawberry conserves on brioche. Don't worry, if you are good I will let you try some."

Sighing, you kind of wished Lacroix was there, if only to distract Amélie. After you ordered, the two of you drank your coffee in peace. Lacroix was probably sulking in the hotel room. Sure, he was running the op, but you knew from experience that he preferred to be on site for the action.

"Oh my, don't look now, but it seems we have guests."

You were composed enough not to turn, instead sipping your coffee, your hand resting on you tanto. Today's outfit was more bearable, cropped black trousers with a pair of red heels and a red off-the-shoulder sweater in a flattering cut. Another Amélie pick, and of course, it looked effortlessly amazing. Amélie went with a coral shift dress and pearls, and she looked vintage Jackie O in the best way possible.

"Ah, Ms. Lacroix. What a charming coincidence. Do you mind if we join you?"

"What a pleasant surprise, ambassador. Please sit." Amélie stood and pulled out the chair beside her with an elegant sweep. You rose to greet Kwento and froze when you turned. Kwento had not come alone. Alongside her was a bipedal omnic wearing saffron and red, a necklace of orbs adorning his neck. Nine cyan blue lights formed a square pattern on its forehead and its face was almost comically mournful, eyes and mouth set at a sorrowful angle. The face did not look human at all, but something about it dipped too far into the uncanny valley. Perhaps it was an emoji gone terribly wrong. Perhaps you had lingering issues. But it didn't matter now: you swallowed your discomfort and pulled out the chair. Its feet did not quite touch the ground.

"Thank you," it said, voice smooth.

"You're welcome," you murmured, feeling the buzz of something along your gloved prosthetics. You curled your fingers, wondering if it was trying to ghost you like Athena had.

"Do you normally attend breakfast armed?" It asked mildly and you weren't sure if it was talking about your tanto, your pistol, or your prostheses.

"Chanceux believes in being prepared," Amélie said with a gentle smile and you held your tongue.

Kwento didn't appear the least bit surprised, in fact, her look for you was not quite as friendly as it had been last night, but that was to be expected, given the contents of the drive. She wore a turquoise suit, too bright and vibrant for this restaurant. It looked good on her and you liked it.

The waiter came and did a double take when he saw the omnic beside you.

"What would you like today?"

"Grits with condensed milk, scrambled eggs, and black tea," Kwento said, not even looking at the menu.

"I am fine," the omnic said.

You sipped your coffee, and studied your left hand. The buzzing had stopped, but you did not like that it had...reached out.
"I'm sorry, where are my manners? This is Tekhartha Zenyatta. He is a former Shambali monk with a strong interest in social reform."

"Amélie Lacroix. Enchanté." She extended her hand and Zenyatta clasped it between both of his.

"And you as well," he said.

Amélie didn't flinch, bat an eye, or waver. She just flashed a dazzling smile that nearly shorted out your brain. How were you supposed to follow that? They finished shaking and it was your turn.

"Lucky Strike," you said, forcing yourself to relax and let those metal fingers close over your flesh ones.

"Peace be upon you." Zenyatta, to his credit, did not make any quips about your name, though Kwento looked amused. But she didn't comment on whether or not it was your real name.

"Thanks, and you too?" You winced at your fumble and retracted your hand.

"You are very tense."

"I'm hungry," you said, because it was true.

"There is disquiet in your soul."

"...I can be pretty unpleasant when I'm hungry," you said.

"It is true. Her vocabulary becomes monosyllabic, she hunches over, and she begins to grunt and growl like a bear. It is adorable." Amélie laughed softly.

The food arrived and you silently cut into your eggs Florentine, savoring the creamy hollandaise sauce on poached eggs.

"You wanted to try my conserves?" Amélie asked, offering you a neat square of brioche. You blinked as she fed you, her smile wide and delighted. The strawberry gel was rich with fruit and sugar, and you caught hints of champagne and vanilla.

"That is pretty amazing," you said.

"The only reason I chose this establishment," Amélie said, leaning closer to Kwento. "It is a bit staid for my tastes."

"We are scandalizing the other patrons," Kwento said, not looking the least bit concerned. She tasted her grits, made a disappointed face, but kept eating, looking somewhat satisfied by the tea and eggs.

"I suspect it is my presence." Zenyatta's tone did not change.

"It could be my table manners," you said, trying to be polite. Though your table manners had been good. There had only been two forks and they looked identical, but you used the outermost one.

"So how did you meet Dom Zenyatta?" Amélie asked.

"Just Zenyatta, please. I am no longer officially affiliated with the Shambali."
"He found me. Our interests align." Kwento smiled with genuine fondness at the omnic.

"And what are those interests?" You asked, casually sawing through your muffin.

"Building a peaceful society for humans and omnis alike," Kwento said, like it was the most obvious thing.

"A worthy goal," Amélie said.

You focused on your food and the sounds and movement in your periphery. There was very little you could add to this conversation, and Amélie was the best equipped to handle Kwento. But both Kwento and Zenyatta kept looking at you.

"Will you tell me why I make you so uncomfortable?" Zenyatta asked and you nearly choked on your food.

You looked to Amélie for help, but she was watching Kwento, who was watching you. Goddamnit.

Patting your chest, you gulped down water and struggled for an answer. Only the truth came up. But saying "yeah, robots are creepy as hell and I have unresolved personal trauma" seemed uncouth.

"I rarely deal with omnis outside of combat settings," you said. "I am ignorant of the cultural mores and do not wish to give offense."

"Do not be discouraged," Zenyatta said. "Everyone begins in ignorance."

You looked back down at your food, not at all liking his tone.

"So have you been through Lyon before?" Amélie asked, knowing full well that this was Kwento's first trip. But you appreciated her diverting the conversation away from you and your issues.

You ate in silence, willing yourself invisible. But you could feel the omnic monk observing you, even if he did not look your way again during the meal.

Kwento seemed to forget you were there, engaged in a lively conversation with Amélie and your mind wandered to the monk's combat capabilities. Kwento would not be out with a bodyguard, and while not all omnis were combat-rated, you knew instinctively that placid facade aside, Zenyatta was a force of his own.

The meeting went smoothly without any further input from you. Kwento was going to make a "surprise" visit to Zurich and meet with Lacroix and perhaps Gabriel. You suspected Zenyatta would be with her. Amélie seemed pleased by the turn of events.

The drive had contained information about two different corporations attempting hostile takeovers of one of Numbani's human-omnic joint-owned enterprises, as well as a predicted assassination attempt on Kwento, and an invitation to come to Zurich. The information was all correct and highly-detailed; Lacroix had overseen the intel gathering and Ziv had triple-checked everything. You had "obtained" the legal paperwork filed by both Pan Tek and Vishkar as well as some pretty damning internal memos.

You were headed back to Zurich now, Lacroix and Amélie happily chattering away in French while you tried to sleep.

"And Chanceux did so well," Amélie said. "A little stiff, but she tried and it was nothing out of the ordinary for the venues."

"You are too easy on her," Lacroix said. "She needs more practice."

"I do not think she is happy if there is no action," Amélie said. "She gets bored with all the polite conversation."

"It doesn't matter. This is work, not pleasure. Chanceux can learn to stand up straight, dress properly, and emulate a civilized bearing."

You opened one eye. "You know I can hear you both, right?"

"Well yes, what is the point of us reviewing your performance in English, if you aren't listening?" Lacroix said. "It was passable, but Amélie carried the bulk of the work. I expect better from you in the future."

You swallowed your retort, because Amélie had singlehandedly conducted the charm assault. You were just there as physical backup. "Yeah, OK."

"You did well," Amélie said. "It gets easier with experience."

"But there is much room for improvement," Lacroix finished, giving you a sardonic look.

You just closed your eyes and pretended to go back to sleep. Kwento would be traveling with Zenyatta, and you wanted to stay as far away from that omnic as you could.

You finished your next "report" to Petras and forwarded it to Lacroix for inspection. Maeda Vargas, Lowell, and Jeong had all sent you separate queries about career paths and combat strategies. They had also included eagerly-worded invitations to lunch. Feng sent you a status update about Bayan, asked if you wanted in on the product-testing she was offering Genji, and hinted at another outing. Maggie had received the news about "Family Day" and was already bombarding you with questions and suggestions about things she wanted to do and people she needed to meet. Thankfully, Michael was a little more reserved, just asking if you were going to be there. Amélie wanted to know the theme of the tea party and you hadn't a clue. Tea? Parties? Snacks?

You had a lot more messages now, and some of them were even work-related. You reached into your desk for a piece of candy. Gabriel had a medical checkup, and while he swore up and down it was routine, you weren't entirely convinced. But right now, there was nothing you could do.

The door opened and looked up, prepared to ask how it went. It was not whom you expected. Standing there, looking broader, more muscled, and surlier than ever, was Ziv. He had a jacket slung over his shoulder and his t-shirt was entirely too tight. So were his jeans and they were hanging a little too low for being in your office. Who let that boy out dressed like that?

His hair had grown too. You were a little surprised they hadn't made him shave it off, but then this hadn't been a formal camp experience.

"I heard you replaced me," Ziv said, stalking in and shutting the door behind him.

"...What?" You narrowed your eyes. You hadn't hired any new hackers. What was he on about?

Ziv slammed his palms down on your desk, glaring at you. "I was only gone for six weeks and you replaced me!"

"Ziv, there is no one in my life as irritating as you. Rest assured, you still hold that spot," you said, suddenly annoyed. He'd been gone for six weeks and literally you had received no word from him. Pictures and numbers did not count. Also, he was back sooner than you expected; had they gotten sick of him and booted him? Because you had trouble envisioning him gaining an early release for "good behavior."

"Ben zona! Don't lie! McCree and Gérard were both telling me all about Newbie Maeda Vargas! Athena told me about him and his stupid plans! The promising maverick recruit who wants to be just like Lucky Strike! I've seen the little shit! You replaced me with a younger, cuter model! How could you?"

"Well, to be fair, he does answer my messages," you said, crossing your arms.

Ziv's brows furrowed and he spun around, back to you. "I sent you pictures," he muttered.

"Uh-huh," you said. "A montage of scenic southern California framing your middle finger."

"I didn't know what to say," Ziv muttered, shoulders drawn up.

"Well, to be fair, he does answer my messages," you said, crossing your arms.

Ziv's brows furrowed and he spun around, back to you. "I sent you pictures," he muttered.

"Uh-huh," you said. "A montage of scenic southern California framing your middle finger."

"I didn't know what to say," Ziv muttered, shoulders drawn up.

"Well, Lacroix told me, according to your letters to him-" he winced at your tone. "-just how happy you were with me. So I drew the logical conclusion."

"I was being dramatic," he said

"I figured. Until you just didn't answer my messages."

"I didn't know what to say," he repeated.

You sat back in your chair, waiting.

Ziv kept his back to you. He took a deep breath. You stared at his back, waiting. He took another breath. "Ben zona, you shouldn't have gotten into it with Morrison over me."

"What?" The word came out with genuine confusion. Where had that come from?

"You shouldn't have," he insisted. "Gérard told me about how ugly it got."

You cursed Lacroix's flair for dramatic meddling. It hadn't been that bad, though you had asked, Gabriel, Captain Amari, and to some extent, him, for advice. So maybe that was kind of a big deal. "Ziv, stop being stupid, Lacroix got into it with him too! You were there! For fuck's sake, what's the difference?"
"...It's Gérard's job to advocate for me. Not yours," he muttered.

_Fucking ingrate._ You took a deep breath. "So you thought I'd just sit by and not do anything? Just watch you get kicked out? What kind of friend do you think I am? Are you my hacker or not?"

"...You have Lao back now," Ziv said, still not turning around.

"What?" You stared at him incredulously. "Ziv, sit your butt down and talk to me, because I have no idea where your head's at, besides up your ass, as usual."

Sighing, Ziv pulled up a chair and plunked down, staring at you sullenly. He met your gaze, and whatever he saw on your face had him avert his eyes.

A little shaky, you opened a bottle of water. "Let's start over. Hi, Ziv. We haven't talked in awhile. How are you?"

"...I'm sorry," he said, hanging his head.

"What the fuck is wrong with you?" You sputtered, water going down the wrong passage. Coughing violently, you glared at Ziv until you could breathe properly again. "For fuck's sake Ziv, I have no clue what you're thinking."

"I should have written you back. I shouldn't have been a dick. I should have thanked you for shielding me from Morrison." Ziv winced, looking miserable. "I was...really fucking embarrassed by how badly I screwed up. And that you have to keep bailing me out. So, I...reacted, and I made it worse."

The two of you sat there, you trying to process Ziv's rollercoaster of emotions, Ziv just staring at his feet.

"...You are _still_ shit at apologies," you said, taking another gulp of water.

Ziv shrugged. "I'm sure I'll get plenty of practice."

"That's not reassuring." You got up and walked around your desk. "You're an asshole. Lao is still under confinement and refusing my visits. So, your job is pretty damn safe. Unless you go rogue again." You blew out a breath.

"Seriously?" Outrage twisted Ziv's expression. "After all you did for her..." He trailed off. "Ah... Pot meet kettle." He jammed his hands in his pockets. "You have terrible taste in hackers," he said.

"I'm just willing to ignore some of their rough edges because they're good at their jobs. Also, they mean well, even if they're goddamn assholes." You reached over and hugged Ziv and he froze for a moment, before squeezing you back too tightly.

"I'm sorry," he said again, voice shaky. "I didn't mean to be a dick. Sometimes I can't help it. I just...I figured I'd talk to you later...and I kept putting it off."

"And suddenly you're back in Zurich and you realized that you blew me off the entire duration of your sentence."

You let go of Ziv and he gave you a sheepish look. "Yeah."
"You look...grown up," you said. "Like you finally hit puberty. Do I have tell you where babies come from? Because to be honest, it's pretty gross.

"Fuck you," Ziv scowled. "You somehow got a whole fan club while I was out."

"Yes, apparently you were the one scaring off anyone who wanted to be my friend."

"Shut up," Ziv glared. "I did not! You just didn't know how to talk to people."

You laughed at that.

"I can't help that you don't know how to make friends!"

You laughed even harder, the irony almost too much to bear. "Ha! I have a social life now. I think I accidentally joined the Ukrainian mob, and Feng had the Shimadas and me over for a slumber party in Shanghai. Also, Bayan."

"I heard," Ziv said grimly. "I want in on the Blackwatch Prank Club."

"...Tataryn told you?"

"Athena."

You snorted. "Of course."

Ziv rose and he gave you a wry grin. "Thanks for...being a good friend." He hugged you again and you patted his back. "I'll try to do better."

The office door opened and Gabriel came in, eyes widening slightly. He shook his head and shut the door behind him.

"Damnit, we're having a moment!" Ziv scowled as he turned around.

"Yeah, in my office, Mihret," Gabriel said, sitting down at his desk.

Ziv muttered something impolite in Hebrew.

You sighed. "Ziv-

"I'm going to go meet this Maeda Vargas kid," he said under his breath. "Teach him to try and cozy up to my..." he trailed off.

"I don't know why you're blaming me. Lacroix's the one who recruited most of them. You should probably fact check whatever stories he's been feeding you. Something you could have done with me, if you weren't ignoring my messages."

Ziv's eyes narrowed. "I'm going to go talk to Amélie."

Uh oh. Suddenly, you were worried, and you weren't sure exactly why.

"Say "hi" to Winston first," you reminded him. "He's missed you too."

There was a sheepish pause.

"You already saw him, didn't you? ...I'm the last person you visited, aren't I?"

Ziv just whistled as he walked out of the office.
"Can we send him back?" You looked at Gabriel's amused expression. "I don't think the attitude adjustment training worked."

Chapter End Notes

And Ziv is back! Hooray! He's still awful! I wrote this chapter ages ago, then had the whole "Instructor Strike" arc keep getting prolonged, so yes, we're finally moving the plot along. whistles innocently

My headcanon Zenyatta is masquerading as placid and calm, but is really super snark chaotic good (is that really good though? IDK). He uses his shiny wit as a didactic tool. Uh-huh. He isn't taking pleasure in your discomfort. Nope. How could you even think that? Meatbag. I suspect Lucky has some issues with omnis, especially after surviving the omnic crisis. :D

Thank you to Elle for her very generous gift. I am still floored, like Owen Wilson "whoa." I will try to get two updates out next week, but I am on day 2 of a 8 day working streak and who knows how that will go. (Plus that whole going out of town for 5/18-5/22). I write on a desktop with one of those dramatic split keyboards to stave off carpal tunnel (and I suspect it works considering how much typing I've done in the past 6+ months). So that's not coming with me while I travel.
Chapter 63

Chapter Summary

Late night at the office. NSFW.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

It was another late night at the office, and to be honest, you had missed it a little. Maybe not the administrative minutiae, but these quiet nights alone with Gabriel while the two of you worked. Not to mention Jesse had screwed up your filing system and your desk setup. You were still getting everything back to the pre-Lucerne standards.

Gabriel growled at his screen, and you looked up to see him hunched over in his chair, glaring at whatever he was reading.

You checked the time and winced. It was later than you thought and Gabriel had missed dinner. You hadn't eaten either, but you weren't the grumpy one right now.

"Hey, do you want to take a break?"

"No, I want to break Petras' skull open and dig a rusty-" He paused, looking up. "Maybe I need one. You worked through dinner too," he said, sounding a little calmer.

"Both of us did," you said. "I can go to the kitchen-"

"There's leftover pizza in the fridge," he said, getting up. "I'll heat it up, unless you want me to cook."

"I just want to finish this budget shit and then call it night." You shook your head. "Ops are so expensive." But you wouldn't cut corners, even if funds were limited. Your people came first, and the money was there so you could do things right. You just had to be smart about it.

Gabriel reheated the pizza, and set a plate on your desk alongside a bottle of pineapple juice. He'd been buying a lot of the stuff lately. He pulled a chair up beside you and looked at the screen. "It's getting late, baby. You can work on that tomorrow."

You almost protested, but then realized if you stopped, he would too. And he could use always use the rest. So you nodded and took a slice of pizza. "Jack still in Geneva?"

"He's supposed to be back tonight. He's got Wilhelm and Gérard with him playing politics again. Wilhelm is surprisingly good at the charm offensive. That, or people are just too afraid to be nasty to his face." Gabriel looked like he wanted to say something else, probably something mean, but he stopped himself.

"Thanks for food," you said, smiling both at the food and his self control.

"You're welcome." He leaned over and dabbed at the corner of your mouth with his napkin, his hands warm against your face. "I want to do that dinner soon. Gérard and Amélie have "You just want to get dressed up," you said, rolling your eyes.

"It's a side bonus," he agreed. "I'm more interested in seeing you and Jack dressed up."

"Is that one of your things? Fancy clothes?" You asked, sipping the juice.

"What do you mean?" Gabriel asked, lips curving upward. "I like looking good, yes."

"I mean, is that a turn on? Up there with being called "papi" and goading innocent agents into sparring matches?"

"You're hardly innocent, chica." Gabriel's nostrils flared. "But yes, I like seeing you all made up and proper. Because then I'm just going to be thinking about how I'm going to have you a disheveled wreck by the end of the night."

You shook your head, heat pooling between your legs. "You're as bad as Jack."

"Worse," he murmured, leaning in. Your breath hitched and he stopped, nose almost touching yours. He ran his thumb along your lower lip. "I have to admit, I'm very partial to you in pretty dresses, because of that first time. Makes my dick stand up just thinking about you waiting there in that little black dress and heels. It's not how I thought it would go, but I don't regret it at all."

"What do you mean?" You kept your eyes on him.

"Wasn't planning on waiting till the ball. Figured something would eventually happen here. It's where we spent the most time together, after all." He nipped your lower lip then and you smacked his arm.

"Gabriel!"

"You're going to tell me that you never thought about it?" His voice was low and smooth.

"I...I was in active denial!"

"So you weren't touching yourself at night, thinking about me and Jack?" He asked. "At all?"

"I didn't say that."

"Some of the fantasies went just like this. Late night. You and me alone. Something gives, and you end up underneath me, getting your brains fucked out on my desk." He paused. "Obviously, I wasn't going to initiate, because...well, abuse of power. But you know, if it stayed in my head, no harm done. I've spent a long time thinking about it."

"Are you trying to seduce me?"

"Well, I did just offer my desk. You love to go on about how yours is for working." Gabriel finished his pizza.

"Huh, I guess chivalry isn't dead," you said dryly.

"Or if you're too tired, we can call it night." He grinned wolfish at you. "My bed is softer than my desk."
He was incorrigible. Shaking your head, you glanced at the budget report. "Let me give this one more review. Then we'll see how I can help you, commander."

"Is that so?" Gabriel raised a brow. "Going to pretend like you're as clueless now as you were back then?"

"Are you asking me to roleplay? As myself?" You laughed softly.

"It is part of my fantasy," he said, completely serious.

The tension in his jaw surprised you. You leaned back in your chair, feigning disinterest. "All right, commander. You go back to your desk, and let me finish my work. I'll help you with your issue once I'm done. You owe me something nice for this. I'm requesting carne asada fries."

Gabriel drew back, smiling faintly. "This is your job, agent. I don't know why you think you deserve carne asada fries on top of your paycheck."

"Not everyone is willing to keep your workaholic super soldier hours, you know. That's why you burn through so many assistants."

"Just who do you think is in charge here, agent?" Gabriel huffed.

"You are, of course. Now go back to your desk and let me work. Unless you'd rather balance the ops resource budget."

"You're getting cheeky," Gabriel growled, laughter in his eyes. "Keep sassing me and you'll be doing extra PT and combat modules."

"Can't do paperwork if I'm doing pushups," you said, turning back to the screen.

"Some day that smart mouth is going to get you into trouble," Gabriel said, returning to his desk.

You checked the numbers, more out of habit than necessity. You had most of the work done. Tomorrow you'd see how it fit against the entire Blackwatch budget and if you needed to do some creative accounting to compensate for any shortages. You could also consult Genji; he had emergency Blackwatch funds squirreled away in several offshore accounts. Hell, you'd had him help you hide your personal funds and the ratline survival funds for individual agents. Everyone from Captain Amari to Ziv had backup identities and escape routes.

You could feel Gabriel's impatient gaze on your face while you worked. You shivered, the skin along your spine already too sensitive. Nervous energy prickled along the back of your neck. A little anticipation was good for you both.

Smiling to yourself, you looked up to see Gabriel glaring at his computer. He typed away, fingers striking the keyboard a little too hard.

"Commander, we don't have the budget to keep replacing your office supplies."

He snorted at that. "I'm tense, agent. Are you volunteering to step on the mat with me?" He looked up at you, impatience smoldering in his eyes.

"Maybe another time," you said, breath catching. "Do you want me to loosen the knots in your shoulders. I know Jack normally does it for you, but..."
Gabriel cocked his head to the side. "Are you OK with that?"

"You've done it for me before," you said.

"Once, and you panicked," Gabriel said, his smile not entirely happy. "Should I be worried? Are you going to ask me for an extravagant favor?"

"I already did: carne asada fries," you said. "With homemade pico, fresh guac, sour cream, and cheese. That's pretty lavish."

Gabriel laughed at that. "You need to work on your negotiating skills, agent. I have better things to offer than that."

"All right, how about some fresh horchata?" You crossed your arms. "Because I can't think of anything better right now. What are you suggesting? Cake?"

"Why don't you come over here and find out?" Gabriel rolled his shoulders, frowning as he massaged his left one.

You took your gloves off and his gaze darkened. He leaned forward in his chair, letting you sink your prosthetic fingers into his taut shoulder. You had much better control now and you kneaded carefully, conscious of your own strength. He made a guttural sound, dropping his head while you used your right hand on his other shoulder.

"You're so tense," you said. "Something bothering you?"

"The usual," he murmured, exhaling slowly.

"Politics? The weight of the world? Bland food?"

"Add smart ass, short-sighted agents to the list and you've got it all," he said with a grunt.

"You flatterer, you," you laughed. He groaned softly while you loosened the knot in his left shoulder. He hadn't been faking the stress. You leaned in, inhaling his scent. He smelled good, like chypre cologne and gun oil, and you sighed.

"Getting tired already, agent?"

"Nah, just trying to get this muscle relaxed. You're so tense. Hold still." You bit your lip, curling your metal fingers, digging your knuckles into the knot. He growled as you moved them in slow circle.

"Careful."

"Am I being too rough, sir? Do you need me to be gentle with you?"

Gabriel gave a sharp laugh. "Aren't you a smug little shit?"

"I'll keep going then," you said pressing harder, and he hissed.

"Don't get cocky, chica. There's only so much pushing I'm going to take from you."

"And then it's penal workouts, eh?" You laughed, because the banter was half the fun. "I'm going to call your bluff on that one, at least till the budget review is done. Besides, I'm doing you a favor. This is one locked up shoulder. You really need to relax more. You should have done something about it sooner."
"...Yeah," he said. "OK."

"Maybe you should take a vacation soon, too. Don't worry, you can leave me and Jesse in charge. We probably won't burn down the UN or declare war on Oasis. Probably."

Gabriel choked and began to laugh. "Damnit!"

"I don't know. What do you suggest?"

"Somewhere relaxing. So I vote a tropical island with good swimming and a fair amount of solitude. Don't want the paparazzi getting shots of the Commander Reyes in a Speedo. Or maybe we do? That could definitely deflect some of the UN scrutiny and be a PR coup. Hell, we could do an Agents of Overwatch calendar as a fundraiser..."

Gabriel snorted. "You are terrible at this." And you weren't sure if he meant roleplaying, seductive small talk, or persuading him to take a vacation. Maybe it was all of the above.

"...Sorry. I haven't taken a travel vacation since I was a kid," you said, chest suddenly tight. "I don't really know what to tell you."

Gabriel slowly turned his head to look at you. "So are you asking to tag along?"

You blinked, unsure of how to answer that.

"Don't worry, agent. I'll put you to work. Someone has to make the fancy little drinks and slather me in sunscreen. I'll even return the favor. Equatorial sun is brutal. Can't have you scorching that pretty hide." He grinned up at you, teeth bright in the soft office light.

"I uh..." You really weren't sure how much of this was roleplay and how much of this was...something else. And now you were afraid to break character and ask.

"And Jack will need all the help he can get. He burns like a lobster," Gabriel chuckled. "So how about it, chica? Behave yourself and you can stowaway with us to Vanuatu."

You exhaled slowly. "It's not nice to tease, sir."

"Just repaying the favor," he said, flashing a crooked smile.

"I'm not-"

"Aren't you?" You took a step backward and Gabriel was on his feet, the chair shoved back against the wall. He stared down at you, pupils dark, jaw clenched. "The way you push me? The double entendres? Those sideways glances you cast in my direction when you think I'm not paying attention?"

You swallowed, wondering how much of that he noticed before the Overwatch ball. Had he been that observant? Had you been that obvious? Your breathing grew shaky as you met his almost accusatory gaze. "I'm sorry-"

"I don't want your apologies," he growled. "Do something about it, or leave it alone. I'm tired of waiting, hermosa."

"But Jack-"
"The only thing that's going to bother Jack is that I got to you first," Gabriel snapped. "Don't pretend like you're not shooting him the same hungry looks that you've been sneaking my way. Because I've noticed that too. We both have."

Had you really been that blatant? Your heart pounded, and it was a struggle to crush your fight or flight instinct. You shuddered as Gabriel leaned over you, hands cupping your face.

"Gabriel-"

"I'll keep it simple, chica. Do you want it? Yes or no?" His lips ghosted along your cheek, not quite touching, just the warmth of his breath against your skin, traveling down your neck.

You nodded slowly.

"You have to say it, baby," he exhaled in your ear.

"Yes, please-"

He moved fast. One moment you were on your feet, and the next he had you pressed against the wall, his mouth covering yours. He kissed you hungrily, more teeth and tongue, all nips and pressure. You moaned softly as he ground against you, his knee sliding between your thighs, one hand cupping the back of your head, the other wrapped tightly around your waist.

"About damn time," he muttered, kissing your throat. "Get over there, hermosa. I want to taste you." He pushed you lightly in the right direction and you wobbled on shaky legs. Apparently you were moving too slow, because he picked you up and dropped you on the edge of his desk.

"Gabriel-"

"I like the way you say my name," he murmured. "Lay back. Let me give you a reward for being so brave."

You reclined, propped up on your elbows, Gabriel's hands yanking off your boots and unfastening your belt. You lifted your hips and he slid your pants off smoothly. He ran a finger along your panties, tracing your slit as he held your gaze.

"Already so wet," he chuckled, voice low. His tongue flicked out to moisten his lips and the heat in his eyes made you wonder if the desk was a bad choice. Not much cushioning here, and he didn't look the least bit gentle. Gabriel pulled up his chair and sat down, placing your knees over his shoulders. "You look as good as I imagined, lying here on my desk." He cupped your ass and lifted you to his mouth, placing a gentle kiss on your inner thigh. "Do you taste as good as you look?"

Heart pounding, you slid your right hand into your panties, not breaking eye contact while you slipped a finger into your pussy and pulled it out, dragging it along Gabriel's lips.

He sucked your finger to the third knuckle, groaning as he swirled his tongue around the digit. There was a sharp ripping sound and you swore as he tore your panties off.

"Damnit, Gabriel!"

"I'll buy you more," he said sharply and lowered his head, flicking his tongue against your clit.
All your protests evaporated and you gave a soft whimper.

He lapped at your clit, fingers sliding into your slick pussy. You threw your head back, eyes squeezed shut as he moved at a slow hard pace, not coming up for air, refusing to let up. His thrusts grew rougher as he curled his thick calloused fingers inside you. The pressure on your clit grew and you writhed on his desk, panting as he played with you. He wasn't teasing. He wasn't testing the waters. He was devouring you, fingers stretching you wide, getting you prepared for his cock. The thought made you clench and he growled as you squeezed his fingers.

"Don't stop, please-" you pulled his hat off, tossing it over your shoulder so you could tangle your fingers in his hair.

"Wasn't planning on it," he rasped, before licking your slit, his fingers still moving at a rough pace. "Love how you taste, hermosa. Tell me how much you want to come." The sheer lust in his voice wrapped around your core and you tightened your grip on his curls. "Tell me that I'm not the only one who's been thinking about this for far too long..."

"Please, I need you-" Your thighs trembled as he sped up. "Don't have words for the things I want to do with you-" you babbled, incapable of finishing your thoughts. You were close and you couldn't focus on speech and the feel of his mouth and hands on your body.

Gabriel laughed and his tongue pressing firmly against you as tremors ran through your core. You were so close. Two rhythms dominated your attention: the bass of your heartbeat pounding in your ears and the slick sounds of his fingers slipping in and out of you.

"That's it, baby," he crooned. "You don't have to wait for permission. Come for me now. I won't stop, I'm nowhere near done. I'm going to fuck this sweet pussy till you're too exhausted to move-"

He made more filthy promises but you were already coming on his face, keening as he licked you, his fingers still twisting inside you while you arched off the desk. He waited for you to fall flat, then he withdrew his fingers, licking them clean, before he wiped his mouth off on the back of his hand.

He pulled off his hoodie and shirt, dropping them on the floor as he unfastened his pants. You lay against the desk, mind hazy as you watched him stroke himself.

"You OK?" He leaned over you, teeth bared, smile faint.

"Thank you," you said and he chuckled.

"I'm not done yet," he said, rubbing the head of his cock against your slick hole. "You sure you're up for this?"

You nodded vigorously, lips parted. "Please, papi. Please fuck me on your desk. I need you. Been laying in my bunk, touching myself, thinking about you, but it's not enough-"

Gabriel narrowed his eyes. "You gotta behave baby. My delicate constitution can only take so much. You get me too worked up and I'll have you here all night."

You gave a soft cry as he eased the head inside, teeth gritted, brow furrowed in concentration.

"You feel so good, hermosa. You're taking me so well." He gave a sharp push and you threw your head back, whining as he stretched you out, his cock sliding in to the hilt. "You going "Gabriel, oh fuck-"

"You're overdressed." He frowned, and pulled your shirt off, one hand unhooking your bra and tossing it onto the growing pile of clothes on the floor. "There we go." His hands cupped your breasts, squeezing gently as you bit your lip. "This is better than I imagined," he purred, leaning over to kiss you. "You know why?"

"Why?" You moaned as he sucked on your neck.

"Thought you'd be more of a smartass. But it looks like if I fuck you hard enough, you turn sweet pretty fast. That's going to be useful when you try to sass me again." He lifted one of your legs over his shoulder, sweat already dripping down his forehead.

"Gabriel, you're a jerk," you managed to get out.

"What was that? You want it harder?" Laughing he drew back and snapped his hips forward. You cried out as he went deeper, the angle sharper than before. "All right baby, I was going to take it easy on you, but if that's what you want..." His grin was savage and he began to thrust harder, each stroke of his thick cock stretching you wide while you arched off the desk, fingers digging into his forearms.

"Fuck!" You bucked your hips as he pounded you with bruising force. "Goddamnit! Pendejo!"

"Language, baby. Where did you learn these words?" He nuzzled your throat.

"You're a bad influence," you panted through gritted teeth.

"Slander," he said, kissing your forehead.

"You're so cruel-"

"You're the one who made me wait so long," he said in your ear. "I could edge you for hours, give you a taste of the agony you put me through-"

"Not fair. How was I supposed to know-?" You whimpered, breathing ragged from more than just exertion. "You never made anything clear-"

He kissed you gently, knuckles rubbing your cheek. "It's OK, hermosa. I've got you now. And I'm not going anywhere. That's what matters."

You gripped his hand as he peppered your face with open-mouthed kisses. Naked on his desk, one leg over his shoulder, you could only accept each deep thrust, his crown hitting your g-spot, his thumb back over your clit. Gabriel bent over you, his body burning hot against yours.

"Just you wait, baby. Jack will be back soon and then you'll really be in for it," he chuckled, mouth moving down your neck to your nipples. "He wants you just as badly, and since we're both willing to share-"

It didn't matter that Jack probably wouldn't be joining you, but just the thought of him had you clenching tighter around Gabriel.

"You like that, do you?" Gabriel chuckled. "I should warn you. He's probably going to be aggravated that we started without him, and even if he doesn't look it, he's a kinky bastard. I suspect you're going to have a sore ass tomorrow."

You cried out as Gabriel began to drive harder. The desk beneath you shook, and you clutched his free hand tighter, fingers interlaced, as he increased the pressure on your clit.

"Gabriel," you mewed. "So close-"

"Love how you say my name," he groaned, mouth sliding down the side of your neck. "You feel so good around my cock, so tight and wet. And you're taking of all of me, baby. Going to come inside you, baby. You ready for it?"

"Please-" Your voice cracked.

"You're so good to me, corazon."

Each hard stroke pushed you closer to the edge, and you writhed beneath him, left hand clawing at the air. Gabriel squeezed your right hand, holding it flat against the desk while you came there, sprawled out under him. His hips jerked and you whined as you felt him filling you up, his cum pouring inside you while you twitched helplessly beneath him.

You lay there trying to catch your breath, while he placed lingering kisses on your throat.

"You like holding hands? That's cute, I do too." He raised your fingers to his lips.

"Gabriel-" You instinctively tried to pull them back, but he held on, kissing your right hand, then your left.

"Got caught up in the moment, did you?" He said in your ear, thumbs stroking your knuckles. Me too. Want to go again, like this, baby?"

You stared at him open-mouthed, brain blank.

"I thought you didn't do this kind of thing on your desk, Gabe. I thought your office was for "working." Same goes for you, Lucky."

If Gabriel had not been holding you, you would have fallen off the desk in surprise. Instead, you tilted your head to the side. Jack leaned against the door, arms crossed, eyes bright. You had been so caught up with Gabriel, you hadn't even heard him come in. His smile was tense and his eyes were hard. Your pulse sped up. You knew that look. Jack was in a mood.

"Mmm, welcome back, Jack." Gabriel nuzzled your throat.

"Thought you were going to wait for me, Gabe." Jack shed his coat on a chair, circling the desk. "Thought we were going to share."

Your eyes widened. Jack was roleplaying too? Had they been discussing this as well? You shivered and Gabriel gave you a smug grin.

"Night's not over yet," he said, and Jack gave you both a hard look. "Finally, got her to relax, Jack. You know how squirrelly she is. Trying to scare her off?"

Jack flashed you a cocky grin. "You don't look like you're going to be running off right now. Not with Gabe's cock nailing you to his desk." He leaned over, fingers tracing your lips. "Going to let me play too, sweetheart?"
You shivered as Gabriel released your fingers and pulled out, his cum leaking down your thighs onto his desk. He sat beside you, warm hands petting your sides.

"You're kind of intense right now," you said.

"Scared?" He asked, mildly. You weren't fooled. There was ice in his eyes and a harsh undertone in his voice.

"Wondering if it's a good idea," you said.

"You like bad ideas," he said, rubbing your cheek with the rough pad of his thumb. "I'm a little pissed at Gabe for starting without me, but you're in the clear. Just don't start pushing me, and you'll be fine." He gave you a lazy smile. "Don't you want to see how he looks on his knees?"

Your breath hitched. The two of you had talked about Jack topping Gabriel, but you hadn't expected to see it tonight. He'd given you plenty of warnings, too. You were going to have to tread carefully, unless you wanted him to turn that ferocity on you. That thought did not bother you as much as it should have.

Gabriel raised a brow, like he hadn't quite been expecting that twist.

You nodded, and Jack's answering laugh came out as a low rumble in his chest.

"You heard her, Reyes. Go sit on the couch. I'll deal with you in a minute."

Gabriel pressed a kiss to your hand. "You're going to want to behave, baby. Jack's not playing nice tonight."

"Your fault, Reyes. Now get over there. Don't make me repeat myself," Jack said, voice sharp.

Smile far too satisfied, Gabriel sauntered over to the couch and dropped to his knees, back straight, shoulders squared. He didn't bow his head or look away. He just watched the two of you, cock already standing at attention.

Jack towered over you, his eyes following your every move.

You pulled yourself up, wincing at the mess on Gabriel's desk. You would be bruised tomorrow, and that was without whatever Jack had in mind. Earlier the room felt like a sauna, but now you shivered, rubbing your arms for extra warmth.

"What's your status, agent?" Jack asked.

"Green," you murmured. "I'm a little sore, but-"

"I know you're new to this, agent," Jack said, a hard edge in his voice. "But if you want me to play nice with you, a little respect for the rank goes a long way."

"Sorry, sir," you said, heart beating faster.

His smile widened, more predatory than pleased. "Did Reyes fuck the sass out of you, agent? I've got to admit, I'm a little disappointed. Thought you'd put up more of a fight."

You clenched your teeth, a smart remark already on the tip of your tongue.

Jack bared his teeth, excitement palpable.
Oh hell, Jack was goading you now and it took every ounce of self control you had not to take the bait. You wanted to push back, to see that feral pleasure ignite till something gave, usually your body. You would play next time, when you weren't quite so sore and didn't have to work the next day.

"Sorry, sir. He took me off-guard." You dangled your legs over the edge of the desk, fatigue causing your shoulders to droop. Jack ran his fingers along your spine, the heat of his touch causing your nerves to prickle.

"Poor thing," Jack said, his breath hot on your ear. "You looked so cute, wiggling on his desk while he fucked you. Going to let me have a turn?"

"Need a moment, sir," you sighed as Jack's hands began to squeeze your shoulders, his lips pressed against the side of your neck.

"Looks like he marked you all up." Jack nipped the back of your neck and you jolted forward. He laughed. "Don't worry. I'll give you plenty too. Have to make sure everyone knows you're off limits now." He wrapped an arm around your midsection, his mouth on your neck.

He was warm and you leaned against him, eyes shut.

"Too much, sweetheart?"

You shook your head. "I just need to catch my breath, sir." You glanced back over your shoulder. Jack was watching you, his smile taut. Those blue eyes met yours and his grip tightened. He was searching for something, and you had no idea what. The intensity in his gaze surprised you and you looked away.

"Feeling shy?"

"Maybe," you said.

He chuckled. "You want me to play with Gabe first or would you rather come sit on my lap and let me warm you up? I can be nice, if you behave yourself."

"I want you, sir." You exhaled slowly.

He grabbed his coat and sat down in Gabriel's chair. "Come here."

You slid off the desk, into Jack's lap, kissing his jaw as you straddled his thighs. He slid his coat over your shoulders and cupped your face, holding you still so he could kiss you. He smelled like coffee and leather, and you sighed wrapping your arms around his neck. His cock pressed against your belly through the fabric of his pants, and there was no mistaking his arousal.

"Got something for you," he said, reaching into the pocket of his jacket. He withdrew a black leather choker with a buckle and a D-ring. "You can try it on later if you prefer. There's a matching leash."

The possessiveness surprised you, just a little. But then, it shouldn't. Jack was a kinky bastard. Of course, he'd like this kind of thing. "Thank you, sir," you murmured. "Can you help me put it on, please?"

"Oh, you are being good," Jack laughed softly. 'Is it because you want to see me topping Gabe?"
"It's definitely incentive, sir." You shivered as he brushed your hair to the side. You tilted your head to make it easier for him. He fastened the collar firmly around your throat and you stiffened.

"Too tight?"

"A little," you said.

He loosened it a notch, slipping two fingers between the leather and your skin. "Better?"

"Thank you," you said.

"Sir," he reminded you.

"Thank you, sir," you said, trying not to roll your eyes.

He raised a brow, reached into the overcoat, pulled out the leash. Hooking it to the D-ring, he let it dangle, admiring the sight of you perched in his lap, wearing his coat and a leather collar.

"Are you too sore to play right now?" He asked, rubbing your back.

"No, sir."

"Get over here, Reyes. Bend over the desk." Jack lifted you off his lap, setting you on the sticky desk as well. You turned to see Gabriel leaning over, weight on his elbows, a faint smile on his face. He kissed your shoulder, his beard tickling your skin.

Jack opened a drawer and pulled out a small container of lube. He reached into another overcoat pocket and withdrew a red plug. It was bigger than the ones you took, and you wondered if Jack normally carried things like that around. The jacket was heavy, and the armor plates maintained the line of the coat. He could have all kinds of interesting surprises stored in it. Like an extra perverted Batman.

Jack rose, fingers tangling in Gabriel's hair as he leaned forward to kiss him. The skintight black t-shirt left little to the imagination and you just enjoyed watching him move.

"Open up," he ordered, pressing the plug to Gabriel's lips. Gabriel smirked as he swirled his tongue along the silicone, his dark eyes never leaving Jack's face. Jack clenched his jaw, one hand gripping Gabriel's chin. "Got greedy, didn't you? Starting without me."

"Don't act like you didn't enjoy watching me raw her, Jack."

Jack shook his head slowly. "I'm going to enjoy pounding your disrespectful ass more." He set down the plug, released Gabriel and walked around the desk. He grabbed Gabriel from behind, one hand splayed over his throat, the other pressing into Gabriel's mouth, fingers thrusting roughly past his lips.

Gabriel stiffened, groaning as Jack ground against him, his face shuttered in concentration.

"Don't worry, sweetheart. He likes it rough too. Don't you, Reyes?"

Though Gabriel was sucking on Jack's fingers, he gave you a quick nod, amusement in his eyes. You didn't think you looked worried, but you were sitting mostly naked on your boss's desk wearing his boss's coat and a leash. You weren't entirely sure how you looked right now.

Jack withdrew his fingers, and a few seconds later, Gabriel grunted. You reached over, stroking his face while he gritted his teeth.

"Been awhile, sir. Might need some more lube, please," he murmured, voice surprisingly soft. He was looking past you know, eyes half-shut, expression euphoric.

Jack nuzzled the back of his neck. "I told you. The attitude disappears once I bend him over and start stretching out that juicy ass." Jack bit down on Gabriel's shoulder hard and Gabriel gave a low groan. He took the bottle of lube and drizzled it on his fingers. You cocked your head, watching as Jack began to loosen him up.

"Come here, sweetheart. I have a job for you. Bring the plug."

You got off the desk, carefully laying the coat on the chair, because it was too long to drag around. You weren't quite as cold now. The plug was heavier than you expected, and wider than you were used to, but this wasn't for you.

"I've got him ready. Why don't you do the honors?" Jack's voice was low and rough in your ear. He pulled back, giving you room to work.

"Can you spread yourself out?" You picked up the lube, and watched as Gabriel grinned at you over his shoulder, hands squeezing his cheeks as he opened himself up for you. You coated the toy liberally and then poured some inside him. Gabriel shivered, muscles tensing.

You eased the plug in, watching it slip in halfway, before stopping. You began to wiggle it, Gabriel's breathing growing louder and raspier, his thighs and ass flexing.

"Relax," you said, rubbing his low back.

"You can be rougher, sweetheart. Neither of us are quite as delicate as you," Jack laughed, getting out a bottle of sanitizer and cleaning his hands. You didn't miss that he wiped them on Gabriel's pants. "Just give it a good hard smack."

Gabriel shuddered, but didn't protest. You just added more lube, pushing slowly till it went in with a soft pop. Grinning, you bit the wonderfully round left cheek, and Gabriel swore, hands dropping to his side.

"I'll remember that, hermosa," he growled.

You kissed the spot, nibbling on the back of his thighs and he jerked to the side, like he was ticklish.

There was a tug on your collar and you turned your head. Jack held your leash, eyes bright and smile just a little too eager for comfort.

"Get on the couch, on your hand and knees, unless you'd rather I took you on the floor."

You backed up, not quite liking how he coiled the leash around his hand. He wasn't choking you, and the leather rested comfortably at the base of your neck, but it still made you antsy. And judging by the shit-eating grin on Jack's face, he knew it.

You climbed onto the couch,

Jack knelt in front of you, unbuckling his belt. He was almost giddy, his long pretty cock bobbing in your face. He rubbed the head against your lips, pearly fluid already leaking from the tip. "Get it wet."
You gave it a few long licks before he tugged on the leash and you got the hint. Opening wide you swallowed him to the base, and he chuckled, fingers stroking your hair.

"Look how eager you are, agent. Do you need me that badly?" He rocked his hips and you bobbed your head, trying to keep the rhythm. "You're so cute with your mouth full. It's a good way to keep you out of trouble. Don't worry, I've ordered a smaller gag just for you. Still not sure if we're going to need it, guess that depends on how much screaming you're doing."

You nearly choked, now very concerned about what he had planned.

"It's OK, we'll take a few days off for _that_. I know you won't be walking after I'm done with you. That's about all I'll tell you right now. Just know that this is payback for all the things you think you got away with, like teasing. I haven't forgotten, sweetheart. I'm just biding my time." He pulled out, cock now slick with your saliva.

You glanced over at Gabriel, who knelt on the floor, a look of harsh concentration on his face. But when he met your gaze, he just gave you a small smile, which could have been reassuring, until you remembered that whatever Jack had planned, Gabriel was probably in on it.

There was an insistent pull on your collar and you looked up to see Jack sitting down on the couch, his thighs spread wide.

"Come sit down," he said, patting his thighs. "Face Gabe."

"Do you want me on your lap or your cock, sir?" You asked, as he hadn't tucked himself away.

"My cock, agent. That will make this more interesting."

Positioning yourself was a little tricky, but Jack held your hips, and slowly lowered you onto his shaft. You bit your lip, breathing heavier as you slid down, your legs spread over his thighs.

Jack groaned, forehead pressed to the back of your head, one arm hugging you around the waist, the other gripping the leash. His cock twitched inside you and you clenched around him. He cursed, teeth sinking into your shoulder and you flinched.

"Don't tease, sweetheart. Not unless you're prepared for the consequences," he warned, hands squeezing your breasts, thumbs scratching lightly across your nipples.

"Sorry, sir," you whimpered.

"These are so sensitive. You'd look good with piercings. I'm partial to rings," he said, pinching your nipples. "Maybe with little bells on them, so you jingle while I'm pounding you. That'd be pretty cute."

"Damnit, Jack," you shook as he began sucking marks onto the side of your neck.

"Come here, Reyes. We're going to play a game."

Gabriel's motions were deliberate. He approached, hips swaying. You couldn't walk that smoothly with a plug in you, but Gabriel barely showed any discomfort. He just knelt between your thighs, hands resting on your knees.

"It feels good, doesn't it? Having Jack stuff that sweet pussy with his pretty cock?" Gabriel kissed the inside of your thighs and you dropped your head against Jack's shoulder.

"He's so deep." You took slow breaths, hands balled into fists.

Jack chuckled. "Here are the rules. Reyes, you're going to try to make her come in a few minutes, using just your mouth. Lucky, you're not allowed to come till I give you permission. There are prizes and there are consequences."

"Wait, how am I supposed to hold out with your cock inside me? That's really unfair—"

"Do you think I care about your excuses, sweetheart?" Jack asked, voice cool. "You have your orders." He squeezed your breasts and your breath hitched.

Gabriel's tongue flicked against your clit and you squirmed, Jack's dick rubbing against your sensitive inner walls.

"S-so mean," you panted as Gabriel began to suck, his tongue still pressing hard against you.

"I haven't begun to get mean." Jack rolled his hips and you shrieked. "It feels good when you wiggle like that," he said in your ear, hands still teasing your breasts. "Keep complaining, I'll just bend you over and pound that tight little pussy. Oh, you're enjoying this. I can feel you squeezing tight around me. You're dripping down my cock, sweetheart. Keep it up, Gabe. She's halfway there already."

You gritted your teeth, trying to think about mundane things, like when was the last time you'd restocked your grenades? Were you low on cumin? How were you going to get Jack back for this?

Jack kept casually telling you filthy things while he fondled your tits. He would occasionally rock his hips, just to make you tense up. And Gabriel tongued your clit, his hands kneading your thighs, holding them apart.

"You're enjoying this, aren't you?" Jack said in your ear. "Been thinking about it much, sweetheart? Because I have. Every time I get you on the mat. Every time you give me that cocky little troublemaking grin. Even sometimes when you're sitting at your desk, hyper-focused and hard at work. I want to distract you. You can't tell me that you've been oblivious to us the whole time."

You swore as Gabriel's teeth grazed your clit, the friction making you arch.

"D-didn't know till someone pointed it out," you said. "Wanted you both, but—" You trembled as Jack's fingers dug into your hips. "Thought you were off-limits. Honest. Thought you guys just liked teasing me."

Jack chuckled in your ear. "We do. Preferably with our dicks. The point is, I have a lot of pent-up frustration baby, and you are the direct cause." His hands cupped your breasts and he began to thrust harder, Gabriel's tongue lapping against your clit while Jack bounced you on his cock. "Come on Gabe, you're running out of time. And sweetheart, if you come without permission, I'm going to enjoy punishing you."

You tried to squeeze your thighs shut, but Gabriel held them apart as you jerked between the two of them. Panting, you gripped Gabriel's hair, trying to push him away. Jack laughed at your attempts and his arms around you, trapping your hands at your sides.

"Behave," he growled in your ear.
"Can't- I can't hold back much longer, sir." You shook as Gabriel's fingers pressed against your clit. He inclined his head back, grinning smugly as Jack sped up, his thighs slapping against your ass. Arching, you clenched your teeth till your jaw ached, trying to hold out. "Jack!"

"Are you asking for permission?" Jack asked, a little breathless. He canted his hips and you choked back a sob. He was so deep, and Gabriel wasn't letting up either. The tension spiked and you teetered on the edge, trying to not to fall.

"Please, sir, I can't-"

"That's it," Jack purred. "Love how needy you sound. You're taking it so well."

"Jack, please oh please, sir-" Desperation choked the words in your throat.

He laughed, slowing his thrusts, giving you just enough of a reprieve so that you could hold out a few seconds more. "What was that?"

"May I please come, sir?" You begged, voice cracking.

"Such a polite girl." Jack chuckled in your ear. "All right, agent. Come all over Reyes' face."

Back bowing, you wailed as the orgasm pulsed through your core. Bucking your hips, you rode it out, swearing as the sensations twisted through you, your inner muscles clamping down almost painfully around Jack's cock.

Gabriel didn't stop playing with you, his eyes shining while he continued rubbing your clit. You struggled to break contact, the overstimulation wreaking havoc on your sensitive nerves.

"Reyes, I thought I was clear," Jack said, gruffly. "You were only supposed to use your mouth."

"Sorry, sir," Gabriel said, fingers still stroking you. "I got carried away."

"Damnit Gabriel! Let up!" You snapped. Jack still held your arms pinned to your sides.

Gabriel swiped his tongue over your clit, giving your pussy a hungry kiss. He deliberately slid his fingers into his mouth, licking your juices off them.

"Well, sweetheart, it looks like you win by default. Have to admit, you're extra cute when you're thrashing around like that. Think I'll have to tie you up again. We'll go till you're a pleading, cum-soaked mess." Jack rolled his hips and you gave a strangled moan. "And Reyes, you can stay where you are. Hands off that thick cock. I'll deal with your insubordinate ass in a minute."

Jack swiveled to the side and pushed you forward onto the couch. Before you had a chance to react, he was inside you again, hips flush with your ass. He pulled on the leash and you raised your head.

"I was going to have you suck him off while I fucked you again, but he's forfeited that reward. Are you warmed up, sweetheart? Because I'm not going to hold back this time."

He snapped his hips forward and you dropped, face buried in the couch cushions. "Jack-"

"Love how you say my name," he growled. "Been thinking about fucking you into this couch for a long time. You look so cute curled up on it. Reyes has sent me a picture or two of you asleep here. Personally, I thought you'd be more comfortable in my bed, but we'll try that out later."

He wasn't teasing any more, his cock driving into you hard, and you scratched at the upholstery. Jack's cock split you wide and while it wasn't as torturous as the constant pressure on your clit, you were still sensitive from your last orgasm.

"Loved feeling you cream all over my dick. And hearing you beg, sweetheart, I almost lost control right there." Jack held you steady, continuing to sheathe himself inside your heat. He angled himself to hit your sweet spot, and you whimpered in response. "Been waiting a long time to do this." He rested a hand on your back. "Too long. But I got you now." He gave the leash a little pull, and you raised your head, glancing back over your shoulder to meet Jack's eyes. His smile was surprisingly gentle and he leaned forward, kissing you.

"Jack-"

"Shh, if you keep forgetting my title and there are going to be consequences."

"Sorry, sir," you whimpered. "I'll try harder, sir."

"Fuck that's hot. All right, baby." He drew back, hands gripping your hips. "See if you can keep up then." Jack slammed into you, his cock stretching you out then leaving you empty and needy. He fucked you into the couch, ass in the air, cheek flat against the cushions, eyes meeting Gabriel's. He smiled at you, strangely relaxed, his heavy cock bobbing between his thighs.

"Go on, hermosa. Want to see Jack blow his load inside you. You know how long we've both wanted this? Do you know how many nights he's fucked me into the mattress, the two of us fantasizing about having you in between us?"

The image of Jack holding Gabriel down and using him like he was using you now, was too much. Hands curling into fists, you came then, Jack fucking you straight through your orgasm. Jack growled something obscene and redoubled his pace, his cock pushing deeper inside you. You shook as he yanked back on the leash, his teeth sinking into the base of your neck. He bit down hard and you squealed, his cock twitching inside you. You lay there, milking him while he held you tightly, aftershocks leaving you weak and limp.

Jack's tongue laved at the bite and he sighed. "Sorry, baby. Looks like that might bruise. Didn't mean to go so hard on you. Spread your legs. We'll get you cleaned up."

You sighed as he pulled out of you. Rolling onto your side, you winced as you opened your thighs.

"Come here, Reyes. Use that talented tongue of yours."

Your eyes widened as Gabriel began to lick your slit, Jack's semen trickling out of your puffy lower lips. He didn't tease you, he just slurped away at your sloppy pussy.

"Such a pretty sight," Jack petted Gabriel's hair. "Love seeing your mouth smeared with my cum."

"Think you like coming inside me more, sir," Gabriel chuckled.

You rested your head on the pillow, watching as Gabriel hungrily swallowed Jack down. Jack had both hands in Gabriel's curls, and he pushed himself in to the base, holding Gabriel's head in place. Gabriel just reached up, cupping Jack's ass. Jack was a lot rougher with Gabriel than with you.

Gabriel winked at you, even as he drooled all over Jack's shaft. You squeezed your thighs together, unable to look away. He didn't have the same breathless enthusiasm that Jack applied to everything. Instead he was slow and thorough, adding a teasing sensuality to every motion. Jack gritted his teeth, pulling out, his cock slapping against Gabriel's cheek. Jack snarled, reaching down to kiss Gabriel, his hands still tangled in the other man's curls.

"You look good on your knees, Reyes," Jack said, hoarsely.

"I look good from every angle," he said, teeth grazing Jack's lips.

You laughed at Jack's disgruntled expression.

"You're so damn cocky." Jack shoved him onto his back. Gabriel rested on his elbows, grinning smugly at Jack. "Going to enjoy making you my bitch."

"Always the sweet talker," Gabriel gripped Jack's t-shirt, pulling him closer. "It's a good thing I got to Lucky first. You would've scared her off."

You didn't see Jack move. One moment, Gabriel was teasing Jack, the next, he was flat on his back, Jack's knees on his shoulders. "You really want to push me, Reyes," Jack rasped. "Lucky, get my coat."

You weren't limping, but you padded gingerly across the floor, feeling both pairs of eyes on you. You brought Jack his coat and he reached into the pockets, pulling out a thick pair of cuffs. Leather-lined, the connecting chain was shorter than the ones he used on you - three inches at most.

"Thank you, sweetheart," he said, not looking at you. "If you're cold, you can put my jacket on. Sorry, I'm going to have to take a moment to deal with Reyes."

You draped the coat over your shoulders and sat on desk, watching as Jack secured Gabriel's hands. Gabriel looked anything but repentant, his smirk not diminishing at all.

"Are you going to fuck me like you mean it, sir?" Gabriel purred. "Because it's no fun when you hold back."

"You won't be sitting right tomorrow, Reyes." Jack stood up and pulled off his shirt. You sighed, watching his arms flex and his pectorals ripple. Both men were beautiful and watching Jack strip was a pleasure in and of itself. "Sweetheart, I want to watch you play with his cock. But you can't let him come. He has to earn that."

You slid off the desk, leaving behind Jack's coat. He turned to face you, blue eyes wild. One hand wrapped around the back of your neck and he leaned over, mouth claiming yours. He reached into another coat pocket and pulled out a remote. A slow smile spread across your face.

"Go on then," he said.

You crawled between Gabriel's legs, your hands kneading his thick thighs. He shuddered as you squeezed his shaft, running your tongue along the underside. He smelled musky and his skin was salty with sweat. He gave a low groan as you swallowed him down, winding your tongue around him in slow strokes.

"You shouldn't tease me, corazon," Gabriel croaked. "Jack's not always going to be the one holding the leash."

You released him with a loud pop. "Should I stop, papi? Would you rather I sat back and just watched while the commander edges you? I guess I could sit on your desk, and play with myself-"

Gabriel snarled and Jack laughed, tugging on your leash.

"Behave, sweetheart. Reyes, she's following my orders, something you seem to have trouble with." He knelt behind you, a hand resting on your ass. "Here's something to take your mind off Lucky." He clicked a button on the remote and Gabriel stiffened beneath you. Then the humming grew louder.

"Goddamnit, Jack!" He shut his eyes, teeth bared.

"Don't you like it?" You asked, fingers gliding over his shaft. "I remember you getting me one-"

Gabriel arched off the ground, panting as the vibrations grew stronger. "Baby, you are both going to pay for this-"

"You know, she likes it when you threaten her. She's dripping wet right now." Jack rubbed your slit, his thick fingers dipping inside you and you mewled softly as he curled them. You took Gabriel in your mouth then, muffling your noises.

Swearing, Gabriel writhed underneath you, his heels digging into the floor while the anal plug pulsed inside him. He raised his hips, trying to get you to take him deeper.

Jack tugged on the leash and you drew back.

"He's close. But I'm not going to let him come. Not till he asks nicely." Jack set you in his lap, his fingers still sliding in and out of you.

"Do I get to come, sir?" You moaned as he pinched your nipples, his fingers speeding up.

"You did win the game," Jack chuckled. "You want to come all over my hand while Reyes watches? So shameless."

"Please, sir." You smiled at Gabriel. His expression was savage and you wondered just how far things would go tonight.

Jack's fingers scissored inside you and his other hand began to stroke your clit. "Such a greedy agent," he ran his tongue along the shell of your ear. "How many times have you gotten off tonight?"

It took you a moment to count. And then you felt just a little self-conscious saying it out loud. "Four times, sir."

"And you still want more?" Jack's voice dropped an octave, his fingers moving faster.

"You do this to me, sir. Both of you." You turned around to kiss Jack's cheek.

Gabriel said something in obscene in Spanish, sweat beading on his forehead. His hips bucked, thighs shaking as he lifted himself off the ground.

"You'll get more, sweetheart, but I want you to pace yourself. I want this to last." He withdrew his fingers, running them across your lips and you licked them clean while Gabriel groaned, his abs clenching as he squirmed on the ground. "I think Reyes wants some attention."

You crawled out of Jack's lap and sat on Gabriel's legs.

He stared up at you with half-lidded eyes, his breathing labored. "Hermosa," he croaked. "I need to feel your pretty lips around me-"

"Are you going to ask nicely?" You cooed, one palm resting on his stomach, the other hand, reaching down to stroke his cock.

Gabriel groaned, and you could practically see the sarcastic retort on the tip of his tongue. Still smiling, you ran your thumb along his balls, watching his eyes flutter shut. You kissed a line along his clavicle before sliding down to nibble on his thighs. He twitched, from side to side, hands clenched into fists.

"Hermosa." He licked his lips. "Corazon." His eyes opened and you could read the desperate need etched on his face. "Baby, please. I'm asking so very nicely." Except, there was a not very nice undercurrent to his voice, and you shivered.

It wasn't begging, nowhere near humble enough, but it was the closest he'd ever come for you. Your smile wicked, you ran your tongue along the tip and he groaned.

"You can do better than that," you said. "Say it like you mean it."

Gabriel tossed his head back. "You're vicious," he said, inhaling sharply, and you knew he wanted to add to that, but he had better self control than you. He gritted his teeth, tensing beneath you. You watched his abdominals tighten and he took another shuddering breath, sweat beading on his forehead, hair already damp. "Please, baby," he rasped, voice throaty and raw. "I need you to touch me, with those clever fingers, with that wicked mouth, that sweet pussy. It doesn't matter. Please, I just need you."

That still wasn't begging, but you weren't complaining. You looked up at Jack, his blue eyes shining in the low light.

"I think he deserves a reward," he said with a boyish smile, stroking himself with one hand.

You angled your head, one hand massaging his thighs while you used the other to hold his thick cock in place. Sucking him down, you kept your gaze on his face. His eyes rolled back as he dipped his head backward, muttering a string of rough and guttural Spanish.

His skin burned against yours and he swore under his breath, your name featuring prominently in his rant. He filled your throat, and you couldn't look away from him, the taut severity of his expression, the fierceness in his eyes. He didn't need to voice his threats; you knew he would get you back for this. But that didn't matter right now. In this moment, he burned for you. More sweat dripped down his chest, and he arched, nearly choking you. But you held him by the base of his cock, and didn't let him interrupt your rhythm. He snarled, but you stayed in control, and watching all that hard muscle twitch and shake under your touch was intoxicating. You had to resist the urge to stroke yourself. Instead, you focused all your efforts on making him fall apart. Tongue, fingers, and lips working in tandem, you kept up the pressure, pushing him closer and closer to the edge.
"Should I tell her to stop, Gabe?" Jack's voice was breathless with excitement. "It would serve you right."

"Damnit, Jack! No, don't stop," he snapped, words running together, thighs tensing underneath you. "Please don't fucking stop baby-"

You had no intention of stopping. You were too far gone, too addicted to seeing Gabriel in this frenzied state, at your mercy. Blood pounding in your ears, you could feel the vibrations from the plug pick up and Gabriel gave a hoarse yell, and hips jerking. You braced yourself, swallowing the thick flood of cum. When you raised your head, Jack was right there, inches from your face and he cupped the back of your head, kissing you hard.

"He didn't have permission to come." Jack pressed his forehead to yours.

"You didn't tell me to stop, sir," you said, batting your lashes. "I can't help that Commander Reyes needs more discipline."

Gabriel gave a harsh laugh and lifted his head off the floor. "I need discipline? Just you wait-"

"You may have a point," Jack said, nuzzling your neck. "But you have room to criticize. In fact, I'm looking forward to seeing him teach you all about discipline."

"If he has the energy for that after this, we haven't done our jobs properly, sir."

"I suppose you're right, agent." Mischief sparked in his eyes. "On your stomach, babe. I think we've waited long enough."

Gabriel took a shaky breath and rolled over. He lay on his chest, bound hands on the ground in front of him, hips raised.

You retrieved the lube from the desk, watching as Jack worked the plug out of Gabriel's ass. Jack applied a generous amount of lube, and you leaned against Gabriel's desk. With one hand on the back of Gabriel's neck, Jack rested on his knees and slowly pushed in. Jack's face was a mask of concentration, sweat trickling down his brow. Gabriel's mouth curved into a circle, his eyes closed.

"Love being inside you," Jack growled. "Love watching you take my cock. That gorgeous ass just sucks me in. Look at you, Reyes. I should fuck you into the carpet more frequently." His fingers tightened on Gabriel's throat, and you bit your lip, watching Gabriel relax against Jack's body. You had to remind yourself that he was obviously having fun.

Jack made eye contact and he studied your face, his grip on Gabriel's neck loosening. "Too much?"

You shook your head. "He's fine, I'm fine."

Jack nodded and continued to thrust, long deep strokes that had Gabriel resting his head against his forearms. "He can still breathe, sweetheart. I promise."

You nodded. "I know. I'm good. Just enjoying seeing you both like this."

Jack snapped his hips forward, picking up the pace. One hand sliding around to pump Gabriel's cock. Gabriel groaned, obviously still sensitive from his recent orgasm. His hips seemed to move of their own accord, matching Jack's rhythm. "You're so beautiful. Love how you look underneath me. Love pounding this tight ass. Love feeling you all hot and slick in my hands. Even though you just came, you're practically begging for more."

"Jack-" Gabriel's face was strained. "Mi cielito-"

"Commander Reyes, you sound so damn filthy," Jack growled. "Letting me fuck you on the floor of your office. How absolutely shameless."

Gabriel groaned, too far gone to comment on the irony of that statement. And to be honest, you were now smart enough to keep your mouth shut. You didn't want to ruin the mood.

Jack moved faster, his fist tightening around Gabriel's shaft. The sound of wet flesh on flesh echoed in the office as Jack pistoned in and out of Gabriel's well-stretched hole. Gabriel panted, eyes unfocused as Jack pushed him harder.

"Is this what you had in mind when you disobeyed my orders, Reyes?" Jack laughed sharply. "If you had behaved, we could have put Lucky in between us and fucked her till she was a boneless, mewling wreck." Jack grinned up at you, and you knew from the look in his eyes, that he hadn't been joking about that plan. "Instead, I'm going to have to remind you who's in charge around here. But I know you like that. Almost as much as you like having an audience. What do you think of letting her see you like this? Strict and severe Commander Reyes, getting his ass reamed by the Strike Commander, and loving every minute of it-"

Gabriel gave a ragged moan and dropped his head, hips moving at Jack's rhythm.

"Come on, Reyes. Don't hide your face. Let Lucky see you come for me. She's never seen you like this, and I know she'll enjoy it."

Gabriel stared up at you, dark eyes hazy, lips chapped. "Mi corazon," he murmured. "Need you both-" And he trembled, shoulders shaking as he thrust faster into Jack's hand. Recognizing the signs, Jack slowed his pace, watching Gabriel tremble underneath him. You watched in rapt fascination as Gabriel spilled a smaller load on Jack's fingers, his eyes never leaving your face. Jack hugged the older man with his free arm, kissing the back of his neck a content smile on his face.

"Goddamnit, Jack," Gabriel sighed, when he could speak again.

"You mean, "thank you, sir?"

"Thank you, sir," Gabriel said turning his head so he could accept another kiss from Jack.

"You're welcome. This is just the warm-up, Gabe. I'm going to ravage you tonight."

"Love you too, Morrison," Gabriel groaned. "Even if you're a sadistic cocktease."

"Even if you're a sadistic cocktease, sir."

Gabriel chuckled. "Yes indeed, sir."

It didn't surprise you that Gabriel submitted to Jack. When they moved, they had a distinct grace, a synchronization born from a long history of intimacy. Even if Gabriel preferred to be in charge, he trusted Jack to take care of him, and the thought made your chest tighten. It wasn't quite jealousy. Seeing them like this, open and unguarded, was a privilege, one you didn't take for granted. But it also reminded you that you weren't on the same level. It wasn't that Jack and Gabriel excluded you, but that you didn't know how to progress. This relationship had not come with an instruction manual.

Gabriel cleared his throat. "Going to join us, baby?"

You swallowed, wondering if your doubts had been on your face. "Sure." You knelt in front of Gabriel, one hand brushing his damp curls off his forehead.

Gabriel pressed his lips to your knuckles, metal and flesh, his eyes on your face. "I want you too, corazon."

"So greedy," Jack murmured. He hauled Gabriel to his knees, arms wrapped around his waist. You weren't sure about the angle, but you wrapped your arms around his neck and lowered yourself onto his lap, using one hand to guide him inside.

"You're so good to me, mi cielito, mi corazon." Gabriel buried his face in your neck.

You whimpered as Jack slammed into him the force reverberating through your own body.

"Can you feel me through him, sweetheart? I bet you can feel him twitching every time I fill him up."

"I thought we were going to focus on Gabriel, sir," you said, voice strained.

Jack flashed a smirk. "Focus" is too gentle of a word, Lucky. We're going to break him.

Jack eventually had to take the cuffs of Gabriel. You ended up on your back, Gabriel between your thighs, while Jack continued to work him over. You kept him locked him place with your legs around his waist. He could have easily broken it, but he rested his head against your shoulder, gladly taking all you and Jack had to offer.

The three of you were drenched in sweat and other fluids. Gabriel rested his on his knees and forearms, careful not to put too much weight on you. Jack maintained a punishing rhythm, face and chest flushed.

"Think I'm going to need to stop soon," you groaned. "Getting sore." You exhaled slowly as Gabriel nuzzled your throat.

"I don't know, I've got a couple more in me-" Jack rolled his hips and Gabriel gave a low moan.

"Going to have to vote with Lucky, Jack. I'm starting to chafe too, on both ends."

Jack reached for the lube, and applied some before handing you the mostly-empty tube. You used the rest, Gabriel sliding smoothly inside you. "One last time," he said. "Want me to go faster?"

"Please-" Gabriel shook and you kissed his face, whining softly as he thrust deeper inside you.

Jack stroked Gabriel's hair, "Relax and let us take care of you," Jack said, his lips gentle as he began to kiss Gabriel's broad back.
A little sore, and definitely wrung out, you held Gabriel, your shoulders bruised from the number of times he'd bitten down, muting his own cries. But you began to move, trying to match Jack's tempo.

Gabriel came first, a strangled moan breaking free of his throat as he shattered, collapsing against you. You stroked his hair, not minding that he was heavy. You weren't going to sleep this way, and you liked knowing that you were partially responsible for his state.

Jack didn't last much longer, wrapping his arms around Gabriel's chest. He dropped onto Gabriel and you swore, trapped under their combined weight.

"What's that?" Jack murmured.

"Get off!"

"I certainly did," Jack and Gabriel both laughed, neither moving to get up.

"Fuck you! Can't breathe..." You rasped, wondering if this was how you went out.

Fortunately, you were not crushed to death by super soldiers during post-coital bliss. After sneaking back to Gabriel's room for a shower, the three of you lay in bed, Gabriel in the middle.

"So were you messaging Jack before or after you pitched me on office roleplay sex?" You asked Gabriel. The emitter was on your side of the bed, which was good because your neck and shoulders were already bruised.

"After, of course," Gabriel said. "I wasn't entirely sure you'd want to play."

"I told him to wait for me," Jack muttered. "He didn't tell you I was on my way?"

"And ruin the surprise? Of course not." Gabriel laughed.

You ran fingers along Gabriel's neck. The hickeys on his skin were healing fast, whereas you would be wearing a high collar or a scarf tomorrow. "Was I really that obvious back then?"

"...Not to us, not that the time," Gabriel said with a sigh. "In retrospect, yes, we were all terribly obvious and undignified. At the time I thought you might be interested, but you were always so apprehensive. I watched Jack throw a full-on, panty-melting, charm blitz at you numerous times. You just looked uncomfortable and excused yourself as soon as possible."

"My feelings were hurt," Jack said with a straight face. "I knew you liked Gabe, but he wasn't so sure."

"I suspected you liked Jack; you got more flustered around him than me. But I wasn't sure if you felt anything more than friendship toward me."

"I thought you were both just acted out around me, because we were friends and you expected me to know that you were just joking." You sighed. "And because you're dicks who think it's funny to tease me. Genji recently told me that we were all painfully obvious and it was awkward as fuck for him and Jesse."
Gabriel snorted. "As if he has room to talk. We've all seen him hanging around the infirmary when he has other things he should be doing."

So you weren't the only one who'd noticed that. Granted, Genji was still probably a hell of a lot subtler than the three of you had been.

"But it's probably better that things worked out the way they did," Gabriel said, nuzzling your cheek. A lot of the tension had melted away and he hugged both you and Jack, a sleepy smile on his face.

"Not complaining," you yawned.

"Why do you say that?" Jack asked, rubbing Gabriel's chest. He reached over to ruffle your hair. You snapped your teeth at him.

"If we'd cornered her in the office, I doubt it would have actually gone that smoothly. She probably would have laughed, made up some lame excuse about leaving the stove on, and hightailed it out of there," Gabriel said. "We'd have had to hunt her down with a tranq gun, just to get her to talk."

"...Maybe." You closed your eyes. "If you came on like that, I definitely would have. You both can be pretty intense."

"And a penthouse suite is a better seduction location. We could take our time, get her comfortable, not have to sneak around for a shower," Gabriel continued, ignoring your comments.

"Agreed," you said, tucking your head against his chest.

"When you put it like that..." Jack yawned.

"Still appreciate you indulging me," Gabriel said, kissing your forehead. "Even if you were a goddamn brat about it."

"Blame Jack," you murmured.

Gabriel was saying something else, but you were already drifting.

Chapter End Notes

This was not what I intended to write. And to be honest, I thought it would be kinkier, but I fought this chapter for almost a week and this is what I got. I'm annoyed because it isn't what I wanted it to be, but I don't have an actual problem with the quality. And I have at least four more smut scenes in my head, so whatever. We'll get there.

Leaving Friday, will be back late Monday/Tuesday. Don't know if this will affect the update schedule yet. Being banging out an arc I've wanted to write for over two months now.

I need to stop cooking too much food. I bought these beef round roasts on sale, and I made a 3 pound roast beef with a giant pot of mashed potatoes and a mixing bowl of kale salad Sunday. I've given a bunch away and eaten the leftover at least 2x a day and we still have some. On the bright side, it was tasty.
Playing politics is more danger than you signed up for.

Kwento had arrived, ostensibly to inspect Overwatch and possibly have sharp words with the Strike Commander over how things were being handled.

You waited with Lacroix and Gabriel in the Blackwatch conference room. Jack and Captain Amari were giving her the tour.

Gabriel was rereading the Eyes Only dossiers that summarized Shit Spiders. They hadn't named the Kwento outreach as a formal mission, even if you viewed it as such. Lacroix was seated beside Gabriel, studying his immaculate cuticles.

You sat beside him, wondering if he and Amélie gave each other manicures or if they had them done professionally.

"And we'll do our presentation on R&D in the tertiary conference room," Jack said, opening the door. A light energy coasted over your fingers and you stiffened, lips curling in a snarl before you forced your expression into one of neutral boredom.

Kwento entered, looking brilliant in a blue suit, patterned with bright yellow rectangles, her gele that same shade of canary. She gave you a nod, and you returned the gesture, pointedly ignoring the one behind her. He floated in, almost passively, but you could feel him in your fingers. Didn't he know that was rude as fuck? Of course, he did. He was pushing you.

You lightly nudged Lacroix under the table. You'd already informed him of Zenyatta's probing. He flashed you a sardonic smile and you understood the message loud and clear. You'd just have to deal with it, till he found a strategic time to broach the subject.

Jack and Captain Amari filed in, Jack sitting at the head, Captain Amari to his right. Kwento sat beside Captain Amari, and across from Lacroix, Zenyatta faced you.

"Agent Strike, I had not expected to see you here. What a delight," Zenyatta said, sounding oddly enthusiastic.

"Thought you'd like a familiar face," you said, dryly, and Lacroix kicked you under the table. You winced.

"I am delighted to see one of your kind here. I was worried an omnic would be unwelcome."

You blinked. "My...kind?"

"You have...enhancements, do you not? I assumed that was common knowledge among the leadership."

You flexed your fingers. "I have fairly advanced prostheses, but no other alterations," you said, a tad defensive. "I am not a true cyborg."

"Ah, my mistake," he said, sounding terribly serene. "You have my apologies. I did not mean to cause you discomfort."

"Then you-"

Lacroix put a hand on your shoulder, giving it a warning squeeze. "Then perhaps you should not be trying to be attempting to initiate a handshake protocol on Agent Strike without verbal permission."

Kwento raised a brow. "Zenyatta?"

"I did not realize she could feel it," he said. "Most cyborgs require extensive neural augments to detect my energy work. My apologies. I was simply curious about the interfacing. I did not intend to be rude, nor to cause you discomfort."

You hadn't really compared your augments to what was on the market. You had never needed to, but Angela did groundbreaking work. It shouldn't come as a surprise that yours had extra features, not including the custom attachments. You took a deep breath, not missing how Kwento watched your reactions. You didn't quite understand why they kept focusing on you.

"Apology accepted," you said, feigning disinterest.

"Well, now that that's out of the way, I must extend my sincerest greetings. Amélie was completely charmed by your acquaintance," Lacroix said, rising to shake Kwento's hand.

"You have a very enchanting wife," Kwento smiled. "These are interesting times, Mr. Lacroix. Your team presented me with quite a bounty of data, most of which I have independently verified. And while I am very impressed, it occurs to me that you do not do this simply out of the goodness of your heart. So what is it you are looking to accomplish?" She sat back down, eyeing your side of the table coolly.

"Take a look around. You have several Overwatch founders here. Reinhardt would have attended, but his presence was required for a rescue mission," Lacroix said. "We have our differences, but on this matter we are in agreement. There is something rotten in Geneva."

Kwento looked at you. "Are you sure we should be doing this with a...rank and file agent present?"

"Agent Strike is briefed on all the missions were have discussed and we have full confidence in her. But if her presence makes you uncomfortable..." Jack trailed off, his expression stony.

"No, I suppose I am just surprised that all of you want to meet with me." She smiled thinly at Gabriel. "It must be quite important if you can come to an agreement."

"Rumors of our internal discord have been greatly exaggerated," Gabriel said sharply.

"Danielle warned me about you Commander Reyes."

"I'm sure her critiques were all fair and completely reasonable too," Gabriel said, tone flat.
Apparently, he and Undersecretary Adawe did not see eye to eye.

"She holds very strong opinions," Kwento said with a small smile. "She is not always as patient as she should be."

Gabriel snorted, but said nothing.

"It's interesting that so much of your...research leads back to Ambassador Nguyen and Director Petras. I had been told Talon was a loosely connected alliance of terrorist cells, nothing to really worry about. Your reports say otherwise." She rested her hands on the table. "My own research backs that up. We have had...issues with them back home."

"You are a very thorough operator, Ms. Kwento," Lacroix said. "I am happy to provide evidence for my claims, but I suppose you wish me to be blunt?"

"Please," she said, smiling wide.

"There has been a lot of trouble, and while I hesitate to use the word "conspiracy," if the shoe fits... Overwatch has been infiltrated more than once by Talon and multiple political agent provocateurs. And you are aware that there are several factions within the UN pushing a variety of agendas at us. We are trying not to get into politics, but when they've killed several of our agents and keep trying to get us involved in political assassinations-"

Kwento narrowed her eyes. "What?"

"Director Petras has made me many under the table offers: promotions, increased funding, prostitutes-" Gabriel laughed darkly. "In exchange for my compliance. I've put him off this long, but he going after the Strike Commander and some of my other agents." Gabriel did not look at you. "We can't share all our evidence at this moment, but I would hope that seeing all of us at this table is a sign of how severe the situation is."

" Doesn't your AI record these conversations?" Zenyatta asked mildly.

This omnic was giving you such a headache. You gritted your teeth as Kwento gave Jack a hard look.

"Overwatch is not cleared to have true AI security systems operating on premises, not with Omnic Crisis still fresh. That's going to be a PR nightmare."

Zenyatta turned to you. "I would not expect you to tolerate it."

"Athena is great and knows not to go around touching other people's circuits," you said sharply.

Zenyatta studied you. "You approve of this?"

"Not my call," you said. "But yeah, Athena's an invaluable teammate. She's a lot more reliable than most people."

"Is that so? Can she hear us now?" Kwento asked.

"No. We have some areas cordoned off as invite-only. Most of Blackwatch is outside her purview," Captain Amari said.

"Interesting. She must be a handy security addition. Has she been able to aid in exposing traitors?"

"Yes," Captain Amari said.

Kwento looked at you again.

And it hit you like a headbutt to the nose. You realized then that they knew you were the "mole" reporting to Petras. Fuck. You couldn't afford to confirm or deny yet, not till Kwento was cleared. But then, she might not want to form an alliance, not if she believed the situation to be dire, which it would be if you were an infiltrator.

You kicked Lacroix under the table.

He ignored you.

"I think we have much to discuss," Kwento said.

---

Kwento would be meeting with Gabriel and Lacroix again this evening. Without you. Lacroix didn't look too bothered by the fact Kwento assumed you were a mole. That was fine; it meant your cover was convincing. Petras would probably get wind of your meeting with Kwento in Lyon; you and Lacroix were putting the finishing touches on your "report" to Petras. That Blackwatch wanted to meet with Kwento wasn't a shocker. She had been tapped as Adawe's replacement as the future UN Undersecretary General. If she agreed to an alliance, she would feign support for Jack and hostility for Blackwatch.

Gabriel and Jack would be busy for the rest of the night. You needed to check your grenade stock. I Need Coffee was the last formal combat mission you'd been on, and your gear had taken a beating. Hitting the operation locker rooms, you opened up your equipment locker, reloading magazines, checking grenades, and discretely sniffing your armor, because someone's gear had some lingering body odor, and you wanted to make sure it wasn't yours.

Nope, you were good. It was probably Jesse's undershirts. Sometimes he forgot to wash them after a run, and they got foul. You discretely spritzed some antibacterial spray through the vents of his locker.

Your climbing harness lay at the bottom of the locker and you wrinkled your brow. What was that doing out? You rarely used it. Had it been there last time? You didn't think so, but you couldn't be sure. Picking it up, you turned it over in your hand. It looked fine, but you ran your thumb along the belay loop. The webbing was still connected, but your thumb caught on something. There was a sizeable slit on the underside, out of sight. And as the belay loop was the load-bearing part of the harness, that could have ended very badly for you.

Whoever did this had probably been interrupted, otherwise they would have folded the harness back up, returned it to its spot, and you have been none the wiser.

You set the harness down. Athena didn't have cameras in the locker rooms and while you used a plain old lock on your locker, it was less a security measure, and more to keep other agents from accidentally opening your locker when they were in a rush. Jesse had a bad habit of throwing his stuff into the wrong locker when he was heading out. You took a picture of the damage to your harness on your phone and set it back in your locker. You'd have to talk to Lacroix about this.

The likeliest perpetrator was someone in Petras' pay. But you remembered the people who didn't like you when you first arrived. Maybe this was personal, though that seemed less likely.
You didn't really deal with anyone outside of Blackwatch, and even if you didn't like some people, you kept relations professional. Hell, you would hope a Blackwatch agent wasn't this clumsy of a saboteur. You briefly wondered if any of your former students could be responsible. Unlikely, though still a possibility.

You hadn't used the harness since...before Lucerne. You didn't recall the last time you checked it either. Rubbing your forehead, you put the harness back on the bottom of your locker.
No sense tipping them off that you knew someone was out to get you.

Lacroix only raised a single brow when you barged into his office. It was just him, but you briefly wondered if you'd interrupted his sexting. Then you stopped wondering, because you didn't want to know and you didn't actually care.

"We need to talk." You plunked down in a chair across from him.

"Yes, we do. You need to stop letting Zenyatta bait you." The fact you weren't entirely comfortable with omnics remained unspoken.

"Kwento knows I'm the one writing "reports" for Petras."

"I picked up on that too. No matter. We'll just keep you out of the proceedings. It will be interesting to see what she proposes to do about it."

You showed him the picture. "I put it back in my locker where I found it."

Lacroix's frown deepened, brows knitting together. "Did you check the rest of your equipment?"

"Of course," you said. "I haven't used it for a long time. I don't think it was out of place the last time I got in my locker, but I don't actually remember."

"It is most likely then that Petras is aware of your meeting with Kwento in Lyon. We knew this would happen eventually. I'll polish the story in the report, make it clear the move was under Jack's orders. We can see if he responds to that."

"I'm not sure if this was supposed to be a warning message or if the perpetrator was interrupted."

"Petras is not that...subtle," Lacroix said. "If he wanted to send you a warning, it would have been unmistakable. Chanceux, you are now officially disposable." He clapped politely.

"I've always been the expendable one," you said. "But good to know that it's official policy now."

Lacroix frowned at you. "That is not the appropriate attitude to take on an op."

You shrugged. "I was joking."
"Of course, you were," he said with a thin smile. "But jokes are meant to be funny, Chanceux." There was an edge in his voice and you rolled your eyes. "Now listen up: I am very serious. I would not waste my time training disposable personnel."

You blinked. "Lacroix-"

"And I expect my students to respect my time and the effort I put into teaching them. Do you understand me, Chanceux? It reflects poorly on me if you cannot appreciate my work or think it acceptable to throw away my efforts. I do not train sacrificial lambs. If you are going to be casual about the worth of my time and your life, you don't belong in special operations." His tone was sharp and you sat rigidly in the chair, almost expecting to be slapped with a glove.

"Uh...sorry?" You blinked a few times, unsure of what else to say.

Lacroix's cool expression did not waver. "Do you understand me, Chanceux?"

You would never understand this man. "I get what you're saying, I think," you said. "I'll be...more circumspect, sir." That was a "please stop being mad at me, I don't understand what you want, Captain Amari" answer. And while you butted heads with Lacroix countless times, this was the first time, since that initial entry interrogation, that his anger made you uncomfortable.

Lacroix's shoulders relaxed. "Yes, well, I won't get my hopes up. I will finish the report tonight and you can send it off to Petras. We'll see if anything changes. If not, consider yourself burned, and we will act accordingly."

You sat there for a minute, wondering what exactly Lacroix was so worked up about. Maybe Kwento wasn't going to play along. Maybe Zenyatta was being annoying. Maybe Gabriel had worn the cufflinks and you hadn't even noticed.

"Now, about Zenyatta, what exactly is the problem?"

You shrugged. "He likes fucking with me is all. The finger thing irritates me, but I can't tell him off since we're in the middle of diplomatic negotiations. That frustrates me more."

"That kind of...reaching out is a common omnic greeting," Lacroix said. "I understand that it violates human notions of privacy and even body autonomy, but it's not rude to them. It is ruder not to acknowledge."

"He admitted that-"

"Yes, but I'm giving you context." Lacroix shook his head. "There was less offense intended than you think."

"OK," you said.

Lacroix folded his hands, resting his elbows on the desk. "You are to be professional, Chanceux."

"I have been!"

"Barely," he sniffed. "Don't let your issues with omnics bleed into your work. I expect better from you. Now I'm going to requisition you another harness and I expect you to discretely arrange for a more secure equipment storage. Leave some things in the locker, but move your primary gear to your quarters. I also recommend telling Gabriel and Jack about this. They will react badly if I have to be the one to give them the news." And from the way he said it, you knew that keeping them in the dark was not an option.

Relationships weren't all cuddles and great sex. Some days you just wanted to be alone. Gabriel could be difficult and snippy. Jack could be distracted or inconsiderate. You were just as capable of being snappish and bitchy. Sometimes you didn't feel like engaging them or anyone. Already in a bad mood, you stalked to Gabriel's office, not looking forward to this talk.

"-Are you flirting with me, Ambassador?" Gabriel laughed, his voice low and pleasant. "What would Adawe say?"

"I am not my mentor, Gabriel. Please, call me Adaeze."

You blinked as you stepped into the office, Kwento sitting across from Gabriel, the both of them looking extremely comfortable. Kwento smiled brightly at you. "Agent Strike, I was wondering if I'd get to see you again before I left. I wanted to apologize for Zenyatta's behavior."

You stood in the doorway, jaw suddenly stiff. "Oh, it's fine," you said flatly. "Agent Lacroix gave me context. I get now that it was one of those cultural misunderstandings I was worried about."

Kwento raised a brow, not quite buying your performance.

You did not look at Gabriel. You just took a deep breath and forced yourself to relax. "When I'm in the field, getting hacked is a legitimate danger. It's a sore point for me and the intrusion put me on edge, but I'm sure he didn't know that. It made me grumpy, but no harm was done and I'll be fine."

Kwento nodded, apparently satisfied by your confession. "That is completely understandable, Agent Strike. Thank you for your candid explanation." She flashed you one of those megawatt diplomatic smiles and you had to fight the urge to snarl at her.

"Of course, ma'am." You nodded, and went to your desk, picking up your tablet and fiddling with some papers. You did not need to stick around and watch Gabriel charm Kwento. You knew it was just work. But it still felt like you'd gotten a fishbone stuck in your throat.

Giving them both a polite nod, you walked back out, closing the door gently behind you. Because otherwise, you might have been tempted to slam it.

Hanzo was in the Blackwatch gym in gi pants and tank top, and to your surprise, he was showing Vo a wristlock. She wasn't very enthusiastic, and he wore that familiar pinched expression that he normally got around you. He mimed twisting his arm and she crossed hers, glaring up at him.

"J'ai terminé," she said when she saw you.
Hanzo frowned.

"Oh, I think Tataryn was looking for you, Vo," you said, not very convincingly.

Hanzo rolled his eyes upward, like he was seeking some kind of divine aid. Vo just nodded her thanks and scurried away.

"I don't know why you did that. She needs the practice. Her hand to hand is terrible."

"We will never knowingly send Vo into a close combat situation," you said.

Hanzo crossed his arms. "Things happen."

You sighed, remembering the damn day spa and Marta. "Yeah. They do," you said glumly. "That's the first time I've seen her in the gym in a months. She hates exercise almost as much as healthy eating. So that is a pretty impressive feat."

Hanzo nodded like he was entitled to the compliment and the recognition. "I'm beginning to see that." He paused. "She doesn't have anyone outside of Blackwatch, does she?"

"Not that I know of," you said.

Hanzo watched her retreat, his expression thoughtful.

You set your tablet down, pulled off your hoodie, and kicked off your boots. "Do you want to spar?"

Hanzo frowned at you. "Didn't you have some important-"

"I showed up for the politicking. Now I'm ready to hit something," you said.

"I think you might be disappointed then," Hanzo said. "I have no intention of letting you hit me."

"So "no" to sparring," you said and picked your boots up. "You haven't seen Genji then, have you?"

"I didn't say I wouldn't spar with you," Hanzo said with a little smirk. "I said I wasn't going to let you hit me. We can spar, you are just too slow."

You dropped your boots back on the floor. Smiling at him, you began to stretch. He just gave you a casual nod tinged with disdain. You didn't care that Hanzo outmatched you. You were going to hit him.

---

You hit Hanzo. Only a few times, and nowhere near as hard as he deserved, but you did that much. Despite ending up flattened on the mat many times, you felt a little better. Eventually, you just laid back on the mat and shot dirty looks instead of roundhouse kicks at him. They were about as effective. Hanzo just shook his head at you.

"You were sloppier than usual," he said. "Angry?"
"I was," you agreed raising your head off the mat. "But not at you. I think I feel a little better now. Thanks."

"Would any of that anger happen to be directed at Commander Reyes?" He asked, studying his fingernails.

You would have never described Hanzo as "emotionally astute." It took you a moment to connect the dots. "He's watching us, isn't he?"

Hanzo nodded. "He doesn't look particularly murderous, if you were concerned."

"I'm not," you said. You got up, dusting yourself off. "It's nothing serious. I'll see you later. Thanks for the workout."

"Of course. Maybe one day you'll be able to return the favor." He tossed his head, ponytail whipping over his shoulder and sauntered out. Yeah, you could really see how being a smug shit ran in the family.

Hanzo greeted Gabriel as he passed, but Gabriel was watching you, his face neutral. You pulled on your hoodie and put on your boots. Grabbing your tablet, you took a deep breath. You walked up to him.

"Do we have a problem?" He asked you, his expression guarded.

You shrugged. "Don't think so."

He frowned at you. "Something's bothering you."

"I'm having a bad day," you said. "I just...need some space. We can talk later."

Gabriel nodded. "All right. But we are going to talk about it."

You bristled at the statement. He could issue you orders about the job, but in the relationship? He wasn't your boss there. Your outrage must have shown on your face, because Gabriel gave a heavy sigh.

"I would like to talk about it later," he said, voice lower. "Please." The words were clipped and tight, but he didn't look angry, just tense.

You gave a curt nod. "OK." And you were off, back to your quarters for a shower and a drink.

---

Bayan had finally sent you a note, just a short message telling you that he was doing fine, thanking you for your intervention, and apologizing for missing the slumber party. Maeda Vargas and Lowell had more questions about combat ops. Jeong sent her own inquiries about the nuances of handling classified supply chain management and logistics. Tataryn wanted something. You weren't sure what, but he invited you for coffee, and addressed the letter to "my good friend," and that made your teeth itch. Amélie wanted to know when you were going out on a double date.

There was a knock at your door and you took a deep breath, hoping it was not Gabriel. "Who is it?"
"Your favorite sandwich-maker, now open the damn door," Ziv snapped.

"I only open the door for cake. Unless I like you." You sat there a moment, then got up and opened the door.

Scowling, Ziv shoved his way in, carrying two large packages wrapped in wax paper. He dropped them on your desk, glaring at you. It didn't bother you at all; you were used to Ziv's hostile facial expressions. You just got out the strawberry Fanta you'd bought for him.

Ziv's frown softened. "Thanks."

"What'd you bring?"

"Roast broccoli sandwiches with Sriracha mayo, parmesan, pine nuts, and Korean pickles. Don't ask me what kind, I got them out of a jar, and it's all in Korean."

"Huh," you said.

"They're really good. One of the girls at camp got me hooked. Said they were a New York thing. I don't care where they're from, they're tasty." He handed you a large submarine sandwich, before carefully pulling out your chair and sitting in it. It wobbled, and he grimaced. "You haven't gotten this replaced yet?"

"I don't use it. Thanks for the food," you said, not actually hungry. But you politely took a bite. The broccoli was tender and almost nutty, the cheese and spicy mayo adding smooth layers of flavor. The pine nuts gave it a satisfying crunch, but it was the sweet and sour tang of the pickles that really brought the flavors together. "That's...surprisingly good." You eyed Ziv and sat down on your bed. "What have you done?"

"God, you're paranoid. I just brought you a sandwich, because I'm sorry I'm a bad friend," he muttered, not looking up from his own sandwich. That didn't actually refute your point, but you decided not to argue.

You took another bite, waiting.

"And the boss told me about your gear." He glared at the floor. "Any ideas who?"

"Not a clue," you said.

"I briefed Athena. We can take several tech precautions without tipping off the saboteur. Torby thinks he can booby trap your locker, if you like."

You nearly choked on a broccoli floret. "Thanks, I'll keep that in mind."

Ziv took a savage bite off his sandwich. Chewing angrily he stared at the floor. "I checked in on your boy."

"I keep telling people, he's not mine."

"He's fast and clever," Ziv said, reluctantly. "He'll be better than me in combat and maybe some of the sneakier shit. But his tech scores aren't so hot, so you're not getting rid of me that easily."

"...There went my brilliant plan," you said dryly.

Ziv flashed you a triumphant smile. "Well, as long as he's competent. He isn't quite as good looking or as mature as me-"

You rubbed your forehead.

"But I guess he won't bring down the team."

"You're talking like this is a done deal: we're not recruiting them straight out of training. They're going to Overwatch first, and we'll see how they do. Unless Lacroix has yet another clever plan he hasn't briefed me on."

Ziv shrugged. "No. It's just obvious that Maeda Vargas is Blackwatch material. And his friends Lowell and Jeong seem determined to join up too. Heard they were part of your fan club."

You took another bite of sandwich, if only to avoid saying something caustic.

"How'd Reyes take it?"

"Haven't said anything yet," you said when you were done chewing. "He was busy...finessing Kvento." You scowled.

Ziv frowned, like he couldn't imagine Gabriel being diplomatic. "I don't know what that means."

"She was flirting with him and he was being friendly back."

"...She was hitting on him? He wasn't flirting back, was he?" Ziv stared at your face. "He was! That pig! You're not going to let him have a harem!"

"Relax, Ziv." You rolled your eyes. "I know it doesn't mean anything-"

"That bastard has the Strike Commander and you! He doesn't get to keep acquiring lovers while I'm celibate!"

"...Those are two completely separate topics," you put your sandwich down. "This is work. I'm just annoyed at her omnic friend Zenyatta. He's fucking with me and I'm not entirely sure why. And Lacroix took me to task for not being more professional about the whole thing." You left out the part where he overreacted to your throwaway comment about being disposable. You still weren't sure how you felt about that.

"He's ruthless when you mess up on an op." Ziv winced.

"Is he still giving you shit over Spinshot?"

Ziv shook his head. "No. We settled that. As long as I don't fuck up again, I think we'll be fine." He focused on his hands. "Amélie invited me over for dinner in their quarters tomorrow night."

You nodded.

"I don't know if it means anything," he said.

"I've told you what Amélie has said to me."

"We...get along pretty well," he said. "Cologne was eye-opening, and not just because I fucked up big time." He sighed. "Amélie likes me just fine and made it clear that my feelings don't bother her. But I don't know about the boss. Sometimes we flirt outrageously, but he's the kind of guy that...well, he flirts outrageously. It doesn't necessarily mean anything."

"Lacroix and I never flirt," you said.

"You have an entirely different relationship with him," Ziv said.

"Thankfully," you said. "Ziv, I want you to happy, provided it doesn't involve lots of evil and inconvenience to my life. If you and Amélie are happy, that's what matters. As for Lacroix, I don't trust him any further than I can throw him, but if you and Amélie can keep him in line, more power to you."

"You know the boss isn't that bad."

"...I understand him better than before," you said after a moment. "That's all I'll say about that."

"Jack's quarters?" was all the message from Gabriel said. You agreed and put on a comm unit. You did not need to be ambushed by Zenyatta.

"Athena, where is Zenyatta?"

"He is with Ambassador Kwento in Commander Wilhelm's office. They are having a late snack and discussing policy."

You nodded, even though Athena couldn't see you. "I'm headed for Jack's quarters. I'd like to avoid him as much as possible."

"...He has asked me several questions about you," Athena said.

You frowned. "Just me?"

"No. He has many questions. He made several personal inquiries about my purpose and satisfaction. It is...nice to speak to such a well-traveled inorganic life form." She sounded almost wistful and you felt a pang of guilt. Athena didn't get to socialize with many high-functioning omnics, not with her role and sentience heavily classified. That Zenyatta had been able to figure her out so quickly worried you.

"Anything I should know about?"

"He asked me if you were ever rude or cruel to omnics and other inorganic collectives. I was offended."

"...I don't interact with them much," you admitted. "But until recently, I didn't have many friends outside of Shit Spiders, so, I think that's more about my lack of socialization than anything else."

"I said something similar," she said. "But worded it better."

"Anyway, he keeps trying to push me. I don't know why." You shrugged.

"He is very curious about you. I am not entirely certain what the reason is. You should be
"...Thanks for the heads up," you said, with a sigh. You appreciated the concern and the initiative. But it would have been extra embarrassing if you hadn't known it was there. Ziv could pick locks just fine and you wondered if he was going to leave you any gross surprises.

"They won't install any of Agent Lindholm's devices without your permission."

You laughed nervously. "Yeah, I appreciate that."

"Don't worry, Lucky," Athena said. "We have your back."

You slunk into Jack's quarters, not looking forward to this discussion. Sparring with Hanzo and eating Ziv's sandwich had perked you up. Gabriel's boots were next to the door. Jack was on the couch, in sweatpants and a t-shirt, eating chips. He flashed you a tired smile.

"You OK?" He asked, as you flopped onto the couch, fluffing a throw pillow under your head. You could hear the shower running.

"It's been a stupid day," you said, staring at the ceiling.

"Gabe and I talked about Zenyatta. If he's going to be a problem-"

You waved your hand. "Getting on Kwento's good side is the most important thing right now. But Lacroix and I are pretty sure that they're aware of the fact I'm sending "reports" to Petras. I'm guessing that's why they keep focusing on me."

Jack nodded and offered you the bag of chips. They were just plain salted potato chips and you sighed. "No thanks."

"Have you eaten?"

"Ziv made me a broccoli sandwich. It was surprisingly good."

Jack's expression was incredulous.

"It was more elaborate than that. There was cheese, spicy mayo, pine nuts, pickles..." You trailed off, realizing that it would be better just to recreate the sandwich than try to explain it.

Jack nodded, more in acknowledgement than understanding. "Gabe should be out of the shower soon. He seemed tense. Everything OK?"

You wondered how much Jack knew and decided it didn't matter. He wasn't scolding you or being a dick.

"Today was just kind of stupid," you said, curling up on the other side of the couch. "I don't like playing politics. I managed to walk in on Kwento flirting with Gabriel and while he wasn't doing anything wrong, it still made me grumpy. I probably should have stayed in my room. I'm not...good company right now."
Jack laughed, patting your knees. "I would've been annoyed too." He scooted over, so he was now in the middle of the couch, hip brushing against your legs. "Feeling jealous isn't bad, as long as you don't act out because of it, sweetheart."

"There's something else, but I figured I'd wait till Gabriel got out of the shower."

Jack nodded. "You want to hear something hilarious?"

"Sure," you said, because you could do with some hilarity.

"They want to build a statue of me. Adawe tipped me off awhile ago, but Kwento brought a copy of the blueprints. She thought it was funny."

"Like a giant Jack Morrison overlooking Overwatch?"

"Don't you mean-"

"No, Jack. No, I don't." You cut him off with a scowl. "Are the rest of the founders getting statues? Is this a group thing?"

"I only saw the one of me," he admitted. "I doubt they'll really do it, sweetheart."

"...You better not let them," you said. "Like you need to actively oppose it."

Jack raised a brow. "Oh?"

"Only two kinds of people have statues of themselves: narcissists and dead people, usually martyrs. You don't get to be in any of those categories."

Jack laughed. "That's fair. I know Petras was really encouraging me to do more "branding," back before things soured. This is probably one of his residual ideas that someone ran with. Don't worry. I'm sure nothing will come of it. And I will block any attempts to make replicas of me. The world can only handle one Jack Morrison." He winked at you with a shit-eating grin.

"You're such an asshole," you laughed and he leaned over to kiss you.

"I made you smile, I can't be all bad," he said, nuzzling your cheek.

"Yeah, Jack Morrison, you're OK," you said. "If you get a statue made, I'll spray paint a porn-stache on it."

"...No statue, I promise." He chuckled, setting the chips on the coffee table. "Shower's off. You want to ogle Gabe as he comes in? I bet you twenty credits he'll only be wearing the towel."

"He won't even be dry, and the towel will be slung dangerously low," you nodded. "I don't know how he does that. Magic hips?"

You sat up, leaning against Jack as the two of you watched the bathroom door open and sure enough, Gabriel emerged with a towel around his neck, and a larger one dipped below his waist, showcasing his sharply cut v-lines.

Jack grabbed the potato chips and shoved a handful into his mouth openly staring. You maintained a solemn expression as Gabriel cocked a brow, his lips starting to quirk upward. You reached into the bag and took a few chips, your gaze never leaving him while you ate.
"You two are ridiculous," Gabriel said, shaking his head.

"You're doing this on purpose," you said. "We're trying to be appreciative."

"We know you need lots of attention," Jack said. "We're being supportive."

"You're being assholes is what you're doing," Gabriel rolled his eyes and walked into the bedroom, wiggling his ass just to tease. Because that towel still stayed up. Magic hips indeed.

He emerged a few minutes later, toweling off his hair, just wearing a pair of sweatpants. Instead of sitting next to Jack, he leaned on the armrest of the couch beside you.

"You want to tell me what was eating you?"

You took a deep breath. "Zenyatta being pushy, someone getting into my stuff, and Kwento flirting with you," you mumbled. "Not mad at you, just...was grumpy."

"But I cheered her up," Jack said sincerely. "She is not a fan of the statue though."

"Narcissists and martyrs," you repeated.

Gabriel rubbed your cheek. "Kwento was just trying to butter me up for information, chica. I'm sure she appreciates my...assets, but in this case, she wanted more access to Blackwatch files. That's not something I'll just give her, not without an NDA, and some serious information trading. She's charming, sure, but my plate is full." He leaned over to kiss you, his lips soft from the shower.

"I know," you said. "It just put me out of sorts."

"You can always invite me to spar," he purred in your ear and your breath caught in your throat.

"Wasn't going to be good company. That's why I found Hanzo: birds of a feather," you said and Gabriel snorted. "He was trying to teach Vo to fight like a ninja. She wasn't having it. He thinks we're remiss in not making her attend your combat classes."

"He's never had to subdue her," Gabriel scowled. "She's quick, stronger than she looks, and she bites hard." He grinned down at you. "Actually, that description fits you too. But you make it cute."

You rolled your eyes.

"So who got into your stuff? Did Vo eat all your snack food again?" Jack asked and you sighed.

Gabriel nudged you sideways, and Jack scooted over, so suddenly you were in the middle of the couch.

Reluctantly, you got out your phone and brought up the picture of your partially-cut harness. You handed it to Jack and he stared at it for ten seconds before handing it to Gabriel. The look on his face went from open and amused to what you internally called "the Strike Commander is not having any of your nonsense," and then grew uncomfortably cold. He leaned forward, fists pressed tight against his sides.

"It was out of place, otherwise I never would have noticed," you said. "I'd like to think that no Blackwatch agent is going to be that obvious about it, but-

Gabriel swore and set your phone down on the coffee table.

The air prickled, and you wished you weren't in the middle of them.

"When?" Gabriel asked.

"I don't know when it happened. I think it must have been recent, because I don't remember it being on the floor of my locker before, but I can't swear to it." Both men sat stiffly beside you and you stared at the bag of chips.

"Did you check the rest of your gear?" Jack asked sharply.

"Yeah. Might cycle out the grenades, but-

"I'll do it tomorrow morning," Gabriel said, words low and clipped.

"I can-"

"Let him," Jack said coolly. "I'm sure you did everything right. But it would give us both peace of mind if one of us, or both of us, did a second or third inspection."

You swallowed your protests. That wasn't entirely unreasonable.

"Thanks," you said. "I appreciate it."

Jack reached over and rubbed your back a little too hard, like he was calming himself. "I'm sure you've already taken defensive measures. Tell us."

"I showed Lacroix already. Ziv and Athena have set up a camera in my equipment locker. Apparently, Torby offered to booby trap my locker, but I think I'll pass on that for the moment. I'm going to start keeping my primary gear in my quarters." You shrugged. "He thinks it's retaliation for helping you scout Kwento. The timeline fits, but I can't be sure. He finished crafting the report and I sent it off already. We're playing it like we don't know anything is wrong."

Jack nodded and reached over to Gabriel. "Babe?"

"Want to go to New York this weekend?" Gabriel asked gruffly.

"Hmm, I have a training exercise, but I can make time." Jack said, with sharp cheerfulness.

"We don't know for sure it was him," you said.

"Don't care any more," Gabriel said, one arm wrapping around your waist. "I'm out of patience."

"I'm OK. I'm careful and borderline paranoid."

"This is our base, we are responsible for what goes on here," Jack said, almost too casually. "Neither of us is "OK" with someone trying to get you killed. You should expect more than that."

You flinched. "I didn't mean-"

"It's not just that they tried to hurt you, corazon, though that's bad enough," Gabriel said, kissing the nape of your neck. "It's that they tried right under our noses, in place where you should be safe."

"Just...don't overreact?" You groped for words as Gabriel's grip tightened.

"Mmm, I remember some idiot charging off alone, against orders to hunt down a sniper in Belfast. I also recall that same idiot ignoring all kinds of "stupid" orders from her concussed commanding officer," Gabriel rumbled. "Was she overreacting?"

You shrugged. "None of it was premeditated."

"This isn't the courtroom, sweetheart," Jack said with a laugh.

"...You're not pulling me from fieldwork," you said.

"No one brought that up at all," Jack said. He patted your head. "Have some faith in us, OK?"

"Just...making sure," you muttered sheepishly, tucking your chin against your chest.

"Do you still want Tataryn on guard duty?" Gabriel asked. "I'll rotate Diallo and the Shimadas-"

"I don't want my friends as my bodyguards."

"They're acting as second pair of eyes. They aren't sampling your food or required to get between you and bullets. They're just watching your back," Gabriel said. "Because you have a giant target sign on it."

You sighed. "I don't want to think about it right now."

"I'll put Tataryn on standby later."

"I can go around with Athena in a drone too," you said.

"All right," Gabriel said. "But I'm still putting Tataryn on standby."

You gave a groan of frustration. "Gabriel-"

He stood and scooped you off the couch. "We're both too tired to discuss this now. Let's go to bed. I have to get up early for an equipment inspection." He began to walk toward the bedroom. "Give me a counterproposal tomorrow."

It was hard to sulk when Gabriel carried you around in his arms. "...OK."

"You're so cute when you're reluctantly reasonable," he said, tweaking your nose.

Chuckling softly, Jack followed you both into the bedroom.

Chapter End Notes

Vacation was nice. I'm trying to stay in contact with my college friends, partially because I like them, partially because it's good to get different perspectives. Most of them are in some way feeling the millennial disillusionment. Even if they're making lots of money, there's a sense of "...we're so fucked."

But enough of my endless optimism!
Chapter Summary

Two words: American cheese

Chapter Notes

Dafne made art based on the last chapter! I always get so excited when I see art.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Will you?" Tataryn hovered over your shoulder while you cleaned your carbine in the rec room. Gabriel had checked your gear, replaced your grenades, and found everything else to be in order. Except he made an off-hand comment about how your equipment could use some maintenance, and then gave you a rather pointed look. Your stuff wasn't boot camp shiny, but it was well-kept. Still, you went through and gave your combat tools a good cleaning, somewhat annoyed by his meddling.

"Tataryn, that's an awful idea," you said, not looking up. "You know that's a terrible idea. I have no clue why you thought asking this would be a good idea."

"...You are not so bad. And while you weren't my first choice, Ana has a prior obligation."

You looked up from your gun. "Really?"

"Truly. I would not ask this of you, except that I am desperate." He nodded sagely and you shook your head. You put your gun aside and picked up your belt, noting it felt heavier than usual. You opened up the sealed pouch and a small wrapped box fell out.

"Ooooh, what's that?" Tataryn asked, his grin widening.

You rolled your eyes and checked the label, written neatly in Gabriel's handwriting. "Corazon." You weighed it in your hand. It wasn't leaking, ticking, or rattling.

"Tataryn, I've met your daughter once. Once. I doubt she wants me to attend her family visitation day at school." Tataryn had been slated to help another new class of Overwatch agents run some kind of combat exercise in Oslo that week. Apparently, he'd tried to weasel out of the shift, but had so far been unsuccessful.

"She likes you," he said. "She likes Ana and the commander too, so don't get too full of yourself. But-"

You had to stop yourself from asking where Kseniya's mother was, mostly because you suspected it wasn't a happy story. "I'll think about it," you said, if only to shut him up.

"You are a lifesaver, woman. I would kiss you, but then the boss would murder me and it would be very sad, possibly messy. So, are you going to open that box?"
"Eventually," you said, palms itching to do just that. But you didn't want to do it in front of Tataryn.

"Come on, I'm dying to see what's inside," he said, plopping down on the seat beside you. He stretched his long legs, feet resting on the coffee table. "Don't keep me in suspense!"

You gave him a hard side eye.

Tataryn just folded his hands expectantly, that shit-eating grin never leaving his face. He wasn't going to move. And if you did, he would just follow you.

You rolled your eyes and tore off the wrapping paper. It was a jewelry box and Tataryn's amused grin widened. You opened it carefully to find a silver chain with a matching filigreed locket on it. It was a little larger than you liked, the size of a pocket watch, but you opened it up, half expecting to see an amusing picture of Jack. It was a compass, the arrows slender and elegant, the rose done in red and black lines. It was sturdier than you expected and there was a manufacturer's statement under the velvet. Despite its pretty appearance, the locket housing shielded the compass from demagnetization and there was lifetime warranty with free calibrations.

"Pretty and functional. The boss is smooth," Tataryn said with approval.

You realized then that there had been nothing wrong with your gear. Gabriel was just making you work for your gift. Aggravating as that was, it still made you smile.

"Thank you," you told him, when you got back to the office. "You jerk."

Gabriel just gave you a smug look as you leaned over his desk to kiss his cheek. "I know it's a little big for jewelry, but it is durable. You can take it on ops. I thought it could be useful: a compass, so you never stray too far off course."

"I think it's going to take a lot more than navigational tools to keep me on the straight and narrow," you said.

"And so that you can always find your way back to me."

Your heart stuttered. "You've been around Jack too long, spouting all that American cheese."

"I thought it was rather suave." He just kissed your glove. "Makes up for all the times I'm a jerk, right?"

"...Maybe," you said, your cheeks hot.

"You up for a quick run to London? There are some scientists that want out of their rather restrictive contracts. Said contracts belong to corporations that reportedly have ties to Nguyen."

"We're just...waltzing in there, no prep?" You crossed your arms.

"It's not supposed to be a dangerous run. But it's loosely categorized under Shit Spiders."

You raised a brow. "If we're picking up civvies, you have to behave."
"I know," he said, not the least bit perturbed. "I just want out of the office for a few hours. Thought you might like to ride along."

"Yeah, OK," you said. "Let me go get changed."

You stuck the compass into one of the padded pouches on your belt and swapped out your prostheses. Gabriel helped you adjust your chestplate and the two of you headed for the docking bay.

Jack waited by the entrance to the bay, holding two insulated lunch bags. There were all kinds of support personnel milling about, so there would be no pre-mission kisses from him.

"Are you coming too?" You asked.

"I wish," Jack shook his head. "No, I have to field an irate call from Petras, demanding to know why he wasn't informed that Ambassador Kwento was making a stop here." He shook his head. "Some days this job isn't worth the headache..."

Gabriel clapped him on the back. "You're taking one for the team, Jackie."

"And the team better appreciate it," Jack scowled and handed Gabriel the bags. "I packed you lunch. I know it's not fancy, not like you two make, but...I wanted to do something. I tried to make something like those sandwiches you like," he said to you.

Gabriel's grin widened. "I could kiss you."

"Don't tease," Jack griped. "I'll see you two tonight."

"Thanks dad, I mean sir," you said, saluting with a wink.

Jack narrowed his eyes at you. "Really, agent?" His voice was low and gruff and the way he said "agent" made you clench.

"Later Jack," Gabriel laughed, pushing you toward the bay doors. "There are too many witnesses for the two of you to start that up right now."

You boarded the Orca, and Gabriel passed you the bag tagged "Lucky." You sat down and strapped yourself in, before opening up the bag. There were two sandwiches, an apple, a bag of chips, and a drink pouch. You wondered if this was what Jack ate in elementary school.

Gabriel sat down beside you. "I brought the files up, if you need to read the mission parameters. I might take a nap."

Nodding, you flicked on your tablet and then grabbed a sandwich. Out of curiosity, you inspected the sandwich.

"...Gabriel," you said, hesitantly.

"Yes?" He asked, eyes shut.

"Are we poor?"
He snorted. "I don't know about you, chica, but I've been responsible with my money. So has Jack. Now if you need a sugar daddy..." His eyes opened, a slow, downright wicked smile spread across his face. "You only have to ask, baby girl."

You just looked back down at your sandwich. It was white bread with a smear of mayonnaise, and a slice of American cheese. There was one pickle chip in the center and that was it. The second sandwich was identical.

After staring for several seconds, Gabriel started to laugh.

"We're poor, aren't we?"

Gabriel just laughed harder. "Dios mio, Jack. Now I have to check mine." He opened his bag and he had three lettuce and mayo sandwiches, a banana, and another juice pouch.

"...Is he saying we need to lose weight?"

Gabriel just shook his head. "...Don't think so hard about it. He probably just couldn't find the peanut butter for PB&Js. That damn ape eats it all."

"...Gabriel, this isn't OK. This is what you pack for a six year old that you don't like very much."

Gabriel gave you a look, like he wanted to say more, but thought better of it. "At least you got cheese, corazon."

"...I'll trade you a pickle and some cheese for your lettuce," you said. "Because I love you and don't want you to starve to death before we get to London."

Gabriel just stuck a straw in his juice pouch, sighing heavily. He still took the cheese.

You waited outside bookstore, watching the coffee shop. You wore a long coat over your armor, your carbine clipped to your back. You pretended to check your phone, watching Gabriel order lattes, while he waited for your defectors to show.

"Did you get me anything? I know they have sweets," You said into the mic of your comm unit.

"No pastries while we're working," he told you. "I'm still not over how it went down last time."

You smiled grimly. "But I'm hungry-"

"I swear, you sound like McCree-"

You watched a dark-skinned woman weave through the crowd, a briefcase clutched tightly in her hands. Her long black hair was loose and she kept looking over her shoulder. Squinting, you recognized Dr. Mai Singh, but where were the other two? Dr. Rudiani and Dr. Kinnunen?

"One incoming, and fast," you scanned the area, remembering your last trip to London. Neither MI-5 nor MI-6 had gotten a good description of you, so you forced yourself to relax, acting engrossed in your phone.

"I'll be out in a moment." Gabriel had a bag and a cupholder with four drinks. You hoped one of those was for you.

You spotted three men walking too fast. They were several yards behind her, and you moved to intercept, phone held in front of your face. "We have pursuers."

Gabriel was out of the coffee shop and he nodded. "I see them."

He casually strolled toward Singh, the bag tucked under his arm. His grin widened as she bumped into him.

"The mouth is not satisfied by speaking and the ears are not satisfied by hearing," Gabriel uttered the pass phrase. "Where are the others?"

"Kinnunen is dead. Rudiani was supposed to take a separate route, but I've been followed-"

"Head over to the bookstore. Woman in the tan jacket will get you to safety. I'll take care of these guys."

That wasn't part of the plan. You scowled as she crossed the street. One of the security guys would pass you in half a minute. You primed your pressure injector, knowing you would have to be fast.

He walked by you, and you kept your hand low, finger pressing against his wrist. He looked up, startled by the pinch and the contact, and then he dropped while you turned to catch up with Singh.

"Watch this," Gabriel laughed, and you looked over your shoulder, eyes widening as Gabriel dumped the entire drink tray on one of the suits. He screamed and Gabriel reached out to "steady" him and "help him dry off" before they both disappeared into an alleyway. You caught up to Singh.

"The hunger of the hungry is not appeased; by mere words, hunger is not relieved," you said in her ear. "Now turn right up here."

Singh, to her credit, did not look back, she just kept walking, following your instructions.

The two of you took the fire escape up.

"Status?" You heard static over the comm.

"Busy!" Gabriel shouted.

You tensed as Singh reached the roof, her eyes falling on the illegally-parked shuttle. It had cloaking-tech, much like your stealth suit, so it was hard for security sensors to pick up, but it wasn't invisible. It opened to your touch and you let her into the back seat.

"I'm going back to see what the hold up is. If we're not back in ten minutes, the autopilot will take you back to the ship."

She nodded once, lips pressed in a thin line. "Thank you."

You made your way to the edge of the roof. Gabriel had an older man leaning against him, three more suits following behind. You positioned yourself above the mouth of the alley, and drew "Get up here," you said. "I've got you covered."

"Try to keep it nonlethal," Gabriel said sharply. Because killing civilians was strongly frowned upon, even if they were corporate security goons.

Gabriel lifted Rudiani in a fireman's carry and took the steps three at a time. You saw one of the suits reach into his jacket and took aim, finger hovering over the trigger.

He withdrew a cell phone and you exhaled slowly. The other two men rushed into the alley, but Gabriel was on the roof and the three of you climbed into the shuttle, already heading back to the Orca.

---

Rudiani had been hit with a motorbike while trying to make his escape. He was concussed and you were pretty sure his left ankle was broken, but he was alive. You stabilized it, and gave him a painkiller. He wasn't entirely cognizant, and you didn't like the way his pupils didn't match. Gabriel set up the emitter while Singh looked on, fretting.

Once you'd taken care of Rudiani, you sat back in your seat and Gabriel handed you the remaining bag from the coffee shop.

"Save me one," he said, before sitting down with Singh to debrief her. Inside were a cinnamon bun and a croissant. You took a small bite off the cinnamon bun, just because it smelled good and then ate the croissant. Yes, the cinnamon bun was better, but it was higher calorie and Gabriel probably needed it more. The croissant sufficed. You didn't even mind that there wasn't any coffee to go with it.

Both Singh and Rudiani worked in genetic engineering: Singh being a cutting edge researcher in the dubiously ethical field of human genome enhancement; Rudiani specializing in custom-designing treatments for a variety of inherited disorders. Kinnunen had patented some kind of trait blocking chemical. So while you weren't actually sure what exactly their work entailed, you had a sneaking suspicion that Gabriel's medical issues weren't getting any better.

"Your counterproposal?" Gabriel asked when he sat down beside you, having finished up with Singh.

"I'll start taking an Athena drone with me. Yeah, you can have Tataryn watch my back, but as necessary. Not full surveillance."

"A combat-equipped drone," he said.

"OK," you agreed.

"We're keeping your name off the mission rosters for now. You can go out, but there won't be any forewarning for anyone outside of Shit Spiders."

"OK," you said, content that he wasn't trying to smother you into safety. You handed him the bag with the cinnamon roll, and he gave you an acerbic smile when he saw the bite taken out of it.
"Really?"

"I was making sure it tasted as good as it looked," you said.

He snorted. "Verdict?"

"Well, it's still there..."

He gave you a look.

"...But I could take another taste, just to make sure."

Gabriel devoured the pastry in two quick bites, his eyes never leaving your face. "It was delicious," he said, crumpling up the bag.

You sighed, looking wistfully at the bag.

Gabriel just rolled his eyes at you.

You crossed your arms. "You're kidding me."

"You always say that, and you are always wrong," Lacroix said, lounging in his chair. "One would expect you to learn from your mistakes, Chanceux."

You slouched in your seat, staring up at the ceiling and muttering under your breath. "After all that..."

"She didn't say "no." This may not even be a stalling tactic. Agreeing to a formal alliance takes time. This is merely an extension of negotiations. Stop being so impatient. You know better."

"But does she have to leave Zenyatta as an observer? For fuck's sake, he's been asking Athena all kinds of questions about me."

"Though it would make your life infinitesimally easier, it's still too early in the process to show our hand, Chanceux," Lacroix said, disapproval clear in his tone. "Petras will probably get back to you tomorrow, if he thinks he's going to retain your services. Ziv has informed me of the camera in your locker. We will see if anyone attempts to fix their mistake."

Lacroix's amended report included a situational analysis, claiming that Reinhardt and Jack were trying to form an alliance with Ambassador Kwento, without Gabriel's knowledge. And that Kwento, like her mentor, didn't care much for him. As Gabriel's meetings with Kwento had been private, none of Petras' spies could contradict you.

"Does she think he's going to uncover more classified information or-?"

"He is a character witness, Chanceux. Kwento is a busy woman. And while she's intrigued by our pitch, she wants to see what she's getting into. She trusts Zenyatta's judgment. So keep that in mind whenever you interact with him. Obviously, he has ulterior motives, but information-gathering is a two-way street. You are not a complete fool. You understand that you can learn as much about him as he wishes to learn about you, if you work the situation correctly."
You winced. "You're the worst."

"I am merely pushing you to do better, Chanceux. You cannot avoid social engineering tasks simply because they make you marginally uncomfortable. Some may have that luxury, but we do not. You are capable. There is no excuse for shirking. I wouldn't have tasked you with this if I thought it beyond you."

It occurred to you then that Ziv wasn't a part of these proceedings, maybe because he'd returned halfway through, or most likely because he sorely lacked a diplomatic face. Hell, he was a right bastard to you, and he liked you.

"I'm not going to be his tour guide."

"No, that would be too obvious. But he will seek you out. And he will question those who know you. Work with that accordingly. You have a reputation for being candid in your interpersonal interactions. It would not be out of character for you to confront him eventually, however, you must be smart about it. None of your outrage or kneejerk defensiveness. Do you understand me?"

"Yes," you said sullenly.

"I want regular reports on your interactions with him. If only to track your progress."

You wondered then if you could take a rotation in Antarctica for a month. No one would ever look for you there.

"...Well this is awkward."

Gabriel had not locked the door and now he regretted it. There were guards on duty outside the room. And visiting hours were in effect. Not to mention he had it on good authority that you would be occupied for the next hour or so.

"Come in, Mihret, and shut the door behind you."

Mihret slunk in, sullen and twitchy, like a feral cat. It still surprised Gabriel that the antisocial hacker had latched onto you. He seemed like the type to live in a tech cave all day, only to emerge for convenience food. But then, Mihret, you, and himself were all bound by shared trauma. And Lao? Yes, that tie applied to her too.

Lao sat behind the table, her arms crossed.

Mihret looked at Gabriel, his eyes narrowed. "You're not threatening her, are you?"

Gabriel raised a brow. "And if I am?"

"Then you're a dick," Mihret said, yanking out a chair and sitting down beside him.

Lao's eyebrows rose higher.

Apparently, Chang's program hadn't worked. Not that he expected an attitude adjustment, not without some serious head injuries. Mihret had filled out a little, but he seemed even surlier than before, like some kind of demonic hellspawn that didn't die, but returned nastier than ever.

"Then you're a dick, sir," Gabriel said sharply.

He saw Mihret start to come back with something smart ass, but then the boy gritted his teeth and stared at the floor. "Yes, sir. Sorry, sir."

"Have you been formally introduced?" Gabriel said, letting the attitude go for now.

"No, sir."

"Agent Lao, this is Agent Ziv Mihret, our Blackwatch systems engineer and a constant thorn in my side," Gabriel said. "It's his secondary title."

"Is that a promotion? I'll get a plaque made for my office," Mihret said. "...Sir."

"You're Rivka's grandson," Lao said in a quiet voice. "Lucky told me. I...I'm sorry. For all the times I attacked you."

Ziv waved his hand, not making eye contact. "You failed, so it doesn't matter."

Lao blinked, obviously taken aback by his brusqueness. "I'm sorry about your grandmother. I-"

"I saw the video," he said sharply. "You didn't kill her."

Gabriel sighed. Mihret was the emotional equivalent of a rabid hedgehog dipped in hot sauce smacking a person across the face. "I am obligated to inform you that this is how he usually behaves," he said. "I think Lacroix and Lucky are the only ones who can reign him in, short of using extreme measures." Ana could do it too. Gabriel considered transferring him right then. He cast a sideways look at Mihret, who actually had the grace to squirm.

"So what did I interrupt?" Mihret asked.

Gabriel inclined his head back and Lao met his eyes silently asking permission to share. He nodded.

"Dr. Ziegler is willing to craft me a new arm and do more invasive procedures to alter my spinal cybernetics. We've been talking about the risks and what I want to do afterward."

Gabriel would treasure the look of shock on Mihret's face for the rest of the night. The younger man's jaw dropped, and then he looked between Lao and Gabriel like they were fucking with him.

"You're being nice to her? You? After-"

"That information is classified, Mihret," he reminded him sternly.

Lao cocked her head to the side. "I was just as surprised that he didn't take me out back with a shovel."

"Lucky wouldn't let him," Mihret scowled. "And speaking of which does she know-?"

"No," Lao said firmly. "It's not her business. You don't need to get her hopes up."

"What do you care? You won't even let her visit!" Mihret practically shouted.
Lao flinched. "Why are you here? To yell at me in her stead?"

Gabriel wondered if he was going to have to kick Mihret out.

"No," Mihret muttered. "I thought you might like a visitor who hasn't contributed to your baggage. But I'm not good at diplomacy."

Gabriel laughed sharply, but diplomatically did not add to that.

Lao stared at the table. "...I don't know how to fix any of this: my knowledge of Talon and Hanoi is of limited use. And I don't know where to start. I don't know what to say. I don't know if any of this can be fixed."

"Oh," Mihret said, after a moment. "I uh...I hear apologies are a good place to start, but I'm no good at them, so you might want to ask the Commander. I hear he has a lot of experience giving them."

"I see," Lao said, her face very blank as she looked between Gabriel and Mihret. Then she covered her mouth and it took Gabriel a moment to realize she was laughing.

She sounded painfully young and Gabriel swallowed his annoyance. "Yeah, I know how to apologize. That's why I have friends and you hang out with a monkey in the lab all day."

Mihret glared at him, and Gabriel wondered if you'd be opposed to sending him back to California for a few weeks. Just to get some peace. But Lao was smiling, and he had not seen that before, not in person. Of course, that was the Mihret effect in a nutshell, surprisingly helpful, but simultaneously a goddamn pain in the ass.

---

Every one of your trainees had passed. You couldn't take credit for all of that, but you were pleased that Maeda Vargas, Lowell, and Jeong had all done well. You'd made an appearance at the celebration, buying them a round and donating a bottle of Máotái to your fellow instructors. Shoal was placated, but Jesse chewed on his cigar, swallowing bitter words, if his sour expression was any indication. You realized you were going to have to talk to him about things soon.

Everything was slowly coming together. Lacroix and Lao were having intel-sharing sessions, and despite her aversion to you, she was handling Lacroix all right, and he seemed pleased over the quality of information she provided.

The Overwatch leadership was working hard behind the scenes to maintain unity, while carefully playing their "politicized" roles for the enemy. The rank and file consensus was that Jack and Gabriel had a personal falling out, but they were too professional to let that get in the way of work. If anything, Jack and Gabriel seemed to enjoy snapping at each other in front of other people in a sort of goading foreplay. Gabriel would sneer "sir" on the end of his snarky remarks, and Jack would take a deep breath, shooting Gabriel a hard look that translated into "we're going to have rough sex later," but that other people thought meant "I hope you get hit by a bus."

Petras had not yet given you anything incriminating, nor had he cut ties. He just thanked you politely for your report. No one had come to remove the harness, so you were working under the assumption that he wasn't trusting any of your information and that he would eventually try again. But the combination of data retrieved from the Vialli mansion and the decrypted Talon SIGINT from the Ninth Circle had enough to warrant a formal investigation. There were so many unethical research projects and corporate ties, you suspected the only multinational you could trust was Feng's White Rabbit Enterprises, and considering it was a Triad front, the irony was not lost on you. Genji was following the money and unearthing quite a tangle - there were several corrupt members of the Petras family and Gabriel had cleared Hanzo to help him.

Athena had numerous search filters and was trawling a variety of intelligence databases for leads. She had put together some very interesting reports, and it was unnerving to see how many intel agencies underreported on Talon. The PRC's MSS had the best compilation overall, though that report had not been widely circulated. There were Talon plants in the Ministry of State Security, but not as many as you expected and you credited On Sing with that.

Lacroix had Ziv pursuing other angles, from the cyborg soldier they'd captured in Zurich, to threads of data from Vialli and the Ninth Circle. Some roads led to Oasis. Too many led back to Geneva.

And that's where Kwento came in. You needed an advocate in the UN, someone powerful, someone with friends, someone who could work the system. As much as you hated politics, you would be an idiot to underestimate their importance. Aside from Lacroix, there was no one else you could see navigating the viper pit of the UN and not burning out. Maybe Amélie, but you suspected she enjoyed violent ops a lot more than she let on. But Lacroix was needed here, in Overwatch. He was too clever to sacrifice on the altar of politics.

You wanted to do the Hanoi op a long time ago, if only to stop the flow of cybernetic soldiers for Talon attacks. But Lacroix had some kind of grand scheme in place and said the timing wasn't right. Nguyen knew you were coming. But so far, she'd just bunkered down, fortifying her base of operations instead of moving, according to your spies anyway. You wondered what the cost of waiting would be, but at this point, you trusted Lacroix's ability to get the job done. There would be casualties, no doubt. And the thought made your stomach drop.

Feng forwarded numerous Talon, Shimada, and Nguyen-related reports to Lacroix. You weren't sure how big a team she had dedicated to intel-gathering on those topics, but she provided lots of invaluable data that would make Hanoi easier. However, you could not rely solely on her. Vishkar was starting to push back against White Rabbit, already suing over one of their hard light patents and the current Shimada leadership wasn't so happy with Feng, not after the East Asian gossip rags published grainy photos of Hanzo and Feng having dinner in Shanghai. Some of the PR departments from Nguyen's companies were openly criticizing Feng for being an ADHD dilettante, rather than a "real scientist." It looked like Feng would have her hands full for awhile.

This was further than you'd been a year ago. And to be honest, this was more than you had dreamed of accomplishing. Sure, it wasn't all your work; you couldn't have done this much on your own, but you were much closer to avenging your squad and taking out the corrupt politicians responsible, and that's what mattered.

After Shit Spiders, your biggest concern was Gabriel's health. He swore up and down that he was fine, but now he was more selective of the runs he took, climate playing an important role. He didn't say anything, but you noticed. And when you asked, Jack, Jack told you things were under control, though he didn't look any happier than you did.

And Jack was being awfully secretive about something. He seemed happy, but you'd walked in on him a few times acting suspicious. Little things, like shutting down his viewscreen and stuffing his tablet behind his back. You weren't worried per se, you trusted Jack. But it was odd and when you mentioned something to Gabriel, he told you not to worry about it. Like that ever worked.

Lao still wasn't taking your visits. But you still sent her things. Books, food, music that you thought she liked, but honestly, you weren't sure.

Tataryn was starting to get annoyed at Zenyatta on your behalf, but you made polite conversation with the omnic.

In short, things were far from perfect, but they were moving in the right direction. You just had survive the robot interrogation.

You took a quick mission in Copenhagen. Get in, kill a Talon plant in the Folketing sent to assassinate a friendly ambassador, take her stuff, and get out. Simple shit. You were on autopilot by the time you'd strolled out of the hotel and toward your extraction point. Athena's modified fish torpedo hovered above you.

Everything went off without a hitch. Except when you set foot in the docking bay, Zenyatta was waiting for you.

"Agent Strike," he said. "You were not listed as on a mission. Is that normal for black ops?"

You shrugged. "Maybe you weren't cleared for it?" Ignoring the fact your mission confirmations were now done in person, though Athena logged some under the Shit Spiders files.

"That must be it," Zenyatta said with a nod. "Is this a bad time?"

You sighed. "Are you ever going to pick a good one?"

"It seems that it's never a good time for you," he said sounding oddly regretful. "I would take it personally, but I know that you are a busy person."

You now understood that he knew you were avoiding him and it was time to handle the situation. "We can walk and talk. What did you need?"

"May I speak candidly?"

"Could I stop you?" You wondered aloud, slinging your bag over your shoulder.

"We had a rocky start, and it was my fault. I was in the wrong. I should not have...intruded at the restaurant nor when I first arrived here. I am very sorry," he said. "I realize now that this is a very sore point for you and would like to make amends."

"Is that why you've been following me around? Because you wanted to apologize?" You asked, unable to keep the skepticism out of your voice.

"Well, you are a very interesting person. Like Genji."

"...I hope you're not bothering Genji," you said tightly.

"On the contrary, he sought me out to discuss Shambhali philosophy. I was most intrigued by his questions. He is on a difficult journey."

You sighed. Genji had told you he was interested in the Shambhali, briefly. Maybe he was still curious. "Sorry, when Athena went live, she did something similar to both of us. She...upset him."

"I was more diplomatic with him," Zenyatta admitted, sounding almost sheepish.

"I bet." You blew out a breath.

"You are uncomfortable with me."

You shrugged. "Yeah."

"You are uncomfortable with omnis."

Well, they were fully capable of squishing you into a little crunchy meatballs. "Sometimes. Small ones, not so much. Big ones, yeah." He was taller than you, so he qualified as a big one, simple as that.

"You lost someone during the Omnic Crisis."

"You could say that." You didn't look at him.

"You lost a lot of people during the Omnic Crisis," he amended. "You are not very old. You were young when it happened. I am sorry to hear that. It must have been difficult."

You shrugged. "I survived."

"I expect that you have gone into combat against many omnis. Does that color your view of us?"

"Am I bigot, do you mean?" You laughed softly. "I've had to fight a lot more humans than omnis. And humans make me just as nervous, if not more so. Hostile omnis? I know what to expect. Hostile humans? They hide it better."

"That's a very broad analysis. But I wasn't asking about humans. Interesting that you them up as contrast. Rather off topic."

You blinked, your face very warm.

"I won't be offended. I am curious how you feel about omnis."

There was no point in lying, not if you wanted to get anywhere. So you took a deep breath. "Sometimes they make me uncomfortable, sure, usually when they're trying to kill me. But omnis are obviously people in their own right. As long as they're not trying to slag me, they deserve equal rights, recognition as people, all that stuff they're doing in Numbani." You paused, realizing how lame that sounded. It wasn't a lie, but it was only lip service. Omnic rights and their struggle had never been something you personally researched or supported. You had not fought against them, true, and maybe you bore them no animosity, but you were not an ally, not really. The realization was uncomfortable, but then seeing your own shortcomings always was.

Zen regarded you placidly. You suddenly worried that he was going to ask you what kind of social justice movements they were embracing in Numbani. Because you didn't know the details. Your specialization had been Talon and their operations. And while there was nothing wrong with that, in the face of scrutiny, you realized your own ignorance.

"You think in terms of combat," Zenyatta said, sounding a little disappointed. "Would you be comfortable with them allowing omnic agents within Overwatch?"

"You looking for a job?" You laughed nervously.

"I might be."

"I have no problem with it," you said, as long as they didn't pair him with you. "We need more skilled and trustworthy hackers."

"What about as combatants?"

"Sure," you said. "Haven't really thought about it. I don't normally do straight up combat runs. But I'm sure an omnic partner in black ops would be great. Athena runs them with me from time to time. She'll be ready for frontline duty soon," you realized, with a frown.

"That bothers you."

"She got torn up on our first mission together. I'd rather keep her out of harm's way. But...that's her choice."

You couldn't read Zenyatta's face, hell you couldn't read most omnic expressions and that was partially what worried you about them. Humans had tells. Omnics weren't quite that open. But still, you got the impression, somehow, that you had surprised him.

"You have an interesting way of looking at things. Rather limited, but-"

"I'm not a scholar," you scowled. "Meditating on the deeper meaning of things isn't a luxury I've had."

"I meant no offense-"

"You can't say things like that, then add "no offense," and then expect someone not to be offended, like you weren't criticizing," you said.

Zenyatta laughed. "True. My apologies. I guess I was expecting you to have a broad viewpoint on the omnic struggle. Perhaps that isn't fair, considering your attention is tied up in other things."

You shrugged, unsure if that was an insult or a genuine apology. Maybe both? "I don't make policy. I solve a very specific set of problems. The only time omnics have fallen under that umbrella is when I'm in combat with them. My interaction with them has mostly been limited to "are they on my side?" And too often, the answer has been "no."

"Then perhaps I could give you a more in-depth experience," Zenyatta said.

"Are you volunteering to be an ambassador for your people?" You asked dryly.

"It is one of my secondary roles," Zenyatta said, possibly missing your sarcasm. "I would be honored if you would spare some of your precious time so I could give you a more balanced viewpoint of omnic culture." Nope, he got it, loud and clear.

"Is this "education" going to be filled with more sarcastic asides, under the guise of bestowing wisdom on my ignorant ass?"
"I have only told you that everyone begins in ignorance. Whether they stay there is their own choice."

You didn't have time for these word games, but Lacroix's admonishments remained fresh in your mind. He had ordered you to interact with Zenyatta. Here was your opening, and it was your mission.

"Yeah, sure," you said, after a moment. "There aren't going to be tests, are there? Because I hate tests."

"I'm sure we can keep this informal," Zenyatta said, sounding vaguely amused.

Chapter End Notes

Today was...weird. Not bad, just weird. I had this 25-35 year old white man (this plays into it, bear with me) ask me for book recommendations. He likes James Patterson and thrillers. OK, so I give some recommendations. Then he specifies he wants "darker things." O-K. So I go with spy/assassin thrillers. Then he specifies that he wants to see the "killer's perspective." Several times. By the second time I'm like. "...well this is some Dexter-esque shit." Yeah, he kept asking and then thanking me for my recommendations. He was completely polite and behaved appropriately, but I'm sure you see where I'm going with this. Here is the textbook wannabe serial killer profile. "...OMFG do I have to kill him to protect society? Because this is an uncomfortable obsession. Also, please forget I exist, because I do not want to play serial killer games. I am too old for that shit."

I got a guy who commiserated with me about how they don't teach enough history in public schools, and how those who don't know their history are doomed to repeat it. Cool, agreed. Then he went on to lament about how they're taking down Confederate flags and statues and how there were plenty of black slaveowners too. Yeah... I was like, "You know, the next town over has a statue of Robert E. Lee, in it. Like, why?" He was slightly taken aback and professed ignorance of it. Because we are in a northern state that did not secede and that makes no fucking sense from a historical perspective (but that town had a very active Klan presence in the 90s, so...you can read between the lines.) But he changed the subject to Kentucky and I mentioned "they didn't actually secede either..." and left it at that, because yeah. We were both polite, but I normally don't comment on things like that at work with people whom I know I'll disagree with.

Ranger (Doggo #1) is scheduled for surgery in two weeks. I found a second lump which they'll look at beforehand. I'm a little freaked out, but hoping for the best. Dogs apparently have lots of benign but unpleasant growths.
"Hey, you busy?" You poked your head into Jesse room since the door was open. He was geared up, and you realized then that this was a bad time. "I can come back."

"I was just coming to look for you," he said, adjusting his hat. "Boss had a run for us."

"Huh," you said, because Gabriel hadn't mentioned anything to you. "Didn't know."

"Just came down the pipeline," he said. "Major Rodriguez is taking a squad out. Some of our trainees are going. Commander thought we might want to tag along and observe."

"Sure, let me get my gear." You weren't sure if you could talk to Jesse about stuff with all those witnesses, but you could always get drinks afterward, and it had been a long time since you'd gone on an op with him.

You got your gear on, and Jesse waited by the door. Armored up, you swapped out prostheses, grabbed your gun, and followed him to Gabriel's office.

To your surprise, Jack was there, sitting on Gabriel's desk laughing. There was a third man, tan, SEP-broad, and in his mid-thirties, with expressive brows, a sharp nose, and slicked back brown hair. He had a wicked scar that cut through his lower lip down his chin. But he was handsome and, even with the scar, he looked like the kind of man who smiled a lot.

"Jesse you've met Rodriguez," Gabriel said with a wry grin. "Lucky, this is Mateo Rodriguez. He's SEP too, and you can't believe a goddamn word he says."

Rodriguez smiled up at you and winked. "You're as pretty as they told me."

Gabriel sighed. "OK, you can believe that part. Pendejo."

"Nice to meet you," you said, reaching out to shake his hand. He stood, took your hand in his, and raised it to his lips.

"The pleasure is all mine. I've been hearing about you for months, but these bastards refused to introduce me." It clicked then that he'd been at Galanos' funeral. You'd left before you had a chance to talk to him.

"You can let go of her hand now," Gabriel scowled.

Laughing, Rodriguez released your hand. "So jealous, Reyes."

"I remember you hitting on Jack's sister, my sisters, and most of the women in SEP. It's for your own protection. Lucky doesn't take shit," Gabriel said, with a warm smile.

"I've heard," he said. "You broke poor Morrison's nose, didn't you?"

"It was an accident," you said, rubbing your forehead.

"It's OK. That's how these idiots flirt," Rodriguez said, laughing. And to your surprise, neither Jack nor Gabriel looked offended. "You should've seen them back at chem camp. They'd be sparring and dropping innuendo the whole time. People either fled or found an excuse to hang around the gym and watch."

"Whatever. You like your women crazy, too," Gabriel said sitting back in his chair.

"Hey now, he'll tell Ray you said that," Jack laughed.

You raised a brow. "You and Chang?"

"...I wish," Rodriguez said, his smile fading a little. "She's great. I'd marry her in a heartbeat. Never look at another woman again. Well, maybe just look," he said with a sheepish shrug. "But, you've met Ray. She uh...isn't about that life."

Chang had told you herself that she didn't like to be touched. Gabriel said she had no interest in sex. And judging by Rodriguez's flirtatious demeanor, that wasn't quite the relationship he wanted.

"Some day though." His grin widened. "If I can't win her over with my charm, I can keep sparring with her. She likes that. And the harder I flirt, the more she hits me. It's adorable."

"...Yeah," Gabriel said, dryly. "She likes it so much, she broke your arm last time."

Rodriguez shrugged. "I got cocky and clumsy. I also proposed in front of her squad."

"...You didn't," Gabriel shook his head. "Of course, you did."

"I knew she'd say "no." But I had to ask again. Just in case she changed her mind this year."

Jack sighed. "I know this sounds like harassment, Lucky. But Ray actually jokes back with Rodriguez. She isn't happy about the proposals, but she'll tolerate one per year. Had me mediate a formalized agreement and everything. They have a strange relationship."

"Shouldn't have done it in front of her squad," Rodriguez said, shaking his head. "That was a mistake. They've been with her for a long time, so I know I didn't undermine her command, but I definitely embarrassed her."

"And that's hard to do," Jack said.

"Yes, there was that time Chang walked in on us in the showers-"

"Which time?" Rodriguez smirked.

Gabriel just rolled her eyes. "This was before the joint chiefs incident." You made a mental note to ask about that. "I swear anyone else would have begged to join in. She just rolled her eyes and told us to let her know when we were done. Came out fifteen minutes later to find her still in a towel and reading a fucking tank manual."

Rodriguez sighed. "Bet she looked cute."
"She looked annoyed," Jack said.

"She always looks annoyed," Rodriguez said. "It's cute."

"...I thought you said he was one of the "normal ones," you said to Jack.

Rodriguez laughed. "I am! Honest! I've just been in love with Rayner Chang since I first laid eyes on her."

"You just want the one you can't have," Gabriel said. "Doesn't stop you from flirting your way through the base."

Rodriguez shrugged. "I'm hoping one day Ray will get jealous. But until then, I have plenty of love to go around." He winked at you.

You snorted.

Jack rolled his eyes. "Ignore him, baby. He's just trying to get Gabe worked up."

"I'm not worried," Gabriel said, smiling at you. "Rodriguez can't cook for shit."

Rodriguez sighed, drooping in the chair. "That is true. And I can't sing like he does either."

You raised a brow. You'd heard Gabriel humming from time to time, but you'd never heard him singing.

Gabriel shot Rodriguez a dirty look.

"Wait a minute, Jack can't cook either-" Rodriguez said, perking up.

"Yeah, but you're not as cute as Jack," you said. "Though he did make us sandwiches the other day-"

"I have to go now," Jack said, standing up. "I uh...forgot about an appointment-"

"Uh huh, sure. Sit your ass down." Gabriel tugged on Jack's coat and Jack sat back down on the desk, sighing. "Go on Lucky, tell him all about Jack's sandwiches."

"I made the mistake of telling him one of my friends made me a roast broccoli sandwich with cheese, spicy mayo, pine nuts, and Korean pickles-"

"You just said pickles!" Jack said. "How was I supposed to know? And wait, pine nuts? Well, I guess it's for the best that I couldn't find the peanuts..."

Rodriguez started laughing, head thrown back.

"So Gabriel and I go out on a mission with these handmade lunches, bestowed upon us by the Strike Commander himself-"

Jack buried his face in his gloves.

"And what to do I get? I have white bread, with a little smidgen of mayo, a slice of American cheese, and a single pickle chip in the middle. He made me two like that."

"I didn't know how many pickles you wanted!"
Rodriguez doubled over, laughing so hard his shoulder shook.

"Fortunately, he packed me an apple and a juice pouch. So it wasn't a total wash. I think I deserved a cookie too, but I don't make the rules."

"I didn't have broccoli on hand and...well, I thought it was weird, but she's got a better palate than me and I tried to recreate what she was talking about." Jack's cheeks were pink and you leaned over the desk to kiss him.

"It's OK. The meal was questionable, but I will take great joy from retelling this story to all our friends," you said.

Jack just stared at the ceiling, resigned to the ungodly amount of ribbing you and Gabriel were going to put him through.

"Anyway, that isn't an excuse. He packed me three lettuce and mayo sandwiches. I didn't even get cheese," Gabriel said, affecting a mock pout.

"They weren't supposed to be just lettuce and mayo! I forgot to add the bologna!"

"...That's probably for the best," Gabriel sniffed.

"Oh. I forgot you don't like cold bologna..." Jack trailed off. He shook his head. "I got you juice pouches."

"You did," Gabriel said, leaning over to kiss Jack's other cheek.

"That's so Morrison," Rodriguez laughed, wiping his eyes. "Next time order out and pack it in your own tupperware, idiot. They won't question it too closely, they'll just be happy they have good food."

Jack sighed, shaking his head. "You guys are all jerks."

You looked up to see Jesse eyeing the three of you with a pained smile. Like this was a side of the commanders that he never wanted to see.

"...So I hear there's a mission?" You said, deciding that he had suffered enough.

The five of you sat around Gabriel's desk, Jesse looking a little more comfortable now that business was back on the table. You were to go to Ankara to retrieve an omnic terrorist the local authorities had taken into custody. Some of your students, Forrester, Chey, and Maeda Vargas, were joining Rodriguez's newly-formed squad. There were three other agents being transferred in from other locations. No one you knew very well, but on paper they didn't appear problematic.

"Damnit Jack, if this mission were any cushier, I'd be pillow-fighting your sister!" Rodriguez's brows drew together in irritation.

"You don't know what you're talking about, my sisters are mean. Jane would put a brick in the pillowcase," Jack said, folding his hands in his lap. "You have a new squad. I'm not sending you into the thick of things till you've developed some unit cohesion."
"That's when they learn fastest!" Rodriguez laughed.

Gabriel leaned back in his chair. "Quit showing off for my woman, Rodriguez."

Rodriguez just winked at him. "Maybe I'm showing of for you, jefe. You've got dreamboat Morrison and this bloody-towel-fighting femme fatale in your bed. How can I resist your charms?"

Gabriel rested his head in his hand. "Goddamnit, Rodriguez. I forgot how annoying you are."

"Making up for lost time, Reyes. It's been how long since we got the gang together? And what's this I hear about Ray being in Zurich for Family Day?"

"It coincides with her leave. I don't know if she'll stay in Zurich," Jack said, shaking his head.

"I'll be here!" Rodriguez slapped his palm against his chest. "She'll stay! If only because I'll buy her the best bottle of whiskey I can find and we will challenge you to a drinking contest. Ray and me versus you and Reyes. It will be epic!"

You nudged Jesse with your elbow. He was falling asleep in his chair. If the two of you timed it right, you could take all kinds of bets...

"Rodriguez, go meet your new squad. Try not to scare them with your enthusiasm," Gabriel said, rolling his eyes.

"And Lucky and Agent McCree are coming with me?" Rodriguez smirked at Gabriel.

"Yes, Mateo," Jack sighed. He looked at you, shaking his head, like he already regretted introducing you. "It's just in case he runs into trouble. Better to have a few more experienced agents backing them up, and you know the rookies pretty well."

"Understood," you said.

"I've heard the stories," Rodriguez said, tone a little more subdued. "At least two of them are strong candidates for Blackwatch. Should I expect trouble?"

Jesse laughed. "Yup."

"Maeda Vargas is smart, eager to prove himself, and views rules as mere suggestions. If you impress him right off the bat, he'll fall over himself to please you. But he's a "jump first, look later" kind of guy," you said.

"I like him already," Rodriguez laughed.

"Chey isn't the most personable agent, but he gets the job done. Butts heads with a lot of people though," Jesse said.

"Pfft, he just needs more hugs," Rodriguez said, waving his hand.

"Don't let Rodriguez's ridiculous attitude fool you. In the field, he's a hardass. Not as severe as Aishani or Chang, but not someone you take lightly," Gabriel said.

"That is the sweetest thing you've ever said about me," Rodriguez said. "Lucky, you are a good influence on him. I approve."
"...I think that's Jack," you said.

"Mmm, maybe." Rodriguez looked at Jack. "Sunshine always did have a way of finessing Reyes."

"Sunshine?" You repeated in rising tones.

"...Rodriguez, get out," Jack scowled.

"Was that his nickname?"

"Aw, this is great. Lucky, how much have they told you much about chem camp? Because I have so many stories, and I bet you haven't heard about the time-"

"Just go," Gabriel scowled. "If you're going to natter on about the past, at least have the courtesy to do it out of earshot."

"It's like the Algeria all over again-" Rodriguez shook his head. He got up. "It was good to catch up with you two. It's OK, I'll look after your agents," he said. "Come on, Agent Sexy Towel and Agent Spaghetti Western. Let's roll!"

Rodriguez sauntered out of the office whistling badly as he went.

You blinked. "Wait, what?"

"Jack's full nickname was "Sweet Summery Sunshiny Soldier-Boy," courtesy of Rodriguez," Gabriel said with a faint smile. "Sunshine" for short. Though he'd sing the full title to him when drunk. He was always off-key."

"Shut up, Gabe," Jack muttered.

"Well, it's time to go," Jesse said, grabbing his hat, apparently so relieved that this meeting was over, he wasn't even going to complain about the nickname.

"You know how Ray is. She did remark on your sneakiness and said you were "better than she expected." Honestly, that's high praise from Ray. She's a bit...challenged in the compliments department." Rodriguez chatted happily as the three of you walked through the halls. He had a slight limp and towered over both you and Jesse. "Have you met Sergeant Chang, Agent McCree?"

"Nope," Jesse said.

"Then I must be boring you to tears." Rodriguez laughed. "So let me get this straight: Lucky's a stealth operator with stabbing tendencies, and you're a sharpshooter. Reyes says you're good, scary good."

Jesse stared straight ahead, his cheeks a faint shade of pink. "Now you're just blowing smoke up my ass."

"Kinky, but not my style." Rodriguez shook his head. "Just wondering how much more damage you could do with an automatic."
"Revolver gives you better control," Jesse said. "Plus it doesn't jam when it gets hot. I can use anything in a pinch, but I prefer revolvers."

"You're a qualified sniper; I'm not questioning your judgment. Was just curious." Rodriguez adjusted his sleeves. "It takes a steady hand and good reflexes to use a revolver against omnis."

"It's just what I'm used to." Jesse shrugged, but he didn't look quite as displeased as he had earlier.

Rodriguez stopped outside the briefing room, straightened his collar, and turned to face you. "How do I look?"

"...Tall?"

He slapped his hand over his chest. "I don't have anything on my face, do I? Uniform look right? Nothing in my teeth?" He opened his mouth, wiggling his jaw so you could see his teeth from a variety of angles.

"You look fine," you said.

"Very professional," Jesse said dryly.

"If I meet my new squad with bean skins in my teeth, I am holding you both responsible," he said, pointing between the two of you. "I had corn in my teeth last time and Reyes never let me live it down."

"You're clear," you said, solemnly.

"Thank you," he said, cracking his neck. "All right. Let's go." He opened the door, shoulders square, mouth flat, and gaze a lot sharper than it had been in the office.

You followed him in, noting that Chey and Maeda Vargas sat beside each other, engaged in a heated, but whispered battle. Forrester looked on in distress, her hair recently cut short. You had seen Krizman around; he was a solid combat medic. You didn't know much about Rangi, other than that he had power armor. And Serik was an accomplished scout and sniper, though her temper was well-known. Chey would man the defensive barriers, his background in mechanics coming in handy. Maeda Vargas would probably train under Serik. And you expected Rodriguez would be mentoring Forrester, since she had leadership qualities.

Maeda Vargas and Forrester sat up straight when they saw you. Chey gave you a nod, his brows raised. It was a friendlier greeting than you expected.

"I am Major Mateo Rodriguez, former US Special Forces." He took a moment, making eye contact with every agent under his command. "We are one of the newer units tasked with bringing order to the Mediterranean region. This area has the worst military fatality rate since the end of the Omnic Crisis. So basically the local secret omnium base is operating under the assumption that the war isn't over," he said sharply, and you thought of Galanos and Sinaga. "I will demand the best from you, and you can expect the same from me. If you have a problem, you come to me. If you have a concern, you come to me. If you have questions, you come to me. And if you cause trouble, I will come to you, and that encounter will be nowhere near as pleasant." He placed his palms flat on the table and leaned forward. "Do we understand each other?"

"Yes sir!" Reverberated throughout the room, hands snapping up in salutes.
You caught the gleam in Maeda Vargas' dark eyes. He wasn't daunted by the challenge, no he was pumped. Yeah, Rodriguez would have him eating out his hand by the end of the day.

"All right then, now that our introductions are out of the way, let's talk about this first mission..."

"Agent Strike, ma'am," Forrester saluted as she passed.

"Ma'am!" Maeda Vargas plunked down beside you as Forrester shook her head at his presumption. "And Agent McCree, sir!" He grinned at you both, his hair longer than you remembered, growing out into little corkscrew curls. He practically vibrated with excitement. "This is exactly the kind of thing I wanted to do when I joined up! Major Rodriguez is SEP, isn't he?"

"Major Rodriguez was US special forces. Anything else about his history, is up to him to share," you said.

"Yes, ma'am," he said, not the least bit discouraged. "You like him?"

You raised a brow.

"...Not like that! Though he is...impressive," Maeda Vargas said quickly. "I mean, that's your own business, ma'am. I wouldn't pry." He glanced over at Rodriguez who was talking with Serik. "I'm sorry."

"I think Major Rodriguez has the right temperament to handle you and Chey," you said. "If that's what you're asking.

"...Chey isn't that bad," Maeda Vargas said, after a long pause. "Don't tell him I said that. He's insufferable enough."

You weren't expecting that change of heart, but it was a relief that they'd reached some kind of understanding. You adjusted your gloves. "How are Lowell and Jeong liking Oslo?"

"I think they're both relieved that they're not on the frontlines yet. Lowell's too anxious. They're perfectly capable; it's all in their head. And Jeong is fighter, but she's best at mission planning - she's a detail person." Maeda Vargas nodded to himself. "I hope we'll get to work together again. Chey too. He can be a pain, but at least he's reliable."

You smiled at that. It was good to see him finding his own way. And maybe you were a little pleased that he still wanted to join Blackwatch.

"You got a moment, Strike?" Rodriguez tapped your shoulder. "Gotta have a talk with you, me, and McCree...heh, I can say that literally."

You rubbed your forehead.

Rodriguez coughed, smothering his grin. "I mean, we have some logistical details to go over."

You rose, giving Maeda Vargas a nod.
Rodriguez fell into step beside you as you headed to the other side of the room, where Jesse polished his bowie knife.

"Kid's got a case of hero worship," Rodriguez said, not looking back. "I'm glad you're along for the ride. You're making this transition much smoother. And I have to admit, Chey isn't as grouchy as I expected."

"They do good work," you said.

"I mean, I remember Reyes on morning patrols. You haven't seen grouchy till you've seen Reyes at 4 AM with no coffee. It's amazing that I survived..." He laughed softly.

"Now Rodriguez, you're teasing me with all these stories, when you claim we have logistical details to go over."

"I lied," he said, sitting down. "I just wanted to shoot shit about the SEP days, and tell embarrassing stories about my friends."

"I have no complaints," you said.

"See, I knew I liked you better than Maya. She was hot. Oh, she had these smoldering eyes and-" He drew an hourglass with his fingers in the air. "But she was a bitch and a half. Thought she was the last coke in the desert. Ray was going to-" He paused. "You do know about her, right?"

"Yup," you said. Though Gabriel had not told you her real name. Well, it was good to know that "Tara" was really "Maya." You didn't share that part. "I think Chang gave me her tacit approval back at Christmas; it was hard to tell."

"Oh good," Rodriguez said, his expression shrewd. "If Ray didn't like you, we couldn't be friends."

"That's bullshit. You're friends with Gabriel and Chang doesn't like him-"

"And for good reason. He loves winding her up. I mean, I do too, but I usually know when to stop. Reyes just goes till she snaps."

You nodded. "That sounds about right."

"Anyway, Reyes' carne asada is the best, and that gets him a lot of slack. But if you tell my mama I said that-"

You laughed. "Gabriel is a good cook."

"And has he made you those little beef empanadas? Dios mio, I can eat my weight in those." Rodriguez rubbed his stomach. "Now I'm hungry. Quick, change the subject to something terribly serious!"

"Did you know Captain Patel very well?"

Rodriguez's smile faded. "Yeah. Aishani was a mother hen with iron teeth." He stared at the wall. "Kept us all out of trouble with the brass, then damn near killed us herself. You didn't fuck up for her more than once. She eventually pushed some bureaucrat too hard and they tried to put her out to pasture. Didn't take. Reyes knows a good thing when he sees it, and recruited her immediately. Her husband wasn't happy, but..."
"Captain Patel was married?" You tried to picture her as anything besides your badass CO. You had some difficulty seeing her living a civilian life. Grocery shopping, yard work, her wedding ceremony: she would have the same stony expression through it all. You realized then, that perhaps your viewpoint wasn't entirely accurate.

Rodriguez nodded. "She didn't talk about her personal life much, not as your CO. But after we graduated she stayed in touch. Aunt Battleaxe is what Frank called her." He stopped, gritting his teeth.

You remembered Jack telling you about Gabriel's squadmate Frank, also SEP, who died in Dili. "Anyone tell you how she recruited me?"

"Ray did," Rodriguez said with a soft laugh. "And I told Andre. And I'm sure Andre told Leah..."

"It's like SEP is the top secret gossip network."

Rodriguez nodded vigorously. "Oh, yes. We keep track of each other. Morrison and Reyes are easier to find than most. "A lot of people are unhappy about Aishani. I know Reyes isn't sitting around doing nothing, but aside from Ray and me, not a lot of people know the details." He shook his head. "It's a godforsaken mess."

You nodded, staring at your boots.

"But we knew that." Rodriguez sighed heavily. "Hey, have you heard about the time Morrison streaked across camp while the joint chiefs were visiting?" He asked, tone brighter.

You shook your head. "Tell me everything. I will owe you all the alcohol."

"I hear you can get things. And I like Pisco."

"Deal," you said.

"So Ray walked in on them in the showers, again. And she was so irritated that she had to wait to clean up, so she took their towels and clothes, and tossed them in the pond. After the inevitable confrontation, Reyes stole her towel and ran. But Morrison was too shocked to react and Ray, of course, went after Reyes swearing bloody vengeance. Eventually, Morrison realized no help was coming, and he was under a time crunch because he had to meet with some of the brass. So he decided to risk it. Turns out, Morrison is smarter than people give him credit for. He didn't cover his junk, just his face. Sure the joint chiefs were on site and everyone was scandalized, but it's not like they could go around demanding a dick inspection."

You ended up taking care of the paperwork for the pickup, because hating paperwork was an established SEP trait. And Jesse was needed to "supervise." Though you weren't sure if he was supervising the prisoner or if he was making sure Maeda Vargas didn't pickpocket the Turkish military police. It took longer than you liked, but you got it done.

Rangi and Forrester were taking first watch in the brig, not that you were too worried about the prisoner slipping his restraints. Still, Rodriguez was pairing up new agents with more experienced ones. Serik and Maeda Vargas would take watch together, and Chey and Krizman would do the next shift, if necessary.

"And that's why Jack wouldn't eat raisins for years! Leah had him convinced that they were indistinguishable from Portuguese wine beetles. You have to understand, there's no such thing. But we all played along. Even Reyes. I think Ray was the one who finally spilled the beans after he gave her too much flak about eating raisin bran."

You chuckled, plenty amused by the stories Rodriguez kept spinning. You'd have to ask Gabriel how true they were, but as outrageous as they were, they weren't implausible.

"Major, there's a distress call coming over secure channels, from the Mani peninsula," the pilot said over the comms, her voice strained. "We're the closest unit."

"Where is it coming from?" Rodriguez said, mouth flat, eyes alert. He'd been at Galanos’ funeral too.

Jesse sat up straighter.

"Off Cape Matapan. Closest town is Kokkinogia. We currently have full operational freedom in Greece, sir," Daniels said.

Rodriguez shook his head. "Guess this routine mission is about to get real interesting. Radio the base. Let them know we are diverting to answer. Lucky, can you find out who's stationed there?"

"Lieutenant Commander Nejem is listed as on patrol in that region," you said, bringing up your view screen. ".But their status is "out on patrol" and no distress calls have been received, according to command. Athena, can you get in contact with Lieutenant Commander Nejem's unit?"

"...Negative, Lucky. They are not responding. It is possible they are out of range or being jammed."

You nodded. "Thanks, Athena."

Rodriguez nodded. "All right then. Gear up, folks! We could be going in hot."

You put your tablet aside and adjusted your armor. Jesse sidled up to you with a few EMP grenades. It could be pirates, a medical emergency, or even freak weather, but the two of you knew that it could very well be another omnic raid.

You had packed EMP rounds, just because you knew you were escorting an omnic criminal. You and Jesse took a turn guarding the prisoner while the rest of the squad tightened up their armor, checked their weapons, and prepped for contact.

"Radioed back," Daniels said. "But not getting any response from the unit. ETA twenty minutes."

"Not uncommon in emergencies. We'll do a flyover, see what the sensors pick up. Move fast and quiet. This could be an ambush." Rodriguez set his assault rifle on the seat beside him.

You strapped yourself in, and Jesse sat beside you, his shoulders tense.

"You always invite me to the nicest places," you said.

"We're going to the beach, Lucky. I thought you wanted a vacation," he laughed.
"Yeah, OK," you said, shaking your head. You took a deep breath and closed your eyes, concentrating on what actions you might need take. Medical care would be left to Krizman. Most likely you would have to reinforce Nejem's unit. And if there were omnics, it was EMP grenades all the way. If the situation was too hot, the pilot wouldn't land.

"We have begun descent," Daniels announced and you opened your eyes. "ETA is under ten minutes-"

Maeda Vargas tapped his feet, hands fiddling with his seatbelt. Forrester chewed on her bottom lip, sweat beading on her forehead. Rodriguez was very still. Chey ground his teeth. Jesse tapped a silent rhythm on his thigh.

"Anybody know any good jokes?" Maeda Vargas asked, his voice cracking.

You never heard the response. There was a roar as something hit the transport, and you jolted forward in your seat. The frame creaked and the lights shorted out, sparks raining down from the port side of the ship. The craft began to dive, and your stomach dropped, even as you heard someone, probably Forrester, scream.

The speakers crackled. "Mayday! Mayday! We have been hit and we have taken damage! Brace yourselves! We are going in hard!" The world spiraled and Rodriguez's gun slammed into the bulkhead.

There was a bang as something breached the hull. Cold currents tore through the cabin throwing tablets and gear in a whirl, ripping at your hair and limbs, and squeezing the air from your lungs. Rapid depressurization, you realized, as your thoughts zigzagged between incredulity and fear. There was a word for what would come next, but you couldn't remember. Hypnosis? Hypothermia? Hypoxia!

The oxygen masks dropped from their stations, but you couldn't reach yours. Not while the world spun in freefall.

You didn't have time to panic. The oxygen was gone, and with it went your consciousness.

"...I can't believe you thought it was a good idea to introduce those two," Jack moaned, and Gabriel just rolled his eyes. It had been Jack's idea, not that Gabriel minded. You would have met Rodriguez eventually. Best to get all the awkwardness out of the way. You would have all sorts of questions and hilarious stories when you got home tonight. It would be wisest to have cake on hand, if only to distract you for a little while. Gabriel had plenty of ideas about how to keep you distracted, and he smiled tolerantly as Jack continued to mutter under his breath.

"If Rodriguez didn't meet her, one of the others would, and at least Mateo knows some discretion," Gabriel said.

"Are we talking about the same guy?" Jack asked, a little incredulous. "The one who told Jane that he'd happily put a wig on me and think of her?!!"

Gabriel snorted. "He was fucking with you, amor. Imagine if Andre or Leah corners her. Andre's still making a lot of noise about Aishani, and the day he learns to keep his mouth shut is the day we bury him with a whole roll of duct tape around his head." Gabriel ran his fingers along "Our friends are all assholes," Jack griped, reaching over to kiss the top of Gabriel's head.

"Newsflash Jack, so are we."

"Strike Commander-" Athena's voice piped into the office, almost nervous. Well, she should be. She wasn't supposed to be in here if Lucky wasn't. Gabriel glared at the speakers.

"Yes, Athena?" Jack frowned.

"Lieutenant Commander Nejem's squad on the Mani peninsula has gone silent. Lieutenant Daniels radioed base to say they'd received a localized distress call over secure channels, but there is no record of any such thing reaching us. Major Rodriguez is moving to respond-"

Jack paled. "None of Galanos nor Maina's distress calls made it through the jammers."

Gabriel swore. "Mateo wouldn't ignore a distress call-" Gabriel didn't need to finish that sentence. Rodriguez would answer the call, taking his new squad, Jesse, and you straight into the thick of it. "Bring up satellite imaging." He ordered, not caring that Athena was not supposed to be in his office.

"Yes, sir!" His screen blinked and with each click, the image zoomed in, from the Mani peninsula to a montage of detailed images of grass, beaches, and billowing black smoke. Athena was faster at this than any of the techs Gabriel had seen, her programs filtering through the junk data at inhuman speeds. Click. A burning overturned armored vehicle on the beach, Overwatch markings and military plates. Click. Fires spreading across the sea of grass. Click. Human bodies in Overwatch uniforms littered the beach, some on fire, some in the water, none of them moving.

"Tell them to abort," Jack said, his voice distant. "They're too late."

"Message transmitted sir, but- they aren't responding either. Strike Commander, you should hear this: "Mayday! Mayday!" The voice was unfamiliar, but the panic was what Gabriel registered. "We have been hit and we have taken damage! Brace yourselves! We are going in hard!"

His blood ran cold, but Gabriel did not look away from the screen.

"Lieutenant Daniels managed to transmit her coordinates before she cut out," Athena said. "They were about twenty kilometers away from the attack site." Athena rapidly cycled through the satellite pictures, and Gabriel suspected she was adjusting the satellite's trajectory to get a better angle on the region. It was a terrible violation of protocol and there was no way she was cleared to do that, but in this moment, Gabriel couldn't bring himself to care.

The Orca lay on its belly in the sand, one nubby fin torn off, the metal blackened and cracked where something incendiary had hit the drop ship. It wasn't on fire, and while it would not be flying again, it was mostly intact. Click. Athena changed the picture and Gabriel almost shouted at her, but the words died in his throat. Because she'd cut to the ocean, the water roiling and steaming as a score omnis: OR-14s, bastions, and what looked like a half-sized Titan emerged from the sea.

Gabriel reached for Jack's hand.

"...What do we do, Strike Commander?" Athena asked, as they watched the omnis march out of the water in real time. And Gabriel already knew the answer: there was nothing they could do.

Chapter End Notes

I have to open, and this scene is taking forever, and I'm trying to post a chapter but keep getting distracted. But it is late, and I am dumb. It is bedtime.
Chapter 67

Chapter Summary

Life, death, and shadows in the dark.

Chapter Notes

We are now past 500k and 7 months. Yeesh.

Here there be monsters. And by monsters, I mean "feelings." Ugh.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"Lucky, chica, come on, wake up. If anything happens to you, Morrison and Reyes will never forgive me. And that means no empanadas."

The voice was unfamiliar, and you struggled to open your eyes. You were not restrained. The ground was soft and wet. And you could hear waves crashing on what had to be sand.

"How long was I-?"

"Just a few minutes. We were thrown clear of the wreck."

Your head hurt. Your whole body hurt and when you tried to move your left arm, the pain shot through your nerves like fire and you opened your eyes, biting down on your lip till you tasted blood. Instinctively, you reached for your tanto. It was there. So was your gun. You couldn't feel your prostheses respond, but you switched on your stealth generator. These were all tasks you could accomplish one-handed and a reflexive part of your combat prep.

Still dazed, you tried to focus on your rescuer.

Rodriguez hunched over you, his brown eyes worried as he cradled your head. "Can you move?"

You wiggled your legs and your right arm. They ached, but they responded. "Left arm's busted," you said. "How did we-?"

"Daniels brought us down as easy as she could. Come on, let's find everyone else. There are some caves over there." He stood. There was a "whumpf" as something heavy hit the sand behind him, a dark shadow falling over you both. Behind him was a van-sized omnic wielding an energy sword.

You blinked as a bright orange shard emerged from Rodriguez's chest. His eyes widened and he pressed a gloved hand to it, blood already beginning to dribble out of his mouth. You were only starting to make sense of it, when Rodriguez pitched forward on top of you, and the OR-14 retracted its blade.
Your breath hitched. "Rodr-"

"Shh, it's OK," he murmured. "It'll be OK." He exhaled softly, blood already hot and sticky against your skin. "Doesn't even hurt..." He sighed, drooping against you. "Never hurts when I'm with you, Ray."

You lay there in the blood and wet sand, pinned under Rodriguez's formidable weight, waiting for the next blow that would finish you off. But the omnic clanked, already moving forward.

You lifted Rodriguez's chin, your gloved fingers brushing his scar. His eyes were open and already empty. Teeth clenched, you shook him, trying to will the life back into his face. Telling yourself that maybe if you just looked harder, you'd find the spark you'd missed. That the man who had been laughing and making jokes with you all day wasn't dead on top of you.

Hyperventilating, you wiggled out from under him, your left arm flopping uselessly at your side. The world wobbled, and you stared at the wreckage of the Orca, about ten meters away. And at the two dozen or so omnics in the water, marching directly toward the craft.

There was another scream, and the world narrowed to three points. You were here on the beach. The rest of your squad was strewn around the wreckage of the Orca. The caves that Rodriguez mentioned were about a hundred meters out. If they were deep enough, you could take cover and regroup.

You patted your belt, EMP grenades still locked in. You took one in hand and staggered forward, your legs not wanting to support your weight.

There was gunfire ahead, and that gave you hope. Someone else had survived. Your legs steadied and muscle memory carried you forward as you threw yourself into a loping run. The majority of the omnic force was still in the water, but they would be here soon. Rodriguez's murderer was ahead and you would have to be careful about the grenades shorting out your stealth field.

"Step right up!" Jesse shouted and your heart sped up. He was alive and you were going to keep him that way.

"Fire in the hole!" You snarled and threw the EMP grenade.

The burst was almost soundless. You watched the OR-14 wobble as the pulse shorted out its legs. Jesse crowed. "Thank you kindly, Lucky!" He fired rapidly into the immobile omnic and you smiled savagely as it fell.

"Status?" You reached for a second grenade.

"Right as rain, huckleberry. You seen Rodriguez?"

"Dead," you said flatly. "That one got him."

Jesse winced. "Lost Krizman and Rangi in the crash. Prisoner got...compacted. Serik is helping Daniels get to cover. She's pretty ripped up."

"Those caves are our best bet. They're narrow enough we can hold them at a chokepoint."

"...We're trapped then, Lucky."
"We're dead in the open, Jesse."

Jesse shut his eyes for a tense second, then nodded grimly. He backed up, hat in his hand.

"Forget about salvaging anything. We need to go!" Jesse snapped and you saw your former students grabbing packs and picking up the pace.

"Strike!" Maeda Vargas' face lit up, his smile wobbly. "I knew you'd be-" He frowned. "Where the major?"

"Less talking, more running," you said, shaking your head.

Maeda Vargas' eyes widened. Forrester and Chey were at his side. All of them were a little scraped up, but they seemed functional.

"Quit lollygaggin' and move!" Jesse snarled and the five of you took off across the sand, Serik and Daniels still in view.

You glanced over your shoulder. A dozen OR-14s were moving fast. You threw your second EMP grenade and hoped that would delay them. With one hand, you unclipped your carbine.

Something whistled through the air as you hit the sandy scrublands off the beachhead. Clumps of vegetation dotted the hills and you kept your gaze on the caves.

The first explosion fell short. The sound spurred you forward, though your lungs burned and your vision swam. The bastions were using their cannons then.

The second explosion wasn't far behind the first and it sprayed you with dirt.

The third was immediately after and though you were on the periphery, it tumbled you a few yards into a bush. Thankfully, you knew how to fall: you'd had plenty of experience.

You pulled yourself to your feet. The OR-14s were catching up and the distance between you shrunk. You threw your final grenade, hoping to buy some more time.

Even as you made the throw, your eyes fell on the body on the ground, her black hair dusty and damp, her head twisted too far to the side, blood already pooling underneath her. You didn't need to check for a pulse. That last salvo killed Forrester. Such a goddamn waste. You clenched your jaw. She'd just been a stupid kid, not Blackwatch material, but still one of yours and seeing her sprawled out in the dirt, shredded something inside you. She'd been so full of hope and enthusiasm that sometimes it had hurt to look at her. And now that that light was gone, it hurt even more.

"Strike!" Chey shouted hoarsely through the dust, and you followed the sound. He crouched on the ground, his leg at a sharp unnatural angle, one hand pressed against his abdomen. Maeda Vargas lay on his side, eyes shut, unnaturally still. And for one terrible moment, you couldn't breathe. "He's still alive. Get the boy out of here."

"You're not a goddamn horse, I can help you both-"

"You can only help one of us, Strike and that's the boy," Chey snapped. "Give me your gun." He gritted his teeth, pain etching sharp lines on his face. "You save the stupid kid. If you can come back for me, great, if not, I'll buy you time."

He was lying. The moment Chey started shooting at the omnics they would triangulate his location and return fire with a vengeance.

But you understood. You'd done this before. You handed him your carbine. "The EMP rounds are spaced out every third shot. You can slow them that way."

"I'll aim for the legs," Chey laughed dryly. "Now move."

You wobbled as you knelt and tried to yoke Maeda Vargas's arm over your shoulder. "Come on, agent. I need you on your feet! That's a goddamn order!"

Maeda Vargas moaned, but miraculously, he pushed himself forward and you half-guided, half-dragged him toward the caves. Gunfire echoed behind you, and you forced yourself to keep your eyes straight ahead on your destination.

Jesse was in front of you, Daniels over his shoulder in a fireman's carry. You caught sight of the mangled mess that had been Serik and swore. Everything hurt, your chest, your head, your arms. Breathing burned and you could smell death and fire on the wind.

Jesse disappeared, against the rock face. You practically rolled down the hill with Maeda Vargas. And then Jesse was there, helping you drag the boy through the rocks and the darkness. With your right hand, you opened your multitool finger and switched on the light. An impressive backdrop of stalagmites and stalactites striped the cavern. The entryway was almost two yards high and a yard across, giving you plenty of clearance. At its highest point, the ceiling at least ten feet tall. The cavern narrowed, about two yards in, and you could not see how far back it went.

Daniels lay propped against a large stalagmite, her head bandaged and bloody.

"Jesse, Chey is still-"

He nodded swiftly and bounded past you while you lowered Maeda Vargas onto the ground and frowned at the placement. If an omnic made it down here, you'd be tripping over them. They needed to be somewhere more secure. You dragged Maeda Vargas and Daniels back a few yards, so resting them against a wall. Then you returned to the entrance, already rushing back out to back up Jesse.

"It's too late! Move it!" Jesse shouted, as he hurtled back into the cave, something small bundled against his chest.

There was a terrible shaking even as Jesse tumbled into the mouth of the cave and rocks began to fall. The bastions were still firing their cannons.

Jesse swore as he hit the ground, landing on his side. The thing in his arms yelped. Rolling onto his back, his hat fell off and Jesse tried to yank his right leg free while cursing. He set the creature aside and you blinked, it was a black and white dog, lap-sized with a blunt snout and pointed ears. It whimpered, cowering under your gaze, and you shook your head, turning back to focus on Jesse.

You removed the augment, still attached to the utility prostheses, so it could give you some light to work by. Your little metal finger rested on a rock while you clumsily lifted the stones to free Jesse. He managed to wiggle free of his metal boot, and while he wasn't going to be using that leg tonight, the armoring saved it from being completely crushed.

"Don't know if anything's broken, but I really fucked up my knee," he admitted after a moment. "I went back but-" He shook his head. "I'm sorry."
"Yeah," you said, looking at the dog. It crawled over to Jesse.

"I got out there and...after I turned back, it practically jumped into my arms." Jesse sounded embarrassed. "I don't know where it came from, but I wasn't going to leave it-"

You shook your head. "It's not that. I'm just...processing."

"You're a good...boy, yes you are," Jesse, patted the dog as it licked his face. Gingerly, you helped Jesse up. He didn't put any weight on that leg. You let him lean on you, while he hobbled to the wall. It was just wide enough for the four of you to sit side by side.

Clanking and gunfire continued outside. You weren't sure what they were shooting at now, but it sounded like distant thunder and the earth shook around you. Heavy artillery, probably. You reached into your belt for the stealth field-extenders. As long as you kept everyone close together, you might be able to mask their heat signatures, for another few hours maybe.

Rodriguez was dead. Forrester was dead. Chey was dead. And you'd lost the rest of Rodriguez's veteran agents.

"How bad off is Daniels?" You asked. You didn't carry an emitter in the field, and neither did Jesse. Krizman had one, and there were plenty back on the ship, but that didn't help you here.

"Dunno," Jesse said. "Serik stopped the bleeding, but she probably has internal injuries. We're all concussed to hell, you're down an arm, and I can't run." He shook his head grimly. The dog was tucked against his hip and you reached over to pet it.

The temperature was cool, and the air smelled a little stale, but you sat between Jesse and Maeda Vargas, the boy's head resting against your shoulder. Your whole damn arm was numb now, a bad sign.

"Jesse, I need you to set this as best you can," you said.

He nodded, his hands poking and prodding. "I'd be happy to give you a hand."

You flinched, mostly from his examination, but a little from the joke.

"Think you snapped your funny bone, sugarpie."

"No, your jokes just suck," you said with a tense smile. "Think it's lower."

"Definitely broke your funny bone," he said, and pushed on your forearm. You gave a cry of pain. "We can put it in a sling."

"Shemagh on my belt," you said. And Jesse grabbed the scarf, and helped you tie a sling, stabilizing your elbow and wrist. "Thank you."

"Anytime, sweetpea," he said gruffly. "I'll see to Daniels. Can you-?"

"Yeah." You checked on Maeda Vargas. "Hey, agent-"

"Got a name, ma'am," he said, voice groggy. "Think you can call me "Távio." I'm a real agent now. It says so in my file."

"Can you stay awake, Távio?"

"I can try ma'am," he said, lips curving in soft smile. "That wasn't so hard, was it?" He Durga save you from smartass rookie agents. You caught yourself smiling, in spite of yourself.

"Do you have any water, ma'am? I think I left my canteen on the ship-"

You were used to working one-handed, and you unclipped your canteen, moistening his lips. "You hungry too?"

"No, ma'am," he said. "Unless you've cooked up some of that legendary fried chicken I heard about. I'd like to try that some day."

"Get through this, and I'll make you some," you said tightly.

"Me too," Jesse laughed softly, the dog now nestled in his lap.

"Yeah," you said, looking up. "Of course."

Eventually the clanging, booming, and scratching noises stopped. Hopefully your stealth field had convinced them you were all dead. Daniels was still breathing, but you weren't sure if she would last the night. Távio drifted in and out of consciousness, often breaking down into long chains of Portuguese while he curled against your shoulder. Sometimes he called out for his mãe, and clung to your arm. You patted his head awkwardly.

The cave was damp and the air stale and cool, but it was only mildly uncomfortable. The close confines and the inky darkness should have bothered you more, but you were too physically exhausted and emotionally wrung out to panic at this point. This was nothing compared to the snow. For the moment, this felt almost safe.

"You know, I wanted to talk to you in private," you said to Jesse. "But this is not what I had in mind."

Jesse grunted, gently scratching the dog's head. You'd been sitting here for hours and your stealth generator was now dead. But the dog had stayed glued to Jesse's lap, not barking, not crying, just licking Jesse's fingers every few minutes. He looked like a Boston terrier or French bulldog, with stubby legs, and pointy ears too big for his head. He had a white blaze in the middle of his head and you rubbed his ears, while he panted happily. His short coat was glossy, if a little dusty, but he didn't look neglected. What was he doing out here?

"What are you going to name him?"

"Bandit," Jesse said without hesitation. And that was better than you expected, given Jesse's code naming practices. You were a little surprised he hadn't chosen Goodboy Waggybottom or Tiddlywinks Cowpoker. "Don't know if the boss'll let me keep him, but-"

"We'll figure something out," you said, wondering if maybe you guys should get an apartment off base and use it like a timeshare. If you got back to base. But you knew better than to voice that thought. You were both very aware of the danger you were in. There was no point in getting worked up over imminent death when you could be finding a solution.
"What'd you want to talk about?" Jesse asked, exhaustion coloring his voice.

You got out an energy bar and offered it to Jesse. He broke it in half and gave part back to you, crumbling some in his hand for Bandit.

You ate sparingly, wondering if you could get Távio or Daniels to take some food. You had a few more bars in your belt; you packed extra for Gabriel and Jack. There was a chocolate bar too, but Bandit couldn't eat that.

"I need to see if there's a water source or another way out," you said, looking at Jesse's leg. The knee was swollen and when he thought you weren't looking he would wince and rub it gingerly.

You carefully extracted yourself from Távio and he groaned softly as you propped him up against Jesse.

Using your light finger, you examined the location of the rock fall. The stones were set firmly and you were pretty sure it was night by now, though no external light had come through after the omnics had sealed you in.

You walked back another ten feet, weaving between stalagmites, some as high as your hip, and stalactites, some dangling low enough to cause serious head trauma. Water dripped from above, and you probably had a purification tablet in your belt. The ceiling was too high to try to tunnel through, and the cave ended in a wall of pitted limestone. Most of the rock was probably limestone; you recognized the shell fossils. It was a soft rock, you remembered. The news feeds often mentioned acid rain damaging limestone statues in the older cities.

But the cave did not connect to any network of tunnels. You might be able to break through the back wall, but there was no guarantee it would lead you anywhere, and you were concerned about releasing trapped pockets of sulfur, methane, or carbon dioxide.

You heard Jesse clear his throat. "Hey, Lucky, what'd you want to talk about?"

You'd heard him the first time, but you still weren't sure how to say it.

"This dead ends, but it's mostly limestone. We might be able to chip away at an exit route," you said, making your way back to the group. "There's a water drip. I've probably got purification tablets if you have an extra canteen."

"I do, but we can always use my other boot."

"...No," you said.

Jesse reached down and handed you his empty canteen. "I got Daniels to drink most of it. She's not staying conscious, but she's still breathing."

You nodded and took the canteen, setting it under a water drip. Thankfully, it wasn't salt water. It tasted heavy on the minerals, but you weren't going to complain. You'd rotate yours after you got Távio to drink more.

"Lucky...what'd you want to talk about?" Jesse asked a third time, and you had stalled long enough.

"Sorry. Just gathering my thoughts." You exhaled slowly, settling back down between Jesse and Távio. "One crisis at a time, you know. Going to turn off the light. Don't know how long the charge will hold. I don't think it got damaged but...

You switched off the light, plunging the cavern into inky darkness. The drip of the water seemed louder, as was Távio's breathing.

"If you don't want to say-"

"...Things between us have been weird. Even Genji said something," you said quickly.

"...Yeah," Jesse said, voice raw. "I know."

"I thought if I just ignored it, it would go away," you admitted.

"Ouch."

"The situation, not you."

"That's not what it seemed like," he said.

"...I'm sorry." You took a deep breath. "...When Candle Arc went south," you began. "After Lao stabbed me. After Gabriel overreacted and issued the gag order, it really hurt me that you didn't try to tell me what happened to Lao. I know it isn't fair, but I thought you had my back, Jesse. Genji and I weren't as close. Ziv got himself banned. Lacroix was never really my friend, but you-"

"Sweetpea," Jesse gave a heavy sigh. "Who do you think got Mihret that Venus flytrap? It's a goddamn indigenous American plant. Not something Mihret is going to think of right away."

You blinked, chest tightening. "You mean-"

"I couldn't be obvious about it, sugarpie. Not without the boss skinning me alive. But I guess I was too convincing. You really thought I'd hung you out to dry, didn't you?" Jesse's voice came out strangled and you realized then how much your assumption had hurt him. This wasn't a new phenomenon. Your cool cynicism was a tried and true defense mechanism, but you were coming to understand that it could just as easily be turned against the people around you. And you'd never wanted to hurt Jesse.

You stared into the darkness, not even able to see your feet. "I did," you said quietly. "I'm sorry. Why didn't you say anything?"

"You didn't say nothing either. You just slowly kind of stopped doing things with me," Jesse said. "I figured you were busy with your issues and your lovers, that maybe you needed some time, maybe some space. Then suddenly you and Genji were buddies. Then you and Tataryn. And then you and the Zhai girl. I guess I realized that maybe you didn't have time for me no more and-" His voice was thin and dry. "I wasn't going to make a nuisance of myself, huckleberry. And with all the tension between Ana and me, maybe you were right to-"

"I'm sorry," you said, resting your head against the heat of his arm. "I was a bad friend. I was dumb and just stayed quiet when I should have said something. Or maybe I should have just trusted you more. You deserve better than that, Jesse McCree."

There was a long silence.

"If you're really sorry, when we get out of here," Jesse took a shaky breath. "You're gonna make me the biggest batch of that karaage, ever. I want to eat till my sides are bursting. And lots of "OK," you said.

"And you're going to crack open that bottle of Johnny Walker Gold and we're going to drink that with it."

"Sure," you nodded.

"And then you're going to buy me some more goddamn tea, because I know damn well it's you who's been filching it all this time."

"Guilty," you said. "Though you've been in my snacks-"

"Not recently."

You blinked. "But if not you...?"

"Snitches get stitches, sweetpea," Jesse said with a laugh.

"I'm here, they're not. Now spill. Was it Tataryn?"

"Ain't caught him in the act; think he knows better."

"Vo?"

"She's been doing all right lately," Jesse said.

"Genji?"

"Wrong brother."

"...You're fucking kidding me. Hanzo?!" You sputtered.

"Seen him once or twice. I didn't say nothing, because I didn't realize you were blaming me. But I ain't taking the fall for that guy."

"Can't let you blame me for everything-"

"I'm sorry," you sighed.

"Ain't nothing left to apologize for, Lucky. Water under the bridge. We're good now, and that's what counts, right?"

"Yeah," you said. "It is."

Jesse patted your head. "OK, we've dealt with the personal crap. Now we need a plan of action."

You nodded, heart sinking just a little. You flicked the light back on, and winced as your eyes adjusted.

Jesse and you discussed the situation.

None of you were in good condition and you had limited supplies. You were trapped in a hole in the ground that could easily become your tomb. There might still be hostiles outside. Rodriguez, Chey, Forrester, and a lot of other people were dead.
You had no idea if rescue was coming any time soon. Athena knew your trajectory, but there was no guarantee she could track you after the crash. And lover or not, Jack and Gabriel could not just charge into an ambush for you. There were bigger things at stake. You had a little water and some food. The air supply didn't feel thin. As long as omnis didn't break through, and no one succumbed to their injuries, you could hold out for a day or two. Sitting tight and waiting for rescue wasn't the best plan, but you were too exhausted to try to dig yourselves out right now. And you hurt, all over.

"Hey, we're all beat. Why don't we catch some shut eye, and maybe things'll look different after some rest?" Jesse yawned. At the very least you could wait out your enemies, for a few hours. Convince them that you were all dead and they could go away.

"Yeah," you said. "That might help."

Your mind was not kind.

You lay on the beach again, the sand and grit sticking to your damp skin, the waves crashing on the shore. Pinned under Rodriguez, you couldn't breathe, and he convulsed against you, Chang's name on his lips while he died.

Sharp pain shot through your own stomach, and you could feel the energy blade cutting through your abdomen, burning straight through you. And you still couldn't get enough air to scream.

You were dying once more, bleeding out on the ground, and it was no longer Rodriguez on top of you, but Gabriel, his body too hot, his eyes vacant. Shouting, you jolted forward, eyes wide, heart racing, and head pounding.

The air felt wrong, and you reached over to check on Jesse, Távio, and Daniels. They were still breathing, but no one stirred. The light was on, and you looked up, cursing yourself for not being more vigilant about your power usage.

Your gaze fell on two figures, in the shadows, and your heart stopped, maybe for real this time. Wobbling to your feet, you rubbed your eyes, knees shaking. The taller one leaned against the wall, his arms crossed, his smile so gentle and familiar that you pressed your palm flat over your chest. The second figure sat on a small pile of displaced stones - debris from the cave-in - half her face still scarred, her expression severe.

"You...can't be. Am I...?"

"Not yet," the man said. You took another step forward.

"You're not really here. This isn't real." You shut your eyes, cheeks damp.

"We aren't really here," he agreed. "But that doesn't mean this isn't real."

"Dream logic," you laughed, voice verging on hysterical. "You'll be gone when I open my eyes." You wiped away the tears and stared ahead, expecting to see only a dark cave wall.

Captain Patel shook her head, like you were being especially thick.
"It's not quite a dream," Shin said. "Or do you still talk to dead people regularly?"

"There's gas," you realized. "We're breathing too much of it."

"Too much CO2, maybe some other elements," he agreed. "Subterranean ventilation is complicated." He stood there in uniform, body intact, eyes on your face like you were the only light he'd seen in years. "We'll get to that later. We don't have much time, but there should be just enough."

You took another step forward.

"You're not really here," you said, your voice weak.

"Does it matter? It's just good to see your face again. I miss you," he said.

"Yeah," you said. "I miss your face too." Your voice cracked.

Shin rubbed the back of his neck, looking sheepish. Like you'd caught him eating the last cookie or slipping his laundry in with yours, again. "I'm sorry. I didn't mean to leave you behind. Honest."

You stopped only a few feet away from them, knowing that if you touched them, they would disappear. It was dream logic, probably, or just the unpredictable synaptic seizures of your dying mind. Maybe death wouldn't be so bad, if you got to see them again.

"Shin," you said his name, unable to think of the right words to say. You settled for the truth. "I miss you a lot."

"I know. But you're doing pretty well, baby. You're so tough. I'm proud of you." He gave you a crooked smile and you fought the urge to reach out and cup his face, to try and keep him here with you. "Always knew you were special. Wish I'd been around to grow alongside you." He shook his head. "My own fault, koibito." He paused. "And the asshole who killed me. But never yours."

"Shin-"

"There are lot of things we should have said when we had the chance." He looked you in the eye. "Always thought we'd have more time."

You bit your lip, right hand balled into a fist. "Me too."

"Do better this time around, for both of us."

You flinched, unsure if the sting came from being called out or the fact he knew about your current relationships.

"I-"

"It's OK. I'm glad you're not alone," he said, without reproach. "But is it what you want?" He didn't sound doubtful, just concerned.

"Still don't know what I'm doing. Don't know if things will work out. But yeah, I want this. I'm really trying."

"All right." His lips curved in an impish grin. "Have to say, it's quite the ego-boost. It took two men to replace me, and you didn't aim low: the Jack Morrison and Gabriel Reyes." He laughed, the sound warming your blood.

"No one replaced you," you said, because there was a part of your heart that would always be held for him.

His expression grew solemn. "I know. I was joking. But I guess that isn't funny to you. Sorry." He shook his head. "You've done well, Lucky. You avenged me. You saved Lao. You're on the frontlines of the Talon counteroffensive. What are you going to do next? Solve global warming? Build a better Numbani? Create the ultimate cake?"

"I'm tired of this, Shin," you said, shaking your head. "So tired. It doesn't end. I kill one enemy, I find ten more. I'm terrified of losing anyone else and I don't know how much longer my luck will hold out. But I don't know how to stop either."

You didn't know where the honesty came from. You would never speak these words to the living. But here in the dark, on the cusp of oblivion, there was no point in lying to the dead. You were too tired for anything but the truth and they deserved nothing less.

"I'm sorry. I don't mean to complain." You shook your head. "Sometimes I just feel like a bag of broken things, my shattered parts rubbing holes in my skin, like they're trying to break free. Sometimes it feels like the damage isn't ever going to get any better. Like everything is too fucked up, I've lost too much, and I will never be able to put the pieces back together. Sometimes I wonder what is actually left of me, underneath all the jokes and the scar tissue." You lapsed into silence, vision blurring.

"I know, koibito. If you wanted to lay back down and close your eyes, no one would blame you." He stared at you and for a moment you felt the cold of the void in your bones. "You've done enough, you deserve your rest." There was no judgment in his eyes.

You glanced back at Jesse and Távio, the two of them still breathing shallowly. Bandit shivered in Jesse's lap, his eyes shut.

"And the others?" Captain Patel said, voice deceptively mild.

Shin didn't look away from you. "I can speculate, if you like." He uncrossed his arms. "The dog will be the first to go." Shin's tone was flat and matter of fact. "But it will be quick and painless. Your pilot is holding on by a thread. Again, it won't hurt. The boy just won't wake up. And your friend? He might stir a few times, but he has his own demons to face." Shin looked you in the eye. "There will be no suffering, unlike trying to live. It's your choice."

You wiped your eyes. You don't know how long you stood there staring at the shade of the man you loved. You didn't know if he was trying to comfort you or galvanize you into action. You didn't even know if he was real. "That's no choice, Shin. Not for me."

"There's always a choice, Lucky. You move, or you die. And there are no guarantees." He smiled sadly at you. "I wish I could help."

"We're stuck here." You tapped your sling. "Maybe if we were all in peak form, we could dig our way out, but-

"Stop making excuses, soldier." Captain Patel snapped, and you stood up a little straighter. "There is no going backwards. You fight or you die. There is no other way."

"Ma'am." You saluted.
Her expression softened. "You did well with Agent Lao. And while I don't condone that piss-poor excuse for dodging, Durga had mercy on you."

"But Lao-"

"Will get over herself, just like you had to. You're resilient, even if you aren't very bright."

"Ouch," you laughed nervously, glancing at Shin. His smile was gentle, but he shook his head, unwilling to intervene. You couldn't blame him. Captain Patel could blister your ears without ever touching you.

"I don't have Lieutenant Sato's tolerance for existential crises. You have a squad here. You have a mission: you keep them alive." She echoed that last night at the Ninth Circle and your breath hitched. "We've lost enough already."

"I don't know-"

She pointed at the spot where she was sitting. "Look here, agent. Time's almost up. If you can't save yourself, then you can at least try to save the others. Mateo didn't die so you could dither around."

"Captain," Shin said, voicing gentle disapproval.

"No, she's right," you muttered. "I'm sorry. It's the air, and the day, and all the death. I'm not thinking clearly."

"Look here, I only ask that you do your best, Lucky. If you give it your all and still fail, there is no shame in that," she said.

"Yes, ma'am." But you stared helplessly at her, because you weren't sure what you could do next. "But I don't know what to do."

"You are so dense." There was a third voice, raspy and heavily accented. You didn't see her, but for a moment you smelled cigarette smoke. "Everything is above your pay grade. Look there," she said, though you could not see her white curls or glasses. And your eyes fell on the spot Captain Patel was pointing to. "You learn or you die, Lucky. But stop taking all these foolish chances. My worthless grandson will be lost without you."

Shin laughed. "Oh she is still bending the rules. I want to be her when I grow up."

You blinked, a flicker of hope illuminating your mind. "Wait, do you mean-"

"That's it." He shook his head. "We can't stay. I'm sorry."

"I love you. I loved you all," you blurted out. "But Shin, I should have said it sooner."

"I love you too," he said, smile widening. "I always knew."

"I was dumb; I only suspected." The words came out rapidly.

"I should have said it too. I was always waiting for the right moment." He shook his head. "I'm sorry."

"Me too." You looked away.

"There isn't time to be sorry, Lucky," Captain Patel said sharply.
"I'm-" Your head spun. "I mean, thank-"

"Don't waste your breath. Time's almost up," she said, standing. "You have your mission."

"Sit back down," Shin murmured. "You still have time. Not much, but enough."

You opened your eyes, breathing shaky, your face wet with tears. Your head was too light, your heart beat too fast, and the cave was dark. Reaching out, you checked your utility prosthesis. It flickered on, and you exhaled slowly, grateful for that small mercy.

They were gone. No Shin. No Captain Patel. No Rivka. They had never been here, you told yourself. The light had never been on. There was no way they could have been, no matter how real it felt. You drew a shuddering breath, you skin too tight, your heart freshly broken.

Your sanity had been in question before. But the dreams had never been quite that vivid. Sometimes they lingered throughout your day, the way all nightmares haunt the corners of the mind, because they had roots in reality. Maybe today had been too much. Maybe there was a limit on what your mind could bear, and now, surrounded by so much death, you were hallucinating in the opposite direction: resurrection to counter annihilation. You were personally stealing back life from the jaws of death.

You needed to move. You didn't have time to think about whether it was real or not. Shaking your head, you forced yourself to focus.

Jesse and Távio were still breathing. Bandit too. You hesitated over Daniels, fearing the worst. But her chest rose and fell. You didn't know a goddamn thing about her, but she'd gotten you through the landing alive, and she'd come this far with you. You could not help but like her for that reason alone.

"Daniels, you still have one job. Just keep breathing till we get rescued. It'd be terribly unfair if you died now," you said, voice raspy.

You shined the light on the spot where Captain Patel had been sitting. It was along the side border of the cave in, and you found a flat rock to set the light on. You began to poke around, feeling for loose stones. This was as good a place as any to start. Your gun was gone. Your left arm was out of commission. You drew the tanto.

You began to pry with the blade, loosening the rocks, and shifting them into piles on the side. It hurt your heart, more than you liked to admit, to abuse your weapon this way, but it was the only tool you had left. You dug one-handed, till your gloves were shredded. And still you kept digging, your fingernails were half torn off, the skin cracked and bleeding. Two inches. Six inches. A whole foot. Several times the hole collapsed on itself, but you kept moving with a fanatic's determination. There were large rocks you couldn't move, but you dug out the gravel, and wedged smaller rocks in the cracks to stabilize the vent. There was no time for skepticism. The light flickered, but you kept on moving, knowing that Bandit was your metaphorical canary, and the dog had gradually slowed down.

The first breath of fresh air, nearly brought tears to your eyes. It was cool and salty, and while you hadn't made it all the way through the rocks, it gave you hope. You sped up, the stones slippery with your blood. The vent took shape, growing almost six inches in width. Orange light poured in and you redoubled your efforts. Snarling, you kept prying rocks loose till one snapped the blade of your tanto.

Your vision blurred, and you stared at the broken edge for half a second, before wedging the handle and guard in the vent, for stability. You picked up the blade and carefully put it back in the sheath. Because even broken, it was yours and Shin had given it to you.

And then you went right back to digging with your bare hand, because you did not have time to mourn.

When you had cleared as much rubble as you could, and reinforced the small tunnel, you stood. Right hand raw, you wobbled over to Jesse and picked up the dog. Bandit's tail thumped, twice and he licked your hand. You reached into your belt pouch and pulled out your compass on its neck chain. It took a few tries, but you shortened the chain, and fastened the necklace around Bandit's neck. If a rescue party found him, maybe they would know to look for you. Maybe. Maybe the dog would just look fabulous.

"OK, boy. I don't know how much English you understand, but don't panic. I'm going to try to get you out."

Very carefully, you pushed his paws through the opening, knowing there was a possibility that there were still hostile omnis around. But least he had a chance out there. You wiggled him through the narrow hole, worrying that maybe he'd get stuck or the rocks would collapse on him. But the channel held and you gave a push.

He squeaked as he fell out.

"You can go for help at any time," you said. "Or at least pick up a pizza? Maybe some gyros and dolmas?"

The dog looked back at you, his eyes big and buggy. He woofed softly, then climbed to his feet, shook himself, and wobbled off out of sight.

You inhaled the fresh air, knowing that even if you saved Bandit, you couldn't do much more digging. Instead, you began dragging your people to the entryway, where they could get some clean air. And after you did that, you collapsed against Jesse, wondering if you could have done more.

Chapter End Notes

A lot of feels. This chapter has been fomenting in my head for about three months. How real is it? Who knows?

My cousin has offered me a bounty of cake every time I kill off well-liked character. He's kind of a troll, but don't worry, I've had the rest of the storyline plotted for months. Tweaking some aspects of the ending, but that's plot-related. He isn't going to change my mind on who lives or dies. Probably.

In other news, teen!cousin is playing Alien: Isolation and has been stuck in the same locker for like 30 minutes. Every time he goes out to explore, he runs into the alien and has to flee and take cover. I keep hearing him screaming in the living room. At this point, it would be a mercy for the alien to eat him. He's now playing Locker Simulator.
Chapter 68

Chapter Summary

You cannot dig any more.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Time wasn't running correctly here. You knew you'd been trapped at least one night, maybe longer. And nobody had come. Or maybe they had and the omnis shot them down too. You couldn't think about that right now. You had to focus on getting your squad out of this alive.

You were on your own. It was a bleak realization. Worse still, you couldn't dig yourself out of here. Your right hand was too fucked up and your left arm was broken. Jesse and Távio seemed a little more active now, but they had not yet awakened. Summoning your strength, you got up to collect the second canteen. You swapped out the empty one, dropping a purification tablet in the full canteen. You took a sip, nearly spilling it on your face, because your right hand would not stop shaking. The water tasted like chalk and charcoal, but it would keep you alive.

Jack and Gabriel would send someone. They would be searching for you. You knew that. You just weren't sure you could bear to think about them right now: you didn't want to think about how much you just wanted to be back in bed between them, Gabriel's arms around your waist, Jack hogging your pillow while he rubbed your shoulders. You didn't want to think about that soft look Gabriel got when you were waking together, how sleepy and content, and happy he was to have you and Jack in bed with him. And you certainly didn't want to think about Jack, and how even your subconscious hallucinations called you out on your cowardly bullshit. How you should have told him exactly how you felt about him on the way back from Mongolia. How you shouldn't have waited this long, continually making excuses to yourself that "it wasn't a good time." How if you died here, he might spend the rest of his life wondering if you'd really cared about him or-

You flinched, and forced yourself to swallow more water. You could not afford to navel gaze now. Even if there was nothing else to occupy your time. You had a vital mission. One that took precedence over your personal neurosis.

Jesse called out for Ana, and you clumsily stroked his forehead. He was too warm, and you patted his cheeks.

"Jesse, you need to wake up."

"Jamie!" He groaned, and you flinched, remembering the woman you executed in New Mexico. Whatever he was seeing couldn't be good. So you splashed some water on his face and he sputtered, sitting up straight.

"Where-"

"Cave. I dug a hole in the rocks. There was something in the air."

"No, where's Bandit?" Jesse looked around frantically.
"I pushed him out the vent -"

"There are omnics out there!" Jesse shook and you held the canteen out to him, your tremors getting worse.

"Drink. The air was going bad. We were all dangerously lethargic. I wasn't sure if he was going to make it." You knew that in a few hours you wouldn't be able to use your right hand. You already hurt all over, from your beach landing and the subsequent firefight. "I haven't heard any shooting, and he hasn't come back. That was a pretty well-cared for dog, Jesse."

Jesse drooped against you. "I...you're right. No sense keeping him walled up here with us. He has a better chance out there. I just...got attached. Sorry."

You shook your head. You were going to buy Jesse a puppy if you got out of this. When, you reminded yourself. When you got out of this.

"My right hand is fucked up. Do you mind opening my left pouch for an energy bar. I'm going to try to wake Távio next. Daniels is still alive; maybe you can get them to take some water."

Jesse frowned, lifting your torn up right hand in the light. It hurt even more to look at the shredded skin and bloody nailbeds. "Goddamnit, sugarpie. What happened?"

You shrugged. "Had to get us clean air. I went a little a crazy." You stared at your sheath. "Broke my tanto. The hilt is one of the support beams for the vent."

Jesse blew out a breath. "I'm sorry, huckleberry. I know how much you loved that knife. I...yeah. I had the weirdest fever dreams." He shook his head. "I'll water them, don't you worry. You got any painkillers in there?"

"Don't think so." You had a few poisons and maybe an ampoule of sedative, but you didn't want to mess around with dosages, not in the dark, with your hands unreliable.

Jesse took the bar and broke it in three pieces. You ate your portion in two bites. It tasted like dirt, cardboard, and sugar, but you didn't care. Jesse ate his part sparingly.

"Maeda Vargas -"

"Távio, you need to wake up -"

He groaned, and muttered something rude in Portuguese. You rolled your eyes.

Jesse splashed water on his face.

Távio cursed, trying to burrow underneath you.

"That's an order, agent," you said sharply.

He groaned. "My head hurts, ma'am..."

"Eat some of this," Jesse said, pushing the remainder of the energy bar into Távio's hand.

The boy slowly sat up, rubbing his forehead. You watched him practically inhale the food. "Where? Oh...just dreams," he said, not looking at either of you.

"There was gas," you said, unwilling to think about that now. "I dug a vent. So we have some fresh air. We should probably sleep in shifts, just in case."
"You need to get some rest," Jesse said as he administered the water and bandaged your right hand. The ground was hard and uneven. "I'm going to put Daniels between us," Jesse said. "She's shaking, and I think she's too cold." Unspoken was the fact she had probably gone into shock and you had no equipment or drugs to treat her with.

You nodded. "OK."

You lay on your side, trying not to jostle the pilot. She was unresponsive, but between you and Jesse, she stopped shaking so much, her breathing leveling out.

"Maeda Vargas, help me stay awake," Jesse said. "Lucky, get some rest."

You nodded and closed your eyes.

"Lucky-" Jesse nudged you.

You groaned, and rolled over, your whole body aching. Your right hand felt like it'd been crushed and rolled in broken glass. When you tried to move it, your nerves pulsed, raw and screaming.

"Something's out there."

There was still light shining through the cracks, and you cocked your head to the side, making out the sound of gunfire. It grew louder. And then came the shouting, still too distant to understand the words. OR-14s didn't shout, they just killed things while making robot noises. You sat up, slightly alarmed to find both Távio and Daniels huddled against you.

"What's up with Távio?"

"He can't stay awake. Probably the concussion," Jesse said grimly. He sat by the vent in the rocks. "Can't tell what's going on. Is your stealth generator on?"

"It's dead," you said.

You wobbled to your feet, and staggered over to Jesse. Moving hurt. Your shoulders were too tight, your muscles ached, and your bones didn't seem like they could continue to support your weight, like they were splintering as you moved. You sank down on your knees beside Jesse.

"How's your pain?"

"...Painful," you muttered.

Jesse reached over and rubbed your shoulders while you both listened to the firefight in the distance.

"We need find a way to signal them," Jesse said.

"You're louder than me," you said. "Why don't you start shouting?"

"You're hilarious, sugarpie," Jesse grunted. "We can both shout."
"Well, I didn't want to cause another cave-in," you coughed, voice cracking. Jesse held a canteen to your lips and you drank slowly, water dribbling down your chin.

"Someone's out there. We have to get their attention."

"They probably won't be able to hear us, not from that distance and with all the gunfire."

So you and Jesse waited, listening as the gunfire slowed. You couldn't tell who was winning or what was out there. Just that there was fighting.

"Jesse, you're hogging the peephole," you said.

"Can't see shit anyway," and you could hear the scowl in his voice. "Just rocks and grass, and some sunlight. I miss sunlight, sweetpea."

"Yeah, me too. I'd like to see it, if only your head wasn't in the way."

"I think I've been stuck in here long enough with you."

"Agreed," you said. "Your feet stink."

Jesse snorted. "None of us smell like daisies."

You weren't sure how long you waited, but the gunfire had died off. And you couldn't tell if the omnis or the humans had won. There was no point in calling for the OR-14s and Bastions to come back and finish the job.

And then you heard the shouting start up again.

"What's going on?" You leaned forward.

"Shh," Jesse hissed. "I'm trying to hear-"

You fell silent, the voices were getting louder. Then:

"What the hell, Gabe? How could you throw the dog?!" Your heart froze right there. You had to take a few steadying breaths, to make sure you heard that right, because you recognized that voice.

"I didn't throw him, he jumped!" The other man sounded outraged and you felt yourself smiling, even as your heart pounded.

"Bandit?" Jesse's voice rose. "Hey! Hey! We're over here!"

There was a low-pitched howl that didn't come from a human throat.

"McCree? What the hell...?"

"Cave-in. We took cover and they caused a rockslide."

"Lucky?" Gabriel asked, his voice rough.

"I'm here," you said, squeezing your eyes shut. They'd come for you. You weren't sure why that surprised you. You weren't sure why your heart was in your throat. But you took short sharp breaths, right hand curled into a painful fist.
"Hold tight," Jack said. "We'll get you out. You might want to back up-"

"Give us a moment. Daniels is severely injured. Maeda Vargas has a bad concussion. Lucky and me are conscious, but we're all pretty beat up."

Távio was out again, and you tried to rouse him, but he just groaned. You and Jesse painstaking dragged them backward.

The earth rumbled and you heard a roar followed by a crash. Light started to stream into the cave. Gravel and small rocks rained down the incline and you shielded your face with your right arm. Piece by piece, the stones were plucked away, and you recognized Reinhardt's hearty laugh. From the sounds of heavy landings in the distance, you were pretty sure he was actually throwing boulders out of the way.

You leaned back against the cave wall, eyes gradually adjusting to the daylight.

Reinhardt waved at you through the gap in the rocks, Jack and Gabriel working in tandem to roll a large slab out of the way. Torby shouted instructions about "structural integrity" and "being smarter than the rocks" but you weren't sure anyone was listening to him.

Bandit was in first, he ran straight to Jesse, and leapt into his lap, licking his face. Laughing, Jesse squeezed the dog, his shoulders shaking.

"You're such a good boy," he said, voice strangled. "Who's my good boy?"

Gabriel was in next, wedging himself through the hole. He rushed to your side and you threw your good arm around him, burying your face against his chest. He was too warm and slick with sweat, and you stuck to him, trying to absorb some of his heat.

"Corazon," he breathed, kissing the top of your head. "You had me so worried."

"Thank you," you mumbled, already melting against him. "Thank you for coming."

He squeezed you to him, and you winced.

"Sorry," he murmured. "Sorry." He relaxed his grip on you, and you blinked. Captain Amari crouched in front of Jesse, her hands cupping his cheeks, her forehead pressed against his.

It surprised you to see both Angela and Torby armored up, but with Reinhardt's help, they loaded Daniels onto a stretcher and were already moving her out.

And then Jack was there, sweaty and eyes wild, his face red from exertion. He stared at you, like he wasn't entirely sure you weren't a mirage. He moved and suddenly he was on his knees in front of you, his hands on your face, because he had to touch you, just to be sure you were really there.

There was relief as he rubbed your cheeks with his gloved hands. Even covered in dust and worn down, the corners of his eyes crinkled and he smiled. What took you off guard was how ecstatic Jack looked. Like Christmas had come early or he'd "lost" all his paperwork in a tragic shredding mishap. Radiant and smiling, there was an openness to Jack that you and Gabriel could never replicate.

You were just dumbstruck by how happy he was to see you. That anyone could be those happy because of you. You realized then that maybe you undervalued yourself, but that Jack and Gabriel did not. It was one thing to believe the give and take of your relationships went both ways. It was another to see them both here, when they shouldn't be, all that emotion - fear, sorrow, gratitude, and joy - plain on their faces. Something inside you began to crumble and you drew a sharp breath, your chest aching.

"I really thought I'd lost you," he whispered, hands shaking as he wrapped his arms around you. He held you too tightly, but you clung to him as best you could, inhaling the scent of his sweat and soap.

"Jack-" His name came out a choked half-sob.

"It's OK, sweetheart. I'm sorry we were late-"

"No! That's not...I'm sorry. I was waiting for the right time. I thought I could do better, and make up for what happened after Mongolia. I'm sorry. I should've said it earlier, but I love you and I'm sorry I made you wait to hear it and I was scared to say it, but-" You took a shaky breath, burrowed into his coat, your face in the crook his neck. You were making a mess of things, your reason dissolving in a flood of sunlight and endorphins. You couldn't muster any eloquence, not when they had found you here, your brain a jumble of regrets, relief, and sheer gratitude. "I love you, Jack."

His grip loosened and he stared down at you, mouth open, eyes wide. And then he beamed, all that unrestrained joy and affection aimed at you on full blast. That look stopped your heart, slew you, and you yielded, letting yourself relax in his arms.

"I love you too, sweetheart," he said, kissing your forehead, then your nose, and finally your mouth. "But we all knew that already, didn't we?"

You just nodded, your smile a little sheepish. Gabriel's hands rubbed your back as Jack embraced you.

"...No fucking way..." Távio muttered, voice slow and groggy. "There's no way she's with the Strike Commander. He's like steamed cornmeal on weak ass milk toast. I am obviously hallucinating..."

Gabriel was still shaking with laughter while Jack carried you down the hill. There were several smoldering mechanical ruins, omnis as well as Torby's turrets.

Reinhardt had one hand over his heart and kept wiping his eyes every time he looked over at you and Jack. Gabriel and Captain Amari helped Jesse hobble out of the cave. And then Rein scooped him up in a bridal carry, laughing as Jesse protested faintly.

Torby and Angela had returned for Távio with the stretcher, and you stared out over the charred and blasted earth.

"Did you...find everyone else?"

"...Yeah," Jack said, voice soft.

You pictured Rodriguez lying there in the sand and closed your eyes, grief and guilt weighing heavy in your stomach.
"I'm sorry about Rodriguez," you said.

Jack was silent as he carried you down the hill toward the beach. A few minutes passed before he spoke. "Wasn't your fault, sweetheart. No one's blaming you. For any of this." The words were sincere. But now that euphoria of finding each other was starting to fade, you could hear the pain in his voice.

"Chey and Forrester-"

"Were your students. Yes, they were your responsibility, to some extent. But this is not your fault," he said, stroking your hair. "There's still a difference."

"-I'm not that predictable," you said, resting your head against his shoulder.

"Apparently, you are. At least to Gabe," Jack nuzzled your cheek. "He can read us both way too well."

"I can walk, you know."

"Gabriel always gets to carry you around like a teddy bear. It's my turn. Not going to risk you running off, or stepping on a poisonous snake, or falling down a well-"

"Screw you," you muttered.

"Later, sweetheart. And I prefer to call it "sweet, sweet lovemaking." You know, because I'm a gentleman." Jack was already going up the ramp into the dropship.

You shook your head, glancing over at Gabriel. There was a softness in his brown eyes that made you want to reach out and hug him too, but you had to wait for Jack to set you down on a seat.

And then Angela was on your case, poking your ribs, prodding your arm, and flicking you in the head for some reason. Muttering about Blackwatch luck and amateur medics, she took your arm out of the sling and straightened it out. You winced as she wrapped it in binding fabric and injected something expensive and possibly alive into your bicep. Then she took the bandage off your right hand and the two of you winced at the sight. The whole hand was scraped raw, like hamburger. Your fingers were streaked in dried blood, and you were missing more than a few fingernails.

"I dug a vent. The air wasn't safe. We were...not in good shape."

Angela's eyes widened briefly and then she blew out a breath. "Your blood CO2 levels are high, but lower than we expected, given the environmental readings. I must congratulate you on your luck, or perhaps your quick thinking."

You didn't respond, because you weren't sure how to explain what you'd seen or if you'd seen anything at all.

She cleaned your hand, and then wrapped it in a protective mitten bandage, before giving you another injection, turning on the emitter, and menacing you with an IV. She placed the solution on your lap.

"You are spending the night in the infirmary," Angela said sharply. "Because you need rest to heal. Got it?"
You grumbled in disappointment, but very quietly, and only after Angela had moved on to harangue Jesse about his knee.

Jack had gone to help...bring everyone else back to the ship. Everyone else who hadn't made it. Gabriel sat down beside you, and you rested your head on his shoulder.

"That was a good declaration," he said, kissing your cheek.

"I love you too, Gabriel," you said, realizing you hadn't said it to him in the cave. "I'm sorry- I'm just...head's not on right."

"You have nothing to apologize for, corazon. But seeing you and Jack happy like that was...it was good. For all of us." He lifted you onto his lap and frowned at your mitten. "What's the damage?"

"Concussion, CO2 poisoning, broken arm, mashed up fingers, and...mental stuff," you recited. "Angela is trying to make me stay in the infirmary. Can I just come sleep in your bed, please?"

Gabriel gave you a weary smile. "I'm not going to go against Angela on this," he said. "But I'll spend the night in the infirmary with you. All right?"

"OK," you said, watching Jack come up the ramp, his expression grim. "Rodriguez-"

"We can debrief later," Gabriel said, adjusting your IV. "Do you want help getting your armor off? For comfort. That's all."

You nodded very slowly, the world suddenly starting to spin. Oh. There were painkillers in that IV. Goddamnit Angela-

You managed to stay upright long enough for Gabriel to remove your chestpiece. The last thing you saw was Jack sitting down beside you, one hand clasped in Gabriel's, the other resting on your forehead.

"Just rest," he said. "We've got you."

Smoke and fire obscured the satellite imaging now. The sun had started to set, and by the time the air cleared, it would be nightfall. The dark would worsen visual conditions. It had been ten minutes since the omnic forces came out of the water. Gabriel paced the office, the combination of adrenaline and raw emotion making it impossible to focus. Jack, in contrast, sat very still behind Gabriel's desk, quietly suggesting different trajectories to Athena.

They were pointedly not discussing your chances of survival. Gabriel needed to remain collected and Jack strategized best when he was divorced from his emotions. His compartmentalization was a strength, though on some level that cold detachment grated like sandpaper on the inside of Gabriel's skin. But they had to keep it together while there was still a shot at saving you.

It felt too much like security theatre: all for show with no meaningful action taken. He was not there. He could do nothing in this moment. And the helplessness gnawed away at him, tearing through soft tissue first, and now working its way through his bones.

Gabriel cycled through several possibilities, none of them pleasant. Maybe it was a blessing that they couldn't see what was happening. Because while Gabriel never considered himself a weak man, he didn't think he was strong enough to sit by and watch you die.

"I've called in air support," Jack said, but that wasn't enough and they both knew it. Jack folded his hands, resting them under his chin.

"We don't have enough people nearby to mount a rescue. Everyone's too far out or needed to hold the perimeter." Unspoken was the fact that the Strike Commander could not pull a dozen squads from their posts to rescue one squad. Not when they couldn't even verify if there were any survivors at this point.

Gabriel's frown deepened. It was obvious what they had to do. But the best way...?

Jack shook his head. "Gabe-"

"Shut up, Jack. I'm thinking," Gabriel said, hoarsely.

"Even if we leave right this moment, there's no guarantee-"

"I fucking know that, Jack. Mateo. Jesse. Lucky. We can't afford to lose a single one of them, but-" Gabriel exhaled slowly. "I'm going in. I'll take a small stealth squad. We'll-"

"No." Jack's voice was firm. "You won't."

"Jack, I know you're not suggesting we sit back and do nothing-" Gabriel's voice was low and dangerous.

"I didn't say that." Jack stared at the screen. "Your Blackwatch agents are capable, but this requires a full combat squad. Athena, get Gérard, Ana, and Rein down here."

"Wilhelm can take more hits than Tataryn," Gabriel said begrudgingly.

"We need a better strategy. We're too close to this, Gabe. All I want to do is hop a transport and race out there, but that's not good enough. We can't rush in there half-cocked."

"...Torby has an aerial-mounted EMP radial gun in the latter stages of development." Jack stared at the beach. "It's supposed to cover a precise area. Might be worth a shot or three."

The office door flew open and instead of Ana, Gérard, or Reinhardt, Mihret stood panting in the doorway. "I came as soon as I could! I managed to boost some of the civilian comm signals. They're jammed too, but not as badly. We've got a few locals who were already out scouting and radioing back reports-"

Jack narrowed his eyes. "Athena, who else did you-?"

"I told you not to run ahead," Ana snapped, pushing Mihret out of the doorway. To Gabriel's surprise, the hacker didn't protest, he just pulled up a chair and waited his turn to talk.

"Athena bring up topographical maps of the region. Overlay with known hostile omnic movement patterns," Ana said. The screen popped up and Ana frowned, studying the layout.
"Layer with human settlements and mark Overwatch patrol routes."

"Torby has a few new rumbly-booms that he think could be useful," Wilhelm announced as he entered the office.

"I am afraid, I don't have much real-time information on the region, though I know the cave networks are extensive." Gérard came in, already armoire up in Overwatch blue. Gabriel tried to focus on Ana's increasingly-complicated map, but all he could remember was that Gérard loathed that color on himself.

No one pointed out the obvious. That despite their best efforts, it could be too late. It could be for nothing. And Gabriel was grateful for their discretion. He didn't quite like the way Wilhelm and Gérard kept shooting worried glances at him, when they thought he wasn't looking. He noticed that Ana was sharper, more on edge than he expected, and perhaps that had more to do with McCree than you. And Jack poured over the maps, weapon schematics, and satellite footage, trying to stay busy.

"We can't all go. Someone has to stay behind and maintain the chain of command," Ana said, after a moment. "And I don't know about you, but I am not comfortable leaving Gérard in charge."

Gérard laughed. "I will only make a few changes, my friends. Perhaps Director Petras' estate will be much improved by being remodeled after a smoking crater."

That comment alone had Gabriel sorely tempted to vote in Gérard as Strike Commander for a day, consequences be damned. "Ana-"

"I'm going in, don't you try to stop me," she said, glaring at him. "Strategically, you and Jack fulfill the same roles. We need Reinhardt as a shield. We need my sniping. We need an engineer or a combat hacker. And we need a medical team for any survivors."

Jack looked up, shoulders drooping, mouth flat. Jack had been to all the funerals from the recent spate of attacks.

But Gabriel had lost Sinaga already. He couldn't afford to lose Jesse. And you...? The thought tore through him, like he'd swallowed saw blades and broken glass. Gabriel gritted his teeth, looking at Jack.

Jack shook his head. Gabriel knew that Jack couldn't let himself to think of you right now. Not while he had a job to do.

"Gabe, let me go," Jack said, clasping his hands. "We can't risk everyone- I know...I know what they mean to you. And I'll bring them home, I swear." He couldn't promise who would be alive, but no one would be left out in the cold. And though Gabriel knew Jack would do his best, but he had no intention of staying back.

"You're not leaving me behind. Just try and stop me. My people are down there too. Leave fucking Wilhelm in charge-"

Jack flinched, rubbing his forehead. "Gabe..." Jack hesitated, the nickname heavy with expectation and thickly veiled emotion.

"Jack," he replied pointedly, daring the other man to push. His jaw twitched as he locked eyes with his lover. Jack bit his lower lip, face pale, the mask of the Strike Commander slipping. "We'll do this together. That's the only way."
"...Yes. Thank you," Jack exhaled slowly. "Your presence is welcome."

Gabriel understood then that Jack had very clumsily been trying to protect him, to soften the blow of what might be coming. Because Jack thought you were dead. He ground his teeth, not in the right state of mind to appreciate Jack's attempt. This was not something Jack could shield him from or vice versa.

"Gérard, if you have to bomb Petras' estate, just make sure none of that gets traced back to us, do you understand me?" Jack asked.

"...I would like to go too," the spy said mildly. "Chanceux is my protégée, after all." He glanced at Gabriel, his smile fading. "But if you think things would be better handled by my staying behind and taking command, well, I live to serve."

"This is a terrible plan," Ana said, but made no formal objections.

"Are we sure Gérard didn't arrange it this way?" Gabriel muttered. "We all go off and suddenly he's in charge."

"You know, I like the sound of this more and more. All right. Go on then. Off with you all. Hurry up. I will be redecorating the Strike Commander's office. Oh, and I shall fire that little shit in the cafeteria who keeps adding water instead of cream to the tomato bisque."

"Oh look, the power has already gone to his head," Lindholm muttered as he stalked into the office, already fully-armored. "No, the radial EMP gun isn't ready: it works for sure, but there's also a 53% chance of it also disabling the vehicle. So no, we're not taking it. But I fine-tuned some of the stealth fields on the dropship. We should be able to get there fast and quiet."

"Gear up. We leave immediately," Jack was on his feet, shoulders squared.

There was a rush out the door and Gabriel hung back with Jack, letting Wilhelm charge out first. He reached out, taking Jack's hand.

"Thank you," he said.

"Your turn next time," Jack said, squeezing his fingers. "I can't always be the one to-"

"I know." Gabriel exhaled and leaned forward, embracing Jack from behind. The blonde man slumped against him. "I know."

"After this, we'll take that break, I swear," Jack said. "We've earned that much." Unsaid was that in the worst case scenario, they would need the time to mourn.

"If she's-" Gabriel's voice wavered.

"If she's just sitting on the beach eating cake, laughing at Mateo's jokes while McCree makes drinks, I'm going to feel silly," Jack's laugh was too tight and he spun around, tucking his head against Gabriel's shoulder. His breaths came too quick and shallow, and Gabriel rubbed his back.

"There isn't time for you to talk, gentlemen. If you don't leave, I don't get to be in charge and you lose plausible deniability," Gérard said, sitting on Gabriel's desk. Mihret stood quietly at his side, his head bowed.

"We're going," Gabriel barked, tugging Jack toward the door.
"Commander Morrison, Commander Reyes..." Mihret's voice wavered and when Gabriel looked at the boy, he was staring at the floor, wiping his face.

"Yes?" Gabriel asked, gruffly.

"I'll tell...Lao," he said. "But please, just...bring her home, sir."

Gabriel gave a sharp nod, and released Jack's hand. It was time to go.

They kept a distance from the attack site, though it sacrificed speed, while Athena and Ziv fed them coordinates and data on omnic movements. They took the overland route, landing several miles away from the attack site and traveling in the dark. There wasn't much conversation. No playful banter or clever jokes. Not from Gabe or Ana. Torby was the only one talking. Jack could hear Torby grumbling under his breath at Reinhardt, but everyone else kept a grim silence. Angela stumbled in the dark, and he heard Torby gruffly telling her to be careful.

Jack kept his thoughts to tactics and potential complications. He focused on logistics and strategy, making contingency plans for a variety of conditions.

He did not think about finding you. He could not think about finding you. Because he had seen the wreckage. He had seen the omnis. And while he was an optimist by nature, his combat calculus was too well-honed to ignore the low probability of finding survivors.

When they finally made it to the wreckage of the Orca, the sky still a deep star-marked blue. That was where they first encountered hostiles.

Gabriel threw himself into battle, and Jack was glad it was dark and he couldn't see his lover's face. Gabe was stunning, and whenever he fought, Jack had trouble looking away. But this blood thirst was born from rage, and Jack wasn't sure he could process thoughts of your death and maintain command. So he reminded himself that he was Strike Commander Morrison, and there was a mission to complete. It was disturbingly easy to slip into that cool, tactically-minded persona, to immerse himself in facts, figures, and trajectories, to suppress uncomfortable feelings and continue with a task-oriented approach. Jack Morrison knew how to be a bastard when needed, and later, he would have to look himself in the mirror and wonder if it was worth it.

Gabriel discovered the first few bodies: you, McCree, and Mateo were not among them. Ana recovered the cold OR-14, McCree's bullets in its chassis. There had been survivors in the crash. Jack dared to let himself hope as he followed the trail of wreckage down the beach.

But it was there that Jack found Mateo, cold on the sand, his eyes closed, his body stiff. He exhaled slowly, checking for a heartbeat or any sign of life. He found nothing.

"Gabe-" His voice was hoarse, and it took a few tries to say more. "Gabe-"

"Is it-?" Gabriel was at his side, hands gripping his shoulders.

Jack shook his head. "No, Mateo-"

Gabriel let loose a stream of Spanish, rapid-fire expletives that eventually took on religious overtones. The curses became prayers for the dead. Jack understood that much.
"There are footprints leading away from the crash!" Reinhardt boomed.

Jack and Gabriel spent another long moment staring at their friend.

"I shouldn't have-" What was he going to tell Ray? And Leah? And Mateo's mother...? The waves roared in the distance and Jack closed his eyes. And if Mateo was dead, Mateo Fucking Rodriguez, the goddamn Wolf of Santiago, then what chance did you have?

Did you know? Did you know how he felt? He thought you did. But did you really know? How could he be sure? You were clever, of course. But that wasn't something people just went around assuming.

Jack had been given several chances to tell you. After Operation I Need Coffee. At any point when you'd been alone with him, in the office, in his room, in Gabe's bed... Because for some stupid reason, he'd thought there'd be more time. There he went, putting the "Jack" in "jackass" again. The idea of losing you, was bad enough. But without you ever knowing that he-

"Stop it Jack. It's not on you," Gabriel snapped, pressing his forehead to Jack's, his gloved hands clasping the back of Jack's neck, centering his focus. Gabriel's expression was severe, grief masked by determination.

Jack shuddered in the moonlight, unable to get the vision of Mateo's cold waxy death mask out of his head. Your limp form half materialized in his mind's eye. How long till..?

"There's no time for that Jack. I'm pissed as hell about Mateo, but we have to keep moving."

"Yeah," Jack said, voice unsteady. Because he had to bring you home too. Because maybe you wouldn't be able to make it on your own. Because maybe... "You're right." He kissed Gabriel on the cheek. "Sorry."

"Keep your head, Morrison," Gabriel's tone was soft. "They're all survivors."

"Yeah," Jack murmured. "You're right, babe." And he told himself that, even if he didn't truly believe it.

The two of them went back up the beach toward the wreckage of the Orca.

And that's when the second wave of omnics attacked.

There had been three attacks so far and the sun was up. They'd found more bodies. Gabriel recognized two of your students, Chey and Forrester. Chey would have made it into Blackwatch if he'd had the inclination. Gabriel shook his head, and then narrowed his eyes. He was pretty sure that was your carbine clutched in Chey's cold hands.

"Lindholm."

"What?" Lindholm was at his side immediately.

"Is that-?"
Lindholm squinted, narrowing his eyes. "Yeah, that's hers. And yes, I'm sure Reyes. I know my own work."

Gabriel swallowed, unable to picture you just giving up your weapon. He gritted his teeth. Things weren't looking good.

"Found...Serik," Ana called, and shook her head.

Angela trailed behind them, her expression grim as she marked the spots where their people had fallen.

Wilhelm kept searching the brush, clanking every step of the way.

Gabriel was about to ask if he could stomp around way over there, when something barked at him. He squinted into the bushes at a little black and gray, possibly white under the dust, dog with a blunt muzzle, stubby legs, and pointed ears. It had something shiny around its neck, and it growled at him.

What the hell was a dog doing all the way out here? Gabriel crouched low. "Come here boy. We won't hurt you--"

The dog went quiet, still eyeing him suspiciously.

Gabriel reached into his pocket and found an energy bar - no chocolate - and crumbled some up in his hand.

The dog hesitantly trotted up to Gabriel.

"What's...huh." Jack stopped beside him.

"Come on, boy," Gabriel said, keeping his tones even.

The dog sniffed the tips of his gloves, and Gabriel lunged, scooping it up in his arms. The dog struggled, but Gabriel held his palm flat, letting the animal nose at the food in his hand. It took a few seconds for the dog to relax. Gabriel spoke softly to it, petting it gently. He was too healthy and well-fed to be a feral stray. He took one look at the chain around the dog's neck and recognized the pendant.

"He's wearing Lucky's compass," Gabriel said, voice shaking.

"Come on," Jack said, excitement lighting up his face. "Maybe he can lead us back-"

"I'm not letting this dog run around a battlefield," Gabriel scowled. "He could step on a mine or get crushed by Wilhelm!"

"I would never!" Wilhelm shouted, suitably outraged.

"Accidents happen," Gabriel said tightly.

"I did not mean to step on your toes that one time!" Wilhelm shouted, exasperated.

It wasn't the only reason Gabriel wore metal boots, but he was very grateful that he had been, considering Wilhelm had been in full power armor.

"Shut up and follow the tracks," Ana said sharply. "Jesse's spurs leave distinct marks. And they lead toward those rocks."
Heart beating faster, Gabriel carried the dog under his arm, scratching its ears. The dog gave a little yip and suddenly it wiggled free, jumping forward.

"What the hell, Gabe? How could you throw the dog?!!"

"I didn't throw him, he jumped!"

The dog bayed, and ran up to an unstable-looking rock wall.

Jesse's voice cut through the stones, coming from inside.

"Lucky?" Gabriel heard himself say, his voice oddly calm.

"I'm here," came your voice, and he let himself breathe.

Chapter End Notes

I know, I used the "reunion I love you" cliche. I think I'll be able to live with myself though.

There will be reunions and more fluff. And of course, funerals, which aren't as fun. But there will be less crying. Because I don't think I've ever gotten so many messages about making people cry. I uh...sorry? I'm not really sure how to use black magic and bathtub full of tears, so if you have any suggestions...

Back on the job hunt, though there never seems to be anything in my area that I am qualified for. Or I'm overqualified. __; Ranger surgery is Friday, so I'm a little nervous, though he'll probably be fine.

There is a Mexican restaurant down the street that just started serving tortas, and OMFG, I had to have two last weekend, like two separate trips and four days of eating giant sandwiches and what have I done? (Ate a lot of bread, and pickled peppers...)
Chapter 69

Chapter Summary

You're back in the infirmary. Again.

Chapter Notes

This was delayed because my cousin came in to debate politics and because I was trying to write a chapter 69 joke and cracked under pressure.

**

"So, if you were Soldier 76 and Gabriel was Soldier 24, was there a Soldier 69?" You lay sprawled across Jack's chest, sheets bunched up around your hips.

"Gabe and I had Soldier 69s all the time," Jack chuckled and you groaned, knowing you had walked right into that one.

"Seriously." You poked Jack in the nose. "Was there a Soldier 69?"

Jack sighed, suddenly looking serious.

Gabriel yawned, rolling over to spoon Jack. "What's wrong, babe?"

"Nothing," Jack leaned back to peck Gabriel on the cheek. "She was just asking about Soldier 69."

"Sorry, I'm still waking up. Give me a moment and I'll be good to go-"

"Goddamnit, I just wanted to know if there was any such person!" You scowled.

Jack nipped your shoulder. "There are only two soldiers you need to be interested in-"

"Jack's just salty because if he'd joined a week earlier like I'd asked, he would've gotten that designation," Gabriel rested his head on Jack's chest. "Instead, Lieutenant Dover got it. Benjamin Dover, if I remember correctly"

"No, Gabe." Jack laughed, his whole body shaking. "That wasn't it. It was that Major. What was his name?"

"Goff," Gabriel supplied helpfully. "How could you forget? You had the same first name!"

Jack snapped his fingers. "Yeah, Major Goff! Major Jack Goff!"

You scowled. "Seriously, guys?"
"OK, OK, for real, though, I remember this," Gabriel hugged you. "It was Connie!"

"...Her last name isn't Lingus, is it?" You asked, already knowing the answer.

"How'd you know?" Jack slapped the bed, his entire body shaking. "Do you like her too?"

Groaning, you buried your face in the pillow. "I'm going back to sleep now."

"But wait, you'll miss the Soldier 69!"

You awoke in a cold infirmary bed, your left arm in a brace, your right hand bandaged up. You were in a hospital gown, prostheses removed. Breathing hard, you looked around, relieved to see Gabriel sitting in the chair beside your bed, a tablet in his lap. He was in sweatpants and a hoodie, and you wondered how much time had passed.

"Gabriel-" Your heart beat too fast, and he leaned over the railing.

"I'm here, corazon."

You took a deep breath and closed your eyes as he carefully embraced you.

"I'm cold," you said.

"Are you asking me to climb into bed with you?" He murmured, already lowering the railing.

"Yeah," you said, voice low. "Please. And uh...what time is it?"

"It's 2200 hours, same day as we found you," he said, sliding in on his side. "Jack's making arrangements." He paused. "He'll be here later too."

"Jesse?"

"Healthiest out of all of you," Gabriel said. "But Angela's keeping him overnight too." He rolled onto his back and let you crawl onto his chest, helping you find a comfortable angle for your arms.

"Távio and Daniels?"

Gabriel raised a brow. "He's Távio now, is he? That boy sure has some opinions about you."

"It's a very naive case of hero worship." You snorted. "He slept against my shoulder calling for his mãe." You shook your head. "And it's shorter than Maeda Vargas."

"Another Mihret, great." Gabriel sighed. He had one arm under his head, the other rubbing
"Távio is less mouthy than Ziv. But I realize that’s not a high bar. Most people are less mouthy than Ziv." You yawned, and your stomach growled, but you didn't want to move, not with Gabriel holding you.

"Daniels is in ICU. She still hasn't awakened. She might not," Gabriel said, voice a low rumble, reminding you of a cat's purr.

You began to wonder if you had made a mistake, if you'd left Daniels, if there had been time to hand Távio off to Jesse then go back for Chey-

No. Human lives weren't numbers to be plugged in and out of equations. You couldn't interchange them neatly. You and Jesse made your decisions in the heat of battle. You did the best you could with what you had and what you knew. You exhaled slowly, trying to let that reminder sink in. You would have to repeat it many times, but eventually your stubborn brain would accept the facts; you knew this from experience.

"How bad?" Gabriel asked.

"Not as bad as the Ninth Circle," you said. "But I'm still processing."

"Ana will handle your debrief, but we can do that tomorrow," he said. "Maybe we should get you some food."

You just flattened yourself against him. "You're not going anywhere."

Gabriel laughed. "Athena, will you please ask Jack to pick something up from the cafeteria?"

"Of course, Commander Reyes," she said cheerfully. "And Lucky, it's good to hear you awake and active. We were all very worried. Ziv is currently inebriated with Agent Tataryn, and Winston, but he wants you to know- Oh, he doesn't want you to know. But he is very glad that you are alive and mostly intact."

Gabriel smirked at you.

You blinked. "Thanks Athena."

"Don't the nurses normally bring food?" You wondered.

"Since we're spending the night here, your room is off-limits to everyone tonight, but Angela. She's already been by a few times," Gabriel nuzzled your cheek. "If anyone asks, you're debriefing us. In a completely professional fashion."

"Yeah, I don't think I can pull your pants off with my hands all fucked up," you said, looking at your broken arm.

"That was a terrible joke... But you can always use your teeth," Gabriel said, flicking your nose.

"You're right," you said. "But my teeth don't have thumbs. So I'll probably just bite the closures off your pants."

Gabriel laughed. "Don't tempt me, corazon. You need to take it easy." He kissed you, hands tightening around your waist. "You scared us bad. Know it wasn't your fault, but..." He pressed his forehead to yours. "You need to stop being such a shit magnet."

Your laughter was tight and you had trouble meeting his warm brown eyes. "I'm sorry. I don't mean to be-"

"I know." He hugged you closer. "Not on you. I'm just venting."

There was a knock at the door and a muffled, "It's me." Then the door opened, and Jack came in, carrying a bag of takeout boxes. He was still in his coat and armor. "Athena said you were hungry." He glanced over, a small smile on his lips when he saw Gabriel stretched out underneath you. "Hey."

"Hello handsome," Gabriel winked.

"Hi," you said, a little unprepared for the way Jack glowed when he looked at you. Those shockingly blue eyes were soft with emotion and he set the food down on the bedside table and sat down, leaning over to kiss you, then Gabriel.

"Nice to see you putting Gabe to good use."

"Shut up, Jack." Gabriel didn't actually sound offended though. He just rubbed your shoulders.

You chuckled and scooted over a little so Jack could rest his head against Gabriel's arm. "I don't think this bed will fit the three of us."

"Want to try?" Jack's smile turned mischievous.

"Angela will murder us all," Gabriel said. "And you don't want to jostle Lucky."

"True," Jack sighed. "It's just for tonight," he reminded himself, looking wistful. "Tomorrow night, you pick the bedroom. Then we can all cuddle."

"We can switch out later. I'll move and you can use Gabriel as a body pillow," you said.

"Nope," Jack leaned over and rubbed his nose against yours. "The moment we take our eyes off you, you'll sneak off, get into a ridiculous amount of trouble, and then Angela will skin us alive. I had to ask very nicely for special permission to get Gabe and me overnight privileges. And she very clearly emphasized "no sparring." Which is hilarious, because I've only now realized she thought we were in bed together long before it actually happened."

You blinked. The first "no sparring" orders came after Shanghai Noon and Lao shooting you. But you'd just started the relationship then. Oh yeah, she'd seen your bruises after Lacroix's Code White in the Alps. And you'd told her you were sparring. Because you had been sparring, not having kinky sex. Huh.

Your stomach gurgled and you glanced at the food.

Jack unpacked several slightly squashed cheeseburgers, a thermos, and some dodgy-looking fruit cups. Gabriel grabbed a cheeseburger, eating it one-handed while Jack got out a spoon for you. You eyed the soup warily.

"The cafeteria tomato soup isn't-"
"Try it." Jack practically shoved the spoon in your mouth. It was creamier than usual, less harshly acidic, and was that sherry? You raised a brow. "I uh...left Gérard in charge while we were out. He was adamant about changing the recipe. He also ordered a remodel of my office, but I think I managed to halt that."

You nearly choked on the spoon. "You left...Lacroix in charge?"

"Ana wasn't going to stay behind. Gabe wouldn't either." Jack shrugged, like remaining here at base had never been an option. "After Rein, he was next in the hierarchy."

You squinted, unsure if it was more disturbing that Lacroix had been left in charge or that Rein was that high up in the chain of command.

"The soup is good though," Jack offered you a burger. And you had to stretch out your neck to reach it. Jack laughed and closed the distance. "Sorry."

Gabriel was on his second burger by the time you were halfway through yours. Jack took a burger in two massive bites, before spooning you more soup.

"What happened to Bandit?" You asked, suddenly remembering the little black and white dog. You flinched at the thought of him alone on the beach, watching the Orca take off. "We didn't leave him behind, did we?"

"Come on baby, I wouldn't abandon a dog in the middle of nowhere. And McCree would've mutinied and stayed there if we tried," Jack said, shaking his head. "No, the dog's with Reinhardt right now. We'll make arrangements for him later."

You looked at Gabriel. "Can we keep him?"

"Don't you start too," Gabriel gave a heavy sigh. "I told the kid we'd figure something out later. I know, corazon, that little dog helped us find you. I am very aware. Jesse already made this argument."

"Jesse adores that dog. When he woke up in the cave, that was the first thing he asked about."

Jack gave you a sympathetic smile. "You like him too, huh?"

"Jesse's OK, but Bandit's great." You tried to keep a straight face and Jack had to set the soup aside while he laughed.

"And when he's out-"

"Wilhelm, Mihret, Ana, Genji, and several other agents have already volunteered to dogsit the beast," Gabriel said, rolling his eyes. "Last I saw, Wilhelm was sharing his currywurst with the dog. I told him he was cleaning up whatever mess came out afterward."

"Any idea where he came from?" You asked, grinning into Gabriel's chest at the thought of the little dog on Rein's lap.

"Mihret did some digging. Nejem's unit adopted him awhile ago," Jack said. "Kind of a unit mascot. He was originally named "Dasri." But judging by how everyone is fussing over him, he just responds to the happy dog voice, period."

"So, he's a veteran Overwatch dog," you said. "That should be a thing by the way."
Gabriel snorted. "Really?"

"Oh yes. I realize he may not be a trained guard, sniffer, or tracker, but he has performed services for the organization as a whole-
"

Jack nodded somberly, laughter in his eyes. "Do you want me to give him a medal?"

"Sure, if that convinces Gabriel to let Jesse keep him," you said.

"Do you want a dog?" Jack asked, expression sly.

"...I can't have one right now," you said. "But maybe someday. And I'll practice with Jesse's."

"Neither of you know what you're doing. The kid has never had a dog-" Gabriel scowled.

"Well you and Jack seem to be experts. You can help him. Otherwise, how else is he going to learn?" You beamed at Gabriel, and out of the corner of your eye, Jack looked very smug.

"Eat your soup," Gabriel said gruffly, grabbing the thermos and spoon off the bedside table. "I'll think about it."

At some point, Gabriel and Jack had switched out, and when you woke up, Gabriel was gone, but Jack was beside you, coat draped over the chair, arms around your waist.

"His turn to get some work done," Jack murmured sleepily in your ear.

Your head was fuzzy and you glanced down at your arms, wondering if you could get the bandages off your right hand today. It was a good thing you had gloves, because seeing a hand without fingernails always reminded you of torture.

"You OK, baby?"

"Groggy," you said, scooting closer to Jack.

"You can sleep," he said. "I'll stay till Gabe gets back. It won't be like last time, honest," he said, kissing your forehead.

It took you a moment to understand that he was talking about the aftermath of Candle Arc and Lucerne. "Don't worry about flowers," you said, voice scratchy. "Just glad to have you and Gabriel. Also happy to be out of that hole."

Jack shifted beside you, eyes closed. "Do you want to talk about it?"

"Not yet," you said. "It hasn't all sunk in." You took a moment to review the last twenty four hours. "Wait, did I really declare my love for you in front of Rein and Távio?"

"Yup," Jack said, eyes still closed, but his smile widened. "Too late to take it back now."

"It was overdue," you said.
"Mmm," Jack said diplomatically.

"I'm sorry."

"I know. I should have said it too. But didn't want to pressure you." Jack yawned, opening his eyes. "I love you, sweetheart." He ran his fingers through his hair. "I figured it was obvious by now. Not to mention, I'm crammed in this tiny hospital bed on my best behavior and you're wearing a this thin cotton thing that doesn't even fasten properly..."

You laughed. "Only you could make hospital gowns sound sexy."

"Gabe and I have had our share of...reunions in them. They're very convenient," he said, looking smug.

"...I do love you; I didn't just say it because you rescued us. In case you were wondering," you said after a moment.

"I know," Jack said he leaned over, nose to nose with you.

"Yeah," you said. "I guess you do."

"How are you feeling?"

"...Exhausted. Physically, mentally, emotionally, astrologically...you name it." You shook your head. "None of it's really sunk in."

"That mission went very...bad. I think you know it helps to talk about it sooner rather than later."

"OK." You blinked a few times. "I don't know where to start."

"You were in that cave overnight. Were you scared?"

"...Yeah," you said, too tired to be proud. "I was terrified that I'd go to check on one of the others and they'd be dead already. I'm going to have all kinds of nightmares about Daniels and I don't even know her first name."

"Nadine," Jack said. He rubbed your back. "What else were you feeling?"

"A lot of regret. Pain. Some despair." You swallowed. "Head wasn't right and I wasn't sure if help was coming or if we'd be trapped in there..." You exhaled slowly, suddenly very cold. "I left Chey. He and Távio were wounded in the same attack. He told me to get Távio first. Asked for my gun to hold them off-" You clenched your teeth. "I know it's not my fault, not really. But I still left him. I didn't even like him that much, and that makes it worse."

"Maeda Vargas would have been easier for you to carry. He's smaller and you were injured," Jack said. "And I understand you were retreating with heavy pursuit."

"I know. I know my actions were defensible and logical, but my feelings- Not so much." You shivered and Jack pulled the blankets up. "Jesse and I talked through some things, but the gas really messed with us. And it's...very lonely in the dark."

"I wish we had got there sooner," Jack said.

"You came for me," you said, voice whisper soft. "That's what matters."
"Of course, we did," Jack said, roughly. "You can't possibly think we'd leave you behind."

You shook your head, leaning forward to kiss Jack's face. "I wasn't thinking clearly. I wasn't sure anyone would find us, and with the omnics actively using the distress signal as bait, it would be foolish to send anyone else into a trap." Let alone the Strike Commander and the upper echelons of Overwatch command.

There was a long pause. "I was scared," Jack said, voice distant. "Gabe, too. He wanted to rush in. I had to sit back and ask for help strategizing. Didn't trust that I was thinking clearly either."

"I know how that is. You mess me up," you said. "I can keep my cool with Gabriel. We're more alike. But you? You make me crazy, Jack."

"I've seen Gabe get you plenty worked up and vice versa," Jack laughed. "But I think I understand what you're saying." He nuzzled your throat. "I'm just so sexy, you can't function."

"...I cannot refute this," you said, reluctantly.

Jack nodded solemnly. "I know."

Shaking your head, you pulled the blankets closer. Hospital blankets were always too thin and bordered on useless.

"Hey, after we wrap up this business, I was wondering... Well, I made the arrangements, but if you don't want to, I understand..." He shifted beside you, rubbing your sides. "I was going to wait till later, but I think we could use a vacation. Just you, me, and Gabe. Gabe thought it was a good idea, and I wanted to surprise you, and I know we all have vacation time, but, maybe it's better to ask?"

You stared at his hopeful expression, brain taking a moment to process his words. All those times he'd quickly shut off his tablet screen or switched windows on his computer; you wondered if this was the reason. "How long have you been planning this?"

"Since we rescued Feng," he admitted. "Athena and Gabe helped."

"...Yeah," you said, your throat suddenly dry. You swallowed a few times. Gabriel had known, that night in the office, when he'd been teasing you about taking you along on vacation. "I'd really like that. Where to?"

"That part's a secret." He grinned smugly.

You blinked. "Really?"

"I'll confirm the reservation today," Jack said, unable to hide his satisfaction.

You awoke to Gabriel entering with boxes of pancakes and bacon. You could smell them through the containers. There were probably eggs and fruit too, because Gabriel didn't do meals in half measures.

Jack chuckled, squeezing you lightly. You hurt less now, though your right hand was still unsteady.

"How are you feeling?" Gabriel asked, sipping his coffee.

"That's a good sign. Your body's healing. Jesse ate three breakfast burritos and Maeda Vargas ate four."

"Daniels?" You asked.

"Still comatose," Gabriel said. "But Angela has her stabilized now."

"OK," you said, watching Gabriel unpack the food.

"Ana will be here later to debrief you. Word's already gotten out about your daring escape and rescue. Mihret drank too much last night and spilled some of the beans." Gabriel scowled.

You sat up, flexing your right hand. You wouldn't be doing detail work, but you could probably hold a cup. "Unwrap me?"

"Later," Gabriel purred, holding out a tall glass of orange juice with a straw. You leaned over and took a big drink. Gabriel held the glass up till you finished. "Angela will be by soon. You can wait till then."

You rolled your eyes as Jack sat up and pivoted, reaching for the bacon.

"Stop that!" Gabriel smacked Jack's hand. "I'm making Lucky a plate first."

"But Gabe-"

"So help me, Morrison-"

You kissed the back of Jack's neck, draping your right arm over his shoulder. "I don't think I've said this yet, but I love you both," you said and they fell silent.

Gabriel set the food aside, leaning forward to kiss Jack. Jack hugged your good arm to his chest, smiling the whole time. Gabriel turned his head, cupped your face, and placed a gentle kiss on your lips.

"I love you and this idiot too," Gabriel murmured. "Now eat your breakfast, before Jack does."

By the time Captain Amari entered, Jack was out of bed with his coat on and his hair combed. Both men sat at your bedside, doing their work remotely. It was a startling contrast from your stay during Candle Arc.

She looked polished in her uniform, and she wore a look of satisfaction. You wondered what had passed between her and Jesse, but knew better than to ask.

"You're looking better," Captain Amari said, her tone professional, her smile not so much.
"Well-rested even," she said smugly.

Gabriel shot her a dirty look. "Really, Ana?"

Captain Amari did not look the least bit perturbed. "It's vexing that the only time I can count on Lucky getting enough rest is after a near death experience. And mostly because Angela drugs her."

You blinked. "It's not just near death experiences, I get lots of sleep after-" You stopped, even as Gabriel rested his face in his hand. Jack, however, preened under the attention.

"I think she's counting le petit mort," Jack said, his accent pretty bad. You wondered if you could get him to say that in front of Lacroix.

Gabriel now had two hands over his face, when he should have been covering his ears.

"...Anyway," Captain Amari said, her smile widening. "I'm just glad that you're all right. Jesse told quite the tale."

"...I don't know how. He was passed out for half of it," you said.

"Then I definitely need your side of the story. This will be an on the record report." Captain Amari just pulled up a chair and sat. "We'll begin recording in a moment. Are you ready?"

"Shit spiders," you muttered.

"That's not a "no," agent."

You closed your eyes, taking a deep breath. You remembered the terror of the freefall, your stomach dropping as you lost consciousness. You remembered the way Rodriguez's eyes widened as began to bleed, dead almost before he knew it. You remembered Forrester and Chey in the moments before their deaths; you hoped Forrester never saw it coming and didn't feel a thing. You didn't know what to say about Chey's selflessness: terms like "glory" and "sacrifice" sounded so hollow right now. You swallowed, your mouth suddenly dry. You had lived through it once. You could do it again.

"I'm ready," you lied, as Jack offered you a glass of water, holding the straw in place for you.

The first part of the story was easy. Yes, you acquired the prisoner. Yes, the new team seemed to be integrating smoothly. Yes, it was a routine pickup, you were just along to help with the transition if necessary.

She didn't ask how much you liked Rodriguez, or how pleased you were that Chey and Távio were getting along, or how glad you were to go on a run with Jesse. Because none of those things were pertinent to the mission, even if they were important to you.

You recounted the sequence of events after the distress call. Yes, Rodriguez had been cautious. Yes, he was aware it could be a trap. No, you don't know what hit your ship. No, you don't know how you ended up on the beach several hundred meters from the crash site. Yes, Rodriguez was with you. Yes, your arm was broken in the crash. But Rodriguez was there to center you, and you understood that your stealth field was what saved your life, that and Rodriguez hushing you as he died, the OR-14 already looking for more humans to skewer.

You wavered then, unsure if you should share his last words for the official record. They were so personal. And you didn't know if Chang wanted to know that his last thoughts were of her.

Captain Amari sat there patiently and when you looked at Jack, he was wiping his eyes, Gabriel's hands kneading his shoulders. You wanted to take his hand in yours, but you couldn't. Later, you would tell him the whole story, off the record.

You told them it was Jesse doing the shooting, let you know that there were other survivors. You didn't need to explain what a relief it was to know that he was alive. You were pretty sure they could hear it in your voice. You didn't tell them how damn happy Távio was to see you.

Serik had taken Daniels ahead. Everyone was retreating toward the caves, with Jesse and you providing sporadic cover fire. But it was nothing against the Bastions. You weren't sure if it was the second or third salvo that killed Forrester. But then Chey was calling for you, his leg broken, Távio stunned on the ground.

You had to take a few gulps of water, your throat raw with thorny words. "He told me to take the boy." You sighed. The mission debrief was not the place to express your complicated feelings. "He asked for my gun, and said he could wait for me to make a return trip. We both knew there wouldn't be time. Jesse still tried to go back for him."

"Is there a reason you should have prioritized Agent Chey instead of Agent Maeda Vargas?" Captain Amari asked, her voice oddly soothing.

"No, ma'am. Agent Maeda Vargas was smaller and easier for me to...help," you said, looking at your splinted arm.

"I see no good reason to question your actions, Lucky. Perhaps you shouldn't either."

"Ma'am," you said, voice rusty.

You had not seen Serik fall, but you looked up to see Jesse carrying Daniels. And then he'd come back for you and Távio. He then galloped back out to see what he could do for Chey and came back with Bandit. Jesse was the hero of the story.

You described the cave-in in the barest of terms. The rocks fell. The lights went out. Jesse hurt his knee. And you extended your stealth field, hoping the omnis would think everyone died. It was strange to talk about this. You knew Athena was transcribing your words, but after Shit Spiders, most of your post-mission reports had been written. Not an option this time, but you were feeling things now that you hadn't in the moment: fear, dread, more grief.

You described the survival procedures. You looked for an exit. You found water. And then you and Jesse talked about your options, and took a rest. You didn't talk about your failure as a friend and how you were ashamed that you had not tried to work things out with Jesse sooner. You certainly didn't speak of seeing your dead and the words that passed between you; you didn't know how to explain what you had seen or dreamt. You certainly couldn't express the regret you felt about not being honest with Jack when you had the chance. You sat there silently, for too long, until Captain Amari cleared her throat.

"There was...gas. I woke up and everyone else was out." You inhaled deeply, appreciating the clean, if astringent hospital air. "I had to get fresh air into the cave. So I dug. Broke my tanto in the process." Your voice waivered then and Gabriel reached out, hand resting on your shoulder. You raised your right hand. "I only managed a small hole. But I put my compass on the dog and pushed him out, because the gas was affecting him the most."

Captain Amari nodded. "Did you have any breathing apparatus or anything to help you work? It seems odd that you were the only one conscious enough to dig."

"There'd been a crash. I think we were all concussed. Jesse was in the best shape, but he'd exhausted himself during the battle." You weren't sure if that was the real reason, but it was the only one that didn't make you sound insane.

"I see," Captain Amari said.

"I had to take a break, but with some prodding, everyone but Daniels woke up. The fresh air helped. I slept some more and when I reawakened..." Távio and Daniels were huddled against you and everything hurt. You sighed, trying to remember useful things. "We were all bundled together for warmth. It wasn't too cold, but Daniels kept shivering. We were pretty sure she was in shock. Jesse was listening at the vent." Waiting for Bandit to come back, more likely. But you didn't point that out.

"Did he try to dig more?"

"I don't think so. We heard shooting, and decided against calling for help till it died down. If the omnic came back, we were sitting ducks. So we waited." You didn't mention how unspeakably relieved you were to hear Gabriel's voice. You didn't bring up how agonizingly difficult it was to just sit there and wait, to see if you would be rescued. You only spoke the facts, describing what happened, and sometimes giving speculation when asked. You weren't sure how to tell the real story, and to be honest, it had no place in the official report.

Angela unwrapped your hand, rolling her eyes as you begged her to scratch it. She did though, somewhat amused by the dumb smile of relief that spread across your face. You were still missing fingernails, and your skin looked patchy, but the damage was mostly cosmetic now, and it would heal.

"So, may I please go now?" You asked, after she checked the splint, ran a bioscanner over your head, and stuck you with another shot in the left arm.

Frowning, Angela gave you a hard look. "You're on medical leave for at least a week. If you fight me on this, I'll make it two."

"Yes, ma'am," you said meekly, hunching over and not missing Gabriel's slightly incredulous look.

"I want you to take it easy. That arm needs a few more days to heal properly. You need to make sure you're taking enough fluids. And no spar-"

"The only thing I'm going to be fighting is anyone who takes my blankets or food," you said, the very picture of sincerity. "I intend to take it very easy. Go on vacation even."

Angela squinted at you, like you were fucking with her. "Yes, well, try to limit your physical activity," she said dryly, turning that cool gaze on Gabriel.
You smothered a snicker as Gabriel glared right back.

Angela remained unfazed. "All right. You're discharged. But if you have any trouble-

"Yes, doctor, I'll be the very model of caution."

And while Angela didn't look convinced, she at least appeared to be placated. She dispensed some medications, repeated her instructions, and gave you a distrustful look before she left.

You still needed Gabriel's help getting dressed. And he took his time. Someone had "forgotten" your underwear again. You just rolled your eyes as you stepped into your fatigue pants and Gabriel wrapped his arms around you, slowly fastening the button, kissing the nape of your neck while he worked. He sat on the chair in front of you, lifting your feet onto his lap so he could tie your boots. You could at least put the hoodie on by yourself.

"Thank you," you said, when he was done.

"Where do you want to sleep tonight?" He asked, voice husky.

"Your room," you said.

He chuckled at that. "You're going to have to field some visitors today. I guess I could stash you there now. Keep you all to myself." He flashed you a wicked grin.

"Tonight," you said. "I...should probably check on the others and find Ziv."

"Mihret's hungover. I think Amélie was having coffee with him later." Gabriel gave you a long look. "What exactly is going on there?"

You shrugged. "I don't know."

Skepticism practically dripped from his pores. "If you say so. Do you want me to walk you back to your quarters?"

"No thanks. I had better visit Jesse and Távio first." You paused. "Where's my gear?"

"I'm getting it repaired," he said.

"OK. But my tanto-"

"...I've got a K-Bar you can borrow, if you like."

Unspoken was the fact that your dagger was broken. It would never be quite right for battle now. And what use was an unreliable blade? You wondered if that was a metaphor. "I...don't know."

"We can get you something similar. I can't pretend like it will replace your weapon, but the quality-"

"I just want the pieces," you said after a moment, your voice a little choked.

"Of course," he said. "Just...give me a day or two, OK?"

You blinked. Repairing it was a waste, you understood that. Had he thrown it away? You took a deep breath, hands shaking.
"I wanted to see if Lindholm could do anything for it," Gabriel said, meeting your eyes. "But don't get your hopes up."

"...Oh," you nodded, relieved. "OK. Thank you."

"Go on," Gabriel ruffled your hair. "I have work to do."

Chapter End Notes

Ranger has surgery tomorrow. I'm sure it will be fine. mutters neurotically to self
Chapter 70

Chapter Summary

Informing everyone that you are indeed alive is exhausting, but it beats the alternative.

Chapter Notes

Surgery patient dog is fine. He has weaponized his cone and is very salty about the whole ordeal. The vet says he's growing several more, but that as long as they aren't in inconvenient places, we can leave them alone. So yeah, yuck.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Angela hadn't gotten around to discharging Jesse yet, and he was sharing a room with Távio. You stopped there first, with some barely-acceptable gift shop flower arrangements for both of them.

Távio was awake and flipping through the movie selection at an alarming rate. Jesse sat with his bad leg elevated, drinking what looked like a mangonada. Where had he gotten that? You wanted one too. To your surprise, Shoal sat by Távio's bed, smiling, though her eyes were red-rimmed and her nose rubbed raw.

"Lucky!" She was on her feet and threw her arms around you, nearly knocking the two vases out of your good arm. "Oh shit! I'm sorry!" She quickly helped you set the flowers on the bedside tables. "I heard you were in isolation! I thought it was really serious!" She sniffled and you hesitantly patted her back.

"No, Angela wanted to keep an eye on me and didn't want me persuading anyone to help me escape." You shrugged. "I don't know why she doesn't trust me..."

Jesse gave you an amused look, knowing full well why you didn't have visitors. "Flowers? For me, sweetpea? You shouldn't have," he drawled.

"There are no secret meanings here. Get well soon, asshole," you said.

Távio was watching all of you, his eyes big, but his mouth firmly shut. You wondered how much he remembered from the cave.

"For you too, Távio," you said, giving him permission to join the conversation. Not that he needed it, but you figured he would be hesitant to interrupt his former instructors.

"Thank you, ma'am," he said, staring at the vase with suspicion. You knew that look. He didn't know what to do with flowers either.

"They're supposed to be cheerful, since you're stuck in here. Reinhardt told me it is important to have some beauty and color when you're laid up in the infirmary," you said, explaining badly.

"OK," Távio said, obviously not impressed.

"Ah-ha! There is our unlucky girl!" Tataryn peeked his head in. "Can you stop getting hurt? You are making my life so much harder!" He swept in setting a bottle of absinthe on Jesse's bedside table and a bottle of vodka on Távio's. He leaned over and kissed you on the cheek and you rolled your eyes.

"I would rather have the liquor."

"I heard you were incommunicado, otherwise I would have brought yours," he said smoothly, and you wondered if you would actually get anything from him.

"You really need to get better at gifting, sugarpie. Tataryn has you beat," Jesse smirked.

"I just got discharged!" You scowled.

"Excuses, excuses," Jesse shook his head.

Shoal laughed and then grabbed a tissue, blowing her nose. "I'm so glad you guys are all right. I heard about..." And she trailed off, sniffling. "I'm sorry. I know I wasn't even there..."

"It wasn't fun," you said, studying your right hand.

"It was just a...bad run," Jesse said after a moment.

Shoal's lower lip trembled. "Yeah."

Tataryn gave an unconvincing smile, his jaw clenched too tight. "We'll drink to Chey and Forrester."

There were nods of agreement.

You blew out a breath. "Sucks."

"Does," Jesse agreed.

The five of you sat in quietly for a moment. Something needed to be done about that region. You just didn't know what.

"So, I heard you got a dog," Tataryn said, breaking the silence.

"He literally jumped in my arms while I was running," Jesse said.

"Probably saved our lives," you said, and Jesse smiled.

"Any word yet on the boss's decision on Bandit? Or do I call him "Dasri?" I don't know. I'll see what he likes best," Jesse toyed with the brim of his hat.

"I haven't gotten to see him yet. Where's he at?" Shoal asked.

"Mercy put him through some exams and vaccinations, and now my pup is staying with Commander Wilhelm, though Captain Amari offered to take him too." The way he said her name was gentle, and you wondered what had passed between them.
"I think he might be coming around," you said. "The Strike Commander has a soft spot for dogs."

Both Jesse and Tataryn gave you pointed looks that translated as "no, the Strike Commander has a soft spot for you," but you ignored them. Jack totally had a soft spot for dogs, but it didn't hurt that Gabriel had a soft spot for you.

Távio was still staring at the flowers.

"But really, it's a miracle you guys survived," Shoal said.

Tataryn patted her shoulder. "Lucky is like a very pretty cockroach."

"What?" You resisted the urge to hit him. "You can stop talking now."

"She is a master-survivor. It is good rescue came soon, because she would have eaten the rest of you to survive," Tataryn continued, ignoring your dirty looks.

"She would not!" Shoal laughed. "Quit picking on Lucky."

"No, Tataryn." You rolled your eyes skyward.

"She carries hot sauce in her belt," he stage-whispered.

You could neither confirm nor deny that accusation.

Jesse and Távio exchanged shit-eating grins. "I'm happy never finding out," Jesse said.

Tataryn just laughed, not the least bit ashamed.

You swung by Reinhardt's office to find him trying to concentrate on paperwork while Bandit sat in his lap, stubby little tail wagging happily when he saw you.

"Lucky!" Reinhardt boomed as he saw you. "Already up and about? You have such an inspiring work ethic!"

"Angela's put me on med leave for a week, so I'm technically not supposed to be working," you said. "I came by to thank you for digging me out...and to see Bandit."

Reinhardt waved his hands, cheeks turning red. "There are no thanks between us, Lucky. That is what friends do." He gave you a bright beaming smile and you fought the urge to shield your eyes. "But you can buy me a beer and currywurst any time!"

You made a mental note to order some delivered later this week.

"As for this one, I think Jack's going to let us keep him," he stage-whispered. It was still louder than your indoor voice and you laughed. You reached out and patted the dog on the head, grinning as he licked your fingers.

"Jesse won't stop asking about him."
"I will sneak him in for a visit later. Angela doesn't have to know," Reinhardt said, and you wondered if he would stick Bandit down his shirt. You pictured the dog popping out of Reinhardt's collar and had to cover your face.

"He'll like that," you said.

"And I was also very happy to see Jack and Gabriel with you. I was worried for awhile, you know. You are so quiet and withdrawn-" You raised a brow at that, but then decided that most everyone was quiet and withdrawn compared to Reinhardt. "-and Jack is under a lot of pressure, and Gabriel has a...fiery temperament. Our circumstances make relationships hard. But it seems that they are good to you and you are good for them."

You rubbed the back of your neck, unsure of how to respond to Reinhardt's pleased expression. "Thank you. I...agree."

"Oh Bandit! Where's that little gubben?" Torby cooed, opening the door, carrying a large hamburger. "Lucky..." he trailed off, stuffing the burger behind his back. "I didn't know you were out of bed." Torby gave you a sharp look, daring you to comment.

"Thank you for coming to dig me out," you told him, ignoring how Bandit jumped out of Reinhardt's lap and Torby discretely dropped the whole damn burger on the office floor. That little dog was going to be a big round pupper soon. "I really appreciate it."

"Oh. I uh.." Torby shrugged, turning pink. "You're welcome. But don't let it go to your head."

"Of course not," you said solemnly.

Genji found you while you were looking for Ziv. You were starting to hurt again, your muscles still sore all over. You had to take a break in the cafeteria, wincing as you turned your head to find Genji right behind you, pulling out a chair.

"You should be in bed," he said.

You sat down, and dug out a pain pill. "I'm just achy," you said, shaking your head. "And unlike you, I don't like spending time in the infirmary."

Genji regarded you coolly. "I don't know what you're talking about."

You shrugged. "Me neither. I'm on pain medication, I don't know what's going on, and I can't operate heavy machinery either."

Genji just looked at your splinted left arm, and even though you'd reattached your prostheses, you didn't want to jostle it too much. Then he looked at your right hand, shaking his head. "The pain medication isn't what's affecting your abilities."

"It was a joke," you said. "I still haven't taken my pill. Can you get me a drink? I don't want to dry swallow this."
Shaking his head, Genji walked off, and you wondered if he would actually come back, but he did, carrying a bottle of lemonade. He even opened it for you and you gave him a wry smile.

"Thank you. I uh...talked to Jesse. Apparently, I'm an idiot," you said, after a moment.

"I know," Genji said. "But it's good that you spoke with him."

You rolled your eyes. "Thanks, Genji."

"Feng wants to do another night out..." He leaned against the table. "Hanzo's in. I know you're on med leave, but maybe after?"

You blinked. "Hanzo...is going willingly?"

"He wants to check on Bayan."

You nodded slowly. Then wondered when Feng started scheduling things through Genji. You didn't feel snubbed, so much as puzzled. Had Genji made a friend? The thought made you grin. "Yeah, sure."

"...It is good that you made it back," he said, studying the floor. "After Lacroix, you are the most skilled at handling my brother."

You choked on your lemonade. "I...what?"

"You have a talent for dealing with difficult people."

You just rolled your eyes. Yes, you had plenty of practice dealing with difficult Shimadas. Both of them. But saying that right now, while you were already in bad shape, was unwise. Because Genji could most definitely hold a grudge.

You stared at the cards taped to your door. One bulky one was from Vo, her chicken scratch handwriting very distinct, and you were pretty sure it was full of glitter. You were surprised to see some from your former students. Shoal had left one and Joon had too. You carefully gathered them up, cursing silently. Responding wouldn't be the problem, but your manual dexterity had not quite recovered yet. One arm full of cards, you glared at your door, trying not to drop more cards as you hit the keypad.

"Do you need help?" Athena asked.

"Please."

The door popped open and you dragged yourself into your room, dropping the cards on the desk. You appreciated the gesture. You just couldn't open them properly. Hell, you probably wouldn't be able to wear gloves either. It was best that you were on leave. Basic tasks were a struggle.

Grumbling, you wiggled your fingers, trying to regain some control. This was going to put a damper on your plans for tonight.

There came a knock, and you sighed. "Athena, who is it?"
"Zenyatta," she said. "Do you want me to tell him that you're resting?"

Your teenage AI was willing to lie for you? You shook your head, unable to cover your smile. "No, I think I can handle him. Can you get the door?"

The door opened and you managed to pull it all the way.

Zenyatta hovered by the threshold. "Greetings Agent Strike. I am glad to see that you are well."

"Thanks," you said, unsure of where he was going with this. "Did you need something?" You didn't invite him inside, partially because you weren't that close, partially because you didn't think your one damaged chair would hold him.

"I would like to express my condolences for you losses." He nodded at you. "I truly am relieved to see that you are alive," he said. Oddly enough, you believed him, even if he did think you were a spy. "If my presence bothers you, I can leave."

"Well, I have to visit everyone anyway," you said with a shrug. "I feel like shit, but if I hide out, they're going to think I'm dying or something, and it will be very dramatic. Best to get the reunions out of the way."

"That is an interesting way of looking at things," he said. "Though I think your friends would understand if you needed to rest."

Belatedly, you realized that Zenyatta testing the waters on your feelings about omnics. You shook your head. You weren't going to be hugging OR-14s or Bastions any time soon, but humanoid omnics were downright cuddly in comparison.

"Well, I'm here. And alive. Still."

Zenyatta looked down at your right hand and your arm.

"I had heard about your...injuries. I also wished to offer my assistance, if you would have it."

You blinked a few times, and resisted the urge to ask him to open jars or juggle. "Umm...with what?" You asked, unsure of how Zenyatta was going to "help" you.

"I am capable of channeling omnic energy into mending," he said. "If you wanted to see me work."

You blinked a few times, unsure of what you were hearing. "My prostheses and augments are replaceable-"

"I can heal organic tissue," he said.

You tilted your head to the side. "Really? It won't interact strangely with Dr. Ziegler's nano-tech?"

"It should not. If anything, they amplify each other. I utilized this technique on Genji earlier this week. He suffered no ill effects."

Huh. He sure was interested in Genji. "Is this a secret Shambhali technique?"

"It is...uncommon," Zenyatta said hesitantly, and you understood that you were not considered trustworthy enough to hear about it.

You waited for Athena to butt in with something like, "Don't fall for his jokes!" or "It's a trap!" But she was silent.

"Sure, what the hell?" You sighed, holding out your arms. "I just took a pain pill too. Is this going to fuck with my head?"

"No," Zenyatta said. "Now, embrace tranquility." There was a chime as a ball of yellow light engulfed you, prickling along your fingers. It wasn't unlike an emitter, though it didn't feel quite as warm and calming.

Your breathing stayed slow and steady. You weren't sure how long you stood like that but you held still till the light faded.

"Lucky, are you all right?" Athena asked, sounding concerned.

You wiggled your right hand and it responded faster than it had before. "Yeah, I think so." Your body ached just a little less, and while you weren't sure if that was because of Zenyatta or the pain pill, your range of motion had improved. "Thank you," you said. "Is this a lesson in disguise? Because I'm too dumb to pick up the subtext."

"Do you need lessons in compassion?" Zenyatta asked.

"If this is just about compassion, wouldn't you be in the infirmary offering to help out?" You paused, wincing at the severity of your words. "I don't mean to sound ungrateful. You helped me. I appreciate it. But there's a hole in your logic."

"Perhaps. But this is a gift from me to you. Since I am to be an ambassador for my people. And I appreciate your trust, especially after the hardship you have endured. It gives me hope. After all, a closed mind is already defeated."

You blew out a breath. He was still making you feel like the bad guy. "I don't hate omnis, you know."

"I know," Zenyatta said, strangely confident. "Hatred is not strategy. And you think in very strategic terms."

You thought of Talon, of the murderous rage you had for them. Perhaps you were too close, you and Gabriel both. That's why you needed Lacroix, who planned without pity or passion. "I'm not sure what you're getting at."

"You do not have to feel hate to look at someone differently. It can be fear. It can be envy. It is whatever makes them different in your eyes and justifies that treatment. Whatever makes it easier to think of them as less worthy or more favored than yourself."

Omnics didn't feel hunger, they didn't need warmth, and they could just swap out broken parts. It sounded easier than your life had been. But that was ignorance. You didn't know how omnis lived, not really: you didn't know how much it cost to keep them going, what kinds of restrictions, both legal and social, they faced. The omnic experience in most of the world would be very different from the human one. Hell, you didn't have a clue how omnis "felt." Zenyatta wasn't wrong to call you out, though you didn't particularly enjoy it.

"Zenyatta, you are smarter and probably kinder than me. Do I have unresolved issues, some of which involve omnis? Yes. But I also have unresolved issues with food, a lot of dead people, and toasters. I'm working on it. And to be honest, I'll probably be working on it till the day I die."

"And I am offering my assistance," he said, utterly tranquil in the face of your honesty. Damn him. "Sometimes an outside perspective can do you good. The path to peace is not an easy one, but it is attainable. Should you want my help-"

"Can you absolve me for the dead?" You snapped. "Can you bring them back? Can you wake up Agent Daniels? Because I already have at least six funerals to go to this week, and I don't want there to be seventh."

Zenyatta tilted his head to the side, his face almost comically blank. "I have pushed you too hard again."

You bit your lip. "This isn't a good time for that discussion, Zenyatta. Not with me."

"I understand. But when will it ever be a good time for you?" He asked, mildly.

You glared at him, furious that he was pushing, but more infuriated by the fact that you did not have an answer for him.

Irritated as you were by your encounter with Zenyatta, you were more irritated to find that he had really helped you out. You were able to pull on your gloves with only minor problems. Your aches were not as severe any more either. Well, you could have handled that entire meeting better. Lacroix wasn't going to like this.

You verbally transcribed a report, and then saved the file, preferring to send it after you'd met with him. You really weren't up for another dressing down right now.

"Ziv is in Lacroix's office with Amélie, should you wish to join them."

"Was I out of line?" You asked Athena.

There was a long pause. "You were understandably upset. Zenyatta is not like anyone I have ever met. I don't know what to tell you, except I think he is trying to elicit reactions from you, if only to build a thorough profile of your character."

"Do I ever make you feel...lesser?" You asked hesitantly.

"Never," Athena said. "But I am only one entity."

"Yeah, I know." You weren't saying, "I'm not a bigot, my best friend is a "insert minority here." You understood that just because you were good to Athena, didn't mean you were good to other inorganic life. "Sorry. I'm still raw from...everything. I could have reacted better. Just wanted to make sure you were OK."

"I am fine, Lucky. Are you?"

"No," you said. "But that has nothing to do with Zenyatta."
You dragged yourself to Lacroix's office, and knocked. The door opened and before you had a chance to brace yourself, Ziv squeezed you in a bear hug, lifting your feet off the floor. What the hell? When had he gained that much upper body strength? You stiffened and he set you down, a little sheepishly. But one arm stayed over your shoulders, like you'd try to escape if he didn't hold on to you.

"I'm glad you're not dead," he said brusquely, his tone belying the wobbly expression on his face, the wounded look in those amber eyes. "Now stop cutting it so close."

"Good to see you too," you said, meaning it.

"Chanceux, you should still be in bed," Amélie scolded. She patted your cheek. "We were so very worried. And your poor hands..."

You blinked, a little surprised that she knew.

"I visited you yesterday, but you were still pretty out of it," Ziv said, one arm still draped over your shoulder. "Didn't stay very long because Reyes was there looking all rabid and distressed. I wasn't sure if he needed a chew toy or a hug. Either way, I didn't want to be involved."

You glanced over at Lacroix. He had turned off his view screen and watched you with keen eyes.

"Heard I have you to thank for the improved soup," you said.

"I chose to do the most good where I could," he said with a little shrug. "Jack does not approve of the office redecoration, but he left the tomato bisque in place."

Something about that made the inside of your skull itch, but you were too tired to think about it now.

"You really have an ass bordered by noodles," Amélie said brightly.

You looked down at your butt. Was that dick joke?

"It means that you are very fortunate," Lacroix said, a smile tugging at the corner of his mouth.

"...Athena, does it really mean that?" You watched as Amélie giggled into her well-manicured hands.

"Yes, Lucky. She referenced, "avoir le cul bordé de nouilles." Some regional variants of the idiom substitute "anchovies" for "noodles," but it is a colloquial phrase that means "you have very good luck," Athena chimed in and you really weren't sure if she was in on it too, or if this was a real thing.

You glanced at Ziv who looked as skeptical as you felt.

"Well, then...I'm...I have...Noodle Ass. Huh."

"We need to have that tea party to celebrate your safe return," Amélie said, clasping your shoulders. "And we will bring that adorable puppy that Agent McCree rescued. I will get him a little bowtie. He will be so dashing."
"O-K," you said, a little taken aback by her enthusiasm.

"You look exhausted and sound even slower than usual," Ziv said, watching you struggle to process everything. "Maybe you should get a nap. We can talk later."

"Yeah," you said. "Sure." You paused. "Is everything all right?"

"I'm glad to see you," he said out of the corner of his mouth, shoulders slumped, one arm still hugging you. "But now I have to be nice to Reyes..."

This wasn't your smartest idea, in fact, you weren't sure if you were up for it at all. But you that wasn't going to stop you from making questionable choices. Squirming awkwardly, you pulled on one of Gabriel's t-shirts and crawled into his bed. Your clothes folded neatly and put on his dresser. He had new blankets, heavy velvety ones that felt good against your skin. You weren't planning on taking a nap, but nestled against Gabriel's pillow, in his warm bed, the linens smelling like him, you fell asleep.

You awoke to the bed dipping under someone else's weight, and you reached for your tanto, your heart dropping when you remembered it wasn't there any more.

"You OK, baby?" Jack asked flicking on the lights. He leaned against you, wearing just his black fatigues, holsters still on.

The pressure was uncomfortable, but you took a deep breath. "Yeah."

"Tired?"

"A little."

"How's your pain?" He brushed your hair back, watching you like a hawk.

"Manageable. Have some pills on the nightstand. Probably due one."

Jack got you one and a glass of water.

You sat up slowly, wincing. Yeah, you were still sore. It was better than before, but your neck ached. You took your pill, sighing as Jack rubbed your shoulders, his hands warm and firm.

"Hungry?"

"A little."

"Gabriel should be here soon. He's picking up the food." Jack nuzzled your neck. "So you like wearing our clothes?"

You squirmed as Jack's hands slid lower, one on your back, the other resting on your belly. "Tired of losing mine," you said.

Jack chuckled. "It's all right, sweetheart. You can wear our shirts; we don't mind." He tugged on the t-shirt, stretching the collar so he could kiss your bare shoulder. "Did you just want to cuddle tonight? That's fine too." He kept rubbing your back, his mouth hot against your skin. "I know you're sore, so we can't be too enthusiastic..."

You exhaled slowly. "No, I don't just want to cuddle tonight-" Your breath caught as Jack cupped your breasts, his hand gentle as he kneaded the soft flesh.

You leaned over and kissed him hungrily, thighs squeezed together while his tongue darted past your lips.

"You know Gabe's really going to enjoy coming home to us already playing in his bed-" Jack voice was low and pleased.

"You mean he won't be salty that you started without him?" You laughed and Jack's mouth dipped lower, teeth grazing your throat.

"Walking in on him fucking you into his desk was one of the hottest things I've ever seen," Jack growled. "You were making the cutest noises and he was struggling not to just tear you apart right there-"

You ran your fingers through Jack's hair, sighing as he squeezed your breasts through the t-shirt. "Help me get this off-"

"Leave it. Gabe'll like seeing you in his shirt," Jack said. "It'll come off right after." He went lower, pushing the blankets down as he lifted the shirt up, exposing your lacy black panties. He paused, giving you a sly look. "You were prepared."

"Definitely," you agreed, blood running hot. You spread your thighs. "Try not to ruin them."

Jack dragged two fingers along your slit and you raised your hips, heart beating faster. "I'll replace your lingerie. Already put something new on order for you," Jack murmured. "You can wear it on vacation-" His fingers slid underneath the fabric and you moaned as he began to stroke your folds.

"Jack-"

"So wet already?" His voice came out low and harsh. One finger dipped inside you and you cried out. "...and so sensitive. Sweetheart, were you playing with yourself earlier?"

You shivered as Jack watched you, a hungry gleam in his eyes, his smile a little too tense. "Maybe..."

"And you couldn't even wait for us to get back. Didn't realize you needed it so badly. Would have gotten here sooner. Going to have to fill you up and make sure you're taken care of." He pushed two more fingers in and you spread your thighs wider. He bent over you, teeth worrying away at your shoulder. "You're going to have to tell me how rough you want it, baby."

"Still sore," you sighed. "Can't take it too hard, even if that's what I want."

"All right," Jack murmured, pulling out his fingers and licking them individually, his tongue curling around each digit, as he cleaned your slickness off. "Let's get those panties off." He slid them down and you raised your hips. He tossed them on the floor, and parted you legs, pushing your knees up.

You whimpered as he blew on your slit, laying on his stomach between your legs, his calloused fingers ghosting over your clit. He paused, and then swallowed loudly.
"Sweetheart," his voice came out raw. "Is there something you wanted to tell me?" Now that your panties were off, he could see the bright blue plug in your ass, stretching you out for tonight.

"Wanted to be ready for you," you murmured, and Jack lunged forward, kissing you roughly.

"So you've been waiting here like this since you got in?" Jack growled, hands pressing you flat against the bed, his cock rubbing against your thigh. "Such a good girl." He raised one leg over his shoulder, unfastening his pants, his eyes never leaving your face. "I was going to take my time. Be gentle. Keep it slow and sweet, make you feel...appreciated." He paused, lips going down to your throat, where he sucked the skin hard, till you shoved him away, knowing that he'd left a mark. He chuckled as you rubbed the tender skin. "Now I just want to hold you down and give you all the cock you've been craving-"

You kissed him then, worried that if you let him talk, he'd get even more worked up. "Jack-"

"Yes?" He purred, nose to nose with you.

"Just...don't get too carried away, OK?"

His smile tightened, jaw clenching.

"I nearly lost you out there, sweetheart. I really thought I was too late," Jack whispered in your ear. "But then there you were, bruised, and beautiful, and most importantly alive, and telling everyone around us that you love me. You think that doesn't affect me? I'm not "steamed cornmeal on weak ass milk toast," like your little shit of a protégée thinks. You're mine, and you finally admitted it. All in all, I think that deserves a bit of a celebration, don't you?" He kissed you again, clasping your right hand in his, careful not to squeeze too hard.

When he broke the kiss, you were panting and rubbing against his knee, dripping wet. "Jack-" you mewed.

"We both know I'm nowhere near as vanilla as I look," he said, strain creeping into his voice. "But you know I never want to do anything to you that you don't like, right baby?"

"Jack, I'm not worried about that. I just meant if you get too rough, I won't be able to last-"

"And that would be a shame since you went to all that trouble so me and Gabe could both have you tonight. Yeah, you're right." He nuzzled your throat, gently kissing the spot he'd bruised earlier. "I'll be good to you, sweetheart. Just need to be inside you."

He dragged his weeping cockhead along your slit. "Love how you feel around me." He pushed inside you and you nearly arched off the bed, keening as he stretched you out, fingers rubbing your clit. It was all so much more intense with a toy in your asshole and for a moment you didn't recognize your own breathless whimpers.

"Oh fuck-"

"What's wrong, baby? I've barely put it in." The words came out low and excited, his shaft inching deeper, while he held you flat against the bed. He didn't rush, instead keeping his motions agonizingly slow. "Maybe I should have worked that pussy a little harder, you're still so tight-"

"Damnit Jack!" You writhed underneath him, trying to get him to go faster.
"Still not all the way in," he said, brows arched wickedly. "Are you sure you can take all of me?"

"Stop teasing and give it to me!"

"Now who's getting carried away?" He nipped your bottom lip and thrust inside, hips flush against yours. Your mouth dropped open in a perfect "o" and your breath caught in your throat. He raised your leg higher. "All right sweetheart, but remember that you demanded this."

"Want you-" You whined as he began grinding against you, his thrusts shallow, though he stayed sheathed deep, increasing the pressure inside you.

"Touch your clit," he ordered, releasing your hand. "The faster you go, the harder I'll fuck you."

Your fingers were immediately between your thighs, stroking yourself rapidly as your need built.

"Is this what you needed, sweetheart?" Jack gave a low growl and sped up, his smile savage as he found a rhythm that matched your pace.

You moaned, head thrown back against the pillow, eyes fluttering shut as he lifted the t-shirt, his hands squeezing your breasts. You frantically ground against your hand, Jack's cock pistoning smoothly inside you. You slowed down, just to watch him grit his teeth and follow in suit, teeth bared, expression harsh. Lazily, you drew wide circles around your clit, giving Jack a cocky grin. He shot you a feral look, the veins in his arms and neck cording as he strained to keep himself under control. The sight had you clenching and shaking around him.

You kept the leisurely strokes, starting to speed up, then slowing back down. Jack followed your lead and you giggled.

"Do you want me to stop playing nice?" He rasped.

You shook your head. "I like how you're looking at me."

"Like I'm going to stop holding back and fuck you so hard you feel it in your throat? Because I can do that."

You shook your head, smiling. "Behave Jack."

He raised a brow, eyes softening. "I am being very good right now."

"You're very good to me," you sighed and sped back up, Jack's fingers digging into your hips.

"I can do better," he purred, rocking his hips. "You just have to show me what you want."

Biting your lower lip, hips bucking for more friction. Jack moved with you, eyes half-lidded, cheeks flushed. You wanted to do more, You tried to go faster, but your fingers still weren't fully recovered and were starting to ache.

"Jack-" His name came out a plea.

"Yes, sweetheart?" He leaned in mouth hot against your throat.

"My hand...can't," you whimpered in frustration.
Jack's smug look evaporated. "Shit, sorry baby. You looked healed up. I was so distracted, I completely forgot about that." He lifted your hand to his lips, kissing your knuckles. "Don't worry, I'll take care of you." He braced himself over you. "Harder?"

"Please Jack." You wiped the sweat from his brow and he clasped your hand to his cheek.

"Anything you want," he said, eagerly kissing your collarbones. One strong hand slid between your thighs, his fingers continuing the teasing pressure against your sensitized flesh. "Need you so badly, sweetheart," he exhaled in your ear.

"You have me." You shook as he stretched you out, the sensations almost too much. His thick hot length kept stroking in and out of you while his calloused hand fluttered against your clit. And all the while, your ass throbbed, the pressure of being stretched intensifying the entire experience. You groaned, muscles squeezed taut, body rigid as he pushed you closer to the edge. "Jack, if you keep-

"That's it baby, I can feel you shaking. Don't hold back. All this is for you. Come with me," he growled. "I promise I'll take good care of you tonight. Want to hear you scream." He rubbed hard circles around your clit, the friction of his touch and the fullness of his cock finally pushing you to the breaking point. Jack fucked you into Gabriel's mattress, the force of his thrusts making it feel like he was driving the plug deeper inside you. The combination was too much. You were drowning in pleasure, with no brakes and no control over your body.

You arched off the bed, your limbs straining. You clamped down around him, and you could feel your body squeezing both his cock and the toy. He didn't let that stop him. The pressure on your clit just made you thrash harder, but Jack didn't let up.

Your name was a sigh on his lips as he stiffened above you, and a flood of liquid heat pouring inside you.

Breathing hard, Jack rested his forehead against yours. "Don't get too carried away, huh?"

You laughed weakly as he cupped your face, watching his brow furrow in concentration. He pulled out slowly, and you lay there, trying to catch your breath.

The door opened and you both looked up.

Gabriel kicked off his boots, holding a drink carrier and a box of what smelled like tacos. He set the food on the table and slowly made his way over, his nostrils flaring as he saw you spread out on his bed.

His grip tightened on the vibrantly layered red and orange drink in his hand, the straw coated in a brick colored powder.

"Is that mangonada for me?" A sweet, tart, savory, and spicy mix of lime juice, mangos, chamoy sauce, and chili powder, you'd been wondering where Jesse had gotten his. Now you knew.

Gabriel held the tamarind straw up to your lips and you drank, savoring the cool complexity of the drink.

"Honestly Jack, you couldn't wait for me?" He looked between the two of you, eyes dark with lust.

"You're one to talk," Jack groaned, sitting back on his heels. "Came in to find her in your t-shirt, and some lacy panties. Turns out she'd been playing with herself and look at her, Gabe. How was I supposed to resist?"

Gabriel set the drink on the nightstand, a satisfied smile on his face when he saw the t-shirt. His eyes widened as he took in your disheveled state, Jack's cum staining your thighs, and the bright blue silicon toy still inside your other hole.

"Did you-"

"She did it herself, before I got in. Said she wanted to be ready for us."

Gabriel took a deep breath. "Hermosa, I want a turn too." He sat on the bed, lifting his shirt over your head and tossing it on the ground. "You think you can go again?"

"Please papi," you murmured. "I missed you too."

He kissed the skin between your breasts, pausing to nibble on the side of your neck before tracing the shell of your ear with his tongue. "Were you a good girl for Jack?"

"Yes." You shivered as his warm hands cupped your face and kissed you, his beard tickling your skin. "And he was good for me too."

Gabriel raised a brow, glancing over his shoulder. "Is that so?"

Jack just pushed his damp hair out his face, grinning like a fool as he leaned over, cheek pressed against Gabriel's shoulder. "Do I get a reward too, papi?"

Gabriel snorted and leaned over to kiss him. "What do you want, Jackie?"

"All three of us together now. Lucky went through all that trouble to get ready for us; we might as well give her what she wants."

"...Is this how it's going to be?" Amusement tinged Gabriel's words. "The two of you ganging up on me?"

"Oh, so you're going to be in the middle?" You asked innocently.

"Is that what you want?" Gabriel asked, as he tossed his belt on the floor.

"...Maybe later," you sighed, admiring the way his abdominals rippled when he moved. Off came the pants and you could feel the stupid smile on your lips as you watched him bend his knees and flex his heavily muscled thighs.

"You're drooling," Jack said in your ear.

You immediately wiped your mouth, but found it dry.

Jack laughed and you were unsure if you should classify his delight as "cherubic" or "impish." Wait, you knew the answer. It was evil. His amusement was evil. He was evil.

"What's wrong, corazon?"

You looked up.

Gabriel knelt on your other side, one hand slowly fisting his cock. You rose onto your knees, kissing him as he pulled you against him. He was always so much warmer than you, and you embraced him, rubbing yourself against his thighs.

He dropped backward, taking you with him. You lay sprawled across his chest, sucking on his neck as he held you. "You ready?"

Nodding, you sat up, wincing slightly as the plug moved with you. Gingerly, you straddled his hips. Gabriel placed his hands on your waist, steadying but not rushing you. With one palm flat on the bed, you lowered yourself onto his shaft, panting as you took him a few inches at a time.

Gabriel held still, fists clenching and unclenching. Inside you, he was scorching hot, and you closed your eyes, taking a moment to savor just how he fit with you. You shifted forward, your weight on your knees as you stretched across Gabriel's chest, absorbing as much of his heat as you could.

"You done teasing me?" He asked as you focused on breathing.

"It's hard to move with the plug inside," you said.

"You're just going to have to practice," he purred. "Now relax. Jack?"

"Already on it."

You took slow deep breaths as Jack carefully began to withdraw the toy.

"Oh sweetheart, your tight little hole doesn't want to give it up. Going to squeeze my cock like that?"

"Damnit Jack-" You squirmed, but Gabriel held you in place, kissing your cheeks while you panted. Jack slowly pulled toy the rest of the way out.

"You're ready all right..." Then came the familiar soothing coolness of the lube being poured inside you.

Jack kneaded your ass gently, and you could hear him slicking himself up before he began to push.

You flattened yourself against Gabriel, moaning into his chest as Jack stroked your back, kissing the nape of your neck while you clung to Gabriel. Your body still resisted Jack's intrusion, but he started off as slow as before, giving you time to adjust.

Gabriel tilted your chin up, the intensity of his gaze taking you off guard. He covered your mouth with his, the kiss more aggressive and demanding than any words he had spoken. You moaned as he raised his hips, driving deeper inside you, thrusts harder than you expected.

For a moment, you couldn't breathe, and you didn't care. Caught between the two of them, you shivered, nerves alight with heat and pleasure. Spots appeared in your vision, and seconds later, Gabriel released you, panting harshly as he rolled his hips upward, bouncing you between his body and Jack's.

"Gabriel-"

"Love how you say my name," he growled. "Need you so badly right now." He nipped your lower lip, eyes never leaving your face.

"Love you too." The words came out strangled as Jack wrapped one arm around your waist, his body molded against your back. "You and Jack both. Need you both."

"You gotta tell me if it's too much," Gabriel shuddered, peppering your face with kisses. "All right?"

You managed a quick nod, then squealed as Gabriel's tip dragged against your sweet spot, Jack's cock already in you to the hilt. Your toes curled as you tried to separate the sensations, but they had you all twisted up, tension building into tighter and tighter coils. You didn't have the leverage or control to set the pace, but right now you didn't care. You were there with them, like you needed to be. Nothing else was nearly as important.

"Want to fuck you so hard that Jack's coming from it," Gabriel growled in your ear.

"Mmm, maybe you can," Jack purred in your ear. "Love watching her come undone." He nuzzled your neck. "Can feel your cock through her, Gabe. And she certainly feels it too. Look at her shaking. Are you speechless already, sweetheart?"

"Shut up, Jack," you sighed, no heat in your words. "It's Gabriel's turn."

"If you just wanted to hear papi talk, all you had to do was ask," Jack gripped your hips. "Or are you trying to wind me up?"

"Trying to go easy on you." Gabriel squeezed your breasts, tongue flicking out to lick your nipples.

"You don't have to." You ran your fingers along his jaw and he sucked in a sharp breath. "Jack, you do. For the moment."

"So bossy," Jack laughed, but he kissed the skin between your shoulder blades, sending shivers down your spine.

"Think that once I start pounding you, Jack's going to have to keep the pace." Gabriel gritted his teeth. "That what you want?"

"You just kissed me like you needed me more than air-"

"Forty eight hours ago, I thought you were dead," he rasped, and everyone froze. "We both did. No one said it, but that's the goddamn truth."

Jack's grip on you tightened, but he didn't deny Gabriel's statement.

"Oh." Your voice was small. "I'm-"

"I know it's not your fault." Pain twisted Gabriel's face, and he shut his eyes. "Just got a lot of pent up-"

You kissed him lightly. "Same."

There was a pause as he pushed your hair back. He stared at your face for a long moment, nose to nose with you. "You don't get to leave us like that," he said sharply. "One day you might decide to walk away. And it will break my goddamn heart. But not like that, corazón." The ferocity in his voice surprised you, though his grip on your arms stayed gentle.

"I'm sorry," you said weakly. "I didn't want to go anywhere. Back when I was trapped in that cave, I just...I wanted to be home, in bed with both of you. But I couldn't dwell on it. The thought of never seeing you again—" Your voice broke and suddenly Jack's arms were around you, and Gabriel was kissing you like he could draw the grief from your lungs.

When he released you, your eyes were watering and you took deep shaky breaths. Neither man moved, though they stayed in place, anchoring you.

"Going to grant your wish. You're not leaving my room tomorrow," Gabriel growled in your ear. "You understand? You get to spend the day in bed and before you complain about getting "bored," I'll clarify that Jack and I are going to keep you plenty occupied. Got that, baby?"

"Yes, sir," you said, corners of your mouth lifting.

"Are you that confused already? Going to call me, "papi" next, sweetheart?" Jack teased, hands squeezing your breasts.

"Shut up, Jack," Gabriel said, reaching over your shoulder to ruffle Jack's hair.

"...Just want to feel you both. To know I did make it out of there. That I'm home again," you exhaled, the confession raw and deep.

Gabriel snapped his hips upward and you gave a cry of surprise.

Jack growled, and just like that, the conversation was over.

You clung to Gabriel, head thrown back as he kissed the side of your neck, his cock stretching you wide, filling you in tandem with Jack. They both worked in unison, leaving you briefly empty and aching for them, before sheathing themselves back inside you. Gabriel bottomed out against your cervix, while Jack didn't face any limits, his length so far inside you that he knocked the air from your lungs.

You clawed at Gabriel's arms and chest, swearing as Jack pulled your hair, turning your head to the side so he could kiss you too. They buried themselves in you, giving their all, taking everything, and not letting go.

You had no control and you didn't care. You took them, sobbing their names, begging for them, though you couldn't form complete sentences. It didn't matter. They understood what you needed.

Secure between them, you writhed as they kept a matching rhythm. You could clearly hear the slick sounds of them sliding in and out of you. Jack rambling as he drew closer to his own release, alternating between sweet and filthy words. Gabriel ground against you, almost silent as he focused on you, that desperate look on his face speaking clearly of fear, relief, and need. You kissed him frantically, trying to chase the shadows from his eyes.

They were too much you. You came violently, your orgasm rippling outward, and dragging them deeper inside you. Jack gripped your waist with bruising force. Gabriel sunk his teeth into your shoulder, and you moaned, trembling between them, so overwhelmed that your limbs did not respond to your basic commands.

Laying limp between them, your breath hitched as Gabriel reached over you to kiss Jack. Your body was slick with sweat and other fluids.

You sniffled, cheek resting against Gabriel's collarbone. Your heart beat wildly, and you closed your eyes, just memorizing the feel of them.

Gabriel massaged your shoulders and you lifted your head, managing a lopsided smile. His face was still lined with sorrow and worry, but he hugged you to him, and you felt him twitch inside you.

"Tell me to stop. Tell me you're sore. Tell me you're too tired," he growled in your ear.

"No," you said, your tone firm, your expression gentle. "No, no, and no."

"Stubborn idiot," he said, kissing the top of your head. "Guess I'll have to try harder."

Gabriel carried you to the shower, while Jack changed the sheets. Your limbs weighed too much, and you could barely hold your head up, but you were content.

"Stay awake," he murmured. "Don't want you to drown."

"In the shower?" You managed a laugh.

"With the way your luck runs? It's a real fear."

You yawned. "You wouldn't let me drown, Gabriel. Even if I tilted my head back and fell asleep with my mouth open."

"No, but I might be tempted to put something in there."

"Oh, I really might choke to death-"

"I was thinking a few drops of body wash ought to teach you-"

You smacked his arm and he laughed. Gabriel held you against his chest and you luxuriated under the hot water, jaw slack and eyes closed. He set you on the tiles gently, and massaged your legs, frowning at the bruises already forming on your thighs.

"I told you to keep going," you said.

"I know," he said gruffly. "Just...you're still healing from your ordeal. I don't like hindering that."

You kissed his nose, grinning as he grumbled under his breath. Once you were done, he dried you off, his motions slow and methodical. A lot of this you could do yourself, but letting Gabriel do it for you was...nice.

"Do you want to eat?" He asked as he lifted you up.

"Definitely hungry," you said, head lolling against him. "Don't know if I can stay awake though."

Gabriel brought you out and set you in the clean bed. Jack gave you a quick kiss before heading to the shower. And Gabriel held the straw for the mangonada to your lips. You gulped it down, the tart and sweet drink almost a shock to your system. Somewhat refreshed, you opened your eyes.

"New taco truck started up downtown. It's passably authentic," Gabriel said. "Asked them to come out here for a day, and they did pretty well." He set the boxes of tacos on the night stand, and retrieved some plates for the now cold food.

"I noticed. You took Jesse a mangonada this morning," you said with a mock scowl.

"...I didn't," Gabriel said then paused. "But Ana had a few..."

You blinked.

Jack emerged from the bathroom, naked, his skin very pink, his smile sleepy.

"Tacos and cuddles, now," he demanded, curling up beside you.

You managed to summon the strength to fold a blanket over him. "You are a taco. And now I will cuddle you," you said, and rolled onto him.

"Now we are a taco supreme," Jack said.

"What does that even mean?" You wondered aloud.

"It means Hoosier still thinks Taco Bell is real Mexican food," Gabriel said in disgust. "And there's no point in wasting this food on his lack of taste."

"But Gabe-" Jack whined, "trapped" underneath you. "I was kidding!"

"And your sloppy ass can go sit on the couch to eat. I am not sleeping in tortilla crumbs again," Gabriel said sharply.

"But Gabe-"

Laughing, you sprawled across Jack and kissed the back of his neck, knowing full well that Gabriel wasn't actually going to make him move.

Chapter End Notes

I've been slightly homicidal this week. The stress of last week (OMG MY DOG) has wore on my nerves and work is...well, you know how I feel.

Behind again, though I'll try to power through. Cousin's birthday involved a lot of socializing. Which is exhausting.

So much fluff. Cutting it with angst, but look at all this fluff! It sticks to everything...
Chapter 71

Chapter Summary

Sometimes you need a few days for things to sink in.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Everything was too quiet. And here in the dark, that was a bad sign. You flinched, wondering if Daniels had finally stopped breathing. You were afraid to check. But then you had Jesse to worry about, and Távio. You weren't losing another squadmate, damnit.

You sat straight up, inhaling sharply as you opened your eyes. The lights were dim, but on, and you blinked a few times, knowing you were somewhere safe, but your sleepy brain delayed in processing the sudden shift in locations.

You glanced around, recognizing the bed and the furniture. Gabriel's quarters. His bed. You inhaled slowly, your mind catching up with your body. You'd been rescued. Your memories of the past 48 hours flooded back and you dropped flat on your back.

The bed creaked as Gabriel sat down beside you.

"You all right?" He asked, voice soft.

"Was disoriented," you said, rubbing your eyes.

"Bad dreams?"

"...Wasn't sure where I was," you opened your eyes, sighing as Gabriel reclined beside you. "I'm OK."

"Didn't mean to leave you," Gabriel murmured. "Jack had to take to step out to take a call. And I went to check on him."

"I'm fine," you said, a little embarrassed.

Gabriel shook his head, face drawn in weariness. "You think I don't recognize that waking gasp? Even if I didn't know about your nightmares, I've had plenty of my own."

You shrugged, leaning against him as he rubbed your back. "It wasn't bad. Just thought I was back in that hole. Worried that everyone else was...already dead." You focused on a piece of fuzz on the blanket, determined not to sound shaken. Your hands didn't hurt as much, and the emitter was running on the other side of the bed.

Gabriel kissed your bare shoulder. "Want to talk about it?"

"Yeah, in a minute. I had some stuff to tell Jack anyway," you said, thinking of Rodriguez's body heavy against yours, his voice slurring as he faded away. You bit down hard, squeezing your eyes shut. You couldn't talk about everything. Not yet. But he needed to know about Rodriguez.
And maybe you needed to say something about Chey and Forrester.

The door opened, and Jack stepped back inside, still dressed down in black fatigues. He glared at his phone, his lips curled in a snarl. "Is it my imagination," he growled. "Or is Andre Graziani getting more fucking annoying every time I talk to him?" The anger in Jack's voice surprised you.

"Andre's always been an ass," Gabriel sighed. "But I think he resents your promotion more than most."

"Andre never liked me," Jack said with a shrug. His expression softened when he looked at you. "Sorry, sweetheart. Had to finish calling some people about Mateo."

You flinched.

Jack crawled onto the bed and lay his head in your lap. "Hey, no one's blaming you, except maybe you."

"Andre's blaming you, Jack, isn't he?" Gabriel asked, not sounding the least bit surprised.

"...In a lot more words, yeah." Jack sighed. "Managed to throw some more conspiracy theories at me. I might as well take credit for everything from the JFK assassination to the Omnic Crisis."

"He's always been an ass about authority figures," Gabriel said, patting Jack's chest. "I'll handle him."

"Good, he likes you," Jack muttered.

"How's Chang?" You asked.

Jack exhaled. "Hard to say. I gave her the news, she nodded, thanked me for telling her, and promptly cut the connection. She's coming in for the funeral. A lot of people liked Mateo. Don't know if you'll see this many SEP vets in one place ever again." He rolled onto his back, staring up at your face. "Sorry, baby. I didn't mean to drop this on you while you were waking up."

You shrugged. "Had some heavy shit to share anyway."

Gabriel kissed your head. "Want some coffee first?" It was a rhetorical question; he was already off the bed and moving.

"Yeah," you said. "Thank you."

Jack scooted up, resting his head on the pillow next to yours. Worry creased his brow. He opened his mouth, then shut it, and began to rub your arm.

Gabriel sat down beside you, holding a travel mug and a plate of croissants. You took one, and had a bite and a sip of coffee, giving yourself a moment to collect your thoughts.

"...I left some stuff out of the official report," you said.

Jack frowned.

"Nothing mission-related, just private stuff," you added quickly. You closed your eyes, remembering how Rodriguez tried to wake you, talking about empanadas. You had no trouble recalling the conversation in verbatim. So you started from where you woke up on the beach, and ended on his last words.

"Shh, it's OK," you said, matching his gentle cadence, trying not to think of his strangely peaceful face and failing. "It'll be OK." He had been bleeding out onto you then. "Doesn't even hurt..." He was almost gone at that point. "Never hurts when I'm with you, Ray." you said, voice a dry whisper. "And that was it." You stared at your knees and drank your coffee, but didn't taste it.

Gabriel stayed quiet.

Jack closed his eyes and rubbed his forehead.

"I didn't think she'd want that in the official report. I don't even know if she wants to know..." You shook your head. "I'm sorry."

"No, thanks for being discrete," Jack said hoarsely. "I don't know if Ray wants to know either, but...you made the right call."

That wasn't what he was originally going to say. But you didn't question it. You just reached over Gabriel and set your empty cup on the nightstand. You wanted a cigarette, but knew better than to smoke indoors. Instead, you wiggled back under the blankets, still sandwiched between your lovers.

"The funeral is later this week," Jack said. "It'll be the last one out of them all. Wanted to give everyone time to get here." He didn't look at you. "We're at thirteen right now. Nejem's squad had no survivors, except for the dog."

"I'll be there. For all of them," you said, realizing that it was time to get a dress uniform. You exhaled slowly. Well, you were on med leave, you had the time. You weren't sure if you would be able to attach the ribbons and medals that sat in your bottom drawer. Maybe you could skip them.

"I will too," Gabriel reached over to rub Jack's cheek.

"We'll leave for vacation next week," Jack told you. "After this, I think we'll need it." He took a shaky breath and closed his eyes.

You hugged him, and he clutched you against his chest, fingers digging into your back.

Gabriel slipped under the covers, one arm around your waist, the other gripping Jack's hand.

The three of you stayed like that for a long time.

True to his word, Gabriel kept you in his bed, under the healing rays of the emitter. You cuddled and dozed, trying very hard not to think about things just yet. Exhaustion made it easy to sleep. Jack had to leave a few times to manage operational issues, but each time he returned quickly, and you didn't miss the way he looked for you when he got back, like maybe you'd disappear just because he left.

Gabriel worked remotely, but refused to let you use a tablet. Instead, he turned on a cooking show, and alternated between cursing his subordinates (some of which deserved it, others not so much), and holding easy conversation with you about things the two of you could make. You were itching to try replicating those ribs you'd brought back from Shanghai. But Gabriel seemed strangely fascinated with the smoked peach, habanero, and moscato preserves they were making on the show.

"So where did you say we were going?" You asked, casually, resting your chin on his shoulder.

"I didn't." Gabriel didn't look up from his work.

"Oh, well, do I need to bring-"

"All taken care of," he said.

You frowned. "Scuba gear? Hot weather clothes? Bathing suits?" He'd said Vanuatu before, but you weren't sure if he meant it or not.

"Bold, yet naive of you to assume that you'll be wearing clothes," Gabriel purred, tweaking your nose.

You rolled your eyes. "You're hilarious. But seriously, should I-"

"Relax and let us handle it? Yes," he said with a smirk.

"But Jack-"

"Has me and Athena double-checking his work. It'll be fine."

"Can I help?"

"Nope," he said smugly. "Everything's done."

"You're making me nervous!" You scowled.

"You trust us, corazon?" Gabriel asked, tone innocent, smile anything but.

"You guys are jerks."

"Such an ingrate," he laughed, kissing your nose.

"Is it just...us?"

"We'll have some extra security in the area," he said. "But they're scheduled as reserves, not active duty. Athena will be handling the perimeter. And she's under strict orders not to tell you a thing."

"...What?"

"Don't think I don't know how the two of you chat."

You gave a huff of frustration, a little irritated that your secret "source" had been compromised. The fact Gabriel had turned his considerable black ops training into planning a goddamn vacation meant that you would have a very slim chance of getting straight information out of anyone. You could try accessing some of his meta data, but that any overt tracking of commanding officers got flagged pretty quickly. Though maybe Ziv could...
"You just can't handle surprises," he said, looking completely unbothered by your displeasure and your scheming.

He wasn't exactly wrong, and you shrugged. "Guess not." Considering you were just used to bad surprises now, everyone should expect that.

"Hmm, looks like some of your friends are asking after you. Your "Távio" included," Gabriel said. "Jesse's handling them. Don't worry about it today."

"Not you too. He's not mine." You rolled your eyes, knowing full well that he was trying to distract you and partially succeeding.

"So you don't mind if Jack sends him to Antarctica?"

"Gabriel!"

He snickered, hand over his heart. "Steamed cornmeal on weak ass milk toast." Jack's still sulking about that."

"I did not keep that idiot alive so that Jack could ship him out-" You snarled.

Gabriel just laughed harder.

You slid down under the covers, glaring sideways at him.

"So grumpy," he purred, setting aside his tablet and pulling the blankets back. "It's a good thing I know exactly how to cheer you up..."

The taco truck was back again today, and you picked up two cups of mangonada and several fish tacos before you went to visit Távio and Daniels.

Daniels was in the ICU, and still unconscious. In the bright hospital lights she looked different than you thought. But then, your view of her had been obscured by blood, dust, and darkness. She was smaller than you remembered with short brown hair and very tan skin. She was close to your age, and you knew nothing about her.

"Hey, Daniels. Nadine. Whatever you prefer." You cleared your throat. "You can wake up any time. I meant what I said back in Greece. Your mission is to stay alive, and while you obviously haven't failed it yet, you're just kind of cruising. I really expect more effort from Overwatch agents, you know?"

There was, predictably, no response.

"You don't even have to go to the funerals. Yeah, they're going to suck, but you have a medical exemption. We're up to thirteen now, counting both Rodriguez and Nejem's squads. It's going really to suck," you trailed off, not likeing the memories of your previous stays. "Don't make it fourteen, OK?"

You walked out briskly, making your way to Távio's room. You weren't sure why he hadn't been discharged yet, and since you weren't in his chain of command, you weren't privy to the information.
He sat in bed, staring at the wall, the flowers drooping on the bedside table. He blinked when he saw you. "Ma'am."

"Távio," you said.

There other bed was unoccupied still. Which was good; you preferred privacy. You pulled up a chair and unpacked the tacos and set a mangonada on the table beside him.

"Some of the others have been by," he said. "Got some frantic messages from Jeong and Lowell. Not sure what to say. Jeong and Forrester were kind of close."

"Honestly, there's nothing you can say that won't hurt. Your best bet is to choose the way that hurts everyone the least."

Távio brushed his curls out of his face. "Thought you'd be by, yesterday. But Agent McCree said you needed rest."

"Literally, stayed in bed all day," you said. "...Still not a hundred percent, but I hate sleeping in the infirmary. Spent too much time here already. You shrugged. "Nothing against Dr. Ziegler and her staff; they're great," you added quickly.

"Who's that guy you hang out with? The hacker with the 'fro? Like...he's come by a few times, peeked in, grunted, and walked back out. What's his deal?"

You sighed, rested your face in your hand, and blew out a breath. "He's friends with Jesse too."

Távio gave you a long skeptical look, and you groaned inwardly. "There are a few Blackwatch agents monitoring your progress," you said, deciding to take the professional route and not start cursing Ziv's awkwardness. "I've had more than one inquiry about how you'd fit in various units."

The boy just shrugged, not looking nearly as excited as you expected.

"...But I haven't accomplished anything yet," Távio said. "That last mission, I just kept my head down, got knocked out, and had to be rescued by you."

"You survived," you said. "That's always a win."

He stared at his lap, then flinched. "Thank you, ma'am. I don't mean to sound ungrateful, I just...I thought I'd be more help than that. If anything, I got Chey killed."

"You did no such thing," you said sharply.

"It was me or him, and you saved me instead of him," Távio said. "Not that I'm saying it's your fault, ma'am-"

You handed him the mangonada. "Shut up and drink this. That's an order."

He blinked and obediently took the cup.

"My arm was broken. Chey outweighed you by quite a bit, and he was down a leg. Even if you weren't there, there was no guarantee I could have gotten him to safety in time." And you took a deep breath, realizing no one had given him the whole story. "Chey told me to take you. He was hurt bad, more than just the leg, and he chose to stay behind. I don't know what passed between the two of you, but it wasn't done out of obligation and it wasn't just expedience. He liked you. Blaming yourself misses the whole point of Chey's decision. He knew what he was doing and he wanted you to survive."

Távio shuddered, and took a deep slurp of the drink, not looking at you.

"If you have to blame anyone, you can blame me for not fighting him harder on it. But it's not on you, and it never was."

Távio sat there. "...I don't know."

"It's a lot to process." You leaned back in the chair. "I can recommend a good counselor."

Távio blinked, his lip curling. "I'm not crazy. I don't need-"

"I see one from time to time."

He stared at you, like he didn't quite believe it. "But you're..." He didn't finish the sentence, just set his drink down and shook his head. "Why?"

"That's awfully private," you said with a snort. "There are a lot of reasons, but I guess mainly because I've seen a lot of terrible things and buried too many people. It messes with your head. Sometimes I need help straightening out my thoughts because I'm too close to see that they're not...healthy."

Despite his shock, Távio was quick. "Chey isn't your fault. If you'd saved him instead of me, you'd be feeling just as guilty and missing my better-looking face," he patted his cheeks.

You laughed softly.

"And I...see what you're saying. Chey isn't my fault either. It's the fucking omnics that killed him. But...it doesn't feel that way."

"You got it," you said. "You handed him a fish taco. "And you have to tell yourself that about a few hundred times before it finally starts to sink in. Honestly, it's kind of ridiculous how dense we can be."

Távio opened his mouth, looking like he wanted to ask more, and then just shoved half the taco in, crunching down on the corn tortilla, crispy fried fish, shredded cabbage, and a spiced lime-cilantro krema.

You slurped your mangonada, watched him eat the taco in two bites. He stared at the paper wrap for a moment, as if puzzled by the sudden disappearance of his food. You handed him another taco,

"Where'd you get these?" He sighed with pleasure. "The food here isn't...bad. But it's kind of bland."

"New taco place opened up. Commander Reyes recommended it." You took one for yourself. "Personally, I'm looking forward to forgetting what ration bars taste like. Hint: they always taste like dirt, partially because I'm sure that's a main ingredient, and also because you eat them in the field where you can't wash your hands..."

"I don't remember everything that happened," he said. "I'm sorry I wasn't more help." He shot a look at your hands.
"We were all a mess. You did what you could. We made it out, so there's no point beating yourself up."

He took another taco. "I...didn't say anything embarrassing back there, did I?"

You very diplomatically shoved the rest of the taco in your mouth and gave yourself a moment to think. He would be terribly embarrassed if you were completely honest with him. "Nothing I think you should feel self conscious about," you said, unsure if he remembered what he said about Jack or your rather blatant declaration.

There was an awkward moment of silence. "I...uh...don't remember," he said biting his lip, eyes downcast. "Should I?"

You kept your face blank. "That's up to you. I said some things I'd like kept private. So whatever you recall, I'll ask that you be discrete about what you repeat."

He nodded vigorously. "I want to join Blackwatch. Of course, I understand discretion."

"All right then," you said.

"But I have one question, completely off the record, I'm sorry if it's too personal."

"Oh boy," was all you said.

"Who is "Shin?"

Your eyes widened briefly and you set your drink down. "...Why do you ask?"

There was an odd pause. "I...heard you mention him was all," he murmured, not making eye contact. "...Never mind. It's not my business. I'm sorry."

You exhaled slowly, hands balling into fists. "Shin was another agent. We were together till he died," you said, and it didn't hurt as much as you expected.

"Oh." Távio looked away. "I'm sorry."

You took a long drink of mangonada, washing down the words and the discomfort in your throat. "...I wasn't shouting his name at the rocks, was I?"

"No, no, nothing like that," Távio said. "It was nothing. Really." He spoke fast, words running together. "I'm sorry. I know that stuff's private. I won't mention it again."

You wondered if you had mumbled Shin's name in your restless sleep. Perhaps you said Jack and Gabriel's names too. You didn't think you did much talking in your sleep, but you wouldn't know. You would have to ask.

"Umm...thanks for the food, and the company." Távio rubbed the back of his neck. "I uh...should probably let you go. I know you're a busy person."

You hesitated, unsure if you should ask more. "It's no trouble. I'm on med leave too. Am I tiring you out?"

"Not at all!" He said quickly. "I'm really glad you came to visit. It's...boring here."

"I know," you said.
He reached for another taco. "So, did you mean it when you said you'd make me some of that karaage? Agent McCree kept talking about it while he was here. Made me really hungry."

Your lips quirked. "Yeah. I'll make some for you and Jesse. Daniels too if she ever wakes up."

"She might be a vegetarian, you know," he said. "But if that's the case, I'll eat her share."

---

Tataryn and the fish torpedo were waiting for you when you left the infirmary.

You groaned, remembering then that it wasn't just rogue omnis that wanted to kill you.

"I'm off duty and sticking to socializing with people," you said. "Though I have to go see Lacroix next." You weren't looking forward to that talk.

"We can just walk with you," Tataryn beamed. "I'm just a nondescript Blackwatch agent out walking my friendly drone."

You elbowed him as you passed, shaking your head.

"I am not following you," he continued, and you could hear the evil delight in his voice. "We are just coincidentally heading in the same direction. Imagine that..."

"It is a lovely day, Fedya," Athena said brightly.

"With a lovely view," Tataryn said, and you knew he was staring at your ass.

"Lucky does have nice hair," Athena said.

"Lucky has a lot of nice parts."

"Like her personality!" Athena chirped.

"And her legs."

"So very good for running!" Athena added, her cheer sounding a little desperate.

You blew out a breath, ignoring Tataryn's narrations the entire way, Athena trying very hard to keep the banter wholesome. It was actually a relief to step into Lacroix's office and shut the door.

Lacroix sat at his desk, frowning at his viewscreen.

"All right. I'm here. Let's have it." You sank down in the chair, waiting for the cutting remarks about your social skills to start.

"Letting Kwento visit us overtly might have been mistake," he sighed, not looking up. "Someone took a shot at her today in Geneva: she's fine, but the chatter about plots has more than doubled. Talon mostly, but also known Petras collaborators. Do you know Sakai in InSec?"

"Not really," you said, processing what Lacroix was telling you. Hell no. Kwento had to live, if only because you'd already put all this damn work into courting her. You were not collecting the bad karma for Spinshot. No fucking way. "Why?"

"She's one of Petras' informants, probably not the one who tried to kill you, she was off-site for the period of time between Lyon and your discovery. But she is one of the agents Athena monitors."

You blinked. "How many informants and/or moles have you dug up?"

"I have two dozen people under surveillance now, though I doubt that's all of them." Lacroix shook his head. "Amélie is reviewing the records, sorting them by culpability. Some of them are completely unwitting - people Petras chats with when he comes in, getting gossip and background information. Mostly, they're just pleased to be helping the director out. Others are a lot less innocent, and those are the ones I'm focusing on. Anyway, Sakai is part of the latter group. Don't know if her family has ties to the Shimada, but she's definitely sending regular reports back to Petras. Some of them mention you."

"...Huh."

Lacroix nodded. "Indeed. Nothing groundbreaking though. Your personal life and secrets are safe for now."

"Great," you said, not sounding the least bit enthusiastic. "What are we going to do about Kwento?"

"I'm monitoring the situation," he said, not looking up.

"OK." You frowned. That could mean a lot of things. From personal involvement to deciding Kwento wasn't worth taking the heat for. You weren't sure how you felt about that.

"Interesting exchange with Zenyatta," he said and you stiffened.

"...I tried." You glared at the desk.

"Yes, I can see that." Lacroix opened his cigarette case and lit a Gitanes. "He was baiting you, Chanceux."

"It worked." You rubbed your forehead. "Sorry."

"I would have done things differently, and honestly, you could have done a better job of keeping your temper in check." He shrugged. "But given the circumstances, your reaction was not unreasonable and milder than I expected."

You blinked as he held out his cigarette case. You fumbled to grab one before he drew them back. He waited with an amused expression, then offered you a light. You took it, your hands still not fully recovered.

"Athena was right. He is trying to goad you into revealing things. What? I am not sure. This goes beyond your role as a "mole." But I can tell you this, Zenyatta is the type that wishes to offer you redemption, and now that you've portrayed yourself as a complex, if flawed, individual, he will most likely pursue that option. Watching him work will be most intriguing."

"...What does that even mean? Because it sounds like I'm going to be your social guinea pig. And that's a terrible idea."
"I don't think Zenyatta is any danger to you, physically," Lacroix said. "Though it would be a mistake to underestimate his combat skills."

"Has he asked you about the fate of traitors or something?"

"He has inquired about amnesty in a roundabout fashion." Lacroix gave you a shrewd smile. "He thinks in strange angles. I rather enjoy our conversations."

You blew out a lungful of smoke and easily pictured Lacroix and Zenyatta sitting casually at a table, conspiring against you in little ways, looking polite and calm the entire time. You shuddered. You weren't fooled by their "dignified" appearances.

"I'm sure the next time you speak, Zenyatta will apologize again for being so insensitive. Just like you will apologize for losing your temper." Lacroix's tone was light and easy, but the order was unmistakable.

"Yeah," you said. "I figured."

"What do you think he is really after?" Lacroix asked, folding his hands.

"I'm not sure. I think there might be a few things. But if he's trying to convert me, he's going about it all wrong. Other than that, I don't know. I don't get what he's angling for. I know he's doing a lot of research on me. Wouldn't it just be easier to out me to one of the brass if thinks I'm a mole or a danger to Overwatch?"

"He still might," Lacroix said. "If he wasn't so sure Gabriel would take you out back and dispose of you himself."

You blinked, unable to picture that at all.

"Kwento knows what has happened to some of our traitors. I'm sure she has shared that information with him."

You just nodded.

"He, or maybe Kwento, wants something from you very badly. But he isn't trying to get you killed or put you at risk yet. I find that interesting, don't you?"

You weren't sure if "interesting" was the right word. But it gave you something to think on.

You did your best to keep a low profile, despite the fact one of Athena's drones now followed you everywhere. She had smaller models, discrete ones the size of songbirds, but this fish torpedo was armed, and you strongly suspected that Jack and Gabriel had been conspiring with her.

Apparently, Daniels was a well-liked pilot. Having been the one to carry Daniels to "safety," and then rescuing and adopting an adorable dog to boot, Jesse was getting quite a lot of positive attention from the blues. It was good: he deserved recognition, and you knew from experience that Jesse did not get to be the "good guy" enough.

Távio was out of the infirmary. The crash had done some damage to one of his eyes, but Angela had fixed him up pretty well. He was still on med-leave, and you found yourself checking in on him periodically. He was back in the Overwatch barracks now, awaiting a new assignment.

Jesse had snuck Bandit into his quarters, and while the dog had chewed up some of his gear, Bandit wasn't barking or drawing unwanted attention. You were positive that Gabriel knew about it, but he was ignoring it for now.

You hadn't slept alone since you returned. Tonight the three of you were staying in Jack's quarters. The funerals started tomorrow, and while you had acquired your dress uniform, you weren't sure you could attach any of your service ribbons or commendations. And to be honest, you still weren't sure how you felt about them.

Letting yourself into Jack's room, your eyes widened as you saw Gabriel sitting on the couch, his sewing kit on the coffee table, a dress shirt folded neatly beside it. Jack divvied up bowls of takeout pasta: it looked like fettuccini with alfredo sauce, shrimp, and a generous mix of vegetables so everyone could pretend like it was a healthy meal. You kicked off your shoes and dismissed Athena, setting the unmanned drone on a chair by the door.

"Look at you homemakers," you sighed, leaning over the couch to kiss Gabriel on the cheek. You froze when your eyes fell on his work. "...Gabriel?"

"Yes, corazon?" He didn't look up, just continued to attach the ribbon bars, amusement clear in his voice.

"...Where did you find those?" You stared at the ribbons and medals that he was affixing to your new dress uniform.

He paused. "Your bottom drawer. I think I got all of them. Athena gave me a catalogue of your awards." He looked up. "Figured you wouldn't be up for doing this yourself."

You glanced at Jack. He handed you a large bowl of pasta and you took it. Though you trusted Gabriel with...everything, you still didn't like the idea of someone going through your things without permission.

You sat down on the couch, on the far side from Gabriel, unsure of what to say.

Jack sat between you, leaning over to kiss you. "If you're going to wear the dress uniform, you should wear your commendations, sweetheart. You earned them. If you've forgotten what they're for, we can go over them-"

You shrugged. "I don't like looking at them."

There was a moment of silence.

"Ah." Jack nodded. "Fair."

Gabriel didn't stop till the ribbons and medals were all in place. "Not even the ones you got for saving Lacroix?"

"Definitely not those. And which time?" You scowled. "Because I regret that on a daily basis."

"How about for saving that civilian in the day spa? And there's the one you got for rescuing Mihret. Hell, I'm pretty sure you got one for retrieving Agent Lao too." You knew that. Just like you knew you had awards for "saving" Jack on occasions like Cobblestone Dust, Spinshot, and I Need Coffee. And there were several others, some of them run of the mill like "years of service" or "sniper qualified." Others were more specialized, and a lot of those, you didn't like to think about. They weren't all here, some being classified as "sensitive" and put in cold storage.

You shook your head, because you knew what they were trying to say. You just didn't agree.

"Jack, I think we both know that she doesn't see them as recognition for the good she's done. She sees them as reminders of the times she's failed, at least in her mind." Gabriel looked up, his expression severe. "And that's just not true."

"For...reasons, it would be best if you did wear them," Jack said. "At least to Mateo's funeral."

"OK," you said. "Thanks." You ate your pasta quietly and then got ready for bed, already dreading the series of funerals. You didn't know how Jack did it. He was a better person than you.

You went to bed first, taking the side closest to the door. They'd been putting you in the middle lately, but tonight your skin felt wrong and you just curled up under the blankets, trying to slow your heart rate.

You could hear Jack and Gabriel talking in hushed tones in the other room. But you burrowed under the pillow and forced yourself to ignore them.

Recognition didn't mean anything. Gabriel was right. You couldn't think of the day spa and not think of Marta and the rest of the murdered civilians. You couldn't think of the Ninth Circle and not remember losing everyone. You didn't deserve a goddamn medal for saving Lao, because you'd been months behind, and really, that's just what you did for your people. Maybe you did deserve a few awards for saving Ziv and Lacroix though, if only because they were awful. You'd had to exhibit copious amounts of patience to keep from killing them yourself.

You didn't want to think about whatever commendations they would try to give you for Greece. You didn't want them. You wanted Chey, Forrester, Rodriguez, and the rest of them alive. You wanted that mission to be a boring waste of your time. You wanted this all to be a bad dream. Squeezing your eyes shut, you tried to blank your mind and fall asleep.

Shin and Captain Patel were just beyond the rocks. All you had to do was keep digging. They were depending on you. Your chest ached, and your hands were stiff and sore. You couldn't get your prostheses to respond. So you clawed helplessly at the stones, knowing that they would suffocate soon, with their little dog Dasri, and goddamnit, you were the only one who could save them. Sobbing angrily, you pounded your fists against the rocks, too weak to move them.

"It hurts. And it should always hurt," Lao said, her voice soft in your ear. "You waited too long and you've let everyone down."

You sat straight up, hand on your chest, your heart beating too hard against your ribcage.

You blinked, as Jack stirred beside you. You were in Jack's room. Captain Patel and Shin were long dead. Bandit was fine. And Lao? Well, Lao hated you, but she was alive. You took a deep shuddering breath.
"You OK?" Jack yawned, his voice still heavy with sleep.

You took a second to recover your voice. "Fine," you said a little breathless. "I'm fine."

"OK," Jack murmured, throwing one arm around your waist. "Want me to-"

"I have to go to the bathroom," you said, sliding away from him.

"Mmm." He grunted, a little disappointed. "OK." You watched him roll over and spoon Gabriel.

Taking a deep breath you grabbed your clothes and headed to the bathroom, giving yourself a once over as you dressed and made your hair look manageable. The clock said 2:46 AM, and you splashed water on your face, your skin crawling, your nerves shot. You wouldn't be able to go back to sleep now. And you didn't want to wake your lovers. Hands shaking, you grabbed your cigarettes, and quietly slipped out of the room.

Mind a little hazy, your feet guided you to the elevator. You stood there, forcing yourself to breathe slowly. Insides raw, you hit the button for the roof and rested your forehead against the wall.

It was just a dream. But that helplessness, that frustration, that guilt, all that was real enough. You wiped your eyes and got off the elevator, going up the access stairs.

"Lucky?"

"Yes, Athena?"

"You seem to be distressed."

"I just need some fresh air and a cigarette."

There was a pause. "But the roof is-

You snorted. "I'm not Bayan. I just need to clear my head. Roof was the closest spot."

"You're not supposed to smoke outside designated areas," Athena said hesitantly.

Growling, you went out the door. "Don't care right now."

The night air was still cool, though it was becoming summer. The moon was full and you stared at it for a moment. You found a spot beside the access point and crouched down, sticking a Gitanes in your mouth and then flicking open your lighter. It took a few tries, the wind up here was fierce, but you got it lit and slumped against the wall.

You needed to go to the memorial wall tomorrow. Before the funeral. You would burn incense. You would pour whiskey. You would mumble a thanks to Captain Patel’s personal version of Durga. You would do all these little rituals that were meant to absolve you of your guilt and grief, and maybe they would work, if only for a little while. Then you would go to the funerals, and you would face the scrutiny of your peers.

You were on your third cigarette when the door opened. You froze, reaching for your tanto, only to remember that it was gone. Swallowing, you listened to the heavy footsteps and wondered if one of Petras’ people had seen an opportunity in your solitude.

"There you are," Gabriel said, voice rough. He stood there in the moonlight, still in pajama pants and his hoodie. He'd left off the hat and his hair was sleep-mussed.

You took a deep breath and bit down on the cigarette.

Gabriel came over to the wall, and stood beside you, back against the wall. "Those things are terrible for you." He sounded disapproving, more so than Jack, and that surprised you a little.

You shrugged. Your hands weren't shaking any more.

"Bad dreams?" He asked.

"Yeah." You finished your cigarette and set the butt next to the other two. You would toss them in the trash on the way back down.

"Want to talk about it?"

"Not really," you said.

Gabriel narrowed his eyes. "You're upset with me."

You shrugged, not wanting to sound ungrateful and unreasonable, but also not wishing to be dishonest.

"Is it just the ribbon bars?"

"Mostly."

He grunted. "And?"

"Didn't like you digging through my stuff either," you said with a sigh and took another cigarette. Sure, they grabbed you clothes from time to time, but this was different. This was more invasive.

Gabriel nodded. "All right. That's fair. I'm sorry."

"I know you were doing me a favor. I just-"

"I get it, corazon. Boundaries. I'm sorry." He sighed heavily. "I'll ask in the future."

You nodded. "OK."

He glanced down at you. "Can I hug you?"

"Need a minute," you said, chest tight.

"...It's not just the ribbons. It's what I said earlier," he mused. "Going this long without a dress uniform is unusual. Not the record, I think that's Vo, but you've been actively avoiding it."

You shrugged.

He crouched down beside you, shoulders not quite touching yours. "I'm sorry. I didn't think it would bother you this much."

"It's not all about you," you scowled. "The funerals. The dead. It's all interconnected."

Gabriel reached over, one hand resting gently on the back of your neck. "It's finally sunk in, has it?"
"Yeah." The word came out dry and brittle.

"...What did you dream of?"

You studied your bare hands. Your fingernails were growing back faster than expected. And while you wouldn't be lifting anything with your left arm for another week, it didn't hurt as much.

You took a deep breath and then you told him about your nightmares, which weren't so much terrifying as heartbreaking. Then, hesitantly, because maybe there needed to be context, you told Gabriel about what you saw alone in the cave. You didn't tell him everything, because some parts still hurt too much, but you told him about Captain Patel, Shin, and traces of Rivka. You admitted that you started digging where they told you, but that didn't mean a thing because it was a sensible spot and your subconscious knew that.

But seeing them, hearing them, having them so close only to lose them again... That shattered your heart.

And when you were done, you buried your face in your knees and sniffled. "I know it wasn't real," you said. "But part of me wishes it was. And part of me can't handle the idea that they're gone again. Which is stupid because-

"You're never going to stop missing them," Gabriel said, his voice distant. "But I'm glad you understand that they would be proud of you. And maybe," he patted the top of your head. "Maybe it wasn't all in your mind."

You blinked. "Gabriel, you don't need to pretend -"

He shrugged. "There are lots of different takes on the afterlife. I think it would make sense if you had a couple people looking out for you, especially given all the shit you get into. But I understand, there's no proof. Believe what you want, corazon, but there's no shame in hoping that the people you love aren't completely gone. Not everything needs an explanation."

You laughed sharply. "Yeah, OK."

"You have shown me a strange image, and they are strange prisoners. Like ourselves, I replied; and they see only their own shadows, or the shadows of one another, which the fire throws on the opposite wall of the cave?" His delivery was rich and sonorous, and he was obviously quoting something.

You blinked. "Yeah, that was lost on me."

Gabriel chuckled. "It wasn't bad, seeing them again, was it? Even if it wasn't real."

"No," you choked out. "It wasn't bad."

"Do you still feel like you let them down? Or is it more the grief of loss?"

You wiped your eyes, and Gabriel kissed the top of your head, his hands soothing on your shoulders. "I...think I'll always feel a little guilty. And it will always hurt that they're gone. But...yeah, seeing them and then losing them again, that's what stings."

Gabriel smiled at you, like he knew something you didn't. Which was fair. He knew lots of things you didn't.
You raised a brow.

"That will get better, corazon. I promise." He sighed heavily. "You ready to come back inside?"

"Yeah." You looked wistfully at your cigarettes. "I guess."

"...You really shouldn't smoke." Gabriel clucked his tongue. "I don't care how many nanotech filters they've installed and what kind of genetically modded tobacco they're using~"

You yawned and stood up. "Let's go."

Gabriel frowned at you. "I'm serious."

"Boundaries, Gabriel. You only get to try to fix one of my problems at a time. The rest of them are mine," you said as he rose, giving you the "Commander Reyes is going to snap you in half" look. It wasn't quite as effective when he was in his pajamas, having just been cuddling you a few minutes ago.

You opened the access door to find Jack leaning against the wall, his concerned expression disrupted by a yawn. He reached over and flicked you between the eyes. "Just going to the bathroom, huh?"

"I did go to the bathroom," you scowled.

"Up here? Eww." He laughed as you pushed past him, shaking your head. He followed close behind. "Feeling better?"

"There wasn't any toilet paper."

Laughing harder, Jack caught you around the waist, before you could exit the stairwell, and kissed the top of your head. "I'm sorry you're feeling bad. I'll make you hot chocolate when we get back to the room, OK?"

"...That'd be nice," you said, some of the tension seeping out of your shoulders as he held you. "You know, I didn't want to disturb you two-"

"I was awake," Gabriel said, shutting the access door.

"I was expecting you to come back and stick your cold hands under my shirt," Jack murmured. "And I was disappointed when you didn't."

Gabriel snorted. "Come on, let's go back. We have a long day ahead of us."

You lay sprawled out in Jack's bed, sipping hot chocolate, and trying to overlook the fact he used water and not milk. There were mini-marshmallows bobbing in your cup, and you were back in the middle, Jack's head on your chest, Gabriel's arm under your neck.

"Thanks for taking care of the uniform," you said. "I guess if I'm wearing it, I won't be looking at all the decorations."

"It's not just that, corazon. I can look at a man in dress uniform and tell you where and how long he's served, what he's accomplished, and from that, I can guess just much you can trust him in battle. They tell a story. And even if you can't give the details about your missions, the rest of Overwatch should recognize your mettle."
"I'm happier when they don't notice-"

"It's too late for that," Gabriel said. "You started getting attention during Cobblestone Dust. Spinshot, the terrorist attack in Zurich, and your teaching position all increased your profile. And now, given everything that happened? You're very visible within Overwatch. There's no point in downplaying it any more."

You grumbled, knowing he was right, and that it would make your espionage duties more difficult. You blew out a breath as Jack kissed your collarbones.

"Personally, I think you'll just look extra sexy in uniform."

You rolled your eyes. His mind would go there.

"Gabriel even ironed your pants. Knife-sharp pleats. I bet if you ask nicely, he'll do your hair too.

You snorted. But Gabriel was the best stylist out of all of you. You drained the rest of your drink and Gabriel set the cup on the night stand.

"Thank you," you said, kissing him.

He chuckled. "You're welcome. Now get some sleep. You're awful when you're tired."

Chapter End Notes

This week has been really unproductive on the writing side. But then it's been stressful stupid problems: House is a mess. AC is won't turn on. Lawnmower is keeps dying. Garage door is possessed. Sinuses are gross. My brain is broken... Individually these are minor issues, but it's been like "If one more thing goes wrong..." And then two more things go wrong and I'm like "!!!!!!" FREAK OUT AND BREAK THINGS! (OK, so I don't actually freak out and break things. I just sit there and silently panic while telling everyone "Yes, everything is fine. This is fine. I am fine." It's really an overreaction, and don't I know it!
Chapter 72

Chapter Summary

Food, friendship, and funerals.

Chapter Notes

We're coming up on 8 months. Yeesh guys.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It wasn't quite like dressing up for a formal occasion. You stood there in a navy blue uniform, white shirt, and black tie, the material scratchy, the cloth free of wrinkles. Gabriel had tied your tie, and helped you pin your hair back.

You made faces in Jack's mirror while Gabriel helped Jack straighten his tie and arrange his hair. You put on your gloves and reached for your tanto.

Sighing, you dropped your hand, and debated taking Gabriel up on his offer for his knife. The grip was different, and while it was a good solid knife, the weight and balance just didn't feel right in your hands. You would have to go dagger shopping soon. Maybe Genji and Hanzo would come.

You thought about that for a moment, picturing Hanzo wrinkling his nose and saying, "You're going to choose that one?" Never mind. You weren't going to invite Hanzo. Tataryn was good with knives, but he liked them smaller, more flexible, stilettos rather than daggers. Jesse would be fun to take along, though he might not be very helpful.

"You look beautiful and Jack can't wait to jump you. Now come on, we need to get moving!" Gabriel yelled from the doorway.

Sidearm holstered discretely against your chest, your lips quirked upward. You grabbed your hat - it was a silly hat - and followed Jack and Gabriel out of the room.

The first few funerals were for Nejem's squad. You didn't know any of them very well, but you stayed at Gabriel's side, ignoring the stares and whispers as you walked down the aisle. Maybe your hat was on crooked. No, Gabriel would have told you to fix it. You kept your eyes straight ahead, expression stony.

Jesse sidled up to you, also in a somewhat wrinkled dress uniform, Bandit on a leash beside him. Gabriel raised a brow, but said nothing. Jesse sat down and held his cowboy hat over his chest, giving you a long look.
"Is there something on my face?" You asked out of the corner of your mouth.

"You sure got a lot of color, sweetpea. Didn't realize how many doodads you'd picked up." He squinted at you. "I think you may have more than I do..." He lowered his hat, displaying his own decorations. You had more on your chest, but who could say how many of his were still in cold storage and still highly classified? You recognized some of his, though you didn't have Gabriel's fluency in reading other people's service history.

"Yeah, because your missions go according to plan and don't have random bullshit ruining them."

Jesse covered his mouth. Bandit came over and sat on your foot, wagging his stubby tail. The service hadn't started yet, so you reached down and scratched his head, then quickly straightened up.

Rein and Ana took their seats by Jack. Lacroix showed up too, Zenyatta in tow. You bit the inside of your cheek, and then checked to see if you were wearing pants, just to make sure you weren't having a nightmare.

Távio, in a uniform that didn't fit him quite right, walked briskly up the aisle, and immediately took the seat next to Jesse. Technically, there wasn't a seating arrangement, but the officers sat closer to the front. He hunched over, not making eye contact with anyone.

"You know, you could have just asked us to save you a seat," Jesse said. Bandit leaned over to sniff Távio's shoe.

Távio gave a sheepish smile. "Sorry. I thought I'd know more people." He froze when he saw Gabriel looking at him, like he hadn't noticed this was the Blackwatch row. "Uh...sir." He saluted, lips drawn back in a panicked smile.

"Maeda Vargas," Gabriel said.

Távio's smile widened, though he looked more terrified than happy. He worked his jaw a few times, but no words came out.

"You're right," Gabriel said to you after a few seconds. "Much better than the other one." Gabriel faced forward and Távio stared at him, mouth hanging open in awe.

Jesse elbowed you, one hand covering his mouth.

You shook your head, also facing forward. You were sure you'd hear more about this later.

Chey's funeral drew the sparsest crowd. He had no family that Overwatch could find, and he had not exactly gone out of his way to make friends. Of course, Shoal, Tataryn, Jesse, and Távio still attended. You didn't have enough stories to tell about him, making the memorial feel incomplete.

But Jack was up there in front of the banner-draped coffin, awarding Chey posthumous honors, for holding the line, for helping you save Távio, and maybe just for spiting his killers in true petty Blackwatch fashion. It was a grim service, Jack trying to soften it with words about sacrifice, camaraderie, and brotherly love.

After the funeral, Távio disappeared, declining invitations to drink with you and the other instructors.

He messaged you later that night to ask which counselor you recommended.

Forrester's funeral was the worst. Her parents were there, looking stricken and brittle as they viewed their daughter's coffin. You wanted to avoid them, because you knew from experience that nothing you did or said could make it better. Words didn't fix heartbreak. But you, Jesse, and Távio still paid your respects to them. And while they didn't come out and say, "Why her? Why not you?" when you shook their hands and gave your regrets, you could feel the question hanging in the air between you and the accusation in their eyes. You had no good answers.

Tataryn and Shoal had an easier time of it. Forrester had apparently written letters home, and mentioned both of them extensively. Maybe she had talked about Jesse, you, and Távio too, but that was overshadowed by her death and your proximity to it. Tataryn and Shoal stepped up, giving Forrester's parents some measure of comfort by sharing their recollections of her.

Your survivors' trio bowed out as soon as possible. The three of you went out for a drink or six, and you retreated to Gabriel's room as soon as you could get away.

"So Commander Reyes knows who I am..." Távio said hesitantly. He chopped the garlic while you mixed the sugar, sherry, and soy sauce. Jesse sat at the table pouring tea for everyone, Bandit sat politely under the chair. You didn't mind that he was in the kitchen, though Jesse had agreed to keep him from getting underfoot. All that boiling oil could be dangerous.

"Of course he knows who you are," Jesse said. "You're one of those cadets who nearly blew up the training field."

Távio winced. "Uh..."

"And he was there for the rescue and retrieval," you said, stirring the chopped chicken thighs into the bowl. You had bought extra skins from the butcher. The rice was in the cooker. Jesse and Távio were getting a meal and then you'd make another batch for Jack and Gabriel. Távio was going to have to help you tie on the skins, but you were managing.

Jesse made tea, grinning as he waited for the inevitable question.

"What did he mean by "better than the other one?" Távio asked.

You sighed, prepping the dredging stations and starting the oil. "Jesse, can you get those croquettes out of the freezer?"

"Oh, do you have the potato curry ones or the crab cream corn ones?" Jesse perked up, peeking into the freezer.

"Both."

"You're the best. Wait, are these store-bought, not handmade?"

You held up your healing arm and your middle finger, still using your right arm to work.

Jesse just laughed. "I ain't complaining, sugarpie. I appreciate it. You making that fancy clear clam soup too?"

"No, Jesse you specifically asked for karaage and rice." You glared at him over your shoulder.

Jesse flashed you an easy smile. "Aww, come on..."

"I don't have any of the stuff," you scowled. "It's not like I've had a chance to go shopping lately!"

"But I thought you were going to make it up to me," Jesse rested his chin on his hands, trying to make sad puppy dog eyes and failing because he kept snickering.

"Jesse McCree, if you keep pushing me-"

"Where did you learn to cook this stuff, ma'am?" Távio asked quickly.

"Shin," you said, not looking up from seasoning the rice flour. There was a moment of silence and you glanced over your shoulder. Jesse looked a little surprised that you'd answered honestly. But Távio nodded solemnly. "And you don't have to call me "ma'am," any more."

"Sorry, ma'am." He paused. "Habit ma- just habit."

"So polite. Never expected you'd be such a straight shooter," Jesse said, grinning at Távio. "Always thought you were more of a rebel."

"I am," Távio scowled. "I just know better than to cross Agent Strike."

You rolled your eyes upward.

"What did you do to them, honeycakes?" Jesse asked, snickering.

You shrugged, and checked the oil. You dropped a few croquettes in, watching the panko-coated patties bubble.

There was a knock on the doorframe and Ziv stepped in, narrowing his eyes when he saw Távio wrapping the chicken.

"I brought vegetables and prawns," he said brusquely. "If you're doing tempura."

You sighed, knowing you would smell like oil for the rest of the day. Still, everyone needed vegetables, even if you were deep frying them. "Yeah, but you have to chop them."

"I know that," Ziv said, glaring at the back of Távio's head.

Jesse's grin just widened, and he had to pull his hat low before Ziv noticed.
"At least Genji, Hanzo, and Vo are off-site. If they knew you were making karaage, we'd have a fight on our hands," Jesse said.

"Whatever, you can just set Reyes' rabid ass on them," Ziv snapped.

Beside you, Távio stiffened.

"Ziv," you said in warning tones.

He grumbled something under his breath and took the vegetables to the sink. He'd brought sweet potatoes, broccoli, mushrooms, and asparagus. You iced the water and then mixed up the tempura batter.

"You've met Agent Ziv Mihret, haven't you?" Jesse asked Távio, his amusement very clear.

"I've seen him around," Távio said, more diplomatic than you expected. But he knew where he fell in the hierarchy. Ziv had seniority. You wondered how long the deference would last.

Jesse continued. "Ziv this is-

"I know," Ziv said, and retrieved a cutting board and knife.

You cleared your throat.

"Would you like some tea?" Jesse asked, eating up the drama.

"Sure," you said.

"Yeah," Ziv said.

"Uh, yes...please," Távio said, carefully.

"Anyway, this is the "other one" you asked about," Jesse said to Távio as he handed him a cup of tea.

You nearly facepalmed, but Ziv didn't notice, just sulking as he chopped vegetables.

"When are you going to Shanghai again?" Jesse asked.

You shrugged. "Genji's actually in charge of this social excursion."

"Genji?" Ziv asked incredulously. "As in Genji "I'm Too Cool to Sweat" Shimada? He's in charge of the social calendar?"

Jesse looked uncertain. "Really?"

"Yes," you said, like it was completely natural. "Hanzo wants to visit again and Feng is always happy to have guests. You guys want to come or something?"

"No thanks, Zhai Feng is creepy," Ziv said.

"You're friends with Zhai Feng? The tech heiress? The alleged Triad Boss? The one that was on the cover of Time Magazine? Like, you know her?" Távio perked up.

"...Alleged?" Ziv asked, giving you and Jesse sharp looks.

"Ziv, maybe you should just be more discrete," you said.
"Wait, is he cleared for Blackwatch shit or not? And does he know about-"

"No," you and Jesse said in unison.

"But he was-"

"Mihret!" Jesse laughed. "Shut up."

Ziv glared at you all. "So you're just hanging out with the kid not telling him shit? What the hell?"

"Ziv, there are these things called "security clearances" and "compartmentalized intelligence." It's not personal, it's work."

"He'll find out soon enough with the way you carry on-" Ziv scowled.

You and Jesse exchanged looks. Ziv was the one with the big mouth.

"Should I...go?" Távio asked looking rapidly between the three of you. He was going to be dizzy and nursing a bad case of whiplash if he kept this up.

"No, I have to make two big batches of karaage, I'm down a hand, and I need all the help I can get," you said.

"Two big batches?" Jesse teased.

"You, Ziv, and Távio get one and-"

"He's "Távio" now?" Ziv nearly shouted.

"Ziv, relax. You'll always be her number one sidekick, if only because no one else will put up with your bullshit!" Jesse said playfully.

Ziv glared at him. "Don't you start with me, dime store cowboy! I will share your browser history with Captain-"

"For fuck's sake, Mihret, we can be social without blabbing everything to everyone. You need to learn to keep your mouth shut," Jesse growled.

"Number one sidekick?" Távio asked you.

"Ziv is part of the espionage team I'm on," you said.

"Who's your number two sidekick?" Távio asked, glancing discretely at Jesse.

You sighed, tempted to say "Tataryn" or "Athena." But Távio wasn't cleared for any of that. Maybe this had been a mistake.

"I don't have sidekicks," you said, shaking your head. "Ziv, you're cutting those mushrooms too thin. You can just halve them. And Távio, don't forget to dredge the chicken twice, once before you wrap it, and once after."

Ziv rolled his eyes, but adjusted his technique, and Távio obediently went back and gave the wrapped chicken a second dredging.

Jesse just watched you with a shit-eating grin on his face. He held up two fingers, gleefully mouthing "sidekicks" at you.

You shook your head in exasperation and started pulling the crispy golden croquettes out of the oil.

"Minions then?" Jesse wondered aloud.

Ziv threw Bandit a piece of broccoli. The dog gobbled it down.

"Hey! Is that safe to feed my dog?"

"Yeah," Ziv scowled. "Don't you know anything? Dogs are omnivores. No onions, grapes, or chocolate. But he can eat broccoli."

"Yeah, but it will probably give him gas. Enjoy your farting dog."

You turned around to see Gabriel lingering in the doorway, his grin sharp.

Ziv muttered something impolite under his breath and Távio stiffened beside you.

"Any of that for me?"

"Second batch."

Gabriel frowned.

"I promised Jesse and Távio some back in Greece." You blew out a breath, as Ziv coughed meaningfully. "And Ziv is helping me out too."

"All right," Gabriel said, his tone amused. "I'll see you later then."

Jesse sat at the table, looking far too pleased. Ziv started dipping the vegetables and prawns in the tempura batter, surlier than before. Távio had a calculating look on his face, glancing between you and Ziv, then you and the empty doorway.

You weren't sure what conclusions he was drawing from all this, and to be honest, you didn't think his imagination could be more outlandish than the truth.

"That was...really good," Távio groaned, slumped facedown on the table.

"Yeah." Ziv leaned back in his chair, staring blankly at the ceiling.

"I can't move..." Jesse rubbed his belly, having unbuckled his belt to loosen his pants. Even Bandit looked extra bloated, and you were pretty sure you'd told Jesse not to feed the dog so much fried food. Oh well, you didn't have clean up after him.

You had the second batch of karaage done, and you smelled like oil. You'd managed to save some tempura and dipping sauce, along with a few croquettes. The second batch of rice was almost done, and you'd packed the karaage away.

There were quite a few dishes in the sink and you were too tired to think about them.
Instead you finished securing the food payload and checked your messages to see where your men were at. You had one message from Jack.

Ray's here. We're in my quarters.

You messaged back that you were done and would up be up shortly. Then you sighed, wondering how you were going to get all that food upstairs unnoticed with only one arm. Your current companions had a serious case of the itis and you doubted you could get them to move.

"You almost done?" Gabriel asked gruffly from the doorway and you nearly jumped.

"I'm ready," you said, gesturing to the multiple containers. "How'd you get here so fast-" You gave Gabriel a skeptical look. "You haven't been...hanging out there waiting for your serving, have you?"

Gabriel gave you a thin smile. "Not at all. Just telling busybodies like Tataryn and Wilhelm that you were busy, there was nothing to see here, and that they could find their own damn dinner."

Shaking your head, you grinned as Gabriel picked up the rice cooker and the chicken. You took the rest of the food, leaving Ziv, Távio, and Jesse in their food comas.

"Chang's here," Gabriel said. "Jack's talking with her about how it went down. Figured she wouldn't want me there."

"That's probably for the best," you said.

"Jack's probably going to invite her to stay for dinner," Gabriel grumbled.

You smiled and had to resist the urge to pat him on the back in public.

The two of you took the long route, Gabriel focused on the food, while you kept an eye on potential witnesses. People were used to seeing you with Commander Reyes. You were his assistant after all. But it would raise eyebrows if the two of you were seen hanging around the Strike Commander's quarters.

"Maeda Vargas seems to be fitting in," Gabriel said as you entered the officer quarters.

"Ziv's not happy," you said.

"Mihret's just jealous," Gabriel said. "Because he's an immature, insecure, petty little-"

"Mmm, Ziv fits right in. After all, petty is a Blackwatch trait," you said entering the code for Jack's quarters.

Gabriel did not look amused. He opened the door, and kicked off his shoes. You followed.

Chang sat on the floor drinking a beer, an untouched slice of cake on the table. She was out of uniform, in a black tanktop and jeans, her expression flat, her shoulders tensing when she saw Gabriel. Jack was in sweats, sitting on the couch. He grinned when he saw you, his smile growing wider when he saw the food.

"Chang," Gabriel said with a nod, his tone not quite as needling as you remembered.

"Reyes." There was no warmth in her voice, but then Chang was not a very...outgoing person. "I can leave now-"
"You should stay," Jack said brightly. "Have dinner with us."

Chang looked at you, dispassionate as a shark.

"I made käraage, rice, tempura, and the croquettes are store-bought, but my arm's still fucked up, so sorry."

"Thank you," she said, still staring at your face, her expression never changing. You weren't entirely sure what she was expecting.

You and Gabriel unpacked the food while Jack grabbed everyone more beers.

"This stuff is great," Jack sighed, reaching over to grab a piece of chicken. "Apparently, several Blackwatch agents will beg, barter, steal, and fight for it. Not that I blame them..." Jack trailed off, crunching happily.

Gabriel got out the disposable plates and passed them around.

You dropped onto the couch, groaning softly as Jack rubbed the back of your neck.

"Thanks for cooking," Chang said, though she had not tasted anything yet. She was watching Gabriel out of the corner of her eye, like she expected trouble.

"Relax, Chang. I'm not going to pick a fight now," Gabriel said, piling käraage onto his plate. "Unless you try to take my food. Then I'll fuck you up."

Chang's answering smile was savage. "You'll try."

Jack just rolled his eyes. "Ray, eat your food. Gabe, behave. Lucky, if you don't get yourself some food, there won't be any left."

You'd munched while cooking, because that was your right as the cook, and really, you had to make sure everything tasted right. You made a small plate, and leaned against Jack. Gabriel dropped a tempura prawn on your plate.

"You're going to make Chang suspicious if you don't eat more," Gabriel said.

Chang gave him a hard side eye.

"I made a full meal of this stuff for some of the other agents," you explained, because that reaction was not out of character. "I've been eating and cooking all day."

"I have no reason to distrust, Strike," Chang said, gazing blandly at Gabriel. "Even if that isn't her real name and she's a sneaky, underhanded, Blackwatch agent."

You nearly choked on your rice.

"That was a compliment," Jack said, a small smile playing on his lips.

"I uh...Thanks?"

"No, thank you for being...circumspect about Mateo," Chang said, not looking up from her plate. She took a few pieces of käraage, but focused on the tempura.

You realized then that Jack had told her then. "You're welcome," you said, though that sounded wrong. "I'm...sorry about how everything played out."
"It wasn't the kind of thing you could control," Chang said and took a bite of sweet potato.

"Yeah," you said, no longer surprised by her abruptness. "Still sucks."

"Yes." Chang stared at her plate for a solid minute. "The food is good," she said, tone still flat, though lacking any signs of dishonesty.

"Thank you."

Gabriel didn't even try to make small talk, he just filled his plate and ate, which was probably the best thing he could do.

Jack alternated between dropping food on your plate and making sure everyone had a drinks. You started pushing it onto Gabriel's plate. Gabriel just took it, looking content, if not happy.

"Michael and Maggie asked me to bring you things," Chang said, she didn't look at Gabriel. "I have packages for you in my bags. I'll get them later."

"Thank you," you said.

It was a more awkward dinner than you had been prepared for, but not as bad you expected. Gabriel kept his comments to a minimum, and Chang was obviously trying to be polite, even if she was bad at it. And Jack was just so weirdly happy, probably because Chang and Gabriel weren't fighting. You didn't know how to read the situation. Instead, you ate your food, stole that cake off the table, and curled up on the couch between your lovers.

There were a lot more prayers, tears, and laughter than you were accustomed to seeing at an Overwatch funeral. Rodriguez had a large family: parents, aunts, uncles, siblings, cousins, nephews and nieces. The entire family had not made it to Zurich, but there were about two dozen of them here, talking, crying, and hugging everyone. They weren't solemn or quiet. They told jokes and invited everyone to the wake afterward, having arranged special permission to use the cafeteria kitchen. It was obvious that Rodriguez had been well-loved. And at points, you and Jesse both had look away, though he clapped you on the back too hard and you rested a hand on his shoulder. Blackwatch agents did not have funerals like this.

Rodriguez lay under a thin shroud, a white candle burning in each corner of his casket. Because of the circumstances, he had not received a traditional velorio. After this service, his remains would be returned to Fairfax, Virginia, and buried in the family plot.

You counted almost two dozen people who looked SEP: impressive physiques, battle scars, good posture. Some of them were in Overwatch, like Chang. Others came in US Army uniform. A few just wore suits. Jack, Gabriel, and the Rodriguez family sat in the front. To your surprise, Chang stayed close to you, like maybe you could protect her from random hugs. Jesse and Távio were your funeral companions now, and they sat in your row too, Távio shooting questioning looks at Chang and Jesse looking very uncomfortable, though you couldn't tell if it was the ceremony, the company, or both.

There was singing, a Catholic mass, and a goddamn slide show: Rodriguez had been a photogenic guy from birth through adulthood. And after Jack made his formal speech, detailing the Wolf of Santiago's unclassified exploits - and there were many - he talked about Mateo, his friend. He spoke of long nights in a foxhole, and how Rodriguez's jokes and light-hearted observations made the time pass quicker. Voice thick with emotion, he talked about a battle where Rodriguez had literally thrown several grenades back at the enemy, his battlecry, "Nobatterbatterbatter!" Jack shrugged at the ridiculousness of the baseball taunt, his smile sad.

"And..." Jack took a deep breath. "I don't want to tell this story. But long before I was the Strike Commander, I was just "Morrison," another dumb grunt in the field. And Mateo made me promise, if I was at his funeral, that I would tell this story." Jack shook his head. "For the record, I hate this story and Mateo's a jerk for making me do this."

There was a smattering of laughter, but even more people leaned forward in their seats. Jesse perked up and you raised a brow. Chang just sighed.

Jack shook his head, obviously reluctant to start.

"Quit stalling, Morrison!" Gabriel shouted, and you covered your mouth with your hand.

"I lost a bet," Jack said, closing his eyes. "Or Mateo beat my score in a training exercise. I don't remember how it happened. But I ended up press ganged into one of his crazy schemes." Jack rested his face in his palm. "All I had to do, he said, was help him get this one girl's attention." Beside you, Chang stiffened. "Easy right? Mateo didn't have trouble getting attention, romantic or otherwise. But this situation was different. This girl was well aware of Mateo's reputation and quite possibly immune to his sweet talking. We spent a week trying to soften her up. We tried a lot of things: flowers, desserts, serenades, and there was the flaming piñata, which wasn't supposed to catch fire, but accidents happen-"

Chang buried her face in one hand.

"It was bad. Really bad. Every time I tried to help Mateo do something...romantic, it just failed." Jack sighed. "So eventually, this lady has had enough. She called us out in front of the entire squad, and proceeded to tell me all the reasons she why wouldn't date my oblivious ass. And I am obligated to share some of those reasons: we don't have the time to hear the entire list, suffice to say, that was fifteen minutes of scathing trauma that I have yet to recover from." Jack cleared his throat.

"She didn't like fruitcake, which at the time I didn't understand was viewed more as an insult or a death threat, than a courting gift. My singing was compared to a hemorrhaging donkey in its death throes. I was obviously an idiot, because who sets a piñata on fire and ruins all that candy? And the invitation to Waffle House was not appreciated, because it was broad daylight and she wasn't drunk," Jack sighed. "Then she sympathized with Mateo for having such a moron for a friend-" Jack shook his head. "And they had dinner that later night. I'm pretty sure Mateo could have asked her out on his own, without putting me through all that, but...he thought it was funnier this way. And Mateo appreciated a good story."

Chang relaxed, and you wondered if this story was about someone else, or if she was just relieved he left her name off it.

Afterward, numerous relatives got up at the podium and told raucous stories about Rodriguez, how he'd set the woodshed ablaze with homemade fireworks, or made armor for his chickens, or gotten caught pretending he was his own twin while seeing three different girls.

It was at the end of the service, after the speeches, the awards, the hymns, and the praying that you started to relax. Which was a mistake.
A tall, well-muscled woman US Army dress uniform stalked up to Chang. Her wavy brown hair was up in a bun, and she had very broad shoulders. Her features were sturdy and honest, and you suspected she was bad at lying. She towered over Chang, frowning at your entire row, and for a moment you were worried.

"Leah," Chang said standing up.

"Ray." Leah crossed her arms. "You could have sat with us, you know."

Chang shrugged. "I just followed Lucky over. Wasn't thinking too hard about...anything besides getting here." Chang's words were stilted, in her usual monotone, her discomfort obvious. And it clicked then, that even if she couldn't love Rodriguez the way he wanted, he had been important to her.

Leah's harsh expression crumpled, and suddenly she was hugging Chang, "I'm sorry, Ray! I-I-" She began to bawl, and Chang sighed, reaching out delicately to pat Leah's back three times, before ducking out of the hug at with shocking speed. "Oh, you hate being- Oh shit!" Leah shook her head. "I'm sorry!"

Chang shrugged, like she was used to Leah's emotional outbursts. "I know, you can't help yourself."

Leah sniffled, but didn't seem offended. "Sorry," she repeated. "I just...I didn't think it would be him-"

Chang nodded, shoulders lowered. "I know."

"He was so- It's not right!"

"I know," Chang said.

"Yeah. Yeah. I know you do. I just- I'm bad at saying the right thing," Leah mumbled. "We'll drink later. Andre's over there, and Lucy came, and so did Blue, and Reyes still owes me a bottle of scotch."

"Yeah," Chang said, voice raspy. "Gotta make it through the wake first." She took a deep breath. "Have you met Lucky?"

Leah blinked. "This is the one...?"

You stiffened, knowing Távio and Jesse were listening closely.

"Yeah," Chang said.

Leah squinted at you, giving you a once over. "Not what I expected."

You blinked. "Better? Worse? Shorter?"

"You're not...high maintenance," Leah said. "But I only met the one..."

You shrugged. "I've heard stories."

"She was all bedroom eyes, breathy whispers, and innuendo till you wanted to gag," Leah said with a scowl. "Yeah, she was pretty, but-"

"Ears," Chang said.
Leah blinked. "Yeah, you're right." She looked at Jesse and Távio. "So you guys knew Mateo?"

"He was my new CO," Távio murmured, eyes darting between Leah and Chang.

"Lucky and me were just along to...help," Jesse said. He stared up at sky. "Wish I could've done more."

"After the crash. Agent McCree got the pilot, Daniels, and Agent Strike dragged me to shelter," Távio said quickly, like he expected accusations.

"There's not much anyone without shielding can do directly against an OR-14 plasma blade," Leah said. She crossed her arms. "We've seen the official report. Knowing the Strike Commander has some benefits."

Chang snorted.

"Gotta warn you, Andre is out of sorts-" Leah said.

"When isn't he?" Chang asked, not actually looking interested.

Everyone fell silent as a woman stopped at your row. She wasn't very tall, but she wore a long black dress, her handsome face lined with grief, her long black hair streaked with gray.

"Tía Elena," Chang said, her voice soft.

"It's good to see you again," Rodriguez's mother said, her jaw trembling. "How are you holding up, mijita?"

To your surprise, Chang bent over and hugged Rodriguez's mother. Leah gaped as Chang gently patted the older woman's back. "Reciban mis condolencias. Les acompaño en el sentimiento," Chang murmured, her accent flawless.

Rodriguez's mother hugged her tighter, sniffling against Chang's chest. "¡Ay! Ray-" She trailed off in a flurry of Spanish, Chang responding fluidly.

Leah watched, her eyes wide and she glanced at you, clearly telegraphing, "Are you seeing this? Is this happening for real?"

Rodriguez's mother drew back a little, taking a shuddering breath. "You have to be careful, Ray. I know you are tough, but I still worry about you. You will come visit us when you get a chance?"

"Of course, Tía Elena," Chang said.

"And bring Jack and Gabriel. They work too hard-" Rodriguez's mother wiped her eyes. "You all work too hard, You're still so young. You need to take time for yourselves. Mateo always said he would but-" She broke down then, clinging to Chang, and you half expected Chang to pull one of her ninja escapes, but she stood there, carefully stroking the older woman's hair, her motions very deliberate. Like she had to focus extra hard on being comforting, though her stare did not lose its raptor-like intensity.

"Maybe we should give them a moment," Leah said, backing up, her eyes still on the scene.
"Good idea," you said, looking away. Jesse and Távio had already stepped to the side.

"Wasn't expecting..." Leah shook her head. "Well."

"Chang's not as tough as she pretends," Gabriel said, leaning over your shoulder to clasp Leah's hand.

"Big talk from the guy who's had her break both his arms."

"And my nose, and my knee, and an ankle, I think..." Gabriel shrugged. "I gave as good as I got."

Távio looked between Gabriel and Chang, his expression slightly horrified.

"Don't be fooled by her slight build. Chang's the top-rated melee fighter in SEP," Leah said, noticing his face. "She's not as big as Reyes or Morrison, but she's quick as a snake and can hold her own. Disturbingly good with a gun. Heals faster than the rest of us too. It's like all the ability that should have been put into social graces, got channeled into her combat skills."

Távio looked between you and Chang.

"She'd win," you said. "In a straight up fight. She'd win hands down. She wouldn't even need hands. She'd kick the shit out of me, and I wouldn't even see it coming."

"But Lucky here is too smart to try to take one of us in a fair fight," Gabriel laughed and you remembered Christmas Eve on the farm and heat spread through your body.

Leah looked at you, her gaze speculative. "I didn't expect Ray to like you."

You blinked.

"Lucky nailed her with a paintball," Gabriel said smugly.

"And I brought enough cookies and whiskey to share," you added, because that seemed like a more reliable way to make friends.

"That wasn't meant as an insult," Leah said quickly. "Ray doesn't like most of the people that J-" She stopped herself. "Ray is prickly. She's a good friend though."

Chang liked you? You couldn't be sure, though she had sat next to you at the funeral. So, maybe that was a sign of approval in her world? Well, she didn't dislike you. You knew she would have said something a long time ago if that were the case.

"This her?" The speaker stopped beside Leah. He was a broad bald man with velvety dark skin, wraparound sunglasses, and an ill-fitting suit. It actually didn't look bad. It sat just too tight across his shoulders, hampering his movements, and you got the impression he didn't dress up very often.

"Andre," Gabriel said, voice cool.

"Reyes," Andre nodded. "Good of you to fly the whole family over."

"That was Jack," Gabriel said mildly.

Andre shrugged. "OK. But I bet you had to remind his flaky-"
"Andre," Gabriel said, tone warning. "This is a funeral."

"Still ain't right what they did to you, brother."

"I know. Jack knows. We've talked about it extensively," Gabriel said casually. "And the situation is more complicated than you know. So unless you're going to come back and help us fix it-"

"No way!" Andre scowled. "I'm not working for Uncle Sam. I'm not working for the UN. I'm done with those two-faced, back-stabbing-!"

"-Then you don't have to worry about it," Gabriel said smoothly.

Andre frowned at the podium, where Jack was speaking with a few people, SEP by the look of them. "Going to finally come clean about Ai-"

"Andre, I love you like you a particularly stupid brother," Gabriel said crossing his arms. "But we're at Mateo's goddamn funeral, and you're going to behave. His mother is right over there, and I do not want to punch you in front of Tía Elena. If you make me, you will feel all that irritation, regret, and anguish up-close and first-hand. Literally. Do you understand me? We can talk later."

Andre didn't move, but he took a deep breath, the tension dropping just a little.

"Afterward, if you're feeling helpful and discrete, we can discuss conspiracies. Otherwise, you can mind your own damn business." Gabriel leaned forward. "Because things are messy enough without you making a bunch of noise about things I'm trying to fix behind the scenes."

Andre took off his shades, his steely blue cybernetic eyes glinting too brightly in the sun. "I fucking knew it-"

Leah glanced between Gabriel and Andre, her brow furrowed.

"You can come too Leah, if you promise not to tell your USG handlers what we're talking about. It could be treason." Gabriel winked.

"Shut up, Reyes. After all we went through in Kandahar and Algiers..." she scowled. "What's a little treason compared to that?"

Chapter End Notes

The past week has been stressful and overwhelming. Air conditioning is fixed - something ate through one of the low voltage wires and that was an unexpected bill. Lawn mower is still a WIP. Grass could conceal an antelope or three. Work is driving me to distraction. Temperature has been high 80s to mid 90s with heavy humidity. Think I had some kind of summer cold, not sure, I've been kind of out of it, but my productivity has been very low. And I am super super behind. There might be delays on some upcoming updates.

I'm getting your tumblr asks and will respond to comments today or tomorrow. Just been pretty meh for the past week and looking forward to sleeping most of the day today. (Because self care! Also: sloth!)
Chapter 73

Chapter Summary

Taking care of business before your trip.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The wake was held in the cafeteria. Apparently, several relatives had gotten up early this morning, taken over the mess hall, and cooked enough for all the funeral goers. It smelled divine. Távio kept sneaking looks between super soldiers and the buffet line, like he was worried about getting a serving. You could have sworn you saw Jesse wipe a trail of drool off on his serape.

You stayed with them, catching sight of Jack and Leah or Gabriel and Andre looking at you and whispering. Chang had joined a few other SEP people. You helped yourself to tamales, arroz con pollo, and sopa de albondigas. The meatball soup was rich and well-spiced, and you sighed, wondering the polite way to ask someone for their recipe at a funeral. Amélie would know. She knew all those tricky etiquette loopholes.

After you were done eating, you discretely checked your messages.

Going up to Jack's room with the gang. Come on up when you get a chance.

Finishing your food, and relieved that this was the last funeral, you excused yourself, not missing the curious look Távio gave you, and headed off to change out of your damn dress uniform.

"You provide the funding, I'll provide the data. And you then you're going to-" There was a smack, and judging by the familiar resonance, it was Gabriel's hand on the back of someone's head.

"Andre, you still don't tell me what to do," Gabriel growled.

"Fuck you, Reyes," the other man grumbled. "You still need to tell Mr. Roberts-"

'Guys-" Leah's voice sounded more exasperated than upset.

"What makes you think I haven't already?"

You walked into Jack's room, a little surprised to see six people sitting around the coffee table, talking, drinking beer, and eating Jack's plain salted potato chips. And then they all turned to look at you, six combat veterans, all hyper-alert.

"Hi, sorry I'm late." You waved, feeling like a specimen under a microscope. No one stared too long, but you could feel them taking in your measure. Judgment always made your neck itch. Maybe it was in your favor, but you had no idea.

Andre took another look at you and quickly averted his eyes. Gabriel did not look up, his disapproving gaze focused solely on Andre.

Jack sat on the floor and beckoned you over. Gabriel was on his other side, apparently in a debate with Andre. Leah sat cross-legged next to Andre, her concerned gaze flipping between Gabriel, Andre, and Chang. Chang was on the couch speaking with a brunette man you had not yet met.

You sat down beside Jack, a little taken aback by how casually he threw one arm around you, the other one holding Gabriel's hand. He offered you his beer and you took a sip, sighing.

"Lucky, I think you've met everyone except Blue." He pointed to the man on the couch.

"I don't think I actually got introduced to Andre," you said, noting that the other man's ears pricked up when you said his name, but he ignored the invitation.

"He's busy," Jack said, his smile so polite that you knew exactly what he was thinking. He didn't think you were missing much. Fair enough.

You reached over the table to shake the brunette man's hand. He was average in height, weight, and with a weak chin, though he had a firm handshake. He wore a suit and you weren't entirely sure if he was SEP. "Should I ask about the nickname?" You glanced at his eyes. They were brown. He was surprisingly normal looking. But then Chang wasn't hulking behemoth, though she had amazing muscle tone.

"Short for Blumenthal," he said, his voice reedy. "Though everyone says I'm depressing as fuck, so there's that. Can't really argue, considering the only time I see everyone together is at a goddamn funeral. It's kind of hard to be peppy when you keep burying what's left of your friends."

"Yeah, I understand that," you said, after a moment. You had marathoned thirteen funerals this week. It was pretty awful.

"He's always been a whiny bastard. Sometimes, he writes poetry about his feelings," Chang said, and you couldn't tell if she was fucking with you or not. "It's terrible."

"It's nice to see you're still illiterate, Ray." Blue gave a longsuffering sigh. "Anyway, nice to meet you Lucky. Don't feel bad about Andre. He's kind of like Ray. Real task-oriented, but critically lacking social skills. It's nothing personal; both of them are just bad at playing nice with others."

You snorted, seeing that minefield for what it was. "I'm too tired to have real feelings right now."

"That must be nice," Blue sighed, giving Jack a wan look.

"I don't think he's as morose as he acts, but after this many years, I really can't tell," Jack said.

"I don't think Morrison's as clueless as he acts, but after this many years, I guess it doesn't matter," Blue said sounding smug, though his glum expression stayed in place.

Jack didn't look offended; he just offered Blue the bag of potato chips. "Blue wasn't SEP, but he served as our pilot for a lot of missions. Got us shot down a few times."

"Kept you in the air way more times," Blue scowled. "And there aren't a lot of us left either," he muttered. "You know, as Strike Commander, you could get better snacks," Blue said, not taking any chips. Chang however, took a handful, and no one said a thing.

"What's wrong with potato chips?" Jack asked. "They're classic! Though I guess we could shell out for some French onion dip." He looked thoughtfully at the table. "Or ranch. Ranch works too."

"...That's is Morrison in a nutshell." Blue shook his head. "It's good to see power hasn't completely gone to your head."

"I have good people around me." Jack kissed the back of your neck and you stiffened, unused to him being this demonstrative in front of strangers. Well, strangers to you. But Jack stayed relaxed, despite his obvious tension with Andre.

"Oh you want to hear about Jack's snacks?" Gabriel leaned over Jack to kiss your cheek, and you didn't miss how Leah and Blue's eyes widened briefly. Though you couldn't be sure if it was Gabriel's overt affection or the idea of Jack making snacks.

"Gabe, no-" Jack groaned.

"Oh yes, they need to hear about this," Gabriel smirked. "Your mother is going to hear about this-"

Scowling, Jack draped his arms over your shoulders and leaned against you. He didn't quite hide his face in your hair, but he grumbled softly in your ear.

"So Lucky and I are getting ready to leave for an op when Jack comes down with brown paper bags..."

---

Jack lay in bed between you and Gabriel. He blew out a deep breath and shook his head. "It's so trite, Mateo's gone, but I keep expecting him to pop back up and yell "gotcha, sunshine!" And every time I realize that he won't...Well, I have to remember to breathe. You think I'd be used to burying friends by now," he said. He kissed the top of your head before tugging on Gabriel's arms, pulling him closer.

"That's not something you ever want to get used to," Gabriel said. He ran his fingers along Jack's arm.

"Yeah." Jack hugged you a little tighter. "I know. Just...I know."

"You've been awfully quiet." Gabriel looked at you.

"Just observing the super soldiers in their natural habitat surrounded by others of their kind..." Because as soon as you'd arrived, Andre had clammed up. And Gabriel had not continued discussing whatever business they were planning.

Gabriel snorted. "You're hilarious."
"I was keeping a lab journal. Day Three: They have an obsession with protein and biceps-

Jack flicked you between the eyes.

You clicked your teeth at him.

"Behave," Gabriel said. "I'm too tired to sort you two out tonight."

"You were pretty quiet," Jack said with a frown. "You didn't feel left out, did you? I know we weren't great about introducing everyone-

"I was a little slow, but this wasn't exactly a normal social occasion." You yawned. "I'm just tired. A week of funerals isn't exactly light recovery."

"Yeah." Jack exhaled. "I know. I'm looking forward to this vacation with you."

"Where are we going?" You asked rolling onto Jack's chest. "Come on, I need to pack."

Gabriel chuckled.

Jack just looked smug. "Well, I know you should bring some of that fancy lingerie you've been hiding. Other than that, everything's taken care of-

"So hiking boots? Climbing pitons? Bug spray?" You scowled as both men grinned at each other.

"I told you it would drive her nuts," Gabriel laughed.

"It's a surprise, sweetheart," Jack said. "That means, I'm not going to tell you." His tone was way too taunting. "Even if you make that cute pouty face and try to sulk under the blankets-

Groaning, you rolled off him, and tried to wiggle away as he dragged you back, hugging you tightly from behind.

"You're a jerk," you grumbled.

"I'm serious. Bring some of that pretty lingerie." His voice dropped an octave as you squirmed against him. "You won't regret it," he purred in your ear, one hand running along your hip.

"I understand you worrying about Jack overlooking something, but he has me double-checking his work and making sure our bases are covered," Gabriel said. "Relax, you little control freak."

"Pot, have you met Kettle?"

"I can appreciate surprises," he said smugly, and you vowed then to make him eat those words.

"Yeah, I'll do it," you said, studying the knife catalogue on your tablet. Shin had custom ordered your tanto from a smith in Japan. You thought about ordering the exact same model. It would fit right in your hand, and you were used to the weight. Why change a good thing?

But that wouldn't fix everything. The new knife wouldn't be the same. You had earned your tanto, and blooded it. It wasn't just a piece of metal to you. Maybe it was all in your head, but your tanto had helped you survive a lot of things. It didn't seem quite right to assume that you could replace it so easily. And that smith now had a waitlist several months long. You put an order in anyway, because it was a solid model. But you needed something sooner.

"Really?" Tataryn perked up, setting his coffee aside. The two of you sat in the office, reviewing Blackwatch intel for anything relevant to the Mediterranean omnic issues. "I knew I could count on you!"

"I do have a little matter I need your help with," you said, not looking up from the tablet.

"Oh really? You clever vixen. You have your poor Fedya over the barrel as they say. Well, bring it on." Tataryn slapped his chest with an open palm. "I do not fear your shrewd negotiating power, or your vicious fighting skills, or even your penchant for insatiable lovemaking."

"Do you know where Gabriel is going next week?" You kept your eyes on the tablet, watching him the periphery, trying very hard not to smile.

Tataryn gave you a knowing look. "A well-earned vacation, I hear. And that is all I have heard."

"...Got a location?"

"Mmm, no." He flashed you that megawatt smile and you squinted through the brightness. "But I can make an educated guess."

"...How educated?"

"Not very," he admitted. "But if both the Strike Commander and the Blackwatch Commander are going to be offsite, they cannot wander too far. And they cannot go anywhere too public. Given your recent ordeal, I doubt they wish to visit the Mediterranean. But they will probably stay in Europe."

"Somewhere secluded, probably warm," you said, because they both knew how you hated the cold.

"They could take you to Morocco," Tataryn said. "North Africa isn't that far away."

"Portugal or Spain seem likely," you said. The Black Sea was farther off, and while Romania, Bulgaria, and other Eastern bloc countries were a possibility, you had a hard time picturing Jack choosing one of those. And he had served in Lisbon...

"Indeed," Tataryn nodded. "But like you, I am left in the dark." He shrugged. "I wish I could be more help, instead I will picture the three of you having lots of fun in tiny bathing suits."

"Really?" You rolled your eyes.

"No. I will probably be thinking of you without the bathing suits," he admitted.

You made a noise of exasperation. "All right, I do have something you can actually be helpful with."
"Oh, you finally want me to intervene with that omnic?" Tataryn beamed.

You groaned. "No, Tataryn. Tempting, but no."

"You can no longer resist the allure of my-"

"We need to place Távio. I'd like you to keep an eye out. I'm pretty ignorant of Overwatch squad composition, but you keep tabs on people-"

"You weren't going to offer him a place with you and Mihret? Or you and McCree?"

Tataryn paused. "Or are you trying to get me to take him on?"

"He needs a wider range of experiences," you said. "I'd rather he served with a competent Overwatch squad for a few months, then we can reevaluate his performance and his goals."

Tataryn stared at the wall. "Were you unhappy with how he conducted-?"

"No, I'm just thinking about his future." You shrugged. "He's still pretty raw. He needs more combat experience."

"Ah." Tataryn nodded. "I don't disagree. I will start looking." He took a breath. "I suppose I should warn you that Kseniya is not happy that I am missing her school visit. She may be...upset."

"What a surprise," you said, unable to reign in your sarcasm.

"But I have confidence in you, Lucky," Tataryn said. "You are actually quite good at reigning in misbehaving children."

"What?" You wrinkled your nose at him. "Tataryn, when have you seen me around children?"

"Well, you were a good instructor, but honestly, I've seen you handle Mihret and the Shimadas. Same thing really," he said, with a sober nod.

"What did you need me fo-oh." You entered Torby's workshop, stopping as you saw Jack and Gabriel both sitting there, looking smug. Torby gave you a flat unimpressed stare, like it was your fault his workspace had been invaded.

"The lasers aren't ready, don't even ask," he started brusquely and turned to unpack some boxes. "Now give me a moment-"

Jack sat on a crate, and patted his knee. You snorted and shook your head. No, you weren't sitting on his lap in Torby's lab. That was a terrible idea. Gabriel just laughed and scooted over, giving you space between them. You sat down and Jack placed a gloved hand on his chest, giving you a look of purely exaggerated dejection.

"Have you been goofing off all morning?" You asked, looking between both men.

"Had to take care of a few things." Gabriel hesitated. "Don't get excited, it's repaired, but not...combat-worthy. I'm sorry." He handed you your sheath back, the worn handle of your tanto hand been rewrapped, the scratches buffed out.

"Thank you," you said, fighting the urge to snatch it out of his hands. "How'd you find the hilt and guard?"

"Jesse told me what happened before we left the cave," Gabriel said. "I dug around and it wasn't hard to find."

You bit your lip, staring at the weapon. Very carefully, you drew it from the sheath. The black blade had been scratched to hell and you blinked as you inspected the gold seams that marked where the blade had been broken.

"Genji suggested it," Gabriel said. "Kintsugi is normally done with ceramics, but I thought you might appreciate the symbolism."

Shin had mentioned kintsugi in passing. It was a Japanese art of repairing broken items with gold, to highlight the history and resilience of an object, rather than hiding the scars. The gold seams were beautiful, though they still hurt to look at. You swallowed a lump in your throat and sheathed the blade.

"It will still hold up in a pinch, but...I wouldn't go stabbing cyborgs with it," Gabriel said, his voice soft, his eyes questioning.

"Thank you," you said, hugging him. "Even if I can't use it, I'm just glad to have it back."

"We could get it reforged," Jack said. "But...it would be less work to get you an identical one from the same maker. I can-

"I already put in an order," you said. "Though it might take awhile..."

"All right, so Morrison brought me the funniest thing," Torby said, in a voice that didn't sound very amused. "A telescoping shock spear."

You had wondered what happened to that. You hadn't seen it lying around Jack's room, though you hadn't really gone searching for it.

"I don't specialize such things, but the craftsmanship was excellent. Morrison put me in touch with some weapons engineers, of extremely questionable origin, based out of China of all places...." Torby gave Jack a hard look. "And after discussing your...combat style, we forged a few prototypes."

Torby held up a six inch baton. "You are woefully underequipped to go against omnics and given all the shifty sneaking you do, your toolkit needs to be concealed. This can extend automatically or manually, though you have to shut off the safety lock if you want to use the manual setting." He flicked his wrist and the baton extended two feet. He hit another button and it began to hum. "Same tech as your EMP prostheses, but with a half a dozen charges." He shut off the pulse and retracted the baton, setting it, and a holster on the table.

You clapped politely.

Torby narrowed his eyes at you. "I'm not done."

You stopped clapping.

"You might need special shoes for this. At least till I get the trajectory fixed..." Torby grunted. He set a blade on the table in front of you. In many respects it looked like your tanto, except for the extra thickness around the base of the blade, the heavy rubberized grip, and the extended guard. He squeezed the handle, and you blinked as electricity arced along the blade.

"Is that-?"

"Don't lick it. Don't touch it to anything electronic, unless you're trying to destroy the object. Don't let your idiot friends touch it on a bet. It will damage them."

"Is the grip safe for my pros-?"

"Of course. What kind of work do you think I do?" Torby scowled. "Try not to stab metal. The blade won't hold. So far, the polymers aren't deteriorating under the constant energy flux, but this is only a prototype. You're the first field tester-"

"He made you an electric carving knife," Gabriel said, a wicked glint in his eyes. "Should make cutting steak easier."

"If you're going to cut food or eat with it, at least turn off the current." Torby looked resigned to your questionable behaviors.

You picked up the tanto. The balance wasn't quite right and, the feel and weight were completely different from your original. It would take some getting used to. "But will it transform into a shovel?"

Torby gave you a long look, before cracking a grin. "You're an idiot." He set another carbine on the table. "Been trying to get the recoil on this right. Think it's a level you can handle comfortably."

You picked up the gun. It was heavier than your last one, but still manageable. "Does it rapid-fire rabid kittens?"

Jack coughed and Gabriel gave you a concerned look.

"...That project's on hiatus," Torby said with a straight face and Jack choked. "No, I just received quite a lot of funding specifically earmarked to modify the pulse rifle prototypes," he paused, giving both Jack and Gabriel sharp looks. "So that's an expensive piece of equipment. You should think twice about using it to block swords, or throwing it off a balcony, or forgetting it in a secret mountain Triad base-" Torby said, voice rising with each accusation.

Jack cleared his throat, turning very red. Gabriel just raised a brow, lips curved in amusement.

You stifled a snort. "I uh...I'll be careful."

"You better," he scowled. "It fires hitscan bursts, so you don't need to calculate a lead. Just point and fire."

"Oh," you said, trying to wrap your head around that bit of information. Were these time traveling bullets? Homing rounds made more sense, but you weren't sure how the tech worked.

"Not making EMP rounds for it because of all the delicate electronic parts. But the casing is hardened and I'm working on a grenade launcher attachment. For now, though, you'll have to make due firing pretty bursts of light."
"...What color?" You asked, because that was an important question.

"Seriously? Blue is the only color available right now, because of the laws of optical physics. This isn't a vanity project, Lucky. I'm not wasting resources so you can make your projectiles coordinate with your outfit."

"I'm sorry, I was just curious," you winced, shrinking in your seat. "Shooting bright lights is a bad idea on stealth missions."

"This isn't for stealth missions, Lucky. This is for when your questionable luck strikes and you need to kill big things fast. I've fitted the stock with a recoil reducer. It adds weight, but with the power on that thing, you'll need it. Your ammo is custom made, so don't try shoving just any rounds in there. You're going to want to take it down to the moving target range, because if you haven't been shooting hitscan, you have some adjustments to make."

"Thank you," you said, meaning it. "I'll go test these out right away."

The carbine did take some getting used to. The sounds were different: it clicked and had that high-pitched whine that regular guns did not. Jack and Gabriel both lingered on the range, watching you adjust your stance and sight it in. Both men made occasional observations, "you're shooting low and to the left" or "keep the stock flush against your shoulder to brace for the heavier recoil" - something you had not had to do with your last two carbines - but mostly they seemed content just to watch you work.

"Damnit, shouldn't stay," Jack said, noticing the growing crowd. "Have fun with your new toys."

"Don't sulk, Jack," Gabriel said, under his breath. "I know for a fact that you got some nice new toys too." His deep laugh let you know exactly what kind of toys Jack had bought for vacation, and your next shot went wide.

Both men smirked as they left the range, it took you a few breaths to get your heartbeat under control. Forcing yourself to ignore distractions, you focused on finishing sighting in your new gun. The recoil would make it harder to run and shoot, but you could do it. And you still had a pistol. This was for more dire situations. You'd probably get a big shoulder bruise if you weren't armored. Still, the hitscan shooting was an improvement you could get used to.

"What do you have there?" Shoal leaned against your booth, peeking in as you started packing up.

"Another Lindholm special," you said.

"Fancy." She eyed your gun speculatively. "I've seen that tech: the Strike Commander carries something similar." Unspoken was the fact that most rank and file agents would not have access to pulse rifles.

"Another experimental build," you said. "I've shot one of those big ones." You rubbed your shoulder. "The recoil would eventually dislocate something." You shrugged as you put the gun in its protective case. "You know how it is: Lindholm loans me tech. I take it out in the field. And then I get to write extensive reports on its field performance, how it compares to previous models,
"See, I stopped asking what exactly your job entailed a long time ago." She ran her fingers through her short red curls. "Like first I thought you were just another shady Blackwatch agent who happened to be good at paperwork. Which is fine, there is nothing wrong with that. But then you go around bodyguarding Morrison and using all these fancy gadgets straight out of an action movie. And then you take the romance out of it by explaining that you have to fill out post-action surveys and write polite reports for engineers."

"Well he made my prostheses," you said. "So I'm already cleared as a guinea pig."

Shoal looked at your left hand. You'd never taken off you gloves in front of her, but you knew that your students must have mentioned the outcome of the omnic sparring match. Shoal was too polite to flat out ask you about your fingers, but you could feel the curiosity radiating off her.

"So, what's up?"

"Mmm," Shoal paused. "So, I know you only kind of pay attention to rumor mill, because it is pretty ridiculous but-"

You groaned. "I'm not personally leading a strike force back to Greece to extract bloody revenge on the rogue omnis responsible. Távio already asked."

Shoal snickered. "Maeda Vargas wants to be you when he grows up. It's adorable."

You squinted at her.

"What? You're a good influence on him," Shoal sounded pleased. "Don't look so embarrassed, you big softy, you. The kid needs good role models. He lost his mothers in a fire. Lived with his grandparents till they died."

You knew this already, having actually read your students' personnel files. "So is this rumor about-?"

"Oh, no. Not at all. Though with the way he follows you around now, it might-" Shoal gave an apologetic shrug. "But that's kind of the hazard of being you."

You snorted. "Yeah."

"So apparently, you were SEP..."

You choked on your laugh. "What?"

"Well, there's a lot of speculation as to how you guys got such an elite rescue team: Commander Reyes went on the rescue mission to retrieve his favorite assistant and his protégée Agent McCree. Or the Strike Commander went on the mission to pick up his old buddy Rodriguez and maybe pay you back for all those fancy rescues you've pulled for him. Or you're secretly SEP and you're friends with both of them." Shoal looked vaguely amused. "And all those SEP people came up to you at Major Rodriguez's funeral..." She paused, looking a little uncomfortable.

"No, I wasn't sleeping with him," you said, rolling your eyes.

"I know that," Shoal said, frowning. "Rodriguez hadn't been stationed around here in years. But yeah, with your mysterious origins, dramatic exploits, and questionable name, some people are speculating that you were some kind of government experiment gone wrong. Or right."
You worked your jaw, trying to come up with an intelligent response.

"-You don't have to tell me, Lucky," Shoal said quickly. "I understand if it's classified. But I thought you should know."

"...Goddamnit," was all you could say.

Shoal laughed. "And just so you know, I don't care if you're a government secret project, or a Blackwatch assassin, or that you go around killing people while wearing nothing but a towel. You're a good agent, and you're fun to drink with. That's what counts in my book."

"Thanks," you sighed, rolling your eyes upward.

You had charge cartridges for your knife and baton. Torby had kept the recharge process simple, and you appreciated his thoughtful designs. The telescoping EMP baton was simple enough. You had the wrist flick down quickly, and it fit just fine on your belt.

The replacement knife was a different story. The electrified blade was unwieldy in your hands. Maybe you just needed time to get used to it. Maybe it was just a mental block. You were going to ask Genji to practice with you. He was fast enough to block your strikes and skilled enough to avoid getting hurt.

Genji took one look at the electric tanto and shook his head. "That won't be any good."

You shrugged, heart sinking. "Torby wants me to try it."

Genji snorted. "Lindholm should stick to turrets, power armor, and prostheses. His blades leave a lot to be desired."

"...I need something to fill that niche," you admitted. "I put in an order for a replacement tanto, but the waitlist is months."

"We will try some different things," Genji told you. "Bring that to the mats, and your original tanto. I'll meet you in twenty minutes."

You glanced at your brace.

"What Angela doesn't know won't get us in trouble," Genji said, looking very sure of himself.

You met in the Blackwatch gym, a little surprised to see Hanzo walking alongside Genji, both of them arguing in hushed voices. Genji carried a bulky canvas roll on his back. Hanzo was empty-handed, but still managed to look overburdened just by being there.

"Show him what you showed me," Genji said, setting the canvas pack down.
You drew the electrified knife from the sheath and squeezed the handle, watching sparks fly.

Hanzo's scowl deepened. "Give me that."

You worked hard not to roll your eyes as you handed Hanzo the blade.

"Balance is passable." Hanzo tapped the blade. "But this alloy is brittle. It won't hold up against bone or armor. You'll get a few uses out of it, but it's just as likely to shatter when you need it most. All for the novelty of electricity."

"Well, I do need more effective weapons against-"

"You never used your tanto against omnis," Genji said. "You're probably not going to start now."

"I do have other options in my toolkit," you said. The baton would be more effective.

Genji unrolled the pack. More than half a dozen blades lay in the multiple pockets. Genji picked the biggest - a full sized katana - and handed it to you.

You held it in one hand, weighing it carefully. It was heavy, and though you could swing it, you didn't have the skill to wield it like Genji.

"She has no swordsmanship training," Hanzo said, shaking his head.

"Is it comfortable?" Genji asked.

"Not really," you admitted.

Genji nodded, not looking surprised at all. He took the blade back. "Try this one." He handed you a lighter katana.

"Genji, she's not going to be able to use katana," Hanzo huffed.

Genji snapped something back in Japanese and Hanzo crossed his arms.

"I could get used to the weight," you said. But Hanzo was right, not that you were going to admit that out loud. You had minimal skill with a combat sword.

Genji swapped that katana for a short dagger, smaller than your tanto had been.

You shook your head. "Need something heftier."

The trial continued till Genji had you balancing two wakizashi. There was a two foot blade, and one just a few inches shorter.

"Not as good for stealth," you said.

"But short enough for you to use comfortably. You're not dueling people," Genji said, giving Hanzo a look. "You don't do fair fights."

"I'm not against carrying one on occasion, but I really preferred the tanto."

"You have more upper body strength than when you first arrived," Genji said. "You could use both. Keep your options open. That is the nature of growth."
You had the feeling that the underlying theme of this discussion had nothing to do with you. You just twirled the blade in your right arm, finding the weight and balance to be comfortable. It wasn't your tanto, but it could work at some point.

"Now pick one and go against Hanzo. He can test Lindholm's...creation. Don't worry, you're injured and probably won't hurt him."

You blinked and set down the longer blade.

Hanzo gave Genji a long, irritated look. Then let loose a stream of angry Japanese.

"Well, I guess I could do it, but I thought you were the better instructor."

Hanzo grumbled and raised the dagger.

"One third speed," Genji said.

You went slow, striking, countering, and feinting. The blade sat well in your hand, even if your fencing skills were very limited.

Hanzo grimaced with each strike, obviously disapproving of your form, the weapon in his hand, and whatever Genji was doing today.

"Faster." Genji smirked.

You sped up, Hanzo matching you easily. You stuck to basic drills, metal ringing as the blades made contact.

"How's it feel?"

"Comfortable enough."

"You could always ask Hanzo for lessons," Genji said, and you nearly dropped the blade.

"I uh...maybe?" You took a step back as Hanzo turned to glare at Genji.

"That's enough. Look at all these chips," Hanzo scowled, holding up the prototype. "I don't know what he was thinking-"

"He was trying to improve on her original. But it doesn't need it. It has served you well enough. You could branch out into using a wakizashi. But first you need to replace your tanto.

Why don't you let Hanzo see what you're used to?"

Genji certainly was chatty today. You drew the repaired blade, not missing how Hanzo's eyes widened at the gold seams.

He carefully took the blade from you, turning it over in his hands. He examined it, face stern in concentration. "I see," was all he said, and handed the blade back.

You looked at Genji.

"Who do you think would suit better?" He asked casually. "Hirakawa or Mizuno?"

"More likely Hasegawa or Yoshihara," Hanzo said.

"Kobayashi specializes in shorter blades."
Hanzo pursed his lips. "I'd have to think about it." He rose abruptly. "Tell Lindholm, this blade was subpar. I can't comment on the technology, but the blade itself won't hold up. You don't need fancy tricks. You need a dependable weapon with better temperance." He tossed his head and walked out of the gym.

You looked at Genji. "I don't want to impose-"

"Oh no, he needs a project," Genji said, carefully rolling up his blades. "And I need him out of my hair." He gave you an almost happy smile. "This is an excellent diversion. We just appealed to his personal pride and shining expertise, so now his perfectionist tendencies won't let him give this task anything but his full attention. Hanzo is one of the better resources you could turn to, and I won't let him pick anything too...extreme. I hope you don't expect results any time soon though."

"Thanks?" You said, wondering just what the hell you had unleashed.

"No, thank you," Genji said smugly, like he knew something you didn't.

You shook your head, wondering if you should just take Gabriel's K-bar.

You sat on your bed, opening the carefully big sealed padded envelope that Chang handed off before she left. Inside was an actual painting of the sketch from Christmas: Gabriel, Jack, and you sitting on the couch: you asleep on Jack's shoulder while Gabriel's arm extended around both of you. You could see the brushstrokes. It was an improved version of the digitally colored one he had sent you via email.

_We're all very glad you're OK. Really sorry about what happened. Thought I'd send this along. Hope you like it. Looking forward to seeing you next month. Maggie can't talk about anything else. I think Dad is going to be happy to see us go, just so he can get some peace and quiet._

There was another smaller envelope and you opened it to find pictures from Christmas. There weren't a lot of you, most of them were of Jack or Gabriel, and there was the ugly sweater family picture that you had managed to avoid. You studied a few of the candid shots. Jack smiling in his bright green sweater, his brow relaxed. Gabriel laughing uproariously at something someone said. Back in Indiana, they'd both been so relaxed. You hadn't realized just how rare that was back then. Lately, even when it was just the three of you together, there was always some kind of worry or strain on one of them. On you too, though you hadn't been nearly as carefree as they had been in Indiana.

You sighed, rubbing your forehead. The three of you needed this upcoming vacation. It wasn't just you. Both men were under a lot of stress. So even if Jack booked you a weird little beach shack with a leaky roof, you weren't going to complain. You were going to enjoy your time with them. You were going to make it count. And then you were going to come back refreshed, and pick a problem to fix. You rather liked the idea of it being Petras.
You sat on the transport, a little surprised by the half dozen modified fish torpedos onboard. These came armed, and not for the first time did you wonder where you were staying, and what kind of security measures were in place.

Gabriel rubbed your shoulders, and you felt your frown easing. "Don't worry, corazon. Jack won't bail on us. He's the one most excited about this trip."

"I'm sure I'd be more excited if I knew where we were going," you said. You rubbed your left arm. The splint was finally off, but it still felt weaker than it should.

Gabriel laughed. "He already messaged me that this will only take a few hours, they can't keep him, and he'll shoot his way out if he has to. We're to get checked in, get comfortable, and he'll be there with us tonight."

"Do we need to get him a second car rental?" You asked.

"Nah, we're cleared to land the Orca right outside the place."

"How about security detail and-"

"Relax, baby. It's taken care of." Gabriel stretched out in his seat, giving you an amused grin. "Unless there's a full invasion, we have five days away, and we're going to enjoy them."

"Sorry," you muttered. You leaned against Gabriel. "I don't like feeling...not useful."

"I see that," Gabriel said. "You know, your intrinsic value isn't a variable based on how much you accomplish in a recent timeframe, right?"

You shrugged. "...That's a hefty sentence with some serious jargon."

"Would you rather I say that you don't have to keep proving yourself over and over again? Because you've already done a lot and you should be proud of yourself. Jack and I are plenty impressed. Oh look, now you're embarrassed." He laughed at your expression. Worse, he wasn't wrong.

"Love you too," you muttered.

"And just because you've been on med leave, doesn't mean you haven't been doing work. Actively trying to get Maeda Vargas placed, writing Lindholm those weapons reports, and just...being there for those funerals. You've been working hard. Even if it doesn't feel like it."

You shrugged again. "Yeah, I guess."

"And you say I'm a harsh judge with impossible standards." Gabriel kissed the back of your neck.

That made you smile. "Yeah, you're right."

"What was that? Louder for the people in the back?"

You elbowed him. "Ten minutes into vacation and you're already ridiculous."

"We've all earned a break," he said, pulling his hat down over his eyes.

The trip was less than an hour. Gabriel had brought a large duffel bag, and tucked his K-bar in your extremely light pack. You appreciated the gesture.
As soon as the bay doors opened, you popped up, excited to see the sun and whatever Jack had picked out.

Gabriel put an arm around you, grinning as you descended the ramp.

The world around you was green enough, the day bright. You were in the mountains, and there was...snow on the ground. In fact, there was snow falling from the sky. You blinked, unsure if you could conceal your horror.

There was snow on the ground.

This wasn't a beach. This was...cold.

You just stared.

Gabriel patted your back, laughing when he saw your face. "Come on then." He seemed unsurprised by the climate.

You looked down at your bag, because you hadn't packed any winter coats or sweaters. Because you'd expected Praia de Tavira or Costa del Sol. Not...this.

"Come on, the inn is just up ahead. You can wear my hoodie if you want," he said, clearly amused by your distress.

Shaking your head, you trudged off the transport, giving the snow a vicious look.

Just...what exactly had Jack been thinking?

Chapter End Notes

Surprise medical bills (have to call and argue with coding at doctor's office tomorrow, because $200 for lab work that was supposed to be part of my annual but wasn't coded properly, is a fucking lot), friends who may or may not have cancer, and all the little things are kind of wearing me down. There will probably be some slight delays on updates.

Also, I'm writing smut, so that takes awhile. facepalm Bad timing all around.

Off to screech at the idiots. I mean, go to work.
Chapter 74

Chapter Summary

There had better be a damn good explanation for snow on your summer vacation.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Grim-faced and cold, you followed Gabriel across the grass to a gated complex. The Athena drones spread out, just floating around the walls. The snow wasn't heavy, it was now summer in the northern hemisphere. Just where the hell were you that it was snowing in the summer? And more importantly why?

The metal double doors were easily ten feet high, and etched with nature scenes. The gate had a flared ridged roof, looking strangely Japanese.

Shivering, you wrapped Gabriel's hoodie tighter around yourself, now trying to figure out where you were.

"Jack's going to be so sad that he missed this. Your face is hilarious." Gabriel laughed at you over his shoulder, eyes gleaming with delight.

The gates slowly opened, and you blinked, forgetting to give him a dirty look.

The tallest building was three stories, and it looked like everything had been constructed from wood and glass - giving the traditional architecture a modern upgrade. There were half a dozen buildings, all built in a distinctly Japanese style - oversized eaves, curved gables, and what looked like ceramic tiles - possibly with built-in solar panels. A bamboo clapper fountain knocked rhythmically against a stone basin in the central rock garden.

There were large wooden awnings built over pools of steaming water, bordered by aesthetically placed rocks and carefully sculpted gardens.

"...Just...where are we?" You asked, giving Gabriel a careful look.

"Iceland, home to a multitude of geothermal springs." Gabriel smirked. "Come on. Let's get our stuff inside. You can explore later. We have the whole place to ourselves."

There were small waterfalls bubbling into the steaming pools. A chiming sound echoed - water splashing artfully into a pot, ringing out almost as clear as a bell. Genji had mentioned having one once. You forgot what it was called, but he had drunkenly explained the mechanics. And you had drunkenly forgotten them.

"So this is a Japanese-themed...?"

"Onsen ryokan," Gabriel said. "A fancy one." He rolled his shoulders. Both Shin and Genji spoke fondly of the hot springs inns they'd stayed at in Japan. And while Shin's experiences hadn't been as decadent as Genji's, he had made you want to try them out, at least once.
An elderly Japanese man in a heavy quilted coat and light blue yukata came down the path and bowed in greeting.

You and Gabriel bowed back.

"Welcome! I'm glad you've arrived. I am sorry to admit that we had everything ready for your arrival, but then our mutual friend ordered a few upgrades."

"What kind of upgrades?" Gabriel asked, crossing his arms.

"Some luxury amenities that we don't normally offer," the man looked a little embarrassed. "Custom yukata, larger meal spreads, exclusive high-end spa treatments. All complimentary, of course."

"Ah, as long as it's not too much trouble," Gabriel said, relaxing a little. "I understand that our "friend" can be overwhelming at times."

"Oh no, not at all," the host said quickly, obviously unwilling to even imply anything negative about this "friend." "I just regret not being more prepared. Do not trouble yourself. I realize you must be hungry and tired from your journey. Please, may I help you carry your bags to your rooms?"

"We can manage, thank you," Gabriel said, politely.

"Then I will start on the evening meal right away. There are snacks in the house and I can make something now if-"

"We're early. You're fine," Gabriel said. "We can use the kitchen in the guesthouse too. We'll be waiting for our other friend to join us anyway."

"Ah, well, please, make yourselves comfortable. All the facilities are open for your exclusive use. Your security team has already been through."

"Thank you, Mr. Ito," Gabriel said. "Our other friend will be arriving in a few hours. There is no need to rush for the dinner."

"Of course. The security has been keyed to his biometrics. I will be staying the caretaker facilities on the side of the property. Are you sure you don't need daily tidying or laundry-"

"We will request service if it is necessary. Meals and privacy are our main concern," Gabriel said, not unkindly.

"Of course, Mr. King." The man bowed. "We are honored to have you here." He glanced at you. "You and your wife."

You blinked. "We-"

"We are honored to be here." Chuckling, Gabriel put one arm over your shoulder. "Come on dear, let's get changed."

Mouth moving, but no sound coming out, you let Gabriel drag you into a two story building. It reminded you a little of that hunting lodge, the one you and Genji had stormed in Nagano in your first meeting with Hanzo: the calligraphy on the walls, the tatami floors, wood and paper sliding shoji screens. It was laid out like a nice house - there was very large round kotatsu in the center of the room. There were also western chairs and large view screens, probably with trillions of things to watch, none of them good. A very large bar had been built into the wall, various bottles of liquors sitting on the illuminated shelves. Both of you took off your shoes and put them on provided shelf. There were pretty indoor sandals that you slipped on.

You inspected the kitchen quickly, the refrigerator stocked with a variety of packages, all bearing a "CLEAR" seal. There were fresh fish, sealed steaks, and carefully packaged fruit. The pantry had also been "cleared" by the security team.

"Let's set our stuff down," Gabriel said and you followed him up the stairs.

An Athena drone hovered in the bedroom. It was a large space, huge flat view screen, gaming consoles, a massive futon made up like an elegant nest. Round paper lanterns hung from the ceiling. There were a few low end tables, but mostly the room had been taken up by the orgy-sized futon with thick green covers. Heavy blackout curtains hung over the windows, and while they distracted from the aesthetic, you appreciated the promise of privacy. There was a set of floor to ceiling curtains and you pushed them aside, finding a glass sliding door that opened to a balcony overlooking a fenced in rock pool, steam pouring off the surface.

"Perimeter is clear! No explosives, unauthorized weapons, toxins, or surveillance equipment detected. The staff consists of three omnics and Mr. Ito. Please enjoy your vacation!" She chirped and floated back down the stairs.

"I thought you didn't like having her around," you said after she'd gone back outside.

Gabriel shrugged. "She's...not so bad, once you make the rules clear," he said, rubbing his shoulder. "Hopefully, she doesn't blow our cover-"

"And what was that all about, "Mr. King?" You poked him in the chest.

"It's called an "alias," Mrs. King," he laughed. "If Gérard hasn't explained those concepts to you, I worry about the quality of your espionage training."

You shook your head. "That's not what I meant-"

"Well, if you'd come late, Jack and I would be Mr. & Mr. King. Or I guess if I'd been the last one, you and Jack could Mr. and Mrs. Strike. Strike Commander Strike," Gabriel laughed to himself and you rolled your eyes.

"That was a Jack joke."

"It wasn't that bad," Gabriel gave you a mock scowl. He set his bags down and looked around.

You put your bag down too. "This has to be...expensive," you said, eyeing the calligraphy scrolls and lacquered screens. "Renting out the whole facility? Who's this "friend?" And how did Jack even know-?"

Gabriel smirked. "I told you he had help. But to his credit, he figured you'd want to do some kind of hot springs tour. We both noticed how much you enjoyed the hot tub. And you did complain that you never got to soak and relax at the day spa."

You also wondered if Athena had given them some hints about the travel conversations the two of you had in the past.

"And are you sure about the discretion of this place?" Mr. Ito didn't look untrustworthy per se, but you were Blackwatch. Being paranoid was your job.

"Apparently, he's retired On Sing."

It clicked then. Oh Feng, that spazzy little sneak. And Jack. He'd managed to hide it from you. With Gabriel and Athena's help of course. You felt yourself smiling, not caring that it was stupidly wide and ridiculous.

"-married an Icelandic man, fell in love with the geothermal springs here, and decided to open a Japanese-style ryokan for very exclusive use. On Sing gave him a generous loan, and while I know we are being undercharged for this visit, we aren't staying for free. But your Zhai Feng seemed unnaturally excited about Jack and you taking a vacation." Gabriel paused. "Athena and my team detected no surveillance equipment..."

"Feng is just..." Living vicariously? Boundlessly enthusiastic? Too rich and unpredictable for her own good? "A supportive friend," you said, choosing the diplomatic words. "Is this one of those morally questionable things? You know? Taking trips from corporate bigwigs/Triad bosses?"

"I know how it looks, but it will be very hard to prove a connection between Jack and On Sing. This place is squeaky clean. I ran the financials myself." Gabriel crossed his arms. "Why? Do you really think she'll try to leverage Jack-?"

"No," you said. "Not at all. But yeah, it does look bad."

Gabriel shrugged. "Personally, I think she owes you and Jack for haring off to Mongolia to save her ass, so I have no trouble accepting her help in setting this up as a "thank you" gift, provided that's all it is."

"So, you know the baths are all nude, right?"

"That was a selling point," Gabriel said smugly. "And they have the pretty robes you can walk around in all day. I'm ready to get changed. Starting today this is a no-pants zone." He pulled off his shirt and opened a drawer in one of the end tables, pulling out a geometric-patterned hunter green cotton yukata and silvery hanten, a half coat to wear over it. "...You know, I think your friend picked the outfits."

You opened one drawer and found a too-large silvery gray yukata with a navy blue hanten. That was definitely for Jack. So you opened the third drawer and found a black yukata patterned with violet and blue butterflies and a lilac hanten. Underneath it was a much-shorter-than-decent purple and white yukata, and you raised your brows. "I think you're right."

Gabriel was already stripping down. He pulled on the robe, tied the black belt to secure it, and slipped on the overcoat.

"Fancy," you said.

"Put yours on," Gabriel said, adjusting his clothes.

You changed quickly, though it took you a few tries to get the robe tied on shut. It probably wasn't correct, but it wasn't falling open either. The lightweight fabric was pretty and comfortable. Remembering the snow, you put on the coat too.

"There should be towels downstairs," Gabriel said, looking you over with approval. "In case you want to do some fighting-"
"You're hilarious." You admired Gabriel's frame in the pretty robes. "Genji is going to be very jealous," you chuckled.

"Don't care about that," Gabriel leaned forward and kissed you, teeth grazing your bottom lip. "How do you feel?"

"I...need to explore before I give you my opinion," you said, a little breathless.

Gabriel laughed softly. "Is that so? What do you want to explore? I thought you knew every inch of my body by now, at least the important ones. Or did you want to test out that futon?"

"I meant the resort," you said, shaking your head.

You found a large stack of massive fluffy green towels in the closet downstairs. There was a brochure on the bar and you thumbed through it, inspecting the variety of natural rock springs. There was a big open air spring. There was a large wooden pavilion built over a deeper manmade pool. There was shallower soaking pool beside it, under another pavilion. There was a sauna. You didn't need to read any more. You just needed to go get in the water.

And of course there was a small comic detailing the Japanese style of bathing: shower and scrub first, till you were clean, then go soak. It was a sensible order of operations.

Gabriel came up behind you, carrying a caddy of soaps and lotions. "Your meddling friend sent us a whole damn spa set." He didn't sound displeased though. "Want to wash up on the back porch and try out our private soaking pool?"

"...I want to check out the big ones," you said.

Gabriel laughed softly, leaning over to brush your hair aside and kiss the back of your neck. "Why don't we wait for Jack? He'll feel left out if we do all the exploring without him."

You winced, feeling a little guilty at your thoughtlessness. "Yeah, you're right." You should stick around the house in case he got here sooner rather than later. "I'm kind of hungry. I guess I'll grab us something light-

"Go wash off and soak. I'll get us something and be out there in a minute. I see how you keep eyeing that pool."

"If you're sure..." you said, already walking toward the back door, carrying the soaps and shampoos. You found three pairs of wooden sandals by the door and switched out your inside shoes.

There was wooden deck directly under the balcony and a small wooden shower stall with a stool. A fence enclosed the area behind the house, with a large wooden pavilion built over the small spring. Rocks and carefully cultivated shrubs decorated the area. Some were dusted in snow. Water bubbled up from a rock formation on the side. It was about three meters long and three meters wide, with raised flat rocks around the edges so you could set your stuff down.

The air was cold, even if the steam warmed you. You stripped down quickly, scrubbing off in the shower stall. Thankfully the water came out hot. Feng had sent some "milk-scented" shower gel, not that it actually smelled anything like milk, and that was probably a good thing.

You left the soaps in the stall and carried your towel and robe down to the edge of the pool. Dipping a toe in the water, you found it just on the hot side of comfortable. Well, it was too cold to stand around. You got in quickly. There was shelf about two feet down that that you could sit on, but you went a little deeper, till you were submerged up to your neck. You leaned against the shelf, sighing happily as the hot water enveloped you.

"Comfortable?" Gabriel strode to edge of the water and set down two travel mugs, a plate of sliced melon, and his own towel.

"Very," you sighed. "I'll just stay here for the rest of the trip."

"Drink." He tapped a cup. "In the hot water, you'll dehydrate without even noticing."

You sipped the cool water, knowing that he remembered how you managed to make yourself sick after the spa attack. It was the little things. "It's bad manners to eat in the bath."

"Yes, but who's going to tell?" Gabriel asked, raising a brow.

"Good point."

He was still dressed, and he eyed your folded yukata briefly, before heading back up to the deck to rinse off.

You closed your eyes, just savoring the relaxing effect the heat had on your tense muscles. Yes, you needed a huge bathtub. Or one of these. Just soaking in this much hot water seemed unspeakably decadent.

The water rippled and you opened one eye to see Gabriel sliding into the water beside you.

"Enjoying yourself?" He picked up the plate of melon and offered you a bite. You took it, the fruit juicy and cool in your mouth. He leaned over to kiss you after, his lips sweet like the melon.

"Very much so," you sighed, resting your head against his shoulder. "Thank you."

"You looked so upset when we landed," he said, his smile easy and light. "I should have taken a picture."

You shrugged, too relaxed to care about that now. He rubbed the back of your neck and you curled up against him.

"Falling asleep already?" He asked, nipping your ear.

"It's so comfortable," you groaned. "And you won't let me drown. Besides, I know how to float."

"Come here." He put you in his lap, his arms around you. "We can't stay in here too long," he said.

"You're not the boss of me."

Gabriel chuckled. "We are off-duty. So I'm not." He didn't sound the least bit disappointed though.
Eyes falling shut, you let yourself drift.

The firm pressure on your thighs had you wiggling, but you grumbled, not opening your eyes. Something brushed against your clit and you stiffened. You tried to pull away, but you were locked in place, a familiar solid heat against your back.

"Want me to stop?" Gabriel's voice was low in your ear, one thick finger rubbing against your lower lips.

"No. But we shouldn't-" Your breath hitched and you opened your eyes, still in his lap in the soaking pool. "The caretaker-"

"He's working and this area is fenced off. Doesn't mean he won't hear you though. You'll just have to work extra hard to keep quiet," Gabriel purred in your ear. He pushed a thick finger inside you, and you bit your lip, whining softly.

"Gabriel-"

"Shh," he murmured. "When you say my name like that, it just makes me want to play rough." His other hand squeezed your breasts, and you shuddered against him, two fingers now inside you, his thumb rubbing your clit. "Haven't seen you this relaxed in awhile." He kissed the side of your neck and you arched against him. He scissored his fingers inside you, stretching you and you cried out in surprise.

"Goddamnit!"

Laughing, Gabriel withdrew his fingers. "Turn around, corazon. I want to watch you."

Shakily, you spun around, straddling his lap, his erection pressed against your stomach. "You're a bad influence."

"Yes," he agreed, hands sliding down your hips. "The worst. I need the love of a good man and a good woman to help me change my ways."

"...Well, we're both shit out of luck then," you laughed, nuzzling his cheek. "Jack's an asshole and I'm dubious on the best of days. And maybe I like how you just how you are right now."

"Good enough for me," Gabriel kissed you again.

The water made it easy to position yourself over him. Very slowly, you slid down his length, teeth clenched as you took him all the way inside you. Gabriel dragged you against him, his mouth covering yours, muffling your moans.

He rocked his hips and you clung to him, his girth leaving you deliciously full. "Look at you, all eager and needy in my lap. We don't use this position enough." He thrust slowly and you buried your face in his chest, whimpering as he stretched you out. Even when he was gentle, the intensity still left you weak.

You bit your lip. You needed something like this: a giant jacuzzi, a hot tub, a personal hot spring. That way you could do this more.

Gabriel chuckled. "You feel so good around me. And you're trying so hard to be quiet-" He tilted your chin up, tongue slipping into your mouth as he kissed you hungrily. "Just want to see you coming around me. Then I'll take you upstairs and we can try out the bedding-"

The water lapped against your sides, steam curling off your skin as you slowly rode him. Gabriel slid smoothly in and out of you, head dipping down so he could suck on your nipples. His skin was slick and so very warm. He was in no hurry and you appreciated the languid pleasure gradually increasing with each stroke.

"More," you sighed, squeezing him tighter.

"Whatever you want." There was no sharpness in his smile, and he had none of the worry lines you were used to seeing etched on his brow, just easy smiles and tender looks. Gabriel's unguarded expression made your heart stutter.

He rubbed your clit, and you covered your mouth with one hand, a squeak escaping your lips.

"Going slow now, but later, I'm going to fuck you into those mats," he growled in your ear. "And you can scream as loud as you want then. In fact, I'll be disappointed if you don't." He began to bounce you, his strokes speeding up.

Gabriel and Jack couldn't help talking dirty. You didn't mind.

"Can't wait for Jack to get here," he purred in your ear. "He's been looking forward to this all week. Given how much you're liking this, you're going to have to think up a nice "thank you" for him. Don't worry, If you're having trouble, I'll help..."

"Gabriel, please," you panted. "Can't-"

"So close already?" He groaned, voice growing raw. "You like doing it out here that much, huh?" He rolled his hips and you dug your nails into his chest. "I know Jack likes fucking outdoors too. It's the farmboy way. Later we can both bend you over the edge of the pool. Love it when you're all slippery and relaxed. You won't have to worry about getting caught. I know you won't be so loud with my cock in your mouth-" His fingers sped up and you squealed. He kissed you quickly, cock, fingers, and tongue all pushing you closer to your release.

And the thought of Jack out here, fucking you from behind while you sucked Gabriel off, was too much. Pressed against Gabriel's body, you trembled, the orgasm pulsing through your core in slow, steady waves. Gabriel gradually stopped moving, letting you cling to him as you came.

Face tucked in the crook his neck, you breathed slowly as your heartbeat too loud in your ears. Gabriel rubbed your back, his cock still stiff inside you.

"Do you need a moment?"

"Yeah. I...melted, in a blissful way," you exhaled.

"You're very warm," he said, kissing your cheeks. "We shouldn't stay in here much longer."

"OK," you sighed, making no move to get off of him.
Shaking his head, Gabriel reached back and grabbed one of the cups. He handed it to you and you drank slowly, the cool water sweeter and more refreshing than you expected. After you set the cup down, he lifted you off his lap, kissing the tip of your nose.

"Let's go upstairs. You can rest if you need to-"

"Want to take care of you," you said.

"Then we have to get out of the water."

Giving an exaggerated and longsuffering groan, you climbed out of the water. The air was cold, and the shock of it cut through your hazy mind. But your skin still radiated heat, and the air was a brisk, energizing shot through your veins. You weren't so tired now. Quickly, you toweled yourself off before you wrapped back up in your yukata.

Gabriel climbed out, getting dressed as well. He picked up the plate and cups. You plucked a chunk of sweet fruit off the platter and offered it to him. Gabriel took it gently, giving you a crooked smile.

"Let's go upstairs," he said.

The bedroom was the target destination, but Gabriel kept trapping you against the kitchen counter, stealing kisses, and clutching you against him. You shoved him off, laughing, and he nearly dropped the plate of melon.

"I thought you said "upstairs!"

"I did. So move your sweet ass." But then he caught you around the waist, his knee sliding between your thighs.

"Can't when you're-" You squirmed as he nibbled on your shoulder. "You're doing this on purpose!"

"And?" He said, voice smooth and full of promise. "I just want to play, hermosa. You're always so serious..."

"I'm the serious one?" You shot him an incredulous look. "Look here, Mr. Surly-Face..."

"Mean nicknames? I'm wounded, chica. Aren't you having fun?" He ground against you, chest pressed firmly against your back, and you whined softly, squeezing your legs together. One hand came up and roughly fondled your breasts through the yukata. "What's the hold up? You don't want to go upstairs?" His fingers traced your lips.

You bit him, hard. Because he was being difficult. Because it was funny. Because you definitely wanted to go upstairs right now and he was delaying you both.

Gabriel grunted and released you. "You brat." His laugh was rough and cheerful. "Now you're in for it-"

You made a break for the stairs, stumbling mid-step when he caught up to you and slapped your ass. "Gabriel!"
He grabbed your ankle and you kicked his hand away as he tripped you at the top of the stairs. You climbed to your feet, giggling as he swore. You made it three steps past the top before he pounced on you, pushing you onto the futon, your legs tangled up in your long robe.

"Damnit!" You swore as he pinned you to the cushions. He lay on top of you, his chest firmly against your back.

"Now I have you right where I want you," he purred, cock pressed against your ass. "Thought you could get away, huh?"

"No, why would I want that?" you panted, grinning over your shoulder as you rubbed back against him.

"So you just like having me chase you?" Gabriel rumbled, sounding pleased. His beard rubbed against your shoulder as he kissed the side of your neck.

"Guess so." You wiggled out from under him, then rolled sideways onto your back, to avoid his grab. Snarling, Gabriel lunged and dropped back on top of you, his elbows trapping your hips, his weight on your thighs. You enjoyed his slightly frustrated look.

"Am I going to have to tie you up?" He asked, kissing your stomach.

You just laughed, propping yourself up on your elbows. "I thought you wanted to play. And we're messing up the bedding--"

Gabriel dragged you toward him, lifting your legs over his shoulders. He pushed your yukata up around your hips, and flicked his tongue against your slit.

You arched against him, eyes rolling back as his tongue slid inside you. His beard rubbed against your sensitive skin, and you squirmed, hands tangling in his hair.

"I thought we were going to take care of you next." It was a struggle to keep your voice even.

"We'll get to that soon enough," Gabriel said, nipping your inner thigh. "Feel like doing this first. Unless you don't want me to..." He looked up at you, brown eyes gleaming with amusement.

"I didn't say that."

"Good." To your surprise, he took your hands in his bigger ones, pressing them against the futon. Then he dipped his head between your thighs and began to suck on your clit. You tried to wriggle away, but he held you flat against the bed. You whimpered as he hummed around you, the vibrations shooting straight to your core.

"Want your fingers, your cock, need you inside me," you panted, already chasing your release.

"Later," he rasped, mouth slick with your juices. "Love how you taste, hermosa. Love hearing you beg for me. You're so cute right now, all warm and soft from the bath. And I haven't forgotten that you like holding hands when you come."

"Didn't think you'd be so sweet."

"I don't have to be," he said, his smile wicked.
You shivered as he sucked on your inner thigh, his tongue teasing you now, his mouth everywhere but on your clit. You strained against him, but his grip on your wrists remained firm. You stayed flat on the ground. His tongue would wiggle across your folds, and then deep inside you, and just as you started to get close, he would stop.

"Please," you said, voice cracking.

"So polite." His dark eyes gleamed with mischief. "What do you want, baby girl?"

"I want to come, you jerk. Stop teasing me."

"But I'm enjoying this. I could do it for hours," he laughed, voice low. "Besides, thought you didn't want me to be "so sweet." I'm just trying to give you what you want, you fickle thing."

"Stop teasing me, please," you panted. "Please, papi." You squeezed his fingers, whining softly as the blade of his tongue dragged against you, the pressure on your clit increasing. You squeezed your thighs around his head and he went harder, switching between firm licks, hard suction, and that infernally teasing humming.

He held you tight against the bedding, giving you no space to move. You were helpless to do anything besides receive his care. Your legs tensed, feet flexing, toes curling. He sucked harder on your clit, tongue pressed rigidly against you, working you closer and closer to another release.

You started babbling then, telling him how much you needed him, how much you loved this, how much you liked holding his damn hands. Your nerves burned, though the ache inside your core increased. The pressure on your clit intensified. Friction, warmth, and the feel of his mouth had you coming on his face. Your eyes rolled back, hips shaking, voice breaking as you cried his name. This time he didn't stop his ministrations. He just kept going, obviously hearing your pleas, and not giving a damn. The pleasurable heat sharpened into fire and you shrieked as he kept up the pressure.

You were a keening, twitching mess when he finally released you, aftershocks still running through your body.

Gabriel chuckled, lifting his head. His face was damp and he leaned forward, kissing you hard. You tasted sweet and tangy on his tongue. His loosened his grip your fingers then, taking a moment to kiss the knuckles on each hand.

"Too much," you panted and he touched his forehead to yours.

"Lies." Gabriel stroked your stomach, never breaking eye contact. His beard glistened with your juices and you swallowed roughly. "We're just getting warmed up."

"You're just insatiable. You and Jack both."

"What's wrong? Need a break?" Gabriel asked, laying on his side next to you. "Didn't realize you were so delicate. Such a frail little-"

"Shut it." Giving him a dirty look you shoved him onto his back and he grinned up at you, expression cocky.

"Oh, is that how it's going to be?"

You didn't answer, you just straddled his thighs, freeing his thick cock from the confines of the robe. It was heavy and dribbling with precum and you gave it a wet kiss, licking the head. His skin was deliciously warm and sensitive.

"Thought you wanted me inside you," he said hoarsely, fingers gripping the blankets.

"My mouth doesn't count?" You asked, all mock innocence.

"I think we both know what the end game is. But feel free to pretend like you don't want it. Makes it all the more fun when you're begging." The bastard was shameless, and you loved it.

You responded by sucking on the tip, watching him shudder, his eyes fluttering shut as you swallowed him down, his velvety cock filling your throat. You bobbed your head, working your way to the hilt. But he remained silent, even as you scraped your teeth against the shaft, your nails digging into his hips.

"If you want to get rough, hermosa, you better remember that I give as good as I get." Impatience colored his tone.

You released his cock, giving him a hard look, one that would have had your students quaking in their boots. Instead, Gabriel's smile widened, his amusement all too clear.

"You're so pretty," he sighed, reaching forward to pat your face. "So proud and vicious. Come on baby. You don't have to prove anything to me. Just want to see you riding me. We can be as loud as we want this time. Do you like that? Hearing me come undone, corazon?"

You bit your lip, watching his chest rise and fall with shallow hard breaths. Sweat trickled down his neck. He wasn't as unaffected as he liked to act.

"What do you want?" Your voice was raw and you squeezed his cock.

"Want to be inside your silky little pussy," he groaned. "I've been patient, baby. Weren't you going to take care of me next? Haven't I been good for you?" There was an almost desperate edge to his words, and your breath hitched. Gabriel didn't usually ask like this. He just overwhelmed you with lust or a well-timed, completely sincere, emotional sucker punch.

You were already wet enough to take him. Raising your hips, you locked eyes with him, watching him grit his teeth in anticipation. Then you dropped down onto him, your hands pressed against his stomach, bracing yourself as you took him to the hilt.

"Fuck!" Gabriel's head fell backward. He arched beneath you, briefly raising his hips and you off the floor. You stiffened and he reached out, steadying you as he dropped back into the bedding.

Breathing fast, you planted your knees on the floor. He groaned, core muscles tightening as he rose a few inches off the mats, resting his weight on his elbows. You could see the smarmy remark forming on his lips.

So you began to move, not giving him the chance to speak. You rode him hard, pulling yourself halfway off his cock before taking him all back inside again. Gabriel gripped the blankets, rolling his hips as he tried to speed up. You just moved with him, only taking him at your pace.

He snarled at you, words guttural and not all in English. You weren't sure about some of those threats, but you didn't care, it was worth it to have him under you, thrashing and swearing. Teeth clenched, muscles taut, he watched you, the harsh look on his face promising savage retribution.
"I like being on top too," you moaned. "I can go as fast or slow as I want, and you just have to take it." That wasn't exactly true: you had more leverage, it was easier for you to control how much of him you let fill you. But it was an advantage, not a guarantee of success.

"Is that what you like?" Gabriel asked, voice throaty and dangerous. "Teasing me? That's a dangerous game."

"You've given me a taste for it," you said, swatting his hand away from your clit. "No, Gabriel. I'm going to outlast you this time." You squeezed your inner muscles, and he swore, fists clenching at his sides. "I'm going to ride this cock till you're coming inside me. Love how messy you get. Yeah, I like it sweet and gentle." You lifted one of his hands to your lips, kissing the scarred knuckles. "But you're right, I am proud and vicious, and you've earned this. So lie back and enjoy it."

Gabriel groaned beneath you, thrusting upward as you focused on taking his whole shaft. Your ass slapped against his thighs, the slick sounds of sex echoing through the room. You loosened his robe, raking your nails down his chest and he arched again, dark nipples hardened into stiff peaks.

"Come on, baby. I love it when you raw me. Love how you stretch me out, fuck me senseless, and just keep going. I can't wait to repay the favor. Because some time soon, Jack and I are going to ambush you again. And this time, he isn't going to distract me."

"Big talk," Gabriel gasped, his cock twitching inside you. "Looking forward to seeing you try."

You leaned forward, and bit him hard, ass bouncing as you sped up.

Strangled curses barely came out of his throat, and Gabriel wrapped one arm around your waist, hips bucking faster as he dug his heels into the bedding. You tried to push back against him, to regain control, but he held on to you, cock driving harder into your slick pussy.

"Couldn't take it any more?" You teased between rough gasps. "Need to fill me up that badly? Go on then, papi. We both know how much you like coming inside me. I like it too, how it feels, how sloppy you get me, how you and Jack both want to keep fucking me till you're oozing out of all my holes—"

With a guttural moan, he buried his face in your chest, tightening his grip on you as he sprayed his seed inside you. He held on tight, rolling his hips for a good few minutes, and breathing hard. Groaning, he dropped onto his back, one arm still curved possessively around your waist.

"You're going to pay for that," he said his voice rough from exertion.

"I know," you sighed, leaning over to kiss him. "That's a bonus." You lifted yourself off him, not missing how his eyes focused on your pussy and cum-stained thighs, a satisfied smile on his lips.

"Is that so?"

The world went sideways and suddenly you were on your stomach, ass in the air, Gabriel's hands on your hips.

"Let's see how many bonus rounds you can handle." He laughed, already twitching against your thighs. "Don't think you'll be so cocky for very long, hermosa."
You buried your face in the blankets, cursing as Gabriel's cock battered at your sensitive walls. He kept slapping your ass and you shrieked, each strike making you clench around his shaft.

You gripped the blankets, hips moving involuntarily, still trying to match his rhythm. You were in no position to keep up, but he seemed more interested in coaxing reactions out of you than reducing you to putty. And you were very well aware of how easily he could do both.

Somewhere along the line he'd stripped off the yukata. You were technically still wearing yours, though most of it was bunched around your hips, the belt loose, your exposed breasts pressed against the comforter.

"Wasn't planning on wrecking you on the first night, but you make it so damn hard to resist-
" His hand slid between your thighs and began to stroke circles around your clit.

"Goddamnit, Gabriel!"

"So loud too," he groaned as began to thrust harder, every other stroke going deep.

A thump caught your attention and you froze. You raised your head, eyes widening as the bedroom door slid open.

Jack stood there in jeans and a hoodie, a duffel bag slung over his shoulder, his hair mussed. He took one look at you and his gaze darkened. He tossed the bag onto the ground and stalked forward, still wearing his outdoor shoes.

"Amor, Gabriel breathed, leaning forward to kiss the latecomer.

"Babe." Jack dropped to his knees beside you.

Gabriel sped up, groaning into Jack's mouth.

You angled your head so you could watch them, clenching as Jack gripped Gabriel's curls. When he finally came up for air, his cheeks were pink. He leaned over and cupped your chin, and kissing you hard, his teeth grazing your lips. You moaned against him, Gabriel thrusting harder inside you, determined to drive you over the edge.

Jack sank back on his heels, the bulge in his jeans very apparent. "Look at you two. You're so fucking beautiful. Best thing to walk in on." He petted your cheek. "Don't stop now."

Gabriel's fingers slipped between your thighs, and the next stroke had bruising force behind it. He pounded you into the blankets. Your back bowed, fingers clawing at the mats. You wailed, eyes locked on Jack's, his smile somewhere between dazed and enraptured.

"That's it, let's give Jack a good show, hermosa. Come all over my dick, so he can see just how well I've been taking care of you-"

Your muscles clamped down around Gabriel squeezing him hard, the intensity making your knees buckle. You could feel the spasms trying to drag him deeper inside you. Gabriel embraced you from behind, holding you too tightly as he filled you once more.
Panting, you sprawled boneless on the ground.

Jack stroked your hair. "Sweetheart, it's taking all my self control not to jump you right now."

"Give me a moment-" you rasped as Gabriel pulled out. "We'll take care of you next."

"No. Mr. Ito said dinner was almost ready. He's bringing it over soon." Jack rubbed your back. "Later. You need time to recover."

You lifted your head, a little worried. "Are you...feeling OK?"

Jack kissed you hard, his fingertips digging into your skin. "You have no idea how badly I want you both. But I have plans for tomorrow." His lips twitched, and hands lingering on your shoulders. "And a little anticipation will just make it sweeter."

Chapter End Notes

Smut takes forever to write, unless it writes itself. Which sometimes happens, but not usually. After vacation, we may not see smut for awhile, because writing this was hard and slowed everything down.

I have been to a few Japanese bathhouses and one medium-range hotel/bathhouse. But I was a dumb kid who didn't entirely appreciate the awesomeness of the baths and saunas. The real highlight for me was running around the hotel in a yukata playing video games with my cousins. Sure, I didn't speak a lick of Japanese, and their English and Chinese weren't very good, but we had fun. (Though I burned through 1000 yen waaaaay too quickly, because several of the games cost 100 yen each.) (To be fair, I was with extended family and made sure to take off my glasses, because I didn't really want to see any of them naked.) So, this is some of my nostalgia combined with fantasy. Sorry guys.

Playing the waiting game on the medical bills, because the US system is shit. Had my insurance and the hospital billing network on the phone at the same time, and both agents were super uncomfortable, because I made them explain some charges that apparently I shouldn't have received. But I have to call back later this week for the hospital to "inquire" about them. Because they're not going to call me back, even though they're in the wrong. (I spent Monday playing phone tag with my insurance, the hospital network billing system, the doctor's office, and the out-of-state lab itself.)

Meanwhile, I have to wait for the doctor's office to get back with me on the lab tests that were coded wrong and the ONE person (they have like a dozen people in that office at any given time, but don't ask me what they do), is out for the next two weeks. I didn't have anything especially fancy done. I had an annual, which is considered preventative care. No rare diseases. No gushing wounds. Just "hey, we need to make sure your lady parts are working how they're supposed to."

Anyway, I've come to terms with the fact I have this bill, need to take my argument up on four different fronts. And I'll probably have to pay some of it. Fine. But now I'm too pissed (and poor) to just eat the cost.
My friend is awaiting her tests and I just...yeah. She's pretty stressed.

My dogs are fine, thankfully. I can only handle so many things going wrong at once, before I start trying to time-travel-sleep through my problems. "If I sleep for 48 hours, maybe this problem will go away? No? OK, make it 72."

My cousin is still fighting the lawnmower. He took the carburetor out, cleaned it, and it worked great for an hour before it died. New spark plugs maybe? Or new carburetor? Well, don't buy the Lowe's Troy-Bilt brand of mower. This started giving us trouble under a year after I bought it.

Looking at updating every 4 days or so for awhile, because I'm still not caught up. -_- ;;

You guys are great and I hope your week is going well!
You showered quickly, and when you emerged, Jack was in the gray yukata, shoes off, and a sheepish smile on his face. Gabriel was dressed again and he handed you your slightly wrinkled yukata. You sighed and redressed yourself, not missing the way Jack's hungry gaze lingered on your body.

"I think I like this "no pants" rule," Jack said. "We should consider instituting it back at-"

"No Jack," Gabriel said, rolling his eyes. "I like watching you flail around in those tiny little exercise shorts, pretending like you're working out and not just wiggling your ass on the mats."

Jack shrugged, like he'd expected the idea to be shot down. "So Gabe tells me your initial reaction wasn't...favorable."

"...There was snow on the ground. I figured we'd be in Portugal or Spain. Maybe Morocco. Seeing snow in the summer really horrified me."

Jack laughed softly. "I'm sorry I missed it." He leaned in and kissed your nose. "But I trust you feel differently now?"

"I'm impressed," you said, running your hands down his chest, smoothing the collar of his robe. "Thank you. It was a good surprise. I'm really excited about all the hot springs."

Jack's face lit up, his smile terribly boyish. "That's good. Come on, let's go downstairs. I want to try out the kotatsu."

"It's a leg-warmer, not a blanket fort, Jack," Gabriel said.

"I know that!" Jack leaned back to kiss Gabriel. "But Lucky and I can kind of fit under there."

"There's probably not enough room for that," you said.

Jack just sighed, not bothering to hide his disappointment.
Shin, Genji, and even Hanzo had waxed poetic about washoku or traditional Japanese food and Mr. Ito's onsen offered kaiseki meals, the multicourse haute cuisine of Japan. The combinations tended to be seasonal, regional, artistic, and come in very small portions. Not ideal for hungry super soldiers.

So you were a little surprised by the number trays he and his omnic helpers carried in.

"I apologize for deviating from the traditional meals," he said, looking slightly embarrassed. "But our mutual friend insisted on providing a customized dinner menu. The kaiseki banquet is scheduled for the last day of your stay..."

You glanced at Gabriel who looked a little disappointed and Jack who just eyed the covered trays with great interest.

"She thought you should start with the nabe. It is hearty and best shared among friends." Nabe was Japanese hotpot, where the food was cooked in the middle of the table, with everyone dropping ingredients into the flavored broth. "It is a filling meal that everyone can enjoy."

Portion size was a factor. And maybe Feng was worried that washoku wouldn't be to Jack's tastes. It was a legitimate concern, though fundamentally wrong. Jack wasn't picky. He would eat anything. His preferences just skewed bland Midwestern American.

An omnic placed a large ceramic pot on a flat portable burner in the center of the table. The contents began to simmer almost immediately, and the omnics began setting trays of chopped raw vegetables, artfully arranged seafood, and thinly sliced meat on the table. Chopsticks, tongs, individual bowls, and a variety of dipping sauces came next.

You knew what to do. As the ceramic pot simmered, you began putting slices of beef and chicken into the pot. You followed up with some napa cabbage, carrots slices cut like flowers, and several varieties of mushrooms.

"Can we just dump it all in?" Jack wondered.

"No, the seafood will get overcooked," Gabriel scowled.

"Mr. King is right. Mrs. King was correct to put in the meat first. It needs to cook longer," Mr. Ito said.

Jack gave you and Gabriel a long questioning look.

"Don't worry, buddy," Gabriel laughed. "We'll handle it for you." There were several more temperature-controlled trays set on the counter.

"It looks like you have everything under control. Please let us know if you need anything else." Bowing, Mr. Ito and his staff left you to it.

"So...?" Jack raised a brow. "Want to explain the aliases?"

"That was all Gabriel," you said, fishing a piece of beef out of the soup. You tasted it, sighing at the rich flavor and silky texture.
Gabriel laughed. "She was just as shocked."

"You realize Mr. Ito used to be an On Sing spymaster, right? He's retired, not senile," Jack said, shaking his head. "He is very aware of our identities and security requirements. He's just playing along because I'm guessing Feng is being...Feng."

"I figured," Gabriel shrugged. "But he referred to Lucky as my wife, and I just ran with it."

You hurriedly shoveled some chicken into Gabriel's bowl and then dumped some more in Jack's bowl.

Jack gave you a sly look. "Embarrassed you, did he?"

You couldn't tell if Jack was talking about Ito or Gabriel. "I'm putting some prawns, salmon, and tofu in next. And the beef is really good too-"

"Yes, and it was adorable," Gabriel smirked. "I was hoping to introduce you as the other Mr. King. One husband and one wife, right? That's the normal number, right?" He dumped half a platter of beef into the pot and then added some sweet potatoes as an afterthought.

Jack laughed, leaning over to press a wet kiss to Gabriel's cheek. "You're such an ass, Gabe."

You weren't sure what to say. So you just stared at the pot, watching the broth start to simmer.

---

Jack and Gabriel ate their way through all the trays. You helped, of course, but something about the cold weather really stirred their appetites. Jack even drank the last of the soup, with noodles, and then sprawled across the mats, his head in Gabriel's lap, his feet rubbing against yours under the blanket. The space under the table was comfortably warm. The heat and the food coma robbed you of any desire to move.

"For food I had to cook myself, that was really good..." Jack groaned.

Gabriel snorted. "You just fished it out of the pot, Jack. That doesn't qualify as cooking it yourself, not really."

"Well, you two cooked it. I just ate what you told me to, and hey, that was the most flavorful boiled cabbage I've ever had," Jack said, grinning up at you.

"I don't know if I can move," you said, leaning against the table. "And if you squeeze me, I will totally lose my dinner."

"Don't worry, we can sleep in tomorrow," Jack sighed, shutting his eyes. "There's a lot of premade food and cooking ingredients available for breakfast and lunch. Mr. Ito will handle our dinners. Unless you want to special order something."

"After dinner drinks?" Gabriel asked, gesturing to the bar.

"I need a moment," Jack said, patting his stomach. "But yes."
"Sure," you said. "Though I wouldn't say "no" to dessert either. Just a little bit," you said, holding your thumb and index finger an inch apart.

"Did you get enough to eat?" Jack asked, lifted his head, suddenly looking worried. "I know Gabe and me devoured most of the food, and-

"Do you really think she would quietly go hungry? You've seen her fight me for pizza and cake," Gabriel laughed, tweaking Jack's nose. "Not everyone has your metabolism, Jack."

"Just making sure," Jack said, a content smile on his face. Gabriel patted Jack's shoulder and Jack moved, letting Gabriel get up.

"What would you like to drink?" Gabriel asked.

"Something sweet," Jack said. "But not too sweet."

"...That's very helpful," Gabriel said, shaking his head. He ambled over to the bar to inspect the bottles.

"So how did you pick this place?" You reclined on the tatami, angling yourself so you could look at Jack, his calloused foot rubbed your ankles.

"You're the one who told me about Athena helping you plan vacations," Jack said, adjusting the cushion under his head. "She was a little...hesitant at first. I guess the two of you are pretty good friends."

"She didn't give me any warning about this," you said.

"I know. But later on, she was very excited about being able to help surprise you."

You blinked at that.

"She's a fun conspirator," Jack said. "I think you've been a bigger influence on her than anyone expected."

"Like I'm the only sneaky person she talks to," you said, rolling your eyes.

"Well, she gave me some ideas, but obviously we had to choose somewhere discrete, yet not too far from Zurich. I was originally going to pick an out-of-the-way beach, but on a whim, I asked Feng for suggestions."

You frowned. "You just...randomly sent her a message asking her for vacation ideas?"

"No. We talk occasionally. Sometimes she sends me these long rambling messages when she should be working." And you understood that Jack took the time to read them when he should have been working. "They go on about her day and how much she hates dealing with committees. And even though she can punch half of her human problems through walls, she knows that will just make the situation worse." Jack laughed. "I can empathize. She's asked for tips on how to stay awake during boring meetings, outside of abusing stims."

You stared at the wood-paneled ceiling. You hadn't realized that Jack and Feng were actually trying to be friends. Not that that was a bad thing. You just hadn't expected it. "I can see that."

"So then she tells me she has the perfect solution. From what Mr. Ito has relayed, this was a retirement project for him, more of a hobby than a moneymaking venture. But then Feng got excited and...well, you know what happens when she gets excited."

"Things blow up?" You laughed softly.

"Metaphorically, yes." Jack chuckled. "Anyway, if you want to sign the "thank you" card I'm sending after we get back, well, I know she'd like that."

"Whatever. You know she's going to invite me to Shanghai, demand I review the whole vacation, and try to pry details out of me."

Gabriel returned to the table with a tray of jiggling Japanese style sponge cake, a bowl of sliced strawberries, and a bottle of champagne.

"You sap!" Jack laughed, sitting up to kiss Gabriel. "Champagne is so overrated."

Gabriel just smiled, pressing a strawberry to Jack's lips. Tongue flicking out, Jack took the berry, kissing Gabriel's fingers.

"I have an entirely sentimental fondness for it," Gabriel said, turning those liquid dark eyes on you. "The first time I kissed you, you tasted of champagne and lipstick. It's not something I can forget."

Warmth, that had nothing to do with food, crept through your belly.

"There's more to it than that," Jack said, giving Gabriel an easy smile. "The first time we had a proper date, one where we went off base, ate at a fancy restaurant, got a hotel and everything - Gabriel fed me strawberries and champagne in bed. The champagne was cheap. The strawberries were sour. But I'll never say "no" to them," Jack sighed, cupping Gabriel's face.

"You left out the part where you spilled it all over the bed," Gabriel laughed, nose to nose with Jack. "The strawberries and the entire bottle of wine. Honestly, it was the clumsiest thing I'd ever seen."

"Shut up, Gabe," Jack murmured, bridging the inches between them. He kissed Gabriel hard, fingers carding through his hair.

They were so damn beautiful and seeing them like this, happy and almost carefree, made your chest tighten. In their yukata, they cut elegant figures. You didn't miss how Gabriel's fingers gripped Jack's sleeve or how Jack's arm curved possessively around Gabriel's neck. You were still too stuffed to start cuddling comfortably, so you took over handling the dessert tray.

You dropped a few strawberries in each glass, and then poured the champagne over them. Then you sliced the white dome-shaped cake, powdered sugar clinging to the knife.

There was the rustle of fabric, and when you looked up, Gabriel had seated himself on one side of you, mere inches away, and Jack was on your other side.

"I don't know why you're surprised. She's always made that abundantly clear," Gabriel said.

"I was getting everything prepared for you," you protested. "I would have joined in the cuddling, but I'm still really full. If you hug me, best case scenario I will belch at you. Worst case..."

Both men laughed.

"She's full and she still wants cake," Jack teased, kissing your cheek. "I told you, she knows her priorities..."

The fluffy cake was gone, and you kind of wanted more because you had not eaten it all. But now you were extremely full and moving seemed like a terrible idea.

Jack lay face up on the floor, a silly smile on his face. He rested his head in your lap, sporadically turning his head to kiss your knees.

Gabriel sat beside you, stealing kisses and finishing off the last of the champagne. You'd been at the ryokan for several hours now and the sun was still shining. You stared out the window, then at the clock. Then back outside. The clock said 2300 hours. You stared at the clock again, to check if you'd misread the time. Nope. So then you started looking for another clock that wasn't broken.

"What time is it really?"

"The clock's right, baby. Midnight sun, remember?" Gabriel said. "It's summer and we're pretty far north."

"...That explains the blackout curtains." You shook your head. "I forgot."

Jack laughed. "We can go for a walk later. Heard "night time" was a good time to see animals. They have reindeer, and foxes, and bunnies..."

"Or we can stay inside where it's warm," you said. "You know I didn't pack any cold-weather clothes, because someone wanted to be a clever sneak and wouldn't tell me what to bring."

"I did tell you: fancy lingerie," Jack said, his smile dreamy.

"We could go for a late night swim," Gabriel said, bending over to kiss Jack's forehead.

"No, you have to wait an hour after eating before you get in the pool," Jack said, his cheeks flushed.

"No, you don't," you said, rolling your eyes.

"Gabe, tell her you have to wait one hour before swimming or she'll cramp up and drown!"

"Jack, that's an old wives' tale," Gabriel sighed, shaking his head. "And anyway the soaking pools are shallow. We've done it plenty of times-"

Jack groaned. "We're enhanced, Gabe."

You snorted. "It's not going to work, Jack. You didn't drink that much. And I know you're not actually that silly."

"Damnit," Jack laughed, rolling onto his stomach, his hair mussed. "OK, you got me. But I really want to go for a short nature walk. Please? We can warm up in the baths afterward."

"You can borrow our hoodies. We brought extra just for you," Gabriel said, pressing a kiss against your temple.

Jack stared up at you, his eyes bright and hopeful.

"A soak after a brisk walk will feel even better," Gabriel murmured in your ear.

"I'll give you a back rub afterward," Jack said.

"OK, OK," you groaned, unable to withstand their combined persuasion. "Just...give me few more minutes to digest."

You triple-layered the hoodies, jamming your gloved hands into the pockets. An armed Athena drone trailed a few yards behind you.

Though the sun was still visible, it was twilight now. Here in the mountains, the landscape was a mixture of stubborn greenery and rock formations. The snow had stopped falling, but it still clung to the stones and capped the higher reaches of the terrain.

Whistling, Jack led the way, traipsing through the valley, swinging his arms.

You followed, taking in the scenery. It was majestic, if cold. But in some ways, mostly the cold and the isolation, it reminded you of the Ninth Circle. That dampened your enjoyment.

Gabriel brought up the rear, like he expected you to try to sneak back to the inn and hide in a hot spring. Which, to be fair, you had considered doing.

"Hey, look!" Jack stopped abruptly, and you nearly ran into his back. Following his line of sight, you saw three small gray-brown foxes pouncing on something in the grass: rabbits or mice probably. They looked too small and completely the wrong color to be red foxes. "Never seen those before."

"Arctic foxes," Gabriel said.

You remembered hearing about them in Canada, but never actually catching sight of any any. Probably because they blended in with the awful amount of snow. "I thought they were fluffier and white."

"Summer coats," Gabriel said. "A lot of tundra fauna have seasonal camouflage: ermine, ptarmigans, some lemmings and hares."

"He knows things," Jack whispered in your ear. "It's very sexy."

"It is," you agreed, nodding solemnly.

"Some of us actually read books," Gabriel said, not looking impressed by your lack of animal knowledge.
"Nerd," Jack coughed.

Gabriel raised a brow. You didn't even see him move. One moment he was giving Jack a "Really, son?" look, the next he was wrestling Jack into the grass, laughing as Jack sputtered underneath him.

"Nerd, huh?" Gabriel smirked, straddling Jack's chest.

"Sexy nerd," Jack sighed, grinning up at Gabriel.

Gabriel leaned down to kiss Jack.

It lasted for half a second, and suddenly Gabriel was flat on his back, Jack in the dominant seat. Gabriel didn't protest, he just wrapped his legs around Jack's waist. Jack bent over and continued the kiss.

The commotion had scared the foxes off, which was probably for the better. At this rate, Jack might spontaneously decide that he wanted to pet them and try to catch one. And you could just picture Angela's disgruntled expression if Jack had to get a rabies vaccine on vacation...

"The grass is pretty soft," Jack said, glancing up at you.

"Surprisingly so," Gabriel said, kissing Jack's chin.

"No fucking way. It's too cold to roll around on the ground. Don't even try, Morrison." As soon as the words left your mouth, you knew you'd made a terrible mistake.

"Oh?" Jack's lips quirked upward, excitement lighting up his eyes. Because you'd just issued him a personal challenge.

"Don't you dare!" Swearing, you started running back up the hill toward the ryokan. Given your activities today, you were nowhere near your fastest. Pulse pounding, you could hear his heavy footsteps gaining on you.

You felt the air shift, and Jack tackled you, his arms wrapped around your waist. You fell forward, cursing as you landed hard, your palms and knees absorbing most of the impact.

"Gotcha!"

Growling, you kicked backward, your boots making contact with his shins.

"Ow!" Jack laughed, but didn't let go. "Gabe, help me out!"

"You better not!" You snarled, and threw an elbow backward, shifting your weight against his chest.

Jack made an "oomph" noise, and his grip on you loosened. You dug your metal fingers into his wrists, and wiggled out of his grasp. Then you kicked him off, grinning as he yelped.

"Gabe!" Jack lay on his back, holding his stomach while he laughed, eyes squeezed shut. "Gabe, help me!"

"You'll get no sympathy from me, jackass," Gabriel chuckled, crouching beside you. "You're the instigator."

"But you jumped me first!"
"And?"

You glanced down at your palms. Your gloves were muddy. But your pants were torn in the knees and both knees were scraped bloody.

Gabriel clucked his tongue. "You all right, chica?"

"Pfft, I'm fine." You dusted off your legs. "It's Jack you're going to have to rescue."

Jack was already on his feet, laughing as he ran back toward the inn. "I'm sorry, baby! I-I'm going to wait till you calm down! You're still beautiful when you're angry!"

"Get back here and say it to my face, Morrison!" You shouted back, pettiness giving you the speed boost you'd lacked earlier.

You couldn't catch him. Not now, and probably not without bait, traps, or mechanical assistance. Sulking, you rinsed off in the deck shower, scrubbing the mud off your legs.

"Do you want to come see some of the bigger pools?" Gabriel asked, leaning in the doorway, conspicuously not wearing a shirt.

You muttered something ungracious about cowardly blonde Strike Commanders.

Gabriel just laughed. "Jack wants me to parley for him."

You scowled at him. "Jack owes me a back rub, new pants, and actually a whole lot more clothes..."

"He'll deliver on the backrub immediately. He just asks, and I quote, "Not in the face and not in the dick. Please." End quote."

You smiled, in spite of yourself. "I'm too tired to try to wander off and figure out the other baths. But I'm getting in the water and yes, I would like company." Turning off the shower, you grabbed your yukata and towel, not bothering to dress as you headed toward the pool. You walked slow, hips swaying.

It was cold, but knowing that Jack and Gabriel were watching you saunter naked down the steps was a thrill in and of itself. You set your things down and slipped into the water, making a point not to look in their direction.

Laughing, Gabriel stripped down quickly and rinsed off. He didn't linger in the shower. His footsteps thudded against the deck as he made his way down to the hot spring.

You just closed your eyes, basking in the heat.

Gabriel settled in next to you, putting one arm around your shoulders. "Jack, make sure you bring cold drinks."

You opened your eyes as Jack set a tray down behind you. He was back in his robe, his hair damp and falling in his face. He gave you a wide smile.
"Is it safe?"

"I'll get you back later," you sighed. "I'm enjoying myself too much right now."

Jack did not hesitate. He practically tossed his yukata in the air and plunged into the water beside you. There was a lot more splashing than necessary. He handed you a glass of something orange, a generous dollop of vanilla ice cream floating on top.

"...What have you done?" You asked, staring at the glass.

"It said "Applesín," but it doesn't taste like apples or sin. Well, what I think sin tastes like."

You gave him a long look.

While you didn't entirely trust Jack's taste buds, it didn't sound like a bad combination. You took a sip. It was fizzier than you expected, a sweet mix of oranges and cream. "Not bad." You took another drink, waiting for the other shoe to drop.

Jack cuddled up beside you, kissing your cheek. "I'm glad you like it. Not just the drink. The vacation. I think we all needed time away from work."

You set the glass on the tray and tapped your shoulders. "I'm not arguing. But I want that back rub now."

"As you wish." A pair of strong hands wrapped around your waist and you stiffened as Jack lifted you onto his lap. You perched on his thighs, relaxing as he began squeezing your shoulders. He worked his hands down your shoulder blades to your low back and you leaned forward, giving him room to maneuver.

"Is there anything you wanted to do?" You asked him, eyes shut.

"The nature-walk was nice," Jack said. "But you aren't the only one excited about the pools and saunas. Honestly, I'm just glad to get away for a few days."

"Same," Gabriel said with a yawn.

"Think I'm starting to burn out," Jack said casually.

You opened one eye, a little surprised by this candidness. "Oh?"

"Sometimes I forget why I took this job in the first place," Jack said, his voice low. "I mean, back in the day when it was just a squad against the omnic armies, it wasn't like there was much of choice. Now... It's a lot different."

"It was a calling," Gabriel said with soft certainty.

"Yeah," Jack continued to massage your taut muscles. "It wasn't a career, it was a crusade. And then things changed. Things are more stable, but also more complicated. I think...I think I'm too used to going from crisis to crisis. Everything is serious business and I feel like I have to be there, or things will go to shit. Which is partially arrogance, partially an terribly overdeveloped sense of personal responsibility."

"I think we all ended up that way," Gabriel said, reaching over you to pat Jack's back. "It doesn't help that we are very good at this."

"I just have unfinished business," you said. "But I...like my job. Wouldn't want your jobs though. Too much responsibility."

"Being a field agent was fun," Jack said wistfully.

"Being his squad leader was not," Gabriel said dryly. "Jack wasn't so much a hothead as a valiant idiot."

"I believe it," you said, recalling the events of I Need Coffee with unhealthy clarity.

"You can't really point fingers, sweetheart," Jack said and kissed the back of your neck. "Cobblestone Dust shaved years off my life." He didn't bring up Greece, and for that you were grateful.

"You're both idiots," Gabriel said, a note of strain creeping into his voice. "Though Lucky takes less risks than you, Jack."

"But she takes bigger risks," Jack said, his fingers tightening on your shoulders briefly.

"Don't know what you mean," you said with a yawn. "We're all risking our lives when we go into the field."

Gabriel made a disapproving sound in the back of his throat.

"Guess we better make sure they're worth it," Jack said after a moment.

"Damn straight I do," you scowled. "I'm not a hero like you, Jack. All that talk about hope and the human spirit goes straight over my head. I'm out there because I have a mission to complete. Usually something small that just might help tip the scales in our favor."

Jack rested his chin on your shoulder, his hands wrapped tightly around your waist. "I don't do this because of some high-minded ideals, sweetheart. I'm here because of the people. I want a safer world for Michael and Maggie, for Jane and the kids. I want better things for Gabe and for you. And the black ops lifestyle isn't...it's not fair to either of you."

You shrugged.

"I wanted to make the world a better place. But now as I get older, I've come to realize that's an abstract metric. I know it sounds selfish, but maybe I just want to make the world a better, safer place for the people I care about. That's...easier to measure."

Jack's words came out slow and thoughtful.

"You're preaching to the choir, Jack," Gabriel said, leaning in to kiss Jack's neck. "But Lucky and I are both adults. We chose this."

"Maybe," Jack said. "Maybe you just realized that you could do the job better than most and stuck to it. You're both overly responsible like that."

You snorted. "You give me too much credit, I'm just vindictive. But you're absolutely right about Gabriel."

"You can be both vindictive and overly responsible," Jack said. "In fact, we're all pretty vindictive too. Some of us more than others." Jack patted your back.
"I have more unfinished business than you do, Jack." The words slipped out too easily, sharper than you intended.

"I know," Jack said. "But I'm giving you a backrub, so maybe you could hold off on your violent revenge for awhile, please?"

The three of you knew that wasn't what you meant, but you appreciated the redirect. You took one of his hands in yours, kissing the calloused fingers.

"How about one right here?" He pointed to his lips, making the duck face.

"Mmm, I thought you said, and I quote, "not in the face and not in the dick." End quote."

Gabriel started laughing.

"You set the terms and conditions," Gabriel said. "I face no such restrictions."

Laughing, you reached over and kissed Gabriel's cheek.

You slept till afternoon, Jack sprawled out beside you. You awoke to the a tray rattling beside your head. Opening one eye, you were unsurprised to see Gabriel in his yukata, putting another tray down above Jack's head.

Breakfast was fresh cut fruit, thick slices of rye toast topped with smoked fish, and fluffy omelettes filled with cheese and cubes of smoked lamb. There was also a large mug of strong coffee. Not traditional Japanese fare at all. Apparently, Ito stocked Icelandic food as well, not that you were complaining.

"Thank you," you said, pulling the blanket over your head, but not before you'd grabbed a slice of toast.

"You're not going to come explore with me?" Gabriel asked, sitting down beside you.

"Later," you grumbled, mouth full of bread. "I'm still tired."

"You sure?" He teased, pulling the blanket back down.

"Gabriel," you whined. "I don't want to get up-"

"Jack?"

"Wuh?" Jack mumbled, rolling over and wrapping his arms around your waist. "Mmm, is that breakfast, babe? You're the best," he sighed happily. "He's the best, isn't he sweetheart?"

Gabriel snorted. "You two are ridiculous. You don't mind if I go check out some of the facility, do you?"

"No," you yawned. "Sorry, I'll be down as soon as I can."
"Take your time," Gabriel said, leaning over and kissing your forehead. "Eat your breakfast before Jack does. I'm going to do some laps and then soak."

"OK," you said, deciding not hurry, because you'd seen Gabriel's morning exercise routine. You weren't going to be able to keep up and you didn't feel like trying.

Gabriel changed out of his yukata into exercise shorts and a hoodie. You tried not to ogle him, but the shorts clung to his thighs and you stared, just a little. Apparently, oblivious to your fascination, Gabriel left, quietly shutting the door behind him.

...No, he knew. There was no way he didn't notice. He was just being a goddamn tease. Shaking your head, you slowly ate your toast, brows going up as Jack began to nibble on your shoulder.

"Goddamnit, Jack."

"Bite," he chuckled, eyes still closed.

You offered him some berries. He licked your fingers and you rolled your eyes. "You have your own, Jack."

He just laughed and nuzzled your neck. "Yours tastes better." He stretched his arms out, then opened his eyes, smile lazy and content. "Good morning."

"Good afternoon."

"Even better," he grinned. "Sleep well?" He reached over you a snagged a berry off your tray.

"Yeah," you said, resigned to the fact Jack would be stealing bites of your food. "Taking it easy."

"That's the plan." Jack brushed his hair out of his face. "Gabriel is amazing though. Before him, I'd gotten breakfast in bed once or twice. But he does it whenever he has the chance." He sighed. "I've tried to make it for him a few times, but it's always something easy like toaster pastries or scrambled eggs and toast." Jack shook his head.

"It's food he didn't have to cook, brought to him in the comfort of his own bed."

"You're right." Jack reached over and stole chunks of melon off your plate.

"And you pick up food. It's not exactly the same as cooking, but he loves it when you bring doughnuts." You took a bite of your omelette. "If he's happy, that's what matters, yeah? Just try to mix it up more. We can't all eat the same thing every day."

"That taco truck he likes sells breakfast burritos," Jack said, after a moment. "And churros. Damn, I didn't even think about that. Thanks." He kissed your cheek. "I know you like breakfast in bed too. Mostly because you end up sleeping the longest out of all of us-"

"I'm not enhanced! I need more sleep!" You scowled.

"Usually because we've fucked you into exhaustion," he continued, looking smug. "Not that I'm complaining," Jack rubbed his nose against yours. "Just making an observation. But you do like it a lot, right?"
"I like whenever you guys bring me food. Even if it's a lettuce and cheese sandwich."

Jack groaned, flopping down beside you. "So, was Gabe your first bed and breakfast boyfriend?"

"It was Shin," you said, taking another bite of omelette.

Jack nodded, not looking surprised at all. "What kind of things did he make?"

"Sometimes it was toast or pancakes, fruit, eggs, and bacon, sometimes it was rice and fish, with miso soup, and pickled vegetables." You lay back on your pillow, recalling the first time you'd awakened alone in his bed, wondering if that was a cue for you to leave. After about five minutes of indecision, the door opened, and there he was, carrying a bag and smelling like food. He'd gotten up extra early, cooked rice, eggs, and fish, and served it with oranges and coffee.

He played it off like he was the hungry one. He felt like starting the day with a home-cooked meal, and it was no big deal. And you accepted that answer, even though it started happening more regularly, and only when you spent the night in his quarters.

"You never really talk about him," Jack said, too casually as he rested his head on your shoulder.

"It seems awkward to talk about your dead ex with your two current boyfriends," you said dryly.

"Mmm, I guess when you put it like that," Jack said. "But back in Paris, you seemed kind of happy to have an opportunity to talk about him."

You blinked, remembering sneaking off to the rooftop with Jack and eating chocolate croissants and drinking coffee. Right before a goddamn terrorist attack ruined the rest of the day.

"It doesn't bother me," Jack said. "You talking about him fondly. If you don't want to talk about him, I understand. But I don't know enough about your life before Zurich. And I'd like to."

"It bothers Gabriel," you said after a moment. "Not just when I talk about Shin, but when I talk about anyone from Black Base Delta. He's never asked me not to speak of them. But he gets that look on his face..." You sighed. "Like it hurts him to hear about any of it."

Jack nodded. "I've noticed."

You shrugged. "I talk to the shrink. Don't feel obligated to-"

He flicked you between the eyes. "You don't have to tell me anything you don't want to. But I'd like to hear whatever you're willing to share. I don't feel obligated at all. I feel guilty though. You've met my family and now a lot of my friends from before Overwatch..." He trailed off. "I didn't ask before, not because it didn't occur to me or I didn't think it was important. I didn't ask because you always looked so unhappy. And I don't want you to feel unhappy. But I guess I forgot that it's OK if we have to talk about uncomfortable things. I'm not just here for the good food, great cuddles, and spectacular sex."

"Ah," you said, words failing. You sat up slowly, picking up the coffee and sipping it. You needed to be more awake for this conversation.

Jack sat up beside you, watching you carefully.
"I don't know very much about Captain Patel's life outside of my former squad," you said when the coffee was gone. "I heard she was married."

"Yes," Jack said. "She never had children. But she opened her home to a lot of us. Her husband isn't talking to Gabe or me now." There was deep sigh and he put an arm around your shoulder. "But I think he'd see you, if you ever wanted to go to New Orleans."

"...I'll keep that in mind," you said, filing away that tidbit of information. "I mean, you've heard about some things about my old squadmates." Especially after Candle Arc and Lao.

"I'd like to hear more," Jack said, placing his tray on his lap and offering you a bite of melon. "It doesn't have to be some kind of epic war story. Anything you want to tell me, about anyone you want to talk about. Start easy. Pick something casual."

"Nwazue didn't really like me, but she was kind of like Chang: all business with no patience for fuckups."

"I wouldn't call you a fuckup, sweetheart," Jack said firmly.

"Oh, she had my back," you added quickly, seeing the disapproval in his eyes. "But it was obvious she thought I was an idiot, and she wasn't wrong." You stared at your metal fingers. "I wish I'd gotten to know her better. She was sharp and she was from Numbani. I always wanted to ask her questions about it, but I was kind of scared to." You sighed. "I think we could have been friends though, eventually. But now...that's not possible."

"You were friends with everyone else though."

"Yeah." You nodded. "I...don't ask people a lot of questions about their backgrounds. Not because I don't care, but because I figure if they want to share, they will. And if they aren't telling me, then they have a reason. Either way, it's none of my business."

"Sometimes people are like you," Jack said dryly. "They'd like to share, but they don't want to "burden" other people."

You shrugged sheepishly.

"There's a way people get when they want talk about things, but can't. They'll bring up a topic and then drop it, one step before they actually ask permission to talk about it. Uh...almost like when someone wants to confess during an interrogation. You just have to give them the opportunity to do so. Whether it's staying quiet, or giving them some kind of reassurance so they can save face, or maybe just refraining from punching them so they can talk," Jack said so plainly that you choked on your toast.

Jack patted your back, laughing as you coughed and sputtered.

"You're right," you said, reflecting on his words.

"I know, it's strange that someone who's so bad at feelings is pretty good at reading people." He kissed your cheek. "But I have to have some skills."

You shook your head, taking another bite of omelette. "You have plenty of skills. Stop fishing for compliments."

"Tell me about Shin. About your time together. Don't leave out the bad bits. Otherwise, I'll be eternally jealous of the guy I've never met and won't ever be able to measure up to."
You smiled in spite of your discomfort, knowing Shin would have gotten a kick out of that.

"Tell me about your smuggler days. Did you deal exclusively in pants? How much Overwatch memorabilia did you transport?" Jack grinned. "Do you want to run a side business selling more personal objects? Because if so, we could probably start with Ana's hats."

"I like living," you said, shaking your head.

"Tell me about your life before," he said, voice softer, smile fading. "Who did you want to be? What did you want to do? What do you miss the most?" He took your hand in his. "Tell me whatever you want to share, and maybe some things you don't. Whatever you can. I want to know."

"That's a lot, Jack."

"There's a lot I don't know," he admitted. "But I want to."

There was a dry lump in your throat, and it wasn't from the bread. You finished your breakfast, setting aside the tray and then slipping back under the covers, your eyes focusing on the wood panels of the ceiling. "Shin hated cleaning. He was always trying to sneak his laundry in with mine. He was cheerfully and insufferably right, till he realized he was wrong, usually a day or two later. He was an unabashed showoff-" You wiped your eyes.

Jack set his tray aside and lay next to you, propped up on one arm. "Sounds difficult," he said, lips gentle against your ear. "Not familiar at all."

Chapter End Notes

Neighbors called city zoning on us because our grass IN THE BACKYARD was too high. Because the lawn mower was broken. Facepalm I am 90% sure who it was, though there is the 10% chance it was another neighbor's realtor. I know, first world problems, but I'm just like for fuck's sake, some of us have to work for a living. They were having cookout parties all weekend; three days in a row there were extra cars parked in front of my place because of it. My cousin got the yard taken care of, but now we're like "...it's petty revenge time." Nothing illegal, but we looking at investing in some extremely obnoxious lawn ornaments and lots of pinwheels. Anyone know where I can get spiders in bulk?

Still playing medical bill phone tag, but it's progressing slowly.

Work has me enraged. Back to job hunting. I've found anger and spite to be great motivators for getting shit done, though maybe a bad influence on life choices/creeds.

Trying to catch up on writing. It's slow, but I think if I get my life back under control, it will get better. I just need a bigger stick to hit things/people with. :D
Chapter 76

Chapter Summary

Now that you have some downtime, it's time to address the elephant(s) in the relationship.

Chapter Notes

Hairypurrter did a dynamic Lucky picture!

Meggyloops did an adorable drawing of the trio and I'm still not over the cuteness.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Wrapped in your yukata and a coat, you left the guesthouse. Jack was going to do dishes, but he urged you to go find Gabriel. You'd stayed in bed longer than you intended.

There was a heated pool, covered by a wooden awning. You could swim laps in it. The sauna was a large wooden building, and you looked forward to trying that out too. Eventually, you found Gabriel sitting in a smaller pool, the size of the one behind the guesthouse, his robe folded on the towel.

"Took you long enough," he said, giving you a once over. "Where's Jack?"

"Doing dishes," you said. "He sent me ahead. We felt bad that we'd left you alone for so long."

Gabriel just laughed, stretching out in the water. "It didn't take you that long to eat, did it?"

"Jack wanted to talk," you said, crossing your arms as the wind picked up.

"Come on in," Gabriel said, his smile wide. "We can talk in here too."

"You just want to see me naked," you said, shaking your head, already taking off the coat.

"That's not all I want," Gabriel said with a sharp grin. "So what were the two of you talking about?"

"My old squad," you said, shivering as you set your robe atop your towel. "Mostly Shin. Some-" You froze as you slid into the water. Not quite literally, but close enough. Hyperventilating, you glared at Gabriel, your eyes wide, your muscles locking up. It felt like needles digging into every inch of your skin. Your breaths came in short panicked bursts. He had been sitting in ice cold water.

Flailing, you scrambled out of the pool grabbing your towel and robe. What the hell? Who sat around in freezing water? Why?
Gabriel laughed uproariously, head thrown back, hands slapping the water with great unruly splashing.

Your teeth were chattering so badly, you couldn't even yell at him. "H-h-hate you!" You tried to wrap yourself up, but your hands shook too hard and the cold wind wasn't helping.

Still chuckling, Gabriel rose, icy water pouring off his body. He toweled off and slung his robe over his shoulder, not bothering to get dressed. Picking you up, he held you against his shockingly warm chest. "Having trouble?"

"That was mean!" You hissed as he kissed your cheek.

"It was hilarious," he purred. "Don't worry, hermosa. I can think of several ways to warm you up."

"Sauna," you snarled. "I want to go to the sauna and we're not having sex in there. In fact, we may never have sex again!"

Gabriel just laughed harder, but he carried you into the sauna.

You were still sulking when Jack arrived, carrying water bottles and his towel. He looked between you and Gabriel, expression questioning. There were two tiers of wooden benches and you sat in the corner farthest from Gabriel. He stayed by the charcoal brazier, pouring water over the coals. There was some kind of fragrance in the water, a mix of citrus and astringent herbs.

"What happened?"

"I invited her into the water," Gabriel smirked. "And now she's out of sorts."

"It was freezing cold," you snapped.

"I didn't make you get in," he said, still unrepentant. "Not my fault you didn't ask. Anyway, your face was priceless."

Jack laughed, leaning over to kiss Gabriel. "Thank you for breakfast. Sorry we took so long." He sat down beside Gabriel and patted the spot beside him. "Come over here, sweetheart."

Sighing, you settled for sitting in the row above him, giving the back of Gabriel's head dirty looks.

Jack leaned back, his head against your knees. "Want me to warm you up?"

"No sex in the sauna," you said.

"Really? Is that where your mind goes?" Jack just smiled. "I was just going to rub your back."

That was an offer you couldn't refuse. You laid down on your stomach, the warm wood comfortable against your bare skin. Jack turned around, his hands already running down your spine.
"Lucky said you were talking about Agent Sato," Gabriel said.

"Unsurprisingly, she has good taste in men," Jack said brightly. "I learned a lot. I know she doesn't usually talk about Black Base Delta with you, because she knows it upsets you. I think you told me something nearly identical."

You froze. Jack was a meddling blabbermouth. You narrowed your eyes at him.

"Jack, you weren't supposed to-"

"I wouldn't have said anything sweetheart, except you two are both reading the situation wrong," Jack said, unapologetically.

"Were you...holding back because you thought it bothered me?" Gabriel asked, hunched over, the humor in his voice gone.

"...Yeah," you said. "I mean, I wasn't ready to say much about Shin till...recently. Since your hallucination in the cave, that might have been some kind of real. "But whenever I bring up Captain Patel-" He flinched and you sighed. "You react like that."

"It's not you," he said hoarsely. "And you should to talk about them." Gabriel turned around to face you, his eyes dark and heavy with emotion. "...I have my own unresolved issues about what happened back there." He leaned against the bench, his face level with yours. "But I didn't mean to make you think you couldn't talk about your people with me."

"They were my people too. Aishani and your Lao included."

The addition of Lao surprised you, but you tried not to show it.

"Was trying to avoid hurting you," you mumbled, because it sounded ridiculous to your ears. But it was the truth. "But I guess just sitting silently on your grief instead of talking about it is bad for you too. Fuck, I should've realized..." And you were uniquely situated to talk to Gabriel about the events at the Ninth Circle. Even if he didn't want to talk about them, it would have been good for him to get some of the unresolved trauma off his chest. You shook your head, disappointed at your own shortsightedness. "Sorry."

There was odd moment of silence as Gabriel's brow furrowed. "Corazon, there's nothing for you to apologize for. If anything, I should have...been more open. It would have helped us both." He drew in a shaky breath. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to do that to you."

Maybe you had both been projecting your own discomfort on the other. You weren't sure. You had only seen what you expected to see, and Jack of all people had to be the insightful one. That wasn't exactly a good sign.

Gabriel stroked your hair with his free hand, his palms damp from the humidity. "So you were trying to protect my delicate feelings?"

You frowned at him. "Don't laugh."

"I'm not. It's not something I'm used to hearing. The Blackwatch Commander is a hardass strategist who doesn't have time for weakness and most people certainly don't consider his feelings." Gabriel kissed your cheek. "So thank you."

You blew out a frustrated breath. "You're ridiculous."

"Yes, we both are. Because it seems like Jack was the emotionally savvy one in this case."
Gabriel’s gaze slid to the man beside him. The reddish-pink man looked too pleased, even as he sweated bullets.

"Shut up," Jack said, good-naturedly, smacking Gabriel’s arm. "It's not my fault you're bad at communication-"

"I'm bad at communication?" Gabriel scowled. "Who was the one-?"

"Hey, you should be thanking me!" Jack laughed, pushing forward to kiss Gabriel.

"Thank you, amor," Gabriel murmured, when he broke away from Jack. "Your blush is very cute."

"It's the heat," Jack said, not looking displeased. "I look like a lobster."

"A sexy lobster." Gabriel winked, then turned back to you. "Better communication. That’s something we can all work on."

"Yeah, all right." You drew in a deep breath, wondering if that was the invitation you'd been waiting for. It really was past time to pin him down and make him answer your questions. "To celebrate this newfound openness, I have questions. Lots of them."

"I am obviously over six feet tall, without the boots, no matter what my paperwork says," Gabriel said, giving Jack a dirty look. "I grew a little after SEP, I swear."

You couldn’t quite smile, not with what you had to ask. "Gabriel, I want to know the truth. How bad it your condition? What range of symptoms are we looking at? I know you've been collecting geneticists, but you haven't-"

Gabriel's eyes widened briefly, then he kissed your knee. "I don't have a lot of answers yet. I'm not secretly dying, if that's what you're worried about."

You crossed your arms. "Tell me more."

"The complications are increasing. The hyperthermia is getting worse. I'm having to be more careful about my mission selection." He ground his teeth together, not looking at you. "Under normal circumstances, my body can regulate itself. Environmental conditions can exacerbate it, but it's my metabolic production that's excessive. I'm fine in the sauna as long as I take it easy. However, exertion-based overheating is just a symptom. There are some instabilities on a genetic level, and that's the unintended side effect of SEP."

You took a moment to digest it all. "You mean, you don't know if things could get worse?"

"They could and likely will. I don't know if it will go beyond hyperthermia, but that's enough on it's own." He shook his head. "Yes, I've commissioned several geneticists to look at it. Chang has a less severe version of the issue and her contacts are sharing data with mine. Andre has people looking into it too. I'm not sitting by and doing nothing. There's just nothing conclusive to share yet."

You looked at Jack, who watched Gabriel with a mournful look on his face. None of this came as a surprise to him, you realized. Of course, Jack knew; he was SEP too. But Gabriel's condition hadn't exactly been his secret to share. It still stung that they had kept everything quiet from you.

"Didn't say much more because I didn't want you to worry," Gabriel said, recognizing the look on your face. "I know, that's not reasonable. But I don't have any answers yet."

"Have you talked to Feng? Crazy AI auntie was a world renowned geneticist. At the very least-"

"I think we've involved enough people," Gabriel said dryly.

"But-"

"Maybe later," Gabriel said firmly. "Weren't you worried about how it'll look if our close connection to On Sing comes out?"

"That's not as important as you-"

"Maybe later," he repeated. "That's a lot of leverage, corazon. I'm still not sold on their trustworthiness and things aren't that dire yet."

Jack said nothing, and you wondered if they'd already had this argument.

"Anything else, besides the overheating?" You asked. "You mentioned other instabilities..."

"I'm sterile now," Gabriel said, after a moment. He looked away from you.

"Oh," you said, brain trying to catch up. "I'm sorry."

He shrugged. "I found out after our trip to London. Never got around to telling you. I'm sorry, I should have. I was...working through it. And then everything went to Hell."

You shrugged. "I understand."

The three of you sat there, you trying to process everything. You had actively avoided the idea of children, but you knew Gabriel wanted them. And you knew that this had to hurt him. So you focused on his pain instead of your discomfort with the nebulous idea of family and childbirth. That's what you needed to deal with now. You hugged him from behind.

"Tell me what you're thinking," Gabriel said, gruffly. "I...didn't want to put any pressure on you about the future but, I guess now that we're talking about everything..."

"Gabriel Reyes, if you think I'd ditch you because you're going through health problems-"

"I know that," he said, sounding amused. "I meant...children. We've always glossed over the topic." And right then, you realized that he and Jack must have agreed not to push you on the subject. You weren't sure how you felt about that, maybe a little outraged that they conspired to keep things from you, maybe a little grateful that they'd been sensitive enough to delay this discussion till you were somewhat ready for it.

You stared at the wall. "I don't know if I'm responsible enough to handle a dog, let alone another human. But I know you and Jack want children. They're not a deal breaker either way."

You rubbed the back of your neck, the heat becoming prickly on your bare skin. Or maybe that was just nerves. You were nowhere near ready, not with Shit Spiders, Petras, and Zenyatta all hanging over your head.

Jack opened a bottle of water and handed it to you. "There's nothing wrong with adoption. We have a few more options when we get to that point."

You blinked, unable to pinpoint when that point would be. "Umm..."
"No pressure, sweetheart," Jack said quickly.

"Are you...?" You started to ask, then cut yourself off, because maybe Jack didn't want to talk about it either.

"Low sperm count," he admitted. "But not impossible. And you don't have to be involved, if you don't want to be. Gabe and I have already talked about surrogates and in vitro fertilization. If you wanted to donate an egg or even do more than that, that's entirely up to you. You're not a broodmare. It's not fair to expect that of you, and we don't. Honest."

"She'd be a nightmare, honestly," Gabriel muttered, a small smile on his face.

You drained the water bottle and let that comment go, mostly because you did not want to think about the mechanics and helplessness of pregnancy. You'd spent your life being very careful. You didn't have the time or resources to raise a child right, not on your own anyway. And whether or not you had the inclination, well there were more pressing matters.

"I was kidding, sort of," Gabriel said, rubbing your cheek.

"You're not wrong," you said. "That's not a position I want to be in any time soon. Things are too messy right now."

"Yeah," Gabriel said, kissing your face. "I get that."

"We'll get a dog first," Jack said. "What kind of dog do you want?"

"A well-mannered one, like Bandit," you said. glancing at Gabriel.

Gabriel snorted. "You can stop soft-selling me the dog. I know which way the wind's blowing. At this point I wouldn't dare to rehome that beast. We'd have an insurrection on our hands. Genji was in the office the other day, suggesting we get him certified as a therapy dog. Jack's been spending more time at the range, coincidentally when Jesse and the mutt are there. Even Vo likes him, and she's terrified of anything vaguely canine."

"Jesse sent me a picture of him in a bandana with a little cowboy hat," you admitted. "He matches Jesse. It's really cute. Amélie got it for him."

Jack flashed you a pained look. "That's cruel."

"Bandit seemed to like it," you said with a shrug.

"Maybe a cat would be easier," Gabriel said, after a moment. "They're more independent."

You pictured Gabriel in bed with a kitten rolling around on his bare chest and you had to cover your mouth. What if it was two kittens, one in each arm? Oh God...

"It would have to live with one of you. I barely have room for my plants--"

"Which are still alive, despite your fears," Gabriel pointed out.

You weren't sure how to respond to that, so you just shrugged. "Dumb luck."

"You're not giving yourself enough credit," Gabriel said. "When you weren't sure what to do, you asked, and you did research. That's how you handle new situations. You're not meant to know everything right off the bat."
"That's what I did with your orchid," Jack said proudly.

"Exactly," Gabriel said, looking so very pleased. Maybe he'd been skeptical of Jack's ability to take care of something with his Strike Commander schedule. Granted a plant was very different from an animal and an animal was very different from a child.

"One step at a time," Jack said, kissing you, then Gabriel. "We can make these decisions together. As long as we're talking about the issues and not pretending they don't exist."

Gabriel sighed. "I love you both. I'm sorry that I didn't tell you sooner, and that I can't guarantee you-.

"We have no guarantees," you said, softly. And there's nothing to apologize for." You cupped his chin. "Except for tricking me into the ice bath. You should be very sorry about that."

Gabriel just laughed, not sounding very sorry at all.

You'd finished off the water bottles Jack brought into the sauna. But your muscles still felt like jelly and you wobbled when you as you walked back to the guesthouse.

"We need to rehydrate," Gabriel said, placing a steadying hand on your shoulder.

"And nap," you sighed. The heat had left you drained. "I definitely need another nap."

"You just got up," Gabriel said, a little disapproving. Maybe you were ruining one of his clever plans.

"Yeah, but we can all lay there together, drinking water, and cuddling." Jack nudged Gabriel with his hip. "How decadent is that? Spending the day in bed?"

"Wasn't there ice cream in the freezer?" You asked, leaning against Gabriel. "We can cuddle up, eat ice cream, and watch a movie..."

"I get to pick the movie," Gabriel said gruffly, his frown especially pronounced. "Especially if you're planning on falling asleep on me."

Gabriel sat between you and Jack, his robe loose and sliding down his shoulders as he settled in on the futon. You fluffed your pillow and placed it against his lap, your hands sliding underneath to squeeze his thighs.

Jack had his arm around Gabriel's shoulders, one hand gently massaging his scalp through the curls.

A big budget modern adaption of Hamlet, complete with omnic thespians and elaborate costumes, played on the screen. It kept the original script, though the setting was contemporary, and Hamlet himself was an omnic.

You sleepily nuzzled Gabriel's stomach and closed your eyes, one arm thrown across his waist. Dozing lightly, you could still hear Jack and Gabriel talking, but you had no idea what they were saying. Their voices were soothing, and you sighed happily as Gabriel's hand rested on your head.

"If you don't wake up soon, you won't get any ice cream." Jack's voice cut through your warm cocoon of sleep.

Yawning, you opened your eyes. "You weren't going to save any for me?"

"We did, but it's starting to melt. The movie's over," Gabriel said, his hand now rubbing circles on your back.

"Oh." You sat up slowly, grinning as Jack fed you a spoonful of salted caramel ice cream. "Thank you."

Jack leaned in to kiss you, his lips icy and sweet. He lingered there, propped up on one elbow. "Feeling better?" He offered you more ice cream.

"Yeah."

Gabriel tugged on a lock of your hair and you tilted your head back, accepting a warmer kiss from him.

"Gabe and I were talking," Jack said, giving you another bite. You held your hand out for the spoon, but Jack ignored it, instead scooping more ice cream for you. "How many kids do you want?"

You choked on your ice cream, coughing violently as Gabriel patted your back.

Jack, the bastard, just laughed. "I think somewhere between two to four at a time is reasonable. But-"

"At a time?" You croaked. "Like...twins and triplets?"

"That would be really efficient," Jack said thoughtfully. "But no, I mean, Gabe's been talking about a lot of war orphans. We could adopt later in life. Too few, and they'd be spoiled. Too many, and they wouldn't get enough attention."

You glanced up at Gabriel, hoping your alarm didn't show.

He was giving Jack a tolerant smile. "Stop teasing her, Jack."

"I'm completely serious. Four was pushing it for my parents, but with the three of us-"

You snatched the spoon and the ice cream out of his hands. "I'm not all awake, Jack. You can't just hit me with that right off the bat."

"OK, how many dogs do you want? And cats? Maybe goats?" Jack leaned forward, his eyes bright. "We don't have to start with humans. Pets will be great practice."

"Gabriel!" You hissed, pure panic inching its way through your voice.
"Pets would be a good place to start," Gabriel said, his grin all too wicked. "We could get those little slings and carry them around the office. Amélie bought one for Jesse, and he's been walking around with that dog strapped to his chest like a bandolier."

You took a moment to process that. "Pics or it didn't happen."

Gabriel obligingly got out his phone and pulled up a picture of Jesse smiling too widely at the camera, his hands on his hips, Bandit strapped to his chest like a baby. There was something extremely disingenuous about Jesse's smile. You chalked it up to him finding the concept ridiculous, but being too scared of Amélie to say no. Bandit had a big doggy grin on his face, tongue hanging out as he stared up at Jesse adoringly. It was cute, if disturbing.

"...Huh," was all you could muster.

Jack snickered, enjoying this a lot more than you expected.

"We leave for two days and...that happens," you said.

"The kid'll have to learn to fend for himself some day," Gabriel laughed, not sounding the least bit sympathetic. "Having a dog is teaching him responsibility." He made it three seconds before doubling over with laughter.

"We should start with one pet," you said, after the uproar had died down. "Maybe something easy, like a rock."

Jack shook his head. "We don't have to do anything right away, sweetheart. I just wanted to know what you thought. Sorry. I know I sprung it on you, but since we're now talking about this kind of stuff... I guess I got carried away." He rested his head on Gabriel's shoulder, his gaze distant, his smile content.

"...No, I guess it's better we start talking about things," you said, unable to deny the warmth in your belly. "But I really do want to start slow. One pet. We discuss it ahead of time. No surprise kittens, or puppies, or baby giraffes..."

"You want a baby giraffe?" Jack asked, his expression thoughtful.

"No," you said firmly. "I was just making an example. Because our lives are weird and who knows what you'll bring home?"

"No hamsters," Jack muttered. "Never again."

Gabriel rubbed your shoulders. "Parrots?"

"They are extremely needy and neurotic," you said. "Way too high maintenance for our lifestyle."

"How do you know?" Jack asked, tone curious.

"Occasionally smuggled exotics for the black market pet trade," you mumbled. "The parrot was cool, but really difficult. Needed lots of attention in transit, and he acted out loudly if he didn't get it."

"Like a real child," Gabriel said, thoughtfully.

"Did you do that often?" Jack asked. "Smuggling animals?"
"...No, not worth the extra work. On top of taking care of them, some of the rarer creatures were fragile and the liability wasn't great. Inevitably, some animals died in transit. That could get messy." And maybe once you'd gotten a little attached to the smart, beautiful, and extremely expensive bird that was going to decorate some arms dealer's aviary. Handing him over had been hard. Listening to his outraged screeching of, "But I'm a good boy!" over and over as you left had hurt more than you expected.

You looked up, realizing that both Jack and Gabriel had gone quiet. They were both watching you. Concern lined Jack's face, and Gabriel rubbed your shoulders, waiting for you to speak.

"Most of the jobs weren't terrible," you said. "But I didn't like transporting anything with...feelings." You shrugged, knowing you felt less guilt over the exotic fish and reptiles than you did over birds and mammals. "Not my...finest moments."

"Anything you don't want?" Jack asked after a moment.

You almost said "children," but bit your tongue and shrugged. "I guess it's all circumstantial. We can talk about it later."

Mr. Ito had also set up an iron griddle in the center of the table and provided more thin sliced meats, vegetables, and seafood for you to cook while you chatted and ate. Some of the meats came marinated, and there were dipping sauces as well. You didn't mind teppanyaki; it ensured Gabriel and Jack got enough food. But Gabriel looked like he wanted something slightly fancier. This time Mr. Ito stayed, with an omnic who went by "Chef Astro," and they rolled sushi while explaining which fish were in season and what flavor combinations would be ideal.

It was strange to hear an omnic waxing poetic about the fantastic oiliness of winter salmon, the sweetness of young shrimp scooped fresh from their spawning ground, and the foolishness of adding wasabi to your soy sauce because it diminished the spiciness. Did they have taste buds or were there mods for that? You didn't have a clue. But together, both cooks made it work. Mr. Ito would talk about the tradition, while Chef Astro explained the science behind the method.

Gabriel ate the nigiri with his fingers, at Chef Astro's behest. Apparently, loosely-packed nigiri was better than firmly-packed nigiri, and using chopsticks was actually less ideal. Jack just kept pouring meat and sauce on the griddle, and eating it over rice with a raw egg.

You ate from both selections, going between delicate thin-sliced flounder sashimi and robust grilled mushrooms, rich sea urchin nigiri, and seared wagyu beef, marinated mackerel handrolls, and charred bias-cut leeks.

Mr. Ito and Chef Astro happily talked about washoku and Japanese cuisine, and were even more thrilled when Gabriel asked questions about ingredient sourcing, culinary training, and evolving traditions. You chimed in every now and then, but were mostly content to eat and listen. Jack focused mostly on eating, though he did make sure to compliment the chefs. He occasionally tossed whole pieces of sushi into his mouth while he waited for the food on the griddle to finish cooking.

It was odd to be so relaxed around strangers, but then they were enthusiastic cooks and you were hungry diners. It was a universal understanding. There was no mention of On Sing or Overwatch at the dinner table. And you were grateful that the illusion held.

After Mr. Ito and Chef Astro left, you sipped tea and nibbled on grilled peaches. Gabriel had slathered his with ice cream, but Jack had slipped outside, claiming he'd be back soon.

"Are you all right with this?" Gabriel asked, blotting at his mouth with a napkin.

"The food? Hell yeah," you said, licking your lips. "Or did you mean the vacation? Because I should praise Jack more for doing such a good job. I mean, I know he had help, but there's nothing wrong with that."

"...Not what I meant," Gabriel said, leaning over to wipe the corner of your mouth.

"Well, I'm not happy about your condition, but-"

"The talk of pets and children."

You shoved what was left of your peach in your mouth, your smile warping from the fruit bulge and maybe the topic. Chewing slowly, you watched Gabriel's eyebrows rise, knowing your tactic hadn't exactly distracted him. Which was fine, you just had to buy a little time to think of an appropriate response.

"It's strange," you said, after you'd swallowed your food. "I think it will take some getting used to. I've considered getting a pet before, but the time hasn't been right." You shrugged. "Anything else requires a lot more thought and preparation." You paused. "As long as we're not picking out nursery colors, or tiny outfits, or elite preschools, I think I'm OK. Unless you're trying to warn me that Jack is baby-crazy. He's not baby-crazy, is he?" You paused, a terrible thought dawning on you. "Or are you baby-crazy? I'm sorry, I didn't mean it like that. There's nothing wrong with liking babies." Except for the fact they were awful. "Liking babies" was akin to liking parasitic larva or eldritch slug-beasts. But you were wise enough not to say that, even without food in your mouth.

Gabriel just smiled, shaking his head. "No. No one's in a hurry for babies. We remember how much fun Ana had with Fareeha. Wilhelm, Jack, and I eventually had to take a few feeding shifts just to make sure Ana got some sleep. She was...exceptionally dangerous at that time." He stared at his plate for a moment. "Lindholm was shockingly competent too. I didn't expect him to like children."

"How many does he have now?"

"Too many," Gabriel said with a straight face.

"You have no idea, do you?"

Gabriel laughed, not denying your statement.

"Hey, Lucky, get changed into...exercise clothes?" Jack peeked his head in the door, grinning at you.
"...You didn't tell me to bring any," you said, watching his face fall. Then it lit up again. "I'm not going naked." He drooped again. "But I brought some sweats, despite your lack of warning. Give me a moment. I'm still digesting."

Grinning, Jack came inside, making sure to take off his sandals. There wasn't any snow on his yukata, which was fortunate. Because you did not want to be outside when it was snowing.

Stretching, you adjusted your robe with a sigh, and went back upstairs to change and put your hair back. If it was anything like the nature walk last night, you needed to stretch too. When you came downstairs, the house was empty. You put on your boots and went outside, wondering what kind of shenanigans those two were up to. You didn't have to go far. You caught sight of Jack and Gabriel crouched beside the heated pool under the wood awning. Unable to tell what they were doing, you jogged over. Jack had changed into his blue sweatpants, no shirt.

You knew it was pretty late, because the sun had begun to set, though you could still see the grounds clearly. The other night you'd failed to notice the long strings of round solar lanterns hanging off the eaves. Probably because you'd been focused on the baths and catching Jack.

Jack held a knife in his hand, applying lipstick - not yours - to the blade. Gabriel was doing the same.

Your pulse quickened. It was then you noticed the heavy mats laid down beside the pool. Steam rose off the water, and the surrounding air wasn't quite so cold.

Jack began to rise, tossing you the knife. You caught it in your left hand, relieved to see that it was wood, like you initially suspected.

Shaking his head, Gabriel handed Jack the other "knife." He still wore his yukata. Taking off his shoes, he rolled up the hem of his yukata and sat by the pool, legs dangling in the hot water.

"I was hoping you'd be up for some sparring," Jack said, eye bright. "Mr. Ito keeps mats on hand for yoga practitioners and martial artists." He rolled his shoulders, his smile sharp. He was barefoot on the mats. You bent over and unlaced your boots.

"What are the stakes?" You asked, even though you knew exactly where this was going.

"I want to change the rules, make it a little easier for you," Jack said, smiling with too many teeth and you didn't suppress your answering scowl.

"How generous of you," you said, rolling your eyes.

"I know, isn't it?" The bastard was patronizing you on purpose, trying to get your blood up. Jack was good at pushing buttons, you knew that. Worse, it still worked, despite your awareness of what he was doing and his end goal.

Gabriel chuckled, obviously enjoying the show.

"The first to score three hits, with the knife, wins. You don't have to worry about arguing deathblows. Gabe will ref."

"I don't mind the deathblow rule," you said, not actually caring about the rule itself. It was the condescending tone that had you gritting your teeth. "But if you're scared..."

Jack's eyes narrowed. "I just don't want to hurt your pride, baby. I'm quite a bit faster than "Not that much faster," Gabriel said, sounding amused. "You can take him, hermosa."

"Well, I was planning to go easy on you..." Jack's insufferable smirk widened.

"That's nice," you said, yawning. "But you didn't answer my question. What do I get out of this if I win?"

"Don't think you'll need to worry about that, sweetheart," Jack purred. "But if you do, I'm obediently yours for the rest of the night."

Your sucked in a sharp breath, picturing a defiant Jack on his knees, doing...well, whatever you wanted. "And if you manage to win?" You continued, trying to sound bored.

Jack gave a throaty chuckle, his eyes flinty. "Same terms, sweetheart. Though I know better than to expect obedience from you. That's fine. You can act out and resist all you want. I'll have you begging for mercy by the end of the night."

Your muscles tensed and heat spread through your core as you met Jack's cocksure gaze.

"Don't worry, you have the next few days to recover." He twirled the knife in his hands. "And you'll need them."

"Your victory speech is premature. I hope that's not a trend tonight." You smiled coolly at Jack.

"You two are adorable," Gabriel called. "And for the record, win or lose, I love you both, and I will most definitely enjoy wrecking the loser."

Jack gave Gabriel a cocky wink. "I can do this with my eyes closed."

You rolled your eyes at his bravado. "Really, Jack?"

"That's "sir" to you, sweetheart. You might as well get used to saying it." He dropped into a defensive stance, knife pointed at your chest.

You stepped onto the mats. Jack's sweats did nothing to hide the fact his legs were tensed to pounce. You began to circle him, forcing him to shift his position.

While you were assessing his stance, he lunged, and you swung to the side, going low and under his arm. As you passed through, you dragged the knife in an upward arc, the wooden blade leaving a long smear of lipstick up along his ribcage. His free hand slipped down to the "wound" and he laughed when it came away red.

"I'm not the one who's going to be sloppy by the end of this," Jack growled, turning his hard gaze on you. He charged, and you dodged backward, trying to block his flurry of strikes. He was fast, and determined, closing the distance within seconds. You batted his knife hand away, swearing as the wooden blade poked your palm.

"Gotcha," Jack said as he met your eyes, his smile crooked. "Want me to kiss it better?"
Snarling, you countered, your blade missing his chest by millimeters. He danced backward, laughing in delight as you went on the offensive. He sidestepped your blows, turning sideways and parrying with frightful ease. He hit a rhythm, dodging, parrying, then countering. The wooden blade came within a hairsbreadth of your nose before you realized what you were doing.

You drew back, realizing how foolish it was to let him lure you into range.

"What's wrong, baby?" Sweat dripped down Jack's brow. "Scared?"

"Nah, just thinking how good you're going to look on your knees," you said, keeping an eye on his foot placement.

Jack sprung forward, his smile predatory. You threw yourself into a roll past his unarmed side. Force cut through the air above your head, and you used the momentum to carry you to the edge of the mats, and onto your feet. You spun quickly and slid sideways as Jack lunged at you, overextended. You knocked his knife hand backward and slid into his space, drawing a line across his bare chest.

Laughing, you twisted out of range, barely avoiding his grasping hands.

"Such a tease," Jack murmured, face flushed with pleasure. "I'm going to enjoy paying you back for all the attitude."

"I'm going to enjoy reducing you to a babbling wreck," you told him. "Because, Commander, I have to say, you look so pretty bent over a desk getting your ass filled."

Jack stiffened, his eyes widening briefly, and then he fucking blurred. You didn't have time to brace yourself. Suddenly, your feet were in the air and you landed flat on your back, the air knocked out of your lungs. Jack kicked the practice blade out of your hand and knelt beside you. You lay parallel to the pool, Gabriel's shadow in your periphery.

"Two," he murmured, tracing the blade along your collar bone. Brows furrowed, he then dragged the wood along your lips. You jerked backward, the edge furrowing along your flesh. "Three," he sighed. Then he tossed the knife to the side and leaned forward to kiss you.

"Bad form, Jack," you snapped, and kicked him backward, outraged that he'd tagged you twice in one go. That was insultingly cheap. Jack staggered, managing to catch himself and rise, as you bought yourself time to climb to your feet.

He went left, his back to the pool and you adjusted your course, knowing the angles were right. You closed the distance and dropped, swinging your leg to sweep him. Jack laughed, simply lifting one foot to dodge. He winked at you, obviously amused by your "miss," but you slid forward, driving your foot into his weight bearing leg. He teetered for a moment, and you followed it up with a second strike to the same leg.

Swearing, Jack fell backward into the pool with a massive splash.

"That was naughty," Gabriel laughed, rising to his feet. "And after he got his three hits."

"Oh come on, the third one was a cheap shot," you panted, wiping your mouth.

"Not going to argue that, but are you sure you should be hanging around?" Gabriel asked mildly. "Because when he catches you..."

Sputtering, Jack surfaced, his hair plastered to his face. He wiped it out of his eyes, glaring
"Baby," Jack growled. "You are going to pay for that-" He pulled himself out of the pool, rivulets of water pouring down his bare chest, and he did not look happy.

"Better run," Gabriel laughed, and you understood then that he would not be any help.

Backing up, you took off sprinting across the courtyard, not entirely sure where you could go. If you climbed the roof maybe-

"Too slow." Jack's breath was hot on your ear, and his arms clamped around your waist, fingers digging in like a steel trap. Suddenly you were airborne, and you swore as Jack slung you over his shoulder in a fireman's carry. You smacked his back, your clothes already damp from contact.

"Put me down, dammit!" You wiggled, trying to slide forward, but he had an iron grip on your knees.

A sharp slap to your ass had you squirming for different reasons. "Keep pushing me, baby: see what it gets you," he rasped. "Now behave. You're in enough trouble as it is."

"Fuck you, Jack!" You snapped, but stopped struggling. Instead you glared at Gabriel as he approached.

"Maybe it's time to start apologizing," Gabriel grinned. "Or groveling."

"Fuck you too, papi."

Gabriel just laughed. "Oh this is going to be fun."

Chapter End Notes

Had some bad writing days, but I think I'm getting back in the groove of things. Just needed some extra time to recharge and plot the final arc in more detail. I broke 600k words in the rough drafts finally. I'm thinking the final product will be close to 700k. Yeesh.

This chapter originally had more Jack, in honor of being 76, but it got shuffled to 77. I hope one day you'll be able to forgive me.

Back to job hunting. I'm terrible at it.

Trying to be social and get more stuff done for my own sake. Bleargh.
Chapter 77

Chapter Summary

It's been a long time coming.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Jack carried you up the stairs, not bothering to take off his shoes or his wet clothes. You glowered at Gabriel, the whole trip up. He just shook his head at you, a sharp edge in his smile, excitement in his eyes.

"Your exit routes need work, hermosa," he laughed.

"Don't encourage her, Gabe," Jack grumbled and then he unceremoniously dumped you on the futon. You scrambled backward, propping yourself up on your elbows.

He dripped all over the floor, his chest and face flushed from the chase. He was breathing too hard and there was a harsh cast to his face, all frustration and heat. He took a step forward, forearms tensing as he reached for you, then he stopped, drawing his hand back. "I'm going to the bathroom to change," he said slowly, his voice an octave lower than usual. You recognized that wildness in his eyes: Jack's control was slipping. "And if you're still here when I get back, I'm going to pound the insolence out of you with my dick. If you're not, then Gabe and I can work this off." Abruptly, he turned a shut himself in the bathroom.

You glanced over at Gabriel, who was watching you with a lazy smile.

"Now you've done it," Gabriel stretched his arms over his head, robe falling open. "So what's it going to be? Think you can handle him like this? Or do you need to sit this round out?"

He was goading you, of course. They didn't really think you'd back down now, did they? You didn't have work or any other obligations for the next few days. You could afford to play their kinky games. Shooting him a dirty look, you peeled off the sweats, debating on leaving on Gabriel's hoodie, just so Jack could destroy it.

"I bet if you change into some of that cute lingerie you brought, it'll put him in a better mood," Gabriel said, sitting cross-legged on the edge of the futon. Even with the robe, it wasn't hard to see just how aroused he was.

"I'll...need a moment," you said, looking at the bathroom door.

"I can distract him for a few minutes," Gabriel said, climbing to his feet. "I think he'd enjoy something red or black. I know I would." Winking at you, he went into the bathroom, the door shutting with a neat click.

Jack had looked...feral. You shivered, peeling off the damp hoodie. You weren't certain what you were getting into, but there was no doubt that you wanted to stick around and find out.

Quickly, you rummaged through your bags, digging out the black leather underbust corset.
It left your breasts exposed, but pushed them up for better display. And it was sturdy, fastening closed with metal grommets and thick laces. The garment might not be super-soldier proof, but it would not tear like lace, and you suspected Jack wouldn't destroy it, if only because it wouldn't be in his way. There were garter straps for stockings, and you put those on too, even though you knew they wouldn't make it through the night. You didn't bother with panties. Those would be the very first thing Jack ripped off. But you gave yourself a onceover in the mirror, admiring the way the corset flattered your figure.

You took a moment to arrange your hair, even though you knew all this primping was in vain. You might look nice for a hot second, but Jack was going to ruin that fast.

The bathroom door opened, and you blinked as Gabriel stumbled out laughing, his robe in disarray. Jack followed, hair still damp, clothes gone. He grasped Gabriel's shoulders, spun him around, and kissed him hard. Gabriel nipped Jack's lower lip, hands roaming the other man's bare torso.

You sat back against a pillow, one hand slipping between your legs while you watched them.

Jack shoved Gabriel against the wall, mouth already traveling down the column of his neck, hands fumbling with the thick cloth belt. Gabriel pulled away, tapping Jack's nose and pointing to you. Jack hesitated, because he obviously wasn't done with Gabriel, but he turned around, eyes widening as he saw you.

He released Gabriel, stalking over to you, jaw clenching and unclenching, like he couldn't choose what words to say.

You rose slowly, making sure to lick your slick fingers. The flush of Jack's cheeks deepened, and he reached for you, one hand locking around your arm as he pulled you against him.

"Status?" His voice was husky, though his expression was now neutral. Pure Strike Commander professionalism masked whatever internal struggle he was having. Was it that he couldn't decide who to jump first? Or had your lingerie choices short-circuited his brain?

"Green."

"Gabe said you needed a minute." Jack's voice was rough, like he really thought you were going to chicken out.

"You don't scare me, Jack," you said, leaning in to suck on a nipple, your teeth grazing the sensitive bud.

He fisted a handful of your hair, pulling you off of him. "No, you aren't calling the shots tonight, sweetheart. Get on your knees."

You complied, if only because he had a solid grip on you. You glanced up at him, flashing your cockiest I-don't-give-a-damn-about-your-authority Blackwatch agent smirk. He stepped to the side, and pushed on your shoulders, forcing you onto all fours.

"Hold that position," he said gruffly, hand trailing down your spine and stopping to cup your bare ass. "Gabe, get my bag."

You tried to see what Gabriel was doing, but Jack crouched in front of you, holding your chin. "Eyes forward." He pushed your hair out of your face, hands deceptively gentle.
Gabriel handed Jack a messenger bag, and Jack opened it up, pulling out a familiar leather collar. He fastened it around your neck, apparently remembering exactly how to fit it. He gave the leash a little tug, smirking as you jumped. He moved behind you, taking a moment to fish through his bag of tricks.

"These match," he said to himself. "They'll look nice."

Gabriel chuckled.

Jack patted your ass. "Lay flat," he ordered, moving a pillow under your head.

You shivered, skin warming at his touch, and lowered yourself onto the blankets.

"Hand behind your back." Jack wrapped a padded leather cuff around each wrist. The chain in the middle had enough slack so that you could rest your arms comfortably against your low back.

"You really do like tying me up," you said. "Don't know if the world's really prepared for how kinky you are, sir."

"Keep it up and you get the gag, baby," he said coolly.

"Thought you liked banter," you said, smiling into the pillow.

"It's for your own good. You're already in enough trouble. Wouldn't want you to bite off more than you can chew."

"Come closer sir, I'll show you much biting I can do."

Jack's hand came down sharply on your ass and you yelped at the sudden sting, your inner muscles clenching too tightly from the impact.

"You really do make some poor decisions, baby. Here you are, little better than naked, tied up, and you're still running your mouth testing my very limited supply of patience."

"It's pretty hot, isn't it?" You bit your lip.

"I think we're going to have to work on your definition of hot," Jack said, sounding mildly aggravated. "See, I think it's hot listening to you pant and scream while I'm balls deep inside you and fucking your needy little holes. But it's also pretty "hot" to watch you straining and drooling around a gag, trying desperately to beg me for something with those pretty eyes, while I'm fucking your needy little holes. Hell, it's still pretty hot even if I'm just watching Gabe hold you down so he can rail your needy little holes."

You sensed a theme there, and you could feel your slickness coating your thighs at his words. Maybe he had a point. You liked pushing Jack's buttons a lot. But you needed to keep an endgame in mind. It was just really difficult to strategize when Jack had you tied up and was oh so casually discussing rough sex.

Chuckling to himself, Jack lifted your legs, securing another set of leather cuffs around each ankle.

"Is that necessary?" You glanced at him over your shoulder.

"No, but you deserve it. Kicking me into the pool wasn't a smart move, sweetheart." He pushed your heels toward your ass, spreading your thighs wide.

"You earned it," you said.

"One more smart comment before I'm done, and you're getting the gag. Now don't let go," he ordered, pushing the connecting chain into your hands.

You fumbled with it at first, but you let your legs dangle over your the backs of your thighs while your metal fingers held the chain in place. It was a looser version of a hogtie and you took a few breaths, getting used to the angle of the stretch. You would start to ache eventually, but you could hold this position for a little while.

"Comfortable?" Jack stroked your back, blunt nails edging along your spine.

"I can handle it."

Gabriel knelt in front of you, robe half off as he stroked himself. "Let's give you something useful to do with that mouth." He pressed his thick head to your lips and you opened your mouth, tongue flicking out to lick the velvety skin. Gabriel slowly thrust into your mouth, giving you time to adjust to his girth.

A familiar cool sensation lit up your nerves as Jack's fingers trailed along your ass, and you moaned softly as his fingers began to stretch out your back hole. The cool lube soothed the burn of the intrusion and soon enough he was pressing a thick plug against your ass. You whimpered around Gabriel's cock as he slowly pushed it inside.

"You ought to see this greedy little ass of yours swallowing it up," he murmured in your ear. "You just can't get enough, can you?"

"That's it, hermosa," Gabriel stroked your hair. "You just keep those pretty lips wrapped around my dick. It's the easiest way to keep yourself out of trouble."

You glared at him, cheeks hollowing as he pushed himself in to the hilt. You gagged as he hit the back of your throat.

"Relax," he said. "You're better off swallowing those words alongside my cock."

"It's a miracle, Gabe. You've finally gotten her to stop running her mouth." Both men laughed, way too amused by their stupid jokes.

You were going to make them both pay. It probably would not be tonight. Or even tomorrow night. But you were going to get them both back.

"Tap if you're having trouble," Gabriel said, hips moving slowly.

You bobbed your head in response.

"I've been thinking about this for awhile," Jack confessed. "I know I've been promising payback for all the sneaky little tricks you've played. And I know you probably expected me to forget about your misbehavior. But don't worry, I haven't."

The plug started to buzz and you groaned softly around Gabriel's shaft. He was letting you set the pace, but he wasn't pulling out and giving you any chance at speech. You squirmed in your bonds, the vibrations gradually growing stronger.
"It's amazing that you have on all this fabric, and it covers absolutely nothing," Jack groaned, his rigid cock pressed firmly against your ass.

You tried to push your hips back, managing a tiny wiggle.

Jack just laughed at your efforts.

"Do you want something, baby? That's too bad. Why don't you show me that you can behave?" He squeezed your ass, and you shuddered. The toy hummed away at your walls and you sucked harder on Gabriel's cock, unable to channel your tension into anything else. You had little reach and all you could do was take him at his own pace.

Gabriel, sensing your impatience, began to speed up. His thrusts grew rougher and you choked a few times, but stubbornly kept sucking, and he rewarded you with a husky moan, his fingers tangling in your hair.

"You're much better behaved with a cock in your mouth," Jack said.

Gabriel's strokes grew faster, filling your throat. You split your concentration between breathing and trying to relax enough to take him.

"It's pretty hot, isn't it? Trying to swallow Gabe whole. Being tied down and used. Getting teased like this. I can feel you shaking." Jack trailed kisses along your spine. "And I haven't even touched your greedy little pussy yet. Go on, Gabe. She's won't break. You can go harder. She loves this."

Gabriel cupped your chin, tilting your head up. You could feel the heat rising in your cheeks. You actively drooled around his cock, trying desperately to swallow him down. His dark eyes locked on yours and he pushed harder, obviously enjoying having you at his mercy. His strokes grew rougher.

"That's it, hermosa. It's all right if you can't swallow it all. I like seeing my seed smeared on your pretty face-" His voice dropped to a growl and a hot flood of semen hit the back of your throat, his heavy cock twitching in your mouth. You swallowed rapidly, knowing you wouldn't be able to get it all.

He began to pull out, his shaft coated in saliva and cum. You swirled your tongue around it cleaning him up. Gabriel leaned over to wipe your swollen lips. "Good girl," he said and you shivered as he kissed you hungrily.

Your eyes widened as Jack began to pull the plug out, vibrations dragging along your walls as he tugged. You shuddered as he ever so slowly removed the thick toy before he shut it off. The pressure on your nerves started as tickling, but grew more insistent. There was a soft pop as the plug came free. You couldn't quite turn your head to see what he was doing, but then you felt more lube getting pushed into your stretched out hole.

"Aren't you going to-?"

"No sweetheart, I'm going to fuck this cute little ass till you can't take it," he said cheerfully. "Remember that time you begged Gabe to wreck me? Or maybe that time you thought you were being clever in my office with your vibrating fingers?" His breath caught at the mention of it. "Or even how cheeky you were that night in Gabe's office? Because I certainly do."

You gave a strangled cry as he rubbed his cockhead against your ass and began to push, his head splitting you wide. Panting you squirmed and clenched, your fingers tightening around the Jack gripped your ankles, rolling his hips till his thighs were pressed against your ass. You buried your face in the pillow, straining to accept him. The pressure made you clench your vaginal muscles even tighter, and you were very conscious of just how empty your other hole was.

"Papi," you said, voice weak.

"Yes, baby girl?" His voice practically dripped with amusement and you lifted your head, staring at him pleadingly.

"Need...need you too."

"You want to slurp on my cock some more, baby?" His eyes twinkled. The bastard knew what you wanted.

"No," you moaned. "Need you in my pussy. Want you both to-"

Jack drew back, shaft sliding smoothly out and then drove it back in.

The force of the stroke made you squeal and left you reeling. You bit your lip, breathing hard.

"Is that all you want, baby?" Jack laughed. "You want someone to touch that naughty little pussy? That's just too bad. I don't think you deserve it at all."

"J-Jack-" you whined.

"Can't even address me properly," he said with mock consternation. "Where was all that defiance you were showing earlier? You sure talked a big game, but once you get a cock inside you-"

"Fuck you, Jack," you snapped in frustration. "Just you wait."

He only laughed at your response. "That's it, baby. Don't start begging yet. I'm going to enjoy fucking the fight out of you. Because I promise, sweetheart, you'll be crying mercy long before I'm ready to give it to you."

Sweaty and sore, you lay face down in the blankets, cursing Jack and Gabriel. Contrary to your expectations, Jack wasn't rough with you. He took his time, drilling you deep and slow, adding generous amounts of lube when you felt dry, but purposefully ignoring your clit. Your thighs and the blankets under you were soaked, and when you tried to rub yourself against the bedding, Jack lifted you by the waist, preventing you from getting any stimulation.

You clenched around him with each thrust, breathing shakily as he squeezed your breasts and kissed your neck.

Gabriel just sat there stroking his cock, looking far too pleased by the show.

"You could always use your safe word," Jack said in your ear, fingers twisting your nipples. "I'd stop this right away."
You were tempted, so very tempted right now. Your pussy ached from neglect, and every time Gabriel flashed you a cocky smirk, you wanted to leap up and punch him, or jump him, or both. Definitely both.

"Of course," Jack continued. "You'd have to take care of yourself then. You're always going on about how your hands work just fine, all the fun toys you have. So I guess you could just lie here and do that too-"

"Fuck you, Jack," you snarled, your voice considerably weaker.

"That's what I'm doing," he laughed, giving the leash a little yank. "I wonder how much longer you're going to be able to hold out. Because I'm close. You look so delicious, writhing and trembling underneath me. Your ass is taking me so well. Going to come deep inside you." He nuzzled the back of your neck. "You'll be scraping my cum out for days."

You whimpered softly as he began to stroke your inner thighs, his fingers ghosting along your folds. The feel of a thick cock in your ass was amazing, but it still wasn't enough and you whipped your head from side to side, trying to contain your growing frustration.

The need was beginning to verge on pain, and you clamped your eyes shut, teeth clenched as Jack sped up, his balls slapping against your pussy lips. You tried to rock your hips, to get just a little more sensation. But Jack tightened his grip on your waist and you struggled against him, trying in vain to move. Sweat beaded on your upper lip and buried your face in the pillow.

From this angle you could feel just how deep in your belly Jack was. He stretched you with each thrust. And it still wasn't enough.

"That's it sweetheart. You just lie there and take it," Jack murmured, fingers digging into your hips.

You swore into the pillow, grinding your teeth as Jack tensed, and gave two hard thrusts before he came with a loud groan. The wet heat of his release did nothing to sate your burning nerves.

"Love how tight your sweet little ass it. Juicy too," he laughed, hand coming down hard on your butt and you shrieked into the bedding, the angle just right to make your pelvic muscles contract.

"She liked that," Gabriel murmured.

Jack bent over to kiss the base of your neck. "Is that so? You like being spanked?"

"You're the worst," you growled, voice strained.

Laughing, Jack nipped your shoulder. "Don't worry sweetheart, I can keep going. I can do this all night long. The question is how much more can you take?"

Your breath hitched as he pinched your nipples, the heat between your legs flaring. Everywhere he touched, you felt it between your thighs. A flicker of pleasure, but nowhere enough. Eyes squeezed shut, you nearly choked as his cock stirred inside you, and he began to rock his hips once more. It was the same thought bouncing around your fraying mind. So close, but not enough. Not nearly enough.
Your breaths came in hard sobs. The pillow was damp with your sweat and other fluids. That sunshine bastard had come twice now, and still he maintained a torturously lazy pace, his hands roaming your body, keeping you on a knife's edge. The soft pleasure had begun to sharpen inside you, tearing at you and lashing out for release. Each thrust stoked that feverish need, and you writhed beneath him, teeth clamped as you tried to silence yourself.

"You're beautiful like this." Jack kneaded your ass and you nearly bit your tongue off. "So desperate for us."

You bit the pillow, trying to muffle your frustration.

"Aw, come on sweetheart. If you ask nicely, I might give you what you want." His fingers brushed lightly against your lower lips and you bucked your hips, practically melting into his touch.

"He can do this for hours, hermosa," Gabriel murmured, patting your head. "And he's fine leaving you like this."

Hours? You shuddered, vision blurring. You couldn't do this for hours. "No, sir, I can't...I can't take much more," your voice broke. "I need to come, sir. Please let me come, please sir."

"That was very sweet," Jack said soothingly. "Good progress, but not quite what I wanted. You're going to have to do better than that."

Nerves aflame, you cried out in frustration. All you could focus on was the throbbing between your thighs, the tension twisting tighter and tighter with no relief. Everything he did made it worse, and being trapped in this state grew more agonizing by the second.

"I don't...I don't know what you want," you shook, muscles locking up. "Jack, I don't know...please."

"Mmm, you don't remember?" His laugh was soft and wicked.

"Mercy," you panted, lifting your head. "Please, sir, I can't-"

"Closer, but not quite." He gave a light slap across your ass and you dropped on your face, thighs quivering. "This is payback, remember? You earned every minute of this treatment. Now if you want me to let you come, maybe you should apologize for pushing me into the pool."

That petty, vicious, beautiful son of a bitch. You weren't sure who was being more unreasonable right now, but you were fine faulting Jack. So you bit the pillow, knowing you couldn't trust yourself to speak sweetly.

"Nothing to say?" He murmured, cock plowing deeper into your ass.

"Goddamnit." Your voice was a harsh whisper and you squeezed your eyes shut, too proud to give him the satisfaction. Except in this case, it went both ways.

"I think I'm being pretty reasonable," Jack said. "I'm not even asking for you to apologize for all those times you were blatantly insubordinate. But every time I think of your smarmy little smirk or sharp little one-liner, it just makes me want to prolong this." He laughed softly.

"You cheated," you said, and even as the words left your lips, you knew how pathetic you
"A cheap shot isn't cheating, baby. And anyway, are you really in a position to argue with me?" Jack didn't sound the least bit annoyed. In fact, he sounded excited, like he was enjoying the idea of seeing how long he could drag this out.

Sniffling, you clenched your teeth. Jack rolled his hips and your whole body spasmed, the force of it squeezing tears from your eyes. You lay there, shaking.

"I'm sorry," you muttered ungraciously.

"Mmm, what was that?" Jack laughed. "Once more, with feeling."

You couldn't even focus on revenge. Shoulders drooping, you bit back a moan. "I'm sorry, sir. I'm sorry I pushed you in the pool." Each word felt like pulling teeth and you gripped your bonds tighter.

"What do you think, Gabe? Sound genuine to you?"

"She could do better," Gabriel said, voice husky. "But you have been edging her for quite awhile. Don't know how much coherence or civility is left in her."

"I'm really fucking sorry," you wailed. "Now please, please stop teasing me. I need to come so badly I can't think straight. It fucking hurts and I can't take it any more. Now show some goddamn mercy, you bastard." Then you dropped back into the bedding, sobbing in frustration.

"...Points for honesty," Gabriel said, after a moment.

Jack just gave a hum of pleasure. "Poor baby. You've almost persuaded me. What do you need?"

"Need you both," you whispered, voice raw. "Need to come. Can't take any more of your goddamn teasing. You've made me scream. You've made me beg. You've made me apologize. You fucking win, sir."

"You certainly made that harder than it had to be," Jack said, swallowing audibly.

You just snarled, his name a curse on your lips.

Jack didn't deign to respond, his demeanor cool. But you weren't fooled. Even in your shaken state, you heard his pleased exhalation at you confession. More importantly, you could feel him twitching inside you.

"Goddamnit, Jack-"

"All right, sweetheart. I'm convinced. Give me one moment to get cleaned up and then I'll give you what you want. Now, what do you say?"

Your pulse quickened. "Thank you, sir," you panted, eyes still squeezed shut.

Ever so slowly Jack pulled out. "Be back in a moment."

"I'll take off the ankle cuffs," Gabriel said as he moved behind you, his warm hands massaging your stiff thighs. You gave a groan of relief after he released your legs and lowered them gently. "Such a stubborn thing."
"Fuck you," you exhaled, no venom or heat in the words. You were too worn down.

You flinched as he spread your ass cheeks. "Jack really worked you over," he said. You were too tired to be embarrassed. "Still want us both?"

"Yes," you sighed. "Just too dry-"

Gabriel poured more lube inside you, and then began to inch his thick cock into your stretched hole. You gave a whine of frustration, wishing he'd give your clit more attention. But then he was in, and your ass was full again, and the strain on your legs had eased. He pulled you into his lap, a contented sigh on his lips. Your eyes fluttered shut as he stroked your hips, his hands hot on your sweaty skin.

Jack knelt between your legs, his cock rubbing against your slit.

A moan escaped your lips.

"Look at me."

You opened your eyes, meeting Jack's insufferably satisfied gaze. His cheeks were flushed, his smile triumphant. He leaned in, kissing you hungrily.

"You held out so long, you ornery little shit. God, I love you." Then he thrust inside you, his cock filling your slick pussy with one hard stroke.

You howled into his mouth, shrieking as he began to pound you, his fingers already rubbing against your swollen clit. He filled you perfectly, his shaft dragging against your walls, his head stroking your g-spot. And while his touch softened the ache inside you, it did nothing to cool the heat building in your core. Your nerves burned and that was exactly what you needed. Three thrusts, and you dissolved around him, wailing at the intensity of your overdue release. Your body spasmed, and you collapsed between your lovers, muscles contracting so hard that you lost control of your limbs. And through it all, Jack watched you, eyes shining and bright, a content smile on his face, his blonde hair sticking to his forehead.

You lay there shaking between them, breaths coming in hard gasps, as you rode out the long-delayed orgasm.

Gently, Jack nuzzled your throat. "Ready, Gabe?"

You blinked, mind hazy.

"Been ready," Gabriel murmured, reaching over you to clasp Jack's forehead to his. The men kissed over your shoulder.

The buzzing started up then, and you squealed, body still too sensitive to pinpoint where exactly this new layer of sensation was coming from. You looked down, the blue silicone ring around the base of Jack's cock had a small vibrator attached.

"Like it?" Jack murmured, kissing your forehead. "You're the one who inspired me to get one."

"Jack, I just... I can't-"

"But you begged so hard for us to let you come," Gabriel said in your ear, his hands cupping your breasts.
"We're just giving you what you want," Jack said happily, and they both began to move, stretching you in synchronization.

The second orgasm came on the tail of the first, the heavy vibrations on your clit dragging you back under. Even when your lovers were gentle, it still felt like they could tear you apart, and now they were enthusiastically taking you, their thick cocks hollowing you out. You dimly realized then that they weren't just going to get you off and stop. No, Gabriel was nowhere near satisfied. As for Jack, he was getting all his accrued pettiness and frustration out in one go.

Jack left bite marks along your chest, alternating between sucking your nipples and kissing your face. Gabriel nibbled on your ears and neck, his hands traveling between your breasts and your thighs, teasing, pinching, and stroking.

And that goddamn vibrator kept brushing against your clit, humming away at your overworked nerves.

"Can't-" you panted, as Gabriel gently turned your head to the side so he could kiss you.

"You can," Gabriel said firmly after he released you.

Jack tugged on the leash and you looked up, unprepared for how damn happy he looked. "Gabe's right, baby," he said with a laugh. "You have to try."

You didn't have breath to curse his trite pep talks.

"You're so pretty like this, all desperate and sensitive." Jack rolled his hips and you squealed. He tugged the leash dragging you closer. "You're ours, sweetheart. And we're going to make sure you don't forget it." Jack held you against him, letting Gabriel thrust extra deep, pushing you flush against the toy. That sent you over the edge yet again, and you screamed till your throat was raw. But neither man relented, Jack's tip bumping your cervix while Gabriel kept stretching your ass. The pendulum had swung to the opposite side of the spectrum, and it was too much now. Far too much. You babbled and begged, tears in your eyes, body soaked in sweat and other fluids.

You didn't have the strength to thrash around any more, and trapped between their bodies, you had nowhere to escape to anyway. Your breaths came in sharp hiccups while you slumped limp against Jack's chest, letting him hold you up.

And still they kept going, not giving you any quarter. Jack held your thighs apart, and your arms remained bound behind your back. They teased you, praised you, and promised more filthy things, until Jack's words devolved into grunts and curses while Gabriel lapsed into long strings of Spanish.

In your haze, you felt them spill themselves inside you, but they didn't stop and you gave up counting or trying to keep score. Goddamn super soldier stamina. It wasn't till you'd gone quiet, too exhausted to do anything besides twitch from the nervous stimulation, that they finally let you rest. You were a mess of cum, lube, and sweat. Your arms ached from being in the same position for so long. Karma, you realized, head muzzy as you slumped against Gabriel's chest.

After that, the world went mercifully still.
You were very warm, extremely thirsty, and extra sticky, but you were too damn tired to care. Calloused hands rubbed your back and you groaned into Jack's chest.

"You need to drink something," Gabriel's voice cut through your stupor.

"You're not the boss of me," you rasped, words slurring together. Your tongue was too thick and stuck to the roof of your mouth.

He just snorted and pressed a water bottle to your lips. You drank involuntarily, the liquid soothing your throat. Gradually, you opened your eyes, and took the bottle in your hands, emptying it.

"Need to clean up," you said, feeling slightly better.

"Yeah, we really messed you up," Jack said, not the least bit remorseful. You lay sprawled across his chest, your body aching.

"Think you can manage a shower?" Gabriel sat beside you, offering you another bottle of water. You finished that one off too, your head feeling less swimmy.

Your corset was intact, though it would need a thorough cleaning. And you were still wearing the collar. Shaking your head, you fumbled with the buckles. Jack very gently helped you finish taking off your accessories.

"Can't feel my legs." You drooped against him, unable to bite back your groan as Gabriel massaged your thighs. Motions stiff, you rolled off Jack, managing to sit up. You felt like you'd been in a particularly fun barroom brawl, and while you hurt, hours later you were still punch drunk.

"I got you," Jack said, kissing the back of your neck. He lifted you carefully. "Shower and we can go back to sleep. Tomorrow we can take it easy again."

Jack set you down on the shower floor and turned on the water. It was deliciously warm and soothing. "After all that, you're still feeling insubordinate. It's adorable."

You were too tired to argue properly, so you just stuck out your tongue, hoping your disgruntled expression clearly conveyed your thoughts. "Mlem."

Jack shook his head, water dripping down his face. "Are you thirsty?"

Rolling your eyes, you reached for the washcloth, but Jack pushed your hand to the side.

"Let me," he said, smile remaining unshakeable. Carefully, he soaped you down, hands gentle as he rubbed your wrists and ankles. He frowned at a few bruises, and started to take inventory, but you put your hand over his, and mimed scrubbing motions.

"Don't care," you said.

"Should've been more careful."

"Yeah, I won't be sitting right for days."

"That part's karma," Jack said. He kissed your nose. "Thank you for indulging me. I think you had fun too, right?"

You just nodded wearily, too tired to have a real conversation. But you needed the shower. And Jack knew how to take care of you. You watched the water swirl around the drain, resting against Jack while he finished cleaning you up.

After he turned the water off and got out of the shower, you considered flopping down against the still-warm ceramic tub. But he was back in seconds, rubbing you down with a towel, and fluffing your hair. You would look ridiculous tomorrow, but you were too exhausted to care right now.

When he carried you out to the bedroom, the futon had been rotated and the bedding changed. Gabriel flicked on the emitter and Jack set you down in the middle. Gabriel gave you a quick kiss and headed into the bathroom.

You stretched out and sunk into your pillow, eyes heavy and limbs leaden. You were almost asleep when Jack bedded down beside you, pulling the heavy comforter over you both.

"Love you," Jack said in your ear.

"You better," you mumbled.

Gabriel emerged from the bathroom, toweling off his hair. "You're still awake?"

You just grumbled under your breath.

Gabriel just laughed. "Jack, I think you somehow made her even worse."

"She's so cute when she's awful," Jack said. "Makes me want to wreck her all over again."

You had absolutely nothing to say to that.

"You all right, corazon?" Gabriel slid under the blankets beside you.

"Tired."

"Can I get you anything?" Jack asked, his voice fading out as you nodded off, no longer able to keep your eyes open.

You woke up at a strange angle, your neck aching. You reached out, feeling the warm bare skin underneath your head. Ridged muscles tensed under your fingertips. "This is terrible pillow," you muttered mostly for someone else's benefit. "Too hard and bumpy, and it feels like a...washboard?"

"You're not funny," Jack snorted and smacked you in the head with a pillow.

You squawked, throwing up your arms to cover your head.

"Up," Jack said, and slid the pillow under your neck.

You had somehow ended up resting your head on his stomach. Which was much more comfortable with an actual pillow cushioning you. Your legs were tangled with Gabriel's and he lay angled on his side, one arm around your waist.

"It was Gabe," Jack said as you lifted your head, trying to figure out how you got in this position. "You were far too exhausted to move around so much in your sleep."

"That's nice, but I'm hungry," you said, trying to wiggle free.

"But you were so tired," Gabriel murmured faintly. "Go back to sleep."

"Hungry," you said, prying his arm off your waist. Grinning, you crawled out of the blankets and wobbled to your feet. Oh, that was a bad idea. You ached, working emitter or not. You winced, dropping back down.

"Tsk, sore?" Jack asked, sitting up.

"Yeah," you glanced at the emitter, wondering if it had betrayed you. Then you recalled just how intense last night had been. There was only so much modern science could achieve. Though you considered, very briefly, asking Angela how to reduce soreness in...certain areas. Then you pictured her weary yet murderous expression. Nope, never mind.

Yawning, Jack rose and rummaged through a drawer, retrieving your yukata. He helped you put it on, not tying the sash very securely, and then dressed himself, before crouching down in front of you, like he was trying to coax you into a game of leapfrog.

"Arms around my neck," Jack said, smiling at you over his shoulder.

"Really?"

"You don't want a piggyback ride out to the pool? That way you can soak your sore muscles and I'll make you breakfast while you wait."

It took you half a second to consider the offer. The first part sounded amazing. The latter part got you thinking. There was plenty of fresh fruit in the fridge and Jack could actually make decent bacon, and you probably wouldn't die. "OK."

Jack lifted you with ease and your forearm tensed briefly as you clung to him. Jack moved smoothly, careful not to jostle you, his arms carefully supporting your legs. You kissed the back of his neck then began to gnaw on his shoulder, causing him to yelp.

"Hey!"

"Hungry."

Jack swatted you lightly. "I still have the gag and I will use it."

You grumbled, but stopped biting.

"You coming Gabe?" He asked, looking back over his shoulder.

Gabriel was upright, watching you with heavy-lidded eyes. "How are you both so damn cute?"

You sighed, resting your face on Jack's shoulder. "It's Jack's not-so-secret weapon."

"None of you can resist me," Jack said with a cheerful nod.
"No, I guess not." Gabriel stretched and pushed aside the blankets. "I'll be down in a second. You two go soak. I'll handle breakfast."

"But you did it yesterday-" Jack began.

"And it was delicious. You can feed us tomorrow." And you considered then that maybe you should get up early tomorrow and handle the food. Gabriel began to dress, but kept shooting you and Jack little smiles.

"Are you sure?"

"I think you owe Lucky more aftercare. That third strike last night was a pretty cheap shot, Jack. It wouldn't have flown in the ring."

"Ha!" You shouted in his ear. "Told you!"

"But it wasn't cheating," Jack said, wincing and rubbing his ear.

"Oh, sorry about that."

Jack laughed it off, shaking his head. "You're not that loud. Even when you were screaming for us last night-"

"I take it all back," you growled. "I'm not sorry."

"Me neither," Jack said, and sauntered out of the room. You tightened your grip around his neck, even though it didn't seem like your weight affected him. Just wait till you got back in the water: you'd show him...

"Don't drown him! Or you only get plain oatmeal for breakfast!" Gabriel called out, because that man knew exactly how your thought process worked.

Chapter End Notes

Been catching up slowly on the fic. Job hunt goes slowly. I move slowly. Bleagh, really dreading going back to work.

Hope everyone else had a good week!
Chapter 78

Chapter Summary

It's always something.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You took it easy, soaking in the pool while Jack rubbed your sore legs. When you got back to base you were going to start pricing giant hot tubs. Maybe you could get them to install a whirlpool bath in the gym. Of course, Jack would try to get you to sneak in there after hours for sex, but right now that didn't sound like such a bad idea...

Mostly because Jack and Gabriel had fucked your brains out last night and you were apparently still kind of a witless moron meandering through a cheerful cloud of bad ideas. It was strange to reflect on your intimacy. They'd ruined you. Those bastards had spoiled you with mind-blowing kinky sex and then copious amounts of aftercare. There was no way you could go back to how things were before. Just like there was no way you ever wanted to admit that to anyone, let alone them.

"Am I hurting you?" Jack asked, hands hesitating over your calves.

"No." You blinked, a little surprised by his worried expression.

"You're grimacing," he said, kissing your shoulder.

Jack leaned over, fingers massaging your hips. "Tell me."

You huffed. "It's nothing."

"Really?" Jack poked you in the nose, laughing as you snapped your teeth at him. "If something's bothering you..."

"It's really minor."

"Tell me," Jack wheedled, nibbling on your ear.

You groaned. "I'm really happy and I'm not used to it, so I sort of don't know how to handle it. Like I'm waiting for the other shoe to drop. There are so many things that could go wrong and external factors aside, I'm still worried about screwing this up all on my own." And you blurted it all out like a preschooler, sharing a lot more than you intended, because that's what he asked for.

Jack leaned against the wall of the pool, one arm dragging you closer. "We both know I can't promise the world isn't out to get us. But me and Gabe have weathered it this long, and we've all faced worse odds. You know we can be bumbling idiots. But even though we've all fucked up before, we've learned from our mistakes. That's the important part. That, and I really want to be here or anywhere with you and Gabe." He kissed the side of your head. "And I'll do anything to make it happen. Even "accidentally" dumping my coffee on the Belgian ambassador's bespoke linen trousers. They were white. Were.

You snorted. "Did you really?"

"He's the reason I was late," Jack scoffed. "Ran the goddamn meeting over by two whole hours. So my coffee was cold, and it did no real damage, except to his wardrobe. But you know, it's the thought that counts."

You laughed. "Yeah."

"I admit, I would like it if you let me do more for you," Jack said, tone still easy and light. "I can put together a list of politicians you can spill your coffee on," you said.

"I was thinking a touch more personal."

"...You planned this vacation and were giving me a massage." You paused. "You can continue with the massage."

Laughing, Jack pulled you onto his lap and went back to rubbing your thighs. "That's not exactly what I meant. Yes, I planned the vacation around something I thought you'd like, something we'd all like. But we needed it. As for the massage, that's part of the aftercare package. I wreck you, I get to fuss over you afterward."

"O-K," you said, not quite understanding his issue. "You and Gabe commissioned all those shiny new weapons for me. That seems pretty thoughtful."

Jack shook his head. "That's work. And what's the point of being the Strike Commander if I can't keep my agents safe?"

There was more to it than that, but apparently that wasn't the point he was trying to make either. You mulled it over for a second. "Still not sure what you mean then."

"I worded it wrong," Jack sighed. "And I was doing so well too."

"You were. That was a good pep talk, by the way," you said with a nod. "Perked me right up. I appreciate it."

"Good." Jack kissed the top of your head. "So what's the point of being the Strike Commander if I can't keep my agents safe?"

You blinked. "So we're not counting work? Because let's be honest-"

"No, the weapons were purely work-related. Not about us and this thing we have," he said firmly.

"This cuddling?"

Jack blew out a breath. "We need to do it after last night. It's to balance things. Not that I feel obligated, more...we played rough, now we need to be gentle."

"Jack, I am very confused," you said, tilting your head back to look at him.

"The more I try to say it, the sillier I sound," Jack said, shaking his head. "I know you're a competent independent agent, a certified badass, and were possibly raised by wolves."
You snorted. "It's OK, Jack. You can say it. I'm kind of feral, I know."

"It's part of your charm," Jack said, kissing your neck. "But you hoard things, thoughts, feelings. You'd rather try to handle your problems alone than bring them to anyone's attention. And maybe it'd help if you occasionally opened up and brought that stuff up unprompted."

You blinked. "Are you asking me to be more high maintenance?"

"No, I am...botching this," Jack sighed. "I'm asking you to rely on me more. Like when you want advice, or you need to talk about Aishani, or when you needed an orchid-sitter. I get that you're being really considerate of my workload and I appreciate it. But sometimes, even when I know something's bothering you, it's hard to reach you. I know you're not trying to shut me out, but it sometimes seems that way." He gave you a rueful smile.

"Oh," you said.

"You rely a lot on Gabe. And I know that Gabe is better at anticipating you than I am, and I'm not jealous," he said quickly. "But...I'm here too, if you need something."

"I...Gabriel is just really good at reading me," you said after a moment. "And yeah, I guess I am bad about talking about my problems. I'm used to solving them on my own, with varying results. But I figure you have enough to worry about and."

"I know," Jack said. "And sometimes I'm not as perceptive as Gabe. But you know, if you need something, you can ask me too. And I'll work on making more time and being more observant."

You took a moment to analyze that thought process. "This is the part where I realize I need to be better at communication and not make my decisions in isolation, right?"

"Yup," Jack said, and you could hear the smile in his voice.

"I will try to be better at communication and not be so paranoid and secretive, even though that is a requirement for my job," you said, turning around to straddle his lap. "And I'm going to have to apologize in advance because I'm going to suck at it."

"I know," Jack said, eyes gentle. "I'm still going to be dense and inconsiderate. You'll have to help me too." He kissed your nose, hands resting on your hips. "But I'm not worried. We've come a long way from reluctant sparring partners."

"Were you reluctant?" You asked, crossing your arms. "Because I had the distinct impression you were looking forward to kicking my ass."

Jack had the grace to blush. "I wasn't looking forward to it, per se. I just viewed it as getting to know you."

"And warning me off your boyfriend."

Jack just laughed. "I honestly just wanted to drop in on Gabe that day. A "surprise your boyfriend at work" thing. Gabe's the one that partnered you with me."

You frowned. Jack was right. Damn. And you still had something else to ask him. Maybe it wasn't your biggest worry, but it was the one that had been in your thoughts for the last twenty four hours.
"What are we going to do about Gabriel's health?" You looked him dead in those sharp blue eyes. "And I did specifically ask you about that before and you-"

"I know and I'm sorry," Jack winced. "But he specifically asked me not to give you details till he had more information. We were going to tell you, just...later," he said awkwardly.

You crossed your arms.

"I...get that that wasn't the right way to handle things." Jack rubbed the back of his neck, his blue eyes welling up with sincerity and regret. And for a moment, you felt like you'd kicked a puppy. But this was Jack, he was trying to charm you. "We'll keep you in the loop from now on. It won't go down like that again. I promise."

"...So what are we going to do?" You asked, after a moment, because you weren't sure if you wanted to pick that fight now. "Because he's being stubborn. I don't like Zheng, but I...think we can rely on Feng."

"I've talked to Ray. She's willing to give On Sing access to her medical records. Her issues are milder, but from what we can tell, the root causes are similar."

"That's...uncharacteristically open of her."

"She isn't crazy about On Sing, but she trusts my judgment on this."

You tried to keep a serious face, because you had a very good idea what she distrusted his judgment over.

Jack laughed at you. "Ray likes you. Honest. She doesn't hate Gabe either. She's just...protective. We've always been close friends."

"Once she realized you weren't trying to woo her?"

Jack snorted. "Figured that one out, did you?" He shook his head. "Yeah. Once she realized I wasn't actually trying to romance her, she took pity on me, and we started hanging out, and...well, we get along pretty well."

"From what I hear, Andre, Ray, and Feng's people are hashing out the details. The US Army gets upset whenever their "proprietary" formulas get leaked, but Ray doesn't care either way and Andre likes sticking it to the man."

"What exactly does Andre do?" You asked, after a moment.

"He works for a private security firm. Very hush-hush, black ops contractor types. Andre...is one of our shadier comrades," Jack said. "I think you'd get along with him, if he could stop being a dick for ten minutes."

You raised a brow.

"We don't...hate each other. But we've never been close," Jack said. "I trust him at our backs, he's great in a fight, but I don't like his attitude. He clearly feels the same about me, but he adores Gabe though."

Your brow went a little higher.

"Yeah, like that, probably," Jack said with a sigh. "Blue wasn't wrong about his social skills either. And I don't know if Leah's seeing Blue, or Andre, or both of them right now. Maybe Lucy. Leah likes...stability, so probably Lucy. She didn't make it to the meeting because she was helping "Huh," you said. "So, what's going on with Andre? I didn't think SEP messed around with a lot of cybridization."

Jack blinked. "Oh, you saw his eyes." He shrugged. "There were different branches of research, but you're mostly right. Andre's all about the augments. He's got the same chem enhancements the rest of us have. But that's not good enough for him; he's too damn competitive. So he plays around with cybernetic upgrades, biohacking, and gene-modding. He even has implants to read Omnicode. So he's our expert on dealing with outside researchers." Jack shrugged. "Gabe has him trawling other databanks for relative information. But I think he's genuinely interested in seeing what On Sing has to offer."

"You didn't bring drinks out?" Gabriel groaned as he emerged from the house, carrying a large tray of pancakes. "Lucky's going to end up heat sick-"

"I'm fine," you said eyeing the food. "You're just fussy, mom."

Snorting, Gabriel set down the tray down. "Keep giving me lip and you can eat your pancakes plain. Which is shame because there are some spectacular preserves, cheeses, compound butters, and honeys inside."

You groaned. "I take it back, I'm sorry."

"Good," Gabriel said. "Now don't eat all the pancakes, there are still bacon, eggs, and toppings to come. And the drinks, since apparently you two want to get dehydrated-"

"I'll help you," Jack laughed patting your hip, and you slid out of his lap. "Lucky, we'll be right back. Don't eat all the pancakes-"

"Would I do that?" You asked, smiling insincerely.

Your lovers' plans were terribly predictable. Soak, sleep, eat, and have sex multiple times in between. But you weren't complaining. You were too busy catching up on well-deserved rest. More than once you woke up to Jack stretched out beside you, Gabriel working him over, all while admonishing him to keep quiet, because you were sleeping.

You somewhat doubted the sincerity of their apologies, but sometimes you still joined in. Sometimes you just rolled over and pulled the blanket over your head, muttering about super soldier hormones.

That all changed on the fourth day.

It was midday and you were doing laps in the large covered pool, the one you'd pushed Jack into, because no matter what Jack said, sex was not enough exercise to burn off all the rich food you were eating.

Jack sat on the edge, reading a book, legs in the pool while he watched Gabriel run laps around the courtyard.
You paused your swimming when you saw a fish torpedo hovering beside Jack. While you knew Athena was helping with perimeter security, she'd made her drone selves scarce since you arrived.

Jack stiffened, no longer lounging. Back straight, eyes sharp, shoulders far too tense: you recognized the Strike Commander posture.

Quietly, you swam up to him and hung off the ledge.

Jack methodically clenched and unclenched his fists, not looking at you.

"Give me a moment," he said gruffly, when he noticed you watching him.

You nodded.

There was a long sigh.

"Orders, sir?" Athena asked timidly.

"Schedule the transport. I'll get packed."

What? That sounded bad.

You climbed out of the water and sat beside Jack, a thousand thoughts racing through your mind. Were Ziv and Jess all right? Had something happened in Zurich? Or Indiana?

Jack slung one arm around your shoulder. "Petras wants me back in Zurich for a debriefing. I'm listed as incommunicado, and Ana has the helm, but this is purely a dominance move. Since I'm "unavailable," he took it upon himself to order Jemison's squad to cover Nejem's old rotation in Greece, ignoring the fact we've completely changed our strategy for handling the Mediterranean region. I countermanded the order, of course, but now that I'm no longer incommunicado, well, I can't plead ignorance to Petras' summons. So I'll need to get back, if only to keep him from haphazardly reassigning my squads." Or at least playing stupid power games with their lives.

You were listed as on extended post-mission "R&R" and Gabriel was rumored to be on an op. No sense in leaving a bureaucratic trail, after all. But the Strike Commander did not get to maintain so many ambiguities or fictions.

"I think you should just say that you're taking some well-earned time off, and ignore him till you get back. He's a civilian authority and this isn't an emergency."

Jack shook his head. "I think we both know that won't fly."

Gabriel stopped behind you, looking far too comfortable in a hoodie and shorts, despite the cold weather. "What's wrong?"

"Petras wants me back in Zurich. Tried to transfer Epsilon squad to the Nejem's old territory even though we've created a no-fly zone throughout the area."

Gabriel frowned.

"Blocked it, of course, but now I'm out of hiding and he's demanding I meet with him." Jack rubbed his forehead. "I scheduled the transport. You two stay here, I have to handle this." And with that, Jack got up and briskly walked back to the guest house.

You glanced at Gabriel.
He was watching Jack, his face grim.

"Guess we should pack up then," you said after a moment.

Gabriel raised a brow.

"I mean, we're supposed to leave tomorrow evening anyway, so..."

"You'll miss the banquet," Gabriel said, giving you a wry smile. You'd both been looking forward to the extra fancy meal.

"...Yeah," you nodded. "But I'll miss poor overworked Jack more."

"Yeah, me too." Gabriel patted your head with approval. "Athena, give Mr. Ito our regrets. A work crisis has occurred and we'll be vacating the premises early. He keeps the full fee of course. We are extremely disappointed that we will miss his dinner, and we greatly appreciate his hospitality."

"Understood," Athena chirped.

You and Gabriel strolled into the house. You didn't have much packing to do, considering how little you'd brought along. However, Jack angrily folded his clothes and stacked them neatly in his duffel bag.

Gabriel silently packed his bag up and you changed out of your yukata into fatigues and a Blackwatch hoodie.

"What are you doing?" Jack scowled at Gabriel. "You two are staying here."

"Nah, we're coming with you," Gabriel murmured, slinging one arm around Jack's shoulders. "Place'll be dull without you."

Jack gave you both a hard look. "No, stay. I paid for another night and I want you two to have fun."

"Yeah, we'll have fun in your room tonight," you said. "We're still off tomorrow."

"I wouldn't mind sleeping in a real bed," Gabriel added. "The futons have their charm, but I like a good boxspring. Let's me bounce my hard-bodied boyfriend higher on my-"

Jack groaned. "Come on, don't let Pettras ruin your vacation too. This was supposed to be a treat for both of you."

Gabriel hugged Jack from behind nuzzling his shoulder, his hands flat on Jack's stomach. "It was a treat."

You wrapped your arms around Jack's neck, grinning because now he was trapped. "We'd just spend the rest of the night moping around the beautiful resort, eating fancy food, sighing in the hot tubs, and wishing you were here."

"So hanging out in your cramped quarters waiting on me to be done with Petras' bullshit is going to be better?" Jack said sharply.
"As long as we get you afterward, yeah. Give him hell, Jack. He interrupted your first vacation since Christmas, and for what? His petty little power games?" Gabriel scowled. "This won't go unpunished. I'll assign Tataryn to feed the tabloids some unsavory, but entirely believable rumors about his personal life." And Gabriel wondered why people considered him petty. Granted, that wasn't "petty," that was karma. At least in your book.

You kissed Jack's chin. "Finish packing and we can have a meal on the balcony before we go. Maybe we can come back another time."

Anger, disappointment, and grim acceptance all ran across Jack's face in quick succession. He tilted his head to the side and kissed Gabriel before leaning forward to kiss you. "You two are ridiculous," he said with a heavy sigh.

"I can set up the mats. We can cook some dinner, and when you're finally done with the political bullshit, we'll be in your quarters waiting," Gabriel murmured, his voice low and soothing.

Jack made a soft noise in the back of his throat. "I'd like that. But you don't have to-"

"Stop arguing. Let's raid the fridge and have a picnic before we go. Mr. Ito can't possibly eat all this food on his own. We don't want it to go to waste," you said, patting his cheek.

"You have the strangest priorities," Jack said, shaking his head.

You leaned against the railing of the balcony, squinting at the mountains. If you could melt the snow just by glaring at it... Well, that would be unwise; it would probably destabilize the terrain causing avalanches and rockslides. There really was no winning.

You turned back to your food. Gabriel had made you a ridiculously large sandwich filled with smoked fish, cheese, and onions. Plums, melons, and peaches had been sliced roughly and drizzled with champagne and honey. You had a bowl full of berries to eat with vanilla ice cream. Jack had also started mixing cocktails with...varying results. He and Gabriel were drinking them at an outrageous pace.

"Sorry, about cutting this short," Jack repeated and you rolled your eyes. "I'm really sorry. You could still-"

"Shh," Gabriel placed a finger on Jack's lips. "You've said that already. Multiple times. Stop apologizing, It's annoying."

"Lucky-"

"What he said." You flashed Jack a tolerant smile and he leaned against you, one arm around your waist.

"But you had fun, right?" He gazed at you earnestly.

"Obviously. Thank you, Jack," you said. "For doing this. I feel very spoiled."

"I'm glad." He kissed the side of your head. "We all needed it."
Gabriel stood on your other side, an arm over your shoulders.

"I'll take you on a fancy vacation every year," Jack said, staring at the horizon. "You just have to come back home to me and Gabe." The roughness in his voice took you off guard.

"Deal," you said after a few seconds. "I'll hold you to it."

"Witnessed," Gabriel said, squeezing your arm. "And no reneging, Jackie."

"I would never!" Jack scowled at Gabriel, eyebrows furrowed comically in outrage. "I don't like your implications!"

"I don't like going years without taking an "us" vacation," Gabriel said smugly. "Christmas and other family holidays don't count and you know it."

"When was the last time the two of you...?" You trailed off.

Jack hunched over, burying his face in your hair. "I can't remember right now. Stop picking on me."

"We're looking at maybe three, four years?" Gabriel mused, rubbing his beard. "It's been so long, I'm having trouble."

"I'll start planning next year's vacation, as soon as we get back to base!"

"Will that be in another three years?"

Jack hugged you tighter. "Lucky, make him stop."

You patted Gabriel's hand, smiling at the wicked humor in his eyes. "You're making him feel worse."

"Yeah, but you're trying to cheer him up and it's goddamn adorable."

Laughing, you stood between them, feeling the sun on your skin, their hands in yours. And you knew you would remember being here, just like this, for the rest of your life.

You sat on the Orca sulking, as Gabriel caught up on his messages. Jack had already disembarked, on his way to give Petras a piece of his mind. It wouldn't do for all three of you to turn up at the same time, so you were staggering your arrivals. You'd go next, and Gabriel would turn up an hour or two later. He had a lot of memos and reports to review.

The reason for your sourness were the two large temperature-controlled containers of mystery food that sat unopened on the floor. When Mr. Ito heard you were leaving early, he and Chef Astro hastily packed you a dinner, though Gabriel wouldn't let you peek at what they'd sent along.

Instead you were fielding a very concerned call from Feng.

"...Should I not have picked nabe? Would you guys rather have had proper washoku every night? Did I overstep? Oh God, I totally did. I planned your meals. I picked out your clothes. I sent you my favorite bath soaps! I'm some kind of micromanaging psychopath. Holy Control Freak Batman! I've become my mother! Shitshitshit! I knew I should I have become a nun. Tons and tons of religion and maybe a lobotomy would have kept me from going down this reckless path-

"Feng, relax." You glared at Gabriel who had a very amused smirk on his face. He could definitely hear every panicked word that came out of the speaker. "Feng, come on. Let me get a word in."

"That was ten words!" She shouted.

Rolling your eyes, you cleared your throat. "Should I call back?"

"No! I mean, don't hang up! Not "don't call back!" if you get disconnected. Ah fucking hell! Who the fuck designed this portable projector? The ergonomics are terrible and how are you going to manipulate the energy if you can't bend your goddamn fingers?"

You sighed. "Feng, if you need to go-

"No! I'm multitasking, but I don't give a damn about the Vishkar lawsuit. They stole their tech from Dr. dos Santos anyway. I don't care if they filed the patents, we know what happened. He never saw a penny and they buried him under gag orders, noncompete clauses, and NDAs! He should have come to us or you. Probably you because I know my reputation is kind of shady, but still! One of us could've protected him!" Feng blew out a sharp breath. "Sorry, I'm done. I didn't mean to cross streams. I'm listening now. Actively listening. Yup. Listening with my ears, not my mouth."

"Jack had to come back because Director Petras tried to get his main fire team fragged in the Mediterranean. It was a power play, for sure, but as the civilian authority, Petras technically outranks Jack in times of peace. And we came back, because Jack's going to feel pretty rough afterward, and we didn't want him to be alone. He needs us watching his back. The vacation was wonderful. We're all super pissed that we had to leave early."

"...I do not like your civilian director," Feng said with great deliberation. "He is a scum-sucking ass-booger. I will now watch UN proceedings strictly to make fun of his hair. And then I will hold a corporate-wide contest to see who can make the most viral memes of him. Incidentally, the winner gets to go to Iceland. Anyway, you should kill him and take his job."

"It uh...doesn't work like that Feng," you said, shaking your head. "At least, not outside of organized crime."

"But it could," she said brightly.

Gabriel stifled a snort.

"So the vacation was amazing. Super luxurious. Way better than the last time I visited a spa."

"...I don't know, the towel thing was pretty hot." Feng paused, awkwardly. "I uh only know that because Jack told me. And because a blurry picture has been circulating on the net, but you can't really see...that much."

You groaned. "Look, my point is, thank you very much. I've never had a vacation like that before and it was awesome. I loved it. I didn't want to leave, but duty calls. Thank you for putting so much thought into it and helping Jack out. We all enjoyed ourselves, even Gabriel. The yukata were really attractive. The food was amazing. Mr. Ito and Chef Astro are incredibly knowledgeable with great taste. The resort was heavenly. I would totally vacation with your people again. Do I need to leave an online review?"

Feng sighed. "Sorry, I'm just...what now, Li?!"

You couldn't quite make out what was going on in the background, but someone was yelling.

"I don't give a fuck if Vishkar's entire team of lawyers is outside the door with siege equipment! I can still take them! In or out of court! We're a goddamn Triad, not a fucking rotary club! You can tell Sanjay his offer is as palatable as regurgitated dog shit and all the money in the world won't buy him a personality! Also, I'm on a call! Goddamnit, handling them is your job, not mine!"

There was a muffled response.

"I know White Rabbit isn't technically part of On Sing! It doesn't mean I don't have On Sing's full backing for all-out war with those pretenders. For fuck's sake, Li, even Fa wasn't this naggy! And I bet he didn't cry his way through every viewing of Bambi either!"

You stared at the phone, wondering if it was time to hang up.

"Yeah! You tell mom, you crybaby! Wah wah wah! At least Fa didn't go running to his mom every time he didn't like something I did!" There was the shriek of rending metal and then, "Uh...hello?"

"...I'm still here, for some reason," you said.

"...I can't even pretend like you didn't hear that," she sighed. "To be fair, Fa's mother was dead long before I hit the scene, but Li doesn't need to know that. And I will admit I cried through Bambi for years, but unlike my brother, I'm not embarrassed by it. I am embarrassed by the creepy eyelashes they put on the female animals, but that's a completely different topic."

"Yeah, it is," you agreed. "Things uh...not going so smoothly?"

"...The nuisance lawsuits have increased, but we're in the PRC and Vishkar is an Indian company. They can't touch us here. But they're trying to play hardball in Brunei, Singapore, and Russia. It's...annoying, but our lawyers are countersuing, and we have the capital to play this game. They just don't realize it. Li's not used to this kind of grand strategy and he wants to freak out every time they do something aggressive. Like that's the whole reason they're doing it, to mess with us. Duh. So yeah, I need a vacation. Maybe in Iceland. Or Switzerland. Say-"

"Ask Jack," you said. "I don't make those calls."

"Well, you need to come visit soon. Genji said you have this weekend off..."

You raised a brow and Gabriel frowned, because your schedule was kind of classified. "Did he now?"

"He and Hanzo were planning on swinging by Shanghai. You should come too. Bayan is going to be there. Hell, bring whoever you want, it's just a daytrip, though you're welcome to stay longer. I'd love to have everyone over for a gaming night again, but I haven't been home in weeks. Just living out of my office, showering in the employee locker room, handling each new crisis as it arises, resisting the overwhelming urge to throw people out of windows...but only just."
"The temptation of defenestration is real," you agreed.

"I'm glad you understand. Everyone else just thinks I'm unreasonable."

Gabriel didn't even try to smother his laughter.

"Well, under most circumstances, actually defenestrating people isn't a reasonable action."

"I knooooow," Feng groaned. "That's why I haven't really done it. Yet. I'm hyperactive, not stupid."

You never assumed Feng was stupid: crazy, sure, but not stupid. There were literally graveyards full of people who'd underestimated her intelligence and resolve. "I'll see what the weekend looks like."

"You should come. Really," Feng said, suddenly serious. "I mean, I understand if you can't but, if you can, it'll be worth your while."

"I'll try," you said, not liking the smirk on Gabriel's face.

"Great, should we do Korean barbecue or dim sum? I mean we have in-house chefs and..."

"I trust your judgment," you said solemnly, and Gabriel raised a brow.

"...Lucky, that's the nicest thing anyone's said to me all week. Well, Bayan said, talking to me after my morning espresso was the auditory equivalent of staring into the sun on LSD." Feng paused. "He's a poet, that one. But now that I think about it, that wasn't exactly complimentary."

You laughed in spite of yourself. "I have to go Feng. Hopefully I'll see you this weekend."

There were a lot of messages waiting for you, and you sifted through them as you headed back to your room. In fact, there were four that all began with variants of, "please come see me as soon as you get back." Unsurprisingly, they did not go into detail. But Ziv, Genji, Távio, and Tataryn all wanted you to stop by.

You knocked Genji's door after you dropped off your bag, but there was no answer. So you left a note, and went off to find Tataryn, because his room was just down the next corridor.

He answered the door shirtless, hair loose and flowing down his back. Between the tattoos and the hair, he looked like some disheveled rock god on his way back from the orgy. Tataryn had a lot more tattoos than you expected, more than just the pair of stars, but then he had been Russian mob. They had an entire culture built around the symbolism. Yawning, he grinned at you, his smile all too devilish as he noticed you inspecting his ink.

"You are back early. Did you miss me that much?"

"Petras demanded Jack's presence," you scowled.

Tataryn's smile lost its cheer. "I see. That is unfortunate. I hope the rest of your trip was pleasurable."
"...Very," you said, and then realized you had let a dumb grin drift across your face.

Tataryn just laughed. "I bet. How was the beach?"

"No beach. Jack went above and beyond: he got us a reservation at a hot springs resort," you said. "Fully nude and private."

Tataryn gave a wistful sigh. "Now you are just taunting me, Lucky."

"Yes and you deserve it. So what'd you need?" You uncrossed your arms.

"I wanted to speak to you about Kseniya." He looked around. "Won't you come in?" The hallway was empty, but there was no guarantee it would stay that way.

You entered Tataryn's quarters, a little surprised by how much bigger they were than yours. They weren't luxurious by civilian standards, but his room was easily twice the size of a standard single. And Tataryn had nice things: colorful hand-woven rugs, wooden bookshelves with fanciful carvings, a plush red sofa, and a queen-sized bed with fluffy pillows and a thick quilt bearing a complicated starburst pattern.

You raised a brow. "Now I'm worried."

"Tea then," he said smoothly. "Tea is wonderful for worries." He retrieved a large red mug and turned on his electric kettle. You waited impatiently as he measured herbs into ceramic teaball and then let it steep.

"Peppermint, chamomile, and lavender." He set it in front of you along with a sugarbowl and a jar of honey. "I prefer it with honey."

You spooned a little honey into your cup. "Thank you."

"You are restless." He poured himself a cup and added a lot more honey. "I will start simple. The pilot from your Greek adventure is awake."

You blinked. "That's good news."

"It seems Zenyatta partnered with Dr. Ziegler to better utilize his talents. She is...very excited by these developments."

You sat back on the couch, recalling your last terse conversation with the omnic monk. About compassion. About motives. About your issues. And he'd put his money where his metaphorical mouth was. You didn't think he was trying to out-virtue you, because really that was no competition and there was no way in hell that you'd win. In fact, you realized that this might be his way of apologizing to you. Or at least it was an attempt to win you over. You weren't sure exactly, but you were going to have to talk to him again. Soon.

"He said you...appealed to his better nature and he was wrong to stand by when he could have helped. Dr. Ziegler was too pleased with the results to worry about that."

"But you are?"

Tataryn shrugged. "I just thought you should know. I don't know his angle, but that omnic is unpredictable. You should be careful. He's targeting you for some reason, and that is worrisome."

"I'd assume it's my proximity to Gabriel."

"Maybe it is more than that. He knows a lot more than he lets on." Tataryn scowled heavily. "Those omnic faces, you cannot read them like humans, Lucky. They are purely for show. Those programs do not feel like we do. I do not like it one bit."

You understood that very clearly. Until Athena, you hadn't thought artificial intelligences could feel embarrassment. But you also knew that the underlying hostility in Tataryn's words wasn't entirely fair, and maybe you had Zenyatta to thank for it. He had odd ways of conveying emotion too. Sheepishness, sincerity, things that you couldn't quite read on his face. "I'm sure omnics have their tells. I'm starting to pick up some: twitching, light patterns, other mechanical quirks. We haven't learned them yet. It's just culture shock."

Tataryn's scowl lightened. "I suppose you could be right. I do not smile in Moscow. Smiling too much in some places is asking for trouble. But not smiling in other places is the same."

He shrugged. "Still, they are hard to read."

You sipped your tea, pleasantly surprised by the balance. "This is good."

"McCree isn't the only one who knows how to make a good cuppa," Tataryn said, waving his hand dismissively. "It still falls short of Ana's, but we can't all be perfect."

"So what else was worrying you?" You held the warm mug in your hands, trying not to get distracted by the numerous things Tataryn had all over his room, silver samovars, ceremonial daggers, and deck of what looked like tarot cards on the coffee table.

"Mmm," Tataryn gave a little shrug. "I am not worried, per se. But perhaps I realized that I did not share some important information with you about Kseniya."

There it was. The real reason he invited you here and made you tea. You sat back on the sofa, giving Tataryn a cool look.

"It would be best, if no one knows she is my daughter." Tataryn stirred his tea. "I understand if some of our trusted comrades have already been told, but I would like to keep our relationship a secret. For her own safety."

"OK," you said, because you'd dealt with enough traitors that you understood his caution. "I wasn't planning on bringing her here. You wanted me to go to her school."

"Yes, yes, but I suppose I should warn you that she doesn't want to be at school for their family visitation day. And given your track record when it comes to outings, I would prefer you only accompanied her to highly defensible locations."

"So she doesn't want me at her school? I guess she's just embarrassed by Pseudo-Aunt Lucky," you said dryly.

Tataryn laughed. "I think we both know what it's like to watch happy families milling about, completely oblivious to their own good fortune. We have the ability to shake it off, or at least hide our envy." Tataryn stared at the floor for a moment. And you kind of wished you didn't understand exactly what he was talking about. "But Kseniya is still young."

"And she's missing you."
Tataryn shrugged again. "I visit when I can."

"So you think I should bring her back here if she doesn't want to stay at her academy?"

"No, but if she insists, you can. But you must check out an armored car from the motor pool, ensure she rides in the back seat, and drive at a steady rate of eight kilometers below the speed limit."

You laughed. "No, seriously-"

Tataryn wasn't smiling. "I am very serious."

You blinked.

"And she cannot stay out late. You have to have back at the school by seven PM. She needs time to bathe and prepare for bed."

You blinked again.

"No scary films. No violent films. No films where the cute fuzzy animal dies. She finds those very upsetting." Tataryn finished his tea in one gulp. "I would prefer you did not inform her of my more...violent exploits, but you don't have to lie to her if she asks you specific questions. And she will."

Your eyebrows climbed higher.

"Ana and the commander are the only ones who have met her as my daughter. I have clearance from the commander to introduce her as his niece, if necessary."

"...Huh," was all you said.

"You should limit her sweets to no more than two desserts while out, and try to make sure she spaces them out. I will provide a list of her favorite foods."

You stared vacantly as Tataryn began to list off dishes along with alternatives. Apparently, Kseniya was trying out vegetarianism now and he wanted to be supportive. Tataryn was absolutely serious. Just what the hell had you agreed to again?

Chapter End Notes

 Almost dropped the a sliding glass door on myself today. It came off the track like "SURPRISE BITCH!" And I was home alone. Didn't drop it though and my cousin and I think we can fix it, but honestly, this home improvement stuff is something that terrifies me and I'm bad at it.

Back at work, and my filter won't go back on. This old guy kept asking for free stuff and jokingly offering his baby grandson as a trade. He comes up to me and says, "I bet this gal would want a baby!" And I was busy with projects, so I was reading the instructions on the computer and just said, "No thanks, I already ate." And he went "No...huh." And walked off. I consider that one a win. This lady wanted to ask me about age level and content of a kids graphic novel and it came up that this girl wrote a guy a love letter and it gets read in front of the whole class. My coworker says something like "bet you wrote love letters." And I said, "No, I wrote threats. Until I realized you shouldn't write that kind of stuff down." Needless to say, the customer did not want to talk to me very much longer, even though I added "Just kidding!" in a not-very-convincing way. So oops.

I am bad at adulting.
Chapter 79

Chapter Summary

Tataryn is still the worst, but thankfully you have good food and good company to soften the bad news.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Rubbing your forehead, you left Tataryn's room, wondering if this was a terrible mistake. Scratch that. It was a terrible mistake, but how terrible? Well, you would have to wait and see. You weren't sure if you had the patience to handle Ziv right this moment, so you headed back toward your room, wondering if Genji had returned yet.

"Ma'am! I mean, Agent Strike!"

You turned to see Távio speed-walking to catch up with you. You stopped to give him time to reach you.

Still in his exercise gear, Távio's forehead was damp and you assumed he'd just come from the gym. His curls were still growing out, and you briefly wondered if he would go all-out like Ziv or keep them trimmed.

He grinned up at you. "Agent Tataryn just let me know you'd arrived."

You were getting Kseniya an extra slice of cake, just to annoy her father.

"Is everything all right?" You took in his big grin and gym bag slung casually over his shoulder.

"It's great, ma'am. That omnic, the Shambali one, he got Daniels to wake up! Told me that you'd convinced him to do it. He's something else," Távio said with clear admiration in his voice. "How'd you meet him...or is that classified?"

You rubbed the bridge of your nose. "He is in the employ of a UN ambassador. We've crossed paths a few times because of it."

Távio's eyes widened.

You reviewed your words, wondering if you'd accidentally said anything incriminating.

"What's he doing here then? Is he a spy?" His eyes narrowed.

You shrugged, but were quietly pleased that he'd read between the lines. "Politics are complicated."

Távio's mouth flattened. "So he's a spy."

"He's not a bad guy, I think, but he has his own agenda." You weighed the importance of discretion versus Távio's inclination toward rash action. You would have to be more explicit, otherwise he might do something stupid. "It may or may not line up with ours. We're still working out his angle. Don't stress it, but don't get too cozy with him." You reached your door. "Was there something else?"

Távio actually squirmed under your gaze. "Permission to speak freely?"

You opened your door. "Yeah, come in. Athena, turn on privacy mode." You held the door.

Távio looked around your room, his eyes darting between your giant bear, your many plants, and the trophy weapons strewn across your desk. You gestured at the chair and shut the door, before sitting down on your bed, feet square on the floor.

"Reinhardt got me the bear," you said. "I wouldn't have bought something that big to put in this tiny room."

"Do you especially like bears or...?"

"I think that's Rein's aesthetic," you said with a shrug.

Távio turned his attention to the bullets lined up on the desk and your sheathed tanto before sitting down, the chair tilting backward as he steadied himself against the desk. "Your chair...uh...maybe I could fix it for you?" He got up, tilted the chair back, and looked at the underside of the seat, frowning. "...The swivel mount is cracked and this spring is all bent out of shape. I think I could fix it if you like. But you might be better off requisitioning a new one."

You laughed, because you knew that already. "I didn't break it. I'm waiting for the culprit to replace it. Though...that might never happen."

"Oh." Távio grinned sheepishly. "Do you just like watching your guests flail around?"

"Sometimes. Honestly, I rarely use the chair, so I forget it's broken. What's on your mind?"

Távio chose to sit on the floor instead of wrangling the chair. "Agent Tataryn says he's trying to place me in a squad. But the one he thinks I'll do best in is Epsilon squad."

You frowned. "Epsilon squad wasn't taking new members, last I checked." And with Lieutenant Jemison at the head, Petras had taken far too much interest in it. As evidenced by your shortened vacation. You felt a pang of guilt. That was partially your fault, though Lacroix bore the lion's share of the blame.

"Why'd he bring it up then?"

Why indeed? Oh, that shithead. Silently, you cursed Tataryn, deciding right then to give Kseniya as much goddamn dessert as she wanted.

"I have no clue," you lied. "I assume he was aiming high. Epsilon squad does a lot of hard jobs and you'd get some good combat experience. But they're not usually a rookie posting."

"Oh. I wasn't sure if Agent Shoal thought I'd be a bad fit." He stared at the floor. "I uh...might not have given her a good impression earlier on."

You rolled your eyes, remembering how Shoal compared Távio to you. Well, she didn't have a good first impression of you either. Luckily, Shoal was open-minded and could admit it when she was wrong. You appreciated that, not being quite so magnanimous yourself. "You could learn a lot in Epsilon squad, but the timing isn't right. Agent Shoal doesn't have a problem with you, if you remember she came to the infirmary to fuss over you."

"Thought she was there to see Agent McCree," Távio said in a low voice.

You shrugged. "Not just Jesse, though that's her business."

"I know, ma'am. Wouldn't repeat that to anyone but you and Agent Tataryn," he said quickly, eyes wide. "I just...wasn't sure what to do."

"Be patient," you said. "We're looking for a good fit. Especially if you want to transition into black ops. Epsilon squad isn't a bad choice, but it isn't my first pick. It'll be hard to find someone to match Rodriguez." And as you told Tataryn, you weren't actually that familiar with individual Overwatch squad dynamics.

Távio nodded.

And you blinked suddenly realizing who did match Rodriguez. And though the position held low combat probability, Chang ran intense drills and would not be the least bit lax with his training. Hell, you'd send Ziv along just for some peace. Rayner Chang's military school for wayward youths.

"You've thought of someone," he said brightly.

"I'll have to ask, and it would be up to the sergeant's discretion," you said. "I will warn you, it's not a traditional career move and I make no promises about your acceptance."

"But you've thought of someone." He leaned forward. "If you think it will be a good fit, ma'am, I trust your judgment."

You sat there, thinking dark thoughts at Tataryn. That ass had to know Távio wouldn't make Epsilon squad. And once he told the boy, Távio would come to you, and you'd offer him advice, and possibly fix the problem yourself. Even though you'd tasked Tataryn to place him.
And you'd already fulfilled your end of the bargain and agreed to take Kseniya out. Tataryn was counting on you being too decent to renege. That lazy manipulative bastard. He'd played you like a fiddle.

"Is everything...OK?" Távio asked, drawing back.

"...Just realized something, was all." It took effort to bite back the grimacing. That sly weasel. He was as bad as Lacroix, and even more self-serving. "All right, give me a week or so, and I might have an answer."

"Thank you, ma'am."

"You don't have to call me "ma'am," Távio."

"Habit, ma'am, especially since you're looking out for me."

"Was that all then?" You asked, checking your tablet. Jack hadn't sent any messages yet, so you had no idea what was going on.

"...Uh..." Távio rubbed the back of his head, and stared at the floor. "I...uh...I know it's none of my business, but there is something I was...uh...concerned about, ma'am."
You rested your elbows on your knees. "OK."

"This is the part where I wasn't so sure about speaking freely, ma'am," he said hesitantly. He gazed up at you, his unconvincing smile dripping with guilt.

"Go on," you said, rubbing your forehead and hoping you wouldn't regret it.

"A lot of people in Blackwatch think you're in a relationship with Commander Reyes. They don't spread the gossip, but...it's different outside of Blackwatch."

"Just who in Blackwatch have you been talking to?" You scowled.

To his credit, Távio just shrugged. "Nobody said anything outright. It was more like, "She and the commander are gone at the same time? No surprise. She keeps things running smoothly and he's in a better mood when she's around." That kind of thing."

You nodded, that was fair. A lot of Blackwatch suspected you two were sleeping together. But that wasn't an issue as long as they never got any evidence.

"But you're in a relationship with the Strike Commander," he said lowering his voice, and confirming that he remembered your declaration in those caves. "And everyone in Overwatch knows that things between Commander Reyes and Commander Morrison have been rocky for a long time."

You crossed your arms. "Just what are you implying?"

"Are you OK in this position, ma'am? I know you're capable, but having to mediate for Commander Reyes and the Strike Commander is a lot of pressure." He shrank down as he spoke. "And I'm pretty sure Commander Reyes has feelings for you too. Not that I think any of this is news to you, ma'am. I'm just...it's not an easy situation to be in, ma'am."

You blinked, taken aback by his reading of the relationship dynamic. And the constant ma'am-ing. Hadn't you broken him of that habit yet?

"And what exactly would you do if that was the case?" You asked, genuinely curious.

He shrugged. "I don't know, ma'am. Offer whatever help you wanted. I uh...figured you'd have a plan."

You weren't entirely sure you bought that explanation.

"Did you voice your concerns to anyone else?"

"Agent McCree said you were fine. So I was only a little worried," he said, jamming his hands in his pockets. "But Agent McCree's pretty loyal to Commander Reyes."

You smiled wryly at that. "Jesse has my back." Even if you hadn't realized the extent of it. "I appreciate your concern, but it's nothing to worry about. Jack and Gabriel get along fine. I very rarely mediate their disputes. There are political reasons why they have to appear at odds with each other. So don't go reassuring people too much, but know that things aren't as dire as they appear."

Távio sat there silently. "Are you seeing both of them?"

You nearly choked on your tongue. He hadn't come to that conclusion just in seconds, had he?
"I'm not judging," he said hastily. "But that's the only other explanation that makes sense."

"What, Gabriel and I can't just be friends?"

"...You're not...blatant about anything. But you don't act like platonic friends," he said, words very soft. "The body language is all wrong. And...the commander behaves differently around you. It's little things, like how he watches you. Agent McCree is one of Commander Reyes' favorite agents, but he doesn't treat him like he treats you. I can't put it into words, but you're not just friends."

You wondered how many other clever Blackwatch agents had deduced that already. Then you wondered how many actually cared. There had been a constant stream of requests for you to return to your administrative duties after Candle Arc went bad. Your fellow agents didn't care if you were sleeping with the boss, as long as you did your job and kept him in a good mood.

"I know what you're going to say," he said brown eyes meeting yours. "And I know how to keep my mouth shut, ma'am."

You sighed, leaning against the wall. "You're not wrong."

He swallowed, eyes getting bigger. "Oh."

As much as you liked Távio, you weren't going to out Gabriel and Jack to him just yet. If he went to Chang's squad, he'd find out soon enough. But until then, it wasn't his business.

"They both know. There's no deception among the three of us. It's fine," you said with a shrug.

Távio just stared at you for a moment like he wanted to ask more, but then he dropped his gaze. "Understood." He gave you a firm nod. "If you say "it's fine," then it's fine, ma'am. I just wanted to make sure you were OK."

You squinted at him, searching for any hint of sarcasm or even just pandering, but he just looked relieved.

"Well, I appreciate you looking out for me," you said.

He nodded, shakily. "I uh...thank you for not getting upset at me for overstepping or not minding my own business."

You sat there waiting for the awkwardness to dissipate. It did not. You waited a little longer, because your student had just asked you about your secret sex life and you'd given him a mostly honest answer.

"I uh...I should go then," Távio said, climbing to his feet, his eyes averted.

You were going to have to do something to clear the air. "I'm going to be...accompanying a kid around the grounds next week. Do you have any insight into what might interest a precocious eight year old girl?"

Távio stared thoughtfully at the wall. "Not your room. Maybe the bear, but not much else."

You snorted.

"Winston is great at science stuff. And he's nice. Good at explaining things when Agent Mihret talks over your head. You should visit him," Távio said, and you didn't miss the wry expression on his face when he mentioned Ziv. "And Commander Wilhelm is pretty cool too. I think he'd be good with kids. Umm, I can look into it, if you want," he said, sounding more confident. "I used to look after some of the younger ones back home."

"That would be helpful," you said.

"You can count on me, ma'am!" Távio beamed, smacking his hand against his chest.

You just shook your head, unable to picture Távio as responsible enough to look after even younger children. That was clearly inaccurate; Távio was a capable youth, and you were just biased. Still, you couldn't look at him as anything but a child. When had you become the Overwatch babysitter?

---

You sent Ziv and Genji messages saying you would meet with them tomorrow, and checked in with Athena. Petras was still occupied with Jack. But Gabriel had sent you a message inviting you to his quarters.

You headed over, though you thought the original plan had been to meet in Jack's room.

Gabriel knelt in front of his table, adjusting a large electric griddle. Your rice cooker sat next to it, steam rising from the vent. The coolers were on the ground, and you rubbed your hands together.

"Don't open the one with the fish symbol on it. Ito has some fancy temperature-control for the sashimi set up, and the food will stay good as long as you don't open it till we're ready to eat."

"But I can open the other one?"

Gabriel sighed. "If you must."

"You could just tell me what's inside," you said, not pouting at all.

"An assortment of dishes they managed to prepare while we were waiting to go: seaweed salad, braised vegetables, marinated Berkshire pork, aged wagyu beef, all the stuff that isn't raw fish. Some of it needs to be cooked or reheated, and this griddle should do the trick. I know the kitchen would be better, but we can't work in there without a bunch of scavengers congregating."

"That's a lot of food," you teased.

"And I'm not sharing with anyone besides you and Jack. You've seen those Shimadas eat. Can you imagine what they'll do if they see what we have here? No, I'm not risking it," Gabriel said firmly. "Now you can get into the other cooler, and start sorting the stuff that needs to be reheated."

Laughing, you opened the cooler to find about two dozen containers neatly stacked, and labeled, with finishing instructions taped to each one.

"Well," you said, a little taken aback by that level OCD. "That's...nice."

Gabriel smirked. "It's good to make friends, isn't it?"
"Chef Astro and Mr. Ito did take a shine to you," you said.

"Maybe, but I'm sure Feng had something to do with this. The girl is trying to buy our approval with food, and I will admit that it's working."

"I'm sold," you said, making two stacks of food.

"I can tell, but I'm not that easy," Gabriel said with a straight face as you started handing him the meat. "Jack should be done soon. If not, I've instructed Athena to page him with a complex and coded tactical "emergency." If that fails, you'll have to get one of your lackeys to run in and interrupt. I nominate Mihret. He might even give the old bastard a stroke while he's at it."

"Then we'll never hear the end of how he singlehandedly saved Jack and Overwatch."

"Never mind," Gabriel muttered, shaking his head. "I'll do it myself." He began cooking the meat first. The steak would need time to rest before it was served. Letting the beef sit awhile before cutting it ensured the meat remained juicy. He could always throw the steaks back on the heat to sear right before he served them.

"So, I'm...spending the day with Tataryn's daughter next week. He says he has permission to claim she's your niece."

Gabriel looked up, expression shrewd. "Suckered you in then, did he?"

"Yeah," you grumbled.

"You're not the only one," Gabriel said, sounding very casual about it and you wondered why he hadn't warned you about Tataryn's predilection for foisting his kid on other people. "And Kseniya's a good kid. So it shouldn't be too painful. But Tataryn and her mother made a lot of people angry. And those Thieves-in-Law bastards have long memories. He's being extra cautious is all. My sisters have a dozen or so kids in various stages of development. It'll be fine."

You nodded. "Just checking. Because you can't take that asshole at face value." And then you told him about how Tataryn managed to weasel out of your deal.

Gabriel just laughed. So much for sympathy.

"But I think Távio might do well with some lessons from Chang. Do you think she'd be open to working with him? It's not a live-fire combat-rotated squad, but-"

"...They see combat," Gabriel said, flatly. "At least twice a year, some asshole with big guns shows up looking for the Strike Commander's family. Usually it's a loner; sometimes it's a mercenary troop. But Chang's good at keeping a lid on the situation, and if she takes one alive, which she usually does if there's more than one, we get them for interrogation."

"Oh," you said.

"What? Don't think your boy can handle it?"

"He's not my-" You shook your head, realizing the futility of your protests. "I was just surprised. I'm not worried about him. He wants to join Blackwatch. So yeah, I think he can handle it." You paused. "He figured out that we're together too."

Gabriel's smile widened. "Oh?"
"Didn't tell him about you and Jack. Kid knows too much as it is. But if he gets stationed with Chang-"

"I wouldn't count on it," Gabriel said wryly. "But it doesn't matter, you're going to have to convince Chang to take him on. And don't expect Jack's help either. I doubt he wants a roguish young agent anywhere near Maggie."

"...I'm not entirely sure he wouldn't prefer Michael," you said after a moment. Though you hadn't considered the danger of two adrenaline junkie teenagers in each other's proximity. Which was rather foolish of you, to be honest.

Gabriel shook his head. "No one prefers Michael."

You choked on your laugh. "Gabriel!"

"It's true and you know it," he said, completely unrepentant. "I'm not worried though. That girl can take care of herself. Michael though? Michael's a great big weenie."

You recognized the wicked glint in Gabriel's eyes and dropped your protests. There would be no winning. "Do you have any suggestions for placement?"

Gabriel shrugged. "You could ask Wilhelm to take him on. He's a soft touch."

You considered it. Reinhardt would not cover black ops material, but Távio needed a more balanced training regiment. He was eager to please you, because he respected your reputation. On top of being clever and sneaky, he was a quick study with good people skills. But you recognized that same vicious survivor's streak that you possessed. Being ruthless came easier than you liked to admit, and you didn't have trouble committing crimes for "good reasons" and some bad ones. That cool practicality and flexible morality were a boon in your line of work. But left unchecked, they could warp a person's sensibilities or make them cruel.

"They have very different skill sets," you said. Távio was smaller, and while he was strong, he wasn't built to be a bulwark or carry around power armor all day.

"Wilhelm, for all his bluster and idiocy, does have good networking skills and a knack for teaching. If he didn't think he could help the boy, he'd find someone who could. Chang isn't a bad idea, but you need a backup plan."

You nodded. "OK."

Gabriel had the Berkshire pork on the griddle now, rich fatty cuts of meat marinated in mirin, sugar, and soy sauce. It smelled divine.

The door creaked open, and you turned around to see Jack kicking off his boots. He slammed the door behind him, and threw himself facedown on the couch, pulling a pillow over his head.

"Jack?" You blinked.

"Give me a minute," he growled, words muffled by the cushions.

"Do you want to cook or rub his back? I'm in the middle of this so-" Gabriel asked, not looking up from the griddle. He seemed more interested in the food.

"I guess I'll rub his back," you said.
Gabriel chuckled and began to hum.

You climbed over the back of the couch, grinning down at Jack's back. "Incoming!" You slid down and lifted one arm, tugging his sleeve off. Jack mumbled something, but just stayed face down, letting you peel his ridiculously heavy overcoat off. You unfastened his holsters, took them off, and carefully set them on the coffee table. Then you worked your fingers under his waist, unbuckled his belt, and pulled it off, also placing it on the coffee table, next to his sidearm. With the constrictive clothing out of the way, you straddled his waist and began lightly pounding on his back, loosening the tense muscles.

He groaned loudly when you dug your metal fingers into the knots, some in his shoulders, others in his low back. You used your right hand to work on the more delicate parts, like his neck and spine. There was something fascinating about having all that taut solid muscle underneath you, responding to your every touch. Gradually, he lifted his head, glancing over his shoulder blearily.

"Are you an angel?"

"Shut up, Jack," you laughed, in spite of the cheesiness.

"Oh, I see, you're from the other side. That's OK, too," he said and winked.

"Close enough," you said.

"I like bad girls. And boys," Jack laughed. He patted your legs before rolling onto his back. "Gabe, is dinner almost ready?"

"Yes, dear," Gabriel said exaggerated cheer. "You just lay on the couch and cuddle our girlfriend while I do all the work."

"OK, thanks, you're the best!" Jack said, smirking up at you. He ran his fingers along your calves.

You looked up at Gabriel who was giving Jack a sardonic smile, one brow arched. He just shook his head and smiled tolerantly at you. "Pendejo," he muttered, and turned his focus back to the food.

"Kiss?" Jack puckered up, eyes squeezed shut.

You leaned over and pecked him on the lips, squealing as he grabbed to fistfuls of your hoodie and yanked you in for a longer kiss, his teeth nibbling on your bottom lip. You laughed, and pushed him down against the couch. He let you, eyes shining as he grinned up at you.

"Don't get too carried away," Gabriel called out. "Food's almost ready."

Jack lay flat against the couch, one hand on your hip.

"Feeling better?" You patted Jack's stomach.

"Yeah," he sighed, running his fingers through his hair.

"Corazon, do you want to help me take some plates to the couch?" Gabriel picked up the unopened cooler and brought it over to the coffee table.

"Are you sure it's wise to leave Jack alone with the food?" You asked, already getting up to "Hey, the most important part of any relationship is trust!" Jack sat up. "And you can trust me alone with the food for about five minutes."

You brought over a tray with the a large bowl of cubed pork and the plate of sliced beef tataki with its ponzu-soy dipping sauce to the coffee table. The wagyu filets were next: you were serving this out of order, but you knew Jack would prefer the meat first.

Gabriel had already set out the seaweed salad, marinated bamboo shoots, lightly pickled shrimp with cucumbers, and a whole sea bream, its crisp skin crusted with salt, the pink skin seared to shades of golden brown. The fish lay in a bed of shredded daikon radish. There were fine-sliced braised mushrooms over white cubes of tofu drizzled with a thin brown sauce. A large ceramic bowl held a savory egg custard mixed with sliced clams and greens, and was topped with sliced scallions and sesame seeds.

Gabriel went back to scoop out bowls of rice while you opened up the sake, foregoing the cute little cups and pouring coffee mugs of the high quality stuff that Mr. Ito had sent along. "Serve chilled, slightly below room temperature," were the instructions, and you weren't going to argue.

Jack sighed happily. "I'm sorry about our vacation."

"But you're really glad we're here right now with all this food," Gabriel said, handing him a rice bowl and a set of chopsticks. He then opened up the sashimi cooler, removing several platters of sliced raw fish.

"I can't deny that having you both here makes it a lot better," Jack said.

"Should we take a picture for Feng?"

"No, if Genji find out that we ate all this and didn't invite him, it won't be pretty," you said.

"Not my problem," Jack said, snapping a quick photo.

Gabriel handed you your rice and sat down on Jack's other side. Jack leaned over to kiss him. "Thank you, babe."

"You're welcome, amor.″ Gabriel sat back in his seat, looking very pleased with all the food. "I know this is meant to be served in a specific style, but I figured you'd be too hungry to care."

"It was meant to be eaten just like this, sitting beside your favorite lover," Jack said, grabbing a steak and dropping it onto his rice.

"Mmm, switch me places then," Gabriel said, picking up a piece of pork.

You just laughed and reached for the sashimi.

It was only when you were finishing up that Jack finally started to talk about the reason for your early return.
"Jemison was happy she didn't have to move the squad on such short notice." Jack shook his head. "Also relieved because she knows Petras' angle."

"What'd he want?" Gabriel asked, idly taking a bite of braised bamboo.

You snagged another bite of cold tofu with oyster sauce, sesame oil, and matsutake mushrooms. The umami flavor was much stronger than you'd expected and it went very well with the rice and eggs.

"It was mostly a power play," Jack grumbled. "To remind me who's in charge. He's worried about something though. First he feigned concern over Epsilon squad and the Mediterranean region, claiming he only wanted to send the best to deal with the threat."

Epsilon squad was solid, but it was only led by a lieutenant because it handled short-term blitz-style ops, usually under the Strike Commander's supervision. Rodriguez and Nejem had been higher ranked because their squads operated independently: they required less oversight and had more freedom to establish their own perimeter and maintain stability. Epsilon squad was not built for that purpose. It was a bad fit all around, and either Petras was a total idiot or obviously trying to get them killed. You weren't sure it wasn't both.

"He went on to tell me that I'm not handling the situation "as well as he'd hoped." Then he wanted to talk to me about my foolish foray into politics and my "well-intentioned" inclusion of "one of those talkative ones," alluding to Zenyatta's presence. He then had to tell me what a mistake it was to try to "pander to a select minority in this political climate." Obviously, my ties to Kwento have him nervous."

"Greasy eelfucker," you muttered.

Jack laughed and kissed your cheek.

"Did he do that thing where he tries to appear all paternal and worried about you, like he's just some saintly soul telling you this out of the goodness of his heart? Because it's fucking insulting," Gabriel scowled. "Don't call me "son." You're not my father, you pasty-faced televangelist fuck."

"Dibs," you said raising one hand. "I'm still calling dibs on killing him."

Jack sighed. "So, I made a concession-"

You groaned.

"I told him I'd had trouble finding an assistant as competent as Ainsley. I asked if she was still looking to come back."

"Nooooooooo," you groaned even louder.

Gabriel snorted. "I bet Petras was thrilled."

"He practically started salivating. It was really creepy. Yes, I know she's a Trojan horse, but with Athena, Winston, and Agent Mihret monitoring all her electronic traffic, I think this will give us a better idea of what Petras is after. Gérard suggested it awhile ago. I just hadn't needed to throw that bone, till now."

"You do realize this limits the amount of sex we can have in your office," you said, less than thrilled and perfectly comfortable showing it.
"Gabe's office is better for that anyway," Jack said with a shrug. "I know we'll have to be more careful, but I think we can manage it. It seems Ainsley's just been traveling on her father's dime, "seeing the world" and "finding herself." But now she's ready to come back."

Gabriel just looked as amused as he had when he first mentioned "Overwatch Barbie." But that was because he hadn't spent several days in her company listening to her talk about herself.

"Cheer up, baby. She won't be arriving till next week." Jack nuzzled your neck. "You're so cute when you're jealous."

You smacked him with a throw pillow, unimpressed by his implications. "Jack Morrison if you think that's why I'm annoyed-"

"Jealousy! Madness!" Jack laughed and you hit him again with the pillow. "Gabe, help!"

Gabriel sighed and poured himself more sake. "Taunt her at your own risk, Morrison. If I remember correctly, Overwatch Barbie was driving you nuts too."

You waved the throw pillow threateningly, and Jack held his hands up in surrender. "It's true, I'm dreading it too. But we'll see what happens."

You vowed then to clinch this deal with Kvento. You had more than enough motivation to move up the time table on ousting Petras. Tomorrow, you would visit Zenyatta.

"So Maeda Vargas needs a new posting, and Lucky wants to know if Chang will take him," Gabriel said, reaching out and scratching your back lightly.

Jack's brow furrowed. He looked between you and Gabriel, like this was some kind of trap. "Is that so?"

"I can ask for Rein's help if Chang isn't interested," you said. "But I'd like to keep an eye on him."

"And he's not even a hacker," Gabriel said, with a grin. "I think Wilhelm might be a better choice. But I won't deny Chang has a unique way of handling difficult youths."

Jack stared at the table, tapping his knee. "...That's entirely up to Ray."

"Right, I'll shoot off a message tonight," you said with a yawn. "Now we better clean up." You began to gather the plates, noting there would be enough leftovers for breakfast tomorrow.

"He's figured out that she's seeing both of us, but he thinks she's collecting an SEP harem," Gabriel said in a stage whisper. "Still hasn't connected the final line yet."

Jack pinched the bridge of his nose, grimacing. "I see."

"He's not that bad, Jack," Gabriel smirked. "Quite a promising young agent, in fact. Lucky's going above and beyond by mentoring him. He's got a lot of potential, but if left unchecked, he could easily become another Mihret."

Gabriel was completely off-base. Távio had far better social skills than Ziv. He'd be more like Tataryn. But the world didn't need more of that either.

Jack gave Gabriel a dirty look.

"And just think, she never would have had the opportunity to teach him, if you hadn't run off to Mongolia without me..."

Groaning, Jack buried his face in his hands.

Gabriel winked at you.

You blew him a kiss. Served Jack right for implying you were jealous of Ainsley.

You woke up to crumbs falling on your head. Again. Why did Gabriel let Jack eat in bed? Yawning, you dusted off your face, ignoring Jack's soft laughs. You tried to pull the blankets over your head, but Jack began to rub your neck with slightly greasy hands.

"Why are you like this?" You sighed, opening your eyes.

Bare-chested and flecked with crumbs, Jack offered you his croissant. You obligingly took a bite, pleasantly surprised to find it filled with whipped chocolate butter. The sugar perked you up immediately, and you stretched, reaching over to squeeze Gabriel's arm.

"Thought you'd need some more energy," Jack purred, one hand stroking your hip. "We still have today off..."

"More food," you said.

Gabriel laughed and rolled over, his hands gently brushing the crumbs off your head. "Jack, why?"

"It's flaky!"

"Like you," you muttered.

"I don't share my breakfast with mean girls," Jack said, holding the croissant over your head. "They can get their own."

"Going back to sleep then," you murmured.

Jack just started chewing extra loudly over your head, finishing the bread with lip-smacking gusto.

"Are you going to Shanghai this weekend?" Gabriel asked, nudging you.

"It'd probably just be a daytrip. Why? Do you guys want to come?" You sat up, stretching, because obviously your lovers weren't going to let you go back to sleep. Jerks.

"I probably shouldn't," Jack said wistfully.

"I might be able to," Gabriel said then groaned. "Probably not, though. Have a five days of work to catch up on."

"Guess I should stay back and help," you said, because part of your job was helping manage Gabriel's workload.
"No, you should go," Jack added quickly. "Feng would be delighted to see you."

"Yeah," Gabriel yawned and patted your head. "Go see your friend. We can manage for a weekend."

"Maintaining good ties with On Sing can count as a work trip," Jack said with a wink.

"Oh, I see how it is. I'm your "thank you" sacrifice to Feng," you said with an eye roll.

Suddenly you were flat on your back, Jack's hands on your shoulders, as he pressed you to the mattress.

"Nope. Feng can find her own girlfriend. This one's mine. And Gabe's,' he added, eyes locked on yours, his smile a little too sharp to be completely playful. "That's all the sharing I'm doing." He nipped your collarbone for emphasis.

You ran your fingers through his hair, grinning as he kissed your throat. "I just meant you're sending me to hang out with her so you don't have to."

"Delegation is important," Jack said, giving you a mock serious look, his hands already peeling the blankets away from your body. "But it's more important to know when you have to do a job yourself, like right now..." His hands slid down under your t-shirt.

"You should at least take her some kind of thank you token. It's only polite," Gabriel said, his smile a little too amused.

"Gift basket?" You wondered, as Jack's fingers hovered over your ribcage.

"I think you should pick out the gift basket yourself, Strike Commander." Gabriel leaned over to kiss Jack. "It will mean a lot more if the gift has a personal touch."

Jack gave Gabriel a disgruntled frown. "Really, Gabe?"

"Well, we are talking about the person who helped arrange that extra nice vacation we just returned from. I thought you were working on being a more thoughtful and considerate individual."

Groaning, Jack sat back on his haunches. "Gabe-"

"Feng wanted to visit Zurich again," you said. "We could probably put her in big sunglasses and a floppy hat, and let her hang out for Family Day."

"That'll work," Jack said quickly. "And I'd like your input on the basket contents too, Gabe. You and Lucky are better at picking out presents anyway."

Gabriel chuckled. "In a hurry, are you?" He wrapped his arms around Jack's waist. Jack leaned into him, tilting his head back to kiss Gabriel's chin.

"Family Day invitation and fancy gift basket personally delivered by Lucky," Jack said. "Sounds like a plan."

"So is that it?" You traced the a ridged scar across Jack's pectorals.

"Yeah, Gabe, is that it?" Jack murmured, tugging at the blanket covering you.

"Stop that." Gabriel rolled his eyes. "You're getting crumbs everywhere. You're doing the laundry and sweeping my floor, Jack."
"OK," Jack sighed. "We can get a shower after this. I'll wash your hair, baby. To make up for getting stuff in it." He went back to pulling on your blanket.

Gabe snorted. "Focus, Jack. And not on fucking in my shower."

"You're invited too," Jack said brightly.

"I should hope so, considering it's my shower."

"Hey, let's focus on fucking in the bed first," you said, laughing as you took your shirt off.

Chapter End Notes

This would have come sooner but AO3 ate my last draft and I had to redo some things. Writing is slowly picking up again. Needed some time to plot the details of the next arc and steer it toward the finish line.

Real life is weird and extra social right now, which cuts into my writing time. But it's good for me, I think, and I'm trying to work on balance so I don't burn out (in everything, not just work and writing).
Chapter 80

Chapter Summary

Friendship is magic. Friendship is also awkward, invasive, and only lets you shoot things some of the time. You wouldn't trade it for anything.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

"How do you do it?" Ziv practically shouted as he paced your room. "How do you have a relationship with two people? I have enough trouble with one!"

You sat on your bed sipping strawberry Fanta and trying not to laugh. "Well, to begin with, I have higher level social skills than you. And I also have friends-"

"Ben-zona! That was rhetorical, and you can shut the hell up-" He stopped, jabbing his finger in your direction. "And the three of you are banging each other so it's not the same! This is way more complicated!"

"Then why are you asking for my help?" You rolled your eyes, because Ziv was being an unreasonable brat, as usual.

"I don't know!" He wailed, and sat on your bed, avoiding your broken chair.

You covered your mouth. "Are things not going well with Amélie?"

"Things are great," he hissed. "Amélie and I spent the entire weekend watching K-dramas, doing spa routines, and drinking unspeakably expensive wine. But Gérard was nowhere to be seen!"

You snorted. "So Amélie is a fun friend, isn't she?"

"She's spectacular," Ziv scowled. "Way more fun than you."

You couldn't argue that. "And she's not...pressuring you for sex?" You winced at the harsh wording. That was more indelicate than you intended. But it was better to ask.

"No! She would never! We get along great. It's fucking fabulous! But Gérard..." Ziv took a couple deep breaths, jamming his hands in his pockets. "Well, he keeps avoiding me!"

You shrugged, not missing the fact he was now calling Lacroix by his first name. "He's probably trying to give you time and space to figure out if this is what you want. I mean, you're hanging out with his wife, and knowing Amélie, she isn't shy about talking about sex with you."

"...She isn't," Ziv said with a sheepish smile. "I don't think women are gross, except you. Amélie is gorgeous, elegant, and amazing. I'm just not...attracted to her that way. And she's fine with it. We get along really well."

"Which is saying something, considering what a pain in the ass you are."
"Fuck you," Ziv said with very little feeling. "So things are going well with Amélie. Why is Gérard checking out? Is it only fun if it's illicit?"

You sighed, wishing he'd found literally anyone, besides you, to explain this to him. "The smartest thing he can do is let you and Amélie sort out how both of you feel about this, before he starts escalating. And the two of you seem to be bonding." You left out the comment about "harem-buddies" and "sister-wives" if only because you didn't want that to get back to Amélie. Fuck what Ziv thought.

"He's thinking long-term. You remember when Gabriel not-so-subtly sent me off to Paris with Jack and Overwatch Barbie, who, by the way, is coming back?"

"I know, we've got her account handled," Ziv said, his smile not nice at all. "You just worry about her trying to steal your pretty blonde boyfriend."

"I'm actually more concerned about her cornering me and telling me about how hard her life is," you sniffed. "Jack can fend her off on his own. He's the one who invited her back."

"Gérard explained it. Just another version of "keep your enemies closer." I guess it's good that you're not worried."

"I am," you said. "Just not about her poaching Jack. We have enough hostiles wearing our uniforms, we don't need more...and she annoys the hell out of me."

"It's a good thing your social skills are so much better than mine," Ziv said, ending the sentence in a high-pitched falsetto.

"Shut up," you scowled.

"Anyway, you mentioned Paris? Oh, and Amélie is talking about her own Paris trip some time. Maybe just the three of us. She's very envious of your Iceland trip. I showed her the pictures you sent." Ziv's eyes were big and round, his expression verging on panic. "It better not be like your Paris trip!"

You leaned back against your pillows. "Outside of Ainsley and the terrorist attack, it wasn't that bad. At the time, I assumed Gabriel just wanted someone he trusted watching his boyfriend's back. That was part of it, sure, but he'd wanted to push me and Jack together alone, and it obviously paid off. Cologne was meant to be your version of that."

"It was...kind of." Ziv sighed. "No, it was. Until I fucked everything up."

"Yeah, well Lacroix drank a big old bottle of Bordeaux before he confessed that the two of you were rooming together. So he's not as unmoved by the situation as you may think." You paused. "He also gave me some pretty good advice about handling Amélie. You have to "make her see your perspective and appeal to her better nature." Otherwise she can bulldoze you thinking that she's helping."

"Yeah, I've heard that already," Ziv said with a shrug. "I'm not having problems with Amélie."

You rolled your eyes. "So if things are going your way, why are you so upset?"

"Things never go my way!" Ziv snapped. "I don't know! I don't know how this works! I don't know how to handle this! I'm just going with it, and I don't know if that's good enough!"
"Story of my life, drama queen," you said with a shrug. "Look, it's pretty serious if you're hanging out with Lacroix's wife and she likes you." It was a struggle not to say something mean like, "and that's a goddamn miracle." But Ziv had come to you in distress, and you were trying to be supportive. He just made it really difficult.

"What do I do?" He rubbed his face.

"What you're doing now. There's no rush-"

"Easy for you to say! You're getting nonstop sex, I haven't been laid since-"

"I don't care," you said pleasantly. "If you only wanted no-strings-attached sex, you wouldn't have gotten yourself into this situation."

Ziv grunted.

"Take it slow. Make sure it feels right. Make sure everyone's happy. Talk to Amélie about your concerns." Maybe he should discuss his feelings with Lacroix too, but you had trouble offering that advice. You didn't trust the sneaky Frenchman any further than you could throw him and telling your hacker to trust Lacroix still seemed wrong. "Talk to Lacroix too, after you've talked to Amélie."

"Yeah," Ziv took a few more deep breaths. "You're right."

"Communication and trust," you reminded him and yourself. "It takes time. And you're going to fuck up, so you better compile a list of their favorite things for bribes and work on your apologies. Because you suck at them."

Ziv downed his bottle of strawberry Fanta and belched at you.

"Get out," you said, knowing there was not much more wisdom you could impart on him. And that he was fairly likely to ignore any of the advice you'd already tried to share.

He just belched again, smirking at you.

Once you'd chased Ziv out of your room with a slipper, you went down the hall and knocked on Genji's door. He answered before the second knock, still in his armor, his face grim.

"Oh, didn't realize you'd been on a run."

"We just got back." Genji shrugged. "I should have clarified that we wouldn't be back till today."

"So, yes, I'm down for Shanghai this weekend. Did you need something else?"

"Have you seen, McCree?" Genji asked, eyes darting to Jesse's door.

"No, haven't heard a peep from him," you glanced at the door. "Something wrong?"

"You should check on him," Genji said, abruptly. "And leave me out of it."

"That's a Hanzo move, you know. I care, but I can't admit that I care because I'm emotionally immature."
"No, he's just going to be annoyed by your interloping, and I'd rather not get involved in that fight."

"...Coward," you sighed. "Can you at least tell me what's wrong?"

"I'm not sure," Genji said. "Bandit is fine, if that's what you are wondering. Commander Wilhelm watched him while we were out. He posted pictures on the internal network, if you want to see them eating currywurst and sprawled out on a couch."

"...A thousand times yes," you said. "Thanks for the tip." You paused, glancing back at the door. "How bad?"

"Bring whiskey and chocolate; don't skimp on the whiskey," Genji said. "And I'll let Feng know you're coming for sure." He had an oddly satisfied expression and you weren't sure how to take that. "You might...consider putting any breakable objects up high."

"...What?" You asked.

"Exactly what I said. Move your breakables and consumables up high."

"...Is Bandit being destructive?" You wondered aloud. "Like, you can't just say shit like that and not explain any of it."

Genji just rolled his eyes at you and shut the door in your face. Because apparently, he could and did. You sighed. Friend or not, Genji was a rude little shit.

You went back to your room, grabbed the bottle of Johnny Walker Gold and a couple bars of chocolate from your drawer. Then you knocked on Jesse's door.

Bandit woofed a few times and you heard a curse as Jesse stumbled around his room.

"Who is it?" Jesse growled, his voice ragged.

"Your favorite harbinger of whiskey and chocolate."

There was a grunt and then the door opened. Jesse stood there, in pajama pants and no shirt. He was hatless, his hair mussed, his eyes bloodshot. You took a discrete sniff and smelled cheap booze and maybe corn chips. Jesse noticed the gesture anyway and gritted his teeth.

"Look, I'm tired and just got back from a run-"

Bandit slipped out, his little tail thumping as he took a seat on your foot, so you couldn't just leave. You reached down to pet him. He panted happily.

"What a good boy." You glanced at your whiskey and chocolate, realizing you were going to have to start carrying dog biscuits or something dog-safe.

"What do you want?" Jesse scowled.

"You look rough," you said, going for honesty.

"Some of us didn't just get back from a hot springs retreat with an all-you-can-eat sex buffet," Jesse said sharply.

It clicked then. Well, shit. You hadn't been expecting this. Not after... Well, obviously he hadn't been expecting it either.
"Sex buffet?" You snorted. "No, I got a buy one get one deal, at best."

Jesse glowered at you.

"I'm sorry," you said. "I really thought it was going to go the other way."

Jesse flinched and shuddered, looking away, his profile in shadow. "Yeah, me too." The aggression drained out of his voice, leaving him sounding raw and exhausted. "Does everyone-?"

"I just figured it out while standing here," you said. "You're normally happier to see me, or at least my whiskey."

"Sorry," Jesse mumbled. "Just sore about it. Nothing for you to worry about, sweetpea. But I'm not going to be good company-"

"Well, I have Johnny Walker Gold and chocolate," you said. "I can swing by the cafeteria if you need something more solid. But if you lock me out and try to pretend you're asleep, I'll just get Athena to let me in." Or Vo to blow the door down. Whichever.

"I'm fine," he said, the words clipped and harsh.

"Then I'm coming in."

Scowling at you, Jesse stepped backward. He glared as you set the whiskey and chocolate on his table and settled onto his worn couch. Bandit hopped into your lap, obviously voting for you to stay.

"I thought you were going to come find me..." You said, watching Jesse shut the door. He ungraciously slammed two glasses onto the table and plunked down in a chair across from you.

You slid a chocolate bar across the table and Jesse slumped in his seat, not looking up. Then you opened the whiskey and poured.

"So..." you said, petting Bandit. "You want to vent?"

"I just want to go back to bed," Jesse grumbled, downing his glass in one go.

"You weren't going to fall asleep anyway. Being alone when you're feeling like this sucks. Do you need to go the mats?" You asked, sipping your whiskey.

Grumbling, Jesse just refilled his glass. "No."

You scratched Bandit's chin. "What changed?"

Jesse shook his head. "Nothing that she would tell me. She just finally made up her mind. It was polite, apologetic, and so gently worded it took me a few to realize what she was saying. Took the wind clean out of my sails."

You sighed, remembering the names Jesse called out in the dark of the caves. You felt a pang of guilt over Jamie, but this one wasn't your fault.

"After the rescue, I thought, I thought maybe we had a chance." Jesse stared at the wall. "She came after me. She cares about me, just...maybe not enough. Not the way I want her to. I know the reasons. You do too. I know what she's worried about. I thought, I thought we could beat that, you know? I'm willing to do whatever she wants. But...that isn't enough." Jesse sat hunched over. "I'm not enough."
You could taste the bitterness in his words, and it was enough to make your stomach turn. "That's not true. If you weren't, she never would have let it get this far." Though you had wondered about that numerous times. How seriously did she take his declarations? Other than escorting him to the Overwatch Ball, there'd been very little confirmation that she viewed Jesse as anything other than a good friend. And even if her feelings were stronger than that, it didn't mean she wanted to pursue anything more intimate with him. But it wasn't your relationship; you didn't know what words were spoken between them. All you knew for sure was that Jesse was your friend and he was hurting.

"Darling," Jesse stared at you, eyes hypnotic in their fervor. What exactly does a man like me have to offer a woman like her? You've seen where I'm from. Ain't nothing but cursed dirt, bad blood, and ugly history." Jesse slammed back another whiskey. "Hell, what do I have to offer anyone? Sure, I'm a crackshot, and a snappy dresser-"

You snorted.

"Shut up, sugarpie. I am a snappy dresser, and I brew a mean cup of tea. But that don't exactly make good relationship material." He reached for a cigar, squeezing between his thumb and forefinger. "As for the future? Hold up now, I don't even know what I'm doing next week." He managed a weak smile.

"Those are the wrong questions," you said, though you were intimately familiar with those kinds of doubts. "You're a good man, Jesse McCree, and that's enough on its own. There's no other friend I trust more at my side. When I came here with nothing, but trauma and Gabriel's clothes on my back, you showed me the ropes and watched my six. When I was at my lowest, you stuck by me and helped me stay afloat. When I couldn't figure out what the hell was going on with Gabriel and Jack, you were the only one merciful enough to spell it out for me. So you need to pull your head out of your ass and remember that you are enough."

Jesse blinked a few times, clenching his teeth. "Maybe that's it," he said after a moment. "Got some issues too, you know." He managed a wry smile. "Maybe she knew I wasn't-"

"Do you think it will help if you try to identify the one thing that maybe sunk the deal? If you just change that single attribute will you suddenly be good enough?" You stared at your gloved hands. "Because I've been down that road and it doesn't work like that. We all have issues, Jesse. They all have issues. And if someone you trust can't be supportive or vice versa, it isn't going to work."

Jesse shook his head. "You've been spending more time with that shrink than I thought." He unwrapped a bar of chocolate and took a bite.

"Gabriel and Jack both make me talk about my problems, which happened a lot on vacation, you know, in addition to the sex buffet," you said.

Jesse choked on his block of chocolate, and began to cough. Bandit stood up, slightly alarmed. You patted the dog's head, grinning as Jesse slapped his bare chest.

"So I'm trying to open up and make sure they do the same. You know firsthand how bad I can be at communication."

Combing his fingers through his hair, Jesse shook his head. "Whatever you say, huckleberry."

"You deserve better than crumbs." You patted his hand. It occurred to you then that maybe the captain understood Jesse better than you did. That maybe she knew all about his fears and doubts, and the way he idolized her. Maybe she knew that she couldn't give him what he wanted, or fill that void in his life, though she still wanted to be a part of it. It was an idle thought, not one for sharing now. "I know it's clichéd, but there are other-"

"There ain't no one like her," Jesse said, his tone almost reverent with admiration.

"There's no one else like Shin Sato either," you said, your voice gentle. "Gabriel and Jack didn't...replace him. But I think you understand that already."

Jesse stared at his lap. "Lucky-

"Whatever her reasons, the captain is missing out. And she has to know it too. But this doesn't mean you're not good enough, Jesse. I guess it might feel that way, but it might just be a bad fit. No fault. Just...it won't work." You fumbled with the words. "Also, it's not you, it's her.
And if you tell her I said that, I'll stand by it, even as lightning strikes me dead."

Jesse managed a faint smile. "Ain't necessary for you to stick your neck out like that.
I'm...avoiding her for awhile." He poured himself more whiskey. "It's her prerogative to tell me what she wants. But I'm still upset and it fucking hurts." Jesse closed his eyes. "There's really nothing you can say about that that I don't already know, Lucky."

You mulled that over. "OK. I'm just here to listen if you want to vent. Or say "that bitch!"
in a really quiet voice, because I don't want to die just yet. Or just pet your dog, the one that Gabriel is definitely going to let you keep, in case you hadn't figured it out already."

Jesse snorted. "Thanks, sugarpie."

"Come here," you said patting the cushion beside you.

Hesitantly, Jesse rose and wobbled over. You placed Bandit on his lap and then hugged him. He stiffened briefly, then rested his head on your shoulder.

"I saw the picture of your dog carrier, and that shit was fucked up," you said, sotto voce.
"You look like a city slicker."

"...Fuck you, sugarpie," Jesse muttered with no heat. "Amélie Lacroix is a scary witch when she wants to be."

"I've been saying that for months. But very, very quietly."

Jesse gave snort of laughter.

"Want to come to Shanghai with us this weekend?" You reached over to pet the dog.

"...I don't know. I appreciate the thought, but I don't want to intrude. Ain't really my scene."

"You're not intruding. Feng is always happy for more visitors. We're going to see Bayan too. There'll be food, Hanzo-baiting, and maybe some awkward flirting. You can probably bring Bandit along, though there isn't any shortage of people who want to dogsit him for you."

"...I'll think about it," Jesse murmured, his cheek against your arm.

You patted his head.

"Missed this," he said, not looking up. "You, me, sometimes Mihret... Slumber parties, bad movies, and late night kitchen raids."

"We'll do it more," you promised. "But Bandit is way more likeable than Ziv. He probably eats less too."

Jesse laughed into your shoulder, his chin scratchy with stubble. "Wanna do some clean up missions tomorrow? Just some mindless shooting?"

"I did get a fancy new gun," you said, thoughtfully. "It's sighted in and everything..."

"But you're still hunting for a blade," Jesse said, shaking his head. "No, don't want to drag you into combat without your throat-cutting knife."

You rolled your eyes. "I'm not that superstitious-"

"Maybe I am," Jesse shrugged. "That blade of yours made all the difference on more than one occasion. You still shopping around?"

"Put an order in with the original smith, but he's got a long waitlist." You shrugged. "Torby made me one, but..."

"Genji bitched about it to me already," Jesse leaned back on the couch, idly scratching Bandit's ear. "Said he'd convinced Hanzo to start looking for one for you."

"Yeah, he said Hanzo needed a project and this was perfect. But that he'd be at it for awhile. I may just have to make do with Gabriel's K-bar." You paused. "Figured I'd ask Feng if she had any connections while we're in Shanghai. You should come, seriously. I think you'll have fun."

"...Do I have to dress up all fancy like you did last time?" Jesse asked.

"Think we're going for street casual this time. Though with the Shimada brothers, who knows what that means?"

"Something ridiculous," Jesse said, without a hint of irony.

You just laughed and took another sip of whiskey. "Yeah, probably."

Jesse chewed on his cigar. "I'll think about it," he said.

"Nothing to think about. Just do it." Yawning, you stretched out and let Bandit crawl into your lap. "And let me tell you, watching everyone needle Hanzo is remarkably therapeutic."

You awoke to a knock on the door. Jesse had fallen asleep on your shoulder, and at some point Bandit had wedged himself between you two, his head on Jesse's lap, his butt on yours.

Yawning, you reluctantly wiggled out from under the dog and ambled to the door. Head a little fuzzy, you checked the peephole. Gabriel stood outside. Smoothing back your hair, you opened the door.

Gabriel quirked a brow and he glanced over your shoulder, taking in the sleeping Jesse, the empty whiskey bottle, and the chocolate wrappers. Behind you, Jesse began to stir, Bandit
You were sprawled out in his lap.

"You hungry?" Gabriel asked, his eyes soft as he looked at you. The gentleness made your breath catch. If you'd been in private, you would have kissed him then.

"Yeah," you said, your stomach gurgling quietly in agreement. "Did I miss dinner?"

Gabriel shook his head. "Just made roasted chicken with mole poblano and rice. Jack's tossing the salad-"

You snickered, like a mature adult.

"And if you ask nicely, he might toss yours too," Gabriel smirked.

Jesse coughed, apparently awake enough to be appalled.

You jerked your chin at Jesse, giving Gabriel an inquiring look.

He raised a brow, then nodded. "You can come too, kid. We're eating in my quarters. Just get dressed first. Don't need any more unsavory rumors about my personal life."

"I don't wanna intrude, boss-"

"Bring the pup, too. Jack's been asking about him," Gabriel continued, ignoring Jesse's weak excuses. "If he gets to fuss over your dog, I don't have to worry about him running off and adopting a puppy."

"One that he doesn't have time to take care of and will foist onto us," you added.

"You'll be doing us a favor," Gabriel said offhandedly, looking bored by the exchange.

You smiled at him, not fooled for a second.

"Yeah, OK. Uh...yeah. Just give me a minute to take Bandit out and get cleaned up. I'll meet you there," Jesse said, pulling on a shirt. He shot you a slightly panicked look. "Should I bring anything?"

"The dog," Gabriel drawled.

You waved over your shoulder and shut the door, looking around quickly before kissing Gabriel on the lips.

"Thank you," you said quietly.

"I don't know what you're talking about," Gabriel muttered. "Now let's swing by the kitchen and find something dog-safe. Mole poblano has dark chocolate in it and Jack won't be happy if he doesn't have treats to spoil the mutt with."

You stood outside the infirmary room wondering if whiskey and flowers were too much. You didn't actually know Daniels. You hadn't ever had a real conversation. And you weren't sure how she felt about you. Maybe she was one of those stick-up-the-butt Overwatch agents who spread rumors about you once upon a time.

Taking a deep breath, you knocked.

"Come in?" You recognized the voice from right before the crash and opened the door.

Daniels sat upright in her hospital bed, metal frames, like an exoskeleton, covered her hands and wrists while she opened and closed her fists. She'd been unconscious for almost two weeks and the hand strengthening exercises would be a necessary part of her physical therapy. Nanites and some of Angela's cutting edge tech slowed muscle atrophy, but she would still be weak for awhile.

Her brown hair was up in a messy bun and she gnawed on her lip, brows furrowing as she struggled with making a full fist. She had narrow straight nose and now that she was awake there was a nervous energy about her, like she'd had too much coffee and was trying very hard to sit still.

"Agent Strike," she said, eyes widening. "I uh...wasn't expecting you. I'd shake your hand, but..." She snarled as she forced her hands open. "This is extremely uncomfortable. It's uncomfortably warm, to stimulate blood flow, and the nanites are really going to work. I shouldn't complain, but it's tingly and unpleasant."

"Should I come back?"

"No, no. As long as you don't mind me making strange faces and grunting a lot." She sighed. "Or I could take a break. No, I should take a break. I've done my requisite sets already. I'm just an overachiever. But if I overdo it I could just hurt myself again."

You set the vase of carnations in one of the few free spots on the counter. Daniels had a lot more flowers than you had received, as well as balloons, model ships, and some plushies too. You put the whiskey on the bedside table.

"I don't know if you indulge, but..."

"Thank you," she said, still watching you with big eyes. "I uh...wow. I think I should be buying you the drinks."

"I didn't do that much," you said with a shrug. "Jesse's the one who carried you to shelter. " You tapped the bottle. "And you brought us down as gently as you could. I'm grateful."

Daniels didn't lose that watchfulness, and you wondered if she just always looked like a deer in the headlights. "You're the one who convinced that omnic to come help. I get that it might be poetic justice, but-"

"How so?" You wondered aloud. Because it wasn't poetic justice if you fought a bunch of humans and then were healed by more humans.

"Well, we got massacred by omnics and he's a-" She frowned and fell silent.

"Zenyatta didn't owe us a thing," you said. Though that wasn't entirely true. Zenyatta had owed you an apology, if only for constantly needling you.

"Yeah, I uh... that was kind of racist. I'm embarrassed." She sighed. "Computer, disengage." The exoskeleton opened up and Daniels pulled her hands free. Very slowly, she raised her left palm and smacked herself across the forehead. "I said something stupid. I plead being medicated, traumatized, and kind of dumb. Can we try that again?"

"I know the feeling," you said. Because haranguing her wouldn't help anything either. Especially when you only barely knew what you were talking about.

"Thanks for getting Zenyatta to help out," she said. "My stupid comment aside, he was something else, and wow, he was kind of what I always pictured a bodhisattva to be. I didn't mean to sound ungrateful to him or you."

"I get it. I honestly didn't do that much. It was all Zenyatta," you said. "I only brought your case to his attention."

"And Agent Maeda Vargas read me the reports," Daniels continued, like you hadn't spoken. You blinked at the mention of Távio. Apparently, he had been visiting Daniels too. "You made sure I stayed hydrated and you dug the vent that ensured we got fresh air. You might not have done the dramatic part of the rescue, but without you, I wouldn't be alive. Or awake. So thank you. I appreciate it. I know, you'll probably say something flippant like all the impossibly cool Blackwatch agents. But seriously, thanks. I'm pretty attached to being alive."

Impossibly cool? You thought of your fellow agents and couldn't name one. Genji was a spoiled little shit. Tataryn was a lying swindler. Jesse was a Clint Eastwood wannabe. Vo was a pain in the ass...

"Uh, you're welcome," you said, unable to think of something impossibly cool.

Daniels smiled at you, still looking nervous. "Can I buy you and Agent McCree drinks some time?"

"Sure," you said, because you did not say "no" to free drinks offered in good faith. "I'm sure Jesse would enjoy that too."

"Oh good. Because I wanted to thank him in person, but I was kind of scared to bother him. Like, I never know what you Blackwatch agents are up to: are you just going to dinner or are you preparing for a top secret mission and am I supposed to leave you alone so you can focus? I don't know. It's nerve-wracking."

"...You can always send him a message on the internal server," you said, picking a carefully neutral route. "I mean, if you see us on base, sure say something. We'll let you know if we're busy. If we're off base, don't blow our cover, but here at HQ you should be fine."

"Yeah, that makes sense. I probably would have come to that conclusion eventually. It would have taken an embarrassingly long period of time of though. Honestly, I'm a much better pilot than speaker, I swear. I know that you might not believe me since we got shot down, but-"

"Most of us survived the crash," you said. "Your skills were never in question."

"Oh. Yeah." Daniels stared at her hands. "It wasn't the landing that killed most of our friends. Just some of them."
buildings, but that he was still on the grounds and gave you his last known location. So you took a walk, and were slightly surprised to see him meditating beside the memorial wall. You took a seat on a bench, not wanting to interrupt whatever he was doing. Sleeping, maybe. Did omnics sleep? Not like humans did. Maybe it was cache-clearing process, and reordering of systems and revitalization of processes.

You stared at the wall, covered in names you knew and ones you didn't, though after all this time, a lot of them were familiar, even if you didn't have faces to match with them. Closing your eyes, you couldn't help but reflect on your dead. From Rodriguez's squad, to Captain Patel, Shin, and Rivka, and then further back, into dark uncharted territory and the roots of your knowledge of loss and grief.

Some days it was hard to focus on the future, when you'd already lost so much. You had rebuilt so many times, and for what? One more hit like that might actually kill you. You were painfully aware that there was a limit to your resilience. If Petras, Nguyen, and Talon, and whoever else managed to destroy what you had built here...

You took a shuddering breath, your insides twisting into knots.

"Agent Strike," Zenyatta's oddly pleasant voice roused you from your dark thoughts.

"I'm awake," you said, opening your eyes very slowly. The omnic hovered beside you, his head cocked to the side.

"You looked...upset."

"It happens," you said, staring at the memorial wall. "And when it happens, sometimes I say things I shouldn't." You took a deep breath, because even though Lacroix said you had to apologize for the sake of the mission, maybe you actually were a little sorry. You weren't sure why. Zenyatta had been on your case since you first met. You were sorry that you'd reacted. You were sorry that he revealed some of your prejudices, though maybe you were sorrier that you held them so unquestioningly in the first place. But you were mostly sorry that you were in this situation at all.

"The error was on both sides. As they say, to err is human, to SYNTAX ERROR is also human." He nodded. "To crash with disk errors is unique to AI."

You'd been around Winston and Ziv long enough to get the engineering humor. Maybe not appreciate it though. You just groaned. "I was going to apologize for being a jerk, but your joke just destroyed my puny soul. Is that the true secret weapon of the Shambali? Because I'll go write up humanity's surrender papers now."

Zenyatta gave a warm laugh. "If only our weapons were that sophisticated: to do no harm except the pain one's own mind is willing to inflict on oneself."

"Are you saying that the greatest enemy comes from within?" Because you were coming to understand that angle all too well. Sure, Petras, Nguyen, and anyone in Talon would torture and kill you, given half the chance. But it was your own coping mechanisms and emotional barriers that threatened to sabotage your personal life.

"...I find that "enemy" is a strong word," Zenyatta said. "An individual's greatest struggle is with oneself. Even if they have external adversaries, they must conquer their own fears and doubts to move forward. And they must always be on guard to ensure they do not become the thing they are fighting."
You sighed, because that was the Blackwatch dilemma.

"But no, that wasn't really what I was trying to say," Zenyatta said cheerfully. "Not that I mind the philosophical discussion, in fact, I welcome your ideas. They are much more interesting than apologies," he said, giving you a way out.

"Yeah," you agreed. "But I still have to apologize for my part." You forced yourself to look at him, or at least where his optic sensors should be. "I'm sorry I was a jerk. There's a lot I don't know, and while I don't appreciate trick lessons, I shouldn't be too proud to learn from them."

Zenyatta took on a formal bearing, though he barely moved and you could not pinpoint what changed, something about his presence or stance shifted, something that made you sit up straighter and pay closer attention. "I am sorry I pushed you so hard when you were vulnerable," he said. "I assumed much, and wrongly so." He sounded so very sincere, though you had to wonder if omnics had a setting for that: humans faked it all the time, omnics could probably automate it.

In the grand scheme of things, it didn't matter whether he was really sorry or not. You had to be honest about your own shortcomings if you were ever going to improve, just like you had to forgive yourself and do better, rather than wasting time wallowing in recriminations. Zenyatta's apology might be a sop to your ego, but in the long run fixing yourself was far more important than any tit for tat criticism of his behavior.

"And thank you for helping Daniels. It wasn't on you, you know. It's not your job to pay the blood price for what other omnics have done," you said, wondering if that was part of his motivation.

"Of course not. And while Adaeze encouraged me to keep a low profile, compassion is a greater calling than politics, don't you think?"

"I can think of a lot of things that are a greater calling than politics," you said dryly, though it was not lost on you that he didn't seem to mind going rogue for the greater good.

Zenyatta laughed. "Your raw emotional response was a reminder that I cannot expect to change the world if I live apart from it." He hummed again. "It is a lesson my brothers and sisters overlook."

You weren't sure what to add to that. "You didn't have to tell everyone that I asked you to do it. That isn't exactly what happened-"

Zenyatta regarded you placidly. "There is no debt, Agent Strike."

"That's not what I meant!" You scowled. "I yelled at you a bunch about my unresolved feelings about the dead and the state of Agent Daniels. I didn't politely ask you or do anything really selfless. And that's how they're taking it." You sighed. "I'm not looking for credit."

"You didn't ask me, but you reminded me of what I should be doing. It is to your credit, Agent Strike. If you hadn't drawn my attention to the situation, I may have overlooked it."

You didn't believe that, not really, but you accepted the explanation. "OK then. Thanks. I'm glad you did it."

"I believe it," Zenyatta said. "You are not what I expected, Agent Strike."

"...I'm not sure why you have these expectations," you said.
"Are you completely unaware that you have earned a...rough reputation? Because I have heard a variety of troubling rumors about you, from your excitingly varied romantic life, to your murky origins as a secret government weapon, to your alleged penchant for cannibalism. I doubt most of their veracity, but you can see my concern."

You were going to kill Tataryn. And leave a bottle of hot sauce in his mouth. The one you may or may not keep in your utility belt.

More likely you were going to take Kseniya out and buy her cake, caffeinated soda, and a kitten. You figured that would bother him more.

"I just ignore the rumor mill," you said after a moment. "It changes all the time and attempting direct damage control would only make it worse."

"Commander Wilhelm agrees. He has only the nicest things to say about you," Zenyatta said pleasantly. "Not the response I expected from a man who dislikes black ops on principle."

"Rein's a good man," you said. "A little overly optimistic, but a good man and we need that."

"Meanwhile, Agent Lacroix - he should have another title, since he's higher up in the hierarchy than most agents- seemed pleased to wax on about your many perceived faults."

"...That's nothing new. He does it to my face too," you said with a shrug. "I do it back. It's the nature of our relationship. But we haven't killed each other yet."

Zenyatta regarded you, oddly relaxed. "Agent Lacroix has many enemies."

"...He's a very irritating man," you said with a shrug.

"And yet, he seems rather fond of you, in his own fashion," Zenyatta continued and you involuntarily thought of the show you'd put on for Korpal. You had to suppress a shudder. "There is a vortex of chaotic misinformation around you, Agent Strike," Zenyatta said, like he didn't notice your growing discomfort. "It almost seems cultivated."

He said it so matter-of-fact. You gritted your teeth, knowing that he was engaging in his game once more. Whatever he was after, your answers had not yet satisfied him. "I am aware that some of my...associates spread rumors about me for fun. The more outlandish, the better. Some of it is mean-spirited, some of it just to see how gullible our comrades are."

"Which seems somewhat mean-spirited," Zenyatta observed.

"I'm not actually arguing," you decided. "It's easiest to just dismiss all the rumors and only believe what you can prove."

"I thought so too," Zenyatta said with a sage nod. "It's good to know that you agree."

You clenched your teeth, knowing then that you'd said too much.

Chapter End Notes

Catching up on stuff. Still fighting the hospital bill fight. Still job hunting. Still a salty meat sack of cynicism and lethargy.

On the bright side, still alive, still have awful dogs, and trying to play video games again. I have a list of books I need to read, and I'm going to try to make more time for that kind of stuff. :D Fic is coming along better. Next chapter will be longer and rather self-indulgent. I hope you can forgive me/enjoy it too.

We're getting some of the fluff and friendship sidequest/arcs moved along before the plot really starts ramping up. So hopefully you don't mind some slice of life adventures for the next few chapters. I'm starting to suspect this is going to be longer than 700k. facepalm
Chapter 81

Chapter Summary

Another Shanghai visit that throws your expectations back in your face like karmic confetti. You have better karma than you thought.

Chapter Notes

Well, in the rough drafts, I'm at 637k. So maybe the finished piece will be 800k? Because I'm so bad at calculating this and this is the longest thing I've ever written, counting the years of middle school bad Sailor Moon fanfiction scribbled hastily in old notebooks that I don't like to admit to ever. But you know what? I had to start somewhere, and while looking back at it is very cringey, I have no regrets or shame. I also have no intention of ever sharing it. :D

Also, I've received some awesome art this week and let me tell you that gives me life. I love hearing from you guys and there's just something great about "I made something, and now you made something, which makes me want to make more things! HELL YEAH!"

So on my tumblr, I shared a little headcanon about "The Men of Overwatch...And Baby Animals" calendar done as a fundraiser. Shirtless Jack cradling puppies, Reinhardt carrying around baby goats, Winston holding a human baby and looking extremely uncomfortable. Of course, Blackwatch has to make a parody version, and I mentioned Jesse cradling a cactus. Thistle Witch ran with it and it's Jesse looking like a proud cactus-daddy. I...uh don't actually know what that means.

peercat ambushed me out of the blue with this badass Lucky looking like she's getting ready to stab people through the eyes. :I was up at like 4AM squealing like a murderous guinea pig.

Then Gaia Fesbak made this awesome R76 comic from the time Jack took all those hits in Kandahar...

All the feels guys. (ง™₃.hours)

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Jesse squirmed beside you, dressed in stiff new blue jeans and a plain black t-shirt, his hat askew. Bandit sat on Genji's lap, ignoring the long looks Hanzo kept shooting in his direction. The dog just wagged his stubby little tail and looked awfully smug as Genji scratched between his ears.

Feng had arranged a private transport shuttle, though she didn't ride along this time.

You held the gift basket and the handwritten invitation to Family Day. The basket contained a mix of fancy cheeses, chocolates, smoked meats, and two bottles of wine. You and Gabriel had handpicked everything and filled the basket. Jack had written the invitation out numerous times, gritting his teeth every time Gabriel casually remarked on how sloppy his penmanship was. Finally you'd "borrowed" one of Lacroix's fountain pens so Jack would have an edge. Of course, Gabriel had to point out how crooked the lines were...

You bit back a smile at the memory. It was good-natured ribbing. Moreso than the teasing you put Hanzo through. You did not miss how Jesse's eyes darted between Bandit and Hanzo, like he expected the archer to start trouble over his dog.

"So Bayan was really reticent about mentioning his work," you said, trying to break the ice. "Is that a bad sign?"

Genji didn't look the least bit concerned, but Hanzo tensed beside him.

"There are probably nondisclosure agreements in place," Genji said.

"Yeah, I know, but I guess I just expected him to say that he couldn't talk about it, rather than dance around the subject. I understand that explanation perfectly well."

Bandit began to thump his hind leg as Genji scratched the skin at the base of his tail. Genji maintained a disinterested expression, but you weren't fooled. He was as wrapped around that little dog's paw as Jesse was. So you weren't worried about Hanzo.

"So is there a lot of...formality?" Jesse asked. "I've only been in Shanghai for ops. Don't know much about wining and dining with billionaire tech heiresses."

"Nah," you said. "Feng's middle class American origins keep her humbleish."

"On our last trip, she picked up the tab. Dinner was only a few thousand credits. Nothing too fancy. She keeps it modest," Genji said, a glint in his eyes.

You rolled your eyes, because while that was insane and possibly true, he was baiting Jesse on purpose.

Jesse adjusted his collar, looking a little green. "Genji, I think we have different definitions of "modest." Some of us weren't born with silver chopsticks in our mouths."

"The term is "silver spoon," peon," Genji said with exaggerated pomp, shoulders square and chin raised at an arrogant angle. And you squinted, because he moved and sounded a lot like Hanzo right then and you doubted that was an accident.

Jesse's lips quirked and he shot a look at Hanzo. "Oh, my mistake, young master," he drawled.

"Ah well, it is good that you can learn from my greater wisdom," Genji continued, mimicking Hanzo's posture. "Some day, young McCree, you may even rise above your humble station. Not very far, but-"

Jesse smiled sardonically. "Your faith means so much to me."

Hanzo glanced between Jesse and Genji, brow furrowed, like he knew they were mocking him, but wasn't entirely sure how to address the situation. You had to turn your head and cover your mouth, feigning a wracking cough.
You disembarked on the roof, gift basket in hand. Jesse held Bandit, though the dog also wore a padded harness and a long leash clipped to Jesse's belt. Genji wore his oversized hoodie and sweatpants, an outfit that seemed too hot for Shanghai in the summer. Hanzo was the most stylish in his narrow legged trousers and layered shirts, his bow bag slung across his back.

Feng waved frantically, looking deceptively youthful in a lacy green tank top and white capri pants, a matching thin blazer slung over her arm. She clapped Genji on the back, grinning at him. Then she saw Bandit, her eyes going wide.

"Puppy..." she said, slowing down noticeably and extending her hand so Bandit could sniff it. "What's his name?"

"He goes by "Bandit" now," Jesse said.

Bandit nosed Feng's hand, panting in the heat.

"He's adorable," Feng said, eyes locked on the dog's face. "Hi, I'm Feng. I don't think we've actually met, but I'm too busy taking in your adorable dog to be sure. Look at his little paws and his wiggly little butt! He's so cute and friendly! I have a new favorite boy, yes! Just don't tell Li's dogs I said that!" Halfway through her spiel, Feng switched to the "good dog" voice. "You're the best boy, yes you are!"

Bandit wagged faster, soaking in the attention.

"We haven't met. I'm Jesse."

Feng finally tore her gaze away from the dog and blinked up at Jesse. "...Oh wow, are you really a cowboy? Like are you good with horses, or cows, or doing rope tricks? Because I went to a rodeo once and that shit looked hard. Or are you a rodeo clown? Because I totally respect the way you run out there slapdash and try to distract a raging bull. That takes balls. Or a distinct lack of self preservation."

Genji snorted.

"Umm..." Jesse blinked. "Sorry, I ain't a rodeo rider."

"That's OK, you're Blackwatch and hey, I recognize you from Lucky's Shanghai adventure. You, Mr. Lacroix, that cute bitchy hacker... Well, you're pretty badass, cowboy."

Jesse looked uncomfortable for a fraction of a second, then flashed an easy smile. "Why thank you, darlin'. You're too kind." He used that slow easy drawl that was part charm and all distraction.

Feng pursed her lips, looking thoughtful. "Wow, you remind me of someone I know," she said, shaking her head.

"Is that a bad thing?"

"No, he's an old friend. Helped me get over to Shanghai and covered for me with..." She trailed off, frowning. "It doesn't matter any more, that story is boring. Thanks for coming. I'm Feng. You probably knew that and more. Lucky, you better make sure my Blackwatch dossier photo is flattering, OK? Like, I get that you have to compile as much embarrassing and terrible information about me as you can, but please don't use any yearbook photos."

"I...don't handle any of that," you said.

"Damn." Feng glanced back at Jesse, realizing she'd been babbling again. "Sorry, I get distracted. A lot. But thanks for coming out anyway. It's great to see people who aren't my subordinates and more importantly people who are not related to me." She nodded and then turned to you. "Lucky! Is that cheese in a basket? Because I love cheese. Baskets are OK, but I love cheese more than I love my own brother right now. Which isn't hard considering what a pain in the ass Li is, but you get the gist."

You handed her the basket. "Thank you for all your help with our vacation. Gabriel and I made sure you got real cheese and not processed cheese food." Unsaid was the fact Jack wouldn't have made that distinction.

"You are an angel," she said happily. "I will stash this in my office and eat everything after you leave. Then I'll roll around on the floor holding my stomach going "why did I do that?" And Auntie Zheng will be like "I told you not to eat all that, why don't you ever listen, Feng?" And I'll just groan louder and pretend like I can't hear her. It'll be great." She paused, taking in your faces. "Shit, did I say that out loud?"

"Say what?" You asked, now very well-versed in pretending you hadn't heard one of her outbursts. "Oh, before I forget: this is an invitation to Family Day. For obvious reasons, it would be best if you attended incognito, maybe with big sunglasses and a floppy hat, but we figured you might like another Zurich visit."

Feng nodded, enthusiastically tearing the envelope open. "I'll be there!"

"You don't even know the date," Hanzo said, looking irritable, like maybe he didn't like being left for last.

"I don't care! I'll be there! And yeah, I can totally make that," Feng said, beaming.

"It's the least Jack can do for his "oath sister," you said, unsure if you should mention Jack's biological sister would be there.

Feng made a high-pitched noise and then slapped her hand over her mouth. When she pulled her hands away, her smile remained big and delighted. Then she finally deigned to look at Hanzo. "Oh, Hanzo. Hi." She said it all very casually, like she hadn't just been squealing.

"Feng," Hanzo said with a curt nod.

You squinted at her, wondering if she was actually annoyed at him, or just trying to play it cool.

Feng glanced down at her watch. "Oh shit, we better move. Uhh, Lucky, you're with me. Where the hell is Bayan? He was supposed to meet me up here!"

You wisely made no comments about the awkwardness of inviting him onto the roof with Hanzo.

Feng headed toward the entry door, waving for you to follow. "Come on then," she said, setting a brisk pace. "Hanzo, I looked into that matter and your connections are better than mine. I can smooth the way if you need, but I don't have the tact to make the request correctly."

"I would be happy to advise," Hanzo said dryly.

"I bet you would," Feng said, rolling her eyes.

You glanced at Genji, but he didn't look concerned at all. Jesse stuck to your side, a polite grin pasted on to mask his discomfort.

Feng cocked her head to the side, no longer looking at any of you. "Oh...is that all?" Feng touched her ear. "Bayan's waiting for us in the lab. Had to oversee a delicate process," Feng said, leading you down a hallway to an elevator. "Jesse, you're going to want to hold onto Bandit. Uh...don't put him on the ground while we're down there."

Jesse tightened his grip on his dog, looking alarmed. "Should I stay back with him?"

"It'll probably be fine, but I'm not going to risk it," she said, giving him a serious look. "Do you need a carrier?" The door opened to a carpeted freight-sized elevator with padded benches and potted plants. You all filed in, but no one sat. Feng touched a button.

You gave Genji the side eye, wondering if he'd tipped Feng off about Jesse's ridiculous chest rig harness of Bandit.

"-Because I have some lockable titanium reinforced ones down in the lab. They're padded too, for comfort." She reached over to scratch Bandit's chin and you realized she was talking about the box-shaped ones with handles.

"I can hold him," Jesse said, shoulders tense.

Feng stared at his biceps for a second too long, her smile widening. "Yup, I believe it." Her eyes fell on his Deadlock tattoo and you knew she had to recognize the emblem. "Oh, you were biker. I get it now. I bet you rocked those leather jackets."

Jesse shrugged. "I didn't look too bad."

"Bandit needs a leather jacket." Feng pressed her lips together, trying to contain her grin. It wasn't working. "And a helmet, and he could ride in your sidecar, it would be adorable-"

"He already has a cowboy outfit, a bowtie, and a unicorn headband," Jesse said with a shrug. "And no, I didn't buy any of that." He glared around the elevator, daring any of you to comment.

Feng stared thoughtfully at Bandit. "He definitely needs a leather jacket and...oh wow, sometimes I surprise myself with my own brilliance."

Jesse hugged the pooch closer to his chest. Bandit just panted, looking unperturbed by the situation. The little ham was used to being the center of attention and didn't seem the least bit concerned by Feng's plotting.

The elevator dinged and opened. Feng gave Jesse one last look. "Are you sure you don't want an armored carrier?"

Jesse stared at you for a moment, like what had you gotten him into? "Am I going to need a hand free for shooting?"
"You shoot one-handed anyway!" Feng laughed. "But probably not."

Jesse shrugged. "I think we'll be fine then."

You followed Feng out, the room oddly humid. It was a laboratory, but painted in soothing shades of green and blue, with lots of ferns and other plants in niches, on shelves, and decorating the area. The lab smelled funny, like the back passages of a zoo: earthy, musky, and a little too wild for your tastes.

"This is...a lot of shielding," Genji said, sounding oddly approving.

"Well, you know, better safe than dead," Feng said brightly. She linked arms with you. Leading the way to a reinforced metal door. She flicked her finger against it.

"We've talked about this before," Zheng's smooth voice wound through the room. "You're supposed to put your finger on the bioreader-"

"Oh you know it's me!" Feng said, rolling her eyes. "I shouldn't even have to knock."

"Cultivate good habits, Feng. Or at least adhere to the safety protocols. Even if most of them do not apply to you." Somehow Zheng managed to sound annoyed without raising her silky voice.

"Yes, Auntie," Feng said as the door opened. "So everyone's feeling OK? No shortness of breath or signs of allergic reactions?"

You blinked. "Feng-"

"We just went through decon. About .04% of the population has an allergic reaction to our patented process, but that's almost exclusively found in tandem with severe genetic immunodeficiency issues, so I figured you guys wouldn't be bothered at all. Just checking though!"

"...I think we're fine," Genji said dryly, looking around. "But some warning would have been nice."

"Slipped my mind!" Feng said with a shrug, and sadly you believed her.

Jesse squeezed Bandit closer, and the dog just panted happily, not sounding any different or looking the least bit distressed. But his ears perked up.

Bayan stood there, wearing a green lab coat covered in odd stains. His wavy brown hair had been pulled back in a messy bun, and he'd filled back out, looking tired, but nowhere near as broken as you remembered. He smiled at you, looking a little nervous but not unhappy.

"Bayan," you said, reaching out to hug him.

"You might not want to do that," he said regretfully. "I uh...am covered in unsavory biological matter." He turned his gaze to your side. "Feng, it's happening now. And I was in the middle of the usual routine. Should we...?" He trailed off, taking in the rest of your group. "Hi guys. Great to see you. Give me one moment!" He waved and turned back to Feng. "I cued the recordings about an hour ago. I'd give it another five minutes at most."

Feng clapped her hands together, dragging you closer by accident. "Oh, sorry! Lucky, I need you to follow Bayan. Don't ask questions, just do what he says! He's got this process down to an art!"

"It's science, Feng!" Bayan said, sounding exasperated.

Feng just snickered. "Go!" She released your arm and gave a light push.

"Can someone explain what's going on?" Jesse asked, his worried gaze still focused on Bandit.

"No, because I love surprises!" Feng chirped. "Now come on, you guys can watch from the observation deck."

"What?" You wondered.

"Come on," Bayan said, pushing you toward a well lit room. "I just need you to stand over that pedestal, look inside, and speak slowly. Use nice encouraging words. Maybe coo a little. None of that antisocial Blackwatch bravado."

"What?" You gave him an incredulous look.

"Why are you arguing with me? Just do it, agent," Bayan said sharply, reminding you of times spent in the infirmary and the threat of blunt needles and no pudding.

"Oh flashbacks," you said, trudging into the small chamber, filled with a dozen similar pedestals. They were carbon-colored cylinders, about a foot in diameter, and a small marquee on the side flashed metrics such as temperature, humidity, and a timer.

You glanced down at the pedestal, surprised to find a clear glass lid. You took a quick glance upward and saw your companions on a balcony about ten feet up, watching you. Feng waved. Hanzo and Jesse just looked confused. Genji was the only one who seemed unbothered, and you had a sneaking suspicion that he knew exactly what was going on.

"Eyes on your unit!" Bayan told you. "And start talking!"

Too shocked by the strange orders, you bent over, resting your hands on the side of the pedestal. You could see an oddly-shaped leathery ovoid rock sitting in the center, bits of it flaking off. It was about five inches long and speckled with greenish blue.

"Hi there," you said. "I'm not sure what to say, but if I don't talk, Bayan's going to yell at me, and I forgot just how terrifying he can be-"

There was an odd noise and your eyes widened as the outer shell began to crack. Wait a minute...

"Keep going!" Bayan snapped and you were really starting to wonder why you'd come to visit his bossy ass.

"I feel like an idiot," you said. "I bet I look and sound like one too." You frowned, staring at the moving thing. Because that wasn't a rock. You were talking to large leathery egg. "OK, I think I get it. I really hope no one is recording this, because that would be really embarrassing and who am I kidding? I'm in an On Sing lab-"

"White Rabbit!" Feng yelled.

"Shhhhh!" Bayan hissed.
You heard Feng clap her hand over her mouth. That or someone smacked her in the back of the head.

"Stop talking about yourself. Be encouraging!" Bayan said.

"OK, then. Hi, there. It's time to come out and see the world, eat some...whatever you eat, and, then poop it out on Bayan's lab coat."

There was an clicking chirp. The shell made you think some kind of reptile, but the chirping was avian.

"OK, little bird, you can do it. Stop being shy. It's time to get your fluffy butt out of the egg and-"

A tiny eggtooth tapped out another fracture in the shell, and then tiny little black claws, just big enough to wrap around your fingers, began kicking out weakened pieces. You frowned, because you'd seen chickens hatch before and it didn't happen quite like this...

"Come on," you muttered. "This would be so much faster if you let me take the lid off and-"

"She has to do it herself," Bayan whispered. "Now keep talking! These are not difficult instructions, agent!"

"OK, fuzzy bird," you said. "Come on chick-chick. You can do it. There's food for...her, right?" You glanced up at Bayan.

He nodded firmly. "They're all female."

"Yeah, there's delicious bird food," you continued. "Nom nom nom. Great times. Can't think of anything better! If you don't hurry, I'm going to eat it all. Just kidding. But Uncle Jesse might. Yup. Or Hanzo. Hanzo is an unrepentant snack thief who helps himself to other people's shrimp chips, rice crackers, and squid jerky, among other things."

You heard a disapproving cough and muffled laughter. Belatedly, you realized there was a camera with microphone in the incubator, and everyone up top could hear you just fine.

You laughed awkwardly. "Come on little bird-thing, I am the worst cheerleader ever-"

In the corner of your eye, Bayan nodded vigorously, and you scowled at him.

"Who's a clever girl?" You cooed, watching the tiny talons and eggtooth carve away at more swathes of shell. The opening was growing big enough for you to see what was coming out.

Classical music started to play over the speakers, soft strains to set the mood, but not loud enough to drown you out. It was an orchestral piece that sounded familiar, but you couldn't quite focus on that yet.

"Come on, I'm dying to see how damn cute you are," you muttered, though you knew chicks were often damp and kind of bedraggled when they first hatched. They'd get cuter after they dried off. "Don't be shy."

Little talons cut through a quarter-sized hole and you blinked as a tiny bedraggled black head popped out, its eyes a shocking shade of blue. Even dilated, the pupil was oddly-shaped, two parentheses fused together, the ends tapering into points. You stared, unable to identify what kind of bird this was. Wait, that wasn't a proper beak, it was a snout.

It looked at you with those bright blue eyes, more an electric aqua than a true blue, and gave a chirp, tiny little white teeth gleaming in its gray mouth.

"Hi," you said, very slowly, realizing what had happened. "You are not a bird. Birds do not have goddamn teeth. You do not have a beak." Your voice rose with every sentence. "You are...Feng, did you really fucking do it?"

Her responding chortle answered the question.

The goddamn dinosaur chick flinched and you leaned over. "No, no, it's OK. I know she sounds scary, and she is pretty fucking scary now that I think about her life choices, but she's not going to hurt you-"

It trilled, blinking at you.

You made clawing motions. "Come on, time to get out, and how long do I have to cheerlead? Because I would like some fucking answers..."

To your surprise, the baby...whatever it was, pushed through much quicker, looking up at you every few seconds to chirrup at you. You answered in words, feeling very much like you were having a conversation, though you had no idea what was being said.

"Yeah, you're doing a great job," you said. "I know it's your first time and all, and I have no idea if you have evolutionary instinct or if you're just making it up as you go, like I am, but hey, keep it up."

The noises ranged from soft peeps to throaty warbles, to hisses and shrieks when you looked away at Bayan, trying to get him to explain what the hell was going on. He just ignored your pidgin sign language, most of which involved pointing at the incubators, shrugging, and then mouthing "What the fuck?" over and over again.

The music swelled, and you slapped your forehead, recognizing the echoing strains of French horns and an strings section. Because that was the goddamn Jurassic Park theme song.

"Feng, I bet you think you're funny!"

She just cackled like a mad scientist and you watched Bayan shake his head, like this wasn't the first time she'd reacted that way.

You turned back at your outraged dinosaur baby. She had managed to free her upper body and was now kicking holes the rest of the shell off of her legs. She was black and fuzzy, with three claws on her little "hands" and four claws on her feet, counting the dewclaw. The second innermost claw was larger and set at a higher angle than the rest. Very slowly, she dragged herself out of what was left of the shell, her little tail wiggling from side to side. She made a little jump toward the lid, chattering quickly.

"That's a raptor," you said, recognizing the claw. "Goddamnit, Feng, she's a raptor-"

"Velociraptor," Feng called out. "With modifications."

"Here," Bayan handed you a bowl of what looked like raw beef in some kind of nutrient paste. "Chew on it for her, then baby bird it back into her mouth."
"You are shitting me," you said.

Bayan just gave you a long empty stare and took the glass lid off the incubator. You looked at him, then the bowl, and then back at him. Then back at your little baby murderbird.

"Seriously?"
Bayan was not smiling.

Sighing, you picked up a small scoop and put it in your mouth, chewing unhappily. You'd eaten raw meat before. In fact, you'd eaten far worse, but not with an audience. Shaking your head, you leaned over the chick.

Squeaking, she opened her mouth and you dropped it in. The goddamn velociraptor baby began to chew, making odd little purr-chirps even as her egg tooth dropped off.

There was a moment of silence. Then choked sniggering came from behind you.

"Bayan, I can't believe you did that! I love you so much!" Feng shouted, laughing.

"Holy shit, I did not actually expect you to do it!" Bayan said, aghast.

"You guys suck." You could hear more laughter from the peanut gallery.

Using your metal fingers, you scooped up a small portion and reached into the incubator.

"Oh, let me get you tongs, their teeth are really sharp-"

She bit down on, through your gloves and to your fingers in her hunger and then squealed in outrage.

"Don't bite me," you said shaking your head. "Go easy."

Eyes bright, she snuffled and tried again, teeth glancing off your metal fingers. She squeaked in protest, because it probably hurt.

"No," you said firmly.

She looked at you and bit down again.

"Nope," you repeated, in a lower voice.

Hunching over, this time she lightly took the ground meat from your hands, very carefully not biting you. By the time you were finished with the bowl, you could feed her with your bare flesh hands, and while she'd nicked you with her needle-sharp claws, she wasn't aggressively biting you.

"...She learned faster than the others," Bayan murmured, looking down at his own scarred fingers.

"Metal fingers aren't tasty," you said.

"You can pick her up, but be careful of the sickle claws. Keep a firm hand around her lower half. They can get really squirmy."

"I want some liquor and some gum," you told him.
"I want a clean shirt, a full night's rest, and to get rid of the smell of raw meat. But that isn't happening. And just so you know, I never signed up to be a dino-daddy," Bayan said. "This is your fault."

"...No, this is not my fault," you said. "Feng gets the credit here."

Bayan blew out a deep breath. He checked his watch. "I've got ten minutes to answer your questions, and then my brood are going to be awake and demanding attention."

"Your...brood? How many...?"

"This is the third generation of viable hatchlings," Bayan said. "Zheng had worked out most of the kinks by the second gen, but they were still a little too feral for conventional domestication. That batch has a nice enclosure by the Mongolian Death Worms. Their favorite pastime is hunting live goats. Feng can handle them, but most everyone else keeps their distance."

Bayan shook his head, and you weren't sure if that meant Feng had a way with animals, or that she was just enhanced enough that she didn't have to worry about taking damage from them.

"How'd you get involved? No offense, I thought you were sticking to medical care and maybe cybernetic development."

"I accidentally imprinted on three of the third gen when I was helping Feng record measurements. Which is why we now have one egg per incubator." Bayan glared up at the balcony.

"Oh," you said, carefully lifting your murderbird out up. She was damp and covered in a fine black down. She wiggled, her little sickle claw slicing through the air. "Hey, hold still. I don't want to drop your fuzzy butt."

You held her carefully in both hands, and she stared up at you, those bright eyes darting around the room, noticing Bayan, the balcony, and the other pedestals. But she only made happy little chirps when she stared at your face.

"You can hold them against your chest, but keep a good grip on their legs. If they feel unstable they'll start flailing and tear you up on accident. We have falconry gloves too."

Very gently, you held the baby murderbird against your chest, keeping the pointy parts facing outward. To your surprise, she relaxed, trilling happily as she rubbed against your hands.

"OK, now what?" You asked looking around.

"I'm hungry, what about you guys?" Feng said leaning over the balcony.

Lunch was dimsum, complete with omnics wheeling multi-tiered carts around the table, each tier containing bamboo steamers full of appetizers. You were still in the underground lab, though this room had mood lighting, Chinese brush paintings of dinosaurs on the wall, and a large round table for dining. The Jurassic Park soundtrack continued to play, despite Bayan's protests and eye-rolling.

He sat in the corner with three other chicks, all louder and bigger than yours. They were the size of bantam chickens, just a little shorter than Bandit, but far more slender. Each one wore a complex harness fitted behind the neck, under the wings, and around the legs. The harnesses were attached to Bayan's belt. They were sleek things, their feathers just starting to fill out their wings. They stuck close to Bayan, watching all of you, and especially Bandit and your murderbird, with terribly intelligent eyes. None of them had that vibrant shade of aqua irises that yours did, but their colors were all markedly different: peridot green and yellow; cream and brown, with gradient striping along the wings; and one gray one with a deep rose along the wings and belly.

"Can they fly?" Hanzo asked.

"They shouldn't be able to," Feng said, picking up a fried taro cake and biting into it with a loud crunch. "It might happen though. We added a few mutations for color variety and plumage, and modified their proportions just a little; sorry if you were feeling purist, Aunt Zheng thought her alterations would be more practical and aesthetically pleasing. They do have hollow bones, so it isn't out of the question. They might be able to glide though, eventually when their feathers finish coming in."

Your baby dino sat on your lap, dozing while you downed a glass of plum wine, trying to wash the flavor of raw meat out of your mouth.

Jesse set a few steamer trays in front of you and you grabbed some shrimp hargow; the little dumplings were succulent and plump. You took a plate of beef chow fun, stir-fried beef and rice noodles. The fresh hand-cut noodles were wonderfully chewy and coated with just the right amount of sauce.

"What are you going to name her?" Feng asked. She paused. "They're all female, and while parthenogenesis is a concern, I figured you could just not let them hatch the eggs. It shouldn't be a problem, but just to be safe..."

"...I uh...I have no idea what I'm going to do with this murderbird," you said, staring at the little creature.

"You're not naming her "Murderbird," Jesse said, looking slightly appalled.

"And you're definitely keeping her," Feng said cheerfully. "She's obviously imprinted on you. And since you were the one who asked me to reengineer dinosaurs for you-"

"...Fuck," you said, staring at your lap. Damnit, that meant Bayan was right. This was your fault.

Bayan shot you a dirty look while he fed his "babies" little chunks of raw beef. They nipped his fingers, and while he muttered under his breath, you noticed that they didn't break the skin. Though they kept a wary eye on your party, they all stayed close to Bayan, behaving fairly well for a trio of murderbirds. And when he thought you weren't looking, he kissed their fuzzy heads, and they trilled happily at him.

You had to cover your mouth.

"How did you circumvent all the ethical boards on this?" Genji asked.

"Pfft, no one else knows what I do down here," Feng said with a shrug. "And Auntie Zheng needed a project. Plus she used to keep birds..." Feng trailed off, her smile flattening. "She drew palette inspiration from her former aviary. Like Peony over there has patterning from a rose-crested cockatoo," she pointed at the pink and gray one, current nestled in the crook of Bayan's elbow.
"They're very smart, like predatory parrots," Feng said.

"...How dangerous are they?" Hanzo asked, still looking skeptical.

"They're territorial, and fully capable of tearing up unprotected flesh. But they are more docile than I expected - Auntie Zheng's doing."

"This is not a good sales pitch for a pet," you said.

"All animals should be able to defend themselves," Feng said with a shrug. "Auntie Zheng designed them to be more social and playful than they were originally. With some tweaking, she was able to induce neoteny. They'll retain juvenile behaviors and that should dampen aggression. It's the same as the domestication process that separated wolves from dogs. I'm not sure if they'll be like dogs and stay immature forever, or if eventually they'll hit another version of maturity. That's why the imprinting was so important."

"But are they safe?" Jesse asked, eyeing your murderbird.

"They have teeth and talons; I'd say physically they're about as dangerous as any modern flying raptor, but they're going to be smarter. And I definitely wouldn't leave them alone with any small defenseless animals."

Jesse frowned at the velociraptors, holding Bandit closer.

"Let me clarify! I've been socializing them with Li's dogs and cat," Feng said quickly. "I wouldn't leave them unsupervised just yet, but aside from a few nips and accidental scratches, there hasn't been much bloodshed." She paused. "But don't try it with anything guinea pig-sized or smaller. They do seem to sense the difference between prey animals and other omnivores."

You decided not to ask for the details.

Genji just piled his plate full of shumai while Hanzo nibbled on a char siu bao. You blinked as he hesitantly offered some of the roasted pork, from the middle of the bun, to Bandit. His face was utterly still, the severity of the "I am the heir of the Shimada" expression was dampened slightly by the meat in his outstretched palm. So that's why he'd been staring at the dog all day. He'd been trying to resist the adorable pupper, and could not. How the mighty had fallen. You had to cover your smirk.

Jesse raised a brow as Bandit accepted it, politely accepting the treat from Hanzo's hand. Hanzo stared straight ahead, not looking at Jesse or Bandit.

"Anyway, you should thank Genji for helping arrange it. I knew we had a few eggs due to hatch this weekend and I'd hoped you could make it in time for this batch," Feng continued, eating a scallion pancake.

You turned to look at Genji who just popped a piece of shrimp toast in his mouth and then went back for a jellied chicken foot.

"Is this why you told me to put all my...consumables up high?"

"Yes, but that was before I learned they could climb," Genji said.

"Huh," you said.

"They're very social, but not on the same level as pack animal," Feng said. "At least, ours aren't. They like being around people, and each other, but they can be left alone without too much psychological distress. I'd keep them contained because they're naturally curious and like to try eating everything at least twice."

You stared at the tiny monster in your lap. She opened one eye, gave a soft chirp, and you petted her downy head.

"Can you housebreak them?"

"Theoretically, yes," Feng said, as Bayan gave a groan. "They have...uh...better muscle control than birds. But the ones in the lab environment haven't really caught on. One of my advisors, Mr. Li - not to be confused with my brother -has taken one home and says he's had some success with it." You had a hazy memory of the older man who'd accompanied Feng to the oath-swearing ceremony. "His seems to have favorite spots. So it's a work in progress."

Your little monster yawned and nuzzled your stomach. You waited for the bite, but it didn't come. So you carefully broke off a piece of beef.

"Anything I shouldn't feed her?"

"They're omnivores with a heavy protein requirement." Feng chewed on a spare rib. "I'd avoid lots of salt, refined sugar, and preservatives, but Auntie made them pretty hardy. They don't have the avocado allergy that the first gen did either."

You offered the chick some beef and she nibbled it, concentrating on the new flavor. Then she gobbled it down and chirped for more. You gave her a noodle. And a piece of shrimp. And part of a chicken foot, though you removed the bones first.

"She should be able to digest small bones," Feng told you. "You won't need to give her grit or stones for digestion. Her teeth should be enough."

"OK," you said, offering her some egg custard.

"We'll get her vaccinated in a moment, and I have a whole folder about the care and keeping of modern velociraptors," Feng said happily. "Bayan wrote most of it."

You looked over at dino-dad, covered in poop, and cuddling three squawking murderbirds.

He just sighed, shaking his head while "Peony" nibbled on his shirt.

She pooped on you. It wasn't pretty. It was slimy and part of it was white like bird poop, the other part brown.

She shrieked angrily when you tried to hand her to Feng so you could clean up. To your surprise, Genji offered her a piece of bao and she quieted down as he picked her up in his metal hand. He spoke softly to her, while you petted her head.

You cleaned up in the washroom, hoping this wasn't going to be a trend. When you came back out, she trilled happily, ignoring Genji as he offered her more steamed bread and meat, and flapping at you.
"You should introduce her to Bandit," Feng said. "Maybe not put them together yet, but definitely do it while she's still so much smaller and cute."

Genji handed her back to you and she rubbed her snout on your hands. You reached over and carefully scratched Bandit's head, while she watched. Then you scratched her head. She sniffed your hand, chattering rapidly. "No biting," you said as she nibbled on your fingers, mouthing rather than trying to break skin.

Jesse reached over hesitantly, offering a piece of steamed fish. She swallowed it whole, making happy noises the entire time. Very slowly he rubbed her head, and she watched you as much as Jesse, like she was trying to gauge your reactions to all these "strangers." She was frighteningly intelligent, you realized.

"Uncle Jesse's safe," you said, patting his hand, laughing at his pained expression.

Jesse scooted his chair closer so you were almost touching. Bandit leaned over to sniff.

Your murderbird froze against you and you reached out again to pat Bandit. He licked your hand, looking nonplussed by the baby dinosaur. It was smaller than him after all. And he was a veteran Overwatch dog. Such things didn't faze him.

Very slowly she stretched out her neck, her tail, lashing back and forth. She watched him warily. He yawned and stretched out in Jesse's lap.

"Hmm, maybe single hatchings are a better way to go," Feng said, looking at Bayan as he tried to make sure all his babies got equal amounts of food and attention. "I thought because they're social animals they shouldn't grow up alone, but now that I think about it, a lot of us might have been happier being the only child..."

Both Genji and Hanzo snorted.

"You are the worst," Bayan said.

Very slowly, your hatchling walked across your lap, steadier on her feet than she had been half an hour ago. She moved like an oddly graceful chicken, head bobbing as she stretched her neck out, tail extending to balance her.

Bandit sat still, letting her come toward him. She leaned over and nipped his leg.

"Shit!" Jesse nearly jumped.

Bandit just yawned, because she hadn't bit down hard. She was just mouthing him, and you booped her nose lightly. "No biting."

She grumbled, and continued "tasting" him. Bandit leaned over and licked her face, and she froze, shocked by the dampness and maybe the smell. Then she ran back to your torso, cheeping loudly.

Laughing you picked her up and held her against your chest while she chattered away, probably telling you all about the horrors of dog breath. You looked up to see Feng grinning broadly holding up her phone.

"That was so fucking cute."

You reached out and let Bandit lick your hand, all while your chick watched. Then you set her down again and she hesitantly headed back over to investigate the dog. She reached out, poking him with one of her tiny "hand" talons.

Bandit lazily swung his front paw, smacking her off-balance onto her butt.

Squeaking, your murderbird jumped up and ran back to your lap, chattering away at a rapid pace, her outrage clear. You picked up another piece of shrimp hargow and ate it, watching her hop from foot to foot, peeping. You offered her a small bite, and she ignored it for a second, flapping one wing at Bandit. She took half a bite chewing slowly as she watched the dog. Then she grabbed the rest of it and headed back over to Jesse's lap.

This time, she put the piece of shrimp dumpling in front of Bandit, and sat down, waiting for him to take it.

"...Well," Feng said, sounding very interested.

Bandit delicately picked up the offering and chewed it. The raptor chick looked at you, then slowly approached. She extended one of her little wing talons and gingerly touched his face, not quite able to reach the top of his head. She cooed softly, sniffing his face while she mimicked petting him.

"Good girl," you said, not entirely sure this wasn't some elaborate raptor trap to get Bandit to drop his guard.

She moved to the side, grabbing little fistfuls of Bandit's skin and began to climb him. He held still, but grumbled when her toe talons nicked him. She was on his back in seconds and she rested against the back of his neck, little hands lightly scratching the top of his head. She looked at you, chirping with excitement.

"That is impressive," you said, wondering how much of that was predatory behavior and how much of that was just mimicry with a dose of quick problem solving skills.

She looked up at Jesse, head tilted to the side. He hesitantly pulled off a piece of pork char siu and held out his hand.

Squeaking, she grabbed it out of his hand with her little talons.

"Ow!" Jesse grimaced as she clawed him in her excitement. "Careful." He tapped her nose.
"No claws."

She hissed at him, and them crammed the meat in her mouth, like she expected him to try to take it back. Which was kind of ridiculous because no one had tried to take her food yet, even as punishment.

You reached over and tapped her nose and talons too. "No clawing."

She shrunk down, falling silent as she flattened herself against Bandit's head.

"How could you be so mean to the baby?" Feng wailed. "Look at her, so dejected!" She reached over to pat the chick. Your murderbird shrieked and fell off Bandit's head, racing back to your lap for safety. She curled up against your stomach, tail wrapped around her body while she hissed at Feng.

"It's OK," you said. "Aunt Feng is safe too." You patted Feng's outstretched hand as Feng's lower lip wobbled.
"...Aunt...Feng?" Feng blinked, her green eyes big and watery.

"Did you want to be "godmother Feng?" Because I'm just improvising," you said.

"I'll be Auntie Feng!" Feng shouted frantically. She grabbed a piece of spare rib, shredded it in her left hand, and then pushed her hand out.

The hatchling looked at you, and you nudged her forward, watching her slink over to Feng, sniffing experimentally. She nibbled on a piece of pork, then another. Except when Feng went to pet her, she nipped Feng's finger, stole the last piece of meat, and ran back to you.

"No biting," you sighed and you swore that was a defiant look on the raptor's snaky little birdface.

Feng just laughed. "You are a clever little shit. But that's OK. You're smart and Auntie Feng respects the challenge."

Hanzo, Genji, and Feng apparently had business to take care of. So you hung back in the dining room with Bayan and Jesse, watching as your baby raptor called to Bayan's trio. They didn't approach each other, but they were certainly vocal. It sounded like a mix of birds, cicadas, and squirrels all chattering at each other.

Bayan eyed your single hatchling enviously. "She's more eager for human contact than mine were initially. I think she'll acclimate to your lifestyle faster."

"Come on, this is really cool, Dino Dad."

Bayan sighed. "Do you know how long they're supposed to live?"

"...No," you said, looking down at your squawking chick. "Ten, fifteen years?"

"If nothing goes wrong, they have parrot-length lifespans," Bayan scowled. "Thirty to sixty years."

"Oh," you said.

"Three of them, for thirty or more years, Lucky."

You laughed awkwardly. "Umm, if you don't want them-"

"The combination of prolonged juvenile behavior and imprinting means I'm probably stuck with them forever. They like Feng and Jalair, but they won't let any of the other lab techs handle them without me present. If I try to separate them, they panic."

"Huh," you said.

Bayan sighed. "I'll have to separate them eventually, just for training. It's just so hard. They get really upset and cry..."

Which was kind of hilarious, because in the infirmary Bayan was not such a soft touch. He was kind and compassionate sure, but he didn't hesitate to make you suffer for your own good.
And he did it cheerfully.

Jesse just petted Bandit, who remained unperturbed by this entire ordeal. "So Lucky has to take her new baby with her?"

"Baby? This is a dinosaur, Jesse. A juvenile dinosaur. It can walk, feed itself, and communicate. This is not a baby."

Both Bayan and Jesse gave you skeptical looks.

"What?" You scowled. "She's not a baby. Babies are gross."

Your not-baby raptor chose that moment to relieve herself on you.

You sat through her series of immunizations, trying to think up a name. Sure, you could call her "Murderbird," and probably would, but that was a nickname at best. You rubbed your forehead, still not sure how you were going to explain this. Yes, she looked like a really weird bird. Except birds didn't have teeth, a long wiggly tail, or that distinct wing claw-hand scientifically known as a "manus." Any dinosaur enthusiast would recognize her for what she was. But most everyone else could be convinced that she was a "mutant bird" you "adopted" on an op. You lived in a world with genius inventor gorillas and super soldiers. Mutant birds didn't even rate a second page news story.

Feng sat beside you, grinning. "We're still collating data and writing the patents, but once we have a better idea about their behavior and temperaments, we might start out selling them to reputable people at an exorbitant price. I might have to gift some to government officials. But I think it will be OK."

"Well, thanks. I'm overwhelmed. This is...not what I was expecting."

"Dinosaurs like shiny Pokémon," she murmured. "They're going to be pricy, and we'll spawn a bunch of imitators and maybe an awful market of poorly engineered dinosaur-replicates." She paused. "I'll have Bayan draw up a training course that people have to pass on top of the fee. Maybe deal more heavily with zoos and wildlife parks."

"...Not a bad idea," you said, watching your chick snap her teeth at the frustrated lab tech.

"I'm gifting some to loyal family members with an inclination for exotic pets. It's more of a diplomacy project," Feng admitted. "But the novelty is pretty damn enchanting."

"Family giving you problems? Other than your brother, that is?"

She shrugged. "I'm managing them. It's irritating, but not dire. The dinosaur project should impress everyone long enough to roll out some of my other initiatives. We'll see." Feng leaned forward.

"Are you adopting one?"

"Are you kidding?" Feng laughed. "I don't have time to mother a dinosaur. I don't have time to date or maintain civilian friendships." She shrugged. "This isn't my only big secret project, Lucky. This is just the most fun one."

You almost asked then if giving Bayan three dinosaurs was really an oversight on her part. Because Bayan looked much happier with their companionship, even if he complained profusely about the addition to his workload.

The tech brought you a reinforced fabric sling, and you wound it over the back of your neck and around your chest, then put your sleepy new pet inside. There were snaps to cinch the fabric together, but she settled down quickly, not trying to peek out.

"Let me know what housebreaking method you choose. We've been using chicken diapers on some, but Bayan thinks he can get them to poop in his shower." There was an odd silence. "That's really gross, now that I say that aloud."

You sighed. "I don't know anything about anything," you said.

"They should be really hardy. The vaccinations are more of a precaution than a necessity." Feng rose. "I've put together a starter kit for you. On top of the manual, it includes some custom harnesses, a sun lamp, chicken diapers..."

"Thanks," you said, getting up. The two of you walked to the elevators, pretending you didn't hear Bayan crooning lullabies to his raptor babies.

"Just one more thing I'm terrified of fucking up."

"Yeah," Feng said, with both palms up. "I feel that way about everything."

Chapter End Notes

So goose!anon, you were very close. I saw your ask and was like "...how did they get in my brain?"

But seriously though, I left the first Jurassic World film wanting a pack of raptors, a motorcycle, and a barbarian-style fur outfit. I can't really explain the last one. Now the velociraptors in Jurassic Park are actually based on deinonychus and velociraptors were actually the size of turkeys. Yes, I went full dinosaur-nerd when writing this. I took some liberties, because pretty feather patterns are cool and I wanted something like a cuddly killer parrot with little claw hands. I will admit that I was looking at Kim Rhodes on Deviant art and her amazing little feathered raptor figures as reference points for cute. (I used other sources for scientific reference, but those were the cutest damn things I'd seen in a long time). No, velociraptors probably couldn't glide even if they had feathered arms. No, they probably weren't true pack hunters. And I doubt they were cuddly at all. But I can dream.

Working on keeping my attitude more internally positive. Because I'm good at being cynical and really I don't need to be thinking harsh thoughts all the time, even if they're true. They're not helpful.

As for Ana and Jesse, I initially wanted to try writing them as a rare pair, but the more I wrote them the more it didn't feel quite right. There's a Korean fan artist (zo-km on tumblr) who does a tragic pining Jesse who waits for Ana post-fall Overwatch, and that's really what inspired me to try. I think Ana cares a lot about Jesse, and maybe she was tempted, maybe she wasn't (WHO WOULDN'T BE, OK?) , but with the way they are now, it wouldn't work.
Chapter 82

Chapter Summary

Sometimes it's hard to pinpoint the exact moment you connected with someone. It's usually easier to remember when you finally realized it.

Chapter Notes

We have officially broken 600k!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Genji had convinced Jesse to go upstairs, with him and Hanzo. You weren't sure what they were doing. Your murderbird dozed as you rode the elevator with Feng who kept shooting amused looks in your direction.

"So what were Hanzo and Genji doing?"

"They had a couple errands," Feng said. "I had to send some couriers to do some shopping for them. You know, since they can't exactly waltz around Tokyo any time they please."

You pictured Hanzo and Genji stuffing designer suitcases full of shrimp chips, wasabi peas, and wagashi. Maybe Genji had Feng pick up some limited edition release of a new video game, a few comics, several expensive bottles of alcohol...

"Don't tell anyone, but Hanzo really likes South Korean beauty products," Feng said. "They're usually really good and super cheap, but he gets embarrassed when you point out that he prefers anything to the Japanese brands."

You blinked slowly.

"Oh yes, he has a complex facial regimen all worked out." Feng's smile was sneaky. "And while I'm not entirely sure why he's so worried about that stuff, considering his youth and the availability of anti-aging gene mods; it's pretty hilarious when he lectures me about the importance of sunscreen and moisturizing."

"I can't tell if you're joking or not," you said.

"Well, he wanted snacks, clothes, and some gear too. Won't stop bitching about the inferiority of western blades and arrows, but how many weapon smiths still make fucking combat arrows? Most fletchers just make hunting gear. Of course, he's going to have to custom-order them to his insane specifications," Feng said, rolling her eyes. "You know, maybe I should buy stock in some of those chaebol beauty companies. I suspect when Hanzo has enough capital, he's going to take over one or two. If only for special access to their products."

"...I still can't tell if you're fucking with me," you said as the elevator opened. You patted your sleepy, pooped out murderbird, who snoozed happily against your chest. "You realize I didn't actually expect you to make designer dinosaurs, right?"

"...Yeah," Feng shrugged. "But it's brilliant. And cute. And I have no regrets. Yet." She gave your raptor chick a speculative look as you both walked out of the elevator into a fancy high-rise lobby, complete with marble floors, leather couches, and more brush paintings of dinosaurs.

Hanzo stood with his back to you, while Genji sat on the arm of the couch, tossing a knife back and forth in his hands.

"Stop that," Hanzo said, turning his head.

"Why?" Genji asked, spinning it.

"It's not yours!"

Genji slouched on the couch, not looking like he cared, but he stopped playing with the knife. Jesse sat on the other side of the couch, rolling his eyes. Bandit napped in his lap, not looking particularly concerned.

"Any issues?" Feng asked.

"No, your people did a good job," Hanzo said begrudgingly. "They're loading the items as we speak. The money has been transferred and I've given the referral; you shouldn't have any trouble getting your supplies from that area."

Feng just smiled. "You have such admirable efficiency."

"He just didn't want Lucky to see all the limited edition Kitkats he ordered," Genji laughed. "There were Fuji apple, wasabi, and sake flavors, if you're interested."

Hanzo gave Genji another withering look. "Quit being ridiculous. I needed time to inspect the Kobayashi and the Yoshihara."

"Oh, is that who you went with?" Genji asked dryly. "I thought this was a Hasegawa?" He held up the knife.

"It was not what I expected. And I ordered different sets," Hanzo said sharply. "Because unlike some people, I believe this business to be serious."

"As the grave," Jesse drawled.

Hanzo whirled, brows furrowed, teeth clenched.

Genji just rolled his eyes. "He didn't actually kill me, McCree."

Hanzo winced.

Jesse flashed his easy "aw shucks" smile and you weren't fooled at all. "So you going to tell us all about this serious business? Because seeing you load up on all that hardware after saying you were done with swords, well, that makes me mighty uncomfortable."

"American, this isn't your business. It's hers." Hanzo jabbed his finger at Feng.

Genji made a face.
Feng blinked. "Uh...Kind of? But I just sent the couriers..."

"Most of the smiths I know work in sets," Hanzo said. "They create heirloom masterpieces, and have spent their entire lives honing their craft. Asking for a single knife from most is...a waste of everyone's time."

"Go big or go home," Genji said with a shrug. "But I'm fairly sure those are my brother's sensibilities and not a requirement of the smiths-"

Hanzo shot him a dirty look.

"...But who am I to question my elder brother's expertise?" Genji said so politely, that Hanzo had to do a double take and Feng covered her mouth.

"The Yoshihara set a superior work overall; it is one I would gift to a trusted family member," Hanzo lifted a large wooden box onto the couch. He lifted a katana, wrapped in silk, the lacquered scabbard and handle a vibrant green. "The blades are perfectly balanced, the katana is the shining centerpiece, the steel strong and flexible. The engravings done by a true artist; the tsuba alone is an intricate work of art, bearing the motif of a dragon, perhaps a tad extravagant for a hand-guard, but still exquisite The handle is battle-wrapped in silk, lacquered leather, and ray skin. I admit the katate-maki style is not as aesthetically pleasing as some of the traditional patterns, but it makes the handle easier to clean after battle. The wakizashi and the tanto are of an equal quality and have been crafted to complement the longer blade."

"So, were you interested in learning the katana?" Genji said, interrupting Hanzo's monologue.

"...Someday," you said, a little worried about Hanzo's reaction. "When I have more time, maybe?"

"That's what I thought," Hanzo said sourly, lips pursed. He set the katana down and removed another set. "Kobayashi did not deign to attempt to provide a true daisho, despite my requests."

"Maybe he'd rather demure than provide a subpar work," Genji suggested, a smile playing on his lips.

"She crafted this set, and took my money, but did not provide a katana. I specified that this was a gift, and I could not give an incomplete set..." Hanzo blew out a frustrated breath. "But she has no manners. I don't know what I expected from a woman smith."

"Imagine that," Feng said dryly. "And here I thought all Japanese people were polite. Those uppity women, how dare they? Did she charge you for a katana too?"

Jesse choked back a laugh and had to cover his mouth. He locked eyes with you, happier than you'd seen all week. You were suddenly very glad you'd pestered him into coming along.

Hanzo whipped his head around, giving Feng a dirtier look. "No, but I asked her to make me one." Apparently, Hanzo still had trouble with the subtle difference between an order and a request, but you had faith that with a little more work, he might get it by the end of the year.

Grimacing, Hanzo unwrapped a two and a half foot wakizashi, the scabbard black, the handle trimmed with red. "She used a fox for the tsuba!" He scowled at it. "I had to check the tsuka wrap to ensure she actually used real ray skin on the handle..." Hanzo grumbled. "It is genuine and will not fall apart."
Genji rolled his eyes again, and you suspected this was not the first time he'd heard these complaints.

"The balance is passable. The weight is acceptable. The blade won't just snap under pressure, but it is insulting. Look at it!" He shoved the sheathed wakizashi in your face.

You took the short sword, weighing it gently in your hands. The grip was quite nice and it fit well in your hand. The pebbled ray skin leather gleamed under the red silk wrapping. It was far lighter than you expected; you could wield it one-handed if necessary, though it was still a bit long for your ambush kills, but you suspected you could adjust. You glanced at the hand guard; it bore a stylized fox, like Hanzo said, its sinuous body and multiple tails flowing through the metal. You carefully drew the blade, admiring the wave pattern. It looked very sharp.

When you looked up, Hanzo was watching you expectantly. "It is mediocre, isn't it?"

"...No, it's actually rather pretty; more importantly it is well-balanced, light, and the blade looks keen," you said. "But I'm no expert."

Genji smiled.

To your surprise, Hanzo didn't protest, his face remained oddly neutral. He just handed you the tanto. "She is a cheeky smith with no respect for decorum. The tsuba bears a familiar sign."

You carefully sheathed the wakizashi and offered it back to Hanzo. He just waved his hand, and you held it under one arm, inspecting the tanto. Unlike the wakizashi, the handle was black, still ray skin leather with black silk instead of the rubberized grip your last tanto had. There was a tiny weasel-creature on the guard, its claws long and stylized. You shot Genji a look. "Kamaitachi, right?" Genji had called you "Kamaitachi-chan" during that first arrow-studded encounter with Hanzo, where you'd managed to stab the archer twice. Huh.

"Sounds about right," Genji said lazily, and you fought the urge to throw something at his head.

The tanto was a little heavier than your original, its blade a smidgeon longer. You drew it, surprised to see the blade blackened, just like yours had been. It was slightly wider at the base, but still had the razor sharp chisel tip.

"And she can't even get the colors to match. No respectable swordsman wants a mismatched set with an assassin's blade," Hanzo said, shaking his head and confirming your suspicions. You held the sheath in one hand and the knife in the other. It fit and it felt...good. Not exactly like before, but still right: much better than Gabriel's K-bar.

"I like it," you said softly.

Hanzo lowered his head, eyes closed. "Well, there is no accounting for taste. I cannot just give a subpar gift like that to someone important."

You shrugged, looking at Genji.

"Well, if you're not going to use it," Genji said, rolling his eyes. "You could ask Lucky to take it off your hands. She has been trying to find a new blade."

Hanzo made a show of rubbing his chin and looking thoughtful. "Oh, that's right. It completely slipped my mind." He turned his head slowly and studied the blade in your hand. "I suppose this could be a small repayment for all the food you have shared with me. A mere trifle.
These are minor matters, you see.

Jesse had to pull his hat down over his face. Feng made a rude noise beside you. And did this mean you weren't supposed to give him crap about stealing your snacks? Because honestly, you were just hiding the good stuff in your room now. You glanced helplessly at Genji. This was the weirdest gifting ritual you'd been a part of; though to be fair, you hadn't engaged in many.

Genji just smirked at you, enjoying the show.

"Well, if it eases your mind, I uh...I would be delighted to make use of these fine blades. This is most generous of you," you said, because you weren't entirely sure what would happen if you just outright thanked Hanzo for the obviously custom-made and terribly thoughtful gifts. He might explode from embarrassment, and that would be messy. "My compliments to the cheeky smith and her intransigence. After all, a full katana would be wasted on my lack of skill."

Hanzo exhaled slowly, shoulders sloping as he relaxed. "Think nothing of it. Just, try not use blades as shovels," he said, a pained look on his face.

"I wasn't interested in repeating that experience," you said, rolling your eyes. And he'd been doing so well too.

Feng winked at you. "Well, I'm glad you found a solution for that terrible problem."

Hanzo nodded and looked at the Yoshihara set. He carefully wrapped it back up and stared at the box for a moment. "You prefer spears, don't you?"

"Most of the women in my family do." Feng raised a brow. "I actually prefer Berettas; I inherited a love of guns from Dad. But Mr. Li has been running me through an advanced melee course. Apparently, my aunt - my mother's dead sister, not Great Aunt Zheng- had quite some skill with the dāo. It's a traditional Chinese saber, single-edged," she said to you.

"These are superior," Hanzo said, thrusting the box into Feng's hands. "A person in your position shouldn't be using a peasant's weapon."

You glanced at Genji, who just sighed and rested his face his hands.

"Is he talking about spears or the Berettas?" Jesse asked, nudging Genji with his elbows. "And hey, what's he implying about Lucky?"

Feng just took the box in both hands, grinning at Hanzo. "Wow, these will look really nice on my wall next to that kimono I bought at the airport and the Pokémon wall scroll Li bought me."

Hanzo's jaw dropped and he stared at her in pure horror.

"I was kidding!" Feng shouted as she examined the blade set. "Come on, Hanzo, it was funny! I don't actually have an airport kimono on my wall or a Pokémon scroll! Do you think Aunt Zheng would let me be that tacky?"

Hanzo had locked himself in restroom ten minutes ago, and had not returned. Genji sat perched on the arm of the couch next to Feng, not bothering to hide his grin.

You sat beside her, your new blades in your lap. You felt a pang of sympathy for Hanzo, after all, he had done all that work to get you both nice presents, and then made an elaborate show of giving you your gifts in the most emotionally-stunted fashion you could imagine. And then Feng had counter-trolled him.

Jesse was still laughing, while Bandit sniffed your sleeping murderbird. He licked her head and she hissed softly, apparently not keen on being disturbed.

"I really do like these," you said. "Should I tell him that, or will that blow his mind?"

"Hanzo's still taking baby steps at friendship," Genji said, a faint smile on his face. "He best understands relationships in the terms of debts and balances." Genji gave you a sheepish look, because both of you weren't so far removed from that viewpoint either. Sure, you were making progress now, but before...

"Hanzo doesn't owe me that much," Feng said. "I mean, if you guys decide to retake the family business, sure, I'll help, provided Jack doesn't blow a gasket." She looked at you, reaching over your lap to pet Bandit.

"I don't know what they're planning," you admitted. "If they follow the keiretsu model and go legit, then it shouldn't cause too many problems. You know, provided you don't go making unsavory allies like Talon and you quit the drug trade." You paused. "But we haven't really talked about that yet."

Genji shrugged. "I suspect Agent Lacroix and the commander may have some opinions."

Jesse stared at the swords in Feng's lap, and then her face.

"You know, I'm sure we all know this little farce wasn't as coincidental as Hanzo would like us to think." McCree looked between you and Feng for confirmation.

"Jesse, I am nowhere near as dumb as I act," Feng said sternly.

Jesse just laughed. "Just making sure we're all on the same page."

"I think this means I have to be...nicer," you said with a sigh.

"No," Genji said. "Don't change a thing. The shock would kill him."

You weren't sure if he was being serious or if he just enjoyed watching you bait Hanzo too much to see that change. It could be both.

Feng snorted.

"You're pretty patient with him, huckleberry," Jesse said, patting your head.

"That's me, patient as fuck," you said.

No one said anything, and you weren't sure if that was agreement or discretion.

"Anyway, Feng, I just had to ask your opinion, because I'm not too knowledgeable about this kind of thing." Jesse's easy drawl didn't fool you for a second. He played dumbest right before he went for the kill. "Do you think it's "endearing" or "tacky" that those swords match your eyes?"

Feng stared very hard at the scabbards. "Yes," she said, turning a very deep shade of red.
Bayan arrived in a clean gray shirt and jeans. He sighed when he saw the four of you snickering and no Hanzo in sight.

"...What did you do to him?" Bayan asked, sounding tired and maybe a little disappointed in your life choices.

You pointedly did not look at him or Feng.

Jesse whistled innocently.

Feng giggled.

Genji just shrugged. "He's in the bathroom. We were not going to make jokes about his delicate constitution."

Bayan squinted at Genji, then shook his head and came over to sit on one of the couches. "She's sleeping?" He stared at your raptor chick. "Damnit, why did you get the easy one?" He glared at Feng.

"They keep each other up," Feng said, rolling her eyes. "If you'd just give them separate beds..."

"They're bonded to each other!" Bayan scowled. "They get scared!"

On cue, your chick yawned, her little teeth gleaming under the lights, and she burrowed deeper into the sling, tail wrapped around her fuzzy body.

"...I guess we could say Lucky is a better dino-parent," Feng said, smirking at him.

"I though we were going to watch a movie," Bayan said, not taking the bait. "And not Jurassic Park or any of the sequels or remakes."

"The Land Before Time?"

"No. No dinosaur movies: you're just going to spend the entire time critiquing the science." He glanced at Genji.

"I was kidding," Feng said sulkily, and you didn't believe her at all.

"No westerns," Genji said, giving Jesse a look.

"Aw come on, Genji. I didn't say no "kung fu" movies."

"That's because you like kung fu movies," Genji sniffed.

"You like westerns! Hell, you like the Magnificent Seven better than the Seven-"

"Silence," Genji said.

"Period dramas?"

"Eww, periods are gross," Jesse laughed.

You punched him in the arm.
"Thank you," Bayan said. "Blackwatch seems to prefer thrillers, action flicks, and anything with lots of explosions." He pursed his lips. "Why don't we watch a Miyazaki film?"

"Oooh," Feng nodded. "Good idea. Spirited Away or Nausicaä?"

"Who?" Jesse asked, raising a brow.

Feng smacked Genji in the arm. "Hayao Miyazaki was a national treasure! You've never shown him a Miyazaki film?"

Genji shrugged.

Feng stood, eyes flashing. She grabbed Jesse's hand and pulled him too his feet. "Let's go. We're going to have snacks, drinks, and Genji, you need to pick one to start him on. But we are not watching Grave of the Fireflies."

Jesse blinked. "Uh.."

"That was my first choice," Genji said, lazily.

"You're a dick." Feng said, shaking her finger at him. "And you've forfeited your right to choose. We'll start with Nausicaä, go on to Howl's Moving Castle, and maybe Princess Mononoke. That's not going to be too dark, is it?"

"It just highlights the fact that the price of progress was the death of magic and the inevitable extinction of." Genji began.

"No spoilers!" Feng yelled. "We can watch Spirited Away, instead. And don't you tell me 'I'm a grownup, I don't watch cartoons!'" She gave Jesse a hard look. It was amusing considering she was half a head shorter than him.

"...I am a grownup. I sometimes watch cartoons?" Jesse admitted.

"Good," Feng said. "Come on, Hanzo. Stop sulking. We want to show Jesse some Miyazaki films and we need someone with culture to help." She winked at the rest of you.

It was half a minute before Hanzo emerged from the restroom, looking disdainful, and sadly there was no toilet paper stuck to the bottom of his shoes. So you almost asked him what took him so long and if he'd fallen in, but Bayan stepped on your foot.

Feng's office had a massive viewscreen, blankets on the floor, and a truly distracting number of snacks. She'd blacked out the windows, put on Nausicaä, and sat down.

Jesse, Feng, and Hanzo were glued to the screen. Bayan had fallen asleep facefirst on the couch, unable to fight his exhaustion any more. You and Genji ate buttery popcorn, your baby dino still out cold.

"Do you not like Miyazaki films?" You asked, keeping your voice low.

"...Everyone likes Miyazaki films," Genji said out of the corner of his mouth. "Even the commander is very fond of them, if you didn't know."

"...Huh," you said.
"...I haven't watched one in years," Genji admitted. "Too...nostalgic." His gaze fell on Hanzo, who was eating rice crackers and watching a the titular character steered a glider through a post-apocalyptic wasteland.

You nodded. "Do you need to step out?"

Genji shook his head. "No." He gave you a small smile. "Thinking about the past doesn't bother me as much as it once did."

The trip home was...interesting. Bayan had packed you a survival kit, complete with adjustable harnesses, chicken diapers in various sizes, a solar lamp, and one of those titanium kennels, complete with a hardened lock, because apparently the older ones could operate the latching mechanism with no difficulty. You had tried to skim the handbook, but then your raptor chick was awake, and hopping out of the carrying sling, and no, she didn't want to sit still, she wanted to explore and eat things.

It took you and Jesse twenty minutes to catch her once she hit the floor, mostly because the Shimada brothers didn't deign to help. They just laughed at your struggles, Hanzo holding Bandit in his lap.

Once you'd caught her and cleaned up her mess, Jesse helped you put the smallest harness on her, and you attached the leash, and sat back down, watching her trying to wiggle free. She was alarmingly flexible, her little claws tearing at the foreign material, while she squawked furiously at you. But the harness straps held.

You still had no idea what you were going to do with a baby velociraptor. Between Gabriel's administrative duties, Lacroix's Shit Spiders missions, and the care and upkeep of your fellow Blackwatch agents, you had a full schedule. Now that you were out of Shanghai, this seemed like a terrible idea. You weren't ready for a dog, let alone a highly-experimental genetically-engineered murderbird brought back from extinction. What if she got sick? The closest "expert" was in Shanghai. What if Gabriel or Jack didn't like her? What if she hated them? Could you even take her in public without inciting panic? There were so many potential problems, and sheer magnitude of your responsibilities began to weigh on your chest.

Breathing deep, you looked down to see her balled up on your thigh, her tail curled around her fuzzy little body as she dozed. Reaching down, you scratched her head and she chirped softly, nuzzling your hand, her claws closing around your finger. She cooed, holding you there, warm, and fragile, and so damn trusting that you had to look away.

Whatever the problems, she was your murderbird now. You'd find a way to deal. You always did. Now, you were just going to have to explain to Jack and Gabriel that she had imprinted on you, you were now an honorary velociraptor guardian, and you couldn't just send her back.

Gabriel sat in the docking bay waiting room, still in casual uniform, a tablet in hand. He looked up, his eyes immediately going to the pet carrier full of dinosaur care supplies. He raised a brow, his gaze lingering on the new weapons in your belt, and finally stopping on the sling around your chest. Frowning, he rose, closing the distance between you, and looked inside fabric sling.

Your murderbird popped her head up and began chattering rapidly. She gave Gabriel a quick onceover and fell silent as she looked to you for your reaction to him.

You leaned over and kissed him, his lips soft against yours. He caught your bottom lip between his teeth, one arm curving around your waist.

"Miss me?" You asked, kissing his nose.

"Of course. I had to look over all those forms on my own." His words were casual, but his eyes were warm, and you didn't mind the teasing, not when he was standing here looking at you like that.

He glanced back down at your dino chick, who was still silent.

"Gabriel," you said, patting his chest. "He's safe."

She tilted her head, watching him with those piercing eyes, her little hands folded together like a praying mantis. She cheeped a few times, not sounding upset or even excited. It was a lot like acknowledgement and you wondered briefly just how clever she was going to be.

Gabriel's brows climbed higher. "So that maniac really did it?"

"Yeah," you said, a smile creeping across your face, because Gabriel was smart and knew right off the bat, so you didn't have to completely explain the situation. You weren't entirely sure what you would have done if he disbelieved you.

"What kind?" Gabriel crouched down, so he was eye level with your hatchling. "Does it have a name?"

"Velociraptor," you said. "And no, not yet. I've been calling her "Murderbird," but that's more a term of endearment."

Gabriel shook his head, not even looking surprised. "No, chica, you can't name her that." He reached over and she eyed him warily, puffing up as his fingers hovered over her head.

"No biting," you said in a low voice.

She ignored you, her eyes on Gabriel's fingers. He held his hand out, giving her time to sniff. She opened her mouth slowly.

"No," Gabriel said firmly, tapping her on the nose.

Grumbling, she sat back down, but held still as he gently rubbed her downy head.

"How old is she?"

"She hatched about eight hours ago," you said. "Imprinted on me and...well, that was it. She has her vaccines and can eat just about anything. I know you said no pets in the Blackwatch dorms, but you also said I could keep it if Feng made me a-"

"I remember," Gabriel said, standing up. His expression was distant, almost dazed. He leaned in and kissed you again. "I'm still processing the fact you are wearing a baby dinosaur in a sling on your chest."
"Bayan has three, all a few weeks older than her," you said. "He's exhausted." You stroked your chick's back and she made a pleased thrumming sound. "She's pretty social, so far she likes Bandit, Jesse, and Genji, still kind of wary of Aunt Feng though..."

Gabriel chuckled. "Clever girl." He paused, looking at you, loaded down with supplies. "I know we talked about a dog or a cat. But this..." He laughed. "Are you ready for this?"

"No," you breathed, shaking your head. "Not in the least. I'm sorry I didn't consult you guys. It all happened so fast. I have no idea what to do. Please say you'll help me."

Still laughing, Gabriel stroked your cheek. "I think we can arrange something."

You forwarded a copy of Bayan's manual to Gabriel's tablet. Your baby dinosaur peeked out of the sling, head jerking from side to side as she tried to take in her new surroundings. The metal halls of Overwatch HQ were markedly different from the sinuously organic architecture of White Rabbit's laboratories. Gabriel had the metal carrier slung over his shoulder and a wry smile on his face. He kept glancing over at you, his amusement clear.

She started trilling when you passed through the mess hall, and you had to draw the fabric of the sling up, shushing her as you walked. The room was loud enough that she didn't draw much attention and you were able to keep her concealed, but you did get some strange looks.

"Why am I not surprised that she's extremely food motivated?" Gabriel asked, nudging you with his elbow.

You shrugged. "I thought most things were."

Gabriel just laughed, like you'd missed the point of the joke. No, you understood it just fine. You just ignored it. Because you were in public and it wouldn't do to bite the smartass Blackwatch commander in front of your fellow agents.

Jack was waiting on Gabriel's couch, one leg curled under him, his brow furrowed as he looked over something on his tablet. A steaming mug of coffee sat on the end table beside him. He waved without looking up. "Welcome back, sweetheart. Did you have fun?"

"Yeah," you said, kicking off your shoes. "I did."

"What'd you do?" Jack asked, still focused on his tablet. "No robberies this time? What about ancient gods rising from the deep? How about a demonic incursion? Maybe werewolves?"

"No, no, and no," you said. "Nothing like that. We stayed in the White Rabbit building and the security was topnotch."

Jack nodded. "How's Feng?"

"Loved the basket. According to her own predictions, she's probably rolling around her office floor, wishing she hadn't eaten the entire basket of cheese in one sitting, while AI Auntie passive-aggressively reprimands her."

"...Sounds about right," Jack said, smiling. "I got her RSVP for Family Day. The message literally said, 'I'LL BE THERE.' Followed by one that said, 'Uh, this is kind of embarrassing, but can I stay with you guys?' Don't want the paparazzi finding out that she's so cozy with us. So we'll Gabriel set down the carrier next to the couch and began unpacking the goods. He actually laughed when he saw the little diapers. He wouldn't be laughing when she shat in his shoes or somewhere equally awful.

Your murderbird cheeped, eyes on Jack.

"What do you have there?" Jack asked, finally looking up. He took a moment to inspect the empty metal carrier. Then he set his tablet down, looking slightly confused. "Gabe?"

"Ask your girlfriend," Gabriel laughed going to his cupboard and grabbing a dented metal bowl and plate. "From my old mess kit," he said. "Should be sturdy enough for now."

Jack examined the carrier, still confused. "Did you get a...what is that?" Jack's eyes widened in alarm. He crossed the room in three strides. "Sweetheart, what's wrong with your little chicken's face? Did she lose her beak?"

"Uh..." Suddenly you weren't sure where to start.

Jack scrunched up his face. "She looks healthy."

Gabriel chuckled, getting into the fridge. "Is raw hamburger OK? Or you think we should cook it?"

"She'll eat it either way," you said.

"I'll cook it just to be safe. She like eggs?"

"I haven't found anything she doesn't like yet. They're omnivores, but they need more protein than anything else."

Jack crouched down, staring hard at your chick. She sat low in the sling, wings folded at her sides. "Is that a harness?"

"Yeah, she's fast."

She chirped at Jack, then looked at you and chirped again.

"That's Jack," you said. "He's safe too." But you suspected she already knew that. She was getting good at figuring out your body language and your vocal cues. Even if she'd been excited in the mess hall, she hadn't tried to attract attention or approach any of the other agents.

"Is she a silkie? A Polish? One of those really fancy Asian breeds? You know, the ones the extravagant plumage that they breed for cockfighting?" He squinted. "Or is she some kind of pheasant? She's too big to be a bantam. Unless she's older than a few weeks?"

You weren't entirely sure what to make of Jack's fixation on poultry. But she did sort of resemble a chicken. "Uh, no. Jack-"

"No, don't tell me, I got this," Jack said, with cheerful confidence. "Farmboy here, after all."

Gabriel snickered. You covered your mouth.

"You know, I thought you were going to start with a dog or cat, sweetheart," Jack said, and you could detect just the faintest wistful disappointment in his tone, like he'd really been looking forward to a puppy. "But I get that you're being responsible and starting small. We probably don't have time to train a puppy. And if you want a bird, that's fine too; I don't mind at all. They don't potty train though. And chickens poop everywhere." He paused. "You're sure it's not rooster right? Because that could be a problem down the road -"

"It's not a rooster, Jack," you said with a wry smile.

"Hold on, I'll bring up Poultrypedia. Chicks tend to look the same. Does she have sex feathers by chance?"

"...What?" You and Gabriel asked in unison.

"With some breeds you can determine the sex by the coloring or patterning on the chicks. Makes it easier to separate out laying hens. Not foolproof, but -" He paused. "Can I get a better look at her?"

You gently lifted your raptor out of the sling, holding her against your chest, the clawed tips at the end of her wings now visible. She yawned as Jack got closer.

"...Sweetheart, your chicken has teeth," Jack said, wincing. "Gabe, do birds have teeth?"

"Not that I know of."

Jack stared. "And she has tiny little hands," he muttered. "Gabe, that's not a chicken. I'm not entirely certain that's even a bird."

"Never claimed it was," Gabriel said, chopping up some melon, his lips curving upward. "That was all your "farmboy" expertise."

Jack inspected your chick, his brow furrowed, his expression severe. You could see the moment the epiphany hit Jack. His eyes got big and his jaw went slack for a second, before a big stupid grin crept across his face.

"...Did she really make you dinosaur?"

Gabriel began to laugh and you couldn't stop grinning.

"Feng actually got AI auntie to engineer modified velociraptors. She's third gen, which is apparently the first set that's domesticated enough for companionship."

Jack just stared, his eyes wide and full of wonder. "Can I pet her?"

"Go slow, and scold her if she bites."

Jack gently offered her his hand and she sniffed it, mouthing his fingers, her little claws reaching out to hold on to him.

"No biting," you said, tapping her snout. "Careful with the claws."

She made a grumbling sound and released Jack's fingers.

"She's not hurting me," Jack said. "Can I hold her too?" He sounded like a kid at a petting zoo and you exchanged smiles with Gabriel.

"You can try. Jesse and Genji had to bribe her with food."
Jack reached his hands out, grin big as you passed her over to him. She didn't struggle, but she kept looking between the two of you, even as Jack gently petted her head, cooing at her softly. She trilled back at him, relaxing against his hand. "She likes me," he said, delight breaking through his quiet tones.

"She actually does," you agreed. Jack didn't even have to feed her first.

He held her against his chest, grinning as she stared up at him. "What's her name?"

"Don't have one yet," you said. "Been calling her 'Murderbird,' but I'm very aware that I can't name her that."

Jack just laughed. "You can't name her 'Ana' either. Not if you want to live." He rubbed her chest, grinning as she wiggled in his big hands.

"My mind didn't even go there," you said, rolling your eyes.

"There aren't any namesakes you'd like to use? If I have any kids, I might have to name one after Mateo or Ray."

You blinked, thinking about your dead. "It doesn't seem quite right." The names from your past were heavy with history and you weren't sure that was fair to anyone, human or not. Not to mention, you weren't sure how Ziv would react if you named her "Rivka." Probably not well.

"I wanted to name a daughter 'Ishana,'" Gabriel said, coming over with the bowl of water and a plate of meat, eggs, and melon. "It's a variant of 'Aishani.' Same meaning."

"Oh," you said. "I couldn't take that."

"I'm not having any daughters any time soon," Gabriel said with a shrug. "It's just a suggestion, if you wanted a name. I have plenty of other names picked out." He flashed you a cocky grin.

"It's a good suggestion," you said, after a moment, not entirely sure how to interpret that.

"We could call her 'Isha' for short," Jack said.

"Could work. Because I feel like we're probably going to be yelling at her a lot and that's easier with shorter names," you said.

"It sounds so much more severe when your name is three syllables or more and it gets dragged out," Gabriel said dryly. He sat down on the floor, putting the water in front of him. You and Jack sat down, forming a circle.

"Can I put her down? I've got a good grip on the leash," Jack said.

"Yeah."

Jack gingerly set her on the floor, and she strutted over to the water, clutching the rim of the bowl with her little hand talons as she lowered her head to drink. Her gaze stayed on Gabriel's plate.

"You can hand feed her," you said. "But you have to discipline her if she bites," you said.

The raptor cocked her head to the side.

"Isha, come," Gabriel said firmly, lowering his open palm.

She looked at you.

"Go on," you nodded.

She strutted over, her walk having already evolved into the cocksure swagger of a barnyard rooster. You could see why Jack had mistaken her for one. She plucked the melon from Gabriel hand with her talons, watching him warily as she delicately took the first bite. Then she chirped happily and practically shoved the entire cube of fruit into her little mouth, spraying fruit pulp as she chewed.

Gabriel watched her gobble it down, a faint smile on his lips. "Messy, but it looks like she should be easy to train: you just have to bribe her with food."

"Let me try!" Jack reached extended his hand.

Gabriel passed Jack the plate and he took a ground beef crumble and set his open palm on the ground. "Come here, Isha," Jack said, using the good dog voice. "Come on girl."

She blinked owlishly at him, head cocked to the side, and she did not move.

"The high-pitched voice doesn't have the same effect on birds," Gabriel said.

"She's not a bird, Gabe," Jack rolled his eyes. "We've already establish this," he said impatiently. "Come on, Isha," he said switching to low tones anyway. He smiled, rolling the meat crumble in his hand.

Your murderbird, whom you hadn't actually agreed to name Isha, bobbed from side to side, cheeping as she stalked over to Jack, looking almost predatory. It was fine if they wanted to call her that though; it was more important that they liked her and wanted to keep her. And "Isha" wasn't a bad name; you weren't sure if Captain Patel would approve, but you didn't think she'd be offended.

She glanced up at Jack and then ate the meat straight from his hand.

"Ow!" Jack laughed as she bit him in her excitement. "Careful!" He got out another piece of beef.

"No biting," you said, because apparently that was your line now.

"It's fine," Jack laughed, leaning over to rub her chin. She thrummed happily. "She's just a baby and she didn't mean to-"

You looked at Gabriel and the two of you rolled your eyes.

"So have you already picked out her enclosure and toys, or do we need to get more?" Jack asked feeding her more melon. "Because you're going to need stuff for her in my quarters too..."
It's been a weird week. I'm trying to be less...negative? That doesn't mean I'm being "positive." It just means I'm not letting the world and my anxiety bring me down. I don't know. I'm a pretty big cynic. And sometimes my thoughts just get overwhelmingly dark, heavy, and awful, because I read the news every day. (Dystopic future? More like present.) That doesn't mean I'm wrong, it just means feeling that way doesn't accomplish anything. It's a weird balance.

The other day I was across the store when some guy just starts screaming profanities and telling people to leave him and his family alone. He was enraged. It was a long loud rant. And he had no family with him. Managers went over and calmed him down. He said a group of teenagers was saying racist things about him so he had to go out for a smoke. Obviously, the reaction was over the top and made us all suspect there were some underlying issues there. The managers questioned these teens, and they denied it. Who knows? A couple of the boys (who worked at a baptist church camp - sussed out because they were wearing staff t-shirts) had that smarmy "tee hee" look that makes me go "I just want to punch you in the face just for looking at me." We're inclined to think they were.

Of course, right after that everyone's on edge, and since I live in America, I was mentally reviewing our active shooter protocols. It's been awhile since I did that. The guy comes back inside holding his lighter. And then some young upper middle class white woman runs up to us with breathless excitement says, "I think he's holding a knife!" It was his lighter and the manager told her that very plainly. Thankfully, the manager handling the situation has a good crisis mode, and the guy later apologized for losing his cool. I just look at this and go "...wow, that could have ended very badly for a whole slew of reasons, but didn't. Phew." Just another day in the bookstore.

Today I got all the weirdos. This one guy followed me around asking me for postcards of that Manhattan Project mushroom cloud shot where the scientists are watching it with big protective glasses. Then he told me he wanted this guy at church to do a painting of Sodom and Gomorrah being destroyed with a mushroom cloud in the background. Also, there's something not right with that kid, but he sure can draw. Though he's not quite right in the head if you know what he means?

Also, this customer started to tell me the whole story of Sodom and Gomorrah, and I'm just trying to walk away, and he's following me talking and showing me this artist's slightly odd drawings, talking about how weird this other guy is. I'm sure the irony was lost on him.

Taking my cat to the vet tomorrow. He's been acting a little strange and since he's FIV+ and over 10 years old I'm concerned.

I have several kids events to run on Saturday. I will have to hypercaffeinate myself.

Hope everyone else's excitement has happy outcomes!
Chapter 83

Chapter Summary

What do missions, murderbirds, and other people's children have in common? You need to plan for handling them, and then you need to understand that that plan is going to go out the window at a critical moment.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Did you really ask Ziv if I was...forcing him into sex?" Amélie asked as you lined up the shot.

You nearly choked to death on your tongue, but decided to try to cough up a lung instead. When the fit had passed, you glanced up at Amélie, who was serving as your spotter. She held her own custom rifle in hand.

"Can we talk about this later?" Patting your chest, you looked down the scope, moving the barrel to adjust for your clumsiness. The hotel room had a lovely view of the river, and you'd chosen this for spot its west-facing windows.

"Chanceux, I am very worried. Do you really think I would-"

"No, I don't," you said tersely. Exhaling, you spotted the target, sans the traditional scarlet robes. Instead he wore an outrageously expensive suit as he walked along the bridge across the Danube, chatting amicably with an omnic in an equally expensive suit. You squinted, not recognizing the fellow. "Who's the omnic?"

"I am getting a picture of his companion. Quite a dapper one. He dresses better than many people." She said it in such a matter-of-fact fashion, that you didn't think the insult had been directed at you. And to be fair, she was right. He wore a three piece suit, a red paisley pocket square, and his bowtie matched the lights on his facial plate. "Do we want to eliminate him too?"

"Do we know whom he is?"

"Running him through the database... Oh, so very dashing. His name is Maximilien. He has a casino in Monte Carlo." Amélie laughed softly. "How intriguing."

You exhaled slowly, remembering the litany of names that Gleeson had called out under Gabriel's torture. There had been a few candidates, but no one was quite sure which Maximilien he had meant. That this omnic was in the company of a known Talon financier, and a cardinal no less, was damning. But then, Gleeson had accused Jack of being in on it too. Proximity and circumstantial evidence were not enough to warrant a death sentence. But the omnic was now on your radar.

"Chanceux?"

"We'll leave him for now," you said. "Need to get more info on him before we pull the trigger."
"As you say," Amélie said, her voice low with excitement. "We should visit him some time. I'll pick the outfits, you pick the weapons."

You waited for Cardinal Kovács to enter your kill zone. Your finger rested on the trigger and you counted your breaths, focusing on the space between. Your world narrowed to the man in the expensive suit, not the omnic beside him. Not the woman at your back. Holding steady, you squeezed the trigger, your index finger pulling back slowly.

"So then what did you ask him?"

Your finger jerked to the left and you swore vehemently as the shot went wide. "Really?" You shouted.

Quick as a snake, with a small smile on her lips, Amélie lifted her rifle and fired two shots. They both connected, fatally, despite Kovács' alarm and Maximilien's attempt to shepherd him to safety.

There were already private security drones moving to calculate the origin of the shots. The extra shooting had shaved seconds off your escape time. You glared at Amélie as you broke down your rifle and packed it into your bag. "Was that necessary?"

"I'm sorry, Chanceux," Amélie laughed. "Come on, we must hurry. We can talk about this later!" She teased as she folded up her rifle, dropping it into her bag as she opened the door. You hadn't, of course, registered to stay in this room or even this building.

Lowering her sunglasses, Amélie led the way, breezing through the hallway in a floppy white beach hat, cerulean summer dress and strappy gold heels. You were just as casual in a lacy black tanktop, red cropped trousers, and black ballet flats. You wore a sheer red scarf around your neck.

"They've pinpointed the building," Athena chirped in your earpiece. "I'm still looping the security cameras, but you're going to have to take the secondary exit if you wish to remain undetected."

You and Amélie took the elevator, Athena bypassing the other floors, till you hit the basement. There was a maintenance tunnel that connected to the Metro. It had fallen out of use, but according to Tataryn, it was still accessible. Still, you weren't going through the tunnels in frivolous shoes.

"That was a dick move," you said, kicking off your flats, slipping out of your fancy pants, and changing into combat cargos. You put on leather boots and dropped your clothes into the same bag as your rifle. You wore a pistol and your new tanto in your belt.

Amélie giggled and began stripping in the hallway, winking at you as she shimmied out of her dress. She was wearing fancy underwear. She wore a lacy violet matched set with little black silk bows, on an assassination op. You weren't the least bit surprised.

You rolled your eyes. "I'm not distracted that easily."

"I am sorry," she purred, winking at you as she bent over to unbuckle her sandals, wiggling her hips as she stretched her impossibly long legs. "Better?"

"Come on, Amélie," you facepalmed, hoping you sounded more exasperated than flustered.

"Relax, Chanceux. We're moving too fast. They won't find a thing. And I will take full responsibility for the consequences." She pulled on black fatigues, folded her street clothes, and put them in the bag. "You must admit, those were impressive shots." She gave you a proud smile.

They were, and that was the only thing that might excuse her flamboyant actions. You didn't answer, instead removing the hastily-erected wall-panel that concealed the tunnel access.

"I've altered all footage that could reveal your presence," Athena said in your ear. "The hotel is on lockdown and local authorities have pinpointed your sniper's nest. Judging from the comm traffic, the cardinal's private defense forces are searching for you as well."

"Oh Chanceux, don't be angry. I knew I could make the shots. I would never jeopardize a mission." She nudged you with her elbow. "I am very sorry. I should not have stolen your thunder. Please do not be cross."

"Can we talk about this later? Like when we don't have Hungarian security forces actively hunting us?" You let her go first, taking a moment to slide the panel back in place.

"I suppose. I hear the prison conditions in Budapest are appalling," Amélie said cheerfully. "But you, Fedya, and Gérard planned this exit route. I am not worried about that. I am concerned about what you must think of me-"

You pushed open the security door, safety lights flickering on. From what you, Ziv, and Tataryn could figure, the tunnel drew power from the Metro maintenance grid, and that was different from the hotel. That would make it harder for anyone else to trace your route.

You followed the tunnel down, the orange lights casting eerie shadows on the concrete. You followed the tunnel several meters till you found a half recessed security door covered in dust.

You oiled the hinges first, just to be safe. Kneeling down, you flicked your fingers. Examining the lock, you found that it was old, but intact. Your middle finger lit up and a pick emerged from your index prostheses. You inserted a tension wrench with your right hand, and it didn't take long to work the pins into place. The tumblers clicked, you pushed once, and the metal groaned. You braced yourself and pushed harder, and this time the door creaked open.

The passageway was pitch black, of course. You held up your light. The concrete tunnel was tall enough to stand up straight, and wide enough for the two of you to walk side by side. You looked around, knowing with your luck, that you could stumble into a nest of hibernating killer omnis, or be chased by mutant rats, or get ambushed by mole people.

Amélie followed close behind, shutting the door behind you. In the distance, you could hear the roar of the Metro. It didn't smell like diseased rodents or anything at all lived in this chamber. The air was cool and stale and there was no sunlight down here. You closed your eyes, and for a moment you could hear omnis scraping at the rockfall barrier, while Jesse took shallow breaths, his hand gripping yours.

"Chanceux?" Amélie's voice was uncertain, the acoustics of the tunnel slightly different from the cave. There was a slight echo, a reverberation backed by a great deal of white noise.

You opened your eyes. It wasn't a true flashback, not like some of the others. The feel of dark underground had reminded you of something unpleasant, but you weren't scared or losing your grip on reality.

"I'm fine," you said. "Trying to get my bearings and map our route." Once you were out of the Underground, you would get to the outskirts of the city and request pickup.
"I still say we should take bicycles. This city has some wonderful cycling tours..."

"Maybe next time. I need to get back to base." Jesse was watching Isha, and he'd been very nervous about being designated "dinosaur-sitter."

Amélie laughed softly. "So is it sufficiently "later," Chanceux? Or is that just your excuse to avoid a thorny subject?" Her good-humored tone did nothing to change the fact she was calling you out.

Deep down, you knew this moment was coming the moment those words left your mouth. You'd hoped Ziv would have been circumspect about repeating portions to Amélie, but that was obviously expecting too much. He didn't have a filter nor the good sense to use one.

"I asked Ziv if he was being pressured," you said sourly. "Not because I thought you would, but because the subject needed to be addressed."

"Did it?" Amélie asked and you didn't have to look at her to know she was pursing her lips, one brow arched elegantly in her skepticism.

"When I started seeing Jack and Gabriel, Captain Amari and Jesse both made a point to ask me if anything untoward had occurred, not because they thought either man was taking advantage, but because that's the responsible thing to do when there's a power imbalance. Too many people get away with things because “no one thought they would do that.” You blew out a breath. "And don't even try to tell me that "you're just the poor wife and you have to abide by your husband's decisions." We both know that he can't make you do anything you don't want to. In fact, I think we both know he wouldn't dream of doing something like this without your approval."

Amélie laughed, one hand resting on your arm. "I am teasing, Chanceux. Ziv explained your reasoning, though...perhaps not as coherently as you did. At first, I thought I shouldn't say anything. But I admit, the idea of you thinking that of me sat poorly. I had to clarify. I know sometimes I am...forceful about things, and I realize I have been too pushy. But I have never intended to make you uncomfortable."

"It wasn't a reflection of you. I just had to ask." You left out any uncharitable comments about Lacroix. "About the entire situation." Because while you were very happy with your relationship, being in your position gave you a great deal of insight into all the ways this type of situation could go bad or be exploited.

"Ziv...reassured me that you didn't think I was that kind of person. But I am very aware that sometimes I just come in, take charge, and start issuing orders. I do appreciate that you humor me."

"Humor" wasn't the right word. It was pure self-defense, though you knew better than to say that. You rubbed your forehead. "Do I want to know what he said?"

"I don't think she meant it like that," Amélie mimicked Ziv's slightly accented English, her voice low. "She has clumsy protective tendencies and she says weird stupid things all the time, that are actually smarter than they sound, which is good because she usually sounds like an idiot. Don't worry about it. Would you please pass the Chablis?"

You rolled your eyes, catching sight of another maintenance access door up ahead. "That's it, that's an accurate assessment of the situation. Also, Ziv's an ass. Good luck managing him."

"I am glad that you look after him, like a good sister," Amélie said, squeezing your arm. "His isolation from his family has been difficult, and it's been such a comfort that he can rely on
You almost asked Amélie how she knew, and then you realized that Ziv and Amélie had been talking quite a bit, and even if those weren't Ziv's exact words, even if she had prettied them up a bit, the feeling behind them was genuine.

But of course, you'd always known that. He'd even told you so. It was just strange to hear another person confirm it.

"OK, so if you already knew all that, was it really necessary to mess up my shot?"

"No," Amélie said with a laugh. "I just did that for fun. Sometimes I'm too competitive." She flashed you a bright smile.

Sighing, you unlocked the maintenance door, the murmur of human crowds growing substantially louder. Both of you changed into your civilian clothes before you pushed through the exit, and disappeared into the crowds.

You knocked on Jesse's door and it swung open immediately. Jesse gave you a slightly panicked smile.

"You're a sight for sore eyes, huckleberry," he said. "Was wondering when you-"

"What'd she do?" You sighed, stepping into Jesse's room. You caught sight of several torn candy wrappers, a chewed up boot, and a shredded blanket. You glanced at Jesse's forearms, reddened with little clawmarks and bites. Uh oh.

In the middle of Jesse's couch, Bandit dozed on a pillow, and Isha was curled up against his side, snuffling softly as she napped.

You gave Jesse a questioning look.

"She's been trying to ride Bandit like a pony!" Jesse whispered.

You briefly wondered where she got that idea; she was a shameless mimic. You suspected she had been watching Jesse's westerns. He left them on in his room now, just so Bandit would have some background noise. "Please tell me you took pictures."

"I was too busy worrying that she was trying to hunt him!" Jesse wiped his brow. "She's got killer instincts!"

You glanced over at your baby raptor, her fuzzy black body nestled against Bandit's. Bandit didn't seem to mind her, though Bandit was an exceptionally relaxed dog. You looked back at Jesse.

"I didn't say it was a rational worry. But it made sense at the time," Jesse scowled at you.

"Obviously, she likes Bandit and is happy napping with him. If she was being bad, you could have crated her."

"I did: she cries," Jesse mumbled, adjusting his hat. "And she behaved better after I let her Uncle Jesse was a soft touch. You shook your head.

There were little clawmarks on Jesse's walls, snags in the sofa that probably came from talons, and a chunk bitten out of his table leg. You were fairly certain that hadn't been there before.

"Thanks for watching her. Sorry she was...bad." You'd already lost several socks, some snacks, and a coffee mug to her destructive tendencies, and that was just this week. There was a portion of your floor that would never be the same. "Gabriel and Jack were both busy. I'm sorry."

"She wasn't terrible. I just don't know what to do with a baby dinosaur," Jesse said, leaning over to pet her head. "I wouldn't mind giving her another shot."

She snapped her teeth sleepily, not actually trying to bite him.

"No biting," you said, tapping her nose.

Her eyes flew open and she flapped her arms, trilling as she hopped to her feet. Her little claws gripped your fingers and she cooed. You picked her up, listening to her chatter rapidly like she was trying to tell you about her day. She rubbed her head on your gloved hands, chirping loudly.

"Hey there, Isha. Were you good for Uncle Jesse?"

Her eyes darted to Jesse and then to the shredded blanket. She cocked her head to the side and made that happy thrumming sound. You picked up the blanket.

"Did you do this?"

She opened her mouth, looking oddly proud.

"No clawing or biting Uncle Jesse's things." You shook your head, wondering how much of this was actually effective.

She tilted her head, cheeping. You offered her the blanket. She bit it. You rapped her gently on the nose. "No biting."

Isha grumbled, but released the blanket.

"That can't taste good," you said.

She chirped at you. You got the feeling she liked the taste of Jesse and Bandit's things, simply because she knew they weren't hers, but you couldn't be certain.

"...Sugarpie, you should know, she doesn't listen to anyone else like she does you," Jesse said with a sigh. "She's scary smart. I'm pretty sure she understands what I'm saying, she just doesn't care."

"Sometimes you have to incentivize them to care." You learned that nugget of wisdom from teaching the recruits. You reached into your pocket and pulled out a small resealable bag. Inside were strips of dried mutton, no salt added. Bandit perked up. You tore one in half and gave it to him. Isha called loudly, demanding hers. You set her down on the couch and she took off toward Bandit.

"No," you said sharply. "Not for you."
She slowed down, glancing over her shoulder at you. She gave an angry cheep.

"Come here, Isha." You kept your voice low and commanding.

She gave Bandit's treat one longing look and headed back to the edge of the couch. You held out the other half of the strip. "That's for you, Isha." She squinted at you, then Bandit, and then snatched it away, gorging it down.

Jesse glanced at Bandit who had finished his treat, and wagged at you happily. You tore off another half strip and he took it politely from your fingers. Then you handed Jesse the other half and he offered it to your baby raptor.

"No biting. No clawing," you said.

Isha blinked at you with her big blue eyes, her mouth already open, like she was going to eat that meat and maybe Jesse's fingertips.

"No biting," you said, firmly. "Jesse, you tell her too."

"Aw, sugarpie, now I see why the rookies were so scared of you," Jesse laughed. "Isha-bird, no bitin' and no clawin'."

Isha hesitantly closed her mouth, then politely accepted the treat in her little hands. She sat down and began to chew, chirping at Jesse.

"Clever girl," you told her, because it made you happy, even if everyone else was rolling their eyes.

"Not used to all this training," Jesse said. "Bandit's so easygoing."

"Your dog is an adult and has already learned his manners. Isha is starting from scratch."

You rubbed the back of your neck. "It doesn't help that I don't know what I'm doing."

Jesse patted your back. "No, but it's pretty damn entertaining to watch, Mama Raptor."

You resolved to let Isha eat his hat next time.

You signed an armored car out of the motor pool, because it was better safe than sorry. Tataryn had sent you a list of Kseniya's favorite foods, more restrictions, and a rambling message about how he was trying to find Távio a placement, really. You were going to stop at that French bakery downtown and buy a ton of desserts.

Isha was staying with Gabriel, in the office, while you went out, something that you weren't so sure about. He seemed completely at ease, chucking her under the chin, while she chattered at him, and putting her harness on without any help.

She still wasn't pleased when you left her, but Gabriel waved you off, rolling his eyes at your hesitation.

So here you were, pulling up to the wrought iron gates of the Institut Montana, boxes of cakes and pastries in the backseat. You might have gone overboard. Just a little. But Tataryn was a pain in the ass, and if Kseniya didn't like the sweets you picked, well, you, Jesse, and Genji wouldn't have any trouble finishing them off.

An Athena drone sat in the backseat as well. "The security measures here are heavier than they look. My presence might attract unwanted attention. I'm going into shielded mode."

You slowed down, giving the armed guard your visitor's badge and sign-out documents that Tataryn had arranged in advance. The guards were polite - they had visitors from all over coming in, but that meant higher security.

You parked in the lot, your armored car not actually sticking out here. There were plenty of others. Hell, if you stuck around, you might be able to gather some intel, network, and visit Tataryn's kid.

The stray thought surprised you. You'd been spending too much time with Lacroix. Both of them. You climbed out of your vehicle, sidearm holstered discretely under your shirt, your new tanto tucked inside your belt. You had dressed nicely enough for a school visit, but comfortably in case you had to do a relay race or kill terrorists: sleeveless dark blue button down, matching gloves, khaki capris, and cute tennis shoes. You recognized a Swedish royal listening to a renowned actress. They were talking about ins and outs of racehorse breeding.

You ignored the banners and signs advertising a variety of activities and headed for the dorm. You made it to the door, preparing to get your ID badge and other documents out, when you saw Kseniya sitting on the steps, her hair up in two puffs, a backpack slung over her shoulder. You studied her face, making sure this was the right kid. Because it could go very badly if you just walked up to someone else's child and started talking to them. She was small, and you still didn't see a trace of Tataryn in her bone structure. Her nose was thin and straight, but that was the only resemblance. Her skin was a shade darker than Gabriel's and she had dressed down in khaki shorts and a striped collared shirt, not a wrinkle in sight. She wore little buckled clogs that were so ugly they were cute, and you weren't sure how you felt about that. Embarrassed? Appalled? Like you'd been spending too much time with Lacroix and Amélie?

She looked up at you, and you recognized those amber eyes. You walked forward, extending your hand. "Sorry if I'm late-"

"No, I just got the notification you were here." She stood up, and shook your hand. "Thank you for coming. Did you want to go to the picnic?" She had a polite, complete disingenuous smile on her face, like a kid who was humoring an older boring relative.

You stood there dumbly for a moment. "Were there any activities you wanted to attend?"

"Not really," she said, with a shrug. "But we can. I hear the hoverboard race is fun. You can see the crown prince of Spain if you want."

"OK," you said, trying to sound enthusiastic. "Do you want to?"

"Not really," she said. "I've met most of these people before. Umm, I can introduce you to an action move director and the BMW CFO. I'm not really in with the old money crowd."

"...That isn't necessary," you said, realizing that Tataryn was right and she did not want to be here. "So did you want to make a token appearance or do we run while we still can?"

She relaxed then, a shy smile appearing with the relief. "Let's go."
Kseniya stared at the backseat full of desserts.

"Your dad told me you're vegetarian. I grabbed some vegan stuff too, if you like. There are also browned butter and sea salt rice crispy treats if you're doing the gluten-free thing. There are-

"I can eat anything," she said, setting a box to the side and buckling herself in. "I'm trying vegetarianism, but I don't really want to give up pepperoni." She fidgeted.

"If you want something, go for it. I wasn't sure what you'd like."

"I'm not supposed to eat this much sugar," she said.

You laughed, because you already knew that. "Is that so?" You asked, winking at her.

She gazed at you seriously. "Are you going to tell?"

"I have all these desserts. I'm going to need help eating them," you lied, because you could eat those all on your own; you just knew you should not. "You don't have any health conditions I should know about?" Because you assumed Tataryn would have told you if she was diabetic or had any food allergies.

"No, Tato is just overprotective." She shrugged and selected a chocolate tart. "Do you have any milk?"

"...No," you said. "I have coffee." You held up your travel mug. "Want some?"

Kseniya giggled. "You know kids aren't supposed to drink coffee."

"I know nothing." You shrugged. "We can stop somewhere. I'll get you decaf if you want. Or plain milk." You glanced at the time. "We can grab fast food if you're hungry, or we can get something back at HQ." You wondered how much anguish you could cause Tataryn by buying her a Happy Meal.

"We can wait till we get back," she said. "Tato says the food there is mostly good." She glanced at the fish torpedo. "Your drone is on."

"Athena, maintain security monitoring and traffic mapping," you said.

"Understood," Athena said, trying to sound emotionless.

Kseniya stared at the drone. "I've never seen that model before."

"Custom-built," you said. "Winston's design. We can visit him later if you like. Your dad said you were thinking about becoming an engineer." Which made you laugh, because she was eight, and when you were eight you thought engineers drove trains.

"Winston the world-renowned inventor?" Her eyes got big. "The gorilla Winston? I follow his tech talks channel! You don't think he'll be too busy?"

You failed to realize Winston had an audience outside of Overwatch, which was silly because he was a minor celebrity and needed non-work-related social interaction too. Giving science and engineering talks was a good way to reach new people. It seemed Távio had been more on point than you expected.

"Where I come from, Winston is known for being the one who eats all the peanut butter in the pantry and doesn't replace it," you said shaking your head. "I have some peanut butter cookies I picked up for him. We'll take them to him later. Anything else you want to do?"

"I'd like to visit Uncle Gabriel and Aunt Ana if they're available," she said after a moment. "I realize they're busy people, so I understand if they're not..."

"Gabriel should be available. I think Captain Amari is off-site. You know the cover story, right?"

"I'm visiting my Uncle Gabriel. My mother is his oldest sister Catrina Morales; she actually has a daughter my age. He calls me "Zinnia" as a nickname. That's probably the best way to introduce me. I'm attending a local school and he's paying for my tuition because I'm "gifted." She nodded. "Tato said I could claim to be your daughter too."

"Do you like kittens?" You asked a little more venomously than you intended.

"...Umm, yes? Who doesn't?"

"Would you like one?" You asked with a tight smile.

"I live in a pet-free dorm." She stared at her lap. "I'm sorry, I didn't mean to make you uncomfortable," she said, her voice small.

You groaned, realizing you had upset her. "You're fine. But your dad should know better," you scowled, trying to think of the best way to explain your relationship with the Overwatch rumor mill. "There are some...a lot of rumors about my personal life." Some of which you were now pretty sure Tataryn started. "Some of the rumors are...unpleasant. If I turn up with a child claiming to be mine..."

"It's just going to make things more complicated," she said, nodding sagely. "I understand."

Did she? You tried to remember what you knew at that age, but it blurred. You understood rumors and the damage they could cause in an abstract sense, but the scope was so small and you were so young... So it begged the question, what had Tataryn been teaching her?

"Sorry, your dad was telling people I'm a cannibal, as a joke. But apparently some people believed him."

Kseniya snorted, a smile creeping back onto her face. "You're making that up."

"I am not!"

Kseniya took a bite of her chocolate tart. "I don't believe you," she said, bolder than you'd ever heard.

"I have witnesses! Athena, could you please message Távio and tell him to meet me at the motor pool?"

"Understood," Athena chirped, and you could have sworn she was laughing at you.

You bagged the boxes of pastries. Kseniya took a bag walking along side you as you exited the motor pool, Athena floating behind you. Távio stood at attention, in uniform, by the check-in counter, his eyes widening as he looked at Kseniya. You could only wonder what he was thinking.

"Agent Maeda Vargas, this is my principal for the day. She goes by "Zinnia." It seems you were right to suggest Winston."

"Ma'am," he said, nodding enthusiastically. "Miss Zinnia, you can call me Távio."

Kseniya offered her free hand. "That would be rude. Pleased to meet you, Mr. Maeda Vargas."

Távio stared at her, eyes wide, because you doubted anyone ever called him "mister." He shook her small hand politely. "Nice to meet you too, Miss Zinnia."

Kseniya nudged you with her elbow, her smile bright. "What was that story you were telling me on the way here, Ms. Strike?"

"I was telling her about the time Tataryn went around telling people I would eat you guys if we'd been stuck in Greece much longer. Apparently, our favorite visiting omnic approached me saying he head rumors that I was a cannibal."

"...Uh...I was there when Agent Tataryn said that. I didn't realize anyone else heard it," Távio scratched the back of his head.

Kseniya giggled. "But is it true? Would she eat people?"

Távio blinked. "I...don't know?" He raised his hands when he saw your face. "Probably not!" He eyed your bags. "Do you need help with those, ma'am?" He asked quickly, obviously trying to change the subject.

"Oh no, I can eat these cakes and other fine pastries all on my own," you said, smiling cheerfully at their crestfallen faces. "That way you guys don't have to worry about me getting hungry and resorting to cannibalism."

---

You were checking in with Gabriel first. Kseniya wanted to greet him, but also, you were slightly concerned about Isha being in the damn office possibly eating your handwritten Shit Spiders files. Távio had the rest of the hour free, but then he had patrol duty. Still, he followed, sneaking hopeful glances at your pastry shop purchases.

"What do you got there, Agent Vargas?" Someone called out in a mocking tone of voice that set your nerves on edge. You stopped, hand on your holster.

Távio gritted his teeth and turned his head. "I'm busy, Moore."

"Oh, they got you babysitting now? Sure you're up for that?" You stiffened as a pale lanky man, maybe in his mid-thirties, sidled up to Távio. He had a buzzcut and was also in standard uniform. He flashed you a sharp smile. "Oh, Agent Strike, didn't see you there. You look better out of uniform." He gave you a onceover, smirking in a way you didn't like one little bit.

"Guess you were too enamored with Maeda Vargas." You stared at him flatly, forcing your hands to relax.

"Just showing the kid the ropes," he said, not quite sneering at you, but close. "He needs a more experienced agent to show him how things work. You know, one who doesn't hide behind her boss."

You could hear Távio's sharp intake of breath. You smiled serenely, because you'd been here many times before, just never with witnesses. It took half a second to transfer all the bags to your right hand.

Still smiling, you leaned in, your left hand resting on Moore's shoulder. You squeezed lightly, and he winced.

"That's so kind of you," you said, voice oh so soft. "I'm really looking forward to seeing what kind of things you can teach a promising young agent such as Maeda Vargas. In fact, I'll make a point to check in with you both, regularly, Moore." You bared your teeth in a facsimile of a smile, your faces inches apart, your eyes locked on his. His pupils dilated. Your metal fingers tightened around his shoulder, the bones creaking under pressure.

Moore's eyes widened briefly, his teeth clenched. "You-

"I do appreciate good agents who know how to go above and beyond. That sense of personal responsibility will take you far. Keep up the hard work." You smiled viciously, not moving your hand.

"Look bit-"

"Ms. Strike," Kseniya said, clearing her throat. "We're going to be late to see Uncle Gabriel. Mom says he hates that."

'It's fine, Zinnia dear," you said cheerfully, not looking away from Moore. "He'll understand that we had to stop and have a nice little talk with Agent Moore."

"I don't know, Ms. Strike," Kseniya put just enough hesitance in her voice. "You guys seemed kind of serious. And Dad says Uncle Gabriel shoots first, and asks questions later. That's a figure of speech, right? It isn't it true, is it?" There was a tiny bit of fear infused in her voice and you had to smother a smirk. She was Tataryn's kid all right. Had the acting and the manipulation down pat.

Moore paled, having clearly forgotten about the kid. Who was apparently as clever as her shifty father. You however, had remembered both her and Athena, hence the polite language. But you'd been even more conscious of Athena's cameras, your body blocking her line of sight, or at least the view of your hand on Moore's shoulder.

"Of course not. It's just a very militant idiom," you said with exaggerated sweetness. "And we were just having a pleasant talk, weren't we Agent Moore?"

"Yes, ma'am," Moore exhaled slowly, your left hand gradually releasing him.

"We'll have to do it again some time, won't we?"

"That...won't be necessary, ma'am." Moore smiled weakly at Kseniya. "We were just...joking around little missy. Nothing to bother your uncle about."

"I don't know...if we're late, I'm not taking the blame," she said, eyes big and worried.
"Uh...I had better go then-" Moore said, backing up slowly.

"Be seeing you," you said, not losing your smile, and waving as he all but ran down the hallway.

"You get all that Athena?" You asked, as you handed Távio and Kseniya a box of macarons. He opened it, and offered them to her first. They both looked too young to be here.

"Affirmative, Agent Strike," Athena said, sounding a tad too smug for a "machine." You didn't think Távio and Kseniya noticed, but they were both sharper than you expected. You'd have to remind Athena to be more careful.

"Smoothly done," you told Kseniya. "That was just the right amount of innocence. You have finesse."

"Ta- I mean, dad taught me some things," she said, with a shrug. Though you didn't miss the pleased smile she had as she took a pistachio macaron. "What would you have done if I hadn't said anything?"

You maintained a polite smile. "I would have scolded him, and the sheer moral weight of my words would have had him begging for forgiveness."

Távio snorted.

"You would have made him mad enough to fight you." Kseniya gave you a serious look.

You shrugged. "Normally, I try to deescalate. But since he's been bothering Távio, I figured I'd see how far he'd try to push things." You didn't look at the junior agent. "Blackwatch likes to deal with its own problems, you know."

"...Dad says you shouldn't try to get into fights," Kseniya said.

You just laughed, because that wasn't a moral prescription. You and Tataryn were of the same school of thought. If you were facing someone head-on, you were doing it wrong.

"You're right," you said. "But that one came to me. Anyway, it's a good thing you spoke up," you said. "If he swung, I would have had to drop the cakes, and then they might get smashed. The horror!"

Kseniya giggled. "You bought some pretty fancy desserts."

"I know, and I want them to stay pretty until I get to eat them."

Távio looked like he wanted to ask questions, and then thought better of it. Above his pay grade after all. He slunk along beside you, looking troubled. You stopped outside Gabriel's door and knocked. You had access, of course. But Kseniya and Távio didn't possess those clearances and you didn't need to them to walk into anything classified.

"Commander Reyes is currently...occupied," Athena said, after a minute. "He'll get the door when he is able to."
You groaned, wondering what Isha had done now. Sighing, you set your bags down and began sorting through your desserts. There was a whole fraisier to split with your Blackwatch friends, along with boxes of assorted tarts, éclairs, and madeleines. And no, you hadn't gotten the strawberry cake just because it was Hanzo's favorite. You never got to try a slice on that day you got stabbed in Lucerne. And that haunted you. It had been such a beautiful creation: almond genoise cake soaked in brandy, layered with mousseline cream and fresh strawberries, and topped with marzipan and more strawberries. Even Hanzo had wanted seconds. This time, you were definitely getting a slice, albeit from a different bakery. You'd also picked up peanut butter cookies for Winston, two cinnamon pear rum babas for Gabriel, and chocolate croissants for Jack. Those gifts were individually boxed, for their own safety. You kept them in a separate bag as well.

"Are we having a party?" Kseniya asked, looking down at her clothes.

"No, I just got...carried away," you said, not sounding defensive at all. "I hope you can help me eat some of this."

"I can help," Távio said quickly.

"Yeah, go for it," you said, sending a message to Vo. Kseniya wanted to meet her after all. You also reminded Winston that you were dropping in.

The door opened, and Gabriel stood there with Isha in her harness, tucked against his chest. He had a firm grip on her, and you smiled as she trilled at you. Gabriel shot you a wry look. He glanced between Kseniya and Távio.

"Uncle Gabriel," Kseniya stared openly at Isha. As did Távio. "What is that?"

Isha chattered at the child, then at you about the child. You had no idea what she was trying to say, but she didn't seem upset with Gabriel. You weren't sure the reverse was true.

"That is now Agent Strike's problem," Gabriel said, handing her off to you. He didn't look angry though. "She chewed a hole in the couch, tried to eat my shoes, and disappeared Genji's third favorite scarf."

You sighed. "Here you go, Gabriel," you said, passing him the box of rum babas, soaked heavily in real rum.

"Look at her trying to buy my forgiveness," Gabriel said to Kseniya. He glanced inside the box. "And it just might work. Well, come on in. How's school?"

Isha trilled, annoyed that you weren't looking at her.

Kseniya glanced at you and Isha.

"I'll be with you in a moment," you said. "Need to calm the murderbird."

Kseniya nodded, still eyeing Isha. Gabriel just gave a bark of laughter and closed the door.

"Your bird has teeth," Távio said, after a moment.

You got out a strawberry éclair for her, carefully breaking it into bite-sized pieces. She was growing fast. She'd doubled in size since you brought her home, and her feathers were starting to come in, with hints of colors besides black. She was losing her baby teeth too, so she was chewing through everything like a vicious puppy. You'd given her ice, popsicles, bones, and even antlers, with only some relief. Jesse got you a heavy duty rubber dog toy, one you could fill with treats, and that was holding up for now.

You sat down on the floor, Isha on your lap, her leash in one hand. She looked between Távio and the dessert, obviously torn about which one she should be focusing on.

"Távio," you said, pointing to him. "He's safe. Probably."

Isha chirped, not quite greeting him, but acknowledging his existence, before delicately taking the pastry from you and then cramming it into her mouth.

"Not too much," you said, patting her head. "All that sugar is bad for you."

Távio gave you an incredulous look. Like you didn't know all that sugar was bad for you too. You just didn't care. "I'd heard you'd gotten an...unusual pet, but..." He crouched down. "She has hands, ma'am. And teeth. Where did you even find her?"

"The official story is I found her on an op. We bonded." You winked at him. "You're not cleared for the rest of it."

"Ma'am," he saluted, eyes widening.

You handed him a piece of éclair. "Do you want to feed her?"

"Sure. Uh...does she bite?"

"Yes." You rubbed her chest and she chirped. "But she's not going to bite you, right?"

Isha gave a long slow blink and opened her mouth, holding it open possibly so Távio could admire her teeth. Or be intimidated by them. You weren't sure.

"Good girl," Távio said slowly, offering the piece of pastry. "Please don't bite me."

Isha delicately took the dessert in her mouth, and then used her little hands to hold onto it while she chewed.

"May I pet her?"

"I think she'll let you," you said, because feeding her normally won some measure of civility from her. At least for a little while.

Távio reached out with one hand and rubbed the top of her head. Isha didn't react. She just finished off the rest of her food and then headbutted your stomach.

"No more," you said, eating the rest. "Don't want you to get sick." Not that she'd thrown any of her food up yet, but there was a first time for everything.

Isha grumbled, but stayed on your lap, nuzzling your hand. You petted her slowly, letting her lick the pastry cream off your fingers.

"How long as Moore been bothering you?" You asked as Távio gaped at your baby velociraptor.

"I...umm...It's nothing severe, ma'am. I appreciate you intervening but I can handle him."

You raised a brow. "I didn't ask if you could handle him, agent. I asked how long he's been bothering you."
Távio swallowed, tugging at his collar. "...Since I got out of the infirmary. Nothing bad, just makes shitty comments, knocks stuff around, always stops short of a real fight. Kids stuff, ma'am. Honestly, it's just embarrassing. I can take him in a fight, if it comes to that. And it's just him. Everyone else knows he's an ass. They think he's jealous of the attention I got, which is stupid, because...well, who wants to be the sole survivor of their squad?"

You smiled thinly at that. "Who, indeed?"

Távio stared at his knees. "I mean, it beats not surviving," He rubbed the back of his neck. "But you know what I mean. Bastions and OR-14s, those give me some pause. Moore is just a washed up bastard. I'm keeping my head down, because I'm trying to qualify for a good post. That's all. I'm not scared of him, ma'am."

You nodded. "OK, but you let me know if he starts anything. I mean it. I'm not going to write him up. Or send it to any CO's attention." You already knew Távio would do no such thing. But now Athena knew to keep an eye on things. If Moore didn't lay off, you'd get Jesse, Tataryn, and maybe Shoal and go have a nice talk with Moore. No, scratch that, you wouldn't invite Shoal. She had a good reputation, no sense in tarnishing it. You'd get Genji instead. Moore was a coward. It wouldn't take much persuasion.

"I uh... better get going. Thanks for everything, ma'am. It was nice to meet you, Isha." He stared at her for a few seconds too long, and she cocked her head to the side, chirping at him.

"Wave "bye" to Távio," you said.

Isha flapped one wing, then looked at you expectantly. You sighed and gave her a macaron. She happily bit into it, getting crumbs all over your lap.

Távio stared and then slowly waved back, mind obviously blown by your little murderbird waving her little hand at him.

Chapter End Notes

It's been a stressful week. I survived Saturday, chipped a tooth, and cleaned my room. I just had way too much stuff crammed in the small bedroom and so I spent 6 hours moving shit around and now I have a floor again. It's kind of nice. Not looking forward to my dentist visit later this week.

Cat is in the early stages of kidney disease. We're going to put him on prescription food and some meds, and hopefully that will prolong his life/keep the quality good. Have to do all my dogs' booster shots this week. So it's $$$ kind of month. >.< I can handle it, but just thinking about it makes me go DJKLFjkdjkfdjkdfl. Adulting is hard. But when you have pets, you have a responsibility to take care of them. Even if you're cleaning your room, and you've put Shepard the Eternal Dining Room Pooper in his kennel, and all of a sudden you smell poop, and you leave your room to find that Shepard is coming down the hall, because he broke out of his kennel, just to go poop in your dining room, even though you had him outside for like 20 minutes and he didn't go then.

He's a dick.
Hope everyone's week is good!
Chapter 84

Maybe small children aren't as bad as you remember. At least compared to your coworkers.

You knocked once and then carried Isha and the bags of desserts into the office. Kseniya sat in a chair across from Gabriel's desk, while he sat on the desk listening to her talk about science.

You let Isha perch on your shoulder, though she was getting a little too big for it now. She stared at Kseniya with obvious fascination, and you realized she had never seen a child before.

"...And so, obviously, with the manus, the teeth, and the sickle-shaped claw, Isha is a dinosaur. Probably a dromaeosaur, more specifically a raptor."

Gabriel threw his head back and laughed, hands on his knees.

You sighed.

Kseniya turned around, her expression very serious. "That's not a bird, Ms. Strike. That's a dinosaur."

"Dinosaurs are extinct," Gabriel said, his smile easy. His box of desserts sat unopened on the desk. "Have you eaten anything besides sugar?" He looked at you.

"...Yes," you said. "I had coffee."

Gabriel shook his head, a mildly exasperated smile on his lips. "What about you Kseniya?"

"I had a balanced breakfast of pancakes, eggs, and melon balls," she said. "And I wasn't done talking about your dinosaur."

"It's Agent Strike's dinosaur," Gabriel said wryly. "I was just trying to litter box train her. But then she took to dustbathing in the litter. I think wood chips might be a better choice."

You noticed the uncovered litter box in the corner of the office. When had he picked that up? You'd been putting newspaper down and trying to get her to use that. She got the idea, but the application wasn't quite there yet. Maybe the box would work better. It would be easier to clean.

"How did you get a dinosaur?" Kseniya asked solemnly.

"That's actually classified," you said. "But I've been passing her off as a mutant bird."

"So there's a lab that's reengineered them?" Kseniya asked. "Because she's really tame. I don't think you caught her in the wild."
"...I didn't catch her," you said. "Do you want to pet her?"

"Does she bite?"

Gabriel laughed. "Yes. But we're working on that. Did she bite Maeda Vargas?"

"Of course not," you said.

Gabriel shook his head, looking a little disappointed. He offered Kseniya some of the dried mutton you'd started buying for Isha and Bandit.

You gently picked Isha up and placed her on Gabriel's lap. She chirped at him and he rubbed her chest. Though Jack spoiled her more, Gabriel kept her busy with training, and she seemed to like that just as much.

"No biting. Kseniya is safe," Gabriel said. "You have to be polite."

Isha watched the girl with narrow eyes.

"No biting," you said.

Isha glanced up at you and chortled her impatience. She knew that already. You didn't need to keep saying it. You just rolled your eyes. Just because your murderbird knew how she was supposed to behave didn't mean she would actually do it.

"Hello Isha," Kseniya said gravely. "It's nice to meet you."

Isha cocked her head to the side and chirped.

Kseniya held out the entire jerky strip.

Isha took it in her mouth and dragged it back to Gabriel's lap. It was bigger than the portions you normally gave her. She dropped it on his thigh and then grabbed it with one foot, holding on tight while she bit chunks off.

"She'll use her hands if you give her smaller pieces," you said.

"This is amazing too," Kseniya said, watching her with big eyes. "Does she hunt?"

"No, but that's because I don't let her. She's fast enough and she has the instincts." You thought about her chasing rabbits or squirrels on the grounds and shook your head. That could go bad very quickly. You began to stash the cakes in the fridge, shooting Gabriel dirty looks when he grinned at them covetously. Or at least that's how it looked to you.

"There's milk in the fridge if you want any," Gabriel said.

"Yes, please," Kseniya nodded enthusiastically.

You grabbed the carton and poured her a mug, and handed it to her, not missing how Isha raised her head, bobbing it side to side, trying to figure out what you'd given the girl. Rolling your eyes, you poured her a tiny bit in a saucer and set it on Gabriel's desk.

"You're spoiling her," Gabriel said, without any real heat.

"That's Jack. I'm just seeing if she likes milk."
When you looked back up, it was gone and she was eyeing Kseniya's mug.

"So how's school?" Gabriel crossed his arms.

Kseniya straightened up, her posture so proper, it hurt to look at. She set her mug on the desk, and folded her hands in her lap. "Not a lot of changes, sir. Emilia Bartalotti seems to be using her visitations at the school as an excuse to meet with Evgenia Volskaya. Their sons haven't noticed, but the relationship is...more than friendship." Her voice wavered, her embarrassment clear.

You blinked and sat down on your desk, giving Gabriel a hard look.

"Interesting," Gabriel said, not looking at you. "I thought it was going in that direction, but I appreciate the confirmation."

"I have the recordings," Kseniya said, opening her backpack and handing Gabriel a data chip.

"That's fine work," Gabriel said, giving her a warm smile.

You gritted your teeth, a little shocked by what you were hearing. Which was stupid, because you'd done some bad things, but you'd never used a child as an agent.

Kseniya nodded. "The chemistry teacher, Mr. Patterson, has accumulated an alarming amount of gambling debt. I don't think the security officers have picked up on it yet. He likes online gaming too much. I'm not sure if he's been compromised yet."

Gabriel nodded. "I'll look into it."

"Sanjay Korpal is sucking up to the Belgian princesses. And I don't think it's just because they're kind of pretty. His mother was in, making a big deal about his chances of attaining a high position in the family business."

Was Sanjay related to Vikram? Did the family business mean Vishkar Industries? You frowned, partially at the puzzle pieces, partially because it was an eight year old that was the source.

"Good job, Kseniya," Gabriel said. "You just used the recording devices, right? No heroics? No listening at keyholes?"

"I maintained "plausible deniability," sir." She didn't trip over the words and you rubbed your forehead. "I know I can't afford to draw any attention to myself or do anything that will endanger my cover."

"...Gabriel," you said, voice oddly high. "Can I talk to you?"

"In a moment," Gabriel said. He grinned at Kseniya. "I told you she wouldn't be happy." He picked up Isha, who'd been drinking out of Kseniya's mug while the three of you were focused on other things.

You crossed your arms as Gabriel approached your desk, looking very amused.

"Is something wrong?" His voice was low and teasing.

"She's eight, Gabriel," you scowled.
"I know," he said, patting your shoulder. "How old were you when you first killed a man?"

You flinched. Because the answer was simple: too young. "It's not the same."

"You know Tataryn had...reasons for leaving his old lifestyle," Gabriel said. "He and her mother taught her this...observational skillset early on, because people don't suspect children. It was an essential survival skill, and partially the reason she's alive today."

"That doesn't mean you should-"

"Tataryn and I have both run the risk assessment and found the likelihood of discovery to be minimal. After all that fussing, do you really think he would let us put her in danger?"

"Tataryn has questionable judgment," you said, sourly.

"It's low-risk, big payoff," Gabriel said. "We're getting primary-sourced HUMINT, that's digitally-backed up, and she handles it like a pro."

Eavesdropping wasn't all she learned, judging by her quick intervention with Moore. You glanced over at the girl who was watching you both with big eyes.

"I volunteered for this," she said forcefully. "Uncle Gabriel didn't ask me to do this or even make any hints toward it. Honest."

You glanced at Gabriel and he gave you a wry smile. "Yeah, I'm a bastard, but I'm not that much of a bastard."

"I know Tato is out there doing dangerous things. And if any of this intel can help him, or just make him just a little safer, then it's worth it. If I get caught, I can talk my way out of it. But I'm a quiet kid and a good student. The risk isn't bad." She shrugged. "At worst, I get expelled. But I'm not in real danger,"

"...Some of the people you mentioned would kill to protect their names," you said, recalling what happened to Vikram Korpal. "It doesn't matter that you're a kid."

"It's a Swiss boarding school," Gabriel said. "An expensive one at that. And we're not without allies, are we?" He had the audacity to wink at Kseniya.

"I'm nice; people trust me," Kseniya said with a nod. "Also, I have a discrete bodyguard on site," she added quickly, noticing the look on your face. "To my classmates, I'm just a good listener with a big snack stash."

It was more than that. Kseniya was smart, coming off as meek when the situation required it. "Manipulative" sounded very negative, but she knew how to read the situation and how to act accordingly. "...You're mentoring another prodigy, aren't you?" You sighed, giving Gabriel a weary look.

"I would love to take credit for Kseniya's skills, but that goes to her parents." Gabriel laughed at your expression. "It's all right. I know that feeling. That is precisely how I looked when she and Tataryn approached me about getting her into the Institut Montana."

You massaged your forehead. "Don't tell me Lacroix knows about her. No wait, of course he does. Goddamnit, Gabriel."

"Mr. Lacroix offered me a job. I declined. He is welcome to pass questions through Uncle Gabriel, of course, but I need to keep up with my schoolwork too,” Kseniya said with utmost sincerity.

"She's got you beat there," Gabriel laughed, patting Isha's head. She nuzzled his stomach, and you didn't miss how he slipped her another strip of dried meat. "At least she was smart enough to turn him down."

You just sighed and took an almond cream tart and poured yourself more coffee. You couldn't deny that at all.

Athena's fish torpedo hovered outside the door. Kseniya had her backpack on, and she had fastidiously wiped the milk and pastry crumbs off her face. You had Isha on your shoulder, her leash strapped to your belt. Gabriel had passed her along, saying he needed to get real work done.

You had a pet, an AI, and a child in tow. You took a moment then to reevaluate your life decisions. How had it come to this? It sounded like a joke, and the punch line was your life.

"Do you want help carrying those?" Kseniya asked.

You almost declined, but you weren't sure how Vo would react to Isha today. The last few encounters hadn't gone so smoothly with Vo yelling at your murderbird and Isha shrieking right back. So you handed Kseniya the dessert bag. She handled it carefully, watching Isha out of the corner of her eye.

"You and Uncle Gabriel get along really well," Kseniya said.

"We better. I spend a third of my on-duty time in the office with him," you said, keeping your voice low. "It'd be miserable if we hated each other."

"Then you're friends?" She asked, perking up.

You nodded. "Yes." This relationship was built on a solid friendship. You valued that as much as the passion and the sex.

"I'm glad he has friends close by," she said, watching your face. "When I first came here, he seemed...angrier. Not at me. He's always been nice to me. Probably because I'm a kid."

You nodded, keeping your expression politely neutral. You weren't sure if she was fishing or if she was just sharing her thoughts. "It's a hard job."

"Lonely," she said. "At least, I think it is. Tato is always keeping secrets. I...understand why. I suppose Uncle Gabriel has even more."

You scratched Isha's head, listening to her coo as she nibbled on your ear. "Maybe," you said, because Tataryn was a shifty character. "It's part of the life."

"Isn't it exhausting?" Kseniya asked, her words subdued.

"Of course," you said. "But you learn to live with it, and eventually you just start to keep things close to your chest." So much so that maybe people forgot how to be honest and open.
"Wouldn't it be better just...not to live like that?"

You shrugged. "Habit. The longer you do something, the easier it is to keep doing it. Even if it's bad."

"I'm not sure that's "habit." That sounds like a combination of inertia and laziness," Kseniya said crossing her arms.

"Think that's the definition of habit," you said with a laugh. "I'm guessing you have some concerns about your Tato." You weren't sure why you brought it up. It really wasn't your business. Except this eight year old prodigy sounded so damn depressed when she mentioned her father's secretiveness.

"He drinks too much." Kseniya wasn't looking at you.

"...Sometimes," you said. "But I haven't seen him drunk since before Malik's funeral."

Kseniya nodded. "He never visits me drunk. But I know he still drinks. He's says it's part of his culture."

You shrugged, not really wanting to talk about Tataryn's bad behavior when under the influence.

"Is it also part of the job?"

"Most of the time, no. Can you imagine Gabriel's reaction if one of his subordinates showed up drunk to an op?"

Kseniya smiled involuntarily. "I meant unofficially."

"Yeah," you said, after a moment. "There's a drinking culture here." Especially after funerals. "I mean, some of us do it more than others. It's a coping mechanism, but not a great one. Not long term anyway." Gabriel would look the other way occasionally, but no one wanted to go on an op with someone who couldn't function.

"Does he have friends?"

"Yes," you said. "He plays the fool very often, and sometimes he's a scoundrel, but he has friends. People like him."

She smiled. "That's good. I worry about him getting lonely. Do you like him?"

"That's complicated," you laughed. "Most of the time I have to control my urge to slap him. But I guess so."

"You do, or you wouldn't be escorting me around," she said. "Even if you did lose a round of cards, or Monopoly, or whatever games you play in Blackwatch."

You smiled wryly. "Yeah, OK. But don't tell him I said that. His ego is big enough."

"Our secret," Kseniya said. She looked up at you. "Like the fact Isha is not a bird."

"These are badly-kept secrets," you said with a laugh.

"I'm just a kid," Kseniya giggled. "What's your excuse? You're a secret agent!"
Shaking your head, you led her down the corridor toward your dormitory. You stopped in front of Vo's door and knocked. There was silence. She hadn't answered any of your messages, but she wasn't listed as off-site either.

"Vo, I have desserts," you called out.

There was a shuffling sound and you rolled your eyes. Of course.

The door opened a crack.

You held out a small fruit tart filled with pastry cream and covered with berries. "Hey, we have a visitor-

"Je n'aime pas ton oiseau," Vo scowled, looking up at Isha. She was in oversized Blackwatch sweats, as usual, and not wearing shoes. She snatched the tart out of your hand, *"Pas de mordant!"

Isha screeched at her, and you weren't sure if it was actual malice or if she was just shouting along with the drama.

"Ce n'est pas un oiseau, c'est un dinosaure," Kseniya said, her accent very Parisian. What exactly had her early childhood been like? This wasn't the first time you had wondered about that.

"Hey, weren't you keeping that a secret?" Not that it mattered. Vo didn't exactly go around talking to people.

"Tato trusts Ms. Vo," the girl said, admittedly looking a little chagrined.

Vo squinted at Isha. "...Is that true?" She took a bite out of the tart, not looking at it. You were just glad you'd gotten some fruit in her today.

You sighed. "Yes."

"Bad bird is not a bird?" The tart was half gone.

"Yes," you agreed.

"Dinosaur?" Vo's voice went high with incredulity. The tart was down to one bite.

"Yes. She's a terrible bird, but a pretty good dinosaur. And no bombs. The commander is very fond of her. I am very fond of her."

Vo mulled that over, finished her tart, then held her hand out. "No bombs," she repeated sullenly. You gave her another fruit tart.

Isha eyed the dessert.

"No," you said, tugging on her leash. "That's not for you."

Vo glowered at your murderbird and stuck the pastry behind her back. "Mine."

"Here," you said, giving her the third tart. "We just wanted to come by and say "hi." Brought you some of these. We'll have strawberry cake with Hanzo later, OK?"

Vo didn't answer, she was now studying Kseniya. Vo was barely a few inches taller than Kseniya, but decades older.

"You're Fedya's daughter," she said, and it was official, there were no secrets in Blackwatch. Everyone knew everyone else's business, no matter how classified it was. Everyone probably knew you were schtupping Jack and Gabriel, and you were the only person dumb enough to think it was a secret. Why did you even bother trying to be discrete?

"Yes, he brought me the glitter poppers you made," Kseniya said enthusiastically. "They're amazing. Thank you."

OK, Tataryn had already informed Vo of his daughter's existence and given her some description. That made you feel a tiny bit better.

Vo looked at you. "Fedya know you bring her here?"

"He's the one who told me to do it!" You threw your hands up in frustration and Isha squawked, slipping and digging her talons into your shoulder for stability. Swearing you pressed her against your chest, knowing that if you tried to remove her, she'd just grip harder. You'd learned that the hard way.

"No bad words in front of her," Vo said solemnly.

You gave a pained grimace as Isha relaxed and you held her against your chest, no longer willing to let her perch on your gouged shoulder. Isha just nipped your fingers, not liking the restrictions.

"Well, we need to be going now," you said. "Because my shirt's ripped and I'm bleeding."

Vo's eyes darted between you and Isha.

"Bad bird. Good dinosaur." And even if her expression was flat, and her voice monotone, you swore she was laughing at you.

You cleaned up in your quarters, sticking Isha in her kennel; it was a nice kennel with soft blankets, a water bottle, toys, and two levels: she didn't care. She screeched her displeasure at you, but you pulled your shirt down, showing off the bloody punctures. "No clawing," you said.

She squawked louder, too outraged to reason with. Shaking your head, you just went to the bathroom to clean and dress the wounds. They weren't deep, but infection and lectures from Angela were still hassles that you didn't want to deal with. You changed shirts, somewhat annoyed that Isha had torn up your civilian clothes.

When you came out, Kseniya was staring at your bear.

"It was a gift," you said. "Reinhardt got it for me when I was laid up in the infirmary." You opened your door. "Let's go visit Winston, shall we?"

Isha sulked in her kennel, not looking at you.

"Do you want to come, murderbird?"
She just burrowed into a blanket, ignoring you. Kseniya smothered a giggle.

You rolled your eyes and shut the door carefully, waiting to see if she'd throw a fit. There was only silence. She probably needed a nap anyway.

You and Kseniya walked down the corridor, Athena floating behind you.

"You don't have any pictures of your family," Kseniya said after a moment.

"...I don't have anything," you said. "It all burned when I was young...and there's no one to send replacements."

"Oh." Kseniya got quieter. "I'm sorry."

"Nothing to apologize for," you said, with a shrug. "I've been told numerous times that my decorating could use some work."

Kseniya didn't laugh. "My mother is dead too," she said, after a few minutes.

"That's rough," you said, though you weren't exactly surprised. You figured she was either dead or had abandoned them.

"He's still in love with her," she said sadly. And you wondered if that was true, or if that was a convenient fiction that Tataryn let her believe. It was hard to say either way. You'd misjudged him before. You certainly weren't going to share that skepticism with his daughter.

"You don't stop loving someone just because they're gone," you said after a moment. "And it isn't like after six months or a year, you're automatically all better and it stops hurting."

Kseniya blinked. "I...guess. I have pictures. I remember some stuff. Sometimes I miss her. But it was a long time ago, and its more...there's a hole where she should be, but I don't feel the way he does. Her being dead doesn't affect me like it affects him. Does that make me bad?"

"No." You exhaled. Kids handled trauma differently, you knew that much. In fact, you suspected they were a lot more resilient than adults. Whether they just forgot what happened, or they were able to bounce back just because they didn't quite grasp the magnitude of death, you weren't sure. "Everyone deals with grief in their own way. Maybe you were too young to really process it, and maybe you'll be able to go through life without any lingering issues. Maybe you'll wake up in a week heartbroken because it finally hit you."

Kseniya did not look relieved by this. But you knew from experience there was no way to make grief fun or comfortable. And it wasn't meant to be. So you just walked with her, waiting for her to speak.

You made it all the way to Winston's lab in silence.

"Do you want to take a minute or two?" You asked.

"No, I'm fine," she said, straightening up. "Sorry, I didn't mean to-"

"Nothing to apologize for," you said, inputting your key code. The security doors opened, and you blinked when you saw Lacroix and Ziv arguing in hushed tones right by the door.

"That's not an option! I know you're not as hapless as Reinhardt, but it won't fucking work like that! Come up with a new idea!"
"Ziv, it's only partial-" Gérard was using his explanatory tones, like he was talking to a small child, though come to think of it, you'd never seen him speak to a small child. That might change in a moment.

"She's not like the ones you've worked with before, Gérard. You can't just reprogram her-" Ziv scowled. "And she remembers everything! We have to be careful! You can't just wipe her memory either! Who's the goddamn expert here? Here's a hint: not you!"

Huh, you'd never seen Ziv lose his temper with Lacroix before, and it was kind of nice to see all that vitriol and chutzpah directed at the spymaster. More specifically, it was nice to see Lacroix getting the same Ziv-induced headache expression that you were so familiar with.

"All right. Give me a better definition of her parameters then," Lacroix said, glancing at you. "I will consider what if any modifications can be made then. Also, we have company, so perhaps you could restrain yourself, mon chou."

You wrinkled your nose. Did he really just...

"Don't you start that! I am not a cabbage or a cream puff!" Ziv tried to scowl, looking more flustered than angry.

"We can come back later," you said loudly, not actually meaning it.

Kseniya covered her mouth.

"Fuck you and your- Oh." Ziv stopped mid-sentence, finally noticing Kseniya. "Ben-zona, where did you get the kid?" He squinted at her. "Isn't Maeda Vargas bad enough? Do you have baby fever or something?"

You slowly drew a line across your throat, shaking your head at your idiot hacker.

Lacroix sighed. "Please excuse, Agent Mihret's outburst, Mademoiselle Zinnia. I am working on improving his social graces. Chanceux hasn't had much luck, despite her clumsy, but earnest efforts. I, however, have a more experienced hand. Look at how well-behaved she is now."

You and Ziv both gave Lacroix a sharp sideways look.

Kseniya just extended her hand. "Please to meet you, Mr. Mihret."

"Yeah, uh, sure," Ziv said, sticking his hand out awkwardly, his panicked gaze falling on you. "You can call me Ziv."

"OK," she said brightly, and you raised a brow. "Nice to meet you, Ziv. You can call me Zinnia. Earlier, she'd been a stickler about titles with Távio and maybe she was just messing with him. Now, she was doing the opposite with Ziv, and you wondered if that's because she was trying to make him comfortable.

"Winston's expecting us," you said.

"Oh," Ziv said. "Yeah, he's in the back fine-tuning some more drone prototypes." He gave Lacroix another dirty look, and a part of your heart finally relaxed, because Ziv wasn't going to let Lacroix walk all over him and while it seemed like a silly worry now, you had been really concerned before...

"Are those éclairs, Chanceux?" Lacroix asked, glancing at your bag.
"Peanut butter cookies, for Winston," you said. "But...I might have bought some of those coffee éclairs that you like and a whole fraisier for later. I guess you can have some if Amélie comes along."

Lacroix smiled slyly at you. "I see Mademoiselle Zinnia has been a good influence on you, Chanceux."

"Oh no, Ms. Strike has been a very gracious hostess," Kseniya said, with an alarming amount of sincerity.

Lacroix's smarmy little smile widened, and you could have sworn your saw his mustache curl smugly. Was that even physically possible? "I have heard that her attitude has improved greatly, even from our Shambali friend. I am so very proud of your progress, Chanceux."

You discretely raised your middle fingers while Kseniya was looking in the other direction. "Why are you still here? Don't you have nefarious plots to mastermind? Fair maidens to lock in towers? Plucky orphans to crush?"

"I am taking a sanity day," he said cheerfully. "But I think since you're conducting a guided tour, I might come along. I can't think of anything better to do."

"I think Isha might have eaten all the coffee éclairs already," you said darkly. "And if she hasn't yet, she might soon."

Lacroix just grinned at you, making no move to leave. "Your "murderbird" is quite the little operator. Amélie is very charmed."

"Amélie likes mean pretty things," Ziv said with a sigh. Apparently, he was aware that he fit that category. Isha liked Amélie and Ziv. More surprisingly, she liked Lacroix too, though you weren't exactly sure why. You hadn't actually told her that he was "safe." Maybe he was slipping her treats on the side.

"Greetings, Lucky!" Winston called out. "I'll be there in a moment! So very sorry! I just have to replace this power source and we'll be all set!"

"So Jack says you wanted to place Maeda Vargas with Chang," Lacroix said casually. "Are you sure that's a good idea?"

"What are the drawbacks?" You asked, straightening up. "It's a combat squad, her unit is fairly professional and equipped to train him, and she's exactly the kind of leader he'll respond to. He needs someone who will push him hard and not give him room to bullshit. I want him for Blackwatch, but he needs more training and experience before I bring him in."

"Chang is the opposite of subtle," Lacroix said. "But you're right, he does need a more well-rounded education." He gave you a faint smile. "It's interesting that right now you have him assigned to Reinhardt."

"I didn't do anything," you said blandly. "He's outside my chain of command."

Lacroix's smile widened, and it was obvious he didn't buy your story at all. "D'accord."

"Why are you doing it? I know you have a soft spot for the kid," Ziv said rather begrudgingly, like he was completely unaware of the soft spot you had for him. "And he isn't totally hopeless. But I thought you delegated that task to Tataryn. Did that sneaky bastard weasel out of it?" Ziv demanded, voice rising. "That's just like him." Ziv's hands curled into fists. "Ben-zona, Lucky, he always does this to you. Remember the trainees? That was his penal duty and yet you did most of the work! All those incidents with Vo? He's her CO. He should be the one handling her messes. That Ukrainian gigolo is just shirking-

You put a hand over Ziv's mouth, unable to bring yourself to look at Kseniya's face. Fuck. "Discretion, please," you hissed.

"Oh you know it's true!" Ziv pushed your hand away, eyes defiant.

Lacroix sighed and shook his head. "You didn't brief him, did you?"

"I was asked not to." And to be fair, you hadn't expected to expose any child to Ziv. But that was a critical oversight on your part. His office was in Winston's lab, after all. In terms of geographical proximity, he was right where you needed to be.

"It's OK," Kseniya said serenely, her smile vapid. You were starting to recognize her "I'm uncomfortable but can't show it" expression, though you weren't sure how much damage Ziv's words had done. "Cursing doesn't bother me."

Lacroix coughed warningly at Ziv and your hacker shut up. "You know, Mademoiselle Zinnia, you would of course be an asset to our R&D department," Lacroix said with a small bow. "But are you sure I can't convince you to join Chanceux and Ziv on my taskforce? You would bring a refreshing amount of maturity to the team."

"Sorry," Ziv grumbled, though you were pretty sure he didn't know exactly what he was apologizing for. "I get carried away sometimes. But Lucky's an idiot and she needs people to watch out for her."

You sighed, shaking your head. That was still a shit apology, but it was better than before.

Kseniya's smile then reminded you of Tataryn's politest mask. It was the closest she'd resembled him. "Make me a better offer this time, Mr. Lacroix and I'll consider it."

Lacroix laughed, and you wondered what offer he had made last time.

"Sorry about the wait!" Winston ambled over, adjusting his Overwatch blue tie with silver fleur de lis accents.

"Is that new?" You asked, eager to change the subject.

"Oh this? Yes! A gift from Ziv," he said, brow furrowing. "Does it look...bad? I uh, don't have a full suit in my size but Commander Wilhelm has referred me to his tailor. I'm...not sure that is wise."

"No, it's a good color," you said, because it was true. "And you do you. I think you'd look great in a suit. Or a dress. Whatever you want to wear."

Winston chuckled. "And you must be Ms. Zinnia." He extended his hand. It was borderline alarming to see her tiny hand covered by his. "Your suggestions for increasing the tensile strength of the minisub collector nets were quite innovative. I should have considered using the modified spider silk fibers in a hexagonal weave. I know they're mostly used in ballistic armor, but with some tweaking-"

You felt your eyes start to glaze over. Quickly you handed Winston the box of peanut butter cookies.
"Oh, Lucky. You didn't have to," he said, even as he plucked them out of your hand. "They smell delicious." He delicately took one and ate it slowly, taking care not to get crumbs anywhere. "And they are delicious."

"But the tech cloth wouldn't work?" Kseniya asked.

"Absorbs too much water and doesn't function properly at those depths. We're still tweaking its ability handle that amount of pressure.

You glanced at Lacroix, who was whispering in Ziv's ear. You knew precisely the moment when he revealed Kseniya's identity, because Ziv's shoulders slumped and he groaned, resting his face in his hand. Later on, he'd bitch about the fact you hadn't warned him, but honestly, everyone knew Ziv's mouth got him into buckets of trouble.

Lacroix patted his back, winking at you.

You gave him a reluctant smile, and wondered if you should offer him one of the Gitanes in your bag.

The rest of the visit went smoothly. You had dinner with Jesse, Bandit, and Isha. Your baby raptor had taken her nap, and while she'd shredded one of her blankets, she was in a better mood when you returned to the room. She seemed to like Winston, especially his fur, but it was probably better that you didn't carry her around his lab with all the breakable things.

Several Blackwatch agents flitted by your table, and you cut your friends slices of the fraisier. It was as good as it looked. Even Hanzo showed up, ignoring everyone except Bandit, whom he fed chunks of beef stew. Isha watched him shrewdly, but didn't approach. You still cut Hanzo a large slice of cake. Genji slipped Isha some chicken nuggets and you rolled your eyes.

"Sorry about Ziv," you told Kseniya on the way back. "He uh...he talks a lot of shit."

"...I know how Tato can be," she said, hanging her head. "I uh...I'm sorry if you got caught up in one of his...schemes."

"There's nothing for you to apologize for." You decided to preempt her too insightful questions. "I agreed to do this as a favor for him, sure. But it's been a nice change of pace and while he can be extremely underhanded, we are friends. Making sure you aren't alone on day like this is something friends do."

Kseniya smiled wanly. "He's really bad at honesty."

"...He has a funny relationship with the truth," you said after a moment.

"You're not in love with him, right?" She asked, looking worried. "That's not why you agreed to this, is it?"

You rolled your eyes. "I am definitely not in love with him. I am not entirely sure I like him most of the time. He's kind of like Ziv to me, you know a friend, but also a pain in the ass. Only Ziv gets a pass because I knew his grandmother."
She nodded. "I wouldn't mind if you were...with him." She bit her lip. "But after my mom died..." She stared at the floor. "He's had...special friends, but..." She trailed off, obviously conflicted about speaking ill of her father.

"There's someone else in my life," you said gently. "Maybe if I'd met your father at a different point..." Unlikely, because as good-looking as Tataryn was, he was still an infuriating weasel. "But no. I'm very happy with what I have. I don't think your father and I would have been a good match."

"He's not really my father," she mumbled.

You blinked at that. Wait a minute. "I...do I need to break his knees? Or worse?"

"No, I didn't mean it like that!" She shook her head, eyes panicked. "I just meant, I've looked at the timeline. And the mirror. I'm pretty sure he came into my mom's life after I was born. I don't know who my biological father is. But it's not him."

You shrugged. "OK?"

"He takes care of me because he loved my mom. He doesn't come see me very often because I remind him of her and he can't handle that." Kseniya's voice was very soft and you rested a hand on her shoulder. "I'm just an obligation." She wiped her face. "I don't mean to sound ungrateful, Ms. Strike. Please don't tell him I said that."

You took a deep breath, because damnit, this wasn't part of your job description. You didn't know how to talk to kids about their wayward parents. All you could do was be reasonably honest, balance that response with compassion, and hope for the best.

"On the day before Malik's funeral, your dad came to me a complete wreck."

She winced. And you realized you should have worded that differently. Still, even you knew better than to go into detail.

"He was sobering up, grieving, and exhausted. So I cooked him breakfast and talked some sense into him." You smiled slightly at the memory. "I made him crepes, and he covered them in sugar, Nutella, and preserves. Lots of sweet stuff. I asked him why, because to be honest, it looked like too much, and that's saying something coming from me."

Kseniya bit her lip.

"He told me it was how you liked them. And eating them that way made him think of you. It...made him happier. He was much better after that," you said. "Did he get it wrong?"

"For your visit, he made me extensive lists of what kind of food you like, what I shouldn't give you because it's too high in sugar, and reminders that if you were sticking with vegetarianism, I had to read the ingredients lists for all the foods you were going to try, because some things contain gelatin instead of agar and gelatin comes from animals."

"You ignored the sugar limit," Kseniya said.

"Well, it was stupid." You shrugged. "If he wanted to police your food, he could come here and do it himself. I'm not being the bad guy. And besides, that would be amazingly hypocritical of me. Can you imagine? Me saying, "Oh no, you can't have any more dessert. That's too much sugar!" while I crammed giant slices of cake into my mouth?"

Kseniya cracked a crooked smile.

"What I'm saying is that I don't know about his trauma and his reasoning. I know nothing about your genetics, and that's really a conversation you should have with him when you're ready. But I'm telling you it doesn't matter if he's the sperm donor or not, because that man does love you, even if he's bad at showing it. You're not just an obligation."

The tiny girl looked up at you with damp eyes, her hair still in the adorable little puffs, pastry crumbs on the collar of her shirt. "Do you really think that?" Hope quavering in her voice, eyes so trusting it hurt to look at her.

"Yeah, I really do," you said, and were relieved to find that you weren't lying. You were still going to chew Tataryn out after this.

---

Gabriel was waiting for you by the check out counter of the motor pool, dressed down in jeans and skintight black t-shirt that looked painted on his chest. You blinked, a little surprised to see him. An Athena fish torpedo hovered beside Kseniya, and was probably how he knew your exact location.

"Care if I ride along?" He asked, giving you a wolfish grin, eyes full of mischief.

"I don't know." You raised a brow, nudging Kseniya. "Do you him to come with us?"

Kseniya nodded vigorously. "Yes," she brightened. "Uncle Gabriel is actually a lot more fun than he looks."

"Is that so?" You asked, giving Gabriel a mock skeptical frown. "Could have fooled me."

Gabriel shook his head at you, an edge in his smile. "Do you see what I have to put up with? I'm the victim here."

Kseniya giggled, one hand over her mouth.

"I heard you had that big strawberry cake at dinner and you didn't even save me any," he continued, eyes wounded.

"I bought you your own rum babas," you said, rolling your eyes. "And don't tell me you didn't help yourself to the éclairs."

"Those were some nice little cakes you brought me," he said, sauntering alongside you both. "Think we can get more of them?"

"Not tonight," you said. "Bakery's closed."

"That's a shame," he said. "Maybe we could go out for ice cream? My treat?"

"What do you think?" You asked Kseniya, though you knew you'd still have to be careful.
"I like ice cream," she said.

"Good," Gabriel winked at her. "I can't be friends with people who don't."

You rolled your eyes. "Where's Isha?" You had left her with him after dinner, thinking he was going to go back to his room to decompress.

"Got that blonde sitter she likes," Gabriel said casually. "Last I saw they were snuggling on the couch and she was eating his dinner off his plate."

You snorted. She really hammed it up for Jack, acting extra babyish and cuddly when he was around. And he adored it.

Kseniya and Athena climbed into the back of the armored car while Gabriel took the passenger seat. You grinned, slightly surprised that he hadn't tried to take the keys.

"Do you usually make Ms. Strike drive you around for ice cream?"

"Nope," he said, watching her buckle up. "But I should."

Shaking your head, you asked Athena to map the route to an ice cream parlor.

Chapter End Notes

Been stressed and sick this week. Just drained and queasy. Took a day off work and slept. Feeling a little better, but still meh.

Internet keeps farting out. Have a service call set for Sunday. Was informed that if the fault is on my end, they'll charge me $99 for repairs. I have AT&T. I wish I didn't.

Dentist visit was OK. Have two fillings with cavities UNDERNEATH them, so I have to get them removed and refilled. Other than that, they said if I chipped a tooth, it was small enough that it'll be OK. I actually liked the new dentist's office, but it was staffed entirely by perky 20-30 something blonde women. Which was kind of strange. The receptionist was in her early twenties. The tech was probably late twenties. The dentist was late twenties to mid thirties. Everyone had nice makeup, long eyelashes, and jewelry, and they were all pretty and super friendly. It felt like the Stepford Wives Dental version. I'm still like "was any of that real, or just a fever dream?"

Cat seems to be eating his RX food with no problem and vacuuming down his pill in the process. We'll see how he does. Dogs are all needy cuddlemonsters.
Chapter 85

Chapter Summary

The things you do to keep your lovers happy: milkshakes, Ainsley, and other boundaries.

Chapter Notes

Jasmine4tea shared a sketch of Lucky!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was past her curfew when you and Gabriel walked Kseniya back to her dorm, and you made sure to leave the rest of the macarons with her. Just to spite Tataryn. Gabriel had bought her a massive ice cream sundae the size of her head, and you all knew she couldn't finish it. But she’d tried and he had snapped before and after pictures, possibly also to spite Tataryn.

Gabriel had ordered Jack a chocolate malt and had gotten himself a four scoop ice cream cone with complete with four different flavors, whipped cream, and a cherry on top. He’d managed not to spill it, eating it too fast and then went on to help Kseniya finish off her sundae and take more pictures. He ended up loudly complaining of an ice cream headache for the entire ride back to the school.

Kseniya gave Gabriel a hug, though she barely came up to his waist. You blinked as she whirled and wrapped her arms around you, squeezing you quickly. "Thanks for the day out," she said. "I had a lot of fun."

"You're welcome. I did too," you said, not just because it was polite. "I'd do it again, if you father doesn't ban me for stuffing you full of sugar and letting you meet Ziv."

"You did what?" Gabriel groaned.

"I didn't mean to," you muttered and Kseniya laughed. "He was there in the lab, and she wanted to visit Winston."

Gabriel muttered something unflattering about gorillas, and you sighed. Kseniya just smiled, because she thought he was kidding. "I'll have a word with Korhonen later about your teacher issue. That's their chief of security," Gabriel told you.

"Do you want me to handle it?" You asked, smiling wryly at Kseniya.

"...Is that a good idea?" She looked to Gabriel.

"Well, we'll see you on Family Day," Gabriel told her, with a wink. Like you weren't going to notice how he dodged that question. "I think Lucky will have an entire group to escort. Should be interesting." He seemed rather pleased by this and you sighed, not quite looking forward to being at the center of things, but realizing that it could be a whole lot worse. You could be alone watching everyone else have fun.

Goodbyes said, you walked back to the car in comfortable silence, the Athena drone waiting in the car.

"You can logoff, Athena," Gabriel said, shooting you a sidelong look. "We'll take it from here."

"Acknowledged, Commander. Drive safely, Lucky."

"Something on your mind?" You asked as you pulled out of the parking lot.

"Thinking about how fun it would be to neck in the backseat with you," he said leaning over and nipping your shoulder.

Your breath caught. "Gabriel!"

"Tinted windows, spacious backseat, and we have the rest of the night off..." His voice dropped an octave. "We can do more if you like-"

"This car is signed out in my name," you said, shaking your head. "I'm not taking it back with suspicious stains."

"We can just make out," he said, his grin wicked and you didn't quite believe him.

"Jack's shake is going to melt."

"Don't give a shit," Gabriel purred, hand on your knee. "I'm more interested in seeing you melt, hermosa. I just want to play with you a little. I'll make it worth your while..." He nuzzled your cheek, his skin hot against yours.

You bit your lip, heat coursing through your core. "I'll find a place to park."

---

You moved the drone to the floor. Gabriel put his seat down and you crawled into the back, a little breathless as you rubbed against him, his mouth on your throat. He licked and sucked, not caring that he was going to leave marks. You slipped your hands under his shirt, fingers skimming the chest.

He groaned as you flicked your tongue against his ear, his hands squeezing your thighs.

"What spurred this? Feeling old?" You teased. "Trying to recapture your glory days of fumbling around the backseat?"

Gabriel laughed, cupping your breasts. "No, just got tired of waiting," he growled in your ear. "You looked so damn cute fussing over those kids today. Been wanting to jump you since you showed up at my office door." You almost said Távio wasn't a damn kid, but realized it wasn't worth quibbling over.

"You just...like me out of uniform," you moaned as he ran a thumb across your lips.
"I like you, whatever you're wearing, or not wearing," he murmured, kissing you hungrily. He still tasted like chocolate and sweetness, and you clung to him, riding his powerfully muscled thigh. "But this is pretty."

"Goddamnit," you hissed and began to pull your shirt off.

"No, chica. Need to leave your clothes on if you don't want to return this car with suspicious stains." Gabriel chuckled as he wrapped an arm around you and you swore louder.

"Damnit, Gabriel! You're the worst!" You snarled, frustration leaving you light-headed. You rubbed against him, the friction of his denim-covered thigh giving you some relief.

"I'm suffering too," he growled in your ear. "Because right now, I can't think of anything I'd rather do than tear those pants off you and fuck you raw. Bet we could make the car rock."

"Or flip over," you stroked his face, watching him clench his teeth. "So our clothes have to stay on, huh? What if I just make you come in your pants?" You traced the outline of his cock through his jeans, your thumb rubbing the tip. "You'll have to make it back from the motor pool with-"

Gabriel yanked back on your hair, sinking his teeth into the base of your neck. You cried out, hips moving faster as you bucked your hips, rutting against him. He moved with you bouncing you on his thigh.

"Look at you. I don't think I'm going to be the one coming in their pants-" He pulled your shirt down, stretching the collar, his mouth moving from your collarbones, down to your breasts. His hands kneaded your ass, the extra stimulation tightening your already strained muscles. The sensation of his finger tips stroking against the outline of your slit ratcheted up the tension. The air grew warmer, and your world narrowed to the confines of the backseat. All you heard was his heavy breathing and your own sharp gasps as he touched you. All you could focus on was Gabriel's body against yours, the warmth of his hand, and the pleasure escalating as you ground against him. You were too wound up to pretend you were unaffected.

"That's it, baby," he said voice, deep and rough. "You're close. I can feel you shaking," he coaxed. "Let me see you come undone. Then we can go home, strip you down, and I'll fill you with all the cum you've earned today-" He held you against him with one arm, his free hand snaking between your thighs to put pressure on your clit while you rubbed against him faster. "However you want it, corazon, I'll give it to you. And then it'll be Jack's turn. He's going to be so sorry he missed this."

You whined as you came, your pussy painfully empty as you clung to Gabriel, your ass shaking as the rhythmic spasms rippled through your core.

Laughing softly, he kissed your forehead while you panted against him. "No suspicious stains in the car."

"Counteroffer," you growled, hand latching onto his cock as you leaned forward and bit his lower lip. He stiffened underneath you. You gripped him hard, massaging the head through the rough denim. You could practically feel him pulsing against your palm.

"Hermosa-" Gabriel's eyes widened and he gritted his teeth.

"I'm going to make you come in your pants, because that's just fair." You flashed him a mean smile. "And then we can go home and jump poor unsuspecting Jack. Put him between us, and I don't know, give him the same treatment till he's a mewling wreck, maybe mess up his coat a little, and then fuck him into next week." You thought about reaching down Gabriel's pants, and finishing him that way, but frankly, you wanted to get him off through his clothes.

"You brat-" Gabriel groaned, head thrown back. You rubbed faster, hoping the denim didn't chafe him too much, because you were pretty sure he wasn't wearing underwear.

"Come on, papi." You licked your lips. "Jack can clean you up when we get home. You know how much he loves it when we get messy. He can choke on you while I get him all stretched out for you." You flexed your ring finger, and it began to hum.

Swearing, Gabriel ground against your hand, burying his face in your shoulder as he writhed beneath you. It was a heady rush, feeling all that barely constrained muscle tensing under you. He dug his fingers into your hips and a dark spot slowly appeared on his jeans.

"You filthy woman," Gabriel sighed, pressing a kiss to your throat. "Have you been wearing that all day?"

"Nah, swapped it out at the ice cream parlor," you said. "Figured you'd try something sexy. Are you complaining?"

"...You are going to pay for that," Gabriel said, shaking his head.

"I was just returning the favor, baby." You kissed his sweaty brow.

Grumbling, Gabriel took a napkin to his crotch, shooting you a dirty look, those dark eyes smoldering. You ran your fingers through his curls, not fooled by his gruffness.

"I love you," you said, kissing him pouty mouth.

"You better," he said, severity melting away as he cupped your face.

Laughing you offered him a sip of Jack's melted milkshake. You'd have to stop and get another one on the way home.

It took a little work, but you got yourself presentable before you got out of the car, with a whole carrier of milkshakes. You had red marks along your neck and you knew there would be bruises on your hips later. The red marks you could blame on Isha, maybe. If they didn't look so much like hard kisses.

There was a damp spot on Gabriel's pants, and he took the milkshakes as an excuse. You let him go in first. You'd catch up in a minute. Less gossip that way. Jack's quarters were the closest and you followed Gabriel at a safe distance, trying to see if anyone noticed his crotch.

Fortunately, because it was evening, there wasn't much foot traffic, and the two of you reached Jack's room without incident.

Gabriel shook his head at your pleased expression. Both of you went in, finding the lights dimmed. You kicked off your shoes and headed for the bedroom. Jack lay face up in the bed, shirtless. His eyes were closed and it looked like he was asleep, a small smile on his lips. Isha lay on his pillow, curled up in a little ball, her snout touching his hair. She looked bigger than earlier today. And were those more feathers? Also, she totally wasn't allowed in the bed.

You sighed, shaking your head.

Gabriel stopped beside you, exhaled slowly and set the tray of milkshakes down on the dresser beside Jack's puzzlebox.

You both sat down on either side of the sleeping man.

"You're not fooling anyone, Jackie," Gabriel said, amusement clear in his voice.

Oh yeah. He's wasn't fooling anyone. Nope. You had definitely not been fooled.

Jack opened one eye, giving you both a sheepish grin. "Oh come on, weren't you going to try to kiss me awake at least?" He tugged on your hand and pulled you onto his chest. "Missed you, sweetheart." He nuzzled your neck. "Isha do that?"

"Nope," Gabriel said smugly.

Jack's eyes narrowed. "I thought you were babysitting today."

"I was. Took the kid back and then Gabriel wanted to make out in the backseat. But don't worry, we talked about you quite a bit," you said, running your hands down his chest. "Think you'll enjoy what we planned."

Isha yawned, her chirping as she opened her eyes.

"Mmm, but first we should put her away. Thought we agreed not to let her sleep in the bed, Jack," Gabriel said.

"I was lonely. Missing my boyfriend and my girlfriend who were apparently out having fun in the backseat of a company car," he said plaintively, the corners of his mouth turned down. But his blue eyes twinkled, not that either of you were fooled by his forlorn act.

You picked up your raptor and kissed her head, before carrying her over to her kennel and putting a blanket over it.

When you turned around, Gabriel already had Jack pinned to the bed, his pants around his knees.

"I just want you to know that I planned on putting Lucky's sneaky ass between us, till I saw that you'd let the damn dinosaur in our bed," Gabriel said gruffly. "You silly son of a bitch."

"Love you too, babe," Jack choked out, kissing Gabriel's fingers. "And you as well, sweetheart-"

Smiling, you began to undress.

The three of you lay on top of the covers, Jack in the middle, all of you slurping away at your melted milkshakes. Jack rested his sweaty head against your chest.

"Haven't seen much of you lately," he said.

"Been busy," you said. "You can always come down to our office."

"Been busy too," he said, wrapping one arm around your waist. "Can't always get away. Miss having you come visit me."

You felt a pang of guilt. Because maybe you had been avoiding Jack's office too. And maybe Ainsley was the reason. "I."

"I know you don't like Ainsley, and I know it wasn't fair of me to invite her back, but I swear she isn't as bad as she used to be. She's not even trying to flirt with me any more, honest." He kissed your cheek. "Not that you ever had anything to worry about..."

"Poor Jack, all alone in that office with Ainsley, abandoned by his girlfriend," Gabriel laughed.

"Sorry," you said sullenly, and gave Gabriel a dirty look. He just winked at you, pressing a kiss over Jack's heart. "I'll bring you lunch tomorrow. How's that sound?" You leaned over and kissed his forehead.

Jack closed his eyes, smiling happily as he finished his chocolate shake. "Sounds great. It'll be even better if I get to see you more often."

"I'll try: it wasn't quite a conscious thing," you said with a heavy sigh.

"Sorry," you repeated, stroking his hair.

"And you can bring Isha," he said, running hand over your bruised thighs. "Gabe too, if he's free."

Gabriel gave a wry laugh. "Fat chance. I have a slew of agent post-mission reviews to go over tomorrow. You're on your own, Lucky."

"Probably better that way," you said. "Between Isha and Gabriel, there won't be any food left for you."

Grinning slyly at Isha, you packed the meat loaf glazed in bulldog sauce, smoked cheddar mashed potatoes, and kale salad in airtight containers, wrapped them in insulated bags, and placed them in your briefcase. If anyone walked in on you right now they'd think you insane. You also packed to large slices of lemon meringue pie, and carefully shut the case. It was completely full of food.

Isha chirped excitedly. You briefly wondered if you were giving her the wrong impression about briefcases, then decided it didn't matter because you rarely used them. Adjusting your collar, you let Isha climb onto your shoulder, and latch onto the reinforced holster straps you'd started wearing over your clothes. Because those claws had to dig into something.
You had a regular, if large lunchbox packed for Gabriel, and you dropped that off first. He was out, so you set it on his desk, and made your way to the Overwatch offices.

"You have to stay," you told your murderbird, giving her leash a light tug. "Stay." You knocked once, then keyed in your code.

Ainsley sat her small desk, which now sat against the wall where your work chairs had been. She looked up as you entered, her soft blue eyes widening comically as she recognized you. She'd cut her hair into a perky bob, that looked pretty, feminine, and utterly stylish on her. She was tanner than before, probably from lounging around private beaches, but she was still wearing one of those baby blue skirt suits you'd come to loathe, her makeup soft and perfect, her familiar poise that of an old money socialite.

"Welcome back, Ms. Petras," you said with nod, keeping your face business-like, your voice calm. It was almost like you didn't care that she had returned. You could be a smooth operator when you had to be.

"A-agent Strike," she stuttered, probably remembering how you'd stabbed a man to death in front of her. She couldn't stop crying after the rescue, and her hysterical shrieks had gone straight through your skull. It was a miracle you hadn't finished that op with a migraine. "It's good to see you again," she said, a tense smile on her face.

"Strike Commander," you said, glancing over at Jack who was at his desk pretending like he wasn't watching. "I have the items you requested, sir." You raised the briefcase.

"I'm sorry to interrupt, Agent Strike. What is that on your shoulder?" Ainsley voice went higher with each word, her hands gripping the edge of her desk with white-knuckled panic.

"This is Ishana," you said, reaching up and scratching Isha's head. Isha made a soft inquiring thrum, though she too pretended to ignore Ainsley, watching her closely out of the corner of her eye. You were very glad she didn't just run to Jack and start being cuddly. It would make her less intimidating. "I picked her up on an op. The details are need to know."

"Is she...dangerous?" Ainsley shot a panicked look at Jack, who seemed most absorbed in his tablet at this moment.

"Don't try to take her food or grab her," you said blandly.

"The labs have done the workup and deemed it safe to let Agent Strike keep the beast," Jack said, not looking up.

Isha made a snorting sound, looking put off by the fact Jack hadn't come to fuss over her yet.

Ainsley drew back, one hand posed dramatically on her chest.

"Is she...dangerous?" Ainsley shot a panicked look at Jack, who seemed most absorbed in his tablet at this moment.

"Don't try to take her food or grab her," you said blandly.

"The labs have done the workup and deemed it safe to let Agent Strike keep the beast," Jack said, not looking up.

Isha made a snorting sound, looking put off by the fact Jack hadn't come to fuss over her yet.

Ainsley drew back, one hand posed dramatically on her chest.

"Isha, Ms. Petras is a bystander, behave." You chucked her under the chin and she narrowed her eyes, her thrumming growing louder. You had three classifications of people: safe, bystander, and hostile. If you'd been thinking clearly, you would have used technical terms like "ally" or "friendly." Gabriel complained briefly about your terminology, but back in the Feng's laboratory dining room, you hadn't really been thinking tactically. Isha understood the terms though, or so Gabriel said. He was giving her some kind of modified security dog training. "Bystander" meant she had to be polite, but that was all. She wasn't expected to be friendly and she didn't have to let them near her.
"Ainsley, I have to discuss some sensitive information with Strike," Jack said, his tone flat, impatient, and all business. He didn't even look at you. But he held his chin at that infuriatingly imperious angle, his gaze cool. You wanted to punch him then kiss him. Maybe while Ainsley looked on. "Why don't you take a long lunch? Maybe catch up with some of your friends."

You wondered then if Ainsley had friends here, or if she'd just snobbed her way through the masses, only focused on bagging herself The Jack Morrison for her trophy husband.

Ainsley bit her lip. "Oh, of course, sir. Thank you." She picked up her purse and gave Isha a long, somewhat frightened look. ".I'll be back later," she said and quickly marched out the door, giving you and Isha several backwards glances before the door shut.

"Athena, route all oncoming traffic through the "do not disturb" protocols and lock my door. I'll verbally disengage after we're done."

"Understood, sir." Was it your imagination or did Athena sound just a little salty? You'd have to talk to her later.

Jack rubbed his forehead, then stood, took off his coat, and came around the desk. He stared at you, the corners of his mouth gradually rising, his brow softening. "You're so harsh," he said, voice gentle. "I am sorry if you didn't want to come-"

"You're not the only one who can act, Jack," you said, with a smirk. "We can't go giving your mole the right impression about us."

Jack laughed, relief widening his smile. He sat down on the desk and leaned forward, giving you a soft kiss, while he rubbed your shoulders. "I thought you were bringing lunch. Did you have other plans, baby?" He gave your murderbird a questioning glance.

"I brought Isha," you said, rolling your eyes. "You can get him now, Isha."

Chirping, she jumped off your shoulder and onto his lap, cooing happily while he rubbed her feathered head. "I'm not going to eat Isha," he said, rolling his eyes. "Do I need to bribe Rein to bring us something?"

Laughing, you set the briefcase on his desk and opened it up, enjoying his silly grin as you unpacked a full meal instead of work documents and office supplies.

"Brings a whole new meaning to business lunch," he said.

"Don't you start," you said, jabbing a finger at his chest.

"I guess this is going to be a case of keeping those jokes brief," he said innocently.

You groaned. "I'll eat all this food by myself."

Isha trilled, giving you a worried look.

"Well of course, I'll share it with you, murderbird. But Jack won't get a bite."

Isha looked at Jack warily. If Jack didn't get food, he couldn't spoil her with all the good tidbits.

"You know, a brief case should be full of briefs, so by that logic you should strip off your-"

Isha squawked then, drowning out his punch line.
You opened up the containers of food, smiling at your baby raptor as you cut her a large slice off Jack's portion of the meatloaf.

After lunch, you took Isha back to your room and she went into her kennel, crawling into her nest of torn up blankets for a post-meal nap. Jack had overfed her, of course, sneaking her bits of meat and potatoes, and giving her his pie crust. Her tail feathers were starting to fill out, and while her body remained a shiny downy black, her tail was showing traces of iridescent green. If Isha was solid black with no accents, she'd still be the most beautiful murderbird in the world - Gabriel and Jack would completely agree with you - but something told you that AI Zheng wasn't going to settle for such a basic palette.

With your murderbird secured, you headed back out to the office.

"-no excuse for this level of incompetence, Acosta." Gabriel's volume rose, each word popping with barely constrained fury. "I can't even address you as "agent," because that brings shame to the dozens of people under me who will never reach your level of absolute tomfuckery."

Agent Acosta shrunk down, his eyes glued to the floor. He made no move to defend himself, because this time he really had screwed the pooch. He'd been on an extraction mission in a restaurant, and bagged a waiter instead of the target. They'd made it all the way back to base with the wrong guy. The target had since gone to ground and the waiter was understandably traumatized, if none the wiser about who abducted him.

Swearing, Gabriel launched into a rant in Spanish, and you felt a slight pang of sympathy for Acosta who was getting it with both barrels in two languages.

Shaking your head, you walked around him and sat at your desk, noting that Gabriel's lunch sat on the floor untouched.

You picked up your tablet and focused on collating the latest batch of Shit Spiders mission debriefings. They were backed up, but you combed through them, gleaning little details and compiling notes and updating reports. It was tedious work, at least compared to shooting people out of hotel windows, but you liked putting the puzzle pieces together and getting a clearer picture of the situation.

Lacroix wanted just the two of you on a short run this weekend, and you sighed, knowing you might have to find someone to dino-sit. You weren't sure if Jack and Gabriel would be available either.

"Denied," Gabriel said, raising his voice.

You looked up, a little surprised to see Diallo standing there, gnawing on her lower lip as she faced Gabriel.

Acosta was gone, and you'd tuned out most of that meeting. You hadn't even heard Diallo come in. Maybe it was unwise of her to meet with him now. You'd seen Gabriel shred agents before, and to be honest, it could be very uncomfortable to watch. And usually if someone got him that upset, he'd be in a mood for several hours afterward.

"Sir, the circumstances have changed, and I think this is a viable option. Agent Tataryn does as well. He just hasn't submitted the paperwork yet, but it should be done before he returns from Oslo. We'll have a more concrete proposal later, but we need to postpone or cancel the current."

"What part of "denied" are you having trouble understanding?" Gabriel growled, obviously still in a bad mood from dealing with Acosta. You checked his status, and found him to be suspended without pay, with a transfer to Antarctica pending.

Shaking your head, you pulled up one of the more important Shit Spiders memos: Nguyen had been spotted at a very exclusive winery, having a friendly chat with Petras. That was alarming, if only because while they were both traitors with Talon-backed agendas, they were also political rivals and had thus far only given each the barest amount of cooperation.

"Sir, something important has come up," you said, keeping your voice even and disinterested.

Gabriel's head to snapped the side, and he glared in your direction without really looking at you.

"It's compartmentalized intel," you continued, giving Diallo a meaningful look.

She blinked at you, one brow raised. "I'll get out of your hair then," she said, saluting Gabriel. She left quickly, but not before you saw the relieved look on her face.

Gabriel's frown deepened as he scanned through the report. "Yeah, it's alarming, but there's not a fucking thing here, except a few shitty photos. Did that really warrant interrupting my meeting?"

You got up, picked up the lunchbox, and put it on the desk. "Your lunch is now cold. I know Acosta is a certified dumbfuck, but Lacroix is monitoring the potential fallout and I've tasked the Shimadas to see if they can pick up the actual target's trail."

Gabriel narrowed his eyes at you, finally twigging that you'd chased Diallo out for his own good. "You're pushing-"

"I wouldn't waste time on Diallo. We both know she's just standing in for Tataryn. Wait on his amended proposal," you said lightly. Because there was nothing to be gained from arguing with her and you didn't really want him to take out his frustration on her. She was a good agent, and he'd feel bad about it later. She was just the messenger, taking the heat because Tataryn was off-site and she was acting as his proxy.

"This isn't your business," he said, tone harsh.

You smiled, not taking the bait. "You know he probably just sent her here to pitch the idea and get shot down, so he could polish his argument, sweep in like he didn't know what transpired between the two of you, and try a different tactic for the same result."

Gabriel took a deep breath. "Lucky-"

"Please eat your lunch," you said, sitting down in a chair in front of his desk. "I'll see if Genji and Hanzo are available if you need to expel. Jesse's on an op, and Jack's got some visiting dignitaries to entertain."

Gabriel took another deep breath, closing his eyes and massaging his brow. You would rub his shoulders, except you weren't entirely sure that would be welcome right now. Part of you wanted to be silly or accommodating, anything to dispel the anger and lighten the mood. It was very uncomfortable to be around him when he was like this, all harsh words, violent thoughts, and sharp anxious energy. Another part of you was tempted to pick a fight; it wouldn't take much to get him going. Then he could get it all out of his system and the two of you could have rough makeup sex afterward.

Jack did everything he could to distract people from their anger or fan the flames so it would choke itself out. Jack didn't like his lovers to be angry for very long, not that that was necessarily a bad thing.

You didn't mind anger as much. Getting mad wasn't a bad thing; losing control was the real problem. Using anger as an excuse for bad behavior was unacceptable. But the feeling itself wasn't innately problematic. And even when Gabriel made you uncomfortable, you trusted his control. Sometimes a person just had to get angry and ride it out, perhaps away from everyone else. And, you realized, it was important that Gabriel knew that you weren't afraid of him when he was like this and that he was allowed to be angry around you.

You took the lid off the lunchbox, and got up to make him some coffee.

"Want me out of your hair?" You asked, after you set his coffee mug on the desk beside him. "I've got some business with Lacroix, anyway."

"You're so meddlesome," he scowled, not opening his eyes.

"Yup, but I've got good intentions and I'm respecting your boundaries. So hopefully that wins me some reprieve," you said.

Gabriel slowly opened his eyes, not looking at you. "Yes, go ahead and see if the Shimadas are free, give me a timeframe, and then you're clear to go needle Gérard." He gave you a wry look. "I'm not going to be good company for awhile."

"I'll stay if you want," you said.

"No, it's fine. I need the space," Gabriel said without any rancor.

"Want me to cancel the rest of your meetings for the day?"

"No, I can do it," he said, waving you off. He picked up a fork, wrinkling his nose. "Is this...meatloaf? Really?" His scowl deepened and he gave you a look that would freeze any other agent in their tracks.

Rolling your eyes, you laughed, then set up the sparring session for Gabriel with the Shimadas and left him to his own grumpy devices.

Isha curled up in her cage, though it was getting kind of cramped. That could be from all the toys and blankets Jack had jammed inside, but you doubted it. She was growing fast. Jack and Gabriel were going to need bigger cages for Isha soon, because even though she was slowly learning not to destroy things, you didn't trust her unsupervised yet. Especially not in your lovers' rooms where they had actual nice things with sentimental value. Isha lay flopped over on a stuffed dog - Jack had bought it for her, along with a little vest that totally did not fit. But it was a good effort. You placed a blanket over the cage.

Yawning, you stretched out in Jack's bed, wearing one of his t-shirts. You'd gone from Gabriel's office, to Lacroix's office, and then you went back to your room for Isha and a shower. Now you could finally relax, though you mentally kept running through contingency plans for your upcoming mission with Lacroix.

The actual op with Lacroix would only take a few hours, but you'd spent that long arguing over the details, especially when you saw where you were going. There would be a considerable amount of mission prep required, mostly in the disguise department. And Lacroix wouldn't listen to your requests to change the location: he was dead set on this. And it didn't matter if you didn't want to go, this is your job, you are, shockingly, the agent best suited for the task. Stop being such a child. Sulking is unbecoming, Chanceux.

You suspected his choice was at least partially to irritate you.

You pushed for a third close-range combat-trained agent. Amélie was formidable, but her presence wouldn't work on this op and Ziv would be even more useless. You'd suggested Jesse or Tataryn, if only because Genji and Hanzo were too recognizable. Lacroix bitched about the annoyance of inserting a third agent this late in the game. Too bad. There were too many things that could go wrong, and after Shanghai Noon, all of you knew that Lacroix couldn't make public appearances, even in disguise, without the threat of assassination. And he had chosen a rather public venue.

So it was a compromise. You had to go along and play by Lacroix's rules, but you were getting backup and you were going to have Amélie "help" you with the some of the details, without Lacroix hovering over your shoulder. No, it wasn't a win, but it was the best outcome you could realistically expect.

You rolled over, somewhat annoyed that you were still thinking about work. Jack would be in late tonight and you suspected you wouldn't see Gabriel till tomorrow. Shutting your eyes, you took a deep breath, and willed yourself to sleep.

The next thing you knew, the door creaked and you opened one eye, your hand slipping under the pillow for your tanto.

Gabriel slunk in and sat down beside you, in a clean hoodie and shorts. He was on the edge of the bed, hands at his sides, his expression uncertain.

"Hey," you said, voice rough with sleep.

"Hey," he said. "Didn't mean to wake you."

"Not a big deal." You reached over and patted his thigh. "You OK?"

"Better now," he murmured, leaning over to kiss your cheek. "Sorry about earlier."

"It's OK." You yawned, rubbing your eyes. "I'm used to your grumpiness. It's nothing new."

Gabriel frowned, shadows giving his brows an ominous cast. He looked so terribly severe.

You couldn't keep a straight face. Giggling, you patted his cheek. "I'm kidding." You stretched, arms raised over your head "We all have bad days. You weren't fun, sure, but you don't have to be, not all the time." You certainly weren't. "It's fine. You didn't cross any lines. And I didn't choose Jack's room because I was avoiding you. You asked for space, so I figured you'd come find me when you were ready."

Gabriel smiled then, and reclined beside you, tugging your hands in between his. "Did you have a fun meeting with Lacroix?"

"No, but I guess it was productive," you scowled. "I'll be out of town this weekend for Operation Gift Horse. Hopefully it'll just be Saturday and then I'm home, but there's room for delays on this one."

"I can watch Isha," Gabriel said, kissing your knuckles, his legs tangled with yours. "Want to do some more training with her anyway. Before Jack spoils her too much."

"You're the best." You kissed his cheek.

"I am," he agreed.

"I love you," you said, a little surprised by how easily it rolled off your tongue.

"Love you too." Gabriel kissed you, his lips soft against yours. He held your hands, his smile faint. "Thank you for looking out for me. I...did need to eat and expel."

You laughed. "Oh, so you did eat the terrible meatloaf?"

Gabriel rubbed the side of his neck, looking uncharacteristically sheepish. "Of course. You cooked it. And it was good, not the least bit dry, rubbery, or flavorless, despite being made for Jack. Didn't mean to belittle your cooking. Was just...in a mood."

You laughed, remembering the incredulous expression he had when he opened his lunchbox. "You looked so disappointed."

"Come on, I was having a shit day. Don't let me get started on Acosta again and all the other headaches that caused. Diallo had to come in with Tataryn's bullshit. Vo was sending me passive-aggressive messages about your dinosaur. Overwatch Barbie is camped out in Jack's office again. And then there's...meatloaf." He shrugged. "But it was good. Made the day better. Even if I didn't expect it to."

"So now I should always make you meatloaf when you're having a bad day?"

"I wouldn't go that far," Gabriel said dryly.

You just smiled he wrapped his arms around you, burying his face in your hair. He stroked your back, planting gentle kisses on your neck. You squeezed his hands, your thumb rubbing circles on his palms.

"Jack'll be home late," you said. "Why don't you get comfortable?"

"I already am," Gabriel murmured, starting to drowse.

You woke again to the familiar weight of your other lover settling on the bed. Yawning, you looked up to see Jack on his side, a tired smile on his face.

"Everything all right?" He asked, rubbing your back.
"Gabriel had a rough day," you said as Jack leaned over to kiss you.

"I know, he didn't get to have lunch with us," Jack said, sympathetically. "The meatloaf was awesome."

Gabriel snorted, but also accepted a kiss from Jack.

"Come on, Gabe." Jack scooted over, and patted the spot in the middle. The three of you repositioned yourselves, Gabriel on his back, while you and Jack each hugged a side.

"Better?" Jack asked, nuzzling Gabriel's chest.

"Yeah," Gabriel said, running his fingers through Jack's hair. He kissed your forehead, sighing in contentment.

"And we can always get Isha-"

"No, Jack," Gabriel said firmly, tightening his grip around the other man. "I've got my hands full with you two."

Jack laughed, reaching over to squeeze your arm. "Come on baby, we should vote on this-"

"Mmm," you said, yawning again. "I vote we cuddle Gabriel and go back to sleep."

"Seconded," Gabriel said.

"Aww," Jack said, not hiding his disappointment. "But she's so alone in there by herself-"

"You can go sleep on the couch with her then, Morrison," Gabriel grumbled.

"It's my bed!"

"Don't care," Gabriel grumbled, not opening his eyes. "No dinosaurs in the bed."

"Fine, maybe I will go sleep on the couch," Jack laughed.

But Gabriel tightened his hold on Jack, not letting him wiggle away.

"Gabe, I can't move-" Jack laughed, still trying to slip out.

"Mmm, that sounds like a you problem," Gabriel murmured.

"Lucky-" Jack whined.

"Go to sleep, Jack," you said, trying not to laugh.

Huffing, Jack leaned over and blew a loud raspberry on Gabriel's chest.

"You done yet?" Gabriel asked, tweaking Jack's nose. "Because we all have to be up early tomorrow."

"Mmm, I guess," Jack sighed, closing his eyes. "But just you wait. I'll get you both later...and your little murderbird too."

Chapter End Notes
Someone asked for a reference sheet. I'll try to put one together later. Writing a long mission right now (I know, finally, right?) and focusing on that.

Still super tired. Bleagh.
"Non," Amélie shook her head. "You are not wearing a suit, Chanceux. I really cannot understand this strange fixation with suits when you should be wearing dresses! There is a time and a place for suits. They are wonderful, truly, and there are many occasions you can wear them; mais ce n'est pas le moment pour ça! Gérard warned me you would try this-" She shook her head, leafing through your closet, bypassing your suits and examining your dresses, most of which she had purchased for you.

Ziv sat on your bed, playing with Isha. She'd charge up to him and he'd catch her then fling her onto your pillow. She'd tumble, flutter, and sometimes land on her feet. Then she'd run back to him and do it all over again while cheeping happily. When he thought no one was looking, he'd lift her up to his face and give her a peck on the snout.

You rubbed your forehead. "Amélie, this is an op. It'll still be formal and-"

"A woman in a suit will attract far more attention than a woman in an evening gown," she said flatly. "You can choose a shorter gown and Agent McCree can stash your gear for you, ahead of time. But you will wear a dress, and you will look beautiful, and you cannot convince me otherwise."

"I don't know about "beautiful." She'll look like she normally does: awkward and violent, just in a dress," Ziv said with a smirk.

Amélie whirled, hands on her hips, dark eyes flashing. Her face was a mask of cold fury. You took a step backward, nearly tripping over your chair. There wasn't enough space in your room to flee. "Présentez des excuses à votre soeur; immédiatement !!"

"...Sorry," Ziv croaked, and Isha crawled between the pillows and took shelter, head tucked against her body. Her wary eyes stayed on Amélie.

There was an odd silence as you processed what Amélie had just said.

Ziv stared at the floor.

"Chanceux is very lovely, and she's trying so hard to do well on this mission," Amélie continued. "And she asked for our help, Ziv. You cannot belittle her when she's putting herself in our hands."

You weren't exactly sure why Amélie kept using a plural pronoun. Yes, you'd specifically told Lacroix you wanted Amélie's advice. At no point had you invited Ziv to help you get ready. He'd just tagged along, saying he wanted to see Isha.
Ziv squirmed uncomfortably. "I uh... I didn't mean anything by it. Lucky knows she's pretty."

"Oh? Est-ce vrai? How often do you compliment her? I don't remember the last time you said something like "Oh, Chanceux, you look so nice today!" And I know you are capable of it. You always say the sweetest things to me, mon chéri."

"...That's because you always do look amazing," Ziv said, sounding a little flustered. "But Lucky never looks bad-

Amélie frowned, her pretty lips turning downward, her gaze sharpening.

"She normally looks fine," Ziv amended quickly, shooting you a panicked look. "I honestly don't notice these things most of the time. You and Gérard are just so striking," he mumbled.

Amélie's expression softened. "Chanceux is always lovely. But it is good practice for you to tell her she looks splendid, especially when she makes an effort."

You waited for the smart ass comment.

"I like the dark blue dress. The one you wore to Shanghai," Ziv said, not looking at you. "The cut is flattering, the color hides stains, and unlike the purple dress, your tits aren't hanging out. That's a win."

You snorted and Amélie just sighed, perhaps finally realizing what an ass Ziv was.

"You know, it is magnificent. And it could become damaged on this mission," Amélie said thoughtfully. "I think she needs a new dress."

"...Uh..." You glanced at Ziv halfway to Panic City; you tried to signal for some interference through willpower and eyebrow movement. You were not taking Amélie shopping. Not after last time.

"Yes, and we still have your measurements from the prior excursion. And I've been browsing some of the local shops remotely. Yes, I think I shall put an order in. They can deliver it tonight, and if there's a problem, you can return it later."

You sighed, partially in relief, partially in resignation.

"And you will need a matching shawl, some new jewelry, opera gloves..." Amélie clapped her hands together. "Oh Chanceux, do not worry. When we are done with you, I will be proud to say that I am sending you on a date with my husband!"

You winced, really hating that phrasing, and you wondered then if Operation Gift Horse was already cursed.

You rested your hand on Lacroix's arm, trying not to let on that you were steadying yourself. Amélie had insisted that you wear proper shoes - high heels - and all these stairs were not made for women in heels. To be fair, you could have taken the elevator, but you wanted to inspect the building and make sure you weren't walking into a trap.

Not that you were sure about how things were supposed to look in a goddamn opera house in Oasis.

There were intricately decorated tiles everywhere: in the walls, in the floors, and on the ceiling. Elaborate geometric tapestries hung from the walls. Calligraphy scrolls shouted at you from the walls. The goddamn Persian carpets that you were walking on were works of art. The dearth of human figures was striking, but not necessarily bad. They had spared no expense on the ornaments and your hands itched under your elbow length gloves. Surely they wouldn't miss a ceramic or two...

Everything drew the eye, and while individual pieces were exquisite, there was just too much for you to process comfortably. It wasn't actually a case of the patrons having more money than taste. It was more like the art pieces were all speaking to you simultaneously and with no volume control:

"Pick me!" Said the blue and gold starburst tapestry. "I'm beautiful, tasteful, and would look great in Jack's room!"

"No, pick me!" Cried a carved ivory dagger, its pommel bearing a jeweled lion's head. "Tataryn would be so jealous and you are so petty!"

"Come on, you know Gabriel and Isha would like me best!" A marble statuette murmured. He had the head of an eagle and the body of a man, and four sets of wings and you really weren't sure you should be filching priceless artifacts for your damn raptor, especially ones that predated the founding of Islam. For Gabriel, sure, but Isha would just eat it or do something else awful.

"It really isn't so bad, ma chérie," Lacroix said, misinterpreting your long silence, which was probably for the best. "This is actually follows a theme. You should see the replica Rococo nightmare one of Amélie's friends installed in her family home. Gilt, pomp, and curlicues everywhere." He paused, looking disgruntled. "No, actually, you should not. No one should be subjected to that kind of suffering."

"It's just very...busy," you said, testing the word. "Content overload." And you couldn't steal anything well-guarded now, not without compromising the mission.

Lacroix nodded. "I see," he said, and you wondered if he did. After all, he did like nice things. Tonight, he wore a well-tailored tuxedo with gold cufflinks and a burgundy pocket square.

You strolled through the vaulted arches of the halls, your borrowed pearl drop earrings brushing against your neck. The matching necklace had five strands, each loop longer than the next, layering pearls against your chest. You were glad Gabriel and Jack hadn't seen you in this getup. There would be dirty jokes abound.

Amélie had chosen a floor-length black chiffon wrap dress: the bodice was form-fitting, but the skirt flowed and you could easily fit your tanto and a pistol underneath. Hell, you could get your wakizashi under there too, but you were already walking uncomfortably in the heels. No sense overcomplicating things.

The two of you looked respectable enough, though he had a stupid mustache and you kept making rude faces. Your hair was up in an elaborate chignon - styled by Lacroix himself. You knew he helped Amélie do her hair, so you had just sat there in the hotel and let him fuss with the pins and product. He did a better job than you would have and you weren't sure how you felt about that.

"We have cheap seats. The view will be lacking," he said apologetically.
"I picked that area," you scowled. "Precisely because it was discrete."

"Don't make that face, Chanceux. We are just civilians looking for some culture tonight. Pretend that you're enjoying yourself."

"I'm really bad at that," you muttered.

"You don't have to feign enthusiasm," Lacroix murmured out of the corner of his mouth as you passed another couple. "One can enjoy themself with quiet dignity. Just stop looking like you're being marched off to your own execution."

"...I'm going to have to sit through someone singing in Italian, while wearing these shoes, and trying to stay awake."

"Carmen is in French," Lacroix said, sounding amused. "Though the story takes place in Spain. No Italians."

"...It sounded like Italian," you said sullenly, though to be honest you hadn't been listening that closely to the recording Amélie played. Isha had been chewing on Ziv's hair and you'd had to rescue him.

"Well, you aren't meant to understand the exact words, Chanceux," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "You are supposed to appreciate the music and the feeling behind it. The costumes. The pageantry. The passion. Opera has so many layers." He sounded like he'd given this speech before, or heard it many times.

You fought the urge to shrug sullenly. Instead you inclined your head to the side, a pleasant smile on your face. "You mean the real draw is parading around in fancy getups, broadcasting how rich and sophisticated you are to the peons...and more importantly, each other."

"Touché," Lacroix chuckled. "We can leave the auditorium without any problem. It is timing our entrance into that particular box that will be tricky. The security monitoring tech in Oasis is cutting edge. Some of it is better than what we have." That's why you hadn't brought an active Athena drone on this run. You'd left some sensors, to transmit energy fluctuations and other tech data, because you were far too ignorant of Oasis' capabilities.

"Should we, I don't know, borrow some?" You wondered aloud. Winston and Torby would probably appreciate some trade secrets.

"Easier said than done," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "Fortunately for us, many of the wealthier patrons balk at the idea of constant surveillance, so this is area is off their main CC grid; that's the only reason this has a chance at success."

"Plus I bet they can't pay their bodyguards enough to stay awake through an opera." You worked on looking happy to be here. Really, you wished you had taken up Amélie on her offer of a lacy fan, so you could flutter it, hide your mouth, and mutter mean things.

Lacroix laughed.

"See, you are learning. You can unleash your cutting remarks, just smile cordially as you do and it softens the blow." You continued to walk the perimeter of the opera house, slowly heading upward toward your seats.

There was something different about Lacroix tonight. You couldn't put your finger on it. He seemed less inclined to snipe at you, and you weren't exactly sure why. Maybe it was the fancy clothes. Those always put him in a better mood.

A terribly familiar man in a "borrowed" usher uniform showed you to your cheap seats. He had laughing brown eyes, unruly hair, and the audacity to wink at you as he handed you a playbill.

Lacroix cleared his throat in disapproval.

"Yer stuff's behind the bar in the next hall over," Jesse murmured. "I'll start scouting as soon as the curtain rises."

"I'd thank you, but I don't think we're supposed to thank the help. You have already been gifted with the opportunity to bask in our sublime presence," you said, mimicking one of Ainsley's insipid smiles.

Jesse snorted.

Lacroix just pretended like he hadn't heard you.

Even the cheap seats were nice. You sat on the plush cushions, view screens on the back of each chair, where they would stream subtitles and close ups of the performers. Lacroix sighed heavily, staring at his own screen with a frown.

It hit you then.

"You don't actually like opera, do you?" You asked in hushed tones.

Lacroix favored you with a sardonic grin. "Now Chanceux, why would you think that?"

"You really don't." You covered your mouth, trying not to laugh. "Why the secrecy? Worried about getting kicked out of the snobby arts club?"

Lacroix rolled his eyes.

"And wait, you like musicals," you said, and then promptly wondered how you knew that.

You blamed Ziv.

"Musicals are fun," he said stiffly. "I dislike opera for all the reasons you have listed and more. I respect the skill involved and can appreciate the art form, but singing every single line, instead of only performing in fits of true emotion, detracts from the experience. There are only so many melodic conversations one can have, before it becomes entirely ridiculous."

You knew the main difference between musicals and operas, besides the wage gap, was that in musicals people still had spoken dialogue. The bursts of song were momentary bits of madness. In opera, they sang all their lines like, "good morning, how are you? I'm fine, thanks for asking," which was kind of silly. Not to mention you could usually understand musicals. Operas tended to be conducted in their language of origin. But they also usually had an accompanying orchestra, which was kind of cool.

And the only reason you knew this was because you'd done your research when Amélie had threatened to forcefully expose you to culture. You figured she'd give you a few choices and you needed to know ahead of time which was going to be the most painless.

"So why...oh...Amélie likes opera, doesn't she?"

Lacroix gave a sharp nod. "Adores it."
But he couldn't bring her along, because they were still maintaining the fiction that they were separating.

"So...why did you choose this venue again?"

"It was the most expedient and our targets will have less security on hand." Lacroix rubbed his brow. "But I positively loathe the traditional performance of Carmen."

You flipped through the playbill. "OK, so we could have all just come as hired help."

Lacroix shook his head. "McCree was troublesome enough to get into Baghdad. I am too well known. Best to have a plausible cover. I am taking my young lady friend to the opera for entirely salacious reasons." He said it so dryly, you cracked a grin. "After all, I do have a reputation as a libertine to maintain. Amélie doesn't get to have all the fun."

You shook your head. "Lacroix, you need to tailor your approach. Under normal circumstances, opera ain't going to get you laid."

"Rest assured Chanceux, this is not the method I would use to seduce you." He rested a bare hand on your shoulder. He flashed you that sultry bedroom smile full of promise and French cheese, and you squinted at him.

"Do I want to know?"

"It's quite simple really: I would shower you with cake and cheese till you warmed up to me, like taming a feral cat. Minimal work, to be honest. Jack and Gabriel went about it all wrong."

He laughed softly to himself. "But they were incredibly entertaining to watch."

You rubbed your forehead, not caring if you smudged your makeup. It would give credence to the idea that you and Lacroix were here on a date.

"So really, why are we actually sitting instead of hanging out at the bar or coming in through the vents? This place has to have massive vents."

Lacroix gave that Gallic shrug. "You need the practice. And perhaps I realized that I need to be able to be able to give a convincing portrayal of enjoyment as well. Amélie knows I dislike opera and that encroaches on her own pleasure. I do not wish to deprive her of this small thing. She has made enough sacrifices." Lacroix sounded almost wistful.

"Maybe Ziv likes opera?" You wondered if he'd enjoy getting dressed up and accompanying Amélie out. Most likely he'd just want to ogle Lacroix in his tux.

"...Ziv still watches cartoons with Agent Shimada and Agent McCree," Lacroix said, sounding mildly exasperated.

"So do I," you muttered.

Lacroix gave a longsuffering nod. "I am aware."

You pursed your lips.

"Chanceux, I am telling you this because we both need to hone our acting and undergo desensitization," Lacroix said. "You have made admirable progress since Lyon. Your handling of Zenyatta has improved. You are ready for the next step."
You nodded, not missing the fact that Lacroix was leading by example. Just like you didn't miss the fact that he was making sure you knew it too. You wondered about that for a moment.

"At this rate, you are well on your way to being trusted on your own, in say, another five years?" Lacroix chuckled, and you had to quash the urge to smack him in the face with your playbill.

The auditorium mostly full, but Jesse had managed to channel several other patrons to seats farther away from you, but closer to the stage. You appreciated the gesture.

The room was dark, except for the stage lights and the glow of the small screens on the balcony chairs. You were half-paying attention to the program. The fights weren't particularly convincing, but you understood that their authenticity wasn't a high priority. Carmen was narcissistic and toxic. José was wishy washy. The bullfighter was hot, but you didn't actually like anyone. Even Michaela was irritating, mostly because she could do better than José. The subtitles helped and the music was lively. You occasionally glanced over at Lacroix who managed to maintain a polite smile.

"You still look like you're suffering," you said.

"Because I am." He shook his head. "But I will endeavor to do a better job concealing it." He sat up straighter, leaning forward, his eyes on the stage. "More convincing?"

"Yes," you said.

He lifted a pair of opera glasses.

"Scoping the targets, are you?"

"Yes," he said. "It seems like a good exercise to keep me occupied. I will keep it in mind for next time. There's always someone in these audiences that I wouldn't mind killing. In fact, this might be an opportunity to plan more missions," he said thoughtfully.

That thought process sounded terribly familiar, and for a moment you wondered if he was mocking you. But judging by his pensive expression, you realized he was not.

"That's what I do," you admitted. "I guess you're picking up some of my bad habits."

"Quelle horreur," Lacroix said, handing you the ornate mini-binoculars.

You gazed downward, and slightly to the left at a private box. There were privacy curtains and you could not see the targets. Jesse had already verified that Jadranko Grbić and Zahir Al-Hashim had checked in, and confirmed the visuals matched, but you and Lacroix had yet to catch sight of them. Fortunately, that meant most people probably wouldn't see what was happening inside the box when you went to take care of things.

"You want to just get it done now?"

"Tempting," Lacroix muttered. "But we will wait for intermission. The second act is almost over."
You left with the crowd, stretching your legs as you and Lacroix meandered back to the bar. A few people ordered drinks, and Lacroix watched disapprovingly as Jesse chatted with them. If he was trying to hide his distinctive accent, it wasn't working.

After he took care of the line, he moved out from behind the counter, passing you the bag and an extra security keycard as he left.

"Facilities are over there, ma'am," he said. "I'll go clear the exit."

You and Lacroix moved toward the bathrooms. You went into a stall, changed your shoes, fitted your pistol with the silencer, and did the same for Lacroix's guns. You emerged and handed Lacroix the bag.

The two of you took a winding hall to the box access. You found the right doorway, a single sentry standing guard. He wore his guns on his chest and an earpiece. He stiffened as you approached.

"Excuse me," you said timidly and he relaxed a little. "I'm all turned around. Which way is Box Four-" You jabbed your pressure injector into the side of his neck and he staggered, reaching for you, before he fell forward. You caught him and Lacroix helped you lower him to the ground.

Lacroix passed the bag back to you, took his pistols, and opened the door, music reaching the hall. You hung back, keeping an eye out for complications. Lacroix went in. The door clicked shut.

You began counting, keeping one ear open, while carefully flexing your fingers.

Twenty...Twenty one...Twenty two...

These doors were soundproofed. You were to give him thirty seconds before you offered backup.

Twenty five...Twenty six...Twenty seven...

Thud. Something hit the door.

Fuck it. You set down the bag and opened the door, in time to see Lacroix struggling against two men, a third cowering behind his chair. There was another on the ground, Al-Hashim, and that made four: two more people than were supposed to be here. You recognized the man behind the chair as Grbić, but the other two moved like fighters. Holstering your pistol - too dangerous in direct combat, especially with all the bystanders - you drew your tanto.

Lacroix kicked the closest guard backward, and you lunged forward, blades out. You stabbed the second bodyguard in the throat, and he gurgled, releasing a choked gasp as he went down. Spinning, you lunged, your tanto sliding smoothly into Grbić's chest. The chair tipped over in the scuffle. He gave a rattling gasp and Lacroix seized him by the hair and twisted.

The orchestra and singers covered most of the more visceral sounds. You couldn't hear if anyone was complaining, not over the racket you were making. But it was unlikely the fracas went unnoticed. Someone would be by to check on the occupants of the box.

You kicked the surviving guard in the head, before he could properly raise the alarm. Management probably already had someone on the way to check on the disturbance, so you had to be fast.
Lacroix inspected both targets, nodded, and the two of you were out the door. You walked briskly, carrying your bag of shoes. You could abandon the guns in the trash if you needed to sneak out, or start screaming that "those violent criminals ran that way!" and pointing in the opposite direction. Already you could hear the rapid beat of footsteps and ducked down the service hall, to find Jesse holding the fire escape doors. It was night, but the grounds were well-lit. You would have to work to remain unnoticed.

"Problems?" Jesse grinned.

"They were expecting me," Lacroix said tightly as the three of you took the metal stairs down.

"Well, we have been targeting known Talon higher-ups," you said. "They should all be afraid." Your expression was too joyously fierce to be a smile.

In the distance, sirens began to sound.

The three of you headed downward, then across the gardens to the parking garage.

Jesse skidded to a halt and you nearly ran into him.

Half a dozen men in armor waited in front of the entrance. They were carrying expensive weaponry.

"We can take'em hoss," Jesse said.

"Before the authorities arrive?" You wondered.

Lacroix shook his head. "No, let's check another direction."

Walking quickly, you passed abstract statues and topiaries. Lacroix had stashed his guns under his jacket, and Jesse wore his in his belt. Yours remained strapped to your thigh. There was a side gate and you took it to the streets, only slightly surprised to find a trio of armed guards waiting for you there, bearing the same armor and weaponry as the men at the garage.

They didn't try to talk, they just looked at Lacroix and went for their guns.

Jesse fired first, dropping a man. And though he had a silencer on the end of his pistol, the shot still echoed in the night. Someone would come to investigate.

Cursing, you lunged, your long skirt ripping under your sneakers as you yanked the nearest man to you, partially as a shield, partially so you could drive your tanto into his unprotected throat. The new dagger flowed like an extension of your arm, and the only thing you were still getting used to was the extra inches of reach the longer blade gave you.

When you looked up, Jesse had shot the final guard, but you were out in the open now, and the streets were so well-lit. You were too exposed out here.

Grim-faced, Lacroix led you down the road. He picked a sedan, smashed the window, and opened the door. Silently, he jammed a data stick into the dashboard, overriding the security features and starting up the vehicle. He brushed the broken glass out of the frame, mouth pressed in a thin line.

You climbed in the back, letting Jesse take shotgun. He would be better in a vehicular firefight, after all.
Slowly, Lacroix drove the vehicle out of the downtown area. You sat on the edge of your seat, wondering if there would be more surprises. And by "surprises" you meant bullets and explosions.

You ditched the car a few miles away, picking up another one with the same tactic, Lacroix glancing over his shoulder far too frequently.

You drove the next vehicle, everyone on edge, even as you hit city limits. Lacroix signaled the transport, and it wasn't till you were airborne that he finally relaxed.

"You said there were only two people in that box, McCree," Lacroix's words came out clipped.

"Reservation for two and one security. I sent you pictures, remember?" Jesse scowled at the implication.

"You didn't see the other guards?"

"No, I didn't get a chance. I was at the bar maintaining my cover and making sure your immediate exit was clear-"

"They were definitely expecting us. Those perimeter guards would have at least given "civilians" a warning," Lacroix muttered. "I don't know if we managed to tip them off." He didn't look at Jesse, but you knew that's what he meant. "Or if it's thanks to Oasis' heightened security, or if Talon's finally closing ranks." He held up an unfamiliar gun. "I picked this up off one of perimeter guards. It's a Vishkar model. Not on the market yet."

Vishkar wasn't doing business in Oasis, though they very much wanted in. So, you hadn't murdered some poor plainclothes Oasis cop. Those were Talon hirelings, and you felt no guilt.

Jesse just crossed his arms, a sour look on his face.

Lacroix drew a deep breath. "This bears more investigation. Thank you for your assistance tonight, Agent McCree. Your reflexes are as impressive as always."

Jesse nodded curtly.

"Maybe someone recognized Jesse," you said, careful not imply anything was wrong with his undercover work. "But we've been going after the people that Lao was able to name. I'm sure they know by now that the Bái Shé program compromised several of them." You didn't need to add that Zaher Al-Hashim had been the one to post the bounty on Ziv, or that Lacroix had killed him first. Jadranko Grbić had been of lesser importance, but having both men in one place was a tempting target. Had this been a precautionary measure? Or had they been bait?

"True," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "After Warsaw, Buenos Aires, Budapest, and Antwerp, they have to be on higher alert. Merde. I had hoped they were still embracing the cell model and working in isolation."

"We're getting too high level," you said, unable to hide your satisfaction. "We'll just have to be more careful, and if we take a break, that's fine too. We can let them sweat for awhile. We'll still find them. And if they're fortunate, we'll kill them right away."

Jesse gave you a long look over his shoulder. "Sugarpie, has anyone ever told you how downright terrifying you are when you're cheerful?"
Lacroix just laughed. "Well, I suppose you're right," he said, his eyes bright. He exhaled slowly, patting his jacket pocket. He produced a pack of Gitanes, offering both you and Jesse one. You both accepted, basking in the sublime satisfaction of small sins, comfortable shoes, and a job well done.

Frowning, you wrote up your post-mission report. Operation Gift Horse had been a success. Interestingly enough, the attacks didn't make the news in Oasis, a city that prided itself on its safety record. Were they covering it up because of bad publicity? Or was there something more sinister at work?

Shaking your head, you glanced under your desk. Isha was in her basket, gnawing on a raw beef rib bone. Someone, tall, blonde, and not mysterious at all, had actually gone to the butcher's and bought a whole bag of them for her. You shook your head, still a little floored by how much Jack liked spoiling the murderbird.

"Lucky, Ms. Petras is at the door," Athena warned you.

"...I'm not here," you said.

The knock came.

"It would be funnier if you told her that yourself," Athena said.

Damn, she was right. "Nice try, evil AI. I almost fell for it too. But you can't trick ole Lucky Strike."

Athena sighed. Which she had to have learned from one of you, because AIs didn't breathe or have any kind of respiratory system. "Lucky, you already listed yourself as in the office today..." Athena said, sounding mildly amused.

"She doesn't have the code. She can stand there and knock all day," you said with a smirk. "She can't prove I'm in here." You grinned wryly as you climbed to your feet. You were very aware there were several legitimate professional reasons for the Strike Commander's assistant to seek out the Blackwatch Commander's assistant. You were just being petty.

"Do you want me to request interference?" Athena asked.

"Nah, I'll get it. I just don't want to," you said, shaking your head.

"Shall I maintain monitoring?"

"Please." You sighed, straightened up, and went to open the door.

Ainsley stood there in a navy blue suit, actually wearing pants, though she still had on heels. She held a bag in her hand and a drinkholder with two steaming cups in it.

"Commander Reyes is out right now," you said, as politely as you could. Because you didn't want to think about why she thought she could bring Gabriel coffee and something that smelled like pastries.

"I didn't come down here to see him," Ainsley said, biting her lower lip. "I uh...I wanted to come talk to you." She offered you a perky smile though you could see the discomfort in her eyes.

"Oh," you said cleverly, glancing back at the coffee and slightly greasy bag. "I'm finishing up some paperwork, but yeah, come in."

You stepped back, letting Ainsley in, though you would have to sweep for bugs afterward. She took a long look at the blankets on the couch, the expensive coffeemaker, and your slightly messy desk.

"This is very cozy," she said, sounding surprised.

"I spend a lot of time here." You shrugged and went back to your desk, gesturing for her to pull up a chair. "What'd you need?"

Ainsley set the drinks and the bag down on the desk. She sat down, still looking around your office; it was very different from Jack's.

On cue, Isha chirped underneath your desk. You lifted her up, because otherwise she'd climb your legs and that would hurt. You set her on the desk, bloody bone and all. She took one look at Ainsley and puffed up, chattering sternly.

"Bystander," you reminded her.

She glared at the other woman, actively gnawing on her bone while she stared at Ainsley, as if to say "this could be your face." You weren't sure where she learned that kind of behavior. Definitely not from you. Right? Maybe Gabriel?

Ainsley went pale. "I'm sorry, your...thing has a bloody bone."

"Relax, it came from the butcher," you said, trying not to smirk. "And definitely not from anyone we know. Or knew."

Ainsley gave a weak laugh. "Commander Reyes lets you keep her here?"

"As long as she doesn't make any messes, yeah."

Ainsley stared at Isha and your murderbird snapped her teeth.

"Isha, behave," you said, scratching her head. "You have to be polite."

Isha gave you a skeptical look. Like she knew exactly how you felt about Ainsley and how dare you tell her to be nice when you wanted to be just as hostile? You chucked her under the chin.

"Behave," you repeated.

Your murderbird grumbled and sat on the corner of your desk, glaring between you and Ainsley.

"I...sorry. I didn't come down here to talk about your pet." Ainsley sighed. "Umm, I realize this is really late, and I'm sorry, but I never actually thanked you for saving my life in Paris."

That had been about a year ago. She was exceptionally late, not that you really cared.

"You're welcome?"

She pushed the drinks forward. "I'm sorry, I don't know how you take your coffee. But I picked up some breakfast pastries," she said, sounding uncertain. "Um, if you hadn't eaten yet..."
"Thank you," you said, making no move to take anything. There were several smarmy things running through your head: was her life really only worth a continental breakfast? Couldn't she have sent a card instead? It would be far less awkward. No, you were not going to give her tips on how to bag Jack Morrison. But with great effort and steely resolve, you kept your thoughts to yourself, trying to maintain a polite expression. You weren't sure if you were succeeding.

Ainsley crossed her arms, not looking at you or Isha. She went back to chewing on her lower lip, and you scratched the back of your neck, wondering when this visit would be over. Because you weren't eating any food Ainsley brought you, not just because you were petty, but because poisonings were still a thing. And dear old Uncle Petras had tried to off you at least once this year.

"This is a lot more awkward than I imagined it being," she said, looking up, her smile weak.

"Thanks for the breakfast," you said, still not touching it. Lacroix's accented voice hovered in the back of your head, nagging you to use more finesse on the target. "It was thoughtful. But I've already eaten."

"It is kind of late in the morning," Ainsley said quickly. She took a deep breath. "OK, I know breakfast is kind of a stupid way to approach this, especially so late. But I didn't know what else to do. I...I traveled a lot after Paris. Did a lot of...soul-searching. Had to get some counseling, because the idea of danger was sexy, but being so helpless was just plain terrifying."

"Yes," you agreed, feeling a pang of empathy.

"And she encouraged me to take up martial arts or, or target shooting, or do something else empowering." She straightened up, looking more confident. "I started Tae Kwon Do. And now I think I understand now why Commander Morrison never took me seriously."

You raised a brow, unsure of what to say to that. "I never heard any complaints about your efficiency."

"That's not what I meant and you know it," Ainsley huffed. "You didn't take me seriously either."

"Oh, I did," you said, lips pressed firmly together.

Ainsley flinched at your expression and you had to take a deep breath. "I mean, I'm just a civilian to you. I don't stab people in the neck or shoot them in the head."

"That's not the only criteria for authority: I take plenty of civilians seriously," you said, thinking about Kwento, Zenyatta, and Director Petras.

"I'm sorry. I guess it's not fair that I'm projecting on you," Ainsley said after a moment. "And you were a good listener. Like when we talked about my feelings for the Strike Commander."

"I tried," you said, testing the sharpness of the words on your tongue.

"My point is, that he never took me seriously as an individual, because I was just his assistant paper-pusher. I'm not a trained soldier like you. And I want to be taken seriously, Ms. Strike. I don't want to bring down the team. I want the Commander to trust me. You obviously have a good working relationship with Commander Reyes. Can you give me any pointers?" She leaned forward, soft blue eyes wide and eager.
"I doubt the Strike Commander expects you to be an administrator and a trained agent," you said dryly. "From what I understand, he hired you based on your very specific qualifications." Being a Petras. Oh, and because he hated paperwork.

She frowned at you, her expression turning pouty. "That's not good enough, and you know it Ms. Strike."

You rubbed your forehead. "I don't know why you're asking me these questions if you know my mind better than myself," you said, unable to keep the ominous note out of your voice.

Isha hissed, puffing up as she eyed Ainsley. You rubbed her snout, partially to calm her, partially to calm yourself.

"I'm going about this all wrong," she said after a moment. "I thought I should be more aggressive and authoritative. That's how you are. You're so collected and professional."

You gave a long slow blink.

"The Strike Commander...respects you," Ainsley said after a moment. She stared at the desk. "You might not have noticed, because you don't work as closely with him, but in Paris, I could tell that he felt at ease in your company and that he trusted you to handle both the administrative and the security issues. He doesn't have that faith in me."

It was a struggle to maintain a professional face. "Mutual respect is important in the field," you said after a long pause. "If he didn't trust me to do the job right, why would he have me there? If I didn't respect his leadership, why would I follow him? He obviously trusts and respects your ability to do your job," you lied through your teeth.

"See, you know this stuff. You're a trained soldier," Ainsley said excitedly. "I never thought of any of it like that!"

There were a lot of things she'd never thought of, like apparently that you and Jack could be close. The presumption otherwise made you bristle, even if it was meant to be a secret.

"Wait..." Ainsley's eyes widened slightly. "I...I didn't take your job, did I?"

"What?" You asked, tempted to throw her food at her head.

"I mean, you're obviously doing a good job here in Blackwatch. I'm surprised you didn't apply for my job. I mean, you probably would have gotten it since I had taken a leave-"

"Why would I apply for your job?" You asked slowly.

"Like you have to ask! Pay raise, prestige, proximity to power: it's important to stay upwardly mobile, Ms. Strike. You can't just settle for second best. I know you're a career-woman, Ms. Strike. You've got your future to think about!"

"Huh," was all you said.

"Shatter the glass ceiling! One day you could even be the Blackwatch Commander!" Ainsley said shaking her fists.

You just stared at her, wondering if she was working for the Director, because if so, her pitch needed some work.

"You're smart, competent, and tough! But I think you need some help in the ambition department. But don't worry, we ladies have to stick together. I can help you with that. And maybe you could show me how to be tough, like you agents."

You nearly choked to death on your own tongue. You'd saved her life for this? Backhanded insults and more time with her? No, thank you.

"Well, that's certainly something to think about. Unfortunately, I have a lot of work to catch up on-"

"I could help!"

"It's...not necessary," you said with a pained smile. "Compartmentalized clearances after all."

"Oh, of course," Ainsley said. "Do you...need a gym buddy maybe?" She asked, wringing her hands. "Or if you don't go to the gym, maybe a running partner?"

"Is that what you really want?"

Ainsley shrugged. "You're strong, efficient, and people respect you. I want to see how you do it."

You laughed very loudly at that.

"I'm serious," she said, grinding her teeth. "I know you think I'm just a spoiled rich girl who leveraged her family connections to get this job. I know you think I'm a joke and I'm out of touch with reality. And maybe you're right. But I don't want to stay that way. Maybe you don't know what it's like, not being good enough, but-"

Fury flared in you gut. Yes, you knew all that and more. She didn't get to just pretend like her privilege didn't matter. It wasn't your job to walk her through life like her own personal spirit guide. "You know nothing about me," you said coldly.

Ainsley froze, swallowing roughly as she sat back in her seat. "You're right," she said softly. "I...uh...I made this all about me. My counselor said I do that a lot. I mean, I'm paying him to listen to me, but he meant in daily life. He's...right. It's a bad habit. I'm trying to stop." She took a shaky breath, lower lip quivering. "I'm sorry." She squirmed in her seat, a morose expression on her face.

"Apology accepted," you said, conscious that others would be listening to this recording.
"Now, I'm afraid I'm going to have to get back to work."

"Oh, of course," Ainsley rose quickly, breathing hard. "I'm, sorry to bother you.
I...uh...well, I guess I'll see you around."

"Sure thing," you said, instead of "not if I see you first."

"I don't like her," Athena said after Ainsley left. "She's does her job, and she's always passably polite, but she talks down to people in subtle ways. I can't tell if it's intentional or not, but I'm starting to suspect that's just how she is."
"Yeah," you agreed. "That's Ainsley. Thinks the world revolves around her, and she's always so surprised when you remind her that it doesn't."

"Unfortunately, that is not part of my job description," Athena said.

"Do you "misinterpret" her commands too?" You laughed.

"I would never. I am a consummate professional, Lucky," Athena said primly. "And she still isn't comfortable utilizing my functions."

"Her loss," you said. "I think you're awesome."

"Thank you. You're awesome too," Athena said brightly. "And Isha is so very fun to watch. Jack had gotten me very excited about puppies, but I think this is better. It is exciting to study the behavior of a previously extinct species." You wondered how much of her processing power Athena devoted to finding cute animal videos to share.

Your murderbird perked up at the mention of her name, staring at the speaker in the ceiling.

"You say that now, but I've seen her eyeing your fish torpedo chassis. She's going to pounce on you one day."

"I look forward to it. I will be sure to save the footage and share it with you."

You laughed. "I would hope. So is everything OK with you and Jack?"

"Everything is running smoothly: he has not complained of my performance. We certainly have not quarreled."

You shook your head. "That's not what I asked." What was with everyone giving you evasive answers. Did they think you couldn't figure it out? You were the Queen of Evasive Answers and Dodging the Question.

"He used to talk to me more before she moved into his office," Athena said, sounding a little sheepish. "I just miss our conversations."

"You should tell him that," you said.

"I know he is not enjoying her presence either. I don't want to be a bother," Athena said. "The Strike Commander's time is important."

"So are you," you said. "And Jack can be bad about realizing things like this. You're a valuable teammate. I can say something to him if you're not comfortable doing it."

"I think I would appreciate it," Athena said after a moment. "Can we modify a drone so I can play with Isha? I think Winston would be willing to do it."

"Yeah, just...start gentle. She might be feisty, but she's got hollow bones." You laughed as she came up to your viewscreen and began run her little claws over it, opening files and watching portions light up to her touch.

She squawked at you.

You blinked. "Oh. Oh I hadn't thought of that. Huh."
"What?" Athena asked, because she had no visuals in Gabriel's office.

"She's playing with my screen. She knows she can make it react to her." Gently, you tugged her away. "Not on my work terminal, murderbird. I'll get you a tablet and put some art programs on it. We can send homemade dinosaur drawings to Aunt Feng. I think she'd like that."

Isha grunted in protest, little claws tapping on the composite viewscreen.

"Not now, I've got work to do. I'll set one up for you later, OK?"

"That is interesting," Athena said after a moment. "I know there are elephants, horses, and primates that create art. But it didn't occur to me."

"I'm not sure she won't just watch animal videos or figure out how to play mahjong. But I think art is a safe spot to start."

"I can load up a spare tablet and have it delivered. Maybe she could learn to use the camera."

"She could," you said, suddenly realizing all the surveillance opportunities that skill opened up. She could wear a camera and stream, but if she knew how to operate one and take specific pictures...

You rubbed your sulky raptor's head. "I'll have to talk to Gabriel about the possibilities."

"Winston has personal knowledge on several brain-training activities. I could consult him if you like."

"That's a really great idea. I'd appreciate it," you said. Because Isha was a clever mimic, and you suspected you weren't giving her enough mental stimulation. Yes, she loved spending time with you. But Gabriel was the one who handled most of her training. The other day he had taught her to play dead, attack, and release. Granted, she already knew how to do the last two, but she now consistently responded to the commands and seemed to understand that she couldn't "attack" Gabriel's bare hand. She had to wait for him to put on the protective gauntlet.

"Winston is preloading one for you now. I did warn him that her claws may damage the device, but he's putting a protective case on it. Hopefully that will be enough."

You looked down at your murderbird who was eyeing your terminal covetously. "Why don't you go take a nap now?" You pointed at the basket. "You've been awake for most of the morning."

She cheeped, unimpressed by your suggestion.

"I have to do work," you said.

She picked up her bone, fluttered down to the floor, and stalked over to the couch. You watched as she gripped the bone in her mouth, her little talons digging into the upholstery as she scaled the side.

Shaking your head, you went back to reports.
Thanks to Prior for French help. All mistakes are my own.

Ugh, life is draining me. Thanks to those of you who commented. It seriously makes my day to hear from you guys. Trying not to be dead inside. Just so tired. I'm guessing school started for a lot of people? Me, I'm just adulting. Watching Brooklyn 99 to relax and getting back into playing games, but I think I need to find some kind of meaningful work to do, like volunteering. I just have to find time/motivation.

I got free tickets to Carmen once. Made the mistake of taking my younger cousin, and he was so bored that we left early. Mind you, he didn't act out or behave badly, but I felt bad taking him to something he didn't really want to see. So my opera experience was truncated, but I think I could like it? I don't know. I do like musicals.
"I don't like this at all," you said, eyes narrowed as you read the comm traffic one of Lacroix's NSA contacts had passed along to him personally. There was something big coming, and while the US intelligence community apparently wasn't inclined to share with Overwatch, someone thought it important enough to break ranks.

Alone, each piece wasn't a big deal. Vast sums of money had moved between big-league arms traffickers and an unknown client with deep Swiss pockets. There was a flurry of extra activity in Hanoi, lots of people going out, none of them returning. Large empty shipping containers, routed through known Talon depots turning up in US ports: or at least the containers were empty when the US customs inspectors reached them, their dummy manifests filled with fake names and nonexistent products. Suspicious foot traffic had increased in Baltimore, Norfolk, and Charleston - all major US port cities on the eastern seaboard. When you put all the seemingly random occurrences together, they started to tell a story.

"The red flags have been cropping up for the last week and a half," Lacroix said. "They think whatever is coming will be in the next month, probably the next two weeks, which coincidentally, or not, is when Ambassador Kwento will be visiting DC." Lacroix leaned back in his chair, fingers steeped.

You blew out a breath. Lacroix, Amélie, Ziv, and you all sat around Lacroix's desk, reviewing the report Lacroix had thrown together this morning.

Ziv frowned. "Are we sure we should be involved? Kwento has impressive private security. A mix of human and omnic guards, Numbani's best from what I could find. And the American government, for all its lip service, does not want Overwatch actively operating on its soil."

Lacroix shook his head. "If Petras and his backers are using Talon to make a move, it won't be enough."

"Maybe it has nothing to do with Kwento," Ziv said, not sounding convinced.

"She's up to six assassination attempts in the last two months," Lacroix said, shaking his head. "Adawe announced her official retirement date last night: one month and then she's focusing solely on the growth of Numbani. Kwento is an official candidate, and she definitely has the votes to get in. The pressure is on."
You frowned. "Ziv's right about how difficult this op will be. If the US intelligence community is aware of the problem and they're not coming to us, we're going to have a hard time mounting a proper operation and we run the risk of becoming the scapegoat if everything goes tits up." And there was a very good chance things would go wrong.

"The fallout would be brutal," Amélie nodded. She sipped a bottle of mineral water, lounging in her seat like a sleepy leopard. "But it is likely the US intelligence services are also compromised. Gérard's delightful friend is more than a little concerned about the lack of interagency cooperation. Her bureaucratic superiors apparently shut down all lines of inquiry. Gérard is trying to recruit her, should she decide that she is tired of the petty bickering."

"A CIA contact complained of the same kind of stonewalling," Lacroix said. "He technically has no jurisdiction, so it's not a surprise. I've reached out to people in the FBI and DHS, through...private channels. I'm still waiting to hear back, but I'm not holding my breath. Honestly, for the superpowers, a strong Overwatch is a threat, no matter what lip service they give us." Lacroix shook his head. "They think any sort of international co-op is a threat to their sovereignty. So we cannot just send in a battalion or make a fuss. I have already spoken to Kwento at length. She is going to Washington DC. She is willing to limit her time there, but she will not cancel the trip."

"No, that would mean the terrorists win," Ziv said bitterly. "Idiot."

Amélie gazed at him affectionately. "Political moves are complicated and counterintuitive. She cannot afford to look weak right now. Not everyone can be as refreshingly blunt as you, Ziv."

"You mean not everyone can do it so charmingly," Lacroix chuckled. "And you gave him a hard sideeye. There was nothing charming about your hacker. He was a rotten little shit."

Ziv crossed arms, staring at his lap, a flustered smile creeping across his face, his cheeks darkening. Amélie giggled and nudged Lacroix. Lacroix cleared his throat, a small smile on his lips. You would call that look affection, but you were going to pretend like you didn't see it. Watching Lacroix and Ziv flirt for real, with Amélie cheering them on was still surreal.

"You two are ridiculous," Ziv muttered, trying not to sound pleased. "You should stop. You're going to make Lucky uncomfortable."

You snorted. Because he was always so concerned about your comfort. "Anyway," you said, rolling your eyes. "This is something we need to run by everyone cleared for Shit Spiders. It's too much for our team."

"True, but we need a the outline of battle plan," Lacroix said. "I have a few ideas, but I'd like to hear your thoughts, Chanceux. You have a knack for seeing holes in everyone's plans, including the ones our enemies make."

You weren't sure if he meant that as a compliment, but when were you ever? "We can use the same tactic as Talon, you know. Send everyone in staggered waves through different routes. We even have the advantage of being able to place more people through legitimate channels with better cover stories, ignoring the Talon sleeper agents. Some of the Overwatch agents can be there on government business and there are plenty of Blackwatch agents that can fly under the radar. And we don't have to jump through all those hoops to smuggle our gear in, like we did in Oasis: Overwatch ambassadors have diplomatic immunity and the USG doesn't have the authority to check our transports."

Lacroix nodded. "It would be a major PR coup if the Strike Commander was there for both the political and the military action. And of course, he would require bodyguards."

"We cannot be too obvious about the alliance between Jack and Kwento, not until she is confirmed," Amélie cautioned. "But if he were there on Overwatch-related business and just happened to save the day?"

"What a happy coincidence," you said cheerfully, knowing Jack would not quite enjoy being hailed as the hero. "And I know some DOD officials have been clamoring for Gabriel to pay them a visit and give a canned speech about his time in SEP. If he happened to be there at the same time, well so much the better." That was your entry route, if you didn't get to be one of Jack's bodyguards, and to be honest, not having to sit through endless political dog and pony shows seemed like more fun. "And he needs guards as well."

Lacroix smiled at you. "It is the start of a plan, Chanceux. We will have to review Kwento's itinerary, the routes, and the probable location of the attack. We will bring in Gabriel, Jack, and Ana for the tactical planning."

"Do we warn the Americans?" Ziv asked.

"...Now that is the question," Lacroix sighed. "Because even if we are completely successful, this move will make us very unpopular with their intelligence community. And that will make our lives more complicated. I can liaise with Nikita, and maybe come up with a plan to let them save face. She would have a better idea about how to approach it, and perhaps we could draw up some files so they can cover their asses."

"We can't trust them but we have to go out of our way to be nice to them and clean up their messes," you said with a headshake. "Ugh. Fucking politics might be worse than Talon."

"That is the way of things, Chanceux," Lacroix said. "I think we have the beginnings of Operation Black Abacus."

Amélie smiled, because she also understood Lacroix's taste in obscure science fiction novels.

"Yeah, the beginnings, all right. In short, we need a small, elite group of commandos who can blend in with civilians, navigate all kinds of battlefields, and stand triumphant in the face of overwhelming odds, while making up the plan as they go," Ziv said dryly. "Now why does that sound so familiar?"

You exchanged bows with Hanzo, a little concerned by how earnestly Isha was watching you. She sat on the side of the mats with Jesse. Her snaky neck jerking back and forth as she observed the two of you. Genji sat beside them, holding Bandit in his lap.

"The tanto is really working out," you said brightly.

Hanzo grunted, not looking displeased. "Focus on the task at hand." He wore his hair tied back, and you didn't miss the new kyudo-gi styled outfit, in black and red with a Blackwatch insignia and an exposed nipple. He wore it casually.

"I like your new clothes," you said. "They look good."
"Flattery will get you nowhere," he said sternly, and you could hear Jesse laughing at you.

"We should get more of that fraisier some time-"

Hanzo lunged, and you heard Isha give a squawk of surprise. You slid around his right side, dodging the strike, but he moved with you, his reflexes superior. You raised your left hand, blocking his follow up strike, and countering with a hit to his floating rib. He grunted and recalling your matches with Gabriel, you withdrew knowing that you weren't fast enough to get in another hit without retaliation.

Hanzo's foot snapped forward, nearly smacking you in the face and you grabbed for his ankle, hoping you could throw him off balance. He planted his leg firmly on the ground, shaking his head at you. "You are still too slow. I wasn't even going at half speed. You should have been able to grab my kick."

"Can I practice that move on you a few more times?" You asked innocently.

"Later," Hanzo said, tightly. "Focus. I know you are capable. You just choose to be easily distracted."

You laughed, and went on the offensive, trying to thrust your basic metal fingers into his soft tissue. Your left hand sliced through the air, striking his shoulder. He countered with a punch that nearly knocked you on your back.

Grunting, you held your stomach for a moment, wondering if you were going to lose your lunch. Hanzo closed the gap and kicked your legs out from under you. You hit the mats with a loud "oof!" Your lunch tried to escape, but you were too stunned to throw up.

Hanzo was on top of you then, shockingly heavy. He was all solid muscle, still lighter than Genji, but his knees pinned your arms, his weight on your chest. He leaned forward, a hand going for your throat. You gasped for breath, panic already rising as you shook your head. Had Genji had told him about your reactions?

There was a terrible shriek, and the flutter of feathers. And then your murderbird slammed into Hanzo.

"Shit!" Jesse was on the mat, yanking her leash as Hanzo backed up. You sat up slowly, rubbing your chest.

"Isha, stop. Isha, I'm OK," you said, trying to keep your rough voice calm.

She turned and rushed back to you, chirping rapidly as she climbed into your lap, her wide eyes looking you over. She was the size of a chicken now, her new set of teeth much bigger than her baby ones.

"You OK?" You asked Hanzo. He had defensive scratches on his forearms and bite marks on his hands.

"I have all my fingers," he said, looking completely incredulous as Isha hissed at him, puffing up as big as she could. "You were supposed to hold the beast, McCree."

"I didn't expect her to freak out," Jesse said. "And were you going to try to choke out Lucky? Because that doesn't end well either."

Hanzo said nothing, and you knew then that Genji had told him about your reaction to being choked, and that he'd decided to go for it anyway. You weren't sure exactly how you felt about that just now. Only that he would deserve whatever harm he received.

Isha continued chattering at you, headbutting your chest as she curled up against you. "It's OK, murderbird," you told her, rubbing her head. "Hanzo and I were just practicing." You wondered then if she reacted to your discomfort or to the possibility of danger.

She glared over her shoulder at Hanzo and then resumed letting you fuss over her, her sounds gradually growing softer and calmer.

Hanzo rubbed his arms as Genji brought over the first aid kit. There were a few spots where she got him with her sickle claws, and the gouges bled heavily.

"I'm sorry," Jesse said. "I didn't realize-"

"These are mere fleshwounds," Hanzo said, not sounding bothered. He watched Isha coolly. "You need to make it clear to her that I am not your enemy."

You raised a brow as he offered you a bloody hand. You took it, letting him help you up. You did not miss how Isha flashed her teeth, feathers around her neck all ruffled up.

"Hanzo and I were training," you told her. "He probably wasn't going to hurt me...much," you said, because you couldn't bring yourself to lie to your raptor.

Genji snickered.

Isha cocked her head to the side, watching Hanzo suspiciously.

You patted his arm.

Isha looked at him as he reached out his hand, holding it in front of her.

"No biting," you said.

She gave it a sniff, clicked her teeth, and then turned her head, snuggling up against your chest.

"Come on, I'll get you cleaned up and bandaged," you said. "That might help." Genji handed you the first aid kit, a wry smile on his face. He reached out and petted Isha and she cooed at him.

Hanzo frowned heavily at Genji.

Jesse held Bandit in his lap and was very quietly telling him what a good drama-free pet he was and how much he appreciated his calm ways.

You sat on the sidelines, while Hanzo held out his forearms. With Isha in your lap, you cleaned the wounds, dressed them with antibiotic ointment, and wrapped them. "I'll check with Feng and see if their are any bite side effects that Bayan has discovered."

"Not yet," Hanzo said.

You looked at him quizzically.

"They have not shown any unpleasant side effect yet," Hanzo said clearing his throat. "Bayan and I exchange letters. He talks about his brood quite a bit. There have been no complications though they have bitten a few of Feng's extended family members. I have a complex set of vaccinations, so I'm not concerned about any diseases."

"Oh, good to know," you said, a little dazed. "I'm uh...sorry about that. Though you really shouldn't try to choke me out...ever."

"I can handle your reactions," Hanzo said.

"Or maybe you should ask first. I don't really like airing my panic in front of everyone." You waited for him to say something dickish like "how will you learn to control yourself if you don't try?"

Instead, Hanzo hunched over, staring at his feet. "You are correct. I am...sorry. That was inconsiderate of me."

You sat there for a moment, maybe just a little stunned. "Umm, OK. Yeah, do you need an emitter? Because I can get you one..."

Hanzo shook his head. "No, thank you."

"You sure?"

"Yes, but if you happen to be in town and procure another slice of that fraisier...I would be most grateful." Hanzo didn't look at you, he just stared at the bandages.

"OK," you said, nodding. "I'll do that."

Lao was asking for you. Or so Lacroix said. You didn't entirely trust that troubled look on his face, nor the way Ziv wouldn't meet your eyes. They had been keeping you apprised of her debriefs, her moods, and some of her trauma, but you couldn't shake the feeling they weren't telling you everything. No, Lacroix never told anyone everything, except maybe Amélie. But you knew they were hiding something from you, the question was it professional or personal? And could you even tell the difference any more?

You wore a hoodie and fatigue pants. You brought another science fiction novel and snacks: rice crackers, candy, and melon soda. And you wondered if she would repudiate you again. You could bear it, it was true. You'd lived through her death and her hatred before. But a part of you still hoped that there was a chance to salvage things. That maybe one day, she could forgive you, and then you could forgive yourself.

You reached the cellblock, finding two Blackwatch agents standing guard by the door. They nodded at you. You knocked once, and opened the door.

Lao sat behind the table, looking...better. She was still pale, but there was color in her cheeks and while she was still thin, she didn't look quite so frail as you remembered. She wore an oversized Blackwatch hoodie - the drawstrings removed - and no prostheses. She hunched over the table, her eyes darting up to look at you before she slumped over, not speaking.
But Lao wasn't the only one in the room. Gabriel sat across from her, arms crossed, glancing at you as you stepped inside and shut the door behind you. His expression was the normal grim poker face he wore when working. You looked between the two of them, trying to process why exactly they were in here together. Lao had made it very clear how she felt about Gabriel when you'd spoken last. And judging by the interrogation transcripts, you didn't blame her.

"Hey," you said, focusing on Lao. You pulled out the chair and set the snacks and novel on the table. "I was told you were...asking for me." You tried not to put too much hope into those words.

Lao nodded once, not looking up.

"...And why are you are here, Commander?" You asked, turning your head to look at Gabriel.

"Agent Lao has something to tell you," Gabriel said, his tone all business.

Your breath caught in your throat, but when Lao looked up, her expression was cool. You swallowed your words.

"First off, I want to go on the record and say that Ziv Mihret is an utter piece of shit, and I know exactly why Rivka was always complaining about him," Lao said with an unhealthy dose of venom.

You blinked. "You would not be the first person to say that." You wondered if you were supposed to defend your hacker. What had he done? Had he hacked her cybernetics? Is that why he was acting so weird? "But what exactly did he do?"

Gabriel snorted.

Lao scowled at you. "He came here over a month ago and told me you had gone down in a plane crash and were presumed dead. It wasn't till two weeks later that the Commander told me otherwise."

"...I did get shot down by omnics." You rubbed the back of your neck. "I think it took them about 24 hours to find us. What was left of us."

"Yet you managed to walk away from it alive," Lao said, her tone scathing. "Lucky Strike, indeed."

"That's enough, agent," Gabriel said, his voice harsh with displeasure.

Lao bit her lip hard enough to draw blood.

That was the second time he called her that. You gave him a questioning look, but Gabriel's attention was on the girl in front of you.

"Go ahead, tell her what happened," Gabriel said, his voice cool. "How many of you did we have to dig out of that cave?"

"Me and three others, four if you count the dog and I actually dug him out," you said after a moment, your voice oddly calm. Though you wanted to shout at her, you swallowed that urge: there was no point in fighting with Lao. She wasn't fighting to win, she was lashing out, causing damage wherever she could. "They carried most of us out of there," you said flatly. "Had thirteen funerals to go to the following week. It's more than our squad got, but..." You stopped talking, realizing that you were babbling. You looked Lao in the eye. "Do you want me to apologize for surviving? Or were you just hoping that I wouldn't?"

Lao's head snapped back and she stared at you like you'd slapped her. She blinked rapidly, turning her head away. "I still hate you, you know. It eats me up inside. It's taken me a lot of work to untangle it. Some of it, I think is the programming. But some of it isn't."

You closed your eyes. You'd heard this all before. You could hear it again. But maybe you'd stop coming here. You weren't a masochist or a martyr. You didn't need to do this to yourself. You didn't deserve to be punished like this. You took a few deep breaths, very conscious of Gabriel's warmth beside you. Even if you couldn't touch him, just having him here helped. And while Lao's words cut deep, you were grateful that he didn't jump in this time.

"I still hate you," Lao repeated. "But I don't want you dead."

You opened your eyes, looking up to see Lao watching you, her eyes watery.

"And even," she took a shaky breath. "Even if I hate you, I loved you first. And I don't know if that ever went away. It's all terribly confusing-" she hiccupped, and dropped her head to the table, burying her face in her forearms.

You reached out then, to stroke her hair, to tell her it was OK, but you stopped, reminding yourself that she didn't like being touched without permission.

"I understand. I hated myself for quite awhile," you said. "I tortured Chumak, you know. Beat him and cut him till he told us everything. And then I killed him in the interrogation room." You paused. "Lacroix once told me that to torture someone, you had to hate yourself, at least a little." More importantly, that if you were going to survive it, you had to love something more than yourself. You looked at Lao, sniffing on the table. And even if she hated you, yes, you would do it all over again for her. You would do it better if you could. But you wouldn't write her off.

"Poor you," Lao spat, her wobbly voice taking the sting out of her words.

"But I'm done hating myself, Lao," you said. "I'm here for you if you need me. I don't expect everything between us to go back to how it was. I don't know if you'll ever forgive me for letting you down. But I just want you to know that I love you and I want you to be happy. I don't know how to make that happen. I can't fix your problems. But I'll be here to offer support."

There was a moment of silence and then a low keening filled the room. Lao wailed into her sleeves, shoulders shaking. She sounded like a wounded animal, and you stared at the wall, wondering what would be the right thing to do.

You very carefully patted her empty sleeve with your left hand. No flesh contact. Just...something to let her know you were there.

"Why are you making me do this, Commander?" Lao sobbed. "You're such a fucking bastard."

Gabriel didn't look at you. "That was the deal, agent. You've done the work so far. You don't get to quit now. You owe it her to tell her yourself. You owe it to yourself to face her."

"Tell me what?" You turned to look at Gabriel, realizing then that he had been meeting with Lao on his own. And you had no idea why.
Lao raised her head, wiping her eyes on her empty sleeve. She grabbed a napkin off the table and blew her nose.

"Gabriel?" You asked.

He shook his head.

Lao seemed too overwrought to notice your slipup. "Dr. Ziegler has found a way to replace my spinal cybernetics." The ones that both kept her alive and made her controllable. "It's a risky procedure. The odds aren't in my favor. But I'm doing it. I'd rather die free than live under the threat of being anyone's puppet again." She glared fiercely, through you and possibly through the reinforced walls.

You sat back in your chair, rubbing your temples. "Lao-

"I'm doing it," she said firmly. "And if you try and stop me, you're no better than those goddamn Talon-"

Gabriel cleared his throat, and Lao fell silent. You assumed he gave her some kind of scary look. But you were just staring at her too-young face.

"Is this..." You almost asked her if this was really what she wanted. But that was a stupid question. She'd said so quite clearly, and while Lao had been immature, she'd never been stupid. You bowed your head. "OK," you said. "I...I don't like the idea of you being in more danger. I hate the idea of anything else happening to you. But...but if you, the Commander, and Dr. Ziegler want to go through with it, well, I certainly can't stand in your way." You swallowed roughly, trying to dislodge the lump in your throat.

"I've already told Agent Lacroix everything I remember," she said, not looking at you. "So you won't lose any intel."

"It was never the intel that I cared about, Lao," you said. You rested your hands on the table. "When?"

"In two weeks," she said.

"...I...I might be out on an op," you said, wincing, because Kwento would be in DC around then.

"Good. I don't want you hovering over me while I'm unconscious. That's fucking weird," she said, her tone oddly forced. "And if you have them play that damn recording of you reading Conservation of Shadows, I will find a way to smother myself to death with a pillow."

"You really hated the book?"

"No, your reading style is just terrible."

"I've never done it before!" You sighed, feeling oddly wounded by that. After all the terrible things she'd said, this was the one you got defensive over.

"Well, let Athena do it. You stutter and trip over your words too much," she said.

You slumped in your seat. There really was nothing you could do for her. You couldn't look at Gabriel either. You weren't sure what to say about his involvement and how he kept this all from you for however long they'd been planning it. But a heavy weight pulsed in your stomach.
"They're going to build me a different prosthetic arm, something more suitable for daily life..." Lao's voice was softer.

"That's good," you said, trying to sound upbeat, but failing. Your voice was distant, your thoughts circling around the same ideas repeatedly: Risky procedure. Bad odds. I'd rather die free.

You sat there in silence, wondering if you were going to have bury your baby hacker for a third time. The first death was at Black Base Delta. The second death was in Lucerne, when no one would tell you a goddamn thing. This time, this time you knew it was coming, and while you could brace yourself, it would be a lie to say it wasn't going to hurt.

"I..." You stood abruptly. "I'm sorry. It's a lot to take in. I don't know what else to say. And I don't want to say the wrong thing. So I should go now." You turned to leave.

"Lucky," Lao's voice quavered, though she said your name with conviction.

You stopped, your hand resting on the doorknob. You blinked rapidly, steeling yourself for another vicious parting shot.

"If I die, I chose this," she said. "You didn't have any part in it. You don't get to make this about you. This is my call, my life, my own damn choice."

"I understand," you said, and you did, though the words sounded terribly hollow.

"If I live..." she took a deep breath. "I think...I think I want you to come see me. When these circuits and chips are out. When I'm not bearing their poison in my flesh. When I know that I'm really free. I think maybe things could be different then." She paused then, her voice ragged. "But don't get your hopes up."

You stood there, your back to her, the words echoing in your head. That hook, that hint of forgiveness, completely contingent on her survival was just too much for you. You nodded once, opened the door, and fled.

You sat in front of the Memorial Wall, smoking again. You didn't bring any offerings, you just took deep gulps of air, trying to center yourself. You needed to see those names, to comfort yourself, but you couldn't stay here. This would be the first place Gabriel looked, and you really weren't sure what to say to him or Ziv right now.

"Ms. Strike, do you know you're not supposed to smoke over here?"

You took a deep breath, recognizing that voice, and wishing you had left a minute ago. You looked up from your bench to see Ainsley standing there, wearing pants again, looking concerned.

"You going to report me to the Strike Commander?" You asked, carelessly. You took another puff before pinching the cigarette out with your left hand. When you looked back up, Ainsley was still staring.

"No, of course not. And you stopped anyway," she said, staring at your gloves. She looked at the wall for a moment. "Do you...know some of the people on there?"

"Served with about four dozen of them in different places," you said, counting your Blackwatch missions, the Ninth Circle, and your Greek debacle. Lao's name was still on there, and you had thought about trying to get it removed as some kind of clumsy welcome back gesture, but now? You weren't so sure it was necessary.

Ainsley stared. There were a lot of names on the wall. "I...I'm sorry."

You shrugged, not wanting to think about her uncle's connection to your dead friends. You couldn't trust your reactions right now. Lacroix didn't think Ainsley had anything useful to add, but he'd warned you to keep things civil. "This is what all my soldiering got me," you said, bitterness creeping into your voice. "A lot of dead friends and some foreshadowing about what I should expect for myself."

Ainsley stepped back, one hand over her mouth. "Ms. Strike! That's just not true!"

You stood up, taking a deep breath. She was right. It wasn't true. Not entirely. But you weren't in the mood to be fair and rational right now. "Sorry, Ms. Petras. I'm not going to be good company." You jammed your hands in your pockets and walked back toward the main building, not waiting to hear her reply.

You headed up to the officer quarters. Genji and Jesse were on a mission, and it looked like they'd taken Hanzo along. Lacroix was in a meeting with Captain Amari and Ziv was working on something with Winton. But you weren't sure if you wanted to talk to anyone directly involved with Lao's situation just yet.

You knocked on the door, wondering if this was a mistake. After half a minute passed, you turned to go.

The door opened then, and Amélie stared at you questioningly. "Chanceux, what a wonderful surprise! Won't you come in?"

"I...hope I'm not interrupting," you said, rubbing the back of your neck.

"Not at all," Amélie waved a hand. "I was just reading a delightfully trashy novel." She wore a striped black and white shirt, cropped jeans, and a violet silk scarf tied in a jaunty knot around her neck. Her hair was pulled back in a high ponytail. Her look was anything too fancy, though with her it was impossible to tell. She stepped back from the door, beckoning you inside. "Come in, sit, please. Can I get you something? Bordeaux? Merlot? A cab? Would you prefer a white? Or something stronger? I have cognac too."

"...I'll have what you're having," you said, sitting down on the plush plum couch. You looked around, noticing pictures of a younger Amélie strewn over the coffee table. They were mostly of ballet performances and practices. Primadonna Amélie floating across the stage in a feathered swan outfit. Teenage Amélie looking serious as she stretched at the barre. Preteen Amélie sitting on the studio floor with another girl. The two of them giggling and whispering to each other. There was something familiar about her friend. She had striking reddish brown hair, with handsome features, but you could not place her. Of course, kids tended to blend together, so it wasn't a surprise.

"I was looking at some of my old photos," Amélie admitted as she poured you a glass of cognac and curled up on the couch beside you, her gaze serious. "And then I grew too sentimental and decided to read a trashy novel instead. You are far better company than V. Tethras. And yes, I am aware, that is a terrible nom de plume."

That's right, Amélie had spent her entire life training and working to get where she was. And then she had to give it all up, because Talon decided they wanted to shit in Lacroix's personal life.

"Fuck Talon," you said. "And screw your husband too, for being so damn good at pissing other people off."

Amélie laughed softly at that. "This is not Gérard's fault. You have said yourself that he could never make me do anything I didn't choose to."

"...I know," you said, taking a swig of cognac and sighing as the sweet alcohol burned your throat. The crystal was heavy in your hand and you set it carefully on the table. "Sorry."

"Oh no, Gérard is very good at getting under other people's skin," Amélie laughed. "And he is so very underhanded. He needs strong companions to keep him honest. Or at least, bearable." She winked. "And despite your complaints about him, you don't actually harbor any ill will toward Gérard."

You blinked, and found yourself taking another drink. "Have you heard how we talk to each other?"

"Yes, it is so very delightful. Gérard truly enjoys verbally sparring with you and Ziv." She clapped her hands together. "I have a box of chocolates set aside. Would you like some?"

"...I wouldn't say "no," you admitted, finishing off your cognac, your fraying nerves already starting to quiet down a little. "But don't trouble."

Amélie was already up and moving. She grabbed a gold box of chocolates and poured you more cognac. "I am going to hide the menu sheet, and you will just have to guess what filling you are going to get," she said happily, setting the open box in front of you.

You rolled your eyes and took an oval one. It tasted like almond cream and sugar. "...Marzipan." You took another one, pleased to find it filled with ganache.

"Coconut," Amélie said thoughtfully, as she popped one into her mouth. It occurred to you then that she already knew what all the chocolates contained. "Where is Isha?"

"In her kennel. Don't look at me like that: you have nice things. You do not want a juvenile velociraptor in your rooms. You won't have nice things any more."

Amélie waved her hand dismissively. "They are just things, anyway. It's not like I brought the family heirlooms to Zurich. The grandfather clock would look appalling in here. Too...cramped." She paused thoughtfully. "Did you say Ms. Zhai would be putting more of them on the market soon?"

"...I could see if she has more available," you said, recalling all those other incubators. "She said she was going to test it out. She wanted to ensure they found...good homes." Suddenly you pictured a violet raptor with elaborate tail feathers, lounging on this couch, wearing a diamond collar and eating fancy chocolates with Amélie. The publicity photos alone would be amazing.

"Do not worry about calling in favors, Chanceux. I can afford her selling prices," Amélie said sipping her cognac. She glanced at the pictures. "I was feeling nostalgic, true, but I do not regret my decisions. You must realize we used the dance troupe as a cover for a great deal of Gérard's intelligence work. Ballerinas do travel quite a bit. We hear things. We meet people." She shrugged. "And now that I am an officially a sniper, I do not need that cover any more. Oh, I still dance, and I will admit, I do miss performing, but working with Gérard has always been my true pleasure."

"Is it just Lacroix or-?"

"Don't be jealous, Chanceux. I adore working with you too," Amélie beamed, leaning in to kiss your cheek. "You are so much fun."

You touched your face, still not used to Amélie's open and flirtacious affection. "It wasn't a personal statement. I was trying to say that you really seem to enjoy the thrill of dangerous missions," you said, recalling her stunt in Budapest.

Amélie nodded happily. "I cannot deny it." She scooped the pictures up, pausing over the one with her friend.

"Who is that?" You asked, sipping your drink.

"Oh, that is Odile. We were best friends growing up," Amélie giggled. "Inseparable."

"Oh. Do you still talk to her?" You regretted the question instantly, because you didn't talk to anyone from your childhood. Well, maybe you did. But they didn't talk back.

"Oh yes," Amélie laughed. "We talk all the time. Though, I suppose things have changed." She gave a Gallic shrug, never losing that amused look. You had the feeling you were missing something, but that was fine. It wasn't actually your business. Amélie topped off your glass. "So what is bothering you?"

"That obvious, huh?" You knew better than to think you could fool Amélie, at least when it came to feelings. She'd probably twigged it as soon as she opened the door. All the small talk, booze, and chocolate had been to put you at ease. And it had worked.

Amélie just offered you more chocolates.

Taking a deep breath, you updated her on Lao. You strongly suspected she knew most of this already. Lacroix said he didn't keep secrets from her. But apparently Gabriel kept some from you. You weren't even sure if you had a good reason to be upset at anyone. Lao was going to undergo a risky operation. Gabriel had been talking to her, and you still trying to figure out what that was about. But your insides were all twisted up and you weren't entirely sure where to start untangling your feelings.

"From what I can gather, Gabriel has been actively trying to rehabilitate her," Amélie said, swirling her glass. "I did not realize you knew nothing of it. Ziv has been visiting her as well. For personal reasons."

"Rivka and Lao were close," you said, biting your lip. Of course, Ziv wouldn't tell you what he was doing. It didn't surprise you that Lao would choose to see him and not you. There was minimal baggage attached to him, and while you were glad she wasn't alone, it still stung that she'd literally rather see anyone else besides you.

"It is all right to be wounded, Chanceux," Amélie sighed. "Your Lao is not thinking clearly. And honestly, if she deserves even half the loyalty you have given her, she will regret how she has treated you." Amélie's voice grew stern, her gaze sharp.
"...Umm..." Was that a threat? Because that sounded like a threat to you. You glanced at you cognac, a little surprised to see the glass still full. Amélie had to be stealth-refilling it.

"And I know you wish to be supportive, but for now it is best for you to keep your distance. You cannot be at the mill and the oven at the same time: there is only so much you can do," she said gently.

"I think I understand what you mean."

"And you are already dragging around enough saucepans."

"OK, now I'm lost." You took another drink.

"You have enough baggage, Chanceux." Amélie's eyes grew distant. "I suppose Gabriel was trying to make some sort of discernable progress before involving you."

"Yeah, you're probably right," you muttered into your glass. "It just really threw me. Because before he didn't want anything to do with her, and...then later on he retracted that. So, yeah. I guess I shouldn't be so shocked. I'm just dumb." You rubbed your forehead. "Still, I hate being blindsided more than almost anything in the world," you said. "It pisses me off so much. You know how it is: you have go over everything looking for some clue that you missed. Some glaring red flag that you magically overlooked. You have to agonize over everything for hours-

"You really do not," Amélie laughed. "You are not perfect. I am not perfect. We are both amazing, but we still make mistakes. Do not be foolish and hold yourself to impossible standards."

You slumped over, hating that she was totally right and you were doing that thing you repeatedly told Gabriel and Jack not to do. "Yeah."

"That doesn't mean you have to let Gabriel off with just a moderate, "oui amour, keep important secrets from me, I completely understand," she said cheerfully. She stood up, doing a little twirl, slow and graceful, before winking at you.

"...What exactly are you saying?"

"Make your displeasure known. Very vocally. In a way he doesn't expect."

You frowned, a little worried.

Amélie rested the back of her hand on her forehead, eyes fluttering shut. "My love, how could you?" She cried, flinging herself onto the couch, her face buried in the throw pillow beside you. It was quite the swan dive, made more impressive by the fact that the gel padded foam cushions barely rustled.

She peeked up, dark eyes shining behind the pillow. "And then, when he comes closer to check on you, you pounce!" She lunged forward, landing halfway in your lap with a delighted laugh, the throw pillow clutched in her hand like a bludgeon. "And now that you have him trapped, you can exact your revenge!"

"Um..." you tried to picture yourself doing that and cracked a grin. "I don't have your flair for dramatics, Amélie."

"That is all right," Amélie giggled as she turned over, lying face up in your lap. "You can practice on my couch. Come on." She tugged on your hand. "It will be fun!"
You let her pull you to your feet, and laughed as she struck a pose. "Gérard, mon loup, how could you forget the camembert? Now we will only have three kinds of cheese with supper!"

Heaving a world weary sigh, Amélie threw herself onto the couch with abandon. "How do you expect me to live under these conditions?" She gave a mock sob, shoulders shaking from laughter.

Chuckling, you stood there, until she turned around and looked at you expectantly.

"Your turn," she said, rolling over.

You had to take a moment to think about your complaint.

"Oh Jack...how could you wear socks with sandals?" Laughing you hurled yourself at the couch, more like a professional wrestler than a hysterical woman in distress.

"Non," Amélie gasped, hugging her throw pillow. "Il ne fait pas ça!"

"He does," you nodded emphatically. "I caught him last week! They were white athletic socks with the gray stripe around the top!"

"Vraiment? Gabriel hasn't stopped him?"

"Gabriel wasn't there," you said, then dramatically raised your hand to your chest. "Oh Gabriel, where were you in our hour of need?" You fell sideways onto the couch, laughing.

"If it happens again, and you need backup, do not hesitate to call me, Chanceux. I will come running. We cannot allow the Strike Commander to be seen in public like that!" Amélie's expression was suddenly grim. "It will irrevocably tarnish our image!"

You blinked, not so sure that Amélie was joking any more.

"We will host an intervention. I will get Ana. You must call Gabriel. Athena will help us contain the fallout, and Ziv will scrub the internet of all traces..."

"Uh..." You reached for your cognac. Because suddenly you needed it.

Amélie's brow furrowed in concentration. "I will buy him new socks. You will start to lose the old ones. Gabriel can dispose of the sandals. Gérard can find a new supplier for Overwatch. That is the solution. We will no longer provide white socks for uniforms..."

Chapter End Notes

Finally listened to Pray for the Wicked by Panic at the Disco in all it's glory. Writing a fight to it, and it's a lot of fun. I haven't heard anything that makes me want to dance a lot for a long time.

I have acquired a giant anglerfish plush for sidekick purposes.

I've been full of awful things lately, and it's a real trial to keep my mouth shut. My favorite line is still "Intestines? More like out-testines, am I right?" I don't even remember the context. But we were talking about evisceration.

Today, this lady literally could not understand why we couldn't order a DVD set for her (they were no longer available and are probably out of print) and didn't want the one we could order, but just kept asking the same question over and over again like the answer was going to change. She actually said, "I don't mean to question you, but are you sure?" in a super bitchy voice and yeah. Yeah.

Then I got another one right after who made a bunch of demands, her husband was super high maintenance, and then she wanted the "historical novels." I told her we didn't have a separate section for historical fiction. She angrily told me, "no, I want history and biography novels." I had to explain that "novel" means a work of fiction, but I could show her the history and biography books. Please keep in mind, all of these people were adults, 40-60, old enough to know better, young enough not to be senile.

So there was just too much stupid at work in a short period of time. I had to go to the receiving room, climb up on the counter, bend my knees, clench my fists, and shriek "WRRRRYYYYYYYYYYYYYYYYYYYYY." No one really expected that. One of my coworkers asked if that noise really came out of my body. Heh. And my throat still hurts, but I felt better afterward.

Hope everyone has better coping mechanisms. I'm eating candy. Like a good adult.
Chapter 88

Chapter Summary

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

There was a knock at the door, and Amélie giggled as she went to answer it. You sat on the couch, the cognac gone, the box of chocolates empty.

"Oh, Jack. We were just talking about you!" Amélie said, looking over her shoulder and winking. "What do you...Oh!"

You rose, blinking as Jack stepped inside, his coat rustling. You raised a brow as Isha's head popped out of his collar with a triumphant cry. She trilled when she saw you and you shook your head. Jack had gone into your room and retrieved your murderbird.

"Hey," Jack said, his smile gentle. "She was so happy to see me, I couldn't just leave her..."

You shook your head, rolling your eyes as Isha cooed, rubbing her snout against Jack's cheek. She patted his face with her delicate little hands and Amélie's breath caught.

"Wasn't sure if you wanted to join us for dinner? We're eating in my room." Jack gave you a hopeful smile. "Gabriel made that rice and chicken dish you like so much, and I picked up a few different cakes, because I couldn't decide which one looked better..."

You narrowed your eyes, knowing that this was no coincidence.

Isha chirped at you, not entirely sure why you weren't as excited as she was. You leaned in and kissed her snout, making sure scratch her head. She watched you expectantly.

"Sure," you said, glancing at Amélie. "Just give me a minute. I'll catch up."

Jack leaned in and kissed your nose, beaming. "Of course, sweetheart." Whistling, he headed off, chatting happily at Isha.

"...They're working together," you said, cursing under your breath.

"Yes," Amélie sighed. "I am afraid I must encourage you to change your strategy."

"...I'd hide, but they have my murderbird," you said.

Amélie laughed. "Yes, yes they do."

"This is now a hostage situation and I am outgunned," you said, shaking your head. "Damn them."

"Yes," Amélie said. "You certainly are. It is a good thing you don't require guns to settle this." She clapped her hands together, looking downright devious.
"What am I going to do?"

"Go to dinner and enjoy their fussing. Have a lovely time. Then take Gabriel to task for his sins of omission. If they spoil the anger out of you, that is actually in your favor. You must still communicate your displeasure. But if you can do it calmly with stilettos in your smile, so much the better: keep the message simple and clear. Do not just "let it go," especially without making your feelings known."

"...I'm not that kind of girl," you said, smiling wryly. "But I think we both know that."

"Let them get comfortable, then pounce. No need to even raise your voice. And you must tell me all about it later," Amélie said, patting your back. "I am cheering for you, Chanceux. Make me proud!" There was a moment of silence. "And if you can start hiding Jack's socks..."

Laughing, you straightened up and headed for Jack's quarters.

The lights were low, and Gabriel bent over the coffee table, setting plates and silverware on it. You kicked off your shoes, eyes widening as he turned to face you. He wore black collared shirt and pressed trousers, his tie was an emerald shade of green. He'd foregone that hat and styled his curls.

"Gabe, did you want the Chardonnay or the blonde ale?" Jack came out of the bedroom, now wearing a navy blue button down, his white tie resting over his shoulders.

"What would you like, corazon?" Gabriel asked.

"The ale," you said, because it was less potent than the wine, and also you were a little wary of the quality of wine Jack kept around. If someone had given it to him, it might be decent, but if he bought it himself, well, usually it was because he liked the picture on the label or the novelty shape of the bottle.

Jack went to the fridge to get the drinks.

Isha climbed onto the back of the couch, chirping angrily. She was wearing what had to be a handsewn vest in Overwatch blue, and a little black tie, and it was the cutest damn thing you'd ever seen. Scooping her up, you rubbed her head.

"You look very stylish," you told her, admiring the doll-sized buttons. "You're always adorable, but this is ridiculously so. Don't fuss. You will probably get twice the treats in that outfit."

She cocked her head the side, giving you a thoughtful look.

"Yes, if you start letting us dress you up, I know Amélie will feed you more of those fancy cheeses you like. She thinks you have exquisite taste in appetifs." You knew she was just a gluttonous little monster.

Gabriel began to pour the drinks. There was a steaming enamel pot of arroz con pollo, a plate of fried plantains, and a salad topped with chorizo and fresh avocado slices.

"I was told there would be cake?" You sat down on the couch, giving Jack a wry smile. You felt completely underdressed for the dinner, but then they were doing this to butter you up.
"There is chocolate, tres leches, and a Doctor Bird cake, Hummingbird cake in the South, I think: lots of pineapple, cinnamon, and walnuts," Jack said. "But you have to eat your dinner first." He frowned, still tying his tie.

"OK, dad. Should I change too?"

"Never," Jack said, kissing your nose.

"Should I change clothes?"

"No need, unless you want to," Gabriel said, sitting down on your other side.

"I'll see what I have here," you said, getting up and heading to Jack's bedroom. Some of your formal shirts were still hanging up in his closet; they were left over from the series of funerals you'd attended together. You pulled on a black button down and changed out of your fatigues into a pair of jeans.

"Want to borrow a tie?" Jack murmured, coming up behind you as you finished buttoning your shirt.

"Sure," you said, going with the theme of the evening.

Jack draped a slim gold tie over your shoulders and tied it for you, sneaking kisses along the back of your neck as he worked.

"Flashy," you said, turning your head to look at him.

"It suits you," he said, and kissed you softly. His smile was gentle. "You feeling all right?"

"Better," you said.

"Gabe's worried," Jack said as you turned all the way around to face him. His hands rested on your hips, he pressed his forehead to yours, eyes bright.

"He has reason to be," you said, stroking his cheek. "And maybe you do too. Because at the very least, you're his accomplice."

"I'm innocent, boss," Jack said, laughing softly. "As far as I know. At least enjoy dinner first. Then you can move on to trials and executions."

"You're not slick, Morrison," you said, patting his cheek.

He caught your hand between his, and kissed your knuckles. "I'm just glad you're here, and not off in say...Jo-burg with McCree."

Shaking your head, you left the bedroom. Gabriel was pouring drinks and he had made you plate. Isha sat on the floor, holding a tiny fork and a tiny spoon in her little hands, not looking impressed at all. There was a plate of food in front of her and she stared at it longingly.

You had to cover your mouth as Gabriel handed you your plate. "Thank you," you said, lips quirking upward.

Gabriel flashed you a warm smile. He leaned in, smelling faintly of cologne and spices. He kissed your cheek.

"What have you done to my raptor?"
"Go on Isha, show her good table manners," Gabriel said.

Isha stabbed a piece of chicken with the fork, and scooped up some rice with the spoon. Balancing them carefully, she crammed both utensils into her mouth, chewed on them for a moment, and then spat them onto her plate, clean of food. She swallowed her food, looked at Gabriel defiantly, and then started eating with her little hands.

"...Well," you said. "It seems I've had the wrong idea of good manners this entire time. Don't I feel silly."

Gabriel only laughed, and the three of you sat on the couch, with you sandwiched in the middle. You ate your dinner, listening to Jack and Gabriel chat amiably about Isha, the meal, and what they wanted to do on the upcoming Washington DC trip.

You ate slowly, savoring the piquant spice of the chorizo blending with the smooth ripe avocado. Gabriel had put extra cheese on your rice and you didn't mind at all. There was a tug on your trousers and Isha stood at your feet, wings extended. You lifted her up and sat her between you and Gabriel. Jack would let her eat off his plate, and you didn't want to encourage that.

She nestled down between you, yawning as she eyed your food. You offered her a piece of plantain and she took it carefully, though her vest was already covered in crumbs.

"What do you think, baby? Anywhere you want to go in DC?" Jack nudged you with his elbow.

"Haven't really thought about it," you said, looking up. "Mostly been doing the mission planning."

"There are a lot of good restaurants," Gabriel said.

"A lot of American history," Jack said. "We could see the monuments if you like."

"But the museums are more interesting," Gabriel added.

"Are we going to have time for any of that?" You shook your head and continued eating. "I don't mind tagging along wherever you guys want to go. I'll have to read a travel guide and see if there's anything that really catches my interest." You paused. "I'm going to have to find a sitter for Isha. We can't take her with us."

"Probably wisest not to. Too much scrutiny and work. Ana is sitting this round out - we need someone to run things back here. Wilhelm probably isn't coming either. I'm not sure about Mihret. I think Gérard might actually be bringing him. And Tataryn should be back soon. He owes you a hefty favor or two," Gabriel mused, rubbing his chin. "If you needed suggestions."

"I could bribe Winston too," you said. "She likes him a lot."

Gabriel rolled his eyes, probably thinking something unkind about having an animal babysit a pet.

"What kind of cake do you want to start with?" Jack asked, taking your empty plate. "Oh, that's a silly question. I'll get you a little of each."

You sipped your beer, starting off with the tres leches cake, the sweet creaminess light and pleasant. The chocolate cake was much denser, rich and thick, and covered in a bittersweet dark chocolate butter cream. The Doctor Bird cake was delicious, fruity, well-spiced, and moist. You gave Isha some of the pineapple and spiced walnuts.

"You're spoiling her," Gabriel said, shaking his head.

Isha ignored him, rubbing her head against your side, thrumming happily.

"Let's take your cute little outfit off and put you to bed," you said. Isha held still as you found the Velcro back seam and carefully removed it. The tie and collar also had a Velcro fastener. She chirped her thanks and you carried her to the kennel, giving her a quick kiss on the head before you shut her in for the night. She curled up against the stuffed dog, cooing.

You sat back down on the couch and finished your cake, conscious of Gabriel watching you cautiously. Jack refilled your beer, leaning over to kiss your cheek.

"I hear you had a rough day," Jack said.

"There were some hard moments," you agreed. Amélie was right. Yelling right now would be counterproductive. Especially since they went to all that trouble to try to cheer you up. Sure it was self-preservation, but you liked this sweet treatment better than any kind of defensive argument Gabriel could have started. You weren't going to let it go though. Nope.

"So..." Gabriel began, as you set your plate down. "Did you want to talk about it?"

"I don't have anything to add just yet," you said. "Because I'm still not really sure what is going on. So if anyone is going to talk, I think it's going to have to be you doing some explaining." You inclined your head toward him, smile polite.

Jack sucked in a breath and while he didn't scoot away, he leaned backward, away from the danger.

Gabriel rubbed his temples. "You're upset."

"Yes," you agreed. "Mostly because I wasn't expecting Lao to call me up and let me know she was planning to undergo a life-threatening procedure or that such a thing was even an option."

"You're upset at me though."

"It looks like you were involved, and certainly didn't tell me anything. So I don't know enough not to be upset at you right now," you said, folding your hands in your lap. "But I'm willing to listen."

Gabriel flashed you a wry smile. "You were right all along. I was...unfair. Agent Lao was one of mine. I should have taken more responsibility. I shouldn't have just left it up to you. That's no reflection on your abilities. I just should have taken a more active role. I'm trying to fix that."

You raised a brow. "You said as much when we were in Iceland. Did you just start talking to her?"

"No. I sat her down when you were on your first Shanghai trip," he said. "Mihret joined the meetings after our London trip, when Gérard was taking you to task about Zenyatta."

You narrowed your eyes, not missing how Gabriel was spreading the blame. Oh, you'd deal with Ziv and Lacroix later. Lacroix kept his counsel, certainly. And you'd have to be extra careful there. But Ziv? Oh, Ziv was going to get it.
"She's been seeing someone who specializes in deprogramming. Mihret's been there for social calls. Even if he blunders along, they seem to speak the same awkward language. And while you know I'm not Mihret's biggest fan, you should know that she asked him not to repeat anything he'd learned to you. And I think he was trying to win her trust."

You took a deep breath. "I'll talk to Ziv before I bite his head off."

"You don't have to," Gabriel said, sounding amused. "Anyway, Angela's been doing further research on the cybernetics. It seems she's liaised with your nurse and Feng and the breakthrough is thanks to their collaboration: the technical work is pretty high-level, but I've been supervising the whole affair."

"Why didn't you tell me?"

Gabriel sighed. "I did. Today."

"Why didn't you tell me sooner?" You scowled, because your first Shanghai trip had been months ago.

"There was little to tell. Her progress is understandably slow and her feelings about you are complicated, though she doesn't hate you nearly as much as she wants you to believe," he said. "Angela's offer to replace the spinal cybernetics is the biggest advance we've had. I didn't want to offer you any false hope, corazon."

There was a lump in your throat and you stared at the coffee table.

Gabriel rested a hand on your leg. "Talk to me?"

"You do remember in Iceland, when you finally told me about your SEP issues and all that entailed, despite the fact I'd asked about it earlier?" You tilted your head back, staring at the ceiling. "And you both agreed that even if there was nothing I could do, you should have talked to me sooner..."

Gabriel sighed. "Yes, but honestly, this situation has been on the backburner till recently."

You struggled to put your feelings into words, taking a moment to breathe. "You and Jack both want me to be better at communication, and I'm trying. Really. But where does that leave me when you don't tell me the important things? I know you have to keep a lot of secrets. I get it and I'm trusting you here, Gabriel." You looked at him. "But you're making it difficult. You know how important she is to me. I...Yes, it upset me that you did all this and didn't tell me a thing till months later."

"Ah." Gabriel nodded, closing his eyes. "I suspected you would be unhappy, but I didn't think about it in those terms. For me it was just a slow progressing operation, with nothing to report." He took your left hand in his, gently rubbing your palm. "I'm sorry, corazon. I never want to jeopardize your trust in me."

You glanced at Jack, who had obviously helped Gabriel set this up.

"I didn't know about it till today, honest," Jack said, hands up in a surrender pose. "Gabe just told me that he'd messed up and needed help making it up to you. I told you, I'm innocent, baby."

Gabriel snorted.
You glanced back at him, wondering what that meant.

"It's true. I didn't tell Jack either, not because I don't trust him, but because I honestly didn't think there was anything to share."

You weren't sure if Jack would have told you, because he was even more prone to overlooking feelings, but you didn't need to pick a fight based on theoreticals. Shaking your head, you sat forward on the couch. "I would have liked to know that she had someone other than Lacroix to talk to. Yes, I'm hurt that she wants to talk to everyone, but me. But it would have been a relief to know that other people were looking after her."

Gabriel rubbed your back. "I am sorry." He kissed your hand, lips brushing over your knuckles.

You sat there, Jack rubbed the back of your neck, leaning over to kiss your cheek.

"Can I just interrupt to say that I'm really glad you stuck around to talk about this?" Jack murmured in your ear. "Even if we still have to get the mats out and I have to risk life and limb to save Gabriel from your bloodthirsty rage, I'm just happy you're here."

You laughed softly at that, shaking your head at his exaggeration.

"Hey, I already learned my lesson about standing between you and your hackers," Jack chuckled. "But Gabe...well, sometimes he's kind of dense."

You and Gabriel both laughed at that.

"Thank you, for staying and talking to me," Gabriel said, leaning in, his breath warm against your ear. "You...handled this gracefully."

"You two are ridiculous," you muttered. "Dressing up, making me dinner, you're just trying to keep me from getting mad-"

"Did it work?" Gabriel purred, nuzzling your shoulder. "Because it's worth all the trouble if it worked, even just a little..."

"Yeah," you said, hanging your head. "You are too smooth, Gabriel Reyes. I did want to take it to the mats, but now I'm too sluggish and full of food. Well-played."

Gabriel lifted you onto his lap, his laugh warm and rich. "Have I told you how adorable you are when you're reluctantly reasonable?" He kissed the back of your neck, his arms wrapped around your waist. "I'll do better, baby. I promise."

"If you keep making Isha little outfits and cook dinner for the rest of the week, I think I'll be inclined to forgive you," you said.

Gabriel's laughter rumbled against your back and he hugged you tighter. "Now you're just taking advantage of me-"

"Jack, back me up here," you said, lips curving upward.

"She has a point, Gabriel. She's been pretty lenient..." Jack chuckled. "And I did leave the office early to help you set this up. Got some pretty strange looks at the bakery too. Also, Isha does look damn adorable in those fancy little getups..."
"Mmm, I suppose I could agree to your penal terms," Gabriel said, nibbling on your shoulder. "The things I do to keep you two satisfied." There was no real reluctance in his voice though.

You glanced sideways at Jack, who was smiling at you both, his eyes gentle. "Thanks Jack, for helping him out." You leaned over and kissed him. He leaned into your touch, groaning as you ran your fingers down his chest.

"Baby-"

Gabriel's hand slid under your shirt, his warm hands ghosting along your sides. You shivered, turning your head to kiss him.

Jack began to loosen his tie, his gaze growing wilder. "Sweetheart-"

You ran your fingertips along Jack’s jawline, heart rate spiking as he sucked them into his mouth, tongue swirling along your knuckles. "Why don't we take this to the bedroom?"

"...Your Isha does not like me," Tataryn said, nursing a bloody finger. "I do not think this a good idea." The two of you sat in the rec room, the TV on, while Tataryn tried to coax her into nicely taking chunks of ham from him.

Isha sat on the coffee table, chewing angrily while she eyed Tataryn. You had introduced him as friendly, so you weren't entirely sure why she was being so aggressive.

"That's funny, because Isha likes Kseniya, and Kseniya really likes Isha," you said, voice silky. You were sure he got the message that it would be a shame if Kseniya found out that he wasn't getting along with your murderbird. "Curiously, whose idea was it for her to spy at her boarding school?"

"Hers," Tataryn said, shaking his head, and he did not look proud: it surprised you a little. "She is her mother's child. If she were more like me, she would keep her head down and simply fleece her wealthier classmates. She is quite the little busybody." He gave a "what can I do?" shrug and shook his head. "I saw some her pictures. Thank you again for taking her out. She had a wonderful time."

You waited for him to admonish you about the sheer quantity of sweets you'd fed his kid. But he just flashed you a happy smile.

"I knew you'd be good with her, Lucky. She can't stop raving about all the cakes, cookies, ice cream, and tarts you bought her." He didn't even look mad. "You were so generous, it's overwhelming."

You wondered then how good of a spy this kid could be if she couldn't keep those things secrets, but then Tataryn was her father and part of his job was finessing the truth out of a reluctant people. "Oh, I was worried you'd be upset about all the "rules" I flaunted," you said, sounding anything but worried.

Tataryn shrugged again. "Eh, those were more...guidelines than anything. Kseniya had fun. That's what matters."
You rubbed your forehead, wondering if he was just hiding his dismay or if he was so clever that he'd manipulated you into rage-buying his child an imperial ton of sweets. Goddamn hustler. Either way, you weren't winning this confrontation. Not from that angle.

"Well, you can return the favor by helping watch Isha while I'm gone. Don't give me that look. I already found a spot for Távio, Chang agreed to take him on a trial basis after Family Day. If that doesn't work out, then you can go back to working on a placement for him."

Tataryn laughed. "Oh Lucky, what do I know about murderbirds?"

"I have an entire manual you can reference," you said. "And Rein and Winston have already agreed to help too. So you're not on your own." You didn't trust Tataryn to do anything without some oversight. "Gabriel's come up with another training regimen for her, and I think you'll like the it. It involves lots of sneaking."

Tataryn eyed your murderbird speculatively. "She is quite smart, yes?"

"She can open doors now," you said. "I've put a tracker in her collar, but I assume it's only a matter of time before she figures that out. And she's been sniffing around the vents, so make sure you keep her harness on. Athena has also been helping me keep an eye on her."

"Those little hands are very delicate..." Tataryn eyed her speculatively, and you wondered if there would be a series of jewel thefts while you were out.

"You are not using her to break into places," you said firmly.

"...The thought never crossed my mind," Tataryn said smoothly, though you knew better than to believe him. "All right, Lucky, I will do this thing for you. With Winston and Wilhelm's help, of course. In fact, I think if I get enough peanut butter and currywurst, maybe they will do most of the work, yes?"

"Maybe," you said, understanding that was the best you could hope for.

Tataryn sat back on the couch looking smug. You had one more thing to fling at him.

"So, I know it's not my business, but you need to talk to your kid. She has some suspicions about her paternity and thinks that's why you don't spend much time with her."

Tataryn's transformation was instantaneous; his face hardened, his shoulders tensed. "She is my daughter," he said, voice chilly. "When she cried in the night, I rocked her to sleep. When she took her first steps, then fell on face, I was there to pick her up. When her mother was murdered..." he trailed off, gritting his teeth.

"Then talk to her, Tataryn. She needs to hear it from you," you said. "She's a smart kid, but she draws some pretty cynical conclusions. Think she's developing some abandonment issues too." And you would recognize those.

Tataryn ran his fingers through his hair. "I see," he said, tone going from angry to flat.

"Don't get snippy with me, I'm just passing on my observations," you said and reached over to pat Isha's head. She'd been awfully quiet, and when you looked down, you realized then that she'd been helping herself to the ham while you were distracted by Tataryn. The entire package was now gone. "Really, Isha?" You held up the empty packaging, with a frown.

She looked around, pretending not to see and began to groom herself, paying extra attention
"No, thank you for sharing. I had not realized that things had progressed that far. I will...talk to her," Tataryn said. "I was hoping that discussion could wait, but..." He leaned back on the couch, propping his feet up on the coffee table. "Anything else I should know?"

"...Stop telling her I'm in love with you," you deadpanned. "I know you're the reason she thinks that."

Tataryn began to laugh, not even trying to deny it. "You aren't? After all we've been through together?" He clutched at his chest, shoulders shaking. "How could you do this to me?" He choked out. "Such a cruel woman-"

Rolling your eyes, you scooped up Isha and left Tataryn in the rec room, still doubled over laughing.

"Reyes, you smarmy bastard, it's been forever!" The older man's ribbons and medals jangled as he clapped Gabriel on the back, laughing as he turned the move into a bearhug. "And you can still fit your goddamn army uniform, you fucking showoff!"

Gabriel stood in the office, not in Blackwatch gear, but in a pixelated camouflage uniform. The chestpiece was bizarrely ostentatious, with a brilliant red crest in the center, and he rocked the sleeveless leather duster that he wore over the whole ensemble. It had to be hot, but you were standing in an air conditioned office, and Gabriel could always just take off his jacket. Or more...

"It's General Singh, now is it?" Gabriel laughed, returning the hug. "How the hell did that happen?"

"Nobody else wanted the job." General Akal Singh was short, but thickly built, with mahogany skin, a turban, and a beard the color of steel wool. He was probably in his early fifties. "I might have arm wrestled for it while I was drunk. I don't remember any more."

Gabriel laughed even harder at that. "You lying bastard, you've been maneuvering for this for years!"

Singh just gave a satisfied smirk. "Yeah, well, we can't all be famous international heroes. Just glad I could finally get you to grace us with your presence-"

Gabriel rolled his eyes. "Well if you'd been the one to ask me, jefe..."

Singh sat on his large wooden desk, his gaze traveling to you and Jesse. The two of you were in your Overwatch armor sets, in official colors and everything for Operation Black Abacus. Your new set, because you'd battered the shit out of your first one on Operation Cobblestone Dust, now bore the same protective metal collar your Blackwatch armor had. Your carbine and wakizashi stayed clipped to your back. Your tanto stayed on your hip, and you'd brought a blue shemagh, just in case you needed to be more...discrete. But after this visit to so many "official" installations alongside Gabriel, you'd be on radar, not just with the US intelligence community, but probably Talon. Still, you knew you couldn't stay a shadow forever, not if you were in Jack and Gabriel's bodyguard rotation. Lacroix had agreed with this assessment, acknowledging the value of your work was worth the end of your anonymity, and telling you to keep your head down as best you could.

Jesse wore his hat low over his eyes, his black serape draped to hide the movement of his arms. He was more nervous about this visit than you, chewing on his bottom lip and staring hard at walls. Of course, Jesse had been a member of the Deadlock gang: some people might recognize him.

Singh studied you both, his brown eyes sharp. "If you tell me they're your secretaries, I'm going to dump my coffee on your head."

"You wish you could reach that high," Gabriel smirked. "Agent Strike in fact does handle quite a bit of my paperwork. It's what makes her so mean."

With half your face behind your metal collar, you let yourself smile at that.

"And Agent McCree can do it in a pinch."

"Bodyguards who do your paperwork? Maybe you Overwatch folks are on to something," Singh said, shaking his head. "And who look like that? Honestly Reyes, what else are they? Your backup dancers?"

Jesse snorted, but you narrowed your eyes.

Gabriel just laughed. "Jealous, Akal?"

"Choking on it," he admitted.

"Well, now that you've met them, I'd prefer if you used their callsigns. Gunslinger," Gabriel said, gesturing to Jesse. "And Wendigo." He pointed at you slyly.

You weren't sure if the nickname came from the cannibalism rumors Tataryn had started. Or if Gabriel just liked giving you "hungry monster" callsigns. Either way, someone was going to get it later.

Singh raised his brows. "Well...I never expected you to start a superhero team, but I approve. Maybe you can get them those fancy spandex outfits?"

"How have you not been done for sexual harassment yet?" Gabriel laughed, rolling his eyes.

"I don't say that shit to people under me. Your Gunslinger and Wendigo don't work for me, so they can tell me to fuck off. Anyway, did you want a tour of the facilities?"

"No, but I'm sure you want to walk us around the base making smartass comments," Gabriel said.

"I want more of your time, Reyes. You're not just here to give rousing speeches for the DOD," Singh said shaking a finger. "Morrison wouldn't even do it, and he's got more patience for the brass than you do."

"The brass?" Gabriel laughed. "Like you aren't one of them now."

"Guilty," Singh said with a pained smile. "But I want to hear all about it. You wouldn't come unless there was something big."

Gabriel just smiled politely. "Maybe I just missed your ugly face."
Singh laughed at that, his expression still thoughtful as he turned his gaze back to you and Jesse. "Well then, shall we begin the tour?"

At first you thought it was an Army facility, because SEP had been under the Special Forces branch, but the Quantico Base belonged to the Marines. Apparently, the FBI, DEA, DIA, and other agencies also used it as a training center, so that's where Gabriel would be hosting his talks.

It wasn't too far from DC, and they were bringing all sorts over for a seminar on Omnic Integration and what they were calling "the Overwatch Effect." It had been defined as a popular movement toward the rapid expansion of a globalized task force to handle humanitarian efforts, and international defense, as inspired by Overwatch. Not everyone thought it was a good thing, and you wondered how much backlash Gabriel was going to get today.

Gabriel walked alongside General Singh, while Jesse and you brought up the rear. There was a massive mess hall, large hangers for a variety of vehicles, and lots of people passing through, some in hurry, some not, but all taking a moment to salute General Singh and Gabriel. Then they took a longer moment to stare.

"This is real uncomfortable, sugarpie," Jesse murmured out of the corner of his mouth. "I still think you shoulda brought Genji instead."

"His identity is even more of a secret than ours," you said. And he and Hanzo were helping Epsilon Squad guard Jack. Gabriel might be giving speeches to the military and intelligence community, but the general public wasn't aware of his presence. Jack was visiting DC, ostensibly to request more funding for Overwatch. There would be supporters and protesters in the streets. There would be 24 hour news networks covering his every move. And through it all, Talon would be watching.

You'd already seen a network news puff piece about what Jack ate for dinner yesterday - crap apparently, when you and Gabriel weren't around to feed him. He'd had a Double Quarter Pounder with Cheese, large fries, and gone on to get a milkshake from a local ice cream shop. In contrast, Gabriel had treated you and Jesse to nice steakhouse, one where he apparently knew the owner. The three of you had gotten a discrete booth in the back, and eaten expensive beef while the owner - a man who'd served with Gabriel before SEP - sat with you and chatted about old times, basketball teams, and the best ways to age meat.

"Want to run the night vision obstacle course? We've got some endurance challenges. Maybe you want to test pilot a heli?"

"Fuck you," Gabriel grumbled at Singh. "That's all kids' stuff, and I am already certified to fly, you smart ass."

"Oh come on, your bodyguards are going to be bored here, listening to us veterans shoot the shit."

"I know exactly where this going," Gabriel shook his head. "You haven't changed a bit, general. You just want to pit them against your people for bragging rights and betting pools."

Singh looked over his shoulder, flashing you both a shrewd smile. "Maybe. I am curious about what they can do."

"Maybe you need to sweeten the pot, sir," Jesse drawled. "I mean, what do we get out of this? And don't say "pride in a job well done," because that's cheap as fuck."

You smacked Jesse in the arm. "Don't start, we have a job to do."

"Come on Wendigo, where's your sense of friendly competition?" Gabriel said, smiling with too many teeth. He crossed his arms. "I think as long as one of you is on duty, the other can have a little fun."

You glared at him sharply. You were here to watch his back and observe the crowd. You weren't here to perform like a trained monkey and draw more attention.

"Let's walk. We can find something for each other you. I've got a state of the art range here.
You can even pick the firearms, Gunslinger. And uh...Wendigo, we did just pass the mess hall," Singh chuckled along with Gabriel.

You were going to strangle Gabriel. Shaking your head, you followed, keeping an eye on both men and your surroundings. Singh brought you to an outdoor range, picking up some ear protection as he went. There were several lanes, with a variety of paper, clay, and digital targets.
The porch from the armory building had a few benches, and observers. The occupants straightened up and saluted as soon as they saw Singh.

You and Jesse switched on your decibel blockers, while Gabriel put on a pair of earmuffs.

"I assume Gunslinger might enjoy this?" Singh asked. "Figured Reyes would bring a shooter. You're welcome to join in too...Wendigo."

You just stared flatly at the older man, and he laughed.

Jesse glanced at Gabriel. "Sir?"

"Have at it," Gabriel said cheerfully, leaning up against the building. "But if you make us look bad, you're walking home."

Jesse blew out a breath, shaking his head. "Well what do you got?"

"Is Captain DeVevo here?" Singh asked, not looking surprised when a woman stepped out of her lane, a large rifle slung over her shoulders.

"Sir." She was tan, with fine features, almost too delicate for a soldier. Almost. It looked like she'd put a lot of hard work into correcting that impression: her nose had been broken a few times, a slim scar crossed her left eye, though it seemed like she still had the use of the eye, and she had a strong jaw, chin set at a stubborn angle. She was a street fighter princess in MARPAT camouflage. Her long dark hair was pulled back in a bun.

"Didn't you win a gold in target shooting at the Olympics a few years ago?" Gabriel asked, narrowing his eyes, because wasn't it such a coincidence she was here right now?

"Yes, sir," she said, her voice lower than you expected.

Jesse grinned at her.

"We'd like to have a friendly little competition," Singh said. "DeVevo and Agent...Gunslinger. One of you picks the target, the other picks the weapons."

"Ladies first," Jesse said.

"Fifty meter free pistol, one handed. Six shots since you're carrying a revolver. You can use yours as long as you have iron sights," she said, studying Jesse's stance and weapon.

"I do," he said, tipping his hat and drawing his revolver. "Not to be fresh, but I'll show you mine if you show me yours."

She gave a wry smile and set down her rifle, drawing her pistol from her shoulder holster. "Revolver, huh? That really fits the ensemble, cowboy."

"Jams less than those fancy semi-autos," Jesse said with a shrug. "I can use them too, just prefer this."

The pair of them took two lanes, digital targets appearing in the distance. They were scored based on the rings within the bullseye, the center being the highest point value.

DeVevo shot fast, her posture straight, her face cool as she fired one-handed.

Jesse held himself similarly, a delighted smile on his face as he fanned his revolver. DeVevo was done faster, benefit of a semi-automatic, but when the scores came back, Jesse had beaten her by two points, each of his six shots hitting the target dead center.

Singh whistled appreciatively. "Well, then. That was some fine shooting from you both. Thanks for the demo, Captain."

DeVevo nodded curtly, her expression sour, but the look was gone as soon as she extended her arm to shake Jesse's hand. "That was certainly impressive," she said to him, her eyes thoughtful. "Where'd you get your training?"

Jesse jerked a thumb at Gabriel. "Some from him, some from Captain Amari, ma'am."

She nodded, the look on her face speculative and almost friendly. "Well, nice meeting you, cowboy. Next time I won't hold back."

"Looking forward to it," Jesse said, tipping his hat.

"You think we should buy them dinner?" Singh said, nudging Gabriel.

"I think you owe them something for humoring you," Gabriel drawled. "And you definitely owe me-"

"You're just looking forward to showing off your protégés," Singh said as DeVevo lingered, turning her sharp eyes on you. "What do you specialize in, Wendigo?"

"Cake-eating contests," you said dryly.

Singh raised a fuzzy brow then glanced at Gabriel. Gabriel's eyebrows remained level, and he smiled. Both of Singh's brows rose higher.

You glanced at Jesse, whose eyebrows drew together. You understood what that meant. Yes, Singh and Gabriel both communicated via the eyebrow language with each other. But you and Jesse understood it too.
"Well, I guess we could go back to the food hall—" Singh began.

"Why don't we wander around a bit? I'm sure something will catch Wendigo's eye," Gabriel said, sounding far too smug. "I've eaten the food here, it's passable, but having any kind of mess-catered eating contest is a recipe for disaster. Unless you like spending hours in the bathroom."

You shrugged, not really wanting to eat a bunch of military-grade cake. That just sounded awful, to be honest.

"I figured her for a melee fighter," Singh nodded approvingly. "They're doing combat knife coursework over by the mess hall."

Gabriel's smile widened. You sighed, rubbing your forehead. For some reason, you had flashbacks of fighting Athena in front of the recruits. Oh yes, because that showoff Gabriel got you into that mess too.

"Let's go see," Singh said, rubbing his hands together gleefully. Singh and Gabriel led the way, while you hung back with Jesse and DeVevo.

"I am fine calling you Gunslinger and Wendigo," DeVevo winked at you both. She was tall, with a confident, easy smile. "My given name is Vashtai. Yes, Mom was a bit of a drama queen."

"You can call me Joel," Jesse said with a wink.

"Wend-y," you said and immediately regretted it.

DeVevo laughed. "The general was pretty excited to hear from Commander Reyes. Apparently, they knew each other back in the day, and Reyes conducted some dramatic rescues for him a few times during the Omnic Crisis."

You glanced at Gabriel and Singh, Singh making lively gestures while Gabriel laughed. It was pleasant to get this window into his past. Gabriel told funny stories, to be sure, but he didn't like his war stories, and you understood that feeling.

"So are you a sniper?" Jesse asked.

"Qualified, but I run a small troubleshooting squad," she said with a shrug. "Usually need to be on the frontlines for that."

Gabriel and Singh had stopped, and you sighed, eyeing the circle of two dozen men and women in combat fatigues and t-shirts, wielding familiar wooden knives edged with lipstick. You rubbed your forehead. Of course, this was a military training exercise. You wondered if Jack and Gabriel used it as foreplay, and then mentally scolded yourself for getting distracted. Because now you wanted to see them play it with each other. You'd fight the winner, and well...

"Does this look like fun to you, Wendy?" Singh asked, his eyes twinkling.

You gave him and Gabriel a sharp look, because if you were going to spar with someone, you'd probably need to take your armor off. You turned to Jesse, as you loosened the seals, and handed him your chestpiece, gun, and wakizashi. The tanto could stay where it was. You whipped the shemagh off your belt and tied it over your lower jaw, Old West outlaw style. Let them think it was a theme. Gabriel Reyes and His Shoot'em and Loot'em Outlaw Posse. You flinched inwardly at that title. You were going to pretend like that stray thought never crossed your mind and smack Jesse for it later.
Singh blinked, but didn't comment. "I need a gentle volunteer for a friendly match with one of our Overwatch guests," he called.

You watched a few men and women stand at attention, giving you curious looks. A tall, rangy man with rough hewn features and a shaved head, stepped forward. He had a wide nose, deep set eyes, and thin lips. He looked like he should have been bulkier, though he was all lean wiry muscle.

"Sir," he rasped, sounding like he had a bad case of laryngitis.

"Lieutenant Salazar," Singh nodded. "Practice blades. Three strikes. Don't get too carried away." He gave you a cheerful smile. "Agent Wendy was going to challenge you to a cake-eating contest, but decided this would be easier on the body."

"It's true!" Someone called out.

"Aww, you can take it off, sweetheart. Don't be shy. We're all ugly here!"

"Don't listen to him, that's sexy as-"

You shot a wry glance at Gabriel, who was eyeing the crowd with a frown. Jesse hadn't faced this level of scrutiny, but then a proper knife fight did require a responsive and bloodthirsty audience calling out commentary, heckling the combatants, and making loud bets on their favorites.

Singh marked the blades in full view and handed one to each of you. "This is a friendly match, so try to keep to your organs on the inside."

You smiled behind your scarf, watching Salazar's dark eyes. He smiled thinly at you. The conversations, cheers, and shouts faded to a dull roar. Salazar was tall and he had range. You circled him, ignoring Gabriel. You knew the rules: make Blackwatch, or in this case Overwatch, look good, and don't get too banged up. Everything else was secondary.

Salazar feinted, lunging forward and stomping a foot, drawing "oohs" from the crowd. You skidded to the right, keeping an eye on his knifehand. He was right-handed and fast, but not like Hanzo or Genji. The major advantage he had was long reach. You could counter that by getting too close for his long arms to matter.

Grinning you darted in, coming within inches of his nose, before ducking under his defensive slash, swiping him across the hip, and swinging back to the side.

"First blood!" Someone howled, and the soldiers around you began stomping their feet.

"Come on Salazar!"

"Holy shit, look at them go!"

"OO-RAH!" You could feel their shouts resonating in your bones. But the fact they were cheering for your opponent didn't bother you in the least. They weren't your people, after all.

"Come on, Wendigo!" You heard Jesse in the distance, your ears keyed to his distinctive drawl.

Salazar leapt forward, getting an impressive amount of air, and you ducked to the side, barely missing his bold crosscut. Despite his dour appearance, it seemed he was a showman. You circled him, grinning as he made a kissy face at you, drawing more howls and laughter from the audience. You were going to have to do something about that.

Salazar lunged again, this time grabbing your the wrist of your knife hand as he thrust the wooden blade at your gut. You slammed your freehand into his forearm, knocking the strike off-target. And then you followed up with a knee to the gut, because he'd let you get that close. He grunted at the strike, releasing your knife hand and you jabbed him in the stomach, because that was what he'd been planning to do to you.

"Oh, we're getting personal now! Looks like Wendy's got some lipstick on her gloves. But Salazar is one strike away from defeat!" Singh called out. "Come on, marine! No bellyachin' even if she did nail you in the guts! Where's your goddamn pride?"

Salazar straightened up, a pained smile on his face. It wasn't hard to tell that that knife jab had hurt. Good. He charged forward, and if Gabriel or Jack had done that, you'd be fucked, in more ways than one. But Salazar was an unenhanced human. You spun, drilling a roundhouse kick into his forearm, knocking the knife out of his hand. It was a terribly impractical move for a real knife fight, and you might have gotten some lipstick on your boot, but it was worth the second strike penalty. He was disarmed and you tucked your knife in your belt, grinning at him behind the shemagh. You stood between him and his weapon, and while you could end it on a quickly, it wouldn't hurt to prolong the fight, just a little.

Salazar eyes darted to your belt, and then your empty hands. He gave you a dark look and his foot snapped forward in a front kick. You dodged to the side, and he lunged forward for the knife.

You were behind him in an instant one arm around his throat, and even as he kept reaching for his fallen weapon, you dragged the wooden blade lightly across his mouth, making a soft kissing noise in his ear while you did it. Then you released him, taking a step back and letting him drop onto the ground.

"Third Strike!" Singh groaned.

Salazar spun around, a wry smile on his face.

"It looks like Wendy wins a whole mess hall cake all to herself!" Singh announced.

"Oh no," you groaned and then extended a hand to help Salazar up. He took it, shaking his head. His grip was firm, and he held your hand for a second too long.

"I will be avenged," he said.

"Well, that's only if I eat it. I could keep it as a paperweight or a bludgeon."

Salazar cracked a delighted grin, and it softened his face immensely. "Good match, Wendy."

"Friendly, even," you said.

"You fight mean," he said approvingly. He glanced at the tanto in your belt. "May I see?"

You drew it, letting him inspect the blade.

He gave a low whistle of approval. "That is downright sexy. I'm going to have to ask who made this and where can I get one?"
"The smith's name is Kobayashi, she's in Japan. She doesn't take shit from her clients either, so be polite."

"I am an absolute gentleman." He gave you a very ungentlemanly grin. "Also, I think this is the part where I ask you to marry me," Salazar said casually as he touched his face, smearing the lipstick. "I don't know if my husband will approve at first, but, you know, he can learn to share."

You laughed pretty hard at that.

Salazar placed his hand over his heart. "I'm dead serious, bomboncita. I think the Captain is too, though she might be torn between you and your cowboy friend."

You looked over your shoulder and Jesse and DeVevo waved at you, DeVevo winking, her smile a lot more flirtatious than before.

"Let's go, agent," Gabriel said, coming up behind you. "I think it's time for your cake."

"Whose side are you on?" You turned to face him, and your brows went up as Gabriel gave Salazar a hard look.

"No luring my agents off, marine," Gabriel scowled. "If she's going to date any branch, it'll be Army. That goes for you too, boy." He shot Jesse a severe look.

You snorted, and shook your head. Because Gabriel was just kidding, right? Yeah, he and Jack were army, and you certainly weren't looking to bag anyone else, but he couldn't be that competitive, could he?

"I don't know, I saw him eyeing this cute pilot the other day," you said and Jesse sputtered.

Singh watched this exchange with keen eyes. "All right, all right. Get back to work. I have to go make good on my promises and Commander Reyes has a speech to give."

Salazar shot you a mournful look and you blew him a kiss from behind your shemagh. He caught it and clutched it to his chest, wiping an eye, much to the amusement of the other soldiers.

Jesse laughed too, DeVevo leaning very close to him.

You thought of honeytraps and convenient excuses, and your smile faded just a little, not that anyone could tell. You put your armor back on, and checked your rifle after Jesse handed it back to you. Everything was fine, but when you looked at Gabriel, he was already walking with Singh.

You glanced at Jesse, his eyebrows raised in speculation. They furrowed, and you got the message, watching Gabriel's back as the two of you hurried to catch up.

Chapter End Notes

Have a book hangover right now. One of my longtime favorite series, the Kate Daniels series, by Ilona Andrews has come to an end. I enjoyed it for years. It was nice to sit down in bed with the dogs, read a good back, and take a nap.

Don't have a lot going on right now. Just minor adulting woes.
Chapter 89

Chapter Summary

FBI? Man that shit gets into everything.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After Gabriel's talk, he fielded questions from the bigwigs while you and Jesse surveyed the crowd. It was a about a hundred people from varying agencies in the auditorium, and it was surprisingly easy to pick out the spooks. They came in a few varieties: there were the ones in suits and civilian wear, watching with flat eyes and dismissive looks, hungry sociopaths drawn to power and intrigue. There were the college kids, fresh out of school with big ideas, a library of spy thrillers, and no chill. And then there were the types like you, the ones who'd blend in, slap on a uniform: military, culinary, janitorial, and play the role.

It was a little surprising how adept you were at spotting that third group now. It was in the eyes, that hyperawareness and concealed tension that you were intimately familiar with. Can't bullshit a bullshitter: you knew their tricks.

Together, you and Jesse counted at least a dozen, from a variety of agencies. You'd left a fish torpedo in your vehicle, and while you did slightly worry about Athena taking it for a joyride, you wondered if they'd be bold enough to tamper with the car. Athena would, of course, be fine and warn you, but you weren't too happy about receiving this level of scrutiny.

Singh awarded each of you a bottle of whiskey and then very reluctantly broke open a bottle of scotch to share. And since it was a shame to pair such fine alcohol with military rations, the general's assistant ran out to pick up good burgers.

It was a little strange to eat dinner in a general's office, listening to him and Gabriel talk about people you'd never met, but it was over soon enough and the three of you headed back to the hotel, Gabriel at the wheel.

You had a suite with two bedrooms connecting to a common area. The two bedrooms was easily explained by the fact that one of you was going to sit up to keep watch. But even with rotating watches, you weren't sleeping alone.

An Athena fish torpedo did a sweep of the room, picking up some listening devices, though no cameras. They hadn't been there earlier, and so you had to get the hotelier and arrange for new rooms because of a plumbing malfunction. Possibly one that you and Jesse engineered with gun oil and dirty socks.

"Who in the alphabet soup do you think is responsible?" Jesse asked as you moved up a few floors, Athena inspecting the new quarters and finding them acceptable.

"NSA," you said, taking off your armor and setting it aside.
"CIA," Jesse countered, kicking off his boots.

Gabriel just glared at the new room, carrying your bags to the bedroom.

"...You going to be OK, sweetpea?" Jesse asked, as the door shut.

"Yeah, why?"

"He's sure sore about something," Jesse said. "Maybe it's because I got Vashtai's number. Don't know what I can do with it, but..."

You smiled. You'd figured it out pretty quickly, and Jesse probably had too, but you appreciated his discretion. "I'll handle him, if you want to take first watch."

"...I think that would be safest for everyone involved," Jesse laughed. "Athena, you sweet bucket of bolts, you done running that backtrace?"

"Agent McCree, you fragrant meatsack, yes I am."

You and Jesse paused, and blinked at each other.

"Oh...Oh Athena, you're going to have to explain that one," Jesse said slowly.

"My response was merely a reflection of your semantic patterns in regards to pet name phrasing: proper noun, pronoun, sensory-based adjective, then a noun phrase poetically summarizing your base components, and finally an answer to your query. Complex, but just mimicry on my part," Athena said. "Did I do it wrong?"

"Oh no, you did it perfectly," you laughed. "You burned him."

"Athena, sweetpea, please why you gotta pick on your cowboy?" Jesse sighed. "Genji and Ziv are such a bad influence..."

There was a moment as the fish torpedo's lights blinked. "But I mimicked you..."

"She has you there," you laughed, patting Jesse on the back as he hung his head. "You forwarded the data to our tablets? We can start triangulating-"

"Oh, I did better than that. I traced it back to the reporting station, opened a backdoor, inserted our own...entry, and now have eyes on the entire operation. It seems that the Federal Bureau of Investigation is actually monitoring us."

"Not the feebs," Jesse groaned, because there was history there.

"Yes, and they are a lot less interested in Commander Reyes and very keen on finding out more about you and Agent McCree. They seem to have his rap sheet already pulled up. They aren't sure about you, Lucky."

"...There shouldn't be much to find," you said. Because even if you'd had run-ins with the law, they'd never been able to keep you. You'd never gotten high level recognition for your activities. And the you from before was unrecognizable compared to the you now.

Jesse frowned. "They going to try to move against us?"

"Not yet. I'm sifting through quite a bit of data. Some of it is legitimate concern about your motivates, but a lot seems to be politically-motivated. Higher-ups wanting some kind of leverage..."
"...Wait, did you just hack the FBI?" You rubbed your forehead. "Of course you did. Just...make sure they don't know you did it."

"Oh Lucky, I thought I'd leave a smarmy taunt letting them know that Overwatch is on to their clumsy surveillance, while using a creepy fake robot voice, and plastering all available screens with their embarrassing yearbook photos."

"What?" Your voice went high.

"Well, just the agents in charge," Athena said cheerfully. "I can dig up more if you like."

"...OK, umm, you do what you have to do. Just don't start any major diplomatic incidents and please don't get caught. I know that's obvious stuff and I trust you, but this is all above my pay grade," you said.

"I was just going to ask if you wanted to play cards again..." Jesse sighed, sitting down at the table. "But I guess you're busy."

"Oh no, I can play poker with you too. It doesn't add much processing load to my systems. I could honestly do it while emptying data caches. So don't worry, Agent McCree. I'll keep you company and play by your regional rules."

Jesse winced at the implications. "Thank you kindly, Athena."

"So is this going to be with or without the copious cheating?"

You knocked on the bedroom door. "Can I come in?"

"Yeah," Gabriel's answer came in a hoarse voice, and you peeked in. He had changed into sweats and a t-shirt and he was stuffing his dirty laundry into a bag. The covers on the queen sized bed had already been turned down. Was he going to sleep so soon?

"Athena's monitoring the FBI agents who set the bugs. And Jesse's keeping first watch." You stepped in a shut the door behind you. "Couldn't wait for me?"

Gabriel gave you a wry smile. " Been hard since you tied that damn scarf around your face." He sat down on the bed and patted the spot beside him. "Though I didn't like watching all those jarheads drooling over you-"

"Guess you shouldn't have volunteered me for a game of one-upmanship," you said, taking your armor off.

"Yeah, I know. But I'm not sorry that I did. You looked good out there." Gabriel's voice was rough and he pushed his hair back. His eyes burned and you swallowed, knowing he didn't want to be gentle tonight.

"Can't go all out till the mission's over," you said, regretfully as you sat down beside him.

"I know. Just feeling...possessive. And I know we can't play like I want to - you need to be in fighting shape." Gabriel pressed a tense kiss to your shoulder. "Don't worry about it. I'm OK for now."
"Because you hurried in here to jerk off, or...?"

Gabriel gave you a sharp look. Because that was exactly what he had done.

You straddled his lap, grinning. "What were you thinking about?" Already you could feel him stiffening against you, and you leaned forward, your teeth grazing his ear. "Because I'm disappointed that I didn't get to watch, papi."

Groaning, Gabriel dug his fingers into your thighs. "You goddamn tease. Didn't we already establish that we shouldn't-"

You slid between his knees, pushing his thighs apart. Stroking him through his pants, you winked at him. "If you're feeling possessive, won't you enjoy the sight of me on my knees? I'm not as good at this as Jack, but you can be rough. I'll tap if it's too much."

Gabriel groaned, stripping off his pants. "You're damn right you will, baby. That's an order." He cupped your face. "Love it when you look at me like that."

"Like you're a snack?"

Gabriel's smile curved wickedly. "Keep it up. We'll see who gets eaten alive."

"You, obviously," you said, getting in the last word before you went to work. Hands on his thighs, you stayed on your knees at eye-level with his cock. You took a moment to lick stripes along the side, pushing back the foreskin and working your tongue along the head while his grip on your hair tightened.

You took the hint and opened wide, slowly swallowing him inch by inch.

"Good girl," Gabriel murmured, stroking your hair. He thrust the rest of the way in and you gagged, fingers digging into his thighs. Panting you tried to relax your throat, gasping as he pulled out, gave you a second to breathe, and then pushed back in. Gabriel facefucked you at a harsh rhythm, his hands in your hair. "That's it, hermosa, you're doing so well."

Your eyes watered, but you moved with him, trying to keep up. His cock was hot and slick in your mouth, and sometimes your teeth grazed him, but he didn't seem to mind. He was enjoying the control too much, knowing that he had you at his mercy, that you trusted him to do this to you.

"You look so pretty like this," he sighed, voice hoarse. "Going to fuck you into the mattress after this, babygirl. Need to watch you coming on my dick. Need to remind you that you're mine."

Remind you? Or remind himself? You weren't too bothered either way.

Your eyes fluttered as he sped up. You were a mess already, drooling around his cock. Your panties were damp, heat already coiling inside you. It must have shown on your face, because Gabriel chuckled.

"I'll take care of you afterward, hermosa. I always do. But you have to earn it, you little cocktease. Do you know how hard I was while I was trying to give that damn talk? If I hadn't had the podium there, things could have gotten awkward fast."

You moaned around his shaft, one hand carefully massaging his balls. He growled in response, and jerked his hips, speeding up.

"I'll tell you, I was all ready to go when we got back to our room. But those fucking feds..." Gabriel trailed off. "Figured I'd take care of things and let you rest. Maybe see if you were up for quickie in the shower in the morning. Didn't think that presumptuous bastard got any good hits in, but wasn't sure how you were feeling..." He exhaled. "But you're here now." He rested one hand on the back of your neck, inhaling slowly. "That's what matters."

Your neck and jaw ached and each thrust went deep enough to choke you, but you didn't tap, too focused on finishing him off. He was one twisted nerve away from losing control, and you couldn't wait. Breathing hard, Gabriel tensed beneath you, and then the first drops of cum hit your throat. You coughed, trying to swallow the rest, but it came too fast, and you drew back, still coughing as you wiped your lips, some of the thick liquid spattering your face and chest.

"Aww, got you all dirty," Gabriel said, not sounding the least bit sorry. "Here, let me help." He leaned over, fingers brushing against your chin as he gathered up some of the mess. Dark eyes on yours, he pushed his fingers into your mouth, watching you lick them clean. Then he hauled you up against him, kissing your swollen lips. You barely had time to catch your breath before he was pulling your shirt off. You stripped down, and suddenly Gabriel had you on your back.

"Wasn't thinking clearly. Should have gotten a picture of you like that for Jack. He'd love seeing you with that dazed look and my cum on your pretty face." He squeezed your tits together, tongue sliding across your nipples as you arched beneath him. He sucked each one, rolling your breasts in his hands while you rubbed against his thigh. "I can fucking hear how wet you are," Gabriel rasped in your ear. "Do you need it that badly?" He asked, like he didn't already know.

"Yes, papi," you sighed, kissing his jaw. "I can show you how much." You reached down to stroke yourself, but Gabriel batted your hand away.

"No, babygirl, I said I'm going to take care of you." He rubbed the tip of his cock against your lower lips, jaw clenching. "You just lie back enjoy. Try not to be too loud. Don't want to scare the kids next door."

You covered your mouth, biting back a cry as he pushed inside you, that first thrust a heady mix of pleasure and strain. He stretched you out, groaning into your shoulder as he went in to the hilt. He filled you up completely and you bit down on your metal fingers, whimpering. You shook beneath him, your knees bent, feet digging into the mattress.

"So beautiful, corazón." He nuzzled your throat. "And all mine." He chuckled as he rocked his hips and you moaned. "Jack's too. But I saw you first." He pushed your hair back as he looked you in the eye. There was a gentleness on his face that made you weak, something he only showed Jack and you.

"Gabriel, please-"

He kissed you, mouth covering yours as he pulled out and then slammed back in.

You shrieked into his mouth, fingers digging into his forearms. "We can't-" you stuttered when he released you. "Bed squeaks."

"You squeak," Gabriel laughed, his beard tickling your cheek. "And it's goddamn adorable." He stroked your sides. "I know, I know. We can't go all out." He chuckled. "Wrap your legs around my waist and hold on tight."

You obeyed, shivering as he kissed your neck. He rolled his hips, staying deep inside you, one hand gliding across your clit.

"Is this what you wanted?" He asked, tone playful.
"Yes, papi," you moaned, just to feel him twitch inside you.

"Keep that up and I'll have you screaming," he threatened. "And then we'll both have to apologize to them in the morning."

You hugged him closer. "Need you too. Don't tease."

"Don't worry, babygirl. When we're done here, going to get you and Jack and we'll make up for lost time. Doesn't matter where. I'll break into the goddamn infirmary if I have to," he growled, fingers pressing hard against your clit. You whined softly, as he rolled his hips, pushing deeper against your cervix. "That's not an excuse to get banged up though. You hear me? Any careless behavior and I'll be edging your cute ass till you cry." The threat didn't worry you, you could hear the concern in his voice, and the rough emotion surprised you just a little.

"I'll do my best," you promised, kissing his face.

He smiled at you, fingers rubbing slow circles around your clit. "All right then. You've been good so far. Not your fault those jarheads can't keep their eyes to themselves." He kissed you again. "You were fucking gorgeous out there, you cocky little shit. You could have finished it in half the time."

"Had to put on a show, keep things fun."

"That's Jack's kink. I like girls who take care of business efficiently."

"Who said I was putting on a show for you?" You laughed. "Had to work the crowd. Win points for Overwatch. And don't you get mad, you made me do it."

Gabriel growled at that, his fingers moving faster. "Not doing my job well enough if you can still sass me." His hips sped up, moving in time with his fingers. His cock stroked in and out of you, hitting your g-spot, and filling you up. You dug your heels into his ass, hands clutching his forearms.

"You're wound so tight," he groaned. "Come on baby, let it go." He pressed his forehead to yours. "I'm not done yet. Now be a good girl and come for me."

Panting, you moaned into his mouth as he drove you over the edge, holding you against the mattress, while you shook underneath him. Flat against the bed, you lay there, trying to catch your breath while he kissed your face.

"Not too rough?" He asked.

You shook your head.

"Up for more?"

"Give me a second," you laughed, kissing his chin.

"Now you can touch yourself." The words were tight and eager. He'd denied you that once, but he was a benevolent lover. And he liked giving you permission. "I want to watch you play with that needy pussy. I'll keep you nice and quiet, don't worry." He kissed your forehead.

You began to touch yourself, biting your lip as he shifted into sitting position, one hand cupping your face, the other arm wrapped around your waist. He closed his eyes, teeth gritted as he canted his hips, his motions smooth.
Still sensitive, you squirmed, eyes on Gabriel's face. With his eyes shut and his head thrown back, he was only focused the feel of your bodies. Most of the time, he watched you with fierce pleasure or careful concentration. You liked seeing him like this too, lost in the moment, the rest of the world forgotten.

He opened his eyes, mouth curving in a smile as he looked at you. "Keep stroking yourself. Love how eager you are for me." He sighed as your thighs tensed, your fingers pressing harder against your clit. "I'm close, baby. Just waiting for you-"

You trembled, pussy clenching around him. He leaned forward, placing his large hand over your mouth.

"Go on then," he purred. "Let me feel that juicy pussy milking me. Going to fill this greedy hole too. You like that, don't you? Being soaked in my cum?"

His hand muffled your cries as you came, your inner muscles trying to pull him deeper inside you. Gabriel growled, burying his face in your hair. His orgasm came on the tail of yours, and he held you tight, fingers digging into your flesh with bruising force. You clung to him, doing your best to stay quiet.

Very slowly he pulled out, taking a moment to grab his t-shirt. You both watched as pearly fluid began to trickle out of you, and he gently wiped you clean, a satisfied smirk on his face.

"You're mine too, you know. You and Jack," you said patting his hand. "And I love you."

"Love you too, corazon." His smirk softened into a smile. "Thank you," he said, kissing your cheek. "I...needed that, that control from you. You didn't have to do that though. Wasn't your fault I felt like that..." He ran a hand through his sweaty hair. "But thank you."

"Oh yes, this was such a trial," you giggled, kissing his palm. "I was more annoyed about you volunteering me."

"...Sorry," he said. "That was...work."

"I know. It was cute how you tried to be lowkey about your possessiveness. "Oh, yeah, you can't date marines, agent." That doesn't sound suspicious at all."

"I'd say the same thing to anyone in my family. Marines have no sense of humor," he said with a straight face.

You snorted. "Uh-huh."

Gabriel sighed, rubbing the back of his neck. "I might have been...a little out of line."

You laughed. "Uh-huh."

"Thank you, for being understanding. I know a big grumpy possessive super soldier can be hard to manage," he admitted.

"Your words, not mine."

Gabriel laid back down, pulling you against him. "You're just too smug. I should have fucked you harder. Jack's right about that. You're just too much of a brat if we don't."

Giggling, you nestled against him and closed your eyes.
Sitting in the hotel room, you studied the dossiers Lacroix had sent over. Several of them you'd seen before. Most of them were part of the usual rogues gallery: terrorists, black hat hackers, and killers-for-hire. But Richard Prince was in town. And while he ran one of Nguyen's PMCs, he was persona non grata in the US. Aside from the leaked video of him beating a prisoner to death with his large cybernetic arms, Prince was known for his mercenary sense of loyalty. He was suspected of selling secrets to a number of unfriendly entities. If Prince was actually here overseeing the operation, Nguyen was getting serious.

Maybe that's what Nguyen and Petras had been meeting about. If Kwento actually became Undersecretary General, she could make both their lives much harder.

You sipped your coffee, shaking your head as you studied each picture, trying to commit these faces to your memory.

A box of doughnuts sat in the middle of the table, and the three of you sat around it, reading up on the opposition. Gabriel had let you sleep through your watch shift, waking up and taking it for you. And while you were grateful for the extra sleep, you weren't too sure about how to take the special treatment. It wasn't a good thing, professionally, not in the long run.

Jack was visiting Walter Reed Medical Center in Maryland, for another round of PR photos with politicians. Ainsley was with him, and Genji swore up and down she was behaving, and that if she did not, Hanzo would avenge your honor.

You weren't entirely sure you wanted to know what that entailed.

Athena gave you FBI status updates, mostly that they were panicking because you'd switched rooms.

"Agent Lacroix says that he is sending over an FBI contact, unaffiliated with the idiots tracking Agent McCree," Athena announced. "He should be here later this afternoon."

Gabriel raised a brow, draining his coffee. "Got an ID?"

"Agent Lugh Brant. Accessing his profile now," Athena said cheerfully.

"...You've already told Ziv that you broke in the FBI database, haven't you?" You picked up a jelly doughnut, rather pleased by the raspberry filling - not too sweet, not too gel-like. It was almost like a pudding, the flavor rich and satisfying.

"He's upset that I beat him to it," Athena said, not bothering to hide her smugness.

Shaking your head, you pulled up a picture of Agent Brant and stifled a laugh. He looked too young to shave, let alone carry a gun. And he had bright carrot-colored hair that stuck up in all directions, skin that burned if the day was anything less than totally overcast, and a law degree.

Right, so that was Plan D, as in Desperate.

Kwento landed today. Jack would be, coincidentally, having dinner in the restaurant across from her hotel. What a surprise. Fancy seeing you here. And then Genji would liaise with Zenyatta, who had been recalled specifically for this trip. You weren't sure how much of Operation Black Abacus Lacroix had shared with Kwento.

You weren't entirely sure where Lacroix and Ziv were. Lacroix would be handling damage control on top of the op logistics. You weren't sure which politicians Lacroix was leveraging or how many trustworthy contacts he had, but you knew he was the one best suited for the job. And Amélie would be sniper support, though you weren't sure where she was either.

But strangely, that didn't bother you. Lacroix would get the job done right. And if he decided to be stubborn about anything, Ziv and Amélie would take him to task.

Shaking your head, you took a break from memorizing faces to check Kwento's itinerary. She would be meeting with the Secretary of State and having a luncheon tomorrow. And then they would take a tour of the Smithsonian complex. There were multiple Smithsonian museums, and security was tight. You would be there first thing in the morning, alone, inspecting the area with Athena. Genji, Hanzo, and Jesse would also be in different corners of the map, helping maintain eyes on the situation.

The day after tomorrow she would be addressing the members of Senate Committee on Omnic Relations in an "informal" luncheon, possibly meeting with several tech moguls interested in doing business in Numbani, and taking a tour of the White House.

There was a knock at the door. "Room service."

You and Jesse exchanged looks. Really? That was what they wanted to go with? Like they didn't expect you to know that one?

"Be there in a moment!" You called, strapping on your armor. You set the tablets aside and Athena began scanning for interference.

Jesse adjusted his armor, and took a look out the peephole. He held up one finger, eyes narrowed. The others would probably be around the corner.

Gabriel frowned at you both.

"I can-"

"You're our principal, sir," Jesse said. "So get geared up, and stay back. Me and Lucky will handle the first one."

"Alive, if you please," you reminded Jesse.

"And alive if I don't please, got it."

Gabriel took a moment to put his armor back on and you stood behind the door, waiting for Jesse's signal.

You opened the door, Jesse held his gun up.

"Wait! Don't shoot!" The man in the hotel uniform said, even as Jesse dragged him, and his food trolley, into the room. "Mustache Man asked me to come!"

Jesse slung him onto the ground, revolver pointed at his head. You quickly shut the door, waiting for his back up to charge forward.

The uniform cap fell off the intruder's head, revealing a mop of ginger hair. Agent Lugh Brant stared up at you from the floor, teeth clenched, his palms up. "Black Abacus! Black Abacus! I'm on your side! ID's in my jacket pocket. And I brought the whoopie pies! Just like Lacroix told me to!"
You wrinkled your nose, keeping your gun level at him. "What?"

"He said you guys appreciate your desserts. I figured you'd like some whoopie pies," Brant said. "It's a New England thing."

Jesse reached into the jacket pocket, and extracted the FBI ID badge. He tossed it to Gabriel, one hand holding his revolver steady.

Gabriel looked it over with a sigh. "You know some of your buddies already have us under surveillance."

"Why do you think I'm wearing this stupid uniform?" Brant asked not looking particularly worried by the guns you were pointing at him. "I'm trying to be discrete. It's already a clusterfuck out there."

"You should have found a way to let us know you were coming in advance," Gabriel said, coolly. "Surprising us is a good way to get killed."

Brant shrugged, running his hands through his messy hair. "Desperate times, desperate measures, and I figured your people were better trained than to just kill me for knocking on the door." He gave a sly grin. "I almost made a joke about other law enforcement agencies, but I guess it wouldn't be very funny." Brant shook his head. "Anyway, it's an honor Commander Reyes."

Gabriel sighed and gestured for the two of you to stand down. Jesse holstered his pistol and you clipped your carbine to your back. "What can you tell me about our watchers?"

Brant sighed. "Can I at least get off the floor?"

"Something wrong with the floor, agent?" Gabriel barked. "Is your federally-owned ass too good for the floor?"

"No, no, this floor is amazingly comfy. Didn't mean to complain," Brant said, and sat in lotus position, his expression pleasant. "You going to join me?"

"No," Gabriel said, and didn't elaborate.

Jesse waved Athena over and inspected the food cart. There was a covered dish and he let Athena scan the entire cart before he took the lid off. The plate was filled with what looked like giant Oreos, made of cake and pastry cream. They were the size of dessert plates and you fervently hoped they weren't poisoned.

"Everything checks out, though those "whoopie pies" are extremely high in sugar and fat."

"That is a ringing endorsement if I've ever heard one," Brant said. "I'll eat one first, if you're worried. Hell, I'll eat all of them, if you're worried."

Gabriel cleared his throat.

Brant's smile faded. "So there is some serious confusion over what that team was authorized to do versus what they've actually been doing. Maybe they'd like to try to override the amnesty agreement you offered Agent McCree there, but none of us actually have that authority." He glanced at you. "And no one knows who the fuck Ms. Strike really is, so I'm hoping the answer is "single, one of the good guys, and not a trigger-happy psychopath," in that order."

Gabriel gave Brant a very unfriendly look.
"No, yes, and only some of the time," you said dryly.

"Acceptable," Brant said, turning a little pink under Gabriel's gaze. You wondered if it was embarrassment, or if Gabriel's angry look was actually boiling the FBI agent alive under his skin. "Anyway," Brant said quickly. "There's been a lot of internal finger-pointing over this. My higher-ups are already moving to sweep things under the rug and they were really hoping you hadn't picked up on the surveillance."

You and Jesse exchanged smug looks.

"And then there's me, trying to sneak in without any of the other guys noticing, and let me tell you that the Bureau picnic is going to be very awkward this year."

Your eyes drifted back to those whoopie pies with great interest.

"How much do you know?"

"We've been tracking some of the folks Lacroix mentioned. We're on higher alert for a potential terrorist attack or assassination. It's pretty vague, like most of the "credible" threats we get. He thinks future UN Undersecretary Kwent is the target, and while I guess it's likely, we haven't heard any chatter indicating it to be so."

"Any word from the NSA or CIA?" Gabriel asked.

"Nothing in detail," Brant trailed off. "...But of course, you already know about it, don't you? Because no one wants to share with the FBI."

"No one wants to share, period," Gabriel said. "It took Lacroix prodding his contacts across several agencies to get the data that we have here now."

Brant groaned. "I know interagency cooperation isn't anyone's favorite game, but I swear we're usually better than this...Oh." His gaze sharpened. "I see. Someone up high, maybe the same someone who set our people on you, is muddying the water. Lacroix did that annoyingly vague sentence trail off that makes you wonder if he's being mysterious or has some kind of executive function disorder."

Jesse snickered.

"Lacroix has confirmed Brant's identity, as has the swab Agent McCree took," Athena announced.

"You- damn," Brant blinked at Jesse. "You guys don't play around. Or respect civil liberties much, do you?"

"I think we have a lot to talk about, Agent Brant," Gabriel said, his expression grim. "Why don't you come have a seat at the table, and we'll show you what we've found."

"Sure," he said, getting off the floor. "I like being allowed at the table." He dusted himself off, not bothering to remove the porter jacket. He reached over and grabbed a whoopie pie off the cart. "Hey, do you guys have any milk?"

---

Brant took the seat across from Gabriel, taking notes while the three of you brought him up to speed. You were careful to share only what could be verified by the American intelligence communities and equally cautious about revealing any of your sources. For his part, Brant seemed to understand that there were some things you just weren't going to tell him, though it didn't stop him from asking.

"Why Kwento? Why not your boss, Jack Morrison? Or the Secretary State? No one likes him much. Staties, you know?" He was on his third whoopie pie.

"There have been several attempts on Kwento in the past few months. Talon is just getting bolder."

Brant gave a low whistle, teeth sinking into his bottom lip. "Talon, of course." He ran his fingers through his hair, and leaned back in his seat. "...Should have twigged when you mentioned the impressive failure at interagency cooperation." He rubbed his cheeks, stretching his face in funny directions. "Goddamnit, you should probably know that I don't specialize in counterterrorism. I'm a BSU, by trade. You know, serial killers, profilers, all the sexy stuff. But...I've had a run-in or two with Talon."

Gabriel and Jesse frowned at each other. "Can you shoot?" Gabriel asked.

"Sure, but I would prefer not to," he said cheerfully.

Gabriel's frown deepened.

"What kind of support can you give this operation?" You asked. "Besides dessert and classified intel."

"I didn't say I was bad in a fight," Brant said, taking a big gulp of milk. "I just don't like shooting." He shrugged. "But terrorists rarely give us that kind of courtesy. Anyway, from what I know, Lacroix is coordinating with Senator Armstrong - he's on the Senate Intelligence Committee. Go on, make your jokes, I'll wait."

Jesse chuckled, but with Gabriel's serious expression, both of you knew better than to get too distracted.

Brant waited expectantly, and looked terribly disappointed by your restraint. "Right, anyway, Lacroix has been working through the senator and his spooky buddies. I got an interesting call from some CIA douchebag yesterday, but the file he sent over was all about some cybernetics operation in Hanoi. Not my field, but it's supposed to be relevant."

"I'd like to see that," Gabriel said, leaning forward.

"You know how many regulations I'm breaking just being here? You want me to piss off the Company too?"

"Best case scenario, you, that CIA douchebag, and all of our Stateside compatriots come out of this looking like the extra efficient poster children for interagency cooperation. You're their face-saving measure," you said. "Because we don't need the credit. We just need to keep this attack contained."

"God, you guys really are disgustingly heroic," Brant said admiringly. "The federal bureaucracy requires us to take credit for as much as we can. You know, if we want to retain funding."

"She didn't say we wouldn't get credit. We will, with the people who matter. But we don't need to justify ourselves to the congressional budgeters." Gabriel yawned. "We'd like to see that device. We can wait for you to-"

Brant reached under his shirt and pulled out a few pages copied onto onionskin tracing paper. Easily destroyed if he was compromised.

"Relax, I came prepared." He beamed at you. "I'm just relieved if it's cyborgs instead of omnics. I'm just a little too squishy to take them on in the damn capital. You know what I mean?"

You did, from terrible experience, but you didn't comment, instead letting Athena scan the pages and send them to your tablet. He hadn't brought very much that you didn't already know.
Satellite surveillance had been slowly building up the technical specs and capabilities of the Hanoi facility.

But there was a more comprehensive profile of Richard Prince, an unfamiliar shipment manifest containing a lot of chemical ingredients and incendiary components that sounded terribly familiar, and an odd set of serial numbers. You didn't recognize what they could be for. But combining things like welding fuel, antique carbide lights, powdered aluminum...that set off red flags.

"Homemade bombs," you said, exhaling slowly. All those occasions where you had to help source ingredients for Vo had been very educational. Nwazue would have been proud, or so you told yourself. "And a mild nerve agent to numb the sniffer dogs."

"Wait, what?" Brant snatched up the papers.

"Why bother with homemade bombs? Talon has far more sophisticated weapons, most of which are easier to hide than motorcycle fuel," you mused.

"...There are a couple reasons. It could just be straight up distraction," Gabriel stared at the list. "Or they might be setting it off in waves."

"Conspiracy theory: they're providing materials for their scapegoats. They're going to make a much bigger boom, but let some shitty wannabe militia take the fall." You'd have to run it by Lacroix, because that piece wasn't making sense. Maybe it wasn't bombs. You needed to consult Vo or a trained chemist. You sent the query to Vo, hoping Athena would nudge her into responding faster.

"Mebbe," Jesse leaned back and grabbed a whoopie pie, his expression thoughtful. "But Talon likes to cause trouble. They launch an attack on Kwento in DC, well, that's risky. Why not kill two birds with one shot? Who do they want to push America into conflict with? Killing Kwento is a bonus and won't raise too much scrutiny if it was in a terrorist attack. Keeps their political patsies' hands clean."

You were missing something. You just weren't sure what, not yet. Getting up, you grabbed a whoopie pie, not missing Brant's smile.

"...Maybe it's not that purpose," Gabriel said. "We need to see if there are any defense or intelligence bills up for a vote soon. A terrorist attack can score a defense contractor a pretty cozy deal."

And several of your enemies were high up in weapons manufacturing companies like Vishkar, Hyde, and Volskaya.

"On it," Jesse said. "Assistance, Athena?"
"Scanning...now," Athena said, trying to sound pleasantly neutral and blank. Was it you or was she getting really bad at it?

"Terrorists in line with evil corporate agendas? Surely that's a little bit of a stretch?" Brant scratched the back of his head, not sounding convinced by his own skepticism. Because if he was working with Lacroix, he had to have some suspicion about just how powerful these multinationals had become.

You were going to have to get Lacroix's input on this. After all, he had the most developed supervillain prediction powers.

"There are three budget increase proposals that fall under those subjects," Jesse said, forwarding the information to you and Gabriel. "The most interesting one, proposed by a Senator Bonnie Boland, née Petras, from Massachusetts. There's about 500 pages of pork and riders, but one of them involves upgraded ballistic and kinetic shielding for federal government buildings."

It clicked then. "What, if any buildings, already have this shielding here in DC? And who makes it?"

"The Capitol," Brant said, brows furrowing. "Probably the Whitehouse, the Blair House, and the National Archives. I can check." He scanned his tablet for a moment. "A small company called "Luminescent Holdings, not a lot of data on them. Ah, CEO is Amara Korpal." And you'd bet your left hand that she was related to the same Korpals who ran Vishkar.

You looked at Gabriel.

"It's bold," he said. "If buildings with the shielding are attacked and remain intact, Luminescent Holdings sees a strong share value increase. They'll get more generous government contracts, maybe form a Superpac to donate to a pet politician, and up they go in the cycle of money, power, and influence."

Jesse studied the map for a moment. "I'd bet my hat they're targeting the Capitol or the Archives. Those are a sight closer to the museums than the Whitehouse. But it's all centered on the National Mall. Are their balls really that big?" That was tourist central, and there would be a lot of soft targets.

"Wrong question," Gabriel said grimly. "How likely are they to pull it off? Nguyen's cyborgs aren't pushovers and Talon has the resources to do this."

"Can we get a couple of the tourist traps closed down, for say, emergency maintenance?" You asked. At this point, you didn't even care about spooking the Talon operatives. Prevention was more important. "I get that might send the terrorists to ground, but..."

"It would be best if we could clean this all up in one go," Jesse said shaking his head. "Brant and Lacroix's network of Americans don't seem to have trustworthy resources if Talon comes back a week later for round two."

But, Kwento would be out of the line of fire and it wouldn't be your problem any more. You didn't say that though. It was an honest thought, but the longer it sat in your head, the more uneasy it made you. You could become that person, thinking in pure calculations; it wouldn't be hard at all. But that person wouldn't be able to look herself in the eye at the end of the day.

"I don't have that kind of power," Brant laughed nervously. "Maybe if you know someone high up in the National Parks Service. They handle some of the Smithsonian administration as well." His phone beeped. "And that is Senator Armstrong requesting a progress report. Do we have any good news for him?"

Gabriel smiled thinly, because the three of you didn't answer to that level of politician. "I guess that depends if he knows someone high up in the National Parks Service."

Chapter End Notes

Made okonomiyaki because I'm trying to be a healthy adult and cook instead of going to Pizza Hut at 10:30 at night. In my defense, I did it once last week and feel supremely guilty, but I did get 4 meals out of one pizza so maybe I shouldn't? IDK. Okonomiyaki isn't particularly healthy. I made mine with (sale) oysters, mushrooms, cabbage, dashi, and turkey bacon. Then I fried it up in lots of sesame oil. And spreading Krema style mayo on it with bulldog sauce, shredded nori, and bonito flakes makes it even less healthy. (Mostly all that creamy mayo/mustard/sour cream mix.)

For the record, I have amazingly mixed feelings about the FBI. On one hand, cool BSU stuff, great tv show material, movies, some super cool stories. On the other hand, looking at their actions during the civil rights era? Oh boy. I'll just say "J. Edgar Hoover was a piece of something." Do I think they're important? Sure. Do I think they're perfect? Nah. Am I out to get them in this political climate? Nope, this is just for the story.

I made friends with a hormonally-imbalanced cockatoo. He's been rehomed five times. Maybe six as of today. I can't afford big expensive birds, but I do love them. It's probably best that I don't think about "wow, I could adopt him" because that's a terrible life decision. (Also I have 3 dogs and 1 sick cat and no, no.)

Work isn't bad, but I'm going to be back on the job hunt this month, because $$$ I'm so bad at this.
Chapter 90

Chapter Summary

Operation Black Abacus encounters difficulties.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

You didn't like this one little bit. The National Mall was a hotbed of tourist activity and you'd been sent to blend in. The Metro exit was tightly packed, the long narrow escalator practically a death trap. One push and a row of people would go down like dominos.

The day was sunny and bright. And you were in civilian clothes packing small arms and an Athena drone, for reconnaissance. It was the standard fish torpedo model, floating cheerfully beside you like a party balloon. Plenty of people had personal helper drones, and she didn't draw much attention, but then, the problem wasn't Athena.

Your allied senator had managed to get the Archives shut down because of a "storage equipment malfunction." But that was it. Congress was in their summer recess, so no politicians were really at risk if the Capitol building was attacked, and to be honest, you thought that was tremendously unfair. But then, you didn't care much for politicians.

No, the real problem was that the area was still teaming with soft targets. People wanted to see the museums, the war memorials, the Washington Monument, that pointy white obelisk that you thought Genji might enjoy climbing, just to be a dick. People wanted to be close to power, history, prestige, good food...

But that Metro exit was also a big problem. You could bottleneck way too many people in there. And you knew from nasty experience how badly things could go when you were trapped underground. Shuddering, you shook your head, the heat of the sunlight chasing the memory from the edge of your skin.

And the worst of it was, you'd been picked as the "tourist." Gabriel, Jesse, and Hanzo were too recognizable. Genji would stick out for all the wrong reasons. Epsilon Squad had its hands full with maintaining a secure perimeter for Jack. So you were to show up early and scout the land, mingling as you went.

Most of the other Blackwatch agents had been dispersed to potential target locations, and you'd been surprised to see Gabriel geared up in his army uniform. Even with the shiny chestpiece, it was camouflage: there were so many soldiers in the area, they tended to blend together. Jesse had FBI credentials and a cheap suit, so he really looked the part. Hanzo was back in that pretty three piece suit he’d worn to Shanghai and had been sent to tour the Capitol building. Genji had joined Jack's entourage and delivered your armor and carbine to Jack. He would be visiting the museum today too, and you would meet up with him once your rounds were done.

You were in a loose sunset-colored summer dress with matching crotchet gloves. It was long and underneath you had on combat boots. Your tanto was strapped to your thigh, your pistol in a special holster in your bra, and Gabriel had cut one of the pockets so you could reach your blade faster. You strolled along the sidewalks, large sunglasses covering your face. Winston had fairly sophisticated tech built into the lenses, and you were scanning for particular chemical signatures and other weapons-grade materials. After a lot of pressure, Brant had managed to get you a federal ID badge, so you could bypass security, if necessary. Though he had tried to make you promise to give it back when you were done. You were still deciding if you really were going to. Heh.

But now the FBI had your picture. Ugh. Athena said she could delete it and would after the op was over, but it still put you in a foul mood. Anonymity had been your one comfort, and that was going straight out the window on this trip.

And today, Lao was going under the knife. You wouldn't be there to say "good luck" or "goodbye." There was nothing you could do. So you said a rote chant to Captain Patel's personal version of Durga, even if she was the goddess of battlefields and experimental surgeries weren't her domain, you still sort of viewed her as the patroness of your former squad.

You had a job to focus on. Sucking in a breath, you adjusted the signal amplifier for your comm unit on your hair barrette. The signals traffic in this area was heavily-monitored, and you wouldn't be using it unless all hell broke loose.

You and Athena strolled around the mall, making stops at all the tourist traps, the presidential memorials, the war memorials, and everything on the west side. There were cyborgs here, you realized. About half a dozen, a scouting party at the very least, trying to blend into the crowds. But you recognized Nguyen's models with their bulky armaments, and their glassy, not entirely sane eyes. They meandered with the tourists, always careful to not to congregate, but slowly moving eastward.

"Radio it in," you told Athena, speed-walking toward the museum complex. You thought about trying to thin their numbers here in broad daylight, but inevitably, you would panic the crowd. There were several Smithsonian museums and Kwento was supposed to be visiting the Natural History Museum right about now. It was one of the larger ones, situated across the way from the others.

"Fire Eater to Wendigo, do you copy?" Agent Brant's voice crackled in your ear.

"Heading to Crane's location now," you said, referring to Kwento. "Have you seen the footage?"

"Called it in already. Clip that badge onto your dress when you get a chance. Don't want my people taking shots at you."

"Will do. Going to back up Crane's people. Are you there, Ultraman?"

"Roger," Genji said, not sounding particularly amused by his callsign. Well, that made two of you. "I have passed your message on to Summer. We are moving now to rendez-vous." There was a moment of silence. "Gallus wants you to know that he's called for backup from the locals. Athena will provide profiles. Try not to shoot, stab, or headbutt any friendlies, Wendigo. And eating them is definitely out of order."

"Really?" You scowled, shielding your eyes from the sun. "You too?"

"A Wendigo by any other name..."

"You guys are hilarious," you sighed. So Lacroix had called in his reserves. There were over half a dozen agents from multple agencies and you carefully scanned the profiles and pictures. You recognized some from prior interactions: Nikita, the NSA Silent Sister, whatever that meant and Hopper, probably the CIA douchebag Brant was talking about. But Lacroix had also called in a Secret Service agent, a military contractor, a US marshal, and even a park ranger.

You weren't sure how this was going to unfold, but this was not your jurisdictional pissing match. You just needed to get to Kwento and Jack.

**

You walked into the museum, flashing your badge to security. A giant fiberglass blue whale model hung from the ceiling of the atrium. Ninety-four feet long, the sign said. You blinked and then approached the security checkpoint. A heavyset blonde woman in uniform, her badge said "Griffin," glanced disinterestedly at your ID. Armed federal agents were the norm here.

"You're going to want to start closing the museum," you said. "We need to evacuate everyone quickly and quietly. There are armed terrorists incoming, and we have it on good authority that they are after a VIP in this building."

Griffin stared at your badge for half a second more. "I have to call this in," she said quickly, eyeing your fish torpedo. "I'll start the process here, but we have a fifth grade class on the second floor. They're going to need special handling." She gave you a pointed look.

You blinked. Because you needed to get to Kwento and Jack. That was your mission. But the last thing you wanted was a bunch of kids caught in the crossfire.

"How many?" You asked.

"About thirty," Griffin said. "Counting chaperones. They took the Metro."

"...No good. Try to encourage people away from the Metro," you said. "Where'd they go?"

"Second floor. Prehistoric animal exhibit." She pointed at the stairs. "That way. Follow the signs. Uh, you might be better off taking them out the closest emergency exit. The alarms will sound though."

You took off then, blinking when the lights started to flicker. A thin black man in the security uniform stood by the switches, looking vaguely amused as he flipped them on and off.

"Attention guests," Griffin said on the PA. "Due to electrical issues, we are going to have to ask you to leave. The museum will reopen after the problem has been fixed. Rainchecks will be available at the door. We are sorry for the inconvenience."

"Ultraman, I've been diverted to evacuate a class of kids. Your ETA?"

There was silence. Were they jamming you already? Your skirts flew, as you took the stairs two and three steps at a time. Up the staircase, down the hall, and through the double doors to the "Prehistoric Life" exhibit. You spotted a trio of kids examining a life-sized Glyptodon replica. You wanted to stare at the giant armadillo, but there wasn't time for that.

"Where's your teacher?" You asked brusquely.

They stared then pointed at a slim dark-skinned woman with a shaved head.

"Ms. O'Malley is over there," one said.
You walked over there, and she turned to give you a sharp look.

Quickly, you flashed your badge. Her eyes widened.

"I need you to gather up your students, in a calm orderly manner. We're going to take that emergency exit out," you said pointing at the glowing red sign down the hall. "Once you're out of the building, get them away from the Mall. Do not take the Metro."

She swallowed and nodded. "All right." She whistled then, shrill and loud. "Attention Beecher Street Elementary students. Due to this electrical issue, we need to return to the hotel. Everyone form up on me. Chaperones included."

"Aww, can't we go to another museum? C'mon Ms. O," one boy whined.

"Now, Charles," she said with steel in her voice.

The boy fell silent.

She began moving toward the door, calling roll as she went. "Du? Has anyone seen Du?" She asked, voice strained.

"I think she went to the bathroom, ma'am," another girl offered. "I can go get her."

"No!" O'Malley said sharply. "I'll do it-"

"I need you to make sure the rest of them are accounted for," you said. "I'll go in a moment. Is anyone else missing?"

The teacher did a quick headcount, students and the adult chaperones who were watching you warily. "Yes."

You went first, hand positioned awkwardly in your dress so you could draw your pistol. "Stand back." You pushed the emergency exit door open, but the sirens did not sound, and someone yanked the door the rest of the way.

He was much bigger than you, like they all were, his armor so very matte black in the sunlight. The first thing you recognized was the pulse rifle cradled in one of his massive arms, then it was the circuitry patterns across his sneering face. And he wasn't alone, a second cyborg stood behind him.

You raised your gun, firing at the nearest one immediately. A neat hole appearing in the center of his head. The screaming started up behind you, but you ignored it. Using the first cyborg as a shield, you fired again, and the second cyborg toppled off the fire escape. Then you shoved the dead cyborg off the same side, taking a moment to lean over the metal stairwell, fire a few more headshots, and ensure neither of them were getting back up again.

You turned around to see O'Malley watching you with clenched teeth and big eyes. You glanced down. There was blood and other glop spattered across your dress. Oops.

"Are you-?"

"It's not mine. Go now. Don't take the Metro. Head toward Pennsylvania Avenue. Avoid the Mall. And uh...don't look to the left." There wasn't that much blood, but...

"Let's go class. Step carefully. Keep your eyes on the step ahead of you, these fire escapes are rickety," O'Malley said, her voice steady. She waited with you till the last student had passed. "Du is Asian, about this tall-" She held her hands at shoulder level. "And she can be very shy around strangers."

"Who isn't? I'll look for her. It might not be safe to send her out alone, but I'll do what I can. Go. Hurry."

You spun around, the evacuees giving you wide berth as you went back inside to find the bathrooms.

**

Gunfire sounded in the distance, and the lights flickered.

"Ultraman? Summer? Gunslinger?" You flipped through the channels, trying to reach anyone.

"The comm network is offline," Athena told you. "My homing signal is weak too. We're being jammed. I may not be able to maintain a presence here."

"I thought your quantum entanglement tethers bypassed that kind of tech."

"I did too," Athena said. "This effect bears some looking into."

It fucking figured. You opened the bathroom door, your gun held close. Several stall doors were closed, though you couldn't see any feet.

"Du, from Ms. O'Malley's Beecher Street classroom, are you in here?"

There was a soft creak as the door opened and a girl with bobbed hair crept out, bigger than Kseniya, but still small. Her eyes widened when she saw your gun.

You flashed your fake badge, wondering if it would help. Her eyes stayed on the gun.

"Listen, we need to get you out of here. Your class has already evacuated. I took them out the back way and they're going toward Pennsylvania Avenue. Avoid the Metro."

She nodded once, her eyes shifting to Athena. "Omnics?" She asked, her voice dry and frightened.

"Terrorists," you admitted, waving her over. Now let's go. Follow me." You stepped into the hallway first. "Athena, can you scan?"

"...Signal too weak," she said. "But there are hostiles on this floor, Wendigo. I can't maintain function-" Her drone wobbled, the lights flickering. You caught the drone and carried it under one arm.

You bit back a curse and put Du behind you. You were on your own. No, it was worse than that: you had a scared kid depending on you. So you hugged the walls, listening to sporadic gunfire and the rapidly cutoff screams as you walked the child back to the prehistoric life exhibit. She hugged herself, flinching at every telltale gunshot, but kept her one hand over her mouth.

You heard them before you saw them. Grabbing the kid you shoved her into giant ground sloth exhibit. "Take this and hide," you ordered, pushing Athena's drone into her arms. "No matter what happens, stay quiet. Cover your face if you have to."

She nodded, eyes big. "What about-?"

"Now," you hissed and she disappeared behind a stack of rocks and the replica animal. You hugged the side of the display, listening to heavy footsteps. Your eyes darted to the large posed bone display in front of you. You probably couldn't knock that over onto them. And there were more than one. You could hide, though you weren't sure if they had infrared sight, and all your heavy combat gear was with Jack.

Taking a deep breath, you took cover behind the saber-toothed cat, your gun raised.

Three cyborgs in full armor stepped into sight. "No sign of Hammerhead or Bull. They were supposed to come through here," one man said.

"Probably had trouble figuring out the door," the second man said, his armor a dark shade of navy blue.

"Step lively. We're on a time crunch," the first cyborg said, shaking his head, but not actually disagreeing.

"Target's putting up heavy resistance," a slender woman in a visor said. "I'll head back with the EMP cannon. Should take care of her omnic guards."

"We can take care of these stragglers first," Blue Armor said. And he looked straight at you, his smile vicious. Yes, they probably had infrared vision. So you had to keep their attention on you and off the kid.

You took a quiet breath, and fired. Your first shot hit the biggest one, tearing through his cheek, shattering his teeth, and ruining his terrible smile. He dropped there.

The woman lunged, blades in her metal arms whirring as she rushed you, Blue Armor hot on her heels. You fired quickly, flinching as her metal forearms deflected some of the bullets. Genji could do that, and you knew how you fared in melee practice with him...

Your pistol clicked empty and you dodged backward, narrowly avoiding decapitation.

"Take her alive, Mako! We need to know who she is, what she knows, and if anyone else is on the way," the surviving man called from the floor.

You slammed another magazine into the gun and returned fire, missing Mako, but finishing off her companion. Mako jumped, her boot smashing in to your side and sending you rolling across the floor. Quick as a snake, she kicked your gun out of your hand, her boot on your throat.

"Who are you? Who sent you? Answer quickly, because I'm in the mood to start carving pieces off you-"

You jabbed a blade finger through her shoe into her foot and she swore, drawing back and giving you enough time to scramble away. Your side ached, but you couldn't focus on that now.

You dove for your gun, but she was faster, her cybernetic arms grabbing you by the back of the neck and slamming you face first into the floor.

"Stupid move, worm," she hissed. "I'm going to enjoy taking you apart."
Your head spun, and you winced as she yanked your hair back. She crouched on top of you, one foot pinning your left hand to the ground, the other square on your lower back.

"I don't even care if you talk now; I'm too angry." She ran a long blade along your throat and you held very still, the metal so cool against your skin. In a few seconds, the skin started to sting. She'd cut you. You felt her yank the badge out from under your dress. "FBI, huh? You weren't supposed to know anything. Well, it looks like they weren't able to lock down your investigation like they promised. A pity. You might have survived otherwise."

You struggled, trying to wiggle free, but her grip was too strong and she was heavy. Bruised and helpless, you tried to push off the floor with your legs, but the cyborg bitch held you flat against the ground.

"I think I'll start with your left hand," she said. "It looks like you're already missing part of it anyway, and you won't need it any more. Besides, you could use a makeover, sweetie. I like them in my own image." She raised her a blade the metal gleaming under the LED lights.

You clenched your teeth, tasting blood and panic. You vainly tried to wiggle free as you stared at the floor tiles, bracing yourself for pain with frantic rationalization. Angela could build you a new hand. Mutilation wasn't death. Maybe they could reattach it. As long as she didn't kill you right away, you had a chance to get out of this, amputations be damned.

There was a deafening roar, and suddenly the cyborg was no longer on top of you. Panting, you rolled over.

A blue blur smashed his fist into Mako's face, her visor shattering on impact. He struck again and she bounced off the wall, pinwheeling into a resin fossil display. She crashed, scattering bones everywhere. You blinked as Genji moved, and suddenly Mako was in two, no, make that four pieces on the ground.

The look on Jack's face was terrible, his eyes flashing as he kicked a part of the lower half of the body out of his way. He turned to you then, eyes zeroing in on your neck.

"Sweetheart, how bad?"

You rubbed the thin slit on your neck. She'd barely nicked you, but it was an alarming place to be cut. "I'm OK. It's not deep," you said, relieved to hear your own voice.

He was at your side in two steps, one arm pulling you against him. "Sorry we're late." He pressed a kiss to your temple, before he drew back, looking you over. His eyes went to your bloody dress.

"Not mine," you said.

"Some of it is." He shook his head, dragging his gloved thumb across your lower lip to the corner of your mouth. He tapped your nose gently, and you winced. "Don't worry, you're still pretty," he said. "But that blood is yours. Unless you've been biting the enemy."

"Not yet."

He kissed you then, crushing you against his chest, his warmth reassuring. You shuddered, curling your left hand into a fist. "Thank you," you told him when he released you. "I was in real trouble. Can't fight in a fucking sundress." You hated how helpless you sounded, but Jack deserved the thanks.
"Three on one is stupid odds, baby." He helped you to your feet, looking around. "I assume you shot up those cyborgs too?"

"Oh, yeah," you said. "Forgot about them. There are two more at the bottom of the fire escape too." You laughed softly.

Jack's expression darkened. "What the hell were you thinking and where's Athena?" Jack asked gruffly.

"Give her a nanite injection, she's favoring right her side," Genji said, examining your kills.

"Hold up," you said, as Jack clasped the back of your head, looking you straight in the eye, amusement gone. "I had to come back for someone. I didn't pick this fight for fun."

Jack froze. "What?"

Moving hurt, but you walked over to the display. "Du, it's clear. You can come on out."

The kid emerged from behind the giant ground sloth, her eyes widening as she saw Genji and Jack. You didn't think she'd seen Jack fussing over you, but you weren't sure; she'd probably heard him, if she wasn't deafened by the gunfire.

"This is Du. She got separated from her class. I got them out of the building first, but-" But you had no idea what was going on outside. She stared at your bloody face, then Genji, and then her eyes lit up with recognition when she saw Jack.

"Are you all right?" Jack asked her.

She nodded, smile very big as she hugged Athena's drone to her chest. To your surprise, her smile got bigger when she saw Genji, like he was the coolest person in the room.

"Ultraman, can you escort Ms. Du to safety?" Jack asked.

"Sir," Genji nodded.

"I have your drone," she said, offering the fish torpedo to Genji. "Are you a superhero?"

"He's pretty close," you said, before he could answer.

Genji just strapped the drone to his back, giving you and Jack an awkward nod.

"I'll be back," he said.

"I cleared the fire escape once," you said. "But there might be more."

Genji nodded again. "Keep your eyes on me," he said, as he led the kid the long away around the dead cyborgs. "I'll hurry back. It wouldn't do to get caught out there like this; they might mistake me for some sort of mass murdering cyborg," he said, almost sounding amused, and then he was out the door.

Jack removed a pack from his back. "Your gear."

You stripped out of the ruined dress, putting on fatigues and a t-shirt. Jack took one look at your bruises and gave you a nanite injection. "Sorry, baby. We can't wait on an emitter."

"No, it's fine," you shuddered as the needle went deep. When he was done, your body felt hot, but you were already strapping on your armor. Tanto and pistol on your belt, wakizashi on your back, carbine in your hands. You were relieved to add on your decibel blocker, because you wanted to be able to hear Jack during a firefight. But damn, it felt good to be prepared.

Jack gave you a sharp approving smile as he looked you over. "Kwento's people are holed up on the fifth floor. You ready, baby?"

"Let's go," you said, wiping your face.

**

You weren't sure how they'd gotten ahead of you, unless they'd managed to land on the roof. But the stairs between the third and fourth floor remained barricaded. They'd thrown down turrets, and your only cover was sticking to the wall and staying around the corner. They weren't trying to shoot you through the wall, yet, but it was a distinct possibility that they would try.

"We have any grenades?"

"Couldn't carry everything securely. Packing ordnance under those circumstances seemed like a bad idea," Jack said giving you a regretful shrug.

You leaned around the corner, firing a few shots off your new carbine. It had a stronger kick than your previous gun, and the blue-lit shots took some getting used to, but after a few rounds "duck, duck, shoot," you managed to take one turret offline.

Jack gave you an approving nod. "Good shooting."

"Carbines offer better accuracy," you said.

"Just take the compliment," Jack laughed. "Come on, I'll provide suppressing fire, you take out the other two."

"Understood, sir," you said, even as he leaned in to kiss you. "Is this really the time-?"

"Good shooting is sexy, and Gabe agrees." He grinned. "Plus I missed you both."

"Missed you too," you said, feeling that familiar stupid grin creeping across your face. You shook your head: you couldn't go into battle with that expression on. Unless looking like a dopey lovestruck Overwatch agent was actually intimidating.

Jack stepped out of cover, firing fast and lighting up the stairwell. You stayed low, lining up your shots and taking the other two turrets out of commission.

After reloading, you followed Jack up the stairs, finding only junked automated defenses, no cyborgs. Jack held up a fist as you passed the fourth floor. You stopped abruptly, your eyes falling on the numerous glowing red discs adhering to the walls. You bit back a snarl. Those were a lot of proximity mines with laser trip sensors and were those incendiary mods? Any fleeing survivors could easily set them off.

"Goddamnit, they're modded and they're close enough together to set off a chain reaction. Not sure what that would do to the building. If we could hack them..." He trailed off, shaking his head, because Athena wasn't here to take care of that for you. "Don't want to take this route, not unless we don't have a choice. There's another stairwell on the other side of the building."

You glanced at the fourth floor exit, wondering what traps lay ahead. Maybe they'd just bypassed the entire fourth floor, but you knew better than to believe that. Your luck was never that good.

The two of you cleared the door, ducked past the restrooms, and found yourselves in hall full of taxidermied mammals, their glass eyes watching you a permanent state of alarm. Lions, tigers, bears...

And a heap of dead tourists lined up on the floor. You swallowed roughly, suddenly cold. Then you crouched down to check the dozen or so bodies. They'd been rounded up and executed. Couples, students, families: a father trying to shield his kid, all you saw at first were the tiny sneakers emblazoned with Mickey Mouse and spattered in blood, but that was enough. Still, you checked everyone, already knowing what you would find. There weren't any survivors.

You let out the breath that was curdling inside you, and when you looked at Jack his expression was grim.

"We need one alive," you said, your voice quiet. "I don't want to spare any of them, but we need one alive. Maybe two, if the Americans get greedy."

"We'll cross that bridge when we get to it, agent." Jack rubbed the spot between his brows. "Let's move."

You nodded, tasting bile in the back of your throat. Your stomach was suddenly sour, but you kept moving, very glad that you'd rushed to get that elementary school class out of the building. You took a shaky breath and started to move. Jack however, stood still, his fists clenched.

You moved around to face him. He stared at the ground, expression painfully blank, though he was grinding his teeth.

"Hey," you said, taking his hand between yours.

Jack blinked a few times and looked at you, awareness gradually returning to his eyes. "I...Sorry," he said, gripping your fingers. "You'd think by now I'd be used to atrocities. Saw worse during the height of the Omnic Crisis. I..."

"I'd be more worried if you weren't bothered," you said.

"I know," he said, voice distant. "Thank you." He squeezed your hand. "We need to go."

Silently, you exited the mammal exhibit, knowing you'd see this place again in your dreams.

**

The next wing's theme was deep sea ocean life, and you were kind of relieved to see cyborgs skulking behind the large photography displays. Because fangtooth fish, giant tubeworms, and viperfish were utterly terrifying to look at and you had enough nightmare fodder. Cyborgs? Cyborgs were nothing compared to fish from the abyss.

Beside you, Jack finally relaxed, his expression zen even as he lifted his rifle.

You braced yourself, mirroring him, the motions oddly comfortable. This would be the first time you used your upgraded carbine against another person. You were not disappointed. Your shots struck half a second before you registered them, and the blue-lit rounds punched through their armor plating like it was tissue paper.

There was a shriek as a man with blades flung himself at Jack. You shifted your barrel inches to the left and suddenly the attacker was falling in silence.

Jack stepped over the body and the two of you advanced, taking cover behind some of the partition walls.

"What the fuck is Morrison doing here?"

"How did they get here so fast?"

"Talk less, shoot more!"

You smiled involuntarily at their panic.

"Not so tough when you're not gunning down unarmed civilians, are you?" Jack snarled. "Such brave strong soldiers, out here killing children." Jack didn't shout, not like you expected. But the virulence of his scorn burned like acid in the air.

They responded with a hail of bullets and you yanked Jack down. He fumed as he reloaded, his thoughts dark. He looked mad enough to flatten coins between his teeth, and you know what, he probably could.

You took a deep breath, listening for movement. The gallery was laid out in twists and turns, but the area looped around itself. There were at least four left, and you expected a pincer attack.

Instead they charged you. Not for the first time did you wonder if Nguyen's cybridization process traded critical thinking skills for aggression. And then you didn't have time to worry about it.

Jack shot the closest one in the face, and the man dropped. You nailed one in the kneecaps, and he went down, but the next two were on you then, and Jack slammed his fist into the man's jaw, ignoring the metal arm reaching for him.

You fired a burst into your attacker's chest, and his staggered, but he had an enhanced dampener shield on top of his armor and your bullets didn't penetrate. He wore a heavy helmet, so headshots were out. You set your gun aside, drawing the wakizashi off your back.

"Idiot," he panted, clutching at his chest as he raised his gun.

You were not Hanzo or Genji, a master at the blade. But you'd been practicing simple strikes, and you had good aim. If this had been your tanto, your reach would not have been enough. Smiling thinly, you darted forward, weight on your front leg, arm fully extended as you drove the blade through the cyborg's poorly protected throat. That was Gabriel's fencing lunge, and you'd mimicked it well.

By switching to a melee weapon, and avoiding contact with the armor pieces, you'd managed to avoid triggering his kinetic shields. You removed the blade cleanly, a little impressed by how sharp it was, and looked up to see Jack grabbing a fifth cyborg by the head and just twisting. The crunch was oddly satisfying and you wiped your blade off.
Jack dropped the corpse, and looked at you, his expression cool. "Was it wise to take a short sword to a heavy?"

You sheathed the blade and shrugged. "It was faster than wearing through his kinetic shielding."

Jack's lips quirked upward. "That's Gabe's pirate move, sweetheart. Though I think he perfected it with Gérard and Amélie."

"The fencing lunge?"

"Yes. And you stole it," Jack gave you a tired smile. "I'm not sure if Gabe will be impressed or salty."

"He'd be turned on and you know it," you said, and Jack laughed.

There was a moan from the floor. The man you'd shot in the kneecaps was trying to crawl away. Jack raised a brow and stalked toward him.

"You said we needed one alive," Jack said idly. "But he doesn't need his limbs."

The man screamed in terror as Jack raised his boot and brought it down on the prosthetic leg. The metal snapped under the pressure, and you blinked, pretty sure that didn't count as torture, though it was a little disturbing to watch Jack stomp on a shrieking man.

You pulled the omnic-grade cuffs off your utility belt and slapped them on before Jack got any bright ideas about fingers. The bastard deserved it, but you couldn't afford to waste time on a distraction. Jack gathered up the guns and on a whim, he turned and smashed one into the prisoner's head. Lights out.

You helped him put the weapons out of the man's reach.

"Leave him. Someone else can pick him up," Jack said. "We need to get to Crane."

"What do we know about her situation?" You asked as you resumed the trek to the opposite stairwell.

"They were on the fifth floor. Geology exhibit, I think. Last I heard, they'd had civilians with them and sustained heavy casualties. We should hurry."

You almost asked about Zenyatta, though you had no idea why. It wasn't like the two of you were friends. And while your conversations had been uncomfortable, you didn't like the idea of him dying here. As for Kwento? You'd worked too damn hard to get her on your side. You were going to save her goddamn life, and she was going to appreciate it so much, she would handle all the nasty political shit for you out of sheer gratitude. There was no other option.

Jack began to jog and you followed in suit. The second stairwell waited.

Chapter End Notes

So work screwed up my vacation time and I'm working overtime this week, instead of getting an extra vacation day. Which is fine because I need the money, but I start a 6 day stretch and I'm so full of rage and "fuck them all" that I'm a little worried.

My cousin works there too, and we're still waiting to see if he's going to keep his job over something that happened. Management wants to keep him, but corporate doesn't. So...yeah, super stressed.

Teenage cousin just asked to move in because of family issues. I'm fine with it, but I'm not sure if he means it or if he's venting. So I guess having more money is going to be good, but OMFG, I'm just two steps away from a shrieking screaming meltdown. I kept muttering "I'll kill them all. I'll send them facefirst back to Hell," yesterday when I found out they had "forgotten" to schedule my vacation and put me on for a full work week instead.

I wasn't going to take "trip" vacation. Just get my teeth fixed, eyes checked, animals vaccines, etc. Clean the carpet. Adult. I'm not entirely sure I can make it through the next two and half weeks as a polite sane human being. I many go full murder-beast. We shall see.

Hope everyone else is doing better. Love hearing from you. Comments make me a little less screaming rage monster. Which is good, because I don't want to be a screaming rage monster.
Chapter 91

Chapter Summary

Operation Black Abacus continues.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Cursing loudly, you ducked, annoyed that they had portable turrets and cyborgs defending the place. They had to have come through the roof. Or had inside help. You fired off a couple shots, muttering obscenities under your breath. You would have strangled someone for a grenade right now.

"Where is everyone else?" You scowled, peeking around the corner and nearly losing your head. Instead you got a face full of dusted drywall and coughed, wiping your eyes.

"Epsilon Squad is at the Archives. Gallus's team is coordinating with the first responders and trying to secure the Mall. Gunslinger, Hawkeye, and Bauer-

"I'm sorry, was it just Gabriel who came up with these names? No, Jesse had to be in on it. Genji and I are going to-

"Gérard helped," Jack said, and leaned around the corner to fire off a few more rounds. "At least you sound intimidating. Summer? I sound like a vegan otter scrubber who wants to spend more time around the drum circle."

"...Do you?" You asked, because that was an oddly specific description.

"What do you think, smartass?" Jack gave you his patented "the Strike Commander is not amused by your bullshit" look. "Look, I can draw fire, but I don't know how long I can take hits, sweetheart. You're going to have to be fast if you-

"Terrible idea," you said shaking your head. "There are four of armed cyborgs, three self-repairing turrets, and only the two of us. We need some grenades or-

"A partridge in a pear tree," Jack said.

"What?"

Jack stared at your blank face. "Never mind."

"We need ordnance, or some kind of battering ram," you frowned, because demolitions wasn't your specialty. "Or bigger guns. We always need bigger guns-

The door to the fourth floor opened, and you leveled your carbine at it, waiting for the ambush. Because you and Jack had been stuck here too long. Because you were too busy chatting to move forward. Idiot! Now they'd sent someone to flank you.

One man slipped through the door, weapons raised. You stared at the huge barrels of two shotguns, and lowered your gun with a headshake.

"Damn you're slow. Did you two just stop for a latte break?" Gabriel asked, patently arrogant smirk on his face. He was still in his pixelated camouflage, his hat gone. Which was fine, because he'd styled his goddamn hair for a combat run. And even if his face was smudged with soot and sweat, you couldn't ignore how good he looked in a uniform. "Or was Jack trying some of those cute pickup lines on you?"

Jack just laughed, lowering his gun. When Gabriel got close enough, Jack yanked him by the collar and kissed him hard. "You're a sight for sore eyes," he said, his grin fierce.

"Have you heard of knocking? Or radioing ahead?" You glared, even though the comms were down and you'd been too focused on the barricade ahead to worry about your flank.

"Comms aren't working so well in here. Not sure what they're using to disrupt. Ultraman said even Athena was affected."

"Oh, where is he?" You asked, wondering if you had ninja backup to take out the defensive emplacement.

"Sent him to help Gunslinger and Hawkeye. Capitol's secure, but they're clearing out some of the other museums. Figured the three of us could handle whatever they were doing here. Archives are still under fire, but Epsilon Squad has it under control. Gallus and company are coordinating resources on the Mall itself. They put Black Swan in the Washington Monument with her fancy rifle, and she could probably clear the green all on her own. Prickly Pear is still trying to get our comms back online, but if they're blocking Athena, then I'm not holding out much hope." He shrugged, like he didn't expect much from Ziv. "Now, what's the hold up?"

"Four heavies, three turrets, and us without a siege breaker," Jack said, jerking his head to in the enemy's direction. "But now that you're here..."

"That's a plan?" Gabriel laughed, shaking his head. "All right, I'll take point and the central cyborgs. Jack, the outer two are yours, suppressing fire if you please. Lucky, you're on the turrets: stay behind us. No showing off, either of you."

"Bossy," Jack said. He winked at Gabriel. "I like it."

Gabriel just raised his chin, never losing that smug expression. "Get moving, and try not to get distracted by my ass." He rushed the stairs laughing, and you only took half a second to admire the view before the gunshots started up. Then you and Jack were right behind him. You focused on the turrets, winging the central one, and destroying the one closest to the door. Gabriel's shotgun roared, drowning out whatever he was saying to Jack. But Jack was laughing too.

You kept your head down, but none of the return fire came near you. Gabriel's shotgun blast tore through a cyborg and the central turret, and you had to shift to the right to reach the last one.

Sparks flew off Gabriel's armor and he racked his shotgun as he reached the final step. Kicking dead cyborgs out of the way, he inspected the smoking ruins.

"...Was that all?" He asked, raising a brow at Jack.

"Don't even start," Jack rolled his eyes, blowing out a breath. "You and Lucky take on ridiculous odds without thinking-"
"Oh? Just me and Lucky?" Gabriel grinned, grabbing Jack's collar and shoving him against the wall. He kissed him hard, eyes bright. "I think you've been leading by example, Jackie."

Growling, Jack gripped Gabriel's hair, sinking his teeth into Gabriel's lower lip. "Just you wait, Reyes."

"Cocky, I like that in a man." Gabriel chuckled. "Lucky and I will show you ridiculous odds later, won't we, hermosa?" He gave you a heated look, and you forgot to breathe for a moment, seeing them both so on edge.

"Oh, don't get me started on her. She's not off the hook either," Jack said, because he was a goddamn snitch. "Do you know how I found her-"

"Hey, we need to move," you said, checking the door and hoping to delay that story for awhile. You didn't see any trip wires, but that didn't mean there weren't any traps. "Back up, so I can work." You carefully examined the door jamb and found a wire wedged against the bottom of door jamb. It ran parallel to the threshold. Anyone opening it unaware would trigger something nasty.

"What is it?" Gabriel asked, crouching beside you.

"Tripwire, probably for a claymore, set against the door." Your tanto was too big to get under there. You flexed a blade finger and carefully sawed through the wire.

Satisfied that you'd disarmed the claymore, you opened the door. You found two flashing red lights the size of dinner plates. There was a high-pitched whine as they primed themselves: proximity mines, and you'd just triggered them.

"Down!" Jack shouted.

You swore as Gabriel grabbed you and spun you around, slamming you into the far wall. He held you there, one arm covering your head. The detonation wasn't as loud as you expected, but Gabriel flinched, sweat dripping down his forehead.

"Gabriel-"

"I'm OK," he said, gritting his teeth. "Got some shrapnel in my legs, but I'm OK." He cupped your face. "Are you all right, baby?"

"I'm fine. Now you have to turn around and let me see-" You said, breathing shaky. Because you remembered the story of Frank Hsieh, Gabriel's SEP squadmate who'd died from internal bleeding before they could get his armor off.

"Hold still, Gabe," Jack's voice broke through your panic. He knelt down, reaching into a pocket and withdrawing another nanite injector. "Hmm, your armor isn't compromised. There's nothing too deep or large. Might not be sleeping on your back tonight. I'll pick out some of the bigger pieces. How's breathing feel?"

"I'm all right, Jack," Gabriel said, releasing you. He pressed his palms against the wall and took a deep breath as a demonstration, not wincing at all. His ribs and lungs were probably undamaged then. Unless he was faking. He was good at faking.

"I'm sorry, I should have been more careful," you said, voice trembling. "I-"

Gabriel shook his head, biting his lip as Jack yanked out small pieces of metal. "Honest mistake. That was overkill on their part. But if you're worried about it, you can make it up to me later, chica. Stop apologizing."

"Their makeshift emplacement took most of the damage," Jack said. "He's OK, sweetheart. He has good reflexes."

You exhaled, hugging Gabriel's neck. He was warm, but not running too hot. But the museum was air conditioned.

"I-"

"You're welcome, corazon. You can help me pick out the splinters later tonight," Gabriel said, with a wry smile. "It'll be very romantic." He kissed you gently, a gloved hand patting your head. There was an oddly satisfied look on his face.

"Don't try to do it by candlelight though," Jack said, leaning over to kiss Gabriel's cheek. "It's a good idea in theory, but..."

"Of course," you said, nodding rapidly. "We can feed you ice cream, and put on a movie, and I'll get tweezers and some lidocaine-"

"Stop fretting," Gabriel rolled his eyes at you. "If your sorry ass is really grateful, you'll manage to stay uninjured throughout the rest of this mission. Got it?"

"Yes, whatever you say," you said, prepared to agree to pretty much anything, because Gabriel had been injured protecting your careless ass and the guilt was suffocating.

"All right then," he said. "Let's go."

You found a dark-skinned woman in black armor, the red, yellow, and green emblem of Numbani on her uniform. She was very dead, probably one of Kwento's bodyguards, and you could hear gunfire in the distance.

Checking the signs, you found the entrance to the Janet Annenberg Hooker Hall of Geology, Gems, and Minerals, and understood why Jack had just called it the "geology exhibit." Jack led the way. Gabriel followed, his walk was a little stiff, but he didn't seem to be flagging at all. If anything, he was in a surprisingly good mood. You brought up the rear, on high alert. No one was sneaking up on you this time. Not even a goddamn Shimada.

"You should've seen her, Jack. She made that marine eat her knife, and he loved her for it. All those damn jarheads did," Gabriel said, with mock disapproval. "He proposed to her, despite the fact he was already married."

"I think you and I are going to have to make a quick trip to Quantico and sort this boy out-"

You rolled your eyes at their good-natured ribbing. It was good that they were trying to act normal, if irritating, but you kept shooting looks at Gabriel's bloodied pants. "Whatever, Gabriel came in real smooth and said I wasn't allowed to date marines. It didn't sound suspicious at all."

"Hey, you were so popular, chica. I was feeling a little insecure," Gabriel said with a cheerful shrug. "She made that up to me too. Got on her knees and mmm-" He shook his head, smile broad. "All that practice has paid off. Meant to send you a picture, but I was too spent."
Your cheeks heated as Jack turned around and gave you a slow smile. "Maybe she'll give me a personal demonstration later."

"Focus," you scowled. "We're on a mission!"

"So stern," Gabriel laughed and elbowed Jack. "We better behave, Jack. Otherwise she might punish us."

Jack saluted you with a wink. "Yes, boss."

Shaking your head, you reloaded your gun, slamming your clip in harder than necessary.

You blinked as you entered the exhibit, coming upon a trio of cyborgs smashing some of the glass cases. You'd assumed this display would be kind of boring, except some of the cyborg soldiers were wearing massive rocks, and by rocks, you meant expensive shiny gems they had looted from the museum.

"Well this is awkward," Gabriel said, eyeing the burly cyborg men decked out in tiaras, fancy pectoral jewelry, rings, and bracelets. Under other circumstances it would have been an amazing photo shoot, and they did look quite fabulous for Talon scumbag mass murderers. It wouldn't save them, but it would earn them a footnote in your mission logs.

They went for their guns, but Jack, Gabriel, and you were faster. A brief roar of gunfire and then there was the crash of heavy bodies, and the gentle tinkling of bangles and baubles jingling. You made a show of kneeling beside the bodies to check for vital signs, and whether or not you palmed some smaller pieces as you went, was going to be real hard to verify.

"Well, they're actually dead," you said brightly. "Good work guys."

Jack nodded, already moving forward, but Gabriel gave you a thoughtful look.

"What?" You asked, voice higher than you liked. It wasn't really stealing when you stole from other thieves, was it?

"Nothing iconic," he muttered under his breath. "I do not want to explain why you're wearing the Hope Diamond to Jack."

Oh, you'd forgotten all about that one. The giant blue cursed diamond. That was tempting. You wondered if it would match Jack's eyes and if he'd be willing to pose wearing nothing but...

Focus. You rose, remembering exactly why you were here. Terrorists. Dead civilians. Saving Kwentó.

Each thought sobered you further and you tightened your grip on your gun. You followed the trail of broken glass, the staccato bursts of gunfire, and a dozen more bodies, cyborg, tourist, and Numbani security officers, human and omnic.

This time, you did not make the mistake of studying the dead too closely. You told yourself it was because you were too close to combat zone, but you were relieved to have the excuse.

You rounded the corner, finding Gabriel and Jack taking cover on opposite sides of a bullet-riddled doorway. The familiar hum of high-powered shields had the hair on the back of your neck standing up straight.
"They took cover in the Hope Diamond alcove," Gabriel said. "Probably the sturdiest part of the building. You know, to prevent robbery." He gave you a wry look.

You blinked, wondering if Gabriel wanted a cut. Maybe a tiara? He'd totally rock a tiara. You could totally double back and grab more.

"Can you get a headcount?" Jack asked.

You sidled up to Gabriel, kneeling beside him. You flipped up the viewfinder on your carbine. You were only about twenty feet away, but Jack and Gabriel's guns weren't equipped for long distance shooting. You could see the bullets striking the kinetic barrier, but you couldn't see who was inside. But there were half a dozen cyborgs, three more turrets, and an OR-14 concentrating fire on the shield. Your heart clenched briefly when you sighted the omnic. How the hell had they gotten it in here? The roof. They had come from the goddamn roof. Which probably meant there had been a cloaked aircraft in DC. That had some very unpleasant implications.

"At least six more cyborgs, three turrets, and a goddamn OR-14," you muttered.

"Give Gabe the cyborgs. You can help me with the omnic," Jack said, his voice low. "Think of it as therapy."

You smiled thinly at that. No one here had forgotten about Rodriguez.

"Stop being reckless. You can make quick work of the cyborgs, I'll keep it occupied, and then we can all take care of the tin can," Gabriel said tightly. He swapped out his rounds. "Stay behind me, you two. Using the anti-omnic rounds. One hit's enough to kill an elephant."

"Fine," Jack said looking almost amused by your shared boyfriend's penchant for heavy weaponry. "Sweetheart, want to announce us?"

"With pleasure," you said, lining up your first headshot. The cyborg never knew what hit him. One moment he was firing a pulse rifle at some innocent civilians. The next, he was on the ground, his brains leaking out. So sad.

You managed to take out a turret too before they finally noticed you. And then it was Gabriel and Jack charging forward. Jack was the faster one, but Gabriel took point, since his shotguns were best at close range. Jack laid down suppressing fire, while Gabriel just started blowing craters in the walls and the enemies.

You focused on the turrets. They had the highest rate of fire and but without shielding you could knock them out of commission the fastest. Reloading you, swore as the OR-14 swung around, laser sword lighting up the room.

Just because you were saving it for last, didn't mean it was going to wait nicely. It swung the weapon in an arc, narrowly missing Gabriel, the glowing blade striking sparks against Kwento's protective shield. It brought the weapon up for a second pass, faster than anything that big should be able to move.

There were still cyborgs, but the biggest danger was right in front of Gabriel and you turned your attention to the OR-14, firing furiously at the wrist joint. You just had to keep that damn sword away from your man.

The blade was already descending on Gabriel and you screamed in fury, physics working against him. You held down the trigger, knowing that you couldn't get there fast enough. But then Jack was at Gabriel's side, blocking the strike with his rifle. The rifle wouldn't last, not against the superheated blade, but it was enough to save Gabriel. You couldn't keep shooting, at the wrist, not with Jack there, but Gabriel angled himself on his knees beside Jack, and fired his shotguns from below. The "hand" and the sword fell to the ground, and Jack tossed his smoking pulse rifle aside drawing his pistol.

It occurred to you then that Torby was going to kill Jack when you got back to Zurich. Oh dear, well there were more dangerous things in front of you and, you had the ride back to strategize.

Then you were right behind Jack, laying down cover fire for his advance. Gabriel was to your right, firing another shot point blank into the omnic's torso. It stuttered to a halt, though you knew better than to believe it was out of commission. Instead you trusted Gabriel to keep it busy while you and Jack finished the cyborgs.

Jack fired one-handed, even as two cyborgs rushed him. Laughing, he smashed his fist into the first one's face. The second one fired a shot that glanced off Jack's eyepiece, shattering the blue optical scanner. Snarling, you put two rounds straight between the bastard's eyes.

Jack gave you a fierce smile of thanks, blood trickling down the side of his face from the shrapnel. It didn't look deep but you were going to have to check that eye after the battle. Jack wasn't slowing down at all though; he pistol whipped the first cyborg, delivering a savage kick to the man's torso.

A woman in a facemask, much like "Mako" who had damn near killed you, flipped forward, moving almost as fast as Genji. Even with your hitscan rifle, you had to shoot with a lead, trying to predict where she would be in half a second. She ricocheted like a damn pinball.

Your gun clicked empty, and you could swear that the bitch heard it, because she zoomed past Jack, bounding off a wall, her head inclined at you. You slammed your gun into place against your armor and drew your wakizashi. Nguyen's cyborgs confused their superior strength for invincibility, a mistake that Genji never made. She was on you a heartbeat later, blades popping out of her gauntlets. You blocked the strike, knowing that you had to end it quickly.

"Going to gut you, amateur," she rasped, breaking the lock and drawing back to prepare for a second strike.

Jack was suddenly behind her, his gloved hands on the sides of her head. You blinked as he grabbed and twisted, the familiar crack letting you know that she was done.

Out of the corner of your eye, Gabriel was systemically dismantling the OR-14 with his shotgun and you were a little sore that he was doing it without you. Not that you blamed him; you were just annoyed that things didn't go quite as neatly as you planned. Of course, you were used to that by now.

You got a glimpse inside the Hope Diamond alcove. Kwento was there, with two surviving guards, a scarred man and a heavily burned omnic. There were a dozen more civilians crammed in there behind her, and it heartened you that Kwento hadn't just tried to save her own ass. Beside the shielding mechanism was Zenyatta, he sat in lotus position hovering an inch off the floor. From what you could see, it looked like he was channeling his own power into keeping it strong.

Relief steadied your hand, and faced the last standing cyborg, wondering if he'd beg for mercy. Wondering if you had any left in you.
"All yours, sweetheart," Jack laughed.

Goddamn reckless asshole. You had a fucking audience, though his declaration sounded less like affection and more like a taunt.

The man looked between Jack and you, sizing you up, and then judging you to be the weakest link, rushed you. Well, he was right, you were the weakest combatant out of your trio. So he would underestimate you, and like the others before him, he would not have long to regret that mistake.

You swung the blade in a horizontal arc, holding it loosely in both hands, letting the momentum power your strike. You concentrated more on directing the weapon than putting all your might into it. There was a brief jolt down your arms as you made contact. The blade swished through the target, the resistance soft and brief. And then the head soared off the body, blood arcing from the exposed neck, some of it spraying onto you. It landed on the ground and rolled under the OR-14. The body toppled, still leaking.

The look on Jack's face was worth all the laundry you were going to have to do. He looked like a kid who'd gotten caught after setting off the fireworks he'd stuffed into the school toilets, but had no regrets. And to be honest, it was kind of cute.

You didn't have time to admire your handiwork, or wonder what kind of caustic critique Hanzo would offer about your form. You wiped the short sword off on the nearest cyborg's pants, swapped it out for your gun, and reloaded.

Gabriel had taken out two of the OR-14's legs, and you fell in beside him, directing your fire at the processor in the central body.

"You just like getting dirty, don't you?" He said, loud enough for only you to hear.

"Aren't you going to compliment my awesome swordsmanship?" You asked, as Jack joined you, holding a cyborg's heavy rifle.

"Oh, we have the ride back to Zurich to show you how impressed we are," Jack said out of the corner of his mouth. "It's a good thing I have this overcoat on."

You stifled a laugh. The three of you concentrated fire on the OR-14. Watching the chassis peel away, seeing the goddamn murderbot spark, stutter, and fall, shredded beneath your gunfire, was a moment you'd always treasure. You were here with Jack and Gabriel beside you. This was exactly how it was supposed to be, the three of you together. You glanced over at Gabriel who was smiling fondly at you both.

"If it lives, we can kill it," he said, lips drawn back in a savage approximation of a smile. Your heart fluttered just a little.

"It is my privilege to be at your side in battle." Jack lowered his gun, looking over at the two of you. "And it'll be even better when I'm on top of you in bed."

If they kept this up, you were going to do something stupid in front of the civilians. Well, stupider. "I am so hungry now," you said, trying to distract yourself as your stomach growled on cue.

"See, she earned her codename," Gabriel said as he shook his head. The three of you inspected the fallen enemies. There was an odd satellite device humming along, and you contemplating smashing it. But you were an adult with decent reasoning. You found the off switch
"Wendigo, Summer, Bauer, come in. I repeat-" Ziv's voice sounded over your earpiece.

Well, you'd found one of the jammers. "Hey there, Prickly Pear," you said. "Crane is secure. We have Zen and some civvies-"

"You need to get out of there now. While you dumbasses were fighting, some of their sneakier operatives stuffed the basement with incendiary bombs before Black Swan could take them out. Think Belfast if you need inspiration," Ziv said tightly.

"...For fuck's sake," you sighed. When you looked up, the protective shield was down. And Jack was already in, ushering the civilians toward the fire exit.

Kwento's right arm was bandaged and she was limping, but she held a gun in her hand. "Oladele, Fennec-7, get the civilians out first. We'll bring Zenyatta."

You glanced at the Shambali monk, whose lights seemed dimmer than you remembered.

He gave a light chuckle. "I will be fine, Adaeze." He floated along, though he wobbled slightly. "Agent Strike, you came for us."

"Well, you know, I owed you one," you said. "And we don't leave people behind."

When you looked up, Kwento was watching you with keen eyes, her face smudged with blood and ash. "Impressive work. I am afraid one of the teenagers recorded your fight. I asked Fennec-7 to confiscate the footage but-

And then you heard the rumble and building began to shudder. Did they really plan on blowing up the museum? What a bunch of cunts. "Fire escape, now," Gabriel snapped, and pushed the jamming device into Jack's arms. "Move people!"

You caught sight of the Hope Diamond, sitting in its case. Kwento was already limping along with Jack. Zenyatta, was moving slower than usual.

"Help him, please," you said to Gabriel.

Gabriel gave you a look. "He's fine. Come on." He began to move. You looked around and then smashed the glass display case with your metal fingers, grabbing the giant blue diamond pendant. And on the way out, you might have picked up some choice pieces too, you know, since the building was on fire.

Jack stood at the top of the fire escape. You were pretty sure Zenyatta had seen your dramatic blue diamond acquisition. So you hung the enormous jewel around Jack's neck, taking a moment to admire it. Too bad you wouldn't get to see him only wearing the necklace. But damn, his eyes were a brighter shade of blue, and they sparkled when he looked at you. And when he quirked his lips at you, you forgot all about rock.

"Really?" He asked.

"I'm saving it. Or, you are now, I guess."

You and Jack raced down the rickety metal stairs, catching up to Gabriel who had Kwento in a bridal carry. You were pretty sure that was a concession to her pride. A fireman's carry might be too undignified. Zenyatta was keeping the pace, to your relief. You weren't sure how you would transport him without Gabriel or Jack's help.

The building was already smoking. You spotted Lacroix on the ground in tactical armor, directing the civilians to safety. It shocked you just how relieved you were to see him there, handling things. There were far less reinforcements than you expected to see in the goddamn center of Washington DC, but you had time for questions later.

Gabriel set Kwento down as soon as you were further away, the building already collapsing, black smoke pouring into the sky. Suddenly, you were drained and you shook your head, dreading the body count. You and Gabriel held your weapons, even as Lacroix and Brant herded the civilians a safe distance from the Natural History Museum. It had been really cool. Too bad you probably weren't going to get invited back.

Four black SUVs, with government tags, roared across the sidewalks. You blinked as two dozen men in a disjointed combination of suits and tactical armor poured out, guns drawn.

Brant was suddenly in front of everyone his badge raised. "Hey, hey, they're friendlies. They're Overwatch!" he shouted.

"FBI, put down your weapons!" A man in douche shades and tactical gear shouted, gun pointed in your direction.

"Goddamn it!" Brant snarled.

You and Gabriel made no move to disarm. Because you didn't trust "allies" that showed up once the fighting was all done. And Jack's hands were full of salvaged Talon tech.

"I said!" The man in sunglasses snarled, and raised his gun. No, he wasn't aiming at you. The move was instinct by now.

"Down!" You whirled, shoving Jack to the ground, back to the shooter, head tucked low, presenting a larger target, and hoping that he'd aim for center mass.

You felt the shots even as the thunder clapped. Thunk thunk thunk, they hit your armor, knocking the air out of your lungs. You staggered, gasping for breath.

The civilians started screaming, and you could hear Lacroix cursing in the vilest French you'd never imagined. You stumbled and caught yourself.

Jack stared at you, pure fury on his face, even as he dropped the jammer and climbed to his feet to steady you. And then Gabriel was at your side, pulling your armor off, his hands on your back. You didn't feel good, but you were still standing. Your armor was good. The shooter had a pistol. You were fine.

"Status?" Jack ground out, eyes never leaving yours.

"Armor intact... But how the hell did you get shot in the same place twice?" Gabriel snarled, already tearing strips off his sleeve to apply pressure to your left arm.

You blinked, looking down, blood flowed down your elbow, already soaking your rashguard. You hadn't even felt it. Too much adrenaline. "Oh. I don't know. Luck?"

Gabriel clenched his teeth, mirroring Jack's furious look. You wanted to laugh, but breathing hurt.

A familiar warm glow passing through you as Zenyatta hovered at your side. "Allow me to You shuddered as your arm grew uncomfortably hot. "Thank you," you said.

"Thank you again for coming to rescue us," he said, tone oddly thoughtful.

When you turned around, Lacroix was standing over the shooter, his shoe on the other man's head. Brant had seized control of the situation, and the other FBI agents were looking between Jack, you, and the shooter in absolute horror.

Jack took another moment to examine you. Then he inhaled, released, and his expression shuttered, cold determination replacing his boiling anger. The Strike Commander had taken the helm. He gently released you, giving you a nod and a cool look that promised to continue this later.

And then he was moving, speaking in tight harsh tones, telling the FBI right where they could stick their jurisdiction, their bullshit apologies, and their "trigger happy" agents. You knew better than to believe that this was any kind of accident, but it didn't do anyone favors to cause more panic. Instead, you just sat on the ground while Gabriel muttered in Spanish, holding your arm up so Zenyatta could patch you up.

Brant came to join you after a moment, his hangdog expression kind of comical. Though that could have been the blood loss.

"I am so sorry," he said, rubbing the back of his neck. "I knew it was bad, but I didn't think it would be-"

"Save it," Gabriel snapped.

"Eh, not his fault his agency is riddled with traitors," you said, trying to shrug and immediately regretting it.

Brant winced at that. "...I think everyone else is now realizing that he was aiming at the Strike Commander and not the armed guards. And they have to be wondering why. There aren't any good conclusions anyone can draw. This is going to get ugly."

"Going to get ugly? It's not already?" Gabriel said, tightly. "Because if this is how the feds operate now-"

"Why don't we get out of the open? Especially the Strike Commander and the future Undersecretary," you suggested, realizing that Gabriel was in no mood to have any kind of civil discussion. And he kept glancing over at the cuffed shooter, the look on his face murderous. You didn't mind if something bad happened to the asshole, but you didn't want to do it with witnesses.

Zenyatta didn't speak, presumably because his focus was on mending your wound, but you knew he was listening very carefully to everything everyone said.

"Come on, Gallus has set up a command center with kinetic barriers. We can wait there," Brant said.

The four of you headed to the area, stepping through the humming shields. Gabriel held your chestpiece in one arm, the other steadying you. Zenyatta floated beside you.

"Ben-zona, what the fuck is going on?" Ziv snarled as he stormed out of a tent, his hair frizzed out, his body armor hugging his lanky frame. He took one look at you and glared at Brant. "Is the FBI in the habit of shooting their goddamn allies? Because this would explain why no one wants to fucking talk to you!" He jabbed his index finger into the center of Brant's chest. "And why are you just standing there like an idiot? Stop gawking and make yourself useful!" Ziv turned his outraged gaze on you. "You. Sit your ass down, let the monk heal you, and try not to get hurt for five goddamn minutes, all right? And will someone bring me a goddamn emitter? Also, get her something to eat before she goes into shock! What the hell kind of operation are we running? Is this amateur hour? Do I have to do everything myself?"

You blinked a few times and then obediently sat down on the grass. It was a pretty sunny day, and your throat was parched, your limbs were starting to feel a little weak. He wasn't wrong about you needing food.

Brant looked between Ziv and Gabriel and took off, presumably to find you a snack. Or to make a run for the border. Because Ziv looked two steps away from full-on rabid psychopath, and it was kind of cute. You thought about hugging him and reassuring him that you were fine, but this was way more entertaining. He needed to vent anyway, and you could wait to see how things played out. Someone had to feed you. Or everyone would be sorry.

You sat on the ground watching Ziv bark orders at people. Blood pounded in your head at the rapid rhythm of your heartbeat. You were a little dizzy now. Gabriel had gotten you a blanket to sit on and was off grabbing more stuff, and there was an Athena drone hovering beside you, her guns in plain view. Zenyatta stayed at your side. He'd already staunched the blood flow and now he was trying to mend the bone. The bullet had gone through your arm, but nicked a bone on the way out, causing more damage than the last time you were shot.

You wanted a painkiller very badly, but you couldn't afford to have a fuzzy head if anything else went wrong, so you sat there, grinding your teeth, and wishing you had something alcoholic to drink. Instead you sipped bottled water, your stomach uncomfortably empty.

"Here," Ziv stood in front of you, hand extended. "I got some over the counter stuff. So you won't get loopy and over-share anything from your personal life. Because no one wants to hear that shit."

"I think some of that was because of the blood loss too," you said, managing a crooked smile as you accepted the pain pills.

"Whatever, you're a reckless idiot. It's not like Morrison can't take a few hits," Ziv sniffed. "You're always saving him, but he's the goddamn super soldier-"

"He's had my back plenty of times and you know it. But thanks, Ziv," you said. "For looking after me. I'm sorry I worried you."

He blinked, eyes slowly narrowing. "Oh no, you don't. You don't get to act all reasonable and shit, and expect me not to be pissed off that you went and got yourself shot again."

"Don't be jealous," you told him with a laugh. "I'd still take a bullet for you."

"I don't know why you think that's an acceptable measure of affection!" Ziv snarled, grabbing your collar. "I don't want you taking bullets for anyone! What the fuck kind of declaration is that?!"
"Please don't jostle my patient," Zenyatta said mildly. "I'm at a very delicate juncture."

Ziv's stiffened, quickly letting you go. "Sorry," he muttered, and you suspected that wasn't just meant for Zenyatta.

"Were you talking to me or her?" Zenyatta asked, not looking up from his work.

"Both of you. Mostly her, since she's the one in pain," Ziv scowled, crossing his arms and looking away. Because he had to know by now that ambiguous apologies were not very good apologies, right? "Look, you were supposed to be careful. And I know you suck at it, but can we have a mission where you don't get fucked up, please? Let someone else have a turn."

You snorted. "Ziv, I've been on plenty of missions where I didn't get hurt. Lay off. You're giving me a headache."

"No, that's your low blood sugar, idiot," he huffed. "For fuck's sake, where did Reyes and Brant get to?"

Gabriel returned then with an emitter, a bottle of blue electrolyte, solution and a military-issue chocolate bar. It was a terrible flavor combination, but you still wolfed down the chocolate and gulped the drink rapidly.

Gabriel watched Ziv, somewhere between tolerant and amused, as your hacker went off to find someone else to yell at.

"You realize he's probably going to find the shooter and kick him a few times," Gabriel told you.

"Eh, if he's tied up, Ziv should be fine. He does know how to kick things without hurting himself."

Gabriel shook his head, looking slightly amused. "He'll have to get in line."

"Yeah, I got dibs," you said, looking at your arm.

"You know it doesn't work that way," Gabriel said, shaking his head.

"It should," you said, maybe sulking just a little.

Brant approached, a beacon of mussed ginger hair and sheepishness. He had a hunted look on his face and kept glancing over his shoulder, like he expected to be ambushed at any time by your surly hacker.

"I found a box of Oreos and an unopened bag of Cheetos in my car," he said, looking a little awkward. "I know it's not much..."

You extended your good hand. "Give."

Gabriel opened the packages for you and you ate, because calories were calories, and emitter healing in addition to whatever Zenyatta was doing, was making you hungrier by the second.

Brant watched you eat, relaxing just a smidgeon. "So, good work getting those school kids out. But they're already saying some pretty FBI agent in a dress saved them. I'm afraid you might not get credit for it."
You almost shrugged again, but remembered to hold still.

"Is this really the time?" Gabriel glowered, his hands wonderfully warm against your back.

"I uh...no, but I have to ask about something else. Umm..." Brant tugged at his collar, face turning pink. "So, um...why is the Strike Commander wearing the Hope Diamond?"

Zenyatta had gone off to help the other injured, and you wondered when he was going to take time to rest or recharge. Kwento and Jack were in serious discussion with Lacroix, but Gabriel lingered with you, unwilling to leave you alone with Brant. Athena had reassured him a few times that the jamming device was not affecting her now, but he lingered.

Ziv was also in the area, watching you like a hawk. He thought he was being sneaky, so you pretended not to notice.

"So, did you happen to salvage anything else?" Brant asked, as you watched thick clouds of black smoke pour out of the shell of the Natural History Museum. You felt a pang of sadness at the thought of all those cool displays and artifacts going up in smoke. Just another heinous crime to lay at Talon's feet.

You yawned, and ate another cookie. Nothing good ever came from admitting anything to law enforcement and you didn't have to say a word.

"She did," Gabriel said, much to your dismay. "Wendigo is a detail person. She just doesn't think she can trust anyone in the FBI."

Brant winced at the low blow. Normally you would have told Gabriel to behave, but you weren't feeling very forgiving right now. Even if Brant had brought you all the junk food in his car.

"Snitch," you said, under your breath.

"They belong in a museum," Gabriel told you, and you wondered how long he'd been waiting to use that line.

You sighed and looked at Brant who was trying very hard not to laugh at you.

With one hand, you took off your belt, opened up certain storage pouches, and dumped out the jewelry and precious stones you'd stashed in there onto the blanket. Brant's smile got progressively more uneasy as the pile grew.

"I was saving them," you said. "We got the message that there were incendiary bombs, and I couldn't get to the fossils... You know, those would have been pretty cool." Come to think of it, you wondered if anyone managed to take any prisoners. Because your team hadn't saved any enemies. Oops.

"I won't ask any questions," Brant said, though you could tell he was struggling with that.

Gabriel patted your back gently. "I'm going to see if we're setting up a base camp, or leaving. Let Prickly Pear or Athena know if you need anything. And if anyone bothers you, you can shoot them," he said, gaze traveling to Brant.
Finally! A Jack, Gabriel, and Lucky exclusive combat mission!

I wrote this before the Brazilian museum fire, and still feel amazingly guilty. Like, "oh let's make a fictional terrorist attack and also burn down a museum." Then sees a real museum burn and feels terrible. Left it though. I know the Smithsonian Natural History Museum only has three floors, BUT this is the future and I'm having fun with making it a bigger, crisper museum. OK, maybe not the crispy part.

Stressing hard core.

Finished Day 5 of a six day stretch. I'm getting over a cold. We still don't know if my cousin is going to lose his job. And I'm so done with people I have been screeching on occasion. I can't customer service any more. I can't. Teenage cousin is not moving in with us, yet. Haven't seen any changes in cat's health since we put him on meds and prescription food, but it's expensive. Dart's sebaceous cyst is oozing sebum, so it's gross, but he seems fine. Ranger has grown another fatty tumor, and I'm like "WHY?"

So applying for more jobs again.

As I was writing this I had to go into the kitchen and found Shepard had stolen a box of Beanboozled flavored jellybeans off the table, tore open the box, and was eating them.

Overall, stressed and grumpy. I'm finally off Wednesday and I need to catch up on laundry, exercise, and finding ways to relax. Bought a Moana Lego set, but too tired to put it together tonight. I don't even usually play with Legos any more, but it was on clearance and I loved the movie.
Chapter 92

Chapter Summary

While Black Abacus is technically a success, things in DC are still a mess.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Washington DC was on complete lockdown, and the reason any official help had been delayed was because Talon hit the Metro, with bombs instead of gunmen. The explosions were bad enough, but the subsequent train derailings, fires, electrical faults, and cave-ins just multiplied the death toll. The Archives, the Capitol, the Smithsonian Museum of Natural History, and the Smithsonian Museum of Inorganic Life had been attacked. Though the Natural History Museum had seen the worst of it, those numbers paled beside the Metro casualties. You wondered if the American government was going to try to blame Overwatch.

The casualties were in the mid-triple digits. You didn't have the details, but apparently Lacroix had managed to get some USG agencies on board prior to the actual attack and while it had been bad, it could have been much worse. But the hospitals were swamped, many roads were closed, and civilian aircraft remained grounded.

So you sat there in the grass, drinking Gatorade and eating vending machine snacks that Ziv ordered Brant to get for you, while Athena updated you on the situation. Kwento's surviving omnic bodyguard Fennec-7 came by to give Athena a copy of the phone footage they'd confiscated from some of the civilians. In addition to early accounts of the attacks, you got to see your decapitation trick and your meat shield trick in high definition, and it was much better quality than most security cameras.

Kwento had lost seven out of her dozen member entourage. Her assistant and one bodyguard had remained at their hotel working on editing presentations for her meeting, and were confirmed safe. Oladele and Fennec-7 weren't going to be in fighting shape, but they were alive and walking on their own. Zenyatta was still chugging along tending to the wounded.

All Overwatch personnel were accounted for and there had been no loss of life. Epsilon Squad was helping maintain the perimeter on the Mall.

Lacroix's network hadn't been so lucky. The Secret Service agent, the park ranger, and the contractor had all been killed in the fighting. The rest of them were coordinating the response right now, making sure to highlight the interagency cooperation and the heroism of the fallen. It was terribly calculating, but you weren't so naïve as to think you could get through this with good intentions and honesty alone. People had died. The truth was too convoluted for the average person, especially since they were not cleared for all the background information. There would be a call for retribution. And Lacroix had no intention of letting Overwatch be a scapegoat.

Gabriel had quietly informed you that a lot of the National Park Service personnel, including the quirky security guards at the National History Museum, Griffin and the light switch guy, the ones who helped you arrange the evacuation, had died at their posts trying to slow down the attackers. Pistols were no match for pulse rifles, and they had to have known that, but they still stuck around, buying time with their lives.

You didn't have a response. Not that one was required from you. You just laid down in the grass, drinking your electrolyte solution, and stared at the clouds. It was a beautiful day. You were alive when a lot of other people were not. It didn't feel like a victory, but it was what you had. Suddenly, you wanted nothing more than to hug Jack and Gabriel, but you could not, not in the middle of DC, with so many onlookers. Instead, you combed your fingers through the grass, breathing slowly, while you focused on a cloud that looked something like a rhinoceros beetle. Or was it a stag beetle?

"There you are, sugarpie."

You smiled faintly as Jesse's shadow fell over you, blocking your view of the beetle clouds. He settled down beside you, black serape wrapped around his blue armor.

"That has to be hot," you said, offering him your drink.

He took it with a nod and drained the bottle. "Much obliged." He unwound the length of fabric, setting it in his lap.

"How'd your run go?" You asked, tilting your head up so you could get a better look at him. He was sweaty, his hat askew, and he was sporting a shiner, but otherwise he seemed unharmed.

"Things got a little hairy," he said with a shrug. "They brought in OR-14, and that brought back some bad feelings."

"Same," you said, understanding that hesitance in his voice.

"Had it mostly under control. There was some trouble, when Hanzo ended up taking a bullet meant for Genji and then Genji went batshit. Lots of screaming and cutting. They're going need someone good at jigsaw puzzles to put the bodies back together."

You laughed, though it probably wasn't funny, not really. "Hanzo OK, though?"

"He didn't get shot anywhere important. Bullet just grazed his side. He slapped a bandage on it and just kept shooting. The man has some serious talent with a bow." Jesse gave you a thoughtful look.

"Oh, are you going to invite him to join the "I use outdated weaponry for stylistic reasons" club? Because-"

Jesse snorted, sticking his hat over your face. It smelled like sweat, gunpowder, and cologne. You wrinkled your nose and pushed it out of your eyes.

"Ain't nothing wrong with revolvers, and I'll outshoot you any day to prove it."

You just laughed, mostly because he was right.

"Cleared the Capitol, met up with Epsilon Squad to finish of the guys at the Archives, then made it back here for debrief." He rubbed the back of his neck. "Managed not to burn the buildings down either." He gave you a sly smirk.

"That was not my fault," you scowled. "There were bombs."

"And sleeper agents," Jesse said, the humor draining out of his voice. "How's your arm
"Numb. Zenyatta healed me up pretty good. It'll hurt more later, but I'm managing with basic painkillers."

Jesse nodded, clearly remembering the aftermath of Operation Shanghai Noon.

"Watergate or the Mandarin Oriental?" Ziv asked as he came over to you, holding a few more bottles of Gatorade. He handed them to you and Jesse.

"...What?" You squinted at Ziv.

"We probably aren't getting out of the city tonight, not without kicking up a big fuss, so we need a place to crash and we're not staying at the Holiday Inn."

"Aww, but they have a swimming pool," Jesse said. "And continental breakfast. Who doesn't like free continental breakfast?"

"No cheap tourist hotels, it's a security risk." Ziv massaged his forehead, and was that a vein protruding? Hotels were a security risk in general, but you weren't going to argue if the team wanted to upgrade accommodations. "Kwento's asked to stay with us, for security reasons, obviously. So anyway, Hanzo chose the Mandarin Oriental, Gérard is partial to the Watergate Hotel. Amélie prefers the Four Seasons, but it's kind of far from here."

"What's closest?" You asked, dreading getting up and trudging out.

"The Mandarin," Ziv said. "McCree?"

"The Mandarin then," he said, opening up a bottle and giving you a wry smile. You appreciated the Blackwatch solidarity.

"Got it," Ziv said. He glanced at Jesse. "Good to see you made it back without getting shot. Some agents could learn from you," he said stiffly, before flouncing off.

"Huh," Jesse said.

"Yeah," you agreed. "Should've seen him earlier. Shouting orders at people, terrorizing Agent Brant, and being a vicious mama hen, it was horrifying, but also strangely endearing."

"Yeah, I'll pass," Jesse said with a laugh. He patted your hand. "You can cat nap if you need to," he said. "I'll keep an eye on things."

You weren't entirely sure what Jack and Gabriel were doing right now, only that it was probably very important and paramount to international security. You missed them, but they would join you when they could.

You glanced over at Jesse who had already finished his drink. He wiped his mouth with the back of his hand, flashing you a tired smile. Just having him here chased the shadows from the edge of your thoughts, and you put his hat back over your eyes, the sun so warm on your skin.

You felt him lay the serape on you, and you smiled faintly, grateful just for this.

You didn't end up at the Watergate or the Mandarin. Brant's patron, Senator Armstrong, got you an entire floor in the historic Hay-Adams Hotel, which was actually much closer. You were pretty sure it had been comped, because the staff kept hailing your party as heroes and slipping you extras, like blankets, bottles of wine, and fancy chocolates. But there were a lot of wide floor-length windows and rows of balconies, and you really didn't like that right now. Gabriel was working out watch schedules.

Kwento, Zenyatta, and her bodyguards had a suite. Lacroix, Amélie, and Ziv had a suite. Epsilon Squad had two rooms. Jack and Gabriel took the room across from Kwento’s, citing ease of defense. And you were sharing with Jesse, Genji, and Hanzo. Jesse and Genji were on patrol right now, and Hanzo was napping one of the two beds, a satin sleep mask on his face. You discretely snapped a picture.

You sat at an expensive desk and cleaned your weapons, wondering if you should call down to the kitchen to order a meal. The wakizashi had some gunk dried on it and you had to hurry up, slightly concerned that Hanzo would wake up and demand to know why you were mistreating your blade. The guns required less elbow grease, but more disassembly, but it was all old hat. Sure, the work could wait, but you found the ritual soothing: field stripping your guns then using the brushes, the patches, and the Hoppe's No. 9 to clean the parts. Add a little bit of gun oil to polish things up, snap the pieces back together, and everything would run smoother than before.

You were still a little woozy, probably from the exertion, the sun, and all the junk food you'd eaten after combat. The muscles in your back were aching now. You debated asking for more pain meds.

A knock came, and suddenly Hanzo was sitting up, the sleep mask magically gone.

You got up to check the peephole. "It's Gabriel," you said, so Hanzo could relax. You opened the door to see him in sweats, looking worn out.

"Hey," you said. "Did you want to come in?"

He shook his head. "Hotel staff delivered food to Jack and me. Wanted to see if you guys had eaten yet?" He glanced at Hanzo.

"I will order room service in a minute," Hanzo said, his expression carefully blank.

"Well, I'm starving," you admitted.

"Come on over then. You're not a watch till tomorrow afternoon, if we're still here," Gabriel said.

You glanced at the other doors. Shoal had come in sporting a broken nose and wrist brace, declared the day "too stupid to continue," and gone straight to her room, presumably to sleep. Jemison had given you a faintly exasperated head shake, that could have meant any number of things, and followed.

Kwento's door was shut, and you wondered if Zenyatta was finally taking a break. Amélie raised a glass of wine to you as you passed by and you waved back. Ziv was nattering on about something and you could hear Lacroix trying to placate him in low tones. You smiled at that, because they deserved each other. Maybe not Amélie, but she didn't seem to mind them.

Gabriel opened the door for you, and you went in, their room bigger and almost all cream with dark wood accents. There were fresh cut flowers in elaborate vases, several bottles of wine, and a massive cart of food that Jack was unloading onto the dining table. He was also in sweats, his hair damp from the shower. He was setting a salad bowl on the table, an Athena drone scanning every dish.

He stopped when he saw you, jaw clenching as his eyes drifted to your bandaged arm. Jack took a deep breath, placed the salad bowl on the table, and came over to you and Gabriel. He didn’t say anything, he just pulled you close, arms wrapped tightly around you as he squeezed you too tightly.

Jack took a shaky breath, his face in your hair. "Should tan your hide for pulling that," he rasped in your ear. "My armor is heavier than yours and there was no reason you should have-"

"You're welcome," you laughed. "Come on, you were holding recovered tech," you said, like that was the reason you jumped in front of him. "And I'm too sore and tired for anything kinky tonight."

"Stop that," he growled, pulling away, though he gripped your shoulders, glaring down at you. "I hate it when you're flippant about it."

You shrugged, recognizing that flash of anger. This wasn't the first time you'd been on the receiving end, he'd been a bear after Paris and Belfast too. "You're going to be salty no matter what I say."

He let go of you, and turned away, his face hard. "I don't think you get the position you put me in."

You almost made a joke about you being on top, but Gabriel rested a hand on your shoulder, squeezing lightly. You weren't exactly sure what that meant, but it was probably a hint to stop antagonizing Jack.

"Explain it then," you said.

Jack turned back around, giving you a dirty look. "I shouldn't have to. We've been over this before. I hate knowing that you'll throw yourself between me and a bullet, because I'm your boss."

You snorted. "That's not why I did it, you idiot. I definitely would not take a bullet for Lacroix, and I work for him more often than I do you." You paused. "Besides, Gabriel shielded me from those mines earlier, and ended up with cut up legs for his trouble. I'm not saying that like it's a competition. I just knew I would get to you faster."

You leaned over and kissed his cheek. He held himself stiff, teeth gritted, eyes staring through you.

"This isn't fair," you complained. "I get shot and you're mad at me."

"Those two things are related," Jack said sharply.

You sighed, giving the food a mournful glance. "Do you want me to go? Give you some space?"

"No," he growled. "I want you to be more careful."

You managed a lopsided grin. "Can't be careful in love, Jack. That's just cowardice. You can be mad, but I'm just glad you're here now to be mad at me."

Jack winced then, suddenly deflating. "I-" He turned away from you, but not fast enough for you to miss the wounded look on his face. The open regret in those deep blue eyes pierced your chest. "I should have taken care of you myself afterward. I'm sorry, I should have come and checked on you sooner, but-"I didn't mean it like that," you said.

Jack didn't say anything, just wrapping his arms around you, holding you against his chest. Gabriel reached out to rub the back of his neck.

"It's all right, amor," Gabriel said, leaning over to kiss Jack's cheek. "She's OK. We all made it. We're all here now."

"Should have been there with you, not planning counterstrikes and discussing face-saving measures for the American government," Jack grumbled, his voice rough.

"Duty called," you said, kissing him gently. "I get it. People needed the Strike Commander to take control of the situation. I wasn't alone and fending for myself, which I could have done just fine, mind you. Gabriel, Zenyatta, and Agent Brant all helped me out. Ziv also got involved and browbeat everyone into making snack runs for me. And then Jesse showed up and I took a nap."

"I saw you there in the grass, sleeping in his gear," Jack said, his tone funny. "Quite a few people commented on how cute you look together."

"Just Brant and Kwento," Gabriel said, brushing your hair aside and kissing the back of your neck.

You hugged Jack with one arm. "I'm sorry I worried you."

"I'm sorry I bit your head off first thing. Just...too wound up," Jack muttered, rubbing your back. "Shouldn't have done that. Love you, sweetheart. Hate seeing you get hurt. It tears me up inside." He looked down, nose to nose with you, earnest regret weighing heavily in his eyes.

"Food and cuddles then," you suggested. "Because I'm starving."

Jack chuckled, shaking his head. "What? You aren't going to demand more groveling?"

"Sure, but food first," you said. "Then you can tell me all about it. Like is Kwento in our court yet? Because she damn well better be."

"Kwento is all about allying with us now," Jack said, patting your back and you flinched. "Oh, sorry."

"Less business, more eating," Gabriel said wryly, giving the two of you a gentle push. "We can talk and eat too."

You started to head for the table, but Jack guided you to the plush cream couch, his touch firm. "I'll make you a plate. Just relax."

You craned your neck trying to see what he already laid out on the table.

"There's plenty of steak, lamb, duck, red snapper, scallops, sautéed summer vegetables, beet salad, roasted red pepper and tomato soup, mashed potatoes, baked potatoes, pommes anna, artichokes à la barigoule, fregola-"

"OK, I don't know what all that means," Jack said, giving Gabriel a skeptical look. "And I saw the sweetbreads. I know exactly what those are, thanks to Gérard, and no thank you, I'm not doing that again."

Gabriel's grin widened. "Corazon?"

"I want to try everything," you said, because how often did you get free food from fancy hotel restaurants? Not often enough. You were just a tiny bit jealous of Jack. He got all kinds of nice meals whenever he went out and he didn't even appreciate them.

"They included bread, herb-infused olive oil, some nice wines-"

Jack groaned and lightly shoved Gabriel out of the way so he could pile food onto plates for you. He returned with three heaping plates, and a bowl of soup and set them on the coffee table. You dipped the bread in the soup, grinning as Jack began cutting your steak into bite-sized pieces.

"I can do it myself-"

"Let me help," Jack said. He sat down beside you, taking a moment to kiss your shoulder.

You speared a large scallop with your fork, rolling your eyes at him. The shellfish was wonderfully buttery, the sauce tempered with white wine and sparkling with lime. You sighed happily, spooning some orange risotto into your mouth, and it tasted of butternut squash with a hint of ginger.

Jack offered you a bite of steak and you took it. Gabriel brought over a few more plates, and wine glasses. He set two in front of you, a mellow red and a sparkling white you suspected to be champagne.

Gabriel nudged you into the middle and sat on your other side.

"Did you order all this or-?"

"They sent it up. I think they're trying to use up food before it expires: this attack is going to be bad for business. Gérard probably just told them to give us everything they could spare and go heavy on the protein," Gabriel said, cutting himself some lamb. He offered a piece to Jack, and Jack leaned over you for his bite.

"Everyone else is getting fed too, right?"

"They know they can order up," Gabriel said. "The only people I'm worried about right now are you and Jack." He sighed as he ate his steak. "I noticed that you didn't empty your pockets when you were returning all your...salvage to Agent Brant," he said.

"I noticed that you're a snitch," you said with a sniff. You took a slice of duck breast in red wine sauce.

"I wouldn't care, except it was a museum," Gabriel said and you couldn't really argue with that logic or morality. So you took a bite of his lamb instead. "I hope you didn't keep anything too recognizable."

"Don't know what you're talking about," you said, because you'd only kept loose stones, since they were harder to trace.

Jack sighed. "I returned the Hope Diamond, after explaining that one of my agents saved it and handed it off to me for safekeeping."

"Well yeah, you were wearing it broad daylight. The radiant Hope Diamond adorning our very own beacon of hope in a troubling time. It kind of blended in with your armor to be honest, maybe we should have white armor for our white knight." Jack wrinkled his nose at you. "Obviously, you weren't trying to do anything shady with it," you said cheerfully.

"You're such a little shit," Jack murmured, lips warm against your throat. "I already told Gabriel about the suicidal odds you took in the fossil exhibit. Five on one was beyond stupid."

"Now hold up," you said, shaking your fork at him. "I killed two, got the a fifth grade class evacuated, then got cornered by those three while trying to get a straggling kid out. That was not my fault, and it wasn't five on one odds."

"Doesn't matter," Gabriel said, resting one hand on the back of your neck. "Didn't you promise me that you weren't going to get hurt?" His voice was a low rumble in your ear, and you shivered.

"You can't be mad at me about that. I wasn't taking stupid risks, I was protecting Jack!"

"I didn't say I was mad, I'm just disappointed," he murmured and you winced, because now that Jack's emotional minefield had been navigated, you had to face Gabriel.

"I'm sorry," you said, knowing better than to be flippant this time around.

"That's what you said earlier," Gabriel said mildly.

You exhaled slowly, because that was your fault. "I really am sorry. I didn't mean to get you hurt-"

Gabriel said nothing, just taking your left hand in his and kissing your gloved prosthetic fingers. He smiled faintly. "It's nothing compared to these."

"...Gabriel, no," you said, voice quivering. "We're not playing that game. We're not keeping score."

"To quote a particularly stubborn individual, "that's not why I did it, you idiot." He laughed softly at the look on your face. "If given the choice, I will always take the damage, rather than let you do it," he said. "I can't be mad at you for protecting Jack, but I was so looking forward to having you fuss over me tonight." His eyes sparkled as he offered you a bite of seared red snapper.

You glanced down at your left arm. It was still pretty stiff. "Do you want me to help you remove any splinters?"

"I already did it," Jack said. "Figured you wouldn't be up for it with your arm." He rubbed your low back. "Maggie and Michael send their love. Checked in with them as soon as I could. Your heroic rescue clip hasn't made the news, the FBI is trying to keep a lid on it, and I'm willing to let them in exchange for some concessions." He winced then. "Unfortunately, they aren't willing to let us take the shooter into our custody. Lacroix gets first crack at him though."

You shrugged. "Lacroix will be way worse than anything you could do, golden boy," you said kissing his cheek. "He's in terrible hands, and I have no regrets."

Gabriel laughed. "I told you she'd say that. Keep in mind, they probably won't let Lacroix torture him."
You blew a raspberry. Maybe you were a little disappointed, but being sandwiched between Gabriel and Jack, with more gourmet food than you could eat, went a long way in improving your mood. You ate your fill, watching as Gabriel goaded Jack into trying new things, though Jack didn't actually seem to mind. He'd take a bite, and if he thought it was good, he'd offer you a portion.

By the end of the meal, you were drowsing between them. "I should go," you yawned, resting your head against Gabriel's shoulder.

"You can stay," Jack said softly. "Epsilon Squad is being dispatched first thing in the morning to escort Kwento to her Senate committee meeting, as long as it isn't canceled."

"Are you sure that's a good idea?" Neither Epsilon Squad nor Kwento's entourage knew about your relationship. You didn't want to take unnecessary risks.

"Worst case scenario, I gave you my bed because Hanzo Shimada snores like a rusty chainsaw," Gabriel said. "And you were simply too polite to wake him. Genji will back you up on it."

You laughed at that.

"Besides, I've missed you," Jack murmured, cupping your face. "Both of you." He kissed your throat, his mouth firm and insistent against the sensitive skin, and you squirmed.

"Jack," you shivered, gripping his forearms. "I don't know if we should-

"Sorry," he rumbled, releasing you. He gritted his teeth, giving you a rough smile. "Being in expensive hotels, with you and Gabriel, does something to me."

"How Pavlovian," Gabriel laughed, gently stroking your back. "Sore?"

"Yeah," you admitted, though seeing Jack all worked up made you think that maybe it would be worth it to power through the pain.

Jack sighed. "Gabe is too, though he'll deny it."

"We don't have to go all out," you said, holding his hands. "I've missed you too."

"I want nothing more than to pin you to the bed and pay you back for everything you've done today," he said, smoothing your hair back. "Love seeing you mewling under me. Want you so bad I can't think straight." His eyes stayed on your face. "Want to watch you and Gabe too. I can't look away when you're touching him. The two of you are so good together." His breath caught and he gave you a sheepish look. "But you were right. It's a bad idea. We're on high alert. You and Gabe are injured. And I'm all wound up. Once I get started..." He rubbed the back of his neck, his cheeks pink. "Well, I think I'm going to need another shower," he said ruefully. "A cold one."

"We could just-"

"You're already falling asleep." Gabriel laughed softly. "Let's go to bed. A little anticipation is good for Jack."

You lay on your stomach beside Gabriel. He was on his front too and wearing nothing but boxers. His legs seemed to be healing fine, but you studied the healing skin, with a guilty look.

"I'm fine, corazon. Just superficial wounds, honest. But you're welcome to look closer." He flexed his thighs and calves, and you shivered.

"Are you trying to tease us?"

"Just Jack," he said with a wink. "Let him stew in it. It'll be worth it when we get home."

You rolled your eyes, your sharp words cut off by a yawn. "I wouldn't have minded a little fun," you said. "Jack can be gentle-"

"You know how I am after an op," Gabriel said. "Jack's the same way. And he's plenty frustrated about how today went."

Your lips quirked up. "You're just making me more interested."

"Unless you want the entire floor to hear us, I think we better take a rain check," Gabriel said, at least a little regretful.

"Damn," Jack sighed, as he stepped out of the bathroom, toweling off his hair. He wore a t-shirt and boxers. "I was hoping you two would be making out."

Gabriel laughed softly and scooted over. Jack crawled in between the two of you and rolled onto his back, opening his arms so you could snuggle against him.

"Missed you both," he said, leaning over to kiss Gabriel's forehead. Gabriel chuckled and lifted his head, so he could kiss Jack back.

"When we get home, we can make up for lost time," Gabriel said, running his fingers through Jack's hair. "Your sacrifice in this time of turbulence is appreciated. You are a true American hero."

" Shut up," Jack laughed. He squeezed you both. "Lucky needs to sleep."

"You guys keep saying that, but I'm-"

"Really grumpy when you're injured and you haven't had enough rest," Jack finished. "Be good and I'll get you cake for breakfast."

"Of all the patronizing things to say-" You growled. Not just because it was condescending, but maybe because it hit a nerve. Were you that predictable? Would Jack really try to withhold cake from you?

"Mouthy girls don't get cake," Gabriel said, reaching over to ruffle your hair. "They get plain oatmeal. No maple syrup. No fruit. Nothing."

"You both suck," you grumbled, burying your face in Jack's chest.

They were still laughing at you while you drifted off, but you found that you didn't mind. Especially if there would be cake.

---

You sat on the couch, wearing a clean uniform, sans armor, and eating cake with your breakfast. You weren't on the watch roster till this evening, and that made you feel a little guilty. The other night at the hotel, Gabriel had let you sleep and taken your watch shift then. You didn't mind special personal treatment, but it felt weird bleeding directly into work. You weren't entirely sure how to address it yet. So you'd wait till you had better words.

Jack had donned his armor and sat beside you, reading the newspaper. The headlines screamed in huge bold font about the five hundred plus death toll. You weren't quite ready to read the articles or watch any news reports. They wouldn't be accurate anyway.

Gabriel sat at the table, eyes only half open as he inhaled the coffee steam. He sipped it slowly, eventually noticing the plate of beignets Jack had left for him. He flashed Jack a tired smile, but Jack was frowning at the paper, newsprint rustling as he flipped through the pages.

"Are there comics?" You asked.

Jack handed you the funny pages without looking up.

You looked at the comics, realizing you didn't recognize or follow half of them. You read them half-heartedly and then set them aside as soon as your food was gone. You'd pass them on to Jesse later.

You turned on your tablet, skimming the reports that had already been submitted to Blackwatch. You had already dictated your post-mission report to Athena yesterday. It would be important to see what everyone else had observed.

Richard Prince, cyborg mercenary, and Nguyen's apparent black ops man, was conspicuously absent from any of the reports. Was he going to go after Kwento personally? Or was there a part two in the works?

There was a knock at the door, and you glanced at Gabriel and Jack. Gabriel was still waking up, and Jack was focused on the news. So you put your tablet aside, drew your pistol, and checked the peephole.

Zenyatta floated outside, looking serene as ever.

You opened the door, pistol still gripped loosely in your hand. "Good morning," you said.

Zenyatta tilted his head to the side. "Good morning, Agent Strike. I was looking for you. How are you feeling this morning?"

"Sore, but other than that, I'm fine," you said.

"I was going to check on you last night, but you weren't in your room."

You blinked. "Hanzo snores like a rusty chainsaw," you said, automatically. "And he talks in his sleep. It's kind of scary, to be honest." You glanced discretely down the hall, hoping no one else heard your lies.

"Does he?" Zenyatta floated there, too serene for your liking. "I didn't hear anything like that."

"He let you in there while he was sleeping?" You hoped your skepticism covered any discomfort.

"I am more sensitive to some frequencies than others," Zenyatta said. "I just wished to make sure you were all right."

You blinked, wondering if his auditory sensors were strong enough filter out white noise and eavesdrop through the goddamn vents. Or if he just knew you'd spent the night here. Suddenly, you were very glad you had not gotten up to anything last night. "Filching food from my COs and working on reports," you said. "I'm living the dream."

"If this is the dream, what is your real life like?"

You weren't sure what to say to that. "Zenyatta, I have not had enough caffeine to handle your philosophical subtext yet."

"Well, I am relieved to see that you are doing well. I actually came by to let you know that Adaeze would like to speak to you later," Zenyatta said, sounding almost uncomfortable. "I am going to one of the hospitals to help treat the wounded. But I would consider it a great favor if you waited for me before having that discussion with her."

"Yeah, sure," you said, wondering what the hell Kwento had to talk to you about. Maybe it was just a "thanks for saving me" and "are you getting along with Zenyatta?" You weren't going to say anything nasty about the omnic monk, not after he fixed up Daniels. And certainly not after his help yesterday.

"We will meet later then," Zenyatta said cheerfully.

Chapter End Notes

My cousin is not getting fired. Hooray! But we've had two more people put in notice/get fired, so we're understaffed.

Pets are doing OK right now.

Went to a wedding yesterday. Wore my inflatable T-Rex costume part of the time. It was pretty epic, till the reception when the children caught me and wouldn't let me go. I was in a dress underneath, running down a gravel road, screaming for my cousin to start the car because I was being chased by kids. He has a convertible, so he put the top down and we drove half a mile with me in the suit. Those inflatable T-Rex's have no natural predators, so they have no real defense mechanisms, and their tiny arms make it impossible to escape tail-pulling children.
Chapter 93

Chapter Summary

Zenyatta's true motives come to light. Or do they? You can never tell with him.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes.

Athena was your best resource on keeping track of everyone. Kwento and half of Epsilon Squad were having an expanded meeting with several senators, Armstrong included. Lacroix and Amélie were making rounds in the intelligence community, both gathering information and engaging in diplomacy. You understood that Lacroix had his "visit" with your shooter later today. You looked forward to hearing all about that.

Blackwatch and Kwento's remaining guards were maintaining the hotel perimeter. Jack was fielding several calls, mostly from American politicians. Some of them were thanking him for his service, others blaming him for not doing enough, and one particularly shortsighted asshole even demanded that Jack resign from Overwatch and come back and protect Americans. To his credit, Jack handled each one politely, and you made an expanded list of the politicians whom you did not like.

Ziv and Athena were monitoring all kinds of signals intelligence, Ziv sending you FBI updates with malicious glee. Apparently, the higher-ups were still having a meltdown, ordering an agency-wide investigation, and doing a lot of finger pointing. It was quite the cock-up, and Ziv now had access to all their correspondence. You weren't going to question that too closely. Lacroix would have to rein him in.

Lacroix's network sent regular updates about their agencies' policies. The survivors had come out on top, and their respective employers were eager to take the lifelines Lacroix had offered. You knew he'd attached several strings to the aid, of course. You were counting on it.

You also had several personal messages. Távio, Tataryn, Daniels, and Riggs had all sent you some variant of "I just heard what happened, I hope you're OK." Távio had included a message from Reinhart and several pictures, since Reinhart was the one pet-sitting Isha and Bandit the most. Winston was stepping in to help when Reinhart was busy, and Tataryn? Well, no one had complained about him yet, but it had only been five days.

There was a shot of Isha and Bandit curled up on the couch napping. Then one of them both in Reinhart's lap, all three of them napping. And then there was one with Isha in black ballistic armor, little metal tips covering her claws. Torby was also putting a similar getup on Bandit, complete with little Blackwatch crests. You shook your head, unsure of what to make of that. Távio said that the armor was custom-made, and functional.

There was a message from Captain Amari too. All it said was, "She's still with us." And you swallowed carefully, thankful for that little bit of information. That didn't mean she was OK. That didn't mean the surgery had been a success. But Lao was still alive. You knew there wouldn't be any more information till you got home. The situation here was precarious, and while Athena seemed to be a secure way to communicate, you still weren't sure how they managed to block her from her drones within the Smithsonian. The jammer Jack secured had been carefully packed up, and Ziv was studying it.

"...I'll be back. You stay here, sweetheart," Jack said, looking up from his tablet.

"Where are you off to?" You asked, trying not to sound suspicious.

"Got some VIPs in the hotel conference room," Jack said, massaging his forehead. "They want a debriefing and probably some kind of concession for aid and a joint task force to respond to the attack. It'll mostly be posturing and the beginnings of negotiations. I doubt anything concrete will be achieved today."

"I'm going with him," Gabriel said, already standing up. "We do a decent good cop/bad cop routine. You can stay here. It's going to be a lot of handwringing and hypotheticals."

You frowned. "Do you need an intimidating bodyguard? Or flaky arm candy?"

"Genji is on patrol and Epsilon squad will pick up Overwatch Barbie on their way back," Gabriel said a little too smugly.

Jack laughed, partially at Gabriel's joke, partially at the look on your face. "Relax sweetheart. I know you're working on one of Gérard's projects. We've got this."

"If you show up now, you'll just get more entangled in their convoluted political games," Gabriel said, no longer smiling. "You're the Overwatch agent shot by one of their own. Different factions will want to use that in all sorts of ways, and it's best if you keep a low profile for now. We may have to politicize the incident as a bargaining chip, but I'd rather your actual involvement was minimized."

"...OK," you said, blowing out a breath. That was a fair assessment; you were trying to preserve some anonymity. And you were still trying to track down Richard Prince, but Athena and Ziv had not had much luck.

Both men donned their blue Overwatch combat armor, and you wondered then just how many changes of clothing Gabriel had brought along. Jack leaned over to kiss you goodbye, while Gabriel tapped his lips, grinning cheekily at you. They both got kisses and left looking awfully smug.

Shaking your head, you went back to your reports.

There was a knock at the door and you drew touched your holstered pistol as you got up to check the peephole.

It was Kwento herself, in a black suit, her hair coiled in a complicated pinned up braid and secured with a headband. You opened the door, wondering if you should explain that Hanzo snored.

"Agent Strike, just the person I was looking for," she said, smiling pleasantly.

"Oh, Zenyatta said you wanted to speak to me." You stood there, deciding not to invite her into Jack and Gabriel's room. "Is everything all right?"
"I...don't want to have this conversation in the hallway. I understand you're doing work for Commander Reyes, but perhaps you can spare a few minutes?" She didn't actually make it sound like a request. You pondered that for a moment.

"Oh, yeah, we can wait for Zenyatta-"

"That isn't necessary," Kwento said. "I understand you've had some...rough patches with him. We don't need to-"

"I don't mind," you said. "Zenyatta is pretty great. You don't need to tell him I said that." There, you hadn't badmouthed him, no matter how irritating he had been. That was good karma, right?

Kwento pursed her lips, a brief flash of annoyance on her face, and then it was gone, covered by a diplomat's smile. "This regards things Zenyatta finds...distasteful."

You blinked, curiosity piqued. "Oh?"

"I think you'll be very interested in what I have to say." Kwento

You rested your hand on your hip, wondering what she could be hinting at: was she finally going to confront you about Petras? You typed out a quick message to Lacroix on your tablet, and set it down. "You know I'm not authorized to make decisions on behalf of leadership, right?"

"I just want to have a chat," Kwento said lightly, as she stepped back and opened the door to her room. "Please, come in. Would you like something to drink?"

"I'm fine, thanks though," you said, as you followed her.

Kwento's quarters were as luxurious as Jack and Gabriel's, the color scheme all pale greens and bright yellows. Kwento gestured for you to sit and you did, blinking as Oladele and Fennec-7 emerged from the back, the omnic stationing himself beside the door, Oladele coming to stand beside Kwento.

You didn't quite like the way they were looking at you. You rested your hand on the gun on your hip.

Kwento set a stack of papers down in front of you. "Ms. Strike, I am going to be candid. We know what you've been doing. We know you ingratiated yourself into Commander Reyes' inner circle. We know you're reporting to Director Petras. We know you aren't whom you say you are." And then Kwento called you by your real name, the one that only three people in the world still used, and two of them were your lovers.

The only real surprise was her use of that name. How had she found that out?

You blinked, watching Fennec-7 out of the corner of your eye. Oladele was injured yesterday. You could take him if things got ugly. Fennec-7 was mostly intact, though still blackened with burn marks, and a human-sized omnic, so he would be trickier than a wounded man.

You glanced down at the papers, printouts of your "reports" to Petras. Well, Lacroix had been right to court Kwento. Her people did good work, except when the jumped to the entirely wrong conclusion. You wondered if you needed to defend your cover, or if this was another elaborate trap. Just how many plots within plots did you need to keep spinning?
"No one ever has to know," Kwento said, mistaking your pensive silence for fear. "You give me what I want, and resign, and I won't let Commander Reyes know what you've been up to. I hear he takes betrayals very personally."

"Huh," you said, because she wasn't wrong. "This is some very interesting conjecture."

"Stop with the act, please. You're wasting my time and your own." She crossed her legs. "It's a bit too late to play stupid," she said. "You have to understand, I only want information. There's no need for this to get ugly. I can even help you disappear, if you're worried about retribution."

"I bet you could," you said dryly.

"That wasn't a threat," Kwento said, actually looking offended. "I understand your concern. You could have a very comfortable, if discrete lifestyle. You've already shown that you have no real loyalties. I must admit I was a little shocked by your behavior yesterday, but then, you are very good at maintaining cover. I would expect nothing less from one of Gérard Lacroix's agents."

"What is it you want?" You asked, wondering why they had gone to all this trouble to try to leverage you instead of turning all this in to Lacroix. You kept an eye on Fennec-7. He wasn't reaching for any weapons, but he would try to stop you if you decided to walk out that door now.

"I've already said it: information," Kwento said, her eyes narrowed.

You scratched your head, trying to figure out Kwento's angle. What did you know that made such a difference? Why you and not one of the higher-ups? Was it because you were the "weakest link" once more?

"You know, you've got it all wrong," you said mildly, after a moment. "But we can wait for Lacroix or even Commander Reyes to get back. They'll set you straight," you said pleasantly. "I'm not authorized to talk about such things."

Kwento narrowed her eyes. "You expect me to believe that you won't try to run or destroy the evidence?"

You shrugged. "I'm not actually worried-"

"Because you're working with Nguyen, Petras, and Talon?" She spat, fury twisting her features. "You think it makes you untouchable? You think your stunt with the Strike Commander will protect you?" Her voice grow louder with every question. "No. You will not walk away from this. I've worked too hard." She was on her feet, a gun in her hand, and you froze, torn between defending yourself and not killing your principal whose safety and cooperation you'd been trying to attain for months.

There was a knock at the door.

"Ignore it," Kwento snarled. "I want answers," she said, jamming the gun in your face.

Your gaze flicked to Oladele, who watched you with cool eyes, his gun also pointed at you, in case you tried to disarm Kwento. He was favoring his left side still. If you were fast enough, you could use her as a shield, but...you ran the risk of her getting hurt, or worse. Where the hell else were you going to find another high-ranking politician to support your cause? So you kept your hands up, smiling politely.

"What do you want to know?" You asked, stalling for time.
She took a deep breath, shoulders shaking as she glared at you. "What happened to Chibundo Nwazue? What did you do to my nwa nne?"

Of all the things you had expected to hear, that name was not one of them. You felt your eyes widen, and your jaw go slack. You sat back on the couch, staring at Kwento's furious face. Her features were broader, her mannerisms nothing like Nwazue's. Nwazue had been thin and sharp, all edges. She had been cool, reserved, and unbothered by anyone's opinion. Kwento radiated sophistication and charisma, and was obviously a powerbroker. You weren't entirely sure what "nwa nne" meant, but you understood now why Kwento had been so keen on including you. She had all the pieces, she'd just put them together wrong. Not bad for a politician, but too sloppy for espionage.

"Surprised? She told me about you, Lucky Strike. The scoundrel that her captain recruited: fortune's fool, unreliable with explosives, and so clever it made you reckless."

You sighed, not denying the description. It sounded like something she would say, disapproval clear in her voice.

"Are you struck dumb? Do I need to bring up the others? Aishani Patel. Simon Razafindraniatsimianiry. Julio Valdez. Lao Yue. And I heard you were especially fond of Sato Shin." She glared at you. "Or at least you seemed to be. Who can really say?"

You clenched your fists at that.

There was a pounding on the door, and you glanced over, teeth pressed together tightly. "Well, that's certainly a low blow."

"Don't try to change the subject!" She snapped, gun still pointed at your head. "She was an agent of Blackwatch. She was a brilliant engineer. She was like a sister to me, and all our family received was a letter."

You flinched. There hadn't been enough of her left to send back. Not after the explosions.

"I want answers-" Kwento hissed.

And that's when the door flew off its hinges, nearly flattening Fennec-7.

To your surprise, it was Lacroix who stood there holding a tactical, single-person battering ram. Amélie was behind him, rifle cocked, and Ziv had a pistol.

"That was unnecessary," Zenyatta said, hovering there behind them. "I have a keycard..."

"Now he tells us," Ziv griped, but no one actually looked disappointed by their dramatic entrance.

"Chanceux, can we not leave you unsupervised for an hour?" Lacroix sighed dramatically. "Madame Kwento, could you please stop pointing that gun at my agent. With the way your hands are shaking, you are making me terribly nervous."

"Can you not piss off everyone you meet?" Ziv asked.

"Huh," you said, because that description fit him better than you.

Amélie just kept her gun up, flashing you a wink and a sharp smile.
"Adaeze, I asked you to wait for me. Agent Strike does not respond well to antagonism or threats," Zenyatta said, and you found yourself agreeing with him.

"I have been amazingly polite," you said tersely. "I haven't tried to kill anyone. I haven't reached for my gun. I certainly haven't stabbed anyone through the throat. I've been so fucking civilized, it hurts."

"Growing pains," Lacroix said cheerfully. "I am so very proud of you. We will get you cake to commemorate the occasion. Come now Madame Kwento. Please put your weapons down. We don't want anyone to get hurt."

Kwento shot Zenyatta a furious look, but the omnic just hovered there, serene as a swan in water. Angrily, she and Oladele set their guns on the table.

Lacroix strolled past Fennec-7. Ziv elbowed the omnic on the way past, then made a face, probably because it hurt. Amélie stayed in the hall as Zenyatta entered. He glanced down at the printouts. "Well, it seems we were too convincing, Chanceux. You do excel at exuding a certain...unsavory air."

"Thanks," you said dryly.

Kwento narrowed her eyes. "She's a double agent."

"Triple, actually," Lacroix said. "And we wrote those "reports" together with some significant...exaggerations of the truth."

"I told you, Adaeze. Yes, Agent Strike is sneaky, combative, and stubborn. But she is also loyal, awkwardly kind, and possesses her own convoluted code of ethics. Honestly, I thought you trusted my judgment," Zenyatta said, the sheer mildness of his voice a reprimand.

Kwento sat down, shoulders slumped. "I do. But you're so damn compassionate."

"Yes, I am compassionate, not blind," he said and Kwento winced. It was kind of nice to watch his overly pleasant admonitions being turned on someone else. "If you had decided to listen, I could have told you that she personally recruited Ziv Mihret, Agent Rivka Cohn's grandson for some kind of mission. And this is the prodigy who turned down offers from the Mossad, Shin Bet, INSA, NISS, and a few others. Whatever she offered him had to be very important, probably personal. Those are not the actions of a traitor."

Ziv shrugged, trying not to look too pleased with himself and failing. "They were all assholes."

You pointedly did not look at Lacroix, who was the biggest asshole you knew.

"I could have told you that your cousin's other squadmate Lao Yue is still alive, and in Blackwatch custody, though I haven't been able to ascertain the reasons."

Kwento's eyes widened. "Was she the one?"

You shook your head. "It's very complicated."

"And I also could have told you that she's in serious a personal relationship with both Strike Commander Morrison and Blackwatch Commander Reyes. We all saw how well they worked together yesterday. Just like we saw how she reacted to someone threatening Morrison. I told you that wasn't a calculated move, Adaeze. The look on her face said it all."
"She looked angry," Oladele said. "Which is a reasonable reaction to getting shot. I'm not sure what you think you're seeing. Have you ever been in a romantic entanglement?" The man scoffed.

"She looked determined," Zenyatta said. "The body language is there."

Oladele glanced at Kwento who shook her head. "I don't buy it, Zenyatta. Maybe one or the other, but not both."

"We can rewatch the footage if you like," Zenyatta said.

"No need," Lacroix said brightly. "I can confirm that she is indeed in a relationship with both of them."

You tilted your head back and stared at the ceiling. You knew letting Zenyatta hang around HQ would compromise security. you just hadn't realized how much. How had he found all this shit out? And why was Lacroix outing you? Goddamnit, he had a plan. And he didn't think to run it by you at all. That bastard.

"Do they both know?" Oladele asked, shock permeating his words.

"I would assume so, considering she slept in their room last night," Zenyatta said, his tone not changing one bit.

You could feel everyone staring at you now. Amélie giggled from the door. "We just slept!" Panic edged your voice.

"Is that all?" Amélie murmured, sounding disappointed. "Poor Chanceux."

"That is unusual. Is there a problem? Untreated injuries perhaps? Or do I need to have a talk with Jack and Gabriel?" Lacroix was laughing at you. You rested your face in your hands.

"Shut up," you grumbled. "Hanzo snores!" Desperation meant you were going to throw Hanzo under the bus over and over again, as many times as it took, and you had no regrets.

"He doesn't, that much," Zenyatta said, ruining your cover story. "But he does say some strange things."

"That's creepy," Ziv said, wrinkling his nose. "Athena could teach you something about privacy protocols."

"The walls here are thin and I have increased auditory sensitivity because of the security situation. I wouldn't have mentioned anything, but this information was integral to proving Agent Strike's innocence," Zenyatta said.

"Not really," you muttered. "All you had to do was ask Lacroix or Gabriel. They would've filled you in, if this was such a concern."

Kwento was watching you, the anger filtering away. She rubbed her temples, squeezing her eyes shut. Oladele gently patted her shoulder.

"This is an impressive compilation," Lacroix continued. "I am most curious about your sources. We were wondering who had sent those inquiries about Chanceux in her birth name. That security breach truly worried us. We assumed it was from a faction with ties to Talon. This is a relief."
It clicked then. Back when they'd changed your name officially to Lucky Strike, it was because someone was sniffing around your real name. It had been Kwento then, hunting for answers.

"But please, ask your questions," Lacroix continued. "Like you should have in the beginning of our talks. Because we would have answered them with honesty." You didn't know if that was true, but you did enjoy watching Lacroix use that manipulative shaming on someone else. "Fennec-7, if you would be so kind as to activate your white noise field, if you haven't already?"

"Mine has been up," Zenyatta said. "But another layer wouldn't hurt." Fennec-7 looked at Kwento, and she nodded. The field would jam signals and muffle your voices outside of the room.

"...We all know Petras is a snake in the grass," Kwento said. "And it worried me that we had a traitor in your inner circle. We couldn't tell for sure if Reyes or anyone else was actively working with Talon. It seemed wisest to leverage her for answers."

Lacroix nodded sympathetically. "An understandable position, but completely unnecessary. You are asking about the operation codenamed Shit Spiders." Lacroix gave you a conspiratorial grin and you sighed, hanging your head. "Chanceux inspired the name, though she was heavily drugged at the time. I can give you a full briefing later. It will take some time."

"I just want to know what happened to Chibundo Nwazue," she repeated, looking at you, her voice tight.

You sat there for a moment, wondering where to start.

"You have permission to share," Lacroix said, mistaking the reasons behind your long pause.

You nodded. Ziv glanced at you, jaw clenched, his hands balled into fists.

"Your suspicions were right. We were betrayed," you said, the words flowing easily off your tongue. "Commander Reyes and I were both at Black Base Delta. We got out together." You paused there, unsure of how much else you should share.

"Lao Yue was taken prisoner during the attack, and subjected to...highly unethical experiments," Lacroix said. "Though we did not learn of it till much later."

Ziv crossed his arms, looking away. He'd tucked the pistol in his waistband, and you realized you were going to have to buy him some nicer holsters.

"I wasn't there when Nwazue died," you said, after Kwento cleared her throat. "I only know what Captain Patel told me, and what we managed to reconstruct after the fact." So you told her, about Nwazue luring the mercenaries into the lab, and destroying it, while she was remained inside. Then you told her about Simon, and Valdez, the parts you had managed to figure out. You took a deep breath, and you finished the story, sharing the facts of what you had lived through. Shin. Captain Patel. The destruction of the base. Lacroix nudged you, and you took off your gloves, waving your metal fingers like some kind of consolation prize.

You didn't mention your guilt or your grief. You recounted your losses with an almost clinical detachment, because you did not want to share your feelings with these people that you barely knew. That sorrow was private.

Kwento sat there, wiping her eyes, refusing to look up. "Thank you," she said, that rich voice shaky with grief. "I...I think I need a moment."
"And a new door," Oladele said, under his breath.
Lacroix nodded. "I will contact the concierge."

"I will ask for that briefing later," Kwento said, her eyes dull.
"And I will prepare materials," Lacroix said, not unkindly. "We have much to discuss."

You left, drained, but confident that your alliance was now cemented.

You sat in Amélie's room, drinking the minty cocktail that she made for you. Ziv kept busy fiddling with that new jammer, though he was hovering right beside you, his eyes darting between you and Zenyatta. Lacroix was also drinking, his tie loosened, his eyes shut as he rested his head on the back of the couch.

"...I honestly thought she was only concerned about your "working relationship" with Petras," he sighed. "Her family is enormous. I did some cursory research, but didn't find anything that raised any flags."

"Agent Nwazue was a distant relation on her mother's paternal side. However, they were raised together," Zenyatta said. "The Igbo kinship ties are complex."

"I should have looked closer," Lacroix muttered. "I expected more trouble from her politically active cousins."

"Wrong side of the family," Zenyatta said. "They have less influence than you would expect."

Amélie laughed and kissed Lacroix's cheek. "It will be fine, mon loup. Chanceux is safe. Madame Kwento will come around. The alliance is on track. And you have learned something."

Lacroix chuckled, leaning over to rest his head on Amélie's shoulder. "You are right, of course. Unless, there is something else I should be concerned about?" He gave Zenyatta an inquiring glance.

"She will need some time. She was very close to some of her security detail. Adaeze works best when she has a mission, and her mission was to find out what happened to her cousin. Now that she has, she will have to take the time to deal with the tragedy we faced yesterday."

You understood that perspective. Mission first, feelings later. "Thanks, I guess, for spying on me and deeming me trustworthy."

"I wouldn't go that far," Zenyatta laughed.

You gave him a look.

"You cheat at cards, steal from museums, and are known for your vindictiveness. You are a black ops agent specializing in underhanded tactics, subterfuge, and there is much chaos within you."

"OK," you said, a little sharply. "I get it. I'm no one's rolemodel."
"Maeda Vargas," Ziv coughed and you glared at him.

"That being said," Zenyatta continued, as if he hadn't heard a thing. "I have enjoyed our time together."

You sighed. "Yeah, you're pretty OK yourself."

"Though I distinctly remember asking you to wait for me—"

You groaned. Because he had, and Kwento had played you like a fiddle. Zenyatta will find this distasteful, she'd said, like you were sharing a goddamn secret. "Yeah, I know. She made it sound...pressing," you said, not wanting to admit the reason why you'd gone along with her.

"Adaeze is very good at being persuasive," Zenyatta said. "I was a little surprised to see the guns. More surprised that you hadn't reacted violently."

"I was tempted," you muttered. "But I'm a professional." You loosened your collar and drained the rest of your cocktail.

"We should wait till later to mention this confrontation to Jack and Gabriel," Lacroix said with a heavy sigh. "After yesterday, I fear they will not react well."

"Hmm." You thought about that. "No, they'll be angrier if we wait." And honestly, you were fine if they were annoyed at Kwento instead of you.

"Yes, but I don't want them around Kwento...enraged while she is emotionally compromised." Lacroix gave you a look.

"They're adults," you said. "They understand reason. I trust them to behave."

"Under normal circumstances, I'd agree with you. Jack and Gabriel have superb self control. But when you're involved..." Lacroix gave you a wry grin.

"Just inform them that you had a confrontation with Kwento and the root causes. You can share the detail about the guns after we've parted ways. You can promise them the whole story on the trip home," Amélie said. "We should be leaving soon anyway."

It was a good suggestion. You took a deep breath. "I think they can handle it."

"You think or you hope?" Lacroix asked, without batting an eye.

"I know they can handle it," you said, hoping you sounded reasonably certain.

"Would it be easier if I ordered you to delay your report?" Lacroix asked, giving you a side eye.

You rubbed your forehead. "Do you lie to Amélie? Especially about things that would upset her?"

Lacroix frowned. "No, of course not."

Ziv looked on, not even bothering to hide his interest.

"You see my problem then."

Lacroix sighed. "Fine, I will urge Kwento to keep a low profile. It will make things terribly awkward, but I suspect she understands that she overstepped and will want to ensure this alliance lasts."

"Yeah, like I want my relationships to last," you said darkly.

Lacroix smiled faintly at that. "So I see."

The hotel sent up another generous cartload of food for the Strike Commander, even though you were the one doing the ordering. You set the table, knowing that bad news was best delivered after they'd eaten. You had to think about your actions, because there were faint lines between manipulation, good sense, and self defense. You certainly weren't scared of how Jack and Gabriel would react: you trusted them. And you weren't trying to guilt or bribe anything out of them, not anything that they normally wouldn't give. No, you were just taking precautions because hungry super soldiers were moody, and Lacroix wasn't wrong to worry about how they would react to Kwento pulling a gun on you.

This was ethical, you decided, though it took some time to come to that conclusion.

You could have taken Amélie's suggestion. She wasn't wrong, and it was good advice. But after taking Gabriel to task about Lao and being honest in a timely manner, you'd be a hypocrite. Maybe you were being too rigid. It would be best to tell Gabriel and Jack after Kwento was out of strangling distance.

The door opened and Jack walked in briskly, glancing over his shoulder with a panicked expression. Gabriel was close behind and he shut the door behind him, lifting one finger to his lips.

You sat at the table, blinking as Gabriel glanced out the peephole and quickly turned around, holding his hands up to signal more silence.

Jack crept over to you, carefully setting his jacket on the chair. He gave you a quick kiss, looking over the table with interest.

After a few minutes on door duty, Gabriel took a deep breath and smoothed his hair back, flashing you a wide grin. He swaggered over and kissed you hard, before pulling out a chair and sitting down.

"So...?" You asked, not entirely able to form words.

"Very dogged reporter," Gabriel said. "We left her Ainsley and ran."

"...I see," you said, brow furrowing.

"We told her to delay," Jack said. "She's actually pretty good at charming the press."

Now Ainsley was at the hotel. Great.

"Don't worry, we're leaving tonight. I'm shipping her back with Epsilon Squad. Told her it was for her own safety," Jack said. "Jemison might kill me for it later, but, it'll be worth it."

You smiled at that. "How'd your meeting go?"
Jack groaned and Gabriel rolled his eyes, already making himself a plate.

"You, me, everyone here is up for some kind of heroism awards. The FBI situation is getting messier by the moment, with some people trying to say that you and Gabriel should have just complied-"

Gabriel snorted. "Of course."

"But preliminary reports are showing that Special Agent Peters has been influenced by an "outside" power, and he had orders to destroy the jamming tech we recovered."

"...So he wasn't actually trying to kill you," you said, a little relieved.

"It would have been a bonus," Jack said with a shrug. He put the entire bowl of lobster macaroni and cheese in front of himself and stuck his spoon in it. "Senator Armstrong has been an invaluable ally."

"He's eyeing the presidency," Gabriel said thoughtfully. "I know he wants an endorsement from us."

"If he's good at his job," you said with a shrug, not quite caring. "So Ainsley is here now?"

"And she's been asking about you," Jack said, his expression funny. "Is Agent Strike all right? She wasn't hurt, was she? I heard she rescued an entire bus of orphans from the terrorists!" Jack mimicked her voice, sounding both breathless and awestruck.

You blinked. "...What?"

Gabriel nodded. "Maybe Petras realized that seducing you was out, so he sent Ainsley to do it instead. You know, since he thinks you're a man-hating lesbian." He chuckled. "What an idiot. It's obvious that you prefer brunettes."

"Hey!" Jack scowled.

You blanched. "That's not funny. Overwatch Barbie is not in love with me!"

"You did save her life," Gabriel teased. "That's always an aphrodisiac. I would know."

"I hate you," you said, burying your face in your hands. "Yes, Ainsley's been following me around lately, but that doesn't mean-"

"Better you than me," Jack said, looking way too pleased. "The meetings were stupid. I'd rather be here with you actually planning an effective response instead of playing politics. They wanted us to make a press appearance, but we're going to wait till we get to Zurich, that way no one politician can hijack our conference and use it for personal gain."

"Makes sense," you said. Overwatch needed to be seen as an independent operator, not subject to the whims of the American government.

"And there were no snacks," Gabriel said. "So thanks for ordering."

"Any word on Richard Prince? Or more motives?"

"There were two kinds of bombs. The crude homemade ones were used against the buildings with proper shielding," Gabriel said. "And those buildings survived, so Luminescent Holdings' value has skyrocketed, as we predicted. Both the Metro and the Natural History Museum suffered from high-tech incendiary devices, and lacked the shielding. It's hard to say whether the shield tech would have made a noticeable difference, but information about the two types of bombs is classified."

"So Luminescent Holdings gets to look good for the public," you scowled.

"For now," Jack said. "As for Prince, we know he coordinated the Metro attack. It's not common knowledge yet and we're not sure if he's planned a follow-up elsewhere, but we think he's slipped the net."

Nodding, you helped yourself to mushroom ravioli in a cream sauce, and listened to their updates. For several hours of "work," that committee hadn't accomplished very much.

"One senator tried to congratulate us, claiming this was how America got shit done," Gabriel laughed. "Jack put him down nicely." He leaned over you to kiss Jack's cheek. Jack turned a slight shade of pink as you smirked at them both.

"But Jack's so diplomatic," you laughed.

"Oh he was," Gabriel said, gaze shrewd. "He played the humble CO, giving his people all the credit, and every time guy tried to say "Americans won this," he would redirect. "Oh, Agent Shoal handled that, she's from the UK. Oh, that was Agent Lacroix who coordinated everything, he's French. Oh, Tekhartha Zenyatta is part of the Numbani delegation, but I think he hails from Nepal..." Gabriel chuckled. "And every time the bastard tried to backtrack or insist Jack should take more credit, he just looked like a bigger asshole. It was masterfully done."

Jack shrugged, looking bothered. "It wouldn't be right for me to benefit from a stance like that. Anyway, it's not like I singlehandedly saved everyone. You guys were integral to the team and the plan. I wish I could give Blackwatch more credit, but..."

You shrugged. "Operational security. We don't need the spotlight."

"And I'm not letting some shortsighted xenophobic weasel disrespect my people," Jack said, cramming another spoonful of macaroni into his mouth. The dish was already half gone.

"You gonna share that?" Gabriel asked, his tone teasing. "Or do you need mac'n cheese, a cold beer, and a half gallon of ice cream to get you through the rest of the day?"

Jack blinked as he looked down at the bowl. "Oh, sorry. Did you guys want some?"

"Yes," Gabriel said, laughing as Jack handed him the bowl and looked around the table, like he was finally noticing the dozen other dishes. "But just a bite, I'll give it right back."

You quickly cut Jack a slice of quiche. He accepted it, but looked far happier when Gabriel handed the macaroni back.

"I wouldn't say no to some Rocky Road," Jack said with a sigh. "But we need to get ready to go. We have a press conference in Zurich tomorrow morning, and I have to go over the speech."

"How was your day?" Gabriel asked.

"...So I found out why Zenyatta's been such a pain in the ass," you said, slicing yourself some bread and covering it an herbed butter. "But he ended up being my character witness. Which actually worked out pretty well for me."
Jack frowned and blotted his mouth with his napkin. "I wasn't aware you needed a character witness."

Gabriel sat back in his chair giving you a thoughtful look. "So Kwento knows you're not really a spy for Petras now? I don't see why she needed the omnic to harass you to figure that out. She could have just come to us." He narrowed his eyes. "Or is there more to the story?"

"Kwento had tasked Zenyatta and some of her personal security to help her investigate the mysterious death of her favorite cousin, Chibundo Nwazue." You rubbed the back of your neck. "She was our demolitionist under Captain Patel," you said mostly for Jack's benefit.

"I know," Gabriel said. He set his fork down. "...And Nwazue mentioned "Lucky Strike" in letters home, didn't she?"

"Got it in one." You took a bite of your bread.

"Did she just politely apologize for misjudging you?" Gabriel asked, his tone low.

"Zenyatta let me know that Kwento wanted to talk to me. He asked that I wait for him, but we all I'm not great at following directions," you said. "So when Kwento came over all friendly and mentioning that she wanted to discuss some thing he wouldn't exactly approve of, I agreed."

Jack's frown deepened. Gabriel narrowed his eyes.

"She then showed me all the documentation of my treachery and tried to leverage me for information. I wasn't expecting to hear her mention Nwazue and ask about what really happened to Black Base Delta." You shook your head. "And I really wasn't expecting there to be guns involved. But she was understandably cautious, given my apparent reputation. And she was upset too," you added hurriedly.

Gabriel looked over his shoulder in the direction of Kwento's room, his expression harsh. Jack put his fork down.

"I'm fine!" You added quickly, before they could interrupt. "It didn't come to any violence, except for the part where Lacroix broke down her door and set everyone straight. Zenyatta helped too." You held your hands up. "It's been resolved. Big misunderstanding. Got to watch Zenyatta use that disapproving teacher tone, the one he's been using on me, with Kwento and it was worth it. Lacroix went ahead and cleared me to give her the details on Nwazue and what went down at Black Base Delta."

Gabriel glared at you, the set of his jaw harsh. Jack glanced over his shoulder, in the direction of Kwento's room.

"I wrote up a report on the whole encounter. Interestingly, she'd offered to give me a way out, so you wouldn't kill me for my betrayal. I don't know if she meant it, but it was a nice touch." You were talking too much now, anxious to keep Gabriel from reacting badly.

Jack picked up his fork and carefully cut himself a small piece of quiche, though he didn't pick it up to eat it. He just poked at it. "Judging by your conciliatory tone, you're really hoping we don't go make a scene, aren't you sweetheart?"

"Yup," you said. "Kwento's pretty upset from losing her security personnel. Apparently, they were close. Her delivery was a little heavy-handed for such an accomplished politician, so I'm pretty sure she wasn't thinking straight-"
"Then she should have taken our advice and not come to DC in the first place," Gabriel snapped, pounding on the table. "This could have been avoided if she hadn't tried to pander to a political agenda-"

"The attack would have happened either way, Gabe," Jack said, taking a deep breath. "At least we were here to mitigate some of it."

"Not the point," Gabriel said sharply. "She shouldn't have been meddling in our business. And if she cared so much about her people, she should have listened to us."

"And she definitely should not have been pointing guns at our girlfriend," Jack said with a gentle smile at Gabriel. "I know. I'm not happy about it either."

Gabriel turned his head away, holding himself stiffly.

You reached over and patted his hand. "Hey, I was irritated too. But I get it. She's on the same revenge quest we are, so she's on our side, and now she owes us a few favors-"

Gabriel got up, walked into the bedroom, and shut the door.

You sighed.

Jack patted your shoulder gently. "Give him some time to cool off. He's not mad at you."

"There was some debate about whether we should tell you the details right away," you admitted. "But I'm trying to be honest and open. But I know I'm bad at being diplomatic. Am I doing it all wrong?"

Jack shook his head, his gaze drifting to the bedroom door. "No, you did everything right, and I appreciate it. He leaned over and kissed your cheek. "Gabe will too, once he's had some time to think about it." He picked his fork up, his quiche now in tiny shreds, and you couldn't tell how much he'd actually eaten. "I take it Gérard was concerned."

"Yeah," you said, not wanting to go into detail. "Oh, and Zenyatta knows about Lao's existence and about us. Which he announced to Kwento and her remaining bodyguards. I don't know if they know about you and Gabriel, but Zenyatta told everyone that I slept here last night."

Jack nodded. "I think they can keep our secrets. And they definitely have incentive to do so." He rubbed his temples. "We can work with Kwento. That was the goal after all. This isn't terrible."

"I think Zenyatta is the one to keep an eye on," you said. "Not that I think he's going to run to the press, but...who can say?"

"...Damnit," Jack sighed. "Do you want to handle him? Or do you think he'd respond better to me or Gabe?"

"I'll talk to him. I don't think either of you need to be involved," you said.

"Keep me apprised then."

"Yes, sir," you said, with a cheeky wink.

Jack's frown deepened and he glanced at the bedroom door.

"Should I go so you can speak with him?"
Jack shook his head. "No, I'll talk to him later. I know we're all still recovering from yesterday. It was a shit show. Today wasn't as bad, but..." He swung around and touched his knees to yours. "For the record, I'm pretty pissed at Kwento too, but you're trying so hard to keep everything low-key, so I can put that aside for the moment." He nuzzled your neck. "Mostly, I'm too tired to go over and shout at her right now."

"I appreciate it," you said, as running your fingers through his hair.

"Missed you," Jack murmured. "Next trip, I'm bringing you. Gabe can have Ainsley."

You laughed, trying to picture that scenario.

Chapter End Notes

Sorry for the late post. Closed at work tonight, opening tomorrow morning. Had to do some edits and make myself this soup I'd been mentally constructing for the past week. It was a smoked turkey, kale, orzo soup and I made it spicy, because why not, and it was really good. Never cooked with orzo before and I rather like it. It's not rice...it's an im-pasta.

...Sorry.

I had something else I was going to share, but I have since forgotten in my sleepiness.
Chapter 94

Chapter Summary

Black Abacus brings its own set of complications.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

With the exception of Epsilon Squad and Ainsley, everyone rode back on the same transport. You watched Ziv and Lacroix out of the corner of your eye, Ziv speaking in sharp whispers as he jabbed a finger in Lacroix's side. Lacroix just laughed and patted Ziv's head while Amélie leaned over to kiss his cheek. Ziv shrunk down, expression flashing rapidly between mortified and euphoric.

Genji held a fish torpedo in his lap, rolling his eyes while Hanzo lectured Jesse about something. Jesse just grinned, winked at you, and pulled his hat down over his eyes. Hanzo threw his hands up, muttering something unflattering in Japanese. But he stayed with the group, pretending to ignore Jesse and Genji's playful banter. To your surprise, Zenyatta drifted over to them, making quiet comments to Hanzo.

Kwento sat with Oladele, Fennec-7, and another woman and omnic you didn't recognize. The woman wore armor, the omnic wore a business suit. The other bodyguard and the assistant, you presumed.

You carried your gear bag and suitcase. You might have lifted some of the nice soaps out of the bathrooms, but you weren't the only one. You were pretty sure that Hanzo had stuffed his gear bag full of bottles of expensive wine, enormous towels, and complimentary hotel toiletries.

You blinked as someone tugged on your bag, and turned to see Gabriel lifting it out of your hands. "I can-"

"I got it, baby," he said, leaning over to kiss you, right in front of Kwento. You stared dumbly as he nipped your bottom lip, his smile playful. Your pulse sped up before he released you, still holding your suitcase. He then turned to stash the bags in the luggage compartment under the seats. You blinked, noting that Kwento and her party were all pretending to stare at the floor, with the exception of the omnic assistant. Oladele smacked him in the arm, and the assistant quickly turned his head to the side.

"Gabriel-" you began.

"Sorry about earlier," he said, eyes gentle as he smiled down at you. "You were right, of course." He smoothed your hair back, looking way too amused by your startled expression. "I was just hungry."

And petty. God, this man was so petty. And you loved it. You shook your head, as he walked with you to your seat. "Are you saving a spot for Jack too?" He asked, innocently, his eyes big, his smile wide. That expression didn't suit him at all. He just looked like a smug asshole who was laughing at his own jokes.
"Of course," you said, not sure where he was going with this.

Gabriel just chuckled. "I was just thinking, since we're unexpectedly sharing a transport," he glanced at Kwento's party. "There might not be enough seats, so you can sit on my lap if you like. I'd probably be too heavy for yours."

You rested your face in your palm. "Gabriel-"

"No need for that look. It was just a suggestion," he said, sounding all too pleased with himself.

Shaking your head, you took your seat, setting your gear bag in your lap, just in case he got any smart ideas. Gabriel sat down beside you, resting one arm over your shoulder. You sat slightly diagonal from Kwento's group, facing them. You got your tablet out of your bag, not quite sure you wanted to see the looks on their faces.

"All right, we're cleared to go," Jack announced as he boarded. He put his bags away. Then he plunked down beside you, leaned over, and cupped your face. His severe expression melted away. "Thanks for saving me a seat, sweetheart." And then he planted a scorching kiss on your lips, his gloves rough against your cheeks.

You swallowed roughly as he released you, his smile downright evil. "What are you two doing?" You hissed.

"Gabe's idea," Jack whispered out of the corner of his mouth, also resting an arm over the back of your seat. "This is the PG version."

You caught sight of Lacroix chuckling. Ziv just shook his head, looking vaguely disgusted. But Amélie clapped and blew you a kiss. Your Blackwatch companions were pointedly not looking in your direction, and neither was Kwento's party. Zenyatta nodded at you though.

"Aren't you going to hold my hand?" Gabriel asked, nudging you.

"Oh, me too," Jack laughed.

But then you couldn't hold your tablet. You exhaled slowly. Gabriel was turning his anger into trolling. And while it wasn't directed at you, you weren't too sure you liked this plan.

"How am I going to read?" You asked, because you were trying to catch up on the reports Athena was filching from the FBI.

"You can talk to us instead, snugglebuns," Jack said cheerfully, brows arching mischievously at the pet name.

"No one will ever find your body," you growled.

"Don't be like that, sweet cheeks," Gabriel purred, nibbling on your ear and making you jump. You glared at him.

"Yeah, I have a very nice body," Jack laughed, squeezing your fingers. "Relax. Everyone here knows about us already." He flashed Kwento a sharp smile. "No reason to be shy now."

"No reason at all," Gabriel echoed, his voice low as he gave Kwento a hard look.

You glanced between your very smug Boyfriends and rubbed your forehead, your fingers still linked with theirs. It was going to be a long ride home.

You eventually fell asleep against Jack's shoulder, drooling on his coat. You woke up with one of Gabriel's hoodies draped over you, and Jack and Gabriel still holding your hands. You knew they were super soldiers, military strategists, and trained killers: you just never realized how much they could weaponize PDA.

Jack and Gabriel wore terribly smug looks, and you wondered what other misbehavior they'd gotten up to while you were napping. Judging by the slightly queasy look on Jesse's face, they hadn't just sat there quietly.

"You know, you're going to make them think I'm some kind of quadruple agent if you keep this up. Like I beguiled you with my wiles or something," you said as Jack kissed your nose.

"You mean you haven't?" He blinked. "It must be all the sex then."

You nearly choked on your tongue. "Jack!"

"That's not fair," Gabriel said dryly. "We seduced you, not the other way around."

"Yeah, but she gives as good as she-"

"I'm going to go sit with Ziv," you threatened.

Gabriel raised a brow, skepticism clear on his face. "You'd rather sit with l'enfant terrible and Gérard?"

"But honeybunches-" Jack laughed, doubling over.

"Don't you even-" You jabbed a finger into his side and he yelped, laughing harder. That traitor Gabriel pulled your attacking hand back to his side, firmly squeezing your fingers.

The PA chimed. "We are beginning descent into Zurich. Please remain seated with your seatbelts fastened."

You glared between the two smirking men.

Gabriel just rubbed your stiff neck and Jack kissed your temple.

"Appreciate you humoring us," Jack said softly. "For the record, I like being openly affectionate with you." He gave you a lopsided smile.

"Yes," Gabriel agreed, his voice low. "I think our message has been received." He gave a wistful sigh. "It's back to business as usual."

When the craft landed and they both released your hands, you hesitated for a moment, reluctant to let them go. Gabriel grabbed your bags. Jack patted your back, his expression polite and impersonal. And the three of you disembarked, stoic and professional once more.

Maybe you would miss the fussing, just a little bit.
It was just past midnight. Captain Amari led the greeting party. Reinhardt was there with Távio, Torby, and Winston. To your surprise, Tataryn leaned against the wall, giving you a smug look. You hadn't expected him to be here to welcome you back.

Bandit barked, jumped out of Torby's arms, and raced to Jesse. He was wearing a little red sweater that looked an awful lot like Torby's. Had his wife Lucia made it for him? Or had Torby? You knew better than to ask in public.

Laughing, Jesse crouched down and hugged his dog to his chest. You didn't miss how Genji and Hanzo had to reach over to pet Bandit too.

"Ma'am!" Távio ran up to you, holding Isha. She was also wearing a little red sweater, and she shrieked when she saw you, flapping awkwardly. You blinked. She had more feathers than before, having lost most of her fluffy down. But the feathers were coming in unevenly, and she looked like she'd been trimmed with a weed whacker then fluffed through the dryer for good measure. Still, she was your dinosaur, and you had to be supportive of her awkward phase.

"How's my adorable murderbird?" You cooed, and Távio released her.

She started to run to you, then narrowed her eyes, adjusted her trajectory, and raced past you to Jack.

You stared, mouth open, as she latched onto Jack's boot and completely ignored you.

Smiling apologetically, Jack lifted her up and scratched her head. She thrummed happily and rubbed her snout against his cheeks.

"How's my bitey death chicken?" Jack laughed, cuddling her.

Gabriel gave you a wry smile, and reached over to pet her. Isha let him, chirping happily at him and pointedly ignoring you.

"...Really?" You scowled.

"You did abandon her," Tataryn said, clapping you on the back. "She missed you, but now that you are back, you are in trouble. Because she is a wicked, clever beast and you are in over your head."

"I was gone for a week! On a mission! So were they!"

"They are not her mother," Tataryn said smugly.

"She behaved really well for us," Távio said apologetically, a smile tugging at the corner of his mouth. "Ignoring the tools she stole from Torby, the tablet she stole from Winston, and all the currywurst she stole from Commander Wilhelm. He didn't seem to mind though."

You sighed. "Thank you guys," you told your friends. "I will replace your stuff."

"She gave everything but the food back. Made us trade her more food for it, but it is all good," Reinhardt laughed. "She is very cute, and she stayed with Bandit most of the time."

"Except for when I took her for training," Tataryn told you. "I think you'll be pleased with her progress." His smile was too smarmy, and you wondered exactly what he'd been teaching her.

You sighed as Isha snuggled up to Jack, giving you a cool look, before returning to rubbing her face against him. She even let Ziv, Lacroix, and Amélie fuss over her, while still pretending like she hadn't seen you.

Shaking your head, you walked up to Captain Amari.

"How is she?"

"Come see for yourself," the Captain said, her smile gentle.

Lao was asleep. You stood in the doorway of her room, trying not to be creepy. The left side of her face was still bandaged, and you wondered if Angela had been able to remove all the residual circuits. She looked peaceful, her breathing regular, her color good. She was still too thin, though you realized that was probably just her build. You still wanted to sit her down and feed her dumplings and kimchi pancakes.

There was a shiny neon yellow composite prosthetic on the bedside. It looked like it had a screen built into the forearm - perfect for your hacker.

Captain Amari stood behind you and you started to leave, trying to quietly shut the door.

"I know you're there," Lao said sleepily, right eye still shut. "I told you not to be creepy."

"Sorry," you said. "I'll go."

"You don't have to." Lao opened her eye, yawning. "I've been dozing all day."

"I just got in. Heard you were alive, and that's all they told me," you said. You stood in the doorway, and did a doubletake, because Captain Amari was already gone.

"You can come in," Lao said, reaching for a glass of water. "I don't really want to shout."

"OK," you said, shutting the door behind you as she flicked on the overhead lights. "If you're sure." You pulled up a chair. "I would have brought flowers or something, but I just got in."

Lao studied you, her expression really hard to read with half her face covered. "You were in DC, weren't you? Saw the news. Recognized some of the assholes responsible." She glared at the wall.

"It was bad," you agreed. "They burned down a museum."

"Those turtle fuckers," Lao scowled. "The death toll was high. Anyone we know?"

"No Overwatch casualties. Some of Lacroix's allies didn't make it. A lot of civilians died." You leaned back in the chair, remembering that tiny bloody sneaker with a wince. "They killed pretty indiscriminately."

"They do that," Lao said, her voice distant. "Heard Overwatch was involved in the counterterrorism efforts. Had a feeling you were there. You're good at finding trouble."

You shrugged, not sure how to take that.

"See anything cool?" Lao didn't look at you, though the question didn't seem entirely forced.
"Uh...some fossils, the Hope Diamond, and really good French food," you said, deciding to keep it impersonal. "Got to take in some of the DC monuments, but wasn't too concerned with sightseeing at the time."

"...When did you get so boring?" Lao shook her head, but there wasn't any real heat in her voice. "You know, I'm not a kid. If you, for example, cut off some cyborg's head in a really cool way, you could say that."

"...Maybe," you said, wrinkling your brow. "Who showed you that?"

Lao laughed. "You think Ziv can keep that kind of thing to himself?"

"He's "Ziv" to you now?" Your voice went a little high. "I thought he was an utter piece of shit-"

"Oh, he is," Lao said, with a nod. "Especially since he said there was more footage of you doing stupid shit, but he wasn't allowed to share that."

You groaned, knowing exactly what footage he was referencing. Lao did not need to see that video of you getting shot. You weren't sure if she would have flashbacks from Shanghai, and you'd rather not find out. You folded your hands in your lap. "So how are you feeling?"

"Sore and stiff," she said. "But I can feel my legs and wiggle most of my toes, so that's a plus." She looked at the prosthetic arm. "Your friend Lindholm helped Dr. Ziegler with that. It's...a civilian model. No fancy armaments or hidden weapons, but I don't want anything military grade."

"It's pretty cool," you said. "I've seen some light up ones, and some partially hollow composite limbs with designs etched into them, and also-"

"You recommended this to Lindholm, didn't you?" Lao asked, her voice flat. "You just couldn't leave it alone. You had to get involved."

"I just showed him some of the designs from the civilian side. Torby's stuff always has great function, but he doesn't put as much effort into aesthetics," you said. "But Gen- I mean, another friend with prostheses, made the recommendations. He thought you might like something more customized. I heard Torby put some of the designs in a portfolio to run by you," you said. "But I didn't compile it. Anyway, that one suits you."

Lao bit her lip, and then swallowed whatever bitter comment had sat on the tip of her tongue. It must have been bad, because she made a face. "Yeah." She studied the arm. "I like it."

You sat there in awkward silence, unsure of what you could bring up. You wanted to tell her about Kwento and Nwazue, but Lao wasn't cleared for that kind of information right now, and maybe she wouldn't ever be.

"Surgery went better than expected," Lao said. "My vision is still a little funny. I might have lost my sense of smell. Kind of twitchy, can't really control it. Dr. Ziegler is waiting to see if the effects are temporary. But I'm alive. I'm not paralyzed. And the spinal cybernetics have been replaced with base models to compensate for some of the nerve function. But no more control chips."

"That's a relief," you said.

"Yeah." Lao looked over at your gloved hands. "Why don't you have more funky designs?"
You blinked. "Guess I'm still just self-conscious about the loss." You shrugged, studying the arm. "I know, it's just fingers, not a whole-"

"Missing parts are missing parts," Lao said. "It's not a competition, Lucky." She rolled her eyes at you, and for half a second, you were back in Canada, watching her program security drones and sneak your beer.

You smiled. "Yeah. You're right. But I've got a toolkit built up." You took off your left glove and flicked your finger. A blade popped out, and Lao's eyes widened. "You see, I'm handy to have on ops."

"What the fuck?" Lao stared at you in outrage. "Did you just pun at me?"

"...Yeah, I guess I did." You frowned. "It's been a long week. Just be glad I'm not wearing socks with sandals."

"Why the hell would you even think- No, don't answer that. I get it. You've changed. A lot." Lao narrowed her eyes. "Like, the trauma from everything really did a number on you, didn't it?"

"I-I guess." You rubbed the back of your head, unsure of what you were supposed to add to that. "I was pretty fucked up that first year after the Ninth Circle." You stared at your boots. "Still not quite right, but-" You shrugged, lapsing into silence. Lao didn't want to hear this stuff. And you didn't want to hear her scorn.

"Captain Amari told me some things," Lao said after a few minutes of awkward silence.

You sat there, wondering what Captain Amari had said.

"She's a lot like Captain Patel," Lao said. "Smother though. Better at mind games too. Captain Patel would kick your teeth in. Captain Amari could easily kick your teeth in, but she prefers to make you question whether or not you had teeth to begin with. And then if you don't learn your lesson, then she'll pull your teeth out one at a time..."

"Yeah," you laughed. "That sounds accurate."

Lao gave you a lopsided smile. "She's a good CO."

"She is," you said. "They saddle her with the problem cases."

"Like you?"

"Yeah," you said, leaning back in your chair, just enjoying talking to Lao without all the barbs. The last time things felt good between you was in Canada. And then something awful occurred to you. "Hey, are you still drugged from your procedures?"

"A little," Lao said.

"Oh." You stared at the floor, wondering if sober Lao would hate you for being so familiar. "Should I go? I know my presence bothers you sometimes. Often. I don't want to impose."

Lao's brow furrowed and she looked away.

Had you said the wrong thing and ruined everything again? Or was this the right thing to do? Because in a day or two, when she was no longer on the heavy painkillers, you couldn't predict how she would react. Casual? Forgetful? Furious that you'd violated her privacy?

"I know I've told you that I hate you. And I wasn't lying when I said that shit. I really meant it, in the moment. But...I don't think I meant it forever. You know, it's not fair to make me talk about this now: I'm drugged," she complained.

"Sorry," you said. "I wasn't trying to-"

The door opened, and Angela marched in, glaring at you. Her hair was back in a frizzy ponytail, with bags under her eyes. And you knew then that it was sheer exhaustion that kept her from murdering you. "Lucky, what do you think you are doing?"

"I..." You trailed off, wondering if you could blame Captain Amari for letting you into Lao's room, and expect to live through the experience. If Angela didn't murder you for the protocol violation, Captain Amari would for snitching. But it was way past visiting hours. And Lao had just come out of major surgery... Oops. "I'm sorry," you began, trying to look contrite.

"You were shot two days ago! And did you got to the hospital? Nein! Did you ask for a doctor? Nein! Did you even try to wear a sling-"

"Zenyatta patched me up," you said, shrinking down in your chair, also lacking a defense plan against that angle of attack. You'd kind of forgotten about that whole getting shot ordeal: Kwento, Gabriel's pettiness, and Lao's condition had overshadowed it all. "And the hospitals were packed! It was a very hostile environment. I couldn't just call up a medic and-"

"You were shot?" Lao raised her voice. "Where?"

"Just once in the arm," you muttered. "My armor caught the rest. I've got good armor for a reason."

"What the hell?" Lao shouted. "Why are you like this?"

"And now, you're upsetting my patient," Angela snapped. "Shut up and go sit in that exam room." She pointed straight across the hall.

"Yeah," Lao scowled. "You fucking irresponsible idiot."

You stared at the two women, their expressions murderous. And then, very meekly, you retreated to the exam room, wondering if you could barricade the door.

Angela let you go after a thorough exam, begrudgingly congratulating you for getting Zenyatta to patch you up. Aside from another nanite injection and an emitter, there wasn't much else you could do now, besides take it easy. She put you on med leave for the rest of the week and kicked you out, telling you to come back during regular visiting hours.

You got a glimpse of Lao, as you left, because Angela had left the door open, and you were pretty sure Lao had heard her berate you for the entirety of the examination. You waved, and she shook her head at you, glaring at you from her bed.

"I'm OK!" You called out, waving your healed arm.

"No, you're terminally stupid," she snarled, and rolled over, giving you her back.
In a rare display of diplomatic acumen, you decided to leave before you made things worse. Lao was mad. Angela was mad. Lao probably would need a few days to cool down, and what the hell was Ziv doing sharing that video with her?

You were halfway to Jack's quarters when it hit you. The Lao from before would have also been furious at you for getting shot. Maybe it was just because she was drugged. Maybe in two days she would pretend that she didn't care. But this was progress, you realized. And you smiled then, because it was more than you'd had before.

You reached Jack's room, yawning as you input the code. You entered, the bedroom light was on, and you could hear him talking softly.

Kicking off your shoes, you headed over and stopped at the threshold.

Gabriel and Jack were both sitting up in bed, Isha on Jack's lap. She was definitely bigger than when you left, almost turkey-sized. Her feathers were coming in at odd angles, and you weren't sure she was going to stay all black. There were iridescent patterns on the feathers, somewhere between an oil slick and a goth-tinted rainbow. Jack held the tablet up, letting Isha see whatever was on the screen.

"And that's your mom being cool," Jack said, shooting you a bright smile. "She didn't want to leave you. But she had a job to do."

Isha cocked her head to the side and watched that accursed museum video of you beheading a cyborg. She rewound it a few times, her delicate little hands now adept at working the screen. Then she kicked, sickle claw slicing through the air. She looked at Gabriel expectantly and he laughed, patting her head.

"Like that, yes. But your long claw is more for gouging than slicing." Gabriel mimicked each motion and Isha watched intently. "Gouge," he said, curling his fingers, and digging them into Jack's forearm. "Slice or slash." He demonstrated a knifehand strike, showing the motion slowly then faster than your eyes could track. "You should stick to gouging."

Isha chirped.

"What are you teaching her?" You scowled. "And I thought there were no dinosaurs allowed in the bed?"

"We're watching a movie," Gabriel said, without missing a beat. "She can go sleep in her kennel afterward. She is fully litter box trained now. Tataryn managed to make that lesson stick." Gabriel chuckled. "I'll let him give you the full story later."

You blinked, taken aback. "Oh."

Isha glanced between you and the screen, vocalizing rapidly.

"Yeah, he was a bad guy," Jack said. "He hurt people. He would have hurt us."

Isha hissed and then chattered at you. It sounded like some kind of lecture, so you just shrugged as you changed into a t-shirt and crawled onto Jack's other side.

"Hey murderbird," you said, leaning over to pat her head. She crossed Jack's lap and poked your left arm, making a soft thrum, then she crawled behind you, nosed your back. You glared at Jack. "You showed her that video?"

"Of course not. I just told her you got hurt, protecting me. Gabriel helped me demonstrate." Jack gave you a smug look. "And it worked, because she's not mad at you any more."

You sighed as Isha curled against your stomach, headbutting you. You weren't sure that she understood Jack's story, but Isha was on speaking terms with you again, so that was something. "I missed you too. I don't know what Jack thinks he's doing, but-"

Isha nuzzled your hands, chewing lightly on your metal fingers, like when she was a tiny baby hatchling monster.

"No biting," you said, flicking her snout.

Gabriel laughed and leaned over to pet your feathery menace. "Looks like you're off for the rest of the week. Angela catch up to you?"

"Yeah. Any idea who tipped her off?"

"My money is on your favorite AI, though Mihret does like starting shit," Gabriel said.

"Athena, did you tell Dr. Ziegler I'd been shot?"

"No, Lucky, I merely made the video of your injury available and requested her medical analysis."

"Really?" You shouted at the ceiling. "Come on! Why would you do that to me? She damn near bit my head off!"

"I...feel like I might be interrupting your personal time. I will leave your privacy protocols on now. Winston needs my assistance on the quantum dilution problem. I should go. I may be occupied for some time."

"Athena, I wasn't done-"

But there was only dead air.

You exhaled, glaring at the wall. That was a bullshit excuse if you'd ever heard one. Athena was fully capable of multi-tasking; she was just counting on your laziness to save her. You probably wouldn't get out of bed and track down a drone to yell at now. You would probably be calmer in the morning. She had probably calculated this awhile ago and goddamnit, she was right. When you looked over to the side, both Gabriel and Jack were trying to smother their laughter in the pillows.

Isha glanced at the ceiling, then you, her chirrup very questioning.

"I'm going to go brush my teeth," you said.

"Oh, that's what she needs," Jack said, snapping his fingers. "A little toothbrush. We used to brush Atticus' teeth all the time. It really helped with his breath-"

"What?" You stared incredulously at Jack.

"Good idea," Gabriel nodded. "Good oral hygiene leads to better health in general. We want to cultivate good habits."
"I bet she'd like bubblegum flavored toothpaste," Jack said.

"...That's disgusting," Gabriel said. "No one over four likes that."

Jack rubbed the back of his neck, totally not looking self conscious at all. "Yeah. Well, she's not over four."

Shaking your head, you left the bedroom, wondering what the hell had happened to your life.

"You did what?" You nearly dropped your bagel into your coffee. The three of you sat in Tataryn's room, and you were slightly amazed that Isha didn't try to destroy anything. Instead, she eyed Tataryn resentfully, till he got down a box of biscuits.

"She is very clever, and it was for the Blackwatch Prank Club," Tataryn said, sipping his tea. He offered Isha a little buttery cookie and she snatched it out of his hands. "I had to remove the toilet tank cover, but it was Min's idea. Teaching her how to do an...upper decker, as they call it, was a real bonding moment for us. I think it was the first time she truly understood that there were different tiers of acceptable places to relieve oneself."

Isha crunched away at her biscuit, completely ignoring him.

"And Min deserves some of the credit. She gave the demonstration." Tataryn winked.

"...Eww," you said, shaking your head. Though, Isha was now using the wood chip litter boxes religiously. It was so much easier to clean up after. So you weren't going to complain.

"And she is beginning to understand how to operate a camera. She was also able to let us into the apartment as well. We put her in through an open window. We could have done the entry ourselves, of course, but she wanted the practice. And she did such a good job." Tataryn reached over and chucked Isha under the chin. She grabbed his fingers, and growled, not letting go till he gave her another biscuit.

"Huh," you said, studying her reaction. She listened to Tataryn, but it seemed to be more of a business negotiation, with hints of a dominance struggle, than straight affection or eagerness to please. It was very different from her interactions with you, Jack, and Gabriel.

"She has very good instincts," Tataryn said, approvingly. "You can make deals with her and she understands."

"Well, thanks." Tataryn had been amazingly helpful. You weren't expecting that. You felt a slight pang of guilt for underestimating him. He wasn't the most...ethical friend. But you could rely on him when it mattered.

"You're welcome. It was very impressive. I sent Kseniya many pictures. She was pleased."

"Who made the sweaters?"

"Lindholm," he laughed. "He seemed to have fun creating miniature battlegear for Isha and Bandit. The dog would make a decent courier, but this one," he gazed at Isha shrewdly. "She has potential in the field."
You frowned, not liking the idea of putting your baby raptor in danger.

"Anyway, you should stop by and see what he made. Though if you say anything smarmy to him, there is a high chance he will smash your knees." Tataryn rubbed his thigh, wincing. "So consider yourself warned."

"Thanks again," you said. "I appreciate it."

Tataryn fluffed his hair, smiling brightly at you. "Of course. Anything for my favorite Lucky. You are always so dependable. The heart of Blackwatch. The devious, cake-loving, petty heart of Blackwatch."

You narrowed your eyes. Nothing good ever came from his compliments.

"If you wished to help me out a little, Family Day is coming up. And Kseniya would love to attend..."

You groaned, realizing that, of course, there would be a catch. When it came to Tataryn, there always was.

"Honestly, Agent Shimada, either of them, is a better melee fighter," you told Távio as you both left the gym. "And I can get you a dispensation for Commander Reyes' unarmed combat classes, if you like that brand of suffering." You draped your damp towel over the back of your neck. You were going to need a shower after this.

"Sure. But I still want to train with you." He grinned up you, sweaty and looking way too pleased with himself. He had put on some muscle - probably Reinhardt's training regimen and ridiculous diet: currywurst and carbs for all! And now Távio hit harder than before, like he wasn't actually worried about hurting you. You appreciated the respect, but damn you needed to ice your knee soon. And your arm. It twinged, and you winced, rubbing it. You'd managed to talk Angela out of making you go to physical therapy, since you already knowing the exercises from the last time you were shot. But if she found out you were actually sparring, not just euphemistically, she would probably stuff your head in a jar or something else vaguely medical and creepy.

You took a detour toward the staff kitchen, Távio following. "I mean, if you have time. I need all the help I can get. Commander Reyes says Sergeant Chang is real hardcore."

"Yes," you said, nodding. "But treat her with respect, and she'll be a good CO. That includes following her orders, both in spirit and detail. Understand that she's not as forgiving of sneaky overzealous smartasses as I am."

Távio laughed weakly.

"Lucky!" An awfully familiar voice called out across the mess hall and you sighed, rubbing your forehead. You couldn't just flee, not with your knee throbbing from Távio's well-placed snap kick. And you'd get laughed out of Blackwatch for running away from Overwatch Barbie. So you stopped, taking a deep breath and steeling yourself for the encounter.

Távio cocked his head to the side, his face politely blank.

"Lucky! I've been looking all over for you. Shouldn't you be resting? You're on medical leave!" Ainsley caught up to you, looking oddly efficient in a well-tailored black suit with a silver tie, sapphire blue vest, platinum cufflinks, and white gloves. She wore black leather ankle boots and you narrowed your eyes, realizing that this ensemble looked oddly reminiscent of your Assassin Butler outfit, if tailored to fit Ainsley's style a bit better. Worse, it looked very good on her.

"...That's my fault, ma'am. I asked for some additional training. Agent Strike was kind enough to give me some pointers." Távio stood extra straight, his expression business-like.

You shook your head. "It's no trouble, Agent Maeda Vargas. Dr. Ziegler is just taking extra precautions."

Távio's eyes narrowed slightly at the formal title.

Ainsley looked between the two of you, her gaze questioning. "Hi, I'm Ainsley. I work in the Strike Commander's office." She extended her hand to Távio.

He smiled politely and shook. "Agent Maeda Vargas, ma'am. I've seen you in passing. I work for Commander Wilhelm right now."

"I thought you looked familiar," Ainsley said brightly. "Have you known Lucky long?"

"Since basic," he said with a nod, notably not giving a timeline.

You crossed your arms. "Did you need something, Ms. Petras?" You asked sternly, and she flinched.

"You can just call me "Ainsley," you know," she said, looking wounded. "I mean, you did save my life after all. You don't have to be so formal."

You rubbed your forehead, feeling an oncoming headache.

"Are you all right?" Ainsley asked. "I know you're probably sore, at least from the injuries you sustained in DC."

Távio looked between the two of you, and you could see him already speculating, his little brain on fire with bad ideas.

"All of that is classified," you reminded her. Because while Maeda Vargas might know some of the story, he wasn't supposed to, and if he did, you would be talking to Reinhardt and Ziv about keeping their damn mouths shut and not sharing every damn video that crossed their screen.

"It's not all classified. That story might be, but she saved a bunch of kids from the terrorists too," Ainsley said. "And she's terrible at taking credit for her heroics. Agent Shoal told me all about it. Do you know she's saved the Strike Commander's life on at least three separate occasions? Probably more than that, but she won't talk about it."

Távio's eyes widened.

You were going to kill Shoal. Slowly. With your ice pack, after you were done with it.

"Ainsley, I wasn't even supposed to be there," you scowled, though that was a massive oversimplification of the situation. "Of course, I can't go taking credit for a damn thing. Not unless I want to draw attention to my questionable activities."
"That's stupid," she sniffed. "I could talk to my uncl-"

"Don't you dare," you snarled, hands balled into fists.

Ainsley actually took a step backward, her eyes wide. "Oh. OK. I...I won't?" She glanced at Távio questioningly.

Távio's eyes darted between the two of you, and he hunched over, trying to make himself invisible, and failing that, at least he would present a smaller target.

"There are several operations in play. It's all extremely convoluted. Nothing is resolved yet," you said stiffly.

"The Strike Commander gave a press conference this morning," Ainsley said. "He already said Overwatch is going after the terrorists too and would happily assist the US government-"

You nodded, not pointing out that you'd seen it already. That Jack had practiced the speech in the mirror this morning. That you'd watched the live broadcast anyway, because it was always fun to watch him work a crowd.

"...But I guess it's really naive of me to just barge in and try to tell you how to run things," she said, a little dejected. "I'm sorry. I'm trying to help. Really." She blinked rapidly, lower lip wobbling.

"OK, thanks." You said, quashing that pang of guilt you got from the hurt looks she gave you. It wasn't your fault rich girl feelings were so damn fragile. The shock was real, but you weren't sure that the guilt trip wasn't intentional. "But please don't draw any more attention to me," you said. "My job is hard enough. I don't need additional scrutiny from anyone." Especially not the goddamn director.

"I'm really sorry," Ainsley said, turning away. "I...I should go then."

Távio bit his lip, giving you a questioning look, like a worried puppy. He jerked his head to the side, his expression clearly saying, "Are you really going to send her off like that? That was kind of harsh."

You gave him a sharp glare, but he didn't back down. When did he grow a conscience? Goddamn Reinhardt and his touchy-feely wholesomeness, high-minded ethics, and white knight delusions that were corrupting your Blackwatch agent-to-be. You should have assigned him to Tataryn instead. Wouldn't have had this problem.

"Ainsley," you said, measuring your tone. You didn't sound too bitchy, but you took a deep breath and tried to turn the setting up to friendly. "If you want to help, we can talk strategy later. When I'm back on duty, all right?"

She spun around, nodding frantically. "Of course. I am so sorry. I didn't even think about that. I know I say that a lot. But I'm trying. I really am."

You almost asked what exactly she was trying to do, but thought better of it. Instead you nodded. "All right. I'll see you later."

"Yes, of course. I'll...write up a brief with some of my ideas. Which you don't have to take. They're only ideas. But I'd love to get your perspective," she said quickly.

"OK, thanks," you said trying to smile, as you turned to go to the staff kitchen. Távio had questions, and damn your knee hurt.

You sat down, icing your knee and your arm, as Távio pulled up another chair, and set it in front of you. You propped your leg up, and sipped a cup of oolong tea you'd made from Jesse's stash.

"Sorry," he said, shooting you a guilty look.

"You damn well should be," you said. "Now I have to meet with Ainsley, and I've been trying to dodge that bullet since the last time she cornered me in my office."

Távio rubbed the back of his neck. "Umm...permission to speak freely?"

You groaned. "If I say no, are you going to make sad puppy eyes at me for the rest of the day?"

"And then go commiserate with Ainsley," he added with a cheeky grin.

"Don't you dare. I will send you to Antarctica." You scowled at him. "I have my reasons for distrusting Overwatch Barbie. Also, she once spent half a night telling me about her delusional love life-"

"I understand. Everyone knows that she had it bad for the Strike Commander," Távio said with a shrug. "But everyone also knows he didn't return those feelings. Possibly because of someone else." Távio winked at you. "Not that I'm questioning his decision at all. Nope, I like living."

You leaned back in your chair, sipping your tea, wondering what kind of smartass bullshit your former student was going to try to pull out of his butt.

"I don't blame you for not liking her," he said. "But things have changed."

"If you tell me that she has a crush on me, I'm done. I'm switching to whiskey and I'm not stopping."

"No," Távio said with surprising certainty. "Well, I could be wrong, but I don't think that's it, well not all of it."

You inclined your head back. "Go on."

Távio squirmed. "So uh...this is kind of embarrassing."

You raised a brow.

"Ainsley, uh, well, she really wants your approval. Like she looks up to you," Távio said, staring at the floor. "The way she looks at you. The way she's trying to dress like you. The way she wants to talk about how great you are. It's hero worship. I know it's awkward, but I get the impression that she's not the kind of person who's really thought very hard about other people's feelings, you know? This is all new to her and she's really stuck on you. I guess it's because you saved her life once?"

You took a drink of tea, realizing the weight of Távio's words. Because Távio would recognize hero worship directed at you. He would know that behavior from firsthand experience.
As much as you did not like Ainsley, you couldn't mock her, because Távio was right and he was sitting in front of you, guilty of similar behavior.

It was weird coming from either of them, but you liked Távio.

Ainsley wanted to be like you, or whatever she thought you were like. Who actually knew? The realization took a moment to sink in. Groaning, you tilted your head back and stared at the ceiling.

"I don't think it's a crush," he said. "I had two moms, and there was...a different dynamic altogether. I could be wrong though. I was pretty young when they died."

You sighed, shaking your head. "We were in Paris. I had to be up early to guard Jack. She kept me up half the night, making her tea, while she nattered on about how disappointed she was that Jack wasn't the man of her fantasies. Keep in mind, I wasn't in a relationship then. It hadn't even occurred to me that such a thing was a possibility. I just had a job to do, but I had to babysit her on top of it, and she didn't even help me clean up when we were done."

"Spoiled rich girls," Távio said with a shrug. "What do you expect?"

"Exactly, best to avoid them all together," you said. "Babysitting them isn't my job, and I don't have the temperament for it."

"But people change. Sometimes for the better. They need room to grow and it isn't always pretty. They're going to fuck up, and while it's not your job to look after every idiot that stumbles across your path, you can't expect them to do better if there's no one to show them how." He scratched his chest, not making eye contact with you. "Having you for an instructor really...helped me. I mean, I think you know I wasn't really a model student, but you didn't care..."

"You were different," you said. "You weren't helpless, you just needed a perspective adjustment. And I liked you."

He smiled shyly, staring at his lap. "I know she's awful, but she's trying really hard. But yeah, she's so bad at it, that even I feel sorry for her."

You almost pointed out her bloodline, but he wasn't cleared for Shit Spiders yet. It was a different situation. You could never afford to trust Ainsley Petras. At worst, she was a well-trained double agent, playing a long game. At best, she was a Trojan horse, and an incredibly annoying one at that.

"I'm not saying you need to mentor her or anything," he said. "Just...don't crush her. She really looks up to you."

You wondered how much of that was projection. You would have to talk to Lacroix. He had a better eye for this kind of thing.

"You've made your point," you said. "But...for reasons, don't get too close to her, Távio. You know whom her uncle is, and he is not our ally."

Távio's eyes widened. "The director...?"

"It's politics and the nastiest kind," you said, because you could not let him go in blind. "But keep that to yourself."

"Ma'am," he said, nodding. "I...OK, I think I understand part of your concern now. I'll be careful. I won't invite her to create a fan club or anything, don't worry.” He smiled brightly at you.

Suddenly, you were very worried.

Chapter End Notes

I feel like really sick, and I'm not sure if it's something I ate or just the weather and stress catching up to me. I was going to write a longer passage, but I'm really not feeling so great right now.
Chapter 95

Chapter Summary

Jack has some issues.

Chapter Notes

It has been brought to my attention that Jack's middle name is "Francis." That will be acknowledged eventually, much to Jack's dismay. That is all.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

