When news of the Conclave crossed Thedas, a nobleman—Trevelyan—called a meeting of Mages, those who were Apostates before the fall of the Circles. He offered them a chance to speak on their own behalf at the Conclave. They send an Apostle young enough to safely pass as a member of the Trevelyan family without raising too many questions, and with a clean enough record that she’s genuinely an example for the ‘does-no-harm’ Apostle. Unfortunately, the Conclave does not end well. Young!Inquisitor.
Seekers of Truth. The name itself is self-explanatory, but it does little to lend to the scope of what a Seeker must actually do in pursuit of the truth. Detaining Varric Tethras was a menial task, though interrogating him had been a daunting process...not morally, but mentally. The man blathered on and on in circles, and just when it seemed his words were mere ramblings, he brought it right back around to the point of the interrogation. Hawke, the Champion of Kirkwall, their capabilities and the tale of their involvement in sparking the Mage Rebellion.

And ultimately, how he had absolutely no idea where to find the Champion.

All in all, his interrogation was the very least of what a Seeker could do—should do—to unveil the truth of any matter.

Thoughts lingering on the face of her most current prisoner, Cassandra Pentaghast wished for the umpteenth time she could thrash that damned Dwarf. Maybe Andraste would convey her wishes to the Maker and he would flip the scenario on them—that it would be Varric receiving the full extent of a Seeker’s wrath, and this...impossibly young-looking girl could be given the courtesy of a chair and a chat with the Lady Seeker.

But no. That was not how this story unfolds. Varric was somewhere on Haven’s Chantry grounds, probably spinning a yarn and having a drink with the men who were assigned to guard him, while Cassandra Pentaghast knelt in the lowest levels of the Chantry preparing herself for what had to be done.

“Blessed are they who stand before the corrupt and the wicked and do not falter,” not as her voice did as Cassandra kneeled with hands clasped, alone outside the door to the gi—the prisoner’s cell. “Blessed are the peacekeepers, the champions of the just.”

"You’re going to want to see this, Cassandra.”

Leliana’s voice was quiet and certain when she’d approached the Seeker after her scouts’ return to Haven from the Temple of Sacred Ashes. Cassandra had been in the ‘war room’. What an awful thing to have in a Chantry. It wasn’t the room itself’s fault, it was just the biggest and most convenient focal point, where they could plan, or attempt to plan how in the Maker’s name they were going to handle...this.

A hole in the forsaken sky. An explosion at the conclave—the Temple of Sacred Ashes and all who had been inside obliterated.

Behind Leliana came two Inquisition soldiers and between them, a woman, head lolled back in unconsciousness, left hand blazing with the kind of veil-light that rend the sky in twain.

No. Not a woman. Well on her way, but no—this was a girl, she could not have been older than Cassandra had been when she’d begun her training to become a Seeker. Younger possibly. She should be somewhere worrying about what to wear to the next ball or if the boy she likes will ask her to dance, not...committing acts of terrorism? Treason? The mark on her hand could be no coincidence—and something annoying in the back of the Seeker’s mind spoke in Varric’s voice ‘caught green handed, you could say’. She couldn’t.

And then the mark sparked, crackling to life and casting a sheen of sickly Fade-green across the hard grey stone of Haven’s walls, prompting Cassandra to draw her sword, fulling expecting the green glow to summon Demons into the room, but no, no Demons, the only thing the mark summoned was the Seeker’s reaction and the feeblest of pained whimpers to drop from the girl’s lips, her face contorting in agony before she fell lax again in the hands of her captors.

The Apostate Solas, the Elf that approached the Inquisitions soldiers with an offer of assistance, took over the girl’s care—he was her cellmate after all. Cassandra thought it too coincidental that the Elf was so near when the conclave exploded, but readily offered knowledge and help on how to deal with this breach in the sky. So, he was cast into Haven’s dungeon, and the girl soon after. The Elf quietly intoned instructions to his guards who, under the watchful eye of Leliana, carried out Solas’s wishes, bringing him fresh water and dry cloth, Elfroot, and any Lyrium that could be spared as he attempted several different magical and traditional techniques to stop the Mark from spreading such that it killed the girl before she could be questioned and brought to the Breach to test the Mark on her hand—if she could close it.

There was a hanging implication that such preventive treatment would be stopped after questioning and closing the breach, and that such a thing would be merciful for a girl facing charges of treason, settled a cold dead weight in the Seeker’s stomach.

“O Maker, hear my cry: Guide me through the blackest nights. Steel my heart against the temptations of the wicked. Make me to rest in the warmest places,” the Chant sounded like a plea more than a prayer, Maker she had to be right, this had to be what was right it was her duty. “O Creator, see me kneel: For I walk only where You would bid me. Stand only in places You have blessed. Sing only the words You place in my throat.”

She would interrogate the prisoner soon. Solas had confirmed she would be rousable within the next few hours. Maybe less. This girl, chained and crouched on the cold dungeon floor.

This was not personal. And yet it was. Divine Justinia was everything, and this girl should mean nothing, especially if she had carried out the attack on the conclave.

If.

“My Maker, know my heart: Take from me a life of sorrow. Lift me from a world of pain. Judge me worthy of Your endless pride.”

She would have to do whatever it took to get the truth from this girl. Questioning would be a kindness that could be quickly ripped away, beating, torture—Solas had been reticent to confirm the aura of magic that emanated from the girl, it wasn’t the Mark it was her, she was a Mage.

He had nodded gravely when the Seeker ordered him to ensure the girl was administered a draught of Lyrium before questioning. That the glowing blue liquid would be coursing steadily through her bloodstream by the time Cassandra woke her from her days-long slumber. Both women had to be prepared for the Seeker to use her gifts if necessary.

“My Creator, judge me whole: Find me well within Your grace. Touch me with fire that I be cleansed. Tell me I have sung to Your approval.”

She would light a fire in this girl’s veins, burn the truth from her blood if she had to. It was her duty. And then she would lead her to the Breach, by force if necessary, and make her close that damned thing if it killed her.

“Blessed are the peacekeepers, the champions of the just.”
“She is ready, Lady Seeker, whenever you are,” the Elfin Apostate said in clipped syllables as he steadily met the gaze of the Human woman standing just outside the dungeon doors. Inquisition soldiers—guards—flanked him, ready to escort he and the Dwarf Varric to the forward camp. They’d both volunteered to be of assistance, regardless of their treatment at the hands of the Inquisition, the hole in the sky made every injustice seem inconsequential.

Cassandra had finished her prayers. Her vocal ones, anyway, the ones handed down through the Chantry that everyone said. Her internal monologue which projected eternally to the Maker, however, did not quiet even as she said, “Very well.” Politeness put a ‘thank you’ readily at her lips but it died in her throat. The courtesy of a ‘thank you’ felt crass given what the gratitude covered.

Thank you, for keeping a young girl alive long enough so that she could be questioned and tortured if need be.

Thank you, for preparing her blood so that it may burn in her body until truth spills from her until she has earned the right to breathe without the air in her lungs tearing at tissue like knives tracing the lines of her every vein.

Thank you, for being complicit to the demands of the Inquisition.

Solas gave her one of his very regal nods. The motion struck her oddly, like the respect he placed in the act was meant to mock, not to regard someone in any high esteem. Or perhaps it’s that it seemed a gesture a king would give to dismiss a lesser man. Then, head held high despite his voluntarily captured state, he led his guards down the dark hallway, ready to face the Breach.

Leliana emerged from the dungeon then the door closing silently behind her. Blue eyes were hard with determination that spoke of hatred. Cassandra’s resolve wavered but for a moment more as the thought glanced her mind that perhaps the Lady Nightingale would be better suited for questioning the girl. As in, perhaps the red head could better stomach the task of interrogating their prisoner and all that may involve.

But no, the glimmer of hatred in Leliana that would allow her to do unspeakable things to any she thought had brought harm to Divine Justinia, would blind her to the truth. It would take little to convince the woman that this girl killed her mentor, and then nothing would convince her otherwise—regardless of what may actually be.

Angered and hurting as Seeker Pentaghast was, as much as she desperately wanted this girl to be a monster hell-bent on the destruction of the world, if she was nothing more than an innocent bystander, some strange girl with a glowing green birthmark that fell out of the Fade because that’s what she usually does on a Tuesday, Cassandra would be able to accept either of those truths, and any in-between.

So, Leliana at her back, Cassandra Pentaghast stormed into Haven’s dungeon, ready to seek the truth.

She’d been burning for days. Her left hand, sometimes further up her arm, and at one point burning in her chest, creeping ever closer to her heart. And then hands, cool and soothing, with long, fine fingers that’s touch brought healing and comfort, would douse the flames, set back the burning until it was just a flicker in her hand. It was contained, it could not be extinguished, but she was grateful for what little had been done. Thank you, to those hands, and whoever they belong to.
She thinks they belong to the voice—the voice was nice. Calming. Masculine but gentle, it spoke with certainty and short syllables like he was used to speaking in the rhythm of another language, his mouth was not made to speak the common tongue of Humans, but he deigned to, in order to tell her…something. Stories maybe. That’s what it felt like—something in his tone implied he was launching into a great Epic, and sometimes she actually understood the words he was saying—catching phrases describing fields of flowers, colors that name could not be given to, and for some reason ‘griffons’ were a consistent theme, that was something she noticed through the haze that left most of his words heard but not comprehensible to her pain-clouded mind.

She lulled in and out of conscious, like a child’s toy, yo-yoing between agonizing darkness, and blacked out nothingness. She couldn’t see when she was ‘awake’ or as much as she could be. She wasn’t sure if perhaps she’d been blinded, or if it was just heavy lids she couldn’t feel to raise. When the burning wasn’t consuming her weary attention, the aching did well to make up for it. Her shoulders, chest, back, even her legs ached. She was kneeling, crouched on something solid and cold, knees pressing into chest, chest curving inward as shoulders hunched lax and unmovable. Her body felt like lead. Burning, aching lead.

She was so tired.

Until the hands carded through her hair and then tilted her head back. They’d done that a few times before to administer fluids—sometimes broth, or water, or the occasional potion that eased her aches. But this time was different.

Cool magic slinked seductive down her throat. Lyrium.

That was…nice. Good even, her bones felt less heavy. Her magic was appreciative, drinking it up like a person dying of thirst, it sang pleasant songs in her blood.

But then the hands were gone. They took the voice with them.

That felt…lonely. Sadness seeped between the cracks pain had left in her chest. The pleasant singing of magic changed its tune to something meant to soothe. She was not alone, she had her magic, and the Maker—neither would leave her.

CRACK

Green flame sparked brighter, and brighter still as pain flared even stronger in her left hand. Fear ignited in her veins and for the first time in the days that weighted her like years, she felt alive, and aware. Jerked from her dazing half-sleep, she could finally open her eyes, and her body wrenched upward of its own accord only to be slammed back down against the stone floor of what she realized was a prison.

The bars were one clue.

The chains that restricted her every movement, keeping her crouched on the floor, were another.

The armored guards wielding swords all pointing at her throat, were a rather solidifying suggestion that yes, she was in prison.

Huh. On their journey to the conclave, the Noble Mage from House Trevelyman had bragged about his night in a cell in Val Royeaux. Being a noble gave him certain allowances, he’d been allowed to leave the Circle to visit family in Orlais and he’d used the liberty to get rowdy in the open-air pub, had too much to drink, and too many encouraging friends, so he’d brandished his manhood for all to see.

Somehow, she didn’t think she’d be bragging about this stint behind bars. He’d at least had a funny story to tell any who would listen—she…she wasn’t even sure what she did.

She certainly didn’t have a manhood to brandish in public so that was one probability down the drain.

Maker, why couldn’t she remember?

The Conclave. That’s where she’d been, she could remember that much.

There was a new-found hope among Apostates—the Conclave, and Divine Justinia, the head of the Chantry, had given them reason to believe that maybe, just maybe Mages and Templars could sit down and build new bridges to better places. Perhaps the Circles would serve as places of learning Mages actually wanted to pursue, rather than prisons they were forced to serve life sentences in simply for being born with what the Chantry claims is supposed to be a gift from the Maker Himself. Maybe Apostates could see a future where they did not live in fear of being found by Templars—maybe they could live their lives as anyone else did, in the public, doing whatever it is they found their niche in.

That the price for unruly magic could be patience and practice, not Tranquility—that the ultimate loss of self was reserved only for those who truly wished to do others harm.

She’d gone to the conclave as a representative of…well…Apostates. Not all of them, obviously. Ones that had been Apostates before the rebellion. And even then, it was really just those who had gotten together in the Free Marches, at the meeting.

Apostates were constantly on the move to stay out of sight of any who would suspect their magic or report them to Templars, but a great many of them knew of each other, either through association, rumor, or the occasional face-to-face encounter.

When news of the Conclave ran through the community, there was a meeting of sorts. Rumored meeting. That had almost resulted in her being eaten by a bear. Several bears. It was a saga in and of itself, the journey from a small Nevaran village to a cave nestled in the Vimmark Mountains in the south of the Free Marches, where the single largest group of Apostates she’d ever seen in her life, gathered. One of their own—a Trevelyan of all people, who rebelled in the Circle at Ostwick, had called them to this place and claimed to have heavy ties to the Chantry in Ferelden. Ties that could get the Apostates a moment with the Chantry’s higher-ups, and quite possibly, with Divine Justinia herself.

Of course, Trevelyan was going as a Representative of Ostwick’s Circle. But he’d come to know and meet many former Apostates in his time in the Circle, and felt it was a duty owed to his fellow Mages to offer the same chance he had at having a voice at the Conclave.

They’d argued for hours. ‘They’ meaning her fellow Apostates, she wasn’t one for yelling, or giving orders for that matter. She was just a kid. She’d just gone to listen. She had been worried their din would have alerted outsiders to their presence in the caves—but that was likely why they were in the middle of nowhere and not a nice, warm pub with drinks and any number of witnesses.

Some of the Apostates wanted nothing to do with the Conclave and were merely there to naysay—no one should go at all, it was dangerous! And what the hell did a noble like Trevelyan know about Apostates, this was obviously a Templar trap. Others thought they should all show up in force, and demand to be heard in front of their Circled brethren and Templars alike, with the ear of the Chantry provided by their noble ally.

What they’d settled on, was a single ‘Representative’ of their own. One of them would go, watch, listen, and be a voice for their fellow Apostates. Trevelyan was pleased with the decision and confirmed getting one of them in would be absolutely “no problem”. In fact, the clan Trevelyan was so large it would be easy for them to just go along and get to meet with the heads of the Chantry under the guise of a member of Trevelyan’s family.

“Ellie.”

She’d been listening very carefully, but her name dropping from the mouth of an elderly Mage—a woman with kind eyes, a sharp tongue, and once upon a time, the guts to hide a young magical child in the kitchens of her Ladyship’s House until the Templars went away—that still surprised her enough to jolt like she’d been half sleeping.

“What?” a shouty one, an Elfin man, no Vallaslin over his dark features.

No one answered him really, but a dozen or so other faces in the crowd, familiar faces, began to chime in with affirmations.

“M-me?” she’d asked and drew the gaze of all seventy some odd Apostates huddled in the just cave just clinging to the light of the setting sun.

“Yes you, fool girl, you’re practically a poster child for good Apostates,” the hedge Mage who’d offered her name as tribute. “You don’t cause trouble, you’ll not start a fight or make us all look like barbarians. If you identify yourself as an Apostate, you’ll certainly be painting a picture the Chantry has never clearly seen. Apostatehood aside, you’re not a criminal, you have control over your magic without the guidance of a Circle, and you just want the right to live as anyone else. You’ve stated your case rather eloquently in the past.”

Yeah. To Templars. And only to distract them long enough while she built up the nerve to Mind Blast them. Gently. Just enough so she could escape—she’d not been trying to kill them, they were just doing their jobs. While she didn’t appreciate their job descriptions, she at the very least could respect them as Human beings.

Trevelyan had appraised her silently, though there was something like acceptance in his face. She would do.

But no, she couldn’t possibly! She was maybe fifteen? Years were hard to count when you were the only one keeping track. They couldn’t honestly think sending someone like her would make the Chantry see Apostates in a different light. Unless that light made Mages look like they should all be in playpens and had no business being out of the house after dark. In which case, the Circles were doing just fine, no need for correction at all.

Her objections were cut off when the one voice that had gone unquestioned all evening sounded, the one that sealed Ellie’s fate.

“Yeah, send the kid.”

He was a man Ellie recognized from a bar in southern Antiva. He ran the place as an underground operation to help free Apostates stay free. It was the last resort of desperate men or the luxury of well off Apostates—you absolutely have no other options, you can’t get the Circle’s dogs off your back, or you simply didn’t want the hassle of handing another big move. So, you go to his bar, order Blue Templar. He pours you a shot, you hand over more money than most make in a year. Then you knock back the shot, and the ghastly stuff knocks you out like a light and next thing you know, you wake up days later and you’ve been somehow smuggled to a new town to live a new life, and it’s your job to keep it safe.

Ellie was really, really glad she only ever asked him to let her fill up her water skin with the pump out back. She didn’t think she’d like blacking out and waking up in a new life.

Correction—she could now confirm she did not like blacking out and waking up in a new life.

Why was she in prison? Was she still at the Conclave? Where was Trevelyan?

BANG

Oh Maker, she really did not like blacking out and waking up in a new life.

Anger incarnate came bursting through the dungeon doors. The woman looked like wrath—sharp cheekbones, a jawline that could cut glass, dark eyes like smoldering coal. For a moment, Ellie wondered if perhaps this was not a woman, but a Spirit of Rage here from the Fade, made flesh.

“Tell me why we shouldn’t kill you now,” she seethed, in what Ellie could almost assuredly place as a Nevarran accent.

She couldn’t help it, her arms began shaking in their restraints, shivers coursing up and down her spine, cutting deeper into the soreness in her muscles. With panic, she thought her magic might rear up inside her to protect her, and she clenched her eyes shut and put her best efforts into quieting it—somehow, she didn’t think adding fire to this situation would help anything. Her magic teasingly played through her body that she wouldn’t have released fire, but ice.

Oh, to chill Rage’s temper. Ha ha. No, ice wouldn’t be helpful either, she assured her magic.

Everything in her went still and silent once this woman of wrath gave explanation for just why exactly Ellie was being held prisoner.

“The conclave is destroyed, everyone who attended is dead. Except for you.”

Destroyed? Everyone was…what?

Bile blazed a path up her throat. Everyone? All of the Mages, the Templars—the heads of Chantry and…oh Maker, not Divine Justinia! Not…

Not Trevelyan. No please no.

“Nervous? Don’t be. Just stick with me, kid, and you’ll be fine.”

Swallowing hard and then gasping for air she looked up into her interrogators face, meeting her eyes as she begged to know, “W-w-what do you mean everyone’s dead?”

Her question was not met with an answer. Instead, Rage took her shackled left hand sharply by the wrist and yanked it up for her examination.

“Explain this.”

It was the first time Ellie properly saw what exactly was causing her hand to burn so, waxing and waning from the feeling that her hand was being stuck directly into fire, to hot sand being ground into an open wound, and back again.

Green, shining light that sputtered and spat, gaping from her hand.

“I-I can’t,” oh Maker that was not a helpful answer, the hand around her wrist tightened and Maker she could feel it bruising, the bone questioning if it should crack. Her magic surged, wanting to protect, but the girl took a deep, deep breath and forced it back. “I don’t know what that is, or how it got there.”

Tighter. Maker, Maker, Maker that hurts, but then her wrist was released, flung back at her face as Rage exclaimed, “You’re lying!” and her hand raised like she would strike the girl, but her fingers met like she intended to snap them.

It was then Ellie noticed the red head. A woman in purple-silver armor, she seemingly materialized from the shadows, striding forward to place a hand on Rage’s wrist and halt the snapping motion with the cry of, “Stop!”

“Leliana,” the Nevarran woman objected.

“Don’t! We need her Cassandra.”

Ahh, Rage had a name. Cassandra. Pretty—she was pretty too in a ‘I could kill you and you would thank me for the honor’ sort of way.

Cassandra growled, and her eyes blazed with something that said she would be yelling at the woman named Leliana in private for interfering with her interrogation. “I know.” Was all she ground out, for now. There was something in what little she said that implied ‘I was hardly going to kill the girl’.

There were worse things than dying though.

Worse things than dying…everyone is dead.

She couldn’t quiet herself. Sniffles, sobs worked through her body as she tried to still herself, cease her carrying on. But good god.

Everyone was dead? Everyone?

“I-I can’t beli-eve it. You’re certain everyone is dead? My- I was with my fr-friend. Trevelyan. Y-youngest of his H-house.”

Youngest of his House, save the few baby nieces and nephews he had. That he adored. The noble Mage from House Trevelyan had taken their travels to the conclave like a grand adventure shared between two upbeat kindred spirits. He’d chattered most of the time, about what would happen at the Conclave, all his relatives that would be there, and most reverently revealed a multi-faceted locket that unfolded several times over, holding tiny perfect portraits of his beloved nieces and nephews. He’d rattled off their names, their favorite colors, who could walk and who was learning, what their first words were—and even offered her an invitation to meet them sometime when this mess was over.

You’re technically a Trevelyan now, he’d joked, you should meet the rest of your ‘long lost’ family. Wouldn’t that be a laugh? I have so many cousins, introducing a total stranger as one even to actual members of the family would likely go unquestioned. You’ll probably be claimed by some poor aunt or uncle out of their minds trying to keep track of all of their actual children.
Their children. Thank the Maker, thank everything that is holy out there no little ones had been brought along to the meeting of the Conclave.

Everyone was dead.

Except for her?

Why?

She hadn’t realized her internalized “Why?” had torn from her throat and exposed itself before her captors, laced with all her sadness, her anger.

Who would do this?

Cassandra looked at her prisoner, assessing her as Trevelyan had that day in the cave. Apparently, there was something to be seen in Ellie, some truth, and she gave Leliana a nod. The red head came to stand before the girl.

Where Cassandra had been rage, this woman—closed off, reserving resentful judgement until now—was something akin to compassion as she spoke.

“Do you remember what happened? How this began?” she asked.

It took a moment, curse the sniffling gasps that held her words hostage. Ellie took another breath, and tried to speak clearly, and calmly. “My name is Ellie. I was attending the Conclave as a guest of the Mage Trevelyan, to represent my people.”

“Your people. As in Mages? Or an organization?”

“My people as in Mages. Apostates, specifically.”

“Charter.”

The name summoned a pretty Elf woman, her red hair was woven into intricate braids atop her head, and Ellie absentmindedly wondered what Leliana did with her own locks under her hood.

Charter held a clipboard with several sheets of thick parchment hooked on it, her eyes scanning pages and flipping them to reveal the next, and then the next before she held the clipboard out for Leliana’s appraisal.

“Ah. You are listed here as Eleanor Trevelyan?”

“I’m just Ellie. The Trevelyan is borrowed. I’m not a noble, I’m just a Mage. Ser Trevelyan called a meeting of Apostates and said he wanted to give us a chance to speak for ourselves at the Conclave. They decided I should go, and he lent me his family name, so my attendance wouldn’t be questioned, and I could get the chance to talk to members of the Chantry, and…and if Templars were looking to start snapping up Mage attendee’s, my supposed noble status would make me a less vulnerable target,” she rambled.

But Leliana had picked up on one thing in particular. “Talk, to members of the Chantry.”

“Oh, oh no I really do mean talk, honest! I would never hurt anyone—that’s why I was sent! To make a good example and prove we don’t have to be a danger! I’ve never once thought of killing anyone! Ever!”

“So, you arrived at the Conclave. Then what happened,” Leliana continued.
her eyes clenched shut, and a wave of nausea passed through her as she tried to remember, "I’m sorry, I’m sorry. I’m trying to think. Trevelyan and I got in line to enter the Temple of Sacred Ashes…we got in pretty early—the line was much longer behind us than it was before us. He introduced me to a few Chantry Mothers and then one of them—Mother Penelope? She said she wanted to introduce me to…Dory I think she said. Trevelyan didn’t know who that was, and we were separated—he wasn’t allowed to come for some reason.”

He hadn’t liked that, he’d immediately suspected her cover had been blown somehow. He made it clear that he didn’t like his ‘young cousin’ being whisked away from his supervision. She’s my responsibility, he’d said. And something warm had settled in her chest, that she had an ally nearby that was looking out for her.

Dead.

“Dory is not a name she used after her promotion, it is used like code now. Mother Penelope told her fellow Chantry Mothers who she was taking you to see without tipping off those who needn’t be in the know. You must have been surprised,” Leliana said.

Ellie shook her head. Both as a negatory, and to clear it. “I don’t know. I can’t remember much after that. I-”

Her mark crackled again, sending even Cassandra taking a step back and placing her hand on the hilt of her sword.

Ellie pulled her hand as close to her body as she could, as if to keep it from sparking at anyone else, “Sorry sorry sorry,” she half-hissed as her hand burned. “I don’t know why it does that.” I don’t know what it is.

“Do you remember anything else? Anything at all?” Leliana asked.

“I don’t know…it’s strange. Weird-strange. It might have just been some kind of nightmare when I think of it, but I remember…running. Things were chasing me, and there was this woman…”

“A woman?”

“She reached out to me, and then I…I fell? Something like that—I remember rubble, air that smelled like rain. There were people shouting maybe? I’m not sure. Then there was the burning, and the hands with the nice voice, and then the whole—bang! With the door there.”

Charter covered her mouth with her clipboard, like she might laugh at the girl’s summary of her time in…wherever she was.

“Leliana.” Cassandra spoke then, “go to the forward camp. I think it is time I take the prisoner to the Rift.”

Rift? Oh Maker, Rift?

There was a Rift somewhere near by?

And she was being taken to it?

Was it wrong that Ellie could picture Cassandra bringing her to a Rift, only to throw her in? She wasn’t a seer by any means, but the probability of such a thing happening in the near future seemed high.
Guards, swords now sheathed, stepped forward undid the chains that held their prisoner in place, but her hands were quickly captured again by Cassandra as she tied them together at the wrist, then hauled Ellie to her feet. The girl worried she may have bitten a hole in her lip to keep from screaming along with her muscles’ protest. Her bones felt hallow, and what little toned bulk gathered around them was little more than mush beneath her skin. Her legs tingled like electricity traveling up and down them as blood more freely flowed to the recently underused appendages, waking them from their own achy slumber.

But she stumbled along, trying to keep one foot in front of the other as, with an affirmative nod from Cassandra, she followed her captor out of the dungeon.

The stairs were just. Not nice. They were long, and her legs didn’t understand why she insisted on stepping so high, and then resting her weight on just one leg at a time to pull her body up and forward of all things when they just wanted her to lie down.

But she became awash with something both haunting and welcome at the top of the stairs. Once they were on the main level of the building, she realized she was in a Chantry of all places. It was…unnerving that a Chantry had been her prison where she’d felt so much fear. But it was soothing that she was somewhere ordained for the worship for her god. Somehow, the idea made her silent prayers for salvation feel more heard.

She followed Cassandra out of the Chantry, and her eyes widened at the sight.

The sky was…gone? No not gone just covered.

The heavens were awash in glowing green light—in places the light faded, the blue of the sky was corrupt with a haze of green making it look almost sickly. Like an infected wound.

“We call it ‘The Breach’. A massive Rift into the world of Demons that grows larger with each passing hour. It is not the only one—but it is the largest—and all were caused by the explosion at the Conclave.”

Explosion? That’s what killed everyone at the Conclave?

So, someone had blown open the sky—and these people thought Ellie had done it.

She liked the sky the way it was before this Conclave mess, thank you very much. Maker, she loved the stars, and she couldn’t see how they’d shine with all that hell-scape polluting the sky with unnatural light.

“How the Breach may grow until it swallows the world.”

And then the torn sky rumbled and crackled, and pain ripped through her left hand, sending her to her knees with a scream, cold-wet seeping into her pantlegs. Snow, cold snow, maybe it would cool her hand…

Cassandra kneeling before her distracted her from that line of thinking. The woman looked…less scary than before. Like she was trying to appeal to Ellie as opposed to forcing her.

“Each time the Breach expands, your Mark spreads, and it is killing you. You say you went to the Conclave with no ill intent—but the Mark on your hand is somehow connected to the Breach in the sky. Regardless of how it got there—it may be the key to stopping the Breach, but there isn’t much time.”

Ellie looked at the Breach overhead. It was only by the grace of the hands and their voice that she was alive right now. The Breach would grow stronger and she would die—may still die even if she manages to do something about it and Maker it’s huge how do these people even begin to think Ellie could have done this, and then look at her and say ‘ah yes, we think you can seal that world-swallowing hole right on up just zippity zap’?

But then she met Cassandra’s gaze. This woman believed the Mark on Ellie’s hand could stop this, not Ellie herself. She wasn’t sure what this thing burning her to death was exactly, but maybe it could be of help to someone. Maybe she could spend her few hours before the Breach consumed her either in its victory, or its closure, doing something that would help people.

“I understand.”

Surprise was definitely a new look for the Nevarran woman.

“Then…?”

“I’ll do what I can. Whatever it takes.”

Maybe when this was all over, she would see Trevelyan again, and that was a comfort. Maker preserve their souls.

Cassandra escorted her prisoner through Haven’s estate. She would have to talk to Leliana later, about their joint interrogation technique. While she was admittedly…glad to have spared the girl her special talent with Lyrium, she didn’t appreciate that Leliana thought she had so little control over her own abilities. She had been merely going to jolt the girl in the hopes of getting more out of her before she had to take things to the next level. A flash of her power, and she knew the girl would have become a fount of information. She was a Seeker, the title is hardly one they just hand out, it has to be earned. And she had earned it, with everything in her—the title Seeker of Truth was more her identity now than her own name, than her place as the Right Hand of the Divine.

Though Leliana’s approach, asking the girl questions so calmly after Cassandra’s fury, had left the girl practically rambling off every last thing she could possibly remember—the desired result procured via a different method.

Eleanor Trevelyan…and the Trevelyan was merely borrowed. The girl was obviously young, her parents…she hadn’t mentioned them being at the Conclave, but surely, she must have parents. Did she have a last name of her own? Or was she just as she said, ‘just Ellie’?

It was hard to believe the girl was ‘just’ anything, with that Mark on her hand.

But Cassandra had seen the truth in her. When the Seeker informed Eleanor of the demise of the Conclave, she’d been truly shaken—grief, and not the sort Cassandra had seen in guilty men realizing the full consequences or true horror of their crimes, but genuine shock that such a thing had happened, and true grief for those lives lost. The girl’s face…it had been almost like a mirror of her own, when Antony…

Eleanor hadn’t gone to the Conclave to cause the sort of havoc that had ensued. So, the Mark on her hand, it had to be somehow coincidental—she’d gotten caught up in the explosion in some way that left her Marked but spared for the moment, perhaps.

For the moment. Solas did not believe he could keep the girl alive indefinitely. The Mark would eventually kill her, so long as the Breach continued to grow. He hoped that the Mark could close the Breach and believed that quite possibly the Mark would either vanish on its own at that point, or at least stop spreading.

And as Cassandra walked alongside Eleanor through Haven’s camps, watched her grief, how she shrank back from the glares and resentment pouring from those around her, she allowed herself to, for a moment, hope beyond hope the girl’s life could be spared, and she would be proven innocent.

But the most she could do for now was silently vow to protect the dying girl with her life, and offer quiet words that may bring her some peace. “They need to believe you did this. They are angry and hurt just as we are, but they have a focal point for that anger, while we still scramble for the truth. It grounds them, gives them purpose.”

Eleanor for her part gave a subtle nod and looked like she might have offered a smile to the Seeker but thought better of it. Which was likely for the best—it would unsettle, and possibly unhinge any who saw the girl and thought her a cold-blooded killer, the destroyer of the Conclave, smiling at her captor while being led to what they were hoping was her punishment, her death.

When they made it to the bridge that would lead them out of Haven proper, Cassandra brought the girl to a halt, and drew her knife.

The girl flinched, closed her eyes as she gasped and then braced herself, as if accepting… what? Oh goodness.

Cassandra took hold of her prisoner’s hands, so she could cut loose the ropes around her wrists. When her bindings slipped to the ground at her feet, Eleanor opened her eyes and looked down at the hand holding her own before meeting the Seeker’s eye.

“There will be a trial,” she promised.

That seemed to settle it for the girl. She nodded, confirming that she understood the Seeker had no intention of murdering her anytime soon. Cassandra released her hand and resumed leading her unbound captive.

“Open the gates,” Cassandra ordered, “I am taking the prisoner to the forward camp.”

Inquisition soldiers pushed open the heavy wooden doors, and Eleanor followed the Seeker onto the dirt road, interrupted every so often by barricades, more soldiers stood their ground while a few were running back towards Haven with cries of “It’s the end of the world!”.

It truly did seem that way, didn’t it?

Regardless, they were going to the forward camp, and onward to the Breach. If the world decided to end in that time, well then, that was the Maker’s business.

The sky rumbled, and to Cassandra’s dread, the Breach expanded yet again. It’d been less than half an hour since the last such pulse, maybe it wouldn’t…

“AHH!”

Cassandra turned to find the girl, Eleanor, fallen straight onto her bottom, clutching her hand to her chest, all color gone from her face—her complexion practically turning gray.

The Seeker went down on one knee, and with care not usually found in her motions, she laid a hand on Eleanor’s shoulder.

“Has it passed?” she asked. They couldn’t sit here for long, but…Maker—she was just a girl.

Eleanor took a deep breath. “S-sorry, sorry. Yeah, I-I’m okay.”

Cassandra, used her other hand to brace Eleanor’s arm before rising to her feet and bringing the girl with her, and then both hands were giving Eleanor’s shoulder’s what the Seeker hoped was received as a reassuring squeeze. “The pulses are coming faster now.”

“Well then,” the girl said, now steady on her feet, she beamed her own reassurance in the form of a smile, “we’d better get a move on, huh?”

The Seeker of Truth nodded, and set a faster pace for them, hoping the girl could keep up. She began explaining to her, about just how Eleanor had found herself locked in Haven’s dungeon—she had fallen, just as she’d claimed, and Inquisition soldiers found her. They brought her to Haven and said she’d fallen out of the Breach itself. They too, had seen a woman in the Breach behind her.

There were already some mumblings going around Haven’s camp that it was Andraste—that Eleanor had been caught by the Maker and delivered by his bride to receive justice for her hand in the Divine’s death.

Cassandra left that theory out of her explanation—though there wasn’t really a chance to say much beyond “You fell out of the sky, we found you, and yes, there was a woman like you said,” when they began crossing the second bridge.

Green light hurled from the heavens and Cassandra sent a hand back, pushing the girl away in the hopes she would find solid footing on uncollapsed bridging, but the effort was in vain. They both went toppling onto the ice below with the rubble Fade fire had left in its wake.

And then, as if there weren’t enough obstacles in their way, a Demon appeared.

A mere Shade, but a Demon was still trouble. Cassandra drew her sword and ordered the girl to stay back, while she handled the cursed creature herself. It clawed and screeched, knocking taloned fists against her armor, and it moved like water, trying to strike her while not being struck itself. But it was no matter, she almost had it down, it’s movements becoming more sluggish with effort after a few slicing blows of Cassandra’s blade.

Movement, fast, dark, clawing, and most definitely coming from behind the Seeker, distracted her just a split second, and one of the Shade’s claws met its mark, tearing at the flesh of Cassandra’s cheek.

But then lightning struck both Shade creatures and gave the Seeker the opening she needed to finish the creatures off herself.

And then she found herself face to face with a wide-eyed, weaponized Mage. Eleanor had apparently found a staff.

Cassandra leveled her blade at the girl’s throat, and commanded, “Drop your weapon, now!”

The staff fell from the girl’s hand immediately and she tucked her hands behind her back in surrender, to show she wasn’t going to summon any form of vicious spell that might free her from
“I only—they were trying to kill you, and you didn’t see the second I…I only meant to help,” Eleanor promised. “Are you alright?”

The Seeker let out a dismissive sound—not quite disgusted, but close. “I am behaving like a fool,” she admitted quietly before sheathing her blade. She knelt down and picked up the staff, extending it to the Mage. “You need protection and I am not best equipped to offer that all on my own. We must work together.”

Eleanor gave her a small grin as she timidly took hold of the offered staff, as if half expecting she was being tested—like if she took the weapon Cassandra would turn on her.

“I should remember you came willingly,” Cassandra offered. It wasn’t one of the girl’s ‘sorry’s but it was as close as the Seeker would have liked to get to an apology at the moment. Well…almost as close. She barely thought to stop and consider her actions more fully before offering from her personal arsenal of healing draughts to this girl she’d already allowed a weapon of all things. “Here. These will help if you are injured—we must use them wisely, we do not know what we will face.”

She tucked almost all of the bottles away in the pockets of her Mercenary Coat, with the exception of one, and Cassandra began looking her over more closely—was the girl injured from their fall? Had the Demon attacked her before turning on the Seeker? She should have been paying better attention, two lesser Demons were hardly a challenge.

“Liquid Elf-root, right?” Eleanor asked as she held the bottle in the light for examination, then uncapped the vial to sniff its contents.

“Yes, drink it if—” Cassandra’s hand flew to the hilt of her sword when one of the girl’s hands drew too close to her suddenly, and something wet swathed across her cheek followed by the slightest tingle of…oh come now.

The wound on her face was closing up.

Eleanor had jumped back immediately after her impromptus application, re-stopping the bottle of draught before tipping into her pocket. “It looked bad, Elf-root can be used topically even in liquid form—better than downing the bottle when you’ve only got littler dermal injuries.”

Huh.

“Do not do that again,” Cassandra warned, “I could have snapped your neck out of pure reflex.”

“Thanks for heads-up, I’ll have to keep that in mind in case that trial thing doesn’t work out in my favor,” she said with a grin. “You know, a broken neck is a swifter death than burning at the stake or something.”

Was she jesting? Fool girl. Well, a sense of humor in the midst of all of this wasn’t the worst thing in the world.

Cassandra and her prisoner walked side by side then, the girl keeping a firm grip on her staff as they picked up the pace. More Demons fell from the Breach, groups of three or four scattered across the landscape between them, and the forward camp. Seeker Pentaghast had been leery of arming Eleanor—though she supposed most Mages did not need staffs to truly cast all magic, she’d suspected the girl, being an Apostate, would be highly untrained and incapable of magic without the assistance of a staff. But as they fought together, she came to realize that perhaps the girl was more qualified than she’d originally appeared. Not ‘tear a hole in the sky’ powerful, surely, but capable. After the first few Demon skirmishes, the girl had politely asked the Seeker if she would object to Eleanor including Cassandra in her own personal Barrier spell—she had apparently been mindful that her captor may not appreciate being cast upon without consent regardless of the magic being used.

Cassandra had grunted and insisted she needed no such assistance, but she would not object.

She almost had second thoughts about that the first time she felt the girl’s magic wash over her. Cool comfort swept across her skin and sent a wave of security through her, almost enough to make her lose focus on the active danger before them. But she was prepared for the feeling as they moved forward and found it beneficial both physically and on a mental level—after her initial encounter with this spell, she found the added feeling of safety took some level of unnecessary worry from her mind and allowed her to focus more on the task at hand—more on fighting and not just surviving.

There were sounds of battle just up ahead—a smaller rift had been reported in the area, and Cassandra could hear the distinctive sound of Varric’s crossbow Bianca firing, and the din of Solas’s magic sending crackles and booms through the air over the sound of the Rift itself hissing and spitting green flame.

Cassandra reached out for Eleanor’s arm, bracing her by the elbow and dropping with the girl over the steep drop off that led to the field where their allies fought against the Demons and their Rift.

The human women joined their fight, Eleanor casting her barrier wide to assist the Inquisition soldiers before slamming her staff into the ground and setting several Demons aflame.

Varric, for his part, shot down yet another of the Shades and called out, “It’s about time you got here, Seeker!”

That seemed the be the last of the Demons for now, the Elf—Solas took two long strides to Eleanor’s side and captured her left hand in his own. “Quickly! Before more come through!”

And then he raised her left hand to the sky.

Zap-crackle-CRACK

The world felt still for a moment. The Rift had sealed completely, leaving nothing but the smell of atmosphere in its wake.

The Mark worked. It could close these things.

It could close the Breach.

“Well done,” Solas said to the girl as he released her hand.

Maker, she could close the Breach, Cassandra felt almost giddy with relief.

But the closed Rift seemed to be a secondary priority to Eleanor. She looked at Solas with widecast eyes and then a blinding smile broke out across her face.

“It’s you! You’re the hands with the nice voice!” and then she proceeded to bounce in place before launching herself at the Elfin man, wrapping her arms around his neck in a bracing hug.
For his part, Solas seemed startled and unsure of exactly what to do. He finally settled at awkwardly patting the girl on the back, which seemed to be appropriate since she released him then, though she stayed close, still bouncing on the balls of her feet.

“You’re the one who helped me while I slept. Thank you, er—” she seemed to only notice his ears then and she performed a sort of bow, arms bent at the elbow, casting her hands out wide at her side—well, her left hand, in her right she still held her staff—and she said, “Ma sereanas.”

“Andaran atish’an, Da’len. I am glad to see you are well. You speak Elvish?”

Eleanor blushed and admitted, “Not fluently, just enough for niceties—to say hello, or offer help, ask for directions and the like.”

“Well, I am Solas, if there are to be introductions.”

“Ellie, it’s a pleasure.”

A high-pitched whistle brought their attention to the Dwarven man in their ranks. “Hey kid, thanks for the help, I thought we were gonna be ass deep in Demons forever.”

Ugh. Varric.

Eleanor turned to look at the Dwarven man as he holstered his crossbow on his back. “No problem, I wouldn’t want to be ankle deep in Demons, myself,” she said with a shrug.

“I hear that. Well, you’ve met Chuckles,” the Dwarf said, gesturing towards Solas to indicate that he nickname was, in fact, for him. “I’m Varric Tethras—rogue, storyteller, and occasionally unwelcome tagalong.”

And then he winked. At Cassandra.

The absolute nerve.

For her part, Cassandra let out a disgusted grunt.

The girl giggled at the Dwarven man’s antics and dipped a small bow his way, “It’s very nice to meet you, Varric. That’s a beautiful crossbow you’ve got there.”

“You noticed Bianca, huh?”

“Is Bianca her name? It’s lovely.”

“I’ll tell her you said so,” Varric said as he looked at the Mark on Eleanor’s hand, and then around the girl as if he expected to find someone else with her and the Seeker before he looked up at Cassandra like he’d just put the pieces together—he hadn’t been given much information about Eleanor when she’d been brought in, only told that a suspect had been found. Solas may have informed him of the Mark. At the very least he’d seen it in action now.

“Oh Maker’s balls Seeker, this is your prime suspect? Shit, she didn’t rough you up or anything, did she kid?”

“You’re a Seeker?” the girl asked Cassandra. Ah. She hadn’t offered up her title, had she?

“I am.”

Eleanor seemed pleased? Relieved? Had she thought Cassandra a random entity working alone, who enjoyed capturing young girls and interrogating them? Upon reflection, perhaps she should have been more forthcoming with her title in their interaction back at Haven, perhaps that would have loosened the girl’s tongue faster if she’d known she was in the hands of the proper authorities.

“Cassandra was just doing her job,” Eleanor said then, “I just wish I remembered something useful.”

“Shit, really, you don’t remember anything?” the Dwarf asked, and at Eleanor’s affirmative nod he sighed, “and you told the Seeker that?” again, another nod. He sighed, “Damn kid. You should’ve spun a story.”

“That is what you would have done,” Cassandra seethed, in fact she still suspected that was precisely what Varric had done. She had no proof, and she had followed up on every lead his cockamamie tale had held, but something told her he was still holding back on what he knew of the Champion of Kirkwall.

Despite the long, very detailed, three act saga he’d practically performed for her when she’d questioned him. She knew far too much about Hawke’s sex life, and little to nothing about his current location.

Which was why she’d kept Varric captive, so he could tell the Divine herself, to her Most Holy’s face that he couldn’t help her find the Champion of Kirkwall and mend the rift between Mages and Templars. Justinia had a way about her that made Cassandra certain that, despite the Dwarves attitude, he would have told her the absolute truth. Sans Hawke’s more carnal exploits.

“Perhaps we should keep moving,” Solas interjected, sensing Cassandra’s patience, or lack thereof, was wearing with the Dwarf. “You were headed to the forward camp, were you not Lady Seeker?”

“Yes,” Cassandra looked to Eleanor then, “it is good we have confirmed the Mark’s abilities to seal Rifts. Now we must use it to seal the Breach—come.”

“Right,” the girl affirmed.

The four of them pursued the path to the forward camp. There was a barricade, some wood paneling put up in an attempt to contain the Demons from the Rift Eleanor had just closed, blocking their path. Solas, with his long legs merely leapt over it and held out his hand as offering to those behind him—Cassandra nodded, acknowledging the hand but not using it to assist her own assent over the fence. Varric belligerently used both hands to push himself up and over the fence, gripping the wood board tightly so he could flip his body over the fence and plant his feet on the other side before letting go.

Eleanor did take the hand Solas offered and used it to help her step up on top of the fence, only to discover the incline was steep and drop farther on the other side, it made her pause and she wobbled a bit. Varric stood just a head above the fence and held up his hand for her to steady herself—she smiled her thanks and placed her hand in his gloved one but she still ended up tumbling from her precarious perch with a surprised yelp, and an overlapping:

“Shit!”

“Lethallan!”

“Eleanor!” came Cassandra’s own startled cry.
The girl caught herself on her hands and knees, her hair, which had been in a falling pony tail for the better part of her time in Haven, whipped back and fell loose when her head shot up and she began laughing as she sat back, her bottom against the heels of her feet as her laughter subsided into giggles and she brushed her hands together to rid them of the mixture of dirt and snow.

“Are you injured?” the Seeker asked.

Her prisoner quieted her giggling and smiled up at her. “Nah, I’m okay, sorry! That was just about as graceful as I get.”

“Jeeze kid,” Varric said, “at least the Demons aren’t challenging us to a dance off.”

For all his teasing, he and Solas both offered their hands again and helped her to her feet.

Cassandra eyed her carefully. The girl was shaking a bit, obviously weary, and the Seeker wished they’d had more time—that matters weren’t so pressing that they could spare even a moment to rest. She’d only let them chatter so long because it got introductions out of the way and it allowed the girl a moment to gather her bearings before pressing on. But the closer they drew to the Breach the more concerns came to mind. The girl hadn’t had a meal in days, since whenever she ate the day of the Conclave, Solas had provided her some level of sustenance with broth and potion but she had to be famished, and her in and out of conscious state had obviously not been very restful. And all the potion in the world, it did little to quench thirst, Cassandra knew from experience it often left her throat dry, could even dehydrate you if it was a potion that used the water in your system to work.

Water. That was something she could offer. That was a concern that could be dealt with.

“Here,” she said, the word coming out more roughly than intended but never the less she uncapped her canteen and held it out towards the girl.

Eleanor looked at the canteen and then the Seeker for a second as if not entirely sure what the woman wanted her to do, but she took the canteen in hand and raised it to her cracked lips. She took a drink, a big gulp she swallowed quickly before wiping her mouth with the back of her hand and returning the canteen to Cassandra.

“Thanks,” she said with a smile.

Cassandra held her hand flat in refusal, instead offered up the cap to the girl, “Keep it, should you have need.”

The smile on her face grew into something blinding and hauntingly familiar to the Seeker and to some level of horror she felt a pang of warmth-mixed-grief in such a way she hadn’t felt in years.

It was the sort of smile she’d only received from one other in the entirety of her life. Antony had smiled like that—like the sun. He’d had a way with people, with Cassandra, that made one feel like they could do anything. Even as her features were soft, where his had been jarring, and her hair curled unruly and auburn where his had always been pin straight and smooth and even darker than Cassandra’s black locks, this Eleanor smiled at Cassandra the way Antony had, with a level of warmth and light that Cassandra could only scarcely remember now, tucked away in the fading portrait of an old locket.

Capping the canteen, the girl used the strap that had been wrapped around it to sling it over her shoulder. Cassandra nodded, seeing it sit secure at the girl’s hip before turning on her heel and marching forward to continue their progress to the forward camp.

Combat was a welcome reprieve. There was nothing confusing about the motives of Demons—they were Demons, and you had no options when it came to their handling. Either you killed them, or they killed you, and there were no trials or interrogations, or emotions involved.

It seemed beneficial, having the girl fight alongside a fellow Mage. Eleanor appeared to be taking Solas’s example and keeping to the high ground to cast her offence. It was a marked improvement from earlier when she’d followed Cassandra’s lead—running headlong into Demons and casting while simultaneously using her staff to physically strike the creatures. Up high, behind Cassandra seemed safer for the girl, and that was what was important. They could not lose her, not with the Mark meant to close these damned Rifts.

“You fight acceptably, Ellie. Your barriers are quite impressive,” Solas said as they walked from one battle to the next, it felt. “In which Circle did you train?”

“Wait, let me guess,” Varric interjected, “You sound like a Marcher—from the east maybe? Your accents got that eastern lilt to it like you’re from Ostwick or Ansburg, one of their Circle’s I bet.”

“Neither,” Eleanor said with a shake of her head. “I’ve never been Circled. I just learned what I could, where I could.”

“What of your parents?” Solas asked the question Cassandra herself had been reticent to ask. The girl had only given the name of Trevelyan as someone she personally mourned the loss of at the Conclave, but she hadn’t mentioned parents or family at all.

“Dunno,” Ellie said lightly with a shrug. “It’s always just been me. There was a sweet Mage, Ava, who kept an eye out for me when I was littler, taught me what she could, and even built my staff. She was from Ansburg. Hence, lilting eastern accent.” She asked Cassandra, “There wasn’t a staff with me when I was brought to Haven, was there?”

“If there were it would be held as evidence, and you would not be permitted its return—you’re allowed the staff you have now for the duration of our fight against Demons, but it will be confiscated the moment there is no need,” Cassandra made sure she knew she was still a prisoner, not an ally. But she did add, looking at the girl out of the corner of her eye, “However, there wasn’t one. Our soldiers saw you fall from a Rift, with just the clothing on your back.”

Cassandra wasn’t expecting to see the girl’s chin begin to quiver at the news. She’d wept openly when she’d been told of what had happened at the Conclave, but the Seeker hadn’t thought the loss of a staff to inflict itself upon the girl like she’d lost a relative.

But Eleanor didn’t cry, not as she had before. She bit her lip and hastily swept a hand at the corners of her eyes. “It was just a staff.”

“Hey kid, don’t sweat it,” Varric said, patting the girl on the arm, “if I lost Bianca I’d be a blubbering mess. You’d have to scrape me off the tavern floor.”

“From the looks at things back in Haven, you already have an affinity for the floor at taverns,” Solas jested in an obvious effort to assist the Dwarf in lightening the mood.

“Ha-ha! Good one, Chuckles. See? I knew you’d be funny.”

“Hilarious,” Cassandra deadpanned drily.
Eleanor actually snorted, and shook her head, smiling at their antics.

And then she was gasping, clenching her left hand and her footsteps faltered momentarily, swaying on her feet before catching herself and standing firm as she shook out her left hand.

“Shit. You alright?” Varric asked, trailing after her as she resumed lumbering up the snow-covered steps leading them further along the trail to the forward camp.

No, Cassandra thought, she could not be ‘alright’. That was the fourth pulse in under an hour. The Mark had engulfed the entirety of her hand and was now trying to creep up past her wrist.

But Eleanor grinned and said, “That one wasn’t so bad. You should have seen me earlier; I thought Cassandra was going to have to piggy-back me to the Breach.”

“Ha, I’d pay real gold to see that,” Varric said.

At the top of the stairs their banter died, Demons were waiting. More Demons, was there no end to them? Cassandra had been keeping an eye out for Leliana along the path but had yet to see a trace of the Lady Nightingale. Hopefully she was already through this mess and waiting for them with Chancellor Roderick.

This was Cassandra’s hope. Leliana would likely prefer being ‘ass deep in Demons’ than spend even a minute enduring Roderick’s company alone.

“I think there’s another Rift nearby,” Eleanor warned them as they dispatched the last of the Demons on their path. Did her Mark tell her this? Her jaw was set, Cassandra noted, the way she herself often when she was dealing with pain kept silent. The Fadelight ingulfing her hand flickered more wildly, in a way similar to its movements when the Breach expanded.

And there was, indeed, another Rift. Just before the entrance to the forward camp.

“We must seal it, quickly!” Solas said as his stance spread, and he cast his barriers across their party, Eleanor flipped her staff around to slam the butt of her staff into the ground, sending bolts of fire flying through the air to rain down on a wraith’s head.

Cassandra ran to take down a Shade under cover of Varric’s fire. After the initial awkwardness of their first few fights, the four of them were now working together rather smoothly. Like a team, rather than strangers fighting alongside one another purely due to circumstance.

When the Rift stopped dripping with fresh Demons for them to fight, Solas drew Eleanor to his side and she nodded as he gave her advice on how to use the Mark on her own without his hand to guide.

She raised her left hand to the sky, tremors working through her arm as green light blasted from her Mark and into the heart of the Rift, zapping it shut.

The girl looked relieved even as she slumped forward, standing with her hands on her knees as she took a moment to catch her breath.

“Well done,” Solas commended her as he placed a hand on her shoulder.

“It’s over,” Cassandra called to the soldiers still standing dumbstruck by the gates to the forward camp. “Open the gate!”
The Seeker’s sharp command seemed to jolt the soldiers and they immediately went to task.

“We’ll regroup and press on to the breach,” Cassandra said as she came to the girl’s side. Eleanor stood up straight then, wincing slightly, and it was then the Seeker realized there was a tear in the side of girl’s mercenary coat, blood was seeping from a gash left by some Shade’s claw. When had that happened? “Here. Drink it,” she sternly intoned as she passed a vial of healing potion to her prisoner.

“Oh, thanks,” the girl said, with such surprise Cassandra thought she may have forgotten the Seeker had potion, had even given her some for herself.

Though the sinking feeling in her stomach said that chances were, the girl was still surprised the Seeker would deign to see her wounds tended, despite her actions.

“Is everyone else alright?” Eleanor asked.

“I am well,” Solas said as Varric confirmed, “All good here.”

The girl nodded and then downed the potion in one go. “Oh gosh, that’s so much better,” she said with obvious relief, “thank you.”

And again, the only response Cassandra could give this grateful girl, someone who could seal Rifts, make bad jokes, and had a smile like actual sunlight, was a dismissive grunt.

Cassandra wanted nothing more than ignore her task of bringing the girl to Roderick. She simply wanted to keep the girl from Chantry clutches, seal the Breach, and see her freed. Something in her said Divine Justinia would have agreed with such actions.

Duty drew the Seeker into the forward camp with her prisoner.

That Elf-Root was something else. Wow. Maybe she hadn’t realized just how badly she’d been feeling, but as the potion from Cassandra (Seeker and now officially a Saint in Ellie’s book) coursed through her veins the ache in her head died away, and her limbs felt lighter and no longer ached from their sudden use after being prone for so long. She could breathe easier and feel the gash beneath her ribcage beginning to itch—which meant it was at least starting to heal. Light and itchy was better than the feeling that giants were taking turns stomping her into the ground and bleeding out. Even her magic was feeling relieved as it thrummed pleasantly under her skin. It liked how much use it was getting today, and with Ellie feeling better it seemed her magic half expected her to perform the equivalent of magical cartwheels.

Cassandra led them into the camp and brought them to a supply point where she retrieved more potion and began passing them around, to Solas, and then with some reticence, to Varric.

“Here,” she said.

“Thank you, Seeker,” Solas said with sincerity as he tucked his portion of potion in the pockets of his vest.

“Yeah, real thoughtful of you,” Varric said albeit sarcastic.

There was that disgusted sound again—though Ellie wasn’t sure what Cassandra had against the Dwarf, he seemed perfectly nice. Sweet, even. Like a plushie bear with an overtaxed liver and the mouth of a sailor.

She was very…rough, this Seeker. Oh gosh, an actual Seeker. Ellie’d had this weird mix of excitement and horror—she was in the presence of one of the most seriously badass women humanity had to offer, but all that badassery was targeted at finding the murderer of the Divine and right now Ellie was still at least on the list of suspects because, well, there was just no one else. But a Seeker.

And Maker was it ever a relief to find out just who she was being held captive by. There were obvious Chantry markings on Cassandra’s armor, but still, the confirmation that she was actually an agent of the Divine was beyond reassuring. Until Varric had given her title, Ellie hadn’t been super sure what was happening, who had her, who exactly was going to be doling out this ‘trial’ Cassandra had spoken of.

The burn climbing up her arm told her she didn’t have long. Her death was certain to her, like a truth you knew in your bones. It was a certainty that made her magic frantic in her blood—like it was fighting against an invisible enemy, mourning her, and trying to console her all at the same time. which was getting to be exhausting—it was hard to differentiate where her magic ended and Ellie began, sometimes the things it felt bled into her own feelings, but that was often useful. It worked both ways—it just took a lot of focus and some patience.

But she could be glad of some things, and so she led that thought to her magic. She’d met some of the most interesting, incredible people in these last few hours of her life. Solas—an Elfin Apostle with incredible magical knowledge that had been implemented on her first hand. Varric—the Varric Tethras, the published author who wrote stories everyone across Thedas enjoyed, an adventurer who’d lived such a colorful and vibrant life that lead him somehow to the Breach.

And to top it off, Cassandra. Ellie could only hope that if she’d had the chance to, she would have been half the woman Cassandra was. Just…maybe less scary. The Seeker had every right to be scary, and it was in fact her job to put the fear of the Maker into those who sought to destroy the Chantry, but Ellie didn’t think she could ever do ‘scary’ well herself.

Some people knew only nothingness, or pain, or terror in their final hours. Ellie…she got to know people, and the hope that when she was gone, the world would still keep moving forward to brighter and better days.

That notion quelled her magic’s panic and made it…thoughtful? It quieted drastically, and coasted smoothly along its usual path, its orbit through her body around her mana pool.

Peace and acceptance. Her magic would be there to help her no matter what they faced.

As for her list of amazing people, it expanded further still. Leliana was affirmed as a member of the ‘amazing’ column of the list. She was at a table set up with maps of the valley and a few books with Chantry symbols emblazoned on the covers, with a Chancellor, Ellie guessed by the imperious robes he wore. Leliana had been arguing with a Chancellor when they entered the camp and was holding her own admirably without punching the man, which it seemed the Seeker would rather do, from the way Cassandra’s fists clinched upon spotting the red-faced…was it buffoon, she’d muttered under her breath as they approached?

This Chancellor actually created a ‘not amazing’ column on Ellie’s list. He was…well, mean. And rude. And loud. And was unfortunately under the impression that she shouldn’t be taken to the Breach—but instead to Val Royeaux to await her trial. And wanted her back in irons, which her wrists certainly wouldn’t appreciate. Nope, she was not a fan.
The arguing quieted as Cassandra stormed up to their war table with Ellie in tow.

Leliana shared a look with Cassandra that conveyed their shared…was hatred too strong a word? Or not strong enough? Either way, Chancellor Roderick had obviously worn out his welcome with the two women.

“You made it,” Leliana said with relief. She gestured to Ellie. “Chancellor Roderick, this is—”

“I know who she is,” Roderick snapped, ignoring Ellie as he addressed Cassandra in a tone that she supposed was intended to make him sound all-powerful, “As Grand Chancellor of the Chantry, I hereby order you to take this criminal to Val Royeaux to face execution.”

Cassandra stepped forward to be in front of Ellie, her stance like she was posed to go into actual battle with the man. “Order me? You are a glorified clerk. A bureaucrat!”

“And you are a thug, but a thug who supposedly serves the Chantry.”

“We serve the Most Holy Chancellor,” Leliana corrected, “as you well know.”

“Justinia is dead!” he snapped, “We must elect her replacement and obey her orders on the matter.”

Anger on behalf of the Divine and those who were working to fix this mess being impeded by this man’s garbage bureaucracy reared its ugly head in Ellie. How dare he be so blasé about Divine Justinia—she’d only just died! The world was still in the wreckage of her demise, and as far as Ellie was concerned, even in death she was still Divine, not just ‘Justinia’. And just why did he care so much about the Divine election anyway? He certainly wouldn’t be called upon for the role. The Breach was a much more pressing issue.

“Hey!” Ellie snapped, her magic riled up at this, like a wing man egging her on as she railed at the man, “Divine Justinia is dead, hundreds of people are dead, and more will die if we don’t deal with that hole in the sky.” She raised her glowing hand eye-level with the Chancellor. “This thing is killing me, I won’t live to see your trial. You can either throw me in a cell to die, or you can let Cassandra and Leliana do their jobs. Get me to the Breach, seal it, and neither it nor I will be of any concern of yours anymore. Then you can hold your precious election.”

Solas made a noise like he’d swallowed a surprised sound and attempted to make it sound like a cough. Varric just whistled lowly and muttered, “Damn, kid.”

Cassandra was staring at her like she wasn’t sure if she should throttle Ellie for her unwelcome intrusion, or back her up.

“And how do you propose we do that? Insolent brat,” the Chancellor groused. “Our forces are outnumbered here, we must retreat—”

“We will take Eleanor to the temple, and she will seal the Breach. Our forces are enough for one last push,” Cassandra inturrupted. Ahh. No throttling for Ellie right now, that was nice.

“Charging may be too dangerous,” Leliana said, “our soldiers can distract the Demons while you take the girl through the mountain path.”

“We lost scouts out there, and our soldiers cannot distract the Demons for long—time is of the essence we must move quickly,” Cassandra countered, and then quieted as she turned and faced Ellie. “What would you propose we do?” she asked.
“You’re asking her?!” Chancellor Roderick cried in outrage.

“I kinda have to second him on that,” Ellie admitted, nervously, “I don’t know anything about soldiers or fighting or how to win a battle.”

“But you do know the Mark, and the stakes we face,” Cassandra said. “The mountain path will take the longest and though we did lose sights on our scouts there, it may be the safest way for you to reach the Breach. Charging would be more dangerous for you personally, but fastest. You said the Mark is…you would be the one most aware of the time we have left to get you to the Breach.”

Ellie held her hand close to her chest, her Mark flaring again, and if Chancellor Roderick wouldn’t absolutely delight in a display of her weakness, she would have screamed at the pain that shot through her body, fighting against her own magic as it carved a zigzag path across it.

“Charge. Definitely charge,” was her vote.

Cassandra regarded her thoughtfully for a moment and placed a firm hand on her shoulder before looking back at the Chancellor.

“Then we shall charge.”

Charging, in retrospect, might not have been the best idea in the world. There were Demons, lots and lots of Demons. She even had to seal another Rift and that was no picnic—it hurt. Like ‘everything in me is on fire’ hurt.

Though when it was over, that was nice—kind of like the feeling you get after letting off a huge sneeze, much more painful, but afterwards your whole body sort of relaxes. And Solas’s praise of her proficiency in sealing the Rifts replaced the burn of the Mark with a soothing warmth.

But then Ellie was faced with something most frightening. As soon as that Rift was sealed and the Demons dispersed, a Templar approached them.

A Templar. In armor, and feather pauldrons, and everything!

Ellie shrank back and away from the golden-haired man as he approached, she practically knocked into Solas, and her hand clenched the sleeve of his shirt—as if the best way for a Templar not to notice an Apostate was to stand right next to another, even more obvious, Apostate.

But the Templar didn’t even comment on her magic, or on her at all really. He instead offered congratulations to Cassandra for closing the Rift which was mildly insulting—Cassandra certainly helped but she wasn’t the one slowly burning to death to close those things. Rude!

“Do not congratulate me,” Cassandra said, “this is the prisoner’s doing.”

Oi! Traitor! Ellie would have appreciated Cassandra’s correction of the Templar if it hadn’t drawn his eye to her, and her glowing hand and her staff and her Apostate Elf friend.

But all he said was, “Is it? I hope they’re right about you. We’ve lost a lot of people getting you here.”

Oh, Maker he was talking to her. At least he hadn’t immediately jumped to slap chains on her or something, but what was she supposed to say?

“I’m willing to try, I’ll do my best.”

“That’s all we can ask,” he said, was that warmth in his tone? Was he being nice? Templars weren’t nice, they yelled and chased.

“The way to the temple should be clear, Leliana will meet you there?” he confirmed with Cassandra.

“Yes, she’ll be along with forces to face the Breach. Keep them off us, Commander,” the Seeker said.

The Commander nodded. He looked over the four of them, “Maker watch over you—for all our sakes.”

As he left them, Ellie slowly released the sleeve of Solas’s shirt, and smoothed the crease she’d left in it with an apologetic smile.

“That was Commander Cullun,” Solas dropped the name quietly into her ear, “I have had scarce contact with him, but he left the Order—a former Templar.”

“That’s…kind of comforting,” Ellie said, and then she met Solas’s eye, as she spoke softly, “Solas, what will happen once we close the Breach, do you think they’ll keep you captive?”

Cassandra had started moving then, Varric, Solas and Ellie followed after.

“My hope is that they will remember that I offered assistance when I could have turned a blind eye to save my own skin.”

“Just run,” Ellie implored quietly.

“Pardon?” the Elf asked.

“You’ve more than done your part. If you would like to face the Breach, do so, but the second its closed, just run for it. If I can, I’ll make a distraction—it’s me they’re wanting to give a big fancy execution.”

Solas slanted her a small smile. “You face your fate admirably, da’len. I appreciate the sentiment, but I believe I shall see what the future holds.”

“Okay, but just say the word, and I can whip up a spectacular distraction—I once faked a heart attack to evade Templars on my trail.”

His smile grew, and he shook his head at the preposterous notion. “Surely you jest. I may not have previously had this much contact with Humans, but no one would think someone as young as you could be suffering heart failure. You’re not a day over twenty.”

Ellie giggled. “Well, you’re right about that—I’m several days under twenty.”

“We guessing ages now? I’m almost as good at that as I am with accents,” Varric chimed in. He’d seen Solas and Ellie talking and started chatting Cassandra up to give them more privacy…or to annoy her to the point of violence which wasn’t the brightest idea Ellie thought since the woman had a firm grip on the hilt of her sword. He hung back a bit to walk more closely with his three fellow prisoners and put on a thoughtful look. “Hmm, I’d say you’re younger than Ellie scrunched up her nose and shook her head. “You’d better stick with accents,” she said.

“Sixteen.”

The trio looked at the Seeker as she firmly offered her own guess.

Ellie smiled at her. Well, at her back, Cassandra did not look back as she led them, her hand was no longer on her sword but hanging at her side, clenched tightly.

“Oh wow, close!” Ellie said, “She beat you good Varric. Let’s see…” thinking on it, she’d gotten into the habit of updating her age with the change of year. “It’s still 9:41 right? Fifteen, then.”

Varric cleared his throat. His voice was…off when he spoke what sounded like he was trying to make a joke, but it rang with accusation;

“Guess you win, Seeker.”

Cassandra had nothing to say to that.

“This is the Temple of Sacred Ashes,” Solas announced.

“This is where you fell out of the Fade and our soldiers found you,” Cassandra said.

Ellie was confused at first, they’d approached an area of just…pure rubble and ruin.

She’d had heard of the Temple—it was hard not to, Andraste’s ashes were a pretty big deal for anyone who even remotely had any love for the Chantry, or at least the Maker. Trevelyan had told her just about anything a person could care to know about the temple—its founding, what it was built with, which of his family members helped in its foundation. He’d had a wealth of knowledge on the subject but none of that had even remotely prepared her to stand at its doors—the temple of Sacred Ashes had been massive, a true monument to the Chantry and to the Maker. The sight of it as they came up over the hillside—the sun had just been rising and the world had been quiet, peaceful, and the valley was drenched in the beauty of sunlight, and its reflection off the Temples many golden sigils and stained-glass windows. It had been all fine silk draperies, golden images of Andraste, and slick marble floors. It felt like just hours ago she’d been clinging to Trevelyan’s arm like it was a lifeline, he’d offered it to her ‘like a gentleman’ and she’d been glad because otherwise she feared falling flat on her face.

Now there had been no grand view, no warning before they were suddenly upon the ruins. The temple was gone. In its ashes, it left jagged stone that pressed into the soles of Ellie’s shoes, and she was more fearful of the aftermath of such a fall—before she’d just have bruised her ego, but now she might actually lose an eye or something to the cracked rubble.

And then there was the smell.

Corpses littered the ruined ground—burned and burning alike, some had become molten statues forming the shape of their agony when the Conclave collapsed.

When the sight and stench finally hit her, Ellie stopped in her tracks and crouched down, torso curled around her knees, left hand pressed against her stomach as her right hand flew to her mouth and she fought not to vomit—she wasn’t sure what would come up exactly, she didn’t really have anything to throw up. Her magic was crying in her blood, sorrow spilling through her veins, and then something wet slipped down the back of her hand and she realized she was crying.

“Ellie?” Solas asked, his worry translating clearly as he tentatively placed a hand on her shoulder.

“Seeker!” Varric’s voice called and he went to Ellie’s side.

Cassandra’s boots crunched the rubble underfoot as she quickly moved to join them, she stood somewhat between Ellie and Varric, placing her hand on the shoulder opposite the one Solas’s hand occupied and said, “Eleanor. I know this is difficult, but we are close. If you’re going to be sick we’d best get it over with, yes?”

That had Varric backing up big time, but he didn’t stray too far, and he smoothed his retreat over by pulling Bianca from his back like he decided to guard them from sudden attack, instead of turning tail at the mention of sickness up.

Ellie took a shuddering breath and moved her hand away from her mouth, Cassandra clasped that hand in her own and held it as Ellie went to her knees and retched and sobbed. Someone rubbed soothing circles on her back.

She’d been right—she’d already metabolized any potion or water she’d taken on before. Her stomach heaved but all it offered up was acidic bile and a mildly concerning trace of blood as it splattered onto the rocks before her, and then dry heaves worked their way through her body.

Solas offered her a handkerchief when she stilled and all that was left was Ellie sniffling from her tears. She wiped at her nose and mouth, and then tucked the handkerchief into a pocket when Solas quietly said she was free to keep it. He was then busy digging through his satchel with both hands, looking for something, and it was then Ellie noticed the hand on her back still continued its ministrations—rubbing a circular path between her shoulder blades. Cassandra’s hand, she realized, and the Seeker was still holding her right hand, firmly but not painfully—no trace of the violence she’d used on Ellie’s wrist during her questioning.

“Here, it isn’t the most pleasant, but it should help,” Solas said as he extended a vial of thick, translucent goo to her. She stared at it dumbly, not quite comprehending what he intended for her to do with it, and the man uncapped the vial and dispensed some of the gunk onto the pad of his index finger.

Oh, it was something that smelled strongly of heavy, almost sour, mint. Eucalyptus? He carefully dabbed the gel over the bow of her top lip, just under her nose and it went a long way to shield them from the stench of the valley and her own vomit.

Cassandra’s hands detached from Ellie’s hand and back and the Seeker took a hold of the water canteen hanging at Ellie’s hip, handing it to her. Ellie did take a careful drink, grateful to wash out her mouth a bit and clear the burn from the back of her throat, and her stomach didn’t do anything in protest.

“Can you stand?” Cassandra asked as the canteen fell to Ellie’s hip again.

She didn’t have much of a choice, did she? She kind of just wanted to lay face first in the rubble and die, but maybe she should at least seal the Breach first. So she nodded, not trusting her voice, and the Seeker helped her to her feet.
“We’re almost there, kid, you’ve got this,” Varric said as he rejoined them, he gave Ellie’s elbow an assuring pat.

“Can we…” Ellie grasped for words, and she hated how she was shaking now. This was really it, they were about to approach the Breach, and she would hopefully seal it shut. But with everything, everything that had happened, there was so little left in her to give, her vision wavered, and her magic was trying its best to still be useful for casting while attempting to keep her…well…alive basically. The only thing she relied on more than, or at least as much as, her magic, was the Maker.

Prayer. That’s what she wanted. And somehow Cassandra seemed to hear the word Ellie had only just realized she’d meant to say.

“This situation calls to mind Andraste’s Sermon at the Valarain Fields,” Cassandra spoke with all the certainty her years studying the scriptures lent her. She placed her hands on Ellie’s shoulders and bowed her head so their foreheads touched. “Transfigurations, 10:1.”

Ellie closed her eyes and listened to the Seeker’s chant;

“Many are those who wander in sin, despairing that they are lost forever. But the one who repents, who has faith unshaken by the darkness of the world, and boasts not, nor gloats over the misfortunes of the weak, but takes delight in the Maker’s law and creations, she shall know the peace of the Maker's benediction.”

Cassandra’s hands gripped tighter, and her conviction was clear as she continued their prayer: “The Light shall lead her safely through the paths of this world, and into the next. For she who trusts in the Maker, fire is her water. As the moth sees light and goes toward flame, she should see fire and go towards Light. The Veil holds no uncertainty for her, and she will know no fear of death, for the Maker shall be her beacon and her shield, her foundation and her sword.”

And then, after a beat, “Or, her Staff, should she prefer,” the Seeker allowed.

“Thank you, Cassandra,” Ellie said, wiping at her eyes before they spilled over again. She was good now, she was ready. “Really.”

She was going to seal the Breach.

The Breach was monstrous from a distance. In person, at its very core, it was indescribable the level of hell it brought to Thedas. It was just so massive.

Eleanor, in horrifying juxtaposition, was small. Tiny. Only Varric was shorter than she, but he easily outweighed her.

Cassandra stood alongside the girl as their party stared up into the Breach. Nothing could be seen past the haze of Fade green that illuminated the crater left behind where the core of the Temple had once stood.

And it contrasted horribly with the bright, blazing scarlet chunks of Red Lyrium growing along the crater’s walls.

Leliana was a welcome sight in comparison, flanked by soldiers of the Inquisition.
“You’re here! Thank the Maker,” Leliana breathed as she joined them.

“We haven’t much time, have your men take up positions around the temple,” Cassandra ordered. Leliana nodded and turned to her soldiers to give some orders of her own.

The Seeker looked at the girl then. Eleanor was staring up into the Breach, her mouth ground into a grim line, glaring at it—with such fervor, it was little wonder the Breach didn’t seal under her gaze. That would certainly be a welcome surprise.

She’d stopped shaking, and Cassandra was glad of it. Her tremors had stilled after the Seeker’s offer of prayer, and she was admittedly pleased to have been able to provide for her. She was still much too pale—even Solas had more color to his cheeks from the bitter cold. Eleanor was just sickly white, even the freckles on her face seemed translucent. She was bruised, and bloodied, and burning. But was she ready?

How could she be?

“This is your chance to end this, Eleanor. Are you ready?”

“Yes,” she said with finality. Her brow furrowed then, and she looked to Cassandra, “How exactly am I supposed to get up there though? Please don’t say Human ladder.”

Solas gave a low laugh and said, “You’ve no need to go up, Ellie. The answer lies below,” he gestured down deeper into the crater, and Eleanor’s eyes followed to look at the Rift at the base of the Breach. “That Rift was the first and is the key. Seal it, and we may just seal the Breach.”

“Then we must find a way down,” Cassandra said, eyeing the trail blazed in Red Lyrium. “Carefully.”

The girl was clumsy, that much had been seen on their journey—Cassandra did not have enough fingers to count the number of times the girl had tripped or skidded or slipped and nearly flattened her face. It would do her little justice to topple into the crater head first and die from some shoddy footing. Her earlier quip of fearing Cassandra would have to piggy-back her to the Breach came to mind, and for a moment the Seeker seriously considered doing just that.

As before, Cassandra led them down into the crater. Either through some level of mercy, or sheer circumstance, there was a path that sloped down and around the outer edge of the gaping hole. Mercy would be too kind a word—perhaps conspiracy was more accurate. Because the path was littered in Red Lyrium, heat pouring off of the vile substance in waves as they made their way to the Breach.

“Seeker. That’s Red Lyrium,” Varric hissed at her as they traversed the rocky path.

“I can see that, Varric,” Cassandra seethed sharply. It wasn’t like the foul stuff was invisible. It literally glowed bright red, almost in warning of the danger.

“But what’s it doing here?”

“Magic could have drawn on the Lyrium beneath the temple and corrupted it,” Solas supplied.

“It’s evil,” Varric insisted, and he made sure Eleanor was listening when he intoned, “Seriously, whatever you do, don’t touch it.” he’d been trailing behind Eleanor and Cassandra, alongside Solas, but he picked up the pace and walked on the girl’s other side as if to keep a barrier between her and the larger shards of Red Lyrium that jutted from the ground around them.
Any affirmative Eleanor was about to give the Dwarf was cut off by a deep, booming voice echoing out across the crater, pouring from the Breach.

“Now is the hour of our victory. Bring forth the sacrifice.”

Solas almost ran into the girl when she came to a full stop at the sound of the voice. They all stopped to follow her gaze up into the Breach.

“What are we hearing?” Cassandra asked Solas, as she placed a hand on Eleanor’s shoulder. More so ready to push the girl back and behind her should they be attacked, than for comfort.

“At a guess, the person who created the Breach,” Solas said.

“Have you heard this voice before, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked the girl.

She shook her head. “N-no,” but she looked conflicted about the answer. “I don’t know really, I can’t remember.”

Cassandra released her hold of the girl and led their party forward, deeper into the crater.

“Keep the sacrifice still.” The voice from the Breach commanded.

And then a voice Cassandra had thought she would never hear again cried out:

“Someone, help me!”

It sent Cassandra running forward automatically, the call of her vows rang strong in her blood as she drew her sword. The path came to an end at a drop that would cast them down to the Rift Solas labeled a key, and she stopped in her tracks, her prisoners catching up shortly after.

“That is Divine Justinia’s voice!” Cassandra cried.

Without a moments more hesitation, the Seeker dropped down into the lowest level of the crater. It took a second for her to realize she’d essentially abandoned her prisoners up above, but Solas had stepped up and with a hand cradling Eleanor’s arm, he assisted her own dissent to reach the Rift. Varric, surprisingly, followed suit.

“Someone, help me!” the breach repeated Justinia’s plea.

“What’s going on here?!” Eleanor’s voice.

Cassandra turned to look at the girl. “That was your voice. Most Holy called out to you. But…”

Eleanor’s Mark crackled again, bringing a surprised cry from the girl’s lips, and then the Rift before them began projecting an image, some ghostly scene, a memory trapped in the Breach.

It was an image of Divine Justinia, magic bindings keeping her arms held taunt and a large creature, a mass of black smoke with glowing red eyes looming over her. They were in the centermost worship hall of the Temple of Sacred Ashes. The doors swung open and through them, came Eleanor.

“What’s going on here?!” she snapped, a staff in hand, prepared to defend the Divine.

But the ghostly image of Justinia shook her head, “No! Eleanor, run while you can, warn
The ghastly red-eyed thing spoke with that deep voice they’d first heard upon approaching the Breach. The man or monster Solas suspected of making the Breach.

“We have an intruder. Kill her, now.”

And with that, the Rift crackled and went dormant, the scene before them disappeared.

“You were there!” Cassandra…hadn’t exactly meant for it to sound as accusatory as it did, but urgency robbed her of her cool, “Who attacked? And the Divine, is she…?” Eleanor had survived somehow. Was the Divine truly dead? “Was this vision true, what are we seeing?”

“I don’t remember!” Eleanor promised desperately.

“The Fade bleeds into this place, what we saw appears to be echoes of what happened at the Conclave, Lady Seeker,” Solas said, coming to the girl’s defense. And then he refocused them on the task at hand. “We must continue. This Rift is not sealed,” he brought their attention back to the Rift before them. “It seems to be closed, albeit temporarily. I believe with the Mark, the Rift can be opened and then sealed properly. However, opening the Rift will likely attract attention from the other side.”

“Meaning Demons,” Cassandra concluded. She could see Leliana’s men had taken position around the crater—archers up high while swordsmen held their place at key points surrounding the base of the Breach. She raised her voice to echo across the crater, “Stand ready!”

Archers knocked arrows, ready to fire, their fellow soldiers drawing their blades.

Solas pulled Eleanor close and began instructing.

“This will be the most trying use of your Mark yet, da’len. You must ignore your every instinct and rip open the tear in the veil. Your magic…may not wish to cooperate. It isn’t exactly desirable, calling Demons to attack.”

“Yeah, it’s not real high up on my list of favorite things,” Eleanor agreed. “Any chance ripping open the veil will rain chocolate? Or puppies?”

“I could go for a nice ale shower, myself,” Varric said.

“Unfortunately,” Solas said, “no such thing shall happen, but perhaps pretending it will could assist in garnering your Mark’s cooperation. You must find a desire to open the veil and pour that will into your Mark.”

“Opening it will give us the ability to properly close it,” Cassandra recited Solas’s earlier deduction. Eleanor looked to her. She almost felt foolish for saying it, but with the girl’s gaze on her now, seeking guidance, she pressed on, “If it is the Demons you fear, remember that you have many surrounding you who are more than capable of handling them, who will defend you. We will remain at your side. Focus your mind on the end goal: opening the Rift to seal the Breach.”

The strength with which the girl flung into her caught Cassandra off guard, knocking her back a step, but her arms came up automatically which was surprising since she hadn’t been hugged since…well, it had been a long time. The motion was a bit awkward since she still had her sword in hand. The girl squeezed her arms around Cassandra’s waist, though with her armor the effect wasn’t much, but it seemed to make Eleanor feel better, using her unarmed hand, Cassandra patted the younger woman on the back.
“You’re amazing, you know that right?” Eleanor asked. She loosened her hold on the Seeker and smiled up at her. “Thank you for everything. Whatever happens, I’m glad I got to meet you guys.”

Eleanor stepped away then, faced the dormant Rift overhead, Marked hand raised to the sky.

Solas and Varric flanked the Seeker, weapons drawn as they watched.

Cassandra’s advice had evidently helped.

Fade light burst from Eleanor’s hand and into the dormant Rift, sending the tear rippling and fluctuating erratically until it burst open, a full-blown rip in the veil, and the Demons emerged.

Or Demon, singular.

A Demon of Pride.

Eleanor screamed in fright and was already backing away from the great hulking purple scaled monster as Cassandra rushed to get between she and the beast.

Electricity passed between the Pride Demon’s hands, and then a great crack resounded through the crater. It had cast a barrier of its own, protecting itself from its enemies.

“Stay back, let the warriors handle this!” Cassandra barked over her shoulder as she heard the whirring of a powerful blast coming to life in the Demon’s hand, it would charge and unleash lightning upon them all if they weren’t careful.

“Lethallan, use your Mark to strip its defenses—manipulating the Rift will weaken the beast and aid our companions,” Solas instructed.

Cassandra saw green light fly overhead and into the Rift, and just as the Demon was about to cast off his spell, the rift fell in on itself, and then spilled open again, sending a wave of pain through the Demon that sent it to its knees, and knocked the barrier it had made away, his uncast spell dying in his hand.

“Now!” Cassandra called out to her soldiers.

Arrows began raining down on the Demon of pride as warriors rushed forward and beat it back with their swords, Cassandra felt the familiar wave of security spread over her as Eleanor cast her own Barrier spell doubled by Solas before the Mages began working together to cast an offense against the beast to the rhythm of Bianca firing off in Varric’s grip.

They’d made progress with allaying the Demon when the Rift shifted once more, and the Demon stood tall, reviving its lost barriers.

Eleanor cast her Mark once more, pouring power against the Rift, and it began to fluctuate, but then the burst of light was cut short—the Demon’s barriers were unaffected, the Rift didn’t collapse like last time, and a startled cry of pain tore from Eleanor’s lips.

Cassandra turned her attention from the raging Pride Demon to Eleanor running as fast as her legs could carry her from two Shades. When had they appeared? She should have been paying better attention, not trusted Varric of all people to watch after the girl Solas’s help or no.

“Eleanor needs help!” she shouted, and Dwarf and Elf alike turned focus to the Demons
The girl stumbled and fell, skidding on her knees before rolling onto her bottom, and the closest Shade was just within clawing range when the Seeker forced her way between them, standing firm with her back to Eleanor as she shouted unintelligibly into the creature’s face, sending it reeling back as if struck before Cassandra came down on its forearm with her blade, slicing the offending appendage off. Solas’s blast of ice froze the second Shade while Varric shot the creature through with bolts, and Cassandra absently wondered if the Dwarf just had an endless supply of the things.

Fadelight shot overhead as the trio worked together to defeat the Shades. Eleanor cast against the Rift once more, and this time she was uninterrupted, and the Pride Demon’s defenses came crashing down.

Cassandra turned and saw the girl was still on the ground, pulling her left hand close to her chest once she’d finished manipulating the Rift.

“Well done,” Cassandra commended, offering an arm to the girl and pulling her to her feet. Once she’d risen the girl’s staff slammed into the solid ground and Cassandra expected fire to fly from the top but nothing so spectacular occurred, the girl instead leaned her weight against the staff, more like a crutch at the moment.

“Kick that thing’s butt,” Eleanor said.

And ‘kick that thing’s butt’ she did. Cassandra ran to get back the mix with the Demon of Pride, and this time, its barriers stayed down as the creature was bombarded by Inquisition forces, and finally slain, its great body evaporated into fade ash and floated back up into the Rift.

“Now! Seal the Rift!” Cassandra called to the girl. This was their chance.

Standing tall, Eleanor raised her hand to the heavens once more, and light shot from her Mark, deep into the Rift, her arm shaking with the effort to keep held high and casting, she relinquished hold of her staff and used her right hand to brace her arm and she screamed the way Cassandra found herself doing when face to face with a Dragon—a battle cry.

The Rift sealed shut and sent a quake up through the entire Breach.

And then Eleanor collapsed.

And despite his earlier jest, Varric Tethras found nothing amusing as Cassandra hoisted the unconscious girl onto her back and carried her away in their retreat.

The Breach hang, stationary and repressed, but still high in the sky, marking the world.
The Threat Remains--Waking Up in Haven

Chapter Summary

Ellie's first week in Haven. She's the Herald of what now? She's about to learn her place in all this Breach business and get to know the people who will help her rise to the occasion.

Chapter Notes

Hello! Thank you for reading, and leaving Kudos and Comments! This is coming a few days earlier than I thought it would (coming in at a whopping 43 pages in Word, sorry!). In this chapter there are a few things marked * which indicate that it will be covered in the end-of-chapter notes, along with translations of any Dalish used. Enjoy!

Three days had passed since the events at the Breach.

The journey back to Haven had been brutal. The beat of Eleanor’s heart thrummed erratically against Cassandra’s back, her breath coming out in weak wisps or harsh gasps in the Seeker’s ear, and the forehead resting in the crook of her neck burned with fever.

And then she stopped breathing altogether. They’d had to stop and Solas resuscitated the girl, laying her in the snow, her head in Cassandra’s lap as the Elf worked emergency spells to pull air into and out of her lungs, trying to coax them to resume breathing on their own. Never before had twenty seconds felt like an eternity to the Seeker.

Leliana had word sent ahead and Healer Adan awaited them upon their return to Haven, ready to assist in tending the girl.

Then came the never-ending work—Leliana brought her friend, Josephine Montilyet on, and Maker bless her, the woman was a force of nature. Cassandra was amazed at how quickly things were falling into place with proper management. Josephine was quickly acquainting the Inquisition with Ferelden allies, and had already began talks with contacts in Orlais. Cullen seemed pleased with the progress his recruits were making, Leliana’s Nightingales were working around the clock to gather information—anything that would help them in navigating the war between Mages and Templars—and trying to anticipate outside forces attempts to assassinate the girl under their care.

Two such attempts had been made.

Rumors innumerable had spread like wildfire after the events at the Breach. Eleanor had been widely proclaimed the ‘Herald of Andraste’ sent by the Maker to save them from the destruction of the Conclave.

A Templar hadn’t been able to stomach the thought that an Apostate could represent the Maker. Many held issue with the idea, but he’d taken it to task to do something about it. He’d broken into the Chantry in the dead of night, and attempted to murder Eleanor while she lay thrashing, mumbling unintelligibly in tortured half-sleep.

Healer Adan had reported a marked improvement in her vitals and was hoping to expose the girl to outside stimulus. Cassandra had spent some time at the girl’s side when there were lulls in her own work.

The Seeker had been mildly uncertain of what exactly to do, talking to someone who wouldn’t be responding wasn’t her forte. She’d thought perhaps reading to the girl would comfort her, but her own collection was scarce at the moment and full of books that would either risk boring the girl to death with instructional texts…or scarring her for life with smutty literature. She’d settled on reciting the Chant of Light from memory.

Unfortunately, keeping in communication with the Chantry alongside Leliana, arguing for hours on end with Chancellor Roderick about what to do with their prisoner, took up most of the Seeker’s time.

Varric of all people, had apparently taken to sitting with the girl when she’d need of company. He had no problem talking the ear off of someone lying comatose. He’d alternated between idle gossip he’d gathered from around Haven and making up stories to fill the time.

So, when the Templar struck, Cassandra had been in the War Room getting a headache.

Which grew exponentially when a cry of rage broke out in the hall outside, and then the sound of Bianca firing and Varric shouting, “SEEKER!”

Cassandra flew from the War Room mid-shouting match, and into the bedroom just off the hall. The door was heavier than usual, and with a loud grunt the Seeker forced the door open to find the intruder pinned to the other side with bolts trapping his arms and legs, screaming abuse about the supposed Herald. Varric made a creative suggestion on where to shoot the man next.

Eleanor had done little more than whimper in her sleep and thrash for a moment, her breath catching before settling back into a smooth rhythm. But that had taken the Dwarf’s attention off of the man and had him holstering Bianca so he could adjust the covers where they shielded her feet exposed from her sleep-kicking. Once he was certain the girl wouldn’t be cold he carefully patted her hair and said, “Hey, shh, it’s all good Tumbles, Seeker’s got ‘im.”

Tumbles? Was that Varric’s chosen nickname for the girl? Eleanor may have something to say about that upon waking.

Of course, even with what little Cassandra knew of the girl, she had a feeling that receiving any nickname from the Dwarf would send her smiling.

Tumbled from a Rift, tumbled off a fence, tumbled across the snowy countryside all the way to the Breach. It did suit her.

After the Templar was done being a door wreath, he’d been questioned thoroughly before Leliana had her people take him away. The man was likely deceased.

Leliana posted one of her own as an undercover guard—a small, jittery Elf girl. Marehis*, a city Elf that joined the Inquisition from within the ranks of Leliana’s spies, she was plain—pretty, but ordinary, and she earnestly believed with all her heart that their prisoner was truly heaven-sent, hand delivered by Andraste to save them from the Breach. All these things, along with her affinity for knives and strong set of lungs made her perfect for protecting Eleanor. She tended to the girl, fetching things for Healer Adan, cleaning up around the room, looking for all the world like she was merely a handmaiden.

A handmaiden who shouted down the house and stabbed a Haven refugee in the neck when she made her own misguided attempt at taking Eleanor’s life. Revenge for a husband and a daughter lost at the Conclave. Sad, but Eleanor should not have been her target.

That thing, that monster with horrible red eyes and a voice found in nightmares, that was who the people should turn against. Whoever he was. Cassandra wasn’t sure if she hoped he’d perished at the Conclave, at the hands of his own evil, or if she wished to track him down herself and tear him limb from limb, pull penance from his bones with her bare hands.

At any rate, upon thwarting yet another assassination attempt, Cassandra suggested moving the girl from the chantry may misdirect such attacks. The room she’d been occupying had only been a temporary arraignment anyway—the room had been allotted for noble guests to the inquisition at Josephine’s insistence. Many would want to see the Inquisition before allying with them.

So, the room was left empty for now and Cassandra, alongside Cullen and two of his men, quietly transported Eleanor to one of the small cabins on the outer part of Haven’s walled-in estate.

Solas and Varric offered a distraction while the move took place—the two quarreled in the tavern in such a way it drew the attention of any who would have been watching the Chantry for any sign of ‘the Herald’. The Chantry courtyard was empty for the first time in days, the streets of Haven practically barren save for the large crowd that had gathered around the tavern, and Cassandra heard the sound of breaking glass and Solas shouting something in Dalish, followed by Varric oh-so-intelligently replying in gibberish mocking the Elf’s words with the addition of, “your mother!” at the end.

All said and done, Eleanor was safe and sound under watch of Leliana’s agent in the care of Healer Adan, and Varric had to pay for Solas’s drinks for the next month.

Adan insisted the girl would wake soon. But amid yet another argument with Chancellor Roderick, the minutes passed like hours, and Cassandra was impatient for something to happen—for either the Chancellor to expire from a hysteria-induced aneurism, or Eleanor to rise and bring a level of legitimacy to the people’s claims that she was the Herald.

It was something that would safeguard her life from the Chantry. The Inquisition would have to work to protect her from other forces. They needed her to close the Breach.

And after everything they had endured getting to the Breach, and the things they’d learned from the Fade vision they’d witnessed, Cassandra and Leliana—both the Right and Left hands of the Divine—believed the girl was innocent.

The War Room door received a firm knock, before opening a crack just big enough for a slender Elf girl’s face to slip through—Leliana’s agent, Marehis peeked inside the War Room and caught Cassandra’s gaze.

Eleanor was awake.
When she opened her eyes, she wasn’t sure what to expect. She was dead, wasn’t she? Consciousness returned slowly, she became aware of...was that an actual mattress?...cradling her as she slept, the soft blanket tucked around her.

The low, steady burn in the palm of her hand.

The light was almost blinding at first, but as her eyes adjusted she realized it was just low lamp light from a lantern on the table beside her head.

She was tired—not bone wearily exhausted, more like she’d just gotten over being sick. She perked up as her magic seemed to realize she was awake and started sending waves of relief—it was trying to convey something like worry and the fact that she had been in danger.

Danger?

Hmm...where was she?

The Breach!

Ellie sat up quickly and the unfamiliar room spun before her eyes, she shook her head and tried to focus. What had happened? Where was everyone?

What happened to the Breach? Was it sealed?

“Oh!” a surprised cry caught her attention, it was followed by the clatter of something hitting the floor.

There was a waif of a girl, an Elf. She’d been carrying a box which she’d dropped, and she stared at Ellie with something like awe and relief.

“I didn’t know you were awake!”

“It’s alright, I just wo—” she swallowed her words when the girl fell onto her knees the way she’d seen Chantry Mothers when overwhelmed by the glory of Andraste.

“I beg your forgiveness, and your blessing. I am but a humble servant.”

“Oh...you’re okay, I’m not upset, just confused. Where am I exactly?” Ellie asked.

“You’re back at Haven, my lady. They say you saved us. The Breach stopped growing, just like the Mark on your hand. It’s all anyone has talked about for the last three days.” She rose to her feet and tentatively came forward to her bedside. “I am Marehis. I’ve been appointed as your handmaid, are you well my lady? Should I fetch the healer?”

Ellie shook her head, both at the notion of having a handmaid and the idea that this person should fetch anything for her let alone a healer. She felt fine, a little sore, and her hand still burned but...

She looked at her hand. The Mark was still there but it was different, better. At this size it looked almost pretty—like a miniature Rift, she carefully traced her fingers over the palm of her left hand, half expecting her digits to pass through the Mark and into the Fade, but all she felt was the callous years of wielding a staff had left along the heel of her hand. Her Magic passed along through it, on its usual path circulating her body, and it felt like it had accepted the new addition to her hand as an ally now that it wasn’t trying to kill her, the connection between Mark and Magic added a pleasant thrum that took away from the bit of pain the Mark itself caused.
“Marehis you said your name was? I’m Ellie,” she said offering her right hand to the girl. She’d been going for a hand shake, but the girl was on her knees again, taking the hand and kissing her knuckles.

“Seeker Pentaghast will want to know you’ve woken. She was to be told ‘at once’, she said.”

Cassandra? “Where is she?”

“In the Chantry with the Lord Chancellor. If you are well, I should escort you to join them.”

Roderick? Maybe she wasn’t feeling better after all, in fact she was self-diagnosing herself with Roderick-itus, she was allergic to the Chancellor and if she went within shouting range of such a man her throat would close up and she’d break out in hives.

But…she had questions, and she needed to know what was to happen to her. She should go to Cassandra.

And Cassandra wasn’t one for taking Rodericks crap. Maybe Ellie would get to see her lay into him again, that would clear her Roderick-itus right up.

“That sounds good,” Ellie said, moving to get up from the bed.

Her legs wobbled a bit when she put her weight on them. Marehis supported her for a moment, Ellie gave her a grateful smile.

“We should get you cleaned up, make you presentable, yes?” Marehis asked.

Cleaning up sounded like heaven for the ever rising itch in her scalp. She was sure her hair was a nightmare. The last time she’d left her locks to their own devices for so long, without brushing or cleaning, it resulted a matted mess that she’d had to cut.

Marehis had her strip—of clothing foreign to Ellie. She hadn’t realized she’d been changed out of her Mercenary coat and leggings— it’d all been brand new, provided for her journey to the Conclave, and the last she remembered it was torn and stained and honestly looked and smelled like it’d been fished from a sewer. The clothing she was in now, or was stripping of and carefully laying aside on an actual bed, Maker it was big and soft!

The Elf girl had her sit on the floor in front of the fire and brought over a large bowl full of water setting it on the floor alongside a pitcher of more water. The box she’d been bringing in actually had potion from ‘Healer Adan’ Ellie was to take upon waking, and a few bars of soap wrapped in wax paper. Marehis unstopped the potion for Ellie and timidly informed her that Adan said to drink it all.

Hmm…she’d already felt better but left-over aches abandoned their claim on her body and she was feeling a bit more awake now.

The Elf then took up a cloth, soaked it in water, and wrapped it around a bar of soap, washing Ellie’s back while Ellie scrubbed her arms and legs with a wet cloth, feeling so much better as she watched her skin turn red from her scrubbing.

Water was poured onto her head then. Marehis insisted her hair would survive, it just needed a good cleaning, so Ellie sat with her knees tucked up under her chin while the Elf worked with the bird’s nest on her head.
Her left arm was wrapped up in a bandage, something cool and wet was slathered between the bandage and her skin, she peeled the cotton back to peek at her injury, but it was just a bruise. Bruises, four rings of varying length around her wrist, a smaller fifth on the opposite side. Surely, they were not something to be bandaged?

“Does it hurt still?” Marehis asked as she poured something that smelled like flowers into her hands, rubbing them until it became a thick lather before massaging it into Ellie’s hair.

“Oh, no, I was just looking,” she said, smoothing the bandage back into place.

“Healer Adan was amazing, my lady. Your wrist was broken when he first examined it—hairline fractures he said. That was three days ago. It was in a cast the first two days, the bandage now is just to keep from getting the ointment for the bruising everywhere.”

Ouch, yeah. She remembered popping her wrist good when she’d gone toppling off the fence, but she hadn’t realized it’d been broken—the pain lost to too much adrenaline and healing elixir. Having a healer on hand was nice, she’d have to seek him out later and thank him if she could.

Ellie squealed in surprise when the entire pitcher of water was poured over her head, rinsing the soap away.

“Apologies my lady, I should have——”

Ellie’s squeal dissolved into giggles, and she cut the girl off. “Thank you, Marehis.”

“Thanks aren’t necessary, my lady,” the Elf girl said as she worked to dry Ellie’s hair.

When the Elf was done with her work, Ellie’s hair was clean, brushed, and braided, of all things.

Marehis was a Mage, she simply had to be—some level of magic had to have been involved because Ellie’s hair either sprang out in every direction or could be forcefully trapped in a hair tie, there was no in between.

Then the clothes she’d woken up in. A button-up tunic and pants made of soft gray linen, the material almost felt like pajamas it was so comfortable she realized once she redressed.

And the buttons. The buttons weren’t like any Ellie had seen before—they were like stone. Gem stones. They were heavy, and they sparkled.

Maker she’d blacked out and woken up in another life. Again.

She may still be headed for execution but at least it was in style?

Magic did not find that funny in the slightest. Worry wart.

“Shall we, my lady? Seeker Pentaghast will be pleased you’ve waken.”

Ellie nodded and Marehis held open the cabin door for her. What she found on the other side was astounding.

A crowd of people were gathered at the entrance to her cabin nestled just to the left of the gate for Haven. They were lined up on either side of the path to the Chantry, and they all stood in silence, armored ones that looked like soldiers stood with a fist to their chests in salute, and they watched Ellie as she emerged from her quarters.

She was suddenly very embarrassed, and so very glad Marehis had insisted she clean up before leaving to meet Cassandra. Maker, why were they all just staring at her? Then she was overwhelmed with the fear that these people might be about to riot—throw rotting food at her, call for her death, spit in her face.

She felt Marehis standing at her side and began following the path to the Chantry, barred on either side by a wall of people—all of Haven, just lined up to look at her.

“That’s her!”

“She’s the one who will seal the Breach.”

“They say the Maker sent her…”

“…why did Seeker Pentaghast have her in chains?”

“Hush!”

Murmurs broke out among her audience, and very little of it made any sense, but everyone seemed excited and pleased with her? She certainly wasn’t going to question it.

She pushed open one of the doors to the Chantry and Marehis followed her inside, closing the door behind them and then Ellie looked to her.

“What is happening, exactly?” Ellie asked.

Marehis gave her a reassuring smile, and took a hold of Ellie’s hands, squeezing them. “Everything will be explained, you’re safe here. Seeker Pentaghast has seen to it. Come, I’ll take you to her. She’s in the War Room.”

She released Ellie’s hands and started leading her through the Chantry, down the main hall all the way to the door opposite the entrance. Shouting could be easily heard through the door—Roderick screaming about how the prisoner had failed, and she should be sent to Val Royeaux for trial and execution.

The Elf gave the door a knock before popping her head inside, after a moment she opened the door fully and gestured for Ellie to enter.

She’d been wondering what a War Room was. It was apparently a room with a big fancy table with lots of books and maps, and people shouting at each other over who to kill.

Cassandra and Leliana stood around the table with Chancellor Roderick, red faced as ever. The Seeker met Ellie’s gaze and gave her an approving nod, Leliana even sent a small, pleased smile her way.

Chancellor Roderick had his own way of expressing his exuberance at Ellie’s recovery.

“Chain her!” he commanded the guards standing at the entrance to the War Room, “I want her prepared for travel to the capital for trial.” Hadn’t anyone told him it was rude to point?

“Disregard that, and leave us,” Cassandra ordered coolly, the Inquisition soldiers saluted her and left the room.

Roderick glared at the Nevarran woman, “You walk a dangerous line, Seeker.”
“The Breach is stable, but it is still a threat. I will not ignore it,” Cassandra warned.

“The Prisoner is still a threat!”

“Am I still a suspect?” Ellie asked. Her Magic wasn’t afraid of her execution anymore—not that it had accepted it was happening, but more like it was certain it wouldn’t happen.

Roderick turned his glare on her, and it had her shrinking back, she would have stepped backward if Marehis’s hand hadn’t gone to the small of her back.

“You absolutely are,” Roderick seethed.

“No,” Cassandra firmly corrected to Ellie’s great relief, “she is not.”

Leliana spoke then: “Someone is responsible for what happened at the Conclave, someone Most Holy did not suspect. They may have died with the others or have allies who yet live.” She stared directly at Chancellor Roderick, leveling an accusation.

“I am a suspect?!” Roderick asked, appalled.

“You, and many others,” Leliana assured.

“But not the prisoner?”

“We heard the voices at the Temple,” Cassandra defended. “The Divine called out to her for help. I saw with my own eyes, Eleanor come to the Divine’s aid. She has assured us she had no ill intent in her attendance of the Conclave and we have since verified her testimony.”

“Really?” Ellie asked, surprised that…well…she’d been able to do that. How?

“Of course, Eleanor,” Leliana said, chuckling lightly as she explained, “you were most earnest in your interrogation, and you’re a sweet girl but that alone isn’t enough for anyone to take you at your word. Under the guise of fellow mages, my agents were able to track down members of Ostwick circle who knew the Mage Trevelyan, and Apostates present at the meeting he called. There was such a meeting, Eleanor was in attendance, and she was selected to represent them peacefully at the Conclave.”

Ellie had to keep herself from rambling off all the questions that came to mind. Who had they spoken to? Was everyone okay?

What about those who’d known Trevelyan? Did they know he’d passed?

Had his family been told?

“Thank you,” she decided to say instead, “that must have been so much trouble.”

Roderick had other thoughts on Leliana’s work. “You have the word of criminals to back up the word of a criminal? Ha! What of that thing on her hand? Her survival of the Conclave—of that so called ‘attempt’ to seal the Breach?”

“I thought I was going die sealing the breach,” Ellie insisted, “I did everything I could—”

“And yet you live.”

Ouch. That had Ellie shutting right up.
Cassandra looked as if she might strike the man. “Have a care, Chancellor,” she said in low dark tones. She turned her gaze to Ellie directly then. “Listen well,” she stressed, “Eleanor’s survival was providence. The Maker sent her in our darkest hour.”

Ellie’s first instinct was outright refusal, but Cassandra had been trying to say something she couldn’t say in front of their audience. She wanted Ellie to confirm her accusation.

Okay. She was not about to say she was some sort of savior sent by the Maker.

He was the Maker. He might strike her down where she stood!

Instead, she offered up something that had yet to fail her, the Chant: “Though all before me is shadow, yet shall the Maker be my guide.”

“We lost everything,” Cassandra said, and there was a light to her eyes that said she was very pleased with Ellie’s cooperation in front of the Chancellor. “Then out of nowhere, you came.”

“The Breach remains, your Mark is our only hope of closing it,” Leliana added. “The Left and Right hands of the Divine pronounce you innocent of all crime in relation to the Conclave and offer our assistance in sealing the Breach.”

“Divine Justinia is dead! You have no such authority, no resources, this entire thing is a farce!” Roderick hollered, his face turning an even deeper shade of red as he gestured wildly to the walls around them. “These people following you, they work for the Chantry, these soldiers were here for Justinia, and they will follow me back to Val Royaue to serve whoever we elect Divine. You two, are done. The Prisoner will be coming with me.”

Cassandra laughed…in a way that wasn’t pleasant, that made Ellie mildly afraid of what the woman was about to say. It was a dark, humorless sound that spoke of the Chancellor’s foolishness.

Ellie wasn’t sure where the woman had been keeping the book that seemingly materialized in her hand then, but Cassandra slammed down a thick, heavy tome with the eye of Andraste emblazoned on the cover. It fell on the table with a thud.

The color left Chancellor Roderick’s face then.

“Where…where did you get that?” he asked.

“You, are the one who has no authority on this matter. Predating the Divine’s death, Justinia bequeathed this writ to us, with well documented commands to call to order the reinstitution of the Inquisition,” Cassandra said. “Those soldiers, our commander, spy master, ambassador—we are all recruits under the flag of the Inquisition.”

“Surely the Prisoner—”

“Eleanor,” Cassandra stressed the name, “was never a captive of the Chantry. She was our prisoner and now, she will act as an agent of the Inquisition,” Cassandra’s eyes met Ellie’s then when she added, “should she so choose.”

“Really?” Ellie asked. “Y-you want me to work with the Inquisition? As what? Designated Rift sealer?”

“We can discuss a proper title later,” Cassandra said, a lilt of amusement in her tones, “but yes.”
“This is utter nonsense,” Chancellor Roderick objected, weakly.

“Never fear Chancellor, we want no quarrel with the Chantry,” Leliana said, dismissing the bearish man. “Once you’ve returned to Val Royeaux, take some time to regroup. We’ll be in touch.”

Roderick grumbled under his breath before pounding his fist on the table, but he stomped away. Marehis’s hand shifted from its place at Ellie’s back, to her elbow to pull the girl out of the way before the man could knock into her as he barreled blindly from the room.

“Thanks,” Ellie said quietly to the Elf girl, she returned her attention to Cassandra and Leliana. “So… the Inquisition? You really want me to join?”

“We do,” Leliana said, “your Mark is vital to sealing the Breach. We have people now working on figuring out what went wrong with your original attempt. In the meantime, Rifts have appeared all over Thedas. They need to be sealed.”

Ellie nodded. “You got it.”

“There is more to it than just the Rifts, than even the Breach, Eleanor,” Cassandra said. “The Divine had other reasons for calling the Inquisition to order, you understand.”

It dawned on Ellie then, “Oh! Divine Justinia reinstated the Inquisition before the Conclave—but she couldn’t have known the attack or the Breach.”

“We can’t ignore the Breach, so it is now our primary concern,” Leliana confirmed, “however Justinia called for the Inquisition for a single purpose.”

“We’re going to bring peace to the rebellion,” Cassandra said, “And if you are willing, you are to help.”

“Me?” Ellie asked. “I mean, I get I’m a Mage but…I mean, I’m just me? How am I supposed to help you end the rebellion?”

“After the events at the Breach, you Eleanor, were proclaimed widely as a ‘Herald’ sent to us from Andraste, delivered to us to save the world from the Breach,” Cassandra explained. “In these times, people need a symbol of hope, and a vast majority has decided that you are that symbol.”

Oh. That is why Cassandra hadn’t wanted Ellie to refute being sent by the Maker in front of the Chancellor. Whatever abuse he spewed over the Inquisition, his insults would carry the rumor of the Herald into validity.

Maker.

“Your job would not just to be to seal the Breach Eleanor,” Cassandra continued carefully, “We are asking you to represent the Inquisition, as the Herald of Andraste. We would use that status, and your efforts with the Inquisition to help bring peace to Thedas end this war between Mages and Templars.”
Cassandra had been concerned about throwing so much at the girl all at once. Eleanor was visibly shaken by the news of her...well, fame. She’d gone from being accused of the single-most horrific act of terrorism in modern history, to being named as an actual Herald of Andraste herself.

It was a major swing, and much would be asked of her.

Marehis had intervened in the midst of the talk, putting her arm around Eleanor, and suggested they give the girl a moment. It was then the other women in the room realized the girl had been shaking, about to topple over. Cassandra pulled a chair from the side of the room and instructed Eleanor to sit, to breathe because it looked like she’d forgotten how.

“I know this is a lot to adjust to, Eleanor. Were the situation not so dire, I would not dream of even proposing such a thing,” Cassandra said quietly as she knelt before the girl. “Are you feeling unwell? Shall Marehis fetch the Healer?”

That seemed to grab Eleanor’s attention. The girl’s head snapped up and Cassandra was actually surprised at the anger her question had put in Eleanor’s eyes.

“Marehis doesn’t fetch, and just what is this handmaiden nonsense?” Eleanor snapped, she looked to the Elf woman and amended, “It isn’t that I don’t truly appreciate you, I mean you’ve been so great, and helpful, and you’re wicked good at braiding hair,” she insisted, “but you’re a person, you shouldn’t serve anyone!”

Oh goodness. Did the girl think Marehis a slave?

“Everyone serves something, Eleanor,” Leliana said, clearly amused. “You don’t yet understand the gravity of the situation, of your role with the Inquisition, but Marehis’s job is vital. If it would trouble you less, you should know that Marehis is not necessarily a handmaiden.”

That had Eleanor looking up at the Elf woman questioningly. “Then...well what are you, then?”

Marehis leveled the girl a gentle smile, but then she hid the grin behind her hand as she physically fought openly laughing. A fight she lost.

“I’m sorry,” Marehis apologized as she calmed, “I-you just- you realize that’s the Lady Seeker you’re s-snapping at like a Mabari pup? Ohh,” she deftly wiped the corners of her eyes, “Da’len, I work for Leliana—I’m a Nightingale agent. I’ll act as an undercover bodyguard for you —my job is to ensure your safety as well as assist you with day to day tasks. My position as your handmaiden gives me cover to always be at your side without revealing myself as an actual threat to any who would seek to bring you harm. You’ll come to find the element of surprise is extremely beneficial. Too, I’ll be more easily able to interfere in attempts to kill you through the servant staff if I’m considered one of them.”

That had the girl blanching ghostly white. “Bu-but who would want to kill me?” Eleanor asked, “Do people still think I killed the Divine? Won’t the Inquisition finding me innocent uh... fix that?”

“Yes and no,” Cassandra said. “We can offer facts, but we cannot control people’s minds. There will be those who hold resolute to the idea you are responsible for the events at the conclave. However, there is also your newfound Herald status. While many find hope in the prospect of a Herald, there are those who see you as a threat. And there are also the people behind Conclave explosion to consider.”
“Once they realize you not only survived their attack but can also thwart their plans and seal the Breach, they will come after you,” Leliana assured her.

That was hardly the way Cassandra would have put it to the girl, she was scared enough as it was. Yes, the threats against her were numerous, but she would not face them alone.

“The Inquisition will protect you, Eleanor. You must trust us, and follow our orders, especially when it comes to your personal safety. This is all very frightening I’m sure, but we are prepared to help you in every way we can,” Cassandra promised. “For what it is worth, I myself along with Sers Solas and Varric have volunteered to be members of your personal party.”

“It’s not the kind of party that involves dancing, is it?” Eleanor asked, as if despite her inherent clumsiness, she half hoped it were.

“No, though if it were, Varric would surely spike the punch,” Cassandra said, attempting to joke with the girl, perhaps it would help stop her from looking like she was still staring death in the face. It seemed to work, as Eleanor did smile at least a little then. Good.

“Your party,” Cassandra went on to explain, “refers to the group of people who will join you in your journeys to close the Rifts and assist our allies in times of need.”

“Allies?” Eleanor asked.

“If you’ll allow me a moment, would you care to meet someone who could better explain that?” Leliana asked. Eleanor nodded, and Leliana left the room.

She’d gone to get Josephine no doubt. Perhaps Cullen as well. it would appear Eleanor was about to get a crash course in how to save the world.

“Are you truly well, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked while they had a moment.

“I’m alright,” Eleanor said, though her reassuring smile seemed to take more effort. “I mean this is all just…crazy, I’m pretty sure I’m still in a coma or something or maybe dreaming some crazy story Varric’s put into my head.”

“You remember him sitting with you when you were ill?” Cassandra asked.

Eleanor nodded, and she kicked her legs a bit. A sign of nervousness? Or restlessness? Ahh, nerves. The girl said, “I remember you too. At least I think it was you—you recited the Chant for a while, I’d hear it every now and again. It was nice.”

“I am glad it was of comfort,” Cassandra offered. “And your Mark, does it ail you?”

Eleanor seemed to debate that for a moment, looking at the glowing Fadelight in the palm of her hand. “No, nothing like it did before. It still burns but it’s kind of like…like I scrapped my hand up or something. It’s loads better—it was all the way to my elbow just before I tried closing the Breach, it’s practically tiny now,” she said holding out her hand to Cassandra, so the Seeker could get a better look.

A sense of relief washed over her as she examined the glow of Fadelight glimmering peacefully in the palm of Eleanor’s hand, no longer the all-consuming threat it had appeared when the Breach was spreading.

“That is good. You are to tell someone if it begins to spread again, or the pain becomes too great. Healer Adan is remarkably skilled and will be glad to assist you.”
“He’ll want to see you now that you’re awake,” Marehis said. “Give you another check up to make sure everything is as it should be.”

Leliana returned then, followed by Josephine, and Commander Cullen.

Eleanor went a bit pale when she saw the Commander—Cassandra had heard Solas’s assurance to Eleanor that the man was a former Templar, but the girl had been running from them all her little life. It was a wonder she didn’t start throwing spells and attempt to get away on instinct alone. She didn’t have a staff, but in true urgency, Cassandra had seen Mages capable of casting without.

But no, the girl instead rose to her feet and welcomed them.

“Eleanor, this is Lady Josephine Montilyet, and Commander Cullen Rutherford—our Ambassador, and our forces Commander.”

“A pleasure to meet you, Lady Herald,” Josephine said with a curtsey.

“We met briefly in the field,” Cullen said as he held out his hand to the girl. “I am pleased you survived.”

“Me too,” Eleanor said as she shook his hand. And then as if worried she’d said something wrong she elaborated, “I mean—I’m glad you survived too, not just me.”

Cullen chuckled lightly, half smiling as he said, “Well thank you for that. I look forward to working together.”

Eleanor’s attention turned to Lady Josephine then and her hand went to the top button of her tunic, “You’re the Lady Josephine that got me these clothes? They’re lovely.”

“I am pleased you like them,” Josephine said, she began scribbling something down on the clipboard she held in hand. “Now that you’re awake we can schedule a proper fitting—I’ll make arrangements to add some more variety to your wardrobe. Would tomorrow afternoon work for you?”

Eleanor’s eyes widened at that and she seemed like she wasn’t entirely certain how to respond. “Um…sure? But uh, why?”

Josephine visibly tried to parcel out what exactly the girl was questioning. “A fitting—a tailor, a maker of clothing, will come and measure you so they can design outfits that will fit you appropriately.”

Eleanor giggled. “I got that part, but this had to be expensive,” she gestured to the clothes she had on now, “why do I need more?”

“Ahh. My apologies my Lady,” Josephine said, having the grace to flush at her assumption of the girl’s knowledge or lack thereof. She rested her quill in the inkwell atop her clipboard and said, “As ambassador for the Inquisition, I’m to acquire us Noble allies. You, as the Herald of Andraste will be a point of interest for them. You will sometimes have to go meet with them personally, while others will come to visit Haven—they’ll want to actually see the Inquisition before offering their assistance, and they will want to be introduced to you. You must be able to look the part while entertaining their company.”

“You really want me to represent the Inquisition like that?” Eleanor asked as if she thought us all mad. “I mean, I’m just…me. I’m an Apostate. I don’t have any kind of uh…formal upbringing. You can pile all the fancy clothes you want on me but putting lipstick on a nug doesn’t make it a lady.”

“Oh, my,” Josephine hid a smile behind her hand at the girl’s…very eloquent way of putting things.

“I do not believe it would be much at all like putting lipstick on a er…nug,” Cullen said, Cassandra could practically see the gears turning in his mind as he sought through his own experiences having a sister and giving her a compliment that wouldn’t embarrass or insult her. “The clothing will help your image, but you’re a lovely girl all on your own.”

“Oh, yes certainly, I did not mean to insinuate otherwise,” Josephine assured the girl.

Oh. Did they think the girl disparaged her looks? Did Eleanor think she wasn’t suitable? She was awfully skinny yes—concerningly light when Cassandra had carried her from the Breach—but she was hardly ugly. She was a little awkward, but no more than any other girl her age. She was pretty, even.

“Cassandra informs us you are fifteen?” Josephine asked. Eleanor nodded. “What sort of education have you received?”

“Not much other than some instruction on magic from fellow Mages,” Eleanor admitted. “I uh…moved around a lot.”

She ran from Templars a lot, Cassandra suspected she meant, but hadn’t thought it polite to mention in front of the Commander.

“I will see to it you receive tutelage in the ways of proper society,” Josephine said. “You’ll learn basic etiquette, and how to carry yourself in front of our Noble allies.”

“Solas has offered to help you train magically,” Cullen said, then nodding to Cassandra he added, “We’ve spoken of it at length, and Cassandra and myself would also like you to study other forms of combat—self-defense training, really.”

“You are quite capable with your magic,” Cassandra elaborated, “but should something happen, and you cannot cast to defend yourself, you will have something else to fall back on.”

Eleanor looked mildly alarmed.

“I understand you might be uncomfortable with my being a former Templar,” Cullen said, “Cassandra would do a majority of the instructing I would just be there to assist her with demonstration.”

“Oh, golly, no it’s not that!” Eleanor assured him, shaking her head. “I just…I mean I don’t much like the idea of hurting people.”

“There is a war going on Eleanor, you may well have to fight people, though we would see to doing that for you as much as we can, we cannot leave you incapable of doing it yourself,” Cassandra said. “You must remember, there are those who would see you dead, you will have to stop them from succeeding, even if it means the loss of their life instead of yours.”

Eleanor was quiet for a moment, thinking their words over carefully. “You're right, I understand. I’ll be happy to learn what I can from you, Commander, Lady Seeker.”

“Aside from your schooling, there are other benefits you will receive from the Inquisition,” Josephine said, gesturing for Leliana to take up the explanation.

“You will be paid just like any other Inquisition agent, Josephine will render your money to you every week,” Leliana said, “The cabin you woke in is yours, and you have the run of the estate. You may go anywhere you wish though we ask you to not stray too far from the property for safety sake. Marehis will take you to meet Flissa once we finish up here—she runs Haven’s Tavern, where you can take your meals. Then there is Seggrit, he keeps commerce going within the camp with his shop. Quartermaster Threnn is stationed just outside the Chantry, you should go to her if you’ve need of anything such as blankets or toiletries.”

“I will see you meet Master Harritt,” Cassandra added, “he is our blacksmith, we need to outfit you with proper armor and weaponry.”

“Oh, yeah, I didn’t see the staff I had at the Breach back at the cabin,” Eleanor said.

Ahh. “Do not misunderstand Eleanor, you were not unarmed intentionally. I merely did not think to pick up your staff when we made our retreat from the Breach. I do apologize.”

“Oh gosh, it’s no problem—I’m just glad you thought to pick me up before retreating,” Eleanor said. “The Breach was scary. I’m pretty sure if I hadn’t absolutely had to face it, I’d have forgotten my own head running from it ‘every man for himself’ style.”

Cullen actually barked a laugh at the idea. “You were so resolute in facing the Breach, and here I was thinking you had nerves of steel.”

Eleanor shook her head her smile sheepish as she said, “Nah, they’re more like mush, but the whole ‘end of the world’ thing firmed them up a bit.”

“I believe that covers everything. You will have anything you need to carry out your duties to the Inquisition, Eleanor,” Josephine said. “Welcome to the Inquisition, Herald of Andraste.”

Herald of Andraste. That was just. Crazy. Blasphemous even. But the Maker hadn’t fried her yet, so Ellie was going to take that as the ‘okay’ to play along. So far, being a Herald wasn’t so bad.

Marehis led her through Haven, taking her straight away to the Tavern to meet Flissa when their meeting ended—Ellie’s stomach finally acknowledged that she was in fact awake, and it wanted fed now. Flissa was said to have food, so Ellie already liked her.

She liked her even more once they were introduced. She was sweet, and really pretty, and she only minorly freaked out about the whole ‘Herald’ thing. For a moment, Ellie had worried the woman was going to bow to her or something, like Marehis had when she’d woken up.

Huh. That was super weird. Marehis was already back to behaving like a timid servant girl waiting for orders to be barked at her. When they’d been in the Chantry, in the War Room with the ‘advisors’, she’d been different…more certain and almost powerful, like she was strong and capable, and she knew it.

But Ellie noticed how people regarded the Elf that followed her everywhere. Or more like how no one regarded her—that was probably what that was all about then. Marehis didn’t want to be seen as a threat, so she played skittish, for that ‘element of surprise’ thing she’d talked about.

Ellie didn’t really get it, but she was grateful no matter what. Marehis was kind, and she enjoyed her company. She always had her magic with her, but there was something different about walking around Haven with someone like a friend at her side—it reminded her how she felt traveling with Trevelyan.

Oh…she missed him…

“Is something the matter, my lady?” Marehis asked. Ellie realized she’d been seated at the bar just staring into space instead of eating the stew Flissa had placed in front of her. Flissa was staring at her now, as if afraid she’d done something wrong.

“Oh! No, sorry! I’m a real space-case sometimes,” Ellie said, hoping that smiling at Flissa would make her stop worrying, though the red head only truly relaxed when Ellie took up her spoon and tasted her stew. “Oh wow! This is delicious, thank you Flissa.”

“Oh, yay,” Flissa said, a little breathless. “I’m glad. Should you need anything more just let me know,” she said as something over Ellie’s shoulder caught her attention, and she took up the pitcher on the counter and went to refill someone’s mug.

When Ellie was done—eating every last bite leaving the bowl clean after Flissa offered her a roll to mop up the last traces of stew—she waved good-bye to the bar maiden and followed Marehis up the stone steps to Healer Adan’s cabin.

She stopped at the top of the stairs and a happy gasp escaped her lips, followed by,

“Solas!”

“Lethallan!” Solas greeted her just as exuberantly, obviously pleased to see her awake. He more readily accepted the hug Ellie half-strangled him with, throwing her arms around his neck and squeezing. “I’m glad you’re well, da’len, how are you feeling?”

“A lot better now! What about you? Were you hurt at all at the Breach?” she asked.

Solas shook his head. “Nothing of note but I thank you for your concern. You’ve seen the Seeker?”

Ellie nodded. “Uh-huh, I just got done meeting with her, and Leliana, and Commander Cullen—you were right, he’s nice—and I met Lady Josephine, she said you were going to teach me?”

The Elf seemed nervous, shuffling his feet a bit affirmed, “Ahh, yes. While I have no formal magical education myself, I believe if we worked together we would benefit from the practice, perhaps I have experience you could learn from,” Solas explained. “I believe I’m to meet with Lady Montilyet this afternoon to discuss final details. She’s to compose a sort of schedule for you—so you can divide your time between all of your studies.”

“Mmhmm. They apparently want me to learn proper etiquette and hitting people.”

“That sounds counter intuitive, but I trust the good Ambassador’s judgement,” Solas said jovially. “I do hope you find our lessons beneficial, some of what I do can be…rather boring I’ve been told.”

“Well, you’re being told now that I think we’ll have fun, I’m excited to learn,” Ellie promised.

“You may change your mind once we start on meditation,” Solas said, “but that is for later. Now, I shouldn’t keep you, you were on your way to see Adan I suppose?”

Ellie nodded. “I’ll see you later, okay? Oh! Varric isn’t around, is he?”

“The Child of the Stone has a tent—if you pass the Tavern to head for the gates, you should find him there, if he isn’t in the Tavern proper.”

Huh, Child of the Stone? Solas sounded kind of snippy, like he wasn’t all too happy with Varric at the moment. “Thanks, I wanted to check in on him, too. I’ll see you later, alright?”

Adan was a brilliant healer…and also very grumpy, but that was sort of endearing really. He had this gruff-caring manner about him, which Ellie supposed made him best suited for the job he had. He had to be no-nonsense and clinical, but still care enough to have compassion when his patients needed it.

“Glad to see you’re still breathing. You’re welcome for that by the way,” he grumbled when she and Marehis entered his cabin.

“Oh yes, thank you so much,” Ellie said in earnest.

“Eh. Just my job. Let’s see, take a seat and we’ll go over a few things. shall we?”

By seat, he meant on top of the desk in front of him, so she was seated eye-level with him, her legs dangling. He asked her question after question as he scribbled furiously on his own parchment covered clipboard.

The Inquisition was doing a great deal of boosting sales for office supplies, that’s for sure.

He used a little wooden hammer to test her reflexes, and then took her bandaged wrist to check her pulse before examining beneath the bandage and he was pleased with how it was healing. He asked her questions all the while, trying to discern what level of amnesia she was dealing with that kept her from recalling the events at the Conclave.

“All in all, you’ve no physical injury keeping your memory at bay,” Adan reasoned out, “it seems whatever happened your mind wishes to protect you from. You may never recall what happened at the Conclave, or your memory may return to you, only time will tell.”

More questions came then. How much and how often did she consume alcohol? Had she ever lived in an area afflicted by the Blight? When was her last menstrual cycle?

Her what?

“Hmm. Need more meat on your bones—you should have begun bleeding years ago, but I suspect in time, with proper nutrition, it’ll happen. When it does, come see me for draught and bandaging, though Threnn has stores for that specifically, as well. Regardless we should likely discuss birth control methods. Are you active?”
“Oh yeah, all the time,” Ellie said, “I mean I’ve been sleeping a lot lately, but usually I’m pretty much always on the move.”

Adan was really quiet for a moment.

Her magic thrummed with amusement at her expense.

Marehis laughed.

What was so funny?

“Ah, no,” Healer Adan cleared his throat, “I meant sexually active.”

Maker! Ellie could feel herself turning bright, bright red. “I don’t—that isn’t—I mean—gosh. No!”

“Nothing to be embarrassed about,” Adan assured her, “it’s just important to keep track of. Sexual health is just like any other kind of health—you’ve got to be safe and it would probably be best if you avoided pregnancy right this minute.”

Yeah, pregnancy was a big Nope!

“Not a problem!”

“Do uh…do we need to have the talk or anything? You know how everything works, yes?” Adan asked.

She’d spent the better part of her life moving around taverns and squatter camps. She’d seen enough to know what was what. “Yup, yup, yup. I’ve got the gist of it, we’re all good.”

Something seemed to occur to him then and the Healer said, “Pregnancy may just be a worry when coupling with men, but it isn’t the only concern. There are also sexually transmitted diseases you can come by whether your preferences are male or female.”

“My-I- that doesn’t particularly matter to me. Gender I mean, not STDs—you can catch some wicked stuff that messes your magic big time when you’re a Mage,” Ellie was quick to explain, “I just haven’t…I never stay in one place too long, and the whole ‘one-night stand’ thing—it just hasn’t ever appealed to me.”

“Well. Good. If there are any changes and you have questions or have an interest in protection let me know.”

Yeah. That was gonna happen. Ellie was pretty sure after this conversation she’d bleed out before willingly setting foot in this cabin again. Sexually active. Gah! Just embarrassing!

Adan, however, thankfully moved on, “Now, let’s take a look at your Mark.”

An Inquisition messenger had interrupted her check-up to tell her Cassandra was waiting for her with the blacksmith. Which offered an excellent excuse to leave the moment Adan was finished.
Marehis was still way too giddy over Ellie’s nice little ‘safe-sex’ chat with the Healer. Way. Too. Giddy. The nerve! The Elf girl was practically cackling as Ellie left the Healer’s cabin, still three shades redder than she’d been when they arrived. Her magic was still giggling in her blood.

“That was not funny!” Ellie insisted to both as she stomped away, heading up the path towards the front of the Chantry, and diverting down to head for the gate.

“No, not at all, my lady,” Marehis said, mirth practically seeping from the words.

Ellie groaned in frustration.

“Tumbles! You’re alive!”

“Varric!” Ellie had been about to go down the stairs to the gate, when Varric’s voice had her spinning around to look at him. The Dwarf was standing by the fire going in front of his tent, she’d almost forgotten Solas saying that’s where she’d find him.

“I feel a lot better—thanks for keeping me company when I was sick,” Ellie replied.

“Don’t sweat it,” Varric said with a dismissive wave of his hand, “it gave me the chance to test out some new story material.”

“All this shit is weird, I figure I should write it all down at some point,” Varric said with a shrug. He looked at the Elf following Ellie around, “Got yourself a shadow?” he asked.

“Oh! Yeah, this is Marehis—she’s my uh, handmaiden,” Ellie said, introducing them, “Marehis, this is Varric Tethras.”

“Oh, an honor to meet you, Master Tethras!” Marehis greeted enthusiastically with a bow.

“Handmaiden, huh?” Varric asked in tones of doubt. “Lady Nightingale’s good. Smart. Keep an eye on Tumbles for us, yeah?”

Marehis smiled and gave him a subtle nod.

“Wait,” that was twice now. “Am I ‘Tumbles’?”

“Yup, the nickname muse has spoken, and that’s what you got, you okay with that?” Varric asked.

Ellie laughed. “Eh, I’ve been called worse.”

“Yeah well, anyone does, just let me know and Bianca will have a word with them,” Varric said. “Seeker tell you about uh, partying together and whatnot?”

“Uh-huh!” Ellie giggled at his phrasing, “Yeah, she said you and Solas volunteered to go with me to seal the Rifts.” And then she had a thought, “You um… you did volunteer, right? It sounded like you weren’t exactly here by your own will earlier. You’re not still captive, are you?” she’d have to do something if he were.

She wasn’t sure what. She was decent at escape plans by now. Off the top of her head she could think of five that would get her out of Haven by nightfall, but she wasn’t quite sure how well they’d work for Varric. Three involved a great deal of climbing, though the other two would require flirting with key guardsmen, and he seemed the persuasive sort.

“Nah kid. Don’t get me wrong, you’re not the only one the Seeker kidnapped and interrogated, it’s a hobby of hers I guess. But she’s made it perfectly clear I’m welcome to leave anytime. Figured I’d stay where the story is. I want to get that thing out of the sky and figure out what the hell all that Red Lyrium was about.”

Red Lyrium?

“That awful red stuff at the Breach? That was really Lyrium?”

She’d never seen anything like it. She remembered hearing rumors about Knight Commander Meredith from Kirkwall—that she’d gone mad with power after using some sort of devil’s Lyrium and turned into a large…statue…but Ellie hadn’t been quick to believe such a thing.

After seeing the Breach though, anything seemed possible. And if the Lyrium at the Breach had been the same thing rumored in Kirkwall, well…it was definitely something evil. Ellie had never been so cold in her life, and the hellish heat rolling off that stuff sent shivers down her spine.

“Creepy Lyrium. Makes people super powerful, and super crazy—I’ve seen it first hand, it’s…bad. And I uh, well I have my own ‘people’, they keep reporting that crap is popping up all across Ferelden. Orlais too, nodes of the stuff that need destroyed.”

“If we find any, we’ll blast it up real good, promise,” Ellie said, offer her hand to shake on it.

“Sounds like a good deal,” Varric said, shaking her hand. “You busy now? I’m thinking of heading over to Flissa’s for a drink.”

Ellie shook her head. “Thanks, but I’ve got to meet Cassandra at the smiths. Solas might join you though.”

“Oh, I’m sure he will, since I’m buying for him,” at Ellies inquisitive look he said, “Eh. Said something I shouldn’t’ve—you don’t want to know.”

“Try to stay out of trouble, yeah?” Ellie asked.

“I can try Tumbles, but trouble’s pretty good at finding me,” Varric said, winking before he headed for the Tavern.

“Varric Tethras huh,” Marehis said, “Do you think he’d sign my copy of Tale of the Champion?”

Cassandra had been ready to storm the grounds of Haven in search of the girl, when she emerged from the gates, Marehis in tow, laughing about something Varric had said.

Ahh. The Dwarf had kept them. Typical.

“Heya, Cassandra!” Eleanor greeted brightly. The Seeker was glad to see the smile on her face was easily brought, and genuine. Their rather extensive conversation in the Chantry War Room had been arduous and Cassandra thought that if she’d been in Eleanor’s shoes, she would have run.

Perhaps the girl didn’t think she could—thought the Inquisition would hunt her down. Or perhaps she stayed because she’d been told she would be cared for. She hadn’t spoken much of her life before the Conclave, but it had sounded like one of solitude, running from Templars, and inconsistency in safety, meals, and comfort.

“Good, you’re here,” Cassandra said, nodding to the young ladies as they joined her. “Harritt is ready to meet you, if you’ll just follow me, we’ll see you get proper armor.”

What unfolded was rather amusing to say the least. Harritt was usually a man of few words, and people not working the forge were almost immediately ejected from the area. But two minutes of Eleanor’s exuberance and outright fascination at the inner workings of the forge had Harritt proudly giving them all a tour of his facilities. He explained what each workstation was for, how Eleanor herself would be able to use some of them if she wished—the man promising to assist her with any project she took up, and to make sure she didn’t leave the forge with fewer fingers than she arrived with.

The Seeker wasn’t wholly certain the girl should actually use any of the forge’s machinery at all. So many moving parts, and tools, and chances for the girl to hurt herself, but she seemed to take Harritt’s words of caution and safety protocol to heart.

He then led them to his cabin, popping open the door and giving the one roomed space a thorough look around, checking the security of the boards over the windows—nailed shut for the cold months—before he left them, telling Marehis where she could find measuring tape and parchment to take down Eleanor’s sizes.

Cassandra offered the girl privacy and watched the door as she stripped and let Marehis measure her. For some reason it reminded her of her own days as a young lady at court—or a young lady with overbearing aunts trying to trick her into presenting herself at court.

“Stop fidgeting, da’len.”

“I’ve got my tits in the wind here and its freezing.”

“I’m almost done and—cut that out, no tip-toes. You’re the height the Maker made you, deal with it,” the Elfin woman chided.

“Make sure to hold your breath when she measures around your ribcage,” Cassandra offered the advice suddenly.

“Huh?” Eleanor questioned.

“The armor guarding your vital organs will be not very pliable. If it is made to fit snugly when your lungs are full of air, it will always allow you to be able to breathe easily with it on,” the Seeker explained as she thought back to her own first fittings. While hers had been for some horrendous dresses Cassandra was apparently to wear in order to ‘catch a man’, it was a similar concept, with dissimilar results she hoped. She’d never actually worn the dresses, she hoped Eleanor would be happy to wear the armor Harritt would craft for her.

Cassandra heard Marehis scratching lines through her parchment before resuming her measuring.
The Elfin woman worked quickly and soon Eleanor was fully clothed and doing some sort of half-skip walk back out to the forge and rushing over to where Harritt stood next to the fire, arms tucked to her chest as if she’d caught the heat in them and was clinging to it.

She truly had been ‘freezing’ as she’d put it. Her clothing was long sleeved and legged, but perhaps Cassandra should put in a reminder to Josephine to see about getting the girl a proper coat. Her armor would be fitted with an over coat, but the girl did seem to chill easily. She wondered briefly if perhaps Threnn would have extra blankets on hand.

“All finished? Well done, I’ll have your armor to you shortly,” Harritt said. “In the meantime, let’s see about a staff. What kind of core are we looking for? Elemental or Spirit? I’ve got most everything at hand for Fire or Lightning, but Seggrit owes me good. You’d have to wait a while for the staff to be crafted, but he’d get you Ice Essence if you needed.”

“Oh, no need,” Eleanor assured him, “I think…” she looked to Cassandra then, “I know I’ll be expected to fight, but I can still do that with a Spirit focused staff—I’ve got a few fire spells and one wicked cool lightning spell under my belt.” Ahh. Cassandra recalled her lightning spell, and supposed if she were more comfortable with magic, she too would term the feat ‘wicked cool’.

“Having a Spirit focused staff though,” Eleanor continued, “would lend to more attacks on the interior of a person, and even more so to just acting as a defensive caster rather than offensive. Barriers, dispelling, and the like.”

“You know your capabilities better than anyone else,” Cassandra said, measuring her words carefully. “I do understand the sentiment—but if you believe I’d think you a coward for seeking to defend the party rather than work on the offensive line, you’re mistaken. I know you are brave, and I trust you to do what needs to be done.”

Eleanor blushed at being called ‘brave’ apparently, “Oh gosh. That’s sweet of you to say, but I was asking for uh…a tactical outlook I guess. What would best suit the party.”

Cassandra thought it over. “Spirit will do, Solas is our only other Mage, and his staff is Elemental—Ice oriented, I believe.”

“Spirit it is then,” Harritt said, “I’ve a few on hand you can choose from. If none are to your liking, just take one for now and we’ll set to crafting a custom staff—it shouldn’t take too much time, it mostly depends on the materials needed.”

The blacksmith had Eleanor examine the staffs he had. With his permission she held each one in turn and sent a pop of magic would emerge from the palm of her hand into the staff, and she watched carefully how it coasted both up and down the length of the staff, as if testing how her magic would glide from it in combat. Two of the staffs she took from the forge and walked down the dirt road in front of Harritt’s forge, going past his cabin to test them in the clearing that dipped down towards the docks sitting atop Haven’s frozen lake. She tested them more vigorously, casting larger spells—Barrier, Cassandra assumed from the lack of visual response from the staff, and then a spell that spilled fire before the girl.

In the end, she picked the staff that had produced the lesser amount of fire when she’d cast with it—a tall, dark wood rod capped with something that reminded Cassandra as the head of a mace, only the points more rounded than sharp.

“It’s more my speed. The other uses just a bit too much of my magic for where I am right now,” she leaned a little on the staff as she explained, and her skin gleamed a thin layer of sweat from her testing. She must still be weary from the Breach, she’d only just recovered, and Cassandra worried she’d pushed the girl too soon—she hadn’t realized all that would go into selecting a weapon. She’d thought Eleanor would just look at the staffs and pick whichever one appealed to her visually, though now she realized that had been a foolish assumption. She, herself, would never do such a thing when selecting a sword.

“Then you’ve chosen well, Eleanor,” Cassandra said with, what she hoped came across as encouragement. “I have a meeting soon with Leliana. Do you have need of anything?”

The girl shook her head. “All good here. Thanks for introducing me to Harritt and helping me pick out a staff.”

“Yes, well. I suppose we will speak later then,” and then, “I do not believe there is anything else that needs your attention today if you wish to rest. Josephine will have your schedule delivered to you later this evening. Dinner is usually ready in the Tavern by six, Flissa keeps it warm well into the evening for late night shifts.”

Eleanor scratched the back of her neck—a nervous habit Cassandra knew, the Commander did the same thing when he was nervous. Was she embarrassed at being caught feeling tired? “Yeah, I could probably go for a nap right about now. Oh!” she looked to her Elfin companion then and said, “Unless, er, would that bother you? Would you be bored?”

Marehis gave the area around them an appraising look before speaking more candidly, “I am sure I can find something to occupy my time. You needn’t worry so, my lady.”

Cassandra walked alongside the two as they made their way back through Haven’s gates to return Eleanor to her cabin.

The Seeker paused at the steps leading up to the Chantry yard and watched to make sure the girl made her way safely inside her quarters.

The following week was…interesting.

Pinpricks hurt, but punching can hurt worse.

Marehis was amazing.

And Druffulos will hunt you down to the ends of the earth if you disturb their naps, but they have an all-encompassing love of Elf Root that makes them forgive any sin.

Ellie’s own nap after meeting Cassandra had turned into lying comatose for neigh some eighteen plus hours.

She was startled awake by a very very very Orlesian tailor starting her fitting as she slept—she woke up to measuring tape wrapped around her wrist and a thick Orlesian accent asking if she was a fan of ruffled sleeves. Josephine had scheduled her fitting for the afternoon, but Madam Florna Vanoran was subject only to the Maker’s will, therefore time had no meaning and there were no such things as personal boundaries.

She’d been measured six ways to Sunday*—much more invasive and chat-riddled than Marehis’s work. Lady Josephine appeared moments after the tailor, yawning discreetly and apologizing that she hadn’t perceived Madam Florna’s early arrival—‘I’m not early darling, the Inspiration is upon me, the Maker fills me with His vision for our fair Herald now! —and began taking up the job of fielding Madam Florna’s bajillion questions about Ellie’s tastes.

Her tastes consisted of what was available and fit alright. The Mercenary coat Trevelyan had outfitted her with was so warm the most sturdy clothing she’d ever hoped to own. Then the Inquisition—Josephine—had provided the most beautiful clothing she’d ever been in the presence of let alone worn. So, Ellie stood as still as she possibly could even though she really really had to pee, and half listened to the back and forth between tailor and Ambassador as they discussed her future wardrobe at length.

As they continued to talk she realized just why Madam Florna had been selected as tailor. She’d heard of what happened at the Conclave, heard the rumor of the Herald of Andraste, and then, when Josephine had put feelers out for a tailor, physically leapt at the opportunity to serve her Maker by tailoring for, what she termed, ‘the love child of the Maker and Andraste made flesh delivered to save the world from the Breach’ which made Ellie’s flesh crawl. It was equal parts blasphemous and yuck.

Anyway. The woman, eccentric as she was, was a well-established tailor who covered her own traveling expenses and would provide the Herald of Andraste with clothing free of charge. Though Ellie suddenly suspected the woman would exact her payment in blood when she started in with the pins. Ellie had slept in a nightshirt Marehis had gotten from the Quartermaster. Madam Florna came already prepared with nightgowns and something she termed ‘play clothes’. Apparently, they were more plain garments meant for roughhousing—she could get them dirty and torn and it wouldn’t particularly matter, she was to wear them for training with Cullen and Cassandra.

She tried every single one on, and Madam Florna made sounds of disapproval or elation depending on…whatever her internal thought process was working out. She tsk’ed and ‘ah-ha’d while cheerfully pinning the clothing to fit Ellie better, though this resulted in quite a few accidental jabs. The first caught Ellie by surprise, made her flinch and hiss a little “Ouch!”

That resulted in Madam Florna dropping her pincushion altogether and falling to her knees apologizing profusely for ‘spilling her sacred blood’. It took the Ambassador a moment to convince the woman she hadn’t…er…sinned? And Ellie promised she wasn’t upset, and even picked up the pincushion and offered the woman’s weapons back.

She kept quiet and still throughout the rest of her fitting ignoring any accidental pricks as the woman finished her work. She gathered her pinned garments carefully and followed Lady Josephine to the Chantry where she would sew them up to fit Ellie.

As soon as they disappeared from Ellie’s quarters, Marehis reappeared with a tray of breakfast—that was two meals in a row!—and a mug of something warm full of milk that made Ellie feel like she could run laps around Haven for days. Coffee, Marehis informed her, and it was grand.

It did, however, make sitting Ellie down for etiquette lessons…difficult. She’d been bouncing out of her skin while Josephine sat with the patience of a saint and taught her how to sit, stand, and walk like a ‘lady’. Day one passed with very little sitting, no actual standing still, and a very unladylike, fast-paced walk back and forth along the confines of Josephine’s office. Throughout the week though, her lessons improved, and she was well on her way to differentiating between the shrimp fork and the dessert fork, due in no small part to Marehis taking the initiative to start Ellie’s morning off with a bracing glass of water and saved the coffee for after Josephine’s lessons. In time for her combat instruction from Cassandra and Cullen. Coffee and combat actually Madam Florna had made quick work of her ‘roughing clothes’ and Ellie changed into the plain grey pants and whitish long-sleeved tunic—one she could just pull over her head, no buttons gemstone or otherwise. They were perfect, warm and comfortable, and the Orlesian tailor was absolutely elated with Ellie’s praise of her work.

Cassandra and Cullen awaited Ellie at Haven’s gates mid-morning, every morning. By day three she’d been hoping maybe they wouldn’t show up, maybe cancel her lessons, or at least maybe her sore limbs would fail her, and she’d fall and crack her head open, never to lift her arms to punch or her legs to kick, ever again.

Day one, she’d been on the tail end of her coffee high, had a few left-over jitters that went towards fueling her nerves over her lessons.

Firstly, there was the whole ‘fighting’ thing. Commander and Seeker both assured her that she would not come to harm in their lessons, right out of the gate—literally, they said this as they led her through Haven’s gate, out onto the practice field, to train in the empty space to the left of their soldier’s tents.

“Oh gosh, I didn’t mean I was afraid you’d hurt me—it’s fighting I’m gonna get hurt sometime,” Ellie explained; “I don’t want to hurt you!”

That declaration had ended in Cullen chuckling and scratching the back of his neck as he looked to Cassandra for some sort of appropriate joint response. The Seeker, however, snorted and gave a half-laugh before turning her back on Ellie as if she could hide her amusement.

“You uh…you don’t have to worry about that much, Eleanor,” Cullen offered.

Cassandra cleared her throat, and was all business when she faced Ellie again, “Most surely not. We are professionals—we have been fighting and taking hits since well before you were born. Put that worry from your mind.”

That out of the way there was also the matter of…well…the instructors themselves.

Cassandra was intimidating and Cullen…well, he was a Templar. Former Templar whatever, Magic did not trust him. It was a fight they were having—Ellie trying to reassure her magic that Cullen was on their side, Magic trying to convince Ellie that they were in danger every minute they let that man lull them into a false sense of security. It sewed doubt in her blood, made her have to stop and breathe through the moment of panic that spiked through her when the man was too close, moving too fast, and she knew he was going for the kill.

That backfired on Magic, in the end.

It had taken a handful of times—she’d passed it off as simply not being used to the routine, she’d only woken up yesterday from being so sick, and she didn’t usually fight like this. That had been believable only so many times in so many minutes—they’d gone from Cassandra getting ready to sling Ellie over her shoulder and bodily forcing her back to bed if she was wearing out so easily, to Cullen motioning for the woman to give them a minute, and slinging an arm over Ellie’s shoulder, sitting her down on the short flight of stairs that lead to Haven’s gate.

He sat her down, and he asked,

“Do you know, Eleanor, where a Commander keeps his armies?”
She thought about it. It was a rather broad question—here, Inquisition forces had tents, some of them may even live in the cabins around Haven. The practice fields? The battlefield? Was he referring to himself, or to Commanders in a general sense?

So, she answered as honestly as she could, “No,” she said, because, she didn’t know.

Cullen gave her the most solemn nod and sighed as if he’d expected as much but hoped for better. Patted her on the knee reassuringly. And then he looked her in the eyes and stoically answered:

“He keeps them in his sleeves.”

...what?

Was he on something? She knew Templars took Lyrium, did it make non-mages loopy or—

Oh Maker, Andraste, and all the Dalish gods. Armies. Arm. ies. He keeps them in his sleeves.

“What is so amusing?” Cassandra called over to them from where she’d been pacing, back and forth between the soldiers’ tents and Harritt’s smith.

Ellie was having too great a giggle fit to answer the Nevarran woman properly, but Cullen just shook his head with a smile and waved her off that it was okay—they certainly hadn’t been laughing at her.

Though the lady Seeker too, did indeed keep her armies in her sleeves.

“I’ve been told humor is a decent ice breaker,” Cullen explained, “Rift sealing didn’t seem to do the trick for us, and neither did our polite exchange of white lies in the War Room.”

White lies?

Oh. When she’d promised she was fine with his being a former Templar.

It hadn’t totally been a lie, she assured him. She was fine with it. Or she wanted to be, at least. She might just have a little bit of bad experience when it comes to her being an Apostate Mage and dealing with Templars.

And then he told her he didn’t trust her either. She was an Apostate, who’d never been Circled let alone been through a Harrowing. His every instinct said she could be demon possessed in a heartbeat, that practicing with her like this—with fists and eventually with blades, anything could happen, bruises were a definite and ultimately, either through bloody noses or split lips or slashes through flesh, blood was a certainty at some point.

But they had a common goal, a shared affinity for bad puns, and a place to build mutual respect. So, he promised her he would ignore his Templar principles and see her fully trained to face the challenges ahead. And she pinky swore that if she was about to get demon possessed, he’d be the first to know—after all, what sort of demon would ever laugh at ‘keeps his armies in his sleeves’?

Magic relaxed more about Cullen after that—mostly because it feared he’d just sit it down with Ellie again and have another chat because that was definitely not the goal it had in mind, but regardless, it stopped with the panic making and took Ellie’s lead in regard to the Commander and how much she trusted him.
Their lesson continued much more smoothly, until Cassandra insisted Ellie show her how she might usually throw a punch. Ellie informed her she hardly ever threw anything other than spells, and once (regrettably) a whole cooked chicken to defend herself.

The Lady Seeker insisted it was all wrong, watching Ellie punch the thin air, and assured her she’d only manage to injure herself balling her fist with her thumb tucked between the palm of her hand and her fingers.

Ellie got the whole ‘proper fist’ thing down. In the ‘hold your up your fist to me. Yes good’ way. But in actual practice, it didn’t help much at first. In their first spar, Cassandra had removed her gauntlets stripped of the metal breastplate, leaving her purple leather armor—still no fun to hit, but Ellie was supposed to be less likely to hurt herself than if the Seeker had worn metal.

The woman could have worn a thick layer of cotton wool. Ellie still would have forgotten, struck out of her usual instinct, and ended up with a broken thumb because the one blow she managed to land against the woman had been a punch, was done, as Cassandra had warned her, ‘all wrong’.

Their first lesson ended with a trip to see Adan, who’d wrapped up her hand and given her potion that tasted like chalk and dirt. Cassandra and Cullen dropped her off at the Tavern for lunch afterward with promises that they’d pick up where they’d left off later, and surely, she would get better as they practiced. By the end of the week, yeah, she was doing marginally better—Cassandra dubbed her suitable enough for a full-blown party outing soon. She was doing well with her training with Solas and could in fact hold her own sans magic in an absolute emergency should she have to.

Varric, Solas, and Marehis always kept her company during lunch. Josephine even made the odd appearance in the Tavern when she learned the Herald was eating there instead of having her meals delivered somewhere less…crowded, as Josephine usually did, having Flissa send her meals to her office. Josephine had not disliked the experience and said she would do so again, but also passed along an open invitation to the Herald to have lunch in her office sometime. Ellie put it in her mind to take her up on the offer—Josephine was nice and compassionate, and she was always so soft spoken in a way that soothed even Ellie’s magic. But she liked eating in the Tavern at lunch with her…well…friends?

Marehis was always around during her lessons—mostly somewhere she could keep an eye on everything going on around Ellie, while looking like she was cleaning, or reading, or simply watching Ellie get knocked on her butt (socially, physically, whatever). She sat next to Ellie every day at lunch and quietly discussed the things she observed about Ellie’s lessons—how she was doing, and if they had the place mostly to themselves as they sometimes did, the Elfin woman offered advice. Like good advice. While Cassandra and Cullen were wonderful and patient with her, it was Marehis’s advice that rocketed Ellie’s improvement in her training with them, bless the woman.

Varric made a point of eating lunch with her—Ellie realized as much on day four when he’d stumbled into the Tavern, just finishing up tying his pants and clad in his night shirt, his usually neat-ish bun completely fallen, hair hanging disheveled around his face, and he looked like he was still asleep even as he staggered into the bar, Solas at his back, looking like he’d taken a blow to the face—a book, she found out later, had been thrown at him for his trouble when he’d gone to wake the Dwarf at Varric’s own insistence, for lunch. Poor Solas.

He too joined their lunch brigade. Day one he’d been in the Tavern with Varric, politely sipping at a mug of tea Flissa had misguidedlly given him. She saw ‘Elf’ and thought he’d appreciate a cuppa, though apparently, he disliked tea altogether. He’d appreciated the sentiment though, so he’d accepted it. Varric suggested he put some whisky in it. Solas suggested he would, if the Dwarf didn’t drink the Tavern dry of the stuff.

For all that the nickname Chuckles was to be ironic, Ellie thought Solas had a wicked sense of humor.

It became habit, a common sight in the Tavern, the Herald sandwiched between two Elves, and seated across from a half-asleep Dwarf.

Ellie did try her hand at…well…matchmaking to some extent. It was hard to do when one of the people was just about as dense as they come to romantic advances, and the other had the eyes of a hawk, ever seeing every intention behind everything. Marehis had appreciated her attempt at making it so she and Solas could sit across from each other—maybe the position would prompt more discussion between the two—but she could get her own dates. Ellie didn’t see how the woman had any time for dating when she was constantly hanging around her. But Marehis insisted she needed no such thing.

Ellie would succeed though, she was sure. Solas didn’t mind Marehis’s presence at all he’d said at one point during their lessons, which Ellie took as a massive sign that the man had some interest in her guard. And Solas was so tall, and had a nice voice, and was gentle in his mannerisms, and just so very, very smart. Ellie would have a crush on the man, she thought, if he were not so um…older…and perhaps less bald. His head admittedly looked like a hard-boiled egg and while that was wholly shallow…it just didn’t do anything for the girl except make her think of breakfast. Which was good, such an infatuation would be entirely inappropriate and likely unreciprocated. Solas, she found, did not exactly fit in with most Elves, but she saw him. He didn’t have eyes for any of the Humans, man or woman, and there were plenty of handsome and beautiful people working with the Inquisition, Dwarves, Humans—Lady Josephine was almost breathtakingly beautiful, but like his egg-shaped melon did nothing for Ellie, the human form did little for Solas.

Would it be so bad for the two Elves to…keep each other company? The Inquisition was hard work, and it was easy to get lonely even when surrounded by an entire army of people. Surely no harm would come of a little romance with the Elf.

Matchmaking aside, Solas and Ellie did well in their practice together.

They worked mostly inside Solas’s cabin unless they were using a great level of magic that needed open space or generated enough heat on its own to keep them warm in the elements. Solas did not seem to mind the cold, though he insisted it was just as much to his benefit as it was to Ellie’s that they meditate by the fire. It also made Marehis’s job a little easier, Solas offered her a chair, and she sat in the entryway, just before the cabin door.

Marehis turned pink when Solas removed the vest of his apprentice coat and dropped it over her shoulders with the concern that a draft often swept up under the door and might chill the woman.

Ellie briefly wondered then what she should do if the two did start a romantic relationship. Could Marehis afford a moment of privacy? Or would Ellie just have to stop up her ears and close her eyes or something so the two could kiss or whatever? Maybe she could meditate.

Despite Solas’s earlier worry that Ellie would be entirely bored with their lessons, he seemed pleased to find that just the opposite was true. ‘I told you’, Ellie had said. She was a Mage of her word!
Meditation was a major focus of their work together, especially the first few days, though it was something they always began, and sometimes even ended, every lesson with. When the man first described the practice, it was…boring sounding. But after a bit of fidgeting—finding the most comfortable way to sit on the stone hearth next to Solas—and some much-appreciated assistance from Marehis who started humming, no words though the sound in her throat sounded like if there were, they would be in Dalish from the tone, the cadence, Ellie began to more easily slip into a state of just being, and being still. It was…pure relief.

Ellie could usually find something good in most anything—she had to, if she didn’t she’d just be miserable her whole life. There was lots and lots and lots of good with the Inquisition. Lots, she wasn’t nutters. But there were these thoughts that sort of twisted a path across her conscious mind.

She wasn’t worthy, she deserved none of the good the Inquisition brought, how dare she benefit from this, how dare she survive when all others had lost their lives at the Conclave? How dare she live the best sort of life she’d ever had at the cost of some hundreds of lives?

And everything was happening so quickly. What if she failed? She already had, she’d failed to seal the Breach before the Maker and everyone. But they were giving her another shot? Why? What if she failed the Inquisition further? Embarrassed them in front of their potential allies? Brought shame to them through her weakness in the field?

What if she just couldn’t do it?

What if she couldn’t be the Herald?

What if she should have just died on that mountain, with Trevelyan?

And yet you live. Roderick had said.

Meditation did not banish those thoughts from her mind permanently, but for a while she could sit and plunge her mind deep into her magic where thought couldn’t follow, which suited her just fine. It was beyond relief to be still for a moment every day and not feel anything about her thoughts—good, bad, benign—to find peace from the words swirling ever constantly in her mind the way they did from the moment she woke to the moment she tried to get some sleep.

Magic may have made her biased, but Solas’s lessons were by far her favorite.

When they weren’t meditating they either worked on spells they knew together or practiced ones they were learning—the Elf knew much more than Ellie, but Solas seemed to be purposefully incorporating spells they both did not know into his lessons. The best way to learn was through teaching, he reasoned, and they both benefited from looking at the spells and seeking to assist each other in better understanding how they would work.

And when they didn’t cast, they talked shop. Of theory and the Fade—Ellie did not actively seek out the Fade in her sleep as Solas did, but she loved the tales he had to tell from his own experiences. Marehis would even ask them questions from time to time that promoted their discussions into interesting directions with a non-Mage trying to better understand magic, and the Mages themselves.

The idea that demons were multifaceted creatures—beings with higher purpose that had merely fallen from their intended place was beyond fascinating. Wisdom and Purpose sounded like spectacular forces to encounter in the Fade, and Ellie listened openly to Solas’s somewhat stilted explanation that he believed demons were merely spirits corrupted from their original purpose. He delivered what was basically a speech on the subject with tones of defense, as if he expected Ellie to tell him he was a fool for thinking such a thing or make a mockery of his ideas.

When she confessed she’d wondered the same thing—if there were Spirits and there were Demons, was there some connection between the two other than being opposing forces, were they related or were they one in the same on some level? They discussed the definite idea that Spirits could be corrupted and turn demon and debated whether or not such a thing could work in reverse. Solas was skeptical—people did not change, why should demons be any different?

Ellie argued that his view was full of logical fallacy. The concept was: Spirits can change into Demons. They already changed—proving change itself was possible. Was it so silly to think that if they could become evil, they could also become good again? Be reminded of their former purpose and be reunited with it?

That conversation had them talking long into evening—Marehis had actually looped her arms through theirs, pulled them up off the floor of Solas’s cabin and escorted them to the Tavern for dinner, the two debating the entire way hardly noticing they’d changed location. It was only when dinner was before them and Marehis cleared her throat sharply, that their attention returned to something other than their discussion.

Marehis offered only a few reminders for Ellie to not speak with her mouth full. It was fruitless, and even Solas was guilty of the act—catching himself and quickly swallowing his food half-chewed so he could finish his sentence with little interruption.

In the end, the Elf woman settled their argument for them. No matter Solas’s opinion on the matter, Marehis believed if Ellie sat down with a demon the way she did Solas and talked their ear off for the better part of seven straight hours, they’d ‘become any Spirit she damn well pleased’ just to quiet her.

That had Solas agreeing with Marehis, and Ellie sticking her tongue out at both of them.

Her entire afternoon wasn’t solely for studying with Solas—there was a block after lunch for about two hours Josephine believed she should dedicate to her practice with magic. After that… well, sometimes, Josephine said, there would be important meetings or dinners she would have to attend, though that could be said any day at any time, Josephine would keep her schedule up-to-date, so she always knew where she needed to be and when.

For her first week though, she did have time free and clear to herself after her lessons with Solas—which sometimes wound up being dedicated to debate with him—but more often gave her the opportunity to check out Haven. She stayed mostly within the walled portion, visiting the Chantry, exploring the place with Marehis. The furthest away from the walls she would go was to the warmth of Harritt’s forge to watch he and his own recruits work—though he’d banished her when she discovered he was working on the final touches for her armor. He only wanted her to see work ordered specifically for her to be seen once it was complete—which she supposed made sense, that’s how it worked for everyone Harritt crafted for, they hardly had the time to pop around his smith and check over things. Sometimes, if they did not seem busy, Ellie would stop by the field tents and chat with Cassandra or Cullen—though he was usually always occupied, she often just sent him a friendly wave. Her talks with Cassandra were usually short, the woman seemed like she was pleased to chat with Ellie but did not always have much for conversation. She was very reserved when it came to questions about herself—Solas had been too, at first, but Ellie got that. He was an Apostate too, casual details dropped carelessly in conversation could mean life or death, getting to stay in town for the night, or being on the run from Templars before you had the chance to settle.
Everyone had stuff, baggage or whatever, so she didn’t take offense when Cassandra likewise treated Ellie’s questions with suspicion, as if she thought the girl wished to pry information from her to use against the Seeker.

That sounded more like Cassandra’s thing to be honest. It was kind of her job description. Ellie just wanted to know more about the woman because…well…they’d be working together. She hadn’t worked much with others before, but her time with Trevelyan had taught her that people worked together better when they understood each other. Like he’d gotten her fear of spiders out of her and handled them for the most part when they did encounter the creatures while passing through a cave that was supposed to be a short cut to the Temple of Sacred Ashes.

That had revealed Trevelyan’s poor ability to navigate. Ellie was no scholar, but she was decent at following a map, so she’d taken over their course from then on. Knowing where one was weak, meant knowing where the other needed to pick up the slack.

Truth, to some extent, was Cassandra’s strength, so Ellie just went with that—being honest about why she wished to know about the Seeker made the woman return the favor. Ellie learned she’d been correct about Cassandra’s accent—she was Nevarran born and raised. Cassandra’s parents had passed when she was young—executed for treason, she admitted. That was…sad. Ellie hadn’t known her parents, sometimes she wondered, but if she’d actually known them and lost them, she wasn’t sure how she’d feel.

She did remember an orphanage when she was little. Really little, she’d been booted from the home when her Fade dreams started. She couldn’t say where the orphanage was if her life depended on it—she’d been so young, and it had been in the actual middle of nowhere.

“You were a ward of the state, but the authorities didn’t contact the local Circle?” Cullen asked. He came to join them when he heard the sort of questions Cassandra was asking—where was ‘Eleanor’ from, what of her parents, when did she know she was a Mage?

“We were sort of in the dead end of nowhere. There wasn’t a local Circle. The cost alone associated with getting word to the Templars would have been more than I was worth.”

“More than you were worth?” Cassandra asked, darkly.

That had been an option discussed. Selling her off. She didn’t know what that meant then, she was only little. All she knew was her dreams were scary and none of the caretakers wished to hold her when she cried, not like she’d seen them do with the other children. They’d been afraid to touch her.

Honesty was good with Cassandra, but there was something a little too honest about all that. Thinking about it too hard made her head swim, and her eyes itchy, and her magic just…sad.

So, she smiled and breezed by the question with, as honest as possible, “They settled on just giving me the boot—it was free, and so was I. I don’t remember a whole lot.” Being hungry, and sad, afraid. “Then I realized I had Magic. I couldn’t use it, not really, but I felt it you know?” Magic had come to her comfort, gave her guidance where it could. “I ended up getting a ride to another town, and from there another. I was only little so people were sympathetic. I could say I was lost, or trying to get to family, and people had no problem allowing me to travel with them.” Not all of them with the best of intentions but wild spurts of magic had often been her saving grace in those instances. “If I didn’t mention that I’d been kicked out of an orphanage, or why, I usually got food or a place to stay for a while.”

There had been people—good, kind people—who openly made an effort to adopt her but… they would find out. If she stayed too long, if her dreams became too much to keep quiet, if her magic dared manifest itself unexpectedly, she would be discovered as a Mage and have to leave. Be kicked out again. She rather liked leaving on good terms—or at least, leaving after everyone had fallen asleep, bid her goodnight with the happy prospect of seeing her in the morning in mind. It was better to leave them with a perfected idea of her, than with the bitter truth. When people found out what she was, there was always hurt—like she’d lied to them, like they’d mistrusted her, and she knew those sentiments were true. Few just told her to get out. Some called on Templars to capture her. More than she’d care to admit had tried to take her life over her misguidance.

“The woman who crafted your former staff, she raised you?” Cassandra asked.

“Uh-huh pretty much,” Ellie said, “Ava, she was a hedge mage who lived in a town right up on the Marches-Nevarran boarder, but she was from Ansburg originally. Talked about it a little, about the Circle there. Anyway, she couldn’t officially take me in or anything—she was allowed to stay in town because she didn’t cause trouble, healed their sick. Saved the town from a flood once. They were grateful but not ‘let you bring more freak-mages into the fold’ grateful. Her village was too close to Tantervale* to be super safe for Apostates. She looked after me though, and as long as I didn’t blow my cover and reveal myself as a mage to anyone else in town, she made sure I didn’t starve, so I stuck around there a lot when I was younger. She was the first person to give me any kind of magical training. I traveled around more as I got older—it was just safer for both of us—but I always went back to visit when I could.”

“Have you heard from her since your time in Haven?” Commander Cullen asked.

Ellie gave the Commander a confused look. Because…what?

“She wouldn’t know where to reach Ellie,” Merhis spoke up, looking to Ellie, “you haven’t sent any letters since you arrived.”

Letters?

“Ahh yes, I did not think to offer it,” Cassandra started, “while Haven is not exactly a central hub of civilization we do send and receive mail. A visit so far north is not plausible at this time, but if you wish you could send word to this Ava, let her know you are safe.”

Oh. She should have explained better.

“Oh, um thanks. I appreciate the thought, but uh, no that’s not necessary,” Ellie admitted, “Ava passed away a few years ago.”

The three adults seemed to scramble for a moment, overlapping “Oh!”’s came from Commander and Cassandra.

Merhis’s hand went to Ellie’s shoulder as she said, “Ir abelas, da’len.”

“I am sorry for your loss, Eleanor,” Cassandra offered.

“My condolences,” Cullen said.

“It’s okay. Ava lived a long life—she was actually a hundred and two when I first met her.”

“Truly?” Cassandra asked, more surprised than skeptical.

“Uh-huh,” Ellie laughed as she said, “she was pretty amazing. Survived like three blights, grew up during the Blessed Age—which she claims was named such because of her birth, and I genuinely believed her for a while because I was…oh gosh I was maybe six at the time?”

That had them laughing, and not looking like they felt badly for her. Her Magic curled up like a cat settling in for a pleasant nap around the memory of Ava, sitting on her porch with Ellie at her feet, telling her stories of different brave and courageous Mages she’d come to know in her youth, people who believed in free mages and had fought for their rights. Many to the death. Most, to the death. Ava was the last of her friends.

_Yet you live._

Her magic wasn’t so comfortable anymore.

“Eleanor?” Cullen asked. “Is something the matter?”

Ellie smiled up at the Commander, and Seeker who’d been about to ask after Ellie herself. “Oh gosh, I didn’t mean to keep you. I’m actually kind of cold, I think I’ll head in. Have a great night!”

She didn’t hear their response as she set a brisk pace for the gate, Marehis rushing to keep up with her. She stopped once they were at the cabin and Marehis opened the door, for her—eyes sweeping across the single room swiftly before stepping back against the door to curtsey and gesture for Ellie to step inside.

Ellie sat in front of the fire for a while, kind of trying to meditate but it wasn’t working as well as it did with Solas’s instruction. Or maybe it was his company that helped. She wasn’t sure and settled for being warm and quiet. Marehis didn’t seem certain why Ellie was being so quiet, but she respected it, only prompting the girl to speak as dinner hour approached.

“Shall I send in an order to be delivered?” she asked.

Ellie shook her head. “Oh, no. We can go to the Tavern for dinner if that’s okay with you.”

“I am well as long as my lady is,” Marehis said. It was as close as she got to outright asking Ellie to tell her what caused her…well…moodiness. It wasn’t a _mood _really, she was just tired.

Magic expressed some concern at that for some reason. People got tired. She lived on an increasingly intense schedule now, she was always doing something, and everything, everyone was so new. It was normal.

A polite knock sounded at the door. Marehis answered to find one of the men that helped around Flissa’s Tavern with the night rush—Danner. He was nice, talkative, and always pleasant to Ellie and her friends. He stood just outside, holding a tray laden with covered dishes and a goblet of drink.

“Oh dear, there seems to be a mistake,” Marehis said in her put-on frantic tone—like a servant girl fearful her mistake would result in a slap—it caught Ellie’s attention and had her watching as Marehis stood firmly in the doorway as if to block Danner from entering. “I didn’t put an order in for my lady.”

“Ah, you’re right, must have been a mix up,” Danner said apologetically.

Marehis was just dismissing him and getting ready to close the door, when he surged forward, the door slamming against the wall, knocking Marehis back off her feet as he charged into her with the tray.
“Marehis!” Ellie screamed, hand reaching back for her staff as the man made to bound across the room towards her.

But he hardly made it three feet in the doorway. As soon as Marehis was down she was back up again, the Elf rolled backwards and popped up on her feet, tackling the man and taking his neck into the crook of her elbow choking him. In her hand she had a knife pressing dangerously into his throat—the blade not piercing but dipping a visible dent in the flesh with every intention of lodging the knife there should he continue to struggle. She got the man to his knees and held him in a chokehold until he was passed out on the floor.

Marehis came to crouch at Ellie’s side then, “Are you alright, da’len?” she asked, a hand running through Ellie’s hair while the other lifted the girl’s chin to pull her attention from the supine man and focus on her guard’s question.

“Uh-huh. He didn’t hurt me,” Ellie said, mind reeling. Danner was…he was nice, why had he tried to hurt her? And then she looked over her bodyguard about to ask if she was alright when a startled cry escaped her—“You’re hurt!”

Marehis’s shirt was soaked in blood.

Magic pooled in Ellie’s hands and she was ready to cast anything that would keep her friend from bleeding out, “Help! We need help!” she screamed at the top of her lungs. Inquisition soldiers came rushing into the room then, and Marehis evaded Ellie’s hands, to stand and face the guards.

“This man made an attempt on my lady’s life, please escort him to the Lady Nightingale at once,” she said. The men nodded and hauled the unconscious man up, slinging his arms over their shoulders to carry him off to Leliana for questioning.

“Marehis!”

“I am fine, da’len, look,” Marehis said, pulling up the hem of her shirt. The skin beneath the stain was intact, save for a few old scars across her side, but nothing brand new. “There was a goblet of wine on the tray—it spilled on me, that’s all.”

“Oh,” the word fell dumbly from Ellie’s lips as she relaxed where she sat on the floor, magic retreating from her hands. “Whoops.”

Marehis held out a hand and pulled Ellie to her feet. No sooner was she on her feet, than she immediately hugged the Elf woman.

“Everything is alright, Ellie,” Marehis said, rubbing Ellie’s back as the girl clung to her, “Things like this happen, it’s what I’m here for. Leliana will find out his reasoning and take care of it. You’re safe.”

“Yeah,” Ellie said as she pulled away, “Thanks to you.”

“It is no trouble. Now, how about we see to actual dinner, yes?”

Ellie wasn’t very hungry now, but she nodded. Marehis had her change since the wine had stained her own clothing as well from their hug. She’d still been wearing her training clothing so that was all well and good—she hadn’t messed up something meant to be kept clean.

They entered the Tavern arm in arm, Ellie waving to Flissa when they walked in, and they took a seat at their usual table, Solas was already seated there. Dinner wasn’t a steady date like lunch—sometimes it was just Marehis and her, and sometimes everyone including Cassandra and the rest of the Inquisition Advisors joined them.

“Ahh, Ellie, Marehis, good evening,” Solas said as they sat across from the Elf man. Solas sniffed and his eyes went to the drying blotch on Marehis’s shirt. “I take it you had a quarrel with a wine bottle?”

“There was an incident,” Marehis explained lightly, “a wine glass was involved, it was handled.”

“An inci—” Solas looked to Ellie, “I trust you are well da’len. Were you hurt? When did this happen?”

“My lady!” Flissa cried out, rushing over to their table empty handed, kneeling at Ellie’s side, and Ellie saw one of Leliana’s people leaving the Tavern as Flissa profusely apologized, “I do not know what happened. I’m so so incredibly sorry. I thought Danner was taking a tray to Lady Josephine, I never imagined—Leliana assures me further security measures will be put in place. You aren’t hurt, are you?”

“I’m fine,” Ellie promised, “he didn’t even get to me, I was very well protected. I’m just glad no one else got hurt. It wasn’t your fault, and Leliana will figure out how to keep that from happening again.” Saying it out loud was supposed to help Flissa feel better, but somehow it made the concept feel more solid to Ellie. She’d sort of felt panicky the whole way to the Tavern, even sitting with her friends, something in the back of her mind said she was in danger but it was slowly sinking in that she really was safe. “Don’t worry about it, okay?”

“Yes well, I’m relieved you’re alright,” Flissa rose to her feet, smoothing her apron with shaking hands. “I’ll go see to your meals straight away. Would you care for anything to drink?”

“Water, please,” Ellie said, and Marehis nodded that she’d have the same.

Flissa left them then, hurriedly setting about getting their food.

“You were unharmed I hope,” Solas said to Marehis then.

“I’m well,” she answered with a small smile, “thank you.”

“Eleanor!”

Cassandra’s voice, a bit loud for her usual greeting but she and Cullen joined them and the Nevarran woman came around to look Ellie over before she and the Commander took seats across from each other, the Seeker sitting next to Marehis. They didn’t talk about Danner, and when Flissa returned with food and water for everyone, they set about eating—though Ellie just kind of pushed her food around her plate. They sat in relative silence until Solas struck up a conversation with the Seeker and Commander about what he was planning to incorporate in Ellie’s lessons, and how they thought she was progressing with her lessons with them.

“There will be a meeting come Sunday, with the Herald and the Advisors,” Casandra said, “we will discuss our first party outing, to the Hinterlands I believe.”

That got Ellie’s attention, she dropped her fork and looked up at the Seeker, “Really?” she asked.

“Yes. I do not have many of the details—Leliana will fill us in at the meeting. Harritt sent word that your armor is ready, would you like to retrieve it tomorrow?”
“Yes!” Ellie enthused, “Oh wow, he’s really done already? I can’t wait, he wouldn’t even let me take a peek!”

“Your schedule is free tomorrow, yes? If you like, we can meet before lunch,” Cassandra agreed.

Ellie nodded, “Sounds great!” and she saw something akin to relief pass among the adults at the table when she picked her fork back up and actually ate the food she’d been given. Her stomach didn’t feel so bundled into knots like it had earlier, and Flissa’s food was good—she’d have felt badly if she’d left without touching her food entirely.

She nearly choked, however, when the Tavern door was thrown open, banging against the wall as Varric Tethras stormed into the place, crossbow in hand.

“Who messed with Tumbles? Bianca wants a word.”

Ellie was absolutely in love—full blown, till death do they part love—with Inquisition Master Blacksmith Harritt. He wasn’t anything close to Ellie’s type, but if he asked, she would marry the man, as it was the only way she could ever begin to properly thank him for what she was wearing now.

It was the most beautiful, warm armor she’d ever even dream of owning. It fit perfectly. She loved everything, the high collar, leather gloves, thick woolen leggings, and the gorgeous leather boots her toes were currently basking in the warmth of. It even came with a thick leather overcoat—and it was green! Not the scary Fade green, but a pattern of dark green and olive that were some of her most favorite colors.

How had he found that out? She remembered Josephine asking her about colors she liked but she thought that was just for the clothing Madam Florna was working on.

The man was a genius. Bless him and his mustache.

She was so warm! She could kiss him!

And she did, popping up on her tip toes she kissed the old blacksmith on the cheek. “Thank you, thank you, thank you! It’s the best!”

The man’s cheeks pinked, and he ducked his head bashfully as he said, “I hope it will serve you well, Lady Herald.”

“It truly is some of your best work, Master Harritt,” Cassandra commented as she stood side leaning against one of the forge’s wooden pillars as she watched Ellie practically vibrating out of her skin with excitement over her new armor. Next to Cassandra, Cullen sat on top of a supply crate beside the low stone wall surrounding Harritt’s forge.

“I think it’s fitting, you look very much like a Lady Herald, representative of the Inquisition,” Cullen complimented the girl. Ellie smiled at him.

“I certainly hope so, everyone’s gone through so much trouble to make it so,” she said, “I feel badly for Madam Florna, she’s been working on clothing for me all week but I’m pretty sure I’m never ever ever taking this off.”

“Oh, you’ll most certainly take it off, da’len,” Marehis assured her laughingly as she approached. She’d left Ellie in the care of the Commander and Seeker when Leliana summoned her to the Chantry for a debrief about Danner’s attack. “You must bathe, we can’t have you scaring our allies away with the smell.”

“I do like baths. I suppose I’ll part ways with my sweet armor sometimes,” Ellie said with a put-upon sigh, she patted her own shoulder as if to reassure her outfit she’d always be back.

“Come now,” Marehis said, “we should get you to lunch.”

Ellie nodded. And then she had a thought, “Are you hungry, Master Harritt?” she asked. Come to think of it, she’d only ever seen the man in his forge. Did he ever leave? “Would you care to join us?”

“Ahh, I appreciate the offer Lady Herald, but I’ve work to tend. Flissa sends my meals to the forge.”

This information resulted in Ellie rounding up the lunch brigade, picking up food from Flissa’s, and returning to the smith.

The closed off blacksmith had been reluctant at first when Ellie showed up with her friends in tow, but when he’d voiced the concern that he didn’t necessarily have a place for them to eat, he usually just ate standing up, holding the plate Flissa brought him, Ellie had simply smiled and plopped down on the stone cabin floor, and motioned for everyone else to do the same. It worked out well, they sat together, in somewhat of a circle, and ate their meals together—Solas, Varric, Marehis, and she even talked Commander Cullen into joining them, though the man had a time of seating himself on the ground in his armor. Cassandra had a meeting to attend with Lady Josephine, but she’d bumped against Cullen as they parted ways and with a hand over her mouth whispered for him to let her know how it goes. She wasn’t sure how well the blacksmith would take to being bombarded by Ellie and her motley crew.

But overall, it was very pleasant. To Varric and Ellie’s utter delight, the man was a bit of a storyteller himself. Harritt had tale after tale—funny incidents in the forge, more serious stories about interesting things that he’d witnessed back in Ferelden during the Blight, and he had twin niece and nephew who his sister wrote to him about, that were apparently always getting into some sort of trouble. His stories were just little ones about things he’d seen or experienced, but it was the way he told them that was truly captivating—something in his voice that pulled those listening in, wanting to hear more.

Eventually though, he truly did have to return to work. He thanked them for joining him and said they were free to stay or leave as they pleased.

They cleaned up and returned their dishes to the Tavern before everyone went their separate ways. Ellie, in her new armor, decided she wanted to go exploring a bit now that she was better outfitted to face the cold.

So, she and Marehis set out down the path leading from Haven’s gate, going past the soldier’s tents, into the wooded area thick with snow-laden evergreens.

“Oh wow, there’s so much Elf Root!” Ellie said, she kept finding strong Elf Root plants popping up out of the snow-covered ground, and she knelt to pick the leaves. “I wonder if Adan has people who collect from around here. We should take this to him.”
“A healer can never have too much Elf Root,” Marehis agreed, she stood with her back leaned against a tall boulder jutting up from the ground and watched over Ellie as she plucked Elf Root leaves and tucked them away in the pockets of her overcoat.

“Does someone live out here?” Ellie asked. Marehis joined her where she stood at the place where the path circled ‘round a cabin in the middle of the woods.

“I recall the healer—the one the Inquisition originally hired on, I think he kept quarters out here, but I’m not certain. He passed at the Conclave, Adan was his apprentice and took over after that.”

“Oh,” Ellie said quietly. She approached the cabin then and gently rapped the back of her fist against the door before pushing it open and finding the cabin empty of occupants. It was still furnished, a little dusty but no one lived here anymore she guessed. “I think there’s something in here.”

“What do you mean?” Marehis asked.

Her Magic sensed something—it sort of bounced in place trying to guide Ellie forward, towards something it thought was important.

It led her to a desk on the far side of the cabin, tucked into its own little nook area. There were papers scattered atop it. There was though, a packet of papers, folded together and held closed with twine.

Ellie picked it up and untied the twine to look over the parchment. Marehis approached and stood looking at it over her shoulder. Ellie looked at the words scribbled out on the page, and down at a picture drawn of elf root and a glass bottle.

Her Magic insisted it was important.

“What do you think it is?” Ellie asked.

“It’s a recipe for Lyrium potion,” Marehis said, pointing at the words at the top of the page. Oh. That's what it said. Oh!

Lyrium, that was important. Adan should see this!

“We should pass it along to Adan then,” Ellie said, folding the parchment again and retying the twine that held it all together before tucking it into an inside pocket of her overcoat.

Inside pockets—Maker bless Harritt.

They left the cabin then, it felt sort of weird poking around a dead man’s things. They followed the path around the cabin and found another gate, that lead further from Haven—to the opposite side of the frozen over lake.

There were Rams galloping around, picking through the snow for grass underneath. They were so cute. They paid Ellie and Marehis no mind as the two looked around, following the path, going down to the docks and looking out across the lake.

Ellie was filled with a sense of amazement as she took in the sight of Inquisition headquarters from a distance. She could just make out Cullen’s men sparring, and the man himself even—none had quite the curly blonde mop he sported. The walls of Haven looked small at a distance but somehow…seeing it all at once made it appear so big. The Inquisition was big. The biggest thing Ellie had ever been a part of at least.

They followed the path up from the docks, and deeper into the woods to find a clearing, snow as far as the eye could see, and at the very edge of the clearing there were mountains—tall tall mountains surrounding the area.

And there were Druffalo, big, huffy brown fuzz balls the size of ten men, they grazed like the Rams did, chomping on grass and snow. A rather large one was lying down in the snow, actually snoring, and a few smaller baby Druffalo chased each other around in circles.

“They’re so cute!” Ellie half-squealed. Little babies! Precious gifts from Andraste!

She seemed to get one of their attention because a baby Druffalo stopped their game and wandered over to the girl and her Elf friend, sniffing all the way as if they’d caught the scent of something.

“Oh my gosh, Marehis fair warning, if I get to pet a real-life baby Druffalo, the amount of happiness I will feel will actually kill me.”

The baby came near, and got close enough to knock into Ellie lightly, sniffing her and nuzzling at the pockets of her overcoat.

“Oh!” Ellie reached into the pocket and fished out a handful of Elf Root leaves, “Do you like these? You want a snack, huh?” she crouched down and held out her hand to the Druffalo, its lips tickled her palm through her glove as it took a mouthful of leaves from her hand. Tentatively she reached out with her other hand and petted the baby’s head as it chewed.

“Are we still among the living, da’len?” Marehis teased.

“I can feel my soul ascending, this is it for me,” Ellie assured her giddily.

“Any last wishes then, my lady?”

“Yes! I want you to marry Solas and name your children after me.”

“Fenedhis!” Marehis shouted the swear in surprise, slapping a hand over her own mouth in shock at having sworn at Ellie. She dropped her hand and continued, “Forgive me, da’len, but the things you say!”

Ellie just giggled in response, and the baby she’d fed made a small, happy mewling noise. “See, even he agrees with me—”

There was an angry huff, then. But it wasn’t from Marehis.

The great napping Druffalo had been unprepared to wake from his slumber, apparently, and was greatly displeased.

Even more so, by the sight of the baby Druffalo being so very close to two strange people. People tended to hurt and hunt.

“So, um…do we run or play dead?” Ellie asked quietly.

The Druffalo stomped its hooves, preparing to charge.

Marehis grabbed Ellie’s arm. “Run!”
The girls ran at break-neck speed, towards the gates out back of the old healer’s cabin, but the Druffalo caught up to them and cornered them in the cleft of the mountain side the wooden gate was built to connect with.

“Ellie, if you’ve been waiting to reveal some sort of super-secret mage power, this would be the time,” Marehis said, though she did look surprised when Ellie held out her arm.

The Druffalo paused and sniffed.

And then, almost with an air of haughtiness, it took a bite from the Elf Root leaf Ellie held out to him. Then he came back for the rest of the leaf, and Marehis was almost concerned Ellie was about to lose her hand, but the girl was quick enough to release the leaf before that could happen, then her hand went back into the pocket of her coat and she held out a handful of leaves as offering to the Druffalo.

In the end, the Druffalo meandered away from them, almost dizzily like it was slightly intoxicated. Regardless, it seemed to deem them a non-threat, and forgave them for waking him from his nap.

To be safe though, they headed back to Haven’s gates with the silent agreement that they wouldn’t be venturing back out to the Druffalo’s field any time soon.

At least, not without a fresh supply of Elf Root.

“Maker’s breath, where did you find this?”

They’d sought out Healer Adan the moment they returned to Haven. He now held his Master’s improved Lyrium recipe, flipping through the pages delicately, holding them as if he thought they might vanish if he was not careful.

“There’s an abandoned cabin. Off in the woods past the soldier’s tents,” Ellie explained. "We looked around and there it was."

“Thank you, for bringing this to me,” Adan said as he folded the parchment closed. "You ever need this cooked up, just say the word.”

“All right?” Ellie asked, “Do you think… I know you’re busy, and I actually—I’m no healer or anything—but I can follow instructions pretty well. I make a mean burn salve. If you showed me, I could make them myself and save you the trouble.”

“This isn’t a blighted school house,” Adan snapped, “but,” he relented, “you do as I say and keep out from underfoot... yeah. I guess I could show you a thing or two.”

Sunday brought about Ellie’s first official War Room meeting. She woke up as soon as grey early-morning light pierced the gaps of her cabin’s boarded up windows, sitting up and breathing in the chill night swept into her room after her hearth’s fire died.

It was weird. Everything was quiet and cold—the air felt heavy with silence, like no one else in all the world was awake just now. Which was silly, and impossible. She absently wondered where Marehis was at this hour. The Elf woman was always there with breakfast each morning, and she did not leave Ellie’s side. At night, when Ellie would prepare for bed, Marehis sat at her desk and wrote up a storm—reports for Leliana, she said, on everything they’d done that day. Ellie fell asleep to the sound of quill scratching across parchment.

Surely the woman slept. But where? Ellie’s was the only bed in the cabin. Did Marehis have quarters elsewhere?

As if summoned by Ellie’s thoughts, the door to her cabin swung open and in lumbered a yawning Marehis, carrying a bundle of firewood suspended by a leather strap she clasped in her hands, she kicked the door closed behind her.

“Oh! Good morning my lady. Did you sleep well?” Marehis asked cheerfully as she made her way to the fireplace and stirred up the ashes, prepping it for fresh flame.

“Where do you sleep?” Ellie asked instead of answering.

“Hmm, there are servants’ lodgings in the cabins near the Chantry. I sleep there with the others. Why? Did you have need of me in the night?” she asked, stopping her work to focus on Ellie, looking her over as if searching for something out of place.

“Oh! No, no I was fine, I just wondered is all,” Ellie explained.

Marehis smiled kindly and returned to getting a fire going. “Good. If you do ever need me, when I leave for the evening there are guards posted at your door. They will send for me.”

“Huh,” Ellie hadn’t thought of that. Somewhere in her mind she supposed she thought her Elf friend…omnipresent. She hadn’t known there were others working to protect her even as she slept.

Ellie yawned then and stretched a bit before leaning back, supporting herself on the palms of her hands.

“Do you wish to sleep some more? Your meeting with your advisors isn’t scheduled for hours yet. Flissa won’t have breakfast out for a while, but if you’re hungry I can whip something up.”

Huh. That made Ellie wonder when Flissa slept. Or ate? The woman ran the Tavern, but Ellie had never seen her take a meal herself. Someone should check on her. Maybe she’d eat lunch with Ellie someday, if she asked.

“My lady?”

“Hmm…I’m awake now, I don’t think I can go back to sleep,” Ellie admitted as she pulled her legs up, hugging her knees to her chest. “I… I’m kind of nervous about today. Do you think I’ll do alright? Meeting with the advisors I mean. I’m not sure what they expect me to do. I don’t know anything about…well…anything. Are they just going to tell me what to do?”

Marehis was thoughtful, she seemed to be mulling it over as she rose from where she’d been crouched before the fireplace, dusting her hands off as she stood before placing them on her hips. “The Advisors job is to advise. However, they know what needs to be done—they’ll likely give you the direction you need to go in, and options for how to go about it. just listen to them and don’t be afraid to ask questions should you have them. Cassandra will be with you, she—like Cullen, Leliana, Josephine—is there to help you.”

“Are you sure you can’t come with me?” Ellie asked.

“Now da’len, you have the aid of some of the best and brightest Thedas has to offer—if you had me to top it all off, there’d be no hope for the bad guys, we should cut them at least a little slack eh?” Merhis teased with a wink, smiling when Ellie giggled. “Besides,” she continued, more seriously, “you’ll be in the care of those I trust to protect you, it will be one of the few opportunities for me to debrief Leliana’s people on your security protocols. They need updating, and that will be the best time to do so.”

“Alright,” Ellie said. “Well, maybe I can bathe? Breakfast should be ready at the Tavern once I’m done.”

“Hmm, a sound notion. Your hair could do with a wash,” Marehis said and set about getting water and soap.

“There’s little rocks in it,” Ellie commented as she stopped scrubbing her arms with the bar Marehis gave her. Was this some form of threat? Had someone sent her a bar of soap with rocks in it in the hopes she’d scratch herself all to the Fade and die of infection or something?

“It’s Orlesian, my lady,” Marehis said as if that explained it, “an offering from Madam Florna.”

“But…why little rocks?”

“They’re grains, da’len, they’re meant to exfoliate the dead skin away and allow your skin to grow healthier,” Marehis said, amusement lilting her words as she massaged shampoo into her hair, “I would not have you harm yourself, they’re perfectly safe.”

“Orlesian’s are weird.”

“You may not want to share that thought publicly,” Marehis teased.

“Oh yeah, Lady Josephine would want me to say something like,” Ellie cleared her throat and in her most embellished impression of polite stilted speech rephrased her words, “Orlesian’s are a class all their own. Unique—singular if you would.” Singular was a new word for her, Lady Josephine used it when she meant something was ‘one of a kind’ in a bad way but didn’t want to be rude about it.

Marehis chortled. “Yes, something like that.”

Ellie much preferred Madam Florna’s other offering. The first of her new outfits was ready and Lady Josephine had approved it for Ellie to wear for their meeting today. Ellie didn’t know when it had arrived, Marehis just pulled a garment bag off a hook by the cabin door the girl hadn’t seen hanging there before and laid it out on the bed for further inspection. There was a little note attached with Josephine’s looping script.

Ellie made herself busy with opening the garment bag and pulling out her new clothing, asking casually, “What does Lady Josie say?”

Marehis took up the note and read, “To my Lady Herald, I’ve found my confidence is at its best when I feel I look my best. May your day be well and Andraste watch over you, signed Lady Josephine Montilyet.”

The clothing was…gorgeous. Just beautiful, so much so Ellie almost did not want to put it on—what if she got it dirty? Madam Florna was…eccentric, but brilliant. She loved it almost as much as her armor from Harritt.

Almost.

It was a tunic cut similarly to the one given to her upon waking up in Haven, only the fabric felt thicker—oh! It was lined! There was warm fluffy wool on the inside, bless the woman! Instead of solid gray, the outer layer of tunic was a warm, deep blue with swirling floral vines in a pale silvery blue throughout. The buttons were cut oval gemstones, dark blue with speckles of silver in them like they were miniature night skies full of glittering stars. The front of the tunic fell at her waist, but the back had more length to it, falling to the back of her knees, her pants a matching dark blue with stripes up the sides of her legs, lined in similar gemstones and the blue-silver floral pattern of her top.

Wearing that with the warm, black gloves and boots Harritt had fashioned for her armor, and Ellie could definitely understand Josephine’s idea of looking your best making one’s confidence soar. For a moment, even her Magic sang with the certainty she could take on anything and she had half a mind to march down to the Breach and give it what’s-for.

But there was breakfast waiting, and that seemed more realistically doable when she thought about it.

“Hold on, da’len, I’m almost finished,” Marehis said, working Ellie’s almost-dried hair diligently, weaving it to hang in a thick braid of curls over her shoulder.

“Won’t I get food in my hair?” Ellie asked.

“Consider it incentive to eat with the manners Lady Josephine is trying to instill in you.”

“I do!” Ellie insisted, and under Marehis’s critical stare she conceded, “Alright, I do but only when eating with Lady Josephine. Other times I eat…just a bit less proper.”

“Like a thing deranged. Your dinner is already dead on the plate, you needn’t attack it to make certain,” Marehis teased as she led Ellie from her quarters into the early morning. The air was just starting to warm from grey to yellow pale as they made their way to the Tavern.

Varric was just about to stumble into his tent when they passed—had he been out all night? What did he do?

“Good morning, Varric,” Ellie greeted cheerily. “Or should I say good night?”

The Dwarf turned to say hello and did a bit of a double take. “Tumbles? Shit, you getting married or something?”

Ellie giggled. “Madam Florna made this for me, isn’t it great? And it’s warm, see?” she rolled up her sleeve a bit and offered the arm for Varric to touch the woolen lining.

“Madam nut-case did a pretty good job,” Varric commented, “glad you’re up and chipper today. You got that meeting later with Ruffles and them? Want me to tag along and keep the Seeker off your back?”
Ellie shook her head, “Oh, no that’s okay, you get some shut eye yeah? Besides, Cassandra isn’t bad, she’ll be looking out for me.”

Varric looked at her like he thought she was crazy. “If you say so kid, just be careful. Don’t uh…don’t be so quick to trust your helpful government officials. That’s usually the safest bet.”

“The Inquisition isn’t a government-run,” Ellie said, confused.

“Tumbles, it’s the Chantry—Inquisition whatever, it’s an organization sanctioned and operated by Chantry officials. And if you think the Chantry isn’t a branch of the crown, they’ve got your head buried deep in the sand.”

This ended with Varric tagging along with Ellie and Marehis to breakfast and giving them a breakdown on…basically every conspiracy ever, it felt like. She wasn’t sure what the purpose was, and she certainly didn’t believe most of it—though his thoughts on Qunari black powder were intriguing, the idea that Qunari had actually developed the stuff centuries ago but only revealed it openly in battle because they were working on something better and keeping it under wraps by distracting their enemies with an old threat. It was the more plausible of his ideas of government-kept secrets.

Solas joined them towards the end and seemed to find the Dwarf’s enthusiasm amusing, he asked earnest sounding questions and gulped down oatmeal around contained laughter.

“We should be going, my lady,” Marehis said, bringing a halt to Varric’s lecture. “You’re due at the Chantry any minute now.”

“Oh, gosh! Is it that time already?” Ellie asked.

“You’re to discuss this week’s adventuring, yes?” Solas asked.

“Uh-huh, wish me luck,” Ellie said as she took up her empty bowl to clear her place.

“Best luck to you, lethallan,” Solas said with a nod of acknowledgment.

“You remember what I said Tumbles, don’t drink the Chantry wine.”

Ellie bent down and kissed the well-meaning Dwarf on the cheek. “I don’t much care for wine, anyway,” she said before linking arms with Marehis and dropping off their dirty dishes with Flissa.

“Good day, lady Herald,” Flissa said, waving them goodbye.

“Thanks for breakfast Flissa, it was great!” Ellie called over her shoulder.

She examined the length of hair hanging over her shoulder then to see if she’d spilt anything in it, and found something…green? She’d had oatmeal? What did she even do?

“Don’t disturb it, my lady, it’s Elf Root,” Marehis said when she saw Ellie trying to get a better look at what she’d gotten in her hair. She explained further as they entered the Chantry, “Elves do have another name for it, but it is an herb held in high regard among my people—Dalish and City Elves alike. I picked it by the stem and cleaned it to weave into your hair for health, luck, and protection. You could do with all three today I think.”

Ellie hugged her friend tightly then, standing just before the War Room door. “Thank you, Marehis,” and then, pulling away, “Good luck in your own meeting, knock ‘em dead.”
“Seems counterproductive but I’ll give it a try,” Marehis teased, smiling pleasantly before taking her leave of the Chantry hall.

Marehis had said it was time for her meeting with the Advisors. So, taking a deep breath, and getting a little encouragement from her Magic, Ellie stepped forward and pushed open the War Room door.

“…know what we’re capable of, I assure you. Suppressing the Breach will be far safer than seeking the aid of the Mages—oh,” Cullen stopped short, he cleared his throat. “Eleanor. Hello.”

“Lady Herald, good, we were just discussing how best to approach the Breach,” Josephine said. “I see you found the clothing Madam Florna has finished? They are to your liking I hope.”

“They’re so lovely, thank you—and Madam Florna too,” Ellie said, “But you were discussing the Breach? Solas and I have talked about it. He said pouring power into the Mark would make it strong enough to seal it closed.”

“Yes, we were just talking about how best to approach the Mages for their assistance,” Leliana said.

“We were discussing how best to proceed,” Cullen said, as if to imply that while that was true, Leliana was incredibly wrong. “I was just suggesting an alternative. Templars are capable of suppressing Mage’s powers. If we approached the Templars, they would hold back the Breach while you sealed it closed.”

“And I was just about to inform them that neither of those options are currently viable,” Josephine cut in before Leliana could round on the former Templar—the Lady Nightingale visibly deflated at their Ambassadors interference. Lady Josephine continued, “Neither camp will speak to us. We’ve yet to acquire the alliance of anything or anyone that would make us a force to be reckoned with. What we need, is a clear relationship with the Chantry—for them to back us as the Inquisition.”

“The Inquisition was founded by the Divine herself and its headed up by both her Left and Right hands,” Ellie said. “Shouldn’t that be enough to get the Chantry on our side? I know that Roderick fellow wasn’t…exactly cooperative, but surely there are others who would support our cause.”

“Unfortunately, Chancellor Roderick has complicated things for us,” Josephine said. “He’s railed against us such that his fellow clergy are taking his side. The Chantry still calls for your execution—they believe your claim of holiness blasphemous, and us equally so for harboring you.”

Oh. Ellie realized then, what Josephine must be getting at.

This week had been simultaneously one of the best and hardest weeks of her life. Relief that the responsibility the Inquisition wanted to rest on her shoulders would soon be a thing of the past overwhelmed the thought that everything everyone here had been doing was soon to be a waste. What was the point of the lessons and clothing and security protocols if they were just going to have her killed? She supposed they’d been trying to find an alternative all week, had hoped beyond hope that Ellie could be spared. That made Ellie feel badly then, for the Inquisition advisors. They’d gone through all this trouble, and she was certain they’d tried their best to find another way.

But it was no matter. What must be done, must be done, and she wouldn’t have them feel guilty over it. If she learned anything from the events at the Conclave, death was a certainty, and there were things bigger than herself that no one could control.

“I see.” Ellie said quietly. And then, looking at the people around her at the War Table, she smiled and resisted the urge to release the tears that threatened to spill themselves—they weren’t going to help anything. “It’s the for the best, then, really. You guys did a really great job—I know you tried, and I’m forever grateful.”

“I’m sorry, Lady Herald, I’m not sure I understand what you mean,” Josephine said as the adults in the room looked at Ellie like she’d just started spouting nonsense.

“You…you’re going to hand me over to the Chantry as a sign of good faith, right?” Ellie asked, “Use their backing to approach whoever you want, and then you use your Ambassador-ness to convince them to let me seal the Breach under their custody. They get the credit for closing the breach, and once it’s done they can execute me on the spot if they’d like. Boom, everyone’s back to their old lives in time for Wintermarch*.”

What followed was dead silence.

And then Cassandra, looking about as enraged as she’d been when Ellie first met her down in Haven’s dungeons:

“We will do no such thing!” Cassandra roared, and Ellie shrank back as the Nevarran woman snapped at her, “Do not offer up your life so cavalierly again, Eleanor, never.”

“B-but I’m the problem,” Ellie said, had Cassandra misunderstood? “I’m why the Chantry won’t back us.”

“Maker preserve us—you are hardly the issue,” Cullen insisted in scathing tones like he’d very much like to hit something, “Roderick is.”

Oh. He’d like to hit a someone. Ellie thought it might be rather fun to see the former Templar deck the Chancellor.

Finding her voice Josephine added, “Yes, quite. The Chantry is not likely to listen to my Ambassador-ness, as you put it. If we did offer you up to the Chantry you would be killed without reservation, and there would be no way of sealing the Breach. It is not you in particular they find issue with, but you are on their list. Leliana and Cassandra, Commander Cullen—even the late Divine Justinia herself, are among the reasons Chancellor Roderick has convinced the Chantry we are not to be allied with.”

Oh. Ellie had misunderstood then. Oh wow, she’d really stepped in it hadn’t she? “I’m sorry,” Ellie said, “I…wasn’t trying to be cavalierly.” She wasn’t sure what the word meant, but the way Cassandra had spat it at her made her think it was just about the worst possible thing a person could be. “I just thought that was what Lady Josephine was getting at.”

“Roderick has turned the Chantry against us,” Leliana said, “but there are those who would aid us in gaining the Chantry’s favor. In the Hinterlands there are refugees being ravaged by the war between Mages and Templars, and among them, is Mother Gisselle. A Chantry Mother who is assisting the people of Redcliff. If we reach out to her, introduce her to you as the Herald of Andraste, she will lend us her aid. If we secure her alliance, she could be invaluable to our reestablishing positive ties with the Chantry.’”

Ahh. So, their efforts hadn’t been a waste—she was to use her new armor and etiquette lessons to help the Inquisition. A scary and intimidating task, but on some level better than dying, she supposed.

“So, I’m to go and meet with her then,” Ellie reasoned out, more accurately this time.

“Yes,” Leliana said, “Mother Gisselle is in a rather precarious position. She’s in the thick of it between Mages and Templars, it is equal parts introduction and rescue mission—you’re to go to the Hinterlands and meet Mother Gisselle as well as assist the Inquisition in securing the area at large. If we help the refugees Mother Gisselle will be more than willing to lend her aide, and if we are successful in our efforts in Redcliffe, it will spread the word of the Inquisition and what strength we possess.”

“Do not pass up on opportunities to spread our name further,” Cullen added, looking as though he were trying to think of any advice he could give that might help. Oh. Cassandra was going to go with her, she knew, but Cullen would be back in Haven. He seemed like he wished he could be of more help…for all the qualms he had with Mages he really did wish Ellie well. “Anything might be significant—if you find those willing to take up a sword in your name, you are at liberty to recruit them.”

“Recruit them?” Ellie asked.

“Yes,” Josephine said. “Do not bandy about the ability just anywhere, but if you genuinely believe someone suitable to assist our efforts, you may do so. We will trust your judgement.”

“Cassandra will be there too,” Ellie said, “I’m pretty sure she’ll make certain I don’t accidentally recruit an axe murderer or something.”

“Yes, all my years as a Seeker has made me most capable of detecting axe murderers, specifically,” Cassandra drawled. “I am glad you would seek my opinion, I will do my best to assist you.”

Leliana said, “My scouts have already secured an area for an initial outpost for our forces. You will go with Inquisition soldiers and further secure the Hinterlands under the flag of the Inquisition.”

“Take the day to prepare yourself, Eleanor,” Cassandra instructed. “we will leave at first light tomorrow morning.”

Ellie nodded. “To the Hinterlands,” she said, affirmatively.

“To the Hinterlands.”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish used in this chapter:
Direth Shiral=go in peace, a common farewell.
Fenedhis=an untranslatable Dalish swear word, though just from phonetics, it looks like it something to do with the Dread Wolf, due to the prefix of ‘Fen’ ‘ed’ implies strength (the only other word in the Dalish language I’ve encountered that has ‘ed’ anywhere in it, has it in the middle, and that is the word that means ‘strength’ Suledin), I couldn’t get a read on ‘his’ however a common idea in the fandom, possibly contributed to by the creators, is that ‘Fenedhis’ holds a similar connotation to ‘crap’ or ‘shit’. That in culmination with ‘Fen’ and ‘ed’ lends to the idea that the word means ‘Dread Wolf’s strong-smelling shit!’ or ‘Wolf’s shit!’ for short.

Ir Abelas= I’m sorry/my condolences.

Noted things:
*Marehis=in case there’s any confusion, I just picked a Dalish name and gave it to the girl we see at the opening of the game, when the Herald first wakes up in Haven, and gave her a bit more of a role, playing off of what the writers laid down.
*Sunday=Thedas uses a different calendar system than RL, however the day names are the same, as exemplified in party banter, once when the day Tuesday is mentioned, and again when Bull talks about (I think, casual?) Fridays in some context or another.
*Tantervale=an in-canon city near the Nevarran-Free Marches border that cracks down heavily on Mages and Apostates. NOT the sort of place one wants to be caught out as magical. It’s one of the top three most influential cities in the Free Marches, and they enforce Chantry law to the extreme, you get caught as an Apostle and you’re not gonna have a good time.
Wintermarch= the Theadas equivalent of January. It hosts the celebration of the new year on the 1st . While you might expect the reference to mean Christmas, from the setup of the DA calendar, it seems the closest thing they would have to a Winter Holiday actually follows the New Year, so the celebrations are reversed. First Day=New Years, and the following month Guardian (February) bears Wintersend which seems to be a sort of celebration like Christmas (in that it is celebrated in a single day, unlike, Las Posadas, Diwali, Kwanza, Hanukkah, etc). While I’m uncertain when exactly in 9:41 the Conclave is held, I’m putting it in August since it’s sort of a holy month for the world. (DA uses regular August for the 8th month. Originally it was planned to name the month after Andraste—who at the time, they planned to name Augusta. However, they settled on Andraste, but named the month August as a tip of the hat to an old idea I suppose) the first day of August is the holiday “All Souls Day” which I thought might be a nice touch to the terror factor of the Conclave, however I cannot find confirmation on the actual date of the Conclave, and after reading a little more about the concept of All Souls Day, it is not the sort of day they would host such an event on, at least not in my opinion. So, the Conclave in this story falls around the end of August—enough time for those who celebrate All Souls Day to make it to Ferelden from their respective homes/places of worship. I’m still planning out the timeline for this story, it may fall within the similar timeline found in canon, the New Divine is Elected in 9:42 (marking the end of DA:I base game), but I’ve got 27 chapters planned out, and I’m accounting for semi-accurate travel times since, if one were actually in the world of Dragon Age, Fast-Travel isn’t likely a thing. Ya walking or going by horse/horse-drawn carriage. So. Realistically, I’m not sure the events in-game, completing a good portion of the missions, would be possible within a one to two year time frame, but we’ll see!
*I’m a big nerd, thanks for reading!

Questions? Concerns? Feel free to message or comment below! <3 Next Chapter

EDA: 7/18/18
The Threat Remains--Into the Hinterlands

Chapter Summary

Ellie's adventures in the Hinterlands. Still reeling from her sudden whiplash of fate, Ellie and her party journey into the Hinterlands, where there are Refugees in desperate need of just about everything, in the middle of Mages and Templars raining terror in the Crossroads, an Inquisition in need of horses, and a lone Warden in need of hunting down. There's quite a few quest markers to check off, as it were, and things can quickly get more than a little overwhelming.

Chapter Notes

Thanks again for the Kudos and comments! Enjoy! * notes and translations at the end!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Roderick had done a great deal to ensure the Inquisition’s reputation was...less than sparkling with the Chantry. And without their cooperation, the Inquisition on its own was not able to approach either Templars or Mages for assistance with the Breach. Mother Gisselle, a Chantry Mother aiding refugees of the war between Mages and Templars in the Hinterlands had heard of the Herald and wanted to help the Inquisition create positive ties between it and the Chantry.

So. Cassandra, Varric, and Solas at her side, Ellie stood in the middle of an Inquisition campsite, in all her armored glory, trying not to shake with the overwhelming mix of excitement and fear that filled her head to toe.

She was supposed to lead her party to Mother Gisselle, assist the refugees, and speak to the woman on behalf of the Inquisition in order to secure her alliance.

Maker’s breath they were serious. They wanted Ellie to do this. They were crazy—Josephine needed Healer intervention if she thought Ellie was capable of doing this.

“You okay there, Tumbles?”

“Me? Yeah, pfft,” she snorted, “I’m great. Peachy. Is that a good thing? I’ve never had peaches, so I don’t know if peachy is actually a good thing.”

“A bit too messy for my liking, but peachy does mean ‘good’,” Solas confirmed, he stood with his staff to the ground, leaning against it as he spoke, “You are nervous, Ellie, yes?”

“Just a little bit,” Ellie admitted. “Everyone has worked so hard to get me here, I’m afraid I might just embarrass you all.”

“You will do no such thing,” Cassandra assured. “This meeting with Mother Gisselle is to be considered a practice run for more delicate alliances in the future. Precious little will sway her from assisting the Inquisition. You are simply introducing yourself and giving her the confirmation that you are the Herald of Andraste, working as an agent of the Inquisition.”

“Herald of Andraste?” a pleasant, feminine voice asked, Ellie turned to see pretty Dwarf woman—ginger hair braided in a way that seemed popular among Leliana’s scouts, that was an indication of who she was before Ellie saw her armor, or the woman herself confirmed, “I’m Scout Harding, it’s an honor to meet you. We heard what you did at the Breach. Everyone’s a little nervous around Mages right now, but you’ll get no back talk here,” she promised.

“Ellie, it’s a pleasure to meet you Scout Harding,” Ellie introduced herself.

“Harding huh? Ever been to Kirkwall’s, Hightown?” Varric asked.

“I can’t say I have,” Harding replied.

“Really? That’s too bad, you’d be Harding in-”

“Varric!” Ellie reprimanded halfheartedly. The joke itself was crude but…funny. But unnecessary!

“Ugh,” Cassandra offered up her patented disgusted groan.

“Ignore him, he’s a little sleep deprived,” Ellie apologized, “please, continue. Leliana said you would have a report for us?”

“I do,” Scout Harding continued. “Mother Gisselle is down at the Crossroads helping refugees. The fighting has spread there—Mages and Templars are waring all throughout the Hinterlands. Corporal Vale has been working to protect the people, but it’s getting bad. We’ve been trying to secure horses for the Inquisition from Master Dennet—I grew up around here, and Dennet has the best horses this side of the Frostbacks. Only trouble is, we can’t get to him—we can’t even get confirmation if he’s alive.”

Oh. That was just awful. Ellie didn’t have a particular place she felt was ‘home’ exactly, though she thought if war tore apart Ava’s village, she’d feel terrible. Maker, all this was happening, and what did the Inquisition bring to aide Scout Harding’s community? A kid-Mage with a weird glowing hand. She was sure it wasn’t at all what the Dwarf woman had been expecting when she’d heard the ‘Herald of Andraste’ was coming to save the day.

“Don’t worry,” Ellie said, and offered Scout Harding what she hoped was a reassuring smile. “We’ll see to it the refugees are taken care of and get Mother Gisselle to safety. Then we’ll see about Master Dennet. I know it’s not the ideal—but no news can be good news, we’ll find him and get the Inquisition proper mounts. I’ll tell Master Dennet you were thinking of him, yeah?”

“Gosh, I’d certainly appreciate it, Lady Herald,” Scout Harding said, “Thank you, and good luck. Maker watch over you.”

“You as well, stay safe out there,” Ellie said.

Ellie felt sick—like she’d been forced to swallow a large stone and it settled a dead weight in her stomach, left her throat feeling raw. She was tired again, like she just wanted to lie down and stay there until everything was back to normal again.

They’d made their way to the Crossroads and found just what war did in the worst of ways. Mages and Templars killed each other and whoever else was around—if you weren’t an Apostate they knew, the Mages attacked. If you weren’t a Templar, you were dead as well. And in the middle, people who just wanted to live and let live.

Inquisition forces had been protecting the refugees. When Ellie and her party arrived, they’d been fighting off the Mages and Templars—neither party would listen to reason, the Templars did not even think twice when attacking even after Cassandra called for them to reconsider. The Mages…Ellie could see how easy it would be to lump them all together and label them evil and be done with it. It made her wish she could hide her staff, made her wish she hadn’t brought it with her at all.

She killed someone. A Mage boy with Inferno heading right for Cassandra, the Seeker pinned between two Templars, with Solas and Varric focused on backing her up. She hadn’t thought it would kill him, the jolt of lightning she’d cast, but he’d shaken, his body seized up, and he fell dead. It was only a second, there was no preamble, no great effort on her part, no warning just…dead. It’d been easy, much much too easy and surely life could not work that way, death was not just that easy to deal out. It couldn’t be.

It felt like everything was upside-down—usually Ellie was the voice of reason between she and her Magic but now, all she could think about was how that boy could have been someone—could have lived to choose a different path, and she’d robbed him of it, while her Magic said Cassandra—their ally, someone who was already on a righteous path—might have died, and that boy wouldn’t have spared it a moment’s thought except maybe something self-congratulatory for having taken down a Seeker.

“It is over—is everyone alright?” Cassandra called out across the field.

“I am uninjured, Seeker,” Solas replied as he went to join the woman where she stood just before the little pool of water in front of the statue that stood in the center of the Crossroads.

“Gimmie a second, potions kicking in,” Varric said as he limped over to sit on a rock by the pool, restopping the draught he’d taken and tucking the empty vial away into a coat pocket.

“Eleanor!” Cassandra called out for response. Ellie didn’t realize she’d been called until the Seeker had her hands on her shoulders, crouching a bit so they were face to face, the Nevarran woman searching her for injury. “Were you hurt?”

“Tumbles? Leg hurts like shit kid, don’t make me come over there, say something.”

It was a feeling like falling—the way it feels to have a dream when you fall in your sleep that jolts you awake. Ellie felt as if she’d sort of fallen back into herself, jerking a bit as she looked around and realized she’d just been standing stock still and silent in the middle of the road, staring into space, staff held lax at her side.

“Varric’s hurt?” she asked, whipping around to get a look at the Dwarf, Cassandra followed close behind as Ellie went to kneel at Varric’s side. “What happened? Do you need potion?”

“Took potion kid. I’ll be all good in a minute, shit, are you okay?”

Ellie nodded. “Sorry, yeah I’m fine. Just got distracted,” she stood then, holstering her staff on her back, and looked around them as if in search, “I was wondering where Mother Gisselle is,” it wasn’t a lie exactly, she did wonder that now—it was the whole reason they were here after all. “I thought I saw a Chantry Mother when we arrived.”

“You should meet her, if you’re ready,” Cassandra said, something in her tones sounded doubtful, like she wasn’t certain she should prompt Ellie to seek the Mother out just yet. “The area is secure for now. You are certain you are unharmed?”

“Does anything hurt, Ellie?” Solas asked gently.

Ellie shook her head. It took a second to realize the negative might be taken as an answer to Cassandra’s question and she quickly amended. “I’m fine. Let’s go meet Mother Gisselle, yeah? Cassandra can come with me—Solas maybe you should stay here and make sure Varric’s leg heals up okay.”

“As you wish,” the Elf said softly.

Ellie could practically feel Cassandra looking at her. How was she doing that? The woman was leading her across the road and up a flight of wooden steps, Ellie following after, but it felt like the Seeker was watching for any sign Ellie had been mortally wounded and was somehow keeping it from her.

At the top of the stairs, a Chantry Mother was tending to man laid out on a cot. A Healer—a Mage—stood at her back, and the man seemed to be refusing treatment. Didn’t want magic to touch him for fear it would be to his detriment.

Ellie felt for all the world like she could will the ground to swallow her up whole. She should have asked Solas to hold her staff—these people had just been traumatized by Mages and here she was with a literal beacon on her back screaming ‘look at me, another Mage coming to pillage your village’.

Of course, leaving the Elf man with two staffs may only incite panic. And end with Solas attacked.

“Come now, their Magic is surely no more evil than your blade. Let the Healer ease your suffering, and you will be well soon,” the Chantry Mother soothed. She was old, dark skin wrinkled with age and weariness, though she smiled when the man consented to being treated by the Healer’s magic. She rose to her feet and regarded the women that joined her.

“Seeker Pentaghast,” the Chantry Mother said, nodding reverently to Cassandra.

“Mother Gisselle, I presume. May I present to you Eleanor, the Herald of Andraste.”

“A pleasure to meet you, Mother Gisselle,” Ellie said as she offered a hand to the elder woman. “Thank you, for agreeing to meet with me.”

“Thank you, for bringing the Inquisition to aid these people,” Mother Gisselle said, taking Ellie’s hand to hold it rather than to shake, squeezing the hand as she ran her thumb across the back of Ellie’s gloved knuckles. “These are trying times. I wish to offer assistance as I can.”

She pulled Ellie along and the two walked out of range of the healer and his patient.

“You aren’t…you aren’t against Mages?” Ellie asked quietly as they walked, giving a voice to her surprise.
“Not on principle. Magic is dangerous, but no more so than any other weapon. The fear should be of those who would wield it for other’s harm. You, for example, came to the aid of these refugees. They may be wary of your magic, but they will be grateful to you.”

“Leliana said you wish to assist the Inquisition, but the Chantry has denounced us. You think differently than your fellow clergy?” Ellie asked.

“I have heard of what transpired at the Breach. I do not claim to know the Maker’s will, but I know this: the Breach must be stopped, and those who caused it must be brought to justice. As it stands now, you are the only viable way of sealing the Breach, and it is the duty of the Inquisition to seek those who sought the world harm. The Chantry has no Divine, no direction. The voice that speaks loudest is the one being followed and right now that is Roderick. So, I offer this—go to the remaining clerics, introduce yourself to them as you have to me, show them the facts Roderick’s charges lack.”

“Introduce myself…to the grand clerics?” Ellie asked.

“In Val Royeaux, yes. At the very least you give them reason to dissent—their greatest advantage right now is their unity, but if you can give them reason to question, they will argue amongst themselves—those who are against you will be too busy defending their position, and those who see reason will lend you their support. In the meantime, I will go now to Haven and help Sister Leliana as I can and make the appropriate arrangements for you to address the clerics. I have names of those in the Chantry who may already be willing to help your cause, I am sure she put them to good use.”

Maker, that was so far. The journey from the Vinmark mountains to the Temple of Sacred Ashes had been the farthest she’d ever traveled—but to Orlais? The Orlesian capital?

Trevelyan had talked about Val Royeaux. Told her about what the city and its people had been like, painted a picture of blues and golds, lion statues and a dangerous game of societal subterfuge.

She nodded politely and wished Mother Giselle well on her journey to Haven, told her to see Flissa when she arrived for a good meal.

And then the second Ellie and the Seeker were out of earshot the girl rounded on the older woman and looked up at her, imploringly, as if Cassandra could somehow forbid her from doing something like traipse off to Orlais. For a moment she felt like one of those girls who got invited to an outing she did not want to attend and sought her mother’s refusal as an excuse not to go.

“Sorry, Mother Giselle, while I’d just love to go chat up Roderick’s buddies, Cassandra said no. So, I guess I’ll just be in my cabin, in Haven, under my blankets where it’s safe and Marehis braids my hair.”

“What is it, Eleanor? That went perfectly well, did it not?” Cassandra asked.

Eleanor let out a little squeak and then, “Not! Cassandra, she wants me to go to Val Royeaux! That’s! Like a million miles from here!”

“Two hundred and fifty*, give or take,” Cassandra corrected, “but yes. It is a great distance. We’re hardly packing you a lunch and sending you on your way, Eleanor. Varric would love nothing more than to see you acquainting yourself with Orlais of all places, the man may expire from his glee at your exposure to the culture that produced the likes of Madam Florna. And Solas would not see you traverse such a journey alone. Neither would I. We will discuss this back at Haven with all of your advisors, but I do believe Mother Giselle’s plan to be viable.”

_Sorry, Mother Giselle, while I’d love to go chat up Roderick’s buddies, Cassandra said yes, she’s a traitor, and I lied. I’d rather jab a rusty fork directly into my brain than meet the grand clerics, so I guess I’ll just be in my cabin in Haven under my blankets where Marehis braids my hair and helps me plot my revenge against a certain Nevarran backst aberr._

Oh. Marehis—maybe she’d put a stop to this. Yeah. Trusty Marehis, Maker bless that beautiful badass. Watch Cassandra try to drag Ellie half way across the world once Marehis puts her foot down. Ha!

“Come, we should regroup, and introduce you to Corporal Vale. He can give us a better idea of what needs done,” Cassandra said, already leading Ellie back to where they’d left their companions.

Varric was already back up on his feet, he and Solas both asking after Ellie’s meeting with Mother Giselle.

“It was fine,” Ellie said, “She’s going to help us win over the Chantry—heading to give names to Leliana as we speak.”

Cassandra led them up a stone paver path to a place where Inquisition soldiers were training, and next to one of their tents, stood the man she introduced as Corporal Vale.

_Corporal Vale was…steady, reassuring. The refugees were hungry, and there was a food shortage, they were cold and there were no blankets, they were sick and there was no steady healer, Mages and Templars blazed hell through their fields, and there was no end in sight. But for all their problems, Corporal Vale seemed to whole-heartedly believe there was a solution. If Ellie were in charge, she’d be a freaked-out mess, running around like a chicken with its head cut off. This man just accepted the reality at hand and hoped for the best._

_What he got was Ellie. But she would certainly try her best. So. Off she went._

_Cassandra watched the girl carefully. When she’d seen her in the aftermath of their first battle in the Crossroads…concerned didn’t quite do the feeling justice. In a moment of overwhelming panic, the Seeker feared something horrendous had happened to the girl—that she would fall over dead before Cassandra could even think of how to help. She’d been as pale as she was when they faced the Breach, and she’d just stood there still, like she was petrified. The girl said she was fine but that was the problem—many people had severely different opinions on what ‘fine’ was, ranging from perfect contentment, to ‘I’m not dead yet’._

_She’d shared her displeasure at Mother Gisselle’s plan to see her meet the high clerics, yet she’d termed the meeting as ‘fine’. That did not boost Cassandra’s confidence in Eleanor’s definition of the word._

_But she must not be badly injured, if she was injured at all—the moment Corporal Vale finished his list of Refugee needs, Eleanor had given the man a salute (not a proper one for a Corporal in the Inquisition’s army, but it wasn’t anything insulting, just something they may need to cover in her etiquette course should she ever interact with military higher-ups from other nations). Then she’d hop-walked down the hill and struck up conversation with just about..._ everyone in town, her party in tow.

She strode up to an Inquisition soldier that Corporal Vale had pointed out to them and asked him about what he would need to keep the refugee’s warm. While he was rather brusque though he lamented that they were not in a city where he could simply steal blankets for them (how well were they vetting Inquisition recruits? They could not have their soldiers actively engaging in petty crimes in the middle of major cities no less). However, he did offer the helpful suggestion of abandoned Mage caches he’d seen around. He marked a few locations on the map they’d been given to help them navigate the area and said they should look there.

 Mage caches. Ugh. Wonderful.

And then Eleanor was off looking for more information on how to help the refugees, by chatting up the people themselves. She waved down an elderly man, asked how he was doing, prayed with him, and then asked where their village hunter was. He led them to a man crouched by what looked to be a potential campfire. It was kindling and firewood, and the man held two sticks, one in each hand, and was sawing them together to create friction. Eleanor knelt beside them and held out her hands as if to show she meant no harm and asked if he would be alright with her helping him. He nodded, and Cassandra’s hand went to the hilt of her sword. If Eleanor used magic so close to this man he may not have the best reaction.

But she didn’t use magic. Ahh. The elder man had mentioned the village’s hunter had perished in the initial Mage-Templar takeover, but he’d passed the tradition onto his son. Passed along the tradition, but not all of the life skills it entailed. Teach a man to fish…or build a fire, as it were.

The young man looked almost embarrassed. He promised Eleanor he did know how to hunt, he could kill and clean anything they asked, but it was his father who had handled fires when nights got cold or they cooked out in the field.

Eleanor gave him a reassuring smile and told him he’d done an excellent job assembling most of what he needed. She held up an index finger and disappeared over the steep drop into the field beside the houses the young man had set up camp between, and reappeared not a minute later with a length of wood no longer than her forearm, and a sturdy twig. She held them up and explained that he needed to always make sure this portion was of matching wood before she laid the larger piece down and knelt, so it was trapped between her knee and the stone platform before planting the twig firmly against it and swiftly rolling it between the tops of her palms and lower knuckles.

She bared her hands for that task, removing the gloves Harritt had crafted her, revealing the Fadelight permanently Marking her hand, and the young man’s eyes widened as the reality sunk in that the Herald of Andraste was teaching him how to build a fire.

Eleanor breezily led him into a discussion of the food shortage problem as she worked, asking him about where he and his father had hunted in the past, what would most likely be in high population and last the longest, what could be most widely shared. By the time she had a proper coal smoking low from the larger piece of wood, she had Varric offering up their map, and the young man marked down a few places they would find a good population of Rams. A great many Mages and Templars too, he warned, which is why he himself hadn’t ventured out, but if they thought they could handle it, the refugees would truly appreciate any Ram meat the Inquisition could send their way.

Eleanor tipped the coal into the kindling he’d collected and blew into it before handing it off to the hunter.
“Blow gently and fan it through the air until it sparks. Once it does, drop it into your fire pit— it’ll do the rest. Be careful not to burn yourself, once your kindling gets going it goes,” she said, holding out her right hand so he could see the bit of puckered, always reddish skin she was sporting on the inside of her index finger. She pulled her gloves back on as she promised, “Just keep that fire going, and before you know it you’ll be cooking up a proper ram steak.”

“Thank you, Lady Herald,” he said nodding to her. “Maker watch over you.”

A distressed looking Elf man was Eleanor’s next target. She heard violent coughing and while Cassandra’s instinct was to usher the girl away from whatever foul illness might spread through their numbers, Eleanor followed the sound all the way to a hut opposite where the hunter was now enjoying his fire. Inside the hut was an Elf man, sitting at his wife’s bedside, holding her hand and murmuring to her in Dalish—Cassandra could not understand what was being said, but his tone was obviously meant to soothe.

Eleanor knocked a fist against the open hut door to get the man’s attention without startling him. “Antishan las vunin,” she said politely.

“A peaceful day to you as well,” the man offered in return.

“My name is Ellie, and I’m an agent of the Inquisition. We’re working to get a proper healer for you, but your wife is badly sick yes? We have draughts of Elf Root if that would help,” Eleanor said, drawing a vial of potion from its place in the belt Harritt made to accommodate her potions supply. She held it out to the Elf, but the man sadly shook his head.

“I appreciate the offer, miss. But you see, this is a recurring illness my wife has—like cobwebs in her lungs, she struggles breath past them, it makes her weak. Our son makes a potion that clears her spells right up. But he is away, joined a cult of Andraste that carries on south of here worshiping a blighted Rift and the Breach. I have tried sending word to him, but nothing makes it through the warfare topped off with demons and bandits mucking about.”

“Well, I haven’t tried yet,” Eleanor said with confidence, “We’ll be heading that way while we’re here, let’s see if we can’t get word to your son, yeah?”

“If you could that would be a blessing ser, truly.”

“Then I’ll do my best and return with good news,” Eleanor promised him. “In the meantime, do you happen to have a tea kettle?”

“Ahh, I do yes—I wouldn’t wish to seem unhospitable but I uh, I could only offer hot water to you, and your companions,” the man said, nervously as he rose to his feet, prepared to heat water for them anyway.

“Oh no, I wasn’t asking for tea,” she assured, and followed him as he went to the fireplace and pulled the kettle from the mantle. Eleanor took the kettle and looked inside to make sure it was empty before pouring water from her canteen into it, and then the potion the man had earlier refused, and dug into her pockets to withdraw Embrium blossoms she’d gathered along their way and popped them into the kettle. She hung the kettle on the hook over the fire already going in the fireplace and said, “Bring it to a rolling boil then pull it off the fire and remove the lid. Have your wife breathe in the steam—the Embrium might clear her lungs entirely on its own, but if not, it will surely help her breathe easier and vaporous Elf Root will assist with any pain she’s in.”

“Mas serannas, Ellie did you say your name was?” the man asked.
Eleanor nodded. “It’s no trouble,” she said as she handed him a full vial of potion, and more Embrium blossoms, “just in case the pot runs out before we return, this should tide you over. Be sure to mix it with water—it should be equal parts potion so…” she took the empty bottle of potion she’d administered into the kettle and filled it with water before restopping it. “Here. You’ll be all set.”

The Elf man took the vials of potion and water into one hand, and the blossoms in the other, so very carefully as if worried they might break apart. “Dareth shiral, mah falon.”

Eleanor gave him a nod before leading her party from the hut. It was only when they were out of earshot that she looked to Solas and asked, “Um, I know he said safe journey, but ‘falon’?”

“Ahh, it means ‘friend’, da’len,” Solas supplied. And then he saw fit to comment, “I am surprised you would learn how to build fire when you could just use magic—and that trick with health potion and Embrium, it is not necessarily basic first-aid.”

He said this almost as if he’d caught Eleanor in a lie, as if he expected her to confess to some higher education outside of the little magical training she’d received in her life.

Ahh. Wait. Did he suspect a demon was somehow at play? That Eleanor had gleaned the information through some subtle blood magic unbeknownst to her companions?

Eleanor did not seem offended, or perhaps she did not hear the hint of accusation in his words. Cassandra would not have followed Solas’s line of thinking if she hadn’t spent the better part of the previous week combating Cullen on Eleanor’s training and his concerns at what might happen should the girl bleed.

She had bled—thrice during their training, and nothing had come from it other than Eleanor’s apologetic attitude towards having to bring pause to their lesson to bandage a cut or see Adan about her thankfully bruised and not broken nose.

No demon had surged forth then, and it was not the case now. Eleanor actually gave a small mirthless laugh and said, “The cold, and a grumpy fisherman taught me how to build a fire when I was little. I only started casting Inferno maybe two years ago, and my little pyro spell is something I picked up from Trevelyan,” she paused then. She’d mentioned the Mage Trevelyan in her interrogation. It had sounded like they’d been friends…she must miss him. “And uh, the Elf Root-Embruim remedy is just from personal experience. I’m no healer but it sounds like his wife has asthma—she might not have much in the way of attacks, that isn’t unusual as you get older, but they make common sicknesses a bear. Ava taught me how to use Embrium to combat respiratory illness.”

“Did your Ava suffer from asthma?” Solas asked. Cassandra restrained herself from slapping the Elf on the back of his bald head. Was he being cruel? Did he wish to make Eleanor think on those she’d lost to a point it saddened her?

For a horrified moment Cassandra thought Eleanor might reveal that it was such an illness that had taken Ava from her.

And then suddenly, she had to restrain herself from congratulating the Elf man, for his line of questioning had proven useful, blessedly so, because Eleanor said,

Had she informed Healer Adan? Or her Marehis? Had she thought to tell anyone in the Inquisition? What if she’d had an ‘attack’ as she’d called them? Or fell ill and needed further assistance than would usually be rendered? Cassandra found herself mentally repeating Eleanor’s earlier instructions to the Elf man, over and over to commit the treatment to memory.

“Be sure to inform us if it troubles you,” Cassandra cautioned.

Eleanor gave her a brilliant smile and said, “It’s not serious or anything—”

“I hate to break it to you Tumbles, but that follows the lines of ‘what could possibly go wrong’ and those are some pretty famous last words,” Varric said.

“I haven’t had much trouble with it since I was little,” Eleanor said, “Now it’s just a pain if I have a cold or something.”

“Aha!” Varric declared, “Our hero brought low by a treacherous cold. Perhaps she needs someone who can keep her warm?”

Cassandra gave the man a disgusted grunt. Eleanor was young. And at the center of a great world-wide turmoil. The last thing she should be concerned about was romance.

“Come on Seeker, don’t be that way. What about that hunter? Huh? Big brave woodsman—can’t light a fire in a hearth, but maybe he can light a fire in our hero’s heart?”

“Varric, I love you, I really do,” Eleanor said all-too-sweetly, “but if you try to set me up with someone, your new book is going right up your butt.”

Cassandra loosed a laugh at that, Solas seemed equally amused, even more so when Eleanor’s rather eloquent threat caused Varric to pout.

“Oh, come on! Every great hero has a great romantic interest! Hawke has Fenris!”

Fenris. And Isabella. And three different workers at the Rose. And an implied liaison with the Arishock but Cassandra suspected Varric only said something of the sort for shock value, having grown bored during his interrogation.

“I am not your ‘great hero’, permission denied, no stories about me—”

“Tumbles, the story kind of centers around you—”

“Around us! You lot have been here since before me anyway, make Cassandra the hero, she’d look cool in a cape, I’d just trip over it and probably strangle myself. Or Solas, pop his character on a fiery griffon and call it a day.”

“You’re killing my vision here kid,” Varric grumbled.

Eleanor stuck her tongue out at the Dwarf.

---

Two weeks. They dedicated two weeks of their time so far, to the troubles plaguing the Crossroads, and their efforts had not been in vain.

It started off with more problems than they had fingers between the four of them, it seemed. And then, they’d encountered the skulls.

Glowing skulls. With holes drilled into the backs of them, so that one could peer through it, and a hallow eye socket, like a macabre telescope of sorts, and apparently, they revealed the location of…shards. Blue glowing, singing things. Keys, Solas said. To what, he did not know, but they collected them as they encountered the things, Eleanor standing tip toe to peer through the Ocularms, was apparently their name, according to a tome Solas read from at one of their sites. They gathered what information they could and sent it along with a shard for examination by Leliana and their people back at Haven. Perhaps they could make something of the bizarre artifacts, they’d been hidden and made to be found for a reason.

This discovery resulted in several instances where she thought the girl would die of her clumsiness. It sent her climbing up on high rocks to fetch shards, getting into precarious positions that sent her sliding down entire hillsides, and once, sent her falling headlong into a gulch.

Maker bless Solas and his quick casting. Barrier, at the last minute, had spared her then.

Cassandra personally preferred the Astarariums they found. Look out points to the stars, that allowed one to peer through an actual, proper telescope, and examine the heavens. If you looked upon the constellation shown and were able to name it properly, the contraption glowed and shone light that directed you to other such constructs, and ultimately, they found, a treasure trove unlocked through the Astararium’s activation.

Eleanor had been absolutely delighted by the things. For all she lacked a formal education, she knew about the stars. Apparently, it had been something of a hobby she could afford to have—always being on the move meant navigation was a priority for the girl, and the cover of night often served a level of security to someone on the run from magical law enforcement. So, when it came to naming the constellations, it had been more of a fun test than some daunting task of connect-the-dots.

It was unlike their pursuit of an end to the chaos caused by the Mages and Templars warring in the Hinterlands.

They’d hunted the Mages to their cave in Witchwood, and the Templars to their encampment to the west. Clearing their respective lairs put an end to the ceaseless fighting that had burnt half the homes in the Hinterlands to the ground.

In their search for Mages and Templars, they also found large shards of Red Lyrium, much to Varric’s equal parts delight and despair. He hated that there was Red Lyrium to be found but loved the sound of the cursed stuff being destroyed beyond repair.

They’d also hunted ram. There were now full bellies among the Crossroad Refugees, and Varric further teased Eleanor that she should give the hunter boy a chance. Eleanor threatened to tell Bianca on Varric if he did not cease his teasing, and for some reason that shut the Dwarf up. Cassandra wished she’d thought of such a threat but thought it might be something that only worked when it came from Eleanor. Bianca was an inanimate object, after all.

Annoying and thoughtless, selfish, careless, as the Dwarf had proven himself to be…when it came to Eleanor he was obviously protective, and cared very much so, about the girl and her wellbeing. It dawned on Cassandra, that Varric’s teasing about kindling a romance with that hunter boy may have been out of genuine concern for the girl. Did he think her lonely? Was she lonely? Romantic attachments could prove tremulous at best, and dangerous at worst, and she seemed rather young to have something with no attachment.
Young love was fire and passion and vows to be together forever that usually dissolved into being with other people before the week was out. Or betrothal at a young age, serious vows taken till death do they part. This prompted the rather horrifying thought that Lady Josephine might see fit to arrange a marriage for Eleanor, should such a thing benefit the Inquisition, but then she thought better of it. Lady Josephine would not do such a thing—she knew well what they demanded of Eleanor, she would not burden the girl with a matrimonial entanglement that would outlast their problems with the Breach.

It was no one’s business but Eleanor’s, at any rate. If the girl chose to pursue a romantic dalliance, it would only involve the Inquisition insofar as her safety was concerned. Varric should stay out of it and allow the girl to do as she pleased.

Although, should someone come along and break the girl’s heart…well Cassandra might just look the other way while Varric took his vengeance.

With the rebel Mages taken care of, their caches had been even safer to loot for items the refugees could use. They’d been able to return to the Crossroads with blankets and warmer clothing to circulate among the refugees. While they searched for these caches though, they had come across recruits, and the cure for the Elf refugee’s wife.

There was an Inquisition scout keeping watch on the road south of their initial campsite. He’d expressed concern over the disappearance of his fellow Scout, a woman named Ritts. On their way to search for more supplies, they found a viable campsite for their forces to spread out to—assisting in furthering their hold on the Hinterlands—and found…a rather horrifying scene. A young noblewoman with her head crushed in. They searched her for identification—someone would seek her when she did not show up wherever she was expected to be, they should get word to her loved ones.

This led to ultimately, the recruitment of the dead noblewoman’s lover. When their party reached the cult of Andraste, congregating around a Rift, worshiping the Breach as if accepting the end of the world would somehow save them, they found a man in search of a woman matching the noblewoman’s description. Eleanor had very gently informed the man that they’d found his love, offering up the letter they had found on the dead woman’s body as proof.

And then she offered him something to turn his focus to. His life did not have to end because hers had. He had a crew of men that worked for him, people trained and capable in battle—he could work to make the world a better and safer place, under the flag of the Inquisition. Thus, Lord Berand was recruited into the Inquisition, and the man was sent to Haven to receive orders from Commander Cullen.

Eleanor sealed the Rift, and that seemed to prove she was heaven sent to the cult members. Their leader turned their allegiance to that of Eleanor herself, and she asked that they work to help the refugees however they could.

Solas sensed an Elf Artifact nearby, that he said would prove useful to protecting the area from veil tears. This resulted in Eleanor following Solas around the entire Cult of Andraste compound until they made it to the uppermost level of the buildings northern tower, and found a…metal orb thing, that glowed with the same Fadelight burning in Eleanor’s hand whenever she followed Solas’s instruction on how to activate the thing.

During their trek searching every nook and cranny of the compound, they found the Elf Refugee’s son among the cult members, and he entrusted the recipe for his mother’s medicine to Eleanor, to deliver to his father.
Which spawned a rather strange turn of events where Cassandra and Varric actually... worked together. Not that they weren’t working as a team already, but that was full of mutual resentment, and hard feelings. They very willingly worked together, and afterwards felt some of the contention lessen between them, when Eleanor had gone to sleep that evening, and Cassandra slipped the recipe from the pocket of Eleanor’s coat. Varric caught her, only because he himself had been going to do the same thing. Cassandra handed the recipe off to him, and the Dwarf copied it down, word for word. They would see it to Healer Adan, so such a thing could be on hand should Eleanor ever have need.

When Eleanor woke the next morning, she was none the wiser.

They could have simply asked to see the recipe, been forthright about the whole thing, but Eleanor was...extremely independent. Almost annoyingly so. She fought against anything she thought was overbearing and was reticent to ask for or receive help. She would have insisted that she would never need such a thing, and that Cassandra and Varric were being ‘worry warts’, as she’d taken to calling them when they, quite justly, were worried.

So. What she didn’t know, may just help to keep her alive someday.

They traveled from the cult of Andraste, further south, in search of a Rift that needed closing, and another Mage cache, when they discovered the missing scout, Ritts, fighting off demons attacking from the southernmost Rift.

It had taken all of two seconds after the last demon was down, for Eleanor ask the woman if she was alright. She hadn’t been hurt, but Eleanor persisted...ahh.

Eleanor had not meant physically. The girl saw the picnic, blanket, and dead Apostle woman and had put two and two together. Cassandra herself hadn’t caught on until Ritts was admitting to having been ‘passing the time’ with the woman now lying dead after the demon attack. She’d evidently slipped off after her shift and spent the night under the stars with the Elf Apostle, only to waken sunshine, bird song, and demons fresh from the Fade.

Where Eleanor had been sympathetic, Varric had been impressed. He suggested if the woman was able to ‘talk an apostate out of her pants in the middle of the war’ she should put her skills of persuasion to better use for the Inquisition.

Eleanor had agreed and told Ritts to report back to Leliana for reassignment—after touching base with her scout friend who’d been so worried for her.

They ended up seeing Ritts safely off and returned to the Crossroads to get the potion recipe to the Elvish man. He thanked them profusely, and Eleanor lent him a hand in preparing the potion, the man reading the instructions aloud while Eleanor collected ingredients, chopped, stirred, boiled. Apparently, she’d spent an afternoon with Adan where he had given her some instruction in the finer parts of potions crafting, and the effects of his instruction showed in the very precise and clean way the girl was able to follow the directions the Elf man orated. Solas had been impressed enough to allow the girl to assist him whenever he refreshed their supply of health potion—it cut his work in half and sped the process exponentially.

Not only did their recruits and resources grow as they ventured in the Hinterlands, but their party grew as well.

Word came from Leliana, a message for Eleanor who’d handed the letter to Cassandra saying she trusted the woman to read it, and that she’d want the Seeker’s opinion on whatever Leliana had to say.
After some disturbing reports from her Scouts, it had come to Leliana’s attention that the Grey Wardens had disappeared. Absolute silence from all quarters—with the exception of one man. A Warden Blackwall, last sighted in the Hinterlands. Leliana wanted them to investigate the Wardens disappearance. It wasn’t uncommon for Warden activity to die down after the Blight, but to disappear entirely was unheard of, and just what made this one warden special, why had all but he fled?

So, Eleanor led them south of the Crossroads, where they found another area perfect for another Inquisition camp. They saw to it and had reinforcements securing the area as quickly as possible, before they continued on further south to the lake, over the hill from their new camp.

There was an abandoned home on the opposite side of the lake. And before this abandoned home, stood a lone Grey Warden, with conscripted recruits—refugees—helping them to help themselves against bandit forces threatening to take what little they possessed.

The man had been barking orders at his conscripts when their party approached. Eleanor called to him when he took a breath, and that had the gruff, greying man marching right up to her and demanding to know just how she knew his name.

She didn’t get the chance to answer right that moment. His shield arm shot up, startling the girl and saving her—the bandits he’d been preparing his conscripts for had arrived and came in firing, arrows meant for Eleanor’s head planted firmly in the center of the Warden’s shield.

Their party assisted the refugees in disbanding the bandits, and Warden Blackwall told them to take back what the bandits had stolen from them and return to their families capable of defending themselves.

And then he rounded on Eleanor once more, demanding to know just who she was, and how she’d gotten his name.

“I know your name, because I’m an agent of the Inquisition,” she’d said.

That had Warden Blackwall examining Eleanor hard, as if he thought perhaps his eyesight was failing him. She was rather young, Cassandra supposed, to be an agent of anything.

Eleanor seemed to realize this as well, and she removed her left glove to bare her Mark to him.

The Warden was shocked to say the least, “Andraste’s tits,” he’d sworn, and then coughed as if he could cover his curse after the fact.

“Andraste’s Herald, actually,” Eleanor gently teased as if to assure him he hadn’t offended, and she put her glove back on as she said, “You can just call me Ellie.”

Eleanor explained how the Wardens had suddenly disappeared after the events at the Conclave. She wasn’t accusing them of being responsible for the Divine’s murder, but she was accusing them of being absolutely no help—wasn’t that what Wardens were for? Yeah there was no Blight right this very second, but didn’t that leave them time to help with things like a gaping hole in the sky?

Maker preserve them all, the girl stumbled over herself apologizing for things unnecessarily half the time, and then she went foolheartedly into confrontation with bold statements when she felt the slightest bit of conviction over what she was speaking of. Cassandra resembled that—at least the ‘foolheartedly’ part, so she could hardly rebuke the girl.
And neither, it seemed, could Warden Blackwall. The man saw the girl’s grievance against he and his fellow Grey Wardens seemingly ignoring the Breach and the threat it possessed towards the people they were supposedly sworn to protect. He agreed, and while he could not offer any useful information—he was a recruiter, and traveled alone, the Warden’s disappearance had been news to him—he could offer his sword, and his connection to the Grey Warden treaties, edicts that would allow the Inquisition to conscript people and resources the way that wardens could in times of the Blight.

Eleanor shook the man’s hand and welcomed him to the Inquisition. And then, there were five traversing the Hinterlands together.

With a good portion of the threats in the Hinterlands cleared—including a rather excruciating Rift at the waterfall just before Dennet’s farms—they were finally able to make contact with the Horse Master.

That is, after setting up camp and resting. Between the five of them, they’d used up nearly all of their healing potion during their battle against the Rift at the falls.

The last of their potion was used in direct application—a shade claw had lodged itself deep into Eleanor’s left thigh. When it was removed she began bleeding so profusely the only thing they could think to do was for Solas to pour potion directly into the wound itself and have Cassandra apply pressure until the potion proved to seal the injury closed, or mostly so. Just the barest of reminders left—a thin circular divot in her skin that would surely scar. Nothing that spoke to the gush of blood that stained Eleanor’s leggings, the ground, and Cassandra and Solas’s armor.

Needless to say, they were weary and to Cassandra’s surprise…though she supposed it should not have been such…Varric offered to take up first watch and allowed the others the opportunity to rest. There was none of the usual resistance from Eleanor. Something about being sent to bed early made her feel like they thought her a child—she was a child—but allowing the girl to take first watch did no harm, it was better than interrupting her sleep or waking her early. Eleanor loved it, especially if one of the others stayed up as well and would chat quietly with her as their comrades slept.

Cassandra had thought the notion daunting at first. When the girl had been dead asleep in Haven for days, she could just recite the Chant to have something to say. But she found that the likes still applied to a conscious Eleanor as well. Conversation came surprisingly easy between the she and the Seeker, and when Cassandra found their silence anything less than comforting, she would throw out a verse of the Chant and Eleanor just reveled in it, seemed to love learning everything the Seeker could possibly share with her about different portions of the Chant of Light. The girl had been somewhat versed in their religion’s doctrine and had rather interesting ideas and speculations about what she knew, and as Cassandra shared her own knowledge, Eleanor returned in kind with her way of thinking about the Chant. It was somewhat like a worship service, only instead of a Chantry Mother delivering a message no one could question, two people of similar faith shared in scripture and discussed it in depth which was…much more preferable to the former, Cassandra found.

There had been one particularly difficult day in the Hinterlands, when, by the time they settled in for the night, everyone had been feeling the weight of discouragement on top of their duty to the people they felt they were failing. Cassandra was not one for song—at least, she was no bard, or a Chantry Sister who could take up the task of singing alone before the congregation, in the congregation she was fine, her voice lost in the mix of all the Maker’s children. But that night, when there was no other comfort to be found, Cassandra found herself singing, very quietly, along with Eleanor. ‘Steel your heart, the dawn will come…’ it was a beautiful hymnal, if not a bit over used by Chantry Clerics—a lovely tear jerker that had eyes watering and devotion pouring from pockets in the form of gold coin into the offering plates. But that night it had seemed somewhat fitting. In the morning, they’d gone on to seal two rifts, and secured bountiful ram meat for the entire village.

Now, they had victory after victory behind them. But they’d come so close to failure at that last Rift—when Eleanor had sealed it, Cassandra stopped breathing for a moment, her mind racing back to that day at the Breach where the girl had collapsed practically dead.

This time, the girl had fallen to her knees, and been back on her feet after the four adults had all somewhat bombarded her, asking how they could help, where she was injured, if she needed potion, or to be carried. She’d ground her staff into the wet earth of the river bank and determinedly used it as a crutch to limp all the way to where they were now camped out near Dennet’s farm. Today was trying no matter their victories, Cassandra found.

Varric took first watch with Blackwall, and no refusal was heard from Eleanor. She plopped down in the grass as soon as Varric made his offer to take watch.

“Are you well, Eleanor?” Cassandra had asked, the girl seemed ready to drop off to sleep.

“‘m fine,” she mumbled and then laid back in the grass, and promptly fell fast asleep, not particularly caring that she hadn’t so much as removed her pack from her back.

They hadn’t the camping supplies with them other than their personal bed rolls, they’d lit a fire with brush that made the smoke a particular shade of blue, signaling that they’d found another foothold for Inquisition forces. Reinforcements would arrive with actual tents, and all the amenities that made up a proper campsite.

Until then, they made do. Eleanor would surely wake up unable to move for the pain in her back if they did not do something, so Solas took up the girl, his hands under her armpits as he hoisted her so Cassandra could unloop the girl’s arms from her pack and set it aside.

Eleanor then lay wrapped in their parties collective bedding, tucked between Cassandra and Solas for warmth. She was sickly pale, and Blackwall had practically jumped out of his skin when he lay the back of his bare hand against Eleanor’s forehead to check her temperature—her skin was frigid to the touch.

She had lost so much blood. Solas lamented they hadn’t pressed her to take on fluids before she’d laid down, and she would become dehydrated—if anything they needed to get an appropriate balance of water and salt in her to aid in the regeneration of her blood. But they’d all been rather bleary minded, Cassandra could feel what potion she’d taken slowly easing the cracks in her ribs, Solas was quickly recovering from an actual blow to his head, it had slowed his thought processes a bit initially.

His thoughts seemed to be clearing now though as he set about trying to more properly treat Eleanor.

Solas gently shook the girl’s shoulder, and said, “I know you are weary da’len, but you must wake even if just for a moment. You must drink.” He gestured for Cassandra to hand him Eleanor’s canteen, and Varric was already thinking ahead and had gathered up everyone else’s water skins to refill them—if Eleanor did not need all of it, refilling their water supply would be one less thing to do later.

Eleanor was a generally pleasantish person to wake—she was not exactly a morning person, but it was not in her to be unjustly unkind to anyone, so she usually offered up a sad little groan at being told it was time to wake and sympathized with her fellow traveling companions over their shared misery in the early hours their time in the Hinterlands demanded they rise. Flissa had seen fit to send them on their way with a plentiful supply of coffee, though Cassandra suspected Marehis’s hand in that decision. One cup of the stuff and Eleanor was running around their campsite looking for all the world she could take on a dragon if they set her loose to find one.

Cassandra saw the tell-tale signs that there was, in fact, a dragon somewhere in the Hinterlands. To the north, past their furthest most camp, but she did not share that information with anyone, especially a caffeine riddled Eleanor.

Now though, Eleanor did not jump up ready to face any task, or even offer her morning groan of remorse for being awake. She did not rouse at all, her motions were lax under Solas’s hand, which had gone from shaking her shoulder, to supporting her upper back, pushing her to sit up, and calling more insistently that she should wake.

Cassandra shifted then, so she could sit supporting the girl against her chest to free the Elf’s hands, so he could do whatever he needed to help Eleanor.

“’m fine,” the girl had said just before falling asleep, or unconscious it seemed. The moment Eleanor was well, Cassandra would throttle her and put an all-out ban on her use of the word ‘fine’.

“She must be worn out, sealing a Rift can’t be a simple task and she’s sealed two today,” Blackwall offered up, hoping that was the reason they could not rouse the girl.

“No, no something is wrong,” Solas insisted, panic slipping into his tones as he said, “Eleanor. Ellie, you need to wake up.”

The girl did groan then, her head lolling to the side as she tried to do as Solas asked.

“Shit, Seeker!” Varric’s voice called out, echoing up the hillside from the ravine below.

“We are handling it, Varric!” Cassandra shouted back, regretting having shouted directly into Eleanor’s ear.

The girl groaned again and lurched forward, Solas’s hands went to her arms to support the girl, before she fell face first into the dirt. Was she trying to get to her feet?

“Eleanor, still yourself,” Cassandra reached to uncap the canteen, hoping to get the girl to drink.

Eleanor opened her eyes then and spoke low, her voice strained and cracking from her lips, like her throat were in the vice of some unseen hand.

“Stop, the demon…wolf-”

Solas’s face drained of all color and he released his hold on the girl as if she burned him.
Eleanor fell harshly to her knees and slumped over to the side, Cassandra narrowly able to shield the girl’s head from cracking against the ground.

“Solas!” Cassandra cried in alarm, what had gotten into the man?

He backed away from them, shaking.
“We need backup!” That was Blackwall’s voice. Where had the Warden gone?

“Seeker I’m serious, I need help!” Varric called again.

It was then she realized she could hear Bianca firing off, and the howl of a wolf rang out across the fields.

Solas turned to look where the din was coming from and he seemed almost relieved? He drew his staff and cast Barrier down towards his fellow party members as he said, “There are wolves, Seeker, a pack of them.”

“Go, I will guard Eleanor,” Cassandra instructed as she made sure the girl was lying secure before rising and drawing her own weapon. Solas was already down in the ravine with Varric and apparently Blackwall, fighting the wolves Cassandra could hear snarling and snapping like things possessed.

Possessed.

The three men returned to their camp after a moment, sheathing weapons, Varric was sporting three claw marks across his chest, and Blackwall was limping slightly as he walked.

Solas looked as if he might be ill.

“What the hell was that?!” Varric exploded. “What kind of wolves fight like that? Maker’s balls!”

“Could they have been possessed?” Cassandra asked, getting Solas’s attention. “Eleanor, she said something about stopping demon wolves just now.”

“A demon…” Solas breathed sharply as realization dawned on him. “an active, powerful demon nearby—working to possess the wolves. Varric, did you see where they came from?”

“They just showed up across the river—north. There’s some caves on the map there right?”

“We have to hurry,” Solas said, “I believe whatever demon is possessing those wolves has his sights set on the Herald.”

Cassandra rose then, “I will go with you, Varric, Blackwall, one or both of you should stay with Eleanor, guard her.”

“One, Seeker,” Solas said, “those wolves are many and fierce.”

“Shit, I’m good to go, just got scratched up, Warden’s the one gimping it,” Varric said, albeit resentful. Ahh. He did not like the idea of leaving Eleanor alone in the care of a man they’d only just met. Becoming a Warden was a noble thing…but often the path that came before was rife with, usually, crime. Horrendous crime escapable only by the Warden’s oath.

“I’ll guard the Lady Herald with my life,” Blackwall insisted, pounding a fist to his chest.

Varric unholstered his crossbow and for all he was much shorter than the Human man, he looked as though he were staring him down, “Yeah well, watch yourself, Hero. I come back and even a hair is misplaced on that girl’s head, Bianca’ll change your name to Warden ‘Lacksballs’.”

But Varric fell in line alongside Cassandra, as Solas led them down the hill and across the ravine to the caves—ready to destroy the Demon.
No matter where he went, or who he met, his first words were always, “Warden Blackwall”. It was more of a greeting for him than a name. People recognized the words as a name when he said it, and just accepted it as his. But no one had ever just walked up and given the name to him.

Then, like a bad joke about a bar, an Elf, two Humans, and a Dwarf walk in.

And the littler Human—a girl, Maker’s breath, a child—had led them, stood before him and called him by that name. Warden Blackwall, no silent quotation marks involved. Somehow, it made it seem like it wasn’t a lie.

She was an Agent of the Inquisition she’d claimed, it made him think his eyes were playing tricks on him. She didn’t seem to type to lie, but who would recruit someone so young? And then she’d revealed her Mark.

He wasn’t a sociable man, but even he had heard the news of the Herald of Andraste—not only what she’d done at the Breach, but what she’d been doing since. Going around the Hinterlands, saving the refugees from Templars, Mages, Rifts, and the elements themselves. When he’d conscripted those men, it had been her name on their lips when they prayed before battle—Maker bless the Herald of Andraste, may we be as bold as she.

Then, by some twist of fate, she appeared. Like their prayer had somehow beckoned her, the Herald of Andraste came to their aid, and saw them be made capable of saving themselves.

And Maker, she was bold. No sooner had she gone from lilting laughter and telling him he could call her ‘Ellie’, then she was railing at him, at Wardens in general because how dare they ignore the Breach, see the Divine and her people die and do nothing to help because it was Red Lyrium, and not Darkspawn, pouring up from the ground.

And then the true twist of fate. The moment she finished speaking, his next words had been those of volunteer, offering himself to her cause. He hadn’t even realized what he’d done until it was done. She shook his hand and welcomed him aboard.

She asked questions, like if he’d had other initiatives in the Hinterlands, things he needed done, if he had everything with him or a camp of his own to stop at and gather his things, and if he’d eaten yet today—the girl offered up an apple she’d had tucked away in a pocket she said she’d been saving for a snack but she’d be happy to share if he wanted to go ‘halfsies’.

Halfsies turned out to mean she sliced up the apple, saw that the Warden ate the half offered to him, and then cut the second half into four pieces between herself and the others.

When he admitted to searching for Warden artefacts, she’d immediately promised they would do their best to find them while they were here, took up his quest without question, had him marking locations on her map, when he marked the one near the ruined tower east of the lake she’d smiled and spoken to what an excellent coincidence this all was. She’d planned on ‘swinging by’ the place to look around and seal a Rift the scouts had reported sighting there.

Then she led them towards the glow of Fadelight flickering in the east. She chatted with him as they walked, he’d seen she was a Mage back in the bandit skirmish, and she asked if he would be alright with she and the Elf, Solas, including him in their Barrier spells. She would understand if he was uneasy with strangers casting their magic upon him.

“Cassandra says it’s a bit weird the first time, but she doesn’t think anything of it now.”

“I did not say it was weird,” the Lady Seeker corrected, “it was merely not what I was expecting. It is not unpleasant, and Solas and Eleanor’s barriers are strong, have given us an advantage in many of our fights we may have otherwise lost without them.”

He didn’t have anything in particular against magic or Mages, he wasn’t certain what to expect, but he would accept the help.

When demons appeared from the thing, she drew her staff, and he felt a wash of energy bubbling over him head to toe, and then a bracing sense of security like he was untouchable, and in fact he was.

He thought she would to fall back then, let them handle the fighting. She did take the high ground with Solas, and the duo cast in time with each other—while one had mana recharging the other was casting larger spells.

He fell in line. Fighting alongside the lady Seeker—impressive warrior she—was admittedly odd. He hadn’t fought with a team, not like this in years. This morning he was a lone Warden looking for a place where he could help and move on. Suddenly he was part of a group—a party, Ellie called it.

There was a breakdown of their routine when a greater terror teleported, tore a portal in the earth and popped up across the field a half second later, knocking Blackwall flat on his back. Solas and Ellie’s barriers had worn down and he expected a claw to the face.

Then he heard a shout of, “Hey!” and then saw the gleaming end of a staff whack the demon across the back of the head, sending the thing stumbling, and saw Eleanor atop the high rock she and Solas had been casting from, holding her staff more like a sword.

It gave him the opportunity to get back on his feet before the demon regained its own footing.

When the demons were dealt with, Ellie cast against the Rift, light pouring from her hand until the Rift snapped shut. That was...something. It felt like one of those things one should be fortunate enough see at least once in their life—magic strange and powerful doing something that would otherwise be impossible. She shook out her hand once it was closed and he wondered if the Mark was a painful thing, but she didn’t say anything of it, just turned to face her group and grinned as she congratulated them on a job well done, that Blackwall was a welcome addition to their fights. They regrouped then, ready to move on and search the ruin for anything related to the Wardens. Ellie though, did hand the Warden a vial of something green, telling him he should drink it if he were injured before she began her search.

His back was stiff from being knocked down, and his head ached something fierce, he had the feeling if he ran a hand through his hair it would come away bloody, he’d cracked his head when the demon knocked him down. So, he downed the potion in one go and reveled in the relief that worked its way through him, clearing his thoughts.

“Oh! These are maps I think, is this something?” Ellie was calling then, and lo and behold, she’d found a crate of Warden maps tucked away in an abandoned makeshift camp, left abandoned by what he could only speculate was a fallen Warden. No one would just leave maps like this if they could help it.
“Excellent find, these could be useful to your Inquisition,” Blackwall said.

The girl grunted when she hoisted the crate up to carry herself, but Blackwall wouldn’t have that—the Seeker either it seemed, the Nevarran woman had been about to take the crate from the girl herself—but the Warden stepped up and said he would carry it. He wasn’t sure where to, but it turned out they’d set up an Inquisition camp just below the lake. Ellie led them back to camp and introduced him to the soldiers there, telling him he could leave the maps there and he could decide what to do with them—whether they should see if they could be used in the Hinterlands, or if they should be shipped off to Haven.

She sat him down then, with a scout, and the Lady Seeker and they discussed terms. What would his role be in the Inquisition, what would he need in Haven, and his payment. Blackwall had objections to that—he’d volunteered, he hadn’t expected to be paid on top of being provided a place to lay his head. Ellie relented on that, but struck him with a compromise—he was to take an equal share of anything they found in their journeys, much was sent back to Haven or spread out across their forces in the Hinterlands, but a portion was kept for the party itself, and he would have access to that, ‘no buts’ she said.

The scout took down what Ellie dictated and when they were through, he rolled up the contract and said he would see it be in their Spymaster’s hands before the week was out.

Blackwall was given his own stock of health potion then, and Ellie asked that he help them keep an eye out for ingredients because one could never have enough Elf Root, and did he know that Druffalo liked Elf Root? He hadn’t, and this prompted the girl to tell a tale of a woman named Marehis, and their close encounter with an angry Druffalo father.

“That’s definitely going in the book, Tumbles,” Varric said as he laughed.

“You do well keeping Marehis ever on her toes, lethallan,” Solas agreed jovially.

“Really, Eleanor.” Cassandra sighed in exasperation. “I was wondering why your security protocols had such a ridiculous update to them—I thought perhaps Leliana was overthinking and considering every possible demise you could suffer. That created a new position, you realize, ‘Druffalo feeder’. We have scouts leaving offerings of Elf Root and feed to that herd.”

That made Ellie beam, she was practically bubbling over with her glee, bouncing in her seat as she asked excitedly, “Really? Oh wow, that’s so great, the Druffalo must be loving it! Oh gosh we’ve been gone so long, I wonder how big the babies have gotten—they were so little!”

It made Blackwall almost sick. The girl faced down apparently every single big bad that had been threatening the Hinterlands, had the responsibility of an entire world-saving operation resting on her shoulders, and here she was, giggling and cooing over baby Druffalos, the very picture of childlike innocence. She should be…Maker, somewhere! Home! Where were her parents, how could they be letting her do this? What sick bastard Marked her of all people for this purpose? She should be in some village somewhere, in a proper bedroom not some campsite in the woods, going to school worrying about dates and dances and homework, not demons and wars and the end of the world.

She’d spared a moment for fun with her companions, giving them the opportunity to rest and resupply, and the relief of a funny story before she stood and said she was ready, if they were, to make the final push to Horse Master Dennet’s farm.

“There’s a Rift, a nasty one, wreaking all kinds of havoc around there. I would like it cleared, and the farm secured before we go asking the man to supply our forces with his steeds. It’s our job to seal it anyway, but it may as well serve to help our appeal to Master Dennet,” Ellie said, “I think with the added help our new friend can provide, we can take that thing down.”

It nearly took them down, is what it did. There were moments when he thought they might retreat, but they pressed on. Every time that blasted Rift produced high level demon after demon, Ellie dug her boots—literally at one point—into the ground and faced them without question, casting against the Rift when she could to weaken their opponents.

A shade sunk its claw into the girl’s thigh—Blackwall had meant to dismember the limb before it could strike her, but what resulted was the Shade reeling back in pain, raising its hand as black blood gushed from the place its finger had been removed. He killed the Shade and Ellie didn’t stop, didn’t retreat even as he thought the girl might fall over dead—they were all wounded, and almost out of potion.

And then she raised her hand to the sky and sealed the Rift.

Maybe it was his sins come back to haunt him. Destiny saw fit that he would look to his leader, follow who he should want to be, and see a child braver than Thom Rainier had ever been.

It was one thing after another then. Just when they thought they’d gotten to safety, had secured the girl, something was wrong. She’d bled so much, Blackwall himself had some on his boots, but surely not that much, not so much that the girl was in mortal peril.

But she wouldn’t wake up, couldn’t, it seemed. And then Varric called out and Blackwall went to his aid—wolves of all things had descended upon the Dwarf when he’d gone to refill their water supply.

And now the Elf, Solas, was saying that they were demon possessed, and that they must be dealt with and the demon destroyed because he believed it was laying claim on Ellie’s mind, trying to take possession of her when it sensed her blood spilling with magic that called its attention to a worthier target than a pack of wolves.

He wanted to go, wanted to gut the demon himself, but a wolf had done a number on his leg—damn thing tried to bite his leg off at the knee. He could stand and fight, hold ground if he needed to—but Varric was the better suited for going with the others to face the demon.

Varric, evidently, hadn’t liked the arrangement either. Warden ‘Lacksballs’, huh? He had to admit, he did agree with the sentiment—any who would harm someone like Ellie deserved such a punishment.

He sat on one of the smaller of the rocks that formed barrier in a semi-circle around their designated campsite. The girl lay where Cassandra had left her, lying on her back in the grass, her expression lax.

Maker, she was just a girl. And now there was some Demon mucking about, trying to get in her head, and there was nothing to do but wait for others to aid her. What if the wolves hadn’t attacked? What if Solas and Cassandra hadn’t figured out what was wrong, and she’d been possessed?

He couldn’t think of that. If Ellie became possessed…well he was pretty sure he’d just let her kill him.

He couldn’t do anything, save sit and stay and protect. And apparently, overthink.

He busied himself, paying close attention to the fire, keeping it tended so it burned warm, the Hinterlands could get chilly. He didn’t suppose Varric would take offense if he laid one of their blankets over the girl—she had been ice cold before, when he’d checked her for fever. So, he went to the fire and shuffled the logs with a stick to keep it going strong, and took up a blanket, carefully covering Ellie before returning to his post.

It was maddening, the wait.

And then it was outright terrifying when Ellie screamed sitting bolt upright, eyes open wide.

“Ellie?” he questioned hopefully. Screaming was not entirely a reassurance that the girl was herself.

She stopped her screaming, and her hand went to grip at her throat as if the sound had surprised even her, her breathing haggard as if she’d just been running for her life. She looked around shaking, her expression so very grave.

“Ellie?” he asked again, and this time she turned more, saw him sitting nearby and relief came over her face.

“Everyone?” she asked, her voice hoarse.

“They went to kill the demon,” Blackwall said, “are…are you alright now?”

She swallowed as if her words caught in her throat, and she nodded. “Mm-hmm.”

And then her chin quivered, and he found her tears more horrifying than when she’d screamed.

Screaming was fear—one could usually conquer or kill a fear. Crying was more complicated, and he wasn’t sure he could kill anything and make it better.

So, he got up off his rock and his leg shouted it’s protest as he knelt at the girl’s side and put a hand on her back, patting gently. “It’s okay, Ellie, you’re awake now, it’s okay.”

He’d meant to console, to comfort, but Ellie began sobbing then, covering her mouth with a hand as she tried to quiet herself while she hunched forward and wept.

Maker’s balls.

“What the hell did you do to her you asshole?!” Varric’s voice bellowed.

Maker’s balls.

“Calm yourself, Varric~” Solas tried to reason.

“Chuckles, get off me! I’m just gonna shoot him!”

“Eleanor,” Cassandra’s voice sounded next, and the Nevarran woman was in the grass, sliding on her knees to be before Ellie, her hands on the girl’s shoulders, “Eleanor calm yourself. The demon is gone.”

Varric and Solas came to stand with them. Solas was holding the Dwarf’s crossbow, lugging it on his shoulder and out of reach of her owner.

Ellie shook, removing her hand from her mouth she sobbed out, “I-I-I couldn’t talk, I couldn’t wake up that thing was t-t-trying to get in me, take over my mind and,” she let out an awful sound, and then, “It said all these horrible things and tried to trick me into letting it in—it said you were in danger, that it would send the wolves and kill you. I tried to wake up, I tried to warn you but when I did it only got worse—called me…it said more awful things and then it said I’d been too late that you were all dead and it showed me—made me see just horrible—” she squeezed her eyes shut. “I woke up and d-didn’t see anyone, I thought you were all-”

Blackwall didn’t think she could speak anymore if she tried. Cassandra realized as much and pulled Ellie into her arms and hugging her fiercely, tucking the girl’s head beneath her chin, her gauntleted hand gently running down the hair at the back of Ellie’s head, “Shh shh shh shh shh, it is alright. You are alright now, and so are your friends. We are all safe. Just…let it all out, we can discuss anything you wish to later.”

It was dreadful. The girl cried as if the world had ended, and Blackwall wondered where demons went when they died, if they were gone forever or if they returned to the Fade. He stood conflicted between hoping that thing was gone for good, and praying he could get his hands on that thing and rend it limb from limb, make it feel tenfold the fear and pain it had inflicted on the Herald.

His hand slipped from its place on Ellie’s back, so Cassandra could hold the girl more tightly, and the woman rocked a bit, side to side as she began rubbing circles on Ellie’s back.

“They didn’t want to kill you,” Ellie told them pitifully. “The wolves. They saw people and thought they should h-hide, but it made them, forced them to attack, it wanted to force me too—it said it would m-make me kill, use my Mark to free its friends from the Fade.”

Varric swore, which got Blackwall’s attention for fear the man had decided to attack him after all, but he adverted his gaze when he realized the Dwarf might be crying a little. Solas looked sullen, full of weariness and regret.

She did stop crying, after a moment more she hugged Cassandra back and squeezed before pulling away and wiping at her eyes. “Sorry, sorry, I’m okay,” she said.

Solas withdrew a handkerchief and handed it to the girl who sniffled and with a small, wet smile she said, “At this rate I’ll use up all your handkerchiefs.”

“Then it is good they are not difficult to make,” Solas said, and that seemed to get the girl’s attention, she blinked up at him and asked,

“You make these?”

At her amazement the Elf man’s ears pinked at the tips, “I do. They are just squares of cloth, da’len, it is a skill of little note,” Solas said.

“Mmm, I think you just offended professional handkerchief craftsmen everywhere, Solas.” Ahh, joking, that was a good sign.

“And should I meet one, I shall apologize. Are you well, da’len? You should drink water if you are settled, you lost much blood not to mention…well,” he seemed hesitant to say ‘you cried until it looks like you have nothing left to cry’ for fear it might actually send the girl to tears again.

“I am a little thirsty,” she admitted, in a way that implied she was a lot thirsty. Cassandra handed her the canteen she’d tried to get her to drink from earlier. “Thanks,” Ellie said before proceeding to drain the thing dry.
And then a stranger’s voice cried out,

“Name yourselves!”

Blackwall, Cassandra, and Ellie surged to their feet, the girl stumbled, and shot an arm out to Cassandra for support as she swayed and then steadied herself.

A bald, dark-skinned mustached man approached from the direction of the farmstead, armed with longsword—at his side stood a small, elderly woman armed with a rake of all things, looking for all the world she could defend her homestead to the death with the gardening tool.

“Master Dennet?” Ellie asked.

“Who wants to know?” the elderly woman groused on the man’s behalf.

Ellie let go of Cassandra and held up her hands in a reassurance she meant no harm.

“My name is Ellie, and I am an agent of the Inquisition.”

Master Dennet was super sweet once he…you know…put the sword away.

Ellie tried her best to explain the situation—they were with the Inquisition, and they’d just sealed the Rift west of his property, and that awful screaming that had brought them running armed to fight, she was super sorry for that!

Master Dennet’s wife, Elaina had this very stern manner about her. When Ellie told them who they were and their hopes that Master Dennet would lend them the aid of his horses, the woman barked at them to get in her house ‘so help her god’. So, they were invited into the Horse Master’s home, and a man named Bron came and took a look at Blackwall’s leg, cleaning the injury. Eliana had just a beautiful garden out front of their home, and in it were a few Elf Root plants, she was kind enough to let Ellie pick a few leaves for Bron to press over the tooth marks surrounding Blackwall’s knee and secure them beneath bandaging.

“Here. It isn’t quite as good as potion, but if you chew on it, it should help somewhat,” Ellie said, handing an Elf Root leaf in each hand to offer to Varric and Blackwall respectively. Poor Varric and his chest hair, she hoped the Dwarf wouldn’t be discomforted by any scaring the wolf’s claw would leave across his chest. She thought it would look rather dashing, like something the man could play up to impress a lover.

Knowing Varric, the man already had the exact way he’d deliver such a tale worked up in his head, ready to deliver to whoever took his fancy.

Now they—Cassandra, Solas, Blackwall, and Varric—were seated with Ellie around a small kitchen table in the Horse Master’s house, discussing his possibly helping the Inquisition.

Master Dennet’s wife, Elaina, was motivated to make Ellie eat something. She had soup simmering on the stove, and she’d already served them tea. Ellie didn’t particularly dislike tea, not as Solas did, but the Elf was steadily nursing the drink politely, while she was busying herself talking. She was nervous, having taken the lead on these discussions, and she worried if she added anything to the mix of nausea and exhaustion she was feeling at this point, she would sick up in the middle of Elaina’s house and that wasn’t exactly charming behavior was it? Josephine certainly wouldn’t approve.

“We’ve been told your horses the best this side of the Frostbacks, Scout Harding said,” Ellie related to the Horse Master.

“Harding…” Master Dennet was thoughtful, “the tailor’s girl?"

Ellie wasn’t sure, she felt a bit badly she didn’t know more about the woman, but she said, “She’s a Dwarf, red hair, cute freckles.”

“Rowdy little Lace Harding is an Inquisition Scout?” Eliana asked, as if doubtful.

“Yup, the best!” Ellie said. “Really, she helped lay the groundwork for everything we’ve done here in the Hinterlands, none of it could have happened without her efforts to scout the area.”

“I’m glad to hear she’s doing so well for herself,” Eliana said, “maybe all the years of shooting practice arrows at miscreant boys’ backsides will serve her well.”

“Miscreant boys?” Ellie asked.

“A combination of boyhood crushes and the uncertainty of what exactly to do with a Dwarf girl running around underfoot,” Dennet explained. “They teased her relentlessly—she took it all in stride and corrected them with welts the size of tomatoes on their backs.”

Ellie couldn’t help but laugh at the thought of a miniature version of the Dwarf girl she’d met running around Redcliff shooting at people’s bottoms of all things.

“Well then, I suppose we should discuss terms. I do have steeds perfect for aiding the Inquisition’s efforts,” Dennet said.

“If you would allow me?” Ellie asked. At Dennet’s gesture for her to go ahead, Ellie sat up straight in her chair, removing her hands from the warmth of the mug to rest in her lap as she spoke.

“We’ve sealed the Rift down the way from here. I saw another just beyond your armory, I’ll see it sealed as well once my party and I have had a chance to gear up for another fight. We would like to settle a camp—for Inquisition forces, back where you found us earlier. It would be a help to us—giving us a place in the area to rest and resupply when we have work here—and it would serve to secure the area around your farm, our soldiers would defend your land, and should you need anything the Inquisition could provide, they would get word to the right people if they could not help themselves.”

“That is what you offer in exchange for my horses?” Master Dennet asked.

“That is what I offer in exchange for your allowing us to have an Inquisition camp on your property. I know we caused quite the commotion earlier, but I assure you we’re relatively quiet neighbors,” Ellie said. “I wanted to get that out of the way and settled so we both have the security that the Inquisition can do its job, before we discuss your steeds.”

“Eliana,” Dennet prompted.

His wife stood leaning against the entryway to their kitchen, eyes closed, listening as Ellie had spoken.

“Sounds reasonable to me. You want to camp near the road anyway, we don’t use that area for anything, it may as well be good for something,” Eliana said, opening her eyes and nodding.

“I agree,” Dennet said, “your people are welcome here.”

Ellie smiled, relieved, and she held out her hand across the table to the Horse Master, and they shook on the first of their deals. “Then it’s a deal. Now, as for your steeds,” Ellie said, “name your terms. They are the effort of your hands, I want you to feel confident in your decision to support the Inquisition with their use.”

“I’ve been attempting to secure the Hinterlands—give us the means to defend ourselves,” Master Dennet started. “I appreciate the Inquisition’s efforts, we haven’t had much in the way of news lately but what has been able to get through has been word of what you’ve done here. But we should be able to rely on ourselves, you understand?”

Ellie nodded, and prompted him to continue.

“We have weapons and even something in the way of armor that we would like to distribute to the locals, but before I arm the poor sods I’d rather have a stronger foundation set up for them to build from—in form a proper militia we need the ability to scout out the area and have communication between patrols across the Hinterlands. Would the Inquisition be able to assist my men in constructing Watchtowers?”

“Oh golly, yeah!” Ellie said. She’d been concerned the man was about to ask for the moon or something, but Watchtowers, that sounded doable. “Do you have anything in the way of materials? Or is it just manpower you require?”

“Bron has some recruits rounded up, but we would appreciate a few more hands on board. We’ve nearly got all the materials—wood, concrete. Bron’s got the plans all drawn up, we’ve nearly got all the materials though we haven’t found a good source for nails, supports, the like.”

“The Hinterlands has a Master Horseman, but the Inquisition has a Master Blacksmith—Harritt can get you nails and anything else metal cast. If Bron wouldn’t mind, our scouts could make a copy of his plans and materials list to send along to him Haven. I’ll get word to Commander Cullen, he’s the head of Inquisition forces, and I’m certain he can get some more helpful hands for building the towers.”

“Excellent. That would be most appreciated.”

“Tell her about the wolves,” Eliana stressed to her husband.

“Oh, yes love. There are wolves that have been attacking our farms as of late. It’s unusual—they’ve never behaved this way before…are you quite alright?” Dennet’s question had the adults in the room looking at Ellie.

She’d felt she might sick up for a moment, and her heart did a funny little turn in her chest, it stopped beating for a moment and then suddenly it pounded in her ears like she was running.

She shook her head and smiled, “Oh! I’m fine,” Cassandra let out something of an angry huff when Ellie said that. But the girl continued, “We uh, met your wolf problem earlier. It’s been dealt with. There was a demon who possessed control of the pack, ordering them to attack. The demon and its wolves won’t bother your farms again.”

“Ahh, well then,” Master Dennet looked to his wife, “is there anything else to add?”

“Nothing I can think of.”
“Then it’s settled. The Inquisition will assist in the construction of watchtowers for the Hinterlands, and in return, they have all the horses in my stables, as well as good hands to go with them. Including you and your travel companions,” Dennet said, “when you’ve time, I’ll take you to the stables and we’ll see you get a proper mount. You’ve been traversing the Hinterlands on foot all this time, haven’t you?”

“Oh yes,” Ellie said, while her feet screamed YES. Her poor boots, they’d been so shiny and new, and now she wasn’t sure they’d make it all the way back to Haven. Harritt had worked so hard on them, and she was worried she’d have to ask the man to repair them or provide her new ones altogether.

And there was already the hole in her leggings, but she could patch that up she thought. It would be an insult to Harritt’s handiwork, and Josephine might have something to say about it like it didn’t look appropriate or fashionable or something, but armor was just supposed to work. Though she did certainly appreciate the beauty of the armor Harritt had crafted for her, it was glorious.

“Well, we can’t have you lot hoofing it across the Hinterlands and sundry. My horses will serve you well.”

“Thank you, Master Dennet,” Ellie said. And then hesitantly… “You must really love your horses, don’t you?”

“Ahh, I suppose I do. They’re noble beasts and I take a great amount of pride in their rearing.”

“This might not be my place,” she looked between Dennet and Eliana and offered, “but…if you would like, there is no one better to care for your horses than you yourself. While I’m sure you have complete faith in the stable hands you’ve offered, no one is going to take as great care as you would—you raised them, you know what suits them best. Would you consider coming to Haven? Working as our Horse Master?”

Master Dennet considered that, a moment. His hand smoothed over his mustache as he contemplated the offer.

“You are Andrasten, are you not, Master Dennet?” Cassandra spoke then. Ellie looked to the Seeker, wondering where she was going with this.

“I am,” the Horse Master said, “I believe in the Maker, and I would like to think my work serves him.”

“Would your work not serve his will with a higher purpose, working directly with our cause—coming to work at the call of the Herald of Andraste herself?”

“Herald of Andraste?” Dennet questioned, as if Cassandra had just brought up a random topic. Oh. Or he thought she was speaking of someone who wasn’t here.

Ellie removed her glove, revealing the Mark on her hand for the elderly couple to see.

“You?” Dennet asked. “You are the Herald?”

“That’s what they tell me,” Ellie said breezily. “I don’t want to pressure you, I understand wanting to be with your family, to not want to necessarily be in the thick of things. But if you wanted to follow your horses, care for them, and serve the Inquisition directly, we’d be more than happy to have you on board.”
Dennet looked to his wife then, the couple having some sort of silent conversation. It ended with her giving a little smile and kissing her husband on the top of his head before returning to the stove. She began dishing out soup into bowls for everyone.

“I would be honored to serve the Inquisition,” Dennet said.

“That’s so great!” Ellie exclaimed and then caught herself in her excitement and cleared her throat, and sitting up straight she continued more calmly, “I mean, excellent, we’ll draw up a contract for you and get it sent to Haven. Shall we discuss those terms?”

“You shall eat something, child, before you pass out on my floors—we’ve just mopped mind,” Eliana said as she put a bowl of soup in front of Ellie. “Food first, you’ve said enough words for now.”

It smelled delicious and Ellie found her stomach wasn’t so very upset any longer, now that they’d not only secured a camp, horses, and a horse master for the Inquisition. The worst of it was over, the negotiating and the nervousness that hung in one’s stomach until they knew how things were going to work out. Everything had. Worked out, that is.

So, Ellie thanked her for the meal, and held out her hands to those sitting next to her, Solas was seated on her left, and Varric on her right. Everyone joined hands and Master Dennet led them in prayer before they dug in.

Tumbles was by no means a businesswoman, she’d be eaten alive if she tried any of that crap with anyone from the Merchants guild.

Well. With the exception of Varric himself, maybe, but he was more a wanted criminal of the Merchants Guild than a member at the moment.

Regardless, Tumbles really shouldn’t press her luck—and that was it, sheer dumb luck that she just went along with the Horse Master’s requests, zero negotiation, and it didn’t totally blow up in her sweet little face. Just. ‘Sure thing, we’ll build you some watch towers! Oh golly, would you like a job too?’ jeez.

Maybe he should talk to Ruffles about adding him to the kid’s school roster—Street Smarts 101. Just call him Professor Tethras. Lesson one—the world is garbage, trust no one. Lesson two—negotiation is war, take no prisoners, give no giggles. Lesson three…hmm, maybe he should teach her how to pick locks? She might be good at it, she was smart and her small, deft hands were perfect for working with fine tools. Tumbles could take on a double meaning then—she’ll tumble down your hills and work the tumblers in your locks.

Oh well, she’d gotten the job done. They would have horses.

Bah! He was going to have to get on a horse. At least then he wouldn’t have to walk as much, but still. Maker made him short for a reason, he wasn’t supposed to get up much higher than that. Ellie wasn’t much better—half a foot taller than him at the most—she shouldn’t be getting up so high either…now that he thought about it he was kind of worried she’d come tumbling off a horse.

Heights aside he had to admit, he was surprised how well everything had gone. He sure as... hell didn’t think Ellie would pop up and start delicate negotiations with the Horse Master all of two seconds after having a total breakdown.

Didn’t anyone else think maybe the kid needed a minute to maybe breathe? Have a stiff drink? Maybe cry some more? He hadn’t liked her crying, it was honestly one of the worse things he’d encountered in the Hinterlands, but she was just a kid. None of this shit should be happening.

Someone blows up the sky and kills a bunch of people, she gets blamed for it. Suddenly the sky-hole says she’s innocent, and now she’s Herald of An-freaking-draste. Inquisition needs someone to gather allies to win over the Chantry of all places, well let’s just send the girl they want to kill! Everyone’s got a problem? Just hand it off to Ellie! Her hands aren’t nearly full enough, it hasn’t killed her yet. She gets tormented by a demon and…what? She gets to cry it out for two minutes before being thrown back into handling the Inquisition’s business for them again?

Seeker should be doing this shit. This was all her doing, all her fault. She’s the one that got Ellie involved in this bullshit to begin with. And Ellie just took it, was just fine with it, thought Cassandra was looking out for her, was her friend.

Maybe the Seeker wasn’t actively working against the girl, hell Varric knew the Seeker had a soft spot for her, would die defending her, but she was just…she definitely wasn’t Ellie’s friend. ‘Herald of Andraste’ was a tool, a weapon of the Inquisition, Ellie was just part of Cassandra’s mission.

Seeker couldn’t admit to herself that Ellie was just a kid and shouldn’t have all this bearing down on her—if she did that, she might actually have to feel convicted over her part in the never-ending debauchery that was probably going to land the poor girl in some expensive ass therapy if she was lucky.

Some asshole made it so that she was the only one who could seal the damn Breach, but why drag her all across the world, into countless danger? Keep her in Haven, take care of her, and bring her out when necessary, don’t use her like a little pawn to make nice with the Chantry. Damn.

He sometimes thought about ‘after’. There didn’t seem to be an immediate end in sight, but he had to believe Ellie would seal the Breach, and live, and have a life after this.

He believed in the Maker. Not his jackass people, or the those tall-hats that claimed to represent him, but he believed in the Maker, himself. And the Maker could not put someone through all this bullshit just to cut their life short, give them nothing but death in return.

But what would happen once the Breach was sealed. Would the Seeker hand her over to Templars? Would she be Circled?

Nope. Not on his watch. Pardon his Orlesian, but fuck that for sure.

No, Breach sealed, Ellie gets to hightail it out of this joint and do whatever she damn well pleases. Kid could spend her days lounging around eating chocolate and playing with puppies all day for all he gave a damn, he’d fund that in a heartbeat. Had she had any chocolate since joining the Inquisition? He’d have to fix that. He had cocoa connections for days, he might as well put them to good use.

He wasn’t a responsible adult figure meant for blah, parenting, or something. But he had money and money was good for providing. If she would let him, he would provide for whatever plans she might have for later on. She was just fifteen, but how old would she be when this shit was over? Would she want to go to an actual school? A college somewhere, to study magic, or art, or science or whatever the hell she was interested in. She’d have to go to Tevinter for Mage college he figured, he should read up about it. Ellie didn’t seem the sort to want to just sit around and do nothing all day. She’d probably study or work somewhere—she was pretty good at that potions stuff. He didn’t know shit about it, but Chuckles said she ‘showed promise’ so, that had to mean something.

The kid was sitting on one of the rocks that surrounded their new soon-to-be campsite. Inquisition soldiers would be here soon. She was chatting with Blackwall, again, the bearded bastard.

She really needed those street-smart lessons.

Varric didn’t trust him. Not that he had a whole lot of people that he truly trusted—he could count them on one hand. Two were Bianca. One was Hawke. One was himself. That didn’t leave a lot of fingers left over, and Ellie was steadily laying claim to that one.

But this guy was a Warden. Not that he had anything in particular against Wardens. Hawke’s sister Bethany, good old Sunshine, was a Warden.

He might be an okay guy, but Ellie was just a kid, and she somehow still had this sense that people were inherently good.

Wardens, however, didn’t usually become Wardens because they were the most sparkling example of what humanity had to offer. Varric had a feeling that ‘I went to the Deep Roads to save my family from crippling poverty and got Blight-sick’ wasn’t a wholly common recruitment story. Sunshine was an outlier and she should not be accounted for.

Whatever his sins, hopefully they were in the past and stayed there. If Ellie got attached to the guy and then found out he’d done something awful…it would crush her, and then Varric would have to figure out how to crush him.

Him and his dumb pointy beard. Were Wardens not allowed to shave? Oh shit, now the mental image of Bethany with pit hair she could braid was permanently burned into his brain. The Hero just got another point against him.

“Does your leg hurt still?” Ellie asked. Her feet hung a foot off the ground and she swung her legs restlessly as they talked. “Reinforcements should be here soon, and we can get you some proper potion hmm…I thought I saw some Embrium growing around here somewhere—they’re the really pretty plants with red and green flowery blooms. Its nectar mixed with Elf Root makes a nice salve that’s really supposed to clear the sinuses, but I’ve put it on cuts before—things that needed stitches, but I didn’t have access to anything like that—and they healed up just fine.”

Oh, for the love of Andraste, if he had her go traipsing across the farms looking for plants Bianca was gonna—

“You needn’t trouble yourself. Whatever your people have on hand will be just fine,” Hero said.

Okay. He gets half a point back. Bastard.

Ellie wrenched a hand at the back of her neck, “Oh, sorry, I guess I’m being a worry wart huh? You’re a warden, you’re probably used to toughing it out.”

“Hmm, yes I’m no stranger to ‘toughing it out’, though it was more my days at tourney that built my tolerance for injury,” Blackwall said.

“You competed at tourney?” Varric almost hated himself for asking. But damn him he loved some tourney talk.

The Warden looked up at Varric and nodded, “In my youth, before my oaths, yes,” he said. “I was rather caught up in the thrill of money and acclaim that could be won from the chance to best others in battle. Now though I’m merely a spectator—less than really, I’ve not seen it in years, but I try to keep up.”

Makers balls, they had a common interest. Shit. Varric found himself ugh…chatting with the Warden, and it wasn’t awful. Maybe the guy was okay. He wasn’t a total imbecile when it came to his top picks of competitors. And the man seemed grateful for the gaps in his knowledge of recent years proceedings being filled by someone who could really keep up to date with the latest competitions. A lot of money was won and lost, and Varric liked winning, so he paid attention and attended the events proper when he could.

And it was almost fun—once the men got over the initial horror—when Ellie asked;

“What’s tourney?”

Man and Dwarf looked at her like that question was somehow the weirdest thing about her—not her mage shit, not the glowing Mark on her hand—her lack of knowledge of one of the single most important sporting events of the modern world. Seriously? He knew she hadn’t had much in the way of an upbringing but…how the hell had she not heard of tourney? She was from the Free Marches for Maker’s sake!* She had heard of it, it turned out, but only in passing, from arguments between men in bars, or kids chattering excitedly about their favorite competitors winning. She didn’t realize how big it was or how many different arenas of fighting it covered, and Blackwall and Varric were glad to share their knowledge of the subject. It was actually fun, tourney wasn’t a super serious topic, it was something that could take their minds off the Inquisition and the hole in the sky. And it gave Varric a taste for what it would be like to actually teach the girl—kid was smart and enjoyed learning. He’d have her picking locks and negotiating circles around the best of them in no time.

Though no matter how well their conversation served to take their minds off their responsibilities, Ellie came hopping down off her perch next to Blackwall, and the men realized Inquisition soldiers had arrived with supplies, ready to set up camp.

“Good to see you! How was it, getting here?” Ellie asked a scout, Ellie helping them unload the large pack that bore a folded-up tent hanging off the back of it.

“We had no trouble, my lady,” the Scout said politely.

“I’m glad, I think Seeker Cassandra has some ideas for where she’d like tents set up, Cassandra,” Ellie called over her shoulder, only to find the woman was already there, ready to give order and direction. Ellie left her to it and started checking in with everyone else, helping unload, Solas was talking with a soldier and assisting her with getting their potions set up assembled and ready for use.

“Is there anything I should be doing?” Blackwall asked then.

“Nah, just sit tight, I’m sure your leg hurts like shit anyway. Besides, this is usually how it goes down—Ellie runs around trying to help everyone with everything, and Solas and Cassandra do their best to keep up. I just sit back, stay out of the way, and enjoy the show,” Varric said.

“Where does she get the energy? I tire just watching.”

“That’s something to keep in mind,” Varric decided to caution the man. He didn’t seem like a bad guy after all, so maybe he’d listen. “Kids got a lot on her, and she doesn’t know when to take a break. She’ll work herself into the ground, and dig her way to Orzamar, if we let her.”

“Not preferable, but I’m sure that’d be an amusing sight—Dwarves who’ve never so much as seen a human before have one crashing through their ceiling, ‘Hello, Herald of Andraste here, don’t mind me I’m just passing through,’.”

Varric snorted. “Yeah, that’s about right. Dunno if they’d kill her on sight or start a cult. She has a cult now you know? They were worshiping the Breach, but five minutes and one sealed rift later, they’d walk off a cliff if she bid it.”

“Warden Blackwall,” Ellie said as she approached again, leading a human soldier to join them, “This is…Jacob, yeah?” she asked.

“Yes, my lady,” the man said, surprised. He evidently hadn’t reintroduced himself to the Herald.

Ellie was attempting the futile task of remembering everyone’s name. Everyone’s. Kid could be heard humming the tune she’d made up to keep track to herself as they walked along in the Hinterlands, sat around the fire at night.

Hmm. Maybe after this mess she’d study music.

Ellie handed out bottles of health potion to Varric and Blackwall to refill their personal stores of the stuff, and said, “Jacob’s a medic, he’ll see to your injuries. It’s just awful a wolf practically bit his leg off!”

“Well let’s just see what we can do,” Jacob said, and he crouched to begin examining the injury for himself.

“Hey Varric?” Ellie asked.

“What’s up kid? Need something?”

“Nothing major, there’s a new requisition to be filled and I was wondering if you’d look it over with me,” Ellie said.

Requisition? Cassandra usually read those things over with the kid, but the Seeker did look pretty busy with setup. Scouts usually said whether a requisition was important or could be put off, so maybe it was something Ellie wanted seen to right away.

“Sure thing, Tumbles. Whatcha got?”

Night had fallen over the Hinterlands. Inquisition soldiers patrolled the area around their camp—at least those who were not asleep in one of their tents. Cassandra sat at the requisitions table, taking down notes of their travels that day, Blackwall joined her, assisting with recounting the day’s events.

Solas sat, legs crossed before the fire, though meditation did not come quite so easily when he found himself intent upon listening to the conversation at hand—Varric’s conversation, with Ellie, the Dwarf man growing ever insistent with the girl from where he stood in the middle of their camp. Ellie, ever trying to be the tallest, even if it was due only to the height of what she was on, had climbed up onto the highest boulder that surrounded their new camp, sitting with her knees tucked up under her chin, arms wrapped around her legs.

“Go to bed kid,” Varric was saying. He had been endeavoring to persuade the Herald of Andraste to sleep for the better part of five minutes now.

“Noope.”

“Eleanor, you’ve had a trying day,” Cassandra said as she continued writing.

“I’m keeping watch!” the girl persisted.

“You needn’t keep watch,” Cassandra reasoned, “we are in camp; our soldiers will keep watch. We’re secure here, save for the Rift, but we will address that tomorrow. Once you’ve rested.”

“I’ll rest. In like. I dunno, an hour or something. What time do you think bad guys go to bed?”

“Da’len?” Solas saw fit to ask. “Are you concerned of…” he did not wish to embarrass the girl, so he decided perhaps the Elvish term would suit her better, assuming she would understand, “enfanim-eras?”

Fear-dreams. Nightmares.

Ellie sighed, and then hesitantly, she nodded.

Ahh. He knew too well how so very close to possession she’d come. That she had been able to hold the demon at bay, and for so long, it was no small challenge. The Fade called to mages in their sleep, and it was a place made of spirits and demons, and the memories created in the living world. Her ordeals today created plenty of draw within her mind to call forth something horrific while she slept.

He should not have been so careless. Rifts had torn the heavens all across the Hinterlands, demons running amok was to only be expected, Ellie’s blood...there had been so much, and even a drop could elicit attention from demons. He’d seen how she’d endured her illness and injury when facing the Breach—her sudden collapse, even after facing such a formidable Rift, should prompted closer examination of the girl immediately.

His shame felt new when he thought of his reaction to the girl’s words when she’d been struggling. She fought a demon actively attempting to take her mind, intentionally gaining ground and losing it to garner the chance to warn her companions of the demon’s plans to attack them. Had he grown so concerned with his own skin his mind jumped to only impossible conclusions so quickly?

She’d warned him plainly, but it had taken Cassandra to realize Ellie had meant there was a demon at play.

There was nothing to be done now. Like with the Breach, he could only move forward and do what he could to deal with what had come to pass.

“Would you care to meditate with me for a while?” he asked. Quieting her mind before attempting sleep may do well to shield her from reliving her demon encounter as she slept.

“Oh, yeah actually, would you?” Ellie asked in return.

Did she think he only offered in the hopes she would say no? Perhaps he should give her a blanket invitation, he would meditate with her whenever she wished. He could hardly refuse her. Marehis had seen fit to stop by his quarters late one evening after Ellie had fallen asleep, to mention that the girl often tried meditating herself after trying days and found the practice difficult on her own.

He had to admit he’d been…albeit disappointed that she wasn’t there for a more personal reason.

There had been…flirtations. Nothing inappropriate in front of young Ellie, of course. Subtle glances, the occasional game of…he believed the Humans called it ‘footsie’, while taking their meals together—especially when they did so sans Ellie while the girl was in lessons, which allowed for more outright expressions of shared interest. While a city-Elf, Marehis spoke Dalish fluently and the two spoke rather plainly to each other within the privacy the language allowed them in the company of Shemlen.

“Yes,” Solas said in answer of the girl’s question, “if you are willing to come down. While I have enjoyed meditating when doing so high up in mountains, you’ve had a long day. I fear you may fall should you try to climb down afterward; the exercise is meant to relax you.”

“Kinda worried she’ll fall regardless,” Varric chimed in.

“I will come down off this rock and fight you, Tethras!”

“Would you care for a hand, Ellie?” Blackwall offered, coming to stand beneath her and holding up his hands.

Ellie let her legs hang over the edge of the boulder and scooted closer to the edge before leaning down and putting her hands in his and hopping down. The man turned as he lowered her—he’d been so close to the boulder there was no place for her there—and he set her on her feet just behind their tents.

“Thanks!” she said with a little laugh, before going to join Solas, sitting across the fire from him. “Would any of you like to join us?” she asked the rest of the group.

Solas couldn’t see Varric being much into the practice, nor was he certain of Wardens, but he was decently sure there were many branches of Chantry and Templar hierarchy that practiced meditation as part of their initiation processes.

“Nah Tumbles, I’m good. There’s enough going on up here,” Varric said, tapping his temple as he took a seat on a stool near the requisition table, “I don’t need to start digging through it ‘with intent’.”

“I have never had an affinity for it,” Cassandra admitted, “but it is not a wholly unpleasant practice. I will join you if you’d like.”

“Can’t say I’ve done it myself,” Blackwall said, “but I can give it a try.”
“Great!” Ellie said, and she patted the empty earth on either side of her as she instructed, “Just sit criss-cross applesauce, and we’ll play ‘Solas says’.”

“Not exactly the textbook definition,” Solas mused, “but in essence, yes. Be seated and we’ll see how we fare, shall we?”

It went surprisingly well. His own lessons with Ellie had been an unexpected delight—he’d thought a young girl would find meditation dull, struggle to be still and silent externally let alone internally. Cassandra had thankfully been versed in the basics, and Blackwall took instruction well, and it was actually beneficial to have the Seeker’s and Ellie’s input to aid Solas’s explanation.

After some time, there was silence shared by those surrounding the fire.

When they were done, Ellie was openly yawning, and it was only Lady Josephine’s strict instruction that had the girl snapping a hand up at the last minute to cover her mouth as she did.

“Sandman finally calling you kid?”

“I’d pop any man who thought he should sprinkle sand of all things in my eyes to make me sleep, right in the throat. Cassandra’s taught me how to punch good,” Ellie informed him as she stretched.

“I have taught you how to punch, I would not necessarily class it as good,” Cassandra said dryly, “but it is passable at the very least.”

“Liver punches are much more efficient,” Blackwall saw fit to inform the girl, “you may surprise or momentarily choke someone striking them in the throat, but catch a man in the liver, you’ve got them flat on their backs.”

“I’ll have to remember that,” Ellie said. “Does everyone know how they’re sleeping tonight? I can sleep ou-”

“In the tent with Seeker, Tumbles,” Varric cut her off, “Hero here can bunk with Chuckles and me.”

“Go prepare for bed Eleanor, I will be along shortly,” Cassandra said. Ellie held up her hands as if to say ‘alright, alright’ and took up her pack, entering the tent to change out of her armor.

They were all quiet for a moment, only the crackle of their fire, and the sound of nocturnal wildlife could be heard within their camp.

And then the Seeker spoke, gravely,

“We nearly lost her today.”

Her statement was met with silence, thick and heavy, loaded with the words rattling around unsaid.

“We cannot lose her.”

That was met with Varric’s bitter snap, “Of course not. Can’t have the Herald of Andraste biting the big one before she seals the Breach-”

“I do not mean the Herald of Andraste!” Cassandra rounded on the Dwarf in uncharacteristically shrill tones before falling octaves into deep conviction, “We cannot lose Ellie!”

They had endured much together since they met under the threat of the Breach. This, was the most vulnerable the lady Seeker allowed herself to become, never had he heard the woman sound so…well he had the urge to offer her a handkerchief. She was not in tears, but her voice was thick, and Solas suspected if she were pushed, it was not so inconceivable that they may well see the Seeker cry.

Solas was not going to push. Blackwall hardly had such motive to.

Varric was another matter but…to no small measure of surprise, he did not push either. In fact, the Dwarf was looking at the Seeker as if he were mildly horrified and ultimately relieved that his snipe had dragged such a truth from her.

Seekers often dealt in truth. But they very rarely were the ones to divulge it.

“She is-” Cassandra’s voice wavered, and she gave pause. Then, with certainty, “We must be more careful. Whatever comes of this, she must be safe.”

That night, while the Herald of Andraste had fallen straight into her bedroll, armor be damned, and laid fast asleep in the comfort of her tent, like a bad joke about a bar, an Elf, two humans, and a Dwarf gathered in the Hinterlands and took a solemn vow to guard the girl from whatever the harm, at whatever the cost.

—

“Let’s see…there’s Annie, and Misha, and David, and Liam, oh—baby Dana, she’s six months old and I swear, hand to the Maker, she calls me uncle.”

Snow fell gently as Ellie and Trevelyan tread the path through the wintry landscape. They were surrounded by thick woods—beautiful evergreens guarding them as they walked, further and further to arrive at the Conclave in time. The sun was still high in the sky, they had hours of light left to travel by. It was cold, but they walked closely, Trevelyan radiated warmth, and the Mercenary Coat he’d gotten her fit well and did an excellent job keeping the cold at bay. The boots he’d given here were thick and she liked the sound they made as they walked—a steady, soft crunch of snow underfoot.

She liked the way it felt to be walking side by side with a friend. Aside from Ava, Trevelyan was the best friend she’d ever had. She missed Ava…

She missed Trevelyan.

Wait, what?

She shook herself of the strange thought and went about teasing the man, “Hand to the Maker?” Ellie asked.

“Yup! Andraste strike me down if I lie—Dana Trevelyan has looked me right in the eye and called me unc-key. Which everyone knows is baby talk for uncle.”
“She could be trying to say yucky. Which everyone knows is baby talk for ‘you smell’,” Ellie said, leaning in and taking a loud sniff of the man’s arm, “ugh! And she’d be right! You’re wretched, Trevelyan! If we show up at the Temple of Sacred Ashes with you smelling to high heaven, Andraste really will strike us down.”

“Brat!” Trevelyan called her with a laugh, “You’re one to talk, you’ve still got spider sludge on your cheek!” he said as he swiped a gloved thumb across her left cheek to wipe away some of the drying green slime.

“We shouldn’t have even been in that cave! At this point they’ll have the Conclave without us. You’ve literally been locked away in a school for years, how is it exactly you don’t know how to follow a map?”

“Sorry I’m not little miss world-traveler-extraordinaire-”

“The Free Marches are hardly the world. And if extra-warden-whatever is a fancy way of calling me a bad word, I’ll slap you right upside the head with my boot Trevelyan, I swear I will.”

“You’d have to be able to reach my head, short stuff,” Trevelyan sniped back, and then explained, “Extraordinaire is the fancy Orlesian way of saying extraordinary.”

“Extra ordinary? Ouch, I’m still an Apostate, that ought to count for something.”

“Outside the realm of the ordinary,” Trevelyan corrected her, “Excellent. It’s a compliment, kid. I’d sooner spit at my mother than call a lady a ‘bad word’.”

Ellie snorted. “I’m not a lady. You’re not going to say I am to the Chantry people, are you?”

“Noooo,” Trevelyan insisted, his tones rife with sarcasm, “I would never dream of telling the Chantry people that my dear, dear cousin Eleanor is a Lady. That would totally blow your cover. As a Lady.”

“Okay okay, I just…feel badly. I don’t really like lying—I mean they’ll be Chantry Mothers for goodness sake.”

“Worried the Maker will smite you?” Trevelyan teased.

Ellie giggled. “Well it’s certainly not the best way to die if you’d like to join the Maker in the afterlife.”

“And yet you live.”

“Huh?” Ellie asked, she stopped in her tracks when she realized Trevelyan wasn’t walking alongside her anymore. She turned around and saw him just standing in the path arms limp at his sides, his head was hanging down so that she couldn’t see his face.

“Trevelyan?” she asked, “What’s wrong?”

It was then she saw blood ooze and spread across his tunic, dripping wet into the snow, and Ellie screamed, “You’re hurt! Help! Somebody we need help!” Wait? Who was she yelling for? She ran to Trevelyan, hands searching as she tried to figure out what she should do.

His hands wrenched around to grip her forearms like a vise, squeezing, and then squeezing tighter still, and a distant thought rang through her mind—it was her thought, but it was like the memory of thought going Maker, Maker, Maker that hurts!

Suddenly the air was thick with the heady smell of atmosphere the Fade brought to the world when a Rift was near, and the earth beneath them was rubble.

“It was all your fault! I had to die, Ellie,’’ Trevelyan sneered her name. “I had to suffer. I was in pain, and now I’m dead. The Divine is dead. Thousands of people are dead, dead, dead and you get to walk around playing Herald when you are nothing but worthless street trash. Lady Herald? How about Liar. Garbage. Traitor. I thought we were friends Ellie,’’ the man seethed as his fingers dug deeper into her wrists and Ellie was horrified to find his hands were like Shade claws, implanting themselves deep in her arms, she could feel them crumbling a path into her bones, blood welling up and pouring out from her flesh surrounding his puncturing talons. “You left me. You left us. To die!”

And then suddenly it wasn’t Trevelyan screaming in her face. He was replaced by the mage boy she’d killed their first day at the Crossroads. Oh Maker, he was young.

“Who gave you the right? It wasn’t enough you survived the Conclave—you of all people. Now you walk around killing people in the name of your Inquisition, how many have to die before someone sees you for what you really are? You think Cassandra, or Varric, Solas, even that Warden—Blackwall—wont figure you out, take you down themselves? They’re noble people. Someday they’ll realize you’re nothing but apostate-trash, a freak mage, that you’ve done nothing but take advantage of their Inquisition—playing Herald to keep food in your belly and a roof over your head. Seal the Breach? You can’t seal the Breach. How long will they keep letting you coast by on your little Rift trick? They’ll see, and they will hate you, and then they will kill you themselves.”

Then he was just gone, and hand wound its way around her throat—a large, spindly fingered hand of a Great Terror wrapped around her neck and pulled her up to be face to face with the creature. She couldn’t breathe.

“You wretched little bitch. You should have let me deal with your friends. You think I’m gone? You may have kept me from stealing your mind, but I will always be with you, always waiting in some small corner of your consciousness. One day you won’t be so lucky, one of my brothers will take you and you will serve us.”

She wanted the scream, wanted to refute the beast and call for someone, anyone to help her. But like before, when the demon had clawed at her mind, tried to take possession of her body and her Mark, he’d stolen her voice—this time by squeezing it from her as opposed to stealing every ounce of focus and effort she could muster to keep him at bay. He wrenched her head to the side and to her horror she saw a pile of bodies in the midst of the burning field of carnage outside the Temple of Sacred Ashes, or what was left of it.

These bodies, they were her friends, her companions, Cassandra, Solas, Varric, even Blackwall, their battered bodies lifeless and broken.

“When!” the demon roared in her face.

What?

“Eleanor, child, wake up!”

Cassandra’s voice, clear as day, and Ellie shot awake, sitting bolt upright, almost smacking her head into Cassandra’s face the woman had been so close, shaking her awake.
Ellie gasped in as much air as her burning lungs could hold—had she actually stopped breathing as she slept? Her head felt light and her chest ached something fierce.

As she slept…sleep, she’d been asleep and all of that had just been a horrible dream and she found herself being pulled against the Seeker’s chest, Ellie’s cheek resting against her shoulder—Cassandra was in the warm linen shirt and leggings she’d taken to sleeping in—and the older woman’s arms wrapped around her, a hand rubbing circles on her back as Cassandra made low shushing sounds. Oh. Ellie realized then she was crying a little.

“Um, I-I’m alright really, I’m sorry. Did I wake you?” Ellie asked as she returned the hug.

“No. Though even if you had there would be no reason to apologize, Eleanor,” Cassandra half-reprimanded the girl, squeezing her more tightly before she pulled away then to look at Ellie. The tent was dark except for the pale morning light creeping in through the half-undone tent flap.

“Oh, were you going somewhere?” Ellie found herself asking. Oh. That was nosey wasn’t it?

But it didn’t seem so to Cassandra, apparently, as the Nevarran said, “I wake at this hour daily, it is when I stretch and take prayer in preparation for the day ahead.”

Wow, this early? She bet the sun wasn’t even visible on the horizon yet! “Oh! Gosh, you should go then, I’m fine now-”

“Eleanor,” Cassandra reprimanded, “as you have said that word in reference to your wellbeing before falling into demon-induced coma, I will no longer accept it to mean you are well. You had a nightmare, yes? Do you wish to speak of it?”

A refusal rose to her lips, but Ellie stopped, and then pulled her knees up, wrapping her arms around her legs and resting her chin on her knees. She was still in armor huh, she vaguely remembered stumbling into the tent last night, and falling into her bedroll as she unrolled it and she’d been out like a light.

“I’ve had the dream before, it’s like a memory at first,” Ellie said, “Trevelyan and I, on our way to the Conclave but…but then he isn’t himself at all, and he gets so angry with me.”

She recounted the dream for Cassandra, the Seeker sitting on her side, elbow on the ground as her hand supported her head, and she listened quietly as Ellie explained.

“Do you dream like this often?” Cassandra asked quietly, when Ellie finished.

“Not every night or anything but…kind of. The Trevelyan part I dreamt off and on after waking up in Haven. The mage boy started after…well while we’ve been here. The demon part is relatively new,” she said as if she were trying to joke but it fell flat.

“Have you spoken of this with anyone? Marehis, or Healer Adan?”

Ellie shook her head. “Why would I tell anyone? I mean it’s kind of embarrassing. I’m not a little kid, and I know it’s just a dream.”

“A nightmare, Eleanor, of things that are honestly concerning. I-” She seemed uncertain what to say and she nixed whatever it was, and started over, “You must wake me if you have another, the only thing I can think to aid you is to give you opportunity to discuss it. When we return to Haven, I ask that you inform Adan of your troubles. There is potion that would assist in your sleeping peacefully.”
“Really?”

“Yes,” she seemed hesitant. But she rose to sit with her legs crossed before her, like they had when meditating, and she regarded Ellie silently for a moment.

“When I was a girl, my elder brother Anthony was a mighty and fierce Dragon Hunter—as is a trademark of the Pentaghast name.”

Oh. Cassandra had never said she had a brother. She’d mentioned her parents, and occasionally had a funny little anecdote about her distant relatives trying to marry her off or persuade her from her position with the Chantry to be a housewife, but never a brother.

“Apostates sought Dragon blood to use in their blood magic and Anthony refused them. They killed him, and I bore witness to the act.”

“Cassandra,” Ellie breathed, she tentatively put a hand on Cassandra’s knee, and she felt her chin quivering, tears welling up in her eyes again. “I’m so sorry.”

Maker, could she really have been going to the Conclave in the hopes of getting them to see Apostates in a positive light? Was there any positive to find in them? Good lord, how could Cassandra so much as stand to even look at Ellie, let alone fight at her side?

Cassandra shook her head and raised a hand, thumb swiping away a tear from the corner of Ellie’s eye. “It was a long time ago. I did not tell you so that you might feel sorry,” she said, “I only say these things to explain that I too have experienced traumatic things, things that gave me nightmares. Potion did a great deal to help with that,” she seemed to be considering her words carefully before she offered them, “I also found that there is potion for the emotional imbalances that can occur, especially when coming to terms with past grievances. I myself have suffered bouts of depression even in my adult life.”

“Oh,” the statement sort of knocked the wind from Ellie’s lungs. She hadn’t expected the woman to admit something so personal, and everything she’d just said had been...really, really personal, Ellie felt like she’d just said had been...really, really personal, Ellie felt like she’d sort of been caught trespassing where she should not be. But she wasn’t, Cassandra had offered the information freely, though Ellie wasn’t really sure why. Oh. Wait.

“Oh! Do you need to go back to Haven? You can’t go back by yourself, and we’re still settling things here, but maybe we could send soldiers with you? Or we could send word to Adan, he could send what you need. Ugh do you need a break or I dunno...do you get days off? I’m the Herald of Andraste I think I can give you days off if you need to rest or-”

“Eleanor, breathe,” the woman instructed, and Ellie shut up and set about doing just that as Cassandra said, “I am well. My disclosure was in effort to perhaps prompt you to consider speaking to Adan for yourself and measuring out if you would have need of such assistance. That is all.”

“Oh, me?” Ellie asked.

“It would not be unusual,” Cassandra said carefully, “You have more than enough cause, and even people in the most pleasant of situations can still suffer from such affliction. My own treatment was recommended to me by an Aunt who had rather a good and comfortable life, and yet she found herself feeling empty, she tired so easily and there were times she could not get out of bed for lack of will.”
Her magic had been rather quiet lately. Not gone or ignoring her just...a pleasant silence—keeping her appraised to danger and letting her know when it was worried about her, but for the most part it sat back and just enjoyed that Ellie had company other than it now. It liked her friends, trusted them. But now her Magic stirred at Cassandra’s explanation, like it was saying ‘see, see?’.

Oh. Oh gosh. Like that day when Danner attacked. She’d had a moment to herself and she’d used it to just...sit and stare and if she could have stayed there like that, she probably would have.

She tried to keep on the move as much as possible. Even yesterday when they’d had nothing to do she sought something to occupy her time. When fear did not jolt her from her sleep, it was only the knowledge that she absolutely had to get up, had things that needed done that allowed her to pull herself out of bed in the morning, and even then, she thought perhaps if Cassandra or her other party members weren’t around to keep her accountable, and sometimes physically pull her from bed, nothing would get done.

Empty...she’d been feeling a lot of that lately. Not all the time, but more and more as things went on. She could see the good they were doing in the Hinterlands but even their greatest victories had more often than not just...not resonated with her. She smiled, she knew when they’d done well, and she congratulated her companions and the soldiers and scouts, but she didn’t actually feel any great sense of pride or joy or excitement, she just knew how to act like herself, how to keep the others from worrying, or at least she thought she had. There was something there, but it was like all her emotions were just...turned down sometimes. Like someone had put a veil between she and them, she could make out their shape but there was no way to connect to them, make them whole. Just...yeah, empty seemed the word for it.

“Um,” Ellie said then, even to her, her voice sounded small. “I...I’ll talk to Adan when we get back.”

“Good,” Cassandra said. She put her hand on Ellie’s shoulder and then, “You may speak to me if there is anything you ever wish to share. Or if you have questions, I do not have much medical knowledge but if I can answer I shall. And too, I do think you should let Marehis know. She cares very much for you, and your wellbeing is important for her to keep appraised of.”

Ellie nodded. She wasn’t sure if she would though...she’d only spoken to Cassandra because the woman had witnessed her in a moment of weakness, she otherwise wouldn't have outright approached the Seeker and told her what was going on. She wasn’t even sure what was going on—Cassandra had given her words to put to feelings. Adan might be able to help but wouldn’t Marehis knowing just worry her? How could she begin to explain this...whatever it was?

‘Hey Marehis, the woman who guards me every day and provides for my every need! I know I’m being protected and provided lodging and food and the nicest clothing I’ve ever owned and an education to boot, and almost every second of every day I’m surrounded by people I would gladly call friend, but I find that I’m sad and empty and just want to...’

Die wasn’t necessarily the word. She just sort of wanted a break from existing—like if she could pause her life, go do nothing for a while, and then come back and start where she’d left off, no consequences, no notice of her absence...that would be amazing.

“If you’d like, you could clean up,” Cassandra’s voice brought her from her thoughts. “Leave your leggings and I shall see to it they are repaired before we go to seal the Rift and meet the Horse Master. Once you’re decent, you could join me for my morning prayer.”

“Yeah, I think I will.”
Sleeping in a tent with Solas and Varric had been...interesting, to say the least. Solas was polite but Varric...while not outright offensive, was still distrustful of him. Blackwall understood, of course, though he did find it a bit much when the Dwarf insisted they sleep side by side—lying facing the sides of the tent, instead of the entrance, with Solas laying in the back exit of the tent, and Blackwall between he and Varric who insisted he ‘sleeps with one eye open and his finger on the trigger’ and laid like a guard dog blocking the entrance of their shared quarters.

All in all, their arrangement was as warm as it was awkward, and they slept rather soundly. Blackwall found he did sleep well, while he was guarded. He found security in that as opposed to sleeping alone, having to truly sleep with an eye open, to be on guard for anything—demons, bandits, darkspawn. Though there hadn’t been any of the vile creatures in the Hinterlands, at least what he’d seen so far. Regardless Varric’s intent, he did like that he could just sleep, no matter that it was sandwiched between an Apostate Elf and a shady Dwarf.

He was thankful that he’d slept so soundly. Some nights his dreams woke him violently, and he didn’t necessarily want to be caught so vulnerable by his new...team mates? This sleeping arrangement had him wary. But that night, only whispers of his nightmares glanced across his mind when he dreamt, and he stayed asleep.

They weren’t nightmares, not truly, they were exact memories. The day a carriage rolled down a path its passengers did not think dangerous, the sound of children singing. It would haunt him for the rest of his days and he deserved nothing more. The only hope he had was to try and serve higher purposes. He’d thought he found that with the Wardens...now he believed he might find that with the Herald.

He didn’t want to be forgiven of his sins or alter whatever sort of afterlife might wait for him for his crimes, he just...he couldn’t put life back into those little bodies. He couldn’t tear the sin from his men’s souls. There was no way to fix what he had done. But maybe, just maybe, he could create opportunities for better things to happen—he would do no further harm to the world, and he would work to save people who would otherwise be doomed without his help, bring hope to those who would otherwise have none if not for his blade. He could dedicate his life to the service of others, and when he died, the only souls he would beg the Maker to spare would be those of his men. Their only crime had been following a man they should never have trusted, should never have aspired to be like.

When they’d woken, they armored themselves in the confines of the tent. Though Blackwall, could not find his breeches. He’d removed them—his underclothes were enough for sleeping in, and he rather thought they might well be ruined after being torn all to hell and bloodstained from knee to ankle.

He had thick quilted armor leggings he wore over his breeches, and plates over that that—not to mention his underthings, so he was hardly walking with his bits in the breeze, but he suspected the lack of breeches some strange prank Varric was pulling on him.

However, upon leaving the tent under the watchful eye of Prison Warden Varric, Blackwall found his breeches.

Ellie and Cassandra sat by the low-burning campfire—the Seeker armored for the day, while Ellie sat in a white linen tunic and pants, sleep clothes he supposed, her hair was soaking wet and she sat with her back to the fire to aid in its drying, and she was humming a tune to herself. In the Seeker’s hands were Ellie’s leather armored leggings, and she was steadily sewing a patch to cover the claw-driven hole in them. At her side though—between she and Ellie—were the Warden’s missing trousers, neatly folded, repaired, and stain free.

He wasn’t sure how the Lady Seeker had gotten his pants from their tent, and he felt wholly embarrassed at the prospect of having the Nevarran woman deign to do something so menial as mend and wash his clothing.

“I’m no tailor but I could have mended them myself, you didn’t have to go through the trouble, Lady Seeker,” Blackwall said, and Ellie looked up at him, and the others as they approached, quieting her humming, which was kind of too bad, it had been rather pleasant, though now the wordless tune was sort of stuck in his head.

Cassandra let out a dismissive huff and said, “I have been occupied mending Eleanor’s armor. She is the one who thought to repair your things while we had the supplies out to do so.”

“I told you I could fix my own stuff, but you wouldn’t let me,” Ellie complained, “I may as well been doing something.”

“The needle is much larger and sharper, that which is required for binding hide together with leather string. It will be more secure and not fray as softer thread might. I would not have you stab yourself trying to work with unfamiliar materials.” The needle in her hand was more dire looking than the one Ellie likely used.

“And just how did you uh…” Blackwall absently wondered just how they’d managed to steal his breeches.

Makers balls, he was investing in sleep clothes—full set of pajamas to cover him head to toe as he slept, just what had the poor girl been subjected to?

Thankfully, nothing, apparently, save their tent’s guard-Dwarf.

“Varric woke up when I went to your tent and handed them over,” Ellie said.

“I thought you were going to burn them,” Varric complained, “commit some arson and live a little kid, not jab your little fingers up trying to play housemaid.”

“Sewing is not merely a housemaid’s skill,” Cassandra seethed as she continued paying careful attention to her work, “anyone who owns anything they care to last them long should have the ability to take care of it.”

“And I did not jab up my lit- my regular sized fingers,” Ellie insisted, equally offended as she held up her hands as if to prove her point. Blackwall had to admit, his eyesight wasn’t the best, but he couldn’t see any injury other than the green mark on her left hand. “I’ve been sewing my own things since…well…always, thank you very much. A few little holes are hardly advanced cryomancy.”

Always? He supposed that must be true. Blackwall hadn’t wanted to pry with her, and Varric was rather tight lipped about anything other than tourney, but Solas had informed him that Ellie was apparently an orphan, she was a Mage, but she’d never been Circled. The only information on her Varric offered up, was a sharp point about the girl’s age—as if the Warden would dare presume a girl as young as she would take a fancy with him! The thought made his skin crawl, that there were men his age that would look upon the girl and think themselves suitable for a fifteen-year-old. He would have to make a point to punch out any such man that made a pass at the Herald.

“I should hope with proper training, you’ll be capable of advanced cryomancy as well someday, lethallan, then you’ll be rather unstoppable,” Solas said.

“Woah now, let’s not get crazy,” Varric said. “Tumbles can already sew—if word gets to our enemies she can do that and perform advanced cryo-whaty they’ll turn themselves in and do our jobs for us.”

“I suspect our job will never get done if we don’t have breakfast,” Solas took the opportunity to suggest.

“I could handle that if you’d like,” Blackwall said, feeling compelled to contribute something worthwhile for them other than just ‘go here and hit things that try to hurt the Herald until they fall down’.

“I believe there are eggs in the cold chest. Salted Ram’s meat, bread,” Solas listed helpfully, showing Blackwall to the chests they kept their food in, there were two—one spelled to stay cool, while the other was actually freezing, white ice lined the inside.

“Think you can cook, Hero?” Varric asked. “If I get food poisoning, your britches are going right in the fire.”

“Oi! Watch it Tethras, I worked hard on those, throw your own britches in the fire,” Ellie griped.

Blackwall chuckled at that and began digging through their food supply, picking out what he’d need. “I’ve killed lots of people in many different ways, but food hasn’t been one of them,” he promised.

He tried to take count of how many Inquisition soldiers and scouts were with them in the camp and make a mental calculation of just how much food he should prepare. It was rather different than just making a meal for himself—slap an egg in the pan, fry up a few slices of bacon, down some ale and he’s good to go. Ale might not be a breakfast food for Ellie though.

“Oh! I can make the coffee!” Ellie offered, which was met with a rather unified response: “NO!” was called out by Cassandra, Solas, Varric, and the Inquisition soldiers within the vicinity. Blackwall almost dropped the eggs he’d gathered up—Solas had practically shouted in his ear.

“The last time you made coffee we were all flying high as kites and jumping out of our skin every time we heard a twig snap or the wind in the trees, or footsteps—our own footsteps, Tumbles,” Varric complained.

“I make it a little strong,” Ellie said with a shrug.

“Eleanor, I am Nevarran, we make our coffee strong,” Cassandra said, “You make coffee that could level mountains and seal the Breach if it had a mind of its own.”

“Come on Tumbles, lets leave these squares to scrounge up breakfast,” Varric said, gesturing to Blackwall, Cassandra and Solas, before gathering up their water skins and canteens. “You and me can hit the river. We’ll top off our water supply and look for some good stones for… uh…” he paused and looked like he’d gotten caught at something, and Cassandra leveled him a mildly threatening, questioning look.

“Stones for what?” Cassandra asked lowly.

“Decoration!” Ellie jumped in for the Dwarf. “We need stones to decorate the camp! Josephine says grey on green on…beigey tan tents is very in this year,” Ellie rambled, already backing up and motioning for Varric to move with her, she declared, “We don’t have a slingshot!”

And with that reassuring statement, the duo bolted down the hill for the ravine. In search of stones. For decoration, Blackwall was sure.

Sealing the Rift on the other side of the farm was a less dramatic affair than the day before. This worst this Rift had to offer were a few lesser terrors and one rage demon—everything else were mere shades or wispy spirits.

Though Blackwall had to admit, he wasn’t sure he’d ever get used to the sight of a Rift being sealed. It just seemed like…like a fluke—it wasn’t possible to close them, it was just sheer luck or accident that Ellie had successfully sealed up three in a row.

But there it was, the Rift was gone and now, the pleasant farmstead in the Hinterlands was that much safer. No more Rifts, no more Wolves. Soon, no more horses as they were all sent off to the Inquisition.

Starting, with their horses. Ellie reported to the Horse Master as soon as the Rift was dealt with, and the man led them down to his stables that stood under the watch of his daughter Serena.

Ellie had apparently never ridden a horse before. Not ‘for real’ she said and upon further pressing, she disclosed a tale of how she’d once fled a town on the back of a horse, sans saddle, clinging to the beast’s neck only to be thrown moments after and wake up several hours later in a muddy ditch.

How the girl lived long enough to survive that day at the Conclave was…well…it refreshed his belief in the Maker, for surely, he was at play. Some level of divine intervention was the only explanation for how the girl was alive today.

They got to go into the stables and examine the horses themselves. Ellie seemed taken with the creatures, taking the opportunity to pet each horse and ask about them—what were their names? Did the Horse Masters think their horses would enjoy their work with the Inquisition? What were their favorite snacks? Did horses get sick? Would Healer Adan be able to treat them or were their special Horse Healers? Did they like Elf Root?

Serena took up the task of answering Ellie’s questions, and she seemed pleased to do so, she was patient and thoughtful with her answers—names, favorite snacks, and yes—they were all very excited to have such a purpose serving as the Inquisition’s steeds.

When it came time to select a steed for the Herald, her lack of experience was taken heavily into consideration, Master Dennet and his daughter lobbed options back and forth at each other, there were several horses that they felt could serve the girl without bringing her harm.

In the end though, it was Blackwall’s opinion Ellie sought.
“Me, my lady?” he’d asked rather dumbly. She’d plainly asked his opinion, but the question had caught him rather off guard. Her party had been silent as they toured the stables.

Ellie nodded. “Uh-huh, you know about horses, right? You talked about your days at tourney yesterday, how you’d actually competed in it. You said you’d gone about picking a horse to compete with you for things like jousting or horseback riding. You’ve sort of done this before, so I’d appreciate your input, if you’re willing.”

“You competed at tourney? Good man!” Master Dennet said congratulatory, clapping a hand to Blackwall’s shoulder. “What year did you compete? I believe I had a cousin who tried his hand at tourney but that was back in the Blessed Age.”

“Ahh, it was another lifetime ago,” Blackwall quickly deflected, and turned his attention to Ellie’s statement. “Of course, my lady. Let’s see these horses and I shall endeavor to give a worthwhile opinion.”

Master Dennet could raise a fine horse—these steeds truly were the best this side of the Frostbacks, and beyond possibly. When it came down to it though, a chestnut stallion was his pick for the Herald. He had this quiet intensity, and a sort of bright intelligence gleaming in her eyes—he was mature enough to not dally about and play around with Ellie, as the girl might easily give leeway to. After confirming with Dennet and Serena that the stallion was capable and could lead just as well as being led, it seemed the perfect fit. At least on paper…or, well, more so in conversation. No paper was involved.

Ellie’s only criteria for accepting the horse as a worthy applicant was asking his name. Which was Russel, apparently. Serena had named him such because of his coloring—a more reddish brown—resembled rust but Russel was more dignified than ‘rusty’, and Ellie agreed, Russel was befitting the noble steed.

Ellie spent some time petting Russel’s face and chatting with him as if the horse could amply respond, and then, she agreed to attempt riding him.

It took a stool, the assistance of Master Dennet and the Lady Seeker offering their hands to support the girl in her climb, and the cheerleading provided by Solas and Varric, to get the Herald sitting securely in the saddle of the beast. Russel was patient, didn’t jaunt around or even huff while the girl struggled to climb into her seat, just stood still and waited. She was obviously nervous, her legs tense around the horse’s sides, hands gripping the reins like she feared death if she loosened her grip in the slightest—not the best way to start out but it was a good test for the horse himself, they were sensitive creatures and Blackwall had been thrown just for sitting astride one with a bad attitude once. One could easily spook their own horse if they had too much trepidation in riding it, but Russel was as relaxed as his rider was tense.

“He is a good horse, Ellie,” Blackwall said then, standing before them and petting the horse’s snout. “He won’t see you fall. You might feel unbalanced, but that’s perfectly normal, you’re not use to the height, or riding in general. Your saddle is secure, and I promise, if you relax your legs, and loosen your grip, you will stay seated.”

She should not trust him so terribly much. It almost startled him, how quickly the girl had listened to his instruction, released her bodily grip on the horse and relaxed, trusting Blackwall’s words implicitly. But at least it was for her own good. He gave her guidance on how to sit in the saddle more securely and then, when she was ready, Serena made a few clicking sounds and walked alongside Russel as he followed after the woman, Ellie astride him, and let the girl get use to his walking gait.

Cassandra trailed after them and then stopped. And then seemed like she would follow. But stopped herself again. She was obviously nervous about the growing distance between the party and their Herald, but there were Inquisition soldiers all around, and Serena would be keeping them within the perimeter of the farmstead.

Which gave opportunity for the party members to select horses of their own.

Cassandra was an easy match—she’d taken an immediate liking to a strong, tall mare with patching coloring of black and white. Solas was more reticent and took the suggestion of Master Dennet, who offered the Elf a pale grey stallion—the creature seemed a bit mischievous, like he would guarantee his ride be kept on their toes—however, the horse was rather responsive to Solas, listening well to his new master’s commands.

Varric…did not want a horse. Or at least, did not want to actually be as high up as a horse would put him.

For a second time today, more surprising than the first, Blackwall was asked for his opinion.

“Tumbles was right, you know your stuff,” Varric grumbled, as he suddenly became very interested with the dirt on his shoes, looking at them rather than the Warden, “And you did a decent enough job finding her a horse. So. Make with the matchmaking. Read their hooves or sniff their manes, or whatever it is you do to pick a horse that won’t throw me for demon fodder.”

Trust. Not like Ellie’s that was young and blind and unfathomable. A test of trust, really. So Blackwall considered it.

Varric ended up on the tallest damn horse the entire stable had to offer.

And he loved it. Hand to the Maker, Varric Tethras sat astride the tallest steed, a dark brown stallion that just dripped with the kind of attitude only the shady Dwarf could respect. He’d threatened to do something unsavory to Blackwall with Bianca when the man had first suggested the horse, but after actually lumbering up onto the creature—which required a saddle that’s stirrups were doubled, with an upper and lower set, and handholds on the bottom lip of the saddle so the Dwarf could reasonably and quickly mount on his own—he loved it.

Blackwall found he’d actually attracted the attention of his horse—the thing chose him. A young, pitch black stallion that huffed and cuffed the man on the back of his head with his snout before following up with nipping at his hair to get his attention. He was a foolhardy thing, and he had the air of a young recruit—in over its head, but eager to learn.

By the time saddles had been secured and the party in them, Ellie came trotting back on her own horse, flush faced and giggling up a storm that left her breathless and beaming at her companions.

“That was so much fun! Can we go again? Are you coming with us?” Ellie asked.

“Yes, we thought we might take a turn around the farmstead, shall we?” Cassandra asked.

That seemed agreeable to the Herald. Master Dennet saw them off—Serena joined them on horse of her own, taking the lead and they followed her around her father’s land.

Ellie was telling them all about her beloved steed. “Russel can go fast! And its so much fun, and he’s so smart—arent you boy? Mwah!” she dropped a kiss to his mane and patted his neck.

“Fast?” Cassandra asked, not caring for the sound of Ellie racing around on a horse with so little experience under her belt.

“We tried out a nice canter—not too fast, but a test of how well the Herald can handle speed, she did rather well,” Serena said.

“He can go faster?” Ellie asked incredulously.

“Yes, my lady, but don’t worry, you’re right Russel is smart, he’ll keep you from harm—if he progresses to a speed you may not be comfortable with it will be because it is an emergency. With time and practice, you’ll be able to manage anything he may throw at you.”

“Practice. Hear that Tumbles, more school,” Varric said, “Just try to keep some time freed up—I sent word last night to Ruffles, to add me to your schedule.”

“Really?” Ellie and Cassandra asked in unison—the Seeker’s more full of doubt and apprehension than Ellie’s curious but optimistic tones.

“Street Smarts 101,” Varric announced.

The Lady Seeker did not mince words, and when she could, she would merely groan or grunt as a form of conveying her thoughts. With Varric it seemed the woman had a disgusted sound ready to use for whatever nonsense came from the Dwarf’s mouth.

“What?” Varric asked, defensive. “The kid needs some savvy-ing up, and besides its mostly to teach her Rogue shit. You and Curley teach her how to hit people with fists, Chuckles here helps her with her magic mumbo jumbo, and I can teach her how to hit people with sharp objects from a distance and uh…other roguish…stuff.”

“Lockpicking you mean,” the Nevarran woman groused, though she did not seem to wholly disapprove, and apparently, she didn’t. “Such a skill could be of use to her in the field. I presume the slingshot you do not have, is a part of your lesson plans?”

“No, we don’t have slingshot, because it’s fun,” Varric corrected, “Though that is a good idea—kid consider not-slingshot practice a lesson in hitting shit from a distance.”

“Cool! I mean,” Ellie thought for a moment before producing what she thought might sound like a more ‘Herald appropriate’ response, “That sounds amenable, I look forward to our lessons, Master Tethras.”

“Ruffles has done a great job teaching you that politeness crap. It’s gonna be fun grunging you up again.”

“You will do no such thing,” Cassandra snapped. “And Eleanor has never been grungy. She was under-bathed and malnourished, but never grungy.”

“You make it sound like I was some Mabari pup you found dying in the street and took in,” Ellie said.

“That’s almost literally what the situation was, Tumbles. Just. More kidnapy and less ‘the good-Qunari’-y.”
Blackwall only half-heard their chatter, his mind had begun working something over the moment horseback riding and lessons had been brought up. He wasn’t sure he should offer, the Inquisition was obviously grooming Ellie to handle political and martial demands—they may want someone like Master Dennet to tutor the girl, but he would be in charge of taking care of the Inquisitions horses. Blackwall wasn’t certain there would be much for he himself to do in Haven, he’d signed on for accompanying the Herald to seal Rifts, Haven wouldn’t hold much meaningful work for him. Her other companions, it sounded like they all had taken up the mantel of teacher for the girl…he wasn’t sure who ‘Ruffles’ and ‘Curley’ were, though he assumed those were not their proper names, but they taught her too.

“I could teach you, if you’d like,” Blackwall said suddenly, again, extending an offer he hadn’t been fully cognizant he was about to give. The others looked at him, and he’d obviously interrupted their little…was it a spat? Or just banter?

But Ellie seemed to catch his meaning, “Oh! Horseback riding?” she asked.

“I’m no master horseman but I’ve plenty of experience,” he said, and Varric guffawed at his choice of wording, so the Warden snapped, adding, “with horses!” Oh. Maker’s balls. Now Serena was having trouble not laughing as he’d only further stepped in it.

That didn’t really help, except it offered up the hope the Dwarf might fall off his horse from how hard he was cackling.

Though Ellie didn’t pay that any mind as she excitedly asked, “Really? You’d teach me?”

“If the idea is agreeable to you,” Blackwall said. “I’d be happy to.”

“I’ll see that Josephine makes time for such lessons in your schedule,” Cassandra said slowly, as if taking care with her words. “I agree these lessons are important to your role in the Inquisition, but do not hesitate to let us know if you require a break of pace. Meetings with our noble allies will be more difficult to move around, but should you need it, there would be no harm in taking time for yourself.”

“You feeling okay, Seeker?” Varric asked. “Because I swear you just told Tumbles she could play hooky whenever she wants.”

“Not hooky,” the woman insisted, “Reasonable, requested days off. Everyone has limits, Varric, I would not push Eleanor past hers.”

Something sort of strange settled between the Herald’s companions then. Realization dawned on the Dwarf’s face almost as it happened in Solas and Blackwall as well. The Seeker was worried, outright concerned about Ellie—concerned about something she did not wish to disclose in front of others like Serena, or perhaps even disclose to them in front of Ellie herself.

“I’m sure Josie—Lady Josephine—will make up a doable schedule, there are only so many hours in the day after all,” Ellie said. “But um…I appreciate the offer and I’ll uh, just let you know yeah?”

“See that you do,” Cassandra said shortly.
“Alright spill.”

Night had fallen in the Hinterlands once more, and after a long day of sealing Rifts and horseback riding, Eleanor had limped off to bed, practically asleep on her feet. Cassandra had the girl clean up and change into proper sleep clothes before they sat down to the evening meal—sleeping in her armor would be poor for her circulation. And it was hardly comfortable, for all Harritt’s talent, armored sleepwear was just not a possibility.

She’d felt…well as close to motherly as she would ever care to. She’d never considered having children of her own—such a thing usually required having a man in one’s life. But Eleanor was her ward, and she felt a strange familiarity—like how she thought her own mother felt from what little she could remember of the woman—when Cassandra instructed the girl to wash her hands before she ate, to eat everything on her plate before sending her off to bed.

Now that Eleanor was out of earshot, Varric was making demands for Cassandra to ‘spill’ something. She knew well what, so she motioned for the men to follow her, and walked with them down the hill, to the ravine, where, if they spoke quietly amongst themselves, she was certain they wouldn’t be overheard by anyone else, save the nugs that were nibbling at foliage lining the riverbed under cover of darkness.

“I had a discussion with Eleanor this morning,” Cassandra sighed and regarded the men for a moment. “I am only disclosing this because she trusts you, and may well do so herself, and if she does, I would rather you be prepared and have an appropriate response ready. Especially you Varric. This is not a joking matter, and if you do anything to dismiss her feelings…just, don’t. This is a serious.”

“I wouldn’t joke about something serious—”

“Varric.”

“Okay yeah maybe giving me a head’s up not to crack jokes is a half-decent idea,” the Dwarf relented. “What’s going on Seeker, is something wrong with the kid?”

“Eleanor has been suffering from nightmares since the Breach. I woke her from one this morning, and she confessed that she has been struggling, with handling the things that have happened, and keeping up with things as they are,” Cassandra said quietly, “I expressed concern that she may be dealing with some sort of depression as well. She’s shown symptoms I have seen before—her apologetic nature, unnecessary guilt, loss of appetite, and there have been days in the Hinterlands I suspect she lacked sleep entirely. After speaking of it, she has said she will be consulting with Healer Adan upon our return to Haven.”

“Shit,” Varric swore softly. Solas and Blackwall were silent, though Shit seemed to just about cover it.

“Marehis has expressed similar worries, she just did not have a name to put to the issue,” Solas said, “it is why I offered meditation last night, Marehis says it has proven helpful for Ellie, at least, with constancy. I regret we have neglected it so long during our travels.”

“We should make time for it then when we are out as a group,” Cassandra decided, “As for in Haven, you meditate during your lessons yes?”

Solas nodded. “Yes, though her schedule is slowly building with more demands, I don’t know that we’ll continue having lessons every day.”
She worried the same thing. The demands on Eleanor’s abilities would only grow, especially as the Inquisition continued to gain prestige.

“I’ll have a word with Josephine about securing free time for it,” Cassandra said.

“Is there anything we can do?” Blackwall asked, “Anything else that might help her uh feel better?”

“With things such as these, we have no bearing on her wellbeing in this regard—our journeys could be full of sunshine and rainbows and she would still suffer so,” Cassandra explained. “She might confide in some of you, and should she need medical assistance, Adan may prescribe potion—Eleanor could experience swings in her mood, might be more easily distraught or frustrated as her mind adjusts. Be patient with her and take up the slack, listen to her, and give her our support as we can,” Cassandra said. “That, is all we can do.”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish used:
Da’len=child
Antishan las vunin= a peaceful day to you (greeting)
Dareth shiral, mah falon= safe journey, my friend
Lethallan=a term of endearment used between friends
Enfanim eras= fear dreams/nightmares. Enfanim=Fear, and Eras=Dreams

*After consulting several maps of Thedas, Val Royeaux is 248 miles from the Hinterland Crossroads, rounded up to 250 because Cassandra is good but like damn who knows the exact exact mileage off the top of their heads, realistically? But maybe I underestimate the Lady Seeker
*Embrium=okay, so apparently in canon there’s backstory to Embrium, where the flower was found to have medicinal properties when the daughter of a noble family was dying of respiratory illness. Her family gathered at what was supposed to be her death bed, and filled her room with Embrium blossoms as decoration, they’re pretty, and the sight might soothe her, send her off into her death surrounded by something beautiful. Lo and behold, she gets better! Turns out, Embrium has specifically respiratory-centered health benefits, and can be used to treat ailments such as congestion, pneumonia, asthma, etc.
*Tourney is held in the Free Marches—which I think I knew once, but while writing this chapter I totally blanked on where exactly Tourney took place, so I thought it’d be a good idea to throw that out there in case anyone else didn’t know! It’s held in the Free Marches, and its pretty popular world wide, or at least the more human-influenced parts of it anyway.

Thanks so much for reading! Chapter 4 EDA: 7/22/18
The Threat Remains--Return to the Chantry

Chapter Summary

 Mostly Housekeeping, preparing for their conquests in Val Royeaux. New Recruits settle in to Haven, Ellie has a bit of a new routine now that she has new teachers and mentors, and she's reaching out to those around her for help with her struggles in her role as the Herald, slowly but steadily.

Chapter Notes

 Thanks so much for the comments, kudos, and reading! Enjoy! * Notes and Dalish at the end!

They stayed only one day more in the Hinterlands before word arrived from Leliana that they needed to return to Haven ‘post-haste’. The time to decide how best to approach the Chantry was upon them, and they needed the Herald back to discuss their options.

 Blackwall was a welcome addition to their team, Cassandra came to find. The man had already taken up the mantle of Eleanor’s riding instructor, and the girl showed vast improvement, as well as a new level of comfort in riding as they traveled. On their last day in the Hinterlands, the Warden took time to talk Eleanor though the experience of being thrown from a horse, how to properly fall and how she may find herself in a situation where she has to actually jump from her steed as it rides on without her. They found an open field where the earth was soft and Solas cast a barrier around Eleanor as Blackwall had her practice how to roll with a fall and catch herself.

 Blackwall had run the idea past Cassandra before he and Solas rode off with Eleanor for her lessons in falling. It had taken all of five minutes of Eleanor’s absence to have Varric looking around the camp for the girl and asking Cassandra where she was. He’d begun pacing and practically gnashing his teeth while he railed on and on about how idiotic he found the idea, what if Eleanor got hurt, and did Cassandra really trust the Warden, and no he didn’t feel much better that Solas was there too, because ‘Chuckles seems to like the guy’.

 “You appear to have grown a liking for him as well,” Cassandra had commented drily.

 That sent the man on a tangent over how he didn’t like any of them. Save Leliana because she scares him ‘shitless’, and Flissa because she keeps the booze coming, and Ellie. Because she was a ‘good kid’ and ‘someone has to watch out for her’.

 Which Cassandra had thought she’d been doing, but apparently Varric considered himself a sole savior, a shining knight defending the girl from injustice (the Chantry) and the influence of unsavory characters (Blackwall, specifically). And then he was ranting again. Cassandra preferred the man’s words when they were on paper—they were much more elegant and…quiet.

 Though when the trio came riding back to camp with Eleanor proudly recounting her lessons and how she was ‘hardly scared at all anymore’ of falling. Varric’s ire turned to open laughter at Eleanor’s rather sorry state, the girl had twigs caught in her unruly mane, dirt caking one side of her face and a good portion of her armor was dusty and muddy, and Solas was working to quietly remove a centipede crawling up her shoulder unbeknownst to Eleanor.

She did find out a centipede of all things had been on her, and that thought was the one that spurred her into the action of bathing vigorously in the ravine. Not the head to toe grime, or the bouquet of foliage sprouting from her hair, but the fact that a bug had crawled on the outside of her armor.

The journey back to Haven was much shorter now that they had proper mounts, and as they traveled, Eleanor seemed to come to terms with the fact that she would be expected to journey much farther than the Hinterlands, and that it was in fact doable. As far as Val Royeaux sounded to the girl, ‘a million miles away’ Cassandra believed Eleanor had termed the distance, with her new, beloved steed, the girl seemed more sure that the journey would not be quite so arduous as she once thought.

It was no small mercy that Master Dennet had agreed to join them in Haven. The man was able to quell Eleanor’s worries over their horses. She was concerned for their ‘poor little hooves’ and ‘didn’t they get awful tired lugging us around all day?’ at one point she asked if there was a way to transport the horses. As if they could somehow piggy back the creatures to Haven, it sounded like she meant. Dennet did well in addressing her concerns—although when she flat out asked if the horses could be carried a portion of their trip, the man had to work at containing his laughter. In the end, Eleanor was reassured that their horses were perfectly fine, that they were in fact born for this kind of work, and that she was doing very well in her care of Russel.

Varric may not have been able to play matchmaker for Eleanor in the Hinterlands, but she did leave them with her heart fully in the hooves of horse named Russel. Cassandra, in a rare moment of outright friendliness with the Dwarf, had commented that perhaps Russel would be the great love of Eleanor’s life he could write into his story.

It was awful—she’d spoken in jest and the man had laughed. Ugh. Might they actually be becoming friendly? She certainly hoped not. She was positive she couldn’t trust the man any further than she could throw him—and the Dwarf was rather dense, both figuratively and literally.

They set aside time for meditation on their journeys, calling it quits earlier than they might usually, which Eleanor thought odd, but she didn’t suspect the reasoning behind it. That was likely for the best. Cassandra had a feeling if the girl thought for a moment she had any bearing on something that slowed them, she would feel badly, and insist she needed no such lenience, and push herself harder to prove to them she was ‘fine’.

Cassandra also found the girl enjoyed joining her in the morning for silent prayer, and even took up the practice of stretching to start the day—which was beneficial especially since Eleanor was unused to horseback riding especially for such long hours. Meditating in the evenings seemed to help the girl lose hesitancy when it came to going to sleep, and their morning ritual seemed to give the girl something to look forward to every morning—something to get her out of bed other than the crippling burden of dealing with the aftermath of the Conclave and the responsibility of the Inquisition.

The meditation did seem to help her sleep peacefully—only twice more did Cassandra find herself waken in the night, once because she’d heard Eleanor cry out in her sleep, and another because the girl thankfully took Cassandra’s instruction to heart and hesitantly woke the woman when she had another nightmare. Their morning prayer worked to improve Eleanor’s distress over the things her dreams clouded her mind with, and Cassandra was glad of it.

It was…unexpectedly enjoyable for Cassandra as well. She used to long for the solitude she found in her morning routine, rising at an hour when all others still slept while she took time to find counsel and relief in the Maker, and steel herself for the day ahead. Now, she felt a sense of loss at the prospect that, upon their return to Haven, Eleanor may not have the time to join her in the mornings.

They made the final push to Haven early one afternoon. Scouts had kept Leliana appraised to their movements, so she and Marehis were awaiting their arrival at Haven’s gate.

Eleanor swung off her horse and bolted for the gate, an excited squeal pealing from her lips as she crashed into the Elf woman giving her a most fierce hug.

“I missed you I missed you I missed you! Tell me everything! How are you? Did anything happen while I was away? Have you been to see the Druffalos? I met a whole herd in the Hinterlands Master Dennet owns and they are the sweetest! Oh! I have a horse now! His name is Russel and he’s just the best!”

“I missed you too, da’len, it’s good to see you,” Marehis said laughingly as she hugged the girl tightly. “I’m happy to have you back in Haven my lady, we should get you cleaned up and to the war room as soon as possible, but once you’ve completed your duties there, we’ll catch up. I want to hear all about your Hinterland adventures.”

And then Cassandra witnessed something that made her feel…rather like she had the strangest urge to squeal, herself, over what she saw because it was so very fitting and so very unexpected.

Marehis looked over Eleanor’s head and her gaze went to Solas dismounting his horse, his eyes immediately sought hers and he gave a soft smile and raised a hand to the woman who nodded at him in return.

Had the Elves…coupled? Eleanor had lamented to Cassandra that she’d tried in vain to play matchmaker between the pair and that Marehis ‘wouldn’t budge’ on her stance with Solas. But the warmth that had just passed between the two Elves, subtly welcoming each other as to not be obvious, perhaps just in front of Eleanor, but maybe because others were around as well, had been palpable. It was the smallest gesture, but Marehis’s eyes held relief and excitement to see Solas well and back in Haven, and Solas…well Solas was actually a little pink around the tips of his ears, and Cassandra did not think it was because of the cold.

Never in her life had Cassandra ever felt like a gossip, but in that moment, she almost felt like a school girl who’d picked up a juicy secret and had to divulge it to the next person who would listen. More specifically, she felt like sharing the information with Eleanor. She wouldn’t—Marehis and Solas were adults and they obviously did not want their liaison known to Eleanor or anyone else for that matter, but Maker—the pair they made was just. Ugh. It was so romantic, dare she say, cute even.

“Welcome back,” Leliana said as Cassandra joined her. “Josephine and Cullen are waiting for us in the War Ro- oh, Commander.”

Josephine was. Apparently, Cullen had seen fit to greet them at the gate. Cassandra wasn’t sure why, all she knew was the former Templar came rushing from Haven’s gate and as soon as his eyes landed on their party he looked to Cassandra and said, “You’re back, uh, good,” and then he cleared his throat and turned to Eleanor, “Lady Herald, it’s good to see you looking well!”
Ahh, perhaps he enjoyed Eleanor’s company as she did, and had missed the girl while they’d been away in the Hinterlands. The fact that their Herald was a Mage had initially been off putting for the man, and he still struggled with the idea that she could be trusted without going through a Harrowing.

But she had now, really. Cassandra felt almost violent over her conviction that Eleanor had more than proven herself a force to be reckoned with against demon influence. The girl had been nothing short of tortured by the wolves’ demon master, and she’d held it off admirably. Cassandra had immediately sent a report directly to Commander Cullen of the event and made it clear that if he dared to ever suggest they subject Eleanor to a Harrowing, a suggestion he’d made more than once to Cassandra during Ellie’s time in Haven, he would be made to regret it.

So, perhaps he’d lost all reticence in his stance with Eleanor—truth be told he was fond of her, that was plain enough to Cassandra.

Eleanor looked at Cassandra and smiled with something almost mischievous gleaming in her eye before looking back up at the Commander and saying, “Heya Cullen! Good to see you too! So much happened in the Hinterlands—we have a Horse Master now and a whole bunch of horses for the Inquisition, and we really worked hard to secure things for the refugees—Cassandra can fill you in on all of it, yeah? You two should catch up!” and then she linked arms with her handmaiden and said, “Come on Marehis, I should go get changed!” and then she practically skipped away, arm in arm with the Elf woman, heading into Haven.

Whatever was that about? Cassandra certainly would not mind informing the Commander of their trip to the Hinterlands, they were all to be debriefed of their work anyway. But Eleanor had seemed almost…conspiratorial? Like she had some plot afoot Cassandra wasn’t aware of.

“We should meet Josephine then, in the War Room?” Leliana asked, a lilt to her voice like she’d seen something she thought amusing.

“Certainly,” Cassandra said baldly, she and Cullen following after their Spy Master to the Chantry.

Marehis had missed this. The past few days she’d been stopping in on Ellie’s cabin, making sure everything was ready for the girl’s return—clean sheets, bedding, enough wood to keep the fire going for a month straight. She’d cleaned the place top to bottom and back again and made sure all of Ellie’s clothing was clean and organized. This morning when Leliana confirmed a Scout had spotted their party nearing Haven, she got the fire going to her cabin would be nice and warm when she got in.

She had other work she saw to while Ellie was away, with her lady out of Haven, Marehis was able to go back out into the field. The girl had been gone a month—Elgar‘nan an entire month. In that time, Leliana had sent Marehis to Orlais to scope out the Chantry Clerics Mother Gisselle named for them and compile dossiers, personal lives, histories, their work and standing in the Chantry hierarchy, anything that struck her as a red flag not to pursue them, anything she found that might point them in the right direction how to get them to side with the Inquisition.
She enjoyed the thrill of her job, but she was glad to have Ellie back, safe in Haven. She’d been in her role as Ellie’s guard little more than a week before she was sent off to the Hinterlands, but Marehis found she missed her, missed spending the day at her side, missed listening to her chatter and braiding her hair. Even when she’d gotten to go out, perform duties familiar to her, be back in the thick of things with the travel and work that drew her to her initial role as one of Leliana’s birds, she’d thought of Ellie, wondered if she was safe, and well. She wanted to write to her, to keep up some form of contact with the girl but she couldn’t do so without compromising her work in Orlais.

She’d returned to Haven with correspondence from the Hinterlands waiting for her. From Solas, actually. Marehis thought she might expire from the embarrassment alone when Leliana, all smirk and barely contained laughter, plopped the stack of letters on her desk and informed her she may want to tell Solas to mark his mail moire carefully, it had been caught in the mix with Scout reports, new agent contracts, and correspondence from Cassandra on their progress in the Hinterlands, and Leliana had gotten a rather telling eyeful of the first of Solas’s letters.

“Rather poetic, this Solas,” Leliana said, “I was tempted to read his work aloud to the rest of the advisors.”

True to her word, Leliana had kept the letters quiet. From the Commander, at least. Josephine blushed the first time Marehis saw her again after returning from Orlais and had congratulated her and Solas as a ‘rather fitting match’.

She could kill the man for his misstep while they’d been trying to be discrete.

She’d settle for kissing him. While it had been embarrassing to be caught red handed by her boss of all people, Leliana was right…Solas had a way with the written word. And Elgar'nan bless him, he kept her appraised to Ellie’s wellbeing. Cassandra made regular reports to Leliana but having her…having Solas’s perspective was welcome. Cassandra’s reports had been more so about their work and accomplishments, whereas Solas shared more personal views on how Ellie herself was faring.

A few of his letters had been troubling. He noticed some of the things she had, when Ellie was under her care—sometimes it seemed the girl didn’t sleep well, or she could be caught pushing her food around her plate instead of properly eating every once in a while. Stress, he surmised in his earlier letters. And then there was the last letter he’d written before wrapping up their time in the Hinterlands and returning to Haven made it so he hadn’t the chance to write again, it had been truly nerve-wracking. Some horrible Demon had tried to possess Ellie, had attempted to trick her into letting it in by threatening to kill her companions, leading her to believe that it had killed them, when she continued to resist it. Her companions had comforted her, he assured, and he had just finished meditating with her before bed, in hopes she would sleep peacefully.

The fact that he knew Marehis would want to hear about her ward, would worry and had done something, written to her, to quell that worry made her…pleased. It spoke well of his character, and his regard for Marehis.

But no number of letters could beat the real thing—having Ellie back safe and sound was a relief. To see her whole and actually being able to be at her side, see that she was alright after even her most arduous adventures in the Hinterlands left Marehis grateful to her gods and to the Maker.

And once the girl was in her cabin for the evening, Marehis could more appropriately express her gratitude to Solas, for his thoughtfulness.

Marehis was working with Ellie’s hair after the girl had cleaned up from her time on the road, they sat on the floor of her cabin together. The change in her ward was noticeable. She looked healthier, physically. After facing the Breach, her time in Inquisition captivity, and whatever sort of life she’d been leading before the Conclave, the girl had been almost skeletal. Now, she had a new softness to her features, a healthy fullness in her face, more muscle tone in her frame, her hair was shinier, and so much time under the sun had added strands of gold to her red mane and revealed an olive undertone to her skin.

“Have you eaten, da’len?” Marehis asked as she braided.

“We ate lunch on the road,” Ellie informed her, “Blackwall—you haven’t met him yet, but you will later, he’s a Grey Warden, and he’s offered to help the Inquisition as a party member when I have to go seal Rifts and stuff. Anyway, Varric gives him a hard time—I don’t think he trusts Wardens very well—and Blackwall made sandwiches for lunch and he put like…what’s that red, spicy flaky stuff Flissa puts in her tomato soup? Uh…”

“Red pepper?” Marehis supplied.

“Yeah! That! We got some as a gift from a refugee, and Blackwall put a whole bunch of it in Varric’s food! Varric turned bright red and I thought his head was going to pop off! It was kind of mean but it was soooo funny you know?”

It sounded like it. “Be sure to remind me not to make this Blackwall upset with me.”

“Oh gosh, I don’t think he’d do something like that to you, you’re always so nice to…well everyone I think, and if he did he better sleep with one eye open. I know where Varric keeps his razors and shaving cream, Blackwall can kiss his beard goodbye if he pulls such a trick on you!” and then, after a moment of thought, “Actually we might want to keep an eye on Varric I have a feeling he might shave the man himself for making him cough up a lung.”

“Shall I tell the guards to be on the lookout for a vengeful Dwarf storming Haven armed to shave?”

“Mmm…nah, they can have a little prank war if that’s what they need to settle their differences. I think the pepper was payback for the worms Blackwall found in his bedroll the other night.”

Ellie’s hair was dry and braided the way she liked. She’d changed out of her armor into one of the formal tunics and pants Madam Florna had made her, and now she was ready for her meeting with the advisors.

“They want me to go to Val Royeaux,” Ellie said quietly.

Marehis crawled around her to sit facing the girl, taking hold of her hands. They were bare, and the thrum of warmth from Ellie’s Mark was a little strange, but not harmful to the Elf woman so she squeezed her hands tight in reassurance. “Leliana told me as much. How do you feel about the idea?”

“It’s just…it’s so far,” Ellie said, “and I’d be meeting with people like Roderick…I don’t know if you ever met him, but he hates me, and I just don’t understand how going to meet with people who already hate me is a good idea. Won’t it just make them angrier at the Inquisition, rubbing me in their faces? What if…what if it’s a trap and they plan to take me, execute me for the Divine’s m-murder.”

Marehis pulled the girl to her and hugged her. “Cassandra will be there. Do you think she’d stand idle-by and let the Chantry do such a thing? Or Solas or Varric for that matter?"

“What if I g-get them hurt or k-killed, they risk so much protecting me in the field and-”

“Stop, da’len, you’re telling yourself scary stories.” It worried her. Had the demon’s toying with her left Ellie with constant fear for her companions lives? Dread Wolf cast that wretched thing deep into the Fade, never to return. “The worse the Chantry can do is yell at you, and don’t you think you should be more worried for them? Imagine if you would, Cassandra, or Varric hearing a cleric badmouth you.”

“Oh…” Ellie sniffled and gave a little laugh, thankfully her little jest had cheered the girl, “yeah, Cassandra might just threaten them but Varric, he might throw punches. Or bolts.”

“You will all be safe and suited for any danger that may befall you. Leliana is good at her job, so are Lady Josephine and Commander Cullen, they would not advise you to your detriment. Do you trust them?”

Ellie nodded. “I do.”

“Then trust their judgement, da’len, they would not lead you astray. Here,” she rose and went to the washbasin, dousing a clean cloth before crouching before Ellie and patting the cool cloth to her cheeks before handing it over with instructions, “close your eyes and put the cloth over them, it will take the redness away.”

“Sorry, I didn’t mean to get so freaked out,” Ellie said as she did what she was told. Ellie would be embarrassed if her advisors knew she’d just been crying before their meeting.

“It is fine, Ellie. I’m sure it is less embarrassing here than it would be if you’d gotten so upset in your meeting—though there is nothing to be embarrassed for. This would be overwhelming for anyone.”

“Thanks for letting me have my little freak out here then, are my eyes better?” she asked as she pulled the cloth away and looked at Marehis.

“Beautiful,” Marehis promised. She checked the watch at her wrist. Lady Josephine would be expecting them along shortly. She wished she’d been firmer—insisted Ellie should be given more time to rest after her journey, but the Advisors were eager to handle this mess with the Chantry. and it was important, if the Inquisition was to succeed. Marehis just hated that it was on Ellie to do so.

She was of half a mind to insist Ellie take a nap, relax for the rest of the day, and go tell Lady Montilyet if she wanted the clerics addressed so badly she could go herself.

But it was not cruelty Lady Josephine worked from, their Ambassador did have Ellie’s well being in mind, and worked tirelessly to ensure Ellie’s job could be made as non-tremulous as possible.

“If you’re feeling better we should get you to the War Room.”

A sign of hesitation on Ellie’s part and Marehis would feel compelled to march to Val Royeaux herself and tell that Chancellor Roderick where he could stick his problems with the Inquisition.

But Ellie didn’t hesitate. She nodded, and they rose together, the girl linking arms with Marehis and they were off to see the Advisors.
“My lady, you’re here, excellent!” Lady Josephine greeted as a guard held open the War Room door for Ellie and she stepped inside.

Cassandra was there, standing across the table from her advisors, and Ellie liked that. It sort of made her feel like she wasn’t the focus of the advisors and had an advisor for dealing with the advisors on her side if that made sense? Someone on her side, to help her sort through whatever Inquisition’s leading trio had to throw at her.

“Hello, Lady Josephine, Commander, Leliana,” Ellie said, and she bowed politely. “I’m glad to see you all again. Gosh, it’s been a month Cassandra said.”

“Yes, and your time in the Hinterlands was vital to our efforts here in Haven,” Leliana said.

“The agents you acquired have been of great help,” Cullen offered up, “and those horses,” he let out a low whistle, “you even convinced Master Dennet to join our cause.”

“Cassandra helped sway Dennet, he was really on the fence about it until she stepped in,” Ellie thought to say.

Ha! Solas and Marehis might be hopeless but Ellie saw! Cullen practically fell over himself trying to see with his own eyes that Cassandra made it back okay. He’d been way too excited for just a casual ‘glad my fellow coworker is alright’ thing.

Cullen looked mildly surprised, and then very, very impressed, “Really?” he asked, “Excellent work, Seeker Cassandra.”

Cullen was crushing. Big time.

Cassandra huffed and shot Ellie a look—not like the ones Marehis gave her that said ‘stop meddlig’!, just a look that said she thought Ellie just said something ludicrous.

“I was hardly the tipping point for the man’s decision,” Cassandra said, “Eleanor won Master Dennet to our cause, it was she who laid the foundation for his loyalty—I merely pointed out that Eleanor is considered the Herald of Andraste, and perhaps it might please his god should he serve her cause.”

“His name at our side strengthens our credibility,” Josephine said, “and the lord you met—Berand he is from a powerful Ferledan household, his family has agreed to back the Inquisition, as well as the family of his late fiancée Lady Vellina, they send their regards and their thanks for providing them the confirmation of their daughter’s death and the location of her body. They were able to properly bury her in their family crypt, thanks to your work securing the Hinterlands, they were transport her to their homestead.”

“Oh, how is Lord Berand? And Lady Vellina’s family? Is there anything we can do for them?” Ellie asked.

“Lord Berand and his men are a welcome addition to our forces, he’s doing well, grieving but the Inquisition gives him purpose and he is grateful,” Cullen said.

“I took the liberty of sending a floral arrangement to Lady Vellina’s funeral and a personal message of condolences from the Herald and the Inquisition,” Josephine added, “Her parents, as well as Lord Berand’s family have already made arrangements to journey to Haven and meet you properly.”

“Oh gosh, they don’t have to do that,” Ellie gasped.

“My lady, such visits will be commonplace soon enough, they wish to see the cause they’ve chosen to lend their political weight to and meet the Herald of Andraste.”

“It is a good thing, Eleanor,” Cassandra said suddenly. Ellie looked to her, and the Nevarran woman said, “It will hearten them, to see the Inquisition and give them hope that the passing of their daughter is not meaningless. If Lord Berand does well, if the Inquisition does well, it will bring relief and validation to those who mourn her.”

Ellie nodded. “I look forward to their visit, I hope we can do that for them.”

“They will arrive in a few weeks’ time—they wanted to meet with you personally.”

“Oh golly, that’s a terribly long time to travel, they live that far from Haven?” Ellie asked concerned, trying to think of an alternative…maybe she could meet up with them at a halfway point, or they could send uh…pictures? There were so many people in the Inquisition surely they had someone with the ability to draw some nice portraits of Haven and their troops, maybe Varric could write a narrative…informative…something?

“Oh no, they hail from Highever my lady,” Josephine said. North? Like super north for Ferelden, but Ellie was decently sure it wasn’t weeks and weeks of travel away. “I informed them it would be your next available appointment in Haven.”

“Because I’m going to Val Royeaux,” Ellie completed the thought.

“Yes, that is what we are here to discuss,” Josephine said, “I understand your reticence, Val Royeaux is a rather larger journey than your venture to the Hinterlands.”

“Just a little bit bigger, yeah,” Ellie said. “But…do you think it is the best way to get the Chantry on our side? Leliana? Commander?”

“Val Royeaux is in an uproar,” Commander Cullen said, shaking his head. “the Chantry Clerics have the people in such a state mobs run our agents out of the place.”

“Like, flaming torches, pokey pitchforks?” Ellie asked.

“In essence,” Cullen said, though ‘pokey pitchforks’ did tug his lips up a bit. “It would be dangerous to send you.”

“She would not be alone,” Cassandra cut in, “I will be with you Eleanor, Leliana has been corresponding with the clerics Mother Gisselle named for us, yes?”

“Mother Gisselle has given us valuable leads on allies in the Chantry, and we have been able to approach a few of them so far,” Leliana agreed, “they have agreed to get us into Val Royeaux—the remaining clerics, a majority of them, have taken Roderick’s cries against the Inquisition seriously. With the help of our allies, we can get you in to Val Royeaux to sway the remaining clerics, or at the very least, create enough discord to break their hold on the people.”

“If we can get the Chantry to at least implode on itself,” Josephine said, “it may give us the chance we need to approach the mages or the templars for their aid against the Breach.”
“So, I’m hearing two against one? Or does all of this make you feel better about the plan, Commander?” Ellie asked Cullen.

The man sighed, running a hand over his face as he took a moment to think. “The plan is… sound. You will have your party with you?”

“Yep! Cassandra’s already on board and I mean, I’d like to see someone point a pitchfork at her and live to tell about it,” Ellie enthused, “I’ll have to ask, but Varric and Solas will probably be down for going with me, maybe Warden Blackwall too.”

“We—myself and the rest of our party members—have discussed the possibility that you would be called to Val Royeaux at length,” Cassandra said then, “any of them would join us.”

When had they done that? When she was asleep? Did everyone do everything when Ellie was asleep? When did they sleep?

“Cool! Hmm, maybe we can all discuss it together? Marehis and I are going for dinner at the usual time, will you be free Lady Seeker? I’m going to be checking in on everyone after we’re done here, I’ll invite them too plus it might be nice for Blackwall to have some friendly…” Varric came to mind and she amended, “…mostly friendly faces to eat dinner with his first night in Haven, it can be hard being somewhere new and not knowing anybody.”

“That is agreeable,” Cassandra said.

“So, it is settled then.” Josephine asked, “You will travel to Val Royeaux?”

“Yes,” Ellie said. “When do we need to head out?”

“Leliana and I will need a few days to finalize things with our allies in Val Royeaux,” Josephine said.

“Once we have confirmation they will be prepared for your arrival and get you in, you’ll be on your way,” Leliana finished.

And then, Josephine said, “I have received requests—one from Master Tethras and one from Cassandra on behalf of Warden Blackwall, they will be added to your lesson plans, which can resume tomorrow. I’ll see Marehis receives your updated schedule if that is agreeable.”

“It is,” Ellie said, “so…is that everything? Is there anything else I need to do?”

“We shall take it from here, Lady Herald,” Josephine said, “the day is yours to do with what you will.”

Marehis was waiting for her once she left the War Room.

“How did it go?” she asked.

“It went pretty well,” Ellie said, “um, I’ll be leaving for Val Royeaux sometime this week.”

Marehis placed a hand on Ellie’s shoulder and gave it a little squeeze, smiling reassuringly. “It will be fun, you’ve never been to Orlais, have you?”
Ellie shook her head. “I’ve never been this side of the Waking Sea before the Conclave.”

“Well, it’ll be a brand new, interesting experience. Val Royeaux especially, is beautiful,” Marehis said. Ellie nodded and she and Marehis began walking the Chantry hall, headed outside.

Ellie linked arms with Marehis and lead them around the winding path towards Haven’s gates. Josephine had said Harritt offered to let Blackwall bunk in his cabin, so she assumed the man would be around there settling in. “I actually wanted to check in and make sure Blackwall was settled, and invite him, Varric, and Solas to join us for dinner tonight. Is that alright?”

“Oh, of course, my lady, I’m excited to meet your new Warden friend,” Marehis said.

“You’ll like him,” Ellie promised.

Blackwall was standing out in front of Harritt’s cabin…well, his cabin too now, she supposed, staring up into the Breach. it was a lot closer here, than it had been in the Hinterlands.

“Kind of scary, huh?” Ellie asked, getting his attention as they approached, and she came to stand at his side, looking up at the Breach. “It doesn’t do anything,” she said, “just sits there spinning, you don’t have to worry about demons falling out of it or anything, it stopped doing that.”

“Was it doing that when you faced the Breach?” Blackwall asked, surprised.

Ellie nodded, whoops! She thought he’d known. “Yup.”

“You actually…” Blackwall fell silent as he looked at her, and then back up at the hole in the sky. “It looks so big from here, I can’t imagine what it would be like up close.”

“I don’t know how exactly we’ll end up closing it,” Ellie said, “but if you don’t want to go when we do, you don’t have to. I wouldn’t go if I didn’t have to.”

“The offer is kind, my lady but dings my pride a bit. I can hardly ask you to face it if I were not willing to do so myself,” Blackwall said. “When the time comes, we’ll all be ready to face that thing together.”

“Speaking of facing things together,” Ellie said, coming to stand in front of Blackwall and take his attention off the Breach, “Dinner. Marehis and I usually eat at around…”

“Dinner hour have been starting as early as four recently, my lady, we usually go to Tavern at six,” Marehis supplied.

“Right! Six!” Ellie said, and then, “Oh! This is Marehis, Marehis this is Warden Blackwall, sorry, that was rude wasn’t it, not introducing you right away?”

“You’re just fine, my lady,” Marehis said gently before dipping a curtsey to Blackwall, “it is an honor to meet you, Warden Blackwall.”

“The honor is mine,” Blackwall said, bowing slightly to the Elf woman, “Ellie had quite a lot to say about you—all good, mind.”

“She did, did she?” Marehis asked, looking amused.

“Yes, I’d officially joined the inquisition, and the moment my contract was flying off to Haven, Ellie launched into a tale of your encounter with angry Druffalo.”
“While terrifying in the moment, it’s rather a fond memory now,” Marehis said. “She has had no end of good things to say of you since she’s arrived back in Haven, I’m glad she has another person she trusts watching over her in the field.”

Blackwall looked very grave then, but Ellie supposed he was just being serious as he nodded and said, “I am honored to serve the Inquisition, and to help the lady Herald in her quest.”

Ellie scrunched up her nose at that. “Quest makes it sound like one of Varric’s stories, I’m hardly questing, more like, just running around doing my best to not let the world end while having no clue how to do just that,” she said laughingly. He seemed to loosen up at that, and she was glad—she was almost worried they’d offended him somehow, he’d been looking so serious. “Oh gosh, I got way off track—dinner! I was inviting you to have dinner with us. Well, me and Marehis, and Cassandra, and Solas, and Varric. Sometimes Lady Josephine or Commander Cullen have dinner around that time so they might be there too…Leliana hasn’t joined us,” she gasped then, and her hand shot out to Marehis’s arm as she looked to the Elf woman for confirmation, “Oh gosh, I’ve never seen Leliana in the tavern—is she eating? She eats right?”

“She takes her meals in her command center out front of the Chantry,” Marehis promised. “She eats. Everyone in the Inquisition is being well fed, da’len, you really needn’t worry, she’s hardly a puppy you’ve forgotten to feed,” she said as she petted Ellie’s hair.

“Oh, that makes sense,” Ellie said, feeling silly then. “Sorry, anyway, will you join us for dinner? We’re planning on talking about the upcoming trip to Val Royeaux.”

“In the Tavern? At six?” Blackwall managed to pick up out of all the twists and turns her focus had taken.

“Uh-huh, do you know where it is? Has anyone shown you around?” Ellie asked, she should have offered him a tour before, she just hadn’t thought to.

“Ah, yes, your Leliana sent someone to give me the rundown on the place.”

“Great!” That was a relief. “Is there anything you need? Are you all settled in here? I can run up to Quarter Master Threnn if you need blankets or pillows,” she leaned in and stage whispered conspiratorially, “she’ll say she’s out of pillows, but there are always more pillows.”

“I’m well, my lady. I have everything I need, Quartermaster Threnn can keep her hoard of pillows.”

“She does, I swear, she hoards them somewhere like a dragon!” Ellie exclaimed. “Alright then, if you need anything, Blacksmith Harritt is super helpful, and really anyone should be able to help if you ask. I’m off to make sure Varric and Solas will join us for dinner, I’ll see you tonight okay?”

“I look forward to it,” Blackwall promised.

Ellie nodded and took Marehis’s arm again. The two stopped to say hello to Master Dennet who was tending to the party’s horses, and Ellie introduced Marehis to the Horse Master and Russel. Her guard was immediately enamored with the horses, and Russel was more than happy to have she and Marehis petting his face and kissing his cheeks, the Elf woman actually cooed over him.

“He’s a gentle fella, isn’t he? You’ll take good care of my lady, yes?” Marehis asked him with all seriousness as if he could understand her. Ellie rather thought he could, Russel was a clever horse. He let out a certain sounding huff and bobbed his head up and down as if to say ‘yes’ he would.

“Do you have everything you need? Quarters have been set up for you, right?” Ellie asked the Horse Master.

“Yes, my lady, I’ve a cot in Master Harritt’s cabin so I can be near the horses.”

Oh gosh, she hoped Harritt didn’t mind having not just one but two new roommates. Though the man had seemed sort of lonely, maybe they’d form a gruff old man club. Maybe Blackwall would shave his hair and beard and they could all be bald with matching mustaches!

Regardless, hopefully they got along well, and weren’t too tightly packed. Did they have enough space in Haven? What would happen if they ran out of room? More tents? Could they build more cabins?

Varric was their next stop, the man was sitting out front of his tent by the fire, scribbling furiously into a leather-bound book. He seemed rather focused, so Ellie just asked if he would eat dinner with her and the others tonight—he absently gave a ‘uh-huh, I’ll be there Tumbles’ and didn’t look up from his work. So, she made sure Solas would swing by the Dwarf’s tent to pick him up for dinner later when she extended the invitation to him, he promised to do so.

“Lady Josephine retrieved some texts I expressed interest in—magical theory and historical research on the Fade. If you’d care to join me I’d be happy to share,” Solas offered, holding the door to his cabin open wider to invite them in.

Textbooks…might not be Ellie’s strong suit.

And there was only so much time left in the day, especially before dinner, and she still had something she had to do.

“That’s super sweet of you, Solas, but uh, I actually have something I need to do before dinner, but you have fun and we can talk all about what you learn,” Ellie said, feeling a bit badly, she didn’t want Solas to think she didn’t want to hang out with him or something.

But he smiled and said, “Another time then, I’ll see you at dinner.”

She waved goodbye and he closed his door to the chill, leaving Marehis and Ellie standing…well…right around where she needed to be. But she didn’t necessarily want to go.

“What is you need to do, my lady?” Marehis asked her. “We’ve a little time before dinner. Oh! Goodness, did you want to go check on the Druffalo herd?” she guessed, looking amused at the prospect that Ellie skipped out on a chance to peruse magical tomes with Solas to play with the little Druffalos.

“Oh yeah! But um, not today,” Ellie said. The rest of the day was hers, Josephine had said. She wasn’t sure she really wanted to do this, but…she’d promised Cassandra, or at least said she would do it and she wasn’t going to go back on her word.

“My lady?” Marehis asked quietly. “What is it?”

“Um. I need to see Healer Adan, actually.”

Maybe not the best way to start that out—Marehis raised a hand to check Ellie for fever and her eyes were searching for any sign of injury. “Were you hurt on your trip? Do you feel unwell?”
Ellie shook her head. “Um I’m fine, I’m not hurt or sick not uh, not really. I uh…” she looked around and gestured for Marehis to follow her.

They ended up beside the Chantry, behind the wood stack there. Marehis leaned with her back against the wood stack and waited for Ellie to talk.

“So. Uh. I’ve been kind of…struggling with everything,” Ellie started out uncertainly.

Marehis put a hand on her shoulder then and suddenly everything was spilling out of her—she was so angry about the Conclave explosion, she missed Trevelyan, and she hated that she was the only person to survive. She felt so guilty for having lived, and then she felt guilty for feeling guilty—she should be grateful that she survived, shouldn’t she? And the Inquisition was doing so much for her and helping her and providing for her, and she just felt like she was failing even though everything else said otherwise—they’d done so much good in the Hinterlands, so much and all she could focus on was the numbers they killed, of those they couldn’t save, on their losses and close calls. She was afraid everything was going to be wasted on her, that she couldn’t possibly live up to their expectations of her, and what if, after everything, she couldn’t seal the Breach?

And the thing was, when it came down to it, she was happy, she was. She was glad to have met the Inquisition, she liked her new life, but her mind kept focusing on all of the bad, all the death, and the destruction, and the guilt. And then when it came to the good stuff, her friends, the satisfaction of being able to help those affected by the war and the Breach…nothing. Just. everything felt hallow—she knew these things made her happy but there was that disconnect. She could smile, she could acknowledge that these were good things but Cassandra’s word, ‘empty’, seemed to qualify there. When she wasn’t just so sad or angry, she was empty with a few moments of genuine happiness sewn at random.

And she hated admitting these things to Marehis of all people. Marehis did everything for her, was always protecting her.

And now, to top it all off, Marehis understood her. She didn’t snap at or rebuke Ellie for her feelings. The Elf woman folded her into a hug and when Ellie was calm, she asked a few questions, about her and Cassandra’s conversation and what she wanted to do.

So, with Marehis at her side, they went to see Adan.

Marehis had known something was hanging over her ward since they met. Like a great weight suspended on a thin string, hanging over Ellie’s head just straining to snap and crush the girl. She’d been admittedly worried, but she wasn’t sure exactly what was wrong. Ellie had been through a horrible ordeal, with the Conclave and then being a prisoner, and then being revealed as a Herald.

Marehis was not Andrasten, but she did believe in the Maker—Elf gods handled Elf business, just as the Human god handled theirs. She knew, knew in her bones Ellie's survival of the Conclave was the product of divine intervention. That she could struggle in this way, endure the things that had happened and still keep moving, keep working towards sealing the Breach, it spoke to what her god must have seen in her, what drew him to guard her in his hand and bring her from the Conclave Marked to save them.
When they first went to Adan the man had been expecting them, which seemed to confuse Ellie until he started asking her about ‘asthma’?

It was the most conflicted she’d felt in her line of work with Ellie. When the man gave her an ‘out’ of sorts—she could say she was just in to talk to him about her medical history—Marehis saw Ellie’s hesitancy, the girl saw the opportunity to skip out on asking for his medical opinion on her more pressing issues. Marehis was torn between her different duties to Ellie—part of her job was keeping Ellie safe, but another was keeping her confidence. She would sorely dislike damaging Ellie’s trust in her, but for the sake of her health Marehis would risk it.

Thankfully, Ellie was forthright.

She glossed over the asthma issue—she hadn’t even known he would have reason to talk to her about it, and Adan said he’d received a recipe for some sort of remedy for respiratory illness, and instructions from Cassandra to have it brewed up, and have Embrium kept on hand in case Ellie should ever need it. She thanked him, and then informed him that wasn’t why she was here to see him.

Marehis sat beside Ellie, on Adan’s examination table, and held her Marked hand as she relayed her problems to the Healer. Struggling with appetite, stomach aches, heart racing, trouble falling asleep, and when she did sleep she was often woken by nightmares. And those were just the physical manifestations. The recurring nightmares, compulsive negative thoughts, focusing on death on dying.

Elgar’nan.

Adan was quiet, only speaking when Ellie fell silent, and asking questions—how many hours of restful sleep did she think she was getting? How often did she skip sleep altogether? How severe were her stomach pains? He focused on that for a while and cautioned her to come to him immediately if they got worse or didn’t go away.

Then, he gave her his insight, that what she was describing sounded like symptoms of depression and anxiety. Which resulted ultimately, in his prescription:

Potion for calming her stomach and keep her from developing an ulcer, potion to encourage healthy brain chemistry, and potion for calming herself—he recommended only using that potion in particular during the day if she experienced unprompted, debilitating panic, but that it might be something she would find beneficial to take before her sleeping draught to relax at the end of the day.

Ellie hadn’t been one for drinking, from Marehis’s experience, but Adan had stressed to them that the girl should avoid alcohol for the time being as it could have unpredictable results with the potion promoting healthy brain chemistry, and if mixed with the calming or sleeping draughts would intensify their effects in a way that he warned might be habit forming. Ellie nodded and profusely agreed—alcohol would be a no-go.

The appointment had been arduous but Marehis was grateful that Healer Adan had been patient with Ellie, hadn’t batted an eye at the amount he was increasing his workload to help her, especially in the coming week. Marehis saw fit to mention that Ellie would be leaving for Val Royeaux, and the man just shrugged and told Marehis to keep him appraised of the Herald’s itinerary, and he would get enough potion worked up for her trip.

He also explained the complications that might come up, that her new potions regimen could cause mood swings, a worsening of symptoms before they got better, that acclimating might take time, but if had someone she trusted monitoring her closely, and the patience to bear through, she would see improvement. She would feel better, and hopefully in time her mind would respond to her treatment by re-learning how to create a healthy chemical balance on its own.

Someone she trusted monitoring her brought to question: in Haven, Marehis would monitor her, but what about the journey to Val Royeaux?

Marehis felt certain she could join Ellie unquestioned—she wouldn’t have to give a reason to the Inquisition Advisors other than the mission was fitting of her job description. But Ellie offered up her concern, she didn’t necessarily want to advertise her ‘problem’, she termed it, to everyone, and Marehis joining them might do just that. If not to the Advisors, then to her party.

“I am your handmaiden da’len, and you’re going to Val Royeaux of all places. You will be addressing the Grand Clerics, and I have little doubt you will end up meeting with potential allies for the Inquisition either through Lady Josephine’s arrangement, or purely from the interest you’ll likely generate from your visit alone. If your companions raise suspicion, I’m merely tagging along to braid your hair, command your wardrobe, and make sure you eat with your mouth closed.”

That argument won her a grateful smile, and Ellie’s agreement to the arrangement.

They left with Adan’s promise that by the time they returned to Ellie’s cabin for the evening, his assistants will have dropped off potion that would help her sleep—they, like the others, would have to be brewed, and Adan would see to them first. Then he’d clapped the girl on the shoulder, and even gave it a reassuring squeeze, an act not exactly characteristic of Adan, but it left Ellie looking a bit less grave.

Tomorrow, Marehis would retrieve the rest of Ellie’s potion, as well as instructions for when and how each potion should be taken.

By the time their meeting with Adan was over, they were running late for dinner—if only by a few minutes.

“We can reschedule—they’ll understand. You just got back from a long trip, we can just say you’re tired and decided to eat in your quarters, take an early evening,” Marehis offered as they left the Healers.

But Ellie shook her head, “No, I promised. Plus getting together tonight was my idea that’d be pretty crummy of me to ditch out at the last minute, it’s bad enough we’re late. I uh…” she paused, but nodded her head as she said, “I feel a lot better now, having talked with Healer Adan. And dinner with everyone will be nice—we’ll have serious stuff to talk about, but they’re my friends too, you know? I like spending time with them.”

“Then dinner with your friends it is,” Marehis conceded.

“And my best friend,” Ellie added, popping up on her toes to kiss Marehis on the cheek before linking arms with her. Marehis smiled, and while the admission was a little childish, she did feel honored, and there was a certain warmth settling in her chest that Ellie put there.

She loved this girl, loved her dearly, would die for her. She couldn’t imagine what sort of Maker would allow her to suffer something that deadened her own emotions, while she could still go around freely invoking strong, positive, blessings of feeling in those around her. She made Marehis happy.

And when they entered the Tavern, it was plain as day that she did the same with every single one of her companions.

They entered the Tavern to see Blackwall, Cassandra, Varric, and Solas already seated at Ellie’s usual table by the fire. They looked to be sitting in mildly awkward silence, Cassandra was keeping careful watch of the entrances to the Tavern in search of Ellie’s arrival, sort of half-seated like she was ready to jump up to go looking for the girl. Marehis was grateful—she knew the Lady Seeker took her job of protecting Ellie seriously, but seeing how the woman relaxed upon seeing them enter the Tavern, it spoke to the fact that Ellie truly had someone working with her in the field who held the same regard for Ellie that Marehis did.

“Eleanor, Marehis,” Cassandra greeted warmly, raising a hand to wave them over to the table.

Announcing their arrival worked much like a spell.

“Tumbles!” “Ellie!” “My lady.”

Varric, Solas, and Blackwall’s own greetings overlapped each other, at Ellie’s appearance, suddenly everyone at the table was feeling chatty, the awkward air immediately dissipated, replaced with warmth and comradery and genuine excitement.

“You worried us there for a minute, Tumbles, bout broke my heart—I thought you might be standing us up,” Varric joked.

“More fool the woman who stands up Varric Tethras,” Ellie quipped. And then she apologized, “I am sorry we’re late, I lost track of time,” and she caught Cassandra’s eye before saying, “I had something I had to do.”

“Good,” Cassandra said shortly, but relieved. “It went well?”

Ellie nodded. “Yeah,” she said quietly. Reaching her hand out across the table, “Thank you.”

Cassandra returned the gesture, taking Ellie’s hand and squeezing it gently.

The men at the table didn’t dare question their vague conversation, and instead, they started chatting about their upcoming trip to Val Royeaux. They ate as they talked, Marehis keeping careful watch over how much her ward was or wasn’t eating. She was pleasantly surprised to find Ellie steadily eating, though maybe going to see Adan had been more like ripping off a sticky bandage, she seemed…hopeful.

It was Ellie who casually brought up the possibility that Marehis would join them on their trip.

“Since we’re going to Val Royeaux, Marehis and I thought I might need her help. I mean, I’m going to be talking to some important people, in front of Orlesians,” Ellie explained, as she skewered a bite of chicken onto her fork, “and we all know I wasn’t exactly the picture of elegance and grace traipsing across the Hinterlands with mud on my everything and this haybale on my head.” She used her chicken adorned fork to point at her hair before popping the bite into her mouth.

She did manage chewing with her mouth closed the entire meal, which was a lovely habit she’d apparently perfected during her time spent being less than elegant in the Hinterlands, Marehis mused.
“We’ll have to run it by Leliana and the other Advisors of course,” Cassandra said, “but I see no problem with it. Marehis will be a welcome addition to our party. Don’t you agree, Solas?”

Seeker of Truth indeed. Marehis nearly choked on her own food when the words left Cassandra’s mouth, but she suppressed the urge, opting instead to quietly take a sip of water, shooting Solas a glance over the rim of her mug.

“Oh, very funny, Lady Seeker,” Solas was quick to jest. “Yes, I suppose it would be nice to have another Elf traveling with us, we certainly can’t outnumber our human counterparts, but at the very least we’ll tip the balance of the Dwarf-Elf ratio.”

“Damn it Chuckles don’t abandon ship—we have a real nice Dwarf-Elf coalition formed here! What happened to the brotherhood? What happened to the love?” Varric dramatically lamented, one hand clutching at his heart while the other gripped Solas’s shoulder.

“You can join a coa-whatever with me, and my weird glowing hand,” Ellie offered.

“Ha! Hear that?” Varric asked, straightening up and popping the collar of his coat, “Keep your Elf woman, Chuckles, I’ve got Tumbles on my team. Her hand can seal Rifts and double as a nightlight!”

“Yes, we should advertise her Mark for its nightlight capabilities, then we will most surely have the allies flocking to join us,” Cassandra drawled.

“’s’why I signed on,” Blackwall offered with a shrug. Cassandra actually turned her head to look at the man as if trying to gauge if he was serious.

That set silence over their table.

“Did Hero just make a joke?” Varric asked.

Ellie started laughing, which held a sort of domino effect, setting her companions laughing with her. And Marehis saw, she could see the genuine light in her eyes as she laughed. Really, truly laughed, for perhaps the first time in a long while.

Ellie was hopeful, and so was she. Just as she faced the Breach, and braved the Hinterlands, her ward would see this through.

When they all finally settled down with their chatter, it was only because Ellie yawned. Marehis hadn’t even realized until then that they’d taken up lively conversation until the late hours of the evening—four, nearly five hours spent alternating between their plans for Val Royeaux, and just…talking. They recounted to Marehis some of their adventures in the Hinterlands and worked their way up to their excitement for the coming week’s lessons. Varric was excited to actually be incorporated into Ellie’s school schedule. Blackwall as well was pleased to announce he’d be instructing Ellie in Horseback Riding, which Marehis realized was probably why Josephine had advised she would be sending her a rather different schedule for Ellie to follow in the coming days.

They said their goodbyes and went their separate ways, though Solas said he’d be along after them in a moment—let Ellie prepare for bed, and then he would come meditate with her before she went to sleep.
When they returned to Ellie’s cabin, there was sleeping potion waiting for her. Marehis crossed the room quickly and took the bottle up to examine it for any possible interference before unstopping it and sniffing its contents—Valerian root, lavender, Elf-Root…vanilla? Valerian root could be pretty ghastly tasting, was Adan going soft?—before smoothly passing it off to Ellie. She didn’t want to alert the girl to just how many different ways people had or would use to kill her—she kept most of her security efforts subtle, especially in regard to things she would rather Ellie not become wary of. She didn’t want the girl growing leery of eating or drinking for fear she may be poisoned.

Ellie downed the potion in one swallow and Marehis helped her get ready for bed. She was already visibly drowsy by the time Solas rapped at the door, ready to begin what he informed Marehis would be a nightly ritual of meditation.

Ellie and Solas sat quietly before the fireplace while Marehis wrote up her daily report to Leliana. By the time she was finished, Ellie was practically asleep where she sat, Marehis had to give the girl a hand up and tuck her in—she was fast asleep the moment her head hit the pillow.

Marehis was conflicted again. She would be sending a runner with her report to Leliana anyway. Perhaps she should stay the night in Ellie’s cabin, sleep in a chair in case the potion and meditation didn’t keep her nightmares at bay and she needed comfort in the night.

Solas, in a moment of boldness wrapped an arm around Marehis’s waist, pulling her back against him, and pressed a kiss to her hair.

“Come. She should sleep soundly, and you should seek to do the same. Your job requires a level of alertness lack of sleep will dampen.”

“I suppose you’re right,” Marehis said, taking his hand and leading him away from Ellie’s bedside. She released his hand when they met the door and stepped out into the frigid night air. Guards were already at their stations and Marehis instructed if they heard Ellie wake in the night, they should seek Marehis out as she handed off her report to the scout waiting to take it to Leliana for her.

She walked Solas back to his cabin, the man quietly commenting that it was an added luxury this arrangement allowed—Solas meditating with Ellie just before she went to bed gave them the opportunity to spend time together at the end of the day.

She opened the door to Solas’s cabin, inviting herself in.

“I take it Ellie went to see Healer Adan,” Solas said, speaking of the thing weighing on her mind. “The Seeker saw fit to inform us, should Ellie need help or reach out to us on her own.”

Before she could answer, his arms were around her, pulling her back with her head tucked under his chin.

“You’ve done everything you can, Marehis, you’ve done well,” he commended her, holding her more tightly. She realized she was crying then, tears falling onto the soft material of his shirt.

“I just feel so useless—I can kill assassins, prevent her being poisoned, I can thwart attempts to bring her harm before a hand has been laid on her. But I can’t actually do anything to fight off something inside of her, I can’t hit or kill disease. Elgar’nan she’s been dealing with this since she woke from the Breach and I saw, I saw all the signs there I just didn’t know what it was.”

“You are brilliant, but you cannot be expected to know everything,” Solas said, “You may not be able to challenge illness to a duel, but you can watch over her, help her follow the path to recovery, keep her counsel—potions, hugs, a listening ear, all of these things are blows against this particular beast. You’re doing all you can to help her now, and she will get through this, we’ll see to that,” Solas promised.

Marehis leaned back to look up into his face then. “Ellie is right, you are ‘so very, very smart’,” she complimented, smiling up at him. “It was one of her selling points on why we should ‘totally date’.”

“Oh really now?”

“Yes, along with your gentle mannerisms and the fact that you said you didn’t mind my presence ‘at all’.”

“Hmm, I don’t huh?” and then he captured her lips in a kiss.

No, he didn’t mind her presence at all.

8am combat training, meet Cassandra and Commander Cullen at Haven’s Gate

10am horseback riding, meet Warden Blackwall at the forge

Noon—Lunch in the Chantry, see that the Herald leaves her lessons with time to bathe and change—I recommend Orlesian colors. Lunch will be held with the Marquis Louis Marchand and his wife Jacquelin, reverent and affluent members of the Chantry, they wish to meet the Herald personally before opening their home to our lady and her party while they are in Val Royeaux.

Topics to avoid: conflict with the Imperium, the current discourse over the Orlesian throne (should this topic come up, the Herald is to remain neutral but if she must, she should compliment without committing, in favor of Gaspard de Chalons). Also, please avoid anything to do with the color yellow.

2pm Street Smarts 101—Professor Tethras will await the lady Herald in what he insists I take note of as ‘the world’s classroom’: The Tavern.

3pm See Solas in his cabin for Magical training

5pm onwards, free time, dinner, etc.

10pm Nightly Meditation

A runner brought the Herald’s schedule to Marehis as soon as she rose for the day. She worked to commit the thing to memory as she made the brisk walk from the servants’ quarters to Healer Adan’s cabin. The man was already up for the day…though perhaps he hadn’t gone to sleep at all, he made a fine example of looking like death warmed-up. The haggard man was stoppering up the last of the batch he’d prepared, blue potion in triangular inch tall vials, when she entered the cabin. He put them into a bag that clinked as they knocked against other vials, and then handed her written instructions in case she needed it for later reference. He pulled out four vials—three tiny ones, and one regular sized vial.
Yellow for depression, white for upset stomach, blue for calming nerves, and the larger vials contained purplish potion she recognized from the night before as sleeping draught. Ellie was to take the yellow one with food every morning, and he made up enough white and blue potion to be used a maximum daily amount Ellie could take—four times daily, but they were to be used only as needed. Needed for the stomach draughts was stomach aches of course, the blue should only be used if she was experiencing debilitating panic or directly before bed.

He would schedule an appointment for Ellie to see him upon her return from Val Royeaux for a checkup and see where she stood then. If there was any need for adjustment, they would do so and have a standing appointment every month until such a time it was no longer necessary. If she or Marehis had any questions or concerns his door was open anytime he assured her…as he was very insistently ushering her out, so he could have a moments rest before quote ‘Mother Gisselle sends her Chantry goons to hassle him for free labor. Pious thugs!’.

She gulped down a bowl of oatmeal and a cup of coffee while Flissa put together a tray of breakfast for Ellie, the sun had just barely peaked over the horizon, and she was well on her way to her lady’s cabin to dismiss the night watchmen and wake the Herald for her busy day.

Her heart stopped for a moment when she saw the guards were not at their post, and it took less than a second to assess that there was no struggle, no sign of a fight.

The tray and bag of potion were abandoned in the snow as Marehis rushed to the cabin, blades in her hands as she kicked open the door—it had been mostly closed but unlatched, it knocked into the wall with a bang followed by Ellie screaming and the sound of a blade being unsheathed zipped through the air.

“Oh, it’s you.”

Two voices, the same sentence, spoken in unison, with equal measures of surprise and relief from both parties.

“Seeker Cassandra,” Marehis said as she nodded to the Nevarran woman standing in the middle of Ellie’s cabin with sword raised to defend her.

“Marehis,” Cassandra greeted her in kind. The women cautiously sheathed their blades.

Ellie was sitting on the floor in front of the fire, peeking around Cassandra’s legs.

“Is…is everything alright?” she asked, timidly.

“The guards weren’t at their post,” Marehis spoke blandly, she wasn’t sure if she was still outraged, or if she was relieved. Her panic was hardly quelled, Fendehis. It had certainly not been alright.

“I dismissed them when I arrived and was going to stay,” Cassandra explained.

Oh had she.

Evidently, Ellie had taken to rising when Cassandra did while they traveled and joining the Seeker for silent prayer and stretching. When Cassandra woke to do so this morning she’d checked in with the Herald just in case she cared to join her still, found her awake and they’d been sitting in prayer when Marehis burst in.

“Very good, please, carry on, I’ll see to breakfast,” Marehis said lightly, leaving them.
The bag of potion was thankfully intact, nothing broken, nothing tampered with. The tray she’d collected for her lady was slopped in the snow. It was no great matter, she had to return to the Tavern to collect breakfast for Lady Cassandra anyway. She gathered the mess on the tray and offered her sincerest apologies to Flissa who merely laughed it off and happily prepared another for the Herald and her guest.

Marehis…well she wasn’t about to start a fight with the Lady Seeker. Ellie was very religious she’d found, and she must enjoy the morning ritual if she chose to wake so early to partake in it. Marehis was hardly going to deny her something that could bring her comfort. But this…she did not think she could laugh this off as Flissa had. This could not happen again, and Cassandra would be made to understand that. Elgar’nan, she’d thought the guards had been compromised—either paid off to abandon their post or they themselves gone rogue. She thought that she was too late, and Ellie had already been captured, been killed.

The solution was presented by Ellie herself, upon Marehis’s return, in the form of an invitation. Marehis did rise early enough, she could join them in their morning routine—they could all eat breakfast together, either in her cabin or the Tavern whichever they preferred—she knew Marehis was religious too, and Dalish gods respected prayer just as the Maker did she was sure.

“I pray to Elgar’nan too already, anyway,” Ellie said with a shrug, as if to suggest Marehis’s addition of the Dalish religion would be no big deal.

“You do?” Cassandra asked with mild surprise as she and Ellie took seats on the floor and ate their breakfast.

“Of course! I ask the Maker to watch over you and Varric and Blackwall, and well, everyone including Solas and Marehis. But they’re Elves, so I ask Elgar’nan to watch over them too, you know, just to be safe,” Ellie explained, though quick to assure them both, “I don’t think the Maker is racist or anything, I just wouldn’t want to be disrespectful to the Dalish gods—just asking the Maker feels like I only credit him for their collaborative work.”

This resulted in an interesting conversation where Ellie laid out that she didn’t need the Chantry or the Chant of Light to tell her the Maker existed, she knew he was her god in her soul. That didn’t mean he was the only god, even though the Chant made sure to say he was because ‘that was the deal’ struck by Andraste to save mankind from empty afterlives.

“We,” Ellie said gesturing to herself and Cassandra, “have to hail the Maker as the one and only god over humanity,” she stressed, “we’re locked in, thems the rules. But Humans aren’t the only people in the world. Qunari, Elves, Dwarves—if any of them choose to declare the Maker their god, become Andrasten, cool, they fall under his godly jurisdiction—but they all have their own religions they can turn to. It would be foolish to think they were praying to thin air—not more than we are when we pray to the Maker.”

“I hadn’t thought of it in that way,” Cassandra said slowly, working the thought around in her mind, with no small measure of doubt true, but she was taking it under consideration.

Regardless, Marehis agreed, she would join them. She would handle the change of guards as she was supposed to, every morning, and see her lady’s security was uncompromised.

The moment Cassandra finished eating she bid them good morning, saying she’d see them in a bit for Ellie’s lessons, Marehis retrieved a yellow vial of potion from the box she’d placed on Ellie’s desk when she brought them their breakfast and slipped it into Ellie’s hand when the girl handed the finished tray up to her.
“You’ll take that every morning after breakfast,” Marehis said, quickly relaying the instructions Adan had given and showing her the little vials, which she immediately regarded with relief—Ellie had apparently worried she’d be toting around ‘tons’ of ‘great honking bottles’ across the empire and back, she liked how discrete the tiny draughts would be. She could take them without drawing attention.

“You’re to let me know if you have need of the others during the day, I’ll have them on hand,” Marehis promised.

Ellie nodded and unstopped the bottle, giving the yellow concoction a little sniff.

“Well…healthy brain chemistry smells like sweaty socks,” she said a bit doubtfully, but she downed the first of her potion without further hesitation. “Doesn’t taste like sweaty socks though, so, neat.”

“Very good, my lady,” Marehis said.

Ellie changed into her practice clothing, and Marehis briefed her on her day’s schedule as they made the short trip to Haven’s gates. Marehis sat up on the high ledge that bordered the steps and watched over her charge as she trained.

The improvement was great, since her first week’s lessons in Haven. Her time spent in the Hinterlands had obviously…well, she’d gotten a lot of practice in, apparently. It made Marehis proud, especially when she clocked Cullen good right in the jaw and caught the former Templar by surprise, but she was also extremely glad she would be accompanying her to Val Royeaux. The reports she’d read, stories she’d heard, Ellie had been in such great danger. Marehis would feel better about it all if she were with her, capable of physically being able to help and protect her in the field.

Another improvement was found in the fact that Ellie at least waited until the end of her sparing match with Cullen to check if she’d hurt him. It had been a concerning habit Cullen and Cassandra had worked to break her of—they couldn’t have her stopping mid-fight in the field to ask if she’d hurt her opponent when…the whole point…was yes, hurt your opponent.

The man just rubbed at his sore jaw and leveled her a smile, clapping her shoulder as he commended her for her improvement.

And then Ellie made a rather enthusiastic statement that the Lady Seeker and Commander made just the best couple of teachers she could ask for, they were just so very good at instructing her and she was so grateful for them.

It would seem she was back at playing matchmaker again. Cullen and Cassandra, being her chosen targets this time. Marehis bit her lip to keep from laughing as the Seeker and Commander began demonstrating a new move for Ellie to master. Ellie usually needed to see the move in action a few times before jumping in and trying it out for herself, but this time she scratched the back of her head and gave them an apologetic “Oh gosh, I’m sorry, I just don’t get it—could you try that one more time?”

One more time became three more times before Ellie, ‘finally got it’!

Elgar’nan, and the girl thought Varric was a nuisance for encouraging her to see that hunter in the Hinterlands. If Cullen found out he’d just been grappled into a chokehold half a dozen times for the purposes of manipulating him into an inter-organizational romance with the Lady Seeker, he may see fit to wring Ellie’s neck.
Marehis wouldn’t blame him, she’d certainly stop him, but she wouldn’t blame him.

Though he might just thank her, should things work out. Marehis had to admit…she was rather happy with her current rapport with Solas. She wasn’t necessarily broadcasting the relationship for all the world, because…well…Solas was a rather discrete person in general, as was she, and she didn’t want Ellie to find out and take it into her head to try and give Marehis time alone with the man—evade her handmaiden or anything else that might put the girl in harms way in an attempt to give she and Solas space. Her responsibility to Ellie was more important than any personal relationship, and things as they were, were more than ideal.

Blackwall came and stood beside the ledge where Marehis sat as Ellie’s lessons went on, her time with Cullen and Cassandra would be up soon. The Warden watched the last of their training session with keen interest.

“Heya Blackwall!” Ellie called as her last match came to an end, throwing up her arm and waving at the Warden before jogging to join him at Marehis’s side.

“Good morning, Lady Herald,” he greeted politely with a nod. “You fought well.”

“Oh golly, thanks!” Ellie said, “Marehis says I have lessons with you at 10 is it that time already?”

“Indeed it is, shall we get started?” Blackwall asked.

“Uh-huh, lead the way!” Ellie said before turning around and waving at her combat instructors conversing on the practice field, “Thanks again, I’ll see you two later!”

Cassandra and Cullen waved them off, and Ellie and Marehis followed Blackwall to the horse pen beside the forge.

“Hi Russy!” Ellie cooed, petting her horse’s face and pecking him on the cheek. “How do you like Haven, boy? Are you having a good day?” Her horse huffed affirmatively. “Good.”

Blackwall hoisted Ellie’s saddle onto the horse, but he stood back and let her secure the saddle herself, though he did double check to make sure she’d done so tightly enough before giving her a hand to get up into the seat.

Marehis joined her, slipping into the saddle behind Ellie, as Blackwall mounted his own steed and led them around the frozen lake, past the abandoned Healer’s cabin, and to the area they’d found the Druffalo in.

It looked a bit different now, there were little obstacles set up in the clearing, log stacks of varying heights to jump, and a line of poles to weave a path around.

Blackwall, Harriott and Horse Master Dennet had teamed up in the early hours of the morning and constructed the course for Ellie to practice on. They made sure to keep it at a distance from the larger portion of clearing where the Druffalo roamed, but they could be seen grazing and playing.

“I discussed criteria for your lessons with the Lady Josephine and Cassandra,” Blackwall explained, “We feel you should be made prepared for an emergency, should you ever have to ride off on your own to evade capture or get to safety quickly, working on maintaining your seat even at great speeds or jumping could make all the difference.”

The Warden ran the course first, giving Ellie an example to follow before suggesting the girl make an attempt at handling the lower sets of jumps a few times, though Marehis may want to sit out for that.

Marehis dismounted and Blackwall, actually did as well, dusting the snow off of a rock so Marehis could sit, before he went to Ellie and gave her instruction. Advice on how best to hold herself to keep on her horse, having her practice lifting herself in the saddle, supporting her weight in the stirrups and lifting her butt off her seat.

She tried out the smaller jumps, wide eyed, when her horse completed the first jump she’d let out a surprised yelp, falling back into the saddle, and laying forward hugging her steed with her elbows, as if clinging to him so would keep her from being dismounted.

“Up, Ellie, sit back up in your saddle girl, you’re fine,” Blackwall called out firmly.

Ellie did as she was told, it took her a moment, but she sat up and did the jumps again, and again, until she could do so without so much trepidation in her form.

Blackwall waved her down after a while and Russel trotting up to meet him, Ellie as breathless as she got when training with Cassandra and Cullen.

“That was good Ellie, you feel more confident with the lower jumps for now, yes?” Blackwall asked.

Ellie nodded as she caught her breath.

“Landing sort of knocks the wind out of you huh?”

“Just a little,” Ellie admitted with a grin.

“It’ll get better with time and practice,” Blackwall promised, “Lady Josephine said I would need to keep our first lesson short, something about needing you presentable for lunch? That sounds a bit concerning.”

Concerning?

“Well, the Inquisition has been making a point of fattening me up,” Ellie returned, jovially, “consistent meals, snacks, the works.”

Elgar’nan Humans had a morbid sense of humor sometimes.

“Ellie will be eating, not being eaten,” Marehis cut into their banter, “we should be heading back, you definitely need a bath, da’len.”

“I could really use some water too please.”

Of course she could, she’d done nothing but sweat for hours now. Marehis should have been prepared for that. Cassandra had given Ellie her own canteen ‘for keeps’ Ellie said, when they met, and the girl kept it on her at all times in the field, but she wasn’t in the habit of taking it with her in Haven. Marehis should have thought to fill it and bring it along—she’d brought Ellie coffee to start her day since it helped the girl wake up and gave her a nice jolt in preparation for her combat lessons, but that wouldn’t do anything to hydrate her—the potion she’d taken would dehydrate her, she should have had her take on water with it.

“Here.”
Blackwall was handing up his own waterskin to Ellie and she smiled gratefully and gulped down...well, Marehis certainly hoped it was water or she’d knock the Warden into next week.

But Ellie was all smiles and gratitude, and apologies that she hadn’t thought to bring her own water supply, and did Warden Blackwall need a new water skin because this one seemed ‘oldish, no offence’?

“None taken, I suppose I’ll keep an eye out for a new one,” Blackwall said lightly.

This resulted in, the very moment the horses were unsaddled and receiving water of their own, Ellie bounding up the steps of Haven and going directly to Seggrit’s little shop. She and the man had an interesting rapport, from what Marehis had seen before Ellie left for the Hinterlands.

“Canteen. Big, for the field. Fair warning—my haggling skills consist of crying and shin-kicking.”

“Brat, you’re a brat you know that, Lady Herald?” Seggrit sniped. Ellie held his gaze, her grin never slipping, and he sighed. “Fine. Here,” he handed her a canteen that did look worlds better than the Warden’s water skin, “Just take the damn thing. I don’t need Andraste telling the Maker I can’t play nice with her whelp.”

“And Andraste blesses you for it,” Ellie promised solemnly. “Especially if you wouldn’t mind having it run over to Warden Blackwall, he’s at Harritt’s.”

“Fine.”

Ellie leaned across the table, supporting herself on the palms of her hands, and the man very belligerently rolled his eyes, but ducked down so she could kiss him on the cheek.

“Mwah! Thanks Seg, you’re the best!”

“Yeah yeah, keep it to yourself.”

Adan was a life saver...he’s a Healer so that’s sort of his job description already, but Ellie had an ever-growing appreciation for the man and his healing capabilities.

Marehis did a great job getting Ellie ready for her lunch meeting with the...Marquis Louie? Louis. Louis! Yeah, him, and his wife Jaqueline. Anyway, Ellie was still beyond nervous, so much so she thought she might sick up rather than eat anything, and her stomach just burned horribly. The white potion—thick tasteless, nonetheless glorious gunk—had soothed the burn immediately. Maker bless Adan.

Lady Josephine met them outside the Chantry. She wanted to take a moment to quiz Ellie on topics to avoid and lean towards and gave her an appraising once-over to make sure she was suitable before throwing open the Chantry doors and introducing their guests to the Herald of Andraste.

Their Ambassador hadn’t thought it proper for the Marquis and his wife to eat in the Tavern, and the Inquisition ‘sorely lacked a formal dining hall’ so, her solution was clearing the Chantry hall—the entire main corridor of the Chantry acted as a dining room, with a long table in the center encased in a white table cloth—Ellie couldn’t see the table legs, and she thought perhaps Lady Josephine did so to hide the fact that they weren’t eating off a mahogany Orlesian made whatever table, but simply the same tables they had in the Tavern just lined up and covered to look fancy. A bit drastic, Ellie thought, there would be so few of them, was this really necessary? Maybe their guests would enjoy the genuine Inquisition experience?

Most likely not though, Ellie soon realized.

Orlesians were…an interesting people. Madam Florna had only been the tip of the iceberg. Her noble guests were wearing masks. Creepy, porcelain masks that covered their entire faces save their mouths. For eating. Which was nice. Except the food offered was just as strange as her guests.

Appetizers came out as two snails in some kind of green sauce. The salad course consisted of a single spinach leaf, an olive, a radish, and a sprig of lemon grass. Then a tiny tiny bowl of what looked like cream with rosemary floating on top? Tiny, like a bowl one would put bird feed in. There were seven courses total, each stranger than the last, but Ellie followed Lady Josephine’s lead.

Who did this? Who made this? Who thought this was how people were supposed to eat? Flissa would never do this to her, blessed woman, where was she and why was she sitting idle by while someone came into Haven with their sociopathic idea of a menu? If Lady Josephine hadn’t been there for Ellie to take cue from, she’d have eaten each course in single bites—but Lady Josephine caught her eye and very purposefully took teensy tiny bites of each and every course.

Thankfully, while their guests were eccentric and fancy, they were still kind. Theirs were some of the names Madam Gisselle had given Leliana. While they had not the political weight within the Chantry itself, they were affluent members of society and devout followers of the Maker. They had a ‘mid-spring’ home in Val Royeaux they were considering allowing Ellie and her party use while mediating with the Chantry Clerics.

“We have just heard so many rumors of the Hearld of Andraste,” Marquis Louis said, “we wished to see you for ourselves before committing to aiding your cause.”

“Perfectly understandable, we appreciate you taking the time to meet with us, your visit has been most anticipated,” Lady Josephine said.

“Oh yes, thank you, I really am glad to meet you both,” Ellie spoke up. She wasn’t really sure what she should be doing or saying, Josephine had given them a tour of Haven, and the couple hadn’t asked Ellie many questions.

But Marquess Jaqueline giggled in delight and looked to her husband, “I for one think the Herald is simply darling,” she crooned, fanning herself with an ornate lace fan…Ellie wasn’t sure the point her mask wasn’t conducive to feeling the simulated breeze. “Isn’t she just darling my love?”

“She’s simply precious, not in the least the haggard peasant that Chancellor Roderick has been trying to make her sound like,” her husband agreed.

Haggard peasant? Peasant, yeah Ellie could give him that, it was more a statement of fact than an insult, but haggard was just straight rude.

“When you show up in Val Royeaux—why you will simply deflate Roderick’s arguments against you.”
“We should send word for the servants to air out the house, prepare it for the Heralds arrival.”

“Oh darling, we must redecorate—all our mid spring home decor is out of season, and opening it pre-spring…hmm, oh I’m so excited we must get started right away.”

It took Ellie a moment to catch up—the Orlesian accent was quite the thing to get a handle on understanding, and the couple spoke so excitedly, so quickly she almost didn’t realize what they meant.

“You’ll let us stay in your home while we’re handling things in Val Royeaux?” she asked for confirmation.

“Oh, most certainly,” Marquis Louis assured, nearly overlapping his wife’s own declaration;

“We would be delighted!”

Ellie looked to Lady Josephine. That meant it had worked, right? She somehow hadn’t embarrassed herself at this fancy schmancy lunch and blown Lady Josephine’s hard work to smithereens?

“Thank you, Marquis Louis, Marquess Jaqueline,” Lady Josephine said, giving Ellie a nod.

Oh! “Yes! Thank you so, so much!”

“Shall we retire to my office to settle the details?”

“Of course,” Marquis Louis said, rising from his seat, which prompted everyone else to do the same.

“Very good, Lady Herald, I believe your next lesson will begin soon. Thank you for taking time out of your busy schedule to meet with our guests,” Lady Josephine said, dipping a curtsy to Ellie.

Taking time out of her busy schedule? Josephine put her schedule together. Though Ellie supposed she wanted the Marquis and Marquess to feel special, like Ellie thought their meeting so important she’d prioritized it regardless of convenience or something.

“It wasn’t a problem,” Ellie said quickly, bowing to her guests, “Thank you again for coming out to see me, if I don’t see you again before you leave, I hope you have a safe journey home. Maker watch over you.”

“Food!”

Varric had been sitting in the Tavern with Blackwall and Solas. The trio ate in relative silence for a while before the Warden started chatting them up about lessons with Ellie. She did well at her horseback riding lesson. Which wasn’t a bad place to start, talking about literally the only thing all three men had in common, their interest in Tumbles’s wellbeing. Solas started talking about the implications of Ellie getting better at riding, that she may be capable of casting from horseback, and perhaps they should have some form of joint lesson sometime to test the theory, once the kid got a better handle on staying in the saddle.

Varric had been disappointed when Hero showed up in Ellie’s stead—apparently, she had some kind of lunch meeting with Orlesian nobility of all things.

Though you wouldn’t think she’d had any lunch the way she burst into the tavern, saw the uneaten roll leftover on Varric’s plate before she saw the men around the roll, shouted ‘Food!’ like she hadn’t seen the stuff in eons, and plopped down in the chair next to Blackwall, across from Varric and Solas. She stole the roll off his plate and started breaking it apart, stuffing it in her mouth.

“Hey there Tumbles, slow your roll…no pun intended,” Varric said.

“Sorry,” Ellie mumbled around a mouthful of bread, raising a hand to cover her mouth as she did. “I think we’re going to starve to death in Orlais.”

“Fancy lunch, tiny portions?” Varric asked.

“The tiniest! I’ve eaten better out of the garbage.”

Varric could see the question on Blackwall’s lips and shook his head, trying to subtly motion with his hand to not say anything. Poor bastard was still new. Ellie did this from time to time—just casually dropped little details about her life before the Inquisition like they were no big deal when they were usually just straight up depressing. Her companions had just sort of let these things fall light, Ellie wasn’t distressed by them, so they didn’t want to bring it to her attention that sometimes her upbringing was just…sad. Hero was gonna get a swift kick in the family jewels if he brought that fact to the kid’s attention.

“Orlesians are nuts kid, you sure you wanna trek all the way out to Val Royeaux to play nice with the Chantry?” Varric asked.

“Not really but we kind of have to,” Ellie said with a sigh, but she perked up to report, “The Marquis and Marquess were super sweet though, they’re going to let us use their home while we’re in Val Royeaux, and they want to ally with the Inquisition,” her face scrunched up a bit when she said, “They think I’m ‘just darling’.”

“Ahh Tumbles, don’t take it personal, you’re like the Inquisition’s mascot. And just like any mascot you’re measured on a scale from ferocious beast to cute and sweet. You fall closer to the cute side, unless someone tries to get between you and your daily caffeine intake.”

“Or another roll, you think Flissa has any left? I can feel my soul dethatching from my mortal form,” she lamented as she laid her head down on the table.

“I believe the Orlesians love of the dramatic must have rubbed off on you, Ellie,” Solas teased warmly, turning a page of the little book he’d been pouring over since he’d finished his meal.

Marehis appeared then, Varric hadn’t seen her come into the Tavern, though the Elf woman was always attached to Tumbles at the hip, she must have come in when Ellie had, just gone in search of more food for the kid. And for her as well, she had a bowl of stew for herself, and a plate of rolls she set in front of Ellie before sitting down next her. Though the moment Marehis was seated, she tore open a roll and used it to sandwich a few pieces of meat from her stew in, before handing it to Ellie.
“Have some protein as well, Elgar’nan your meal plan has been wildly derailed today, I’ll have to talk to Lady Josephine about scheduling meet-and-greets that don’t involve snails.”

Orlesian bastards. “They made you eat snails, Tumbles?”

Ellie’s nose crinkled up and she nodded her head as she set about eating what her shadow put in front of her. Shadow, huh, maybe that would be Marehis’s nickname? His first instinct had been to go with something that represented her stabbing tendencies—but Varric wasn’t sure if anything that could be related to blades, or knives for that matter, could be considered racist. But thinking back, it had been what he’d first called her—someone who was hired to shadow Ellie for her safety. It sort of fit, may even help with her cover—anyone hearing him call her that would assume he was making fun of the fact the wisp of an Elf woman was following Ellie around like a tag-along, an eager servant living to please her ladyship.

He checked his pocket watch then, he was pretty sure he wasn’t scheduled to start lessons with Ellie for a little while longer. But the second his watch struck II, these losers had to beat it. Chuckles and Hero already got their time to teach the kid, he didn’t want them clunking up his time teaching her the most valuable life lessons he could impart upon another person-being.

Mostly, he just didn’t think the Warden or Apostate would have the same level of appreciation he did for the finer art of lock picking, or…well, it wouldn’t kill the kid to have some practical street skills either. Being able to swipe stuff off of people on the sly. Knowing how to lie well, no matter the circumstance—Ellie had a weird mix of being able to lie convincingly one second, and horribly the next. Kid had a guilt complex—if she thought her lie would protect someone she could get it off without a hitch, but if she felt guilty about lying things went sideways.

Shit ever really hit the fan with this Inquisition, someday she might have to lie to people she considered her friends, people she would feel guilty about lying to—like Seeker, or Curly—in order to get out in once piece, non-tranquil and away from any newly reinstated Circle.

Anyway. Ellie was also way too trusting, she would also need to learn how to spot a lie. Varric might not always be around to shoot people trying to take advantage of the kid.

Ellie chatted them up about her little lunch date Ruffles arranged with the Marquis some more, but then she got on to the topic of her lesson with Blackwall—she’d had fun even though jumping was ‘scary but kind of thrilling’ and he’d been ‘super sweet’ to let her use his water skin when she got thirsty, and had Seggrit sent him his replacement canteen yet?

Huh, Varric had noticed the Warden had some new hardware on his hip. Nice new canteen.

Hero got real flustered, his face was so hairy there was hardly anything visible to turn blush—man practically had beard up to his eyebrows—but the little jagged points of visible cheekbone glowed bright red.

“My lady it was hardly worth the trouble, I…I will not have you paying my way, what do I owe?” he haltingly demanded to know.

Tumbles strikes again, Maker’s breath, he hoped the kid hadn’t just dumped out the contents of her purse and given Seggrit a promotion to boot in exchange for something for Blackwall. Shit. If the kid was so pressed to do something about it, Varric would have bought the sorry sap a new whatever.

But then, Ellie giggled and waved the Warden off with,
“Oh gosh, it wasn’t any trouble. Seggrit gave it to me, free of charge. Unless you count a kiss on the cheek as currency.”

Kiss? On the cheek was just barely okay, and it sounded like she’d kissed the older man, but he’d punch the daylights out of Seggrit if that big human oaf thought it appropriate to put the moves on Tumbles.

“That was after you informed the man your haggling tactics would be crying and shin kicking,” Marehis added drily.

Oh, shit Tumbles did know how to negotiate, at least on a basic level. He could work with that.

“Point is, don’t feel badly, it wasn’t any trouble and you needed it, just consider it an early Wintersend* gift,” Ellie said, leaning over she rested her chin on Blackwall’s shoulder and hit him with some straight up Mabari puppy eyes. Kid had all kinds of tools in her bargaining arsenal. Nothing that would cut it in the big-time, but he’d get her thinking like a cut-throat business woman.

“Very well,” Hero reluctantly agreed.

“Yay!” she said, before sitting upright in her seat and turning her attention to Varric. “I have lessons with you next yeah?”

Varric grinned. “Yeah, Tumbles, it’s about that time,” he said, checking his watch. “Hey Chuckles, Hero. Hit the bricks.”

Leliana had received so many resources from their success in the Hinterlands, she’d been able to procure proper lockpicking sets, little leather pouches full of anything one might need to tease a lock open. When Varric floated the idea of teaching Ellie to pick locks her way, she passed along two such kits to him.

In a summation, these kits were wicked sweet.

“Oh wow!” Ellie said upon opening the leather pouch Varric set in front of her, brilliant smile on her face, “Thanks so much this is sweet of you, Varric!” and then, looking up at him with just a little bit of uncertainty, “Uh…what are they for?”

…

Kid had no clue what she was looking at. For all she knew they were junk. Why did that make him feel like he could have given her a box of rocks and she’d thank him for it? Keep them on a shelf in her cabin and name them? She mentioned Wintersend earlier when placating Hero, but had she ever gotten a present before in her life? She’d been given clothing and armor and weapons from the Inquisition, but those were just things they needed her to have for her job, not gifts for gifts sake.

She was officially on the Wintersend list. He should also figure out when her Name-Day* is. Shit, wait, it was ‘birthdays’ for Humans, right? He’d check with Ruffles, she might have taken it down for documentation or put it on the calendar or something.

“They’re picks, Tumbles, if I’m gonna teach you how to lockpick you need the tools of the trade.”

“Oh! Cool!” Ellie said brightly.

“You don’t know the half of it.”

He pulled out his own kit and they sat there at their usual table in the Tavern, and he showed her each and every instrument, what they were called, how each one could be used. He unfolded a piece of parchment he’d stuffed in his coat pocket, where he’d jotted down the names, instructions, and even a little labeled picture of the picks for her to keep for reference.

Ellie nodded when he spread the paper out on the table and looked at it with keen interest while he told her she could take it, he’d made it for her to keep for reference.

“Uh, thanks,” she said, carefully folding the parchment as it had been before and when she found her fancy duds from Madam Florna didn’t have pockets, she looked to Marehis who said she’d take care of it and tucked it away in her back pocket.

Then the real fun began—Varric took Ellie and Marehis to the Chantry, down stairs to the basement, it was the only locked doors in the joint. Well, the doors in Haven could be barred, but there weren’t actual locks on the doors except for the few celled doors on the rooms in the basement. And in the dungeon but he didn’t think he’d want to take her there.

Leliana provided keys to the room outside the dungeon. He took out the proper picks and showed Tumbles how it was done. It had admittedly been a while since he’d last cracked open a lock, but he got it open, and then used the keys to lock the door up again.

“Wanna take a swing at it?” Varric asked.

Ellie nodded and crouched before the door. It took five minutes and a little encouragement and instruction from Varric but kid actually did it. Not bad for her first time. They practiced for a while, locking the door and then having Ellie unlock it, and soon she got it down pretty well. Well enough that, should she ever need to, she could break someone out of prison. He’d keep an eye out for other kinds of locks she could take a crack at when they were out and about.

Next, he took her out to the practice field. They used one of Seeker’s beaten-down dummies for target practice, Varric armed with Bianca, and Ellie with their no-longer-secret slingshot. Marehis watched from her favorite vantage point, on the ledge by the steps to Haven’s gate.

He thought she’d get bored of still targets, and she should practice on something that moves, but when he suggested taking aim at the local wildlife Ellie just about turned the slingshot on him.

“No! That’s awful! You leave those poor little nugs alone, Varric Tethras!”

“Alright, alright Tumbles, sheesh.”

“You are the one who wanted a moving target,” Cassandra drawled from where she stood watching them from her usual post by the soldier tents, “perhaps Eleanor should practice on you.”

“The Lady Seeker has a point,” Ellie seemed to be taking the thought under consideration.
“Tumbles!”

“Oh golly, but rocks’d be mean though.”

And then something hit him in the chest. Cold, cold something. It was soft and broke apart on impact and was followed up by two more, and giggling.

Rocks would be mean. Snowballs, apparently, were fair game in Tumble’s book.

“Oh you wanna play it like that, huh?”

Holstering Bianca, he scooped up a handful of snow and pat it down, sending the thing flying blind at Ellie who squealed and dove to take up more ammunition.

It was all fun and games until one of Ellie’s snowballs accidentally flew backwards out of her grasp, and directly into Seeker’s face.

Varric froze, he actually dropped the snowball in his own hand, and Ellie was turned, looking at the Seeker, hands slapped over her mouth as she gasped and waited for Cassandra to react.

If it had been Varric, Seeker would drop-kick him into the next age.

But it was Ellie.

So, Cassandra raised a hand and briskly thumbed the snow off her cheek.

And then in the blink of an eye she’d made a snowball of her own and it smacked Ellie square in the face.

“Oh!” Ellie squealed in surprise before letting out the most delighted laugh.

Snowball fight became a snowball war, then. One between Cassandra and Ellie, verses Varric and Bianca, and Maker bless her, this Bianca didn’t throw snow.

He swore he could hear Marehis openly laughing at his expense as the Human women took turns throwing snow at him, sometimes at each other, but mostly at him while he tried, very valiantly, mind, to fight back, but four arms were better than two.

He didn’t think he’d been happier to see Chuckles, when the Elf became concerned waiting for Ellie to show up at his lesson and gone to investigate what was keeping her.

Maker, it’d been fun—lots of fun. The whole while, Ellie was free and bubbly, like a kid her age should be. But Varric, was an admittedly…not old, but getting there, man. A very wet, cold, not-old man, and he needed hot cider and a maybe a nap. Definitely a nap.

“Having fun, Ellie?” Solas asked, bringing the girl to a halt, “Lady Seeker?”

Cassandra dropped her snowball and dusted snow off her hands as she cleared her throat, mildly embarrassed to be caught participating in something like a snowball fight.

“Target practice, helping Eleanor grow proficient with her aim.”

“Her enemies will cower at her snowball firing prowess, most surely,” oh Chuckles was beyond amused.
But Ellie blushed and looked chagrined. “Sorry, I got carried away goofing around. I’m late for my lesson with you huh?”

Shit, she’d clamed up real quick, like she felt badly that she’d been having fun for a minute. Not feeling guilty for having gotten caught—feeling bad because she’d been doing it in the first place.

Solas waved her concern off. “You are entitled to a bit of fun every now and again, being late to your lessons with me does little harm, in fact I agree with the sentiment Cassandra expressed—not all spells assist you in their casting as far as aiming goes, more difficult casting rely solely on your ability to aim. Snowballs are a safer practice tool than actual spells.”

Thank you Chuckles, leave it to him to be able to serious-up snowball fighting. In this case it worked to make Ellie stop looking so damn guilty. Tumbles really needed to learn it was okay to cut loose sometime and be able to let go of all this Inquisition responsibility bull for a bit.

Ellie looked to him then, “Thanks for teaching me today Varric, I learned a lot.”

“Glad to hear it Tumbles, you did good today, be sure to study that little cheat sheet,” Varric said.

She had kind of a weird look on her face for a moment. That faltering gaze that was one of her major tells tat she was about to lie and felt bad for it. But then she didn’t say anything, she just smiled and nodded and leaned down to kiss Varric on the cheek.

Apologies did not come naturally to the Lady Seeker.

She had found it within herself to apologize before to Eleanor, when it was befitting. In fact she often felt like apologizing to the girl even needlessly, when with others she would not. Because there was no amount of ‘sorries’ in all of Thedas that could cover the grievances Cassandra had to make up for with the girl. She had reviled her before all, labeled her a murderer and a terrorist, imprisoned her unjustly, interrogated her harshly—she had seen the dark purple rings she’d left on Eleanor’s arm, had been sick with horror when Adan pronounced it fractured, but when the girl had spoken of the injury she believed it to be from her fall on the way to the Breach. Cassandra… she wasn’t so sure. But could not bring herself to say so to the girl. It was pointless now after so much time passed…first shame had kept her silent, pushing it ever from her mind, and then the realization that if she did bring it up, Eleanor would either insist Cassandra was mistaken or…or worse. Absolve Cassandra of fault, give her an excuse and forgive her.

She’d had her resoning, in the moment, for the level—Maker, the level she’d nearly taken it to, Leliana’s hand on her arm, halting her Lyrium power, had been an annoyance in the moment, but now she was beyond grateful Eleanor did not live in fear that Cassandra could at any time cause the Lyrium in her blood to burn her into madness.

All of her reasons for her methods, her willingness to inflict her Gift on Eleanor all seemed futile now. She worried her prejudice had gotten the better of her—that she’d seen Eleanor was a mage and jumped to so many horrific conclusions, treated her so very obscenely, because she saw Apostatehood as a mark of evil, darker than the Mark that caused the suspicion that Eleanor may have been responsible for the Conclave.
And after all of that, it was Cassandra’s decisions that foisted the title of Herald upon her, set an impossible task before her. Every loss Eleanor endured, every injury, every disappointment, every level of suffering—physical, mental—she endured for this cause, Cassandra felt responsible. Because she was. It was what was necessary, Eleanor could not be freed from these responsibilities, not while that Mark still burned on her hand, and Cassandra found she could not express how absolutely she regretted their situation.

But she could express her regret in her earlier misstep. She found herself constantly questioning her own capabilities, her own decisions when it came to Eleanor’s care, she always tried her best in the moment, but looking back all she could see was mistake after mistake. And she had seen something like that in Marehis today—saw that the Elf woman felt as Cassandra did, that they had to think of every last thing they could to protect the girl, that their efforts were not nearly enough. That she lived with the fear that someday the small mistakes would lead to the ultimate loss.

So Cassandra Pentaghast stood in wait while Solas and Eleanor completed their nightly meditation, leaning with her back against the wall of the log cabin to the right of Eleanor’s.

The evening guards came and took their places at Eleanor’s door, and shortly after, Marehis emerged with Solas close at her back, and a scout came bounding down the stairs from the Chantry to retrieve Marehis’s nightly report and run it up to Leliana.

“Marehis?” Cassandra addressed the Elf woman who…well she’d seen Cassandra, she was hardly unobservant. Even if Cassandra had been hiding, she was certain the Elf woman would have been aware of her presence. She had been almost pointedly ignoring her, though she did look to Cassandra as she approached. “If you would not mind the intrusion, I wish to speak with you,” Cassandra said.

Marehis nodded and looked to Solas, the Elf man giving them both a regal looking nod of farewell before he went on ahead to his cabin.

“Here?” Marehis asked, shortly.

Ahh. Marehis had been cordial with her earlier, but Cassandra had suspected, rightly so, that the Elf woman was indeed, hmm Varric would term it ‘pissed off’ with her.

Cassandra cleared her throat, trying to go for politeness. “If you would walk with me?”

Marehis did not say yes, in fact her jaw clenched like she was restraining herself from yelling at the Seeker—if only to avoid accidentally waking and alarming Eleanor. When Cassandra began walking, Marehis followed her to Haven’s gate, and they meandered the path down, past the field she used for Eleanor’s lessons, to stand at the frozen river edge.

“I apologize. For this morning, Marehis. I would not have caused you alarm intentionally. When I dismissed the guards—I knew Eleanor was safe in hand, I did not consider that you would see the lack of guards and may imagine the worst.”

“But I should have,” Cassandra stopped her, hoping to explain herself before this turned into something ugly, that would bleed into the coming days. “Marehis, if I had seen Eleanor’s guards missing from their post I—” fear, just the ghost of possibility, stole the breath from her lungs for a moment. “I would have assumed the worst. You came bursting in armed to fight—that you did not attack me is truly a wonder. Roles reversed, there is precious little that would have kept me from throttling someone who, even in err, caused me to believe for a moment Eleanor had been brought to harm, killed because I was not there to protect her.”

“Precious little. That sums Ellie up nicely,” Marehis admitted with a bit of a rough laugh. “And had I not realized in the same instant I saw you that she was there, bearing witness, I likely would have ‘throttled you’. Or attempted to, anyway.”

Cassandra smiled at that, “Truly? Huh. Yes, roles reversed, Eleanor would have kept me from violence as well.”

“I read reports about your time in the Hinterlands. I forget you were the one…acting in my stead, really, while she was away. Your regard for her is the same as mine.”

“Regard?”

Marehis sighed, hugging herself a bit as she looked out across the frozen ice. “We love that child.”

“Ahh.” Cassandra herself could not have termed it as such, the word hadn’t even occurred to her. In fact having the idea laid bare before her sent something like panic through her she did not…she liked few people. Had had relationships of all sorts—mentors, friendships, her fair share of romantic interests, lovers. Though the latter seemed ironic because she had not loved any of them. Cared for, and certainly interested in but, there were scarce few she’d allowed herself to love in her life. She could barely remember loving…she hoped…her parents, at least. Antony, most assuredly, even now the ache of it lingered after all these years, could be made to feel fresh like an open wound if she thought on it long enough. She had loved him most in all the world, and none after him until Divine Justinia. And even then, it did not compare to her love for her brother.

But her…Maker, her love for Eleanor. It made something Cassandra thought died with her brother demand to be heard—the something that said love could exist for her, that it could result in painful things when those you loved were lost, but that did not mean it was worthless in the first place. To know Eleanor was to love her, and to not know Eleanor? Cassandra could scarcely believe there was a world out there where their paths had never crossed, where Eleanor remained alone and fending for herself, and Cassandra spent the rest of her days with the loss of love leaving her closed off to the idea entirely. She always held back in her regard for those who drew close to her for fear that such a thing would happen, that she would come to let them be important, too important and then she would lose them.

Eleanor. When she laid eyes on her that day after the Conclave, limp and lifeless in the hands of Inquisition soldiers, she thought she would hate the girl, would eventually see to her death, perhaps even kill her herself. She hadn’t steelied herself against loving the girl because the idea was so very far from her mind and then surely enough, it happened. She loved this girl, freely and unreigned in a way she had not dared to. Not since Antony, and she thought never again.

“When you left for the Hinterlands,” Marehis said, “I woke up the next morning, got a tray of breakfast from the tavern, went to Eleanor’s cabin. The guards were missing then obviously, but I wasn’t alarmed because on an intellectual level I knew her schedule, knew she was away, but the rest of me just hadn’t caught up yet. I had a fire going, a plan for what she was to wear, how I was going to do her hair, and was just getting ready to wake her when I fully realized she wasn’t there to wake. It was pure habit, I thought nothing of it.”

Cassandra looked to the Elf woman, not sure why she was sharing such a thing, but was willing to listen if it meant Eleanor’s guardian would be more at ease with her.
“Perhaps I was too quick to judge,” Marehis said then. “Your actions this morning, waking and thinking immediately of her, wanting to share in something you enjoy doing together that you know helps her—it is much like my routine. And in my case I certainly don’t think twice sending the guards away because I know she is safe in my care, as I’m sure she is in yours. You did not act out of thoughtlessness for her safety, or my job.” Marehis sighed. “We care for her such that we blame ourselves for things that are out of our control.”

Ahh. That loosed something in Cassandra’s mind—the whirlwind of thoughts ever pressing in the back of her mind that told her she had to do better. Be better. Take better care of Eleanor. What happened in the past was entirely out of her control now. She could not go back and still the hand that bruised the girl, anymore than she could go back and stop the one that Marked her for her fate now at the Conclave. She was certain she’d made mistakes in her care of Eleanor but…blessedly, they were both still around for her to learn from them. And some of the things—some, not all—were things she should not blame herself for because, they simply were not her fault. Out of her control from beginning to end.

“You are too hard on yourself too, I believe,” Cassandra said then. “You are amazing in your care of Eleanor. You cannot perceive of everything that could befall her, cannot be with her every hour of the day, if you tried you would only diminish your capacity to help her as you do.”

Marehis blew out a breath like she’d been holding it hostage for a moment. “I… I thank you, Lady Seeker.”

“Consider calling me Cassandra,” she called her ‘Marehis’ after all.

“Cassandra then,” she shifted slightly, back and forth on her feet and then, “I do understand about the morning prayer, truly. If you wish to take over the change of guard…” she left the invitation open ended.

“Ahh. Would you care to sleep in? Your work is tireless, if you wished for more time in the mornings—I could see to it she gets breakfast, our lessons are her first in the morning, if you wished to join us then.”

“No no, that isn’t necessary, I just meant if you would prefer for me to not interfere in your prayer ritual, I would just bring breakfast for you and Ellie—”

“And yourself. Marehis, I know my earlier candor was not one of welcome when Eleanor proposed you pray us. But I would be honored, truly, if you wished to join us.”

“It would be my pleasure.”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish Used:
Da’len=Child
Lethallan=my friend
Elgar’nan= The All-Father, the male leader of the pantheon who plays the masculine role opposite Mythal’s feminine role in Dalish religion.
Fendehis= unofficially translated Dalish swear word, I personally believe to mean "(Dread) Wolf’s Shit!"
Notes:
*Wintersend= basically Christmas, falls in the month of Guardian, the Thedas equivalent of February
*Name-Day= so Dwarves either don't have birthdays, or they consider their naming more important than birth, or some culmination of the two ideas. They might be named the day of their births, but they could be named in some form of post-birth ceremony. Dunno for sure but I remember Birthdays being mentioned in every other context of the other races and their birth, but in Dragon Age: Origins Dwarf Name-Days are mentioned. So I went with it.

Thanks for reading! Chapter Four, in Val Royeaux, EDA: 7/28/18
They left for Val Royeaux shortly thereafter. Marehis was a marvelous addition to their team, Cassandra thought. She fought well—remarkably so, Leliana hadn’t been exaggerating when she said Marehis would be best suited in her role as Eleanor’s bodyguard. The Elf woman stayed close to the Herald, and it was something of a relief to have someone who always had eyes on Eleanor—they’d done well in the Hinterlands, between Cassandra, Varric, and Solas there was almost always someone with Eleanor, but there were times, especially when setting up camp or in battle when Cassandra lost sight of the Herald. Marehis was continually at Eleanor’s side, nothing took her from it, and it was reassuring. Cassandra worried less of what might be befalling Eleanor as she focused on defending herself in battle or work that consumed her focus.

Marehis equipped appropriate scout armor she used for field work, and she rode with Eleanor as they traveled, seated behind the Herald in the saddle. The Elf woman was religious in her treatment and care of the girl, every morning she subtly passed along small vial of yellow potion to her and was often unprompted when she would hand her what Cassandra recognized as an antacid, something to calm Eleanor’s stomach when she became anxious.

There was one day in particular that had been…jarring, to say the least. They’d been cleaning up from their midday meal, Elenaor had been rather quiet throughout, had needed potion to stomach her food. The girl dropped the ceramic plate she’d been handing to Blackwall for drying and looked like she might sick up, her hand flew to her chest though and she gasped out a panicky whisper to the Warden that she couldn’t breathe.

Blackwall hollered for Cassandra, but Marehis was already at the girl’s side. At first there was the concern that something had triggered an asthma attack, that the girl genuinely was losing the ability to breathe, but it was more that she couldn’t catch her breath. Marehis took a hold of Eleanor’s face, told her to focus on her and try to match her breathing to Marehis’s own.

A panic attack, it turned out to be. Eleanor nearly threw up, was on the verge of passing out, when Marehis calmly unstopped a miniature vial of blue potion and administered it to the girl.

It was rather drastic, the change. It was clear why Eleanor was not to use such a draught unless going immediately to bed or experiencing dire panic. They had to keep moving so, Marehis got into the saddle first, before Blackwall helped a swaying, unsteady Eleanor into her place in front of her body guard, and the Elf woman took the reins, keeping her arms secure around the girl—Eleanor’s head lolled back onto Marehis’s shoulder and she dozed in and out of consciousness as Russel trotted along, moving carefully, as if he understood he needed to take care with the girl in his saddle.

Varric had been rather alarmed—one moment Eleanor had been loud and inconsolable, and the next she was eerily still and silent, and if they fell under attack, she would not be capable of defending herself. He rode close by and it was only because his own horse was so skilled that he stayed on their path—the Dwarven man was hardly paying attention to where they were going, he kept looking about as if worried danger could swoop down at any minute and he’d need to protect the Herald.

Eleanor was quiet the rest of the day. Even as the potion’s effects wore off, Eleanor remained withdrawn, awake but unfocused. When they made camp for the evening she slid from the saddle and didn’t respond when questioned on how she was feeling, if she was tired or hungry. Solas and Blackwall set up their tents, and Eleanor slowly, as if her legs were like lead, lumbered into a tent. Cassandra followed and saw her unroll her bedroll and slip inside pulling the covers up under her chin, bottom lip caught in her teeth, she turned so her back was to the Seeker. Cassandra wanted desperately for Eleanor to say anything, but her own words dried up in her mouth.

She left the girl be. Marehis didn’t disturb her either. Their party sat silent in the midst of their campsite, no fire built, no supper underway. They sat and waited, the only sound in their little desolate camp, was that of Eleanor crying, now that she was in the privacy of her tent, curled up under her covers—the sound was muffled but they could still hear, and it was…awful.

She didn’t come out of the tent even when they did take their evening meal, didn’t speak when Marehis and Cassandra settled in for the night alongside her, her back was still to them. Cassandra did not think she was asleep. Marehis crouched at Eleanor’s side, and set two bottles beside her—sleeping and calming draughts—and then smoothed some of the girl’s hair from her face before pressing a kiss to her temple, whispering, “Theneras antishan, da’len.”

Cassandra and Marehis had been alarmed when they woke the next morning and Eleanor was not in her bedroll, potion untouched, but they found the girl sitting in front of a fire none of them had built, in silent prayer as they usually started her day. The older women looked to each other for a moment before taking their usual seats, on either side of Eleanor, and joined her. Cassandra closed her eyes and prayed—prayed for their days journey, for their safety, for Eleanor.

Eleanor remained quiet, eyes closed, until the men began shuffling out of their tent, tentatively taking seats of their own around the fire.

“I’m sorry,” were the first words out of her mouth since ‘I can’t breathe’. Cassandra was gratified to hear the girl’s voice again, though she did not necessarily appreciate that they were in apology, but she wasn’t about to snap at the girl. “I shouldn’t have shut down like that, last night. I know you guys were helping me, and just trying to make sure I was alright. My little freak out was kind of scary, huh?”

No one seemed certain what to say to that, but Marehis took a hold of Eleanor’s unmarked hand, and Cassandra found her voice, “We were merely concerned. You’re feeling better?”
“I don’t really… feel much of anything right now. I’m still kind of…I dunno. I was just tired afterward, done up. But I’m not freaking out or anything, so I guess that’s better,” she licked her lips nervously. She’d been staring into the fire as she spoke, but now she raised her eyes to catch the gaze of the men who sat across from her.

Eleanor was transparent with them then, opening up to them about her discussion with Healer Adan, and that Marehis had been brought on their journey to monitor her treatment. Cassandra was glad she’d somewhat prepared them for such a revelation—Varric, still half-asleep, bags under his eyes as if he’d had trouble falling asleep at all, visibly held his tongue, stopped himself from saying the first thing off the top of his head in response to Eleanor’s disclosure. Blackwall and Solas were quiet too, though she supposed they were taking her advice and merely listening to the girl.

They did seem mildly surprised that Eleanor had decided to tell them. But Cassandra, after her initial ponderance thought perhaps that was why she’d been so very sad. She’d been caught, so to speak. Eleanor was embarrassed of what she thought of as a weakness. She was ashamed of her having had such a drastic symptom flare so openly—she’d known it would be awkward at the very least, if not futile to try and act like nothing had happened at all.

Eleanor said that thinking back, she’d had some close calls with panic attacks, but yesterday it just crept up on her—she hadn’t been expecting it any more than they had.

“I didn’t realize how loopy calming potion would make me, I’ve only ever taken it before bed.”

“In the future, perhaps we could try half doses,” Marehis suggested. “Adan is a skilled healer, but he cannot account for every sensitivity you might have to certain ingredients.”

Eleanor nodded.

“Look Tumbles,” Varric nervously trotted out, “I don’t know a whole lot about this stuff, but uh, you ever need to talk, I’m all ears.”

“Likewise,” Solas was quick to volunteer.

“If you need anything, don’t hesitate to ask,” Blackwall insisted.

“Actually,” Eleanor said, as if giving the matter considerable thought, “there is something that’d be really helpful right now.”

There was something almost like amusement in her tones, that was the only thing that kept Cassandra in her seat. The three men, however, were already on their feet. Varric was looking around as if he should be able to see what Eleanor was referring to, looking like he might actually race the other men to get whatever it was he was shifting restlessly on his feet.

“What? Name it, Ellie, anything,” the Dwarf said.

She looked up at them, and with grave seriousness said,

“Breakfast.”
It took an entire week more to traverse their path to Val Royeaux. Their horses were well in hand at the stables just outside the city gate, though Eleanor worried leaving their steeds in the care of strangers.

Though that seemed rather forgotten as she stared up at their surroundings in wide-eyed awe—or perhaps it was terror. The expression on her face reminded Cassandra of how she’d looked upon the Breach. a mix of shock, horror, and resigned determination. Val Royeaux was full of glittering beauty that juxtaposed the dark fury of the Breach, but to some degree, they were equally terrifying and malicious entities. The Breach was full of demons, but Val Royeaux was full of Orlesians. Wealthy, high-born Orlesians with a penchant for frivolous rivalries and too much power for anyone’s good.

Their access to the city was secured by their few Chantry allies, but unfortunately, it did precious little to secure them from open fear on behalf of Val Royeaux’s citizens. They were not carrying torches and pitchforks, as Eleanor feared they would, but Cassandra expected no less. Orlesian’s were more likely to run from their fear than attempt to do it harm.

Eleanor looked up at Cassandra, wide-eyed when in fact, a woman took sight of them upon entering the city and ran screaming.

“What was that about? Just what kind of rumors has Roderick been spreading about me?” Eleanor asked.

“You are hardly a foreboding sight, Eleanor, I’m sure she was reacting to the Inquisition’s infiltration of Val Royeaux. If anything, my presence will set fear in our audience today.”

“You aren’t scary,” Eleanor was quick to…it sounded like assurance, though Cassandra was half-inclined to take it as an insult. “I mean golly you’re good at scary, but you’re really pretty!”

Cassandra gave a dismissive huff. ‘Pretty’ did not put fear into the hearts of men. Scary, however, did.

“Lady Seeker.” One of Leliana’s scouts approached them then, “Revered Mother Hevara is in the Bazar expecting your arrival. There are Templars in wait, led by Lord Seeker Lucius.”

Eleanor blanched at the idea that there were Templars near and waiting for her.

“They cannot take custody of you Eleanor, you will be safe,” Cassandra promised. Though the fact that there were Templars here at all was troubling, but Lord Seeker Lucius…surely, he would be reasonable. But it was not Cassandra’s worry that needed abated, “The Marchand’s apartment is in the second tier of the bazar, we could go settle ourselves and take a moment before addressing the clerics.”

If memory served, as hers often did, there were shops on either side of the bazar they could slip through unnoticed to get to the towers leading to the upper levels of Val Royeaux. They could make themselves at home and maybe set in for the day, let Eleanor eat something she didn’t have a hand in cooking, bathe in an actual bathtub, and sleep in a proper bed before facing the Chantry’s masses.

There was something familiar, that gave Cassandra a deep sense of relief that Eleanor was on her way to recovery, in the Herald’s response to the Seeker’s suggestion.

The Eleanor they brought back from the Hinterlands would have clutched Cassandra’s offer like a lifeline—there was no immediate, pressing thing that could not be put off until tomorrow. The Eleanor Cassandra bore witness to at the Breach…she would face the grand clerics head on— their time in the Marquise home a luxurious reward for a job well done, as opposed to a guilt- ridden respite before facing a harrowing task.

“The grand Clerics have had more than enough opportunity to speak ill of the Inquisition already,” Eleanor said, a sort of determination in her voice, “let’s go see what they have to say to our faces, yeah?”

And despite the fact there were Templars in attendance, Eleanor took the lead, her party members flanking her, and Marehis at her back, into the summer bazar.

Rather a large crowd was gathered before the Cleric’s platform—Orlesian nobility and members of the Chantry, all who parted way to let the Herald of Andraste stand before Revered Mother Hevara herself.

“Good people of Val Royeaux, hear me! Together we mourn our Divine,” The Mother said at the Inquisition’s approach. “Her naive and beautiful heart silenced by treachery! You wonder what will become of her murderer, well wonder no more.” She pointed her finger at Eleanor, “Behold the so-called Herald of Andraste! Claiming to rise where our beloved fell. We say this is a false prophet! No servant of anything beyond her selfish greed!”

Several thoughts struck Cassandra at once. She should have insisted they regroup before coming here, scoped the landscape more before having Eleanor come before the clerics. She shouldn’t be subjecting her to the Chantry’s rhetoric at all—it seemed sound to address them but perhaps they should have simply dug-in, stood on their own to serve Thedas until they caught the attention of the Mages or the Templars on their own merit. She shouldn’t want to strike an old woman—a Chantry Mother of all things.

But Eleanor stepped forward, her voice calm as she said, “We only came to speak with you peacefully, your show here is a bit dramatic don’t you think? Perhaps you could get off your little stage and speak with me like an adult about how we can work together to seal the Breach?”

Cassandra nodded. “Agreed. Really Mother Hevara, is this all necessary? You asked for Eleanor to address the grand clerics, should you not give her fair opportunity to do so?” Cassandra made certain her voice was loud enough to be heard by all gathered there, “She is no longer a suspect of the Divine’s murder and you know that. There were several Chantry members in attendance, myself included, when the Breach revealed its creator and the events of the Divine’s death.”

“It is already too late for any such vindication,” Mother Hevara said gesturing to a group of oncoming Templars. At their head, was Lord Seeker Lucious. “The Templars have returned to the chantry! They will face this ‘Inquisition’ and the people will be safe once more!”

Perhaps not all the people. A Templar at Lord Lucious’s side punched Mother Hevara squarely in the face, knocking her onto her back as Lucious took her stage.

“Still yourself, she is beneath us,” Lord Seeker said to a dark-skinned Templar who was visibly startled by the assault and made to go to the Mother’s side, stopped only by Lord Lucious’s hand on his arm.

Cassandra was very glad she hadn’t herself given in to the temptation to strike against the Revered Mother, Eleanor was glaring—a look more murderous than Cassandra thought the girl could manage, and for a moment the fear of magic surging forth uncontrollable in a fit of rage piqued itself in the back of Cassandra’s mind. What would she do if Eleanor suddenly lost control in such a way?

But she didn’t, she did however clench her fists and Cassandra flinched when Eleanor rushed forward, hopping up onto the platform to put herself between Mother Hevara and the Templars, hand reaching behind her to settle on the old woman’s shoulder while her marked hand pointed a finger at Lucious as she railed against him,

“Hey! Back it right up mister, what is your deal? Maker’s breath is the entire Chantry filled with toddlers? I came here to talk to have a civilized discussion on how to fix the gaping hole in the sky that threatens the entire world, not to reprimand grown men for not knowing you shouldn’t hit people.”

Lord Seeker Lucious looked down upon Eleanor with distain. “I came to see what frightens old women so, and to laugh.”

“Lord Seeker, what if she really was sent by the Maker—” the dark-skinned Templar that had been just as appalled as Eleanor spoke then, coming to her defense. Eleanor leveled the sensible Templar a grateful smile.

“You are called to a higher purpose, do not question,” snapped the Templar that had struck Hevara.

Eleanor looked as if there were several things she would like to say, and it occurred to Cassandra that she had yet to see the girl swear before—she’d volleyed her share of insults at enemies true, but never with the colorful language Varric, and sometimes even Cassandra or Solas, used. She looked like she might break that streak just now, but instead looked imploringly to Cassandra. Ahh. Maybe the Lady Seeker could get the Lord Seeker to see reason. Maybe.

“Lord Seeker Lucious—” Cassandra began. Maybe turned into ‘definitely not’.

“You will not address me,” the Lord Seeker said frigidly. “Creating a heretical movement, raising up a puppet as Andraste’s prophet. You should be ashamed. You should all be ashamed! The Templars failed no one when they left the Chantry to purge the Mages. You are the ones who have failed! You who would leash our righteous swords with doubt and fear! If you came to appeal to the Chantry, you are too late! The only destiny here that demands respect is mine!”

What sort of nonsense? Had Lord Lucious gone mad? His bizarre behavior struck Casandra silent, just what had become of the Templar Order without proper Seeker supervision?

“I will make the Templar order a power that stands alone against the void,” Lucious enthused, “We deserve recognition. Independence! You have shown me nothing, and the inquisition…less than nothing. Templars, Val Royeaux is unworthy of our protection! We march!”

And they did, leaving the chaos they’d created, the Templar’s followed Lord Lucious away from the platform and across the bazar to the gates of Val Royeaux. Though the young Templar that had tried to get Lucious to see reason looked back at Eleanor as they left. Cassandra hoped something could be done about the Lord Seeker, that he could be made to see sense. Not all of the Templars were a lost cause.

Eleanor was helping Mother Hevara to her feet then, standing on tip toes to whisper something in the woman’s ear before pulling away, the two nodding at each other, though the woman looked rather disgusted with the whole affair. Eleanor turned to face her companions.
Marehis was at her side in an instant, a hand on Eleanor’s elbow as she led her off the platform, her lips at the girl’s ear and Cassandra caught the whispered, worried snap as Marehis insisted Eleanor never rush off out of reach like that again, not in such an unpredictable situation.

Eleanor looked abashed and kissed her minder on the cheek before saying, albeit apologetically. “I didn’t mean to worry you, I just didn’t want them to think they could hit her again. She didn’t uh…”

“She didn’t what, Ellie?” Solas asked quietly.

Oh goodness. Eleanor was going to insist the woman hadn’t really meant the horrible things she’d said or some such nonsense. She was too forgiving by half.

“She didn’t move to protect herself or get out of striking distance so,” Eleanor shrugged. “Usually when people uh, hit like that they don’t stop, not in my experience anyway. That Seeker Lucius seemed like the kind who might literally kick when someone’s down.”

Oh. That certainly hadn’t been the response Cassandra expected, and for a moment the Seeker had to try in order to parcel through what exactly Eleanor meant, and she found herself paling at the thought of an even younger Eleanor with some great lout towering over her, striking her down and kicking her for good measure—that Eleanor had worried the same thing was about to befall the woman who had just insulted her, and sought to keep her from harm.

She opened her mouth to…well she wasn’t sure what. She felt like yelling, not at Eleanor, but she wanted names. Just who thought they had the right to—

The absolute outrage she felt was quelled and forgotten, replaced by startled panic when their entire party jumped back, Cassandra and Marehis’s arms shooting out to shield Eleanor when the distinct thump of an arrow striking stone smacked at the Herald’s feet.

Blackwall had his hand on the hilt of his sword as he surveyed the area above them trying to scope out the sniper, Varric had pulled Bianca to aid in striking whoever had shot at Eleanor, and Cassandra felt the wash of Solas’s magic as Barrier swept over the girl.

“An arrow with a message,” Cassandra ground out with some measure of relief after studying the object that had been flung at Eleanor, the men calmed at that and Varric very reluctantly settled Bianca back into her holster.

Eleanor made to reach for the parchment attached to the arrow, but Marehis beat her to it, unraveling it herself to hold it out for Eleanor’s inspection.

“What does it say, Lady Seeker?” Blackwall asked as the two women and Eleanor examined the parchment.

“Favors for Favors of Friends,” Cassandra read aloud. “People say you’re special. I want to help, and I can bring everyone.” Eleanor’s cheeks pinked at being called ‘special’ by their unknown messenger.

“There’s a baddie in Val Royeaux,” Marehis picked up then, “I hear he wants to hurt you. Have a search for the red things in the market, the docks, and ‘round the café, and maybe you’ll meet him first. Bring Swords. Signed, the Friends of Red Jenny.”

Marehis looked to Cassandra then, and were silent for a moment as they seemed to decide between which of them would go to investigate the threat to Eleanor, and who would stay.
With a nod from Cassandra—that she would watch over Eleanor—Marehis gave her a grateful smile and said, “I’ll have a look around. In the meantime, da’len stay with the others and try to stay out of trouble, yes?”

“Take someone with you please, would you mind? I…I wouldn’t want anyone to mistreat you, wandering around Val Royeaux on your own.”

Ahh. Marehis was an Elf. Perhaps Cassandra should be the one to go in search of the information this ‘Red Jenny’ sought to provide.

But Marehis shook her head and pulled her hood up over her hair, the outline of her ears barely visible—one could easily mistake it as some form of hair decoration sticking up under the hood the impressions were so very unperceivable, the woman had much shorter ears than her male counterpart in Solas. At a passing glance one would think the woman just a tall, lean Human.

“I’ll be just fine, Ellie,” she said reassuringly before turning on her heel and heading for the docks.

The moment the Elf woman was out of view, another seemed to take her place, approaching Eleanor cautiously. Her robes spoke to her status as a mage, though she had no staff with her, so Cassandra supposed the woman was not much of a threat if she meant to harm the Herald. Ahh, wait, Cassandra recognized her.

“Herald of Andraste?” the raven-haired newcomer asked Eleanor. “If I might have a moment?”

“Grand Enchanter Fiona?” Cassandra asked, shocked to find her in Val Royeaux of all places.

Solas immediately recognized the name, “Leader of the Mage Rebellion? Is it not dangerous for you to be here?”

The woman looked to Eleanor as she said, “I heard of this gathering and wished to see the Herald with my own eyes,” she looked thoughtful before offering, “if it is help with the Breach you seek, perhaps you should look among your fellow mages.”

“You would help us?” Eleanor asked.

The Grand Enchanter did not necessarily say yes, but neither did she reject the notion. “Consider this an invitation to meet with us in Redcliffe. Perhaps alliance could benefit us both. Au revoir, Herald.”

She was walking away, out the gates of Val Royeaux before Eleanor could reply. Cassandra was not certain it would be wise to approach the Mages, but the invitation was a sign of progress for the Inquisition.

“We will discuss this once we are back in Haven, Eleanor. For now, we should seek out our housing,” Cassandra said.

“Yeah, lets go check out the digs Ruffles got us,” Varric said. “I call dibs on the biggest bed.”

“What would you do with the biggest bed?” Blackwall asked.

“Fill it.”
“You’re shorter than I am,” Eleanor said with genuine confusion.

The Dwarf smirked. Oh Maker. “Give me an hour at the tavern and trust me, Tumbles, I can fill the biggest bed in Val Royeaux.”

Eleanor clapped a hand over her mouth, delight evident in her eyes at Varric’s joke.

Blackwall clapped the Dwarf on the back of the head for his crudeness. “Watch your rotten mouth, Dwarf, she’s just a girl.”

And then Eleanor shrugged as if unbothered and began leading them towards one of the towers that would lead them up to the level their housing was on, she said in the most nonchalant tone of tones, “I could probably fill my bed in half the time Varric could anyway.”

Maker preserve them, the Dwarf was a terrible influence Cassandra thought as she shook her head. Blackwall looked dumbstruck while Varric guffawed.

Solas was the only one who had his senses intact, following close behind Eleanor.

But Marehis would likely kill the man if he let Eleanor’s knack for occasionally saying something astounding and unexpected, keep him from being at her side at all times.

Though he seemed more amused than shocked, Cassandra realized then, his shoulders were shaking with unspilled laughter.

Maker preserve them all.

The Marchand’s home in Val Royeaux was…well it was just amazing. Ellie felt the way she did when she was a foreigner in an entirely new place, somewhere with another language and customs she could never hope to understand. Everything was crafted from marble and gold-something-or-other it seemed, everything. From the doors to the windows, to the decorative candle sticks, everything was made from things that cost more money than Ellie could ever dream to see in her lifetime.

What was it she’d had in her pocket when she and Trevelyan finally trekked up the stairs to the Temple of Sacred Ashes? Lint and maybe a copper. And that copper might have been on loan from Trevelyan, she couldn’t really remember now. Was it the amnesia or had just so much time passed that she couldn’t remember the little details?

Not much time had passed, and yet her time in the Inquisition, with all the people she’d met and traveling she’d done, it felt like years instead of just…uh…

“How long has it been since the Breach opened, Cassandra?”

Her sudden question had Cassandra looking at her strangely, but the Nevarran woman slowly replied, “It has nearly been two months, why?”

Ellie shrugged. “Hmm, just wondering. I’ve never been good at keeping track of time.”

“Oh, don’t sweat it kid,” Varric said, “time’s just a social construct.”
“Perhaps how we mark its passage, yes, but time itself is scientific fact,” Solas debated.

Ellie shook her head at them, those two could really get into it over just about anything sometimes. But it seemed like they usually did so in good fun, so, that was alright.

“Come Eleanor, I suggest we pick out our rooms while Varric is distracted,” Cassandra whispered conspiratorially in her ear.

Ellie smiled and nodded. Cassandra had been like that more and more lately—friendly. Not that she’d been wholly unfriendly towards Ellie, not since she first woke up after the Conclave anyway, but lately…well it was a bit more like having an actual friend than just someone you could play nice with at work.

They wandered through the house together. Well, Ellie wandered, Cassandra seemed like she knew where she was going—the Seeker, Blackwall, and Marehis had poured over maps of Val Royeaux and the Marquis home, discussing the best ways for navigating both, and every possible option of emergency exit should the need arise.

Ellie didn’t like that. Oh! Not that they were prepared, no, that was great—she just didn’t like that they tried to leave her out of things like that. A lot of her security stuff was kept between her companions and advisors and Marehis in an effort not to ‘scare’ her. But didn’t that just make their jobs harder? She only knew about their contingency plans for Val Royeaux because she’d woken earlier than usual one day on their trip and seen them gathered together talking quietly, and then the moment Marehis saw Ellie awake and standing in the open flap of their tent, they’d gone quiet and said they were just waiting for Ellie to wake up for their morning prayers.

They could have been sleeping! That’s what worried Ellie, that her friends were neglecting themselves to unnecessarily shield her from something that would honestly probably benefit them if she was in the loop.

She wasn’t sure how to ask to be included, she didn’t want to make them think she was ungrateful, but she knew there were people after her. Yeah sometimes it was stressful, the idea that she didn’t know who outside the Inquisition…and sometimes even in the Inquisition…she could trust, that anyone could be out to kill or capture her. It used to gnaw away at her in the beginning, but she’d had time to think about it, think about it clearly—even more so recently, since Adan’s prescription—and really…it wasn’t that much different from her previous life.

Templars had always been after her, and people who just in-general feared or hated mages. She’d never lived anywhere she felt particularly safe, even when she was able to stay close to Ava. And that wasn’t even considering the fact that she’d been alone, taking care of herself, never having a consistent roof over her head, never quite sure where her next meal was coming from, or if it was coming. Some nights she’d gone to sleep expecting to wake up dead.

If anything, her life in the Inquisition was the safest she’d ever been. It hadn’t seemed that way at first, she’d been so caught up in the new danger it made her forget the old danger she’d just come from.

“You’re awfully quiet.”

Ellie looked up at Cassandra then, giving her a reassuring smile, “Just thinking,” she said.

“Anything you’d care to share? Is there something troubling you, Eleanor?”

Well, she did ask.
“Why do you guys plan so much when I’m not around? I understand if it’s because you’re afraid I’d get in the way, but if it’s just to make it seem like there’s nothing to be planned for, because you don’t want me worried, I’d much rather be informed and included than in the dark and ‘blissfully ignorant’.”

“Ahh.” Cassandra seemed to think on it a moment and then, “I should like some time to consider the matter and discuss it with the others before outright offering to include you in future, however I understand your point. It would likely be safer for you to be more readily aware of the different security precautions we’ve taken it upon ourselves to see to without your knowing.”

“I mean, I could help, you know? If there’s something I’m doing, or something I should be doing that would make your jobs easier, you guys should tell me.”

“You’re not exactly running around making a spectacle of yourself, delivering yourself into the hands of your enemies—save your display with Seeker Lucious,” Cassandra gently reprimanded. But then, “though I must say, it was rather well done of you. My point is, Eleanor, you do not make our job difficult, in fact you’ve rather improved its burden since becoming more forthright with the things you struggle with, your opinions on things, telling us when there is something that bothers you.”

“Well, it bothers me you that you spend time you could be resting to do things you could do when I’m awake. I know I’m the youngest but I’m pretty sure everyone needs to eat their vegetables and get enough sleep.”

“I’ll discuss the matter with the others, but you needn’t be so concerned for us, we’re hardly hurting from lack of sleep. Though your sentiment about vegetables, Varric could do with a few.”

“The healthiest thing I’ve seen him eat is fruit…in alcoholic form. Technically that’s just drinking.”

“Eleanor, you may not realize this, but you do hold a great deal of influence over the Dwarf. I’m certain if you asked him to eat all the brussels sprouts in Thedas, he’d take up the challenge.”

Ellie scrunched up her nose at that, “Oh sprouts taste like sweaty socks! Peas are okay though, and carrots. Oh! You know what’s the absolute best? Butternut squash! Flissa made this stew with them and Maker it was heavenly.”

“Better than snails?” Cassandra asked as placed an arm around Ellie’s shoulder’s then, the two walking closely as they investigated the Marchand’s home.

“Cassandra! Snails are the worst!”

They ended up getting their pick of bedrooms, though Ellie had a feeling Cassandra had already decided before arriving in Val Royeaux, which rooms would suit them best. She did mention there were several escape roues out the various windows, balcony door, and even a secret passage way the Marquis and his wife made them aware of in case of emergency, in the room which she delegated to Ellie.
The room was beautiful and so big! It was good it was so open, or Ellie feared she might just get lost in it. It was constructed of copper-veined marble, deep blue curtains and tapestries, even the bedding, and gold trimming on everything. She was somewhat afraid of getting things dirty.

But there was also a bath. An actual bath! A tub, sunk into the floor she could step down into and bathe. Had she thanked the Marquis? She was pretty sure she had but she was for sure thanking the Orlesian couple big time next time she saw them.

She opted, however, to wash up in the basin first. Marehis would be back soon and something in Ellie’s magic said she’d be out and about again—no point in bathing and changing if she was just going to get all dirtied up again.

She did get lost when she left her room. She couldn’t exactly remember which room Cassandra had claimed, but she knew it was close by. But the older woman might be bathing herself, and she didn’t need Ellie hanging around all the time—she was probably enjoying the solitude. So, Ellie began wandering the estate in the general direction she was pretty sure would lead her back to the main hall.

There weren’t any servants, she was grateful to note. It was weird enough having someone like Marehis, who she could ask just about anything of and expect it forthwith, she didn’t think she’d like having servants acting like she was the boss of them. That was another security measure, one she’d been made aware of, that the usual serving staff would prepare the house for occupation and then leave their Inquisition guests to their own devices—less chance of an awkward interaction where Marehis would have to kill a servant-turned-assassin or anything.

Though, she could stand having someone around who could give her directions. She was pretty sure she was lost now—she’d found a section of the house dedicated to being a library. The door to it thrummed with magic that zipped through her hands when she pushed it open, not painful just, like she’d opened something warded, but allowed her access.

Maybe Solas would be around? He liked to read. Or maybe once she found him she could show him the library if he hadn’t discovered it yet. She didn’t know much about magical texts or if this library would hold anything of interest to the Elf, but there were a billion books it looked like, spanning the walls and the maze of shelves throughout the large room. Surely something would pique his interest. She thought of Varric as well, but he seemed more interested in writing books than reading them.

A bit of panic spiked in her chest though, as the shelved path grew too narrow for comfort—the room was truly set up like a maze, no clear path through, and she wasn’t sure if she was going in circles or not.

And her magic did something it hadn’t done in quite some time. It sent familiar notes of comfort coursing through the veins of magic traveling through her body.

She thought at first that her magic had been backing off because she’d found companionship elsewhere, but maybe her depressive state had been keeping her magic from interacting with her the way it was used to? Now, it sought to soothe and do what it could to guide—as she navigated, her magic told her if she’d already been one way before, or if she’d accidentally rounded back.

Thank you, she thought as she made it to a large door on the opposite end of the library from which she came, and her magic warmed in reply.
She swung open the door to find Solas on the other side looking just as surprised as she was to be, quite literally, running into him.

“Oh!” she gasped as she staggered backward, his hands went to her elbows to steady her.

“Ellie!” he regarded her for a moment before asking, “Are you well, lethallan?”

Ellie nodded slowly. “Yeah, I’m alright. Are you?” she looked around the hall they were in, “Did you get lost as well?”

Solas shook his head. “Not at all, I was merely settling in when…Eleanor, were you lost just now? Were you frightened?”

Ellie blinked at that, confused. She felt a bit childish for having to admit she’d been afraid, but she wasn’t about to lie to Solas…especially with Cassandra’s voice in her mind reminding her how much easier it was to protect her when she was forthright with her companions. “I was actually—there’s a whole world of books back there, and I got turned around in the maze,” and then, “It really is a great set-up if you’re interested in checking it out, I think I can navigate it better now—there might be something you’d like to read.”

“Yes, I gathered as much, before,” he spoke absently.

“Before?” Ellie asked.

Solas’s cheeks paled though the tips of his ears turned red, and he seemed embarrassed about something. Or worried?

But then he shook his head like he was clearing a thought from it and peered into the library. “Ahh. There are some books of magic—common ones, on the outer shelves. Perhaps we should avoid the library then. I’ve never had the means to do so myself, but usually Mages obscure the set up of their libraries to keep others from finding things they’d rather keep hidden. Like rare, possibly only remaining editions, of tomes and scrolls containing spells they’d rather keep in the family or be the only Mage in existence that holds such knowledge.”

Oh. But, “The Marquis isn’t a mage, though,” Ellie said, confused. She hadn’t thought his wife was one either.

“It is of no great importance, they may just be avid collectors of books regardless of genre, the wealthy can often afford even hobbies that do not necessarily coincide with their way of life,” Solas shrugged. And then, “Come, are you hungry, da’len? We didn’t partake of a noon meal earlier, Marehis would be rather displeased if she discovered I left you to starve.”

Ellie giggled at that. “I forgot all about lunch! Though its more like dinner time now isn’t it? Do you know where the kitchens are?”

“I do indeed, come along now, da’len,” Solas said, and he actually offered her his hand which she took in her unmarked one, and he led her though the Marquis home.

When they’d first entered the Marquis Val Royeaux apartment she’d thought it would be just that—a small, fancy apartment. But now she realized the Marquis owned the entirety of this fourth of the circle around the Summer Bazaar—the second tier and the third tier, which was…well it was an awful lot for just two people, wasn’t it? Though they probably had friends and family that visited them, they hadn’t any children it seemed. Ellie thought she’d get rather lonely if she lived in a place this big all on her own.
Solas was quiet as they made their way to the kitchen, but she could smell something delicious already being prepared, had the Marquis left a chef for them?

“Oi, Dwarf, you cut those carrots like that they’ll be mush—fine lengths, not mashed paste!”

“Keep your fine lengths in your pants, Hero, I’m chopping just fine.”

Solas loudly cleared his throat as he and Ellie entered the kitchen.

Ellie started laughing then—it was just too rich, these two in aprons, standing side by side at the counter—Varric on a stool of course—chopping vegetables and squabbling like a married couple.

Oh Maker, Blackwall and Varric would make the hairiest babies!

Ellie slapped her marked hand over her mouth as peals of laughter escaped her lips at the thought. Even Solas was chuckling a bit at her side.

“Oh, shit, sorry Tumbles. And Chuckles, there you are, I was wondering where you’d wandered off to, you uh, okay? You kind of just walked away mid-sentence.”

“I was merely wondering after Ellie, she needs to eat too, does she not?”

“Well yeah, I figured we’d call her when it was done, I wasn’t gonna let her go hungry.”

“Can I help?” Ellie asked, looking at their work on the counter.

“See? You went and got her too early Chuckles, now she wants to be put to work.”

“Actually, he got me just in time, I was sort of lost—this place is huge. So, can I help?” Ellie asked again.

“There’s peas that need shelling if you’d like,” Blackwall said as he resumed chopping…oh onions, yuck—they didn’t taste bad or anything, but chopping them always made her teary, which meant she’d wipe her eyes and get onion juice in them and it was all one big vicious cycle. Shelling peas though, that was easy enough!

Ellie went and washed her hands in the kitchen basin and then stood next to Varric on his stool, as she pulled the pile of green toward herself and began shelling the little peas from their pods into a bowl. Solas came alongside her and helped with the peas—they were done in no time! Piling everything into a pot that’d been simmering on the stove full of broth and meat, they went to sit at the kitchen table, though Blackwall moved a chair to sit next to the stove so he could occasionally stir.

Footsteps could be heard in the hall just before Cassandra entered the kitchen. “Ahh, Eleanor, there you are.”

“Enjoy a nice soak there, Seeker?” Varric asked drily, noting how Cassandra’s hair clung curly and wet against her head.

“I did in fact, though you obviously haven’t. I do hope the bath isn’t too deep for you.”

Ellie thought Varric looked like he might say something rude but thought better of it because he didn’t wish to say it in front of Ellie. He gave Cassandra a mockish looking smile and “I held off on bathing too,” Ellie said, “for now anyway, Marehis will probably be back soon.”

“Ahh, I apologize Eleanor,” Cassandra said, “I did not think—would you care for a bath? I forgot Marehis usually helps you. I could be of assistance.”

Ellie blushed at that, “Oh golly, I can bathe myself just fine. I was only waiting till she got back in case we have to go out again, you know?”

“Ahh, you expect the letter will bear something relevant?”

“Just a feeling, but yeah,” Ellie shrugged.

Blackwall began ladling soup into bowls sitting on a tray he carried back over to the table and set down before dragging his chair back over, so he could sit with everyone.

They sat in relative silence as they ate, though Solas seemed contemplative, stopping the steady stream of spoonfuls and then seemingly remembering what he’d been doing and setting about eating once more.

“Does something trouble you, Solas?” Blackwall asked quietly.

“Trouble, no. Though I suppose there has been a notable development of sorts. I’ll demonstrate if Ellie would be willing to assist.”

Ellie finished drinking the last of the broth from her soup, and looked at Solas as she lowered her bowl. “Of course, Solas, what’s up?”

“If you’re finished Ellie I would appreciate if you’d…well do not take this the wrong way, but I’d ask that you not tell us where you’re going, and just wander around the house for a moment.”

“…just, wander around?”

“I’d also ask that you trust me,” Solas said.

Looking to each of her companions for a moment, all whom seemed just as confused as she was, Ellie shrugged and said slowly, “Alright,” before rising from her seat and leaving the kitchen.

That was…pretty weird, but she supposed maybe he needed to talk to the others about something? There wasn’t any harm in looking around the home some more anyway. She hadn’t been around on this side yet except the stretch between the library and kitchen.

It was once she’d found a very lavish sitting room she realized she’d lost track of just how many turns she’d taken. Was it two lefts and a right? Oh, would she need to reverse that—two rights and then a left…no, that didn’t make sense. She’d turned down a sort of semi-circular hall at one point and gone up a flight of stairs but…

Several minutes passed as she sat down in one of the cushy, over-stuffed chairs to think of how she might get someplace familiar—either the entrance, or her room, or the kitchens again.

Just when she was thinking she was lost, the door before her swung open, and in walked Solas, followed by Varric, Cassandra, and Blackwall. Oh! And Marehis!
“You’re back!” Ellie said, delighted as she jumped to her feet and went to hug her friend.

Marehis smiled as she hugged Ellie back, “Yes, just in time for the search party it seems. You got lost, da’len?”

“She was not lost, not really,” Solas interrupted. “I knew where she was.”

That had everyone looking at him…well, rather much like he’d just grown a second head.

“…um, you mean you guessed where I’d be?” Ellie asked uncertainly.

“No,” he looked around the room they were in and gestured towards the couches and chairs sitting around a low table, “Shall we sit?”

“Okay Chuckles, what’s the deal? You’ve been acting weirder than usual since we got here,” Varric said as everyone took their seats—Varric in the chair Ellie had been occupying, and Blackwall in a chair next to him. Ellie took a seat on the couch, which Cassandra and Marehis took to sitting at her sides. Solas looked as though he were going to pace for a bit, but he stilled and instead sat with his legs crossed the way he did when they meditated, on the low table before them.

“I have not had many companions in my life, friends so to speak, outside of the Fade,” Solas started out. “Even as I joined the inquisition I did not think to meet any I would truly consider my friends, but I have found that with each of you. And in an even deeper sense it seems, I’ve found a dear friend in Ellie. No offense to any of you, but I do…find I cherish her friendship more than most, it is very precious to me. Similar only to how I cherish the friendships I’ve formed with beings in the Fade.”

Ellie found she’d gone bright, bright red. “Oh, gosh Solas. That’s really sweet of you to say—I cherish our friendship too. All of you, you’re some of the most important people I’ve ever had in my life.” Maker, it felt silly to say as much though.

Oh, that was nice, everyone seemed to be blushing on some level or another now, she wasn’t alone in her mild embarrassment.

Solas nodded. “Thank you, Ellie. My point is this, however—my friends in the Fade, I can sense them. I can focus on them and know if they are well, they can call to me if they are in trouble, or in need of my companionship. I can also fathom out where they are in the Fade or the world, should I need to find them,” he paused, carefully considering his words before saying, “earlier, Ellie, you got lost in the library and you were very frightened. You actually hoped you might run into me there—your fear and desire to be found, my magic sensed those things while I was in the kitchen with the others. I hadn’t even realized what I was doing until I was half way to the library, and even then, I didn’t know what had happened until I saw you.”

Ellie’s mind drew a blank and then, “Oh! You mean you found me, using your magic? Like you do with your spirit friends?”

Solas nodded.

“Uhh…is that unusual?”

“I would not know. I’ve never developed such an ability with anyone born outside of the Fade.”

“It is certainly unorthodox, but possibly beneficial,” Cassandra spoke then.
“We would be better off being able to find Ellie if we ever got separated,” Blackwall said.

“And you can discern her wellbeing as well?” Marehis asked, “You could tell if she were sick or injured or in danger?”

Solas closed his eyes. “A spirit of Faith I have known for several years is currently working in Kirkwall, guiding the foreman of a construction crew, in charge of rebuilding the city. He—the spirit—is safe, and happy, pleased with the work he’s done, grateful that the foreman is so responsive to his presence. A spirit of Patience is in Tevinter, not summoned for blood magic, but there to watch over a group of slaves—Elves—one of which the spirit has grown attached to. That slave is hungry, being starved as punishment. It makes my friend sad, but she hopes she can shield her friend from further punishment by tempering his master’s impatience with the work they require, while also lending the slaves the patience to bide their time so they can choose wisely the best opportunity to break free.”

He opened his eyes then. “Ellie is safe, warm, and still full from our meal together. She is intrigued by my friend in Kirkwall, pleased and grateful that a spirit is helping to heal that broken place. She is sad that there is slavery, that there is a hungry slave, and a sorrowful spirit striving, and thus far failing to help him as she’d like. Angry, that someone could be so cruel to another living being. Hopeful, that the Inquisition may do things that will one day help people like that slave.”

Ellie stared wide-eyed at the Elf. That was…accurate and kind of uh, well—

“That was just stupid spooky, Chuckles,” Varric spoke up, “That might be useful in a fight, or if we lose Ellie somewhere, but shit, don’t play creeper on her brain all the time okay?”

“I apologize for the intrusion, I meant only to make a point. I will only intentionally seek your mind if you are lost or in danger. Does that suit you, Ellie?”

Ellie nodded. “Y-yeah, that sounds alright,” beyond strange, but alright, “Thank you, Solas.”

And then he was shooed away from his seat on the table by Marehis as she rose to her feet and Solas took her former seat beside Ellie on the couch as the Elf woman laid out her findings from the little scavenger hunt their anonymous friend had set up for them across the table.

Three red scarves, each with a note pinned to them, and a key.

“This is a key, a report from a stable’s records that discloses a location, and a time. There is a meeting this evening of some sort of anti-Inquisition group. Our Friend asks that we attend and break up their little party.”

“Eleanor, you said you thought this ‘Friend’ had merit, do you still believe it is so?” Cassandra asked.

Ellie bit her lip and listened to her magic for a moment. It thrummed in a way that said…there was something here. Someone important was on the other end of these messages, and they would be found if Ellie pursued their offered quest.

“Should we bring the punch?” Ellie asked, “For their party I mean.”

Varric snorted. “Tumbles, that was a horrible pun. Chuckles, never lose her.”
Their late-night rendezvous in Val Royeaux was more than a little unorthodox. Cassandra was not certain what she should expect—some form of information broker, or a spymaster like Leliana.

What they got was a prankster with some connection to a system of ‘Friends’ peasants that sought opportunity to trick and cause menial strife for nobility and gentry.

They were able to take the first set of guards by surprise, and once deeper into the compound there was indeed a Marquis with a vendetta against the Inquisition, and the Herald of Andraste. After lobbing several fire balls that narrowly missed Eleanor’s head, he rambled some nonsense about how much it must have cost them ‘immeasurably’ to discover him and his plot.

And then he was cut off by an arrow in the throat. Marehis was quick to throw a hand over Eleanor’s eyes when she caught on to what the strange new comer meant to do, pulling back on her bow as she demanded the Marquis just say ‘What’.

What indeed. What nonsense.

“Hehehehe squishy one, but you heard me right? Just say what? Rich tits always try for more than they deserve,” the Elf girl with an atrocious bowl-cut said as she sauntered to the now-dead Marquis and wrested the arrow from his throat.

Marehis uncovered Eleanor’s eyes to receive a bit of a reproachful glare from Eleanor for babying her, the Herald looked to their ‘Friend’.

“Good to see you’re…” the Elf girl said, looking Eleanor up and down a moment before blanching a bit, “well shite, you’re just a little one, aren’t you? Regular at least, but you’re a right tot.”

“I’m fifteen,” Eleanor informed her belligerently.

The newcomer slapped her hands on her thighs and guffawed, “Maker, you’re just a baby! I mean,” she calmed herself, “It’s all good innit? The important thing is you glow, right? You’re the Herald-thingy.”

Eleanor held up her Marked hand, the glimmer of her Mark just barely perceivable through the seams of her glove. “Yup, Herald-thingy at your service. Would you mind explaining all this?” she asked.

“I don’t know this idiot from manners. One of my Friends just said you might should check him out. Oh,” the girl seemed to remember something. “I’m Sera, and this is cover,” she said gesturing to a stack of crates nearby, “get ‘round it. Reinforcements should be coming soon—but no worries, my Friends tipped me off to their equipment shed.”

“You’ve stolen their weapons?” Eleanor asked.

This Sera snickered and said, “No, even better—no breeches!”

The thunder of footfalls echoed through the corridors leading to their place in the courtyard, the sound of battle cries and unsheathing of swords.

Eleanor gave Marehis a rather pitiful look. “If you wanted to cover my eyes again, that’d be cool.”

But nevertheless Eleanor was jumping up, teetering on the edge of a box before throwing herself forward to continue climbing so she could take the high ground atop the cover ‘Sera’ had so helpfully pointed out. Cassandra felt the familiar soothing cool of magic coast across her skin as the Herald casted Barrier on her companions.

Men in chest plates and loincloths bravely rushed from the safety of their compound to face their enemies in the courtyard sans breeches. Maker’s breath, all this cloak and dagger, all this set up and they met a child with a drinking license and a penchant for sabotaging their enemies in ludicrous ways.

But, this Sera was a skilled marksman, it seemed. Cassandra watched closely as the younger woman fought, jumping up onto the crates to be just below Eleanor, and even without the Herald’s barrier surrounding her she fought with confidence and…

Well she fought well in defense of herself and the Herald it seemed. Enemies Eleanor herself did not notice or catch in time, were taken out by this Sera in swift fashion. Perhaps she could take some things seriously.

Though the horrendous cackling could be turned down a notch—this Sera took a great deal of pride in her handiwork.

“I think we’re all clear my lady,” Blackwall announced gruffly as he looked about the courtyard with uncertainty. The man looked for all the world like he wished he had something to cover the dead men’s underdressed state, but he opted instead for looking up to Eleanor and offering her a hand down off the crates.

Cassandra, personally, was grateful it was so very dark.

Eleanor hopped down off the crates and the Warden caught her deftly, making sure she was secure on her feet before releasing the hand she’d given him.

“Everyone alright?” Eleanor asked as she looked around at her companions.

“All good here,” Varric said, Solas was at his side and nodded in agreement.

“We’re well Eleanor,” Cassandra said.

Eleanor smiled and then turned to address Sera, “You’re okay, right? I didn’t get a chance to ask if you’d mind me casting Barrier on you before the fight broke out, but I feel badly having left you out. Are you hurt?”

Sera shuddered, “Ugh! Oh Andraste’s tits you’re one of them. I mean I heard something about that but shite. You seem okay though for a Mage, just…yeah don’t go casting your Mage thingy on me, or I’ll pop you, got it?”

Eleanor holstered her staff on her back and put her hands down in front of her waist as if to show surrender. “No casting my mage thingy, got it. Now, would you care to explain all this? You said your Friends told you we should check this out, but I’m still not clear on who your Friends are? Are they just a group of friends into espionage or is it an organization you work for?”

Sera scoffed. “It’s no fancy shmancy organization but…yeah like that. I don’t know a lot of ‘em, there’s a fence in Montefort and a woman in Kirkwall, there were three in Starkhaven, brothers or somethin’. Anyway, the Friends of Red Jenny lets little people stick it to nobles they hate. I used them to help you…plus arrows.”

“I’m glad you wanted to help but uh…why?” Eleanor asked.

“I want to join, help your Inquisition. There’s a hole in the friggin’ sky and all anyone seems to be doing is pretending it isn’t there, point fingers at each other over shite that doesn’t matter right now. You lot seem to be the only ones doing anything about it, and I want things back to normal. I got things to do. So here, in your face, I’m Sera. I can use my friends to help punch back at noble shite getting in the Inquisition’s way, and my arrows to…well, shoot anything big bad getting in your way.”

Cassandra was fully prepared to advise Eleanor not to associate with this…hooligan. What absolute nonsense. This was, perhaps not a total waste of time—they’d taken out an enemy of the Inquisition they may not have discovered until he was a greater threat. But still, not wholly worthy of their time—the girl may have her talents but if she wanted to be part of the Inquisition she could join on at the recruitment level like everyone else with conviction to assist their cause and an ability to fight, be a soldier if she wanted to help so very much. She couldn’t just throw together some shady connections and expect a position working directly with the Herald of Andraste herself.

But Eleanor didn’t even look to her for advice before she held out her hand and said, “Alright Sera. You’re in.”

In? Just like that? Surely Eleanor didn’t think…ugh. She was a child, and sometimes Cassandra forgot that with that came severe immaturity, the idea that fifteen was all grown up and she didn’t need anyone’s advice. But Eleanor had never exhibited such behavior before—was it a symptom of her medication? Or a result—Eleanor regaining the full scope of her personality? Cassandra had believed Eleanor’s reliance on her advisors a sign of maturity, but perhaps it was a lack of blind faith in her own foolish ideas. She could go around baselessly offering alliances to outsiders! She should have stopped to think before she acted, consulted someone who may just know better.

Cassandra would be having words with her once they returned to the Marquis’ home. She would not rebuke the Herald in front of a stranger, out in the open, private as this compound seemed. But the girl needed to know she was by no means to take such charge.

“Really? Great!” Sera enthused as she shook Eleanor’s hand briskly. “Get in good before you’re too big to like—that’ll keep your breeches where they should be. Speaking of,” the girl released Eleanor’s hand and went behind a pillar, hefting up a large sack, and carrying it over to lay at Eleanor’s feet. “These are their breeches. You’ve got merchants and stuff that buy this pish yeah? Got to be worth something.”

“Uhh…”

“Haven, right? I’ll head there now—”

“Wait, all by yourself? We have a place we’re staying—”

“Ugh! Some Marquis something or other’s hoity-toity blah blah place? No thanks. I’ve got favors to handle along the way anyway, best rack some up. I’ll just meet you lot back in Haven.”

“We’ll send word then, ask for Leliana when you arrive alright? Be careful,” Eleanor cautioned.
Sera giggled. “You’re a sweet little one, aren’t you? I’ll see you there.”

“I’m not little!” Eleanor thought to call after her.

Oh she was, and she would be reminded. Eleanor would learn that if she wanted to be treated as an adult in the Inquisition, she had to behave like one.

Everyone was seemed tired when they got back to the Marquis’ home, and Ellie followed close behind Marehis as they made their way to her bedroom, and the moment she laid eyes on the sunken tub in the floor she started stripping, leaving a path of her armor in her wake as she went to examine just how to work the thing.

Marehis snorted at her very lady like behavior, closing the door behind them to make sure her lady had some measure of privacy—Elgar’nan, the girl forgot all semblance of modesty when her sights were set on bathing.

“Put away your armor and I’ll run you a bath, Ellie,” Marehis said.

Ellie had the grace to blush at that. “Whoops! Sorry, I didn’t mean to leave my things everywhere,” she said rising from where she’d been crouched, looking at the different knobs that operated the bathtub. She set about tidying up the mess she’d made while Marehis filled the tub with warm, soapy water.

“Oh! There’s bubbles,” Ellie commented when Marehis was done.

“You have heard of bubble-baths yes? I thought you might enjoy one.”

“Neat. Thanks, Marehis!” Eleanor gave her a brilliant smile before stepping carefully into the tub and sinking beneath the bubbles.

They chatted idly for a while as Ellie soaked and Marehis reclined at the edge of the bath, she thought perhaps she should keep an eye out for some sort of tub that Ellie could use in Haven. Maybe not on a daily basis, but every now and again, the girl might enjoy the opportunity to relax, she could certainly use it.

“Do you think Cassandra is upset with me?” Ellie asked suddenly.

Marehis thought for a moment, carefully running the evenings events through her mind—whatever had Ellie done that would warrant the Seeker’s displeasure? Had Cassandra been acting coldly toward her?

But no, there wasn’t anything in particular that could set the Seeker against Ellie.

Ahh. Wait. “You mean is she displeased you signed on that Sera girl? I was surprised you didn’t seek her advice on the matter.”

Ellie looked uncomfortable then. “She was going to say no—I figured not asking would be better than asking and outright defying her in front of everyone.”

Truly? “You would have gone against her judgement?”
Ellie nodded.

That was…surprising. Ellie held nothing but respect for Seeker Pentaghast and her opinion, why in the world would she differ so strongly over some random girl? It was true Sera had proven somewhat useful, but she wasn’t invaluable, not on her face anyway.

Oh but maybe her face had something to do with it, the rest of her as well. Marehis hadn’t found the Elf girl to be particularly striking in appearance—if anything she’d looked gangly and odd, with the most awful haircut. But did Ellie find her appealing in some way? Had she gone against Cassandra because she…had some sort of crush on the Rogue Elf? Granted there was some romance to the entire affair, a mysterious stranger leaving a scavenger hunt that leads you to meet them in the midst of battle, fighting side by side before they formally introduce themselves as something like a spy—a pedestrian sort of spy, but it may still hold some appeal to a person as young as Ellie all the same.

It wasn’t something she would expect from Ellie. She hadn’t expressed interest in anyone they’d encountered before—aside from her exuberant proposals of marriage to Master Harrit as thanks for his blacksmithing abilities—but this Sera seemed younger than many they’d met in the Inquisition. And Marehis had taken note, that first day with Ellie in her care, when the girl had admitted to gender not being a factor in who she found interest in, sexually—she thought to keep tabs on her ward’s interests in case they posed a threat. Too, she didn’t want her lady to be wholly without romantic attachment if she were ready for such a thing, Marehis was keeping an eye out for any who might be suitable.

She certainly did not think this Sera suitable. And she wasn’t expecting such an impasse to occur—didn’t think Ellie would find attraction into someone so unsuitable and create…well a problem. If anyone naysaid the liaison, if Ellie was so immature as to be seduced by anything this Sera had to dish out, she may well be further enticed by her friends’ and advisors’ disapproval.

Suddenly there was a horrific aspect, being the caretaker of a fifteen year old. Rebellion. Her very own Mage Rebellion, in Ellie’s case. Ha.

“Well,” Marehis spoke carefully, “I suppose you’ll have to talk it out with Cassandra. She won’t hold it against you for long, da’len, it’s one recruit,” she said, attempting to sound non-committal to an opinion on the girl for now.

Ellie sighed and smiled up at Marehis, “I think I’m ready to get out now.”

“Prune-y enough, Ellie?” Marehis asked teasingly as she reached for a towel, letting it unfold so Ellie could step up out of the tub and be wrapped in it.

“Oh gosh, I’m all wrinkly!” Ellie exclaimed in surprise as she examined her hands. Silly girl.

Sweet girl. Too sweet, she wasn’t allowed to date until she was forty! Oh that was irrational she knew, but still! No sketchy rogues! Nothing against rogues, Marehis was one herself, just no sketchy ones!

Marehis drained the tub and stepped into her own room—adjacent to Ellie’s—and sought out the washbasin to clean herself off, rid herself of the dust from the road and wet her hair, it was so short it wasn’t difficult to keep clean. By the time Marehis was satisfied with her own state of cleanliness and stripped of her armor and changed into a fresh tunic and breeches. She wasn’t sure how to broach the subject of Ellie’s interests, and she thought she’d magically (ha!) come up with some sort of solution as she made herself ready for bed, but…no such luck.

She heard a knock at Ellie’s door and walked back into her lady’s quarters to find Ellie with her hair in a towel and tying her robe closed. “Come in!” she called over her shoulder.

“Seeker, the kid’s trying to get some sleep, see?” Varric said as he and Cassandra appeared in the now-open doorway.

“Eleanor asked to be a part of our late-night discussions, she’s more than welcome to join us if she thinks she’s so capable,” Cassandra said, her voice hard.

Ahh, perhaps the Lady Seeker was upset with Eleanor.

“Come on in, is everyone with you?” Ellie asked.

Cassandra stepped into the room, followed by Varric, Solas, and Blackwall.

Ellie climbed into her bed, sitting with her back against the pillows as she for everyone to come around and take a seat, Marehis went and got into bed next to the girl, pulling the towel from her hair so it could finish drying in the open air. Varric hopped into bed on Ellie’s other side, and Solas sat in front of Marehis. Blackwall came near but didn’t sit, he just stood beside Varric, and Cassandra stood at the end of the bed with her arms crossed over her chest.

“We’re sorry to disturb you so late, but the Lady Seeker insisted,” Blackwall started off uneasily.

Ellie nodded. “You’re mad about Sera. Would you feel better if I explained?”

Cassandra sighed as if trying to temper herself with some level of patience before outright yelling at the girl. “I do not wish to quarrel Eleanor, but I do not appreciate you flippantly agreeing to let that girl join without so much as taking a moment to consider the matter.”

“I didn’t need to,” Ellie said, and then held up her hand in defense before the woman, whose mouth had flown open to seemingly yell at the girl, could get started. “Explanation time, before you blow a gasket huh?”

“I do not blow—ugh, explain yourself then.”

“First off, I didn’t have time to consider Sera’s offer. What do you think she’d do if I said no, or asked to think it over? She’d be off in the wind, her offer rescinded. She’s likely always on the move, and you either take her or leave her, you can tell that much just from meeting the girl. And…that’s sort of how I was living before the Inquisition. I didn’t have time for people to think over whether they wanted me for a job, or if I could stay somewhere for the night—it’s not like I had a home to go sit around and wait on their answer, I had to move on to the next thing, or it was over for me.”

“You felt sorry for her—” Cassandra accused.

“No. I understand the position she’s in and how that relates to my response time. I had to give her a yes or a no, then and there, and for this instance, it had to be a yes,” Ellie sighed.

“It had to be?”

The Seeker looked chagrined when Ellie flinched at her scathing tones.
“Eleanor,” Cassandra said, terse but obviously trying. “I…suppose you should explain then. I cannot let you simply accept requests to join the inner circle of the Inquisition on a whim. This woman wants to assist you personally dealing with Rifts—that cannot be allowed without appropriate understanding of who she is and if she poses a threat to you. What, exactly is your reasoning for tonight?”

Ellie was silent for a moment, and Marehis thought perhaps the girl was considering her answer, but when she peered around to look at her ward, the half of her face visible to her was…well her jaw looked set, and she wasn’t making eye contact with the Seeker.

“Da’len?” Marehis asked, gently.

“I want to explain I just…it’s just not safe.”

The Seeker looked concerned then, they all did. Ellie looked truly frightened, so much so Marehis was contemplating rising to dash into her bedroom and get the girl a bit of calming draught, the girl clenched her fists tightly to keep her hands from shaking, but that did not stop the trembling in her frame.

Cassandra sat on the bed, scooting so she sat on her knees before Ellie, and cautiously, as if she expected the girl to shrink away from her, reached out with a gloved hand to take hold of Ellie’s Marked one, squeezing it gently. “Eleanor? I do sincerely apologize for getting so angry with you. People get angry at each other, and that isn’t necessarily a bad thing, it’s just means there is something needing addressed in order to work through it. I…I can never apologize enough for the way I treated you when we first met. But you needn’t fear that I would…hurt you. I know once that trust is broken it is hard to regain, but I promise Eleanor, I vow, no matter the transgression, I will never strike you out of anger ever again.”

Ellie looked up at her then. “You’ve never hit me or anything it’s not that—”

“I informed you that hundreds, including someone you held dear, had been murdered in an attack that I blamed you for, and in my outrage, I laid hands on you in anger and I broke your wrist.”

Marehis’s mind went blank for a moment. What…when was she talking about? She wasn’t sure if she should throw Ellie over her shoulder and get her as far away from the Seeker as possible, or if she should fight the Nevarran woman outright—she’d hurt Ellie? When? Marehis had trusted this woman to protect her ward! Why hadn’t Ellie—

“Cassandra!” Ellie cried out sounding exasperated with the older woman, “You didn’t break my wrist, I fell off a friggin fence like a thousand feet for goodness sake! And even if you had, Maker, do you think I’d hold something like that against you? You talk like you had all the facts at the time—I have Conclave-specific amnesia and you knew just a little bit more than I did. For all you knew I was some demon possessed psychopath masquerading in a teeny-bopper meatsuit hell-bent on destroying the world. And when I was finally awake to give you answers, I didn’t have any for you! You’re a Seeker, I’m sure you’ve heard loads of crap excuses like ‘I don’t remember’ or ‘I don’t know’ from tons of people who did do horrible things were just trying to get away with it. I’m lucky you didn’t beat me to death!”

Ahh, Marehis relaxed marginally, at Ellie’s explanation. She remembered then, her wrist had been injured when she was brought into Marehis’s care after the Breach. Marehis had known Ellie had been a suspect for the Conclave, had seen her dragged into Haven’s Chantry by Inquisition soldiers who’d found her, claiming she’d fallen from a Rift. She herself had not been sure what to believe—she’d seen a young girl, but the Mark had seemed menacing then, like proof positive she was responsible for the Breach in the sky. She couldn’t imagine the choices she would have made, had she been in Cassandra’s shoes.

“Eleanor if you believed, as I do that I hurt you in such a way—”

“Hey!” Ellie shouted, prompting everyone to stare because...well Ellie did not shout, save for the few times Marehis had heard her do so during fights. The girl took both of Cassandra’s hands in her own and squeezed them tight. “Gosh, Cassandra, yeah for like all of five minutes, these hands intended to hurt me, did hurt me. But they also freed me from captivity, guarded me, and laid on me in prayer for my soul before I faced certain death—that was just day one. And since then? They’ve done nothing but teach me to defend myself and protected me in battle. Cassandra I’m nothing but grateful to you for all you’ve done to help me.”

“I...Eleanor you say that, but you fear explaining your thought process behind doing something I believe to be reckless.”

“Not because of you! It’s not safe to tell anyone. Gosh, you getting mad or hurting me or whatever didn’t even cross my mind. I mean don’t get me wrong I don’t necessarily enjoy arguing with you but I’m not scared to or anything. You wanna yell? We can yell! I’m game. I might cry after so much of it, but that’s just reflex, pretty sure its just cuz I’m so short.”

“I suppose I misunderstood then. We needn’t yell, Eleanor.”

Ellie looked over her shoulder to Marehis, and then turned to look into the face of everyone else in the room in turn before her gaze settled on Cassandra again. “I can explain, and I will, but I would ask that what I’m about to tell you doesn’t leave this room.”

“Whatever it is, da’len, we will keep your counsel,” Marehis promised, her hands going to Ellie’s shoulders and giving them a reassuring squeeze.

Ellie nodded. “Um...so. You know how sometimes I find things, like those little treasures in the Hinterlands, and the things Blackwall’s been looking for from the Grey Wardens?”

Marehis wasn’t certain where she was going with this, though it did call to mind the instance in Adan’s old teacher’s cabin. Ellie had insisted they look inside, and she discovered an improved recipe for lyrium the man had invented before his passing. That had been...rather fortuitous and strangely coincidental.

“Yes?” Cassandra prompted.

“My magic uh...well it communicates with me, and part of what it does is tell me when something is important—whether it’s important I go a certain direction to find something, or that I talk to someone because somehow my magic knows they need my help, or that they have information I need,” she took a deep breath. “When we got the letter from Leliana that there was a lone warden in the Hinterlands my magic sort of pinged, told me that we were about to meet someone important,” she looked to Blackwall then, “the moment we met my magic was certain, you’re supposed to be a part of our team, you’re important to our success as the Inquisition.”

Blackwall visibly paled and actually finally did sit down on the edge of Ellie’s bed then, the motion more like he’d needed to sit than simply accepting the seat she’d offered.

“My lady, that is...surely you exaggerate.”

Ellie shook her head and leaned forward to put her hands over the hand of Blackwalls closest to her, and gave it a gentle squeeze, “I don’t. Why would you question it? You offered your help yourself, my magic knew you would even before you did. You’ve done nothing but help us, and you’ve been amazing! Don’t sell yourself short.”

“Your ‘pinging’ of magic, you felt it upon meeting this Sera?” Cassandra asked.

Ellie shook her head ‘no’. “I actually felt it when her messenger arrow hit the ground in front of us. I knew the message would lead us to someone important. I don’t know how or why, but Sera’s going to help us, really truly help us. So far, my magic hasn’t steered me wrong.”

Oh. Oh thank everything. She hadn’t acted out of rash, hormonal, love-struck teen angst.
That was…well Marehis wasn’t certain about magic all the time, but Ellie’s had never posed a problem, and the girl had used it as a tool for survival all her life. That it would develop in such a way, to keep her appraised of things that could help and harm her she may not be able to perceive of herself, wasn’t unfathomable.

“Why would disclosing this be dangerous, da’len?” Solas asked.

Ellie looked at the man as if he’d just asked her if she thought setting oneself on fire was a good idea.

“The system we live in paints all mages with the same brush,” she said, “If I went around telling people—even those I trusted—my magic helps me find valuable things, that could get out to the wrong sort of people. I mean how quickly do you think I’d be snatched up for treasure hunting? Or worse, because people think all mages are alike, I have the ability, so all mages must.
Slavers would capture mages just for the purpose of using an ability they might not even have!”

Solas looked taken aback by the prospect. Marehis knew he had not come from a back ground of being acquainted with many others, especially other mages. He hadn’t considered it might be dangerous for others to know about the personal natures of magic, that it could create danger for his fellow mages.

Cassandra was quiet for a moment. Then she squeezed Ellie’s hand, looking into her face as she said, “Thank you, Eleanor. For trusting us. None shall hear of it unless you bid it.”

“Even the Advisors?” Ellie asked tentatively. “It’s not that I don’t trust them, it’s just…the more people that know, the more risk there is and…I know Cullun wouldn’t—”

“No, that isn’t necessary. Unless you just feel convicted to do otherwise, you are free to keep it to yourself. Should they question a decision you make based on your magic, I will simply back you up.”

Ellie smiled then, “Even if that means defending my decision to let Sera join?” she asked, almost teasingly.

The Seeker sighed as if put-upon. “Ugh. Yes. I will defend that wretched Elf. Though be warned, if she does not absolutely prove great value to our cause, I will be very cross.”

Ellie moved forward to hug Cassandra’s shoulders. “If she doesn’t work out, I promise, you can kick her out yourself!”

“Ahh Eleanor, I appreciate that you trust me, but do not tempt me so, I may just send her packing upon our return to Haven.”

Ellie sat back and shook her head, “No you won’t,” she said simply.
“I won’t?”

“Nope! Because you trust me too.”

Cassandra sighed. “And so I do.” And then, “I understand your magic gave you insight but I still would have appreciated you seeking my opinion on the matter.”

“Oh a scale from one to ‘dragon in high dudgeon’ how outraged would you have been if I asked you about it and you said no, and then, in front of an outsider, and our friends, I flat out ignored your advice and hired her on anyway?”

“I cannot imagine that would have gone over well,” Cassandra allowed.

It certainly would have not.

“I preferred to deal with it in-house later…or, well now…instead of in front of a total stranger. The goal wasn’t to embarrass you or make it seem like I think I know everything, I just —”

“Saw what needed to be done, and you did it,” Cassandra said softly, like she had a certain fondness for the idea.

And then she started laughing.

Loud, one hand clutching her abdomen as laughter spilled forward unbidden.

“Did she drive you literally mad there, Seeker?” Varric asked, as if honestly worried that was exactly what had happened.

“Oh, forgive me Eleanor, I—” Cassandra stopped to take a deep breath and steady herself, she sat on the bed then, “I was absolutely furious when you behaved so brashly but I should have realized it was because it was so very much like something I would have done. Have done. You would not be here, Herald of Andraste if not for my own inclination for the practice of seeing what I think is best and acting upon it.”

“So…you’re not angry with me anymore?”

“No, Eleanor, I suppose I’m not. I don’t particularly care for our new team mate, but perhaps she’ll surprise me.”

“Eh, I think with Sera what you see is what you get, but an extra Rogue can’t be a bad thing.”

Marehis shook her head and sat back against the pillows, throwing an arm over the Ellie’s shoulders and the girl snuggled back into the embrace.

“You know, I’m surprised, magic or no magic, you offered her a place to stay after she called you a baby, she’d probably think cuddling with your nanny before bedtime real grown up,” Varric teased.

“Marehis is my best friend, and Sera can fight me if she thinks I’m a such a baby. I’m fifteen! Almost sixteen, thank you very much.”

“Is your birthday approaching, Ellie?” Solas asked. Elgar’nan, bless him, the way he asked, he was obviously curious to know how much time he would have to get her a present.
But Ellie’s impending birthday was news to Marehis. Had the girl ever mentioned the date before? She supposed she should have asked.

“Mmm, it’s still the first week of Harvestmere now, right?” she asked. Cassandra nodded, and Ellie continued, “Then yeah, First Day—Wintermarch 1st.”

Cassandra sat up at that, “You were born on the first of the year?” she asked, surprised. It would be a rather fortuitous birthdate—to be born at the beginning of the year often marked a child as gifted in some way, at least that was what was boasted in noble circles. In Marehis’s experience, no one she’d met before who’d had such a birthday was all that spectacular, but perhaps Ellie was a true example of the Maker using the start of the year to bring forth someone of importance, who would carry them into a better future.

But Ellie was shaking her head. “I dunno about that, it’s just when I up my age.”

“…up your age?” Cassandra asked as if she wasn’t sure she’d heard her right.

“Yeah. I don’t know when I was born, but I do know when the year changes—it didn’t matter if I lost track of what month is was, if it was First Day, it was hard to miss the new year celebrations going on everywhere. So, I just started counting with that. I know I was five when I was sent off on my own, and it was 9:31 then, in 9:32 I started saying I was six, and it just went on like that.”

Their conversation shifted then to what they’d accomplished during the day, and what they could improve upon. It was a ritual they usually performed without Ellie, but she’d evidently sought to be included. She mostly listened, but occasionally she held some measure of input that helpful—a lot of their nightly talks centered around her security, having her actually there to say ‘yes, doing this was helpful’ or ‘that isn’t necessary’ to different strategies and ideas was beneficial.

Solas reclined on the side of the bed, and even Blackwall was laying on his side, Varric had long-since put his feet up, laying next to Ellie, and Cassandra was lying on her stomach, her chin resting in the palm of her hands. Their talk began driving off into chatting, that was beginning to die down.

Ellie seemed practically asleep, her head resting against Marehis’s shoulder, when she suddenly mumbled out, “I didn’t even need to go to the tavern.”

“For what, da’len?” Solas asked.

A mischievous smile pulled at Ellie’s lips and she said,

“To fill my bed.”

The following day at breakfast, the halls of the Marquis’s home echoed with a low gong. Ellie watched for Marehis as the Elf woman left the table to answer the door, Solas volunteering to go with her in case there was any trouble.

Maker, they were so cute together!
They returned shortly, Marehis holding a fancy looking letter.

Oh. Her magic perked up at that.

“What’s up?” Varric asked.

“It’s an invitation from the Imperial Enchanter herself,” Marehis said, rather breathlessly as if she could scarcely believe it, “Vivian de Fer, First Enchanter of Montsimmard is holding a salon at the Chateau of Duke Bastien de Ghislan. She wants Ellie to attend. Or, well, ‘Herald of Andraste Eleanor’.”

“Truly?” Cassandra asked, rising from her seat to read over the letter herself. “It’s embossed with her official seal.”

“The messenger mage who delivered the letter seemed legitimate as well,” Solas said.

Ellie’s mind drew an absolute blank. “So…wait…the Imperial Enchanter wants me. To come to her fancy party? Why?”

“Evidently she’s heard of you and wants to meet you as a representative of the Inquisition.”

“Josie’s going to have kittens! I can’t just…go to something like this! I just learned how to chew with my mouth closed! Like! Yesterday, I’m pretty sure! 24 hours of neat eating under my belt doesn’t make me ‘salon ready’!”

Marehis giggled! Was everyone in her life prone to traitorous tendencies? First Cassandra and her being so very okay with Ellie traipsing off to Val Royeaux in the first place, and now Marehis and her weird ideas that Ellie should set even one foot in the direction of Duke Bastien’s existence, let alone a party thrown in his home hosted by the First Enchanter.

Maker. Whatever could a woman like that want with a girl like Ellie? Oh, her magic could take a flying leap, there was no friggin way! It pinged! Traitors, all of them!

“Eleanor you’ve been doing well enough at meals, your lunch with the Marquis got us the use of his ‘mid-spring abode’ we’re in now,” Cassandra said, “This is hardly a sit-down dinner, it’s a party.”

“There will be finger foods—snacks basically. We’ll eat before we go, you snack, sip some champagne…or well, we’d best stick with water,” Marehis said.

“Water! Definitely water!” Ellie agreed.

“I’m sure the Grand Enchanter will have some pretty extravagant wine, rare vintage the whole thing,” Varric said as if the thought were enticing.

“You’ll have to drink enough for the both of us then,” Ellie said. She’d tried a glass of wine at lunch just her and Lady Josephine, she’d forgotten, and she hadn’t wanted to be rude. So, she drank less than half a glass of wine the day before they left Haven and it’d interacted awful with her potion—the one for depression, Adan was sure. Marehis said she didn’t act strangely—a little quiet sometimes, maybe a bit gigglier than usual—but Ellie had absolutely zero memory of the rest of that day until about mid-morning when they’d been just about to head out. Literally, to her mind, one moment she was chatting with Josephine and the next she was falling because she’d apparently been climbing into Russel’s saddle when she snapped out of it and panicked.

She’d blacked out, Adan said when Marehis whisked her away momentarily to make sure Ellie was alright to travel. Given she already had some level of amnesia surrounding the Conclave, she was to absolutely not even think of drinking, which was fine by her.

“Vhenan,” Solas said absent mindedly, “I don’t believe you read the letter in its entirety.”

Marehis turned bright red and seemed to choke for a moment, and Solas’s eyes went wide as he reeled back, taking a few steps away from the Elf woman, half looking like he might turn heel and run away.

“You just call Shadow a bad name?” Varric asked, as if ready to come to Marehis’s defense if he had. That was sweet.

“No worse than your nicknaming her ‘shadow’, I quite assure you,” Solas said, his voice was pitchy though, nervous.

“Vhenan?” Ellie asked. “…huh,” she thought over what Dalish she knew.

“It means ‘My heart’. I assume Solas meant it in the way a Human might say ‘bless my soul’, or ‘oh goodness’. A statement of surprise, yes?” Marehis asked.

“It certainly seems to be,” Blackwall said as if he were all too pleased about something.

“It would seem the Grand Enchanter is only interested in meeting with Ellie. She requested her presence alone at the party,” Solas said.

Marehis looked further down the letter and said, “Ahh. This is a party for the elite of Orlais, I should have figured something of the sort would be required.”

“What do you mean?” Ellie asked.

“Well, da’len…um, I know you’re conscious of the prejudice many hold against Elves,” Marehis seemed to struggle with her explanation for a moment before she came and sat down in the chair next to Ellie and took Ellie’s hands in her own. “Sometimes you’re going to be called to events like this, we’ve been hoping for such a thing—that you would attract the notice of important potential allies, and they would seek audience with you. This is a case where you’ll have to go to them, and…well, the Grand Enchanter is so closely tied to the Empress, da’len. Everyone in attendance will be high ranking nobility. They will not mingle with undesirables.”

Undesirables?

Oh Maker. Oh, the absolute nerve! Pinged or not, this Madam de Fer, she could…she could — “Madam de Fer can stuff her invite then! Undesirable?! You can’t be serious—” Ellie railed once she caught on.

“It is not a pleasant thing, Eleanor, but racism is alive and well, especially in the upper class of Orlais. I worried we would run into something like this,” Cassandra said, her hand on Ellie’s shoulder, meant to sooth, and Ellie fought the urge to find it patronizing and shake it off. She wouldn’t be so unkind to the Seeker, even if she meant it in a bad way, Cassandra had difficulty expressing herself affectionately, Ellie wouldn’t throw her efforts back into her face.
“I take it none of us are invited then?” Cassandra was asking then.

None of them?

“Wait, she’s not just excluding Elves?” Ellie asked. That…that wasn’t much better. In fact, it wasn’t better at all.

“No, da’len. Think on it. While we would be excluded regardless,” Marehis said, gesturing to herself and Solas, “she’s not going to invite a Dwarf into her fancy party, no matter his renown.”

“But I’m so fun at parties,” Varric insisted in tones that implied there was no love lost.

Marehis rolled her eyes and continued, “Or a Grey Warden. Cassandra, perhaps…”

“I am Nevarran nobility, a pariah. Seventy-eighth or so in line for the throne, perhaps if a great portion of the Kings family were to suddenly drop dead I would be credible enough to attend as a guest, or at least an oddity.”

“As a guest,” Ellie said then. “What about as a servant?” she blushed as soon as she made the suggestion. “I mean it might not be a good idea—”

“It’s a sound idea, Eleanor,” Cassandra was quick to stop her. “We cannot send you alone, but neither should we turn down such an opportunity.”

“How do you propose we do such a thing?” Solas asked.

Ellie smiled. “Well, if you can get a letter out, I think we have a Friend who can help us.”

The letter to Sera made it in time for the girl to send back a crudely written, phallus embossed letter of reply with names, times, and instructions before the salon.

Perhaps she would be useful after all, Cassandra thought.

Sera evidently did have a Friend connection to some people on staff for the caterers Vivienne de Fer used for her parties. Marehis, Solas, and Blackwall infiltrated the catering staff using Sera’s intel, and Cassandra went without armor, wearing a nicer tunic and breeches similar to what Marehis would wear—she couldn’t be an outright guest, but if she did not make a spectacle of herself, the woman could pass as Eleanor’s handmaiden, a more socially acceptable one. If Marehis arrived at her side, the Elf woman would likely be made to wait outside while Eleanor went in alone. If she were allowed in, there was no telling what Eleanor might say to defend the woman she considered her dearest friend if someone mistreated her—she could very well get herself ejected from the party without ever meeting this Madam de Fer. With her real handmaid acting as an invisible servant, and a Human woman acting as her ‘handmaid’, all was right with the world as far as Orlesian nobility was concerned, and there was a smaller chance Eleanor would feel the conviction to start a fight over her friend’s honor.

She’d already been lectured by just about every single one of her companions to hold her tongue in regard to the invitation being so very prejudice. Well, she’d termed Cassandra and Marehis and Sola’s talk with her on the matter a ‘lecture’. Blackwall had given her a pat on the back and insisted she not worry herself on his account, and Varric said he was grateful to have dodged a fireball on this one—fancy parties were not his forte. He preferred fun parties, not stuffy polite affairs.

“If people don’t leave drunk, hungover, or pregnant, what’s the point?”

Blackwall saved Cassandra the trouble and slapped the Dwarf on the back of the head for that one.

As it was, Varric got the luxury of cooling his heels by the carriage they’d taken to the chateau, on guard for any sort of trouble—it wasn’t lost on Eleanor or her companions that her being invited to attend this event alone could well be a trap dressed up in Orlesian elitism. Hence the need to have a great deal of them on the inside with her—if this Madam de Fer had devious plans for Eleanor, she would have aid.

Maker, Orlesians were tiring.

Cassandra felt more than awkward. She felt naked, walking around without her armor, without her weapons. True, she had a few knives tucked into her boots and daggers carefully concealed beneath her clothing, but that was hardly a sword or a shield, or a thick plate of steel between her chest and an oncoming blade. Eleanor had opted to wear her armor, at Marehis’s suggestion, replacing the leather overcoat with shimmery ankle-length duster made of swirling patterns of silver and olive green. She looked appropriately attired for the event while maintaining the security of her armor, no one might even realize she wasn’t just wearing a fine tunic and leather breeches—the style of wearing tight leather bottoms had become popular in the youth of Orlais, for ‘clubbing’ Marehis had informed Cassandra. It made the Seeker wonder if the Elf woman was of a mind to sneak Eleanor out to such a place, a club, full of young people around her age for a bit of fun. Reckless, and truly pointless, but not everything needed to be doom and demons.

Clubbing aside, for now they were safely inside Madam de Fer’s salon, going in full-swing by the time they arrived, fashionably late. The idea had boggled Eleanor’s mind to no end, she couldn’t believe it was a faux-pas (especially before Marehis explained what faux-pas meant) to arrive to an event at the exact time specified, that it wasn’t outright rude to show up even an hour or more, late.

Eleanor had known it was appropriate to bring a gift for the host, she seemed delighted with that idea, and Cassandra handed over a portion of their funds for this trip to Marehis, who slipped down to the marketplace in search of something suitable.

Eleanor, however, had something else in mind entirely. So, they came to Chateau de Bastion armed with a crystal-encrusted bottle of wine, a specialty of a popular Orlesian Vineyard, encasing their rarer vintages in bottles meant to be kept as a decorative status symbol. The silvery, glittering bottle looked like it would fit in well with Orlesian décor, and then there was Eleanor’s offering. A circlet of flowers.

The girl had apparently done some slipping out of her own—which she was quick to apologize for once she was reminded how very unsafe it was for her to leave her companions, especially in such a new place. She’d not gone far, just to the top of the circle of buildings that encased Val Royeaux, technically the roof of the estate. There were small beds of flowers there and an Elf man, a servant had been replanting them for a Nobleman and his Lady wife—they were to be dining there later in the open air and the Lady sought to surprise her husband with flowers similar to those she’d had in her wedding bouquet.

Some of which, the Elf man had given to Eleanor. The girl seemed to find the whole thing rather innocent, a sweet gesture from the man since she’d complimented how lovely the flowers were and he’d seen fit to leave her with some, but Cassandra, and Varric as well (ugh, to be of the same mind with the Dwarf was...increasingly less disparaging. And that was a depressing thought in and of itself) thought that the man had been flirting with Eleanor. The girl didn’t think so.

She’d carefully woven the flowers into a circlet and it hung around the wine bottle, pink petals admittedly complimentary to the silver vessel.

It was one of those moments where Cassandra was struck by what level of innocence the girl had managed to maintain in her life. Hearing Solas term his kinship with Eleanor the other day, as something ‘precious’, something he cherished, it made Cassandra wish she had some way with words. Eleanor was light and trust, and as she grew more like herself she became even more open with her regard to her companions, Cassandra included. But the older woman wondered if the girl knew just how very important she was to the Seeker, outside of her role as the Herald.

Cassandra did not often think of the future. Now, now was what mattered. But still she worried. The choices the Inquisition would make, it would influence Eleanor’s future not just in her role within the organization itself, but her life later. If they came down on the side of mages, Cassandra knew well the dangers of magic held unaccountable, it had cost her her brother.

If they came down on the side of Templars, it may well cost her Eleanor. Would she be Circled? Would Cassandra stand idle-by and let it happen because duty bid it so?

She didn’t think so. And that thought terrified her. Even in her seemingly rebellious, anarchical actions, maintaining the Inquisition Justinia had ordered...it was just that, orders. Cassandra was not banging her chest and waving her flag as the Lord Seeker, and many others seemed to think. She was performing her duty to the Chantry. While a majority in the Chantry did not necessarily agree with her actions, it was their own code that dictated them.

It was baffling how easy it seemed to be calm and certain about the idea that someday, orders may go out to lock Eleanor away in a Circle for the rest of her life, and Cassandra would simply defy them, no hesitation, no struggle with her moral sensibilities or her sense of duty.

Eleanor had been chatting politely with a nobleman and his wife, faring rather well, in Cassandra’s opinion. She’d side-stepped their interest in rumors they’d heard, making all the right notes without committing anything as certain truth. And she hadn’t faltered even for an instant when Marehis, dressed in catering uniform, slipped past them holding a tray with champagne flutes, one of which Eleanor was quick to snatch up—water, though it almost looked like champagne, just clear with bubbles similar to that of its more yellowish counterparts.

But as Eleanor began sipping at her beverage, a haughty voice spoke out from above—descending the flight of stairs down into the foyer, a Marquis they hadn’t the pleasure of meeting yet, began lobbing insults at the Inquisition.

“The Inquisition? What a load of pig shit! Washed up sisters and crazed Seekers? No one can take them seriously. Everyone knows it’s just an excuse for a bunch of political outcasts to grab power.”

“The Inquisition was reinstated to restore peace to Thedas,” Eleanor said calmly, and Cassandra was glad of it. His ‘crazed Seeker’ comment had set a stiffness in the girl’s shoulders, and while her ‘crazed Seeker’ companion was albeit flattered to see the girl so ready to jump to her defense, this was hardly the place or time to pick fights with pricks over petty jabs.

And it was almost amusing, how flippantly this man insulted Cassandra when he had not a clue she was in his presence. The thought of breaking her cover was almost so, so rich in her mouth. How very satisfying would the look on his face be, if he realized Seeker Pentaghast was among them and he’d actually insulted her to her face?

But the notion was also angering—he thought Eleanor alone. An easy target, a little girl he could bully. This man was a coward. Perhaps she would break cover just to punch him square in the face.

And then the man challenged Eleanor, to a duel of all things and Cassandra realized all too late she could well have come openly armed. The man had daggers strapped to his back and reached behind to pull one on the Herald.

And then he froze. Solid, his body coated in a thin layer of filmy frost, his hand just barely touching the hilt of his dagger.

“My dear Marquis, how unkind of you to use such language in my house, to my guests.”

A feminine voice, one that held power and seduction spoke from on high, and it took no guess to realize just who the woman descending the stairway to join them, steps certain and measured, was.

Madam Vivienne de Fer, First Enchanter of Montsimmard.

“You know such rudeness is intolerable,” she crooned as she circled, predatory around the frozen Marquis.

“M-Madam Vivienne, I humbly beg your pardon,” the man chattered.

“You should,” Vivienne said as she came to look the man in the face. “Whatever am I going to do with you, my dear?”

And then she turned to Eleanor. “My lady, you are the wounded party in this unfortunate affair. What would you have me do with this foolish, foolish man?”

“I’m sorry?” Eleanor asked, clearly uncertain what Madam de Fer was insinuating.

“My Lady, if I may,” the words felt unnatural coming from Cassandra’s lips, and she wondered just how Marehis dealt with acting so very cowed when she was much more confident and capable. Never the less, “I believe she is leaving his fate up to you. The Marquis challenged you to a duel. Shall Madam de Fer release him and have him evicted from the party, or would you prefer she kill the man where he stands for his crime?”

Eleanor looked taken aback at the prospect. “Oh! Gosh! I would ask that you spare him, Madam de Fer. I’m sure he’s sorry now. His insults aren’t worth his life. Though…” she was thoughtful a moment and she looked at the offending Marquis. “I would like you to apologize to my erm, handmaid here, for your rudeness.”

Cassandra nearly snorted. This girl. He hadn’t labeled any of his insults for her ‘handmaid’ but Eleanor wanted penance paid for his insults against Cassandra personally, even if he hadn’t a clue who he was apologizing to, or what he was apologizing for.

“I-I-I am t-t-truly sorry if I have caused offense to you or your Lady,” the Marquis rambled out.

Vivienne looked intrigued for a moment and then she turned her magic back on the Marquis. “Very well, by the grace of Andraste, you have your life, my dear. Do be more careful
With a snap of her fingers, the man was free, redfaced with shame, and scurrying out of sight.

The First Enchanter then drew close to Eleanor, hands clasped lightly before her as she so charmingly greeted the Herald. “I’m delighted you could attend this little gathering. I’ve so wanted to meet you. Come,” she gestured for Eleanor to follow her. She and Cassandra trailed after the First Enchanter, up the stairs where she led them to a window overlooking the courtyard.

“Allow me to introduce myself, I am Vivienne, First Enchanter of Montsimmard and Enchantress to the Imperial Court.”

Eleanor gave a small bow as she said, “It’s a pleasure to meet you, Lady Vivienne.”

“Well aren’t you a polite little thing. Tell me, are you truly who they say? The Herald of Andraste?”

“If I may,” Eleanor held up her marked hand, gloved in the thick leather that encased her Mark entirely, she gestured to make sure Vivienne was comfortable with her removing her glove.

Ahh. Such a move could be at first perceived as the start of a challenge. Eleanor had learned more in her lessons with Josephine than just how to chew with her mouth closed.

Vivienne assented with a regal nod, and Eleanor carefully removed her glove to reveal the Mark of Fadelight resting in the palm of her hand.

“How lovely, the color brings out your eyes,” Vivienne commented as if Eleanor had just shown her a darling pair of earrings and not a strange Mark of unknown origin giving her the power to manipulate tears to the Fade itself.

“Thank you,” Eleanor said as she replaced the glove on her hand. “Oh! We have a present for you,” she said, turning to Cassandra then, and holding out her hands. The Seeker deposited the flower-ornamented wine bottle into Eleanor’s care.

Madam de Fer looked like she’d been taken off her stride, as if Eleanor had interrupted the way the older woman had been guiding the conversation, but she examined the girl’s offerings and there was a softness in her eyes then. Marehis would be pleased to know her gift went over so well.

Or maybe it was not the wine so much, but the flowers adorning them.

“Peonies*,” Lady Vivienne spoke softly, carefully reaching out to touch a soft petal with her finger tip. “They are lovely. Whatever made you think of them, my dear?”

Eleanor shrugged, and then blushed—the gesture was not wholly rude, but such plebeian forms of nonverbal communication weren’t done. “When I received your invitation, I wanted to bring you something. My handmaid thought of the wine, but I dunno, I don’t really come from a background of buying presents. Anything I’ve ever given anyone has been something I made or found. I found these…peonies did you say? Oh, that’s a pretty name. Anyway, I found them and made them into a little circlet, I think they’ll still smell pretty for a while.”

Lady Vivienne waved her hand before the flowers, gold light slipping over the petals before disappearing. “They shall remain just as they are for all time,” she said.

A house servant, a young human girl came and took the gift of wine and flowers from Eleanor’s hands, and Lady Vivienne instructed they be placed in Lord Bastien’s room.

“Will Lord Bastien be joining us?” Eleanor asked.

“I’m afraid not, my dear. He is detained, but I will make sure he sees your thoughtful present.”

“Well please tell him thank you for allowing me into his home. And give him my apologies for that mess with the Marquis. I didn’t mean to cause trouble. Oh! I apologize to you for that as well, thank you for helping me.”

“It was my pleasure. Put that insufferable man from your mind, he is not worthy of concern, he has always acted without thinking of the consequences. I expect once his Aunt gets word that he disrespected the Herald of Andraste herself, he’ll be disowned. The woman is powerful, and extremely devout.”

Eleanor looked horrified at the thought. “He won’t really be disowned, will he?” she looked to Cassandra then, “Could you help me later? I’d like to get a letter to his aunt and make sure she knows I’m not offended.”

“Oh my dear girl. The man is grown, and still doesn’t know any better. Being disowned will not be to his detriment. If anything, it will create the opportunity for him to grow. If he redeems himself, he’ll be back in his aunt’s good graces forthwith, though I shall pass her name along to your handmaid if that is your wish.”

“Hmm, well if she’s as devout as you say, I would still like it if we could reach out to her on behalf of the Inquisition.”

“I’ll see you have her information before you leave,” Vivienne promised. “If it pleases you my dear, I did not bring you here to exchange pleasantries.”

“Oh, right! Please, what did you want to talk with me about?”

“With Divine Justinia dead, the Chantry is in shambles. Only the Inquisition might restore sanity and order to our frightened people. As the leader of the last loyal mages in Thedas, I feel it is only right that I lend my assistance to your cause.”

“Loyal Mages?” Eleanor asked, apprehensive.

“Loyal to the people of Thedas. We have not forgotten the Commandment, that Magic exists to serve man.”

“And never to rule over him, Transfigurations 1:2,” Eleanor finished, to express she knew what Madam de Fer was referring to.

“Exactly so, my Lady,” Vivienne said, with some measure of obvious delight.

“What would you do for the Inquisition, Lady Vivienne? Are you lending us political aid, or do you mean to join our ranks yourself?”

“I would serve in both respects. I know every member of Council personally, here in Orlais. I would work within the court to assist the Inquisition’s political affairs, and I hold the remaining resources of our fallen Circles, those would be of use to your cause as well. And I am a mage of no small talent.”
“You would join my party then?” Eleanor asked.

“I would.”

Eleanor looked around as if to take in their very fine, comfortable surroundings. “Are you certain, my lady? I mean no disrespect of course, you were amazing earlier, you’re obviously powerful. But Haven is far, and very different from here. I would hate for you to travel all that way just to realize you would rather serve here. Your political assistance and the uh…Circle resources you mentioned, that is more than enough you’re bringing to the table for the Inquisition. And it can be very dangerous.”

“I should like to meet my enemy. I will not sit quiet and watch the world destroyed,” Lady Vivienne insisted.

Eleanor made a point then, of looking up at Cassandra, making certain the woman held no objection before she offered her marked hand. “Then I would gladly welcome you into the Inquisition.”

Madam de Fer looked at the hand for a moment, a handshake was not usually a trademark of ballroom etiquette, but she clasped Eleanor’s offered hand and said, “Great things are beginning my dear, I can promise you that.”

“Vaaaaaaric!” Ellie’s voice, all sing-songy.

Varric jerked awake, in his seat on top of their carriage. Shit, he was supposed to be keeping watch. At least Bianca was out and at the ready, he used his free hand to rub at his eyes, geesh. What time was it? Wait, did someone say something about wine?

Ellie and Seeker were standing by the carriage now, man Seeker looked weird out of armor. She and Tumbles looked worn out, he holstered Bianca as he yawned, and then pulled out his pocket watch. Damn, it was going on II in the morning now. Had it been that fun?

“Hey Tumbles, how was the party?” he asked.

“It was nice. We brought you wine, as thanks for keeping watch!” Ellie was happy to report, holding a canteen up to him.

He dropped down from the driver’s seat and took the canteen off her hands, twisting off the cap. Huh. Sweet.

“Ahh, Seeker, I didn’t know you cared,” he drawled before taking a swig.

“I didn’t realize one could keep watch with their eyes closed. Eleanor brought you wine,” Cassandra corrected drily, looking to Tumbles as she announced. “I still do not know how you hid that.”

“I’m a woman of mystery. The Herald of Andraste. Men fear my canteen concealing abilities,” Ellie proclaimed. And then under Cassandra’s wry stare she giggled and admitted, “I asked Marehis if she thought she could get this in and fill it up. She just passed it off to me before we left.”
Kind of stolen wine tasted all the better, Varric thought. “So, what now? You ready to head back?”

Ellie shook her head. “The others will be out in a while. Do you guys mind waiting?”

“Not at all,” Cassandra said.

“Nah, I’m set,” Varric agreed with a shrug, opening the carriage door and hopping in, reclining with his back against the carriage wall and his feet on the seat as he enjoyed his wine. Cassandra gave Ellie her hand to help her into the carriage before the Seeker stepped up and slid into the seat next to Tumbles.

It took all of thirty seconds for Ellie to start swinging her legs restlessly.

“Oh!” she said, looking to Varric. “You wouldn’t happen to have writing things?”

He couldn’t always write while they traveled, but inspiration could strike at any time, he couldn’t risk not having a way to jot down notes when he needed to. “Course, what do you need?”

Ellie turned to Cassandra. “Do you think you could write a letter? To Lady Josie, asking her to write to that Marquis Aunt for me? Since we’re waiting. It’s okay if you’re too tired or something tho-“

“I would be glad to,” Seeker said.

“Mind if we use some parchment, Varric?” Ellie asked.

“Knock yourself out, Tumbles,” he said. He always had a journal for note taking on his hip, quill secured between the cover and parchment, and a small box hooked to his belt that held a stoppered inkwell. He handed notebook and inkbox to Ellie who removed one of the loose parchment papers in the back of the journal and the quill, closed the journal and handed it to Cassandra, parchment flat against the hard cover of the journal so she’d have a stable surface to write on.

Cassandra settled in with Ellie leaning against her shoulder, in her unmarked hand she held the inkwell for Seeker while she held her Marked hand overhead, ungloved so the Fadelight gave the Seeker light to write by. Varric had told them. Nightlight capabilities.

“Dear Lady Josephine Montilyet,” Cassandra read aloud as she wrote, and then looked to Ellie. “What would you like to say?”

“Explain what happened at the party and that when Madam de Fer said his aunt is so devout, I thought we should reach out and see if she would like to help the Inquisition and ask her not to be so cross with her nephew for challenging me—”

Woah woah, hold up! Varric swung his legs over the edge of the seat so he could sit straight up facing Tumbles. “Challenging you?”

She shrugged. Shrugged! Damnit, Tumbles! “There was a Marquis at the party who wasn’t exactly pleased to have someone from the Inquisition present. He just said some stuff and tried to challenge me to a duel or something.”

“He insulted you to your face and attempted to draw his weapons on you.” Cassandra corrected drily.
Maker’s entire nutsack. He was going to have to kill someone. Marquis whoeverthefuck. Wait. Was that that dipshit that got kicked out? He could feel his brain splitting off in two directions—half of it assuming Seeker stepped in and saved the day and that asshole had been ripped a new one, and the other going into full panic mode that Tumbles had to fight the bastard herself—shit! She hadn’t even gone in armed! Had he hurt her?

She didn’t seem it. And no way Seeker would let anyone actually hurt Ellie and walk away from that.

But shit. He should have paid better attention—if he’d known that asshole Marquis he saw skulking away from the mansion had tried to start something with Ellie, threatened her, he’d have popped him real good.

Oh. But maybe it was a good thing he hadn’t. because of course Tumbles forgives the sap and wants to play nice with his aunt or whatever. Sometimes he felt like his Street Smart lessons didn’t sink all the way in with her.

But that was…okay, he supposed. It was worrying as shit because people take advantage of that forgiveness shit, but it was also part of what makes Ellie, Ellie. On some level, he was pretty sure it was part of what made the Maker think she’d be cut out for a job like ‘Herald of Andraste’.

“Madam de Fer stepped in and helped, kind of…scarily.”

“Scarily?” Varric asked.

“She froze him solid and then offered to kill him for me.”

Huh. Really? “I like her already.”

“Varric! It was awful!” Ellie insisted, “She might have killed him!”

Cassandra glared at him then and holy mother of chest hair, under the glow of Fadelight, her imposing presence was amplified by about a thousand. Scary.

“Sorry Tumbles. Ignore me and work on your letter.”

Varric downed his wine while Ellie and Seeker worked on the letter for Ruffles, Ellie dictating while Seeker scribbled away.

“Does it look good to you, Eleanor? You’re satisfied?”

“Uh-huh! Yup, your handwritings cute! I like Lady Josie’s cuz its all loopy and fancy, but I like how yours is kind of zig zaggy and little it’s pretty.” Maker.

Seeker looked almost overwhelmingly bemused, like she wasn’t sure if she should laugh or groan. “Eleanor. Honestly. I meant the wording.”

“Is probably just as great as your handwriting, Go for it!”

“Very well, I shall indeed go for it. I’ll see it sent as soon as we return to the Marchand’s home.”

Ellie nodded and put her gloves back on, sitting on her bottom on the seat and swinging her legs again, bopping her head side to side. It was something the kid did when she’d forgotten something and was trying to think. Varric picked up on this because he was an astute observer, a true master of his craft. And he’d only caught her doing it every spare moment of every day her first week in Haven, trying desperately to recall the events at the Conclave, but it was no dice.

“Something on your mind, Tumbles?” Varric asked.

“I was just trying to remember what Lady Josie told me about the Marquis and Marquess Marchand. Oh gosh, that’s a lot of M’s,” she observed with a smile. Maker, watch over this kid, damn. “Anyway, when I got lost in their house yesterday I came across their library and Solas said it was set up like a Mage’s library. But I’m pretty sure Lady Josephine didn’t say anything about their being Mages, and they certainly didn’t say anything of the sort.”

“No, the Marquis and Marquess are not Mages,” Cassandra said quietly, carefully, but her voice did that sort of upward-pitching thing it did when she...

Oh shit she was lying. Not…not outright but, there was definitely something there she didn’t want Ellie to know. A lie of omission, about something that Seeker obviously did not want to hurt the kid with.

Tumble’s leg swinging stilled and she placed a hand on Cassandra’s knee. “Cassandra? What is it?” Ellie asked,

Oh shit. Shit shit shit, nope, Street Smarts was not smart, he should not have taught Ellie anything about lies, or tells, specifically Cassandra’s, or anything he was an idiot and he should have stuck to snowball fights.

“It is nothing, Eleanor—”

“It’s not nothing if you won’t even look at me. Come on, out with it.”

Cassandra took the hand Ellie had placed on her knee, into her own and turned a bit in her seat to more properly face her.

“The Marchand’s daughter was a Mage.”

Oh. That wasn’t so bad, Varric thought.

“Was?”

Oh. Okay that might be bad. Past tense usually was.

“She attended the Conclave, as a representative of White Spire*.”

Fuck.

Ellie’s mouth opened like she might say something, then closed, licking her lips as, oh shit her chin crinkled the way it did she was about to cry.

“Oh,” she said faintly, like she’d used the tail end of a breath held in her lungs, and it didn’t look like she breathed again until she blinked a few times took in a staggering breath through her nose. “I…no one said anything. I should have t-told them I was s-sorry for their loss!”

“Eleanor you were not to know. The Marchands insisted you not be informed.”

“W-what?”

“They did not wish to burden you with the knowledge, Eleanor.”
“They must be so sad! And I was so mean—”

“Nonsense. Eleanor, you were not unkind to them, Josiephene had nothing but good to say of your meeting.”

“But I was mean about them, later, I complained, and joked about Orlesians being weird—”

“Tumbles!” Varric half-shouted, swinging his legs over the edge of the seat to sit up properly, across from the girl. He wasn’t sure what he did with the canteen of wine but he was pretty sure he’d thrown it or something, he heard it thump on the carriage floor. “Kid listen to me, you can’t beat yourself up about that. Orlesians are weird, and that was a crazy lunch, you didn’t know—not because you’re insensitive, but because they didn’t want you to. And because of that you gave them something they probably needed. A normal afternoon by their standards.”

“What good does that do them?” she asked pitifully, she clenched her eyes shut as tears escaped them.

Maker damn it, he slid from his seat and got on his knees, took both of Ellie’s hands in his and squeezed as he looked up into her face. “Ellie, when you lose someone like that, everyone you know, everyone that they knew, reminds you about it—and that’s what happens, what’s supposed to happen, we’re supposed to be comforted by friends and family. But constantly hearing that people are sorry, sometimes it just reminds you what you’ve lost. They came to Haven to get closure, see that there was still some hope after the Conclave. Kid, they got to meet you—their daughter might be gone, but you, a little Mage girl with the key to saving us all, working with the people trying to find the one responsible for Breach? Helping to make decisions that might make the world a better place for people like their daughter? That had to give them hope. And that’s all they needed. Not more sorry’s or for you to feel badly for them, or guilty.”

“Eleanor—” Cassandra started.

“Um,” Ellie gulped out, “T—that was nice of you to…I. I just…can we just not talk for a bit? I’m not mad at either of you I just…” Ellie’s hands clenched under his own and her head was bowed, eyes closed shut as she shook. Varric let go of her hands stood, nodding that he understood but then that felt stupid cause she definitely couldn’t see it.

Seeker carefully put an arm around Ellie’s shoulders and the girl tucked her legs up against her chest and turning to bury her face against Cassandra’s shoulder, and just sat there, biting her lip, eyes closed.

Varric patted Ellie’s shin, gave Seeker a nod she lightly returned before leaning her head to the side to rest it atop Ellie’s. Varric hopped down out of the carriage, wait on the others and maybe actually keep watch.

Ellie was wandering around the halls of the Marchand estate, padding barefoot, in her pajamas. The hall was dark save for light spilling out from underneath a closed doorway.

Where was everyone? Were they hiding?

Wait, when did they get back?
She got to the door, and it thrummed with magic that zipped through her hands when she pushed it open, not painful just, like she’d opened something warded.

Oh. The library again. Why was she here?

“I wanted to meet you, of course.”

Ellie was sure she’d entered the library—the maze of shelves and everything, had been there when she opened the door, but now it was vanishing, like they’d been cast aside, and in the center of the library there was now just an overstuffed couch, like the ones in the sitting rooms, and end tables on either side.

Seated on the couch, was a young woman with long dark hair, pallid skin, dressed in a soft blue nightgown that fell to her ankles. Glasses rested on the tip of her nose and she was scanning the pages of a book she held in her hands, though it vanished when she looked up at Ellie. She’d wanted to meet?

“Herald of Andraste? That’s what mother and father called you. But your friends call you Ellie, yes? That’s what they’ve calling you while you’ve been here.”

Ellie stared at her blankly.

“Oh, how rude of me. I’m Charlotte Marchand. Come, sit,” the girl said patting the empty space beside her on the couch.

Ellie hadn’t even stepped forward. One second she was standing in the doorway and the next she was seated on the couch.

Oh. Oh she supposed they had returned to the estate after all. Or maybe she was still in the carriage with Cassandra, or they were all on their way back or something. Either way—

“I’m dreaming. And you’re dead.”

“Both true. You sleep in mother and father’s bed—gave me quite the startle your first night here. Time moves a bit different when you’re dead I think. I experience a lot of timelessness, I thought I might have missed seeing you altogether and then poof! I like sleeping in their bed or… well, just being in it when the world looks like sleep time, sometimes they’re there—they were when they came to make the house nice for you, thanks for that I was worried they weren’t coming back. Anyway, a few nights ago I go for a lie-down and there you were, I’m surprised I didn’t wake you.”

“I um, I sleep pretty deeply. I take potion—”

“Yes. Lots of fluoride, clogs up your penial gland*, makes you sleep without dreaming, keeps you disconnected from the Fade when you sleep. My parents arranged for me to have similar after White Spire fell.”

That sounded like being made Tranquil to her, but Ellie, well she didn’t know what to think about that. Maybe she’d ask Adan or…or something.

“I’m sorry,” Ellie said, then. “T-that your Circle falling gave you nightmares and…and I’m sorry your parents don’t come a lot, and I’m sorry about the Conclave. T-that you’re dead.”

“Why are you sorry? Apology implies responsibility. It’s not your fault I’m dead, or the Conclave happened, or my Circle Fell. Those things just happened. The world happens.”
“I might not be r-responsible, but I still feel badly.”

“Might not? There is no might about it, Ellie. You are not responsible, it was not your fault. Say it.”

For one startling moment, Ellie worried she’d messed up big time—it was stupid to talk to something in the Fade, it was one thing when she didn’t realize she was in the Fade (it was still dangerous, but it was hard to tell she was there when it pulled from your own personal memories!) but here she’d realized pretty quick she was asleep, Fade dreaming. Charlotte might not even be Charlotte—she could be a demon, and the command ‘say it’ Ellie bit her lip to keep her mouth shut but…

Oh. Nothing happened. Ellie didn’t feel any sort of compulsion to give in to the command, and Charlotte just sort of stared at her, waiting. So, no spooky manipulation from a demon trying to possess her, just a kind-of spooky ghost hopefully not interested in possessing her at all. Hopefully.

“It isn’t my fault,” Ellie said quietly.

Charlotte smiled. “Very good,” and then she looked down at Ellie’s hands sitting in her lap and asked. “Can I see?”

Oh. Her Mark. Ellie held up her left hand for the older girl to examine. Oh it was weird—she could feel the other girls hand touching hers but it felt…like it wasn’t really there. It was almost like her hand was asleep or something, just the barest ghost of pressure of something around her hand, no warmth or softness.

“I’m glad I waited around to meet you,” Charlotte said softly, one hand holding Ellie’s while the other she used a finger to trace across the Mark itself.

“Waited?”

Charlotte nodded. “I was just…I wanted to see my parents again. They can’t connect to the Fade, not as you do but when they were here I laid with them as they slept, and I think they knew I was there. That I’m okay. But they talked a lot about the Inquisition and you especially and…well I wanted to see you for myself. To thank you.”

“T-thank me?”

“Your meeting, with my parents. They really liked meeting you and getting to know that…well that even though so much was lost at the Conclave there was still good that came from it. You came from it and you gave them a lot of peace of mind about backing the Inquisition and hope that the Breach can be stopped. And it got them back here. They don’t live in Val Royeaux, just have the apartment here so we could all stay together—White Spire would let me out in the Spring, for my birthday.”

Were birthdays important? Ellie hadn’t thought so—she knew people kept track of how old they were, it was important for health stuff and legal stuff or whatever, so she’d done her best to figure out her age. But Sola’s and the others interest in her birthday’d seemed like they wanted to know about the specific day as opposed to just how old she was. Huh.

Oh! But that wasn’t the important thing.

“You only got to see your family once a year?” Ellie asked.

Charlotte nodded. “I was one of the luckier ones. My parents could afford a place in the City—White Spire wasn’t going to let me too far out of bounds, after all. Most people never got out, hadn’t seen their families or anything outside the Circle since Templars took them away. You have to have certain influence.”

“You had to be nobility,” Ellie said. That’d been true with Trevelyan, he’d only ever been allowed out of Ostwick because his family was so notable, though he’d been allowed way out of bounds—but maybe because he’d been going to Val Royeaux. White Spire could have taken him if he’d caused trouble. Oh Maker, just how different could everything have been if that had happened? Their paths may never have crossed.

“Yeah, or just wealthy, really. My parents would offer up a generous donation to the Circle, and in return I got to come stay with them here for a week or so. One year, they let me out for a whole month it was the best.”

Maker. She seemed a little older than Ellie, but not by much. And magic could be exposed in someone at a young age. Had she been like Ellie? Turned five but gotten whisked off to a Circle, never to see her family more than the cumulated time of maybe a year, if you squished the weeks and one month of visitation together? That…

That was sickening.

“I’m sorry you didn’t get a lot of time with your parents.”

Charlotte shrugged. “Again, nothing you could do about it. I got enough time with them, or at least as much as someone like me could hope for. I’m not sad about it or anything. Though…if you could do me a favor?”

“Anything.”

“Careful who you say that to, in the Fade,” Charlotte cautioned. But then she smiled. “In my library there was this book. Its from when I was little, just this compilation of children’s stories. My father used to read them to me. I got so nervous when I was preparing to go to the Conclave—I was here for a while before I left. I thought I would study up on magical theory or rhetoric that would support our cause but…I found that old story book and for some reason I just gravitated toward it. I pored over that dumb book for hours, I even took notes of all things, habit I think from my time in the Circle. I just had all these thoughts I kept marking up the margins with. Like, memories about daddy reading my favorite stories, and how much some of them meant to me when I couldn’t be with my family because I’d just cling to those memories, sometimes relive them like new in the Fade while I slept.”

“That’s really sweet,” Ellie said.

Charlotte nodded. “Um. I would like it if you could get them that book for me? And maybe just…just tell them I’m okay—I think they know that, but it would just really make me secure in that knowledge if you promised to tell them that I’m okay, and I’m not sad or scared, and I’ll be here, well not here here, but in the afterlife with the Maker when their times come. Would you do that for me?”

Ellie took the older girl’s hands, tried giving them a reassuring squeeze as she promised. “I will. I mean you’ll have to tell me where to look cuz your library’s kind of mazey but—”

“Oh! It’s here with me in the Fade, I had it on me at the Conclave. I’ve been reading while I’ve been waiting so it’s sort of existing in-between, in the here-and-there.”
“Um. So. How am I supposed to get it?” Ellie asked.

“I have a friend, sort of. From White Spire. I haven’t seen him much since everything went to hell there, but he came to me when I died. He’s really different now though. He died but then he didn’t. Anyway, he can pop in and out as he pleases, take the book from me here and bring it to you there. Just uh, try not to freak out if you can see him.”

“If I can see him?”

Charlotte shrugged. “Dead and not dead, it can get weird.”

“I’ll try not to kick him the danglers then.”

Charlotte actually cackled at that. “Well, as long as you try,” she said, still laughing a bit. “Oh, it was good to meet you, Ellie. Thank you for all you’ve done, and all you will do.”

Ellie gasped when she woke. She didn’t remember coming back from Madam de Fer’s party, but she was in her assigned bed in the Marchand’s home.

Though that line of thinking was lost to the fright of a strange boy crouching on the headboard, staring down at her.

Ellie shot up, reeling around to crawl backward toward the end of the bed, scream building in her throat—

But then there was a soft sort of blip in her magic, oh. Was he…was he important? Like Blackwall, and Sera, and Madam de Fer?

The boy was suddenly right in front of her, knees on the bed, somehow making no dip in the mattress like he was weightless, but his hand felt real enough when it laid across her mouth to hush her regardless of the fact she was no longer trying to escape and was just observing him now. He wore a huge, wide-brimmed hat, and rogue armor, shaggy blond hair dipping over wide cast blue eyes, and Maker he was pale as a ghost.

Oh. Ghost?

“You healed a hurt, and had your own hurts healed,” he said, removing his hand from her mouth. “You were very sad when the hairy man carried you in. And then the one that watches, she put you in soft things certain to see you safely sleeping. But you were still sad.”

Um. That was a lot and sss sounds. Ellie realized then she was no longer wearing what she’d worn to the party. ‘the one that watches’…that must mean Marehis? She must have changed her into her pajamas. That was sweet.

She did feel better now, actually. Having met Charlotte—it was sad she was gone, and that her parents would miss her but being able to help the girl give her family further closure was…nice. The best one could hope for out of a bad situation.

“How did you know I was sad?” Ellie asked.

“I hear the hurts and try to heal them. Charlotte beat me to it this time, but I brought her book, so we helped each other I suppose.”

Oh Maker he was a ghost. Or…or not a ghost? Dead and then not dead, Charlotte had said. “You’re Charlotte’s friend.”

“Cole was. And now I’m him. When Charlotte passed she sought him and got me. She wants to heal her parents’ hurts. They will always hurt, but healing helps.”

A book appeared in his hands then and he offered it to Ellie.

She carefully took hold of the book dark blue book, gingerly running a finger across the silvery lettering engraved on its cover.

“I’ll make sure her parents get this and her message,” Ellie promised.

Though she may as well not have said anything at all. When she looked up the boy was gone.

Cole, had he said his name was?

Blackwall was dead tired when they at last made it back to their appointments in Val Royeaux. They couldn’t just drop their trays and leave with Ellie anytime they pleased. They stayed until the servants were dismissed—which came after the party, and after they’d cleaned up. Ellie couldn’t stick around though; she and Cassandra made a polite exit at the end of the party and the girl was found having fallen asleep in the carriage while waiting on the others.

She’d been crying it looked like, curled up against a subdued Cassandra who, at Marehis’s concerned (bordering on outraged) look explained that she’d informed Eleanor that the Marchands had a Mage daughter who had perished at the Conclave.

This resulted in an almost amusing, mostly terrifying, whisper-fight the entire carriage ride. Marehis was livid—apparently it had been a matter of agreement between she, the advisors, and the Marchands that Ellie not be told of the girl’s passing for fear it would only exacerbate the survivors guilt the Herald felt. Cassandra assured Marehis she knew very well why such a thing would hurt her, but apparently Ellie could tell something was being kept from her and she would only press until someone informed her, and Cassandra felt it was best to do so in as open and gentle a manner as possible rather than being prodded until the answer was delivered in the form of an accident or a harsh snap.

Marehis had been open about her doubt in Cassandra’s gentle manner.

Surprisingly enough, once they arrived at the estate and Varric hopped down from the driver’s seat and once he realized they’d been arguing, he settled it coming to Cassandra’s defense—Blackwall was almost certain he himself had fallen asleep on the carriage ride back to the Marchands, for surely he must be dreaming. But no, Varric insisted Cassandra had done her best, and it was his fault, he said, that Ellie was even capable of spotting a lie from Cassandra, specifically. Hurting Ellie was the very last thing any of them wanted, and fighting over something that they couldn’t change was pointless—she knew now, and she felt terrible the Marchands had lost a daughter in the assault on the Concalve. What mattered was being there for her, and quote ‘Seeing her moms have a world-ending bitch off over who’s the better parent’ wasn’t going to Both women had slapped the dwarf—Marehis on the back of his head and Cassandra backhanding his cheek, the two of them rising to each other’s defense saying, “Do not call her a bitch.”

And then Varric chuckled and, making a very quick exit to get to his rooms and lock the doors before the women could assault him further, he left them on the note that he was glad to have brought them back around to being on each other’s side and he wouldn’t mind watching them ‘kiss and make up’.

That damn Dwarf had a death wish. But he was right—he’d momentarily given the women a common enemy and that led to, when Blackwall took up a sleeping Ellie in his arms, Cassandra and Marehis being much more civil to each other as they followed after him, discussing how the party had gone and how they would handle tomorrow’s schedule. Or today’s schedule, as it were, Maker it was late. It was a good thing they weren’t fighting anymore—he’d certainly never term it as such but ‘bitch-off’ hadn’t been too far off the mark. If they hadn’t feared waking Ellie, he thought the women might have actually drawn weapons on each other.

“Blackwall?”

The Warden looked up from where he’d been…huh he’d just been staring into the fire in the kitchen’s hearth, the mug of coffee in his hands mostly untouched. He hadn’t slept a wink, hadn’t tried to really. It was nearly four in the morning when they returned from Chateau de Bastion. He wasn’t sure what time it was now, Ellie usually rose early with the Seeker and Marehis, but they’d had such a long night he was sure everyone was sleeping in before they got a start on their journey back to Haven.

“Ahh, good morning Ellie. Did you sleep well?” he asked gently. He’d been worried, when they put her to bed Cassandra and Marehis did not think it best to wake her to take potion for sleep—she wasn’t restless or distressed so they figured it was best just to leave her as such, if they woke her she may only get upset again and she’d feel better after a good night’s sleep, was the hope.

The girl nodded sleepily, rubbing at her eyes as she stretched a bit. “I feel like I slept for forever. Oh! Thanks, you guys worked so hard last night, you must’ve been beat, I appreciate it, you carrying me in.”

Blackwall felt his face warm at that, clearing his throat, “Ah, did we wake you?” he asked. He thought she’d been sleeping rather soundly, but Maker she’d felt so little when he carried her—it actually made him consider discussing her eating habits with Marehis, Ellie was able to eat well enough at meal times now that Adan’s potion had been brought to bear, but the girl was young and probably still had growing to do, and she was extremely active what with all the fighting and the training, and Rift Sealing looked like a workout in and of itself. He was surprised the girl wasn’t constantly snacking. Anyway, he was big and while he wasn’t worthy of a title like ‘Tumbles’ he certainly could be rather clumsy himself at the of worst times, he’d probably jostled her something fierce and hadn’t realized it.

But Ellie was shaking her head. “Nope, a friend told me.”

“Friend?”

“I’ve had kind of a weird morning,” she said, “Fade dreamed.”

Suddenly the blood that had rushed to his cheeks was gone and he could feel his stomach...
turn, he abandoned his coffee cup on the table as he studied the girl’s face for any sign she was distressed. “Are you alright?” he felt almost awkward as he offered, he wasn’t…great, with emotions or talking for that matter but he was the only one up and around and he had a feeling shouting for…hell, even Varric would be better suited for the task…would only startle or offend the girl so he said, “Do you want to talk about it?”

She plopped down into the seat next to his, head bopping side to side as she thought it over. “Hmm. It wasn’t bad or scary or anything. It was actually kind of nice.”

Fade sounded scary, the crap that poured out of it was just bloody awful. He couldn’t imagine finding anything pleasant about dreaming in the place, but he wasn’t a Mage. Still, it was little wonder Ellie needed help sleeping but he worried her potion forced her into slumber—like if she were having an awful experience in the Fade, she couldn’t wake up until the potion was out of her system, though Cassandra assured him no such thing was happening. But the Seeker wasn’t a Mage either, so he wasn’t certain she had any authority on the matter.

“Marehis hasn’t been in here, has she?” Ellie asked then.

Huh. With Ellie awake he’d actually expected Marehis would be on her heels “You haven’t seen her this morning?” Blackwall asked.

Ellie shook her head. “Nope. I checked in her room, but she wasn’t there.”

Ahh, but she hadn’t checked Solas’s room had she? It was well enough, the Elves wanted their courtship to be private, though that ‘My Heart’ rubbish was quite the blunder. He was surprised Marehis’s cover had worked. Ellie was a smart girl, but ultimately Blackwall supposed she was too trusting. Marehis’s word that she had no intention of coupling with Solas was enough for her to believe they hadn’t despite any evidence to the contrary, not until Marehis or Solas confirmed it themselves forthrightly.

“I think she had an errand to run this morning, we’re to leave for Haven soon, yes?” Blackwall offered up as cover.

And there it was, Ellie smiled at him, taking him at his word. “Oh, well hopefully she gets back in time for breakfast! Did she need help?”

Blackwall shook his head. “Did you have need of her?” he asked carefully. He wasn’t sure he himself was equiped to comfort the girl, especially if she was seeking comfort from her minder.

“No, I’m fine,” she assured him with a smile and a shrug.

He half expected it to be a lie—or as much of one as Ellie could tell. Cassandra had rather a passionate lecture to them one evening that they were none of them, under any circumstances whatsoever, to ever accept Eleanor’s definition of ‘fine’ as a passable one. He had to admit he agreed, he’d only heard her use the term a few times but so far she’d practically dropped dead the first time. He looked her over carefully for any sign of distress or some hidden mortal wound she thought wasn’t worth the bother, when he realized she was dressed for the day, but her hair was unruly and wild, curling madly from her head uncombed. In her hands she had a wide-toothed comb and a small bottle of…huh, he figured with her hair, it was probably oil of some sort.

“Do you need help with your hair, Ellie?” he asked.

“Oh! Uh, sort of,” she said, blushing a bit and looking at the implements she’d been intending to bring to Marehis, “I never really do it right. I like how long it’s gotten its just difficult to do it as well as Marehis does—swear she uses some form of secret, hidden Rogue magic. I used to have to just chop it every couple weeks.”

He was quiet for a moment before offering, “I could help, if you’d like.”

She looked up at him then, “Really?” she asked, surprised. As if he’d just told her he was a world class tap dancer in his spare time.

Blackwall motioned for Ellie turn her back to him, “Put your things on the table, I’ll fetch some water.”

Ellie did as she was told, just a bit hesitant, and she waited. Blackwall went to the kitchen pump and filled a pitcher with water before digging around in the cupboards for a few clean dish towels.

“For your shoulders,” he said as he handed her one of the towels, Ellie placed them over her shoulders, across the back of her neck.

They were quiet as Blackwall wet her hair before selecting a section to detangle. Once he’d massaged—it smelled like coconut—oil into the tangled mane, he took up the comb and carefully worked through her hair. Starting at the ends of course, he used to get smacked in the head for starting at the roots, and he’d deserved it.

“My sister, Liddy*, her hair was like yours, when she was young,” he found himself saying to his own surprise. Her name hadn’t crossed his lips in decades—ages before his years at tourney.

Ellie almost turned around in her seat to look at him but stopped when she remembered he was still working on her hair. “Liddy’s a cute name.”

Blackwall nodded, his voice a bit thick as he said, “Her hair was always a bother to her. She struggled with it,” she’d been so very sick in the end, “so I learned how to do it for her.”

“That’s really sweet of you, it seems like you do a pretty good job of it,” Ellie complimented.

“Ahh, it’s been ages since I’ve done this. You’ll have to let me know if I snag you, or comb too roughly.”

Ellie nodded, gently so she didn’t pull her hair, and asked, “What’s your sister do? Have you been able to keep in touch with her since coming to Haven? Cassandra says we can send and receive letters there.”

“That life is long gone from me now. Liddy passed when she was nine.”

“Oh,” Ellie said quietly, “I’m sorry.”

“That life is long gone from me now. Liddy passed when she was nine.”

“Nothing to be done for it now,” Blackwall said, the words sounding lighter than they felt.

“I know…that talking about life before the Wardens is difficult, for most Grey Wardens,” Ellie said, speaking as carefully as he handled her hair, “but if you ever want to talk—about it, or anything else, I’m always here to listen. I mean, I know I get busy,” she said with a laugh, “but if you ever need it, I know talking about things can help. And…I mean, if you don’t mind my saying…”

“Yes, Ellie? Feel free to speak your mind, I won’t take offense.” How could he? Ellie was more likely to burn Orlais to the ground than hurt someone intentionally. He couldn’t think of anything he’d hold against the girl.

He pulled his hands away from her hair as she turned around in her seat to face him.

“You disparage yourself too easily!” She…was she reprimanding him? For what?

“I’m not sure I know what you mean,” he said baldly.

“You’re always making self-deprecating remarks and putting yourself down! And honestly it worries me, because you talk…well, you talk like you don’t like yourself very much,” her voice went thin, fragile, like the thought made her want to cry.

He found himself almost speechless, just barely finding the hallow words, “I like myself just fine, Ellie, you needn’t worry.”

Oh. She was giving him a look now, like he was in for a bit of a lecture. “Look, as someone whose working on liking herself on a consistent basis, I can honestly say I think you should talk to someone. If not me, then someone else—even not Varric but I don’t think he hates you really. Maybe Cassandra, or Solas or Marehis—she’s always with me but I dunno if you don’t want me to hear I can go hang out with one of the others or something and she’s a wicked good listener. Harritt and Dennet, they seem like they’ve been through life, and if you needed someone with similar experience, that might be where to look. Or even Adan, if you’d prefer. He doesn’t just prescribe you stuff and send you on your way, that’s what I do because it’s what we think will work best for me, and I talk things out with Marehis and Cassandra.”

How could he even possibly begin to explain just how dark his sins had stained? That they were many, and irredeemable? How could he tell her she was putting her life in the hands of a wretched man repenting from his own life of cruelty in the only way he can? He wasn’t worth liking, and he was entirely unworthy of her concern.

But she was concerned. Something could be done about that. He was meant to be helping. Maker, he was useless at this. He’d been meaning to comfort Ellie since she woke this morning—in the back of his mind he was pretty sure that was what had kept him awake, he’d been waiting to see if she was alright, wanting to be there for her if she needed. And here she’d breezed by any of the awkward efforts on his part to talk about her problems, and instead flipped the script on him.

“I’ll talk to someone, Ellie, if that would make you feel better.”

“Promise?” she asked, raising her Marked hand to him, pinky finger extended. Wouldn’t he have to cut off a pinky if he broke his promise?

Maker take his whole damn hand if he ever breaks his word to this girl.

“I promise,” he said, bending his own large, battle-calloused pinky around her slender Fade-lit one.

She smiled before turning back around in her seat, so he could continue on her hair. He was glad to have her eyes off him, he did not like the way her gaze sometimes seemed like it could drive him to bear his soul. There were times he thought his crimes might just come spilling past his lips as he tried to make it clear to her just how wretched a man he was. And. Maker, there was some part of him that felt, feared…

That he would do so and horrify the girl. Have her look upon him for what he truly was, that light she had that made her see the good in everyone utterly destroyed, extinguished by his hand. He could not allow that to happen, not to her, not because of him.

Then there was a new fear created by Ellie herself. Seeker Pentaghast admitted to things he thought he’d kill a man for. Granted she’d had her reasons but…Maker, Cassandra had made it sound like she’d horribly abused Ellie when they first met. He’d heard some of the confusion the Inquisition had had—something that came off like a rumor the further away from Haven one got, that the Herald of Andraste had been momentarily considered as a suspect before she’d revealed the blessing the Maker himself had bestowed upon her, her true divine purpose. He hadn’t realized she’d been captured and had a Seeker of all things set upon her for interrogation. The very idea made his skin crawl. Cassandra had intentionally inflicted the girl with fear and pain and it was little wonder Ellie had guilt and shame over the Conclave—regardless of the fact her name had been cleared, Cassandra had laid the blame upon her and it had obviously taken root.

And then Ellie had offered redemption. No sooner had Cassandra confessed her sins, then Ellie was wiping her slate of guilt and shame, he could practically see the burden of it being lifted from the Seeker’s shoulders. The girl gave her justification and forgiveness, left her clean and blameless, and untainted in the eyes of the others in her company. Blackwall had experienced actual whiplash, gone from fear the Seeker could not be trusted with the girl, to realizing Cassandra had more than proven herself worthy of their trust, that she’d made things right, those hands that hurt Ellie had long since found redemption in her care and protection.

That scared him. Because he feared someday his past would come for him, and it would either destroy some innocence in Ellie or…or see her forgive him. That through some divine grace this girl seemed capable of wielding, his slate would be wiped clean. That he would look into her face and know redemption, forgiveness, penance paid for the lives he’d taken.

It scared him, because it made him think perhaps forgiveness was obtainable and that was a dangerous thought. There was something in that vein that said ‘do enough good for Ellie, follow her, protect her, please this little holy girl and she will save you’. That he couldn’t counteract the balance of his karma, but she could with the snap of her Marked hand if he could prove himself to her.

And that was a horrid thought because no matter what—it tainted whatever good he would do. He’d be doing it for the wrong reason—he would be doing good things to save his own skin, and not because they were the right thing to do. That was a life he had lived too long, and not one he sought to ever live again.

“What’s this? Hair braiding chain?”

“Varric! Ho—Ouch!” Ellie yelped when Blackwall suddenly jerked.

Maker’s breath, he’d been working with her hair, lost in thought—her voice, greeting Varric who lumbered in, his greeting spoken as if he’d been half-asleep, though now fully awake and glaring at him, had startled him, caused him to jerk and oh. Ouch indeed. He’d not left a bald spot or anything but there was quite a bit of hair caught in the comb now he was decently sure hadn’t been a moment before.

“Oh Maker, forgive me,” he rasped out as he dropped the comb and gingerly separated her hair to examine her scalp for injury, worried he’d pulled up skin or caused her to bleed.

“I’m not the Maker you goof, and I forgive you just fine. It didn’t hurt much you just sort of startled me really,” she assured him as if he were overreacting. Maybe he was but, well damn it, she was certainly underreacting. It’d happened so quickly but he’d seen her head snap back and heard her chair scrape against the floor, felt the back of it press into his knee caps because the force had pulled her chair and all. She wasn’t bleeding, thankfully though her scalp was a little red where he examined.

“What’s he doing playing with your hair anyway? Last I checked hair braiding wasn’t in the Warden handbook,” Varric sniped.

“He was helping me comb my hair,” Ellie said, “since Marehis is running an errand.”

“Shadow’s no—”

Blackwall motioned Varric to kill that sentence.

“—uh, not back yet?” Varric amended. “Forgot she was going on a uh, errand.”

“Perhaps we should wait for her to return,” Blackwall said to Ellie when she picked up the comb and made to hand it to him once more.

“Oh, if you’re tired of doing it or something yeah I can wait, but really, I’m okay, you do it nice.”

Well he certainly wasn’t going to snag her again, Blackwall took up the comb with even greater care, paying closer attention he resumed the section of hair he’d been working on. He was nearly done anyway.

“Just be careful with her, Hero. I’m gonna get this breakfast thing rolling since you two are busy and Seeker’s sleeping in.”

“Everyone deserves a lie-in after last night,” Ellie said, “I mean it was pretty boring just standing around talking and those people made it go on for hours. Did they really enjoy that?”

“Unfortunately, yes,” Blackwall said.

“People leave parties hours early all the time kid, you show up, show off, go home,” Varric spoke over his shoulder, he’d set about actually making breakfast—standing on his stool before the stove, cracking eggs into a pan. “You didn’t have to wait on the others, I’d’ve taken you home and gone back for them. Well. Maybe just for Shadow and Chuckles.”

Blackwall made sure Ellie’s back was still turned to him when he flicked oil to hit the back of the Dwarf’s head to get his attention, so he’d turn to see the lovely bird Blackwall had for him in his hand. Varric snorted, returning the favor.

“I didn’t want to go on ahead without everyone, I’d’ve felt badly,” Ellie was saying, “Plus, I didn’t want to be rude to Madam de Fer.”

Madam de Fer. She was a prissy one. A terrifyingly powerful priss. Blackwall had to admit he had been glad that she stepped in when she did with that Marquis talking threats to Ellie. He’d been about to spill his tray and use it to knock that lout into next week, challenging a little girl over political nonsense. It had been the most uncouth game-play he’d ever witnessed.

And he hadn’t liked Ellie being involved in the Game. That party, those people, they were all playing it and she hadn’t even realized just how much danger she’d been in. That Madam de Fer hadn’t taken advantage of the opportunity, well…it didn’t quite speak to her character yet. She could merely be biding her time.

For what, Blackwall wasn’t certain. But he did not trust this Madam de Fer. She had motives in her offer to Ellie other than just lending a helping hand.

And she was to be a party member, Ellie had been excited to inform them.

Voices echoed in the hall outside the kitchens, male and feminine, lively and was that...giggling?

And then a gasp of surprise, from Marehis, as she and Solas entered the kitchen, obviously not expecting to find anyone there.

“Da’len!” the Elves greeted in unison, both sets of pointed ears tipped in burning red.

“Heya!” Ellie said, not seeming to find anything questionable about their behavior. “I’m glad you’re back! What’d you do? Did Solas help?”

Blackwall could actually kill Varric, the Dwarf snorted. “Oh yeah, I’m sure Chuckles was a real gentleman, helping Marehis with her errand. Work hard, did you?”

At least it helped the girl’s minder to realize they’d had to cover for her. “Just reconnaissance for our departure today. I ran into Solas on my way to get you some breakfast, I wasn’t expecting you would be awake so soon. Did you have need of me?”

“Not badly or anything, Blackwall was here and helped with my hair, see?” she asked, holding up a lock of curls for Marehis’s examination.

He was finished now, he thought, the whole of it hanging wet and neat. “It just needs to dry now,” Blackwall said.

“Great, thanks!” Ellie said as she hopped up from her seat, she turned and dropped a kiss to his cheek before joining the Elves and hugging Marehis tightly in good morning.

“How are you this morning, Da’len?” Marehis asked, pulling back and carefully running a finger along the side of Ellie’s face, tucking it up under her chin to raise the girl’s gaze so she could properly gauge her ward as she relayed her morning to her minder.

Blackwall quietly excused himself then, he found he wasn’t feeling all too hungry and retreated to his quarters. His room was the one at the end of the hall of bedrooms next to Varric’s—he wasn’t sure if the Dwarf wanted to pal around with him or if he was still putting himself as a buffer between the Warden and the Herald. Either way it didn’t matter, if Varric still distrusted him...well then, he was the only one here with any sense, wasn’t he?

Alone in his room, the door sealed shut behind him, Thom Rainier kneeled at the foot of his bed, in prayer like he did when he was a boy. But it wasn’t Andraste or the Maker he spoke to.

Talked to. As promised.

“Liddy. I know it’s been a while. I haven’t been ‘round to your grave in ages now.” Ever. Just nine flowers in her death bed, and more offered up, to people, to the wind, to the sea, every year—each flower representing the age his Liddy would have been...should have been. But sometimes, he feared she didn’t get them. “I’m sorry. But Liddy-girl...I’ve done some things. Horrible, awful things...”
It had been…Maker, decades since the last time she’d risen after sunrise. Though she hadn’t missed it—the sun coming up. She’d still been tossing and turning when the first rays of sunlight streaked through a gap in the curtains in her appointments in the Marchands home. Her argument with Marehis had been thankfully short-lived, resolved before the women went their separate ways for the evening. It worried her, to be in opposition to the Elf woman who held Eleanor’s heart so dear, that if they remained at odds Eleanor…well, she would lose Eleanor’s regard. But she’d felt badly, even with Marehis’s forgiveness—acceptance that Cassandra had acted with Eleanor’s best interests at heart—she still felt she’d failed the girl somehow. Worried that she’d only sent her spiraling. So sleep, it evaded her even as the sun rose.

She felt like she hadn’t slept at all, the only indication she had was the fact that one moment pale light had breached the darkness of her rooms, and the next the golden light of midday was flooding the bedroom, and then something warm made a dip in the mattress and curled up against her side, soft fluffy hair snuggling into the crook of her neck, it was almost alarming but she felt so at peace with the intruding presence she didn’t need the sight of wild red curls when she cracked open her eyes to tell her who had taken it into their head to cuddle with the Seeker.

“Eleanor.”

“Sorry. We have to get going soon, I figured you’d want the chance to wake up a bit before hopping on a horse.”

“Blinding me and then cuddling seem like counter intuitive actions,” Cassandra mumbled.

“Blind you to wake you up. Cuddling so you don’t kill me for blinding you,” Eleanor explained. “I did try calling you awake, but you just sort of snored in response so. Sunlight, the Maker’s wake up call.”

“I do not snore.”

“You do so!”

“Insufferable girl,” Cassandra accused, and her arm, trapped under Eleanor and the mattress, came up around the girl’s shoulders, running her fingers along one of the fluffy, wild curls of Eleanor’s hair. “Did you sleep well?”

“I met Charlotte.”

That…that was not a usual response to, ‘Did you sleep well’. “Who?” Cassandra asked.

“The Marchand’s daughter.”

“I’ll admit could do with a bit more explanation,” Cassandra prompted, looking down at the girl’s head, resting on her shoulder, she couldn’t properly see her face but at least she did not sound disturbed by…well whatever interaction she’d had with this ‘Charlotte’.

“I Fade Dreamed. Which was actually nice, Charlotte knew we’d be coming and was waiting around to talk to me. I feel a lot better, it’s still sad she’s gone but she um, she’s at peace and she sort of asked a favor of me.”

The word ‘favor’ made Cassandra nervous, fearful the girl had been tricked by some awful demon but then Eleanor said, “There’s this book—I have it now—and she wants me to get it to her parents and tell them she’s alright. She doesn’t think they’ll return here—they only kept this apartment because she could visit them here on break from White Spire. Now that she’s gone…
well they may not find it if I just left it laying around with a note or something.”

“I’ll touch base with Josephine. If you cannot meet with the Marchand’s in person, we’ll arrange for the book and their daughter’s message to be safely delivered to them,” Cassandra promised. “Your talk helped?”

Eleanor nodded. “Sorry, for last night. Getting upset.”

“You needn’t apologize Eleanor, it is perfectly natural to find such things upsetting,” she thought over her next words carefully, she did not want to reprimand or make the girl feel she was being lectured but this…manner she held herself to, only finding it acceptable to express herself either happy or even tempered, it was unhealthy and concerning. “You do not have to be sorry for having and expressing emotion. You did no harm to anyone, it is…not a selfish or shameful thing to be anything less than cheerful. You would not disappoint us or lose our regard for being a normal person with responses to normal feelings.”

Eleanor ducked her head at that, shyly, the nod she gave in response tentative, but it was something Cassandra supposed.

Cassandra was startled when the bed dipped further still, jostled by the added weight of—

“Sweet girl, Cassandra is right, you’re allowed to be human,” Marehis said as she snuggled against Ellie, sandwiching the girl between herself and the Seeker, the Elf woman’s arm draping over her ward, hand resting on Cassandra’s arm and giving it a squeeze.

“In that vein, Ellie, it would be understandable for you to be upset with us for leaving you in the dark, so to speak. The Marchand’s did ask for our discretion.”

Oh but that had Eleanor shaking her head ‘no’. “I wasn’t—I mean I was upset, just cuz, you know. It’s sad. And I do wish I’d known, but I understand…Varric explained the idea rather well, why they’d prefer I not know. And I know you were just respecting their wishes—and their wishes are what’s important I mean Maker, I can’t imagine how they must be feeling. And you were all trying to protect me from feeling guilty or sad, so I can’t really be mad at that. It isn’t like you were acting out of meanness or anything.”

“No, no it was not out of meanness,” Marehis murmured, pressing a kiss to Eleanor’s hair.

Maker preserve her, she never thought she would say such a thing, but Cassandra found the next sentence falling almost effortlessly from her lips;

“It is because we love you.”

And there went that shy head ducking again, “Gosh.”

“It’s true, you silly girl, we do. We do, we do, we love you,” Marehis insisted laughingly, shifting to tickle the girl’s sides. Cassandra could not help it, Eleanor began giggling and Cassandra found herself peppering kisses to the head half-resting, half-wriggling against her shoulder.

“Marehis! Cassandra! Oh, you lot, I swear! I love you too!”

The sound of the bedroom door creaking opened was followed by the heavy thud of boots against marble thunking into the room and then, “Geeze Tumbles. First a hair braiding chain with Hero. Now you’re having a cuddle party without me?”
“It is not a party, and if it were you would not be invited,” Cassandra assured him.

But Eleanor was already sitting up, oof, she was half seated on Cassandra’s stomach for half a second, but she popped up and away from her place sandwiched between her guard and the Seeker, bouncing across the bed until she was launched onto her feet and rushing the Dwarf.

“Brace yourself, Tethras, you’re getting a hug!”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish Used:
Theneras antishan, da’len: peaceful dreams, my child.
Vehnan= my heart, a term of endearment used among Elves to their significant others. Solas uses it eventually as you romance him in game.

Notes
*Harvestmere=October
*Wintermarch 1st=New Years Day (First Day)
*When I was doing background research for Vivienne, I read about how Bastien, when he decided to sweep her off her feet and pursue her openly like 2 seconds after knowing she existed bombarded her with a boatload of Peonies (commonly used to express courtship in Thedas)—I’d kicked around the idea that yeah, like IRL you can’t really go far enough back and find a time when it was acceptable to just show up at someone’s home, no matter the circumstance and not come bearing a gift. So. I wanted to throw in something that would be meaningful, and when I read about the Peonies, I was like, you can’t give this woman something she couldn’t get herself, she’s someone who snaps her fingers and has whatever she wants. So the gift she’s going to love has to be simple enough that it catches her off guard, something she wouldn’t think to get for herself, that would genuinely touch her, which would be something that inadvertently pays homage to the single most important relationship she has in her life. Just an all around banging gift that she’s going to actually find memorable.
*White Spire=the biggest baddest Circle I’ve heard of, in Val Royeaux proper. Super strict, and it goes to absolute hell when the Circles fall. It’s where our good friend Cole was held captive and died, then haunted, then went to Therinfal Redoubt seeking punishment.
*Penial (ha!) Gland= it’s not dirty, I swear! It’s a gland in the brain that controls our sleeping/waking functions. It produces all the chemicals that allow us to sleep. There’s a belief that it is what allows us to dream full stop, and that if it gets calcified (calcium builds up around the gland), you don’t dream. A major way it’s believed calcification occurs, is through the ingestion of fluoride.
*Liddy is in canon Thom Rainier’s sister. She passed away from, what sounds like illness due to his conversations with Cole, when she’s around eight or nine (there is a reference to number of flowers he leaves on her bed and window sill after her passing, and the number of flowers he gives as offering is the number of years old she would be. this is a tradition that, in canon, Blackwall continues, even as he’s in the Inquisition —Cole references the flowers he’s cast into the sea on the Storm Coast, and then the ones he casts off the battleships in Skyhold).

Next Chapter: Storm Coast! Iron Bull! Krem de la Krem! MAYHEM! EDA: 8/4/18
Chapter Summary

Returning to Haven to discuss their future moves to seal the Breach--should they reach out to the Mages who've already extended an open invitation, or should they hold out hope for the Templars to help them?

Ellie and friends journey to the Storm Coast to check out the Bull's Chargers, in general mayhem ensues.

Chapter Notes

This chapter introduces the point of view of a canon Trans Character--I'm not a trans man, but just like everything else with this fic I wanted to be super careful with research, and in this case super respectful because we're dealing with a real life topic, so 'Thank you!' to the lovely T's in LGBT that read over Krem's POV's providing their insight and accountability, before I posted. <3

This chapter will also address one of the major reasons I thought of this fic in the first place--in the tags you'll notice I tagged both 'Inquisitor Sides with the Mages' and 'Sided with the Templars'. I'm super excited to finally get to touch on that in this chapter!

I hope you enjoy this chapter, it kind of got away from me, and grew so long that covering the entirety of the Storm Coast in one chapter became a no-go, so I ended up having to split it in two! Thanks for the Kudos and comments and feedback! I truly do appreciate it.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

They’d been back from Val Royeax for three days and Ellie was starting to miss her friends —Blackwall, Solas, Varric, oh Marehís, she only saw her first thing each morning, and in the evening when she was heading for bed. She hadn’t been able to see Sera or Vivienne much at all since their arrival in Haven and she felt badly for that, but it couldn’t be helped.

Advisor meetings. They had consumed her every waking moment. Every evening when she finally got to leave the Chantry she half-expected to find the Inquisition in ruins, abandoned and possibly on fire because who was running everything if Cullen, Josephine, and Leliana spent the whole of their days holed up in the War Room with Ellie and Cassandra arguing?

Cullen and Cassandra thought the Templars should be investigated as their option for sealing the Breach. Cullen knew there were more Templars like him, yearning to help the people of Thedas by sealing away the threat to their world, they could suppress the Breach while Ellie’s Mark went to work. Cassandra was certain she could get Lord Seeker Lucious to listen to reason if she could just sit down and have a civilized conversation with him for even a moment.

Leliana was amimate about going to the Mages of the Rebelllion. Their power combined with Ellie’s Mark would surely close the Breach for good, and it would bring the Mages back into the fold. Josephine was of a mind to agree with her, Grand Enchanter Fiona had reached out to Ellie very intentionally, inviting her to meet with the Mages in Redcliff—whereas the Templars and their leader had openly shunned the Inquisition and denounced them in front the Chantry.

Ellie just wanted someone to pick already. At this point she’d kiss the bare, hairy bottom of the most Templary Templar that ever Templared or the bloodiest Blood Mage just to put an end to the cycle of breakfast, War Room, arguing, lunch in the War Room while still arguing, arguing after lunch, dinner time! Oh! But wait! They’re still in the War Room arguing over dinner! Instead of dessert, they get more arguing! And then maybe someone (usually Cassandra) remembers that Ellie actually likes sleeping now that she can actually get some, and she gets to limp back to her cabin for some peace and quiet. Limping, because her legs are numb from staying in the same spot around the War Table all day. At this rate, she was tempted to keep a spoon from breakfast, use it to dig an escape tunnel. Somehow, she didn’t think Flissa’s spoons would break through Chantry concrete, but a girl could dream.

It was the third day of such deliberations when Ellie finally realized there was only one other voice in the War Room, and they hadn’t picked a side. This was followed up by the thought that…well, did there even really need to be a side?

We are asking you to represent the Inquisition, as the Herald of Andraste. We would use that status, and your efforts with the Inquisition to help bring peace to Thedas end this war between Mages and Templars.

Cassandra had said that, back when all this started. She said that Justinia reinstated the Inquisition to bring the Mages and the Templars back together.

“We already have Fiona on our side—” Leliana was half-shouting.

“And an invitation to the city her followers took ransom is hardly being on our side!” Cullen was full shouting, that awful vein up the center of his forehead seemed fitting to burst. “For all we know this could be a tra—”

“Why choose,” Ellie said suddenly.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra questioned.

“What do you mean, my lady?” Josephine asked.

Ellie realized she’d been staring into space, and she blinked, looking up to scan the faces of all her Advisors. Oh Maker, she hadn’t actually meant to say anything out loud just yet, she’d only just had the thought, and it…was probably crazy.

But something in her magic said to just go for it.

“Divine Justinia reinstated the Inquisition to mend the rift between Mages and Templars,” she looked to Cullun, “Templars can suppress the Breach—but I’m still…I mean I’m young, my Magic isn’t fully mature, and the Mark uses my power to fuel it, even with a hundred Templars my power might not be enough to close the Breach by myself.” And then to Leliana, “Likewise, even with all the Mages in Ferelden, the Breach might be too strong.”

It was Cassandra who Ellie turned to, imploring her, “This, the Breach it could bring us all back together don’t you think? We shouldn’t choose, when we could approach both. Make the Mages and the Templars work together under the flag of the Inquisition, to suppress the Breach, and fuel my Mark, and seal that thing for good.”

“I mean, wouldn’t picking a side cause further division?” she continued when she was met with, what she hoped was thought-filled, silence. “Justinia wanted them brought back together, and with a threat such as this… I think it would be a rather fitting revenge against the person who created the Breach, if what they thought would destroy us actually brought us together and made us stronger.”

“You have the invitation readily available to go to Redcliffe at any time, my lady,” Josephine said, not entirely rebutting, just reminding her there was still work to be done, even more so if she wanted to do something like this, “approaching the Templars will require more renown, more noble allies gathered together to beseech the Lord Seeker to let us have talks of getting their aid.”

“Then we get more renown,” Ellie said. “I mean our work is hardly done here. There are still Rifts everywhere. We’ll keep working and reach out to both parties once we’re ready.”

Cullen looked thoughtful for a moment and then said, “…that does sound almost feasible. Am I alone in thinking this?”

“Wait,” Ellie said, her magic doing a happy little jolt in her blood, “oh Maker is that one yes?” she asked him.

“Yes,” Cullen affirmed, then prompted, “Cassandra? Leliana, Josephine?”

“I believe with more acclaim, we could indeed approach both parties,” Lady Josephine agreed. “It would take great care to traverse the order in which we do so, and who we take to represent the Inquisition, but…yes, I think we could do this.”

“As do I,” said Leliana.

Then Cassandra, “And I.”

Woah woah woah woah wait.

“For yeses? I’m not hallucinating, did we just make a decision on this?” Ellie asked excitedly, bouncing in place a little.

Her advisors looked to one another and there was one unanimous, “Yes!”

“Ha ha! Whoo!” Ellie pumped her fist in excitement, and then flushed when she realized that was just a bit too excited possibly, it might seem rude. “Sorry, it’s just…well I was worried I’d die an old woman in this War Room, still listening to your ghosts screaming at each other.”

“My Lady, we did not scream,” Josephine was quick to say.

“Oh come now Josie, you nearly bit my head off yesterday and we were arguing for the same side,” Leliana corrected.

“A lady does not scream. She declares.”

“Can we declare this War Room meeting adjourned?” Ellie asked. “Did I use that right? Adjourned?” she’d heard Solas use it once, in a similar context—and the Elf Apostate was also the one who explained what the word ‘context’ meant, so she was pretty sure she said it right.
The adults seemed to consider it a moment and then,

“Yes you did, and yes we can,” Cullen said.

“Yes, thank you, thank you, thank you!” Ellie enthused, going around the War Table then, popping up on her toes before each advisor and kissing them on the cheek, “Thank you,” Lady Josie, “Thank you,” Leliana, “Thank you!” Commander Cullen, “and thank you!” Cassandra, who shook her head at her antics.

“Can I go now?” she asked then, way too amped up—they said yes! They had a plan! Sort of! Ahh! “I haven’t felt the sun on my skin in days, I’ve forgotten Varric’s face. Will my friends even recognize me?”

Lady Josephine seemed amused as she said, “We can handle things from here. You know the locations we’ve been receiving reports from of Rifts?” she asked, to which Ellie nodded—Cassandra had kept her updated. “Good, think on where you’d like to go next to garner more attention from noble allies,” she gestured for the door, “You may go see the sun.”

The next time Bull wanted someone to play messenger bird, he could send Stitches—at least he was Ferelden, he’d be used to this weather, wouldn’t he? All Krem’d done was agree that the Ben-whatever-eth’s orders for Chief’s next job would be good fights for a good cause, “if you think it’ll be such a good time, you won’t mind delivering the contract”. Maker’s ass, it was freezing. Ugh, he could practically hear Chief cracking a joke, calling him ‘Kremsicle’. He’d show him Kremsicle. Put his cold frozen foot right up his Qunari ass! He had to run this missive to the dead end of nowhere, ‘Haven’, and then trek all the way to the Storm Coast; where it would be, surprise surprise, storming. At least that meant it would be warm enough to rain instead of this cold, frozen, hellscape of never ending snow.

It was strange to think when he’d been a little—when he’d been young, he wished for snow. They didn’t get it a lot, in Tevinter. Not where he’d lived anyway. It snowed once, when he was maybe ten, because some nut-case Laetan thought they could up their status—prove they were actually an Altus—by performing a magical feat so great, there could be no mistaking their connection to the Old Gods. Whatever they’d been trying to do, some world-ending storm spell, just made it snow a little around a small section of the city. He could remember his mother bursting into his room that afternoon—he’d thought she’d come for round two of the row they’d had that day—but she’d been excited to show him the fluffy white coating the ground, the soft flakes still falling from the sky. She’d laid with him in the middle of their street and taught him how to make a ‘snow angel’.

That had been a good day. One of the best he’d had with his mother.

But that snow had melted rather quickly once the spell wore off, the cool of it refreshing in the summer heat. This snow was just frigid and wet, and filling his boots. Worst of all, the cold had given him a cold.

He couldn’t bind when he had a cold. Too dangerous, Stitches insisted. And it was, Krem had that learned the hard way a while back. Binding too much or at all when he was sick, even with just a stupid little cold, only made it worse, and could even turn into pneumonia if he got stupid about it.
It shouldn’t have been that bad—his armor was solid, provided smoothness to the appearance of his chest no matter that he was sans-binder, in fact sometimes he didn’t bother. But by the time he reached Haven he was sick, and tired, and hadn’t actually used his voice in a long while, not since stopping to ask for directions at the last sign of civilization several miles back. So, when he’d finally spoken, to the guardsmen at Haven’s Chantry doors his voice came out…well, not the way he was used to. Too soft, and too high. It got under his skin a bit, just a bit.

“’scuse me, I’ve a message for the Inquisition. My boss said to get it into the hands of your Ambassador?”

“Ambassador Montilyet’s office is down the hall, last door on the left,” a guardsman said, helpfully.

_Cool._

But when he actually made to enter the chantry, helpful guards were no longer helpful. They halted him. “No one’s permitted to enter.”

…was he speaking Qunlat or something? Had they not just had a conversation about this? Clearing his throat, he tried again, “…I have a message for your Ambassador—last door on the left, you said?”

“You’ll have to wait,” a guardsman said, “No one’s permitted to enter the Chantry while the Herald is in with her Advisors.”

And he hated this Herald already. Maker’s breath could he not catch a break? He just wanted to be _done_ with this, message delivered, off to bash some baddies’ heads in with Bull, the stupid lout. Bastard owed him for this trip big time.

“Look I-”

The doors swung open then, and the guardsmen stood at attention.

An Elf woman was walking out of the Chantry, arm in arm with…well. Maker.

A young Human woman, younger than Krem but…not by much if the way was filling out that tunic was any indication. She had to be Lady of something or other, she was dressed well enough, deep blue tunic and leggings that brought out the green in her eyes. Olive skin, little freckles dusting her cheeks, curly ginger hair trapped in a braid that ran along the side of her face, laying over her shoulder, falling just past the curve of her chest. She looked like…Maker she looked like she _made_ joy, happiness just sort of rolled off of her. She was _excited_ about something, the biggest smile on her face, it reached her eyes. She seemed to be sort of vibrating with exuberance as she squeezed the arm of the woman next to her in a hug.

“…_believe_ they they said yes! Oh!” she was saying as she emerged from the Chantry, and then she looked up like she was looking for someone, and her eyes went to him for a moment before she directed that blinding smile at him as she said, “Hello there, can I help you with something?” she asked pleasantly.

“Excuse me,” he said, immediately clearing his throat again—not low enough still. His eyes only left her for a moment when the guardsmen put their hands on the hilt of their swords—not drawing on him yet, just making sure he didn’t mean harm. He stood relaxed though, and his voice was back to normal when he continued, “I’ve a message for the Inquisition, but I’m having a hard time getting anyone to let me deliver it.”
The girl didn’t reply to him at first, her earlier exuberance calmed as she gave a questioning look to the guards.

“Security protocol, my Lady,” a guardsman said.

She looked to Krem then and smiled apologetically. “Sorry about that, I hope you haven’t been waiting long. Who’s your message for?”

“The Ambassador…Montiliyet I think her name is.” Was it her name?

Apparently not, but that was even better, because she said, “Oh! Josie’s busy right now, but if you’re willing to wait she shouldn’t be too terribly much longer,” she leaned forward then, whispering conspiratorially, “the Advisor’s shouting match is done for the day.”

Waiting, somehow that didn’t sound as bad as he found it moments ago.

“I can wait,” he said. Damned mucus had him sniffling quietly.

“Oh well you certainly shouldn’t wait out here, it’s freezing. Are you hungry?”

The girl leveled him a brilliant smile, big, and he found the cold didn’t bother him so much anymore. “Great! Marehis and I were just about to grab a bite to eat if you’d care to join us. It’s… oh, what time is it?” she asked.

Marehis must be the Elf woman, who looked at a watch on her wrist and said, “Half past three, my lady.”

“Lunch rush is over then, the others probably won’t be hanging around still,” the girl said, sounding a little disappointed. But then she shrugged it off, “Oh well, come on um…oh, I haven’t asked your name,” she said as if she felt badly for it.

“Cremisius Aclassi,” he said, with what he hoped was reassuring grin, “Cremisius is a handsome name,” she complimented sweetly. Handsome, oh that was nice, even if it was just in regard to his name, it was a good sign he hadn’t er…well, that his initial vocal flub hadn’t left her with the wrong impression.

“May I ask your name?”

She extended a gloved hand to him and said, “I’m Ellie, it’s a pleasure to meet you.” Ellie.

“The pleasure’s mine,” he said, as he took her hand, the girl squeezing his in a shake. Her cheeks went a little pink, but that was probably because he had her chatting in the snow. If he was cold, she had to be too—she’d even said it was freezing just a moment ago—she had long sleeves but that didn’t make up for the lack of a proper coat. She was dressed well enough, so he couldn’t imagine she didn’t own one, but perhaps she’d forgotten it? He didn’t have one, didn’t usually need it though the weather in these parts had him seriously reconsidering that, but he’d have offered it if he did. He hadn’t seen any signs for a tavern, so he wasn’t sure how long they’d have to walk in the cold.

“Come along then, Cremisius Aclassi, Flissa should still have some lunch left over, or dinner underway,” she said as she pulled her hand away. But then she offered him her arm and she led him away from the Chantry. “If not, worse case scenario,” she was already walking right “Beside him, but she leaned in closer to say, as if it were some secret she was about to trust him with, “Marehis puts snacks in my pockets before long meetings,” she told him with a girlish giggle. Then straightened up and said, “We ended things a bit earlier today than I thought we would, so if you’re a fan of shortbread, I’ve got plenty to share.”

Yeah, he was pretty sure she could offer him straight up poison and he’d suddenly be a fan.

“That’s very generous of you,” he said.

They’d reached what he supposed was the tavern then—it hadn’t been far, that was good—and he stepped ahead of her to push open the door, unlinking their arms so he could gesture for she and her…handmaid? to enter first.

“Quite the gentleman,” the Elf, Marehis said, sounding pleased as she and her Lady entered the tavern, Krem right behind them.

It was a nice little set up. Nothing fancy, just a small single room with a little bar, a few tables and chairs but it was clean, well lit, and warm. There were only two other occupants—a Human woman with short red hair wiping down the bar (Bull’d piss himself!) and a blonde Elf woman with a bowl-cut snoozing away in a chair seated in the opposite corner.

“Oh! Is she alright?” Ellie asked sounding alarmed when she saw the dozing Elf, and she looked to Marehis for explanation.

“Ahh, I forgot to inform you, Sera’s taken to sleeping in the tavern. She’s claimed it as her quarters.”

Ellie looked distraught at that. “Surely we haven’t run out of room? My cabin’s big enough for more than—”

“You needn’t fret so, da’len, we have plenty of room still. Sera sleeps here because it’s where she’s most comfortable, she says.”

“Really?” she asked doubtfully, examining the sleeping Elf. “Well, she seems zonked out. Maybe we could arrange for a bedroll or a cot, and move the side table by the door someplace else so it isn’t in the way when she’s using it…does Varric have a desk? He could probably use one, that table isn’t used for eating or anything it just sort of sits there anyway.”

Varric?

“I’m sure Master Tethras would appreciate one, certainly. I’ll bring it up with Flissa, why don’t you two find a seat,” Marehis suggested as she left them to go speak with the woman at the bar.

Oh, Tethras…the Dwarf? Yeah, that was the bloke that wrote that book on the Champion of Kirkwall. Krem had read it, it wasn’t half-bad. Strange to find him working for the Inquisition, though.

Ellie looked to him again, “Sorry, I didn’t mean to ignore you or anything. Sera’s new, and I haven’t been able to check-in much on how she’s settling, or Vivienne very much either…” she looked as if she were about to call something to Marehis, but the woman was already answering over her shoulder.

“Madam de Fer sends her regards, and is ‘settling in splendidly, thank that dear girl for inquiring, she’s an absolute treasure’, she said to tell you.”
“Oh gosh,” Ellie’s cheeks went pink again, and then to Krem, “Alright, I’m focused now. Table!” oh she was focused now, had this determined look on her face like it was a mission of the utmost importance, it was cute. “We usually sit by the fire if that’s alright with you.”

Sweet Maker, fire sounded amazing right now, the tavern was nice and warm, but he felt a sort of relief in his bones as he took a seat across the table from Ellie just before the hearth.

“So, what brings you to Haven?” Ellie asked conversationally once they were settled. There was that blush again, and she bit her lip before saying, “Oh gosh, you said already, a letter. But um, well can you say what for? It’s alright if its private.”

He wasn’t about to go talking about the Chief’s private business, but this wasn’t that. In fact, if Ellie was some noble ally for the Inquisition, having her interested in their work may lend to them getting the job. Plus, they could always use the advertisement. “I work for a mercenary company, The Bull’s Chargers. Our leader, Iron Bull, wants to help out with the Breach, and sent me to bring a proposal to your Ambassador. Hire us on, to help as only we can—there are loads of things we can get done as a mercenary crew with no official Chantry or government ties, that the Inquisition may not be able to do on its own without compromising alliances or political interests.”

“You’re a mercenary then? Do you like your job?”

Maker, that was a sweet question, asked in earnest like it mattered to her that his job made him happy of all things. “The Chargers’s the best crew of people I’ve ever worked with, its an honor to serve with them. Fights are always good, so’s the money, so I can’t complain.” He could. He did. But he was blessed enough to know he shouldn’t, might not if he were the type who took things too seriously. Everyone in the company had their complaints, it was the way of things, it wasn’t like any of them actually hated their jobs. They loved it, and at the end of the day, loved each other like a bizarre mis-matched family—most of them, anyway. Closest thing to family Krem had had in a while. When bits of it were unpleasant, like this little jaunt out to Haven, yeah, he wasn’t going to be real chipper about it, but that was just…Human. And Elven, and Dwarven, and even Qunari-en if he considered his crewmate’s griping. Chief’s bellyaching gave all of their whinging a run for its money.

Though, he’d lost all reason to complain now. Warm fire, nice company, and he could smell the food—if the Inquisition hired them on, they were in for a decent set up. He just hoped Bull didn’t terrify the locals. Hmm, especially Ellie. She seemed a little younger than him and she was on the smaller side, and a Human. A great honking, loud-mouth Qunari hanging around might scare her, especially if she heard about his thing for red-heads. Bull wasn’t a total slag or anything, Krem’d give him a heads up about her age and he’d know his place.

“Wow, that’s really cool! Do you usually work in Ferelden? Your accent sounds Tevinter,” she was saying then.

Ahh. “I’m from Tevinter, originally, yes,” he responded, quickly. He didn’t talk much about it. “The Chargers come from all over.”

“Oh neat! I’ve never been to Tevinter, but closeish—a little ways into Nevarra once or twice—and I’ve been to Hasmal*. I’m from the Free Marches.”

Hasmal. Huh, that’s where he’d been heading when he ran into Bull. Never made it there of course, but it did make him wonder if he’d just narrowly missed the opportunity to meet her then. It also made him wonder what a noblewoman would be doing in a place like that, though after seeing her care of others in Haven, he thought perhaps it’d been some sort of missionary work or something.
She was a Marcher, that seemed to fit the accent. “We just came from there—we’ve been working our way around the Free Marches coast into Orlais and back ‘round the Ferelden side. Company’s heading for a job on the Storm Coast now.”

Ellie looked concerned about that. “Really? Please, be careful there, we’ve had awful reports of Rifts in that area—the Storm Coast.”

Reports. He wasn’t entirely sure what Ellie was in the Inquisition—she’d welcomed him straight away and seemed concerned about how the new girl Sera and someone named Vivienne were settling in, thinking of things like maybe Varric could use a writing desk. Was she some sort of manager, or welcoming committee, or something? That would be surprising, a noblewoman not only joining up with a thing like the Inquisition, but then to act in service of its members regardless of their status—that Sera was definitely a commoner, and Krem wasn’t a king or anything—well, that said a lot about her, he thought. But now she was talking like she was involved in the information part of the Inquisition—having access to reports the Inquisition got on places with active Rifts. Chief had gotten similar reports too. Krem couldn’t imagine Ellie worked in a similar capacity as Bull. She seemed a bit too honest for that. She said she’d been in the Advisor’s meeting for the Herald. She certainly wasn’t the Templar man Bull’d been told about, a Seeker, Spymaster, or Ambassador Montilyet. Had she just been a guest or something? Did she work for one of the Advisors?

“We’ve heard rumors about them, everyone’s on the look out and’ll stay clear,” he promised her. Calling them rumors wasn’t a lie necessarily—if he considered Bull’s sharing his Ben-Hessrath reports as gossip, which from Bull it basically was. Besides he couldn’t outright say anything about the Ben-Hessrath to her, but he could tell her this way, and she seemed to feel better. The fact they would be careful made her smile with relief.

“Good,” she said, “I’m glad.”

She’d asked about him so, “Where were you from, in the Free Marches?” he asked.

“Oh well…” she seemed to give it some thought, “I traveled around a lot growing up. Never really kept to the same place. Haven’s been the first place I’ve ever stayed in long-term.”

That was surprising. “Really? Does your family deal in trade or something?” That might explain her work—some nobles did roll up their sleeves and dig in to the family business, it wasn’t common, but it also wasn’t entirely unheard of.

But she shook her head. “Oh, no. It’s always just been me, no family, and definitely no trade, oh gosh, that’d be lux wouldn’t it?” she breezed.

Oh wow. Always just her? Some problems, having money could fix—he knew that for certain, especially since he didn’t come from wealth himself. But he also knew what it was like to lose family. He couldn’t imagine any amount of money that would make up for the loss of loved ones. “You seem to have done well enough for yourself, my Lady,” he commended gently.

She shrugged. “I’m…oh. Oh are you thinking…,” she stopped and then restarted her sentence to clarify, “I’m not nobility or anything, the ‘lady’ thing is just…I dunno, politeness, or something. Everyone’s just been calling me that since I got here,” she looked over his shoulder then, and said, “Why does everyone call me ‘my lady’? I don’t think I’ve asked.”

“It’s appropriate for your station,” Marehis said as she came up from behind him to stand at the end of the table and place two plates of food down before them, potatoes and meat loaf, which actually looked pretty good, especially considering he’d had to gnaw through the charred block of weird meat Skinner wordlessly burned up to Bull’s claim that it was ‘meatloaf’ every once in a while. The woman they called Flissa followed after with a third plate she sat in front of the empty chair next to Ellie, which Marehis took a seat in then as she said, “Think of it as a shorter way of saying ‘my Lady Herald’.”

…“Lady Herald?” Krem asked, uncertainly.

It was strange how quickly his thoughts flipped, righted themselves, and flipped again. He thought Ellie a noblewoman, then been corrected—thought she was just a well-off commoner—and then…Maker, Herald?

Oh, he certainly didn’t hate this Herald at all, then.

Maker, he’d been chatting her up. Had he made an ass of himself? Was he still making an ass of himself? He was pretty sure his soul was damned now, he’d all but laid eyes on Andraste’s Herald and he’d…Maker he’d checked her out.

How many verses of the Chant would he need to recite? Did he need to find a Chantry Father*? Oh, but it was Mother in the South, right? Men were either Clerics or Brothers or something.

“Are you alright?” Ellie was asking then, left hand reaching out to lay on his forearm resting on the table. That was supposed to be the Marked one, right? Thick leather gloves were no help deciphering that though, no matter how hard he stared.

“I-I apologize, Lady Herald, I didn’t realize uh, well,” and he was making an ass of himself. Bull would never let him live this down if he heard.

But Ellie smiled again, gently. “It’s okay, I know I’m not what a lot of people expect when they hear the name. Josie and Cassandra—Seeker Pentaghast—they’re always introducing me as ‘Eleanor’, because that sounds more Herald-y than plain ‘Ellie’.”

Huh. Did it? “I think Ellie’s a beautiful name. Pretty, and cute. It suits you.”

Her face actually went red at that and she looked shy at the compliment as she murmured a bashful, “Thanks.”—he’d’ve been embarrassed for saying something so forward, except she seemed flattered.

“Anyway, a lot of people don’t quite believe it till they see it, so,” she removed her hand from his arm and used her other to remove the glove from it before laying her hand palm-up on the table.

The Mark was…weird, definitely weird but beautiful. Almost like the Rifts they’d seen in their travels, but those had seemed like death and doom. This one was small, and the Fadelight was oddly comforting. Perhaps because it was a Mark meant to close those damned things. Or maybe because it was wielded by someone like Ellie.

Oh Maker. This girl, shorter than Krem by almost a foot, was small like her Mark. He didn’t think his hands were the largest, but bigger than hers—she was slender and fine-boned, like it would take seven of her to make one Iron Bull. And here she was, the Herald Bull had heard about, been going on about since word of her reached his bosses back in Par Vollen. The Herald of Andraste that faced the Breach, went around the Hinterlands sealing Rifts—getting right up on them, slaying the demons and sealing them away with her Mark—and saving refugees, cutting off all the Templar and rogue Mage bullshit happening down there. The woman who’d stood up to some high-up Templar dick when she addressed the Clerics in Val Royeaux, had spread division among her critics in the Chantry. Chief had actually cackled when he read that report, was of half a mind to deliver the contract to Haven himself just to see her first hand.

And seeing her first hand, there was what the Ben-Whatnot reports lacked, what Krem himself had witnessed in his time in Haven. She came back to Inquisition headquarters, dealt with War Room meetings and who knows what else, and worried after others in her camp—if they had places to sleep, or to write. She’d just ended her work for the day, found Krem and immediately set about making him welcome and ensuring he didn’t have to wait in the snow for that Lady Josephine.

“Maker,” he swore.

He half expected her to put her glove back on, but instead she took off her other one. Oh, it was probably easier to eat. He almost did the same, but he liked his gloves on, usually didn’t take them off except to clean them, or his hands.

“ Weird, huh?” Ellie asked, as if sympathetic—like she expected him to be uncomfortable with her Mark and was okay with that.

“It’s just different,” he said. “Different isn’t bad.” In her case it was world-saving good.

That got him another smile.

They turned on their food then, and Maker above, it was good and warm. Ellie filled Marehis in on the fact that Krem was here to deliver a contract from his mercenary company, and that resulted in the Elf woman making polite conversation with him—just as inquisitive as Ellie, only her questions weren’t so much about whether he enjoyed his job or not, and more so about the work itself. He was happy to answer her questions and hell, if he thought Ellie’d had influence in the Inquisition before, he knew she would likely have final say in whether or not they got the job. When they finished their food, Ellie made to take their plates but Marehis beat her to it, insisting she sit and chat, and when the Elf woman returned, she did so bearing three mugs of coffee. He wasn’t sure if he was more surprised at how good it was—coffee among the Chargers was hit and miss, a hit when Grimm or Bull played barista, and a major miss if Dalish or Rocky took on the role—or by the fact Ellie accepted the pitch-black liquid with a blinding grin and immediately set about drinking it, no sugar, no cream. Even Chief usually put…ugh…what he called ‘krem’ in his coffee most days. But Krem figured it was mostly his need to be tirelessly punny, rather than the Qunari oaf really needing the bitter drink sweetened to stomach it.

Krem personally found pun-less coffee easier to stomach, himself.

Flissa’s coffee was excellent, warmed him head to toe, though that got a bit embarrassing as it made his nose run. Marehis politely pointed it out to him and he made to cover his nose, but Ellie handed him a handkerchief, dark green with a silvery E embroidered in it.

“Apologies, my lady,” he said, he didn’t want snot all over his face in front of her, but neither did he like soiling something that belonged to her with it.

But she was shaking her head, looking mildly concerned about something. “Don’t worry about it. Go ahead and keep it in case you need it later. Do you have a cold, Cremisius? You’ve a bit of a cough,” she said, and then she leaned across the table—Marehis shaking her head a bit as Ellie narrowly missed knocking into her coffee cup because her Elf friend moved her mug out of the way—and placed her warm, unmarked hand on Krem’s forehead. “I don’t think you have a fever or anything, so that’s good.”

“Just a little cold, it’s nothing to worry about,” he assured her as she pulled her hand away.

Her eyes went a little wide at that, “But it is!” she implored him with some level of urgency. “Healer Adan is just up the way, he’d gladly treat you. Well, gladly in his own way—he’s a bit of a grump but good all the same.”

His face actually felt a bit clammy now. No Healer. Not someone new, anyway.

“Oh, uh, that isn’t necessary, really,” he insisted, something on the verge of panicky he resented in his voice.

Ellie looked at him for a moment, deciding something and then she turned to the Elf. “Would you mind, Marehis?”

“What shall I ask for?” Marehis questioned.

“Embrium, liquid-form,” Ellie requested, “clove tincture too, if he has it.”

“Of course. I’ll return shortly,” the Elf said as she rose to her feet, though she looked at Krem for a moment and said, “You are to ensure my lady is safe.”

Oh. Something sort of clicked then, Chief’d give him a hard time for not figuring it out sooner, its not like the signs weren’t all right there. He’d thought Marehis was just Ellie’s friend or something, she obviously was, but she was also her guard. He could see just the faintest of outlines at her hips, concealed daggers. The way she moved, the way she had her eye on just about everything—she was a trained, professional bodyguard. You wouldn’t know it unless you knew what to look for, and when to look for it. Ellie was the Herald, there had to be loads of people after her.

Oh, and that thought made him sort of sick. While there were more and more people all the time singing the Herald’s praises, there were people everywhere that hated and had a vendetta against the Herald of Andraste. Hated Ellie. Wished her tortured and killed.

This Adan must certainly be close by, and Marehis seemingly decided Krem himself wasn’t a threat, at least he hoped so—otherwise she wasn’t as good a guardswoman as she seemed, leaving her ward even at Ellie’s own say-so?

But Krem would beat the hell out of anyone that made a move to hurt her. “I will,” he promised. Marehis looked him in the eye for a moment more and then nodded. She was off, out the door they’d come through, he could see her racing up the steps as the door swung closed behind her.

There were two doors to the Tavern, on walls adjacent to each other, so Krem turned in his seat so his back was to the fire and he could keep watch over the entrances see out the few windows in the tavern. Flissa was in his peripheral, though he supposed the woman was to be trusted, she handled the Herald’s food after all. When Ellie addressed him, he kept the entrances in his view as he looked her way. She was leaning in closer, speaking softly—her eyes went over to the bar as if to ensure Flissa was still behind it, washing dishes and humming to herself before she asked, very softly,

“Does your chest hurt, or feel tight at all?”

She seemed to want her questions private, so he shook his head no, in response. It didn’t.
Ellie nodded. “And you’ve been stretching, right? Every few hours?”

Stretching? He spared her a confused look for a moment and then she explained. Or more rather, she demonstrated.

Ellie leaned back in her seat to sit up straight and stretched her arms up over her head, crossing her wrists and twisting a bit side to side to stretch out her chest and upper back in demonstration, coughing lightly before lowering her arms to repeat the stretch downward. Oh. The movement was kind of distracting when she did it, kind of...

He almost didn’t realize it was the way he was supposed to after every few hours of binding.

“Ahh,” he cleared his throat a bit, it felt a little tight. Just when had she realized? She was obviously not shaming him or reacting badly or anything.

Oh. Maker. She wasn’t reacting badly at all.

Her insistence he get his cold dealt with, and the compromise, that he didn’t have to go to this Adan she mentioned. Keeping her questions related to his binding vague and quietly spoken between them—she even waited to ask such questions for when her Marehis wasn’t around, respecting his privacy. She knew, and what was more, she understood, was worried that he didn’t realize how serious sickness could get when binding—she assumed he was under his armor—but knew he mightn’t be comfortable with the potential threat of outing himself to some healer he’d never met before or anyone else for that matter.

His stomach got sort of queasy—not like he was going to be sick or anything, just, like he was overwhelmed or uncertain, like he was just one misstep from going headlong into a trap. He wasn’t sure if he was upset that she had been able to tell or if he was relieved at the prospect that he didn’t have to agonize over a future reaction. She knew from the get-go and it hadn’t phased her. That was…nice.

“Yeah, I keep track,” he said then.

“Good,” she said, smiling as she relaxed. “I have a friend who used to get horrible chest congestion and coughing spells because he’d forget to stretch. He’s an Apostate so finally he got this little silver pendent on a chain he wore under his shirt and he spelled it to vibrate at the top of every couple hours during the day to remind him.”

Oh, that made him feel a lot better actually. It wasn’t him, it was her—like when he realized he should have pegged Marehis as her guard. He’d known what to look for in that regard, and so had she, in this. The outright acceptance…he’d only found it before in Bull, and then the Chargers. Much different from his life in Tevinter.

Krem sat up straighter in his seat, alert, though he saw it was only Marehis again, her hands full of glass bottles and a jar, which she placed on the table.

Maybe new healers weren’t so bad after all, he thought. Not with Ellie playing the role, anyway. She took up the glass bottles and came around to sit in the chair right beside Krem’s, scooting close so her knees were between his. He might not have had a fever earlier but now his face and neck felt a little warm. More so when, after she asked politely if he minded (he didn’t), her fingers searched the lymph nodes (Adan’s words, she said—Stitches too, he did this when Chargers were feverish) under his jawline, very top of his throat, gently pressing to see if there was any inflammation there that could indicate he was worse off than he thought. She gave him a relieved smile when there was no tightness or swelling to be found. He almost didn’t pay attention as she started handing him a vial of potion to drink—cold medicine, that smelled and tasted like what Stitches gave them, so that was okay. Ellie had to stand then, to drip a few drops of that clove stuff—explaining that it would fend off anything making him sick and numb his sore throat. He tilted his head back and she carefully administered three drops to the back of his throat, which was excellent—almost immediately he lost the feeling there was a tiny Qunari raking his stupid horns along the inside of his throat.

Ellie pulled the jar over then and removed the lid.

“Oh,” she said, sniffing the translucent salve lightly, “Adan won’t mind if this is for keeps, right?” she asked Marehis who nodded, “Good, I’ll make him more, promise,” she said as she closed up the jar and handed it to Krem. “You should take this with you when you leave, alright? It’ll help you breathe easier and should keep you from getting any sort of chest congestion. It’s just Embrium salve, you should put a little here,” she pointed to her own chest, the center plane of bone just beneath the visible dip of collar bone at the base of her throat, “before you go to sleep.”

Eyes up, you berk! “Thank you,” he said, meeting her eyes and nodding. He shifted so he could put the small, squat jar into the leather bag at his hip, holding his supply of potion. He wondered if Stitches knew how to make this stuff, it sounded dead useful.

Someone new came bursting through the door then, Krem saw armor and fast movement out of the corner of his eye and rose to his feet, hand on the hilt of his sword, partially drawn as he stood between Ellie the the newcomer.

But it was just a scout who went right up to Marehis’s side, “Ambassador Montilyet is available now.”

Marehis was looking at Krem, an amused smile at her lips over his reaction. Oh. He’d sort of forgotten Marehis was back watching over Ellie, and her being an Elf, she probably heard the scout coming before they even made it to the Tavern, knew who it was before they approached her lady.

“Very good,” Marehis said, though she was looking to Krem as she said it, like she was telling him so, and simultaneously offering a response to the Scout, who nodded and took their leave.

Krem relaxed and turned to find Ellie was standing now, putting her gloves on and offering him her Marked hand, “Come on, I’ll introduce you,” she said.

When all was said and done, the letters and contract from Bull were delivered—not yet signed, but there, waiting. Lady Josephine Montilyet seemed nice enough, Chief’d definitely like her. He’d like Ellie too.

Damn, Ellie had been something else. Beautiful and kind. His cold was better, and she made sure he was sent off with job well done, good news for Bull, a meal packed away for the road from Flissa’s—the short bread she offered to share with him before carefully wrapped and tucked into the warm ceramic container as well—and his tankard full of fresh water. She and Marehis walked him to Haven’s gate and had seen him safely off, Marehis seeing fit to offer him directions on a short cut he could traverse since he was on his own, to the Storm Coast. She was of a good sort.

And the conversation with the Ambassador had gone smoothly, Ellie introduced Krem, as she’d said she would, ‘This is Cremisus Aclassi, he works for a Mercenary company that would like the Inquisition to consider hiring them on’. Lady Josephine launched right in to a few questions about Bull’s company and when and where to come watch them in action.

_Ellie_ was going to watch them in action. She said something about having decided on where she and her party were going next to Lady Josephine—apparently, they’d been considering going to the Storm Coast soon to seal the Rifts there and look for signs of Warden activity.

Krem left Haven looking _forward_ to getting to the Storm Coast. He wanted a piece of the action, and he definitely wanted to help make the impression that got them hired on to the Inquisition.

---

Eleanor was rather exuberant about going to a place as abysmal as the Storm Coast. Cassandra was not necessarily looking forward to the venture, but she was going all the same. Varric griped but that did not stop him from being at Haven’s gates ready to go when it was time to leave, right along with Solas, and Sera who actually offered to go as well—she’d heard the name ‘Iron Bull’ and wanted to see. Blackwall volunteered as well, as he knew the area, apparently, and wanted to help in their search for signs of Wardens.

Madam de Fer politely declined, which was not at all surprising. It was just as well, six of them going to the Storm Coast was more than enough. Though what was surprising was the fact that Madam de Fer decided to go with Marehis, on her mission.

Marehis was going to Orlais again—Leliana and Josephine had found something as to the source of those strange blue glowing stones Eleanor had discovered using those horrible skulls in the Hinterlands. Eleanor wanted to investigate and what they’d uncovered so far was strange and unsettling—miners being lured out in to the farthest deserts of Orlais to some so-called Oasis, only to abandon their post and then…well it seemed a lot of them may well have vanished or gone into hiding. It was concerning enough that when the advisors brought it up to Marehis, the woman volunteered to go along with Scout Harding for an initial sweep of the place before they even considered allowing Eleanor to set foot in the direction of the alleged temple that laid there. The temple and the somehow connected shards were what attracted Madam de Fer, when she examined the shards the Eleanor had collected for the Inquisition, she was intrigued and insisted her magical expertise be brought to bear. Harding would be at base to give the Herald and her party a run-down of the Storm Coast before heading to meet Marehis and Vivienne in the Oasis.

The Elf woman had pulled Cassandra aside before they were to leave Haven and took her to Healer Adan. The man gave her a fresh supply of Eleanor’s potions, instructions on how and when they were to be used, and the three of them discussed how the girl was faring. She was improving all the time, she would still struggle, but Cassandra would say she was beginning to truly flourish in her position as Herald now that she was receiving proper care. When Eleanor had returned to Adan after their stint in Val Royeaux she reported feeling like she had things more in-hand, and given him feedback about the potion he’d made for calming panic attacks—she could take full-doses now, as Adan had tailored the brew to be less potent, they could not have it rendering her so lax she could not defend herself, or that it put her in such deep sleep she could not rise in an Marehis had also seen fit (once they were finished at Adan’s) to inform Cassandra that Eleanor had apparently developed a sort of first-impression crush—which she said Eleanor denied when Marehis teased her about it. But Marehis insisted she knew what she saw, that this Cremisius Aclassi and Eleanor had gotten on well, and he was a very handsome young man. Eleanor was, to coin a phrase the Herald herself had used to while conducting her own matchmaking schemes, ‘totally crushing on him’, and he (in Marehis’s words) had been ‘positively smitten’ with her. Marehis and Cassandra had gone together to consult Solas on the matter, asking him to use his connection to Eleanor to see if she truly was infatuated with the boy, but the Apostate man insisted that he would not break his word to the girl—no prying when she wasn’t in danger—and too the effort would be in vain. He could only perceive of what she was currently feeling in the moment, he would have to catch her at the exact time her focus was of this Cremisius. But it was no matter, Marehis was certain and Cassandra would see for herself.

He was a mercenary, this young man, and they would be investigating how credible his company was. They already had some information about it, their leader The Iron Bull had provided letters of recommendation embossed with official seals from noble houses they’d performed jobs for, which Josephine and Leliana—Cassandra herself, when it came to the few Nevarran ones—had been able to verify the authenticity of. So, if they were a reputable company, honorable in their code, there was nothing inappropriate about his job that might worry them in regard to his character. Marehis said he’d been very vigilant when she test-tasked him with watching over Eleanor for a time, taken the role seriously—some would have allowed the fact they were attracted to Eleanor distract them, put their focus on her as opposed to the potential dangers around her—when she returned to the Tavern, they’d obviously still been chatting amicably, but he was positioned to take in all their surroundings, keeping watch, and prepared to defend her. He’d done nothing to expose himself as a threat overall, though Marehis admitted she would like Cassandra’s eyes on the situation, asked that she see for herself if the boy was suitable for Eleanor.

Cassandra had done her own investigating, carefully, one evening when she and Eleanor laid alone in their tent on the road to the Storm Coast—Sera was off…well she wasn’t quite sure what the Elf girl did, she was in and out at odd hours of the night. But Cassandra hardly wanted the girl yammering away and interfering with her questioning. She didn’t seem to do subtle, this Sera, she was loud, and crude and Cassandra shuddered to think what horrible jokes she may seek to make at Eleanor’s expense. Varric was bad enough with his uncouth jokes, Sera seemed to take things to another, usually phallus-centric level.

Cassandra asked after the person this Iron Bull had sent to the Inquisition. It certainly verified Marehis’s belief in Eleanor’s infatuation. She hadn’t gushed over the boy or anything, but her cheeks pinked in the low lamp light of their tent, and she ducked her head in shyness, a little smile on her lips as she recounted her interaction with Cremisius. Cassandra commented that she hadn’t seen the young man when he’d been in Haven and asked what he looked like. Eleanor bit her lip and lightly commented that he was ‘a cute boy’, she’d a fondness for his eyes apparently, ‘sort of dashing’ and did Cassandra know he worked for a Mercenary company? Yes, she did.

Oh. It tickled Cassandra, the thought of how Varric would be very upset if it turned out he’d missed the initial meeting between Eleanor and her ‘great romantic interest’ for his precious book.

Cassandra herself was greatly displeased when she realized just what it was Sera was out doing to occupy bizarre hours of her evening. The following morning, she found honey had been poured into the boots she’d left outside to air out. They had been filled. To the brim. And Sera could be heard cackling from their tent when the audible squelch slapped the air from Cassandra blindingly shoving a foot into the sucking stick of thick, now insect infested honey.

The Seeker sought to wring that little menace’s scrawny neck. She certainly would have if it weren’t for Eleanor. The girl had taken in the sight of Cassandra, red faced, seething, one foot sucked into a honey filled boot, hand clutching the other boot so tightly honey spilled over the edges and left a trail down her chest plate and leggings.

And she’d laughed. Hard, and fierce, and genuine.

She’d struggled of course, trying to contain her laughter, a hand slapped over her mouth as if that would hide it but…well Cassandra would douse herself, head to toe in the disgustingly sticky substance if it meant Eleanor might laugh like that again. She seemed to be handling her station better but there was always some measure of tightness in her shoulders, an underlying seriousness in her expression when she worked. And the girl did not often have moments where she considered herself not working—during meals sometimes, and during their morning prayer, and even that she considered preparation. Ugh. That awful cycle of sleeping and War Room meetings had been unrelenting, they’d fallen out of the habit, but regained it now that they were back on the road.

Varric had lamented more than once that Eleanor did not know how to relax and have fun—that she did not know it was okay to do such a thing. Cassandra was…oh Maker preserve her, she agreed with the Dwarf.

So, seeing Eleanor so giddy she was practically falling over from the effort, well Cassandra could not hold her laughter against her, and annoyed as she was…she felt some measure of gratitude to that horrible, horrible little Elf.

It had been nice, as well—something like vindication—when Eleanor calmed herself and rounded on Sera, reprimanding the girl for tampering with Cassandra’s equipment. Pranks had their place, Eleanor said, but what if there had been an emergency? Weapons and armor, at least those that belonged to their party members and members of the Inquisition, were off limits for her jokes, she insisted. Sera had begrudgingly agreed and when Eleanor set about helping Cassandra clean up the mess made of her armor, Sera had sat down with them and lent her hand as well which was…a bit useless, the girl wasn’t so underbathed for no reason, her efforts were futile, but she meant well Cassandra supposed. It seemed Sera could be reigned in by Eleanor, to some degree, at least.

All of Eleanor’s companions thus far had become her mentor in some way or another, Cassandra taught her self-defense, Solas Magic, Blackwall horsemanship, Varric…every life skill he took into his head to pass along to the girl, one day it was picking locks, the next it was how to make the ‘ultimate smore’…of course that had been when he’d finally gotten a hold of some chocolate. Even Madam de Fer pulled Lady Josephine aside to discuss a more rigid magical lesson plan, “Surely she cannot learn everything she needs to know from an Apostate Elf” and perhaps Eleanor should be given appropriate lessons in how to survive within the Game, should she ever need to play on behalf of the Inquisition.

Sera, however, she taught Eleanor how to have fun.

Eleanor had begun bonding with the Elf girl, who was by far the closest to her in age out of the whole of their companions coupled with the mentality of an absolute child. But she had Eleanor laughing and making light, silly conversation more in these past few days than she had since Cassandra had met her. It had built to where nearly everything the girl did revolved around her role in the Inquisition, even in her supposed down time. Now as they road along, it was not just that she looked so very young that they knew she was still just a child, it was in her voice and her candor. She wasn’t thinking about the Breach or demons, or danger when Sera drew her into a ridiculous debate over which cloud overhead looked more like some buttocks, or the occasional round of Sera making some sort of bizarre noise for Eleanor to copy, and vice versa, seeing who could make the other laugh first.

Cassandra could have done without the random dancing, Sera just coming up from behind Eleanor when they made camp and pulling her dangerously near to the fire in some frantic musicless nonsense that looked ridiculous—neither of them were suitable for the dance floor as it were, though it did bring to mind that Cassandra should remind Josephine the Herald may have to dance at some point, lessons would be beneficial. A necessity, really. Sera often did this when Eleanor was mid conversation with one of her other companions, though the younger girl usually only danced around a little and then told Sera she was free to continue, but Eleanor really did need to address something important.

However, the Seeker realized perhaps, tactless as the Elf was, as much as she wasn’t one for subtle…Sera did choose carefully, these moments in which she engaged Eleanor in random fun. Always when something pressed so much it might strain the young Herald, burden her more than what was necessary—when the tension in her shoulders tightened beneath the weight of what they were doing, Sera struck, and Eleanor always returned to her work a little lighter for it.

All in all, the annoyance Cassandra felt at Sera’s general presence was…tempered. She did not necessarily like the Elf or her company, was still not wholly certain why Eleanor’s magic had ‘pinged’ upon her initial arrow delivered interaction, but she did feel grateful to her for instilling a bit of childishness into Eleanor’s all too adult routine.

Sera was given some explanation about Eleanor’s Magic—not the full extent of the personal inner workings of it, Eleanor and Cassandra agreed Sera may find the treasure hunting aspect all too interesting. What she was told, was about how Eleanor’s Magic told her when someone was important to the Inquisitions efforts—all but implying that it was a symptom of her Mark interacting with her Magic.

The Elf had gotten flustered when told how Eleanor’s magic had said she would be vital to the Inquisition, and told Eleanor to, “Ping yourself, you!”

That had Eleanor giggling, and then saying, “It pinged about The Iron Bull too, I wonder what he’ll be like? Cremisius says he’s got the finest crew he’s ever served with.”

“The Iron Bull sounds cool. The name anyway. Crem-is-us-is is a stupid name, too much sssss.”

“Ssssssera’s got too much sssssssss if you say it right,” Ellie retorted laughingly.

“Eww, gross, don’t say my name like that! Ugh! Yours dunnit even have S in it. ‘cept maybe it rhymes with Smelly.”

“Oi! I bathe regularly!”

“Cuz you’re so smelly! Stinky Inky!” Sera teased, loudly, and sent Eleanor giggling at the play on that horrendous nickname the Elf had given her—Cassandra hadn’t a clue what ‘Inky’ meant, though the sound of it sent a worry through her that it was short for Inquisitor.

They hadn’t one, for the Inquisition, no true leader that represented them, and Cassandra was rather worried that the Advisors might one day place Eleanor in the role. Being Herald was one thing, an already daunting task in and of itself, it made Cassandra almost sick to even consider further burdening the girl.
In her annoyance, the Seeker had growled, “I will murder you both in your sleep, if you do not let me rest,” from where she lay between the girls in their tent. Serious or no, her threats were met with a pair of giggles, and a soft ‘Whoops! Sorry,’ from Eleanor before she leaned over in her bedroll to kiss Cassandra on the forehead. Ugh. Sweet girl.

“Pleasant dreams,” Eleanor wished her.

Sera snorted. “Someone’s hoping she dreams of Crem-sus-sus-sis!”

“I hope you dream of him then,” Eleanor rebutted, but then she settled down deeper into her covers, and did finally fall asleep—sans sleeping potion, Cassandra was pleased to note. It was reassuring to find the girl did not so heavily rely on potion for peaceful sleep, and she thought then, as annoying as Sera’s banter could be, perhaps it was of some help to Eleanor, that after she cleared her mind with meditation, the Elf girl turned her thoughts to lighter, sillier things before sending her off to sleep. Ugh. Cassandra was not going to have a quiet night this entire trip, was she? Ahh well.

Blackwall was a great deal of help with their journey to the Storm Coast. He had warned them ahead of time that the rain was unrelenting, and Cassandra was gratified that the Warden had seen fit to bring up the issue with Harritt when Eleanor announced their impending journey there—the trip was time sensitive, so their party was informed of the decision immediately and they had left the following morning after that day Eleanor settled their rather harrowing War Room debate. Blackwall and Harritt worked late into the night to fashion and waterproof a matching hood to attach to Eleanor’s armored tunic.

The Warden had also taken it upon himself to manage Eleanor’s hair, in Marehis’s absence. Twice during their journey to the Storm Coast her unruly locks had required washing, and when she was finished bathing, she sat by the fire, hair still damp, and the Warden would pull up a stool and sit behind her, taking a great deal of care in conditioning and combing her hair. He even made some valiant attempt at braiding—he’d apparently sought Marehis’s advice on how to do so, and while his efforts were not quite as elaborate as what the Elf woman could do, Eleanor had been absolutely delighted, thanking him.

It took them little under a week to reach the Storm Coast—though for the last stint into the area, they’d stopped at the last sign of civilization, a little town, and secured safe haven for their horses. Blackwall warned that the Coast held terrible conditions for steeds—the constant rain meant extremely slick, muddy terrain, and the place was full of steep hills that, it would be nice to have a horse to traverse, but ultimately may result in injury for the beasts.

The rain for which the Coast was famous started a mile out from their destination. Ugh. The moment they came in view of their infiltration camp, Eleanor laid eyes on Scout Harding and let out a happy squeal of sorts, rushing down the muddy hillside to meet her. She skidded and slipped, and Cassandra saw the purplish glow of Barrier bouncing at her knees and around her shoulders, Solas using spurts of the spell to counter balance her so she kept upright and unharmed in her descent.

“Oh! Oh my gosh it’s so great to see you again, I’m so glad you’re alright!” the girl was saying as she clasped hands with the Dwarf woman. “I told Master Dennet you asked about him back in the Hinterlands, and he’s even in the Inquisition now, did you hear?”

“I did, I read all the reports about what you’ve done so far in the Hinterlands. Thank you, Herald,” Scout Harding said sincerely.

“Oh gosh, you can call me Ellie, please,” Eleanor insisted.
“Ellie, then. Thank you, home’s really starting to shape up again, and I’m proud to serve those responsible for that,” Scout Harding said, squeezing Eleanor’s hands in her own before looking to the others as they approached. “Nice to see some new faces, thank you for joining on.”

“Yeah! Scout Harding, this is Warden Blackwall,” Eleanor introduced, the old Warden offering a nod of acknowledgment.

“Nice to meet you, Ellie has said great things,” Blackwall said.

“It’s an honor to serve,” Scout Harding replied, bashful.

“And this,” Eleanor said, her voice ringing with some measure of excitement as she reached behind her to grab ahold of Sera’s wrist and bring the Elf girl to her side, “Is Sera, our Friend of Red Jenny. She’s just brilliant with the bow. Sera, this is Scout Harding, I told you about her.”

Cassandra did recall Eleanor speaking of Lace Harding rather a lot on their journey to the Storm Coast. So much so Cassandra wondered if Eleanor had developed a crush on the Dwarf woman, she was even chattier about her than that Cremisius boy, talking her up so much with Sera—that Scout Harding was a proficient archer, and perhaps the two of them should practice together sometime, and…oh Maker.

Sera gave a strange sounding, nervous laugh and then said, “Oh you’re a cute one ain’t you. Hmmmm, freckles,” and then, “Oh shite. Said that bit out loud yeah?” as if there were any part of what she’d said that could not be considered embarrassing to have spoken aloud.

Scout Harding seemed flattered as she blushed. “Thank you, I think?”

Eleanor was practically beaming then. Practice together indeed. Cassandra had worried success with her matchmaking efforts would only instill in the girl further desire to play matchmaker. And success would not be difficult with Sera, Cassandra thought, the Elf girl didn’t seem like she had standards coming out her ears. But Scout Harding was a solid, honorable woman, any liaison between the two would be impractical in the longterm. Eleanor should hardly expect an invitation to their wedding, in any case.

“Scouts have combed the surrounding area. There are two Rifts we’ve seen so far, on the coast and one in the north, there’s also been a few darkspawn sightings, I’ll mark on your map where the problem areas are. There’s a group living here called the Blades of Hessarian, I’m not entirely sure what their deal is. We sent soldiers to investigate but so far haven’t heard anything back from them. I’ll mark the area they were heading to—if you could look into that and just see if they’re alright, I’d really appreciate it.”

“Of course,” Eleanor promised.

“Not a whole lot else. We’ve heard some… screeching. We haven’t made it much farther out than our entrance points here, but we’re pretty sure it’s a dragon. A few Scouts got roughed up by dragonlings when they tried investigating the northmost part of the land—past the tombolo.”

Oh Maker, a Dragon. No, no no. No. It was much too soon for Eleanor to be facing such a creature—should she ever do so. Cassandra was wholly opposed to the idea, there was no telling the endless things that could go wrong, and it was a reckless venture. She would have to be vigilant in keeping track of where the beast could be and steer the girl away from it.

“Venatori presence has been noted—some kind of Tevinter mage gang, we don’t have much intel on them, but those people Lady Josephine has you looking at to hire, they’ve been hunting them down and dealing with them—last I saw they were down on the shore just down the hill.”

Eleanor nodded. “Good, I mean we should probably go then, get a good idea of how helpful they’ll be to the Inquisition,” and then catching herself she said, “Thanks Scout Harding, I really appreciate all the work you’ve done here.”

“Thank you,” Scout Harding said, her cheeks a bit red from Eleanor’s praise.

“You’re going to meet up with Marehis now?” Eleanor questioned.

Scout Harding nodded, grinning. “I am, I look forward to working with her again.”

“Look out for her, yeah? And tell her I’m thinking of her?”

“Of course,” Scout Harding promised. “Stay safe out there.”

Sera watched as Scout Harding left the Inquisition camp. “I en’t gonna have to fight your child-minder for her, am I? She’s pretty…wow.”

Eleanor ignored the jibe at her age and giggled saying, “I told you!”

“Shall we seek out the Bull’s Chargers, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked.

Eleanor smiled. “Oh! Yeah! Let’s go!”

Ellie had known the Storm Coast would be rainy, but like…not this rainy. Where did it come from? Did it ever stop? Maker bless Blackwall and Harritt for her hood. The rain was kind of nice? She liked sleeping with rain pattering overhead…but that was only ideal when you had shelter. She felt another pang of gratitude for all the Inquisition had given her. It had put her in a situation where rain wasn’t life threatening—she had no fear of being caught out in it with no hope of warmth or cover. Just a few months ago rain clouds overhead would terrify her.

Now, since her time in the Inquisition, rain usually made her sleepy. Something about the lack of sunlight and how very quiet the world got when everyone and everything seemed to try and lay low until the weather passed. And they’d been up since sunrise, traveling for hours, she’d expected that mixed with the weather, she’d be dying to curl up in a tent and nap.

But right now, she was awake and excited, slip-stepping down the muddy slope that led to the stoney beach. She couldn’t wait to see the Chargers in action—Maker, what kind of person would Iron Bull be? He must be super important for the Inquisition—her magic had pinged twice!

When she first left the Chantry with Marehis and saw Cremisius waiting, her magic brought her attention to him. She thought he might be important to the Inquisition, and he was going to be she supposed, but then he’d presented his mission from Iron Bull, that he was there to offer their services to the Inquisition, and the moment he brought it up, ping again!

So this Iron Bull must really be something!

Fighting could be heard ahead, and Ellie drew her staff and fell back, allowing Cassandra and Blackwall to rush ahead of she, Sera, Solas, and Varric, the warriors running through the Barrier spell she cast as they ran ahead, though she was careful to avoid Sera who still wasn’t comfortable with magic. Sera gave off one of her clattery giggles and scrambled up the hill to shoot down onto the coast from a boulder jutting off the drop of the hillside. Though that was probably more of a tactical thing than a ‘keep that creepy mage-thingy away from me!’ thing. Probably.

“Venatori, to arms!”

Oh yikes! Ellie had never fought against a Tevinter mage before, but they meant serious business!

Oh, and so did these Chargers. They fought well together, and when Cassandra and Blackwall declared themselves—calling out that they were Inquisition—the Mercenaries seemed to take consideration for their additional numbers, made certain of where they were striking, and the Inquisition forces blended seamlessly into the crew already on the ground.

Ellie didn’t think she could climb like Sera…not even on a good day but especially not in this rain, she’d end up slipping and cracking her head open or something! So, she stood with Solas and Varric flanking her as she cast against the Tevinter Mages.

Darkspawn added to their numbers—in the form of enemies of course, though they attacked the Venatori as well, they also drove a wedge between Ellie and her companions.

“Shit!” Varric shouted.

“Ellie needs help!” Solas called out.

“Eleanor?!” Cassandra yelled for confirmation, she couldn’t exactly scope out the battlefield at the moment, her sword locked with a Darkspawn’s, the creature snapping its jaws at her face.

“I got her!” a gruff, deep voice bellowed.

Ellie shrieked in surprise when…oh Maker just the greatest biggest largest person she’d ever seen in her entire life ever, came swooping in. A Qunari! He stood towering over Ellie, getting right up behind her and shielding her with his form as he swung his battle-axe around like a whirlwind to cut down the Darkspawn surrounding them.

“Oh!” Ellie gasped, and the Qunari man almost lurched away from her when she shot her staff out under his arm, which was raised holding his axe, and smacked a Darkspawn he’d just narrowly missed square in the face before its teeth could seek purchase in the exposed flesh of the Qunari’s arm. She followed up with a blast of fire right to the face, that raced down the Darkspawn’s body, sending it reeling backwards to fall dead on the shore.

“Nice move, kid,” the Qunari rumbled out. It was then she noticed his eye. The Darkspawn he’d missed had crept right up under the whipping of his war hammer and into his blind spot.

“Horns give it away?”

“Just a little.” She grinned when he chuckled at her understatement.

And then he was turning his back to her to swipe at a Venatori Rogue slipping a path up the shoreline to strike, and Ellie was joined by Cassandra, who stayed as close as possible to Ellie for the remainder of the fight.
“Eleanor are you hurt?” Cassandra rounded on her the moment she could sheath her sword.

“Ellie-girl?” Blackwall was with them in a heartbeat, skidding on his knees to be eye level with Ellie, his hands bracing her shoulders as he looked her over carefully. These two, Maker’s breath! Cassandra had taken Ellie’s hands and was lifting her arms and having her turn about while the two warriors looked her over for even a scratch that could have come in contact with Darkspwan blood. Blackwall looked like he was satisfied she wasn’t going to turn anytime soon and let out a breath he’d been holding. “Maker, there must be a horde somewhere nearby. You’re uninjured?”

“I’m just fine, I didn’t even get hurt. We’ll deal with that horde in a bit, kay?” Ellie asked, looking at Cassandra, amused as the woman still had a hold of her hands and didn’t realize it. The Seeker released her grip and Ellie looked to Solas as he and Varric approached.

He didn’t use his weird magic connection thing to check in on her unless he thought she was in trouble, but they’d found she could communicate silently to him using it, not exact words or anything, but feelings and instincts on things. She sent him a little vibe to check over everyone and make sure they all took potion if they needed it while she approached Iron Bull.

Oh Maker, she hoped he checked on Sera—she caught sight of the Elf girl sliding down the bank to join their party and worried if she hadn’t been hurt in the fight, she may well break something the way she just threw her whole-body weight into slipping down the muddy hillside. She sent him something she hoped conveyed itself as a Be nice! because he really did not like their new Elf party member.

Ellie was a bit nervous as she made her way to join the Qunari, talking to one of his men about their fight, though she couldn’t see who exactly, not around their boss. Maker, he was massive! No wonder her magic pinged twice! One for each great honking horn atop his head!

But he was their friend it seemed, Magic had pinged. Though now it was rather a lot nervous, so was she as she was approaching him. She kind of wished Cremisius had given her some sort of heads-up, she’d never met a Qunari before and she knew zero…huh, was it called Qunlat? She was worried she’d accidentally insult the large man. But he’d spoken to her in Trade language*…and she didn’t see any other Qunari in his crew, so he must be pretty proficient in it.

So, Ellie walked right up to the Qunari, his subordinate rushed off with orders to ‘break out the casks’ as she approached, her eyes glued to Iron Bull’s great big back as she thought carefully how to address him.

She realized she still had her staff in-hand and while she didn’t know any Qunlat, she did understand that Qunari were generally reticent with magic. She’d heard things…awful things, about mouths being sewn shut that made her squeamish if she thought about it too much. She thought of holstering her staff but instead kicked aside some of the pebbles and rocks underfoot and sunk her staff deep into the sand to stand on its own. The sound caught Iron Bull’s attention, and she was already leaving her staff behind to join him.

“Thanks for helping me earlier,” she said.

“Not a problem. Glad you could make it—have a seat, drinks are comin’,” Iron Bull said as he sat on a boulder, resting a bit.

“I assume you remember my Lieutenant,” he said, gesturing as his subordinate returned, “Cremisius Aclassi.”
Oh gosh! “Cremisuis!” Ellie greeted him, her magic did a happy little skip in her blood and she smiled when the older boy joined them. She realized why she hadn’t spotted Cremisius almost immediately—he wasn’t using the sword he’d been armed with in Haven…was it a Warhammer? It was awfully big. It looked like he’d found a stout sturdy tree branch, sanded it down and jammed it against giant green rock and bound them with a spike riddled, thick leather strap. Whatever it was it looked heavy and he’d seemed to have excellent control over it. “It’s good to see you again! Are you feeling better?”

Cremisius had two large ceramic tankards in his hands and he held them out to Ellie and Iron Bull as he slanted her an amused smile and he reported that he was in fact, “Right as rain, my lady.” Iron Bull snorted before taking a drink of whatever Cremisius brought them, and Ellie giggled at his pun, “I’m glad,” she was. Colds were no fun, but it could have gotten so much worse. Maker bless Adan and his excellent potions-work! She almost sipped at the drink he’d given her, but as she raised the mug to her lips she could smell the mix of spice and alcohol. Oh warm, spiced mead would be glorious in this weather, but she definitely shouldn’t, not with her potions regimen. So she just kept her lips tight to the edge of the mug and tipped it a bit to make it look like she’d taken a sip—she didn’t want to make Cremisius think she didn’t trust him or something, or come off as rude.

“The uh,” Cremisius balled up his fist, running a gauntleted thumb across his throat, “are all done, Chief.”

“Already? Check ‘em again, I don’t want any of those Tevinter bastards getting away, no offense, Krem.”

Krem? Oh! For short! It was cute!

“None taken,” Cremisius said with a shrug, “at least a bastard knows who his mother is,” he said as he turned to ‘check again’ on whatever he hadn’t wanted to say in front of Ellie, “puts ‘em one up on you Qunari, right?”

Ellie smiled at their exchange—time with Varric and Blackwall had shown her that talking meanly to each other was sometimes a bonding thing—that was nice that they got on so well. And Cremisius was Iron Bull’s Lieutenant? That sounded like an important job, to Ellie at least.

“Eleanor!” Cassandra called as she came to join them, looking conflicted, like she was going back and forth on something in her mind. Oh she was worried that Ellie was drinking—the Seeker didn’t want to throw all of Ellie’s personal business out there in front of strangers, but she had a responsibility to make sure Ellie wasn’t blacking out while handling important Inquisition affairs, huh?

“Cassandra,” Ellie greeted her cheerily, popping up on her tip-toes to kiss her on the cheek, to be close enough that the Seeker could smell that Ellie hadn’t actually drank anything, Maker she was glad she’d brushed her teeth after breakfast! Then she offered the woman her mug, “Here, are you thirsty? It’s really good—warm.” She thought it must be, anyway.

“Thank you, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, taking the mug and a few quick drinks of the stuff, coming away looking pleased with it.

“Oh! This is—” she stopped when she remembered something, “Lady Josie read your name as ‘The Iron Bull’ in that contract you sent us, do you have a preference?”
“I like ‘The Iron Bull’,” the Qunari said, “Putting an article in the front makes me sound like a machine or a weapon and I…well I dig that.”

She wasn’t sure what ‘article’ meant but she did understand that he ‘dig’ed that so. Ellie nodded. “This is The Iron Bull. And this is Seeker Cassandra Pentaghast.”

Any pleasantries between the two warriors were stopped short when a dark-haired Elf woman appeared on the boulder The Iron Bull was seated on. She was crouched, sitting on the balls of her feet with her hands planted between them, examining Ellie intensely.

“Skinner,” Iron Bull greeted her, though his tones sounded like a warning. “Are we behaving? We have guests.”

Ellie smiled to her, gently. “Hi, I’m Ellie,” she said, holding out her hand for a shake.

She didn’t even acknowledge that Bull or Ellie had spoken, just kept staring at her. And then, “You took care of Krem. You made sure he was fed and made well before returning to us.” the Elf known as ‘Skinner’ said.

Ellie nodded, since the woman didn’t seem like she would shake her hand, she just dropped it and said, “I just treated him the way I would want anyone treated,” since it sort of sounded like…well like she wanted an explanation.

Skinner stared at her for a moment more before, eyes never leaving her as she deftly snatching the mug from Iron Bull’s hands and twisting on the balls of her feet. She turned her head away and fled with her stolen mead.

“Skinner!” Iron Bull protested, just a little though, he didn’t make to go after her or anything. “Well that was pretty uhh…tame, actually. Sorry about that.”

Ellie shook her head with a smile, “Oh that’s fine—it just seemed like she was curious about me. It was kind of sweet really.”

“It uh…yeah, from Skinner that’s about as close to sweet as she gets,” Iron Bull said as if he would not at all term the woman as such.

“So,” Ellie said, since he’d said they should sit and talk, she plopped down onto the ground, seating herself like she would when she and Solas meditated. Cassandra grunted in mild disapproval, but she too one leg crossed before her while the other’s knee was raised to rest the arm she held her mug in upon. “Shall we discuss terms?” Ellie asked. “Josie—erm, Lady Josephine briefed me on the finer points of the contract you sent to Haven. Her only concern was um, well the matter of your payment.”

“No need to worry about that, if you hire us on, I’ll work out a payment plan with your Ambassador. Gold will take care of itself. We’re worth every coin, and it’s not just my crew,” The Iron Bull said, “You’ll be getting me—you need a front-line bodyguard, I’m your man. Whatever it is, demons? Dragons? The bigger the better.” he sighed as he leaned forward a bit, eyeing Cassandra warily, “and one more thing. Might be useful. Might piss you off.”

“Unless you’re about threaten me or something, Cassandra’s cool,” Ellie promised with a shrug.

“Nothing like that,” he promised. “You ever heard of the Ben-Hessrath?” the Qunari man asked. Cassandra immediately stiffened at the words, so Ellie looked to her.
“Qunari intelligence,” Cassandra ground out. She sounded angry about it which was…well weird.

Ellie looked to Bull then. “Well, of course you’re super smart, I mean you’re multilingual, and you know how to fight like super well that whirlwindy thing you did was just wicked cool! And you run your own mercenary company, and Lady Josie was impressed with the contract you sent to Haven so you must write well. Why would you think you’d have to tell me you’re smart? Or think that the idea would offend me? I…I’d never just assume something mean spirited about…what’s so funny?”

Iron Bull was full blown laughing, hearty and rich in his chest as he slapped his thigh.

Cassandra sighed. “Ellie, Maker preserve us.”

Ellie blushed, pretty sure she’d stepped in it somehow.

“Imekari,” he said once he calmed, voice ringing with affection so Ellie didn’t think it was an insult or anything, it sort of sounded like the way Solas or Marehis called her ‘Da’len’. He cleared his throat and politely explained, “It’s a Qunari order. They handle information. Loyalty, security, all of it. Spies, basically. Or, well, we’re spies.”

Oh. Oh! Ellie giggled then wrenching a hand at the back of her neck, nervously. “Intelligence as in the government kind, then. I wasn’t super wrong though—you’ve got to be smart to be a spy I think.” Leliana was certainly one of the smartest people she’d ever met.

Iron Bull grunted his agreement. “Ben-Hessrath are concerned about the Breach. Magic out of control like that can cause trouble everywhere. I’ve been ordered to join the Inquisition, get close to the people in charge, and send reports on what’s happening. But I also get reports from Ben-Hessrath agents all over Orlais. You sign me on, I’ll share them with your people.”

Ellie thought about it for a moment. “Thank you, for being upfront with me—I understand about your job, and it sounds important. I wouldn’t want you getting in trouble with your bosses, but the Inquisition’s safety is important too—what sort of things would you report to them about?”

Iron Bull gave a dismissive wave of his hand as if to cast worry aside, “I’d send enough to keep my superiors happy, nothing that’ll compromise your operations. They’re considering sending an army to stop the world from falling apart—you let me report on the progress you’re making, it’ll help put some minds at ease.”

Oh, yeah, Qunari army sounded bad. It made her grateful they’d sent a spy first, before adding a whole other level of warfare to the chaos in Ferelden and the Empire.

Ellie looked to Cassandra—she’d already told the woman her magic said The Iron Bull would be important, so she trusted the woman’s judgement. The Seeker nodded, so Ellie stood from her place on the ground, Cassandra and Iron Bull rising as well, though the Qunari looked a little surprised when Ellie hopped up onto the boulder he’d been sitting on, to be eye level with him. Or. Just-barely chest level but looking more directly into his eyes.

“Young company’s strong and your mission is important. You’d be a welcome addition to the Inquisition, but only if you promise to run your reports by our Spymaster Leliana before sending them out, and that you’ll send nothing she doesn’t approve of. If you compromise the Inquisition after all the hard work everyone’s put into it, I’ll let Cassandra eat you alive.”

And then she held out her hand for him to shake.
“Wouldn’t have it any other way,” Iron Bull said, his hand devouring hers. Maker he was big!

“Great! So, would you care to follow us to our camp? We should probably get everything in writing. Maybe with Cassandra though, I’m super pumped you’re joining us, but I could use a nap.”

Chargers made camp in the cover of some caves they’d cleared the spiders from. Nasty things. Krem was absently pleased they’d cleared them before Ellie went trekking through the Storm Coast—one of those Rift things were gleaming just down the way and she may well have to cut through the caves to get to it. Krem didn’t particularly like fighting the damned eight-legged bastards, but he didn’t have a problem squaring up against them.

“Your little girlfriend’s cute,” Dalish teased from her place around the fire. Where were the Templars when you needed one?

“If I were about twenty years younger, you’d have some serious competition my friend,” Stitches was saying as he bandaged Grim’s leg. The smaller blond man grunted his agreement. Or maybe Stitches got his bandage too tight, but he had something like mischief in his eyes.

Maker this lot couldn’t cut Krem a break. Ever since he got back from Haven with his report—he’d just told them about Ellie, given Bull a heads up about her being so young, and talked about what he saw while on the inside of the Inquisition’s headquarters—they’d been teasing him about his ‘little crush’ on the Herald.

Krem was quiet, sitting close to the fire, working his latest knitting project. It was one of the things he did without his gauntlets—the fibers tended to get snagged if he tried—grey wool soft under his fingers as he worked, nearly done.

He ignored their teasing. As if. Not that he wasn’t interested just…some things weren’t in the cards for him. He’d had his share of carefully ventured lays in the past but Ellie…that wasn’t the first thing that came to mind, when he thought of her. She made him think more of long walks spent talking about anything and everything or finding different ways to make her smile at him, the way she had when he was in Haven. Things that seemed like the sort of things you did to build something long term, and nothing in Krem’s life was permanent, they just never worked out, not before the Chargers anyway, and even that was…well if you grew old in the mercenary business, you got out. Out…it didn’t hold anything for him he thought. Couldn’t, he felt like sometimes.

Besides, she wasn’t interested, she was just…

“She is kind.”

The chatter around the Charger’s Storm Coast campsite died down when Skinner spoke. It usually did—the woman didn’t often speak and when she did it either meant she was about to do something horrendously violent they either needed to stop or join in on, or she was delivering the very rare, genuine usually violence-oriented opinion on something.

“She is,” Krem agreed feeling sort of creeped out by…well Skinner rarely spoke to anyone, and certainly never to him. Nothing personally, but he was just another ‘Shem’. Sometimes she spoke to Bull, more often than not, though Dalish was her second, rarely used, choice. Grim too, surprisingly, but that was more of a grunting contest between the two teammates. Skinner still had it pretty hard against Humans—the ones that spoke in more than monosyllables, at least. Krem didn’t blame her, but that didn’t mean her actually talking to him for once didn’t make the hair on the back of his neck stand on end. Like he was half expecting the woman to attack or something.

“Shemlen so rarely are,” Skinner said before turning her attention away from Krem like he didn’t exist to her anymore.

“Kid thinks your real sweet too, Skinner,” Bull said as he came to sit around their fire, his voice teasing though Krem was pretty sure Bull would somehow say something like that about Skinner even if the Elf woman had done something bizarre—all he knew was Skinner came away from the interaction with Chief’s mug. “She’s smart too—a little gullible or at least slow on the uptake sometimes, but she means well, got a good head on her shoulders when it counts. Red head. Damn Krem.”

Okay he wasn’t going to ignore that, but neither did he look up from his knitting as he threatened, “Watch yourself Bull, or I’ll kick your fat Qunari ass all the way back to Par Vollen.”

Bull snorted. “You’d have to get in line behind just about every member of that party of hers. I know my place, Krem, I just meant maybe I’ve rubbed off on you a bit, eh?”

“Rub off on yourself you oaf,” Krem groused half-heartedly. Bull chuckled at that, and Krem felt a hand on his shoulder then so he looked up to see the amused smile tugging at Chief’s lips as he jerked his head to the side, a signal for Krem to come with him. Krem nodded and laid his project aside, rising from his seat by the fire to follow after.

He did dislike stepping out side the cave to chat with Bull in the pouring rain, but the big ass did stop him at the entrance, letting Krem stand under the last bit of overhead coverage.

“Herald agreed to sign us on. I stopped by their camp since she wanted to make sure I had a contract that covered my personal alliance to the Inquisition. Get my promises about my transparency with the sort of things I’ll be reporting to HQ, in writing and sent off to her Advisors so I can keep up with my reporting schedule, get the next one out on time…” he looked like he was mildly impressed when he thought about it some more, “I think she was trying to secure my job too, make sure I get paid my due, since the contract I had written up just covered the Chargers in a general sense.”

Huh. Yeah, their contract was for the Chargers to work for the Inquisition offering their mercenary services, but there wasn’t anything explicitly detailing Bull’s role…but uh, wasn’t his role just leading them? “What’s up?”

Bull grumbled for a second and then, “The original plan was just…subtle infiltration, get in, earn trust, get information out. But shit Krem you didn’t tell me she was that…” ha, flustered was not a good look for Bull. “I mean you’re sure she’s as old as you’re thinking? Humans make such little imekari. And they have her just rushing out into fights—girl can’t have fought in an actual battle a day in her life before this crap, she’s obviously had training but…its recent. She isn’t used to it.” He sighed. “So, plans changed. I offered to go out with her, be a part of her ‘party’ she calls it. Hence, separate contract for my personal services,” he said with a wink.

And then Bull just sort of gaped at him when Krem started cackling with laughter.

“Well of course you did, you oaf! I tried to warn you, but I figured you’d have to see for yourself before the idea drilled its way into that thick head of yours. You sure you got room for brains in there what with those horns?”
Bull grunted at that, “Might want to watch the ‘stupid’ comments around your girl Krem, she thinks I must be ‘super smart’ to do my job.”

He ignored his calling Ellie his ‘girl’. It was just baiting, trying to see if Krem was out of his mind or something, under the delusion he should attempt something dragon-crap crazy like romancing the Herald of Andraste.

“You actually told her about that Ben-Hessrath stuff?” Krem asked.

“And she thanked me for my honesty. And then I think she hit on me. Or threatened me? Either way, it was kind of hot.”

Krem whacked the oaf on the forehead with the palm of his hand.

“Okay, okay,” Bull relented. And then he looked almost gravely serious.

“Chief?”

“You know she’s Saarebas.”

He could hear the accusation—that Krem had either missed pertinent information right in front of his nose, or he’d opted not to tell Bull, though he was certain as hell those Ben-Hessrath reports had told Cheif she was a mage and he hadn’t felt the need to tell Krem. But that meant it had likely been a test.

“She wasn’t carrying a staff when I was in Haven, got a bodyguard that stays with her there —I told you about her, Marehis? I sort of figured she didn’t fight full-stop,” he said. That sort of concerned him. She was a Mage and she just walked around unarmed in Haven? “What’s it matter anyway, you’ve got no problem with Dalish,” Krem snapped, defensively. Qunari got real weird about mages. Yeah, it had surprised him when Ellie popped down onto the shoreline armed with a staff of all things. Even then—staff fighting wasn’t a common technique outside of magic, but it wasn’t unheard of—it wasn’t until he saw her actually casting visible magic that he accepted she was a mage.

A mage who saw her potential ally in a Qunari…and just disarmed herself like that, went defenseless to speak with him so that he would feel safe. Iron Bull. Someone that could break her in half with the effort most used to pop open a bottle of wine. Ugh, awful imagery.

Oh. Was that why Ellie hadn’t had her staff on her in Haven? She’d just been in with her Advisors, one of which was a former Templar, he couldn’t imagine such a person would be comfortable speaking their mind in a high-stress situation with an armed mage. But Maker, wasn’t she worried the man may attack her should things grow heated? He really couldn’t imagine a Templar former or otherwise would dare disarm for a Mage’s comfort.

Growing up Soporati* in Tevinter, seeing the absolute worst of what magic and mages had to offer the world, magic was still on some level a synonym for ‘evil’ in his book. Dalish was an exception, he thought, she’d done okay—never hurt any of the Chargers with her magic, never resorted to Blood Magic, that Krem knew of anyway. But…well Maker, Ellie, she couldn’t be evil. In the little time he’d known her, he’d come to feel secure in the conclusion she couldn’t have a mean bone in her body. It…well it sort of made him feel that maybe ‘exception’ to the rule didn’t cut it. Maybe the rule itself was wrong. Magic…magic couldn’t be inherently evil, not if it could also be a part of someone like her.

“I didn’t mean anything by it, just an observation,” Bull shrugged.
Krem snorted at that. Bull’s entire job was observation. He didn’t go talking about them unless he had a point other than the ones on his head.

But he changed the subject then. Seemed done with it, whatever he’d been trying to say. “You’ll take the boys on ahead to Haven, sign the Charger’s contract on my behalf.” Bull said.

“You got it, Chief,” Krem replied, before returning to his place by the fire and briefing everyone on the situation—Chief staying behind while they went on ahead to Haven.

Some nodded, some started grumbling, but they all set about gathering their things and packing up camp. Krem…well he’d had a good idea which way the wind was going to blow. He had his stuff all ready to go.

Besides, while the others got their shit together, he was hoping to finish his knitting.

Ellie finally did get that nap, once The Iron Bull had been properly introduced to everyone and his contract was seen to—Cassandra had written up the deal Ellie and Bull set. After he read it over, The Iron Bull was satisfied with the terms of his employment and sent it off with his first set of reports to be approved by Leliana—though they only covered his sending an offer to the Inquisition and about his initial findings on the Storm Coast and his dealings with the Venatori there, he said, but a deal was a deal.

When they asked him if he’d care for lunch, Bull said he had to check in with the Chargers, tell them they got the job and give them their orders. Cassandra seemed pleased when, as they ate, Ellie told her that Cremisius was actually Bull’s Lieutenant. She didn’t exactly know what a lieutenant was exactly—a military rank?—but it sounded important, like he was Bull’s ‘right-hand-man’. Or maybe ‘right-eye-guy’—Varric had said that, once Bull was down the bank heading to… well wherever they’d set up camp. She hoped it was dry.

She sort of worried The Iron Bull would get sick, running around the Storm Coast without a shirt on, but the Qunari was large and warm like a walking furnace, so he was either already running one wicked fever, or his natural body temperature was such that the cold and rain might just not phase him. But then, maybe shirts were difficult to manage when one had such spectacular horns to consider. She’d have to ask him about it sometime. Politely. Maybe there was some cultural reason Qunari didn’t wear shirts.

When she did finally wake from her nap, it’d been nearly two hours! She was surprised she actually slept so long. Not that she hadn’t been tired, just Sera didn’t seem the sort to not take the opportunity of Ellie napping to prank her or something.

Huh. Sera never pranked her. She teased her and played and invited Ellie to join in on her plans to prank the others, but she didn’t play tricks on Ellie herself. She wondered at it, but she wasn’t about to complain—if anything it made her feel like they were partners in crime or something, and that was sort of fun! Ellie was glad that Sera had gotten into the habit of running her pranks by her since the whole ‘boots full of honey’ incident, it gave her the opportunity to redirect Sera’s special brand of chaos into something manageable and easier to deal with in the aftermath.

And it was pretty funny while on their way to the Storm Coast, when they crept into the mens’ tent while they were sleeping and filled their hands with...it was pie filling, and Ellie wasn’t certain where it came from, but Sera just had it on her for some reason. Goopy, pudding-like stuff that tasted like something in the sleeping potion Adan made for her. Vanilla, Sera said. What was left over from the setup of their prank, the two ate as a midnight snack—with Cassandra when the woman woke and discovered them, apparently vanilla pudding was a good enough bribe to secure a Seeker’s silence. That might have been the most fun part—the three of them gathered together around their cold firepit, eating pudding in the middle of the night with a shared secret that was sure to bring amusement in the morning.

When the men woke for the day, three cries of surprise could be heard from their tent, and they emerged with pie splotches on their faces—Solas on his head, Varric’s around his eyes, and Blackwall’s right around his mouth all caught up in his beard. They were all sporting glares for Sera who’d jumped up, pointed at Ellie, and cackled, “She did it!” and ran away. She climbed up a tree!

Ellie realized then one of the reasons Sera was so very mailable to Ellie’s suggestion when they pulled these pranks together—Sera was going to toss the blame off on Ellie, so Ellie may well get a say in what she’s going to be blamed for.

Or not blamed for, really. The moment the men finally believed it had been Ellie’s doing, Solas was forgiving, Varric impressed, and Blackwall laughed it off saying it was a refreshing, tasty way to wake up, good on her for getting them good.

Ellie yawned as she pulled her riding cloak on, and hood over her head. She crawled from her tent, once she was out she stayed on her knees and stretched as she opened her eyes to look around their campsite.

Sera might not be into pranking Ellie, but she certainly gave her a fright. The Elf girl was waiting, crouched eyelevel with Ellie, right up in the Human girl’s face. Sera actually leaned forward so their noses sort of smushed together.

“’s bout time you woke up! Andraste’s tits I’ve been bored. Lady Priss Pants won’t play with me unless there’s puddings involved. And Beardy won’t let me braid his hair! Dwarfy says he’s busy with his stupid book.”

Oh gosh she’d startled her! Ellie took in a few short quick gasps and her lungs did some sort of quivery thing, ouch! But she caught her breath just fine then, and gave Sera an apologetic smile as she leaned back to sit on her bottom, thankfully resting on the edge of her bedroll and not the ground, so she wasn’t so smushy-faced. “Sorry, rain makes me kind of sleepy, you know?”

Sera plopped back then too, a little splashy since she’d just sat in the mud. “Pffft. Rain just makes me have to piss. All that falling water, drip drip drip it’s a nightmare.”

“Ugh,” Cassandra complained. “Sera, really?”

“I know right? Lady Priss Pants feels me! Or should I say Lady Piss P—”

“I will murder you I swear to Andraste. I will cast you off a cliff, into the ocean, if you finish that sentence.”

Sera cackled—she liked when Cassandra threatened her, Ellie thought. She kind of figured it was some weird form of the Elf woman trying to flirt with the Seeker. Hopefully Sera’d be able to hit it off with Scout Harding and give Cassandra a break. The pretty, Dwarf woman seemed much more Sera’s speed.
Ellie shook her head as she stood to join Cassandra and the others around the fire in their camp. Thankfully the trees around gave them some sort of out-of-doors coverage from the rain, though the occasional droplet dripped from the branches, it wasn’t too bad. Maker, it was cold though—was it this cold in Haven? Colder there but she was either inside or working so hard out of doors she kept up a nice body temperature. Here she just felt cold, and Ellie pulled her riding cloak more tightly around her as she sat beside Cassandra, leaning into the Nevarran woman a little, though her armor was sort of cold so that didn’t help much despite the woman’s body heat. Oh well, Cassandra looked up from a requisition she was reading, and wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders, rubbing Ellie’s arm to warm her a bit with the friction.

“You’re cold, Eleanor?”

Ellie shrugged. “Just a bit.”

“Shall I put the kettle on, lethallan?” Solas inquired.

Ellie smiled, grateful for the suggestion, “If you wouldn’t mind.”

“I wouldn’t have asked,” Solas assured her, warmly. “Coffee? Or would you care for some tea?”

Oh, her throat felt a bit scratchy, tea’d be lovely. “Hmm, tea so long as you’re okay with it.” She wouldn’t want Solas to make something that he himself wouldn’t partake of, he didn’t really like tea, she remembered.

Solas nodded and went about fetching the kettle and water.

“How’s the book coming along, Varric?” Ellie asked, the Dwarf sat across the fire from her, scribbling away in his journal.

“Not off to a bad start, just cleaning up the first chapter. Editing’s hell kid, you wanna lend a hand?” Varric asked, holding up his journal as he looked to Ellie.

Ellie snorted, shaking her head. “I’d be down to listen if you ever want to give us a preview, but you definitely don’t want me as your editor,” she assured him with a little laugh.

“Oh, come on Tumbles, breaking my heart here, you mean I gotta do my work myself?”

“At least we’re in the Storm Coast, the rain will mask your tears, though we may well drown in them,” Solas quipped as he got the kettle hanging over the fire now.

Varric dramatically put his quill to his chest like he was being stabbed in the heart, “You people live to see me bleed, don’t you?”

“Oh can-it Dwarfy! There’s Bull!” Sera said as she dropped to the ground from…had she gone up into a tree again? Where had she gone when Ellie turned her back on her? The Elf girl was always wandering off and it worried Ellie sometimes, really. What if she got caught up in a fight away from her allies, or had an accident and got hurt?

Nothing for it, now, Sera was fine and excitedly greeting The Iron Bull as he approached their camp. Ellie wasn’t sure if maybe she had some kind of crush on him? But probably not though, she’d said he ‘made her wonder about things’ and then went into a little tangent wondering about if Qunari women were built like their men. Ellie said she hadn’t a clue, she’d never met a Qunari. Never really ever seen one, before The Iron Bull.
“Heya! Glad you’re back safe, how is everyone? All squared away?” Ellie asked, patting the empty space at her right side, if he wanted a seat. He’d probably be more comfortable sitting and talking with her in his peripheral—there wasn’t really a place across the fire for him, not with Varric, Solas, Blackwall and…well Sera wasn’t really sitting but she was standing on the empty portion of the log beside Blackwall, bouncing up and down on her tippy toes.

“Chargers are all set, heading off to Haven as we speak, they set out about an hour ago. I double checked the shoreline on the way back to make sure there weren’t any stragglers from the fight.”

“Oh! Thanks, that’s good work,” Ellie commended, feeling a bit weird having to lean back to look up at him, she considered standing since he hadn’t sat down yet, but it seemed he was just taking a quick look-around before seating himself beside Ellie and Maker, bless him. Wait, who was the Qunari god? Did they have one? The Qun was a religion, right? Huh. Anyway, bless The Iron Bull and his body heat because it was like the actual sun had taken a seat next to her. Okay maybe not the actual sun, that’d be like world-endy and whatnot she thought, but still.

“Not a problem. Uh, this is for you,” he said sounding…well not awkward but kind of like he was amused about something and trying to hide it or trying not to laugh about it at least. He handed her something soft wrapped in cloth bound with a bow made of twine. There was a torn piece of parchment with a hole poked through it so the twine could be threaded through, like a tag, with…uh…

“For me?” Ellie asked The Iron Bull.

“Got your name on it kid,” Bull said with a shrug.

Oh! Really? Ellie smiled as she traced the letters with a bare index finger. 'E-L-L-I-E'.

Careful not to damage the parchment she tucked it with a bit of the twine still tied to it gently away into her cloak’s inside pocket for keeps, and pulled away the cloth to reveal, oh!

“A hat!” she said with a smile, holding the grey, woolen garment in her hands, oh it was so soft! “It’s beautiful, did you make this?” Ellie asked. That’d be cool if Bull knew how to knit—Solas knew how to make handkerchiefs! Maybe they could bond over that? She had a feeling Solas was uneasy having a Qunari with them—worried, that the man may try to convert them to the Qun or whatever.

Bull let out a boisterous laugh, and patted her on the back—gently, though it did still push her forward in her seat a bit, making Blackwall eye the Qunari as if trying to judge whether or not he was hurting her, but she smiled at him and he seemed to relax.

“Nah, shit, can you imagine? My hands trying to knit? Krem made that for you. He had it all wrapped up when he was ready to lead the Chargers on out and asked me to pass it along.”

Oh! Cremisius knew how to knit! That was…Ellie felt her cheeks warm and she bit her lip, gently running a finger across the soft hat in her hands…that was really sweet of him. “I’ll have to thank him when we return to Haven.”

“Who’s Krem?” Varric asked, his questions coming rapid-fire as he stared at the present in Ellie’s hands. “What’s he do? How tall is he? What’s he look like and what are his weaknesses?”

He almost sounded like he might be wanting to fight Cremisius? Huh.

Ellie shrugged. “We talked about him earlier, Cremisius Aclassi, the Chargers’ Lieutenant.
He’s the one that came to Haven and invited us out here. He’s about…” Ellie thought it over. She’d seen Krem and Bull standing side by side on the beach, “he’s shoulder height with The Iron Bull —”

“Thanks for remembering the, ‘The’,” Bull cut in.

“No problem!” Ellie said, “Weaknesses…well he was the fellow knocking Venatori around with that huge war hammer thing, so I dunno, he seems super strong. And he’s got like, tan, brownish skin. Brown hair, that sort of long-up-top, shaved on the sides look. And his eyes…well they’re just warm and light, sort of like sunlight caught in the bottom of a whisky glass.”

Oh, she felt a bit awkward then when everyone just sort of stared at her.

Oddly enough, Sera giggling and falling onto the ground to sit on the forest floor by the fire and cackle like a madwoman made Ellie feel a little less embarrassed. Probably because one of those group ‘oh sweet ‘deity of choice name here’, what is this girl on?’’ looks that sort have happened on a regular basis as they traveled to the Storm Coast.

Sera was sweet. Bit wild, but sweet, Ellie thought.

“Varric asked,” Ellie said then, shrugging a bit.

“Uh. Kinda asking his boss but, shit tumbles, you sure you don’t want to play editor? I’m not gonna lie that was rough but I’m planning on cleaning up and using that sunlight whisky reference. Maker.”

Ellie blushed. “It’s your book, you goof, write whatever you want.”

“Uh-huh. You feeling poetic about Seeker, or Chuckles? I think my description of Hero’s pretty down pat.”

“Down pat, eh?” Blackwall asked, curious.

“Foul-smelling crotchety old man with more beard than brains.”

“I’m sitting right here Dwarf, I could burn your stupid book.”

“I’d like to see you try—”

“Sorry about those two, they’re always sort of fighty. It’s how they get along I think,” Ellie said quietly leaning towards Iron Bull. “Thanks for bringing me this, I really appreciate it,” Ellie said as she lowered the hood on her armor and pulled the hat on over her head, it slipped over her hair and actually fit comfortably, like the Tevinter man had taken her hair into consideration when crafting the hat. Maker, it was warm! Pulling her hood over her head, she was water proofed and snuggly, and if she wasn’t careful she’d end up falling asleep again!

“Your tea, da’len,” Solas said, handing her a mug. More warmth! Would it be socially acceptable just to take another nap in the middle of their campsite? Sera wouldn’t care, and she was comfortable enough with the others, but Iron Bull might take offense, think she found him boring or something, especially if she fell asleep on him. So. No more napping!

“Thanks, Solas! Oh!” she looked up at Iron Bull, “Are you thirsty? Solas just made tea! And we have water. You have a canteen or something right? Do you have all your things? Are you cold? Do you need a coat? I can keep on the lookout for one.”
“My reports said your Inquisition didn’t have an Inquisitor but you two seem to be vying for the position,” Bull said gesturing between Ellie and Varric with one hand, his laughter dry as he patted Ellie on the head with the other. “Don’t worry about me kid, I have everything I need. Qunari run warm, so yeah, the rain’s kind of nice. Refreshing. Won’t pass up a cup of tea though.”

Solas was already pouring more tea into a few more mugs to pass around, though he looked a bit worried about how well the Qunari would be able to hold the cup, but Bull was obviously used to handling things not quite made to fit Qunari hands. He kept the handle pinched between thumb, and index and middle finger, resting it on the palm of his other hand even when he tilted it to drink.

“Not bad,” he said, “Solas right?”

“Indeed. Good of you to remember,” Solas complimented with a polite bow of his head. Well at least he was just being polite—with Sera his politeness was more like cold disdain dressed up in pleasantries, when he wasn’t outright fighting with her. Maybe that meant he and Bull would get along! That’d be nice.

She didn’t need everyone to be best friends or anything, but the larger their group got, the more personalities that mixed and repelled, the more Ellie worried about taking everyone out with her. They needed to be able to count on each other in a fight, not worry that some campsite unpleasantness will lead to hard feelings and letting each other get hurt in the field.

Ellie took a sip from her mug and sent Solas a little wave of gratitude for the tea that had the Elf man smiling to her before he resumed…oh, he’d been writing something when Ellie came from the tent. He did that a lot, Ellie had noticed—not when they went to Val Royeaux, but when they went to the Hinterlands, and now as they traveled to the Storm Coast, he wrote letters, sometimes everyday! She didn’t want to pry into his private business, but she did wonder just who this ‘M-a-r-e-h-i-s’ was. Were they in the Inquisition? Or was he writing to a friend from somewhere else?

Oh gosh! What if he had a girlfriend? Well. Whoever they were Ellie was sure they couldn’t hold a candle to Marehis. But if they made him happy, that was good! And he always seemed…content, not busting out of his skin happy but, he definitely cared about whoever these letters were for.

“Are you hungry or anything? We’ll probably head out soon,” Ellie said turning her attention to Iron Bull.

Bull shook his head. “I’m good to go whenever you’re ready.”

Ellie nodded, and took a bit more time with her tea, eyeing Solas occasionally to register when he might be done with his letter writing. Sera started chatting up Bull then, asking him her questions about Qunari women—though when her questions got a bit…uh…graphic, Cassandra snapped at her to mind her tongue.

Sera giggled wildly and said, “Sorry! Forgot Ickle Inky was listening.”

“Inky?” Bull asked.

Sera groaned, exasperated as if it should be obvious. “Ellie. Cuz her hands all marked up like a glowy ink stain. And Inky rhymes with Ellie. Cause e’s and y’s and shit.”

“Inky is a reference to her Mark?” Cassandra asked.
“Duh.”

Ellie hadn’t been sure why she called her that either, but she supposed if you thought with Sera-vision in mind, yeah, that made sense.

“Best leave the nick-name thinking to me, Buttercup,” Varric teased. “Tumbles makes way more sense.”

“Tumbles is a stupid one, doesn’t even rhyme.”

“Doesn’t have to rhyme—”

“I promise I love both nicknames equally. They’re sweet, thank you,” Ellie assured them as Solas rose, folding up his parchment and placing it in the box for outgoing messages on their requisitions table, Ellie drained the rest of her tea and stood, stretching a bit and yawning.

“Are you still tired, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, standing then and looking down at Ellie with reserved concern.

“Nah, just still waking up a bit. We should get moving, yeah? Scout Harding said something about soldiers not reporting back, and we haven’t seen or received anything from their unit while we’ve been here, have we?”

“We haven’t,” Cassandra confirmed.

“We should go check up on them—they might need our help or be lost or something.”

“I know a good rout,” Blackwall offered.

“Lead the way!” Ellie said.

Soldiers hadn’t reported in in a while huh. That was never good. kid had proposed the possibility that they could need help but…shit. She didn’t seem like the sort to jump to the very probable conclusion they were dead—though they could be captured, but a hostage situation could get ugly. Not everyone had a code like the Chargers—when they could, they took care of anyone they captured, and handled negotiations as quick as possible, no more bloodshed, everyone back where they belong and make a little gold on top. Vints this time, it hadn’t been one mercenary group against the other, there wasn’t any sitting down and talking things out, these guys were hell bent on…well, Ben-Hessrath weren’t sure. They had some sort of cryptic god bullshit going on, and a vendetta against the Inquisition. He wondered if the kid was just super optimistic or…too optimistic. So hopeful that the idea her people might be dead already hadn’t occurred to her. Shit.

Ben-Hessrath reports out of Orlais had given Bull, what he thought, was a decent rundown on the Herald of Andraste but Vashedan. Who the hell were they letting into the Qun? Into the Ben-Hessrath? No shit they needed a guy on the inside. Krem’d given him the most accurate report to date on the Herald, and he hadn’t been able to figure out that she was Sarabaas. He thought he’d trained Krem better than that, but yeah if she was going around unarmed in Haven, and after her display on the beach that checked out, he could understand not seeing it. Kid didn’t carry herself like any mage he’d ever met. If she hadn’t come trotting—like a kid, she had this little hop in her walk, in her run like she was amped up about where she was going—down onto the beach and Well shit. He wasn’t sure what he’d thought. But that wasn’t surprising. Humans weren’t like Qunari, there wasn’t a filing system for them, they weren’t numbered and labeled and put in their neat little niche in society before puberty. They fended for themselves mostly, spent a shit-ton of time fathoming out their ‘purpose’ their ‘dreams’, even their elderly—sometimes especially their elderly. She was just imekari, full of potential, an empty vessel. If she’d been born without magic she’d just be starting some form of training for something else—just now figuring out what she’d want to do with her life, and even then, she could take up something and drop it, move on if she didn’t care for it.

She’d used her staff like a sword a few times during that fight and there was toning in her arms, in her upper back—he’d seen the muscles shift and flex beneath the leather of her armor—her footing in battle, these were all indications she’d been trained like a warrior. But she was on the small side, she was young so maybe she’d grow, but she seemed too little for out-and-out warrior shit. Maybe she’d make a good rogue—fast movement, attacking from afar with a bow or something, nothing up-close and personal. She had little hands perfect for picking locks or pockets.

Overall, she was just…pure. Talan. He’d spoken her language when he’d been upfront about the Ben-Hessrath, kid understood reason, and believed in honesty, and that there was good in people. If he’d hidden it from her and she found out later that wouldn’t have ended well. She wouldn’t have figured it out on her own—she was too trusting for that—but that Spymaster Leliana, she probably knew what he was even before the Inquisition had boots on the ground on the Storm Coast and he didn’t know her from Koslun* so he wasn’t sure how she ran things. Putting it out there right from the start with Ellie—shit the name just sounded like the word ‘imekari’ only softer, which was worse. Anyway, being honest with her earned her trust, told her he could be as honest as she was—which was misleading in and of itself, but it did the job.

Krem’d warned him to be on his best behavior—she was small and Human and he was decently sure she’d never seen a Qunari before, and Bull’d obviously startled her when he came to her aid in the fight but she’d defended him, and when she saw that her magic had startled him—it shouldn’t have, he’d known the Herald was a Mage for months now, that shit was Krem was just a test he’d…eh, half-way passed—she disarmed herself to come speak with him. At first, he’d taken the sound of her staff hitting the ground as a sign of attack, but she’d been digging it into the ground and walked away from it, put it out of reach so he would know she couldn’t just draw and cast on him. That…had taken some serious guts, girl deserved a stiff drink after that. She obviously trusted her party to protect her, but she’d approached him alone, unarmed, and he could have snapped her neck before anyone of her companions could blink let alone come to her rescue. She did it anyway, so he would be comfortable talking to her.

He’d seen her pretend to sip from the mead Krem gave her—which told him three things. She didn’t drink on the job, she was thoughtful of her companions, and she trusted Krem. She wouldn’t have passed her drink off to the Seeker if she thought there was something funny about it, she handed it off because she thought her companion would like the warm drink, and it was a smooth move that made sure she didn’t give Krem…or Iron Bull himself…the idea she thought them untrustworthy, that they’d invited her out just to poison her or something. She showed that much thought about one interaction. And hell, Skinner hadn’t sent her packing either, she hadn’t even looked phased by her weird Elf shit—maybe because she had a weird Elf on her own, but Sera was more like a wild cat than a crazed…well, Skinner reminded him of a madness driven Mabari on a good day.

Damn, Krem hadn’t been kidding when he said she took responsibility over everyone in her camp. He’d meant everyone. She checked to make sure Sera hadn’t been hurt in the fight, made sure that Blackwall guy knew she was sincere about helping him clear out any active Darkspawn sites. The Elf, Solas had taken a blow to the face, his nose bleeding and bruised though by the time the kid got to him he’d had potion and his injury was already clearing up—she asked him if he was alright, and when he assured her he was well, she stood on the tips of her toes to kiss him on bridge of his nose before chatting away trying to discern who in her party had how much potion. As soon as they got to camp, she made sure everyone was restocked and Bull was given a supply of his own, asked if there was anything their company healer had need of that they could spare from their stores, and was Cremisius really feeling better? Really? Great! Had anyone else gotten sick? No? Oh good! Kid had been genuinely relieved—like she’d been worried about Krem, and worried about the Chargers being caught out in all this rain. Elves seemed fine with it, Dalish’d never been sick a day in her life since Bull had known her, same with Skinner…though he had the feeling her foot could be falling off and she’d not deign to inform anyone about it…but Humans didn’t seem to mix well with being wet and cold.

She made sure that Iron Bull had a personal contract with the Inquisition—that entitled him to his fair share of things they came across while traveling, money, loot, things that weren’t covered in the contract he’d sent to Haven. Kid was tired as shit—didn’t act like it but something in the slump of her shoulders, in her smile tipped him off that she’d been sincere when she joked about needing a nap. But she sat down with that Seeker, and Iron Bull, and made sure Cassandra was comfortable as a representative of the Inquisition with Bull’s agreement to have their spymaster vet his reports, and that he was comfortable with the terms of his employment.

Then when that…Warden—kid’d introduced him as a Warden anyway, something was off there though, maybe not in his occupation but dude had secrets—had started making lunch and she helped him, asked Bull if he wanted to eat with them but it was the way she asked, no pressure either way, if he was hungry she’d feed him—probably cook up a storm if he said he needed it—if he’d rather take a break from their Inquisition intro, go check on his guys and handle his business, cool. He’d shaken her hand on the beach and suddenly he and his crew were her responsibility and she would work with him in whatever way suited him best, no questions asked.

Well. That was almost a lie. As Blackwall led them through the Storm Coast to check on their soldiers—she asked a lot of questions. More responsibility—she wanted to know every last thing she could think of she would need to know in order to make sure Bull had everything he needed. Instead of being frightened of his being a Qunari she was more worried she didn’t know how to take care of one. It was the first time he answered truthfully when asked if he was allergic to anything, had any food-sensitivities. He didn’t have any—usually he’d give a false weakness, see if someone would use it against him. Kid wouldn’t do that, and neither, it seemed, would those around her. They seemed more likely to convert to the Qun than do something to hurt her.

The Qun—it obviously made that Solas guy uncomfortable just how many questions she had about the Qunari religion. She was careful—like she didn’t want to be disrespectful in case he wasn’t supposed to talk about it with outsiders. She asked if there was anything he needed to avoid, religiously. Like if there was something he wasn’t allowed to partake of under the Qun, or if he had any religious practices he’d like to take time to observe—said something about how she and the Seeker and sometimes someone named Marehis (again, not someone mentioned in his Ben-Hessrath reports seriously? Krem’d told him about her Elf body guard, he was just going to start sending the Tevinter man around everywhere scooping out intel for him at this rate, damn), they woke up early and prayed together in the mornings, and if he wanted to join them he was more than welcome to. She wanted to know if it would be alright for her to pray to whoever Qunari prayed to, to watch over him—and that Solas’s ears went red when she said she prayed to the Maker and Elgar’nan for he and Marehis and Sera now too but that just made the weird Elf stick her tongue out at her and tell her not to ask some Elfy god to get all up in her business.
“I’m good kid, Qun isn’t really about prayer or reliance on a greater power. Our religion teaches us to seek strength within ourselves, that we can face our own problems head on without divine intervention. Lots of self-reliance, reflection, meditation.”

“Oh! Solas and I meditate every night, if that’s more your style. Just offering you don’t have to, I get it if that’s something you do alone, but you’re more than welcome! Its fun!”

Huh. He took time to meditate just…not as often as had been enforced during his time under the Tamassrans. It could get boring as shit. He only ever went full-blown lotus position if he really needed it. Ellie talked like she liked the practice. Eh. Maybe he’d join them. Somehow, he got the feeling if the kid could term it as ‘fun’, she was doing it wrong. But maybe she knew something he didn’t.

“Oh! Gosh! I’m sorry, I should have asked earlier, um. This might be a dumb question…I know Qunari don’t really love magic, but would you be comfortable being included in Solas and I’s barrier spells? It’s okay if you’re not! Sera isn’t and we’ve sorted just fine.”

“I like Inky just fine, but magic’s creepy!” Sera said as she skipped alongside the kid.

Ellie just smiled at that and said, “So, if you’re creeped out by magic too, I totally get it!”

Dalish usually cast barrier…with her uh…bow. So. “As long as it’s just barrier kid, we’ll get along, you can handle casting uh, that much?”

“Yup! You’re the actual tallest person I’ll have ever cast on, but I think it’ll be okay!” she sounded like she was excited about that, and shit if the kid could do it, more power to her. Uh. Literally, he supposed.

Once they made it up the muddy hillside to a clearing housing two run-down cabins, there were Blades of Hessarian all around. The second they were spotted by the enemy he felt what definitely had to be the kid’s magic bubble across his skin—from the tips of his horns to the bottom of his boots, and shit, either Dalish needed a better bow, or this kid would be giving her a run for her money sometime soon.

Ten warriors, three archers, two rogues, three mabari. They were holding position, all of them already banged up like they’d been through one hell of a fight. Their leader sent them out here to ward off or take care of Inquisition forces, and hadn’t sent backup or reinforcements? Just, sent them to go fight and hold position until what? Inquisition retaliation?

These chumps up against three warriors coated in barriers set in place by two mages who were backing them alongside two archers? They never stood a chance.

Seeker was the first one through the door to the first cabin and the moment she set foot inside she was rounding back, pushing Blackwall out of her way and shoving against Iron Bull so she could be in clear sight of Solas, Sera, and Varric as she gestured at them.

“Keep the Herald back!” she called out, “Eleanor, remain where you are there is…it is dangerous, let us handle it!” she implored.

Bull felt Barrier slip over them again, Ellie. Seeker said danger and the kid had taken that to mean more of a fight.

But there wasn’t anything to fight. Just bodies. Inquisition soldiers lay in bloody heaps on the cabin floor, like they’d been fought outside and dragged into the cabin for some reason. To hide them? What kind of operation was this, whoever the fuck ran the Blades of Hessarian, running? Shit was all kinds of messed up. These kills were sloppy, their marks had suffered not for cruelties’ sake but because they were brought down by under-trained hands—they’d just been caught off guard, outnumbered, probably on the return trip to their camp, exhausted. Bodies were cold, the blood on them, around them, dry and stale—they’d been dead for nearly a day now and the Blades they’d just taken out? They had to be the ones that did this. They came out here, killed Inquisition soldiers and were waiting for further command that never came.

Bull was pretty sure it wasn’t death that prevented communication coming down the chain of command. Just shitty leadership. These weren’t bandits or thugs, they were mercenaries—swords for hire, they shouldn’t want to pick a fight with the Inquisition of their own provocation. But everything—from reports he’d received on the Blades, and the reports from Inquisition Scouts that Cassandra’d let him read through while she was looking over his own reports to send for Leliana’s approval, get him briefed on their situation in the Storm Coast—said that these Blades hadn’t been hired on by anyone in a while. Months by Ben-Hessrath reports, and certainly not since Inquisition influence on the Coast according to Scout Harding’s account.

Shitty leadership. Poor saps. Their boss set them up for failure to bang his own chest, feed his own ego, and left them to reap the punishment for his decisions.

Bull’d of felt sorry for them, the Blades, if it wasn’t for what happened next.

“What is it?” Ellie asked.

Seeker slammed the door to the cabin shut, standing in front of it as if doing so would keep the doorway hidden from the girl who…well Solas and Varric each had their hands her shoulders, but they didn’t apply any actual force against her to keep her back she just walked away from them when she realized there wasn’t some sort of fight breaking out she was meant to keep away from.

“Cassandra?” Ellie questioned again, standing just before the Seeker.

“Eleanor. I would ask you return to camp, with the others. Blackwall and myself, The Iron Bull, we can handle what is left to be done here.”

That just got her a confused look. “We haven’t found our soldiers yet, they could still be out there, just cause they’re not right where Scout Harding was hoping they’d be…” a sort of realization—half-realization—dawned on the girl’s face then. “You…you found them.”

“Eleanor. Please.”

Seeker may have some sort of rank in the Inquisition, but it sure as hell wasn’t Inquisitor, and ‘Herald of Andraste’ seemed to out rank her.

Kid got right up in Seeker’s personal space, looking for all the world she was hugging the older woman, and she did sort of—her arms went around her waist except while one hugged, the other reached for the handle to push open the door, Seeker relented, rolling with it, just turned so she could face the room with the Herald, putting her arm around the younger girl’s shoulders.

Full realization, then.

“Seeker?” Solas’s voice.

“Inky?” Sera. Tentative sounded strange from the rambunctious Elf.

Bull heard her, Ellie, take in a deep, shuddering breath and then, “All of them?”
“Yes,” Cassandra said. She’d counted. All their missing soldiers were no longer missing.

“The Blades?”

“I believe so.”

“Response to normal human emotion sound okay?” Ellie asked.

Bull wasn’t sure what she meant by that, but the Seeker squeezed the kid’s shoulders before releasing her hold on her, and Ellie walked past the dead soldiers, out the back of the cabin to the cliff side as the rest of her companions came to stand with the warriors gathered at the cabin’s front door.

“Seeker?” Varric questioned, his tones in warning like he wasn’t sure what she thought she was doing, letting the kid just walk off like that.

“Give her a moment Varric,” Cassandra said.

A scream, like rage and pain, just about as close to a roar as Bull could imagine coming from a Human that size, echoed out across the coast, loud, and long. It would have been impressive if it had come from anyone else.

Coming from Ellie, somehow it just made him…shit it made him…not sad. He wasn’t sad over this. Soldiers died. And she was just some kid.

She was just a kid.

A kid that, after ten solid seconds of screaming her frustration, walked back into the cabin, features tight with strain, fists clenched at her sides.

“Scout Harding had a list of soldiers. We should get their personal things back to their families when they’re notified. Will you help me later, getting everything to Cullun?” kid asked. He wasn’t sure who, exactly, she was just staring at the ground.

But Seeker answered, “Of course, Eleanor.”

“We should…” Ellie licked her lips, her voice hoarse as she looked up, spreading a look across her party, “I mean we can’t just leave them.”

Too slick to get the bodies down from here, they’d probably kill themselves trying, and the constant rain, it’d make digging graves hell.

“Can’t move or bury them boss,” Bull said. sounded weird calling someone the size of one of his legs ‘boss’ but Koslun’s entire ass, if he didn’t distance her somehow, he was pretty sure he was going to end up coddling her. Maybe because she was so much smaller than him—something about that made him think of her as actual imikari, Qunari grew very big, very fast, he’d seen toddlers bigger than her. Maybe that was a bit of an exaggeration but if it was…it was only a bit—a Qunari her age would be two, three, four times her size. She was too young to be dealing with shit like looking for missing soldiers and parceling out what to do with their bodies.

“Personal items, money, weapons. Let’s get it off them,” Ellie said, decisively. Orders, he could roll with that. “And then I don’t care who you lot pray to, or if you pray at all, we’re praying. If prayer isn’t your thing just have a moment of silence or whatever, bow your heads and close your eyes. We’re not just leaving them.”
They’d have to leave them in the end, but yeah there were some things that could be done. Everyone stepped up and helped as Ellie started them off, sweeping her hand across one of their fallen soldier’s faces to close his eyes before she removed a brass locket from around his neck, wedding ring, pins on his armor that denoted his rank and status in the Inquisition. No weapons it turned out. None of them had weapons, they’d probably been looted for them by the Blades. She pulled a handkerchief out of her pocket—a lot like one he’d seen Krem with when he returned from Haven—used it to wrap up the dead man’s belongings, keep it separate from the rest.

They all caught on, did their best to keep each soldier’s things separate so they could more easily be identified and divided up among their loved ones. When they were done, there were seven bundles for seven bodies, and with a glare that was obviously in warning of the Elf girl—that if she meant to steal even a copper from the collection Cassandra would see her regret it—the Seeker accepted the rucksack Sera handed her to put the bundles in to tote them back to camp, Ellie placed each carefully inside before pulling the drawstring shut and Sera slung the bag over her shoulders.

Ellie stood over the bodies, bowed her head, eyes closed, hands reaching out to either side of her. Cassandra took her marked hand, and Solas, the other, all of the Herald’s party joined hands and formed a circle around the fallen soldiers, Bull ended up between Blackwall and Sera.

“Many are those who wander in sin, despairing that they are lost forever,” an Andrasten prayer fell from the kid’s lips, out of the corner of his good eye he saw the Seeker squeeze her hand, then he snapped his eye shut in case the kid might see. “But the one who repents, who has faith unshaken by the darkness of the world, and boasts not, nor gloats over the misfortunes of the weak, but takes delight in the Maker's law and creations, they shall know the peace of the Maker's benediction. The Light shall lead them safely through the paths of this world, and into the next. For those who trust in the Maker, fire is their water. As the moth sees light and goes toward flame, they should see fire and go towards Light. The Veil holds no uncertainty for them, and they will know no fear of death, for the Maker shall be their beacon and their shield, their foundation and their sword.”

“Blessed be,” Cassandra said.

He thought that would be the end of her prayer, but the kid continued, in Dalish. Respectful, he supposed, since at least two…maybe three, it was hard to tell with some of the damage…of their fallen were Elves.

“Falons na melana sahlin, emma ir abelas, souver’inan isala hamin, vhenan him dor’felas, in uthenera na revas, vir sulahn’nehn, vir dirthera, vir samahl la numin, vir lath sa’vunin.”

Ellie sniffled where she stood, and it was a moment more spent in silence before she cleared her throat, and everyone looked up to see her no longer bowing her head, eyes open as she looked to each of her companions, assessing if they too, were done with their prayers.

“We can’t carry them down?” Ellie asked Bull then, for confirmation.

Oh shit she was looking at him like she thought he could lift anything. Hell, yeah he could hoist all of them onto his shoulders but that wouldn’t matter much if they sent him headlong down the bank. Maybe his horns would keep him from cracking his skull open.

But he’d be no good to her…er…dead. So.

Iron Bull shook his head and Blackwall seconded the sentiment, saying, “All the paths down from here are steep and slick, my lady. And any grave we could dig for them would…well it’d scarcely be passable, probably end up washed away.”

Ellie nodded. “We’ll not leave them to rot,” she insisted. “Everyone out. Solas, with me.”

It was a few minutes more before Bull could smell burning, and Ellie and Solas emerged from the cabin, not bothering to close the door behind them. The bodies would burn, possibly the cabin, though the rain was enough, the wood of the cabin probably wouldn’t catch, rain like this would spare them a forest fire. It was a wonder the bodies caught flame.

The Herald of Andraste cared for everyone in her camp. Even her dead.

Everyone, even that Sera—a first since they’d met—was subdued as they made the journey back to their camp. Warden stayed close, walking before Ellie, braced to catch her should she slip and fall forward, he kept looking over his shoulder to make sure she was alright.

It was somehow raining even harder as they traversed the muddy slope. Bull was keeping close behind. There was a sign on this path, warned of rockfalls—sometimes the boulders overhead got too much give in the earth underfoot and came barreling down the hillside to strike unsuspecting passersby. He was in the best position to move the kid out of the way or, worst case scenario, shield her. Kid had enough on her plate just now, adding on a concussion wasn’t going to help anything.

As it was, it sounded like she was getting a cold or chest congestion or something. She was still sniffling but she hadn’t cried at all—screamed her head off and dealt with her shit, but she hadn’t shed a tear. Had the sniffles though, and she’d coughed a few (seven) times, made Seeker break their silence to quietly ask if Eleanor needed water.

Their pace was much slower than that they’d taken in search of their soldiers, it was almost awkward for Bull, he had to take such short steps to keep behind Ellie and the Seeker who was walking just about as close to beside the kid as she could with the narrow path. Cassandra had a hand raised in case Ellie needed it for balance or…well the kid seemed very affectionate, she may take the hand for comfort, and it was almost amusing that the Seeker would be open with that. But maybe it shouldn’t be. Watching the two, Cassandra reminded him of the Tamassrans.

Something caught his attention then—raspy, almost liquid-clogged breathing straining through someone’s chest.

“Kid?” Bull asked. She’d had a cold he thought but this…this sounded like the makings of that pneumonia shit that’d almost taken Krem out a few months after they met. She didn’t reply but her sluggish steps were beginning to slow further like she did intend on stopping to address him.

“She might not be feeling real chatty, Bull,” Varric ground out quietly from behind him.

Bull ignored that and brushed past Cassandra who gave a startled, half-outraged cry that had Blackwall stopping in his tracks hand on the hilt of his sword as he turned to see what had happened.

Bull had come to stand, well kneel, now on one knee before Ellie, oh fuck.
“Kid doesn’t sound right, been wheezing for the past twelve seconds,” Bull said, “Ellie?”

“A panic attack?” Varric whispered quietly, to Solas.

Panic attack? Oh, veshedan. Asala-taar. Soul sickness—where the mind thought it was still in battle while the body was safe from harm. Qunari got it left right and center in Seheron. Did… did the kid deal with things like that?

He’d followed her around on her job for all of two hours and she’d dealt with Venatori, Darkspawn, delicate negotiations with a foreign entity, kept her team of misfits balanced and focused, and not murdering each other (at least she seemed to play referee a lot between Sera and Solas, Varric and Blackwall), and then she’d seen the bodies of men she felt responsible for, realized they were lost, and she’d had to deal with that loss. It would be a shock to anyone.

But no, no he finally got her to look up at him—this wasn’t Asala-taar it was just… fuck he wasn’t sure. Sickness, physical, definitely physical. Her cheeks were flushed and features tight with strain, and though it was definitely cold out, sweat was beading along her forehead, and her eyes were sort of glazed over.

“I, um-” Ellie mumbled incoherently, the few words constricted like she didn’t have a lot of air to say them with, and Cassandra came around to stand at Ellie’s side in a flash—a precarious position since there wasn’t a whole lot of room on the path before there was a drop off. The narrow path kept the others—Varric, Sera, Solas—standing in a line behind the Herald, not sure if they should come closer or give everyone some room.

“Ellie-girl?” Blackwall asked.

“Seeker, her asthma!” Solas called out in panic, “She’s burning with fever, and her airways are constricting, she’ll lose the ability to draw in breath at all if we do not hurry.”

Asthma…some of the Viddathari he’d met before—usually Human, though the occasional Elf recruit, had complaints of the ailment, made their lungs weaker, saw them seriously sick.

Ellie laid a shaky hand on Iron Bull’s shoulder struggling to keep herself upright, her knees buckled.

“Eleanor!”

Cassandra looked like she meant to sweep the girl up and carry her the rest of the way but Bull beat her to it, having caught and kept her from falling, he scooped Ellie into one of his arms, her head resting on his shoulder, side pressed against his chest while her legs hung over his forearm. “I got her,” he said.

“We must get her to camp immediately,” Cassandra stressed.

They were moving at an even more urgent pace than before, then, Bull moved fast, his legs longer than the others as he rushed forward with Ellie held securely against him, Cassandra on his heels for the last stretch back to Camp where Seeker started shouting orders, telling Bull to get Ellie down and for one of the medically trained scouts to assist them. The Iron Bull sat, on the ground, his chest supporting Ellie’s back, an arm wrapped around her waist to keep her upright. Cassandra knelt at her side, had potion in hand and uncorked in an instant before handing it off to the medic who immediately had its contents in the kettle over the fire to boil. Solas made fire in the palms of his hands and cradled the bottom of the hanging pot in an effort to heat it more quickly before snatching it up and removing the lid, handing it to the scout that held the pot before the Herald, using the lid to fan the steam directly toward’s Ellie’s nose and mouth.

“Breathe, Eleanor,” Cassandra commanded quietly.

What she did sounded more like choking than breathing, what little air she could take in rattled around in her lungs in a way that sounded painful to Bull. Cassandra took hold of Ellie’s unmarked hand, and Solas sat on Ellie and Bull’s other side—he removed the glove that covered her marked hand and held it firmly in his own, eyes closed and it clicked then—the Elf had some sort of magical connection to the girl, could monitor her somehow. Saarebas ways were often strange but if this preserved the Herald of Andraste’s life, Bull wasn’t about to turn his nose up at it.

Sera was pacing madly, and Varric had sunk down to sit by the fire, giving the others room to help Ellie but watching, like he thought if he looked hard enough he could have the same ability Solas did to know Ellie’s wellbeing.

Blackwall stood looking like he felt utterly useless. Like he wanted to do something but there was nothing to be done.

Or maybe something. Sera had her hand on his wrist then, that hand trembling a bit as she asked, “S’wrong with Inky?” she didn’t look at him as she asked that, her eyes were trained on those assisting the Herald.

“Asthma,” Blackwall replied dumbly.

“Yeah I heard Elfy. I got ears. What the friggin hell does that mean?”

“Not a hundred percent sure myself,” Blackwall admitted. “her lungs aren’t as strong as what would be normal, and her airways—”

“Constrict, that means like they choke themselves summthin messed up like that, right?”

“That’s a way of putting it I suppose,” Blackwall said. “Potion can be used to help clear them up—get rid of anything gunking up her lungs, and help her to breathe normally again.”

“Is...is it helping? Can you tell?”

It didn’t sound like any great miracle had occurred and the kid was gonna be up and at’em anytime soon but Blackwall said, “Solas would tell us if she were in peril—the potion seems to be helping.”

Sera growled at that. “Stupid, pointy-nosed, ugh,” she huffed and then, louder, “E- er—Solas, is potion doing shite for her?”

“It is helping her, if that is what you mean,” Solas said wryly, opening his eyes. “She’s breathing easier now, no longer on the brink of an attack,” he said to Sera, it was just about the most pleasant interaction the two had had since her introduction into their ranks. And then he turned his attention to Cassandra, “She has a cold, I believe the worsening of that, in culmination of stress triggered her asthma. We should get her into her tent, keep her warm and dry, and allow her to rest.”

Cassandra took Ellie, unconscious, from Bull’s lap, carrying her in her arms to the tent.

Sera descended on Solas then, plopping down directly in front of the male Elf.
“What can we do? Does she need anything? Herbs and all that pish make potion—do we need more? Oi! She’s cold right? Can you make some sort of stupid mage fire shite that’ll keep the tent warm? Or would extra blankets work? Do we have extra blankets? She can use my bed stuff…”

Shite shite shite shite shite shite shite.

No way, no way, no friggin’ way!

So them Blades of Hessarrian, real dick-heads right? They go and kill Inquisition soldiers, and there’s all this rain, and some kind of ass-ma or whatever. Inky’s sick and Beardy’s gonna fight some big ugly bloke that runs the Blades!

Oh. There’s a lot missing from that huh? Okay, ‘s like this see—Seeker got Inky settled in her tent, and Elfy’s got some sort of magical shite that tells him if she needs anything, like if she wakes up, or gets sicker or something weird and creepy but if it helped Inky…oh Maker, it just better help her! Or Elf boy was getting arrows in his dangle bags!

Anyway, they gathered around the fire and Elfy pulls some paper out of his pocket. Says it was something he saw in the cabin with their dead soldiers—these Blades, they wanted out. Or not out—they still wanted to be Blades, but they were hoping the Inquisition would come. Apparently, their boss was bad news, Bull said their whole operation seemed like a cock-up. So, those Blades they’d killed—the ones that killed the soldiers—they hadn’t wanted to fight the Inquisition, if anything they wanted to help, take get rid of the Breach, or at least stay out of the Inquisitions way while they handled it. but their boss didn’t like Inquisition coming ‘round, thought of it as them encroaching on his territory or some shite. So, they followed their orders, but they left a map to their Headquarters and some kind of note with rules or something, their company follows. If someone from the Inquisition came to the Blades base, wearing some sort of challenge medallion or something, they could square up against the Blades boss—kill him, and become the new leader of the Blades.

Ugh. After they went and murdered Inquisition soldiers, people with lives and families, that Inky cared about—after those arseholes went and made her sad! Made her sick!—Sera’d rather they just go down to that dumb fortress of theirs and set the lot on fire. See how well they liked having their people burn.

But that’d just make Inky sad—she’d get all forgive-y once she realized the Blades were ugh, some sort of victim in all this even if it was only a little bit. In Sera’s opinion, if those arseholes hadn’t wanted to fight the Inquisition, they should have taken care of their stupid boss themselves. Not blindly follow orders and ask the Inquisition to save their sorry hides.

But they talked about it—the group, but they decided it would be best to go fight the boss and claim the Blades as part of the Inquisition. Lives would be spared, and Beardy made a point that while yes, the Blades had done something terrible, the blame was with their boss, the man that lead them, gave them orders. So, he would go challenge the man and hopefully by the time Inky was feeling better they’d have good news for her. Revenge for their fallen soldiers, new grateful recruits for the Inquisition, and they took the moral high ground. She’d like all that pish.

But she wouldn’t be liking much of anything if she died. Which Sera was pretty freakin’ terrified she would! Because shite shite shite shite shite—Blackwall would need backup, so Seeker and Dwarfy were going…

And they were taking Solas with them! Solas!

Ugh! She never thought she’d actually want that egg-headed git hanging around but what the hell did they think they were doing taking him along and leaving her!

They were thinking he’s their only mage with Ellie down for the count but still—they were taking him and all the rest of the responsible-ish adults and leaving Sera!

Sera!

In charge of watching over a sicky Inky!

Shite!

She wasn’t even able to take care of herself! She should be taken from her own custody! Who thought it would be okay to add Inky to the equation?! She was just little! And she was so sick!

Solas said she was ‘stable’ whatever that meant. She was still pale, and she wouldn’t wake up—but she needed to rest anyway everyone was saying—and her breathing was all wheezy.

She wasn’t supposed to be wheezy! She was supposed to be Inky! Sera just wanted her better already, she didn’t know how to take care of someone! Didn’t like Ellie being sick, full-stop!

Oh, but they were leaving Bull behind too. But what the hell does a Qunari know about taking care of a sick Human girl?! He was staying for protection and cause he’s so warm. They couldn’t do much for the temperature in the tent—Seeker got her into some sleep clothes and got her wrapped up real good in all the blankets they could find—but it was still so cold. So they got Bull dried off and he was laying in the tent with Inky tucked up against him. She stopped shivering so.

She sat in the tent with Bull and Inky, curled up watching over the sick Human. Sera wanted to do something but there wasn’t anything to do, it was the worst. And she’d rather pace around outside—she really just wanted to tear ass through the forest, burn off the nervous energy bubbling around inside her guts—but if she did that she couldn’t see Inky. And she couldn’t not see her—letting the girl out of her sight right now just sort of set something panicky in Sera, like if she couldn’t see with her own eyes that the girl was still weakly, but steadily, breathing, still among the living, she’d…she’d stop being among the living.

Oh and that was dumb! What the hell could Sera do for her, huh? Seeker’d gone over all the potions shite but—oh.

The kettle they’d been using for potion—left sitting by Ellie as she slept while steam rose from it—it had stopped steaming a while after the others went to handle the Blades. And Lady Priss Pants, she’d told Sera all about the emergency potion, but she’d also shown her something Ellie’d done for some lady in the Hinterlands—when she’d been sick like this—so…Sera was pants at cooking but maybe she could do this.

She looked to Bull as she took up the kettle.

“Um. I’m…,” she cleared her throat quietly, she wasn’t used to this whispering crap but she didn’t want to wake Ellie, stupid as it was she wanted her to wake up already cuz it’d seem like she was feeling better, but…ugh she needed to sleep to actually get better right? Really getting better was better than just seeming better. So, whispering, “I’m gonna get her more steam stuff. Just…just watch her and s-shout or something if something happens.”

“Got a war horn on my belt,” the Qunari rumbled out quietly. Drily. Oh har har.

Oh, she really wanted to yell! “I’m serious you great…” whispering! Shh! Inky needs to sleep, “ugh! I-if she…I want to help. If she needs something or something’s wrong—”

“I’ll call you. She’ll be fine.”

She friggin better be!

Oh shite. Wait. Ugh.

Sera stopped just outside the tent breath catching in her chest and for a second she wondered if that ass stuff was contagious. But no, no people could get breathless from being afraid and she’d just had a thought that scared the shite out of her. She’d be leaving Ellie alone with some great big Qunari guy they’d known all of two minutes.

She wasn’t the highest functioning adult, but she’d been good at protecting herself, her friends. Capital and lowercase F alike. In her book, Ellie qualified as both and…Sera’d seen enough of the world to know it wasn’t always the safest place for anyone—especially someone young, and pretty, and…well while she wasn’t interested in mixing bits with her, she’d certainly taken notice what Inky had going on under her fancy duds. And she was little and unconscious and…well Bull didn’t seem like a groady slag but lots of blokes seemed alright and turned out not to be.

So she waited a second, and listened close. There was some benefit to being elf-y. She found she could hear better than Humans. The simultaneously agonizing and reassuring rasping of Ellie’s breathing, and if she really paid close enough attention she could hear the thrum of her heartbeat—Bull’s business too but she didn’t care as much about that aside from the fact she could hear he hadn’t moved a muscle since she left. Anyway, she figured if he got up to anything funny in the few minutes she’d be blah, cooking or whatever, she’d hear and then she didn’t care how big and Qunari-y he was, she would ugh, she’d…well she’d kick his ass! Shoot him right in his good eye! And the danglers! And the nips! Teach him to wear a shirt!

She crouched by the fire and dumped out the very little sorta medicine, mostly water mix left in the bottom, out onto the ground before filling the pot with uh oh! Elf root potion! Kay, cool she could do this! Embrium blossoms was in the little potions station, so boom! All put together in the pot, it was hanging over the fire heating right up! Oh! Water! She’d nearly forgotten, cripes! She quickly dumped some in, her canteen was full anyway…

Inky’d filled it. Ugh! That made her eyes all itchy and that was just dumb! It was just stupid water! But Ellie was always doing stuff like that, it was like having a miniature mother or something. Making sure Sera’d had enough to eat or that she got sleep—in sleep clothes, Sera’d always just slept in her stuff! It was her stuff! But Ellie thought that wasn’t any good, and so, sleep clothes. She…oh shite. She hadn’t questioned where they came from—Ellie just said ‘sleep clothes’ and poof, a few days later, there was tunic and trousers for her. They didn’t feel like hand-me-downs, or seem like something borrowed from her Marehis, Sera was a head taller than most Elves*, and her sleep clothes fit well enough, too-big in a way that made them cozy.

Then she woke up one morning, and her day clothes weren’t uh, quite so hole-y anymore. She really didn’t think Solas or Cassandra were responsible so.
Ugh. Stupid. Sometimes it scared her, how nice Ellie was to her. People weren’t nice! Especially little bitchy teen age girls! Sera knew! Cuz she was one! Or had been one, very recently! They were only nice if they wanted something or wanted to screw you over. Usually both.

The closest thing to bitchy she’d seen from Ellie was when she told Solas off for using Barrier on Sera when she’d already said she didn’t want their creepy magic shite touching her! and that’d been a bitchin’ sort of bitchy so.

“Barrier is perfectly harmless,” baldy-boy’d insisted all snooty from his place across the fire from Ellie. Bleh! Bleh him, not Inky, cause she was sayin’,

“So?! She said no magic! No means no!”

“I understand that, Ellie—”

“If you understood, you wouldn’t have cast!” Ohh, she sounded pissed.

“Her reticence on the matter is silly.”

“Uh-huh. Solas, you trust me right?” Ellie asked him.

That seemed to throw him off his stride. “Of course, Ellie. Implicitly.”

“Cool, so let’s say, next time we’re under attack, I borrow Cassadnra’s sword—Cassandra, I can borrow your sword yeah?”

Seeker’d been writing her whatever-reports for Leliana. “You’ve need of it, Eleanor?” she asked absently, like she’d not quite been paying attention to their chatter.

“Hypo-something-clly,” Inky said.

“Hypothetically?” Varric offered. Wordy one, him.

“Mwah!” Ellie plopped a little kiss to Dwarfy’s cheek. “Yes! Hypothetically!”

“Then certainly,” Cassandra said, returning to her writing.

“So,” Ellie said, looking to Solas across the fire. “You trust me. I’m borrowing Cassandra’s sword. You know, there is so much vital stuff in our throats? Like an artery, windpipe—I mean gosh, our necks connect our heads to our bodies, so its an important thing to keep protected!”

“It is,” Solas agreed though he sounded a bit confused. Sera was totally lost but Ellie talked like she was getting somewhere with this. Plus, it was throwing Solas for a loop too so, ha!

“So you wouldn’t mind—seeing as you trust me and all—if I held it up—edges not pointed at you or anything, just the blunt length of it shielding your throat!”

“Eleanor you could easily—”

“I could easily hurt you. Just like I can easily hurt Sera. Not with Barrier but here’s the thing. Your worries about a sword at your throat is this—you might trust me, but things happen. You can’t know implicitly that I won’t accidentally cut you, and when I draw the sword on you, you can’t be a hundred percent sure I’m bringing the sword to your throat to shield it, or to hurt you. is it your reflex to see a sword coming at your throat and just let it come?”

“Certainly not,” Solas said quietly.
“It’s the same with Sera. And she’s new. She’s got little reason to trust us, and even if she did—she’s not a mage, hasn’t been around a lot of magic, especially the friendly kind! She has no way of knowing what we’re casting when we cast, she can’t trust that the magic we’re lobbing her way is barrier or a fireball until it’s too late to do anything about it. She just can’t be certain, so, no magic! Barrier or otherwise!” and then, “And you can be certain. If you ever cast on Sera against her will again, I’ll be casting fireballs—to burn all your clothes!—and you’ll be hoofin’ it back to Haven starkers. To work as a team, we’ve got to have respect for each other. If you can’t work as a team, you can’t be part of the team!”

That shut Elfy right up, and Sera hadn’t felt the creepy crawl of that barrier crap since!

Oh! Oh oh! There was steam shooting up from the spout now! Hell yeah! She was in business!

“Innnkyyy! Oh!” she caught herself calling, and whispered, “shite!” Sleeping! She whisked the kettle up and returned to the tent, sitting by the entrance and reaching to set the pot by Bull, popping the lid off so the steam could uh steam or whatever. “All done. Inky’s okay?”

“She’s hangin’ in there,” Bull said.

A scout popped their head in—oh the lady that helped when they came back with Inky so sick—and said, “Excuse me, the Lady Herald should take these,” she held up two glass bottles. Huh. There was one that didn’t look like any of the ones Inky took—it was red. Ellie took lots of potion…it’d sort of worried Sera when they first started heading for the Storm Coast, but she didn’t know shite about medicine, she figured it was like nutrition stuff or something. There was a yellow one she took every morning, and then the blue stuff, the white stuff, oh! The scout was holding the big purply one that helped Inky sleep. “Cold medicine,” the scout said shaking the red bottle, “and Lady Cassandra entrusted me with Lady Eleanor’s potions. I’ve brought her sleeping draught.”

Bull shifted so he could sit up a bit, Maker he was big, and he kept Ellie undisturbed, still tucked against his chest, propped up so she could take her potion.

Or so he could take her potion sort of. The scout placed the glasses in the Qunari’s hand, and he unstopped the red one first, sniffed it and touched the part of the cork that was wet with potion to his tongue before he shifted Inky so her head was tilted back in the crook of his elbow, and made a soft rumbling sound in his chest, it almost sounded like cooing but Qunari-y Sera supposed, like it was meant to soothe and stir her a bit before he put the potion to her lips and carefully tipped it back to steadily slip down the sleeping girl’s throat.

He did the same with the sleeping potion—sniff, taste test, he mumbled something about vanilla being weird.

“Inky’s sleepy potion, she told me it tastes like vanilla,” Sera said. She remembered, from when they’d had pudding. She wondered if Inky could have pudding while she was sick. Oh. But that might hurt her tummy. Too much sugar or something, didn’t sick people need…dunno. Huh. Soup! Could Sera make her soup? Ellie couldn’t eat it while she was asleep though. But she’d done alright making that steamy stuff, so. As soon as Inky was awake Sera’d make her soup! Erm, maybe. Might just make her sick.

Bull seemed to accept the vanilla thing checked out and started giving the potion to Ellie. Why was he so—oh! They didn’t know this scout from a salad fork—they were Inquisition but that didn’t mean they weren’t capable of being some sort of evil super secret agent or just an in general bad person or something, out to hurt the ‘Herald’. Duh. He was checking to make sure the potion was alright that it wasn’t poisoned. Oh! Bull could taste test Sera’s attempts at soup! Make sure the effort didn’t make Inky sick all over again.

The Scout was getting ready to leave. Oh!

“Thanks for uh, bringing potion and stuff,” Sera whispered. Blah, she wasn’t usually a thanky person. But Inky couldn’t do it, and she would if she were awake. She’d have thanked them all to the Breach and back for helping her.

Oh. “Hey Bull. Thanks. For uh,” when Ellie did this she was always good at making sure you knew what she was grateful for. Maker she was just sweet. “you know. Realizing Inky needed help and getting her to camp so fast and checking her potions and and…” what would she thank him for? Ah! “And for keeping her warm!” oh he was gonna get a cheek kiss for that!

“Just doin’ my job. If you’re cold you can get in on this—plenty of body heat to go around. You can watch the kid like a hawk sitting right beside her too.”

Huh. She wasn’t sure if that was some kind of pick up line or something, but he hadn’t said it weird or nothing. And Andraste’s tits yeah, it was still kind of cold. And sitting next to Inky didn’t sound bad.

So Sera scooted to sit right by Bull. Oh. Frick! Qunari were warm! She needed to get her one. Maybe Bull had a sister?

Bull shifted a bit, to pull a journal out of the bag of his pish he’d lugged up from wherever his Chargers camp was. He’d slung it into a corner when he came to play heater for Inky.

Speaking of ink, he rested the journal on the thigh Ellie’s legs weren’t hanging over. Oh no ink, he had a—oh shite, not laughing hurt but she was so not about to wake Ellie over…he had a big pencil!

Ugh. Too rich. She was totally telling Inky all about it. It was just such a good one!

Bull started scribbling away then and that, and the rain and ugh it was so warm! And…and Inky was breathing, two short rasps in, one out, and nothing needed arrows put in it at the moment so…

So Sera fell asleep, head leaning against Bull’s shoulder.

Chapter End Notes

Dalish Used:
New Dalish in this chapter resides in the Eulogy, which is a canon, common Dalish Eulogy:

falon na melana sahlin, emma ir abelas, souver'inan isala hamin, vhenan him dor'felas n uthenera na revas, vir sulahn'nehn, vir dirthera, vir samahl la numin, vir lath sa'vunin friends your time is come now I am filled with sorrow weary eyes need resting heart has become grey and slow in waking sleep is freedom we sing, rejoice, we tell the tale, we laugh and cry, we love one more day Qunlat Used in this Chapter:

Imekari=child, the Qunari equivalent of da'len
Serabaas= mage
Vashedan= crap or shit, a common profanity
Tamassrans=priestesses who raise all children under the Qun, and educated new conversions to follow the Qun
Talan=Truth
Asala-taar= "soul sickness", Qunari's word for PTSD. It is an epidemic in Seheron, where statistically two soldiers contract it for every one casualty. Sufferers are usually removed from combat and reassigned among the priesthood and workers.
Viddathari= converts to the Qun, non-Qunari.
* Notes:
*So, when you speak to Iron Bull for the first time, he says he got his mission to infiltrate the Inquisition from Ben-Hessrath, however when passing through the Fade with Iron Bull in your party in game during Here Lies the Abyss, Bull grumbles about how it was Krem's idea they fight for the Inquisition--or at least it sounds that way?
All he says are quotes of Krem saying the Inquisition would give them a good fight for a good cause, so I'm interpreting that as, Bull got his orders from Ben-Hessrath was like "eh okay" and Krem was like "yeah, that'll be good fights for a good cause" and Bull in all his 'I must constantly troll my son' wisdom, sends Krem to Haven with the contract, since he thinks its such a good idea.
*Tevinter Weather=so, in game as you travel around, especially with Dorian, he complains a lot about the weather, because it's so much colder in the south he says. Throughout DA, there are multiple indications that Tevinter doesn't really do snow--it just doesn't get cold enough there.
*Laetan=it's like the first step up from being a free, non-mage in Tevinter society. You have zero connection to the Old Gods, but you've got magic, so you're 'ight. But being an Altus is better.
*Altus=Dorian is an Altus. This is someone who is a mage with powerful bloodline connections to the Old Gods--it's the bees knees, the ultimate ultimate of what you can be in Tevinter Society.
*Hasmal=a town on the Tevinter-Free Marches border. In canon, it is a refugee city full of mostly escaped slaves from Tevinter. Considering that Krem was fleeing Tevinter Authorities, this is likely where he was heading when he came across a crazy Qunari willing to sacrifice his eye for a total stranger in need of some help kicking Vint ass.
*Chantry Father=One of the major points of division between Tevinter and the rest of Andrasten-centric countries, is that in Tevinter, men are just as powerful in the Chantry as women. It is the only place known in canon that allows men to be anything higher than a cleric or brother, and hold the position of Divine or of a Father (equal to a Mother role outside Tevinter). Outside Tevinter, the Divine is always female, and there are no Revered Father's, only Revered Mother's.
*Trade Language=okay so, I'm decently sure I've called the language everyone speaks in-game 'the Common Language'. In actuality, in game it's called Trade Language, and guess what? It was invented by Dwarfs! In order to create trade with the rest of the world.
*Soporati=non mage, free citizens of Tevinter. Lowest social class one can be, and not be a slave.
*Koslun= the Prophet Koslun wrote the code the Qun is based on. He's been dead for Sever hence the phrase "I don't know you/them from Koslun".
*In Sera's game specs, the designers built her specifically to be a head taller than all other Elves in game. Why? Dunno. But it was a little detail I saw in her background... and decided to plop in here.

Thanks so much for reading! Next Chapter EDA: 8/15/18 the second half of their adventures in the Storm Coast
Chapter Summary

The remainder of their time on the Storm Coast, getting Sicky Inky back into fighting shape, facing off with dragonlings, bears, and demons (literal and figurative). Victories are had, lies are revealed, and Ellie learns how to play tag.

Chapter Notes

Thanks for reading, and a to everyone who has left kudos and comments, I appreciate it!

Also. Another of my bigger motives for this fic is an exploration of different ways Blackwall's redemption arch can play out. Um. Have fun!

See the end of the chapter for more notes.

Icy rage settled a heavy weight in Blackwall’s stomach. The medallion—Mercy’s Crest, the instructions left for them by the now fallen Blades—was hanging around his neck. Cassandra and Sera had cobbled it together, Sera slipped down the bank to collect Serpent Stone—more like assaulting the stuff, blowing off steam she’d screamed and shouted, smashing it with the pick-axe kept in camp for such purposes, and then with her fists it sounded and looked like when she returned, bloodied hands clutching large chunks of precious stone.

Cassandra quietly commended the girl for her efforts before, in a moment of uncharacteristic…well outright compassion for the Elf girl that often rubbed her the wrong way, the Seeker doused a handkerchief in Elf Root tonic, and took a hold of Sera’s hands, gently brushing it over the broken flesh of her knuckles as she asked if Sera had any ideas on how best to fashion the medallion. The instructions were rather strange, Serpent Stone hanging from a chain of deepstalker hide. Sera volunteered to collect hide, but there was already some in their stores. Too bad, she’d said. But she’d made ‘crap like this’ before, her words, and in the end, the bizarre looking necklace with an unfitting name was crafted.

Blackwall came to a stop, surveying the area below for the best way to go about getting down to the damn fortress for the Blades of Hessarian. Maker, the Coast was unrelenting—like it was set up with the intent of killing those who dared traverse its paths, with the rock slides and slick slopes, high rises that lead to steep, plummeting drops.

Solas, Varric, and Cassandra joined him near the cliff that overlooked the Blades Fortress.

The Elf Apostate went very pale then, taking a sharp intake of startled breath as he jerked forward, nearly pitching himself over the edge of the cliff—he would have fallen if not for Blackwall and Varric’s hands shooting out to assist him, Blackwall’s hand on Solas’s shoulder pulling him back away from the cliff’s edge while Varric’s hands went under the Elf’s opposite elbow to support him, keep him standing upright.
“Shit, Chuckles, you hit or somethin’?” Varric asked, alarmed. Solas was practically translucent, he’d gone so very white.

“E-Ellie,” Solas breathed, eyes wide with shock, his expression crumbled and thickly accented, ancient-sounding Dalish tumbled past his lips, deep and haggard and broken as he staggered back.

Blackwall’s heart actually stopped for a full second, still and unbeating in his chest before making three harsh, fast pumps to make up for it. Oh, oh Maker no. Please no.

Dread filled him out matching the absolute horror he’d felt when Bull called their attention to the girl’s distress, the blood chilling fear when Solas announced she was losing the ability to breathe, he’d been terrified by the idea that they couldn’t possibly move quick enough to save her. She’d been pale and feverish, and she’d shivered fiercely, practically seizing from the chill when she was out of Bull’s hold. She’d been so cold, helpless like Liddy.

No. Not like Liddy, please…

“Solas, you will explain this instant!” Cassandra demanded in panic-ridden, wet-sounding tones her expression fierce even as tears welled up thickly in her eyes. Her hands went to his shoulders and she shook the Elf, fiercely, sort of snapping the man out of his rambling, he and fell onto his bottom and then—

Solas half sobbed and something like relief poured over his features as he held up a hand like he meant to stop someone from attacking him as he closed his eyes. At this point yes, Cassandra, even Blackwall was inclined to start throwing punches if the man didn’t calm himself and put words they could understand to his panic, his sudden lamenting turned to relief.

“My apologies, Seeker, everyone,” he heaved a deep breath, “Ellie is fine. Resting, alive.”

“Oh, praise Andraste most high,” Cassandra whimpered out as she went to her knees, hand pressed over her heart as tears slipped unbidden from her eyes, the Seeker bowing her head to hide the fact, or perhaps the whiplash of fear to overwhelming relief had driven her to take a moment for prayer.

“Maker,” Blackwall breathed rubbing his forehead trying to banish the pound of a headache building in the front of his brain. He wasn’t sure if he would be eternally grateful for the Elf man’s abilities to monitor Ellie or if he would throttle him for worrying them so. It wasn’t his fault, the very fact he could do such a thing at all was miraculous, but Maker—damn it! he was too old for such a scare.

“What the hell was that, Chuckles?” Varric ground out, fists clenched and shaking.

“It would appear my connection to the Herald has its limits. I must have stepped out of range—I felt all connection to Ellie cut off abruptly, it is not something I’ve had any experience with, it is was rather startling, again I apologize. One moment I could feel her peace and warmth as she slept, the ache of her illness, the ragged pull of breath in her lungs and then suddenly nothing. Not the way it feels when I pull away from the connection. What I felt was a vast emptiness in my connection to her, as she was no longer in range to fill the void. My magic immediately interpreted this to mean she had been lost.”

“Bullshit,” Varric snapped. “You told us all about your Spirit friends hundreds, thousands of miles away, we can’t be three miles out from our camp!”
“I do not understand it myself, except the deduction that perhaps it is because my other friends being Spirits with no physical manifestation in our world, allows me to sense them where ever they are through the Fade. Ellie is not of the Fade, it was foolhardy for me to assume my connection to her would work exactly the same.”

“You had no reason to assume otherwise, you have not been separated by such distance since…well, you’ve never been so far from one another since meeting upon her waking to face the Breach,” Cassandra offered as she hastily wiped the wet from her cheeks.

None of them had. When they weren’t in the field together they were always with the girl in Haven. It felt almost strange, to Blackwall, the realization they had all become such a constant in each other’s lives since the Hinterlands.

It had been a sort of misery, those few days in Haven when War Room meetings kept them from their routine, they’d seen little of each other, and almost nothing of Ellie. There had been one evening, when Varric rather surprisingly came down from his tent, to the stables to invite Blackwall along to the Tavern for drinks. It had been strange and almost awkward, they sat drinking in silence until eventually they called it a night, on their way back to their respective homes in Haven, they’d seen Ellie wearily walking alongside Marehis, making her way to her cabin. It was the most they’d seen of her since they set foot back in Haven after Val Royeaux, poor girl looked exhausted but when she caught sight of them and broke out into a brilliant smile, so cheery it’d sent a warmth to his chest greater than that which Flissa’s ale had left behind.

It’d been a troublesome thing not to see her for those few days. To not see her ever again? Varric must have been feeling the same way because he was voicing the question just about to break on Blackwall’s lips.

“Is she okay?” Varric ground out, though he was shifting a bit on his feet and Blackwall half-expected the Dwarf to turn tail and bolt for their camp to see Ellie was alive and well with his own two eyes.

Solas actually closed his eyes a moment to more fully focus on his reinstated connection to Ellie and then, “Actually, she’s feeling markedly better, I believe potion has been brought to bear and is finally kicking in. She’s sleeping even more peacefully now. If I focus hard enough I believe…” his lips tugged upward almost involuntarily, and he opened his eyes, blinking a few times, and cleared his throat. “My panic spiked across our connection when it was reestablished, I’ve assured her we are alright, but it startled her, and I do believe The Iron Bull may well be humming to comfort her.”

Varric snorted. “Shit, I’d give my right eye to hear that.”

Cassandra made a disgusted grunt at his jest, and rose to her feet, offering her hand to Solas, helping the man up.

“Are you recovered now Solas? That was quite the shock,” Cassandra said.

“It’s certainly not an experience I would care to recreate. Though it was truly beneficial to learn such a thing,” Solas said, “If this had occurred while I were in Haven and she on the road elsewhere, I may not have been able to reinstate the connection with proximity and believed her truly lost.”

Maker, news of a fallen Herald would have spread like wildfire.
Ellie’s triumphant return would likely only redouble her renown. Of course, it had been bad enough the Inquisition had labeled her ‘terrorist’ and then ‘savior’, proclaiming her dead and then not dead would have called the Inquisition’s competence into question.

“Let’s go beat the hell out of that Blades bastard for putting us through all this shit!” Varric declared.

“Yes, let’s. Blackwall,” Cassandra said, gesturing forward. “By your leave.”

He envied The Iron Bull. Right now, he wouldn’t say no to a nap in the security of their camp, the ability to be certain Ellie was alright a constant. The trepidation that they would be leaving the range of Solas’s ability to monitor her was palpable throughout the adults as they made their way down the slope to the fortress, Solas looked back over his shoulder the moment he stepped out of range looking albeit tempted to find some valid way to wait within range of his connection while the others went on ahead.

“Someone’s come to challenge,” one of the Blades guarding the gate said, in tones that sounded like rekindled hope.

“The others have failed,” the other said dully, like…Maker like the very life had been drained from them.

Oh, there was no love lost between these people and their leader. Truly, they longed for someone to come and take him out.

And then it became very plain why none of these Blades dared to step up and done the job themselves. The man waiting for them was as tall as Bull, and in a moment of uncertainty he almost wished he’d switched places with the Qunari man.

But no. No, this was almost fate. This was somehow meant to be.

Blackwall stood and stared into the face of a man…the man he had been, would still be if he’d chosen differently. He saw a reflection of himself. Thom Rainier alive and well, having held no remorse for his grievances, making a living off the suffering of others. Leading men astray to lead dishonorable lives, cutting short the lives of those far more deserving than he, and relishing in the raw, unregistered power he held over those far weaker than him.

“You come to challenge me?” the Blade’s leader asked in haughty tones.

“You killed Inquisition soldiers, we cannot let this stand. I’ve come to represent the Inquisition,” Blackwall announced, “and Eleanor, the Herald of Andraste.”

The man merely laughed, pulling his weapon from his back. “You want justice?” he mocked. “Claim it.”

He would. It didn’t matter how big this man thought he was. He was going down. He’d made his choices and now he would die for them.

Hessarian mabari hounds descended on them at their master’s command, and Blackwall felt the wash of Solas’s magic—swift, sure, secure—glide over him in the split second he had to draw his sword up to block the downward strike of the Blade’s leader.

A battle cry tore from Blackwall’s throat as he pushed back against the beast of a man, his blade ringing and vibrating with the force of untrapping his blade from beneath his opponent’s axe, a split second gave him the chance to slash up against the exposed armor of the man’s torso, cutting through the thick quilted material his blade coming away, blessedly bloody.

It wasn’t enough to stop the man’s advances, to cut him down, but getting in the initial blow did work in Blackwall’s favor, the man was slumping, trying to shield his injury as he rallied against the Warden. Solas’s barrier broke down and that big bastard got a hit in on Blackwall’s blade arm before…

Barrier flashed across his body again, but it wasn’t practiced and certain like Solas’s or the bubbly blanket of security Ellie could provide. It felt like desperation and the sudden impulse to protect.

Whoever cast upon him, Maker bless them, he redoubled his efforts under the security Barrier provided him and—

Oh. Maker. He was certainly glad Ellie was not present to see this. He’d struck against the Hessarian’s leader…former leader…intending to slice his throat and had managed to lob the man’s head off entirely.

Varric gave a low whistle as he holstered Bianca.

“Well done,” Cassandra commended him looking for all the world she wanted to spit at the dead man’s face for good measure but thought better of it.

Ellie certainly wouldn’t approve of such a spiteful action, deserved though it may be. Maker that girl had them all wrapped around her Fadelit fingers.

“Ser. The Blades of Hessarrian are at your service,” a voice had Blackwall turning to see a younger man in Blade armor addressing him with a bow.

Blackwall sheathed his sword. “By the mercy of Andraste’s Herald, you’re delivered from your former leader, and you will serve the Inquisition.”

“We will be your eyes on the coast,” the Blade vowed.

“We shall get a proper contract written up, you’ll make your reports to Inquisition Commander Cullen Rutherford,” Cassandra said. The young man nodded and led the Seeker to the cover of a cabin to see to just that, Varric trailed after them, either to assist with negotiations or… well it almost seemed like the Dwarf was prepared to back Cassandra up if these Blades did not hold true to their code.

Blackwall took in the sight of the Blades gathering in the midst of their fortress, trying to discern just who had come to his aid—cast Barrier on him and given him the edge he’d needed to win. But not a one of them had a staff on their person, not from what he could see.

A staff did catch his eye then, on the back of a young Elf man in Inquisition uniform. The four of them had come alone hadn’t they? All their soldiers and scouts were to stay at camp and guard the Herald, at most they could patrol the surrounding are for enemies—

There hadn’t been any mages among their numbers in the camp, save Solas and Ellie, not many Mages had joined their cause. But…he’d taken the Lyrium supply off the body of one of their fallen soldiers slain by the Blades, himself.

Oh. Maker.

The Inquisition Mage raised a hand to his temple to salute him and then he vanished.
Cassandra had experienced a brief period of her life where she had been prone to panic attacks, for a time after Antony’s death, when she’d found herself alone without the brother who had always guided her, her only true source of friendship, of family. For a stance of nearly a year after his passing, if she were near flames that grew too hot, or found herself engulfed in total darkness, her mind threw her back to that night where the forest burned, and Blood Mages slayed her brother before her very eyes.

Her Seeker training had done a great deal to deliver her from that life, grounded her so she could instill herself with the cool calm required of her. but still, she felt the strain in her chest as lingering panic tried to hold her breath hostage, she had to focus on her breathing the entire way back to their infiltration camp. It was not until she pulled back the opening to the tent, and laid eyes on Eleanor, chest rising and falling, the sound of the effort it took for the girl to breathe that indicated she was still among the living reaching Cassandra’s ears, that the Seeker found herself able to once again fully ground herself in her well-trained sense of peace. With a sigh of relief, she knelt in the tent entryway, just outside so she did not track mud or rain into the tent proper.

The Iron Bull was sitting up, a closed journal with pieces of parchment laying on top sitting atop one thigh, Eleanor’s legs hanging over the other while she slept propped up against his chest. Sera was sitting awake and alert, holding Eleanor’s Marked hand in her own, rubbing circles on the back of it with her thumb. It was surprising—Sera abhorred all things magical, and while she had a certain appreciation for the fact that the Mark was supposed to be able to close the Rifts and seal the Breach, it did frighten her. Eleanor was always careful that if she did offer a hand to Sera for any reason, it was always her unmarked hand. But Cassandra supposed the Elf girl had merely taken hold of the closest most hand to her…still it was an act of kindness Cassandra found herself grateful for, that Sera did not let her fear and prejudice keep her from doing something she thought might comfort Eleanor.

“Job done?” The Iron Bull asked quietly.

Cassandra nodded. “How is she?”

“She stirred about an hour ago, but potions helped her sleep. Lungs are clear of fluid now, her heartbeats steadier, stronger,” the Qunari said.

“Whatcha do about those Blade aresholes?” Sera whispered.

Cassandra granted her a half smile at that. “The Blades will work for us now, I’m just about to send their contract out to Cullen.”

Sera nodded, though she grimaced as if she’d have preferred they’d gone against their plan of action and killed the Blades. It was clear that was her opinion on the matter when they’d discussed it as a group, it was a sentiment Cassandra felt as well but…the way things had played out was for the best. Most especially since it was what would most hearten Eleanor when she woke.

“Mind sending this for me?” Bull asked, picking up the parchment in his lap and holding it out to Cassandra. “It isn’t a report, but you’re free to read it to verify. Just touching base with my guys.”
Cassandra nodded. She considered folding it up and merely reading it once she was out of sight of the Qunari, but he’d already proven just how good his hearing was. There was no point in feigning trust in this regard, so she scanned the letter first before nodding again and leaving them to get it into the claws of a messenger bird. It was indeed a letter—to Cremisius, specifically, detailing that they may be delayed in the Storm Coast for longer than expected, since the entire purpose for Inquisition presence on the Coast was to seal the Rifts, but their designated Rift Sealer was down for the count. He informed the man that Eleanor was ill, terming her as Cremisius’s ‘little girlfriend’. Cassandra supposed the letter was fine to send through, she did not necessarily want word to spread widely of Eleanor’s illness, but she was curious to see just what sort of response it might illicit in the Tevinter man.

Days passed, and their party kept busy—they all switched off in taking watch and care over Eleanor. With the tent only able to fit Cassandra laying along the entrance, Sera along the side and Eleanor curled up atop Iron Bull, though her temperature did regulate, and she could be kept warm without the Qunari’s constant assistance, that still left Blackwall, Varric and Solas incapable of having eyes on the Herald. It was unsuitable to have the tent opening every few minutes letting in the cold, so they could check on Eleanor.

They’d been taking a meal together, huddled around the campfire when Varric ground out that if they couldn’t all fit in ‘Tumble’s’ tent they needed a bigger one ‘damnit!’.

It had taken all of two seconds for Cassandra to agree, they should do just that.

It took a great measure of patience and Cassandra and Blackwall’s passable ability to sew, they were able to conjoin tents, Sera whisper-chanting “Mega-tent! Mega-tent! Mega-tent!” to cheerlead them on as they worked to make lodging large enough for their party to sleep in all at once, the entire scene, and the fact they felt compelled to do so, was very amusing to the Iron Bull. They were lunatics, the lot of them, but it was worth it.

Now Eleanor was under constant watch always slumbering tucked up against one or more members of her party, stirring only slightly to be given potion or broth. Sera tried her hand at preparing the broth, actually, and she surprisingly looked to Solas for guidance on the matter because,

“You make potions and whatnot,” she said. He also made a good portion of their meals on the road but apparently Sera did not take that into consideration. But perhaps it was the way the girl thought—Eleanor was sick, potion would make her better, and so would sustenance provided by broth, so she classed them in the same category of ‘medicine’. Oh. Ugh. It hurt Cassandra’s brain, being so readily able to fathom out the innerworkings of the Elf girl’s thought process. “And you got that magic shite right? You’ll be able to tell if Inky don’t like it. And maybe Bull should play taste tester again yeah?”

That had certainly been heartening information, that the Iron Bull had been so very diligent in his care of Eleanor. He brushed it off—he could down the whole of a draught tainted to harm Eleanor, anything meant to take out someone her size would pass through like mild indigestion, and worst case scenario he was apparently diligent in mithridatism* and was immune to most common poisons.

Daylight hours led Blackwall, Solas, Iron Bull, and Varric, along with a few volunteers from their Inquisition soldiers to set about finding and sealing off tunnels Darkspawn had been using to escape from the underground. When they returned, they made certain they were all clean and free of Blight contamination, they gathered around Eleanor who dozed in a state of half-consciousness and Blackwall recounted their days adventures in a manner that utterly delighted

---

* Mithridatism: The practice of using a poison to make a person immune to future poisonings.
Varric—the Warden sounded like he was telling a bedtime story, assuring Eleanor that all the Darkspawn were sealed away, but he did little more than touch on that subject. He opted instead to describe the caves and beaches and cliffs of the Storm Coast, tell her about the families of Nugs and Fennecs that lived about these parts. Though later he did recount to Cassandra that they’d seen a Dragon and a giant of all things, battling it out on the shore. But the Dragon had lost interest and hadn’t been sighted again, and the giant had been taken out by the men backed by Inquisition soldiers. She was grateful he hadn’t mentioned such to Eleanor, if she remembered any of his tales, it would certainly be that one, and Cassandra was still resolute in her conviction Eleanor was by no means to ever face off with a dragon. It took everything in her to allow the girl to remain on the Storm Coast—something inside screamed, longing to take the girl back to Haven and lock her away from Dragons and Darkspawn and sickness for time immemorial.

Solas’s letters to and from Marehis in those days multiplied like Nugs. Cassandra had even received correspondence from the Elf woman, asking for her take on Eleanor’s care and wellbeing, saying she knew and trusted Solas’s insight but she wanted Cassandra’s point of view. It was the closest thing to a personal letter Cassandra had received in years, while it still pertained to work it was not obligatory like reports. Cassandra took care to respond quickly, hoping she could reassure the Elf woman. She shuddered to think how she would feel, herself, were roles reversed—if she were hundreds of miles away incapable of returning to Eleanor’s side and receiving word that she was so very sick. As it was, with Bull no longer constantly acting as a personal heater, Cassandra found she was most at peace when she had Eleanor resting tucked up against her, being able to feel the thrum of her heartbeat, her breathing, be able to monitor her fever herself.

It had been petrifying when in the dead of night, Bull, Sera, and Solas shot up from their bedrolls, the fast movement waking Cassandra just a millisecond before Eleanor began choking, her body thrashing uncontrollably. Everyone was up and awake then, Sera letting out a horrified, aggravated scream as she fled the tent to be out of the way and wait for the others to assist Eleanor. Solas attempted to use the same respiratory magic he’d used to get Eleanor breathing again after their attempt on the Breach for all of a second, but her magic was endeavoring to do something on its own that conflicted with that. Bull throwing the girl over his shoulder to hang over it upside down and reaching back with a great hand to pound on her back.

The Qunari hadn’t flinched or hesitated for even a moment when Eleanor emptied her stomach and her magic expelled liquid from her lungs, bile and phlegm, and the mucus-ridden fluid that had choked her airways—thick, awful, concerningly blood-flecked stuff. She retched and coughed until there was a horrible, foul smelling trail of gunk down the Iron Bull’s back, and a puddle in the middle of their tent. He kept her like that, gently patting her back until they were certain she was done, and then he carefully pulled her forward, cradling her against his chest, wiping the corners of her mouth off and Varric got to bear witness as humming rumbled through the Qunari’s chest, the girl fell lax, utterly exhausted despite the fact she’d been sleeping for all of two entire days at that point. It had been daunting, cleaning everything up, and the Iron Bull actually went and threw himself into the sea to rid himself of the grime and stench, but they had everything back to rights shortly.

When he returned, Cassandra thanked him for his quick thinking, but he shrugged it off—he’d known what to do, it wasn’t something he hadn’t done before, apparently one of his Chargers had dealt with a similar ailment and needed such assistance, sans magic. She was grateful all the same as she laid with Eleanor sleeping against her again.

When Sera returned from her run she demanded Solas use his ‘magic shite’ to dry her off before she dove to lay on Eleanor’s other side, holding the girl tight as they slept.

The following morning, there was a response to Bull from Cremisius Aclassi. If Eleanor did not decide to eventually kiss the Tevinter man, Cassandra may well do so herself. Sweet man. He not only sent a detailed report on how the Bull’s Chargers were faring on their journey to Haven, most importantly he’d sent along a small squat jar from his potions stores. Something ‘Ellie’ had given him when he’d been unwell he said, it was a salve that would prevent such chest congestion from occurring again. He’d even included instructions and made a point that Bull was by no means to apply the salve himself unless Eleanor was somehow comfortable with it. It would require unbuttoning her sleep top a bit to rub the concoction into her chest. Cassandra took up the task herself and told Bull to send along her thanks—Maker, they hadn’t such a salve on hand but Cassandra would write Adan, ask that he see to it that they would from now on, it improved Eleanor’s condition greatly and the Seeker found she was able to rest easier that evening knowing Eleanor was able to breathe.

It had been nearly four days when they sat around the campfire, quietly taking on dinner, when Eleanor emerged from the tent riding cloak and a blanket wrapped around her, hat and hood over her head as she half crawled to join them, snuggling up between Cassandra and Bull.

“Thanks everyone,” she croaked out as her head nuzzled into the Seeker’s shoulder. That was nice.

“How are you feeling, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked.

“Better, sleepy,” she said, giving her a small smile.

She was, she was snoring softly shortly thereafter, but she roused when Sera landed in front of her with a thump, crouching before the girl.

“Hey,” Eleanor murmured, reaching out with a finger to poke the Elf girl on the nose.

“Hey you! Are you hungry, Inky?”

Eleanor nodded and Sera let out an excited little yelp before whirling away to…oh Maker she’d been very serious when she said she wanted to cook for the girl. It didn’t take her very long, though the Elf nearly caught herself on fire—as it was the hem of the back of her shirt ended up singed but nothing too detrimental.

Bull was rather startled when the Elf girl descended upon him, armed with a spoonful of soup and shoving it at his mouth with no warning, but he did accept it and shrugged. “Not gonna kill the kid,” he said, which didn’t say much for the taste.

But when Sera handed a bowl to Eleanor the girl smiled pecked a kiss to Sera’s cheek that left the Elf girl red-faced, she obviously hadn’t been expecting to receive such appreciation for her efforts. Eleanor ate her fill and then she asked to be filled in, what they’d been up to while she’d been asleep.

Blackwall was the next recipient of Eleanor’s gratitude, the man looked wholly bewildered when the girl exclaimed that she was just so very proud of him for saving the Blades from their old leader! And she was so glad they’d dealt with the Darkspawn, though she apologized she hadn’t been able to be of any help.

In point of fact, Cassandra did not like that the girl had been sick, but she was grateful that her illness kept her out of the mix with more Darkspawn. The risk of the Blight…she did not even want to consider the possibility of Eleanor ever falling prey to such a fate.

“Hero had plenty of help,” Varric insisted, “you just focus on getting better.”
Eleanor nodded and yawned then, stretching as she rose to her feet. “I think I’ll head back to bed if that’s alright. Oh!” she gasped, turning around so quickly she nearly lost her balance, steadying herself with a hand to the Iron Bull’s shoulder. She gave him a smile and said, “Thanks for keeping me warm!”

“Not a problem kid,” Bull said.

Eleanor nodded before pressing a kiss to the cheek under his good eye. When she returned to the tent and crawled into her bedroll once more, the grey of his cheeks looked a bit purple now.

Sera began cackling. “Knew it!”

Bull was glad to see the kid rallied a bit, taking a meal. Though Koslun’s ass food was food and shouldn’t be wasted but damn, Bull was pretty sure he’d tasted better from Skinners attempts at...uh...possibly trying to poison them all. He wasn’t sure yet. Anyway, as far as Sera went, everything she made was cooked, Ellie wasn’t going to get food poisoning or anything, but he was pretty sure her cold kept her from actually tasting what she shoveled in her mouth.

Krem was going to crap himself when Bull teased that Ellie kissed him—he’d clarify it was just on the cheek but maybe he’d let it ride on its own for a paragraph or two in his next report, wait and leave it as a post-script.

Krem was definitely going to crap himself whenever they did finally make it to Haven—if the kid’d been passing out kisses for keeping her warm, dude was in for a kiss on the cheek for that hat she loved. He’d told Krem she loved it. He also told him that’d been a smooth move, getting in good with Ellie’s Tamassran, Cassandra, by sending along that salve stuff.

Ahh, he was a good guy—A-classi guy, shit! He needed to use that!—Bull was just giving him a little grief. Maybe a lot of grief. The latest report from Cremisius Aclassi held a second sheet of paper that had...he’d seen Human kids splay their hands against parchment and trace the outline of it. It looked like Krem’d done the same except he’d just pressed the back of his hand to the parchment and extended a solitary finger. It was pretty sweet and Bull sort of kicked himself over the fact he hadn’t thought of it first.

Morning after kid ate with them had caused a bit of panic. Just for a second though—Bull heard Seeker wake up and gasp, she wasn’t the sort that startled easily so he figured it wasn’t that bugs or a mouse had crawled into their tent in the night scaring her. He sat up and immediately realized kid was not in her designated place in her Seeker-Sera sandwich.

But he heard her—heart beat strong and steady, breathing clear, rain was pattering against the hood and cloak she wore when she wasn’t in the tent.

“Outside,” Bull said quietly, getting the Seeker’s attention, and the woman scrambled to go check on the kid.

He expected her to start spouting off questions, but he heard her sit and then nothing. Oh. That prayer thing Ellie said they did maybe the girl was trying to get back into the swing of things. Bull almost went back to sleep but after a while Seeker started talking,

“How are you feeling, Eleanor?”
“A lot better now, thanks!” her voice still sounded a little hoarse, but better than last night, “I’m sorry I worried everyone.”

“You do not have to be sorry, you fool girl,” somehow ‘fool girl’ sounded affectionate, “Everyone gets poorly sometimes just…” the Seeker took a deep breath and then, “Eleanor, why did you not tell anyone you were feeling unwell? I understand your asthma can set in quickly, may give you little to no warning but Solas informs me part of its onset was triggered by a cold.”

“I was a little symptom-y when I woke up from my nap…well, the nap was probably a symptom too. I dunno, I’d been feeling it off and on for a few days, but it always turned into nothing—which is normal for me I’ll sort of get a cold, where most people it would be gone in a day, my body likes to play ‘will-we-or-wont-we’ for a bit and then eventually moves on. It wasn’t until we were almost where our soldiers went missing that I started feeling badly—but we had to focus on finding them. If they’d been alive and needed us and we turned back because my head was a little stuffy. Everything just sort of built up after that. I didn’t realize I was in trouble until I couldn’t actually vocalize the fact.”

“In future you must tell someone when you are, symptom-y, immediately Eleanor. Please.”

“I will, promise,” Ellie said.

“Good. Now, are you…how are you feeling ah,” Seeker seemed to be struggling with the right words. “Emotionally. Our discovery was not an easy one to make, and I apologize but you were incapable of consuming…” more struggle and then, “if I’d given you your depression medication, it would have been too hard on your stomach, what with the little sustenance you could take in while you were ill.”

Oh. Damn. Kid…

Bull had fought a little bit of everything in his life—Darkspawn, Ogres, Tal-Vashoth, bandits, weird tree-spirit shits. He’d never surrendered, not to anything or anyone, no matter how big, or strong, he was the Iron Bull and he could take on anything. The one thing that had ever taken him to his knees, had him waking up, not knowing who he was, why he was alive, losing every sense of his self and his purpose, that brought him so low it was either surrender himself to the re-educators or the sword of some low-life Tal-Vashoth scum, was what Humans termed depression*.

Shit. Rough. But it sounded like she was getting help, that was good. That was the hardest part, in his experience.

“Kind of weird. Praying helped. I’m not as sad and angry—thanks for handling all the Blade stuff, I’m glad they were able to be spared. Were you able to send our soldiers things on to Cullen?” come on kid, this is serious, don’t side-step.

“I was. Word has been sent to their loved ones, and he and Lady Josephine are working to see to it that their families will receive their income for the next six months.”

“Working to? Are we um…I know running the Inquisition is expensive and everything, if —I mean I haven’t used any of my payment, and I don’t really see that happening anytime super soon so—”

“Nonsense, Eleanor, we are hardly in dire financial straits. Work means they are in deliberations on how to best obtain payment. The Blades of Hessarian have a great deal of weapons stockpiled, obtained not in the most legitimate of ways. If they are to be a part of the Inquisition, they must get rid of their ill-gotten-gains, we are attempting to find the most honorable way to convert the goods into money that will be used for such a purpose, reparations for the lives they stole.” And then, “Now. You are not as upset as you were before, you are still distressed?”

Good. Keep her on track.

He heard her shrug. “I’m just sort of, dunno. Little sad. Anxious. Not empty or disconnected or anything so, that’s good I think—sort of felt that way when I first woke up last night but seeing and talking to everyone helped.”

“I am glad,” Cassandra said. Bull had to keep himself from chuckling, giving the game away that he’d been listening (not that he could help it, if Sera or Solas were awake, they’d bear witness too)—he heard what he was almost positive was the Seeker kissing the kid on the forehead. She’d done that a few times while holding the kid as she slept, when she didn’t think anyone was paying attention, dropping kisses to her hair or temple.

“I know it is awkward to put words to feelings, thank you for being forthright. Would you care for breakfast? If you are up for it, we should get you back to a regular schedule, it is a dangerous thing to be inconsistent with your potions.”

“Breakfast sounds good. Can I help?”

“Certainly. You’ll be a great deal of help sitting as you are and keeping me company while I cook.”

“Cassandra!”

“I’ll hear nothing of it, Eleanor, you will rest today or so help me I’ll…ah,” the Seeker huffed, frustrated that she could not think of any unpleasantness she could honestly threaten the kid with other than a pitiful attempt of, “Well I will certainly be very cross with you!”

The kid sighed and relented, “Alright.”

Well damn, it worked. Bull got up then, the movement stirring most of the others since he wasn’t being careful about it—if the kid was up they probably needed to regroup anyway, so he didn’t see the point in slipping out unnoticed.

“Oh! Good morning, The Iron Bull! Are you hungry?” Ellie asked as he emerged from the tent. She was sitting, facing the tent from across the cold firepit in her sleep clothes and riding cloak, Krem’s hat still on her head, covered by her hood. She still seemed a little pale to him, but she looked to be in pretty good shape.

“Good to see you up. Breakfast’d be good. I can get the fire going,” he offered the Seeker who was digging around in the chests they stored food in.

“Yes, thank you,” she replied, recalculating how much food she’d have to prepare since now everyone was filing out of the tent. Bull crouched before the firepit and set about getting it hot again.

Ellie was imekari, so he was going to refrain from joking that he was, in fact, very good at making things hot.

“Inky!” Sera crash landed into Ellie, wrapping her gangly arms around the younger girl’s shoulders. “You’re awake! And its daytime!”
“I’m feeling better,” Ellie promised, using her unmarked hand to squeeze the arm around her neck in assurance.

“Thank Andraste’s right tit! This lots just boring without you!”

Okay, Sera started it, and Bull couldn’t stop it, “Why just her right tit, Sera?” he asked, “Why not have appreciation for the whole set?”

“Left one’s bigger in all the statues, and I’m savin’ it for when Inky’s all better duh! Then both tits get thanked. It’s called patience, Bull!”

Seeker gave a disgusted grunt. Bull had to laugh, the Elf was weird, but funny.

Varric took the empty spot next to Ellie and started an Inquisition of his own—how was she feeling? What could they do? Had they done enough when she’d been down? She didn’t have an answer for that, she didn’t remember much after finding their soldiers.

Blackwall and Solas helped the Seeker get breakfast underway and the Nevarran woman returned to the tent for a moment before she came back and made sure ‘Eleanor’ had a large plate of food and silently slipped her two bottles, yellow, and white. That got her a grateful smile and the girl downed the white one quickly, setting about chatting with Solas about if he’d seen any of the Rifts, and how bad he thought they would be to deal with. Kid let her potion settle before she started popping bites of scrambled egg in her mouth, listening intently as the Elf man briefed her on his own understanding of the Rifts in the area.

“You will absolutely not be sealing any Rifts today, Eleanor, it is much too taxing.”

Kid didn’t do much that day, Seeker either had her sitting by the fire or in the tent. That Blackwall guy offered to handle her hair if she wanted to clean up.

“Oh golly, I must reek! I haven’t bathed in…gosh how long was I out?”

“’sandra and me—” Sera started but Cassandra leveled her a menacing glare at the shortening of her name. She squeaked, “Shite!” and then, “Cassandra and me, we made sure you wasn’t stinking to high heaven. Cause you like being clean and stuff. And I was thanky to people for you. And I sent wordy thoughts to those great pricks up in the sky. Cause I figured you couldn’t all sleepy and such.”

“Um. Wordy thoughts?” Ellie asked.

“Prayers and shite! Which I don’t do by the way but you get all worried about this lot and your child-minder and think praying for them helps keep them safe. I figured if I did it for you, you wouldn’t have to worry about it. Though Bull said he don’t pray cause Qunari are too big and bad for gods and pish so I figured praying to him for himself would work just fine.”

Ellie smiled at that—though he wasn’t sure if it was because of the Elf’s weird acts of thoughtfulness or because Bull started laughing at the ideas that crazy Sera could take into her head. But it was uh, kind of sweet. Crazy Elf had her heart in the right place.

Blackwall did end up washing and doing some kind of intensive conditioning crap to the kid’s hair—it had been wild and frizzy and brittle before he started working with it. It almost reminded him of applying globs and globs of oil to his horns—Koslun’s balls, he would kill for some damn horn oil. That shit was scarce outside of Par Vollen.

Everything was pretty low-key, Bull did end up sitting with the kid and Solas when they meditated. He didn’t get super deep into it but somehow yeah, it wasn’t stupid boring, and it did seem to ground the kid so, eh. Giving it a whirl couldn’t hurt. He could practically hear the Tamassrans lecturing him that he shouldn’t have fallen out of practice with it to begin with, that he should be ashamed it took some Basra brat to get him back into doing it.

Huh. But she wasn’t just Basra. She was straight up Basalit-an. He’d been ready to consider her such when Krem came back from Haven telling him how she’d treated him so well—that she’d shown the Tevinter man respect, especially in the regard of his being Aqun-Athlok. Shit. Humans varied in their response—Stitches hadn’t kicked up a fuss, but those Tevinter assholes really did a number on Krem. Dude didn’t talk a whole lot about that, but Bull’d seen the sort of insecurity past reactions to his gender identity had left in him. That Ellie had just accepted him right off the bat—no preamble, no questions asked, saw he represented himself as a man and rolled with it—she’d already been okay in Bull’s book. Everything he’d seen of her in person only added to that.
Especially, once she got back to work.

She apologized to him that everything’d been pretty boring especially with his being a Mercenary and all and promised they usually would have gotten ‘a whole bunch more’ done by now. Kid was sweet. He assured her he wasn’t underwhelmed with the Inquisition and was looking forward to seeing her in action. She’d smiled at that—Qunari weren’t real big on smiles, the show of teeth was usually a threat but uh, it wasn’t so bad from the kid.

The boss—shit, he had to remind himself. It’d been hard to see her as such, especially when she’d been sick. If the Chargers had seen him going full-blown Tamassran on the Herald, he’d never live it down. It was beyond weird this complex—he’d never encountered it in the Qun. You were what you were, if you were imekari that’s what you were, you weren’t also Karasaad or Ashkaari or Arigena, just as none of those titles intermingled. But Ellie—she was ‘kid’ and she was ‘boss’, and the mixture was disorienting as fuck. Should be one or the other. And it bugged the shit out of him that the ‘one’ should just be kid.

In the following days, once Seeker, Solas, and Varric of all people, were satisfied that Ellie was well enough (two tits better, Sera declared her), they did finally start spreading Inquisition influence across the Storm Coast—taking on a few more campsites, and more importantly, Rifts.
The first they faced was on that little tombolo branching off the coast where all the dragonlings were. Kid hadn’t liked that they had to kill the ‘baby dragons’, neither did Bull really, but it was necessary. Little shits would just try to fry and eat them, and anyone else that occupied the area so.
They had to go.

Ugh. If there was one thing Bull hated fighting, it was some fuckin demons. Liked sending them back to the Fade though, so. It was a love/hate thing when they reached the Rift.

The kid showed no hesitation in fighting the things, she cast barrier over her team sans-Sera and went to down on the monsters pouring from the Rift. He could have done with some warning that she could manipulate the Rifts—cast against them with the Mark and weaken them—when she first zapped the Rift it startled him, he wasn’t sure what he’d expected it to look like, but then it seemed to him like something was wrong, maybe she was still too weak to deal with these things, because it didn’t close. But no one else responded like they were in trouble, just took out the weakened demons and waited for the next wave. When she manipulated the Rift a second time he got the picture. Good thing too, he’d been inclined to throw the kid over his shoulder and make a run for it if there was something wrong with her Mark magic.

But after the second wave of demons she cast against the fluctuating thing and when she snapped her hand back, it crackled closed.
That just about did it, in Bull’s book that was pretty badass.

When the Rift closed several things happened at once.

First and foremost, kid was grinning, absolutely ecstatic to have closed that damn thing, shaking out her hand.

But under that—her heart had stopped, just straight up called it quits, only to start beating again with several, erratic, painful sounding thumps, which made Sera stare at her absolutely terrified, but he expected Solas would be used to hearing that.

But he wasn’t just hearing it this time, simultaneously, the same thing happened to the Apostate Elf, only the man let out a yelp, and crumbled in on himself, going to his knees, arms crossing over his midsection as his body jerked in head-to-toe pain and he went about six shades whiter than normal.

“Solas!” Ellie was on her knees then, to be level with the Elf man as she started pulling vials of potion from her stores, offering health draught to him, but he raised a hand to halt her.

“I-I am well, Ellie,” his voice came out rough and he had to clear his throat, everyone was gathered around him, even Sera looked a bit worried for the guy. But he was staring into space with some measure of…well he looked horrified.

“What ails you, Solas?” Cassandra asked.

“I…we have not encountered any Rifts since our time in the Hinterlands. This was the first I was capable of monitoring Eleanor as she sealed it,” his vision focused and he was looking at Ellie then, “You, lethallan, my word. Is that what you feel when you seal Rifts?”

Kid looked like she’d just been gut punched—worse for wear than when whatever the fuck just happened, happened. “Oh, gosh! Solas! You don’t have to monitor me all the time—I’m not sick anymore and it was just a normal fight I…gosh, yeah, that was pretty normal for Rift sealing, sorry! I’d have given you some warning not to if I’d known! Are you alright?” she asked.

The Qun taught purpose, and the necessity in fulfilling the roles they had to for the good of the Qunari—fellow man. Bull had a pretty grounded sense of it, in fact everything told him that the Mark on that girl’s hand meant this was her purpose, to seal Rifts, seal the Breach.

But shit. It wasn’t just a little sting in her hand she’d been shaking out, fuck. Solas was an Elf but lots of Viddethari, some of their best Viddethari like Gatt, were Dalish, and they were tough sons of bitches. He didn’t seem the sort to exaggerate an injury or have a low pain tolerance.

That she kept fulfilling her role, and what was more, that she didn’t complain, shit. Kid had the makings of Viddethari. It was something that spoke to her being more than suitable for the role she played in all this.

But it also made Bull want her to have absolutely nothing to do with this mess. She was expected to do this a second time—today, she’d said. She wanted to deal with all the Rifts so the Coast would be safe from demon influence.

“No no no no no no,” Sera was saying then in tones of rising panic, shaking her head emphatically. “No more Rifts, nope! Inky! We’re going back to Haven and staying there, and the world can go prick itself. Shite!”

“I know they can be really scary. You can return to camp if you don’t want to face anymore Rifts with us, we’ll walk you back. But they need dealt with,” Ellie said, as she rose to her feet. “Solas wasn’t expecting what it feels like to use the Mark to seal Rifts is all—I’m used to it now, so. It really isn’t that bad.”

“Lady Priss Pants!” Sera appealed to the Seeker, “Tell Inky she can’t go sealing any more Rifts!”

“I… I must say, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, “I did not realize how truly arduous it was, I did not assume it was any different from other form of magical casting. Why have you never told us it was so very painful?”

Kid just shrugged. “Dunno. At first, you know, it’s not like it really mattered if it hurt or not, I had to get those Rifts sealed to get to the Breach and I was pretty sure I was toast anyway. And then later when it still hurt I just…there isn’t anything we can do about it, I’ve tried uh using health potion, cause it’s a good painkiller just not for this. It’s more of a pain in my magic than a physical hurt—they’re so closely tied it prompts a physical reaction to magical pain,” she was quick to clarify when it looked like Solas was about to refute that it had been, very much, physical pain. He nodded then, agreeing she was correct, and she continued, “So, there wasn’t really any point to bringing it up, it is what it is, all you guys knowing about it would be pointless, just make you feel badly.”

“There is most certainly something to be done!” Cassandra insisted. “Eleanor, there are other ways to obtain acclaim for the Inquisition, we do not need to—”

“Yes, we do Cassandra!” Ellie implored. “We can’t just leave people to deal with these things floating around! They’re dangerous, and my Mark is the only way to get rid of them and,” she stopped, seeming to need to catch her breath, she’d been half-shouting and she looked stricken, conflicted. Her fists clenched at her sides and she said, “We do not know if sealing the Breach will take the other Rifts with it and I…I can’t leave them open.”

“But ridding the world of the Breach truly might seal the others, Ellie,” Solas said, rising carefully to stand.

“He’s right, Tumbles,” Varric agreed, “just let us bash in some bad guys heads or whatever, fix some pedestrian bullshit to impress the nobles, and we’ll get the help we need to seal the Breach. We can see if that closes off the Rifts—if it doesn’t then you can go around finishing them off.”

“I might not be able to,” Ellie said, shaking her head.

“Come now, Ellie, you’re stronger than that,” Blackwall said, coming to stand at the girl’s side he placed a hand on her shoulder, squeezing gently. “If you can seal that damn blight in the sky, you’ll be able to handle anything left over from it.”

She didn’t look up at him. Wouldn’t. Her head was bowed. “The Breach is…it’s big. Worse than any Rift we’ve dealt with,” she said, “I wasn’t exaggerating when I said it nearly killed me.”

Cassandra paled at that. “Eleanor we…we’ve agreed to your solution, reaching out for Templars to suppress the Breach while the Mages power your Mark to seal it.”

“I know. And I believe it will work to seal it,” Ellie said. “Doesn’t mean I expect to get to walk away from that thing a second time.”

No one knew what to say to that. Bull certainly didn’t. Ellie didn’t look up at them, but she did start moving then, Blackwall’s hand slipping from her shoulder. She began heading back up the hill toward the mainland. Bull followed after her, and it took a few seconds but eventually so did the others. There was the smell of salt—different from that of the sea, and Bull realized someone was crying. Wasn’t Ellie though.

When she started sniffling, Bull figured out it was Sera.

They were quiet as they made their way to the second Rift their scouts had reported. Sera’s cheeks were still a little wet, but it was still raining, and she didn’t wear anything to cover her head, if Bull weren’t Qunari, he wouldn’t have had a clue she’d been upset.

Or an Elf. When her sniffling began to slow, Bull saw Solas silently extend a handkerchief to her. She accepted it, begrudgingly, using it to wipe at her face, and then jammed it into a pocket before they came up on the next Rift.

Second Rift sealed, and kid didn’t even flinch. Solas either but Bull got a feeling dude was either braced for it this time or…well, no ‘or’ about it, he couldn’t imagine the guy left her to feel it alone. The Elf Apostate was guilt ridden, features pinched, sweaty, a slight—very slight—tremor in his hands. He felt guilty. Was guilty, of something, Bull was sure.

Ben-Hessrath didn’t have many reports directly from the Conclave—all their spies had either been in attendance, or observing from nearby, and died in the explosion. The first news they got was from spies other places hearing about what happened at the Conclave, and then the acclaim the Herald was receiving from her time in the Hinterlands. But since joining up he’d been filled in by Seeker and Solas, and a little by Varric about how the kid fell from a Rift with that Mark on her hand, taken into custody as a suspect, and had only been able to be kept alive long enough to face the Breach because of Solas’s magical understanding.

Magical understanding Bull’s ass. Dude knew more than he was saying. He went to see the Conclave but wasn’t close enough to the event proper to be harmed in its destruction? There’s a hole in the sky, and this Elf Apostate comes traipsing down to turn himself over to a Templar-run Chantry order instead of turning tail and running? Worked like crazy to keep some girl he doesn’t even know alive—a girl who was considered a perpetrator of the Conclave attack, who everyone who knew about what had happened blamed for the event, everyone but him and he’d been able to keep the Mark from killing her.

There was a powerful council in Par Vollen that studied and understood all manner of magic in an effort to reign in and control what little the Saarbas were allowed to use. So they kept tabs on what big magic users like Tevinter and Orlais were developing—their Viddethari, Elves, the Dalish sort with Vallaslins, they kept them informed on all sort of Dalish magic. Bull’d never met her, but there was a Keeper that abandoned her clan and converted to the Qun, and she’d delivered to them a great deal of understanding of Elf magic. Nowhere, was there anything about something that could cause the Breach, and there wasn’t anything like that Mark on her hand. So how the hell did some Apostate with zero formal magical education just so happen to know so much about it?

Didn’t matter how you sliced it, Solas…shit why hadn’t the Seeker labeled him a co-conspirator? Why wasn’t he being questioned about the Breach? So much screamed that he’d had something to do with it. Was it because he obviously regretted whatever part he played in the act? Or was she afraid to label him as such because he would be revealed a traitor and then they’d have to deal with him? He was the only one that knew anything about all this mess, guilty or no they couldn’t afford to lose him. Maybe he’d confessed his part in the event and was acting as an agent of the Inquisition as punishment? Paying for his sins through service. His every action in regard to Ellie rang with recompense, like he was endeavoring to make up for…what? The Breach? The Mark?

Cassandra looked all sorts of awkward, like she wanted to talk to Ellie and didn’t know how, didn’t know what to say. They found a decent place to set up another Inquisition camp. Ellie went about gathering everything they needed for a signal fire, and Blackwall got it burning so their reinforcements would know to come set up a camp.

“Bullshit,” Sera said out of nowhere. She was the first of them to say squat in the past hour and a half. It’d been the quietest battle he’d ever fought, the one against the second Rift, no smack talk, no shouting, just the occasional grunt or groan from their efforts and then the crackle of the Rift being sealed.

“Sera?” Ellie asked, looking up at the Elf girl.

“Ugh!” Sera screamed and then pushed Ellie by her shoulders, knocking the smaller girl back a few steps.

“Sera!” Cassandra and Blackwall’s voices overlapped with Varric’s, “Watch it!”

“It’s bullshit!” Sera shouted, stomping up to Ellie and getting right up in the girl’s face, “You’re just going to give up! Just like that! Ohh I’m Inky, I’ve got some magic shite on my hand and have to close the hole in the sky and die?! It’s bullshit, and I don’t buy it. You’re not allowed to just- just- let that happen!”

Bull released a breath he hadn’t realized he’d been holding—he’d sort of expected wild magic. Serabaas often lashed out, even unintentionally, when they were threatened but nothing happened, Ellie just stared at the older girl with wide eyed confusion, didn’t push back or move to defend herself, not in any way other than with words.

“I…I’m not giving up I’m just being practical,” Ellie explained gently. “I really did almost die the last time I faced the Breach. It pulls on my magic and tries to take me with it, like it was going to burn me up to fuel the Mark but I dunno. I guess I passed out before it could do that, stopped it somehow. If we try again we have to succeed, no matter what, and if sealing the Breach won’t rid the world of Rifts, I have to do my best to make sure they’re gone just…just in case.”

“On the contrary, Eleanor, consider this,” Solas spoke up. “It is true your first encounter with the Breach was deadly—in point of fact you required resuscitation—but-

“What?” Sera snapped, clearly not liking the sound of that.

“Tumbles bit it for a minute, but Chuckles got her back,” Varric deadpanned.

Veshedan.

Sera groaned at that and covered up her ears like she could stop herself from hearing what she’d already heard, “No no no no no no no no no!”

Ellie had her hands on the Elf girl’s shoulder’s then, only she didn’t push, she just squeezed and said, “Sera! It’s alright! I…I’m sorry you’re so upset but you really don’t have to be its…it’s not that big of a deal.”

“What have we discussed about your being so cavalier about your life?!” Cassandra snapped.

Ellie’s hands went to her side as she turned to look at the Nevarran woman and timidly shrugged as she thought it over. “Uh. N-not to be? That’s the same as cavalierly, right? Was I doing it again?”

“Yes!”

“Sorry,” Ellie apologized, rubbing the back of her neck nervously she added. “Uh. It might help if I knew what cavalier meant?”

Cassandra took in a deep breath. “Eleanor, it means to be careless, or show lack of proper concern for something, in this instance, your life! You cannot regard your life so little that you could speak so casually of throwing your life away to the Breach! We are not asking you to lay down your life, we are working to preserve it!”

The girl blinked a few times as she processed it and then, simply, “Oh.”

“If I may,” Solas interrupted, “I did have a point I was endeavoring to make before all these asides.”

“Then by all means, make it,” Cassandra snapped.

“I understand facing the Breach the first time was certainly a death sentence but Ellie, you must remember, you were already at several disadvantages, and you survived,” Solas stressed, “You were starving, exhausted, grieving, injured. You had to fight your way to the Breach, sealing not just one, but four Rifts before attempting to seal the Breach proper. You had no training to do so, you had no assistance in casting against it, but now you will.” He continued, “Think on it, da’len. We shall not see you face the Breach as you did before. You will be well rested, fed, you’re certainly stronger now than you were then—physically and magically. It will be a simple matter of marching to the Breach, the path well maintained and clear. You will have the whole of your allies at your side. You will have Mages—myself and Madam de Fer included—that will assist to power your Mark, and Templars to weaken the Breach.”

“Cullen and myself will assist the Templars as well,” Cassandra vowed. “it will not be like last time when it was you alone casting against the Breach.”

“Lethallan, could we compromise?” Solas asked.

“Maybe,” Ellie said. “Depends.”

“Our discussion just now it has reminded me that we do intend for your fellow mages to assist powering your Mark. We have only thought of doing so in regard to the Breach, but could we not consider having me attempt to assist you when sealing Rifts? It would make for practice for sealing the Breach and may make the act of dealing with Rifts easier. It could also serve to give you some peace of mind for what facing the Breach will be like a second time.”

Kid seemed to consider it for a moment and then, “Do you think it would hurt you too, if you tried helping me seal the Rifts?”

“I do not know, Eleanor, we cannot be certain until we try,” Solas said. “The compromise comes with this—if this exercise makes you feel better about your chances surviving the Breach, we will only seal Rifts in areas of Inquisition influence. It will allow us to see if sealing the Breach will take the remaining Rifts with it—it would be a horrible thing if we could spare you the effort and didn’t.”
“One condition,” kid said, holding up an index finger, “no linking to me anymore when I seal Rifts, and we’ll try having you help power my Mark to test it out but if it hurts you too, I don’t want you doing it,” Ellie said. Then, “Oh. That sounds like two conditions then, but I’m not always the best at counting.”

“I always monitor you during fights—”

“So just promise you’ll pull away before I seal Rifts! You can do that, we’ve got switching it on and off pretty well down pat. I don’t—” oh shit the kid’s chin was quivering a bit, “I don’t want it hurting you too, okay? The Mark isn’t your problem, you shouldn’t have to deal with its side effects. Please?”

Yeah if this asshole ended up being part of the big bad behind all this, Bull was gonna kill him. Not for the Breach, but for putting this kid through hell and making her feel badly for him to boot, this sketchy-ass Basra bastard.

“You’ll truly consider not seeking out every single Rift before seeing if the Breach will seal them away? They are numerous and in places the Inquisition cannot yet influence, it could take years to garner the means to seal all of the Rifts. We cannot leave the Breach at large for so long.”

Ellie nodded. “I get that, and yeah I want the Breach sealed as soon as possible so…if, if we can be certain I’d still be uh, around to seal them then yeah, we’ll test your theory out.” Instead of extending her hand to him like she had when striking a deal with Bull, she extended her pinkie to the Elf man. “You’ll close our connection when I’m sealing Rifts, and you won’t help me if it hurts you.”

Oh Imekari. A pinkie promise. Yup. Dude was screwed. If he fucked her over, he was going to pay big time.

Huh. Were the Chargers in Haven yet? Should be. Last he heard they were in the final stretch. Hadn’t gotten todays report yet. He’d have Krem do some recon on the Elf before they got back from the Storm Coast. Maybe he’d reach out to his Ben-Hessrath contacts, see if they could find anything on where this guy came from, what he was doing before the Breach.

And of course, he’d do his own research. He’d be Elf boy’s best damn friend, see what he could get the Apostate to tell him himself.

Solas wrapped his pinkie around hers and nodded. “Agreed.”

“Whatever the hell you two just worked out better friggin work!” Sera snapped. And then, remorseful, “I’m sorry I pushed you, Inky. Shite, I didn’t hurt you, did I?”

Ellie smiled up at her and when she put her hands on her shoulders she did push the older girl, gently—just enough to jostle her before pulling her into a hug. “I’m okay! I’m sorry I got all defeat-y,” she said, pulling away.

But the Sera pulled her into her arms, squatting a bit so their faces were squished together as she hugged the girl as tightly as possible.

“We’re gonna kick the Breach right in the danglers, Inky!”
Inky was sort of dumb. Not stupid—dumb, like how babies is dumb—cause she didn’t know lots of things. Like about pies, or pranks, or loads of important stuff Sera knew all about growing up. But maybe that’s cause she had a little more help. Sort of. Shite help that it’d been, bitchy old Lady Emmald* blah! Anyway, it was dumb to just jump to crazy conclusions about dying and shite. Cause that was just…nope. Not allowed. Inky was gonna…well she had to just live for forever, alright! Or at least a good while after Sera bit it. Elves lived longer than humans but…nope. Not allowed! So, back to forever it is! Inky’s immortal, anyone who has a problem with it can friggin fight Sera!

Ugh. Enough about that crap. Inky also didn’t know about loads of kid stuff! Like hide and seek and tag and hopscotch! Though she made a joke about playing tons of Hide and Seek with Templars. So Sera wasn’t sure if that would be fun for her. Though maybe it meant she’d be real good at it. Didn’t want to lose Inky though, cause she wasn’t like Elfy with his ‘finding her’ junk. So.

“Tag! You’re it!” Sera shouted as she tore ass away from Inky.

They was waiting on Inquisition tits to get to their new campsite and set up, and that was just straight boring, and Inky was feeling better, and tag was fun! Ellie didn’t get much fun. If Sera had her job well…she wouldn’t. The world would be screwed. Or maybe not, Sera would want to go play but you couldn’t play much with a hole in the sky. But she also didn’t like nothing about those Rift shits. She’d almost taken Inky’s offer to go back to their camp and sit out on fighting more of those Rift things—they spat out demons for Andraste’s sake! But Ellie had to fight them and they was scary. So if they were scary to Sera, they had to be even scarier to Inky! Cause she was littler! And a Mage! All them demons wanted all up in her brain! It was bad enough she had Solas mucking about in it sometimes or whatever.

Anyway. Tag! Fun! Fuck the Breach!

Inky chased after Sera, oh gosh, she was fast! Gosh, huh. Maybe Inky was rubbing off on her? Nah she just thought ‘fuck’ so, probably not. Inky never swore not even littler ones. Oh! Maybe she didn’t know any swears? Sera could teach her those too!

Ohh, Lady Priss Pants wouldn’t like that at all. Yes!

“Gotcha!” Ellie giggled breathlessly as she reached out quickly switching hands—oh. She’d almost tagged her with her Marked hand.

Ugh. That made Sera feel like a real dick-head. Magic was creepy, but Ellie was alright and…and the Mark was a part of her and people already had so much shite they put on girls about their bodies and pish, making them feel low so lucky bitches or rich tits got to feel big. Sera didn’t buy into any of that garbage—who cared what she looked like? What mattered was if her body friggin worked. Foot hurt? Don’t matter if it’s beautiful or not, you fix it and move on. Hair got in her face? Chop it went!* Didn’t matter if it was pretty, it matters that she can see to shoot shite!

Anyway. Ellie didn’t deserve to feel like something on her was gross. And that’s what Sera was doing, she thought. Made her feel like…well Sera hadn’t minded her ears till Lady Emmald told her that baker was a right prick who hated Sera, cause she was an Elf. She let Sera hate him when he was just a regular bloke, and Lady Emmald was just a lying priss that would rather make Sera feel hate, feel hated because of something she couldn’t control! All so she could maintain her own stupid sense of pride by destroying Sera’s. She didn’t ask to be elfy. And she wasn’t, as far as she was concerned. She was just Sera. But, ugh, the point was—she wasn’t lying when she said magic was scary, but it was scarier the idea that she made Ellie feel badly about herself, that she could have that in common with that dead bitch.
So, Sera doubled back, stopped in place and twisted ‘round—Inky had just about caught her good—and let her tag her, pressing her shoulder into Ellie’s Marked hand. For a second she worried she might burn up or something but nothin’.

“Oh gosh, sorry!” Ellie gasped out, snatching her hand away and putting it behind her back. Shite! She was bad at this.

“S’fine Inky. I mean, it’s all good innit? The important thing is you glow,” Sera teased. “Don’t bother me none. Don’t hurt me none either so, you don’t got to be so careful, okay? Point of tag is having fun, not worrying about stupid stuff.”

Oh, that got her a smile. That was nice. “You’re it!” Ellie squealed, tapping Sera’s shoulder with her Mark hand and dashing away.

They ended up on the hill that overlooked their campsite. They finally got the fire going good, they could see the smoke, hopefully Inquisition would be ‘round soon.

Oh yuk. There was bones and some swords and stuff. Would that be scary or sad for her?

“Uh Inky maybe we should turn—” oh shite. “Inky?”

She was leaning against a bolder as she worked to catch her breath. Oh. Fun was fun but maybe she shouldn’t’ve picked something so runny. Took lots of lungs and Ellie’s had just been sick. “I’m okay,” Ellie said, a bit breathless but she was smiling and waving dismissively. “That was fun, skulls are sort of a creepy way to end things, but I liked playing tag.” She coughed a few times but it didn’t sound bad, just like it helped clear her throat a bit and then she said, “I wonder what happened up here. Huh. Look…”

Inky crouch down and brushed dirt away before picking something sort of brown but silvery and shiny up off the ground, wiping it against her cloak. “This has markings like Warden things. Maybe Blackwall will want it.”

Sera looked at it, was upside-down from her point of view ‘cause she was facing Ellie but she could read it just fine. Inky was weird just going off the picture. “Well yeah he will! It’s his! See? Warden Constable Gordon Blackwall,” Sera read off, pointing to the words. “Ha! That sucks. Warden-Gordon Blackwall? Warden-Gordon, Warden-Gordon, Warden-Gordon!”

“Oh don’t be mean, Gordon’s—” Inky tried to reprimand her but then she giggled a bit, “Yeah it’s kind of funny that it rhymes.”

“Who could take him seriously? No wonder he just goes by Blackwall. That don’t rhyme with shite. Cept maybe ball, or tall, or uh…wall…er. But those ent jobs now are they?”

Ellie nodded and then, “Come on, last one there’s a rotten egg!”

Ahh! Yeah! Inky knew ‘bout last one there!

So maybe she knew some important shite after all!

“Warden-Gordon, Warden-Gordon, Warden-Gordon!” Sera’s voice was sing-song as she and Ellie came skipping down the bank. Blackwall wondered just where they had run off to. Bull’d risen when they left, stood and just sort of turned, watching after them while they apparently went to play Tag. Cassandra had almost run after them, probably would have if it wouldn’t have looked like she were joining in their game.

Though if Ellie asked her to, Blackwall was pretty sure the Seeker would sit down and have an out-in-out pretend tea party with the girl, with zero shame. But Ellie seemed too old for that sort of thing, Liddy’d been growing out of them when she was six, one of the few things she got the chance to grow out of.

Ellie was certainly doing a lot better, her complexion was healthy, and she was rosy-cheeked and a happy sort of breathless as she came to a stop within the bounds of their camp, Sera giggling up a storm at her side as the younger girl caught her breath.

“You called?” Blackwall asked drily for Sera, but smiling for Ellie, he certainly didn’t want her thinking he was being short with her.

Sera just cackled and fell onto her bottom to finish catching her own breath.

“You’ll never guess what we found!” Ellie enthused, smile on her face, bouncing on her tip-toes with excitement, her hands behind her back.

Maker’s breath this sweet girl. Had she found something she thought he might like? Had he done something to warrant a present? She had been rather grateful for his handling the Blades business, thanked him multiple times for it, but he hardly needed it. Ellie might not think so though. Huh. There didn’t seem to be much in the way of seashells on the shore of the Storm Coast, but maybe she’d found an interesting rock or a flower or something.

She could hand him Nug dung in earnest and he was prepared to grin and thank her and tuck the droppings away for safe keeping.

“What’ve you got, Ellie-girl?” he asked.

More giggling, Maker she was excited. “Guess!” she insisted giddily.

He was bullocks at guessing, it’d be no fun for her. “I thought you said I’d never be able to,” he teased.

Ellie playfully made a show of rolling her eyes at him, but his words earned him an even brighter smile, present enough in and of itself, and then—

Nug dung would have been preferable. In fact, he was certain it wouldn’t make him sick to his stomach, have his throat drying up, heartbeat pounding blindingly in his ears and if he hadn’t already been sitting down well…well he’d probably just fallen on his arse.

In Ellie’s hands lay a Warden Constable’s badge. Warden Constable Gordon Blackwall emblazon in its seal.

“You must of dropped it when you were fighting the Darkspawn or uh,” she sounded a bit uncertain as she continued, concerned, “when you were here last…um, are you alright?”

He was standing on the sharp precipice of his lie. He hadn’t used it against Ellie so far, not really. It was she, who called him Warden Blackwall. She’d been the one unknowingly spreading the lie for him. Every point he could recall, she was the one who spoke that name, to her friends, her allies.
Somehow that felt worse than if he’d straight up lied right to her face. Ellie was honesty and he’d taken advantage of that.

His hands trembled ever so slightly, as he took Warden Blackwall’s badge from her.

“El-” he cleared his throat and then patted the empty space next to him. He stood when she sat though, he wasn’t sure…Maker he wasn’t sure how to even begin.

But he hadn’t lied to her. Let her go along with one. But never had he actually lied to her. And…he wasn’t about to.

He got on his knees before her, running his finger along the truth etched in a badge he’d never worn. Everyone was still and silent, watching—confused he was sure. Ellie certainly looked such.

“My name is Thom Rainier*. I was born in the Free Marches, Markham,” he said. “My sister’s name was Liddy, she passed when she was eight. I went on to win the Grand Tourney in my youth, and it was with that in my resume that I was recruited into the Orlesian military. I garnered the notice of Grand Duke Gaspard, and his ally Ser Robert Chapuis,” no one interrupted him. No one was certain what he was saying, but they would be. Absently, he wondered who would move to kill him first. Varric? Cassandra? Would Ellie find it within herself to do so? It would be just if she did.

“I did well in the Orlesian army, and when I retired I formed a mercenary crew of my own. We practiced for two years before I got a contract from Gaspard and Chapuis. This was when Gaspard was making one of his original moves for the Empire’s throne. He wanted an ally of Empress Celene taken out of the picture. Lord Vincent Callier. These men, they were my friends, we’d fought together, defended each other’s lives. I was honor bound to help them as I could—at the time. If I were a better man, I’d not entertained the notion for a moment. He wasn’t military, or a warrior, he was just some political pawn Celene over played, pi—angered Gaspard, dinged Chapuis’s pride. Looking back, it was petty political nonsense. Not worth a moment’s thought, let alone bloodshed.” Hindsight was…well. He wish he’d known then what he knew now. “I delivered my men their orders, and we went to intercept the Lord when he was in travel. He was meant to be alone but…he’d allies of his own. Been tipped off and thought…” Blackwall swallowed against the bile building in his throat. “My men descended upon his carriage with orders to kill anyone inside. It wasn’t until it was too late that I realized Lord Callier had taken his family with him in an effort to dissuade any such attack—thought having his wife and his children surrounding him would save him from the onslaught.”

He didn’t need Qunari hearing to realize Ellie had stopped breathing or was at the very least holding her breath. Her covered head was bowed, staring down into her hands resting on her lap, drops of wet dripping into her palms.

“This was a highly political movement and Gaspard wanted nothing linking back to his involvement. There was no paperwork, nothing. I told my men they were to attack a carriage, kill everyone inside…” Maker preserve their souls, “and they did. It was a massacre. My men were arrested or ran. Gaspard denounced the act entirely—nothing tied him to it so he was able to sit back and earn sympathy for how very heartbroken he was over the tragic loss of Lord Callier, his family. Chapuis killed himself. And I ran.” Somehow that almost felt like the worst of it. He’d just…run. “I was drinking myself into oblivion in this little bar in Churneau, when the village militia started harassing the barmaid. I came to her defense. Man sitting at the end of the bar stood up, shook my hand, and introduced himself. His name was Warden Blackwall, and he saw potential in me. Would I perhaps be interested in joining the Wardens?”
Ellie looked up at him then, eyes wide, tears streaming down her face as she trembled. Her voice rasped out, “You didn’t…” and her expression crumbled.

Oh, Maker, no, “I didn’t,” he vowed. It was the truth, every word. “Not what you’re thinking. I agreed. We were on our way to Val Chevin, for me to take my vows. We were ambushed by Darkspawn here on the Coast. There was a blow meant for me, that Warden Blackwall took upon himself, and it killed him. That medal was on his body when he perished. That was five years ago.” Had it truly been that long? Some days it seemed on yesterday he’d come across the Warden man, and others it felt he’d been Warden Blackwall for centuries. “I could have continued on to Val Chevin, taken the oath but…Warden Blackwall, he was a pillar of the Warden community. He had no criminal background, he joined the Wardens simply out of honor, not circumstance. He gave his life to the order, made an example of what a true Warden should be. He was responsible for recruiting new members in his old age and I…I did not see a reason for that to stop. What could Thom Rainier bring to the Wardens? Nothing worthy. I let Thom Rainier die that day, and I moved on as Warden Blackwall, traversing Ferelden and working in the name of the Order, continuing the good work of a better man.”

He heard Bianca being removed from her holster and then, “You fucking low life son of a —” “Varric!” Ellie half shouted, half…it sounded broken, her voice. She held up her hand and something like Barrier wavered over him—not bubbly and protective but more like bland obligation, and he wasn’t sure if her hand motion had cast the spell or if it was meant to still the Dwarf whose finger was trembling over the trigger.

“I…don’t know what to do with this. I…m-magic…you might have lied but it doesn’t. S-so.” She sniffled, the sound staggering, and she bit down harshly on her bottom lip for a moment before, “We will have to uh…figure out h-how to m-move on from here,” she looked at Blackwall then. “L-Liddy wasn’t a lie?”

“No. No, swe—.” ‘sweetheart’ was hardly going to fix things. He’d give anything to fix things. “I swear,” he tried, “I’ve never lied to you, not directly. I just…your information told you I was Warden Blackwall and I never refuted it. Liddy wasn’t a lie.” None of it was, not his vows to serve the Inquisition, to serve her. None of it.

“She was just little, so you might not be familiar with this,” Ellie said. “Kids throw tantrums. Teen girls, at least in my case,” she leveled him a hallow look, “we’re more of a silent treatment sort. You don’t have to leave. But I’m not talking to you until…well right now I feel like never. But I’m not s—” she stumbled on the word as if she wasn’t certain she was speaking the truth if she said it, and it killed him that he’d made her feel this way, made her think it might be a lie for her to say, “I’m not stupid. Lie or no, magic wouldn’t have said you were important for sealing the Breach unless you were. Sera didn’t even give me her name when it knew. So. Just.” She stood then, “Do whatever. But don’t talk to me.”

He nodded, tentatively, worried even that would end whatever measure of patience she was teetering on. He said nothing, and she turned heel and stormed away from their camp, walking up the hill that would let her see if their Soldiers were on their way to set up their site, Sera popped up, made to follow her, turned to look back at Blackwall and she made a face at him—used one middle finger to draw down the lower lid of an eye, while she stuck up her tongue and held up the other middle finger, jerking it about before she stomped after Ellie.

“Talk to her again and I’ll fucking end you,” Varric swore, and then he, a Dwarf who had expressed more than once, his weariness of the sea, stomped down to the shoreline, to stand in the splash of the waves. Anything to be away from him. To not break faith with Ellie, Black—...he supposed. Solas looked...disinterested. Like he didn’t care to condemn or commend him, just...indifferent. He went and joined the Dwarf on the shore.

“I am going to Eleanor,” Cassandra said quietly to Bull who nodded. And then to him she said, “Your fate has yet to be decided though were it up to me you would be dead where you stand. I suggest you make yourself scarce. Eleanor would not cast you out, but I will. Do not be here when we return.”

He waited for Cassandra to walk away, up the hill to join Ellie, and Sera, before he dared to rise to his feet. The Warden Constable medal slipped from his hands and clattered against the stones underfoot. He didn’t bother to pick it up.

“She’s not done with you. The kid,” Bull said from where he sat by the fire. “Don’t do anything stupid. Wait it out.”

He nodded again, and then he did as the Seeker said. Heading for the river, and the woods that lay beyond, he made himself scarce.

Boss girl might have said she was giving Blackwa...er...whoever the fuck, the silent treatment, but she was pretty quiet around everyone in the days that followed. She didn’t say much when she came back to camp, though she did see the Grey Warden badge laying on the ground and tucked it away in a cloak pocket.

She woke up, prayed in silence with Seeker. Sera joined them—not to make ‘wordy thoughts’ really except maybe a few to the Maker, she said. She just liked being up when ‘Inky’ was, liked sitting with her. They took on breakfast, and afterward Ellie led them around to find the Astarium things because they always lead to cool treasure apparently—and they did, it was bitchin. And she quietly led them to those weird-ass glowing skulls and used them to find the even weirder ass glowing shards. Seeker explained they wanted to find out what they were and if they could be useful to the Inquisition. Apparently, her bodyguard, Marehis, was off in Orlais investigating a lead on that—that was one of the few times Ellie spoke up, asking if Cassandra had heard from Marehis at all. She had, and Marehis was faring well, missed Ellie. That’d gotten the quiet admission that the kid was missing her too, the words came with a look like the kid was holding back tears. It sounded like homesickness in her voice—like she really wanted her minder here to give her advice on how to handle all this shit being thrown at her on the Coast. Cassandra carefully put an arm around the girl’s shoulders, and they walked like that the rest of the way until Ellie made to get another shard from some great precarious reach.

Bull was able to help with that, actually, he’d lift her up to reach high places, step up and grab stuff for her that she’d have had to climb to reach herself. Something about it made him even more appreciative of his size—and he already had a strong appreciation for it.

It was day two, they finally got a smile out of her. Shit, it felt good—admittedly even more so because Bull could take credit for it. Not to blow his own war horn, but he’d taught the kid how to make pancakes. She was great at mixing them up, but she had a hell of a time trying to flip them. Her hands were small, the spatula was big, and so was the round, cooking blob of batter. He’d had to help her, his hand over hers as they worked together to flip it teaching her how—that’d gotten a little spark in her eyes. The next pancake they made, she flipped it all on her own and damn, he almost gave a victory cry when she smiled in excitement, pleased and proud she’d been able to do something so simple, and she’d given that smile to him. Shit. It was like a damn medal. Except he’d sound like a total loser bragging about it.

Didn’t stop him from bragging about it in his report to Krem. Your little girlfriend’s been feeling down—sad, not sick—and guess who made her smile? That’s right. Your god, The Iron Fucking Bull. I. am. King.

Day three he expected another piece of parchment with Krem’s middle finger drawn all nice on it but uh, no. There was a spare piece of parchment that came with Krem’s report—a report that detailed his search of Solas’s quarters, he’d found nothing super sketchy, just tomes about Fade magic, and, what was most interesting, letters. Love letters. From that Marehis chick that protects Ellie. No one said anything about it, kid obviously didn’t know, and Bull’d noticed Solas sending letters to Ellie’s bodyguard, but he hadn’t seen their contents, just figured he was reporting to her about Ellie since he had that weird magic stuff. So, either he was in a blooming relationship with the Elf woman, or she was spamming him with sexual harassment mail. Krem said they read like non-threatening, non-creepy, regular old love letters so.

Speaking of love letters. The extra piece of parchment in his report.

It wasn’t a letter exactly, it was ‘origami’, Krem called it in his post script of his report to Bull. The extra parchment was folded up into an intricate looking flower blossom, that he was instructed to pass along to Ellie and son of a bitch, it made her smile for the second time—big and genuine, and damn Krem, that was smooth. Not Bull’s style, but smooth.

“What’s this?” Ellie’d asked, intrigued when Bull deposited the paper blossom in her hands.

“From Cremisius. I might have let it slip you were having a bad day—nothing detailed,” he promised. He hadn’t even mentioned the fake Warden in his Ben-Hessrath reports, just sent off a detailing of their progress on the Coast, sealing the Rifts. “He told me to pass it along.”

Que big smile and then, “That’s so sweet,” she murmured, running a finger carefully along the edge of a paper petal.

“What’s it supposed to be?” Sera asked.

“A peony,” Ellie said quietly, cheeks going the shade of pink an actual blossom of this sort would be.

For her part, Seeker was sitting quiet and still except for the hand she slapped over her mouth to keep her from saying something. Or maybe squealing. There was a sort of vibe rolling off her that screamed ‘this is so cute, I might just die’.

Solas, with some measure of amusement, taught the kid a little charm to keep her present dry. And Varric grumbled a bit as he jotted down notes in his journal. Bull had been informed by Cassandra that the Dwarf man had wanted some great romantic interest for Ellie as an element for his book but being faced with the reality that someone might actually be pursuing the girl he found so precious romantically was not the delightful side quest he’d thought it would be.

Bull kind of felt that. Big part of him was rooting them on, if Krem liked her enough to be able to handle all the Herald stuff that would come with it, he should go for it, shit, the girl was sweet. Accepting, warm, compassionate, tough. If she came in Bull’s size, he’d be pursuing a woman like that in a heartbeat. But she didn’t, she was a kid and that sort of made him feel like he didn’t want her traversing the trials and tribulations of dating at all. Not until she was. Dunno. Old enough she could tear the heart from a lover that scorned her and stomp it into the ground, walk away like nothing happened. But something told him it wouldn’t matter how old she was, Ellie would still be too sweet for that.

What made him most comfortable was that it was Krem. The guy would turn himself over to those assholes in Tevinter before he hurt someone like Ellie. He wasn’t a horn dog, and he was respectful, he couldn’t think of anyone he’d trust her with more. But uh, did make him a little conflicted. He was always on Krem’s side. Always had been and had never thought of a situation where he would ever not be.

But if he somehow did manage to hurt her, Bull was pretty sure he’d be the first in the line of their party members to break his face. He’d help him fight off the rest of the vengeance-seekers but uh, yeah. He was fixing to be on Ellie’s side just a little bit. Then Krem’s. Bros right after uh, nope. Not calling the kid that, he’d have to fight himself.

“Cassandra, would you help me with a letter?” Ellie asked looking up from the paper blossom in her hands.

“Of…of course Eleanor,” the Nevarran woman said, “Though if you wish to pen a response to Cremisius, you may prefer to do so yourself.”

“Oh. No I was just going to thank Cremisius when we get back to Haven,” Ellie said, shaking her head. “No, I want to get word to the advisors.”

“Whatever for?” Cassandra asked as she made to retrieve ink, quill, and parchment.

Varric looked like he was holding his breath, actually scratch that, he definitely was. Poor guy, he was terrified she was about to disclose a courtship to them or something, wasn’t he? He was so screwed.

Ellie set her paper blossom aside and withdrew the Warden Constable medal from her cloak.

“I’d like to inform the Inquisition, and the Grey Wardens, that Warden Constable Gordon Blackwall has died, while assisting Inquisition efforts on the Storm Coast.”

The sound of rain pattering against her hood was nice, comforting despite the chill of it. It helped that The Iron Bull was sweet enough to walk alongside her as they made their way across the river and further into the woods, the others trailing behind them. Maker he was warm, and she was pretty sure she would love him forever for it.

At least he’d had some great honking secret, something he’d have been justified to keep secret, and he’d still told her. Been honest from the start!

Oh. She wasn’t still unfathomably mad about it anymore, it was a complicated situation all around. She could understand a little—Cassandra had brought to question if they could pursue cases she had piled up from the Seekers, taking out criminals of the Chantry that the Templars weren’t dealing with. She’d been fine helping Cassandra track down Ser Torn in the Hinterlands and kill him. Not that she could do something so unthinkable as send her party to kill off children without raising question about it, but…she understood loyalty and wanting to help your friends. Thom Rainier made bad friends and had gotten played. Gaspard shouldn’t have called the hit, and if that Callier man knew what he was in for, he should have surrounded himself with armed guards, not his wife and children as human meat shields.

And Thom’s men shouldn’t have killed them. full stop. Orders or no orders, there are just some lines you do not cross. Maybe kill that political putz, its not like he deserved a great deal of mercy for his part in that horror fest, but Maker. Children?

Thom hadn’t killed them. Gave the orders—to kill the Lord!—it was his men, and whatever messed up ideals they had that let them kill without question. But he blamed himself entirely, and yeah, Ellie felt that too. Responsibility. Maker, when they found their soldiers slain at the hands of the Blades, she’d felt like she’d sent them to their deaths herself.

Well, it was little wonder now, why the man regarded himself so very low. Ellie…wasn’t a hundred percent she could ever look at him the same way again. He’d lied, and she hated that. She’d felt used and stupid. She was stupid, and she was really gullible sometimes but…oh, blah! Sera’d tried teaching her swears. She knew swears, just didn’t use them. She really wanted to take up the practice now though.

Ugh. She wouldn’t but “Gosh!” didn’t feel like it did this situation justice! Gosh!

“Okay there boss? That’s the third time you’ve uh, huffed all angry-like,” Bull said quietly.

“If we did this when I stopped being angry about it, we’d have to make a trip all the way back here from Haven. Doing this now. It’s been like four days. So,” she shrugged.

It’d been four days since the man formerly known as Blackwall left their camp. And d-um. Er. Darn was okay! Darn it! She hated that she was kind of worried about him. He’d been all alone before, so he was probably alright but still. Ellie was worried. He hadn’t exactly packed a bag, or anything just walked away with what he had on him.

She was worried because she cared, she’d loved him. just like she loved all of the people the Inquisition had brought into her life. That’s what made all of this so…hurtful. She loved him and now she couldn’t be sure who he was. He’d said he’d not lied to her face, and not lied about his past—what he’d told her of it before all this—but…he’d been living a lie for five years! And he just let her spread that lie for him! Made her a liar!

She’d lied to Marehis! And Scout Harding! And just about everyone! She’d wanted to disappear when she sat with Cassandra while the woman wrote that letter to the advisors yesterday with the news of ‘Blackwalls’ demise, with a separate missive detailing the truth and what was to become of Thom Rainier. She hated admitting to them that she’d been lied to, and had lied to them, and they’d all been tricked!

She got lying—she’d had to lie loads of times to protect herself and people she cared about, and she sort of thought maybe this was the same thing. But in her case she was lying because some political nonsense Ages ago said that her just being alive was a crime she deserved to be locked away for! So, she either kept her magic to herself or straight up lied to keep herself safe. Rainier had done the same thing but…his crime was legitimate. It was something he’d done—she hadn’t chosen to be born, hadn’t chosen to be a Mage, whereas he’d chosen to take the life of a civilian, and in the mix of things his men murdered innocents! He was running and hiding to protect himself from incarceration or even a death sentence, taken on someone else’s life to escape it. Taken on a lie.

Lying to trick for selfish reasons was dumb, hateful and awful. Unless it was to protect someone from harm, you should be forthright about your public business! Everyone was entitled to their privacy—things were private like super personal stuff—but privacy didn’t cover every single aspect of your entire life! You didn’t get privacy when you were living someone else’s life! That’s called acting! And that’s a super public thing! They sell tickets and everything!

Another angry huff. Bull chuckled and patted her on the back. That was nice.

What wasn’t nice was the burning in her hand, Marked one, worse than usual but they’d deal with that next.

Magic was thrumming along, timidly reassuring. It helped her find her way through the woods, following the trail—though there wasn’t really a visible one except for the occasional boot print that hadn’t been completely washed away—to Thom Rainier.

To his tent, it would seem. Not a super nice one, like the Inquisition had, it looked like he’d just set up camp in an abandoned tent, it was old and moldy and soaked from rain.

His boots stuck out from the opening of it, sleeping with most of his body under the cover of the crummy tent. Part of her wanted to say “good! I’m glad your tent is crummy!” but…she mostly just felt bad she hadn’t come out to get him sooner.

Of course, Varric was still hot to shoot the man, Sera too for that matter, so. It was likely for the best that she’d let their tempers cool off a bit more.

Cassandra had been murderous, but she was the one Ellie had talked to the most about it. When everyone else was asleep, they’d gone to sit by the now dormant occularm on the hill near their camp, under the cover of the trees there and she’d done an embarrassing amount of crying over it, but mostly they just talked, and debated, and considered their options.

In the end, there was only one thing that could be done.

---

A gentle kick to the bottom of his boot.

And then, “Wake up, Rainier. I’m tired, and mad at you, but I still love you. We’ve got stuff to do, so get up.”

Ellie’s voice. Oh Maker. Was she truly here? Was she talking to him?

It’d been how long? He’d sort of wandered aimlessly and then stumbled upon this abandoned camp and just laid down. At some point he’d gotten hungry. Laid there a while, but eventually he’d gone and got something together. There was all kind of edible fauna. Throw that in with some nug meat he’d called it a day and then…well, when the Seeker banished him he wasn’t exactly sure when or if they’d come for him again. He’d laid back down and hadn’t really felt convicted enough to get back up.

Now though, he sat up straight in the tent he’d found, it wasn’t the best campsite, but he didn’t exactly deserve the best of life right now did he? His face ended up covered in the moldy sheet overhead and he scrambled as he ended up a bit caught in the tenting and Maker’s balls he didn’t have time with this—what?! She was tired, she said? Was she sick? She was mad at him yeah that was a given but Maker—she had loved him? That was...he didn’t deserve that. Still loved him? What?

Damn him, was she crying now? Something, muffled, it sounded like sobbing—

Oh. When he finally whipped the mangled sheet up over his head, freeing himself, he realized she was laughing. Hard, loud laughter, the girl was doubled over with it.

All of them were for the most part—the entire party was with Ellie, though they were standing a way off, as if to let her deal with the man herself. But, no crying, just laughing at his expense for his clumsiness—an expense he was more than willing to pay.

“I’m still mad at you!” the girl insisted, made sure that he knew, as she calmed from her laughter and wiped her eyes. Maker, she could be mad for as long as she liked he was just glad...he was just glad to see her again. This had been worse than those days in Haven.

“Of course, yes. Good,” he was quick to say, “I would be too. Am, really. Mad at myself, that is. You...you still want my help?” he asked uncertainly.

The girl looked down at him and nodded, crossing her arms over her chest. “You’ve lied to us this whole time, but you’ve also helped us this whole time, too. And magic wouldn’t have said you were important unless you were,” she said. “But no more lies. I’ve already made arrangements. As of yesterday, Warden Constable Gordon Blackwall died in service to the Inquisition. We’ll send word to the Wardens though I doubt we’ll hear anything given they’re all missing still. Leliana and the other advisors have been filled in. When we return to Haven you’ll be reintroduced to everyone as Thom Rainier, and we’ll just move on from there. No more lying. None, Thom.”

It couldn’t be as simple as all that. “Thom Rainier is wanted by Orlais—”

“I’m not totally stupid,” the girl snapped. “We’ve been in contact with Leliana. It’s being dealt with. She and Lady Josie are in talks with Orlesian authorities and they’re positive we can work it out with them—your volunteer work, we’re terming it, with the Wardens, and your continuing service with the Inquisition will pay penance for your part in the Callier attack.”

That was all...what? Really?

He...

What?

“Well? Are you just going to sit there, or can we get a move on?” Ellie asked, impatience was an unfamiliar tone to her voice, but he deserved worse than that. But then she Maker, preserve him, she blanched a bit and crouched down to be level with him, ungloving her unmarked hand and resting it against his forehead. “When did you last eat? Did you have that fire going at all this entire time?”

“I...” he wasn’t sure what to say. In fact he was almost afraid to guess, if he was wrong that...well he’d be right back in the lying business wouldn’t he? No more, about anything, she’d said. “How long has it been?” he asked instead.

“G-Gosh!” she stumbled over the word with shock and then, “Thom! It’s been four days!”
“I merely lost track, haven’t been paying much attention. I did have a fire going for a while, not surprised its cold now though, I didn’t keep it tended. I ate um, the second day,” he was most certain of it, anyway.

She didn’t look any less horrified at the notion. She set about digging around in her pockets—cloak, her armor’s overcoat. She came away with crumbling shortbread and an apple.

Shortbread came first, she handed it to him saying, “Stay sitting, eat this. You have your canteen?” she asked.

He nodded, doing as he was told. She held out her hand and he gave her his canteen which she shook and then uncapped. “You haven’t refilled this have you?” she asked, in tones that sounded parts concerned and accusatory.

“No,” he hadn’t really drank from it much, there was no need to refill when it was still mostly full.

She pulled Elf Root potion from her belt and poured its contents into his canteen before capping and shaking it up and then handing it to him. “Drink it all. We’ll refill when we’re on our way.”

He’d drain the sea if it pleased her. Maker, was she really taking him with her? Oh. She was. He was…huh, she’d probably use a word like ‘loopy’, he realized. Dazed and a bit confused. Who wouldn’t be?

He wasn’t prepared for this. He thought…maybe he’d get to see her one last time, but it would be to deliver his death sentence in some form or another. Death, he’d already died before. He’d been more than ready to do so, permanently this time.

And here she was, an offer of redemption. The sentence of living and earning forgiveness. Making the idea obtainable. It…he’d feared this very thing would happen someday, had resisted it but…maybe it was because he wasn’t of his right mind, delirious from exposure and hunger and sudden offers of redemption he still couldn’t wrap his head around. Once his truth was exposed, and he’d seen all the sort of damage his lie had done he wanted nothing more, nothing in all his life, more than her forgiveness.

Because forgiveness would mean his harm was reversed—not with Callier, never with that—but with her. He’d hurt her, betrayed her trust, shaken that fragile sense of security in who she could put faith in—she could trust so few with the life she lead now and he’d compromised that for her.

And worse. Something he had picked up on, faster than her offered path of forgiveness, I’m not totally stupid, she’d said.

He made her doubt herself. Made her feel she was a fool for having trusted, for being herself and that was…he couldn’t let that stand. He had to prove to her she hadn’t. He would regain her trust, tenfold, and show her that her magic hadn’t been wrong. That it had been him who should have doubted himself, that he’d been the foolish one, playing pretend he was someone he wasn’t. He wasn’t going to play a better man, he was going to be a better man.

If it was the last thing he did, he would right his every wrong to this girl that could be so hurt, betrayed by him, and still fret over him. Who worried that punishment she hadn’t even put upon him—Cassandra had, and it was justified, he deserved much worse—had harmed him.
He downed the potion-mixed-water and when she stood, he stood. His legs sort of wondered what he was doing, the blood rushed to them proper for the first time in a while. But he had to get a move on. She obviously had something pressing she wanted to get to and Maker mark his words he was going to help her.

She took his canteen from him and handed him the apple. “Eat,” she said, and then she turned on her heel and rejoined the rest of her party, heading back toward the river. He made himself busy eating as they walked. He was a bit outside the formation of party members that sort of walled him off from Ellie, Varric walked with his fists balled up and jammed down into his coat pockets, resolutely endeavoring not to pummel or shoot the man Ellie was providing repentance.

Made him a bit breathless for a moment, because it made him realize Varric and the others…he’d thought they may well cut him down in the midst of their next skirmish, just to be rid of him. But they wouldn’t do anything to hurt Ellie and…doing something like that would hurt her he realized. Maker, his loss would hurt her. He didn’t deserve that sort of care, he’d always known that but…he was going to earn it. He’d always just skimped by accepting he wasn’t worthy, but he’d never attempted to do anything about it, he realized then. Instead of wallowing he should have picked himself up and done something worthwhile—on his own, not raising himself up on someone else’s acclaim.

“Eleanor, camp is northward,” Cassandra gently offered. Her posture was stiff as she very pointedly ignored the W—uh. Thom…Rainier. That was going to take more getting used to. Everyone was walking along as if he weren’t trailing after Ellie but that was just as well. Roles reversed, he’d never look at himself again.

“Sorry, I was thinking too much earlier! I forgot to say anything,” she offered the woman apologetically, “We’re not heading back to camp, if that’s alright with everyone,” her left fist clenched, the movement fast and she cleared her throat a bit. “There’s another Rift.”

“You’re certain? Our scouts are very thorough,” Cassandra said.

“I’m positive, felt it once we got to the river earlier,” Ellie assured her. “big one. So if…” she turned her head a bit, to speak more so in his direction. “If anyone doesn’t feel up for it, you’d better head on back to camp.”

No way. He was going to fight whatever she did until he was dead. End of story.

When they got to the river, Ellie knelt and refilled his canteen before handing it back to him and doing the same with her own, everyone set about topping off their water supply. Thom wondered what he should do with the apple core he was left with but there was a little Nug drinking from the river edge and he tossed it to the creature which stopped what it was doing to give a happy little chirp before taking what was left of the apple and scurrying off with it.

Oh, and it made Ellie smile just a bit and that was nice.

The smile slipped along with the canteen cap from her Marked fingers and she gasped, hand clenching again, involuntarily it looked like. Sera was quick to snatch up the cap before it could float to the bottom of the river, popping it back on for the younger girl.

“Ellie?” Solas spoke with some measure of concern.

“No point,” she said quickly, trying to gloss over something. “We’ll seal it, and it’ll be all good. We can test out your helping power my Mark, yeah?” she offered a bit hopefully.
No point?

Oh Maker, she’d said something similar days ago, when they’d realized just how awful sealing those Rifts were. She’d always just shaken out her hand and kept moving, but he’d considered it had to be somewhat painful. It’d never occurred to him it might be as bad as it truly was.

She’d been able to tell where Rifts were, even without consulting their maps if they were near enough, and how powerful they were going to be. She had to have something to measure that by.

“Inky? Your Mark hurt?” Sera asked tentatively.

“Hmm,” she seemed to consider the question as she stood and stretched, Sera rose with her and the younger girl popped up on tip toes to kiss her on the cheek. “Only when I breathe,” she said with a shrug and a smile like she intended it to come off as teasing.

Sera didn’t look like she was reassured by the younger girl’s blitheness. The Elf girl groaned a bit and picked up the pace to walk next to Ellie and took the girl’s Marked hand, holding it fast like doing so could will the Mark to stop hurting.

Though she did have to drop that hand eventually as they walked along, because there was a loud growl, and then a roar. Bears, plural, descended from the river bank.

Huh. Well, that would explain there being a Rift out this way that went unseen. Bears were hellions, more demon than most demons, Thom thought. He’d heard them about when he was on his own, it’d sounded like there were many in these parts it was little wonder their Scouts hadn’t been able to survey this area much.

Bubbly security trickled over his skin, Ellie’s Barrier as it should be, he was glad she would still do so for him. She moved to put herself between Sera and the Bears, pushing the older girl back a bit to prompt her to seek higher ground because Maker, these horrible creatures were fast approaching, and while it’d been heartening to see Sera’s reticence over the Mark was quelled, she still wasn’t of a mind to allow for Barrier.

Thom had his sword in hand and charged one of the oncoming bears. Ellie squealed in surprise when Bull got right up behind her, one hand holding his axe while the other arm wrapped around her waist to hoist her up and around, moving her out of the way before he backed Thom up going head to head against the bears. Or head to horn, the Qunari man was squaring up with the bear he’d taken on, they were roughly the same size after all.

Cassandra joined them, and surprisingly…well, it should be so surprising, she was a woman of strong character, had a code for battle she stuck to with conviction…she assisted Thom, without hesitation.

When the bears were dealt with, Thom was almost tempted to jest at Varric. A few of his bolts had been the deciding factor between victory or death in the bear Thom had fought. He wanted to see if the Dwarf would swear at him or if he’d rather say something like he’d missed his mark, than admit he’d assisted his former ‘frenemy’.

The term was Ellie’s, not his, but it was rather fitting he supposed.

“Eleanor, are you injured?” Cassandra called out, immediately rounding to seek the girl out.

“Nope!” Ellie said, “All good! Everyone else okay? How are we looking on potions?”
Sera, Solas, and Varric were just fine, unscathed as Ellie was, since they’d been able to attack from afar.

Cassandra, himself, and Bull had all had to knock back draughts mid fight. Ellie worried at that a little, she stepped up on a rock to be taller, getting on tiptoes and nearly slipping off the thing but Bull was quick steady her, and crouched a bit when he realized she was trying to get a better look at the half-bleeding half-bruising on his forehead over his good eye. She made a concerned sound that almost sounded like cooing as she examined it.

She ended up taking out that jar of stuff that boy, what was his name? Cremisius. The salve he’d sent her. That was for chest congestion wasn’t it?

But he remembered Ellie’d offered him such a remedy when he’d been injured in the Hinterlands, something about it being disinfecting and healing. There were little flecks of green in it, a sort of topical Elf-root that wouldn’t drain their potion stores further.

He made this girl feel stupid. It made him sort of wish Varric would punch him.

She opened the jar and Bull held it for her while she got a thin dab on her index finger before using her other hand to shield his eye in case rain or sweat carried the salve out of place before she could get it rubbed in, she tapped the stuff gently to the injury.

“Sorry it hurts, I’m almost done,” she promised the Qunari.

“Don’t sweat it boss,” Bull said, sounding amused that she thought she might be doing something that he could qualify as hurting him.

When she was done she tucked away the jar and popped a little kiss just above the Qunari’s eyebrow like that would finish off the remedy she’d applied. He gave her a hand as she hopped down off the rock, and she looked giddy for a moment, like she’d been delighted by the splash she’d made in the river, before she rounded on Cassandra, having the woman roll up her sleeve. No bleeding but it would bruise later from great bear paw bashing against it, she made a sympathetic sound at that and Cassandra went a bit red in her cheeks with embarrassment when the girl kissed the reddening skin on her forearm before rolling the leather sleeve back down into place and giving it a little pat.

She looked to Rainier then, but then she looked at her feet when she offered, “Are you alright, Thom?”

He was weary, and the bears had certainly knocked him around a bit, but potion had done much to heal him, especially riding on the back of the Elf Root she’d had him drink not too long ago. “I’m well, thank you.”

She nodded then and looked to everyone else. “Shouldn’t be too much farther now,” she promised them. “Maybe later we should send people to uh, collect stuff from the bears? Fur and the like, it’d be a shame to let it go to waste.”

“Certainly, Eleanor,” Cassandra said.

She kept them moving then, and when they found the Rift’s hiding place, well.

Ellie paled considerably and actually stepped back away from the cave entrance, eyes wide as she knocked into Cassandra walking behind her, the Nevarran woman quick to brace the girl, hands on her arms.
“Eleanor?” she asked quietly, mildly alarmed. Was she hurt?

“All good,” Ellie said, voice pitching a bit high, “we’re all good just uh, there’s a lot of…” she looked to her Elf friend, “Sera. I can’t do it justice, would you mind?”

“There’s a shit ton of friggin spiders! Shite!” Sera screeched on her behalf.

“Sums it up nice, thanks!”

Varric looked almost amused then, “You’re afraid of spiders too, huh?”

“I-just a bit,” Ellie admitted, embarrassed.

Maker bless her, the girl went headlong into battle with men and demons two, three, four—hell in the case of Pride demons twenty—times her size brazen and ready to fight, but Spiders elicited such trepidation in her.

“I got ‘em!” Bull announced, drawing his axe and giving off a war cry as he rushed headlong into the cave. “You wanna piece of this you six-eyed freaks? I’m the Iron Fucking Bull!”

The Qunari’s antics left Ellie looking surprised for a moment and then she started giggling, casting to protect them as they joined their ally in facing the horrible things. Rainier didn’t care for them much himself, but he couldn’t blame the girl for being frightened of them, it did make him all the more glad to fight them for her.

They saw the Rift then, shimmering and crackling in the back of the cave.

“Everyone ready?” Ellie asked.

She hadn’t been exaggerating when she said it was a big one—demons of Despair poured from the blasted thing with spirits and a Rage demon to top it all off, and this was just the first wave. And the second wasn’t any more forgiving—it was a difficult thing to count those Spirits when they were so quick and many you weren’t sure how many more you had to deal with until they were all finished off, Maker, they were wretched things!

When Ellie raised her hand to seal the Rift, Solas and Cassandra joined her raising their own hands and Rainier saw the Rift shrink in size as the Seeker used her Templar training to suppress the thing while Solas worked with Ellie, powering her Mark as she cast to seal it shut.

Ellie was wide eyed when she rounded on her friends and grabbed hold of an arm from each of them, “Are you two alright?”

“It was a bit tiresome but nothing detrimental, Eleanor. I feel no discomfort from suppressing the Rift,” Cassandra reported.

“Neither did I,” Solas agreed.

“Really?”! Ellie asked, excitedly. “That’s so great! Gosh, that was so much easier than usual, you guys were a really big help!”

“Didn’t hurt so bad this time, did it Inky?” Sera asked.

“Nope!”

Oh, Thom breathed a sigh of relief. Thank the Maker.
“It was a lot better than doing it on my own!” Ellie said as she looked to Solas, “The Breach is going to be tough, but I think I’m more likely to die from tripping and falling into the crater on my way to close it than from actually casting against it with Mages and Templars on our side.”

Sera gave an excited yelp and then, “The Breach can eat it!”

It was awkward, the walk back from the cave. Once the Rift was dealt with, and they’d collected all of the Shards—there’d been one of those horrid skull devices in the very back of the cave—there was nothing more to do, really, no task at hand other than getting back to camp, settling in for the evening.

Cassandra still could not bring herself to look at that man. Rainier. He’d been a friend and an ally, an excellent help to Eleanor and then…he’d completely betrayed that girl’s trust. All, of their trust. He should have paid for his crimes a long time ago, but he had been a coward, ran and hid instead of owning up to what he had done.

Though there was something…ugh. This man better truly prove himself of use to the Inquisition. If so, then perhaps it was meant to be. Perhaps it was divine providence—his choices, shameful as they’d been—preserved his life, lead him to be in the right place at the right time to assist the Inquisition, and Eleanor. If he had been convicted of his crimes, he would surly be in prison still, or perhaps dead.

Eleanor was weary when they returned to camp, and Cassandra stared after her in mild concern when the girl yawned and stretched and said she was going to take a nap, if that was alright with them.

“Solas?” Cassandra asked quietly once the girl was in their tent. There was no ‘mega-tent’ this time, three tents for their party were set up. Varric had been livid when Eleanor chose to spare Rainier, and return him to their group, it was the first time the Dwarf man had raised his voice in anger at the girl. She’d handled it well, and placated him, enough so that he begrudgingly accepted it but there was ‘no way in hell’ he was sharing a tent with the ‘bastard’. They secured another tent and set it up so the men could sleep separately, which suited well enough, they did share rather cramped quarters with Bull in their midst.

And it wouldn’t do to tempt Varric with such easy access to go through with the thought of slitting the Human man’s throat as he slept.

Solas took a moment to focus on his connection to Eleanor and then, “She is merely exhausted, Cassandra. Not sick, or in as much pain any longer. I did not realize, though I should have…when the Mark detects Rifts, it burns more intensely, reacts to them. The more it burns the bigger the Rift, and the more…reactive—the thing sort of flares against her magic—it gets, the closer it is.”

“More intensely?” Sera asked, Maker the vapid girl did pick up on tiny details every now and again and it always surprised Cassandra, “You mean that friggin thing like actually burns all the time? I know its all shiny but I thought that was just a light show. It don’t feel like much when you touch it, just sort of hummy.”

Cassandra thought so as well, it was strange, though now it was familiar, the thrum of Eleanor’s Mark when her hand was bared, but she thought Eleanor experienced the same effect.

“You are not affected—you aren’t from the Fade,” Solas said, “and the Mark isn’t latched on to your physical form, as it is with Ellie. It is in constant contact with her magic, and while not debilitating all of the time there is always some measure of discomfort, even out of reach of the Rifts. Perhaps when the Breach is gone, and the Rifts as well, there will be nothing left to agitate it. Perhaps the Mark will leave her entirely.”

“Piss,” Sera swore. “Double piss! For Inky, cause she can’t make swears.”

“Kid is a weirdly uptight about that,” Bull said with a laugh.

“Eleanor is clean spoken, and it is very professional behavior, we should all take example,” Cassandra said.

Sera snorted. “No, she don’t make swears ’cause of professional whatever shite, she doesn’t ’cause her Ava lady or whatever.”

“Ava?” Bull asked.

“Avery was orphaned in infancy, cast out of her orphanage when her magic was discovered. She was left to her own devices save for the occasional assistance from an Apostate woman named Ava, she has since passed” Cassandra summarized for him for fear he would ask Eleanor herself. The girl didn’t speak much of the woman, and Cassandra didn’t pry worrying it may be a painful subject for her. “Eleanor said this Ava did not abide swearing?”

Sera shrugged. “Dunno. I tried teaching Inky swears and she said she knew ‘em, just couldn’t use ‘em cause she promised Ava she’d ‘be good’, you know, when she uh, died. So, no swears.”

Oh. That made Cassandra’s throat feel a bit tight.

The Seeker cleared her throat and said, “I believe I could do with a nap, myself.”

Sera snorted. “Ha! You just wanna snuggle Inky!” she hopped up then. And shrugged. “Me too, lets go.”

“Getting’ real soft there Seeker,” Varric teased.

Insufferable Dwarf. “I am not the grown man afraid of spiders,” Cassandra tossed back.

“Neither am I,” he replied smugly.

Oh goodness. That had Cassandra stopping to look back at him. He didn’t mean…

“Varric. Is the Champion of Kirkwall afraid of spiders?”

The Dwarf man held up his hands as if to halt her. “I’ve already said too much.”

Ha. “Obviously,” Cassandra drawled. And then, she realized she was about to leave the man with Bla—Rainier, mostly unattended. “Behave yourself, yes? If you wake Eleanor by endeavoring to extract revenge she has forbidden you from, I will throw you into the ocean and consider letting you drown.”

“Yeah yeah,” Varric groused with a dismissive wave. “I’ll play nice.”
“I’ll keep an eye on him,” Bull promised.

Cassandra was almost reassured by that, except that when she made to enter the tent, the Qunari quietly added, to Varric, “Didn’t say it’d be my good eye, though.”

Maker preserve them.

Their last few days in the Storm Coast were spent looking for signs of the missing Wardens. Ellie tracked down and found a few things, left behind by Wardens who had been on the Coast searching for their fellow Warden, a man by the name of Stroud.

Thom had felt badly, when he couldn’t say he knew the man. He didn’t know many of the Wardens, the only one he’d actually met was Blackwall, and it wasn’t like he went to Val Chevin claiming to be the man—that wouldn’t have worked. Any conscripts were either released from service after he’d imparted valuable skills to help keep themselves alive, or they’d been sent on to the Warden fortress to take their vows, being able to say that Warden Blackwall sent them there.

That was why Ellie had decided to say Blackwall had been part of the Inquisition and died recently, she’d explained to Thom—if the Wardens discovered several of their recruits had not actually been vetted and selected by Warden Blackwall himself, well. They could be found guilty of crimes against the Order, even if they’d had no way of knowing they’d been fooled. At the very least, they would no longer be considered Wardens, be cast back into whatever life they’d been fleeing in the first place.

“Thank you, my lady, that’s an excellent idea,” he’d said.

She’d just shrugged, avoiding his eye as she said, quietly, “I do have them sometimes.”

She did keep up in collecting Warden artifacts. No more would they serve to assist Thom in his lie—he’d hated having to admit he’d only wanted them to give him information beneficial to sounding more like a Warden—now they would be sent on to the Wardens proper, offerings of the Inquisition as a show of good will, and repayment for the efforts ‘Warden Blackwall’ had made to assist them before he ‘laid down his life in service’.

Things were…messy with everyone. No one much cared to acknowledge him, but they still fought well together, and that was right decent of them, he thought. No one spoke to him much—Varric had not said a single word to him, though he supposed that was because, if the Dwarf did dare do so, he wouldn’t be able to stop himself from flying into a rage and going against his own word to Ellie that he wouldn’t kill him.

Ellie struggled the most, with talking to him, caught between wanting so badly to forgive him, and feeling the brunt of his betrayal. She only endeavored to do so when it was absolutely necessary—well, by Ellie’s standards—and it was always measured and almost painful for her it seemed, to say anything to him, and she very rarely looked at him when she did so. She talked out how they were going to handle the aftermath of his lie with the Inquisition itself, that had been their longest conversation. She would wish him a stilted good morning, ask if he was hungry, always checked to make sure he had enough potion between fights, made sure he wasn’t hurt badly. No more joking, or small talk, or asking his advice.

Or for his assistance outside the realm of fighting. Her hair was worse for wear, and she’d set up everything to do it herself but it was clearly difficult, her hair being so long, her arms were short and working with so much of it was a real chore.

The Iron Bull had rumbled out a soft, “Here, Imekari, let me,” and then he set about the careful task of conditioning and combing her hair. If it hadn’t been so very…well, he knew he wouldn’t deserve such trust so quickly but he did miss the way things had been, it was a kind of heartbreak seeing the Qunari do what had once been something he could be glad to do for the girl. If it hadn’t been so very sad, it would have been amusing—this Qunari with large hands carefully pinching locks of hair between index finger and thumb, taking a comb that was comically small in his other hand, and gently untangling her curls. He’d done well, said the conditioning aspect was similar to horn maintenance, and he’d seen enough of combing over the years to get the gist of it.

“I figure, if I do anything the opposite of how Skinner does it, I’m doing alright,” he joked with Ellie.

“Oh gosh! She doesn’t brush her hair roots down does she?” Bull nodded and the girl made a face, “Ouch! That’s so painful!”

“Skinner doesn’t really do gentle. Speed is more her thing. Burns every meal because she thinks cooking it hotter will make it cook faster.”

That made the girl giggle. “I like her.”

“In her weird way I think she likes you too. Or at least, she doesn’t dislike you. And that’s saying something. Took me forever to get to ‘doesn’t dislike’ with her, and I’m the one passing out the gold,” he said. “I’ll introduce you to the guys sometime.” That got him a rather exuberant smile.

Rainier made his way to his tent then, it was…he didn’t deserve to be in her good graces, but it was still hard to watch.

They said their farewell to the Coast, once their leads dried up. There was nothing more to do. So they made their way to the little town they’d left their horses in, Ellie practically bursting out of her skin with excitement when she got to see her Russell for the first time in two weeks.

“Russy! I missed you, I missed you, I missed you!” she exclaimed, peppering her steed’s face with kisses. “Did you have fun? Did you miss me?” she asked, and the horse brayed a bit, nipping lightly at one of the loose curls hanging over her face, and it got him a giggle.

Ellie was all serious business then, suddenly, as she left her horse to stand before Rainier’s, standing between he and his steed, halting him. Meeting his gaze for the first time in days as she said,

“You wait just a minute. You’re going to apologize to this sweet horse for lying to him, and then you’re going to reintroduce yourself to him. Got it?”

Varric laughed at him, Sera too. Cassandra even stifled a guffaw she managed to shift into a cough.

“Of course,” he said and went to his horse then, standing before him and addressing the beast—he wasn’t in the habit of doing so, as Ellie did with Russell, so his horse just sort of stared at him like he was confused. “I owe you a debt of apology, my good sir. I lied and deceived you, I am not Warden Blackwall. My name is Thom Rainier, and I am sincerely sorry for having mislead you. Do you think you can forgive me?”
The horse just huffed and nuzzled its snout against Rainier’s cheek. He patted the horse’s face in return before looking to Ellie who met his gaze.

“Trust takes time but,” she shrugged, “I think maybe he forgives you. At least a little.”

Oh, Maker. The thinly veiled admission of even partial forgiveness on Ellie’s part, oh, it was like water to a dying man. Even more so than when the girl had actually given him water and he’d sort of been dying from lack of it.

“Trust takes time,” Thom agreed. “If I can make amends, it will be more than worth the wait.”

Ellie nodded, giving just the barest bit of a smile.

Sera snorted. “He’s just a horse,” she said. “You lot are so weird!”

Chapter End Notes

Qunlat used:

Imekari: child
Tamassran: Qunari priestesses who raise all Qunari children and teach new initiates to the Qun.
Basra: derogatory term for a non-Qunari.
Basalit-an: a non-Qunari worthy of respect.
Aqun-Athlok: the Qunari word for someone being assigned one gender at birth, and living as another.
Karasaad: an in-general word for Qunari warriors
Ashkaari: “one who seeks/thinks” a Qunari Philosopher, Koslun was an Ashkaari.
Arigena: Qunari government official, female, who presides over workers, and deals with things like public health.
Viddethari: non-Qunari who converts to the Qun.
Serabaas: Qunari word for Mage

*Notes:

Mithridatism=the real-world practice of consuming non-lethal quantities of poison to build up an immunity to them. It’s named after Mithridates VI, the King of Pontus, who so feared being poisoned that he regularly ingested small doses, aiming to develop immunity.
Iron Bull’s Depression=in game if you talk to him about Qunari roles, he’ll talk about the Re-Educators, a branch of the Ben Hessrath that essentially deal with mental health. He talks about how his time in Seheron left him questioning why he woke up every morning, and that he’d considered just letting someone kill him in battle, but did end up turning himself in to the Re-Educators for help instead.

Lady Emmauld=the woman who took Sera in when she was caught stealing at a young age. She tells Inquisitor a little bit about her in game, and how she told Sera that the local baker hated her because she was an Elf,. She discovered later the woman only did so to keep Sera from going into his bakery stop her from finding out that cookies Lady Emmauld claimed to have made, were actually made by the baker.
Sera’s Hair= in her info, the creators of DA: I have it that her hair is the way it is because she cut it with a knife because it got in her eyes, and she needs those for shooting things.

Thom Rainier= the whole of Rainier’s confession is canon, some of that information is offered in-game in dialogue but some of it is from codex entries and information offered by the writers online.

Real Life projects are bearing down on me, so there will be a bit of a bigger break this time around, I apologize! Next chapter will be their return to Haven to clean house a bit, a certain Tevinter man getting a kiss on the cheek, and Ellie's pursuit of the Rebel Mages. Coming at you, as soon as possible, but at the very latest EDA: 9/1/18
Return to Haven

Chapter Summary

Cleaning up after the Rainier reveal. The Chargers find their place in Haven, Bull's got glasses, Varric blows a gasket, and there is a gratuitous amount of Krem POV. Because if you've stuck around to read this long-ass story, this is what we're here for.

There is one scene, in Solas's POV that contains a few Trespasser DLC spoilers and is marked as such, so if you haven't played/seen and don't want to know, you can skip on down to Krem's POV.

Chapter Notes

I'm back! And slightly concussed! So pardon the quality, I'm not 100% satisfied with my writing at the moment, if you see anything super plot holey or confusing please call me out! But I have two chapters this week somehow! Because I made promises about this next installment that I wasn't going to be able to fulfill in just one chapter--original chapter plan got totally derailed because I remembered Leliana's character arch in game and uh. well. Plot bunnies were born. Second chapter is being edited and will be up very shortly! Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The return trip to Haven was…a bit long and sort of awkward, but better than what Ellie had feared it would be.

First there’d been the matter of, well, The Iron Bull was a big man and they hadn’t a horse for him yet. They’d see to it he had one assigned to him once they were in Haven—Sera hadn’t wanted a horse of her own, Ellie thought perhaps the Elf girl was afraid to ride by herself, she rode on the back of Russell with her arms wrapped tight around Ellie’s waist—so he couldn’t ride with her…she was a little worried he’d weigh too much with her in the saddle too anyway. The biggest, strongest of their steeds was Varric’s, at the very least it was tall enough that The Iron Bull’s legs wouldn’t drag on the ground riding him. So, the Dwarf man let their Qunari friend use his horse, and he road with Solas officially proclaiming their ‘Dwarf-Elf-Coalition’ reunited.

Then, as they traveled, she’d been concerned Varric would start a brawl with Rainier, possibly attempt to kill the man, but she’d sat her Dwarf friend down made him promise her, to her face, with double pinkies, that he’d not harm the man. He could be rude, or angry, or whatever else he felt, but he’d have to figure out some way to work with him still because…well they just had to! Anyway, Varric kept his word, and mostly just pretended that Rainier didn’t exist, ignored him entirely, no attempt to belittle or smack talk the man, no exchange of pranks like there had been before when Varric hadn’t been sure they should trust the lone Warden they met in the Hinterlands.
He hadn’t told Ellie ‘told you so’, and he really could have. Varric was sweet really, at least in Ellie’s experience. He hadn’t once made her feel stupid for being tricked.

And they were still dealing with all that. They’d made camp for the evening along the edge of a river. Varric was reclined by the fire, reading, the Iron Bull seated next to him, reading…huh she thought it might be a letter from Cremisius, the Qunari kept close tabs on his Chargers, worried after them she thought, it was sweet. Solas sat closest to the fire, with ingredients for dinner scattered around him Sera was actually helping. Apparently, he’d taught her a lot about cooking when Ellie’d been sick and now whenever the Elf Apostle took up the task of preparing their meals, Sera was always a volunteer. They still didn’t like each other very much, but they didn’t exactly make conversation while they cooked aside from ‘pass me that spoon’ or ‘chop that more finely’. It was really great to see them doing something nicely together because they wanted to, not because they had to like fighting alongside each other and stuff.

Thom had taken to sitting apart from the group more often than not, he sat behind everyone, backed up sitting against the trunk of a tree while he whittled…something, Ellie wasn’t sure yet, it was just a block of wood that was less blocky.

Cassandra sat with Ellie, by the water, away from the rest of the group so they could focus on their work. The Seeker was going over the latest word from Leliana with Ellie. It sounded like things were sort of rocky in their negotiations over Rainier’s service, some rot about ‘the Game’ and how, while Callier and his family’s death had only been a part of the game, and Empress Celene had no true grievance with the loss of her ally outside of the fact she’d been her pawn on the ‘board’, she was obligated to kick up a fuss about Rainier being found and not serving a sentence in Orlesian captivity. Anyway, it was all complicated and made Ellie’s head hurt, made her heart hurt—emotionally, not physically though as she started to worry about all the things that could go wrong—what if they couldn’t work this out? Would Rainier be taken by Orlais? Imprisoned or executed, unable to help them with the Breach? Would the Inquisition be required to deal with him, execute him themselves to keep the Empress from declaring them an enemy and thwarting any progress they were making to get the Mages and Templars on their side?

All of those worries made her stomach burn and her heart started racing—like she was running like mad instead of sitting with Cassandra. Solas looked up at her and the Iron Bull raised a hand to quiet Varric who’d been saying something. Sera’d jumped up from her place around the fire coming forward but keeping a distance in case she’d be in the way of helping and she screamed at Cassandra,

“Stop yammering at Inky, something’s wrong with her!”

There wasn’t anything wrong, exactly. Okay sort of. Her heart wouldn’t slow down and then she couldn’t really catch her breath. Cassandra hadn’t been yammering, Ellie just hadn’t really heard that the woman was speaking, her hand was on Ellie’s shoulder though and she realized Cassandra had been asking if she’d needed potion, though the Nevarran woman had made up her mind for herself and risen to go get some. The Iron Bull came and sat straight down on his bottom, his legs on either side of Ellie so he could sit at her eye-level and he put a hand on her shoulder and in the other he held her unmarked hand.

“Hey boss, you’re okay. Try breathing with me,” he said taking in and releasing breath methodical increments she worked to match, she wasn’t sure she’d be able to, but she did. “Okay, good, that’s good. Can you tell me five things you can see?”

The question was kind of weird, but he said it like it was important. “Um, y-you?”

“Good job boss, you’re doing great, four more,” he said.
“The grass, trees, our tents, Cassandra.” The Nevarran woman had rejoined them, just come up to stand at The Iron Bull’s side, clutching a bottle of blue potion.

He continued, “Four things you feel—physically, outside not inside.”

“Your hands, my hair, the ground, the wind.”

He asked her for three things she could hear—his voice, the river, birdsong. Two things she smelled—him, he wasn’t stinky though she promised, and spindle weed, it was growing somewhere along the river. And then lastly—kind of silly sounding, he said—he asked if she could taste anything.

“Mint. I brushed my teeth after lunch.” Varric had made some sort of stew that had beef and onions and garlic in it. Tasted good but it made her breath reek, and she should keep her teeth clean anyway.

“Yeah I’m pretty glad you did that boss, smells better than garlic breath,” he teased her, patting her on the shoulder. “Feel better?”

Oh! Her heart wasn’t so poundy in her chest anymore. “Oh, gosh, yeah! Wow, how’d you do that?”

“Ben-Hessrath trick. Called grounding, your mind panics about a danger that isn’t physically present, grounding brings you back into the reality of the moment.”

Huh. Neat!

“Are you alright now, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked gently. Ellie nodded. “Have you need of um,” she cleared her throat, not wanting to disclose that she’d been about to give Ellie something for anxiety in front of the members of her party that hadn’t really been let in on her private business, she supposed.

“I think I’m okay now, The Iron Bull’s grounding thing worked really well,” she said, looking to the man still seated in front of her, and if she turned her head to the side a bit, Sera was standing, sort of pacing in place nervously, watching everything. “Sorry. That happens sometimes, I’m alright now, promise.”

Sera stared at her. “Inky that was…shite what was that?!” she glared at Cassandra, “And don’t you dare say it was nothing, you priss! I know what I heard this time, something’s wrong!”

Oh.

Ellie felt her cheeks go warm with embarrassment, and she looked down at her lap. Bull’s hand on her shoulder gave her a squeeze, and he rumbled out quietly, “It’s okay kid, you don’t have to say anything if you don’t want to.”

They’d heard! Solas had been of some help, with his connection, been able to send waves of calm if he didn’t get too freaked out from the panic coming from her end. She hadn’t thought Bull or Sera noticed her occasional brush with panic attacks over the last week, but they heard! And Sera’d asked Cassandra about it and…well it sounded like Cassandra lied to keep Ellie’s confidence and that felt wrong, hypocritical for Ellie to let her do that seeing as, well, she hadn’t liked it at all when she realized she’d been lying for Rainier.

She didn’t want to say anything, not really. It was embarrassing! But, “No, it’s okay. I um…That was a panic attack, I have those sometimes. And uh, well you’ve seen the potion I take every morning?"

Sera nodded, stopped pacing. "Yeah, you mean your vitamin pish?"

Ellie shook her head. "It’s not vitamins, I mean there might be some in there, I don’t know a whole lot about it. It’s for depression."

Sera plopped straight down onto her bottom, crossing her legs in front of her and leaning on them a bit. "That doesn’t sound like an Inky thing. That should definitely not be an Inky thing—you’re always smiles! And lovey! And sweet and shite! That’s just dumb!"

Cassandra leveled a menacing glare at the Elf girl. "Do not think to belittle—"

"She’s not being mean, Cassandra, honest. I mean it would sound weird to me too," Ellie defended, looking to Sera again. The Elf girl was quiet, scrunching her eyes closed as she…well it looked like she was thinking it over really hard.

"Thanks boss, for telling us, you didn’t have to do that,” The Iron Bull said, patting Ellie on the shoulder.

Ellie shrugged. "I sort of just freaked out on you and it’d be weird to just let it go without explanation. You guys are my friends, and we work together, sometimes in some pretty dangerous situations. You need to know that I’m not going to break down on you mid-fight or something. So, it’s only fair to be forthright with my problems and promise that I’m dealing with them. Thanks for helping me."

The Iron Bull sat back, arms out behind him so he could recline on the palms of his hands. "No problem. Everyone has their crap. I’ve dealt with depression before, Qunari have re-educators for that. Branch of the Ben-Hessrath that handles all things mental health."

Oh. Gosh… "I’m sorry," she said. "You’re okay now?"

Bull nodded his head, smiling. "Yes, Imekari. That was years ago. But I spent a good deal of time with the re-educators and there’s some of their line of training in psychology incorporated into the spy branch of Ben-Hessrath training. If you’d like I could teach you a few things like grounding that might help you."

"Hey Chuckles, how long did I wager it’d take Tiny to offer to teach Ellie something?" Varric asked.

"You believed he would be requesting time on her roster before the end of the month,” Solas sighed.

Those two betted on the weirdest things, or maybe it was just that they bet on everything.

"Roster?" The Iron Bull asked.

"I get pretty busy when we’re in Haven,” Ellie explained, “there’s a lot of different things I learn that help with the work we do in the field, and sometimes I have to meet with people considering allying with the Inquisition, or meet with the Advisors about things—so Lady Josie makes me a schedule so I can do everything I need to get done."

"Perhaps some education in psychology would be beneficial to your work, and at the very least it could prove useful in assisting you personally,” Cassandra said. "If you would truly be agreeable, Bull, I could send word to Lady Josephine."
Oh, it’d be fun to learn from The Iron Bull! But wouldn’t he be busy in Haven? “Oh gosh! But I mean you’ve been away from the Chargers for so long and you’ve got your Ben-Hessrath stuff, I wouldn’t want to make more work for you.”

“Spending a little time teaching you some things isn’t going to take away from my work—in fact it helps with my ‘Ben-Hessrath stuff’. My job is technically to spend time with Inquisition higher-ups, and that’s you, boss. I’m down if you are,” he said.

Oh, that sounded all good then! “Deal!” Ellie agreed, “Thanks!” she said and the Qunari man patted her gently on the head before rising to his feet to rejoin the other men around the fire.

Sera was still sitting in the middle of their camp thinking when she suddenly snapped her fingers. “Oh! Got it! Like your asthma stuff!”

Um…“What do you mean?” Ellie asked.

“You know!” Sera said. “You’re breathing just fine right now but you still have Asthma—you’ve always got it, even when you’re not all wheezy and shite. So, this depression business, you’ve got stuff that helps keep you from getting all mentally wheezy or whatever. So, you can be smiles and sicky.”

Oh. Yeah. That was actually…huh.

Ellie always felt sort of…well she was embarrassed, ashamed for having to get help with something going on in her mind. She felt like she should just be able to move on on her own, like normal. Something makes you sad, you don’t cry about it for forever, you cheer yourself up and feel better. Mad about something? She’d been livid with Thom at first, but she’d had time to work through that anger, now she was just sort of…sad because she wanted things to be back to normal and waiting to see if she could trust him again. She hadn’t needed potion or brain tricks to snap out of it. But the way Sera put it…depression was something she couldn’t get over like normal, because her brain was sick, just like her lungs. Ellie wasn’t ashamed of having Asthma—it was just a thing she dealt with, it wasn’t her fault she had it and all she could do was try her best to keep it from interfering in the things she needed to get done. It was the same thing.

“Sera, has anyone told you you’re kind of a genius?” she asked. Sera preened at that sitting up straight and smiling proudly.

Cassandra was shaking her head as she sat back down with Ellie by the river’s edge.

“You’re alright now, Eleanor?” she asked, her hand resting on Ellie’s knee. She nodded, and Cassandra looked relieved. “Are you feeling up to continuing our discussion of Leliana and Josephine’s efforts for Rainier?” she asked carefully, gently enough Ellie knew she could say no and the Seeker would drop the subject until Ellie herself brought it up again.

Sera jumped up to sort of launch herself at Ellie then, colliding into her side and wrapping her arms around her shoulders. “No more bothering Inky with friggin Beardy’s bullshit, Cassandra! It’s his mess!” she exclaimed, half-shouting in Ellie’s ear, turning her head a bit to look at Thom and stick her tongue out at him.

Ellie looked to him then and saw he’d stopped his whittling, his project laying on the ground at his side, abandoned. He looked…well he’d gone very pale. Thom hadn’t been able to hear what Ellie and Cassandra were discussing, he’d Human hearing and sometimes it wasn’t the best, but he’d certainly heard Sera’s shouting that Ellie’s panic had gotten out of hand while discussing their work to clean up after his lie.
Oh, gosh, if worrying about how it was all going to work out had freaked Ellie out, he certainly had to be worried now too—it was his life at stake. “It’s okay,” she was quick to assure him. “Leliana and Lady Josie hit a bit of a snag, but we’ll get it sorted, alright? I promise.” She wasn’t entirely sure how they would fix it, but she’d always been good about keeping promises so, she figured doing so would sort of lend to tipping fate in their favor.

Varric made a sort of frustrated growling sound and slammed his book shut before shooting to his feet and stomping away from the campsite, very intentionally walking the direction opposite of where Rainier sat. Well, it was better than the Dwarf brawling with the man she supposed. A lot better, really. He was going to keep his promise to Ellie and that was nice, he was a good friend. They all were…for the most part. Solas, Cassandra, Sera, the Iron Bull…

Huh. It made her think she was so very lucky to have so many great friends and somehow that sort of made her think of something—Vivienne was her friend, sort of. Her ally at least, and she’d promised to work within the realm of Orlesian politics on behalf of the Inquisition, in ways that sometimes might be able to surpass Lady Josie’s work. So, she’d asked Cassandra to see if maybe, since Madam de Fer was already in Orlais with Marehis, she wouldn’t mind going to the Empress to settle this matter for them.

“That’s a sound idea, Eleanor,” Cassandra agreed.

So that was a focus in the following days as they made the return trip to Haven. They’d run the idea by Lady Josie first, because Ellie didn’t want her feeling badly, thinking that Ellie was disappointed in the work she’d done, or feeling like she was having Vivienne undermine her or something. But the Inquisition Ambassador admitted to having considered the same thing and thought it an excellent notion. So, Cassandra sent off a letter to Vivienne, requesting her assistance.

Ellie got the weird feeling, like the return messenger bird had been given performance-enhancing drugs or charmed or catapulted at great speed—it returned to them in record time, and practically crash-landed into Ellie bearing Vivienne’s response, which she passed off to Cassandra who said Madam de Fer ‘would be absolutely delighted’ to assist in such a way, and she was already on her way to Halamshiral as they speak, oh it was such a shame to have reason to leave the Oasis.

That made Ellie worry a bit about Marehis, but Cassandra said she’d been receiving copies of Marehis’s reports to Leliana and things had been going well in the Oasis, but it was very hot, and isolated, and far from all signs of civilization, and the actual Oasis proper was full of Nugs and Tuskets. Oh! That sounded so cute! But apparently Madam de Fer hadn’t thought so, the soothing water had to be full of filth she was certain, so she’d not been delighted by it at all. And there were Rifts all around, but they’d managed to work around them. They’d found old mining equipment abandoned by the company that had been working out there and discovered a weird Temple that Marehis hadn’t liked at all, but it seemed have something to do with the Shards—Madam de Fer theorized that the Shards could work like keys, but they hadn’t brought the Shards along for a scouting mission. Marehis said she’d see to it that all the Shards Ellie had collected would be sent along to their infiltration camp in the Oasis and when Ellie and her party decided to finally check the place out themselves, they would be there, waiting.

Marehis was wrapping up her final look-around the area with Scout Harding, and then she would return to Haven. But, she wouldn’t be able to be there when Ellie and the others got back from the Storm Coast. That was sort of sad. She missed Marehis! It was embarrassing that she’d gotten a little teary over it, Maker, she was such a baby sometimes! But it had just been she and Cassandra, and Sera too, talking in their tent, and Sera hadn’t made fun of her, just told her it would be okay—they’d have loads of fun when they got back to Haven!—and Cassandra told her it was alright to be sad about missing Marehis, assured her she was positive Marehis missed her too, that she was a strong and capable woman and she’d be back before Ellie knew it.

Huh. Speaking of Elves she worried over—Solas. He’d been really quiet the last couple of days of their journey back to Haven, like he was worried about something, but when Ellie asked he said he was ‘well’. He hadn’t been very upset over Rainier, he wasn’t best friends with Thom, but he remained cordial, polite. She thought maybe it had something to do with the person he’d been writing to so very much—he’d sent letters out to whoever ‘M-a-r-e-h-i-s’ was during their return trip to Haven, and he’d been receiving letters back until a few days ago. Had they had a falling out or broken up or something? He never talked about who he wrote to, so she was afraid to ask him outright. Secrets did have their place—whoever he was romantically involved with was his private business. Well, his private business and hers whoever she was. Oh! Or he! Maybe that was why he hadn’t found an interest in Marehis, maybe Ellie’d misread things? She didn’t know many of the male Elves in the Inquisition, but she’d keep any eye out, for whenever Solas was ready to put himself back out there! Yeah!

Coming back to Haven was a relief, Ellie missed the routine, and the snow, and the people, and her bed!

Oh, that was sort of a new experience, another thing the Inquisition had given her—home. A set point, not just the next form of shelter she could find. Homesickness and the absolute high that came with returning home after a long time away. Ellie’d always moved on, looking for the next place, the only other place she’d ever made a point of coming ‘round was Ava’s but even that had been…not something she could term home, not in the way she did her place in the Inquisition. It had always been dangerous, so Ava kept her at arm’s length. The elder Apostate struggled between the urgent need to keep her head down, keep everything in her life unquestionable for fear she’d attract too much attention, be cast from her home, and what she felt was her obligation to be of some help to the scrawny young Apostate she’d whisked away into her cellar one day when Templars had gotten too close and she had all of a second to decide if she was going to leave Ellie to her own devices or save her from certain capture.

But, Ava had come up in a Circle, escaped that life at great cost for good reason. She wasn’t going to stand by and just let Templars drag another little girl off to be locked away forever. So, she took Ellie in for a time and always welcomed her back, taught her what she’d known of medicine and magic before meeting Trevelyan and then Solas and even Adan, in the healing department.

Crossing the last bridge into Haven estate and seeing the smoke of Harritt’s forge growing ever nearer, the outer walls of Inquisition Headquarters coming into view. It was pure relief and excitement and just wow, she was so glad to be back! She could kiss the snowy ground!

Horse Master Dennet was waiting for them just outside the forge with some of his crew, ready to take their horses into their care. Oh, gosh, she wondered if maybe he would be upset over everything. Lady Josie had said she and the advisors debriefed the Horse Master and Blacksmith about the situation, at least that Rainier had lied about his identity and since confessed he wasn’t a Warden. The men had taken some time to consider a response, and Lady Josephine said they were still alright with the man sharing a roof with them if the Lady Herald was so willing to attempt forgiveness. As long as this ‘Thom’ did right by her, they’d endeavor to keep things cordial.

“Master Dennet!” Ellie greeted him, going for cheerful. Sera slipped out of the saddle behind her dashing away to race up to Haven’s gate saying “Gotta piss, gotta piss, gotta piss!” so. Ellie supposed she had to use the bathroom—they could have stopped! Sera was just a riot.
sometimes. Ellie couldn’t help laughing a bit.

“It’s good to see you, my lady,” Horse Master Dennet said as he approached and offered Ellie a hand down, “You had safe journeys I hope?”

Ellie waited until her feet were on the ground and then said, “All safe! Oh! We have a new party member,” she turned to look at the Qunari man lumbering down off Varric’s horse. “Horse Master Dennet, this is The Iron Bull. He’s going to be working with me in the field, do you think you could help him find a horse of his own?”

The Human man stared at the large Qunari, sort of paling a bit, but he cleared his throat and regained his composure. “O-of course, my lady.”

“Nice to meet you, boss speaks highly of you,” The Iron Bull said. “You’ve met my Lieutenant, Cremisius Aclassi?”

“Tevinter chap, came ‘round and introduced himself when he and the Ambassador worked out where your crew would set up camp. Bull’s Chargers, yeah? Decent neighbors, they don’t cause a bunch of ruckus and spook the horses or anything.”

“Krem runs a tight ship when I’m away. Back now though so I can’t promise the ‘ruckus’ will stay down,” the Iron Bull joked as he and Dennet shook hands. The Horse Master laughed a bit and seemed to be put at ease with his new Qunari neighbor.

Oh. Ellie noticed then there were a few tents set up between the Forge and Haven’s gate. She almost worried because surely there was room in Haven but then she remembered that Varric liked his tent near the Chantry, and Sera slept in the Tavern. Too, if Cremisius had worked with Lady Josie, obviously this was the accommodations the Chargers were most comfortable with, so that was nice.

Oh! Cremisius was just emerging from Haven’s gate, and he called out over his shoulder, “Chief’s here!” as he came down the steps. Just after him came a group of people, a dark-skinned Human man, and a short blonde man, and the Elf woman, Skinner. They all went to gather around the tent, though Cremisius continued toward Ellie and her party, still having their horses being dealt with. The Iron Bull waved to his Lieutenant in acknowledgement before he followed Horse Master Dennet to seek out a proper steed for him.

The Tevinter man saw Ellie then and he smiled as he approached.

“It’s good to see you, my lady,” he said warmly, “How are you feeling?”

“Oh, much better now, thanks!” Ellie said, smiling. “Cassandra said you sent the Embrium salve, that was really helpful. Oh! And I love the hat you made me! And the flower! It was all super thoughtful of you!” Ellie thanked him, lowering her hood so he could see she was wearing the soft wool hat before popping up on tip toes to kiss him on the cheek.

Cremisius’s face went red and he scratched at the back of his neck nervously. “It was nothing, my lady. I’m just glad you’re feeling better, and that you’re back safe.”

“Ahh, Lieutenant Aclassi, it’s good to see you again,” Cassandra said as she came up from behind Ellie.

“You as well, Seeker Pentaghast,” he greeted in kind.

“I apologize for the interruption, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, “but the families of Lord Berand and the late Lady Vellina have been visiting Haven, Lady Josephine was hoping you would get in, in time to see them before they leave this afternoon.”

Berand worked for Commander Cullen, Vellina…oh! The noblewoman they’d found deceased in the Hinterlands, she’d been engaged to Lord Berand, he joined the Inquisition after Ellie informed him of his fiancée’s passing. Wow, it’d seemed so long ago, the war room meeting where Lady Josie said their families wished to see Ellie and throw in their hats with the Inquisition.

(Of course!” she looked to Cremisius, “I’ll be back around later, to make sure everyone’s settling in alright. The Iron Bull should be done soon, Master Dennet’s just assigning him a horse. Oh! Do the Chargers need horses?” she thought to ask.

“No worries, I’ve spoken with the Horse Master, decent bloke. He got us all squared away. I already picked a horse for Chief, actually, strong old mare,” and then leaning in a bit he shared conspiratorially, “Her name’s Bitsy, though.”

Oh gosh! The name created the mental image of The Iron Bull riding into battle on the back of an itsy-bitsy horse. Ellie slapped a hand over her mouth to keep from laughing too loudly. “Really?” she giggled out, and Cremisius smiled.

He nodded, then said, “I shouldn’t keep you, I hope your meeting goes well.” He gave Ellie and Cassandra a wave before going to…probably check and see how well The Iron Bull was warming up to his new horse.

Cassandra linked arms with Ellie. “You were able to thank the Lieutenant?” she asked as they walked, heading for Haven’s gate.

Ellie nodded. “Uh-huh!”

“I am glad. Would you care to freshen up before we head to the Chantry?”

Cassandra was admittedly nervous, returning to Haven without Marehis awaiting them. She’d confirmed with Leliana that the Spymaster was aware Eleanor’s caretaker wouldn’t be there when Eleanor returned, and she was gratified to see someone had been around to keep house after a fashion, her quarters didn’t seem dusty and nothing looked out of place, and most importantly, there was a fire going in the cabin, Eleanor’s room was warm and she was vaguely certain the bedding had been changed.

Eleanor went to her wash cabinet, poured fresh water from the pitcher into the basin, wetting a cloth left laying out for her, to wash her face. She opened the cabinet and withdrew a few more towels, one of which she offered to Cassandra. “Your face doesn’t look dirty or anything,” she assured her, “but I know its nice to clean up a bit after being on the road.”

Sweet girl. Cassandra accepted the offer, washing her own face. Though she did feel out of her element. Marehis seemed almost effortless in her care for Eleanor and Cassandra…well all she’d done was walk the girl to her quarters, and then Eleanor had seen to it the Seeker washed her own face. She felt uncharacteristically clumsy like she was doing this wrong—she should take charge, should she not?

Somehow this felt different from their time on the road, Eleanor kept after herself with bathing and brushing her teeth, they worked together to make meals. Cassandra watched over her safety and the only role she felt she played as caretaker was when she ensured Eleanor had her potions. But in Haven, Marehis saw to every element of the girl’s care. She was always at her side—Cassandra had seen how the woman was there even before Eleanor was awake, making sure her cabin was warm and breakfast ready, the Elf woman did everything from picking out Eleanor’s clothing to seeing her safely through her scheduled day.

She was uncertain who would take on that role now that Marehis was delayed, still making the journey from the Oasis back to Haven. Eleanor could sort for herself as far as personal hygiene, bathing…clothing herself Cassandra was decently sure she would be fine in—she knew how to dress herself obviously but she may need to rely on Lady Josephine for fashion advice. Certainly, the Seeker could assist in Eleanor’s morning routine—she was already a large part of it, she would merely be taking on the task of seeing the girl got breakfast, and the days Lady Josephine scheduled her lessons with Cassandra and Cullen, those were always the first lessons of the day now. But she didn’t think she would be able to follow the girl throughout her day, as much as she would certainly be glad to, she had her own responsibilities to the Inquisition to see to. Who would see to her safety?

This made a survey of questions pop into her mind. What should she be doing? Did she need to get Eleanor to the Chantry right away? As soon as possible, she was sure. What did the girl need? Would she need advice on how to speak to their noble guests? She got nervous sometimes, when handling Inquisition alliances, should Cassandra offer her calming potion? No, Eleanor never seemed under the influence when she attended meetings, but maybe…

“Should I change, do you think?”

Eleanor’s question sort of snapped Cassandra out of her own internal inquisition. Ahh. A part of Cassandra didn’t see why—she always went about in her armor, herself. But Eleanor had a bit of a different role to play than she, and she’d meetings with nobility today.

“Certainly,” she cleared her throat as she looked around the cabin and went to the wardrobe, opening it to look through Eleanor’s clothing.

She hadn’t cared a bit about what was fashionable to wear when she’d been fifteen. And she certainly had not a clue what would be fashionable for such a girl to wear now.

But Eleanor was at her side then, humming a bit as she filed through her clothing, head bopping side to side as she considered her options.

“Lady Josie said they’re from Highever, right?”

“Yes, Ferelden nobility,” Cassandra confirmed.

“Their heraldry is greeny-blue,” the girl’s nose scrunched up a bit as she tried to remember. “The drop of water with two arrows crossed over it yeah?” she asked. Lady Josephine had seen to it Eleanor would be able to recognize notable flags of their noble allies, Cassandra was pleased the girl had taken the lessons seriously.

“Yes,” she was certain Eleanor was correct. Ahh, she was pulling a…Lady Josephine would likely term the green-blue color ‘teal’, tunic and leggings from her closet, swirls of soft blue in their design. Cassandra was not wholly fashion minded but she thought it would look nice, the colors did compliment the green of Eleanor’s eyes, and the cool hues sort of contrasted the warm tones of her skin in a way that was striking.
Eleanor changed quickly, putting her armor and staff away, and she checked her face in the mirror over the washbasin to make certain she was clean. She tousled the curls atop her head trying to arrange her hair neatly.

Oh. She realized something she was certain Marehis would do for the girl, and…well, she hoped she could at least make a passable attempt at the task.

“Would you like your hair braided, Eleanor?”

“Oh!” she looked to Cassandra with surprise, “Really? Could you?”

She wasn’t sure, but Maker watch over them all, she was certainly going to try. She nodded and was a bit surprised when the girl took that as a signal to seat herself on the floor before the fireplace, but she supposed that was merely where she sat when Marehis did it. So Cassandra sat down on the floor behind the girl and gathered her hair so it was all over her shoulders, down her back.

It was a different experience than she had with her own hair—the braid she kept around her head was easily maintained of course, otherwise she would simply keep it cropped short. But her hair was very fine and while it was a bit wild when she rose in the mornings, it was easily tamed. Eleanor’s hair reminded her of literal fire, unruly and it easily got out of control if one wasn’t careful. Thick and heavy and the curls seemed to multiply as she worked, like they were conspiring against the uncertain Seeker. But like with all things, Cassandra was persistent and while it certainly wasn’t Marehis’s handiwork, she had Eleanor’s hair trapped in a neat, thick braid of curls that tapered to the small of her back, bound at its end by two tightly knotted hair ties because she meant business, her labors would not be foiled by a gust of wind or the hair coming alive and trying to unbind itself, which she felt most certain it could not, at least not now. Not with two hair ties. Certainly not!

“Oh wow, Cassandra, you did great!” Eleanor enthused once she was on her feet and twisting about a bit to see her hair in the mirror. “Thank you!”

Cassandra had fought and won actual battles whose victory paled in comparison to that which she felt at Eleanor’s approval of her attempts with her hair. She caught herself smiling in the mirror as she offered her arm to Eleanor. “I am glad it pleases you. Shall we head to the Chantry?”

The girl nodded but she looked nervous, to Cassandra’s eye.

“Eleanor?”

“Oh, gosh, sorry I just…” she looked up at Cassandra. “I’m kind of worried, seeing the advisors again after…” her chin quivered a bit and the Seeker was mildly horrified that she might cry, but she didn’t, just cleared her throat. “Do you think they’ll be upset with me? About everything with Thom?”

Maker, she could throttle that man. She settled instead for putting an arm around Eleanor’s shoulders and pulling the girl into a hug. It was almost strange how such a thing was so easy for her now, but Eleanor was so openly affectionate with those she cared for, and after days of almost non-stop contact with the girl when she’d been ill, Cassandra found she could come to miss it, took any opportunity that arose where it would be appropriate to be so open with her regard. Speaking somewhat into her hair as she said, “Eleanor, you did nothing wrong. You did not knowingly misinform anyone—we were all fooled. Lady Josephine, Leliana, Cullen, they do not blame you— it was Leliana’s information that said he was a Warden in the first place, do you fault her for his betrayal?”
Eleanor shook her head, pulling back to look into Cassandra’s face as if concerned the Seeker did blame their Spymaster. “Of course not! Leliana had no way of knowing! Thom was the only one who knew Blackwall had died, and he went around telling everyone that’s who he was, she…” the girl calmed then, “it wasn’t her fault like it isn’t mine, I see what you mean,” she said with a smile, she leaned in again, borrowing her head against Cassandra’s neck and the tension in her frame relaxed. “You’re the best.”

Maker, ‘the best’ indeed, she was embarrassed how very pleased she was to be called such, it was a ridiculous thing. Cassandra dropped a kiss to the girl’s hair and rubbed her back for a moment before releasing her. “Do you have need of anything?”

“I feel better, like thinking and feeling wise about my meeting but um, my stomachs sort of in knots, burning.”

She was in need of potion, then, Adan’s instruction was clear about that. Cassandra worried—the girl had been using it only occasionally, before a meal every once in a while, but since Rainier’s reveal on the Coast she began taking it a daily, many days taking the maximum amount she was allowed. Cassandra was not worried of abuse of course, Eleanor was hardly getting a high off the stuff and it wasn’t habit forming, but that her worries made her so very ill so often lately was concerning. This would be her third dose today alone.

“Of course, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, gently, handing a draught over and Eleanor had it downed in the blink of an eye. “Would you care to let it settle before we join the advisors?”

She shook her head, and linked arms with the Seeker. “I think I’m ready now, thanks. For the potion and for listening to my pre-war-room freak out,” she said, jesting to make light.

_Did_she usually have such worries before her meetings? Cassandra supposed…oh, Maker. If she were as young, and non-confrontational as Eleanor was, yes War Room meetings would be nerve-wracking. The girl could argue over things she felt some conviction over, but that only came if she felt she was a reliable source on the subject. Cassandra knew well now, the girl was not so brazen to assume she knew everything about everything, and openly admitted to having no clue how to even begin fathoming many of the issues they dealt with in their meetings. That she’d been able to voice her idea to approach both Mages and Templars had been surprising, and the girl had privately admitted to Cassandra that she’d only done so because her magic had encouraged her.

It made her think of herself in Eleanor’s place, when she’d been her age. She could easily imagine a fifteen-year-old Cassandra storming into the War Room, angry at everyone and everything, arguing with the advisors at every turn, having strong opinions on their every issue that she would stubbornly stand by, whether she was right or wrong not mattering to her in the slightest.

“What are you thinking of?” Eleanor asked as they walked the path to the Chantry, a bit of laughter in her own voice as she smiled up at Cassandra.

Ahh, had she laughed aloud? She could feel the smile on her own face at the very least. “Nothing of note, just how very different I was from you, in my youth.”

“Do you think we’d’ve gotten along?” Eleanor asked.

Oh goodness. “Unfortunately, I do not think we would have, through no fault of yours. I was very brisk, and angry. Though…” she thought it over. Eleanor had a great deal of patience, something many lacked with Cassandra in her youth. Somehow, she was almost certain if anyone could have weathered that, it would be Eleanor. “If you were persistent, I’m sure your influence would have broken through eventually. Over time, we may have even been friends,” she said. “I’m certainly glad to consider you such now.”

Eleanor beamed at that, hugging Cassandra’s arm more tightly as she said, “Me too!”

The Chantry doors swung open to reveal Commander Cullen speaking to Lord Berand just inside the Chantry hall, though they’d obviously just finished, the Lord was turning to leave and he bowed to Eleanor when he saw her, wishing her a pleasant morning before he took his leave of the Chantry. The Commander looked to Cassandra and Eleanor and he smiled.

“Cassandra, it’s good to see you,” he greeted warmly, his eyes sort of lingered on her and she realized she was still smiling, it was not a wholly common sight, not something she did aside from…well Eleanor had a way of making her do so. It was mildly embarrassing just now as she worked to school her features. She was glad when the Commander turned his attention to Eleanor. “You as well, Lady Herald. Cassandra informed us you were poorly while on the Storm Coast, I trust you’re feeling better?”

“I am, thanks!”

No sooner had she spoken then,

“Is that Eleanor?!” Josephine’s voice echoed through the hall from her office, and the Antivan woman was suddenly rushing, well walking rather briskly in a way she may term improper, down the hall, Leliana looking bemused as she trailed after her friend. “My lady,” Josephine said, coming near but stopping just short of touching the girl. “Would you be ill at ease if I were to give you a hug?”

Eleanor looked surprised that the woman would ask, “Oh! Of course not! Hug away!” she insisted, releasing her hold on Cassandra’s arm and putting her arms out. It was rather a ludicrous question, but Cassandra supposed the advisors did not see quite so much of Eleanor to know just how very affectionate she was. Lady Josephine held the girl tightly for a moment before pulling back and saying,

“My lady, we were truly very worried when we heard you were ill, you are fully recovered?”

“I am,” she said, “everyone took really good care of me.”

Eleanor had been particularly grateful to her companions for having aided her when she was sick. It struck Cassandra about the fifth time Eleanor saw fit to thank her for some arbitrary thing she’d done to comfort her, that the girl hadn’t expected to be taken care of. That she had never been taken care of, not usually anyway, when she found herself ill before the Conclave. When her sickness filled her lungs with fluid, nearly suffocated the girl to death, it was her magic that stepped in as it obviously must have in the past, with some assistance from Bull, expelled the foul stuff from her lungs—she’d been thrashing in her sleep, her magic trying to get her to turn over so she could rid herself of the fluid without re-breathing or swallowing the bile. It horrified Cassandra to think that there had been a time when Eleanor may have found herself wholly alone, stricken with fever, weak, and unable to breathe, with only her magic to just keep her alive until…what? Had she just managed to heal on her own over time? Had no one helped her? Her Ava had been of some assistance it seemed but what of the times when she couldn’t be due to distance, or her death?

“I am so glad to hear that,” Josephine said.

“Yes, it’s good to see you looking so well, my lady,” Leliana agreed.
“You were in our prayers—as you always are, but we took time to pray for your recovery in earnest when word came.”

“Oh, gosh,” Eleanor was blushing now. “That’s so sweet of you, thanks.”

“I thought I was going to have to lock Josie in her office—she immediately set about plans for an all-out vigil throughout Haven,” Leliana said sounding wholly amused.

“I was rightly concerned!” Josephine defended. “Though I understand it would not have been wise to do so, and risk word getting to someone who may seek to use the information to your disadvantage my lady.”

“I appreciate it,” Eleanor promised. “The almost-vigil and being so thoughtful for my safety.”

“Of course. Come! We’ve updates on the Rainier situation we should discuss in the War Room,” Josephine said as she began leading them down the hall. “And then Lady Vellina and Lord Berand’s families are just dying to meet you my lady, oh, they heard of your time in Val Royeaux—Lord Berand’s father thought it was rather well done of you, standing up to Lord Seeker Lucious. And Lady Vellina’s family actually has Orlesian ties—the Marquis that challenged you at Madam de Fers’s salon? Lady Vellina was his second cousin, they share the aunt you had us write and she insisted she had to meet you, so she will be among those you see today.”

Leliana opened the War Room door and they took their usual spots around the table.

Eleanor took in a deep breath and asked, “So. Updates on the um, Rainier situation?”

“I will challenge the man to a duel on your behalf if you wish it, Eleanor,” Commander Cullen said, in tones that neared seething.

“Cullen has put in a formal request with you to duel the man on your behalf,” Lady Josephine reported drilly. “And Madam de Fer has reported that she has in fact secured the Inquisition full custody over Rainier. There has also been…well, an interesting development. You recall the letter we received from the University of Orlais, their Chancellor Jurgen Haulis*?” Josephine asked.

“I’ll pass on the duel, but that’s um, sweet I think? Thanks,” Eleanor said before she thought for a moment. “Haulis, he wrote to the Inquisition asking for help with…Mother Hevara? Right? The Cleric we saw when we were in Val Royeaux.”

Awful woman. She’d said such horrible things about Eleanor, for all to hear in Val Royeaux’s Summer Bazaar. Though Cassandra was grateful that it seemed most spoke more of Eleanor coming to the woman’s assistance after the woman cast such slander upon her, than of the slander itself.

What had been most horrific to the Seeker was that the Mother Hevara had called Eleanor selfish. She feared the girl would take such an accusation to heart—come to truly believe herself to be selfish. The last time someone from the Chantry had maligned Eleanor in such a way, it had been Chancellor Roderick. ‘And yet you live’ the man had said, blaming her for surviving—the Conclave and her attempt against the Breach—and the words had been a part of the girl’s nightmares she described to Cassandra, played a role in the intrusive thoughts she was subject to that told her she was not worthy to have been the sole survivor of the Concalve, that she should have died.
There was a lingering fear ever-present at the edge of Cassandra’s mind, that with her struggles, the near constant turmoil she’d been subjected to since the Conclave—Maker, the girl had never killed a person before the Crossroads. She hadn’t been prepared for death delivered by her own hands upon another person. She’d been tortured, reviled, betrayed. All that she’d faced, all that came for her, with all the guilt the girl felt for her survival on top of it all…she worried Eleanor may seek to stop surviving. Either in giving up completely or…

“Cassandra?” Eleanor’s voice, there was a hand on her arm.

“Seeker Pentaghast?” Cullen asked.

She realized then she’d been rather lost in thought. Oh, her fists were clenched at her sides and her face felt a bit tight with stress. She blinked and looked to Eleanor’s Marked hand resting on her arm, raised her left hand and placed it over Eleanor’s. “I was merely thinking.”

Of things she should not have been, her mind was required presently and such thoughts…they were as unthinkable as they were unpleasant, and she should not worry about those possibilities in such a way. Eleanor had an excellent system of support that stretched across many people with any perspective she could possibly need, and she was openly receiving help.

Cassandra gave her hand a gentle squeeze and the girl smiled before dropping her hand.

“I guess it is a lot to consider,” Eleanor said as if in agreement, a crease in her brow as she pondered.

What she was pondering, Cassandra was unsure.

Ahh. She was most tempted to simply let it stand and not admit she’d not been paying attention to save face but…if Eleanor was in need of her input on the matter she would not be ill-equipped to give it. “I did not hear the uh…developments, Lady Josephine was informing us of. I apologize, I allowed myself to become distracted.”

She’d expected to receive looks of reproach or perhaps a complaint for having to rehash the information, but what she got was,

“Oh!” Eleanor gasped, as if startled. “I’m sorry! You checked with me to make sure I didn’t need anything before coming to the Chantry, but I didn’t ask about you!”

“I am well, Eleanor,” Cassandra was assuring her, but the girl was already digging around in the lower pockets of her tunic, just above her hips, withdrawing a few thin wafers of sweet shortbread, and holding them out in offering. The girl was looking at her in earnest, like she was concerned, and she thought that the only way Cassandra could grow distracted during an important meeting was if she were unwell somehow, perhaps suffering from low blood sugar. When had she put food in her pockets?

Maybe she was suffering low blood sugar, she barely realized she asked the question aloud.

The girl gave a smile like she’d been caught with her hand in the cookie jar, as opposed to a hand in the snack pocket, “Um. I sort of remembered Highever’s colors because I saw there was something in the tunic pockets of this outfit. Marehis always makes sure I have snacks and keeps tabs on my schedule so…I figure whoever had the fireplace going in my cabin had instructions on which outfit to supply.” Maker bless Marehis, the woman was a force of nature. Cassandra couldn’t imagine herself thinking to do such a thing. “Huh, oh! These are really good,” Eleanor was saying, “did you know Seggrit makes th—” she gave an excited gasp as if she’d just realized something, “Seggrit! Was he the one who did all that? Made sure my cabin was warm when I got back?”

Seggrit? The curt, Ferelden man who ran Haven’s store?

Leliana nodded. “We were considering who to deliver the task to and the man volunteered himself.”

“Ha! That jerk! He loves me and he knows it!” and then, at everyone’s mildly surprised stares, because Eleanor was not in habit of calling people names she giggled, “We talk mean to each other but not for real meanness—Seg calls me a brat and insists he finds me insufferable, then does nice things for me. He’s the one that got Varric chocolate. And he makes a lot of the things Marehis has around for snacks—he says he orders them from somewhere, but he’s handed them to her piping hot while had flour on his face!”

She was still holding the wafers out Cassandra.

Well. It had been a while since breakfast.

Cassandra took a wafer and nodded to the girl to say that was enough for her. It got her a smile for some reason and then Eleanor was looking to the other Advisors. “Anyone else?”

Cullen shrugged and took one, Leliana too, so Lady Josephine allowed herself to partake as well, leaving a left-over wafer in Eleanor’s hand which she took a bite out of once she was certain no one was going to ask for seconds. It was almost comical, the War Room going from talk of important issues to, Eleanor’s enthusiasm, to the quiet crunching of the five of them taking an impromptu snack break. It was admittedly good, crisp and sweet but there were granules of salt as well, and the bites melted on her tongue. She could practically see the gears turning in Lady Josephine’s mind as she pondered just how to cajole the Fereldan man into making her things to serve to guests of the Inquisition.

“So, Lady Josie was reminding us that after Val Royeaux, Mother Hevara started trying to deflect the backlash against the Chantry by calling out the University of Orlais, use them as a ‘scapegoat’, Chancellor Haulis said,” Eleanor recounted for Cassandra.

Ahh. Things were always tense between the University and the Chantry. They often sought to create some greater discord between the people, and the University whenever there was unease against the Chantry. The University’s Chancellor Juregen Haulis had written the Inquisition and asked that they help get the Chantry off their back in exchange for the University’s resources on magical knowledge, perhaps they would find something of use to their issues with the Breach. Discussed among the advisors, they decided to have Leliana arm the University with what they like best: information. She gave them ammunition against the Chantry that silenced their efforts, and Chancellor Haulis wrote back in thanks, Mother Hevara had come to his office and apologized to him, dissuading further conflict. Or at least, that had been the impression Cassandra had been left with, had something happened?

“I thought that was resolved?” Cassandra asked.

Lady Josephine nodded. “Which brings us to the interesting development. Madam de Fer knew of our dealings with the University, so when she was granted audience with Empress Celene, she made certain the Empress became aware of the assistance the Inquisition lent Chancellor Haulis against the Chantry. You know Empress Celene’s love of the University*, when she learnt their recent victory against the Chantry was our doing she reconsidered her stance on Rainier’s sentence and has given the Inquisition jurisdiction over his fate.”
Ahh. Good—at least it would put Eleanor’s mind at ease and secure her the ally she still managed to find in Rainier. But Lady Josephine was not finished.

“The Empress also has an offer to extend. To Eleanor.”

Oh. Maker above. It would be a move in the Game, accepting or refusing Celene’s offer. Cassandra had hoped, futilely, to keep the girl from such things. She’d barely been comfortable with Eleanor’s attendance of Madam de Fer’s salon. Directly dealing with Orlais Empress would be a polarizing thing.

“Empress Celene is willing to expunge Thom Rainier’s record,” Leliana said, “make it so it would be as if charges were never brought against he and through proxy, his men.”

“If Eleanor accepts, it would not only secure Rainier’s position within the Inquisition,” Josephine clarified, “but his life afterward, as well as the lives of his men. They would not be held accountable for their crimes against Orlais, and all official record of their misdeeds would be destroyed. However…”

“It would mean she would owe the Empress a debt of favor,” Cassandra concluded with a weary sigh.

“Something she may use as the Inquisition builds acclaim and further moves are made by Duke Gaspard to take the throne,” Josephine confirmed. “However, the offer is a generous one, and should Eleanor refuse, it could be seen as a slight against Celene. The Empress has remained neutral in regard to the Inquisition, whatever we choose to do here will influence her future candor with us.”

“Accepting would also create the possibility for a feud between the Inquisition and Gaspard,” Cullen pointed out, clearly displeased with the notion of garnering the Duke’s attention in such a way.

“We should be more concerned that refusing the Empress could be seen as our position in the conflict between Celene and Gaspard—that the Inquisition wishes to align itself with the Duke,” Leliana argued. “Regardless of people’s feelings on the matter, Celene is Empress right now. Refusing her may cause the Duke to approach us with an alliance, offers of his own to beat his cousin at indebted Eleanor.”

This was…beyond messy. Perhaps it had been understatement, Eleanor’s claiming there was much to consider. It felt more than ‘much’. She did not want Eleanor owing anyone favors, especially not the Empress. Who knows what the woman could call upon her to do. But neither could the Inquisition withstand the woman’s ire.

“Whatsoever the decision it is Eleanor’s to make,” Cassandra snapped. “She is the one who will be most at stake, the consequences will be hers. We must set aside our personal feelings over Celene’s claim to the throne, this will be a move within the Game for Maker’s sake! She can ill afford getting caught in the middle of Orlais power struggle.”

“O-of course,” Cullen said, the man visibly paled as if he hadn’t considered just how truly arduous this could turn out to be for the Herald. Celene made the offer to her specifically, not the Inquisition Josephine had said. The Inquisition would be affected but…this whole mess derived from Duke Gaspard calling a hit on a Lord that allied with Celene—small petty moves within the game delivered a man and his family to their deaths. Accepting the offer would make Eleanor a walking target to people like Gaspard. Declining would make her enemies within Celene’s camp and quite possibly the Empress herself—she would not take kindly to some commoner, Herald of Andraste or no, refusing her generous offer.

“Can I…” Eleanor bit her lip, going silent as she thought and then she cleared her throat and restarted her sentence, “I know I have to meet with people today and this decision is um, is it time sensitive?”

“Extremely,” Leliana said. “If we could have appropriately settled this via messenger bird, we would have.”

Eleanor nodded. “I would like to talk to Thom, quickly, if that’s alright. What time is it?”

“Nearly noon now, Eleanor,” Cassandra said. She wanted to speak with Rainier?

“Okay. Give me ten minutes with him, we can have a decision out to the Empress before the noon hour is up, and uh, would say, one-ish be okay to meet the Lords and Ladies from Highever? Oh. And Orlais too I guess, if that Marquis’s aunt is here you said?”

“Yes, my lady,” Josephine said and then, “Very well. If you’re certain, I’ll send for Rainier at once.”

“Could we speak privately, do you think?” Eleanor asked, “I wouldn’t want to be rude and put you guys out, he and I could speak uh…” she seemed to be trying to think of something that would be quick and convenient.

“You could use my office,” Lady Josephine offered. “You will not be disturbed,” she promised as she quickly left the War Room to send for Rainier and clear her office of staff.

Cassandra was not certain she liked the idea of Eleanor wholly alone with the man. “Eleanor, would you like for me to sit in on your discussion?” Cassandra asked. She did not like the idea of leaving her alone with the man.

But the girl shook her head. “Nope. But thanks for offering. You know…just because he wasn’t really Blackwall doesn’t mean he isn’t still ‘Blackwall’. He’s not going to hurt me or anything. He’s still…still our friend. Whose made bad life choices and I’m seriously considering letting Cullen loose on him.”

“The offer does stand, and it is most sincere,” the former Templar assured her.

“But yeah, I’ll be fine.”

For Rainer’s sake, she certainly better be. Eleanor gave them all a small wave before leaving the War Room to wait in Josephine’s office, Lady Montilyet returned and shut the door closed behind her.

“She’s settled in your office?” Leliana asked.

Josephine nodded, the motion seeming grave. “Rainier will be along soon, we should do this now while Eleanor is occupied.”

That certainly did not sound good.

“Has something happened?” Cassandra asked as Lady Montilyet resumed her place around the War table.

“There has been a breach in security,” Leliana said. “One of my agents, Farrier, is dead, murdered by agent Butler.”

The codename was vaguely familiar. Butler was an agent who dealt in service to other agents—keeping appraised to their whereabouts and wellbeing, reporting back to Leliana if they were compromised or needed extraction from their current mission. Farrier was one of the agents who handled travel arrangements for Leliana’s spies ‘ferrying’ them to and from location when they had to—

When they had to travel great distances for their missions. Like Marehis’s work in Orlais.

Cassandra could actually feel the blood draining from her face.

“Marehis?” Cassandra asked tightly. Oh Maker, please.

“She is alive but compromised,” Leliana gravely confirmed. “We have not detained Butler yet, but my agents are close. Farrier was on his way to meet Marehis and Harding in the Oasis when Butler killed him, I have since sent orders for she and all my agents in the field to abandon their positions and confuse their trails. Butler had knowledge of everyone’s assignments and locations, if he’s turned on us and planning on going after the others, that should serve to keep him from killing more of our agents before my men find him.”

“I received reports from Marehis—one as recent as yesterday, just when did this happen?” Cassandra asked.

“Farrier was found days ago. The last genuine report we received from Marehis was her arrangements for Eleanor’s return to Haven. The reports you’ve been receiving the past few days were written by me, using Marehis’s older reports to copy her handwriting, make the letters look and sound genuine and as if she were merely delayed at the Oasis for now,” Leliana explained. “I am aware you keep Eleanor appraised to Marehis’s wellbeing, I thought if reports stopped showing up, she would know something was wrong. We cannot have her getting involved, she may seek to go to Marehis’s aid, or unintentionally compromise the woman further still. The best thing for Marehis’s and Eleanor’s safety, as well as her peace of mind, is if we handle this as quietly as possible. She needn’t be aware her caretaker was in danger at all, just delayed performing other duties for the Inquisition.”

Cassandra most certainly did not like the idea of lying to Eleanor, especially after the horrible betrayal inflicted upon her when Rainier’s lies were revealed. But this was life and death—Eleanor knowing would only worry her, needlessly if Marehis came out of it alright, and her knowledge could potentially put Marehis in greater danger. Eleanor would…if she discovered she’d been lied to, she would prefer Marehis be safe than being kept in the loop and putting the Elf woman at further risk.

“You will not be asking Eleanor’s input on your dealings with Butler then?” Cassandra surmised.

Leliana shook her head, something like darkness hardening her gaze. “Butler has betrayed us. He cannot be allowed to live.”

It was conflicting. Cassandra was agreeable to such a solution but…Maker. That Sera of all people could set such an example for her vexed Cassandra to no end. The Elf girl had done much to consider Eleanor’s feelings on things when the girl had been sick, been thankful to those Eleanor was not conscious to thank herself, even joined Cassandra for her morning prayer on Eleanor’s behalf this…this was much the same, at least it felt to her, a place Eleanor could not be made to give her own opinion on the matter but, if she could she certainly would hold a more merciful stance than what was being dealt.

“I understand your position Leliana and I would not wish to speak out of turn,” Cassandra spoke carefully, “but if Eleanor cannot be included in this decision then I would speak on her behalf.”

Leliana gave the Seeker a wry look. “You think Eleanor would hold some objection to my decision?”

“I know for certain she would not wish for you to take his life forthwith without so much as questioning him. I ask that you spare his life for now and bring him in for questioning—we do not know what transpired between he and Farrier, there could be more to the story than a rogue agent. If it would please you, I could assist with his interrogation. You can kill him yourself if you are dissatisfied with what he has to say for himself.”

“Eleanor may be showing mercy to Rainier, but Butler has compromised the host of my agents,” Leliana insisted. “You cannot believe she would be so merciful to someone who has endangered Marehis.”

That was too rich by half. “So now you are an expert on the innermost workings of Eleanor’s personality?” Cassandra snapped. “You’ve not spoken a single word in her direction outside your work together, made no effort whatsoever to get to know her. Do not think I have not noticed how much you hold yourself apart from her?!”

“I’ve been nothing but cordial, if not outright friendly to the girl in our meetings!” Leliana retorted. But she sighed wearily then, “State your case. Why is it so very important to you we bring him in?”

“There is every possibility Eleanor will find out about Butler’s betrayal, even if it is after the fact. I understand we cannot divulge this to her now, but when she finds out she will not like that we have lied, but it will be forgivable especially given that it is meant to keep Marehis safe. Should we kill Butler without so much as trying to give him the chance to explain himself…she is very tenderhearted Leliana. You read our reports from the Storm Coast—the Blades of Hessarian murdered our soldiers and it devastated Eleanor, outraged her even. But she was gratified that we found a solution that allowed us to spare the Blades—because we took the time to decipher just what had truly happened. We thought them mindless thugs when in truth they were victims of a cruel master Rainier freed them from.”

Leliana seemed to consider that a moment. “I know…,” she cleared her throat as if it were tight. “I know Eleanor is not at fault for the Breach, or Justinia’s death but…that the conclave was survivable, that someone made it out alive and it was not Most Holy it…”

“I understand,” truly, she did, “You are still hurting.”

“I do not wish to take it out on the girl, so I ‘hold myself apart from her’, as you say,” Leliana said. “However, I do see your point, I would not hurt the girl needlessly. I can see the value of bringing Butler in—this could go beyond him, he could be working for an enemy force, there could be co-conspirators within our ranks still that he could expose for us. I will have him brought in for questioning,” she conceded. “But you will by no means question me if I decide the man should be executed afterward.”

“Of course. Thank you Leliana,” Cassandra said. “Truly and…if you do not mind my saying so—”
“I undoubtedly will,” the woman groused leveling her a glare.

Cassandra felt embarrassed for what she was about to confess, especially given they were not entirely alone, but Leliana was her friend, they worked together to serve Justinia and the Lady Nightingale hadn’t attempted to reach out for help in her mourning the woman, this was the first time she’d voiced her grief to Cassandra. It was not good to just push through the day to day, and not endeavor to work through her heartbreak, Cassandra knew that very well.

“I had similar issues, reconciling the losses we endured at the Conclave. If you would take the time, even outright tell the girl your feelings regarding the loss of Justinia…well, knowing Eleanor has healed things in me I did not even realize were still broken,” she admitted, albeit abashed. “Perhaps she could do the same for you. She would be glad of it should you try to connect with her, Leliana. The girl idolizes you, says you’re the smartest person she’s ever met.”

Leliana huffed an uncertain sounding laugh at that. “I am the one who gave her bad intel on ‘Warden Blackwall’. She cannot still have unshakable faith in my abilities as Spymaster.”

“In point of fact, she does not blame you for Rainier at all. She has said as much to me. If you were to reach out to her I believe you would benefit from it, and she would certainly be delighted,” a smile came to Cassandra’s lips as she recalled, “Marehis actually told me there was a moment where Eleanor grew incredibly concerned that you do not eat, because she’d never run into you in the Tavern proper. Perhaps you would consider taking a meal with her.”

“I could put it on her schedule!” Lady Josephine interjected, sounding ecstatic with the idea.

Leliana crossed her arms over her chest, looking a bit out of her depth like she did not really wish to take Cassandra’s suggestion to heart, but relented regardless because Lady Josephine was already excited for her to agree. “I suppose. I will have lunch with the Herald some day this week. A short lunch. I do not have all day to play child minder.”

“Splendid! Oh!” Lady Josephine seemed excited then, “Perhaps we should all dedicate to having a meal together! Something casual, no work talk, as the Herald does with her party members. I’ve always enjoyed joining her when I can.”

“I’ve certainly no objections,” Cullen agreed.

“That is all well and good, schedule whatever pleases you Josie but we are still at work,” Leliana pointed brought them back to the task at hand. “And while we may have settled how I will handle Butler there is still the matter that Eleanor will not have Marehis while she is in Haven, not until we have questioned and dealt with the man appropriately.”

“Oh course,” Cassandra said.

“You must continue assuring Eleanor that Marehis is well and will be back in Haven as soon as possible—that is the truth of the matter, should things change you will know the moment I do,” Leliana promised. “Until then that leaves Eleanor with no guard. Until Butler is apprehended we must assume the worst, and that has severely compromised the safety of all of my field agents. The few that were here in Haven were sent out to detain him. I have conferred with the Commander and Josephine on the matter and they can think of none in their ranks we could securely bring in on the issue without further exposing our problem with Butler.”

Certainly, they could not have the Inquisition at large being made aware there had been a traitor in the most sensitive of their ranks. Butler’s betrayal, if not handled carefully could at the very least cast seeds of panic that would lead to people—recruits and noble allies alike—abandoning their cause.

That wouldn’t do, Eleanor needed someone—Cassandra herself could not be with her at all times, no matter that she would love nothing more than to do so, neither could any of the advisors. That left her party perhaps. Solas maybe but the man had a great deal of research he saw to in Haven, vital to their efforts against the Breach. Varric would take the job seriously insofar as her safety went but…no he was not suited to the task, he would likely influence Eleanor poorly, have the girl skipping classes or meetings he did not think worthy of her time. Sera, as much as Cassandra had come to respect her as an ally for Eleanor, she would insist Eleanor do nothing but play. Rainier, was most decidedly out of the question. The Iron Bull had his own duties to the Ben-Hessrath and his Chargers to deal with—ahh. Oh goodness. There was someone that came to mind.

“Would you perhaps be willing to allow the Iron Bull to know of our issue with Butler?” Cassandra asked. “He would be more than capable of understanding the situation, its severity and the need to keep it quiet. He has done well to respect the Inquisition’s safety and not compromise our operations when reporting to the Ben-Hessrath. He has disclosed nothing of some very personal things he has come to learn about Eleanor in their time together,” he’d not reported on her illness in the Storm Coast to the Ben-Hessrath, or her personal struggles with depression or panic attacks out of respect and care for the girl. “Nor did he expose the Rainier betrayal in his reports to them, and he could have very well done so.”

Leliana considered the matter. “The Iron Bull has been true to his word, he’s only reported on Eleanor’s sealing Rifts, our plans to seal the Breach, and that the Inquisition had things well in hand without further interference from Par Vollen.”

“You want The Iron Bull act as a subtle bodyguard for the Herald?” Cullen questioned, looking at Cassandra as if he were concerned she’d all but lost her mind.

“No, but he could lend us the aid of someone who could do so, someone I know Marehis would trust,” Cassandra said. “And quite possibly, the arrangement would be such that Eleanor will be too distracted to question or despair of her minder’s delay.”

Things were…a bit awkward with Harritt and Dennet. They did not know of the Callier massacre, and as far as Ellie was concerned Rainier did not need to confess his past sins to others. It would only make things worse for relations within the Inquisition. They were given the explanation, by the Inquisition advisors that he had been with Warden Blackwall when he passed and been driven to take on the man’s name in an endeavor to keep his work alive. Still they were uneasy that the man had mislead them, but willing to overlook it, ‘every man has his secrets, keep your nose clean and uh, your bunk too, we’ll get on fine.’ Harritt had said when he was settling in from the Storm Coast.

He was nervous though, walking through Haven for the first time, in the wake of a runner saying Lady Josephine requested his presence in the Chantry. For some reason he expected someone to…well…do something. Say something, call him out. But no one…well it seemed like normal. It wasn’t like with Ellie and the others, where he’d caused so much hurt or was being pointedly ignored. He hadn’t exactly gone around introducing himself to everyone in Haven, people barely knew there was a Warden in the Inquisition, supposed or otherwise. He was just another face in the hustle and bustle of everything, a few people who didn’t even know his name, just recognized him from seeing him around, waved as he passed. Flissa was scurrying away from Quartermaster Threnns station, returning to her Tavern when she caught sight of him and she smiled, giving him a little wave and calling out “Good day W- er. Mister Rainier! Nice to see you back safely!”.

So maybe things would not be quite so uncomfortable with the others in the Inquisition, his consequences squarely residing within those in the Herald’s company. He was glad but…honestly, he’d rather every person in Haven hate his guts, Flissa spit in his face and food, if it meant he hadn’t hurt Ellie.

The runner led him to Josephine’s office, but it was not Lady Montilyet who awaited him.

Oh. Ellie stood, leaning back with her bottom resting on the edge of the Ambassador’s desk, arms crossed over her chest, the girl was staring into space looking very grave. She didn’t even notice when the door opened, like she hadn’t heard it.

“Thom Rainier, my Lady,” the runner said, bowing to her.

The girl startled, jerking slightly and blinking in surprise before she offered a small, polite smile to them. “Thank you for bringing him, I appreciate it.”

“And then the runner was gone, the door closed shut behind them, and Rainier was alone with the Herald of Andraste.

Had something gone wrong? They’d hit a snag, she said a few days ago, in their efforts to clear his work with the Inquisition. Ellie...Maker, the girl had a panic attack over it, or at least the beginnings of one. And then she sought to ensure he did not worry, not as she did, over the issues that had come up. It was distressing, he wished...he was glad, selfishly so, that Ellie was worried because that meant that she cared, proof positive the girl did still have some love for him but he wished with everything in him she had no cause for such fear, that he could spare her the trouble she was going through to clear the mess he’d made. He’d considered going himself to speak to the Orlesian authorities be open and contrite on his own behalf, but that would only bungle the Inquisition’s efforts and he wouldn’t risk that, not after all that had been done for him.

“My lady?” he asked, gently. Worried he shouldn’t, since she hadn’t spoken to him yet, but he’d been brought here to speak to her, hadn’t he?

“Sorry, spaced for a second, thinking. Would you care to sit?” she asked. There wasn’t really a chair available except for right behind Lady Montilyet’s desk, but she was gesturing to the side table against the righthand wall of the office. There wasn’t anything on the side of the table nearest to where Ellie was, so he nodded and leaned against it, half-sitting as she was.

“You’re settling back in okay?” she asked, “Harritt and Dennet um, they aren’t too terribly upset, are they?”

“I’m all unpacked. The Horse Master and Blacksmith took time to welcome me back and clear the air a bit. They’ve been right good about everything, far kinder than I deserve.”

“I’m glad,” she said softly, though that seemed to give her pause. She was quiet, hands resting at her sides against the desk, they gripped-tight the edge. Then, “You...everyone deserves kindness, Thom.” She was rather tense, like in their previous discussions but she’d been able to look at him at least when she spoke and that was...that was some improvement. “You did an awful thing, and punishment is a good response, its what teaches us the consequences of our actions, but once you’ve learned your lesson, are certain you’ve learned not to repeat your mistakes...you shouldn’t punish yourself forever. I...I still stand by what I said in Val Royeaux. Perhaps it means more now. Learn from your mistakes and do better, if you do, you shouldn’t disparage yourself so much.”

Said in Val Royeaux? Oh Maker. She still worried he was too hard upon himself. At the time, he’d thought if she knew the truth of everything she would take it all back, understand he was loathsome—she had come to understand it, had the fullness of his sins revealed to her, been disappointed, found him wanting, and still. She worked her way back around to mercy.

“I promise to work on that, in future. Truly.”

She didn’t smile but she did give him a little nod, satisfied with his promise. “I...” she took a deep breath and her arms crossed under her chest, over her stomach hands gripping the opposing elbow as she continued. “I have some questions. About your men.”

Thom nodded. She hadn’t asked him many questions about what happened, only focused on how to move past it but...well he’d gladly answer anything if it would put her mind at ease, help her with whatever she needed to reconcile still letting him help her. “O-of course. Please,” he said, “you may ask me anything.” He’d talk of anything if it meant she would speak with him.

She seemed to think for a moment more before saying, “When you’ve spoken of their actions with me, you’ve mostly taken the blame upon yourself. Do you think them blameless? They did something horrific, orders or no they should not have killed innocents.”

“They shouldn’t have,” Thom agreed. “But they did. They were instructed to kill everyone. Gaspard did not wish for any witnesses to the attack, the order was meant to take care of that. My men trusted me, believed me worthy to lead them, and they believed I would not ask such a thing of them unless I had some viable reason. I understand that does not excuse them—make them blameless—but ...the fault was mine. I should not have taken the hit, it was my decisions, and their trust in me, that led to what happened.”

“You know how we were just talking about um, punishment, teaching us the wrongness of our actions so we can move forward and do better?” she asked, and he nodded. Then, “Do you believe that, with the time that has passed, that they have um, learned? From their punishment?”

“My lady, you have never sinned in such an egregious way, I pray you never do,” he struggled to find the words to explain. “You would find that no matter how much better you do, you always inflict a bit of punishment upon yourself, for forever it feels. My men were horrified, mad with guilt and shame, they suffer for what they have done from the fact that they must live with themselves. They cannot fix what they have done, none of us can. They were remorseful and I’m certain they would never do...do anything like that again.” He stopped to gather his thoughts and then, “My lady, while people did realize Callier and his family never arrived to their destination, it wasn’t until my men turned themselves in and confessed to the crime that our part in their deaths was realized. If they had not done so, I’m...I’m not sure any legal action would have been brought up against us. There was no paper trail, no written contract or traceable money exchange, nothing tangible that could draw authorities to the conclusion of what truly happened.”

“Really?” she asked. “It must have been upsetting, being found out when you could have gotten away with it all.”

Thom shook his head, he’d been mortified when word of their deeds spread, and he found out his men had turned themselves in but really he just… “No, no my only regret is that I did not do the same. I was ashamed of myself, and I wish to the Maker I’d been the sort of man who could face the consequences of his actions.”

She was silent for a moment as she seemed to think it over. And then, “You might not have been that sort of person then but…you’re doing well enough with it now,” she quietly commended him. “The Inquisition is hardly prison but…I know it can’t be easy everyone being so upset with you. You’ve continued serving the Inquisition well, fighting, and you haven’t p-pushed anyone to just be okay with everything,” his stomach turned with remorse when it seemed like she might cry, her eyes looked a bit wet and she closed them. “I’m…I am trying, I promise. I wish I um, I wish I could just get over it already.”

“E-” he stopped, he still wasn’t sure he should return to being so informal with her yet, it might be too familiar. She always called him by his first name but…well he didn’t have a more formal title anymore, did he? “My lady, I understand, needing to take time to rebuild the trust I’ve broken with you. If such a day comes that…those things could be as they were…”

She opened her eyes and, it obviously took some effort, but she gave him a small smile. “I’d really like that,” she said.

He could never thank the Maker enough that Ellie would want something of the sort, to be able to be friends again, truly. It didn’t matter if they never regained their former candor, that she was willing to give him anything remotely like friendship…it felt like he’d been blessed with borrowed time with her. He’d come so very close to losing her—hell for a time he had, those four days of his banishment had been deserved but still a sort of torture, the real fear the last time he’d see Ellie was in her heartbreak at his deeds.

“Then do not trouble yourself over it, please,” he implored her, “If such a day comes it should be because I deserve it not because you’ve found it within yourself to fix the hurt I caused you on your own. You’re doing more than enough of that, already, dealing with the Orlesian authorities on my behalf.”

She nodded. And then his words seemed to remind her of something. She cleared her throat and asked, “What do you think they would do? Your men, if they were no longer convicted of their crime?”

His mind drew a blank at that. “I’m not sure I understand the question,” he said.

She worried her lip a bit before, speaking very carefully, she said, “If tomorrow, everything was wiped clean from their records, and they were free to live their lives, do you…do you think they deserve that? What do you think they would do with their freedom?”

He would…Maker the very thought, of even a hypothetical situation where his men could be set free, allowed to properly atone, move on with their lives from the horror he’d put them through, it was almost cruel to voice something so unobtainable, he was certain she meant it in kindness, an attempt to understand the situation better somehow. “They were not…they were not inherently bad people, as hard as that may be to believe given the circumstances, they were honest men trying to make an honest living. If they could be free I am sure…I’m sure they would endeavor to do better, help people, do as I did in trying to live a life where I no longer caused more suffering but aided in the relief of it. I am certain they would do the same.”

“Minus the lies?” Ellie asked in tones approaching wryness, lips tugged slightly upward as she attempted to jest.
“Minus the lies,” he said, in all seriousness. “I thought living as Blackwall would cease my contributions to suffering in the world, but the lie ended up creating more. It is bad enough I have done so, it…it kills me that the suffering I created inflicted itself upon you. I’ve learned now, that only in living in truth, with that same measure of seeking to help where I can as I am, that is the path I should have led all along. If my men could do the same…I would give anything for that.”

She took a deep breath, and nodded, looking every bit as grave as she had when he’d entered. She held herself tighter, her cheeks lost some color and she flinched a bit as if something hurt.

“My lady?” he asked, and he rose to take a step closer, but he had to stop himself from reaching out to her. Was she unwell? His mind raced back over the course of the last few days, trying to recall the skirmishes they’d fought on the journey back, was she injured?

The door swung open behind him and he looked over his shoulder to see as Seeker Pentaghast entered looking every bit of menacing that she possibly could, the woman, beautiful as she was, could really look like the stuff of nightmares when she wished to.

“Your ten minutes has more than passed,” she said, in low dangerous tones, glaring at him, and he wasn’t sure what her words meant—their talk was being timed? Then Cassandra drew nearer, having looked the girl over, and all animosity left her and she was crossing the room, a hand on Ellie’s shoulder. “Eleanor?”

“Sorry, I’m pants at tracking time,” she offered weakly, “I um. I’ve made a decision. We should get back.”

A decision? He thought…he thought she had decided to allow him to serve the Inquisition as penance for his crimes? Had she been reconsidering her choice for his fate?

“He has upset you,” Cassandra said, her free hand clenching at her side as if she intended to round on Rainier and punch him with it. He certainly wasn’t going to stop her. Had he done something, said something that upset Ellie even more?

But Ellie shook her head. “No. I’m just uh, nervous and…I mean this isn’t the sort of decision I’m used to making. I…I know I have to make it just, I don’t feel either option is a super ‘right’ decision. It doesn’t seem like something I should have a say in, period.” She stopped and swallowed harshly as if to keep herself from being sick, and she flinched again, beads of sweat forming on her forehead.

“Seeker,” Thom said, “something is wrong—”

“I know very well something is wrong,” she ground out menacingly. And then much more gently, quietly she asked the girl, “Burning, again?”

Burning? Was it her Mark?

She nodded to the Seeker’s question, “I know I already took—” her voice cut off and she ruefully admitted, “bit uh, stabby, now.”

…stabby? Did she mean stabbing pain or had she been outright stabbed at some point?!

Cassandra seemed to understand perfectly what she meant, the Seeker’s hand unclenched to reach into the smallish compartment on her potions belt that held the smallest draughts of Ellie’s potions, and she handed the girl a small white vial she knocked back quickly, pressing the back of her unmarked hand as if it would help to keep it down. Maker, was it her stomach? People died from being run through! It was slow and painful, but there was some level of salvation that could be brought to bear through Healer’s and magic, was she treating such an injury?

“Should I send for Adan?” Cassandra asked quietly. Rainier was just about to bolt for the Healer’s, but Ellie shook her head ‘no’, and the Seeker took a deep breath before firmly stating. “Very well. But you will see him later, are we clear?”

Ellie nodded.

Gentle knocking came from the doorway and they looked to see Lady Josephine standing there with Leliana and Cullen at her back, the man had a hand on the hilt of his sword as if he expected trouble.

“Apologies, we merely wished to see what was keeping you, my lady,” Josephine offered.

Ellie pulled her hand away from her mouth then, swallowing once more before she could speak, “It’s okay. We’re sort of pressed for time, I know. Thanks for letting me talk it over a bit.”

It? Her questions about his men?

“You’ve come to a decision, I trust?”

Ellie nodded, though she didn't seem happy about it.

It was great to have Chief back. Krem was proud to be second in command—it’d been a bit unexpected to be named such in so short a time, he’d barely been with the company maybe a week when he’d made ‘Lieutenant’, but no one begrudged him the position, no one’d been vying for it and their time without their leader reminded him why. It was a special brand of chaos to keep everyone stable and functioning within the realm of acceptable behavior.

Skinner was the least of his problems in that regard, what with Rocky constantly on the edge of blowing shit up with random experiments trying to recreate Qunari black powder. And Dalish’s nervous, sketchy behavior—she’d be just fine if she stopped making unnecessary attempts to cover her Apostate status. Grim’s silent thing was always met with mixed reviews—some people thought he was weird and creepy, and some thought he was simple.

Stitches was his favorite. Favorite one, spoke when spoken to, didn’t say anything weird, didn’t blow anything up, didn’t randomly threaten the local ‘Shems’ with gratuitous acts of violence. Maker bless Stitches, that beautiful, Ferelden bastard.

Chief touched base with everyone, thumped him on the back of the head for ‘Bitsy’, but he said the steed was a damn good pick. Krem gave him a rundown on the place, showed him around, and he thought he was going to have to call for Dalish to slap Bull with some ice magic, cool him off when he caught sight the redheaded barmaid that ran the tavern. She was kind of flighty, a giggly sort Bull’d treat right and have a nice time with, not a future ‘Mrs. The Iron Bull’ or anything but Krem didn’t think he had ‘long-term’ type. He’d pay real gold to see the sort of person that could pin the Qunari down, get him locked into anything resembling a committed relationship.

Maker, relationships. Once Bull got over his initial ‘there’s a redhead that serves booze’ glee he’d made fun of Krem some more, asking if Ellie’d kissed him yet for his presents. Bastard.

They weren’t presents really, he wasn’t courting the girl! Not exactly. He wasn’t sure what he was doing.

The hat had been a present he guessed, but Ellie’d been kind to him, when he was in Haven, and he’d just wanted to thank her. He knew how awful the Storm Coast was, how cold, and the weather in Haven was hardly any better—it was even colder! He figured, maybe she could use something to keep her warm. And the salve was hardly a present—she was sick! And Maker, that’d sounded awful, and she’d helped him when he was sick, so it was only right he do the same. The flower…he…he just hadn’t liked the thought that she was so sad she hadn’t smiled in days. Bull hadn’t said what upset her so badly, but it must have been bad. So. Paper flower. Girls liked getting flowers, but there wasn’t really anything growing in Haven other than Elf Root. He’d had to fold about a thousand of those damn paper peonies for a cousin’s wedding what felt like ages ago, he was pretty sure he could craft them in his sleep. It was lame but apparently, it’d worked to help her feel better.

And…well it’d been reward enough on its own that it’d made her happy, Bull telling him so before they made it back to Haven. But her actual thanking him was even better and he kind of hated that. She’d smiled and laughed with him and kissed him on the cheek and…Maker, his face still felt a little warm if he thought about it.

Bull took up post out front of their tents to watch how the Inquisition soldiers trained, so Krem too his place, standing in his blind spot to keep watch from just below the ledge that bordered the stairs to Haven’s gate.

He heard the gate doors swing open and then,

“…where they practice for hours every day! Everyone works so hard to train and prepare. Do mind your step. Is everyone still comfortable? Your coats are all lovely by the way!”

Ellie’s voice, cheery and chatting away politely to, oh. Wow. There was like ten…eleven, twelve…shit. Sixteen people paraded after Ellie, all nobility unless they were also orphans ascended to Herald-hood, and somehow, he doubted that. On her arm she led the most elderly woman of the group, her hand on the woman’s arm that was linked with hers, walking to keep an easy pace for all of them as she spoke. She was giving a tour of the place it seemed.

He was glad to see she was dressed warmly, she’d changed out of her armor, wearing something similar to what she’d worn when he first met her, only with the addition of her cloak and he could see the very bottom of the hat he’d made atop her head underneath her hood that sort of made him feel warm—that she liked the hat so very well she wore it with her nicer things.

Oh, she looked a bit worn out, a little pale, and her smile didn’t quite reach her eyes. That was worrying. She’d had a war room meeting when she got back, he wasn’t sure what went down in those but ‘war room’ sounded intimidating. Had it gone badly?

Though it was…Maker it was almost enough to make him forget his concern, when she turned to face the path to the forge and she laid eyes on him and her polite smile turned into something warmer that met her eyes, glittering green as she said, “Here are our most recent recruits, a Mercenary Company, the Bull’s Chargers,” she drew her crowd nearer to the tents, “this, is Cremisius Aclassi, he’s the Charger’s Lieutenant, second in command.” Nice, gave Chief a heads up she was bringing people up on his blind side.

“An honor to meet you all,” he said politely, with a little bow. Ellie’s smile spoke of gratitude for rolling with her suddenly introducing these random nobles and she moved on to Bull.

“And this, is their leader, The Iron Bull.”

“Oh my!” the elderly woman on her arm exclaimed, looking up at Bull with wide struck eyes. “He’s a Qu- quite a large fellow, isn’t he?”

“He is!” Ellie enthused, “The biggest, baddest Mercenary commander this side of the Waking Sea—and that’s only because he can’t also be on the other side of the Waking Sea mind. He’s been the most incredible ally since he joined the Inquisition, and he has nothing but glowing commendations from nobility hailing from all across the Free Marches, Antiva, even Nevarran nobility proclaim the Charger’s greatness.”

That was certainly complimentary…oh. Wow. She was advertising for them, making sure their name got ‘round to people who mightn’t’ve heard of them—they had a name for themselves in the Free Marchs but yeah, this side of the Frostbacks was entirely fresh territory for them, they’d done work in Orlais before, though the jobs there had gotten scant as they worked their way to the Storm Coast. The Inquisition was a priority for them but working other jobs certainly wouldn’t hurt, if anything they could do things that helped to represent the Inquisition. There were sixteen potential customers and even if they never hired the Chargers, they would likely pass along their name to others who would. She’d even offered them Krem first, introducing him as a face of the Chargers they would be comfortable coming to, in the event that the actual face of the Chargers was a bit too intimidating—their first impression would be ‘polite human bloke’ and not ‘great big one-eyed Qunari we fear will eat our children for snacks’.

“Shucks my lady, you’re gonna make me blush,” Bull said, before dipping his head a bit at the Herald and her crowd. “Nice to meet you all. How’re you enjoying Haven?”

“I do believe we’re having a splendid time,” the elderly woman said, meeting Bull’s eye. “I say, have your men worked in Orlais before my good man?”

“We wrapped up a few jobs there recently, ma’am. For the Lords, Acord and Callihand.”

The woman seemed to brighten at that. “My word! Callihand is a dear friend of the family—you’re the ones who cleared up that awful rash of gang violence plaguing his land?”

“Yes ma’am, that’s right,” Bull confirmed.

It hadn’t been gang violence exactly, but close enough. Lord Acord had hired the Chargers when Darkspawn tunneled out of a nearby mine and Wardens weren’t responding to the call for help, so the Chargers came, cleared them out, sealed the tunnel back up, and Acord passed their name on to Lord Callihand. Callihand was an ally of Duke Gaspard, so one of Celene’s devotees hired mercenaries to harass Callihand’s townspeople. Good job, good gold, and it was always a good feeling, being able to put a stop to shite like that. Two wealthy blowhards duking it out over political nonsense and wreaking havoc on innocent people’s lives.

“Fool man, Callihand,” the elderly woman said, “he had nothing but high praise for your men but when I asked your company name, he couldn’t for the life of himself remember! My son-in-law had complaints I thought your company might be suitable for, have you a calling card by chance?”

“Never leave home without ‘em,” he jested lightly, giving the woman a little wink as he reached into one of the small pouches of his belt, and the crowd of nobility behind Ellie sort of stared in shock when the elderly woman didn’t hesitate to accept the small piece of parchment from the Qunari’s hand.

One of the Lords looked fit to faint when she allowed Bull to kiss her hand before they parted ways, with promise that she would send their information to her son-in-law. Ellie was all smiles over the exchange as she led her little tour onward to the stables, and forge.

“Lieutenant Aclassi,” a Nevarran accent spoke and that Seeker…Pentaghast was her name yeah, she approached. Ellie’s ‘Tamassran’ Bull’d called her.

“Seeker, Pentaghast, good to see you again,” Krem offered politely.

“I am watching over the Herald for the time being, but I need to speak to the Iron Bull on a pressing matter. Would you keep an eye on Eleanor for me just a moment?”

“Of course,” Krem promised.

“Excellent. She’ll be seeing our noble guests off soon, so she shouldn’t be straying out of sight, catch her when she returns to the gate if I have not returned with Bull, I will try to be back quickly,” the Seeker assured him before going to talk to Chief. Krem shifted so he could see Ellie better, still chatting away with the Horse Master who appeared to be answering the questions of the nobility flocking around her.

“Nothing that is of any concern to you,” the woman replied darkly. But then, “However, there is a problem I would like to bring to your attention.”

“Something wrong with the boss?”

Boss? Oh yeah, Ellie. It was sort of hilarious, the large Qunari man calling a girl about the size of one of his legs ‘boss’. He sounded worried—oaf that he was, he was sharp probably saw what Krem’d seen, Ellie seeming tired, but pragmatism kept her focused on her task of entertaining their noble allies.

But the Seeker was saying, “Nothing detrimental, though more than that I cannot say here, you must be debriefed. We’ll have to go to the Chantry, Leliana will be joining us.”

Don’t do it, just don’t. Please Maker above keep that damn Qunari’s mouth shut—“Spymaster. Redhead, right? So, which one of you will be uh, debriefing me?” Bull asked as he followed after the Nevarran woman heading for Haven’s gate.

He grunted when the Seeker elbowed him in the gut. Good. Served him right, debriefing, honestly.

Ellie was showing her guests around the forge, introducing them to Harritt, and…huh there was a man that had ridden in with her, part of her party but Krem didn’t know his name. He didn’t join the group or address Ellie, but he was watching her awfully close, so Krem watched him awful close because the guy looked nervous. He was almost considered moving closer in case there was something weird going on. But Ellie led her tour on away from the forge to where a carriage sat just a bit down the road from Harritt’s cabin, and she gave the man a nod as she passed him, and he didn’t do anything bizarre in response just nodded and then he decided to head inside the cabin so. Krem supposed he wasn’t up to anything strange—maybe he was just worried too.
Nobles loaded up into their carriage…carriages, Krem could just see the back of another, and then another if he leaned to his left a bit. Ellie held the arm of the elderly woman, helping her into her seat. She took a moment to talk to a couple of the Ferelden nobles, man and wife that she motioned to hang back with her a moment, and she…well she seemed sad about whatever they were talking about, and then she hugged them in farewell, smiling to them as they got into their carriage with their family.

She waved, high up over her head as she watched the carriages roll away heading for the bridge out of Haven estate and she remained waving until Krem supposed she couldn’t see the carriages anymore, then she turned on her heel, heading for Haven’s gate, smiling and waving to Harritt and Dennet as she passed and he could just barely hear her called out, “Thanks!” for taking the time to talk to their guests.

She looked around a bit as she got closer, probably wondering where Cassandra was.

“My lady,” he called in greeting and she smiled at him again, coming to join him out front of the Charger’s tents.

“Cremisius! Thanks for being polite with our guests, sorry I just sort of sprang them on you and the Iron Bull.”

“Are you kidding? We’d never turn down the chance for advertisement, Chief’ll be stoked if that Orlesian lady actually comes through with a job offer for us. It was no trouble saying ‘hello’.”

Ellie nodded. “I’m glad!” she said.

Huh. She still didn’t look like she felt very well, little pale, tightness around her eyes. “Are you alright, my lady? You were excellent with your guests and everything,” he assured her, and he didn’t want her to think he thought she looked bad or something, “just, you seem a bit tired.”

Because women love hearing they look ‘tired’, smooth. Though Ellie didn’t seem offended, she’d taken his words at face-value which was…well he was glad she hadn’t seen rudeness where he’d just been offering concern.

“Oh,” she looked sheepish as she admitted, “I’m okay, just a headache.”

That wasn’t any good was it? He got more than enough headaches from Bull to know they were unpleasant and he didn’t like it, the idea she wasn’t feeling well. “Stitches is around, he probably has something for that,” Krem offered lightly, though he was half tempted to outright call for the man to come and check up on her. But Ellie didn’t know Stitches, she mightn’t be comfortable going to a stranger, “Or I could walk you to Adan’s.” Seeker had made it sound like he should keep Ellie ‘round the Gate but she’d hardly begrudge him taking her to the Healer’s if she needed it.

She shook her head, smiling for good measure as she said, “That’s sweet but it isn’t bad or anything.” She shrugged. “Travel and war room meetings and trying to keep so many new names and faces straight, I think my brain is just telling me its done for the day.”

Well yeah, he’d be beat too he supposed.

She looked around a bit more. “Where did the Iron Bull get off to? I was going to see how he was settling in.”

Her brain was done for the day but she clearly wasn’t. “I gave him a tour of Haven, he knows where the Tavern is so he’s all set,” he assured her, she giggled at that. “Seeker Cassandra came ‘round and said she needed to talk to Chief real quick.”

“Oh! I was wondering where she went!”

Yeah. He probably should have said as much, sooner. “She said she’d be back soon though. You’re welcome to stick around.” He didn’t want to outright say ‘I’m supposed to watch you’. One, that phrasing could come off as creepy, and two, the idea might make her feel like she was being babied and embarrass her, or make her worried she was bothering him or something.

“Thanks! Huh, I wonder what she wanted to talk to him about…”

“She said something about him being debriefed and he got gut-punched for making a less than couth joke about it.”

She smiled at that. “Oh gosh!” she said, shaking her head. “He’s so bad about that, loves his puns.”

“You’ve no idea. You’re lucky ‘Ellie’ can’t really be made into a pun,” not any he could think of anyway, “he uses every variation he can imagine for Krem.”

She gasped, eyes a bit wide as her hands went to her mouth, and then she said in tones of amusement-mixed-sympathy, “I literally just thought of about ten different ways to use Krem as a pun and I am so sorry you have to live with that, is it constant?”

“It’s constant.”

But almost worth it, since she was laughing with him over it. It was nice.

“Oh!” she said then as if she’d just realized something, “I’m sorry! Do you prefer Krem over Cremisius?”

Eh. “Krem’s faster,” he said with a shrug but… “But I don’t mind, that you call me Cremisius.”

She nodded. “I wouldn’t mind, if you called me Ellie,” she returned, “You haven’t really, I don’t think, since um, finding out the Herald thing.”

“I didn’t mean anything bad by it,” he swore, though she didn’t seem upset, just offering an observation. Still, “I just wouldn’t want to overstep.”

Her nose scrunched up a bit, “I’m not a super formal person. I mean it still feels pretty weird everyone calling me ‘my lady’ or ‘the Lady Herald’. The Iron Bull can corner the market on liking ‘the’ in his name.”

“Ellie it is then,” he promised. “And don’t let Chief mess with you, he’s not super formal either. He wouldn’t begrudge you calling him ‘Bull’ for short.”

“Speak for yourself, Krem, its nice someone pays respect to the whole thing, I’ve got an image I’m trying to put out there, boss-girl knows how it is,” Bull said as he and Seeker Cassandra approached. Ellie whirled about to face him and the Qunari held up his hand to Ellie for a high-five and Maker it was cute, she really did her best to give his hand a loud solid slap. “Thanks for repping the Charger’s boss, I appreciate it.”

“No problem!” she looked to Cassandra then. “Everything alright? Cremisius said you had to um, debrief the Iron Bull on something.”

“Security protocols,” Cassandra said by way of explanation.

“Oh! Sorry, there are a lot of those, I hope you weren’t bored,” Ellie said.

“Seeker and Red kept me on my toes,” Bull assured her, “no worries.”

“Red?” Ellie asked.

“Sister Leliana,” Cassandra supplied drily, obviously unimpressed with the nickname.

Please Maker don’t let him have actually called the Inquisition’s Spymaster ‘Red’ to her face.

Bull’s a jackass and there was a hundred percent possibility he’d done just that.

“You know cuz of her uh,” Bull looked at Ellie then, a lose forelock hanging along the side of her face. “Yeah ‘Red’ might not be a specific enough nickname. You’re ‘Boss’ to me though, so there shouldn’t really be any confusion.”

“There’s like a thousand redheads in the Inquisition!” Ellie exclaimed laughingly. “Leliana, Charter, Scout Harding, Flissa…anyway there’s a whole bunch!”

“A thousand redheads huh?” Bull asked sounding pleased…too pleased. Oh Maker. “Guess I have my work cut out—”

“Watch your rotten mouth, Chief!” Krem snapped.

“Indeed,” Seeker Cassandra agreed.

“Sorry boss,” Bull said, not super sorry.

Ellie just smiled and looked like she was going to say something but lost her train of thought.

And then, “Woah, kid?”

“Eleanor?” the Seeker questioned in alarm when the girl pitched on her feet, swaying a bit and nearly falling over, except Bull dropped to his knees, hands on her shoulders to steady her.

“Ellie?” Krem asked.

She shook her head as if to clear it. “Sorry, I’m okay. Little dizzy.”

Dizzy? “Is your headache worse, Ellie?” Krem asked. And then it sort of struck him—she’d been whisked away to a war room meeting the minute she set foot in Haven, then entertained their noble guests, she hadn’t mentioned a meal in there anywhere. “When was the last time you ate something?”

The Seeker looked chagrined. “Not since breakfast—do not,” she stopped Ellie from saying something, “A cookie does not constitute a proper meal. Maker, it has gone five.”

“Oh! It got so crazy earlier I forgot all about lunch, honestly,” Ellie admitted. She laid a hand over one of Bull’s on her shoulder, patting it as if in thanks as she stood okay on her own, so he let go. That wasn’t good, her not eating all day. She wouldn’t stand for it if it were someone Seeker Pentaghast linked arms with Ellie and put a hand over the arm she held captive in case she needed the support. “Come. You will eat and we’ll see to what we discussed earlier. Then I recommend you call it an early evening, busy day is rather the understatement.”

Ellie nodded. “Um, it’s after five you said?” when Seeker nodded Ellie looked to Krem and Bull. “Are you two hungry? The Chargers?” she asked.

“Gotta touch base with my guys, we’ll grab dinner later,” Bull answered for them as he rose to his feet.

“Okay! Um…” she looked toward Harritt’s and said, “if you would, maybe check in on Thom? I mean, if you’re okay with that.”

The Seeker was shooting a glare over Ellie’s head that read that Bull was most certainly not to be okay with that. Thom? Was that the party member he hadn’t been certain of earlier?

Bull pointedly (ha! Horns) ignored the Seekers glare, only looking to Ellie as he promised her, “I’ll make sure the guy isn’t starving or anything boss, no worries.”

Ellie nodded her thanks and went with the Seeker. Good thing too, it’d looked like the woman was milliseconds away from yelling at someone and throwing Ellie over her shoulder to get her to the Tavern already.

“Round up the guys,” Bull ordered. “Just core people* on this one.”

“Got it, Chief.”

Thankfully everyone was around for the most part—Stitches had been sleeping in the tent, Dalish was nearby in her bedroll reading. Rocky, Skinner, and Grim were in Harritt’s forge poring over weapons schematics.

They gathered in the clearing between the forge and the bridge out of Haven—they couldn’t all fit in one tent and Chief wanted privacy.

“Good. Listen up,” Bull said once everyone was accounted for. “The Herald has a bodyguard that sticks by her side when she’s in Haven—unfortunately she’s delayed on Inquisition business. That leaves boss-girl in need of replacement security. I want everyone to watch over her while we’re in Haven, just in case. Nothing too invasive just keep an eye out for her while you’re going about your days.”

“The small one?” Skinner asked for clarification.

That got Krem a blank stare from Bull. “Ellie,” he explained.

“Yeah Skinner, the small one,” Bull confirmed.

Krem was a bit concerned the Elf woman looked pleased, like she thought she was being given carte blanch to kill any ‘Shems’ that looked at the Herald sideways. But uh. They’d burn that bridge when they got to it he supposed.

“We’ll keep an eye out Chief,” Krem said.

And that got him one hell of a shit-eating grin from the Iron Bull. The Qunari clapped Krem hard on the shoulder, hard enough he wasn’t sure if it was the oaf’s hand or his words that winded him.

“Oh, you’ll be doing more than just keeping an eye out, Krem.”

Varric and Sera were sitting together at the bar of Flissa’s Tavern. Good woman, kept topping off Varric’s mug without question. Sera hadn’t done much more than chug two beers, her third sat slowly losing its froth, all but forgotten to their debate.

Of the most intellectual and stimulating sort, of course.

“Yer a Dwarf, Dwarfy!” Sera exclaimed. “You should know Diamondback* is way better’n’ Wicked Grace!”

“You don’t know shit about Diamondback if you think I would enjoy it just because I’m a Dwarf,” Varric drawled. “It’s the damn Orzamar nobility that’s all about that crap. Wicked Grace is where its at. Diamondback is a child’s game.”

“Dwarves is short like kids,” the Elf girl snickered.

Okay, ignoring that. “Chanson d’Argent verses Dead Man’s Tricks.” Varric posed.

“Duh! Dead Man’s Tricks!”

“Can’t pronounce Chanson d’Argent can you, Buttercup?”

“Shite yeah I can’t pronounce ‘chanty deodorant’ you wank, plus I’ve only ever played Tricks. Other thing sounds like a lady-bits disease.”

Eh. “It’s Orlesian so, basically yeah, it’s like a lady-bits disease,” he conceded. Dead Man’s Tricks was more fun. Huh. He wondered if Tumbles knew any card games.

He heard the door swing open, and Sera whipped her head around real fast, “Inky!” she greeted loudly.

Oh, hell yeah, Tumbles was here? Great timing, Wicked Grace was totally going on the syllabus for Street Smarts. Varric turned from his mug and saw Seeker and Ellie.

“You will moderate your tone this instant,” Cassandra snapped at the Elf girl, harshly but quietly like she was trying to keep her own voice down. Sera’s mouth went shut.

“Be nice to Sera,” Tumbles gently reprimanded. Almost half-hearted but not like she hadn’t meant it, more like she was just beat. Seeker saw Ellie seated in front of the fire place, kneeling a bit to whisper something to her, hand stroking the back of her hooded head before rising and coming to the bar. Ellie had her arms folded on the table and laid her head down in them.

“S’wrong with Inky?”
“She has had a trying day, Sera, she is tired and has a headache. If you insist upon speaking do so quietly, please,” Cassandra implored using the strained politeness asked of her. “Flissa, the Herald needs dinner.”

“Of course!” Flissa gasped, setting about getting her meal ready at once.

“What’s up?” Varric asked Seeker quietly. Oh. Shit.

Seeker looked like absolute hell. Taunt with stress, eyes wide and unblinking as she stared into space, hands gripping the edge of the bar, and she was just ashen.

“Fliss, you good to keep an eye on things?” Varric asked the barmaid who nodded. “Go sit with Tumbles, kay Buttercup?”

Sera nodded. “I’ll be quiet,” she promised the Seeker before slipping off her stool to go sit next to Ellie, whispering ‘Just me’, and putting a hand on the younger girl’s back to rub circles.

“Seeker?” Varric asked, awkwardly putting a hand on the Nevarran woman’s shoulder. She jerked and stared at him in question. “Come on. Flissa’ll get Tumbles her food, Sera’s watching her.” he nodded his head to gesture for the Seeker to follow him.

“I cannot leave Eleanor unattended.”

“Was I not speaking Trade? Flissa’s got her, so does Buttercup, and Chuckles is literally two feet away in his cabin.” He’d seemed distracted lately, Solas, but he’d know if Ellie were in danger and come running.

Cassandra nodded stiffly and followed as he hopped down from his seat and led her, not far, just to his tent, gesturing for her to take a seat on his cot. He sat on the little table that used to be in Flissa’s, Tumbles got it for him as a writing desk. Bless that girl.

Seeker sat and just. She looked like she was about to snap, really.

“What’s going on?”

Okay wait, maybe he shouldn’t’ve asked, shit.

He thought she might yell or get violent or something but her face just completely criumpled, and something like a sob huffed out of her and her eyes had definite, confirmable tears when she pressed a hand against them. Shit!

He couldn’t’ve felt more awkward if the woman had sat down and stripped herself naked, and at least if she’d done that eh. He knew what to do with naked. Definitely couldn’t say the same for crying but he was going to try his best.

“I forgot to feed her,” she said first. “She has been in my care in Haven for all of seven hours and I just…Marehis isn’t here, and she won’t be for-” she stopped and gasped for air, “Marehis will be delayed indefinitely! She has to trust [319x142]that we can do what is best for Eleanor and I have failed more than once today!”

“You forgot to feed her?” he asked first. “She has been in my care in Haven for all of seven hours and I just…Marehis isn’t here, and she won’t be for-” she stopped and gasped for air, “Marehis will be delayed indefinitely! She has to trust that we can do what is best for Eleanor and I have failed more than once today!”

“You forget to feed her?” he asked first. “She has been in my care in Haven for all of seven hours and I just…Marehis isn’t here, and she won’t be for-” she stopped and gasped for air, “Marehis will be delayed indefinitely! She has to trust that we can do what is best for Eleanor and I have failed more than once today!”

“Okay uh, let’s talk this out. What do you mean ‘forgot’ to feed her? She’s not a puppy.”

“Our War Room meeting became more involved than I thought it would be, and then she had to meet with noble allies for the Inquisition, that was abhorrent, they,” oh man they’d done something, Cassandra was pissed, swinging from near sobs to seething rage, “they proposed to Okay. That. No no no, nope! Nu-uh. Back it _way_ on up.

“Please tell me you mean a lucrative business proposal.”

Cassandra leveled him a wry glare—though her anger was clearly not at him. “Lord Berand’s family proposed a _marriage_ between Eleanor and their son! A man most recently affianced and over a decade her senior! The Lord himself gave Cullen some warning but Maker forbid anyone tell me! Apparently Lord Berand wanted no part in his parents’ manipulations but they offered his hand to Eleanor saying Lady Vellina’s loss was tragic but just how fortuitous that her fate delivered their son to the Herald of Andraste—we were in talks for _three hours_ dissuading them from such a notion without losing their allegiance! Eleanor was incredibly embarrassed by the entire affair!”

Yeah screw them for scarring the kid but also proposing in general. Cause see Tumbles isn’t allowed to get married. Nope. Not uh, not anytime soon. The meaning of ‘at arrow-point wedding’ would mean Bianca has shot the groom dead to cancel the proceedings.

How the hell did these people even thought to do something like that? Shit, hadn’t these jerks come here with the family of their son’s dead fiancée?

“Wait wait wait, so you introduce them to Tumbles and they just…? Propose?”

“What an esteemed honor it is to finally meet you Lady Herald, while it was such unfortunate circumstances that brought you together, we hope you would hear our proposal of _marriage_ on behalf of our beloved son,” the Seeker quoted in scathing tones. “The absolute _gall_! And when Lady Montilyet finally worked them down to an understanding that such a union would not be practical at this time before doling out a respectful refusal, they cajoled Eleanor into giving them a tour of Haven before they left! Like they thought if they could get her alone they could bully her into acceptance! Thankfully Eleanor brought up the point that it would be incredibly rude for her to ignore her other guests, they’d all come so far to see her, and she would be so very delighted to give the host of our noble guests a tour. She only just saw them off.”

“Well shit, Cassandra it doesn’t sound like Tumbles had time to breathe let alone take a lunch break in the middle of war room meetings, thwarted marriage proposals, and playing tour guide.”

“Time or no I should have made some!” Cassandra insisted with vehement compunction, “Made escape for her during those _horrible_ marriage negotiations! They were daunting and did nothing but mortify her. Lady Josiphine could have made her case without the Herald’s presence. But I didn’t even consider she hadn’t eaten since breakfast until Eleanor was suffering from the oversight! Marehis would _never_ have made such a mistake!”

“Let’s stop comparing with Marehis. You’re always watching over Ellie in the field, Marehis usually watches over her in Haven and those are two totally different playing grounds.” Plus, Marehis was the embodiment of maternal instinct, the woman had mad powers of perception and foresight for _days_. Varric was definitely never playing card games against her, she’d rob him blind.

Cassandra had actively _work_ at taking care of the kid outside of kicking demon ass to defend her, everything else was new and she was _trying_, shit, it was more than Varric had ever expected of the woman. She’d gone from keeping the girl at battle-field’s length, an asset to the Inquisition and nothing more to open, revealing affection with the kid! Varric had gotten an eyeful of the woman’s cuddle session, and he didn’t need Qunari hearing, just his regular shitty Dwarf hearing to overhear the Seeker singing, that’s right! A horrible, off-key, ‘the tune bucket had a Breach sized hole in it’ lullaby, to Tumbles when she was sick on the Coast. Elves and Qunari were gone, and she obviously thought Varric wouldn’t be able to hear her through the tent and the raining, but nope, he’d been cooking dinner and boom! Horrible singing…but a damn sweet gesture. Point was, Seeker tried.

And still, she beat herself up when shit just…happened. “This should not be so difficult,” she said.

“It’s just different!” Varric insisted. “Out in the field we’re all together, we take all our meals at the same time, sleep at the same time everything—everything that needs done we do together, and our time is way more flexible, anything we can’t get done one day can be seen to the next. Here we all go our separate ways. Marehis’s day is dedicated to taking care of Ellie, you’ve got your own shit to juggle, separate schedules with you and Tumbles trying to stoke a crap ton of fires. Today sounds like it got away from you. It’s not like she was going to starve to death, a headache isn’t that big of a deal—”

“She nearly fainted!”

Alright granted. “Slightly bigger deal but still, Seeker. Slightly. Definitely not life-threatening—you’re doing the best you can. You had to pick up the slack for Marehis on a crazy-ass day. Don’t beat yourself up over it.”

“It isn’t just today I am…I am so,” worried? Distressed? Either worked. Seeker shook herself and restarted her sentence. “Something is…something is wrong, Varric she,” her voice was wrought with panic, Cassandra bowed her head, hands bracing her temples like a vice. “She is sick, nearly all the time now, from stress. It is constant. She…”

“What?” he asked. Seeker didn’t say anything so Varric rose from his seat and went to kneel in front of her. “Hey. Look at me. I know Marehis isn’t here but the rest of us are, talk to me. What’s going on?”

“She is ill, day in, day out, sick to her stomach, must be continually dosed with potion and it is getting to such a state she cannot take more and yet her illness persists—burning sometimes stabbing pain in her stomach, burning in her chest. She could barely eat this morning she was in such pain. And her panic attacks…” she struggled for her words then so Varric tried to help. Shit. Kid was stressed but he hadn’t realized it was that bad. He’d seen her picking at her food this morning he just thought she was sick of his scrambled eggs. It was his go-to for breakfast okay? And the bearded bastard used to handle breakfast a lot of the time so Varric had been beating that asshole to the punch. Cause fuck him, that’s why.

Seeker was still tripped up so he offered, “Yeah, that’s always hard, but it was just one panic attack,” the fact was meant to soothe but,

“Seven,” she corrected.

… “What?”

“She has had seven panic attacks in the last four days. One of which n-nearly…” she shuddered. “Solas was able to be of assistance before it wholly transitioned into an asthma attack.”

“Shit, Seeker…” about a thousand questions wanted to fling themselves at her all at once. Why hadn’t she said anything?! Who else knew about this, why was he the last to know? Fuck!
What was…shit was it all over Rainier’s crap? Of course it was, that bastard. Bah! He had to stop himself from launching into all sorts of questions Seeker was…she was freaking out right now.

Cassandra handled her shit pretty well, but she was basically in the middle of a full blown breakdown and he uh…definitely didn’t want that. She worked herself way too hard. He’d seen new parents with less anxiety. Aveline* hadn’t slept for almost three months after she (with a little help from Donnic) popped a little guy of their own into existence, she worried if she didn’t have eyes on the tyke he’d stop breathing in his sleep or something. Cassandra was nearing new-mom-Aveline levels of stressed-out and that was dangerous for everyone involved, and certainly not healthy for the Seeker herself.

“What can we do?” Varric asked. Shit, he knew he did fuck-all to help out with the kid outside lunch dates and the occasional street smarts session. He could do more. Probably. “Is it Rainier’s bullshit stressing her out so much? I know you got some resistance from the Empress, but I thought kid asked Vivienne to handle that. Can’t imagine Iron Lady walking away without success.”

“Oh no. No, Madam de Fer did indeed secure the Empress’s mercy in Rainier’s case. Perhaps too well,” Cassandra took a deep shuddering breath, and she was shaking. “This cannot leave this room, not until everything has been finalized.”

“I can keep a secret.” For someone who chronicled his every adventure, he really could keep a secret.

“It will be common knowledge all too soon,” she said. “The Empress offered Eleanor a favor.”

He didn’t know the symptoms of having a stroke. But he was pretty sure he was having a stroke. His brain felt like someone had doused it in kerosene and lit it on fire. He sat straight down on his ass then. Son of a bitch. Whatever the hell it was, if Ellie refused she was screwed. If she accepted she was screwed. Just. Damn it!

“Uhh was it at least wor—” nope. Nope. Didn’t matter what it was. That old Orlesian bitch could have offered Ellie anything in all the world and it wouldn’t matter a damn because she just got right up in the asscrack of the Game. Hell yeah, this was going to be common knowledge soon—every last fucking noble dick was going to hear about this, take satisfaction or offense at whatever choice the kid made.

Ellie’s whole ‘screaming my frustrations out into the sea’ thing felt like uh, yeah, he’d be down for some sea screaming. How far was the Coast? Maybe the Haven’s lake would work, all that ice and shit it’d be echoy and loud and yeah he could go for it right now. No wonder Seeker was beating herself up—it wasn’t her fault but yeah, Varric hadn’t even been there and he felt like…shit! He should’ve been able to do something! He had all sorts of connections, mostly in Ferelden but he couldn’t believe an offer from the Empress to Tumbles had slipped under his radar. This was dangerous and there was no way of protecting her from it!

He’d never really cared much about whose ass warmed Orlais’ throne but yeah, Empress Celene was definitely on his list now. Ellie was a kid! And she just threw her head first into the deep end of the Game!

For some reason that gave him the vague thought that the kid might not know how to swim? Not just politically—shit, she had no way of even beginning to know how to do that. But like for real? They should probably make sure of that—ha, not him, he was sunk but someone should, when they were around a non-frozen body of water. Bah! Current problem though—“What has her royal majesty so graciously offered?” he wanted to know. Damn!

“The Empress will clear Rainier and his men of their crimes, he will be free to work in service to the Inquisition and his former comrades will be released from prison,” Cassandra said. “After discussing what Rainier feels his men would do with their new-found freedom, Eleanor decided to accept.”

Just. Wait. “He- that bastard- He could have told her anything! Just! Lied again, gave her false assurances, maybe…maybe this was what he was planning all along!”

“Yes Varric,” Seeker drawled. “Years before the Breach, before the rebellion even, Thom Rainier decided he would have his men commit a horrific crime he fully intended them to get away with because he planned to pose as a Warden and wait for the Herald of Andraste to find him, trust him, and manipulate her through his betrayal to free he and his men with the aide of the Empress of Orlais. Truly. He is the greatest mind in a generation. We will proclaim his intellectual prowess in the ages to come.”

Okay. Little much. But at least she was being all bone-dry humor and not all worried out of her mind and openly crying anymore.

“I’m not saying he planned all that, I’m just saying he’s a goddamn opportunist!” Money to be made over the war for Orlais throne? Sure! Whoops, now some kids are dead. Better run while I can! Oh, Warden says I ‘show promise’ hell yeah, sign me up! Oh he’s dead now too, and it should have been me? Sounds like a likely story, I’m the only one alive to talk about it anyway, I’m just going to steal his identity! Sweet, clueless, naive little girl running around trying to fix the hole in the sky? If she can fix that she may as well fix my cocked-up life for me!

“It was a difficult decision, but Eleanor had to make the call, loath she was to make it. She is petrified at the possibility that these men will squander their freedom, cause harm that could have been prevented if she had turned the Empress down,” Cassandra sighed. “As it is, Lady Josephine is working on offers to present Rainier’s men with, to see if perhaps they would serve the Inquisition, they would be more easily dealt with if they were under our direct supervision. If they are truly repentant, we will see.”

“I could kill him, I really could.” Really, really, really could. Bianca was practically begging to put an arrow in that man’s head, and he so very rarely let his favorite girl down.

But, he might have made a promise—double pinkies—to uh, shit, she was his new favorite girl, how was that possible? Was he losing his edge? He’d accused Seeker of going soft but damn.

“Believe you me, if his loss would not absolutely devastate Eleanor, that man would not have survived the journey back from the Storm Coast,” Cassandra assured him darkly.

Varric sighed and shook his head. “I still can’t believe she gives a damn about him.”

“She loves him,” Seeker lamented wearily.

“You…you do know Eleanor loves you, as well, yes?”

Uh-huh well that had his face feeling like it was on fire now. He cleared his throat. “She’s a good kid. That asshole hurts her ever again I’ll kill him myself.”
“You most certainly will not,” Seeker assured him. He would have argued but then she said, “I have already made arrangements with Leliana. Should he ever betray Eleanor again, his loss will be made to look like an accident.”

He didn’t quite have Bull’s appreciation for red heads, but he could kiss their Spymaster senseless if he thought she wouldn’t put a hit out on him for it.

“Huh. I can dig it,” he agreed. Still. Might not be able to kill the bastard, but he was absolutely by no means to go anywhere near Ellie. Never. He’d broken her heart, and Varric blamed him, absolutely for Tumbles being so nerve-wrackingly sick, and…shit now, now he’d put her life at stake. Asshole may think he can just pick up where he left off with the kid but nope, he had another thing coming, no way in hell Varric was letting him get anywhere near being someone Ellie considered truly her friend ever again.

“You uh. You feel better now, Seeker?” he asked after they’d fallen silent for a while.

She went a bit red at that, as if she’d only just realized they sort of completely broken their whole ‘I’m going to despise you till your dead’ thing they had going on between them in the beginning of what was now a…weird sort-of friendship. “I do apologize for becoming so out of sorts. I would ahh,” she cleared her throat, “appreciate your discretion.”

Oh, come on, he couldn’t let the opportunity pass him up. “I assure you, I’m always discreet about the women who’ve been in my bed.” She was sitting on his cot after all.

“I could also arrange for your death to look like an accident.”

“Yeah yeah,” he chuckled. But more seriously, because awkward as it felt to say, they’d already come this far, “Look uh. I know, taking care of the kid can be a lot, Marehis being out of the picture leaves a lot on you but I was serious when I said everyone else is here. Solas. Bull. Sera…you know, sorta. And uh. Me. Don’t feel like you gotta do everything all on your own.”

She didn’t say ‘thanks’ but she did say,

“You will cease being so kind to me this instant. I assure you it is nauseating.”

He was pretty sure that was the same thing.

Trespasser DLC Spoilers abound

He lost track of time, a gentle feeling of question filtering through their connection snapped Solas out of his daze and reminded him of the hour. Goodness, it was nearing sunset when he finally emerged from his cabin. He hadn’t set foot from his quarters since their return to Haven that morning. He’d been occupied with study. Of a sort.

Admittedly, of his letters from Marehis. He…he kept them all, every single one. A strange bit of sentimentality he supposed. One that was a bit torturous at the moment. He did not think of himself as a clingy man but...well he’d not heard a single word from Marehis in quite a few days. Three. Which wasn’t much granted but...well she’d written him, sometimes multiple times a day, every day since their, ah, since their relationship formed, and he went to the Hinterlands with Ellie. They made a point of touching base, some of their letters were barely worth the parchment they were set to—entire scrolls dedicated to the single line “I am safe” from Marehis, and in Solas’s case the addition of the assurance that “Ellie is well” when he hadn’t a great deal of time to detail their travels. At first he was worried, perhaps some misfortune had befallen her—that she physically could not get word out from her quarter. But apparently Marehis was still sending her reports along to Cassandra, well, and still in Orlais.

He wasn’t sure what he’d done. He almost wished he were the sort of person to copy his own correspondence, a record of letters he’d sent her. He tried to remember everything he’d said in his last letter to her...had he offended her somehow? Said something he shouldn’t? Was she...had she decided to terminate their relationship? Surely even if she despaired of him she would not suddenly cut off all contact—she would write to let him know or at the very least make it clear she did not wish to continue correspondence with him until such a time they could speak face to face, to end things.

So, upon returning to Haven he’d gone straight away to his cabin and pored over every letter the woman had ever written them, studying them for style, tone. Reading them in order he could see the...the way her feelings for him had grown, the change between light flirtation to...genuine love. He had not loved in such a way as this, not in recountable time. He hadn’t expected to find someone who captured his attentions but somehow, she had. She was beautiful, at times it was such he came to understand what it was to look upon a woman and the breath from your very lungs is stolen away at the sight. When her body was bathed in moonlight he would find himself struck by the thought that perhaps she had been like him—not in exact form, of course, but...he had not found any of the others in his travels, though he knew for certain Mythal* had fallen, given herself over, allowed herself to be reincarnated in a sense by attaching to a willing mortal form. He wondered if perhaps Marehis was her vessel, conduit of the All-Mother. But no, there was nothing in her history that would suggest such a thing, and perhaps that was for the best. While he longed for things of old, Marehis brought to light every quality that could be found in something new.

Just as she was lovely, she was bright, so very smart. He found he could speak with her on any subject he could possibly care to discuss and he did not grow bored, he could listen to her for hours, and she listened to him, never mocked or ridiculed ideas of his she did not agree with or couldn’t fully understand—when such misunderstanding did occur, when they brushed against subjects he was not fully prepared to discuss with her in full, like his... plans for the future, for their people...she was patient and tried to comprehend, and sometimes it seemed like she did garner understanding even when he could not clue her in on all of the information, not yet.

He’d spoken with Marehis of the way things had been—not in great detail. He’d posed truths disguised as hypotheticals—had she heard legends of the old gods, what did she think of the tales of their ascension? Did she believe, as many Dalish did, that their gods—at least Elgar’nan and Mythal—had always existed as gods, or did she think there was some credence to be paid to the theory that their gods had once been Elves themselves, ascended to godhood. He daren’t pose the suggestion that the gods were not gods at all, merely the last generation of Dalish that lived the way Elves were meant to live before they fell from their higher station, revered by their cheated descendants as mystical beings. Marehis believed in the gods.

She would scarcely believe, that when Sola’s attentions as they laid together caused the Dread Wolf’s name to cross her lips, she placed them on the Wolf himself.

When he first woke, sought the keys to his success to bring his people back from the brink of destruction they lived on now, his goals had been for the betterment of them all, to set things right, make things as they were, return eternity to his people. Now...now when he thought of the return of Elvish immortality, of forever, he thought of Marehis. Oh. Perhaps she had come to have some idea of that. Maybe he had been too reckless with his intentions, given her too much information. Maybe she pieced enough of the puzzle together, had discovered his plans for Elven immortality.

Perhaps that was it? Why she’d so abruptly seemed to have cut things off with him. Had he been reckless, given the woman too much information too soon, accidentally revealed the truth of the matter—that Elves were always meant to live eternal? She loved him, would certainly be content to share their lives together, he was certain of that now. But...but forever? That may be desirable to her as well except...he only lay claim to part of her heart. There was Ellie. A Human girl, small and, despite the Mark’s ability to anchor to her, and more impressive her ability to hold magical connection with him, she was mortal. If his goals were met, he and Marehis, all Elves would live on. Ellie...she would age, and if she were lucky, live a long life. But she would eventually grow old and weak and die. Perhaps Marehis had realized what Solas longed to do for his people and wanted no part in it because she could not abide a fate where she lived eternally with the loss of her ward.

“...here soon. He said he was coming. Or...well, he sent the feeling? It’s pretty weird to explain,” Ellie’s voice, muffled, filtering through the walls of her cabin as Solas approached.

“Nah, I’m okay. Really Cassandra, thanks for everything today. Oh! Come in!” she called when Solas sent a subtle announcement of his arrival.

Her cabin was warm, Cassandra sat on the floor, her back resting against Ellie’s bed, the Herald curled up against her before the fireplace, one of the Seeker’s hands absently playing with one of the curls at the back of Ellie's hair. Even though by his watch it was not even seven o’clock, Ellie was already in her sleep clothes.

He had not focused much on their bond today, and he should have. The past week Eleanor had continually exhibited signs of stress causing her to be physically unwell. When he focused now...there was the burn of the Mark, the dull pain ever-present in her stomach as of late, and she was weary, more than ready to go to sleep, she did still wish to meditate with him before she went to sleep though...not for her benefit? Oh.

She was worried about him. She wanted to make sure he was alright before she went to sleep, and thought...ah, she had noticed he was unlike himself these past few days and thought he was sad, perhaps lonely, and sought to make sure he got the opportunity to both clear his mind and attempt to work through his angst while being in the company of one he could call friend—to dispel his sorrow, and loneliness.

He could scarcely forgive himself, that his actions had led to the fate burned into her hand, but he was glad to know Ellie. He did not like the prospect any more than Marehis would, a future where he would have to live on past her death, but that made the time they had together all the more precious. He would hold onto it for as long as he could and cherish it once it was gone.

“Come, da’len. Sit with me,” Solas said as he sat down before the hearth. Ellie nodded and scooted away from the Seeker to sit beside him. He cast his worries aside and focused on his breathing, on her breathing, they synched rather seamlessly now, and he paid close attention to his heartbeat—like the ticking of a clock, to help him discern how much time they passed. He would not keep her long. In fact, it was such he needn’t keep track of the time, Eleanor quickly began to doze in her seat after a few minutes, outright falling asleep, he cracked an eye open to see her slump forward, his hand and Cassandra’s went to her shoulders, his far more calmly and he nodded to the Seeker as if to reassure her Ellie was well.

“I think that is enough for this evening, da’len,” he said, and the girl stirred a bit, shaking herself and blinking at him sleepily.

“Mmkay. Thanks, Solas,” she mumbled.

She was only barely awake, and he worried that she might fall if she tried to rise, she was utterly exhausted. So, he carefully slid his arms, one behind her back, the other to brace the back of her knees, and carried her the few steps to her bed. Cassandra pulled her bedding aside, so she could be laid down and her blankets pulled over her, the Seeker actually tucking the girl in, and Solas offered her a bit of privacy, turning away when the woman brushed the hair from Ellie’s face and pressed a kiss to her temple.

“We must talk,” Cassandra said quietly, after a moment of making certain Ellie was sound asleep. She gestured for him to follow her, nodded her thanks to the guards stationed outside her door for the evening, and headed for Solas’s cabin.

“May I speak plainly? Marehis has told you I am aware of your relationship, yes?” she asked when he closed the door behind them.

“Oh. Oh goodness. Had…had Marehis sent the Seeker with some form of rejection for him?
She was much younger than he surely, but he had not ever found her to be immature, it would be incredibly childish to- to- break things off through a friend. Like a girl in the school yard breaking a liaison with some boy she’d claimed to have loved for all of a day!”

“You may wish to sit,” the Seeker was reluctant to say.

“Of course, Seeker.” They’d been almost concerned with just how many knew of their relationship, but the important thing was Ellie wasn’t aware—the girl wouldn’t be upset over it, just the opposite. She would seek to encourage their relationship, and that ran the risk of Ellie putting herself at danger to allow the Elves more time alone together. Ellie would not understand that there was a part of their relationship that benefited from her presence, Marehis in her role at peace to have her ward so close and safe, Solas in his role offering guidance and sharing what he could of his knowledge with the girl. Marehis’s job protecting Eleanor came first, that was something he was more than cognizant of going into this, he could hardly begrudge the time Ellie consumed with Marehis, not when, once all was said and done, Marehis’s time with Eleanor would be a mere paragraph in the story of the Elf woman’s life.

“You may wish to sit,” the Seeker was reluctant to say.

Oh. Oh goodness. Had…had Marehis sent the Seeker with some form of rejection for him?
She was much younger than he surely, but he had not ever found her to be immature, it would be incredibly childish to- to- break things off through a friend. Like a girl in the school yard breaking a liaison with some boy she’d claimed to have loved for all of a day!

“No. I do not believe I do. Say what you’ve come to say.”

“Very well,” Cassandra said looking incredibly awkward, shifting on her feet uncertainly.
“You cannot share what I am about to disclose to you, not with anyone. Leliana barely agreed to cue you in, but given your relationship with Marehis, I believe it wise to keep you informed.”

This…this did not sound much like a breakup anymore. It…no. He would wait to hear the Seeker out first, if he allowed the very thought to cross his mind that Marehis might…no. Panic spiked in his magic and he could feel it crackling beneath his skin and for a horrified moment he thought perhaps after centuries of cool control he’d mastered in his youth, he was going to cast involuntarily, wild magic lashing out like a wounded animal—
Perhaps he should sit down then, clenching his eyes shut just a second as he took a few deep breaths, before he crossed his quarters—small as they were they felt vast somehow, empty. He had never minded his solitude, did not mind it even still but his world was lighter, more content when Marehis was there, even when it was just her attendance during Ellie’s lessons. He fell into one of the chairs before his fireplace. It lay cold, and he realized he hadn’t tended it all day, his cabin was chilled now and that suited him, it was something of a distraction. When Cassandra sat in the second chair he was reminded that he was not alone in his quarters, he cast at the dormant logs, gave them light again.

“Marehis is alive, but there has been a complication. Leliana’s ranks have been compromised, and while she seeks to fix the problem, her agents in the field have been instructed to scatter and lay low. Marehis made it out of Orlais safely but we cannot know where she has gone until order is restored among the Nightingales.”

Oh, he was, he was eternally grateful. He wasn’t sure to who but…Marehis was alive. She…she had to flee Orlais? She could not let anyone know where she was, that explained the sudden cut off in communication but…

“…she…she’s been sending reports still, I thought?”

“Fabrications. Leliana’s doing, to ensure Eleanor was not made aware of the problem.”

Ahh. “Ellie does not know?”

“Certainly not.”

“When can she…how can…does Leliana have any idea of when she will be able to resume contact? Return to Haven?”

Cassandra shook her head. “The Iron Bull has been made aware of the issue, and is reaching out, quietly to his Ben Hessrath contacts, to keep an eye out for Marehis. If they see her they will report back to Bull on her wellbeing—he has not revealed the Inquisition’s troubles just asked that they look out for ‘a friend of his’ in the field. That is the most we can hope for until the threat has been dealt with. I cannot go into detail but Leliana assures me that we will have the culprit apprehended and in Haven for questioning before the week is out.”

“What will we be saying to Ellie? She will question if Marehis does not return shortly after Madam de Fer. Or with Scout Harding.”

“We will be saying nothing, allow Leliana to handle this. Harding is under orders to hide, just as Marehis is. I will ensure Eleanor believes Marehis is merely delayed with other matters the Inquisition requires her attention on in Orlais. She cannot know about this, Solas, truly.”

Her voice held such an intonation that was just about as close to begging as Solas had ever heard from the woman.

“What is it, Seeker?” Solas asked.

She sounded surprised that he would ask as such. “You did not hear us earlier? When we visited Adan?”

He looked up at the Seeker then, absolutely horrified, “She was in need of the Healer? Was she attacked?” Surly he had not been so distracted that he missed a call for help from Ellie!

“No, Solas. The ailments she has been having, her stomach upsets, more frequent bouts of Today she took the maximum amount of her stomach potion before noon. I insisted she see Adan and he believes she has begun to develop an ulcer. If she were to know that Marehis has been put at risk, that she could be in danger it—the stress is unnecessary for her to bear, and it could prove detrimental!”

His mouth worked, opening shutting, opening again but he wasn’t sure he was capable of speech at the moment. What did manage to translate from his brain to his lips was, “An ulcer?”

“A hole burned through the lining of the stomach and if left untreated, through the organ proper.”

“I know what an ulcer is!” he found himself snapping and then, “I apologize I just…Adan is certain?”

“As he can be. It has not become wholly degenerative but must be monitored. We must be vigilant in lessening the demands placed on Eleanor. He has sent word to the Advisors, and I will be speaking to the others later. We must do what we can to bring her ease. I would ask that you monitor her as you can in the days to come, I understand you do not wish to invade her privacy, but this is a matter of her safety.”

Solas nodded, he whole-heartedly agreed. The future was uncertain but what he could be certain of, was Marehis never forgiving him should he allow something to happen to Eleanor, something he could have prevented, anyway.

He thanked Cassandra, and she left him to his thoughts.

To his sleep—he needed to, now, not just because it was ever pressing, his exhaustion from the day. He had to dream, cast his mind deep into the Fade. Ellie was resting and he would monitor her when they woke tomorrow.

The Iron Bull had his Ben Hessrath contacts but he…he would much prefer the reliance of his own allies. He would call out to his friends in the Fade and ask that they cast a net of their own to search for Marehis, see that she was well. He could feel the subtle life-signs of Marehis’s magic perhaps he could make contact with her himself. She was not a Mage, but all Elves, even now, had some measure of magic even if it laid dormant within them. Sera, loath that she was to accept her heritage, she had a certain affiliation with magic. She may not realize it but her instincts, to hold Eleanor’s Marked hand when it burned the girl’s magic, it was in fact a form of relief—the Mark could sense another’s magic touching it even through a layer of skin, it stopped tormenting Ellie’s magic so much, became distracted trying to see if it could latch on to a more compatible host. To no avail of course, Solas had tried, for days after the Conclave, to get the Mark to transfer to him, but it would not be removed. Sera could not put it into thoughts or words, she did not even realize what she was doing, she just did it. Perhaps Marehis would be able work on such instinct as well, join him in the Fade even if by accident.

Solas closed his eyes and threw himself into sleep.

Krem’d always been something of a morning person. It started in his youth—his father always rose early each morning, to prepare for the day in his workshop, a little place just around the corner from their home. The first thing his father did was shave, he always woke with scruff on his face, and he liked to be neat, clean-shaven—it was professional, and dignified he said. Once mother could be heard getting breakfast together, Krem would tip toe from his bedroom to his parents’ room and in the low lamplight, just a hint of morning sun peeking through the slats of their windows, and the bit of reflection from his father’s shaving mirror always angled downward so Krem could see into it, his father would let him pretend to shave. The man kept a squared off butter knife in his shaving kit—something that looked similar to the razor he used without an actual sharp edge a young child might accidentally hurt themselves with. And even when things were tight, every dollop considered scarce, his father always let him lather his face with shaving cream—when he was very little his father did it himself, he’d take Krem’s face in his hands and rub the cool cream on his cheeks, for some reason it always made Krem laugh, and his father would grin ‘meus bello mimo!’ my handsome child, he’d say. Together they sat, father and son, shaving.

It was one of the few times in his day he felt truly completely at peace with himself when he was young. His father’s shaving kit was one of the few possessions he still had from his life in Tevinter, a small wooden box he kept tucked away except when he shaved. He didn’t have anything like the thick dark scruff his father had, nothing that reminded him of the comforting scratchiness of his father’s cheek against his face when they hugged, but he got fuzzy under his chin, along his jaw, above his lips. Made him feel like, wherever his father may be, for a few minutes, they were together. A silly notion, nothing but sentiment, but comforting, Krem thought. So.

This morning he rose just a bit earlier, excitement, nervousness rousing him before sunrise. A runner came for him just shortly after he’d woken, he was already armored up and ready for the day ahead when he received Ellie’s schedule.

8am combat training, meet Seeker Pentaghast and Commander Cullen at Haven’s Gate

10am—up to the lady Herald’s discretion. She may take free time, though Mister Thom Rainier will be available for horseback riding lessons, should she wish. He can be met at the forge, but she truly needn’t trouble herself.

11am psychology, meet The Iron Bull at the Charger’s camp

Noon Break for lunch

2pm See Solas in his cabin for Magical Training

3pm onwards, free time, dinner, etc.

10pm nightly meditation—The Herald may call upon Solas at any hour she wishes to retire, but we advise 10pm at the latest.

His orders were to keep the schedule to himself—the Herald’s movements were to be controlled around Haven, but the Advisors didn’t want just anyone knowing her outright schedule. Even her party members were not appraised to the thing, they only knew where to be and when for their specific part in her day. Apparently Marehis committed the new schedules to memory each morning and destroyed it but Seeker Pentaghast made it clear he was to simply endeavor to keep the parchment on his person, it would not do for him to forget where Ellie needed to be and when. He studied the thing over breakfast, he’d commit it to memory but tucked it away for safe keeping for today. Just in case. And then yeah, if that went well, maybe tomorrow or the next day he’d read it and burn it for safety’s sake.

It would seem Marehis had tested him when he’d been in Haven—he’d have figured that out soon enough without Seeker Pentaghast outright spelling it out for him. He was given full leave to command anyone for the sake of the Herald’s safety. When Marehis had gone to Healer Adan’s at Ellie’s request, she could have simply passed the task along to someone else and stayed with her ward, but she wanted to see how he’d fare with the responsibility. The Seeker said Marehis had been pleased with his work, the little he’d done, and her recalling the events to Seeker Pentaghast was what made her think of him in the first place. Marehis would be ‘comfortable’ with the idea of him watching over Ellie’s safety and Seeker Pentaghast had seen him fight on the Storm Coast, thought him suitable. So. No pressure.

Little bit of pressure but he didn’t mind it. Wanted to do well. It felt good, that they believed him capable. And he liked the idea, being someone who could keep Ellie safe.

He reported to Ellie’s cabin first thing after breakfast. There was a moment of uncertainty, once he dismissed the guards keeping watch outside her door, and he stood ready to knock. Her day would start soon, the scheduled part but he wasn’t sure if she would be ready yet or not, didn’t want to make her feel rushed or uncomfortable or…

No, he was just nervous. This was an important job, and…well he and Ellie got along well in the little doses of time they’d spent together but what if she tired of him, having to spend an entire day in his company? And he wasn’t certain just how many days after that, until Marehis was back from Orlais, or Ellie was sent somewhere else for the Inquisition’s work. And Marehis was who she would want to be looking after her, she had to miss the Elf woman horribly. What if she resented him because he was taking Marehis’s place?

It took all of a second after he knocked on the door for him to realize his worries were unfounded really. Ellie was just, well,

The door swung open and Ellie popped her head out, smiled when she saw it was him, bright, cheery, and Maker it cleared any trace of the chill Haven’s winter placed in his chest.

“Good morning, Cremisius! Do we need to leave now, or would you like to come in?”

He’d been careful to follow instructions, he was supposed to join Ellie early enough that they could handle any last-minute hiccups in her schedule before they absolutely had to be to her first appointment so. Yeah, they had some time.

She seemed glad to hear that, stepped aside and motioned for him to come on in.

She looked like she felt better today, well rested, her color returned. Her hair was trapped in a braid that ran down her back, and she was wearing the plainest clothing he’d seen her in—still pretty, she was uh, well she was beautiful it didn’t much matter what she wore—but they were obviously clothes meant for wear and tear. Combat training, her schedule said, and he wondered what sort of training that would be for a Mage. Fighting with her staff? It sat propped up against the wall in the corner by the door.

“Sorry for getting all fainty on you yesterday,” she thought to apologize. “I appreciate you helping me.”

He hadn’t helped much, and that’d certainly been no problem. “Don’t worry about it. You should see us when Chief gets a drop in blood sugar, he goes down like a stack of bricks. Squashed the littler Human fellow on our team, Grim, once, I swear! It took five of us to get the lug off of him!"

“Oh, that’s horrible!” she said, though the little story earned him her laughter. Had he really been concerned of boring the girl? He had no end of ways to make fun of Bull, and a great deal of stories that he thought she might like of previous jobs they’d worked. She wasn’t incredibly hard to please.

Her cabin was nice, clean, and he was glad it was warm. Ellie offered him a cup of tea from a pot sitting on a tray from Flissa’s. “It’s green tea. I didn’t think I’d like it, smells sort of…eh,” making a face like she’d expected the stuff to be foul, “But it actually isn’t bad,” she promised.

Oh, he accepted a cup in the hopes she would drink more of the stuff herself, she did which was good—they stood in front of the fireplace sipping their drinks. He was supposed to encourage her, in the efforts being made to make her better. Seeker Pentaghast had informed him last night that Ellie was at risk of ending up with an ulcer—which scared him senseless when he made Stitches give him a Healer’s rundown on it. Maker, he certainly didn’t want such a thing happening to Ellie. He’d stayed up talking with Stitches until Bull saw fit to remind him he couldn’t protect his ‘little girlfriend’ from much of anything if he was falling asleep on the job. Ass. Anyway, Stitches gave him a good feel for what to do in an emergency and the sort of things they’d need to avoid. No coffee was the kicker, Ellie’d not like not being able to have that but it was good she was going along with the green tea thing instead. Tea was on the ‘yes’ list. He’d been briefed about her potions regimen, Seeker handled her potion in the mornings with breakfast, and Ellie was supposed to let him know if she needed the others throughout the day. And he was supposed to watch out for signs of distress, let the Seeker know if he saw anything they could do to cut back on unnecessary stressors pressing the Herald.

Huh. Bull said that Ellie was shy about outright bringing attention to her anxieties, she would usually talk things over with Cassandra, and probably Marehis. She might not be comfortable being so forthright about things that bothered her with someone she wasn’t that close to.

“Ellie, can you do something for me?” he asked as they set their empty mugs back on the tray.

She nodded, as she looked to him. “Of course, whatever you need.” she sounded mission-ready when she said it, like if he were about to asked her to help him slay a dragon she’d ditch her day’s schedule and stop only to see if Bull wanted to tag along.

Oh. Maker. That reminded him how Bull ached to fight one of those things. Krem would kill that bastard if he took it into his head to drag Ellie along to hunt down a dragon! After all, “My job is to protect you, right?” When she nodded he continued, “It’ll be easy enough to see if someone’s coming at you with a knife or something, but part of my job is helping protect you from stuff that might not be super obvious to me—things that stress you out or scare you. I know it’s hard to be uh, open with people you’re not super familiar with, but we’ll have to work together.”

She worried her lip nervously. “Yeah, it is kind of awkward to just say ‘Hey! This bothers me!’ I mean sometimes it’s the stupidest stuff,” she admitted.

“It’s not stupid if it bothers you,” he told her. “I was thinking maybe, if you wouldn’t be comfortable saying something, you might be alright doing something.”
That got him a bit of a confused look. Yeah, explanation would probably be good.

“Growing up, my father and I had this sort of system. If something was really getting to me—even if it was something that wouldn’t quite make sense to him—I could just reach out and either lay my hand on his shoulder or arm, or hand and squeeze three times, that told him if someone or something made me feel uncomfortable or unsafe, and he’d do whatever he could to help me deal with it.”

“Your father sounds like a good man,” Ellie said sincerely.

He nodded, wholeheartedly agreeing. “I was thinking, maybe you’d be more comfortable doing something like that? You wouldn’t have to say anything—no explanation needed unless you feel like giving one later—just one two three and I’ll know to either look out for something in the future, to end or intervene in a conversation, or get you out of a situation you don’t want to be in.”

She lit up at that. “Oh! Gosh! Yeah, that’s such a great idea!” she enthused and oh. Wow. She hugged him, rising just slightly on her toes to wrap her arms around his neck, her head just beneath his chin, hair soft against his throat and oh.

He didn’t catch himself before he leaned into the hug, his head bowing over hers because her hair…what was that? Coconut oil. Her hair smelled like the coconut oil that scented nearly every stitch of the clothing his father tailored after investing in a proper sewing machine for himself. It was this big metal clunky thing that required lots of light to use and pedaling, and his father would let him help disassemble the thing on a regular basis because every piece and part required cleaning and oiling. There was outright sewing machine oil but uh, coconut oil was much less expensive and there was something about it, the fact that the scent lingered on the thread fed through the machine, stuck with his clothing that made it…he wasn’t sure. For his father he supposed it felt a bit like part of branding his designs. For Krem it just made everything his father ever made for him, smell something of him and home.

He hadn’t realized he’d hugged her back more tightly then until she returned the favor like she thought he’d suddenly found himself in need of the contact. He suppose he had.

Maker! Nope! Backing it up, get your head in the game Acassii! Friend! Bodyguard! Protecting the Herald!

He let go of her and she pulled away, smiling up at him, so he supposed he hadn’t done anything that struck her as odd. He checked his watch then, they were still good on time but should probably start heading that way. “Do you have everything you need? You’ve combat training with Seeker Pentaghast and Commander Cullen first.”

She nodded, excited. “Yup! All set!” she said as she grabbed a canteen that hung from her bedpost.

“I could carry that for you, if you’d like.” It was only polite, and he figured he’d have to hold onto it for her while she trained anyway.

“Oh, gosh, it isn’t heavy or anything,” she objected.

“Then it shouldn’t be an inconvenience for me at all then,” he returned with a reassuring grin.

“Okay, well, thanks,” she said sweetly, handing it off to him. He put the canteen over his shoulder, settled beside the bag on his hip of her potions.
She didn’t grab her staff or cloak when they made to leave, and she informed him she wouldn’t need her staff just yet, only if she had training with Solas, so they’d swing back around later and pick it up then. She wasn’t in the habit of wearing her cloak to her lessons—she certainly couldn’t during her time with Cullen and Cassandra she said. He grabbed it just in case, draping it over an arm—he could drop it in a heartbeat if he needed to, to defend the Herald, and he didn’t want to risk being out and her needing it. He offered up his other arm for her to take, if she wanted.

She blushed and thanked him, hugging his arm a bit when they stepped out into the morning chill. The sun was out well enough now, bright against the snow on the ground, though it wasn’t snowing at the moment which was nice. They made their way to Haven’s gate, and saw the Commander and Seeker waiting in the gateway.

The two stood close, conversing over something that seemed important, Cassandra had her hand on the Commander’s shoulder, saying something in earnest and Ellie tugged Krem. He let her pull him off to the side to duck along the front of the last cabin that lined Haven’s walls.

“Did they see us do you think?” she asked him quietly.

He shook his head, no.

“Good! I mean, not good, it kind of looked serious, I hope everything’s okay, but…well people talk about serious things with people they trust right?”

“True,” he agreed with her.

She smiled at that, looking excited about something. “This might sound super silly but,” she leaned in closer, speaking softly, “I think they’d be so cute together! You haven’t seen much of them I suppose but Cullen is super into Cassandra, and I think they’d be good for each other! They’ve got similar experiences and jobs, and I mean they don’t seem like they’re the sort to be super pressed to start a family or anything, but could you imagine—Cassandra’s cheekbones, Cullen’s eyes? They’d make the most beautiful, violent babies!”

He hadn’t paid a lot of attention to the Commander’s eyes but if Ellie thought they were nice, he was sure they were. Maker, she seemed ecstatic that the two were caught confiding in one another. “Lady Herald, have you been playing matchmaker with those in your camp?” he couldn’t help but tease.

“Maaaaybe. Just a little,” she admitted playfully. “I just, I dunno, I know things like that are important for people to have. The sort of work they do is tough to handle all on your own and so its important to have friends you can rely on, and if there’s someone you can be completely yourself with, rely on implicitly even in intimate ways, it’s something everyone should have if they need it.” and then, “I mean, Cassandra could stand to get laid. Cullen too. So. Two birds, one bed.”

Oh sweet Maker, god in heaven, did he really just hear that?

“Shhh! Shush! Cremisius!”

He couldn’t help it—he was laughing, loud, uncontrollable, and Ellie was no better after a second of trying to quiet him she was leaning against him for support as she giggled and laughed, her cheeks were red and her eyes a little wet after a moment.

Krem looked up when he heard movement and saw Seeker Pentagast had followed the sound, rounding the corner to see them laughing their asses off at…well. He had to stop himself from laughing harder when Commander Cullen joined the Seeker just a second later, and asked,
“Something funny, Eleanor?”

Ellie squeaked a bit, trying to reply but she was more focused on trying to stop laughing.

“Apologies, Seeker, Commander,” Krem cleared his throat, though his belly still jolted with unspilled laughter as he tried to reign it in. Sort of, “The Lady Herald was just telling me a funny story about some birds.”

“Cremisius!” that got him a little swat on the arm and she looked…not mad but like she was trying to look mad at him but was too amused to actually be upset. It was…

It almost made him want to kiss her really, and that was not happening so. He smiled in apology and she giggled.

“Sorry,” she said then, to her teachers, “I’m ready if you guys are!”

He thought the Seeker would be annoyed with their carrying on, but she looked pleased if anything, and the Commander just seemed amused.

“Very well, come along Eleanor, Lieutenant,” the Seeker said.

Bull was up and about, and Ellie released his arm to run up to the Qunari man with a big smile and a “Good morning, The Iron Bull! Thanks for helping me yesterday.”

“Not a problem boss. Morning to you too. Feeling better?”

Ellie nodded. “Uh-huh! Did you sleep well? You and the Chargers are all comfortable out here?”

Bull grinned to the Human girl. “Yeah boss, Chargers are all snug as a Nug in the mud,” he assured her.

Oh that was just lame, but it made Ellie laugh a bit. “Good,” she said, “I’ve got lessons now, but I’ll see you later!”

Krem went ahead and stood in Chief’s blind spot like he usually would, he could watch over Ellie from there—they trained right out in front of the Charger’s tents, in the clearing with a few practice dummies set up, beside the soldiers’ tents. Didn’t use the dummies though.

Oh. She really didn’t need her staff at all for this, it wasn’t the kind of combat training he’d been expecting.

Sparring. Hand to hand combat with the Commander and Seeker—they alternated sometimes coming at Ellie one at a time, and sometimes they both struck at the girl and she’d have to try to dodge or block or hit one of them back while dodging the other. She popped the Seeker in the chin, and ducked down, rolling to avoid the Commander coming at her from behind.

“Oh shit,” Bull said, obviously pleased with the move. “Go boss!”

There was fast movement on his left and Krem’s attention snapped to oh. Skinner. She’d come running from a tent, hair disheveled as if she’d just woken up, eyes wide, arms shaking a bit like she was itching to jump into action, fight something even as she stopped, standing between Krem and Bull, and stared unblinking at the ongoing training session, trying to decipher what was happening.
“Is the small one under attack?” she asked, bitingly, alarmed.

“Nah, Skinner, they’re just training,” Bull assured her. She didn’t look super assured. But then again, Skinner didn’t usually look much of anything except detachedly neutral, or wrath-fueled violent.

“I’d be over there kicking ass if it were anything else,” Krem promised. Wasn’t super sure he could take on a Seeker of all things especially backed by a Templar but uh, he was pretty sure he’d fist fight a bear if he had to, to defend Ellie. Plus, Bull’d have his back. Kind of want to see Bull fist fight a bear now.

Skinner stared at the three sparring Humans hard for a moment more and then she turned on her heel and disappeared back into the tent.

“Shouldn’t’ve told her she should watch out for the Herald, someone’s going to end up dead,” Krem warned him.

“Yeah but it keeps you on your toes. Though I suppose boss-girl’s doing a good enough job of it on her own,” Bull said. “Two birds one bed? Shit, that was good.”

Krem snorted.

Seeker handed Ellie a sword. It was a practice one for now—it looked real enough to make him a bit nervous at first, but the edges were blunted, you were more likely to walk away with bruises than bleeding. So, she’d get the feel for an actual sword without the consequence of accidentally injuring anyone or herself, and her teachers kept their actual swords sheathed, using practice swords to demonstrate moves for her and exercises that would help her gain better control over the weapon.

“Huh. She did something like that against a bear on the way back from the Coast,” Bull commented when they had her practicing a swinging strike with her blade.

Wait. “Seriously?”

“Two bears show up and we’re handling it but there was this third—like a damn bear club those woods. Huh. Bear club, bear cub. There’s something pun-worthy there to work with, it’ll come to me,” he was certain. “Anyway, third one shows up, gets right up on Sera—Rogue Elf, tall, bad bowl cut,” Krem nodded, he knew her, Bull said, “Ellie didn’t want to cast on the bear because it just about had Sera pinned down and she’s batcrap afraid of magic. Boss-girl just runs at the damn thing screaming like mad, bashed it in the face with her staff. WHACK, busted its snout.”

“Shit,” Krem breathed. That was just…badass. He’d been a bit more focused on the discover that she was a Mage when he saw her fight on the Coast than on her actual fighting, but Maker, watching her here, she had excellent form. As in fighting form. The form, with which she was using to fight? Bull and his damn puns had him seeing double meanings in stupid places! Blah! Yeah, he thought she was pretty to say the least, but he meant there was definitely some muscle going on and she knew how to use it, both obvious effects of all the training.

They stopped practice fights about half an hour before their time was up, catching their breath, the trio sat down on the ground and started talking. It seemed like the Commander and Seeker were going over their lesson, Ellie nodding occasionally, or asking questions. And then it seemed like they were just chatting, Ellie sat relaxed and smiling, reclining a bit, supporting her weight on the palms of her hands. Their time wasn’t up yet but they seemed to be done for the day, Commander Cullen rose to his feet, offering his hands to the Seeker and Ellie, helping them both to their feet though…oh shit. Yeah. He saw it—Cullen let Ellie’s hand go once she was on her feet but the Seekers, yeah it wasn’t like awkward or anything, but he definitely held on to her hand a little longer, gave it a squeeze before releasing it. Huh. He wasn’t exactly spouting love poetry at the Nevarran woman but uh, yeah he was into her.

Ellie waved goodbye to her teachers then, her cheeks were still rosy from her workout and she was smiling as she jogged up to meet him.

“Good work out there,” he complimented, offering up her canteen.

“Thanks!” she replied. She tilted her head back, gulping at the water. Sweat shone down the curve of her throat and that was sort of just…whelp he was going to kill Chief. The bastard was snickering.

“What?” Ellie asked after wiping at her mouth with the back of her hand, looking to Bull.

“Nothing much, boss, just thinking,” he brushed her off. Ass. At least he hadn’t called Krem out. He hadn’t been gawking at her or anything just. Oh the big oaf could bite him! He took the canteen back when she was done with it, slinging it over his shoulder.

“Do you want your cloak now, Ellie?” Krem offered, not to distract her, not really anyway. It was freezing and sweat could make you real cold, real fast in weather like this.

“Oh! Yes, please!” she said, and he draped it around her shoulders before Ellie secured the clasp at her throat. She dug around in one of the cloak pockets and pulled out her hat. She gasped a bit when something else fell out of the pocket—a slip of paper and twine, that fell to the ground, so he was quick to snatch it up before it could get wet or anything.

Oh. It was the tag—what he’d written her name on, so she’d know the hat was for her. Kind of dumb, considering Bull was the delivery service, not a messenger bird but still. She kept it? Maybe she’d just forgotten to throw it away?

She put the hat on and took the tag as he offered it back to her, “Thanks for saving it,” she said to him, tucking it away into her pocket again, “I forgot to put it away when we got back!”

Put it away? “You plan to keep it?” he found himself asking.

“Of course!” she said, blushing a bit as she bit her lip and then, “No one’s ever just given me a present like that before, so,” she shrugged, “I thought it’d be nice to keep the tag too.”

Oh. Wow, really? That was sort of…well it was a little sad, to think no one had ever given her a present just because, or for…Maker not even her birthday? Or Wintersend? But he was glad he’d uh, well he’d given her something she really did like and it was a first of sorts to boot. That was nice.

“I’m glad you like it,” he said, and Maker he was glad Bull hadn’t taken the opportunity to somehow make fun—of him, Bull wouldn’t make fun of Ellie.

She nodded. “So, um. What’s next?” she asked.

“You got lessons with me later, right?” Bull asked.

Ellie brightened at that, looking to Krem. “Really?”

“Yeah, over an hour from now though, Lady Montilyet said this next hour was up to you—uh,” he thought, and almost pulled the schedule from his pocket but he remembered. “You’re free to do as you like, but Mister Thom Rainier is available for horseback riding lessons if you’re up for it. Your choice.”

“Oh!” Ellie seemed to take the matter under consideration.

“Uh…you don’t have to, if you don’t want to boss,” Bull said, looking uncomfortable.
“Sera’s probably up if you’d rather go play or something? I’m down for moving our lessons up, or we can just shoot the breeze if you want. Hell, you could take a mid-morning nap. Those are banging.”

Oh. Thom…was that the guy from yesterday? Sort of nervous fellow, watching Ellie worriedly while she gave her tour for the nobles. He’d forgotten to ask Bull about him, but he obviously didn’t want Ellie to feel pressured to take lessons from the man.

Krem offered her his arm, to escort her wherever she chose, and for her to squeeze if she needed.

She smiled her thanks and took his arm, she hugged it tight but no pattern just, holding. “I would like to go ahead with lessons with Thom. If um…if that’s okay with you? I’ll still have time with you later, right?” she asked Bull.

Chief shrugged, keeping it light. “No problem boss, yeah I’ll see you in a bit. Have uh, fun.” And then, he looked the most like a little-shit Krem’d ever seen, mischievous and just like he was living to cause some sort of trouble. He said, “You can introduce Krem to your boyfriend.”

“He means Russell!” Ellie said, exasperated.

Okay. Not jealous. But Chief was obviously trying to make him be. Who was this Russell?
Was he someone to Ellie? She was blushing an awful lot, her face, even her ears and neck were a little red like Bull’s terming the man her ‘boyfriend’ embarrassed her.

“We’re to meet Rainier, at the forge then, if you’d like,” he offered.

Ellie nodded. “Come on, you’ll like Russell!”

Probably not, but he’d certainly try. Maker, it was stupid! It shouldn’t bother him, Ellie being with some boy, especially if he made her happy, and she was pretty excited to go see him, so.
Grow up!

They walked arm in arm to the forge. Harritt was hammering out a flat edge to a red-hot blade, and he was the only one in the work area. Oh. There were some boxes stacked by the cabin door, and a single box sat next to the stack—yeah, the guy from yesterday, he was sitting on top of a crate, whittling something. Not sure what, it had ears whatever it was—he thought they were ears anyway, pointed, sort of like a mabari maybe?

The man half-way looked up when they approached, and then he did a sort of double take and jerked as if surprised to see them. “Lady Herald!” he gasped out, wincing a bit when he accidentally sliced his thumb on his whittling knife, dropping the blade and project on the ground as he jumped to his feet—though dropping everything seemed like it was because he was surprised more than the cut on his hand.

“Thom!” Ellie let go of Krem’s arm and reached out, taking the man’s bleeding hand and examining it, she pulled a handkerchief out of her trouser pocket and pressed it tight against the slightly gushing injury. “You should be more careful!” she said, holding his thumb tight to help it stop bleeding. Putting pressure on it for a minute or two got it to stop and she took the non-bloody edge of the handkerchief in her teeth to help rip a sliver of the cloth away and wrapped it around the man’s thumb. “It’s not too tight, is it? I don’t want to cut off circulation or anything.” She said as she released his hand.

The man hadn’t spoken a word since he’d addressed Ellie, he still looked…huh was he going into shock or something? Krem supposed not, because the man cleared his throat and spoke coherently enough then. “It’s fine. I apologize I wasn’t expecting you.”

Ellie stepped back away from him then, bumping into Krem and staying there. “O-oh. I thought the schedule, um,” she clammed up, sort of seemed to struggle for her words and her hand was on his arm then, one two three. Was she afraid of Thom? She seemed more worried that she’d been scheduled by mistake—that the man had lost interest in teaching her and she’d been foisted on him regardless.

“Lady Montliyet said you would be available for lessons right now, for an hour at least, if Ellie was up for it,” Krem explained to the man, he’d sort it out alright if there was some confusion. Another squeeze, like a quiet ‘thank you’ before she released hold of his arm.

“Oh! Yes, of course!” Thom said, he looked to Ellie, “I just, I meant- I wasn’t expecting you to uh, to be up for it, given the circumstances. And uh…well you didn’t seem to be feeling very well yesterday,” he said, Maker the man was a nervous wreck. As nervous to speak to Ellie as it seemed she’d grown to speak to him. He seemed almost afraid to ask, “You are…you are feeling better I hope?”

Ellie nodded. “I am. And I’m up for lessons still, i-if you are.”

“Certainly! Let me just,” he gestured vaguely before bending down and picking up the knife and wood he’d dropped, and he retreated into the cabin for a moment. When he returned, he looked like he had himself more in hand, or at least not quite so anxious, though there was some relief in his expression when he saw they were still there waiting on him, like he’d thought they’d change their minds and leave in his absence.

“I don’t believe I got your name?” he said to Krem.

“Cremisius Aclassi, Bull’s Chargers. Though today I’m shadowing the Herald,” he explained, offering a hand to him.

“Ahh, its nice to meet you,” he said, shaking his hand. “I’m Thom Rainier. Shall we?”

Ellie nodded, seeming more relaxed now and they followed the man to the stables.

Bull made it sound like this is where that Russell would be. He looked around a bit—for tactical, protecting-the-Herald reasons—but he didn’t see anyone except the old Horse Master, he certainly wasn’t Russell.

Oh. Oh he certainly wasn’t.

“Russell!” Ellie cried out happily, skipping ahead to pet a rust-colored chestnut stallion on the snout, kissing the horse’s cheek. “Good morning fella! Are you happy to be back in Haven?” she giggled when the horse sort of nodded to her.

A…a horse.

Russell was a horse. Russell was a horse and Bull was an ass.
He was going to actually murder that Qunari. Murder him dead. Big. Stupid. Lout!

“Russell, this is Cremisius! He’s going to look out for me while Marehis is away! She’s in Orlais, we’ve been there, remember? Anyway,” she looked to Krem then, “This is Russell, he’s the actual best horse in the world.”

Yeah he was, cause he was a horse! “It’s an honor to meet you, Ser Russell,” Krem said, more than pleased with himself when Ellie giggled at him giving the creature a little bow.

Thom saw to Russell’s saddle for Ellie and then he sort of seemed like he might help her up into it but he stopped himself and backed away, looking to Krem. The man made himself busy saddling another horse, for himself Krem supposed.

“My lady,” Krem said, smiling to Ellie as he offered his hand, she giggled a bit at the formality and he helped her up into the saddle.

She patted the space behind her. “You can ride with me if you’d like.”

Oh yeah, it was either that or go get the steed the Horse Master had assigned him when he’d gotten the Charger’s steeds. But uh, it was probably safer that he stick close in case something happened.

He swung into place behind her, and he worried for about half a second about what exactly to do with his hands but when she laughed and said, “You should hold on, you goof, you’ll fall!” He offered a laugh himself and put his arms around her waist.

They were off then, Ellie heading out with Rainier following after them, riding past the soldiers practicing, and past a cabin that was sort of tucked away in the woods around Haven, and then around to the other side of the frozen lake. There was a clearing with little obstacles for her lessons he supposed. Rainier joined them and got off his horse, so Krem figured he should probably wait with the man, Ellie probably didn’t need to worry about a second passenger in the saddle while practicing.

“Try taking a lap around and practicing the lower jumps first,” Rainier called out.

Ellie nodded, signaling Russell and he raced around the clearing and Krem was just a bit nervous about her being airborne for a second over the shortest obstacle fence, she lifted out of the saddle when Russell was in the air, which that was exactly what she was supposed to do but still he sort of worried she was being launched off the horse. But no, Russell landed gracefully and Ellie was seated in her saddle safely.

“You’re the Iron Bull’s Lieutenant?” Thom asked conversationally, the pair of them keeping their gaze trained on Ellie as they spoke.

“Yes sir.”

“Good,” he said, “Thank you, for taking the time out to watch over the Herald.”

“Of course.”

That was the extent of Rainier’s attempts at conversation. He’d have to ask someone about the guy—Bull, if Ellie didn’t say anything. Something had gone down, the man was obviously… dunno, seemed like he was afraid if he made one wrong move he’d be tossed out on his ear and Ellie clearly was keeping him at some sort of distance, but wanted to close that distance just, wasn’t sure how to. Everything just sort of felt awkward with them.
“Maybe try calling her Ellie.” Krem suggested. He didn’t seem like a bad guy, Ellie obviously cared about him so, maybe it would help. “The other…well, she doesn’t seem to care for titles between friends.”

“We’re not quite on a first name basis right now I don’t think.”

“She calls you Thom.”

“That’s just about all I am,” he said, as if that was unfortunate.

“Well on her schedule you were put down as ‘Mister Thom Rainier’.” Huh, maybe he’d pissed off the Ambassador and that’s why he was on such thin ice? Bull joked about not messing around too often with Antivans on account of their ‘hot Antivan blood’, tempers were wild if they wanted more than a ugh, ‘ride’ with the Bull. Anyway, “I’m pretty sure if Ellie wanted to she’d just call you something like that, but she chooses to call you Thom.”

Ellie’d done a few good runs but then she shifted course, coming back to them, slumping in her saddle a bit. That set off a red flag for Krem who stepped up to meet her, and the second Russell came to a stop she was out of the saddle, on her feet, but only for the barest moment before falling to her knees. Shit. Krem knelt with her, was she hurt? He’d been watching closely nothing came shooting down at her, there wasn’t a sniper in the mountain range. But maybe a spell? He could hear Thom’s boots crunching the snow, coming closer to see what was happening but keeping back to stay out of the way. Her Marked hand on Krem’s arm while the other was holding her stomach, she worked to catch her breath and there was a tightness to her features. Oh, Maker.

He offered up one of her white potions, she nodded but took a moment, eyes closed taking a few deep breaths, like she wasn’t sure or not if she might sick up. Krem moved to be of better help, bit awkward walking on his knees, but he shifted to sit to her side where he could hold her potion until she was ready to take it, and place a hand on her back, rubbing circles the way his parents would whenever he’d been sick. After a minute, she seemed certain she wouldn’t be emptying her stomach in the snow, so she took the potion. Krem took a hold of the hand on his arm.

“Ellie? Is it…” he gave her hand three quick squeezes, light and gentle but she got it. She gave him a small smile and shook her head.

“No, um,” she cleared her throat, “A lot of the stuff I do with Cassandra and Cullen uses muscles around my stomach, and so does holding myself correctly in the saddle, and all the jostling and whatnot, I think I just over did it. Agitated it or something.” She winced, before righting herself, rising to her feet, he almost wanted to protest but settled for keeping a hand under her arm just in case, Maker.

“Do you need Adan?” Could she ride back or would she have to walk? Or be carried really because he definitely wasn’t having her walk all the way back around the lake when she was hurting. If he shouted he was pretty sure Bull’d hear him, send Stitches their way.

“Ellie?” Thom asked, concerned, coming closer to stand just behind Krem.

She looked up at the older man, surprised that he’d said her name and then she smiled, warmly. “I’m okay,” she said. “Do you think we could sit for a minute though?”

“Of course!” Thom said, and for a moment Krem thought the man might break his own neck he was whipping his head around so very quickly, looking for someplace suitable. There were some large stones that sort of lined the path they’d used, and he brushed the snow away, off of one that was a good height for Ellie to sit on. Krem kept an arm around her back, she didn’t seem to need the help but he sort of felt better, he guessed, being right there if she needed him.

Oh. He gave her arm a reassuring squeeze before letting go because it struck him then. He’d sort of...he thought the girl would need coddling or something, that every little sniffle or ache might be her undoing. When he first met her, he hadn’t really been able to reconcile the image of what the Herald of Andraste was rumored to be—slayer of demons, defender of the weak—and Ellie, someone who ran around sharing the cookies in her pockets, young and trusting and looking for all the world like someone who had no place fighting anything. He kept underestimating her—she wasn’t one or the other, she was Ellie, the Herald of Andraste, she’d bash a bear in the face with her staff and eat the cookies in her pocket to refuel for the next fight. She was tough. She didn’t need Krem to coddle her, she just needed him to have her back.

When she sat down he knelt at her side. Thom sat down on the ground before her. It would take more than just ‘a minute’ for her potion to settle and really help her, and the silence was a little tense. Thom looked like he so badly wanted to strike up conversation with Ellie, and her knee was sort of bouncing nervously like she was trying to come up with something as well. Though maybe the motion was meant to distract herself until her potion was really in her system. Either way, he thought of something that might distract her better and maybe get them talking.

“The trees around these parts are just normal trees, right?” he asked. Ellie stopped her nervous fidgeting and she and Rainier looked to him.

“What other kind of trees are there?” Ellie asked, curiously.

“Well,” Krem said, “there was once this noble of the Dales—they hate if you call them Dalish nobles,” he rolled his eyes, “he hired the Chargers* to take care of the trees on his land. Apparently, they were causing all sort of trouble, attacking anyone who went near them—they were magic, possessed by something called Sylvans, Elf spirits that controlled the trees and made them haunt the forest.”

“Oh gosh! Really?” wide-eyed she asked, “Were you scared?”

Shitless, but more hilarious was the fact that, “Oh Chief just about crapped his pants when we started in on chopping down the trees and they chopped back—you should have heard him! ‘Ahh, shit! Shit! Kill ‘em with fire! Fire, Dalish!’” he mimicked. Bull’d kill him, but Ellie looked absolutely delighted with the tale so, worth it. “Anyway, all in all the spirits weren’t that bad—worst part was the squirrels,” Krem shuddered a bit. “Squirrels. One of the little buggers just about ripped my face off,” he said pointing to a scar on his cheek where a little squirrel claw had slashed deep enough that Stitches literally stitched it up.

Her bottom lip stuck out a bit in an amused but sympathetic pout. “Awe! Well, it sounds like you were very heroic against the evil-tree squirrels, now you’ve got a sort of dashing battle scar to prove it.”

“Squirrels will forever fear the name Cremisius Aclassi I’m sure,” Krem jested, trying to ignore how ‘dashing’ just about went right to his head, made his face feel a little warm.

“Have you ever fought anything like haunted trees?” Ellie asked Thom then, a solid effort to get him talking with her.

“Oh, uh, well no but,” he seemed to think a moment, obviously wanting to offer something she’d enjoy, “Hordes of squirrels does call to mind: When I was young, just sort of starting out for myself, there was this Lord who hired me to track down his missing wife. They’d had a good relationship, he said, and he’d not received threats or ransom notes like she’d been taken, she just one day she up and left without a word. So I follow a few leads and end up in this part of Starkhaven—a sort of slums area really no one had any business being in but apparently she’d rented out an apartment there and paid a year’s rent up front in gold. I explain the situation, landlord lets me in no problem—doesn’t care he’s already been paid. Door shuts behind me and there’s no windows, so it’s black as pitch in this place, and I can hear movement all around, little scratchy claws skittering across the floorboards.”

“What was it?” Ellie asked.

“I stumble around, and I keep knocking my feet into these things, warm, moving, squeaking. And Maker, the smell, it stank to high heaven in that place. I finally bump into a dresser, feel around and find a lamp—Maker only knows how I got the damn thing to light but I do and when I finally get a look around…Nugs. I’m talking not one or two, it had to be at least a hundred of the things packed into the apartment, wall to wall lining the floor, climbing over the furniture—and completely covering the bed.” Holy shit.

“Oh my goodness!” Ellie gasped out in a way that came off like her version of ‘holy shit’, “What about the missing Lady?”

“The missing lady? She was laid out on the bed, completely covered in Nugs just crawling all over her. At first I’m confused and disheartened, thinking something horrible happened, she got caught up in some sort of underground Carta Nug-trading business and killed in the process. But I go over to the bed, just about break my neck trying not to step on the Nugs and I reach to check her pulse and chomp!”

Ellie’s eyes were wide, “A Nug bit you?”

“No, the Lady!” Rainier exclaimed, Ellie’s mouth fell open in shock as he said, “She just sat straight up, naked as the day she was born, bit me right on my hand! Then asked me what I thought I was doing like I was the crazy one!”

“No way! What in the world?!” Ellie was just about as amazed and confused as Krem was, the tale just wild. “What did you do?”

“I said her husband sent me and she said she didn’t know why he would. Apparently, the day she left, her husband said he worried she wasn’t finding fulfillment in her life, living as a housewife, and told her he wanted to fulfill her dreams whatever they were. So. uh.” He shrugged. “She took that as a by-your-leave to do just that.”

That…what?

Ellie looked just absolutely dumbfounded as he felt. Ellie asked, “Her…her dream was Nugs?”

“Her dream was Nugs,” Rainier said, Ellie sort of worked that thought around in her head and then shrugged.

“Maker,” Krem swore, “please tell me you at least got paid for your trouble?” It was always either the absolute worst jobs, or the absolute most worthy jobs you didn’t get paid for, and at least with the latter you can hope for some reward in your afterlife for your deeds.

“Oh not a coin,” Rainier assured, shaking his head, “I went back to her husband and tried to explain but he didn’t believe a word of it—I got him to follow me back to the apartment in Starkhaven, but when we got there, the place was empty—top to bottom, no furniture, no Nugs, and certainly no crazed Nug Lady. I swear to the Maker, I would think I’d hallucinated the whole thing if it weren’t for the bite mark on my hand,” he showed them, just the faintest impression of, yeah it did look like a scar from teeth marks, faded and distorted from aging but still there. Damn, crazy Nug lady nearly bit a chunk of his hand off!

“That’s awful!” Ellie said, “After all that trouble you didn’t even get paid?”

“Hmm. No, looking back it was a worthwhile experience,” Thom said. Krem supposed it must be, seeing as the story sort of broke down a bit of the distance between him and Ellie, the man seemed like he’d take on a thousand such fruitless endeavors if they resulted in tales that made the girl laugh with him, talk to him with ease.

Their time was just about up, as it was they’d be late meeting up with Bull. Ellie said she was fine to ride, and Krem was certain she was being forthright, her coloring was normal, no hint of discomfort in her expression or the way she carried herself.

Thom mounted his horse and when Ellie led Krem back over to Russell popped up on her toes to kiss Krem on the cheek with a whispered, “Thanks.” For helping to break the ice he supposed, wasn’t really sure, his brain sort of crapped out on him for a second and he felt himself nodding in acknowledgment to her thanks but uh, Maker that was twice now—was it a Mage thing, her lips spelled to leave him feeling warm from head to toe?

Seriously? Focus! Get it together Aclassi! Bodyguard! Friend! Helping the Herald! Go!

Krem helped her up into the saddle, and climbed up after her, he spoke quietly against her ear, offering to take the reins, she could just relax against him keep away the risk of re-agitating anything. She went a bit pink, he thought maybe she was a little embarrassed at the offer of help, but she nodded and handed over the reins, relaxing against his chest, his arms bracing her on either side would keep her from falling out of the saddle. Maker, Russell was a smart horse, didn’t fuss about a stranger directing him and he walked the path back to Haven, as if he knew trotting would knock Ellie about too much. No instruction just did it. Krem’d have to check with Dennett, see if it’d be alright to reward the beast with a treat like sugar or a salt lick or something.

Rainier went on ahead to the stables but Russell came to a stop so Ellie could talk to Bull when they returned. They were just a few minutes behind schedule, but Bull’d heard them coming back.

Seeker Pentaghast had no such ability and she descended upon them the moment they returned, apparently, she’d been watching for them while she worked with the Inquisition soldiers.

“Eleanor, Lieutenant. Was there trouble?” she asked.

“We’re okay!” Ellie said, then, “Sorry I’m late, The Iron Bull!”

“No problem, boss,” Chief said with a dismissive wave.

Krem got down, offering up a hand for Ellie since Horse Master Dennet was approaching to take over with Russell. Ellie grasped his hands and swung her leg over but her other foot slipped out of the stirrup. She gave a surprised yelp, but Krem was quick enough, released her hand to wrap his arms around her back to catch her against his chest plate.

“All good?” he asked. Maker, he was glad he’d caught her—it wasn’t a terribly long fall but still she could have been hurt!

She hadn’t been, though she looked sort of dazed for half a second and then, “Whoops!
Yeah, sorry, thanks for not letting me fall on my face!” she said, blushing.

Oh, he was still sort of holding her, he set her on her feet and released her. “All part of the job. Canteen boy, comedic relief, catch the Herald every once in a while, its paying the bills,” he teased.

Ellie smiled and rolled her eyes at him before she went to join Bull for…psychology huh? Maker he was glad to sit in on that, watching the oaf play professor.

Smart oaf, despite the flack Krem gave him, so, he might actually learn a thing or two.

Seeker was still watching though, like she was concerned at their lateness. And Ellie’d taken the Seeker’s question literally—they hadn’t been attacked or anything, and she was feeling better so there wasn’t any ‘trouble’ to speak of.

“Apologies for the delay, Lady Seeker,” Krem said quietly, he was probably going to get dinged a few points for not keeping right on schedule. “Ellie wanted to attend her lessons with Thom Rainier—she’s still interested in learning from him so, perhaps days she learns from you and Commander Cullen, and riding days should be made separate? She said both lessons use a lot of core strength, it hurt her stomach and she had to take potion for the pain—we were delayed waiting for it to set in. I checked if she needs to see Adan, but potion set her to rights.” Seeker didn’t look entirely put at ease by that so he thought it best to tack on, “Unless you believe it necessary, then I can take her by.”

The Seeker looked to where Chief and Ellie sat—there was a bench near the Chargers tents and they sat facing each other, Bull straddling the bench while Ellie had her legs crossed up under her. She looked a bit bashful as she said something to him but then the Qunari pulled an apple from his pocket and Krem heard the happy yelp Ellie gave as she withdrew an apple from her own cloak pocket and she high fived before Bull whipped out a cloth napkin and had her set her apple down and he started using a knife to peel and slice the apples, making a nice pile on the napkin, Chief talking all the while as Ellie munched on an apple slice, listening intently. Seeker Cassandra seemed satisfied, “She looks well. No healer unless that changes. I have a meeting with Lady Montilyet, I will see to it she adjusts Eleanor’s schedule accordingly,” she cleared her throat and asked, “She was not distressed by her time with Rainier?”

Bit of a rocky start but they’d gotten past it so, Krem shook his head. “No ma’am.”

Seeker Cassandra nodded, she looked to him then. “You are doing well thus far, in your care of Eleanor. It is appreciated.”

He almost felt like he should say ‘thank you’, the woman didn’t seem the sort to just hand out praise, but that uh, yeah that probably wouldn’t make much sense. “It’s an honor to serve,” he said.

The Seeker left then, went on ahead through Haven’s gate, heading for the Chantry he supposed, for her meeting. Krem went to join Bull’s lesson, Ellie smiled and waved as he approached.

“No distracting the boss, Krem,” Bull said, “I’ll drop-kick your Vint ass back across the lake.”

He hadn’t planned on being a distraction. But of course, now he was, just a little. Ass.

“Course Chief, I’d never,” he vowed, snatching up an apple slice and popping it into his mouth before winking to Ellie and crossing his eyes, she slapped a hand over her mouth to quiet her giggling.

“Fuck off Krem, I’m teaching here!” and Bull’s eye went a little wide and he said, “shit sorry boss,” even before Krem swatted him on the back of his stupid Qunari head—Maker, his mouth!

But Ellie just laughed outright the exchange. “Here Cremisius, you can sit with me,” she said patting the empty space behind her on the bench.

Probably the safest place in case Chief sought to seek vengeance for Krem’s bit of fun, he sat facing the practice grounds and kept an eye out, listening as Bull lectured. Ellie’s hand would occasionally appear low, in his peripheral, passing back an apple slice to him.

He just about snorted when he saw Bull pull his spectacles out of his pocket—tiny, tiny stemless reading glasses he squeezed onto the bridge of his nose—so he could read from a large book he had resting in the palm of his hand, Krem wasn’t certain but he was pretty sure the cover had Qunalt on it. Oh, oh wow. He did recognize the book—it was Ben-Hessrath, Bull read from it sometimes, but he certainly never shared the contents, not like he did sometimes with reports he got. But here he sat translating a few paragraphs into a lecture in Trade for Ellie.

He was teaching her different breathing and grounding techniques…a few of those things Krem knew actually. Huh, big lug had shared some of his Ben Hessrath stuff with them. Things Bull had imparted on the Chargers for uh, situations. If they found themselves captured by enemy forces, to survive imprisonment and torture. Oh. Maker. Bull didn’t tell Ellie that’s the ultimate reason Ben Hessrath teach their spys such methods but…it made him sick to think there were people out there seeking that very thing befall the ‘Herald of Andraste’, that someday Ellie might find herself in such a situation where she was captive, tortu—nope. Not thinking about it. Made Krem’s stomach turn, so much so that when Ellie passed back another slice of apple he just held the thing in his hand. He hoped with everything, that Ellie would never have to use her lessons with Bull for something like that.

“I think that’s our time for today,” Bull said right around noon by Krem’s watch, snapping the book closed and taking his glasses off. “You should try grounding yourself throughout the day, it’s not just for handling panic attacks. Habitual grounding can help you keep your focus and help keep anxiety in check. Try it out when you wake up in the mornings—nothing big, just think of a few things that are true in the moment. Your name, location, whether or not you’re safe, are good starts. Just quick observations that bring you into the present moment before focusing on the day ahead.”

Ellie nodded. “I can do that! Thanks for taking the time to teach me, The Iron Bull!”

Bull rested a hand atop her head, Maker! Oh, but he was being careful, gentle. Krem’d had to build up a tolerance for Bull’s manhandling—used to wind him every time the Qunari patted him on the back, or the shoulder. Seemed to know better with Ellie though, the action was meant to comfort, not concuss.

“You are welcome, Imekari,” he said a sort of rumble in his voice around the Qunlat word.

Krem almost choked on his breath in surprise. Bull never broke out the Qunlat except for swearing or something sacred or important. And he called Ellie Boss, kid sometimes, but he straight up calls her Imekari? Not just in passing description but like to her face? Krem had worried about Bull being under orders to get close to Ellie—she’d be heartbroken if the second his mission was done she realized he didn’t really have any care for her, she’d just really been a part of his job and nothing else, she obviously cared about him. He wasn’t so worried after what he’d seen today though. Dude was totally wrapped!

Bull was rising then, tucking the empty handkerchief they’d used for their apples into his pocket. “You two heading for lunch now?”

Ellie leaned backward a bit, resting her head on Krem’s shoulder. “Are we?” she asked.

“That’s next on the list. You don’t have lessons again until this afternoon, 2pm with Solas,” he popped the last slice of apple she’d handed him into his mouth and stood when she leaned forward again, turning about in her seat, accepting Krem’s hand when he offered it.

“Cool! Would you like to join us for lunch, The Iron Bull?”

“Just gotta put this stuff up and yeah, I’ll tag along boss.”

“Great! Um…” she seemed a bit nervous to say, “I was thinking about inviting Thom too. Would that be okay, do you think?” Oh shit. Did dude have beef with Bull?

“It’s your business boss, as long as he doesn’t get between me and my food, we won’t have a problem. Maybe tell him not to block the view.”

Oh. Oh crap! Yeah things had been tense at first between Rainier and Ellie but he hadn’t realized she was the one he’d wronged! She hadn’t seemed angry with him just awkward—Krem’d read it as being uncomfortable because the man was at odds with a mutual friend in their camp, Ellie feeling caught in the middle.

Oh. Because that’s exactly what it was. She’d forgiven Rainier for the most part it seemed. And the man had done something that pissed everyone in her camp off. So. She was caught in the middle.

But she didn’t seem too focused on that, at least not just now,

“Oi!” Ellie reprimanded the Qunari, “Flissa’s a woman! Not ‘the view’! And you better respect her cause she’s a person and she feeds me, and I’d rather that not stop anytime soon! No casual romps with people who give me food! No Flissa! Or Cassandra! Or Solas or Varric or Marehis—You haven’t met her yet but she’s like, the prettiest, and sweet, and I will personally destroy the man who breaks her heart!” Solas better watch out then, Maker, Bull said Antivan women had tempers. “Thom doesn’t seem your type but…” she gave it some thought, “Oh, and definitely no Seggrit!”

“Seggrit?” Bull asked.

“Human man, blonde, runs the shop just inside Haven. He makes me cookies and then says he doesn’t—but he does! And I like them!” Ellie informed him, and then, “Unless of course you can seduce him into giving me even more cookies, then by all means do your thing.”

She’d said it so seriously it took a second for it to sink in that she was joking. Bull of course, ate it up, going right along. He looked to Krem. “Is Boss-girl pimping me out for cookies?”

Krem nodded, “I think she is, and I think I’ve had them before so I’m okay with it,” he admitted, remembering the shortbread she’d sent him along with from Haven, it’d been damn good, “so long as she’s still willing to share.”

“Oh certainly,” Ellie assured breezily.
Krem shrugged. “Well then there you go.”

Bull chuckled and then, “You realize you left Sera as free game?”

Ellie shrugged. “If you think your Sera’s type, you’re more than free to risk the arrows in your coinpurse for hitting on her.” Maker!

Bull was belly laughing at the statement, and then he asked, “Dalish wants us to eat together on Tuesday nights, right?”

Huh? Oh yeah. Chargers all sort of had their own things they did while in Haven, different schedules and whatnot. After day one of that, Dalish had insisted they set aside a night a week for ‘family dinner’ to keep everyone ‘connected’. “Yeah Chief.”

“Clear your schedule tomorrow night, Boss, you’re officially invited to meet the crew. Dinner at our place, ‘round sundown.”

Oh. Oh that…would she even want to have dinner with the Chargers? Should she, was the real question, things could get pretty out of hand, wild when they were all eating and settled someplace they could cut loose and have a few drinks. But he supposed everyone would be on their best behavior. Or at least, he supposed he’d just have to make certain everyone would be on their best behavior.

If any of those assholes made a single ‘little girlfriend’ joke in front of Ellie, Stitches would have his work cut out for him.

Ellie was ecstatic at the prospect, bouncing on her toes a bit with excitement. “Oh, gosh! Really? That sounds like fun!” she enthused, “Thanks, The Iron Bull!”

“Don’t sweat it, Boss,” Bull said, “See you in a few.”

Rainier wasn’t outside the cabin off the forge, but he answered the door to Ellie’s knock. You’d have thought Ellie’d offered him a life’s worth of gold from the way he just lit up when she invited him to have lunch with her. He followed close behind as she and Krem made their way back through Haven’s gate.

“Oh! Solas’s lessons next yeah? I should grab my staff real quick.”

Krem led them back to Ellie’s cabin, beating her to the door and taking a quick look-around to make sure everything was as it should be, before moving out of her way so she could grab her staff—she walked right past it though, so Krem followed a bit in case she needed help or something. She went to her desk and reached up to the shelves hanging over it, retrieving a wooden box. It looked like it was meant for jewelry but when she opened it it was just the paper flower he’d made her, resting on a bed of the cloth he’d sent her hat wrapped in, and she dug the tag out of her pocket to add it to the collection. That was nice. Sweet, made Krem feel almost—Bull’d make fun of the word but—giddy, that the things meant so much to her.

She grabbed her staff, carrying it herself, the holster’s strap slung across from shoulder to hip so her staff hung on her back—he wasn’t sure if it would be rude or not to see if he could carry it for her, Mages were very particular about their staffs in Tevinter, and he’d never seen anyone but Dalish handle her…uh…bow. Besides, she should have it on her if she needed to cast to defend herself.

Thom waited outside her cabin and followed them up to the tavern. When they entered it was right in the middle of the lunch rush, Inquisition soldiers, servant staff grabbing a bite to eat.
The Dwarf, Varric was there, seated at the bar beside a blonde-headed Elf girl. Sera, Krem assumed.

The moment Varric turned to see who’d entered and laid eyes on Thom, then Ellie and back again, the glare-you-dead look he leveled the man had Ellie stopping in her tracks, a hand on Krem’s arm.

“What the hell are you doing here?!” Varric snapped at Thom.

But it was Ellie who answered him, “I invited him to have lunch with me,” she said, trying to offer up lightly, “you’re free to join us too, if you like?”

“Yeah, you and me, anyone else you want Tumbles, but that bastard can come back later! Or never for all I fucking care.”

Well he could just back it the hell up.

“Check your tone with the Herald, Master Tethras,” Krem returned coolly, staring the Dwarf down.

“Yeah! Don’t say big swears at Inky!” the Elf, Sera whirled about in her seat next to Varric at the bar and looked around before her gaze settled on Krem. “Oooh! Is that Cris-is-a-mif?”

He was pretty sure she meant him, but there wasn’t even an ‘f’ sound in his name? Girl didn’t seem quite right though, bit of a wild card Bull’d said so, eh. Not the issue at hand.

Thom obviously had no intention of creating more trouble for the Herald. “I appreciate that you invited me, Ellie,” he said, “but you go on with Varric, I’ll leave.”

Ellie shook her head, “I invited you out,” she insisted, “we can just take trays—”

That hardly placated the Dwarf. “Shit, Ellie, come on!” he shouted.

And she returned him the favor, not quite so scathing but firmly, “What’s going on with you, Varric? You were peaceable enough yesterday, and all the days before that! If you’re so tetchy about everything now, I’m sorry, really. But I invited Thom, so I’m eating with him. If you’re going to be rude, we’ll leave, though he’s got just as much right to use the Tavern as anyone else!”

“Course he does, seeing as he’s a free man now,” Varric sneered, turning attention back to Rainier, “You rotten bastard. What’d you tell her, huh? What’d you say to talk the sweet little Herald into doing more of your dirty work, letting your me—”

“Varric!” oh that was a shout. Ellie snapped at the Dwarf, “That’s private business, you’ve got absolutely no right sharing, especially here. Stop it! I don’t know what you think you know, or how you know it, but you need to quit talking about it, right now. Please.”

“Goddamn it Ellie, would you stop and think for a minute?! Why the hell are you still defending him? He’s done nothing but lie and wreak havoc and- and- shit, Ellie you don’t even understand just how dangerous your decision was yesterday, do you?”

“I do understand, Varrie.”

“Sure you do, that’s why you’re still making the same mistake, again! Wake up kid! You can’t trust that bastard any farther than you can throw him. Guy puts you through hell—”

Krem was on the verge of stepping in himself and shutting it down but Ellie hadn’t signaled for him and he knew his place. If Chief had a problem with one of the Charger’s it wasn’t an outsider’s business to step in and help the big lug, undermine him in front of his subordinates. Same principal applied to Ellie and her team but…well Krem had leave to defend her.

Rainier tried to intervene though, get the Dwarf to stop yelling at Ellie, focus on him.

“Varric, I know—”

Oh. He got him to focus on something alright.

“No, you don’t know shit, you selfish manipulative bastard!” Varric railed at him, red faced, raging mad. There was a vein in his forehead that looked ready to pop and you could see the strain in his neck as he shouted, “You didn’t stick around to see Ellie sob her heart out on the Coast! You didn’t hear how she cried herself to sleep every night—every goddamn night those four fucking days! Oh and that’s not all! Glad at least I’m not the very last one to get a fucking clue—she’s been having back to back panic attacks, brought her right up to the edge of another asthma flair you jackass, because she needs not being able to breathe in her life, that’s super helpful! And now she’s got an ulcer! You know who gets ulcers? Not fifteen-year-old kids!”

He just…did he really just air all of Ellie’s private, personal business in front of everyone? It would be bad enough if he’d shouted it in the privacy of a party-member meeting, but this was the bloody tavern! There was an Inquisition soldier the man probably didn’t know from Andraste sitting at the bar next to him! More soldiers and staff seated around the tavern and everyone was deadly quiet and staring.

He was pretty sure he was about to kill a dwarf. But he wasn’t Krem’s primary concern at the moment, “V-Varric that’s enough,” Ellie’s voice was faint and faltering, and she’d gone pale, Maker she was losing all pigment at a rate that had Krem’s outrage whiplashing over into gut wrenching panic.

Varric clearly didn’t think he was through, “You should be staying the hell away from him, you’re smarter than this!”

Ellie flinched as if the man had slapped her.

“She said that’s enough!” Krem raised his voice in her defense. “Shut your mouth right now dwarf, or I’ll shut it for you.”

Varric scoffed. “Look, I’ve got no problem with you kid,” he said to Krem, “but that asshole—” Maker, he might actually have to fight this guy, that’d be a good mark to have on his first day on the job. Fisticuffs with one of the Herald’s party members. Way to keep it professional.

“I definitely have a problem with you. Now shut up!” Bull’d taught him how to roar his words, and that had Varric’s mouth snapping closed. Much, much more gently Krem spoke to Ellie. “Adan’s?” he asked quietly, hands on her arms just below her shoulders to steady her. Maker, she was shaking. Shit!

She swallowed thickly, eyes clenching shut for a second.

And then quietly, “Um, j-just potion I think.”

“Oh, piss! Cris-is is right, you’re upsetting Inky! Frick!” Sera was out of her seat and at Ellie’s side while Krem searched the potions bag on his hip. “Inky, does your stomach thing hurt really bad?” She growled at the Dwarf when Ellie nodded.

Varric looked absolutely horrified. Serves him right. Bastard.

“T-Tumbles?”

And then a shadow fell over Krem, someone standing over them, the silhouette of horns appearing on the Tavern floor.

“You’d best remember where you are, and who you’re talking to, Tethras.” Chief. His voice was low, and very calm. Made the hairs on the back of Krem’s neck stand on end, because it was the kind of calm he used when he was riding the edge of going ballistic on someone, just one wrong word away from all hell breaking loose. Raising his voice at Ellie, yelling at her like she was a child, questioning her, and flaunting her business out for everyone to hear? Chief took a lot of flack, let a lot of shit slide, but he did not abide outright disrespect, especially not in front of strangers or worse, subordinates. The random mix of Inquisition soldiers bearing witness fit both categories to the letter. “Apologize. And leave. Now.”

The Dwarf was quiet, stared wide-eyed at Bull for a moment like a nug caught in a trap, then Ellie, like for once in his life words failed him. But then, “I…I’m sorry, Ellie. Really.” Sincerely spoken but shit was some seriously weak sauce. Didn’t seem to matter though, Ellie didn’t say anything, almost seemed like she hadn’t heard him and Varric walked across the Tavern, leaving through the other door.

Krem knelt before Ellie, trying to get a better look at her face as he handed off her potion. “Ellie?” he asked carefully, once she’d downed the draught. Shit, her vision wasn’t focusing was… was she going into shock? Damn it he should have…he should have punched that Dwarf out the moment he so much as raised his voice in Ellie’s direction. That was the new security protocol, he’d update the Spymaster. Start shit, get hit.

Bull caught on just a moment before it happened. “Alright. Nothing to see here, eat or move along,” Bull’s order got the other Tavern’s occupants’ stares off of them, off Ellie, some of the tavern occupants abandoning untouched food at their tables for fear they’d be on the receiving end of Bull’s temper. Because Varric hadn’t just embarrassed her.

Sorry everyone, he was going to have to kill one Varric Tethras. At least that would put an end to his shitty romance serials.

Bastard made Ellie cry.

Her entire expression crumpled in on itself a millisecond before Ellie’s arms were around Krem’s neck and she sort of leaned into him as she hugged him, burying her face against his throat, and he felt warm tears against his skin as her arms squeezed, one two three.

The whole thing had to be embarrassing enough, Varric’s yelling at her in front of everyone, enough to make her cry, Maker, she was straining not to sob, trembling. This was definitely a ‘get her out of here’ situation.

“Have a tray sent to the Herald’s cabin,” Krem said quietly to Bull, as he rose, taking Ellie up with him, one arm wrapped around her back while the other scooped her knees up, braced against his hip, Bull and Thom moved out of the way letting them pass.

She was holding on to him pretty tightly, so he used the hand at her back, for just a quick second before he secured her again, to pull her hood up over her head, gave her a bit more privacy from the eyes of those they passed in Haven. He let go of his hold under her legs and used that hand to push open the door to her cabin, kicked it shut behind them.

They were quiet except for the sounds of her sadness, and he didn’t set her down, just had both arms wrapped around her back. Wouldn’t let her go until she let him know that he should, just let her cry.

“Wh-why…wh-what d-did…” her voice came out in gasping sobs, “Did I do so-something wrong?” she whimpered out.

“No, no Ellie shh. Maker, you did your best, that wasn’t…that was none of it your fault.”

She let go of him, and he set her on her feet, hands bracing her elbows in case she was unsteady. “I…I don’t kn-know what to d-do,” she pressed her unmarked hand to her eyes. Yeah, she was definitely done in, sick and tired and sad.

Krem rested his hands on her shoulders, going for soothing as he said, “Hey, we’ve got time okay, all the time you need,” he promised. She could take the rest of the day as far as he was cconcerned—Solas dude could fight him if he had a problem with it. “Bull’s sending a tray.”

She seemed apologetic about that. “I’m not very hungry anymore.”

“No worries. I’ll get things settled, you get comfortable, you should probably lay down for a bit.” She didn’t look at him but she did nod that that sounded okay. “I know you said you only needed potion, but I’d appreciate it if you’d let me get Adan,” he was getting Adan, he would just prefer she not be made further upset about him springing a check-up on her, “just to make sure. For my peace of mind, okay?” he brushed a curl back from her face when she looked up at him her gaze was just hallow. “Pretty sure Seeker Pentaghast will kick my ass if I let you get sick,” he tesed, wiping his thumbs against her tear-stained cheeks.

That got him just the barest twitch of a smile, and she nodded in agreement, “Thanks.”

Oh he could do better than that. “Crim-mis-mif Aclas-id,” he mangled his own name cheerfully as he saluted her, “always ready to serve.”

Actual smile, and she groaned a bit, as if embarrassed over her friend, “I’m sorry, I don’t think she means anything mean by it, and she’s not stupid it’s just like if a word gets long enough Sera gives up, throws some sounds out there and calls it a day. Please, just tell her to call you Krem.”

“Oh yeah, she can definitely just call me Krem,” he said, glad to see her looking not quite so grave. “Go ahead and change, lie down. I’ll be back.”

He’d been about to call on guards to watch Ellie’s door while he was gone but Bull was approaching the cabin armed with a tray from Flissa’s when Krem closed the door behind him so he asked the Qunari to wait out front while Ellie changed, keep watch until he returned.

He went to Solas’s cabin first, cutting through the tavern as a second thought, asked Flissa if she’d mind making a pot of tea for Ellie. She’d eaten a little earlier but if he couldn’t get her to eat lunch, it would be best to get something with some benefit on her stomach. He went on ahead to Solas’s while Flissa prepared the order.

Windows looked dark like there wasn’t any light on inside Solas’s cabin, and he had to knock a few times calling for the Elf, almost thought maybe he wasn’t in, before the man answered. He looked uh, not too hot himself. Bags under his eyes, features drawn and movements sluggish, seeming like he’d just woken up when Krem came to his door. He was blinking against the light as if it hurt his eyes, raising a hand to rub at his temple, and his voice came out in a rough croak,

“What is the time?”

“Noon hour sir,” Krem wasn’t sure if it was the time that startled him more or the fact that the man had apparently been speaking to himself—had been answering the door but it seemed he hadn’t really noticed Krem, he jumped out of his skin a moment and cleared his throat.

“Oh. Lieutenant Aclassi, yes? Still getting your bearings of Haven I see, if you’ve need of the healer, Adan’s cabin is next door.” Well, he certainly slept pretty deep. Didn’t seem to know Krem was replacing Marehis for a bit, and he’d obviously not known Ellie was supposed to meet him soon.

So Krem gave him the condensed version, “Actually, I’m here because I’m shadowing the Herald today and you’re scheduled for lessons with her this afternoon. She taking the afternoon off, resting.”

“I was sched- oh. Wait resting? Is she alri-” he stopped and shook himself. Closed his eyes a moment. Oh, weird mage power, he could check on Ellie from here, he guessed, Seeker Pentaghast had explained it as best she could, didn’t make much sense to Krem. Didn’t mind magic so much anymore but Mage things were pretty bizarre. Whatever he felt in his ‘connection’ startled him. “Oh, my. What has happened?”

Didn’t have super amounts of time to get into it. “Rough day. I’m heading to get Adan now,” he said, pointing a thumb in the direction of the Healer’s cabin to assure the man he did indeed know his way around Haven.

“Very good,” Solas said, “th-thank you, Lieutenant.”

“Yes sir. Have a good one.”

Solas nodded absently and closed the door. Once Ellie was looked over maybe he’d send Adan Solas’s way, he’d seemed unwell to say the least. Though the man was grown, lived next to the Healer, would surly seek him out if he saw fit. He’d tell Bull though, Chief’d be interested to know something was up with the Elf he was so suspicious about, and it’d give him an opportunity to show himself as a friend to the Apostate, checking in on him, help him out, earn his trust.

When he got to Adan’s, Stitches was there too. The place was…sort of a wreck. There were books and scrolls laid out all around, on tables, on the floor, there was the barest bit of space for a path from the door to the potions table where the two Healers were hovering over a cauldron boiling with thick syrupy green goo bubbling in a way that eerily reminded Krem of witch’s tales.
They’d been working together on potion for Ellie, something that should help heal her forming ulcer. Adan had been researching it for a while now, since he first had concerns such a thing might happen to the Herald, but it wasn’t something he’d ever made before and the process was very intricate—experimental so much so he’d needed a second set of eyes on his proposed formula to really understand if it was viable, and then a second set of hands as well, in helping follow the recipe he and Stitches worked to sort of cobble together from different sources.

Maker, the stuff looked ghastly and he was definitely making Bull try it first before they unleashed it on Ellie.

Adan was quick to follow him, trusted Stitches to mind their potion while he was gone. The Healer hurried after Krem. Flissa was watching for his return and was at the Tavern door with a tray with teapot and mugs, giving him her regards for the Herald.

Bull was still waiting out front, said he’d heard Ellie lay down, so Krem let them all in, pointing to Ellie’s desk for Bull to set aside the tray. Ellie was under her covers, hair unbound, she lay curled up with her back to them, but she turned when Krem placed his tray on the foot of the bed, and then came to sit beside her.

“You’re good for the day, no more schedule,” he spoke quietly, resting a hand on her arm, “Bull brought food if you’ve changed your mind?”

She shook her head. “You should eat,” she said.

“I will in a bit,” he promised. She didn’t look like she’d be much satisfied with the answer unless it came with him chowing down on a turkey leg while he said it, so he saw fit to say, “Come now, I can’t in good conscience ignore a direct order from Andraste’s Herald, can I?”

She huffed a little laugh at that, smiling a bit. “Why do you keep trying to make me laugh?”

“Because it also makes you smile,” he answered, probably a shade too honestly. Too late to call the words back now though. Probably wouldn’t if he could, even if it meant Bull’d heard them. Maker, he was screwed. “Adan’ll check you over, then you just rest. Let me know if you need anything.”

Chapter End Notes

End Notes

No real new Qunlat or Dalish broken out in this chapter however Meus bello mimo!=my handsome child, in a culmination of Latin (Meus) bello (Spanish/Italian) and mimo (Italian). We don't get a lot of the Tevinter language, and a massive portion of what is provided is untranslated and I couldn't cobble together a "look at this word in that context and use the translation to cross reference and figure it out" because there's not enough translated Tevinter to do that. So. I know Tevinter is sort of Roman Empire-based, and the words they provide look like a marriage between Latin and Italian with just like a few things that strike as specifically Spanish--though Spanish Italian are markedly similar languages, I personally think there's a touch of straight up Spanish influence in the Tevinter language so. I used all three to come up with the term of endearment from Krem's father to lil bby Krem.

*This is a War Table mission, “The University of Orlais”, Chancellor Jeurgen Haullis writes the Inquisition for help with Mother Hevara badmouthing the university. Here, I’ve chosen Leliana’s method of handling the situation for the Inquisition, it matches the in-game option of picking her card at the War Table.

*Empress Celene canon, LOVES the Orlesian university. The university has thrived in wealth and resources since Celene has taken the throne, attempting to open the University up to more and more students from all walks of life as long as they have educational merit—meaning non-Humans, and even non nobility, she personally sponsors an Elven commoner because she believed them to be a brilliant mathematician. This is obviously met with mixed feelings because Nobles be snooty, but that’s beside the point, Celene owns an “I <3 the University of Orlais” sweatshirt in every color.

*Core people=Bull talks about the Chargers in game like he has more troops, like a smallish army of support troops, and then his core people we meet when he has drinks with the Inquisitor—Rocky, Dalish, Skinner, Stitches, Krem, and Grim.

*Card games=Diamondback is a card game that is popular with Orzamar Nobility, that makes it sort of popular among Dwarves because they want to be fancy/act like nobility blah blah blah. Sera assumes Varric would like Diamondback better than Wicked Grace because WG is more so a Human game—too, Diamondback has a much more simplistic format, fewer rules, it really could be easily played by kids, and Sera enjoys it a bit more than WG because it has way more rules, and different combination of hands that can be played—its like Poker on steroids. Dead Man’s Tricks is a simple little card game that can be played quickly for just mindless fun, and then Chanson d’Argent is an Orlisian card game like Dead Man’s Tricks but more complex in a way Wicked Grace is, from my understanding.

*Aveline=Aveline! Companion from Dragon Age 2, for anyone who is all about DA:I but hasn’t played DA2 or just hasn’t played in 5ever. she meets Hawke while their families flee the Blight, Aveline looses her husband to Blight sickness. She later becomes Guard Captain of Kirkwall and marries a Guardsman named Donnic and they are precious.

*Mythal=Solas is aware Mythal started a system of latching on to mortal forms to keep her presence among her people to some extent. As we play DA:I and encounter Morrighan and Flemeth, Solas discovers where Mythal ended up which…doesn’t work out so great for her.

*Squirrel Story= the story Krem tells is from an in game conversation you can have with him, where Inquisitor asks about memorable missions the Charger’s have had. Rainier’s story is from the depths of my concussed brain.
In Haven Part 1

Chapter Summary

Growing pains, mending friendships, Charger Family Dinner, assassins, knitting, tag, lots of Krem

Chapter Notes

I'm so so sorry this is so late! Protect your noggin kiddos!

I had just gotten a concussion when I last posted, didn't think anything of it but it was just a liiiittle bit more serious than I thought it was. Memory isn't great, and I lost a good deal of my vocabulary. I thought I had this chapter all written, but clearer thinking me realized I only had two scenes and a crap ton of notes--which was helpful because otherwise I'd still be scrambling to replot this! With the help of a thesaurus I was able to grind this out with some level of quality (hopefully) and I'm relearning my lost words slowly but surely!

Coming at you in two chapters since they can only be so many characters long--here's 100+ pages of "I'm so sorry this took so long, thank you for your patience, I promise to finish this fic! <3" Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Krem sat at Ellie’s desk, watching while Adan asked question after question before checking her temperature and declaring her feverish, the Healer was glad to announce that her vitals were passable—but heart rate was erratic he said—as he listened to her breathe for a moment and checked her pulse.

And then he checked her stomach, having her push away her blankets and lay back while the Healer pressed a hand into her abdomen. One spot made her flinch a little but the second had her sitting bolt upright, breathless from pain and Krem was at her side in an instant, pulling her hair back away from her face, holding it when she started to retch, dry heaving for a moment. Adan dashed across the room to grab the empty wash basin, at first Krem wasn't sure why since she wasn't throwing anything up, but she'd shut her mouth biting her lip to keep it closed even as it sounded like she was choking on something, the moment Adan had the basin in front of her she let out a strangled heave and blood poured up from her stomach.

“I-I’m alright,” she panted out, Krem stared at her incredulously when the words left her mouth, about to protest until she said, “but if y-you’re worried you can get Commander Cullen.”

Commander Cullen? Last time Krem checked, which was never, Templars weren’t known for their heal—

Templars.

Oh. Oh. She meant she was ‘alright’ as in she wasn’t in danger of possession. He hadn’t even considered the fact she was a Mage when he saw blood Maker he’d just been scared shitless because—well blood was usually bad anywhere outside its designated places in the body! Stitches had made it perfectly clear it was a severe symptom and he was to get a Healer immediately if she started doing that, it was so ingrained in him for a moment his brain told him to run and get Adan…who was already here, so. He was just a little freaked.

“Seeker Pentaghast has made it known you’re more than capable to resisting demon influence,” Adan said, “Ellie, are you sensing something strong nearby?”

She shook her head, her voice raw, Maker it just sounded painful, as she insisted, “No b-but I know it can be scary, the threat of mage possession. I trust Cullen’s judgement, if you’d feel more comfortable having a Templar on hand.”

Krem leveled Adan a menacing look that said he was absolutely not to fetch the former Templar. And then he moved to sit facing Ellie, making sure she was looking him in the eye when he said, lightly, “Ellie? Hush.” He smiled to make sure she knew he didn’t mean it meanly. Just.
She was going to be fine, if Seeker Pentaghast was confident in her ability to stave off possession Krem trusted her. And he trusted Ellie, really.

She nodded. “Kay,” she agreed.

Adan instructed Ellie to stay in bed and said he’d be back around later with the completed stronger form of Elf Root tonic he and Stitches were so, so close to finishing. It was meant for intensive healing that would require sleep for her body to process. They’d have to wait until she was able to eat, and the Healer said he was going to talk to the Advisors, make it clear they were to clear her schedule for a bit, at least a day so she could just recuperate if her potion hit her hard.

Krem held Ellie’s hand until she dropped off to sleep. Then he set about cleaning up the washbasin, setting aside the tray of tea for later, though he did eat some of the lunch Bull’d brought by since Ellie was out like a light, he’d order dinner when she woke up. He kept her cabin warm and sat in the chair by her desk. Chief’d been decent enough to drop back by with something to keep Krem occupied while Ellie was out, though he complained he wasn’t a bar wench when Krem handed him the trays to return to Flissa’s.

“Wouldn’t know it, the way you constantly display those big pillowy man-bosoms of yours,” Krem, very quietly, sniped, and Bull just slumped, shoulders dropping in devastation because he couldn’t properly shout or laugh at or slap the crap out of his Lieutenant—had to be quiet so Ellie could rest, and it killed the Qunari, Krem could practically feel the life force draining from the lug, extending the Tevinter’s own life by…eh, about a decade it felt, solid ten years bonus for his trouble. Bull still flipped him off before taking up the trays of half-eaten lunch and abandoned tea.

Now, Krem sat knitting, waiting. Seeker Pentaghast came ‘round not very long after Healer Adan left, the Healer had appraised her on how poorly ‘Eleanor’ was feeling. She knelt by the bed, taking hold of Ellie’s Marked hand, smoothing her hair away from her face before resting her forehead against the girl’s.

“Though I am flesh, Your Light is ever present,” Krem closed his eyes and bowed his head respectfully as the Seeker prayed, quietly, her voice a bare whisper as she recited the Chant, “And those I have called, they remember, and they shall endure. I shall sing with them the Chant, and all will know, we are Yours, and none shall stand before us.” She pressed a kiss to the girl’s forehead, and then stood, seemed to calm herself before she turned to Krem. She looked like she wanted to say something, but she just nodded to him and then she was gone—so swiftly he worried for a moment she might let the door slam behind her, but she made certain it closed softly, didn’t wake Ellie.
Stitches ended up being the one to bring the finished potion along since he would be headed back to the Charger’s camp anyway, handed it off to Krem with promises that it’d been tested for toxicity, nothing in it would be harmful to the Herald and yes, Stitches had Chief lick the spoon when they were done making it so. Bull’d apparently declared it was safe, but that it tasted quote: “like the inside of a Qunari’s ass, but that isn’t necessarily a bad thing”. Maker, maybe instead of Qunari Mages, the Qun should have sewn Chief’s mouth shut! He was certainly glad Ellie’d been sleeping when Stitches relayed that…graphic piece of information.

When trays of dinner arrived from the tavern, delivered by Flissa herself, Ellie was just beginning to stir, giving the woman a small sleepy smile of thanks, saying she knew Flissa was busy. The barkeep let out a happy little gasp, curtsied and stumbled over her words as she wished the Herald well, that it’d been no trouble to bring her dinner, and she’d been just so very sorry she hadn’t smacked that Dwarf with a spoon or something—he was cut off! No more day drinking if he was going to be such a lout! Probably good for him though since uh, day drinking wasn’t the healthiest habit to have, in Krem’s experience. Not that he particularly cared about the man’s health, but he wasn’t feeling quite as murderous as he had been earlier at least.

He downed his food quickly, and Ellie did manage to eat as well—Flissa had made some sort of thick broth, like for a stew except there weren’t any large chunks to chew, it was meant to be sipped. Took a while, Ellie gingerly sipping, seeming half concerned each new gulp might have her stomach emptying out, keeping the cleaned-out wash basin close at hand but she finished her meal without issue. Krem sat on her bed, his back against the wall and when she finished eating she scooted to sit next to him. She laid her head on his shoulder, and he thought she might fall asleep, but she insisted she wanted to talk. He just talked nonsense with her at first—who would win in a fight, The Iron Bull, or a bear? Easily figured out, Bull wins hands down every time Ellie was certain, and who was he to disagree? Krem, feeling just a mite vindictive over the Ferelden man’s teasing him these past few weeks, proposed the idea that Stitches and Adan may have something going on, romantically, which perked Ellie right up—she gasped with her delight at the idea and immediately wanted to know ‘everything’ he’d seen to make him think such a thing. They hadn’t just been working together on potion for Ellie—aside from their meals together as a crew, Stitches had taken to eating with Adan, either in the Tavern or the man’s cabin, Krem’d teased him about it one morning when the man rose at an ungodly hour to have breakfast with the Inquisition’s Healer, and he’d been just a bit flustered, insisting ‘someone has to make sure the man eats’. He may have just been embarrassed getting caught caring so much about someone new, but he’d seemed pretty impressed with Healer Adan. Either they were developing the biggest bromance, endeavoring to outshine Krem and Chief, or they were dropping the ‘b’ and cooking up something serious besides potions. Ellie was ecstatic either way.

Their light, borderline gossiping, chatter seemed to help her relax enough to say what she wanted to talk about. She explained about Thom, once she secured Krem’s solemn vow not to breathe a word to anyone else—Bull knew, she said, so did everyone else in her party, but everyone was supposed to keep it quiet (though Varric had certainly been running his mouth about it, Krem thought, didn’t say as much though in case it upset her)...she technicallly probably shouldn’t tell him but, Marehis had been informed and he was sort of in her job now, and he was The Iron Bull’s Lieutenant. And she trusts him, she said which uh...well he certainly wasn’t complaining about that. So, she explained how they met Rainier, posing as a Warden in the Hinterlands, that he’d volunteered himself to the Inquisition’s cause, and Ellie explained that her magic had a way of expressing when people would be important, for the Inquisition’s goals of sealing the Breach. Her magic had done so with everyone in her party—Bull twice, she said and then she stopped, working the thought around in her mind a moment.

“Though, it might have meant you, huh,” she said as she pondered.
Seriously? “Me? You think your magic says I’ll be of help against the Breach?” the huge ass, gaping hole in the sky? Him?

Ellie shrugged. “You’ve been pretty helpful so far,” she said, playfully knocking into his side a bit. “And everyone in the Inquisition plays a role that helps save the world from the Breach—I mean Flissa’s never seen a Rift or fought a demon, but if she didn’t run the tavern the whole operation shuts down, Breach stays put, demons probably take over the world.”

Huh. Very true. Maker bless Flissa, last beacon of hope against the void.

She went on to explain about finding the real Warden Blackwall’s badge on the Storm Coast, that when Thom had been faced with outright lying to Ellie’s face and say the badge was his, he confessed his former misdeeds when he’d been a mercenary, Maker. Krem found himself compelled to assure her, Bull had never, would never make any such horrible…mistake was the only word he could think of to use but kids getting murdered over anything let alone political bullshit wasn’t an ‘accident’ or a ‘mistake’, it’s something Rainier’s men did. But there was no undoing what had already been done, killing Rainier for his crimes would only make him dead, and he served higher purpose alive, so she’d cleared his name with Orlesian officials—she told him about the ‘offer’ from the Empress. It was no wonder she was worried sick to the point anxiety was burning a hole in her stomach! And it sort of made Varric’s freak out just a bit more understandable. He wasn’t doling out fresh anger over Rainier’s lie, he was pissed Ellie’d been cornered into playing politics with the Empress directly.

He was still an asshole. And he was definitely still on Krem’s list.

It was also good to know, in general. Krem didn’t say as much to Ellie but…damn it, Gaspard was a right bastard, all those Orlesian assholes were. He’d have to be on guard for retaliation against the Herald for accepting Celene’s offer, incase Gaspard or one of his allies sent some form of threat, probably something mild but sometimes ‘mild’ came in the form of assassination attempts. Fucking Orlais.

Despite everything…well Ellie had loved Blackwall—he was always so helpful, and kind, and funny, and he always tried his best to help her no matter what! She loved everyone on her team really. She didn’t know Madam de Fer very well yet, but she certainly liked her a whole lot. She said she wanted everyone to be able to at least work together, and…she loved Varric very much, he was always saying the funniest things and teaching her cool stuff, and always watching her back. She didn’t want to have to choose between hating Rainier forever to keep Varric as her friend and forgiving Thom at the cost of Varric’s regard for her. She’d only gotten so very upset because she thought she was losing the Dwarven man’s friendship, that he would hate her, leave. Oh, Maker. Did she really think like that? That people would just cast her aside the moment she didn’t meet their every expectation?

Krem took a hold of her hand, and it was then he realized he hadn’t replaced his gauntlets—he’d taken them off to knit and he was sort of glad he’d forgotten to put them back on. Her hand was warm in his, soft for the most part save the callous on the heel of her hand from wielding her staff, and the underside of her right index finger had a bit of puckered skin, scarring from a burn. Reminded him of something as he said, “He’s not going to leave. And he definitely doesn’t hate you, Ellie.” he had to laugh at himself a bit—he’d sort of hated the Herald when he thought her War Room meeting would keep him stranded in the bitter cold for hours his first time in Haven. But then, he actually met her, so. “No one that knows you could hate you. He might hate the situation or Rainier, or both.” He sighed. “I know he was a real ass about everything but, well, he’s probably just scared of you getting hurt, taking up for Thom, getting involved in the Game.”
That got him a confused, doubt-ridden, “He...hurt my feelings, because he’s scared I’ll get my feelings hurt?”

More than just her feelings, Game put her life at stake, but yeah basically. “I know it sounds weird, and he went about it all wrong, but,” Krem tried to explain, “I remember this one time, I was...I must have been four? I’d been playing too close to the fireplace while my father was cooking, apparently I’d gotten amused by the fact that every time I got close to the fire he would come swoop me up, carry me back across the kitchen.”

That made Ellie smile. “Awe, that’s so cute!”

“Oh, it was adorable,” he assured her. “Till I ended up burning myself. My father was livid. Once he knew I was okay he yelled at me mean loud, like wall rattling volume—has a real boom to his voice, like Bull. We needed the fireplace for, you know, cooking, so it’s not like he could just never light a fire ever again to keep me safe, he certainly couldn’t yell at the flames to keep to themselves, so he had to make sure I knew to stay away from it, so I wouldn’t get hurt. Sort of what parents do.”

“Varric isn’t my dad. I think I’d have chest hair down to my knees if he were.”

Krem snorted. “My point is, you love him a lot? Well he probably loves you just as much, wants to protect you from things he has no control over. He saw you walk into the tavern buddy-buddy with fire. Once he’s more confident you won’t get burned, he’ll come around. Give him time.”

She whined a bit at that. “Time sucks. Moves either way too fast or way too slow.”

“Well, if you’re worried he’ll be in a reasonable mood too soon for you, I can always start a fight with him,” he teased. Sort of. Might punch the guy next time he laid eyes on him. Jury was still out on that.

That got him a frustrated little huff, but she grinned when she sat up and playfully pushed against his shoulder, “Cremisius! Don’t be a mister smarty-pants!”

“Allright, alright,” he relented.

She seemed to be feeling better about her fight, and she’d eaten well so Krem offered her potion. She looked shy for a moment, admitting she was starting to feel ‘swamp-persony’ after all the sweating and sicking up and everything from the day. He got wanting to clean up after all that and very carefully helped her to sit on the floor by the fire, saw to getting her set up with everything she’d need before stepping outside.

After a short moment he heard what sounded like her voice and he almost dashed back inside, thinking she needed something, or something was wrong, but his hand stilled on the door handle when he realized she was singing. Soft and a little off-key, he vaguely recognized it as a Chantry hymn. He couldn’t remember the words, it’d been forever since he last heard the tune, but it was something simple everyone learned when they were kids about the Maker’s love for all his children. He believed in the Maker of course, but uh. It was a tenuous relationship to say the least. Had faith but also if he did ever actually meet the guy he’d have some serious fucking questions about a lot of things. But it was sort of...soothing to hear, after a hard day Ellie absently worshiping the Maker in such a sweet way, sounding so content while doing it.

When she was done the crazy girl had gotten up and let him back in, and he saw her safely to her bed, half tempted to carry her but that might be a bit much, as it was she did lean on him for support. She was practically falling asleep by the time she raised the potion to her lips. He asked if she could think of anything she needed,

That got him a tired little smile and, “Hmm, for you to get some sleep too. Thanks for everything today;” she mumbled, eyes closed, snuggling deeper into her blankets.

So, a sleepy evening turned into a sleep-filled day, for the Herald. Krem kept busy. Once Ellie was fast asleep, there was a report to get out to Spymaster Leliana of the day’s events, and then he was just knitting, tending the fire, admitting the occasional visitor. Solas came later in the evening, and he looked better, thanked Krem for having Bull check up on him. He’d gotten caught up in a tangent of his research, neglected to eat for nearly two days, he asked that Krem keep his momentary unwellness to himself, he was fine and there was no need to worry Ellie. Krem was quick to agree, and the Elf Apostate went and sat on the floor by the bed, Ellie’d rolled over on her side, Marked hand hanging down over the edge of the mattress and Solas sat facing her, taking her Marked hand in his, pressing the back of it to his forehead and he meditated or something for a while, before taking his leave.

Bull came by late in the evening er, more like three in the morning, tried talking Krem into catching some sleep in the Charger’s tents and…well he could have but, no, he wanted to be around when Ellie woke up. In case she needed him, or needed help, or was scared or something—he didn’t know! Just. He didn’t want to leave her. So, he didn’t, he did however let guards take post outside the cabin doors, and after he did a perimeter check ’round the cabin, and a once-around Haven, before he returned to the desk chair in Ellie’s room and napped a bit, ‘getting some sleep too’ as ordered.

He jerked awake when the cabin door opened, hand on hilt, but it was just Seeker Pentaghast. It was early morning, sun wasn’t even up, and she’d brought breakfast for Ellie—Krem too which was greatly appreciated. They didn’t wake Ellie at first since she hadn’t stirred of her own accord. Seeker wanted to chat for a bit, she’d read the report he’d sent to Leliana. He’d done well, she said, she was glad he’d taken the initiative to clear her schedule, that he’d gotten Adan. She said she had taken note, he’d bowed his head while she prayed for Eleanor when she last stopped by. He worried momentarily he’d made a mistake, that she was going to reprimand him for not remaining visibly on guard in the moment, but no, instead it prompted her to ask if he was Andrasten. He was, he said, and she seemed very pleased with that—she was a Seeker after all, he supposed one didn’t pursue such a calling if you weren’t a devout follower of the Maker.

She left him to eat his meal then, going and rousing Ellie to see if she felt much like eating. Potion had her absolutely zonked, Krem didn’t think she comprehended a word that came out of the Seeker’s mouth, she just looked so incredibly exhausted and confused. But the woman spoke to her kindly, a seemingly uncharacteristic warmth in her voice that had Ellie at ease through her disoriented daze and she did manage to drink the thick broth of a breakfast stew, and then the Seeker had her drink her morning potion, asked if Ellie needed anything. At first it looked like she’d been understood, that Ellie needed a hug since she sort of faceplanted into the Seeker’s chest plate, the Nevarran woman quick to hug her back, running a hand through Ellie’s hair a moment before she realized the girl hadn’t been so much hugging her as much as she’d just flat out fallen asleep again. She looked bemused at that and then she seemed a bit conflicted. Krem understood decorum, the woman looked torn between taking a moment to hold on for her own sense of security more than Ellie’s—and the need to save face in front of someone she wasn’t super familiar with, so he averted his gaze and quietly said he was going to do another perimeter check, drop their dishes off at Flissa’s. That, apparently, was enough to earn him a quiet ‘Thank you’ from the Seeker.

When he exited the cabin Varric was there. Not skulking just outside the door or anything but standing at the bottom of the stairs that led down from the path splitting between the Tavern and the Chantry, staring at Ellie’s cabin, and then Krem, when he emerged. He thought he might punch the man when next he saw him but uh…well the Dwarf was still wearing the clothing he’d had on the day before, and while he’d made himself scarce after that, it didn’t look like he’d gotten around to sleeping much, his eyes already looked bruised for lack of rest. He didn’t say anything, just met Krem’s eye for a moment, stared, and then left, back up the steps. Krem thought he’d been heading for the Tavern too but as he made his way up, he saw the Dwarf disappear into a tent at the top of the stairs.

Sera was in the Tavern though, sound asleep in her cot there—Krem wasn’t sure how the Elf girl slept so well there but she was snoring away all through the ruckus of the breakfast rush.

He walked passed Solas and Adan’s cabins, following the loop around the Chantry, nothing seemed out of sorts, he’d gotten familiar with the regular faces around Haven and no one seemed out of place as he jogged down the stairs and headed for Haven’s gate.

Commander Cullen was in high dudgeon it seemed. The former Templar looked the very definition of irate, barking out orders that sounded like punishment being cast upon the huh, it was a much smaller group of men on the practice field than usual, just six men lined up in two rows doing what looked like a never-ending number of pushups, sweat pouring off of them as the Commander bellowed. Skinner was at his side for some reason, the side of her face Krem could see was sporting a cut across her cheek, bruising on her jaw. Her knuckles looked bloodied and bruised, but she seemed the absolute most elated Krem had ever seen her. She was smiling, a very sadistic looking smile, but still. She was pleased.

He touched base with Chief real quick, and uh. Well, he got the rundown on just why exactly Cullen was currently teamed up with Skinner of all people.

Apparently Varric’s meltdown got around, the Advisors were handling damage control, had rounded up everyone present in the Tavern during Varric and Ellie’s fight, but word still managed to spread. Bout an hour or so ago Skinner and Bull overheard a group of soldiers—six, to be exact—laughing, calling Ellie mentally unstable and saying they weren’t super confident in the Maker sending them to be saved by some ‘crybaby bitch’ and she didn’t look just fifteen, and the things that had been said in their argument, without the proper context did sound like some strange lovers’ quarrel. Varric being so upset at seeing Ellie and Rainier together, insisting Ellie go with him instead, yelling about how Rainier had broken Ellie’s heart and left her devastated on the Coast. They bet she was screwing Rainier, they’d had a spat and she moved on to Tethras, starting drama in her own camp by juggling the men or something.

Skinner cut loose on them and Bull looked the other way for a couple minutes. Landed the assholes in the infirmary. Of course, feeling so very badly for his recruit’s behavior, Bull manhandled them the whole way to Adan’s, explained the altercation and left them to the Healer’s tender mercies. Adan didn’t seem to be in a particular mood for gentle bedside manner for some reason. Meanwhile Cullen was made aware of the situation—by Bull—but when Cullen confronted his men they tried to turn the situation around on Skinner, said she just attacked them for no reason.

Needless to say, Cullen had already been livid and ashamed, and that just about doubled it. He said that the entire thing gave him a massive migraine and he was basically making them do pushups until he felt better, or they were dead, whichever happened first. Skinner got to watch.

Krem couldn’t really hear too well after the recap of the soldier’s slander, his heartbeat sort of pounded in his ears and he was trying to think of just how much time he could leave Seeker Pentaghast with Ellie before he’d be missed. “That’s nice Chief, where’s my maul?” thing got lost sometimes, Rocky borrowed it for harvesting materials—breaking off chunks of raw metals and stones out of hillsides for his experiments. Or Chief’d use it for training, fighting whatever. Krem’s turn now though. Just real quick.

But Bull shook his head. “Let it go. Boss-girl’ll be upset if she wakes up and finds out you’ve been picking fights on her behalf.”

He was hardly picking a fight, those assholes started it! But Chief had a point. And just the prospect that he might be the one to upset Ellie…nope. Did not like that at all. So.

Thom inturrupted them. He’d been in the forge talking to Harritt but when he saw Krem he excused himself and hesitantly approached. Just sort of checked to see how Ellie was doing. He assured him she was recovering, he should be getting back to her anyway. Took just about every ounce of restraint he had in his body to keep from rounding on the men Cullen was still shouting at.

By the time he got back, Seeker Pentaghast was standing over the desk examining his latest knitting project, or at least she had been. The second the door was open she was backing away as if trying not to get caught, and nodding to him, asked if he needed anything before she left—she would be in a meeting all day, possibly longer, it would require her full attention and she did not know when she would next be available. In fact, he was to see to it that Ellie got breakfast tomorrow.

She didn’t outright say ‘I’m going into the bowels of the Chantry to mercilessly interrogate someone in a way only a Seeker can, and I’m not coming out until it’s done’ but uh, she definitely delivered the words with such a quiddity. If anything to ‘Eleanor’s’ detriment were to happen he was to get word to the Chantry guards as soon as he possibly could, they would get Cassandra.

“I will,” he promised. Interrogation wasn’t a big part of what the Chargers did, but Bull’d had to do it from time to time with his more official line of work. It was always intense, you had to be at your best to make sure everything…everything that needed done got done without having to take things too far. “I’ve got everything under control here. Focus on your meeting, I hope it goes smoothly.” The Seeker put a hand on his shoulder and thanked him, truly. Twice in one day, damn.

Sera stopped by during the afternoon, she’d heard ‘day off’ and wondered if ‘Inky’ wanted to play but Ellie was still out like a light from her potion. The Elf girl just sort of watched her for a time as if verifying her Human friend was still breathing—sleeping and not dead—she was sleeping pretty deep. Then Sera came over to Krem, sat at on the floor and, very quietly, asked him all sorts of questions. Was Inky supposed to be sleeping like that? How was she feeling? Was she better? When would she be better? Was she in a lot of pain? Could Sera do anything to help? How exactly does he pronounce his Vint-ass name? He told her she could just call him Krem and she liked that a whole lot better, said she didn’t know why Inky called him the other, and he said she could mind her own business. That got a weird sort of cackling sound out of her and then ‘fair enough’ she said. Then she rose to leave but she came in real close, right up in Krem’s face, looking hard and Krem asked, “Pfft, no, just lookin’ at your eyes. Inky got all wordy about them so I wanted to see what all the fuss was about,” Sera said, speaking directly into his face before pulling back, standing up straight.

“Can I help you?”

Wordy? “Wordy?”
“Ugh. You know!” He really didn’t. “Fancy word stuff. Poetry-like. She said they’re like sunlight or whatever, but I just think they’re just regular brown,” she said with a shrug. And then she whirled about on her heel and left the cabin.

Well. He was pretty sure his face was as red as his eyes were brown. Maker! That uh, well that was certainly something. Probably not something Ellie’d’ve wanted Sera just sharing with him but…huh.

He shook the thought from his mind, focused on his knitting for a while, but that just sort of made his eyes hurt after a while, they ached after not sleeping very much. Guards were still in their places, so he found himself dozing in the middle of the afternoon.

Only to wake when a hand made contact with his shoulder. Gentle, but reflex had him lurching forward to tackle an assailant to the ground, but sudden realization had him stopping before he actually got them down, instead he rolled mid-attack to fall onto his own back on the cabin floor, his assailant wide-eyed with surprise as she landed on top of him with a startled gasp, but otherwise unharmed.

“Cremisius?”

“Ellie! _Maker’s breath_ I’m so sorry!” the words shot from his mouth rapid fire, “I swear, I didn’t know it was you! Are you alright?” Shit! He hadn’t hit her or put her in a choke hold or anything, and he’d realized it was her fast enough to stop himself from grabbing her too roughly but still.

“I’m fine, you goof,” she said laughingly, pushing herself up a bit with her hands and he realized then he still had his arms around her, the hand on her back felt the muscle shift as she moved, and he realized his other hand was lower, had a handful of something soft—Maker! He quickly let go he’d- hand- bottom! Ellie rolled off of him, rising and offering him a hand up. She looked around the room a bit sort of getting her bearings and then she looked at him hard and asked, “Have you been here this whole time?”

“Of course.”

“Cremisius!”

Oh. She hadn’t been upset at his mistaking her for an assassin here to kill…well…her. But she laid into him pretty good then, because people need to sleep! And eat! And! Not sleep in chairs! That couldn’t be very good for him at all! Was he alright?! Did his back hurt? His chest? When had he last eaten? _Breakfast?!_ He must be starving! She appreciated that he’d wanted to help but Maker, he was by no means to neglect himself!

He’d hardly done that. Yeah yesterday was pretty intense but it was about a four on the scale of absolutely demanding, ’so much pain and exhaustion from our work I might lay down and die’ days he’d had in the military or with the Chargers.

Huh. The Chargers. Sun was down so…

“How are you feeling, Ellie?” he asked.

She looked up at him indignantly, stomping her foot with a huff, “Don’t you _dare_ try to change the subject, Cremisius Aclassi!”

“I’m not trying to change the subject,” he said, holding up his hands in surrender, “work with me here.”
She didn’t look like she very much believed him but, “Tired but not like I need to sleep anymore, and my stomach feels a lot better—” she grinned a bit and said, “all better, really, wow! It doesn’t hurt at all anymore!” Maker, that was a relief, enough so he almost gave into the sudden urge to hug her he was so very glad to hear that, but he thought he probably should leave the hugging initiation to Ellie, he wouldn’t want to overstep. “Though uh,” she sheepishly admitted, “I’m actually pretty hungry.”

Couldn’t have that, now could they? “Me too. I could send for dinner from Flissa’s,” he said, definitely wasn’t super ready to take her to the Tavern proper, he wasn’t sure just how well the advisor’s ‘damage control’ had gone over yet, “or if you’re still up for it, Chief did invite you to dinner with the Chargers,” he reminded her. No one’d dare bother her with Bull at her side and the practice fields should be clear this time of day. She’d need to see either Stitches or Adan now that she was awake—if she wanted to order in he’d swing by and pick up Adan on the way back, and if she was up for Charger family dinner, Stitches would check her out. Either way, healer, food, and avoiding assholes.

She gasped in surprise and excitement, “Oh gosh! I forgot all about that! That’d be great!”

Guys probably already had dinner underway, so he said, “We can head out whenever you’re ready.”

“Oh!” she commanded, pointing to the cabin door, and for half a second he thought she’d misheard him or taken offense at something, but she was smiling and then, “No peep-shows Mister Aclassi. I have to get changed.”

Oh. Yeah, that wouldn’t be super appropriate to stick around for would it? Wasn’t like with the Chargers where everyone had seen everyone else’s everything. He assured her he’d be right outside whenever she was ready. Guards hadn’t changed since morning, so he went ahead and dismissed them for the evening, he’d arrange security when he returned Ellie to her cabin later.

“All ready!”

Ellie wasn’t in her practice cloths, but it wasn’t as elaborate as the clothing he’d seen her wearing for noble guests and other ‘Herald’ business. Matching brown linen tunic and leggings, tucked into her boots, he was glad she remembered her cloak, and gloves. Chargers ate around a large fire but still, it was chilly. She was pulling her hat on as the cabin door closed behind her, her hair wild as it spilled unbound around her shoulders.

“You look beautiful,” the words just sort of left his mouth on their own, but girls liked knowing they looked nice, and Ellie had probably put thought and effort into picking out what to wear, her face was sort of glowing, moonlight casting a cool shine to her warm skin…uh. Like she’d just washed up was his point. So. It was only polite. And you should be polite to your friends.

Course, Bull was his best friend and if he ever called him beautiful, the Qunari would go full blown Ben-Hessrath re-educator training on him. ‘Damn right I’m beautiful, I’m a goddamn legend!’. Ass. But maybe he’d wait and see, save it for when Chief had a bad day or something, being given an excuse to be insufferable would cheer him right up.

Ellie went a bit pink. “Gosh. Thanks!” and then she seemed to have a thought, “Oh! Wait! Should I…I mean is it going to be rude just showing up empty handed?”

Kind of hard to go ‘empty handed’ anywhere with the Mark meant to close the Breach. Krem huffed a laugh. “You’re bringing yourself, that’s good enough as it is. Everyone’s pretty stoked to meet you. This is just supposed to be a fun, chill thing. No pressure, alright?"

Ellie nodded with a sheepish smile, “Yeah, sorry, I guess I’m being a worry wart huh?”

For a horrified moment Krem worried he might accidentally say something just stupid lame about her being the cutest wart he’d ever seen—damn! And he was worried about Bull’s big mouth! Well that stood to reason, at least he’d kept his comment to himself. Lame, lame line even if he’d cared to use one. He opted for shrugging it off and offering her his arm.

They walked the path out front of the Forge, empty now that night had fallen. The Chargers gathered in the clearing just a ways down the road from the forge—an area large enough they could gather around a bonfire and cook and eat and drink. They heard a hoot of laughter and something clattering like armor-plates knocking against each other. Oh. Once the Chargers were in view, everyone was around the fire, Grim and Rocky were sort of wrestling each other over…yup. Nothing. Not anything Krem could see anyway, they were just fighting for the fun of it, it’s not like Grim talked smack. Rocky probably just straight up tackled the guy and started fighting for fun.

“Krem, man! You made it!” Bull called out when he saw Krem and Ellie approaching, he rose from his place around the fire. There was a massive pot hanging from the spit, whatever it was smelled like Grim’s handiwork—dude could really cook. “Boss.” He came to meet them just short of joining the group. “Looking good, you feeling okay?”

She nodded. “Thanks. For everything, yesterday.”

“Hold up a sec,” he said, gesturing for them to follow him away from the Charger’s party. Not far, just over to the tree line for a bit more privacy. Bull knelt to be eye-level with Ellie then. “Just wanted to touch base about that. Yesterday, the offer.”

“You know about that too, huh?” Ellie asked Bull, quietly.

“Yeah,” Bull said, neutral.

“Do you,” her fists clenched, and her chin quivered a bit, but she schooled her features and looked up at Bull, wanting the honest truth, not something sympathetic. “Do you think I made the right choice?” she asked him plainly.

Bull seemed to have put a lot of thought into it. “I think you made a choice. Tough one. There was no right or wrong call there boss, just a call, and you stepped up and made it. That’s what I wanted to talk to you about. No matter what flack anyone gives you about the choices you make, you should keep that in mind that they weren’t in the War Room, and it wasn’t their decision to make. No one’s opinion on what should or shouldn’t’ve happened matters now, no one’s not even mine,” Bull intoned. Then, “Since you’re asking though, you did what you had to do, got the job done, so I’m damn proud of you, myself, Boss.”

Ellie nodded, and she quickly wiped at her eyes with the back of her hands, they’d been a little tear filled, and his praise had her blushing as she thanked him. Bull clapped her on the shoulder.

“Ready to meet the guys? Things get too crazy for you just say the word,” Chief said.

Ellie hugged Krem’s arm a bit more tightly. “I think I’ll be okay.”

Oh, Maker, that was just…nice, that she knew he had her back, trusted him to help if somehow things went sideways.
Chief led them back to the bonfire and announced. “Alright, everyone, listen up. Boss is joining us tonight. So. Best behavior,” he said, spreading a pretty serious look across their numbers. Grim and Rocky sat up from their fight in the snow and went to sit on one of the four large logs laying around the fire as seating. “Boss, these are the guys. Dalish, Stitches, Rocky, Grim, and Skinner,” he introduced, pointing to each member in turn. “Guys, this is the boss.”

“It’s really great to meet you all!” Ellie enthused. “You can just call me Ellie!”

Krem noticed right off the bat Skinner looked better, healed from her beating some sense into those assholes that badmouthed Ellie. She was weird about accepting healing—didn’t like going to Stitches for help, rebuffed efforts from the Human man to treat her when she wasn’t seriously injured but her hands were all better, the bruising on her face was gone and the cut now looked more like a scratch.

Rocky and Stitches wanted Ellie to sit with them—Stitches obviously to check up on Ellie and make sure he and Adan’s potion had done its job, keep a close eye on her as she ate. Rocky, he knew, just wanted to badger her with questions about the Mark. They said that Krem had been hogging her all to himself, he could go sit with Chief, let her hang out with everyone else for a while.

Ellie gave his arm a little squeeze—part of him wanted to pretend he’d mistook one for three and use that as an excuse to sit with her—reassuring him as she said, “That sounds good, thanks!” and then to Krem, “Go have fun with Bull!”

He didn’t want to have fun with Bull!

Especially since the moment Ellie and Krem were seated across from each other around the fire, Bull pounded his back with breath-thieving strength and asked, “How the hell you doin’ Krem-de-la-Krem?”

Ellie started giggling when Krem sent her a helpless look.

“Doin’ just fine, Chief,” he choked out.

“Really?” Bull asked, wagging his eyebrows a bit, “Been busy showing boss you’re A-classi guy I hope.”

Okay the eyebrow wagging was a good indication that he needed hit and then…A classy g —?

Bull grunted when Krem elbowed him in the ribs. Bastard didn’t get to pun up his whole name!

“He’s been holding that one in since the Storm Coast,” Ellie informed him.

“Well the anticipation didn’t kill him,” Krem groused, “so I guess I have to.”

“You, zip it—keep your bickering to Bull. I got business here,” Stitches reprimanded Krem! Bull started it! But he didn’t say as much since he wasn’t twelve and yeah, Stitches needed to do his thing, and the Ferelden man pulled Ellie into conversation then, talking so quietly Krem couldn’t hear, but he just seemed to be asking her questions about how well the potion worked. At one point he had her remove her left glove, so he could check her pulse. She undid the clasp of her cloak, so he could easily press a hand against different spots on her stomach to see if it hurt, the way Adan had earlier. Krem watched, some part of him panicked that it’d be just as painful as last time, but the only reaction Stitches’ actions got was a few giggles—apparently Herald of Andraste, Rift-sealer, bear-basher, demon-slayer, was ticklish.

Skinner had moved—Krem wasn’t sure when, hadn’t seen the woman do so just one minute it was Rocky, Ellie, Stitches. The next it was Rocky, Ellie with Skinner sitting at her feet facing the fire but almost like a guard dog before the girl, and Stitches who dropped the woman a wry stare for all of a second before he continued talking with Ellie. It might’ve seemed rude or invasive, but it wasn’t like the woman couldn’t hear them talking from where she’d been sitting before—she’d probably have to be in Haven proper get out of earshot, and Ellie hadn’t minded.

Rocky had been practically bouncing in place since Ellie’d removed her glove, eyeing her Mark, but he kept his cool (mostly) until Stitches was done and then immediately, Rocky’s opener was,

“So, does that thing make shit go boom or what?”

Shit! She doesn’t know Rocky, she might think he’s accusing her of using the Mark to blow up the Conclave! He almost spoke up to intervene, but Ellie said, “I don’t think so?” giving it some more thought before shaking her head. “Except Rifts maybe, those make a lot of little boom noises and they contract and expand when I manipulate them in battle but like an explosion that affects the Fade mostly I think. They’re usually very up high, I’ve never been close enough to one to feel any back-blast if there is some, but neither have I seen anything else around them respond like there was a physical explosion.”

“Those things are loud as shit when they close up, like thunder,” Bull said.

Ellie blinked sort of processing that a second and then, “Huh, do you need anything like earplugs, the Iron Bull? Rifts are super loud, the sort of loud that shakes your bones a bit, I didn’t think about it hurting your ears or anything.”

“Nah boss. Certain pitches can hurt Qunari ears, or at least be considered unpleasant—Krem’s bitching for instance—but volume doesn’t physically deteriorate our ear drums or hurt or anything.”

“Ellie, do me a favor—ah, thanks,” Krem said as Ellie giggled and covered her eyes a moment. Gave him the opportunity to offer Bull both middle fingers and, “Horns up, Chief. Horns all the way up.”

Chief slapped a hand over his heart and said, “Krem-iclassi Aclassi I have never loved you more than I do now, in this very moment.”

Figures he’d be more delighted than insulted, damn him.

“You ever tried setting something on fire with it or anything?” Rocky asked Ellie then. The girl pecked between her fingers for a second before dropping her hands into her lap.

“‘Tried’, no. But it doesn’t burn hot or anything, on an external level. Otherwise my gloves would be toast,” Ellie said in good humor. Then, “You can touch it if you want to see for yourself, it won’t hurt you, promise.”

Rocky looked close at her offered hand, examining the Mark, holding his hand over the glow to see if he could feel any warmth coming off it, and then he very quickly poked it, looking like he half expected to go up in flames but nothing quite so exciting happened. He did take a hold of the marked part of her hand for a moment then to see if maybe prolonged exposure would burn but,
“Huh. Not what I was expecting but still cool,” he said, letting go, “I mean. You know. It’ll close the Breach or whatever.”

‘Or whatever’, it was the ruddy Breach!

Dalish cleared her throat loudly, looking at Rocky who seemed to remember something then. “Oh, uh, does it uh, interfere with your magic at all?” he asked. For his own interests, of course.

Ellie’s gaze flickered between Dalish and then back to Rocky. “Not with casting spells or anything,” she said with a shrug. “The Mark uses my magic to power it, and my magic doesn’t exactly like interacting with the Mark but it doesn’t outright cancel out or impede my magic or anything.”

Krem wasn’t super sure what her magic ‘not liking’ something meant but Dalish looked sympathetic about it.

She asked about everyone then, where everyone was from, how they ended up with the Chargers. Stitches got a condoling hand on his arm when he said he picked up a sword during the Blight, never put it back down, ‘Darkspawn are wicked scary! All scrunchy faced and snappy teeth!’ she was so glad he came out of it alright, and she was super grateful to have the opportunity to meet him, she said.

She asked about Skinner. Bull explained in a few words, that gave Ellie everything she needed to know—she’d never been there, but like them, she recognized the marriage in Skinner’s voice, accent caught between Ferelden and Orlesian. All she needed was ‘Skinner didn’t take to kindly to nobles testing their new swords on the people in her Alienage’ and that filled in the blank of where the woman came from with ‘Edgehall*’.

“I hope you got those guys good!” she said to the Elf in earnest, with a little nod. She had a look on her face like she ad half a mind to hop on Russel, go to Edgehall and give the guard captain a piece of her mind. Probably not the most Inquisition mission-oriented idea but Krem’d back her up.

“Now I get paid to kill Shems,” Skinner said with a nonchalant shrug. Krem was a bit worried about how Ellie would take that, but she got that Skinner didn’t mean it as a reference to all Humankind, just assholes. She smiled and said she was glad Skinner had a job she liked now, that Bull had been able to get her out of trouble.

Skinner was something like a feral mabari when Bull met her. Understandable. Alienage wasn’t good anywhere, from what Krem’d seen, but Edgehall’s Alienage was called ‘the Edge of Hell’ for a reason. It was a city still to this day devastated by the Second Orlesian Invasion. Noble blood was mixed and their pride there was wrought with turmoil, the caustic combination of colonization and sabotaged-reclamation left nothing but a ruined city with Arls pounding their chests trying to fight over who gets the scraps. Their alienage…you have this hellish city, and then there’s a bridge leading from it. A goddamn siege funnel basically, so enemies passing through it are easy to pick off one by one. Except it’s not foreign enemies it’s meant to work against. It’s to hold control over the Elves. This bridge leads to their Alienage and the place is like a cage, shack-town surrounded by a great circular wall, only one way in or out, and the Humans have the high ground, the control over the bridge—you need something from the Human part of the city? You might not make it there, and you damn well may never come back. Anyone from nobility having a laugh to some commoner seeking to feel bigger about themselves, may take you out, toy with your life. And there was no escaping when nobles decided they wanted to test their new swords on the people there, it was a massacre, weak defenseless everyday people just trying to get by cut down Bull heard the tell-tale accent when she informed him she’d ‘killed some people’, and knew everything he needed to about the feral, bloody, bruised Elf they found the last time they were this side of the Waking Sea, and took her in in a heartbeat, no questions asked. Got her outfitted for the field, first of her cuts went to paying off her bounty…which got sufficiently decreased when they realized a Qunari would be delivering the payments in person. She was a survivor and to have managed an escape from the inescapable? She might be out-of-her-mind, but who wouldn’t be growing up in a cage, and she had an amazing aptitude for strategy. Shit that saved the Chargers more than once since she signed on.

The Elf woman didn’t speak a single word to any of them for months after her exchange with Bull that got her hired, she was skittish, and violent, ready to cut the throat of anyone who posed even the slightest bit of threat to her in her mind. Everywhere they went, she had what was hers—her area in their camp, she claimed it, marked it off by drawing a circle around her bedroll and pack, you accidentally cross the line you got a knife wherever she could most quickly lodge one. Krem had a scar along the back of his calf to prove it, he accidentally stepped over the line while heading to take a piss in the middle of the night…was definitely more careful after that. But as they traveled that stopped—or at least, they thought it had, until they realized Skinner no longer claimed just her bedroll and pack as her own. The Chargers were hers, even if she didn’t necessarily like all of them—you don’t have to like someone to love them. She certainly didn’t like Krem at all very much he thought, but when he back from Haven the first time, Skinner listened silently when Krem reported to Bull, and he’d seen it when she spoke of Ellie later. The Human girl had taken care of what was Skinner’s, add that to Chief giving her a nickname boom, Ellie had nothing to fear from the Elf woman—huh, come to think of it her freaking out on people talking shit about the girl…yup. Herald of Andraste was one of Skinner’s people. Otherwise Bull’d never have invited her out—Skinner cut loose on anyone that came ‘round that she felt were encroaching on her territory, Krem had to make that clear to the Ambassador when they were deciding where to set up camp in Haven, strangers setting foot in their camp might get knifed. That’d been a uh, fun conversation. Lady Montilyet took it in stride though, Maker bless her.

Dalish was next. Ellie thought she had just the most beautiful Vallaslin! Bull outed her for being sent away from her clan because they couldn’t have too many Mages around. Dalish denied being an Apostate, that her staff was in point of fact, a bow and Krem couldn’t help but rib her about the honking crystal on the tip of the weapon currently strapped to her back. But Ellie seemed to get Dalish not wanting it out there that she was an Apostate and the Human girl agreed, teasingly, that she’d totally heard about Elves using crystals to assist in aiming—“Keep up with the times, Cremisius!” she said with a wink.

A quiet—not quiet enough because Krem heard him!—rumble of laughter hummed in Bull’s chest.

He was going to walk away from this meal with a bruised elbow, from how many times he was going to have to bash Chief. Bastard, with his puns and laughing and Krem was just waiting until Ellie wasn’t around and then he was so so getting Bull back for Russel being a horse. Dude was getting snow down his pants he just had to wait for the exact perfect moment to strike because he was tired, and Bull was fast, knew what someone was planning to do even before they did sometimes, it was hard to catch him off guard. He’d do it though.

Dalish looked almost misty-eyed when Ellie started chatting her up about archery—the girl talked what Krem could only assume was magical theory with the Elf woman using archer’s terminology instead. Arrows instead of spells, ‘knocking’ instead of ‘magical intent’, ‘drawing’ meant charging he thought. It got pretty bizarre sounding at some points but the two of them seemed to be on the same page at least, and ended with Ellie looking excited, saying she was “totally going to try that out next time!”.

Grim waved and nodded to her when she asked about him. Chief explained that he didn’t talk much, and he had high hopes that the man was secretly the lost king or chieftain of some village. She smiled and waved back to the quiet man, saying it was very nice to meet him, asked him yes or no questions the guy could shake his head or nod to. Did he like his job? Good! How long had he worked for Bull? She mouthed numbers ‘one, two, three’ quietly to herself as she counted the fingers he held up and then asked if he meant years—nod.

When Rocky’s turn came he mumbled about blowing up a bit of the Shaperate, Ellie was equal parts impressed and concerned—he was definitely not to risk blowing up Haven, she insisted fiercely the man was quick to promise he wouldn’t. She also made him promise to just be careful in general, she wouldn’t want him blowing himself up either. If he had any big plans he should maybe collaborate with Harritt—he was super smart knew all about weapons, she said.

Grim got up and took the lid off the pot over the fire, satisfied it was ready. Steam came billowing out in all directions and the smell of beef and potatoes and butter permeated the air and Krem was pretty sure his stomach was eating itself, Maker he was hungry.

“Alright, Grim! Let’s dig in!” Bull announced, and then it was a mess of everyone scrambling to get bowls filled and utensils and Krem was about to get up and take the bowl of potatoes and roast beef he’d gotten to Ellie since she hadn’t gotten caught up in the mix of madness but Grim had ladled a heaping amount into a bowl and was handing it off to Ellie, along with a fork.

The blond man made a motion with his hand that Krem almost thought might be him blowing her a kiss but then he recognized it—Grim did that sometimes, seemed like a habit for when he handed people food, his fingers* extended but still lax, he’d press his middle finger to his lips and then wave the hand at them.

“Oh!” Ellie said, sounding surprised. “Thanks! I’ll be careful,” she promised, spearing a forkful of beef and blowing on it before putting it in her mouth.

Grim had been returning to the fire to get himself a bowl, but at her words his eyes went a bit wide and he whipped back around to look at her.

He moved his hands again, both of them this time, index fingers pointing to each other as he moved them in a circular motion and then he pointed them upward, palm’s facing Ellie as he extended his thumbs, making an L shape with both hands as he pressed his thumbs together and then pulled them apart.

Bull’d stopped eating to watch the exchange intently.

Ellie made a fist and a motion like knocking on a door. “A little bit. I don’t understand finger spelled words, but I understand most straight up signs,” Ellie said with a shrug. “I have a few friends that are deaf, and then there was a little girl in a village I passed through a lot, she was non-verbal and used Sign Language to speak. Do you mind if I ask which you are? I don’t mean to be nosey, but I’d hate to miscommunicate because you need to read my lips or something.”

Read her—

Wait. What?
Grim shook his head and flicked his thumb under his chin before tapping his index finger at the corner of his mouth and then by his ear.

“Cool! Though I’m sure the Iron Bull’s jokes make you wish you were deaf sometimes, huh?” Ellie teased.

Grim’s shoulders shook with laughter, and he grunted, holding his hand in a fist with just his index and pinky finger out, bringing his index finger just under his nose and then making a fluttering motion away from his face.

And she giggled! At Grim’s…Grim made jokes! “I know right?!” Ellie enthused, “Maker, his snores were louder than the storming when we were on the Coast!”

Shit! That was him talking this entire time?! Grim didn’t do much more with his hands when interacting with people other than wave and the occasional, well deserved, middle finger, but thinking back, yeah, he had a few motions that came off like actions of habit. There was the food handling thing, and sometimes like if Krem offered to help with meal prep or backed him up good in a fight the man grunted to him and did a motion that was sort of like blowing a kiss just from his chin, it’d struck Krem as a bit odd but now he thought it was Sign for ‘thank you’. Shit! He’d thought the man had been awkwardly hitting on him or something the first few times it happened!

“Whoa whoa let’s back up,” Bull interjected, Krem agreed honestly, “One. I don’t snore.” Okay that was a lie but whatever, “Two. Grim! You bastard! That’s some cool-ass shit we could use! Expanded method of silent communication across the field? Why the hell didn’t you say anything? Uhm.” There we go, get to the issue Chief! Badly, but he did it!

Grim gave him a dry look, just shrugged. It wasn’t like the man couldn’t hear them, and they’d never run into an issue because he couldn’t talk, guy had a good way of getting his point across without words.

The rest of dinner was full of everyone calling out words for Grim to sign back to them, spitting balling ideas for how to incorporate signs into fight instruction mixed with random words for just in general communicating with Grim purposes because shit, it wasn’t like they never talked to him, they always got along just fine, but if he could be understood in return and included more…he was one of them! Krem definitely wanted to be able to understand the man better—Bull did too though he insisted he had his priorities straight. Chief wanted in on all the swear words first, signs for tactical use, then he wanted the rundown on…other…signs. More uh, tactical stuff. Boring stuff, he said.

Big oaf was going to badger Grim for every single variation of anything even remotely sexual he could possibly think of, Krem knew it. Slag. At least he was waiting until Ellie wasn’t around. The things Bull’d think to ask about sexually would probably scar her for life. As it was though, she was more than amused by Bull enthusiastically shouting profanities at Grim—Maker, if anyone else saw them it would look like Bull was cheerfully slandering the Human man like a total psycho.

“Motherf—”

“Qunari’s don’t have mothers!” Ellie and Krem called out in unison to cut short that particular turn of phrase.

“So? Might not be applicable in Par Vollen, but I’m free-range right now,” Bull reasoned with a wink—how he pulled it off with just one eye Krem wasn’t sure, but Maker bless the giant lug, he did it, “even mothers need some fun every onc—”

Ellie slapped her hands over her ears, eyes scrunching closed, and then, “Lalalalalalala! Stop! You’re making me think Chantry Mother and that’s painting a much too vivid mental image of you and Mother Gisselle!”

Bull shrugged. “She hot?”

Ellie huffed in mock anger, straightening up she pointed at Bull and ordered, “Cremisius!”

“I’m on it,” Krem assured, just a quick dip of his hand into the snow behind Bull and he slapped a cold wet pile of snow against the back of the Qunari’s head, earning him a surprised yelp.

“Snow was a nice touch,” she commended him, giggling when he offered her a regal bow in return.

Bull stopped focusing on the swear words then, there was something he really wanted to know, more than all the dirty signs in the world, “If you tell me you haven’t secretly been a king or something this whole time, I’m going to lose my shit.” It would actually crush him, Krem was pretty sure.

Grim looked Bull in the eye, put his hands, fingers curved like claws, to the center of his chest and moved them up towards his shoulders in a V.

Ellie’s eyes were alight with excitement as she said, “Mayor.”

And that was good enough for Chief.

“YES!”

Dinner with the Chargers had been…Maker! It’d been so much fun! Everyone was so nice! And funny, Ellie’s belly only hurt now from laughing so much. It’d been the least tense meal she’d had in a week—no sickness, no drama, no stress just fun.

Cremisius looked beat by the time dinner wound down, and she’d felt badly—it was so incredibly kind of him to stay with her, and she was grateful, that potion had really knocked her out. She vaguely remembered…she hadn’t even really been sure of where she was, she heard Cassandra’s voice she thought, someone she trusted holding her and running their hand through her hair. It made her feel better about being so out of it that he’d stayed with her, watched over her. Still, she couldn’t believe he’d done that! And he insisted on seeing her back to her cabin, he had to make sure she was safely back and call for guards to be posted at her door, it was his job after all, though the Iron Bull could have done it. Or Ellie herself, really who was going to kill her between the gate and her cabin? It seemed like all of Haven was sound asleep as they walked arm in arm, and he checked to make sure everything was okay with her room, that she didn’t need anything, and that her cabin was warm enough before he took his leave.
“Don’t hesitate to send for me if you need anything, I’m just outside the gate.”

She popped up on her toes to kiss him on the cheek. “Go! Sleep! I’ll be fine,” she promised, “I’ll probably just sleep until tomorrow,” which was crazy, but she was still tired, and now that her belly was full, and she was warm and cozy in her cabin, she was definitely in for a nap to say the least.

His face looked a bit warm and he nodded a bow, “As you wish.”

After he did a last check around her cabin she saw him out, he waved to her just before disappearing past Haven’s gate.

She had thought she would fall right asleep once he left her and she’d gotten all, soft pajamas, warm blankets, curled up in her bed but she sort of just, thought, mind racing across the last few days.

Cremisius was just. Oh gosh! He was just so sweet, and thoughtful, and funny. Her heart sort of felt a little lighter in her chest somehow when she thought about what he’d said, about making her laugh because it meant she would smile. The thought made her smile too, so.

Ugh! What did that even mean?!

And Maker, he was so handsome, sometimes she got nervous! Like when he caught her when she sort of slipped out of the saddle almost fell on her face, his face had just been right there, and he caught her like it was nothing—and it didn’t scare her! Sometimes people being so much stronger than her terrified her. She loved the Iron Bull, but she still panicked just a little inside when he moved her in battle, or when she sparred with Cullen and Cassandra just, in the back of her mind it sometimes set off a red flag. But Cremisius catching her so easily, and when he carried her to her cabin, it just made her feel safe, and she knew if she ended up on the ground it would be because she was standing on her feet secure. When he caught her, he’d just been so close, and they’d been having so much fun and…well she’d just been struck by the urge to kiss him, right on the lips! That would have been so embarrassing!

She was grateful for how kind he was, and how seriously he took the job of watching over her but Maker! He’d heard all those things Varric had blabbed about her, things that were true, and then she’d cried all over him, and he’d listened to all her angst about it later. He’d been so nice and hadn’t made her feel badly, done everything to make her feel better but he had to think she was just! Batcrap! Absolutely crazy! There was no way he could look at everything going on in her life and think “huh, you know what, I’d be cool with that crazy girl with world problems knocking on her door and a weird glowing hand, having a—” well. A crush on him. It was just a dumb crush! They happened! She’d liked plenty of people before! Just…she liked Cremisius a lot and she absolutely loved that he was her friend, at least she hoped he was anyway. And she definitely didn’t want to mess that up!

Oh! Ugh! She pressed the heels of her hands into her eyes, just, frustrated! Because that reminded her how she’d really messed up with Varric! He’d been so mad with her! And! She didn’t want to be. She hadn’t liked being mad at Thom, and she hated being mad at Varric! He’d been so mean, and Cremisius’s explanation about him just being scared, that he wasn’t really mad at her, that’d…that’d helped, a lot, but she still felt like the Dwarf man was mad at her, she couldn’t help it! She hadn’t seen him since! But she hadn’t really seen anyone like usual except Adan and Bull and Cremisius, because she’d slept so much. Though she’d felt Solas meditating, he’d held her Marked hand and sent a few apologetic and soothing waves through the bond, so she knew for certain he stopped by, Cassandra too.

She also got the vague impression Sera’d been by? She thought she’d heard her laughing but maybe she’d been mistaken, she’d Fade dreamed mostly, and sometimes that carried over random bits of things she’d heard, from her memories.

She wondered if Marehis was alright. She hoped everything was going well. She was still in Orlais handling Inquisition business, outside the Oasis now it sounded like. Night time, she hoped that meant her friend was safe and warm, in a tavern or inn or an ally’s home. She missed her! Agh! If she didn’t stop thinking about it right this instant she might be a big stupid baby about it, cry again. She understood having to work, and she was mildly horrified at the thought that maybe Marehis felt like this when Ellie went away! Sad and lonely and just aching all through her heart because she wanted her friend back! All of her friends! Marehis would know what to do about Varric! Creminius’s advice had sounded reasonable, wait it out, but how?! And what if there wasn’t time to wait, what if Varric really really hated her now?

She sighed and just, tried to relax. It would be hours and hours before sunrise and she didn’t have anything to do really. She was half tempted to see if Solas was awake, maybe he’d come meditate with her, but it was really late and—

She shot up in bed when the door to her cabin swung open and then she was smiling.

“Good evening, da’len, would you care to meditate? Perhaps a midnight snack is in order?”

“Solas!” she bounced a bit in place as the Elf man came inside armed with a tray, a kettle and cups and some sort of sweet-smelling bread. He sat down on her bed and she gasped when it looked like he’d dropped the tray but then her eyes went wide because it hung in the air just floating! “Oh gosh! What kind of spell is that?”

Solas smiled and took a hold of her Marked hand. “Perhaps I’ll teach you someday, lethallan.” He seemed more serious and he gave her hand a squeeze before saying, “I would ask how you are feeling, but I admit I have been paying much closer attention since you’ve wakened.” Oh, so he’d felt her feeling all frustrated and sad the past little while, and came to cheer her up, that was sweet! “I must apologize, truly, Ellie. I allowed myself to become distracted, I should have been of more assistance to you since our return to Haven.”

Ellie shook her head, “Solas! Everyone has problems, I know…” she bit her lip, not wanting to overstep but she said, “I know you’ve got um, friends and stuff, other places that you worry about and if you were like, seeing someone, you know, romantically and they broke up with you that sucks! Because you’re really nice! And smart and you’ve just got a wicked sense of humor, and if someone broke things off with you, I might not know them, but they must be just! Stupid!”

Solas sort of stared at her in surprise for a moment and then he was laughing, so much it was almost contagious, Ellie felt herself getting giggly and her magic was giddy from the amusement-mixed-relief? pouring in from the Elf Apostate.

“Ahh, da’len, dear one, I assure you I have not been thrown over,” he said as he calmed, “I admittedly believed that someone I am close to wished to end their relationship with me, but it was a misunderstanding. They are in a troublesome situation where they cannot communicate at this time. In my worry I attempted to make contact with them to no avail.”

“Oh, gosh, I’m sorry—I mean I’m glad everything’s okay relationship-wise, but I’m sorry you can’t reach them right now. Do they need help? Can we do anything?”
“No da’len, in this instance it is safer I not try to find them on this plane just now. Though, they are not a Spirit or a Mage,” Solas seemed embarrassed to admit, “my endeavor was rather futile to begin with.”

At first Ellie was a little shocked, that Solas would be embarrassed about being with someone who wasn’t magical but then she realized that wasn’t at all what he meant.

“Oh, it isn’t safe to reach out to them in person, so you like, tried to contact them through the Fade?” Solas nodded. Huh. Ellie guessed then yeah, it was little silly, but she shrugged, “If I was super worried about someone I loved I might try reaching out that way, even if it probably wouldn’t work—it’s like you’ve got to do something right? I hope everything works out. Do you… I mean would you like to pray about it or anything? Or I can?” Solas hadn’t ever been super open about his religious beliefs, though his practices with the Fade sort of seemed like a form of religion for him.

“I do not bow to the Dalish gods, da’len. But I do appreciate the spirit in which you’ve offered,” Solas assured her warmly. “I have faith in my friend, and I will hear from her soon enough.”

Her, huh? Awe! Solas has a girlfriend! Cute cute cute! She hoped she was okay and could contact Solas soon! Maybe she could come visit him in Haven? Had she visited before and Ellie just hadn’t seen her? She was only attached to Solas by the magical hip after all and he was the one in control of it—she couldn’t perceive of things on his end unless he allowed her to for communication.

Solas poured them…huh tea, with lots of warm milk in it. It didn’t much taste like tea—not the green stuff or black tea Ellie was used to, which she supposed is why Solas was alright drinking it. It was cinnamon, Solas said, and it was so good! Warm and kind of sweet, with some heat to it like a spice. It was like happiness in a cup! And the bread was warm and super super soft, tasted like apples and brown sugar—she definitely had to brush her teeth again!

Solas told her stories about some of the things he’d seen in the Fade, and they talked a bit about some of the magical theory he was trying to teach her during their Haven lessons. It wasn’t boring or anything, and she sort of thought all the sugar would have her wired, but she did eventually start to yawn. How in the world could she still be tired after sleeping so much! But Solas suggested they meditate and call it an evening. When they were done he actually, gosh! He tucked her in! And then he kissed her on the forehead and wished her sweet dreams! It was almost overwhelmingly sweet, made her heart feel sort of full in a way that was almost painful, and her eyes a little achy. No one’d done anything like that for her since she was really really little, just the barest sort of memory of life before she dreamed in the Fade.

When she woke up next, she heard logs shuffling in the fireplace, smelled breakfast, felt the bit of chill on her face, swept in by night time and the door opening and closing just moments before. Oh! Grounding, like the Iron Bull suggested! Hmm my name is Ellie, I’m in Haven in my cabin, in my bed and…she peeked open her eyes to see Cremisius working to get the fire going warmer. So, I’m safe.

She curled up a bit tighter under her covers before stretching and sitting up.

“Good morning, Cremisius,” she mumbled out in greeting. She was awake, she swears, just. Early. Not as early as usual though, sunlight filtered through the little spaces between the boards on her windows. Huh. Had Cassandra come at all? Maybe Ellie slept through her arrival?

“Good morning. Did you sleep well?” he asked, coming to sit on the edge of her bed. Ellie nodded.

“Did you?” she asked.

“I did, dropped right off to sleep, not even Bull’s snoring kept me up,” he leaned in a bit and shared, “though Rocky, he’s the real roof raiser, we take turns rolling him on his side or no one’d ever get any rest.”

He handed off her morning potion and then they sat on the floor in front of the fireplace and ate breakfast together—Cremisius took a hold of her unmarked hand and bowed his head so she did too, and he said a nice little prayer of thanks over their food before they ate. He explained that Cassandra had come to visit when she was asleep the other day. She had an important meeting this morning, and she’d asked him to step in for her.

She couldn’t help it, really, she couldn’t. “So, now I get to have coffee with Krem?” she teased lightly, thank the Maker she was officially allowed the beverage again. The Tevinter man choked a bit on his drink. And then he really hammed it up, gripping his throat and throwing himself backward to play dead.

“Tell…Chief…he’s an ass…”

“You’re ridiculous!”

He peeked open an eye. “Hey, I’m dead here, have some respect!”

He popped right up after Ellie leaned over and kissed him on the cheek, told him to behave and eat his breakfast!

“What’s on the schedule today?”

“Whatever you want—only thing is lunch with Sister Leliana,” Cremisius said with a shrug. Oh wow, really? Leliana wanted to have lunch with her? Oh gosh, that’d be great!

“That’s all I have to do today?” she asked, sometimes in Haven she got like a weekend day off but…well gosh that’d been ages ago. Well. Months ago. Whatever.

“You slept most of your day off so, it doesn’t hurt to have one you can enjoy.”

“I did enjoy my day off,” Ellie insisted, “thanks again for last night.”

“You’re definitely welcome to hang with the Chargers anytime,” he replied. And then he started rattling off ideas for things to do—she could stay in, relax, they could talk, or she could read a book…he could grab one from his bunk if she was interested since she didn’t seem to have any on hand. Did she know how to knit? He could teach her. Sera had come ‘round when she’d been sleeping and wanted to see her. He’d seen her asleep when he left the Tavern, but he could send her a note that Ellie was awake and feeling better, see if the Elf girl would want to come hang out. Bull was running drills with the Chargers, but he’d probably be by later.

“If you give me a minute I can change, and we can return our dishes to Flissa’s,” Ellie said, “then we can figure out something to do.”

He looked sort of uncomfortable as he said, “Oh, that isn’t necessary, I can run them back while you change. Maybe um…” he scratched at the side of his head thinking, “uhh do you know Wicked Grace? I know loads of card games, I can get a deck from camp real quick—”
She could do cards, and that did sound fun, but, “Cremisius? Is there some reason you don’t want me to leave the cabin today?” Had something happened? Like a security thing? Or oh, maybe he was still tired after yesterday? Was he not feeling well?

He certainly seemed uncomfortable as he struggled for his words, “No! It’s not that I don’t want you to— I-,” he cleared his throat and then he pushed their trays aside toward the desk and he shifted so he was sitting directly in front of her, his back to the fireplace as he took hold of both of her hands. He didn’t look at her, just focused on their hands, there was a tension in his jaw, brow creasing as he very carefully explained his concern, worried it would be hard for her to hear.

Apparently, there was gossip about her fight with Varric. He was worried she might hear about it if they went out. Someone might be overheard gossiping or making fun about it, maybe something might get said to Ellie’s face and if the instance wasn’t avoidable, and he supposed it wasn’t. He may have been able to sway her to stay in today, only go out for her lunch meeting and then right back to her cabin, but she couldn’t stay in forever. He didn’t want her to be caught off guard. She asked what sort of things people’d been saying.

“It’s not everyone,” he swore to her, “just some idiots.”

“What’d they say?” she asked again more firmly.

He held her hands a bit more tightly, not painfully or anything, but it seemed like he was trying to focus on that, staying seated, holding her hands so he didn’t…oh gosh he was angry! It was like he was worried he might just jump up and go fight someone! He ground out the incident between Skinner and a few Inquisition Soldiers, because they’d been making fun of her for crying and calling her crazy, and Cullen stepping in and taking Skinner’s side—oh, that was a relief but still,

“She didn’t have to do that! Was she alright?” Skinner hadn’t seemed injured or anything when she saw her last night, but she didn’t exactly strike Ellie as the sort to advertise that she was hurting!

“She was fine, Ellie,” Cremisius insisted, “She wasn’t just going to stand by and let them say those things.”

Ellie shrugged. “They were mean I guess, but it wasn’t anything that would’ve really hurt my feelings or something. They didn’t exactly strike Ellie as the sort to advertise that she was hurting!”

“She was fine, Ellie,” Cremisius insisted, “She wasn’t just going to stand by and let them say those things.”

Ellie shrugged. “They were mean I guess, but it wasn’t anything that would’ve really hurt my feelings or something. They didn’t exactly catch me on my most impressive day.” She wasn’t going to get mad or sad over people observing the obvious, if she was just someone else in the Inquisition and saw the Herald getting told off like a toddler and crying about it to boot, she might not think they were suited for the job either. The Breach was frightening, it would only be scarier if the only thing that stood between you and it was some weak-willed brat.

“Those assholes,” Cremisius raged, “they’d probably piss themselves, run home crying if they ever had to deal with a Rift or face the Breach the way you do! They don’t know anything and if they did, if they’d seen what I have, they wouldn’t have said any of that garbage.” The words seemed to tumble past his lips rapid fire, “You’re brave, and strong, and smart, and compassionate and you’re handling something that feels impossible pretty incredibly.”

Well, she was pretty sure her face was permanently red now, Maker! “Gosh, that’s sweet of you to say—”

“It isn’t sweet, it’s the truth.”

Oh. Huh. It wasn’t that she thought he was lying but yeah, she supposed when she said it was sweet of someone to say something, she thought they were sugarcoating things, trying to simply be kind more so than entirely honest with her.

She gave his hands a grateful little squeeze, “Thanks,” she said. “So, was that it?” oh, he looked even more uncomfortable somehow and she was almost afraid to ask, “it wasn’t was it?”

Nope. Apparently not! Gross! Gross gross gross!

“Oh that’s just groady! No offense to either of them but-! Thom’s like-! He’s so old some days I worry he might die of a heart attack! And Varric’s not a whole lot better! Why in the world would they even think that’d be a thing?! I’m only fifteen!”

Though yeah, she guessed Varric yelling about how very heartbroken she’d been over Thom, and her shouting at Varric that it wasn’t any of his business, that he needed to stop talking about whatever he thought he knew, could be construed as possibly being about an affair or something but yuck! She was half tempted to send something through the bond to Solas for him to come Mindblast her until she had another form of specific amnesia, forgetting all big, hairy, horrible mental images!

“You don’t look just fifteen,” Cremisius said, and his eyes went a little wide, red faced as he was quick to assure her, “Is what Bull told me they said! Sorry, I was quoting I swear—it was creepy and inappropriate and more than enough cause for a solid trouncing. If Skinner hadn’t done such a good job, I’d’ve laid them out, myself.”

It really seemed to be bugging him, and that was sweet, but it wasn’t like they’d threatened her or tried to hurt her or something, he didn’t need to take it so seriously. Did he think ‘bodyguard’ meant he had to protect her from words? She freed her unmarked hand and he looked at her confused as she held up an index finger in front of his face, and his eyes went crossed when she bopped him on the nose with it. “They’re not totally wrong, I’m almost an entire sixteen years old, I’m practically ancient,” she teased. It was certainly older than she ever really thought she’d get to be.

That had him snorting but then then he looked like he’d caught onto something interesting. “Your birthday’s coming up?”

He sounded excited about it? “Sort of. I up my age on the first of the year, so I’ll start saying I’m sixteen then.”

He seemed confused by that. “…up your age?”

Why did they always ask that? That’s twice now someone thought it was weird! She was pretty sure people kept track of their ages why was it weird that she did it?

So, she explained not knowing the exact day she was born, and that it was hard to keep track of things like the date when you didn’t really have a sort of structured thing in your life like a consistent job or school or something so First Day was just the easiest thing to use as a measure.

Cremisius nodded. “Well then,” he said, smiling as he asked, “what do you think you’ll do for your birthday this year?”

…what’ll she do? “What do you mean?” Ellie asked as she thought it over. “I guess there might be First day things happening…um…whatever Lady Josie puts on my schedule? Classes or meetings or whatever. I don’t know if I’ll be in Haven though, we’ll be heading back out into the field sometime soon and it’s hard to tell how long that’ll take, especially once we finally get into negotiations with the Mages and Templars.”

He just sort of stared at her like he wasn’t sure about something, and then he smiled and nodded. “You’re um, okay about everything? Do you still want to go out?”

“Yeah,” she thought about it, “That stuff doesn’t bother me much, I don’t know those guys. If it were my friends who thought badly of me or something that’d be different.” She sort of worried they’d run into Varric. Like, worry-wished, she wanted to see him and work things out. Well. Maybe yell a bit and work things out, just not in the middle of a busy Tavern. She was definitely mad at him! Little bit more now that she lived in a world where someone thought she’d…slept…with…two really really old men. Just! Gross! The mental images physically burned her brain!

“Forget about all that then. We’ll go have fun today. You get ready.”

He left her to change. She wasn’t super sure what to wear. She kind of…she was struck with the thought she wanted Cremisius to think she looked pretty, say she looked beautiful again, but that was dumb! Blah! Um. She did want to look nice for lunch with Leliana though. Ellie was sort of worried the Spymaster didn’t like her very well. Her relationship with the advisors was different from her party members, she didn’t know them quite so well, but Cullen took time to teach her fighting stuff. And Lady Josie had helped with etiquette things and she usually made a point to see her outside of War Room meetings and lessons, she was just the sweetest! But gosh, Leliana just had to be super busy, all the time it was silly to expect her to want to spend spare time with Ellie, she didn’t have any reason to. But she wanted to get to know the woman—she was the one who’d given her Marehis! Oh, Maker, she could never be grateful enough to the Inquisition’s Spymaster for that!

Oh! Well Leliana’s armor was purple, and whenever she dressed for meetings and meals with people for the Inquisition she wore colors of their heraldry or whatever, and she’d worn brown to eat with the Chargers because Bull and Cremisius had brown in their armor, so did the other Chargers so she figured it was sort of their color. She picked one of the nicer outfits that was a sort of…lavender, Marehis called it, with silvery designs on it, it was pretty, Maker bless Madam Florna!

Huh. She might need to see her again sometime for adjustments. Madam Florna had made her clothing with folds in the back of the tunics and inside the sleeves, in the legs and hems of her leggings so that if her size changed stitching could be taken out and her clothing would fit better—she’d put on some weight since joining the Inquisition, no more dips in her ribcage or jutting hipbones; her face, other places a bit fuller now. Her armor had needed a little adjusting and Marehis had taken the stitches out of her clothing already, and everything fit great! But today these leggings felt a bit tight around her tummy. Not super uncomfortable but it took a little more umf to button up. It was a relief really, she’d been a bit worried she’d drop weight after being sick, she hadn’t exactly been packing in the calories for a while.

She put on her cloak and grabbed their breakfast trays and the second she opened the door Cremisius took them from her, and gosh! He said she looked ‘lovely’ and that was just sweet, and her magic sort of perked up, amused at how flustered the compliment left her. She took his arm and they made their way to Flissa’s. They had to walk by Varric’s tent and she sort of considered seeing if he was in but if he were he might still be sleeping—or maybe he wouldn’t’ve gone to bed yet? She wasn’t sure about his hours much anymore he kept such odd ones in Haven. Either way, she didn’t want to talk if he’d already be grumpy from being tired.

Flissa was on them the moment they entered the Tavern, waving them over and chatting with Ellie, seeing how she was doing. Sera was sound asleep when they came in, but Ellie heard crunching and a thump followed by, “Piss!” and when she turned, Sera was popping up off the floor, rubbing at a sore spot on her bottom with one hand and raising the other overhead to wave at Ellie like she was some great distance away instead of just the few feet between Sera’s cot and the bar.
“Hihihihihi!!”

Oof! Big hug! Sera zipped across the room and squeezed her super tight, and Cremisius looked a bit alarmed because his arm was still linked with Ellie’s so now it was caught in Sera’s vice-like body grip.

Sera wore her sleep clothes, for sleeping like Ellie suggested, but she’d never considered the fact that the Elf claimed the Tavern as her quarters.

And this is how that played out.

“Tits out!” Sera warned the general population before whipping her night shirt off, reaching under her cot for her pack, digging out her regular tunic and pulling it on. Apparently it was common place for early morning Tavern goers, most people either looked away or honestly didn’t pay attention, night shift people just wanted to eat and go to bed, day shift people were wishing they could stay in bed, Sera’s bits were the least of everyone’s concern.

They sat at the table by the fire, Ellie and Cremisius drank more coffee while Sera ate breakfast, big spoonful’s she talked around going a mile a minute, first asking Ellie all sorts of questions, was she feeling better? Whoo! Was she mad at Varric? Good because Sera was too, Dwarfy could eat it! Did Krem tell her Sera’d been by? How come she liked calling him his funny name? Krem was way better!

Huh. She didn’t say as much but, she rather liked his name, she thought. It was handsome and suited him. And he’d shown a level of preference that she calls him that. It didn’t seem like he disliked ‘Krem’, but she figured it was sort of like how she was just fine with Cassandra and some of the others calling her ‘Eleanor’, but if that was all anyone ever called her she’d get tired of the nickname.

She broke out some cookies to share, she found she liked dipping the sweet thing in her coffee, made them softer and a pleasant sort of bittersweet. Cremisius took one and she offered some to Sera once she’d finished eating her breakfast.

“You made cookies, Inky?”

Ellie shook her head, “Nope! Seggrit makes them for me, they’re really good—help yourself.”

“Thanks Inky but uh,” Sera said, “not real big on cookies.”

Huh. That was too bad, but to each their own she guessed. Sera’d liked their pranking pudding well enough, she wasn’t sure where she’d got that, had she made it? Maybe Ellie could find something like that…oh! Sera liked sharing her fruit snacks, like apples, and grapes weren’t always a go-to cause they got squished easily, super messy but Sera’d liked them a lot—green kind that were sourish.

The Elf girl was excited to tell her about how ‘Lady Priss Pants’ got Cullen to find some man for Sera in the southern part of Ferelden, who could jar up bees* and use them as a weapon!
She’d heard about it from one of her Friends and thought the Inquisition could use it—she thought it’d be great for pranking stupid prissy parties but apparently Cassandra thought perhaps they’d be of good use for fights. That was so nice that Cassandra had taken the time to listen to Sera and even helped her, too! She wasn’t a hundred percent sure it sounded nice for the bees though.

They were just getting ready to leave, the three of them, when Lord Berand and some of his men came into the Tavern and she stopped dead in her tracks and so did he, his eyes going a little wide and all his men went quiet as he sort of stared at Ellie. Oh gosh! She was so embarrassed after his parents…gosh they proposed! Like! Marriage! They talked at her about ideal wedding dates and how she’d be ‘free’ to wrap up her Inquisition business but then they’d really have to get on with starting a family! She thought for certain Cassandra was about to have an aneurism when they asked how long Ellie’d ‘had her blood’ and if it was ‘regular’ or not yet. Cassandra and Lady Josie had no way of knowing about that really and at first Ellie’d said yeah, she was regular—she was just a person! Thankfully Cassandra realized Ellie didn’t understand the question, because at first her declaration had delighted the Lord and Lady. But they were talking about the whole bleeding ‘cycle’ thing Adan had mentioned in her first check up, and yeah she’d never done that before she didn’t think and that was the point they started being able to get talked down. Not ‘your son has to still be grieving his former fiancée’ not, ‘The Herald really is much too young for marriage’, not Ellie being an Apostate, or the politest way of saying she really didn’t have any interest in their son, no! It was the fact she wasn’t the best candidate for baby dispensing that got them to start to back off and even then—“perhaps we can revisit this in future” blah! Not happening! Maker, those people. Ellie hadn’t ever thought of marriage before, it wasn’t exactly on her radar and then, bam! Hello, thanks for finding our son’s dead fiancée would you like to be his next one?

“I’m sorry—!” she said at the same time as he said,

“My apologies—!” oh. That sort of felt better though, and they laughed, nervous.

“Lady Eleanor, truly. Please. I apologize for my parents’ behavior,” Lord Berand said, “I did not realize their intentions until it was too late to dissuade them.”

“It’s okay, really. You’re not mad or anything are you? I’m sorry I just uh, well I’m not really looking to marry anyone right now? And we don’t really know each other, and I promise I’d be absolutely pants at noble stuff!” She really really would be!

Lord Berand smiled, shaking his head. “My lady don’t worry about offending me. My parents acted of their own accord. I mean no offense to you, you’re lovely, and kind and,” he sort of looked her up and down then, “lovely.”

“You said that already, mate,” Cremisius observed drily. He’d said it to her earlier too, and she’d liked it better then. Cremisius had been speaking sincerely, not just trying to be polite and then…kind of skittish.

Sera snickered.

“Ahh, um. Yes,” the Lord cleared his throat nervously, “I just mean to say I had no part in their actions yesterday and I’m satisfied that the Inquisition was able to give them a refusal, with no offense against you. I hope you are not angry with me.”

“I’m not,” Ellie promised, “I wasn’t to begin with, and not with your parents either really. Yeah I’m not um, interested, but I understand marriage in noble circles is important. They probably just mistook the situation as opportunity to do what they thought was best for you.”

Lord Berand nodded and thanked her for understanding and then he motioned for his men to move Ellie and her friends pass. Whew. That was… That could have been much more awkward. She’d been so embarrassed listening to Lady Josie go on for literally hours trying to convince Lord Berand’s parents they’d made a mistake, she’d been worried Lord Berand would be offended at the refusal.

Sera accused her of having a ‘secret boyfriend’ and Ellie explained. Oh. It felt better to get it off her chest just how much it’d bothered her, the whole callous affair. She thought she’d rather crawl in a hole and die than spend five seconds alone in the Lord and Lady’s company after they were so! Just! Unreasonable! Thankfully all of her guests had been able to come along on the tour of Haven and Maker, bless the elderly Marquess, she’d seen Ellie was uncomfortable with Berand’s parent’s attentions, they tried pulling Ellie into conversation with them during the tour and the Marquess from Orlais had immediately put herself between them and Ellie, letting her act as her escort on their tour and interrupting all attempts at conversation with questions about the Inquisition and Haven, even going so far as to ask if they’d ever considered dyeing the snow different colors for decoration, when she ran out of more reasonable sounding questions for Ellie. And then Ellie’d apologized, to Lady Velania’s family before they left—they’d only just lost their daughter! And then her fiancé’s family was being so…just cold, like they didn’t care their son’s betrothed had passed if they could get him a better prospect. She’d been so ashamed and hoped they weren’t upset after their visit, she was sorry Velania died, and she was glad she could be peacefully laid to rest. Thankfully her parents had been understanding, accepted Ellie’s condolences.

Cremisius had seemed rather tense during the whole interaction with Lord Berand and when Ellie asked if he was alright he insisted he’d only been concerned because he worried she had some sort of issue with the Lord, that he’d been about to start trouble for Ellie. Sera snorted and sort of cackled at that.

Ellie told them about the Druffalo herd and they wanted to see! She was super excited, she hadn’t really gotten much chance to go visit the herd at all—though Sera was under strict instructions not to terrorize them…or weaponize them, since she’d thought bees should be used as bombs!

They had to walk past the Soldiers practicing, Cremisius seemed to be on guard, studying the faces of the men on the field but he relaxed after a moment, didn’t seem to see anyone that he had issue with. Commander Cullen was walking along between rows of sparring soldiers, giving quiet critiques as he passed huh. He raised a hand to Ellie gave her a small smile when he saw them, and she came to a stop, releasing hold of her friends’ arms and the former Templar came to meet her once he realized she was approaching.

“Good to see you Eleanor,” Cullen greeted, “you’re looking well.”

Ellie smiled and nodded. “I just wanted to say thank you for sticking up for me, and Skinner too, with your men yesterday. I’m sorry for the trouble.” He didn’t look like he felt very well, sort of tired and stressed and pale.

He sighed, wrenching a hand at the back of his neck. “I apologize on their behalf, Eleanor. I assure you their behavior wasn’t tolerated and has been corrected.”

“Thanks, I really appreciate it.”

“Certainly,” he said, looking relieved, “did you need me for anything else?”

He looked relieved but not like he felt much better—gosh he was pallid, and his features strained. So Ellie nodded, and beckoned him with an index finger to come closer, and he crouched a bit to be eyelevel with her, head tilting so she could speak in his ear if she had something she wanted to say just between them, but she just took the glove off her unmarked hand and rested it against his forehead—she thought he might have a fever or something but yikes! His skin felt cold and clammy, like…was there something that was the opposite of a fever? Was that bad?

“Eleanor?”

“Are you feeling alright? I know Cassandra’s busy this morning but um…well maybe Bull or,” she looked to the Tevinter man standing alongside Sera waiting and keeping watch, he was second in command, so he probably helped with training and things for the Chargers right? She felt a bit badly for offering without asking but gosh, the Commander really didn’t look well.

“Cremisius? Could take over for a bit. Have you been to see Adan? I could walk you. Oh! Or Mister Stitches would probably be glad to treat you, you’ve met him right? He’s the healer for the Chargers.”

He straightened himself upright again. “It’s kind of you to offer but I’m quite alright, my lady,” he said. Well. That was a lie!

But not one she’d hold against him or anything. “I understand privacy and stuff, I don’t need to know your business, but if you’re sick or hurt or something, you should get help.”

“I have. I appreciate your concern, but you’re right, my problem is personal,” he said, “Seeker Cassandra was made aware when she recruited me for the Inquisition, and I’ve consulted with Adan. You needn’t worry.”

Oh. Maybe that’s what they’d been talking about the other day? She hoped he’d be alright, that it wasn’t too serious whatever it was. “Good. I mean not good that something’s wrong, and I hope you feel better, but I’m glad you’ve got people to help you. Um. Is there anything I can do? You wouldn’t have to say why just, if you need time off or want to tone down my lessons or uh…” she tried to think. His forehead had felt frigid, so maybe his head was cold? “Oh! Would you like to borrow my hat? It’s really nice and warm and it isn’t girly looking or anything and it should fit just fine cause I have so much hair—not to say you’ve got a big head or anything just, you know, regular grown up sized head—and I keep clean, so you wouldn’t have to worry about lice or anything.” She pulled her hood back, so he could see for himself.

A smile tugged at the Commander’s lips and won, the man grinned, and a few laughs escaped him as he put a gauntleted hand on Ellie’s shoulder, though he did close his mouth and clear his throat to stop his chortling, his voice full of warm amusement when he said, “That is very generous of you, Ellie, but unnecessary. Thank you,” he said, squeezing her shoulder before letting go. “I’m well enough, and should return to my men unless you’ve need of me?”

Ellie shook her head, “Nope! Just, you know, take care of yourself okay?”

“I’ll certainly try,” he assured her warmly.

When she rejoined her friends, linking arms again, she asked Cremisius if his offer was still on the table about teaching her to knit. He seemed uncertain as to what had prompted the question, but he said he’d be glad to show her—maybe this afternoon? It would take practice especially if it was something she’d never done before, but he found it relaxing. Sera said knitting was booooring but she was somehow the easiest person to entertain she’d ever met, who got bored with anything at the drop of a hat, so Ellie wasn’t sure she was the best authority on the matter.

They picked Elf Root along their way around the lake and had handfuls of the stuff for the babies! Gosh! They weren’t really babies anymore, they were all taller than even Sera, now! Not as big as their parents but still. Sera shrieked a bit when she first saw them,
“I thought you said they was ruddy babies!”

“Well they were the last time I saw them, I told you it’s been forever,” Ellie couldn’t help but laugh at her friend.

They still loved to snack on Elf Root and Sera groused a bit when she got a lick on the cheek for her kindness, but they also snuggled into the three of them in greeting once their peaceful intentions were established. They were so warm! And this time when Ellie got chased it was because the big open field was just much too tempting, and she swatted Sera on the arm and shouted, “Tag! You’re it!” and shot off running away from the Elf girl as fast as she possibly could, dashing across the field, Sera racing after her!

For all of maybe a minute but then Sera seemed to think just the two of them was boring or something. Ellie stopped running to watch as Sera took off in the opposite direction.

“Tag! You’re it, you’re it, Kremmy-boy!” Sera cackled as she peeled off running back toward Ellie. Cremisius looked stunned for a moment, and then looked around as if to make sure everything was safe around them before joining in.

And then he chased after Sera who was giggling up a storm and ran crashing into Ellie, grabbing her by the wrist to pull her along, get her running again.

Gosh, it was fun! Ellie thought it’d been fun when she and Sera played on the Coast but having two people to chase after, the confusion of ‘oh wait Cremisius has just been it but AHH nope it’s Sera now!’, the three of them laughing and shouting.

Sera’d run to be right next to Ellie when Cremisius’s turn to tag was up again, the Tevinter man chasing after them and then, gosh, Ellie’s foot caught on the back of Sera’s ankle just as Cremisius’s hand was in reach of her shoulder, but Ellie went toppling forward with a little squeak as she tried to catch herself and a soft thump as she landed on her back in the snow, something solid against her chest, and the back of her head.

Oh! Someone!

Cremisius had fallen too, or maybe it was more like he’d gone with her, his gauntleted hand cradling the back of her head to shield it from the ground, he’d caught himself with his other hand slapped against the snow by her hair, and his knees, straddling Ellie’s right thigh, his face was flushed as he caught his breath, chuckling a bit.

Her magic did a sort of skip in her blood and suddenly the cold seeping through her cloak from the snow was very refreshing because she felt warm all over.

“All good?” she barely heard him ask, more saw him asking really reading his lips not staring at them, nope!

“All good!” she assured him, her voice sounded a bit high to her. Yup she was pretty sure she had a fever or something, Maker she was warm, and she didn’t think she liked it! Nope!

Magic just sort of laughed at her. It could just mind its own business thanks!

Sera was laughing at her too it sounded like, though Ellie couldn’t really be sure, Sera laughed just at random. Though she seemed sort of pleased with herself about something.

Cremisius sat back and stood up before offering her a hand up, pulling her right up onto her feet.
“So?” Sera asked, giggily, “who tagged who?”

“Hmm I think we have to tag our lunch appointment soon,” Cremisius said checking his pocket watch.

“Iin-kyyyyy?” Sera questioned, sing songy.

Oh she’d been sort of spaced lunch appointment…lunch appointment…Oh! Leliana!

Ellie reached out to tap Sera on the elbow with one hand while with the other she sort of rapped the back of her hand against Cremisius’s chest plate, “Race you to the gate!”

She almost fell, whirling about to run off toward Haven’s gate, but she kept upright and bolted, Maker they set off after her in a flash!

Cullen looked mildly alarmed when Ellie came speeding around the path but Cremisius and Sera were right on her heels, so he just sort of kept his hand on the hilt of his sword, watching to see if anything came after them but they’d been pretty jovial.

As soon as they made their way back around to Haven’s gate the Iron Bull and Thom were just about to head into Haven with Skinner, Stitches, and Grim.

“Incoming!” Ellie called out breathlessly, as she barreled past them to slap a hand on the gate before turning around to see Sera and Cremisius catch up to her, all of them stopping to catch their breath. “Sorry…cut you off…race…fast…won!” Oh gosh, she kind of wanted to lay down in the snow again, her muscles were all burning, and she had to cough to clear up her chest, Haven’s cold dry air always sort of scraped in her lungs, so they were kind of on fire right now, nothing serious though and Maker it was worth it, that’d been amazing fun!

“Way to go boss,” Bull greeted, both groups coming to a stop just inside the gate. “See, what I tell you?” he said, knocking the back of his hand against Thom’s chest to get his attention, “Up, racing, lookin’ sharp purples a good color on you. Boss bounced back in style.”

She wouldn’t call red faced and gasping for air ‘style’ but huh, yeah purple was pretty.

“Ellie,” Thom said, seeming to fumble for a moment, stepping forward, stepping back, it looked like he was debating on hugging her, she was glad he didn’t though. They hadn’t been super hug-y when he’d been Blackwall, but certainly not since then, and she wasn’t a hundred percent sure she’d be feeling quite that close to the former mercenary anytime soon. “Maker it’s good to see you.”

“You too,” she said once she was able to speak normally, “Oh!” she did reach for his hand then because she remembered his cut, the man looked confused but didn’t resist her taking his hand and examining the broken skin on his thumb, now just a little scarring divot along the pad of his finger, “It looks like your hand healed okay, it doesn’t hurt anymore, or anything does it?”

Thom huffed, almost indignant sounding, “It was hardly worth the bandage,” he assured her, cheeks flushing. “But I do appreciate the concern.”

Oh, it was probably embarrassing having her fussing over it, but it couldn’t’ve gotten infected or something! She let go of his hand and moved on to say, “Sorry about the other day, I didn’t mean to ditch you,” she promised.

“You too,” she said once she was able to speak normally, “Oh!” she did reach for his hand then because she remembered his cut, the man looked confused but didn’t resist her taking his hand and examining the broken skin on his thumb, now just a little scarring divot along the pad of his finger, “It looks like your hand healed okay, it doesn’t hurt anymore, or anything does it?”

Thom huffed, almost indignant sounding, “It was hardly worth the bandage,” he assured her, cheeks flushing. “But I do appreciate the concern.”

“Think nothing of it, I’m glad you’re alright,” Thom cleared his throat nervously, “Bull invited me along to lunch, would you care to join us?”
“Oh gosh, I’d love to really, but I actually have plans already, with Sister Leliana.”

“Another time then,” Thom said lightly shrugging it off. “Sera?”

The Elf girl stuck out her tongue at him and blew raspberry—at first Ellie thought that was a refusal but Thom just crossed his eyes and returned the gesture and Sera cackled before letting go of Ellie’s arm to join the other group.

Oh! Ellie’d almost forgotten! “Skinner?”

The woman stared at Ellie unblinking her expression a sort of pleasantish neutral though as she said, “Yes.”

There was still a scratch on her cheek, Ellie’d seen it last night at dinner but now she was decently sure where it came from, so she popped up on her toes to kiss the mark, “Thanks, for sticking up for me.”

Skinner’s eyes were wide struck and her cheeks, and the tips of her ears were pink before she blinked a few times. She reached out in a jerky, halt ridden motion to pat Ellie on the head _pat...pat-pat_ before she snatched her hand back. “It was my pleasure.”

Leliana was weary to her very core. She and Cassandra had spent hours interrogating Butler.

And then, they spent more hours, interrogating the _other_.

This was all such a mess.

Farrier. It had been Farrier who’d been compromised. He’d disclosed the identity of the Herald’s bodyguard to Venatori agents. He’d been heading to the Oasis to escort Marehis back to Haven, with the intentions of leading her headlong into a trap—Scout Harding had been under orders to hold her position in the Oasis, keep the area under Inquisition Influence until the Herald and her party could investigate the temple, Madam de Fer had left to attend to matters of court. It was the perfect opportunity to take Marehis out—she would have been alone, in the hands of a traitor she believed to be her ally, and with Madam de Fer out of the way, there was no chance of a powerful mage coming to her defense, too no risk of earning the wrath of Marquis Bastien for the injury or death of his beloved mistress.

Butler had intercepted Farrier’s message to the Venatori, the confirmation that he would bring Marehis to them, when and where. She would have been captured, interrogated, tortured until either she satisfied their inquiries about Eleanor, which was highly unlikely the woman would bite off her own tongue before she spoke a word that would endanger the girl, or they drew the conclusion they wouldn’t get anything out of her. Either way, it would end in her death. Butler had no time to get word out to Leliana, Farrier was already on his way to get Marehis, so the man tracked him down himself and killed him before he could reach the Oasis. He’d tried he said, to contact Leliana but she’d not received it. Butler’s missive had been intercepted as well.

This led to the other. Leliana’s ranks had been infiltrated by a Venatori spy—a man that had claimed to be from Ferelden, spoke with the accent, had documentation to back up his claims, birth certificates, a lease on a home that dated back years, letters with official seals that gave him the glowing resume that got him into the Inquisition and the Nightingales in the first place. All along he’d been a handler for Farrier on his mission to work against the Herald of Andraste. The handler had been keeping watch on Farrier’s progress, making certain he wasn’t going to double cross Venatori efforts to capture the Herald’s bodyguard. They’d witnessed Farrier’s death and used their position in the Inquisition to dispose of Butler’s letter to Leliana and report instead that Butler had murdered Farrier in cold blood, that he was the traitor.

She’d had not one but two enemies in her ranks, and she’d nearly lost an ally in Butler—she would have killed him outright had Cassandra not interfered on Eleanor’s behalf. She’d been too hard, and somehow Cassandra of all people compelled her to soften* her stance, for the girl.

Eleanor. Leliana handled a great deal of Butler’s questioning and now Cassandra was with their Venatori friend since he was a Mage. Leliana could get creative enough on her own but the Seeker’s Gift was much more effective and Leliana could scarcely stomach another moment in the Chantry dungeons. Josie had seen fit to schedule a lunch date with Eleanor for this afternoon, just the girl and Leliana. It was irksome, Leliana was hardly in the mood to attempt entertaining the young Herald but she had told Josephine to do so. It was not Josie’s fault she could not be made aware of the work Leliana and Cassandra had been seeing to—when Leliana informed her Cassandra would be handling the rest of their private business, Josie’d been delighted because Cremisius’s report had come in for the evening—Eleanor was awake, and all was well, and after all the trouble among her companions, wouldn’t it be nice for her to come have lunch with Leliana, a private stress-free affair?

If she did not love Josie with such ferocity it could drive the Spymaster to her very wits end, she would kill the Antivan woman for making such a suggestion and looking so very earnest about it. She was so excited Leliana had agreed to try and get to know the Herald more, that the Orlesian woman could not bring herself to disappoint her friend. Ugh.

She was exhausted, and Maker she was so enraged. How? How had this all happened? How had she not realized Rainier was a fraud? How could she have ever thought Butler could cross her? How had Farrier made her blind to his own betrayal? How in the world had her ranks been infiltrated by Venatori? The ‘Hows’ of her failures were ever rising, more and more as the days progressed. Questions of her abilities, or their lack. Her lack.

How had she not been there, at Justinia’s side? How had she not defended the woman who meant the most to her in all the world?

How had Eleanor been where she had not, risen to Justinia’s defense in Leliana’s stead? A girl who had not so much as killed another living person in all her life, had probably faced nothing more serious than a street fight before, she’d drawn her weapon and faced down whatever monstrous thing stole Justinia from them all, destroyed the Temple of Sacred Ashes, left none survive save the Herald.

Perhaps that was why the Maker saved her. For all she did not spend time with the girl, Cassandra was quick to assume Leliana knew nothing at all of Eleanor. She did know, some at least. Enough, she thought. Through the detailed reports delivered to her nightly—from Marehis, Cassandra, Cremisius. She did not merely coast her eyes across the pages to be certain they were accounted for, to make a few blasé updates to her security protocols. She read them, every word. They gave Leliana a view into the girl’s sense of justice, her spirit, her unshakable faith in the Maker, and perhaps these were the reasons she was captured in the Maker’s hand, held safe until danger passed, released from the heavens to save them all. But how had He looked upon the souls of those in attendance at the Conclave, weighed them for purity and strength, and not chosen Justinia to live?

But Cassandra had not been entirely misled in her accusations of Leliana. She’d feared Leliana disliked Eleanor, perhaps hated the girl. In truth, Leliana had, it had been nothing but struggle for her to be amicable with the girl in the days that followed her waking after the Breach. Leliana had hated her, absolutely, it was the form her grief had taken to despise the girl for things that were not her fault—hatred the moment she first laid eyes on her, because she must have destroyed the Conclave and killed Justinia, and then hatred still because she hadn’t done either of those things and now they had no clue as to who was responsible. That worked its way down to stinging resentment yes, but that had now dissolved into what Leliana felt was careful detachment. Well. Perhaps not detachment entirely. She did like the girl, to some extent at least.

When Leliana emerged from the Chantry into the blinding light of Haven the noon sun was casting violent rays against the snow so brightly it demanded all the eye’s attention, left no room for the sickly glow of the breach to contaminate the air. Even as the ghastly thing hang overhead, the sun shone brighter than it, and it was only at night, when Leliana walked the paths to the very edge of Haven estate, where no firelight was found, that the green of the Breach was unrelenting.

Being blinded was certainly not what she most desired in the moment, it made the pound of her headache all the more intense, snap and strain against her tolerance. She wanted to hurt something, someone, eat a good meal, and go to sleep. As it was she was uncertain she could even speak a peaceable word in another living person’s direction. Could she somehow manage entertaining her guests in silence? This was exactly what she’d hoped to avoid, she was most certain if she elected to speak it’d be harsh and bitingly to the point and while it would certainly offer a bit of stress relief she hardly wanted the outlet to be Eleanor.

The girl stood in wait before Leliana’s station out front of the Chantry, chatting enthusiastically with her bodyguard, hands gesturing excitedly as she recounted something that had she and her audience enraptured—not too much though, it was clear the young man cared very much about what Eleanor had to say to him, was listening intently enjoying the delight of her storytelling, but he was ever vigilant, keeping track of the few soldiers and Chantry Sisters roaming the area, Leliana knew the instant she stepped foot out the Chantry doors there were eyes on her, and she realized it had been the Lieutenant, keeping watch of just who might be coming up from behind the Herald before he assessed she was safe and returned his gaze to Eleanor.

“-cut the fuse too short before he lit it and BOOM!” she slapped her hands together, jumping in place for emphasis, “The firework blasts off in one direction and Sam’s sent flying back the other—his face would be non-existent if I hadn’t cast Barrier at like the last second—his are robes on fire, and he’s laughing like a total maniac! Needless to say, the entire thing got a lot of attention from the town guards. So Mabel grabs a bottle of whisky smashes it against a tree and shouts, ‘Scatter!’ which personally I think is just a waste of some perfectly good whisky, but it did the trick. The twelve of us all take off in different directions, and I’m like so so close to getting away but I look back to see if Sam’s making it okay and BAM!” punched the palm of her Marked hand, “right into a tree! Woke up in an infirmary thinking I’m totally toast because of my staff, but the guards thought I just needed it to navigate—they thought I was blind!”

“Well they did see you slam face first into a tree,” the Lieutenant chuckled.

“It was dark, and I couldn’t see where I was going!”

“…could be said of many blind people I’m pretty sure.”

Leliana felt a tug at the corners of her lips. This was all…interesting information. The girl was so very polite and well behaved a great majority of the time Leliana had seen her. It was almost amusing how very clearly Leliana could picture Eleanor among a group of friends set on mischief, causing sound-barrier breaking havoc, and getting apprehended and delivered from suspicion in such a clumsy fashion.

“Am I interrupting?” Leliana asked as she approached, almost surprised at how easily the words came from her. Something about Eleanor’s enthusiasm must have been catching. The girl whirled around, and Leliana wasn’t sure if she was startled or excited, her eyes were wide and alive.

“Oh! Of course not!” Eleanor insisted cheerfully. Ahh, excited. “Good morning Sister Leliana! Or is it afternoon now, because lunch, right?” Giving Eleanor the day off seemed to worsen her inability to keep track of time, though the girl wasn’t dressed much like she had the day to herself. Her face was clean—freshly so like she’d cleaned up before their meeting—hair as wild as she’d ever seen it, but she’d obviously tried to get it under control, it was clean—and she was wearing one of the nicer outfits designed for meetings with nobility, purple suited her complexion. Huh. She’d obviously put a good deal effort to prepare for their meeting.

It was almost annoying the way she could practically hear Cassandra’s claim that the girl admired her in her mind now, but it would seem on some level she had made some good impression upon Eleanor. It made the Spymaster think she should at least attempt to be hospitable. Made her feel more hospitable.

“It is. Good afternoon. Lunch should be here shortly.” Josie put out the order just as Leliana was getting ready to meet the Herald. Leliana passed the young people and entered her tent, moving ahead of them to pile together the documents laying out on her desk, stacking them neatly before slipping them into a leather journal and smoothly sliding it into a drawer. “Please, be seated.”

There were a few chairs and the Lieutenant pulled one out for Eleanor before taking the seat next to her, he sat with his back to the back corner of the tent though, instead of facing the table, so he could see the entire opening of the tent, a tactical position Leliana herself would have taken but he’d beaten her to it she supposed. He was diligent enough, so she sat at the end of the table, her back to the entrance as she faced Eleanor.

“Thank you, for inviting me to lunch!” the girl thought to say sincerely, she had her gloved hands clasped together on the table before her tightly, and Leliana was amused by the impression that the girl would be bouncing in excitement but was endeavoring to contain herself.

“I’m pleased you could join me,” Leliana replied politely. She hadn’t been looking forward to their meeting but as it happened…it wasn’t entirely horrible.

Well, while Eleanor had been exuberant in her greeting her thanks, still so in her demeanor, now she seemed uncertain as to what to say. Leliana wasn’t sure what she could offer the girl, outside of work chatter and there was nothing to discuss, nothing of use just between the two of them.

“How’s your day going?” Eleanor settled for asking, in earnest, in the way Josie does—genuinely hoping her friend’s day is going well, willing to listen if Leliana is inclined to share. She rarely could, most of her dealings were matters of secrecy but the Lady Montilyet always offered up the opportunity in the rare event Leliana could share her troubles or triumphs.

“Well enough,” she chose to answer lightly, there was nothing she could share with Eleanor, certainly. “Yours? I do hope you’re enjoying your day off?”
The girl relaxed a bit at Leliana’s offered interest and nodded. “Uh-huh! We went to see the baby Druffalos—they’ve gotten so big!” she was delighted to report. And then, “Have you ever played tag?”

What a question, it almost made Leliana want to laugh. As it was, she did smile ever-so-slightly. “Not recently but I do recall enjoying the game in my youth.”

“Sera taught me how to play when we were on the coast! So we played again today, it was really fun! And Cremisius says he’s going to teach me how to knit later,” she seemed very excited at the prospect.

Knitting? “Really?”

“Yup! Do you think you can teach me how to make hats?” she asked the Tevinter man.

He seemed to consider it a moment, “I don’t see why not, but it might be a difficult first project.”

That didn’t seem to dissuade her. “It’s okay if it’s hard! I like learning new things, as long as you don’t get bored teaching me or something.”

Somehow Leliana couldn’t imagine the young man classifying time spent with Eleanor as boring. Josie was practically giddy over the rumor among the Herald’s companions that the pair had a crush on one another. Leliana had been concerned that the young man’s infatuation would make him incompatible to the job he was given but he’d done admirably well thus far.

“I wish you well in the endeavor,” Leliana said, “I never much cared for the practice myself but,” perhaps her words were coming to her too easily now. A sort of pang in her chest when the words came to her, she almost didn’t say it, let the sentence die but she couldn’t bring herself to abandon something that held a piece of her mentor, even just her name, “Justinia enjoyed knitting in her down time, for as long as I knew her. She would make things to donate to Chantry clothing drives, hats and scarves and the like.”

Her eyes lit up at that. “Oh, wow, really?” Eleanor asked in tones of gratitude and it caused Leliana to wonder if the girl had ever needed to use such means to clothe herself. Something told her she undoubtedly had. It made her wonder if perhaps, by some strange coincidence something made by Justinia’s hands had ever clothed the girl, her donations were distributed to poorer parts of the world in and outside of Orlais. If Josie had her way, the girl would never rely on the kindness of strangers in such a way, ever again Leliana thought. When Eleanor was first brought into the Inquisition’s care, and Josie joined their movement, she’d taken all but one look at the girl she’d gone to see while she recovered after their assault on the Breach, and the dusk of Eleanor’s skin had reminded Josephine of her own complexion, “She cannot be older than Yvette, Antoine?” she’d rasped out to Leliana. She immediately reached out to see to it she would have proper clothing. She took pride in being able to assemble the girl’s schedule each day, that in some way Josephine was able to make sure the girl had a proper education and all of her needs met, and Leliana kept her appraised to the reports on Eleanor’s wellbeing on the days the girl’s schedule kept her from seeing Josephine herself.

“That was sweet of her!”

For a moment Leliana thought the girl was referencing Josephine, before her mind brought her sluggishly back around to the fact they’d been speaking of Justinia. “She was generous and kind,” Leliana agreed.
Eleanor bit her lip then, a little nervous to touch on the subject but she said, “I um…I’m really sorry I can’t remember meeting her but everything I’ve heard, Divine Justinia was an incredible person. I’m…I’m sorry. That I couldn’t um, save her.”

It hadn’t been her job to do so. “You are not to blame for Justinia’s passing,” the words hurt to say—in the way it hurts for a Healer to set a bone or clean a wound, because they were true and solidified the idea for the Spymaster. Leliana had longed to blame someone within her grasp for Justinia’s death, if Eleanor could be found at fault, her vengeance would have been easily wrought. “We will find the one responsible, I promise you that,” she cleared her throat, before quietly commending, “You endeavored, it seemed from the vision we saw at the Breach, to come to Justinia’s aid. For that I’m grateful.” Grateful, and ashamed. It should have been her. It couldn’t’ve been, she’d been assisting Cassandra in Haven, dealing with Varric, working with her people to confirm his stories. They should have been with the Divine, not hunting Hawke.

“Still, I mean. Just,” the girl was staring into lap she admitted, “If anyone could have walked away from the Conclave, if there was a choice, I’d want the Divine to have survived.” The Lieutenant looked alarmed by her words.

Oh. Leliana realized it then. She wouldn’t have without hearing the words come from Eleanor’s mouth, but… Leliana had wished the very thing. Wished that it had been Justinia who survived but what she had not realized was, it was an ache she felt in her soul, something that tormented her when she lay awake unable to find sleep. But she hadn’t realized, to wish Justinia had survived instead—instead—was to wish that Eleanor herself had died.

If Justinia had been given the choice—if she had known there was a young mage girl, her entire life ahead of her, compassionate and persevering, full of faith in the Maker Most-Holy loved so dearly, who would have died at the Conclave, been given the choice to either save herself or save that girl, Justinia would not have hesitated to sacrifice herself for Eleanor. And it would anguish Justinia to think that Eleanor would wish likewise, that the girl would wish she could have taken the Divines place, that her life was secured only to live on to consider her survival a bit of misfortune.

Justinia would not have wanted that and neither did Leliana.

“I grieve for Justinia. A part of me always will, but I am not…” another truth, a painful balm to confess, “I am not sorry that you survived, Eleanor.”

She looked up at her then, surprised, like she truly believed Leliana had to resent her. Leliana had, unfathomably, so much so if she focused on it she could revive the feeling of hatred she once held on to like her life depended on it, but it was not so anymore.

Eleanor smiled softly and said, “Thanks. I…I know this isn’t an ideal situation, but I’m really really grateful that I’ve gotten to meet all the people I have through the Inquisition. I’m glad I got to meet you,” she admitted bashfully.

“I’m glad of it as well,” she found herself saying, almost as if she’d been compelled. She suppose she had been…the words were true enough.

Flissa came then, rolling a cart laden with steaming plates of food she placed before them. “Thanks, Flissa!” Eleanor spoke ardently to the woman.

“Certainly, my lady,” Flissa returned, dipping a curtsey to Eleanor before gasping as she looked between the cart and their empty cups, “Oh! I’d lose my head if it weren’t attached! Drinks!
Water will be along shortly!” the barmaid promised, scurrying away with the cart.

“Shall we?” Leliana prompted.

Eleanor nodded held out her hands to Leliana and the Lieutenant, and they silently prayed over their meals before digging in.

Water did come along shortly. A man in plainclothes bearing a pitcher from Flissa’s approached. He bowed his head respectfully as he poured water into their cups to the tune of Eleanor thanking him, she’d been parched. However, the Lieutenant took a cup in one hand and put his other on Eleanor’s thigh—Leliana wouldn’t have seen it if the movement hadn’t caught her eye because her first instinct was indignation, that that was certainly bold of the young man. But his hand wasn’t really touching anything it shouldn’t be, his grip on her thigh flexed three times, and that was the action that gave the girl pause, like a signal. She’d been moving to take a drink of water but stopped then, setting her cup down and looking to her bodyguard.

His eyes were on the serving man as he finished pouring water into Leliana’s cup. “Longue vie à l’empereur,” the Lieutenant said delivering the Ciriane* words in light, casual tones, accent spot on, and he looked almost relaxed as he raised his mug in toast. Long live the emperor. Emperor…not Empress. A call to supporters of Duke Gaspard. Leliana tensed in her seat, hands slipping to reach for her daggers.

“Peut-il régner,” May he reign, the servant responded in reflex, realizing a second too late his mistake.

Lieutenant Aclassi threw his drink in the man’s face before rushing him, putting himself between Eleanor and the supposed servant who was working to draw a blade but the Tevinter man dealt him a solid blow to the face which cast him to the ground and the Lieutenant was on him, flipping the man onto his stomach and grappling him into a chokehold until he laid unconscious.

“Cremisius?” Eleanor asked, rising from her chair.

“I got him Ellie, it’s alright,” the Lieutenant confirmed as he released his hold on the man letting his face fall into the dirt.

“Are you alright?” was what she had been concerned of.

The Tevinter man rose to his feet dusting his armor off a bit, “All good here. Can’t say the same for this poor sod, where’d you want him, Sister Leliana?”

The Spymaster had risen from her seat and was rifling through a drawer in her desk, pulling out a testing kit. A translucent tincture that gained pigment when interacting with poisons. She doused the edge of one of their napkins in the stuff before dipping it into Eleanor’s abandoned drink and it turned a very telling shade of black.

“It would seem the Duke’s people favor Hemlock these days,” she reported darkly, staring at the unconscious man before looking to the Lieutenant, “have the Chantry guards escort him to a cell for questioning.”

Lieutenant Aclassi nodded, waving along the guards posted outside the Chantry, helping them get the man restrained before going and throwing the Chantry doors open for them to carry the man away. He met Leliana’s eye before looking to Eleanor and then back again seeking confirmation Leliana would keep watch of her for a moment, and the young man jogged down the path toward the Tavern, to make sure nothing had happened to Flissa Leliana realized then.
“Gosh, Hemlock’s bad right?” Eleanor asked.

“It is indeed, very bad,” Leliana confirmed. Judging from how quickly, darkly the tincture interacted with Eleanor’s drink, at this concentration, the Herald would have suffered convulsions mere seconds after her body began digesting it, been dead before her body hit the ground.

“That was…that was something to do with my dealings with the Empress? Duke Gaspard did this?”

“I intend to find out,” was as much as Leliana was willing to share with the girl.

The Lieutenant rejoined them then, “Flissa’s safe,” he reported, “she swears she thought she set a pitcher of water out to put on the cart—when she didn’t find it forgotten at the bar she went to get fresh from the pump, she was just on her way back when I checked on her.”

Eleanor looked mildly horrified like she hadn’t even considered Flissa may have been interfered with to get to her. It sent her hugging the Lieutenant fiercely, arms tight around his midsection. He hugged her back, around her shoulders, a hand resting on the crown of her head.

“Thank you, thank you, thank you!” she breathed.

“How did you realize something was amiss?” Leliana asked, satisfied with the outcome though she certainly wished to know how he’d spotted the assassin.

Eleanor leaned back a bit to look up at him, and the Lieutenant shrugged, explaining, “Didn’t recognize him from anywhere around Haven. He certainly hadn’t been working this morning, and shifts don’t change for at least another hour. Security protocol says Flissa’s under orders not to entrust Ellie’s food and drink be delivered by anyone other than her, Marehis or Ellie’s party members now anyway so. Couple decent red flags, but thought I’d double check before taking him down.”

Ahh yes, the Ciriane had been very clever, given her a direction to move in once she got to questioning—the man was possibly Orlesian, definitely a follower of Duke Gaspard, if he wasn’t working directly for the man himself he was working for an ally, it could have taken hours to get that information in interrogation. “Very good,” Leliana complimented. “Eleanor, I apologize but it would seem our luncheon must be cut short, I’ve work to see to.” She had to make certain this was a contained threat and not something that expanded across their ranks like the Farrier situation, and that more such assassins were not waiting in the wings for their chance at the Herald. “But,” she said, resting a hand on the girl’s shoulder, prompting her to look at her. “I would very much like to continue this at a later date.”

Eleanor seemed elated at the offer, she pulled away from Cremisius, placed her hand over Leliana’s on her shoulder for a moment, “Really? That’d be great! Just, you know, maybe no poison next time,” she jested lightly before turning away to look at their abandoned lunch. “Oh! The food is still alright isn’t it? You should at least take it with you? Or I can put in an order for you at Flissa’s?”

“For safety’s sake, since it’s now been surrounded by contaminants it would be best to dispose of our meals entirely,” Leliana said, “I’ll send someone to get rid of everything,” and then, it was true she should eat properly before questioning her guest, and Eleanor seemed eager to be of assistance. So, “If you dine in the Tavern, yes, I’d appreciate your placing an order for me.”
Lunch in the Tavern with everyone was good, Bull thought, he’d wanted to get a feel for how his guys, Skinner in particular, would mix with Rainier’s presence. Krem’d had an idea Bull was thinking of going for, but he was still considering. Wasn’t important right now. They’d been finishing their meals, damn that Flissa could cook, when Bull’d heard a bit of ruckus, almost gone to check in but it sounded like Krem had it well in hand, back to business. Too bad. Been uh…nice, seeing the guy cut loose a bit that morning, act more his age. Playing around with friends, carefree with the girl he liked. Guy’d been sort of catapulted into adulthood, having to hold everything down on his own. Bull didn’t know a whole lot about his life before, didn’t ask, did his best to make sure Krem knew he was all ears if he ever needed, without pressing. Got the impression his father was gone, since he took responsibility for the welfare of his mother…got the impression if he ever met the woman he’d be glad there’s no such thing as mothers under the Qun. Between that and military life, some days, especially when they first met Krem came off like a man of seventy not seventeen*. Knowing Krem was what had surprised Bull so much about Ellie being not a whole lot younger than him. Humans had so much variety it was interesting to see Krem and the Boss-girl side by side—his head was parallel to Bull’s shoulder, Ellie had to be an entire foot or more shorter than that but was a little younger than Krem’d been when they first met, made Bull wonder if she’d ever shoot up like that. First month or two rolling with the Chargers, Krem’d shot up like a damn weed, had to be reoutfitted more than once, but he took good care of his shit, was responsible so Bull didn’t have any problem helping him out, fudged the numbers a bit in his bookkeeping when the boy’s growth spurt broke their usual upkeep budget, quietly dipped into his own pay to settle the difference, the guy had mad pride, didn’t ask for help, but he had enough on his plate and it wasn’t like Bull wouldn’t do the same for any of the others.

They were all just sitting around talking when Krem escorted Boss into the Tavern. Didn’t smell like either of them had been hurt, bit of adrenaline still rolled off Krem, gaze carefully sweeping the entirety of the Tavern like part of him expected an assassin to come leaping out of the chimney or something, but only other person in the Tavern aside from their motley crew was Flissa—second Skinner came through the door everyone else scattered, made themselves scarce. She’d instilled quite a bit of fear in the general population after losing her shit on a total of six soldiers at one time. Woman knew how to clear a room.

Boss looked restless as shit. Fists clenched tight at her sides. Anxious, possibly pissed.

“Hey boss, what’s up?” Bull called out from where he was seated between Rainier and Stitches, Grim and Sera sat on the ends of the table, Skinner sitting in the seat next to Grim, across the table from Thom, sort of watching the Human man in a way that seemed to be making him increasingly uncomfortable. Pretty good behavior all things considered.

Ellie didn’t say anything in response to him at first, lips pressed into a solid line. “I’ll put in our orders, Spymaster’s too, you go ahead and take a seat okay?” Krem spoke in her ear, he put his arm around her shoulders, gave her arm a quick squeeze when she nodded. Shit, they hadn’t even gotten the chance to eat huh. She joined their table, plopping down next to Skinner.

Flissa seemed to already be one step ahead of Krem, as he approached the bar she was picking up a tray to rush to the Chantry for Leliana and she promised she’d be right back to get them some food as well.

“Red have to cancel?” Bull confirmed.

Kid huffed. Angry little sound and then, “Yep! Some jerk tried to assassin me!”
Figured as much but still, “…tried to…‘assassin’ you?” he wasn’t certain he should be concerned, or if he was more so amused, figured he should maybe make light to make her feel better, seeing him keep his cool might help her not get caught up in everyone else’s impending panic—cue;

“What?!” Sera screeched, slamming her hands on the table top as she leapt to her feet, leaning forward on the palms of her hands as she looked Ellie over.

“You were attacked?” Rainier rasped out, alarmed, likewise trying to see if he could perceive of any injury.

“Mhmm,” Ellie confirmed with a nod, “Cremisius stopped him though, kicked his butt—You kicked his butt real good, Cremisius!” she commended as Krem took a seat next to her, resting his arm along the back of her chair.

Real good huh? He supposed he had, damn good, made Bull damn proud just hearing the encounter, Krem’d been quick. Shit like that, you had to work fast, good move on his part going for surprise—sounded like a poisoning attempt but people usually had more than one contingency plan, asshole could’ve slit Ellie’s throat if it’d been given away too soon that he’d caught on. “It was my pleasure,” Krem assured her, though it looked like he wished he could have waled on the guy. Security protocols dictated threats were supposed to be neutralized with as minimal force as possible, so they could be brought in for questioning. Made sense, wasn’t super satisfying though. Bull felt that.

“Who?” Skinner asked, fists clenched, she scooted back in her seat like she was ready to jump up and go fight whoever Boss named. Good ol’ Skinner.

“Neither of you are hurt, I hope,” Stitches asked, looking between the two of them as if he were decently sure they’d’ve covered that ground first thing, but he had to check to make sure. Krem splayed his hand, pressed his thumb to his chest, the sign Grim taught them for ‘fine’. Fucking sign language was boss.

“Guy tried to poison Ellie,” Krem started to explain but that sent Boss gasping. She looked like she’d just realized something and then, “Tried to poison us! He could have killed you and Leliana too! Oh!” she growled in frustration, shouting, “That’s it! The next person who thinks they can mess with my lunch dates or hurt my friends is getting my foot right up their butts! Just!” she punched a fist into the air to demonstrate, “Wham! Like that but feet! Can I punch that guy? I wanna punch him!” she appealed to Krem, like he had a say in the matter.

Guy struggled not to smile at her wrathful enthusiasm, and there was a little levity in his voice as he said, “I’d be happy to oblige but he’s in Leliana’s care now.”

She didn’t look entirely appeased with that. “I hope she punches him. In the face!” she specified, “If he has such a problem with me he should come fight me himself! I’ll fight him! I’ll fight him twice!” she sounded dead-set on the idea.

“Official duels don’t really work like that, Boss,” Bull saw fit to informed her, and then his eye went a bit wide because she…shit Boss could glare, and she was currently doing so right at him. Damn. Pretty good.

Angry huff again and then she crossed her arms on the table, burying her glare there and then there was a muffled, growl “Ugh!” and “Sera!”
“Wan’ me to go shoot him? Or break you into his cell?” Sera rattled off guesses and then she gave a little whooping sound and jumped up from leaning against the table, “Inky needs a swear word?” she asked, excited.

“Big one!”

“Fuck!” Sera shouted gleefully on Ellie’s behalf.

Ellie’s shoulders heaved with a sigh of relief and then, quiet, “Thanks.”

Let her sit like that a minute, see if she’d vented enough before checking, “Still mad, boss?” Bull asked.

That had her sitting up again to look at him, “Yeah I’m still mad! I’m p- p-” pissed it seemed she wanted to say but she stumbled over the word and settled on, “particularly furious! If Gaspard or his friends wanted to come after me because they don’t like who I choose to play nice with, fine yeah, I get that, it’s sort of what I signed up for. Lots of people have lots of reasons for doing that so I don’t take it too personally,” she banged a fist on the table, shouting, the words falling thick from her lips, “But they shouldn’t’ve done something that endangered everyone else too! It wasn’t Cremisius or Leliana that miffed off half the Orlesian nobility, it was me, if they have a problem with it, they’re welcome to pop off at me! Not my friends!”

Ahh. Bull reached out a hand and laid it on her arms, palming her crossed wrists, his thumb brushed back and forth along the back of her forearm an action meant to soothe. “Where are we at right now?”

Boss seemed confused, she almost looked like she might yell at him, but she only offered up a rough, snippy, “The tavern?”

Kind of fun to hear her sounding like a pissy teen but that wasn’t her usual style. “Yup. You feel the chair under you? The table, my hand?” he listed for her, and she nodded. “Who’re you with?”

A bit more calmly, a sort of realization dawning in her features, she swallowed and said, “My friends.”

“And are we all safe?” Bull asked her, reminded her.

She nodded again and visibly relaxed in her seat, seeming subdued. “Yeah,” she admitted, her voice sounded tight and Krem settled a hand on her back to rest between her shoulder blades, wanting to comfort, not sure if she was mad or sad or okay now. “We’re all safe,” Ellie confirmed with a little sigh.

“Oh Inky!” Sera cooed, coming around and Krem had to pull his hand away from Boss’s back before it got wedged between her and Sera’s business as the Elf girl hugged Ellie from behind, arms around her neck, nuzzling her cheek against the top of the Human girl’s head, snuggling her as she asked, “Getting almost assassined got you all brain-wheezy huh?”

Yup. Pretty much. Had enough experience to know sometimes panic attacks weren’t always panic presenting. Sometimes shit came out in different ways. Krem put a hand on Ellie’s arm, one two three, some kind of signal and she nodded, though she seemed a little uncertain about it.

“Did it?” Ellie asked, looking to Bull for clarification. “I mean that didn’t really feel like um. Usual.”
“Things like that can manifest as anger,” Bull explained lightly, “You’re right to be mad, it’s some messed up stuff. Blowing off steam, getting it off your chest wasn’t getting you through it though, you got stuck dwelling on past danger—the threat to those around you that has been prevented.” He shrugged. “Can’t dwell on that stuff too long.”

“Thanks, the Iron Bull,” Ellie said sounding like she had herself more in hand. “I feel better now,” and shit if there was a bit of humor in her smile when she said, “Though if we don’t eat soon I’m probably going to flip my stuff again.”

Grim silently scooted his plate over to the Boss-girl, offering up his left-over potatoes.

Ellie seemed to be feeling better, they’d eaten, chatted, joked around and now she was hugging Krem’s arm tightly as they walked back to her cabin—he was glad she was so agreeable his suggestion of heading back in for the day. Morning’d been plenty of fun, he hadn’t played around like that in ages, but he was nervous having Ellie out in the open after an attempt on her life, he was hoping Leliana would be able to update her security protocols soon, have a full report on just what to expect. It’d been a pretty drastic attempt, genuine. It could be a fucked-up warning of sorts, or it could be the first of many. All the ‘ifs’ made him glad Ellie was eager to get back to her cabin—she was excited, he was going to teach her how to knit. Maker help him he was going to try. He did well enough he thought, helping Bull run drills with the Chargers, but that was about as close to ‘teacher’ as he got and even then it was more like an assistant.

Though…there was something he’d sort of had on his mind, he’d thought about it on and off since meeting her, gone back and forth about outright asking but she’d brought up that friend of hers—Sam, apostate fellow who nearly blew himself up with fireworks was the same friend who had to charm a necklace to tell him when it was time to stretch when binding.

“So…” he’d asked carefully, as they walked arm in arm, down the path ‘round the Tavern, “coming up with someone like Sam…that’s how you knew, when we met?”

“Hmm…yes and no,” she said thinking it over before explaining squeezing his arm in a bit of a hug, “Magic and I communicate all the time, we observe the world together, it gets information from me and the way I see things, and I get information from it. First time I met Sam, he wasn’t out yet, might not have even really known or understood himself—he was wearing his school dress when I first saw him, so I got the wrong idea, but my magic said ‘boy’ and magic is always right. Now, when I saw you, we both saw ‘man’,” she said, explaining quietly, discrete, “my magic added ‘like Sam’—not like a judgement or anything just an observation,” she assured him. “I wouldn’t’ve said anything, never ever unless you wanted to disclose to me. I’m sorry I didn’t give you the opportunity to do so. I was just scared you might be, you know binding and worse—that you might not be doing so safely, with like bandaging or something, on top of being sick, that can get so dangerous. I hope I didn’t overstep or hurt y—”

“Ellie, hush. You were great. I wasn’t offended and honestly I’m glad to not have it hanging over my head,” Krem said, patting her arm. “There’s always a bit of worry, you know? People not knowing and what their reaction might be if they were to find out,” it felt stupid, self-indulgent, or maybe just vulnerable but he still found himself asking, “so you…you saw me as a man?”
“You are a man no matter how anyone sees you,” Ellie told him firmly as they reached her cabin door, like she knew it was important he know that. And then, “But yeah, of course I did…” she seemed shy to say, even as she shrugged, “You’re very handsome, Cremisius.”

Well that…um…yeah. Liked her calling him handsome even more than when she’d said as much about his name. “Well uh, thanks. Er…you um, let’s get you in, I’ll post guards and be back with my knitting supplies in a jiff.”

…In a jiff. Maker help him, girl said he was handsome and now he’s using words like jiff. Smooth.

Did a quick look-around her room to make sure everything was to rights and guards arrived shortly to take up post—he planned to keep them around for the rest of the day just in case, switch them out with fresh guards before he left her for the evening—then he dashed off to his bunk, grabbed his knitting supplies. Huh. When he was heading back, Bull, Chargers, were coming back to camp with plans to play Wicked Grace, and Rainier’d been invited along. Good sign, Krem thumped a fist to Bull’s shoulder as he passed in thanks, right good of him to really put an effort in considering Krem’s idea. When he returned to the cabin, Ellie’d taken the opportunity to change into the sort of softer, cozier tunic and breeches she used for sleeping.

“You fancy a nap?” he asked her humorously, though it wouldn’t be unthinkable she’d be beat, they’d had a sort of wild day. Lesson could be put off for a bit if she needed to rest.

She shook her head, “Nah, fancier clothes are beautiful, but I’m sort of done with going out today unless we have to, you know?”

“You’ve nothing left to do today, I can always send out an order for dinner later.”

Ellie gave a happy little whoop and then she set about making a bit of a nest of sorts on her bed—learning and lazing she called it. She got her pillows set up along the wall and she settled in back against a pillow, blankets draped across her legs and she patted the empty space next to her, he could relax too, she said, he was keeping the guards around after all.

True. He’d have to remove his gauntlets for knitting anyway and he decided it was safe enough to take off his chest plate, wearing a cotton tunic underneath. He wasn’t too worried about another attack today with backup on hand and everyone on high alert. And a benefit of his binder was that it was made of leather—it’d stopped blades from cutting into him before when he was caught out of armor. Something Bull’d seen to having made for him, when he joined up. Stitches was absolutely horrified that Krem’d been using bandages for binding before then, proper binder made a world of difference.

He set his armor on Ellie’s desk, stoked the fire to get it going warm again before joining her. Ellie shared her blankets with him, laying them across their legs, and in return, he offered her the knitting needles she’d need for making a hat, the sort bound together by a wire.

She wanted to make a hat, for the Commander, it turned out, he’d wondered why she’d been so keen on taking him up on the offer after talking with the man. He worked outside most of the day and it was so super cold, and it didn’t seem like he had a hat, she said. And she liked the idea, being able to make things that could help people stay warm.

Ellie watched carefully as Krem showed her how to cast on the yarn, using a different set of needles so she’d be able to try doing it herself with her own. It was ‘a little tricky’—her words—but she got it, and then he helped her get her first row of connected stitches, giving her directions, though he found it easier use his hands to correct her fingers as she wove grey yarn between them. and onto the needle. She dropped a few stitches, and he almost wish she’d drop more, it gave him a stupid sort of pride, how amazed she was over him being able to help her fix it, and it earned him another kiss on the cheek at one point. She caught on well enough to be left to her own devices though and soon he was back to working on his own project, pleased when she said the warm evergreen yarn he was using was ‘very pretty’. He certainly hoped so, Bull’d just about busted a lung laughing his ass off at him when Krem’d asked him if he knew what Ellie’s favorite color was. Ass. Owed him everything, would die for that stupid Qunari in a heartbeat, but he was still an ass.

They worked in pleasant silence because it took a lot of concentration, at least on Ellie’s part. Krem could probably do this in his sleep by now, the click, clatter and shuffle of knitting needles a smooth rhythm in his hands that Ellie seemed impressed by. It was still almost distracting to watch her work, she was getting the hang of it and seemed to be having fun, hyper-focused on each stitch she made, lip catching between her teeth when she thought she was close to messing up.
There was this excited little wiggle-dance she did when she finished a row of stitches and then she’d turn and show him her project, leveling him a blinding smile when he’d look it over to make sure she’d gotten it right.

She stopped her knitting for just a second, before turning to him and asking, “What got you interested in knitting in the first place? How’d you learn?” sounding truly interested, so that gave him pause when his first instinct was to shrug and sidestep.

“Well,” he said, keeping his eyes trained on his own project as he spoke, “my father was a tailor. So, when I was littler I took a great interest in everything to do with his trade, sewing and the like. My mother used that to get me to sit down and knit with her by saying it was similar to what father did, I could make a great many things if I learned how to knit and it would help me to occupy my time,” he said the words ruefully. “For later once I was married and spending my days minding children.”

Ellie looked insulted on his behalf, sort of blustered momentarily, “She didn’t mean…I mean…”

“Mother never really understood what was going on with me,” he explained. She couldn’t at first, and then wouldn’t. “Not the ideal situation. But, I got knitting out of it, found I actually enjoyed the activity despite the spirit the craft was taught to me with,” he shrugged. “Turns out I enough time to pass between…” the thought sort of struck him then, “oh Maker. I’m basically married to Bull and minding the Chargers.” He snorted. Mother’d almost be proud.

“Technically,” Ellie said, “you only watch after the Chargers when the Iron Bull isn’t around so…if we’re talking traditional roles…mother minds the children, father steps in when she’s away…”

His hands stilled, and he looked to her. Oh sweet Maker above, “You don’t mean—”

“You’re the Charger’s dad,” she informed him sagely, “The Iron Bull’s the mom.”

“Bull’s the mom! Ha!” he pounded his fist against the cabin wall and called out, “You hear that you great grey bastard! You’re the mom!”

Ellie’d been laughing but then she gasped in surprise, whispering, “He can’t really hear us from in here, can he?”

“Nah,” he waved the idea off, “If he was right outside maybe.”
She nodded and then she seemed a bit thoughtful before saying, “Um…I didn’t mean to bring up something uncomfortable for you if…if I ever ask something you’d rather not answer you don’t have to.”

“I know. I wouldn’t’ve said anything unless I felt up to sharing. You uh, I dunno. I’m pretty comfortable talking to you,” he admitted, even his ears felt a little warm as he said it. “Same thing goes for you though, I mean I would like to uh, get to know you, but if past stuff bothers you, I ask something I shouldn’t, just you know. Tell me to shut it.”

So they talked. For hours. Their projects got abandoned, Ellie said she wasn’t quite sure she could listen very well to him while knitting, so she laid her half-a-hat down and he packed his project away too, opting to instead take a hold of her unmarked hand. It was nice, soothing and she didn’t seem put off, she was already sitting right up against him like she had when they’d talked the other night. Bit different, having his armor off, he could feel her warmth, through his shirt. Sort of relaxing really, made it easier to talk somehow.

“How’d you and the Iron Bull meet?” was her first question.

He explained, he’d been in the military in Tevinter. Men and women had different roles they played, and he’d signed on as a man. Bit young, he’d only been fifteen, but it wasn’t like his gender was recognized by the government, getting in involved bribing the healer who did his physical anyway, the guy was already checking off the M box for him, bumping his age up half a year to sixteen wasn’t a big deal on top of it. But the next year’s physical came up, duty called his bribed healer away from where Krem’d been stationed, and a different healer performed his exam. Sixteen was true enough then but the Healer wouldn’t accept a buyoff to keep him from outing Krem as someone who didn’t quite meet the requirements to be in their ranks to his superiors—he’d have been enslaved or imprisoned for being unable to pay the hefty fine that came with falsifying military documents—he settled for punching his lights out and running for it.

“I’d gotten good at punching,” he said, assuring her since it seemed to be a favorite of hers, “punched him right in the face.”

“Good!” she affirmed, raising her Marked hand and giving him a high-five.

He talked about how he’d been heading for Hasmal, was close to the Tevinter-Nevarran border when a Tevinter tribune found him, wanted to make an example of him. Ellie’s hand squeezed his, thumb running across the back of his hand in a soothing motion, worry creased her brow, but he assured her, it all worked out. “I’m here aren’t I?”

She nodded and rested her head on his shoulder sort of snuggling into his side, he shifted a bit, taking her unmarked hand in his other hand as he wrapped his arm around her shoulders, and told her all about the fight of his life, and how he’d been pretty sure he was done-for, when a great honking Qunari came busting in, kicking ass, taking names, and ultimately a flail. Tevinter weapon, coming right for Krem, would’ve taken him out, Bull’d caught it and the weapon had come away with his eye.

“Crazy bastard didn’t even know me,” he shook his head. “just, busted in, saw an opportunity to kick Vint ass, saved my life, offered me a job. Guess getting my ass handed to me made an impression somehow.”

Ellie’s head rocked against his shoulder like she was shaking it, ‘no’. “You kick butt, Cremisius Aclassi. Big time. Jerk healer butt, assassin butt, Venatori butt—that hammer thing you used on the Coast was huge!”
So he might have been using his maul to be impressive. Huh. Nice to know it’d done so.

“My turn,” Krem said, “You know about my job, what about yours? What did you do, before all this?”

That got him a bit of a snort. “Eh. I could get by pretty well doing odd jobs once I got big enough people would hire me.”

“Big enough?” he asks curiously, had she some former grandiose reputation before ‘Herald of Andraste’?

“Old enough,” she elaborated, and explained about how she’d been so young when she started Fade Dreaming—shit, in Tevinter she’d probably have been fought over by Laetan families left right and center—in the Free Marches they just kicked her out, sent her away and at every turn, her mage status meant she had to keep moving, she glossed over it when he asked what happened when he got taken in by someone and they found out she was a mage, something in the ambiguity told him all he needed to know. She’d said when they met it’d always just been her. She meant always, and suddenly her being so distraught, upset with herself over her fight with Varric made more sense. The weird insecurity she had that she’d be cast aside at the drop of a hat wasn’t strange—it was precedence. She had nothing but experience after experience that told her she was disposable, that Varric could very easily cast their friendship aside, that he would leave to be rid of her.

“Before the rebellion there was always something I could do. Boring jobs for the most part, but the not-boring jobs for Apostates were usually gang-oriented or run, and I just…it’s too easy to get caught up in that, really hurt people, so I steered clear,” Ellie said, rattling off her resume, “Kitchen hand, waiting tables, sweeping up in shops, things like hauling ore or helping bring in harvest. Had a nice little job in a vineyard once maybe twoish years ago? Harvesting grapes, helping make wine, didn’t pay much but the couple running the place provided lunch and let workers have a crack at the new wine—three-day-old stuff that’s so sweet you just chug it like fruit juice until it knocks you on your butt.”

“What about after the rebellion?” he asked. Conclave didn’t happen for a good while there.

Ellie shrugged. “Got harder to avoid people finding out I was an Apostle—even everyone was on such high alert for us and it was harder to find people chill with the idea of hiring on someone like me. Too much of a liability. People had always been afraid of mages but after one basically blew up Kirkwall, the rest of us were pretty uh…”

“Screwed,” Krem offered, it seemed like one of the words she avoided.

“Yup. So, there wasn’t much work after the rebellion. Wouldn’t join a gang, couldn’t really at that point even if I’d entertained the idea. Mercenary jobs were more above board—I wasn’t much use for fighting then, but I know a good bit about healing and Barrier’s the first spell I learned to cast so I’m pretty good at it—and offers were almost steady to come by but I got burned enough times to know it wasn’t worth it. Even legit companies, hiring on Apostates under the table gives them the upper hand, someone like me, new with no clout or backing rarely got hired, and definitely didn’t get paid up front, not even half. Most of the time I wound up not getting paid in the end since it wasn’t like an Apostle could take their grievances up with the guards or a council or something.”

Shit. He’d never considered being a mage a position of weakness—in Tevinter it meant you had power and influence, here it made you vulnerable. Some assholes had her risk her neck for their mission and then cheated her out of her cut? He was half-tempted to press her for names, see if Bull knew these bastards.

“Bull’d never do something like that. Dalish gets paid same as the rest of us. ” Oh. Dalish—yeah, he wasn’t planning on making quite so much fun about her constant need to insist she was just an archer for the Chargers anymore. It really wasn’t like in Tevinter where mage status was all a person could ever hope for—Dalish’d been sent away from her Clan, had to move and keep moving like Ellie had, hiding her Apostate status. It wasn’t strange to blatantly deny her magic, it was a vital part of her survival, didn’t matter that the Chargers all knew, or that the people they worked for usually saw. If she got out of the habit of hiding and needed to later…well it was just best to stay in the habit he supposed.

“The Iron Bull’s definitely the best company leader I’ve ever met,” Ellie said.

“So, you just…what? No one would hire you?”

“Jobs got lean yeah. I wasn’t doing too hot by the time I ended up at the Conclave…little better though. Traveling with Trevelyan, he set me up with proper gear and made sure I ate.”

Wasn’t…doing too hot. Maker had she just been starving to death or something?

“Trevelyan?” he asked instead, not really wanting or needing an answer to that.

“Mage, from Ostwick Circle. He wanted to give Apostates a voice at the Conclave and I got picked to go with him. He was my friend.”

Oh. That’s how she ended up at the Conclave. “I’m sorry,” he said. Something’d bothered him since their lunch with the Spymaster. More than the assassination attempt, even. When she’d been apologizing to Leliana for the Divine’s death, she’d sounded sorry for having lived and that just, it made Krem feel almost panicked, that she might think her surviving was wrong or undeserved. “I know it’s horrible that all those people were lost at the Conclave, but that doesn’t make your survival regrettable or a mistake or something sad. They’re separate.”

“Separate?” she asked, confused.

“It seems like the ideas are clumped together—the devastation that was the Conclave with the fact that you survived it. But that’s wrong, it isn’t ‘sad so much was lost at the Conclave and you survived’. It’s sad so much was lost at the Conclave, period, end of sentence. You survived—and that’s definitely a good thing. You living, it’s…I’m glad you’re alive. You’re grateful you’ve gotten to meet all the friends you have now through the Inquisition? I’m glad I got to meet you.”

She didn’t say anything at first just sort of curled up against him more, her head tucked up under his chin and she squeezed his hand. And then very softly, enough to reassure him she understood, that he’d helped, “Thanks.”

Then, after a beat, “My turn!” she declared it, “You’ve asked like a bajillion questions—” she must have felt him smiling at her exaggeration against her hair, or maybe the huff of amusement in his chest because she defended, “don’t get smart with me Aclassi, I wasn’t actually keeping count, I just know it was way more than one.”

“That’s not terribly fair of me is it?” he asked, technically another question, the bit of mischief in his voice that got him a short indignant sigh.

“No, it isn’t fair at all, wise guy. No more questions for you! Oh. Or, from you is what I mean I guess, huh,” she waved her hands as if to dismiss her words, ‘forget all that’. And then, more serious, gently to make sure he knew she wouldn’t press for something he wasn’t willing to divulge. “Is it okay to ask why you joined the military, and like so young? You said you’d had an interest in your father’s work but being a tailor and being a soldier are two pretty different career paths.”

Krem shook his head. “I mean when I was little it was just about wanting to know about my father, wanting to spend time with him—he spent his days working so I took an interest in it. Not that I necessarily grew up wanting to become a soldier either anyway that just sort of happened.”

He thought it over. It was complicated and for a moment he was almost overwhelmed with the realization he’d never gotten a chance to ever tell his side of things. His father had been gone when all was said and done, and his mother certainly hadn’t wanted to hear it. Bull’d never needed much more than ‘asshole healer didn’t like what he didn’t find in my pants, I had to run from the authorities, you point me in the right direction and I’ll hit stuff for you’. The Qunari man hadn’t ever pressed him about his life before, not because he didn’t care, Krem was pretty sure he could have a full-blown breakdown scream and cry and pour his heart out and the man would listen, give him some sort of mind-blowing sage wisdom about how to move forward, and then he’d crack a joke or beat him over the head with something, never hold the interaction against him or think less of him.

And there was that business she had with Lord Berand. He hadn’t been jealous when he realized there’d been some sort of talk of marriage between the two, not really. He’d been sick with worry Ellie might end up in a similar situation he’d once faced, escaped—a life where Ellie was trapped and hating herself, hating everyone around her because she was staring in the face of a lifetime commitment to someone she didn’t love, who was planning to use her life, her body to fulfill the roles other people required of her like ‘wife’ and ‘mother’. Those were great things if they were roles derived from choice, when they were forced upon you that…that was an entirely different story.

“The short of it is: I was in desperate need of a decent paying job. But uh, it’s a pretty long story. Not the most pleasant but if you’re willing to listen I’m willing to share.”

Ellie withdrew her hand from his and for a moment he thought she was pulling away, and she did a little but only, so she could give him more attention, she even tucked the curls around her face back behind her ears like that would help her hear better and situated herself a bit more in her seat settling in more comfortably against the pillow at her back before she took hold of his hand again. Ready to listen until he’d said all he wanted to say.

So he started with the basics. His family was Sopporati—barely free non-mages of little note, but his great grandfather on Mother’s side was a Laetan—a mage—and Father’s lineage descended from an allied family that fell from Laetan status in the Blessed Age or some such nonsense—point was there was magic on both sides of the line. So, their families put his parents together, betrothed from birth, in the hopes they might spawn a magical child, re-up the family status a notch. They tried for years to get pregnant with no such luck, put themselves in debt to get some help in having a shot at making a child, got one chance and ended up with Krem. Healthy, great set of lungs he screamed his arrival into the world with, but not one magical bone in his body. However, Father’s work caught the attention of the son of a merchant Laetan*, a Mage named Cornelius.

“Am I going to like Cornelius?” Ellie asked him, skeptically.

Perhaps she’d be sympathetic for him, Krem was sometimes. Definitely didn’t like the guy though. He explained how his father had made uniforms for the workers in Cornelius’s father’s shops. Cornelius liked the way Father did business and his designs, so he hired him to make his wedding robes. Cornelius used Father as his tailor for everything from then on, and they even became friends. After a while father noticed changes in him—he was a relatively pleasant man, always cheerful—but he’d lost a great deal of weight, father worried about him. Krem had been very little, playing in his father’s workshop, and Cornelius came by for his scheduled appointment, still cheery as ever. He’d always bring Krem sweets, little candies—‘sweets for my sweet girl’.

“Youp, don’t like him,” Ellie agreed blowing raspberry and giving the man a thumbs-down. Summed up his feelings pretty nicely. Thumbs down indeed.

“I was little, and when I was young I had no idea why I felt the way I did. Things that should have been at least acceptable bothering me for seemingly no reason—it’s sort of why my father made up our three-squeeze system, a way of knowing what to avoid and maybe figure out why something made me upset or angry in the first place. ‘Sweet girl’ always rubbed me the wrong way but I wasn’t exactly sure why at the time and ultimately didn’t fuss because, you know, candy,” he said with a shrug. Ellie nodded, yeah that checked out.

That particular day, Cornelius had been all smiles and cinnamon drops, and he chatted up Father as usual, but he said this time though he couldn’t stay for his fitting, he only dropped by to make a payment and then he had other business to get to. He handed Father a bag of money, not one of the small coin purses he dealt out silver in, just the right amount for his clothing, but this was an advance he said—the bag had to be about as big his head, full of gold. Father said that the money wasn’t worth Cornelius’s life. He was absolutely not accepting this payment and Cornelius wasn’t allowed to leave until they negotiated on his bill. Father kept him there for hours, seemed dead set on not letting him leave—the men did not part ways until the early hours of the morning, voices raw. Cornelius’s wife had died in childbirth that year, and their child did not survive long after being born. He’d seemed to be working through his grief but when he came in to Father’s shop, wanting to leave so quickly, paying enough for a lifetime of work, Father realized the man was leaving the money he’d be paid over the course of years the man had no intention of living. Father talked him down.

Cornelius never remarried, and it almost seemed like he never would. Till one day, Krem turns ten, and his parents inform him that—after years of friendship, in return for his family’s kindness—as soon as Krem was old enough to start a family, he would marry Cornelius. Mother had been absolutely delighted.

Ellie’s hand squeezed his. “Cremisius, that’s horrible.”

He nodded, because Maker it really had been. But, marriage would’ve bumped his family right up out of Sopporati status—where anything gets you cast down into slavery especially a lack of money which was something they always struggled for. They’d be considered honorary Laetan’s, and that status would be passed on proper to their children. The magical ones at least. It’d been made perfectly clear non-magical children wouldn’t have been considered much of anything other than mistakes in need of correction. There were loads of horrible blood magic rituals could verify mages from birth and that had been a horrific idea he’d lost countless night's sleep over in and of itself.

After five years of fighting over it with Mother, consoling from Father, there came a time when he realized just how far on the brink of things they were. Cornelius was Father’s wealthiest client, and once a Magistar realized there were people, poor and slaves freezing to death in the southern-most parts of Tevinter for lack of proper clothing, he started homing-in on the business—using slave labor to mass produce clothing that cost next to nothing, and that only expanded into other households getting in on the endeavor. The practice spread to where even his home city had places you could buy clothes like that. Father was basically out of business, barely able to keep them going as things were. He’d…he understood why the marriage was important. Krem had resigned himself to living as a woman for the rest of his life, if it meant his family could be kept from slavery to pay off their debts. He’d spent years dreading his future, lying awake at night aching to escape somehow, hating his parents, hating himself. He’d tried, Maker how he tried to convince himself he was just confused or something, prayed he would just wake up one day and everything about his biology and his chemistry would be on one accord one way or the other he really didn’t care.

But rehearsal dinner comes. Their families gathered together for a big meal to celebrate the wedding, all those people—family members that didn’t even know Krem—talking about how lucky he was, that his fiancé—a man not much younger than Father—and he looked like they were so in love and how he was just going to make ‘the most perfect wife’…Krem’d just snapped. Lost his actual mind. He caused a pretty big scene. Ripping at his dress, he’d pulled a clump of hair clean out of his scalp, knocked candles and food off the table, smashed a porcelain plate over Cornelius’s head when the bastard put a hand on his arm and told him to calm down. He just started screaming, shouting that he didn’t love him, that he couldn’t love him, and he would certainly never be anyone’s ‘perfect wife’ and then he stormed off, running. Must have run for hours. When he finally worked up the nerve to go home Mother definitely wasn’t speaking to him, but Father sat him down to talk and…he was set to marry at the end of the week, expected to start a family before the year was out and it was the absolute most miserable he’d ever been in his entire life. He just started sobbing and told him…well Krem didn’t think it was something he could do, not long term anyway. Thought at best, he’d get his parents out of their station, secure their place by popping out a passable heir for Cornelius so he’d be obligated to keep his parents around, and then uh. Well. He hadn’t planned on sticking around much longer, one way or the other.

Ellie held his hand even more tightly, quiet and listening. It’s ugly, and it’s not something he’s ever shared since then. No one needed to know, even Ellie but he’d…he’d never talked about it. He didn’t even realize he’d needed to until suddenly he just…doing it and Ellie didn’t judge or ridicule or make light. Didn’t try to breeze through it with jokes and levity to ease the blow of his words when they really needed to land, fully, no leash or safety net to keep the truth gentle and distorted. His mother, any friends he had before, his family, his community, people that raised and said they loved him, they thought he was ungrateful for passing up such an opportunity, crazy even. Thought he was sick and insane and selfish. They didn’t understand he was facing a death sentence and if he’d told them they’d think he was that much more insane, being dramatic or petty. Ellie just listened, understood, and accepted.

As it turned out, Father had returned the dowry and broken the engagement agreement with Cornelius, which insulted the Laetan beyond belief—he’d had to defend the decision to marry Krem at every turn because it was marrying down, a nobody from a line of fallen mages. Father said their friendship should have ended the day Cornelius proposed. Money and status weren’t worth losing his son over. Then his Father had just wanted to talk, about anything, everything. Asked him questions about what sort of life Krem thought would make him happy. Gave him advice for the future and told Krem different things about his own life. Everything ranging from ‘this is how you treat the person you love’ to the time he broke his leg climbing a tree when he was seven. Then he broke out scissors and his shaving kit, helped Krem cut his hair—not the first time Krem’d done so, he used to drive his mother up the wall cutting it himself when he was littler, but this time it was different—he’d never be made to grow it out again unless he wanted to. Then father shook his hand, and said he was happy he got to see his son. Then he woke mother up to kiss her goodbye, the way he usually did before going into work, and left. Except he didn’t go to work, and he didn’t come home.

A few days later they got a package, government seals, a crest from a Magister house, Tilani, on it. Payment. Father gave his business over to the state and sold himself into slavery to settle the family’s debts, a little extra left over to get them by so they could find a way to avoid the same fate. He smiled a bit ruefully then, working down to the answer for her original question. Joining the military was a guaranteed job, had benefits for himself, his Mother. Hadn’t seen her since, but he always sent money home. It was good work, hard work—he was proud of his job. Life in the military had given him the opportunity to live being recognized as a man but he was constantly teetering on the edge of people thinking otherwise—if he wasn’t quick enough when changing, or if he got caught bathing. Growing up his body hadn’t been a something shameful, it was his thoughts and his feelings that were. Then the military gave him a life that was just the reversal, his identity was accepted, unquestioned until you got down to his anatomy. And then he met Bull, and suddenly he had family again, for the first time in his life he was surrounded with people who just accepted him—inside and out. There was no hiding or shame or secrets, he wasn’t wrong, and neither was his body. Bull reached out using a Viddethari friend of his to find out for Krem if his mother had gotten caught up in everything—he was able to get in contact with a cousin of his. Mother’d been questioned but not implicated in his crime. Takes a bit of subterfuge but Bull gets half his salary to her, cousin keeps him posted on if she’s doing okay, if they think she needs anything. He made a promise to his father he’d do whatever it took to take care of her and live a life he’d be proud of. The man may never know such a promise existed, but it did, and he’d keep it.

Ellie was very quiet, and she sat up, staring down at their joined hands for a moment and then, “You kept the name your parents gave you?”

He wasn’t sure why she’d latched onto that, and it took a second to realize yeah, he’d heard about people like him who changed their names when they started living openly as themselves. “I did. My father named me so, I like that it comes from him. And it’s never really bothered me I don’t associate it with a gender. ‘Cremisius’ is pretty neutral as far as Tevinter names go, it just means me.”

“I really think it does. Cremisius,” she said with a nod, like she was thinking something over in her head and then she looked up at him, “To create from belief*. A miracle.”

She launched herself into him then, sitting on her knees straddling a thigh hugging him so fiercely he’s almost overwhelmed by it, how warm she was, how very close and then her face was buried against his neck and she said, “You’re an actual miracle Cremisius Aclassi. That you were born, that you survived, that you’re here! You’re strong and brave, and your father would be so, so incredibly proud of the man you are. He is proud. I just know it. I’m glad I know you, I’m glad you were born, and I’m glad that you’re here!”

He almost feels hysterical and he wasn’t sure if he wanted to laugh or cry or thank the girl hugging him so very tightly, or what to do with her and he settled for hugging her back, as tight as he dares, breathing in the fading scent of coconut oil in her hair, slowly being replaced by something that just smells like her and he likes that even better.

It strikes him then. And he almost feels ridiculous saying so, but she’d just translated his name. “Okay Chief said you speak Dalish, and there’s the Sign language, you know Tevene too?” He’s never had a super strong affection for his homelands near-dead language, everyone spoke Trade, it was only Priests and nobility that still kept Tevene in business but Maker, he might have second thoughts about how unappealing the language is if it’s something she speaks.

She laughed a little, like she thought it was a very silly thing to pick up on. She shook her head ‘no’ as she shifted to sit next to him again, his arm around her shoulders and he indulged a bit, playing with a lock of her hair as she explained, “Hasmal was the only place I could really go to Chantry on holy days—no one cared I was an Apostate there, you know?—and Chantry there was a lot like I imagine it must be in Tevinter, Fathers and Brothers and such. They preached a lot of the Chant of Light in Tevene, so I picked up some of the commonly used words. ‘Creation’ and ‘belief’ get used loads of times in sermons. When faith is put in the Maker to provide something we can’t achieve on our own, and something is created from that belief, it’s usually called a miracle. So. Word math.” She bit her lip then, before meeting his eye and saying, “Thanks Cremisius, for telling me.”

“Well, thank you, for listening.”

Topics got lighter then, just sharing stories about some of her more creative efforts to evade Templars, or she’d ask him about different jobs the Charger’s had worked. It was relaxing, just sitting with Ellie half laying against him and there’s this heady sort of high from the swing in their conversation. From the sinking horrible feeling he’d gotten listening about Ellie’s life before, alone, fending for herself, and the pull and sting of ripping the almost literal bandage off his past, to Ellie laughingly tell him how she used to think the phrase ‘scape goat’ was ‘scape coat’ because she’d certainly never used a goat to escape—a horse, one time a herd of druffalo, but never a goat—but she’d swapped coats with a friend and gotten all her hair under a cap to help her blend into the mix of a crowd, evade guardsmen looking for her. The most unbelievable aspect of the tale was how she’d gotten her hair hidden, and she informed him she used to just chop it all off all the time. Huh, that was too bad, but he thought it may well have been rather cute. She found no end of amusement in Krem’s tale of the time a nobleman hired the Chargers—Bull—to dress up in chicken feathers and scare an enemy of his who’d received a premonition that his death would come ‘on feathered wings’ who later choked to death on a chicken bone.

Then his throat went very dry, heart thumping in his chest—for all of a second before he was suddenly feeling exasperated with himself. Ellie’s hand had pressed low against his stomach, right over where his tunic covered the waistband of his trousers, but she’d hardly been being forward or making a move on him. She’d been pushing herself up off of him to sit closer to her headboard, arms reaching up over her head as she stretched before asking if he felt like dinner. He didn’t even realize it’d gotten late—the sun was starting to set, shades of Fade-tinged yellow and pink filtering through the gaps in the boards on Ellie’s windows. Krem almost faceplanted when he got up to go put their dinner orders in with a runner, Maker they’d just been sitting for forever, his legs were full of pins and needles.

Not ten minutes later Flissa came bustling in with their meals, insisting she was more than happy to do so when Ellie apologized for not feeling up to going out again today and thanked the barmaid profusely for making the trip. Flissa assured her it wasn’t any trouble, and thanked Krem for about the twelfth time for keeping Ellie safe and checking up on her to make sure she hadn’t gotten caught up in that assassin’s business, before she bid them a wonderful evening and hurried back to the Tavern.

“I think she might just have a crush on you, Cremisius,” Ellie teased when she left them.

“Hmmm, not interested. Don’t go playing matchmaker for me, Lady Herald.”

That got him a little pout, Maker. “Why not? I’d be very careful, I wouldn’t dare set you up with someone horrible who’d have the wrong idea,” she promised him sincerely, and then she looked like she’d just thought of something. “Oh! Do you already have someone? Or are you just not interested in a general sense?”

“No seeing anyone,” he assured her, focusing on his meal, it felt almost foolish, but he said, “I’m interested in a specific sense. In uh, a specific someone really.”

Ellie gave a little delighted gasp, happy for him he supposed. “Who?” she asked curiously,
“I won’t tell, or meddle or anything promise—on my honor as the Inquisition’s official-unofficial matchmaker I vow not to matchmake unless of course you need a wing woman—who is it?”

That was the only question of hers he didn’t offer up an answer for. Ellie just smiled and let it be.

He fucked up. Not the first time he’d done it of course, Varric Tethras had a knack, a penchant if you will, for colossal fuck ups, often of epic proportions, it was one of his more formidable talents he supposed.

He’d yelled at her, made her cry. Straight up belittled her, and shit, he’d been screaming at that bastard for making her sick, when it was Varric who…fuck!

Seeker just about wrung his neck when Varric’d been in the Chantry with the Advisors trying…well he was mostly getting glared at or yelled at, but he was trying to help them cover all their bases—what all had been said in the Tavern, and how many people had heard, could he identify them, so they could be spoken with to make sure he didn’t have the entire world at large be made aware of the more private personal struggles kid had. And then Healer Adan showed up, blood splattered on his robes. The Lieutenant had gotten him, and he’d just been to check on Ellie, Maker the blood was hers. Her ulcer was way too close to rupturing, kid wasn’t to so much as set foot outside her cabin until it was healed. Seeker’d rushed from the Chantry hall to go see Ellie herself. Varric felt like he was the one with the hole in his stomach. But he wasn’t, and he wished he was, wished he could somehow trade places with the kid. Wished he hadn’t said any of the shit he had. He’d just…he saw it, Ellie’d forgiven that asshole, was going to let that bastard back in just so he could hurt her again, and he’d lost his mind! he would have told her the Breach was purple—absolute nonsense of a lie but he’d spew it with conviction if it would somehow convince her stay away from Rainier!

Rainier hadn’t hurt her though, not this time. Varric had and he was pretty sure it was actually killing him. He’d promised Seeker he wanted to help with the kid while Marehis was away and he’d basically landed her in the infirmary!

The advisor’s grilled him for hours though Leliana was called away by, huh, first scouts he’d seen around Haven all week. Seeker was back then, assured her she’d be ready whenever Leliana needed her and then the Spymaster disappeared. Ruffles sat quietly writing everything Varric could tell them down, jaw set like she daren’t open it until she could find it in herself to say something peaceable. Curly rounded up the soldiers and staff Varric described, and Lady Josephine went with him to very discretely, diplomatically ensure they understood their respect and discretion about the things they’d heard would be appreciated and rewarded, smooth over any worries that Ellie wasn’t fit for her role.

Seeker questioned him six ways from Sunday. This time he wasn’t quite so resentful about his interrogation.

Then Bull shows up. They’d just finished up, it was the ascrack of dawn, sun would be rising soon and the Qunari just saunters into the War Room, that Elf chick Skinner looking beat up all to shit but seeming proud and satisfied about it. They missed some people, some real assholes that Bull let Skinner cut loose on, Curly’s guys so the Commander, feather pauldrons flaring as he swept from the War Room, took his leave ready to make heads roll, Bull and Skinner following after.

Seeker just looked at him like he was the lowest form of life and ground out that she was going to see to it Ellie got breakfast.

He hadn’t realized it, not until Ruffles found it in herself to call it to his attention, that he’d already finished, he’d just been sitting there in a chair around the War Room, staring into space for shit…felt like hours.

When he finally drug himself out of the Chantry the sun was up, he thought he’d been walking back to his tent he was so exhausted, and said exhaustion made him have this annoying thought in the back of his mind, a guilt that his bullcrap kept Cullen, Cassandra, Leliana…awe man sweet Lady Josephine, she never hurt nobody—they’d all been up all night and now they had to go about their days working to keep things going in the Inquisition, they had to be bone-tired. But he got to mosey on back to his tent, get some shut eye.

Except he didn’t not at first. He didn’t realize it until he was staring at that boy, Krem, that he’d completely bypassed his tent, and was out front of Ellie’s cabin. Dude was holding a tray, staring Varric down and huh. He wasn’t sure if he should be grateful or pissed. Guy looked tired too, like he hadn’t gotten much more sleep than Varric had, had stayed all night watching over Ellie. Better have just been watching over her, anyway.

What was Varric even doing here? Kid was probably still sick. And definitely wouldn’t want to see him. Not after everything he’d said, he’d be surprised if she ever wanted to talk to him again. Damn it! He’d thought it was hilarious, felt outright giddy and vindictive when Ellie’d declared she was giving Rainier the silent treatment. Did a shit job at it—she still checked up on the bastard, didn’t seem to understand that silent treatment should mean complete and total silence directed at the intended victim. If Rainier was on fire in front of her, he didn’t deserve her to speak even a word that’d douse the flames—that’s how a proper silent treatment was delivered.

He’d thought it was a good thing, her anger at Rainer. Now he was horrified that he might have earned it himself, hated it. Just wanted to go back, go right back in time to the moment he turned around and saw Ellie and Rainier, and now-self would punch past-asshole-self out before he could open his big dumb mouth.

He couldn’t though. So he settled for going back to his tent and flopping face first onto his cot. Uncomfortable as all get out still in the clothes he’d been wearing the day before, Bianca on his back but. Eh. Wasn’t like he expected to really sleep. Just.

He’d really done it this time.

Sera of all people peeked her head into his tent sometime later. Afternoon. He had actually fallen asleep and he was pretty sure he’d never be able to sit upright again because this Bianca was not made to be a sleeping companion. Not that the other one was much better. Stole all the blankets, elbowed him in the face once, so.

“Here’s food or something dwarfy.”

“You’re talkin’ to me?” Varric asked as he very, very carefully pulled Bianca off his shoulders and set her aside.

“No, I’m not talkin’ to you, you pissfaced pussbucket piece of shit! But Inky’d ugggh,” Sera groaned, slamming down a tray of food onto his cot, water sloshing from the tankard before she put her hands on her hips and railed at him, “She’d be all worried and pish if you don’t eat! So. Fuck off, eat a sandwich!”

“Wait wait,” Varric, shit he didn’t care if it sounded like begging, “is she awake? Did she send you? How is she?”

“No she isn’t ruddy awake! She’s sick! Healer blokes gave her potion that’s making her sleep like the dead—like just really really asleep! But Krem says it’s supposed to make her better.” Absently she said added, “Got a good look at him, his eyes is just regular brown. Ugh!” Sera’s face scrunched up and she balled up her fists before pounding them to the sides of her head, “I wasn’t going to talk to you! Just! Eat it dwarfy! Literally!” and then she whirled about and stomped out of his tent.

Didn’t particularly feel like eating but he did and when he was done he very cautiously took the tray back to Flissa’s. Didn’t see Rainier or any of the party members around the Tavern, even Sera was gone somewhere. He took the tray up to Flissa and apologized, acting like an ass in her bar.

“I’m not the one you need to apologize to, and don’t you dare think you can just sweet talk your way into drinking in here again,” Flissa snapped at him, cramming a wash rag bearing fist into a mug, almost like she wanted to punch him in the face so…she was a little pissed, “you’re cut off, Varric Tethras!”

Yeah, not the first time that’s happened.

“Wasn’t trying to work an angle or anything Fliss, I’m serious, I’m sorry. I’ll uh. I’ll try to make it up to the kid, soon as she’s better.” Didn’t know when ‘better’ would be though.

It was the next day apparently. He almost barreled out of his tent when he woke up and heard Ellie’s voice chatting away. Sort of sounded like she was venting, going a mile a minute about something and he waited, worried maybe it was about him. But no, she was airing her feelings about those asshole Ferelden nobles trying to wrangle her into a marriage with their son. When he dared to look outside he caught sight of her heading for Haven’s gate with Krem and Sera on her arms. Dressed real nice, was it for that boy? Bah!

He was a rational adult, most of the time anyway; the kid wasn’t just a kid, but she was young and way too trusting, and boys are scoundrels! Dogs, every last one of them! When he teased her about that hunter in the Hinterlands, that boy had seemed just as wide-eyed and innocent as Tumbles, he figured eh, worst case scenario she runs around with a little boyfriend back in the Hinterlands she sees every once in a while, when the Inquisition has work out there, nothing too intense that eventually peters out. Cute, fun, light ‘training’ boyfriend. This Krem dude was…well he was here, in Haven! She was way more likely to be able to hang around him, what if they got serious, and she got hurt! Then Varric’s gotta kill him, Bull’s got to kill Varric, it’s all a big mess. But maybe dude won’t hurt her, he was pretty…okay seeming for a guy. Everything he’d sent her on the Coast was…admittedly thoughtful, dude clearly gave a damn about her, genuinely seemed like he cared at least. And he did a decent job standing up to him for her—couldn’t really hold his words against him, Varric was being an asshole and the guy handled the situation pretty well—and he helped her. Varric’d been making his way back around to his tent, sort of pacing between the Tavern and the Chantry because shit he wanted to run back and fix what he’d done, make sure Ellie was okay—and he saw him carrying Ellie back to her cabin. He didn’t take any liberties, lots of guys would have taken the opportunity to cop a feel, all his hands did was keep her secure and pull her hood over her head. Because she’d been crying, Varric made her cry, see! Right back around to the male population being scoundrels! Shit!

Oh. Maybe she wasn’t dressed up for the lieutenant. It was the sort of thing she wore for noble business. Was she back to work already? That thought had him grumbling, pulling his boots on tying his hair back and swinging Bianca onto his back never mind he was still in his sleep clothes—he was gonna go tell Seeker off if she and the Advisors thought it was okay for Ellie to just jump back into things already! But she wasn’t down by the soldiers’ tents or at the forge or anywhere around Haven except maybe the Chantry, but when he went there the guards turned him away insisting no one was allowed in or out today, Spymaster’s orders.

Flissa was less snippy with him but maybe that was because she was too busy working on what she said was lunch for Ellie and Leliana. Ahh. Kid had the day off, probably dressed up for her lunch date. But she did take a moment to get him a sandwich he took to go. Almost bumped into a servant walking out with the pitcher Flissa had sitting on the cart she’d been prepping. When he stepped outside he could hear Bull and Sera talking, on their way to the Tavern, didn’t really want to risk getting into it with Tiny he’d been on pretty thin ice the other day, so he swung around, deciding to check in with Chuckles, see if he was in a chatty mood where Varric was concerned, and maybe he’d tell him how Ellie was doing.

The Apostate man was in his cabin, reading some book Ruffles’d gotten him, and he confessed he wasn’t exactly up to date on all of Haven’s goings on, though the Iron Bull had informed him of Varric and Ellie’s fight. The guy seemed okay with him though not pissed off at least, and he said he’d gone to check on Ellie in the night. He wouldn’t give Varric any specifics about things he picked up on in the bond, outside of assuring him her stomach pain was gone now, healed.

Chuckles stopped talking suddenly and his attention went to the door, Varric thought someone might be there but it just seemed like the guy was trying to hear something and he was rising out of his seat, hand reaching for his staff when he stopped, focused for a second, and then sat back down with a sigh of relief.

“What? What just happened?”

“All is well,” Solas said, “I thought I heard something concerning but Eleanor assures me everything is fine.”

Chuckles wouldn’t say much more than that which was infuriating but whatever, he had his confidence to keep in the kid so, Varric wasn’t going to hold it against him. Much.

“What, you uh got that whole magic thing with her—”

“I’ve made it perfectly clear I won’t break faith with Eleanor.”

“I’m not asking you to, shit! I just…want, you know, advice. How do you think I should uh, go about trying to work things out with her?”

Solas leaned back in his chair, hands steepled as he blandly informed him, as if he already didn’t know; “It is Ellie. You’ll have to speak with her. Talk through your problem whatever it may be.” Thanks captain obvious. But then, “And you’ll have to learn to respect her decisions, even if you don’t agree with them. She is not a child, Varric. Young certainly, and in need of guidance but that is something she actively seeks on her own, we cannot foist it upon her and neither can we resent her when she chooses differently from what we would like. There is a difference between having a disagreement and talking it through—as she has exhibited she is capable of doing reasonably—and the inappropriate shouting match you apparently challenged her to in front of all and sundry. Unless Rainier truly poses himself in his person as an actual threat to her safety you have to accept that she may continue her former rapport with him. If you force her to choose you will lose her, and what is more, she will be anguished by that loss."

‘Anguished’ was a real kick to the balls, he didn’t want to anguish the kid! But he definitely didn’t want her hanging around that rotten bastard! But he got Solas’s point. Shit. He guessed he’d have to suck it up and talk to her.

But he didn’t even know where to begin. It wasn’t like one of his books. Chapter One: I’m an asshole and I’m sorry. Chapter Two: Flashback—it all started when I was in diapers, my parents are social-elitist psychopaths, and they raised horrible, god-awful children, of which I am the most well-adjusted, what does that tell you about my family? Nothing good. Chapter Three: Fucking just let Seeker punch me, and forgive me already kid, I’m a grown-ass man whose entire life feels like it’s turned upside down because some teenybopper brat I’ve known little more than a few months has me totally whipped; how did my life become this, and why am I okay with it?

He almost went to Ellie’s cabin. In fact, he did. He stood at the bottom of the stairs ready to march right on up and knock on the door, but he saw the guards posted and used that as an excuse to chicken out. Never mind it was the middle of the day, guards were usually only around if the kid was sleeping or something. Who was he to interrupt her nap?

When he got to his tent there was a sealed missive from the advisors on his desk. The ‘something concerning’ Chuckles had heard earlier had been an attempt on Ellie’s life, maybe she was taking a nap, or down for the count again—oh. No, never mind. Safe. Spymaster wanted to make sure the party members knew to one, keep an eye out for further retaliation from Duke Gaspard’s camp, two, that Ellie was safe, thanks to Lieutenant Aclassi.

Flissa might have cut him off but he was definitely buying that Krem guy a drink.

Shit. He knew something like this was going to happen, Ellie getting involved in Orlesian politics. He was torn between storming down to Rainier’s place and beating the man into a pulp for…everything! And going to Ellie’s right this instant, apologize, make sure she was really okay but bah! He was more likely to just go do something stupid and confront Rainier than actually try and hash things out with Ellie right now, and guards had been posted so either it was extra protection because of the attack or yeah, maybe the kid did need to rest. She was just getting back on her feet again, an attempt on her life probably wiped her out. Didn’t want to wake her up.

Ultimately, it was Ellie who had no problem waking him up.

It was the dead of night when he heard a blood chilling scream, faint to his ears but he knew, oh Maker, it was Ellie. Varric was launching from the tent, Bianca in his hands as he bolted down the stairs, heart hammering in his chest. The door to her cabin was hanging open and as he burst in, the guards were just on their way out, running like mad, saying they were rushing to get Seeker and Healer Adan. Oh he was gonna put so many bolts in someone.

But there wasn’t any ‘someone’, no assailant lying unconscious but fuck. Fuck.

“Ellie? Sh-sh-shit shit, it’s okay, it’s going to be okay,” Varric croaked out as he holstered Bianca.

Ellie was sitting up in her bed, pale and wide eyed and shaking, covered in blood. Large portion of her bedding was soaked in it, her pajama bottoms, blood on her trembling hands.

Her voice was weak, scared, as she said, “I-I-I d-d-on’t know what’s—” shit she couldn’t even speak she was shaking like a leaf, and then clutching at her stomach, not high up like the actual organ itself was hurting her, lower reeling forward like something seriously, seriously hurt.

“Shh shh shh, Ellie, it’s going to be okay, shit shit,” Varric was out of his mind afraid, his own hands shaking ghosting along the edge of Ellie’s bed like he wanted to help do something, but he wasn’t sure what to do, “What hurts, what happened? What do I need to—”

Air! Choking! Can’t breathe! Varric’s words turned into a garbled yelp when his sleep shirt collar dug right on up into his windpipe, the Iron Bull was pulling him by the back of the shirt up and out of the cabin, dark skinned man, Stitches was there yelling for them—huh, Krem kid was there too, Bull’d palmed his head in his hand and was pushing him out the door—Healer wanted them all to get out and wait for Cassandra and Adan, before the Ferelden man knelt at Ellie’s bedside, his voice soothing as he asked her questions and tried to calm her down.

“Get off me!” Varric and Krem shouted in unison, outraged as Bull cast them out, shutting the cabin door behind him.

Of course, Bull was unfazed. “We’ll wait out here,” he said with certainty, “Or we can go back to bed really, everything’s all good, we’ll just embarrass her if we hover.”

…all good? Was he bent?!

“What?!” Varric snapped.

“What?!” Varric snapped.

“We have to find out what happened, who attacked!” Krem insisted. Liking him better every time he opens his mouth.

Oh. Okay, respecting the guy even more now. Everyone had been asleep obviously, as it was Bull was barefoot, harness gone tats on full display, sleep pants riding a bit too low on his hips for Varric’s peace of mind. Krem’s boots were undone, and he was just in cotton breeches, sleep shirt. He heard Ellie was in danger and just grabbed his sword, came running, didn’t give a fuck who saw what, shit. Good man.

Varric nodded. “Kid’s got the right idea, we gotta find the bastards and make them pay!” How’d they get past the guards? What the hell had they done to her, damn it there’d been so much blood!

“No one to find, because no one attacked.” Bull deadpanned, leveling Krem a significant look. “Dude. Seriously? Think about it for a second.”

No one attacked? But that…no no no wait.

Did he mean…shit had Ellie done something to herself?

No no no no no, she wouldn’t do something like that, she had…she had some issues, but she was dealing with them!

But she’d been dealing with them in private, with the help of people who were supposed to be looking out for her and Varric had gone and…he betrayed her, embarrassed her about something she was already embarrassed enough about with just the few who did know, and m-maybe—

“Could be,” Krem said doubtfully but calm like whatever Bull’d been suggesting was no big deal? “She was petrified Chief, she doesn’t have a clue what’s going on.”

No clue what’s going on…well at least his and Tumble’s coalition was going strong because that made two of them, but if she didn’t know then that meant it wasn’t something she’d done to herself. He was jumping to wild conclusions, things that didn’t make sense, but he needed answers damn it, what happened?!

Questions sort of fell on the backburner because he’d never seen Seeker without several inches of leather and steel between herself and the rest of the world and he sort of thought it was a permanent thing—like she’d been born in her Seeker gear, Maker bless her poor mother if that were the case, but apparently it wasn’t.

Seeker came running with Healer Adan at her back, though Varric almost didn’t recognize her in slippers, soft, light purple (dare he think the word ‘periwinkle’ in any context related to the Seeker? The word was too cutey but that’s what she was wearing) robe wrapped around her—softest thing he’d ever seen her wear—and she had hair. Like big time, all the way down to her hips. Huh. He’d never really thought about the implications of the braid she kept wrapped around her head, guess that hair had to come from somewhere. Sera was just about to come barreling down the stairs but Solas was hot on her trail and he reached out, grabbed her wrist and pulled her aside a moment, looked like he was explaining something to her that had her scrunching her nose up and Varric heard her cackle like a loon and then the quiet echo of her ‘Yuck! Inky Inky!’ before she hightailed it back in the direction of the Tavern, Solas following—didn’t he want to help?! And what was yuck?! Nothing made sense! Was he drunk? Was this all some weirdass nightmare?! Maker, please just let this be a nightmare.

“Eleanor!” Cassandra called out as she joined them, looking to Bull and Krem for explanation, “Is—”

“Boss-girl’s fine Seeker,” Bull assured her. “Stitches is talking with her now, explaining.”

“Explaining what?!” Varric snapped, “What the hell is going on?!” if someone doesn’t say something that makes some goddamn sense, he’s going to need the Healer because he’s pretty sure he’s about to have a fucking heart attack.

“Boss-girl’s technically boss-woman now,” Bull said with a shrug, and then as if realizing the very sharp, dark interpretation Varric was just about to make of that, probably because his heart actually stopped, Bull shouted, “Shit! Calm down, I just mean there’s blood on the field you moron!” he snapped, “Ellie’s entertaining her monthly guest. For the first time. Hence her freaking out. Poor kid had absolutely no idea what to expect apparently.”

Oh.

Wait.

Oh.

You know. He’s really getting to old for this shit.

“Oh, goodness,” Seeker said looking almost overwhelmed by the prospect as she offered, “Um. Perhaps I should speak with Eleanor then?”

Took a second to work it around in his mind that yeah, Seeker had a uterus, she’d probably have some insight for the kid. Damn. Monthlies. Tumbles fell right into it all with a literal splash, hadn’t she? He wasn’t totally oblivious, he’d woken up with little bloodstains on his bedsheets from the occasional overnight guest having theirs catch them off guard in the night or because they’d uh…fallen asleep, been too wiped out to change the sheets after their fun. But what he’d seen just now with Ellie shit, there’d been just so much. She was a little old to be starting this maybe the stuff was saved up or something? He’s not a wealth of knowledge on the subject. Bleh, Sera’d been right, yuck, he was glad now Solas had figured it out and kept the girl Elf at bay—she’d probably humiliate the poor kid right about now. He was…goddamn he was beyond relieved it wasn’t remotely anything like the horror show he’d worked up in his mind, but he knew exactly nothing about this crap, he wasn’t sure how he could help the kid with that. More chocolate, definitely more chocolate.

“Adan better go with you,” Bull recommended, “Kid’s pissed and wants answers.”

She really was, and she really did. The cabin door swung open. Ellie, washed up, in clean pajamas, shoving her feet into her boots and stomping out to join them, not shaking anymore exactly, more like vibrating with rage.

“You!” Ellie pointed an accusatory finger at Adan, “You said I would bleed! I thought you meant like! A little! Where is it coming from, why is there so much, and why the ugh- the- why every month? How am I not dead?!”

“It uh, isn’t all blood, Lady Herald,” Adan attempted to explain, looking around as if uncertain whether or not Ellie realized she had a bit of an audience, “it is merely the lining of your u—”

Ellie slapped her hands over her ears and shouted, “NOPE! Shut up! That’s what Mister Stitches said, and what good does that do me?!” she asked, “I don’t plan on making any babies! Can’t I just! Shut it off?!?”

“She really was, and she really did. The cabin door swung open. Ellie, washed up, in clean pajamas, shoving her feet into her boots and stomping out to join them, not shaking anymore exactly, more like vibrating with rage.

“You!” Ellie pointed an accusatory finger at Adan, “You said I would bleed! I thought you meant like! A little! Where is it coming from, why is there so much, and why the ugh- the- why every month? How am I not dead?!”

“It uh, isn’t all blood, Lady Herald,” Adan attempted to explain, looking around as if uncertain whether or not Ellie realized she had a bit of an audience, “it is merely the lining of your u—”

Ellie slapped her hands over her ears and shouted, “NOPE! Shut up! That’s what Mister Stitches said, and what good does that do me?!” she asked, “I don’t plan on making any babies! Can’t I just! Shut it off?!?”

“Eleanor,” Seeker was tentative to address the kid, “I know it is an uncomfortable thing, but it is erm, perfectly natural. Perhaps we could talk inside, not wake Haven?”

“It’s not my fault you’re all out here! Everyone’s already awake!”

Well, “You did sort of scream down the house earlier Tumbles,” Varric couldn’t help but try to make light.

“Double nope!” Ellie was pointing at him now, how was that scary? She wasn’t even that much taller than him and he had to fight the urge to duck behind Bull for cover. “You don’t get to yell at me and make me cry just because you’re a big scaredy baby, and then try to joke with me! Not happening! If I want to be friends with Thom, you just have to deal with it! Think it’s stupid? Fine! Think I’m stupid? Whatever! If I’m smart enough to fix Thom’s legal stuff with Orlais I’m sure I’m smart enough to work out whatever fight-y nonsense you want to have with me! I’ll fix it!” she shouted at him, “I’m going to fix it! So don’t you dare think about leaving the Inquisition!”

Leave the Inquisition?

“Shit, Ellie there’s nothing you have to fix! Who the hell said anything about me leaving the Inquisition?” Varric wanted to know, “I’ll kick their ass!”

Oh. Maybe not, because she yelled, “I said it! Cause…I dunno!” her chin quivered, “People leave and I…I don’t want you to!” her words came out thick, like she wanted to scream and cry at the same time, so she settled for loud, tear laced, increasing-in-volume shouting, “I love you, Varric Tethras! And I love Marehis, and Cassandra, and Solas, and Thom, and Sera, and The Iron Bull, and the Chargers, and Cullen, and Lady Josie, and Leliana, and Scout Harding, and Seggrit, and Flissa, and Harritt, and Dennet and Russel, and I love Healer Adan even though I just got all yell-y at him. I’m sorry about that!” she said looking to the bewildered Healer, “This whole monthly thing is very upsetting I do not appreciate it at all!” little foot stomp for emphasis.

“Understandable,” Adan allowed, looking like he wasn’t sure if he should acknowledge that Ellie just said she loved him somehow, or if he should be offended that he came last tale end after a horse. guy probably didn’t know just how much kid loves that horse though.

Varric, however, was still on her declarations to him, shit. It’d been one thing to be pretty sure about it, but it was another, awkwardly overwhelming thing to actually hear the kid say… shout as much. “I uh. I love you too, Ellie,” he said, way to go, word guy. “I’m sorry. For yelling at you—I overreacted, and I never meant for you to think shit- Tumbles, you’re not stupid. I never thought you were. And I’m uh, sorry for being a dick to that a- um, to Thom,” the name sounded like it tasted sour in his mouth, it did, but he was trying. He would try if…if Ellie was still willing to play nice with Rainier, Varric…he’d caused enough problems for her. He needed to have her back. “I’ll um, get over it. Work on it, anyway.”

Ellie nodded, seeming calmer as she said, “Good. Thank you. For apologizing and stuff.”

Bull patted the top of Ellie’s head. “You feel better now, Imekari?”

“No! Sort of,” she shrugged and sighed in frustration, “I’m tired, and upset, and cramping, and my beds all murder-y!” she sniffled, “I woke up and thought I’d been murdered!”

“I know where Marehis stores your bedding, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, taking some charge, “Everything will be taken care of shortly. Would you care to ah…” she seemed to be trying to think of what exactly to do with the kid in the meantime.

He realized then Krem had sort of disappeared, emerging from Ellie’s cabin, the Tevinter man had her hat in his hands and pulled it over her head in the blink of an eye, her cloak was over his arm and he was already moving to drape it around her shoulders, coming around to stand in front of her and clasp it closed himself as he asked, “Bull taught you pancakes, you like them right?”

Ellie nodded. “Y-yeah?” she answered confused but more calmly than she had been just a moment ago.

“Chief! You’re on pancake duty!” Krem ordered.

“On it,” Bull said, already heading for the gate.

“Ellie, you come on out front, while he’s cooking. You can borrow my sword to beat down on the practice dummies,” he leaned down a bit to press his forehead against hers, smiling as he offered, “I’ll even make dramatic sound effects, so it seems more authentic if it’ll help you feel better.”

Huh. Simulated murder and carbs. Might just do the trick.

It seemed it would. Ellie’s chin quivered, and she nodded, sniffing a bit then, “That sounds like everything I want in life right now.” When he stepped away she asked, “Piggyback?”

Varric almost thought it was weird she’d add a request to the already generous offer but as Krem obliged without so much as an ounce of hesitation, he realized she’d seen what he had and was giving the guy a bit of discretion in front of so many unfamiliar people—when she hopped on his back the front of her cloak draped over his shoulders. Huh, good on her, he wasn’t sure how he’d feel if it turned out Ellie was the sort of person to be phased by something like that.
That reminded him, he hadn’t heard from Mae-Mae in a while. Since before the Conclave—sort of lost track of keeping in touch but he should probably let her know he was alive. Check in and see how she’s doing. Tevinter was a long way away but maybe she’d be interested in seeing the Inquisition next time she was in the neighborhood, she liked shopping in Orlais well enough she’d probably be by sometime—she and Ellie'd get on like a house on fire. Kid was practically a life-sized doll the woman wouldn’t be able to resist making her up.

“I better whip up fresh potion for the uh,” Adan cleared his throat, “cramping, headaches and such.” The Healer seemed to be half-addressing Stitches.

“Gave her bandaging but I’ll swing by the Quartermasters and get her a good supply going. Be by to help you in a few,” the Ferelden man assured him before the two went along to the steps, bounding up them to go their separate ways.

And then there were two.

“Seeker, you uh, want help?” he jerked his head in the direction of Ellie’s cabin, place really did look like a full-blown murder scene.

The woman didn’t seem like she very much wanted to accept, but she sighed and said, “Very well.”

Ugh. He hated doing this, it was bad enough all the apologies this got out of him, and that he’d probably have to talk to…and not hit…Rainier sometime, clear the air. But…fuck him, this is why you shouldn’t make friends! “Cassandra. I’m uh, sorry, you know. To you too. I talked big about helping with Ellie and I majorly dropped the ball. Right off a cliff. Into a shark’s mouth. And the shark was on fire.” There.

“You have disappointed me beyond words, Varric. But,” she said, stepping into Ellie’s cabin, there was just the hint of amusement pulling at her lips as she continued, “we shall see how I feel after you remove Eleanor’s soiled bedding, yes?”

Yup. Deserved that.

“I’m on it.”

Chapter End Notes

*Edgehall=a city near the Orlesian-Ferelden boarder, all the history pulled from canon is mentioned above, I mostly marked it for Skinner origin sake. There isn’t any nationality listed for her, and while her accent sounds Nevarran-ish in game, it also strikes me personally as sounding Orlesian, mixed with something else. When I was looking through canon alienage’s for her backstory—the alienage she’s from isn’t listed specifically—and I read about Edgehall and it seemed like a perfect fit to me, the kind of person Skinner is, how untrusting and wild she can be, makes sense coming from somewhere where Elves are living in a constant state of terror, pinned in and easily assaulted and taken advantage of by the rest of the community, the city itself basically built to cage and attack their Elf population.
*Sign Language! First sign Grim uses is the sign to warn someone that food is ‘hot’. Grim grunts instead of talking in game and so I thought, Sign language! Most of my descriptions for signs are based off of ASL, however I straight forget the sign for ‘Mayor’, don’t know signs for other lower-level ranks (didn’t want to go overboard and make him a King or Emperor or something haha!) so I used the description for the British Sign for Mayor instead.

*Inquisition Needs Bees! Is a war table mission you can do for Sera Approval, its how you unlock her Jar of Bees attack in ya potions slots.

* “She’d been too hard, and somehow Cassandra of all people compelled her to soften”—as you advance in the game, you’ll have several options that mark Leliana’s character arch in particular, one of them is your response when Leliana is confronted with handling Butler’s betrayal, Inquisitor can stay silent (harden), encourage Leliana to kill Butler (harden), or spare and question him to see if he can explain (soften). Ultimately what these decisions affect are the Epilogue if you make Leliana Divine. Hardening Leliana will make her harsher if you make her Divine, Softening her will give her a more compassionate reign.

*Yvette and Antoine are the canon names of two of Lady Josie’s younger siblings. She has three brothers, one of which goes unnamed, and a sister, Yvette who we meet during Wicked Eyes and Wicked Hearts!

*Ciriane is just French basically, the language of the Ciriane tribe that was one of the two tribes to settle Orlais, ultimately dominating and creating the Orlesian Empire we know today.

*Krem’s age—for the purposes of this fic, to pull off young inquisitor and KremXInquisitor I worked to make him age appropriate. So, currently, he’s 17, and Ellie will be turning 16 by the time she returns to Haven after she recruits the Mages and Templars. While Krem’s age isn’t a canonized fact, I get the impression he’s older in canon—like early twenties. In Thedas, because of the Medieval-esque setting, people generally consider 16 ‘your life is half over, you’ll soon die of the plague’ grown up age, so I peg that as the legal-adult age, you can own land, join the military, enter a legally binding contract, etc.

If Ellie didn’t have Andraste’s permission slip on her hand, her butt couldn’t be in the Inquisition until she was sixteen

*Krem’s backstory—in canon, Krem’s backstory is represented in this story. Cornelius and other such details are purely made to flesh out the story more than what canon provides. House Tilani is a canon Magistar House. There is a plot-driving point to Krem sharing his backstory with Ellie. Also someone just in general needs to hug the guy.

*Cremisius translation! If you put Cremisius through translation engines…you get Cremisius. However, if you parcel the word out, put a space in the middle and write it as Cremi sius, Italian and Latin offer parts of the word meaning ‘Create’ and ‘Believe’. Which for one thing is a beautiful name for a trans person. But it also got me thinking that something created by people’s belief in a higher power is considered a miracle, that prompted me to consider the fact that Krem is canon, an only child, chances are, his parents weren’t able to have more than one child. Realistically thinking, a couple living in Sopporati status only having one child, and that child being identified as female at birth, means they physically cannot have more children—because in general... societies, and people seeking to raise their status in that society want cis male children to raise their status through 1) societal opportunity like higher education and/or military service or 2) marriage, it keeps the family name going (traditionally) and brings the family more power in the marriage situation.
TLDR: Cremisius Aclassi is a miracle, I love him and you can fight me
Chapter Summary

Periods suck! Madam de Fer returns at last, so magical lessons ensue. Lessons in hoppin' scotch, the Chargers make some new hires, and Krem makes a decision.

Chapter Notes

Part two!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

With the threats to Leliana’s ranks nullified, an all-clear was getting out to those in the field who had to hide. Scout Harding would be receiving orders to return to the Oasis and hold ground. Marehis would be returning to Haven…just as soon as she could be found. Maker the woman was too impressive by half—Bull’s Viddethari contacts did report seeing her. They trailed her for a moment to make confirmation she’d been sighted, and nearly lost their lives for the trouble. Needless to say the woman evaded them, rather violently, and fled the area believing she’d been further compromised. She’d been spotted in the southern part of the Free Marches, she could very well be anywhere now, but Inquisition birds would find her shortly. Cassandra just hoped for all their sakes the woman has not found refuge farther north, the further she was the longer it would take for her to return to them and Maker, the Elf woman was needed now more than ever.

Eleanor found nothing about her newfound womanhood…appealing in the slightest. In this way, Cassandra found herself in a situation where yes, Eleanor’s upbringing was very much like her own—eleven-year-old Cassandra Pentaghast had found the entire aspect of her biology to be pointless and unrelenting, nothing but a horrible messy annoyance she dreaded each month.

Cassandra had been uncertain if she should endeavor her morning ritual with Eleanor, the girl’s sleep had been disturbed to say the least, spent over an hour in the middle of the night apparently beating a practice dummy senseless—taking a break to eat what Bull termed an ‘impressive’ number of pancakes, which Cassandra worried just how great the Qunari’s standard for impressive may be. The words immediately set the mental image of Eleanor devouring a stack of pancakes her own height. Eleanor’s sleepy, contented mumbling as Cassandra half walked, half carried the girl back to her quarters contained the words ‘bajillion pancakes’ and ‘love the Iron Bull…Cremisius just the best…best best.” Before she fell headlong into her fresh bedding, rolled over, and fell fast asleep.

Cassandra had to agree. Cremisius Aclassi was indeed the ‘best’ of the ‘best best’. When she emerged from her own interrogations to discover Leliana just finishing up from further questioning with an assassin sent in retaliation for her efforts for Rainier, Cassandra had nearly gone to lay eyes on the girl just to assure herself Eleanor was safe. However, she was certain she must be quite a sight—interrogations were arduous affairs this one in particular had lasted nearly the entire stance of two days, she could practically feel the bags under her eyes—she did not wish to worry Eleanor.
Instead she attended to a meeting with the advisors, discussed how to move forward now that Leliana’s ranks were secured, and how to respond to the attack on the Herald. Leliana recounted the incident, the Lieutenant had done well, Maker bless him, guard the man in His hand for eternity. The attempt had been far more serious than what they’d expect from the Duke or one of his allies, a genuine attempt on Eleanor’s life. It was called for by a family member of Ser Robert Chapuis—the man who conspired with Gaspard to take out Callier and eventually took his own life after word spread of the massacre—they were still loyal to Duke Gaspard and resented that Rainier and his men were apparently getting away with their crime while their cousin remained dead for his sins. Leliana was already seeing to it the threat be dealt with, no more assassins would be sent from that quarter. And what was more, the Spymaster asked Josephine if she thought perhaps she could squeeze in another attempt at a lunch date with Eleanor, into the girl’s schedule—if not this time around in Haven, then the next, perhaps it could be a regular affair.

Afterward Cullen pulled Cassandra aside once Leliana and Josephine were gone. The Commander worried that he may be on a downturn of sorts, he had been so poorly that Eleanor had taken note, had insisted the man see Adan.

Cassandra made the point that Eleanor, day one of their training, had landed a slap against Cullen’s side, against his armor, and in earnest asked if he was alright—the girl was prone to worrying after him, all of them. In point of fact, Cassandra informed the man, Eleanor recently asked Cassandra who the Advisors were considering naming Inquisitor, she might just apply for the job she might just apply for the job she might just apply for the job, Eleanor’s first official order—bedtimes all around. Everyone would have to get good sleep and eat regular meals and take days off to rest and relax, stop every now and again to play with the baby Druffalos, it was only healthy, the girl insisted. Then she’d step down after an hour or something and let someone who ‘actually knows what they’re doing’ play Inquisitor. The anecdote worked to ease the man’s concern, made him smile and he agreed, Eleanor wanted to help however she could, even unnecessarily—she’d offered him her most beloved hat because she thought his head might be cold he informed Cassandra with a fondness in his smiling expression. It was nice to see... after such a hard day for him, of course. Though the man was undoubtedly handsome, when he smiled, she observed. Cassandra was watching him carefully, after all, as agreed. He was doing admirably in his position, dealing as he was, and until he displayed otherwise, Cassandra was satisfied with his work.

The Lieutenant was a surprising, but greatly appreciated ally, in helping Eleanor traverse the trappings of monthlies. When Cassandra arrived at Eleanor’s quarters the morning following the girl’s rather unfortunate milestone, prepared to peek in and see if the girl was awake, the Lieutenant was there, waiting with a cart of breakfast trays for them. He said he didn’t wish to intrude on their prayer time, he would certainly make himself scarce, but Eleanor may need assistance first thing waking up. Cassandra assured him he was welcome to join them, though she didn’t fully realize what he meant by ‘assistance’—she thought perhaps he meant the girl would want potion or to eat right away, but no. The man foresaw something that would very much distress Eleanor if she hadn’t had some preparation for it.

Lieutenant Aclassi knelt at Eleanor’s bedside and quietly woke her, Eleanor stirred and smiled wearily as he asked her how she was feeling, and she reported her back did feel rather stiff and the cramping was ‘going pretty strong’. The young man offered her a sympathetic nod, playing with a lock of her hair while he informed her just what he’d wanted to prepare her for.

Sitting up, first thing in the morning, when your monthly was upon you. He termed it, ‘the wake-up flood’. Cassandra realized yes, it was indeed unpleasant, sitting up and... well, especially if one was experiencing a heavy flow, bandaging usually ended up very quickly drenched in a rush of blood, though how the man knew so very much about it she was uncertain, but she was glad someone had thought to give Eleanor some warning. He figured it would alarm her, and what was more he whispered some form of instruction to her that had her grimacing a bit, but she thanked him, seeming almost embarrassed and he told her not to ‘sweat it, if there’s some mess, it’s happened to the best of us’.

A strange turn of phrase, Cassandra thought, though Eleanor found no qualm with it. The Lieutenant rose and set about making himself busy retrieving the cart of food and bringing it in while Eleanor’s hands disappeared momentarily beneath her covers and there seemed to be some sort of wriggling—ahh, a lesson Cassandra had learned the hard way after months of ending up with bloody sleep clothes and bedding, she was adjusting her bandaging in case it had shifted in her sleep to ensure it would…catch everything—before she took a deep breath and sat up, nose scrunching up in displeasure and she shuddered a bit, cringing once she was upright.

“Gross,” she whispered to herself, something she would do often in the coming days, “Gross gross gross.”

Speaking over his shoulder as he began stoking the fire in the hearth, the Lieutenant said, “Just sit tight a second. Five-to-one if you’d like.” Cassandra wasn’t sure what five-to-one meant but Eleanor closed her eyes, mouthing silent words to herself, Cassandra recognized ‘bed, blankets…Cremisius, Cassandra, cart,’ the girl smiled a bit at the alliteration. Ahh. Grounding.

They prayed together first, the Lieutenant joined them, Eleanor seated between he and Cassandra. She had already stilled her mind, focused on her gratitude to the Maker for the progress the Inquisition had made, for their safety, that He continued to watch and guard Eleanor, when the girl herself laid her head on Cassandra’s shoulder. It was not an unwelcome intrusion, and the Seeker felt a hint of a smile tugging at her lips as she cracked an eye open to look at the girl.

“I love the Maker, like, a bunch, and I did all my big prayer things, but um. I’m kind of almost starving right now.”

After the past few weeks it was practically music to the woman’s ears to hear Eleanor eager for a meal, one she could stomach, that would not go half eaten or lost after the fact to illness. “Certainly, the Lieutenant brought breakfast,” Cassandra saw fit to give the man credit.

“ Miracle man!” Eleanor declared him, causing the man to snort, his cheeks reddening ever so as he rose to his feet and waved for Eleanor to remain seated. He retrieved two trays from the cart he’d brought in, placing them before Eleanor and Cassandra, before he got his own.

Eleanor’s tray bore another paper blossom, like the one he’d sent her on the Coast. The little token made the girl smile, blush as she leaned over and kissed the man on the cheek, thanking him.

Maker it was heartening to see Eleanor eating so well, a sight Cassandra had not seen in so long. She’d made such progress under the care of the Inquisition, it’d been disheartening to see the dip of her cheeks deepen, but it was nothing too detrimental, slight but noticeable to Cassandra’s eye, it would be righted soon enough. One benefit she found in confiding with that abhorrent Dwarf was that it had given her cause to do so in the other members of their party…not quite so embarrassingly, she’d hardly gone around and shed tears before the whole of their companions, but she’d asked they watched over how well Eleanor ate, and they’d all touched base with the Advisors on their efforts. The Iron Bull had hosted Eleanor in his camp, thankfully she was well enough to still accept his invitation, and he’d seen to it she ate several hearty portions of dinner, Solas had consoled her when she was heartsick over her fight with Varric and her missing Marehis so much that her magic expressed her distress to him, and he’d taken the opportunity to bring her a midnight snack, and the Lieutenant had assured her Eleanor had eaten well in all the meals they shared. Sera penned two separate sloppily written missives, addressed to ‘bossy-people’, one the day Eleanor was in her potion-induced coma to panic about ‘Inky’ sleeping through the noon meal, and a second the following morning rejoicing that the girl had eaten several cookies between breakfast and lunch—a little drawing of cookies scratched into the parchment. Cassandra had been impressed with the lack of phallic symbols in her letters until Commander Cullen snorted and pointed out that the little drawing of three chocolate chip cookies had been placed, portioned to appear like...well. Two symmetrical cookies sitting atop an oval shaped cookie with an interestingly placed chocolate chip at the...ugh...tip. Cassandra was almost inclined to be impressed by her creativity, banal and crude as it was.

As they ate, Eleanor asked how Cassandra’s meeting had gone. Splendidly, Cassandra was pleased to inform her, though more than that she could not say. And gosh, did she know her hair was just so pretty? It was beautiful, and Eleanor ‘called dibs’ helping Cassandra braid it sometime. Eleanor’s own hair had been cleaned and conditioned while she was in the Charger’s camp last night—the Iron Bull’s doing, seeing fit to pamper the girl a bit, and that had apparently started a hair managing chain of sorts. The Qunari assisted with Eleanor’s hair, sitting close to the bonfire he’d cooked over, and when the Lieutenant took the opportunity to armor himself while guarding Eleanor, ‘Skinner’ came to check on Eleanor, which resulted in the Elf woman being sat down and the Human girl brushed her hair for her, because the Elf always brushed her own hair so roughly according to the Iron Bull. Eleanor thought perhaps she could persuade her to be gentler if she was shown how, and it’d been ‘so much fun!’

Laughter burst past the Lieutenant's lips and he had to take a moment, using a hand to cover his eyes, drawing his forefinger and thumb along the underside of them to drag away tears as they met to pinch the bridge of his nose. “Maker, Ellie! I was wondering why she was acting so weird this morning!” he gave an amused sigh, “I woke up to Skinner sitting at the end of my cot—proper heart attack material—taking the upmost care of brushing her hair from the bottom up and said,” the young man spoke with a stilted Orlesian-Ferelden accent, “I am being more gentle with myself,” he snorted, “like I was supposed to know what that meant! Guess she wanted me to make sure you knew she was following orders?”

“Oh gosh! It wasn’t an order or anything I just told her she should...yeah be more gentle with herself,” Eleanor supposed sheepishly. Then, “Snagging tangles hurts!”

And so did cramping, though Adan’s potions were rather helpful. As were the bandages the Lieutenant offered up, saying a woman named Dalish crafted them for apparently whenever anyone in the Chargers was struck with such a thing. Not meant for absorbing blood. They were strips of cotton with emblems emblazon upon them in fiery lettering, in a fashion that looked like the fire runes Cassandra had seen used to enchant weapons. They could be wrapped around one’s hips and would provide soothing warmth that would bring her some ease for several days before their enchantment wore off. It got the young man a rather exuberant hug.

When he stepped out while Eleanor changed to give her privacy and return the cart to Flissa’s, Cassandra assisted in wrapping the enchanted bandaging in place—she wanted to lay hands on the things first to ensure they weren’t dangerous, she felt certain the Lieutenant wouldn’t give the girl something he hadn’t tested for safety, but she certainly didn’t want to run the risk of burning the girl, and she’d never seen such a remedy before. Waterskins full of boiling water, and the like had been a common thing for Cassandra to use, but this was truly ingenious, the warmth from the bandage was pleasant, even when tested on tender flesh on the inner most part of Cassandra’s wrist it did not feel scalding, and it was something that could be worn throughout the day discreetly beneath Eleanor’s clothing.

Eleanor was delighted with it, performing a happy little wiggling dance once the bandaging was secure. Though she was rather candid with Cassandra that she thought it was most certainly ‘dumb’ that something your body did naturally hurt itself, Cassandra agreed. Eleanor hadn’t been one for listening to medical terminology the other night, but the Seeker did try to assure her it wasn’t uncommon an occurrence, informed her that cramping was normal and why it was happening as best she could with what knowledge she had on the subject.

“I don’t much care for it either,” Cassandra said handing Eleanor a clean tunic, “Everyone is different, but in my experience, monthlies have gotten more predictable and exceedingly lighter overtime. Too, there is potion that would regulate it, make it lighter, you could choose to alleviate it from occurring entirely—Adan would be more than glad to supply such potion to you once you’ve established a healthy enough cycle on your own.”

“If Mister Stitches doesn’t marry Adan,” Eleanor said, tugging her tunic on and smoothing it out, “I will.”

Maker preserve them, was everyone to be wed within the Inquisition? It was a holy cause, not a dating service.

Even so, she found herself smiling at Eleanor’s enthusiasm, “I’m glad it pleases you,” Cassandra said, “we could see to it Adan adds such to your regimen in future.”

“That’s so cool! Um…Adan’d make that for anyone in the Inquisition, right?” she asked.

“It’s standard medical care the Inquisition does provide its recruits,” Cassandra assured.

Eleanor nodded, smiling at that as she wriggled to get her leggings over her hips, buttoning them and she commented that her bottoms had been feeling tighter the past few days, Eleanor was albeit disappointed that the snugness of her leggings derived from bloating and not proper weight gain, though she did concede that that made sense and for some reason the information earned Cassandra a hug.

Oh, not that, the fact that Cassandra was merely present she realized then, as the girl let out a happy sounding grunt of effort from how tightly she hugged the Seeker and said, ‘I’m really super glad our schedules are back to normal! I missed you yesterday!”

Ahh. Somehow that felt…almost as if she were the one enduring their monthly cycle. The admission almost made her eyes itch, her throat feel a bit tight. Huh. It was still truth that they had not been separated since the Breach, save now for Cassandra’s time in interrogation with that vile Venatori agent. She’d been preoccupied with the task at hand and it felt…surprising. She hadn’t expected the girl to miss her of all things, though she realized if perhaps she had not been so busy, focused, she would have missed Eleanor as well. In fact, she had felt the pang of wishing to see her as she made her way to her quarters to prepare for bed, had considered checking in on the girl, just to see her even if she might be asleep.

She cleared her throat and hugged the girl back, “I am glad of it as well, Eleanor.” And then, as they did have a moment alone she wished to assess, “Leliana informed me, of how your meal together went. Are you alright?” she’d been safe physically of course but that did not speak for her peace of mind.

The girl’s head nodded against Cassandra’s chest plate and she said, “Cremisius kicked butt, big time. I got a little freaked out. But the Iron Bull helped. And Sera and Thom and Mister Stitches and Grim and Skinner. Oh!” she pulled back to look up into the Seeker’s face, “Did Cullen tell you about Skinner? I’m really, really glad he came down on her side of things the other day.”
“Indeed, I am grateful she rose to your defense. Cullen has assured me it was handled, nothing more will come from that, Eleanor.” Before the month was out those men would be joining Lord Berand and his mercenary crew to go investigate the Fallow Mire on behalf of the Inquisition. Strange reports had been coming from that quarter of Fade Rifts and undead, but they could only get limited confirmation of the former, the place had wildly been abandoned long ago. It may well be an area Eleanor would need to travel to in order to rid the world of Rifts, for now the area would serve purpose to get the men out into the field doing something useful besides hanging about Haven and flapping their gums about—ugh! She should not be so incensed, but it infuriated her beyond belief that they’d even thought to belittle Eleanor! The absolute nerve! “You…you were informed of what was said?”

The girl nodded, seeming unbothered by it, “Cremisius gave me a heads up, just in case something happened while we were out and about yesterday, he didn’t want me running into anything unprepared.”

She was grateful the man had thought to do so, but still some part of her wished the girl had been spared the knowledge. “I do hope you did not take their words to heart, Eleanor. Despite what anyone thinks on the matter you are in fact suitable to the role you play, and erm…”

“I’m not a raging slut, toying with the hearts of men and then playing victim when they get miffed at me over it?” she asked with a gleeful grin, like she considered it some laughing matter.

Raging sl— “Eleanor!” Maker!

“What? Sluts not a bad word. Depends on whose using it and why whether it’s even mean or not,” the girl shrugged. “Doesn’t bother me, what those guys said outside the realm of the horrible mental images. It’s not like we’re friends or something, they work for the Inquisition, so we’re allies in that respect, but I don’t have to care much what they think personally.”

“Chancellor Roderick is certainly no friend of yours,” Cassandra offered up gently, somewhat in accusation, fearing the girl was being reticent to divulge just how very much the gossip had bothered her. But she said,

“Oh…well that was different. Even if Roderick hadn’t blamed me for surviving the Conclave, I was already blaming myself,” she admitted, “It didn’t originate with him, it started with me. Um. Cremisius helped with that actually. I felt badly, that everyone died, and I didn’t. But he explained that it doesn’t have to be one idea, it can be separate things. The Conclave was sad, and I can be sad over it. I survived and that’s okay, it’s alright to be happy about that.”

Cassandra pulled the girl close again, tucking her head under her chin. She thought the passage of time and the progress they were making toward the Breach would have taken that guilt from the girl. She wasn’t sure how Cremisius discovered Eleanor’s feelings on the matter but bless him. Cassandra had always believed it juxtaposition, placing the ideas together, that the tragedy of the Conclave further made Eleanor’s survival that much more incredible, wondrous, good. She’d never considered the girl might hear it as further accusation, the rotting cherry atop the devastation.

“It is not just ‘okay’ that you survived, Eleanor. I will always be grateful for it,” Cassandra said. They may have eternity to spend with the Maker, but she was not certain even with all that time she could express how grateful she was to Him that she knew this girl.

She didn’t have anything to say to that, but the girl blushed, hugging the Seeker more tightly.

When the Lieutenant rejoined them, Eleanor felt at ease informing him that Cassandra had
The girl did continue her training with Cassandra and the Commander, though breaks were more commonplace, and Eleanor was rather apologetic for them, but Cullen waved the concern off, he knew how very unpleasant monthlys were, he had sisters he explained.

“Oh gosh!” Eleanor gasped, absolutely delighted by the prospect that more Rutherfords existed, “Really?”

Their training session dissolved into Eleanor wanting to know all about the Rutherford family*. The man was pleased to speak with her of his loved ones, he seemed relaxed today. Lyrimum withdrawal not hitting him quite so fiercely, thankfully. Mia was his eldest sister, then it was him, his brother Branson, and little Rosalie.

“Rosie’s not so little anymore though. Maker, she’ll be twenty-five come Bloomingtide*.”

Cassandra was tempted to tease the man, that he should send his sister a letter, perhaps keep her appraised to his wellbeing? ‘Happy Birthday, I’m still alive’. But she stopped herself just short of speaking.

Lieutenant Aclassi had informed the advisors in his most recent report, that he discovered Eleanor had absolutely not a single clue, as to what a birthday was.

She knows that people are born, obviously, and that they keep track of their ages. But she did not know that they were a thing of celebration. A fact that was most…well, distressing, it had set the advisors and Cassandra into silence until Lady Josephine gasped and clapped her hands in excitement declaring, ‘Oh! We can throw her the most splendid surprise party! On the day proper! She shall not be expecting it!’.

The prospect was honestly…well Cassandra felt rather excited, almost giddy with it, anticipating what she hoped would be excitement and fun for Eleanor. She wracked her brain for ideas of just what to present her with—it was her sixteenth year, a year that marked her an adult in most of Thedas, and a first birthday for the girl was a rather wild balance. She had time, certainly, but she hoped to find something suitable soon.

When they were finished, the Lieutenant offered up Eleanor’s canteen and Cassandra was almost surprised when the girl turned her back to him popping up on her toes a bit and his gaze went directly to her backside, just a short moment before he leaned in closer to Eleanor’s ear and murmured an assuring, “All good,” to her before handing off her cloak and she thanked him.

Ahh, further assistance, Cassandra hadn’t thought to offer to check for obvious staining for the girl, and the young man hadn’t been gawking at her or anything, it would seem Eleanor felt comfortable enough with him checking for her, he’d been respectful enough.

“What’s next?” Eleanor asked, almost hesitantly. “I know last time I was given the option to learn from Thom but um…I know, I might have to ride around like,” she gestured vaguely to her lower half, “this at some point, and like if someone’s life depended on it or I had to go somewhere for the Inquisition I’d be on it. But, uh, as it is, I love Russell, but I will cry if I even have to climb into a saddle for something not of the upmost importance.”
“Well then, you’re in luck,” Lieutenant Alassi informed her, “magical training is up next. In the Chantry, about an hour from now, since your schedule says you might want to clean up, change out of your roughhousing clothes.”

“Why does Solas want me all fancy?” Eleanor sounded rather ‘miffed’ she would say, crossing her arms over her chest, she informed them, “I feel murder-y again maybe we should run some more drills.”

“As it so happens, Eleanor,” Cassandra offered up, trying very hard to keep her amusement to a minimum, was it so strange to be delighted by familiar ground? Cassandra would be perturbed to be made ‘presentable’ to anyone at the girl’s age, would seek violence even in a mild form to quell her anger even on a good day. But, “Madam de Fer is arriving back in Haven today, she’s requested to see you for a bit of magical training. She put no such request for your state of being but given her standards…”

“Oh!” Eleanor’s shoulders lost some of their tension and she nodded, “Yeah, I probably better get dressed up then, Madam de Fer is very…fancy,” she brightened a bit and said, “I’m glad she’ll be back, I haven’t gotten to see much of her really since she joined on. It was super nice of her to help us with Thom.”

Cassandra would not term the woman negotiating with the Empress to such an efficiency the exchange encouraged assassins to come Eleanor’s way as ‘super’ nor ‘nice’ even if the phrase were a part of her own vernacular. But she supposed it was not the woman’s fault, Cassandra had not been there, it was no doubt unavoidable.

Though she could, and certainly did find fault in her…well…

“I hope you do not mind the intrusion, Eleanor, but Madam de Fer asked that Commander Cullen and myself be present for your first lesson,” first few lessons, the woman had said, when she spoke of teaching Eleanor before they left for the Coast. As if she feared Eleanor would hurt her! The Grand Enchanter requested that Cullen suppress Eleanor’s magic for the duration of their lesson under a Seeker’s supervision. The prospect made Cassandra almost sick, that the girl could ever find herself cut off from something so vital to her survival, what was more it would be, in essence, attacking Eleanor and Cassandra could not think of a situation she could ever bring herself to allow someone to do so.

Cassandra had been forthright with her—Eleanor was not capable of being managed in such a way, and if Madam de Fer so much as made the suggestion to change that status, especially in Eleanor’s presence, Cassandra was not one for boasting of her abilities, but she assured the woman, it was not boasting to inform her that she could cause the magic to burn in her blood far quicker than she could cast that very precious little ice trick she pulled at her salon. She would not have the girl fear her allies, people she relied on for protection, ever using any of their abilities against her. She did not mind Madam de Fer having a measure of caution though. Never the less, when the woman wrote to inform them of her impending arrival, she still requested their presence, and Cassandra was not comfortable leaving Eleanor alone with such a woman who would seek to control and manipulate the girl. Cullen agreed, and together they worked up a response to the Enchanter, letting her know they would in fact be glad to attend, for Eleanor’s sake. Magical suppression would only occur if it became necessary, and they let it set the implication that they were far more likely to do so to Madam de Fer than they were to Eleanor, to keep the girl safe from the Mage if she sought to do something unseemly.

Eleanor seemed pleased at the idea that the Seeker and Commander would be joining them, “Oh gosh, really?” she looked to the Lieutenant and smiled, something wide and excited, “Well, I better go get cleaned up and stuff! I’ll see you two in a bit, yeah?” she said to her teachers.

The Lieutenant looked wholly amused by something and his hand went to the small of Eleanor’s back as he leaned in close and Cassandra saw the word, ‘Smooth’, cross his lips, the word whispered in the girl’s ear before he escorted her from the practice field, back through Haven’s gate.

Smooth?

Had…had…were…

Had they coupled? The young man had exhibited a great deal of understanding and comfort with Eleanor’s current state, was the girl so eager to be alone with the Lieutenant for privacy sake? Thought perhaps Cassandra would be occupied with Cullen, preparing for Vivienne’s lesson and they could—

Oh. Cassandra. Occupied with Cullen.

Oh dear.

Oh Maker, most high.

That…that conniving, meddlesome, absolutely fool-headed—

“Cassandra?” the Commander’s hand was on her arm the man addressing her with some level of concern. “Is something the matter?”

Oh, most certainly. Matchmaking. That horrible, horrible child had been playing matchmaker this entire time! Eleanor had shown substantial improvement in her fighting abilities as they traversed the Hinterlands, but upon their return the girl suddenly began insisting upon witnessing further demonstration than what she had even required when they first began instructing her. The girl had even asked Cassandra if she believed the Commander to be handsome—at the time the Seeker thought perhaps the girl had a bit of a crush on him.

That horrible child, terrible and precious and blessed and eerily perceptive—was it her magic? Had it prompted her in this way? Solas and Marehis were rather well suited for each other—bah! Just what was Cassandra supposed to do with this?! She was a grown woman, she did not get ‘crushes’ but she did have a certain…measure of…infatuation perhaps where the Commander was concerned—she was only a woman! The man was…well most did find him markedly dashing, handsome. What was more he was of strong character, firm in his convictions, and there was even some element strange though it was of…well she often found his regard for Eleanor, seeing how he cared for her, the pride in his expression when the girl conquered a new lesson or the way he was so capable of speaking easily with her of casual things even making her laugh with what were honestly some of the worst jokes Cassandra could care to hear, these things endeared him to her, set a soothing warmth in her chest.

But it would be highly inappropriate! The entirety of the Inquisition required that they keep their focus, do nothing that might cause discord within their ranks as relationships so very often do. And the last thing the man needed at this time in his life was courtship!

“I merely have a headache.” A ginger-haired, green-eyed, five-foot-tall, headache she could strangle or…or possibly hug, she was not sure. Maker, did she have some attachment to the Commander in such a way? Could they somehow benefit from further—no, foolishness all around!

“I understand,” Cullen said, “It isn’t ideal, being at odds with Madam de Fer. I do promise you Cassandra, as far as Eleanor is concerned you and I are of one accord,” he vowed sincerely, “If the Grand Enchanter has such qualms with it, you needn’t worry you would be alone in defending our stance, she can simply withdraw her offer of training the girl. Solas has been proving adequate as instruction enough for her magically.”

Of one accord, Maker preserve them. “Thank you, I am glad you would not discount my conviction that Eleanor needn’t be bound in such a way,” she sighed, focusing on the matter at hand, “I do hope Madam de Fer can find it within herself to teach Eleanor, the girl seems to thrive with tutelage and there are several branches of magical study, Solas alone cannot give her an adequate education in them all. While she seems to have an affiliation for Spirit magic that may derive solely from circumstance, she has not had the opportunity to explore other forms of magic.” The Commander snorted in amusement then, causing Cassandra to raise a brow at him, “Whatever could be so very amusing?”

“I was thinking the same thing—it has been on my mind these past few days how just to convince Madam de Fer to find Eleanor an adequate student, was just about to say as much and… well, it struck me that we would sound rather a lot like parents fretting over getting their child into an exclusive finishing school,” he observed laughingly. “I believe my mother baked brownies to take along to their interview with the headmaster of the school Mia went to.”

Cassandra grunted. “I have no such ability for baking,” she assured him.

“Neither did she,” the Commander returned, “I believe the objective was to threaten the man—let our darling Mia in or be forced to eat brownies you’ll break your teeth on.”

Ahh. “Threats I can manage.”

“Very good,” Cullen said, “Shall we head to the Chantry? We could take the path ‘round the Tavern, stop in at Adan’s if your headache ails you,” he offered lightly.

“I’m well. You are…feeling better today?” she asked.

“Yes. A wonder what adequate sleep does,” he said as they headed for the gate, “I prepared for bed rather early last night. I suppose I’d prefer I regulate my own bedtime than risk Eleanor seeking Inquisitor status to enforce one.” And then, with some measure of added mischief, “Though I must admit I regret I missed all the excitement last night. Varric filled me in over breakfast this morning, he informs me…is it called periwinkle, the color of your robe?”

Oh, she could certainly murder that Dwarf.

“A visit to Adan’s can still be arranged,” Cassandra promised him.

“Seeker, are you blushing?”

“Would you prefer he treat a busted lip or a broken nose?”

“Dealer’s choice,” he supposed, his voice warm, teasing.

Maker was he…? He was flirting! He was flirting, wasn’t he? Just how long had that been going on? Had he done so in front of Eleanor? Was that why she had such ideas in her head? Had… had Cassandra herself been flirting, even inadvertently with the Commander? Surely not!

She did not punch the man in the face. But she did give him a solid shove that had him laughing at her as he stumbled momentarily. Somehow that made it worse, like he’d found her response endearing and she might just…not…hate that. And she hated that.
Now was certainly not the time to be considering such things, they had work to do. Madam de Fer would be arriving soon, and she did truly wish to make sure everything went smoothly.

Lady Montilyet was a blessed woman. There was an alcove in the Chantry where Madam de Fer had a bit of an office space—a well-lit area with desk and chair for the Enchanter to study. When they arrived at the Chantry, Josephine was seeing to it that the place was tidy, a tray of tea sitting on the desk, and the woman had lit candles that smelled of...roses Cassandra ventured a guess, the things were popular in Orlais, it was a pleasant enough scent. There was appropriate seating for their lesson, a chair set aside for if perhaps Eleanor’s bodyguard cared to take a tactical seated position during her lesson, and she had made a point—the chair Madam de Fer favored was seated to the right of the desk, while two chairs sat on either side of a high stool, perfect for being seated while a staff was holstered to one’s back, to the left. Cullen and Cassandra would be seated physically on Eleanor’s side, a clear message to the woman in and of itself.

“Leliana says Madam de Fer will be here shortly. Does everything look alright to you, Cassandra? Porcelain was the best I could find in Flissa’s collection,” Josephine gestured to the tea set.

She certainly wasn’t any great authority on the matter, but, “It is all very lovely, Josephine, you needn’t concern yourself. You’ve done well, thank you.”

“I would not wish to impose, but I thought...well perhaps since we have a War Room meeting this afternoon with Eleanor, and she is feeling so poorly, we could keep her within the Chantry—after her lesson with Madam de Fer we could congregate either in my office or the War Room and have lunch together, the Advisors, and Eleanor?” the Antivan woman proposed, “That way she would not have to go back out into the cold, walk to the Tavern for lunch, only to come back for her meeting.”

Ahh, this she certainly could answer with some surety. “I’m certain Eleanor would be delighted,” Cassandra said, “my schedule is agreeable to such a thing.”

“Mine as well,” Cullen said.

“Excellent—oh!” Lady Montilyet looked about as if to make certain they were alone and then she drew closer to the warriors, her hands reaching out to rest on an arm from each of them, as she whispered—badly, but a valiant effort as if she were truly trying to be covert, “Marehis has made contact. Her missive came in, to Leliana, ten minutes ago, making her return trip through Orlais.”

A sigh of relief heaved in Cassandra’s chest, “Thank the Maker.”

Lady Josephine nodded in agreement, “Yes, Eleanor will be so pleased,” she sighed contentedly and then, almost shyly she probed, “Leliana had reports this morning of um, Lady Eleanor’s introduction into womanhood last night,” she was blushing, seeming almost giddy as she asked, “is it true she erm, proclaimed her love for all who work with her?”

Ahh. Cassandra had found the entire display bemusing, the poor girl had been so very afraid she’d lost that...ugh, Varric’s regard, only Eleanor could be so angry with someone it drove her to shout about how much she loved them. “She did, rather loudly, I’m surprised the din did not wake all of Haven. She listed just about every single person in Haven she has regular contact with, including each and every one of her Advisors.”

“Listed?” Cullen asked.
“As people Eleanor loves.”

“Oh ahh,” the man wrenched a hand around at the back of his neck nervously, cheeks going a bit pink, a small smile on his lips he almost looked flustered though, “Should I…we…anyone ahh address that? Speak to her of our own,” he cleared his throat, “regard? Or would that embarrass her, do you think?”

“It might, perhaps,” Cassandra said, “it was rather a…moment of passion for the girl, she was overwhelmed and venting after a fashion. But it is your prerogative of course, and certainly should Eleanor chose to bring it up to you…”

“I’ll sound like a total sap if she does,” Cullen sighed, “Maker help me I love that girl.” Josephine nodded in agreement.

Maker help her, that was…that was obvious enough she supposed but hearing him say as much was rather a lot like when Eleanor said such things—that she loved or missed or was proud of Cassandra—it was almost overwhelming how very pleased she was at his regard for the girl.

And then the Chantry doors swung open and Cassandra almost shuddered. She did not need to turn around to know just who had entered, even the swing of the doors sounded pretentious though she was certain the woman would not deign to open a door for herself.

She hadn’t. The Iron Bull was acting as an escort of sorts, for Madam de Fer, carrying her luggage for her as well. The Qunari man looked almost chagrined, like a child fearing chastisement from a Chantry Mother.

“Madam,” Bull said, offering her a bow as she released his arm and came gliding into the Chantry.

“My dear Lady Seeker, Commander Rutherford, Lady Montilyet darling!” Vivienne offered them each a peck on the cheek—nothing quite so welcome as Eleanor’s—they were airy and false, a polite gesture of sorts just ghosting the skin of her cheek over theirs making grating little ‘mwahs’. Disconcerting to say the least.

Was it reasonable that of all the people in their party, the likes of Sera, Varric, and Thom Rainier outranked the Grand Enchanter as far as Cassandra was concerned?

“Do pardon my state, I only just got in,” the woman said. She certainly did not look like she was fresh from arduous travel, she was immaculate from head to toe, regal as ever as she dusted imaginary dirt from her hips before settling her hands upon them in a stance that struck Cassandra more like a pose than mere body language.

Yes. Very bottom of the list. She actually, admittedly, liked Sera. Varric was on the thinnest of ice after hurting Eleanor. And loathe that she was that the man was even allowed within a stone’s throw of the girl, she would gladly kiss Thom Rainier if it meant she did not have to endure such…had she said pretention? The woman was pretentious.

“You are lovely as ever, Madam de Fer,” Josephine offered politely. “I hope your travels were pleasant?”

“As they can be,” the woman said sounding put-upon. “I say Haven is rather an inconvenient location, could the Inquisition not benefit from relocating to a more central area?”

“Eleanor did warn you that you may find Haven to be unpleasant,” Cassandra saw fit to point out. “You were quite insistent you could endure it.”
The Iron Bull was staring rather wide-eyed between the Nevarran woman and the Grand Enchanter like he was restraining himself from calling for them to fight. Maker, Cassandra was supposed to be amicable, creating a peaceable environment for Eleanor, persuading Madam de Fer to be comfortable teaching the girl—and too, make certain herself that she was comfortable with the woman teaching Eleanor. Though perhaps making her uncomfortable with Cassandra’s presence would do just that—make the woman decline any such observation from Cassandra and Cullen in future because she found the Seeker so very unpleasant, instilled with the fear of the Seeker’s wrath should she do anything to Eleanor’s harm. That would certainly solve both worries.

“I uh, best be going,” the Iron Bull said, an appreciated effort to stop any further confrontation, and he held out the hand that bore the Mage’s suitcase.

“Set that down over there—gently mind,” Madam de Fer commanded as the Qunari crossed the hall and placed the suitcase by the woman’s desk, with the upmost care.

“It was a pleasure meeting you, Madam de Fer,” he said offering a bow to the Human Mage before he took his leave. Cassandra almost felt annoyed on the Iron Bull’s behalf, being made to play manservant for the woman even before she said, “Oh yes, darling, be on your way,” Vivienne dismissed him with a fluttering wave. Not so much as a thank you.

Bull made to leave though he did stop once the Chantry doors were open, and Cassandra heard the soft rumble in his chest before he said, “Imekari,” ahh Eleanor. The Qunari actually knelt to address her, “you look beautiful, boss.” Cassandra could not see Eleanor over the man’s shoulders, but she could see him raising the back of her unmarked hand to his lips.

“Gosh!” the girl breathed bashfully, “Lady Josie recommended my clothes, Cremisius said. I’m meeting Madam de Fer for lessons—she’s back from Orlais today!!”

“You’re killing it, Ambassador,” the Iron Bull complimented over his shoulder sending the Antivan woman blushing. And then he said, “Introduced myself to Madam de Fer. She’s in and uh,” he glanced over his shoulder at the woman and then turned back to Eleanor and Cassandra caught just the slightest glimpse of his hands splaying before his chest shaking* in what seemed to be a signal of sorts. “Enjoy you’re uh, lesson.”

Whatever it was made the Lieutenant snort while Eleanor giggled, “Thanks, the Iron Bull!”

The Qunari departed leaving way for Eleanor and Lieutenant Aclassi to enter the Chantry and…well.

Cassandra had always abhorred her aunts’ constant berating of her to pretty herself up, wear dresses, but she almost wondered now if they had some point. Seeing Eleanor, there was a sort of aching swell in her chest like pride-mixed adoration. It was most certainly not a ballgown by any stretch of the imagination, paired with her staff holstered to her back, but Eleanor was wearing one of the few dresses Madam Florna had seen fit to make for her, a similar cut as to what Lady Montilyet wore only the sleeves were not puffed, soft tufts of fabric that ran down the girl’s arms, the dark blue material cinched just below her bust, fell cleanly to her knees, warm woolen stockings peeking out over her boots, a bit snow covered on the bottoms but she’d seemed to have taken an opportunity to clean them before she buttoned them up to her knees. Someone had braided the girl’s hair, let it hang over her shoulder and the paper blossom she’d been given that morning was somehow pinned to sit at the very top of the braid by her ear.

Had she ever in her life felt the need to use the term ‘adorable’ out loud? She was struck with the urge to inform Eleanor she appeared as such, just beautiful, yes she could see why the Iron Bull had saw fit to say so.

“My dear Lady Eleanor you look just darling,” Madam de Fer crooned, going to her and giving her one of those air kisses, which Eleanor returned with an authentic kiss to the woman’s cheek, catching the Mage off guard, but she merely smiled politely and as she stepped back informed her, “Your dress is lovely.”

Eleanor seemed excited about that as she said, “Thanks!” and then her hands disappeared into the sides of her dress, by her hips, “It has pockets!”

Maker preserve them all, guard and protect this most precious girl. Cullen physically flinched as he seemed to catch his laughter in his chest, coughing a bit, Lady Montilyet pressed the back of her hand over her lips to contain her amusement and the Lieutenant was red faced as he turned away arms akimbo and he seemed to be holding his breath like that was the only way he would keep from laughing.

For Madam de Fer’s part she stared at Eleanor like she’d just spoken some foreign language, mouth working before she said, “How splendid. And your hair, my lady, who in Haven is your hairdresser?”

“Marehis usually,” Eleanor said, “but today, Mister Stitches did it!”

“Mister…Stitches?” the woman seemed out of her depth like perhaps she thought the girl so juvenile she had an imaginary friend she was trying to insist had done her hair.

“He’s the Charger’s Healer—he came to check on me after my training session this morning. I was just getting ready to leave for our meeting and he offered to help me with my hair—he keeps his hair super short, but he said he used to let it grow out a lot like mine, only his doesn’t curl up quite the same way, he used to twist it into locs.”

The Lieutenant looked wholly amused by the mental image of his company healer with locs as long as Eleanor’s curls. It actually boggled Cassandra’s mind in truth.

“And your…accessory here, whatever did inspire you my dear?” Madam de Fer asked pointing ever so to the flower in Eleanor’s hair, her tone was pleasant enough but something in it told Cassandra exactly what the woman thought of Eleanor running around with paper in her hair.

“It’s a peony!” Eleanor told her, “Cremisius makes them for me and I thought it’d be nice since you like them so well.”

“Oh, how quaint. Cremisius is…?” uncertain as to whom Eleanor was referring.

“Lieutenant Cremisius Aclassi, Bull’s Chargers,” the man himself said offering the woman a respectful bow, “Acting as bodyguard for the Herald this week.”

“You’re a Tevinter?” asked, sounding mildly scandalized.

“Only on the weekends,” the Lieutenant assured her drily. Ahh, his glibness deflated Eleanor’s outright indignancy, the girl had been ready to rise to his defense, but her eyes sparkled with amusement and she had to bite her lip to keep from smiling. Too much, at least.

Madam de Fer did not seem to take offence at his tone. “Ahh. Well I am grateful you guard our lady’s life and apparently craft her fine origami wares. Lieutenant.”
Lady Josephine cleared her throat, “It is wonderful to see you, Eleanor, I am most pleased you’re so well,” she said as she came forward and gave the girl a quick hug, an added warmth in her expression as she her fingers lightly ghosted over Eleanor’s braid as she informed her, “Madam Florna will be delighted with how your dress has turned out, do you like it?”

“Oh, yeah I mean I haven’t worn a dress in forever so it’s a little different but comfy and pretty,” Eleanor enthused, spinning around once on the ball of one foot so the skirt flared out around her knees, the Lieutenant chuckled lightly, his hand at her elbow as she came to a stop to brace her incase she’d knocked herself off balance. “It’s got pockets and twirl factor, I’m pretty sure it’s the best dress ever,” Eleanor concluded and digging into one of the pockets she withdrew one of Seggrit’s cookies, offering it to the Ambassador as thanks.

Lady Montilyet’s smile seemed almost uncontrollable as she accepted the snack in hand. “Thank you, Eleanor, I am so glad you’re pleased with it! I must be going now, but I will see you later,” she assured.

“Oh good! Have a wonderful day, Lady Josie!” Eleanor gave the Antivan woman a little wave and then her attention returned to Vivienne, “I’m so glad you’re back safe. Thank you very much for going with Marehis and Scout Harding to the Oasis! And for negotiating with the Empress for me, I really appreciate it.”

The woman was still staring at Eleanor’s hip like she was mildly concerned what all the girl was keeping in her pockets, and she certainly didn’t seem to think cookies were an appropriate accessory by any means, but she met Eleanor’s eye and assured her, “It was no trouble at all, my Lady, Halamshiral is lovely this time of year. And I must say I am so very pleased with your decision in that regard, Eleanor. It was a very bold first move within the Game, you’ll be the talk of the courts for months, and you chose wisely, further endearing the Empress to our cause.” And then, motioning toward her alcove the Mage said, “Come, let us sit. There appears to be tea.”

“Allow me,” Cassandra spoke quietly as she brushed passed Cullen to take the seat closest to the table, and the man gave her a small, grateful smile. It was an open enough space but with the wall so close, boxed in between Eleanor, with Madam de Fer before him the man may feel a touch claustrophobic*, as he was prone to. As it was, sitting on the other side of Eleanor he had the open space of the Chantry hall at his side and could even step out if need be.

No sooner were they seated then Eleanor was offering the Seeker and Commander cookies as well, because it would be rude just giving Lady ‘Josie’ one and ‘gosh, Seg gave Cremisius so many this morning!’ So, Cassandra and Cullen accepted, and the Seeker watched with some measure of amusement as Madam de Fer took her seat, the image of prim and proper, only to be struck with momentary confusion and uncertainty as to how best to proceed when the girl was offering her up a sugary treat from her pockets of all places.

The woman cleared her throat and using index finger and thumb, with a motion that seemed tentative like she thought the thing might bite her, Madam de Fer accepted the offered treat, “Thank you, my lady.”

“They’re really good!” Eleanor promised the Enchanter before saying over her shoulder, “No cheating!”

“It’s not something you can really cheat at, El,” the Lieutenant said.

“Oi! You don’t get paid for backtalk, Aclassi!” Eleanor sassed before throwing a cookie over her shoulder, Cassandra turned in her seat, the Commander following suit to see the young man standing with his back against the Chantry wall behind Eleanor, where he could watch the proceedings and have a clear view of anyone coming or going in the hall, though with a cookie sailing through the air at him, the Lieutenant took a few steps forward, face upturned to catch it deftly in his mouth before stepping back and leaning casually against the Chantry wall, grin on his lips as he chewed.

“Did he get it?” Eleanor asked excitedly.

“Indeed,” Cassandra was bemused to report, starting to feel out of depth, herself. She wasn’t entirely certain she should just allow the girl to wreck her own special brand of havoc, break Madam de Fer into the reality that Eleanor considered her a party member. Not a noble ally she had to play politician with, but merely a potential friend she could play with, or around at least, befriend in the pure honest way Eleanor made friendships. Though, Vivienne would certainly have to get used to it, especially if she truly planned upon actually acting as a party member and joining Eleanor in the field, the girl was hardly going to adhere to such a role of propriety around the clock to appease the Enchanter.

“Excellent catch, Lieutenant,” Commander Cullen commended the man, the Tevinter executed a quick bow.

Eleanor giggled before popping a bite of cookie into her mouth, returning her focus to Madam de Fer who had yet to consume so much as a morsel of the one offered to her, but under Eleanor’s delighted, expectant gaze the woman took a breath, and took a dainty bite from the snack, and seeming satisfied that it wasn’t disgusting, she carefully finished the thing off in a few polite bites. She seemed to take the opportunity to resettle herself in the situation and attempt to take charge again.

“I have been informed that congratulations are in order,” Madam de Fer said as she poured their tea, an almost unexpected motion but Cassandra supposed there wasn’t a servant around to do so. She offered Eleanor the first cup seated on a small plate, which the girl took very carefully nodding her thanks and looking interested in just what Vivienne thought was worthy of congratulating. “The Iron Bull, is it? Yes, I had him relay Haven’s goings-on in my absence and he tells me that you, Lady Eleanor, have received your very first blood.”

Eleanor smiled and said cheerily, “Thanks, I hate it!” before sipping at her tea.

Cassandra could hear what almost sounded like wheezing coming from the Lieutenant, as it was the Seeker nearly choked as she worked to swallow her own drink of tea.

“It is all part of growing up my dear. Though it does raise some measure of concern no doubt,” Madam de Fer said, taking a delicate sip of her tea, the motion seemingly meant to act like a dramatic pause than anything else, “given you are an Apostate,” the word held mild disdain, skepticism. Madam de Fer had been rather candid with the Advisors with her displeasure when she discovered Eleanor had never been a Circle Mage, but an Apostate the whole of her life.

Eleanor shrugged. “I mean yeah it was kind of crazy last night, I kinda thought I was dying,” she admitted humorously, as if she found the misunderstanding to be funny in retrospect.

“That you were not possessed in your panic is nothing short of a miracle my dear,” Madam de Fer assured her, “and we cannot have you relying on miracles.”

“Oh, gosh. I didn’t have any problem with demons. There’s none nearby around Haven much and even if there were it wasn’t like I would have been possessed. Demons don’t have anything I want.”
“Anyone in a desperate enough situation is susceptible to the allure of demon assistance my dear.”

“Nope. Sorry,” Eleanor said, “No offence, but if you think demons could ever give you anything worth having, you’ve got the entire wrong idea about them.”

The woman raised an eyebrow at that, “Seeker Pentaghast informs me you struggled against demon possession in the Hinterlands. You were not tempted to accept its offer, possession in exchange for the lives of your companions? For their revival in the event of their deaths?”

Cassandra had never considered a teacup a weapon, but she had the sudden desire to break the thing in her hand to hue a sharp edge she could lash out at the woman with. The absolute nerve to so blasé bring up a horrific event for Eleanor—

“Absolutely not, not even for a second,” Eleanor sounded appalled. “I would never wish something like that on my friends, on anyone!”

“You would not wish their survival upon them?” Madam de Fer posed in sardonic tones, it came off a touch too mockingly to Cassandra’s ears.

“Is that what you think would have happened?” Eleanor asked, sounding less shocked and more like she was concerned about the woman, like perhaps Madam de Fer did not know something very important, very basic about demons. The girl was explaining, very gently like it was vital the woman be taught to understand, “Madam de Fer, demons do not fix things. If I’d agreed, even if the demon had spared my friends or brought them back to life, it would be horrible. There would be something wrong about it, their lives would likely be short and miserable after that. Why possess only me when they could work their way around my party possessing them one by one as they call on them for further help? If they’d been dead there was nothing I could do about it, and if they weren’t if it was a trick, eventually the demon would be dead. And if neither of those happened well, I wasn’t going to let him have me—I only struggled because I was injured, badly and recovering, and my magic was pretty tapped out at that point. Otherwise I’d have just been able to shrug him off like normal. It was a matter of waiting until I was better, or one of us dying.”

“Shrug him off? Just like that? That is foolishly bold of you to assume. My understanding is it was a rather formidable demon, capable of ensnaring an entire pack of wolves before he set its sights on you.”

Eleanor shrugged, and Cassandra wondered if perhaps the action was meant to be cheeky, shrugging Madam de Fer off as it were, and she said, “You weren’t there, and you aren’t me. I’ve only ever had a hard time against demons when I’ve been really hurt, and I’ve kept out things a lot worse than some Great Terror on a power trip.”

“Truly? Do pray tell,” Madam de Fer invited, with a wave of her hand.

“Tell…?”

“Enlighten me,” the Mage elaborated, “just what was your closest encounter with demon possession, what exactly is the great standard set by the Herald of Andraste?”

“Pass,” Eleanor said, a firmness to her tones, fists flexing in her lap.

“I beg pardon?”

Eleanor’s Marked hand went around to the back of her head like she meant to scratch her scalp but in the peripheral of her vision, Cassandra saw she merely clenched her hand three times—a signal to the Lieutenant, Leliana had seen fit to mention to her—as she said, “I’m passing on your question,” she dropped her hand back into her lap, “I’m not comfortable answering it, so I’m not going to. You can either move on or we can end this discussion right here.”

That was alarming to say the least—not the girl drawing firm boundaries, that was her right and Cassandra was admittedly proud she could do as much for herself—but Eleanor had never been so reticent to share something of her past, even in those first few days of getting to know each other after facing the Breach. It had been a tenuous process, Eleanor hesitantly padding up to the Seeker at least once a day and engaging her in conversation in an effort to…move past the incredible awkwardness that was only natural when one was faced with befriending someone they once imprisoned. It was almost difficult to picture having any hesitancy to speak with Eleanor now, but the process at the time had been little more bearable than pulling a rotting tooth. Cassandra had initially feared getting to close to the girl, had been worried perhaps she resented her earlier treatment and was merely trying to dredge up personal information to use against the Seeker later, but Eleanor was always forthright with her and she hesitantly returned the favor. Her demon encounter in the Hinterlands had been horrific but she spoke of it freely, even to Sera when the Elf girl albeit rudely, wanted assurances of her own that Eleanor wasn’t ‘going to go all demony’ on her, somehow her denial of elaborating on a past painful experience with a demon made Cassandra curious, gave her questions she wouldn’t dare ask unless the girl brought it up to the Seeker on her own accord, but still she wanted to comfort the girl if she could. As it was, Cullen had also heard the slight tremble in Eleanor’s voice when she first said she would ‘pass’ on the Enchanter’s question, and he’d taken the girl’s unmarked hand in his own.

It was only when Madam de Fer looked like she might still press further that Lieutenant Aclassi’s voice sounded, “The Herald has plenty of other things that could use her attention today. If you’re done here,” backing up Eleanor’s willingness to walk away from their discussion if the Enchanter did not wish to cooperate.

The Mage smiled politely and changed her question. “Demons do not tempt you at all?”

“Not even in the slightest,” Eleanor assured. “They offer me things sure, but nothing I’d ever want, not from them. Imagine your problem or desire is like a remedy to patch up a wound that needs stitches—Demons will give you a bandage every time, something like a fix, that will eventually lead to you calling them back for help again because it doesn’t actually solve all your problems. People usually don’t get possessed on a first brush with a demon because demons have to work their way in—every solution they bring will be trailed after by another problem—probably worked into the fix by the demon themselves—so you’ll call on them again, and again, until they get you. You cannot ever accept anything from a demon—it is much better to either work your problems out on your own, or accept things that are out of your control, even if it means your death, than it is to take something from them that was never meant to work in the first place.”

Madam de Fer seemed thoughtful then. “Perhaps I was mistaken. I did not believe the Apostate Elf could teach you such a sound defense against resorting to blood magic. Scarcely a year with your magic, you were passably equipped to weather brushes with the threat of demon possession.”

Eleanor shook her head. “Solas didn’t have to teach me not to trust demons, I learned that years before the Inquisition. I’m sorry, why do you think I’ve only known of my magic for a year?” Eleanor asked, vocalizing the question for Cullen and Cassandra as well. Solas had shared with Madam de Fer Eleanor’s capabilities, her magical history at length those days when Eleanor and Cassandra had been deliberating in the War Room before leaving for the Storm Coast.

“I do not think that man has quite an accurate grasp on the Trade language, my lady,” Madam de Fer haughtily sniped with a little grin that spoke of superiority, “He said you had been developing your magic for ten years before the Conclave. Obviously, he meant months. You are only fifteen after all—a little later than most*, many start as young as ten to twelve years of age, but then it would seem you are a late bloomer in many respects. There is no harm in that, as long as long as your magic is nurtured correctly, my dear, as I intend to do.”

She looked startled when Eleanor waved to her as if in greeting and reintroduced herself after a fashion, “Hi, Ellie, nice to meet you. Fade dreamed at five, been nurturing my magic on my own with the occasional help of the friendly neighborhood apostate. Solas speaks trade just fine, thanks. Dear.”

The Commander had to shift, arm resting on the arm of his chair, hand raised so he could press his lips to his knuckles to hide his smile. Cassandra was rather caught between schooling her own expression and her pleasure that Eleanor was not holding any pretense with the Enchanter—she could remain almost completely reserved but she was absolutely certain her eyes held her pride in the girl at her side for not wavering in her convictions even to the likes of someone as intimidating as the Grand Enchanter.

Madam de Fer leveled the girl a cool stare as she very measuredly said, “I will be forgiving with your tone Eleanor, as I do understand you may be finding yourself unbalanced at this time.”

“Nope,” little ‘pop’ of the ‘p’ as the girl assured her, “this is my regular balance, but you’re pretty new so I get you don’t realize that yet,” Eleanor returned casually, no trepidation in speaking against the Mage. “Speak disrespectfully to or of my friends Madam de Fer, I don’t much care what you do with my tone. Forgive it, return it, whatever, it’s yours that needs adjusting. Solas is one of the most intelligent men and most powerful mages I’ve ever met in my life, he’s had much more time with me and my magic to study and understand it, and you just discredited his knowledge on the matter because he’s an Elf, that is just insulting. I can get maybe thinking he misspoke because he’s a person and last time I checked we do that, but you barely need to have half a conversation with Solas to know he speaks Trade just as well as the rest of us—better than me any day. We played along and respected the conditions of the invitation you sent me in Val Royeaux, but you’re in the Inquisition now. Our salon. Solas is a valued member of our team, just like you. His worth isn’t less because of the shape of his ears, so you’ll treat him as such. Same goes for everyone else—if you belittled Marehis or were rude to her in any way while in the Oasis you better apologize and make things right, because I will absolutely not abide any disrespect toward her. Full stop. End of story, that woman does everything for me, anyone that messes with her will have to answer to me and I’m crafty. Sera’s the best archer anyone in the Inquisition’s ever seen, second only to Varric and that’s honestly because Bianca’s such an amazing weapon, and he can negotiate circles around the shrewdest businessman. And I don’t know what you said to the Iron Bull—who is absolutely without a doubt mad intelligent, and the best mercenary commander I’ve ever met—if you were rude to him, you should apologize, and you’re certainly not to speak down to him just because he’s Qunari. Same goes for Cremisius—his being Tevinter doesn’t make him any less an incredible asset to the Inquisition, and frankly I appreciate your efforts with the Empress, but it gave me an actual ulcer and I was almost poisoned over it, whereas Cremisius just gives me pretty flowers and saved me from said poisoning.”

“…I see,” Madam de Fer said working to formulate a response.

“Mmm, I don’t think you do,” Eleanor said. “See, what really miffs me—like most out of all of this—is that I’ve seen you and Cassandra cat-fighting it out with the glares and the stares this entire time,” Eleanor informed her, “but you won’t dare bring your grievances with her out in the open, you’ve been treating her with politeness and respect. You belittle people who haven’t done anything other than, in Solas’s case try to help you prepare for teaching me, but you won’t be up front and confront the Human Seeker, who you’ve got an actual problem with. In case you haven’t realized I’m more than happy to talk my issues out with people, doesn’t matter that your Human or a Grand Enchanter, what matters is that you’re rude, classist, and racist, and then you go the extra step of not even brave enough to be up front about it. You dress it all up like graciousness, like you’re really putting yourself out to dare breathe the same air as someone you believe to be less than, oh don’t you deserve some grand reward,” Eleanor drawled before informing the woman, “I’m never going to have a tolerance for that. You’re a powerful ally, but that doesn’t mean anything if you compromise the work we do here because you can’t bring yourself to cooperate with your team mates. You can either treat everyone you work with, with respect, or you can go wait the Breach out back in Orlais. I’ll be sure to ask Lady Josie to write you when it’s gone.”

It was all vaguely similar to one of the few arguments Eleanor had had with Sera. The Elf girl had some measure of prejudice—against Elves mostly which struck Cassandra as rather odd—it was almost wild to see the girl railing at the Grand Enchanter in the same way she’d reprimanded her Rogue Friend. Cassandra was not certain just how well the Grand Enchanter would handle Eleanor lecturing her, was ready to put herself between the two should the woman seek to lash out at the girl in any way. But the Enchanter stared at the young Apostleate for a moment, eyes glimmering with something that looked pleased and surprised before she spoke, “The standards for my Salon, while admittedly biased were not based off of my personal views. It is simply how things are in Orlais, that does not make it a sentiment I believe in—it is merely how the Game is played,” Vivienne appealed. “I do regret I left such an impression on you.”

“Welcome to my game, Madam de Fer, the only one that matters if you’re going to work with me,” Eleanor returned offering the woman a small, kind smile, “Good news is, the rules are simple enough—play nice, or don’t play at all. Think you can handle that?”

Instead of answering Eleanor directly, she chose to speak loud enough so the young man she addressed could hear, “Lieutenant Aclassi, I do apologize for my earlier rudeness. You’ve done well to protect the Herald and I must say,” she said, looking to Eleanor, “I’m rather glad of it.”

“No problem,” the Lieutenant assured. “My pleasure really.”

“You’ll find no issues from me, working with the rest of your companions, Eleanor. I do realize my comment about Ser Solas’s grasp of Trade was…uncalled for. I assure you I didn’t discredit the man simply because he is an Elf. I discredited him because you are a girl. I’ve never heard of such a case, a child as young as five suffering Fade dreams,” Madam de Fer explained. “As for my qualms with Seeker Pentaghast it is she who is upset with me. I asked her here, along with Commander Cullen, because I wished for them to suppress your magical abilities for the duration of our lesson. They declined, obviously, and my request offended the Lady Seeker. I must say I’m surprised they still chose to accompany you.”

“Your request offends me as well, Madam de Fer,” Cullen assured. “For the record.”

“We saw fit to join Eleanor, not you,” Cassandra said, more so for Eleanor’s benefit—she did not want her to worry the Seeker and Commander had had a change of heart about suppressing her. “You cannot honestly believe we would allow her to be alone with someone who would wish to leash her.”

Eleanor took a deep breath, head rocking back and forth the way she did when she was mulling something over legs swinging—Maker her feet didn’t touch the floor, wasn’t she due a growth spurt at some point?—Cassandra wondered if the Enchanter would chastise the girl for her unladylike manner, her knees were together and the dress fell past them while she sat but Cassandra would have been reprimanded in a heartbeat if she did the same thing with one of her aunts around.

“Cassandra, is anyone using downstairs for anything?” Eleanor asked after a moment of contemplation.

Their cells were vacant now—their traitors and assassin dealt with, Butler free and clear, wandering Haven, helping Leliana get her spies regrouped and everyone reassigned to their next jobs. But still that did not make her question any less strange. “…no, Eleanor. Why?”

“Cremisius!” the girl called over her shoulder, beckoning the man forward as she rose from her seat, cringing a bit and whispering to herself, “Gross. Standing.” And then, to Cassandra, “I promised Sera I’d do something sooo…I’ll go do that. You guys work out your stuff yeah?”

…work out their stuff? Did she not understand what the woman had said? “Eleanor, Madam de Fer wanted your magic bound—!”

The girl put a hand on her shoulder then, leaning in close to intone, “Cassandra, she thought I was new. But thank you for sticking up for me.” And then she kissed the Seeker on the cheek before doing the very same with Cullen as she passed him, though having his head level with hers she looked her bodyguard as if in question before looking at the Commander’s hair again, and the Lieutenant spared the man a look before shrugging and nodding.

“Eleanor?” Cullen asked.

The girl hopped backward, hiding her hands behind her back, eyes wide as she belligerently declared, “I’m not making you a hat!” before she grabbed the Lieutenant’s hand, the Tevinter man openly laughing as she pulled him away down into the Chantry basement to give the adults a private moment to argue if need be. And possibly apologize. To not have to do so in front of witnesses may bring them more easily, not sting their prides so very much. Though she did wonder what Eleanor could promise the likes of Sera from the Chantry basement.

“She has quite a way of cutting to the chase,” the Grand Enchanter commented. “Her Marehis gave me some forewarning I would have a lecture on my ‘elitism’ in store for me upon properly meeting with Eleanor, but I did not expect it to be quite so…” Madam de Fer smiled, something that seemed far more genuine than anything she’d done that day, “She’s a tenacious little thing. I believe I might like her,” and then, “I do apologize, Lady Seeker, Commander, for requesting she be suppressed. I assure you I genuinely believed her to have only had active magic for scarcely a year—I have seen Mages with even three, four years under their belts bring near-destruction with accidental magic, and those are people of the highest caliber, trained properly in a Circle.”

Ahh. Eleanor’s insistence that Vivienne thought she was ‘new’. That was…adequate explanation. Understandable, even, the woman feared Eleanor would have zero control, be prone to wild magic left right and center—in which case it was reasonable to desire having someone on hand who could put a stop to the girl’s power. Cassandra…Maker she felt foolish now. She, herself, had had quite a struggle coming to terms with the girl’s magical ability. She’d assumed the same—that Eleanor could not possibly have had more than a few years of experience with her magic before the Inquisition but working alongside the girl had proven her claims of a longer relationship with her power.

“Madam de Fer, I apologize for my candor with you, truly,” Cassandra said, “I did not realize your concern was born of misunderstanding.”

“I’m sorry as well,” Cullen assured. “You must understand, Solas informed us he’d briefed you on the Herald’s magic. When you insisted upon suppressing her we feared it was out of some form of cruelty, taking an incredibly harsh, unnecessary approach to your lessons that we would not abide from anyone trying to teach Eleanor. Making her incapable of defending herself magically, in your presence.”

“I do see how that could sound…beyond abhorrent,” Vivienne agreed. Though she did see fit to question, “You’re certain of her history?”

“As we can be. And as you’ve seen, Eleanor is not deft in the art of unnecessary deceit,” Cassandra mused, looking to Cullen. “She is apparently, not making the Commander a hat, after all.”

Cullen shook his head, grinning ear to ear at the prospect. “Maker, that girl. She thought I was chilled yesterday,” Cullen sighed asking, “Does she even know how to knit?”

“No, but the Lieutenant is teaching her to do so,” Cassandra informed him, wearily, “it will likely be her first attempt at such a thing…the erm, quality…”

“Will be greatly appreciated,” the Commander insisted, in a way that made Cassandra certain the thing could be some ghastly garish color, have more holes in it than the heavens, and the man would wear it like it was the finest garment in all Thedas. Oh, Maker that was almost infuriatingly endearing was he doing that on purpose? “I swear she worries for me worse than my sisters.”

She did see fit to tease, “Does Eleanor know your favorite color? Or is the color of your ‘not a hat’ dealer’s choice as well?”

Oh, and he made certain she regretted it. “Maybe I should drop hints that my favorite color is periwinkle,” he proposed with an impish grin.

The nerve! “I hope it is…what is that horrible pink color Lady Josephine thought Eleanor might like? It’s popular with the youth in Orlais’ gentry.”

“Fuchsia,” Madam de Fer drily supplied, with some measure of derision, like it was a horrid unseemly disease as opposed to a color. “Please tell me the Lady Herald has better taste than that.”

“I should think so,” Cullen said, “She’s dressed herself since Marehis has been away, fairly well, and I must say while I missed out on the ro- excitement last night,” he chose his words carefully under Cassandra’s glare though it did not wipe the smile off his face, “you missed seeing Eleanor in purple—color of your armor and Leliana’s,” he said, tapping the lavender leather over Cassandra’s forearm. “It was very fetching.”

Madam de Fer seemed rather interested in their banter, eyeing the hand on Cassandra’s arm though she asked, “Where is Marehis? When we parted ways in the Oasis I was under the impression she would be returning to Haven shortly. Before my own return even.”

“Work for the Inquisition kept her in Orlais longer than she originally anticipated,” Cassandra explained.

“A pity,” Vivienne said as if it truly were such, huh. Perhaps the woman was forthright about her standing with Marehis, the women may have bonded in their time together. “She was so looking forward to seeing Eleanor again soon—she spoke of little else, so much I must say I feel almost as if I spent those weeks with the girl herself.”

Wishing to extend a peace offering of sorts, Cassandra listened closely to ensure she did not hear the young people returning and then asked, “Did Marehis tell you Eleanor’s birthday?”

“She did, in fact,” Madam de Fer preened ever so, seeming excited at the prospect, “it may have lent inspiration to my latest bit of shopping.”

Ahh. That…Cassandra had been feeling rather a lot better about Madam de Fer’s regard for Eleanor now that they were past their confrontations and suppression misunderstandings, but somehow hearing the woman had gotten the girl a present was pleasing, even more so lessened the reluctance Cassandra felt with her. Was that all it took to improve standing with the Seeker these days? Show Eleanor the sparest bit of genuine kindness? Too, while she was almost jealous the woman could so easily know what she wanted to gift Eleanor, she seemed like she’d gotten to know rather a lot about the girl from Marehis—it gave Cassandra the idea perhaps she should confide in the Elf woman once she was back, she might have some idea of what Eleanor would like. She found herself smiling slightly, even as she said, “I would ask you to not bring up birthdays to Eleanor—living as she has, she’s never celebrated the day, we believe she does not even realize people do as such. The hope is to surprise her with a party on the day itself.”

Madam de Fer looked dumbstruck at the notion. And then, “Should any assistance be needed with arrangements, planning, I do have connections that could be of value.”

“Lady Montilyet is handling the better portion of party planning, but I’m certain if you offered she would gladly accept the assistance should she need it.”

The echoing clatter of boots skipping up the stairs and the jovial lilt of Eleanor’s voice announced her impending return, arm in arm with the Lieutenant who was chuckling lowly as he trailed alongside the girl.

“All better?” Eleanor asked cheerily as they joined the adults.

Cassandra nodded as Madam de Fer assured her, “Yes, my dear.”

“Great!” she squeezed her bodyguard’s arm before releasing hold of it, the young man acknowledging them with a polite nod before he returned to his post. Eleanor seemed to be returning to her seat, but she stopped just before Madam de Fer and leaned down to wrap her arms around the Enchanter’s shoulders in a hug. “I wasn’t trying to be mean or rude—we just all have to be able to work together, and I was encouraged to have a conversation with you later, not call you out at your own party. Later just didn’t happen until now. But I really appreciate everything you’ve done for the Inquisition so far and I am glad you’re back, I’m sorry if I made it sound like I wasn’t..”

Madam de Fer seemed patted the girl’s back albeit hesitantly, before Eleanor pulled away, sweeping her skirt against the back of her legs as she resumed her seat between Cullen and Cassandra.

“Think nothing of it my dear. I’m pleased we can move past it,” Vivienne assured her with a dismissive flutter of her hand. “Now. If you’re agreeable, I should like to ascertain your magical maturity for myself. Solas informs me you understand Barrier, yes? To the extent you needn’t a staff?”

Eleanor nodded, smiling as if pleased to hear the woman hadn’t just heard the Apostle’s explanation of her abilities and denoted it as forgettable, and was seeing fit to pull from it now as a credible source of knowledge. Madam de Fer held up her left hand. “Call the spell into your hand, do not strain yourself now, but attempt to match it to this,” the woman instructed, a glow of purple light blossoming in the palm of her hand, “as best you can.”
Eleanor held up her unmarked hand to mirror Vivienne’s and Madam de Fer’s eyes widened when the first pulse of barrier consumed the whole of Eleanor’s hand before shrinking down to fit in her palm.

More pride then, it almost felt strange to be so pleased over magic but seeing Eleanor so proficient made her feel as such. She supposed it wasn’t bizarre, she often found herself pleased when she saw Eleanor’s progress in her other realms of training, magic…perhaps magic should not be any different. It certainly didn’t feel different.

“You’ve…remarkable control,” Madam de Fer commented. “May I?”

Eleanor held out her hand to the woman and allowed her to examine the glow of Barrier more closely, and after she looked to Eleanor meaningfully, received a nod from the girl, the Enchanter very carefully touched her own barrier spell to Eleanor’s for a solid minute before pulling away and seeming…almost shaken, the woman took a moment to compose herself, she was silent in such a way Cassandra felt compelled to remain so as well despite the questions the interaction called to her lips, while the Enchanter poured herself another cup of tea. She sat and did not speak until she had taken five separate, neat drinks punctuated by moments of pause, draining the cup before she set it aside.

“Not quite as refined as what comes from Circle training but…more than passable my dear. Though I do find an almost disturbing oneness with the Fade in your magic. Tell me Eleanor, have you imbibed Lyrium before at all?”

Eleanor shook her head. “Nope! Back alley stuff’s dangerous, costs an arm and a leg to boot and I’ve never had an interest in it. Oh! Well like one time, I think?” and for a moment Cassandra was horrified the girl had tried Lyrium off the street but she said, “I was given Lyrium when uh…I woke up after the Conclave, right?” she asked the Seeker.

Ahh. “Yes,” Cassandra confirmed quickly, not wishing to delve into that matter at all. Though the girl labeling it as ‘one time’ did make her wonder, “Eleanor, you’ve not been using Lyrium?” that…didn’t sound right. Eleanor dealt with Fade dreams, nightmares, Lyrium* is what makes a Mage’s connection to the Fade so very intense that they dream in it consciously after their initial magical awakening, and Adan had been most gratified that the girl found his old potions master’s improved recipe for an advanced form of the stuff, made sure fresh was made for all their travels.

“They’re the glowy blue bottles in our caches, right?” Eleanor asked, when the Seeker nodded she said, “I keep some on hand in my field stash in case Solas runs out while we’re away from camp or on the road, and I’d totally use it if there was an emergency but um, it increases a Mage’s connection to the Fade and I’m already too close for comfort with it. I haven’t struggled much with Fade dreams since I first found my magic, but since the Breach, my Mark makes me Fade dream, s’why I use potion if I just want to straight up sleep, avoid the Fade—it’s not bad all the time I can use the time I’m sleeping to think about things or process things in a conscious way, but sometimes you just wanna sleep you know? Taking Lyrium would probably be counter intuitive to that.”

“The Mark causes you to Fade dream*?” Madam de Fer asked, aghast. And then, “Might I see?”

Eleanor nodded and offered up her Marked hand for the Enchanter’s examination, she practically pulled Eleanor out of her seat, the girl jolted forward jarringly as Vivienne took hold of her hand and brought it close, as it was the woman rose from her own chair to be closer, regarding the Mark now like it were some horrifying, gaping, gushing wound. When Eleanor displayed her Mark as proof of her Herald status upon meeting Madam de Fer, the woman had brushed it off, aloof and charming about the entire thing…Cassandra had perceived it as the woman being uncaring or disinterested but she realized now she had been afraid of the Mark, not willing to show that fear in front of others. It was fear for herself, that the Mark might be a danger to her or others. But now she had no hesitancy to display the urgency fear placed in her, that it might be a danger to the girl.

Vivienne traced a finger carefully along the Mark, calling Barrier into her hand again she said, “I know no spell that would be compatible with your Mark, but I would attempt to examine it in such a way, if you have no objection. It is only a theory.”

Eleanor nodded. “It shouldn’t hurt you but be careful, yeah? Solas hasn’t examined it with anything other than Rift magic.”

Madam de Fer nodded and pressed her spell filled hand to Eleanor’s Marked one, the girl’s eyes went wide as she gasped in surprise though otherwise she remained still and silent as the woman examined her Mark, though Vivienne did not maintain contact for nearly as long as she had when examining the girl’s magic, and when she pulled away she shook out her hand for a second as if it stung.

“Eleanor? Vivienne?” Cassandra prompted. The Mages spoke in unison with conflicting answers. Vivienne’s quiet, shocked, “It burns.” Overlapping Eleanor’s surprised, “It stopped burning!”

“That thing is unnatural!” Madam de Fer proclaimed as she actually began to pace, out into the Chantry hall and back toward her desk click click click click the scrape of her heel as she turned, click click click click, and again.

“Eleanor? Has your Mark stopped burning still?” Cassandra asked quietly, some irrational-feeling bead of hope rattling around in her chest, like she knew what the answer would be but did not wish to believe it until the girl herself said it.

She shook her head ‘no’. “Nope! I think it just stopped interacting with my Magic because it got preoccupied with Madam de Fer’s. Sorry, I didn’t think it would do that—it’s never hurt anyone else before, promise!”

“I have never studied this ‘Rift magic’, it is not taught in Circles, but neither have I heard of it even from other quarters, you say Solas knows of it? Has used it to examine your Mark?”

Eleanor nodded. “In some of our lessons yeah. I don’t think the Mark burned him though. Are um, are you alright? Your magic doesn’t hurt, or anything still does it?”

“I’m well, it ceased burning at once when I stopped examining that thing,” the woman said though she still continued to pace, restlessly like she were anxious. When she neared the desk again, Eleanor reached out with her unmarked hand and took a hold of Vivienne’s hand, giving it a squeeze, thumb rubbing a soothing path back and forth along the back of the Mage’s hand, bringing her to a halt. Magic shone in the girl’s fingers before Madam de Fer returned the magical gesture, and Eleanor said, quietly, an almost-whisper, she seemed to speak to the woman’s Magic,

“You’re safe now, you interacted with something scary, but it can’t hurt you unless you reach out to it again. You’re safe, and so is your mistress,” and then to Vivienne, magic disappearing from their joint hands the girl said, “It’s okay, my magic needs talking down too sometimes.”

“You talk to your…” the woman sounded appalled at the idea even as she flushed with embarrassment, clearing her throat and very primly resuming her seat hands clenching as she placed them in her lap. “I do apologize, I’ve never encountered such a thing before.”

Eleanor shrugged. “It’s no big deal really, happens to everyone I think. Er. Well, everyone who’s a Mage that is—I almost had a full-blown panic attack day one training with Cullen and Cassandra,” she shared, an effort to lessen the woman’s shame. “Magic was absolutely terrified of Cullen. It was certain he was using our lessons as some sort of ruse to lure me in for the kill. Like he couldn’t get away with just outright murdering me, but he might be able to go ‘whoops I was teaching her a move and my hand slipped, my bad!’ or something,” she reported humorously, and she rested her head on the Commander’s shoulder assuring him, “Magic likes you fine now though, thinks you’re just neat!”

Ahh. Cassandra had wondered why the man had seen fit to take Eleanor aside that day, make her laugh, he’d seen her trepidation with him where Cassandra had thought the girl merely breathless from still recovering after the Breach, or perhaps nervous to learn a new skillset. Maker bless him.

The man wrapped his arm around Eleanor’s shoulders, rubbing her arm as he spoke into her hair, “Well, you’re certainly not to tell anyone, but I think your magic’s neat too,” he teased.

“Oi! What about me?”

“You’re alright I suppose,” he understated warmly, smiling as he gave her arm a squeeze and pulled away.

“Rude!” Eleanor accused laughingly.

Cassandra shook her head. Whatever was she to do with them?

“Vivienne, you are well now, I trust?” Cassandra asked, “Would you care for more tea perhaps?” she thought to offer the Enchanter. She appeared to have herself more in hand.

“I am, though I will decline on more tea, thank you,” the Enchanter looked to her wrist then, at the delicate diamond encrusted timepiece there and said, “I believe our time is nearly through, my dear. I should…hope you would be willing to learn from me?”

Eleanor nodded enthusiastically, “Of course! I’d really like that.”

“Splendid,” the woman returned, “I believe I shall go and confer with master Solas, perhaps his expertise will lend some understanding to your Mark, and we can compare what I have learned of your magic to his knowledge.”

“I’ll tell him you’re on your way! I can’t be sure but he’s usually in his cabin, if not the Tavern’s not far, he’ll be there. Oh! Noon!” Eleanor said in realization and then, “Would you like to eat together? Solas would probably be fine talking over a meal?”

“Actually, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, “Lady Josephine is making arrangements for you and your advisors to commune in her office for lu—”

Eleanor gasped and jumped up from her seat to whirl around, pointing an index finger at Cassandra causing the Seeker’s brows to shoot up in surprise, and that was before the girl insisted,
“Nope! No no no no no! We do not say that word in this Inquisition, anymore! Not in a context that relates to me! It’s banished, it’s banned, it’s—Cremisius, I really want another ‘buh’ word!”

“The Lady Herald has officially barred the use of the ‘L’ word for the meal we consume at noon,” the Lieutenant supplied.

…the word lunch…was…barred?

“Barred! Yes!” Eleanor wiggled excitedly, beaming a smile to the young man. And then to Cassandra, “Can we give him a raise? I think Cremisius deserves a raise!”

He certainly did, Cassandra agreed, more so for his work this week than his ability to offer Eleanor alliteration. She had already discussed as much with Lady Montilyet, arrangements to increase the man’s hazard pay after yesterday’s foiled poisoning attempt that could have potentially lost them the Lieutenant and their Spymaster along with Eleanor. “You are barring it because…?” Cassandra prompted instead.

“I’ve had nothing but awful, terrible luck with that word, all week long!” Eleanor explained. “Sunday I got a headache ‘cause I missed it, then the Varric drama, and then I slept through the next day’s noon meal, and then yesterday I almost got poisoned! So, I’m hoping to trick the universe into thinking I’m just going for a largish snack, that just so happens to be at noon, so it has absolutely no reason to make me sick, or get yelled at, or attacked.”

Madam de Fer’s eyes widened at the recap of Eleanor’s…truly hectic week, and she looked at the Seeker like she expected some form of explanation or perhaps for Cassandra to assure her Eleanor was prone to exaggeration.

“You’ve had quite the week Eleanor, but the universe is not conspiring to ruin your l-,” lunch dates, she wanted to say, but chose to humor the girl, “noon meals.”

“Um, that’s,” Eleanor counted carefully, silently mouthing the numbers as she carefully counted her fingers, one two three four, “four times in a row, Cassandra! I’m not usually superstitious, but that makes me at least a little-stitious.”

Maker help her, she felt like smiling at the girl’s bit of wordplay. She heard the Lieutenant snort and Cullen actually indulged her further, chuckling a bit before saying,

“Well then, there’s no reason to tempt fate,” and then louder, as if speaking to the universe itself, “I would be delighted to share a large afternoon snack with you, Eleanor! It’s just a snack mind!”

“Thank you,” Eleanor said, pecking a little kiss to his cheek, “Advisors means you’re coming too, right Cassandra?”

If she did not expire from this girl’s antics beforehand, certainly. “Indeed.”

Eleanor seemed more than pleased about that, “Good! Madam de Fer? Would you care to join us?” she asked the Mage.

“That is very kind of you my lady, but I must decline,” Vivienne said, and Cassandra almost wondered if the woman were perhaps nervous to be near Eleanor during her lunch hour now that it had been established as a cursed event, but she said, “I would like to confer with Solas while our lesson is still fresh to my mind and our discussion will likely be incredibly involved, it would not make for suitable company. But perhaps we will sit down to debate over repast.”
“Oh! Talking about past stuff with Solas should warm him right up to you!” Eleanor enthused, “He loves history and stuff, studies it a lot in the Fade, it’s always really fun to talk with him about! Just, you know, make sure you eat, okay?”

Madam de Fer took in a breath like her chest had filled with laughter she wished to suppress, though she did seem wholly amused as she politely explained, “Ahh, my dear girl, repast means ‘meal’.”

“Oh. Whoops!” Eleanor giggled sheepishly, “That’s good then! Repast away! Oh, but that doesn’t sound very nice, like re-‘passed away’, huh,” the girl seemed to mull it over.

“That was not a proper sentence regardless, I’m afraid,” the woman informed her, though not unkindly. “I do hope you enjoy your own repast with your Advisors, my lady. I shall seek out Solas. In the mean-time, Eleanor, I did intend to discuss with you what sort of direction you would like to take your magic in. You’ve developed strong Spirit magic but I would be more than capable to help guide your magic in other paths of craft you may be interested in—I have a list I was going to go over with you but I’ll leave it for you to examine for next time,” she said her fingers slipping into what Cassandra had thought a seam in the hip of her outfit but it was actually a very thin, small pocket she pulled a slip of paper from offering it to the girl with a wink as she shared almost conspiratorially, “All of my dresses have pockets.”

Eleanor took the offered paper smiling as she said, “Madam de Fer, I think you and I are going to be really great friends.”

“I’ve never been one for befriending teenagers,” Madam de Fer informed her in albeit dry tones as she stood before the girl.

Eleanor was grinning as she bounced on her toes a bit. “That’s okay! I’ll teach you,” she promised.

“And so, you might,” the Mage conceded, delivering them a very regal nod before she was sweeping out of the Chantry doors.

The moment the woman was gone Eleanor visibly relaxed, coming to plop down unceremoniously into her seat and resting her head on Cassandra’s shoulder.

“That went okay, right?” she asked.

“It did indeed,” Cassandra promised her, wrapping an arm around the girl’s shoulders and indulging in a kiss to her hair before asking, “Eleanor, what exactly did you promise Sera you would do for her in the Chantry basement?”

The girl sat up and smiled brightly, something full of mischief and glee as she said, “You’ll just have to wait and see!”

Wait and see indeed. It was almost maddening, for the life of her Cassandra could not think of what Sera would want from the Chantry, and Eleanor’s pockets were thin enough anything too large would be obviously seen so she didn’t think the girl had stolen or planted something for the Elf.

It took some maneuvering to gather around Lady Josephine’s desk for their meal—her office was L shaped and not necessarily large, multiple desks, few chairs, a trunk, it took some rearranging to get everything functional. Eleanor assisted Lady Montilyet in clearing off her desk while Cassandra and Leliana brought in more chairs, and when they returned, the girl immediately volunteered to help Cullen with moving the thing to the center of the room so they could easily sit around it—though when Eleanor made to lift her side of the desk, she appeared shocked at how very easily she hefted the thing, and then her cheeks colored a very vibrant red when she realized she had not lifted it alone. The Lieutenant had come around, his arms on either side of her as he assisted the Herald and Commander.

Cassandra was heartened by Leliana wishing to be seated next to Eleanor, even more so because when she vocalized that fact, Eleanor seemed delighted, Marked hand eagerly patting the empty chair on her left. The girl was seated with her back to the door, so the Lieutenant sat across from her, next to Lady Montilyet, keeping the Herald and the only entrance in his sight.

Then the girl invited Cassandra to take the chair to her right—sitting before the table end and she realized the girl may have done a bit of maneuvering. Cassandra wasn’t sure how she’d planned it or executed such a scheme…perhaps the Seeker was being paranoid…but she found herself seated directly opposite the Commander.

“Cullen, did Cassandra tell you about the band of bears we fought on the way back from the Coast? Gosh, that was tough, but Cassandra kicked major butt! Bear butt!” the girl giggled at the bit of borderline potty-humor.

Ahh. She was not paranoid. Conniving, sneaky—Eleanor had warned Madam de Fer she was ‘crafty’ and Cassandra had been inclined to find the threat laughable, but now she was not so certain.

“Oh, no she hasn’t.” Cullen said, looking to Cassandra something like pride and amusement in his eyes as he asked, “I would certainly love to hear all about how you kicked bear butt.”

The man could not fight the smile his sentence brought to his lips, Cremisius snorted, Eleanor giggled in delight and Leliana and Lady Josephine were sharing an amused stare before the Spymaster insisted, “Do regale us, Cassandra.”

Regale them indeed.

The Seeker, begrudgingly, recounted the fight, and it there was some vindication to be found when the tables were turned on Eleanor—the Iron Bull had apparently told Cremisius something of that particular battle, the Tevinter man saw fit to mention the girl having used her training with Cullen and Cassandra to unleash the end of her staff on a bear’s snout—she was abashed at the praise the move earned her from Commander and Lieutenant alike.

Eleanor got exactly what she asked for, thankfully, perhaps there was some superstition to be brought to bear. None present used the word ‘lunch’ to describe their gathering, and there was no getting sick, no yelling, and no attack. Just chatter and laughter and a good meal. Leliana asked after Eleanor’s attempts at knitting and the girl was pleased to inform them she thought the activity very fun—Cremisius is ‘just so very good at it!’ and then Eleanor mentioned her discovery that the Commander had siblings, and wished to know about Leliana and Lady Josephine, if they wished to share. The Spymaster turned the question over to their Ambassador who delighted Eleanor with the fact that she did indeed have several younger siblings—three brothers and one sister, most of them not much older than Eleanor.

They sat around talking once everyone was done eating and their dishes were cleared away, since there was technically still a good bit of time before they were scheduled to meet in the War Room, when the door to Lady Montilyet’s office swung open, the Lieutenant’s eyes immediately assessing before he grinned.
“Iiiiiiilinky!”

Ahh. “Sera, to what do we owe the honor?” Cassandra asked, “Are we about to be enlightened as to what you asked of Eleanor from the Chantry basement?”

“Didn’t ask Inky to pinch nothin’ from your basement lady priss, I asked her to put something in it! Did you do it?” Sera asked, coming forward to hug the girl from behind, her arms around Eleanor’s neck, resting her chin atop her hair.

“Done!” Ellie confirmed, “Cremisius helped!”

“Oh shite, yeah I shoulda thought of that,” Sera said, hugging the girl tighter, “Sorry Inky!”

“It wasn’t a big deal,” the Lieutenant said with a shrug, “just figured Ellie shouldn’t be crawling around and getting her clothes dirty.”

Crawling around? Just what on the Maker’s green world had gone on in the bare five minutes Eleanor had left the adults alone? Cassandra could feel the bewilderment on her face, the expression seemingly drawing some measure of delight from Eleanor at the Seeker’s expense, though there was some mercy to be found when the girl said, “Come on! You can watch and even join in if you like, Sera says it’ll be fun!”

Cremisius linked arms with Eleanor, keeping a good pace even when the girl hopped her way down the chantry steps into the empty basement hallway.

The nearly empty basement hallway.

Cassandra let out a sort of half-disgusted, somehow half-relieved groan.

“You did a good job Kremmy-boy, it looks great!” Sera clapped, before pulling a small smooth reddish stone from her pocket, “Inky? You ready to play hopin’ scotch?”

Eleanor apparently had chalk tucked away in one of her dress pockets—not the one with cookies in it that’d be ‘yicky’ the girl had termed it—and the Lieutenant had used it to draw out this sort of grid thing, a line of boxes, with different places where two boxes were side by side, and each box had a number in it up to ten.

Sera went first and showed Eleanor how to play—some children just took turns hopping in the boxes as fast as they could, but it was more challenging to take a stone, throw it on the grid and hop to where it landed, hold your position whether or not you were on one leg, and try to pick the stone up and toss it again until you finished the course. Sera’s landed on ‘7’ and she squawked a bit as she just barely kept her balance, leaning down to snatch up the stone and gently toss it onto the ten.

Eleanor seemed uncertain how well she’d do hopping from space to space, and Cassandra was albeit relieved when her stone landed on ‘5’ which was right next to ‘6’ and she could stand on both feet while she crouched to pick it up. Lieutenant Aclassi was easily persuaded into taking a turn and then Sera again, and eventually even some of the adults—Cullen first, informing Eleanor that he was in fact, the hopscotch champion of the Rutherford line, don’t let his sisters ever say otherwise.

He was admittedly good at it, Cassandra found herself amused with the man’s antics, his armor jangling, pauldron’s flopping with each hop, and how he managed not to fall over when he bent to pick up the stone was beyond her. The Seeker didn’t play but when everyone else took turns, Eleanor stood at her side when she wasn’t playing, and Cassandra found herself standing with an arm wrapped around the girl’s shoulders.

Lady Montilyet joined in as well, to Leliana’s amusement, interjecting herself nervously but the Antivan woman was markedly graceful.

Cremisius signaled Eleanor when his pocket watch said they were a half hour out from her appointment in the War Room, she thanked Sera for teaching her a new game, and the Elf and Lieutenant helped when the Herald set about using one of the servant’s cleaning rags and water from her canteen to wash up the chalk, she admitted to being a bit worried about dirtying up the floor but it was the warmest and easiest place to set up such a thing, and the chalk came right up, no permanent vandalism left behind. They made their way back upstairs and got Lady Montilyet’s office back in order.

The Lieutenant verified with Cassandra that it would be alright to step out for a moment, and then he took Eleanor’s canteen and dashed out to the pump to refill it before her meeting. Sera, ever the astute observer, finally realized Eleanor was dressed up, and asked her why. The girl explained she’d had lessons with Madam de Fer, which got a snort out of the Elf girl but she did ask if she learned anything cool in her ‘weird magic’ lesson. Eleanor said it was interesting, but they didn’t really get around to doing much besides introducing their magic to each other. Which Sera thought sounded creepy but good for them, she said, and Eleanor admitted to being quote, ‘excited-ish’ to learn different types of magic though she wasn’t sure about the list Madam de Fer left with her.

“Of course you aren’t sure, Eleanor, you haven’t read it yet,” Cassandra said.

“Well ‘sandra can help you with that, right?” Sera asked the girl.

Cassandra raised an eyebrow at that. “I would certainly be pleased to go over it with Eleanor though I wouldn’t be of much help. I’ve no great understanding of magic that would be of use. Look it over before your next lesson,” she advised, “maybe confer with Solas if you’ve need.” He would be glad to talk the different sorts of magic over with Eleanor should she need more guidance on the matter.

And so was Sera it seemed, she made a frustrated little sound at Cassandra, and held out a hand to the girl saying, “Hand it on over Inky!” Eleanor handed her the slip of paper Madam de Fer had given her and Sera’s face scrunched up and then, “She can teach you icy pish, and fire stuff—oh shite you probably need like the actual, ‘blah blah blah’*. Okay, so like there’s an Elemental school of magic, that’d give you options like fire or ice or nature spells. Then there’s Creation magic which is like manipulating the natural world, and then…En…Enthro…Entropy which she says is like harnessing the chaos of creation? Dunno sounds like some weirdass shite. And then Force magic which would let you move stuff—like your fist fighting but with magic you could knock people over and stuff…oh! Or chairs and pish you could really get some people’s butts good sneaking their chairs out from under them!” Maker, was the girl’s mind focused on nothing but her pranks?

“Mmm, I’ll think about it,” Eleanor said, “but I’m definitely not pushing people’s chairs out from under them—people get hurt that way and that’d be mean.”

Sera snorted. “Yeah but it’s funny mean! Eh, it’s your thing Inky—you want me to go over it with you again? Or…oh! Oi! Ambassador Josie, sweetness, you got a pencil or something I could use?”

“Of course, Sera,” Lady Josie said, looking around her desk a, she wrote mostly in ink, but she did keep pencils lying about, used for marking up possibilities on drafts and the War Room map. She handed Sera a pencil and the Elf slapped the list onto the desk and started scribbling around a bit before handing the pencil and list back to their respective owners.

Looking over Eleanor’s shoulder, Cassandra could see the neat looping script of Madam de Fer’s handwriting. The list had underlined terms for the different schools of magic, followed by their definitions. Now each set of underlined words had small pictures beside them. A flame, a snowflake, and a lightning bolt, a vine with leaves on it, and so on, so that each option had an explanatory image next to it, which Cassandra found odd, but perhaps the Elf thought it would be easier or a faster way to reference the terms for Eleanor.

Eleanor who, upon examining the list paled for a moment, eyes going wide she appeared the be shocked and then…perhaps embarrassed or overwhelmed before she saw fit to launch herself at Sera, arms around the Elf girl’s neck as she hugged her fiercely and Cassandra was worried something was amiss, the girl had begun…not crying, not outright but a few little tears spilled down her cheeks as she squeezed her friend and breathed out an extremely grateful, “Thank you.”

Sera hugged her back, humming a little as she sort of twisted side to side holding Eleanor tight, the motion made the shorter girl’s legs swing a bit since they hung off the ground. “Don’t sweat it, Inky,” she said, patting the girl on the back of the head “Eleanor?” Cassandra asked carefully. What…had just happened?

“Oh Inky’s just all inky!” Sera breezed, as she set Eleanor on her feet and pulled away, “Monthlies is a right bitch, making you swing between wanting to cry and murdering shite all day!”

“Ahh.” of course, Eleanor was already so prone to extreme thankfulness even for small gestures of kindness, with all the chemical firings sure to be happening now it was little wonder the girl got swept up in her gratitude.

Leliana was silent as she watched the exchange, seeming thoughtful as she shared a look with Lady Montilyet before the Antivan woman came and put a condoling hand on Eleanor’s shoulder, “Well. You’re quite alright, my lady, we’ve all been there.”

“Not me,” Cullen said, “but Mia did bloody my nose once when she was running her courses and I ate her dessert.”

“Oh gosh, that was mean of her…but um, maybe no touching my desserts unless I’m sharing them?” Eleanor thought to caution the man.

“Oh I quite assure you, I’ve learned my lesson,” he promised her.

Cremisius returned with Eleanor’s canteen and he’d been keeping her cloak with him, either slung over his shoulder or hanging on the back of his chair during their meal and hopscotch fun, but he handed both off to her now in case she needed them while they were separated—War Room meetings were private affairs, even Marehis did not sit in on them. And too, the man was expected elsewhere, if Cassandra understood correctly.

“Oh! Would you mind…?” Eleanor asked, she seemed to feel badly for making a request of the man as she slung her cloak over her arm, holding her canteen in one hand and using the other to reach for the strap across her torso for her staff holster.
“Oh yeah, no problem. Will you want it when you’re done with your meeting or should I just take it back to your cabin?” he asked, holding out his hands to take her staff.

“My cabin if you really don’t mind,” she said. “Thanks, I appreciate it.”

“It’s fine El,” he assured her, and then once he had her staff in hand he stepped in close to whisper quietly against her ear, Cassandra barely catching his reminder to her, “hat and gloves are in your right cloak pocket, I put extra bandaging in the left if you need it, inside pockets have snacks. I’ll be in the Tavern, be back around when your meetings over, but don’t hesitate to send for me if you need me, alright?”

The girl popped up on her toes to give him a quick kiss on the cheek. “Thanks! I’ll be okay, you go have fun, yeah?”

The Lieutenant looked to Cassandra then, and they shared a sort of wry look as he said, “I uh, doubt it,” that almost felt like understatement to Cassandra, “but thanks. Good luck in your meeting,” he said, his hand on her elbow giving three squeezes before he stepped away and waved farewell to the room.

Sera said, “Wait up, I wanna watch! Dwarfy said I could!” and chased after him.

“…Varrie?” Eleanor asked Cassandra.

“Indeed,” Cassandra said, reaching out to her and putting an arm around her shoulders as they left Lady Montilyet’s office and headed for the War Room, “Think nothing of it, Eleanor.” Varric had seemed to want a measure of privacy in this regard, though Cassandra was rather eager to see just how his efforts worked out. But that was not the matter at hand,

“First order of business,” Leliana said as she took her place around the table, the Spymaster looked pleased, “Cassandra, would you care to do the honors? Our good news?”

Oh, most certainly—she hadn’t been certain she should, had been actively fighting the temptation to do so since she’d heard it herself.

“That is my favorite kind of news!” Eleanor enthused, looking up at her.

Cassandra grinned and met her gaze, “Marehis is on her return trip to Haven as we speak.”

Her entire expression lit up and the girl had to take in a rather large double-breathed gasp of air into her lungs as her instant excitement seemed to overwhelm her. “Really?!” she asked, “That’s- that’s so so so so good! Ahh!” she took a hold of Cassandra’s arm, it probably wasn’t professional, but it seemed like the girl was settling to do that as opposed to running around the War Room hugging them all…perhaps taking up the task of hugging everyone in Haven, the enthusiasm she squeezed the Seeker’s arm with was so great, as she said, “I’m so glad!”

“As are we all, Eleanor,” Cassandra assured her.

Leliana pointed to a spot on the map close to the Orlais-Ferelden boarder, near the Waking Sea. “This is where she touched base with our people, word came from her this morning,” Leliana said. something about the woman most surely being in the same country as them by now was relieving, made her seem nearer at hand even though she was likely days away…though, Cassandra thought perhaps roles reversed, had she gone so very long without seeing Eleanor, was traveling with the promise of meeting her again, she would cross any distance in record time.

“Thanks so much for keeping me updated,” Eleanor said to them.
“Actually my lady, we have not kept you entirely in the know,” Leliana admitted then. “Eleanor…we must debrief you on a security breach that occurred last week. We have handled it, and the danger is passed, but it required some measure of keeping you in the dark, which is regrettable but necessary to ensure everything could be taken care of as quickly and safely as possible. We would like to rectify that now.”

Cassandra’s heart stopped. She had suggested they make Eleanor aware eventually but there was something inside her that made her terribly afraid to break faith with the girl—that she would see their necessary omissions and fabrications as betrayal despite the outcome. It did not help that the girl stepped back from Cassandra to her usual spot around the War Room though the Nevarran woman knew it was likely the girl taking them seriously, endeavoring to conduct herself more appropriately. That did not stop Cassandra from taking hold of her Marked hand, nor did it stop the girl from accepting it without contention.

“You guys do everything running the Inquisition,” Eleanor said, “I’m never going to begrudge you doing what you have to do, even if it means I don’t get to know everything. Um. But you’re telling me now?”

“Yes,” Leliana confirmed, and Cassandra’s hand squeezed hers as the Spymaster laid out the betrayal found in her ranks, explaining that Venatori agents infiltrated Inquisition scouts, but their plans were discovered and foiled before they could come to fruition—Leliana didn’t say what those plans were, if Eleanor knew for even an instant that Marehis had been targeted specifically, that it her job as the Herald’s bodyguard that made her such a target, the girl would rebel against any effort to guard her, claim it was too dangerous. As it was, Eleanor did not seem like she felt she needed to know all the details, in fact she seemed uncertain as to why they felt they needed to tell her this at all—she was sure there were ‘loads’ of things the Advisors did for the Inquisition that they didn’t give her every last detail on—until it was explained that the breach in security was the reason Marehis wasn’t back when Ellie returned from the Coast—they’d lied to her.

“Marehis is alright, right?” Eleanor asked, pensive.

“Yes,” Cassandra was quick to promise.

“She is—it is standard protocol,” Leliana informed her, “all of our scouts were given orders to scatter themselves and go into hiding until an all clear was sent out.”

Eleanor nodded, sighing with relief as she nodded.

“I am sorry, Eleanor, that we found it necessary to lie to you,” Cassandra said, nervous as she gauged the girl’s reaction.

Cassandra almost felt dumbstruck with relief when Eleanor merely shrugged and said, “It wasn’t a lie really—for one, it kept Marehis safe and I’m super grateful for that—and I mean technically she was under orders from Leliana, her boss, to hide,” and then looking to Cassandra, smiling, small and genuine as she said, “So, her job was hiding this week, she was ‘busy handling Inquisition business’, just like you said.” the Marked hand in hers squeezed with reassurance before releasing hold.

The girl took a deep breath then and shifted their focus. “Have you decided who we’re going to approach first to take on the Breach?” she asked them.

“Indeed, my lady,” Lady Josephine said, “Everything is falling into place. We’ve successfully secured enough noble allies to assemble at Therinfall Redoubt to call for the Lord Seeker to meet with us. with you, my lady, as the voice for the Inquisition.”
Eleanor blanched at that. “Cassandra can come with me, right? Meeting with the Lord Seeker?”

“Of course, Eleanor,” Cassandra vowed, resolute, “I would not leave you to speak with that man alone. You will have your allies at your side.” She would unleash the Iron Bull upon the man if it put Eleanor at ease, though she was almost certain such a thing would not be necessary. Almost. Even now she was still struck by how very disconcertingly out of character the man had behaved in their meeting in Val Royeaux.

“Cool! Uh…” she cleared her throat, “I mean, that would most agreeable…maybe I should practice my etiquette stuff before meeting the Templars. I’ll probably have to talk in front of our noble allies, I did okay with our Ferelden guests but I didn’t really fancy-talk with them much—I’ll probably have to with those who come to help us with the Templars, I’m so grateful for them, I don’t know where exactly Therinfall Redoubt is, but I get the gist it’s not super in the neighborhood for Orlais, that’s a lot of travel just to help us.”

“You will have some brush-up lessons with me in the coming days, my lady,” Lady Josephine assured warmly.

“That would definitely be most agreeable! We’ve all been busy, and gosh you’ve been working so hard to get our allies arranged for this, but I’ve missed our lessons,” Eleanor admitted, shyly.

Lady Montilyet blushed, looking almost surprised, her hand rising to fidget with the centermost medallion on her necklace, and she smiled affectionately, “I’ve a fondness for our lessons as well, I’ll be glad to continue them.”

“So, are we approaching the Templars first?” Eleanor asked.

“Ahh, no,” Lady Josephine explained, “Our allies will need time to make the journey from Orlais. In the meantime, you will accept the invitation to speak with the Mages and address them, garner their alliance, on the way to meet with the Lord Seeker.”

Eleanor nodded. “And that’s the way we’re most comfortable addressing them? You’ve all agreed?” she asked looking to Cullen, not an accusation or judgment, merely opening the floor so that if the man had been bullied into compliance, had legitimate concerns as to why they should act otherwise, he could speak his piece.

“It took a great deal of deliberation but yes,” Cullen said.

“We’ve a unanimous consensus,” Leliana said, backed up with the Commander nodding in agreement. “Allying with the Templars initially may spook the rebel mages entirely. But coming to the Templars with Mages in our ranks may give them purpose, show them they are needed in some respect…ahh.” the woman cleared her throat, seeming apologetic, “I do not mean to imply that the mages would be out of control, it is merely how things are. Templars are believed to be a necessity, making them feel needed will encourage them in considering our cause.”

“I don’t have anything against Templars doing their jobs,” the girl said with a shrug, “I understand that they are necessary.”

“You needn’t fear offending me, Eleanor,” Cullen assured, “I would understand if our alliance with the Templars brought you some discomfort. I left the Order for a reason. I’m certain you do not think poorly of me, for my past service.”
The girl seemed to take the words as question more so than statement, she gasped and then,

“Oh gosh, of course not! You’re the best! You’re so funny and clever and strong and brave and I think it’s absolutely amazing the work you do for the Inquisition, that you were able to stand on your own and leave the Order,” Eleanor was quick to insist to the man as if she thought he might need a bit of a pep talk about it, “It takes a lot of courage to break away from something you’ve dedicated your life to!”

The man blushed so fiercely even his ears flamed red, a hand wrenching at the back of his neck as he ducked his face ever so slightly, wholly abashed as he chuckled quietly, nervously and then he cleared his throat and said, “Ahh, thank you, Eleanor.”

“I believe the Commander was merely expressing a wish to know your true feelings on the goals of reforming our system,” Cassandra said, earning her a grateful smile from the man at her explanation when he’d lost his own words, “You’ve never shared your opinion on the matter. That is what you came to the Conclave to do, is it not?”

“Oh…um yeah I mean…” she cleared her throat, seeming surprised and nervous all at once, hands fidgeting before her as she asked, “you guys really want to hear about what I think? I mean I know I was supposed to represent Apostates, but I didn’t really expect to be heard.”

“Justinia heard you, we believe,” Leliana said, “you did speak with her in the time you cannot remember, before the destruction. We would like to hear you now, if you’re willing to share.”

“We would not put you on the spot my lady,” Josephine was quick to input, “if you would like to take some time to think, compose your thoughts…” she let the sentence hang.

“Oh gosh, I’ve had ten years to gather my thoughts,” Eleanor mused lightly, biting her lip, she took a deep breath and then,

Oh Maker, she certainly had.

“I think there should be more Templars,” she started with, which was beyond surprising, but she spoke with such sincerity, such certainty it must be truth. “And I think they should be a branch of guard systems everywhere, in every city, town, and village, to deal with magical crime, and assist regular guards when they’re called to handle regular crimes committed by mages. When people are discovered to be mages they should have to register as such with local authorities—magic can be dangerous and needs accountability. But Phylacteries shouldn’t be mandatory right away—we don’t have a system for tracking down every last person who owns a weapon—but it makes sense that they should be created when a mage actually presents themselves as a threat, is an actual offender of the law that may need to hunt down someday. And it shouldn’t just be handed over to a Templar and that’s the end of it—someone should oversee that Templar’s use of it, like how Seekers are supposed to watch out for corruption in Templar ranks, to ensure that they aren’t using the Phylactery for anything other than keeping the general population safe. Tranquility should be reserved for mages who don’t respond to correction—a mage can lash out accidentally, or even on purpose because of life or misguidance, and be taught to see the error of their ways, learn from their mistakes. I think people shouldn’t be taken from their homes and families, I think communities should be set up with the ability to handle magical citizens. Templars working with guards, the Chantry working with citizens, schools teaching everyone some basic knowledge on magic thrown in with…whatever they teach in schools, reading and writing and numbers. Just add magic to the roster.”

“You believe non-magical people would find benefit in magical education?” Leliana asked.
“I’m standing here with two people who had to learn about magic for their chosen career paths,” Eleanor said, gesturing to Cassandra and Cullen. “I think everyone should get some kind of magical education from when they’re little. Like, take Sera for example. She’s terrified of magic because she doesn’t understand it—how it works or how to defend herself from it, she can’t tell the difference between someone casting Barrier or an offensive spell until they’ve cast. But if she’d come up learning just basic things about magic, she would know what her allies were doing, and her enemies, be able to better defend herself against mage attacks if she understood them better. I think everyone could benefit from that—as children grow up and come into an age where they start presenting as magical or not, they wouldn’t just being thrown into this sort of life where they have absolutely no idea about anything to even do with magic, and their friends and family know what to watch out for and expect, create a smoother safer transition into life as a Mage that doesn’t so wholly uproot people from everything and everyone they’ve ever known.”

“What would become of Circles then, my lady?” Josephine asked.

“It’s never made much sense to me, the idea that in trying to protect people from Mages being possessed by demons, the Chantry puts all found Mages into a situation they would be most tempted to call on help from a demon, most abominations crop up in Circles from people trying to escape. People shouldn’t be forced into them,” Eleanor insisted with conviction.

“So what would you propose then? Do away with Circles entirely?” Cullen asked, curious.

“I think Circles should become places of higher learning, it’d be better all-around if there was nothing to escape, that instead Mages willingly go to Circles because they’re branching out, trying to gain some independence in their adult lives through academia instead of being ripped from those lives and locked away for forever.”

“Excellent use of ‘academia’,” Cullen complimented. It was a markedly higher-level word than Eleanor usually used.

“Solas taught me!” Eleanor reported, “It means like, school or education and stuff right?”

“Indeed,” Cassandra affirmed. That was…a lot to process. An entire societal reform that Cassandra found equal parts impossible and…there was this pang of desire she felt at the idea. That is precisely the sort of world she would want for the girl. One where she could be free to live her life as she pleases, no running from the law or Templars, her magic kept in check with no need to reign her. She’d thought to do everything in her power to make Eleanor an exception but…

Maker, they could not possibly reform their system in such a way, surely.

“Thank you, Eleanor,” Leliana said, nodding thoughtfully. “Justinia…I cannot be certain of course but I think she found your thoughts intriguing, if you did get the chance to share them with her.”

“Really?” Eleanor asked, blushing.

“Truly,” Leliana affirmed, “was that all you cared to share?” Eleanor nodded, and then looking to Lady Montilyet and Commander Cullen, then Cassandra the Spymaster said, “I cannot think of anything else I needed to go over.”

Neither could Cassandra, and Lady Montilyet nodded as Cullen shrugged that he too had nothing to report. “I believe we’ve covered everything,” Josephine said, “I will send out an acceptance of the Herald’s invitation to Redcliffe and set up a date on which to meet with Grand Enchanter Fiona.”
“So…meeting adjourned?” Eleanor asked.

“I believe so,” the Commander agreed.

“Eleanor,” Leliana said, “If you would like…I understand you do not write to Marehis?”

For some reason the girl looked very nervous about that, swallowing she said, “Um. Yeah I just…I mean she’s always in Haven when I am, so it’d be pretty silly to write her then right? And when I’m gone I know she has other work she does for the Inquisition and I wouldn’t um…I wouldn’t w-want to bother her!”

…that sounded very plausible. In fact it is what Cassandra had always assumed but Eleanor…it sounded like lying. Cassandra had never heard the girl speak in such a way, and…why in the world would she lie about such a thing? How was it even a lie, it made perfect sense that she would not write Marehis for such reasons but—

Leliana came around then to stand between Cassandra and Eleanor, taking the girl’s hands in her own and speaking in gentler tones than the Seeker had ever heard from the Spymaster, “If you would like…I do have some time. Perhaps you and I could sit down, and we could work on a letter for her. Whatever you would like her to know in the meantime before she reaches Haven? No such thing could be done while she was in hiding of course, but now, I’m certain it would hearten her to hear from you.”

“Um…”

“I’ve a report I must send her, it would be quickest if you dictated and I added whatever you care to say to my own letter, if you’d like?” Leliana offered, squeezing her hands a bit as if in assurance, to comfort the girl.

“Oh gosh…yeah,” Eleanor agreed, smiling shyly as she nodded. “I’d really really like that.”

Leliana returned her smile, gently. “Excellent,” she said, “come with me—when we’ve finished I’ll send for the Lieutenant. Josie we can use your office I trust?”

Lady Montilyet looked almost grim as she nodded absently and then came into focus shaking herself from her thoughts as she said, “Oh, yes! Certainly Leliana, at your leisure,” when Cassandra made to follow after the Spymaster as the woman put her arm around Eleanor’s shoulders and led her from the War Room, the Ambassador said, voice pitching high, hand actually flinging out in a motion to halt her, “Lady Seeker, Commander, wait! I had…just one thing more I wished to discuss with you. Privately.”

“Have a pleasant day, Eleanor,” Cassandra bid the girl goodbye, and out of her peripheral she could see Cullen waving farewell to her as he said,

“Do try to stay out of trouble.”

“No promises!” Eleanor lobbed over her shoulder before Cassandra closed the door behind the Herald and Leliana.

When Cassandra resumed her place at the War Table Lady Montilyet looked at the door as if she could verify that Eleanor was not on the other side of it and then, very quietly she asked, “Cassandra, Commander…do you think, perhaps, Eleanor may not know how to read?”

Asshole,

Tavern, 2pm, if you’re late you’re buying. Booked a referee, don’t shit your pants. We’ve got crap to work out. For Ellie, so if you don’t show I can shoot you where it won’t kill you, but you’ll never sit right again.

Tethras

That lovely, poignant missive was scratched out on a piece of spare parchment that had been slapped against Thom Rainier’s forehead midmorning by Sera who shouted, “Dwarfy says I get to watch!” before she cackled and ran from the Forge cabin, slamming the door behind her.

He wasn’t sure what that meant until he read the letter and Maker help him, he needed glasses, but he made the words out well enough. He was just glad the Horse Master and Blacksmith had jobs that drove them from bed in the early hours, so they weren’t subject to his rude awakening.

He probably shouldn’t get used to sleeping in as much, they would be setting out for… somewhere, maybe the Hinterlands again, sometime here soon. And there was the implications of the impending arrival of his men. Former men.

He’d received a much politer missive from Ambassador Montilyet, requesting his presence in the Chantry, after dinner, the other day. Maker, he’d been barely able to stomach his evening meal, he was worried sick after seeing Ellie in the Tavern with claims she’d…for god’s sake the girl called it getting ‘almost assassinated’! No one should be siccing assassins on someone that…that incredibly precious! Didn’t know all the grammatical forms for ‘assassination’!

And then he realized just why she’d had an assassin set on her.

Him. His past, the mess she’d cleared. Suddenly her fight with Varric, the way she’d railed about ‘miffing’ Orlesian nobility, made sense. Ambassador Montilyet and Spymaster Leliana filled him in on the deal Ellie’d struck on his behalf. His men would be released from prison before the end of the month, and the Inquisition was offering them work—offers sent and most of them already accepted, they understood the Inquisition, the Herald of Andraste, had garnered their freedom, cleared their names, offered them a job on top of it all. Of course that was just a way to keep a close eye on them, ensure they were staying on the straight and narrow, but Ellie’d been right when she said the Inquisition was hardly prison—they’d be free, atoning for what they’d done, fighting for an honorable cause.

Maker help him, he was beholden to that girl until the day he died. Didn’t matter where her journeys took them, he’d fight alongside her until there was no fight left in him.

Though there’d been something of a fight last night. He wasn’t sure exactly what happened, all he knew was he’d been waken in the middle of the night because he’d thought the Lieutenant had been in trouble. He’d left the cabin, to find the Iron Bull whipping up pancakes in that clearing he and his men gathered in for group meals, and over along the little drop before Haven’s frozen lake, there were practice dummies set up, Ellie, sword in hand, was beating down on them like they deserved it—they probably did the bastards—and Lieutenant Aclassi was making exaggerated cries of distress, sound effects for Ellie’s wrath. He…wasn’t sure what was happening, but he wasn’t going to question it, it was much too late, and Ellie seemed vengeful but well at hand and he hadn’t wanted to interrupt their strange but of fun. Whatever the matter was, it was nice to see her well enough to, as she would put it, ‘kick butt’ even if it was just a few unsuspecting practice dummies.

He arrived in the tavern at five after two, coinpurse at his hip, he figured he’d have at least enough for a few rounds…maybe, if Varric was drinking it could get up there.

Dwarf was seated at the bar…maybe he wasn’t drinking, there was a little metal cup in his hand, like the ones Fliss served water in. The Lieutenant was though, frothy mug of beer set before him, Varric held the seat closest to the wall, so the Tevinter was seated as a buffer-state of sorts. The referee, he supposed, the two were talking as Thom entered, “…/him’s right. Uh. Nice of you to ask, though, thanks,” the Lieutenant was saying.

“Don’t sweat it, kid. Got a cousin whose uh, the other way around. She’s Tevinter too, actually. Been trying to push for ‘they’ and ‘them’ to be legally recognized by the government, but…well shit, you know how it is,” Varric said, and then, as the door closed behind Thom the Dwarf didn’t even turn around, he just spoke over his shoulder, “Late. You’re buying.”

“Sir.”

“Thom.”

Okay, possibly better than the other names Varric had been calling him, though it certainly rang like ‘asshole’. But it wasn’t like he didn’t deserve it, and it seemed like the Dwarf was trying, to some measure at least. “Thought Sera was going to watch?” he asked lightly as he seated himself at the counter.

“Lost interest when she found out we were just going to have a little chat,” Varric explained, “no shouting or violence which is, you know, boring. Dunno where she went, but she’s probably up to no good,” he said, as Fliss came, getting behind the bar and pouring a mug of ale for Thom before taking her leave again, seemed to be giving them privacy.

“You uh, wanted to talk?” he asked.

Varric, ever eloquent, “Look. I hate your fucking guts—don’t you ever dare think otherwise—but we can’t keep…I can’t keep torturing the kid like this, you and me having it out.”

“I’m not going to fault you holding a grudge against me. But you have it with me, Tethras,” Thom ground out, he deserved whatever wrath the Herald’s party members felt for him but, “You take it out on Ellie, take any of this out on her again, I’ll string you up faster than you can string together one of your clever little threats.”

Krem finished taking a sip of his beer mug clunking firmly against the countertop and then, “No one’s keeping a grudge, not anymore,” he intervened, “So, get the fuck over it both of you—if either of you make Ellie cry again, I’ll make you wish you were dead. She gets hurt because you two play fuck-around and don’t work as a team, I’ll make you actually dead.”

“What would you suggest?” Thom asked.

“You two have to settle your differences however you can if you’re going to work together.” Krem said, “You can’t stir up bullshit that lands Ellie caught in the middle—you’re grown ass men, she shouldn’t have to referee your spats. Accept that the past is in the past, and the only things that matter now are Ellie, the Inquisition, and sealing the Breach—in that order.” And then, “You don’t have to suck each other’s dicks or nothing, you just have to respect one another.”

Thom choked on his own drink, foam burning his nostrils. Maker!

“Dick sucking imagery payback for the ‘jilted lovers’ rumors?” Varric asked.

The boy smirked. “Yup.”

“Fair enough,” Varric drawled, raising his cup to clink against Krem’s mug.

“Indeed,” Thom agreed, joining their toast, Maker. He’d overheard the Iron Bull giving Krem the rundown on those…he could wring their necks the rotten sods.

“Look man, you do right by Tumbles, you and I won’t have any problems,” Varric allowed.

“Same here,” Thom said, “I…I know my word hasn’t meant much all things considered, but I swear, I’ll do everything I can, everything to make it right.”

“You better,” Varric groused followed by Krem’s confident assurance of,

“Oh he will, Bull’ll make sure of that,” he looked to Thom, “If you think you’re up for it.”

“…it?” Thom asked uncertain. ‘It’ with the Iron Bull could mean all sorts of things Thom personally wasn’t up for.

“How does tacking on a more formal title to the name ‘Thom Rainier’ sound?” Krem proposed, “Something like ‘Sergeant’.”

…“Sergeant?” Thom asked.

“Rank just under Lieutenant, third in command,” the Tevinter explained, “though make no mistake you’d have no rule over the Chargers…except for our ground troops. They’re getting some new recruits, hired on through the Inquisition, inbound from Orlais at end of the month. If you and Chief’re out partying with the Herald, I’ll get them squared away, outfitted, retrained and you’ll take the reins with them once you’re back,” he shifted in his chair, reaching down into his boot, he pulled out a thick wad of folded parchment, slapped it against the counter and slid it in front of Thom. “Make no mistake, they’re your responsibility. They mess up, it’s on you too. Having you all under Bull takes the responsibility off of Ellie, any good that comes from them will benefit the Inquisition, any bad can be made to reflect on the Chargers, not on the Herald or her cause, and Bull will take the heat for anything public, and hold you responsible in-house. Keep your nose clean, and your men accountable, it’ll be all good.”

His throat felt tight, hands trembling slightly as he carefully unfolded the parchment. A contract. From the Iron Bull, hiring Thom Rainier into the Chargers. Thom carefully cleared his throat. “Have uh…either of you got something I can use to sign this?”

“Contract?” Varric asked, curious. Thom nodded, and the Dwarf sighed, holding out a hand. “Give it here.”

He did only for fear of insulting the man further, but he wasn’t sure why until…ahh.
Businessman. Maker was he reviewing the contract to ensure he wasn’t getting a bad deal? He hadn’t really read the thing, first paragraph gave him all he needed to know, but there were “Five percent could sound stiff for third in command,” Varric commented neutrally as he reviewed the contract, “mind if I ask what you make?”

“Ten,” Krem supplied with a shrug, “Bull will take fifteen for himself now, ten percent overhead keeps everyone outfitted and healers supplied, forty percent gets split across the ground troops, leaves twenty to be split even across the core members of the Chargers—I get a cut of that, Thom will too.”

Varric seemed to think that sounded more than reasonable, “Five percent and a cut of his core people’s profit?” he whistled, pitching low as he gave the contract one last look over.

“I will?” Thom asked. Payment alone was generous enough an idea…and he’d caught that—his five percent wasn’t coming out of thin air, Bull was getting 15% now, taking a hit to his own salary to…what? Make sure Rainier accepted the job? A cut of his core people’s salary that was…

“Think Bull just hands out ranks and nicknames? Core crew. You sign on, that’s what you’ll be considered, no arguments. You want to do right by Ellie? Right by your men? This is how you’ll do it,” Krem said firmly. “Family dinner’s Tuesday nights, though uh, tonight Dalish insists on a welcome bash, get you introduced to everyone proper. Word to the wise, Skinner bites.”

Varric slid the contract back over to Thom, pulled his quill and inkbox out for the Human man’s use. For the first time in forever, he signed his name, Thom Rainier on the dotted line.

He huffed in astonishment, a sort of weight lifting from his shoulders and he admitted, “Believe it or not I almost feel like a new man.”

“‘Almost’ is pretty good,” Krem commented, “though in my experience, you want to really feel like a new man, proper haircut goes a long way.”

Varric cackled at that slapping the countertop in affirmation, “Hell yeah! Haircut, and shave that stupid beard while you’re at it, s’not like you’re trying to hide your ugly mug anymore.”

Ahh. True he supposed. His description had been everywhere in Orlais when news broke of his crimes. Growing his hair long, beard that clouded his features, it’d worked to be something of a mask.

“Hate to disappoint, but I don’t even own a razor,” Thom said, though he might invest in one, the suggestion…it wasn’t a bad one.

Varric snorted. “Come on Sarge,” ahh. perhaps that would replace ‘Hero’ and ‘bastard’, the Dwarf slapped enough money for the Lieutenant’s drink onto the counter—yeah, after seeing the Tevinter lad in action this week, Thom wasn’t planning on letting him pay for his own drinks for a while if he could help it, nice to be of one accord with the Dwarf—and then, “settle your bill and we’ll go get you squared away.”

Ended up only paying for his drink—apparently Varric had been animate about buying the Lieutenant’s drinks for a good while after his service to Ellie. So Thom left his coin and followed after the Dwarf and Lieutenant.

And that’s how Thom Rainier ended up sitting out front of Varric’s tent, Lieutenant Aclassi trimming his hair, Varric Tethras dragging the sharp edge of a razor blade along his throat in what was an extreme form of trust building exercise.
Krem’d been surprised when Varric was waiting for him just inside Haven’s Gate last night after Seeker Pentaghast escorted Ellie to bed—Maker, he was beyond relieved Ellie was okay, he felt like he couldn’t move fast enough when he thought she’d been in danger, he was half tempted to walk her back himself but if he’d been scared shitless that Ellie’d been hurt he couldn’t imagine what Seeker Pentaghast was feeling and thought she could use the privacy to get assurances of her own that Ellie was alright. Seeker’d been so stricken with worry when she came on the scene, and he got needing some solid proof that Ellie was really okay after a scare like that—he thought he’d missed something, that the attempt at lunch was only the beginning, some form of distraction like if the Inquisition thought whoever called the hit had taken their shot and missed, they’d let their guard down and get a solid attempt through. As it was, Krem had been doing one last security check, that turned into double, triple checks around Haven before returning to bed—and the Dwarf approached, walking alongside him as he asked Krem if he’d care to join him for a drink—he was going to clear the air with Rainier and thought Krem could give the men some insight on righting things with Ellie, and at the very least keep them honest and peaceable. Overall it’d gone much better than he’d feared it might. The men now had some weird but amicable candor going, though the Dwarf had been a bit too gleeful, really got off on the fear he put in the Human man as he held a blade to his throat giving him a close, thorough shave. Got his hair trimmed up nice, seemed to bum Varric out that all that long hair hadn’t been a massive combover, he’d expected the man to be balding but for a guy getting up there, his hairline was holding pretty strong. Bull’d come ’round when they were finishing up, just about didn’t recognize the man, and when he did, he wolf whistled and declared him, ‘One beautiful old bastard’. Maybe Ellie’d gotten it wrong and Thom would be Bull’s type…probably wasn’t reciprocated though. Though they’d see, Bull wasn’t exactly shy about knocking boots with anyone as long as they were interested.

Ellie was all sorts of giddy when he got the call to retrieve her from the Chantry—Marehis would be returning soon she’d gleefully declared, followed shortly by a very apologetic assurance that she was only happy about that because she missed the woman, it didn’t have anything to do with Krem, he’d been ‘amazing, just super!’ and he got a sweet little peck on the cheek. Maker she was too sweet, he’d hardly assumed she meant any unkindness in her excitement at Marehis’s return, he was glad the woman would be back soon he knew Ellie missed her terribly. Oh, and Leliana helped her drop the Elf woman a note, and had even taken the time to speak with Ellie, just chatting after their war room meeting, the Spymaster was interested in speaking with her further which she seemed grateful for. She’d been worried Leliana hadn’t used to like her very well, she said. And did he know anything about Elemental magic? She knew he wasn’t a mage, but he’d come up in a society run by them, hung around ‘such an amazing archer’. She’d gotten the chance to think about Madam de Fer’s list and most of her offered teachings sounded a little strange or scary—but she figured the Enchanter was most familiar with Elemental magic, and she wouldn’t mind learning more fighting spells.

“Plus I have a fire spell already…fire spell and a half,” she said as she thought about it, holding his arm tight as they walked the path to her cabin. “And a lightning one. So, it wouldn’t be something my magic’s got zero experience in, you know?”

He didn’t know loads about magic but sounded reasonable enough to him. “Sounds really cool Ellie, I hope your lessons with Madam de Fer go well.” It still struck Krem as off-putting, the woman’s desire to suppress Ellie’s magic. He understood it, there was some measure of reason behind it but still, just rubbed him the wrong way, hadn’t liked the way she’d been bossy about Ellie’s ‘tone’, talking down to her. Woman struck him as the sort to manipulate Ellie or try to at least. Though after seeing how Ellie’d taken her spat with Varric so hard he’d been surprised she got so defensive with Madam de Fer—someone Bull had termed ‘scary’—but he realized it was different. Enchanter was someone coming into the group as far as Ellie was concerned, and it wasn’t like the woman was attacking her personally, she was insulting Ellie’s friends and Maker that was clearly a mistake.

When they got back to her cabin she plopped down on her bed, squirming a bit before settling down in a comfortable position.

“So, what’s on now?” she asked him.

“Rest of the day is up to you, but I’ve got an invitation for you, if you’re interested,” he said, and Ellie sat up straighter, leaning forward in a way that said he had her undivided attention, little smile that grew even bigger when he said, “Chargers are having a get together tonight, dinner after sundown, welcoming a new recruit Bull signed on.”

“Oh gosh, really? I’d love to!” she enthused and then, “Have they settled in to Haven alright, this new recruit? Been given a tour—we could show them around, it’s scary being new,” she said.

“They’re pretty well settled, you’ll meet them tonight, no worries,” Krem said. Bull’d wanted to leave it a nice surprise.

“Alright then,” Ellie thought it over some more and asked, “Would you mind if I worked on my hat then? We’ll be leaving soon for the Hinterlands and I’d like to finish it before then.”

Huh. That was…he knew Ellie’d have to leave eventually, head back out into the field but he liked the Haven thing, seeing her every day, getting to be a part of her routine, and there was a part of him that felt like it could just go on like that but that was just ridiculous—eventually Marehis would be back, and the Chargers would be getting jobs outside of Haven, they’d have separate schedules again soon. Still, sort of ached him. But, he did want to finish his own project before Ellie left for the Hinterlands as well, and that got him more focused in the now—now, “Afternoon of knitting sounds like fun. You want anything before we get to it? Snack, or something to drink?”

Oh, she did. She seemed to be appealing to him, big eyes, pouty lip like she wasn’t usually permitted caffeine so late in the day, but he’d been given no direct instruction not to indulge her in afternoon coffee and agreeing…well he was decently sure if he advised against it, Ellie’d settle for something else but there was the risk that she’d continue pouting and saying yes was easier than fighting the temptation to kiss the pout from her lips. And it got him a grateful smile, she said she was feeling ‘brain foggy’ like she were sleepy, but she didn’t want to take a nap—she had things to do! she said. And she asked for two hours warning before they had to leave for dinner.

So. Coffee, between the two of them they drained the pot Flissa sent them and ate the rest Ellie’s stash of cookies as they worked on their projects sitting in the bedding nest again—took a while but Ellie’s hat came along nicely, and it was large enough. She watched carefully as he taught her how to cast off her yarn, cinch the top of her hat closed. Holding the finished product in her hand looking so excited and proud, he half expected her to jump up and run to find the Commander immediately, but she was going to hold off until she just saw him next—she said she thought he and Cassandra had been very chummy today, didn’t want to risk interrupting them, and Lady Josie’d held them back for some sort of meeting, and did Krem think maybe they were disclosing a relationship to the Ambassador?
“Gosh, they’re so cute! Did you see them today?”

“You know El, I’ve been meaning to tell you…I’m physically incapable of seeing people in the Templar Order, they’re literally invisible to me, it’s a whole thing—”

“Cremisius!”

He grinned at that, “Yeah I saw, they were definitely flirting at uh…during our noon repast.”

She liked that, “I’m learning so many cool words in the Inquisition!”

She did end up taking a little bit of a nap, unintentionally, she’d rested her head on his shoulder watching him knit and dozed off, snoring in his ear until it was time to give her the notice she’d asked for. He was shooed from the room, so she could clean up and then she came, cloak donned, and took him by the arm, a little coinpurse hanging from her wrist as she led him to Flissa’s.

Given she had the time, she didn’t want to show up to the Charger’s campsite empty handed again, and dinner had been great, but they hadn’t had any dessert last time, and they were celebrating a new recruit too, so:

“Sugar cookies—sweet recipe I picked up working a kitchen in Wycome,” she shared as they entered the Tavern and she went right up to the counter—Flissa had everything she would need and shooed Ellie’s offer of payment for the ingredients she’d use, the barmaid had little trouble resisting Ellie’s pout, and instead,

“My lady if you attempt to pay I’ll be deeply insulted!” Flissa insisted.

She did receive a sort of payment—Ellie came around the counter and hugged the woman tight before kissing her on the cheek and thanking her.

Flissa helped her get set up, lending her an apron so she didn’t dirty up her dress, and let her use vacant bar for her prep work. Krem offered to help but Ellie waved him off knowing he was on the job, which was nice. He wouldn’t mind helping, had no problem cooking but he was a little worried being behind the counter with her, hands occupied with messy work, his focus on helping taking away from his focus on the others in the Tavern—something went wrong he didn’t want to not be able to get a proper grip on his weapon because his hands were covered in cookie dough. He took a seat in front of the fireplace so he could keep an eye on everything, entrances, other patrons, Ellie as she worked.

Sera came popping in the Elf girl bound up to the counter and wanted to know what Ellie was up to.

“Cookies! I know you’re not big on them, so no pressure but you’re free to try them when they’re done, I’ll want some taste testing—it’s been a while since I made these, I’d hate to bring something yuck-tasting you know? Um…you could help if you want?”

Sera shook her head, “I’ll try ‘em but uh, I don’t know pish about baking.”

“That’s okay, I could teach you,” Ellie offered in earnest.

“You wanna teach me how to make cookies, Inky?”

“Uh-huh, if you want!”
Elf was quiet for a moment, but she did come around and Ellie lightly smacked her hands away insisting she wash them first which made Sera stop looking quite so serious, though she did take the instruction in cookie making very seriously which was almost strange to watch, but the Elf girl rolled up her sleeves washed up and diligently followed Ellie’s every instruction, measuring and mixing. Cracking eggs was messy work, but Ellie showed her how, helped the older girl when she got a bit of shell in the mix.

“Shite, gosh Inky I’m sorry, shite that’ll just make ‘em crunch or whatever right? Some people like crunch.”

Ellie giggled, “Mmm not in a nice way, but these are supposed to come out crispy,” she jested lightly, “It’s okay, that happens, we just…” she carefully picked the bit of shell out, “there, all better!”

Sera seemed a bit reluctant to help after that, afraid she’d mess it up, but Ellie finished putting the last of the sugar in their mixture and enticed her with, “Stirrer gets to lick the spoon.” So, after watching Ellie mix the batter up a little, Sera tried her hand at it, Ellie hopping up to sit on the countertop and watch, thanking the Elf because mixing is a real arm workout, and ‘gosh’ she was doing such a great job!

They worked together to get the batter on the pans—plural, Ellie was serious about her cookie game, making more than enough for all the Chargers, it was little wonder she’d wanted so much time, she and Sera baked four dozen cookies once all was said and done. While the last pan baked in the little brick oven, Ellie whisked two of their finished product off a cooling pan to hand off to Krem and Sera for taste testing. Warm, sweet, and they had a pleasant crispness to them when you bit in that just melted in your mouth.

“Shite Inky these is boss!” Sera declared them.

“Thanks! I can give you the recipe if you want, sometime,” Ellie offered as she packed up the cookies in a ceramic container to take to dinner.

Sometime turned into two minutes later, after Sera dashed from the Tavern and returned, dragging a loudly protesting Varric by the collar of his leather jacket.

“Stick a cookie in it, dwarfy, gimme your writing pish so I can jot something down for Inky!” Sera demanded.

“Alright, sheesh. Hey Tumbles, you look great,” Varric complimented, “you uh, feeling better?”

“Mostly, still gross but everyone’s been super helpful,” Ellie said, handing Krem another cookie, another one of her quiet ‘thank you’ she’d been giving him all day since he said she didn’t have to keep thanking him.

She’d been doing it profusely all morning, and worried a bit, about his helping—talked to him about it in private before her Chantry meeting with Madam de Fer. He’d been offering her advice all morning and as soon as they had the cabin door closed behind them when she went to change, she wanted to make sure he wasn’t helping her to his own detriment. She was beyond grateful but wanted to make sure it wasn’t picking at his own sense of self. He’d assured her it was fine…didn’t bother him anymore, and she was to stop being such a ‘worry wart’ before he left her to change. Been hell when he lived in Tevinter, he was absolutely prohibited to seek out any form of birth control, or suppressants, but that life was behind him now, Stitches kept him rolling in potion, and in a way he was glad experience made him able to help her.
Varric tried a cookie for himself, had his mouth full as he instructed Sera to write a copy of the recipe for him. Couldn’t bake for shit, he said, but Bianca would kill him if he didn’t get it.

“Just make sure she eats her veggies first,” Ellie teased lightly

“Shit Tumbles, I can’t tell that woman what to do, but maybe you could give it a shot, might listen to you,” he said looking all kinds of relieved Ellie seemed to really have forgiven him, was willing to be playful again.

Ellie worked to clean the mess she and Sera’d made of Flissa’s pans and dishes while she recited her recipe from memory, though Flissa waved her off when she came back from running a tray somewhere, “I’ll finish up, my lady, my apron won’t save your clothes if you get them all wet.”

“Just about time to head that way anyway, El,” Krem said.

“Okay…though I’m going to kind of dirty up just one more plate,” Ellie said, a little apologetically, though Flissa seemed unbothered, immediately offering up a clean plate to her, and Ellie piled on as many cookies as it would safely hold, leaving it on the counter top. “Thanks, for letting me use your kitchen,” she explained, giving the woman another peck on the cheek that sent her blushing and hugging Ellie tight before sending them off, and there was just the littlest bit of motion that caught his eye, Ellie’s arms wrapped around the woman’s middle, she patted her side and he was pretty sure she basically just reverse pickpocketed the woman—carefully slipped some payment for the ingredients she’d used up, Flissa’d just find later and either wouldn’t know where it came from or would just assume she’d forgotten how much she had on her.

“Very sneaky, Lady Herald,” he murmured quietly against her ear as he helped her don her cloak.

Her cheeks pinked, and she couldn’t keep a straight face, grinning as she insisted, “I have no idea what you’re talking about.”

Ellie held his arm tight as they left the Tavern, carrying her offering for the Chargers dinner…campfire, in hand. Maker it was a good thing she’d made so many, something from Ellie would have them all scrambling to eat one just out of the need to be nice to her, once they actually tasted them…Chief didn’t have much of a sweet tooth but even he might eat his weight in the things.

“Lethallan!” Dalish called as they neared the clearing, jumping up from her place around the campfire to rush Ellie, the younger mage had to hold the dish out of the way because Dalish hugged her excited to see Ellie in their camp again so soon. “Enansal, emm’asha.”

Ellie blushed, “Ma serannas,” and then she offered up the dish to Dalish, “I brought dessert, I hope that’s okay.”

“Wonderful!” Dalish said, taking it from her, and gesturing for them to come join them around the fire.

Krem was glad Ellie’d passed off her dish. Because he was pretty sure she’d drop it when, “Boss! Glad you could make it, we’re breaking in the new recruit,” Bull called, slapping said recruit on the shoulder.

Ellie pulled away from Krem to walk right up to the man next to Bull and offer her hand to shake, “Hi! It’s so great to meet you, I’m El—” she took in a few sharp gasps of air, eyes going wide as she stumbled backward into Krem who braced her elbow to halt her before she went tumbling into the fire or something Maker. She asked, bewildered, “Thom?!”

“Sergeant Thom Rainier now,” Thom said, seeming to truly have some pride in the new title, or maybe it was the job that came with it, “Inquisition put out offers to my men, Bull recruited them to the Chargers as ground troops, so he signed me on as well.”

“So you…so you’re…and…and…” she seemed to be working it out in her head and then she squealed running in place a moment before rushing full speed at Chief, hugging him tight as she breathed a litany of, “Thank you thank you thank you thank you thank you thank you thank you thank you!” and then, “You’re the best! You’re so smart and clever and mwah!” she pressed a grateful kiss to his cheek.

A chuckle rumbled through Chief’s chest his hand at the back of Ellie’s hair scratching lightly as his other arm hugged the girl back, rubbing between her shoulder blades. His lips went to Ellie’s ear, tucking her head down so he could speak directly into it, quietly for a moment, letting her go once she nodded, and the big lug—oh he’d get so much teasing for this later—pressed a kiss to her forehead (Rocky ‘dawwwed’ and promptly grabbed Grim by the shoulders to pull the man forward a plop a big kiss to his forehead, Chief’d never hear the end of it not tonight anyway) Bull ignored that, and Krem heard him say, “Don’t stress it anymore, alright?”

Ellie nodded again and smiled, turning to Thom and offering him her hand again to shake. “I’m really glad to meet you, Sergeant Thom Rainier,” she giggled around the name, “When did this happen?”

“Signed the contract just this afternoon. Varric invited me ‘round the Tavern to clear the air—and we did, Ellie, really—he asked the Lieutenant come along to mediate, he brought the offer from Bull with him.”

“Gosh,” she reached out with her unmarked hand to poke at the dip between jaw and cheek, “you’ve got an actual chin and everything now! And your new haircuts very dashing.” Dude literally looked decades younger, like a man in his thirties as opposed to his sixties.

“It was the Lieutenant’s suggestion, actually, his handiwork.”

Bull got the most devilish look on his face before he opened his big, stupid mouth, “Krem-puff’s just been full of great suggestions lately,” he said, “haircuts…new hires…”

Ellie gasped and rounded on him, “Cremisius!” she exclaimed looking on him, eyes alight with excitement and pride, “You suggested the Iron Bull hire Thom and everyone?”

Maybe. Big lug’s the one that ended up taking the pay cut though, insisted upon it like the dumb, noble ass he is—he didn’t have to, Krem was sure he could make it work, might get a bit tight if something came up but a cut to his own salary wouldn’t’ve killed him, especially with the unexpected pay he’d be getting from the Inquisition for his time working as the Herald’s bodyguard. Krem shrugged. “Takes a load off—won’t have to work so much with the ground troops myself whenever our third in command is around.”

Ellie leveled him a brilliant smile before launching herself at him, arms around his neck, giggling as his arms came up to support her back since her feet hang off the ground, before she kissed him on the cheek, not just once but three times, and his throat dried up, eyes wide when her lips were just before his own just the barest breath between them, he was overwhelmed with the thought that she might actually kiss him but she just smiled and pressed her forehead against his, unmarked hand massaging at the back of his neck as she said, “Thank you.”
“Of course,” he rasped out before setting her on her feet. Bull hadn’t learned his damn lesson with the snow down his trousers a few nights ago, bastard was chuckling.

Didn’t bother him much once Ellie was pulling him along to sit together, she plopped down across the fire from Thom and Bull, empty space next to Grim, waving cheerfully to the man who waved back. Skinner came and sat in front of Ellie, her back to the fire so she could face the Human girl.

“Hiya Skinner,” Ellie greeted, “your hair looks really pretty.”

Maker Skinner actually preened under the praise, seeming incredibly proud with herself. “I have brushed it. You are feeling better, small one?”

Ellie nodded. “I am, lots better than last night,” she said, and then she remembered, “Oh, Dalish!” she called out to the woman working the large pan sitting on a rack over the fire, “Thanks a ton for the heat bandages they’re literally the best thing in life, I’m so toasty!” she wriggled a bit, arms over her midsection sort of snuggling into herself.

“I’m glad,” Dalish said. “Have you ever crafted an enchantment, Ellie?”

“Sort of, just once—my mentor Ava and I crafted the staff I used to have before the Conclave, she let me help with the spirit rune for it,” she said.

Dalish nodded. “If you’ve time at some point, I would be happy to show you how to craft them yourself.”

Ellie gasped excitedly, “Oh gosh, really? I’d love that!”

“Of course, lethallan.”

“You uh, got the rundown on everything from Krem?” Bull’s voice got their attention, talking to Thom.

“Varric read over my contract for me,” Rainier said, not quite getting what Bull meant, “and Krem told me all about how things are run here, schedule things li—”

“Disclosed to him already, Chief,” Krem said and Ellie’s attention was piqued, she sat up straight looking to Krem and then Rainier as if wary of the elder man’s reaction. Guy’d taken it pretty well—at first he’d been falling over himself apologizing because he misunderstood, thought Krem was correcting him, that he’d been mistaking him as a boy, but he finally got it. Said he’d never met anyone like that before, not that he knew of anyway. Varric had seemed ready to come to Krem’s defense if things went south after that but Rainier hadn’t any qualms—a few mildly awkward questions but overall it wasn’t bad, guy hadn’t been disrespectful just confused and seeking to understand so he didn’t end up disrespecting Krem—said he was a good man as far as Thom was concerned. “He’s cool,” he vouched, giving Ellie’s hand a single reassuring squeeze.

Ellie beamed at Thom for that, relieved the man hadn’t reacted poorly. She bounced in her seat, and her arm looped through Krem’s, snuggling into him—seemed like she felt she needed to hug someone over it and he certainly wasn’t going to complain about being the most easily reachable recipient.

Chief nodded and made with his proposal: “Know you’ve got a little set up at the Forge but, you want, you could bunk with the Chargers.”

Krem figured he should get everything out in the open with Rainier in case he accepted, he’d rather be up front with it than have the man see something he might find question with without context—figured the guy would accept the offer since things got a bit hinky when you have a sudden reveal that you’ve been using an alias and there’s no real explanation why outside of cryptic answers, disclosing the full truth wasn’t in the cards so. Things were tense with Harritt and Dennet. Chargers didn’t have a reason to question him—they all only knew him as Thom Rainier, most of them hadn’t so much as seen the man before tonight. Krem’d handle things with his old men, see what temperaments were like, how they were feeling about working for the Inquisition, with the Chargers, with Thom Rainier before bringing the man back into their lives. He’d make sure everyone was here to play nice, anyone who wasn’t was out on their ear before any further mess could be made. All in all, a fresh start for Rainier, and any of his men that would cooperate.

“That uh, actually sounds good to me, as long as I wouldn’t be stepping on anyone’s toes,” Rainier said, nodding as he sort of nervously scanned the faces of his new coworkers for any sign he wasn’t welcome.

Maker, guy was still too tense. “Wouldn’t’ve offered otherwise, quit your worrying, old man, bad for your heart right?” Krem goaded him.

“Watch who you’re calling old man, boy,” he threw back jovially, relaxing a bit.

“Gosh, you don’t look so much like an old man anymore Thom, it’s like your beard held all your wrinkly old man secrets,” Ellie giggled, and then she gasped, her hand had been in Krem’s but it went to his knee then squeezing to get his attention as she said, “You know, I thought maybe Thom and Dennet and Harritt could make a bald, mustached, old man club someday,” she looked to Rainier, “but now you can be in a club with Cremisius and Grim and Mister Stitches! Clean-shaven warrior men with dashing haircuts club!”

Bit of a long name, but Maker her enthusiasm was catching—should they get a banner and everything perhaps?

“Stitches is a bit bald for that,” Dalish sniped humorously.

“Oh! You lot just watch, I’ll grow my ruddy hair out!” Stitches vowed, met with the whole of the Charger’s laughter, “I will! Once I’m shedding in all your medicine you’ll be sorry.”

“Wonder if Adan’ll like it,” Krem whispered conspiratorially in Ellie’s ear, earning him a peal of laughter.

“Oh no the horns are big beautiful glorious things, no worries,” she assured, gesturing to her jawline as she explained, “you’re just a bit too scruffy to join, sorry. You and me can form our own club if you want!”

“Sounds great to me Boss,” Bull said, “we’ll think of something, be way cooler than their dumb haircut club!”

“Yeah! Air five!” Ellie called, throwing up her unmarked hand, Bull mirrored the action with equal enthusiasm.

Dalish served up roasted veggies, a whole mix of things she seasoned to the nines always made even Bull’s nose run from the spice but Maker it was good, all thrown together with rice and thick chunks of chicken—it was one of Krem’s favorite things Dalish made and when the Elf woman began serving she did so with two plates, one for Ellie and the other for Krem, passing his off to him with a kiss to his temple and a whisper of thanks. Maker, the woman was a mother hen. He wasn’t sure if it was for his work with Ellie or for adding another member to their ranks for Dalish to fuss over in Thom, but maybe it was both.

When dessert came, the second Dalish had Ellie’s name out of her mouth the poor Elf woman was almost trampled by Rocky and Skinner making a mad dash to beat each other to the ceramic dish the woman held and Bull had to step in, rise from his seat to confiscate the dish waving for them to sit down before he came over, offered it to Ellie first—she was new so she didn’t know any better, only took one, but that was okay, it was Krem’s turn next so he used both hands, snatched up three in each, handed half off to her. Then Bull took an actual Qunari handful for himself had to be close to a dozen cookies in one hand while he passed the dish to Grim to take and send around the campfire, dish came up empty after everyone had a turn with it.

“The Iron Bull, you’ll give yourself a bellyache!” Ellie chided laughingly.

“Worth it, we don’t get stuff like this under the Qun*,” Bull said, “gotta get while the getting’s good!”

“They don’t allow cookies under the Qun?!” Ellie asked sounding absolutely appalled by the fact—like that was the most abhorrent thing the Qun could possibly demand of its followers.

“Not like they’re banned, Qun’s just efficient, so are its people. Cookies, cakes, pastries, desserts in general really derive from abundance—making too much dough or batter for a necessity like bread and having enough left over to experiment with doesn’t happen, we’re very precise, make what we need and nothing more.”

“I’d like to chat up your Qun leader people—you’ve got tamassrans that’ll shag you whenever you need a good romp, but dessert isn’t a priority?” she questioned, declaring “Sweets is just as important as sex, they’re good for the soul!”

That got her a round of encouraging laughter from most of the Chargers, overlapping Dalish’s cry of,

“Dread Wolf bite off your tongue, you horrible man,” she hollered at Bull, “what sort of things have you been teaching the girl?!”

“She had questions about the Qun, I answered!” Bull defended.

“Dunno,” Ellie said, grinning because she knew it would get him in trouble and he deserved it, “Could’ve done without the phrase ‘they’ll pop your cork’,” she shuddered making a face. “Sounds violent.”

And all too casually Bull returned, “Sometimes it is.” Rainier thumped Chief upside the back of the head. Yup. Having a third in command was already taking the load off Krem, good man.

Everyone was chattering then, signing hands and speaking mouths going a mile a minute, introducing Thom to the Chargers chaos proper. Ellie seemed completely at ease, content, smiling as she watched, listened, joining in where she saw fit, her head resting against Krem’s shoulder the entire time, her hand on his forearm, underside wasn’t thickly armored, just the cloth of his tunic and Ellie’s fingers traced ticklish patterns over the fabric, warm and soothing.

Ellie was…Krem just, he liked her. She was kind and honest and brave and maybe it was just sleep deprivation and fire light, but she was just beautiful. He thought that all the time, but seeing her warm and bubbling with excitement, carefree as she chatted and laughed with the Chargers, with Bull was something else. Nearly everyone he loved in all the world was gathered in once place, just like any day with the Chargers and somehow having Ellie in the midst of it all feel more, the fire felt warmer, conversation lighter. Dalish really knew how to cook, but he was pretty sure the food tasted better because it was a meal he was sharing with her. Maker, everything about her made him want to know her more. Be more. Anything she would let him be. Scarred him, that he would try, and she might reject him, but if she did he’d survive, smooth it over he was hardly going to ruin their friendship over this. If friendship was all he could ever have with her that was amazing in and of itself. Damn, she did right by her friends, cared about them, was there for them, her love on that level was definitely not something to turn your nose up at. He’d gotten more than his fair share of firsthand experience with the kind of friendship Ellie offered.

Bull was never going to let him hear the end of it. When Chief taunted him over his feelings for Ellie, he’d insisted he just wanted to be friends. Told himself to keep his dumb, stupid crush quiet, wait it out, it would go away. But it wasn’t, and he was pretty sure that wasn’t happening anytime soon. He’d hold off for a while, wait until he wasn’t her bodyguard anymore, that’d hardly be appropriate but…yeah.

Maker watch over them all, he was going to court the Herald of Andraste.

Herald of Andraste…uh…maybe the Maker shouldn’t watch too closely, mind.

Chapter End Notes

*Cullen’s siblings are all canon siblings! Mia is a boss big sister and Cullen is her dumb little brother that gets into trouble, his workplace gets blown to hell multiple times and he sends her not even a ‘sup I’m back on my bullshit’ card or nothing, she has to track him down—as revealed in conversation in Skyhold. Love Cullen, he’s precious and he too could use a hug.

*Bloomingtide is the Thedas equivalent of May “April showers bring May flowers” #Bloomingtide and since Cullen’s baby sister’s name is Rosalie, ‘Rosie’ I thought it was a nice fit. This month also brings the holiday Summerday on the 1st! Dedicated to the Old god of Unity, it marks the beginning of Summer and in Orlais it’s a big deal, children who are of age are dressed in white and taught the responsibilities of adulthood and all that jazz, like how to pay taxes and do their laundry. Hopefully.

* The Sign Bull uses to describe Madam de Fer means ‘Scary’

*Cullen’s claustrophobia is a canon/fanon thing, he suffers due to his time in Circle Tower, in Lothering’s now-fallen Circle where he was tortured by demons while keeping watch over a Harrowing. The idea that the hole in Cullen’s roof in Skyhold is never repaired=fanon idea that he keeps it that way so he can easily see the sky, see that he’s out in the open and not closed in and trapped.

* “fifteen…a little later than most” so, my ass was researching mage whateverness in Dragon age and it struck me I made Ellie super young to be Fade Dreaming and discovering her magic, but I’ma roll with it. in actuality most people don’t realize their mages until around puberty.

*Lyrium=so, I also realized, while reading about Lyrium (because I never have before,
I just chug it in game and POOF mana!) but in canon, Mages experience consciousness in the Fade while sleeping when their magic first is like “whats up, whats good, yer a Wizard Harry”. This is due to a oneness with the Fade. This same experience can be had again, through Lyrium consumption, Lyrium connects mages to the Fade giving them the boost in mana and whatnot, which also prompts Fade Dreams. If Solas wasn’t a lying dog, he’d probably have to habitually drink Lyrium to dream in the Fade as often as he does, as it is he may have to do so anyway.

*The Mark does cause the Inquisitor to Fade Dream, at different points in the game, since I don’t have Ellie hopped up on Lyrium for most of this fic, I figure the best explanation for her Fade Dreaming, and the need for her sleeping potion to disconnect her from the Fade is because the Mark does connect the Inquisitor to the Fade in the way magic and lyrium can for Mages.

*All the schools of magic listed in Madam de Fer’s offer to Ellie for lessons are Dragon Age canon schools of Magic

*There are no cookies under the Qun! Its literally a Trivia mention in the canon of Dragon Age that the Qun is all about efficiency and they don’t do ‘abundance’ they just do ‘enough’, and list desserts like cookies and cakes and an example, all ingredients for things like that are used for more purposeful recipes, and usually desserts derive from having left over ingredients and batter for something purposeful, that you need to use, so you get creative. Thanks to Seggrit, Ellie can never successfully convert to the Qun, cookies are too good for the soul, and she likes the Maker just fine.
In Hushed Whispers

Chapter Summary

In Hushed Whispers! Wicked Grace, crushes, the B-Quad is formed, reunions, new friends, horrible enemies, and Time Magic exists, so that's fun.

Chapter Notes

DISCLAIMER: I own nothing, still literally and for the purposes of this fic. All dialog used to be canon complaint during cut scenes belongs to the creators of Dragon Age Inquisition--Bioware, Frostbite, Electronic Arts, etc. Don't come for me, I am so very very poor.

Here we go! I appreciate all the Kudos and comments--I think I've replied to everyone, I really do appreciate the feedback!

A bit of a heads up just in case it ruffles any feathers, I do have the Iron Bull refer to himself, a pansexual man, and a character that's...more borderline demisexual, as Bisexual for the purposes of alliteration for a punny name, but we all know what's up. <3 no hate or erasure intended, there may even be a discussion about it at some point, it just didn't make it into this Chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

So. Lots of weird, confusing, crazy, and unexpected things were going on in the Inquisition.

Weird and confusing—Cassandra. She was acting very strange around Ellie. Before her lesson with Lady Josie they had breakfast together and the woman had just been...well she seemed like she was concerned about something but unwilling to speak of it, insisted that there was nothing the matter when Ellie asked if everything was alright. She asked Cremisius when they were alone, walking the path to the Chantry afterward, if he thought Cassandra seemed off and he posed that perhaps the Seeker wished to discuss something with Ellie privately. So, after her promised proper lunch date with Leliana, Ellie caught Cassandra on her own later that afternoon—Cremisius gave them some space, going to chat up Bull while Ellie went to Cullen first, at the soldier’s practice field.

“Eleanor, to what do I owe the pleasure?” the Commander asked as he joined her.

“Um so...” she sighed, she was kind of nervous! She wasn’t sure he’d like it or if it’d embarrass him, so she just thrust the hat at him, holding it out in her unmarked hand. “You need a hat! You work outside all day and it’s just no good not to bundle up if you can.”

Cullen knelt before her, grinning as he took the hat in his hands, “Ellie, you made this yourself?”

Ellie nodded. “Cremisius taught me how, he was lots of help but yeah, I knitted it,” she told “This,” he responded, whipping the hat onto his head, and she was so relieved it fit well, covering his hair, and ears and she thought the gray was nice, sort of went with the steely parts of his armor! “is the most excellent hat I have ever owned. And,” he said, brushing a lose lock of hair out of Ellie’s face, the back of his gauntleted finger skimming along the bottom of her hat, “I do believe we match.”

Oh gosh! “Yeah, we do!” she realized, and then, “Does it feel okay? It isn’t itchy or anything?”

He shook his head. “It is very soft, and I feel warmer already, truly, Eleanor, thank you. Seeker!” Cullen called as he rose to his feet, waving to the Nevarran woman who’d been practicing, beating down a dummy. She sheathed her sword and came to join them.

“Commander, ahh. What is this? The mysterious ‘not a hat’?” Cassandra asked.

Yeah, that’d been lame, but she’d been trying to be covert! Just checking to make sure she had a good idea how big she needed to make it, and it wasn’t like she got tons of opportunity to see the man’s head that well gosh—everyone was just way too tall! She was almost sixteen! She got big enough for her uterus to decide it was time to bleed out all over the place—when were her bones going to decide it was time to stretch a bit? She needed height! She had things to reach! It was officially on the prayer list: Protect all her friends, watch over them and bring them happiness, help them seal the Breach, make her taller.

“Not mysterious! Just…a surprise, sort of,” Ellie explained. “I wasn’t super sure it’d turn out okay.”

“It is lovely Eleanor,” Cassandra assured her.

The Seeker was standing right beside her and Cremisius was still talking with the Iron Bull, awe! Thom now too. Gosh he looked so different now, and it wasn’t just the massive lack of facial hair, he didn’t hold himself quite so reserved as he chatted with his new teammates, he was welcome there and was made to feel as such. He seemed at ease. Oh! Cassandra—focus, the woman definitely hadn’t been at ease at all that morning—so Ellie smiled and took her arm, “Thanks!” she said, looking to Cullen then, “I’ll let you get back! Have a good day!”

“Alas Eleanor I’m afraid that’s impossible,” Cullen spoke with put-upon regret, grinning as he informed her, “as I’m already having an amazing day.” Ellie giggled at that, he’s ridiculous!

“Um, can we talk?” Ellie asked Cassandra.

Cassandra looked to her a moment and then, “Of course, Eleanor,” she said, squeezing Ellie’s arm in a hug, “truly, you may speak with me of anything,” she assured as they began walking the path past the tents, heading for Haven’s frozen lake.

…Maybe she’d gotten it wrong, did Cassandra think Ellie had something she needed to talk about? She’d been so weird this morning, seeming awkward and wanting to bring something up—oh.

The crazy. Not a bad sort of crazy not really, just in the hectic sense.

Word came from the rebel mages late yesterday evening, Lady Josie informed her during her lessons. Today was their last day in Haven. Tomorrow morning as soon as they were through with breakfast, she’d have to armor up, pack her underthings with as much bandaging as possible because Maker help her, she was going to ride a horse. Russel—sweet Russel, he was always good and careful with her when she was hurt, she’d just have a quick talk with him that her body had betrayed her, and she was definitely hurting right now.

Cassandra may have known when they sat down the breakfast, been afraid to bring it up because their leaving tomorrow also meant…gosh she…she wasn’t going to see Marehis she was pretty sure. The woman was amazing, and incredible and she was sure she was making the journey back as quickly as mortally possible, but chances were Ellie would be long gone by the time Marehis returned to Haven and…well Ellie wasn’t coming back, not until they’d dealt with both the Mages and the Templars.

“Oh, Eleanor,” Cassandra actually hugged her as Ellie admitted that yeah she was…Maker she hadn’t seen Marehis since they went their separate ways, to the Coast, and the Oasis! That was so long! And so much had happened and she just, she missed Marehis so much! She got a little teary eyed when Cassandra tucked Ellie’s head under her chin, began rubbing her back, promising, “You will meet with the Mages as soon as we are in the Hinterlands, secure their alliance, and we will immediately set out for Therinfall Redoubt and I swear to you Eleanor, I will see to it the Lord Seeker does not unduly lengthen our negotiations. All of our allies are secured, everything is prepared. And while I know it is stressful business, you will be so busy with our dealings on behalf of the Inquisition…you will not have the time to dwell on homesickness, you’ll be back and seeing Marehis again before you know it.”

Ellie nodded, squeezing Cassandra tighter. “Thanks. And thanks for, you know, coming. It’s so much traveling and fighting and work and you’re so due a break, I really appreciate you always being along for the ride, you know? Gosh I’d be a mess,” she laughed a bit wetly, pulling away to wipe at her cheeks, “an even bigger mess. Can you give yourself a raise? I think you deserve a raise. Like. All the advisors do. Everyone in the Inquisition.”

Cassandra smiled ruefully, taking Ellie’s face in her hands and, thumbs brushing away leftover tears from under her eyes, “This is the exact reason you cannot be Inquisitor, Eleanor. We would go bankrupt for your gratitude.” And then, “Is there anything else that is troubling you?”

Nothing she could think of, so, “No. Was um, was there anything you wanted to talk about?”

Cassandra seemed to consider it a moment as her hands came to rest on Ellie’s shoulders, regarding her curiously, “What are your plans for the rest of your day? Do you need assistance packing?”

Ellie shook her head. “Nope! My afternoon is clear now, I’m all packed. I had time once I was done in my lessons with Lady Josie, so I went ahead and gathered up my stuff. Cremisius helped me with a potions run for everyone at Adan’s, so everybody’s all set there. You seemed busy earlier, so I took all the potions you hang on to for me and your health potions—Adan’s got something new for stamina he says, mid-battle pick-me-up of sorts Mister Stitches taught him—and I put them in your quarters. I hope you don’t mind—I didn’t snoop in your things honest I just left everything on the empty space on your desk and locked your room back up.”

“It was my understanding I locked the door myself this morning,” Cassandra said drily, though she was grinning a bit seeming amused, not upset that Ellie’d technically broken into her room. “Thank you Eleanor, that is one less thing I’ll have to see to. I’m finding I feel a bit of procrastination is due then, for my own packing since you’ve seen to gathering most of what I’ll need. If you’re free perhaps you wouldn’t mind joining me?”

“In your procrastinating?” Ellie asked, giggling because Cassandra procrastinating was just a fun sort of out-of-character, coming from the Seeker who worked nonstop.

“Yes,” Cassandra confirmed, “You’ve been to my quarters, while I believe you when you say you did not snoop, I’m sure it was hard to miss my collection.”

Collection…oh!

“Oh, yeah you like reading, just a little I guess, huh?” Ellie teased. Cassandra had a little room in the Chantry, just her bed and a desk, little washbasin and a trunk, and then stacks and stacks of books everywhere.

“Indeed,” Cassandra said, “I was considering getting something warm to drink from Flissa’s and spending the afternoon curled up with a good book, if you’re interested, I’m sure we could find something that would suit you.”

“Oh,” Ellie said, and then it wasn’t that far from the truth to say, “I’m sorry, I’m actually feeling really tired,” she was, it was hard not to want to sleep all day, woke up feeling tired no matter that she’d slept really well last night. Adan assured her that was normal. Now the exhaustion was sort of rolling through her chest. “I think I might need to lay down for a little bit.”

Cassandra put an arm around her shoulders, began walking them back up the slope toward Haven’s gate, “Of course, Eleanor. Perhaps another time.”

_Nope_, but Ellie wasn’t going to say as much.

“Hey Boss, Seeker,” the Iron Bull greeted as they approached, Thom nodded politely as Cremisius turned to them and Ellie stepped out of Cassandra’s hold to take his arm and gosh her eyes burned, stomach turning like she might be sick, her chest just felt heavy, she was worried if she spoke she might start crying so she tried smiling to the Qunari but even that didn’t feel right. She squeezed Cremisius’s arm three times.

He looked to her, then Cassandra, and back again. “We best be going Chief, I’ll see you later.”

No questions asked, not even when they got back to her cabin, as promised. Maker bless him.

“Sorry, I’m just not feeling very well,” she felt she should explain as he surveyed her quarters, led her inside.

“It’s alright,” he assured her warmly, helping her remove her cloak. “Do you need anything? Potion, something to eat or drink?”

She shook her head, though that felt a bit silly because he’d turned his back to hang her cloak up for her, “I’m just going to take a nap I think—if that’s alright.”

“Of course,” he said, laying a hand on her shoulder squeezing in reassurance, “you don’t need permission to take care of yourself, El,” he smiled, reprimanding lightly. “You want me to stick around? Need anything to help you sleep?”

“Nope! You go, relax, have some fun, yeah?”

“Alright, I’ll arrange for some guards,” he agreed, “I’ll come back around dinner time and check in, but you need anything send for me, okay?”
When she was alone she curled up in her bed, thought for sure she’d sleep but her head pounded with ache. She was sort of miserable with herself, didn’t feel like getting up and getting potion. It was dumb!

She told them—flat out told Cassandra and the Advisors, Marehis day one, when they asked if she had any form of education—she didn’t! She explicitly said she hadn’t had any schooling aside from the occasional lesson in magic from someone like Ava or something. And she thought they got it—Cassandra asking if Ellie knew she could write to people from Haven, she thought that’d just been an offer for the woman to send word to Ellie’s loved ones if she had any that she was alright. After that no one, not even Varric or Solas questioned her asking them for help handling things like letters or requisitions when they were in the Hinterlands, Cassandra helped her the most and she thought…she thought they knew! That they understood, and it wasn’t a big deal.

And then they got back from the Hinterlands and Solas asked if she wanted to read with him and…well she thought maybe he didn’t know after all or had forgotten or was just being polite. Then Varric tried teaching her lockpicks with that guide he drew up, told her to study it, pictures and words and all—and she definitely didn’t feel like flat out informing a man who wrote books for a living she’d never read a word of one in her entire life! And then Cassandra wrote that letter to Lady Josie for her when they were in Orlais, wanted Ellie’s opinion on her wording when she hadn’t read it out loud and it clicked. They just assumed—no matter that it didn’t make any sense, where would she learn something like that?—they all thought she could read!

And then she came to realize that was because everybody knew how to read. Every single person in the entire Inquisition could read and write, even Sera and she had a similar background to Ellie! Everyone knew how to do it, so she thought it must be easy, but she tried! Nothing made any sense to her, there wasn’t any rhyme or reason to the squiggles, circles, dots, and lines, she couldn’t figure it out all on her own and she definitely wasn’t asking for help. They’d have think she was a total idiot! Just so dumb! And she was but she didn’t want her friends to think that!

Magic drew up the fact that Sera had figured it out, and she just did what Ellie thought everyone else had been doing—read things for her, and gosh that’d been sweet trying to make Madam de Fer’s list a little more understandable if she wanted to look it over later on her own. She didn’t even make Ellie feel badly or stupid over it but…

Blah! She yanked her covers over her head and just—she wasn’t going to think! She was just going to lay there until she slept and hopefully when she woke up her headache would be gone!

She felt better, wasn’t sad and angsty when she woke later, Fade Dreaming gave her time to sort of disconnect from how badly she was feeling, think without her physical aches picking at her concentration. Her headache wasn’t quite so bad but oh Maker, the cramping. Rolling pain in her guts from dull aching to stabbing…literally, she’d officially been stabbed enough times to verify as much, it felt like being stabbed. Why? She knew why, understood it was just her body trying to help get everything out but why did it take so long? It’d been two entire days almost! And Adan said it could last an entire week! What sort of nonsense?!

But Adan also supplied potion, and she was properly motivated to climb out of bed and drain a draught, capping the bottle right when someone knocked on her cabin door before peeking their head in. Cremisius, glad to see she was up and feeling better.

“Did you have a good afternoon?” she asked him.

“I did,” he was happy to confirm, “Hung out with the guys—Thom’s settling in well, him and Chief are all set for tomorrow—finished my knitting.”
Oh! The scarf he was working on! Huh, “Really?” he wasn’t wearing it, “is it warmer out now?” dare she hope? Haven just seemed to be getting even chillier as they transitioned into the wintry months.

“Oh Maker no, I wish,” he said as he realized what she meant, “I wasn’t making it for myself. It’s a gift actually.” He explained, “Specific someone.”

Specific…oh!

“Oh gosh, did they like it?” she asked, excited…mostly excited…she was happy for him if he had someone he really liked. She just hoped they didn’t hurt him, whoever they were. Oh if someone broke his heart or hurt his sense of self they were so toast!

“Dunno yet, I’ll get around to it soon enough,” he shrugged. “If you’re feeling up to it everyone’s going to meet in the Tavern—whole-party dinner to kick things off before you leave tomorrow.”

Oh gosh, everyone?

He meant everyone—every single one of her party members, Madam de Fer and all, were gathered around two tables scooted together so everyone could fit comfortably, Maker what time was it? There wasn’t anyone else in the Tavern, but it was regular dinner time.

Everyone’s greeting was sort of garbled together, but enthusiastic enough it seemed everyone was getting along pretty well which was…definitely a relief, Ellie was a little nervous about heading out tomorrow, with a party of seven of her companions, but everyone had wanted to come. Varric didn’t want her going out without him, Thom too, and the Iron Bull was sincere when he’d said he wanted to be a frontline bodyguard of sorts. Cassandra was going to help her with the actual addressing the Mages and Templars thing which was just a relief because Ellie was nervous enough doing it with help. Solas didn’t like being too far away from her now that they knew their connection had limits, and his being around able to link with Ellie in emergencies gave everyone peace of mind. Madam de Fer wanted to oversee everything, watch over the proceedings and offer guidance as she could. Sera wasn’t super interested in the ‘Mage pish’, but she wanted a proper look at the Templar business and she was pretty determined to go just about anywhere Ellie went which was just really really sweet.

The Iron Bull pulled out one of the two empty seats on his right, “Hey boss, foods on its way, have a seat.”

So she did, thanking him. It wasn’t exactly table manners, but she wasn’t at a fancy party or something, so she leaned forward, resting her arms on the table top, sat so her left knee touched his thigh so he’d know she was there. Cremisius’s gaze sort of swept the room before he sat next to her, keeping his own arm—left one, right beside hers in case she needed to signal him quickly, she noticed he always did that when they were at meals with others, it was sweet.

“You are feeling better I hope, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, seated across from Ellie.

“I am, thanks. I’m sorry about earlier,” she really was.

Cassandra’s hand reached out and covered her own, “Think nothing of it.”

Everyone chatted amicably with each other—Varric and Thom sat across from each other down the table from Ellie, and she caught a few mentions of ‘tourney’ so it was nice to see them trying to find common ground again, Sera was sitting across from Cremisius, rapid-fire tonight, talking about everything from pranks she’d pulled to Friends missions, asking him about Charger stories, and had he seen any Qunari women? She was very disappointed that he hadn’t. Madam de Fer talked about her time in the Oasis with Cassandra, Solas, and Ellie—gosh it was so far away, but she was sort of excited to go check it out at some point, Solas had all sorts of theories for what could be waiting there in the strange temple they’d found.

“My dear girl, have you considered the list I gave you at all?” Vivienne asked.

“Uh-huh! I was thinking maybe Elemental magic would be the way to go, if that sounds okay to you? I know a little, so my magic has already started developing that way, and it likes it well enough.”

“That sounds most agreeable my dear,” Vivienne agreed crisply. “I do hope our travels will afford us opportunity for some tutelage. Working together in the field should give us some active educational experience.”

Ellie nodded. “It’ll be fun! Oh! Do you mind being included in mine and Solas’s Barrier spells, Madam de Fer?”

Madam de Fer huffed a laugh, “Of course not my dear. The questions you ask. Why ever would I take issue with such a thing?”

Ellie shrugged. “Just because you’re a mage doesn’t mean you trust other people’s casting or that you’re comfortable with their magic touching you—you’d have to ask the others if they’re okay with you casting on them. And you’re absolutely not to cast on Sera at all, ever, unless she says otherwise.”

Vivienne dipped her head in a single nod. “Certainly. I would not wish to make the young lady uncomfortable.”

She spoke a bit drily, in a way that made Ellie feel like she was being sarcastic about it, but she did it in that pithy ‘being polite to mask rudeness’ way but she wasn’t being outright mean, so Ellie’d just have to wait and see. She was pretty sure it meant Madam de Fer had no problem not casting on Sera because she didn’t particularly care about her either way which was…not ideal but okay. If it meant she was going to cast on her anyway…oh gosh she’d be in for so much! Many words! All of the words Ellie knew—and the Inquisition was teaching her loads of them! She’d never been so angry at Solas before the time he cast on Sera when she made it clear she didn’t want magic on her, oh gosh that’d been just infuriating! She really hoped they could all work together well.

Dinner was so good, Flissa made that stew, the kind out of butternut squash, with warm, fresh bread gosh, it was just yum! Ellie got the impression Cassandra remembered her liking to the dish, that she’d asked Flissa to make it for their last night in Haven—when their dinner was delivered the Seeker had been watching like she was looking to see her reaction, seeming pleased when Ellie’d smiled. Gosh she was just the best.

Oh! She really was—when they were all done eating and their dishes cleared away, Ellie thought they’d chat some more or go their separate ways, but Cassandra pulled out a deck of cards!

“I thought perhaps we could enjoy a game of Wicked Grace,” she said, and then she looked to Ellie and seemed almost nervous to ask, “would you care to play, Eleanor? Purely for fun, not coin.”

“Coin is the fun, Seeker,” Varric griped.
“I will gladly confiscate your money if you’re so eager to be rid of it,” Cassandra returned drily sending a glare down to his end of the table before looking back to Ellie. “If you do not know the game I’m certain it would be no trouble to teach you.”

Ellie held out her hand again. “I can deal if you like?”

She definitely didn’t mind at all it seemed, she looked almost relieved like…huh dunno it was just an extreme amount for something so small but maybe Cassandra didn’t like dealing herself, had hoped someone else would offer?

“Careful Tumbles, if you send the cards flying everywhere you’re picking them up,” Varric jested as Ellie split the deck, taking half in each hand. And the Iron Bull turned in his seat to watch her.

She quickly riffle-shuffled the deck a few times, keeping all the cards in hand thank you very much—she wasn’t new!—before sliding them around the table one at a time to make sure everyone got the same number of cards. One two three four five.

Sera watched her wide-eyed and declared, “Shite! Inky’s gonna hustle us!”

“Sera, if I were hustling you, you wouldn’t know it,” she tried to keep a straight face, it was enough to get Sera looking a little gob smacked, but that just made Ellie laugh.

“Shit boss, had me going there for a second,” Bull said, discarding a card and selecting a new one from the deck.

Ellie looked to her own cards. Huh, she had two daggers which was eh, and one of the Snake ones, ‘D-e-c-e-i-t’, two of the Knight ones—one that had ‘R-o-s-e-s’ written at the top, whatever that meant, but Ellie liked him, he was a favorite because of the pretty flowers in his hands, roses she thought, and the other one was the bleeding one, ‘S-a-c-r-i-f-i-c-e’. Not sure but the pictures were clear, they were both in armor like knights, and she knew her numbers okay-enough to tell what order they should be in when played.

She swapped out a dagger first in hopes she’d get another part of a set, she ended up with one of the Angel ones, but it wasn’t Death, no creepy black, blown-out candles. It was the coin one. Eh, she liked Angel cards better than Snake ones so when her turn to swap again came she discarded that one and took up another.

“Deceit,” Cassandra said.

Deceit? “I’m sorry?” what…what did she mean?

Varric looked over the table to the pile of discarded cards and snorted, nodding at Thom. “You poor bastard, it was only a matter of time before she got the truth out of you—Tumbles here’ll even cast out the deceit card given the chance,” he quipped.

“Right good of her on all accounts,” Thom said as he rearranged his own hand of cards, unbothered by Varric’s teasing and it’d been actually…well, as close to friendly about the situation Ellie’d ever heard him be, maybe joking about it was his way of getting over Thom’s lie. “Well, possibly not the card one, if she’ll regret that move later.”

Deceit…card…move—oh! Her card! Was that what it said?

“I’m just not a big fan of the snake ones,” she explained, “they’re not as pretty as the others.”
That got her a series of groans from around the table and the Iron Bull said, “Imekari, you’re killing me here—don’t tell me your strategy is just playing the ones you think are pretty?”

Krem snorted, “Oh she’s playing great, mind your own cards Chief! Knowing your rotten luck, El’s already way ahead of you.”

Well yeah, if Death got dealt right now she’d have a half-and-half hand, she wouldn’t lose, it’d be more of a draw unless everyone else just had super crappy hands. But! “Cremisius! Keep your eyes on your own cards you cheat-y McCheater pants!”

“My most sincere apologies lady Herald,” he said, much too smoothly before his tones turned dry, “how dare I see the cards you’ve practically got laid out on the table,” he teased.

Oh, she’d put her hands out once she’d finished dealing, keeping her cards turned away, more toward Cremisius so the Qunari couldn’t see what was on them huh. “What did I say about backtalk, Aclassi?”

“Hmm…” he made a show of thinking it over, “I’m not getting paid for it?”

“Yup! So button it, mister!” she ordered humorously.

Cremisius raised a hand to twist his fingers before his lips like tucking a button done on a shirt, dedicating himself to keeping his mouth a solid line until the action made Ellie giggle, which took all of a second, and huh, her laughing made him smile to so that was nice. Made her feel blushy though if she thought about it.

She got very blushy the following morning…because of the unexpected part of things happening in the Inquisition. Could also easily be categorized as ‘crazy’ and ‘confusing’. She certainly didn’t understand it.

Everyone was gathered out front of Haven’s gate, horses saddled, packs secured to backs of masters and beasts, sweet, sweet horses. Russel was very understanding, he nodded and nuzzled Ellie’s cheek when she quietly informed him that she was so, so so so so not looking forward to this trip on a physical level, she felt all sorts of yuck. But she was going to suck it up—she had enough bandaging to soak up a river tucked in her underthings, worst case scenario she has stained drawers and have to clean the inside of her armor, it was kind of made to be bled on anyway, and her cramping and headache potions had already kicked in from breakfast. She had this!

She had something else too.

The others were getting on their horses or getting ready to—Cassandra and Cullen were still talking over by her horse, the Seeker absently petting her steed’s face as they spoke in hushed tones—Ellie was just finishing her own talk with Russel when Cremisius came up from behind her and she turned to greet him—or, well, say goodbye really, this was it. They were really going to go settle these things with the Mages, the Templars, it all made Ellie excited and nervous—like the rush you get from standing on the edge of a cliff, precariously balanced on the heels of your feet and thee wind could either blow you back into safety or cast you to your doom.

“All set? Need anything before you head out?” he asked as he came to a stop, hands behind his back.

Ellie shook her head. “Not really…just um, maybe give Marehis like the biggest hug in the world for me when you see her, yeah?” she asked, rising up on her toes to hug him around the neck.

“Biggest one, promise,” he said squeezing her tight before releasing her. She realized then he’d been holding something, folded over several times, clenched in his hand—oh!

“Your scarf!” she looked over her shoulder to see if the Iron Bull was paying attention, but he was rather preoccupied climbing into Bitsy’s saddle—biggest. horse. ever! The name was clearly for irony’s sake…kind of like Varric’s nicknaming the Iron Bull ‘Tiny’—they matched! Anyway, she still kept her voice low in case Cremisius would be embarrassed talking about a person he liked with his boss in ear shot, “Are you giving it to them today?”

“In a bit yeah. Still on the clock,” he said with a shrug.

Oh! Yeah she supposed it wouldn’t be super professional to go make his moves on the person he fancied when he was technically supposed to be seeing to Ellie’s safety, but she was leaving! She was practically gone already so, “Cremisius! Are you kidding me?” she smiled and said, going for encouraging levity, “Thank you Lieutenant Aclassi, you’ve been absolutely amazing this week, and now you are officially released from bodyguard duty! By order of Andrsaste’s Herald! Go! Do your thing, you’ve got this!”

Cremisius breathed out a little nervous sounding laugh, smile tugging at the corner of his lips. “Alright then.”

And then he was very close, looping the scarf around her neck, around her hair really it sort of got in the way a bit but um…that was not really a concern at the moment. Her eyes sort of felt like they were going to fall out of their sockets and her face felt very, very red, and she was pretty sure she officially lost the ability to breathe ever ever again.

“No pressure,” he said to her quietly, “none at all just…be safe, and I’ll see you when you get back.”

Her mouth worked for a moment while she tried to figure out just how to put words into it again he…wha…who…huh?…what?!

He smiled at her, chuckling a bit as he turned to let his sentence stand on its own, no pressure even from the beginning to respond at all and that made her stomp her foot, pointing at his back as she shouted,

“I will definitely see you when I get back, Cremisius Aclassi!”

“Looking forward to it,” he called over his shoulder as he headed for Haven’s gate, throwing up a hand to wave.

He! Was- did- how?! What the! The!

What the flip!

“Everything all good there, Boss?” Bull called from where he sat successfully astride his horse.

Ellie turned to see all seven adults up and ready to go, staring at her like they weren’t sure what was happening but also way too amused, and magic was half racing with excitement and half laughing in her blood over everything and she was just! this was!

“All good!”
Way to go Krem!

Dude really had to wait until the last minute like that, huh? Bull got it, waiting until he wasn’t working directly for Boss girl…damn good of him really, Ellie was relying on him as a source of protection, springing something like this on her might pressure her to respond positively when she wasn’t truly interested…and damn telling her they’d see each other when she got back gave her time to think it over, but nothing that would distract her from her mission. State his interest, put it out there for her to consider, without any pressure to touch on it while she was away, he wasn’t going to clutter her inbox with love letters, and didn’t expect as much in return, Herald of Andraste had business, work. Enough occupied her day, complicated her life. A scarf would keep her warm, and a promise would leave her looking forward to picking up where they left off in a time and place that was best for them both and damn it all if that wasn’t just smooth. Spoke volumes to the thing that worried him most about Krem’s pursuit—handling the ‘Herald’ thing, sort of what inclined him all the more to lend Krem out for Bodyguard duty, it’d given him a crash course in seeing the ups and downs and stresses of being so directly in the Herald’s life. Something like this, everything about it said yeah, he knew what was up, wasn’t going to make unreasonable demands or burden her further, wasn’t going to tax himself with unnecessary jealousy or childish expectations for constant attention. He’d focus on his work, let her focus on hers, and any time they had together would be that much better—absence makes the heart grow fonder and all that noise.

Oh man it’d been fun to hear those two during Wicked Grace, he didn’t have to see them to hear Boss-Girl at play, lively and flirtatious with the young man at her side. Krem definitely enjoyed goading her, liked riling her up playfully. And he appreciated that everyone sat back, didn’t try to meddle one way or the other, they didn’t need encouragement—but they definitely didn’t need discouragement either. He’d had his eye on Madam de Fer, woman was snooty as fuck, but she didn’t seem like she was going to object to the two getting to know one another—worried she might try to manipulate Boss into a more ‘lucrative’ situation but uh, he’d heard the girl hold her own against her that day in the Chantry, got a recap from Krem to boot, so he wasn’t too worried about it. And Tethras hadn’t run his mouth off or anything, seemed almost pleased which was…better than his outright working against it but gah dude really pissed him the fuck off, yelling at that girl, degrading her in front of her people, kid looked absolutely gut-punched when he was through with her. Considering the circumstances though she technically had been.

Bastard got points back for apologizing—in front of others, which was only fitting. He’d embarrassed her in front of subordinates, it was a good step up to apologize in front of people he wanted respect from, foregoing his own pride. And doing right by Krem—seeing and not judging, even checking to make sure he was addressing him correctly. Shit, his Lieutenant wasn’t going to be paying for drinks anytime soon—Bull’d settled the Charger’s tab before he left, put down money to cover them while he was gone, got a good peak at Flissa’s books—Dwarf had paid in advance, bankrolling Krem’s drinks for…well the dude could get pretty well plastered every night of the week if he cared to.

Boss girl was all kinds of bashful as she led their party, red faced, new scarf wrapped securely around her neck. Sera was a giggling mess in the saddle behind her, to a point the kid threatened to make her walk if she didn’t quit.

Elf cackled at that, her arms around Ellie’s waist squeezing in an apologetic hug. “Sooorry
“I appreciate it but maybe less with the squeezing yeah?”

Boss was tight-lipped about the whole affair, shrugged off any effort to question her on her goodbyes with Krem from Madam de Fer and Varric—not even the Dwarf’s offering of chocolate got him any details, not that that kept him from handing the treat over anyway, poor kid deserved something for her trouble. Monthly crap was hitting her hard. When they finally stopped for the evening, Bull stepped up to help her down after Sera slipped out of the saddle. Her whole body was stiff, sore, she flinched against him, quietly thanking him. He made sure she sat next to him at dinner—seeing side this time for his peace of mind that she ate well enough, and he kept a hand on her back, massaging at her shoulders as she talked shop with Vivienne and Solas. Had to stop after a while though because he almost put her to sleep in her dinner, head lolling forward, shoulder’s lax after he’d worked to loosen them up.

She did confide about the day’s events with Seeker once they were alone in their tent, Sera had been cast out with demands from Boss that she go brush her teeth for fear the Elf would get cavities. Madam de Fer had her own sleeping arrangements, a snowy-white tent she kept to herself.

The girl sounded shy as she informed Cassandra that Krem vaguely informed her that he had an interest in someone in their camp, and later admitted to making the scarf he’d been working on as a present for them…and then proceeded to present it to Ellie herself once he was no longer crossing the boundaries of his employment. Seeker was doing that thing where she held her breath to restrain herself from being too enthusiastic about something—deep down the woman was a romantic and everything about the story seemed to strike her as…adorable, ten to one that was the word she wanted to use, even if she’d never say it out loud.

“…do you think Cremisius really likes me?”

Koslun’s entire ass-crack. Bull was reclined in the tent he shared with Rainier, Thom whittling away in his own bedroll while the Qunari read over reports from Red on their mission in the Hinterlands, and he couldn’t help himself, he called out, “He’s crazy about you, Boss,” his words got him a minorly confused look from Thom before Bull pointed to his ears and the Human nodded with realization, snorting when, after Bull heard her indignant huff, Ellie called back loudly enough to be heard by even Rainier,

“You mind your own beeswax, I wasn’t asking you! This is girl-talk—no boys allowed!”

Sera took that as leave to catapult her way into the tent, heard Boss-girls little ‘oof’ as the Elf collided with her, shouting, “Inky’s got a booooyfriend!”

“Oh shush it! I do not have a boyfriend! I have a very good friend. Who is a boy. And. We might maybe sort of like each other. Like a lot.” Uh-huh.

“Clearly,” Cassandra teased lightly.

Sounded like she nodded and then, “It just seems…I mean I’ve got all this, going on. It’s a lot to get involved with. And I mean he’s so…” yeah she probably didn’t want him listening if she was about to gush over the guy in detail but it wasn’t like he could shut his ears off, “gosh he’s so incredibly kind and compassionate and thoughtful and, you know, handsome…and…he doesn’t scare me,” she swallowed, quiet for a moment before saying, “sometimes people scare me.”

Well that was a big fucking…Bull sat up and listened closer. Had…had some putrid, lowlife asshole harmed that girl? Seeker must have gotten the same idea because he heard Ellie gasp, the soft slap of her hands taking the woman’s as she was quick to assure her she meant people in a general sense but that definitely wasn’t any better.

Following day during lunch they almost had an issue—Thom’d gotten it, been cool with Krem, hadn’t stared or made the guy uncomfortable when he was securing his binder the first morning Rainier spent as an official Charger, never misgendered him, treated him the same as he would any other boy Krem’s age, but he didn’t quite understand it was Krem’s business alone who knew and who didn’t, almost outing the guy in front of the others when he asked,

“So you’re er…comfortable, with this young man,” it was how uncomfortable and uncertain he seemed that tipped Bull off, “You know with him uh, that he’s—”

Must have tipped her off too, split second before Bull was about to intervene, “Cremisius being Tevinter doesn’t bother me,” Ellie cut him off smoothly, shrugging, “I’ve dated a Tevinter before.”

“So the Herald of Andraste has a history of Imperium lovers?” Madam de Fer asked, sounding amused.

Kid’s face scrunched up at that. “Not a history of them, that sounds almost creepy like I’m building a collection or something. First person I ever dated was a Marcher, this boy whose father runs a bakery, so he’d always swipe something for me in the hopes that I’d agree to go on a date with him if he plied enough baked goods. He was always nice to me, so we went out a few times,” she shrugged, “but he’d talk terrible trash about everyone, even people he claimed were his friends, talking them down to make himself seem better and that’s just ‘nope’,” she shook her head, “didn’t like that at all. And then I don’t know if you’d count them as ‘Tevinter’ necessarily when I really think about it—I dated a girl from Hasmal, first generation born in the Marches after her family escaped the Imperium.”

Sera squawked at that, excited, “Inky has a girlfriend?”

“Had one, yeah.” Ellie said, “She was sweet and pretty and fun, nothing super serious just a ‘hit me up whenever you’re in town’ thing.” She caught Thom’s eye though using the opportunity to answer the question he’d been asking without outing Krem, just a casual summation of her own interests, “It’s more about hearts than parts with me.”

Nope, girl outed her damn self instead. Shit. It wasn’t as big of a deal, and he figured as much given the circumstances, but some people were weird about it though, enough that he wasn’t going to leave her hanging, plus it struck some cord of inspiration, “Hell yeah! Boss! I got it—B-Quad.”

“Bee…squad?” Boss-girl asked, confused.

“Quad—as in four—but it’s like Squad you know? And B as in B-words. You and me, Boss we’re the Big, Beautiful, Bisexual, Badasses,” Bull explained, yup, that about summed them up. “Sealing Rifts, kicking ass, stealing hearts! Suck it Sarge,” he said to Rainier, “your dumb cool-guy hair warrior club is over, B-Quad’s where it’s at.”

Ellie gasped in excitement, returning his enthusiasm, “Yeah! B-Quad, I dig it!” she declared, rising from her seat next to Seeker to run around the campfire to where the Qunari sat, she still had to jump to slap the hand at the end of the Iron Bull’s fully extended arm with glee but she did a good job, Imekari always put lots of effort into her high-fives.
“I can see it, Eleanor supplies the beauty, you supply the big,” Madam de Fer saw fit to tease.

“Oh! The whole thing applies to both of us—The Iron Bull is gorgeous! And I’m plenty big!”

He…he never thought he’d ever want a deity to pray to, but he almost felt like he needed outside divine assistance to handle the bombardment of unadulterated hilarity that overwhelmed him at the sight of Boss-Girl flexing her biceps like she had mad muscle going like Bull.

“Yeah Boss-girl you’re out here gettin’ your gains!” Kid beamed at his laugh ridden encouragement and moved to sit on one of his thighs—he had his plate resting on the other and the little brat proceeded to steal his bread. He thought traveling sans Skinner would keep his food and drink safe from theft, but…eh. He was done anyway and shit if mischievous wasn’t a good look on her, little spark in her eyes, smile at her lips as she munched on her stolen goods, pulling him and Sarge into conversation, wanting to know how he was coming along with learning different Signs the Chargers were integrating in their battle tactics, Boss girl helping him learn ones he didn’t have quite down.

That was one crisis averted, and Rainier was apologetic as hell later when things were winding down for the day and they were alone in their tent, Bull gave him a better run-down on the ‘dos’ and ‘don’ts’ of knowing someone’s gender identity conflicts with what they were assigned at birth, kept Krem’s name out of it in case that Solas guy or Sera could hear, but he got the point across that if you know, you keep it to yourself. End of the day, his heart had been in the right place—he’d been worried for Krem, thought that Ellie didn’t know, and while she was kind there was still the chance she might be wholly unfamiliar with the concept, react badly and hurt the guy’s feelings over it. and fuck if he didn’t mean it, he caught the drift, didn’t name names, but he said, “I’ve been a decent man, and I’ve been the worst sort of man, but regardless of good or bad I’ve never had the ‘man’ part called into question. Can’t imagine having to actively defend the claim, worry that people could find some fault in that identity. Hardly seems fair, that boy isn’t even grown and he’s already far better man than I could ever hope to be, and there are people that would dare think otherwise.” Thom shook his head. “Hell. I ever finally grow up I want to be half the man he is.”

“Right there with you Sarge.”

Following morning had them making the last stretch into the Hinterlands, kid was absolutely miserable, nerves over having to address the rebel mages had her knocking back draught to stomach her breakfast, and she’d had trouble sleeping even with potion, her heating bandages died out on her in the eleventh hour and it was only getting colder out with winter months on them. There were only a two, three hours before they had to be up and at ‘em when Ellie came to him, maybe twenty minutes sleep under her belt, blanket wrapped tight around her shoulders, tired and cold and cramping all to hell, mumbling incoherently about how ‘they’re coming’ which was spooky as shit what with being startled awake to find Ellie standing over his bedroll looking like a specter of death voice rasping an ominous message, Mark casting a sickly green glow along her features in the pitch-ass black. He took one good look at her and got over it pretty quick, waved her in, let her catch a few winks curled up against him, kept his arm around the small of her back in the hopes the extra warmth would help the way Dalish’s heating bandages or a warm waterskin would. Still wasn’t nearly enough sleep and the poor kid got startled herself—she didn’t even remember waking up earlier, just trying for hours to fall asleep in her own bedroll, only to wake up splayed half across Bull’s chest, drool on her face, a foot planted firmly against Rainier’s cheek as the elder man snored through all the excitement, he woke up when the kid did because she jerked in surprise, ended up kicking him in the face which was just damn funny even the girl struggled with her laughter as she apologized and made sure the old bastard was alright. Damn that was good. But Imekari wasn’t feeling good at all, Sera was extra careful holding onto her as they rode, the Elf snuggling against her, quiet and comforting the younger girl who held herself stiffly, drawn and dreary looking for all the world like she could sleep for a week.

But the second the Inquisition’s infiltration camp in the Hinterlands came into view, he heard Ellie’s heart skip a beat, lungs do that twitchy-gasping thing they did when she got overwhelmed, and she practically jumped off her horse—as it was, Russel was still in forward motion, Sera screeching in surprise when Ellie threw herself out of the saddle rolling onto her feet and when she was up, she screamed with excitement, and then bolted, rushing to get to camp as fast as her legs could carry her.

“Oh my gosh, oh my gosh, oh my gosh, oh my gosh!”

“Da’vehnan!”

Boss bodily collided with a tall, lean Elf woman in scout armor, who fell to her knees, taking Ellie with her as she held her like her life depended on it, hand reaching up into her curls, openly crying as she pressed a kiss to the top of Ellie’s head, rocking back and forth as the girl squeezed her as tightly as physically possible.

“I missed you so much!” came Ellie’s muffled wail.

“Oh my sweet girl, I missed you too!” the Elf said, pulling back, hands taking Ellie’s face in them, thumbing away the girl’s tears, “Elgar’nan it has been far too long.”

Huh. Marehis, he was pretty sure, they were all caught up, gathered near the camp, dismounting to join the Herald but it didn’t look like she had introductions much on her mind as she sobbed, sniffling before launching into,

“We hired the Chargers! And s-some of our soldiers got killed but Thom took care of the person responsible—Blackwall’s Thom now you know that right? And I got really sick, but everyone helped me so much, Sera made me soup and the Iron Bull, he’s a Qunari! So he’s like super warm, and Cassandra sang to me I think?” Seeker actually choked on air and she turned a nice shade of red. “And I met the nobles from Highever and they proposed! Marriage! Like total lunatics! But Lady Josie and Cassandra stopped them! And I got an ulcer! But Healer Adan and Mister Stitches fixed it. And I almost got assassinated but Cremisius kept me safe—he watched out for me while you were away, he taught me how to knit, I know how to knit now I made Cullen a hat! And Varric yelled at me real bad but he apologized, and he got me chocolate, and I’m having my first blood thing which sucks so so so so so much—I thought I’d been murdered but the Iron Bull made me pancakes! And I had a talk with Madam de Fer, she’s going to teach me magic and she says you’re friends, she’s been nice to you right? Oh! Gosh! You haven’t met the Iron Bull—you don’t know him yet but he’s like one of my favorite people in life! He hired Thom! So he’s a Sergeant and Thom now! And- and- Cremisius likes me, he made me a scarf, see? Oh! And a hat but that was before,” she haphazardly summarized, holding a portion of the woolen length up for Marehis’s bewildered inspection.

“Da’len, da’len breathe,” Marehis intoned, patting the girl on the back, “you’ve really had a time of it, huh?”

“I’m so glad to see you! Are you okay? Did you like the Oasis? What happened last week, you were safe right? Leliana told me about everything.”
“I’m well, da’len, the Oasis was beautiful, it’ll be even more so once you’ve cleared the Rifts. I was perfectly safe, you needn’t worry. Leliana sent out a report on your time in Haven while I was away, with that sweet note from you—I apologize I didn’t pen a response, but her report was followed shortly by orders to make my way to our Hinterlands camp.” She smoothed back the girl’s hair, “After all, with all these formal negotiations for the Inquisition, the Herald of Andraste may have need of her handmaiden.”

“She does! She really, really does!” Ellie insisted, squeezing the woman tight before releasing her full-body grip. “I’m so glad you’re here!” And then she gasped, “Oh gosh! Sera!” whirling back around looking for all the world like a Tamassran who’d just realized they’d forgotten their Imekari at the Mashev-Esaam. “I left you all alone on Russel! Are you okay?!” she scanned the crowd of her companions, relieved to find Sera safe on the ground,

“You just about gave me a ruddy heart attack!” Sera griped lightly, “But it’s all good innit? Wassup Marehis, sweets? I think Inky missed you a smidge.”

“It’s good to see you again Sera,” the older Elf woman greeted, “Solas,” ooooh so neutral, so polite, and yet there was just a bit too much fire in the eyes to contradict that, if Krem hadn’t tipped him off to their relationship, that would have told Bull all he needed to know. The second those two had a moment alone, clothes were coming off. Or whatever Elves did together. Lots of ear biting in his experience. Elf took in a breath, hand rising to her chest before she moved to embrace the Seeker, hugging the Nevarran woman tight, “Thank you, thank you so much, lethallan,” she whispered quietly against the Human woman’s ear, either for keeping Ellie safe, or interrogating the shit out of the people responsible for Leliana’s security breach. Both, probably.

“Praise Him most high you are safe, I am grateful you’ve returned,” Cassandra whispered back, squeezing the Elf.

“Marehis, darling, I am so pleased to see you again, you are well I trust?” Madam de Fer asked, her tones regal, light, but sincere enough, and she came forward to hug the Elf in earnest before pulling away to look her up and down like she was truly concerned the woman might be hurt from her adventures in espionage.

“It is wonderful to see you again Vivienne, I’m well. And you, must be the Iron Bull. I’m pleased to make your acquaintance,” she addressed Bull then, offering her hand to shake, “your Lieutenant spoke very highly of you when he came to deliver your offer to Haven, though I’m glad to hear you’re Ellie’s ‘favorite person in life’.”

Ha! Little bastard loves him, and he knows it, ‘spoke very highly’, hell yeah! “I have that effect on people. Glad to finally meet you, boss-girl’s had nothing but great things to say,” and then, because he’s an asshole and the Elves were so very intent on keeping their relationship a secret…it could only help that, right? “I believe she said you’re the sweetest, smart, brave—didn’t mention beauty on top of all that,” little kiss to the back of the Elf’s hand just, you know, top that off.

“Oi!” What the actual fuck was that a pebble? A pebble bounced off the back of his head! “One, I told you Marehis was the prettiest, you jerk! Two, what I tell you about hitting on people who give me food?! Knock it off or get knocked!” Ellie threatened, tossing and catching a second round of ammunition rhythmically in her unmarked hand, ready to strike.

Oh yeah, he had promised that hadn’t he?

He released Marehis’s hand, dipping his head respectfully, “Sorry Boss.”
She cast down the rock into the dirt, hands on hips as she informed him, “You better be!”

“You know, now that I think about it you did say she was the prettiest,” and to show the poor guy he was only yanking his chain, tip him off that he knew what was up, he gave Solas a wink and a heads up, “Also said you’d personally destroy any man who broke her heart.”

Solas gave a low, quiet huff seeming bemused and then he blanched a bit when boss girl backed up the claim with, “Yeah I will! So watch it!” she reprimanded Bull, unmarked hand pointing a finger at him while her other arm pulled her minder into her side.

Fei-sty. Love it.

Bull wasn’t the only one who better watch it—Marehis was outright warm with most of their party members but Rainier and Tethras received a tightlipped, polite nod of greeting. Got the impression that if Ellie wasn’t looking the woman would have backhanded the both of them. Instead she opted for leading Ellie into the camp as she announced she had presents. They all gathered around the fire going in the Inquisition camp, Ellie sitting just about as close as she could get without actually sitting in the flames and Bull got pulled into sitting at her side—having him sit where he could keep her in sight.

“Presents?” Ellie asked, confused.

“Of course, da’len, I missed you while I was away! I had some things to take care of for Leliana on the way to the Oasis that took me to places of business, and I was thinking of you so,” she leaned into an Inquisition tent coming out with a floral-patterned cloth shopping bag. She plopped down next to Ellie offering the bag to her, “presents.”

“Oh gosh, you really didn’t have to but thank you,” oh man, kid’s birthday was going to be all sorts of fun shit. Wasn’t sure what he was gonna get her himself, Krem was a smug bastard about his own plans he refused to share with Bull, wasn’t a damn bit of help like the traitor he is—but thanks to Seeker’s reports from their last venture into the Hinterlands, Bull had a good idea of what he wanted to get the kid now, and it was gonan be kick-ass, so the little vint can suck it! She was excited and blushing like mad as she peeked into the bag lip catching between her teeth as she pulled out a few small, colorful glass bottles, warm green, a soft pink, different shades of blue swirled together in one. She set them down carefully and unscrewed the top of one, a little brush attached to the cap she pulled away and she lightly sniffed the contents. “Oh wow, paint?” smelled like it to him, definitely not something you drink.

“Very close,” Marehis explained, “it is nail polish, like paint but for your finger nails. Toes as well if you’ve a mind to.”

“Oh really? Thanks, that sounds cool!”

“It is growing increasingly popular,” Madam de Fer said with satisfaction, holding out an ungloved hand for the kid’s inspection of the white tips of her nails, “I myself get frequent manicures, Orlesian style—a more natural look, but colors are fashionable among people your age.”

“Ohh, they’re very pretty,” Ellie offered sincerely, smiling to the Enchanter.

“Thank you my dear.”

Her gift bag still had shape to it like there was more inside, and Ellie pulled out a small,
“Can you guess where these came from?” Marehis asked warmly as Ellie popped open the box.

“Val Royeaux!” she gasped out pulling the ring out to look it over more closely, a long oval shaped ring that would cover the length of a finger from joint to the lowest knuckle, shield that knuckle a bit on Ellie’s hands and that was just fine—she’d leave a pretty nasty mark on someone’s face if she punched them sans gloves while wearing that thing. It was made of lines of silver with hallows between them, like lines cut out from a map—a map of the streets of Val Royeaux.

“Excellent catch,” Marehis congratulated her, taking the ring in her hand while Ellie removed the glove from her unmarked hand and the Elf slid the ring in place on her index finger. “Do you like it, da’len?”

“I really really do, thank you so much, Marehis!”

The Elf woman was beaming, pulling Ellie into a hug, resting her head atop the girl’s hair as she held her like she couldn’t get enough of it, shit. Kid had Tamassran’s left right and center right now.

They regrouped then, Seeker gave a rundown of their schedule, boss-girl had to go into talks with the Rebel mages starting this afternoon, could take a few days if negotiations were rough, everyone was tagging along for the ride, but it’d be Ellie and Seeker taking point.

Or uh, maybe just Seeker. Between piss poor sleep, the rapids of nerves over the work ahead, the excitement and surprise of Marehis’s appearance, being seated around a warm fire, surrounded by her friends, Marehis practically had the girl laying up against her, seated in the Elf’s lap, arms wrapped around Ellie’s shoulders, the kid conked out.

The Elf woman raised a hand to check her for fever and when she found none just smoothed her hair back, absently playing with a lock as she spoke quietly, “Poor girl. Monthlies are horrid things.”

Madam de Fer nodded sounding genuinely sympathetic as she said, “She is exhausted.”

“She said she had trouble falling asleep, took her hours, and then a nightmare or something woke her up before she came to bunk with me for warmth,” Bull said now that she was out, hadn’t wanted to sound like he was snitching on her, make her feel babied by everyone keeping track of her habits, but he kept Seeker in the know on the down low as far as Ellie was concerned, whenever he saw something.

Sera let out a little groan, “Poor Inky. Nightmares isn’t any fun.”

“Fool girl did not wake me,” Seeker sighed worriedly before asking, “You’re certain it was a nightmare? Eleanor took potion last night. If she is Fade Dreaming regardless I will have to consult Adan.”

Bull shrugged. He hadn’t heard Boss wake up scared, or anything but then again he hadn’t woken up until she joined him. “Pretty sure, but kid was real out of it, talking out of her head, and was out like a light pretty fast, didn’t remember any of it when she woke up.”

“I sensed something disconcerting in the Fade as I slept,” Solas admitted, “a mass amount of magical and demon activity. Perhaps that disturbed her.”
That sounded just great. Fucking magic.

“I will admit I sensed as much as well,” Madam de Fer said, “our fights yesterday required my use of Lyrium. I did not see Eleanor partake of any, you’re certain she took her sleeping potion?”

Cassandra nodded seeming uncomfortable like something got under her skin, but she didn’t want to kick up a fuss over it. “She realized you may be uncomfortable, traveling with a young mage Fade Dreaming, so Eleanor is determined to take potion for the duration of our trip.”

“Is that wise?” Solas asked, tones sharp, concerned. “I understand the need for restful sleep, she desperately needed as such when it was first prescribed but Ellie has been able to Fade Dream without disturbance more often as of late,” he looked to Madam de Fer, “Fade dreaming does not equate possession, I myself use them for mindful thought, processing information, learning new pertinent things. Ellie avoids them when they might call an unpleasant experience, rob her of adequate rest entirely, but while sleep is meant to rest the body, it is dreams, even if we cannot recall having dreamt, that allow our minds to process our day’s events, retain and store information. Ellie is not capable of doing as such naturally—she must either Fade Dream or render herself unconscious with potion to find physical rest but that does little for her mind as it keeps her from dreaming full stop. With potion if she falls asleep despairing of something, she wakes up equally distressed whereas…well a few days ago her magic brought her distress to me. Eleanor was very upset, anguished over something—the prospect of leaving Haven and not getting to see Marehis until our return with our new allies I suspect—but she woke up far more at ease for having time to herself in the Fade to process and cope.”

“I’m hardly going to debate you on the finer points of Fade Dreaming, our opposing views are plain enough,” Madam de Fer insisted, “If the girl has had no issue with it in the past I would not dissuade her from it—it is her prerogative. I did not make any such demands—it is the Seeker and Sera who share a tent with her,” bit of a mischievous smirk on her lips as she drily jested, “if she rises and murders you in your sleep, that is no problem of mine.”

A joke, bad one, but Sera didn’t take it that way,

“You shut your mouth you bitchy priss! Inky’d never do that! You tell her—”

“Sera,” Solas reprimanded softly, shooting a meaningful look to the Boss girl snoozing on Marehis’s shoulder.

“I got her, should let her rest while she can,” Bull rumbled out and when Marehis nodded he scooped the girl up in an arm, grabbed the bedroll off the top of her pack and carried her into one of the cleared Inquisition tents got her settled—as it was he was pretty sure Sera could have screamed down the house and Ellie’d still be out, she didn’t stir in the slightest.

Still, probably for the best given, the second he emerged from the tent, had the flap sealed,

“You tell her she can sleep however she wants to!”

“Uh Ser’, you want Tumbles Fade Dreaming?” Tethras asked, uncertain if the Elf understood that’s what would be happening.

“I got ruddy ears dwarf, I heard Solas! And he’s the brainy one if he says it’s good for her to dream in the Fade…s’long as it isn’t scaring her none, I don’t care. I trust Inky not to let a demon in, she’d never do that!” Sera round on Madam de Fer, “So you’re gonna tell her she don’t got to take sleep potion unless she wants to, or I’ll pop you right in the melons!”
“I don’t see why I should, I did not demand she take potion in the first place,” Madam de Fer refused calmly, looking at Sera like she thought the Elf was just about the lowest form of intelligent life on the planet.

“So?! Gah! You’re all so stupid!” Sera shouted, “Inky doesn’t need us to tell her to do things—she needs us to tell her not to do things! Like being too thanky or worrying too much—or doing something that makes you more comfy cozy even if it’s bad for her!”

Madam de Fer scoffed. “You’re one to talk, you are the only one here who denies any magical assistance whatsoever, including Barrier of all things—even the Qunari allows the girl to cast upon him.”

Yeah, the Qunari allows a lot of shit. At least Boss’s magic doesn’t feel like cold, dry-ass distain.

“That don’t hurt her none,” Sera defended, reasoning, “it probably helps ‘cause she don’t got to cast so much!”

“Au contraire, mon ennui,” well fuck him, Krem’s the one who knows Ciriane for shit…though the guy called him ‘mon ennui’ more than once so he was pretty sure it translated close to ‘pain in the ass’, “it is rather an inconvenience, even a danger given the circumstances.”

“What’d’re you on about? It’s not…it’s not dangerous!” Sera snapped.

“Do enlighten me then Sera,” Madam de Fer posed, “how is it you manage to come away from our scrapes so thoroughly under-scathed? I myself have had to treat injury and I’m hardly in the thick of things. You don’t necessarily run headlong into battle, but it is still so very remarkable how you, with your paltry attempt at clothing yourself—while I’m certain that plaid monstrosity is defense enough against the attention of well-bred lovers, it is hardly proper armor. And yet time after time, you walk away, no armor, no barriers, and nothing more serious than a cut or a scratch on you. Just how does that happen, do you think?”

Veshedan. Fuck him for real, seriously? Boss’s business, it wasn’t anything he wouldn’t do for his guys but he was the Qunari, the Iron Bull, he could do that no problem, she isn’t…Aah! This is another place where Boss and kid conflict all to shit.

Marehis looked pensive, hands on her knees as she leaned forward in her seat. “What are you insinuating, Vivienne?”

“Solas, you make active your connection to Eleanor in battle, do you not?” Vivienne asked before addressing the group as a whole, “We’ve all seen her more than capable with Barrier, hers in particular are strong despite her tawdry upbringing, as are Master Solas’s and my own. That is three, thick layers of powerful magic warding us all against injury and yet, whose barriers seem to wear down first?”

“It would have to be a tossup among our warrior fri…friends,” Solas faltered as he lost himself to thought and realization struck home. “Ellie’s can be a close second.”

“Very close, in my observations. Sometimes first if our enemies catch sight of not only the Herald of Andraste but an unarmored archer in the wings, an easy target that could cause the most trouble, best to dispose of quickly to rid our warriors of a great deal of their cover fire.”

“Shit,” Varric breathed, rising from his seat to pace along the tents hand wrenching at the back of his neck.
“Why would Inky’s barrier whatevers fail fast if people are hitting at m—” Sera went very quiet like the air had been punched from her lungs then, “No. No no no no no no no! You take that back, you’re lying!”

“You and Ellie have always stuck close together during fights,” Rainier said, rubbing at his forehead as if he could squeeze a rising headache away.

“Yeah so I can protect her, not the other friggin’ way around! She- she- Damn it!” Sera screeched, burring her eyes against her balled up hands.

“When you can’t get to high ground, she takes some extra hits to her barriers, it just wears them down faster Sera its not the end of the world, she’s got armor on top of that,” under it, still, “I haven’t seen her seriously hurt over it,” Bull said. He’d have realized it himself if that were the case. It was hard to keep an eye on the kid mid-fight, it wasn’t like they could watch her non-stop, still. Dinged him like hell he hadn’t noticed, he’d seen the habit the kid had of pushing Sera behind her the handful of times they’d been in his sight when fights broke out, that should have tipped him off. Madam de Fer…she obviously kept a close watch on the Herald and it sort of sunk in that despite her, uh, extremely frosty disposition, the ideals she had for mages that a kid like Ellie couldn’t live up to, she was becoming attached in her own right, and…huh. Shit she did care about Marehis, had bonded with the woman in their time together, knew how much the Elf cared for the girl and had taken it upon herself to do what Seeker said Marehis did whenever she traveled with the Herald’s party. Madam de Fer watched that girl like a damn hawk, eyes on Ellie and less on their enemies when they were in battle.

“Shut up!” Sera hollered rising from her seat and it looked like she wanted to take off running, the way she did to burn off energy when they were on the Coast, pent up frustration or angst but she wanted this fixed, right now because, “I-inky was bruised all over all the time when we was on the Coast, coming back and- and- shite last night her shoulder was all purply before she took potion! I thought she was just falling down a lot or somethin’, piss!”

“She’s doing for you what she’d do for anyone else on her team,” Bull reasoned out for her, his hand on her arm got a nasty look but she didn’t shake it off and he made sure she could have if she wanted to. “You’re her people, her responsibility. You’re afraid of magic so she works around it, doesn’t cast spells to land near you, since you don’t let barrier on your person she basically lends you hers—her getting bruised is better than you getting killed. I mean shit you don’t even uh…Ser’, Boss made sure I had a contract with the Inquisition, you get paid right? There some reason you don’t have legit armor?”

She groaned. “Never needed no ruddy armor before! I just shoot at things, things don’t usually get to shoot back! And I’m all,” Sera groused, gesturing to her gangly limbs. “One-size-fit-all don’t work for me, can’t just slap Elfy armor* on me! Ugh! I got money I can get armored whatevers made or somethin’ and I’ll tell Inky she better stay out of the frickin’ way!”

“Sera…” Cassandra spoke up looking to the Elf girl, reserved like she didn’t want to get caught caring but, “if it would please you, I could assist you in getting properly outfitted for the field. Too, I understand your reticence with magic, but I have training that offers me insight on the inner workings of the stuff, how to tell offensive spells from defensive spells and the like. Perhaps, if you’d care to, I would be glad to teach you to do as such for yourself. I would not pressure you to accept casting upon your person before you were ready but in time, would that make you more comfortable receiving magical assistance in future?”

“I- you- ugh!” Sera stomped her foot, hands slapping to either side of her head squeezing her scalp in frustration, “Well I have to do something! Frick, she’s only tiny! I have to “Kid does it for everyone Ser’, don’t beat yourself up,” probably should have chosen his words more wisely because Sera was looking at him, expression wrecked like she was about to have a colossal breakdown thinking the kid was letting herself get beat up on behalf of all of her team members which was definitely not the case, she was one person, they’d have noticed the kid trying to bodily shield every last one of them...somehow it might actually be funny to watch her try, “You ever see Seeker start our campfires? If Boss doesn’t get them started herself she always makes sure one of us handles it, never tasks it to Cassandra. Solas never meditates alone if she has a say in it, and I’ve never seen her use the Lyrium in her stores, so who do you think she’s carrying that around for? Tethras is the most hydrated he’s probably been in years, kid delegates or does things herself that give him time to write when we’re on the road, and somehow he never seems to run out of ink—caught boss switching out inkwells on you more than once when you start to run low, cuts a sharp edge on your quills if she sees they’re getting worn. Thom’s got the healthiest diet I’ve ever seen an old bastard eat—don’t look at me like I’m crazy, you had egg whites this morning who the fuck else here eats that crap?—she even makes sure I keep your flask full of wine instead of mead or beer, better for you she says.” Chargers all have a little something to drink besides water on them, helps keep them loose, mild pain reliever, and there’s a hole in the damn sky so everyone deserves a fun flask. “And yeah, she takes sleeping potion when she doesn’t need it, so Madam de Fer can sleep soundly knowing she’s not near a young mage mucking around in the Fade at night,” he looked to the Enchanter saying, “and you haven’t broken a single fingernail have you, caring for your horse? You realize you gotta clean out their shoes every day spent riding, right? Boss got you covered this entire trip.”

Madam de Fer raised a brow at that not liking at all the implication she couldn’t sort for herself. “And what does she do for you?” she returned.

“Always mindful of my handicap.” Eye, and bad ankle both*. Even when sitting around eating, playing, kid had her knee to his thigh, hands where he could see them in the innermost peripheral of his good eye when she sat in his blind-spot. And most people assume the brace on his leg is just extra armoring covering a low appendage on his blind side, so he wasn’t about to say otherwise. Kid saw, understood it could be a matter of privacy, respected that while quietly making sure he had access to heating balms, things for stiff joints, and there were times on the Coast the girl was like a damn foot servant working around the campsite fetching anything he had a mind to get up and get for himself, so he could take a load off. In that vein, “Makes sure I’m not hurt just as often as she does with the rest of you—might not seem like a major deal but I’m big, a Qunari, yeah I’m tough shit but people lean on the side of assuming I can’t get hurt or feel pain, Boss has never held that bias and I sure as hell appreciate it. Checks in to make sure I got enough to report to my own bosses, checks in to make sure my guys got everything they need. Treats my people like they’re her people,” he said. “We’re a team. Her team. We take care of her, take care of each other, and she takes care of us.”

“Ugghh,” Sera said slowly thinking it over. “Still. She shouldn’t be getting hurt!” She looked to the Seeker, “You’d really teach me, ‘sandra? How to not be scared of mage shite*?”

“I would,” Cassandra vowed in earnest. “It will take time of course but I’m certain you could be put at ease.”

“Don’t bite my head off,” Tethras spoke up, holding his hands up defensively as he halted his pacing, “but uh, that won’t stop the kid in the meantime. Buttercup, you ever let Tumbles explain barrier to you? You trust her right?”

“But you’ve never let her explain how it works or what it feels like?” Sera shook her head and Varric continued, “Look, I get being scared of Chuckles or Iron Lady over here—”

That piqued Vivienne’s interest, “Excuse me?”

“Everyone gets a nickname, take it up with my muse if you’ve got a problem with it.”

“…I rather like it actually,” she graciously allowed.

“Glad to hear it. Any-way,” Tethras stressed, moving back to his point, “I get being uncomfortable with their magic, but you might test the waters with letting the kid cast on you, see if you really don’t like it. It doesn’t hurt, and I mean it uh doesn’t feel bad either.”

That seemed to pique Sera’s interest, “Whatc’ you mean?”

Word guy didn’t seem to have words for it so Bull offered, “You know how you feel when you see boss get excited about something, gets all bubbly, big smile, sometimes she does that little dance? Its like that on your outsides.”

Sera looked a bit wide-eyed at that, “Oh shite really?”

“Just, test it out,” Varric suggested, “See how it feels and if it doesn’t bother you, tell her you’ll let her cast on you—just leave it at that. It’ll be enough to imply to her you’re accepting barrier from your team mates even though no one else will cast on you until you’re ready. You’ll actually get the benefit of Ellie’s barrier, it’ll be enough to offer you some level of protection all while convincing the kid to stop taking hits for you.”

“Oh pish, that’s bloody genius that is,” Sera enthused. “I…yeah I never did let Inky explain her magic shite it’s all noise to me, but I’ll try—hers! I definitely didn’t like baldy’s fucking creepy crawly bullshit, I didn’t know Ellie’s’d be any different! And Casandra will help me get armor and more…okay with the weirdo stuff.” She growled, sounding frustrated with herself, “Magic’s just freaky!”

“Sera, I do sincerely apologize,” Solas spoke up, chagrined. “It was unworthy of me to cast on you to your discomfort. I regret I left you with such a horrible impression of what it would be like to accept our assistance. If there is anything I could do to put you at ease do inform me.”

Sera just blew raspberry at that, arms crossed over her chest. Marehis rose and offered to take the younger Elf aside and get her measurements, leading her off—standing upright in one of their tents wasn’t really doable for someone Sera’s height, fuck if Bull didn’t feel that, so Marehis took her down the incline to a place that overlooked the crossroads but offered enough privacy from foliage. Wasn’t like Sera was hyper concerned with who saw what but no one really needed to see her butt-ass naked getting every last bit of her business measured.

Everyone was quiet for a moment staring into the fire before Solas spoke,

“Seeker, I would not wish to pry but if you’ve erm, a aversion to fire, I would offer to be mindful, when casting in battle.”

“I as well, certainly,” Madam de Fer said.

“I appreciate the offer, but it is of little note. I did not even realize Eleanor was doing as such,” Cassandra said, “I shared with her an unpleasant experience from my past that involved a great deal of fire. She must have thought it might put me more at ease to not have to make as much myself.”
“Where the hell does Tumbles get my ink?” Varric asked, and then he groaned, running a hand over his face, “Shit she’s not buying it, or something is she?”

“The Inquisition provides your writing supplies, Eleanor merely retrieves wells from Quartermaster Threnn when she packs for the field,” Cassandra said.

“Huh. Thought it was weird I wasn’t running out,” then, “Wait a second, I tried getting ink and crap provided in my contract with the Inquisition and you said no!”

“I am aware,” Cassandra drawled. “However I may have had a change of heart upon discovering your intent to chronicle the events of the Inquisition. Technically that is a service to us, at the very least it may benefit us in future, it is only reasonable we would provide the means for you to do so. I sent a missive to you on the matter.”

“…we got so much shit in the beginning between Tavern menus and briefs on the Breach assault, security protocols, I uh, didn’t look at half of it.”

Cassandra scoffed, rolling her eyes, tones bone-dry, “And surely you jumped at the opportunity to read anything I would care to send you.”

“Come on Seeker, don’t play it like that. We hated each other then.”

“We do hate each other.”

“You only mildly dislike me now and you know it.”

“You’re incorrigible.”

“And you only mildly dislike that about me.”

Elves returned, Marehis handing off the list of measurements to Cassandra and the Seeker nodded, moving to the requisitions table to start writing up specs and instructions to be sent off for an estimate, or…huh. She put it all in an envelope and the woman dug around in the leather pouch at her hip, dropping a good bit of coin in to foot the bill herself before sealing it up and sending it off on a messenger bird. She might not care to ever admit as much, but Sera was a good friend for the kid, and Seeker appreciated that more than she’d say.

Sera didn’t notice any of that, though her attention did immediately turn to the tent Boss girl was snoozing in, Bull heard it too, “Eleanor is beginning to stir,” Solas confirmed for the Human and Dwarf ears around their campfire. “Should we get lunch underway?” Marehis nodded in agreement, rising to her feet to get to work.

“Certainly,” Cassandra agreed, though she stopped and then spoke very quietly to Marehis, not sure when they’d get another opportunity to speak without Boss-girl directly underfoot, “I do not know if Leliana informed you—First Day we shall throw a surprise party for Eleanor,” at the Elf’s confused look at how they’d pull off the ‘surprise’ bit Cassandra added, “she has never celebrated the day before, she doesn’t know people do as such.”

Marehis’s mouth dropped open, working to find words for that, hands stilled midair almost like she was physically grasping for a response when Boss girl came trudging from the tent, rubbing sleep from her eyes and stretching.

“What’s uh, um. Is it today still? Didn’t mean to fall asleep,” she yawned, and then she looked at Marehis. “What’s wrong?”

The woman twirled on the balls of her feet to face the kid. “I just…missed you so very much and I want to kiss your precious face!” before she descended on the girl, grasping her chin in hand and pressing a kiss to her cheek, making Ellie smile, face scrunching up as the woman plied another and another while she wrapped her ward up in a hug, “mwah! Are you hungry, sweet girl? We’re just getting ready to make lunch.”

Ellie nodded. “Lunch sounds great, can I help?”

“Nope,” Sera interrupted, “Inky! You come with me a minute right? I wanna try something if you aren’t too sleepy.”

“What’s up?”

Kid was suspicious as hell when Sera asked her to try out barrier, took both of her hands and made her look her in the eye as she asked if she’d been pressured into it, but Sera was pretty damn sincere that she wanted to give it a shot. Ellie sat her down in the grass at the edge of the field near their camp and asked her to hold out her hand, tested it on a small scale first, just called the spell into her own hand and held it hovering just over Sera’s, worked up to holding her hand like that, then letting it spread along her arm, explaining the spell would slip over her clothing, it would only touch exposed skin, an entirely exterior thing. By the time Rainier, Marheis, and Solas had lunch whipped up for everyone, and Madam de Fer was putting their tea kettle on to brew something, Sera was giggling up a storm after letting Ellie cast on her properly with her staff, the glow of barrier washing over the Elf head to toe.

“That’s so friggin weird! Not a bad weird just, weird!” the Elf shook her head like she needed to clear it. “Alright Inky, I don’t got no problem if you wanna add me to your little spell pish. Just that one mind, you singe me or something I’ll…I’ll be right pissed!”

“No singeing, promise!” Ellie offered up her pinky which Sera happily wrapped her own around before taking the girl’s hand and leading her back to sit around the fire.

Marehis handed her a plate laden with two sandwiches cut into halves, and a pile of apple slices, and the Elf woman almost forgot to eat her own meal she just sat there watching the kid dig right on in. Sort of struck him then how rough her time away must have been, she’d almost been captured by enemy forces, forced to go on the run, not knowing if she’d live to see her ward again, no clue if Ellie’d gotten caught up in it somehow, if she was safe, hell if the Inquisition was able to find an appropriate replacement to protect her. He’d shoot Krem a message, tell him to send on copies of the reports he had to make for Red of his time watching out for the Herald for Marehis’s inspection, might help her catch up and reinforce the fact that her faith in her allies was rewarded.

Once Ellie was finished up with her meal, Madam de Fer handed her mug full of hot tea and...honey, lemon too it smelled like.

“This should soothe your throat my dear, I always prepare my tea like this before a day of speaking events, lectures and the like.”

Ellie carefully sipped at the drink, smiling once she swallowed. “This is so good, thanks! My throat doesn’t feel so scratchy anymore. Oh!” she looked like she’d been caught doing something she shouldn’t as she turned her attention to the Seeker whose brow had shot up, was staring at the girl like she had half a mind to yell, or maybe just lecture her, but Ellie was quick to say, “I’m not getting sick, I promised I’d tell you if I was feeling badly, I’ve kept my word, honest. It’s just in general dry-air sore, not ‘coming down with the dread-plague’ sore,” she assured... humorously. Seeker nodded—still looked to Solas for silent confirmation but took the kid at her word well enough.

“Message for you, ser,” an Inquisition scout spoke quietly to Bull as they handed him a letter that’d just flown in. Report from Krem Bull cracked open to look over while he ate—Seeker got something in the mail too, and she looked…dare he think shy? Bit red around the cheeks, pleased little smirk on her face as she cleanly slipped a finger along the underside of the parchment to break the wax seal. Another letter from the Commander, he presumed. Kid was gonna flip if she found out her endeavors in Matchmaking were having successes big and small.

“Oh yes the weather in these parts is simply horridous,” Madam de Fer agreed with the kid, “Eleanor, would you care to join me this evening when we’ve settled for the day? I believe a bit of pampering is in order. We could chat, you could even feel free to…what is that precious little word I keep hearing, ‘bunk’? You could feel free to ‘bunk’ with me for the evening.”

Ellie lit up at the offer, “Oh wow, like a sleepover?”

The Madam looked like she sincerely believed that phrasing to be genuinely precious. “If you wish to term it as such, yes, Eleanor, we’ll have a sleepover,” the woman sounded damn delighted at the prospect, “Marehis is more than welcome to join us, if she wishes. Seeker Pentaghast and miss Sera as well.”

“I would be delighted,” Marehis insisted.

Okay. Woman was smooth. If both Sera and Vivienne had sudden changes of heart on things, Ellie’d know something was up, that they’d been talking about her amongst themselves. Too, there wasn’t any reason for Madam de Fer to know the kid was taking potion for her peace of mind unless someone snitched. Inviting her to spend the night would offer an organic, natural way of taking note that Ellie was doing so, telling her she didn’t have to. On top of that—Madam’s offer gave Marehis excuse to take a beat, the opportunity to step out while the Mage kept Ellie occupied with gossip and manicures, and let the Elves have a moment alone to talk, get reacquainted.

Maybe he should have taken boss up on her offer of ear plugs.

“Hold up now, why do the girls get to have all the fun?” Varric asked.

“Damn straight,” Bull agreed, “guys, sack up. We’re drinking tonight—Charger style, bonfire, booze, boy-talk—no girls allowed,” little wink to the kid, when she caught the reference, a return of her earlier insistence for him to ‘mind his own beeswax’.

“Sounds invigorating,” Solas conceded with a nod of acceptance.

“I’m in,” Tethras shrugged. “What about you, Sarge?”

“Might have to move some things around on the old social calendar, but I’m sure I can manage,” Rainier drawled with a grin.

Boss girl sort of ran in place—her butt was still in her seat, but her feet lightly stamped the ground a few times before she jumped up and went around the fire to squeeze the Dwarf in a hug, kiss him on the temple, repeating the gesture with a bewildered Rainier, the man dropped his own sandwich back onto his plate and he hesitantly patted the arm around his neck.

“Thanks, you know, everyone, for working so hard on getting along,” she addressed the group as she pulled away from the Sergeant, “I’m kind of dying from happiness overload, you’re all just the best!” looked like a slight kick to the balls for most of the people gathered around the campsite to have the actual teenager commending the adults in the situation for behaving well but making the kid happy of all things perked them, especially Varric, right on up. She sighed contentedly, biting her lip before saying, “Um, I’m all done eating so, I’m gonna go freshen up before we head out—like please don’t rush, take your time eating and stuff, but I’d like to go ahead and get a move on once everyone’s ready.”

“Certainly Eleanor, but your meeting is not until later in the afternoon,” Cassandra reminded her.

“I was thinking maybe we could walk to Redcliff?” Ellie proposed hesitantly, “It isn’t like super far and I’d like to give our poor horses a break, and its kind of easier to seem approachable when you’re not zipping through the Crossroads on horseback—I’d like to check in on the refugees if that’s okay?”

Madam de Fer sat up, leveling the girl a regal smile as she said, “I’ve no qualms stretching my legs a bit.”

“Sounds good to me Boss,” Bull assured her, she seemed happy about that, relieved like she was worried he was having a rough leg day.

“I believe we’re all in agreement,” Marehis said, rising, “would you like help getting ready, Ellie?”

Her nose crinkled a bit and she held out her arm, index finger raised as she said, “I just need like one private minute and then yeah I’d really appreciate your help!”

“Certainly um, do you need erm…anything for your private minute?” Marehis asked. Bandaging, Bull figured she meant. Kid did too, “Nope! Thanks though. Between Cremisius and Mister Stitches and Healer Adan adding more and more and more to my pack before I left, I’ve got enough bandaging to suture an entire army. Oh! Should I send left over bandaging somewhere when I’m done? I feel like I’ll never be done, but I’m still holding out hope.” And then that seemed to inspire the thought, “Oh gosh! Do you think people around the Crossroads and Redcliff have access to bandaging for things like monthlies?”

“I’m not certain,” Cassandra said as she considered the matter, “but I can address the issue with Corporal Vale if you’d like, get them resources if there currently are none.”

Kid blew her a kiss in thanks before snatching up her pack and disappearing into a tent. Everyone finished up their meals, cleaned up and by the time Marehis was done with her, Imekari’s armor was all spiffed up, scarf tucked close around her neck, looped several times so none of it was left hanging, hair braided, hat on, hands gloved, cloak secure. Kid was just about as bundled as she could get, and she looked ecstatic over it.

Well, she was about to get even more pumped ‘cause. “Boss. Message for you,” he said, beckoning her closer with a crooked finger, so he could deliver it properly. Ellie stepped right up to him and he dropped to his knees to be more level with her before, as per his instructions, he wrapped her up in hug before pulling back and informing her, “You got this.”

She smiled shyly at that, blushing as she said, “Tell Cremisius I say, ‘thank you’. Oh! And he doesn’t have to be on hug duty for me anymore—Marehis showed up!” she looked to the Elf at her side, “Cremisius promised to hug you for me whenever you got to Haven while I was gone!”
“I’ll pass along your thanks…guy knows Marehis is here though,” at the woman in question’s and Ellie’s inquisitive looks he added, “he got worried you might of run into trouble when you didn’t show up a day or so after we left Haven, so he checked in with Red, offered to take the Chargers out to go look for you, back you up if you needed help. She let him know what was up,” shook the report he’d just received, “so he asked me to keep an eye out, let him know if you didn’t show.”

“I like that boy, I like that boy very much,” Marehis shared quietly with Ellie as she took her arm, “you are to tell me absolutely every single thing I missed while we were apart young lady, I want all the details tonight.”

Meanwhile Boss-Girl looked beyond pleased Krem’d been so concerned of her minder and almost…frustrated, she buried her face in her hands, letting out a long slow breath, and on the very tail end of it, whispered so quietly to herself Bull just barely caught it, “I want to kiss his entire face.” Marehis chortled in delighted sounding surprise.

Way. To go. Krem!

Elgar’nan her heart was so full. Never since their meeting had they been separated for such an indeterminable amount of time, before orders came from Leliana…which she felt might have been the influence of Seeker Pentaghast, to have Marehis report to the Hinterlands and join the Herald in her negotiations, she thought she would not see the girl again until they were both returned to Haven. There had been times of rest in her travels she lost to the ache in her chest, the fear and anger and bitter sadness. She had missed Ellie with such a ferocity, feared the girl would be harmed in her absence, worried about how the Spymaster would chose to handle the situation—a part of her had been horrified that perhaps Leliana would be so caught up in handling the threat she would not consider the girl’s tender feelings, leave Ellie thinking Marehis had simply abandoned her as opposed to making believable excuses for her absence or allowing her to know about the security issue. How it played out…she would be forever grateful. Cassandra and Leliana had stepped in admirably, covering for Marehis, assisting in the interrogation that garnered her freedom to return to her post, explaining what had happened to Ellie once the danger was passed.

There were times she was certain she may never see her ward again. To be able to walk alongside her, hug, hold, braid her hair, heavens it was even longer now! It was pure relief. Oh and her first monthly, it felt strange to almost mourn missing that milestone to some degree at least, to not have been there to explain and comfort the girl, it sounded like it’d given her quite the fright. She wondered what else she had missed—Lieutenant Aclassi had been given charge of guarding Ellie in Marehis’s absence, she wondered just how close the two had gotten, oh had she missed some milestone there as well? She would be excited for the girl but still, she did not like having missed so much. She supposed to some degree that was par for the course, loving the girl as she did, there was some element of lost time, something in her that wished with everything she had somehow met the girl sooner, born her herself—she could not love the girl more if she had—but who had gotten to bear witness to her first words? First steps? The first time she smiled or laughed? Anyone that would have gotten the chance to see such a thing had sent her away, cast her aside, it felt like such a waste, a maddening, infuriating waste.
Oh but there was something that had not been lost. A first birthday, the celebration of one at least. That excited Marehis beyond words. Her splurge in Val Royeaux on the way to the Oasis had just been the influence of the city itself mixed with the company of Madam de Fer—the woman had wanted to shop for Ellie’s birthday and while Marehis had already successfully completed her birthday acquisitions shortly after that night when all of Ellie’s party gathered in her bed their first time in Val Royeaux together and she informed them the day on which she marked her birth. The ring, nail polish had been a mere urge to spoil the girl after a fashion but gifting the things had given her a taste for what it would be like come First Day.

Walking arm in arm with Ellie through the Crossroads, it was different than when they were in Haven, or even her time working in Orlais. In Haven there was a bubble of sorts around the Herald, she was streamlined to meet with key people at certain times, had a distinct schedule to adhere to, there were a few familiar faces that differed from those in her party or council. In Val Royeaux she’d been entirely closed off—spoken on behalf of the Inquisition at decisive points, and the rest she’d been locked away in the safety of their ally’s home.

Here, the girl had taken a deep breath once they reached the bottom of the sloping hillside leading into the refugee site and seemed to be tempering herself—she’d practically raced her way down the hill eager to get where she was going, but now she walked a steady, careful pace making eye contact with all they passed, waving, calling hello to different people by name. She’d worried passing through on horseback would make her less approachable, now Marehis realized the girl wished to give anyone who cared to, access to the Herald of Andraste. Some people greeted her in passing, others wished to thank her or show her some new progress made in the Crossroads with the help the Inquisition had given them. More than once the girl let go of Marehis’s arm, often enough the Elf decided it was best to let the girl to her own devices and keep watch over her as she worked, and Ellie went to huddle with strangers, her hands on their shoulders, or hands clasped with theirs, and she prayed with them—to the Maker, the All-Father, any deity they cared to ask blessings from or for aid.

“Ma falon! Ellie!” an elderly Elf man called from on high, there was a home on one of the Crossroads stone platforms, he stood in the doorway waving to the girl as he turned into the home to say, “Vehnan, the Herald of Andraste has returned—she fought her way through the south, sealed the rifts, and got your medicine for you,” he summarized as an Elf woman was just emerging from their home to join him as Ellie scrambled, pulling herself up onto the platform to speak with them.

“Oh gosh, I had loads of help doing that, it’s all thanks to the Inquisition. I’m just so glad we could help! I’m very pleased to meet you!” Ellie greeted the Elf woman, taking her hands and asking after her wellbeing. Apparently the woman had asthma as well, had been suffering illness from it—her son made remedy, the recipe for which had assisted Ellie on the Coast. Elgar’nan she’d been sick herself with worry when word came from Solas. It had taken everything to remain in the Oasis—the fact that the work they were doing in that land was to secure the place for Ellie’s eventual arrival, and her letters full of assurances and updates from Solas and Cassandra alike there was the only things that kept her to task.

Solas. Ellie was still addressing the Elven couple—chatting with them while Marehis watched over her from below, standing near the statue in the center of the Crossroads, of Andraste she was decently certain—when Solas carefully approached, coming to stand alongside her.

Oh. She had missed him as well, dearly. She’d worried he would fret over her sudden cut off in communication. It had been conflicting, the need to remain hidden and the ache of longing that somehow he might endeavor to find her. It was ridiculous, but she’d even dreamt of such a thing one night when she stowed away aboard the ship that unwittingly gave her passage to return to this side of the Waking Sea. Even as it was a dream, it felt almost like she’d waken in the night and Solas was there, sitting across from her in the dark, cramped place between heavy crates of cargo she’d slipped between to stay out of sight, he looked startled and then relieved, breathed the single word, “Antishan, ma Vehnan,” and then he’d vanished. It felt strange, almost like it’d been real. Of course she also dreamt once that Ellie turned blue from head to toe and Varric was chasing her down with claims she was supposed to have turned orange, and all Marehis could do was sing the alphabet backwards which for some reason seemed like it should be helpful to the situation somehow—that had certainly felt real while she dreamt it despite what sense it made. Dreams were bizarre, strange things.

“I’m glad you’re well,” Solas said quietly.

“I am. Thank you,” Marehis replied, “for watching over her while I could not.”

He looked a bit chagrined at that. “I’m afraid most credit goes to our friends. I’ll admit I became rather distracted—had I been Eleanor’s sole source of protection and guidance I would not have allowed myself to become as such, I assure you,” he promised, knew it was important she be certain she could truly trust him to watch over her ward, “but as it was, she had help of all sorts and I found your absence…troublesome.”

Understandable. Though it did bring a mischievous smile to her lips, “Then I’m glad we have such capable friends and allies. The Iron Bull for instance.” Flatterer, he was. How had he discovered their relationship, had Cassandra informed him? He was Ben-Hessrath, her reports said, so perhaps that had been brought to bear. And Leliana informed her the tail she’d discovered and lost through some measure of…well, arson had been involved. She might have destroyed a bridge in the Free Marches evading what was actually a Viddethari agent of the Ben-Hessrath, a man who owed Bull a favor, had been asked to keep an eye out for Marehis and report back on her wellbeing.

“Seeking to upgrade, lethallan? Would it persuade you otherwise if I told you young Ellie has indeed figured out my heart is bewitched,” he drew dangerously close for keeping their cover, breath in her ear as he elaborated, “Stolen, enraptured.” He resumed his more platonic distance as he assured her, “By who she is uncertain, but she did realize I was saddened by a loss in communication with that someone and thought I had been…” ‘broken up with’. She insisted that any such person is quote, ‘just stupid’, were that the case.” Oh he was having far too much fun.

“Oh, well, I wouldn’t want to be just stupid, now would I?” she quietly returned.

“It is not the most desirable trait. Of course perhaps it is whoever courts you who is the foolish one. I would not advise any to brave the risk of invoking Eleanor’s wrath. She is, after all, rather determined to destroy any man who breaks your heart.”

Her turn for a bit of fun. “Ahh—perhaps I should seek the company of women then, for all men’s sake.”

“I have a feeling Eleanor has no double standard, she would just as easily seek vengeance on any who scorned you regardless of their gender,” Solas chuckled at that. Ending his flirtations he shared, “Ellie has recently admitted to such practice—did you know she has had a girlfriend?”

When had Ellie discussed as much, what all had she missed?! “Truly? She has been open with me about gender not dictating her preferences, but she’s never discussed it at length, however did that come up?”

“The Lieutenant has expressed his interest, and Eleanor saw fit to talk of her past dalliances in all things romantic. Before the Inquisition there was a bakers son, and a ‘sweet’, ‘pretty’ young lady from Hasmal,” Solas listed.

“She does have a love pastry and sweet, pretty people,” Marehis conceded, that certainly sounded like her Ellie. Ohhh and the way some had spoken today, including Ellie herself, she had the idea Mister Aclassi had staked some claim to the girl, was it silly she wished to skip over their important meeting with their potential mage allies, who they were approaching to seal the Breach, so she could interrogate Ellie about things like boys and girls and the things she’d missed while she was away?

“Ma seranas! Don’t hesitate to approach members of the Inquisition if you need anything, alright? Take care!” Ellie called as…Elgar’nan the girl dropped down off the high platform—there were stairs! She could have used them, was she tempting fate? No, she was likely just excited to return from her conversation…or perhaps it was she was determined to move forward swiftly with some mission, she seemed to be thinking over something serious as she approached, sighing as she reached Marehis, though it was Solas she looked to. “There still isn’t a proper healer around.”

Was she feeling poorly after all? Did she need a healer? But Solas asked,

“The Inquisition could not find one to deploy for the refugees?” Ahh. For the refugees, that made sense.

Ellie shrugged. “Our own healers are spread thin what with how much the Inquisition is expanding, and as we add the Mages and Templars…Lady Josie’s going to be up to her ears in resumes while we’re gone, trying to fill new positions for healers and servant staff and just about everything you need to spread forces and simultaneously house more in Haven itself.”

“Everything we have needed has come to us eventually, I trust we’ll find someone,” he assured her, patting her on the shoulder.

Ellie nodded. “Um, have either of you seen where Madam de Fer went off to? The Elven couple said that mage is still living nearby— Ellendra*, the one we found the phylactery for? I was thinking maybe Vivienne could talk to her? She’s out here all alone and she mostly just scares the refugees, but Cassandra read up about her, files from her circle, and thinks she could be of use to the Inquisition.”

“My dear girl, did you have need of me?” Madam de Fer’s voice came as the woman herself approached, coming up the path from Corporal Vale’s post, she’d gone with the Seeker and the Iron Bull to touch base with him on their efforts in the Hinterlands, though the warriors were nowhere in sight.

“Only if you’re up for it—you don’t have to, but I’d appreciate you coming with me. I’d like to invite a mage we met to be an agent of the Inquisition, but um, I’m just a kid, you know? Herald of Andraste or not she might not listen to me.”

Madam de Fer linked arms with Eleanor as she said, “Well that certainly won’t do. Eleanor you are the Herald of Andraste, it matters not if someone sees you as a child, you must prove you are otherwise. I’ll escort you certainly,” she said as Ellie led her away, “but perhaps regard her as a fellow mage, instill some comradery and command…” her voice was lost as she and Ellie strayed further away, disappearing from sight to speak with—

“This Ellendra is near, yes?” Marehis asked, she almost made to follow after, she trusted Madam de Fer but it was worrisome to have Ellie out of sight.

“Huh. I expected Madam de Fer to jump at the opportunity to speak on Ellie’s behalf…”
Solas shook himself from thought, realizing he hadn’t answered the question and said, “Yes, Marehis, she is near, and has not presented herself as a threat. Eleanor rescued her phylactery from falling into enemy Templar hands, returned it to her for safe keeping, with the unfortunate confirmation that her lover had apparently passed on, but it brought the woman closure and she is grateful for it.”

Ellie returned seeming very proud of herself, Madam de Fer congratulating her on her apparent success—she’d spoken to the mage herself, convincing her that magic was indeed a positive force, and shouldn’t she work to use her own magic for good on behalf of the Inquisition?

“It was indeed,” Madam de Fer said, arm around Ellie’s shoulders, standing closely with the younger mage as she intoned, “you did very well, Eleanor. That was excellent practice for what is to come. You will speak with Grand Enchanter Fiona, do not belittle yourself—you are the Herald of Andraste, you are the voice of the Inquisition, deigning to offer alliance where you have every option not to.”

“But we do need the mages, Vivienne,” Ellie said.

“Darling a great portion of negotiation is playing hard to get. Make them grateful you are offering in the first place—you claim the upper hand, and it will be given to you whether it was yours to begin with or not.”

“Huh,” Ellie thought it over. “That makes sense, gosh you’re so smart.”

The compliment made the Enchanter smile ever so, “As are you my dear,” Vivienne assured her warmly.

Ellie shrugged and said, “I’m all done here I think, except I do want to say hi and check in with Corporal Vale—I’ll go see if everyone’s ready, you guys are, yeah?”

Oh it was nice to be arm in arm again, taking a lap around the Crossroads gathering their party, Ellie chatting away, giving Marehis a tour of sorts then, talking about the work they’d done, interruption as she took a moment to speak amicably with Corporal Vale as the man assured her he had everything well in hand, and he promised to see Ellendra was given an escort, so she could safely report to Haven as their newest agent recruit. It was something to watch her at work and hearing her excitement at all they had been able to do in the Hinterlands, pride swelled almost painfully in Marehis’s chest as they regrouped and set way for Redcliffe.

“Here’s where we sealed one of the Rifts,” Ellie said as they approached the large stone fortification that could, if gates were dropped, bar the path to the village. “Oh! Can we hold up just a minute?”

“Certainly,” Cassandra said.

“Something up, boss?” the Iron Bull asked.

“Magic found something,” there was something like excitement and mischief in Ellie’s grin as she bounced on the balls of her feet and asked, “Would you like to help me with a little short cut?”

Ellie led them through the gate—on the opposite side there was a stone shed attached to the structure, and rich laughter rumbled in the Qunari’s chest as he put his back against the wall and dropped to one knee, lacing his fingers together palms up to form a foothold for the girl as she released Marehis and before she could protest, Ellie put her hands on the man’s shoulders, stepped into his hands before he launched her up onto the roof of the shed.

“She!” in warning from Cassandra and Marehis’s mildly panicked, “Dal’en do be careful!” overlapped as a peal of laughter left the girl who waved to them before climbing the onto the top of the wall, and following the path out of site, Marehis heard the thunk, thunk, thunk, of Ellie climbing a ladder, and the girl hummed to herself as she explored the highest tower of the fortification before,

“Oh! There you are!”

There what is?!

And then Ellie was sliding—Elgar’nan preserve her, the girl gripped the sides of the ladder and slid, toes of her boots palms of her gloves scraping in a rush against the wood—down the ladder landing with a soft, thump and Marehis didn’t breathe again until the girl was climbing over the lip of the wall back onto the roof, something held between her arm and body, a book. She crouched and handed the tome down to the Iron Bull first, and he passed it off to Rainier and then,

“I got you, Imekari,” he invited. He certainly better! Ellie leapt from the roof, into the Qunari’s arms. Goodness he was massive, but…careful with the small Human girl, though he did indulge in whirling around a few times to make her squeal with surprise and excitement before setting her on her feet.

“Thanks!” Ellie giggled breathlessly, smiling as she nodded to Thom as he returned the book she’d gotten, she rushed over to Madam de Fer and held it out, “This is one of your Circle tomes, right?”

“My dear girl, you remembered! You are an absolute treasure,” Madam de Fer crooned, brushing at the book cover and giving it a look over before she sighed contentedly, “this is an excellent find.”

Solas stepped up and offered to tote the book in his pack for safe keeping until they could return to camp, and Ellie giggled out an apology for worrying Marehis with her need to climb. The Elf woman shook her head, wrapping an arm around her ward’s shoulders to keep her even closer as they continued on their way, Ellie pointing out different spots they’d been—apparently they found a smuggling plot afoot between thugs and someone in Redcliffe named ‘Tanner’ they hoped to confront, near a cabin over the hill from where she’d found Vivienne’s book, and there was a cabin along the roadside a demon had been haunting.

“Varric jumped right out of his skin when the demon popped out of the ground!” Ellie informed her.

“I was not jumping out of my skin, I was backflipping while shooting that damn thing right between the eyes—it’s a move! It was cool!”

“It was very ‘cool’ when you landed on your own coattails and falling flat on your face when you tried to stand,” Cassandra drawled.

“While the move did indeed fall flat, the amount of bleeding your nose did was rather impressive,” Solas quipped.

“Tumbles!” the Dwarf complained, “They’re ganging up on me!”

Sera snorted, “Don’ be such a big baby, tattlin’ to Inky!”
Ellie hugged Marehis tighter, laughing as she teasingly threatening, “You lot, I’ll turn this party around, I swear! Then I’ll have to tattle to Lady Josie that you couldn’t behave and made us late!”

“We could stand to dally a bit my lady,” Vivienne said, “there’s never any harm in arriving fashionably late.”

“I still can’t believe it’s polite to show up everywhere late,” Ellie said shaking her head.

“It is not politeness my dear, it is style.”

A sickly crackling sound startled their more sensitive-hearing numbers, the sound of a Rift where…well all of the Rifts had been sealed in the Hinterlands. In that same moment Ellie’s heart pounded and then stopped, air shuddering through her lungs as she choked back a cry, and Marehis felt the girl’s entire body seize up quaking head to toe before she doubled over.

“Ellie?!” Marehis asked, kneeling before her, supporting her so she didn’t fall, trying to get a look at her ward’s face as the girl trembled, heart thumping to catch its beat again.

“He’s…opened?” Cassandra’s voice, “her Mark, is it spreading?”

Ellie’s arms quaked as she reached behind to unholster her staff, Marehis rising with the girl when she slammed its butt into the earth and used it to support her effort to remand standing on trembling limbs, her voice, hoarse and thick, speaking with shock-mixed-alarm, “N-no. I…I think a Rift just opened.”

…just…opened? Marehis could hear someone in the distance shouting to ‘keep an eye on that damn thing’ and the cracks and snaps she’d heard echoing endlessly across the Oasis. Was the Breach expanding again? What just happened? What could she do? Her hands hovered over the Herald’s Marked arm, everything in her screaming to find some way to help, but the girl took off, rushing down the path to Redcliff, staff held out behind her poised for casting in her unmarked hand. This was followed by the sound of swords and shields, staffs and bows being made ready as her party made chase, Marehis drawing her own daggers as she sought to catch up with Ellie.

Oh, she had never been one for praying to the Maker in her days before the Inquisition, it was only her faith in the Herald and the need to ask for divine protection over her ward that she beseeched the Maker most high, and she did so now, a silent plea for His protection.

As soon as Ellie was in reach, taking in the sight of demons descending on the few guardsmen outside the gates of Redcliff, the purple glow of barrier shot down her staff sending the whiplash of fear and anxiety conflicting with the glee-ridden security washing over her party in the same instance her Marked hand was raised before her to cast against the Rift. Solas and Vivienne’s Barriers were spread, and their warriors rushed the Demons as, sensing the Rift being manipulated, they turned their attention on the Herald, and then the more pressing danger of her party members rallying against them. Marehis kept close to Ellie’s side, and Sera, All-Father bless her, made a point of putting herself before Ellie before taking her shots at their enemies.

Oh but with such fierce warriors, the precision of their marksman, and three mages casting against the horde, their group was like a small army, demons were sent swiftly back into the Fade and Ellie, Solas and Cassandra raised their hands to suppress and seal the Rift completely.

A crack of energy swept across them as the Rift sealed shut and Marehis felt almost seasick, like the entire world had rocked and shifted underfoot that…that was not something any had described happening before, Solas had sent rather detailed accounts of their every encounter with Rifts and that...something strange had just happened.

“That was...real fucking weird,” Varric affirmed.

“Ellie,” Rainier rounded to look at the girl, as he sheathed his sword, “are you alright?”

Marehis sheathed her daggers, moving to brace Ellie when the girl swayed like she was still caught up in whatever motion they’d just felt in the ground beneath their feet.

“That...that wasn’t-” she swallowed harshly, pressing the back of her Marked hand to her lips like she might be sick.

“Boss,” the Iron Bull spoke, coming to stand before Ellie, kneeling, bottom resting on the heels of his boots as he got level with the girl, “what do you need?”

“C-Cassandra,” Ellie breathed, and Marehis was almost infuriated with herself at the frustration she felt, the jealousy that Ellie would call on the Seeker for comfort, before the girl said, “white one.”

The Seeker came to Ellie’s side and offered up a vial of potion Ellie downed in one grateful swallow before she left Marehis’s hold to put her hands on the Iron Bull’s shoulders, pressing her forehead against his, trembling, her breathing choppy with panic before she struggled in a few bracing breaths, the Iron Bull carefully placing his hands on her shoulders in return.

“Grass, boots, dirt, my hair, The Iron bull,” she listed quietly. “Your hands, the ground, cold air, my scarf. Wind, our breathing, my voice. Sweat and sulfur.” She huffed a small, wry laugh. “Taste is kind of yuck right now, sorry if it smells. Had to re-swallow my lunch.”

“Don’t sweat it boss, Humans all smell like crap to me anyway.”

Ellie gave him a small smile, “Yeah well, Cremisius says your feet smell so bad sometimes he lets Rocky blow up your boots, just so you’ll replace them.”

“Whole flock of birds dropped dead once cause of the fumes. We ate good that night.”

The girl huffed a little laugh, squeezing his shoulders before she pulled away and turned to Marehis, and the woman’s heart clenched. There were lines of exhaustion drawn in the corners of her eyes, and there was a discoloration at her temple, a blood vessel had burst beneath the skin there, and low on the opposite side of her face, along her jaw, lip bleeding like she’d bitten into it harsh enough her teeth sank beneath flesh. She rose up on her toes to hug Marehis around the neck, resting her head against her shoulder. Ohh. ‘What do you need’ the Iron Bull had asked. There was a great measure of relief found in that Ellie had needed a hug, and that she needed it from Marehis specifically. Somehow it made the woman feel capable again, that despite her inability to help in some tangible, necessary way against the foul magic of her Mark, she was still needed, could still help. She held the girl as tightly as she dared, worried she might be hurting, and then Ellie released her, took a deep breath, and turned to address the others.

“Everyone alright? How are we on potions?”

“Everyone is well, lethallan,” Solas assured her in summation after everyone looked to each other and confirmed their health and potions status.

“You okay, Inky?” Sera asked, pensive, she stumbled up to Ellie and tentatively raised a hand finger ghosting over the dark webbing on her forehead as she eyed the matching mark on her jaw, she reached a hand into her own potions stores and pulled the stopper from a vial of Healing potion, thumbing the blood off of Ellie’s bottom lip before holding the potion out to her, though she did hesitate momentarily, “Oh shite. You just took stomach calming pish. Will your tummy hurt if you take heal-y stuff too? It’s supposed to, you know, heal right? So it shouldn’t make you sick up?”

Ellie smiled and took the potion in hand, knocking it back and wiping her mouth with her back of her hand, “Thanks.”

“Here my dear,” Madam de Fer said, offering the girl some remedy for the almost-vomit followed by…well Ellie’s stomach potion always smelled like chalk, and Elf root tonic was hit-or-miss, some liked it, some were wholly turned off by the scent. The combination of all three were hardly the making of the Herald of Andraste’s signature scent for certain. What the Enchanter held out to Ellie looked to Marehis almost like a stick of chewing gum, but thin and translucent, smelled heavily of mint, tasted of it too since Ellie popped the thing in her mouth and shuddered, not as if it were unpleasant, just assaulting to the senses as she went,

“Wowza, that’s minty! Thanks,” Ellie said to her and then, “Let’s watch out for each other in here, okay? Stick together. I know nothing about anything going on right now is normal with, you know, the hole in the sky, weird glowing hands—Apostates, Elves, Qunari, oh my—but that Rift was definitely not normal, we need to be careful.” She huffed a wry sounding laugh, “Something even weirder than usual might be going on.”

“We are with you, Eleanor,” Cassandra affirmed.

Marehis was pleased to see Ellie’s lip heal, the discoloration on her face clear up as they entered the village, greeted by a young Elf mage who seemed…curious as to why the Herald of Andraste was visiting, but allowed them passage, telling them Enchanter Fiona was in the local Tavern.

There was still time before their meeting and Ellie wanted to get a feel for what was happening beyond the gate their party had once been turned away from when they first traveled the Hinterlands. She chatted with the local storyteller, and worked her way around the town, starting at the lowest tier closest to the waterfront, introducing herself and the Inquisition to the townsfolk. An elderly Dalish man caught her interest, discussing how well the Inquisition had secured the Hinterlands—his wife passed some time ago. Once a year he would travel to clean and lay flowers at her grave, but it had been so dangerous as of late, and the journey was too long, arduous for him in his old age.

Ellie released her hold on Marehis’s arm to take both the elder’s hands in hers, “We’ve cleared that area of serious threat. I think I’ve actually been there before when we passed through. I could see to it myself on your behalf or…well we’re scheduled a few days in the Hinterlands, I have a very good friend Russel—he’s my horse and he’s very smart and gentle, and we’ve a camp right nearby. I would be honored if you’d let me help you.”

“Lethallan…”

“We’d go at your pace. Whatever you need, however long you need—we’ll make a day of it!” she enthused, assuring him, “You’d be more than welcome to rest in our camp, and we’d see you safely there and back to Redcliffe.”

He shook his head, “You offer to do a foolish old man far too much kindness.”

“Hmm…” Ellie seemed to think it over, “I’ve seen a lot of impossible things in my time with the Inquisition, but I still think it’s impossible for there to be too much kindness.”
quiet rumble from the Iron Bull, ‘Imekari’ and Varric actually slapped a hand over his eyes whispering ‘killing me, Tumbles’. “You love your wife and wish to honor her, I couldn’t sit back and not help you however I could. I’d be grateful if you’d let me.”

“We shall make a day of it then,” the elderly man agreed, “by your leave my lady.”

“Ellie,” she insisted.

“Ellie.”

Marehis wrapped her arms around her ward’s shoulders as they left him, the man had seemed sincere, and non-threatening but she’d ensure it was not some elaborate trick or trap, but Elgar’nan she was just…proud did not seem to cover it.

They met the smuggler Tanner…Sister Tanner, actually, and with some help from Varric the woman would now be putting her skills to good use serving Leliana. And then a young man named One-Eyed Jim enlisted Ellie’s help in keeping an eye out for his very special Ram, the girl vowing to send the thing his way if she crossed his path, suggesting that they may as well spend the evening at their Inquisition camp south of the Crossroads—near the lake and caves, the young man had reason to believe his Ram may have run off to play with the Ram that could be found all around the lakeside.

And they did indeed find a Healer for their crossroad refugees—an Elf woman, with some encouragement from Solas, agreed she could offer her services outside of Redcliffe as well and help those the warring in the area had displaced. And it was something just so incredibly endearing to see Ellie the picture of grace and composure as she settled the agreement with the Healer, and then the very second they were back down the path, headed for her meeting, the girl rounded on Solas, letting lose a small, quiet squeal of glee as she launched herself at the Apostate Elf, arms around his neck as his arms came up to support her and she gave him an enthusiastic kiss on the cheek.

“You were right! We did find someone, and you were so helpful just…ahh!” she squeaked before she heaved a sigh of relief, and Solas’s hand wound its way into the curls at the back of Ellie’s head, mindful not to pull her braid eschew as he held her tightly, pressing a kiss to her forehead as he said,

“I am pleased that is a worry taken from your mind da’len, I was glad to be of help.”

What was Ellie’s claim earlier? That she was dying of ‘happiness overload’? The ailment must be catching because she was certain her heart could not take much more, old-gods preserve her, she loves this man, loves this girl, loves that he loves this girl as she does.

They made their way to the ‘Gull and Lantern’, Ellie stopping just outside the door to turn and address her party.

“I know Cassandra and Vivienne are coming to help, Solas and Marehis too, but is everyone coming with?” Ellie asked. “You’re all welcome to of course but I know mages and negotiations aren’t everyone’s thing, it could be a while.”

“I’m tagging along for the ride,” Varric said, gesturing toward the Tavern.

“Some of us are gonna go shoot the shit, stay out of the way, keep an eye out for trouble,” the Iron Bull said, “Holler if you need us though.”

“Knock ‘em dead, Ellie-girl,” Thom said, holding up a hand for Ellie to high-five.
“Thanks!”

“I’m goin’ with them,” Sera said, “no offense Inky just negotiations sounds boring.”

Ellie nodded in understanding, “If I wasn’t so involved with them, I’d think they were boring too. Go, have fun! Stay out of trouble.”

The Iron Bull chuckled. “Can only have one or the other boss, can’t have both.”

“Trouble, trouble, trouble!” was apparently Sera’s vote as she trailed after Rainier and The Iron Bull.

“Okay, so. Mages. We can do this right?” Ellie asked as she looked across her remaining allies, nervous now that their meeting was so close at hand, “Our offers solid, and Enchanter Fiona approached us in the first place, so…easy peasy yeah?”

“We have hope it shall indeed be ‘easy peasy’, Eleanor,” Cassandra assured, “You will speak well on our behalf, and I would not let you flounder on your own. Should you need assistance you shall have it.”

“I have every faith in you my lady,” Madam de Fer said, drawing near to intone, “Remember who you are and what you represent,” her hand cupped Eleanor’s chin, drawing it upward a fraction more, “Chin up, shoulders back, you are not beholden to anyone.” And then, “I promise you my dear, you’ll have all the assistance you need with Enchanter Fiona.”

Ellie nodded and then she took a deep breath before facing the tavern, looking at the door like it were some possible threat before she cast it open and led her party inside.

It was anything but easy peasy, unfortunately.

First and foremost, ‘Enchanter Fiona approached us’ was apparently no longer accurate, to the Enchanter at least.

“Welcome, Agents of the Inquisition,” Fiona greeted them cautiously. She caught sight of Madam de Fer, offering a respectful nod, “Grand Enchanter Vivienne.”

“My dear Fiona its been so long since we last spoke…” Vivienne said, sounding incredibly sympathetic, “you look dreadful, are you sleeping well?”

…oh that was almost deliciously petty, the perfect balance of politeness and insult with…well, a justified measure of accusation. The woman was currently leading a faction of rebel mages that displaced actual citizens of Redcliffe proper taking over the village to offer sanctuary to people who had no claim to the land, sent their people running headlong into the crossfire of warfare breaking out between Mages and Templars in the Hinterlands. So yes, Marehis did wonder herself, just how well this woman could sleep at night knowing innocent lives had been uprooted, some entirely lost, in her gambit to secure sanctuary for she and her fellow mages.

“What brought you to Redcliffe?” Fiona asked Ellie.

“I’m here on behalf of the Inquisition to discuss your mages assisting the Inquisition with sealing the Breach…It’s Haring 4th right? 3pm?” Ellie confirmed with Marehis who nodded yes—granted, by her watch they were a few minutes early—while the Grand Enchanter just looked at her like she’d spoken a foreign language, Ellie elaborated, “…we met back in Harvestmere, when I addressed the Grand Clerics in Val Royeaux, you extended the invitation for me to come visit you here, to consider looking to my fellow mages for a solution to the Breach?” she offered to jog the woman’s memory.

But Enchanter Fiona shook her head. “Harvest…You must be mistaken, I haven’t been to Val Royeaux since before the Conclave.”

“Well then I’m not certain who I spoke with,” Ellie offered up breezily, “she certainly looked like you ma’am, introduced herself, and her identity was verified by Seeker Pentaghast and my mage friends.”

“That is…certainly very strange…regardless, the situation has changed. The free mages have already pledged,” the word dropped more like ‘sold’ from her lips, “themselves to the service of the Tevinter Imperium. As one indentured to a Magister, I no longer have the authority to negotiate with you.”

“Do you truly wish for all of Thedas to turn against you?!” Cassandra snapped, appalled.

Ellie’s hand went to rest on Cassandra’s forearm as she said, “Very well. May I please speak with whoever is in charge here then?”

Marehis saw the hand on Cassandra’s forearm gripped tighter, and Enchanter Fiona looked to Ellie alarmed, though her gaze swept across the whole of their party, trying to discern from who she’d just heard…well it was the sound of Ellie’s heart skipping and then hammering in her chest, and the girl held her breath entirely for a moment holding herself very stiffly until it sounded like she could breathe normally again. This was followed by Solas slipping away, quietly making his way around the Tavern, and Marehis saw him disappear into the kitchen, heard him leave out the back exit following some silent command of the girl through their bond.

That was before the door slamming behind them startled Ellie slightly, directing everyone’s attention as…oh fenedhis.

A Tevinter had just entered the Tavern, high ranking if all the points of his robes were something to go by, they did dress strangely, Magisters. “Welcome my friends, I apologize for not greeting you earlier.”

“Agents of the Inquisition allow me to introduce to you Magister Alexius,” Enchanter Fiona introduced the man.

“The Southern Mages are under my command,” the Magister said as he came to stand between Ellie and the Enchanter. He looked at the girl hard, some strange interest in his eye as he asked, “and you are the survivor, yes? The one from the Fade? Interesting.” The word was spoken with what sounded to Marehis almost like the quietest of growls, muted outrage that the girl before him survived the Conclave and the Elf wanted nothing more than to throw Ellie over her shoulder and flee. Magisters…Magisters were a threat all their own and this entire situation was growing increasingly out of the range of the ordinary.

“Avanna, Magister Alexius, it’s a pleasure to meet you. I’m from the Free Marches, originally, the Fade was a little side trip,” Ellie released the grip she’d had on Cassandra’s arm and held out her hand to shake. “My name is Ellie, Herald of Andraste and agent of the Inquisition. I came here to discuss the possibility of the Free Mages assisting in sealing the Breach, since you’re in charge now I would be honored if you’d speak with me on the matter. I’m sure we could come to an arrangement.”

“…Avanna,” he greeted in return, and somehow it almost sounded strangely predatory when he said, “it is always a pleasure to meet a reasonable woman.”
It took every ounce of restraint not to reach out and grab Ellie, pull her back, away, leave. Keep her from taking that horrible man’s arm and allowing him to lead her to an empty table to discuss anything.

“Felix, would you send for a scribe, please?” the Magister asked a young man in Tevinter armor. And then, “Pardon my manners: my son Felix, my lady.”

Ellie looked at the Tevinter man as he bowed in greeting like she felt something was off, but she said, “A pleasure to meet you, ser.”

The man merely nodded leaving to do his father’s bidding, fetch a scribe, though Varric grumbled under his breath that he could have done the job himself—she certainly hadn’t appreciated the news of he and Ellie’s fight, but she did appreciate that the Dwarf was likely currently just as concerned as Marehis, wishing he could impose himself on the conversation, have an excuse to sit at Ellie’s side and protect her from harm.

“I’m not surprised you’re here,” Alexius sympathized, “containing the Breach is not a feat that many could even attempt. There is no telling how many Mages will be needed for such endeavor, ambitious indeed.”

“Well ser, when you’re fighting a massive tear in the veil, you can hardly afford to think small,” Ellie returned. “I’m young and not fully mature magic wise, so I need help powering the Mark. We’ve done so successfully on a small scale with my mage allies, that helps seal Rifts, but the Breach is very powerful. Templars are capable of suppressing the Breach—the hope is we could all work together, with enough power, weakening the Breach enough to seal it. Would your people be willing to work with the Templars, if the Inquisition acted to keep order between them?”

“Ahh my friend, even without the current strife between Mages and Templars in the south…my alliance* with the Southern Mages was forged in battle against Templar forces—the brutes tried to cut them down directly after the Conclave. Luckily I was in the vicinity, drawn by the dealings of the Conclave, I could not stand idle by while my fellow Mages were in danger, and came to their aid.”

“Yes it was all very…timely,” Enchanter Fiona said quietly.

That was…none of that was possible. Not even in the slightest. No one from the Imperium had been invited to the Conclave, and Leliana had no reports of anyone having taken an interest, outside the few spies that attended the event proper and were lost in the destruction. Something was very, very wrong.

Ellie didn’t get a chance to formulate a response to that, as Felix returned, sans scribe. The younger Tevinter trudged toward the table, staggering ever so slightly, and Ellie was up and out of her seat, rising to meet him just as his legs gave out from under him, the much shorter girl bending to support his weight against her frame, and it looked like she meant to raise her hand to check him for fever or his pulse or hold up fingers for him to count, but his hand held hers fast, low as if he didn’t wish to be caught holding it.

“Felix,” Alexius breathed worriedly as he rose from his own seat.

“I’m so sorry,” Felix said, righting himself, the hand that held Ellie’s had released its hold and was now holding his side as if it hurt, he stood slumped, weary, “please forgive my clumsiness, my lady.”

“Are you alright?” Alexius asked.
“I’m fine. Father.”

“Come, I’ll get your powders,” and then loud enough to cast his voice across the Tavern Alexius called, “please excuse me, friends. We will have to continue this another time. Fiona I require your assistance back at the castle. I shall send word to the Inquisition, we will conclude this business at a later date,” he vowed.

“Vitae Benefaria, lady Herald.”

When Alexius was leading his son to leave Ellie looked into the hand Felix had taken, pulling open a note he’d apparently slipped to her. As soon as the Tevinters and Enchanter were out the door, Ellie’s team was surrounding her, Madam de Fer asking,

“Eleanor, honestly, where did you learn that filthy language? Don’t tell me that boy has been teaching you Tevene.”

“Hasmal. Holy days. Tevene isn’t filthy and I might have to talk to a Tevinter for Inquisition business—as I kind of just did. So. I’d do the same talking to an Orlisian or Antivan,” Ellie waved dismissively, as if to physically clear the matter away, “Language isn’t important right now, there’s another Rift—sorry I squeezed the crap out of your arm,” she said to Cassandra, “it opened just before Magister Creepy came in and Herald of Andraste probably wouldn’t seem super impressive keeling over and screaming the house down so, squeezing. I hope I didn’t hurt you.”

“I hardly felt…Eleanor another Rift—Maker, do you need potion?” the Seeker asked.

Ellie shook her head. “Maybe later. Solas went to look for it since it’s so close, but he hasn’t sent me anything, we should go.”

That had them speeding from the Tavern but Solas was out in the square, having gathered their fellow party members to wait for Ellie to be out of her meeting.

“The Rift did not open anywhere in the vicinity, Ellie,” Solas reported, “no one is under attack, no distressed villagers, you’re certain—”

“Yup! It’s close, super super close,” her voice pitched high, tight from pain, “follow me!”

It was indeed, Ellie led them directly up the path to the Chantry throwing open the doors and it was then the heady smell of atmosphere and sulfur reached them, the crack and rumble of the Rift that had opened right in the center of the Chantry.

And there was yet another Tevinter Mage it seemed, fighting off the Demons pouring from the Rift.

“Good, you’re finally here, now help me close this would you?”

The next wave of Demon spawn was short lived with the help of their numbers and while the Rift fluctuated, preparing to spawn again Ellie looked to the Tevinter wide eyed and said,

“You just came through this, right? Piggybacking on whatever bat-crap magic Alexius cast?”

“Not...not through the Rift, I arrived some time ago. If you mean did I cast interdimensional magic across space and time to tear a hole in the veil itself that would create a portal to transfer me... from the casting site of that raving lunatic I call a former mentor, yes. I piggybacked. How perfectly plebian.”

“Mind your tongue, Tevinter, you are speaking to the Herald of Andraste,” Madam de Fer informed him sharply.

“…she’s the-” he stopped speaking the moment more Demons appeared from the Rift.

“Yup!” Ellie assured him.

And it didn’t take long to garner proof positive of her Herald status when, as the last Demon was felled, Ellie cast against the Rift and sealed it closed.

“Fascinating, how does that work exactly? You don’t even know, do you? You just wiggle your fingers and boom, Rift closes.”

“It’s not an exact science yet but we get by just fine,” the girl replied, “are you alright? you weren’t—oh ouch, your poor arm, here.” There was rather the horrible gash across the man’s exposed bicep, perils decisively wearing a single sleeve. Ellie withdrew potion from her stores, extending it almost like a handshake given she used it to introduce herself, “I’m Ellie, and you are?”

“Ahh, getting ahead of myself,” the Tevinter said as he holstered his staff, and after carefully examining the bottle in the bit of light shining through a broken slat over the Chantry windows, he knocked back the drought and then bowed with an air of regality, “Dorian of house Pavus, most recently of Minrathis.”

“Careful boss,” the Iron Bull warned, “pretty ones are always the worst.”

“Curious friends you have here,” the man, Dorian said. “Magister Alexius was my mentor so my assistance should be valuable to you.”

“Oh!” Ellie chirped, pleased of all things, or maybe relieved like that explained some matter she’d been confused about. “Was your mentor, care to elaborate?”

“Certainly. This time magic you’ve deduced is at play, I helped him to develop it. It was mere theory when we worked together mind, it wasn’t something he was ever capable of getting to work until now. The Rifts you’ve encountered today, I’ve been studying the magic that created them—more will appear, further and further from Redcliffe, if Alexius isn’t stopped. It is dangerous, and it could unravel time itself.”

“Time unraveling…doesn’t sound ideal,” Ellie agreed nervously.

“Eleanor, darling,” Madam de Fer interjected, coming to stand alongside the girl, laying an arm around her shoulders as if to stand guard on her behalf, defending her from the unwelcome influence of the Tevinter Mage. “I simply adore your trusting little heart but please. Time magic? No such thing has ever been possible before,” Madam de Fer insisted.

“It’s not a matter of trust so much as time magic just…makes sense weirdly enough?” Ellie supposed, reasoning, “I know you weren’t with us when we met Fiona in Val Royeaux, but I’m pretty good with the whole names and faces thing. We did meet her, many here can back me up, and Lady Josie was in communication with Fiona as early as a few days ago confirming our meeting, but she genuinely had no idea we were coming today, believed it when she said she hadn’t been to Val Royeaux since before the Conclave—she wasn’t lying, to her it’s the truth because…I guess it sort of is now? Marehis?” Ellie looked to her. “You’ve got um, you know.
Experience with espionage. And Cassandra, you’re a Seeker of Truth, do either of you think Enchanter Fiona was just bald-faced lying that she hadn’t invited us here?”

Marehis had to admit, “…Fiona did seem forthright, I too was struck by how earnest she was but…” Elgar’nan none of this made any sense.

“I likewise observed as such,” Cassandra offered, “I thought perhaps it might be some form of manipulation magic, an enchantment cast to make her forget meeting you so that Alexius could indenture the southern Mages.”

“That could be possible,” Solas spoke up, “but Fiona had some measure of free agency in the interaction, mind control, manipulations of the magical sort leave their victims more like puppets, drones. They are incapable of speaking words that have not been fed to them directly from the manipulator while under the influence of their spell. While she’s clearly subservient to Alexius she chafes at the restraints, resents it, she has not the lax complacency of someone enchanted.”

“The only thing I don’t understand…” Ellie said, amending, “well, I mean there’s loads about this I don’t understand but…gosh why would Alexius want these Mages? Last time I checked Tevinter was flush with Free Mages. What does he want them for?”

“That’s what I don’t understand myself,” Dorian agreed, “Alexius wouldn’t risk unraveling the world for a few hundred lackeys.”

“He’s not doing it for them,” Felix declared as he emerged from the Chantry’s side entrance, nodding to Ellie as he joined them.

“took you long enough,” Dorian complained, “Does he suspect?”

“No, but I shouldn’t’ve played the illness card, I thought he’d be fussing over me all day.” He sighed ruefully as he addressed Ellie, “Glad to see you got my message. My father has joined a cult, Tevinter Supremacists, they call themselves, ‘Venatori’. And I can tell you one thing, whatever he’s done for them, he’s done it to get to you.”

“Me?” Ellie asked.

“These Venatori they’re obsessed with you for some reason,” Felix explained, “perhaps because you survived the Temple of Sacred Ashes.”

“You can close the Rifts,” Dorian offered theories, “perhaps there’s some connection there? Or perhaps they see you as a threat?”

“Alexius…is risking unraveling the world to get to me?” Ellie asked, and then, “Huh. And here I didn’t get him anything.” The notion that the Venatori were so heavily targeting Ellie further still had Marehis’s stomach plummeting, she would be sending word to Leliana the moment they returned to camp, but it was heartening to hear the girl make light, that she wasn’t outright frightened.

“Send him a fruit basket, everybody loves those,” Dorian quipped, “You know you’re his target. Expecting the trap is the first step in turning it to your advantage. I can’t stay in Redcliffe any longer, Alexius doesn’t know I’m here and I want to keep it that way.”

“Sounds good to me,” Ellie said…and for some reason she began removing her cloak.

“Ellie?” Marehis questioned.
“Magic pinged,” Ellie threw over her shoulder as explanation before telling Dorian, “Another advantage: I don’t know why, but you were meant to be here, meant to meet me and help stop the Breach. Sound good?”

“I apologize, you southerners I swear you speak an entirely different language,” Dorian said sounding taken aback, “your magic did what now?” tones nearing braggadocios as he said, “I understand I’ve a glorious presence and my abilities are many and astounding, but you wish my help to stop the Breach?”

“Yup! My magic tells me when I meet people necessary for Breach banishing.” Ellie informed him as she held out her cloak to the Tevinter Mage. “While I don’t appreciate the threat to time and space, Alexius inadvertently turned things, so you’d be in the right place at the right time.”

“No pun intended?” Dorian offered up in jest staring at her offered cloak as if he found it more than questionable.

“Oh no, with me, the pun is usually always intended. The Iron Bull loves puns—big Qunari fellow who thinks you’re pretty,” Ellie explained, sounding pleased. “You’re mister mysterious, with the need to be incognito. You don’t want Alexius knowing you’re here, and I don’t much care to leave you to your own devices when you’re an ally. So. Cloak.” She insisted, tossing it to the man who caught it clumsily, “It might be a little short on you, but it’s got a hood. Put it on and we’ll just mosey on out of Redcliffe like we’ve not a care in the hole-y world.”

“…very well. I do wish to bear witness, assist when you confront Alexius, I suppose going with you now suits that.” Dorian haltingly agreed. “If this thing gives me lice or rash you’ll have worse to fear than Alexius’s rampant magic,” he vowed as he donned the thing, which fell to Ellie’s ankles but on him came just barely to his waist, though the hood did do well to cover his head, shielded his face from view if he kept his head down.

Ellie stuck out her tongue at him, eliciting a derisive ‘ha!’ from the Mage before she looked to Felix. “Thank you, Felix, for everything today. I um…know it isn’t worth much with…well its your private business,” she said, “I just want to say I do hope you feel better.”

The man nodded to her. “Thank you, my lady. Your kindness is worth plenty.”

Ellie nodded back before whirling about to face her party, her attention going directly to —“The Iron Bull! You’re my official escort on the way back to camp, its freezing and also I like walking with you so, it’s a double win for me.”

“You got it Boss.”

“Shit, Tumbles, don’t—” Varric opposed—not the Iron Bull’s escorting of course, but the in general idea of her walking around without the extra warmth of her cloak, handing it over to their strange new ally. The Dwarf grumbled as he pulled at the straps to Bianca’s holster, set the weapon on her butt before him while he removed his leather overcoat. “Here. No ‘buts’ just put it on kid,” he insisted holding it out with a definite motion that said he meant business.

“Varic its freezing out—”

“I don’t get cold. Dwarf thing, you wouldn’t know about. Just take the damn thing.”

“Well then, I suppose your pants being on fire will keep you warm enough on the walk to camp,” Ellie breezed as she kissed the man on the cheek before accepting his offered coat, pulling it on, arms a little long and hanging on her, hem falling just below her bottom as she pulled it on and wrapped up in it, prompting, “Oi! If we’re all trading clothes I wanna switch with Viv!” Sera declared.

“I don’t believe my apparel is cut quite to your…build,” Madam de Fer returned.

“Oh I know my bits won’t fill your boulder holders,” Sera snorted, “I just wanna see you in plaid!”

“I quite assure you my dear, I would burn any plaidweave before it dared touch my skin.”

“Not-Beardy then!”

“Alright,” Rainier amicably agreed, ahh yes, he was indeed ‘not-beardy’ now, “but I warn you, might’ve shaved the beard, did not shave my chest and your little tunic’ll be a tight fit.”

“Oh good heavens,” Madam de Fer groaned though Ellie and Sera were rather giggly over it. Marehis watched as Dorian shot Felix a look that said ‘whatever have I gotten myself into?’ and then,

“Well then, we’ll be off?” he asked.

Ellie nodded, “You can walk with me and the Iron Bull if you like, I’ve got loads of questions.”

Marehis was not certain she liked having Ellie out of reach walking alongside…oh goodness arm in arm with the Tevinter Mage they’d only just met, but the Iron Bull was a sound defender and Cassandra and Rainier had both moved to flank them, on guard on Ellie’s behalf. Madam de Fer came and took Marehis’s arm, patting it reassuringly.

“Jolly good,” Dorian said as Ellie linked arms with him, “Oh and Felix,” he called to the Tevinter man, “try not to get yourself killed?”

“There are worse things than dying, Dorian.”

Worse things than dying indeed. Fasta vass. Always has to get the last word in, that Felix, but he supposes that is his due.

This was all very strange he wasn’t certain that perhaps he wasn’t just hallucinating somehow. When Felix wrote him asking for his help with Alexius he’d been having a lovely time squandering his life away…technically just last week, Dorian Pavus was vying for his next meal on the hopes his date was a proper gentleman…boring fellow, desperate, but so was he. It was such he would prefer swifter ends than starving to death, which was preferable to choking down another measly morsel from some gutter. Then the benevolent golden child Felix sees fit to deign reach out to his old friend—who was fine by the way thanks so very much for asking. That mightn’t be fair, necessarily, Felix had more than enough of his own issues to deal with, not to mention Dorian had rather spectacularly burned that bridge when he left the tutelage of his father, and certainly Halward and Aquinea* had covered their own shame well enough after their own falling out, disparaged their son’s name for the sake of their own reputations, and Felix had no way of knowing otherwise, but Dorian was hardly a fair man. Maevaris of all people was a better ally in those first days he’d fled his family home. She was…she was the only person Dorian could think of that would hear his plight, understand given her own circumstance. She knew the rituals his parents had tried to foist upon him, helped him recover after his escape, done what she could to aide him quietly, get him out of the Qunaris. He did not like being indebted to anyone but Maevaris was a good sort and she never dreamed of helping him without getting something in return, told him despite the luck of his stars he’d turn things around eventually, she’d call on him for recompence when the time came.

Somehow, that didn’t seem to be happening anytime soon. One day he was rotting in the streets, the next he was infiltrating a Venatori base all the way in bloody Orlais for Felix—because Alexius had taken it into his head that the hole in the sky wasn’t big enough, lets tear one in time too—mind, Dorian had not once said ‘I told you so’ through all of this, despite the fact Felix came crawling to him months after Dorian had tried to warn the man his father was falling in with Tevinter supremacists after Alexius himself reached out endeavored to reconnect with his former apprentice to recruited him into their leagues, and at the time Felix in his infinite wisdom had called him a liar, insisted his father would never fall in with the likes of the Venatori!* And now, here they are. He’d been able to follow them to Redcliffe, and in a strange turn of events he was holed up in a study again with Felix sneaking him snacks, anything he could anytime he could slip away to the small room in the Chantry where Fathers…Mothers, whatever, prepared their sermons. But there was a divan he could sprawl out on books that held little interest but at least he could read, occupy his mind even if it was tripe and blather about the Southern Andrasten tradition, broken up with moments of poring over anything Felix could get his hands on about this spectacular Tevinter cock up.

And now, now he was wearing the upmost ridiculous item of clothing he’d worn in public being dragged around the Hinterlands by the bossiest, chattiest little tyke the Inquisition itself had to offer, touting her the ‘Herald of Andraste’.

She chattered up a storm as they meandered the paths from Redcliffe to their Inquisition camp south of a dusty little town christened the ‘Crossroads’ near a lake which sounded…quaint. And possibly something like a passable washing up, better than what he could do in his days of Chantry squatting hmm…perhaps the Iron Bull would wash his back?

Oh but this girl, on and on, what did he have with him? Nothing. What did he need? Nothing! Was he allergic to anything? Not a thing save, perhaps, incessant questioning—she giggled at that, giggled! Would he mind being included in her party’s barrier spells that…well he hadn’t been expecting any of her questions but that least of all and it was…appreciated that she would do so, he’d been…it was appreciated. As he had no aversion to magical protection, yes, barrier was fine. What kind of mage was he—that got him a ‘oh! huh’, she wasn’t frightened as he hoped she’d be when he informed her he was, for all intents and purposes, a Necromancer*. He heard more than enough sounds of disapproval and disgust from her companions, and the Iron Bull had grunted, and pulled his arm out of the girl’s hold to wrap it around her shoulders like a physical barrier between them, rumbling out,

“Here Imekari, stay close. Cold as shit out here.”

“Yeah,” the girl agreed wholeheartedly, “Are you still comfortable, the Iron Bull?” she turned a question on him, “We could get you a coat, I’m sure of it!”

“All good Boss.”

Even the Qunari called her Boss? Well she certainly was, that much was more than established, even more so once they made it to their camp.

“Nobody pay me any mind, we’re essentially home, we’ve got this camp to ourselves so just, give me a minute,” and then she proceeded to remove the coat of that Varric…Tethras? Oh that name was so familiar…he…oh. The writer, though Dorian was certain he’d heard that name elsewhere…huh. Anyway, she returned the jacket and unholstered her staff and then plopped unceremoniously straight down onto the ground slumping forward as she wrenched a hand at the back of her neck massaging it.

“Eleanor?” the Seeker asked, concerned.

The girl looked up at her, grimacing, “That’s not ignoring me!”

“My apologies,” the Seeker said with a nod though she sounded albeit amused, “let us know when your minute is over if you’ve need of anything,” she intoned as she and the female Elf…cleaner one, Marehis, moved to a large table laden with maps and parchment, setting about working together to write something, reports or the like.

“Thanks!” Ellie chirped and then a series of popping noises that could not be healthy came from her knees, her spine as she laid out flat on her back and she groaned, hands falling back to rest beside her head as she moaned out, “I’m dying. My soul rejects this mortal form, I have been of this world for far too long, and I am ready to ascend.”

The other Human Mage with them, she introduced herself as ‘Grand Enchanter of the Imperial Court Madam Vivienne de Fer’ in tones that implied Dorian was to address her as such in full. She looked startled by Ellie’s over dramatic declarations as if concerned the girl had suddenly found herself possessed.

“Ahh. Lethallan,” the Elf…Solas? said, “while I have an appreciation for this bit you do, where you speak like an ancient being encased in a fifteen-year-old’s body whenever you are world-weary, some would be quick to take you literally.”

Fifteen. Good heavens, the Maker had sent them an entire infant.

“It feels pretty literal to me. My body is still rebelling against me, my everything was set on fire times a thousand twice today, and time magic exists. I need a nap before I take a nap,” and then she snorted, giggling out, “I need a nappetizer.”

It…certainly sounded like it. He wouldn’t shy from as much now himself if he weren’t in such strange company.

The not-as-cleanly Elf, Sera, dropped to sit on her bottom next to the Human girl looking worried, “You need a nap Inky? I’ll snuggle with you yeah?”

“Totally gonna take you up on that, but first!” She grunted as she swung her legs up over head before swinging forward to roll onto her feet wincing slightly as she stretched and then, “You,” she said pointing to Dorian, “Come on, food. I’m famished, anyone else? Cool—dinner time!”

“I do hate to inform you, lady Herald, but I’ve not a culinary bone in my body,” Dorian assured her.

That had the girl whirling about looking absolutely delighted, giddy over the fact, “Really? Then you’ll not be in charge of feeding anyone, especially me! I wasn’t going to suggest you cook anyway, you should sit, like, now. Can I have my cloak back or are you chilly?”
Freezing but that fellow, Rainier was setting about getting their campfire going, and he was hardly going to keep wearing the ridiculous thing for any longer than needed, he could have removed it once they left Redcliff he supposed though the hood did do well to shield his face and he was wary some vagrant in that Crossroads place would somehow pass word of the dashing Tevinter fellow that passed through and devastated the hearts of many back to the village Alexius held hostage.

“By all means, I’ll not keep you from it,” he said, and when he handed it back to her she held his hand fast a moment like she was looking for something and was pleased she didn’t find it. “Looking for a ring?” he drawled.

“Nope! Just checking for spooning, but there isn’t any so that’s good.”

…spooning?

“Sit!” she insisted, pointing to a stool by the fire.

And then she started rummaging about their food stores looking for something, talking with Solas, Rainier, the Iron Bull about what they thought would be good for dinner. Oh Maker. Food. An actual, proper meal, dare he dream?

He daren’t, while the Iron Bull and Rainier worked to make something that smelled just…he would murder someone, possibly the Herald of Andraste for a morsel it smelled heavenly…the girl handed him a fork and a bowl. A salad. A salad comprised of mostly spinach. In fact it was essentially a bowl of spinach with an assortment of fruit and something that mentally he was certain it was some kind of vinaigrette but…

“Eat up, dinners on soon but this is to get you started.”

Oh no. No no. “While I do appreciate the gesture I assure you I’m not eating this.”

“You’re not allergic to anything in it and you need it like yesterday so. If you eat it all you can have steak!” she promised.

“You’re a bossy one.”

“Well, they do call me boss so…” she returned cheekily.

“You’re a toddler.”

“And you’re anemic.”

What?

“…anemic?”

“A blood disorder caused by vitamin deficiency. Spinach is rich in all the sort that the lack of causes anemia, lean meats too to an extent. Unless you want to eat liver instead which is definitely yuck, I’m prescribing spinach salad, then steak.”

A…blood…disorder.

“Who died and made you healer?”

“My mentor, Ava actually,” she quipped cheerily, was that…macabre humor? Kaf-fas. “I wouldn’t call myself a Healer, but I did come up with one, and I’ve worked as one for a few mercenary companies before,” she explained. “Look, see? Your cut isn’t healing, not like it should…do you mind if I…?” she gestured to the injury on his exposed arm and he nodded. Huh, he’d just thought the potion he’d taken insufficient, poorly made despite the quality he’d seen and tasted, felt in his magic, and yet it contradicted the persistent sting of his still open wound. The Herald knelt and pulled clean cloth and bandaging from her pack, she laid it across her lap, and retrieved a vial of Elf Root tonic, dousing the cloth with the stuff before using it to carefully clean and medicate his cut before she wrapped it up tight, “I don’t know when the last time you looked in a mirror was but here,” she pointed touched the inner corner of her own eye, “super super pallid, and your fingernails aren’t spooning up yet but they’re practically grey where they should be rosier see? And um. Well. You fought very well—brilliantly—but you’re clearly exhausted, you’ve probably been feeling sluggish and foggy right?”

“…you…that…” well he certainly felt foggy headed now, and he had been feeling some malaise for quite some time, but he’d chalked that up to in general apathy with life, the lack of sunlight cooped up in the dusty Chantry, the occasional venture into the bowels of Castle Redcliffe. It wasn’t like he’d had a particularly vitamin-rich diet in who knows how long now what with time travel and everything. He strangely felt the urge to accuse her, a Mage, of being a witch. He opted instead for spearing a forkful of spinach and verifying, “my fingernails will spoon?”

“Yup. And like, you could eventually die you know, either from weakness or the eventual lack of oxygen to your organs and muscles…that’s if the heart failure doesn’t happen before then.”

“Cheers,” he raised his fork in a toast before…oh it wasn’t quite as ghastly as it looked, and it wasn’t nearly as ghastly as what spooning fingernails would appear. He was in dreadful need of a manicure as it was, jagged edged and simply filthy.

“So,” Ellie said as sat down on the ground before him, her back to the fire, “Venatori— we’ve had some run-ins with them before, on the Storm Coast and we’ve had more serious issues with them. You said they might be interested in my Mark?…huh, okay so a Rift opened up when we got close to Redcliffe, just popped open out of nowhere. When I closed it, that’s where we started running into time discrepancies. Like I met Enchanter Fiona in Val Royeaux and she invited me here months ago. She was in contact with the Inquisition as recently as a few days ago, finalizing plans for our meeting to discuss an alliance with the Inquisition.”

Dorian grinned, feeling a little vindictive he got a chance to show off after a fashion, he laid the fork in his bowl and reached into his robes to withdraw a slip of parchment. “I’m well aware.”

“Another note huh?” Ellie asked wearily as she unfolded the parchment. Something immediately caught her eye. “12.4.9:41 3…” her hand slipped into the outer pocket of her cloak and pulled out the note Felix had passed to her earlier, holding them side by side to compare a moment before looking to him, “Felix wrote you about my meeting?”

“Venatori spies infiltrate your ranks, and those of Enchanter Fiona,” Dorian airily explained. “As soon as she confirmed a meeting with you, Venatori higher ups sent word to Alexius, and Felix sent word to me. To beat you to the punch of recruiting the Mages he had to know when to beat you. Today, Haring 4\textsuperscript{th}, 9:41, technically perhaps two hours or so ago Alexius cast the spell that transported he and his Venatori friends back in time. The Venatori gave him this amulet, when he powers it, it glows green like your Mark. One moment they were gathered in a Venatori base, portal opened up and boom, Felix tells me they appeared outside the gates of Redcliffe.”

“Just after the Mages took Redcliffe over after the Conclave, with…” Ellie’s head bopped side to side as she considered the matter, handing him back his note while she tucked the one Felix had given her into her pocket. “I’m guessing hired mercenaries or are the Venatori crazy enough to dress up like Templars and let their allies cut them down to earn the trust of the Rebel mages? The whole ‘I could not stand idle by while my fellow Mages were in peril’ thing seemed super convenient.”

Huh. Well. At least if he’d fallen into the company of a demanding, chatty toddler, she had some measure of intellect to be brought to bear. “Swords for hire, yes, they came through the portal with Alexius.”

“So that explains Rift One and why they’re here,” Ellie said. “What about you? You said something earlier about interdimensional space time stuff?”

“Felix got me into the Venatori base where I lay in wait until Alexius made his move.
Using the residual magic in the wake of Alexius’s casting, and my understanding of the spell being used, I was able to follow after, setting to arrive in Redcliffe’s chantry. I wasn’t capable of casting myself as far back as Alexius using only the leftover magical signature of his amulet, and not the device proper. I’ve been hiding in that dross-ridden edifice for nearly a month now.” Alexius wouldn’t deign set foot in a southern Chantry, hadn’t set foot in a Chantry period since the accident that took his wife, was still to this day working to take his son.

“You both cast though…” Ellie asked for clarification, “So. Two Rifts. One marking where Alexius came through, the second opened where you appeared. Cool. Major ouch but cool.”

“Boss, I don’t wanna rain on your parade…” the Qunari spoke up.

“Rain away!” she permitted cheerily.

“If the guy was just going to send his people back to just after the Conclave why did he need to know when you would be meeting with the Mages? He went back before you were even proclaimed the Herald of Andraste it sounds like, he more than ‘beat you to the punch’,” the Iron Bull said, “I’ll admit everything back there was hard to explain. But the plots got holes in it other than Rifts.”

“Because he needed my Mark to do it didn’t he?” Ellie asked Dorian who wasn’t certain how to answer that, he didn’t know, “You thought perhaps the Venatori are have an interest in my Mark, this amulet you say they gave him glows like my Mark, the magic it uses might be Rift Magic or something, it might all have something to do with the Breach. Alexius cast today, little bit in advance to my meeting so I’d come across the Rift that formed at his set destination,” she reasoned. Huh. Well, he’ll be damned. He hadn’t considered that. “Their timeline—the one where Fiona never went to see me in Val Royeaux because she was already in service to Alexius—didn’t ‘click into place’ for us until after I sealed the Rift. Rift sealed—boom. Alexius and everyone got sent back and indentured the Mage rebellion…” she looked up at the Iron Bull, “that’s why One Eyed Jim hasn’t been able to go or get anyone to go look for his Ram, the Healer’s out of vital ingredients that are easily collected from around the Hinterlands I mean I think I literally picked everything she asked for from here—Alexius has kept everyone locked up it sounds like. No one in or out so…” she gasped, “hopefully that means his playing around time travel haven’t affected the Inquisitions work with the Refugees, ugh!” she actually slapped her hands on the ground at her sides for emphasis as she informed him, “If he’s messed up any of all the hard work we’ve done in the Hinterlands in any way I will completely flip my entire business, I swear! I’ll go off!”

“I’m fairly certain it hasn’t,” Dorian assured her, amused though, he was rather tempted to see just what the Herald of Andraste ‘flipping her entire business’ would look like. “While I’ve been toiling away in that Maker forsaken Chantry, Felix assured me Alexius saw to it no one set foot outside the gate fearing what interaction with the outside world would do until you came to interact with his change in timeline.”

“Good. Though its tough toenails if he has a problem with me taking one of the villagers out tomorrow,” she looked to the Seeker still writing away, “I really do want to make good on my promise with that man, getting him to his wife’s grave. Since we’re still technically dealing with this mage business, I think tomorrow would be good for that, yeah? While we plan on how to proceed? I’m not giving up on the mages here and we absolutely have to stop Alexius meddling with time, we’d be crazy to realize his plans and not do a thing to stop him*.”

“We shall see what tomorrow brings, Eleanor,” the Seeker said, wearily like it disappointed her she might let the girl down, “while I’m certain it should be doable I can make no promises of my own other than, should worse come to pass we shall extend our stay here to fulfill your deal with the Dalish man.”

“I’ve almost finished my report to Leliana, da’len,” Marehis said. “We’ll see where to go from there.”

“Thanks, you guys,” Ellie sighed with relief, then, “Oh! Would you thank Leliana for me for sending you—is that okay to put in a report?”

“It’s not a problem, I’ll pass your thanks along, although,” Marehis said, as she continued her work, “I do believe my change in assignment was the suggestion of the Lady Seeker.”

“…I may have made a suggestion in passing,” the Seeker reluctantly admitted.

“Cassandra! Gah! You’re just the best!” Ellie enthused, “Seriously! Mind your inkwell, as soon as I’m physically capable of rising from this sitting position, you’re getting hugged!”

Physically capable indeed it took her an almost pathetic amount of time but she did trudge to her feet and then stumbled the path to the desk to lay against the Seeker’s back wrapping her arms around the woman’s neck.

“Think nothing of it Eleanor, it was merely a suggestion made in passing.”

Ellie hummed her enthusiasm as she squeezed the woman more tightly and pressed a kiss to her head.

Surprisingly enough he did manage to eat his way through the entirety of that green monstrosity she’d offered him and then oh. Maker. Steak. Actual steak and potatoes and carrots were an upgrade from the spinach most assuredly—he was not allowed wine with his dinner which was sacrilege, but Ellie insisted he was not to partake of any alcohol until his anemia was taken care of since over imbibing in the first place can cause such an affliction which was…not appreciated in the slightest, but likely wise given he’d been doing far too much of that the past few years, the first six months of his exile he had only glimmers of memory from, in the good old days when he was young, blissfully ignorant as it hadn’t struck him yet that things cost money which he no longer held a beautiful ever flowing wealth of.

Ahh well, dinner was good enough on its own, the Iron Bull certainly knew how to cook, as did that Rainier fellow, the finest, largest meal he’d had in longer than he’d care to think of. Their entire mismatched crew gathered around the fire and filled Dorian in on the work the Inquisition had done in the Hinterlands and…well yes he could certainly see why that girl would be furious if any of that had been undone, the Inquisition was rather a rising noticeable force in Thedas, so much so word of it had been circulated through the Imperium, he’d heard about it in passing more and more, though his first real focus on it came when Felix got him involved in thwarting his father’s schemes. And they had plans for more—smaller tasks like searching the nearby lake for someone’s missing Ram, and that prompted the Dwarf to ask,

“Uh Tumbles, you know how to swim?”

“Yup! I mean it’s cold as all get out right now and I’m not necessarily in a ‘swimming for fun’ condition but I can swim fine. Why?”

“Just, you know, making sure. Never know, you might have to. We can’t have the Herald of Andraste drowning on us can we?” That certainly would put a damper on things.

When she’d cleaned her plate the Herald seemed almost tentative, despite her earlier enthusiasm over the prospect, “Um, I really am beat, would it be okay if I took a nap? I’d just take a half dose,” she proposed to Solas as if asking the Elf’s advice on the matter.

“Oh my dear girl you’re more than due a lie-down,” Madam de Fer was quick to interrupt with an assurance. Though there was a mix of concern and sympathy as she questioned, “Today’s affairs have been more than daunting, do you fear you’ll sleep unpleasantly without the assistance of potion? If that’s the case then by all means do imbibe, but otherwise I would not think it wise to risk tempting the chance of sleeping too late into the evening, it simply wouldn’t do to get your waking hours amiss.”

That seemed to be all the leave she needed, Ellie, Sera and Marehis in tow as well, disappeared into one of the Inquisition tents. As almost-annoying as he’d found the girl, he did feel almost abandoned, being left to chat up the other strange adults.

That…Sergeant, he’d been introduced as, the Rainier fellow looked concerned as he watched the trio disappear into one of the tents. “Um…Solas? How’s she feeling?” he prompted for some reason.

“She is sore from our work today, weary, but otherwise she is well,” the Elf shuddered a bit, “Well, and cramping. Which is not a familiar concept for me, insofar as location and it is a very unsettling sensation.” That got a laugh out of Madam de Fer and a quieter one from Seeker Pentaghast who raised a hand to her lips as if she were merely having a coughing fit.

That led to…Maker’s breath, time magic baffled these people to the extent most of their conversation was spent—talking to someone who had developed, and he himself been thrown back through time—talking about how such a thing could not exist, but they had encountered this strange phenomena in Solas’s magic that allowed him to monitor the Herald’s well-being and no one sought to question it.

And then there was a softness that came into the Elf Apostate’s features, a slanted smile as his eyes warmed and his gaze rested on the tent the Herald had disappeared into.

“Oh my dear girl you’re more than due a lie-down,” Madam de Fer was quick to interrupt with an assurance. Though there was a mix of concern and sympathy as she questioned, “Today’s affairs have been more than daunting, do you fear you’ll sleep unpleasantly without the assistance of potion? If that’s the case then by all means do imbibe, but otherwise I would not think it wise to risk tempting the chance of sleeping too late into the evening, it simply wouldn’t do to get your waking hours amiss.”

That seemed to be all the leave she needed, Ellie, Sera and Marehis in tow as well, disappeared into one of the Inquisition tents. As almost-annoying as he’d found the girl, he did feel almost abandoned, being left to chat up the other strange adults.

That…Sergeant, he’d been introduced as, the Rainier fellow looked concerned as he watched the trio disappear into one of the tents. “Um…Solas? How’s she feeling?” he prompted for some reason.

“She is sore from our work today, weary, but otherwise she is well,” the Elf shuddered a bit, “Well, and cramping. Which is not a familiar concept for me, insofar as location and it is a very unsettling sensation.” That got a laugh out of Madam de Fer and a quieter one from Seeker Pentaghast who raised a hand to her lips as if she were merely having a coughing fit.

That led to…Maker’s breath, time magic baffled these people to the extent most of their conversation was spent—talking to someone who had developed, and he himself been thrown back through time—talking about how such a thing could not exist, but they had encountered this strange phenomena in Solas’s magic that allowed him to monitor the Herald’s well-being and no one sought to question it.

And then there was a softness that came into the Elf Apostate’s features, a slanted smile as his eyes warmed and his gaze rested on the tent the Herald had disappeared into.

“Solas?” Cassandra asked.

The Iron Bull motioned for them to quiet and listen, “Imekari’s almost asleep.”

There was a sound just barely perceivable to Dorian’s ears from the tent, a voice, quiet and muffled but musical.

“Marehis,” Solas murmured in explanation, “an old Dalish lullaby.”

The thought of that seemed to melt something in Madam de Fer, “Oh she missed that girl terribly.”
He felt more than out of place, part of him was absolutely certain he would not stay here, surely not. He would have to move on soon wouldn’t he? It was strange he felt almost half-invited, Ellie had all but taken him in like some mabari pup, but that wasn’t on he still had his pride but, just…he felt antsy like the other shoe was about to drop, the uncertainty of the future rolling in his gut—they needed to stop Alexius, but could they? And what if this was all part of some greater, darker scheme? And what would happen once it was over would he…Maker he was in bloody Ferelden. He’d barely scraped together the means to make it to that Venatori base, had to pawn the last of his ties to his old life off just to get to that place by the barest skin of his teeth. Would he…could he even dream of returning to Tevinter? Did he even want to was more over a question though…it was more and more an impossibility. He’d barely a copper to his name ha. His name. Why did he continue introducing himself as Pavus, what good did that do him? There was still some measure of pride in his roots, it was ingrained in him.

Then there was some strange chance in pace, Madam de Fer set about very regally erecting a snowy white tent, though she did call for the Iron Bull to ‘be a dear’ and assist her in adjusting the thing—it was a very simplistic set up if it were just she alone housed in the tent, but apparently there was a sleep over of sorts planned for that evening, whatever that meant. It was a silky, several layered construct that could expand to hold an out in out gala if she so chose, but it required more than one pair of hands to hold and pull and drive supports for the entire thing, but in the end there was a big, glorious tent set up across the stream from the rest of the Inquisition’s set up.

And then the Iron Bull announced that the men were going to convene to gather around a bonfire and make merry while the women ‘did their thing’. This led Dorian to trail after Solas, Rainier, Tethras, and the Iron Bull up the hillside a way, turning left, opposite direction of the lake to set up in a clearing they could still have an excellent view of the camp below in case they were needed—Solas could be communicated with through his bond to the Herald if she were in danger, and the Iron Bull could apparently hear if their companions below called, but it would put their better-hearing men out of earshot of the ladies ‘girl talk’ and vice versa. Apparently Herald of Andraste came with world defining decision making and threats of all sorts ever pressing in her life, and the poor thing was due some relaxation though she was currently still napping…on hour three of her lie-down, the sun had set, it was nearly 8pm, he wasn’t sure that would be conducive to getting proper rest that evening but then again, sleep overs didn’t involve much sleep.

“Nah. Kid’ll wake up, have some fun, but it’ll mostly be relaxing shit, she’ll be out like a light before midnight guaranteed, she barely slept a wink last night and…” the Iron Bull paused as he threw another log onto the fire he and Rainier were working to build, he looked to Dorian. “Fuck me. Imekari had all kinds of trouble sleeping, something in the Fade freaked her big time and she came waking me up, half asleep, mumbling about how ‘they’ were coming.”

“There was much activity afoot in the Fade last night perhaps…” Solas reasoned, “perhaps it was some form of preparation for the casting that took place. To send a group as large as what it sounds like Alexius supposedly did though time would have been no small feat.”

“I ought to pop that Vint bastard right in the mouth,” Rainier railed, amending, “no offense to present company of course.”

“Oh, if you mean Alexius, by all means, pop away,” Dorian invited him.

“Lady Josephine worked tirelessly to arrange these negotiations with the Mages and Templars and Ellie’s been nerve wracked about handling them, only to have this rubbish blow up in her face,” he seethed.

“Tumbles handled it all pretty well though,” Varric informed them. “I mean shit, I was still wrapping my head around trying to figure out just what angle the Enchanter was trying to play and she just rolled with the punches. Fiona acts like she doesn’t have a damn clue what’s going on? Cool. Tevinter Magister’s come and indentured the entire mage rebellion? Alright, bring him on—she felt that second damn Rift open up, didn’t let the bastard see her down, and greeted him like he hadn’t totally derailed her entire game plan. In Tevene.”

“Truly?” Dorian asked, surprised. The girl’s accent sounded more like a Marcher, not quite so low-brow as what Ferelden’s jargon produced, she did have the sort of dusk common to Tevinter skin, but such was also common in Antiva, Rivain, though her hair was wild red, like cousins of his he’d met in passing from Ferelden.

“Kid traveled a lot, seems to pick up languages pretty okay, Dalish, little Tevene she says.”

“Krem says she speaks Antivan* with Ambassador Montilyet when they have their lessons together,” the Iron Bull said.

“Yeah she mentioned Antivan. Anyway,” Varric got them back on target, Alexius, “bastard was creepy as fuck with her though. Felix kid seems okay, just about trampled Ellie with his whole fainting act…he uh, okay? His dad made it seem like he was really sick, its uh, nothing contagious? Tumbles can’t really afford to get sick.”

“No, nothing contagious,” not in any way they had to worry about, it wasn’t as if the man had committed a blood pact with the Herald of Andraste.

“He did seem a good sort that Felix,” Rainier said, “too bad he might have to witness his father die—exactly what level of creepy are we talking here, Varric?” Ahh. Alexius…well the Alexius Dorian knew years ago mourned his late wife in such a way he couldn’t so much as look at another woman, but so much had changed, the man hadn’t been a scoundrel had he?

“I almost doubled back on my search for the Rift when I heard him call it a pleasure to meet ‘a reasonable woman’,” Solas offered up wryly.

“Yup. Made my damn skin crawl, the way he said it,” Varric said. “I thought Marehis was gonna start chucking knives.”

It all certainly sounded…ugh.

Fire lit, company gathered, the Iron Bull broke out his promised booze, bottles of a very oaky smelling bourbon and red wine, not a proper vintage but it would do, all very tempting and the Qunari did see fit to indulge Dorian, passing off a tankard of wine.

“Better listen to Tumbles, Sparkler,” Varric warned him before sipping at his bourbon.

“Sparkler?” Dorian asked drily.

“Nickname. Yours. Deal with it.” Varric sniped and then, “I mean the kid’s magic ‘pinged’ so that pretty much means you’re stuck with us right? You sign on with the Inquisition, keep Tumbles alive, hell—Chuckles, how long before you bet this asshole wants on the kid’s roster, teaching her…fancy Tevinter magic or whatever.”

“I hardly think that would be appropriate, neither is it necessary,” Solas replied, “between Madam de Fer and myself Ellie has more than adequate training for where she is at the moment magically. And the world at large would balk at the Inquisition allowing the Herald of Andraste to learn magic from a Tevinter Necromancer of all things.”
Well the Elf didn’t sound like he much approved of him but uh…well he was an Altus, obviously came from the upper crust of the Imperium and it was true his family did have slaves—it was their system, and no one family could change it overnight, for his family it was more the equivalent of non-monetarily-compensated servant staff, they were housed well, fed the same, their meals were not revoked as a weapon against them, saw Healers when necessary and there was not an Elf among their numbers, at least their hadn’t been when Dorian could last check. Still there was a more than tenuous relationship between the Imperium and the people they’d so thoroughly subjugated Ages ago.

He didn’t have much time to focus on any of their chatter as, he’d had no more than a sip of his wine when,

“Oh! Lop-head! I said no alcohol and I meant it!” Herald of Andraste, hair loose and wild, cloak donned over what appeared to be soft pajamas bottoms and tunic, feet tucked into unlaced boots. He was surprised to see her not flanked by one of her…were either of them her mother—the Seeker or that Elf Marehis? Who claimed this girl, where were her parents surely they could reign her in? Give her a time out, leave him in peace?

“Oh goodie, the ickle Herald is up from her nap. Feeling rested?” Dorian questioned innocently, but all that got him was the tankard, forcibly removed from his grasp…huh. He would hardly fight the girl over it, not physically that would hardly be appropriate, but still she did take it from him with a great deal of ease, passing it off to the Dwarf and glaring at the Iron Bull for providing him with alcohol, perhaps Dorian was bad off, weak. And that was before, “Ow! Ow! Fasta vass!” she twisted his damn ear! Just a quick yank she held for two seconds but still!

“Da- Darn it Dorian, take this seriously, you have to take care of yourself!” she insisted, stomping her foot, hands on her hips. Oh the girl she…well she looked fierce as she lectured him but scared for him. That was…he wasn’t sure how he felt about that.

“I tried to warn you,” Varric said smugly, the cur was double fisting it now with wine in on hand and his bourbon in the other—he drank at the wine just to spite him, surely.

“How’re you feeling, Ellie?” Rainier asked in earnest.

“Loads better now that I got a bit more shut eye,” Ellie said, the man looking wholly relieved to hear as much. Huh. Rainer, maybe the girl’s mother wasn’t present, perhaps this man was the Herald’s father? The Iron Bull was apparently some sort of Mercenary leader, ‘Chargers’, perhaps that was how they’d gotten involved in all this? One of them surely had to be responsible for her, she was awfully young to be going about without some relative or another trailing after her on her misadventures, but most of the Herald’s party were fair skinned, a couple of them together weren’t likely to produce a child of Ellie’s complexion—the only combination among them would perhaps be Rainier and Madam de Fer but that…definitely did not seem like an obvious match. Then again, perhaps she was someone’s niece? Cousin?

“So, you ditching your gal pal party Tumbles?” Varric asked.

“Nope! I worried you lot might let Dorian drink and I thought about it,” she turned to the Tevinter Mage. “Not that you’re a girl or anything, but you don’t have to be to like what we’re on to better than sitting sober with these loons all night. We’re just talking and relaxing— Madam de Fer’s tent is warm, and there’s fluffy blankets and hot cocoa—you’re definitely welcome to that. Just offering, if you’d rather not it’s no worries but you really really shouldn’t drink.”

“…I’ll admit I’m intrigued.”
The girl whooped, and held out her unmarked hand to help him up. And then she led him down the hillside to the plateau their camp rested on, she’d been chattering away about how much fun they were in for but as they approached the Inquisition tents she dropped her voice to a whisper and said, “I’d like to check how your arm is healing if that’s alright,” and when he nodded she peeked under the bandaging and smiled. “Oh good, it’s all healed up, it doesn’t hurt or anything still?”

“Not at all.”

“Then its healed inside and out, whew,” she breathed a sigh of relief then, stepping away from him, giving him space, “There’s things on the requisition table for you if you want a bit of a wash, the water in the stream is clean and I promise you’ll be toasty as soon as you join us in the tent. I had to guess size wise but there’s robes in our storage, so I set one out, and if you leave your clothes out I promise no one will mess with them, they can be washed. Shout if you need anything alright?”

He found himself nodding dumbly, and the girl spared him a warm smile before she gave him his privacy.

He wasn’t sure what to do with any of this. He knew how to bathe himself, obviously but what was left for him was a neat arrangement of a fresh bar of soap, unopened bottles of shampoo, conditioner. A toothbrush, paste, and razor and cream—he’d had...he’d had the implements and made them work with water alone, but they’d been left abandoned in the Chantry. A clean towel set folded with a washcloth on top of it and next to that was a robe, not exactly his style but it smelled freshly laundered, not like it’d been pulled out of a musty trunk—storage, she’d said it came from, and there was a balled-up pair of thick woolen socks. And then, there was his beaten-up leather satchel he’d had strapped to him for forever now, he’d almost forgotten he’d set it aside when they ate. It’d been cleaned and the little hole that had been working itself larger and larger over the past few months had been mended and when he pulled it closer to examine it something inside shifted and clinked, he opened it to reveal a store of health and lyrium potions. Lyrium.

These were things, services, resources that cost money, money he didn’t have. He supposed there was some level of repayment for coming to their aid against Alexius to be had, he was their ally, and there’d been some talk of him joining their Inquisition though he’d taken it mostly as jest but...were they serious? He had no interest, though...it was more like it wasn’t something he’d ever considered. It hadn’t been so much as a passing interest in the slightest. Talk of the Inquisition in Tevinter hadn’t inspired the man to join their cause, he’d been focusing on his own life issues, the hole supposedly forming in the sky over Ferelden was the least of his worries until this Alexius mess came up. He didn’t...he was Dorian Pavus, a damn treasure to the world thank you very much but he didn’t feel much like he had a thing in the world to offer right now.

He couldn’t just stand out here all night so he decided to go against the warning voice in his head that said he was only indebting himself, as he took up the offerings and went to have a quick, frigid but painfully needed bath in the stream, Maker, he’d never felt so clean in...far too long he could feel layers of grime and dust and disgust peeling from his skin, and oh his hair, it was silken when he was done with it, gone was the horrid grease he’d been convincing himself gave it a pleasant shine. Proper shave, maintaining his mustache while getting rid of the scruff along his jaw. Then came the robes, soft, clean and as he finished up he hesitated only momentarily before storing the offered toiletries in his satchel, leaving his own clothes on the requisition table as instructed.

He could hear the women in the tent talking as he approached, he wasn’t certain just how they’d feel about him joining them though he had been invited, and he wasn’t some slaggard...not in a way that concerned anyone present mind, but still.

It was no matter though, the moment he reached the tent the flap flew open as if by magic, and it certainly was, Madam de Fer was reclined on a pile of pillows gesturing airily at the entryway and saying, “Do come in my dear.”

Kaffas, the tent was warm, as promised the chill of the Hinterlands did not follow him in, and the scent of lavender permeated the air. Soft light emitted from what reminded Dorian of a chandelier, only there were no candles just glowing tear drop crystals hanging along a silver frame in the center of the tent’s ceiling. The women were gathered in a circle of sorts, Seeker Pentaghast sitting alongside Madam de Fer, a buffer state between the Enchanter and the Elf, Sera, then Ellie who was already patting the place at her side for Dorian to take a seat, behind her sat Marehis who was carefully managing the girl’s hair. He found himself seated on a cushion, no sooner was he down then Ellie was passing him the length of what was indeed a wonderfully fluffy blanket and once that was settled around his shoulders, she was handing him matching crystal saucer and teacup full of hot cocoa and he was certainly hallucinating even as she clinked his cup with her own with an offered toast of, “Benefaris!” she said.

“…Benefaris.” It was official, he’d actually perished in the battle against the Rift…maybe before that, maybe he died of exposure before he even heard from Felix about his father’s plans, there was no such thing as working time magic, he’d merely given up the ghost and now he was in some strange but glorious afterlife.

“Sup, Dorian,” Sera greeted giddily, “…hey how come you’re all fancy Tevinter but you’ve got a normal sounding name?"

“…as opposed to…?” he asked.

“Cremisisisisssssssss.”

That certainly was a strange sounding…sound, it didn’t seem much like a name.

“Cremisius!” Ellie corrected, and my how her cheeks pined in rather spectacular fashion, the Herald of Andraste was blushing, “His name is nice!”

Huh. A bit religious, but yes, Cremisius wasn’t the most bizarre name he’d encountered among his fellow countrymen.

“And who is he, exactly?” Dorian asked.

“Cremisius Aclassi, he’s the Iron Bull’s Lieutenant,” Ellie explained, and when Sera opened her mouth to add something the girl was quick to cut her off, “and my friend! Who’s a boy and we like each other.”

Ahh. Apparently they’d been talking about all things ‘last week’. Ellie wasn’t half-Elf apparently, she was too short for that anyway—Marehis was her bodyguard, a minder, but not her mother. Alexius’s meddling had kept them apart apparently, which pissed the Herald of Andraste right off, understandably all things told, while the woman was not biologically her mother, it seemed to Dorian she was currently the closest thing unless the Seeker…no he doubted there was a genetic connection there as well. Her summary of her time with the young man from Tevinter—a non-mage, so Sopporati then, that must be why Madam de Fer wasn’t balking entirely at the possible relationship—was concluded with an admittedly cutey declaration of interest…huh. He’d apparently given her a hat which wasn’t wholly notable but flowers, and a scarf, those were par for the course of Tevinter courting custom.
Though her summation of the week did kill his theory that perhaps Rainer was her father, that he’d followed after her and brought the Chargers with him—it turned out he’d only just been recruited. None of her party were familial relations by any means to this girl.

“Your parents aren’t able to join you in the Inquisitions work?” Dorian asked. “That must certainly be worrisome for them.”

She smiled, shaking her head ‘no’, “Parents don’t worry about me because I don’t have any—well, I mean obviously I have some, I came from somewhere, but I was dropped off at an orphanage naked as the day I was born…quite possibly on the day I was born.”

No parents? Lucky girl. Oh but that wasn’t fair really, that was sad. She seemed unbothered by it but still, he felt like he’d stepped in things and he knew all too well what it was like to be cast aside. Twice in her case as magic apparently deemed her ‘unadoptable’. Well it may have done so then, but now Kaffas, they say it takes a village, granted this village housed a Qunari, three Elves, and a Dwarf atop her Human allies, but they all were very taken with this girl, they practically oozed with it. Even the Seeker, she was rather the foreboding presence, he wasn’t sure if the chill he’d felt on their journey from Redcliffe had been merely climate, or her cold shoulder, being so uncertain of their new ally. But the moment Marehis, finished with Ellie’s hair, suggested a manicure was in order for the girl, instead of coming around to sit in front of the Herald, she had her shift places—Cassandra was open warmth as she waved the girl over before Ellie scooted and turned about, sitting with her back against the Nevarran woman who wrapped an arm around the young Mage’s shoulders, other hand absently playing with a lock of her hair while the Elf woman began cleaning and smoothing the Herald’s fingernails, the girl was apparently a nail biter.

Marehis turned the conversation to past romances as she worked, the Elf had apparently one serious relationship under her belt, in her youth there was a young boy she grew up with, they were sweethearts, and even had plans to wed until they came to the realization there was a world outside the alienage, he and Marehis had been hired as waitstaff to the soiree of a noble family—their first dalliance in espionage, they was to listen and report back anything of interest. While her fiancé hadn’t much interest, Marehis found her calling—where Marehis found excitement and fulfillment, he found anxiety and fear, which was more than reasonable, the dangers were many and rewards few, and the two grew apart. She’d mostly smaller affairs after that, casual dalliances. Madam de Fer and Seeker Pentaghast glossed over their own ventures—the Enchanter found love at a young age in her patron Bastien of Ghislain, and the Seeker hadn’t much interest in relationships being wholly dedicated to her training, her work in the Order but she admitted to her fair share of flirtations. Sera talked about her own past girlfriends though she seemed to struggle keeping things non-explicit, attempting to be mindful of the more tender ears among them, for a filthy peasant the girl got around.

Ellie had apparently gone on a single date with a young man that she had liked well enough but lost interest in almost as quickly as he’d garnered it when he turned out to be two faced, had the sort of ego where he felt it necessary to degrade others to promote himself. And then, there had been a young lady from Hasmal, Aelia. She was the Mayor’s daughter and Ellie’s first time passing through the refugee state, the girl had invited her to sit with her during Chantry—it was the first time the Herald of Andraste had been able to attend a holy service since the discovery of her magic, and it became a regular occurrence, anytime Ellie was in town they hung out, and always sat together during service—apparently the Chant was always recited in Tevene as it was back home, the Chantry Fathers would read aloud and Ellie blushed as she admitted she’d known the Chant in Trade and picked up on the Tevene version pretty quickly but she liked Aelia leaning in close to whisper translations for her so she ‘played dumb’…the Chant as a mode of flirtation it did sound like the very way to seduce someone who ended up the Herald of Andraste.
“Inky put the moves on the Mayor’s daughter during Chantry!” Sera screamed, absolutely enthralled by the idea.

“It wasn’t a grope fest or anything—the most we did in Chantry was hold hands! It was Chantry!”

Sera just snorted, giggling up a storm before she jumped up, fleeing the tent as she cackled out something about needing to tell ‘Dwarfy’ and Bull because they would apparently ‘lose their shit’.

“She sounds like a nice girl, da’len,” Marehis said, “You had a falling out?”

Ellie shook her head. “No we’re still friends, but I’m not exactly allowed to step foot in Hasmal until certain people retire or something, and um she’s married now since last Bloomingtide—happy, so that’s good.”

Apparantly when the Herald of Andraste last visited Hasmal, fourteen at the time, Aelia had broken down into tears on the spot—her parents had made arrangements for her to marry Titus, the Captain of the Guard’s son, a nice young man they’d always been good friends with, it wouldn’t be a terrible situation, he was kind, always got along well with Aelia and Ellie, and given he’d had a girlfriend of his own at the time, he was just as disappointed as they were at the arrangement—he and Aelia could make it work, it was just…well Dorian understood the absolute frustration of having such life decisions foisted upon you, made on your behalf, but at least he’d always had a say in things up until his parents endeavored to strip him of that ability. As far as things with Ellie went, she’d talked it out with Aelia, done her best to comfort her and assured her they could still be friends, but yeah, it wouldn’t be appropriate to carry on if she was engaged. All in all it sounded rather responsible, civil, nothing that would get Ellie out in out banned from the city proper, but apparently it had. Aelia had walked Ellie to the gate to see her off, and as it was the end of things, a goodbye between friends and a goodbye to their relationship, they’d kissed.

“I take it he didn’t react well,” Cassandra offered gently.

That got her a little snort, “Oh gosh no, he wouldn’t even let us explain, he just beat the crap out of me, and said if he ever saw me again he’d kill me so: banned.”

…beat the…Dorian wasn’t certain how to respond to that, it sort of knocked the wind out of him. There was a mix of quiet horror and outrage coming from all gathered, a terrifying look shared between Marehis and Cassandra that said they may be seeking some form of penance paid from a certain Guard Captain if the opportunity arose. As it was Cassandra held the girl more tightly and it seemed to strike Ellie she’d revealed something uncomfortable and she wasn’t sure how to take it back or side step getting much further into it, but Marehis just squeezed her hands and asked,

“Which color would you like me to paint your nails, sweet girl?”

Ellie blushed and gave her minder a grateful smile before she requested the polish that was a lovely evergreen color, matched the darker tones of her armor, her scarf.

“Oh yes, it’ll suit you nicely my dear,” Madam de Fer voiced, and while her features were reserved the Enchanter actually reached out tucked a lock of the girl’s hair behind her ear like she was struck with the need to display some form of affection.

When Marehis finished with Ellie’s nails Madam de Fer displayed a neat little magical feat. The woman had Ellie hold out her hands while Vivienne called an ice spell into her own, holding the icy chill in the palms of her hands hovering just over the Herald’s for a short moment that sent the girl shivering ever so slightly but she smiled in surprise when she realized the act left her fingernail polish instantly set—she wouldn’t have to worry about accidentally ruining it or getting it on anything.

“Golly that’s so cool!” and her nose crinkled a bit as she smiled and said, “literally too I guess, thanks Vivienne.”

“Enough practice darling, and you’ll be doing that yourself soon enough.”

Surprisingly Ellie offered to tend Dorian’s nails next, he thought she’d return the favor for Marehis but he realized the woman’s nails were already done, and a lovely shade of pale pink, the Seeker’s as well though the woman hadn’t indulged in nail polish aside from the clear coating they’d used that made them shine. All in all, this was rather a lot more pleasurable than sitting in the cold huddled around a fire, exhausted and filthy and sober in the presence of drunken strangers. He was warm, clean, had a decent meal in him, and the cocoa wasn’t brandy by any means but it was wholly delicious—definitely Orlesian proper—and the Herald of Andraste was cleaning under and smoothing the jagged edges of his blessedly non-spooning fingernails surprisingly well.

Seeker Pentaghast seemed to be enjoying herself, but she did keep a careful eye on the time and she said, “I believe I should do a perimeter check—Marehis, would you join me?”

“Of course,” Marehis was quick to agree, though she did make certain, “do you need anything at all, Ellie?”

She shook her head, “Do you guys need any help?”

“No Eleanor, it is merely a precaution,” Cassandra said, “we have it well in hand.”

“If it isn’t too much trouble, maybe check in on the guys and Sera, yeah? I hope they’re having fun just…maybe not too much fun, I’d rather they not make themselves sick or get hurt or something.”

“Oh, I have every intention of disturbing their fun,” Cassandra assured her with a small, almost devious looking smile on her face as she and Marehis took their leave.

Madam de Fer started talking about Circle standards then, endeavoring to tout their ways to Dorian apparently, as if he might find his own upbringing inferior. It was apples and oranges, their differing Circle systems, and it was only further proven to him how horrendous mages were cared for outside the Imperium. He’d asked Ellie about her own experience in a Circle and Maker’s actual breath. Southerners were wholly barbaric in their handling of Mages, at least she hadn’t been sent to the bastardization of Circles that was popular in these parts and merely cast out though that…ugh. Was that…was that sympathy he was feeling? Absolutely disgusting emotion, he didn’t care for it, not at all. Even more so when he asked just how old the girl had been when she represented magically he nearly choked on his damn cocoa. Five was the last thing he expected to hear. That was dreadfully young for homelessness and magical awakening even by Imperium standards where magical children were purposely bred, everything in their upbringing made to encourage and nurture the spark of woken magic—he’d always lorded over later bloomers—peers who were eight, nine, ten years old (practically ancient to be discovering magic by Tevinter standards) his own Fade Dreaming in record time, his parents had been so very proud that he did so well within the same time his own father had in his youth.

“How absolutely dreadful I do so hate not being the most impressive person in the room,” he lamented humorously. “I was seven when I had my first Fade Dream, it was glorious! I was fed so many grapes—in my dream and as a congratulatory snack when I awoke of course. My parents saw to it I was accepted into the best Circle of course.”

Ellie looked bewildered by the thought, “Gosh that’s so little. Were you scared?”

Had she been when her magic surfaced? “Not in the slightest. It was all very exciting, a long-awaited rite of passage, I thrived on my education…until, of course, I got expelled for injuring another Magister’s son in a duel*,” he shared with a mischievous wink.

“Oh ouch, for both of you I suppose. Was he mean to you or something?”

“Not particularly,” Dorian returned lightly with a casual shrug. Not at all really. Dorian had merely been young, realized the aberrations in his design—he’d had quite the terrible crush, and lashed out at the boy. Not in some twisted form of flirtation. He’d tried to convince himself he didn’t feel the way he was feeling. Taking what was supposed to be nothing more than a friendly practice duel too far had, in hindsight, been his desperate attempt to stop liking the boy so very much by making an enemy of him. “I always aim to impress, I suppose I overdid it then, but as I’ve always adhered to the saying: go big or go home.”

That sent the girl wide eyed, slapping a hand over her mouth as she was struck with an absolute fit of giggling, it certainly seemed to strike her with even more amusement than he’d intended, like he’d struck a private cord with her he wasn’t in on. And then she seemed to find further humor in it with, “Well you did get expelled, so its more like go big and go home.”

“Ha, indeed it was,” he had to concede.

“My dear girl your cup is empty, as is the kettle,” Madam de Fer spoke up, “I was thinking I could do with a spot of tea before I retire, would you care for some?”

“Gosh, that’d be great,” Ellie agreed.

“I’ll be just a moment then,” the Enchanter said, taking up the tea pot. Though she did pause before setting foot outside, intoning, “I’ll be right outside, should you need anything Eleanor.”

“I’m good, thanks,” Ellie assured, and Vivienne leveled him a look that said if he so much as displaced a curl of this girl’s hair, she’d see him tied and quartered. Reasonable, he was a stranger after all. He nodded to her in acknowledgment and she left them.

“So Ellie, you traveled a lot in your time then. Varric tells me you’ve got quite the knack for picking up languages?”

“Enough to be polite, mostly. Antivan and Trade have always been my main languages though knowing Solas and Marehis, they’ve both taught me loads more Dalish. Tevene pleasantries and lots of words from the Chant of course, and I know some Ciriane—our Spymaster, Leliana, she’s Orlesian, and she’s offered to teach me more, not like as a class, I have loads of those, everyone’s always teaching me stuff, but she’s rather busy so she just mixes it in when we have meals together, it’s fun.”

He wasn’t sure he’d necessarily term learning outside the realm of his specific magical interests, ‘fun’. “You’re a disgustingly intelligent little thing aren’t you?”
Her eyes widened at that and she looked at him like…like he’d said something insulting and it hadn’t angered her so much as made her sad and she was a bit red-faced as she said, “Yeah I’m not the smartest.”

…not…the…but he’d said—? Had she taken the word ‘disgustingly’ the wrong way? “Ellie, it is a compliment, granted I did deliver it rather pithy—it means that you’re very bright, smart to the point I’m nauseated, likely with jealousy but it could be that anemia business you diagnosed me with,” he jested.

“Oh!” she said, like she’d just gotten it. “Thanks then, that’s sweet of you to say.”

Maker he was uncomfortable as he more seriously said, “You…Eleanor if I had meant it badly, you should have disputed it, better yet slapped me in the face or something, why…why ever would you think to agree?”

She shrugged seeming just as uncomfortable as he was. “I um…I dunno. I’m not like you or Vivienne, I’ve never been Circled, and there’s not much in the way of schooling when you’re just sort of scrambling from place to place.”

Ahh. “A lack of formal education hasn’t seemed to leave you an ignorant. And the Inquisition has been apparently endeavoring to make up for that what with ‘everyone always teaching you stuff’.”

She nodded. “There’s just…there’s some things I don’t know—well I mean there’s loads I don’t know,” she amended, “but there are…things that everyone, well almost everyone, just assumes I understand when I really haven’t the slightest clue about it. I’d…I think I’d like to learn if I could but…”

“But?” he prompted.

“I mean, almost everyone seems to think I know already, and if they find out I don’t…well I mean they’d have to just think I’m a total idiot.”

Ahh. He…well damn it all that had him feeling outright guilty. He’d quipped earlier, made fun when they first met that she didn’t understand her Mark at all, did she? Just wiggled her fingers and ‘poof’ Rift closed. Of course she didn’t understand it, Rifts, the Breach, her Mark were all foreign magical entities! He took her proficiency with her Mark as ‘she must not understand a single thing about it, and its sheer dumb luck the thing works for her’, but had her companions taken it as a sign she knew absolutely everything about how the Rifts and her Mark worked? The Elf, Solas, had mentioned something—Ellie too, about ‘Rift Magic’. Perhaps the Elf had some understanding of such things, and could teach her?

“Ellie, everyone has to learn everything they know, every single thing—no one just knows anything, not usually. If there’s something that would be impossible for you to have had the opportunity to learn, your friends can hardly think badly of you for not knowing about it, now can they?”

“…I guess not?”

“It’s not a guess, it’s a certainty. Not a single one of us would know even basic things like how to walk or to talk if we hadn’t been taught. It might surprise you Ellie, but I didn’t just pick up a staff one day and start casting Time magic. I had to be taught how to read, to understand mathematics, and logic, critical thinking, years and years of research atop it all, just to garner an understanding of the theory that might lend to making such a thing work.”
She was quiet for a moment, thoughtful, and then she squeezed his hands, “Thanks…I’ll…I dunno. I’ll think about it, asking if someone would teach me just…we’re kind of in the middle of a lot right now, and I don’t even know that learning would help with much of anything it hasn’t caused a problem, not really.”

“It’s your prerogative,” he said, but just, “but regardless, remember there’s no shame in being uneducated about something if you’ve never had the opportunity to learn. If you need help, your allies would surely help you.”

Ellie nodded, offering him a quiet but sincere, “Thanks.” And then, more brightly, “So. Your nails are all cleaned up, do you want in on some of my nail polish? Marehis got them for me while she was in Orlais.”

That was how Dorian Pavus, most recently of Minrathous, ended up sleeping in the Imperial Grand Enchanter’s tent, swaddled in a pile of cumulated fluffy blankets, tucked between the Herald of Andraste and an Elf named Sera, nails painted a glimmering swirl of different shades of blue reminiscent of the nights sky.

And Maker did he sleep, he didn’t rise until the smell of yet another delicious meal pulled him from his near comatose state, the tent was void of other occupants, and the clothing he’d left atop the requisition table was laying folded neatly at his feet, clean as promised, boots polished. He dressed and left Madam de Fer’s tent to the smell of coffee, bacon, eggs and warm bread.

Everyone was gathered around the fire and Ellie was sitting on the Iron Bull’s lap, bundled up and talking to Marehis who was seated beside them. It was the Herald who acknowledged his arrival first, greeting him cheerily and offering him the empty space in the Qunari’s line of sight saying she saved it for him in case he woke in time to join them all for breakfast. He had to admit he was grateful, the Qunari did certainly throw off a good deal of body heat.

“How’re you feeling?” she asked as he sat.

Feeling well. Better, news of which got him a relieved smile and the girl informed him, “Marehis wrote Adan for me while I was napping yesterday and he sent things um…he agrees your symptoms sound like anemia but it’s important to test just in case it’s something else so he sent along…oh thanks,” she said as Marehis offered up a small circular crystal with a long thin sharp point, the girl took it in hand, passing off her still full plate of breakfast for the Elf to hold a moment as the girl addressed Dorian, “I know it isn’t any fun and if you’d rather not…well I dunno, I’m sure we could find another way but this is something that will take just an itty bit of your blood to see if you’ve got low oxygen levels, and figure out what exactly you need to get better—if you only need vitamins and no iron, and we load you up on that particular mineral you can have some serious problems from that so it’s important to find out, you know?”

“You want me to stab myself with that thing?” he asked, mildly horrified.

“Oh gosh no, no stabbing, promise!” she said, “I’ve used things like this before, working with Ava she had one like this. I’d be very very careful, I’d just prick a finger and you’d be all done if that suits you. I could easily explain how to do it if you’d like to try it on yourself or have someone else do it.”

“…can’t I have breakfast before the Herald of Andraste asks my permission to stab me?”

“Oh gosh no, no stabbing, promise!” she said, “I’ve used things like this before, working with Ava she had one like this. I’d be very very careful, I’d just prick a finger and you’d be all done if that suits you. I could easily explain how to do it if you’d like to try it on yourself or have someone else do it.”

“You want me to stab myself with that thing?” he asked, mildly horrified.

“Oh gosh no, no stabbing, promise!” she said, “I’ve used things like this before, working with Ava she had one like this. I’d be very very careful, I’d just prick a finger and you’d be all done if that suits you. I could easily explain how to do it if you’d like to try it on yourself or have someone else do it.”

“…can’t I have breakfast before the Herald of Andraste asks my permission to stab me?”

“It’s best if you’ve been fasting a bit sorry, I’d have let you have a cup of coffee first otherwise,” she assured him. So he held out his hand and she came to crouch before him, implement in hand and indeed she was very careful as she took his hand and then casually, “Dorian, how big do you reckon the Iron Bull is?”

His eyes went wide, breath catching in his throat, he nearly choked on air before rasping out, “Fasta vass!”

And then she was giggling as she rose, examining the crystal that was glowing a vibrant shade of red at its circular base, “What? I mean how tall, what did you think I meant?” she asked all too innocently while she watched the thing shift from red to yellow. “Yup, somebody has an Iron deficiency.”

It struck him then she’d…she’d distracted him in some gambit that made him ignore whatever pain was involved in the process—he’d not even noticed her prick his finger in the slightest, it was over with before he realized, and she was already swabbing a little dab of Elf root tonic to clear away the minor wound she’d inflicted at the very tip of his right index finger. “Clever,” he allowed.

“Shit, Boss, just about gave the guy a heart attack,” the Iron Bull rumbled out laughingly.

“Sorry,” she apologized, holding out the cloth bag, “Here. Supplemental potions! These ones,” she retrieved one of the darker, purplish vials from bag, “You should take one, twice a day, with a meal until you run out. There’s plenty of everything if you’re hungry—eggs, bacon, rolls, Solas is working on chocolate chip pancakes—”

“Uh, they’re actually gonna turn out regular pancakes, Tumbles,” the Dwarf was regrettable to inform her, “don’t know what happened—I swear I had a whole boatload of them in my pack, laid eyes on them…huh before we made it into Redcliffe yesterday,” he looked up from the pan he was working over, “shit. I always go for Tevinter chocolate, Tumbles. I think time travel fucked with my chocolate connections somehow.”

“Wait, you’re telling me there’s no more chocolate with you? None at all?” Ellie asked in awe.

“All out,” he confirmed.

She groaned lamenting dramatically, “It’s official. Time magic does exist, and we are in the timeline the Maker abandoned.”

“Oh most assuredly,” Solas confirmed jovially, “is all hope lost then, da’len?”

“Yup! Let’s pack it in! We can officially call the Breach a lost cause!”

“Flissa did make apple butter,” Rainier spoke up, “I saw it in our stores last night. It’s not chocolate but it’d be right good on pancakes.”

Ellie perked up at that instantly, “Flissa! She really is the last beacon of hope against the Breach, Maker bless her—the Inquisition is back on!”

“Thank the Maker,” Cassandra drawled even as she smiled, wholly amused.

The potion was rather foul tasting, but he’d certainly tasted worse and at least once he’d knocked it back the Herald was handing him a plate piled high with bacon and an actual hill of eggs, and a warm roll, pouring him a mug of coffee she set at his feet for whenever he was ready for it before she resumed her own seat Marehis looking exceedingly amused as she handed her back her plate so she could finish eating.
The Herald began informing Dorian about their plans for the day—their spymaster, Leliana, had been in contact and was on her way now to meet them in the Hinterlands so she could assist their move forward. In the meantime, that left them the opportunity to make good on a promise she’d doled out to a Dalish man in Redcliffe, so she and most of her party were going to spend the day fulfilling that, though they should be back in the afternoon sometime.

“You stay here and rest, I wouldn’t want you getting hurt while you’re sick, and the more you have the chance to recuperate, the more likely you’ll be fit to come along when we confront Alexius,” Ellie explained, “no worries, I’ve asked the Iron Bull to stick around in case of an emergency—we’ve pretty well cleared the Hinterlands of threats but there’s always the occasional brush with bandits or wildlife,” she looked leaned back, the crown of her head resting against the Qunari’s chest as she looked up into his face, “Cremisius and I have a theory that you can take two, possibly three bears on all on your own.”

“Possibly three? Boss, rude. I can totally take on three bears. Blindfolded. And naked. That’s a legit Qunari position—fighting off three bears while blindfolded.”

“…Does ‘bears’ mean the same thing to Qunaris as it does to Humans or are we talking bears from the wilderness?”

Had…had that potion been some form of hallucinogen? Or was this conversation truly happening?

“Wilderness bears…but you know,” The Iron Bull shrugged, “people aren’t always down for wildlife battle sex. We adapt how we can.”

“Eleanor…” Cassandra asked, genuinely lost, “what would humans refer to as ‘bear’ other than the sort from the wilderness?”

Oh good heavens it was.

“It’s…a descriptive word for a type of man based on his physical appearance,” Ellie carefully explained, “Like, Thom was a total bear, with his beard and everything. I mean he still sort of is, just, not quite so much.”

“Billowing shirt, couple buttons popped…” the Iron Bull proposed.

“Oh totally!” Ellie agreed cheerily.

“Billowing unbuttoned shirts sound cold to me, I’ll pass thanks,” Rainier said.

“Well yeah here and now I’d definitely not recommend it but, you know, you ever want to put yourself out there with your visible jawline, dashing haircut, a billowing shirt wouldn’t be amiss,” Ellie informed him sagely.

Everyone began gathering their things—Seeker Pentaghast had been keeping an eye out toward the sky like she expected a messenger bird, and one did arrive, bearing a bundle of small scrolls, but apparently it wasn’t what she’d been waiting on necessarily as the Nevarran shared a look with Sera who sighed and said,

“Hey Inky, you’re gonna be taking that Dalish bloke around on Russel so it’s not like there’ll be room in the saddle for three—even if you let him ride on his own you and me would have to ride with someone else and that’s just not gonna fit good. And no offense but going to visit some lady I don’t knows grave just isn’t my jam. I think I’ll hang back and keep camp safe yeah?”
“Not a problem!” Ellie assured brightly, hugging the Elf, “I’ll miss you, but I’m grateful you’re staying to help hold down the fort, do you need anything before we head out?”

Sera sort of groaned at that, hugging the Human girl back tight. “Just be careful out there, you got it?” she looked to the adults gathering behind the Herald, raising an arm to point an index finger at the likes of Madam de Fer, Varric, Marehis, Solas, and Rainier, “You lot better keep Inky safe or there’ll be arrows everywhere! All up in your bits! And your pieces!” Ellie giggled at her threats, pulling away as she said,

“We’ll be all good, no worries.”

“I would stay as well,” Cassandra informed the Herald, “I have correspondence from Lady Josephine I should see to, and I should keep appraised to updates from Leliana.”

Ellie nodded. “Thanks so much for handling that, I hope it goes well, if you need my help with anything I promise to work with you when we get back.”

“We’ll be all good, no worries.”

“I would stay as well,” Cassandra informed the Herald, “I have correspondence from Lady Josephine I should see to, and I should keep appraised to updates from Leliana.”

Ellie nodded. “Thanks so much for handling that, I hope it goes well, if you need my help with anything I promise to work with you when we get back.”

“Eleanor, Marehis was going to ride along with myself—she’s of course free to my steed in my absence, and you are welcome to as well should you care to.”

Ellie smiled her thanks, rising up on tip toe to pull the Seeker into a hug.

The Herald led her following party members out of camp once their things were together and the mess from their breakfast was cleared. The Herald had potion to take too it seemed, Dorian’s stomach dropped a bit, the yellow hue reminiscent of potion for Depression Felix required in the wake of the Hurlock attack when he lost his mother to death and his father to tireless, crazed research, all atop the bleak fate he’d been given. She drank it quickly and did a last look around their camp to make sure everything was to rights, made certain Dorian had no need of anything—nothing at all, she checked and told him of just about every last thing in the entire world she could think of, what all food they had in their stores, things he could just pick up and eat as opposed to having to cook although she promised the Iron Bull would whip something up if he wanted something warm for lunch, where the type of kindling they used for signal fires was in the event they had an emergency, the war horn if there was a ‘super’ emergency, and if he had anything he wanted to write down, or anyone he wanted to write to, there was parchment, ink, everything on the requisition table he was welcome to. When she was done rattling off her list she delivered one of her hugs to him and wished him a pleasant day before she and the others took their leave.

“I do believe I’ve been adopted by an orphan,” he said as her party disappeared from view.

“That’s pretty much how it goes down here,” the Iron Bull assured him.

“Inky’s just like that,” Sera said. “You’ll get used to it.”

He wasn’t certain he would, he still didn’t think he was going to stick around…not that he had anywhere in mind he could particularly go but this was all still strange to him.

“Armor didn’t come in yet?” the Iron Bull offered, it sounded like a guess, to the Elf.

She sighed. “No. Friggin Harriet said it’d be in—”

“The Inquisition’s Master Blacksmith is a busy man, though as you are a member of the Herald’s party, actively out in the field, he did assure me your requisition was bumped to the top of his list, he and his assistants are working on it,” Cassandra assured, “your armor will arrive soon enough, before the day is out I’m certain. As it is, if you allow me a moment to handle this,” she said, motioning with the hands that held the correspondence she’d received from the messenger bird, “I do believe we’ve been presented with a rather fortuitous opportunity to attempt the training I promised you, should you wish.”

“Oh yeah…” the Elf seemed uncertain for a moment before she seemed to steel herself with determination, “you got it! Do your writey thing! I’m…gonna run around, yeah? That’s all good innut?”

“Certainly, Sera, just be mindful of your surroundings, stay near camp if you would, I’ll call on you once I’ve finished.”

“Sweet!” the Elf had actually meant run around, the girl set racing off from their camp, up the hill toward the lake. Running…for…fun or…needlessly, without being given chase. How absolutely bizarre.

Well, she could do enough of that for all of them, for all Dorian cared, he was…well he was certainly feeling better, but he had been given the day to rest and he was still admittedly weary. Madam de Fer had not said he could not return to the bedroll and blankets he’d been allotted last night, so he returned to the Enchanters tent and had a bit of a lie-down. A lie-down, that turned into him sleeping the entire morning away. He was roused again by the smell of food Fasta vass. He sighed and stretched, before pulling himself out of the swaddle of blankets he’d buried himself in. When he emerged from the tent, the Iron Bull was flipping cuts of chicken in a frying pan, the Elf Sera and Seeker Cassandra nowhere in sight.

“Good, you’re up. Take a seat, lunch’ll be ready soon. Everyone’s still out but Marehis sent word when they reached the southern camp, they’ll be back before dinner,” the Iron Bull greeted. Then, as Dorian did take the offered seat across the campfire from the Qunari, he said, “Just a heads up, Boss girl thinks she’s real slick, leaving me behind, but I know what’s good. Kid’s a bit of a matchmaker, fair warning, she’s definitely trying to set us up.”

“…I quite assure you, you mean mismatch-maker,” Dorian drawled, “You may have mage allies here, but I know well what you Qunari do to Mages in your ranks. You’d likely prefer me bound and leashed.”

“I’d buy you dinner first,” the Iron Bull assured him.

“Hopefully before you sewed my mouth shut.”

“Depends on how much you keep yapping,” the Iron Bull chuckled and then, “It’s a thing, just don’t encourage her. Solas and Marehis—she doesn’t know that worked out, so if you see something, keep it to yourself, they’re trying to keep it on the down-low, they don’t want Ellie putting herself in danger trying to score her bodyguard alone time with her boyfriend.” Ahh. he’d wondered what that woman got up to—when she returned from assisting the Seeker in a ‘perimeter check’ while he was certain the Seeker had genuinely done a security check, the Elf on the other hand had to placate Ellie’s concern at her state with a claim that she’d tripped in the dark and fallen, she was rosy cheeked, and her lips bitten bruising and she kept her sleep shirt with a sleeve hanging off one shoulder, so the other side rode up on her neck a ways. Huh. He hadn’t pegged Solas as the sort to indulge in the fine art of ‘hickies’, but these were certainly strange times, time travel, holes in the veil and all that, too he hadn’t thought the Herald of Andraste’s nanny the sort to…well she’d obviously brushed them off but there was some lingering dirt on the knees of her sleep pants. Good on them. “Then uh…well Krem said she’s been working on Inquisition’s Commander, Cullen, setting him and the Seeker up, and the dude just started writing her on this trek out from Haven so…kid’s already two for two.”
“Krem…short for Cremisius?” Dorian deduced, “The Herald’s ‘friend who is also a boy and they like each other a lot’?”

“Yup, that’s him lucky little bastard. Ellie deadass was ready to set him up with someone too.”

“But he would rather be with the matchmaker, than matchmade. Fair enough,” Dorian said, seeing fit to warn him, “You’ll want to keep your eye on that. Flowers, a scarf. If you see the lady Herald with a new pair of gloves or Maker forbid binding ribbons, well—those are followed up with engagement rings.”

“…what the fuck do gloves, and ribbons have to do with marriage?”

“Tevinter courting ritual—a long affair, several steps along the way but it starts with flowers to denote interest…scarves aren’t usually brought out so soon though so that’s albeit worrisome—those are more sexual in nature, if you aren’t careful you’ll end up with little Tevinter-Herald tots running underfoot.”

“Not uh…not what dude meant by it. He wouldn’t be pushing sex so soon with Boss girl, she just gets cold as shit real easy, and the guy knows how to knit. Flower thing just happened back before he even thought about pursuing her—granted Chargers were taking the piss out of him, teasing about his ‘little girlfriend’, I might have mentioned she’d had a rough time, been real down for a few days, guy sent along a paper flower to cheer her up. Plus Krem could give a flying fuck about Tevinter courting rituals, he’s not exactly brimming with patriotism.”

Ahh, that was fair enough too, he supposed. Sopporati were not given much benefit from their nationality, after all.

It was sandwiches, the Iron Bull was preparing, warm chicken between halved rolls. It was entirely plebeian, eating with ones hands something too large to be considered a finger food, but he was hardly going to complain. Not genuinely, he did let the Qunari know this was a meal fit for peasants, it got him another threat to sew his mouth shut with his sandwich crammed between his ‘flapping gums’. How delightful. The man piled two plates with food after passing off Dorian his meal and left him to take lunch to the Seeker and Sera who were apparently off training—not too far from where they’d set up their bonfire last night, that desolate, ruined fort, Calenhad’s foothold he called it.

He was half tempted to return to the sanctuary of his bedroll but now that felt more like hiding than resting. He wasn’t tired anymore, but he wasn’t sure what to do with himself.

What resulted, was a game of chess, between he and the Qunari. Dorian had decided to stretch his legs and ventured out of bounds just up the hill to the lake when the Iron Bull found him, offering a friendly game to pass the time. There was a board tucked away in the Inquisition’s stores, so they set up, seated on the grassy bank. Most of the pieces were present—though several pawns and the white mage was missing, the black tower as well, but they replaced those with small stones from the wealth found along the waterside, though that led to bickering over which piece was which and to whom they belonged.

“Checkmate.”

“That’s a pawn, Sparky,” the Iron Bull ground out, “they don’t move like that, you can’t checkmate my Arishok.”

“I quite assure you, that is a Mage, and we do indeed move like that. The Arishok is dead.”
The Iron Bull growled at that. “Rematch. More distinctive rocks this time.”

“If you wish to muck about in the mud in search for more distinctive rocks, then by all means, be my guest.”

“Not sure if you’re lazy like any other aristocratic dick, or you just wanna look at my ass.”

“Can it not be both?” Dorian returned.

“Eww get a room you two! Yer out in the middle of the friggin wilderness, the little nugs can see you and everything!”

Ahh. “Sera, how lovely of you to join us,” Dorian drawled, “care for a game of chess?”

“Piss off with that noise, chess is straight boring, blek,” the girl groused, dropping onto her bottom with a weary sigh.

“Rough day, Ser’? Seeker run you ragged?” the Iron Bull asked. Huh. He almost felt sympathetic for the Elf, she looked exhausted. Was that a thing now? Instant sympathy for any and all downtrodden? When had that happened? Ahh. Well. He supposed that came with the territory of having been the very definition of downtrodden. Still, he didn’t like it, not at all.

Seeker Pentaghast herself came to join them, coming to stand at Sera’s side, placing a hand on the Elf’s shoulder, squeezing as she commended, “Sera did admirably.”

“Friggin just about killed me!” the Elf complained.

“And you still live, admirable indeed,” the Seeker jested lightly but then in all seriousness, “have you need of anything, Sera? More water, or potion? Something to eat?”

The Elf stretched her arms overhead, legs flinging out before her as she flopped onto her back. “I need a ruddy nap! When’s Inky coming back?”

“Do you always nap with the Herald?” Dorian asked, jovially cautioning the Iron Bull, “This Cremisius best look out, perhaps our young rogue friend has her eyes on laying claim to little Ellie’s heart?”

That had Sera sitting bolt upright, and for an instant his mind panicked, like perhaps her throwing her hand forth to jut an index finger at him would send an unfriendly spell flying his way as she shouted, “You watch your rotten mouth you friggin wank! Inky done taught me cookies—she’s like my proper little mum so mixing bits just isn’t on ever! Don’t be making me wanting to nap with her sound dirty—I like girls plenty that doesn’t mean I wanna shag them all. Friends is friends.”

Ahh. Yes he’d certainly stepped in it hadn’t he? He loathed the misconception that his sexuality leant to finding any and all men desirable. Granted he wasn’t entirely choosey at the worst of times, but he wasn’t predatory by any means. “I do apologize, that was unworthy.”

“Quite,” Seeker Pentaghast assured him, then to Sera, “I’m certain Eleanor will be back soon enough. I’m sure if you laid down now, you would rally in time to greet her.”

“Oh frick, yeah!” Sera rose up onto her feet, satisfied at the prospect, “You lot have fun playing with your whatchers,” she bid them as farewell before trudging her way back to camp.

“You laying down too Seeker or are you up for a game?” the Iron Bull offered. “Sparky here owes me a rematch, but you can play me next.”

“Is it not customary for the next opponent to play the victor?” Dorian questioned.

“Like I said,” the Iron Bull replied, “she can play me next.”

“Very well,” the Seeker agreed, seeming almost amused as she came and sat alongside them to watch, “do, proceed.”

Dorian did end up watching them play next. Damn Qunari was a surprisingly formidable foe, far far too clever.

“Boss’s back—we’re up here, chess match, me versus Seeker, and yeah, it’s about as hot as you think it is,” the Iron Bull rumbled out for...huh Dorian thought he’d heard some ruckus below, he supposed the Qunari was speaking to assure their Elf friends who could in turn inform the others their camp hadn’t been abandoned. Though his words earned him a derisive grunt from the Seeker even as she took his Mage. “Everyone’s headed our way. Imekari too, she’s just gotta take a beat. Private minute.”

Everyone indeed, the whole of their returned party joined them, sans their youngest members. “Shit, Seeker,” Varric said as he got a good look at the chessmatch underway, “you uh, haven’t played in a while, huh?”

“However you’ve got the board figured out, flip it,” Bull said, eyes trained on the board as he considered his next move carefully, “Seeker’s got me on a run for my money, I’m pretty well fucked.”

“Ahh, yes it would seem as such if I’m deciphering your more creative pieces correctly,” Solas agreed.

“How did it go? All is well, I trust?” Cassandra asked as she took the Iron Bull’s ‘Tamassran’ earning her a quiet growl.

“Indeed,” Marehis confirmed, “it was all very nice, we had pleasant journeys save the one brush with bandits trying to reclaim the southern territory the Inquisition cleared of mercenaries for themselves. It has been dealt with.”

“Tumbles made a grown man cry with all her sentiment, paying respect to dude’s wife,” Varric said, sounding amused over it.

“Well she was his wife, Varric,” Cassandra chided.

“I’m talking about Sarge. Had to get the bastard a handkerchief.”

“Allergies, Dwarf,” Rainier insisted.

“It was admittedly rather moving,” Madam de Fer said. “Have the Advisors perhaps considered offering sermons from the Herald? Mother Giselle preaches marvelously on holydays in Haven but a little message delivered by Eleanor when there are noble allies visiting could attract the right attention.”

“I’ll pass along the suggestion to Lady Montilyet, if Eleanor is agreeable,” Cassandra allowed, “much is asked of her in Haven as it stands and she may not feel comfortable with such a task.”
The adults were all startled then, chess board knocked into disarray as the Iron Bull and Seeker shot to their feet, even Dorian could hear Ellie’s high-pitched shrieking but then there were giggles echoing up from their camp followed by Ellie and Sera bounding up the hillside…what in heavens—

“I’m free! I’m free!” Ellie exclaimed as she ran with Sera chasing after. The girl was stripping off her overcoat and left it lay on the hillside as she worked with the clasps of her armored tunic, “the flood has ended! Peace has returned to the lands!”

The Herald of Andraste stripped herself topless, shucked off her boots socks and all, bare feet slapping against the nearest dock before she launched herself—cannonballed—into the lake clad only in her breast band and leggings, a cackling Sera following after wholly naked, clothing abandoned along the dock before she jumped into the lake after her friend, giggling like mad the pair of them as they started a splash war of sorts.

“Eleanor!” the Seeker cried, startled.

“Da’vehnan, you’ll catch your death!” Marehis chastised, albeit half-heartedly, pleased to see the girl having such fun.

“Tumbles fell into monthlies with a splash,” Varric supposed, “I guess it’s only fitting she end it with one.”

“And now you’re most certain she can swim,” Cassandra said, sounding somewhat amused, though she did threaten, “honestly Varric you’re horrible influence, if she catches chill I’ll cast you into the lake myself while you sleep.”

Ahh. Monthlies. Perhaps that was what inspired the Herald’s bossy attitude.

The girl, however, had backstroked her way to the shore near the bit of land in the center of the lake, where there was a crumbling archway and…the most spectacularly colorful Ram—had that been there the whole time? Was he hallucinating?

If he was, it was shared. The moment the Herald caught sight of the thing she rolled to float on her stomach before finding her footing, standing half out of the water, she whipped the great mass of her dripping wet hair over her shoulder, slapping against her back as she said, “Oi! Lord Whoolsy I presume? You can’t just run off like that—Mister Jim is terribly worried, and he misses you something awful!” she ordered firmly as she pointed, arm raised toward the direction of Redcliffe, “Get on with you then, home!” Ahh.

The Ram ‘baa’d at her before splashing its way along the shallow part of the lakebed to gallop across the little bridge, and past the Herald’s party, disappearing down the path to home.

At least all the excitement worked in the Iron Bull’s favor, in that their game pieces had been knocked out of place, the Seeker very smugly accepting to call it a tie as they all knew just who was really going to win that match, her victory needn’t be declared in full. The Herald and Sera clambered up out of the water—Maker preserve him he got way too much of Sera’s business burned into his brain, the Elf just meandered her way out of the lake, around their gathered group, to get to where she’d left her string of clothing, Marehis had taken up the Herald’s armored tunic and laid the thing over Ellie’s shoulders as she came to shore, the Elf woman hugging the girl into her side, insisting they needed to get her warmed up and dried off.

The Dwarf, Varric had apparently lost some such bet or another—something between he and Solas, over just how many interferences they’d deal with during their mission that day. Varric Tethras, ever the optimist, expected hell and highwater to impede their journey as they had nothing but good, peaceable intentions for the day and the Maker usually had a sense of irony about that, whereas Solas was certain they may have to put up something of a fight, but they’d secured the Hinterlands rather soundly. So the Dwarf ended up having to prepare their dinner. Alone, as was the deal they struck, and it was amusing enough no one seemed to much mind how long it would take the man to cook enough for all of them. Madam de Fer took the opportunity to retreat into her tent and freshen up. The much-awaited armor of Sera’s had arrived as the girl napped, and Marehis and Cassandra were in a tent with her, helping her don it, teaching her how to do so on her own and the like Dorian supposed, she’d apparently never owned armor before. The Iron Bull and Solas had taken up a game of chess between themselves by the campfire, Ranier sitting by and watching their match, prepared to take on whoever won, while Varric cooked. Dorian ended up falling victim to yet another Inquisition courtesy of a very question-filled Herald.

About slavery of all things. The girl wanted to know every last thing about Tevinter’s slave-system. How it worked, how did one end up enslaved, how were they treated, were their legal protections in place that kept masters from being overtly cruel to those indentured to their service, and just how, exactly, could one get out, earn their freedom?

“Well, it varies, case to case.”

“What about when someone sells themselves into slavery? Like in exchange for paying off debt?” Ellie proposed.

“Ahh. Well. A master pays off the debts of the slave and in return that person is bound to their service until their debt is repaid, after which they can earn their freedom. Of course mind, its rather the slippery slope. Once indentured, a master takes over care of their servant—housing them, clothing them, feeding them, caring for them when they fall ill. Such things rack up further expenses which only further indebts them you see and…well, it is customary that, like when one takes on debt to a bank, there is a matter of interest added, to make money lost to providing for their slaves back with added profit via free labor. However there are sometimes exceptions I suppose, if a particular servant shows promise—there was once a slave freed from her captivity when a Marquis visited a their Tevinter friend’s home and fell madly in love with a slave woman. It was the talk of court for months.”

“She got freed cause some Marquis married her?” Ellie asked.

“Certainly not, but the Marquis was able to petition his friend to forgive her debts to him personally—meaning forgiveness for anything her master spent on her upkeep. With the time she worked already, the debt that got her enslaved in the first place was more than repaid. She was freed and then yes, I do believe they married.”

“So…someone like a Marquis could petition a Magister for a slave’s freedom?”

“A Magister? Oh heavens no, not in the slightest. In their case, the owner was a Laetan fellow. Not all powerful Tevinter’s are Magisters mind you, in that case it is rather unheard of, petitions being considered, save from family or fellow Magisters.”

“Oh…Dorian…you’re a Magister aren’t you?”

“No,” he insisted wearily, “I am an Altus. My father, however, is a Magister.”

“Do you happen to know a Magister Tilani?”

“…” “I certainly do. Everyone knows Maevaris Tilani, there’s not a Magister, goodness, I daresay even the gentry know well of her. She’s quite the reputation—"

“You keep Maevaris Tilani’s name out of your damn mouth, Pavus,” Varric Tethras snapped, as he looked up from the pot he was stirring.

“I quite assure you I’m no enemy of Maevaris. We are allies after a fashion. I hold no disrespect for the lady, I quite assure you.”

“Varric, what’s up?” Ellie asked, questioning the Dwarf’s defensiveness.

“Maevaris is like uh…she was designated male at birth but came out as a woman when she was about your age, her parents rolled right with it, but Tevinter’s all sorts of fucked up about that, it was a pretty big deal for a Magister’s kid, let alone the kid that took over as Magister once her father passed. But she’s out, proud of it.” That was indeed the case but Dorian wasn’t certain how Varric knew so very much about it, cared so very much about it…huh, well she had caused quite a stir both in Tevinter and Dwarven circles as well, possibly those top-side like Varric, but certainly in Ozamaar. Still.

“Oh!” Ellie chirped.

“Well that, and the rather scandalous affair surrounding her marriage,” Dorian saw fit to mention. “She attempted to marry the Dwarven Merchant representative to Tevinter, from Orzamaar, a man—given that her gender identity, despite her Magister status, goes unrecognized by the government—their marriage wasn’t legally recognized. That certainly didn’t stop them from combining their wealth, signing him into her estate, and she into his, living as man and wife.”

“Didn’t stop a lot of shit,” Varric commented darkly. Ahh. Yes. Thorold’s death, despite what his death certificate said, was certainly no accident. Not at Maevaris’s hand most assuredly, even Thorold’s family was certain, no, the woman loved that man even now, such a way she ached with his loss. He’d been assassinated plain and simple, for the threat he posed to the status quo. Huh. Thorold…his last name was just on the very tip of his tongue, what was it again? Te…Teth…”Why you asking questions about Maevaris, kid?” Varric asked.

“I…there’s someone I know,” Ellie said, “a friend, that sold themselves to Magister House Tilani. I just wanted…I dunno, it’s complicated.”

Ahh. Bit of misfortune that. He found himself wishing he could be of some assistance, at the most maybe he could seek Maevaris connect Ellie with her enslaved friend, give the girl assurances that they were alright—while slavery was admittedly not an ideal life situation, Maevaris was not a cruel mistress. More than that he could not do, he owed the woman far too much as it was, he was in no position to seek further favor from her.

But perhaps Dorian Pavus, gift to Humanity, was not the ally the Herald needed in this situation.

“Tumbles. Don’t shit yourself,” Varric cautioned with a wide set grin, “but Maevaris Tilani is my cousin*.”

*While it is not explicitly stated, it is implied that the relationship is likely a cousin due to the reference to a family connection.
Do you think, perhaps, Eleanor may not know how to read?

Cassandra had never considered such a possibility. In fact it was impossible—Eleanor had duties she’d fulfilled to the Inquisition that required her ability to read, correspondence, requisitions, the like. But as she called those examples to mind there was the ever-present fact that Eleanor had never once, done such a thing on her own, it was always with the assistance of Cassandra herself, or another member of her party. The Seeker had always thought it a mark of maturity on the girl’s part—that she knew well she did not know everything and was seeking the guidance of those she could trust to help her as such. Now she worried it…surely Eleanor was not illiterate!

Oh but what if she was? So much would be lost to her, in opportunity and accessibility if she went the whole of her life incapable of reading…of writing, goodness! Could she even sign her own name? They had never required as such since… technically while yes, they did have an agreement with Eleanor, terms of her employment, pay she received, benefits of working with the Inquisition, she was not of an age to strike a legal agreement. Given the miraculous circumstances, she had to work for the Inquisition, but it was through mutual understanding, nothing binding. They’d worked, the advisors and Cassandra, to create a contract for Eleanor to sign once she was of age, something that would cement the promises the Inquisition made to her for her role.

If she did not know such things it was vital she learn. The girl thrived in her tutelage, the ability to read, to write would only further her opportunity to do so! And too there was the realm of reading that allowed for leisure, relaxation—Cassandra loved to read, and it was horrific the idea that the girl was incapable of knowing the joy of casting one’s personal worries aside to delve into the planned out, plotted strife of fiction, something that guided you to a resolution, usually a happy ending, but always something satisfying that took your mind off of real-world troubles that may have no such end. It horrified Cassandra that the girl had not the ability to lose herself, cast away her own troubles to seek refuge in the passage of a book. Reading had always been the barest bit of salvation throughout Cassandra’s life. Maker it had gotten her through so much…when their parents were lost, and she and her brother were cast into the care of strange relatives, her heart did not ache quite so much, her mind did not burn with the fear and trepidation of traversing a future without her parents when Antony would slide into her bed, hold her closely as he read to her, book after book, things of all sorts from children’s books to texts and tomes he required for schooling—upon reflection she realized her brother had been so busy looking after her, he did not often get opportunity to properly study, and had made up for it by reading his texts aloud to her until she fell asleep, there were a handful of times she’d woken in the night to find him hunched over his desk, poring over his school work by lamplight, kept low eyes straining to see but not daring cast something brighter that would risk waking her. and when he was lost to her, she found her brother again when she holed up in her bedchamber focusing solely on the words on the pages of the storybooks they once shared. And when she pursued her training to become a Seeker, up until her work with the Inquisition even to this day, she often found herself so busy she could not spare more than a short moment for relaxation, and reading was always a reliable source for such. If…if Eleanor did not have the ability to do so herself, well that wouldn’t do at all.

She wanted to be absolutely certain before she made any such accusation. Eleanor…recently she had been expressing more and more an insecurity in her own intelligence, in a way that alarmed Cassandra to be honest.

I’m not totally stupid!

Think its stupid? Fine! Think I’m stupid? Whatever!

And then there had been that awful evening on the Coast, when Eleanor was still fresh from Rainer’s betrayal. Cassandra had woken in the night to find the Herald no longer tucked between she and Sera, in fact when she first woke, she thought the girl was there—someone was snoring directly into her ear, slobbering drool onto her shoulder and an arm haphazardly thrown to lay across Cassandra’s face. All Sera, and the Herald was nowhere in sight.

Cassandra found the girl sitting atop the hill over camp, alongside the now dormant occularm, cloak pulled tight around her, hood overhead, face buried in the arms that held her knees curled up into her chest, quaking with sobs. When Cassandra placed a hand on her shoulder to alert her to the Seeker’s presence, the girl had gasped, head snapping up to look at her, eyes red and face tear stained, the girl had brushed her hands across her cheeks so fiercely as if she thought if she rubbed hard enough she could rid all evidence, even the observation itself, that she’d been crying entirely.

“I-I’m sor-” the girl fell silent save the squeak of a suppressed sob when Cassandra knelt in the cold grass to the girl close, into her lap, hold her fast and fierce. The sound of the girl’s despair had twisted knots in Cassandra’s stomach, fear alive in her veins as she worried the struggle to breath through her sobbing, the sniffling that was building thicker and persistent would send the girl sick again, that her sorrow and the wet chill would send the girl sick again. But what was even more concerning to Cassandra now was the declaration, “I’m such an idiot! He- he- I just…I just took him at his word, never qu-questioned, never thought there was anything off b-but Varric did! He knew we co-couldn’t trust him and I didn’t believe him I’m sorry Cassandra, I’m so so sorry!”

She did not wish to embarrass the girl by flat out assuming she was illiterate, questioning her to her face as such may only cement any idea the girl had that her companions felt her ignorant. So, Cassandra began investigating, carefully. Lady Montilyet verified that she had never assigned Eleanor any sort of reading for their lessons. Neither had Solas, the man himself confirmed with her when she asked, masking her questions as mere interest in teaching technique—perhaps Eleanor would understand some element of fighting better through manuals on the subject, she said.

Cassandra continued her investigation. Eleanor’s clear afternoon the day before they left Haven made for an excellent excuse to invite the girl to read with her—she’d hoped such a thing would verify Eleanor’s abilities one way or the other and create the opportunity to assist her, let her know it was no character flaw to not have had the same opportunities as everyone else, that if she desired to learn to read, she could be taught.

Her heart had sank when the girl claimed to be feeling unwell, though it did not come off like a lie from her lips, and Cassandra had felt the weary trembling in the girl’s frame as she returned her to the Lieutenant, the young man had obviously seen something of concern, had immediately seen her to her cabin to rest. Cassandra…she wasn’t certain if perhaps the girl was feeling some sort of nerves at the prospect of admitting an incapability she found embarrassing, or if she had just truly been stricken with the exhaustion and pains this time of the month was bringing her.

She had gone to Sera, on the matter as well, but the Elf was of no help one way or the other. She claimed her ‘doodlin’ wasn’t a big deal, she didn’t really need a reason for anything she took it into her head to do did she? And it wasn’t any of Cassandras ‘stinking’ business anyway, apparently. So.

Dinner provided the perfect opportunity. Everyone was agreeable to a full-party meal, something that enticed Eleanor to join them, put her at ease, let her be secure in the fact that she was surrounded by friends and allies, and then she offered a test of sorts.
Relief was rich in her blood when Eleanor was immediately agreeable to the game, no hesitation, no discomfort at all with the workings of Wicked Grace—so tenuous and taxing was the innerworkings of Wicked Grace, fully literate people struggled with it, surely she could not even begin to weather the trappings of the game without some basic knowledge on how to read the cards she dealt.

Though Eleanor’s claims of finding preference in the pictures on the cards did cause some confusion of fact and evidence, Cassandra was confident enough in her findings, and that was only further encouraged by their strange Tevinter allies. That Felix—he’d passed Eleanor a note, and when she gathered her party she immediately set to the Chantry with certainty, and Felix had commended her for following his written instruction. And then that Dorian had shown her another missive penned by Alexius’s son, and Eleanor had read aloud the date and time, confirmed Felix’s signature. The girl could read most certainly, and Cassandra felt almost foolish for believing otherwise in the first place. Perhaps…oh. perhaps the girl simply did not enjoy reading. That was unfortunate, but certainly less so than Eleanor being wholly illiterate.

Though that did raise some very minor concern, Cassandra was careful when she received her mail, to keep their sender’s name from view of the girl, keep the growing bundle out of sight. Letters…not quite daily but almost as often. Of course, it was ridiculous, they worked together, Eleanor would have no reason to question Cullen and Cassandra corresponding but she…it was not a secret, not like Marehis and Solas, she did not fear the girl would be put to harm attempting to further intervene, but it was more that…it wasn’t like Marehis and Solas. Cullen had caught her ear before they left Haven, asked if he could write her while she was away, and she saw no reason not to agree so…she had. She’d expected the man merely seeking to keep her up to date on his wellbeing, the work he was getting done in her absence, and he did but…well often the letters were merely personal rather than work related it seemed. Informing her of his day, asking after hers, after Eleanor’s, sharing…it seemed the man was endeavoring to only send along something he could tack some interesting anecdote to, a humorous occurrence in his day, some fond memory called to mind from his youth, or his time training to be a Templar, all of which enticed Cassandra to return the favor, sharing and shared alike. Getting to know one another more intimately without the awkwardness that could occur in spoken word, face to face. It was…wholly ideal and they were certainly…Cassandra was unsure. Coworkers, friends, building upon something with a potential for more. But until more was established Cassandra did not wish to get Eleanor’s hopes up. If the girl thought that they had coupled, were together, she would be truly elated, but devastated if their pairing did not work out, ended before it even began so. She kept her newfound inflow of correspondence to herself, for now.

“You’re very smiley, did you have a good day?” Eleanor asked as she knelt onto her bedroll and scooted to snuggle in close to Cassandra who, as soon as she heard movement outside their Inquisition tent, quickly folded up the letter she’d been reading, the latest from Cullen, tucking it away in the pack next to her bedroll with one hand while her arm came up around Eleanor’s shoulders, resting her chin atop the girl’s freshly conditioned hair—she’d been made to bathe after her day of traveling to the Dalish grave and back, and her impromptu swim—that had made it into the letter Cassandra penned the Commander, sent off just after dinner, he would certainly be delighted by the girl’s mischief.

“I did indeed. Your day was well, Eleanor?” the girl nodded, sighing contentedly. “Good.”

“What’d you do all day while we were gone?” Eleanor asked, “The Iron Bull said everything was quiet, safe I think he meant.”

Cassandra was keeping Sera’s training in confidence—it was Sera’s business alone, and she was…she was truly frightened of magic, absolutely terrified, which lent to the Elf’s lacking confidence that their lessons would bear success, but Cassandra had born witness to more than even evidence that the girl would succeed. Sera had trained tirelessly, of her own volition—at every point that the Seeker offered her reprieve, the girl dug in and pressed further, she did not stop until Cassandra made the point that if she wore herself out too much she would risk sleeping through Eleanor’s return to camp, perhaps be too weary to make play with the girl if she was in the mood to unwind after a day of traveling for such bleak purposes as graveside visits. Maker it was strange, but she was unspeakably proud of that girl, of Sera. It was a sort of training similar to that which she received to become a Seeker, arduous, required a great deal of focus and endurance, meant to master fear, and learn and understand magic one could not wield themselves, to be able to perceive it being used, understand what was about to happen as a mage began to cast, and if need be, suppress magical attempts against oneself. Going into her lesson she feared Sera would not be suitable to the task—not through any inherent fault, not necessarily, the girl, for what she lacked in polishing, was not an imbecile—the act of magic is to tap into the power of the Fade in order to question reality itself, rendering the real mutable and therefore be able to be reshaped—where there was no fire, fire appears, what once was penetrable is now shielded by an invisible force.
Magical suppression requires the reinforcement of reality and impervious nature of the world—
Cassandra had initially believed Sera would find difficulty mastering a task that required a mind focused and grounded in the sense of what was real, the girl operated on a constant tangent of nonsensical fun…but she knew what was real. Perhaps that was the very reason she was a consistent source of levity, she knew all too well the truth of reality and sought to unburden herself from it as often as possible.

Calenhad’s Foothold was where they sealed one of the Rifts, a place where the Veil had once been torn, and while mended was left thinned. According to Solas, the Fade was very near in this place, so much so when they last made camp in the area the man had spent a night Fade Dreaming in the ruins. It was the perfect place to begin Sera’s training, a place where magic was not in use, but it was so entangled with the unbalance in reality the Fade could cause that it allowed the girl to practice in steeling her mind, focusing on the real, and suppressing the Fade’s influence, following Cassandra’s example.

All in all, it had gone remarkably well, and in time, Sera would have a comfortable amount of knowledge surrounding the workings of magic that would allow her to be more fearless in the face of it and be able to protect herself from it.

Ahh, but Eleanor’s question deserved some answer. “Lady Josephine wrote in regard to your new dealings with Alexius, arrangements have been made for you to meet with him in Castle Redcliffe, Leliana left immediately after our reports came in to Haven on the turn out of your meeting with Enchanter Fiona. She will be in soon with plans to move forward.”

“All by herself?” the girl worried, “Should we go meet up with her do you think, catch her halfway?”

“Leliana will be fine, she’s more than capable of handling herself, and too the ways we travel as a large group are different than the paths and shortcuts she’ll be capable of using traveling on her own. She should be in sometime tomorrow.”

But in the night, as Cassandra, Eleanor, Marehis and Sera laid sleeping their Inquisition tent, a hand slipped over Cassandra’s mouth, startling her awake, her heart pumped wildly in panic quelled by the overlap of her eyes opening to see her intruder—just a moment quick enough to stop herself from striking—and Eleanor’s sleepy hum and surprised,

“Hmm…oh! Leliana!”
“Leliana?” Marehis croaked out, half asleep, almost parroting the name as she held Ellie more tightly, mumbling, “Go back to sleep da’len.”

Sera snorted up a snore, sitting bolt upright in her bedroll, “Wuss’on?”

“My apologies,” the Spymaster said, as she removed her hand from Cassandra’s mouth, “I did not intend to wake everyone.”

But she had woken Eleanor. And now the girl was up, the motion jarring Marehis fully awake to find Eleanor on her knees, hugging a crouching Leliana tightly, a happy little hum of effort as she squeezed and then, “I’m so glad you made it in okay—were you safe? Did you run into any trouble—you’re not hurt are you?”

“I was able to travel undetected Eleanor, I’m perfectly fine, thank you.”

“Oh gosh, thank you for coming—are you hungry?”

“Not at all.”

“Have you eaten in the last twelve hours—a meal?” Eleanor specified.

Ahh. The answer to that was, apparently, no. This led to a camp-wide midnight snack—Leliana woke Eleanor, she woke Marehis and Sera, the culmination of Eleanor and Marehis being awake roused Solas who tripped over Varric, waking Dorian who was invited on the Dwarf’s behalf to bunk with them. The Iron Bull woke as soon as he heard someone enter their camp, had some foresight that the woman would inevitably wake the Herald and fall victim to the girl’s need to make sure no one in her line of sight went hungry. He was already setting about putting something together when they emerged from their tent. Madam de Fer even joined them, greeting Leliana amicably and asking after Lady Josephine.

“She is well, Cullen has promised to ensure she sleeps—between our problems here in the Hinterlands and expanding cooking, serving, and medical staff in Haven and—” she stopped short.

“And?” Eleanor asked, interested.

“I do apologize, I’ve lost my train of thought, perils of traveling so long without a proper meal,” Leliana breezed, an obvious maneuver, at least to most of the adults, to turn Eleanor’s focus away from pressing for what Leliana had stopped herself from speaking of.

“Well you’re to eat everything on your plate and then wash up if you’d like and come sleep—you can squeeze in with us!”

“Certainly,” Leliana agreed.

What followed almost made Cassandra wish she was the sort for bad jokes—how many Elves does it take to put the Herald of Andraste to sleep? Three. Marehis, ever the vigilant Nightingale, made herself busy getting them the sort of privacy Leliana required, holding Eleanor close as they sat together around the fire, humming quietly, playing with her hair, she caught Solas’s eye and Cassandra suspected the man was aiding her, sending subtle waves of calm across his bond to lull the Herald. The girl nearly fell asleep in her seat, shaking herself to stay awake, and Sera actually caught on well enough, the Elf crouching before the Herald.

“Hey Inky, I’m real sleepy and it’s way cold for sleeping by myself,” Sera said, holding out her arms to the girl, “come snuggle, yeah?”
Eleanor nodded, rising with Sera and stumbling to wrap an arm around the Elf’s waist as the older girl threw her arm around her shoulders. “Mmkay…” and the youngest of their numbers disappeared into their tent.

Leliana gave it a moment and then, “There has been…one further complication.”

“More than time magic interfering with our plans for the mages?” Cassandra asked.

“Indeed. It is our plans for the Templars we need remedy for as well,” Leliana informed them. “Given…the very polarizing nature of Eleanor’s first move in the Game, showing an alliance of sorts with Empress Celene at least insofar as being willing to allow herself to owe the Empress a debt of favor…we have unfortunately lost several of the noble allies Lady Josephine secured to meet us at Therinfal Redoubt to demand the Lord Seeker give audience to the Inquisition, as they have strong ties and political attachment to Duke Gaspard.”

“…we had more than enough coming to throw their weight against the Order,” Cassandra insisted, surely they did not lose that many of their allies.

“And now we have too few. There is nothing to be done for it, save…well. It has been made clear that there is something of interest that would regain some who have turned against us and there are others who have said they would pledge their loyalty and assist us in Therinfal Redoubt.”

“What must we do?”

“It is not so much ‘we’ as it is you, Cassandra Pentaghast,” Leliana said, and it fell into place in Cassandra’s mind then, just why Leliana hadn’t wanted to say as much in front of Eleanor—not because the girl might feel guilty her decision to aid Rainier interfered in their mission to obtain Templar allies but, “We need you, and any you would take with you, to slay a Dragon, as a representative of the Inquisition.”

“Hell yeah!” the Iron Bull roared out, earning him a slap on the back of the head from Rainier.

Hell yeah indeed. Ugh.

“If any of you so much as breathes a word of this to Eleanor before it is taken care of, I will feed you to the Dragon.”

“The indigestion the Iron Bull’s horns are likely to give it would indeed make it easier to kill,” Solas said.

“Seeker, I need this—for real. I was planning on getting a couple of you guys to team up against the Dragon I know is here in the Hinterlands, north, near Redcliffe I can just smell him,” the Iron Bull growled with satisfaction. “and uh, read the reports you sent Red last time you were here. Anyway, it’s for Imekari. Birthday present.”

…“You wish to slay a dragon for Eleanor’s birthday?” Cassandra questioned. She’d yet to…Maker she’d yet to come up with just what she wanted to get for the girl and time was running out, dragon slaying certainly wasn’t on the list of ideas.

“I wish to slay a dragon for anything-day. Need something off of one for her present though. Real little, just consider it my cut for helping take it down.”

Cassandra sighed.
“Very well. Once we have concluded our business with Alexius we can make camp in the north, the Iron Bull will certainly join me…I would certainly appreciate the assistance of a Mage, but I understand reticence facing a dragon.”

Madam de Fer lightly scoffed, assuring her, “My dear, I would be delighted to assist you against such a creature.”

Solas looked to Marehis from where he sat across the fire from her. “Vehnan, emma lath, lasa ghilan ma halani? Ar dareth, dirthvaren.”

“Fen’harel ma ghilana!” the woman swore in tones of disbelief.

“Certainly vehnan—bellanaris,” Solas returned with amusement.

Marehis sighed, shaking her head but she conceded, “Ma nuvenin, vehnan. Dareth shiral.”

“You would have my aid as well, Cassandra,” Solas volunteered.

“Not a mage, but I’ll gladly back you up, if you’d care for it,” Rainier offered as well. Cassandra nodded. She wasn’t…entirely disgusted by the man’s in general existence any longer, he had done well in his penance, was every day proving himself a true ally to their cause, to Eleanor.

“Shit Seeker, you’ll have anyone’s help you want,” Varric said, “but uh, someone will need to keep the kid distracted if you really wanna pull this off without Tumbles running headlong at a dragon. She’s a bit too bite sized for comfort.”

She vaguely wondered if perhaps she was being somewhat sexist. Antony had been slaying dragons since the age of fourteen, two entire years of experience killing the things before his death. But no—there was some measure of truth in that the Pentaghast name came with the affinity for Dragon slaying, it was in their blood it was as close to what Cassandra supposed wielding magic must feel like as possible without being a Mage, when facing a Dragon there was a call in her bones, in her blood, instinct that drove her forward guided her hand in battle against such beasts. Antony had been the same, and furthermore he had been trained to do so, such training started nearly a decade before he went head to head against so much as a Dragonling.

They put off further discussion of dragon slaying, it was a task for another day, now it was late and they all needed rest before they regrouped with the Herald, and planned their next move to secure the mages if they still could, everything about this…Maker, they could not turn a blind eye to a Magister running amuck with time magic of all things but the very idea that such a thing was even happening, even plausible was horrifying, the danger all too real and she wanted Eleanor nowhere near such caustic vile magery. She did not wish for the girl to be anywhere near that Alexius. Ugh, the threat he posed, the way he’d spoken to Eleanor, the warning from Felix that Alexius had done all he had just to lure her here. She did not want Eleanor to take any part in this.

And that trepidation only grew once the letter came.

It arrived at breakfast, while all were gathered around the campfire, an unfamiliar messenger bird, an owl, landed in their camp, Marehis rising to stand as a bodily shield, intercepting it before it landed near or on Eleanor, retrieving the message herself and handing it to Leliana who read it over carefully with Cassandra.

Every character every punctuation of every line worked together to spell ‘trap’. That Alexius believed Eleanor would come, and he would have her, hand her over to these Venatori as promised—they needed no warning from Dorian to know as much was true.
“Is something the matter?” Eleanor asked with some interest, though she was currently giving attentions to their winged guest, it rested on Marehis’s arm and the girl was leaning forward, index finger scratching under its chin as it cooed and she was endeavoring to offer it some warm biscuit from her unmarked hand.

Varric groaned. “Tumbles, kid, I love you to death but you gotta stop coddling the enemy.”

“Haven’t you heard of not shooting the messenger, this poor little fella can’t help it his master’s a time-manipulating mad man, no he can’t,” she cooed scrunching her face at the creature, “Lil cutie do you like bread?”

“Bad for birds, Ellie-girl. Owls eat raw meat, mice usually,” Rainier informed her.

“Hmm we don’t have any mice and I’d feel badly feeding you one. The Iron Bull, hand me some of that ram meat you haven’t cooked up yet would you please? Thanks, oh!” the girl giggled when the owl snatched up the raw ram’s meat she offered.

“Da’vehnan please do mind your fingers.”

“Sorry Mare,” Eleanor apologized to her minder, and then, “Cassandra? You seem um, upset or something, you kind of look murdery.”

She was feeling murdery. Her rage had such a ferocity she felt almost certain she could march down to Castle Redcliffe, kick down the door and tear that lunatic Magister limb from limb for threatening Eleanor.

But what she did was inform her allies, Eleanor, “Magister Alexius wishes to meet with you to finish your negotiations. Given he had spies deliver to him our confirmed meeting with Fiona, he knows our original plan was to remain in the hinterlands until we finished our negotiations, that we planned to be here for several days, knows that we are still here. He has invited you to join him in Castle Redcliffe this afternoon.”

Eleanor nodded, taking a deep breath, “Alright then. Will we leave after lunch or do I need to start getting ready now and head out as soon as possible?”

“Neither, Eleanor,” Leliana said. “My lady…his letter it is disturbing to say the least, this is obviously a trap and I do not feel certain at all that you would be kept safe. He and his Venatori allies lay in wait to capture you, even with the whole of your party at your side I would not advise it, as it stands, he wishes for you to come alone.”

“Well I’m only little—underage I mean,” Eleanor said, “he’s an idiot if he thinks I’d show up to something he wants to disguise as a negotiation for a legally binding agreement between he and the Inquisition when I can’t so much spit on a contract much less sign one. I-in a legal sense;” she was quick to assure.

“That is true, Eleanor,” Cassandra agreed, “it would not be difficult for us to join you I’m certain but that does not stop the fact that he has numbers greater than ours according to Dorian.”

“Felix assures me his father brought along a small army of Venatori agents,” Dorian confirmed.

“We can’t just give up, there has to be something we can do,” Eleanor insisted.

“…The Hero of Ferelden, she used a secret passage way, from the dilapidated windmill in Redcliffe village that leads to Castle Redcliffe, to assist the Arl,” Leliana reasoned out, “I could have my agents in the Hinterlands gather within the hour, we could infiltrate the castle during your meeting, take out his Venatori forces and secure your safety as you confront the man.”

Eleanor pointed to their Spymaster, “You see! What do I say? The smartest, Leliana you’re just a genius and I am proud of you not only as a person but also as a redhead.”

“Why thank you, my lady.”

Ugh. Very well. “You will stay here, Eleanor,” Cassandra conceded. “I will go and negotiate in your stead, distract this man for Leliana and apprehend him.”

“And then what? His Mages are just going to come with you?” Eleanor asked doubtfully. She argued, “Cassandra, if I don’t show he’s got no reason to let you in—its not like he really wants to chat up the Inquisition, he wants me, so let him have me. Its just talk, and everyone is free to come help keep each other safe.”

“It will certainly be more than just talk!” Cassandra insisted, “Eleanor this man means to capture you,” hold her captive, take her life within his hands, give her over to the Venatori and Maker only knows what they want with her! To study her Mark, rend it from her body, get information on it, on the Inquisition, on the Conclave—an event she could not even hope to remember, and when one does not have answers to questioning, questioning turns to torture. She almost felt overwhelmed with her panic, the very real fear of such a thing befalling the girl, “He has made it perfectly clear—”

“His letter has you freaked out so badly?” Eleanor asked, surprised.

Cassandra extended the parchment to the girl, garnering her a questioning look from Leliana and the Seeker firmly verified, “She can read it for herself.”

Eleanor regarded the offered missive warily before taking it from her, holding it carefully like she were uncertain and then she looked to Cassandra as if she’d thought of something, a deal of sorts, ‘Cassandra…if I look at this, and it doesn’t scare me, I’m still determined to go through with this and meet him, will you let me?’

Ugh. She did trust the girl had a good head on her shoulders, was reasonable, and brave. If she truly felt it was worth the risk, if Alexius did not intimidate her…Cassandra could not sit by and choose cowardice where Eleanor would chose to challenge. “Yes, Eleanor.”

The girl took a deep, bracing breath, and then her eyes scanned the letter before her, carefully, looking upon each and every word of Alexius’s writing until at last her gaze lingered on his looping signature.

“He wants to meet at three?” Eleanor asked for verification of the time specified in his letter, 3pm. Cassandra nodded. “Well then, Leliana, you best start gathering your people and preparing. Everyone else, do the same—whatever you have to do, be ready to head out after lunch. Are you still feeling up to going with us, Dorian?”

The Tevinter man looked pleased, almost proud even, “I wouldn’t miss it.”

And so it was done. Cassandra felt heavy with dread as Leliana set about the task of gathering her ranks in the Hinterlands and heading out to prepare their infiltration. Eleanor had instructed they all prepare themselves, and her preparation was prayer, Cassandra went and sat at the edge of the drop from their camp, near the occularum long dormant since their first venture into the Hinterlands, looked out over the Hinterlands before she closed her eyes and prayed with such intensity, she did not even hear the subject of her prayers approach, join her on the cliff’s edge.

“Though I am flesh, Your Light is ever present,” her sweet voice spoke with certainty, returning to Cassandra the Chant she’d used when she last feared she would lose this girl. “And those I have called, they remember, and they shall endure. I shall sing with them the Chant, and all will know, we are Yours, and none shall stand before us.”

“Praise be,” Cassandra said quietly as she opened her eyes, she did not look at Eleanor, not until the girl took her hand in her Marked one.

“I know you’re scared, but this is what we have to do. The Maker is watching, always always, Cassandra. He will be with us when we face Alexius. Even if all that went to meet his threat was me, I would not be alone. We encountered this mess for a reason, we were meant to stop this, and we will. I know it.”

“The Maker does always provide,” Cassandra had to agree, tucking one of the girl’s loose curls behind her ear.

Eleanor grinned mischievously. “Well…not always. The Iron Bull’s providing lunch again,” she giggled and said, just a bit louder to be certain he could hear her, “though the Iron Bull is a god among men.”

“Fuck yeah I am, Boss. Guess who just earned herself extra potatoes?” the Iron Bull called.

“Nice!”

The whole of the Herald’s party was going to attend the meeting with Alexius, even Sera—she certainly wasn’t going to let ‘Inky’ go without her to face off with some ‘pointy git’, and now that she had appropriate armor there was no reason she should not join them in a potential battle. Harrit had done well, followed Cassandra’s every instruction from the proper reddish leather chest piece and leggings to the thick, metal-spun red and brown plaid weave that would protect the Elf girl’s arms and throat. She even had proper boots now, an idea she’d balked at, at first, but she did not mind so much once she examined them and realized her preferences had genuinely been taken into consideration—she always went barefoot or in those thin-soled flat shoes, so her boots were made in like fashion, not too thick on the bottoms, no heel to speak of.

“Shite, Harrit does a proper job. How much do I owe him, ‘sandra?” Sera had asked when she first tried it on.

“It has been paid, Lady Montilyet will just render your next months pay with the cost of your armor deducted.” A small deception, the Elf would forget the matter entirely and think nothing of it when she received her pay in full…she was a member of the Herald’s party and…what was more she was Eleanor’s friend, a reliable one at that. It was a small thing, to provide for her as such, Cassandra was admittedly glad to do so.

“Wow Ser’, you look awesome!” Eleanor complimented when she joined her gathered party, armored up herself and prepared for her meeting. “Everyone ready?”

They were. But they were wholly unprepared, not for what happened next certainly.

Varric whistled as he finished his own examination of Alexius’s letter, he’d wanted to see it for himself, “Shit Tumbles, you sure you wanna meet this wack job again?”

“Uh-huh,” Eleanor affirmed with confidence, “if he thought his fancy lettering writing could scare me, the jokes on him,” she said as she finished pulling on her gloves a smile met her lips and then, “I don’t even know how to read.”

Sera screamed with laughter.

Good Maker on high. He’d sent them an entire infant, an illiterate infant. And now they were lost in time.

Ahh. Getting ahead of himself as always. Let’s back up a bit, shall we?

The Herald of Andraste was greeted by some homely looking Mage, one of Fiona’s ranks, when she arrived, with her struck-dumb entourage, at Castle Redcliffe. Surrounded by Venatori agents in those gaudy masks they insisted upon wearing. How in the world had Alexius believed Dorian would ever agree to join Tevinter Supremacists? Their ensemble was as tacky as their beliefs were bigoted.

“The Master’s invitation was for the Herald alone, the others must wait here.”

Ellie sighed as if disappointed. “Gosh, that’s just too bad. Well, do please give Al my warmest regards,” she instructed before turning to face her party, gesturing toward the great castle doors, “come along everyone. Say, do you think they serve hot chocolate at the Gull and Lantern?”

“W-wait!” the Mage retracted desperately. “Your friends are welcome as well, my apologies. I’ll just let the Master know you’ve arrived.”

Huh. That worked well enough. Dorian kept to the back of their numbers, he needn’t give the game away after all.

“My lord Magister, the agents of the Inquisition have arrived,” the Mage announced as the Herald and her small army approached, the Iron Bull was certainly a protective one, he flanked the girl opposite Marehis, Cassandra standing directly behind the Herald still...well she’d been watching the girl like a hawk their entire journey, silent and pensive.

“My friends!” Alexius greeted amicably, rising from his throne, oh heavens preserve him, the man sat in the Arl of Redcliff’s throne like he was born for it the colonizing trogolodyte. Felix stood at his side, pale, jaw set as he watched his father betray everything they’d been taught to believe as rational, strong Tevinter men. “It’s so good to see you again, and you’re associates, of course. I’m sure we can work out some arrangement that is equitable to all parties.”

Oh that Enchanter Fiona woman, she didn’t care for this arrangement she’d struck with Alexius at all. More than once Dorian had had to hold his breath, pray the woman didn’t barge into the priest study in the Chantry—Alexius had forbidden practice in the Chantry from all his followers, and still, any chance the woman got to rebel against that particular rule, she did so, holding secret services a handful of times while under their Magister’s rule. She came forward, her every motion speaking of quiet outrage, “Are we Mages to have no voice in deciding our fate?”

“Fiona,” Alexius spoke as if to calm someone who was being unreasonable, “you would not have turned your followers over to my care if you did not trust me with their lives.”
“If the Grand Enchanter wishes to be part of these talks,” Ellie spoke up, smiling to Fiona, “then I welcome her as a guest of the Inquisition.”

The Enchanter regarded her with some measure of surprise, gratitude. “Thank you.”

Alexius was silent as he turned his back on them and instead chose to resume his seat on the throne. “The Inquisition needs Mages to close the Breach and I have them. So, what shall you offer in exchange.”

The Herald of Andraste did remarkably well playing it up, her careful consideration, humming a bit as she brought her unmarked hand to her chin, index finger tapping against her jaw as she pondered just a moment before saying, “Nothing. Not a thing. I think I’ll just take the mages with me if its all the same with you. I mean fair’s fair. You did use time magic to beat me here, and gosh, I mean even the ‘templars’ you fought off were fake, I mean for goodness sake, didn’t anyone ever tell you cheaters never prosper?”

Oh well then, just like that, was it?

“What?” Fiona asked fiercely.

“I…I don’t know what you’re talking about,” Alexius quietly denied.

“She knows everything, Father,” Felix assured him warily, sick, dare he say it, to death of his father’s lies.

“Felix, what have you done?” Alexius asked.

“He’s worried about you,” Ellie defended the man. “You’re his father and he sees you going down a dangerous path.”

That had Alexius rising from his seat coming forward to accuse, “You walk into my stronghold with your stolen Mark you don’t even understand, and you think you’re in control?” he asked. “You’re nothing but a mistake.”

“Oh, no doubt,” Ellie assured him, “But what’s interesting to me is the claim I’ve stolen something? You know something about my Mark?”

“It belongs to your betters! You wouldn’t begin to understand its purpose.”

“Father, listen to yourself. Do you know what you sound like?” Felix asked in disbelief.

“He sounds exactly like the sort of famous cliché everyone expects us to be,” Dorian drawled as he came forward to join the Herald.

“Dorian,” Alexius regarded him gravely. “I gave you a chance to be a part of this. You turned me down. The Elder One has power you would not believe, he will raise the Imperium from its own ashes.”

“Elder one, huh?” Ellie asked. “A tired old man thinks only one sort of people is best for all the world? I can get that anywhere.” Maker he did like her.

“Soon, he will become a god,” Alexius insisted. “He will make the world bow to Mages once more, we will rule from the Boric oceans to the Frozen Seas!”

“You cannot involve my people in this!” Fiona declared, finding his claims of his master’s godhood wholly blasphemous.

“Alexius, this is exactly what you and I talked about never wanting to happen,” Dorian ground out, “Why would you support this?” Hours they’d railed against this very idea, like minded individuals sharing their disbelief that such people existed that held these ideals, and now here they stood on opposing sides.

“Stop this father,” Felix pleaded, “give up the Venatori, let the Southern Mages fight the Breach, and lets go home.”

“No, it’s the only way Felix,” Alexius…Alexius pleaded in kind, insisting, “he can save you.”

Oh. Oh Kaffas. No.

“Save me?” Felix asked, appalled.

“There is a way,” Alexius railed, “the Elder One promised. I-if I undo the mistake of the Temple.”

“I’m going to die,” Felix insisted. “You need to accept that.”

And Alexius refused, commanding, “Seize them, Venatori! The Elder One demands this girl’s life!”

The clatter of armored bodies hitting the floor rang through the throne hall as Inquisition forces appeared from the wings, effectively dismantling Alexius’s gathered forces.

“So…that doesn’t look like that’s happening,” Ellie supposed, looking to Alexius. “I’m sorry you’ve been manipulated into this, Alexius, and I get where your heart is but this isn’t the way. Let’s talk—”

“No more talk! You are a mistake,” Alexius hissed, and Dorian realized all too late the man had been clutching something in his hand. The Amulet. It began to glow sickly green, hover in the palm of his hand, “You should never have existed…”

“No!” Dorian shouted, putting himself between he and Ellie as he casted counter to whatever foul spell the man sought to…Maker he wished to eradicate the girl entirely wipe her very memory from the face of the world.

And still, a portal opened up and Dorian felt the sickening pull as he was drawn through, Ellie’s scream echoing in his ears.

And that, ladies and gentlemen, was how Dorian Pavus was cast once more through time, with the Herald of Andraste.

They fell out of a portal, landing splat into a waterlogged prison cell…no a store room, the bars were meant to keep people out and things safely in. unfortunately there was no such safety for them, Dorian was on his feet in a moment casting Barrier across himself and the Herald as two Venatori agents, guards assaulted them.

He felt Barrier in kind and the Herald charged forward, it was such close quarters and she beat against one of the Venatori with her staff while Dorian cast against the other and Maker just what were those people teaching this girl? She pulled a dagger from her boot plunging it upward and in through the soft of the agents stomach just beneath the apex of his ribs to pierce his heart before pulling back and away, wiping the blade clean against her overcoat before sheathing it again.

“Are you hurt?” Ellie rounded on him, unmarked hand on his exposed arm as she looked it over and then up to meet his eye.

“T’m remarkably unscathed. Are you alright, Ellie?”

“Alright isn’t the word for it, but I’m not hurt if that’s what you mean,” she said, taking in their surroundings as she took a long, solid deep breath, “Okay. So. That definitely wasn’t according to plan. Time magic?” she asked.

Ahh yes, best to get to the point and not have a complete breakdown at the possibility becoming ever-pressing reality. “It would seem so.”

“Kay. Forward or back? This…this doesn’t look like anything I saw in ‘back’,” Ellie said as she examined their surroundings oh Kaffas there was…there was red lyrium growing along the walls. “You cast against Alexius?”

“I did. He wished to cast you back so far that you would cease to exist, the hope was to cancel his spell entirely.”

“He was trying to send us back, your casting propelled us forward instead which is…good but we really really need to get back,” her hand raised to the cell door, shaking it to see if it would open. Silvery keys caught Dorian’s eye, hanging on the hip of their fallen foe and he snatched the set up.

“Let’s take a look around, shall we?” he asked, setting about unlocking the door and the Herald offered her arm as if for all the world they were about to take a leisurely stroll. Well. They may as well.

And their first hall led them to a fork of sorts—two separate directions.

“Let’s check out this level first—then go up,” Ellie decided, “work our way through and figure out just where we are. This isn’t the throne room but the uh…the architecture looks Ferelden, I think we might still be in the Castle.”

“The Venatori are a good indication we’re still in Redcliff,” Dorian offered.

“Yeah but the lightest ‘worst case scenario’ I’ve got on replay up here,” Ellie said, free hand tapping her temple, “is total world take over, the Venatori are everywhere, Alexius rules the world and has my friends chained up feeding him grapes.”

“We’d be in luck then,” Dorian was pleased to inform her, “Alexius is allergic to grapes.”

Further luck. They were indeed still within the halls of Castle Redcliffe—“Ahh, yes, I recall this part of the castle, they had the tackiest carvings of dogs I’ve ever seen…though I’ll admit that was preferable to their latest redecorating,” Dorian admitted as they searched, Fasta vass there was red lyrium everywhere, casting a feverish warmth that made his skin crawl.

“Okay, so. Let’s keep looking, figure out when we are and how to get back…do you…do you think we can?”

“I can certainly make no promises, but…if Alexius is still here, and has the amulet he used, I do believe I understand the spell well enough, with the amulet powering it I could send us back.”
“Let’s go get that amulet then.”

“I cannot believe Alexius has done this, of all the fool headed, cockamammy schemes. How could he not see the destruction he was heading for this…this isn’t what he wanted.”

“I know. I understand him wanting to save Felix but…I mean…I know the Wardens aren’t really around at the moment, but he’s been Blight sick a while right? They haven’t considered that?”

… “What makes you think it is the Blight that afflicts Felix?”

“He sort of fake collapsed into me when passing that note of his without his father seeing, to distract him too so I could go meet you I suppose. He sort of smells like spores, like when you freshly cut deep mushroom, they smell like that because of their entanglement with Blight, and he was talking right into my face so I got a good whiff of his breath, there was definitely Crystal Grace, Prophets Laurel in whatever he takes, those are only mixed for serious potion either for intensive healing from disease or um…well…”

“Prolonging the inevitable?” he offered. “Felix accepted his fate early on. His treatment is meant to keep him going for as long as he can, do what he feels he must before his time comes, he hopes to bring his father some peace of mind before the end. He would prefer spending what time he has spent being a force for good and change in Tevinter, than submitting to a lifetime of servitude, as honorable as the Wardens are, it’d take his say on things back home.”

“I get that,” Ellie acknowledged, “Life doesn’t have to be long to be good. I feel sorry for his father though. And, you know. I’m sorry to you too. Felix is your friend.”

Well. Now was not the time to get into such things. Never suited him he…he would miss Felix when his time came, such that he didn’t much care to dwell upon it now.

“Curious thing—Eleanor, just how did you manage with our note passing? If you ahh…”

“Didn’t read Felix’s, my Mark reacts to Rifts pretty intensely, I felt when one opened in the Chantry and used my Mark to find it. I didn’t even really think about his note until all was said and done. I know numbers well enough so his note to you with the date and time wasn’t any problem getting the gist of. The handwriting was the same, plus there wasn’t anyone else at our top-secret Chantry meeting so I figured he was the one who wrote you.”

At the top of the stairs they came across a room…more like a cavern, a high platform in the center of four drawbridges and Fasta Vass that was a long drop he found himself being very very mindful of where he was when fighting, Eleanor too for that matter Maker that Dwarf called her Tumbles, they certainly couldn’t have her tumbling into an abyss.

“Kay, so that ways no good,” Ellie said looking to the drawn bridge ahead of them, forward wasn’t an option, only left or right. “Preference?”

“Do you think your Mark could perhaps lead us in the direction bearing a marble bath? That would be delightful.”

“Gosh, I wish,” though she closed her eyes a moment and Dorian felt himself holding his breath waiting for some strange, Fade driven power of divination to come pouring out of the girl to show them the way as she raised her Marked hand and then, “Hmm…ennie meanie miney—that way!” she pointed.

Maker preserve them.
They did not find a marble bath, but they did find a mumbling lunatic. This cavernous place was Castle Redcliffe’s dungeon. Enchanter Fiona was one of its many prisoners, trapped behind bars and her body…Maker her body was slowly becoming encased in Red Lyrium, she was practically melded with the cell wall. He had…he was of a mind to urge Ellie back, cover her eyes from the disturbing sight Kaffas she was a child.

“Enchanter Fiona?” Ellie breathed in disbelief. “Are you…can you tell us what happened here? Where is everyone?”

“You…Herald of Andraste, it…it is impossible. I saw you…disappear,” the woman rasped out weak, withering.

And then she informed them of the date.

“Maker, an entire year?!” Ellie gasped, looking to Dorian, wide-eyed, “I’ve missed everything, we have to go back, we have to stop this. Fiona, we’re going to get this sorted, I promise. I’m so sorry.”

“Go, do not worry about me…stop him.”

The girl nodded looking torn like she wanted to do anything she could to help but…well there was nothing to be done, not now, save for…well save for saving the day.

Humming drew them to the next corridor of cells, humming, and loud, deep…tired singing.

“Hmmm hmmm hmmm hmmm hmmm hmmm…”

“Ninety five bottles of beer on the wall, ninety five bottles of beer,” he sighed, “take one down…pass it around…ninety four bottles of beer on the wall.”

“Varric! The Iron Bull!” Ellie cried.

Oh Maker, she did—or she nearly was, chin quivering as she knelt before the Dwarf’s cell, hands shaking as she reached on her belt to remove a set of picks and work the lock.

“Andrastes favorite knickers,” the Dwarf swore, breathing, “you’re alive! Where…Tumbles where did you go, how did you escape?”

The moment the door swung open Ellie was rushing to the Iron Bull’s cell to free the Qunari as well, “Alexius sent us forward in time, we only just got here,” she explained.

“…Imekari no, you…you were dead. We saw you both die there were burns on the ground and everything.”

“Alexius can bill us for the cleaning when we get back then. I’m alive, you’re alive—we’re finding the others and getting the heck out of here. Help us we get to Alexius, Dorian can use his amulet to send us back in time and stop all of this from happening.”

Maker they looked wretched, the pair of them had Red Lyrium practically sweating from their pores, their skin let off a reddish haze.

“Alexius isn’t our biggest problem kid,” Varric informed them, “it’s the Elder One. He means business—he assassinated the Empress Orlais, used the aftermath to launch a full-blown invasion. Using an army of demons. South is completely under his control.”

“That Vint bastard is still here though,” the Iron Bull said, “overheard the guards saying he’s holed up in the throne room.”

“How nice of him, we won’t have to go looking for him then,” Dorian scoffed.

“We’ll fix this, promise. Gosh I want to hug you guys, but it looks everything hurts right now,” she said as she examined her friends.

“Best keep your distance, Tumbles, this Red Lyrium shit spreads. Hug the hell out of me when you get back though, stupid bastard doesn’t know how lucky he is.”

Ellie nodded, biting her lip harshly, turning her back on her friends to keep moving, though her eyes were rather wet, she likely feared crying in front of them and…

Dorian carefully put an arm around her shoulders as they continued their search.

“That’s Cassandra!” Ellie gasped, surging down the next flight of stairs into another corridor of cells.

“...the light shall lead her safely through the paths of this world and into the next, for she who trusts in the Maker, Fire, is her water.”

“As the moth sees light and goes toward flame, she should see fire and go towards Light,” Ellie recited as she reached the cell, kneeling to undo the lock.

“Maker...Eleanor you...are you truly alive?”

“Yup! Time traveled, it’s a long story—we’re going back to stop all this, but we need your help to do it.”

The Seeker was shaking as she rose to her feet eyes struck wide as she took in the sight of Ellie, alive and well, and coming to the rescue, hands tentatively reaching out and Dorian realized the woman was about to hug the girl,

But Varric beat her to it after a fashion, the Dwarf surged forward into the cell and wrapped his arms around Cassandra’s waste, holding her fast. “Hold up there Seeker. We’re all...fuck we missed the kid but you can’t risk touching her, its bad enough she’s walking around all this Red Lyrium shit.”

“No worries,” the girl assured.

Madam de Fer was not quite so pleased to see them.

“What trick is this? Staging a fake rescue to earn my trust?” Vivienne questioned suspiciously.

“Ellie, I am here as well, da’vehnan,” Solas’s voice echoed through the hall.

“It is a trap, Elf, wretched demons—”

“Not a demon, though I’m like super proud of you resisting demon influence after all this nonsense. Demons don’t fix anything at all, anything they’d offer you would result in something worse never mind that it’s the end of the world and whatnot,” Ellie said to the Enchanter, it sounded like somehow what she was saying was meant to prove to the woman she was truly speaking to Ellie and not some demon come to trick her into possession.

“Ahh. Darling, do be a dear and open my cell then, that’s a good girl.”

“Varric—” Ellie started as knelt.

“On it kid,” Tethras said, heading to free Solas from his cell.

Solas was all business, this future version more willing to speak with Dorian, discussing the ramifications of getting them back, how best to cast in order to do so as they made their way, back up the stairs to cross the bridge to the other end of the prison, if more of their allies had been captive, they’d be there.

“Get back, Eleanor, let us handle this,” Cassandra ordered, drawing her sword as Venatori guardsmen came to fight, “you and Dorian should save your energy, potion.”

They did just that, the host of the Mages cast barrier and their warrior allies surged forward to take down their enemies before they could so much as hurl an insult at the Herald or Dorian, let alone a weapon.

“Damn its good to do this again,” the Iron Bull said.

“So much Venatori butt is getting kicked before we leave—all of it!” Ellie insisted as she led them across the platform and down into the cells.

Sera was singing, trying to at least, her voice was still markedly pleasant despite the horrible grating undertone Red Lyrium gave it, but she couldn’t seem to remember the words to the tune she was attempting to keep. “Agh…stupid!” and then, “Shite! No! No no no no no, you’re dead, I-Inky you can’t be here!”

“I’m alright, Sera, I’m sorry, gosh you must be…I’m so sorry magic did this, we can fix it,” Ellie promised.

“Piss, all of you’re here?” Sera asked, looking on their gathered numbers, “Inky, Sparky you look just…yeah you look like not a friggin minute has gone by, oh thank tits! All the tits! Especially yours Ink if you’re gonna go back and fix this.”

“My tits gladly oblige,” Ellie jovially assured as she pulled open the cell door. And then she gasped, as she laid eyes on the cell in the back of the hall, “Oh gosh, Thom!”

The man went remarkably pale when he saw her, red crystallite forming in the corners of his eyes oh Maker, Red Lyrium tears.

“Oh Ellie-girl, no…no the dead should be made to rest in peace we…we tried but there wasn’t a body to bury, sweetheart I’m so sorry—”

“Thom. You stop this instant or I’ll start to cry too,” Ellie warned as she picked the lock.

“I’m alright, I’m not back from the dead, I just didn’t die full stop. Alexius sent us forward in time, now we’re going back.”

“…Maker help me I might be going crazy. Either way, I’m with you then,” Rainier vowed joining them.
“You…there was a funeral?” Ellie asked.

“We thought you’d died, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, “Alexius let us go, we retreated and…”

“Boss,” the Iron Bull interrupted, "Bunch of bullshit happened, you don’t wanna know. Inquisition went all to shit, the world is overrun by a demon army, we were hunted down by Alexius, trophies from the Herald’s allies for the Elder One. The only thing we can do now is get you back.”

“Is…are the Charg—”

“You don’t want to know.”

Ellie looked stricken at that, but she dug in, and led them further in their search, down one flight of stairs more, and as they reached the next corridor of cells,

“Iras ma ghilas, da’len, Ara ma'nedan ashir,” there was a broken sob, “Dirthara lothlenan'as, Bal emma mala dir. Tel'enfenim, da'len, Irassal ma ghilas, Ma garas mir renan, Ara ma'athlan vhenas,” Marehis, curled up with her face pressed into her knees as she rocked and sang to herself, sobbing out, like she wished for all the world whatever she was about to say could be true, “Ara ma'athlan vhenas.”

Ellie looked wretched, openly crying as she fell to her knees in front of Marehis’s cell. “I am here, Marehis, I’m here, and I’m going home. We all are.”

The Elf woman gasped, looking up, her spilt tears leaving scathing scratches like tear tracks down her cheeks, Red Lyrium gravel falling from her lap as she rose up onto her knees and came forward on them, reaching for Ellie her hand shaking hovering just inches from the girl she dare not touch, like if she did she might just disappear.

“Da’vehnan,” she moaned out.

“S-stop crying, p-please, everything’s going to be alright,” Ellie begged and Dorian placed his hands on her shoulders—her hands were shaking too much to be of any use, and he was startled when she turned and pressed her face into his throat, wrapping her arms around his neck, his own eyes ached rather fiercely as he patted her back, resting his other hand atop her head, giving her a moment to grieve while Varric took on the task of opening Marehis’s cell. The woman began crawling forward like she intended reach Ellie, hold the girl again but Solas slid on his knees to intercept her, wrapping her up fiercely in his arms, rocking her side to side as he pressed his lips to her hair.

“Vehnan, you cannot. You will hurt her. She has to go back, emma lath, safely, coming into contact with Red Lyrium as we have would spell her doom.”

Ahh. Dorian wasn’t sure what exactly he should do. The Iron Bull had made it very clear Ellie wasn’t know but he wasn’t sure he could dissuade her from the notion the Elves were together—and now their kissing that’s just. Well.

But Ellie just smiled, wiping her eyes as she rose to her feet, Dorian rising with her uncertain what to say but she didn’t comment on their interaction just yet, though she did say, “When I get back, everyone’s getting hugged, so much—just focus on that, this timeline is crap, and it’s getting replaced with a nonstop Inquisition wide hugfest. Some of you never met the mega-tent, but it’s making a comeback!” she proclaimed before she began leading their way out of the dungeon.
“You aren’t upset?” Dorian asked quietly as he followed close behind.

Ellie shook her head. “None of what is happening is exactly thril- oh you mean Solas and Marehis? No, I’ve known about that. I mean, I can’t read to save my life but I’m not blind—Solas told me these letters he got all the time when we were separated from Marehis were from his girlfriend, and I’d seen the name he’d put on the envelopes—when Marehis had to hide from the Venatori, those letters stopped but I didn’t really put two and two together until Leliana offered to write Marehis for me. The word shapes matched, so,” she shrugged.

…word…shapes…Maker help him did she mean letters?

“They believe you to still be in the dark,” Dorian saw fit to inform her.

“I know,” Ellie said, “I don’t plan on saying anything. It’s their business, as long as their happy, I am too.”

She fell silent as they found the drawbridge to the final door was dropping, and Maker, he didn’t even get a chance to cast Barrier before Marehis launched herself, followed after by Cassandra, Thom, and Bull taking out their numbers in a flash.

They moved carefully, quietly down the next corridor, the sound of one of Alexius’s men,

“Tell me how the Herald knew of the sacrifice at the temple!”

“Never. Aah!”

“Leliana,” Ellie breathed, then, “The Iron Bull.”

“There’s no use to this defiance, little bird—”

He was cut short by the resounding thud of the door being knocked out of the frame entirely, and falling to the floor. The Venatori agent had his knife at Leliana’s throat but he turned at the sound and the Inquisition spymaster who looked like the exact idea of literal death warmed up, pulled her body up on her chains, legs wrapping around the Venatori’s neck and snapping it between her thighs before dropping him to the ground.

Ellie ran forward to grab the keys off his belt, undoing the woman’s chains.

“You survived,” Leliana said.

“So did you, Maker Leliana—” she pulled back looking horrified. “Oh th-the blight… they…”

Maker on high. What wretchedness. Torture, experimentation, oh he feared what fate had befallen Felix, he had hoped the man had died, expired of his illness, but this…this looked like Alexius had ordered experimentation in the hopes of figuring out just how to cure the blight by inflicting the worst sort of remedies on the Inquisition Spymaster. She was ghoulified.

Ellie fell silent and stepped aside as Leliana pushed forward to the chest by the door, retrieving weapons for herself before she dared to speak a word to the girl, “Alexius keeps to his chambers these days. Let’s finish this.”

“Let’s go,” Ellie agreed.

Dorian wanted nothing more than to interrogate the lot of them but if the fifteen year old had more restraint than him, well. He didn’t’ much care for that. Focus. Find Alexius, and get back to where everything makes…at least more sense than what’s happening here and now.

Ellie stopped dead in her tracks as they traveled the next passageway, paling as she doubled over and her Mark crackled and then spread, “Da’len?!” came Marehis’s horrified cry.

“Inky whas—shite shite, frick!”

A Rift tore open right in front of them, demons descending on Venatori agents that found them, made to attack but were thankfully…well actually no thanks, Dorian would prefer dealing with the Venatori himself as opposed to another bloody Rift.

But a wash of relief seemed to overcome the whole of their future allies when, as the last demon was felled, the Herald of Andraste, back from the supposed dead, raised her Marked hand and sealed shut the Rift.

“Maker,” Rainier chuckled out, “I have missed seeing that.”

“Well done, my dear,” Madam de Fer commended.

“Lets keep moving,” Ellie said tightly, and the Iron Bull moved ahead to start turning the mechanism that would pull up the gate barring their path forward, and up.

“We’re getting closer, there is a courtyard ahead,” Leliana announced hollowly, “once we are through that we will be in the halls that lead to the throne chamber.”

He thought…he thought one rift was bad.

The entire ruddy world was over. The moment they reached the courtyard, Ellie was aghast as she took in the sky.

“The- the Breach its—” she whispered breathlessly.

“It’s covered the world,” Dorian was certain.

Ellie was sent to her knees, clutching her Marked arm, a scream tore from her throat and the horrible thing spread like the slow drag of a knife against flesh, up her hand, her wrist, her entire fist was consumed in the glow as not one, but three Rifts tore open in the Maker damned courtyard.

The only blessing, if there was any to be had, was that demons only emerged from the first one, Dorian moved to shield the girl, standing before her as he cast alongside their allies and she sat in utter shock, oh Maker was she going into actual shock?

“Ellie,” Dorian knelt at her side once he was no longer needed to fight, “Ellie what can I do? What do you need?”

“I just…dying’d be sort of great right now I think, but that’s not on is it?” she asked staring into space eyes unfocused before she shook herself. “I- sorry. Help me up?”

His stomach felt like lead as he did, his arms bracing her elbows as he helped her to rise.

It was hell. All of it. Every inch of that damn courtyard, the Herald sealed the Rift, and they faced the next, and the next and when it was done Ellie was silent and drawn, pale, and her temples bore black webbing of her veins, burst blood vessels beneath the skin, and when he offered her potion she shook her head, swallowing like she was endeavoring to keep from throwing up.

“Hold Inky’s hand—not that one you dolt, her Marked one, it’ll help,” Sera snapped at him. He regarded the young girl for a moment holding out his hand for her to take and she did, squeezing it tight shaking as if she did feel some form of relief.

Leliana led them forward, and Dorian held fast to the Herald’s hand as they followed after, he leaned to speak more directly to her, quietly, “If you break my hand I’ll never let you forget it, but I quite assure you you’ll be forgiven. Whatever you need. We’ll get through this.”

He almost wished he could call the words back when the next Rift tore open Ellie, Maker she had a grip, she did not break his hand but he felt almost certain she could Kaffas. In his free hand he wielded his staff, casting Barrier and defending himself when need be but the center hall was full of demons and Venatori so busy fighting one another, added to the benefit of their gathered allies hellbent on their victory, he wasn’t needed much and…just out of the corner of his eye he saw the Herald’s unmarked hand flex once…twice during their battle and he felt the wash of her Barrier ghost across his skin, saw likewise the purple shine spread along their numbers.

“Hold on, bring that here,” Dorian called as he holstered his staff. The Iron Bull grunted and looked around a second before his good eye caught sight of what he meant, something strange, a large rectangular totem of sorts, glowing with red lyrium. “What in the world is this?”

“That looks like some bastardization of the keys the Herald discovered,” Madam de Fer said, “there are occularums that unveil their location, and we’ve been collecting them, they’re meant to open the door to a magically sealed temple in the Oasis.”

“There’ll be more of those wretched things then,” Vivienne informed them, “you cannot open it with just one.”

There were several corridors that branched off this part of the castle, they followed Leliana’s lead as she picked one at random and went in search of another trusted member of Alexius’s men. They uncovered several Venatori praying in what appeared to be a small library, their spellbinder bore yet another shard for them once they were felled.

“Shit, Tumbles,” Varric swore, wrenching a hand at the back of his neck. “Kid’s gonna give up the ghost if we take much longer.”

“Our numbers are great enough we can afford to split up,” Cassandra said, “one group will take the east, the other the west—”

“How the fuck do you know which way is—”

“Oh just follow me you wretched dwarf,” the Seeker snapped, “the rest split up between myself and Leliana.”

“Agreed,” the Spymaster said, looking to Dorian, “you and Eleanor should remain here, rest a moment. We’ll return with the keys.”
Well they would certainly get no argument from him. ‘Eleanor’ either it seemed except for her quiet plea, “Be careful.”

They sat in silence once Dorian led the girl to sit alongside him on a fallen pillar near the bookcases, his eyes scanning over spines he could see…literature did not take a turn for the better a year from their time, not at all. “I wonder just how long they’ll be, I could go for some light reading,” he jested quietly. When he was met with silence he asked, carefully, “Eleanor…do you truly not know how to read? To write?”

She didn’t look at him, but she did speak, “Numbers,” she said quietly.

“…well then. That simply won’t do,” he said. Damn him. He was really in this wasn’t he? “I believe I will join your Inquisition, I’d like to stick around and see what happens in his hug infested future you’ve promised.”

That seemed to give her a bit more life, “You will?”

“Certainly. And perhaps, since it would be inappropriate for the benevolent force that is the Herald of Andraste to learn magic from a Tevinter Necromancer…if you’d like…perhaps I could teach you to read.”

Ahh, her eyes regained some of their light and her lips turned up in the barest of smiles, but it seemed a great improvement to him, “Really?”

“I believe I would be honored.”

She squeezed his hand again, far more gently this time, “I’d like that I think.”

“Then we have a deal.”

And just in time…pun intended he supposed if he were truly an ally of Ellie’s. Their companions returned in force, bearing the last of the keys they needed to face Alexius.

“Are you ready?” Dorian asked.

Ellie nodded, knocking back a drought of Health potion before rising to her feet, broken blood vessels slowly healing before his eyes. “Let’s do this.”

The hall they earned passage into was nearly vacant, desolate. Alexius stood with his back to them, not daring to turn around as he gazed into the roaring fire before him, his voice dull, lifeless, “I knew you would return again, not that it would be now…but I knew I hadn’t destroyed you. My final failure.

“It doesn’t matter now. All we can do is wait for the end,” Alexius said.

Oh, that seemed to pressed a button with the Herald, Ellie looked up, the fiercest expression on her face as she railed, “It does matter, and I will fix this!”

“How many times have I tried?” Alexius asked himself, “The past cannot be undone. It was all for nothing. The Elder One comes for me, for you, for us all.”

Alexius was not the only occupant of this room, Dorian realized too late. Leliana had moved, abandoned her place in their group to come up to some crouching creature hunched near the fire, pulling him up and back to hold her knife at its...at his throat.

“Felix,” Dorian breathed, a knot forming in his throat, he could barely speak past it, “Alexius...what have you done?!”

“He would have died, Dorian! I saved him!” Alexius insisted oh Maker this man was truly broken.

Felix...that wasn’t living. That wasn’t alive, it was many things, horrible, awful, disgusting things, suffering, anguish, despair all placed upon the very last person in all the world that deserved it, but it was not life.

“Please...don’t hurt my son, I’ll do anything you ask,” Alexius begged.

Dorian saw, whoever held Felix’s corpse in her hands was not the same Leliana he’d met... Maker scarcely twelve hours ago, and somehow a year away. He could see a deal, or a plea ready to cross Ellie’s lips but he stopped her, pulling her toward him by the hand he still held, wrapping his other arm up and around to hold her face against his chest in the moment just before Leliana slit her captive’s throat, and Ellie flinched as whatever remained of Felix dropped to the floor with a thud, mercifully dead.

“No!” Alexius roared in anguish, casting against the Spymaster and sending her flying back off her feet.

Facing the whole of the Heralds enraged, revenge-fueled party did not bode well for Alexius, and though he fought them tooth and nail, twice he cast to create a tear in the Veil to call demons to his aid, Ellie fought, sealed those Rifts as soon as she could, and Gereon Alexius lay dead and defeated, at least here, in this time.

“We must move quickly,” Dorian urged, swallowing back...Maker he didn’t know what he felt, how he felt, there wasn’t time to process wrenching away that damn amulet out of Alexius’s cold dead hands.

Sounds of warfare, intrusion echoed through Castle Redcliffe and Leliana called out with grave certainty, “The Elder One is coming.”

“We will hold him off,” Cassandra told them, looking to Dorian, Ellie, “Maker watch over you both.”

“We’re going back Ellie, none of this will have happened, they’ll be safe,” Dorian promised the girl as she looked upon these people, those she loved most in all the world holding back tears as they lined themselves up to die in their stead so that they could hope to reach a better future.

He held Ellie’s Marked hand fast in his own, and the Amulet in the other pouring as much power as he could summon into the cursed thing, and just as soon as the chamber doors were thrown open...

Dorian and Ellie appeared, standing before Gereon Alexius, alive and well, falling to his knees in despair as his just-fallen enemies returned from whence he cast them to the sound of their allies clamoring in awe and relief the Herald of Andraste returned.

“It’s over, Alexius,” Ellie said, wearily leaning against Dorian for a moment before released his hand and went forward to kneel before Alexius. “You were lied to, and I’m so so sorry but the future you’re creating, it is nothing that you want. You fail in every single way imaginable and ultimately? I am sorry, truly but Felix is better off the way things are than the absolute horror you Inquisition soldiers came and saw Alexius in chains, a prisoner for his crimes against them.

“What is the meaning of this!” oh. Maker. Was that uh…the Arl of Redcliff? It was. Beautiful woman, maybe someone should tell her as such? Placate her, a bit before she tore their heads off now that she was finally able to access her Castle once more, “Fiona, I tried to grant your people safe haven and this is what you’ve brought into my home. Ousted me with a Magister, sent my people to their doom. You are no longer welcome in Redcliffe.”

“Arl, we have no where else to go—we were tricked and fooled, I regret what alliances we have made,” Fiona pleaded.

“Actually,” Ellie spoke up, coming to stand at Fiona’s side. “The Breach is still at large, a threat to us all.”

Fiona looked taken aback, and then sullenly she conceded, “I suppose we have no choice but to accept your offer.”

It was the closest to Ellie losing her cool when the Inquisition needed her to be diplomatic, that Dorian could imagine the girl could get without…any of that ‘flipping her business’ she’d threatened before. Her fists clenched, jaw setting as she cleared her throat trying to…either trying to remember that no one here save Dorian witnessed the future she experienced and she must be patient with them, or trying to forget that future in full as she said, “We would like to come to an agreement, yes. If you would work with us, join the Inquisition, your people could find refuge in Haven. I will ask for guidance on how best to move forward with you, and send my final decision to Lady Montilyet, when you arrive, she will give you the terms of your employment. If you wish to stay, you’ll have to sign.”

“By your leave,” Fiona granted, bowing respectfully before leading the few fellow mages of hers present out of the Arl’s throne room.

“Arl, I apologize, I understand this is your home and you’ve been kept from it, but would you mind if we stayed just a moment more?” Ellie asked.

“Certainly, Herald of Andraste. Do what you need to rid this place of the Imperium scum that sought to claim it. I appreciate the assistance you and your people have been to my own, and your work in the Hinterlands has been noted,” the Arl assured her.

“Thank you,” Ellie said, bowing before she turned and faced her party, “Just a minute.” And then she went to Felix, who stood still reeling from his father’s shame. “Hi,” she said.

Felix blinked only then noticing she’d approached. “My lady, Eleanor I apologize—”

“Don’t. None of this is your fault, it was your father’s decision. And I get it, really I do,” she said holding out her hand to him, “I want to show you something.”

He nodded, taking her hand and Ellie led him to…well to her gathered party.

“This, is Seeker Cassandra Pentaghast. Hand of the Divine, she’s been a driving force of the Inquisition since the very beginning, she’s the bravest woman I’ve ever known, strong and dependable, and honorable,” Ellie said, “and this is Solas—a powerful mage, he knows just about everything there is we can know about the Breach and the Rifts, he studies the Fade constantly and he’s doing tremendous research for the Inquisition to help us stop the Breach. Varric Tethras, our resident rogue storyteller, he’s chronicling the events of the Inquisition so in the future, no one will forget what we did here, or anyone who helped us—he’s a powerful archer and one of the best people I know, he’s very brave and so so clever. My handmaiden Marehis who…well she’s incredible, strong and capable, and I can’t really say, but she does a lot more for the Inquisition than braid my hair. Then there’s Sera—she’s a Friend of Red Jenny, that’s this amazing organization that helps small people affect change with noble houses and the wealthy, fighting against corruption in those ranks, she’s my best friend and an incredible archer, a prodigy really. Madam Vivienne de Fer is an accomplished mage, the Imperial Grand Enchanter for the Empress of Orlais herself, and she’s an incredible ally, powerful and strong, helping the Inquisition politically as well as magically. This is the Iron Bull, a mercenary leader of his own crew, the Bull’s Charger’s, as you can see…he’s amazingly strong, he’s got the actual biggest heart literally and figuratively, he’s tough and brave, and he gives the most amazing hugs. Then there’s his Sergeant Thom Rainier, an amazing warrior, he’s…made some mistakes in his life, but he’s learned from them, knows how to move forward and every day he proves that you can come away from the lowest low and achieve great things, he works hard for the Inquisition, and I’m glad to call him a friend. And of course, Leliana, our Spymaster, she advises me along with Cassandra, and takes care of some seriously complicated operations for the Inquisition, we wouldn’t be here today without her help.” Ellie looked to Felix, “There’s also a Lady Josephine Montilyet and a Commander Cullen Rutherford, advisors back in Haven—Josie’s the sweetest, most compassionate person I’ve ever met, she handles all of our political dealings herself, as our Ambassador, and Cullen’s just so kind and funny, and tough he’s incredible in his work with our forces,” she led him at last to Dorian and said, “and this is our most recent recruit, Dorian Pavus. You know him already but I have to tell you, if you ever get lost in timetravel, he’s definitely the one you want having your back.”

“If I must travel through time ever again, and I pray I never do,” Dorian acknowledged, “I must say, there’s no one else I’d rather team up with.”

Ellie smiled at that and then she released Felix’s hand only to offer her unmarked hand to shake and when he did she said, “And I’m Ellie. This,” she held up her Mark for his examination, “is my Mark. It seals Rifts and we are beyond certain it can and will seal the Breach. With the southern Mages powering it, and the alliance we hope to have from the Templars, working to suppress the Breach, we’ll seal it closed and it will never consume the world.”

“It is an honor to meet you all,” Felix assured, sounding mildly confused as to why Ellie was leading him around in introductions.

“I know…I know its not the same but…when I faced the Breach for the first time, I was in pretty rough shape. I was absolutely certain I was going to die…I did die technically. Anyway, I didn’t expect to live after sealing the Breach and that…well I know something about coming to terms with what you’re facing now. Something that helped, brought me peace was all the incredible people I got to meet—Cassandra, Varric, Solas, Leliana, Cullen. Seeing them, knowing that when I was gone the world would move forward with these amazing, incredible people in it, handling things, I knew I was leaving everything in capable hands, that there was so much hope for the future, and that…that really helped. So,” she admitted shyly, uncertain if she’d mis-stepped, “I thought maybe it might just help you too. That you know everything is going to be okay and the future is in good hands.”

Felix Alexius stared at the girl before him mouth working to find words before he stepped forward, and enveloped her in a hug, tears escaping his eyes just for a moment and he breathed, “Thank you.”

When at last the Herald and her party made their weary way out of Castle Redcliffe, Cassandra was the first to question, “Eleanor... just what happened when you went through the portal?”

“I... I’m going to explain everything, promise, but um,” her voice broke and she’d chosen to walk arm in arm with Dorian, hugging his arm more tightly now, chin quivering. She had done well to keep her composure but...Maker he needed to sleep for a week and have a good solid cry, he couldn’t imagine what she was feeling.

“The Iron Bull, do join us would you?” Dorian asked, and the Qunari made his way to Ellie’s side, Dorian jerked his head in her direction and he seemed to take the hint.

“Come on Imekari, I got you,,” the man rumbled out, crouching to take her up into his arms and her hand left Dorian’s momentarily as she wrapped her arms around the Qunari’s neck, her head resting against his shoulder as he carried her, shuddering as she tried to keep quiet while she cried, and she dropped the arm that was nearest to Dorian, holding out her hand.

“The short of it is this, Seeker Pentaghast,” Dorian said as he took a hold of the Herald’s hand and they resumed their journey to camp. “You are to reinstate the use of something called a 'mega-tent', and I am going to teach young Ellie here how to read.”

Chapter End Notes

Qunlat
Mashev-Esaam: Food hall. Mashev is basically Qunari gruel/general term for 'food', and Esaam 'Place'.

Tevene
Avanna: a respectful hello
Vitae Benefaria: a respectful farewell
Kaffas: Shit
Fasta Vass: untranslated but the way Dorian says it in Here Lies the Abyss sounds like the swear, "Fuck (me)!
Benefaris: In Dragon Age II Fenris is heard saying this whenever he takes Health potion, believed to be 'bottoms up' or 'to your health', something that would be used as a Tevene toast

Dalish
Da'vehnan: little heart

Solas/Marehis's conversation
Vehnan, emma lath, lasa ghilan ma halani? Ar dareth, dirthvaren--My heart, my love (laying it on thick), grant my help? I will be safe, I promise
Fen'harel ma ghilana!: Dread Wolf guides you!-a common Dalish curse
Bellanaris: as always/(eternity)
Ma nuvenin...dareth shiral: as you wish...go safely.

The song Marehis is heard singing both to Ellie as she falls asleep, and when they find her In Hushed Whispers is a canon Dalish lullaby (I'm sorry):

Iras ma ghilas, da'len/Where will you go, little one
Ara ma'nedan ashir/Lost to me in sleep?
Dirthara lothlenan'as/Seek truth in a forgotten land
*Sera's Armor: in her specs, Sera can't wear Elf armor because she's human trained. Since she's programmed to be a head taller than all Elves in game, I opt for going with she needs custom armor to reasonably fit

*Bull's bad ankle: implied canon, he wears a brace on his ankle in game, lots of people speculate its for an old injury and not just extra protection low on his blind side

*As you travel with Sera and Cassandra in your party, they have a conversation where Cassandra offers to teach Sera how to not be so afraid of magic, but in game Sera just tells her to stuff it and stand in front of her in fights, Cassandra agrees she can do just that. Obvs, for this story, there's a different character arch.

*Ellendra: she's from the quest 'My Lover's phylactery' and can be recruited to the Inquisition. You can recruit her yourself or let Vivienne do it for you, but if you do let her do it, Solas disapproves, so I reference that a bit, having Solas be pleasantly surprised that Vivienne doesn't jump at the opportunity Ellie offers, and lets Ellie do it instead

*When you ask Alexius how he came to indenture the southern Mages, he tells a tale of him being there after the Conclave and helping save the mages from templars

*Halward and Aquinea are the Maker given names of Dorian's parents

*Alexius did reach out to Dorian after their falling out and Dorian leaving his parents, to recruit him for the Venatori in the hopes he would help master Time Magic

*Necromancer is Dorian's given specialty in game

*I literally believe DA:I could have been so much better if they didn't make us pick between Mages and Templars and let us play both routes because you don't just find out some dude is unraveling time and go 'cool, see you later' plus the whole point of the Inquisition in canon was to end the war between Mages and Templars-anyway its a whole thing that's why we're here

*Antivan is Spanish, just like Ciriane is French

*If you talk to Dorian about Slavery in game, his family doesn't own any Elves

*9 year old Dorian was a brat...but then again so is 30 year old Dorian our precious son. Dorian's history in this fic is canon compliant, his upbringing, apprenticeship, when he ran away from home, his homelessness etc though some of his backstory, how long he's been in Redcliffe/how he got there and such was interpreted in a way that might possibly differ from canon there isn't a lot of solid details there, so I just went with what fits best for this story and makes the most sense given the Rifts we encounter blah blah blah

*Arishok instead of king: when playing chess in DA:I Bull uses Qunari terms for chess pieces

*Maevaris Tilani: FRIENDS when researching for this fic, I wanted the Magister house Krem's father was sold to, to be from around where Dorian is from, and he lives in the Qunaris. So I look that up. Magister house Tilani is there and lo and behold its Magister is the FIRST canon trans character Dragon Age had to offer (Krem is the first canon character offered in game). Maevaris Tilani's backstory is canon, she married Varric's cousin and she has a place in his little dwarf heart. Later in Trespasser Dorian and Maevaris have teamed up to form the Lucerni which is an organization meant to bring progress to Tevinter and restore its good name. Her actual nickname is Mae, so of course Varric calls her Mae-Mae Champions of the Just

Chapter Summary

Aftermath of time travel, lots of hugs, a little dragon slaying, and Ellie learns the alphabet.
Oh and almost gets possessed by a demon of Envy so that's cool too.

Chapter Notes

Hi! I'm back! I still own nothing!
So, picking up where we left off! Thanks for all the Kudos and comments, and just, for reading in general!

Imekari was heartbreak as they made their way to their northern camp, clung to Bull like her life depended on it just crying her heart out, and he wasn’t sure if he should be worried or grateful that she fell silent after all of five minutes, lulled into some state of unconsciousness before they set foot out of Redcliffe’s gate the hand in that Vint, Dorian’s grasp went limp, but he kept his hold, thumb rubbing circles. The guy looked like hell. Shit. That was some fucked up casting, one second they thought the kid’d been blasted, totally annihilated, all that was left of her and Dorian was scorch marks on the carpet, there wasn’t even time to process that horror show, that Ellie was dead, gone and there wasn’t a damn thing they could do about it, before that portal opened up again and boom, they’re back, alive and…somehow different than when they’d disappeared. Kid had said something to Alexius about the horrible future he created, but Bull didn’t want to even begin to think about the possibility that the girl had actually time traveled but there wasn’t a lot of explanation outside of that for, gone one second, back the next looking like… she didn’t seem badly hurt, beat up the pair of them, bruises and scrapes, and for a split second after they emerged from the portal Imekari’s Mark…Bull’s eyes had to be playing tricks on him because her entire hand had been engulfed in fadelight, halfway up her forearm, but it dissipated, or at least shrank back to normal size once the portal closed behind them.

“As are you injured, Dorian?” Cassandra asked quietly they approached their camp. Everyone had to have questions like mad, but they weren’t even sure where to begin. Checking in health wise was probably a good start.

“Nothing serious. I’ve health potion,” he said, though he didn’t make a move to retrieve any.

“Imekari’s out,” Bull said.

Marehis came near and rested a hand on the kids back, rubbing gently, “Da’len?” she prompted, concerned even more when the kid didn’t so much as stir.

“Exhaustion. Dermal injuries, bruises,” Solas reported, “It feels like she might have strained tendons in her Marked hand.”
“Let her sleep, if you can she…that was…” Dorian swallowed, “there are several troublesome things that should be addressed and reported to your people as soon as possible, I can tell you what we saw. You shouldn’t…she should speak of it at some point, but I would not press her before she’s ready.”

Marehis and Seeker took the kid from Bull…and Dorian, the guy almost hadn’t realized they’d been taking her, he’d startled and held her hand more tightly, seemed reluctant to let it go, and then seemed embarrassed about that, clearing his throat. He finally did dose himself with health potion and Thom was already stoking a fire in the camp’s pit. Sera trailed after Cassandra and Marehis when they slipped into a tent with Ellie, sounded like they were trying to get her changed, out of armor, check her out and get her resting comfortably.

Sera stayed with the kid, lying awake and listening, she’d told Marehis and Cassandra to go on, they were the ones that would know what to ask, had questions that needed answered, go get Sparky to tell them ‘what friggin’ happened!’.

“The Elder One is some man, claiming godhood that the Venatori follow, worship. We did not meet him in the future, but we saw what he wrought. After Ellie and I’s supposed demise, you lot retreated. You didn’t have much to say about what happened outside of holding a funeral for the Herald, Solas told me—”

“Wait, shit, we were there? Did you guys show up in Haven?” Varric asked.

“You were all there and no, we were merely transported to the basement of Castle Redcliffe a year in the future.”

“Do not interrupt him, Varric,” Cassandra snapped. “Please, Dorian, continue.”

A year in the future sounded fucked. “The Elder One is working to orchestrate the assassination of Empress Celene. In the future we went to, he succeeded, and used the aftermath to launch an attack on Orlais, Ferelden…‘the south’ is what Tevinters call the whole of everything from Antiva to Ferelden so, it could just as easily be assumed he took over the world at large, using an army of Demons. The Inquisition, according to The Iron Bull ‘went to shit’ and Alexius recaptured the Herald’s party as trophies for the Elder One. You were all his prisoner when we arrived. There was Lyrium—Red Lyirum everywhere, growing out of the walls, out of people, you were all infected with some sort of ailment from it, like your bodies were full of the stuff, you glowed red, your eyes were strange and…you weren’t handcuffed or bound in your cells I think the implication was you would eventually begin merging with the walls or floor once it started growing from you, and that seemed imminent I mean Maker you cried the stuff, not wet liquid tears but chunks of red Lyrium crystals that…it was disconcerting to say the least. I do not know the nature of your disease, how it was contracted, but you were all rather insistent that none of you touch Ellie.”

“Did any of us?” Cassandra asked, alarmed. Red Lyrium disease was definitely not what the kid needed right now how the hell would you even treat that?

“No, a few close calls. Most of you got the impression that Ellie was risen from the dead, thought she was a specter or something—Marehis was rather inconsolable—she did not think she would hurt her, I don’t think she realized for a moment that Ellie was actually alive and real. Solas…” Dorian cleared his throat, “stopped her. I did plan to cover for you two but your future selves seemed to have lost their resolve to disguise your relationship.”

“You make it sound like the world was ending, and we took the time to tell Ellie of our romantic entanglement?” Solas asked in disbelief, like perhaps Dorian was confused—maybe they hadn’t been sent to the actual future, perhaps they’d been cast into some pseudo-reality or something.

“Nothing quite so couth—you lot started sucking each other’s faces off. It is of little use anyway, the girl well knows of your relationship, she has for some time now.”

“She has?” Marehis asked.

“She didn’t plan on informing you…doesn’t perhaps but all this sneaking around is rather trite, isn’t it if she already knows? She’s pleased, happy that you two make each other happy,” Dorian assured them. “She explained something about how Solas would write letters to his ‘girlfriend’, while she couldn’t perceive that the name was yours, Leliana wrote to you also and Ellie saw that, quote, ‘the word shapes matched’.” Fuck. Word-shapes. But then Dorian was waving dismissively, “That isn’t necessarily important right now. Where was I?”

“Elves sucking face,” Varric supplied helpfully, and Bull could hear Sera giggling quietly, moaning out a soft ‘ewww’.

“Ahh yes. After that we found Leliana, she’d been taken captive and the Ventatori were torturing her for information—their Elder One, he believes Ellie knew about a sacrifice that was meant to take place at the Conclave, and they wanted to know how.”

Cassandra shook her head thinking it over, “Eleanor has no memory of the Conclave. But we bore witness to a vision we believe to be evidence of what took place when the Temple of Sacred Ashes was destroyed—a man…ugh horrible awful voice, he may well be this Elder One, he held the Divine captive, referred to her as ‘the sacrifice’, Eleanor came to her aid, but it did not seem like she knew what she was walking into, it was mere coincidence, she was near and heard Justinia’s pleas for help.”

“Alexius…he was keeping Felix alive somehow, did some sort of experiment on Leliana, infected her with Blight, ghoulsed her, whatever he did to her it looks like happened to F-Felix as well he…Maker he was just a husk of a body, nothing that resembled a living person and Leliana slit his—” sounded like the guy had gotten caught up in it, he shook himself, trying to regain focus, “I apologize, I’m getting off point again. We regrouped after finding Leliana and Maker, I don’t know how—no one had much to say on what happened while we were gone save the highlights, but perhaps it was because Ellie’s mark had been out of play for neigh on a year—the Breach had expanded, was actively expanding, it covered the whole of the sky and Rifts were tearing open left right and center, Ellie’s Mark gr-grew…I counted five naturally torn rifts that we were able to face and seal but it…Kaffas her Mark kept crackling and growing, I think Rifts were opening all over the place, out of reach, it was misery she said she wanted to die, and that was before Alexius, Maker, his…he could summon them, I thought we wouldn’t- she- the damn thing grew up to her elbow I worried it might just stay that way once we returned, but thankfully…oh we made it out just in time. Everything was just…ruin, That Elder One, he was coming, you- you made sure we got—she watched you all go to your deaths.”

Shit that was bad enough all on its own, but the guy seemed real torn up about it, pale, he definitely looked like he wasn’t doing too hot, heart racing and his breathing picked up almost like a panic attack, Bull reached out patted him on the back before resting his hand on the back of his neck, squeezing a bit to ease the tension there, “Did a damn good job keeping it together, getting her out of there.”

“Thank you, Dorian, truly,” Marehis said, and Bull could see the actual moment Solas realized he could never say a damn thing against the Vint again—he’d been bordering on cold rudeness since meeting the guy but it looked like he didn’t care to keep up whatever animosity he felt, and he certainly wasn’t going to risk his woman’s wrath, she looked like she felt she owed the world to the guy.

The tent Imekari was in opened and Sera’s head popped out. “Oi. Sparky. Get in here and snuggle.”

That got her a mirthless laugh and, “Well. I suppose a nap wouldn’t be amiss.”

Scouts had been holding down the fort in this camp, keeping track of the dragon’s movements oh man, a dragon it was exciting shit, but they had other things to focus on right now. Seeker asked the Scouts to head to Redcliffe and help the forces Leliana was orchestrating there, bringing Alexius in as a prisoner of the Inquisition, and escorting the Mages to Haven. Then she sat with everyone gathered around the fire as Cassandra wrote up a report on everything that happened, going to meet the Magister, everything Dorian had reported happening in the future, and then she wrote up word for Adan to ask the man about the red lyrium disease they’d witnessed, and the fact the kid’s Mark had spread and shrank. Took all of an hour before a return message came in from Haven, Stitches writing on Adan’s behalf to inform them their Healer had taken all of two seconds to throw his shit together before he hauled ass out of Haven to come meet them in the Hinterlands—he didn’t give a damn if they had to postpone their meeting their allies at Therinfal Redoubt, he didn’t want them stepping foot outside the Hinterlands before he could get there and examine the girl and Dorian properly.

And then there was the uh…four-hour long hellshow when everyone sort of lost their collective shit. Everything settled, everyone safe…Bull wasn’t sure who started it but Seeker and Tethras got into a shouting match over why no one realized the kid couldn’t even read, and why the kid felt she needed to hide the fact, Madam de Fer got involved going on about how it slipped the Inquisition’s notice the girl hadn’t any proper education before, and Solas started…not shouting, but close, that none of that mattered now, what was important was they knew now, what they should be concerned about is catching the girl up in that regard and working to help her regain her self-esteem insofar as her intelligence is concerned, he realized she’d been feeling guilty for not confessing to her lack of knowledge, but too embarrassed to ask for help. That turned into Marehis airing her grievances against Rainier and Tethras all at once, how dare Thom mislead Ellie about his identity, his vile past, make her feel tricked and betrayed, and that obviously the girl now had some sort of insecurity in her intelligence after being so fooled, and then having Varric insult her further, make it so the girl did feel stupid over the whole thing, it was reprehensible. Woman just about popped that vein traveling up the center of her forehead, railing at the two who weren’t really going to defend themselves, outright admitted they deserved it, Rainier was apologetic, remorseful as said he’d seen Ellie talking down about herself and wished with everything in him he could do something to set her to rights. Tethras looked sick with worry that his fight with the kid had sent her thinking if she asked for help—was forthright about her lack of education—her friends would look down on her.

Everyone let off steam, finally worked their way back down to agreeing, it didn’t matter the fault, they needed to work together, do what was best for the kid.

Which started with getting the mega-tent was back in full force. Thankfully they didn’t have to butcher any Inquisition tents. Took all hands on deck, but Madam de Fer offered up her tent, it could be stretched to accommodate them, they had to really coordinate to spread it into something big enough for all of them to sleep under but there was no way in hell they weren’t doing it—it was only concreted further when Imekari woke up from her nap.

Kid could be heard getting restless, stirring a bit, and then her breath caught, heart thumping wild in her chest, Sera gave out a concerned sounding whine, “Shite, Inky, wake up, its o-”

Ellie sat bolt upright and screamed, panicked as she incoherently begged for Marehis to please stop crying before she got a bearing for her real surroundings, found herself with only Sera and Dorian in sight and she started hyperventilating, rasping out a question of where is everyone between stolen breaths she worked to catch.

She only really calmed once she was seated with her entire party around the fire, in her pjs, Marehis had wrapped her Marked hand up before the kid had laid down because they were pretty sure it was sprained, Dorian sat at her side and she clutched his hand in her unmarked one, shaking like a leaf and Madam de Fer came armed with one of those blankets of hers, wrapping it around Ellie’s shoulders, hugging the girl from behind in the same motion, rubbing her arms for a moment murmuring about how she must be frigid before she took to her own seat. Solas was working on brewing up something warm to drink and everyone just sat in silence. Marehis looked like she was close to tears as she came and got Ellie to scoot so she was sitting on the Elf’s lap, Marehis wrapping her arms around her, keeping her head tucked up under her chin quietly comforting her, “We’re all safe, da’len. Dorian gave us a full report, everything you could forewarn us of, the Inquisition will be preparing for. We’re going to sit tight for a few days. Healer Adan is coming to check you over.”

Kid got this startled look on her face like that worried her and Bull was quick to assure, “He won’t be traveling all on his own, Stitches is tagging along,” the guy had gone to catch up with the Healer, told Bull to consider it a chunk of his yearly leave, “So he’ll be safe. And Haven’s covered — Adan’s got applicants in vying for apprenticeships and healers positions so there’s lots of helping hands right now.”

That seemed to placate her, kid was quiet as shit though for the rest of the day, and she jacked the worry factor in her party way up when she shook her head at the offer of potion when Marehis realized she wasn’t eating her meal at dinner, just barely pushing the food around her plate absentmindedly.

“Tumbles, come on, you gotta eat something,” Varric tried when they were cleaning up from dinner, but the kid just shook her head and for a minute Bull thought she was getting up to retreat into a tent, but she just went to where Varric was sitting and wrapped her arms around his neck and curled up against him.

Dwarf sighed. “Okay kid,” Varric conceded gently as he held her back.

She didn’t say anything just buried her face against his neck and Bull could smell the salt of her tears, though Varric looking like he’d accidentally set off an explosive was evidence enough that she was crying again.

Got late enough, Solas sat her down with an offer of meditation and even Sera joined in on the practice. Apparently Cassandra had said it would help with her training, and the youngest of their Elves made a damn good effort at meditating for the first time, it was definitely not her calling but she gave it her best before giving up and just flopping onto her back to wait it out while the others finished.

Mega-tent wasn’t that awkward, Madam de Fer hadn’t sounded certain of the idea when it was first explained to her, but everyone settled in to the warm clean tent, basically… the inquisition was a cuddle party, that was it, just everyone gathered together in a massive pile of bodies to sleep surrounding what Bull was certain had to be the saddest kid in the world. She did take potion for sleep not wanting to risk revisiting the actual timeline the Maker abandoned in her dreams again and Bull wasn’t certain how well anyone slept, everyone just seemed to be thinking too loudly or too busy listening for any distress from the kid.

Dorian was the first one up. Maybe the guy hadn’t slept though, Bull heard him swearing in Tevene, fucking with something outside the tent.

Trying to get the fire going again apparently, guy was tired as shit, squinting in the dark, sweating despite the chill as he tried getting the pretty well burned out bits of ashy wood to spark under a fire spell to no avail.

“Sit down, I got it,” Bull said.

“Vasta fass!” Dorian hissed, whirling around to see him, heart hammering in his chest, “Maker’s breath, I didn’t hear you!”

“Sit.”

Guy finally did as he was told, straight down on his ass, slumping before the fire pit while Bull got it refueled and a proper fire going again. Something was broken about him. Came that way, before this time travel business, Bull’d seen it when Ellie asked the guy’s permission before daring to cast Barrier on him. There’d been this quiet gratitude for that. And then when Madam de Fer had been grilling the guy after a fashion, trying to seem aloof about her interest but she clearly didn’t approve of Tevinter magic, wanted to make it clear she wouldn’t abide the use of Blood Magic—something like sympathy had twisted in his guts when he saw how the guy’s jaw set, looking like he was holding back something heavy, weighed him, as he ground out very coldly that Blood Magic was the resort of a weak mind, and he certainly held no such weakness. Something… something had happened there, and Bull didn’t like the idea of blood magic in general but fuck this guy’d had some kind of experience with it that left him scared. Internal, not external, at least none that Bull’d gotten a look at, wasn’t sure what the guy had going on under his robes…and damn it Imekari he wasn’t going to find out. Nope. Not happening. He didn’t know what kind of magic the kid had at her disposal, but he could practically hear wedding bells with Marehis and Solas, and Seeker…shit she was pretty struck with Cullen, and he definitely had a mad thing for her, the makings of long term, committed relationships and that was so, so not happening here.

“You know, time travel’s real fucked up. Kid saw some rough shit but uh…so did you. Can’t have been easy watching the world go to hell, especially at the hands of someone you used to respect. Seeing what happened to that Felix, he’s your friend. Or er…?”

Dorian leveled him a menacing glare. “Alexius was my mentor, took me under his wing when I seemed a lost cause, welcomed me into his home. I would hardly betray his kindness dallying with his son. Felix is a friend, better than I deserve really.”

“Hey, no judgement here, just, you obviously care about the guy is all I mean. It’s okay to not be okay with what you saw, everyone’s watching out for Imekari, but uh, you need anything, to talk or whatever, about yesterday’s shit or anything else, Qunari are pretty good listeners.”

Dorian regarded him for a moment and then nodded. Didn’t say anything, they sat in silence, but sometimes that was all you needed too. Maybe that’s just how Vint men were. Lots of silence the first few days after Krem joined on, poor kid tried and tried to work up the ability to apologize, or thank him, just walk up to Bull, mouth working little spurts of sound coming out and then he’d just deflate and offer him water or potion from Stitches or food. Always came armed with something to fall back on like he knew he wasn’t going to be able to say anything. ‘til one morning he came stomping up to Bull, shouted, “You crazy bastard—you don’t even know me! What the hell were you thinking?!” and slammed a breakfast tray down in front of the Qunari. “Always down for a good fight,” he’d said. And he was, and he sure as hell wasn’t down for just standing by when something messed up was going down but uh…well shit, he’d never said as much but seeing this kid, getting beat on by an entire Tevinter Tribune, and still fighting, still holding his ground like he stood a damn chance…reminded him of himself, his last fight in Seheron before he submitted himself for Reeducation. Could of use a hand in that fight, thought maybe it was only fitting he be the turn of the tide in this one when he busted in to break some Vint heads.

Everyone rallied for breakfast, even the kid, though she didn’t come out for her usual prayer thing. But she did show up as they started getting breakfast going and didn’t say anything, quietly helped Rainier and Marehis cook, ate enough to take potion when Seeker quietly reminded her it was important she keep to her regimen and if she didn’t she ran the risk now, skipping a dose of crap that kept monthlies at bay, of it not working when the time came if it wasn’t thoroughly in her system. So she ate enough to take potion without it making her sick, wasn’t what Bull’d qualify as a meal though, not by a long shot, and then she retreated into the tent. Day was pretty quiet, Seeker sat with those who would join her in taking down the Dragon and talked strategy, preparing them for what it would be like to face off with one of those things. Sera, Dorian and Marehis would hang back and sit tight with the kid while the others went out, watch her, keep her distracted if she noticed anything was up.

And he hated himself for saying it but…well damn it, it had to be considered, “Seeker uh, I know we technically need this for the whole ‘allies bending the arm of the Templars’ thing, and I’m the last damn person that wants to naysay fighting a Dragon but. Uh. Kid’s pretty well wrecked over the shit she saw, us all uh dying and all. Taking such a big risk, even though we know we got this, might not…uh…might not sit well with her. Freak her out. Is there some other way to get those Orlesian assholes on our side?”

“I do see your point, the Iron Bull,” Cassandra sighed. “I worry as well. It is something we must do, I plan to sit Eleanor down and explain the situation, showing her there is a necessity for our actions, and a surety that we have it well in hand. It is not something we can keep her from ever knowing—there will be celebration of our Dragon slaying when we return to Haven, the invitation to which will be reward for our allies.”

They had planned on talking her through it over dinner, but a new level of debauchery came from her time in the future.

Got the meal underway, Madam de Fer actually deigned to assist in its preparation, making some kind of grilled Ram’s meat and creamy sauce working alongside the likes of Rainier, and Sera was working with Solas making what the younger Elf called ‘Vegetable pish s’good for Inky’. Vegetable medley, he was pretty sure she meant. Pretty sure.

Solas just about chopped his damn thumb off instead of a carrot when Ellie screamed—not scared, not ‘frightened’ scared, panic scared—in pain. Marehis and Seeker had been sitting with her, and they let out overlapping shouts for Solas who went diving into the tent beating everyone to Ellie’s side, they all sort of crowded because fuck.

Ellie was wide eyed, dazed and confused as she clutched at her Marked hand, shaking and sweating, hyperventilating. Solas sent active their connection when she screamed to figure out what was hurting her, and he shouted for someone to lay eyes on the Breach because her Mark was spreading.

Except it wasn’t. Not even a little—Bull laid eye on the Breach himself, it hung in the distance big and menacing, but no larger than it had been, and Solas was carefully examining her Mark, it had been her Marked hand hurting her, and it felt like the Mark was flaming, spreading further up her hand, up her arm at a horrifyingly accelerated rate, but that wasn’t the case, it was still nestled securely in the palm of her hand.

“We should consult with Adan when he arrives, Ellie. But I do not believe your Mark is truly spreading, it is, well—” Solas seemed at a loss for how exactly to explain, but it was Asala-Taar, straight up.

Everyone cleared way when Bull came back into the tent, had to basically crawl or risk getting Madam de Fer’s expensive ass tenting caught up in his horns, but he went to Ellie sitting up in her bedroll with Marehis holding her tight against her, and he sat before her on his knees, holding out his hands in invitation, he didn’t want to grab at them himself on the off chance she didn’t want the contact, and her Marked hand was still bandaged, so it might be painful. But she put her hands in his and he held them carefully.

