“Imekari, sometimes when we experience trauma our minds latch on to specific aspects, it can make you re-experience those things, even if they aren’t actually happening again. Like how panic attacks derive from the body interpreting danger that isn’t physically present and threatening your life,” he brought her unmarked hand to the scar slashed across his chest. “Got this, most of these,” he said, jerking his head to indicate the rest of his body, the scars on his torso, biceps, his legs, all from getting some payback in Seheron. Tal-Vashoth got to a baker that poisoned his unit, killed most of ‘em, used that same poison to kill a school of children*. Sent him right over the damn edge. “infiltrating a Tal-Vashoth base, under manned, and we were overpowered, and uh… well, it wasn’t pretty but I’m still here, can’t say the same for the people I went in with. Had to turn myself over to the Reeducators after that. Even after I got all healed up, there are days these things feel fresh like when I was lying in the dirt waiting to die, reopened—actually did reopen one on my back once, thought it was just my brain’s bullshit till Krem was dragging my ass back to camp. I know it sucks big time kid, you gotta breathe through it, and try to separate real and not real. Grounding helps.”

The kid’s gaze was hollow as she nodded mouth working like she wanted to say something but all she did was sit up on her knees, pulling out of Marehis’s hold, slipping her hands out of Bull’s to wrap her arms around his neck, felt like one of her ‘sorrys’ but fuck, the kid hadn’t…she hadn’t said much of anything since the castle. He wrapped an arm around her and made their precarious way out of the tent, sat himself down in front of the fire while everyone resumed their cooking, meat came out a bit crispy but still edible. Imekari wasn’t…she didn’t say a word, just ended up sitting in Bull’s lap staring into the fire, plate sitting untouched in her lap, he even left some of his food on his own plate to see if he could tempt the girl into stealing it but no such luck. And the following morning at breakfast the kid didn’t even try to make an appearance. She just laid still and silent, even when Sera tried getting her to come out and join them, all that resulted in was the Elf emerging from the tent, shaking as she said, “Inky won’t say anything and sh-she…I don’t know, shite I think friggin time magic broke her!”

Seeker seemed to have a solution of sorts. Mulled it over a moment and then she reached a hand up to pull something from her hair and the braid she kept wrapped like a crown around her head came falling down and she pulled out the hair tie, rising and leaning forward to shake her hair out, completely loose before whipping it back up over her shoulders which was damn hot, and then she went to stand in the tent entry way and said, “Eleanor? Would you help me with my hair? I am having difficulty with it today, and I believe you did call ‘dibs’ braiding it, have you not?”

That at least got the kid to come out and get some damn sunlight, and she…he wasn’t sure what the fuck they were going to do but she needed to eat. She was wan, pale, legs unsteady as she came to sit on the ground by the fire behind Seeker, gently combing the Nevarran woman’s hair.

“Your hair’s really pretty.”

Fuck yeah, those were whole-ass words! An entire sentence! Seeker looked like she was thanking every otherworldly power out there as she smiled and said, “Thank you, Eleanor.”

When Ellie finished with Cassandra’s hair it wasn’t the usual tight braid the Seeker worked her hair into to wrap around her head, it was looser, and she let it hang over her shoulder. She turned to face the girl, taking her hands in hers. “How are you feeling?”

Kid shrugged. “Um. I’m pretty sorry, actually. You…you aren’t mad at me?”

Didn’t really click with him what the hell the kid was on about until the Seeker sighed and said, “Make no mistake, I do not appreciate being intentionally mislead, Eleanor. By the time you were forthright about your semantics, you put me in a position where I had to allow you to move forward with a plan I felt was unsafe for fear of compromising Leliana and her forces already in position to strike castle Redcliffe.”

Oh yeah, the kid’s whole ‘if I look at this and I’m not scared’ bit she pulled with the Seeker. Smart-alecky but uh, Bull had to have mad respect for it, sort of reminded him of when he was imekari—wasn’t the exact same situation but the whole reason he ended up becoming Ben-Hessrath in the first place* was because he was a little smartass, kind of cool to see something of the same in the kid. Little Bull, just called ‘Imekari’ then like everyone else his age, had always looked out for the other kids…admittedly he was a snitch when he thought someone was gonna do something stupid and get hurt doing it, already a spy of sorts, and then ultimately, he had a serious bone to pick with broccoli. Shit was nasty, but it was the only thing left on his dinnerplate and a Tamassran said he couldn’t get up and go play with the others until he ate two more things off his plate. She meant two more pieces of broccoli, but he’d done that dance more than once so he’d been prepared, had a two chunks of meat hidden away in his pockets from the start of the meal. He’d looked the Tamssran right in the eyes as he pulled them out, plopped them back on the plate, and then ate them—technically doing what he was told—before running off to join his friends. Soldiers were expected to follow rules and protocol both to the word, and in the spirit they were given in so, ‘Imekari’, child, became ‘Ashkaari’, one who thinks, given over to the Ben-Hessrath to train.

“But,” the Seeker allowed as she rubbed circles along the back of Ellie’s unmarked hand, “I do understand your drive to deal with Alexius, and it was necessary—we know now all too well the future he was bringing about, one we can stop now thanks to your forward experience. And it has born severe consequences for you as it stands, I would not seek to punish you further, whether it be in deed or being cross toward you,” the kid looked absolutely relieved she hadn’t pissed off the Seeker.

“I am really, really sorry I mislead you,” Ellie promised the woman.

The woman scoffed at that as if to say it was not worth being ‘sorry’ over, and Cassandra reached out to cup the girl’s face, “Fool girl, why did you simply not tell me sooner you did not know how to read?”

Imekari sighed, “I did tell you,” she insisted. “I said day one of this Herald business I’d never had an education outside of a little magic, I don’t say things I don’t mean—not usually, anyway. I thought you all knew I couldn’t, you never hesitated to help me with letters and requisitions. By the time I realized everyone had gotten it twisted, thought that I did know how to read and write I…well I realized everyone does! Everyone in the Inquisition can do it, so I thought it must not be that hard, but I tried figuring it out on my own and it doesn’t make any sense to me, so I thought… I thought I was just so stupid, but—"

Solas had to subtly rest a hand on Marehis’s arm, hold her back from launching herself at Varric, and the kid startled when she suddenly had nine adults clamoring at once, half-shouting to her in a reprimand/encouragement/denial, Bull’s own booming “Imekari!” in the mix. Straight up scolding, in what world did the Iron Bull scold? But the kid wasn’t-! She wasn’t allowed to say crap like that about her damn self!

“Ellie, da’vehenan,” Marehis rasped out, “why in the world would you ever think such a thing?”

“Everyone knows how to do it and I couldn’t understand—and I tried!”

“Of course you couldn’t Eleanor,” Cassandra argued, “you lack of knowledge— knowledge, not intelligence. You merely need to be taught.”

“But Sera came up like me and she figured it out on her own—”

Sera looked startled at that, “Shite! Inky! I just meant arrows!” she screeched, “I didn’t- frick! It’s like friggin pride cookies all over again! I en’t doing that, fuck it,” that didn’t make much sense but then again it is Sera. The Elf shot up onto her feet and stomped away to the bushes off near the edge of their camp, breaking off a long branch, wielding it in her hand like a sword as she came marching back, “You’re not stupid! You just haven’t had the same opportunities as everyone! Half of these prick heads we work with were born with silver spoons in your friggin pieholes, and some of us got there!”

“What do you mean?” Ellie asked quietly looking very wary of the branch in Sera’s hand like she worried the girl might start smacking people with it.

“Inky I…I’ve been living like you, on my own sorting for myself, no help from nobody, that wasn’t a lie, but I didn’t exactly grow up that way. I don’t talk about it none cause yeah it en’t nobody’s business, but…I guess there’s a sense of pride in people thinking I’ve always toughed it out, never had nothing from nobody but…gah! That isn’t true. We’re different*,” Sera let out a frustrated sound and then, “I got caught stealing food when I was a little thing, way littler’n you, I was an actual tot at the time, and people usually get alienage or worse for theft but instead I got taken in by this bitchy…bitch! Lady Emmauld, she couldn’t have kids of her own, she was sick or somethin’, she saw me getting into trouble and since I didn’t have anyone she became my ‘patron’ or whatever. She left me her estate and pish but I signed it away, didn’t want any part of that garbage, money and things, power, too much of it, with no accountability is the exact recipe for a shitty person, I saw that plainly coming up under the likes of Lady Emmauld she…she was just a bad person. So I went out on my own did my own thing without any of that garbage. But I grew up alright Inky, lived in a house, had a cook and pish, and I had tutors that taught me shite, reading and writing and math and science.” She planted the stick in the ground and dragged, started writing something in the dirt before their campfire, “Lady wouldn’t let me learn fighty shite, wasn’t ladylike she said, but I did learn pish like geometry, physics,” the Elf rattled off, “aerodynamics, energy, velocity, blah blah blah blah blah.”

Bull’s brain went ‘blah blah blah’ what the actual…between the variables and fractions involving deltas and velocity and something to do with the thousandth power…maybe…this…he was good at math, especially money math, but just looking at the damn thing Sera scrawled out gave him a headache.

When she finished she cast aside her writing stick and crouched as she examined the formula she’d written, “Fill that in with all the right things and I got myself a decent shot, every time.”

…that…uh…well holy shit.

“Buttercup,” Varric said with quiet amazement, “…are you an actual genius?”

“Piss up a rope!” Sera snapped at him before looking to Ellie, “Point is, I had help. Nobody just knows shite, Ink.”

Kid nodded in understanding, “Everyone needs taught everything,” Ellie agreed seeming thoughtful, “Dorian said something like that, that I shouldn’t be embarrassed about not knowing something I’ve never had the opportunity to learn.” Well damn, the guy was earning points all over the place, helping the kid out, “So I did plan on bringing it up maybe when we got back to Haven, if someone wouldn’t mind teaching me—I mean its not exactly something I need need to know, like how I had to learn how to fight or ride a horse or use my magic or act fancy. But then, you know. Everything sort of just happened.”

“Eleanor the Inquisition would hardly begrudge giving you tutelage in anything you needed,” Cassandra insisted, “We…misguidedly assumed you had such knowledge of your own, if we had known, you would have been offered lessons months ago. You are…comfortable learning from Master Pavus?”

“Uh-huh! If he still wants to teach me,” Ellie said, looking to the Tevinter in question.

“I would be absolutely delighted,” the man graciously assured her.

“Ser’…” Ellie said, holding out her unmarked hand to the Elf who took it, swinging their arms a bit, “Thanks, you know, for saying all that. You didn’t have to but…I mean there isn’t anything to be ashamed of, I mean all kids are supposed to come up with help, its not a character flaw that you had a roof over your head, that you were fed and educated. Um…should I be sorry Lady Emmauld died?” that…wasn’t a usual turn of phrase but kid had obviously picked up what Sera was putting down…fuck, what kind of wack-job raised this girl? Elf had serious issues…
mostly with being an Elf and that spoke volumes to the sort of attitude ‘kindly human’ woman taking in a little orphan Elf girl had.

“Nope!” Sera assured her.

“Well then I’m sorry for whatever makes it that way,” Ellie said sincerely. “Um. You can always talk to me and stuff, you know?”

“Bleck! I’m done with the therapy session!” Sera griped, pulling her hand away, though she did sigh and say, “But thanks, Inky.”

Kid seemed to be feeling better, more like herself. She was chatty, checking in on how everyone was doing since the Castle—apologized for having been so out of it, ‘getting in a mood’ she called it.

“Sweet girl,” Marehis shook her head, “Dorian explained the things you saw when you were cast into the future. It is understandable, while we are all well and unharmed now, you…you experienced the loss of those you hold dear, da’len. Needing time is understandable.”

“But you guys are alright. I was such a baby about it for like, gosh its been like three days or something right?” Kid had really been out of it, huh?
“Eleanor, it is only now the second day since our dealings at Castle Redcliffe,” Cassandra said. “You’re allowed time to process and cope. Wasn’t it you who said I am the ‘bravest’, strong and dependable?” she questioned, and when Ellie nodded she said, “You taking a day to mourn is hardly ‘being a baby’. I was bedridden for months after Antony’s loss.” Oh shit. Brother—Seeker had mentioned him a few times when talking strategy for taking down the dragon. Damn.

Imekari hugged Cassandra tight, sat with her when they all gathered around for breakfast. All said and done, kid ate everything she was given—two bowls filled to the brim with oatmeal, melon Bull had chopped up for her cuz kid needed some damn vitamins, and every last slice of toast Sera kept pushing her way—doing a sort of potions toast with Dorian since the guy was still knocking back supplemental nutrient potions…what the fuck had happened with him that he’d been so malnourished in the fir-? Nope. Don’t care. Not really. Just a little bit, but that was just on account of his training, he observed everything. Just about everything anyway. Really ground his damn horns he hadn’t realized Imekari couldn’t read—he’d seen the look on her face when he gave her her first present from Krem, the soft realization dawning in her face when he told her it was her name scrawled out on the tag. Kid had never seen her own damn name before just- he should have figured it out!

He. Really. Should. Have. He was pretty sure he was having an aneurism. Because mail came, right as they were finishing up breakfast. Fucking. Krem.

“Imekari, I swear, he didn’t hear it from me,” Bull promised as he handed off the parchment that had been folded in half and nestled in the center Krem’s latest report to Bull with ‘In the case of a sad Herald, break seal’ written across the back. Guy’d been filled in on what he could be told about their Mage talks go awry, that Ellie was in rough shape.

Kid looked confused for a moment as she accepted the parchment and unfolded it to see what Bull had seen, and a smile spread across her face before she broke out laughing.

“Eleanor?” Madam de Fer asked after the girl, looking bewildered.

“Sk-Sk-Skinner she- ahhh!” the kid couldn’t damn breathe she was laughing hysterically.

When she finally calmed down enough she gleefully declared, “That’s so mean!”

What came for Ellie was a…Bull wasn’t sure what it was. No words, just illustration? Krem uh, well shit he’d done a pretty damn good job. Sometimes the guy would doodle on things, usually crude-intentioned drawings to amuse himself or Bull when reading over his Lieutenant’s reports, but this was way more elaborate.

He’d drawn up these boxed images, different panels told a story, about what definitely resembled Skinner, scowling expression and all, creeping into the tents where the Charger’s ground troops slept, among them were now their newest recruits, and Skinner had uh. Welcomed them. Next was the image of Skinner perched on the foot of the cot owned by what Bull supposed was either whoever Skinner pegged as a ringleader among them or just some schmuck that struck her wrong. Then Skinner striking a match followed by the view the poor guy must have seen when he was startled awake by the sound—Skinner staring silently, her scowl illuminated by the ominous glow of match light. She’d blown it out and it was all weird and strange enough to send the guy backpedaling out of his cot onto the ground, and when the ruckus woke everyone else in the tent woke and when they saw him scrambling to his feet, making a run for it, they all started running with him only to find that Rocky and Grim were waiting outside their tent, holding a rope taut for their retreating numbers to trip over, resulting in a massive man-pile.

“Maker’s breath, that’s…” Rainier squinted at the parchment when Imekari shared it with the others, “Cyril*,” he named the man Skinner had startled, “has to be, poor bastard. Krem’s got quite the talent though.”

Huh. He really did, sort of ticked in Bull’s brain a bit, made him wonder if the boy had once had an interest in it—never really got into specifics of what drew him to his former career in the Military.

“You uh…told Krem you can’t read?” Bull asked. Sort of made more sense the guy not putting any pressure on the girl to write him or wait for him to do so to her, if that was the case.

Ellie shook her head. “Nuh-uh.”

“He said you talked about how you didn’t have something consistent like school or anything to keep track of time and pish any when you was little, and he noticed you’d always ask for words by sound,” Sera…for some reason…could explain, “buh-words instead of ‘b’ words and shite. Somethin’ too about you know something called sign language but you said you don’t understand fing—” the Elf cackled a bit, decided not to risk the temptation of turning ‘finger-spelled’ into something dirty, “spelled out words. He put it together, didn’t wanna embarrass you so he ran his whole ‘telling Inky he likes her, that they’d just chat each other up when she gets back thing’ by me when Inky was all napping before we left,” she fessed up. “Said Inky showed him the list I marked up from Viv, and figured I knew too, otherwise he’d just gone with his gut and left me out of it.”

Fucking Krem was getting put in a damn headlock when Bull got back—he knew, and he hadn’t given Bull a damn bit of heads up! It’s not like Bull would’ve made Imekari feel bad about it but…yeah, he got keeping it on the down low, out of respect for Ellie since the kid had been embarrassed as shit about it. Eh. Still, headlock—it as basically their form of low-level hugging. Saved actual hugging for the big stuff—wasn’t about that toxic masculinity bullshit but he never wanted to coddle the guy too much either, ding his pride any.

“Would you please thank Cremisius for me?” Ellie asked Bull, “Tell him I liked his drawing. And to maybe tell Skinner not to terrorize Thom’s men quite so much.”

“You got it boss,” he said, “No promises that Skinner will lighten up…that was literally her form of warm welcome.”

Ellie smiled at that before she took a deep breath then and looked to Seeker. “Um, so. What’s on now? We’ll be headed for Therinfal Redoubt?”

“Ahh. We…we’re still awaiting Healer Adan—he and Ser Stitches have sent word that they’ve entered the Hinterlands and should be here soon—to look you and Dorian over, ensure you’ve not picked up whatever Red Lyrium illness that was apparently catching in the future,” Cassandra explained.

“Oh, gosh, I forgot about that—that they were coming, I mean, not the—” kid shuddered a bit. “That’s sweet of them, to come all this way.”

“There is also the matter of…well Eleanor there is something we must do, a majority of us as a team. But I would ask…I would command you, to stay here, in camp. I will hear absolutely no argument on the matter, do you understand?”

“…Cassandra I’m always a bit arguey if its important, but I don’t mean any disrespect by it. What am I supposed to restrain that impulse for?”

Seeker carefully laid out the fact that some of their Orlesian allies with fealty to Grand Duke Gaspard, had backed out of the agreement to meet at Therinfal Redoubt. But, they could regain enough allies, they were decently certain, if they did something that would catch the nobilities’ attention—at the very least, garner their loyalty just to be connected to such a feat. Cassandra Pentaghast, of the famous Pentaghast line, would slay a dragon as a representative of the Inquisition. The woman was quick to assure Ellie she would be doing no such thing alone—though given time, a few days to properly bait and trap, subtly lead the dragon to injury and capture, she could very well do so single handedly—she would have more than enough help but she would not hear of Ellie being a part of that.

Ellie was quiet as she listened, fists clenching but after a moment of consideration she said, “I don’t like it. At all. Not even a little. And I might freak out a bit but…I…I guess it’s sort of like how I had to go face Alexius when you were scared. You have to do this, too. My turn to be scared. Just. Don’t get eaten, kay? Any of you. As impossible as time travel is, I feel more confident about coming back from that than I do about you making your way out of a Dragon’s stomach safely.”

“Oh I quite assure you, if swallowed whole, Eleanor, the feat is rather possible,” Seeker said, “It is a risky but effective, accredited method of Dragon slaying my great grandfather preferred.”

Kid crinkled her nose at that. “Yick.”

“Yick indeed. I hold no such preference myself,” Cassandra assured her warmly, smiling softly as she patted Ellie’s hands, “we will head out after lunch—the Iron Bull, Madam de Fer, Solas, Varric, Rainier and myself—and we shall return before dinner, it will not take more than a few hours.”

“War horn on my belt kid, I’ll signal—big long victory blow when we kick that things ass,” Bull promised.

Imekari jutted out a pinkie at him, “No getting eaten, be super safe, and stock up on potion before you leave, all of you. And yeah, signal the second you’re done and safe.”

It was clumsy going but he got his pinkie carefully intertwined with hers as he sealed their struck deal.

“Oh. Wait…” Ellie said, looking to Cassandra, “um. I sort of remember…Lady Josie asked me not to pick sides about the whole ‘throne’ situation, but to try my best to lean in favor of Duke Gaspard if I ended up having to talk about it with Marquis and Marquess Marchand when we met. Did they…are they not coming to meet us then?”

“Unfortunately, the Marchands are among those who decided against further alliance with the Inquisition, Eleanor,” Seeker Pentaghast verified.

He wanted to fight whoever the fuck these Marchands were, Imekari looked so sad about losing them as allies. “That’s too bad,” she murmured.

Kid hadn’t washed up since the Castle, so Madam de Fer took up the task of gathering some of her fancier oils, soaps, everything one needed for a classy bath in the lake near the gate that marked the northern edge of the tamed Hinterlands. Then the Grand Enchanter threw her arm around Ellie’s shoulders and led her along to get cleaned up, Marehis slipping her hand into Ellie’s bandaged one to join them.

And when they returned, kid got…not a surprise for her really, it was still nice like one though. Imekari was clean, changed into fresh pajamas for a lazy day, hand rebandaged to keep her from using it too much, and it seemed that Vivienne and Marehis had bathed as well. As the trio rejoined the camp, Solas approached the Elf woman, wrapping his arms around her waist and pulling her close, murmuring that he quite liked the smell of the lavender soap they’d used before he pecked her on the lips.

“Ack!” Sera yelped, “Don’t go getting your cooties all up in the same air Inky’s breathing it’ll get in her asthma! Gross!”

Imekari giggled, looking like she could burst she was so happy, “You guys aren’t going to be so hide-y now?” she asked excitedly.

Marehis considered the man that held her, “I don’t believe we’ll publicly engage in…what did Dorian refer to it as? Face sucking?”

“Hey! Sparkler just talked about it, ‘Elves sucking face’ is copywrite Varric Tethras,” the Dwarf called from his place around the camp fire.

“But yes, we see no point in hiding the exact nature of our relationship,” Marehis said.

Ellie shot a fist to the sky, “Yes! Two matches down!”

“…two?” Cassandra asked, alarmed, looking like she was trying to think over any instance Ellie could have possibly seen Cullen’s name in writing and been given verification it was his—any chance she could have ‘matched the word shapes’ on them.

But no, “Solas and Marehis, and Seggrit and Flissa!” Ellie cheerily reported to Cassandra’s relief, “…possibly three but I can’t really take credit for Adan and Mister Stitches, they just sort of happened. Oh! But Sera’s got a drink date with Scout Harding next time they’re both in Haven!”

“Who the frick told you that!?” Sera shrieked in surprise.

“You did, Sera,” the Seeker reported drily, “Granted I believe you were asleep at the time—were you aware you talk in your sleep?”

“Pfft. Well, that sleepy bitch better stop blabbing my business.”

Kid seemed okay with their impending dragon fight, as much as she could be at least. Definitely scared her, she shyly admitted to needing potion at lunch before she could so much as take a bite, but she listened as they went over their strategy again—talking it out in detail to put it fresh in everyone’s minds and to lay it out for Ellie’s benefit, getting walked through their plans reassured her they knew what they were doing, that they would be as safe as possible doing it. And Dorian assured her he was going to distract her after a fashion, he felt confident the requisition table held enough parchment and writing supplies to get started with the basics of reading—the alphabet.

“Oooh, Inky! Alphabet’ll be fun, you like singy stuff,” Sera assured her, well damn if the little Elf wasn’t trying to be an encouragement.

“There’s singy stuff?” Ellie asked, intrigued.

“Yeah, there’s a lil song that goes to with it,” Sera hummed a few notes of the Trade alphabet song. Hmm-hmm hmm-hmm, hmm-hmm hmmm.

“Huh, I kind of remember something like that, a little—I know the sounds a bit from the orphanage, like I had to use numbers and stuff so I never forgot them, and then, gosh I kind of…I think there was something like, ‘aah bae seh, che, dea hmm, hmm,’” she sang, humming the last two sounds with uncertainty. “Is it different in Trade?”

Bull didn’t know what the fuck ‘che’ was so yeah it was different in Trade.

“…the sounds are, and I suppose some of the letters as well,” Dorian said carefully, as he regarded the girl with newfound curiosity, she was getting looks from all the adults pretty much. “Ellie…you told me your ‘main languages’ were Trade and Antivan. Which is your first?”

“Oh! Antivan es mi lengua maternal,” Ellie chirped, fucking…just…dead ass whipped out the damn accent and everything before 180°ing it back around to her lilting Marcher mode, “It’s what they spoke mostly in the orphanage, some of the older kids spoke Trade in their lessons. I didn’t really learn Trade super well until I met Ava.”

….oh man. “Boss,” Bull said. “Are you…are you Antivan?”

“I was born there I guess, its where the orphanage was,” she shrugged.

Well damn. Krem went an found himself an Antivan. A red-haired Antivan. Tamassrans would crack down hard on him if they could hear his thoughts but—there is a Maker. And dude has a sense of humor.

“You hail from Antiva?” Cassandra asked slowly.

“Border town somewhere. Ended up in the Free Marches pretty quick when I got a move on, wasn’t too keen on going back, got my footing there good once I had Trade down. Going by Ellie, speaking with the accent I picked up learning Trade from Ava, and my hair being so red, no one questioned the little brown girl running around without her papers.” Though the kid thought about it, “…not that I’d have proof of Antivan citizenship either. It’s not like I’ve got my birth certificate on me or anything.” She shrugged.

Seeker seemed confused at why the kid would feel the need to shorten her name to keep people from questioning if she was an actual Free Marcher or not, “Eleanor is a Free Marcher/Ferelden-esque na-” and then it looked like something almost physically clicked inside the Seeker’s brain, “Maker preserve me Eleanor gah! Child! I swear to the Maker you could drive me to madness! When you were apprehended you said your name was Eleanor Trevelyan granted the Trevelyan was borrowed but-!”

“The guest list said Eleanor. I told you my name was just Ellie,” the girl giggled out at the Seeker’s frustration. “It’s just about all anyone’s ever called me for as long as I could remember. When Trevelyan wanted me to pretend to be his cousin, ‘Ellie’ was too simple sounding for the name of a Marcher noble. So. Eleanor.”

Sera gasped, pointing at Ellie as if in accusation, “Inky’s had a secret identity all along! It’s not-beardy all over again!” she called out, sounding gleeful at the twist.

“Tumbles,” Varric said, “If you tell me you led a life of toddler crime and had to fake your own death, I’m gonna flip.”

Kid seemed like she was struggling not to smile. “Apostacy is my toddler crime,” she conceded, “and I’m sure there are people from Antiva who think I’m dead.”

“Ellie…hmm…short for Elia then? That’s Antivan,” Dorian guessed.

“Pfft. Dumb guess,” Sera booed. “Eliana! S’got actual ‘Ellie’ sound already in it, we don’t call her ‘Ay-lie’.”
“Ellie-girl?” Rainier prompted, “You feel like sharing your secret identity, so this lot’ll shut up.”

“Rude,” Sera and Dorian accused in solidarity, and when the Elf girl raised her hand to him the Tevinter man shrugged and gave her a high-five.

Imekari just giggled at that, “It isn’t short for anything. There wasn’t anything that identified me when I was dropped off, I was the eleventh unidentifiable baby on record—they just use the Trade system for math and numbers so eleven inspired them to name me ‘Ellie’ once it was time to put a more adoptable spin on me.”

“Imekari,” Bull saw fit to inform her, "no shit—Qunari just get numbers for personal identification under the Qun.”

That had Ellie gasping excitedly as she asked, “Really?” and then declaring, “We’re practically twins!”

“Hell yeah we are!” Bull matched her enthusiasm holding out a hand for a high-five, damn good to see the kid in higher spirits.

“I…apologize, I didn’t realize your name was truly just ‘Ellie’,” Seeker spoke up as she sort of came out of thinking something over, “Are you put to discomfort at the use of Eleanor? I would call you Ellie, see the other advisors corrected if you wish,” she offered awkwardly.

Kid shook her head. “It didn’t feel super weird to me or anything. I just thought you liked using Eleanor because it was fancier for Herald business and it just seemed like a nickname sort of like Tumbles or Inky.” She was bashful to admit, “And you’re the one that calls me Eleanor the most and it’s always sort of sounded like when Solas and Marehis call me Da’len or the Iron Bull says ‘Imekari’ and I like it.”

Seeker looked like she’d been knocked with some emotion at the kid finding endearment in how the Nevarran said her kind-of-name.

“If your Ava lady taught you Trade um…how come she didn’t teach you how to read Inky? Was she…I mean was…” Oh. Sera seemed to be stumbling, not wanting to press a nerve if the woman had been using knowledge as some kind of abusive tool, keeping Ellie ignorant to make her dependent.

“Oh, Ava was super old when we met, like over a hundred when I first met her, and she’d started losing her sight long before then, so she wasn’t reading, didn’t write things down. She was still a good healer though, knew different ingredients by smell, feel too for things that were safe to touch bare handed. And not being able to see didn’t really hinder her diagnosing people or helping with injury, and I helped out whenever I was around, so it gave me good experience. She could stitch people up and things but…people were just a bit more comfortable with the little kid who could see doing it instead.”

And speaking of experienced Healers, they just about finished lunch when came the call,

“Horns up, Chief!”

“Horns up!” Bull called back as Stitches and Adan came around the last bend around the mountainside that led to their camp, “Glad you could make it.”

“You lot had to keep the Herald at the farthest ass-end of the Hinterlands,” Adan complained as he dropped his satchel at his feet before sitting straight down on the ground before
“Oh my gosh, you didn’t walk all the way here, did you?” Ellie asked, concerned.

“This one started to, but I caught up to him on horseback,” Stitches said, “rode with me the rest of the way here.”

“Yes, our knight with shining horse crap,” Adan crooned facetiously, “He’s getting watered down and some rest at the infiltration camp,” he said before barking out the order, “Hand me a thermometer, Liam, I need to take our little time-traveler here’s temperature.”

Fucking Liam, is it? Well shit, Stitches better save up his work leave for the damn honeymoon.

‘Liam’ didn’t say anything just shook his head and handed off a thermometer, and a waterskin which Adan rolled his eyes at, but he did stop to drink after he plopped the thermometer under Ellie’s tongue while they waited for it to get a good reading.

“Look at that, I’ll be damned, a normal temperature for once,” Adan said as he shook out the implement, cleaning it off before asking, “Which one of you lot’s Dorian, then?”

Dorian did not appreciate having to have his temperature taken, but he came and sat alongside Ellie, and he shot her a sort of helpless look when he ended up the sole recipient of Adan’s gruff care as Stitches took a seat beside the other Healer and started checking over Ellie himself. Checked her pulse, took out an instrument he plugged in his ears, placed another piece to her chest to help him listen to her breathing, her lungs. Guy was firm, no nonsense, but he was damn soft as he asked after Imekari, and he definitely handled her possibly strained hand with all the gentleness he lacked when stitching up a battle wound. He unwrapped her Marked hand, looking it over before gently squeezing along her fingers, asking her to squeeze his hand if she could, tell him if it hurt to do so. He ended up messaging her knuckles and saying nothing was broken but she shouldn’t use it much for a while, wrapped it back up to keep it stable. Asked a few questions about if her Mark was giving her trouble, and Adan was listening carefully as she explained about her Mark spreading while in the future and shrinking once they returned to the present—that she’d sprained her hand when it spread so much so fast, sort of pulled it wrong while convulsing, and she’d squeezed ‘the crap’ out of Dorian’s hand he’d apparently given her to do just that. Adan looked at the guy’s hand then to make sure it hadn’t been hurt. There were little spots of bruising, looked like the tips of Imekari’s index and pinkie fingers pressed into the back of his hand and the poor guy looked startled when Ellie ‘awed’ and rocked to the side to kiss him on the cheek in apology and thanks.

She waited until Adan was done with Dorian to talk to the Healer about feeling her Mark spread when it really wasn’t. The Healer rested a hand on her shoulder, nodding in sympathy as he thought it over, looking to Stitches to see if he concurred. “I don’t right know a medicinal way to assist with that, the advice you’ve been given to attempt grounding is sound. There’s a sort of pain reliever I could get for you—topical, it would need applied with a gloved hand or an implement, it would sink into the dermis and down, tell the nerves in your hand to stop sending pain signals, that might be of assistance if its persistent.”

“I wouldn’t want you to go through more trouble for me on something that might not work but…that could be super useful to have on hand,” Ellie supposed, looking to Bull for some…awe Boss.

“We do have it on hand,” Bull assured her, Stitches had beat her to the punch, whipped up that sort of thing for his ankle, made the damn thing numb when he needed it. Shit. Hadn’t thought to offer it for something her brain was tricking her with, but it was just a guess that it could work it sounded like, still, “Be glad to share if you need it.”

“I’ll get you some more, can’t have too much around with all this roughing you’re out here doing,” Adan said. “My lady. Maybe give the Healers some notice before you go bending the laws of time and space again eh?”

“I’ll do my best,” Ellie promised.

“Speaking of time, now that healer’s business is out of the way, I’m under orders to play delivery boy,” Stitches announced as he began digging around in his satchel…orders huh? Not from him. Better not be anyway, Bull’d have to kick his ass if he went around divulging the orders Bull gave him when Stitches informed him he was coming to meet them in the Hinterlands, those were top secret, birthday business. He was going to just have Harritt send things, but he figured his guy could save the Blacksmith the trouble.

“When I ran catching up with Adan by our Lieutenant, he gave the all-good as long as I pass this along to you, didn’t want to risk it getting damaged sending it along with a bird, he said,” Stitches explained as he handed something Bull could hear softly ticking away under the soft cloth bag it was encased in.

Ellie unsinched the bag and a silver pocket watch slipped into her unmarked hand as her eyes widened, “I- he-, but he needs this!”

“That’s not the one he uses, Imekari,” Bull assured her, guy was real careful with this one, keeps it under lock and key, “Got himself one he’d be okay using regularly in the field.”

“He trusts you with this one, that you’ll take good care of it.” Stitches explained.

“It’s too-!” she was protesting,

“He figures as much, says he does want it back, but only if you’re bringing it to him. You’re just hanging onto it for a bit.” Stitches assured, “He wanted you to have it because it doesn’t just tell the time of day,” he explained gesturing for her to ‘go ahead’ and the girl carefully pressed the release at the top, the lid swinging open smoothly. “In the center there’s a dial that gives you the day’s date. Tevinter craftsmanship so, it uh, you know, its got magic whatnot in it, keeps the date accurate on its own correlates with the sun and moon or the tides or some such nonsense. He thought it might um…reassure you.”

Imekari was very quiet, swallowing like oh man, she might cry, but at least it didn’t seem like she was sad, not very sad anyway, overwhelmed more like it as she carefully traced a finger along the dial, and then the inscription in the underside of the pocket watch cover. “Dorian?” she asked quietly.

The Tevinter man leaned over to get a look over the inscription himself. “Ahh how lovely, it appears to be a wedding gift,” and Imekari paled at that, looking startled, not like she was jealous but scared, shit Krem…Krem wasn’t married…he wasn’t married right? Nah. Definitely not but she got spooked by it until the Tevinter man read, “Tonio*, to mark the passage of forever and always, your love Liviana.” Kid looked relieved.

“Tonio and Liviana?” Ellie asked.

“Liviana’s his mother’s name,” Bull offered, he knew that much at least, so it was safe to “Then Tonio,” Dorian said…weirdly loud, like he was trying to be heard by someone in particular, “must be Cremisius’s father’s name.”

“Got ears Sparkler, thanks,” Varric deadpanned.

“Just practicing vocal projection,” Dorian breezed, “you never know when one might be called upon for rousing oration.”

Sera let out yelp and then, “Inky’s right there! Don’t be talking ‘bout arousing orat- just gross!”

“Sera!” Ellie giggled out in gentle reprimand before looking up at Bull, “The Iron Bull, do you think I should keep this? I…it’s super thoughtful and gosh, the whole, accurate date thing is… it’s nice enough he thought to do this, I wouldn’t want to risk something of his father’s getting hurt.”

 “…Trust works both ways Imekari, even when its extended outward. He trusts you, and you’ve gotta trust that trust in return, if that makes any sense. You’ll do okay kid, just take good care of it you do all your other things.”

Ellie nodded, gently closing the pocket watch up, “Kay…” she returned her attention to Stitches, “Would you please tell Cremisius I say thank you and that I promise I’ll take care of his father’s watch, and bring it back safe?”

“You got it,” the healer nodded.

“Are you two hungry?” Ellie asked him and Adan, “You’re welcome to lunch, dinner too, and we’ve room if you need to stay tonight before heading back to Haven.”

“Oh we’re staying,” Stitches said, “we have it on good authority this lot is heading out for a little dragon slaying.”

“I’ll keep out of the thick of it, but I’ll be waiting in the wings to help patch you ingrates up when you’ve finished,” Adan assured.

“I’ll tag along for the fight, extra sword, a medic on the field if needed,” Stitches said, looking to Bull, “Fair warning, our Lieutenant has put me under direct orders to nut-punch you if you’ve concocted some elaborate scheme to take a certain young lady dragon hunting—” he was quick to say, “while he’s sure the Lady Herald could give any dragon a run for their money, we all know Bull’s horrible influence. Dalish worries sick though.”

Ha, she’s not the only one, Imekari surged forward to wrap an arm around both Healers’ neck and pulled them in for a hug, “Thanks for coming and helping and-! Be safe! All of you!” she pulled back to look at Adan, “You’re not fighting the dragon?”

“I’d rather not,” he said, sounding uncertain if maybe the Herald was unimpressed with his lack of desire to get caught in the fray.

But what he got was, “Good! Adan’s my favorite now—my favorite one!” Ellie declared him, “At least of the people going. My actual favorites rank Marehis, Sera, Dorian, cause they’re not going full stop! Then Adan!”

“Woah woah wait, back up—I thought I was your favorite person in life?” Bull asked, in mock offense. Mostly mock offense. Damn it!

“Nope! Sorry! I just did the whole ‘watching everyone die’ thing already, if you jerks go risking your lives again so soon, I have to either be mad or sad about it. Sad means laying in my bedroll waiting for death until I know everyone’s okay, that doesn’t really work for learning things —Dorian’s teaching me how to read!” she said for Adan and Stitches benefit. “If I’m mad at you lot, I can be all ‘ha! I’ll show those punks for ticking me off! I’m gonna learn the alphabet just to spite them! The spitephabet!”

“Ahh yes, I can work with that,” Dorian was sure, “A is for attitude. B is for bi- ahem, boss, C is for catty, D is of course for Dorian as I do live on spite.”

“Yeah!” Ellie high fived the Tevinter man. “Should eat more vegetables though, man cannot live on spite alone, I’m pretty sure Andraste said that.”

“Eleanor!” Cassandra gently reprimanded the blaspheme, laughing despite herself.

“What? I’m the Herald of Andrsaste aren’t I? And She probably said lots of stuff that isn’t written down,” Ellie defended, giggling though she caught herself and gasped, pointing at Cassandra she ordered, “No laughing with me! Mad! At you! And you and you and you and you and you!” she pointed to her friends in turn, “starting now!”

Seeker sighed as she said, “I am truly sorry we must do this, Eleanor, if there were another way I promise, we would explore it.”

“Well that’s just tough!” Ellie told her, then, “But, go kick dragon butt and come back in one piece…and I’ll consider forgiving you.”

A dragon! Holy shit!

’sandra pulled Sera and Marehis aside before they left cause they was staying behind, gave them more of a rundown on just how long it should take and she passed off Ellie’s potions to Marehis, apologizing that she hadn’t to do so earlier, but she thought Marehis should have them in case Inky got panicky, and blah! Dumb! But Sera felt all proudy when Cassandra told Marehis that Sera knew what to do if Ellie had an asthma attack and that she trusted her to help take ‘excellent care of Eleanor’!

Sera took a hold of Inky’s Marked hand—oh! it was still bandaged, careful—as the others went off to fight a frickin dragon. Cripes! That was...Sera was half tempted to join them, something about the adventure of it all sounded like fun, but...nope, she wasn’t crazy! It was a freaking dragon! And there was still just the barest bit of panic digging about in the back of Sera’s mind at all times, since Inky went poof through that portal. She felt like any second she didn’t have a hand on the little Human girl, she might get poofed away again and that just wasn’t on! Shite, she thought Ellie was dead! And then she came back alright but...not alright, that future business sounded...it just wasn’t any good and Inky was all brain wheezy over it, almost physically wheezy as the dragon fighting brigade disappeared out of view of their camp, she was shaking a bit and Sera’s eyes felt itchy when the younger girl’s chin started quivering and her breathing picked up.
Nope nope nope, she promised ‘sandra she’d take good care of Ellie!
“You’re mad at them, right Inky?” Sera tried reminding her.

“Right!” Ellie agreed determinedly, it seemed like it made her feel better, even if just a bit, and that Marehis lady came to stand on Ellie’s other side, wrapping an arm around her shoulders, leading them back toward the center of camp.

“Come along da’vehenan,” Marehis said, “Dorian is getting everything ready for your first lesson.”

He was a magey git but he’d been good by Inky so…Sera liked him okay. Dorian was already sitting at the requisition table, all the Inquisition businessy stuff was cleared away, inbox and outbox scooted off to the side huuuuh-uh-oh Sera reached over and flipped the envelope sitting on top of the outbox upside down. Inky was gonna learn all the different ‘word-shapes’ eventually and ‘sandra probably needed to be more careful with her mail if she wanted to be all secretive about Commander Dreamy’s little love letter thing they had going. Sera took a seat on the edge of the table and Marehis actually…awe she was real scaredy over losing Inky, she took any chance to have the girl close so Mare’ sat in the chair next to Dorian’s and pulled Inky along to sit in her lap and Ellie was all smiley when the Elf woman kissed the top of her head.

Dorian’d laid out stacks of parchment before them and was finishing up writing something down, took up a huge piece of parchment, writing in big letters.

“Alright Ellie,” Dorian said, “first thing first, the basics—letters.”

“You want me to write a letter?” Ellie asked, tentatively.

“Ah. Not just yet—we’ll get there,” Dorian assured her, “These,” he said, running a finger along the Alphabet he’d written up, “are letters. They make up words which make up sentences, that make up what we call the letters we get in the mail.”

“Oh! Neat! So we call them letters ‘cause they’re made up of a bunch of letters!”

“…I suppose that is so,” Dorian allowed amicably.

Inky did end up liking the little alphabet song cri pes it was cute, though Dorian…huh, it was nice of him, he seemed to take into account that Inky wasn’t a baby or nothin’, he set the song to the tune of a Chantry hymn®, still simple but not as childish…sorta, Ay be-e ceee eee Eee-ee Eff-ff Gee! H I-ii Jay Ka-ay L-M-N-O Pe-e-e-ee-ee! Oh that was kind of fun though, Sera couldn’t help laughing at that part!

Marehis was all smiles as she listened to their lesson though after a while she hugged Inky around the waist and asked, “Do you need anything sweet girl? Water, coffee, tea? Something to eat?”

“I’m okay,” Ellie shook her head, “but thanks!”

“What of you, da’len?” she already asked Ink- oh. Cripes, Mare’ was lookin’ at Sera as she reached to rest a hand on her knee, “Would you care for anything?”

That wasn’t…she didn’t like elfy words getting used at her but…Marehis was okay, and she called Inky da’len, and she wasn’t an Elf so. Sera let it slide. Huh. Maybe Inky’d get snacky if Sera did, “Yeah, I could go for something to eat.”

Marehis nodded, giving Sera’s knee a squeeze, and Ellie stood so the Elf could slip out from behind her, and she went to start digging around in their food stores. While she was at it, Dorian got out a pencil for Inky to try her hand, unmarked one, at scribbling down the different letters in order, copying from Dorian’s sheet. Ellie took her time trying her best to copy them down alright.

“It’s kind of…messy,” she said, looking at her shaking handwriting.

“Oh cripes Ink, I write like that! Cause I write too fast—you’re just starting out; a little practice and you’ll be writing as fancy as you like!” Oh, Marehis was back and handed Sera a plate of huh, green grapes but they was all freezed over.

“Indeed da’len, you’re doing an excellent job,” Marehis assured Inky as she leaned forward, didn’t sit back down just stood with her arms wrapped around the girl’s shoulders and looking over her as she worked.

“Thanks,” Ellie said shyly as she bit her lip concentrating hard on the last line of her Z.

Shite! The grapes were freezing but so so good the cold sort of made them taste more sour! “Wowza that’s good! You gotta try these!” Sera said, holding out a grape to Inky.

Ellie carefully bit into the offered grape, her nose scrunching up as she shuddered a bit, “Gosh! Yeah! You like them that way Ser’? Solas has this little leather pouch charmed to keep cold he says he’ll let us use for taking grapes around as snacks, I figure if they’re frozen they might be less likely to get squished you know?” Oh yeah, they’d tried taking grapes around, but they got smashed and got their mess got all over everything when they’d been just sitting in Sera’s pack on the way back from the Coast—her night clothes got stained but they was clean now, though she thought maybe Cassandra had cleaned them she’d been…getting more friend-y with Sera on the return trip from the Storm Coast. Might’ve had something to do with Sera not pranking her quite so much. Seeker was a good sort, scary, super wow looks wise, but Sera knew better than to try chatting her up like that. They was friends now definitely. Anyway, grapes!

“Friggin’ brilliant that is!” Inky was a genius! And Dwarfy was getting arrows in his bits if he ever started shouting at her like she wasn’t again!

Dorian had her practice writing up the alphabet a few more times before he took away his cheat sheet and the papers she’d written on, and had her try writing up the letters from memory—just as many as she could do, and it wasn’t any pressure, “Just try your best, Ellie, it’ll be good enough,” he said.

Oh gosh she looked determined, the sort of look she had on her face before they came up on a big fight, Sera almost wanted to cheer but she didn’t want to be distracting. Learning was hard. Sera’d found it boring, most of it anyway. Science and maths was fine—fun even, chemistry was the literal bomb. But history was lame—shite already happened, what was she supposed to do about it? And reading ‘literature’ and whatnot, well…she’d rather go do something story worthy than read about some made up prick having all the fun.

Huh. That was…Inky’d been okay about Sera being more…openish with her past. She hadn’t lied like Lady Emmaud had about that baker bloke, but Sera’s pride kept her tight-lipped about her background, and if the misconception that Sera’d always been living by her own means and hadn’t had any help with anything was hurting Inky’s heart like thinking she was hated so Lady could play pretend ‘perfect’ had hurt Sera’s…that just wasn’t fricking on!

And maybe Inky got it. People usually didn’t. She’d made the mistake being too honest about it before, people thought she was a spoilt little rich kid that didn’t know what she was on about, slumming and whatnot but she wasn’t! She’d hated living all—ruddy trapped she’d been!
Having food on the table and a roof over your head and an education and money was right blessings, if the things weren’t used to manipulate and control and break a person down. She didn’t have any say in anything living under Lady Emmauld’s pruney old thumb. Yeah Sera didn’t ruddy well know how to cook good—she was learning as she went! Having her every meal prepared for her sounds nice, and yeah food in your belly is ultimately what’s important bout food, but it was straight up meant to make Sera rely on Lady Emmauld’s kindness—keep Sera incapable of providing for herself, and Cook…Cook was on payroll, did whatever Lady said, she only made pish Lady approved of, and only when Lady approved of it, she’d take away meals if she thought Sera was getting too big. Fat, or something when she was littler and then too tall, Lady complained. Everything she did was criticized, stupid stuff, just growing-up stuff—nothing she took interest in was important, nothing she thought or felt mattered. She put Sera under a microscope and picked at every little thing until Sera just…didn’t like herself very much. She’d get all wheezy like Inky does, not asthma but the way Ellie gets panicky over things and can’t catch her breath, heart gets all poundy. It’d happen over talking with people, anyone, or leaving the house because…what if she said the wrong thing, did the wrong thing and it got back to Lady and…just, it was bad when things got back to Lady that she didn’t like, that she said ‘embarrassed’ her. When she did get wheezy there wasn’t any words for it, like panic attacks or anxiety or pish, Lady just called it ‘fits’ and get pissy about it, they was Sera’s fault, being dramatic or whatever. And when Lady died it’d…Sera cried and that just felt dumb. She was sad, because she knew Lady Emmauld had taken care of her, fed her, put a roof over her head, shite parents was supposed to do, but Sera didn’t grieve, not like how people described grieving. If anything she experienced the sort of grief over the fact that she wasn’t sad if that makes sense. To be sad because you don’t feel sad about something everyone says you should. Upset that she hadn’t had the sort of life with Lady Emmauld where the woman’s loss was loss. And then she realized she had all the tools to do whatever she wanted with her life but…that was terrifying! She didn’t know the first ruddy thing about running an estate, and…the only way to move forward with that pish was follow all the rules other people made up for being noble and shite, and she saw…Lady Emmauld had the same tools, passed them on to Sera, they were how she’d lived her life, the ways she abused people to have her own way and it was scary that Sera might just do the same thing. So she started over, signed everything away, kept only the clothes on her back, decided if she was going to make it, it would be on her own, no help from anyone, she would rely on herself and make do with that, she would call the shots, and no one could take her own power away from her if it was all hers to begin with!

“Sweet girl, you got all the way to H perfectly!” Marheis’s voicing congratulations sort of jolted Sera a bit, oh cripes! Ugh, stupid brain! Focus!

“Oh wow Ink, you did great!” Sera enthused, looking over the younger girl’s work. Gosh she’d done great, missed a few after H, but she got L good and M, forgotten a few and tried Q but the lowercase came out more like a g but those was confusing! She got T and then W through Z great though like pish that was sixteen entire letters from memory and the alphabet had like twenty-six right? Only ten more to go!

“Thanks…” awe Inky was all blushy! She seemed proud of herself and that was just! Friggin yes!

“An excellent first endeavor,” Dorian agreed, oh he spoke warm to Inky, he had a sort of air to his voice where he could be real snooty, talk down to you easy, but he didn’t do that to her. Good, cause Sera’d have to beat his stupid pretty face in if he made Ellie feel stupid trying to learn something new. “Would you like to try studying some more and trying again?”

“Uh-huh, I think…I know like, the little song now so I can say them all in my brain, but the shapes just aren’t a hundred percent yet,” she said as Dorian spread out the alphabet page for her to look off of some more.
“You friggin got this, you’re doing so great!” Sera was quick to encourage, “As soon as you know all your Alphabet Inky, it’s over for these hoes!”

“What um…?” Inky seemed confused.

“You know! The in general hoes in the world!”

Inky giggled at that, and then turned her focus on the page before her, studying. Though she did look up, same as everyone else because the low tone of a war horn rang out in the distance and even Sera was heaving a sigh of relief, ‘sandra and them were okay! All done! Inky hugged herself a bit and said, “Solas sent me a little ‘okay’ too.”

“You’ll have to show everyone how far you get whenever they get back,” Marehis said softly, massaging Ellie’s shoulders as she looked over her work scattered across the requisition table, “I think I’ll get started on dinner,” she said, pressing a kiss to the top of Inky’s head.

“Do you need help?” Ellie asked.

She didn’t seem burned out or anything, like she needed a break, so Sera hopped down from the table and said, “You sit tight Inky, keep up the good work! I’ll help Marehis, yeah?”

The woman smiled and reached out to take Sera’s hand pulling her closer to link arms with her, patting her forearm warmly, “I would certainly appreciate it, emm’asha,” Marehis said, oh yuck, her skin sort of crawled when her brain immediately perceived the Dalish to mean ‘my girl’, but it wasn’t…totally yuck as Marehis pulled Sera along to figure out what to put together for everyone…they’d been gone a few hours now and Dragon slaying sounded like hungry work.

“Hmm…what looks good to you?” Marehis asked as she and Sera looked through the cold chest.

“Uhhh…dunno really. Bread’s always real good, all regular temperature but we could always warm it up a little, and there’s stuff for stew, ram meat’s already cooked up its just freezed. Um. There’s carrots and potatoes and pish, Inky likes peas. Oh and I think there’s corn…I can um, get it off the cobby part,” Solas had taught her how. He wasn’t always a total wank. He taught her cool stuff sometimes. And he’d been helpful sorta, when Sera left Viv’s sleepover thing to go tell Bull and Varric about Inky’s Chantry dates with her little ex-girlfriend, baldy waited until she’d finished talking ask her if she’d mind joining him. Hadn’t been excited about it or nothin’ but she did, and he had her walk with him to that Foothold place saying he’d recommended it to Cassandra for Sera’s training and…he’d been helpful. Explained the whole ‘Fade feeling thin’ in the place and giving her advice on how to…dunno, sounded like mage shite to her, ‘perceive and manipulate either to provoke or suppress’ the bit of Fade that touched the place. But then ‘sandra had her do that, to focus on it and sort of send it away, make what was real more-real and push the Fade back, Solas’s advice on how to find the Fadey parts and ‘manipulate’ them helped.

“Excellent idea, we can have everything ready in no time,” Marehis said.

So she and Marehis sat by the campfire and worked together, Marehis wanted to know more about the ‘Friends’—they hadn’t really gotten to talk much, this was the first time they really got a chance to—Marehis thought the Friends sounded like her early days starting out working parties for Leliana’s Nightingales.

“…I uh, had an idea kind of, I’ve thought about running by the Spymaster,” Sera admitted. “For protecting Inky.”
“Well I’d certainly love to hear it,” Marehis said…sincerely, usually people said they’d love to hear ideas of hers sarcastically. So…nice.

“I dunno, there was this…Inky told gave you a run-down sort of, on shite that went on while you were away. The bloke nicking a pitcher from Flissa’s and trying to poison Ellie,” when Marehis nodded that she knew what she was talking about, Sera asked, “Leliana doesn’t got any of her people mixed in with the servant people?”

“Flissa is technically one of Leliana’s but she isn’t a fully trained Nightingale,” Marehis said. “Leliana has been wanting to put plants in the serving staff around Haven but the Inquisition has grown so much, so quickly, everyone is necessary where they are, and getting raw recruits out of the waitstaff would require training we haven’t numbers to spare to provide.”

“Well I was thinkin’ Friends is always looking out for each other—I’ve been chatty with lots of the people that work with Fliss, and in the Chantry and stuff, um. They all like Inky good—maybe I could recruit a few little people around Haven into the Friends of Red Jenny, no pranks or nothin’…not too much anyway, but just a few people that could keep an eye out. People get caught up in their dayjob, they’re focusing on waiting tables and cleaning hallways and pish, but put a spin on it being part of a secret club feeling all spy-y might make them keep their eyes and ears open, you know? No training required. Anyone sees anything, they can tell me and I’ll go put arrows in people that wanna hurt Inky.”

“That sounds like an excellent idea, Sera—protocol dictates threats should be neutralized and brought in for questioning…but if you could work with that,” she said, “I’m certain Leliana would find your reasoning sound. If you’d care to, write up a proposal—I could assist you if you’d like. Leliana could have time to consider it before we return to Haven.”

Oh shite, really? “Sweet!”

Sera and Marehis could hear everyone making their way back, round the time they started coming past the little waterfall, through the cavern that lead back to camp, Bull sounded…right pissed. Drunk, not angry. He was practically singing, his arms slung around Thom and that Stitches bloke’s shoulders. Oh.

Inky gasped, shooting up from her seat next to Dorian once she caught sight of them, “The Iron Bull? What’s wrong, what hurts?”

“Nothin’ Imekari, I’m great! I just killed a motherfucking dragon! I’m the Iron Fu—” Seeker looked right pissed—angry not drunk—as she elbowed him in the ribs. “Sorry, language, got it.”

“Stupid oaf’s rolled his bad ankle, other than that and being a total idiot, big lug’s alright,” Stitches reported as he and Rainier helped the Qunari seat himself by the fire, stretching out his leg. “Just needs to sit it on down a bit, he’ll be fine.”

“Is everyone else okay?” Inky asked, pensive, she sort of spun around, trying to lay eyes on everyone as they gathered in their camp.

“We are well, lethallan, our adventure was dangerous, but we were victorious, and Healer Adan and Master Stitches were very helpful seeing that everyone is in good health,” Solas assured.

“Oh, shit, Tumbles, everyone’s okay, really~” Varric was trying to promise urgently like he could stop her but nope, Inky was…damn it she was all teary, and that was making Sera teary!

“I was so scared! I’m so g-glad you’re all alright!” Ellie wailed, muffled as she wiped at her eyes, and her arms got a bit trapped between her and the bodies that collided with her—Varric, Solas, and Thom had all moved at once to hug her, ended up hugging each other too which was friggin hilarious that! Even more funny when they ended up just hugging each other, Inky ducked out of their hold when she saw Madam de Fer, she didn’t look hurt or anything, just kind of dirty, her armor, but Ellie was rushing to hug her tight, asking how she was.

“I could certainly do with another bath, but I’m well, my dear girl, truly,” she said, pulling back to wipe tears out from under Inky’s eyes. “I take it we Dragon slayers have earned your forgiveness?” she asked teasingly.

“You all came back okay so I can stop being pretend mad,” Inky decided.

“Wonderful,” Vivienne said, then, “Now, did you have a pleasant lesson with Master Pavus?”

Oh Inky was excited then, nodding as she rushed back over to the requisition table and pulled away her newest sheet, “Dorian taught me about letters!” she reported, handing it off to Madam de Fer. Sera was nervous at first, Viv wasn’t exactly…she was a bitch, most the time, and didn’t seem like the best person to start off showing off Inky’s alphabet skills but the Enchanter took Ellie’s work in hand and she smiled in a way that seemed encouraging.

“Oh darling, this is simply marvelous,” Vivienne breathed as she smoothed a hand along Ellie’s handwriting, “just excellent work my dear,” she commended as she wrapped an arm around Ellie the two coming to join everyone around the fire, stew was just about ready. Baldy was sitting right up behind Marehis…they was kind of cute, right groady hearing them carry on their first night in the Hinterlands, jeeze. Maybe not having to be so secret would keep them from having so much…pent up…bleck! The second they sat down, Viv was passing Ellie’s work back and Inky was showing it to Sera and Marehis. Oh!

“Ink! You got so many!” Sera enthused, twenty down! Friggin boss! And her little q looked like a proper q!

“Da’vehn, you did so well!” Marehis said before passing it on to ‘sandra.

“Eleanor, this is wonderful,” Cassandra sounded…huh almost choked up about it, sounded kind of like she was worn out too, but she reached out for Inky and the girl went and sat with the Seeker, ‘sandra wrapping her arms around her while she sat with her back against the woman’s chestplate, “Did you enjoy your lesson?”

Ellie nodded, “Dorian’s a really great teacher!”

“Of course I am,” Dorian said proudly, “though I must say it isn’t terribly difficult when one’s student is focused and imbued with a disgusting—not an insult—amount of optimism.”

“I wasn’t feeling very optimistic,” Ellie said, resting a hand on the forearm around her neck, “I’m glad you’re safe, and you killed the Dragon right? Was it um…I don’t like killing things, but the Iron Bull makes it sound like Dragon slaying’s supposed to be fun. Was it fun?”

“It…was trilling, yes,” Cassandra allowed as she passed Inky’s work on to Varric who let off an appreciative whistle nodding as he looked it over, giving Ellie a thumbs up so he didn’t interrupt the Seeker, “it was a Ferelden Frostback, they are notoriously territorial creatures, but we were able to track it back to where it nests and hold our ground. Its greatest weakness is Frost—so Madam de Fer’s magic brought to bear was extremely helpful. The Inquisition won’t have to fear holding this camp, using the area beyond—there is clean water from the falls, and all sorts of plant life. If you wish, perhaps tomorrow you could have your run of the valley and refill your personal stores? I believe...there was Elfroot, Spindleweed as well."

"Oh yeah, that sounds like fun! Do you need anything from around there Healer Adan, Mister Stitches? Would you like to come?"

What those two needed was a room. Shite. They wasn’t cuddlin’ or nothin’ but they was sitting right up next to each other and arm to arm, hands overlapping on the ground, and Adan seemed...he’d definitely been worried about the other man fighting a dragon of all things but he also liked the idea, like really liked it, the guy kept catching himself smirking, staring at the Charger’s Healer like he wanted to play...did healers play healer? Or would that be borin’ for them cuz they was Healers for real? Maybe it made it hotter, more authentic or whatever? Blah! Gross! Nope! Mental images! Sera didn’t like peeps, nowhere near her bits or her brains!

"We could use more blood lotus, I spotted it near the water," Stitches supposed.

Adan nodded. "Fresh would be best for trying again—"

"—oh you think we could make—?"

"—exactly, little bit of that Royal Elfroot..."

"Brilliant," Stitches breathed.

"So you’ll come?" Ellie asked.

"We will," oh cripes they spoke in unison and Stitches went a bit red, looking to Bull who was looking all sorts of amused as the Chargers Healer said, “Cork it. I will poison you so help me Maker.”

Bull just chuckled at that, “I wasn’t saying nothin,” he assured as Inky’s parchment got passed to him.  “Hold up! Imekari, you wrote all these?”

“Uh-huh,” Ellie nodded.

“You did an amazing job, Ellie-girl,” Thom said as he craned his neck to see the parchment from where he sat next to Bull.

“Thanks,” she said shyly, though she was excited to report, “Dorian taught me—I know the song, and I’ve almost got all the word shapes down!”

“Hell yeah! Song! We just killed a dragon, and Imekari’s gonna put Tethras out of business once she gets this writing thing down—hit it!”

“...hit what?” Inky asked uncertainly.

“My eardrums with the alphabet!”

So that’s how they celebrated the slaying of a Ferelden whatsit Dragon. Gathered around the campfire warm and cozy, everyone joining in or at least laughing along, as the Iron Bull belted out Inky’s alphabet song once he got the tune, eating some pretty bangin’ Ram stew, if Sera said so herself.

She didn’t have to though, Inky did, saying it was just ‘so good!’ and Marehis gave Sera credit for dinner and everyone even Viv complimented it.
Lady Emmauld could friggin’ eat it!

Their time in the Hinterlands blessedly came to a close, with a morning well spent allowing Eleanor to run wild with Sera on her heels all around the Dragon’s former territory, picking roots and herbs, though somehow…they were girls, and therefore Elfroot ended up woven into circlets they bestowed upon each other. It wasn’t a serious excursion by any means, it was merely a last opportunity to just…let them make play before they had to forge the path to Therinfal Redoubt. What was more, they found more of those shards for the Temple in the Oasis, and Sera did well to keep Eleanor distracted while the adults worked together to collect them, there was one perched precariously along one of the jagged rises of rock in the center of the valley. Cassandra endeavored to climb up and retrieve it herself, and she did. She also elbowed—quite accidentally, even now she felt badly for it—the Iron Bull in his good eye, she’d fallen off balance when she had the shard in hand and the Qunari had stepped up and caught her but she half-landed on the man, her back against his face and ultimately her elbow caught him in the eye. It was fine, he assured her though she was regretful, had a worried knot in her stomach until their Healers and Eleanor were declaring the man’s eye well, bruised, but his sight had not been damaged further and he grumbled, cheeks tinging in purple as the girl fussed over him for the stance of an entire five minutes of concerned questions and gently applying ointment to the injury, kissing his temple. And it had been nice when Eleanor made certain Cassandra was well, unhurt in her fall, amusing even to some extent to hear the young girl lecturing that Cassandra really should be more careful, gosh she could have been really hurt! From the mouth of a girl that once fell into a gulch collecting the things.

The journey to Therinfal Redoubt was long, and not entirely unpleasant, but trying in certain respects. Eleanor still relied on potion for sleep, though she had been able to catch a night or so without assistance as they traveled. They all still held to their word of sharing a tent which was cramped, and somewhat awkward but when fear struck Eleanor when she first woke in the morning, or drew her from her sleep in the night, she was easier to calm being able to lay eyes on them all, and what was more…to her mind, sometimes when she woke she feared in that way, she would slip it open, and under the light of her Marked hand she could see proof positive she was still secure in the present date. And there was once on an attempt at potionless sleep when nightmares scared the girl awake, she woke only Cassandra, holding true to the deal they’d struck that she would wake the Seeker if she had unpleasant dreams, and not the whole of their party because she’d risen, taken in the sight of her friends surrounding her and knew they were all safe, was able to relax once she made certain of the date, and then gently roused Cassandra to whisper to her that she’d been frightened but was alright, before curling up against the Seeker and falling back to sleep once more.

Twice more did Eleanor’s Mark feel as though it were spreading, grounding was able to cease her mind’s tricks the second time it happened, but the third had sent her breath pitching and they had to stop, Solas and Dorian worked together surprisingly enough, while Madam de Fer did have powerful elemental magic, the Tevinter man was able to call the warmth of fire into his hands without the caustic flame, Solas doused a rag in Embrium extract and water, while Dorian warmed it until it let off steam and then Eleanor was made to breathe through the rag for a moment to halt the onset of an Asthma attack. The Iron Bull had taken care in swathing a layer of numbing ointment directly over her Marked skin, more along the inside of her wrist to where her mind was perceiving pain. Of course the Qunari…she wasn’t certain if it was merely panic to ease Eleanor’s suffering that sent the man rushing and forgetting that applying the ointment using his bare fingers would leave them numb, or if he knew well what he was doing and intentionally created a circumstance where the girl’s mind would be taken off her own trouble to fuss over his numb fingers, and ultimately to give her amusement at the misstep—it was his non dominant hand regardless and he endeavored to use it for menial tasks, clumsily trying to scratch an itch, handling his canteen, and he had the girl giggling over his attempts at eating dinner, persisting until she laughingly reprimanded him, insisting he use his other hand.

Cassandra was uncertain what the Iron Bull was planning for Eleanor’s birthday but in the aftermath of their Dragon fight, the Qunari hadn’t made to take any of the valuable things one could remove from the corps of a dragon, webbing or scales, or any of the weapons lodged between plates of scaling, struck there from former battles the beast had won through either death or forfeit of its opponents. He’d not even taken much of what he did seek as repayment for his hand in the creature’s defeat. He’d turned to Stitches, asked the man if he’d ‘brought it’ and the man had given him a large implement Cassandra was vaguely familiar with, a tool used in smithing to cut through bolts, and in this instance, a tooth. He did not take the whole of the tooth just the very, very tip of the sharp curved bone, and handed it off to his Charger with instructions to get it to Harrit, the Inquisition Blacksmith apparently knew what Bull wished with the thing, the only thing he said further on the matter was intoning to Stitches that Harrit was to ‘do whatever he think’ll look best, set it with Dawnstone, or whatever, just make it pretty’ but no matter what ‘they just gotta match’.

Cassandra had at last gotten a solid idea what she wished to get the girl. She’d already confided in Varric and the Dwarf was actually an admirable ally in this regard, had been encouraging of the idea and connected her with the right people. She’d actually worried they may have the same idea for what to get Eleanor, but Varric…had something similar planned, they’d need of the same leathersmith, but not the exact same idea.

Her idea came to her, as she watched Eleanor’s progress throughout their travel, with her studies under Dorian…Maker bless that man a thousand times over. When he and Eleanor vanished from the throne room Cassandra’s heart had stopped and there had been pain like hot sand ground into an open wound in her chest and she was not certain if she were about to collapse in her grief or surge forward and end the life of every Venatori left standing in Castle Redcliffe starting with Alexius. Leliana…oh that man was lucky it was Leliana and not Cassandra handling his extraction from Redcliffe, to Haven. She understood the man’s desperation, perhaps all too well now there had been…if the foulest demon in existence had approached her in the wake of Eleanor’s momentary demise, with offered means to bring her back she may well have disregarded her every vow, every bit of sense she had grasp of, and struck such a deal. But Alexius had attempted to remove every trace of Eleanor from time, and he may well have succeeded had Dorian not intervened, miraculously so, casting against the man, protecting Eleanor as they traversed that dark future, returned her to them.

And now he was teaching her to read, to write, and it brought back a part of Cassandra’s life she hadn’t expected to find again. Varric had connections that had connections to libraries, was able to send out a missive with a list of book titles Cassandra had written up, and they received most of what she’d asked for, a few small books that Cassandra had enjoyed in her youth. Every night as they settled in their tent for sleep, Eleanor lay against her and listened as the Seeker read to her—it lent something to the girl’s understanding of how the words on the page connected to spoken language, figuring out just how the different letters connected to make the assortment of sounds they did, even when they were unexpected. The letter x vexed her to no end, as did the combination of ch when it made shhh sounds, ‘Why don’t we just use s-h instead of c-h then?’ and silent ‘k’ s boggled her mind. She came to acknowledge that yes, the k in know was the only way to be certain if someone were saying ‘now’ or ‘know’ but was it really necessary in ‘knife’? she leveled these questions at Dorian of course and the man had the damnedest time coming up with explanation for her. It amused Cassandra to no end, that the man had to handle Eleanor’s appalled questions while the Seeker got to enjoy the girl’s quiet contentment simply enjoying having a story read to her. It was relief that the girl did truly enjoy books, and Cassandra…oh she could not regret more that she’d so blindly seen what she wanted to see. But it was being righted now, and in admirable fashion. Dorian Pavus had not struck her as a patient man, but he did well with Eleanor in their lessons, did not lose his temperament with the girl and she was imbued with a newfound confidence. In part, due to Dorian’s instruction, helping her learn to read and write and being so very encouraging while doing so.

But her confidence was also regained by using her newfound, building knowledge in simple ways, often at the suggestion of one Thom Rainier. The man was older, and he insisted his eyes weren’t great—though the Iron Bull had seen to it that Stitches gave the man a proper eye exam after he signed on in Haven, and on the way to the Hinterlands, spectacles had arrived for Rainier’s use. But he ‘lost’ them—often in an inside pocket of the leather overcoat he now wore, made of the brown leather common to the Bull’s Chargers, matching the armor that had been made for him, uniform. He would call on Eleanor to assist him reading notes he’d written down to remind himself of something, and as they traveled if they came across a sign he would squint at the hewn image and ask ‘Ellie-girl’ if she could tell him what it said. What was more, he’d written down every recipe he could think of from memory, and created a sort of loose-leaf cookbook, pulling out recipes when it was time to prepare meals, more of which he took over, with Eleanor as his helpful assistant. He would sit patiently and wait for her to carefully sound out the words written with painstaking neatness to not hinder her further, and congratulated and encouraged her every victory, and softened every misstep, carefully correcting, and heartened her to try again on her own, and he seemed to keep track of words she’d struggled with—such recipes got reused a day or so later, and Eleanor was bright with enthusiasm when she realized she understood more easily.

Their journey to Therinfal Redoubt also rendered answers on how best to move forward with the Mages and the fact that there was an amulet that could cast one through space and time.

Or at least, there was such an amulet.

First thing first. The Mages. Eleanor kept to her word and discussed how to accept the rebel mages into their ranks with those she trusted. The whole of her party gathered around, and she opened the floor to their opinions. Even the likes of Varric and Rainier, Sera and Marehis who would hold no strong ties to magic.

Eleanor’s greatest reticence over the Rebel Mages was what she bore witness to in the future. She lamented they’d not the time, ironically enough, to gather more information. She’d spoken to future Enchanter Fiona, imprisoned in Redcliffe, the worst afflicted among them, Red Lyrium had been growing from her body, merging her into the wall of her cell Eleanor shuddered to inform them. The woman had been imprisoned for…something. There was some reason Alexius had turned against her—Dorian spoke of how Enchanter Fiona defied Alexius’s ban on the Chantry, she was Andrasten through and through, and he was certain enough to postulate that Fiona refused to bow before another god when the Magister commanded his followers to worship the ‘Elder One’, and landed herself imprisoned for her insubordination. Eleanor and Dorian bore witness to other mages in captivity, that Eleanor recognized from their time in present Redcliffe, however they had also witnessed converts to the Elder One, rebel mages that sacrificed their fellow Mages and themselves to become abominations because the Elder One had demanded it or some such nonsense. Horrific nonsense, and Cassandra’s heart clenched when Eleanor began rubbing at the palm of her Marked hand as she spoke.
With all said and done, Eleanor and Cassandra met privately to compose a letter to the advisors in Haven—with the Rebel Mages inbound, a decision would need to be made and the Advisors would need it to know how to proceed, how to handle the Mage’s arrival. The Inquisition would be taking the Mages in on a probationary status—they would know that they had not yet secured their place in Haven, with the Inquisition. Depending on their actions, how they did in their training to face the Breach, they would either be conscripted, made to seal the Breach the prisoners of the Inquisition, or they could prove themselves to be allies, be offered as such with all the freedoms that implied. Their actions would dictate their fate.

As for the curse-amulet Alexius used…

One night on the road—after Eleanor was dosed with potion and sleeping soundly, choosing to do so tucked up against Varric—Cassandra, Dorian, Solas, Madam de Fer, and the Iron Bull slipped out of the tent and held a meeting of sorts to discuss the ramifications of time magic.

“While it seems Alexius could cast using the Amulet without the aid of Ellie’s Mark after his initial messing with time, it would seem it is still bound by the magic that created the Breach,” Dorian reasoned as he withdrew the amulet from a robe pocket, setting the thing on the ground in the midst of the circle they formed just outside the tent. “Ellie agrees that its reasonable to deduce that the amulet ultimately could not have cast her from time completely, Alexius’s endeavor was fruitless. Likely he originally wished only to access time magic that would allow him to go back and stop the attack that killed his wife and infected Felix with the Blight, but this amulet is tied to whatever power is in Ellie’s Mark, in the Breach. The amulet cannot go back any farther than the very moment the Breach exploded into existence.”

So that meant that it was not as great a threat to all of time as they once feared.

But ultimately, it was why the amulet needed to be destroyed.

They could have kept it in safe keeping, Solas seemed rather animate that they endeavor to do so but even he came around to the idea that nothing could be worth the risk, the temptation the Amulet bore. Cassandra honestly could think of no end of reasons to cast herself back in time, to see if perhaps she could replace her former self, that it would be the Cassandra that loved Eleanor with the very fullness her past self had hated her with, that she could make better choices. Save Eleanor from imprisonment—be there the very moment the girl fell from the sky, care for her, gently break the news of the destruction at the Conclave, the loss of the Divine, of her friend Trevelyan, be better prepared for the assault on the Breach, suppress the Rifts, suppress the Breach, actually listen to the girl in their first official meeting with the Herald of Andraste, see to it she was not made to feel ignorant, stop the soldiers on the Coast from dying, secure the Mages before—

It was for naught. Things were the way they were, to mess with time was unsafe, selfish, and ultimately undoable. And Cassandra could not replace her former self…save killing the woman and taking her place but the ramifications of such an action were unknowable and likely would result in her own demise, to destroy her past self would mean her present self wouldn’t exist…but then she wouldn’t exist to come back in the first place and…ugh! It was all very confusing. And ultimately pointless to think of. Dorian had experimented after a fashion. Before time travel, as he was going to infiltrate the Vinatori base, at multiple settlements and the last sign of civilized life, Dorian had penned letters, dropped them off at a handful of different mail carriers as he passed through on his way through Orlais, sent letters to be delivered to himself in the Hinterlands. And then he was cast back in time—he wondered if he would replace himself in the timeline, that there would be only one Dorian Pavus in existence, and he would be living in hiding in Redcliffe’s chantry. However, lo and behold, on their last day in the Hinterlands one of his earliest sent missives came to him—postmarked just days before their meeting in Redcliffe, and now as they traveled Leliana had intercepted the rest, sent word that the last missive, postmarked the day they met Dorian, written in his hand, was delivered. Even as the timelines overlapped, there was a Dorian Pavus traipsing about Tevinter, and eventually Orlais heading for his first adventure in time travel, even while the Dorian they knew, was present in Redcliffe.

So ultimately, they decided to destroy the amulet. Late that evening, Maker they did not seek their bedrolls until nearly three in the morning, but that damned amulet was powerful and it had taken much…well…and then again not truly. She wasn’t sure what to think. One moment they had all been working together to destroy the damn thing—leaving their camp entirely as they were certain it would be loud work, but it would not be crushed under the Iron Bull’s might, even when Madam de Fer froze the thing solid and the Bull came down on it with his war axe. Dorian endeavored to banish the thing but it was resistant to such magic and Cassandra attempted to melt it down, disintegrate it by pouring out an entire bottle of lyrium and sending the liquid boiling as hot as she could, all she did was set the thing aflame momentarily and give herself a nosebleed and a terrible headache, such she felt even as they made their journey forward, and when she insisted to Eleanor she was fine and there was no need to stop, the girl asked Marehis, who occasionally rode with Cassandra but more often rode in the saddle with Solas now, if she would mind riding with Sera so the Elf girl wouldn’t have to ride on her own. Surprisingly enough Sera said ‘I got this, Inky’ and took the reigns herself while Eleanor slipped into the saddle before Cassandra and took the reigns of her steed in hand, had the Seeker wrap her arms around the girl’s waist and was instructed to lay her head on Eleanor’s shoulder and just rest, even if she could not sleep she could at least close her eyes and not have to focus and concentrate on riding.

Ahh but the amulet—it did end up destroyed. When all their efforts failed Solas stepped forward and with a wave of his hand and a muttered incantation, sounding of some strange Dalish, the thing began to crack and crumble until it was ashes that blew away in the breeze. It seemed simple enough but Solas assured them it was a very arduous spell, required much power and concentration focused and brought to bear that the caster could not put much effort into showmanship.

The Iron Bull had stared at Solas a moment, something in his gaze that startled Cassandra…not that she was frightened of the Qunari, but suddenly made to feel she should be cautious of Solas. And then the Iron Bull patted the Elf man on the back and told him he did a damn good job. The Qunari had been consulted throughout due to the nature of his occupation. His reports to the Ben Hessrath. Dorian and Madam de Fer were let in on the secret of his spy work as…well there was no real reason not to, the whole of Eleanor’s party knew aside from them simply because Vivienne had not been with them on the Storm Coast and Dorian…well neither had he, he’d only just joined. As it was, the Iron Bull had been holding off on reporting to his superiors out of respect for Eleanor. Informing his superiors that time magic existed and it was in the hands of Tevinters, let alone Tevinter supremacists, on top of them using it to meddle with the affairs of the Breach, would spell their doom. He was certain, as were they all, that if he reported such a thing to Par Vollen, an army of Qunari would be inbound for Ferelden fast enough to make their heads spin. So, upon the destruction of the amulet, the Iron Bull composed a report that merely informed his superiors they’d encountered and dismantled a Tevinter Supremacist cell, their ringleader was in the custody of the Inquisition, the Mages were allied to seal the Breach, and they were on their way to secure the Templars—all mention of time travel and the magic that created it, left out entirely.

There would be repercussions of their time travel eventually but that wasn’t Par Vollen’s concern. Eleanor sat straight up in her bed roll where she lay between Cassandra and Marehis the first morning on the road to Therinfal Redoubt, gasping awake with the panicked premonition, “A Rift is going to open inside that storage cell in Castle Redcliffe in 9:42!” tumbling from her lips.
This was met with Dorian shifting in his bedroll sleepily, sighing and mumbling out in concurrence, “And in the throne room where we returned.”

It was all rather mind boggling and a half-asleep Cassandra had sought to figure out just what they were on about—the fact that Rifts had appeared where time travelers appeared, one at Redcliffe’s gate, and one in the Chantry where Dorian arrived, likewise there would likely be Rifts that marked where he and Eleanor were cast forward and came back. Once her mind caught up and Cassandra pulled the girl back into laying alongside her, Sera lay on the Seekers other side and snorted before rolling over to snuggle against Cassandra’s back, “You okay, ‘sandra? S’Inky okay?”

“Everyone is well,” Cassandra whispered back before she pulled Eleanor so the girl’s head was tucked up under her chin, bending to murmur assurance against her curls, “We shall send word to the Arl, advise her to be cautious in the coming year and to send for you at once should such a thing occur.”

And they did, ‘we’ being Cassandra and Eleanor, she enlisted the girl to assist in composing the letter to the Arl. Eleanor was not quite so confident enough to attempt penning any of the missive of her own power, she’d only just begun learning then, but Cassandra had taken more time in doing so, explaining the words she chose, how they were spelled, why they were spelled as such.

No, the first thing Eleanor penned was, well, it wasn’t a letter exactly. Marehis woke one morning to find a spare piece of parchment laying at the head of her bedroll with her name written out in shaky but steadily improving handwriting. When she picked it up and flipped it over, there was just ‘Hi’ written on the back and a circle with lines coming from it meant to depict the sun, like a wish of good morning.

Little notes from Eleanor began cropping up all over as they traveled. Varric took some of his own parchment and cut it into strips that he then stacked, folded in half and sewed the crease so the pages would be bound together but easily torn away. A sort of flip-open parchment pad he handed off to Eleanor and told her to ‘knock herself out’. She did, any opportunity she would leave little, usually one worded, though they grew to sort of sentences over time, missives where she would greet her friends, or something small but encouraging, found left in boots or slipped into their packs. She wrote to the Iron Bull, just his name but in her hand ‘the’ and all, and he woke with the missive adorning a horn, a move that made the Qunari chuckle. Madam de Fer received a ‘thank you’ note for sharing her tent, even though the girl had been rather vocal of her gratitude, and Vivienne…the woman had been kind, no biting remarks that the girl should have no need of such coddling. Cassandra had worried the woman would find fault in Eleanor’s distress, but no. In fact, there was a new ritual in Eleanor’s routine. After they settled in to camp for the evening and had dinner as they made their way to Therinfal, Madam de Fer started taking tea with Eleanor—Marehis sometimes joined them but it was usually just the girl and Vivienne, drinking tea and having a chat for the better part of an hour or so, and Cassandra had heard when Eleanor was thanking her again for allowing them to share her tent, Madam de Fer had regally informed the girl that she did not ‘entirely despise’ sharing her tent with all and sundry. In point of fact, she was pleased it could bring her comfort.

One of the first of such little messages Cassandra received was when she had suffered that horrible headache from her failed attempt to destroy the amulet, and they’d settled in for the evening. Sera was concerned enough over Cassandra’s exhausted, pained state, to offer to lay down with her if she needed a nap. It was kind, and it convinced the Seeker to curl up in the darkened tent to rest while dinner was prepared, though she insisted that Sera enjoy her evening, perhaps find some amusement with Eleanor. When she rose to join the others for supper, her place was set, and there was a little folded up piece of parchment made to stand by her dinner plate, with ‘Cassandra’ written upon it in Eleanor’s scrawling script. At first she perceived it as an attempt at writing the Seeker’s name left as offering, perhaps as a marker like at some official banquets Cassandra had attended in her life, but upon further examination, when she turned it over, inside there was the instruction to ‘Feeel Beter’ oh goodness she did try, and there was a little humped, pointed shape at the bottom of the missive, ahh. It was a ‘heart’, not anatomically correct, but much cuter than what an accurate image would be. It was almost heartbreakingly sweet, and Cassandra was very careful with it, folding it neatly and mindful of where she tucked it away, she wanted to safeguard it as keepsake.

“I am feeling better now. Thank you, Eleanor.”

“Gosh, I’m glad,” the girl said as she came and sat in the Seeker’s lap, facing the woman so she could raise a hand to feel her forehead, and while she was not feverish Eleanor still worried, “You’re not coming down with something, you’re sure?”

“It was just a migraine.”

Eleanor had nodded. And then cautiously, “Um. Cassandra. I know its none of my business, so you can tell me to take a leap—”

Certainly not. “I meant it when I said you may speak with me of anything Eleanor, you’ll be told no such thing. What troubles you?”

“I know Templars take Lyrium, and its addictive when you’re not a Mage. Do Seekers do the same? I mean headaches, migraines that bad—before you washed your face this morning your nose had a little red under it like you’d had a nosebleed—did you um, forget to take some?”

“Ahh. No, Eleanor, Seekers do not imbibe Lyrium as Templars do. But I appreciate you endeavoring to think of what could be making me feel unwell and how to fix it, it was merely everything catching up with me I suppose.”

Eleanor sighed with relief. “That’s good. I’m glad you didn’t have to take Lyrium to be a Seeker. Poor Cullen though. The Inquisition keeps him supplied right?”

“The Inquisition would supply anyone who had need of Lyrium,” Cassandra replied. It was not her place to discuss Cullen’s private business, and it was not a thing either of them saw fit to burden Eleanor with.

“I’m really glad,” Eleanor said. “Lyrium withdraw is horrible and dangerous. You get so so sick and,” she shuddered. “It’s just bad.”

“I am sorry,” Cassandra said sympathetically, taking the girl’s hand in hers. Street lyrium was dangerous at best, she was not certain how common addiction was among non-magical people in poverty seeking a high, “…someone you knew suffered as such?”

“Oh gosh, no, not really,” Eleanor said, and for a moment Cassandra held her breath to brace for Eleanor to reveal she’d somehow discovered Cullen’s battle with Lyrium withdraw but no, “Ava…Ava had a boyfriend, a Templar that worked in her Circle. They escaped together.”

“Hold now,” Dorian interrupted, interest piqued. “Ava, mentor. She was a Healer you said —she was also a Mage and she escaped a Circle?With her Templar boyfriend? Do you lack the details? You must, otherwise by now you would have told me to shut my trap and be enthralling me in a regaling tale of star-crossed lovers.”
“I wouldn’t tell you to shut up,” Eleanor said, “that would be mean, and you talk pretty—both voice wise and I appreciate ‘enthralling’ and ‘regaling’ in the same sentence.”

“Albeit redundant,” Madam de Fer noted drily.

“I liked it, it was very fancy,” Eleanor giggled. “But you’re still the fanciest Madam de Fer, no worries.”

“As long as that’s clear,” Vivienne said, mirthful.

“Hmm…okay. So. Ava’s magic cropped up when she was around twelve. She was Circled and it was pretty miserable for her. She…was an easy target for Templars. Different and poor. No one big on the outside to defend her on the inside. But she had good friends, they always looked out for each other, and eventually, as she got older, there was this Templar—Alec—that was sweet on her, really came to know her, they loved each other very much.”

“So they decided to run away together?” Dorian asked sounding excited by the idea.

Eleanor shook her head. “Harrowing was coming up soon and Alec wanted to make sure Ava succeeded, so he got her and some of her friends access to Lyrium, so they could practice entering the Fade in their dreams to train. One night, Ava was asleep, and she heard one of her friends screaming in the Fade. Um. A Templar had…um. He’d been making passes, unwanted advances, always targeting her friend, making creepy compliments, grabbing at her, and when she told him she wasn’t interested, tried convincing him to lose interest—relationships were forbidden and he would only get in trouble—he just got her written up for fraternizing with him. So, that night, he’d decided to take what he wanted regardless of how she felt about it—and he’d been trying to keep her quiet, ended up knocking her unconscious. Her distress in the Fade woke Ava up and she broke into her friend’s dorms to stop him, you’ve got one shot you know? Templars can suppress magic and she wanted to make sure he wouldn’t just be startled and in a position to fight back. She cast knock him on his butt, but it ended up killing him. More Templars come and um, well Ava was in serious trouble. They spun it to their superiors that Ava and her friend had been attempting to escape, killed the Templar in cold blood.”

That…that was abhorrent, every bit of it.

“The Seekers, surely they did not believe such a thing?” Cassandra asked, appalled. “He would have suppressed their magic immediately if he found them making escape. They would not be able to murder him, with magic at least.”

Eleanor shrugged. “I don’t think any of this was brought to the Seeker’s. I mean I’m sure they got called in once there was an actual escape. The Circle didn’t particularly care about the Templar’s misdeeds—just that he was dead. It wasn’t like Ava or her friend had parents that could have pull with Circle higherups.”

Cassandra had never thought to take such note but she’d been called to investigate claims of abuse among Templars, and as she thought on it now, it had always been in instances where the Mage in the situation had been the child of nobility, once an Arl’s daughter, and another the son that was not gentry, but he came from an affluent merchant family that made heavy donations to the Chantry, to the Circle they entrusted with the care of their child. Only once had a Templar been exiled from the Order because of their misdeeds, the rest, despite Cassandra’s recommendations, the rest, no matter that they’d been found guilty, their superiors had seen to it they were merely relocated to other Circles to placate their donors.

Cassandra had often lamented Eleanor’s upbringing. A Circle would have provided her security in her welfare, she would have had a roof overhead, food, healers, caretakers. But the Maker’s ways were above her own, the girl had been born in a country that housed only one Circle*, where their Templar forces were nothing to speak of in comparison to Antiva’s southern counterparts. If Eleanor had led such a life she may well have perished in the fall of the Circles, Antiva’s had been horrific. And now, it horrified Cassandra to think that in another life she may have met Eleanor under such a circumstance as an investigation into the Templars…and then further still because she realized no, if such a thing befell the girl, she had no one to defend her, no outside influence to kick up a fuss if she were mistreated or even harmed in the worst of ways. No Seeker would be called to investigate the claims of copperless orphan. And she did not feel much better about what exactly happened to such victims, those whose voices would go unheard,

“So, Ava and her friend were slotted to be made Tranquil,” Eleanor explained. “But one of her Mage friends was apprentice to the Grand Enchanter, and so working with Alec, they stole the Grand Enchanter’s and the head Templar’s keys to the Phylactery vault* and stole Ava’s Phylactery, those of her friends, and broke out of the Circle.”

“Good show!” Dorian cheered, although he was mindful that, “I don’t suppose they got to live happily ever after?”

Eleanor shook her head. “I mean at first yeah, they were glad to be out but…it was a lot to deal with, you know? Having to go into hiding, putting distance between them and the Circle, fending for themselves. They couldn’t go back to their families, that would be the first place Templars would look especially since they’d be going in blind. And then um. Well Alec…Lyrium’s hard to get outside Chantry supply. And it costs the world on the street, and the risk isn’t worth it because more often than not, its fake, or cut with something dangerous to spread it out more across customers. So he just stopped cold. Withdraw hit him hard, made him so so sick and after a while he went into shock and died.”

That had Eleanor…well Cassandra had already been pulling the girl closer of her own accord but she wrapped her arms around Cassandra’s neck murmuring how very glad she was Cassandra did not have any such affliction.

It was a concern of Cassandra’s. Getting involved with the Commander. While was not suffering quite so badly, and as time went on, it was trying but there was always the chance, the possibility that eventually he may begin using Lyrium again, or suffer such from the lack of it, and it wasn’t unthinkable that as it stands, no matter what, the stress and strain he puts on himself will undoubtedly strip years off of his life. It seemed reckless, foolish to get involved with someone in such a situation, but she’d come to understand the loss of a loved one was not love lost. Even as she faced the ultimate loss of Eleanor, she’d wished for many things, for the girl to be returned, for Alexius to pay for what he had done, for the Venatori to rue the day they sought to harm the Herald, but she hadn’t regretted knowing the girl, did not wish to forget her altogether. And life was such an uncertain thing, nothing was without risk. Cassandra herself, Maker forbid, could suffer some demise at any time, in battle, to some such illness, her horse could throw her and crush her head under hoof. She would not rob herself the opportunity to know this man in any capacity they desired to, simply because it, like all things, would eventually find some end, either in a dissolving of their relationship or in death. That was simply life.

And Maker he was…truly something. Kind and compassionate and brave, she understood his conviction to leave the order and all its hold behind him, respected it. His letters were a sort of reprieve she found, like that she found in books as a child, though of course his missives were not quite so long. Some were—obviously not novel length—but lengthy letters, page after page of what seemed like he was dumping the entire contents of his mind onto parchment. What he had done that day, what he was thinking of from the past, the present, plans and ideas he had for the Inquisition’s future. And always, always he asked of her wellbeing, and of Eleanor. When their report came in to the Commander and Josephine of Alexius’s misdeeds in Redcliffe, he had written, offered to take leave, join them on their way to the Templar fortress—he would face his former comrades if Eleanor had need of him...if Cassandra, had need of him, insofar as if she wished for his assistance in negotiating with the part of the Order he had once worked in, or if perhaps just to help Eleanor feel more secure—another ally at her side, another person she could rely on for guidance or comfort or protection.

And he did not just write Cassandra. Eleanor, oh her eyes were alight with delighted surprise when mail came and there was a letter addressed directly to ‘Ellie’. She would get a few notes from the Lieutenant passed along through Bull once she gained the confidence to send him a note herself, and his response came the following day sent along with his report to the Qunari who had taken a sacred vow of ‘no peeking’ with Eleanor—under penalty of having to cleave his pinkie from his hand if he broke his word. But her first piece of personal correspondence came from Commander Cullen, Cassandra had seen the letter come in, handed it to the girl and she immediately...she hadn’t the most secure grasp on reading yet but she knew her name by sight after Cremisius’s gift. She smiled and carefully broke the wax seal before looking up at Cassandra and shyly asking if she would help her.

The two sat together and they took their time, Cassandra encouraging the girl as she very carefully worked to quietly sound out the message she’d received, Cassandra ready to step in if she found a word she could wholly not conquer and while it was slow going, there was no need, and it set a warmth in the Seeker’s chest when she saw the Commander had been mindful, considerate of Eleanor’s reading ability. Her name came in his usual jagged script, the man wrote...quickly, sometimes Cassandra struggled with its legibility, especially if he were writing about something that excited him, but to Eleanor he’d taken the time to write in neat precise, somewhat larger than usual lettering, all of them capitalized as Eleanor may struggle with their lowercase counterparts, and he’d chosen carefully the vocabulary he used. He asked after her wellbeing and offered to join them if she wished his assistance with the Templars. Cassandra was a great deal more help when Eleanor took to the task of replying to him, unsteadily writing out that she was alright, that ‘Cassandra and everyone’ were taking great care of her, and that while she did appreciate the offer, she knew the Inquisition would need him in Haven for their inbound Mages, but...oh she wrote that she missed him and hopes he’s feeling well and everything is going well in Haven. ‘Love, Ellie’.

It was incredibly precious, and she would throttle the man if he did not keepsake the missive. Though she felt most certain he would and Maker she did love that. And he did—his next letter to Cassandra said as much, and he was so incredibly proud of Eleanor’s progress. That he missed the girl likewise—he admitted he hadn’t been certain how he would swing joining them when he offered, but if she’d said yes, he would have merely called it ‘Herald’s orders’ and made leave.

However, as Therinfal Redoubt loomed in the distance, Cassandra grew nervous about who else wouldn’t be joining them. They required ten noble families of Orlais to bend the arm of the Lord Seeker, so that he would have to meet with Eleanor and discuss a possible alliance with the Inquisition. Half of their numbers had been lost, denounced their allegiance to the Inquisition due to their ties to Grand Duke Gaspard. Their dragon slaying efforts were wholly useless, Cassandra feared. The slain beast regained them quite a good deal of acclaim, several new allies in Ferelden given their location, but only four new alliances of Orlesian noble houses, and Lord Seeker was not a generous man, but he was a stubborn one, even before his strange display in Val Royeaux.

But when they woke to make the final stretch to the Templar fortress, Lady Josephine was pleased to inform them there would indeed be ten couples of Marquis and Marquesses representing their houses. Confirmation went out from the Seekers of Truth that Lord Seeker would speak with Eleanor when they arrived. There was a Marquis and Marquess that traveled nonstop for days to catch up and be there in time to stand with their allies to secure their chances with the Templars.

They were the first Eleanor greeted when they arrived, she, like Cassandra, was wholly shocked to see them, though it took a moment to fully make the connection it was them, thankfully they wore the same style masks they’d adorned in Haven—with only their eyes covered.

“Marquis and Marquess Marchand!” Eleanor enthused as she slid out of Russel’s saddle, and Cassandra heard Madam de Fer make a ‘tsk’ing sound of disapproval at how the girl rushed to meet their surprise guests as the Seeker moved to join the Herald, though there was some measure of dignity to be found when the girl reached them and dipped them a polite bow.

“Bonjour Herald Eleanor, it is wonderful to see you again,” Marquess Marchand greeted with a regal nod.

Cassandra came to stand at Eleanor’s back, Marehis on her heels for the very reason the Seeker had been so swift to join the girl. she’d gone bounding up to people that may well be her enemy now, perhaps here to do some harm, subterfuge for the sake of earning a few points with the Grand Duke. “We were informed you had rescinded your allegiance to the Inquisition,” Cassandra said.

“We did, and we humbly seek to apologize,” the Marquis said, “we are honored to assist you in your endeavors to acquire the Templar’s assistance with the Breach.”

… “I apologize but I would ask why the sudden change in heart,” Cassandra questioned. It…it could not be as simple as them merely resuming their alliance on a whim, there could be ulterior motives, there could be—

The Marquis said, “When we sent word to your Ambassador that we were dissolving our alliance, she wrote back that while it was regrettable, the Inquisition wished us well,” Lady Montilyet did have quite the way with words and tact but Cassandra found it doubtful her well wishes so moved the Marquis and his wife.

And they hadn’t. But the scrawling, ever-improving handwriting of the Herald of Andraste had. Marehis’s cherished ‘Hi’ was not the first missive Eleanor had penned.

“But then Lady Eleanor wrote to us, saying she understood our decision, that friendship is important,” the Marquis explained, Maker help them, Eleanor termed their allegiance to a political head seeking to usurp the throne of Orlais a ‘friendship’, “and that she hoped that, while we are no longer a friend of the Inquisition, that we would still consider her our friend, that she was regrettable of our decision only because it meant she would not get to see us again, as she’d intended to return our daughter’s storybook to us in person when we arrived. So she sent it along with her letter, so it would be safely returned to us.”

The Marquess withdrew a small blue tome. There was a silk ribbon sewn into its binding that could be used to mark its pages but there was also a slip of parchment, it looked like it had been torn for scrap paper, and used to mark a place in the book, ‘Read me’ written at the top of the scrap-paper bookmark in the earliest carnation of Eleanor’s handwriting. The Marquess opened to the passage it marked, but it was not the story there, that was of great importance to the couple, but the underlined passage, the last line underlined in such a way it blended into the margin to point to the neat, cursive handwriting written within. “This is a saying I think on often. When I was found a Mage I lost my family, but gained a new one—friends and mentors. When White Spire fell I lost them all, but I regained my family. Loss is always great but I’m always stronger for it. I’m...
to go to the Conclave, that we will not find peace, that I might be recaptured by the Templars, separated from my parents again, but I have faith. The Maker will provide and I believe, no matter what happens at the Conclave, we can be made stronger for it. No matter what happens, ‘Family is a circle of strength and love with every birth and every union the circle grows. In every crisis we face, it strengthens*’.”

“I wasn’t…I’m just learning how to read and write—I had to dictate my letter to a friend of mine,” Eleanor admitted, “he wrote what I said, and then I copied the best I could since…well Charlotte asked me to deliver her message personally and since you weren’t coming, I tried to do it as personally as possible. But I wasn’t sure how exactly to phrase what Charlotte wanted me to pass along to you, and when I looked through the book I saw she referenced the Conclave…I might have picked up that word pretty fast, Dorian—my friend—he read it to me and I thought it would be better if she spoke for herself. Charlotte didn’t want you to be weakened by her loss, she would want you to find strength in it. She wants you to live the best life you can. To be happy. She knows you’ll see her again someday and when you do, she wants to hear about all the marvelous things you did.”

The Marquess looked to her husband and the man nodded before his wife knelt before Eleanor, never mind that her skirts were pressed to the dirty stone underfoot as she extended the tome to the girl. “Thank you, Eleanor. You’ve given us all we needed from this book, we would like you to have it now.”

“Are you sure?” Eleanor asked cautiously, she knew well it was rude to turn away an offered gift but…well that certainly did not matter here Maker. Was Marehis crying? Cassandra felt she might cry. Where was Solas with his handkerchiefs?

“We are,” the Marquis said, “It would please us very much if this book were to be used as the Maker intended—it was the first book Charlotte learned to read on her own when she was a girl. Perhaps the same could be said of you.”

Eleanor smiled as she took the tome in hand and nodded, determined as she said, “Thank you. For the book, and for still being my friends.”

“And as your friends, we will see too it the Lord Seeker must speak with you, my dear,” the Marquess said as she rose, smoothing her skirts. “by your leave, Eleanor.”

The girl nodded, and the couple went to join the group of gathered nobility, many of which were staring at the Herald as if trying to gauge just when to approach her themselves…though they held an air more like circling vultures than anything else, Eleanor certainly paid it no mind as she turned to face her friends and allies gathering now behind Cassandra and Marehis.

“Gosh, I can’t believe they came! I just wanted to make sure they got their book back and Charlotte’s message, she went through so much trouble to get it to—,” she stopped short as if she’d just thought of something.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked as the girl remained silent.

“Huh. Magic feels full when I think about it.”

“Full?”

The girl shook herself as if to clear up her thoughts and she said, “Well the book reminds me of all the allies I met in Val Royeaux—our team here, and magic says I’ve met everyone I needed to, I guess, for my party. Dorian was the last but…Cole hasn’t popped up again. I wonder where he is.”

“Cole?” Marehis questioned. Cassandra’s mind drew a blank.

“Oh! I forgot to tell you about him I guess. Sorry. We met in Val Royeaux.”

…they had been with Eleanor that entire trip, met everyone she had, save the Elf she met when she made her rooftop excursion that bore the peonies she gifted to Madam de Fer, “Your magic said the rooftop gardener was meant to join our cause?” she asked uncertainly.

Eleanor shook her head. “No, I didn’t meet Cole on the roof—he was in my room. Well the Marquis and Marquess’s room, but I was using it.”

“Da’len there was a stranger in your bedchambers, you did not- I-” Marehis looked horrified at the notion that someone had slipped past them, that the girl had been intruded upon by someone they did not know. In…it had to have been the night that was the only other time the girl was on her own!

“Not a stranger. Cole. He’s nice, he wasn’t up to anything bad and magic pinged the moment I saw him…he’s a friend of Charlotte’s. She had this book with her when she was at the Conclave, took it with her into the Fade when she died. She knew Cole from White Spire, she said….he’s dead but then not-dead,” the girl spoke slowly as if carefully recalling something that she had thought to have forgotten entirely, “He was able to go meet her in the Fade and return to our world—she gave the book to him, and he appeared and gave it to me. He’s the one that told me that Thom carried me in after Madam de Fer’s party and that Marehis changed me into my sleep things… I’d…I’d forgotten all about him until…” Eleanor looked about then as if she expected to find the boy she spoke of in the crowd. “Huh.”

“Eleanor, you say you spoke to this Charlotte in the Fade. You were likely still dreaming and did not realize it,” Madam de Fer offered.

“Nope Cole just startled me right to death, I was ready to scream for Marehis, he just poof! Was there on my bed when I woke up from seeing Charlotte. and his hand was real, and the book is definitely real.”

“His hand?!” Cassandra and Marehis asked in unison, over the chorus of the Iron Bull’s rumbling in time with Varric and Rainier’s variants of what was in essence, the realization there was a boy somewhere in the world they had to kill—make dead and just-dead.

“Inky, you see him again, you point and I’ll shoot!” Sera seethed.

“No shooting! It wasn’t anything bad! I know it sounds bad but…Cole isn’t…from literally any other stranger in the world I would have found the entire thing creepy, but he wasn’t being groady. And magic wouldn’t ping on someone who wanted to hurt me. Cole doesn’t seem the sort to want to hurt anyone really.”

That was…not entirely…Cassandra did not know what to think. Though her next thought was rather rude, and toward the Maker, and she profusely apologized to Him in silence it was just…it had started to rain quite suddenly, it actually startled her, and Eleanor’s head was bare to the sky and rain just…set worry in her now, it might be ‘rude’ or out of etiquette for Eleanor to cover her head but any Marquis or Marquess that held issue with it could face Cassandra’s wrath.
“Oh da’vehenan!” Marehis said, startled as she immediately moved and pulled Eleanor’s hood overhead for the girl, making certain it was secure, tugging up the scarf wrapped around Eleanor’s neck so it more fully covered her skin, “You are warm enough, yes?”

“Uh-huh, I’m okay! Though someone should check on Dorian, he only has one sleeve and…Dorian would you like to borrow my hat? Its in my cloak pocket. I don’t want you getting sick,” Eleanor said.

The Tevinter man was cut off by…just…ugh. Cassandra was grateful they had the numbers to grant them entry to see the Lord Seeker but…ugh.

“Herald of Andraste!” one of the Marquis addressed Eleanor. “Esmerele Abernache,” he introduced himself, “honor to participate. It is not unlike the dispersal of the reclaimed Dales. Ahh! Madam Vivienne! We met at last summer’s ball! The Duke introduced us!”

“Indeed. I could not possibly forget the occasion.” Madam de Fer said as she excused herself and began heading up the path to the Templar fortress not wishing to invite the man to speak with her further, and oh it felt like vindication, that she implied she could however well forget the man she’d been introduced to. It was…nice to find the woman’s brand of pettiness endearing now.

“The Lord Seeker is willing to hear our petition about closing the Breach, a credit to our alliance with the Inquisition,” the Marquis said, asking, “Care to mark the moment? Ten Orlesian Houses walk with you.” did the man expect a speech?

“It’s a pleasure to meet you, Marquis Abernache. Thank you for coming. I really appreciate it, and I look forward to settling things with the Lord Seeker himself,” Eleanor said politely. And… oh Madam de Fer had to be rubbing off on her at least in some small way, it wasn’t pithy or rude, but the girl’s words were a brush off of the Marquis demand and she steadily…oh goodness it was almost strangely adorable as she sauntered forward copying Vivienne’s confident slinky step to join Madam de Fer, slipping her and into that of the Grand Enchanter’s and leading her party toward the fortress proper. Vivienne looked mildly pleased when Cassandra caught up with them, like she’d perhaps coached the girl…she likely had.

It did not stop Marquis Abernache for endeavoring to keep up with their massive group, chattering away that it was so very strange the Lord Seeker would have such a drastic change of heart after their ‘spat’ in Val Royeaux, to wish to speak directly with Eleanor himself as opposed to one of his subordinates on his behalf. Cassandra moved to walk alongside Sera more directly to stop the girl from assaulting their ally if need be. She’d heard her grumble, seen her tense in her periferial. The Elf was worried about Eleanor talking to Templars—‘Inky’s scared of Templars! We can’t let her get chatty with the biggest Templar! Especially if he hates her guts!’ she’d argued when Cassandra confirmed with her that yes, Eleanor would be leading their discussion with the Templars as she did the Mages. Cassandra did not like it anymore than Sera did. and now the Elf girl clearly did not appreciate the Marquis…she would likely term it ‘yammering away’ at Eleanor with reminders of the Lord Seeker’s ill regard, the girl had to be nervous enough as it was.

Though their next new face was one that Cassandra was gratified to put with a name. Cullen had mentioned the man to her as they prepared for this meeting,

“I present to you Knight Templar Sir Delrin Barris, second son of Ban Jevrin Barris of Ferelden,” the Orlesian Ambassador sent to handle contact between the nobility and the Templars introduced the Templar awaiting Eleanor at the gate of Therinfal Redoubt.

“I’m the one who sent word to Cullen, he says the Inquisition wishes to close this Breach in “Barris…” was that man still following them? Marquis Abernache saw fit to attempt to tout superiority, “moderate holdings, your family. And the second son? Peh.”

“I’ve certainly no holdings to speak of,” Eleanor said, “and in my experience, when you think you can make something better, you try again, so being someone’s second endeavor in parenthood isn’t anything to balk at,” she reasoned blithely, “Marquis Abernache, as you’ve officially gotten off on all the wrong possible feet with me, you may wish to take their example.” Cassandra was not quite certain what the girl was getting at with that but Madam de Fer picked up on her line of thinking,

“My dear Marquis, I assure you you’re quite forgettable,” the Grand Enchanter elaborated, “leave us and return with a better attitude. I’m certain Lady Eleanor will be more receptive to your second ‘first’ impression.”

The man looked as taken aback as one wearing a ridiculous mask can, but Marquis Abernache did finally take a hint*, he gave Eleanor a rather small, stiff bow before leaving her to speak with the Knight Templar.

“Sorry about him. I’m Ellie, thank you for coming to meet with me,” the girl said offering her Marked hand to the Templar, “Um. I’ve only ever really spoken with Cassandra and Cullen—Seeker, and Commander—so I’m not quite sure how to address you. Sir Delrin? Or Knight Templar Barris?”

The man regarded her hand for a moment before taking it to shake, “Sir Barris would serve just fine. Er, Lady Ellie,” he said. “This promise of status has garnered interest from the Lord Seeker beyond sense. The sky burns with magic but he ignores all calls to action until your friends arrive.”

“I’ve a Seeker of my own, Lady Seeker Cassandra Pentaghast, she says its protocol—when there’s no Divine for guidance, and no stable chain of command yeah, the Lord Seeker has to look to the noble houses of Orlais for how to proceed, but she agrees that the Lord Seeker should have chosen to do something about the Breach sooner, given the threat it poses. There’s a difference in waiting for the Chantry to give you permission to change the colors of your heraldry, and deciding whether or not to fight the gaping hole in the sky that could destroy the world—we’re in a more of an ask forgiveness not permission situation.”

“He’s taken command permanently,” Barris stressed, “The Lord Seeker’s actions make no sense. He claims he wants to restore the Order’s honor then marched us here to wait. Templars should know their duty even when held from it.”

“bout time one of you gobs said that,” Sera muttered, and then whispered, “Templar gobs not Seeker gobs ‘sandra, you’re a right boss.” Cassandra scoffed but the girl did not take it as a sound of disregard. And it hadn’t been meant as one so that sorted. Ugh, she really did care for the Elf girl now, what utter nonsense. It was boggling that months ago she’d been railing against Eleanor for hiring the Rogue on.

“Win over the Lord Seeker, and every able-bodied Knight will help the Inquisition face the Breach,” Sir Barris vowed.

“You’ll understand if I don’t necessarily feel like winning him over after what I saw from him in Val Royeaux.”
Barris seemed regrettable. “That was…reprehensible my Lady, I’m…that isn’t what the Order is, it isn’t what it should be. My superiors…everyone that can do something about it is parroting his decisions right now. Otherwise I quite assure you, you would have the aid of the Templars long before now.”

“You’re doing something about it right now,” Eleanor said gently. “I suppose lots of impossible seeming things have been happening all over the place lately, the little apostate girl Lord Seeker hates winning him over…stranger things have happened.”

Sir Barris nodded and then the Templar led them through the gate into Therinfal Redoubt’s courtyard where…ugh. Truly. What nonsense. The banners were in place, lowered to where they nearly touched the ground, that which represented the Maker, the People, and the Order. But… Cassandra was curious to see what would unfold.

“A test all Templars take before they’re permitted to remain in Therinfal Redoubt,” Barris explained as he led Eleanor to where she could turn the wheels that would raise the flags. “Lord Seeker would like for you to complete it as well, if you’re willing. Raising the flags in order of importance. Whatever you think is most important, you place highest, and the rest follow in descending order.”

“Alright, I’ll do the ritual,” Eleanor supposed as she stepped forward to look upon the banners a moment. Cassandra nearly went to join her to help her parcel out which was which when the girl looked over her shoulder to look to the Seeker but then she realized it was only to study the symbol on her chest plate, she did the same with Barris and she had all she needed. The Maker’s Symbol, and Order’s sigil left only one that could mean that which represented the People and that, is what Eleanor chose first, going to its controls and gripping tight the wheel that was…well the things were nearly her height and Cassandra could almost hear the Iron Bull wondering if he could step up and turn the dials for her, but the girl did well enough on her own, raising the People’s flag until it was high along the wall of the Templar fortress. It seemed much to Sera’s pleasure, the Elf at Cassandra’s side let out a whispers, ‘alright Inky, good job’, and then the Eleanor moved on to the next. She raised the flag that represented the Maker next, and lastly, the Order and…well Cassandra wasn’t certain how to think about how the girl had done.

“Traditionally,” Barris stressed…a kindness, Cassandra thought, it left Eleanor free to decline answer if the girl was perhaps struck shy, or uncomfortable doing so in front of their stranger allies and the members of the Order gathered in the courtyard, “a participant in the right would explain their reasoning to those assembled.”

“The Maker needs nothing from us and we, need everything from Him, His love for us is infinite. He puts people first, so I put people first, both in life and in this test. That makes Him second, and the Order…well it isn’t intended as an insult, there are millions of things in the world and here, we can lay out the top three. It’s incredibly honorable, to join the Order. The Maker needs nothing of the people He makes, but Templars, the Seekers of Truth, you’ve chosen to serve Him, choosing to put Him, above you, so that you can enact His will to ultimately serve and protect the people He loves so well.”

“Very good, my Lady,” Knight Templar Barris replied. “The Lord Seeker will see you now.”

They had discussed this in advance, who would go in with Eleanor to speak with the Lord Seeker, and who would remain cooling their heels in the courtyard, ready go come in at a moment’s notice should Eleanor need their help. The whole of her party remained in the courtyard, with the exception of Cassandra, Marehis, and Madam de Fer...and Sera, trailed along after them, she hadn’t given a decisive answer when asked what she would do but Cassandra supposed the girl thought she might be intentionally excluded from the talks if she outright said she wished to attend and...there was no harm in her presence. And Sera did not like it at all that Eleanor was made to speak with the Lord Seeker after he’d been a ‘right prick’ to her in Val Royeaux, was a leader in the Order that set fear in the young Human girl.

“Knight Captain,” Sir Barris said, surprised as they entered the meeting room to find…not the Lord Seeker, but Knight Captain Denhem.

“You were expecting the Lord Seeker,” the man supposed in tones that set Cassandra ill at ease, and that was even before he said, “he sent me to die for you.” which was strange enough phrasing in and of itself, and then he approached Eleanor, “This is the great alliance the Inquisition offers, you be ready. The Lord Seeker had a plan but the Herald ruined it by arriving with purpose. Its sowed too much dissent.”

Suddenly the halls of Therinfal Redoubt were clamoring with the sounds of battle coming from beyond where they gathered—nothing behind them in the courtyard where their noble allies laid in wait, but forward. Maker.

“Knight Captain, I must know what’s going on!” Barris demanded, alarmed at the sounds of warfare.

“You are all supposed to be changed! Now we must purge the questioning knights!” the Knight Captain cried, “The Elder One is coming and none shall leave Therinfall unless stained red!”

“Maker’s breath!” Barris exclaimed.

Their numbers were descended upon by…twisted Templars, and the moment the fighting broke out, the Iron Bull was in the room backed by the rest of the Herald’s party, their separation short lived.

“Is the Knight Captain alive?” Eleanor asked when the final enemy Templar was felled.

“Barely,” Barris said, “healing elixir brought to bear, he would live.”

“Leliana might want to bring him in for questioning,” Eleanor said as she pulled potion from her stores.

“He’s hardly deserves our charity my dear,” Madam de Fer said, her hand on Eleanor’s arm and for a moment her stance spoke of protection like she meant to pull the girl back and behind her, so the Grand Enchanter could put herself between Eleanor and the fallen Knight Captain. As it was Vivienne shared a look with the girl a moment and she did take the potion Eleanor held in her unmarked hand from her, deigning to administer it to the Knight Captain herself, and Cassandra was admittedly grateful, the man could well be feigning the seriousness of his injury and the Enchanter seemed more willing to fall victim some trap or trick than to allow Eleanor to risk it.

Or perhaps it was to instill some fear in the man, the Iron Bull rumbled in approval and Marehis looked appreciative of whatever Madam de Fer was whispering to the Knight Captain as potion slipped down his throat. What was more the action, healing the man, earned the woman a grateful smile from Eleanor, who hadn’t the faintest idea of Vivienne’s motives outside the realm of agreeing with the girl that he should be brought in for questioning.
“Okay, let’s go see what’s going on,” Eleanor said, leading them from the meeting room, Barris removed the ring of keys from the Knight Captain and rushed to catch up with her, unlocking the door on the far wall and leading them down into the lower barracks.

Where… oh Maker, more Templars, and this time they were obviously twisted by Red Lyrium, it almost looked like the disease Eleanor and Dorian recounted from the future, had it started its spread here?!

“They are monsters!” Cassandra called out in warning as she surged to get ahead of Eleanor, push the child back and away, perhaps they should not allow her to lead like this, be so far ahead of their numbers.

“What are these things?!” Sera asked in fright.

“Templars,” Cassandra was horrified to confirm as she fought against one in particular that’s arms had been wholly replaced by shards of Red Lyrium.

“That’s shite!” the Elf screeched.

“I know,” Cassandra assured her.

As they approached the door that would lead them out into the midst of whatever hell had broken loose further in Therinfal, Eleanor stopped in her tracks, eyes wide as she paled and she turned to look up at her allies following after her.

“Was that the Lord Seeker?” she asked them.

Was… was what the Lord Seeker?

“What the what?” Sera asked in return, “All I hear is fightin’.”

Eleanor shook herself and then, looking grounded in determination before she surged forward, throwing open the door and leading them headlong into the fight.

It was utter chaos, madness, Barrier spread so thick powered by so many mages kept them safe as they endeavored to fight as they could but there was no clear battle to be won, and Eleanor pressed forward, rushing to get through the thick of it, “We have to find the Lord Seeker!” she said.

Barris led them through a short cut of sorts, through the Knight Captain’s office, Barris had removed the keys from the man when he’d been taken down, but upon their entry they found not only a path through that diverted from the fighting. There lay a dead Templar ugh, the smell. The man had clearly been dead for quite some time… not just any Templar,

“That’s the Lord Vigilant,” Barris breathed in disbelief, betrayal, “the Lord Seeker told us he died at the Conclave…”

They continued the ascent, running higher and higher up seemingly endless flights of stairs, Eleanor leading them all the way.

When at last they made it to the top of the final flight of stairs, Lord Seeker was there, standing at the doors to Therinfal’s Great Hall, his back to them as they approached and he just… stood there.
“Lord Seeker,” Eleanor said, wary as she approached the man, staff drawn and ready to strike if the man meant her harm.

And then the Lord Seeker turned to face her, surged forward and a startled cry of outrage broke past Cassandra’s lips as the man grabbed Eleanor by the collar of her over coat and pulled her closer to him, hissing, “At last.”

Eleanor took in a startled breath as she was drawn eye level with the man.

And then in the very next instance the girl was dropped to her feet as the man…no it wasn’t a man it was some ghastly horrific looking demon, pale and multilimbed, falling onto its back, slamming into the doors to the Great Hall with such force they opened behind it, and it let out a shrill cry before it…it hadn’t fallen back, it merely landed on its feet and had been bending unnaturally to bend over backwards and up its face a gaping mouth of jagged teeth open and screaming in Eleanor’s face before it disappeared in a cloud of black smoke that moved, sweeping through the great hall—the end of the Hall was open to an outdoor area meant for training or ceremony but it was now blocked off, the Great Hall completely closed in as the creature left a great barrier in its wake.

Eleanor was reeling back, gasping for air, and Cassandra was quick to brace the girl by the elbow to keep her upright.

But the girl flinched from Cassandra’s hold, turning to face her party and she blanched eyes wide and darting from face to face of her gathered allies as if she were fearful, frightened of them. “Cole?!” she called out, panicked as if she were yelling for help as she fell onto her bottom expression crumbling and she started hyperventilating when she found there was…there was no newcomer in sight but her Marked hand had landed on her fallen staff when she fell and she stared at it and the girl lifted her hand to dig into the inside pocket of her overcoat and she visibly relaxed and began to be able to catch her breath when she found something there, pulled Cremisius’s pocket watch from there with a relieved, whispered, “I’m back,” as she clicked the thing open and she looked upon the time, “whew, it’s still today at least,” and then tentatively like she were afraid to, she looked up and met Cassandra’s eye, “just how long was I gone?”

“Eleanor…” Cassandra breathed, utterly confused, “child, you never left.”

It was dark.

One…one second the Lord Seeker had grabbed her, was hoisting her up as her heart pounded in her chest and Maker, her brain felt on fire with panic.

And that…that didn’t get much better when she found herself in a cold dark stone chamber lit by burning corpses made of solid ash, like at the Temple when they’d gone to seal the Breach, mist that glowed fade-green ghosting over a floor covered somehow in growing grass and weeds, and she made to pull her scarf up over her mouth and nose that…that certainly couldn’t be safe to breathe in—

But her scarf wasn’t…it wasn’t the scarf…it wasn’t the scarf she’d been wearing a moment ago she didn’t think. It was the olive color cloth scarf that came with the Mercenary armor Trevelyan had outfitted her with. She wasn’t wearing her usual armor, her hair wasn’t in the braid Marehis had put it in that morning, it was loosely bound at the back of her head by that old…it’d been a shoelace she found—and cleaned!—to keep her hair out of her face.

She reached behind herself to draw her staff but that was gone too.

Where was she? Where was everyone?

Ellie shuddered trying to block out the creepy whispering coming from the shadows, tentatively taking a few steps forward, fear in her blood like any step could be her last as she blindly went headlong into a trap. Another trap. This was a trap wasn’t it? Whatever this was?

There’d been a voice, the Lord Seeker’s she’d thought when they were running through the Templar fortress, a horrible voice that kept demanding that she show them who she is. And it had just been her who could hear it, the others…they hadn’t heard it at all, not even Solas she was sure.

Oh Maker,

“Josie! Cullen!”

They…they were here! Lady Josie and Commander Cullen were standing at the end of the horrible chamber and Ellie ran to them, so relieved to see something, someone, and then her heart leapt in her chest when she heard a wretched gasping sound and suddenly Leliana appeared from…from nowhere, coming forward and…all three of her Advisors they were just still. Silent and staring forward unseeing until Leliana met Ellie’s eye and asked, in a horrific warped version of the Spymaster’s voice, “Does this shape please you? Will it let me know you?”

…okay. Okay cool, she wasn’t quite so panicky now. She knew exactly where she was.

She was in the Fade. And this was a demon.

“Everything tells me about you,” the demon in Leliana form said as she came up behind the Commander and for a moment Ellie’s mind flashed with the memory of poor Felix, goulified, a husk of his former self, helpless and docile in Leliana’s arms as the future form of the Spymaster slit his throat. “So will this,” the demon said as it raised a blade to Cullen’s throat.

That wasn’t Leliana, Ellie told herself, not really, and neither is this…that isn’t Cullen, it isn’t, it isn’t!

“You’re a demon, I get it. Are you trying to tempt me, or are you trying copy me?” Ellie asked. It…she wasn’t sure what it was doing—it seemed like she wanted to provoke Ellie to ask it for something, save Cullen but it all seemed too simple, it was obvious this wasn’t real, and it kept asking to know Ellie.

Oh Maker she felt like she might vomit at the squelching sound from demon Leliana slitting Cullen’s throat and the…not him, not him! He fell to the ground, dead.

And then in a horrible, deep toned, bastardarzation of Ellie’s voice the demon asked, “Are you trying to copy me?” as Leliana backed away.

And then Lady Josie…no no no no! She came forward bearing a knife—

_Lady Montilyet can handle herself I quite assure you_—Cassandra had said once Lady Josie laughed with that horrible demon voice, “Being you, will be so much more interesting than being the Lord Seeker,” she said as she circled Ellie, the girl carefully followed her, turning to keep the demon in her sights but then she vanished.

“Do you know—” Maker! Demon Josie suddenly appeared directly behind Ellie and she whirled around to see the creature, “what the Inquisition can become? You’ll see. When I’m done, the Elder One will kill you, and ascend. Then I will be you.”

“Well he sounds like a conceited jerk, running around trying to play god.”

“He will come, and you will serve him as all others will, by dying in the right way,” Josie said before she turned her back on Ellie and started walking away.

“I am not your toy,” Ellie’s heart leaped in fright as she whirled about at Cullen’s demon-warped voice, “I am Envy, and I will know you. Tell me Herald, in your mind,” and suddenly there was some silvery-black copy of…of Ellie, standing before Cullen and he drove a blade into her back, it cried out with something that sounded dangerously, horribly close to Ellie’s voice as the demon said, “tell me what you think,” and then he blinked out of existence and Ellie felt the hairs on the back of her neck stand on end and she turned to find the war table behind her, Cullen standing on the other side looking over it, both hands resting on the table the way he did when he was poring over the maps trying to figure something out, and he looked up at her, “tell me what you feel,” and then Ellie was turning again or…or maybe she hadn’t turned, it felt like the whole room turned under her feet while she stayed perfectly still and suddenly that silver-black copy of her was standing before her, face contorted in anguish as it cried out, clutching at an injury in its stomach and blood sprayed and Ellie felt a scream build up in her throat, she kept it there but Maker a blade was clattering from her own hand, it…it hadn’t been there before had it? where…where was she? What was happening?

The demons voice, unadulterated by any other, purred out, “Tell me what you see.”

Fade, demon, Ellie.

My name is Ellie, I’m in the Fade. I’m fifteen years old, I’m an agent of the Inquisition. It…grounding was little help there wasn’t anything to ground to, not that would bring her any sense of security but what she could think of off the top of her head, things she had to remind herself of now. This was almost as bad as…

Focus. Right here, right now. A demon of Envy, trying to possess her right now.

A door swung open to Ellie’s left and she followed it only to find herself standing in observation over her own interrogation…she was in Haven’s dungeons again, watching as Inquisition soldiers held swords at the throat of a shadowy Ellie knelt on the…it was Haven’s dungeoun but a forest floor underfoot that was somewhat reassuring, helped her remember she wasn’t really there.

Cassandra…not Cassandra? She was standing before shadow Ellie.

“You think me a fool?” wait was it Cassandra, Maker it sounded so very close, “Explain this! Do you deny it? Do you deny your crime?” there was some sort of garbled nonsense, it almost sounded like Ellie’s head were under water and someone were speaking to her in a deep, baritone voice, none of the words came through, “Tell me why we shouldn’t kill you?” and after something that sounded like a hissing whisper, “You’re lying!”
I’m not! I mean I did, about reading not the Conclave—

Focus! Not real! Not real not real not real!

Ellie found another door behind Cassandra and she rushed to it, grateful to find it unlocked only to have it open to…to strangers. A man and a woman dressed in Inquisition uniform, and between them another shadow copy of Ellie.

“Our enemies have surrendered unconditionally,” the woman said.

“The Inquisition’s strength rivals any kingdom in Thedas,” said the man.

And then shadow Ellie, in that horrible demon voice, “Our reach begins to match my ambition, but we will strive for more.”

A refusal rose to Ellie’s lips she’d—she’d never want that for the Inquisition! She just wanted to seal the Breach, not take over the world! But…no this demon was trying to copy her, become her, trying to get some sort of response that would tell it what she was really like…

She didn’t…this was bad. She’d faced worse, at least as it stood now, she’d faced worse. She didn’t know how bad this would get though. That wasn’t the point! It could get bad, and maybe she wasn’t going to make it out of here. Maybe this shadow Ellie would be the one that greeted her friends whenever all was said and done…

“I could really take over the world?” she asked, oh gosh this was dangerous but, “You would help me do that? That’s all I’ve ever wanted, you…” sorry Ava, “shit. Damn. You really get me, don’t you?”

Be good, don’t let this make you hard, Ellie. This wasn’t your fault, don’t…don’t become like them.

Stop stop stop!

“An arrogant little thing, aren’t you little Herald? Shit. Damn.” It said in almost a perfect copy of Ellie’s voice, and then it cackled, the Inquisition soldiers at its sides disappeared and her shadow self burst in a pop of dissipating smoke.

Ellie took a deep breath trying to calm down. Okay. Keep it cool. Either make it out, or send something they’ll know isn’t you.

She almost feels like she might cry, a part of her hopes…she almost hopes she dies. That this demon in Ellie form will go out and get gutted by Cassandra. She’d know it wasn’t her the moment she laid eyes on it.

She took a few steps forward to find there were pillars, lines of three with dragon heads on all sides of them and they rained down fade-fire from them, turning in time with each other, some sort of pattern she’d have to work her way through, she did her best to slip through when there were gaps in the flames, press herself close to the pillars in an effort to not get singed.

“Were you embarrassed when you raised the people’s flag?” the demon’s voice poured out of the walls, “When I am you, the people will never forget what you do to them. do you see what glory the inquisition will be when you die at the hands of the Elder One?”

She wondered what was happening to her. real her. her body. Was it being dragged off to be sacrificed under the Elder One’s blade? Oh Maker she hadn’t considered…where her friends Alright? They wouldn’t just stand by while the Lord Seeker took her, would they?

Cassandra might, she hates Ellie, wants to lock her away, kill her for destroying the Conclave—

No! She did! Once but not anymore! Gah! Cassandra loves her! She wouldn’t let someone hurt her! Neither would M…who…Marehis! Marehis! She wouldn’t let anyone hurt Ellie! Neither would Solas or Varric…or Sera or Vivienne, or the Iron Bull, or Blackwa—he hurt her, but he didn’t mean to! Thom! Thom was her friend, he’d protect her too! And…who…who else?…C…C…

“You’re hurting, helpless, hasty,” a soothing voice said, “What happens to the hammer when there are no more nails?”

That’s a lot of ‘sss’ sounds—

No! ‘H’ sounds now!

“What are you?!” the demon hissed in outrage, “this is my place! Get out!”

Ellie followed the other’s voice, the soothing one, into what looked like a strange bedroom, but all of the furniture—desk, dressers, a fire place, it was all on the ceiling for some reason and there were chairs and upside down paintings on the walls—the bed was still on the floor at least. A bed. She wanted to sleep, sleep until the Breach was gone and everything was back to normal, why couldn’t she do that? Her hand always hurts.

What…what was she doing again? She turned around, looking over the strange room, the door had closed behind her. She walked to it, ready to leave when suddenly,

“Wait,” oh, that voice again, the nice one—soothing voice with the nice hands no, not that one, a different one, not as familiar as So…who? What was she thinking about? The door was open now but she didn’t…she didn’t want to walk through it yet did she? She walked back into the room further, “Envy is hurting you,” Ellie looked over her shoulder but he wasn’t there, “mirrors on mirrors on memories. A face it can feel but not fake. I want to help. You, not Envy.”

“…you…I’ve seen you before haven’t I?” Ellie asked.

“I’ve been watching, I’m Cole, we’re inside you. Or I am, you’re always inside you,” he nervously corrected himself. Oh! Ellie turned and found him…standing upside down on the floor-ceiling thing, “Its easy to hear, hard to be a part of what you’re hearing, but I’m here, hearing… helping, I hope.” He swallowed, “Envy hurt you. Is hurting you, I tried to help, then I was here in the hearing…it’s- it’s not usually like this.”

“I’m…in my own head? This isn’t making any sense,” Ellie confessed. Gosh she was stupid. So dumb.

“St…st…stir until sm-oh…oh…”

“Smoo…” Rainier prompted gently.

Oh right! Double o! “Smooth. Stir until smooth, and the…then, let it rest for 10 min…minutes before add-ing to the p-pot.”

“Excellent job Ellie-girl, you’re really getting the hang of this!”
“I forgot double o.”

“But you remembered the rest! Maker that was an entire sentence full of different sounds and spellings. You’re doing amazing, you’re so very smart sweetheart. Keep it up, what does it say to do next?”

She’s smart! Really smart! She just tricked a demon into thinking she’s cool with world domination! Gah! Focus focus focus. This is your mind, Cole says…oh gosh Cole!

When she turns around he’s sitting on the bed.

“Cole! You came back! Gosh, I was wondering where you went!” Ellie enthused as she rushed forward and leaning over the footboard to hug the boy around his waist, this was! Gosh it was so good for there to be a non-demon possessed ally, he was Cole, not Envy, and he was here to help her! Big squeeze for helpful Cole!

“You…you remember me from before…” he said in quiet surprise, he didn’t return her hug and he looked down at her like he wasn’t certain what she was doing, but he didn’t seem uncomfortable, just curious. “I was watching. I watch,” he explained, “Every Templar knew when you arrived. They were impressed, but not like the Lord Seeker.”

“The Lord Seeker is an Envy demon…he wants to be me,” Ellie explained, voice wavering a bit as she pulled away from Cole. Gosh she was such a baby sometimes—

“You’re brave, and strong, and smart, and compassionate and you’re handling something that feels impossible pretty incredibly.”

Who…who’d said that?

“Don’t press, you wouldn’t press him, and he isn’t here. We’re in your hurts, and he heals them, he hasn’t made any, and I…I wouldn’t want not-him to make false hurt real him would have to hope to heal.”

Him…him…it almost rhymes with…

She’s not sure.

“Alright, I won’t uh…press,” she said to Cole.

“Good,” Cole breathed with a sigh of relief, “Don’t worry, you’ll get him back once we’re away.” And then he went on to explain, “Envy. It twisted the Commanders, forced their fury, their fight, their red inside. Anyway, you’re frozen, Envy is trying to take your face. I heard it and reached out, and then in, and then I was here.”

“Is that…usual for you? I get uh, here isn’t usual, but reaching out and into people? Are you…” Ellie gasped in quiet delight, “Cole, are you a spirit?”

“I was…am…it is different.”

“Charlotte said she knew you from White Spire.”

“She knew Cole yes. She saw him when the Templars brought him in, dragged him down to the dungeons to deal his doom. She wanted to help…and so did I but he died and now I’m him.”

“That…kind of sounds like possession,” said a bit wary.
“Cole is gone, his body beaten broken busted burst. But I was trying to help. I reached out and in—”

“And now you’re him…huh. Okay. Not exactly possession then. More like someone leaving their home and another person moving in?”

“What’s home? So many people miss it, but it seems to be different for everyone.”

Huh, she guessed that did get confusing. “Home is a concept that can be placed on any place. Do you understand ‘friend’?”

“I do…did…I did not have many friends and now they’re gone.”

Ellie reached out and took Cole’s hand, “I’m your friend I think. Magic says we’re going to be, anyway. So. Not all gone, yeah? They, whoever they were, were your friends, just like now we’re friends. Friend is a concept that can be put on any person you love, whether its big love or small love. Home is a concept that can be put on any place you love. Right now, home for me is wherever my friends are—our friends. Will you help me get back to them?”

Cole nodded, and then he slipped off the bed staring down at their joint hands. “All of this,” he gestured, to their surroundings, “is Envy, he took root in your hurts and moved from there. People, places, power, if you keep going, Envy stretches. It takes strength to make more. Being one person is hard. Being many, too many, more and more and envy breaks down. You break out.”

“So we keep moving, and Envy will tire out?”

Cole nodded. “Maybe. I hope it helps. Its more than sitting here waiting to lose your face.” That was…creepy but it didn’t sound like he meant it meanly, it didn’t even sound like bluntness just…clean observation, nothing attached to it, something in the way he said it made it light.

“Is it okay that I’m holding your hand? I wouldn’t want you to be uncomfortable, but I know its scary in here and I wouldn’t want us getting separated. You...you’ve just been in this room since we arrived? You’re alright, right?”

“…alright, right? You’re waiting, wanting, worrying, you add me to the list. Hold my hand to hush any hurts you hope I don’t have because you’re here. And you can fix this.”

Ellie nodded. “I think I can now, anyway. Your explanation, how to tire out Envy, it’s brilliant Cole.”

Cole didn’t release hold of her hand so she figured he was okay with it, and he began moving forward, Ellie following alongside as he said, “This way,” leading her out the door to the strange bedroom.

It seemed like he wanted to lead her further down the hall but there were dragon pillars hurling fade-fire down to block their path, no pattern to break, just blockage.

“Ideas are loud here, think louder. Think of water,” Cole instructed.

“…okay, you got it!” Ellie said, this was her mind right? Envy was just mucking about in it making everything twisted up. She could twist it back—

Water poured out of the Dragon’s mouths.

It was a Ferelden Frostback...its greatest weakness is Frost.
Cassandra’s voice overlapped, almost drowned out the sound of the demon screeching,

“That thing cannot help you! I will see more!”

“Let’s give him more to see, yeah?” Ellie asked Cole lightly as they ran through the water falling from the dragon’s mouths and safely to the door on the other side, swinging it open.

Suddenly they were in…it looked like Haven’s dungeons but the war room table…or a table that was meant to represent it, oh Maker the demon really was stretching out, confused, making things up as it went, losing a grasp on what as real to Ellie. Cassandra stood on Ellie’s side of the table, and…ugh, Chancellor Roderick stood on the other. Oh. And then there was shadow-Ellie laying on the table with a dagger in her chest.

“Betrayed allies will curse your name, like the first Inquisition, you will bring blood and ruin and fear,” the demon swore.

“Unless you don’t,” Cole offered simply, “you don’t have to. None of this is real unless you let it be.”

Okay…yeah this was nice, easier, “Thank you,” she whispered to him, speaking softly in case they disturbed whatever was unfolding before them, she didn’t want to interact with it, whatever it was.

“Get out, thing!” the demon hollered, “I am learning!”

Fuck off – I’m teaching here!

The Iron Bull’s voice then, huh.

Ellie and Cole moved around the dungeons wall to get to the door on the opposite side, moving forward, moving forward was good. Stretch it further.

They came into a hall where shadow-Ellie was apprehending Mother Gisselle for not bowing to the Elder One, being a heretic and spreading the Chant, and the Maker still.

And they were stopped, Ellie and Cole, oh. another place Envy wanted her to react. She squeezed Cole’s hand. If all else failed, everyone would know Ellie wasn’t herself if,

“It’s about time someone put that Chant-thumping bitch in her place. Where was her Maker when I needed him, huh?” With her, always.

The demon cackled as the scene before them—shadow-Ellie, Inquisition soldiers, Mother Gisselle—all burst into flames.

They searched the strange…it was like a hall with different branches that held cells, Ellie could hear Mother Hevara in one, oh gosh Lady Josie’s voice too,

“It is dark now,” Cole said, “but think of spark. We need to get higher, you’re more you there than Envy is.”

Oh. There were these sconses like Solas helped her find sometimes in the Hinterlands, they made Veil Fire, and they responded to Spirit magic, the sort that Ellie used to make Barrier. She could get them lit okay on her own. They worked their way around, finding all the sconses, Ellie kept her focus forward, not daring to look at anyone in the cells, Maker—this wasn’t real, her friends weren’t imprisoned again! Everything’s alright she just has to get out of here.
The final sconce was where Lady Josie’s cell was…oh gosh she wanted to go home!
Haven! She wanted a hug!

Give Marehis like the biggest hug in the world for me when you see her, yeah?

That was her talking to…huh.

There was a cavern then opening out of the room Josie’s cell was in, and Ellie followed it out until it led her to…a…forest. Okay, might as well. At least it was outside, and there was some slope to the ground like it was leading up! Cole said she needed to get higher, so, yeah!

Oh gosh but where was Cole?

“She’s here,” Ellie called out, he wasn’t holding her hand anymore, he was gone!

“I’m still here,” his voice rang out from the trees, but he wasn’t in them. “You’re more you here, keep going up.”

Ellie ran as fast as she could through the forest, and it led her… it led her back to Therinfal Redoubt, not like she was coming at the entrance, no, it just sort of opened up into one of the inner courtyards they’d had to run through to get to where the Lord Seeker had been.

Okay. Forward, and up!

Ellie ran back through the path she’d already tread, up the stairs, more and more, until… well she was scared, afraid to find the Lord Seeker waiting for her at the top of the stairs again but he wasn’t there…

“Cole!” she cried excitedly, reaching for her friend.

But then a hand gripped her arm and she was wrenched around by shadow-Ellie, Envy trying to take her form, it pushed her back until she was up against the door, hoisting her up by the scarf of her mercenary coat.

“Unfair, unfair!” the demon screeched in her face as it slammed her up against the door, “That thing kept you whole! Kept you from giving me your shape!”

“What could you gain from being me?!” Ellie wanted to know. Just about flipping nothing that would matter to a demon, she was just an agent of the Inquisition, not their leader! A kid!

“What could you gain from being me?!” the demon parroted back in a horrible impression of her, voice still to warped to sound anything like Ellie. “What…gah! We’ll start again!” it decided, raising a glowing, faux-Fadelit hand to Ellie’s temple, “more pain this time! The Elder One still comes!”

“Its frightened of you,” Cole’s voice said, from where Ellie couldn’t see him but Maker she was glad he was still here. He distracted the demon as it turned its head away, its hand leaving Ellie’s temple as he shouted at Cole,

“Get out of-!”

Ellie was on her feet again, and she moved forward, quickly, like…Cassandra, and Cullen, they loved her, wanted her safe, protected, to protect herself! Forward, knee up, pull them toward you and then, boom! Headbutt!
And then she was standing facing the doors to the Great Hall again, face to face with the Demon of Envy fully revealed and screaming in her face before it disappeared.

Ellie was still trying to catch her equilibrium again, she’d just been in the air, and then headbutting, and she’d been facing the opposite way hadn’t she? Where was the demon going, was it doing it again—that thing where it pretended to walk away and came back looking like something else? Her lungs were sucking in air of their own volition like she’d been holding her breath and they rebelled like they needed to breathe again, like she’d gone a moment without doing so. And then there was a hand on her elbow.

Oh no, no no no no no not again, it was back and now it looked like Cassandra! Ellie flinched away, falling off unsteady legs and onto her butt, oh gosh she was so tired, and weak and scared and how did she ever think she could get away? Where was Cole, he’d just been here hadn’t he? Where did he go?

“Cole?!” she called out in fright, oh Maker please let him be here, let him help her, oh gosh she can’t breathe, she started hyperventilating, but then her Marked hand had landed on something __

Her staff.

She…her staff was here.

And she was back in her armor.

She reached into the pocket of her overcoat and pulled out Cremisius’s pocket watch, that…that Cremisius. Krem! Krem kind of rhymes with him almost! He was the one that wasn’t in any of her hurts and now that she was out of them she could remember him!

“I’m back,” she whispered, relieved, and she pressed the release on the watch to reveal the time…she wasn’t certain what time it had been when she’d gotten mind trapped, but the date was still the same as it had been that morning when she checked, “whew, it’s still today at least,” and then tentatively…it was Cassandra. She, not it, she was Cassandra, Ellie was pretty certain at least, she looked up to meet her eye, “just how long was I gone?”

“Eleanor…” Cassandra breathed, sounding confused, “child, you never left.”

…she never…

But she had. And she almost hadn’t made it back, and oh sweet Maker they…they didn’t even know she’d been fighting possession it…it’d only been a second or something but she felt like she’d been gone for hours and she was…exhausted and tired, felt like she was a rag someone had wrung out repeatedly from one end to the other, and the relief she felt that everyone was okay, the whiplash of worrying she’d been gone and they’d been in danger, and suddenly discovering the danger had come and passed in the blink of an eye for them, it felt like she’d released something heavy and now she was just left with the ache in her muscles from her work. Her head lulled to the side and then snapped forward and her eyes felt heavy…

“Eleanor?” Cassandra knelt, hands on Ellie’s shoulder’s gripping tight.

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis asked, stumbling forward from the group to crouch in front of Ellie, her hand raising to feel her forehead. “You feel chilled, sweet girl are you cold?”

It’d been freezing it felt like in the Fade…was it cold there? She didn’t notice it all the time when she Fade Dreamed, maybe going there with a demon made it different…demon…
That was what was important, and Ellie wasn’t sure…she really wasn’t feeling well, “Cassandra…” Ellie murmured, “you…you’d kill me, if I wasn’t me, right?”

“Eleanor!” the Seeker called out appalled, "I would nev-"

“You have to," Ellie insisted, "if I’m ever not me, if I got possessed, you…you’d have to ’kay? Someone has to. Cullen did it…and I think I…I killed it too. And you, or maybe it was Chancellor Roderick, you were both there and fake me was on the table…”

“Eleanor—” Cassandra’s mouth was moving and Ellie tried to focus on it but there was this awful ringing in her ears and something like rust, the taste of it filled her mouth, the smell in her nose and she felt her head snap back.

It was dark.

---

It almost felt like the morning she woke after the failed assault on the Breach. She was laying somewhere warm and soft, there was give in what she laid on. A mattress, and there were blankets tucked up all around her, her armor was gone again and that almost made her panic except…well she’d never worn this before it was someone’s shirt. Big someone, bigger than her anyway, a large linen tunic, it was clean, and she felt clean, like someone had done so while she was down for the count, the smell of coconut lingering from their efforts with her hair.

“…Inky?”

Ellie opened her eyes…oh gosh ouch, light. But Sera was there too once she could see, huh, it wasn’t that bright, it was lamplight from a fixture hanging on the ceiling, fear sort of ghosted across her magic, in under her skin, she was in a stone room…but there wasn’t any furniture on the ceiling, she groaned as she rolled on her side to make certain the floor was…floor and not forest. and there was something ticking…

Oh, thank the Maker, there'd been a niggling worry in the back of her mind when she woke up in a different place without her things but Cremisius's pocket watch was safe and sound, sitting open on the nightstand.

“Take it easy Tumbles, you’re okay, you’re safe,” oh Varric. He and Sera were sitting by her bedside, Sera came forward and shifted to sit on the edge of the mattress, resting her hand on Ellie’s arm a moment before coming to press the back of it against Ellie’s forehead, “Er…” Sera hummed, concentrating.

“Not sure how to check a temperature?” Varric asked.

“She feels warmer now than she did before, but not sicky warm it just took me a minute!” Sera snapped, Ellie flinched at the tone and then, “whoops, shite. Sorry Inky.”

“s’okay…” she rasped out quietly, reaching out to poke the older girl’s cheek. Oh she felt like she was real, that was nice.
“Here, drink up,” Varric said as he handed her her canteen, uncapped. Oh, he wasn’t handing it so much as holding it to her lips and gosh she was thirsty. “You good, or you need more?”

Yes but he might leave, or Sera would and she didn’t-want that more than she wanted water. Where was everybody? “I’m okay,” she said, “um…where is everyone? What happened?”

“We're still in Therinfal, but this wing's secure, everyone's making sure it stays that way and cleaning up after uh, well. Everything. As far as what happened, it’s a long story and we got a lot we don’t know from your end Tumbles,” Varric said, “short of it? Elder One was doing a take over of the Templars, we stopped it for the most part, Barris guy’s their top guy now. Sort of.”

“Sort of?”

“Sandra might’ve went berserk,” Sera said, sounding impressed.

“What…what did she do?”

Varric blew out a weary sigh, “Well kid, here’s the thing. Lady Seeker’s taken control of the remaining Templars and she’s conscripted them to the will of the Inquisition.”

Chapter End Notes

*This is canon backstory, some of which isn't fully mentioned in game. The Iron Bull tells Inquisitor about the baker in Seheron poisoning his crew.

*Also canon backstory I found that just! It's so cute I couldn't help but slip it in, little bby Bull being a smarty pants and getting set on his career path because of it!

*Canon backstory, I don't recall from the game--Sera inherited Lady Emmauld's estate when she passed, but Sera signs it over to the state and goes out on her own, ultimately joins the Friends.

*Cyril=this is the man that Blackwall blows his cover with the Inquisition to go to Val Royeaux and save from the noose, turning himself over to the authorities in the hopes Cyril will be spared.

*Tonio and Liviana=Krem's parents aren't named, so. I named them using Roman names, based a little on how they sound with 'Aclassi' but ultimately meaning won out. Tonio means 'man whose worth cannot be estimated' and Liviana means 'a woman who envies'.

*Ellie's alphabet song is set to the tune of the RL hymnal 'Seek Ye First'

*Antiva has only one Circle, it's Andrasten, but other than that there's no info on it, it doesn't have a name or even a listed location in-world but I assume such a thing would be kept near Antiva City, since there's only one. Given Antiva's crazy set up government wise, their Circle system is probably not exactly the same as it is in the south, less focus on running and maintenance, less structure, fewer official resources, and I figure when shit hit the fan with the rebellion it was either the most peaceful rebellion where everyone wove flower crowns and had a marvelous garden party....or uh, everything went to actual hell in a handbasket.

*The only way to obtain a phylactery is to unlock the Circle's phylactery vault using a key from the Circle's Grand Enchanter, and a second key from the highest ranking Templar, both have to be used at the exact same time or the door doesn't open.

*"Family is a circle of strength and love with every birth and every union the circle grows. In every crisis we face, it strengthens" is a lovely French saying.

*Marquis Abernache is repugnant and just clunks up the Templar story line, he bothers me in my soul. So I dropped him, I understand somewhat his purpose in the story, but he isn't wholly necessary.

Update: Chapters 13 and 14 (the Birthday chapter) will be posted on December 31st, 2018 and January 1st, 2019 respectively since they'll be cleaned up and ready to roll in time to match the days in story!
Return to Haven: First-Day Eve

Chapter Summary

The aftermath of Envy and Therinfal Redoubt, the journey back to Haven just in time for a certain someone's birthday, but first—First-Day Eve! Lots of firsts for First Day fun.

Chapter Notes

Happy New Year's Eve! Since this chapter is set in the Thedas equivalent, I figured, why not go full corn, and post this chapter, and the Birthday chapter, on the matching dates.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

“Cassandra...” Eleanor murmured, the Seeker knelt before her, hands gripping the girl’s shoulder's Maker, she looked exhausted, spent, trembling so fiercely in Cassandra’s hold that, for a moment, she feared the girl might be seizing and then she gasped in air, grew so very still, and made the most horrific request, “you...you’d kill me, if I wasn’t me, right?”

“Eleanor! I would nev-”

“You have to,” the girl insisted, sounding ill with her conviction, “if I’m ever not me, if I got possessed, you...you’d have to, 'kay? Someone has to. Cullen did it...and I think I...I killed it too. And you, or maybe it was Chancellor Roderick, you were both there and fake me was on the table...” what...what in the world had—

“Eleanor, sweetheart, you’re not making any sense,” Cassandra said, and the girl seemed dazed, blinking rapidly and then squinting like she were trying hard to focus on what the Seeker was saying, “what just happened? Are you hurt? What did that demon—” her heart leapt into her throat when the girl’s eyes rolled back in her head and her head snapped back and her body went limp, and to her horror she feared, lifeless, “Eleanor?! Eleanor please-”

Sera’s hand on her shoulder then, letting out a shuddering, oh so relieving, "I-Inky's alright, she...she's gonna be okay, h-hearts still beating 'sandra, and she's breathin'."

It had been a kind of hell, fighting the horde of Red Templars turning against their non-infected ranks, while keeping Eleanor as safe as possible...Maker they hadn’t the slightest idea what to do for her. Solas could only perceive that she’d endured some great psychological trauma her mind processed in under a second, it had been overwhelming for him to observe, a wave of something that started with fear and desperation that fluctuated from resolve to panic to hope to worry and back around to fright and despair the moment she was out of the Lord Seeker…a demon posing as him, it's hold.

It had been taxing and sent the girl comatose, she could not be roused, she was pallid and chilled like when she’d fought demon possession in the Hinterlands, but this had been some fight far worse than that—that demon had taken so much longer to fend off but Solas, when there was a moment of reprieve between waves of Red Templars, he examined Eleanor. He deduced the Great Terror hadn’t been powerful enough to take a deep foothold in the girl’s mind, Eleanor had been able to keep her at the edge of her consciousness and was able to hold it there until she was either well enough to cast it off herself or it was felled by her friends. This demon, a demon of Envy, old and powerful and Cassandra couldn’t fathom just how it had been acquired for this job—there was more than reason to believe someone had summoned it, given it purpose to take on the task of overtaking the Order. It had penetrated Eleanor’s mind, cast the girl deep into her own subconscious in an attempt to ‘learn her shape’. It did not seek possession, it wished to destroy the girl’s mind while learning how to copy it, so that it could take on her form when it was through.
The Elf explained it was rather a lot like dreaming—while our minds perceive dreams happening over a great span of time, they truly only happen in an instant.

It was also confirmed by their strange new ally. He came to their aid in the final battle with the demon of Envy. Eleanor’s ‘Cole’. Cassandra…she did not know what to think of the boy, but Eleanor clearly saw him as an ally, had cried out for his help when…Maker she’d seemed terrified of everyone when she broke free of the demon’s hold and this boy had apparently been with her in her mind helping to guide her out, he explained when they encountered him while assisting Knights of the Order under assault as they attempted to join their ranks in the Great Hall.

The Lord Seeker had been dead for months. He’d been replaced by a demon and no one had questioned him. He’d turned proud, dedicated members of the Order into monsters, twisted them from their purpose made demons of them himself. The whole of their higher ranks were abolished. It was…

So much corruption, the Order defiled, and none had done a thing to stop it until the Inquisition arrived and foiled their corrupted part’s plans. They were meant to stop abominations and yet Lord Seeker, he’d fallen victim to one himself! Allowed one to take his form, and now their order lay in ruin!

And they were party to the plans to assassinate the Empress of Orlais. Defeating Alexius bore the information that such a thing was to occur in the future, and now in the destruction at Therinfal, they affirmed such a thing was afoot, that this Elder One planned for the Empress to die at her peace talks she was holding in the coming spring—marking the end of winter with a grand ball in her Winter’s palace.

The Order had been destroyed by its own, while others stood blindly by and allowed it to happen.

They’d been taken over by a demon their highest-ranking member had not been able to keep from destroying him. A demon Eleanor, after torture and torment, broke free of.

And the thing…oh it had tried. Tried to take the girl’s form. It had, in a way, when its health worsened, the demon of Envy had taken on the shape of Eleanor, her small body in shadow form. Even as the Seeker knew—knew it was not Eleanor, it was more than obvious, it was still…disconcerting to say the least to kill a thing with the girl’s resemblance.

Heartrending, at its core.

You’d kill me, if I wasn’t me, right?

Cassandra felt hollow, like someone had scraped her empty, left her raw in their wake.

“We’ve numbers across Thedas but we let this happen,” Barris’s voice, Cassandra barely perceived the words past the roar in her ears. “Our officers either failed to see it or were complicit. The Templars are ready to hear with the Inquisition needs of us.”

Barris had shown remorse, humility, ready to make things right however possible. But he was right, and Cassandra…she’d never found herself questioning the Order more in her entire life.

“You know what you need to do,” she snapped. “It was you who ignored the threat of the Breach, at the word of a demon who has been in your midst for who knows how long.”

“You speak truths we should never have ignored,” Barris said. “The Order is leaderless, gutted by betrayal. We must rebuild it.”

“Leaderless?” Cassandra seethed, “You were so willing to follow a raving madman, your Lord Seeker, a demon in disguise. I am Lady Seeker Cassandra Pentaghast.”

“Y-yes ma’am, of course, I meant no disrespect-”

“You will submit to my guidance! The Order you have worked for is broken. You will yield and serve the Inquisition without question as you seem so capable of doing!” They certainly hadn’t done nearly enough to question their former leaders. “You will be knights of the Inquisition, serve us, and rebuild without stain on your honor.”

And when Barris turned to his fellow Templars, sought their opinions, they knelt before the Lady Seeker, subject to her will.

She willed to wring each and every one of their necks, this was all…frustrating, infuriating, overwhelming, her mind ached as it tried to comprehend just how far they’d fallen.

Cole was an anomaly to say the least. He’d helped Eleanor, helped them in the destruction of the demon of Envy. And he remained to help further still. Their new conscripts were sent split up, a portion making certain a wing of the barracks were clear of enemies, see to it Knight Captain Denam was secured as their prisoner, and the others going to make certain their noble allies were alive and well. If some unfortunate fate befell their allies it would not bode well for the Inquisition…and Maker, Eleanor would be wracked with guilt, blame herself for their joining them here and being led to their demise, especially the Marchands.

In the broken, destruction-wrought Great Hall of Therinfal, their party gathered around the Iron Bull who was kneeling, still holding fast to Eleanor, as she…Maker, she could not be roused, no amount of jostling, calling her name, Solas sending pulses through their bond would wake her if…oh if Cassandra could not see the steady rise and fall of the girl’s chest she would fear the girl was dead. It’d been her first thought, the first horrific thing that came to mind when the girl went limp in her hold just seconds after being dropped by the demon of Envy, that in the mere blink of an eye, Cassandra had failed and Eleanor was gone.

“What is wrong with her, Solas?” Cassandra asked.

The man looked listless, struggling to find words as he searched their bond for some explanation further. He wrapped an arm around Marehis, holding her close as the woman looked over her ward, tucked in a single arm of the Qunari. The Iron Bull’s eye was closed as he listened closely, fingers carefully pressed into her wrist as he checked her pulse.

“Her heart’s pounding hard, her pulse is thready,” the Iron Bull rasped out.

Sera shrieked, startled when Cole appeared, crouching before Eleanor, paying no mind to the Iron Bull’s low wary growl.
“It got in her hurts and used them against her, faked faces of her friends to learn her face and form, she did not realize she was free at first,” Cole said, an explanation of the girl’s behavior, her initial fright with Cassandra. “She knows now, but her mind needs to heal.” He held at a hand, hovering just over the center of the girl’s chest.

Cassandra heard the strain of an arrow being knocked and bowstring pulled back, as Sera screamed, “You keep your ruddy hands off of Inky you creep!”

The boy wasn’t alarmed by her actions, “Hurtful, hateful, hands touching what isn’t meant for them, She doesn’t want it she said! I’ll show him, arrows will teach him not to touch my friends! I wouldn’t touch Ellie like that, this is meant for healing, not hurt, my hand will stay where it is, I only need it to look,” he said, and then, “Her heart—the physical one—it is under pressure, pushing pumping powering blood to her brain, trying to help but it is hurting itself.”

Ahh. If that diagnoses didn’t sound so very terrifying Cassandra would find amusement in the thought that perhaps he found such fast friendship with the girl for her love of alliteration. Was he...was he correct, about Eleanor's condition? Solas was quiet, head bowed as he searched their bond trying to verify and perhaps come with something that would help.

Sera looked startled by Cole's words, “You…that’s…what the frig?!”

“Sera, silly, sisterly, smart. She's amazing, someone to be proud of, does she know she's perfect as she is? Old hate should have no hold on her. You're hurting because your friend hurts, you all are, I...” he found pause, deciding instead to say, “it hurts me too. I like Ellie, she sees hurt and she tries to heal, like me, but she isn’t a Spirit, she doesn’t have the things I do, still she tries and keeps trying until she succeeds.”

"sandra he's saying weirdy shite!"

"Leave her be, demon," Dorian said, and he shifted to stand more so alongside Sera as if to back her up or perhaps give her the ability to allow him to shield her from Cole attempting some sort of foul manipulation. There was some solidarity* there Cassandra was unsure just how it was struck, but it had only grown as the Mage made himself a friend to Eleanor and by association, Sera.

"Dorian, delight, daring, dulled, why doesn't he understand he's so much more than circumstance? He can build better than what was broken because he is brave. I'm not a demon. I'm Cole."

"Kaffas!"

"No...Cooole," the boy stressed as if Dorian misunderstood his pronunciation.

"What is..." Cassandra sought to question the young man's strange way of speaking, was he proclaiming some relation to Sera, 'sisterly' he'd said? What exactly was he going on about? How was this helping anyone?

"Love makes bonds, not blood. Cassandra, caretaker, careful, compassion, I like it when she smiles, doesn't she know she deserves so much love? She has such an amazing heart. I know Ellie's mind, she sees your hurts and hurts with you. I can help you, I want to help you. Let me."

That was a touch too raw for Cassandra's comfort, but it did sound like the Eleanor she knew, Maker her eyes ached, she had to speak past the tightness in her throat, “What would you have us do?” Cassandra asked quietly.
"Envy forced her into the Fade, put her in her hurts, played, pained, punished." Sera flinched as this Cole explained. "Her Mark makes her go back, but her mind…it is broken, and she cannot perceive the Fade yet," he looked to Marehis, “You—you’re the one that watches, her Marehis—minder, motherly, missed, waiting watching but who watches after the watcher? Oh she’s so very glad you have Solas, your friendship with Cassandra, you build each other up and it makes her heart happy. She nearly forgot you in the Fade, you aren’t in her hurts, not deeply rooted, you didn’t put it there. You have her potions. The one for sleep would see her safe, steel her from the Fade, allow her physical mind and heart to rest and recover.”

Solas nodded, agreed, and they set about doing what they could. Maker, she hoped it worked. Marehis administered sleeping potion, and all they could do was wait.

And so they settled in. They found a room they felt was most secure, and everyone went to task. Dorian was animate they try to scrape together as much information as possible on this ‘Elder One’ the Red Templars were receiving their order from, so he was going back through the wings of Templar barracks they’d had to fight through earlier to search for any documentation that might be lying around, the Iron Bull going along in case they weren’t clear of enemies. Madam de Fer went to smooth things over, make certain their allies—the nobles, they were all safe, merely frightened and confused at what had happened—did not leave Therinfal rescinding their allegiance to the Inquisition. Rainier stood guard to ensure the wing Eleanor was to be kept in was safe, remained clear of any straggling foes, their remaining Templars were ordered to follow suit, assist him as need be. Cassandra…supposed they would have to return to Haven under her watch, and she was not leaving, not until she could do so with Eleanor.

Cole and Solas were sequestered. Solas would ascertain what nature of Spirit the young man was, just why he held the form he did, it seemed strange even to the man who studied such things, a Spirit in a seemingly mortal form. The Elf Apostate had spoken directly to Cassandra to say he’d examine the Spirit, and then he was silent as he led Cole into the room they chose for such purpose, and closed the door, something flashing across the wood like warding, Cassandra supposed to keep the Spirit in bounds or perhaps to secure privacy, she could hear nothing of what was said even as she did admittedly press her ear to the door, trying to make fathom out if the spell meant something had already gone awry but Solas was more skilled than that she trusted, he had things well in hand.

Varric waited in the wings, taking point outside the door to the room they tended to Eleanor in. Cassandra, Marehis, Sera took the task of getting the girl some peaceful rest. They all worked to remove her boots, her armor, and Cassandra was mindful of the watch still in the girl’s pocket it…it would bring her comfort, perhaps, to be able to lay sight on it when she woke, so the Seeker placed it on the nightstand and left the clockface open for her.

“Inky’s feet is stinky,” Sera announced quietly as she plied a wet washcloth against said stinky feet, breaking their longstanding silence, “but once I clean them up good, do you think Viv’d be prissy about redoing her toenails? Paint’s almost chipped all off. Inky thinks the polish’s pretty, it might make her happy.”

“Hmm, if you look in my pack there is remover that would suit for now,” Marehis said, and Sera twisted around to dig in the Elf woman’s pack, pulling out a bottle of clear liquid marked as such, “it would leave her nails pigment free, clean, to be repainted later.”

Sera began cleaning off left over nail polish from the girl’s nails—toes and fingers as well, it was all rather chipped and the Elf girl groaned in sympathy when, as she moved on to her hands, she found deep cracks and chipped pieces of her actual nailbed, fingernails bleeding and broken like they’d scraped harshly against stone. Sera broke out a vial of Elfroot tonic and a clean cloth, carefully swabbing Eleanor's nails so they might heal as she slept.

Marehis was working a comb through the girl’s wet hair. Cassandra held her upright, Eleanor’s head resting back against the Seeker’s shoulder, her hair lay down Cassandra’s back. As it was, the Nevarran woman had removed her chest plate, and she could feel the girl’s heartbeat against her chest. Cole…had certainly been of great help, her heart beat slow and steady now. It was a comfort, like it had been on the Storm Coast, to feel it’s certainty.

“…’sandra?” Sera asked gently.

Ahh. Cassandra had not realized it until the young Elf voiced concern. The Seeker…well admittedly she was crying. Possibly. It felt like a stone was lodged in her throat tears steadily streaming down her face, her chest felt tight.

“Shh, da’len,” Marehis hushed Sera in gentle reprimand, that she should have not brought attention to the Seeker’s distress. But it wasn’t necessary, Cassandra was…albeit embarrassed but she did not feel ashamed at her show of weakness.

She reached and laid a hand on Sera’s forearm, “It has been a trying day,” Cassandra said tightly. Maker it was understatement.

Tears welled up in Sera’s eyes and she sought to comfort, “I’m…I’m sorry your Order thing’s all broke ‘sandra. And that Inky’s hurt but…it’ll be okay. Ellie’s tough, she’ll bounce back, and we’ll help her,” Sera promised. “And you…you’ve got this, you really do, you’ll get those assholes whipped into shape,” and then trying for teasing, “Commander Dreamy might rethink his decision to leave the Order once he finds out you’re running things, bet he’d like you barking orders at him.”

“Sera,” Marehis spoke laughingly, sniffling as she wiped at her own eyes with the back of her hand.

“Honestly,” Cassandra drawled halfheartedly. Then, with all sincerity, truly, “Thank you, Sera. You…you do well, being Eleanor’s friend, cheering her up, encouraging her. I do appreciate you.”

“I do as well, da’len, truly,” Marehis said.

“Cripes you two, we’re already all weepy, shush it!” Sera snapped, ears tinging red with embarrassment though she said, “Thanks…”

And then after a moment of consideration Sera ventured, “Um. I got play time with Inky when we was in Haven ‘cause she got all sick and had a few days off, and we get some meals together but…I…” it sounded like she was endeavoring to request more time with the girl once they returned to Haven, and certainly Cassandra did wish they could supply Eleanor with more downtime, but the Elf proposed, “I know I don’t talk all fancy but I am smart. Dori’s teachin’ Inky all kinds of reading stuff, and I was wondering…maybe Josie’d put me on Ellie’s schedule. She’s never had school, she seems okay with numbers but maybe you’d like her to learn some math things—I can teach her that, good. And she likes potions and stuff and she knows cooking, so I thought she might like sciencey lessons.”

“You would like to teach Eleanor math…and science? Of what sort?” Cassandra asked.

Sera nodded. “Littler math to start and see where she is, work her up to algebra soon enough I reckon. Science’s easier sort of, we’d do basic things, but she could do a little chemistry’n’pish for fun and application,” she flushed, ducking her head and Cassandra felt badly, she was sure she’d given some sign of hesitation in her expression—she did not think the girl was an ignorant and she’d spoken of her education to some degree, but ‘fun and application’ sounded like experiments and experiments and Sera didn’t sound like a safe mix, but the young Elf defended, “Look. If you…if you poke around the University of Markham*, Professor Farkus, he uh, might remember me. I applied for their Chemistry program few years back, got accepted. Full scholarship gig, he thought my shite was impressive.”

…that was certainly a bold claim and Cassandra...could not imagine Sera lying so brazenly about something of the sort, “You studied at the University of Markham?”

“I was Inky’s age, needed um, permission, in the end,” the girl shrugged. “Lady shut it down big time. Professor was real upset ‘bout it. If you ask, he can probably vouch for me or whatever, I wouldn’t let Inky get blowed up or nothin’ and it’s fun. She likes learning and it um might make her feel…you know. Smart and stuff.”

That…she…Maker what sort of- it was the University of Markham! It was only one of the largest universities in Thedas, rivaling, and in most circles it could be said to be surpassing, the University of Orlais! And Maker to be so young! What sort of mother, adoptive or otherwise would deny their own child the opportunity?! Marehis looked as appalled as Cassandra felt.

“I’m certain you would be an excellent tutor for Eleanor,” Cassandra said, “if she is agreeable you’re more than welcome to a spot in her schedule.” And then, "Sera...do keep me in mind if you’ve ever a wish to continue your education in future. I would make certain the Inquisition provided letters of recommendation, myself personally, I would accredit you to any university you wished. And if Eleanor accepts your offer of teaching, that would certainly be a bright spot on an application, the personal tutor to the Herald of Andraste."

"Oh you keep that crap to yourself!" Sera snapped, and for a moment Cassandra thought she'd misstepped egregiously, been overbearing but, "Might take you up on letters or somethin' but don't put it in Inky's head I'd want to teach her just for some bright spot on my shitty whatever. Not using Ellie's business like that."

Ahh. That was understandable, honorable even. "But you would still use mine I hope?"

"Pfft yeah, you're Seeker, no one's lookin' for handouts from you, you're too scary, too strong to let people take advantage. But Ink's kind, wants to help everyone so bad, she's gonna have people pulling on her in all directions wanting to break her into pieces they can build themselves higher with. Assholes like that will get arrows from me. Besides I...I dunno, I never thought about trying school again. It wasn't...uni was an out for me, or at least I thought it was going to be. Got nothing to be out of now, so."

"Well...perhaps you should consider it, if it is something you may find passion in. You have your entire life ahead of you sweet girl, whatever you decide with it...I'm certain it will be incredible no matter what,” Marehis encouraged, reaching out to tuck a bit of Sera's hair behind her ear, it sent the younger Elf blushing, smiling slightly despite herself it seemed, but still shaking her head to shift her hair back into place shortly after.

Once Eleanor was clean, they had to find clothing. Her pack was on Russel, and he and their steeds were...someone should check on them. Their steeds were outside the fortress. Since the girl had place for her potions stores in her armor’s belt and Madam de Fer had reasonably suggested the girl not carry her pack around when meeting with her noble guests, with the Lord Seeker. It wasn’t exactly intended to be a fashion accessory, but she did look more ‘presentable’ without it. There was a bit of fear washed with relief when Cassandra recalled how they’d considered having the girl wear one of her nicer outfits to meet with their noble allies and represent the Inquisition before the Lord Seeker—Lady Josephine had been certain the girl packed as such—they’d no idea the danger they were walking into, Maker. Cassandra was so relived they’d thought against it, had the girl been without armor…she was just grateful they’d reconsidered. There was the thought that perhaps, had the girl been unarmored, she could have been persuaded to stay with their noble allies while her party went ahead and dealt with the Lord Seeker when trouble rose, that perhaps she wouldn’t have faced Envy as she had, but the past could not be undone, and Eleanor would not have been compliant to such a decision, she would have merely gone forward less protected.

“She can wear my sleep shirt,” Marehis offered, pulling a surprisingly large tunic from her own pack that…certainly did not look to be made for the slender woman holding it.

“Solas’s shirt you mean,” Cassandra was certain.

“He has long since come to terms with the fact that he is no longer the sole owner of his wardrobe,” Marehis informed her humorously.

Ahh. Implying should things stand, and they were here for the evening, Marehis could merely commandeer her…other sleep shirt, poor Solas. Sera’s nose wrinkled up at the thought of the Elf Apostate running around topless.

Ohhh, Cassandra wished Eleanor would wake. It felt foolish, but she sat holding the girl’s hand until the very last second she could possibly spare…she lingered longer than she should have, there were things to do. Still, she hated leaving, but she needed to take charge further still with their newly acquired Templars, and she and Marehis would need to get reports out to the advisors on the day’s events. Once they had the girl situated, Varric came to take post, sit with Sera and watch over the girl. The young Elf took the bag of Eleanor’s potions from Marehis, and Sera rattled off the instructions for each to confirm she was certain when and how to administer them if there was need. Blessed girl. Cassandra sighed, and if someone had told her she would do such a thing when she first met the wretched little prankster in Val Royeaux, she would have thought them crazy, but the Seeker came up behind where Sera sat at Eleanor’s bedside and dropped a kiss to the top of the Elf’s horrible, horrible bowl cut. Varric snickered at her open affection, and Cassandra might have felt a mite vindictive, so she smoothly stepped up behind the Dwarf and kissed the top of his hair before smacking him upside the head, earning a grunt from him and a snorting giggle from Sera.

“If you’ve need of anything, Rainier is just out in the hall, and the Iron Bull should return shortly,” Cassandra said, “if Eleanor wakes before we are returned, do please send word to us.”

“You got it, Seeker,” Varric said, rubbing the back of his head.

She and Marehis set up in Knight Captain Denam’s office. It lacked the hidden corpse of the fallen Lord Vigilant now, and there was room to work. It was a sort of torture, waiting for Eleanor to wake, but at least there was some distraction found in getting their report written up.
Cassandra…Sera had jested that Commander Cullen would find pleasure in Cassandra’s decisions, but some small part of her feared he would greatly disapprove. It would not make her regret her decision, but she did hope he would see reason, if he heard the things that transpired this day and thought Cassandra’s decision lacking, that would certainly speak to…well she wasn’t certain it would speak well of his character, his ideals, and perhaps they were not an adequate match if that were the case.

What she got was understanding and support of her decision, and a request to be kept appraised as to Eleanor’s recovery, another offer to join them she would again decline out of fear of what the girl bore witness to in the Fade—she’d spoken so incoherently, but there’d been some horrific mention of Cullen killing her. Cassandra was desperate for the girl to wake and fearful of what would happen when she did. She had already been through so much and they hadn’t any idea what may have transpired when the girl was cast into the Fade with a demon of Envy.

The Templars were eager to help however they could. They secured Knight Captain Denam for Cassandra—Leliana had agents near the fortress who would come and take custody of him, turn him in to a cell in Haven’s dungeons with Magister Alexius, and Cassandra almost wondered if perhaps the Spymaster would indulge in vindication, have the Templar and Tevinter mage share a cell…Cassandra would certainly see that as fitting, but Leliana likely wouldn’t do anything of the sort. She would perhaps threaten the men as such though, and that was pleasing enough in and of itself. As for their new helpful Templars, The Knight Fletcher assisted Madam de Fer her in reigning in their steeds inside the Fortress safely, retrieving Eleanor’s pack. Barris came and sat with Cassandra and Marehis, he willingly submitted to questioning from the women, laying out every last thing he’d witnessed in his time with the Lord Seeker since the Conclave.

Though he did start out with questions of his own, offered tentatively as though he were certain the Seeker would snap at him for it, but he endeavored none the less,

“If I may…” Barris spoke carefully, “I would ask after Lady Ellie. Is she…has there been any change, do you know?”

“She is still unconscious,” Cassandra allowed, “but we made certain she is comfortable. We will know more when she wakes.”

And then it was time for Cassandra’s questions. Barris admitted he worried perhaps the Lord Seeker may have been taken even before then, and Cassandra…well that was very possible, the man had been replaced without raising alarm. She had not seen the actual man in quite some time. Bah! Somehow she felt badly that she herself hadn’t called the man to question when she saw his change in behavior in Val Royeaux, and her anger redoubled at those in the Order who saw the man every day and hadn’t thought to question his change when it took only a few minutes in Val Royeaux for Cassandra to spot something amiss.

There was a knock on the office door then, and followed by Thom Rainier’s voice, “It’s me,” before he entered, “Apologies, Lady Seeker, but uh, it’s getting late and I…well. Is this a proper interrogation or can you and the lad eat?”

Ahh. The man came bearing a tray of sandwiches and drink. It was nearly gone seven in the evening and the Seeker was admittedly peckish.

“Well, thank you, Sergeant,” Cassandra said gesturing for him to join them, and he came and carefully set the tray on the desk, “Is there anything to report?”

“Ellie-girl’s still out like a light,” he was sad to say, “Solas has concluded his investigation of Cole. The young man seems to have passed his inspection, Solas wrote something up for you,” Rainier said, reaching into the inner pocked of his over coat to withdraw a folded stack of parchment to hand off to the Seeker. “Cole has been assisting um, telling us things, and Solas has been using their bond to confirm.”

“Things?” Marehis asked.

“Ellie’s sleeping peacefully, there’s something…some kind of disconnect where it doesn’t feel like she’s hungry but she does need something to eat so Solas and Sera are endeavoring to get something on her stomach, broth at least. And Dorian is working on getting some Embrium steam going in the room to help her breathe more clearly, cold air’s getting to her, Madam de Fer is trying to make the room warmer. And our artist extraordinaire Varric Tetrhas has taken it to task to paint her nails.”

Oh Maker that...well that all sounded like help to the girl, and that last interesting factoid was equal parts amusing and unsettling, Cassandra personally wasn’t certain of the author’s ability to paint nails.

“I’m glad she’s still a...well. Does this Cole have any idea when she’ll be better?” Barris asked, pensive. When Rainier shook his head, the Knight ran a hand over his face, sighing, “Maker, today was...I wish I had done more. I thought I was doing well to prepare the Herald for facing the Lord Seeker truly, I still cannot believe I didn’t see what was right in front of me all these months.”

“You will do more now,” Cassandra said as she gathered her work in a neat stack and rose from her seat, “Serve the Inquisition—Eleanor—well, you and your fellow Templars can find redemption,” she felt just the barest bit of mercy, and moreover it was more to bring the girl comfort, “When Eleanor is better, perhaps you could speak with her, assure her of our security in the Templars helping us to seal the Breach.”

The young man looked like he did very much wish to take her up on the offer but still, “I...Maker I would be glad to be of assurance but...she...she could not possibly wish to see anyone from the Order let alone me. I saw what was happening and did not do nearly enough about it. She stood up to the Lord Seeker when he—it—behaved so reprehensibly in Val Royeaux. I should have done more.”

It was his prerogative, she wasn’t going to spend more of her own breath offering pity to the man, she wasn’t feeling that generous just now. Though Rainier rested a hand on Barris’s shoulder, “The fault is not entirely your own, it is that of your superiors. And Ellie took note that you were the only one that sought to reason with the Lord Seeker that day, appreciated your assistance with the dealings today. You’ll find...Ellie’s a good sort, there are those in her ranks who have done far worse than you, and she’s found them redemption still.”

“...Thank you er, Sergeant?”

Rainier offered the hand he removed from the young man’s shoulder to shake, “Thom Rainier, Bull’s Chargers, and personal recipient of the Herald of Andraste’s mercy.”

It felt like all mercy was gone that night. They finished their work and made certain the fortress was clear of enemies before Cassandra organized the Templars into rotations—to keep watch in the night, some would sleep while others stood guard. The Herald’s party made quarters in the barracks though Sera was rather irremovable from Eleanor’s side, but that suited well enough. There was much to be done, reports to be written, their findings in Therinfal to be sorted through, accounted for, Marehis looked wholly torn between the desire to be there the very moment Eleanor woke, to hold and soothe her as she slept, and the girl's need for her to secure her safety, make certain their efforts, Eleanor's efforts, did not go to waste. But Sera was not needed for such things, so the Elf girl slipped under the covers and held the Human girl close, settling into sleep with the Herald’s party taking turns standing guard outside the chamber door. Cassandra and Marehis pored over everything written up or discovered that day, the report from Solas on Cole, Madam de Fer actually came to the room Cassandra had claimed and the two discussed the Elf Apostle’s findings. Cole was apparently a young man that died at the hands of cruel Templars in White Spire. A Spirit of Compassion found him and tried to help, but while they ‘reached out and in’ trying to bring him peace and assistance, the young man expired, his soul leaving his body, and the Spirit found their self inside the broken body, they became Cole. Not possession, accidental replacement—the body was empty when the Spirit entered it, and was now its sole...soul in residence. Madam de Fer was as skeptical as Cassandra was but they both understood the young man had been of assistance to Eleanor, they would watch carefully and make certain he wasn’t a threat.

Cole is a Spirit of Compassion, meant to help with injury and trauma, healing both mentally and physically. He is intuitive to thought in relation to that goal—for example Sera’s panic when it seemed he might touch Eleanor inappropriately—he spoke as if he were Sera, and then explained his intent. He quotes thought, I don’t think its to be revealing of our privacy, it seems he’s incapable of keeping it silent, he reflexively recites what he hears at times, though there are others where speaking thought assists in the healing process by addressing the issue in their own words. Others he summarizes what he's observed on reflex, he's trying to understand our group, and how he can best work in it, he's decided to do so using what he's learned from his time in Ellie’s mind.

Ahh. Unnerving. Put possibly helpful. They would see, Cassandra supposed, the boy had helped Eleanor admirably so far. How did one strike a contract with a Spirit in Human form? Would he even desire payment for his work in the Inquisition?

Before sunrise, the Seeker was holding a gathering of their Templar conscripts, discussing plans for how to move forward, and how they would traverse their journey back to Haven, when Varric and Sera, having resumed their bedside vigil, sent word through Rainier that Eleanor was finally awake. Awake and asking after everyone. Oh, Maker, asking implied talking, Cassandra feared the girl would shut down as she had before, put perhaps this was a sign she would not, that she would talk through her troubles.

Eleanor’s room was full. The whole of her party was gathered around save Cole. Solas and Rainier stood off to the side while Varric and Sera, Dorian and Madam de Fer had taken seats on the sides of the mattress, though it was nearly full as it stood before their added numbers—the Iron Bull was sitting upright, his back against the headboard, Eleanor seated in his lap.

The moment the door was closed behind them Eleanor’s bedside companions were up and out of the way, making room for Cassandra and Marehis who joined them from her own work corresponding with Leliana, to descend on the girl—very wise, Cassandra was admittedly prepared to bodily force her way through.

“Eleanor, are you well?” Cassandra asked as she sat on the edge of the bed, Marehis mirroring her.

The Elf woman raised a hand to push curls back behind the girl’s ear, her voice tight as she asked, “Da’vehnan?”

“I’m okay I think,” Eleanor said quietly, “Tired. Head still hurts but it's just me in here now, so that’s good.”

“Do you need potion?” Cassandra asked, she’d been tentative to risk touching the girl in case she still found some reticence there, but her hand had moved almost of its own volition to reach out and take the girl’s Marked hand, and Eleanor grabbed a hold of it, squeezing tight like she wanted reassurances of her own in some regard. Huh. Varric had managed his adventures in nail polish admittedly well, his handiwork neat, the girl's nails were now pink.

Eleanor shook her head ‘no’ at the offer of potion, though the motion did make her wince, “Um…maybe, yeah,” she admitted.

“Here Inky,” Sera said, thrusting a bottle of nearly-translucent green potion.
“Thanks—” though she gasped in surprise, along with the alarmed cries of her friends when their large-hat wearing Spirit suddenly appeared, crouched and balancing on the footboard of the bed, “Cole!”

“You’re awake, hurting. Piercing, painful pound,” the young man announced.

“Potion,” Eleanor offered another ‘p’ word with light amusement as she raised the vial as if in toast before knocking it back.

The boy sighed with some relief. “I want to help,” he said, and then he looked to Eleanor for a moment, “you…you want to do that thing again. You wanted one from Lady Josie, when you heard fake-her crying out in the Fade. You want one from me now?”

Eleanor nodded, holding her arms out and the boy was on the bed then, letting her wrap her arms around his neck while he crouched before her, his arms limp at his sides. “Hugging,” she explained, “and I want hugs from lots of people, Lady Josie’s in Haven though, the real one not the knifey one. Real Lady Josie wouldn’t pull a knife on me…don’t um, let what went on in the Fade give you a bad impression of my friends.”

…Lady Josephine pulled a knife on Eleanor in the Fade? Maker. Oh Cassandra wanted to know just what had happened, but Eleanor had questions for her own. Cole made himself scarce, he did not leave but he took to sitting on the footboard, everyone gathered to listen and help fill in the blanks for the girl.

“Varric said you took over the Templars um…Envy’s dead, right?” she asked, “It didn’t…it wasn’t able to copy me or anything?”

“It is dead, Eleanor, truly,” Cassandra promised, “it endeavored to copy you but failed rather spectacularly. Did it divulge it’s intention?”

Her chin quivered at that. “It said the Elder One was going to kill me and let Envy take my place, use the Inquisition t-to take over the world. I wasn’t….I wasn’t sure I was gonna make it out of there, so if I didn’t, I wanted to make sure whatever you got was something you’d know immediately wasn’t me.”

“You tricked a demon, Tumbles?” Varric asked, sounding proud.

The girl nodded. “Tried to, anyway. I pretended that I’d be cool with world domination. Took up swearing for a bit, um…I might have called Mother Giselle a bad word and renounced my belief in the Maker in the same sentence.” She looked to Cassandra brow creased with worry as she asked, “Do you think the Maker hears things in the Fade? I felt badly, and I’m sorry, but I didn’t know what else to do, the Lord Seeker wasn’t upfront with his plans to corrupt the Templars, no one saw until it was too late, so I figured world domination might happen the same way—you wouldn’t question Envy-Ellie until it was too late to do anything about it, and swears would be a good clue but you might find excuse for it. A complete loss of faith, no more praying, denouncing the Maker, making Envy think I would talk like I felt He’d abandoned me my whole life—but I don’t feel that way, honest,” she insisted tearfully, “I never have! I l-love—”

Cassandra pulled the girl close, hand cradling the crown of her head as she endeavored to put a stop to her worry, “That wouldn’t sound like you at all,” she agreed, “The Maker knows your heart, sweet girl. I’m certain He is with you always, even in the Fade, and I’m certain He took no offense.”

“Oh da’vehenan, you were so very brave, and that was such a clever move, you did nothing in meanness,” Marehis breathed in agreement.

The girl nodded, pulling back to wipe at her eyes with the back of her hands, “Thanks.”

But that was all they got on Eleanor’s time in the Fade…and a great deal of what she offered, they’d already surmised. Her attempts to trick the demon they hadn’t guessed though Maker, she was so very glad Eleanor had been able to keep her wits about her, had thought to do such a thing. The girl shrugged off further questioning—Envy was dead, and she’d given them confirmation that the plot afoot had been to kill and replace her. The girl listened quietly as Cassandra explained all she had missed while unconscious, what they learned of the impending assassination attempt on the Empress, the conscription of the remaining Templar forces.

“I understand that conscription wasn’t the goal,” Cassandra started carefully.

“I don’t like conscription on principle, I mean its…a fancy word for militant slavery, and I feel badly I wasn’t able to help,” Eleanor apologized, promising, “I understand it and I trust your judgement I mean, you did amazing—saw what needed to be done and did it, so I’m really proud of you for handling everything.”

“Thank you, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, admittedly relieved. “Now, how are you feeling? Your headache is better I hope?” the girl nodded, and the Seeker asked, “Are you hungry?”

“Do you think um…c-could we leave, or do we have to stay here?” the girl asked instead of answering.

Cassandra looked around to meet the gaze of her teammates and when she received nothing that looked like reticence she said, “We could move on, take on breakfast once we’ve some distance. Do you feel well enough?”

Eleanor nodded though to Cassandra’s eye she still seemed weary, pallid and exhausted despite having been unconscious for neigh some seventeen hours, but she would have help if she needed it and right now… it truly seemed the girl needed to be out of the Templar Fortress.

Though there was a moment of panic when the girl realized she would be given privacy to change. Granted the shirt she wore fell to her knees, it wasn’t proper clothing for riding, let alone the weather, and everyone was already making leave of the room when Eleanor stood up on shaky limbs atop the mattress, preparing to step down, though her eyes went wide when Rainier’s hand was on the door latch.

“Wait!” Eleanor called out, halting him, “Um, w-where are you guys going?”

“I can help you change, da’len, the others are just stepping outside,” Marehis explained, sounding uncertain.

“You don’t have to! Um…is it okay that I use this shirt?” she asked, looking around to see who would answer her as she wasn’t sure who’d given her their clothing.

“Of course,” Solas and Marehis answered in unison, sending their ears turning red.

“…cool. Thanks. One sec, just stay, please,” the girl instructed, though she shrieked as she tripped rather spectacularly, her foot caught on the bedding and she would have fallen, crashing against the stone floor face first if the Iron Bull hadn’t reached out, his hand palming the back of her neck, fingers fitting over its curve to her shoulder and pulled her backward and down to fall on her bottom into the cushion of mattress beneath her.
“Eleanor—” Cassandra made to object when the girl thanked the Qunari before making to rise again.

“One sec!”

It took more than a second, but only slightly. Her next attempt off the bed was made by Eleanor thrusting her arms out to Sera who obliged her, taking her by the hands and pulling her forward until her legs slid over the edge of the bed and she was on her feet. The girl had spotted where they’d left her armor, and she grabbed at her leggings, hastily pulling them up, hopping in place to get them up, and over her hips faster before buttoning them, and then she grabbed her cloak and slung it around her shoulders, shoved her feet into her boots and looked around before setting sight on the nightstand and taking up the pocket watch still sitting there, tucking it away in her cloak pocket before she threw her overcoat and armored tunic over her arm to carry them and announced herself, “Ready!”

“If they leave, they might come back different,” Cole murmured quietly to himself.

“Ell-” Solas started but the girl was already in motion making way for herself through the group of her allies standing by the door saying,

“Let’s go!”

Eleanor was quiet and tense the rest of their time settling things in the Fortress, always clinging to one member of their team or another, following after those who went to their allotted sleeping quarters to gather their things, keeping the group together, and trying to keep the whole of their numbers in sight, looking back over her shoulder or turning about in circles to check and recheck that everyone was accounted for. It was a rather impossible feat, and as they gathered in the courtyard where Eleanor had been tested to grant them audience with the faux-Lord Seeker to begin with, a solution of sorts was offered, given there was no longer anywhere between them, and their exit, that held a low roof overhead.

“Imekari. Come here,” the Iron Bull ordered, kindly but firm, it had the girl whirling about immediately and looking up at the Qunari before she reluctantly detached herself from the strange pairing she’d made of Madam de Fer and Varric and came to stand before the man who then got down on his knees and extended his pinkie finger to her, “If you’re up for it, we’re about to do something that you can never—never—tell Dalish we did, or she will find me, and she will kill me,” the girl stared at him wide-eyed for a moment before he said, “Piggyback. Qunari style.”

Which meant Eleanor riding atop the Iron Bull’s shoulders, using his horns as armrests and support to keep her securely seated. Cassandra’s heart leapt in panic when the girl had settled sitting with her legs hanging over the Iron Bull’s shoulders, and the Qunari man, the tallest person—being the Nevarran had born witness to in her life, rose up onto his feet, no slouching, full height. Eleanor was more than two Eleanor’s up, and it was very disconcerting, even as the excitement of the man hefting her skyward sent her gasping out the barest bit of a giggle.

And it also meant that, with the Iron Bull keeping toward the back of their party, the girl could keep everyone in view, all while being constant physical contact with one of their members.

Barris and Fletcher led the lineup of their sixteen fellow Knights, following the Herald’s party out of Therinfal Redoubt. The sun was out, blessedly so, no rain clouds in sight. Their steeds walked alongside them, their master’s holding the reins, Sera kept Russel walking alongside their group, and Rainier held the reigns of both his horse and the Iron Bull’s. Cassandra was certain they’d stop to partake of breakfast soon, and riding...well Eleanor understood the Templars were conscripts, punishment for their compliance that led to the fall of the Order in Therinfal, but the girl might feel badly, riding while their Templar counterparts walked. It wasn’t punishment exactly, though it could serve as such. The Templars had marched to Therinfal under the rule of a demon playing Lord Seeker, they could stand to march back—they’d traversed their way from Val Royeaux, they could stand the much shorter stint to Haven without detriment.

They took a break in a clearing, clean lines of sight of anyone traveling along the road, and they were near a stream they could reup their water supply. Rainier stepped up to help Eleanor down off the Iron Bull’s shoulders, the Qunari crouched and Eleanor twisted about to wrap her arms around the Sergeant’s neck and be pulled from Bull’s shoulders though she did hang, holding onto the man a moment longer and he hugged her back, “There we go, Ellie-girl. What’d you say we whip up some breakfast?”

The girl dropped to her feet and nodded, smiling lightly as she followed him.

With the help of Marehis, the Iron Bull, and Sir Barris, Eleanor and Rainier had a campfire and breakfast underway although…

“Hey Kid, you uh, do you eat?” Varric asked their strange Spirit…friend. Cole was over in the clearing near their stop, studying the horses it seemed, they garnered a great deal of his curiosity. Varric had gone to join him, Cassandra watched from where she was securing copies of her reports into the leather pouch she kept tucked away in her steeds saddlebag.

“...Varric, violent, vulnerable, valiant, he shouldn’t be so very hard on himself, he’s so brave and capable, doesn’t he know he’s enough? He always puts himself at fault. I can eat if you need me to,” the young man said in earnest, “but I don’t need me to.”

Varric looked wholly startled and then he cleared his throat. “No thanks Kid, don’t put yourself out on my account,” Varric said. “You don’t eat…at all?”

“I didn’t before. I haven’t needed to.”

That was…mildly disconcerting but at least it was one less mouth to feed?

Two less. Breakfast made, everyone seated around the fire, Cole nor the Herald ate a bite. Eleanor did not endeavor a turn at the food she could take freely from, but instead drained her canteen of water, and when pressed if she was going to eat—Marehis offering to make the girl a plate—she shook her head and made a run to refill her canteen, taking it to task—making herself busy refilling everyone’s water source at the stream. With the aid of Sera and Sirs Barris and Fletcher who volunteered when she approached. There was a segregation of sorts—the Herald’s party gathered around the camp fire while the Templars had seated themselves together nearer to the clearing where they dropped the lines for their horses. Eleanor seemed timid, like she were worried they might not respond well to the Apostle girl coming up to them—she left her staff laying behind where she’d been sitting during breakfast and approached them without it on hand. It startled her when their numbers stood but they did so in earnest, as if expecting some command from the Herald of Andraste they were ready to carry out, but Sera was the one who spoke to them, after her initial squeak when Ellie stumbled back, hand gripping the Elf’s when the Templars rose to their feet and Barris asked,

“My lady, how can we assist?”

“Calm your bits,” Sera, ever the diplomat, told him, “Inky just wanted to see if you lot need to refill your water pish.”

Eleanor nodded, smiling as she held out her unmarked hand in offer to take their canteens.
“That is kind, Lady Ellie, miss Sera, is it?” Fletcher asked.

“Call me miss again and I won’t miss your danglers,” the Elf threatened though she found something funny and giggled, patting Eleanor on the forearm as she shared jovially, “but he would—miss his danglers, get it Ink?”

Ugh. Sera, Maker. Though it was gratifying she’d taken the opportunity to try and tempt the girl to talk, whether it be in joking along or in gentle reprimand, it was a valid effort but all she received was a wry grin and Eleanor blushing at the crude joke.

“Sera then,” the Templar noted with some measure of amusement, “We would appreciate it, allow us to assist.”

So. They had plenty of water, but nothing in reassurance to how Eleanor was coping. She’d fallen into that painful sort of silence where she wouldn’t speak a word, and Marehis passed along an apple and Solas’s cold bag, full of grapes, to Sera who would be riding with Eleanor, intoning that the Elf should seek to entice the girl into snacking at the very least.

They kept a good pace without outriding their Templars that followed on foot, marching. Though getting onto horseback was albeit awkward. They had two new members since they’d last been in Haven—Dorian rode with Varric oddly enough. Apparently Varric had family in Tevinter that Dorian was well acquainted with and too, the duo had bonded over some shared venture they were keeping tight-lipped about, to an extreme, Cassandra only knew such a matter existed because Eleanor would, on occasion, slip a bit of paper with the request that the Seeker occupy the Iron Bull somewhere out of ear shot, so that she and her co-conspirators could conspire in privacy. It was not a difficult task, she would merely request the Qunari assist her in collecting firewood, and guided him into a distracting, long conversation on the finer points of Dragon slaying.

There was also Cole to consider. Rainier actually offered to share his steed with Cole, asking kindly if the young man had ever ridden before. He hadn’t, but the prospect didn’t seem to scare him he was rather…for someone who was supposed to be so in tune with the struggles and emotions of others, the boy was rather passive. He swung up into the saddle with little help from Rainier before the older man climbed on after him, and Cassandra was near enough to hear him offering some form of assurances, while the boy didn’t appear fearful of riding, Thom talked about how to best seat himself and assured him if they had to break out into a gallop in an emergency, he would be safe as he was. Though this prompted,

“Thom, trust torn, then tightened, forgiveness fumbled but fought for, found, does he know how great he can be? I’m so proud of the man he’s become. Thom, but you’re also Sergeant? You were Commander, but you like this name better. The lesser feels like more.”

“I…yes. I’m happy with the work I do now,” Thom spoke cautiously, as if he worried what else their Spirit friend might say in relation to his past.

Sera sat next to Cassandra when they broke for lunch, flopping down next to the Seeker with a defeated sigh.

“Inky wouldn’t bite. And I ate all the grapes. I was trying to get her to eat them with me, honest.”

Sweet girl, she did try. “I appreciate your efforts, Sera…did she…has she spoken a word since we left Therinfal?” Cassandra asked, looking to those seated around her—most of their party were gathered in something of conspiracy near the Seeker, while the Iron Bull enlisted Barris and Madam de Fer’s assistance for making lunch. Eleanor was across the way, seated with Dorian or…
well she was seated but nearly slumbering, she had to keep shaking herself to stay awake even a her head rested against the Tevinter man’s shoulder. Why did he only have one sleeve? The Lietuenant dressed like he had sense.

"Not a peep," Sera sulked.

Solas sighed, “She has been quiet.”

“What do you mean?” Cole asked, startling them, Cassandra had to restrain herself from drawing her weapon on reflex, Maker.

“Creepy!” Sera shrieked.

“Shh! Sera,” Cassandra gestured to Eleanor as reason to be more careful with her volume, they hardly needed the girl overhearing them.

“He’s the one poofing everywhere,” Sera whispered loudly.

“We were merely noting Eleanor’s silence today,” Cassandra offered as answer to the boy’s inquiry.

But that seemed to confuse him further, the boy sat straight down onto his bottom looking up at her with curiosity, “She’s been loud since she woke up.”

“What the frig are you on about?” Sera asked.

“Thoughts twisted need untwisting, but they’re twirled tight. She wants to fix it and she will, she…” Cole seemed to think on it a moment and then, “Ellie’s always fixed things. More often than not, there has been no one else to turn to, when things go broken, she’s had to fix them on her own. So that’s what she does, she thinks and thinks until its fixed.”

“Shit,” Varric swore, “kid always says crap like that, that she’ll fix things when everything goes to hell. She thinks she has to fix her mind being turned into a demon’s torture palace all by herself?”

That…that was enlightening, in an almost infuriating way. It was a pattern of behavior Cassandra had seen but she had not identified what it meant. She merely believed the girl to be subdued but when she thought about it with what Cole had to offer up…when they’d been on the Coast, in the wake of Rainier’s reveal Eleanor did not speak almost at all for nearly three days except for in apology, and when she finally did, it was with a solution for the issue.

“But surely she knows she can talk to us,” Marehis said.

“Can and should are different things—you’ve told her she can but not that she should,” Cole said, “Painful press, what if she breaks? You’re worried if you push she’ll fall.”

Cassandra thought perhaps she might just like this young man after all, strange as his being a Spirit was…well he was ever-proving his allegiance and ability to aid Eleanor.

Even more so when they had lunch underway and Eleanor smiled her thanks when given a plate but made precious little effort to consume its contents.

“There is also a difference between can’t and won’t,” Cole observed suddenly while Cassandra was working up the nerve to prompt the girl to eat, perhaps demand it to see if she’d at least try if she thought Cassandra was frustrated with her lack of appetite.
“There is…” Solas supposed uncertainly, looking to the Spirit, “in what context are you speaking?”

“Ellie’s,” Cole said simply, his attention on the girl who looked to him, confused, “it isn’t like before. Hurt hand in hand with hunger—quiet crying crave, you were left to starve but you don’t have to now. You’re used to bad things happening meaning you’ll have to go without food, your body learned to adapt, to ignore hunger in the wake of wicked things. It doesn’t realize that ‘can’t eat’ is ‘won’t eat’ now, you should tell it, that will help.”

The girl’s mouth worked momentarily, and then very softly, “Oh…”

She seemed to think it over a moment and then Cole bounced in his seat and there was a ghost of smile in his features just before Eleanor tentatively took one of the carrots on her plate between her thumb and index finger and took a careful bite.

Cole seemed to focus on that a moment and then he looked to Sera, “Preening pride, the good kind, I can take care of Inky, I’ll keep her safe! You have her potions.”

“You need potion, Ink?” Sera asked, and when she received a nod from Eleanor the Elf girl yelped and leapt into action, Cassandra had to act quickly to snatch the plate in Sera’s lap before she could send it toppling when she shot to her feet after digging a vial of potion out of Eleanor’s potions bag. The Seeker vaguely wondered if Sera had the ability of Cole’s to teleport, the girl moved so quickly to join the Human girl, armed with potion. The Elf sat next to Eleanor for the remainder of the meal, keeping an eye on how much she ate, though perhaps they all were, there was a collective sense of relief when Eleanor’s plate was left nearly empty, close enough to qualify as an appropriate meal. Eleanor took the potions she normally took in the morning, she was a few hours behind schedule but nothing detrimental. Sera fussied over it, but Solas was able to informed her it would be fine, and the younger Elf surprisingly took him at his word. Though perhaps it shouldn’t be, there was a bit more comradery there as of late, he’d been of some help in her training with Cassandra, and Sera had appreciated it.

“Sir Barris, divide your numbers—to scout ahead for danger and perform a perimeter check, ensure we’re safe while we prepare for our final stint of travel for today,” Cassandra ordered once lunch was through. The young man nodded and immediately saw to it. It was prudent and offered their party privacy. Cole’s intuition had been accurate thus far, it had even gotten Eleanor to eat, now, Cassandra hoped, they could get her talking.

They regrouped, the Herald’s party, gathering together to ensure they were all of one accord, they would approach, be as open and comforting as possible.

“We’re gonna go over there and talk to Imekari,” the Iron Bull whispered to their group, “Get it all out, help her process, cope, internalize, externalize, re…turn…alize… psychology bullshit.” Little affirmative nod to assure yes, he did know what he was talking about, certainly.

“You still got hankies on you, Baldy?” Sera asked Solas quietly. “Better have ‘em on hand.”

“Of course. Did I not give you yours?” Solas asked, and when he received a look like Sera thought he’d grown another head he dug around in the side pocket of his pack, and with an “Ahh,” withdrew a few handkerchiefs he handed off the younger Elf, red, with a golden ‘S’ and the tiny image of an arrow embroidered in the corner.

“Blah!” the girl complained, “Don’t-! Don’t be so nice to me Baldy, it’s right- right weird!”
“Are they not to your liking?” Solas wondered. “I can keep them if you’d rather not—”

“I didn’t say nothin’ like that!” Sera was quick to amend belligerently, tucking the handkerchiefs away in a pocket of her armored tunic, “Just…starting now don’t be so nice to me. Just freaky otherwise. We ain’t friends! N-not really. Be meaner!”

“I do apologize Sera. Your hair is especially horrendous today.”

“Thank you!”

“It’s getting a bit long, da’len…” Marehis said, brushing a hand through the younger Elf’s hair as she examined it, “do you think I could help you with it when we make camp tonight?”

Sera shrugged. “Depends on what’ch’you wanna do with-” she caught herself, shaking her head she stomped her foot and, “blah! Helping Inky! Focus! What the frig do we do just, ‘Hi, what happened in the demon Fade yesterday?’”

“Something just as direct but perhaps…gentler,” Cassandra allowed, “we don’t want to demand the girl speak with us, but neither do I wish to move much further without more fully assessing the situation.”

“We…” Rainier sighed, “I’ve attempted talking with Ellie about things—whenever I’ve offered comfort over troubles in the past she’s had the tendency to flip it around on me. I received three lectures on self-esteem on the way back from Val Royeaux. If we appear to need comforting ourselves over yesterday, or if she thinks what she has to say will make us, erm, sad, she may not be forthright.”

Madam de Fer...she’d been remarkably silent all day, and Cassandra realized then that the woman had needed to speak yesterday, but only done so by seeking Cassandra out in private. The woman feared speaking in front of Cole, maybe not feared exactly, but she was wary of prompting the young man to say anything of her. She seemed contemplative, building a resolve before offering, “Perhaps I could open the conversation?”

And Cole replied, "Vivienne, virtue, vibrant, valued, doesn't she know she is loved not because she is lovely but because she is worthy, for being her? Irreplaceable, precious, she doesn't need to bring others low to raise herself up, she's already enough."

Madam de Fer looked stricken, struck still and silent like she were trapped by the Spirit's words. Cassandra thought perhaps offering the woman someone else to address in the stead of Cole would suit best. "You wish to open the conversation with Eleanor, Madam de Fer?" the Seeker asked.

"On the premise that I wish to assess just how well she handled her dealings with demon possession, perhaps," the woman confirmed, her voice tight like she might be uncomfortable or perhaps...while she did not wish to believe Cole a benevolent ally, his supposed knowing of Eleanor's mind, that the impressions he had of her friends were his interpretations of her very thoughts and feelings may have admittedly overwhelmed the Grand Enchanter who was so usually frigid and petty. "An educational discussion that might lead her to sharing the more emotional aspects of her trials,” she reasoned as she regained further composure.

“Sneak attack, smooth,” Varric agreed, “Tumbles won’t realize it ‘til we’ve got her talking.”

“You take point, Madam de Fer,” the Iron Bull said, “we’ll back you, help keep Imekari focused, kid really knows how to side track…mostly unintentionally, got a lot of anxieties her brain pops around to, but sometimes she’s just outright deflecting. Either way, we got this,” the Qunari rumbled out arms swinging like he were stretching before a fight.

“Certainly,” Cassandra agreed. “Our plan is sound.”

It. It seemed that way. In theory.

The Seeker wasn’t sure how surely she felt about that as she turned to face the girl in question who was looking at them in mild confusion from where she sat by the fire. She couldn’t have heard them of course, but Cassandra supposed the girl wasn’t blind, had plainly seen her party huddled together before turning on her in unison. And now they were descending upon her all at once.

And then despite their plans, Madam de Fer took one look at Eleanor’s…the girl’s eyes were dull, troubled even as she tried to offer them a smile, tension in her shoulders like she were nervous, her complexion was still more pallid than usual and she’d worried her lip so much it bruised, sitting huddled in her cloak and Solas’s tunic swallowed the girl, made her seem impossibly small. Whatever it was that stuck out to the Enchanter left her mouth working and she cleared her throat unable to find whatever words she’d had clear in her mind just a moment before.

Which left the rest of the adults scrambling to start them off.

“Ellie,” Solas said overlapping,

“Imekari—”

“Ink—”

“Tumb—”

“Shank Mistress,” was the endearment Dorian offered up brightly, it sent Eleanor’s brows raising in amused surprise, her attention—all of their attention—held by the Tevinter man who shrugged, “Don’t care for it? Eh, I don’t much either, though I find it more fearsome, and it’s rather befitting given that all of three seconds after being launched into the future, young Ellie here shanked a Venatori guardsmen, right in the heart.”

The girl bit her lip and then, “Cassandra taught me,” she offered shyly, “the room was so tiny I worried my spell backblast might hurt you.”

Ahh! Speaking! And it was nice…while it was an unpleasant necessity, there was a certain sense of pride Cassandra had that she’d been able to equipped the girl to defend herself, to keep herself safe when Cassandra wasn’t there to protect her.

“An admirable solution. We worked well together, you and I, sorting out how to get back from the future,” Dorian said as he sat before the girl, taking her Marked hand in his, his fellow team mates sat close together around him then, backing him up so to speak while curious to see what the man was doing. “You were instrumental in our return, Ellie, but it was team work that got us back.”

The girl gasped, looking regretful as she apologized, “O-oh, gosh, Dorian, I really appreciate all of your help, you were amazing of course, I’m sorry if I- I haven’t talked about it much but I hope you don’t think I mean to sell you short—”

The man was kind enough to cut her off, “Oh, Ellie, while I do so love hearing how very amazing I am—"

“Boss girl just said ‘amazing’ there was no ‘very’ about it, Sparky,” the Iron Bull drawled.

“—never the less,” the Tevinter stressed, shooting a glare at the Qunari, though his expression warmed when Eleanor giggled over the exchange and he returned his attention to her. “We made it back, because we worked together. Yesterday, you made it back from what sounds like a harrowing experience…erm, perhaps not the best term given we’re in the South—your struggle with Envy. You made it out, with our flighty friend Cole’s help.”

“Does he see me and think I’m flying?” Cole could be heard quietly asking Varric who shushed him, clapping the younger man on the back of the neck as he assured the Spirit it was just a turn of phrase.

The girl nodded, “I don’t know that I could have done it without Cole,” she said.

“You’re good at sorting for yourself,” Dorian said. “But Eleanor…you don’t have to. What scared you the most about our friends going to fight that Ferelden Horsetail Dragon?” that…alright, there was no such dragon but it was close enough she was sure Eleanor would get Dorian's point.

“It was a dragon, Dorian.”

“Not quite where I was going. Hmmm...alright, what if Cassandra had proposed she faced it alone. She had it well in hand, do you not think her capable?”

“Of course she is but it was a dragon, Dorian,” the girl reiterated again. “Wh…why are we talking about this?”

“So if Cassandra had something big to fight, you would want all of us to step up and assist her with it?” Dorian asked instead of answering.

“Of course!”

“Why?”

“B-because—that’s just crazy!” Eleanor reasoned, “We’re a team!”

“So no matter the enemy or situation, if we were descended upon by those who mean us harm, even just one of us, what should we do?”

“F-fight them?” Eleanor answered sounding uncertain as to why he would have to ask.

“Together?” Dorian prompted, and when Eleanor nodded he asked, “So why is Envy any different?”

Eleanor flinched, paling as she whimpered out, “C-C-Cassandra s-said Envy’s dead!”

What…what was this man doing?

Dorian reached out, taking the girl’s hands in his, voice soothing as he said, “Yet you’re still dealing with it. A fight in and of itself. And not once, during this fight, have you let us join in.”

“…join in?”

“You’re still in a fight, and we’re still a team.”
Maker, she understood now. She’d been about to intervene, stop the Tevinter as it sounded like he were trying to scare the girl. When Cole said Eleanor wasn’t talking while she processed, Cassandra had heard a point of action—go in, get Eleanor to talk through her troubles—but Dorian heard what was actually said. The girl already knew well she could talk about these things with her friends. The point wasn’t to get her to talk. It was to get her to understand that she should.

“B-…um…” Eleanor fell silent, chin quivering, “it’s…”

The Tevinter man didn’t need Cole’s intuition to realize the girl needed a hug. He leaned forward and wrapped her up in a hug that almost looked like he were doing something wholly unfamiliar but trying his best. Cassandra wasn’t one to judge, she’d not indulged in such practice in decades before the Conclave.

“Come to us, any of us, whenever you’re ready to, Eleanor. Think on it, perhaps, like our agreement on nightmares,” Cassandra offered gently. “This was rather a similar thing.”

“Thanks,” Eleanor said, pulling back to spread her gaze across her party, “I… I will just um…”

“Whenever you’re ready da’vehenan,” Marehis assured her.

“I… I don’t know that I feel up t-to everything right yet, b-but I know I’ve been kind of a whack job all morning. En… Envy made me see people in the Fade—some of you, the Advisors, and um… it would show up looking like one person, then walk away, come back as someone else.”

“That would explain what our resident… Spirit,” Madam de Fer spoke the word with the same intonation she would have ‘demon’, she was still wary of him, as were they all really, “said this morning.”

“Imekari,” the Iron Bull said, gesturing for her to come to him where he sat kneeling, she joined the Qunari before he said, “Everyone huddle up.” It was only mildly uncomfortable, they’d all been sharing quarters as of late after all, still it felt albeit strange to gather around so tightly around Eleanor, Cole looked mildly pleased, excited like he were witnessing something amusingly curious, ending up between Varric and the Iron Bull who said, “Your name is Ellie. You are the Herald of Andraste, agent of the Inquisition. We are your allies. Your friends, we are real, and you are safe.”

Eleanor wrapped her arms around the Qunari’s neck and hugged him tightly, shoulders shaking, and she had hands resting on her shoulders, her back as everyone reached out to comfort her. Cole could be heard humming as if pleased, content.

Despite their reticence with Eleanor’s matchmaking the pair made quite the formidable team. Because Dorian laid down the footwork of helping the girl understand she should talk, and the Iron Bull created a space she felt compelled to do so in, holding the girl even more tightly as Eleanor cried, and details of her time with Envy in the Fade falling from her lips. The cruel version of the Inquisition Advisors, Cassandra felt her stomach turn at the mention of Envy in Leliana form slitting the throat of a false-Cullen. The foul thing created some horrible faux-fortress the girl had to work her way through witnessing horrific possibilities, renewed trauma twisted a different way—Cassandra and Roderick arguing over some wildly inaccurate version of their War table, down in Haven’s dungeons for some reason, with a specter of Eleanor laid out with a dagger in her heart between the quarreling parties. Cole was indeed of assistance, telling Eleanor how to free herself, to push the boundaries of how far Envy could push its creation, expanding its mind trap until it grew too great for the creature to be capable of powering. Even then, the demon had Eleanor in the vice of its grasp, prepared to cast her back to start the torturous process again more painfully this time, so it might learn how to replace her, and Cole distracted it, and Eleanor had found herself on her own two feet and,

She bit her lip seeming pleased with herself, “I did that thing…Cullen taught me actually, Cassandra helped too but I practiced on him? Pulling someone a lot bigger than me in for a nasty headbutt.”

“Right on, Boss,” the Iron Bull commended.

“He will be so proud to hear that, as I am,” Cassandra assured once she could trust her own voice.

Eleanor nodded. “I miss him. Everyone in Haven,” she admitted. “You know, all this wacky powerful magic we keep coming across, it’d be great if the next nutcase villain we encountered was all ‘mwahahaha here’s instant travel! One minute you’re here, the next you’re wherever you want to be in the world in a flash! Also there’s…’ I dunno, it’d be nice if in all these meetings there’d at least be cakes or something for our trouble, Lady Josie always gives our guests great snacks and tea.”

“Lady Montilyet isn’t usually set on our guests demise,” Cassandra jested lightly, gratified that it made the girl smile.

“You’re alright now, Inky?” Sera asked, offering the Human girl a handkerchief, “You’ve got sniffles.”

Eleanor gave her a small smile, nodding. “Thanks.”

It was awkward to say the least when they did part ways to find the Templars had only just returned—made themselves scarce but still they bore witness to the Herald’s party all on their knees, huddled in what was essentially a massive group hug around a girl who was now very enthusiastically blowing her nose into a handkerchief. It was hardly the picture of a fearsome Inquisition.

Thankfully, they had some measure of decorum, they weren’t staring and Sir Barris only approached after they’d had a moment to collect themselves, to say, “Area’s clear, secure ma’am.”

“Very good, ready yourselves, I’ll let you know when we’re prepared to move forward,” the Seeker said, receiving a nod from the Templar before he went to pass her orders along. She turned to look upon Eleanor who was returning Sera’s handkerchief, “Eleanor, we would like to cover just a bit more ground before we make camp for the evening,” examining the girl closely, she asked, “Are you well, or should we stop here?”

“I don’t want to hold us up, gosh I miss Haven. Um…” Eleanor looked nervous, staring down at her feet, a boot twisting against the dirt underfoot before she asked, “the Iron Bull?”

“Yeah, Boss?”

“Would…would it be alright if I rode with you please? I-if it’s okay with you, and Sera that is,” she looked to her Elf friend, “it’s no offense to you I’m just really tired and cold.”

“I’m good on Russel, Ink,” Sera promised.

“Not a problem with me, Imekari,” the Iron Bull assured her.

Not wishing to risk casting her mind to the Fade, especially while on horseback, Eleanor took an experimental sip of sleeping draught, stoppering it back up, and when she was ready, the Qunari reached out to pat her on the head before he wrapped an arm around her shoulders to lead her to Bitsy.

Eleanor was fast asleep mere moments into the journey forward, and Cassandra quietly passed along the idea of pressing further than they’d planned—cover more ground before calling it a night, move them toward Haven at a quicker rate. She was admittedly relieved to hear Eleanor eager to return, she feared the things she’d seen in the Fade would make her frightened to see the advisors again, but if anything it sounded like she needed assurances further still, to see the real Leliana, Josephine, Cullen.

"Good work back there, kid. Helping us help boss," the Iron Bull seemingly decided to get on with it and rip off the proverbial bandage keeping Cole's commentary on the Qunari personally at bay.

"The Iron Bull broken, boisterous, best. Even protectors need protected, doesn't he know he doesn't have to rely on himself? Strength can only be strengthened not strained when you rely on strong friends. I like you, the Iron Bull," Cole noted as he rode along, seated in the saddle with Rainier at his back, the man usually rode close to Bull.

"I make a good first impression," the Qunari allowed. "You seem okay too."

"Not your impression, Ellie’s," Cole corrected, "you aren’t in her hurts—not deeply. You didn’t put the hurt there, you’re just in it a bit, but you soothe more often than you ache."

"Cole," Cassandra ventured, "What are hurts, exactly, how can someone be in them?"

"Like regular hurts," Cole said as if it were simple, "like a cut or a scrape. Something, someone, somewhere puts it on you. Other people and things come along and they may never touch the hurt, or they may end up getting in, tearing deeper.” Tearing deeper sounded horrific to Cassandra and as if picking up on that thought the Spirit was quick to assure, "You've never set in something and torn it worse. None of you have, without leaving it fixed except for Varric."

"Me?" Varric asked incredulously.

"You yelled and yelled and did not listen, didn't let her explain, you just got angrier, louder. Ellie has too much experience in that, belittlement betrayal, being found wanting and unwanted, it has often ended in bones bruised and broken, and skin scraped scarce. You made her afraid to be near you and afraid she might loose you all at once, the fear of her loss won out, but...she does not realize it but she flinches when raise your voice even to jest or to laugh, she knows you would not hurt her but there is a part of her that is waiting wary, scared for when you will decide to strike. You should talk to her."

"Shite, someone shut him up," Sera's voice wavered, something caught between fear and tears, Cassandra felt struck dumb herself it...called to mind Eleanor's telling of her departure from her former girlfriend, witnessed by the father of the young man she'd been arranged to marry.

...he wouldn’t even let us explain, he just beat the crap out of me.

"He shouldn't b-be airing Inky's business!" Sera insisted.

"I'm sorry, I only thought it would help. It's a hurt, it's almost healed between he and Ellie but her mind would feel better with promises."

Varric was pallid, looked like he might be physically pained by his anguish, "I'll- I'll talk to her. An actual real talk."

“T’m in her...uh...hurts?” the Iron Bull asked uncomfortably. Cassandra understood Sera’s objection to discussing the girl in such a way, but...too she understood the wish to know what 'hurt' was there and if it could er...be healed. They rode with enough distance from their Templars—all Human, they would not be overheard by their stranger followers.

“You’re strong, so much bigger than her and that usually makes her feel safe but she’s startled easily, you pick her up without warning—it isn’t your fault, it’s that hurt or a physical one. You mean to protect but there were hands that came before, human hands on a much younger smaller Ellie, and...they fit the same—her mind doesn’t always know the difference between the hands that protect, place her securely on her feet, and the ones that grab, would throw her into the wall, into the street, hit and hate. It isn’t your fault, and you help. Every time, she’s startled a little less, it secures the idea that when that happens she isn’t going to get hurt. You press into the hurt but then you soothe, eventually it will heal. So I like you. Just like I like Sera and Cremisius and —”

“Don’t friggin like me!” Sera snapped, shooting the young man a glare. “Stop mucking around in Inky’s brain, I fucking told you!”

“I’m not in her brain, I’m here,” Cole explained. “You aren’t in her hurts—you’ve never meant to make them, and you always leave them healed.”

Sera looked like she felt she shouldn’t be so pleased to hear that but she was, despite herself, “…I do?”

Cole nodded. “Cremisius isn’t in them either though it’s different. He doesn’t get in her hurts, he’s only seen and touched hurts to heal them, she does the same for him. It’s nice.”

“She talk to you about Krem?” the Iron Bull asked warily.

“No, I watched. They didn’t see me, I wanted…I heard Ellie’s hurt, stress strain872 snap, bubbling burn boiling over Varric’s so mad at me, I really messed up! I always mess it up. They can’t send me away but what if he leaves… I wanted to make sure she was safe. Ohh, I went to see Ellie, but Cremisius was full of hurts, old and closed but festering inside, infected. He thought he just wanted to forget, but what he needed was to be heard, believed, understood.”

The Iron Bull seemed concerned at that, but unwilling to risk Cole chattering away something terribly painful or personal about the Lieutenant in front of those who had no business knowing such things. “You were in Haven?” Cassandra asked, she was genuinely curious.

“You saw me as I was leaving, but you forgot. That’s alight, you’re supposed to. An assassin? We are supposed to keep her safe! I promised to do so, Marehis must trust we can do so in her absence. Cremisius kept her safe but I should have been with her. I keep failing her, how many times must she come to harm before this is over? you worry too much, hold too much responsibility for things out of your control. You wanted to check on her, but you were so tired, hurting, you needed to stop, refocus and rest. Checking on Ellie would have worried you and her, but talking with the Advisors reassured you she was safe, told you that Marehis was alright and would be back soon, and seeing the Commander makes you lighter,” Well. Cassandra’s face felt enflamed at that. “Prepare for tomorrow and get some rest. Interrogations are arduous affairs, you’ve been at it for two days, if you go now she will see, and she’ll worry.”

That was...her exact motivation for not seeking out Eleanor when she was through with interrogating their Venatori infiltrators in Haven, when she heard an assassination attempt had been made against the girl. If she thought hard enough, focused to the point it nearly brought about a headache yes she could vaguely recall…she’d…she had been about to leave the Chantry, lay eyes on the girl when she saw…someone. Someone in the Chantry hall that certainly was not permitted there, an intruder. Maker she could look at the boy now but in her mind, for the life of her she could not picture who she’d spoken to,

“Name yourself, state your business!”

“I’m Cole. You’re Cassandra—Seeking, saving soothing. Ellie is fine, safe, sleeping soundly—”

Maker!

Cassandra wasn’t certain what to say to any of that, it sounded…equal parts malicious and benevolent. Her mind had been manipulated by outside influence, the designs of a spiritual being and that sounded so dangerously close to Demon influence, possession, but it had been to her benefit, not for her harm.

The sun had well set, it got dark enough that it wouldn’t do to travel much more, they did still need to eat, rest. Rainier assisted the Iron Bull—the Human man reaching up to take Eleanor from the saddle, getting her secure in his hold, one arm under the back of her knees, while the other was wrapped around her shoulders, and then the Qunari was free to unseat himself with ease.

“Ellie-girl? We’re setting up camp now, you best get some dinner before we head to bed,” Rainier prompted gently, shifting on his feet to jostle the girl a bit to wake her.

What resulted was a piercing scream and the Mercenary ending up with a bloody nose when Eleanor elbowed him in the face, scrambling out of his hold—he let her go, as carefully as he could manage in the midst of the bit of chaos ensuing, and the girl fell straight onto her bottom, scrambling back, eyes wide as she took in her surroundings, gasping for breath.

And then she was so very apologetic, worrying over the man’s injury—he assured her it was fine, his nose didn’t feel broken, it merely stung.

“I really didn’t mean to it’s just—it’s so dark and I couldn’t remember where I was for a second, and I panicked. I’m so so sorry!”

“Oh don’t fuss so girl, I’m sorry for startling you, there wasn’t really anywhere to put you down,” the man apologized, his voice sounding off as he was seated in the grass, his head tilted back holding a handkerchief over his nose.

The Iron Bull, Solas, Sera and Marehis were working on getting a campfire going, and dinner preparations underway while Cassandra worked on reports for today. Madam de Fer seemed to be testing Cole after a fashion, she had the Spirit assist her with her tent, and she called upon Sir Fletcher for his aid as well.

"Ellie," Varric spoke for the first time in nearly seven hours, softly, waited for her to look at him, the girl smiling as she addressed him,

"Yeah Varric? Whats up?"

"Nothing bad," as if to assure her she weren't in some form of trouble with him, it was rather the opposite, as he said, "just, can we talk?"

"Sure!"
The Dwarf held a distance as he and the girl went to walk to the riverside, and while Cassandra could not be certain just what transpired, she heard the Iron Bull rumble his approval. He did appear sincere, speaking without jest it... wasn't that he could not be serious it was more that he often sought to deflect the seriousness of their situation, cushion its blow around Eleanor. He certainly had no qualms telling Cassandra or the Advisors the several ways they were 'fucked' when issues arose, but he never seemed to wish to be too serious around the girl. It was sort of like how Sera sought to make play so often with her, Cassandra thought.

Whatever promises he gave her, he knelt to do so, and did indeed seal it with an offered pinkie and a bracing hug from the girl, like she was seeking to physically assure him she knew he meant her no such harm.

When Eleanor and Varric rejoined them, the girl looked about in search of something before she took a deep breath and then she went to face the group of Templar’s that seemed to be gathering dry wood for starting a fire of their own, and she tentatively approached them again, the action caught Cassandra’s attention and she watched as the girl interacted with their conscripts she was still so wary of.

“You guys can just call me Ellie, really. I wouldn’t want to impose, but maybe you’d like to sit with us?” Eleanor offered. “The Iron Bull can make a mean bonfire. And I haven’t gotten all of your names yet. I’d like to, if that’s alright.”

Sir Fletcher was returning from helping Madam de Fer, though he did look to where Cassandra sat, and waited for her to nod her assent before saying to the girl, “We’d be honored.”

“Neat!”

So, they made room for their Templar numbers to spread out around their shared campfire, Eleanor chose to sit next to Cassandra, and Sera came to sit on Eleanor’s other side, eyeing the Templars, her arm laying over the younger girl’s shoulders. Maker, the Elf was worried over Eleanor’s discomfort with members of the Order, that they might seek to hurt or judge her for her Apostacy.

But Magic was not the topic of their campfire discussion.

“...you like mystery stories Sir Fletcher? That’s really cool!” Eleanor enthused, “What’s your favorite?” she asked as she took a bite of roasted radish.
“Hmm… Message in the Broken Clock by Pierce is one I can reread over and over, never get bored with it even though I know it by heart.”

“Wow, really? Is it a scary mystery or is it tricky?”

“Mostly tricky—gets a bit suspenseful toward the end, but it turns out alright.”

“That’s good,” Eleanor said, “What about you, Sir Bailey? Oh! Sir in relation to Knights is gender neutral, right?”

“It is,” the female Templar assured. “I like scarier stories, horror fics. Something that sort of startles you out of your skin that isn’t actually dangerous. Don’t really have a favorite though, it’s sort of a one and done deal, once I’ve got my kicks I’m good.” Sera snorted at her wording.

“A rush of adrenaline without the harm? I can respect that,” Eleanor giggled. “Sir Barris? What about you?”

“Oh, Maker, I haven’t read for pleasure in forever…my mother’d want me to say ‘the Chant’ is my favorite thing to read, but honestly?” he leaned forward in his seat, sharing as if in conspiracy with the girl, "I’m a sucker for Wintersend romance serials.”

"Really?!" Eleanor asked in surprise.

“No, come on, seriously?” Varric complained, “Those things are—”

“Total garbage, and I know it,” Barris laughed, “but I’ll be damned if I don’t sit there stressing over if they’re going to end up together or not, even though they do, every time, without fail.”

“Bit of a romantic streak never killed anyone,” Rainier offered.

“Kills my damn numbers Sarge, and my spirit,” Varric groused, "Publisher’s always on me to write Wintersend crap.”

“Gosh, I didn’t realize there were so many different kinds of books,” Eleanor said, resting her head against Cassandra’s shoulder then, as the Templars started a debate over the pitfalls of the sort of tripe that floods the literary world around Wintersend.

Sera did at last submit herself to Marehis’s hairdressing once she conceded that yes, her hair was in such a state that it kept on getting in her ‘friggin eyes!’ and needed a trim, Marehis could save her the trouble of finding scissors or a knife again, and just handle it for the girl.

Marehis was given instruction to do, ‘whatever’.

She cropped the sides and back of Sera’s hair—scalp wasn’t visible, she left a solid layer of hair that, after the initial reticence over how exposed her ears were, the younger Elf delighted in rubbing ‘scratchy, soft, scratchy! Soft! Inky! ’saaaaaaaaaandra! Come feel!’”—and she left a great deal of the length of what was atop her head, save for trimming so no hair hang down very far over her forehead. It was simplistic enough the girl wouldn’t have to do much to maintain it—keep clean or comb—but…she could do more with it, leave it be or style it after a fashion, curling, or slicking it back. And it would take much longer for her bangs to grow back to such a state that they impeded her line of sight while shooting.

Overall, it was declared ‘friggin boss!’
“Scout Harding should certainly find it becoming,” Cassandra offered, remembering their impending ‘drinks date’, “it is very ‘you’ Sera, an excellent fit.”

“I don’t need it to look pretty or nothin…” Sera said, though she seemed pleased and then, “…but it’s…she’ll like it cuz it’s ‘me’?”

“Certainly,” Cassandra said, and then…well, the girl seemed in need of some clarification, “Sera, I do mean ‘you’ to be synonymous with pretty.”

“Oh gosh, yeah Ser’!” Eleanor enthused, “it is you! You’re pretty!”

“I dare say my dear, your new do’ does accentuate your cheekbones, your jawline, you’ve a striking profile…” Madam de Fer actually took Sera’s chin in hand to turn the girl’s head side to side, “and when you’ve properly bathed, you’ve not got a bad angle on you.”

“…an’ if I’m not properly bathed?”

“You’ve no good angles when you reek, my dear.”

Marehis did finally get her sleep shirt back once they settled in their tent for the evening, Eleanor curling up in her pajamas between Marehis, and Sera with the albeit unwelcome addition of Cole.

“Sleep?” he asked when Eleanor proposed he join them.

“Uh-huh, you know, laying down, closing your eyes. Think happy thoughts, quiet your mind, and relax until sunup,” Eleanor explained.

“I…can try.”

So he ended up laying almost directly on top of the girl holding him, a little on Marehis as the woman held the girl close, stripped of his jacket, hat, and boots. For some reason it startled him that such objects could be removed from his person, but he trusted Eleanor's assurances that they could be put back on.

Cassandra felt restless, lying on the other side of Sera. She did try for sleep, but she wasn’t as bone-wearily exhausted as she’d been the other night—in Therinfal everything had struck her such that she was asleep the moment she was afforded the opportunity to lay down. Now her unanswered questions, her worries, her plans, rattled around in her mind.

Though she did find some semblance of sleep, only to waken due to Sera shifting, elbowing the Seeker in the cheek as she turned to sleep facing Cassandra, snuggling into her side which was not wholly unwelcome, she didn’t much care for the elbowing but neither did she mind it.

It had, however, woken her, and in the low light, a hazy pale blue glow just barely emanating from the light fixture overhead, she realized Sera had shifted because she’d lost the person she’d been holding captive when she first fell asleep. Eleanor wasn’t in her bedroll and Cole was nowhere to be seen.

Cassandra rose from her bedroll, stepping carefully over Varric, and then the Iron Bull’s legs, Maker the Qunari could really sprawl out…oh. Cole was there, he’d moved to lay albeit awkwardly between the Iron Bull and Rainier…huh the young man did appear asleep she thought.

“Oh. Good,” the boy breathed with quiet relief, “I thought I was doing it wrong.”
The Seeker moved to find Eleanor and…well, hopefully distance would keep the Spirit from hearing her mind before he was discouraged to find he was, in fact, 'doing it wrong' if he was conscious.

Eleanor was seated in the grass near the river that ran along the path they’d chosen to return to Haven, staring out across the water, humming softly to herself, wrapped up in a blanket. Maker, it was frigid out.

“Eleanor?”

The girl startled a bit but she looked up at Cassandra, eyes fearful for an instant before she whispered, “Hi…are you cold?” and motioned for Cassandra to join her, and when the Seeker sat alongside the girl, she shared her blanket, spread it so it rested over Cassandra’s shoulders, so the woman pulled her to sit in her lap, the blanket could be wrapped more securely around them both seated so close, and the action seemed to give Eleanor some relief, proof positive that…no matter what that horrible demon had made her bear witness to in the Fade, Cassandra was real, meant her no harm.

“What are you doing out here, dear girl? You’ll catch chill,” she gently reprimanded.

“I’m okay. I drank the rest of the sleep potion from earlier, sent me off but I woke up and it…it sort of felt like there wasn’t enough air in the tent, if that makes sense—don’t get me wrong its…it helps being around everyone…I feel badly everyone still—.”

“Eleonor, no one dislikes our current arrangement, it is warm, and comfortable, and I’ll admit to some pettiness in knowing now that Madam de Fer has such an arduous nighttime ritual that makes her look so very fresh every morning even after long riding days,” Cassandra felt a smile tugging at her lips when the girl giggled despite herself.

“Vivienne likes her lotions and things, and they’re relaxing,” she saw fit to defend lightly, “You’re pretty too, even if you wake up kind of grumpy after long riding days.”

“Me? Grumpy? Never,” Cassandra chuckled lightly, pressing a kiss to the girl’s temple. “Is something on your mind, Eleanor? Ah, it is my understanding you had a heart to heart with Varric?”

"...understanding? Oh! Yeah it was kind of random, he wanted to talk about our fight from like almost an entire month ago, but um...it was actually really good. I didn't realize I needed the talk until we did." Ahh. It was not what drove her to take the night air but still, it would do no harm to make certain all was well.

"I saw you garner permission to cut off his pinkie finger in future should he break faith with you on some matter of importance.”

"Oh groady," Ellie's nose scrunched up at the prospect. "Yeah he apologized for not seeing reason in the moment and blowing up, promised to keep his cool and hear me out if we do ever, you know, need to have another shouting match. Shouting and arguing doesn't bother me so much its just, yeah I guess it gets scary when you say things to explain and diffuse the situation that just go ignored and it looks like everything just blown out of proportion."

"Varric behaved poorly, but he did not intend to act to your detriment. While none of us were quite so vocal, neither were any of us wholly comfortable with you resuming your former candor with Rainier," Cassandra saw fit to offer, the man had not intentionally blundered into a trauma of the girl's, neither was he blameless, but still, there was redemption to be found. But, she wished to make very clear, "Eleanor... I do promise, truly and sincerely, you are safe among your allies, and... it is not like how you described circumstances of abuse working in Circles. Eleanor, if anything were to happen, with anyone, be they a stranger or even those we trust most, if anyone makes you to feel unsafe or Maker surely forbid, lay hands on you in anger, or abuse, you can come to me. You will always be believed and I will always defend you. There is nothing in this world I would not strive to protect you from. Are we of an understanding?"

Eleanor nodded, seeming bewildered as she said, "G-gosh, yeah. Thanks, Cassandra."

"You needn't thank me, child," and then, "Does anything else trouble you?"

Eleanor was quiet, thoughtful for a moment before she sighed in frustration, "Fighting Envy just... I mean I didn’t—it just happened! " oh yes, this was the primary angst pressing the girl, she was railing at... Cassandra wasn't sure if Eleanor was upset with herself or with circumstance, "I mean there wasn’t any stopping it from getting so far in my mind, just boom! It was happening, and I don’t know how! I have to do better than that! You guys have to be able to trust me, that I won’t let a demon in!"

“Eleanor, you’ve not broken any such faith with us, we can, and do still trust you to resist demon temptation,” Cassandra sought to assure her, “To our minds, one second it was the Lord Seeker and the next it was revealed as a demon, it happened far too quickly for you to shield yourself further,” she reasoned, “It held a physical form that could lay hands on you, and you were not prepared to be attacked in such a way.”

"But I- usually- there's never just been—" she struggled for her words.

I’ve only ever had a hard time against demons when I’ve been really hurt, Eleanor had once said.

"You are concerned that a demon was so swiftly able to break into your mind when you were not seriously injured," Cassandra offered. "For one, it happened so suddenly from somewhere you were not expecting to have to steel your mind. And you should not be so very hard on yourself, Eleanor there is some measure of... well while there was no physical injury to speak of, debilitating you from fighting off a demon from taking your mind, the issue there is that physical aches and pains pick away at your mental focus, yes?" and when the girl nodded, Cassandra said, "Eleanor, the sort of depression you struggle with, your anxieties, these are aches that deteriorate your mental focus, perhaps even more so than a physical injury would. It is not a matter of your failure to defend yourself Eleanor, if anything, you were at such disadvantage. That you still managed to persevere and survive speaks to your capability, not your inability."

"Oh! That... I hadn't thought about it like that, it only makes sense, mental and physical sort of roll into each other all the time, I don't know why I didn't consider mental illness hurting my mental focus. Which yeah, only makes sense, its no wonder someone gets an infection when they've got an open wound."

"Often when we are closest to the problem the solution is not easily seen, it is why we must rely on each other, to see the forest for the trees so to speak."

"Thanks Cassandra." the girl snuggled against her, arms wrapped around Cassandra's middle as she squeezed. Then, "I love you."

“As I do you,” the Seeker assured, pressing a kiss to the top of her head. "Is your mind less troubled now, sweet girl?" she asked, and when the girl sighed contentedly and nodded, “Do you feel like returning to bed?”

The girl let out a little groan even as she smiled and said, extending a reaching hand toward their tent like she could bid it come to them, “Instant travel’d be nice right about now.”

Maker help her, she may regret it once she laid down, but she felt it might be a bit of well needed fun, indulgence. The girl was secure in her lap, her hold. She merely held on to her and pushed off of her knees onto her feet and up, Eleanor letting out a surprised squeal followed by Cassandra—the Seeker was not giggling, but as close to such as she dared as she shushed the girl for fear they’d wake their camp. Heavens forbid the Templars see her. She moved as quickly as she could bearing the girl’s weight, only setting her down once they reached the tent, and it was so, so good to see her smiling so easily.

And ultimately, she did not regret it in the least, her joints protested but once in the security and warmth of their tent with Eleanor lying between she and Sera—bearing the brunt of the Elf girl’s sleeping habits in the Seeker’s stead—all felt truly well.

As they traveled, Eleanor became more secure in her sense that she was truly free of any trick of the Fade, that the world around her and her friends were all their true selves. Especially after there was some sort of Qunari ritual meant to master fear the Iron Bull apparently adapted for the girl. Cassandra had vaguely heard of it in passing as one of their more barbaric practices, having someone beat against you with a length of wood while you shout some form of...she wasn’t sure, a chant perhaps or something meant to refocus you.

What ensued was the Iron Bull getting in a decent workout by squatting where he stood behind the girl, wrapping his arms around Eleanor’s waist, and rising to hoist her into a tight, bracing hug while he asked, she answered, received a big squeeze for her efforts, and then he’d squat to put her on her feet before starting all over again, “Who’s deader than a door-nail?!” he asked as he raised her high.

“Envy!”

“Who kicked their stupid demon ass?!”

“Me! And Cole! And Cassandra!”

“Who is the biggest, baddest, demon fighter this side of the veil?!”

“Um you? And Cassandra?”

“Annnnd?” he asked, keeping her held to his chest feet dangling off the ground.

“Me!”

“Hell yeah!” he roared squeezing her tight.

She did not startle quite so easily after a few solid days of travel, the more time spent with her true allies on the road to Haven reassured her she wasn't still trapped in some demon's mind tricks. She did not risk sleeping without the assistance of potion for fear that would change, and no one was going to push her to do so until she felt ready. Too, she became more reliant on headache potion, it was not something she took for minor discomfort, their onset of these headaches were swift and intense, more than once the girl stopped breathing momentarily and looked as if she might be ill from the pain, like someone had taken a fire poker to her brain, she described it once. Cole was of comfort, he was able to ascertain that it was after affects of her mind being so violently infiltrated, it would get better with time, and that much was true. As they traveled, the occurrence happened less and less, much to Cassandra's and, most certainly, Eleanor's relief.

Sera actually lost some measure of reticence with their new ally in Cole, as the young man...he was capable of sensing the downturns in Eleanor’s spirits, when her panic or stress might send her low, Cole would tell Sera, and the Elf girl knew precisely when to strike, get Eleanor joking or playing, or cuddling merely being a comforting presence when Eleanor was tired or in pain. He did as such with everyone to some extent, letting them know when and how they were needed, though he could stand to raise his voice as opposed to that disconcerting 'poofing' Sera called it, to rush and tell them whatever was the matter when they were in ear shot and not separated by any substantial distance. The boy nearly gave Rainier and Marehis both heart attacks when he vanished from Rainier's saddle and materialized, sitting on the rump of Solas's horse, voicing the announcement that Eleanor was in need of headache potion.

Though she was markedly grateful for the young man's ability to teleport then, he'd not been exaggerating when he warned of her impending headache, it sent Eleanor losing her grasp of Russel's reigns, Sera screamed out when the girl, seated behind her Elf friend, reeled forward with such momentum she nearly fell from her saddle, but Russel came to an abrupt halt and Cole appeared in place to help steady her, keep her safely in the saddle, before he helped her down and then looked to Sera,

"If you hold her hair it will help."

It took little more than that to have Sera sliding out of the saddle to follow after Eleanor who'd stumbled off their path and when Cassandra and Marehis joined them, Sera and Eleanor were kneeling, the older girl was holding her friend's hair back, murmuring comfort to the Human girl as she retched, heaving the contents of her stomach.

"Oh, da'vehnan," Marehis said sympathetically, potion in hand as she joined her.

"Thanks," Eleanor croaked out breathlessly, and when Cassandra offered her water afterward it earned her a tired smile and a hug, the girl wrapping her arms around Cassandra neck as she leaned against the Seeker.

"Would you perhaps care for more instant travel, Eleanor?" Cassandra proposed quietly. And when the girl nodded, the Seeker gladly obliged, carrying her to the amusement of most of their party. Sera took Russel's reigns and Eleanor spent the rest of that day's riding sharing the rather snug fit in a saddle between Solas and Marehis, resting, her head laying between Solas's shoulder blades and Marehis curled around her, humming softly in her ear.

The following morning, Eleanor was still lying in her bedroll, even after most had risen to see to breakfast or start their days. Cassandra came to get her for their morning meal and the girl was not asleep, just laying, staring into space, she did not even percieve it when the Seeker knelt before her until she rested a hand on her shoulder,

"Eleanor?"

She startled, flinching under Cassandra's hand before raising her own to lay over it, "Gosh, sorry. Hi."

"Breakfast will be ready soon. Are you well?"

The girl nodded slowly but then, "Um...I...I'm so tired, and sore all over from riding I swear my hair hurts, and I'm just sad and dunno. I know we need to keep moving...I understand if we can't b-but um-... You offered once, that I could ask for a break if I needed it?"

"I believe a day of rest would be suitable for everyone, it would hardly derail our schedule. Haven will still be there no matter when we arrive."

"I'm really so-"

"Hush, Eleanor, everyone needs a break now and again. Take the day, whatever you need. Would you care to sleep in more? I will bring you breakfast, you needn't ready yourself for the day, and it has been sprinkling on and off this morning," Cassandra reasoned, smoothing back the girl's hair as she pulled her blanket more securely over her shoulder.

The Iron Bull was already assembling a plate of food for the girl when Cassandra emerged from the tent. Sera's hands held her head between them like a vise, groaning disparagingly.

"You can't spare her from bad days," Cole told her, "You do enough, you help."

That had Sera looking up at him, "Thanks! Stay out of my mind stuff!"

"Is something the matter with Ellie?" Dorian questioned, concerned, that got Rainier's attention.

"Is she sick?" Thom asked.

"She is weary, heartsick," Cassandra allowed, "This has been a daunting journey, we are taking a day to allow for rest, perhaps more if she needs it."

"I'm gonna go eat with Inky," Sera decided, looking to Cassandra, "I'll be quiet, promise, let her sleep and stuff, I just wanna keep her company."

Cassandra nodded in agreement, offering a small smile of thanks to the girl as she laid her utensils atop her plate and took it and Eleanor's into the tent.

After establishing their break of pace with their Templars who vowed to hold down their camp, secure it, Cassandra found everyone had followed Sera's lead, their party joining Eleanor, sitting in quiet contentment as they took their meal together, and once their empty plates were gathered, Sera wrapped the Human girl up in a hug and laid down with her, insisting it was 'nap time' and everyone could either join in or 'piss off'. All said it was indeed a lazy day, much needed and appreciated, and Eleanor was back in higher spirits, more ready to face the day when it was time to rise for breakfast once more.

Although...Eleanor did act out, after a fashion, some nights later. It was unsettling but it had been handled rather well, by the Iron Bull. They'd settled around their campfire after dinner one evening after a long day of riding. Eleanor had been subdued, and stricken with another headache, and it had rained terribly all day, beating down on them as they road though thankfully it had let up as the evening wore on. One moment they were making light chat among their numbers, the Templars were on patrol while the whole of their party was seated around the fire, save Eleanor who had gone to the river to refill her canteen shaken her head when Sera asked if she wanted her to tag along. She did not immediately return when Cassandra had estimated she would.

"I believe I'll check on Eleanor," Cassandra said, rising from her seat.

"Imekari just took a detour to check on the horses it sounds like," the Iron Bull said. Ahh. She did tend to dote on their steeds after long riding days.
But then Cole materialized in the Iron Bull's lap, seated with his bottom on the Qunari's knees, legs crisscrossed before him, the brim of his hat pressing into Bull's chin.

"Kid, you really gotta stop doing that," from the slightly startled Qunari was met with Cole's insistence,

"You have to stop her. You have everything you need, you've dealt with this before, she'll listen to you. She's tired and she just wants her mind to be quiet but this will make it too quiet. You don't have to forget memories your mind doesn't take record of."

"Shit, I thought—Tethras, where the fuck do you keep your booze?"

The Dwarf looked as confused as Cassandra felt as he said, "Uh...Bourbon's in my saddlebag, wh-"

What resulted was the Iron Bull bounding away and returning shortly thereafter with a loudly protesting Eleanor slung over his shoulder, fists pounding against his back as she demanded he give it back and put her down!

It being a bottle of Varric's bourbon she'd 'borrowed without asking', which the Qunari had confiscated and tossed to be caught deftly by its rightful owner.

"Put! me! down! Eep!" she squeaked in surprise when the Iron Bull pulled her from his shoulder and got on his knees in the same motion, setting her down on her own knees before him, keeping his hand on her shoulder so the girl wouldn't flee.

"Ellie," the Iron Bull said, "you're not thinking straight right now, what you were about to do was foolish."

"It's not like I was gonna chug it, I was just going to drink a little!"

Reprimanding, "Da'vehnan!" and "Eleanor!" came in unison from Marehis and Cassandra Maker how could she be so reckless?! Varric's bourbon was far stronger than the wine Lady Montilyet mistakenly offered Eleanor, then it had been an act done in innocence she'd merely forgotten she should not drink for fear it would interact with her potion regime, and drinking a little had caused her to blackout, act unawares from one afternoon until early the next morning! That...that seemed to apparently be her objective.

"Imekari, I know things have been rough, you're having a shit time, and yeah, maybe that's your goal—knock back a little something that will keep your brain from acknowledging existence for a while, good or bad, you can't make more bad memories for a while if you can't remember what you did. But you start doing that, there's a good chance you're going to keep doing that. That's not fair to yourself or to the people who depend on you."

"Bite me!"

And so he did, the Iron Bull bent down and gently nipped at the tip of her nose, leaving Eleanor wide eyed and shock struck.

"You...bit me?" she sounded confused, like she was confirming such a thing had, in fact, just happened.

The Iron Bull leveled her an amused grin. "You told me to boss-girl," he replied simply, then, "Feel like telling me what's eating you?"
She gave a miserable sounding laugh, pressing the heels of her hands against her eyes in a motion that felt like she were rubbing the sleep from them. "I dunno," she shrugged, hands falling into her lap, "a little bit of everything. I'm tired and even though I know there isn't always something going wrong it still feels that way, you know? And I hate that I feel like that when I know I shouldn't. I mean Maker, we've got everything we need to seal the Breach, and we've gotten so many amazing new allies and I'm glad we're all together and safe and heading for Haven, I shouldn't be so sad and angry but I am and my brain won't shut up about it!"

"It's been pretty rough going here lately. Yeah, there are things to be grateful for but that doesn't mean you don't have the right to feel sad and angry over the things that make you feel that way. It's a good thing, to try and keep a positive attitude about life, but it's wrong when you make it toxic—holding yourself to the standard that it's only okay to present happiness in the face of total hell. Imekaris—children—love playing, its fun and exciting but sometimes they fall and get hurt. Crying over a scraped knee doesn't mean they're disrespecting or undeserving of the fun they had, it means 'ouch I scraped my fucking knee and the damn Tamassrans want me to rub dirt in it and walk it off!',' he explained albeit comically, getting a little smile a huff of near-giggling from the girl and he used that to say, "You see? Funny. So you reacted, and in a healthy way. Works the same way with sad and angry Imekari. It's okay, normal to act out when things are hitting you bad, you've got that part down. But babe, throw a tantrum or something okay? Scream, cry, yell. Hell, I'd rather you come try to beat up on me before you do something to hurt yourself. You can even pop me in the face for biting you. Swings not swigs, got it?"

Eleanor's chin quivered as she shook her head, crying seemed to be the release of choice as she spoke, looking utterly shamefaced, "I'm sad that I yelled at you, I'm really sorry."

"Bring it in Imekari," the Iron Bull said as he enveloped her in a hug, arms swallowing her up to hold her tight against his chest. "It's okay."

"I'm sorry I tried to steal your bourbon, Varric," she mumbled to the Dwarf, "and that um, that I almost did something really dumb. Gosh its so dumb! I just..." she sighed, frustrated with herself.

"Da'vehnan," Solas spoke up, "have you tried sleeping at all without the use of potion?"

That got him a one eye'd glare from the Iron Bull as the girl endeavored to bury herself more against the Qunari who tightened his hold protectively as she whimpered out, "N-no I...I don't want to dream in the Fade again!"

"You needn't da'len, I do not mean to distress you, I merely ask, to diagnose," Solas assured her gently, "We've not taken the time to meditate in the evenings, we've all been so tired, but you must do something to sort and process through what has happened. If you cannot do that in your sleep, we must endeavor to do so when you aren't."

"Ellie," Maker! Cole appeared again, kneeling beside Bull and Eleanor, "don't be afraid. I'll sit with you while you meditate, if you fall asleep, into the Fade, I'll follow and wake you up."

Oh. Cassandra realized then, yes they hadn't taken time for meditation, and Eleanor usually prompted the practice, but she had not so much as mentioned it once, since their time in Therinfal. They'd been traveling so much and everything had been catching up with them, with Eleanor, she was often exhausted, weary throughout the day and completely spent by the time they could finally rest. Sera'd earned a bone weary, "I love you, you're so amazing" from the girl for helping unstop her sleeping potion the night before when Eleanor struggled with the cork, she'd barely downed it before she was falling face forward into Cassandra's shoulder, in every sense of the words: fast asleep. The girl feared if she sat down at the end of the day, still and silent, doing something meant to soothe that she would accidentally fall asleep without the security of potion to keep her mind from slipping into the Fade. But she did so with guarantees from Cole, and Solas, that she would not come to harm, and Sera joined them as well, fingers laced with Eleanor’s, an offer of support.

"I really am sorry," Eleanor said later as they wound down for the evening, there was a chain of sorts, Eleanor offering to brush Cassandra's hair, while Marehis braided hers. "I really wasn't thinking...or I was thinking too much just not the right way."

"It disappoints me that you would seek to handle your troubles in such a way, Eleanor," Cassandra admitted.

"It was reckless da'vehnan," Marehis breathed worriedly, "you must promise us if you ever get so overwhelmed you'll come to someone, before you act on impulse."

"Promise," Eleanor said.

"Good, you're minder is right, Ellie," Dorian called lazily from where he reclined in his bedroll, "impulse is why I spent three days getting the most horrendous tattoo magically removed from my...er...well, details aren't necessary."

"Sparkler," Varric interjected, "I need every damn detail right now."

That...that resulted in a rather horrible, thankfully short tale of how the Tevinter Mage once had a tattoo...of the reigning Black Divine's face...on his buttocks.

"Left or right cheek?" the Iron Bull asked.

"It took three days to remove for a reason. I'm not a complete heathen, it was a proper mural to His greatness."

As they continued their journey Haven-bound, Cole also proved to know when Eleanor's mind was about to make her perceive her Mark falsely spreading, that earned Sera's gratitude as he'd give her warning to start holding Eleanor's hand and distract her—working together, Cole and Sera found that causing a whiplash of sorts in Eleanor's focus would confuse whatever misfirings were making her believe her Mark was spreading, cancel it out after a fashion through usually Cole asking some benign question about something basic like did she think if he ate he could taste the food or would it be different because he is a Spirit, and then Sera would make some startling sound or ask some wild or lewd question, or say just about anything she could think of to make the girl laugh. And Maker, the boy was discovered to be able to predict, sometimes wholly prevent the onset of panic attacks in the girl. Before she even became breathless he’d appear, take a hold of her hand or initiate the hugging ritual he was growing increasingly familiar with, and address whatever threat her mind had found focus in, assuring her she was safe, or that whatever it was weighing on her, it was something she was capable of facing whenever the time came.

More and more, that ‘something’ was the Elder One. Wretched thing. Thus far Leliana had little lead as to the man’s true identity, a name or a face they could track and hunt down, apprehend, Dorian and Felix were in contact endeavoring to parcel out something s to the Venatori’s plans in relation to what the Elder One wanted with them, how he could be discovered. The Iron Bull was wholly frustrated with his Ben Hessrath contacts, they knew precious little. They’d only struck an interest in the Venatori because of their rumored, now painfully confirmed several times over, vendetta against the Inquisition, had sent the Iron Bull to dismantle their efforts on the Coast in a bid to attract the Inquisition’s attention. Beyond that, the Ben Hessrath hadn’t thought the Venatori any more of a threat than the bumbling Marquis Sera’d brought to their attention when they first met in Val Royeaux, they’d not investigated their organization further. Now of course, that investigation was delegated to their agent in the field...Hissrad.

"Have you had trouble working with this Hissrad in the past?" Cassandra asked when the Qunari aired his grievances with consulting the man. He grumbled and then, "I am Hissrad. So yeah, all the damn time."

It sent Marehis making a sympathetic sound wrapped in a bit of laughter she tried to suppress by pressing a hand to her mouth, hiding her smile even as her eyes were alight with amusement at his predicament. Cassandra thought he might bust a blood vessel when the Qunari received a missive from his contacts referring him—\textit{in all sincerity}—to himself, if he wished to be in contact with their agent responsible for learning about the Venatori.

Sera had overheard his qualm and immediately informed Eleanor, the pair found some amusement in it—as their numbers meant more hands had to help prepare meals, and the Iron Bull was accustomed to making food for large groups, he was officially in charge of meal preparation, what they were going to eat, who was going to help him make it and the like. Any time someone voiced an inquiry surrounding their meals, Sera and Eleanor would race to be the one to suggest, "Gosh, I dunno, I’ll have to refer you to our agent in the field!!".

The epitome of this jest was met when the Iron Bull himself gave into their fun and asked when dinner would be ready, Eleanor gasped, shared an excited look with Sera and just barely got out the whole of, “Well the Iron Bull, I’m afraid I’ll have to refer you to our agent in the field. The Iron Bull,” with a straight face before dissolving into a fit of giggles, that ended, rather eloquently, in a snort.

“Imekari. You’re lucky that was just about the cutest damn thing.”

What was admittedly cute, was Eleanor taking on the role of designated bedtime story reader. On the way to Therinfal she and Cassandra had fallen into the habit of a nighttime ritual, Eleanor laying against the Seeker to have a bedtime story read to her. But on their return to Haven, as they drew nearer and the girl was more recovered, able to stay conscious past the moment they settled into their tent for the evening, Cassandra entered their tent to find Eleanor seated on the Seeker’s bedroll.

“Come on! Bed time, my turn to read,” Eleanor insisted, patting the space before her, looking to Cassandra expectantly. Oh it was so good to see the girl more like herself, more and more as they neared Haven, got closer to putting this whole horrendous endeavor behind them to move on to better victories. She was more at peace, lighter, and Cassandra was grateful she was feeling better, coping.

So the Seeker ended up being, what Varric was more than amused to call, ‘little spoon’. Eleanor sat with the Nevarran woman lying against her, and the girl held the little blue storybook before them, her chin resting on Cassandra’s shoulder so she could see, and the girl read aloud while everyone settled in, prepared for sleep, laying and listening.

They made the final stretch into Haven, blessedly so, just before noon, Haring 31\textsuperscript{st}, 9:41. The last half, of the last day, of the last month of the year.

First-Day \textit{Eve}.
A scarce twelve hours, before Eleanor’s birthday.

Eleanor was dressed in the nicer clothing Lady Josephine had insisted she pack in case she felt the need to wear it to one of her meetings, scarf wrapped securely around her neck, clearly visible peeking up under her cloak, and she rode into Haven with the whole of her party, and their Templar conscripts marching in tow.

The Advisors were standing in wait as they reached the Forge, Eleanor slipping out of her saddle, dropping to her feet before Russel had even drawn to a full stop, let out what sounded like a relieved, happy squeak of sorts before she descended upon them.

“My Lad—oof,” Leliana was saying, though the girl had collided with her in a fierce hug. “hello Eleanor,” the Spymaster gave in to the fact there would be no formal greeting had here. The Herald of Andraste was home and she was going to squeeze every last one of their numbers in a hug before the day was out, Cassandra was most certain.

“I missed you!” Eleanor declared as she hugged the woman tighter.

“Likewise. I appreciated the little note you sent me, I apologize my own reply wasn’t very informative,” the Spymaster said.

“…Leliana, you said you were doing well—that’s all the ‘informative’ I needed!” the girl giggled, before moving on the Lady Josephine, “And I missed you! Did you get my poem?”

“You were so missed, and I did, my lady, Ellie,” the Antivan woman…oh Maker she had really missed the girl it seemed, she looked misty eyed as she held the girl tight, “it was very sweet. I keep it on my clipboard—it cheers me to see it when I’ve reached the end of the day’s paperwork.”

Out of the corner of her eye Cassandra could see Varric motioning to Lady Josephine that he wanted to lay eyes on Eleanor’s efforts at ‘poetry’.

Eleanor was teary eyed when she turned her attention to their Commander, and for a moment Cassandra worried the girl was afraid but Cullen’s cheerful expression softened and he knelt to be more level with the girl, the action making her just a bit taller than the man on his knees and it allowed her easier ability to wrap her arms around his neck, hugging him fiercely as she said, “I m-missed you s-so much!”

“Oh Eleanor, I missed you so very much indeed.”

“I headbutted a demon! Just like you taught me!”

“That’s our girl!” the former Templar cheered, even as they ceased their hugging he still rested his hands on her shoulders, and hers on his.

“You’re wearing your hat!” the girl was pleased to note.

“Of course I am,” the man insisted, “I told you it’s the most amazing hat. Would fake me wear this hat?”

“No he wouldn’t! He’d probably be a big jerk about not wearing it!”

“Exactly! More fool him, this is the greatest hat, in the world, bar none,” he assured her, kissing her on the forehead before he rose to his feet. “I’m so glad you’ve returned safely to us, Eleanor.”
“Truly,” Lady Montilyet agreed, “and you did so well securing us our Mage and Templar assistance, my lady.”

“We’ve made great strides toward our goals, Eleanor,” Leliana said, “we’ll discuss it at length of course…after the holiday. Your schedule is clear for its duration.”

“Oh, yeah! Happy First-Day Eve!” Eleanor wished them.

“To you as well, my lady,” Lady Josephine said, “there will be festivities tonight, I do hope you’re well enough to attend? You are not too weary from your travels?” she asked as she raised a hand to smooth against Eleanor's hair.

“Oh, First Day things sound fun! I'm totally in!”

“Excellent,” Cullen said, “Now, I’ve some duties to attend before festivities are underway,” Cullen announced, “I should confer with the lady Seeker on a matter of great importance.”

“Concerning the recklessness of the Templars?” Cassandra proposed, albeit humorously.

“Concerning the recklessness of a Templar, most assuredly.”

“Try not to let the Lord Seeker business ruin First-Day Eve for you guys, okay?” Eleanor cautioned.

He certainly wouldn’t.

Cassandra was one hundred percent positive the reckless Templar, was a former Templar.

The man had written to inform her earlier in the week that his present for Eleanor was ready but would need safekeeping, someplace warm, he did not feel he could do so in his tent on the soldiers field and he wondered if she would allow him to keep it in her chambers in the Chantry.

However, his morning missive to her cautioned, As you’ll be returning today I feel I should give you fair warning, I may have gone overboard with Eleanor’s birthday present, please advise.

And as a follow up, sent shortly after—it arrived with the first.

Correction. In over my head. Send help.

“You’ve no need of me?” Cassandra made certain with Eleanor.

She shook her head, “Thanks though, I appreciate you. I think I’ll go um,” she bit her lip, cheeks pinking as her she laid eyes on a certain Charger Lieutenant waiting in the wings beside the practice fields, “Unless anyone needs help settling in? Oh—Cole’s…” Cole had vanished, “Dorian?” she checked.

“I’ve got it well in h—” the Tevinter Mage was more longwinded than that but,

“Cool! Have fun! Bye!”

Her abrupt farewell left Dorian’s mouth hanging open as if in insult and then, “I believe I’ve been ditched.”

Oh it was incredibly just…lovely, something Cassandra was glad to see happening for the girl, a budding romance offered in such a gentle manner, this young man had proven himself reliable, careful in his care for Eleanor. The girl ran to meet the Lieutenant who greeted her with outstretched arms, hoisted her into a spinning hug, holding her close before setting her on her feet.

Marehis brushed passed the Seeker to see Leliana, assuring Cassandra quietly she would be following the young couple at a ‘respectful distance’. The Iron Bull, for all his tact, wolf whistled.

And Cullen, for all of his, now that Eleanor was otherwise occupied, he grasped hold of Cassandra’s hand, though he pulled it so their clasped hands were behind his cloak shielded from view of the Templar conscripts and Cassandra intoned, “Report to the soldiers tents, your assignments await you, move out,” receiving a unified,

“Yes ma’am.”

And then she was walking briskly with Commander Cullen smile tugging at her lips unbidden as he looked about as if looking for spies that might see their joint hands as they moved through Haven and up to the Chantry.

The hall was bare when they entered, void of occupants and…furnishing, in preparation for the back to back celebrations soon to take place in its Great Hall, Cullen removed his hat respectfully as they entered, tucking it securely into his cloak.

And then Cassandra found herself engulfed after a fashion, the Commander had taken the opportunity to wrap her up in a bracing hug, his hand on the crown of her head in what was an admittedly bold but…certainly not unwelcome intrusion. After a moment the Seeker realized her arms were still hanging at her sides and she brought them up to hug the man back.

“I am glad you’ve returned safely,” Cullen said, asking quietly, “Are you alright?”

That…well he certainly should not have asked if he didn’t wish to know because it had been a long, wretched month and she had little tolerance for withholding the worries ever pressing, not where…not where she felt at ease to relinquish them.

“I have always respected your decision to leave the Templars but I never thought it would be this way. The Order has fallen into devastation through its corruption.”

“I am sorry it has fallen further still, but you will set it to rights, I know it,” he encouraged, “and I’ll help you however I can, however you need me to, you have my word.”

“We almost lost her, Cullen. Twice—she disappeared through a portal and I believed her truly dead, then tormented by a demon and I…it happened so quickly, one second she was well and the next such devastation had occurred in the blink of an eye, and she was so-,” Cassandra had to stop to take in a trembling breath, “I thought she died in my very arms, and then that horrible creature tried impersonating her to some degree, took on a twisted version of her shape I laid slain.”

“Cassandra, I…Maker I am so sorry,” he breathed. He seemed hoping to reassure, “You did much, and so well to protect her. Eleanor is safe, now. I wish she hadn’t endured such danger, or you for that matter, but she is surviving, despite everything. We will do all we can to help her. You have done your best and it truly has been enough. She’s alive, safe, and tomorrow we celebrate her birthday.”

Cassandra breathed a sigh of relief. “That is true. I can scarcely believe it.” Somehow it had felt like time was stretched and pulled taut, that surely First day would never be upon them and then their line was snapped back into place, suddenly the day was upon them in the blink of an eye.
“Why is it the fact that a girl I’ve known for all of four months is turning sixteen tomorrow makes me feel so terribly old?”

“I suppose because you’re a terribly old man. Ancient, really,” Cassandra offered up like a statement of fact, the barest bit of smile tugging at her lips when Cullen pulled back, looking to her with mock indignancy, “Ancient?!”

“Most assuredly,” she said, picking a long white hair off of one of his feather pauldrons, was he truly graying? It was rather short and fine to belong to him, perhaps he picked it up elsewhere. In an endeavor to move forward with happier things, she asked, “You wrote you’ve trouble with the present you got Eleanor?”

“I'll admit I…went a little overboard perhaps,” he confessed as he took her hand and led her up the hall,

“You mentioned as much.”

“It is…out of the box, one might say.”

“I gathered.”

“No…truly…I can’t put her present in a box, I don't think,” he informed her, "There was this farmer traveling to the Hinterlands stopping along the road from Haven, you see and er, well one thing led to another..."

"You acquired Eleanor livestock?” Cassandra offered in jest.

"Not exactly," he said, his hand on the door to her quarters. “Try not to hate me?”

“I make no such promise.”

“Fair enough,” and then he opened the door.

Her room did look markedly different, her collection of books had apparently been moved for safe keeping against the room’s more recent occupant. Cassandra’s eyes went wide in her head.

“Oh. Oh I do hate you.”

“I know.”

“She will love it.”

“I know!”

“I’m not cleaning up after it, I swear to Andraste.”

Cullen sighed, “I know.”

"Oh!” she complained, swatting him on the shoulder. Maker bless and curse this man! "I hate you!"
Haven had been wild while Herald of Andraste was gone on her mission. It had somehow felt like the longest and shortest time of Krem’s life. There’d been so many changes.

First and foremost, their newest recruits. Rainier’s men arrived just a few days after the Charger’s Chief and Sargent left the scene, it’d been just a bit nerve wracking. Krem wanted to do Bull proud, right by Rainier, so he was feeling the pressure. It was one thing to have new recruits coming in when the Iron Bull was there to put it down, pass out the introductions, take charge and set the tone, leave a clear cut space for Krem to fill. It was another to take charge himself and hope for the best, prepare for the worst. And then there was the whole, ‘most of these men have been in prison for the better part of the last decade’ thing, there were likely to be some issues they were dealing with.

It uh, didn’t go too bad though. No misunderstandings, their biggest qualm with Krem was his age, they didn’t necessarily like taking orders from someone they could have sired themselves. Didn’t give him too much flack though, they were mostly just glad to have a sense of purpose again, that’d been the major thing for him when he joined on with the Chargers so there was a bit of common ground there, something he could put a focus on to help them fall in line.

Might have helped he ended one of their more successful training days by buying rounds in the Tavern, letting them cut loose while taking the opportunity to figure out whether or not Chief’d need to set a ‘no drinking’ rule or not when they were finally able to be sent out on their own. And they were less tetchy about having a toddler telling them what to do once they saw how well he could hold his drink especially when they ended up falling down drunk. Flissa was a real champ, swapping out most of his shots with water, silver tequila tasted like shit and uh, he got giggly if he got too loose, it wasn’t exactly the image he was going for.

And he was real glad he wasn’t thinking through the fog of a hangover when Bull’s report came in from their first meeting with the Mages. Fucking. Tevinter.

Krem’d been saving stories—things that happened while Ellie was gone so he’d have something to tell her all when she got back that he was sure she’d get a kick out of—but he decided she could use something that might make her laugh after time-garbage. Skinner scaring the living daylights out of their new recruits was a sure thing. Took a few days, in his down time he worked on drawing the event up the best he could, took a few tries but he got it done, sent off to the Hinterlands, and uh, he found his rough draft in Skinner’s things. He hadn’t been snooping or anything, she’d been passing along a report to him on progress she saw in their recruits, kept her paperwork in a folder, and he’d caught a glimpse of the formerly crumbled up parchment smoothed out and pasted to the inside cover. Kind of sweet, she’d liked his rendering of her menacing expression. He finished it in good time too.

Time Magic. Of course, only a Tevinter Mage would have the gall to play fuck-around with the fabric of time and space. Oh man it was bad, what was worse was ultimately it got used on Ellie. Some Magister bastard tried to erase her from time completely, and she ended up a year in the damn future, just in time to see the end of the world as they know it.

So, he made sure his next report to Bull after he said Ellie was alright, safe but sad and not talking, he sent off his drawing in his next report to Bull hoping the stupid thing would cheer her up a bit. He was relieved Stitches went along with Adan on his run to the Hinterlands to check in on Ellie—there was no way in hell he was going to oppose of course, shit, he was glad there were such qualified healers heading her way to make sure she came out of it alright, though Krem wished he could go out, check on her. And Stitches going also meant…well, he’d gotten the idea from time spent working alongside Bull, that maybe being able to be sure of the date would help Ellie feel more secure in case time travel left her with time-related trust issues, seemed like she knew her numbers by sight, so, Stitches gave him a reliable carrier for Father’s pocket watch. He trusted Ellie to take good care of it, and he wasn’t going to begrudge some scuffs or dents or scratches if it meant she had something that would help her. At least he hoped it would.

When Bull struggled, mind casting him back to something that sent him pained and panicked, it helped to ground him in things that affirmed for the Qunari that he wasn’t in Seheron. That night in Haven, after that Orlesian assassin attempted to poison Ellie, the potential that Krem had almost been poisoned, something about it set off something for Bull, ticked away in the back of his brain until about an hour after Krem’d gotten back from eating dinner with Ellie. Bull started hollering in Qunlat, gasping for breath like he wasn’t getting enough air in the world, and Krem yelled for Rocky and Grim to back him while he pulled Bull out of the Charger’s tent. Bull threw himself into the snow, Krem ending up half under, half beside him since he’d still been attached at the arm, and Rocky and Grim piled on top of the Qunari, giving him anything that might contradict whatever was happening in his head, helped weigh him down so he was more easily swayed to lay there ‘til he was damn sure the bone chilling snow and the non-Qunari faces around him meant he wasn’t in the humid, Tal-Vashoth haunted jungles of Seheron.

Bull’s reports were priority, and their Inquisition birds were trained to drop them with the Lieutenant directly, so he’d been apprehensive when Rocky came through with mail call and there was something meant for Krem. After Ellie’s birthday present arrived, there was nothing else he was expecting, so. Mail meant Mother, or at least his cousin writing in regard to Mother wanting or needing something.

But what came for him was a slip of parchment with his name Cremisius shakily but carefully written out, definitely not in his cousin’s hand, and Hi! <3 –Ellie on the back. The note was attached to a longer letter penned with the most pretentious handwriting he’d ever seen, lots of unnecessary loops and lines—that Mage bloke Bull told him about, Dorian, writing on Ellie’s behalf, letting Krem know she was learning how to read and write from the Tevinter Mage, and she was okay, and she wanted to hear from him, how was he? She appreciated the watch, thought it was thoughtful of him and she promised to take really good care of it, he’d have it back safe, and gosh the little picture-story he sent her was just the funniest thing! Hell yeah!

So that began the little note sending thing between them. Wasn’t a daily endeavor or anything, but a handful of times he’d get littler things from Ellie writing on her own and it was just great. Little embarrassing, but that was only due to the resident peanut gallery. Rocky got a big kick out of announcing to the Chargers that Krem had love letters from his little girlfriend when her messages came, and they loved being total freaks about it, Skinner, Grim, Stitches once he was back—Dalish cooed. Every. Damn. Time ‘awwwwww!’—making kissy noises and total asses of themselves, mocking him while he grinned like a loon over the little missives. They were from Ellie! It was sweet, and those bastards could just fight him!

And Maker, he’d been damn relieved when he got, I’m okay. Coming home. Miss you. – Ellie after reports came in on the Templar business. Crew didn’t act like asses when that one came, lots of condoling hands on the shoulder, questioning if she’d said if she as alright or not. Reports that came out of Therinfal had been bad.

He made sure Bull didn’t pull any kind of crap on him—he got all his paperwork done, reports written up on each and every one of their new recruits with full detail of how they were coming along in their training in Charger tactics, their attitude in regard to taking orders from Rainier when he got back—things had been a little caustic at the get go, but he’d done his best to work them down, they were grateful for their freedom, wanted to move forward and do better, and that opportunity only came to them, because of Thom Rainier and ultimately the Herald of Andraste. He took notes for Bull on their work, how they did on the job he took them out on, little local thing for the Lord that claimed ownership of Haven’s estate, all the noble purses coming through to see the Inquisition had lured bandits, they set up camp in the woods outside Haven estate with plans to play highwaymen. What they did was rough up couriers bringing supplies to Haven, didn’t kill them so they came and reported to the Inquisition, and Lady Josie contacted the Lord, informed him of what was going on, told them she knew a reliable crew that could take them out, and that’s how the Chargers landed the job. Could have just ordered the Chargers to do so herself but the ambassador was smart, thoughtful, saved the Inquisition money—no bonus paid for the job—but the Lord hiring them meant he paid, getting the Chargers a higher price, a new client, and a sparkling new addition to their resume all in one fell swoop, as well as a grateful Lord putting their name out there. And thankfully they recovered most of what had been stolen too, they were in the middle of nowhere and the bandits didn’t have a way to move the goods themselves, Krem took their new ground troops out, brought down the bandits, brought back supplies that now wouldn’t need replacing. All in all a damn decent gig, and Krem was able to get Bull and Rainier all the info they needed to swoop in, take over for him when they got back.

They cut it real close, he’d been worried something happened, delayed their party from getting in in time for Ellie’s birthday, but right around noon on the 31st, Advisors came and lined up out front of Haven. If that wasn’t clue enough, Spymaster swung by where Krem stood with Skinner and Stitches flanking him as their ground troops ran drills with the rest of the Core people. There was a little amused smile on Leliana’s lips as she cleared her throat and politely informed him the Lady Herald and her party would be in soon.

“Go, see the small one,” Skinner said, “I will tor—train. The new Shems.”

“I’ll make sure they’re still breathing for Bull,” Stitches assured him, “go on, just try not to get too carried away with your little girlfriend in front of her Party though, huh?”

He’d hardly a groping session in mind, ass. Thankfully Bull’d provided him something of leverage. “Adan calls Stitches Liam,” he announced before turning on his heel to leave their Healer to get hassled for his own romantic entanglement. Rocky high-fived him as he passed—he could hear the clopping of horse hooves echoing down the way and he decided to take the long way, Ellie’d need to touch base with her advisors and if he just stepped out into the road he might give into the temptation to greet her on sight, so he took a lap, walking by their training session, down the slope to the riverside to walk along the bank until he could turn and walk by the practice dummies lining the soldier tents—more of those now, more tents out in the woods by the old Healer’s cabin…though maybe someone took up residence there now, he wasn’t sure. Haven had made a few changes in the last month, and if Ellie was up for it, he’d give her the rundown. He was nervous, nervous-excited, it’d been a month, and some days, and he’d missed her. Missed Bull a little too, stupid ass. He’d eat gravel before he’d ever admit it though.

She was hugging the Commander when he came out to wait ‘til she was done, he could just see her arms but it looked like she’d gotten a bit dressed up, it was First-Day Eve after all, oh man he was excited for tomorrow. Sure there would be celebrations tonight to look forward to, but the main event was tomorrow, operation: Ellie’s First Birthday party. Oh, when she pulled away, moved to address the others he could see she was wearing the scarf, and damn him he shouldn’t be so excited over it, but he’d been nervous giving it to her in the first place.

Yup, he was pretty sure he was dying of the overflow of relief and excitement and out in out happiness, was he drunk? He almost felt like giggling when Ellie smiled at him, running full speed to meet him with her own excited squeal. She was back, and he had to put the energy somewhere and he wasn’t planning on kissing her just yet, but he’d damn sure settle for sweeping her up and spinning her around as they hugged, just, she was back! She survived time travel and demon torment and now she was back and alive and here!

“Hi!” she whispered giddily as she caught her breath, squeezing him tight.

“Hi,” he whispered back before as he let her go, set on her feet.

“Here!” she reached in the inner pocket of her cloak and withdrew his Father’s watch, “Back safe and sound, thank you so much. Gosh, it was so sweet and it really really helped, and just…” she popped up on her toes to kiss him on the cheek, “thanks.”

He took the pocket watch in hand, he ran a thumb across the cover, more relief to have it back too, though really, “I’m just glad you’re back safe,” and then, “How are you?”

She nodded. “I’m okay. Lots of scary things but lots of fun and good things too—I have new friends! Dorian, and Cole, I’ll introduce you! And I’m just…glad to be back. I missed everyone. The Chargers are alright? How’ve you been?”

“Busy, but everything’s going well here,” Krem said, “Charger’s are all good, they’re running drills right now. Rainier’s crew’s settled, they definitely want to meet you sometime, if you’re comfortable with that—don’t sweat it.”

Ellie nodded, seemed to be considering it before saying, “I’ll think about it, thanks—so much, for all that. Um, do you need to get back then?”

“Actually, I was wondering what you were up to. Just going on noon now, are you hungry, or have you eaten?”

“Well,” she looked over her shoulder to where she’d been conversing with the Advisors, “I thought for sure I’d have to be locked away in the War Room for the next Age going over everything and talking about what to do next, but in the spirit of the holiday, I’m off the hook for now. I’m pretty hungry though, you?”

“Great!—not that its great you’re hungry, just. um,” he was botching this up pretty nicely, but she just smiled, was patient and he finally got out, “We could grab a bite to eat. Haven’s changed up a bit, if you’d like I could give you the official tour.” There we go, he knew how to use words.

“That does sound great,” she agreed humorously. Oh, that was nice. “Lead the way, Mister official tour guide!” she enthused, taking his offered arm, hugging it a bit as he lead her.

“First stop—the Chargers tents, just a sec,” he motioned with the hand he held his Father’s watch in and she nodded as he pulled open the tent flap, hooked it to stay open just in case…he felt eyes and spotted Marehis shadowing them, he was decently sure she was anyway, otherwise he’d have greeted her, he didn’t want her to get the wrong idea, or Ellie to for that matter. Ellie waited, standing in the entrance while he went to his bunk, unlocked the trunk at the foot of his cot, and pulled his Father’s shaving kit out, the box was smallish, but big enough to hold everything he still had from Tevinter though he’d hidden Ellie’s Birthday present in it too for safe keeping. But it was in the little cloth bag it came in so that sorted well, if she could see over his shoulder. Pocket watch back safe and sound indeed—there wasn’t a single scratch or dent on it, damn well looked like it’d been polished—and he slipped the box back into place.

“Father’s shaving kit,” he explained when he turned and found Ellie leaning to see around him, she blushed begin caught being curious.
“That’s sweet,” she said, “I’m glad you keep after some of his things, I really am grateful you trusted me with his watch. Tonio, huh? The Aclassi men have handsome names.”

“Why thank you, my lady,” he offered, pleased it made her blush. It was sweet of her to say, stung and soothed at the same time somehow, hurt not having him around, not knowing how he was, or ultimately if he was even still alive, but talking about him so casually helped solidify that sometimes wavering security he held that his father was alright—even if it wasn’t actual confirmation, talking about him in the present tense was nice.

They decided on the first, so, they walked arm in arm along the path out front of Haven’s gate. Haven was expanding in all sorts of ways with their new recruits coming, their Mages arrived and there were new trainers, healers, staff. Recruits lived in the tents filling the wooded area all the way to the gate that marked the edge of Haven’s estate. There was a mess hall of sorts—big tented area where their new Cook in charge of feeding their growing masses, would serve up breakfast lunch and dinner in the clearing between the soldiers tents and the old healer’s cabin. It was mad crowded right now, but they had other places to see, other places they could eat, he had a feeling she’d be more interested in something familiar than diving into something new and uh…cook was a decent bloke, but he was loud, gruff, sharp with his staff, might rub Ellie the wrong way if she introduces herself and catches him in the throes of his ire during lunch rush.

Biggest change was Flissa’s in that, it was no longer the go-to for meal rations anymore, now the place served as a proper Tavern, an option—Fliss made up a permanent menu and everything now that she didn’t have to cook based on a meal plan that could serve their numbers quick and easy. You went in, sat down, got your order taken, the whole thing, had a bard now too.

“Has that sign always been there?” Ellie asked as he led her to the Tavern.

“Sign?” he couldn’t help himself he sort of wanted to see,

Ellie pointed to the newish sign over the Tavern door, “The…Singing…Maiden,” she read.

Oh shit, he’d wanted to see how well she was coming along with reading and everything but now he wasn’t sure if giving her praise would embarrass her or not, or if she’d be discouraged if he didn’t say—he was mad overthinking things again.

“Very good,” he murmured to her and she hugged his arm tighter in thanks, smiling shyly like she were proud with herself. “Fliss wanted a more ‘place of business’ vibe, you know? She has to represent now that she’s got competition.”

“There’s no competition, Flissa’s the best!” Ellie enthused as they entered the Tavern.

Barmaid gasped in excitement dropping her dishrag on the counter, “Oh! My Lady! You’ve returned!” she squealed rushing around the bar to come hug the girl with all her might, “You’re safe, are you well my lady? I’ve heard such troublesome things! Oh you look so pretty, blue really suits you, and your scarf is just lovely! Did Marehis braid your hair this morning? Have you gotten taller?”

Ellie was giggly over the woman’s barrage of questions, “I’m great, Flissa, glad to be back. Thanks—Lady Josie picked it out and I figured I should dress up for First-Day Eve, and Cremisius made my scarf! Marehis did braid my hair, and unfortunately no, I haven’t gotten taller…” she looked down as if to check just to make sure, “nope, not taller yet. Yet!”

“It will happen I am sure of it! Are you two hungry?” Flissa asked. and then she gasped, “Oh! Oh gosh I’ve been babbling away while you two are—” she giggled and whirled about to look across the Tavern seating, “Oh I really should get a table for two in here—”

“We aren’t on a date!” they spoke in unison, oh, good, no confusion there. He’d said they’d talk when they got back but that was just expressing interest to see if he should back off or move forward with the intent to ask her on a proper date once she was back. He wanted to do that in person, it just felt right.

“Oh! Poo…Oh!” she gasped, “Not-! I meant-! Platonic-! Friendships are impo-”

“Cremisius and I like each other, we’re just not on a date right this very minute,” Ellie offered gently.

“Oh yay! You’re just-! Oh I think you’re just the cutest! Go ahead and seat yourselves anywhere you like, look over the menu and I’ll be around to take your orders whenever you’re ready!” she said as she retreated to her place behind the bar. Huh, he was pretty glad she was so enthusiastic about them though, might want to borrow her cooking setup sometime if uh, the whole dating thing got rolling.

“I love Flissa,” Ellie breathed, pulling the strap of her staff holster over head and hanging it, staff and all, on the hook by the door.

“I think its safe to say she loves you too,” Krem jested quietly as he helped her out of her cloak, hung it on the same hook before they moved to sit at the usual table, out front of the fireplace. People only occasionally came in for lunch, sometimes breakfast was busy, dinner too—any time shift change was on, people coming off work wanting a drink, they still had to hit up Flissa’s since the ‘mess hall’ was a dry set up. The place was pretty empty now, save Flissa and a waitress who was seated at the bar, the bard lady who wasn’t playing just now, she was leaning against the wall chatting with som—

“Cole!” Ellie addressed the young man in the very large hat, he turned to face her with a serene smile on his face, “There you are!” Oh. Cole. Bull’d mentioned him, good guy, a Spirit or something which was beyond weird, but he’d saved Ellie big time, was able to be there with her when that demon…Maker if he thought about it too much he couldn’t damn breathe, he’d read the reports, it’d been bad, close call to some horrible clone of Ellie running around or Ellie being tortured to dea—yup. Bring it back. Point was, he’d kiss the guy on the damn mouth if he wanted, helping Ellie like that, being there for her.

“Oh. You don’t have to do that,” Cole said, getting a confused look from Ellie since that wasn’t really a response to ‘there you are’, shit! Then, “I heard hurts healing and came to see, there was a very sad man at the bar, missing his wife, and a young woman, angry at herself for not impressing her supervisor with her work, and then there was the Mage boy worried about the Templars arriving. But they all feel better now, went about their days.”

“Oh, I’m so proud of you Cole! Golly, we’ve only been in for like what? Five minutes and you’ve already helped three people? Thank you so much!”

“Oh. I didn’t explain right. I heard the hurts healing, I didn’t heal them myself, so I wanted to see who was—your name is Maryden, you sing songs that make people lighter,” he said, looking to the singer.

The woman blushed at that, “Thank you, Cole is it?” she asked, and then to Krem, “You’re that Charger leader fellow I’ve seen around, and you…hmm,” she looked at Ellie, thinking hard, “…I don’t believe we’ve met.”
“Krem, second in command, Bull’s Chargers—you’ll know our leader when you see him,” he assured her. She nodded and looked to El.

“I’m Ellie! Maryden’s such a pretty name, and your lute is beautiful! You’re a bard?”

“Thank you,” she replied warmly, “A minstrel—bards are more an Orleisan thing. Are you new to Haven?”

Ellie giggled at that, “Not exactly. I’m a resident agent of the Inquisition.”

“An agent? I apologize, I haven’t seen you around. are you one of Leliana’s people, or Lady Josephine’s?”

Ellie gave it a second of thought, “Technically both, Cullen’s too. Ellie—Eleanor for long, Herald of Andraste,” pulling off her gloves and wriggling the fingers of her Marked hand.

“Oh my goodness! You’re the Lady Herald? Oh, it’s an honor to meet you,” she looked around the bar and then quietly said, “Lady Josephine hired me on to help with crafting the Inquisition’s reputation—keep an ear out for any rumors, write songs to spread our acclaim, that sort of thing.”

“Oh wow, really? That’s so cool, thank you for signing on! Lady Josie’s just the sweetest. Flissa too—you like working here?”

“I do, very much,” Maryden said sincerely. “I get shifts here, collect new material to write on, try them out around Haven and then I get to travel to Orlais, tour a bit, performing in different key places to spread stories and the Inquisition’s mission through song.”

“Oh gosh that sounds fun—Orlais is nice, pretty, I’ve only really been to Val Royeaux. I look forward to hearing you! Are you hungry? You could join us if you’d like,” Ellie offered.

“I just had lunch—but thank you for the offer. I should get back to work, my lady.”

“Oh gosh, yeah, um, break a leg! That’s…that’s polite to say for performing, right?” Ellie asked, worried, “It sounds mean.”

“It is nice to say,” the minstrel assured her, “—more of an actor’s superstition but all sorts of things can go amiss in performances, and the idea is that that encouragement jinxes performers, so offering up something that sounds like a wish for misfortune…” she shrugged.

“Oh! Opposite effect, anti-jinxing it, cool!” Ellie supposed, and then, “Cole? Cremisius and I are here to eat, you can sit with us if you like?” It’d be a little awkward if they were going to talk, it would be weird enough with the music maker so close, but…that was twice now she’d asked someone to join them, maybe Ellie was nervous to talk about things or maybe she didn’t want to? Though maybe she didn’t feel they needed to? Or—

“No thank you,” Cole said, and then suddenly the boy was right up in Krem’s space, whispering directly into his ear as softly as possible, he would have worried it was a voice in his head if he couldn’t feel Cole’s mouth moving which was disconcerting in and of itself, but it didn’t bother him so much when, “she’s only being polite, kind. She likes being with just you. You should ask her, she’ll say yes.” Oh. Yeah overthinking again. He was nervous…kind of weird-nice to have someone around that could know people’s minds like that.

And then it swung over to just straight weird because the guy vanished into thin air.
“He does that, oh! You know who I’m talking about, right?” Ellie asked him.

Uhh, “…Cole?”

She smiled, nodding. “Just checking, sometimes people forget talking to him, but it seems to not be happening so much, I guess, with people he wants to be familiar to. He’s a spirit,” she explained.

Ahh, “Bull filled me in, I’m glad I finally got to meet him, he seems nice.”

“The nicest! Look out for him if you see him around, would you? He’s kind of…” Ellie bopped her head side to side as she thought it over. “He doesn’t know lots of things. I had to teach him hugging. He doesn’t always realize when he’s overstepping boundaries, he’s very blunt when he speaks, not in a mean way but I think that’s just because he isn’t mean, you know?”

“Yeah, I’ll make sure no one gives him trouble,” he promised as he pulled out a chair for her, “Lady Herald.”

Her smile grew, and she bit her lip. “Why thank you, Lieutenant Aclassi,” she returned, taking the offered seat.

“There’re menus now,” he said as he sat, there was always a stack at the end of the tables so he picked some up looking to her, and she upturned a hand to take one so he passed it along, though he did still offer, “Let me know if um, you need any help.”

She actually gave a little sigh of relief, “Thanks. I do alright, Dorian and I are going to have lessons while I’m in Haven—oh! Sera’s going to be teaching me maths and science things!”

Really? “Wow, that’s so great, I hope you enjoy it. Science can be interesting, the interactive parts at least. I personally never cared much for the harder maths, though homework was kind of funny. My parents would try helping—proof read papers and things, let me practice presentations—but they’d take one look at the math worksheets I brought home and Mother’d just quit on the spot, offer to make juice or snacks, and Father, bless him, he’d try so hard, always ended up with his hair all crazy from raking his hands through it so much, start swearing in Tevene.”

Ellie laughed at that, “Oh gosh! It sounds like fun, and Sera usually means fun, so I think it’ll sort out well. If not…I sure I can always get Dorian to swear in Tevene at my math homework,” and then she gasped. “I didn’t write you this because I wanted to save it for seeing you again, and I didn’t want to risk the Iron Bull or Dorian seeing but,” she looked around and then leaned across the table, whispering, “Dorian. The Iron Bull.”

No, fucking—really? Oh Maker please. Krem would never ever ever let the bastard live it down if he ended up committed to a Tevinter Mage of all things, not even a red head at that—wasn’t hard to pick the Vint out of their group when they rode in. “Are you serious? Are they…”

“Not yet I don’t think, but good golly! You should see them together! You’ll flip, I swear, they’re just so so into each other—Cremisius. You have no idea how hard its been to save this but,” she reached out and grasped his forearm as if to brace herself and him, “Dorian had an Iron deficiency. It’s literally a sign from the universe. And being malnourished. But like how ‘funny now that he’s better’ is that? If the Iron Bull hasn’t used that in a line for him, I…I might have to disown him as my twin.”

Big lug would totally use that as a line but, “Twin?”
“Muscles, a love for puns—I can’t drink but I’m a whisky girl and he respects that—we like a lot of the same food, we don’t like broccoli, we’re multilingual. Basically bisexual though we’ve talked about it and we’re more like Pan really but B fits better for B-Quad—that’s the official organization for me, and the Iron Bull, and our marvelous friendship! And his name was a number under the Qun, and Ellie comes from the number eleven.”

Oh yeah, she’d told him about her name just being Ellie. Bull’d mentioned the uh…that Ellie’d said as much, gender not mattering to her, outing herself in a way to avoid Thom accidentally outing Krem. He wouldn’t’ve held it against the guy too bad, making an honest mistake, so long as Rainier was prepared to back Krem up if things went south. Seemed like some of her party outright knew and were cool, like Varric obviously, Sera too he thought, Marehis, Madam de Fer’d given him this look when they first met, looked him up and down and then hard for a second, it was usually the sort of look he got from someone trying to decide ‘what’ he was before getting offended over his identity but she’d never misgendered him, seemed to respect it, at least a lot more than she did his Tevinter upbringing. Lady Seeker seemed…she’d been told he was a man and didn’t question that status so…yeah, nice. He didn’t much care what Solas knew or what he thought, that bastard. Bull was more suspicious of him now than ever. Motherfucker knew something, was about something he wasn’t sharing with the rest of the class. He’d known the innerworkings of that freaky Amulet that sent Ellie into time. Banished it like he knew what he was doing, without breaking a sweat, like the master of a magical artifact and not someone going in blind, desperately trying to destroy something they couldn't hope to understand, like the others. If Krem wasn’t supposed to keep it on the down low unless he or Bull had proof…he’d beat that asshole’s face in. Fucker knew how to take care of that Amulet—he could have banished it before that Magister bastard could use it to cast Ellie into the future, but he didn’t do a damn thing to stop him!

“Cremisius?” Ellie asked softly, oh shit. He’d been staring into space, now that he refocused Ellie was looking at him, concerned, thumb rubbing against his forearm.

“Sorry, I uh, I just got caught up in my thoughts—started with thinking maybe we could troll people a bit with a gag, you and Chief actually being twins, you know?” he did think that now that his mind worked its way back around to what they’d actually been talking about, “Dramatic backstory and everything, how you were separated at birth or some such nonsense. My brain just detoured from there big time, my bad.”

Ellie looked relieved at that, smiling she said, “Oh gosh, that’d be hilarious! Just commit to it no matter what obvious facts contradict our act,” she agreed laughingly.

They turned their attention to their menus then, no changes to it or anything so it wasn’t hard to pick from his favorites. Took his time though, made sure to look over the thing carefully so Ellie wouldn’t feel rushed, she was humming quietly to herself to the tune Maryden was playing, it was kind of sweet. Nice, getting to sit with her so relaxed and alive and safe.

“Gosh everything looks good, but I think I know what I want. What about you, Cremisius? It’s no hurry, I’m not in a rush—I’m actually totally clear, no work until after the holiday, Leliana said.”

That sounded perfect, good opening too. He gave it a beat then said, “Hmm yeah, I think I’m ready,” gave Fliss a little wave and the barmaid who clapped her hands once in excitement it seemed before scurrying over, Maker she really was ecstatic. She took their orders and told them it’d be just a little while, but she’d have them out as soon as it was ready.

“Thanks Flissa!” Ellie chirped overlapping Krems, “Thanks.” It sort of made them laugh, having spoken in unison again.

“So…you’re free?” Krem latched on to what she’d said just a moment ago, and Ellie nodded. “There’s First-Day Eve celebrations tonight.”

“Oh gosh, yeah Lady Josie said as much, it should be fun!”

“I’d be honored if you’d attend, uh, with me,” Krem said. Ouch, yikes, got a bit clunky at the end but he’d gotten it out, Cole’s assurances aside he was still nervous to ask her.

Ellie blushed, nodding, “I’d love to.”

“Cool,” oh man his face felt warm, and Ellie giggled, took his hands in hers, so his hands laid upturned on the table top while she traced her fingers lightly over his palms, that sort of ticklish, soothing way.

“So…”

“So,” he chuckled nervously.

“I like you, Cremisius. Very much,” she confessed shyly.

“I like you too, Ellie. Very much,” he grinned, he’d uh, already been pretty obvious about it.

“So…we’re…dating?” she checked with him.

“Not on a date in this current moment,” damn near felt like it, “but yeah, I’d say ‘dating’.”

“Cool,” she said, smiling as she held his hands. “Um, not just a flavor of the week thing right?”

Maker! “Definitely not,” Krem assured her, “at least now for me, you?”

Ellie sighed. “Well, I did meet the most beautiful Lord when I was in the Hinterlands…” she had a mischievous smile on her face as she met his eye, “Lord Woolsly. He’s a Ram. But a very pretty Ram—his fur’s pink and gold and reddish, like a sunset!”

Well damn, that was some rough competition. “Guess I’ll have to duel this Lord Woolsly then,” he made to stand, laughing when Ellie giggled at him, holding his hands more tightly as he sat back down, scooting closer to the table.

Another damn wolf whistle, Bull was getting junk-punched if he didn't watch himself.

“Oh, look what we have here,” a smooth, haughty voice sounded, oh Maker, that horrible sort of Tevinter accent considered ‘upper crust’, for a moment it startled him, but it was just that Dorian guy, “little lovebirds canoodling by the fire.”

“What’re you two up to?” Ellie asked conversationally.

“Ambassador needed someone to lug another bed frame and mattress into Madam de Fer’s cabin, get it put together so Sparky has a place to lay his head,” Bull said, “Checked in with everyone, Rainier’s taking point before everyone breaks for the holiday, so I figured I’d help out.”

Yeah. Bull barely washed up his own dinner plate without bitching about it never mind going out of his way to do something heavy lifting unless he were trying to show off for someone, usually someone he was into. Maybe Ambassador though. Nah, nope, never mind that, Lady Josie definitely did not want to 'ride the Bull', she might hold some interest but not in something so casual, and oaf wouldn't dare pursue her if she wasn't on. So yeah that did leave Dorian...but uh, he wasn't too sure it was a commitment thing like Ellie usually had designed for in her matches. Of course the girl could mend tears in the veil with the wave of a hand so. Clearly more impossible things had happened.

“That was sweet of you,” Ellie thanked him, oh she was excited to see the two still hanging around each other even after settling into Haven. ”It was nice of Vivienne to let you bunk with her.”

“Certainly, though I'm not sure if it's convenient being next door neighbors with that Adan fellow or my worst nightmare. The man caught me outside and took my temperature! Not so much as a hello or by-your-leave just, pop! Thermometer in my mouth! I finished those damn supplements of his and that's the poor reward I get!” the Tevinter Mage complained, though when it got Ellie and Bull laughing at his expense, he smiled despite himself. Then gesturing to their table, “Now, can we get in on the warmth, or would we be interrupting something beautiful and nauseating?”

Catching Ellie’s eye he said, “I’m game if you are.”

“Absolutely! We already ordered but not like super long ago,” Ellie informed them, Bull took the chair next to Ellie, let her sit in his blindspot while he kept one door in his peripheral.
Krem was already facing the other so that made sense. Dorian came and sat next to Krem, offering him a nod as he did.

“Nice to meet you, Cremisius Aclassi. Krem,” “Dorian Pavus,” he introduced himself in return. “Amazing to find another Tevinter so far from the Imperium...that isn't a Venatori mind. Hmm, I say, have you ever been to Minrathous?”

the Mage asked.

Bloke sounded like the sort that’d be all about Minrathous. Krem'd only been twice. After he’d joined the military, graduation from basic took place in Tevinter’s capital. First time was when he was eleven, a last-ditch effort, his parents attempting one final good solid check to make sure of his magical status. Circle of Magi there would have a few days a year where they’d open their doors to the public, and Mages from all over the Imperium would volunteer to test seemingly non-magical citizens or their untested young for magic. Bit dangrous, it involved ingesting Lyrium and being lullled into sleep through hypnosis, which allowed for swift testing, if you did turn out to be a Mage and found yourself in the Fade, you could be made to say as much, be drawn out and back into the safety of the real world without the risk of falling prey to demons, and if you didn't, you waited a bit to make certain, then called you back to consciousness. A kindly old mage…an Altus, or something, though he might’ve been a Magister…Ath-something. Athanir? He’d been…
real decent. Kind. Compassionate about Krem’s lack of magic, was patient with his parents requests for double and triple, quadruple checking, carefully lulling Krem in and out of consciousness, and politely but effectively curtailing his mothers attempts to persuade him into trying again with more Lyrium. Just seeing the damn stuff made his skin crawl sometimes, he only had ghosts of memory from when he was five, being tested and mother bribed the Healer just enough to sway the woman into agreement that Krem would be fine being made, mind-tricked, into draining the whole bottle. It was the closest thing he'd ever seen to his parents divorcing, Father had been livid, Mother had gone behind his back for that round of testing and apparently it was because she thought his father wasn't taking it seriously enough, that they should be stopping at nothing to light the spark of Krem's non-existent magic she so badly wanted him to have. Krem barely remembered anything after being made to take so much, but when he did finally come to hours later, his brain felt like it was slowly inflating after it'd been flattened by a rolling pin, and his insides felt like they'd been wrung out, throat raw and burning, and he was hellishly sick for days after. But last time being tested, nothing like that had happened, he'd only been prompted to drink a spoonful of the stuff before the Mage put him under hypnosis, making it clear cut Krem's choice to take it. When it did turn out he had no magic, the man was gentle in how he broke the news each time like he understood they'd a lot riding on the possibility and…dunno, it'd been an interaction that stuck with Krem. There was this sort of look that ghosted across the old man's face when his Mother asked him to examine her 'daughter', seemed like he made a point to call Krem 'child' or 'young Aclassi'. Knowing Ellie now, it made him sort of wonder if the guy had known someone like Krem, and his magic made him aware the young Aclassi wasn't a 'daughter', and he'd been respecting that. All said and done, Mother had gone off in a tizzy, storming away from the Circle, shouting about how weak willed father was or whatever, and as they were able to splurge a bit since it was just the two of them for lunch before they had to make the trek home, Tonio Aclassi and his brave 'bello mimo', went for pizza and split a scoop of orange gelato.

"Once or twice," Krem offered politely, "Good food."

"Oh, good everything," Dorian sounded mournful almost, "and it was so warm—Ellie, you’re from the north, well…northier," he amended since she wasn’t from Tevinter or anything, "—Free Marches are tolerable, oh and Antiva, lovely place, warmer than some parts of the Imperium! Don’t you miss how warm it was up there? In civility? Away from the snow?"

"I don’t miss Antiva much, but yeah, warm, I miss warm," Ellie allowed, though, "but snow is really nice, lots of fun!"

"I suppose it does have a charm of its own," Dorian allowed, though, "Cold as kaffas." Bull chuckled at that.

"What the hell happened to Haven?" Varric wanted to know as he entered the Tavern, "There’s some kind of mess hall bullshit now, Mages and Templars move in and now the whole neighborhood’s gone to shit! You’re still getting good business, right Fliss?"

"Oh don’t you fuss, this is the sort of set up I’m used to, much better for me than having to be responsible for everyone eating," Flissa assured him breezily from behind the bar, wiping out the inside of a mug before setting it on the counter, filling it with beer, sliding it to the other side of the bar for the Dwarf to take. "Welcome back, Master Tethras."

"Flissa. I love you, really I do. Seggrit treating you right? Cause I’ll kick his ass."

"Oh!" Flissa went bright red at that, "We’re…he’s…" she giggled, "I’m very happy."

"Good," Varric said, taking up the mug, his attention turned to the bars other occupants, "oh come on you assholes, kids are getting their groove thing on, leave them be—they bothering you two?"

"Varric, you’re very fighty today," Ellie noted, looked a little worried as she promised, "no one’s bothering us, you can join if you’d like."

"Sorry Tumbles," the Dwarf sighed as he took a seat next to Dorian, and then he rapped his knuckles against the table top, looking to Ellie, "Forms came after all, they were on my desk when I got in, no problems so far, no worries. I’m just a grumpy old bastard, I don’t do change well. Line in the mess’ is long as shit and I’m hungry." Ahh, angry from his hunger then.
"You're hangry," Ellie and Krem offered in unison, smiling at being on the same page.

And so were Dorian and Bull it seemed. Mage offered up a disgusted groan as Bull said, "Get a room you two." The Herald of Andraste, beauty and grace personified, stuck her tongue out at them.

“I’ll have rolls out to you soon!” Flissa assured cheerily.

“Flissa. Seggrit better watch his back, you’re making me consider holy matrimony,” and then he looked to Krem. “How the hell you doin’ kid?”

“Pretty great actually,” Krem had to admit, “Glad to see you’re all back.”

“Uh-huh, yeah. You’re glad we’re all back,” Varric drawled as he looked between him, and his hands joint with Ellie’s. “Just yanking your chain a bit, Krem. Huh. Krem, short for Cremisius? The hell kind of middle name even goes with that?” though he blanched and amended, “Sorry, you don’t have to answer that if you don’t want, don’t mean to put you on the spot—my middle name’s embarrassing as shit and I’m taking it to the grave.”

“Gistin,” Krem deadpanned with a reassuring grin. Kind of him to think about it, but it was gender neutral enough, Tevinter name for ‘Just’ or something, old family name they’d been dead-set on using.

“Wow, really?” Ellie asked, pulling out a little…huh she had a little notepad of sorts from her back pocket, had a pencil tucked away in her tunic pocket, she blushed a bit, seemed nervous to ask him, “Would you mind spelling that for me? I’m kind of keeping note of new words, names, reinforcing how different letters can go together.”

“That’s really great, El. Gistin, G-i-s, t-i-n. Between Cremisius and Aclassi, I was glad it’s easy enough to remember how to spell,” he chuckled.

“You’ve just the one middle name?” Dorian asked, “Consider yourself lucky.” Then, “Hmm…Aclassi…your father’s last name? What about your mother? Oh. Do forgive my nosiness, I’m just trying to garner just how small the world truly is. Ellie and I had the most interesting revelation: the Pavus family has Free Marcher relatives—I’m the distant cousin of the Trevelyan line, I end up working alongside little Ellie here, and lo and behold, she attended the Conclave with a Trevelyan, posing as a distant cousin. Strange bit of coincidence isn’t it?” he babbled.

…Krem wasn’t sure about all that, or how that made the world small exactly, but he shrugged. “Mother’s maiden name was Fabius,” Ellie opened her mouth to speak and she smiled when he went ahead and offered, “F-a-b, i-u-s.”

“Thanks,” she said sweetly.

“Fabius…hmm…you know I think I know a Fabius,” Dorian said, “—first name Marcellus, Sopporati that runs a little hole in the wall in a town on the way to Minrathus.”

Huh. Well damn, maybe the world was small. “Uncle, my mother’s brother. He retired a while back, my cousin Remus runs it now.”

“Good on them.”

"Oh!" Ellie chirped, interested, "Remus is..."

"Cousin that writes me, yeah. Good guy." They'd never been super close, but Marcellus and mother were definitely brother and sister. Same eyes, same nose, same beliefs, and Remus had taken up for Krem as best he could, at least he hadn't wholly written him off when everything went sideways with his engagement to Cornelius. Hell, First Day didn't usually prompt anything from his cousin, but Wintersend and Krem's birthday, he got letters wishing him well.

"Good. I like him!" She didn't even know the guy but...huh, he supposed it must be true enough, probably wasn't even exaggeration, and it was nice she felt that way just because she knew his cousin was one of the few that hadn't totally disowned him. Probably all you needed to know to get the idea he was a good guy.

"Does everyone have a middle name?" Ellie asked then. "I don't. Dorian's got like fifty though so I'm pretty sure he broke the balance, its why I don't have one so the universe can maintain order. But his are all crazy, Gistin's handsome, he's got like Balbazaramuel or something and Catamereblahblah," she teased.

"Bartholomew, and Catolino," Dorian said, "are yes, two, of my five, middle names. Peasant."

Ellie giggled, "Tevinter middle names are crazy and I like them."

"Guess there is a bit of a wild range," Krem supposed.

"I fear my parents middle names are even worse than mine, I can't even pronounce them," Dorian complained.

Huh. His parents weren't quite that bad, not terribly difficult to remember, "Quintus and uh, Marilla, aren't bad I suppose," and Ellie smiled like he'd just offered up something astounding, Maker she was excited to learn new words. So....yeah, didn't feel bad to indulge her, "Q-u-i, n, t-u-s. And M-a-r, i-l-l-a."

"So, so many cool spellings," Ellie enthused as she carefully wrote down the letters he'd given her, "Q-u is one of my favorites, cause they stick together, like they love each other!!"

Maker help him, that was just adorable. Where did all these people crop up from that wanted to fight her so badly all the time? How did the Venatori sell the idea of hunting down a five-foot ray of sunshine that had favorite spellings because the letters were in love?

“So, Imekari, you excited?” Bull asked once she tucked her notebook away. “First-Day Eve, should be a blowout tonight, you ready to party?” His hand went to rest on Ellie’s back, thumb, index, and middle finger gripping and massaging her neck.

“Uh-huh!” she said brightly, “I’m going with Cremisius! I’m his date!” she was excited to inform them, bouncing a bit in her seat. Maker, she was excited to go on a date with him. And it was strange, a scary-good sort of different for him to actually be excited about going on a date.

“Shit, seriously? Oh man, beating us all to the damn punch, huh Krem?” Qunari gave him a little wink.

“Yup,” Krem replied, “find your own date, you oaf.”

“Ha!” Dorian belted out, pointing in Bull’s face.

“Cold Krem,” Bull complained, “that’s just ice cold.”

Oh man it was great to have that sorted. He’d been so nervous about asking her and now he could just be excited as all get out.

When lunch was through, Ellie asked if Krem’d mind helping her find Marehis—there’d been a deal struck earlier among Ellie and some of her party members to get ready together for any party tonight.

The woman had kept a good distance, he’d been sure she’d follow them into the Tavern but she hadn’t though he suspected she was somewhere nearby. Money went on keeping herself inconspicuous and they were pretty close to Solas’s cabin—she could probably hear any major calamity from there, keep track of when they left, things like that, so they headed that way first. Ellie laughed as they approached, rapping her fist against the door and calling, “Marehis? Solas? Are you in? The door’s unlocked and innocent eyes are about to enter the cabin—I love you, you're so cute, but I don’t need to see all that!”

Marehis was laughing almost uncontrollably, when they entered the cabin she was seated in a chair by the fire holding her sides as she carried on, and Solas was seated opposite her, ears burning red, hand splayed over his mouth as he struggled to hide his smile as he murmured, “Da’vehenan, heavens.”

“Ohhh, da’len, come here sweet girl,” Marehis wiped at her eyes with one hand, waving Ellie over with the other, Ellie’d been carrying her staff in hand after she re-bundled on their way out of the Tavern, so she set it against the wall and went to climb into Marehis’s lap, the Elf woman humming as she kissed her head and then she looked to Krem, “Lieutenant Aclassi, it’s good to see you again, I trust you’re well?”

“I am, its good to see you too, I’m glad you’re back safe,” he replied. Maker was he relieved, he’d been worried sick when Marehis didn’t turn up in Haven like she should have after Ellie left for the Hinterlands, if something had happened to her, Ellie’d be devastated.

Yeah. Solas was getting a beat down if he broke Marehis’s heart, he’d break Ellie’s in the process and yup. Nu uh. Not in this Inquisition.

“Just here to drop Ellie off,” he decided he should excuse himself, “there’s apparently going to be a glam session before the party tonight, though I don’t see why that’s necessary,” Krem couldn’t help but offer with a wink to Ellie who giggled, burying her face more against Marehis’s hair.

“I believe I must concur with the Lieutenant,” Solas agreed warmly. Concur with your damn self, egg-head.

“I like him,” Marehis sang quietly against Ellie’s ear and then she looked to Krem, “Thank you, Lieutenant, I appreciate you—I read the copies you sent, of reports you made while substituting my role as bodyguard. I’m grateful, truly.”

Oh, damn, yeah. Hell yeah, that was you know, cool, having Marehis’s approval. It was a weird sort of set up, Ellie had no parents to impress and yet there were at least a dozen or more adults he felt like he was going to have to work for it with, every bit of approval felt scarce and vital. “It was an honor to serve,” and when Marehis nodded, he caught Ellie’s eye, “I’ll swing by your cabin, eight o’clock?”

Ellie nodded. “It’s a date!”

“It is,” he was glad to say, nodding to the Elves as he took his leave, though he heard
Marehis squealing a little when he closed the door behind him, the muffled sound of Ellie giggling.

So he had huh, damn. Good thing Bull’d given him the all-clear this morning to be relieved of duty until after the holiday. He’d lost track of time, chatted away a little over three solid hours in the Tavern, just barely four hours left before he’d pick her up. He wasn’t sure if he had time to kill or if the time was killing him.

Time was killing him. Or maybe it was just the assholes he had to spend it with.

Brilliant bunch of assholes, loved ‘em. But damn.

The second—the very second—Krem set foot outside Haven’s gate, Bull was there with a breath stealing pound on the back before the lug pulled him into a headlock, dragging him forward toward the Charger’s clearing.

“You beautiful Vint bastard, you wooed the hell out of that girl. Fucking illustration? Where’d you learn how to draw like that? Sent her a watch that tells you the date—that was a damn lifesaver by the way you have no idea,” and when they made it to the clearing he finally let up, sending Krem stumbling but he caught himself, got upright again, bonfire was going and it looked like their ground troops had been sent off, done training till the holiday was over. Core group was gathered, some already drinking even though it was…well it was going on five now so, eh. They all stared at Krem while he caught his breath and then,

“Well? You ask her or what?” Rocky was impatient to know.

“Picking her up at eight.” Krem shrugged.

“He’s picking her up at eight!” Rocky shouted jovially, met with a chorus of cheers from the rest of the group, Grim throwing his hands in the air, two swift shifts of his hands made a good cheering motion and the Sign for ‘Amazing!’.

Thom came and slung his arm over Krem’s shoulders, “Thank you. Work you put in with my old crew, help you’ve been. You’re a fine young man,” the Mercenary commended him, then, “But you need a damn bath,” he laughed as he pulled away, shoving at his shoulder. Yup. Month bunking with Bull, Thom was officially a proper Charger—follow orders, fight hard, fuck with Krem.

“I was just neck deep in Bull’s armpit.” Krem defended himself, though he did tuck his head down to sniff. Ugh…he didn’t reek or anything but uh, yeah, no way was he going anywhere near Ellie, smelling like this.

“Hey!” Bull objected, “You’re welcome, Qunari musk drives the ladies crazy! You know how much Orlesians pay to use my sweat in their fancy colognes?” and then on second thought, “Don’t worry about it its none of your business,” like he didn’t want them stealing his side hustle. He could keep it for himself as far as Krem was concerned.

“Leave the boy alone,” Dalish chided, swatting Bull on the shoulder as she came to stand with Krem, oh Maker someone stop her, she licked her damn thumb and ahh! Nope! Wet, nope! Wiping at his cheek! He hadn’t had food on his face, what the fuck— “It isn’t coming off—oh! You’re definitely due a wash, but maybe clean up,” Wash and cle—oh. Yeah. He’d been taking a few minutes more rest every morning just trying to keep up with everything, he’d skipped out on his usual shaving ritual. Wasn’t ‘coming off’ ‘cause it was attached, sometimes a few darker hairs cropped up along the sides of his face.
Bull was looking at him then, eye squinting as he stared hard, the way he does that makes you feel like he’s trying to dissect your damn soul or something, shit.

And then he did that thing where he gives orders like suggestions, that soft-serious tone, clapping Krem on the shoulder, squeezing the back of his neck, “Wash up, relax a bit. Don’t stress nothin’, I’ll make sure you’re bright eyed and lookin’ your best for your date. Gotta represent, make sure everyone knows how the Chargers roll.”

Translation: I wanna check up on you behind your back. Bathe, nap, whatever. We’ll have a little chat later.

Little chats with Bull were…ugh. Alright. Felt two inches tall going into them but they usually turned out okay and yeah, he’d been pretty amped up all day, but he wasn’t going to turn his nose up at catching a few winks before livening it up until midnight, watching the new year roll in.

So he trudged it on over to their tent, stripped bare ass naked, washed up, shaved, pulled on his sleep bottoms and prayed to the Maker Bull didn’t suddenly decide to pick today of all days to be the sort of person not make good on his word, because damn, the tent could be on fire and he wouldn’t wake up, he was out almost as soon as he fell into his cot, covers pulled up over his head to hold off lingering chill and block out the sunlight filtering in.

Felt like he slept for ages—capital A, he almost wondered if it was possible to go to sleep and wake up in another century—when he woke up, something…cold air on his back, kind of chilly to be sleeping without a shirt, but there was a burning warm hand, Bull’s massaging his neck, shoulders, jostling him awake.

“Come on, sit it on down unless you want hair all over your cot. Or are you growing it out?”

Oh. Yeah, his hair was thicker now, not bad but he usually kept it up better, but it wasn’t like Bull’d been around. He could cut his hair fine on his own, back of his head wasn’t easy but he could manage, and Dalish or Stitches, Grim—everyone helped everyone, usually worked as a trade, he’d help with their hair, they’d help him with his. Was nice when Bull did it though. “Nah, just didn’t think about it. Thanks,” he mumbled, stretching before scooting to drop on the ground, Bull was standing right there, Krem snickered a he turned about so he sat on the oaf’s foot, bare back against his shin for all of a second before the Qunari grunted, pulling his foot free before dropping to sit on his ass behind the Tevinter. Quiet while he wet Krem’s hair, he’d set everything out already before waking him.

“Been busy it sounds like,” Bull rumbled out, Krem felt the cold blunt side of the razor against his ear before the Qunari dragged the sharp edge up the side of his head, “keep your damn head straight kid, jeesh,” he griped, hand on the other side of his head, pushing him upright.

Krem huffed, amused, offering, “Always busy Chief,” to his statement. Interrogatory statement he as sure.

“According to the guys—” yup. Snitches. “you’ve been first one up, last one to call it a night since I left.”

“Had shit to do.”

“Running drills with the core team and the new ground troops,” Bull began listing.
“Just had them practice near each other. Same field so I could keep an eye on both, help out where needed,” Krem interjected.

“Taking the new guys out yourself on that job, Lord what’s-his-dick was impressed. You only took Stitches along?”

“Cryil—new guy—he’s working on getting up to speed, so he can act as their Healer in the field, didn’t want to risk it so I had Stitches wait in the wings for us to be done, patch us up. Everyone gets paid the same no matter who goes where, unless it’s a whole tour or something. Wanted to make sure they were really up to task—wasn’t so far away the others couldn’t come back us up. Best way to test them out, I figured, against a decent challenge with a safety net. Practice is just that—practice. I wouldn’t want to just send them out later on their own without seeing for myself how they handle actual battle after so much time off.”

“Not knocking the process, just running through it,” Bull chuckled, wiping the blade off on his thigh before bringing it along the back of his neck. Huh. Alright. “Anyone give you trouble?”

“Didn’t care for someone my age bossing them around at first, but it was nothing I couldn’t handle,” Krem was quick to assure, didn’t want the guy getting the wrong idea and think they’d been dicks about him being him. When Bull handled it, heads got put through walls. ‘least, that’s what happened the last time someone they’d just hired on slapped Krem on the ass when they were all unwinding in a tavern, called him ‘little lady’, barked an order for him to go get more drinks. Needless to say the guy wasn’t in the mercenary game anymore. Might not be in any game anymore, Bull literally had his head through a wall faster than Krem could even get insulted over the slight, and threw him out. Promised to let Krem have the opportunity to stick up for himself in future, just, first time seeing something stupid play out pissed the oaf right off, he'd acted on reflex, but yeah, he didn't want to overstep where Krem could handle himself.

“Uh-huh. Like you handled 22 shots of Tequila?”

Huh? Oh yeah. “More like three and a boatload of water shots to keep up with everyone,” and when he heard something like a sigh of relief from the Qunari he snorted. “We wouldn’t be having this conversation if I actually knocked back 22 shots of any kind of decent alcohol.”

“True,” Bull supposed. Oh. Little chat—he’d been worried Krem was onto something dangerous with his drinking. Used to…he wasn’t an alcoholic, not in a dependency sense, but when he first signed on…yeah, he’d rather drink and forget shit than talk it out. No crazy amount of shots just, kept everything aching him in until they were settled for the day, he’d drink a little more than he should, enough to shut his brain up, fall into his cot and go to sleep. One of their first little chats had been ‘do you wanna be an alcoholic? ‘cause you’re gonna be an alcoholic’ followed by ‘real men talk about their feelings’.

“So. You kept everything goin’ on your own, wrote a damn novel to keep Rainier’n me up to speed, adapted our training to balance your responsibilities between our guys and the ground troops, but you didn’t think to maybe delegate a little?” oh, non-soul wrenching talk, a twofer. Not bad.

“It was my responsibility,” Krem shrugged.

“Koslun’s ass you’re a brat. Maybe establish a hierarchy of your own in the future, alright? No one’d begrudge picking up some slack, Charger’s has never been a one-man operation even when it was just me in sole command. Not complaining just correcting, constructive criticism,” Bull assured, and then his hand was on the back of his neck again, squeezing gently. “You did a damn good job. I’m proud of you, Cremisius.”
Well shit. Face felt like it was on fire, Bull only first named him when he was going for maximum sincerity—which was hell when he got 'I'm disappointed in you', but proud? Okay, that was...made him proud of himself. Jeeze. “Just doing my job.”

Bull was laughing as he dropped a towel on Krem’s head, rubbing at his wet hair for a second before letting Krem handle it. “Alright I’ll lay off, don’t want you blazing like a beacon when you meet up with your little girlfriend.” Then he was quiet for a moment before clearing his throat, "You uh...you nervous? Need any advice or er dunno, anything? You haven't really done the whole uh, dating thing really out here cept, well, you know." Yeah Krem was pretty sure he'd been around somewhere the few times the Qunari got him set up with the occasional lay. Being on the road meant one time things, he didn't like the idea of playing like it was the start of an actual relationship when he was just going to be off to another city, hell sometimes another country come morning, so: as non-complicated as possible, mutually satisfying fumble in the dark with some pretty stranger. Some of the Chargers either helped each other out when uh, tensions needed paid attention to. Though Grim's silent mysterious thing worked well for him when they passed through towns, and Rocky had a trail of 'girlfriends' in his wake, and a bloke from Markham, it'd been this whole thing where the Dwarf paced around their camp stressing over if it meant he was actually only into men this whole time, Bull, ass that he was, had dropped his britches and sashayed bare assed around their campfire saying if that didn't do anything for Rocky, he was fine, just some random dude got his dick up, these things happened. Maker.

But tonight wasn't anything like that. It was an actual date, he was going to pick the girl he liked up, dining, dancing, the whole thing. Krem shrugged. "Little nervous. It's uh...

"Wait. Shit, is this uh," lots of uhs when they got into uncomfortable shit the two of them, "your first date?" and when he got a derisive snort from that, "Krem."

He sighed, lumbering to his feet, slung the towel to lay over the back of his neck before he sat on his cot to face Bull. Did a good job of looking just about anywhere else than the massive space the Qunari occupied. "First date was with my fiance, back in Tevinter, took me to this stupid cafe where they serve tiny cakes and tea at ridiculous prices to celebrate our engagement. Waitress thought it was real sweet my 'father' was taking me out for a tea party." He met Bull's gaze then, Qunari's eyebrows were raised at that. "I was ten."

Bull was a caustic sort of quiet for a moment, like he was processing something that sent him right on to defense. He took a deep breath and then cleared his throat as he blew it out, then, "Hope that bastard's dead."

"Dunno, I don't necessarily check in on him. I didn't actually go through with the whole marriage thing. It was complicated. He was a Laetan, it would've given my family security, but uh, it was bad. Not something I could go through with. In the end I ranted like a crazy person, broke a plate over his head at the rehearsal dinner."

"Good. Proud of you for sticking up for yourself," Bull said, in all seriousness that he softened with, "and I'm always a fan of dinnerware violence."

That...yeah, sort of felt like a load off, always figured Bull'd be decent about his history, but it was still something of a relief to know yeah, Bull was on his side. "Thanks."

"You uh...you need to talk about it any?"

"Nah, it's a whole thing, long. But if I ever do, I know I can go to you." Embarrassing as shit to say it out loud but the guy wanted to make sure he knew, so Krem wasn't going to leave him hanging either.
"Okay," Bull said, nodding. Then, "Um. I...you...dating. Dates. Date...ing, Let's see. Don't...uh. Try to...you should..." the guy seemed to be working to find some kind of brilliant knowledge to share on how to tackle a date, not just how to pick someone up for a round of fun before going separate ways. He snapped his fingers, "Make sure to you know, get a little head tilt on, when you're going in for a kiss. Less chance of bumping noses."

"I think I got that."

"Right, yeah. uh. Be a uh, gentleman. Tell her she smells nice. Do Humans do ear stuff? Don't do ear stuff with Boss-girl I don't think she'd like it. Pull her chair out if there's uh, chairs. Compliment her and involve the moon somehow, chicks dig the moon."

"Bull."

"Yeah, sorry, I'm thinking through my dating arsenal and it's mostly shit I don't wanna think about you doing with Imekari."

Maker help them all. "Okay, I think I'm good. Thanks."

"Wait-" oh man he really wanted to help with this.

"Chief. It's sweet, and I really do appreciate it, but uh, I'm just nervous cuz I like her. Didn't date after the whole engagement debacle, joined the military pretty soon after that." Lots of people messed around in the military but uh, he definitely hadn't been inviting anyone into his pants. "But my father, he did well to impart with me all his advice on how a man should treat the person they uh," love, his father'd said but he didn't want to get too ahead of himself, "like."

"Better than the no ear stuff suggestion?"

"You know, he didn't warn me about ear stuff, so, I'm glad we had this talk I was really running blind with that, could've made a total ass of myself. And uh, I mean its not like your advice hasn't helped me with other big things."

Bull chuckled warmly. "Well then, I think you're ready to have a damn good night. Your hair's set. Cleaned up your boots for you. You goin' all armored up? Got a uh, shirt you can borrow if you prefer."

Krem raised a brow at that. "You don't own shirts."

Bull made a non-committal noise, “Ehh I don’t know about that. Just check it out, no pressure,” he checked his timepiece "Got about fifteen minutes before you should head that way. Unless you wanna play a little hard to get? No?” he chuckled at the glare Krem gave him, throwing his towel at the oaf. “Okay okay, you want help lacing up? Save you some time,” Bull offered, and when Krem nodded, the Qunari grunted and lumbered to his feet, picked his binder up off where he’d left it laying on top of his trunk, Krem stood and raised his arms out, Bull had him laced up real quick, took Krem a few times tightening and re-tightening to get it right on his own, but the Qunari could just kneel and give the laces a solid smooth pull, holding them taut for Krem to take and tie them in place while turning to offer his other side for Bull to lace. “Feel okay? Not too tight?” he checked.

Krem took in a few deep breaths, stretched properly, “It’s perfect, thanks,” he said, dropping his sleep pants and moving to dig trousers out of his trunk.

“I’ll leave you to finish getting ready,” Bull said. Though he did find pause in the entry way, turned back to look at Krem, “And uh. You know, if you wanted, that bullshit, back in Tevinter. That ain't right, wasn't a real relationship. Doesn't have to count for anything if you don't want it to. You've got a new life now. You could always consider this you're first date."

Oh. Huh. There it was. Bull usually landed some sort of sage advice at the end of the day, shit. That was...yeah, starting fresh sounded good to him and no matter how things ended with Ellie, he didn't think he'd look back on tonight with regret. Krem turned to look at him. "Thanks Chief."

"Anytime. Shirt's on my cot. See you out there."

Shirt for Krem to borrow huh? Of Bull’s? Bullshit. Ass. Sweet ass though...damn him. Tunic was nice, fit Krem great, high collar, inside was wool lined so it was toasty, a warm red color—nice choice for First-Day Eve, people wore red to symbolize letting love into their lives in the coming year which was...yeah he could roll with that. He breathed a sigh of relief when he felt the buttons—they were lacquered to look like gold but were made out of wood, thank the actual Maker. He could...allow the subtle-not-subtle way of presenting him a gift, consider it a bonus or something, a reward for holding things down while Bull was away, but nothing that damn extravagant. Wood worked though.

Cleaned up, haircut, Bull’s handiwork on his binder, new shirt to literally top it all off...he felt as ready as he could be. Shouldn’t be so nervous, it was Ellie she was...she wasn’t trepidation. She was light, and always left Krem feeling lighter for it, nerves always died off once he actually got to being with her. Things should learn not to show up in the first place.

He was pretty sure his nerves learned their damn lesson though. As he approached Ellie’s cabin he could hear the lively chatter—Sera laughing, Cassandra’s voice, Marehis’s, Madam de Fer’s voice too. When he knocked though Sera was the one that opened the door, still cackling about something as she leaned from the doorframe. Oh, she’d gotten her haircut too at some point, styled to curl up atop her head tonight, she was wearing her armor still...new he thought, or at least it was something she’d gotten since she was last in Haven, looked dressed up for the rough Elf Rogue, especially sans weaponry, red for love, yellow for wealth, both good things to wish for in the new year.

"Lookin’ good Sera," Krem complimented, earning him a toothy grin.

"Not too bad yerself Kremmy-boy," and then she reeled back in the entryway, shouting over her shoulder, "Innnnnnnnnky! Your friend-boy’s here!"

He could hear Ellie giggling and Marehis’s, “Go ahead, da’len. Have fun, we’ll see you in a bit.”

“Thanks,” Ellie giggling and Marehis’s, “Go ahead, da’len. Have fun, we’ll see you in a bit.”

“Thanks,” Ellie’s voice and then Sera moved, laughing to herself or maybe at Krem, as Ellie came into view, approaching the doorway just. Yup. Nerves sort of boosted all the way up and then disappeared. Warm woolen leggings tucked into her boots, pale blue dress that fell to her knees—oh he prayed it worked, Maker he did, blue was meant to call peace and rest in the coming year to the wearer. Her scarf was looped in an oval around her neck, green was a good color too, represented hope and faith, braid hanging over her shoulder, a vine of Elf Root woven into it. “Hi,” she greeted shyly, cheeks pinking.

He wasn’t sure what she had to be shy about, Maker. “You look amazing,” he breathed.

“So do you, gosh,” she replied. Oh...oh was she...was she shy because of him? “You look very handsome.”
Bull. Was. Krem’d just. He loved that damn Qunari.

“Bull’s doing mostly,” he said. "Haircut, letting me borrow his shirt," he said with a doubtful look.

She giggled at that. “Marehis did my hair, and the dress is Lady Josie’s doing, though Varric actually painted my nails,” Ellie told him, oh, yeah, he’d noticed earlier her fingernails were a glossy pale pink color—

“Oi! Harrit made my armor, Marehis cut my hair, and I pulled my knickers up all on my own—make with the date you two!” Sweet Sera.

“She’s doing mostly,” he said. “Haircut, letting me borrow his shirt,” he said with a doubtful look.

“Oi! Harrit made my armor, Marehis cut my hair, and I pulled my knickers up all on my own—make with the date you two!” Sweet Sera.

“Sera! Let them be, child,” Cassandra’s voice reproached in quiet warning. "If you come and sit still I will indeed share my eyeliner wisdom with you.”

"Bitchin’!" yelped in excitement.

“Your’re simply precious, darlings, but you are letting the chill in,” called Madam de Fer.

“Sorry!” Ellie giggled out as Krem reached for her hand, and she smiled warm when he pulled her closer as she pulled the door closed behind her. “Hi,” she murmured.

"Hi," he squeezed the hand he held and then linked arms with her, as they began making their way down the path, “So. I’m thinking, we pregame at Flissa’s real quick before joining the party.”

“Pregame?” she asked, little concerned. Oh!

“Hot chocolate,” he was quick to assure, and she held his arm more tightly, hugging it to herself, smiling her approval. Varric’d written to let him know it’d be in, apparently Madam de Fer had introduced Ellie to the beverage and she like it almost as much as she enjoyed her morning coffee. Figured since she couldn’t exactly go for drinks, it’d be a nice treat.

“Ooooh!” Flissa squeaked when they entered the busy Tavern, Maker, the place was packed, the barmaid only saw them because she was standing on a chair so she could reach over someone’s shoulder to refill their drink loads of people were standing, packed tight together. Flissa dropped down and scurried, shuffling as she wove through the crowd to get behind the bar, pulling up two mugs and waving them over, so Krem put his arm over Ellie’s shoulder, holding her close so he could shoulder them through to the bar without detriment. “You look just lovely, lady Ellie. And you clean up so very nicely Mister Aclassi—oh! A-classy-guy, I just got that, the Iron Bull is so very clever!”

Uh huh. Using that around everyone huh? Ellie was amused by it though so, that sorted. She smiled into her mug as she sipped at her cocoa. Oh man, hot chocolate was good.

“Oi!” Flissa snapped, picking up a wooden spoon and smacking it hard against the counter top with a crack that made Krem almost choke on his drink and Ellie gasp, her free hand reaching for him even though she was still tucked up under his arm, she grabbed a fistful of his shirt.

“Herald of Andraste at the bar—back, you brutes! I’ll come refill your drinks in a minute, don’t crowd the girl!” Flissa was zipping around the bar again, armed with a pitcher as she warded the crowd off, huh, yeah things were getting pretty tight. There’d been all kinds of checks to make sure no one unauthroized was in Haven but still, probably shouldn’t have Ellie so boxed in in a sea of only semi-familiar faces as far as Krem was concerned. If they left with their drinks it wasn’t like Flissa didn’t know where they lived. Still,
“Your drink too warm?” he asked her quietly as she released hold of his shirt, smoothing it out in apology, made his face feel warm.

“Hmm,” she held out her free hand and he entrusted his beverage to her, “you wanna knock these back and get going?”

“If you’re cool with it.”

“I actually am,” she seemed amused with the notion and then…Maker. she did love her puns, she took a deep breath and blew on his drink, then hers in quick succession, just the barest bit of frost visible in her breath. “Vivienne taught me.” and then she gasped, "Oh gosh, sorry, jokes are fun but I should have asked first-"

“Cheers,” he cut her off, it was nice she did, even after the fact, consider he mightn't be comfortable drinking something magic-touched but he trusted her, was pretty sure it wasn't something malicious that would freeze his insides if he drank it or something. She handed him back his mug, and they clinked their cups together before chugging their cooler cocoa, leaving the empty mugs on the counter. He raised his arm to wave Flissa down.

“Oh, you’re leaving? Have fun you two,” the woman wished them well as she ducked behind the bar and rose with a canteen, handing it to Krem, “enjoy your evening.”

“Flissa, you’re amazing,” he assured her as he took the canteen in hand, it felt warm to the touch and Ellie waved to the barmaid offering,

“Happy First-Day Eve!”

“Have a Happy First-Day Eve as well, my lady!”

The night felt quieter and the cool of wintry air was actually refreshing after the overcrowded warmth of the Tavern, the two of them heaving sighs of relief as the door shut behind them.

“Sorry, I didn’t realize how crazy it’d be," the plan had been to warm up, maybe eat a little something before heading to the party but, "suppose I should’ve known considering it’s a holiday huh?”

“That was fun, and hot chocolate’s definitely worth it,” Ellie assured. “And I don’t mind that it led to, you know,” her hand reached to pat his forearm hanging over her shoulder.

He certainly didn’t mind it either, Maker bless a crowded Tavern then. Shaking the canteen, he said, “I asked ahead if Fliss’d ready us something for the road. Warm apple cider, isn't fermented promise, since uh…well Lady Josie swears up and down there’ll be juice and things but…”

“Its not a proper party unless someone spikes the punch,” Ellie said in agreement. “Gosh you really put a lot of thought into everything, I mean a canteen of hot cider just in case there’s nothing I can drin- just- are you sure you want to date just me? I wasn’t feeling the flavor of the week thing earlier, but you’ve got a solid pattern of being considerate enough I think it’s cruel to not share you with the rest of person-kind.”

“Too bad for them then, I think I’ll stick with you if its all the same,” he said, whispering in conspiracy, “I don’t know if you’ve heard, but you’re pretty amazing.”

“You’re literally banned from flirting for like, ten minutes, it isn’t fair, and I need time to catch up.”

He unwound the strap from the canteen to sling over his head so it stayed secure at his hip while freeing his hand, then pulled his pocket watch from his trouser pocket, to peek at the time, “Alright, its 8:19…now. But the second 8:29 rolls around, I’m sorry Lady Herald, its back on.”

“Cremisius!” she complained laughingly. Though she stopped in her tracks as they approached the Chantry, sounds of liveliness breaking out against the night sky even through its doors, and when he looked to her she seemed grave.

“Everything alright?” he asked quietly. She swallowed, he wasn’t sure if she was anxious or if the cocoa hadn’t set with her right or…didn't look like she was in pain but Bull’d mention those Maker-awful headaches she'd been having.

“I um…yeah—” uh huh, ‘yeah’.

“You wanna take a lap?” he offered, “There’s no rush.” There really wasn’t.

“Are you sure?” she asked worriedly.

“El, not to be romantic, just a statement of fact—but the only place I’m pressed to be right now is with you. You’re out here, then I wanna be out here. Party doesn’t hold interest for me unless you’re in it.”

She blushed, snuggling into his side more as he led her along path, away from the Chantry, toward Haven’s gate.

“Are you feeling ill,” he asked, "or is it something else?"

“Oh I’m fine just,” she took a deep breath. “I’m sorry it’s- it’s not so much that I’m afraid, it’s like I’m afraid I’ll be afraid, if that makes sense?”

“Worrying you’ll feel fear is reasonable,” he said. “You don’t want to go in because you’re worried you’ll end up having to leave, panic in front of the others?”

He felt her nodding. “Envy…demon in Therinfal?” she checked to make sure he knew what she was talking about and he gave her a little squeeze like an affirmation. “It um, made me see all sorts of things in some horrible alternate version of Haven’s Chantry. Mostly the dungeons and War Room, I don’t think there’ll be partying going on there but…I dunno seeing the Chantry again it just struck me, made my stomach turn and I’m so so sorry I don’t mean to ruin this with—”

He pulled away just to stop, standing to face her, taking her hands in his. “Ellie…hush,” seemed to make her relax and he assured her, “You’re not ruining anything. Nothing to ruin. You have nothing but demands on your time, going into this, I can promise you right now, I’m not going to be one of them. There’s enough pulling on you. You can’t drink—we’ll have cider. Dread demon puts you off the Chantry, well, you certainly don’t have to go there on my account. We can do whatever you need. You need me? I’m there. I get to be too much, just say the word.”

“No pressure?” she asked gently.

“No pressure,” he promised. Oh. shit, he meant to help her feel better, but she sniffled and oh crap, tears, just a few but still, “El-”

“I’m okay, just…thank you, Cremisius.” She smiled, explaining, "You really know how to overwhelm a girl with…how much you’re not going to overwhelm her,” she huffed a laugh, raising the back of her hand wipe at her eyes. “I’m not sad promise. Just the opposite I think. Um, thanks. Same thing goes for you, all of it. Life is complicated enough, if I ever make things difficult for you or get to be too much, just say the word, okay?”

He'd gotten a pretty good idea of what he was in for going into this, hadn't put him off, but “Alright,” he said, nodding. “So. What do you wanna do? We’ve got options all over the place, we could walk along the river, go see Russel, check in on how the Druffalos are having a pleasant First-Day Eve—babies are even bigger now.”

"You checked on the baby Druffalos for me?"

"Maybe," he allowed, though Maker that had her looking proud, like he'd just admitted to saving the things from a burning building or something uh...yeah, liked that, definitely. But they'd gotten off track, "You wanna go on a walk or go somewhere and read or knit, whatever. We can call it a night even if you're feeling done in.” It didn't seem like she'd gotten to rest very much and she'd only gotten back from a trip that was exhausting to read the reports on, he was honestly surprised that she hadn't gotten in and gone directly to her cabin to sleep for a week.

She shook her head. “I...that all sounds fun and um, great future date material if um, you know,” she smiled shyly like she didn't want to just assume he might ask her out again. But yeah, he was glad that sounded like good date material because that was about all he had to work with out here. "But I think I want to try, with the party if you're still interested. It wasn’t like my relationship with Haven’s Chantry started off on the right foot but…I made some good memories there. Maybe we can try making even better ones, replace the bad fake-ones. Sort of like seeing real Cullen and Josie and Leliana helped.”

“They were in the Fade?” he asked carefully.

Ellie nodded. “Yeah Envy…Cole called it ‘putting me in my hurts’. Made me see things and people related to that like being a suspect of the Conclave, things that could go wrong with the Inquisition or the world because of the Elder One and the Breach.” oh Maker. “I actually…you…” no, oh no had he- “I couldn’t even remember your name. I heard you when...sometimes I’d hear memories, real ones, of things that helped keep me going, they mostly refuted the fake things I saw. But in the moment I couldn’t for the life of me put a name or a face to the voice speaking encouragement until I broke out,” she smiled softly at that, Maker, he never thought he'd be glad to hear she'd forgotten all about him but he sure as hell was. “You aren’t in my hurts.”

Oh. Oh thank everything that...hurts didn’t sound like a place he wanted to be at all.

“I’m grateful for that,” he said. “You want to try the party?” she’d said as much but still, he wanted to double check, and when she nodded. “You’re in, I’m in. You change your mind or things get too much—”

She smiled, squeezing his hands three times. “I know.”

She leaned into him as they made their way back around to the Chantry, and his arm wound back around her shoulders, taking her Marked hand in his left.

Chantry doors swung open and the place was packed, bubbling over with excitement and energy, everyone’s good time felt palpable and Ellie didn’t shy away from it.

“There you are! Innkyyyy!” Sera called as she wove through the crowd to join them, and when she broke through Krem saw the date she dragged behind her, pretty Dwarf woman. Huh, Sera wasn't super made-up but she did have eyeliner on now, courtesy of Seeker's infinite wisdom with the stuff he supposed, not bad. “Lacy’n me was wonderin’ when you two’d show up. We wanna dance!”

The Dwarf at her side giggled at that, “Its great to see you again, Ellie.”

Ellie stepped out of his hold to hug the woman, “Scout Harding! It’s so great to see you, I’m so glad you could make it back here for the holiday!”

“Of course, I wouldn’t miss yo—the holiday, the day that’s almost today, that’s a holiday,” she rambled, quick to cover, oh, yeah, she was on the guest list he remembered. Ellie didn’t find her fumbling strange so that sorted. Seemed to be going okay, being in the Chantry, he’d have to keep an eye out, let Lady Josie know if her plans needed some adjustment.

“Come on!” Sera called, “You down, Ink? Krem? Don’t just stand there, let’s party!”

Ellie took a hold of Krem’s hand and a smile tugged at his lips as she tugged him along, following after Sera and Harding, getting into the mix of the other party goers, lively tune, lots of bass pounded through the hall and Ellie almost collided with Sera when the Elf stopped and just claimed a piece of dance floor for herself and Scout Harding. Ellie smiled and turned to face him, taking both his hands as she cautioned,

“You might want to mind your toes, I’m sorry in advance.”

“Hmm…” he pondered, holding her hand as he slipped an arm around her waist, she grinned and squeaked in surprise when he pulled her up and set her so she was standing on top of his boots with a squealed,

“Cremisius!”

“Just minding my toes, they’re safe as it stands,” he said, “that okay with you?”

She blushed, nodding. “Yup,” she assured him as they swayed.

“So far so good?” he asked quietly after a while.

“This is definitely going in the ‘better memory’ column,” she was sure.

It was...yup. Better memory, maybe he was replacing memories of his own. This was a far cry better than anything he’d had of dating or dancing in Tevinter. Especially when...well. Music had picked up then and Ellie stepped down off the top of his boots, he wasn’t a big fan of the distance but the resulting dance? She held his hands in hers, smiling and laughing, singing along occasionally as she shifted side to side on the balls of her feet, swinging her hips to the music, the push and pull of their clasped hands made it easy to dance along with her without looking like an ass or anything.

“Eleanor, Lieutenant!” Cassandra’s voice sounded halfway through the next slower one, the distance closed between Ellie and Krem again and he moved his hand higher, above where it’d been resting—respectfully but it might not be enough for the Seeker—on the small of Ellie’s back. Seeker Pentaghast wove her…no danced her way through the crowd, she was dancing with, “Cullen! Cassandra, hi!” Ellie’s hand squeezed his once in her excitement.

“Seeker, Commander,” Krem offered in greeting.

“I was able to talk the Seeker into dancing,” Cullen said jovially. “Might I have a dance with the Lady Herald this evening?”

“Hmm… how’s your Orlesian Waltz?” Ellie asked the Commander.

“…horrible, I assure you.”

“I don’t know a single step! I think we’re set!” Ellie enthused.

The Commander chuckled, smiling warmly at that. “Excellent!”

“You’ll be okay?” Ellie checked with Krem.

“Of course,” he was pretty sure he saw Bull around—

“If it wouldn’t trouble the Lieutenant, I would endure the next dance in his company,” Seeker Pentaghast said.

Oh wow, really? That was… well nerve wracking but, “It’d be my pleasure,” he said.

Song ended and Ellie was swept away, literally the Commander wrapped an arm around her waist and whisked her from Krem’s feet to place her feet atop his metal boots saying, “I’m more afraid I’ll step on you in these things, and that simply wouldn’t do,” as he led her into the next dance.

“Lieutenant,” Cassandra nodded to him, offering her hand.

Maker, please don’t let him die right yet, at least give him ‘til midnight, “Seeker,” Krem offered back, very carefully placing his hand high on the Seeker’s armored back as he took her gauntleted hand.

“You look very handsome this evening,” the Seeker offered politely.

“Thank you. You’re erm, lovely, your hair looks nice like that—not that it isn’t always nice, just, different nice.” It’d been braided differently, hanging down and over her shoulder similar to Ellie’s.

“Eleanor is to thank for the change,” Cassandra said, letting Krem lead, her gaze went to Ellie and the Commander, expression warming as she watched the two chatting and dancing and… he didn’t have Bull’s hearing, but they were close enough that just over the din of the party he could hear what vaguely sounded like the duo singing made up words to the lyric-less music echoing through the hall. “She seems well. Are you having a pleasant evening?”

“I am. You are as well?”

“I am.” Then, “I would not wish to put you in an uncomfortable position, I do understand pursuing a relationship with the young lady might make it to your discomfort to answer for fear of breaking some confidence with her, so you needn’t but… Eleanor expressed some discomfort when I informed her festivities would take place in the Chantry, she did not say… have you noticed anything of import?”

“Things keep going like they are, I think we’re set for tomorrow. She was worried, seeing the real Chantry again, but so far so good.”

“Thank you, Cremisius. Eleanor is precious to me and I do appreciate the regard you hold for her, truly.”
“Thank you. Between Chief and Ellie, I hear a lot about everything you do for her, I’m glad she has you. You had to deal with a lot of hard things this last stint out, and you still put Ellie first. I’m grateful, really. Just uh...make sure you’re still taking care of yourself too.”

Seeker seemed bemused that he’d presume to tell her to remember she take care herself. "You are making this terribly difficult. My words were meant as a build up to deliver some measure of warning against unjustly, abhorrently hurting Eleanor—while heartbreak is an unfortunately close friend to romantic ventures, there are of course lines that, if crossed, would invoke my wrath."

Yeah, but he got that well before heading into this. "I ever hurt Ellie I trust you'd probably burn my cot with me in it or feed me to a dragon or something. Talked Ellie into seeing Adan after the uh, Tavern incident, by saying you’d kick my ass if I let her get sick."

Seeker looked all kinds of pleased to hear that. The music slowed and they came to a stop and Cassandra raised the hand he’d released to pat him on the cheek as she smiled warmly, “Sweet man,” she declared him before turning to meet Ellie, weaving her way back to them, Cullen in tow, the girl seemed breathless, wide smile on her face as she said,

“That was fun, but I’d like my date back please!”

“As I would mine,” Cassandra agreed, the sentence sending Ellie gasping in delight as she broke out into a bit of a victory dance before she released Cullen’s hand to grasp both of the Seeker’s.

“Really?! Cassandra! You! Cullen-! Cremerius!” he wasn’t sure why she said his name, took all of two seconds to piece together that in Excited Ellie language that probably meant,

“I believe the next dance with the Lady Herald is yours now, Seeker Pentaghast,” he translated, which sorted since, “I think I’ll go hit the refreshment table.”

“Ahh yes, I believe I’ll join you,” Cullen offered, and to the Seeker and Ellie, “try not to have too much fun without us,” Cullen offered with a wink that made Seeker look murderous and somehow shy, the woman went pink but she was not happy he’d only encouraged Ellie's excitement, seeing them flirtatious. Ellie pulled Cassandra along to start dancing with her. Music was pretty upbeat, so Ellie held the Seeker’s hands, bouncing about on her feet and she was already firing off questions it looked like before Krem started making his way to the refreshments, Cullen in tow.

Bull greeted him, Qunari was bombarding the refreshment table, set up to block anyone from slipping down to the lower level of the Chantry. Carefully holding a dessert plate that was almost comically small in his hand, balancing in his palm as he piled it with goods. “Krem-cheese! There you are, lookin’ sharp, out here lookin’ good enough to spread on a damn cracker—"

"Maker gave us cream cheese for bagels you lout, and it's a very mild cheese thank you very much. Gotta know your cheese facts if you're gonna be cheesy."

“Bite me, brat,” Bull shot back with a laugh. Then to Cullen who was looking over the offered refreshments, "Commander, making your moves on the Seeker? Nice."

“Leave’em alone, oaf,” Krem cautioned with levity when Cullen looked outright bashful at Bull’s observation. “You here stag or did you trick someone into coming along with you?”

“You know how the drill. I’m scoping out the prospects, weighing my options for midnight. You havin’ a good time?” Krem nodded and Bull said, "Boss girl’s all dressed up, damn cute. You mind if I see about getting on her dance card?"

“Not for me to mind, she’s the one you’ll be dancing with—ask her. Maybe wait a beat though," Krem cautioned, "I haven’t eaten since lunch, I don’t know if she has either, so, snack duty."

“Good thinking,” Bull sniffed, “supposed to just be juice in those pitchers but uh, someone’s already been through. Wasn’t me I swear.”

“I figured as much, I got Ellie covered—apple cider from Flissa’s,” he said running a thumb under the canteen strap across his chest, earned him a clap on the shoulder from Bull, though he did gesture in offering and Krem figured it was better to be safe than sorry, so he handed the Qunari his canteen and let him take a whiff, just to verify it hadn’t fermented since Flissa made it, but Bull nodded that it was all good.

Commander sighed with relief. “Excellent forethought. I was just about to run out to the pump to get water for her. We’ll have to be vigilant with refreshment tomorrow, though it’ll be a much more contained gathering—do you think all of Haven is packed in here?”

“Here and Flissa’s,” Krem said. Huh, guy seemed kind of anxious, there uh, there’d been a few times, when Krem’d been up late working or woken up and went to get some air he’d see the Commander getting in on the night air, exhausted but not eager to venture back into the confines of his tent for rest. Krem’d started building up the bonfire in the clearing the Chargers used every night when there was enough wood around or Krem felt up to getting more, and he’d invite the Commander to join him and the guys for drinks, winding down. It worked to...he’d found the Commander sleeping out in the open when he needed to, Charger's dying fire good for keeping him warm enough to do so safely. Now, everything getting so packed in inside the Chantry hall, it would be easy for anyone to get claustrophobic. “Everyone gathering to party makes it real nice outside, quiet. Cold air was great when Ellie and I left Fliss’s.”

“Ohh yeah, Krem’s got the right idea,” Bull picked up on what he was putting down, “you could take the Lady Seeker out on a romantic stroll in the moonlight.”

Bull had loads of moon-oriented dating advice. Made Krem feel like returning the favor though he certainly wasn't going to refer to the Lady Seeker as a 'chick'...Ellie either really. So he opted for, "Ladies dig the moon,” he drawled in agreement.

That got him a rumble of Bull's laughter as the Qunari turned to look out over the crowd, “Imekari’s with her right? Yup. They're breaking it down still—much as Seeker loves that girl she’ll be damn grateful if you get her out of the trifecta of youthful enthusiasm she’s caught in, dancing with the kid and Sera and huh, damn, hot Dwarf lady, redhead, maybe I’ll intro—”

Krem cleared his throat, warning, “Scout Harding, Sera’s date.”

“Never mind then.”

“I think I will cut in,” Cullen said, though he did pick up a dessert plate, “vanilla or blueberry, do you think?”

“Ellie says Cassandra’s a fan of vanilla,” Krem said, elbowing Bull in the ribs when he snorted at that.

Commander smiled his thanks, “Enjoy your evening, Lieutenant, Bull.”
Krem piled up a plate with huh, little Orlesian cookie things—two halves with crème sandwiched between them—and grapes, and the servant minding the table, Krem recognized him from around Haven, he was decent enough to give him two empty flutes he held crisscross in his free hand as he worked his way back to where Ellie was dancing with Sera and Harding.

“Cremisius!” she greeted cheerily, and he had to hold his arms out to the side as she descended on him, hugging him around his middle before pulling back and excitedly informing him, “Cassandra and Cullen are dating! Well, Cassandra won’t call it that outright, he’s her date but they’re ‘seeing where things go, it is merely an avenue we are exploring’,,” she rolled her eyes at the Seeker’s roundabout way of basically saying they’re dating while simultaneously refusing to admit as much. “Cullen’s taking her on a walk, gosh, I hope they have fun.”

Sera snorted, “Can’t have too much fun, the way those lot are always goin’ ‘round in their layers of armor, betcha it takes a solid hour just to get undressed, doubt their foreplay game is that strong.”

“Sera, leave them be, come on,” Scout Harding giggled, pulling the Elf girl closer, whispering something that made Sera’s ears and neck burn red before letting out a nervous-excited cackle of sorts before the two disappeared into the crowd.

Ellie was grateful he’d brought back something to eat…he was too actually. Might have had something to do with the fact that once their champagne flutes were full of cider, he held his drink and the dessert plate for her and she repaid him with a kiss on the cheek and by feeding him bites of cookie and grapes. Bull was good enough to wait until they’d finished, gave them a moment before he swooped in for a dance with Ellie. He hoisted her up to swing her around the dance floor, sort of anyway, he did these tight turns that had to make the Human girl feel like she were flying a bit, but he was being very very careful, bit more open with his...well he seemed damn tender to Krem. Bull'd not talked to him about their trip yet but he'd uh, read...Seeker was pretty detailed in her reports and when bigger things like Time Magic and Envy struck, he'd already been privy to the events existence through Bull, so Spymaster would let Krem lay eyes on Inquisition reports coming in from the field. Bull'd guarded Ellie when she went down in Therinfal, she'd been comatose and there'd been something wrong with her heart. And Bull'd outright shared in his own reports that he thought she'd been blasted when she disappeared through that time portal with Dorian. Sure as hell scared Krem hearing about those things, it had to have just about killed the Qunari. Big bastard had an even bigger heart. The guy wanted with everything to have been able to protect Ellie better, he'd written up all these...sometimes he wrote up corrections after fights, constructive criticism on how to handle things better next time, but what he sent in reports to Krem had sounded like him venting, beating himself up, he should have stayed closer, been faster, done more he felt like which was just, natural but unnecessary. Bull'd sure as hell done his best, this shit just happened, all they could do was be glad it hadn't turned out worse, and move forward. When he thought about it, Chantry stone and concrete were used to make all affiliated buildings, like Circles, Templar fortresses and bases. The Great Hall of Therinfal had to have some ghost of presence here, so, Krem hung back and let the oaf have a good solid few dances with Ellie, part of moving forward, sort of replace the memory of Bull brought to his knees feeling like a failure for not having done enough to protect her, holding her and hoping she'd live, and reinforcing the reality that they were back and safe and now he was with Ellie giggly and lively in his arms.

There was a sort of switch off from then on, Krem and Ellie dancing before someone else approached to get a moment with her, Marehis, and then the Elf woman danced with Krem while Solas had his turn.

“You’re having a pleasant time I hope? I feel badly we've all been monopolizing Ellie’s dances, I hope we haven’t been too imposing,” Marehis apologized as they swayed.
“I don’t mind—don’t get me wrong, we’re having a blast, but it’s nice, seeing her have fun with everyone, she deserves it,” Krem assured her. Didn’t like Solas, but he didn’t dislike the way Ellie was smiling, rapt attention being paid to some pleasant story dropping from the Elf Apostate’s lips. “Plus now I’ve gotten to dance with the Lady Seeker, you, who knows who’ll end up on my dance card.”

In a strange turn of events, Thom Rainier. After Varric claimed a dance with Ellie, lines of communication got mixed up when Thom and Dorian both showed up for their chance to dance with Ellie, and the Mercenary bowed out, let the Tevinter Mage have the honor first. Since Krem’d just be standing around waiting for two songs, Rainier decided to occupy one of them, offering his hand to Krem. Wasn’t sure how that was gonna pan out but once Krem took his hand, the older man’s other hand rested on Krem’s shoulder, letting the Tevinter lead.

“You mind your hand on my backside, keep it gentlemanly now,” Thom jested.

“I will try, can’t make any promises though.”

Didn’t turn out too bad. Dorian returned with Ellie, and when she was done dancing with Rainier, she was Krem’s for the rest of the evening, looping her arms around his neck, while he held her around the waist.

“Gosh this is so fun,” she breathed, happy, a nice kind of worn out, the sort when you’d had so much excitement and levity and you know you’re so tired you won’t be able to help but top it off with good night’s sleep.

“I’m glad you think so too,” he said. “You still good?”

“Yup! Unless you're tired?” she asked, and when he shook his head ‘no' she smiled, burying her face against his neck, sighing contently, "Good, I like dancing with you."

It was more like him holding her while he took a few obligatory swaying steps to the music, but he certainly wasn’t complaining. “Huh. What a coincidence,” he said, whispering, “I like dancing with you.”

Almost felt too soon when the music died down and Lady Josephine, getting a helpful hand up from Bull, stood on a chair, speaking loud enough to be heard across the hall, “Ladies and gentlemen, I hope you’ve had a lovely time this evening! If you’ll join me outside before Haven’s gates, we’ve arrangements to ring in First Day in appropriate fashion.”

Bit of hesitancy from all around, she was sweet but talking to a Chantry full of mostly drunken partygoers still looking to dance and have fun—her very polite way of saying there would be more fun outside didn’t quite translate.

Luckily Bull was a good translator, “Lady said get outside—move it!”

“If you would do so kindly, please!” Lady Josephine tacked on as the crowd started filtering outside, Maker bless her heart.

Ellie dropped to her feet, taking Krem’s hand and he trailed after her through the Chantry though she pulled his arm back around her shoulder as they stepped out into the cold evening, following the crowd out until they stood in a mass before Haven estate.

Commander Cullen stood before them with Seeker Pentaghast, the two comparing the time on their respective timepieces before the Commander called out, “Ladies and gentlemen, we’re down to the final minutes of the year 9:41 Dragon, Seeker Pentaghast, if you’d do the honors.”

“We have endured much in this past year, suffered great loss, and many trials,” Cassandra spoke loud and clear to be heard by the crowd. “But we have also dealt in great victories, seen the fruition of miraculous things. We have been so blessed—while the Conclave left us with devastation, the Breach, we have been so blessed. We have the Herald of Andraste, and her Mark to cast against the Breach, and we stand here now, an Inquisition, Mages and Templars with a united purpose under our lead. 9:42 holds nothing but possibility, many of them great—we will work to mend the bonds broken within our numbers, see that Mages and Templars can work in peace, toward prosper. We will be an example to Thedas, to our allies and our enemies alike, that no matter what, we cannot ever truly be divided, we will always come together, and be made better for our differences. We will find unity, and we will seal the Breach!”

Their gathering broke out in roaring cheers, Ellie smiling wide, proud as she cheered for the Seeker.

“Now,” Cullen said as their din died down, “by my watch…ten! Nine!”

“Eight!” everyone joined in, “Seven!...Six!...Five!...Four!...Three!...Two!...One!”

Across the lake, along the road from Haven to the Hinterlands, fireworks shot off into the sky, Ellie gasping in surprise when they burst into brilliant displays of red and gold, silver and blue.

And then Krem took a deep breath, looked to her, and brought a hand up under her chin, and she smiled wide, eyes alight with excitement before she closed them and tilted her head back.

First Day, 9:42, under the glow of the Breach, and blaze of brilliant fireworks, Krem and Ellie shared their first kiss.

Chapter End Notes

*Dorian and Sera totally have that sweet, sweet LGBT+ solidarity. Canon fact.

*University of Markham isn’t mentioned in game, I don’t know that I’ve heard of it in any of the other Dragon Age installments except it might be somewhere in a codex entry? It just came up when I was looking up education in Thedas. The University of Markham is like the University. Orlesians like to talk like they have the best of the best but nah. The only other major University in canon is U of Ferelden, and that’s only a thing if you work it so Anora is the sole ruler of Ferelden in Dragon Age Origins.

*For those who haven’t played the Templar Route for DA:I, what I laid out in the last chapter is basically the mission, with a few variations from the plot because, here be fanfiction. What is laid out in this chapter follows along too like—after Envy messes with Inquisitor’s mind, you have to fight Red Templars in the Great Hall, go through Therinfal and save good-guy Templars so you have back up, the whole thing, blah blah. The whole time this is going on, there’s basically a health bar on the screen ticking down that represents the Templar’s you leave fighting in the Great Hall while you play rescue. If that health bar goes down too far, Barris dies, and his role is taken over by another Templar, Fletcher. Bailey isn't canon except for the fact that, when you complete this mission, Barris/Fletcher address their fellow Templars as "Brothers and Sisters" asking if they're down for following the Inquisition. So, lady Templar. Also, for those unfamiliar with my bby Barris, or his buddy Fletcher who I’ve never met because I refuse to let my child die, here:

http://dragonage.wikia.com/wiki/Delrin_Barris

http://dragonage.wikia.com/wiki/Fletcher
Happy Birthday!

Chapter Summary

Just your average day in Haven...except it isn't, not really...Ellie's got the day off but there's still a schedule? It's kind of rhymey, are they always like that? Everyone's so happy but kind of acting weird, excited but secretive and gosh its so confusing but there's so much fun!

Chapter Notes

WOW I'm so sorry, I haven't posted since last year!
Happy New Years! ;-)

Big shout out to Secret_Life_of_Fireflies for an idea marked and elaborated on in the End Notes!

Enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Ellie’d missed her bed in Haven, when she was just waking up after First-Day Eve she found herself appreciating it all the more. It was so soft, warm, even when the fire died her covers kept the night chill off her, but this morning there was the added warmth, the weight of someone laying against her.

Someones.

Cole and Sera. Ellie had wanted to try sleeping without potion for the first time since Therinfal, so Cole came to offer spiritual support—he could sort of join her in the Fade they thought, if he reached out like he did when he helped people while she slept—and Sera, for moral support—she wanted to be there if things did go sideways and Ellie needed comforting from her time in the Fade. Plus the Tavern had still been wild and packed to the brim—it was an actual group mission between Ellie and Sera to get into the Tavern to extract the Elf girl’s sleep clothing—Flissa staying open until either the booze ran out or the money, and while Sera could sleep through just about anything, there hadn’t been a place for her to sleep, her cot couldn’t be set up with everyone in the way. And she hadn’t been majorly fond of the idea of it just being Cole and Ellie anyway, so, Cole slept between Ellie and the wall, and Sera curled up on her other side, all in all, very cozy, and it’d been nice, she kind of worried it’d feel lonely sleeping by herself after so long with everyone always piling in together, so having company was sort of like a baby step of sorts.

First-Day Eve had been so, so much fun. So much dancing! Gosh, it’d been a blast, literally—Lady Josie arranged fireworks! Though…

Ahh!
Cremisius kissed her! Ellie! Like, yeah, they’d been on a date but still she had a hard time believing he’d asked her in the first place just— it was hands down the actual most amazing first date she’d ever been on.

“For him too,” Cole said softly. Oh, he was awake! Wait, right, he didn’t…he didn’t quite have the hang of sleeping, Ellie wasn’t sure he could sleep really. He was playing with one of her curls, gently but like a toy of sorts—he held it with some slack between pinching fingers and the root, and the tip of that curl pinched between the fingers of his other hand, he pulled ‘til what was between his hands was taut, then released to watch it spring back into shape. She’s pretty sure it fascinates him so much because it changes and goes back, she found it wild how very much and how often people could change their appearances, he’d been startled by the realization clothing and hairstyles weren’t permanently fixed—they were things that could be altered, removed entirely, and swapped out for something totally different. It took a very patient discussion to help him become comfortable enough with the idea that it was indeed safe to remove all of his clothes, so he could be taught bathing. The Iron Bull’d taken charge of that endeavor—in Varric’s stead, the Dwarf had been going to do so because he hadn’t liked the idea at all, that Ellie might, even for something wholly innocent and totally non-sexual, be in a situation where she would see Cole naked, let alone potentially have to touch naked Cole to help with the bathing process, though he didn’t much care for doing that himself either, he worried at just how much guidance Cole would need. But Bull didn’t have any hang ups, so, he worked out as a happy medium. “I like bathing, the Iron Bull makes it fun.”

Oh yeah, thoughts. Ellie smiled, “I’m glad,” she whispered back, “Thanks Cole, for staying with me.”

“Oh! You’re awake now though, I’m supposed to tell them—it’s my job!” Cole sounded excited about that.

“Your job?” Ellie asked, confused.

Cole smiled, nodding as he vanished from the bed, reappearing by her desk to collect his hat and things, he hadn’t wanted sleep clothes, he wasn’t comfortable swapping the clothes he came in out for something altogether new, even just for sleeping. Then he was gone to…tell someone she was awake? Huh. The light was rosy and golden, she’d gotten to sleep in a bit, Cassandra hadn’t come to wake her for prayer or anything, huh. Oh! Maybe she was um…occupied this morning. Gosh she and Cullen were so cute! She’d been blushing when dancing with the Commander! It was sweet! Sera stirred, hugging Ellie tighter as she mumbled nonsensically before words became a thing for her,

“Inky? You okay?” Sera mumbled sleepily, “Er, Cole kept you safe?”

“Mm-hmm,” she nodded, she thought she had, anyway, she couldn’t really remember her time in the Fade much with Cole, she didn’t feel like she’d gotten scared or anything, her mind felt rested.

“Good!” Sera said, squeezing Ellie tight as she nuzzled her head against Ellie’s face, gosh! Her new haircut was tickly! Ellie giggling got Sera started too.

There was a knock on her door before it opened and Marehis’s head poked through, “Good morning sweet girls, you sound happy, did you sleep well?”

“You bet!” Sera said as Ellie sat up and stretched yawning a bit as she nodded in agreement.
“Good morning Marehis! Oh!” Ellie gasped as the Elf woman threw the door open and entered the cabin, followed closely by Cassandra and Solas and Madam de Fer and Varric and gosh! Everyone! Dorian, Cole again, Thom! Her whole party, at least, not everyone in Haven, that’d be a bit much to fit in her cabin, it was going to be very cozy as it stood. “Good morning everyone!” she amended happily.

Cassandra came to sit on the edge of the bed, Sera tucked her legs up under her as she sat up to make room, and the Seeker reached out to tuck the curls hanging by Ellie’s face back behind her ear, “How are you feeling, Eleanor? No headaches still?” Ellie was beyond relieved to nod ‘yes’ hopefully those headaches were done full stop! "Good. And you slept pleasantly?"

"Uh-huh! I didn't need potion, and I didn't have any bad dreams at all!"

"I'm pleased to hear it," Cassandra said, taking Ellie's unmarked hand and squeezing it gently, "We thought perhaps you would enjoy worship and breakfast as a group. Does that suit?"

Ellie smiled, nodding.

The Iron Bull got the fireplace roaring, and everyone sat in a big kind-of circle on the floor, lining her bed, more circley in the more open space, Ellie sat with her back to the fire, between Bull and Marehis once the Qunari was seated.

And then every one of her party members joined hands with one another, Marehis and Bull offering theirs to Ellie.

“We thought perhaps, given it is the First of the year, we should start the year off with a focus on the future,” Cassandra explained. “We’ve discussed it as a group, Eleanor, and we wish to impart blessings, pray as a group with a unified focus.”

Ellie nodded, slipping her hands into Marehis’s and the Iron Bull’s gosh it was warm.

Cassandra bowed her head and closed her eyes, everyone following suit before the Seeker said, “Maker m-“ usually when Ellie heard her pray out loud she said ‘Maker most high’ but given it was a shared prayer with so many other beliefs in the mix, she nixed saying her god was the biggest one, “may we humbly beseech you. We thank you for all that has been given to us in this past year, and all that awaits us in the new. There are many in our numbers, with differing opinions and goals, but there is one, singular thing, we can agree upon, that we would ask of you in the coming year.” awe, yeah, didn’t matter what race or class or magical status her friends held—they all wanted to seal the Breach!, “Guard and protect Ellie, steel her in your hand, anoint her in the bounty of your love and wisdom, and spare her hardship and tribulation as only you can. May this coming year bring her many joys and triumphs. We ask that you bless her, in equal measure to the ways that you have blessed us by bringing her into our lives.”

Wh-…why were…this was…

“So let it be,” Andrasten’s in their midst said, while Solas and Marehis offered up “Agreed,” and Bull, a very serious, sincere, “Hell yeah.” Over the sound of Cole humming in agreement.

“You…gosh that’s,” Ellie’s throat felt tight, and her eyes were watery. She wasn’t sad and she wasn’t going to cry she didn’t think, but Maker that was an overload of kindness, she wasn’t sure why they were getting so very…openly affectionate in such a way, it was…everyone showed they cared and things, in loads of different ways, and it could be startling just on its own when she had one on one interactions with her friends, even her magic was reeling.
“Oh, da’vehnan,” Marehis pulled Ellie into her side in a sort of hug, before pressing a kiss to her hair.

“We’ve left her speechless,” Dorian announced, “and we’re only getting started—oof! I didn’t say anything you mongrel!” he snapped when Bull elbowed him.

“I will get the sewing kit, Sparky. Watch yourself,” the Qunari warned.

“Oh if only I could,” Dorian lamented, “What great fortune it must be to not be me, that you may gaze upon my splendor in all its glory. I, sadly, require a mirror to do so.”

"You’re a fan of using mirror-" the Iron Bull was cut off by, “Don’t go making word sex in front of Inky! She’s sixteen but she’s still Inky!” Sera gasped and slapped her hands over her mouth like she’d said something she shouldn’t have.

Oh! “Yeah, I am sixteen now, huh. Cool!”

Everyone was sort of staring at her like they were waiting to see something that might blow up in their faces, and then there was a mixture of relief and something like…pity? Dunno, it was very quick and a little confusing but—

“Sixteen-year-olds still require breakfast, so,” Marehis said, squeezing Ellie tight before she released her and rose to her feet, “Who wants to help me bring it in?”

“Me!” Ellie volunteered.

Marehis laughed at that, something rich and warm as she offered a hand up to Ellie asking, “Would that make you happy, da’len? Very well, come along.”

There was a cart waiting just out front under the watch of guards Ellie wished a happy First Day to, the ones that were on schedule to stand post while she slept, so Marehis freed them of their post and pushed the cart into the cabin and let Ellie help play waitress, passing out warm plates of food, it was very déjà vu-y to actual waitressing days as Ellie piled plates on her forearms so she could carry four at a time, and handing them off with the caution that “this plate is hot” so they’d let her set it before them instead of trying to take it in their own hands...though she wasn't going to have to face the choice between of having either a roof overhead or a full belly when they didn't tip her for her service, so it was even more fun than waitressing! She'd liked that job whenever she had it, got to meet so many different kinds of people, and gigs like that usually gave at least one meal a day...Inquisition was definitely her favorite thing on her resume though. All the meals, all the roofs, all the friends and interesting people she could ever hope to meet.

When she sat down to her own meal there was coffee! And pancakes, little bits of warm apple in them, gosh it was good, it was her favorite, even more than chocolate chips! They all chatted, talking about how fun the party had been last night, everyone felt...dunno, it was so much fun, everyone seemed really happy and excited for the day, though she supposed that made sense, it was First Day! A fresh start to an entire, brand new year! So far, it was going great!

“You and Krem have fun last night, Boss?” the Iron Bull asked.

Before she could even answer, Dorian was poking fun, “Why Eleanor that is a delightful shade of red.”

Oh! That made her blush more! Blah! “We had fun,” she said shyly, “it was really great. We went to Flissa’s and had hot chocolate, and then you saw us at the party—dancing was so much fun, thanks everyone! Lady Josie did an amazing job with everything, and gosh the fireworks were so pretty.” And then, “Cole, I didn’t see you any at the party last night, did you not want to come?”

“Holidays and hurts go hand in hand, you only hurt once—I came but you didn’t need me, so I left to find others who did. The Chantry scared you, Cremisius kind calm, he saw your hurt and helped you leave it healed. You don’t think the Chantry is going to swallow you up and lead you back to hurt, you think of your friends and fun and fireworks.”

Ellie nodded. “Thanks everyone, for last night. It was really really great. Is Lady Josie busy today? I’d like to thank her, gosh that must have been so much work!”

“She’ll be available later today, I’m sure,” Cassandra said as she put her breakfast plate on the steadily growing stack whoever finished last would put on the cart and return to Flissa’s. “I’ve something I need to see to now, Eleanor,” awe, ‘something I need to see to’ sounded like work, it was too bad she had to on First Day, “but I will see you shortly,” she rose up from her place in their circle to come over to Ellie, crouching to kiss her on the forehead, the Seeker’s eyes were alight with excitement and she was smiling which was just so pretty, gosh it was nice when Cassandra smiled, and said, “I hope you have a most pleasant day.”

“Thanks! You too!” Ellie said as the Seeker made to leave, “Try not to work too hard, okay? It’s First Day!”

Oh, that made Cassandra smile even more as she turned to look at Ellie from the door way, “I will try.”

Everyone began filtering out after that as they finished their breakfasts, and even though Thom did finish last…oh! She just barely thought it, and she wondered if thinking of holding it back would help hide it or not…hold…hold…how far away did he need to be?

Cole volunteered to take the cart back to Flissa’s. He hadn’t eaten but he’d sat with everyone still, waiting and waiting, and the moment Thom was putting the stack of plates on the cart—poof! Cole was where the handle was to push it, and he was off!

She was pretty sure, pretty super sure, he wanted to go see Maryden. She didn’t know if he had a crush on her exactly, Cole was…strange in that he was so much a Spirit, but he had a body that had things that conflicted with his basic design. He didn’t need to eat or sleep to keep functioning, but he could get hurt, bruise, bleed, and he felt pain from that sort of thing. And he was very calm, didn’t let his own emotions about things interfere with meeting the needs of others, it wasn’t a struggle for him to do so, it was what he was meant to do. So, he had a Human body, and his own range of emotions, he might not realize it but…well…

‘Cole and Maryden’ was officially on the relationship list. She had a list now! She’d always had a list like, mentally, but since Varric made her a little flippy parchment pad—wham! Lists! Lots of them! Oh! Speaking of.

“Varrie!” she caught him just as he was getting ready to leave, “Yeah, Tumbles?” he asked, stretching like he were still waking up for the day as he came to stand where she sat by the fire, just her and Marehis—she’d been sitting in the Iron Bull’s blind spot, she could have done this while he was still here but that just felt mean, wrong to use against him, even if it wasn’t meant in meanness or for something bad even.

“Here, in case you need it for reference,” she tore out the little sheet of parchment she’d written up their findings from their investigation yesterday. It wasn’t lying—it was sneaky, secret, she didn’t want anyone really knowing until things were settled, and they had sure solid guarantees. Maker it would be awful to dangle the possibility out there, only to have their efforts derailed and everything snatched away again.

“Thanks. I still need, uh—you know what,” he shook his head to negate that line of thought, instead, “let me get things rolling. This is big help, I’ll let you know when there’s more you can do. We got this, I have a good feeling, don’t worry about it,” he said, tucking the slip of paper away in his coat pocket before he kissed her on the forehead. So many of those today! Cassandra, now Varric, those just made her heart feel warm and toasty! And um…well Cremisius, when they went their separate ways, she’d kissed him goodbye and he kissed her forehead and that just! She’d been warm head to toe!

Anyway, so far the new year brought her all kinds of affection and there were no complaints from her…as long as people didn’t get like, sick or something, sharing their mouth germs…she was going to wash her forehead.

She did! Washed her face, brushed her teeth, it was just her and Marehis and that was so nice, it felt like a return to routine that she’d missed so so much!

“Are you excited for First Day, sweet girl?” Marehis asked as she…mostly played with Ellie’s hair it felt like, deciding what she wanted to do with it.

Big parties were the night before really but that didn’t mean the day couldn’t be fun, “Uh-huh! What’s on my schedule? Leliana made it sound like I don’t have anything to do when we came in yesterday?”

“True, you don’t have any work, but we do have a loose schedule to adhere to, if you’re up for it,” Marehis said, pulling at the curls just at her temples, and pulling them back, sectioning them off to braid.

Oh! No nodding, Marehis was working! Ellie had to stop herself and then, “Sure thing! No work is easy enough…um…I know you’re supposed to protect me and things, but, well I mean it’s a holiday and you never get a day off, do you thi—”

Marehis had worked to make two braids that met at the back of her hair, and she bound them there with a hair tie, stopping Ellie by putting her hands on her shoulders and squeezing, not painfully or anything but Ellie got the idea to shush it, and then, “Ellie, da’vehnan, this is my job, yes, but I do not wake up in the morning and lament having to set to task—I look forward to spending time with you, I love being so involved with your day-to-day. I got more than my fill of day’s off when Venatori infiltration kept me from returning to Haven and it…I do not long for another day off anytime soon, da’len. And what we’ve planned for today will be as fun and relaxing for me as it is for you, so cast off any worry and enjoy our day off. Alright?”

Well…yeah, she understood enjoying something all the more because the person you were with was having fun so, “Okay. Deal! What’s on first?”

“Dress first, warmly, very warmly!” Marehis insisted, pulling out some of Ellie’s practice clothing, and one of the wool-lined tunics and leggings—practice clothing on first, then her thicker clothes, then her overcoat, and her hat, and scarf and socks—three pairs! And her gloves! She had to get used to moving around in multiple layers, gosh she already felt super super warm, she sat on her bed while Marehis was helping her lace up her boots when someone knocked on her cabin door.
“Ahh,” Marchis said as she tied the last knot in her boots, “that would be your schedule bearer arriving.”

Schedule bearer?

“Good morning Maerhis, Ellie, I trust you’re having a pleasant First Day?”

“Cremisius!” Ellie greeted, popping up off the mattress to meet him as he came inside. Oh gosh, it made her blushy, but it was just Marehis…she was pretty sure the woman had eyes on her no matter where she went yesterday, it wasn’t like that was going to stop any time soon so…she got on tip toes to peck a quick kiss to the Tevinter man’s lips, his hands coming up to brace her elbows and he looked happy and that was definitely, definitely the makings of a good First Day—so far 9:42 was amazing. One for the books. Literally if Varric or somebody was ever going to write this down.

“The day has been lovely, though it is only beginning, something tells me it only gets better from here…” Marehis said like she were excited about some great secret. Everyone had seemed that sort of excited today, what was happening?

“Indeed it should,” Cremisius agreed, going to the hook by the door and getting Ellie’s cloak off of it before he came back to wrap it around her shoulders, pulling the hood over her hat covered head.

“I have like five layers on now,” Ellie said, mildly exasperated, she never bundled this much to go out!

“Well, Haven is quite the sight right now my lady,” Cremisius said as he made certain her cloak clasp was secure, “the temperature keeps dropping, nearing single digits, and it wouldn’t do for you to have to cut things short due to the chill. The chill, should in fact, be fun.”

…quite a sight? “What’s wrong with Haven?”

“Nothing at all,” he assured, “in fact it’s more of a case of something being right for Haven, at least for today.” And then he offered her a slip of parchment, “your schedule, Lady Herald.”

Huh, her days in Haven were always so full, she thought her schedules would look bigger than this, it was really a small piece of parchment with two…interesting sentences.

Morning has come, you’ve opened your eyes, go outside for your first surprise!

Stay in the gate, don’t stray too far,

if you need a break, stop by the bar!

What was even happening?! Gosh she was excited!

Cremisius offered her his arm, and when she accepted, he offered the other to Marehis, and that was just sweet, she didn’t have to keep a distance or try to be aloof or whatever and that was… nice. Yeah, there were probably…definitely going to be times she would want at least the illusion of total privacy with Cremisius, but she didn’t want Marehis to feel like now that things were going along like this, Ellie dating someone, that she didn’t want the woman around any longer. She would still get to be just as much a part of Ellie’s day as usual, for the most part. And it was sort of something that seemed like it would help make Ellie all the more safer, give Marehis some relief, to have her ward walking around with not just one, but basically two body guards on hand…or…arm.

Oh, but that did little to stop the assault waiting just beyond her cabin door.

They did little more than close the door, feet crunching in the snow underfoot because…huh, Haven wasn’t clear-pathed like it usually was, no one had shoveled up the nights snowfall, everything was covered in footprint-dotted white. Anyway, they were a bare half foot away from the safety of her cabin walls, when something hit Ellie right in the stomach.

And then two more, her chest, one at her knees, in her peripheral she saw similar could be said of Cremisius, Marehis—

Snowballs.

Seeker Cassandra Pentaghast, Commander Cullen Rutherford, Lady Josephine Montilyet, and Spymaster Leliana…huh, good spymaster, secretive, Ellie didn’t even know her last name…they stood, lined up to block the path forward from Ellie’s cabin, armed with snowballs.

“Good morning, Eleanor,” Leliana greeted, smiling brightly as she worked a snowball in her hands, packing it tight, “Having a pleasant First Day?” Cullen asked.

Ellie’s mouth was hanging open, corners of her mouth straining with her surprise and the urge to smile like a total loon as she brushed snow off her chest, “I am.”

“I do hope you’ll forgive us our bit of fun but…well, there only more where that came from, my lady,” Lady Josephine said, awe, gosh she was so excited, like it were some great mischief! Cute!

And now no one was on anyone’s arm because everyone was arming themselves! Snowball fight? More like snowball war!

“Reinforcements!” Cassandra called out—wasn’t sure why she needed more people, she had a pile of snowballs—proper pile of them clustered together until they reached her hips!

‘Something I must see to’, huh? Oh, Cassandra was going down!

Ahh! No she wasn’t! No she wasn’t!

Because more snowball fighters appeared that demanded attention—everyone hurling snow at each other with wild abandon, she didn’t think there were teams? Were there teams? She was throwing at whoever she could hit!

The Iron Bull! Oh he got a snow ball to the stomach, and it melted almost as soon as it made contact! And then Madam de Fer was out in the midst of it all and—

Every single one of her party, everyone she knew in Haven—Flissa, Seg, Healer Adan—the Chargers! And the countless people Ellie…lots of them she knew their faces from always being around Haven, and their Templars, the rebel Mages—ahh! This was the only sort of war they should be fighting!

The Inquisition was having a snowball fight*!
There was a solid team of sorts—Ellie, Cremisius, Marehis, and Lady Josie, she got pulled in because Ellie just wasn’t leaving sweet Josie to fend for herself. Though Ellie’d never really seen Josie outside the Chantry much, maybe two or three times the entire time she’d been in the Inquisition, she was really glad the Antivan woman had a proper coat, it was pretty—a thick, purple coat with a fur lined hood. Anyway, solid team! They ran the paths of Haven dodging snowballs and hurling them at everyone they could, as fast as they could. Ultimately they had a goal, or at least Ellie did—lots of fun, so so much fun, but so much of it and yeah, her little schedule note offering a place to catch a break was yes, needed, so they worked their way to Flissa’s, and Ellie was pretty sure she’d been knocked head to toe with snowballs, her arms needed a little break from throwing and she was still warm from being so bundled up but that didn’t exactly make the air any less chilled or dry, so, breathing break!

They stumbled into Flissa’s, though the moment Ellie laid a hand on the door she heard several calls for ceasefire—everyone around their team started focusing on each other instead since the Tavern was apparently like a base or a safe zone—Flissa rushed in after them, stomping her feet to clear her shoes of snow, shivering as she rushed to the fire place to stoke the flames just a bit more. They could still hear everyone’s snow fight still raging on outside, but Maker it was so toasty and nice in the Tavern, the whole room smelled like cinnamon!

“Are you having fun, my lady?” Flissa asked through chattering teeth.

Took a sec to catch her breath enough then, “I am!...It’s…great!...You?” oh, Cremisius put a hand on her back, rubbing between her shoulder blades, that was nice.

“Oh yes, it’s all so very exciting! Now, lady Ellie, would you like something warm to drink? Solas came in just before the fight, brewed a pot of milk tea himself that I’ve been keeping warm, he said you like it?”

Milk tea…oh! The super yummy cinnamon tasting tea he made when she was so sad about Varric, and Marehis being gone! “Gosh yeah that’s so, so good!”

“I would appreciate a cup,” Lady Josie said through chattering teeth, hugging herself as she shivered.

Ellie went and hugged the Antivan woman tight, rubbing her arm the way Cassandra or Marehis sometimes did when she was cold. Lady Josie blushed, smiling as she wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders to hug her back, saying, “Gracias, Ellie. Pelear con bolas de nieve es divertido—pero hace tanto frio!” Snowball fighting is fun, but it’s so cold!

“Muy frio,” Ellie agreed. Then she remembered she’d wanted to say, “Oh! I wanted to thank you, so much, for the party!”

Lady Josie looked startled, mouth working to find words, had...had no one else thanked her? Had she not been expecting to be thanked? But Cremisius said,

"Last night was a total blast," he agreed. Oh! Blast like fireworks! Gosh that was a good one, and he smiled when it made Ellie laugh.

And Marehis said, “Yes, thank you Lady Montilyet, your First-Day Eve bash was delightful.”

“Oh!” Lady Josie said as if they’d explained something. She smiled and said, “Yes! I mean, you’re so very welcome, it was a pleasure to arrange!”
Flissa got them toasty inside and out with tea and a warm fire, and then it was back out!

Gosh it was so much fun! Everyone was in high spirits, the levity from their game was contagious, big time, all of Haven was catching…and throwing!

Especially once Ellie found the Iron Bull.

"Imekari!" he called out in greeting before he knelt before her, "B-Quad?" he asked.

Oh gosh...did he mean? "B-Quad!" Ellie agreed.

He did mean! B-Quad was taking over this snowball fight, Ellie getting to ride astride the Qunari's shoulders, and Cremisius, Marehis and Lady Josie took cover behind him, making snowballs to be passed up to Ellie to throw as hard and as fast as she could, raining powdery terror down on the unsuspecting victims...citizens...of Haven!

"Shit, shit! Tumbles teamed up with Tiny! This is not a drill!" Varric shouted in warning so his little team of Sera and Dorian.

"Shite!" Sera squeaked.

"The fool!" Dorian declared him, "He'll make Andraste's Herald mad with power!"

Ellie was held on to the Iron Bull's horns as she threw her head back and gave off her best, most evil, "Mwahahahaha!"

"Bow before your snow gods!" The Iron Bull commanded.

She might be just mildly going mad with the power, but it was just snowball power.

Until a few minutes later when Cassandra whistled sharply, holding up her arms to get everyone’s attention, and the Iron Bull knelt so Ellie could get down—they'd practiced! If the Iron Bull got low enough, Ellie could just lean all the way back and hang off his shoulders, back to back with him for a moment and stretch out her arms, find firm footing...on...her hands haha, and sort of somersault off of him. There was a sort of ripple effect across Haven as everyone threw what they had left in their hands and came to a breathless stop. Ellie was down near Haven gate, but the Iron Bull bound off to go inform anyone who couldn't hear Cassandra near the Chantry, signal them that they were done, and there was a shout that sounded like Solas somewhere behind her, maybe near the Tavern?

“Thank you, everyone, for participating,” Cassandra called out, holding out her hand toward Ellie, gesturing for her to join her, so Ellie came close and took the offered hand, ending up pulled into the Seeker holding her, arm around her shoulders, “Did you enjoy our fun, Eleanor?”

Oh gosh, it felt like lots of eyes were on her, and she nodded, sort of shrinking into the Seeker’s hold as she assured her, “Oh, golly, yeah...it was really great!” she looked out across the faces of those surrounding them, “Thanks everyone!”

There was a chorus of pleasant wishes and insistence that it’d been no trouble to have some fun on the holiday directed at her, and Cassandra called that there would be warm drink in the mess hall for all to enjoy.

“Except,” Cassandra said to Ellie, “for you. Are you well, Eleanor? You’ve more to your schedule today if you’re up for it.”
“I’m great!” Seriously, there was more? This was already just! like! The actual best day ever!

“Excellent,” Cassandra said, looking to Cremisius as he approached, “Lieutenant.”

The Tevinter man handed Ellie a second slip of paper,

_Happy new year, your first battle’s won!_

_But your day has only just begun.

It’s time to eat, so here’s a clue,

_the Charger’s camp would be glad to see you!_

“Really?!” Ellie asked excitedly, grasping Cremisius’s forearm.

“If you’d do us the honor of joining us for an afternoon repast,” he offered smoothly with a bow, and he smiled when Ellie started laughing, he turned the forearm in her grasp so he was holding her arm in hand and pulled her closer, pressed up against his chest plate.

“Hmm…” she pondered the offer, “I dunno, see, I really only wanna go if a certain Charger’s going to be there. You might know him—tall, funny, and gosh he’s just so handsome?”

Krem nodded, as if thinking it over, before confirming, “Oh he’ll definitely be there.”

It almost felt mean, but she meant it in good humor, “Awe yay, The Iron Bull’s coming!”

“Maker help me, you are twins,” Cremisius lamented laughingly, hugging her tighter before they started heading for the Charger’s camp.

“Oh, did you think I meant you? Gosh, that’s silly. I mean tall and funny fit perfect, but I would’ve said ‘the handsomest’.”

“You would’ve huh?” he chuckled, kissing her hair.

They went to the clearing that the Chargers usually gathered in for meals, most were gathered already, some still brushing snow off of themselves, “Small one,” Skinner came bounding up to them, “the snow fighting pleased you? You are having a happy day?”

Everyone seemed to be very concerned with Ellie having a nice time. “It did and I am! Did you have fun?” she hoped so.

“It was satisfying,” the Elf woman agreed. So. She guessed that meant ‘fun’ for Skinner.

“Good!”

“Hell yeah it was good boss, that was a great fight,” the Iron Bull enthused as he arrived, “glad you could join us. What’s this I hear about Krem being the handsomest Charger?” Gosh his ears were good!

“Hey!” Rocky called out from where he was working with Dalish to get their bonfire going, “What about me?”
“You’re still very handsome, promise. Cremisius is my favorite though,” oh gosh she couldn’t help laughing when Grim planted a fist against the center of his chest and toppled backwards to play dead, like her words had so badly wounded the Human man.

“You know, I’m just going to accept it,” Stitches said, from where he was crouched near the fire, nodding, “it’s time to pass the torch on to the new generation. Now I can be valued by my accomplishments rather than my godlike physique. Won’t have to spend so much time keeping it fit, maybe I can focus on needlepoint again—” and then at the looks he was getting, “you think Bull called me Stitches because I stitch you bastards up? No. It has nothing to do with my amazing Healing abilities. Orlesian knot, feather stitch, seed stitch, I can stitch it all! I could make you a damn flower in your wounds if you lot weren’t such crybabies.”

“Oh quit your own bellyaching,” Dalish said, then, “Ellie!” she greeted warmly, coming in for a hug, “It is so wonderful to see you again! Come, have a seat you two,” she let out a little giggling sound as she looked between Ellie and Cremisius, then gestured for them to find a place around the fire.

Lunch with the Chargers was a total blast! She’d missed them when she was away—she was a little nervous for some reason, she…well the Chargers were the closest thing Cremisius had to family, at least right here, so she really hoped they approved of her for him, didn’t dislike that he was dating the Herald of Andraste. But everyone seemed happy, they were poking enough fun to leave them both red faced. But Ellie was just going to blame that on Dalish’s cooking than the Iron Bull’s making fun—had she gotten around to kissing Cremisius’s entire face, gosh! That wasn’t any of his business!—the ‘Archer’ made this mix of rice and chicken and some kind of nuts, cashews the Iron Bull said, and it was all in this great, super spicy sauce! It was so good! Even better when, “Elgar’nan, leave them alone you vultures,” Dalish reprimanded the Iron Bull and Mister Stitches after so much of their teasing.

“Sorry, Boss,” Bull and Stitches chorused to Ellie.

When they were all finished with lunch, the Chargers had something to do, a mission of some sort? But Cremisius was given leave of whatever it was, the Iron Bull waved them off, and the Tevinter man walked Ellie back to her cabin in case she wanted to freshen up—brush her teeth—before he handed her another slip of paper.

Now you’ve recharged, it’s time to relax,
You’ve got a few options—to bathe or to nap!
If it's the first you would prefer report to the Cabin of Madam de Fer!
Maker!

They meant a bath, like an actual bath in a tub and everything! Madam de Fer had a metal tub that, while it required a great deal of time to heat and fill, could be soaked in. She was really going to share it with Ellie today?

“Okay, what…what’s going on with everyone?” Ellie asked as Cremisius pushed open Haven’s gate and they began up the now shoveled path, “I mean…this…everyone’s being like, super extra nice? I mean is there something about First Day I don’t know?”
“Everyone just wants to make sure you have a great start to your year, you know, there’s all sorts of superstitions about the first things you do in the new year dictate what the year holds for you. Kissing on the first, for introducing affection into your life, winning your first battle will bring you victory, I think who you eat your first meal with is important too, because it means your relationship with who you eat with will be strong or something, first person to cross your threshold will influence the year you’re about to have—”

“Cremisius Aclassi you total sneak!” Ellie laughingly accused, as she turned to face him, walking backward as they passed Varric's tent, “Our first kiss being the first kiss of the new year—that’s gotta like double that superstition! And crossing the threshold—’I just gotta do a security sweep’ my butt!”

Yikes! Her actual butt! Cremisius had wrapped his arms around her to sort of guide her so she didn’t walk into anything or fall, and he swatted her butt playfully as he chuckled, “I did need to do a security sweep miss Smarty Pants, but yeah, kind of worked in my favor I hope.”

She stopped and popped up on tip toe to press a kiss to his lips. “Hmm…you know, I have a feeling it might have. Maybe, possibly.”

That made him smile then his hand were in hers he whirled her around so she was facing forward, holding her close as they walked up the stairway to the triangle of Solas, Adan, and Madam de Fer’s cabins.

Dorian’s as well now, he was just leaving, carrying...something, Ellie wasn’t sure what, it seemed like he heard them laughing and she just caught the glimpse of something he quickly hid behind his back, big smile plastered on his face as he greeted,

“Ahh, if it isn’t the lovely Ellie and her dashing Lieutenant. I was just making leave so you might bathe in peace.”

“Oh thanks—” she was saying, gosh he was off in a hurry, nodding and backing away, keeping his hands behind his back, nearly stumbling over his own feet, chuckling nervously as he disappeared around the corner, heading on the path toward the Chantry.

That...she...she was steadily giving up on finding out just what was up with everyone today. First kiss, first meal, first battle made sense as superstitions, but first ‘strange evasive maneuver witnessed’ didn’t seem like a thing.

“I’ll be back around to pick you up after. Relax and enjoy okay?” Cremisius left her with as he knocked on the door to announce their arrival.

Oh! There Marehis was! She was with Madam de Fer! Ellie’d wondered where she got off to when they went their separate ways for lunch...had she eaten? Oh good, she had lunch with Solas since Ellie was ‘well in hand’—she trusted Cremisius not to let anything happen to her for the most part, and with the Iron Bull watching over her, Marehis could get a bite to eat and leave Ellie to her time with the Chargers. Now, she was pouring some kind of oil—lavender!—into the tub, using a hand to stir the water up.

Maker. The tub was full of steaming warm water, and she got to strip out of all those layers—she’d been bundled so tight there were impressions on her skin, it felt good to get everything off and Madam de Fer helped keep her hair from dipping into the water, holding it while Ellie climbed in and sat back, hair hanging safely over the back of the tub and gosh, the water was so relaxing and she...
“You fell asleep. That isn’t always safe in water, but the watcher watches, wakes. She’ll make sure you’re ready in time.”

Cole? That…her mind felt kind of fuzzy, but in a pleasant way, like nothing at all pressed or worried her thoughts, everything calm and quiet and soothing…

“Da’vehnan? It’s time to wake up sweet girl.”

What had she just been doing? Oh, bath, bathing…had she fallen asleep?

Time…something about being on time for something?

Something fancy, Ellie guessed. She wasn’t supposed to put her other things back on, Madam de Fer…gosh, she’d gotten Ellie clothing to wear, like, herself! Vivienne would hear absolutely no argument, whatsoever! It was…a little embarrassing, the woman had gotten her underthings, lacy and white underpants and matching breast band that was different from what she usually wore to keep everything decent and comfortable, it had straps for her shoulders and the front was more um, there were cups? A brassiere, Madam de Fer called it as Marehis helped with clasping it closed in the back. But it was apparently necessary that her underthings be white so they didn't show through her clothing. Madam de Fer helped her into a long-sleeved white linen dress that fell past her knees, it went on over her head and closed up the back with little pearl buttons, and it was cinched at the waist with a bow, and where Marehis had bound two braids where they met at the back of Ellie’s hair, Madam de Fer tied another white bow to cover the hair tie already in place. And then there were shoes, gosh she really hoped she didn’t get this all dirty! They were white too, with just a little bit of thick heel on them.

“My dear girl, I believe you’re ready, you look simply breathtaking,” Madam de Fer said.

“You really really didn’t have to do this, Vivienne—”

“Nonsense! Hush child, or I’ll be wildly insulted—what you mean in humility I will take as insult, that you dislike the clothing I’ve secured for you. It is a gift, Eleanor, accept it and think nothing more. It is only traditional as you're of age, it is custom for young people to wear white on such a day.”

Really? That was nice, and so sweet of her to think of. “Thanks, it's all so beautiful,” Ellie assured her.

Cremisius returned, knocking on the cabin door, and when Ellie went to meet him, he smiled warm,

“You look amazing, Ellie. Are you ready for the main event?” he asked, holding out what she supposed was the final slip of her schedule.

All dressed up and nowhere to go?
Your escort certainly won’t let it be so!
Take his lead, he knows the way, the path to where you’ll end your sweet day!

So she linked arms with her 'escort' and asked, “Alright, Cremisius, where are we going?”

“Oh no El, that’s not how this works—you’ll just have to wait ’til we get there,” he said, leading her down the path toward Flissa’s Tavern.

And then to Haven’s gate, where he walked them right up to the doors before U-ing them back around to head back up the stairs.

Only to turn left at Varric’s tent and follow the path up to the Chantry.

They…that…what? They’d gone such a crazy route, much longer than the itty bitty path between Madam de Fer’s cabin and the Chantry.

And then Cremisius said something…she wasn’t sure. She’d been getting well wishes all day. “Happy First Day!” from everyone around Haven, and for a second, she thought that’s what he meant, that he’d gotten his words somehow confused and mixed up when trying to say them as he drew her close and whispered,

“Happy Birthday, Ellie.”

And then the Chantry doors swung open like his words had cast a spell.

Words that were painted on a banner hanging high, in the center of the Chantry’s great hall, words called out by every occupant therein—Marehis, her advisors, her party, the Chargers, Scout Harding, Flissa, Seggrit, Harritt and Dennet, and Healer Adan!

Happy Birthday Ellie!

“Happy…what?” she asked, equal parts excited and confused.

“Happy Birthday, sweet girl!” Marehis repeated, coming forward out of the mass gathered just inside the Chantry, reaching to take Ellie’s unmarked hand since Cremisius held the other.

“You’re sixteen today, yes?”

“Y-yeah I guess, but—”

“Then, it is your birthday, da’vehn! The day that marks when you came to exist in the world, the anniversary of which, is of course, a matter of celebration!” she explained.

… “Oh gosh, that’s so sweet but…well I mean, what about everyone else? I’m so grateful all of you were born, shouldn’t we celebrate those days too?” oh Maker, that’d be so much fun! People should do that! Celebrate the date of birth of those they loved!

“El,” Cremisius gently explained, “everyone celebrates their birthdays—” oh, someone had already thought of that then? Good!

Oh. Oh gosh she…she hadn’t realized—

Oh!

Oh she was so glad this dress had pockets. Parchment pad time!

“I want every single one of you to tell me your birthdays! Right now! Cremisius! Then Marehis! Then I’m turning on you lot left to right—mine, so just! Stay put!”

“You heard the Birthday girl,” the Iron Bull called out.

Cremisius told her that his birthday was in Justinian!* Awe! He was a sweet summer baby! The 31st, that was the last day of the month so, that would be easy enough to remember!
Varric gave her a significant look, oh! Did he need—‘seventeen’ she mouthed when she was certain Cremisius wasn’t looking and the Dwarf gave her an exasperated look that said ‘Shit, I can’t do age math!’ well! Gosh! Okay…in 9:42 he’d be 18 so…42 take away 18 is 24, so he was born Justinian 31st, 9:24! She held up her two fingers, clinched her hand, and then four and Varric nodded.

Marehis next—gosh hers was in Guardian! That! That was so soon! Just next month! The 12th!

Cassandra was a winter baby too! Drakonis 5th! And she did not find it nearly as funny as everyone else that the Pentaghast had been born in the month literally named ‘Dragon’.

“It is…tradition, after a fashion. A great deal of my family hold Drakonis birthdays. If I were one to take such things as great import, you would not see me the whole of the month, I would be locked away writing Birthday well wishes.”

Varric got a horrible glare shot his way when he slapped Cullen on the back, "Damn, tough break—I thought that was gonna turn into Seeker announcing nonstop,” he winked twice, "the entire month of Justinian.”

Nonstop…Justinian—oh groady! He couldn't count back years in his head but he could count backward nine months just fine for his sex jokes!

"Varric...please do not drive me to murder you on Eleanor's birthday," the Seeker seethed.

"I'll kill him for you if it suits," Cullen offered.

That did seem to tempt the Nevarran woman, "Once she sees 'hey you', I cannot think of a thing you could do that Eleanor would not forgive you for, so..." she smirked, "Watch yourself, Varric.”

...'hey you'?

Huh. Okay, birthdays! Dwarves didn’t celebrate the day of their birth, but the day that could be a week or more later, when they were officially named. So Rocky and Varric had Naming days! Scout Harding though, her family celebrated her birth the day of, that was cool!

Solas was the weirdest about it, he got this blank look on his face and then had to think really really really hard because it’d apparently been a long time since he took notice of the day. Solace! Maybe that was why he was named Solas? Though it was spelled different and 'Solas' was Dalish for Pride so…probably not?

Getting everyone's birthdays written down helped her kind of...she wasn’t sure what to do with all this. It’d been overwhelming to have everyone come together to pray over her—this? Having a big party with everyone she loved just because she was born? Having…Maker, everything they’d done today, from the moment she woke up until Cremisius led her to the Chantry…that! That was all part of it! Everyone had come together and worked so hard to make the entire day special and fun and!

Cole…he didn’t have a birthday, he thought—they’d get him one! If she could pick her birthday, so could he! He came and hugged her then, oh, yeah, she kind of needed it, “They’re overwhelmed too,” he murmured quietly to her, ”—more and more all the time, they love you so much and this lets them express it, it’s a release. Let them. Enjoy it, it’s as much for them as it is for you.”

“We’re getting you a birthday mister! Because I love you too and you being around should be celebrated!”

Maker, everybody getting together to wish her well wasn’t the half of it!

There were games! The rug that lined the entire great hall was gone, at first she thought maybe it needed cleaned after last nights festivities, and maybe it did but in the center of the hall, chalk had been used to draw a huge, long hopscotch grid that ended in 16—everyone played or at least took a turn, even Madam de Fer! And she somehow managed to make it seem elegant! And then there was ‘Pin the tail on the Fennec’! A large drawing of a Fennec hang on one of the pillars lining the hall and Cassandra blindfolded Ellie, handed her the ‘tail’ and took her by the shoulders to spin her ‘round and ‘round till she was a thrilling sort of dizzy, pushing her in the direction of the picture.

Tails, anatomically, were not meant to go on the Fennec’s cheek. Face cheeks, anyway, the Iron Bull called out, “Wong cheeks, Boss!”

Oh har! He didn’t do much better, his ended up in the top right-hand corner of the parchment nowhere near the Fennec! Poor thing didn’t have a tail full stop!

Then there was tag! A team of ‘It’ and ‘Not it’ to be chased! Ellie started out on the ‘not it’ team—

And by the time they were done, she was breathless and happy and not…gosh they’d had the run of the Chantry save for the War Room, slipped down into the basement, in the dungeons—not to where the cells were, just in the hall, and she’d been so busy chasing Cremisius after Leliana tagged her ‘It’, she hadn’t…she hadn’t been scared at all! It’d been so much fun and somehow it helped, she wasn’t scared anymore, that if she had to go down there ever again, it wouldn’t petrify her.

And then they went into the War Room.

It was time for ‘cake and presents’ Lady Josie said when she rejoined them after disappearing for a moment.

She’d been lighting these little white candles. Sixteen of them, planted in a large rectangular cake that spelled out another wish of Happy Birthday Ellie! in the frosting, the cake-candle light was the only thing that illuminated the War Room just now and,

“In a moment, you’re to make a wish, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, taking Ellie’s hand in hers and squeezing, “and then you’ll blow out the candles. Doing so will carry your wishes to fruition, it is believed.”

In a moment, the moment occupied by singing, a crazy mix of those who were genuinely succeeding at staying in key, Madam de Fer, Lady Josie, Leliana, Sera, Marehis—those who were trying their absolute best, and those who were really hamming it up, playing air instruments to accompany their off-key levity like Rocky and Grim (sans vocals).

“Happy Birthday to you, Happy Birthday to you! Happy Birthday dear Elllieeee! Happy Birthday tooooo yooooooou!”
“Close your eyes and make a wish, Inky!” Sera enthused.

"For yourself, Tumbles," Varric was quick to intone, "its your birthday."

So she did,

_I wish…I wish we could always be like this—happy and safe and together!_

And then she took the deepest breath she could and blew at her candles, it took two extra little puffs to get them all, but she did it!

While Commander Cullen set about getting the lamps lit in the room again, Marehis helped Lady Josie get all the candles out of the cake and then it was sliced up and divided among them and it was so, so good! Chocolate with sweet, creamy icing and it was just the best kind of cake she’d ever had she was pretty sure!

And then, it was time for presents. Piles that were stacked on either side of where the now empty cake platter sat.

That…it was all so much already! She didn’t need—

“El, everyone gets presents, this is all standard stuff,” Cremisius assured her, oh, There’d been this sort of rising and falling wave of just pure overwhelming…being overwhelmed. Like being cast into the ocean without a single clue how to swim! She knew how to swim but that was beside the point! She sort of shrank back, toward the door, and she hadn’t realized it but she’d gotten just a little teary, Cremisius wiping under her eye with his thumb.

“Think of it as your due, Ellie,” Dorian offered haughtily, “it is your coming of age after all. Go with it.”

So…okay. She supposed maybe that was alright then. But she was so, so getting everyone back! She’d have to figure out how to get presents! Maybe Madam de Fer would help, she knew a lot of shopping things…

So…so did everyone else. Oh Maker. They sat Ellie down in a chair before the War Table and there was a great deal of shoving involved to take up their gifts and bring them to her, though Flissa and Seggrit didn’t need caught up in the mix—they’d made her birthday cake as her present from them, gosh that was sweet…literally! Neither did the Chargers, their contribution had been their mysterious ‘mission’. They’d all pitched in to help clean up from last night’s party, and then helped Lady Josie prepare the Chantry for Ellie’s Birthday bash! Gosh that was so nice of them!

Cassandra (after elbowing Varric out of the way to get to Ellie) offered her a small, rectangular package first, wrapped in brown parchment paper Ellie carefully pulled away to reveal, oh wow! A book! It…there…there wasn’t a title or anything, it was bound in unnamed, purplish leather with a pretty sigil, it sort of like a lotus flower on its cover,

“It will only open to your hand,” Cassandra assured her quietly.

Cool! It did sort of zip something secure across her magic as she lifted the cover to peek inside and…huh. It…it was blank. Nothing was written inside the pages of parchment at all. And then, “It is a journal, Eleanor. Made to be written in by you, filled with whatever you see fit. Journaling might offer you a way of documenting things you’d like to look back on and remember fresh, or to process through thoughts and feelings in a tangible fashion.”

Oh gosh, for her to write in? Journaling sounded great. “Oh wow, this is so cool! Thank you, so so much Cassandra, I love it!” she said as she hugged the woman in thanks. Cassandra looked so incredibly relieved to hear that. “I’m pleased, Eleanor.”

Varric was next, offering her a package that looked similar to Cassandra’s, just a bit thinner, and there was no zip of magic to ward it shut, it was bound in brown leather with a title emblazon across the cover in gold lettering.

The Amazing Adventures of Russel the Horse

by Varric Tethras

Ahh! Ellie couldn’t help her excited squeak, “Varric! You wrote me a book about Russel!”

“Started on it a while back, uh, after our first stint in the Hinterlands,” he admitted, “But I made sure er…its your reading level Tumbles, Sparkler helped me with making sure of that before I sent it off for binding.”

“I love it so much, I can’t wait to read it!” oh she really couldn’t! She was so bundling up to go visit Russel and read it to him when she had the chance! She set the book down carefully on the War table and gave Varric a hug.

Sera made her a sweet little bracelet of braided thread—she wore a matching one! Scout Harding too! Friendship bracelets Sera said! Oh that was so great—gosh, she seemed shy about her present too, and Ellie was pleased to tell her she absolutely loved the idea of friendship bracelets!

“Lacey’n’ me made more of these for…well,” Sera explained. “Spymaster vetted some people for me on the down low, all they know is I picked ‘em for the Friends of Red Jenny, servant staff and people like that—” she looked to Scout Harding, “And I’ll be handing them out to a trusted few in your different camps,” the Dwarf woman assured.

“—so, you’ll always know it’s a trusted Friend handlin’ your things, or you can ask for help from if you see them wearing one of these,” Sera finished, tapping the friendship bracelet on her own wrist.

Oh that…that was so much peace of mind! Sera! Lace! “You two are brilliant!” Ellie enthused as she hugged the Elf girl and then Scout Harding tight, “You’re just the best, thanks!”

And the Iron Bull took that as a lead in for his present. They would match as well.

After the dragon was slain in the Hinterlands, he’d taken the tip of one of it’s teeth, halved it, and had the halves set into rings—one for her pinkie, and one for his! The bit of curved, pointed half tooth cast in obsidian rested with the flat of the cut portion laying against and set into the silvery metal, and there were little pink stones on either side of the tooth.

“Qunari don’t do strong commitments to anything outside of our roles, our work, in the Qun,” the Iron Bull explained as he knelt to be level with her, offering her ring, “But when we want to signify commitment to another person—you wanna say you’re dedicated to someone—you share half a dragon’s tooth. Sort of creates a physical connection, no matter what happens, you’ve got something that says I’ve always got your back.”

Oh! Big hug! Ellie wrapped her arms around his neck, squeezing tight as he hugged her back, hand carefully running along her hair, and when they pulled away from one another, “I’ve always got your back too!” she promised, wrapping her new ring clad pinkie finger around his ringed pinkie finger. “Thanks so much, the Iron Bull. I really really love it.”

“Glad to hear it, Imekari…hmm,” he was looking at her dress, “I guess sixteen is your coming of age, you still okay with Imekari?” he seemed to consider it a moment… “You’re more like Ashkaari now, if uh, you know, take magic out of account.”

Huh. “Ashkaari?”

“‘One who thinks’, you’d either be on your way to joining some branch of the Ben-Hessrath, or the priesthood, a philospher. Things like that.”

“Oh gosh, that’s so sweet,” she said, her face felt warm as she admitted shyly, “…but um, yeah, if you wanted to keep calling me Imekari…that’d be okay with me.”

The Iron Bull chuckled as he rested his hand on her head, “Be okay with me too, Imekari.”

She thought the clothing Madam de Fer had given her to wear for her party was the woman’s offer of a Birthday present, but nope, apparently not.

Vivienne handed Ellie a flatish rectangular velvet box, which was enough to make her nervous, but oh gosh, she popped open the box to find two silvery decorative combs, pretty blue gemstones set between leaves engraved along the spines.

“I saw them in this charming little shop in Val Royeaux, and I knew you just had to have them my dear,” Vivienne said, raising a hand to smooth against Ellie’s hair. “They’ll be very fetching I think.”

“They’re so beautiful Madam de Fer, thank you so much!”

Vivienne patted Ellie’s back when she hugged her. “It was my pleasure, darling.”

Marehis was warm with excitement as she came and gave Ellie a hug, awe! That was a present in and of itself, everyone really could have just hugged her and called it a day! But when the Elf woman pulled away, she reached her hands behind her neck to fiddle with something before…huh Ellie’d noticed the thin silver chain tucked down under her clothing, but she removed it now to reveal it held a charm, a tree like the great Oaks that Ellie saw in the middle of Alienages.

“My family did not live in a city until my great-great Grandmother was sent from her clan—they’d a Keeper already, and she, an apprentice, so when my ancestor was revealed to have magic, she had to leave, find another clan. What she found, was a handsome City Elf, kind and compassionate to a stranger passing through an unfamiliar place. She found herself coming back more and more often, and he gifted this to her, so that she could take a piece of the city with her when she was away, and eventually she decided to stay, permanently. They married, and while they had a son, she passed the necklace on to his wife, and she to her eldest daughter, then she to her daughter, my mother, and when I left home, my mother gave it to me,” she raised a hand to cup Ellie’s cheek, thumb smoothing along Ellie’s cheek, “Now, my sweet, sweet girl, I would like to pass it on to you.”

But! But she wasn’t— “Marehis that’s so incredibly kind of you but—gosh I mean don’t you, you know… I mean you’re awful young and you might still…you know, have a daughter someday you’ll want to give this to, I couldn’t possibly—!”

“You are my Da’len-Da’vehnan—child of my heart, there is no ‘might still’ about it. Would you see me break my own family tradition and not pass this along to my first daughter just on the off chance I might have a child of my blood someday? No matter what is to come, da’len, I will always consider you as such. This is yours, to keep and pass along as you see fit.”

That! But! She really…Ellie threw her arms around Marehis’s neck, hugging her as tightly as she could, and she was so not crying! Okay she was! But she wasn’t sad, just, Maker, overwhelmed, everything about today was, overwhelming in a great, fantastic, amazing way. Marehis sighed contentedly, hugging Ellie back, she had to slip her arms out from between their chests and Ellie could feel the woman’s hands and the cool metal of the chain against the back of her neck as she clasped it securely to stay there before wrapping her arms around Ellie’s shoulders.

“I love you so much,” Ellie whispered.

“I love you too, sweet girl.”

Marehis stayed at Ellie’s side as Solas came to kneel before her. “With Marehis’s permission, I offer something of an addition,” he said, offering up a little silver charm that he clasped in place, linking in to the loop at the top of the Vhenadahl charm that the necklace’s chain was threaded through. The charm, as it laid in Solas’s hand, looked like an owl in flight, it’s wings crossed before its body, oh! Owls were used to represent Andruil, the Dalish goddess of the hunt, Marehis sometimes told her stories about her, she was the goddess the Dalish praised as a symbol of the survival of their people, a protector. “Just as the Vhenadahl connects you to Marehis, this would remind you I am always guarding you as well, da’len.”

Ellie hugged him in thanks, “It’s so pretty, thank you Solas,” she said.

Huh that was…maybe a trick of the light or maybe unintentional in its design, but when she looked down at the charm around her neck, upside down the owl looked like the face of a wolf looking up at her.

Dorian was next. “Maker, that’s certainly a hard act to follow. Precious as you are to me, dear Ellie, I’m afraid I’d make a terrible parental influence,” he said, “I’m more of the fun family friend that day drinks and travels a lot and tells you interesting stories of my less lewd misadventures.”

“That’s okay, I like hearing your stories…I’d appreciate less day drinking though, it just isn’t very healthy yeah?” She shrugged, "Between Maerhis and Solas and the Iron Bull and Varric and Cullen and Cassandra I’m good on parental influences.”

Oh gosh, the Iron Bull choked on his drink and Varric didn't look very certain about everyone being listed in pairs and he'd gotten slotted in with the large Qunari fellow but she hadn't meant it like that, golly he was silly! And Cassandra went pink but she looked pleased! Cullen…huh, he wasn’t in the room anymore she didn’t think, where’d he go?

Dorian chuckled at that before handing Ellie his present, “Here, Ellie, happy birthday,” he wished her.

It was a wooden, checkered box that when she opened it held little figures…oh wow! A proper chess set! If you took out all the pieces and opened the box all the way back on its hinge, and turned it so the outside faced up, it worked as the board! Dorian had taught her some, when they’d been in their camp in the Hinterlands, it’d gotten pretty silly but they had fun and she did want to play him again! “Dorian! This is so cool, thank you so much!” she enthused as she carefully closed up the box and pulled him in to a hug.

“You’re certainly welcome,” he said, and when he pulled back he placed a biggish, velvety cloth bag on top of the box. “a backup set of sorts,” he supposed casually with a shrug.
Ellie peeked inside the bag—oh gosh oh gosh oh gosh—they weren’t just a backup set—they were a bigger set! They’d still sit nicely in the board squares but they were much taller than the set inside the box, perfect for the grip of someone like, “The Iron Bull, you’ll play with me sometime, yeah?”

“Sure thing Imekari,” he agreed sounding somewhere between sincere and confused as to what prompted her to ask him outright first.

They were going to be! so! adorable! Wait, no! Adoribul! Gosh she loved spelling, she could make so many written word puns! They just needed smooshed together already!

Healer Adan was next though his present wasn’t wrapped. He handed her a book, seeming grumpy because he was so shy over the offer of affection as he said, “You uh. Ever want to cook something in here up, maybe come find me,” and then he walked away! Just ‘noped’ out of hugging distance, and the room entirely!

“Thank you Healer Adan, I love you!” she called a little teasingly in his wake.

His voice was muffled as the door closed but, “Oh you know how I feel, you whelp!”

Ellie giggled at that, running hand along the cover of the book he’d given her, a thick book of Healing instruction, and when she peeked at the table of contents, there were all sorts of cool potions recipes listed.

Horse Master Dennet gave her a wooden box too, there was a tiny crank on the back of it and he told her to twist it a few times before opening the box up and…oh gosh that was so pretty, it was full of this metal cylinder that rotated within the width of the box, these divots poking outward in different places and as it turned, they pulled down these small tines along the back of the box, each playing a different note to hmm…it sounded like a Chantry hymn, gosh it was pretty!

“Made one like this when my Serena was about your age, figured it’d suit. She and the missus send their happy birthday wishes along,” he told her.

“I love it, thank you so much, it’s so beautiful—please tell them thanks and I hope they’re doing well?”

“I certainly will,” the horse master promised.

Harritt made her new boots! Her old ones were getting just a little bit pinchy lately and these ones had more of a heel on them! She was going to be taller!

“Try them on later and let me know how they fit.”

“I’m sure they’re perfect, thanks so much!”

Awe, he was so bashful, he was blushing as he waved her off and went to rejoin the gathered crowd.

Thom came up, looking nervous as he knelt before her, “I um…here. Happy Birthday.” He pulled his hand out from behind his back and held out,

“Its Russel!” she enthused as she took the wooden figurine in hand—he’d made a carving of Russel out of wood and around its neck hang a bracelet made of wooden beads and charms he’d carved, the sun, a small horse, the moon, a star, a snowflake, a flower—like a lily—and a heart with an ‘E’ carved into it! “Thom, this is beautiful! You made these yourself?”
Thom nodded, “You uh, you like ‘em, Ellie-girl?”

Ellie nodded, smiling as she held out the wrist Sera’d put her friendship bracelet on since her Marked hand was currently holding mini-Russel—gosh that was so cute!—and asked, “I really do! Would you please help me put it on?”

Thom took the bracelet in hand and clasped it around Ellie’s wrist, it fit great, it wasn’t super tight, but it wasn’t so loose she’d have to worry about it falling off while moving around.

“Thank you,” she said, as she hugged him tight.

When Thom was done, Cole sort of appeared, sitting on the War table, Cremisius had technically been next in line but he politely gestured for Cole to go ahead.

“Happy birthday,” Cole recited serenely, “Here—I wasn’t sure what to get you, so I looked. Varric thought you’d like them once, but he didn’t get them for you, I don’t know why. I thought you should have them still.”

He…he handed her a few round stones, she had to use both hands to hold them all.

Varric looked indignant and a little confused, “Kid, I…I one time had the passing thought if I gave Tumbles rocks she’d—”

“They’re so great, Cole!” Ellie was quick to assure, “Gosh, I love them all, thanks so much for thinking of me!”

“What are you going to name them?” Cole asked, enthusiastic in his curiosity.

Varric had funny thoughts. “Hmm…well this one looks like a Tina, and this one I think is a Henry…Stewart, Angie, and Leah,” she rattled off the names at random. Gosh it was really sweet, she loved that he’d made such an effort to participate, and they were pretty, gray stones, maybe she’d put them on one her shelves—

Cole yelped in delight, “That’s where he thought you’d keep them! I did it right!” he declared happily before he disappeared.

“Gosh he’s sweet,” Ellie giggled as she placed the stones with the rest of her presents for safe keeping.

“Guess it’s my turn now,” Cremisius said as he came to kneel before Ellie.

“Don’t do it man, marriage is a trap!”

“Bite me Bull,” oh Cremisius should be careful, ’cause he will! “everyone else kne—you’re the one offering up rings! Just, don’t make me come over there!” Cremisius warned, earning the laughter of their audience before returning his attention to Ellie, “Sorry about him.”

“Its okay, I knew about the Iron Bull going into this, we all have our baggage,” Ellie assured him jovially, giggling over the Iron Bull’s little wounded, ‘Hey!’

Cremisius grinned and offered a pretty blue cloth bag she might have seen the other day. “Happy Birthday, Ellie.”

“You’ve said that already—oh! Another first, of the new year and life, you were the first person to ever give me a present, and you are officially the first person to ever tell me Happy Birthday!” she was excited to inform him.

“How come he got to do that? I thought we were sharing her first birthday wish!” Varric complained only to receive a smack on the back of the head from Cassandra before she said,

“We would not know we could plan such a surprise party if it were not for the Lieutenant, and a great portion of it's planning was influence of his input, Varric.”

“Really?” Ellie asked.

Oh, Cremisius was blushing. “I…I might have told the Advisors that I didn't think you knew about birthday celebrations, and Lady Montilyet just asked me a few questions about what to do, she did all the planning and orchestrating everything, wrote your poem schedule, and everyone pitched in to make the day special—”

Oh it was fun, he was sort of rambling like how she did sometimes, “Cremisius, hush,” she told him, and then she returned her attention to the bag, there was a tag on one of the drawstrings that read How would you like to go on another date? that’s all it said so she looked to him, “I would really love that,” she said as she uncinched the bag and then…

Oh she nearly dropped it, but gosh she was glad she didn't! Inside was a beautiful wrist watch, a small round timepiece on a thin silver chain, the pin was pulled out but it’d been dialed to read 6 o’clock and, oh, it had a smaller pin on the opposite side that would control the little double panel between the 6 and the center of the watch that read 04. Friday was the fourth!

“The date works mechanically, so as the clock passes twelve twice after being set, it changes on its own at midnight but uh, it has to be manually reset to one at the beginning of each month,” he said, sounding…was he nervous? Did he think she wouldn’t like it as well as—oh gosh something enchanted to keep the full date and the time magically like his father’s pocket watch had to be expensive, this was expensive enough as it was and she- she didn’t need-“Cremisius it’s so beautiful, I love it! It’s perfect! I always have to be places at different times and it’ll help me keep track of the days, and gosh its so, so, so incredibly thoughtful of you! Thank you.” She hugged him tight, and gosh she wanted to kiss him again but there were so many eyes on them, and even the kiss she pressed to his cheek after he carefully helped secure the watch around her left wrist, got a hoot from Bull, oh he was a- a- a butt! Like Cremisius calls him!

“It is a very lovely timepiece, the young man did well,” Madam de Fer complimented.

“And now perhaps our Lady will keep better track of the time,” Leliana said humorously as she came to Ellie’s side once Cremisius went to stand by—and elbow—the Iron Bull. “From me,” she said, offering her a small rectangular present wrapped in pretty white paper, Ellie was very careful unwrapping it to find a small worn copy of the Chant. “Justinia gifted it to me when I first came in service as her Left Hand. I would like you to have it now.”

That made her throat a little tight. “Oh gosh, Leliana, I can’t take something Justinia gave you that’s…you love her so much,” she didn’t really have anything of Ava’s except the staff they’d made together, and she missed it something terribly.

“I do. You have grown on me in some respect, Ellie, and I think Justinia would like very much that I pass it on to you, a copy of the Chant of your very own. I knew Justinia a long time, believe me I have others, but this one being given to me in my role that led me to the Inquisition...I think it's befitting you keepsake it now.”
Ellie hugged the book to her chest, “I’ll take super good care of it, I promise,” she said before reaching out an arm to pull the Spymaster into a hug.

Lady Josie was next, handing Ellie a tall rectangular present with a wish of, “Cumpleaños feliz*, my lady,” huh, she was pretty sure Lady Josie had wrapped Leliana’s Chant book for her, this had matching wrapping paper and she didn’t see that working the other way around. Ellie unwrapped it to find a box made out of rigid, sturdy brown paper, she pulled it open to reveal a small, porcelain doll in a pretty, frilly green dress, a matching hat pinned into her hair huh, she had dusky skin but wild re—oh! “She looks like me!”

“Indeed she does,” Lady Josie said warmly, seeming shy as she asked, “Do you like her?”

Ellie nodded, “She’s so pretty, gosh, thanks Lady Josie!”

“It is Antivan tradition. At our coming of age, young ladies are presented with several presents that mark the occasion—the exchange between flat shoes and heels for instance—and this…well it is a tradition called ‘the last doll’, one last doll* to note the end of childhood.”

Huh…that…she didn’t necessarily…she didn’t very much care for Antiva but that was just bad experience. Lady Josie was the nicest person from Antiva she’d ever met, and it was sweet, connecting to something pleasant from her sort-of roots, sort of like how she liked speaking in Antivan with the woman. It was…kind of like Envy making the Chantry a scary place, maybe she just needed positive associations to make up for the negative—Lady Josie wasn’t just the nicest Antivan, she was the nicest person Ellie’d ever met full stop. Gosh, her present really was very sweet.

Ellie smiled. “I’ve never had a doll before, so I guess it’s a first doll too, huh? Gracias, Lady Josie.”

“De nada,” the Ambassador welcomed her thanks, “Perhaps…I could have my own dolls sent here*—” Leliana barked a laugh at that, slapping her hand over her mouth, and she received what looked like the closest thing to a reproachful glare Ellie’d ever seen from Lady Josie before the Antivan returned her attention to Ellie, clearing her throat nervously as she continued, “and we could play together, it is an experience you should have if you wish it.”

“Yeah, that sounds like fun!” Ellie agreed, and she gently placed the doll on the War table.

And then, then Cullen returned, holding a bundled blanket, and the Iron Bull whispered, ‘Fuck.’ What was wrong? The blanket looked soft! She liked blankets! Oh, was he worried she might like Cullen’s present best?...well...if she did it was because blankets were warm! It wasn't any offense to anyone else! She's a simple girl, she likes being toasty!

The Commander chuckled and knelt on the floor some distance away from Ellie, looking to her and nodding toward the ground in a gesture for her to sit, so she scooted out of her chair and onto her knees to sit on the floor across from him, not entirely certain why they needed to be so low for blanket gifting.

“This will be your responsibility, Ellie, you must do your very best to take care of her,” he said, and Ellie nodded, gosh he was serious about his blankets. But she understood it might be something like an heirloom and she’d take super good care of it! "Happy Birthday, Ellie,” he said, speaking quietly and then he set the bundle on the floor, something wriggling around underneath it until its little head poked out, and the Commander carefully pulled the blanket to lay flat, freeing its captive.
“Yip!”

Her actual jaw might fall off, Ellie thought as her eyes went wide and she was absolutely certain she was hallucinating or…oh gosh…

It was a little, brown and white furred Mabari pup!

“She's so little,” she breathed in a whisper almost afraid to reach out and touch her, but the puppy was already coming up to her, climbing into her lap, back paws high up on her thighs while it rested its front paws on her chest, “Yip!” right in her face, “Awe! She's so cute! What's her name?”

"Whatever you’d like to name her—for reference, she does not respond to ‘hey you’ by any means. She was the runt of her litter, but she survived well enough, healthy and full of energy—so I take it as a good sign she’ll grow to be a strong companion for you.”

Oh she was so little now! But Ellie’d take good care of her, keep her safe, make sure she grew big and strong! Oh gosh now she had an actual puppy to feed! What did puppies eat? “She’s so precious! I really get to keep her?”

“You do,” Cullen was pleased to say, looking to Cassandra like he’d won some sort of argument or something.

“Yes, as she is now fully housebroken, she can, indeed, stay,” Cassandra drawled like she’d had some hand in helping the Commander rear the pup.

“Oh, thank you so much! I love her!” Ellie promised, oh she was so warm and snuggly, nuzzling her face against Ellie’s as the girl hugged her carefully, petting the pup’s head…hmm…what to name her?

Varric growled. “Damn it, Curly! You really raised the damn bar for next year!”

…next…next year?

“We…we’re doing this again next year?” Ellie asked bewildered, that…that was only a year away!

“Well yeah, Inky,” Sera giggled, “You have a birthday every year, so, you’re supposed to celebrate it every year!”

Every-?!

“What?!”

Chapter End Notes

This snowball fight, and Ellie's evil laughter, was suggested in a comment on Chapter 4 by Secret_Life_of_Fireflies

White is customarily worn in Thedas to denote coming of age according to the info offered on festivals usually held in Spring where basically everyone who has come of age so far that year dress in all white and do a whole ‘look at us, we survived the plague and dragons and crazy magic, watch us dance, we might get married’ thing that I think happens in Bloomingtide.

*Justinian is the month of June. Guardian is February, Drakonis is March, and Solace is July

*Changing of the shoe and The Last Doll are both Quinces traditions. Quinceañeras are, of course, for when you turn fifteen, but coming of age in Thedas, theoretically, is sixteen—Antiva might celebrate Quinces, if they do this is more of an adaptation for circumstance.

*‘Feliz cumpleaños’ is more of a Mexican/Peruvian way of saying/singing ‘Happy Birthday’—Feliz ‘Happy’ and Cumpleaños ‘Birthday’ but Mexican Spanish dialect has several differences from Spain’s Spanish and that’s more so what Antivan is based on, and Cumpleaños Feliz is their thing, to my understanding.

*Lady Josie totally has her dolls with her. No doubt.
Names and Dates

Chapter Summary

Unexpected visits lead to unexpected outcomes, the new year has all sorts of things in store for the Inquisition. Thom's old crew is back, Sera's got new responsibilities, and quadruple dates are a thing, right?

Chapter Notes

Hi! Back at it again! Cleaning up some character archs, lead up to our time in the Oasis and the Fallow Mire—full playouts of how those areas and their missions go down coming next chapter! Then we're off to seal the Breach!

So...one or two, chapters left of dear, sweet Haven.

Also, thanks Secret_Life_of_Fire_Flies—for some reason I have zero problem slapping names on horses, but I couldn't for the life of me think of what to call the Inquisition's new puppy, 'Anya' was a suggestion by Secret that blipped in my brain because I immediately thought of how exactly that name could come about in this story and I rolled with it because I dig how I thought Ellie might get the name, and it's cute!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The new year held things old and new for Thom Rainier.

His old crew in his new life…Maker, he never thought to see any of them again, and yet somehow he’d imagined a thousand times, and thousand different ways for how he’d handle it if he ever did get the chance. Of course, most of those scenarios played out as him being apprehended for his crime and finding himself in prison alongside them, or upon their release, them hunting him down like the dog he is and beating him senseless, perhaps to death…most scenarios ended in them killing him, worst case scenarios and all that.

But for reasons he would never understand, the Maker continued blessing him with thing after thing he didn’t deserve. Mercy and grace beyond his comprehension.

Returning to Haven was relief, getting Ellie back in one piece, safe and alive after that horrible…he was just glad to see her recovered, moving forward after being knocked down so many times. He was excited to be back, with the prospect of Ellie’s birthday just around the corner, and absolutely terrified. Nerve wracked, to face the men he’d so sorely wronged after all these years. He didn’t deserve their forgiveness and selfishly he craved it more than anything, because he liked…he loved his new life. The Iron Bull was the epitome of what a leader should be, someone he was honored to follow, he found comradery among Ellie and her allies, loved that girl so much if he thought about it, it could wind him, it was overwhelming to care about someone so much again. He had a job that made him proud, a cause that was honorable, and people he loved and allies he respected. He wanted…he wanted that for his men as well, wanted to share that with them, but there was the fear that they would see him and be unable to reconcile the wrongs of their pasts with the possibilities of their futures, that they would ultimately take this life from him. He deserved nothing less.

And he got so much more. When Krem swept Ellie away upon their return to Haven, Bull clapped Thom on the back of the neck, and walked with him to the clearing where they could hear the Chargers training.

The Chargers…and Cyril, Damon, Andrew, Jacob, Jamieson, Charles, and goddamn Klaus*. They were there, armed and armored, looking…Maker. It was strange to see them again after all this time, they’d visibly aged, but there was something about it that made it feel like no time had passed at all, there was this…

There was a fire in them, he could see in them what he’d grown to see in himself whenever his old mug happened to cross paths with the mirror again. Purpose. A worthy cause to fight for, a banner under which they could stand proud. And Maker, they looked well, Stitches reported to Bull, Thom, of their recovery from their time in prison—they’d all been malnourished, pallid, even Klaus and Jamieson, dark as they were, had lost some of their color from lack of sun, though that certainly couldn’t be said now, everyone was rosy cheeked, they looked right healthy, and Krem had kept the pattern of reclaiming personage through the freedom to do with your hair what you will. To look at them, you’d never assume the sort of place they’d been little more than a month ago.

“Horns up!”

The words from the Iron Bull cast a silence across the practice field, the clang of sword against shield ceased and everyone, turned their attention to their leader.

“Horns up!” his numbers returned. Seven pairs of eyes went wide in their heads and Thom wasn’t certain if it was from the fact that yes, the Iron Bull was indeed a Qunari the size of a small house—if they threw tenting over his head and tacked the ends out around him, Thom was decently sure he could recreate the exact dimensions of his childhood home—or if it was seeing that Qunari with a massive hand resting on the back of the neck they’d likely like to wring.

“As I’m sure you can guess, I’m The Iron Bull. Nice to see new faces, my Lieutenant informs me you’re coming along well, did a damn good job cleaning up that mess of bandits fucking with Haven resources.”

Their ‘new faces’ all looked to Cyril who cleared his throat, sheathing his sword as he stepped forward, “Honor to serve, glad to finally meet you, sir. We appreciate the opportunity.”

“Good to hear. I’ll want to get better acquainted in a bit but I gotta touch base with the Spymaster on a few things now that I’m back. Guys, Ambassador needs help setting up for tonight and uh, wants to go over some things for tomorrow. I appreciate you volunteering.”

“We want the small one to have a pleasant birthday,” Skinner said as she slipped by them, moving to head for Haven’s gate, rest of the core team at trailing after her.

“Blacksmith says he’s all done with your present,” Stitches informed the Qunari as he passed, “picked it up for you and put it in your trunk, along with the er, new shirt? Kept it out of sight.”

“Sweet,” Bull rumbled out appreciatively. “Sarge, you good here? Leaving you to take point, you know how to reach me.” Yell like mad? Nah. He had a proper war horn, a way to signal
“Gosh it’s going to be so good to be back,” Ellie sighed as she flopped onto her back by the fire. “We’ll really be back in Haven tomorrow.”

“I’m certain,” he hoped so, anyway, Maker her birthday was practically within reach, it’d be disappointing to not be back in Haven in time to celebrate properly. But he was pretty sure, “we’re near the path we take out to the Hinterlands—” he stopped when she giggled, looking up at him seeming amused.

“I know,” she said, raising an arm to point straight up, skyward. “Judex* is just there, anmd if we were sitting on the river I bet we’d see hmm…First Day soon, so Peraquiallis should be more west now than when we could see it in the Hinterlands,” she squinted like she could make herself see through the mass of evergreens blocking their view pointing past them, “just over there. Probably. I don’t control the stars.”

“Huh,” he looked up from the pot of stew he’d been stirring, pulled his glasses out to get a better look-see overhead. Yeah he could make out the hilt of Judex in the sky above. “You really like the stars, Ellie-girl?”

“They’re pretty, and reliable. I used to always travel at night, safest for me you know? And the stars were always easier for me to understand and follow,” she said, voice wistful as she shared, “There’s this place…just north of Markham, this enormous field, empty in the warmer months, gets too hot for Druffalo. If you catch it on the right night mid-summer, it’s just big and open and it’s like the Maker opened up the heavens for you, pouring out beautiful, beautiful light. There’s so many stars its unreal, and there’s this sort of glow, kind of like the Breach but natural, something about the sun shining for so long so directly, that it makes the air there shine at night. It happens all the time way up north or way down south I hear but moving into the summer solstice, longest day of the year, Maker. The sky over this field glows all these different colors, and its breathtaking.”

Huh. He…he was pretty sure he knew the field she spoke of. He’d never…it stank to high heaven in the winter months, full of livestock, he’d never paid it more mind than that, never thought it was anything quite so spectacular, but he almost wondered if he should have paid better attention. And Maker, he hadn’t been anywhere near Markham in decades, but it was strange to hear her speak of being so very close to the place, felt like they’d just narrowly missed meeting each other. He almost wondered what might have happened if he’d returned home after his time in the Orlesian Military, like his mother asked of him, instead of listening to Klaus and pursuing mercenary work with his own company. In another life would he have just walked by that field, or would he have seen such glorious light, gone to appreciate it, set a totally different course?*

“Are you nervous?” she asked him then.

“All the time,” he assured her jovially. “About anything in particular?”

“About seeing them tomorrow. Um. You know, everyone? Are you afraid? You…you don’t think they’ll hurt you, do you?” she asked. Sounded scared for him.

“Ahh,” he was almost certain he’d get a proper punch to the face, maybe worse, but, “No, I’ll be quite alright Ellie-girl. I’m nervous yes. Thought on it loads of times, what I’d say to them if we ever met again and yet, I can’t think of a damn thing of what I might say tomorrow.”

“Don’t be. You’ve done a pretty good job once you’re in the moment, apologizing and working to move forward. You know what you did was wrong. Would you try to force them to “You can’t force forgiveness. You do your best to earn it and accept whatever you get.”

“Then you’re set!” she encouraged, “All you can do tomorrow is be open, honest. There’s nothing to hide that’s worth hiding you know? Admit your fault, and see how you can move forward. Do… I….” she sat up, legs crossing up before her and she was very quiet for a moment before she said, “I don’t know how I feel exactly um. About your men? I mean they…there’s obviously a conflict with what they did, and the kind of people you say they are. But um, i-if you’re scared, or nervous or anything…do you want me to come with you? Introduce myself, pull a little ‘Hiya, Herald of Andraste, I bailed your butts out of prison so play nice with my friend?’ thing?”

Oh, he was most certain if he approached his men with the Herald as his guard, she’d have them wrapped around her little fadelit fingers in a heartbeat, they’d never so much as look at him sideways if she bid it but, “I appreciate the advice, and the offer, Ellie. But you’ve done more than enough. This is something I should do.”

“Go on ahead, I’ll see you later,” Thom assured the Iron Bull who nodded, leveling his newest recruits a parting wave before he turned about to seek out the Herald’s advisors.

He took a deep breath before he dared look to the men gathered before him, watching and waiting and he wondered perhaps if it was a similar thing for them—if they’d imagined how this would go down, the way he had.

“I’m,” he had to clear his throat, Maker, it was suddenly tight, dry…open honesty. Well. His knees protested but he dropped to them. If they wanted penance paid in some sort of violence he wasn’t going to stop them, there wasn’t a point in standing his ground, there was nothing for him to stand on. “I can never apologize enough, there isn’t anything I can do to fix the mistakes I’ve made. I… I swear to you I did not know, and if I had, I would have called off the assault. It was foolish, petty politics I should never have gotten us involved in, what happened was my fault, the blame lies with me. What’s more I should have…if I’d been any sort of real man I would have turned myself in, the moment it happened, given myself to the authorities, kept your names out of it, instead I ran, left those of you who had the decency to do what I should have, to sort for yourselves. That was wrong, damn wrong, and there isn’t a thing I can do or say that will ever make up for it—” a blow landed on his shoulder.

Not…not a blow. Just…just a hand. Resting on his shoulder and squeezing. Klaus was kneeling before him.

“You stupid old bastard. We were the ones that acted blindly. We were your eyes on the field, in the moment… we didn’t realize what had happened until it was over. We turned ourselves in because it was us on us, our responsibility. Chapuis is the only reason the authorities learned we acted on your behalf.”

“Yeah, I gave the orders, I’m the reason you were even there in the first place, you didn’t act blindly, you acted on orders from a man you trusted. It was just as much my-”

Actual blow, Klaus’s fist popped him right in the jaw.

“You think you get to play woe-is-me over something we did? Get over yourself. You don’t have to live with just. Shut your goddamn mouth, alright?”

Well damn. “’m I supposed to shut my mouth, or respond?” Rainier asked.
“Just listen. We can’t change what happened. And we all know we don’t deserve whatever the hell this is, Inquisition, Andraste’s Herald bargaining mercy for us from Orlais. We barely knew a thing about the Breach and suddenly, we have our freedom and contracts from the people working to seal it, offers to join some Qunari bloke’s crew because his newest hire is our old commander who confessed his crime to the Herald of Andraste. All we can do, is better, serve the Inquisition, the Chargers, do what we can to help,” Klaus said as he rose to his feet, offering Thom a hand up. “Same as you.”

His men gathered around, standing in solidarity with Klaus.

And just like that, Thom Rainier was leading his old crew again…or, more like they were leading him. It’d been a while since breakfast and they were all damn hungry, and Haven had a mess hall now. Nice little set up, a large tented area with a row of tables laden with hot trays full of food serving staff slopped out portions from, and there were tables and benches. Crowded as could be but,

“Lieutenant’s running around playing tour guide now is he?” Klaus noted as they filed into line. Then, “Maker, is that…?”

Oh, Krem was out on the path that ran by the tented area, showing Ellie around, Maker that was nice, he looked relaxed, relieved and excited as he escorted the girl, and she looked more carefree than she had in weeks, rosy cheeked, arm in arm with the Lieutenant. They took one look at the crowd and Krem grinned as he bent to say something in quiet conspiracy to Ellie who giggled and nodded, squeezing his arm as he led her away.

“That Skinner lady calls her small but…shit. The Inquisition wants her to face the Breach?”

Scared him senseless too, if he thought about it enough, Ellie having to face the Breach again. But she wouldn’t be facing it alone. “Don’t know if you’ll get the chance to see it in action but her Mark is truly something. She can seal the Breach, we’ve all the allies we need now to make it so.”

“We…we’d like to meet her, thank her at some point, if she’d be willing to speak with us,” Cyril spoke up, looking to Thom, something hopeful in his gaze.

“She’s…we just got in, last stint out was hard, and this whole situation…it caused a lot of trouble for her personally. But after the holiday, once she’s had time to settle in and recover, yes, I’ll certainly ask,” Thom promised. Klaus snorted, whispering something to Charlie that made him snicker. Maker, it’s been years they were hardly—it wasn’t he- He was hardly being soft, it was a perfectly reasonable request to fulfill, it might take a load off of Ellie’s mind to put faces and names to her impressions, to see them and know they will not squander the opportunity she’s given them, that her deal with the Empress wasn’t a mistake.

It felt strange being around everyone after everything. It’d been more than five years since he last saw these men, a majority of that time they’d spent in prison, but they seemed to be acclimating well, something like gratitude in their numbers toward the Lieutenant for that—he’d been bloody detailed in his reports to Thom and Bull about how well they were adjusting, but he truly had done the work. Sat them all down made sure they had everything they needed gear wise and uh, well he’d apparently made it clear if they ever needed to, they could come to him to talk, something wasn’t setting with them right, all they had to do was say so. Kept them structured, worked them hard, but he made sure they had down time, put in requests for books or materials that allowed them to pursue old interests, keep their minds and hands busy, taught some of them how to knit when they showed interest. Hooked Cyril up with instructional manuals, supplies and ingredients, helped get him back in the swing of playing healer, he’d always been good about taking up after everyone when people were hurt back in the day.

Cyril…that was…he was probably who Thom was most nervous seeing after everything.
He hadn’t been certain they would all accept the offer of work from the Inquisition, but they had, every one of them save…Everette wasn’t among them, though Thom hadn’t heard of him being apprehended. Still, it’d been startling to see Cyril’s face in that bit of drawing the Lieutenant had sent off to Ellie. Thom couldn’t much find it in himself to strike up conversation with the man, not as he did with the others it felt…he felt…he was ashamed.

And then he was avoiding. Lunch had gone well enough, but he needed…he wasn’t sure what he needed. To thank Krem certainly, yes, that would sort. And he should touch base with Bull.

Ellie’d accepted Krem’s invitation to attend the evening festivities with him and it was heartening to see the young man so excited, he damn well deserved it. Thom was of a mind to see if Bull’d maybe give the lad some time off, he was due a reward. And Maker, he was excited but exhausted, it looked like. Bull must have seen as much himself because he sent the boy off to rest.

And then he questioned the Chargers six ways to Sunday, wanting every last detail of what had gone on in their absence. Krem’d basically been supervising their newest recruits round the clock making sure they kept their noses clean and to the grindstone, woke up, saw to their rising and breakfast, drills, training, getting them used to working the job again, made sure they and the Core team ran smoothly, and there’d been more group meals apparently. He’d started some nightly ritual of having them all gather around the bonfire to winddown for the evening, made a point of including Commander Cullen, he’d apparently an open invitation to their camp.

Thom spent the rest of the evening, not-hiding, in the stables. Their horses were well cared for, and it wasn’t like he needed Russel’s mug for reference any longer, he’d finished that bit of carpentry before they set out for the Hinterlands. But there was one more charm to craft to wrap up Ellie’s gift, a few more beads to make sure it looked nice and wasn’t too tight…he wasn’t sure she’d even wear it, it was hardly fine jewelry. But he knew for certain she’d appreciate the little miniature of her horse, worried that alone would seem like he were offering her a child’s gift, so he thought the bracelet would balance things out, a more presentable thing for a teen girl. So he sat on a stool in the horses’ company and finished his crafting, Sera’d been good enough to lend him strong thread she had left over, and he strung the beads carefully, fuss a bit over their order, and finally secured the wooden clasp he’d made for either end, glad to see it worked. That was good.
Maybe he should just test it a few more times… fiddling with a damn clasp open-closed, open-closed for five straight minutes. He was hiding.

And the Iron Bull came and found him.

“Hey Sarge. Krem’s just getting ready to go pick up Boss girl. Party’s on soon, already a bit of a get together going on in the clearing, your guys are sticking to that they said. You feel like joining them or you wanna hit up the Chantry digs with me?” Bull was offering though he stopped and asked, “You uh, you okay?”

Thom stopped his fiddling with his more than finished bracelet, tucking it away in his coat pocket for safe keeping as he said, “Fine, just fine.”

“That uh…okay,” Bull sighed, coming to stand before Thom, crossing his arms over his chest as he leaned back against a barrel. “Come on man, spill. Somethings up.” He gave it just a moments thought and, “You just about jumped out of your skin when you saw that Cyril guy in that picture Krem sent. He asked about you when I went to check in on everyone before heading out, real worried about you missing dinner.”

Had he?...huh. “It’s complicated, I’d rather not get into it.”

“Alright. Well you need to, lemme know,” he offered sincerely before clapping Thom’s shoulder in a great warm hand, “Come on then. We’re going stag.”

Stag suited just fine. Food was good, company even better, he got to hang around with Bull a bit but mostly left the Qunari to his own devices, he was ‘looking to score’, and Thom was just... well he certainly wasn’t looking for any such thing. He mostly enjoyed the music, refreshments, and the few dances he indulged in, it was nice to hear from the both of them, Krem and Ellie how their date was going. Good to see Ellie-girl having so much fun after their journey and Maker he was right excited for her birthday.

And he thought he was in the clear, at least for the evening, after the fireworks display died down and everyone started wandering off to either seek more dance or drink, or head for bed for… sleep but mostly sex it looked like, the Iron Bull left his knickers out front of the Chargers tent and that was uh…pretty good indication he was, er, entertaining. Thom had made it this long without bearing witness to whatever ‘Riding the Bull’ was and he was going to keep it that way…which lead to the mistake, stumbling out of the clear so to speak.

He ended up drawing near the low bonfire going in the Charger’s clearing, and he’d already been seen approaching by the time he realized the fire hadn’t been left wholly unattended, it’d be more than awkward, cowardly, to turn tail and run…well he was certainly through, with being a coward. Trying to be, anyway.

“Really know how to ring in the new year, this Inquisition,” Cyril said as Thom came to stand by the fire.

Thom had to clear his throat. “Yep.”...yep?

“They uh…they’re good people, running everything. Lady Montilyet was in charge of the festivities.”

“Ambassador. Nice woman. There’s something on tomorrow—we’ve the day off but we’re also on standby for a…snowball fight?” he asked as if making certain he weren’t crazy and misheard their orders.

“After midnight so it’s today actually,” Thom offered lightly. “Ellie-girl’s birthday. She uh…she’s never celebrated the day before, doesn’t know about birthday parties and the like so we’re trying to make it special.”

“Huh. Well then, I hope it helps make the day special for her,” Cyril offered sincerely, huffing a bit of a wry laugh, “Maker, this is all so strange isn’t it? Two months ago I was a year away from hanging, but here I am, I just…saw a fireworks display, drank some damn good mead with my friends out in the open air, celebrated the coming year.”

Maker, the thought nearly winded him. “You…you were going to hang?

“I didn’t…I hadn’t heard. I thought you’d gotten er, life sentences.”

“Kids died, Thom. Klaus was looking at early release, maybe two years from now? Good behavior, and uh, he was more of an accessory. He took point watching the road, killed the carriage driver, but turning himself in and pleading guilty all worked in his favor. Rest of us were looking at a few more decades of time, but someone had to take the brunt of responsibility. We were all there, it was all our faults, doesn’t much matter who’s blade…dunno. I was just done with it all. Figured it was the right thing to do even if I didn’t…it was a real mess. I should’ve done more, and I didn’t.”

“Wh- who-?” he shuddered, retracting the question, “No, sorry I-”

“Everette,” Cyril answered anyway. “He’s dead. Kids weren’t part of the deal, most of us had the damn sense to know that. But maybe it was the confusion of battle, or just, how ingrained in us it was to follow order without question, it’s not like we did enough to stop him until after it was too late. Lots of should’ve’s about the whole thing.”

“If…if I’d known, heard you were going to hang I would’ve come*.”

“To watch?” wry, but a touch too macabre for Thom’s liking.

“To do whatever I could to stop it.”

“Hmm. All good now, innit? We’re grateful, all of us, for this new life. We aren’t going to mess it up.” Cyril said, nodding as he stared into the fire. “Others headed to the mess, serving something warm to send everyone off, I think I’ll join them. You coming, or are you good here?”

He…he certainly had a lot to think about. He’d turned tail, abandoned everything, everyone so fast. He hadn’t even…Maker, he thought Everette had been in prison or on the run like him, he didn’t realize, he hadn’t seen who did what, let alone his men turning on each other after the fight, cutting down their numbers that took things too far.

“I’m good here. Enjoy your day off tomorrow…er, today. We’ll get a fresh start on the 2nd.”

Cyril nodded and as he passed, he rested a hand on Thom’s forearm, squeezing before he pressed a kiss to his cheek. “Happy new year, Thom.”

It really was. Maker, everything about Ellie-girl’s birthday was fun, and he was glad to have the luck to be a member of her party, and the Chargers core ranks, it meant being part of almost the entire day, breakfast, snowball fight—great many snowballs hurled at him from his men, far fairer punishment than he’d ever expected—and then lunch. Nervous as hell to give her his present but she’d been so grateful, loved the miniature of Russel and the bracelet fit her well, she seemed truly delighted with it. Dinner as a group, Advisors and all packing into Flissa’s tavern, was how they decided to end the day. Little yipper Cullen outshone them with was resting soundly in Ellie’s lap, mirroring her mistress, once they’d eaten and were all just chatting, Ellie was worn from excitement, fell asleep, head resting on Krem’s shoulder. Cole went quiet where he sat across from Ellie, next to Thom, and bowed his head to focus on keeping her from…well he wasn’t sure how it worked exactly, but the girl reported sleeping soundly last night, so bless him.

“I think we did a damn good job,” Bull commended quietly, raising his mug in a bit of a toast them before sipping at his drink.

“Thank you, everyone, for helping with the day,” Marehis said sincerely.

“We will get back into the swing of things, as it were, tomorrow,” Cassandra said.

“I’ve added you to her schedule, as requested, Sera,” Lady Montilyet confirmed, met with the Elf’s quiet, but enthusiastic ‘yes!’.

“You good taking on ground troop drills tomorrow Sarge?” Bull asked,
Thom nodded. “Of course.”

“Cool. Thinkin’ I’ll give Krem-pie a few days off. On the downlow, guy doesn’t know how to take a damn break, so I’ll need your help making it seem like he’s still being taken to task, or he won’t let me pay him. Lots of ‘oh no, Bull asked you to do that? Well I already did so… whoops’.”

He was more than happy to provide a break for the Lieutenant, but he wasn’t too sure about how ‘on the downlow’ it would be considering…oh. Lad certainly did deserve a rest. Krem’s head was slumped forward, out like a light.

“I’m never letting him live down sleeping with Boss-girl before the second date,” the Qunari decided.

“You leave him be,” Thom reprimanded. “It’s not like you have room to talk. Grim drew the short stick, had to get them back with your things since you never did pick your britches up after you were done entertaining company last night.”

Dorian suddenly choked on his drink, coughing so hard Thom almost wondered if someone should do something to help, Maker.

Wait…had…had Dorian-?

Nope, didn’t want to know, staying way out of that!

“Hmm, Dorian? You okay?” Ellie asked sleepily, roused from her impromptu nap.

“Wrong hole,” the Tevinter Mage croaked out.

Sera screamed with laughter, having to rise up from her seat and walk away, doubling over with her amusement, Ellie staring at her like she were half concerned the girl’d gone mad. Bull, Maker the Qunari was a particularly astonishing shade of purple.

Krem startled awake, his arm had been resting on the back of Ellie’s chair and he pulled her more against him, while his other hand went to the hilt of his sword—he certainly couldn’t draw it without striking the table top and it’d be clumsy going, but his hand just rested there as he blinked, looking about trying to discern if Sera was in danger from all the ruckus she was making, “Ser’, you good?”

“She’s…she’s okay I think,” Ellie assured, though she did feel the need to clarify, “…I think,” uncertain that her friend was truly ‘okay’.

Following day Thom woke to the missive that he was part of Ellie’s schedule for the day, horseback riding session. He left the Charger’s camp to navigate the growing number of tents outside Haven in search of where his men were staying, figured they should take breakfast together as a group. They were all making their way to the mess, Jamieson, ever the morning person, flipped Thom off as he approached them.

“Morning to you too,” Thom chuckled, “thank you all, for participating yesterday.”

“Kid have a good party?” Cyril asked.

“She did, good fun,” Thom said. “We’ve got drills to run this morning and then uh, Klaus I’d appreciate you taking point. I’ve lessons with Ellie at ten, I’ll be back for lunch.”
“You got it,” Klaus agreed.

“The hell they have you teaching her?” Charles asked as Thom passed back trays for them.

“Horseback riding, it takes about an hour or so. I’ll um…I’ll ask if she’d feel up to meeting everyone.”

Earned him nods and a few claps to his shoulders in gratitude.

When they headed to the practice field, Ellie-girl was out with Seeker and Commander…not entirely sure how productive they were starting out, it looked like the girl was trying to teach her pup how to do pushups, Cullen was nothing but amused encouragement, and Cassandra was looking skyward as if to question her Maker just why He put her in such a blessed but ridiculous situation.

“Twenty-five, twenty-six- Come on Anya, you can do it-seven, twenty-eight!” Ellie counted through her own pushups, though she stopped to sit on her knees and cheer when the pup remained standing on her back paws but stretched out her front before her, chest dipping low to touch the ground, the closest thing a puppy could do to imitate a pushup, “oh yay! Anya, good job! Good girl! She’s so smart!” she enthused to Cullen, then the pup in question, “You’re so smart!” she saw Thom leading his men to the Charger’s clearing and raised her arm over head to wave, and he threw up a little wave back.

Clearing was empty when they arrived, Bull was taking the core group out on rounds outside Haven estate to verify there wasn’t any bandit presence re-establishing itself after their last encounter.

Ultimately, he hadn’t needed to ask Ellie, if she’d come to meet his men. Little more than an hour after they started their drills Thom was just getting ready to pass off things to Klaus, he’d have to meet Ellie in just a few minutes, but, Cyril blocked a blow from Jamieson and caught Thom’s eye before nodding for him to look behind him.

“Oh, Ellie-girl,” Thom greeted, she stood with some distance between them like she’d not wished to disturb their training or perhaps…well it would be reasonable for her to be shy or nervous too approach, even as she was arm in arm with Marehis, “I’m sorry I thought I was keeping track of the time-”

Ellie shook her head, smiling a bit as she said, “Oh, gosh, you’re fine,” she looked to her own wristwatch to confirm, “I’m just a little early. Lady Josie needed to see Cullen and Cassandra for something. It didn’t take long to get Anya settled back in at the cabin and grab my cloak. I didn’t mean to interrupt, but I thought maybe I should say hi to everyone?”

“Of course,” Thom assured holding out his hand for Ellie to take if she wished, and she gave Marehis’s arm a squeeze before she slipped from her hold and took Thom’s hand, her minder giving him a fearsome glare over Ellie’s head that spoke of his doom if this went badly, Marehis had become less antagonized by his betrayal but still, he wasn’t on the steadiest footing with the Herald’s bodyguard, understandably. He led her to his men as they sheathed their weapons and gathered together.

“Hi, I’m Ellie! Can I ask your names?”

What that resulted in was the men kneeling before her and offering up their names in turn.

“Gosh, Nicolaus is a fancy name—how d’you spell it?” she asked.
“N-i-c-o-l-a-u-s. Klaus for short.”

“Ni-co-laus, Nicolaus. Cool! It’s so long but there aren’t any secret letters in it!” she was pleased to find. Silent letters, she meant, but the girl held a grudge against the damned things—they did seemingly unnecessarily complicate spelling—so she accused them of being some great secret.

“Oh, you’re Cyril…I’m sorry Skinner scared you guys but if it makes you feel any better, it was pretty funny, Cremisius told me about it when I needed cheering up,” Ellie said when they finished introducing themselves.

“Glad to hear that then, “ Cyril said. “My lady, we are grateful, for what you’ve done for us. Hearing Thom’s confession, allowing us to pay penance in this way. We’re honored to serve and hope to do so well.”

Ellie nodded, smiling. “I’m sure you’ll do great. It really is nice to meet you all, sorry it took me a while to get around to it—I think I saw you all yesterday during the snowball fight?”

“We were in it, yes. Did you have a nice birthday?” Cyril asked.

“Uh-huh! Thanks! For asking, and for being part, gosh playing in the snow was fun! And Thom made me—I have the best horse in the world, his name’s Russel and Thom carved me a little Russel! And this bracelet, it’s so pretty, see?” she thrust out her unmarked hand, to, Maker, show the bracelet like it was something to show.

The man smiled warmly as he examined his work, “It is, very pretty,” he agreed, “We’re glad you had such a nice day.”

That was met with the girl’s interest in when their birthdays were, and did Thom know them? He should keep track, so they can all do nice things for their birthdays! She was writing them down and she’d remind him! Maker.

She put away her little flipping notebook and checked her watch, “9…o’2 gosh, I have lessons with Thom now, and Russel! But I’ll see you later! Have a great day.”

“You as well, my Lady,” Klaus wished her and she smiled her thanks, linking arms with Thom.

The girl heaved a sort of sigh of relief as they made their way to the stables. “They seem nice,” she said. Thom nodded his agreement, and then, “Cole and I talked a lot about it last night, while I slept? They still hurt, over what happened. Did they say anything about their talk? Cole said he spent most of First-Day Eve talking with them around the Charger’s fire, but um, I don’t know if they remember it. But Cole saw that they killed the man that actually um…well, you know.”

“I do. Now, at least. We’ve talked about it to some degree.” Cole had spoken with them? They hadn’t mentioned as much but…the boy did have the tendency to leave his messier dealings unmemorable, and Thom could see how such a conversation would be incredibly messy.

“They’ve been nice to you right?” she made certain.

“Yes, Ellie-girl, they have been.”

“Good!”
Their lesson was pleasant, it was a good chance to practice emergency maneuvers...but it was more the mere opportunity for the girl to spend time with Russel. Marehis rode along with Ellie to their practice set up, the Elf woman taking the reins, arms around Ellie as the girl took their leisurely ride out as a chance to dig in to Varric’s latest publication, Maker that was clever of the Dwarf. Ellie read aloud, for the horse’s benefit apparently since the book was about him after all.

Him, and the lead antagonist. Russel apparently spent a great deal of time outsmarting a ‘Great Bumbling Oaf’ to protect his beloved rider from the Oaf’s clumsy influence.

But it was all in good humor and it was wonderful hearing her increasing confidence with reading out loud. She tucked the book back into her cloak and it was nice to return to routine, calling out instruction and advice as the girl rode.

“I do appreciate your care and encouragement while helping her practice,” Marehis spoke up to his surprise as they stood together watching over Ellie’s lesson. Her lessons, he thought she meant, but then, “We have you to thank, for her comfort with reading out loud.”

Ahh. “It was the least I could do.”

As they made their return trip, Ellie asked, “You’ve got more training things to do after our lesson, yeah?” and when Thom nodded, she smiled, “I’ve got lessons with Dorian next but then I’m free for lunch. You’ll break for that right?”

“Of course,” he said, believing the inquiry to be on the basis of...well Ellie didn’t like the idea of anyone going hungry. But, when they returned from their lesson and had their horses squared away, she walked with him back to the clearing where Klaus was running the others through their drills.

“Ahh, our esteemed instructor returns,” Jamieson called out jovially, bringing attention to Klaus who signaled for everyone to halt their practice fighting.

“Did you have a pleasant lesson, lady Herald?” Cyril asked.

“I did! It’s always fun, lots of work though, I’m already hungry, but I’ve got another lesson next hour, before the noon meal. Thom says you’ll be on break around the same time I am, and I’d really love it if we could all eat together,” she said. “You can meet Anya! She’s a puppy and she’s just the sweetest!”

“We...” Cyril looked to the others, Thom, for confirmation, “we would be honored.”

“Great! Have fun practicing, be safe!” she wished them well, as she left with Marehis pulling the girl close and he heard the woman question if Ellie was in need of something to tide her over.

They broke a little early for lunch, not wanting to keep the girl waiting and too, they’d wanted to clean up a bit, before entertaining their young guest. And Anya, as promised. The pup was in tow, eagerly following Ellie out to meet them, under watch of Marehis though the woman drew near one hand gripping his forearm while the other pressed her bag of Ellie’s potions into his hand. She quietly intoned, speaking directly into Thom’s ear, “There has been a situation, Ellie isn’t to be made aware, but I need to meet with Leliana. You watch her, do not let her out of your sight, if I am not returned before her next lesson, the Iron Bull will be here.” And when he nodded, gripping the bag of potion securely before moving to tie it onto a belt loop, Marehis turned to the girl and was open warmth as she took Ellie’s face in hand, “Da’vehnan, you’re sure you’re alright with this?”
“Of course!” Ellie assured, “I hope you have a nice time on your lunch date with Solas!”
ahh, as it turned out instead of endangering the girl, Marehis’s dating life offered a nice bit of cover.

“I hope you have a pleasant time as well,” Marehis kissed the girl on the cheek before smoothing back her hair with just the barest bit of tremble in her hand. Maker, whatever had happened frightened her something awful.

“Hi! Thanks for meeting me for lunch,” Ellie came to address their group, introducing them, “this is Anya! Can you say ‘hi’ Anya?”

The little pup looked up at her, then Thom and his men, then back and offered a little happy sounding huff, tail wagging a mile a minute, Maker she was an energetic little thing.

“It’s an honor to meet the brave little warrior pup—we saw her training this morning, very impressive,” Cyril complimented warmly, crouching to pet Anya as she approached him, sniffing curiously at his hands before nuzzling against them.

“Uh-huh,” Ellie agreed, “Anya’s going to be the toughest warrior mage ever!”

…“Warrior mage?” Thom asked, uncertain. Puppies couldn't be mages...no...could they?

Apparently they could, after a fashion. “Yup! She saw me cast this morning—I woke up super early and it was cold, so I cheated and used my pyro spell and she wanted to try to, now she does this little thing, it’s like a trick—Anya, cast!”

The pup yipped in response and then looked up at Cyril, stomped a paw to the snow and let loose her loudest attempt at barking.

So the man did the only thing he could. “I’ve been hit!” Cyril declared, falling onto his back and Anya went in for the kill, climbing onto his chest and licking at his face, and Ellie was delighted with the act, laughing up a little storm along with Thom and his men.

Though Thom just about drew his sword when he saw fast movement in his peripheral, but he relaxed in the same instant, it was just Sera bounding out the gate, heading for Ellie. The girl might not be aware of whatever the ‘situation’ was, but Sera, apparently, was in the know. The Elf girl and collided with Ellie, taking her up, literally hoisted her so her feet were off the ground as she hugged her Human friend fiercely, “Inky! ’m joining you for lunch, ‘kay?”

Though Ellie might not be so very safe in the Elf girl’s hold, “Gosh, yeah- Ser- squeezingair-!”

“Shite, shite, sorry!” Sera quickly set her on her feet, pulling back to rub at Ellie’s arms, “Didn’t mean to squish you.”

“Are you feeling okay, Sera?” Ellie asked worriedly, raising a finger to carefully touch the purplish-dark skin just under the Elf’s eye, she’d matching dark circles and the poor girl looked like she hadn’t slept a wink. Maker, she did look rather bedraggled, had she been involved somehow with the threat to Ellie? Had she been injured?

“I’m okay, just sleepy, Ink,” Sera assured.

They filed into line for the mess, with Sera physically attached to Ellie, Thom hung back to quietly relay to his men to be alert, some sort of security breach had happened, and the girl may well be in some danger, and received several affirmative nods that they’d be on the lookout, guard her. Ellie and Sera were at the head of their group while the Elf befell questioning, Ellie eager to help her friend if she was feeling unwell—was she sick? She said she wanted to come to lunch but was her stomach upset any? Did she need a nap? Had she gotten enough sleep last night? Apparently the Tavern was packed rather late into the evening the other night, well into the early hours of morning, and the Elf had needed to rise early. Noise wasn’t so much an issue it was merely space—the Tavern had been full to bursting, and when there was finally a break in pace that allowed her to lie down, she’d woken shortly after to someone sitting on her cot, on the Elf herself having not seen her.

“We’ll get your sleeping clothes and you can wash up and nap in my cabin after lunch, Ser’, I have lessons all afternoon—no one’ll be around to bother you, Anya might follow me, but she’ll probably snuggle you if you’re okay with that, I’ll make sure the cabin’s all toasty for you!”

“You sure, Ink?”

“Uh-huh! Yup! Just rest and relax, and if you’re feeling better later we can go get dinner together. We could even order in if you want, it’ll be fun!”

Sera looked a little out of depth—overwhelmed, tired, and stressed over whatever threat had been posed to the friend offering her so much kindness, she looked like she might cry—so Thom stepped up to take some of the girl’s attention off her, “What looks good to you, Ellie-girl?”

“Gosh there’s so much to choose from, everything smells great,” Ellie said as she took a tray and passed it back, starting a chain of take-and-pass and then she stepped up and introduced herself to everyone working the serving line, thanking them for their work.

Cook was…a large, loud, no nonsense fellow, and in high dudgeon this afternoon. “Oi! You watch that flame! And mind your damn fingers, that’s a knife not a plaything! If I see even a bit of pink in that chicken—don’t make me come over there!” he cracked a spatula against the table top before he used it to point in the direction of a serving girl cooking up a large pan of chicken in warning.

“Hi! I’m Ellie!” she greeted as she came stand before the serving dish the Cook was manning.

“Andraste’s sagging tits, who the hell’s letting their brat run loose? You expect me to feed it too?” the man called out at his staff, receiving blank stares as he returned his attention to the girl, “You want biscuits put your damn plate up here, keep the line moving, I got mouths to feed.”

“I’m lots of people’s brat I suppose—Eleanor, Herald of Andraste,” she raised her Marked hand to him as she held out her tray, it was a bit difficult to perceive the glow of her Mark in the light of day unless you were looking right at the palm of her hand, “I haven’t gotten a chance to meet you—thanks so much for all the hard work, keeping everything safe and running smoothly, you’re doing a wonderful job.”

The man leveled her a hard look and then, “Huh. Fine. Double biscuits since you’re supposedly going to seal the Breach,” he said, dropping four biscuits onto her plate, “Keep it moving.”

“He’s a right prick,” Sera muttered to the girl as they finished up getting their food and started heading for a table.

“Oh, gosh, I’m sure he’s nice enough in his off time,” Ellie said as she looked around for a place they could all sit, reasoning, “It’s a lot of hard work, and it’s so dangerous—everyone eats here, depends on it, you could take down almost all of Haven with one tiny little accident, everyone has to be sharp, no room for coddling because there’s no margin for error.”

They all managed to squeeze in on an empty bench lined table, Thom could feel Anya shuffling around under the table, brushing by, sniffing and searching. Ellie was already putting some of her chicken and sweet potato and peas onto a handkerchief she bundled up and then slipped down under the table and he heard, “Here Anya, yeah good girl! Mwah!” before she popped back up brushing off her hands as she resumed her seat. “Cullen says she needs meat and veggies and carbs. She isn’t allowed to eat chocolate, it makes puppies sick, isn’t that awful?”

Oh, that was certainly unfortunate but,

“I suppose you’ll have to be all the sweetness she needs then, lovely.”

Sera started laughing as Ellie’s face went red, twisting about to look up at, “Cremisius! You- gosh! Hi!” she greeted, scooting over so he could sit beside her on the end of the bench, the Tevinter setting his tray down and pressing a kiss to the side of her head as he said, “Hi, how’s your day going?” There was a little ‘yip’ from below and he smiled, leaning forward, arm under the table and Thom could feel the thump thump thump of Anya’s tail beating against his shin, as Krem pet the pup in greeting.

“Great!” Ellie said, “What about you?”

“It’s been nice, we went out of Haven for a quick patrol—Bull spooked his own horse with uh, something loud and deadly,” the Lieutenant reported waving a hand before his face as if to banish the smell, “ended up tossed in a snow bank.”

“Oh gosh,” Ellie laughed despite herself, worrying, “is he okay?”

“Lug’s fine, soft landing. We helped him up,” Krem assured her all too innocently.

“They buried me in snow first,” the Iron Bull informed her as the Qunari took a seat at the table behind theirs, sitting himself down behind Ellie. Ahh. That table’d been mostly empty, there were spaces before the Qunari but he sat with Ellie at his back, and Stitches in his blind spot, Grim on his seeing side. The rest of the Chargers took seats at the table beside the one Thom and Ellie had claimed, surrounding the girl on all sides with people they could trust, securing her unaware while Bull shared, “And then dogpiled on me. I stood up with my *ine*subordinates hanging off of me like damn monkeys.”

“Oh!” Ellie chirped excitedly, “Monkeys are so cute! Dorian and I just read about them, in this little book that has pictures, they’re native to Par Vollen*, Seheron, the Arbor Wilds—tropical places! They can eat bananas with their little feet!”

“At least they have talent, I should just trade you bastards in for monkeys!” the Iron Bull decided.

“Monkeys are probably no good at paperwork,” Krem reasoned for his job security, “I’ll be by to help you with that after lunch,” he said to Thom, “Things we gotta file for your team, due by the end of the week—”

“Oh,” needed to get a start on that, yeah, but, he had his orders. “I already finished that up.”

“Oh, cool. Good work. Uh…need help with anything else then? Chief?”
“Can’t think of anything,” Thom offered.

“Shit, me neither,” the Qunari said. “Got lessons with Imekari after lunch, actually.”

Ellie looked surprised to hear that, “Really? I thought I had lessons with Solas next?”

Sera bit down harshly on her lip and Thom suddenly wasn’t very hungry anymore oh Maker, she looked devastated had—

Krem stretched casually, reaching out behind Ellie to tap Sera on the shoulder in the same motion he rested his arm around the Human girl, the action made Ellie smile and lean into him, gave Sera a clear view of Krem when she looked his way, mouthing ‘he’s okay’. Sera looked as relieved as Thom felt at that, oh, thank everything. Maker just…just what had happened?

“Something came up,” Bull offered to Ellie, “—some kind of Fade thing he wants to try observing this afternoon, you know he’s always talking about that crap, some kind of celestial bullshit lined up and it’s a good time to see the glimmer of an ancient whatever’s asscrack,” Ellie giggled at his crude simplification of Solas’s work in the Fade. Bull was making it all sound just a touch too okay, warm and open in that way he did when he was deflecting, amusing to distract. “All good, he just had to reschedule—figured you’d understand him wanting to pursue his Fade stuff. I said I’d be down to swap timeslots with him today. That cool with you, Imekari? We don’t gotta work even, we can shoot the shit, just me and my Boss-girl.”

“Gosh, yeah, that’d be fun! Learning or shooting, I always have fun with you, the Iron Bull!”

“Glad to hear it. Guys are all squared away doin’ their own thing this afternoon, potions, experimental crap Rocky’s getting into I don’t even what to know. Guess you’re off the hook Krem-pop.”

“…huh,” Krem said, “Alright…well, think of anything, holler at me. Might be crashing a psychology lecture/shit shooting session, though. You know, if it’s cool with the star pupil,” giving said student a little wink as he gave her a little squeeze before unwinding his arm from around her shoulders.

Ellie seemed to give it a measure of consideration. “That depends entirely on if you’re sharing your gravy—I got double biscuits and totally spaced on gravy and it’s basically the worst mistake of my entire life, I regret every decision that has led me to this point.”

“Well we can’t have that, can we?” he agreed earning him a kiss on the cheek and a share of Ellie’s biscuits. Thom leveled his men a glare to knock off their snickering.

Lunch was pleasant, they chatted amicably, Ellie asking Thom’s men all sorts of questions—how were they settling into Haven? Wonderfully. Did they need anything? Nothing, Lieutenant had them settled. Did they like working for the Chargers? How long had they known Thom? She gasped with excitement when Cyril could attest to having lived just down the street from him in Markham, she was absolutely elated with the prospect that,

“You knew Thom when he was just tiny?! I need details! How cute was he? And has he always been so spectacularly hairy? He’s the fluffiest human being I’ve ever met, and I’ve met a werewolf.” She giggled at the startled stares the claim got her, “Not a real one…I don’t think—it was an act, I mean he was really super hairy, but the werewolf claim was for working in a traveling circus.”
“Oi, nice to know you’ve got career options Thom,” Jamieson jested, the bastard.

Cyril huffed a laugh, nodding, before he answered Ellie’s inquiries, “Oh he was a real heartbreaker in his youth despite the fact you could never get him to sit still long enough for a proper haircut. Used to run around with hair down to his a- er, behind,” he censored himself for his current audience, “Worked as a reliable way to catch him, just reach out and yank.”

Maker his scalp almost stung from the memory, “You just about ripped my bloody scalp off that time when Guardsman Rodgers—”

“You were headed right for the Guardsman!”

“I got turned around,” Thom defended, “couldn’t see—

’cause you were like a walking wig!” Cyril teased.

“You got in trouble with the guard when you were just little?” Ellie asked, sounding amused.

“Got caught pinching food,” Thom explained. Been right good of Cyril to help, there’d been loads of times he’d come around and shared his own food with Thom and Liddy when he knew their mother was struggling to make ends meet, and whenever Thom needed to take matters into his own hands, he’d insisted he not do so alone.

“Oooh,” she sympathized offering, “in Markham? Big city, fancy bakeries. You should’ve waited ‘til closing—most big-name places toss anything they don’t sell, gosh it’s good eating. Well, as long as they don’t mess with it?” she supposed, warning, “Got horrible sick once when someone poured kerosene all over everything before throwing it out. I’d been ill for a while, nose was still stopped up, so I didn’t realize anything was wrong with it ‘til I was puking my guts up—always sniff before you scarf!”

“Wh- why the hell would they do that?” Krem asked, appalled. “It’s—they were the ones throwing away perfectly good food, it shouldn’t matter what happens with it afterward.”

Ellie shrugged. “Owner didn’t want ‘vagrants’ hanging about and the like.”

Sera made a frustrated little sound at that. “Friggin! Friggin’ shite that is.”

“To be fair, this particular vagrant avoided his rubbish bins after that.”

“Oooohhh you should—you can write now Ink, you should send a review or something to Markham’s newspaper thingamajig, bet their next headline would be ‘Herald of Andraste says Baker bastard’s crappy pastries made her sick!’ it’s the truth! But him right out of business!”

Ellie did seem to think it over, and then she smiled like she’d thought of something important. “People know to avoid his bins so it’s not like anyone’s in danger if he still practices that. And it’s been a while, I mean gosh like three or more years ago, things might be different now,” she looked to Thom, “People change, learn, do better. He hurt me, and it could have been bad, but I’d hate to punish the man he is now, if he’s no longer the man he was then.”

It…it bloody well clicked then. Thom’d wondered at Ellie’s sudden interest in meeting his men, spending time with them. Cole’s attempts at talking his men through their Hurt hadn’t gone exactly as planned, otherwise he was certain, if they were able to, someone would have mentioned the strange boy approaching them. When Ellie said Cole came to her to talk about what he learned from his time with them, Thom thought it was meant to quell any problems she might have with them. It had, it seemed, but just like the Spirit boy told their party how to help the girl, he’d done something along that line here. Recruited her to help him here.

“It wouldn’t hurt you to be a little vengeful once in a while,” Sera complained.

“Oh really?” Ellie asked, mischievous as she thrust a hand skyward and declared, “Vengeance shall be—” and proceeded to make a few dramatic choking sounds as she leaned to lay in the Elf girl’s lap, legs laying over Krem’s thighs as the Lieutenant smiled, shaking his head.

“Inky! You’re a total nut!”

Friggin yes! Inky’s birthday went off without a hitch, and shite it’d been so much fun! Sera’d been all nerves and excitement waiting all day, she could keep a secret and it was important for the whole ‘surprise’ thing but still, she had to keep checking herself she was just so excited for the damn surprise she was constantly on the verge of blurting it out! And Ellie’d liked the little bracelet Sera’d made for her, like actual ‘thankful’ liked it, thought it was pretty! It’d been friggin wild when Sandra’s boyfriend broke out a puppy of all things, topped them all, but Inky’d asked if Sera thought she could make the little thing a collar that looked like their bracelets—she’d be a Friend too! And Ellie wore her Friend bracelet all day until it was time for bathing or bed, then she kept it in her the little jewelry box thing she had with all her nice things, and the things she wanted to keep safe! She’d just had things from Kremmy-boy in it, those flower things and the tag with her name on it and pish, now she kept the little Val Royeaux ring and the necklace Mare gave her, Not-Beardy’s bracelet, those fancy hair comb things Viv got her, and the watch from her Friend-boy. Oh shite she and Krem were cute. Dating, Inky said. She’d get all blushy when Sera teased her at the end of the day when they was settling in for sleep, day after her Birthday…

That was a regular thing now. See things was getting’ right uncomfortable in the Tavern—she spent their first night back in Haven in Ellie’s cabin, but the second she’d tried to get a sleep in in her own cot in the Tavern but uh, that’d turned out right miserable. For one thing Fliss’s had all kinds of different hours that was hoppin, but like, real hoppin, people not just in there for their meals but straight coming in to drink and have fun, which was great except for when it got so crowded there was no where for Sera to sleep when she needed some shut eye. Noise wasn’t so much a problem just, no room, she’d woken up to people crowding her cot and some bloke friggin’ sat on her! And then there was that weirdy bard bitch. She’d taken it into her head to write a song about Sera, and that just wasn’t on, blah! Nope. Didn’t like it. It was just creepy! Inky thought it was cute but nope, not Sera’s jam, at all, ‘cept for all of two seconds she might not have hated it when Ellie got all giggly and started singin’ bout how ‘Sera was never an agreeable girl’ when they was arguin’. Shite she didn’t like arguin’ with Ellie, and it didn’t last long, thank friggin’ tits, but Inky got all fixy about Sera’s sleeping situation, and that wasn’t on either! Sera could handle her own business! It wasn’t…she didn’t want Ellie going out of her way to fix things for her!

It started with the napping, friggin proper nap—Ellie’d helped her wash up, the Iron Bull waited outside the cabin and Ellie scrubbed Sera’s hair real nice, washed it for her while Sera cleaned up, put some kind of sweet smelling oil she massaged into Sera’s scalp, right soothing and it left her hair so friggin soft! Then she changed into her sleeping things, and Inky fussed with the fireplace a bit, and came and made sure Sera was tucked in comfy in her blankets, kissed her on the forehead, and then she told her little pup to be good if she was going to stay in the cabin, ‘cause Sera was going to be sleeping, it was snuggle time, not play time. Anya curled right up against Sera and let her rest. Oh shite, she still couldn’t believe Ink’d taken the suggestion, Sera’d been kidding!
What should I name her? Lady’d been a real bitch, so Sera snorted and said ‘Anya’d be perfect’ but yeah, context, it didn’t land like something funny cause Ink didn’t know Lady ‘Anya’ Emmauld… but little Puppy Anya was sweetness enough so Sera guessed the name fit in an ironic way, and Ellie’d gotten all excited, thought it was cute so. Eh. Old bitch is dead, long live the sweet little bitch. Hmm, she was the snuggliest little thing!

When Sera woke up, Maker she felt better. About everything, she wasn’t exhausted anymore, and it was nice, waking up and being able to see Inky was alright, Ellie and Marehis were seated at the desk, Marehis in the chair with Ellie in her lap, using the dying light from the fire place, and Ellie’s Mark to see whatever they were working on, some kind of practice sheet Dorian had given her, matching words to definitions or something.

“Hey you,” Sera said as she sat up, stretching.

“Ser’!” Ellie said, pleased to see her awake, dropped her pencil and got up to come sit on the bed with her, though she stopped just before the fireplace and said, “Anya, ready? Cast!”

Awe that was cute, little pup was before the fire place and did her little ‘casting’ trick as Ellie dropped her pyro spell from her hand and into the fireplace, flared it right back up to make the room brighter, warmer and Anya gave a happy sounding ‘wuff!’ at her success, friggin’ precious.

“Oh da’len, how are you feeling?” Marehis asked as she joined them, raising a hand to feel at Sera’s forehead, friggin- she wasn’t sick, cripes! Made her feel a bit squirmy, Marehis’s fussing. “Ellie said you did not sleep well last night?”

“’m okay, all good now, um, everything all good here?”

Marehis nodded. “Da’vehnan, sweet girl, would you like to help?”

“Sure Mare’!” Ellie agreed, “What’cha need?”

“Would you mind putting in an order for dinner from Flissa’s? There’s a clean menu in the top of your desk drawer, just circle what we’d like and ask the guards if one of them would take it to her.”

Oh, “Yeah Ink, you know what we like to eat, you got it?” Sera asked.

“Yup!” Ellie agreed, bouncing off the bed to go do as she was asked. Marehis climbed into bed, sitting behind Sera and pulling her to sit in her lap while Inky finished circling menu things and headed for the door.

Frick. Some…some bastard had a delivery earlier, for Ellie. Sera’d been sittin’, chugging her fourth cup of coffee and trying to wake up enough for training with ‘sandra once she was through with Ellie’s lesson. But the Seeker didn’t show—she got an apologetic note from the woman saying there was an emergency meeting of the Advisors she had to attend, nothing dangerous but it was important and time-sensitive, and cripes, yeah, Sera understood that. She’d been about to try catching a few winks since her plans was cancelled when one of the Chantry cleaning ladies she’d invited into the Friends came running as fast as she could, bursting into Flissa’s. She’d been done with her shift, heading to go see some bloke she fancied that worked in the stables before getting something to eat and heading to bed, but she’d passed Inky’s cabin on her way to Haven’s gate, and seen some man leaving her room. She’d poked in to investigate cause he didn’t seem familiar, and he’d left this weird looking bouquet of flowers and an envelope that said Happy Birthday, Lady Herald. They was all dark purply-red, almost black, shaped like roses but there…there wasn’t really any difference between the top of the flower and its stem, and it looked freakin familiar. Adan had been grumpy, waiting at the bar for Flissa to get him more coffee when he caught sight of the ‘flowers’ and yelled for the servant girl to get those things out of here—it shouldn’t be in a communal eating area and ‘fucks sake don’t touch them with your bare hands, who taught you to handle potions ingredients?! Wash your hands this instant!’

Blood lotus. Someone sent Inky a fucking bouquet of blood lotus*. Unsafe exposure could lead to hallucinations, send people comatose Adan had rattled off. Servant lady got real dizzy, pale and shaky and mumbling incoherently. Sera’d had to help her to Adan’s! And then they opened the letter to see who might claim the attempt, if they’d offered any kind of paper threat.

‘Ccept it wasn’t a letter. Second they got the envelope open, Adan’s hand was over Sera’s mouth and nose, and he stopped breathing, reaching around for a rag, pressed it to his face and used the air he had left in his lungs to tell Sera not to breathe, before he went and got masks, cloth things healers sometimes wore, putting one over Sera’s mouth and nose, and then the now unconscious servant girl, before dropping the rag and putting one on himself. They’d opened the envelope and poof, this friggin cloud of powder burst into the air, leaving these thick floating blobs of pollen it looked like, and it was, Adan confirmed bitingly. Blood lotus pollen. Healer went to the door, opening it a crack to holler for guards to come stand, and make sure ruddy no one comes to his cabin, and to get a mage, fast.

Solas heard, came, and shite he was a big help. Put on a mask Adan handed him through the crack in the door before he opened it wide enough for Solas to slip inside.

Elf bloke looked scared, concerned. “Sera, you’re alright? Do you feel feverish or weak? Did you breathe any of this in at all?” Sera shook her head ‘no’ hating that she was too scared to speak, shite. “I want you to very carefully hand the envelope to me, da’len.” She did as she was asked, Solas taking the envelope and trying to keep whatever was left inside contained. “Very good, Sera. Now, please, I implore you, I will be as noninvasive as possible, but I ask your permission—if there is any pollen on your person, I can remove it the same way I can collect what is in the air, I would like to decontaminate you and let you leave safely before I move forward.” Sera nodded, resisting the urge to take a deep breath to brace herself, shite shite shite, but it wasn’t like before, Solas’s magic didn’t feel yicky, there was something careful and warm and protective about what coasted down her head to toe across her skin, and over her clothing, something like Barrier that collected all the pollen off of her clothes and pulled it away to float, contained in a ball of purple light. “Thank you, da’len, you’ve been very brave.” And then he cast into the open air to contain the rest of the pollen. “Please step carefully around and leave, close the door behind you, do not return. Get word to Marehis, she and Ellie will be arriving at Dorian’s soon for her lessons, inform her what has happened here, I will report to Leliana as soon as this is handled.”

“Y-y-you’ll be alright, right?”

“I will be fine, da’assan,” oh cripes, dumb, dumb, dumb brain said little arrow nope! Big nope! He didn’t get to say shite that made Sera’s throat feel tight, eyes ache and itch. What the frick! “Go.”

She’d…well she’d listened sort of. She went to Leliana herself ‘cause she had ways of communicating quietly to her agents in Haven, she could get word to Marehis, everything the Elf woman could possibly need to know without tipping off Ellie and…shite, fuck, Sera didn’t want Ellie to know a thing about this! Fucking asshole used her birthday! And that was right terrifying because they couldn’t…shite, Ellie’s birthday wasn’t public knowledge, it wasn’t even recorded anywhere—it was a day she picked herself, shared with her friends in the Inquisition, and they’d kept it in house, only Inquisition people knew, specifically those who worked and lived in Haven because yeah, someone might want to use that information for something nasty and somehow someone still managed to do so! They’d been ruddy careful! Lady Josie had ordered everything they needed for Ink’s party along with First Day Eve things, so it all looked like it was just for that, and Kremmy-Boy was responsible for things like the ‘pin the tail on the Fennec’ poster and he and the Chargers had made the big banner they hung in the Chantry. Wasn’t anyone’s business what presents was being bought for—no one let it slip in their shopping that they were purchasing things for the Herald of Andraste. But someone, somewhere, knew, and they’d tried to trick her with some twisted birthday present to bring her harm—who friggin knows what sort of horrible thing Inky’d hallucinate, and that crap could have sent her comatose—

Pollen, thick, and poisonous, and in the air, meant to be breathed in, Inky was smart, knew potions ingredients, but she might not have perceived a bouquet of blood lotus as a threat, but a genuine gift of ingredients and when she checked the card, Maker, she could have…would have had an asthma attack, gotten that crap way into her system she- what if- shite she could have died!

But she didn’t. It hadn’t gotten anywhere near her. She was alive and well and out of earshot as Marehis spoke very quietly against Sera’s ear. “Your Friend is alright, safe, and still willing to help, proud to have been of service in such a way. We apprehended the delivery man. Cole found him and was able to find just where the order came from, and we traced its initiation back to Duke Gaspard. Leliana will handle how we proceed with that information. Thank you, da’assan, thank you so much if…if your Friend had not intercepted—” she cleared her throat when her voice sounded tight and she pressed a kiss to the side of Sera’s head. “You did well today, you did everything right, and we are all so incredibly proud of you.”

“My…Solas is okay, right?” Krem’d said as much, and she trusted that, he was Bull’s guy and the Qunari was usually in the loop about security pish but…ugh that crap had been everywhere! She’d…shite! She’d been scared for that baldy git!

“Yes, sweet girl, he’s perfectly fine.”

“Order’s out!” Inky was happy to tell them as she came bounding back, the door closing behind her, “Gosh it should be good—” Ellie stopped in place as she joined them again, concerned, “oh, Sera, what’s wrong?”

Sera wiped at her eyes real quick, “Just got something in my eye Ink, it’s all good innit?” receiving a soft, sympathetic, ‘oh, ouch’, and Ellie came to the bed and crawled to sit on her knees before Sera, taking the older girl’s face in her hands and asking her to tilt her head back so she could look.

“Your eyes watering up cleared whatever it was away, nothing left but your pretty pretty baby blues! Mwah!” big kiss on the cheek and Inky thumbed away the tear tracks.

“Ink! Quit fussing, cripes you’re silly. Dinner’ll be here soon, we’re supposed to be being lazy right? You should clean up and get changed in to jammies.”

Ellie smiled at that, “That, is like, the smartest suggestion in life! Pajama party!”

And then Inky had tricks and traps of her own. She was clean and in soft pjs, curling up next to Sera, talking about her day. Then food came, and once they were finished eating, all warm, full bellies, Ink made her big play, got them all cuddling together on her bed, Sera laying between Marehis and Ellie, Anya curled up at their feet, all of them just snuggly and safe, content, and then,

“Hm…you know Ser’, my cabin’s nice, roomy, and you’re comfortable here, right?”

“Shite ink, anymore comfy and you’ll put me right back to sleep,” Sera mumbled as she lazily played with a lock of Ellie’s hair.

Inky’s arms were wrapped around Sera’s middle and now they hugged tighter, the head against Sera’s neck nuzzling as she snuggled against the older girl before she said, “Maybe you should just sleep here instead of in the Tavern. There’s room to hang your things in my clothing cabinet thing, and you could share beds with me or we could get one just for you—proper bed, mattress, lots of pillows, and soft blankets and everything.”

Shite! She meant! Sera could sleepover in her cabin but like, for permanent! Move in! She’d just update Marehis and Spymaster and Lady Josie that Sera was gonna be sharing and she’d help if Sera had stuff to move! Friggin- no! It was…that was Ellie’s! Her home! Yeah, sharing tents on the road was one thing, but her cabin was the only place in the world that Ellie could be completely and totally alone if she needed to be, no one bugging her with problems or needing her attention or whatever, she could just go to her cabin, close the door and boom, take an actual complete and total break from all the Inquisition shite. That’d been Sera’s only reprieve in Lady Emmauld’s house was having spaces Lady either wouldn’t or couldn’t come in cause of stairs and being an old creaky bitch. It was important to have space for yourself! And Ellie was datin’ now! What if she wanted those alone time breaks to involve, just, dating stuff! She shouldn’t have to worry about Sera bein’ all up in her business. She tried explaining that to Inky, and the Human girl listened, but had…ugh, reasonable arguments for Sera’s complaints which was just! Gah! Then Sera got all yelly about it, tryin’ to convince Ellie otherwise but then she whipped out that stupid song giggly as she sang, ‘Sera was never an agreeable girl!’ and—well it worked to deflate Sera and…

Well shite! She didn’t want to be someone that yelled at Ellie! What if it got in her hurt things Cole talked about?! But it seemed like it was fine…and later after everything was settled Sera found Cole later and made him check. Things only got to settled though, cause,

“You don’t have to if you don’t want to, honest, just…I think it’d be really nice to share with you, I like bunking with you when we’re on the road! It isn’t stressful or anything, and it’s nice to come back together at the end of the day. I understand alone time being important but it’s not like you’re getting any in the Tavern, I’d totally leave you be, you could even have Lace around um, you know, just, little warning and I’ll stay out of your hair! Warm cabin, proper um, you know. Privacy and beds and stuff. Just, you know, clean up your mess and whatnot.”

Sera’d meant Ellie needing time to herself and- and- whatever! But…well that sounded nice, she’d get more time with Inky if they was sharing the same roof, and a cabin…well getting things off in Josie’s office had been right exciting and fun during First-Day Eve…mention of mess made her brain jump to worry for a hot second trying to remember if they’d cleaned up after themselves, it wasn’t like they’d gotten full starkers and got everything everywhere, but they’d abruptly cleared off Josie’s desk, papers and pish all over the floor. Oh. Nope, yeah, they’d put it back to rights, Lacy’d been friggin cute, turning almost as red as her hair while she started frettin’ with getting everything back on the desk in the order it’d been in. Friggin punch packed a punch and tipsy Sera memories weren’t always crystal clear…in or out of the moment, she vaguely remembered being piss poor help cleaning up, but she’d tried. Anyway, point was, there’d be perks to a change in sleeping arrangement and Ellie wasn’t bullshitting about her offer—offering just to look like a good person in the hopes Sera’d say no so she got all the benefit of ‘I did a nice thing’ without the consequences of doing said nice thing. So,

“Alright Ink. Same goes for you though—you change your mind, just say the word, and in the mean time you need me to piss off, just say so.”

Oh cripes, that’d made Inky so happy. They got Sera moved in and everyone that needed to know someone was going to be sharing quarters with the Herald of Andraste, was updated.

“I don’t live in no friggin Tavern anymore you stalkery tit!” Sera called to Maryden as she slung her pack over her shoulder to finish moving in with Ink, put that in a lyric! Right weirdo!

And Mare’ and ‘sandra had been pleased with the change, someone they trusted spending nights in Ellie’s place, who could help if something happened, like an attack or Ellie having a nightmare or something. Though Cassandra made certain Sera understood it was a matter of responsibility, not play. She wasn’t to keep Ellie up at all hours for fun, and have her tired as she went about her scheduled day.

It was dumb! But Sera liked the idea of being responsible for Ellie. Someone she could rely on and who could be there for her. It was right fun getting to wake up and do the whole breakfast thing together, and now that Ellie knew how to read good, Marehis always let her read over her schedule for the day herself, she’d read it out loud as they wound down breakfast and that was boss! Cause Sera never knew when she’d get to see Ellie when they was in Haven other times, it was just sheer luck or a real hunt to find Ellie for playing or meals. But shite she hadn’t really realized just how much her schedule was. Like, Big! She had to be all over the place every single day, only coming back to the cabin to maybe change clothes or grab her staff or books—Ink stayed up late studying and her things got left all over the place, so Sera gathered them up and left her books and notes and things neat in a pile on the desk so Ellie could just swoop in and snatch up everything without having to forget something. It’d been silly for Ellie to think Sera’d ever need to ask for alone time—she was out almost all the time! It was…cripes! Normal day in Haven she woke up before sunrise to do the praying thing with Cassandra and Marehis, and then breakfast, and then she had her fightin lessons or etiquette lessons, then Russel time with Rainier, then either reading with Dorian or psychology with Bull, which the subtle Qunari had been turning into lunch with the Chargers, totally not so Kremmy-boy and Ellie got to see each other, shite the big Qunari was a softy. Then she’d be off to her slot magic training with Viv and Solas and then she was off with Varric runnin’ around doing his Street Smarts pish which wasn’t that bad, the way Ellie talked about it, it seemed like he tried to keep things fun. Sera decided to meet up with her after her lessons was over to see if she wanted fun before dinner if there was time, or after if magic training things went late. It was nice cause sometimes they’d get to play but Inky also popped around into Adan’s to see if he needed help with potion things or ingredients collected, and then she let Sera tag along to go see the Inquisition’s blacksmith since he was teaching her little things about weapons crafting—like with hammers and fire and everything! Made Sera nervous, but it was more exciting than ingredients picking, though that was easier to turn into tag or something. Tag was not allowed in the smith.

Sera also had something like a schedule this time around in Haven. Before it was just sort of hanging around, looking for fun, trying to catch Inky when she was free, and waiting for the next tour out of Haven. But now…ugh! She wanted to do more! Help more! So, she woke up early did the stretching and the prayer and saw Ellie off. Then she sat down in front of the fire and meditated the way ‘sandra said she should, until the Seeker came to get her. First thing after breakfast Cassandra either had to teach Ellie fighting, or she had Inquisition things to do while Ink was learning fanciness from Josie, but once that was done, Cassandra would stop back by the cabin and sometimes she was there meditating too when Sera came out of it, or she was just arriving and ready to start their lessons. Wednesday morning though, Ink was back to change from her fancy ‘Josie lesson’ clothes into her rougher things. That’d been kind of nice, she was nervous to tell her that Cassandra was teaching her magic defense things but,

“Awe Sera!” she doled out a squeezy hug and a big kiss on the cheek! “I’m so proud of you for facing your fears! If there’s anything I can do to help, let me know, yeah?”
There were…magey bits, parts of her training that involved mage assistance but uh, she definitely wasn’t asking Ink to help with that, nope!

They’d go to the stables and gear up Cassandra’s horse—good old Lexi. Alexandria, ‘sandra said, but that was too friggin long!

First morning after moving in with Ink, as they began riding out of Haven Cassandra said, “I do apologize for cancelling our lessons yesterday, Sera, truly. I would not have you believe I find your training unimportant.”

“Pfft, I wasn’t thinkin’ that ‘sandra, honest. I understand emergencies come up. Everything okay?”

“It was twofold. Firstly, the parents of Trevelyan, the mage man Eleanor journeyed to the Conclave with, reached out to the Inquisition to inform us of their impending arrival. Apparently they wish to meet Eleanor, and they’ll be arriving before the week is out.”

Oh. “That might make Ink sad, to see them yeah, but maybe it’ll help her feel better? Give her the chance to give them her condolences and pish.”

“I certainly hope so. I’m not displeased that the Trevelyans are coming, it is…well, we also received a rather unwelcome guest. He insists upon staying,” ‘sandra grunted the way she does when something chaps her, but she wasn’t makin’ it at Sera, didn’t do that quite so much anymore, “You know of Chancellor Roderick?”

Yeah, she heard of him, friggin’ prick. “Big hat bastard that wants Inky executed for the Conclave?”

“As we have garnered allegiance of both the Mages and the Templars*, he believes our cause may have merit. He wishes to lend his service to the Inquisition, reside in Haven and assist Mother Giselle in her work.”

“But, he was an asshole to Ellie! He got all up in her Hurt stuff—friggin’, Envy made her see-!” Oh, but bringing it up too hard might hurt ‘sandra too, she hated that she’d been part of what Inky saw in the Fade, “well, you know.”

“My qualms exactly.”

“Then tell ‘im to hit the bricks!”

“I would very much like to hit him with bricks, but unfortunately, he is still a powerful figurehead in the Chantry. His allegiance, no matter how after the fact or belligerent it is, is a blessing, will help with the Inquisition’s credibility and standing with the Chantry. Eleanor was given forewarning during our training this morning, that he is here to stay and she is ‘cool’ with that,” she sounded disappointed.

Oooohhh, “You wanted Inky to kick up a fuss! Cry to the advisors that she doesn’t want that asshole around!” Sera was ecstatic to accuse the Seeker.

“If she had I’m certain nothing would stall Cullen from casting that man out on his ear, he cannot abide Eleanor being upset. Lady Montilyet, tenderhearted as she is, would of course be understanding of the move if Roderick’s presence truly distressed the girl, and Leliana would not object once Josephine was of such a mindset.” Yeah, Sera could see that happening.

They’d ride out of Haven, down the road and across a bridge that was still under repair, it’d collapsed or something—Cassandra told her she and Ellie’d been crossing it on the way to the Breach when friggin a bolt of Fade fire shot out of the Breach and blew it up! Shite! It wasn’t super far, where they rode, it was on one of the paths to where the Temple of Sacred Ashes used to be. There was this drop of sorts, that sent them down to the place Ellie’d first ever closed a Rift, and they’d sit in the rubble and meditate until Sera could…blah it was creepy, but it was like she could feel the Fade, she guessed, like her brain pressing something cold but pliable. Focusing on that, Seeker helped her learn how to thin and strengthen the veil, manipulate it to stop it from influencing the world full stop in this place, and then backing off, allowing it to touch reality again. One morning Viv went out with them, meditating with them and then letting Sera try um…shite, actually suppress her ability to cast.

“It um…it won’t hurt you or nothin’ right?” Sera asked nervously. She definitely didn’t want to be hardcore on Viv’s bad side. Woman seemed to tolerate her for the most part, even nice sometimes, but she didn’t think she’d be super forgiving if Sera did something weird to her magic.

“It is not the most pleasant sensation,” Vivienne allowed, “but I quite assure you I have no qualms with it. Such practices have their place, obviously.”

Ugh. She was glad Cassandra was teaching her this shite, she’d…she’d be more help against baddie mages in fights and she was more comfortable with their allies casting on her now that Cassandra and Solas had set her down a few times and practiced, Cassandra demonstrating that she could tell what Solas was about to cast before his spell was in full fling, from things like body language, or how he was using his hands or staff, the glow of the magic used, and if you focused on the Fade like you meant to suppress it, there were other things, when Sera tried it she found it right, but it scared her, that she might accidentally suppress Inky’s magic, what if she hurt her? Or made her scared, make her think that Sera would do something like that on purpose—oh. That…somehow that made her understand it more, having Magic, a power you had to develop and control, that might hurt people you care about even if you’d never mean to ever. It wasn’t…it wasn’t people’s fault they was born with magic, if anything this, choosing to learn how to suppress magic, developing the ability, it was a choice, she had a lot more say in learning to do this, than the…er…Maker? she guessed? Going ‘Poof! Guess what! You’re a Mage now, and it’s gonna fuck with every facet of your life for forever, deal with it!’

But she could do this now, suppress magic, so she needed to practice, make sure she knew exactly what she was doing, and who she was doing it at, so she’d never ever ever use it on one of her friends on accident.

Though their lessons did get a chunk taken out of them, but Sera wasn’t gonna complain, shite. Another…she wasn’t sure if it was a benefit or not just, it was another reason she was glad she could be around to help was all. Thursday morning while she was meditating, waitin’ on ‘sandra, she’d snapped back to attention because she heard Marehis and Cassandra talking with someone and a quiet male voice answered her, she heard raspy, rattling breathing and Anya whining. When she got up from her place by the fire she saw Cullen coming into the cabin backed by Cassandra, Marehis, and Anya, the Commander carrying an unconscious Inky in his arms. Shite, shite. She was okay but frick, Cullen—he hadn’t been anywhere near Ellie, but he’d been demonstrating a move with his boot knife and after her ordeal with the advisors and knives in the Fade with Envy, she’d had an out in out panic attack. She calmed down, was fine in the sense she knew she was safe, but she was exhausted.

“She insisted she was not tired, and fell asleep not a minute later,” Cassandra reported quietly, little amused, yeah, that sounded like Inky.

They got her boots off and Marehis sat with her back against the headboard and Ellie resting against her, Sera laid down with her, Cassandra too, sorta, she sat at the foot of the bed and Cullen brought over Ellie’s desk chair to sit and wait, awe, poor Commander Dreamy, he looked absolutely wrecked over the whole thing. Anya pawed at the bed post so Cassandra reached down and hoisted her up, the puppy just wanted to be up with everyone, Sera worried she might wake Inky, but the Human girl slept through Anya crawling over her legs, sniffing like she were looking for something, and then ultimately ended up, oof, laying on her belly right in the curve between Sera’s ribcage and hip, arms and legs hanging and, letting out the occasional little wuff she did when she was sleepin’. Silly pup.

There was still almost two hours before lunch when Ink came to, her chest sounded clear, thank tits. Sera hadn’t meant to fall asleep exactly but she had, which was eh, a little nap never killed anyone…except maybe Cullen, he’d probably have a nasty crick in his neck from falling asleep slumped over in the chair, “Hey,” Ellie said softly, reaching out and Cullen jerked awake, hastily took hold of her offered hand.

“Ellie, how’re you feeling?” he asked, leaning forward in his seat, bringing Inky’s hand to his lips and pressing a kiss to the back of it before rubbing circles with his thumb.

“I’m okay, honest, I’m really sorry—”

“Eleanor, hush. It is I who should,” Cassandra sighed, hand resting over the blanket covering Ellie’s shin, “I am sorry, I did not consider you might be put ill at ease to see—”

“I didn’t think about it either—I’m not scared of Cullen, my brain just…isn’t always on the same page.”

“What do you feel up to now, da’len?” Marehis asked. “You’ve a War Room meeting this afternoon—of course if you’re unwell we can cancel, but the rest of your day is much more flexible. None of your friends would begrudge cancelling lessons, we sent word to Rainier already, he sends his regards, hopes you feel better.”

“Gosh that’s sweet of him. I do feel better, thanks for letting me rest—” she took in a sleepy sigh as she shifted to get her arm out from under her pillow and look at her watch, “next hour is with Dorian, reading, I’d just be studying if I stayed in my room so, I think I’ll go ahead and get back to schedule.”

“You sure Ink?” Sera asked, squeezing her a bit, her hair was soft when Sera pressed her face against the back of her head, “’sandra and me’ll probably still head out—we’re still on right?”

“Certainly,” Cassandra said, “I do apologize—you fell asleep and I did not wish to disturb you, but we’ve still time.”

“So you’d have the cabin all to yourself to rest an’ stuff.”

They compromised sort of—Ellie agreed to stay in, but Dorian was gonna come and they’d work here instead of him and Viv’s cabin.

When Sera was done with training things Cassandra usually had lunch with her, sometimes it was just the two of them, and sometimes they tracked down Ink and ate together as a group, but ‘sandra felt badly that their lesson had been cut into, so she treated Sera to lunch at Fliss’s.

“You’re coming along very nicely,” Cassandra said as they waited on their food, “you’ve made incredible strides in your training, in point of fact, I feel most confident you could be of assistance in suppressing the Breach.”

“I would not have said as much if I weren’t, it is truth, every word, you’ve done well, Sera,” Cassandra assured, friggin…blah! She sounded proud. Of her! “I would actually recommend you gauge your ability for yourself, this next stint out to the Oasis, that you attempt to assist with the Rifts when you’re of a mind to, I understand starting out it can be tiring.”

“You got it!”

“You’ve plans for the rest of your day?”

“Lace is gonna come help me prepare some more for first lessons with Ink—Josie let me have Fridays cause it’s…well, it’s not like readin’, Ink needs that, but this is more learning for interest. Give Ellie an idea of what she’d be learning—it can be a once a week thing or more just depending on if she likes it and how much. Plus it’ll give me at least the weekend for sure to fix any hinks in my teachin’. S’not somethin’ I’ve done before.”

“I beg to differ, Sera. You’ve done well enough already, teaching Eleanor a great many things—what you have taught her of play is no less important than her other lessons, and neither will your lessons in math and science be any less important than what she learns with any of us,” then, “it is good of you to prepare, but…well, you’ll be working with Lace Harding? If you’re pressed for time you needn’t multitask if that is what this is, an endeavor to balance your work with romantic interest—Eleanor will be in a meeting for a great deal of the afternoon, and I’m certain we could occupy her evening if you wish for privacy.”

“Nah—I mean, if you wanna spend the evening with Ink that’s fine but you don’t have to make special arrangements or nothin’—Lace is helpin’ cause yeah, she uh…wants to spend time with me, but she really does wanna help, her grand-ma was a school teacher, so she’s sort of always helped with things like that.”

“Her family is safe where they are?” Cassandra asked.

“Yeah, her ma and da live near the Horse master’s so, they were out of the way of all the magey templar bullshit.”

“And…things are going well, with your young lady?”

Sera nodded. “Yeah,” she smiled elbows on the table, burying her face in her hands, “I really like her, ‘sandra! She’s so! Just friggin cute! And the freckles!”

Cassandra grinned, “You and Miss Lace make a striking pair. You had a pleasant time at our First Day Eve party? It was a date, yes?”

"Yeah," she sighed happily, resting her arms on the tabletop, "we was just gonna go for drinks whenever we got back in, but it worked out to just go to First Day things together, drinkin' and dancing, it was great! Lacey's real sweet and fun, I like 'er a lot."

"I am pleased to hear you’re happy," the Seeker rested a hand on her forearm, “However, Maker forbid Miss Harding should ever make you otherwise, you may always have my ear, my aid if you needed it.”

That…frick that wasn’t- Sera was grateful their drinks were already there, that wasn’t supposed to make her throat clog up she didn’t think, but Maker. No one…no one ever took up for Sera before, not before she met Ellie anyway. She’d joined up with the Friends because that’s what it’d sounded like—little people taking up for other little people but there was something different about having friends you could put a face to, call on in an instant and they’d be there. And Sera… knew all too well how sideways things could get, how deep in it you could be with someone and it turns out they’re a shite person, that they’ve been using you or just, playin’ nice until you feel like you’ve put too much into the relationship to leave, learnt shite like that the hard way and had to rely on herself to get out and away, ‘sandra…being all protecty was…

Sera took a few sips of orange juice, before clearing her throat, “Thanks…same goes for you and Commander Dreamy.”

“I assure you I don’t know what you mean,” Cassandra said, fighting a smile.

Sera snorted, “Yeah you do, but you guys wanna be all cutesy quiet about it, whatever, just, know your offer goes both ways.”

Afternoons was spent like usual, the way she had been spending them all week, reading up on things, planning for her lessons with Ellie. Lace, just comin’ ‘round expressing interest, helped with Sera’s lesson planning. She was actually a big help, she and Sera’d talk through where Sera thought Ellie might be education wise, like what were things she’d be able to pick up quick or possibly already know from life experience, where to start with her, and how best to present new information.

“So…if I were your student, I’d automatically get an ‘A’ right, for sleeping with teacher?” Lacey asked Thursday afternoon when they had the place to themselves while Ellie was in a fancy-pants Chantry meeting. Well, mostly to themselves, Anya was snoozing away at the foot of the bed. Sera was sittin’ with her back against the headboard of Inky’s bed…hers too now, and Lace had been sitting facing her though now she was reclined back, foot crossed over knee, Sera’d been using her own legs to prop up her book against and Lace kept dragging her foot up and down Sera’s shin as she read over a rough draft for a worksheet Sera’d come up with to help Ink learn the table of…what was it? Elements! She knew things, Lace was just! Distracting—helpful but distracting how did that work?

“Nope, you get a B, for having A+ Bits,” ha! Friggin eat it! Technically Sera ate it in Josie’s office but…

“Now see, I think I deserve an A for my amazing—is what I call the Maker’s love!” Lace squeaked out, switching it way on around when she heard the door open, she shot up to sit upright, Anya shivered and gave out a little ‘wuff’ before she shook again and woke up, stretching back before rising up to look around. Lace was still winging, “We are all truly and wonderfully blessed by Him most high- oh hi Ellie! Oh…” she went quiet when she turned about to actually look at Ellie. Anya whined, dropping off the bed to go and paw at the girl’s feet.

Sera sat up, and her stomach turned, “Inky?”

She’d just sort of burst in, hadn’t closed the door behind her and she was trying to catch her breath like she’d been running, and crying, cripes, her eyes were all red and puffy, tears still streaming down her face and she was shaking, sniffling as she said, “I-I’m sorry, I didn’t mean…I was looking for Sera I didn’t mean to interrupt.”

“Oh, no, honey you aren’t interrupting,” Lace promised sincerely, “we’re just reading. I can go-”

Marehis came rushing into the room like she’d been chasing after Ellie, stopping just in the doorway to catch her breath, voice tearing from her throat in panic, “Da’vehnan! You cannot run off like that—never ever, do you hear me?!?” Trailed immediately by Cassandra catching up with her, shouting,

“Eleanor what were you thinking?!”

There was a window just next to Inky’s bed, Lace looked to it, then Sera, and she nodded, pushing against the window…huh, didn’t budge—oh yeah it could only be opened if Ink put magic on it…but that meant there was some kind of magic on it already so Sera tried focusing on the Fade, and on the window—that what was real, was that this window wasn’t physically barred and in reality it could swing open on its hinges, there was nothing real stopping it from doing so—and friggin boom! Not literally boom, it was quiet, not even a squeak of the hinges as the window panels opened outward and Lace pecked a quick, grateful kiss to Sera’s lips before she made quick escape to stay out of whatever was going on just now.

Which was not good since Ellie was whirling about to face Marehis and ‘sandra, shouting, “I don’t want to talk to you! I told you all to leave me alone!”

“And I had every intention of doing so once I escorted you back to your quarters, Ellie,” Marehis reasoned levelly, “Your safety comes first, even before your feelings, I understand needing to leave but you can. not. run. off. Not alone! And you know that!”

“Get out!” Frick that was loud!

“Eleanor!” Cassandra reprimanded, sounding right pissed, “You will not take that tone with Marehis!”

“I’m taking that tone with both of you! Leave me alone!”

Sera almost sprang off the bed, the air sort of whooshed out of her lungs because…well shite, she thought Cassandra had lost her limit with Ellie, the Seeker had surged forward, hand raised, and Sera was terrified Inky’d been in for a slap. She…no one was allowed to hit Ellie, not even if she was being a total brat but ‘sandra didn’t hurt her, just took Ellie’s face between her hands and pressed her forehead against hers, and spoke very quietly, tones firm and unwavering in her conviction, “Eleanor. We work tirelessly to keep you safe, from harm of every sort, you cannot ever risk that even when you are faced with something difficult and overwhelming. To your mind, you were running to the safety and security of your home. But the very moment you step foot out of reach, running to flee further, the only thing we can possibly think of, the only thing we feel is absolute terror at the countless things that could befall you. If anything, anything had happened, we would never be able to forgive ourselves. You will cease this senseless shouting, and you will apologize to Marehis for scaring her so, for disrespecting her authority and the work she does to keep you from harm.”

Ellie took in a shuddering breath, “I’m sorry,” she promised.

“You have behaved abhorrently tonight Eleanor, and we will discuss this later. We will leave you be, to think. Ambassador Montilyet will smooth things over with our guests—who traveled very far to speak with you of…Eleanor you will apologize to them, and Lady Josephine, so help me. They were rude, but they are hurting, you…it’s more considerate of such things, I’m ashamed you’ve put our Ambassador in an incredibly difficult position to clean up after. They were brash but they are grieving, a loss you both share but it is more so theirs, you understand that yes?” and when Ellie nodded it sort of rocked Cassandra’s right along with it,
“Good. You have behaved badly, Eleanor, but you have not lost our regard. We love you, I love you, and when you have had time to gather your thoughts, we will handle this together.”

“I love you guys too…I really am sorry. For running. And all the yelling.”

Cassandra took a deep breath and sighed, pressing a kiss to Ellie’s forehead before letting her go and moving to the door to stand with Marehis.

“Feel better, da’vehn,” the Elf woman said before she and Cassandra took their leave.

That…shite, Sera didn’t have a single clue what was happening. And she almost screamed for those two to get back in here when Inky fell to her knees, but she wasn’t hurt or sick, not physically, though she was gripping her head between her hands like a vise and whispering,

“I messed up, I messed up, I messed up, I messed up, crap!” and she whimpered when Anya whined at her. The puppy came to sit up with her front paws on Ellie’s knees licking at her face, awe, sad puppy, sad Inky, sad Sera.

“Ink?” Sera asked gently. Ellie wiped at her eyes and took Anya up in her arms before standing and coming to sit on the bed with Sera.

“Where…where did Lace go?”

“She jumped right out the window,” Sera told her hoping it sounded funny…kind of was, little Lace ejecting herself out of the situation as fast as possible.

“Oh gosh, she was okay right? Crap, I’m so sorry Ser’ I- I shouldn’t- this is your home now too, I shouldn’t have run away like that, and I should have knocked or…or gone somewhere else, but I really was looking for you-”

“Shh, Ink, it happens, it’s okay—you were looking for me and you found me, this…I’m not mad or upset, you didn’t interrupt me and Lace, not really we wasn’t up to nothin’. Even if you came busting up in here while I’m blowing her freaking mind, I’d still forgive you…might need you to forgive me since little yippy here would’ve been witnessing- I mean she’s a dog, sex things wouldn’t freak her out right? Do you think she’d know what was happening or be scared or whatever?”

Oh, good, got a little smile at that and Inky chuckled, hugging Anya more, “She’s just a baby Ser’ no having sex in front of the puppy! Put her outside or…dunno, give me a heads up that you want to do your thing, and I’ll make sure she’s with me.”

“Sounds like a plan,” Sera said, and there was a knock on the door then.

And then Commander Cullen came stalking in, holding a tray of…huh, smelled like warm milk and cinnamon coming from the teapot, a few mugs, and there were little cookies on a plate. What was even more bizarre than the Commander playing serving boy was his stilted speech, “Eleanor! That was abhorrent! I am oh so very displeased with you, young lady! Oh the outrage I feel could fuel a thousand fires!” he declared, everything sounding put on like he were acting for the benefit of someone who might be listening in, before he kicked the door closed behind him and brought over the tray to set it on the end of the bed, speaking softly, and actually meaning his warmness as he grinned at Ellie, “Tea and a snack, are you hungry Ellie? Dinner’s not for a while now. Oh sweetheart,” he sighed sympathetically, reaching out to cup Ellie’s cheek, thumb wiping at tears, “Everything’s going to be alright. Lord Trevelyan is an old troglodytic fool,” cripes that was fancy, “and Lady Trevelyan is—no offense to present company, womankind, or precious Anya—but she is a major bitch.” He smiled when Ellie huffed a little laugh, “They came here in hurt, to deliver something unkindly. But...I can honestly say, despite our obvious differences, Maxwell* Trevelyan and I are in rather the same boat. I do not doubt, not even in the slightest, that he meant every bit of what he wrote to them. You traveled together for some time to get to the Conclave and Eleanor, I can quite assure you—it took all of two weeks of interacting with you on the daily basis for me to know, without a doubt, I could not possibly love you more if you were my own flesh and blood. In fact if you weren’t half my age and I’d ever spent time in the company of a lovely Antivan before Lady Montilyet just this past year, I’d be seriously questioning your paternity,” oh yuck, Inky was smiley though even as her nose scrunched up at the thought. “He meant this for your good. He loved you and he wanted to do what was best for you. His family is resentful, but that’s on them. Their own selfish pride. Just, don’t entirely disregard his wishes because of their behavior. You do what is best for you, what you think is right, and forget about them.”

“Thanks, I love you lots. And I’ll think about it,” Ellie promised. “’s why I wanted Sera.”

“Then I’ll leave you to it. Guards will come take post soon,” he assured, dropping a kiss to her hair before heading for the door, and when he opened it, “That’s right! You just think about what you’ve done, young lady!” and then he sighed, satisfied, “I think I really set her straight—”

“You are reprehensible and imbecilic, and I hate that I am not wholly annoyed by your behavior,” Cassandra drawled out as Cullen closed the door behind him.

“Of course you aren’t, being reprehensible and imbecilic is all part of the Rutherford allure, according to my father, and he’s been ‘not wholly annoying’ my mother, forty years strong.”

“I despise you.” Ha! Yeah right, ‘sandra.

“Seeker Pentaghast, that sounds like a confession of your undying love—”

“You are horrible!” Seeker insisted belligerently.

Shite, Sera could hear his smile in his voice as he declared, “My longing for you could fuel a thousand fires!”

“Oh do shut up!” Cassandra said as she started walking away from the cabin.

“It is too late, you’ve inspired poetry!” he insisted laughingly, oh friggin Elf ears stop! Cassandra friggin, she giggled! Like! For real, as it sounded like the Commander picked her up, carryin’ her up the steps toward the Chantry. Were they being all open with their business all of a sudden? Nah, it didn’t sound like much of anyone was really out and about right now. Hoped not, cause she was pretty sure there was some PDA happening. Human hearing was shite, right? Inky hadn’t heard all that?

Didn’t seem like it, sappy stuff usually made her all smiles, but she flopped back onto the bed, petting Anya, chest rising and falling in a weary sigh, and there was this low sort of rattle in her breathing, so quiet it was just barely perceivable to Sera’s ears, she heard it sometimes after hard fights on the road or when Ellie trained hard or played a whole lot. Ugh, nope nope nope!

“Come on Inky, sit up, why don’t you wash your face, get comfy, and we’ll get snacky, drink something warm and you can tell me everything, alright?”

“Kay,” Ellie agreed. Yeah! Right on! She could do this! She could help! She stoked the fire good and went to check and make sure the door was closed up so it wasn’t letting cold air in, double checked the window by Ellie’s bed...good, it was shut, and the magic had snapped back into place, Sera was sort of worried she might have accidentally undone whatever enchantment kept it sealed, but nope! All good!

Ellie carefully took off her new boots the Blacksmith made her for her birthday, washed her face and changed out of her fancy pants—literally she’d been wearing the fancy kind of tunic and leggings—got into pj’s before leaning all the way forward so her hair swung down over her head and she worked to gather it all up in a bun she bound tight in a hair tie before she rose up and sighed hands resting on her hips as she decided, “If anyone wants to talk to the Herald of Andraste tonight, they can just deal with it.”

“Come on,” Sera said, holding out her arms to Ellie who came back to the bed and got right up on in there, big hug! Squeezes for sad Inky!

Sera got her a cup of the tea that Cullen brought, and they munched on cookies, Anya got a little jealous of their snacking, whining when they wouldn’t share but Sera and Ink weren’t sure if the cookies would be safe for her to eat, they was super sweet and vanilla-y, and she wasn’t allowed to have things like chocolate...they wasn’t sure why it made puppies sick and weren’t sure if vanilla* would do something similar. So, Sera popped up off the bed and got a few of those little cookies Cullen had ordered for Anya, they was shaped like little bones which Sera thought was kind of creepy, but they tasted alright—they were cookies so she tried ‘em! Friggin savory, like crispy crunchy meat cookies, just weird! So. Everyone had a little something to make them feel better, let Ellie sort of collect her thoughts before they set everything aside and the Human girl curled up against Sera, Anya in her lap, and filled in the details.

She’d had her meeting with the Trevelyans, Lord and Lady arrived in Haven and wanted to see Ellie immediately. They’d waited for months for their son’s will to be able to be read—it’d been sealed with some sort of Blood Magic, wouldn’t open until anyone he left anything to came of age, they thought they’d be waiting a few years, his eldest little cousin was only ten. But nope. Half way through Haring, they got a visit from their lawyer, the seal was broken and burning like a Phylactery. His will was read and meant to be used to find his beneficiary and execute his wishes.

Maxwell Trevelyan, only son of Lord and Lady Trevelyan, despite the whole ‘Circle’ thing, he was still nobility. He was expected to pick some Lady to be his wife, she’d live in Ostwick so they could be close, have ‘conjugal visits’ and uh, eventually pop out a little heir to Max’s pish. Except, there was just one tiny, tiny issue. If by some strange twist of fate, Maxell Trevelyan had ended up being Herald of Andraste, Ellie was pretty sure he’d have had a major crush on Cullen, swiftly forgotten once the Iron Bull came into the picture. A ‘wife’ definitely wouldn’t suit him, and neither did family either really, from the way he talked. He’d had loads of cousins, with kids he loved to pieces but he’d never imagined ever wanting one he had to take care of, be responsible for, himself—liked swooping in a handful of times a year to soak up all the fun and giggles and good times, the pride of seeing them meet milestones like seeing how much better they was walking or talking since the last time he saw them, he just didn’t ever feel like ‘Oi, I want to do all the hard work of constantly watching and caring for a little brat of my own, be there for all the ugly bits, the crying and tantrums and pitfalls of parenthood’. He liked picking them up and having fun, then passing them back when they were done.

Then he meets this little apostate brat, who doesn’t have anyone else in the world he can pass her back to, and apparently, he hadn’t hated it, according to what he wrote his parents. It wasn’t like Ellie thought he’d claim responsibility over her, they had a common goal, were working toward it, and she figured after the Conclave they’d go their separate ways, yeah it’d be sad, and she really hoped they’d see each other again. But apparently good old Maxy had other plans.
He hadn’t wanted to propose the idea to Ellie until after the Conclave was settled and he knew what their prospects would be, freedom wise, but he’d written his parents to inform them he’d come to a solution for their situation. There was a young lady he held interest in, just, not romantically of course—but why not cut out the middle woman? It was stupid to fuss with having a wife for zero reason other than straight up putting a bun in her oven, when he had a fully cooked, walking talking, living breathing kid he already loved, wanted to provide for and take care of, enjoyed the hell out of the good times with, wanted to be there for to face any bad that might come. Depending on how things went down at the Conclave, he said he thought either Ellie might like to return to Ostwick with him, come up in a Circle, get a proper education, have him around to guide and protect her, or, if she didn’t want to be Circed, at the very least he could provide her a place to stay, live nearby, she could come see him on a regular basis, family visits, they’d keep her apostacy on the down low and he’d take care of anything she needed, take the brunt of any backlash if her mage status got discovered. Coming up in a Circle was all he knew, and it admittedly terrified him, but he thought if things really didn’t go their way at the Conclave, yeah, he could go on the run, travel and live on the road, like Ellie just…better funding. She wouldn’t have to worry about where she was going to lay her head or where her next meal was coming from. He informed his parents of all this, that he was claiming Ellie as his dependent, put in for all sorts of paper work—get her proper documentation, she’d be considered a citizen of the Free Marches, ‘Eleanor Trevelyan’, and he already made it clear in his last will and testament, updated just barely a week before the events of the Conclave, that if anything happened to him, ’Ellie’ would be his sole heir, sealed the will with just a little bit of minimally-demon-involved Blood Magic—same sort of ritual used to make Phylacteries—it wasn’t like there weren’t loads of opportunities Ellie supposed, it’d been kind of a rough trip, he’d used some blood from an injury of hers.

So. Lord and Lady Trevelyan came to settle things, they had to legally inform Ellie what she was due, their lawyer even came along with them, arranged the trip for them in the first place because they were coming up on the deadline of when they absolutely had to execute their son’s will. Except the noble couple didn’t say shite about any of the legal nonsense, they just told the advisors that their son had written them so much about Ellie, and they’d wanted to meet her. When they showed up, their lawyer informed Ellie and the advisors about the will business, and then Lord and Lady Trevelyan turned their ‘pressing need to get to know Max’s sweet young friend’ into ‘plot twist! we’re here to rail at a little girl for things she has no control over’, things she didn’t even know about! Shite, shite, Sera held Ellie tight when the younger girl started crying—it was like losing him all over again somehow, if that made sense, it was hard enough not having him around anymore so suddenly but…on a small scale she’d been prepared for that—when they entered the Temple of Sacred Ashes, she thought the next time they passed through those doors, it would be to go their separate ways. But now it turned out that was never supposed to be the case, Max had wanted her, wanted to keep her and be in her life, they would have been family! And now she knew that’d been taken away, the full scope of what she lost that day and it was crushing her. It’d already been a major blow, the Trevelyans delivered in informing her of this, but then they topped it off with their distain for a future she was mourning the loss of—they accused her of manipulating their son! They talked down about his foolish life choices, disrespected him, disrespected Ellie, all while playing the politeness game—same way Viv did sometimes—so when Ellie couldn’t take any more, popped off at them, she looked like trash. An angry kid, showing her lowborn roots. Cassandra and everyone had expected Ellie to be able to keep her cool enough, let Lady Josie handle things diplomatically. But Ellie’d completely lost her chill, yelled at the Trevelyans in defense of their own son, and that turned into them saying how very rude and horribly she was behaving toward them, they were still mourning his loss after all, and he’d been their son, he’d been nothing to her—which wasn’t ruddy true! Yeah, Sera got that they was still hurting over Max’s death, the loss of relatives that had been at the Conclave, that…shite that had to be awful, that wasn’t the way things were supposed to be. Kids was supposed to bury their parents not the other way around, and frick, it wasn’t even like there’d been anything to bury. That’d been…shite, the first thought she’d had when Inky got blasted by that Alexius asshole was ‘Frick frick frick this isn’t happening, it isn’t it isn’t!’ followed by the decision that she was going to kill basically every single person in that fucking place and then this hollow thought: There wasn’t a body to bury. If…if there was it’d be…there’d be at least one more chance to take care of Inky. Something to do, some way to help. Clean her up, make her body pretty, comfy, tuck her in for a long sleep.

Ugh! Nope, anyway, she got that what they’d gone through was hard, and horrible. But shite, they’d not been willing to accept their son’s decision when he was alive, and they hated that they had to respect it now that he was dead. The last thing they ever sent to their son was ridicule for his ridiculous decision, that he was being foolish and fooled, that some little apostate witch was taking their son for a ride, endearing herself to him for his things. They’d fought the decision tooth and nail, but they couldn’t touch any of their son’s assets. It was—it was just money! They had plenty of their own, what the fuck did they care, their son is dead, his money wasn’t going to bring him back! And when he was alive, they stuffed him in a Circle, resented him because he wouldn’t make a family. Then he does find family, gets a taste of what that life could be like and loving it, thinks he can make something great and special without any of the hurt or falseness that would come with forcing a family out of his situation, and they hate that for him. Then he dies. So they came here, hoping to scare Ellie off, convince her their son had made a mistake, that she didn’t want any part of his decision. Ink couldn’t stand being in the same room with them anymore, and she hated that she’d let her advisors down, that she’d started yelling and embarrassed herself and only escalated a crappy situation. But at the same time, she felt like…like Lady Josie and Leliana and Cullen and Cassandra weren’t on her side when they pulled her out of the War Room and tried to talk her down, she threw a fit, said rude things she felt bad about now, and bolted.

Sera was glad she had one of those, ugh, friggin nice little hankies Solas made her, tucked away in her pocket. She handed one off to Ellie, so she could wipe at her eyes, blow her nose if she needed to, frick, her nose was all stuffy. If she got sick, Josie sweetness could just deal with it, she’d be cleaning up after Sera murdering nobility! Might murder them anyway, friggin! Pricks!

“What should I do?” Ellie croaked out as she hugged Sera tighter.

Oh. Yeah, she’d wanted to talk to Sera specifically but…she thought like, it was a ‘Ugh I just had an awful experience and I wanted to vent about it to my friend who I know will be on my side and everyone else can just eat it!’ deal.

“Shite Ink, I…I dunno. Why would you ask me?”

“Well you…you sort of have experience with this. Signing away an estate or whatever. I’m not sure what that means? Max didn’t own property or anything.”

Oh…oh yeah. Alright. This was…huh. Yeah, first few days after Lady bit the big one Sera’d been mad trying to figure out just what the fuck she was supposed to do with everything, manage an estate, how to move forward, wished someone had been there that knew anything worth knowing, to help and advise her. She’d had to figure everything out all on her own. She hadn’t wanted all that, being in charge of people and a place, power through wealth with little to no accountability. Zero accountability, Sera didn’t answer to anyone. And that was dangerous, Lady didn’t have anyone she was accountable to, and she’d been just about the worst sort of person Sera could imagine being.

But…well frick, should Inky do the same? Just cause that was what was best for Sera, and it really had been, she didn’t regret her decision, it came with all sorts of strings attached, she would have had to play into the societal bullshit Lady was involved in, to have any sort of peace in her life if she’d stayed and kept everything, but that didn’t mean that was what was best for Ellie.

Okay. Facts. Facts were good, real things, they needed to put all the pieces together and figure things out from there—“Did they give you any papers, Ink? Documents or whatever?”

Ellie nodded. “I don’t have them but yeah, there’s a whole stack of stuff they brought along for me.”

Hmm, there was all sorts of spooky stories about looking into a mirror or lighting a candle and saying a name three times to summon some horrible thing. Sera closed her eyes and, “Cole! Cole! Cole!”

“And Ellie was hurt so I came. I was listening—you’re doing great,” Cole assured her, “but you think you need my help?”

Frick! Sera nearly jumped all the way out of her skin! Cole just! Friggin appeared on Inky’s desk! Why did he like sitting up on tables and bedframes?

“I like to be up high. I can see everything better.”

“Stop! Stop being in my brain business! I need your creepy poofing abilities! Go-“

“Oh! I can do that!” Cole enthused before vanishing.

And then poof, before Inky could even question what Sera was having him do, he was back, center of the room, standing like a semi-normal person, arms full of parchment. He set everything on the desk and then whirled around to come over to the bed.

“You won’t like it, you might want to move,” Cole gave her some warning, and she had just enough time to let go of Inky so Cole could wrap the Human girl up in a hug. Huh, he was getting better at it she guessed, and he only did it when Ink wanted one so…it was okay.

“They want to talk with you, the advisors, Cassandra, Marehis, to understand why you yelled,” Cole said, “I sent them Dorian. They would hear you, if you told them, but he can speak from a place of experience you don’t have. He will help them understand why you heard hurt and hate where they heard…not kindness, but indifference, something they did not think you would react to the way you did. It isn’t that they wouldn’t support you sticking up for Trevelyan, it is that they do not know they should. They will need you to talk with them later like you did Sera—they didn’t know you felt that way, loved Trevelyan as much as he’s shown he loved you. They thought he was just a friend, an ally, not someone you’d come to depend upon, who you were dreading saying goodbye to, that you loved him just as much as you love them now. You have context they don’t.”

Ellie’s chin quivered at that. “I wasn’t very fair to them, I was so mad they didn’t take my side, I didn’t stop to think about why they wouldn’t. They didn’t know Max so…yeah, I guess they didn’t realize all those backhanded comments his parents were making were backhanded to begin with. And I…yeah, I haven’t talked about it much, missing him. Oh gosh I must have looked crazy!”

Cole pulled back and looked at her hard, raising a hand to poke at her cheek as if to make certain, “No you…you look the same as usual. At least you did, in the War Room,” he said looking at the big, fluffy bun atop her head, he pat it a few times to see what it would do.

Ellie smiled at that, that hadn’t been what she meant but still, “Thanks, Cole.”
Anya yipped at the Spirit boy and Cole crouched so his face was level with the edge of the bed and he let the puppy sniff at his face and lick his cheek. “You are a very good girl,” he said, the uncertain but sincere way he said things when he wasn’t sure why but he knew it was something that would make someone happy to hear, and then he scratched behind her left ear, her little tail thumping against Ellie’s knee.

Cole beat it then, and Anya yipped at the empty space, yeah! Poofing was weird! Sera was glad it was just them again…hopefully. He didn’t have to watch everything all the time! Jeeze! She didn’t totally dislike the guy but it was creepy! Spirit shite! He was always in everyone’s heads and Sera didn’t like dealing with herself in her own head half the time, she definitely didn’t want someone else mucking around in it!

They ended up using the floor, sitting with their backs to the fire so they could be toasty and spread all the papers out. although paper on the floor gave Inky pause and she looked to her puppy sniffing at one of the pieces of parchment.

“…Anya, precious baby pup, I love you, but you cannot go potty on important papers.”

Anya’s little ‘wuff’ wasn’t very assuring to Inky, so she got up and tugged on her boots and took her pup outside to do her business if she needed to. Sera splayed her hands against papers she was worried might fly when the door opened but it wasn’t super drafty, so everything stayed put. Alright. Focus. What’s what here.

There was documents for identification purposes, Trevelyan used blood magic, everything had seals at the bottom made from Ellie’s blood, they were hot to the touch, glowing red but as Ellie got further away, they cooled and dimmed. Weird, but it would work. Chantry officials would have to watch Ink sign them, but that wouldn’t be difficult to work out, Sera could step outside and toss a rock, hit someone that’d work. Advisors had been working on trying to get Ellie documentation, everything she’d need now that she was of age, so she could have things like bank accounts and legal identification and do businessy things, sign an actual contract with the Inquisition, but they were struggling to get the ball rolling since Ellie didn’t have anything to verify her identity on paper, no birth certificate, nothing. Trevelyan had already done all the work. He got it set up, was giving her a name, proper last name. And then there was his will, shite! Sera’d picked it up while it was folded, and Ellie’d been right there, and her hand just glanced off the seal, it had been burning real warm, the paper sort of thrummed like energy was moving through it. Ink wasn’t the only one he left pish to—Trevelyan hadn’t owned any property, but he had a great deal of inheritance from grandparents and aunts and uncles. He’d portioned everything out, Ellie was entitled to a large chunk of change, but so were his cousins kids, little ones he considered ‘nieces and nephews’, they’d have access to it whenever they got old enough. Oh. Oh frick.

Sera knew why those assholes were so upset over this. Friggin—bullshit!

Kay so there’s this concept of old money blah blah blah, basically nobility, royalty, they like to keep their titles and more importantly, their wealth, in the family. Literally, Sera’d met so many. inbred pricks coming up, she swears Lady Emmauld’s cousins, husband and wife, are ruddy brother and sister! Might be friggin twins—it wasn’t a racist ‘all Humans look the same’ deal, it was straight up they looked exactly the same! Like one another in a wig! That’s how bad some families worked to keep their wealth and titles to themselves. Sera’d had to make the choice she did because it was either be ‘Lady…not important…Emmauld’ and wealthy or be ‘Sera’ and not. But Trevelyan, Sera couldn’t speak for the guy but shite, it seemed like he knew Ink wouldn’t be about that, being nobility, or whatever, he…he was giving her the name but none of the title. She could just be ‘Ellie Trevelyan—no relation’. His parents were pissed because they were considering it a loss—a chunk of their precious family fortune would be in the hands of someone who didn’t have to work inside their family unit, Ink wouldn’t owe them spit, didn’t have to marry someone they approved of or pop out a baby for their name, or anything! Just, run around with all the benefit of having a proper name, and having some financial stability from what they considered their money.

And that…that’s what this would be, some stability, it wasn’t a lifetime of gold, but it wasn’t anything to sneeze at. A safety net. Sure things could go sideways but…this wasn’t the same situation Sera’d been in. Ink…not even an hour ago, there was three different adults making her accountable for her actions…alright two, Cullen was a ruddy enabler, Sera was pretty sure Ellie could burn Haven to the ground and Cullen would be cheering her on and fanning the flames, ‘You’re doing amazing sweetheart! I’m sure Haven deserves it! Whoo!’ Okay maybe not that extreme but basically, he’d been the only one automatically on Ellie’s side of things with the Trevelyans it sounded like, like he hadn’t gotten exactly why Ellie was mad—he was confused but he had the right spirit Sera guessed. There were people around who didn’t let Ellie just get away with shite, when she did wrong by herself or others, she got called out, by the Iron Bull—he friggin bit her!—Cassandra, Marehis, everyone. She had loads of guidance wherever she could possibly need it. And this was…shite Trevelyans had done this out of love, not obligation, Cullen was right about that, had a point that Ellie shouldn’t disregard his wishes. It wasn’t mere circumstance, bland resignation. It was something he chose to do because he wanted to make sure Ellie was taken care of.

“Good girl, Anya, good job!” Sera’s head snapped up, shite she meant to be listening in case Ink got into trouble outside! Oh but there was guards posted now so, eh. Ellie was back, safe and sound, Anya at her feet, sniffin’ at her boots.

“Hey Ink, come sit,” Sera said. Ellie came and sat beside her, tucking little baby curls behind her ears as she looked curiously over the spread of papers and then to Sera. “I think…I think you should do it. Respect Max’s wishes. I think he’d like it, um, you know? He really did want to take care of you, help you come up and have a hand in your future. This is the only way he can do that now. You don’t have to make any big big decisions just yet. Though the name thing…shite Ink, it’d take so much work off Leliana and Josie, they’ve been working on getting you proper set up, you know? They was struggling, but Trevelyans got it all put together, you literally just have to sign in front of like, Mother Gisselle, have Josie notarize it. If you feel nervous about the money, you don’t have to touch it. Don’t sign it all away out the gate, but maybe put it away, for later. For when you’re older and need to make big money decisions, like if you wanna do some sort of big schooling or start a business or get place of your own. You might have enough scratch on your own to do things like that, but this would just, you know, be sitting there, security, or flexibility, it could give you options like for donating to things that matter to you, financing charities or initiatives you want to help out with. But only do that once you know for sure what you wanna do, can move forward informed and certain of your decisions.”

“Oh…gosh…” Ellie seemed to think about it a minute and then she looked to Sera and raised a hand to feel at Sera’s forehead like she was checking for a fever. “You’re feeling alright, Ser’? That was…that was really adult sounding.”

“Oh you little brat,” Sera smiled as she wrapped Ellie up in a hug, squeezing her tight, “I’m not the best at being an adult but I’m growed up! So you gotta listen to me! Got it?” big kiss to the side of her head, for her precious little growing-up brain!

“Got it!” Ellie promised, hugging her back.

“…and Ink, if the name thing bothers you, like you want something of your own, or if you don’t want to associate it too much with Lord and Lady Trevelyans, accepting the name now means you got one you can just legally change later,” Sera said as she let Ellie go, sitting back as she promised, “I could walk you through that real easy. People do it all the time when they get married, but you can do it just…’cause. Takes a few months*, least it did when I did it, but it’s worth it if it gives you…dunno, it’s just a good feeling having a name you can be proud of.”

“You changed your name?” Ellie asked, curious.

Sera nodded. “You and Anya can keep a secret?” and when Ellie nodded, “Seda*.”

Inky’s brow creased as she looked up at her, confused. “Silk?”

“Se-da-”

Ellie giggled, “Seda’s Antivan for silk,” she explained.

Oh yeah. Wasn’t much to remember, from Clan-time. Sometimes there was these little fleeting things like the vague memory of being carried, tiny and small, secured to someone’s back as they traveled on foot, tip of an ear that tickled her forehead when it wriggled. Mare singing that old Elf lullaby to Ink had just about made Sera bolt, first time she heard it in the Hinterlands, right…right familiar, and she hated that. What came before didn’t matter a bit when it came to the now. Seda being…yeah. They…they’d migrated from those parts. Annnd it didn’t matter. Some bullshit happened, followed by more bullshit, and just a little more, then some fun stuff and now she was here. That’s what mattered. “Well, I used to be Seda Emmauld. First girl I was ever uh…in it with, misheard me when we met, called me ‘Sera’ and I was too shy to correct her.”

“Gosh, I can’t imagine you ever being shy.”

“I was… I had a lot of anxieties, pressures. Things that made me second guess every decision, every word I said, everything I did. I was too embarrassed to correct her, worried she’d be insulted or something. But then it…it just sort of became a name that meant me, people who knew me by that name were the sort I could just be myself around with none of the stress or obligations I had in my life. When Lady was finally gone, I just wanted a total break, so. Sera Jones—most regular sounding last name I could think of, not like I use it much anyway.”

“I’m really happy you’re you, you’re amazing and I’m so proud of you!” Inky said, sincerely, taking Sera’s hand in her unmarked one, “You’re my absolute best friend, you know that right?”

She’s amazing, someone to be proud of, does she know she’s perfect as she is? Old hate should have no hold on her. Shite! Cole friggin… it felt weird enough when he was talkin’ from Ellie’s head, and, ugh!

Sera’s throat, eyes ached, “You’re my best friend too Ink. Best friend I’ve ever had.”

She got a big hug, Ink tackled her, knocking her on her side, “Thanks Sera. For talking me through everything, I feel a lot better. I mean my brain is still catching up with everything, today was crazy. I really really appreciate you helping me! Mwah!” Anya yipped and Inky squeaked when the pup climbed on top of her, their little Friend pile—lil Anya was officially a Friend, decked out in a soft woven collar to match their Friendship bracelets.

She friggin helped the crap out of that! Yeah! “Anytime, Ink!”

“We should probably get all these back to the Chantry,” Ellie said as she wrapped an arm around Anya to keep her from falling when Ellie sat up. Sera got up too and started gathering all the papers as Ellie offered, “I can call Cole if you want, I know he still makes you uncomfortable.”
…Cole was the least of her concerns just now as she stared at the seven little numbers scratched out on Ellie’s identification document. 01-01-9:26. Fuck.

“Actually Ink, would you be okay here by yourself if I went and returned these? I’m uh, all Cole’d out for the day, and I can sneak these back fine. It’ll be fun, like a secret mission.”

“I’d be fine here, Anya’s guarding me after all,” Ellie said, snuggling the pup in her arms. “You’d be okay though? Do you want me to come with you?”

“Nah Inky. You just stay here and relax a bit. I’ll stop on the way back and get dinner things rolling.”

“If you ask Fliss for extra rolls, I will love you so so much. Like a billion times more than I already do—it feels impossible but I’m pretty sure I can do it!”

“Don’t hurt yourself Ink, ‘s’just bread,” Sera laughed as she gathered up everything in a neat stack.

Cripes it was friggin cold out. Kay. Chantry, Adan’s, Flissa’s. Go!

There wasn’t much sneaking about it, didn’t need there to be anyway, so it sorted that the Advisors and everyone—’sandra, Marehis, Dorian—was in Lady Josie’s office, Sera could hear them talking as she approached, sounded like they was chattin’. Oh. Nope. Whoops—

“I swear I put them right here,” Lady Josie was saying.

“You’re certain they’re not in the War Room?” Cullen asked.

“Yes! I took them from the Trevelyan’s lawyer myself, spoke to him momentarily in the hall…”

Sera rapped her knuckles against the door before coming in, “Lookin’ for these?”

“Sera,” Cassandra greeted, rising from where she’d been leaning against Josie’s desk, “What…how did you?”

“Sorry Josie sweetness, Ink wanted my advice but didn’t have all the details. Cole swiped the papers for me, but you know, he doesn’t know any better. I asked him so, it’s on me if you’re pissed,” Sera said, handing the stack over to Josie.

Josie breathed a sigh of relief as she took everything in hand, laid it on her desk. “Thank the Maker, and you, Sera. I am not…displeased.”

“Lord and Lady still hanging around?” Sera asked, she hadn’t seen anyone fancy looking in the Chantry, present company excluded.

“The Trevelyans have been sent on their way,” Cassandra said. “Given the circumstances, and a bit more thought on the matter, their behavior was abhorrent, their mourning gives some excuse for how brashly they treated Eleanor. She certainly needn’t apologize to them and they, no interest in speaking to her further.”

“Good riddance,” Cullen muttered, rubbed him the wrong damn way people being mean to Ink huh?

But they might not want to let those assholes get too far away. “Cool, but maybe you should get them back, apprehend them or whatever the frig.” Sera informed them, “Ellie told Max when she ups her age. Member how we was tryin’ to figure out who blabbed about her birthday to Gaspard? Check it. Paperwork, stuff Max filed to get Ink documentation. He got her papers that list her date of birth as 01-01-9:26”

Lady Josie nodded that she’d seen as much, “Yes, wh-” clicked for her then.

“Papers the Trevelyans have been in possession of since his will unsealed upon Eleanor’s true coming of age some weeks past,” Cassandra ground out.

Cullen was already in motion, heading for the door, “They only just left, if I go now I can cat-“

“Wait!” Leliana called to halt him. “We…Cullen we do not have proof, evidence. The pollen filled envelope was destroyed to keep it from spreading, the whole of the immediate threat was eradicated, and the only thing we have is a Spirit who claims to have tracked down the person that paid for the order…we traced everything back to Duke Gaspard and that evidence is, our Spirit friend, who we know we can trust, said so.”

“But I friggin saw the bouquet and the pollen and everything!” Sera argued! Don’t! Don’t stop the man—let Cullen loose! Hunt those arseholes down, make them eat his feather pauldrons! Sera’d help! “And so did my Friend, and Adan and Solas! And they friggin! I mean they had it perfect! Their motive is friggin not wanting Ink to have what Max left her—but they was coming to execute the will like they got to, and oh it’s just too bad she friggin died before they could reach her! Oh well!”

“We could possibly get a court to believe such a thing occurred, I don’t doubt that,” Leliana agreed, “what I am saying is: Duke Gaspard orchestrated the hit, we have no evidence that the Trevelyans offered him information on just when to strike. While the timing is certainly convenient for their motives, they did not hold their ground and expose themselves, they delivered what they were required to, attempted some very benign looking methods of scaring Eleanor off from accepting her inheritance, and took their leave. At most it is conspiracy and it would take a terrible stretch to prove as much. Her birthday is such a small detail that could have easily been offered in ‘innocence’ or at least made to appear as such.”

“That’s! That’s friggin—ugh!” Sera wanted to punch something! People! Lots of them!

“Although,” Cassandra said, sounding like perhaps she were onto something, “Maxwell Trevelyan knew of Eleanor’s asthma. She mentioned as such when we were on the Storm Coast, Varric was concerned we had not done enough to assist her, and she told us the tale of how she’d had an attack on the way to the Conclave that caused Trevelyan to, quote, ‘totally freak out’, she’d had to more so help him handle it than he was of aid to her.” she held up a hand to halt Leliana when the Spymaster looked like she were about to refute that mattering, “Lord Trevelyan said he was pleased to see Eleanor in such fine health, seeing as Haven’s weather cannot possibly be suitable for her constitution. Is it not possible Maxwell informed his parents of Eleanor’s condition? They said his letter to them was extremely detailed, he’d told them all about her.”

“It is,” Leliana agreed, “Meaning it’s entirely possible the Trevelyans not only offered up the opportunity of her birthday, but the method with which to strike. I’ll see what my agents can dig up, perhaps there is some sort of paper trial. Letters and the like, between the two conspiring.”

“My god this is good drama,” Dori spoke up. Dummy. But he breaking the tension so, eh. “My head is spinning from it—and here I thought the south would be boring.”

“She was rude, and we did not realize why she would be so very upset over their lamenting their son not marrying. Nor their hand in Gaspard’s attempt against her,” Josie reminded her, yeah, they had reason to misunderstand and think Ink needed correction.

“What was it she said that made you decide to excuse her from the room? …Vite la a chingwada?” Cullen asked Lady Josie.

“Vete a la chingada,” she rattled off the correction, “When our lady shouted at our esteemed guests that they could ‘go to hell’, I thought perhaps she should take a moment to cool off. Now, I appreciate the sentiment.” Ohh cool, now Lady Josie was displeased, friggin’ cute seein’ her pissed!

“Thank you Sera, for bringing this to our attention,” Marehis said, holding out a hand to Sera, pulling the younger Elf to her side when she accepted it, wrapped her arms around her shoulders, “That was such a good catch.”

“Just…tryin to help Ink,” Sera said, oh shite! “She’s gonna accept it, sign everything is that…I mean I told her to, but if it en’t safe, I can tell her I thought about it some more and think she should just drop it.”

Spymaster considered it a second, “We will think on it but as it stands…I think it would be rather fitting, Eleanor ending up with what they sought to keep from her. Too, leaving it unclaimed could only encourage them to strike again, kill her before she can change her mind,” Leliana reasoned out.

“And we have not been able to secure documentation for Eleanor, it…well obviously in order to do so, it requires a measure of blood magic, to verify her identity,” Josephine said, “That is not a step we’re willing to take, neither do we believe Eleanor would be comfortable with it. However there is no going back and stopping Maxwell Trevelyan for using her blood in such a way.”

Cullen nodded in agreement, and then, “How…how is Ellie? Is she still upset?”

“She’s okay,” Sera said, “You should come see for yourself you tits—Dori too, if you like. I’m getting ready to go put in an order for dinner, you can come have a good talk with Ink and eat together. Her place, she’s done Heraldig today, she’s in fully jammy mode. Her cloak here? She wasn’t wearing it when she uh, got home.”

Cassandra looked to everyone and nodded. “Yes—to both dinner, and her cloak and things,” she said, and Marehis let go of Sera to go gather Ellie’s things, oh, they was draped over the back of the chair in front of Josie’s desk, her cloak and scarf. Cool.

“Alright! Let’s go. How do you wanna do this?” Sera asked, as she led them out of Josie’s office, “You lot can tell me what you want from Fliss’s and head on over to see Ink. Or you can go put in our orders, while I do something real quick—either way, I’m stopping at Adan’s first.”

Cripes! Friggin squeezy grip on her arm, ouch, and she had to stop ‘cause miss grabby stopped, oh. But maybe she deserved it, ‘sandra looked pretty well gut punched with concern as she looked Sera over, “I thought Healer Adan cleared you from your brush with blood lotus, are you feeling unwell?” Shite!
“‘m fine, ‘sandra. It’s a stop for Inky-”

Wasn’t much better, “Our argument has made Eleanor physically ill?”

“Fenedhis!” Marehis swore, hand reaching at her hip where Inky’s potion bag was, “I did not-! Elgarn’nann I cannot believe I forgot to leave her potions-!”

“People don’t make people sick…’cept with germs or whatever,” Sera said to ‘sandra, and then to Marehis, “and calm your tits Mare, you think of about fifty bajillion ways to keep Ink safe every second of the day, don’t beat yourself up forgetting her potions in the middle of all that mess. Besides I asked Adan about backups in case of emergency—I have a little stash on me of potion for her tummy, panic attacks, asthma shite.”

“Oh, All-Father bless you,” Marehis breathed.

Blah, alright, if he has to. “Ink’s not ill, not really. But her breathin’s still rattley, you know, the way it gets?” that got her blank stares from the Human population but Marehis nodded, “Just, hasn’t gone away yet, and she’s been sleeping with that Embrium salve stuff on her chest all week, s’used up. I figure she should probably go ahead and put some on, and I’m gonna see if Adan has blossoms to spare, get some steamy stuff goin’, dry air’s gotta be ki- er, it’s gotta hurt, you know?”

“You’ve been keeping your cabin warm, making tea and embrium steam to help with he-” Marehis looked sort of teary, eyes glossing over, “Sera.”

Cassandra released her hold on Sera’s arm, patting it a bit in apology, “Yes, thank you for thinking of such things. We can handle dinner while you see Adan.”

“Sera, da’len, we saw er, you were in the middle of entertaining Miss Lace,” Marehis said, “I apologize you were interrupted, if you wish, I could make arrangement for your privacy—Solas wouldn’t object to lending you use of his cabin-“

“No offense but that’s bit weird, he’s always Fade dreamin’ and he goes to sleep places so he can see shite that happened there.” Marehis nodded that that was understandable. “We was just getting things ready for my slot with Ink tomorrow—I get plenty of privacy in our set up, but thanks.”

‘sandra wrapped an arm around her shoulders as they left the Chantry, walked the path to Adan’s. “I’m glad your new living arrangement suits you but I agree with Marehis, you are due some reward…” Cassandra pondered. And then, “Sera,” she cleared her throat, “you…wish to pull one of your ‘Friend’ pranks, upon Haven’s cook, to cheer his stressed staff?”

Wait. Wait. Wait, frick, really?! “Sandra…do you mean for re-?”

“There are some rules.”

She’d already thought about it loads especially after Ink explained his harshness—she got it but if he kept everyone wound so tight, eventually…well everyone needed knocked back a peg every now and again, and those beneath them could use a good laugh. “Nothing that’ll mess with Haven’s food schedule, or make him contaminate the whatever—cause everyone can get sick ‘n pish.”

“I would recommend striking at the end of day—his most weary staff members will surely bear witness, and it won’t run the risk of interfering with anything you shouldn’t,” Cassandra advised. “And if you are caught…well I believe I’ve gotten the gist of disingenuous reprimand.”
Holy shite! “Make ‘em think I’m in trouble but I wouldn’t really be?”

“Indeed. Especially if your prank of choice involves ‘pies’. Disingenuous or not, a bribe of vanilla pie filling would not be amiss.”

“Can Inky be my partner in crime?”

“It is not very Heraldly behavior…” Lady Josie said, “but, she’s only a girl, acting her age after all.”

“Yes! Thanks Josie! And ‘sandra! Pudding all around when we pull it off!” Sera promised. Cripes it was gonna be good fun! Friggin eat it Cook! Literally! “Ink wants extra bread,” Sera sent them off with as they went their separate ways, dropping her off at Adan’s.

Adan had salve whipped up already and blossoms too friggin, boss! And that hadn’t taken long so…she took a minute to pop by Solas’s cabin, cause…well it was on the way an’ shite. And. He usually came to see Ink in the evening’s anyway, for meditation shite and Ellie liked spending time with him, Marehis did too, obviously. And it wouldn’t be a big deal to holler in an additional order. And. Frick! She invited him along cause it wasn’t horrible, having him hanging around. Blah! Worked out well enough, she and Sola’s ran into the others as they left Flissa’s, and he just popped his head into the Tavern and waved to Flissa calling that he was joining them, so, she’d just send his usual.

Marehis was all smiles as Solas wrapped an arm around her shoulders as they made their way to Ink’s cabin, and she quietly assured him they had more information now, about the blood lotus attack.

Though Marehis stopped in her tracks as they approached the cabin, eyes wide as she motioned for everyone to halt, looking equal parts horrified and conflicted, and Solas’s face went bright red, tips of his ears flaming.

Cause, to be fair, they was hearing Ellie gasping in excitement, and a very exuberant, “-yes!” she giggled breathlessly, bed squeakin underneath her as she bounced, demanding, “faster, Cremisius!”

“Oh, you want faster, Lady Herald?”

Friggin third time this week, that Sera knew about anyway.

Ha! She couldn’t help but just about pop a lung laughing, oh shite! Maker! The look on Marehis’s face! Solas looked like he was turning purply, had he stopped breathing? Yup!

“Sera!” Marehis made to stop her as she went ahead to the door.

Oh, it wasn’t nice, but too funny! “What? They don’t mind me watching or joining in,” Sera offered innocently as she threw open the door.

Ellie was giggly as they came in, offering a shy wave to everyone, Krem was grinning like mad, looked real comfy in their position.

Ellie and Kremmy-boy were in bed, but there wasn’t anything super fun going on. Well, not by Sera’s definition. Probably because of the definitions. They wasn’t even under the covers or nothin, Krem was seated with his back against the headboard, arms around Ellie tucked up against his chest. She had her little flippy notebook out, and he had hold of a dictionary he was just turning the page in, pages had stuck together a bit.
“Da’vehnan?” Solas asked sounding relieved and confused.

“Hi, we’re looking up ‘Q’ words!” Ellie reported cheerily, “The kind that start with Q-u ‘cause they’re my favorites!”

“You was still working your way through A’s the other day,” Sera said as she came and sat on the foot of the bed.

Krem shrugged. “Cole said Ellie had a rough day, so, I figured we could jump to Q-u.”

“I just learned Qua…” Ellie squinted at her parchment pad, “Quadring… Quadringentenary! It means a span of 400 years! Or like, the 400th anniversary of something,” Ellie gasped, looking to Kremmy-boy, real excited to say, “400 years from now, will be the 400th anniversary of when I learned Quadringentenary!”

Marehis had to laugh, smiling as she shook her head, oh, frig, she came and wrapped Sera up in a hug, “Oh, da’assan, you are horrible, and I love you.”

“What’cha dooooin’?” Ellie asked as she started kicking rhythmically at the heel of Trevelyan’s boot. They were seated at the bar of some pub, nice little place they found in a sleepy town, north of the Temple of Sacred Ashes. Maker, just like maybe a week or so until they were there! Gosh Ellie was stuffed. They’d been there a while now, Trevelyan ordered her a meal…and then seconds. And then dessert that was meant to be shared but she was working on it by herself! Max’d had this stack of parchment he’d been writing away at, scratch scratch scratch of quill to parchment the whole time! He’d been doing a lot of that when they stopped, lately.

A smile tugged at his lips even as he tried to sound annoyed, “Writing a letter, brat, eat your supper.”

“I did!” she insisted as she ceased her boot kicking, “You need to eat too, you know! Lemme see,” Ellie waved for him to pass her the menu at his side and he handed it off to her seeming bemused, she pointed to a box and squinted at the word-shapes, “hmm…Fish ‘n chips.”

“Hmm…that says honeyed ham on rye. Fish and chips isn’t even on the menu babe, but nice try.”

What?! “It’s a pub! There’s always fish and chips at pubs! If it’s that way in the Marches, it should definitely be that way in Ferelden!” It was Ferelden*!

Trevelyan laughed at her indignancy, “Hmm…maybe back home, but Ferelden takes it more serious. We’ll see about cutting through Harpers Ford* or something, proper Fish and Chips are bought from a stand, wrapped in newsletter.”

News…newsletter? “But why?”

“I dunno kid, Fereldens are weird,” Trevelyan smiled at that, tousling her hair, seemed to give him pause, “Getting longer now, that oil stuff working good? You like it?”

Ellie nodded, blushing. “Yeah, thanks,” her hair was nearly down to her shoulders now! She hadn’t been able to let it grow in forever! “You didn’t have to-“ “Can it. I asked you to come with me, remember? You’re going out of your way to travel with me, navigating, pulling your own weight. We’re a team. And teams have leaders—I’m the leader.

“How come?”

“I’m tallest,” he offered simply.

“Oi! That’s heightist! I can be leader! I can actually follow the map!”

“Well, I’m older, wiser, devastatingly handsome,” he insisted comically. “Plus it’s just the way of things. Yeah, you point the way and help with directions, but you’re following me, right? That makes me leader—someday if anyone’s following you, you can be leader then, Maker help whoever those poor sods are. Leader means you’re my responsibility, it’s my job to make sure you have everything you need, warm clothes, medicine, food, sleep. Crap to take care of your crazy hair so you don’t stab yourself trying to cut it with my boot knife.”

“I wasn’t going to get stabbed, I’ve used knives on my hair loads of times! I couldn’t find scissors!” she defended.

“You don’t need scissors…unless you want a haircut—don’t know where we’d get you one, not too sure I could cut it myself, but I can keep an eye out for a barb—”

No! No more spending! “I don’t need a haircut!”

“I said ‘want’ kid, good leaders indulge in wants too from time to time. You know, within reason.”

“Well I want you to eat something, is that reasonable enough?”

“Hmm…can’t right now kid, but maybe when I’m done. I’m not really hungry. Honestly?” he looked around as if he didn’t want to be overheard but the pub was pretty dead, their gracious host/chef was snoozing in a chair behind the bar. “Kind of nervous,” he admitted, tapping the letter he’d been working on, Maker it was long! Front and back it was like, one, two, three, four—almost five sheets now!

Wait, “Nervous enough to make your stomach upset?” she worried, that didn’t sound fun, “I still have ginger root in my pack—”

“Slow your roll, it’s fine kid. I’ll feel better once I’m done I think.”

But! “If I wasn’t feeling good you’d make me take med- we! We literally only have ginger root because you got it for me—”

“I’m a total lunatic who just grabbed every possible thing I could remember getting plied with when I got sick as a kid, trying to make up for almost killing you. In my defense, Rashvine and Embrium are both red.”

Yeah…breathing in steam made with Elf Root and Rashvine would have uh…well Elf root would have helped negate some of the effects of Rashvine but, yeah, bleeding blisterly sores inside her lungs would have been just a bit counter intuitive to the whole ‘not dying’ thing. She asked him to keep an eye out for ingredients as they traveled, they were always burning through Elf root, and she made sure to pick up Embrium when they came across it. Trevelyan had seen Rashvine hanging about and mistaken it for Embrium, tossed some into a pocket on the bag they kept their potion things in. Then…gosh it’d been Ellie’s fault, she wasn’t paying close enough attention when getting their campfire started and basically ended up with a big painful lungful of smoke. Que, asthma attack. Poor Trevelyan, there was a difference knowing she might have an attack, and actually trying to help her through one, it scared him something awful, and he’d tried to help her himself, grabbed ingredients to make the remedy he’d asked her about, but he’d picked up the first red plant he saw in their stores. Thankfully he stepped back and let her do her thing, she’d sorted enough times before, fought to focus and gotten Elf Root tonic and Embrium into the pot they’d been about to make tea in over their fire and took one of the unused Embrium blossoms pressed it over her mouth and nose and strained to breathe as deeply as she could, sometimes that had been the only thing she could do and it worked out alright, if she could get the pollen in her lungs, Maker it helped—hurt, made it worse for a few seconds but then it really, really helped. Max had knelt to rub circles on her back, that…huh, sort of helped too, she wasn’t sure why, but it had made her feel a little better, been comforting. She’d said she’d be okay, just needed to rest a bit. She’d laid down almost instantly been out, attacks just left her wiped. Trevelyan’d felt so badly, but he’d been such a big help, gosh, he’d picked her up and carried her ‘til he reached the nearest town, found a place to stay the night, got a proper healer to come and check her over. Everything was a little hazy but the next time she was actually awake and aware, Max was holding her hand, thumb rubbing circles as he read out loud, from this sheet of parchment with sloppy scrawling all over it, something the healer had written up for him for future reference, and the second he realized she was awake he’d launched into this sort of presentation of all the things he’d gotten while she was sleeping, like ginger for if her stomach was upset, broth, bread, apples, and he’d commandeered blankets from possibly every empty room he could find in the inn he’d gotten them set up in! She’d been bundled like mad, gosh he had sort of been a total lunatic!

A total lunatic that didn’t want anything to take anything to settle his stomach. But…it was upset because he was stressed? So maybe, “You wanna talk about it?” she asked.

“Nah kid, just writing my parents,” oh. They sounded…Max hadn’t talked a whole lot about them, outside of them being good parents. And wanting him to marry a woman already and give them grandchildren. Which was fine if that was what they wanted for their life, but putting that on your kid? Trying to force it? That…well, maybe Ellie didn’t know any better ‘cause she didn’t have parents but that didn’t sound very ‘good’ to her. He said they would write him all the time about different women they wanted him to meet with, had they done so while he was on the road to the Conclave? He was sort of in the middle of something! And! He didn’t want a wife!

“Another marriage thing?” she asked.

He snorted at that, “No, thank the Maker. They haven’t written me in a while, I just…I have some things I need to write them about, that’s all,” he shrugged. “Just grown up stuff.”

Oh. “What kind of grown up stuff?”

“Nothing you need to worry about. You’re just a kid—good kid, for all you are an insufferable brat.”

Rude! “Just for that I’m finishing this slice of pie—you’ll have to get your own!” Ellie informed him, sticking her tongue out before spearing another forkful of crust and baked apple, gosh it was super good.

Trevelyan grinned, pleased like that’s what he’d wanted in the first place. “Guess I will. Eat up, Ellie.”

Someone was shaking her a bit, “Inky? Ellie? Shite, ‘sandra wake up.”

“Hmm?”
“Ellie’s cryin’ in her sleep and she’s not waking u-”

“I’m awake,” Ellie mumbled sleepily, sitting straight up, sort of startled and trying to quell Sera’s panic, oh gosh! Too fast, dizzy, but she could lean against her friend, Sera wrapped an arm around her back, rubbing at her arm. Cassandra was here? Oh…huh, Cassandra was in her sleep clothes, and her hair was loose what…what was going on?

“You okay Ink?” Sera asked.

“Eleanor, did you have a bad dream?” Cassandra questioned, concerned, taking Ellie’s face in her hands and wiping oh, Sera’d said she was crying, must have been, at first she’d thought her nose feeling a little stuffy meant the salve on her chest—a little rubbed between her shoulder blades, Sera rubbed there for her—wasn’t working so well, but it had, she’d just yeah, been a little heartsick, seeing Max again in…gosh the Fade made everything feel so real, like she was really back there with him alive.

“No, not really, not a nightmare. I’m okay just, I guess everything yesterday sort of made me think so much about Max that I relived a memory in the Fade,” yesterday was the most she’d ever talked about her time with him, sort of filling in blanks for the advisors and her friends when they had dinner together. They’d known she was sad at his passing, felt badly about everyone who’d been lost at the Conclave but she’d never really talked about how much…loosing Max had been like if something were to happen to any of her friends—Maker forbid, forbid, forbid! Nothing was allowed to happen to them, none! She’d avoided talking about Trevelyan a lot before because focusing on something enough when you were awake could influence what you saw in the Fade as you slept. She’d been trying not to…it hurt, seeing Max again only to wake up to a world where he was gone, but yeah, after everything last night, “…it was nice, seeing him again. I miss him, you know?”

“I do,” Cassandra said sympathetically, brushing Ellie’s hair back, “Cole did not join you?”

“I’m sure he was watching but unless um, unless it’s something real bad he stays out of it, lets me remember.” Then, “Are you okay?” She wasn’t complaining, it was a nice surprise to wake up to, but Cassandra didn’t usually run around in her sleep clothes, and she was seated like she’d been laying between Ellie and the edge of the bed, her legs were tangled in their blankets.

“I…admittedly had trouble sleeping, myself,” Cassandra said, “I woke in the night and came to check on you and Sera, she woke and invited me to stay.”

“Awe, you’re always welcome for a sleepover,” Ellie assured, taking hold of her hands squeezing them because she wanted to check, “Did you have a bad dream, Cassandra? Are you okay? I tell you when I have bad dreams.”

Cassandra seemed to consider it. “I did suffer unpleasant dreams, but I cannot recall the details now. I’m well, Eleanor, our impromptu sleepover brought me peaceful rest.”

Ellie leaned her head against Sera’s shoulder, humming her appreciation, “Thanks for inviting Cassandra to stay. Gosh, it was a nice surprise to wake up to.”

Cassandra smiled warmly, wrapping her arms around Ellie as she pressed a kiss to her cheek and laid back down, taking Ellie with her, Sera following after to snuggle against Ellie’s back, it was warm, and nice. Was Anya okay? Oh, she was awake, Ellie could feel the dip and rise in the mattress as Anya got up and started walking alongside the row of feet near the end of the bed. Gosh it was early, the sun wasn’t even beginning to rise. Ellie was still pretty sleepy, and then there was something…humming, really pretty humming, right near her ear, awe. Sera, gosh her singing voice was just beautiful, she very rarely sang though, didn’t seem to care for it but it was nice, soothing, it made Ellie fall asleep again.

You’re okay, I’ll make it quiet, you should rest more. Cole…

Friday, Wintermarch 4th, 9:42 was a pretty big day. Felt like it, anyway, to Ellie. Big breakfast, big War Room meeting, big date.

It was fun getting to brush Cassandra’s hair! She let her! Braided it too, Marehis helped, so Ellie could learn how to get the braid to wrap like a crown around Cassandra’s head. And then they ate like, the biggest breakfast—they basically had two breakfasts. They’d eaten together like usual, but Ellie was still hungry after finishing everything on her plate and Sera wasn’t going to turn down a chance at seconds, so they’d went to Flissa’s and had…was second breakfast a thing? It should be a thing! And Cremisius was there, talking with Flissa and she overheard the barmaid saying something to him about ‘dough rising splendidly’, and then she’d greeted Ellie very loudly, gosh! So…Ellie supposed dough had something ‘top secret’ to do with their date, which sounded promising, dough made so much great stuff! When she greeted him he came and kissed her on the forehead, wished her a good morning, and good luck in her War Room meeting, before he was off on an errand for the Iron Bull.

And then, it was time for her War Room meeting. She was nervous. She felt a lot better after talking with Sera, and she was glad everyone came and ate with her last night, but she’d—gosh she’d yelled! At Lady Josie! And- and Marehis! Everyone! That wasn’t okay, she shouldn’t have lost her cool, handled the Trevelyans with more compassion, because yeah losing Max was hard on her, it had to be so much harder for them, they were his parents! She’d been really, really, really sorry, apologized to everyone during dinner and she asked if she could maybe invite the Trevelyans to have breakfast with her or something—she’d apologize profusely, and they’d eat, and she could show them around Haven—but Cullen…gosh he’d almost sounded angry about it, and he’d been quick to assure her he wasn’t mad at her, he just said the Advisors had come to see why she’d been so upset, had found them pretty rude to begin with and they knew more now than they had when Ellie’d stormed off like a total brat—her words, not his, gosh that’d been so thoughtless, she could kick herself, she’d scared Marehis and Cassandra something awful!—but anyway, when Ellie said as much at dinner, Cullen informed her they’d sent the Trevelyans away!

“Oh! Gosh um…well I guess I should write them then-” she’d said, but, “Eleanor,” Cassandra cut her off, “If the Trevelyans were in this very room demanding your apology, you would not need give it.” Cullen was nodding in agreement.

“But I really was rude-”

“My lady,” Josie spoke up, “if you would, allow me to handle further contact with the Trevelyans. Tempers are so caustic, I can express anything needed, in the way that suits best.”

That made sense, and Ellie’d already really put her foot in it, she should have let Josie handle it entirely, to begin with, let her talk for her when she’d gotten upset with them in the first place, so she nodded, “Thanks Josie. I really am sorry for yelling at you.”

Josie shook her head. “Think no more of it, mija*, you’re forgiven.”

“I beg to differ!” Dorian had interjected, “I’m wildly displeased. Outraged. Incensed!” but he…he hadn’t even been there? Oh, but that was what he was getting at she guessed, “How dare such a spectacular argument take place without me there to witness it. I could have made an evening of it—there are so few opportunities in Haven to take in dinner and a show.”
She entered the War Room alongside Cassandra, Marehis waiting with Anya out in the hall. Cullen looked up from where he’d been placing a few more pieces low on the map, gosh super south, nearing ‘the Fallow Mire’ oh! They’d sent people there to investigate claims of Rifts, she supposed they were getting closer, that was good.

What was even better was Cullen saying, “Ahh, good morning Ellie, Cassandra. At last, our quincunx is complete,” he offered warmly, with a little wink.

Oh gosh! “It is!” Ellie enthused, it was one of her Q-u words, she only remembered it because she liked it so much, because it was Q-u word that meant ‘five things arranged to form a square or a rectangle’ like them! Four corners, with one standing in the middle on one side—Cullen was their middle!

“Eleanor,” Cassandra said, taking Ellie’s hand, “Chancellor Roderick will be here momentarily, to bear witness to your signing.”

Ellie nodded. Gosh, she was scared to see him again. She’d had great luck not running into him around Haven…oh but maybe that was mean. It wasn’t like she greeted every last person that joined the Inquisition—Maker, she’d do nothing but greet new people all day long!…that might be fun though- that wasn’t the point! But she greeted most important people, and Chancellor Roderick was a prominent figurehead. A mean one, but she’d just have to deal with it. Cassandra explained over breakfast that, since Ellie’d be signing papers that would make her a citizen of the Free Marches, their signing had to be overlooked by a Chantry official from the Free Marches. Mother Gisselle, like many of their Chantry allies, was from Orlais. They had loads of Chantry workers from Ferelden of course, but um. Well. Good old Roderick, was from the Free Marches, had worked his way up through the Chantry starting in a little worship hall near Ostwick, apparently.

“I swear to you, if you are of discomfort, if it is too much to see the man in the War Room again with…I understand that both our presence may be difficult to see—if you feel panic, you need only say the word and we will send him away, we can make other arrangements this…we merely wish to have you sign as soon as possible.”

“It will be alright, Ellie,” Cullen promised, “the Chancellor was…agreeable, last we spoke. When he came to us he was genuinely contrite, he had to swallow a lot of pride to come back here and offer his aid after speaking against us—you—so openly. And,” the women around the table looked entirely bemused, exasperated with him as he pulled his hat out of his cloak pocket and onto his head, “we’re right here with you.” Oh! Fake Cullen wouldn’t wear his hat! It was sweet, trying to make sure she had things immediately around her in case she did get scared, worried she was trapped again. It was dumb, Envy was dead, and she knew that but still, some part of her sometimes felt like it’d be back any second now—or maybe this was all some sort of trick, that she hadn’t escaped and was merely playing into some sort of trap it was laying out for her. She was pretty sure that was why Marehis and Anya were waiting in the wings, to send in the puppy cavalry if she did become overwhelmed. Gosh, it really did help whenever she’d been practicing with Cullen and Cassandra yesterday, with her panic attack, she ended up falling right onto her bottom and the pup climbed into her lap, and it helped to hold someone comforting and warm and soft.

And now, being back in the War Room, about to be joined by someone that scared Ellie in and out of the Fade, there was a third thing more the Advisors had set up for her, to avoid panic.

“We may have requested some assistance from a Friend, to perhaps give you a more positive association between Roderick and the War Room,” Cassandra said, pulling Ellie along before she sent Ellie forward to walk around the War Table—Leliana moved to stand on the other side of Lady Josie, and Cullen made way for Ellie to slip past him, so they all stood across the War
Table from the door, Ellie between the four adults.

And then there were five. Five adults. But one very distinct difference between the ones at her side, and the one blindly staggering into the room as the door swung open before him.

Chancellor Roderick had been pied.

Chancellor Roderick had been pied, directly in the face, and Sera could be heard screaming with laughter as she fled the scene of the crime.

Ellie slapped her hands over her mouth too hard, it stung! But! Oh gosh she was going to laugh otherwise! Could she have an asthma attack from suppressing laughter? That felt like that might be a thing. It was purely to avoid a potential medical emergency that she started giggling into her hands, leaning into Cullen, trying to sort of hide her face against the former Templar who was holding back laughter of his own.

“What in heaven’s name-!” Roderick was bellowing.

“Oh dear, Chancellor, how simply awful,” Lady Josephine offered up with levity laced sympathy, “would you care for a handkerchief?”

The man wiped at an eye with his hand slopping some of the pie filling onto the War Table yikes! But it didn’t get on anything, just the edge on Ellie’s right. He cracked his now cleaner eye open and accept the offered handkerchief. “Some menace just attacked me with- with some sort of horrible dessert!”

Cassandra reached out and swiped a finger through the bit of filling on the War Table, bringing it to her lips to taste it, “Hmm, we have differing opinions Chancellor, I believe its rather delicious.”

“You should- I’ve been attacked! You should wrangle that Elf—tall girl, tallest Elf I’ve ever seen—”

“Ahh, that would be Sera. I will most certainly give her a stern talking to at her earliest convenience,” Cassandra assured him, Leliana and Cullen had to quiet their snickering at Cassandra’s chosen phrasing. “If you are well? You can see well enough now I trust, to bear witness to the Herald of Andraste’s signing?”

She was…well she certainly wasn’t afraid anymore that she was back under Envy’s influence, Maker, Roderick just got pied! So, Ellie stepped back to scoot behind Cullen and Cassandra, went to join the Chancellor still wiping at his face with Lady Josie’s offered hankie. Ellie had her own she pulled from a pocket and, “Here, if you bend down a little,” she said and when he hesitantly obliged, she heled get some of the filling he missed at the corners of his eyes, that’d sting something awful if it got in them, and there was some more on his chin, “I’m sorry Sera pranked you, you aren’t terribly mad I hope? I’m really sorry on her behalf—I’m kind of nervous, meeting you again seeing as we didn’t necessarily get off on the right foot, and um, I think you’re sort of scary, no offense. She only pranked you, so I wouldn’t be afraid, meeting you again, no one’s very scary when they’ve got pie all over their face.”

“Ahh. I do…apologize, lady Herald. I am sorry,” he allowed almost belligerently like he disliked saying as much but then he sort of stopped, looking at Ellie, “You are…you’re a child, and I demanded your execution for a crime now, I am most certain you did not commit.”

“Thanks,” Ellie gave it a little thought, “If you can forgive Sera for pieing you, I’m pretty
He huffed a disbelieving sound at that like he thought perhaps she were joking but she wasn’t grinning like a loon or anything just, a small reassuring smile and he said, “That is certainly gracious of you. it would only be right for me to act in kind. Your ‘Sera’ is forgiven.”

“Thanks! And thanks for coming to witness my signing, I appreciate it.”

“Come, my lady,” Josie said, stepping nearer and offering her hand to Ellie, “let us proceed, shall we?”

Josie spread out all of the papers on the War Table, gosh they took up the entire length! She put them in the order they were meant to be signed in, starting with the one that would give her her name. like. For real. It felt…kind of weird. Exciting and…she wasn’t sure what else. Sad, her heart still hurt, she wanted Max more than she wanted his name. Maker, all of this...she was more certain in her decision now than ever before, to make sure securing Mister Aclassi was a certainty before making Cremisius aware. Knowing now what Max had wanted for them, that the possibility they could have had some kind of life together had almost been real and had been taken at the Conclave hurt, badly, the actual definition of heart breaking it felt like. She was going to keep his name, she thought, it’d been really sweet of Sera to talk her through everything, offer to help her change it later if she wanted but she liked…she liked having some of what could have been, being family with him as much as she could be now that he was gone.

“Now, before you sign, you’re certain you’re pleased with your legal name, Eleanor? We cannot make much change to what has been dictated here—at least not this very moment,” Cassandra said, “but Maxwell did leave room for you to choose your own secondary name, if you wished for one.”

“Oh four,” Cullen muttered jovially, and earning a backhanded swat to his side.

Ellie nodded. “Sera talked about it with me some more last night, that I could pick a middle name, and I talked it over with Marehis—I hope you don’t mind,” she looked to Cassandra, “Max might have made it so I got labeled ‘Eleanor’ to begin with, but you’re the one who really made it my name, you know? So in a way you had a hand in picking my first name. I thought it might be nice if Marehis got to have a say in my middle name.”

Cassandra nodded, clearing her throat, and there was a bit of a smile at her lips, “I suppose I did. Marehis helped you pick a middle name to your liking?”

“Uh huh,” Ellie said, “Liana*—it’s the Human variant of a Dalish name Liara. It sounds pretty with Eleanor and she said it was fitting?”

Oh gosh, Cassandra got that kind of quiet she did when she was overwhelmed by something, she was silent just a second before saying, “That is markedly fitting, I believe.”

“It is,” Cullen agreed, “although I must warn you Eleanor, you’re entering a whole other level of fresh terror—there is no fear quite like that which strikes you, when you hear someone middle name you. Whenever I hear Cullen Stanton, I know I am in trouble…if I hear Cullen Stanton Rutherford, I run.”

“I wouldn’t run away,” she promised, gosh, not after last night, Maker! She hadn’t meant to scare Marehis, but meant to didn’t take away from the fact that she had, Cassandra too. “But it does sound like a good system to know just how much trouble I’m in!”
Lady Josie wrote ‘Liana’ in the space left for her middle name, under the watch of Chancellor Roderick, and then Ellie had to sign, she was a little nervous, she’d never signed anything before! Not really—‘Ellie’ at the end of notes and letters. But there was something special about carefully spelling out ‘Eleanor Liana Trevelyan’ at the bottom of the parchment that would make her so.

And then she signed another, and another—Chancellor Roderick and Lady Josie did too, and Josie had this little ink stamp she had to use to put a seal at the bottom next to her signature.

“There is one thing more, left to sign,” Lady Josie said as she stacked all the documents together.

Gosh, “Really?” Ellie asked she…she was pretty sure that’d been everything she saw last night.

She gasped when the door to the War Room swung open behind her, she whirled around oh, Varric.

“Shit, this place is depressing without all the birthday crap in here. Get a nice plant or something, damn.”

“You’re alright, my lady?” Josie asked her quietly, oh! Ellie patted her arm apologetically, she’d heard the door bang against the wall, and it’d startled her, she’d taken hold of Josie’s wrist and pulled the Ambassador behind her, and the hum of barrier was over Ellie’s own skin, clothing. She hadn’t cast on Josie accidentally had she? Nope, she was all good it looked like.

“Sorry,” Ellie whispered to Josie, she hadn’t meant to manhandle…Herald-handle, the Antivan woman like that.

“Varric, conduct yourself appropriately!” Cassandra snapped.

“Sorry Tumbles, didn’t mean to startle you, just asked Cole to clue me in so I could make an entrance to represent my client—that’s you,” Varric offered her a wink as he came to stand at her side, “here, read this over best you can, I’ll be right here to explain anything you need—but it’s no worries, I’ve been negotiating on your behalf all week since I learned the Advisors wanted to offer you as much once you were of age, I feel this deal is pretty solid.”

Oh. There was something else—her contract with the Inquisition.

It was…the actual most difficult thing she’d ever read gosh, so many big words, but practicing so much sounding out ridiculous words from the dictionary helped her tackle the larger things…she ultimately had to ask Varric what most of them meant, but it mostly just sounded like a bunch of fancy words that said what the Advisors had laid out to her in her first War Room meeting after facing the Breach, still it was nice that they let her look over everything, made sure she was informed before signing an agreement with them.

Everything signed and sealed, Ellie was officially an agent of the Inquisition…would it be professional to happy dance? She…she’d hold off. Sera was always down for dancing, she’d save it for later.

“Congratulations, young lady,” Chancellor Roderick wished her politely before taking his leave of the War Room.

“You did good, Tumbles,” Varric said.
“Thanks for helping me.”

“Anytime kid,” he assured her, “Unless it’s in the next eight hours, shit, I need my beauty sleep.”

“Gosh! Varric, it’s almost nine in the morning, you haven’t been to bed since yesterday?”

“Haven hours kid, when we’re not on the road my sleep is dictated to me by the gods, my muse, and whenever my body feels like collapsing into my cot.”

“Go get some rest, have sweet dreams,” she wished him, pressing a kiss to his forehead.

“Thanks Tumbles,” Varric waved them off, she heard the sound of Anya greeting the Dwarf, barking and the pads of her paws scraping against his boots as the door closed behind him.

“So, what else is on today?” Ellie asked the Advisors as they settled back into their usual routine.

“Well, actually, we’d like to discuss your next journey from Haven—nothing quite so sudden as last time,” Lady Josephine assured, “but sometime next week, if you are feeling up to it, now might be the most opportune time for you to investigate the Oasis yourself, seal the Rifts reported there and see if these Shards you’ve discovered truly will open the temple.”

“The door Alexius used in the future, to seal his throne room, worked similarly, Madam de Fer said. So, I think it should, it’ll be cool to find out what’s inside.”

Cassandra’s hands clinched tight at her sides, and she cleared her throat, “Please do be careful, Eleanor, we do not know what the Temple may hold. Madam de Fer speculates it could be some great benefit, to the Inquisition, that it is responsible for such a discovery should there be anything of note within, but if it is dangerous… rely on your allies, be safe.”

Oh yeah, “I will be,” Ellie promised her, “and I’ll have lots of people with me,” gosh, she had to think on it, “—Sera’s going for sure, and Dorian and Solas, and the Iron Bull, and gosh, who else? Thom might go, annnnd… oh! Varric, duh… Cole too maybe? Everyone will look after each other.”

The Seeker nodded. “I do regret not being able to join you this venture out, Eleanor, truly.”

“The Templars need training and careful moderation, so we know how they and the Mages will work together when we go to seal the Breach,” Ellie said, assuring her she understood, “I’m really proud of you for working with them!”

“Thank you, Eleanor.”

All said and done, next week, they’d head out for the Oasis. Ellie… wasn’t looking forward to leaving so much behind. She wanted to seal more Rifts, and she was excited to see the Oasis and investigate the temple, but she’d miss Cassandra and Cullen, and Josie and Leliana and Marehis and Vivienne and gosh—Anya! She’d miss her so much! She might be able to go out with Ellie in the future, but she was just a puppy, and Ellie was pretty sure she’d die if anything happened to her that could have been prevented if she’d just stayed behind, so she would be staying in Haven, she’d have lots of people around who would love her and make sure she ate—Cremisius! She’d miss him too! But she was grateful that he double pinkie promised her he’d watch after Anya while she was gone. Marehis had some sort of mission—she’d be there for the start of their journey to the Oasis, and they might be able to meet up on the way back, but Leliana needed her somewhere in Orlais for… something. Ellie wasn’t sure, some sort of top-secret spying stuff. And then Madam de
Fer was going to be doing courtly things for them in Orlais, working in Val Royeaux and the like, visiting with the different nobles who came to their aid in Therinfal, and she wanted to see Bastien, too, and Ellie understood that gosh, he wasn’t her husband, but they loved each other very much, Vivienne talked rarely of him, but when she did it sounded like she thought he hung the moon.

But for now, it was the fourth! That meant…well, they hadn’t been very sure when she’d be done with everything this morning, so they were on a bit of a flexible schedule—whenever they were done, Ellie’d go back to her cabin and change for a lesson with Cassandra and Cullen, until lunch time and then! Sera! She was going to teach Ellie—

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, concerned when Ellie’s eyes clenched shut and she raised a hand to rub at her forehead. They’d been leaving the War Room, Lady Josie and Leliana had returned to work and Cullen and Cassandra were going to walk she and Marehis back to her cabin to change but gosh yikes, ouch.

“Sorry, I’m okay, just a headache—not bad like they have been just, a dull- I would rank it as a mild stabbing in the front of my brain.”

“The stabbing system, I know it well,” Cullen offered gently, speaking softly like he was worried she might be sensitive to sound…but maybe she was, her ears were sort of ringing. “I’ll go get you some water, you’ve potion?”

“I do, thank you lethallin,” Marehis replied, and Ellie smiled when Anya yipped, and when she opened her eyes the pup was on the mission to escort Cullen to get water while Cassandra wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders, and Marehis came to feel at her forehead.

“I’m okay, just kind of tired—dunno why, I slept really well,” she’d felt fully rested when she woke up for the day, she’d been a little sleepy this week, maybe she just needed to be totally lazy for a day to catch up after all the traveling and wildness of the last time they left Haven. Maybe she’d ask for another day off? She didn’t want to get into the habit of it though, she really did have things to do.

“There have been many sudden changes in the last few hours,” Cassandra said, “would you care to rest for a while, Eleanor? If you wish, you could lie down in my quarters—it is warm and comfortable, and there are no windows and the walls are thick, there would be precious little light or sound that could bother you it is an ideal place to find refuge from a headache.”

…oh gosh she needed to stop hanging out with Bull quite so much because the first thought that came to mind was the fact that Cullen suffered an awful lot of headaches. She worried about him sometimes, but he said he was alright…some sort of chronic thing she guessed? Cassandra had assured her the Inquisition supplied everyone that needed lyrium with the stuff, so…huh, she hoped whatever it was, wasn’t super serious.

She didn’t really hear what she said in response to Cassandra’s offer, the next thing she knew, she was in Cassandra’s sleep clothes, and Cullen brought her some water to drink before Marehis gave her potion, and then she was under the covers of the Seeker’s bed with Marehis laying between her and the wall, and Anya curled up at her side. Sleepy puppy, but she was just a baby! She was growing and learning all sorts of new things all the time, of course she needed a nap. Maybe Ellie did too, she’d been feeling a little tired toward the end of their meeting, and it all was a little overwhelming, not even twenty-four hours ago she’d been just Ellie, expecting a pleasantish, somewhat sad visit from the Trevelyans, a chance to finally offer her condolences in person only to have…well, everything that happened, happen. Maker. Definitely nap time.

The light didn’t bother her quite so much, though she swore Cassandra said something about there not being any, there was still pale light streaming in...oh, when she sleepily cracked an eye open she could see path of light from the open door, two silhouettes on the floor of Cassandra’s room. She wasn’t sure what for but she didn’t’ mind, it was just Cullen and Cassandra and gosh blankets were soft, she relaxed and waited for sleep to make its way to her, it was just a bit hazy as the adults in the doorway spoke, “Maker, she has a name now,” Cullen breathed.

“She has always had a name, but yes, I know what you mean,” Cassandra allowed, quietly, “I’m pleased such could finally be arranged for her.”

“Eleanor Liana,” Cullen murmured thoughtfully.

“The Light of the Maker, my god has answered.”

“-Trevelyan,” Cullen spoke as if he were finishing her sentence humorously.

“Well, we do have him to thank, for everything.”

“Nervous?” Max asked as they ascended the stairs to the Temple of Sacred Ashes. “Don’t be. Just stick with me, kid, and you’ll be fine.”

When she woke...she wasn’t startled like maybe she would have been once upon a time, it was now a usual occurrence, except lately the face had been horizontal along side hers. Sera’s face —the Elf girl was crouched pressed up against the side of the bed so her face rested right before Ellie’s noses sort of squished.

“I’m glad you’ve been brushing your teeth Ser’,” Ellie teased quietly.

“Yeah yeah,” Sera laughed lightly, “you okay Ink? ‘sandra said you was havin’ headaches again. It’s almost lunch now, you wanna sleep some more or come eat?”

Mmmm, “Gosh, yeah, lunch sounds great.”

Marehis hummed in her ear, squeezing her a bit, “You’re feeling better, da’vehnan?”

“I am,” she promised, she really was—Cassandra had been right, everything that morning was super crazy, she felt loads better now.

Lunch apparently meant Ellie, gosh, she got to stay in sleep clothes, or at least, that’s what happened, the second she sat up in bed, Sera was pulling her forward and out, to pad barefoot through the halls of the Chantry to Josie’s office with Marehis in tow...where was Anya?

“I brought Inky!” Sera announced as she pushed open the door to Josie’s office, her desk was positioned the way they moved it so they could all sit around it to eat, Ellie and the Advisors, and Sera, Cassandra, Marehis oh! Anya was in Josie’s lap, being a spoilt little thing getting lots of pets from the Antivan woman. Awe, but she gave a happy little bark and dropped down to come make her way back to Ellie, that was sweet.

“Hey girl,” Ellie greeted, kneeling to pet her, “did you have a nice nap? Did you have sweet dreams?” she gasped, that gave her a thought! “Oh! Cole!”

The adults in the room startled slightly when Cole appeared on the table, thankfully it was clear for the moment since lunch hadn’t arrived yet.
“Eleanor, honestly,” whoops, Cassandra sounded a bit exasperated, “need you summon Cole without warning to answer your every question?”

“He can find out so much stuff!” Ellie defended, “Everyone’d use instant Cole to find out stuff if they could! They’d just ‘Cole’ it!”

“That sounds very silly, but I like it, Ellie,” Cole offered sweetly, “You want to know if puppies have dreams?”

Ellie gasped, “He even knows what I want to ask before I ask it!” she enthused, “Do puppies dream?”

“They do,” Cole said, “Anya dreams a lot about running and playing in the snow, she dreams about you and Cullen and Cassandra and Sera and Marehis and Cremisius. Dogs dream nice things, they’re always happy dreams.”

“Awe! That’s so cute! Thanks Cole! Do you want to stay for lunch?”

“No thank you,” Cole answered serenely, vanishing from the tabletop.

When lunch was through, Marehis had a meeting with Leliana since Ellie’d be staying in the Chantry for her lesson with Sera. Sera was just the best! She’d brought along Ellie’s pack for when they were on the road, she’d already put the nicer clothing Ellie’d been wearing to the War Room that morning inside, and she’d packed some of Ellie’s rougher clothes, the sort she wore for practice because they were more comfortable and could stand to get messy. Ellie changed in Cassandra’s room, folding the Seeker’s sleep clothes neatly and leaving them on the bed with a torn-out sheet from her parchment pad left laying with a Thank You note on it—she had a new one now the other was all filled up! Madam de Fer had graciously left her desk cleared off for Sera and Ellie so they could sit in the warmth of the Chantry and work. Their work was mostly parchment based—Sera had made up some worksheets, with different kinds of math problems, addition, subtraction she explained the ones with + and -, and then the x ones and the ones in the little houses were multiplication and division. Sera let her work on them, Anya sat in Ellie’s lap, panting excitedly as she looked the problems over, sweet pup—Ellie was half tempted to call Cole to ask if puppies knew math, but she should probably focus on the task at hand.

Addition and subtraction she had down good already, multiplication and division were a little newer—she’d sort of known how to multiply? By twos, and with some numbers multiplying by 3 wasn’t super hard. Sera showed her how 10 was easy like 1 was, even though it was such a big number, and the idea that any number multiplied by a number made of 1 and several zeros just meant tacking those zeros onto the number you were multiplying and boom! Answer! Division was harder for some reason, her brain just didn’t want to do it unless, for some reason, dividing things in half—by 2—was easy enough. But that was alright, she’d learn! Sera’d just wanted to get a feel for where Ellie was math wise.

Sciencey stuff, Sera wasn’t sure where she’d take her with that, but it seemed like she had mostly a mind for fun—although Sera…Sera had been reading like, a lot, all week, all these different books trying to find one she might like Ellie to read as a starter, she just hadn’t found one yet. She made her this little worksheet that explained the ‘Scientific Method’. Observation—you see something happen and you want to find out why, Hypothesis—you have an idea of why it’s happening, Prediction—if your Hypothesis is correct, what you believe it’ll mean, Experiment—recreating your observation in a controlled setting to see if your hypothesis is correct, and then Conclusion—what you learned from your experiment.

Then, to start her off down the path of higher scientific pursuits, Sera brought two glass beakers she’d borrowed from Adan’s with two matching glass stirring rods, a knife, a lemon, a bottle of vinegar, a box of baking soda, one of Flissa’s little bowls of sugar she sent out with tea, two tea spoons, two drinking glasses, a dropper, and loads of wash rags ‘just in case’.

“We aren’t going to blow the chantry up are we?” Ellie asked quietly.

“Hmmm…no, but it might get a little sploady, that’s the whole point for the first one we’re doing. Don’t sweat it,” she pulled out one of the books she’d been looking over that week, using a picture on the inside of its back cover, a big grid thing, “This is the table of elements—chemicals everything in the world is made up of. Today we’re going to be mostly dealing with these,” she circled Na, C, and O. “Sodium, carbon, and oxygen.”

Oh! Ellie knew those, “Sodium’s like salt, right? I’ve heard of carbon before, and oxygen is what we breathe.”

“Yup! Sodium isn’t quite the salt you’re thinking of though—but it’s in it. Table salt is Na—sodium Cl—chloride. Come on, Ink, let’s have some learny fun,” Sera said, rising and asking Ellie to bring the beaker and stirring rod while Sera grabbed the baking soda and vinegar. Sera set her things down on the floor off to the side of the rug down the center of the Great Hall, and then she started rolling the rug up so it was out of the way a good bit. She laid down a few wash rags flat in a stack in the center of their cleared section of hall and asked Ellie to place the glass beaker down in the middle of the cloth, and then they sat criss-cross applesauce “Anya, sweets, you can’t munch on anything here,” Sera said, whistling to get the puppies attention as she sniffed at the baking soda, Anya looked to her and Sera withdrew a little doggy biscuit from her pocket and pitched it down the hall toward the War Room and Anya bolted to chase after it.

“Alright,” Sera cleared her throat and picked up the baking soda, “Baking soda is a chemical called sodium bicarbonate.” She had a bit of chalk in hand and wrote down NaCO3 on the ground. “Na is sodium. C is carbon, O stands for Oxygen—what this means is it’s made of one sodium molecule bonded with something that’s a mix of carbon, and three oxygen molecules. There’s…we’ll get into it in depth sometime, but basically there’s things we categorize as bases and things we categorize as acids, decided by how they deal with hydrogen ions when you put them in pure water. Acids go crazy giving away hydrogen molecules, while bases are all about accepting hydrogen molecules—it’s a whole blah blah blah thing, I promise I’ll get lecturey about it some time. Point is, you mix an acid and a base together, they can cancel each other out, but sometimes they have a little fun first. Baking soda is a base while the vinegar is an acid. Wanna see what they do?”

“…you’re sure we’re allowed to do this?” Ellie asked.

“Already ran it by Josie, did the experiment with her in her office earlier, she’s on board as long as we do it like this, out here in the open on the stone so any mess can be easily contained and cleaned. She thought it was great fun.”

“Kay, what do we do first?”

“All you Ink,” Sera handed her a tea spoon, “put a spoonful of baking soda into the beaker.” Ellie nodded, doing as she was told, and then Sera handed her the bottle of vinegar with the little dropper, “Fill the dropper up and squirt it all in…”

Oh gosh oh gosh oh gosh! Ellie squealed—it went everywhere! Not everywhere, but before she even finished squirting all the vinegar in, boom! The mixture shot up all foamy and fast!
Poured up right out and over the edge of the beaker, but thankfully the washrags soaked everything up pretty good though there was a thick layer of foam left on top of the mess, wow!

“When they react together they form carbonic acid which is crazy unstable, it instantly breaks apart into water and carbon dioxide, which creates all the fizzing as it escapes the solution,” Sera offered explanation.

“That’s so cool!”

“Yeah it is!”

Flissa had lent them use of a tray so they could load up their mess onto it and take it to be cleaned when they were done. Next, was one more experiment, something yummy, Sera said.

“Allright Ink, we got a lemon, you know what lemon juice is?”

“Oh! Citrus fruit is acidic right? Like the vinegar!”

“Oh-huh, so, watered down, with some baking soda, what’d’you hypothesize will happen?”

Well, she said watered down so… “It’ll bubble up, just not quite so crazily?”

Sera grinned and hastily led her back to Vivienne’s desk. She let Ellie halve the lemon, and then squeeze all the juice out into the beaker, as much as she could! And then she was supposed to fill it up with just as much water as there was juice, so from the first big notch on the beaker to the second, and then add in a little sugar annnnd one teaspoon of baking soda—

Oh gosh! They basically made fizzy lemonade! Sera poured the mixture into the two glasses she had set aside for them,

“It looks great, Ink!” Sera encouraged as they clinked their glasses together wow! It was so good! Sweet and tangy and the bubbles were tickly! Though, gosh it was a mean sort of funny—it was so cute though, she couldn’t help but laugh!—Any came back around and one of the lemon halves had fallen onto the floor, and being the curious pup she was, she’d given it a few sniffs and licked at the wrung-out fruit, and yipped, running around in circles as she worked to shake off the sour taste.

“Awe sorry Anya,” Ellie giggled out, as the pup whined and pawed at her boots, she crouched and took the puppy up in her arms, “Lemons aren’t very yummy all on their own, huh?” Probably a good thing it wouldn’t be something Anya would want to try again, Cullen said citrus wasn’t super great for dogs—they could eat it but sometimes it made their stomachs upset if they had a whole bunch.

“Wuff.”

"Excuse me, my lady?" a servant girl approached them, after, oh! Shoot! Ellie'd meant to roll the rug back into place but she'd gotten caught up in the fun and forgotten all about it, but this girl had gone ahead and done it for her. She seemed about Sera's age, Human though, but blonde and blue eyed like her Elf friend—oh! She was wearing a Friendship bracelet like them too!

"Oh cripes, hey Mol's!" Sera greeted, sounding relieved, "Haven't seen you, you're feelin' better yeah?"

She nodded, "I am, thank you."
"Good, thanks, you know, for all your help. Oh! Inky, this is Molly."

"Hi Molly, I'm Ellie, it's very nice to meet you! I'm sorry you were sick, but I'm glad you're feeling better."

"It was nothing serious, thank you," she said, "I'm just finishing up in the Chantry, and I was going to stop by Flissa's anyway, would you care for me to take your tray along?" she asked, gesturing to the tray that held their earlier experiments mess.

"That's so sweet of you, but we can get it, you should enjoy your break!" Ellie said, "Thanks so much for keeping the Chantry clean, gosh you do an amazing job! The Chantry's always spotless, I really appreciate it!" It had to be a whole lot of work, the Chantry was huge! Hopefully she wasn't the only person in charge of keeping it all clean!

Molly blushed. "Thank you, my lady, I'm pleased to work for the Inquisition. And it really is no trouble, I insist," she said, laying hands on the tray handles.

"Go ahead Mol's thanks," Sera nodded.

"Yeah, thanks, have a wonderful rest of your day," Ellie wished her with a little wave as Molly left them. She was sweet!

"I think that's it for today Ink, did you like it?...was I good?" Sera snickered to herself, "Bit gross that."

"You were great! It was lots of fun, and I feel like I learned a lot," Ellie promised.

"Good," Sera said with some measure of relief like she'd been nervous. And then she was quiet a moment, listening, "I think Mare and Leliana are done. Here Inky, bundle good, friggin freezing, it's been snowin' like a bitch all day," oh! Sera had kept track of her cloak, she'd worn it to her meeting, but Josie had taken it when she got to the Chantry.

"Thanks Ser'! You're still okay right? Do you need a coat or anything?"

"Armor's warm enough," Sera assured her but...well too late anyway, she as on the list! Before she had to leave Haven again, Ellie had a list of people...lots of Elves...to make warm things for! Solas was getting a hat! And Marehis! Sera too...scarves, gosh! Seg helped her put in an order for yarn that should be here soon, and Cremisius was going to help her when he could! He'd been particularly enthusiastic about her idea for horn-cozies.

"Eleanor, Sera," Leliana greeted, as Ellie and Sera approached her little set up out front of the Chantry, she'd been standing and chatting with Marehis. Then, "Ahh, and I mustn't forget little Anya, of course."

"My favorite girls!" Marehis enthused as she turned to greet them, "How was your lesson? I heard, what I believe sounded like happy squealing?"

Ellie nodded, gosh they'd been a bit loud huh? The baking soda vinegar thing had startled her! "Sera taught me all sorts of cool stuff! We did an experiment! Two of them! Sera taught me about chemical reactions and how bases and acids can react together! And I learned about the scientific method! And division and multiplication!"

"How wonderful, I'm so proud of you da'len! I'm pleased you had fun," Marehis said, then to Sera, "Thank you, da'assan, I truly appreciate you."
"No problem Mare’ it was fun," Sera said, "I’ll see you later Ink, have fun in your magic lessons."

Ellie and Marehis met with Vivienne and Solas in Solas’s cabin, the three Mages sitting on the floor by the fire and Marehis taking post in her usual spot in a chair by the door. Ellie tried to be present minded during her lesson but Maker, she was excited for when her watch would say 6:00, 01/04 again! She was half tempted to just turn it to that time, like somehow her little mechanical watch could control the flow of actual time. She kept checking it, Solas chuckling when he caught her peeking at her watch again when they were supposed to be meditating—he was supposed to be meditating too!

“Da’vehnan,” Solas said, Ellie looked to him as he sat with eyes closed, in lotus position, “your excitement is such I can feel it without pressing our bond, I assure you if you do not calm yourself, I may begin giggling of all things.”

“Oh, then do keep it up darling, I believe that would be worth while to see,” Vivienne said from where she sat ‘meditating’ as well. Gosh they were bad at this today!

“Sorry,” Ellie offered shyly.

Vivienne sighed as she opened her eyes, “You needn’t be my dear. You’re excited for your little date tonight with the Lieutenant?”

Ellie nodded, “I really am.”

“Solas, you’re confident Eleanor can cast well enough to preserve her life in the field?” Vivienne questioned.

“…Certainly?” Solas assured albeit uncertain why she would ask.

“Then one lesson derailed will not bring her to harm. Go fetch us…no never mind, I’ll do it, as I have hair to speak of, I know what I’m looking for,” Vivienne said, rising from her seat, “Marehis darling, do you mind terribly if I work some magic of my own on Eleanor’s hair?”

“Certainly not, as long as Ellie doesn’t mind it of course,” Marehis said.

“Do you mind my dear?” Vivienne asked Ellie, “I’ve something splendid in mind I assure you.”

“Go for it!”

She really really did! Maker! She left Solas’s cabin and came back armed with a silky blue scarf, coconut oil and a comb, water and this little box that had a bunch of tiny, thin, golden looking stretchy things, miniatures of the hairties Ellie was used to and they sort of seemed like… had Vivienne gotten them, gone out and purchased things to do her hair with? Madam de Fer kept her own hair short but it seemed rather a lot like hers, just, maybe a tighter curl pattern, it could be a lot to take care of. But she’d obviously worked a lot with hair like hers, wow. Vivienne had her sit in a chair before Solas’s fireplace, chatting about what Ellie had in mind to wear tonight, if Cremisius had let her know what he was planning, dinner was all she knew for certain. Solas, bless his heart, he did manage to slip in some magical theory as Vivienne worked with Ellie’s hair. She started by wetting and conditioning it all before parting Ellie’s hair straight down the middle, then she made two smooth braids that went from the front of Ellie’s head all the way to the tip of her longest hair conditioned and brushed and pulled taught by working with it with fingers she magically called gentle heat into to allow her to dictate its shape.
“Solas, do be a dear and put the kettle on, just water mind,” Madam de Fer instructed as she worked. Wow it was even longer when it wasn’t so curled up, the two braids went all the way to her hips! And when she was all done tying them off, she took the silk scarf she’d brought and wrapped it around Ellie’s hair line to make sure her edges lay flat, “Eleanor, what sort of pillowcase does the Inquisition have you using?” Vivienne asked as she finished securing the scarf and moved on to wetting a cloth with the water Solas warmed up for her, taking a braid in hand and ‘sealing it’ Vivienne called it when Marehis asked after the practice, with the warm water.

Ellie’s mind drew a blank at what she meant, “A um…rectangular one? It’s very soft!”

There was amusement in her voice as Vivienne elaborated, “The material, I meant, my dear.”

“It is cotton,” Marehis offered up.

Madam de Fer made a sound that spoke to offense and somehow gave the very distinct impression that the Inquisition had provided Ellie a pillowcase made of nug dung. Her pillows were nice!

“Darling, do you like the scarf I’ve used to wrap your edges?” Vivienne asked before Ellie could defend her beloved pillows, “It’s very pretty,” Ellie assured her.

“It is, you shall keep it then. It is silk, and it can be unfolded several times over, it would wrap your hair nicely, you should wear it when you sleep, you’ll notice a marked improvement in your hair, believe me. It would assist in smoothness, and less tearing, cleanliness, condition—cotton dries hair out as you sleep, but with silk, it helps to retain your hair’s moisture.”

“Oh! Gosh, Vivienne you don’t have to give me your scarf, I didn’t know about silk being good for hair, but maybe I’ll get—”

“Nonsense, I’ve no need for it, I’ve plenty of others to accessorize with—you’ve not seen me wrap my head as we travel, my pillowcase is proper silk.”

Ellie blushed, gosh it was sweet of her. “Thanks.”

“I’m pleased to provide as such my dear, now, what do you think?” she asked as she finished her work, she came around to stand before Ellie and brought the braids to hang over the front of her shoulders so she could see.

“Wow, Vivienne! I love it!” Ellie enthused.

Vivienne leveled her a warm smile, “I’m pleased to hear it, darling.”

Ellie gasped when she looked at the time, “Oh! Sorry Solas, we really did take up a bunch of time huh?”

“I’ve learned an unfathomable wealth of knowledge about hair care, I’ll be certain to put to good use,” Solas offered jovially.

“Your scalp might appreciate a silk pillowcase,” Ellie teased, patting him on his poor bald head—it would have a hat soon! It couldn’t be good to live somewhere so very cold with a head so very naked! Ellie still got cold outside and she had massive amounts of hair to keep her warm and a hat!...if Vivienne asked, it was made of silk, she didn’t care if whatever was supposed to dry out hair, she liked her hat!

Wasn’t sure about wearing it tonight out of respect for the hair though, gosh Vivienne had done such a good job. She’d take it along in her cloak pocket though, just in case, and she would wear her scarf...the one Cremisius made her, she’d definitely sleep with the one Vivienne gave her though. She wasn’t entirely sure what all Cremisius had in mind, if they’d be outside a lot or not, granted she did have stockings to keep her warm but she just wasn’t feeling wearing a dress again. Plus she only had a few and she sort of wanted to save them, like it’d been nice for wearing on their first date, maybe when she got back from the Oasis she’d pull out another. Tonight she was going for warmth and ‘pretty’, she’d gotten so many compliments when she’d worn purple so, nicer purple outfit—reserved for nobility and dates with Cremisius!

Ellie whirled around when she heard a sort of angry, “Oi! Who the frig—oh! Inky! Shite,” Sera said as she entered their cabin, stomping snow off her boots, “Sorry, I didn’t see Mare around, and thought the guards let some rando red head slip in, your hair’s so different! It’s gonna throw Cole for a right loop if he sees it. Wow it’s real pretty though, you look great!”

“Thanks,” Ellie smiled as she finished buttoning up her tunic. “I let Marehis go ahead, I think she and Solas have plans tonight. What’re you up to?”

“Mmm, little datin’ things of my own, me ‘n Lacey are uh...well since I figure you and Krem'll be out for a little while, Fliss is sending a tray here soon before she closes up—she and Seg have something on tonight too I guess, a break from the Tavern.”

“Oh! You wanna have a nice night in? That’s so sweet! Do you need help? I could help you get ready, set up. Anya's coming along with Cremisius and me so you'll have the place to yourself. We could move the desk so you and Lace can sit at it like, you know, an actual dining set up, set the table, candles—there’s some in the clothing blaahhh,” she searched for the word, it wasn’t a ‘clothing cabinet’ but it was! She didn’t know why she couldn’t just call it that!

“Armoire? Yeah, that, there’s candles….we don’t have like flowers or anything just laying around or growing all over the place, but um...would it be offensive to offer maybe sprinkling Elf root petals on the bed? Oh! Or Embrium, that’s a proper blossom.”

Sera started laughing, “Maker, Ink, we’re not waistin’ potions ingredients like that, cripes, we’re good, honest!” and when she calmed down, “We can set the mood well enough on our own, but I wouldn’t knock your desk idea, yeah, if it en’t too heavy, we can move it more centered or whatever, need another chair though.”

Ellie was already at the door, popping her head out to smile up at one of the guards Marehis arranged for her, “Hiya Bruce! You’re looking exceptionally handsome tonight!”

“Uh-huh, what does the Lady Herald require?” he asked as if put upon, knowing full well Ellie was full of it, blatantly buttering him up.

“Marehis thinks if I step out without escort for two seconds I’ll die—very bold of her to assume that I can die, but she’s a worry wart like that. I could use a second chair in here, would you mind terribly, getting one for me? I tip in undying love. Marehis said I’m not allowed to tip with money...or that it would be rude to tip period, but you’ve got to have something for your trouble.”

The other guardsman, oh! Dave! He was always nice, he snorted into his hand, chuckling while Bruce assured her, mirthful, “Our reward is our service, and the nice little paycheck we get at the end of the week. I’ll see to getting you a second chair my lady, you just hang here, I’ll be back.”

He was! He found them a spare chair they could use and he even helped Ellie and Sera move the desk, it wasn’t terribly heavy but it was nice of him to do so before heading back out to keep watch.

They got the table set up, there was this big knitted shawl Ellie never used…weird to have clothing she never used, she was using it now though! As a table cloth, sort of made it a bit fancier, and they got candles lit, three big round ones they set on a square candle tray in the middle of the table and then Sera asked Ellie for help with her own hair. Ellie wet the top of it, scrunching it in hand and spraying it lightly with…dunno, fancy label in Ciriane and she was tackling one language at a time reading wise, gosh, no thank you, Trade was hard enough on its own! She called it scrunchy spray, cause that’s what it did! Helped hair with curling up nicely when prompted, and staying that way, without making it feel heavy or oily or anything, then she took just a bit of coconut oil, let it melt in the palms of her hands before running her fingers through Sera's hair and following after with a comb, so her hair laid wavy but slicked back.

“You look beautiful as always, Ser’! Lace’s gonna flip!”

Sera's ears were tinged in red, "Thanks Ink."

She was all ready, and they had everything set up for Sera's date, when her watch finally said 6:00, 01/04 and a polite knock sounded at their cabin door.

"Come on Anya," Ellie snapped her fingers gently to prompt the pup's attention, she'd been supervising their work from the foot of Ellie's bed, but she yipped excitedly and followed Ellie to the door.

“Hello, Cremisius!” Ellie greeted cheerily. The guardsmen had been dismissed, which yeah, she guessed made sense, Sera and Lace would probably be more comfortable without people right outside the door and it might even be safer, if anyone did want to start trouble they wouldn’t look there—no guards probably meant no lone Herald. The Lieutenant stood leaning in the doorway, grinning warmly. Huh, they’d had similar ideas she thought, he was wearing the same normal tunic he wore under his armor, just, running around sans chest plate and gauntlets, though he did have an over coat, similar to Thom’s….it’d be sweet if the older man lent his coat to Cremisius but it looked like it’d been cut to fit him, he had mentioned wishing to invest in warmer clothing since it seemed they would be here for the long haul..

“Good evening,” Cremisius greeted, ‘I’m sorry, but I’m here for a Miss Eleanor Trevelyan? Have you seen her? Yea high?” he held a hand level with the center of his chest, “crazy gorgeous curls for days, of course, this,” he said, as he ceased his teasing, taking a braid in hand and smoothing a thumb along a few knots, “is rather striking.”

“Do you like it? Vivienne did it for me,”

“El, it’s beautiful, you look amazing,” he said.

“Well, you do too,” Ellie repayed the compliment, “so,” she giggled, “Miss Trevelyan is accounted for, where is Mister Aclassi taking her?”

“New place, just opened up in Haven,” Cremisius said as she took his arm, “we’re rather in luck actually, it’s only open for a limited time and they do, just so happen, to welcome pups as esteemed guests,” he assured her and Anya.
As he proceeded to lead them right up to Flissa’s which was…closed, Sera’d said. And even if she hadn’t, Ellie could read now, there was a sign that said as much…oh, ‘Closed for a Private Party’.

“We’re the private party?” Ellie asked.

“…part of it, you’ll see, come on, first things first,” Cremisius said as he unlocked the door and led Ellie and Anya inside. “I hope you don’t mind but I thought, maybe, you’d like to help me put dinner together. Tevinter dish, a favorite I think you’ll like.”

“Tevinter?” Ellie asked.

“Uh-huh, pizza, you in?” he asked as he pulled an apron off the hook by Flissa’s bar, offering it to Ellie.

Oh gosh, “We’re making pizza?” she asked excitedly as she accepted the apron, pulling it overhead and tying it secure around her waist.

“As long as you really don’t mind—I promise you won’t be doing all the work, we’ll work together just, I dunno, its kind of fun to cook when it’s not just you on your own.”

Ellie washed her hands in the basin, before going to assess the ingredients laid out on the bar top, Cremisius was just finishing up securing an apron around his hips.

Cooking together was...gosh, lots of fun...of a somewhat flirtatious sort. She'd never made pizza before, that much was true, but she knew very well how to knead and roll out dough, but she accepted the offered help, it was more than welcome, Cremisius standing close arms around her helping just, it was practical, that they work together after all. Many hands make light work and all that. Gosh, but they were making an awful lot, they ended up with three large smooth circles of what would be pizza crust.

"One for each of us?” she asked, "These are awfully big, I mean, if you want an eating contest I'm game, but little Anya probably shouldn't eat quite so much pizza." Anya sort of 'wuffed' at mention of her name and Ellie played like the pup was indignant, "What? One slice of this pizza will be like! Almost as big as you you, silly girl!"

"I've got something whipped up for Anya already,” he said, pulling over a covered dish he lifted the lid off for Ellie to take a peek, "ram meat, peas, carrots, brown rice, should still be warm when we all sit down to eat...pizza isn't just for us."

Awe! He made dinner for Anya! That made her heart happy! "Thanks, it looks great! So, we're having a pizza party then?"

"Uh-huh, you'll see," Cremisius assured her as he twisted open a jar full of red sauce. "Made this up yesterday, takes a little bit more prep time and it's nice to let it set a while on its own."

They each took charge of a pizza and split the difference with the third, spreading sauce before Ellie helped Cremisius pull over the bowls of cheese he had setting out. "We've got Mozzarella, Parmesan, Fontina and...Ellie, whatcha doin' with the Feta?"

“What Feta?” Ellie asked—she was innocent! He looked between her, and the bowl of Feta in her Marked hand, popping another little chunk of it into her mouth with the other.

“The uh, Feta you’re currently snacking on, you’ll ruin your supper that way you know,” Cremisius cautioned.

“Well, it’s just that, no offense of course, but Feta is just…so disgusting, the worst you know?”

Cremisius seemed to be fighting a grin as he crossed his arms over his chest, “Uh-huh.”

“I’m doing everyone a favor by eating it all myself—I’m sparing you.”

“Sparing us?”

“Yep, just the Herald of Andraste saving the day, my greatest victories will rank—defeating the evil that is Feta cheese and sealing the Breach.”

“Is it? Well, I suppose much like the Venatori…it’s my goal to stop you from defeating Feta.”

Ellie gasped, accusing, “The Krematori!” she squealed when he reached for the bowl, she turned to keep it out of reach and his arms wrapped around her waist, hoisting her up and spinning about as Ellie laughed. Anya started barking but—was the little traitor barking at her? She was supposed to come to her rescue! Blaspheme!

“Surrender the Feta!” he demanded laughingly negotiating against her ear he offered, “We’ll make sure you get a slice with a concentration of this horrible cheese, you know, brunt of the work, but everyone’s helping out, like the Breach.”

“Hmm…well, I’m always about peaceful resolutions.”

“Good to hear,” Cremisius chuckled, pressing a kiss to her hair before setting her down and she returned her hostage cheese. Feta was just, so good!

“Anya! You’re supposed to be on my side!” she reprimanded the pup who just stood panting happily as she looked up at her, tail wagging, “Stop being so cute!” She was too adorable to be mad at!

Okay! Focusing, pizza! Gosh, four different kinds of cheese! One pizza was dedicated to sausage and ram meat, and then one was all peppers, onions, garlic, and then the third was coated in olives and jalapeños, “We can’t eat whole pizzas on our own but uh, Bull has a thing for olives.”

“The Iron Bull is coming?” oh! Was it going to be like a Chargers dinner? That’d be fun!

“He’s on the guest list, with a few others. Let’s get one of these cooking up, and I’ll clue you in on the surprise.” Fliss didn’t have one of those big pizza spatulas—the official name, Ellie was sure—that she’d seen in use in Hasmal, but they made do using a cutting board, to slide the pizza into the stone shelf in Flissa’s fireplace and Cremisius snorted, laughing into his hand as Anya ‘cast’ to make the fire burn warmer, then they sat, Ellie taking the pup into her lap while Cremisius got on with his surprise.

The surprise, was a ‘q-u’ word.

“A quadruple date?” Ellie asked.

“Those are things right? A double date is two couples, so four, makes it a quadruple date.”

“Me and you is one, so the Iron Bull has a date?”
“Uh-huh, seeing as I don’t think he bought his First Day Eve date dinner, I figured he could make up for it tonight…but uh, they just…might not exactly know it’s a date.”

“Woah woah wait! First Day Eve, the Iron Bull had a date?”

“Ended the night with one. So, I invited Bull along under the premise that you know, we like hanging out with him and it’s sort of a group get together, and uh…well I figure Dorian misses Tevinter cooking, so, that’s what I proposed when I asked him to join us.”

Ellie gasped, and then she held Anya close, taking her up with a hand under her belly to hold her to her chest because she needed up! Pacing before the fire excitedly, “They! What?! Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh!”

“Thom’s pretty certain—more on that too, but first, Bull, Dorian. He had someone with him in the Chargers tent First Day Eve, and the two of them have been coming up with the lamest excuses to seek each other out all week. To talk—no that’s not a euphemism, I’ve seen them off and on and all it seems like they do is talk.”

“Secret date! I love it! Ahh!” she squeaked. Then, “Wait, what about Thom?”

“Dunno, just seen a few things lately, made me think Thom might have a little something going on—with Cyril.”

“Really?!“ Ellie asked as she plopped back down into the seat next to his.

“Apparently, according to group gossip, they used to be a thing back in the day.”

“I love it! Are they coming tonight too?”

Cremisius shook his head, “Nah, doesn’t seem so much like something that needs meddling. Our other couples are established favorites—Marehis and Solas, Cassandra and Cullen.”

Oh gosh! That was such a great idea! Marehis could enjoy herself, be on a date while having the peace of mind that Ellie was safe at hand, and! Ellie loved seeing everyone together and happy and—!

“Quadruple is my new favorite q-u word!” Anya voiced her approval.

One pizza out, another in the oven, and Cremisius checked his watch, “Should be arriving any—”

The Iron Bull arrived first, knuckles rapping against the Tavern door as he opened it, announcing “Party’s here, what’s up boss girl? Hope you don’t mind me crashing, Krem-puff said there’d be,” the Qunari took in the sight of their rather empty Tavern, “…people, and pizza.”

“We’re people!” Ellie defended, “We’re people aren’t we Anya? Say hi to the Iron Bull!” she said, taking one of Anya’s paws in hand to help her wave. The Qunari shook his head and offered a little wave back, bemused.

“We’ve got people comin’ Chief,” Cremisius reasoned, “pizza’ll be ready soon, we just put yours in.”

Bull sniffed as he sat across from them, “Olives and jalapeños? Nice,” he growled appreciatively.
Oh, Cremisius really had set up a secret date of sorts—he’d given everyone different times, playing like he’d just forgotten and misspoken, Dorian arrived just a few minutes later, since again ‘group’ thing and pizza was rather a major draw for the Tevinter Mage.

“Maker—it’s strange, I haven’t had proper Tevene meal since Umbrallis, but then Time Travel makes that…nearly half a year ago, in personal time,” Dorian worked it over in his mind as he took a seat next to Bull.

Umbrallis…oh! Firstfall—the month before Harring.

“Time magic does complicate things,” Ellie supposed, “I heard from Felix yesterday, funnily enough he told me to make sure you eat.” She’d written him once she knew how to write, just…wanted to check up on him, gosh it had to be hard to leave his father behind in Inquisition care, to have gone through all that horrible Venatori stuff, she was worried he’d be feeling alone, blaming himself for his father’s decisions, so she reached out, so he knew…well, despite the major mess, he’d made a new friend!

“He’s always been a horrible mother hen, I should write him back. He’s still on his way back to the Imperium?” Ellie nodded.

“You gonna take him up on his offer?” Bull asked Dorian quietly.

“No. He’s kind but misguided. I’ve nothing to say to them, and he doesn’t exactly have time to dally making pointless social visits to my parents, if he plans to be in Minrathus as soon as the Magisterium is in session…besides, father will be there.”

Oh…yeah, Dorian had mentioned to Ellie, she supposed he’d talked it over with Bull as well, that Felix wanted to know if Dorian had anything he wanted passed along to his parents. Dorian didn’t say very much about his troubles with them aside from them not ‘approving’ of his life choices, to a point he had to separate himself from them.

“Shitty Tevinter expectations?” Cremisius asked.

“Indeed, my parents were rather dead set on me marrying a girl.”

“Mine were pretty dead set on me being one,” he offered jovially, eliciting a snort from the Iron Bull, as he offered a fist to the Tevinter Mage.

“Righto,” Dorian nodded, bumping fists with Cremisius. “I’ve a friend who lives as a woman despite the mark on her birth certificate—she’s an Altus and the Magisterium still wouldn’t deign to allow her legal marriage to her husband because, well…”

“Legally she’s considered a man, total bullshit!”

“Of the foulest sort, she’s planning to start up a movement of sorts, we discussed it at some length, kicked the idea around—the Lucerni* we called it, in the peak of a drunken stupor,” Dorian smiled when Cremisius snorted at the name, “Well it’s somewhat fitting, there’s a need to shed some light to our lesser born brothers and sisters. Same sex marriage is only not recognized in Tevinter because it is not recognized even among its highest members, and that simply cannot stand, Laetans, Soporati, they shouldn’t have to adhere to the same standard.”

“I wouldn’t want to speak out of turn, I’m not Tevinter, but I don’t think it should be standard for Altus’s either really,” Ellie offered, “I mean, Max was nobility, he thought he had a pretty good solution, you know? The only reason people in power emphasize relationships that can bring about children is because heirs are important for passing power down and keeping it in the Dorian nodded. “I’d never necessarily considered it before, but even—living with Madam de Fer, she was patroned when she wasn’t much older than you, by Lord Bastien, granted that was more of a…consort situation, but yes, I would argue that something of the sort could work in Tevinter, Altus’s adopting unclaimed Laetans in the Circle of Magi or becoming paternal patrons for those that show promise. I proposed as much to Maevaris, she’s uncertain when she’ll take such argument to the Magisterium but she plans to make moves in the coming years.” He looked to Ellie, “She wishes to meet with you, actually, has Varric mentioned?”

“I…we’re heading out to the Oasis next um…gosh I don’t know—I’ll make it work,” she would! “Tevinter? When does she need to meet me by?” how fast could Russel ride? He’d need breaks...depending on when she needed to be there, she could be leaving from Orlais, that would be a bit closer to Tevinter than Ferelden—

Dorian busted up laughing, “Oh you precious thing, you’re—Eleanor, my goodness. No, Maker, you’re a little force of nature aren’t you? You’d storm your War Room and demand to be let leash so you could trek all the way out to Tevinter for—? No, there’s no need, it is Verimensis—Wintersmarch my dear girl, which means we are neigh some four months out from Bloomingtide—Summerday*, wedding season. Maevaris will be conducting her annual shopping spree, she can hardly be seen in the same thing twice, and most of her favorite shops lie in Val Royeaux.”

Oh! “Gosh, that works,” Ellie giggled, a little relieved, that sounded more easily done. “She wants to meet me?”

“Indeed. Just a formality, Varric assured me.”

“Varric?” Cremisius asked.

“Maevaris is Varric’s cousin, through as-close-to-marriage as possible with his cousin, the Dwarven Ambassador from Orzammar, like I said, it’s rather a small world, Lieutenant Aclassi.”

It was 7:30 by Ellie’s watch when Cassandra and Cullen, Marehis and Solas arrived, the last pizza was nearly finished baking and they had enough for everyone to go ahead and start, Cremisius had water and apple juice for everyone though the Iron Bull offered his flask up—Dorian took him up on that.

The finished pizzas had been sitting on the bartop and Cremisius divided them into slices before bringing them over to sit in the middle of the table as Ellie got plates for everyone, passing them out before taking her seat and the Lieutenant clapped his hands together, announcing, "Thanks everyone, for joining us. We've got just a few more minutes to wait for pizza with meat on it but if you're a fan of veggies," Bull blew raspberry and gave the notion a thumbs down, earning him a table-full of laughs and a gentle swat on the thigh from Cassandra for interrupting Cremisius, "feel free to dig in."

Although he did spin the veggie pizza’s platter around before Cassandra could lay hands on the slice she’d been reaching for, “I mean absolutely no disrespect, Lady Seeker, but I’m afraid it’s either this, or dueling you for that slice—it’s Ellie’s,” and at Ellie’s inquisitive look he offered, “It’s the part I put the most Feta on. Marked it with a little ‘E’ made out of peppers, see?” Oh! He had!

The Seeker looked wholly amused at the idea Cremisius would challenge her to a duel over a slice of pizza, “By all means, I would not keep Eleanor from her beloved cheese—Feta is a favorite?” Ellie nodded, smiling as Cremisius handed her back her plate.

“Boss girl, you’re killing me,” the Iron Bull groaned, “you can’t like something that—I want to make so many horrible puns and I can’t—”

“Oi, we don’t kinkshame in this Inquisition!” Ellie snapped giddily, “Feta is my fetish—leave me to my cheese!”

“Da’vehnan!” Marehis laughingly reprimanded as the Iron Bull roared with laughter, awe, she felt a little bad, poor Cullen had been taking a drink of water he choked on.

Ellie grabbed a few slices for Cremisius as the Lieutenant went and grabbed the covered dish he’d had set aside for Anya, the pup barked her gratitude when he knelt to leave the dish out for her on the floor, and she eagerly dug in at her food, it was sweet! Oh, and making him a plate earned her a kiss on the cheek, that was nice!

“Your hair looks beautiful, Eleanor,” Cullen said.

“Thanks!”

“Yes, it is lovely, Marehis did an excellent job,” Cassandra agreed.

“Madam de Fer is responsible,” Marehis said, “I feel like I’ve been doing your hair wrong all this time, I really should pick her brain for how to treat it.”

“Marehis, I love the way you braid my hair! It’s always really cute and my hair is complicated—it never dries the same way twice! And it’s a lot to mess with, I really appreciate you always helping me with it, this is like, the longest my hair has ever been in life! I haven’t been able to let it grow out since I was just tiny.”

“You are still ‘just tiny’ Eleanor,” Solas teased.

“Packin’ away that pizza like a champ though,” the Iron Bull said.

“You’re literally eating an entire pizza by yourself,” Ellie giggled.

“I got a lot on me to feed!” he said flexing a bicep, “But uh, you’re on like slice five and Seeker tapped out at two, you did eat lunch right? Your stomach hasn’t been bothering you again has it?”

“Eleanor ate well at lunch,” Cassandra assured him.

“I thought we were going to have to invent second lunch to match breakfast, you’d think we had the girl running laps around Haven all morning instead of napping,” Marehis teased.

“You can all fight me, I was hungry!” Ellie defended, “And sleepy! Plus I had a headache—not a bad one like I got before, just mildly brain stabby,” she was quick to assure the Qunari.

The Iron Bull started laughing…like really really hard.

“Koslun’s ass, it’s starting,” he wheezed as he wiped at his eye.

“What…what’s starting?” Ellie asked.

“Imekari—hungry, sleepy, brain stabbing—I think you might be coming up on a growth spurt.”
What?! “Really?!” Ellie enthused, standing as she slapped her palms onto the table top, “You’re serious now, you promise, I’m going to get taller?”

“Bet you anything hell yeah you are boss-girl,” the Qunari swore, “Shaving-Krem here—yeah puberty-based pun, it’s a theme, I’m festive—wasn’t a whole lot taller than you when we met, then about a month in he just about ate us out of business, slept so much and got so many headaches I made him see Stitches about it, just before he shot up like a damn weed.”

“He’s not wrong,” Cremisius supposed. “Though I blame the headaches on you, not the growth spurt.”

“The Iron Bull! You’re my favorite person! In life! For forever!”

“Hell yeah I am!” he encouraged her enthusiasm, offering a hand across the table to high five before Ellie sat back down.

“If I eat like, an entire pizza and sleep for three days, how tall do you think I’ll be when I wake up?”

“Unfortunately, I do not think it works that way, da’len,” Solas said, chuckling.

“I would not recommend sleeping for three entire days, Eleanor, but you may certainly rest to your hearts content this weekend,” Cassandra offered.

“Oh, gosh, I was just kidding,” Ellie promised, “I wasn’t asking for a day off or anything —”

“Eleanor, you’ve no need to ask for weekends off, at least not while in Haven,” Cullen said.

…that sounded fake, so she checked, “…I…don’t?”

“I understand it was rather a lot of ground to cover this morning, reading over your contract,” Cassandra supplied, “An issue upon which Varric negotiated with us was securing that, so long as there is not an emergency, when you are not in the field, you are guaranteed Saturdays and Sundays to be spent at your leisure. Cole will inform Marehis when you are about to wake, and it is at your discretion however you wish to proceed on those days, given that you coordinate when necessary so we can be mindful of your security.”

Varric was the best!

They ate and chatted, and gosh it was going on ten by the time Marehis came around the table to drop a kiss to the top of Ellie’s head, then Cremisius’s before she wrapped her arms around his shoulders to hug him from behind, saying, “Thank you, lethallin, very much, for inviting us.”

“Thank you all for coming, it’s been a great night.”

“Why don’t you two go enjoy the rest of your evening while we clean up?” Cullen offered, “You did cook after all, we should do the dishes.”

That seemed agreeable to all the adults, except of course, Dorian—“I will do absolutely no dishes, but if there are suds involved, I will watch.”

“Dorian, honestly,” Cassandra reprimanded lightheartedly.
They did take them up on the offer, it was kind and...yeah, nice for it to be just the two of them—three of them, Anya trailed alongside them once Ellie and Cremisius donned their cloak and coat, strolling arm in arm through Haven.

“How’re you feeling? Still hanging in there, or would you rather call it a night?” Cremisius asked as they descended the steps toward her cabin.

“I’m great!” Ellie assured. Plus, she really did want to spend time with him—and too, the longer they stayed out the less chance they ran of accidentally disrupting Sera and Lace’s date, Maker she felt just awful disrupting them the other night! Lace jumped out a window! So, trying to make sure she could use the door this time.

They walked through Haven’s gate and along the path to the frozen lake, Ellie had to use her serious, stern voice with Anya to warn her not to stray out onto the ice, and the pup was obedient, sniffing at the water’s edge curiously and deciding it was nothing to ‘woof’ home about.

“That went well, right?” Cremisius asked her as they walked.

“Of course! That was such a great idea, and it was loads of fun!” she assured him, “Actually—and absolutely no pressure, I know its short notice and you might be busy, and it might be just, too much—but if you’re free tomorrow, maybe you could come over and we could knit! Seg says the yarn I ordered should be in tomorrow.”

“Hmm...hang out with Bull and his horrible puns like any old Saturday...or spend a lazy day knitting with you...oh man, dang it El, this is such a tough decision,” he smiled when she rolled her eyes at him, wrapping an arm around her shoulders to draw her closer as they walked, “I think, I’d absolutely love to join you,” he said, smiling against her hair before pressing a kiss there.

“Then it’s a date! We’ll just get comfy and knit and we can order in and things—I’ve got a pretty big list I want to tackle before I leave again.”

“Sometime next week, yeah?” he asked and when Ellie nodded, “We’ll hit that list good, working together we can do it!” he was certain, and then he looked about and asked, “Ellie, have you ever made a snow angel?”

She didn’t know what that was so, she was going to guess, “Nope!”

She stopped when Cremisius did and turned with him as he faced the ice, and then he took a few steps away from her and fell back against the snowy slope, moving his arms and legs like she did whenever jumping-jacks were a thing in her warm ups, it was silly! But fun so she fell back and joined him, gosh! Cold! But fun!

She stilled when Cremisius did and he said,

“You’re going to have fun, in the Oasis—yeah, there’ll be Rifts and things and that sucks—but you’ll close them up, and it’s supposed to be warm and sunny and the reports I read say you can’t even seen the breach all the way out there. You’ll be with your friends, exploring something cool. You deserve it, El, have as much fun as you can, be as safe as you can, and I’ll see you when you get back.”

“I’ll miss you,” she offered quietly.

“I’ll miss you too. But that’ll make you coming back all the better won’t it?”

“True.”
“Don’t worry about any of that—we’ll pick right back up whenever you’re back. Everyone here will look out for each other, and we’ll all look after Anya,” he chuckled when Anya took that as call to come sniff at his hair before rapid fire licking at his cheek, “precious little menace that she is!”

Ellie smiled as she rolled over and kissed his free cheek, “I think she’s just respecting that I have good taste in men.”

The weekend was amazing! She got to sleep in and Marehis checked in on her when she woke up. She, Sera, and Ellie chatted about their dates, Ellie was so glad she and Lace had such a nice time! And Sera didn't much care for knitting so she went to go hit up whatever Lace was into since she'd be leaving Monday, to scout ahead of them for their journey into the Oasis. Marehis sat in Ellie's desk chair, settling in with a book to read, and Cremisius came, armed with loads of yarn —she wasn't exactly sure how you buy just 'a scarf worth of this color' and 'a hat size amount in another' so, lots of yarn! He was free to use any for his own projects too. All the yarn! All the knitting needles! They sat on Ellie's bed, their backs against the wall as they knit. Cremisius worked at top speed once he got sight of her list. He'd! He'd been knitting slower before, Maker! Because she'd just been learning and so he'd been keeping a slower pace so she wouldn't feel discouraged, and it was a bit intimidating to interrupt him when he was really in the zone with it but he always smiled and stilled his hands to address either a dropped stitch of Ellie's or answer a question—Anya came over and chuffed in his direction and he'd stopped and had an entire conversation with her, 'why yes, I am having a marvelous day, what about you miss Anya? good? Great to hear, your coat is looking particularly shiny today, did your momma give you a bath?'

“Elgar'nan,” Maerhis groaned, “please, Ellie is too young to be referred to as ‘momma’ of anyone.”

“What?! I’m a puppy mom! That makes you a puppy grandma!”

“Gods preserve me, I’m a grandmother.”

They worked Saturday, and Sunday too! With Cremisius helping, Lace was sent off with a new hat and scarf Monday morning—brown because they thought about it and it would be the most discrete color with her armor, while she was out scouting ahead, it wouldn't draw unwanted attention. Cremisius helped her deliver everything, taking a little bit of time out of her morning training with Cassandra and Cullen—though they were repaid in a scarf for Cullen and a hat and scarf for Cassandra, purple to match the leather of her armor! Hat and scarves for everyone! More purple, for Leliana and Lady Josie! White for Madam de Fer, brown for Thom, because 'Chargers' and for Dorian too because his one armed outfit was brown and white, and blue for Solas, yellow for Marehis because that was her favorite color! Red for Sera who insisted Ellie ‘didn't friggin have to do that' in the same breath she excitedly pulled her hat on. Cole already had a big hat and Ellie wasn't sure how well he’d like receiving clothing but he gasped in delight when she offered him a light blue scarf that matched his eyes.

“It does match!” he enthused before letting Ellie wrap it around his neck in a way she was decently sure would stay put and keep him warm.

The Iron Bull was just as enthusiastic about his horn cozies—a proper hat wouldn’t stay on his head so, he got a warm brown scarf he immediately wrapped around his neck with a flourish, and then after leveling a snickering Cremisius a one-eyed glare, he slipped the matching brown yarn, pom-pom tipped covers over his horns.

“Little pom poms should help keeping you from poking people’s eyes out,” Cremisius said.
Ellie giggled, “They’re cute and I thought it might help keep your horns from catching on things cause sometimes they poke through and tear tenting, but we put little clay…they look like thimbles, that are just under, kind of in the pom poms, that the tips of your horns are in now, they won’t hurt your horns but, you know, should help them not be so pokey when you’re in tents—you’ll push the tenting up but you wont tear into it, so your horns will just sort of slide under the tenting instead of tearing it. No more crawling!”

He’d knelt to accept everything so he wrapped one arm around her shoulders in a warm hug, “Thank you Imekari,” and then, “You too, brat,” and in her peripheral she saw his arm shoot out and heard Cremisius make a startled sound and a thump followed by Cremisius laughing.

And then Wednesday morning rolled around. Everyone was gathered out front of Haven’s gate, they were leaving, again, for the Oasis. Gosh she was so excited, but she hated leaving! She’d miss everyone! She…she wasn’t sure she’d actually be leaving though—she’d been hugging everyone goodbye, Leliana and Josie, and then Cullen, she hugged him around the neck and the Commander wrapped his arms around her and hoisted her up, holding her tight for…well, she was wearing her watch so,

“Cullen?”

“Yes, sweetheart?”

“I love love love hugging you, like, this holds serious rank in my top hugs in life, but um, it’s been five minutes…six minutes now?” Granted it wasn’t like she was much better…she might have spent a solid half hour saying goodbye to Anya, just carrying her around everywhere and giving her lots of kisses. All the kisses! She was going to miss her so much and she was scared Anya wouldn’t understand that! She was just a puppy, she didn’t know about the Breach or Mage-Templar wars or the Oasis! Ellie was just going to be gone, and she prayed Anya didn’t feel abandoned!

Cullen sighed, “I suppose if you don’t want to attempt a ten-minute hug?”

“I mean we can, but I’m starting to lose the feeling in my legs, and I kind of need those.”

He set her on her feet, bracing her by the elbows, “I will miss you,” he said miserably, “be safe, have fun.”

“I will! I’ll miss you too, but I’ll write! And you can write me back!” she assured him, then she looked about, Cassandra was waiting near by so she whispered, “You have all the…?”

“I do. We’ve practiced well enough, I believe little Anya know what to do.”

“Thanks!” she said before going to the Seeker, holding out her arms.

Cassandra cleared her throat and pulled Ellie close.

“I’ll miss you,” Ellie said, her throat felt tight she…she didn’t want to leave Cassandra! It was Cassandra! This whole thing, everything she’d ever done in the Inquisition, she’d done with her, from the moment she woke up after the Conclave!

“Oh dear girl, I will miss you too,” Cassandra rasped out, arms squeezing tighter, oh! Her voice sounded kind of like she’d been crying, awe, “please be safe, Eleanor. Rely on your allies and enjoy yourself.”

“I’ll be super safe! Everyone will work together and have each other’s backs! And Solas and Dorian will all be there to help me with Rifts—Sera says she wants to try helping suppress them! I’ll have lots of help, and I’ll write whenever I can!”

“I look forward to it,” Cassandra assured as she pulled away, raising a hand to wipe at the inside corners of her eyes, “I will see you when you return.”

“You will,” Ellie promised.

Cassandra nodded and when she pulled away she got an armful of Sera, the Elf girl rushing to hug the Seeker tight, grunting with her effort, “’Sandra!”

“Sera, take care of yourself dear girl, be safe.”

“I will! I’ll watch out for Inky!”

Ellie went to Cremisius so he could say his own goodbyes, though it was “Hi,” he started out with.

“Hi,” Ellie replied softly, and then, reaching into her cloak, she pulled out the last of her knitting mission—a name she’d kept off the list because it wasn’t super hard to keep track of, she reached up to pull a warm brown woolen hat over Cremisius’s head before wrapping the matching scarf around the back of his neck, gently tugging it so he leaned down a bit as she stepped up onto the toes of his boots and pulled him in for a kiss, “This, is exactly where we’re picking up when I get back, kay?”

Cremisius looked a bit dazed as he grinned. “Uh, yeah, I can work with that.” He rested his forehead against hers, “Have fun, be safe.”

“I will—you too.”

“Oh good heavens they are nauseating aren’t they?” Dorian’s voice asked, he was standing with the Iron Bull next to Bitsy, Ellie and Cremisius turned to look at them—they were the ones watching!

“That was some damn smooth moves boss girl was puttin’ down though,” the Iron Bull said—thank you!

“I warned you about scarves and Tevinter lovers.”

Ellie looked to the Tevinter at her side, “Cremisius!”

He was one step ahead of her, he’d ducked down and was now rearing back with tightly packed ammunition, “I’m on it.”

Ellie snatched up a fistful of snow for herself and her snowball striking Dorian in the chest just a second after Cremisius’s caught Bull in the chin.

“Mind your beeswax!”

Thom was just finishing up securing his pack to his horse’s saddle, his men heading to the practice field, and Cremisius pressed a kiss to the top of Ellie’s head, giving her arm a squeeze before he went to catch up with them as they offered waves to Thom who waved back. Though Cyril broke away from their group with a nod to Cremisius, went to join Thom.

“You’re heading out?”
Thom nodded, “Yeah.”

Cyril clapped him on the shoulder and pecked a kiss to Thom’s lips, “Be safe out there.”

“Always am, love.”

Ellie’s jaw dropped open—love?!—and the Iron Bull chuckled,

“You minding your beeswax, Imekari?”

It was heartbreak, to watch Eleanor leave. Cassandra could hardly stand it, she wanted nothing more than to join her in the Oasis. But she was duty bound, to stay and train the Templars she’d taken on, make them suitable and ready to work with their Mage allies, to suppress and seal the Breach, ultimately, Eleanor needed her more in Haven, fulfilling her role as Seeker, than she did in the field just now. The Oasis would hold some danger, but nothing she could not handle with the allies that joined her, and hopefully it would provide lighter travel for the girl, nothing so arduous as their last journey from Haven.

Oh, but she missed her, horribly, terribly. She ached with the loss the first morning waking after Eleanor and her party set out. The first thought that slipped through the slight haze that lingered momentarily when she rose imbibing Sleeping potion, was that she should stretch and breathe and see about getting breakfast, go join Eleanor and Sera in their cabin for prayer and morning repast. And then realization struck home, that neither girl were home. Oh Maker, home.

“Cassandra?” Cullen asked, a warm hand rubbing along her bicep as the former Templar held her tighter against his side, her head resting on his chest.

“I did not realize you were awake,” she offered quietly, wiping at her eyes before looking up at him, “You slept well?”

“I did, thank you, for ah, leaving the door open.”

“Of course,” it was…she did find comfort, in the times he spent the night in her bed, her quarters, while a bit less confined than his tent among those on the soldiers field, was windowless, she did not hesitate to leave the door open for his comfort.

Although the door staying open provided another benefit of sorts. No one had to answer the door for their incoming guest.

Cassandra heard faintly, the patter of paw against Chantry stone, eager panting drawing nearer and then a ‘wuff!’ and the door creaked ever so as Anya entered the room, yipping as she pawed at the bedpost, and Cullen smiled as he grunted, shifting to let his free arm hang over the side of the bed and allowed him to hoist the pup up to join them, and Cassandra was just a breath away from reprimanding that he should not allow the dog on the bed—but her words died in her throat, and she sat up straight when she saw a slip of parchment with all too familiar handwriting under the pup’s collar. Cassandra <3

Cassandra raised a trembling hand to her lips as she read, what was apparently titled, an ‘Ellie-gram’.
Good morning, Cassandra! I hope you had sweet dreams! This is Ellie-gram number 1. Dorian taught me about prefixes and suffixes—gram is a suffix that means something written or recorded, something meant to surprise the recipient! You’re the recipient and I bet you’re surprised! I know things get crazy and busy and I might not be able to write every day, so I thought this would be a nice way to still be in touch with you! I love you lots, and I miss you so much! You’ve got this! You’re doing so so so great with the Templars, and I’m so proud of you for staying and training them, and when I get home, we’ll kick major Breach butt!

Yesterday we finished Transfigurations 11, I promise to try and keep up with our Chant studies with Sera! So, today, we should be starting Transfigurations 12, I think its super sweet, if you wake up the same time as usual, we’ll probably be reading at the same time!

“Would you hand me my Chant, please Cullen?” Cassandra sniffled.

He did as asked, offering her the worn book before he settled back against the headboard with her, oh blessed pup, Cassandra sat holding Anya close as she read aloud from Transfigurations 12, there was something in fact soothing, the idea that she and Eleanor and Sera may well be reading together even as they were apart.

And so the days passed, her mornings were opened with Anya presenting her yet another Ellie-gram—it took the entirety of a week to realize it was the Lieutenant rising early each morning to see to Anya’s breakfast, and then on the walk so that the pup might do her business, the young man escorted her to the Chantry, tucked a pre-written note under Anya’s collar and opened the heavy Chantry door for the pup so she could patter her way to Cassandra’s quarters, Maker bless him.

Cassandra received the occasional missive from Eleanor—she enjoyed the weather in the Oasis immensely, and the Rifts were being cleared, though Sera penned a rather panicked missive that almost sent Cassandra riding out to join them, that Eleanor had fallen into a mine that held a Rift in its depths. Sera was writing to apologize, she was so freaking sorry she hadn’t been keeping close enough, been able to keep the girl from harm. But the Iron Bull was steadfast in his reports, they came in daily of their progress, and he reported that Eleanor was well, not seriously harmed, and Cassandra wrote Eleanor to check in on her, and replied to Sera—she was not at fault, it was an incredibly dangerous fight, there were two Rifts close together in the Oasis, one high in the desert range past the scaffolding built around the mine, and one within the mine proper. Eleanor had taken high ground on the scaffolding to cast against the demons pouring from the high Rift—Demons of Despair, multiple of them, had come from it and their icy reach was far, she attempted to stay out of range of them. However, she’d been too far to cast against the Rift proper, and when she made to right that, she’d been rushed by a Greater Terror, and knocked off the scaffolding, rolled and rolled grasping hold of the railing that was meant to safe guard those who drew close to the mine opening, hanging there. She’d gotten her staff up and was about to pull herself up but she’d been holding on with her Marked hand and the Rift below crackled and boomed to life, pouring out demons and she lost her grip, falling into their midst unarmed—if Sera had not been so quick to follow after, been present enough to realize Eleanor’s staff was still up on the platform and grabbed it before descending into the mine after her friend as she called for their allies to shift focus to the Rift below, Cassandra shuddered to think what might have happened. Sera had done well, by all accounts, save her own—she was being too hard on herself, and Cassandra sought to right that, I am proud of you, the Iron Bull reported that you did well, and I believe that. Thank you, Sera.

Cassandra was beyond relieved when she received the missive from Eleanor that they had concluded their business in the Oasis, her wealth of pre-written Ellie-grams had dried up, understandably, the girl had taken the time to pen over a dozen of the things, and they were precious every one of them. They would be returning home—did Cassandra need anything from Val Royeaux? Their party was going to pass through on their way back, Varric, Dorian, and Eleanor were to meet some relative of Varric’s for lunch, and perhaps do a bit of shopping. She wasn’t asking for money!—she insisted upon that for some reason. Ahh. Apparently she’d written Cullen, who had responded before Eleanor sent word to Cassandra—when the Commander heard of her side trip to Val Royeaux involving a spot of shopping, he frantically passed along several coin notes, and insisted Eleanor treat herself.

“Cullen!” Cassandra swatted the man with Eleanor’s letter, they’d been sitting on her bed reading over reports and correspondence.

“She’s! She’s a girl, Cassandra, and shopping, and I know she has money but,” he sighed, “—Mia and Rosie are well and grown, and still to this day, any time they mention taking on a spree in passing to my father, he doles out a little something. I was just…following example I suppose, do you think I insulted her?” he worried.

“No, sweet man,” Cassandra assured him, rocking forward where she sat with her legs crossed up underneath her to press a kiss to his jaw, “she merely worries that she had somehow made it seem like she wanted you to send funds when she had nothing of the sort in mind.”

Though Eleanor’s return to Haven was ultimately derailed. Reports came in from the Fallow Mire.

Maker. Their soldiers, Lord Berand and his men, had gone missing. Scout Harding was working tirelessly to get further information out to them—there were Rifts in the Mire, and, apparently, a tribe of Avvar had taken refuge in that abandoned land, more than that she was not certain, Cullen sent out fellow soldiers to search for their missing numbers and Eleanor and her party, having just crossed the border between Orlais and Ferelden, they were heading for the Mire.

Cassandra was riding to join them—the Templars were well at hand, and something…she felt in the core of her being, she needed to be there, to lend Eleanor her immediate aid. Something was wrong, in the Fallow Mire, their disappearing soldiers was beyond unsettling, and too she missed Eleanor horrendously, had admittedly…it was horrible of her, but admittedly her immediate distress as these reports was the realization that they meant Eleanor would not be returning to Haven as planned, that their separation would be longer still, it was unbearable. And selfish to an extent, Maker, missing soldiers was serious, they could be hurt or captured or…please, please do not let them be dead—Berand was a good man, his men as well, and despite the actions that put those soldiers so low on the totem pole they’d been sent out to handle what they thought would be pointless, rainy muddy business in the Fallow Mire as punishment for their slander of Eleanor, Cassandra prayed they did not pay the ultimate price, it had been meant as a lesson, penance paid for their petty cruelty, not something life threatening.

She encountered Marehis, on her own journey to the Mire. The women found themselves arriving in the Fallow Mire just short of Eleanor—the Iron Bull touched base in writing, that the girl feared for their soldiers and had gone as fast as possible to reach the Mire.

Though…well Maker, Cassandra almost did not recognize the girl.

When they arrived at their infiltration camp in the Mire, Scout Harding greeted them, and then Cassandra caught sight of a girl, bandaging wrapped around what would be the exposed flesh of her ankles given her armored leggings fell short by a few inches, shod in thick soled ankle boots that seemed to be being steadily broken into. There was a bandage taped just behind her right ear, easily seen because…well the most striking difference in Eleanor’s appearance, it was in fact Eleanor Cassandra realized, was her hair. A great portion of it was missing. Gone were her long curly locks, replaced instead by a scalp of short, fluffy hair, just beginning to be long enough for its tips to curl up.

“Eleanor?”

“Uh-huh?” Eleanor asked absentmindedly as she turned to face them, reading a missive under the glow of her Fadelit palm. Oh Maker, it had been so long, Eleanor, she’d grown, her features more defined, there was a new scar, a slice on the left of her top lip, and she had not shot up like a damn weed but she was certainly taller, “Hi,” she greeted breathlessly, coming to hug Marehis close.

“Hello sweet girl,” Marehis said, her voice tight in her throat as she held the girl tightly before releasing her so Cassandra could claim a hug of her own.

Oh it was pure relief to have the girl at hand again. "Eleanor."

The girl hummed happily as she hugged Cassandra back, "Thank you so much for coming."

"Of course."

“Ellie? Another report just came in,” Scout Harding sounded like she was regretful to disturb them, Eleanor stayed in Cassandra's hold, the Seeker’s arm over her shoulder as the girl turned to face the Scout.

Eleanor’s party gathered around as Scout Harding announced, “So, the Avvar tribe here has taken our missing members captive. Hostage. Their leader, the ‘Hand of Koth’ is holding them, until he gets his chance at a fight.”

“This hand of Koth wishes warfare with the Inquisition?” Cassandra questioned.

“Nooot exactly,” Scout Harding ruefully intoned, “he wants to fight the Herald of Andraste.”

There was one change more, aside from Eleanor's hair and height, that had come to pass in their time apart. At the news of her latest challenge, Eleanor sighed and said,

“Well, shit.”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish
Da'assan= Dalish term of endearment, means 'little arrow'

Lethallan/Lethallin='my friend', lan is female, while lin is male.

End Notes:

*This conversation spawned "Under the Changing Stars" a fic where Thom doesn’t pursue mercenary work, and meets Ellie at age 8

*Klaus—Nicolaus Lorey is a canon member of Thom's old crew, in Trespasser, Thom tries to find his former men to apologize, ends up finding Klaus restarting his life in Kirkwall, they have a drink at the Hanged Man and go their separate ways on good terms.

*Judex and Peraqualis are Thedas constellations seen in the Hinterlands, assumed to be seen when you're between there and Haven.

*Cyrl is the member of Thom's crew that faced execution for the Callier massacre, the announcement of his hanging is what prompts Thom to come out of hiding, go to Val Royeaux and confess his crimes in the in-game mission, 'Revelations' in order to stop the proceedings.

*Par Vollen is supposed to be pretty tropical, and Seheron definitely is, and we've all seen the Arbor Wilds. Give us monkeys you cowards!

*Blood Lotus is poisonous, the idea for a bouquet of them comes from a canon story about how an Orlsian noble wanted roses for this huge party, but the florist couldn't get them roses, so, they opted for substituting with Blood Lotus because they could get a hand on a crap ton of that, the party ended with loads of party goers passing out and hallucinating, someone broke their teeth biting into a statue they swore was made of cheese, lots of fun things!

*Roderick pops up during the destruction of Haven, coming to warn the Inquisition of whichever faction the Herald didn't side with, since we sided with both in this story, I needed to tie things up with him.

*When you make your character in DA:I they come preset with a name, the first name you can change, but they auto give Male Trevelyan, the name Maxwell, and so, Max!

*Be careful with Vanilla and your fur babies! Vanilla extract can have similar affects that chocolate can—I hear all the time about chocolate making dogs sick and nothing about vanilla, and when I researched this chapter, I found out it can be a no no so, helpful tip in case I wasn't the only one unaware of that!

*When changing your last name for anything other than marriage purposes, it takes at least 6 months, sometimes longer.

*Seda—Spanish for silk, if you travel with Cole and Sera in your party, eventually the conversation comes up where Cole says 'Seeeerea' testing her name and saying that his mouth wants to form the word 'Seda, da da da' and 'Sera Sera Sera, if you say it enough it almost doesn't sound like a name'. There's some conflict in Sera's backstory where it sounds like she was living in an Alienage before Lady Emmauld took her in, but when she talks about getting caught stealing as a child, "most people get Alienage or worse for that!" Sera says, so. I'm interpreting it that her birth family are Dalish that migrated down from Antiva, (because if her name was formerly Seda in canon, I'm assuming there's an Antivan connection there? Some of our favorite Dalish are from Antiva like good old Zevran! Several clans move through there) either her family was integrating into a Free Marcher city, or passing through and Sera got caught stealing, and was either going to serve time or be sent live in the Alienage, when Lady Emmauld stepped in.

*Ferelden is based off of Great Britain—old timey GB, but the 1860's is old timey right?

*Harpers Ford is an city in Highever in north Ferelden
*mjia means daughter in Spanish but its used as a term of endearment for any young girl you care for!

*Liana is an old English name that means 'My god has answered'. Liara is a variation of it, that comes up if you try to generate Dalish names so, I picked a Dalish name, connected it to a ‘Human’ one and went with that. Plus it sort of went with the theme of Eleanor 'Light of god (or in Thedas, the Maker)' Ellie, on its own, just means Light which I thought was kind of cool, I picked the name at random it was actually just a place holder until I found something I liked, and I ended up keeping it.

*Vivienne totally rocks 4b hair if she lets it grow out! In comparison, Ellie's living the 3c life.

*The Lucerni is a political party in Tevinter that Maevaris and Dorian found and operate to create change and reform in their government by the time Tresspasser rolls around. ‘Luce’ in Latin means ‘Light’ so I figure it means something along the lines of a overly fancy Tevinter way of saying ‘illumination’.

*Theda's calendar system is from Tevinter, the names change as the times did but Tevinter uses the old names—Verimensis / Wintersmarch=January, Molioris / Bloomingtide=May, holds the holiday Summerday on the 1st—which is a holiday where lots of people get married, it's a big marriage month. Umbralis / Firstfall=November
The Forbidden Oasis/The Fallow Mire

Chapter Summary

Adventures in the Forbidden Oasis, meeting Maevaris, getting back the Magister's Birthright, and settling our troubles in the Fallow Mire. Next stop...Sealing the Breach!
End of the game/Trespasser-adjacent spoilers in Solas PoV

Chapter Notes

Hi! Back with our chapter covering our group's Oasis findings and the Fallow Mire!
Thanks so much for all the Kudos and feedback and just reading this in general! <3

Wonders never did cease. Solas had never considered Thom Rainier to be a romantic sort, let alone of the masculine variety, but then again matters of the heart were complex. As it stood, there had been some concern Ellie would be heartsick leaving her loved ones behind in Haven, but she was more than pleased with her most recent match made, her exuberance was so great it spilled into their bond, left the Elf smiling, taking very controlled breaths to ground himself in his own cool calm. He was certainly happy for the Human man, but not so much that he cared to make note of it through more than his offer of congratulations with something like giggling. Ellie hadn't taken claim of pairing the two, but to his mind, and Thom's it seemed, the credit mostly resided with her. Without things playing out as they had, the men's paths may not have crossed full stop, let alone in such a way where they could work together again, forgive each other and themselves, regain the good of what was lost and move forward to better things. Although he did take quarrel with, “You just have a friend who’s a boy?” Sera offered jovially, she’d taken Russel’s reins, Ellie seated in the saddle before her.

“I am a grown man,” Thom assured Ellie and Sera as they simultaneously congratulated and teased his coupling, “I do not have a boyfriend.”

Ellie gasped, “A friend who’s a man! A manfriend!” she giggled, then, “I’m sorry, I shouldn’t tease too much, just… I think it’s sweet and I’m really happy, you know? If you have someone that makes you happy.”

“He’s more of a consistent pain in the—”

Sera shrieked, “Inky! Close your ears!”

“—neck!” Rainier was getting at, he’d already been rather rosy cheeked but now his face blazed in embarrassment as Ellie giggled.

“If he’s a consistent pain in the ass, then someone’s not doing something right,” Bull joked quietly to Dorian, who shorted. While the Tevinter man had certainly been afforded the opportunity to be assigned a horse of his own while they were in Haven, he was apparently nervous to endeavor mastering a steed himself, did not care to take up the practice, and he would be grateful to any who allowed him passage on their own horse. The Iron Bull had, albeit put-upon, decided that, despite the great displeasure he took from the man’s in general existence, he already had one annoying Vint in his life he hardly needed another, he was welcome to ride with him.

“But yes,” Thom allowed as he addressed Ellie, “I’m happy, Ellie-girl.”

“Good!”

Marehis hummed contentedly from where she sat before Solas in the saddle—he held the reins while his vehnan read over reports he occasionally took his eyes off the road to skim for himself. She knew well of the intrusion, allowed it so long as it remained an unspoken thing between them—she wasn’t to talk of the assignments Leliana gave her, but if the occasional hint gleaned from his peeking could put him at ease, Marehis was glad of it, that much had been carried away, perhaps. From what he could gather it seemed Marehis would be infiltrating the staff of a Marquis, allied with Gaspard. This Marquis often entertained the Grand Duke, the men often dined, drank—working as a household servant, Marehis was to observe the Duke and his allies and report back to Leliana.

Solas had no doubt of Marehis’s abilities, her professionalism, but still, the question persisted just at the tip of his tongue—he dare not voice it—but he was curious just how Marehis would fare, with merely observing. To serve and watch and not rend the Grand Duke limb from limb for his persistent attacks on Eleanor. Or at least poisoning his drink or, well, she was certainly creative with her concealment of weaponry, one of their first dalliances, Solas had been startled when sliding his hand along the curve of her side to rest a hand on her hip only to find there were small daggers, one on either side of her ribcage bound in a thin leather band, and it had been almost amusing once she stripped herself in her entirety—at first Solas had been too distracted to take note of what all had been removed, but later he saw a pile of what made it seem like the woman somehow wore more things to kill a man with than actual clothing. Needless to say he was surprised the mission delivered to her was not one for assassination. But ultimately from what he read, it wasn’t. A pity. Solas’s vengeance felt fresh when he was reminded just how close they’d come to devastation, if not for Sera’s Friend intercepting the Blood Lotus. Even then, Sera herself had been put to harm! She could have been poisoned just as easily as Ellie, while she certainly held greater chances of survival, Blood Lotus poisoning was hardly a pleasurable experience! He was most glad, the young Elf had been spared such a trial, it is not something he would wish upon any, though he certainly was…fond, of the girl. He’d found her irredeemably rude, while he himself did not adhere to Dalish standards, their bastardization of their people’s ways, he’d found Sera’s attitudes toward Elves appalling. He had, however, come to realize to his own horror that her hatred did not necessarily lie with their people, but with herself. It couldn't stand, even Solas agreed when Marehis brought it to his attention, made him promise he would hold solidarity with her in being mindful of Sera's self-esteem in regard to her being an Elf—that her race was not a character flaw she should seek to rid herself of. Ellie was always an encouragement to the older girl, and it would seem the young Elf had found some measure of mentorship from Seeker Pentaghast, which brought her a newfound level of confidence, it was heartening to see.

It also led to Sera seeking Solas’s guidance more often, and he found some pleasure in providing as much, seeing as the girl came genuinely determined to learn. He assisted her in finding her footing with the Fade, but…well. He did not wish to press his luck…it was not an experiment—it was serious, and he was careful but her latest request for guidance provided something of an opportunity.
Solas, when given enough time around a member of his people, was usually able to sense some semblance of a connection to the Fade within them, magic laying dormant even in the least magical of their numbers. Marehis, he found, had a moderate measure of dormant magic, he’d been able to sense it after some weeks in her company. In Sera? One afternoon when he was meeting Marehis for lunch, an attempt to cheer the woman because it was during that period of time when Eleanor’s days were occupied with non-stop War Room sessions, where they deliberated over who to reach out to, Mages or Templars. When he arrived at the Tavern he’d been wholly startled, felt as if he’d stepped into the Fade while still in waking form, its presence was so very strong, like it was being called for some great deal of casting. The Tavern had been rather empty, void entirely of other mages, but he’d found Sera working on…something, some sort of semi-mechanical contraption she was attempting to fashion out of wire and forks and a spatula he still wasn’t certain, it was meant as a prototype of a device she wished to use to launch pies. She was working rather blindly, no schematics just, putting pieces of things together as she sat at the table by the fire, focusing so very intensely she did not realize Solas’s arrival, much less that he’d stopped the very moment he entered the Tavern to stare, bewildered. The girl had not a single clue, but it was her magic, guiding her hands as she worked. It was an occurrence he’d seen multiple times sense, Sera pulling off some prank or strange feat that should be something improbable, and when asked, she cannot explain—not even when she’d claimed to have filled a practice dummy with bees, and somehow managed to do so without incident, no stings, she reported it was rather easy all told, but she could not say how she did it*. He would be inclined to write that off as Sera’s flightiness but… she admittedly had something of an analytical mind, an eye for cause and effect, curiosity that drove her to make things work. It was a manifestation of her magic, he was certain, her ability to unknowingly reach out for the Fade and unconsciously allow it to guide her.

Now, she offered a chance to…broach the subject as carefully as possible, without alerting the girl just yet, not entirely, to her potential. Later that evening, their first day heading toward the Oasis, Solas and Sera sat before their campfire, awaiting Ellie to join them for their nightly meditation. The Human girl was with Varric, he said he wished to speak with her, but after she and the Dwarf disappeared into the tent, and all Solas had heard since was the scratch of quill against parchment. Sera informed him, “’sandra says maybe I can help Inky by suppressing Rifts, make ‘em easier to fight, but…” Sera sighed, looking worried as she wrench a hand at the back of her neck like the tendons there were tense, “I’m scared, suppressing anything near Ellie. Viv let me practice on her and it didn’t seem like I hurt her, but she hasn’t been super chatty about what it feels like, just that it isn’t pleasant or whatever the frig. If…if I accidentally suppressed Inky’s magic, I’d feel just awful, what if it hurts or scares her or gets her hurt?” Sera slumped in her seat hands falling into her lap.

Solas carefully placed a hand at the back of her neck, massaging gently, and Sera did not seem displeased, he’d asked permission to do so before, offered it to assist her in relaxing enough to attempt meditation in the past and it seemed to soothe as intended. “Sera, have you considered attempting to seek the conduit that is Ellie’s Mark, when you meditate alongside her? Feel its connection to the Breach?”

Sera regarded him critically for a moment like the question was bizarre, but then she pondered it and, “Sometimes, when we meditate like this, yeah. I feel like…okay, I dunno if you’ve felt this but when you reach for the weirdy Fade from the outside, and don’t go in, touch the outside of it, it’s like when a waterskin is full? If there was a ginormous wall made of something pliable that sort of moves the way a waterskin would if you squeezed it, it’d be the same feeling.”

“Yes, I understand,” Solas offered.

“When I reach for the Fade, it feels like I’m walking alongside a ginormous wall, in the dark using my...brain? Like a hand? Dunno, brain-hand feels along the wall to find my way, and sometimes it feels like it slips through, and I’ve got it in something splashy, makes me feel clammy,” she shuddered.

Ahh, “As if you’ve inadvertently reached into the Fade?”

Sera seemed very reticent to agree as such, but she nodded timidly.

“It isn’t a bad thing, Sera, aside from any discomfort it gives you. It merely means you know Ellie’s Mark...you can find it when you reach against the Fade. Cassandra has done well to teach you how to focus on the realness of our world to suppress the Fade’s hold on it, but perhaps you could be taught something of a reversal of that?”

“...why would I do that?” she asked.

He took a beat, as if considering it as he rested his elbows on his knees, and steepled his hands. “Well, it is merely theory, but if you were to reach out to Ellie’s Mark and focus on the Fade, it’s power, pour will into its grasp on our world, the way it can be given foothold to manipulate and change it, you could power it, strengthen her casting against the Fade. You would be aiding her without running the risk of reaching out to Suppress a Rift and inadvertently suppressing Eleanor’s ability to cast against it.”

“...but...but that sounds like Magey shite, the stuff you and Viv and Dori do,” she sounded startled, but she was placated with Solas’s explanation,

“It is, but ah, you do not necessarily have to have magic to do so, just hold the ability to sense the Fade and work with it.” ...which required at least some small measure of magic, but he was not about to divulge as much, Sera was not...she was not yet ready to know such things. Dormant magic could be nurtured and matured, such as was how non-mages like Cassandra, Cullen, their Templars were able to suppress magic after all. Sera held it in such measures that Solas almost wondered if perhaps she might one day be capable of casting—all Elves once had the ability, and to this day they all held magic potential, if they were made aware of that, taught to focus on it and build upon it, he felt certain any of his people could develop the ability to cast given time, orr ultimately, the reinstatement of their lost world.

“Then how come ‘sandra doesn’t power Ink’s Mark?”

“Her training. Suppressing magic is just as important as encouraging it, especially among Humans. It is of benefit, that you train the way you do—while a Templar’s goal is to suppress magic, your goal is to help with Rifts, with the Breach, you have options for doing just that.”

“Dunno...I wanna help, just...I like the idea of just purely helping Inky, making her stronger instead of something else weaker, but...shite that just sounds,” she shuddered.

“I would not pressure you, da’len. You needn’t attempt it if it upsets you, I merely offered it as a suggestion in the stead of suppression that you may be more comfortable with where Ellie is involved. Seeker Pentaghast is confident in your abilities, as am I—we all trust you are capable of suppressing Rifts without bringing harm to Eleanor.”

“...thanks,” Sera said after some consideration, “I dunno, I’ll think about it.” She sighed, though she perked up considerably, ears twitching when she heard the sound of tenting being pushed aside and, “Inky! There you are!”

“Hi! Sorry, I didn’t mean to leave you guys for so long,” Ellie offered as she dropped to sit next to her friend.

“’s all good,” Sera waved her worry off, “Let’s get our meditation on!”

“Yeah!”

They fell into comfortable routine—rising, travel, and the bit of chaos that was their meals. The Iron Bull and Rainier cooked most of their meals, the men seemed to hold some shared venture of encouraging Eleanor’s growth spurt that they were certain was just around the metaphorical corner. Solas had found it felt like her magic was just on the brink of maturing further—when he proposed as much to Cassandra, the night before leaving Haven, that her body was preparing not only to grow physically but also magically, it prompted the Seeker to call a meeting of the adults and Healer Adan. The girl was just barely five feet tall and that was in her old boots, and there was some shared horror in their group when the Healer announced that at she’d weighed little over 80lbs when she came in for her first official checkup after their assault on the Breach. She was much healthier now of course, had gained almost twenty pounds since then, but after the Iron Bull and Rainier heard the Healer explain Eleanor being so very small was likely due to malnourishment during important stages of growth, they apparently took the words very much to heart. They cooked like mad, bickering over nutritional value and the like, and ultimately leaving Eleanor in something of a food coma at the end of the day, more than once the girl fell asleep directly after dinner.

Sleep was, admittedly, a pleasurable part of their travels. Even as they continued on without her once they crossed the border into Orlais, Madam de Fer left them her tent, assuring that as they moved into warmer climates its enchantment would adjust accordingly—they would need it, once they were in the Oasis for reprieve from the heat during the day. Marehis slept curled up against Solas’s side and he found himself wandering less often so deep into the Fade, he liked to maintain some semblance of basking in the comfort of having her close, in the waking world. Ellie as well, the night before Marehis was to go her own way, leave their party to pursue her mission in a city just south of Val Royeaux. She was hesitant to leave Ellie, they would miss each other horribly, Ellie’s magic had conveyed when she needed comfort, for her homesickness—she missed Cassandra to such a degree it almost set her to tears—and it thrummed in a way that could be considered painful, carrying the ache Ellie felt at Marehis’s leaving. So, Solas had not hesitated in the slightest when they’d been preparing for bed, to offer that the girl could sleep with he and Marehis.

“Thank you,” Marehis whispered to him when Eleanor was fast asleep between them, her head on Solas’s chest—though her proximity did make his nose itch, a curl of hair tickled it, he had to take in a breath and blow quietly through his mouth to banish the lock from being so directly in his face. Marehis’s arms were around her, the woman curled up against the girl’s back.

“Have sweet dreams, vehnan,” he replied quietly, he may well lose his arm, it was pinned under Ellie and Marehis, wrapped around them, but he supposed it was well worth it.

His arm survived, he couldn’t feel it when he woke but it was back in working form when it was time to hug Marehis goodbye.

“So shiral, ma vehnan,” he bid her.

“Bellanaris,” she offered playfully, he supposed it served him right, as she pressed a warm kiss to his lips.

He’d heard Ellie find qualm with Cullen’s ten-minute hug but the moment he released Marehis, the girl was on her Elf woman, hugging her fiercely, seeming like she was hoping to break that record.

“I’m going to miss you! So much! And I have to convey that through—Sera, what’s that thing you were talking about Monday, ossismoses?”

“Osmosis,” Sera offered.

“Osmosis! I’m pretty sure if we hug long enough it’ll work! My cells are making sure your cells know I love them—you so much! And I’ll miss you! And I’ll think about you every day! And it’s warm! Sometimes it might be cold? And I’m safe! And um, I’m sealing all the Rifts, oh! And I’m getting taller! Huh…um…” she seemed to be thinking.

“Are we visualizing the future da’vehnan?” Marehis asked.

Ellie pouted as hugged the woman tighter, “I’m not dumb—I know that when Leliana says I’m supposed to address everything to her, that I want sent to you and she’ll ‘facilitate as she can’, is grown up spy talk that means you’ll get everything once you’re done with your job! Which sort of defeats the ‘keeping you updated’ purpose of writing, I’ll still write so you’ll have nice things waiting for you when you finish, just, osmosis transferring all the reassurance and predictions, so you aren’t worried and can focus on your job! Have fun spying, be safe!”

“Thank you, sweet girl,” Marehis said, rubbing Ellie’s shoulders as she pulled away, “I will be in touch as soon as I possibly can, and the moment my work is done I will rejoin you, I promise.”

She got a rather exuberant hug from Sera who squeezed the older Elf woman tight, “Dareth, n’pish, kay?”

Marehis’s eyes widened and her hand cradled the crown of Sera’s head to keep the girl held fast against her while Marehis caught Solas’s eye, like some milestone had just been met, he supposed it had? Adult-ish child’s first genuine attempt at Dalish? “Ma seranas, da’assan, take care of yourself, yes? Have fun in the Oasis.”

Sera nodded, speaking quietly, “Remember my Friend’s name—never met him in person but Friends of Friends say he’s decent, helped ‘em out of tight spots. Works in the kitchens.”

“Thank you, Sera,” Marehis said warmly. “Ohhh, my girls!” she reached out and pulled Ellie in to hug them both for just a moment more and then, she pulled away, taking Sera’s chin in hand to guide the girl to stoop slightly so Marehis could kiss her on the forehead, before the Elf woman lowered herself to kiss Ellie’s forehead, it was a domino effect of sorts, and then, she was off.

“You okay, Tumbles?” Varric asked after they’d ridden along for nearly an hour in silence.

“…Sera, Solas, do you think we’re far enough away, she can’t still hear?” Ellie asked.

Ahh, “No, da’len, impressive as Marehis is, even her hearing cannot span the several miles we’ve traversed.”

Ellie nodded and then lamented, head tilted back against Sera’s shoulder as she complained to the sky, “I miss Marehis! My heart is sad! I miss Cassandra, and Cullen, and Lady Josie, and Leliana, and Vivienne, and Cremisius! And Anya! My puppy has left my heart an empty void of despair!”

“Awe Inky!”
“Shit, Tumbles, don’t have an empty void of despair,” Varric pled.

“Too late! I’m having one! I’ll be okay, just, feelings, ya know?”

“Have your feelings Imekari, you need anything just let us know—we’re all here for you kid,” the Iron Bull promised.

That…oh. Panic of a sort struck Solas. The other men in their party as well, not that any of them voiced it just then but later, there was an emergency meeting of sorts because the Iron Bull made, ironically, rather the point—they were all there for young Ellie…and they alone. This was their first venture without Seeker Pentaghast in their ranks, Marehis was away, as was Madam de Fer.

“I’m not the only one freaking out right?” the Iron Bull asked as he called their meeting to order—they’d made camp for the evening, Ellie was of a mind to wash up, bathe, so she and Sera were off down the bank from their camp, at the river. Their tent was settled and Rainier had set to task with a campfire.

“I passed freaking out when Marehis left,” Varric said, from where he’d decided to lay down, flat on his back by “went right into…pretty sure I’m going through the stages of grief? Deep in the depression stage right now.”

"You need help getting through 'horny'," the Iron Bull said, "let me know."

"That...horny isn't—the fifth stage is acceptance."

"Yeah, horny. Basra don't know how to do grief."

Varric waved his hands in frustrated dismissal. "Okay whatever- What are we supposed to do exactly? What if she gets bored? How much does she need to sleep? I think I’m having a stroke, I can’t remember what you feed a kid.”

“It’s intimidating,” Dorian agreed, “I’ve not the slightest idea how to rear a child, I’m decidedly not in charge, just to make that clear. If we royally mess up, it’s on you lot.”

“We’ve all offered guidance and council,” Solas offered hopefully, he…yes, it was admittedly strange to feel almost solely responsible.

Especially given, “But Cassandra, Marehis, they’ve always taken the lead, set the tone for how to care for Ellie—” Thom was saying.

“What if that period crap happens again? She takes potion for that right?” Varric shot up, panicked, “Fuck! Who has her potions? Does she have her potions?” That was rather alarming, Solas had entirely forgotten, hadn’t thought twice about Marehis leaving without entrusting…well he supposed she would entrust him he thought, given the nature of her potions, if Ellie had a panic or asthma attack she may not be capable of administering potion to herself-

“You lop-heads are worrying over nothin’,” Sera startled them, both in that they hadn’t realized she was approaching, and her state of undress. She sauntered up, naked, boots in one hand, her armor and leggings hanging over her arm, as she said, “Just do what you normally do. Be a bunch of dummies that Inky and I can laugh at, help keep her safe—Mare left her potions with me, thank you very much, I know all the instructions and I’m usually closest to Ink. She knows I got
"Wait, shit, where’s Imekari?" the Iron Bull whipped about to looked around, the girl wasn’t with Sera, Solas opened the bond, she was safe, not very far, still at the river it seemed, verified by,

"Calm your dicks, she’s finishing up, she takes longer’n me. Cole’s with her—not peepin’ just guarding."

"…Cole?" Varric asked.

Ahh, their Spirit friend hadn’t declared that he was joining them before they left, but Solas had sensed Cole’s presence. The boy mostly made himself scarce around Madam de Fer and Sera, though the girl was more comfortable with him it seemed…of course she was rather comfortable with all of them apparently. Sera finally disappeared into the tent for sleepwear.

They decided on dinner after a rather marvelous and compelling debate between Varric and the Iron Bull, it’d been rather a long day, and the Iron Bull was set on sandwiches all around and Varric insisted you do no such thing for dinner—it was dinner damn it! ‘Kid needs to eat!’ and apparently, despite the balance of carbs, vegetables, and protein sandwiches could involve, they had zero nutritional value in the Dwarf’s mind.

"You two’re real cute—let me know when the wedding is will you, Chief?" Thom saw fit to tease, getting their attention. The mercenary had already had stew Flissa had sent them off with in their frozen stores, thawing nicely—deciding for them, while they quarreled.

The Iron Bull raised his hand in a crude gesture that he quickly dropped. Ellie rejoined them, Cole in visible form trailing after her, at least she’d thought to take her sleeping clothes down with her to bathe. She yawned as she stretched before deciding the Iron Bull was the most appealing place to sit, climbing into his lap.

"How’s your empty void of despair feeling, Imekari?"

"Better," she assured contentedly, "feet are kind of despairy though, would you mind massaging them like you do, the Iron Bull? I’ll return the favor," she promised.

There it was. The Iron Bull had seemed more worse for wear than usual, tightness in his features, he was exhausted, and while Ellie was not in pain when Solas gently pressed the bond out of curiosity and a measure of concern, it seemed she knew the Iron Bull was hurting...had Cole informed her?

"No," Cole's voice sounded at Solas's ear, the boy crouching next to where Solas was seated by the fire, speaking quietly, "She worries for him, watches, waits. Presses without pressing pride—offering alone won't get her what requesting will."

That made sense, Solas supposed, her bit of fibbing got her a foot massage, and the opportunity to deliver as much to the Iron Bull in return, when Ellie worked on the Qunari's bare feet, she did so carefully and used it as excuse to work her way up to his ankles—she insisted his feet were cracked and dry and that wouldn't do, disappearing into the tent to fetch something to right that.

"She worries about you too," Cole informed him, "she's going to accept your offer—trying to join one another in the Fade while you sleep? She's scared, exploring the Fade is dangerous and has always been frightening for her, but you enjoy it and it might make you happy, be fun if you're together, she trusts you. And she doesn't want you to be sad, sleeping without Marehis."

That...well she certainly did not have to do such a thing if she was frightened, but Solas would indeed keep her from harm, and the experience would be one of hopefully, fun, and education. "Thank you, for forewarning me, Cole, I will be diligent. You may join us, if you wish."

He made a noncommittal sound, the Spirit was rather worried he may fall victim to tricks in the Fade—Demons often wished to inflict their fate upon their former peers, force Spirits to become like them. "I will watch, if Ellie needs me, I will come."

Ellie returned, sat on the ground before the Iron Bull again, armed with lotion and what Solas suspected was a jar of numbing ointment, bandaging, tucked under her arm, along with an applicator. She massaged lotion into the soles of his feet before quietly using the thin wooden applicator to administer clear, sticky ointment to his ankle—quietly as in she made no direct comment that would bring attention to her actions, she chattered away, talking to Dorian who lounged nearby, reclining on his side as he watched Rainier work to get dinner settled.

It certainly was a distracting conversation. Although Solas was not immediately alarmed,

"I talked to Gereon—he says it's okay to call him that, he's 'done his family name dishonor' or whatever," she said.

Dorian's breath caught in his throat and he sat up, eyes wide, mouth working and it looked like, goodness, like the man might start yelling at her. He did certainly raise his voice, panicked, "Why the bloody hell were you permitted to speak with Alexius?! Who-you-your childminder."

Alexius. "Da'vehn, does Marehis know of this?" Solas worried.

Ellie nodded, "She went with me, waited outside because she wasn't super in a forgiving place with him, I worried she'd fight him or something and she could hear fine if I needed help. I didn't, it was nice."

"Imekari, you can't just go- " the Iron Bull started.

"Hold still or I'll get- just, hold still, kay? I'm almost done," she insisted, she was currently oh, using a cloth to protect her hand as she gently rubbed the ointment in before she started securely wrapping the ankle in bandaging to stabilize it with something soft, "It's not a super big deal. I talked to Leliana, we have lunch dates every Monday when I'm in Haven. Anyway, Felix hasn't written his father since Redcliffe, and...that's for him to do in his own time, but he doesn't exactly have loads of that to burn through. I wouldn't want him to think about it, in his final moments and regret not reaching out at all. And Gereon is his father, he's about to...no matter what happens, Felix will be gone, pass while Gereon is still paying for his crimes, and it's," she swallowed, taking a second to collect herself, "it's horrible to have to say goodbye when you lose someone you love, but it's even worse, not getting to at all. So. I just went to have a chat. I went mentioned I'd heard from Felix, that he's well and having a safe journey back to Tevinter," she said, "and when I wrote Felix I just casually mentioned I'd popped in to see his father for myself, maybe make some sense of things."

"Ahh," Dorian sighed with some relief, "And what did he say—Felix?"

"He thanked me for checking on his father. When I was hugging Leliana goodbye she let me know he wrote his father himself."

Dorian was quiet contemplation before he sighed, saying, "That was...very big of you, Ellie.
I certainly wasn't of a mind to do the same, not...not just yet."

Ellie shrugged, "You've got all the time you need to, Maker willing." Ellie rapped a fist against the fallen log the Iron Bull was seated on, "you shouldn't try to hash things out unless and until you're ready to."

Dinner was pleasant, when it came time to eat, Ellie sat with Solas, talking over what he thought they might discover in the Oasis—had he heard of the area before, even in the Fade? Admittedly he wasn't certain what the Oasis or its temple would hold, it was a true bit of adventure.

Ellie did endeavor to join Solas in the Fade, the Human girl seeking sleep without potion—the first night she tried as much, knowing she would willingly be entering the Fade for exploratory purposes set such anxiety in her she could not sleep, ended up needing potion to sleep and that kept her from the Fade and fast asleep well into the morning. Her second attempt though, she curled up next to Solas, taking deep, even breaths, and he focused on sending her soothing calm through the bond until she was fast asleep. Joining him in the Fade was a success all around, though Ellie was very quiet the whole of their time together, not daring speak even to him for fear he was a demon in disguise. He supposed she was not far off the mark, given Spirit origins. Why the Fade was so very full of Demons to begin with. Ellie did take hold of his hand, kept close, listened to him when he spoke, discussed the things they saw when they were in the waking world once more with enthusiasm.

"It's kind of cool," she commented one morning, "getting to see what everything looks like on the other side of the veil, little things in the past. Is it boring in Haven, or can you go back super far?"

It was far from boring, was all he said on the matter. Most days, evenings more like it, he found himself relishing in the present day, soaking up all he could of their time together as it was. Someday, there would be no going back, no veil to peer into to view the past. And there was an element of security that came from it as well. When he was returned from long ventures from Haven, he could slip into the Fade and scroll back through the past, just to ensure all was well—sometimes old friends sought him out in the Fade, his practicing magic and traveling into the Fade in one place so very often left an impression of him behind, Spirits seeking him would come to his domicile even if he wasn't present, believing they would find him. So he always made certain to review his current homestead in the Fade in case he needed to reach out to someone he'd missed...upon their return to Haven after their time on the Storm Coast, it was not a Spirit, but a Human, that entered his cabin in his absence. True, staff occasionally came and went, dusting and making certain the place was to rights while he was gone, but Lieutenant Aclassi was no manservant. He was uncertain just what the young man was looking for, or why, though he suspected he had orders from the Iron Bull for some such reason. The young man had carefully, painstakingly searched the entirety of his cabin, putting every single thing back exactly as he'd found it. The Qunari had no way of knowing the truth of things, but that he suspected Solas of something...well he could hardly blame him. He was admittedly surprised no one much questioned his miraculous appearance—the Seeker had, when he first approached. Ellie had not appeared yet, the Inquisition was scrambling to assess the situation and he came...well admittedly he got caught trying to explore the devastation, search for confirmation that Corypheus had perished and find the Orb, but the beast clearly escaped unscathed, and the Orb certainly wasn't in the ashes of the Sacred Temple. Seeker Pentaghast had questioned him endlessly, how had he avoided the blast? What had he seen? Who had he seen? He complied, with a great deal of falsehood but gods, no matter how fallen, or false, held no fear in spreading falsehood to mortals for greater purpose. The truths she sought were not hers to have. And then his magic shook, sparked with life in exhilaration because the ghost of the Orb, its presence, for a second he thought it was off in the distance, drawing nearer, perhaps he could track it and get it back if he escaped, he was just about to execute evasive maneuvers, when the Spymaster entered the War Room, flanked by soldiers bearing the unconscious weight of a young Human girl between them. The Orb was not in the distance, nor was it here, its signature, some of its magic, a portion of its power—one of its many abilities—had been stripped, and latched onto the hand of a little Human girl whose magic was woefully incompatible with it, fighting it off, killing her. He wanted to study it, understand what happened, he did not...he thought it a lie, when he told Cassandra he could help, that he could keep the girl alive until she could be properly questioned. But...she lived. Night after night, as he worked with her Mark, studied it, manipulated it with his own magic, let it focus on him, attempt to merge with his magic, separate itself from this mortal girl, even as it failed to do that, it allowed the girl to recover and heal, and wake. After that, Ellie filled in blanks and created more for the Seeker, the woman moved on from her suspicion of him it seemed.

Now the Qunari suspected him, of something, but he wasn't making any moves so, neither did Solas. Now, he focused when he could, on the present. If the Iron Bull wanted to play friendly, he could play friendly. If he wanted trouble, he would certainly find no end of that.

Another part of their routine on the road, in their waking hours, was reading. Reading provided Ellie with several new opportunities, one of which, was being able to enjoy Varric's work. He'd been rather insistent she dare not endeavor to attempt reading his tawdry romance serials. Marehis had entrusted her with her copy of the Champion of Kirkwall, a tale Ellie worked through steadily enough, reading out loud in the evenings when dinner was through, everyone gathered. Solas sat on the ground near their fire, with Ellie tucked up against his side, Sera sat beside Ellie, her head resting on the Human girl’s shoulder as she read. She'd grown rather good at sounding out difficult words, reading steadily enough, though as she neared the climax of the Dwarf's bestseller, she sat up, quiet and she visibly paled, heart thumping painfully fast for a few beats as she read silently to herself.

"Inky?" Sera asked, resting a hand on the Human girl’s back.

Ellie shook her head, eyes trained on the words on the page,

"Shit, Imekari? Hey, it's okay—everyone struggles with unfamiliar words, Ser' do you see-" the Iron Bull thought Ellie had been driven to startled silence, from stumbling along a difficult passage, but it wasn't her inability to read...more so it was her ability to understand exactly what was written.

"He...Hawke was in the middle Kirkwall's Mage Rebellion? He sided with the Mages? With that Anders fellow that started it all?" Ellie asked Varric.

"Yeah kid, of course," Varric assured, like the fact would cheer the girl, "—granted Anders is a grey area, it's not like Hawke liked what he did, but it wasn’t like he could do anything about it. And he didn't hesitate to join the Mage Rebellion-"

"Uh-huh, and you're...you were okay with that? Just, followed along? Did you think it was right?"

"Wait, Tumbles are you pissed-?"

"Don't 'Tumbles' me. Answer the question."

"It was a complicated situation, why- he took your side, why are you upset?"

“My side? Pen-" she aborted whatever she’d been about to shout at him as she slapped the book closed, casting it aside as she rose to her feet, "My side?! He definitely didn't take my side! I didn't have a side until Kirkwall happened! I was just living my life, I had friends, and Ava, and work! He just! He helped Anders murder the-

"Hawke didn't know what Anders was up to! The guy was his friend, Hawke trusted him, if he'd known, he never would have stood by-

"But he did stand by, let Anders get away with something horrible—and now you can't say where Hawke is, he just watched what happened in Kirkwall and disappeared!"

"He secured the city the best he could and got a hell of a lot of people out, he's tried to be an ally voice for Mages-

“What mages?” Ellie insisted angrily, her voice thick as she railed, “He helped start a rebellion he's had no hand in ending! Stuck his nose into things he had no business being part of! Kirkwall sent all the other Circle’s spiraling into ruin, and does he even know the horror that caused for Apostates?! We were hunted like animals after Kirkwall! People might not have necessarily liked Apostates before the Rebellion broke out, but after one blew up at Chantry? Nowhere was safe, we lost so many! It was like a sport, people capturing and killing us because they were afraid of us! Places we once turned to for safety turned us away! My best friend had to totally disappear, we had to get him to Antiva* to get him a new identity, new life where he could start over and hope no one found out where he came from, that he was magical! And that- I wasn’t-

Solas rose and reached out, pulling Ellie close, bringing a hand to the back of her head to hold her to his chest as she started to sob, “Shh, shh, shh, shh da’vehnan.”

“Ellie,” Cole breathed as he appeared, joining Solas’s embrace by hugging the Human girl from behind, “Ava wasn’t your fault. It wasn’t Varric’s either—you know that, but it hurts, you didn’t know what happened exactly in Kirkwall, heard little of the Champion and his companions roles, you weren’t expecting to find answers to questions you’d forgotten waiting in Varric’s book.”

“Dude. You realize there’s only so many times you can make her cry before I have to kill you, right?” the Iron Bull groused quietly before speaking so Ellie could hear, “Imekari, come on, talk us through this.”

Ellie took the Iron Bull’s offered hand, went and sat with him. Ahh, there was a great deal to get off her chest it seemed—he need only make glancing exploration of their bond to feel raw grief renewed in her magic as she spoke. Solas…it had been disheartening for him, to wake to a world where Mages were so sorely oppressed, though admittedly he’d found Kirkwall’s destruction conflicting—while violence was not often the answer, it was unfortunately the loudest wakeup call to those in power. It was a crude, but effective way of getting the Chantry’s attention, enforce the idea that reform was desperately needed…though it was albeit counter intuitive to teaching them that Circling was not the answer for their ‘mage problem’ when an apostate caused such devastation.

Ellie, apostates like her, suffered greatly, in the wake of Kirkwall’s Circle rebellion. Not only did an apostate mage blowing up a Chantry strike fear into the hears of non-mages, it sparked rebellion across all Circles. White Spire’s downfall was treacherous and even Solas had heard horrific tales of it’s demise, and that was before Cole offered up some of his own past, confiding in the Elf man to some degree. Apostates were feared and with Templar forces stretching thin and faltering, many sought to take matters into their own hands. Ellie’d an apostate friend, a young man named Sam, though she was uncertain if he kept that name still—she hadn’t set foot in Antiva since being cast from the orphanage there, but this Sam had needed her, the journey was far and too, there was the occasional language barrier when traversing through areas Antivan was commonplace. So she joined him on his travels from the Southern Free Marches, to the little bar in Antiva where it’s keeper gave Apostates anonymity and a chance at a new life, for the right price of course.

And it was while she was in Antiva, tragedy struck closer to home than she realized. Ellie had never...she always offered up the fact that Ava had been an old woman when she passed, lived a long, full life, so much so that Solas had assumed the woman perished due to age. He realized now it was coping, the idea that the woman had lived so very long, was likely so close to a natural death, it lessened the harshness of her loss. After Sam was secured, she’d sought Ava, to ensure the elder woman was alright, safe in her home village. A village that turned on the Healer that ridded them of plague, fought to defend from Darkspawn during the last Blight, had a hand in seeing to it not a single villager in her care died in childbirth. Men and women she’d held when they took their first breaths in life, watched her draw her last at their hands. Ellie returned to find a warning to Apostates defacing Ava’s home, the place itself ransacked, and the woman beaten to death. Ellie hadn’t known what to do, she was alone and she couldn’t carry Ava on her own. As she despaired and grieved, her magic lulled her into sleep, holding her fallen friend, an act that allowed Ava to meet her in the Fade. There was some degree of tearing in the veil, when mages passed, the Hinterlands by far had had the most Rifts they’d encountered to date, a great deal of magical energy had been used there, and a great many mages lost their lives—Ellie had been a little worried she’d somewhat hallucinated the whole thing because she’d not any access to Lyrium. Before being Marked, she’d dreamed normally, never in the Fade since her magic first wakened—but Solas offered explanation that Ava’s passing, her soul clinging to the Fade, created an access point that any Mage could have slipped into the Fade through in their sleep, it was likely why her magic had prompted her to in such a way, it could sense what she could not—Ava waiting to pass on to her Maker in the hopes she might be of guidance to Ellie a final time.

“Be good, don’t let this make you hard, Ellie. This wasn’t your fault, don’t become like them. You’re not like them, Ellie,” Cole spoke as if seeking to convince the girl.

“I know, like, on an intellectual level there’s a difference between hateful cold-blooded murder, and self-defense, defending my friends. Just...I dunno, I’m scared she’d be disappointed in me, that I’m breaking my word.”

“Babe, you knit me horn cozies. You’re a tough kid, but you’re the exact opposite of hard,” the Iron Bull assured her.

“Cremisius knitted your horn cozies,” Ellie said, “he really wanted to.”

“Course he did, he’s a bastard. Point is, you think about shit like that—those aren’t exactly dark, dastardly thoughts. I mean the fact you’re genuinely worried about being morally bankrupt is the biggest indication you aren’t. Bad guys don’t lay up at night and worry about their life choices.”

Rainier leaned forward to rest a hand on the young girl’s shoulder, “There is grace in you, Ellie. You always look for light in people, but not everyone...not everyone can be saved. I know you might think if you could get the people we face to stop and talk things through, fighting wouldn’t be necessary, but the thing is this—you go into fights and you see people, these people, they see you as a job. They aren’t considering you or any of us for our worth or value, outside the realm of the price they get paid if we’re killed or captured, they can’t think otherwise, or they wouldn’t be able to do their jobs.”

The Iron Bull nodded. “Can’t exactly speak for Ava but I know for certain, I don’t give a fuck who you’re fighting—someone comes at you, and you’re the one that walks away? That’s not a bad day in my book.”

It seemed they’d given her rather a lot to think about, and she was still…not entirely at peace with Hawke’s hand in the rebellion, Varric’s association being so interwoven with the events that caused such upheaval in her life, in the lives of many, and eventually led to the Conclave.

Sera was supportive of course, the only thing that kept her from tossing the book she blamed for making ‘Inky’ sad into their campfire was that it was on loan from Marehis, and the Elf girl was dead set on being mad at anyone Ellie was upset with, and right now, that was Varric. It made the Dwarf nothing short of miserable—she’d been quiet toward him for all of an evening, the whole of the following day. A day and a half of it, and it seemed he could hardly stand it. Varric actually rose early, to take charge of breakfast, seeking Rainier’s help, the duo whipping up something of a feast, the dwarf setting an offering of thick, syrupy pancakes, and when Ellie emerged from the tent, “Morning Tumbles, you uh, you’re looking real cute, did you do something new with your hair?” she hadn’t, “S’nice. You hungry? I made you pancakes.”

The offer seemed to give her pause. “Can I be mad and have pancakes? Cause I’ll choose mad.”

Varric nodded. “You can be mad and have pancakes—you want milk or water? We made bacon and eggs and toast, and I love you and I’m sorry,” he listed off, “and just—be mad, but promise you won’t stay that way? Kind of killing me here kid, I really…I didn’t realize you didn’t know in advance about everything, Hawke was pretty much the talk of Ferelden for forever, book made mad sales all over the place—”

“I was in the Free Marches, was a bit too busy surviving the aftermath to gossip about the cause, and I just learned how to read.”

“Real fast, cause you’re so smart,” Varric sought to further butter her up, both with compliments and snatching up their butter dish from the Iron Bull while the Qunari was still using it so he could offer it to Ellie, “Look, I would’ve…I wouldn’t have kept the truth from you, but I would have given you some forewarning, sat you down, talked it out if I’d known it was going to be some harsh reveal for you. I never…all this mage, templar shit, it’s never been something I’ve sat down and thought out farther than what’s immediately affecting my life. Things happened that shouldn’t’ve and if I could go back, I would, and punch Anders in the face, tell him where he could stick his maps, Deep Roads just led to bullshit anyway.”

“I’m glad Bethany got out okay, with the Wardens. And I’m sorry about your brother.”

“I’m…fuck, kid, I’m so sorry about everything.”

“It wasn’t your fault, Hawke’s either really, just. Dunno, I’m always sort of low-key mad about everything, I don’t think about it a lot but when I do—”

“Mad, and you’ve got new facts that let you put faces to your pissed off-ed-ness,” the Iron Bull said, “normal Imekari, you be mad, let that Antivan temper fly, girl.”

“The concept of Antivan tempers is a rude stereotype and you can fight me!” Ellie snapped, though, “I did almost call Varric a bad word in Antivan,” she conceded.

“Pen something?” Sera asked.
Ellie nodded, “Pendejo,” she said, “it means, um…” she was still hesitant to offer further explanation—the girl had something of a lecture from the Iron Bull, it struck the Qunari that the girl was overcompensating to an extent, trying to hold herself to unnecessary standards to make up for what she felt like was failure, to ‘be good’. She felt better, was able to consolidate the idea that she wasn’t breaking her word, living the life she did now, and the Qunari wanted to make certain she understood that being a good person meant strength of character, and morality—the occasional swear, or ‘hell, swear all the fuck you want, there's a damn hole in the sky’ didn’t make or break being a good person. She worked around the idea, agreed that it was unnecessary to keep herself from speaking her mind among her friends. Though in this instance, “Dumbass!” Cole offered up cheerfully when he materialized to sit alongside Ellie.

Varric’s mouth dropped open, “Tumbles! You were going to call me a dumbass?”

Ellie blushed fiercely. “I’m sorry-“

The Dwarf cackled, apparently enjoying the idea, “Don’t be, I love it!”

“Soooo…can I still eat your I'm sorry' pancakes even if you’re already forgiven?”

“Wait really? We’re all good again?” Varric asked, looking relieved.

“I’m always a sucker for heart to hearts and sugary carbs.”

“Then knock yourself out Tumbles, you want anything to drink?”

"Do we have coffee?" she asked, hopefully.

Marehis had had a discussion with them, that they were to ‘forget’ to make the beverage in the mornings now, but, "If you truly want some, I can put the kettle on, da'vehnan,” Solas offered, tempted to indulge the girl. Caffeine*, like all stimulants often dampened a Mage’s connection to the Fade, it likely helped to some degree, with managing troubles her Mark gave her, but Marehis’s gentle coffee ban derived from, “though I would advise you that caffeine may stunt growth,” he informed the girl—according to Healer Adan, anyway. Though his warnings were met with,

"I might be short but so is life! We should drink coffee while we can!"

“Thank the sweet, merciful Maker,” Dorian groaned appreciatively, “I need coffee. Just, be a lamb, dear Ellie, pour yourself a cup and then empty the kettle directly into my mouth, I’m dying,” the Tevinter man decided as he sat next to Ellie and proceeded to lay flat on his back.

“He isn’t really dying,” Cole offered up as if genuinely seeking to quell concern despite the fact his companions knew well, the man’s flair for the dramatic, “but he is tired. The Iron Bull is warm to sleep next to, safe, but he snores.”

Dorian’s face blazed red at Cole’s observation that the man felt safe, of all things, in the Iron Bull’s presence, and the Qunari coughed uncomfortably, though Ellie offered a bit of reprieve,

“Do you need more rest, Dorian?” she asked, addressing the concern and not indulging in teasing the man—there was some sort of candor between he and the Qunari that stood unestablished and uncertain, they did nothing more than the occasional flirtatious standoff, at least, openly. “We’re making good progress to the Oasis, we could stand a lazy day if you need one.”

The Tevinter man didn’t request as much, they ate and continued their travels, riding through increasingly warmer forest that would eventually transition into desert—Marehis forewarned them to keep course and trust the direction they set off in once they reached the desert, the sand could make it seem like their trail was endless, but the Oasis was out there. There was a river that was a last source of water until their destination, so they made certain to hydrate, fill up their stores accordingly. The weather was markedly a great deal more pleasant than that of Haven, the Hinterlands, it had Ellie stretching and breathing deep as they waited for Rainier and the Iron Bull to finish their work filling extra canteens they’d brought in case of emergency—if they were delayed somehow, water was certainly the last thing they wanted to be without. She clearly enjoyed the weather, her pleasure was so great it bubbled in their connection in a way…it was a sensation rather like being tickled, while he certainly wasn’t going to start laughing, it did make Solas smile.

Although they may not go to the Oasis full stop since Ellie, mischievous smile at her lips, decided, “Actually, I think I’ll just stay here, for like, ever? Holler at me when you need the Breach closed!”

“How unfortunate, Marehis is looking forward to seeing you in Haven again,” Solas teased.

“She can come live here with me! I vote the Inquisition moves! We have water, and its so nice out, warm, tents would work for everyone! And it’s got the air trifecta!”

“Air trifecta?” Rainier asked Ellie, amused at her enthusiasm.

“Yup! It’s warm, the humidity actually exists here so the air doesn’t hurt when I breathe, all while still being mild enough humidity that it doesn’t mess with my hair. I can have a good air day and a good hair day! That’s like, the ultimate day!"

“The air hurts to breathe in Haven?” Dorian asked, appalled.

“Yup! Asthma’s a bitch,” Ellie giggled out.

“Hell yeah it is, Boss,” the Iron Bull encouraged.

Sera had been diligent, apparently, to keep the cabin pleasant, making humidity of her own with steam from tea and Embrium, though she’d enlisted the help of Solas, with consultation from Healer Adan for an out of doors solution. A few nights as they traveled, before meditation, Ellie was usually occupied handling any mail she received or her own letter writing, and the Elves had time to conspire. Sera wanted to fashion something, that might possibly need to be enchanted—she wasn’t entirely certain how to make the idea work otherwise, thus, Solas was asked for his assistance. She had an idea for something, like a necklace Ellie could wear, that could be filled with water, and warm up enough to cause it to steam, it would be something that hung around her neck, it would make the immediate air around her more tolerable. The trick of it was design—how big to make such a device, what sort of enchantment would be involved, there was an element of heat but there was also the need to make something safe, it wouldn’t do to make something that would burn Ellie.

They would be in the Oasis come morning, the desert was rather vast and seemingly endless, but they were close—on the horizon there was the glow of a dormant Fade Rift, the one reported not even a half mile away from their infiltration camp. They would close it, come morning, and join Scout Harding. For now, Sera and Solas sat by the fire—it was a bit of whiplash, how very hot it could be under the sun’s blaze but after sunset, the desert grew chilled, Sera was chewing at the end of her pencil as she looked over their potential schematics.

“Perhaps it could be two-fold—a charm enchanted to produce cool that would be worn between her skin and the bowl?” Solas proposed.
Sera gave it a moment consideration, “Maybe, kind of worried it’d end up making her cold—would it be safe, havin’ two enchanty things touchin’ when they’re doing opposite things?”

“That…is a good point, I’ve not tried it,” Solas admitted.

“…could always do a closed experiment—get runes and clack ‘em together but like, from a safe distance somehow cause I feel like it’d be an ‘ouch’ sort of exploding if they react bad.”

Huh. “I am intrigued,” he admitted, and such an experiment could render beneficial information, and too, so long as no one got hurt, setting a small, experimental explosion may be a bit of fun—Sera would certainly enjoy it and he was inclined to indulge in mischief with scientific intent. "I’ll see if we can get materials for curiosity sake—if nothing else it will be educational.”

Sera beamed at his agreement, bouncing a bit in her sat, “Sweet!” then, “Hmm...I was kickin’ ‘round the idea about electromagnetic induction?”

He wasn’t wholly certain how such a thing worked but, “What do you propose?”

Sera flipped through their gathered parchment and found a drawing she’d made up as example, “We could make a leather pouch, and a little tiny, tiny copper bowl* you’d put the water in. Inside the leather, under the bottom of the bowl, you’d need two magnets polarized to spin off one another while touching the bottom of the copper—it’ll heat it, make the water steam, without making anything touching Inky hot. She could touch the outside of it just fine cause it won’t heat the leather, or anything around, maybe put a thin layer of table salt between the sides of the bowl and the leather, cause ions. Just to be safe? Ions in the salt’ll cancel out the current from getting anywhere we don’t want it. And um, well it would need a little enchanting, I think—cold, if you can localize it to the sides of the bowl, it wouldn't touch Ink, and it would keep the copper from getting so hot that it melts. It’d be corked shut but with like, a lil’ hole drilled in—something that’ll let steam pass through without it being spilly.”

Ahh. A balance of science and magic. That would certainly do. "We'd have to construct it to know if it would work or not, but your reasoning is sound, I'll make arrangements with the blacksmith for materials," he assured.

"Really? It's er, you think it's a good idea?"

"Certainly, Sera. I don't have enough knowledge on the subject to fully understand just how it will work but I trust your grasp of it."

"I only remembered it cause 'sandra got me this newsletter thing they put out from the different universities, since I'm teaching Ink science stuff she thought it'd be a good teaching material or whatever. They just did this really cool study in at the University of Val Royeaux, playing around with what we know of electricity. They might be able to use it to power lights 'n things, instead of using oil or candles or wood for light-" she stopped in her enthusiasm, seeming almost shy as she scratched behind her ear, "Sorry um, borin' pish, just- cool, we'll make a prototype and see if it works."

It should not bother him so very much, that someone had taught this girl her interests were meaningless, but it spiked outrage in him on her behalf, he had to clear his throat before he calmly said, "I assure you I'm far from bored. In fact, if you've anything you'd recommend I read before we move forward with our project, I'd be glad to learn more."

"I brought the newsletter along for fun, you can have it, I'm done with it. And um, well shite I mean there's a few texts that'd be helpful if you wanna know more."
"I look forward to having more to contribute to scientific discussion with you then, once I've brushed up on the subject."

"Might be fun," Sera supposed. "Thanks. Oh!" she twisted around to reach for the stack of letters she'd received in the last drop off via Inquisition bird. "Here, shite, sorry. You can read this if you want, it's from my Friend," she said, handing him an unsealed letter.

"Your friend?" Solas asked, confused until he started to read.

Sera,

How've you been? Long time no see huh? Well certainly, considering they'd never met. Solas realized it was the 'Friend' from the estate Marehis was assigned to. Everything's been going well here, no complaints, just rosy. Tell everyone I say hi, and I'll do the same. Your Friend, Thegan.

"Thegan is your Friend you told Marehis she should look for?"

"Uh-huh, I set it up beforehand—sneaky-like, it won't compromise her job, but he'll pass along verification that Mare's still okay, let me know if something goes wrong, and he uh, can pass along things if you want. He won't be creepin' on Marehis or nothin', just, if you wanted to let her know mushy stuff, it'd just look like he'd taken a liking to her or somethin'. She says something back he'll tell me, like he's just sharing news with his friend that the girl he likes talked to him, in case his boss or someone reads his letters. It'll just look like normal shite. 'Just rosey' means everyone's safe, when I write it back, it's code to Marehis that you and Inky are safe an- oi!" she startled a bit when Solas pulled her into a hug but relaxed, hugged him back after a moment.

"Ma seranas, da'assan."

She made a dismissive sound and then mumbled a tentative,

"In'garas, ya baldy git."

Sera was stupid excited to finally get to the Oasis. She was scared-excited to have the opportunity to test how well she’d be able to help Inky with Rifts—those things were just scary and she was worried, a little, that she’d fail or mess it up somehow. If she could…she was gonna try it both ways—suppressing a Rift and then trying to power Ellie’s Mark when they faced another, and ask her which way helped more she wasn’t…she still wasn’t sure about powering her Mark, but if that was the best way to help, that’s what she wanted to do. Sucked big ones that there was four Rifts sighted in the ruddy area but she’d get four shots at practice at least, before the Breach. So—excited to help seal Rifts, excited to figure out what the frig all those weird skully things are on about, and to top it all off, they’d get to see Lace! Friggin’, that was just the best!

Ugh, Sera hated the little crackle zap that sounded from Inky’s Mark when Rifts was nearby, but they got it closed soon enough—friggin’ Rage demon popped out of it! It was huge! Almost bigger than Bull, it looked like, when the Qunari shouted for everyone to stay back while he rushed the thing! The Rift was in this weird little shrine looking area, fallen pillars and one upright stone hedge. Like maybe once upon a time the weirdy temple they was heading for had been spread all across the area, not just tucked away like it was now. Solas’d probably spend a night out here, to do his Fade-sleep thing.
Ellie stopped to look to Dorian and Solas before looking to Sera for confirmation that they were set, before she cast against the Rift. Sera felt the splashy, clammy cold of the tear in the veil, cripes, it felt like just a big, blown up version of Ink’s Mark, and there was something satisfying about suppressing it.

“All good Ink?” Sera asked as Ellie shook out her hand once the Rift crackled closed.

“All good! Thanks, you guys really helped!” Ellie assured with a smile.

Friggin' boss that was! The Fade could eat it!

Horses were good sports about it all, Russel ‘n them stayed put where they dropped their reins, just stood and watched from a safe distance while everyone went to fight the Fade tits, like it was something you see every day! Well, she supposed it was a more regular sight for them, but still.

They was close enough to camp, they just hoofed it, themselves, leading their horses, though Ink was off in a flash once they reached base.

"Hiya Lace! Gosh it’s good to see you!” Ellie greeted cheerfully as they approached their infiltration camp. The dwarf woman, frick she was cute! All blushy and happy as she hugged Inky tight.

"It's great to see you too! I'm so glad you got here safe," Lace said, before pulling away, "Gosh, it's- I've never seen a Rift closing before but I caught the tail end of you guys taking care of that one, Maker."

Ellie smiled, bouncing on the balls of her feet, "This camp should be even safer now, you've been alright?"

Lace nodded. "I came in the long way to avoid them, they haven't given us any trouble. I feel bad for the occasional Fennec that runs through, they'd get the attention of the Rifts and demons would chase after them. Other than Rifts there really isn't anything out here except for the temple. There's hyenas around too, be careful, um, they aren't friendly like dogs Ellie, they'll fight you on sight."

"Thanks for the warning, I really appreciate all the work you've done here."

"I'm glad to serve. All of the Shards are in storage here, they're a little heavy but we got them into a satchel for lugging up to the Temple. Marehis and Vivienne were amazing, they took a unit out and found all the Shards the Oasis had hidden. They found a Dalish artifact too, Master Solas, they took note of where it is on the map, but left it for you to handle as you see fit. Be careful, its really really up there."

"That sounds great," Ellie said, "we'll check it out! If everyone else is up for it, I think— Marehis and Vivienne said there's a great spot to set up camp near the temple—so I think we could get rid of at least the eastern Rift and the one just down near their proposed campsite and settle in there."

"We're ready whenever you are boss," Bull spoke up, "just, pace yourself Imekari. You need to rest or call it a day, say the word."
“I think we can do it, but yeah—same goes for everyone, Rift fights are hard.”

Sera was just glad Inky wasn’t pushin’ to get all the Rifts closed day one. Still, friggin three out of four was a lot! But the ones she wanted closed today were pretty nearby. She’d slept curled up against Sera last night, took potion to sleep but it seemed like she still had some trouble resting, she’d been clutching Sera’s hand with her Marked one all night. So many Rifts around couldn’t be fun, so yeah—get em closed! Then get some good rest, maybe Sera and everyone could convince her to take a few days for fun before sealing the fourth Rift—it was way way off, out in this area past the top of the high-up mine entrance. Super far north, past the temple, it shouldn’t bother Ink’s Mark.

“I’ll stick around for a little while, I’ve reports to send out and I want to make sure you’re settled here before I move on to the Fallow Mire,” Lace said, “Lord Berand confirmed there’s Rifts in the area—no rush, it’s a pretty nasty area, wet and murky and abandoned, and they’ve only spotted one so far, in the distance from their infiltration camp. I’ll join them and report to Leliana what we find, scout out the area to see if its somewhere you really need to worry about. A Rift or two in an area that’s been abandoned for decades isn’t exactly an emergency.”

“Gosh,” Ellie breathed, “that’s such a far way—be careful, and take your time, you’re amazing Lace, seriously, you deserve a major vacation after this trek out.”

“It’s not bad, traveling on my own there’s lots of shortcuts, my horse does most of the legwork,” Lace insisted.

Ellie nodded, then she stretched, “Actually if you guys don’t mind, I think I’m gonna lay down for a little while before we tackle anymore Rifts today.”

“You want me to lay down with you, Ink?” Sera asked, for a second she worried she was babying her or something, cause she got this look that bordered on reprimand and then-

Oh. oh duh! That was sweet, she really didn’t have to.

But she did. “I’m gonna cuddle with Cole actually, if he doesn’t mind. Just a quick nap, do you mind me using a tent?”

“Oh of course not, Ellie, go on ahead,” Lace said, “I’ve been using the one on the right, you can use my bedroll even, I haven’t packed yet.”

Everyone else seemed to get the hint, Varric went to go chat up the scouts, Solas, Bull, and Thom went to the requisition table to look over updated maps and any orders that needed put in or taken care of, Dori shrugged and trailed after them.

So Sera and Lace could have a moment, some time while Ellie was resting—they couldn’t go fight Rifts without their designated Rift Sealer so, they might as well occupy the time right? Friggin, sweet!

“Glad you made it in safe,” Lace stepped up to greet Sera who ducked down to hug her little…huh, girlfriend? Closest thing to a girlfriend she’d had in a long time.

“Me too—glad that you’re here and safe, missed you Lace,” oh shite that was sort of- well she had missed the Dwarf woman, loads, but saying it out loud sounded clingy-

But Lace just smiled, poppin up on her toes to press a warm, slow kiss that friggin…shite, maybe Inky miscalculated, should’ve left Lace’s bedroll free. Dwarf was just, wowza! “I missed you too.”
Oh shite! Cool! Friggin’-friggin’ boss, that was!

“Kay, catch me up, anything cool happen since Haven?” Sera asked, sitting down by the empty firepit, way too hot to keep a flame going during the day. Lace sat with her, both of ‘em sort of sitting the way Solas had them sit for meditation, facing each other, knees touchin’ and their hands…it was the equivalent of footsies with hands. Just holdin’ but not holding still, tracing patterns on each other’s palms, chattin’ away.

Sera’s ears twitched when she picked up noise from the tent Ellie’d laid down in, “Sera’s having fun, yeah?” she was asking quietly.

She knew she was, didn’t need to hear Cole’s response, and she really didn’t notice it really, cause Lace giggled. She raised a hand to cup Sera’s face, rubbing a thumb along the side of her cheek, “Your ears are just the cutest—I didn’t really notice them before, with your hair.” Then, “I’m sorry, is that…disrespectful or anything?”

Made her ears burn is what it was! But uh, “Nah, not to me anyway. Cute…cute’s fine.”

Bull snorted. He could fuck off! Sera’d ruddy heard him and Dori’s sexcapades in the wilderness, right up against a tree! Way off out of the way, one night when they’d gone to ‘collect wood’, collected all kinds of wood while they were gone! Yuck!

Ink just laid awake, chattin’ with Cole the whole time she was ‘napping’, and when she came out of the tent and made a big, yawn-and-stretch show of ‘waking up’, it was time for lunch, so Lace stayed and ate with them. Bit silly but Sera felt a sort of pride, or whatever, when Lace complimented her chopping skills when she helped Solas and Thom and Ink prepare their noon meal. Even more when she liked the stew they whipped up, sandwiches too.

Mail came while they ate, and Ellie smiled, and then gasped and, “Someone look at this, it’s amazing, and I love it, and I might cry, and- I need to get taller!” she decided as she passed the sheet of parchment she’d been looking at, holdin’ it horizontal, she passed it off to the Iron Bull.

“Krem-corn sent you another picture huh? Awe, that’s cute, Imekari. Why’s it inspiring you to get taller?” he asked as he passed it to Sera, awe! Kremmy-boy! He drew Inky a pretty picture of little Anya playing in the snow out front of Haven’s gate, friggin’ cute! Shite, he was good.

“Otherwise I’m going to have to climb that man like a tree. I’ve got things to reach, like Cremisius’s face!” Might be nice for the Tevinter if he didn’t have to get so crouchy to kiss her.

“I’m out,” Varric announced as he stood up out of his seat and high tailed it on over to the requisitions table with his half-eaten sandwich in hand. Solas was red faced, ears blazing.

“Artisanship’s a big thing for you, Ellie?” Dorian asked, amused.

“It’s not that—I mean, gosh, he’s really talented, everything he draws is amazing—but it’s just-! It’s so nice of him!”

“You hear that, Tethras? Imekari’s thing is kindness,” Bull sniped. Kink, he meant. Dwarf had figured out Bull and Dori was bumpin’ bits, tried to drag them into a conversation one night while Ellie was asleep with Cole keepin’ guard, and everyone else was gathered around the fire. Varric claimed he could guess just about anyone’s kink, and when he danced too close to the subject with Dorian, Bull shut him right up by asking if he could guess Ink’s kinks. Ha! Inky’s kink is kindness—say that shite five times fast.

“That- that doesn’t help!” Dwarf was all kinds of torn between Ellie being a ‘strong, independent young lady with autonomy over her body and can choose to share it with whoever whenever she pleases’ and ‘no, Maker, please, let’s just lock her away in the Chantry till she’s thirty, she and Krem can slip notes under the door or something’.

“Cremisius is one of the kindest people I know,” Ellie said, confused at just what was upsetting Varric. More confused when Varric groaned at the idea of Kremmy-boy being the 'kindest' while the Iron Bull started laughing.

Lace had to scoot after lunch, got packed up and hugged Ellie goodbye, Sera got in on a hug and a quick kiss goodbye before she let Sera give her a hand up into the saddle of the sweet mare the Horse Master assigned Lace.

“See you, Ser’. Be safe.”

“You too. Later, Teetness*.”

“Tart, sweet. Tiny, between. Candy that makes you sick, but you can’t stop eating,” Cole spouted out, friggin!

"Shite! What I say about 'nouncin' my by brain stuff?!” Sera asked.

Cole looked chagrined, frowning as he sighed in defeat, "I tried to just say it inside," he swore, "did I do it wrong?"

Ugh. Creepy Cole did try. He stayed out of her brain business the best he could it seemed, and he'd been sincere when he promised he'd only try to listen to her thoughts if there was some kind of emergency. Or if Ink asked him, cause Sera didn't much mind...Ellie wouldn't judge something she thought, and she wouldn't ask unless she thought there was a reason to, like checking in to make sure Sera was having a nice time with Lace, and Sera wasn't gonna be a hypocrite about it, she asked Cole about Ellie from time to time just, making sure she was actually helping her, or making sure she hadn't accidentally made a hurt thing. Anyway, he really was trying to stay out of Sera's business it seemed, just, sometimes he heard things cause they was 'loud'...when she actually sat down and had a semi-understandable conversation with the Spirit shite, it sounded sort of like being in a crowded restaurant—you can't help but overhear someone's business, their 'private conversation' when it broke out loud enough to be heard over the din of everyone's garbled talking. Everyone thought all the time, it all washes together for Cole unless it's hurt, or loud.

Lace thoughts were loud, Sera supposed.

"They are, Sera thoughts too."

Sera thoughts...wait- "Lace has thinkings about me?"

"All the time, but if I say them you'll want Ellie to shut her ears...but um, Sera, Human ears don't shut. I...I can't think of anything that has ears that can shut, did you know that? It's okay if you didn't."

Friggin' he was a little dummy, but...sincere, and even though Spirit shite was weird, he was ultimately just...kind. Spirit of Compassion, Solas said, and Sera guessed that fit.

Agh! Was she thinking too loud or something? Cole beamed like her thinking his spirit crap fit made him happy!

"It does! You aren't being loud, I'm just listening...you'll miss Lace, but you aren't upset over her leaving, so I'll stop. I listened because I thought there might be hurt, should I not do that? I'm sorry if it was weirdy, I just wanted to stop you from hurt."

Oh. That was...creepy sweet? She appreciated it, that he was tryin' to keep her from 'hurt' or whatever but, "Maybe uh, hold off next time. If I need you, I'll call you, sound good?"

"Yes! If you call me, I will come," he promised serenely, and then he looked confused, turning to look up at Bull, "no...not like that, the Iron Bull. Sera wouldn't like that at all."

Cripes! Yick!

Bull chuckled. "My bad."

Kind of funny, Ellie having to clear her throat and cheerfully remind the adults there was work to do, though Sera felt bad, shite. She hadn't thought about...frick! She thought about it too much when it was totally pointless, didn't serve much purpose, but they finally get into Rift-ville and suddenly, ugh! She shouldn't've let Ink give her time to chat up Lace. Those friggin' Rifts were like, right there, she had to be feeling them. If they'd been real bad though Ellie would've spoken up, Sera supposed. Still!

Thankfully they weren't too bad. Worst thing that came out of 'em were dumb Rage demons, mostly little Shade things, which was sweet. Made for quick, not quite as dangerous work. Sera was more worried about Ink biting it when they started to make the trek up to where Solas's Elf thing was. They didn't exactly make it there—they got side tracked, which lead to something just a bit more dangerous, than the Rifts. There was this rando woman, they hadn't seen her when they arrived, Lace hadn't reported a scavenger, and they was just happening to cross paths, literally approaching each other—them going uphill as she was coming down—and she asked Ink why she was 'following her'. Friggin' barmy.

She gave Ellie some sob story about before their mining company disbanded, she'd had some fight with her man and taken off her wedding ring, left it behind in the cave they'd been excavating just before abandoning the Oasis. She wanted to get it back, but the cave was fully of baddies. It was just at the top of the hill so, Ink told her to stay right where she was, they'd be right back with her ring 'promise!'.

Spiders. Friggin'. The cave was full of Spiders. Full. All the way. Wall to wall Spiders, it was an actual nightmare for Inky and just...anyone really cuz shite! Who the fuck wanted that many Spiders around? Did the Maker drink? She was pretty sure He got drunk and said 'watch this! Bet how many spiders I can fit into one cave!' damn!

But it was pretty funny that Inky led them headlong into the cave only to stop and shriek, "Holy shit!"

"You okay Ink?" Sera asked once the coast was clear. Damn messy though, shite. So. much. Spider sludge.

Ink was pretty well covered in sweat and dirt and sludge. "I...don't know what okay is. Not anymore, I've seen too much now...don't see any signs of a ring though, hopefully the Spiders didn't eat it."

They hadn't, it was tucked away in a box, and the lady actually came back up to the cave opening once she realized the dirty work was done, thanked them and offered up a key to this gated off area in the back of the cave as reward.

"Thanks," Ellie said as she took the key in hand, "you're all set right? I mean you have water and food and shelter?"

She had water and had been staying in one of the abandoned tents left by the run away mining company. She still wanted to look around the area some more before heading back to civilization, so Ink reached into her armor's overcoat pocket to get her flippy notebook out and wrote up a quick little note saying the miner chick was a guest of Ellie's, and was invited to stay at their infiltration camp once she was done looking around—she would be fed and her water stores refilled, could rest up and stay the night before making her return trip.

Solas suggested they go ahead and make camp—they were all due a wash up after friggin' Spider central. They could go look for his Elf thing later.

"We'll find it, honest," Ellie said, "if we all weren't so yuck, I'd hug you—group bath! To the Oasis!"

Ellie took off running down the hill, taking the loop to the actual water source in the Oasis and shite it looked amazing!

It was so freaking warm out here and everyone was covered in grime so no one batted an eye when Ink got to the edge of the water and started shucking off her boots and leggings, she meant it when she said 'group bath', everyone followed suit, getting mostly starkers—Ink, Solas, Varric, and Thom kept their under things on, but Dori wasn't shy about what he had goin' on, and Inky squealed with giggles when Varric grabbed her arm and pulled her down so he could cover her eyes with his hand the moment Bull got all full frontal on them before the Qunari flopped into the water face first, flipping onto his back once he got where he could just float. Cole appeared, butt naked 'cept for his hat, sitting criss cross applesauce on the Iron Bull's chest in that weightless way he did.

Ink...might not be that much taller yet but uh, she gained a few inches of height just by taking her hair out of the braid not-beardy put it in the other day. Wowza, she hadn't been lying about humidity sending her hair bonkers, it just poofed right up! Sera chased after her as she raced into the water, splashing up a storm, turning and splashing at Sera! Friggin, Ink wanted a water war, and she was so getting it!

Solas cheated! He did some kind of! Magic shite! Got a whole bunch of water into the air, floating over Sera and Ellie before he dropped it on them! They was officially drenched and Ellie's hair instantly deflated once it was soaked.

"Get 'im Imekari!" Bull cheered when Sera and Ellie turned on the Elf Apostate, splashing at him together! Friggin! Eat it baldy!

They had their fun and cleaned up, washing their armor off, and Thom set about getting a fire going up on the little high spot they would set up camp, signaled to their infiltration camp that the area was clear and they could claim the spot now, get set up proper. Ink and Cole played in the water some more while the others got dressed and conspired while they got dinner goin'.

They was takin' a little vacation, a few days of splashy fun before they got back to business, they'd talked it over as a group on the way—Sera and the guys, and they was pretty sure they could get Ink to take a break seeing as they all deserved one, they would resort to guilt tripping seeing as it was for her own good and all.
"Ellie will like it, she will feel badly at first but she already thinks everyone deserves a break, she'll say yes."

Frick! For a second Sera thought Cole was back with Ellie already but the Human girl was still down by the water, talking to someone...the nugs. Inky was talkin' to the nugs, asking them how they liked the Oasis and promising them no more demons would come chasing after them in their own home. Cole had done his poofing thing to join the others around the campfire, though uh, just for a quick second. He dug around in one of their supply packs before letting off a happy, "These will work!" before disappearing, she heard Ink thanking him just a moment later, huh.

"Well then, perks of having a resident Spirit," Dorian supposed, "taking a few days off will be wondrous, ugh, this heat is just atrocious, thank the Maker's sculpted buttocks the water is so very pleasant."

"Hell yeah, sun, swim, we'll just sit back, relax, have some fun," Bull said.

"Sounds good to me—Cole says everyone's hankering for a vacation right? Lets do it!" Inky's voice sounded as she joined them, plopping down to sit next to Sera, wet hair wrapped up in a towel atop her head, Sera wasn't sure how the frig she got it all in there.

And then she found out how it all fit. Cause Ink took the towel off, rubbing at her hair a bit more before setting it aside.

"Inky?!!"

"Da'vehn, what did you-?"

"Tumbles, how the hell-?"

The Iron Bull let out a little whistle, "Lookin’ good, Imekari."

"It is rather fetching," Dorian agreed.

Her hair was! Just! It was friggin gone! Cropped until her hair was just little fluffy baby curls on her scalp! It was cute but like half of Ink's entire body was missing! Ellie giggled at the shocked reactions and said, "Thanks, gosh, my hair is just too crazy in this weather, and it's so thick, and just way way way too hot for that, you know?"

"I think its very cute Ellie-girl," Thom assured her.

"It came off!" Cole announced, sounding like he was still riding his own wave of surprise as he appeared at Ellie's side. "She used the scissors I got her, and clipped clipped clipped it all gone! The nugs took it away to put in their nests! Will you always look like this now?"

"Hair grows back, Cole, you see yours?" Ellie asked reaching out carefully to take some of the length of his hair between her fingers. He was gettin' a bit shaggy. "It's grown since we met."

"If I cut it, it will grow back?" he asked with some uncertainty.

"It'll keep growing if you don't cut it, you can have your hair be as long or short as you like."

"Ohh," Cole nodded in understanding and then he took the lock of hair Inky had been holding, and he still had the scissors and snip went a chunk of his hair. Just the one snip, because he just 'wanted to see', he'd let them know when it grew back, he promised.
Dinner was good, warm and filling, and Sera was almost tempted to call it a night. Ellie was playing chess with Bull while Dori watched, she'd packed the little chess set the Tevinter Mage had gotten her for her birthday. Solas was reading report things, sitting next to Sera by the fire, Thom and Varric was talkin' tourney—it was just around the corner and Varric was working on putting in bets, Thom helping him pick and choose.

But mail came, and Sera had letters from Thegan and 'sandra, and a few of the Friends in Haven, they reported to Sera from time to time. Not a whole lot of letters this time but there was something for,

"Me?" Cole asked, surprised. Cripes he looked ecstatic as Thom passed around what the messenger bird delivered, and offered a sealed letter with Cole's name on the back to him. Spirit boy took the letter and the moment he had it in hand, he announced, "It is from Krem!"

Oh Inky got so smiley over that, especially since Cole seemed touched by the idea someone thought to write to him of all people. He read it out loud, it was just a nice little note asking after him, how he was enjoying the Oasis, if he was having fun, telling him to be safe. That was, shite that was sweet. Everyone got mail every once in a while, Thom never used to get mail cause of the whole 'Blackwall' thing, but now he got things from Krem and his men, Cyril. Mail call usually produced a little something for everyone, but yeah, Cole hadn't ever gotten anything—hadn't bothered the guy but it was nice, made him feel good that someone thought to reach out and check in on him.

"Come on," Sera said, patting the empty space next to her, "you can share inkwells with me if you wanna write Kremmy-boy back."

Marehis was safe and sound still, according to Sera's mail, and 'sandra dropped her a note asking after her, checking in to make sure Sera was having fun, was safe, asking if she needed anything. Friends just touched base that everything was cool in Haven. Sera got everyone written back to.

They settled in for sleep not super long after dark, Viv's tent was just the best, cool during the heat of the day, kept them toasty at night. Though it was...frick, it wasn't even midnight yet, when Solas shook Sera awake, motioning for her to follow him.

"What's on?" Sera asked around a yawn as she joined him outside the tent.

"I do apologize, da'assan, for disturbing you but I've decided to go ahead and handle the Elvish Artifact. I'd prefer it be dealt with as soon as possible, and it is up so very high I do have concerns dragging Ellie along, I thought perhaps you could assist me, in case there is trouble. Too, I believe it could be of some benefit to you."

Oh. "Sure, your wish is something something," Sera mumbled, stretching, trying to wake up. "Lead the way."

He said he was bringing her along in case there was trouble, but it was about halfway up the ladder to the high rise where the artifact was supposed to be, that she realized neither of them had weapons. She was still rockin' her sleep clothes, the night was quiet and cold and there wasn't a thing around, nothing dangerous at least. But Sera didn't mind tagging along—it was dark out, and even the light of the moon wasn't super comforting, you was still walking around in the dark, she wouldn't want to make the trek up here all by herself either, so she got Solas wanting company. Buddy system n' pish.

Though it seemed like he had a bit of a lesson in mind or something. He didn't activate the artifact at first, just sat down criss-cross, made the hairs on the back of her neck stand on end cause he was sittin' with his back to the drop off, she was kind of worried he'd tip backward and fall. Solas gestured for her to be seated across from him so, she popped a squat and waited.

"These artifacts were once of the upmost importance to Elves, of the past," Solas said. "They allow us to measure veil strength, to know just how wan the barrier between the Fade and the world as we know it today, is, in this place. It is not unlike physical measurement—imagine there is a wall before you, closing you off from the next room. You desire to know just how thick that wall is, and you find you are capable of punching through it, measure the distance across the length of the hole you make."

"So you...tear into the veil to see how far you have to go to reach the Fade? Why do we want to know the distance?"

"Places where the veil is thin indicate that there will be multiple Rifts—why I seek these artifacts is to find thin places, where one could make substantial opening in the veil. The Inquisition could one day use their measurements to pinpoint places that Rifts might currently exist, but lie dormant, hidden but needing dealt with."

Oh. Hidden Rifts did sound like a bad thing.

"Sera, I would like to propose something. A test of sorts, if you'd care to try. It would be like a trial, practice for when you endeavor to power the Mark."

"On your artifact thing?"

He smiled almost like there was something funny about that. "Yes, Sera. Activating my artifact would offer you experience in reaching into the Fade with power. I understand if you would be hesitant, but I thought it a disservice not to offer."

Huh. She'd...she had meant to try powering Ink's Mark, for real, but she'd only suppressed Rifts today. She'd had three shots, but still, she was nervous to do anything like send power to the freaky Fade. But uh, huh. Maybe a baby step was in order. Help her get over it so she could see if powering the Mark would be more helpful than suppressing the Rifts.

"Alright, what do I do?"

It was...a lot like what he said, 'bout punching through walls, though it was more like pressing into taut fabric, a literal veil, until you tore into it but it...there was a thickness to it, like a wall. It felt...really friggin weird, like she was balancing on a thin edge over a steep drop, scared, hyperaware, and alive with...not excitement, but something, it made her feel...could blood feel scratchy in your veins? Not like it was scraping her insides but like her blood itched she felt it head to toe when she pulled from the Fade, opened her eyes to see Solas's face illuminated by Fade light, eyes shining with something like pride.

"Well done, da'len. How do you feel?"

Sera, frick, she had to swallow to keep from- "I feel sick."

Solas came around and sat at her side, rubbing circles on her back. Took a minute but her stomach stopped doing somersaults and the sort of head rush she'd been feeling went away, itch-blood too, frick that was weird! "Ir abelas, da'assan. I do apologize, first endeavors with the Fade without full access to magic can be tenuous, I have not trained someone to do so in quite a long time, Sera, I had forgotten, I would have warned you. Are you poorly? Do you need potion? I could...if you needed I could help you back to camp, carry you."

No friggin' way, "I'm good, thanks. Uh, s'not your fault. M'okay, just give me a sec."

They made it back to camp all good, Solas keeping close behind her, a hand hovering just at her elbow as he braced to help if she needed it, which was dumb, she was fine. Though she just about had a heart attack when,

"You all good, Ser'?" Bull's voice rumbled out quietly in the dark as they entered the tent.

Frick she...she almost felt dizzy, how tired she was, and she was cold, freezing, like...had it been this cold earlier? The tent was warm wasn’t it, why was she so cold?

“All good,” she whispered back, and the Qunari reached out a hand in her direction, huh, she was shiverin’. She took it and the last thing she remembered was Bull letting her curl up against his chest, his arm wrapped around her to hold her close, mmmm warm.

She felt a hundred percent when she woke the next morning, like, almost better than that, more pep in her step and that was on, right? Friggin’ day off! Vacation! Hell yes!

They pigged out and played, spent loads of time splashing around in the Oasis, little bit of napping in the warm sand come afternoon, Ink tucked up against Sera. And when they woke up, Ellie was excited, cause she remembered something they planned on making in the Oasis since it’d be so warm there. Ice cold, sweet and tangy fizzy lemonade! It was stupid satisfying, just yum and it always felt refreshing to drink something cool in the heat, and bubbles were tickly.

Only took a day off though, wasn’t like it wasn’t loads of fun, just, their work could be fun too. And they wanted to explore! Fun job first!

Supposed to be fun, anyway, exploring the Temple. Felt sort of creepy, made Sera break out in gooseflesh, when they got close enough to the door. Some kind of weird, old looking...her brain wanted to process it like Dalish but it was old, and she didn’t have a clue what any of it meant, the weirdy carved message by the door. Only word she understood was Solas but uh, she didn’t think they meant the person. Pride or somethin’ wasn’t it?

“It is a warning against entering the temple, da’len,” Solas offered to Ellie while she dug into the satchel Bull was lugging for them, carrying all the shards.

“Ha! Their signs mean nothing to me—I can’t read!” she offered jovially, sliding a shard into one of the slots on the door, it clicked into place. “At least not Dalish, not yet anyway.”

"Right on boss, rules can't apply to you if you can't read 'em...them's the rules," Bull chuckled.

Creepy feeling vanished when the door unsealed and swung open so. Kay. Cool. Maybe they should take another splashy day? Save the Temple for never?

It wasn’t too bad inside, just old and mossy and...just felt like the sort of place you wasn’t just allowed to walk into without an invitation. Guess the Shards were an invitation though.

She was a little nervous when one of those Elf things was there, on a stone table across from three...weirdy doors.

Nervous and she didn’t want to mess with those things ever again...and she did? Like?
Really bad, her blood felt itchy again and there was something...she just, felt more awake, aware—Solas activated the artifact though, once he saw it. Good! She didn’t want- she didn’t want whatever the frig was going on! Maybe she was sick or something- oh piss, Humans couldn’t catch Elf disease, right?

Wasn’t sure about that, and it didn’t much matter once Ink did catch something.

They went with the middle door, first, it was cold as shite! And full of corpses! Like! The walking kind! Friggin’ undead! And when they was all re-dead, Ink went to the big stone…looked like a coffin almost but Sera was gonna go with ‘chest’ because the place was creepy enough and she really hoped Ellie didn’t find herself face to face with a stiffy.

It was a little relieving though, that Ellie grunted with effort, trying to push the top aside and couldn’t. “The Iron Bull? Would you mind? Sorry, I can’t quite get it to budge.”

“No sweat, boss girl, its what I’m here for,” the Qunari said, and Ellie stepped aside, coming to stand by Sera, linking arms with the older girl and smiling with excitement at what they might find, it was really cool. Both…cause it was cold in the chamber, and like, cool adventurer stuff. Treasure!

Bull pushed the lid right off the thing, sending it crashing to the floor, ruddy loud but that wasn’t why Sera jumped.

“What the frig was that?!” Sera shrieked she pulled her arm out of Ellie’s to face the younger girl, hands on her shoulders, shit shit shit, was she okay? “Ellie? Are you hurt?”

Fucking! Ice things, glowing balls of white had shot up out of the chest and flown right over to Inky, hitting her square in the top of her head!

“I’m okay, I…I don’t know what that was, but it didn’t hurt.”

“You sure, Tumbles? How many fingers am I holding up?” Varric asked, holding up a splayed hand in Ellie’s face.

“A thousand.”

“I’m serious!”

“These Shards, the temple, it is all set up rather like a test,” Solas said, “perhaps it was some reward. Whatever it was, was attracted to your Mark, da’len, it was not malevolent,” he assured as he came and looked her over. “Huh. Dorian, would you care to observe?”

Tevinter mage came closer, “Ahh. How strange and delightful. It seems you’ve been given some resistance to Cold.”

“…I still feel pretty cold, it’s freezing in here.”

“I mean magically, Ellie, cold spells. They will not hurt you, at least, not quite so intensely.”

Oh wait, frick, really?

“Lets go kick down some more doors!” Sera said.

Lots of corpses! And a friggin’ Reverent! Bloke was huge, had a horrible grabby hand he could cast out to full-body snatch you up and pull you to him, but Ellie and Sera stayed back, shooting and casting from just inside the doorway* to the final room while the others rushed inside.

“Are you okay, the Iron Bull?” Ellie was quick to check on the Qunari that got pulled in by the Reverent, once the fight was over.

“Saved me some legwork, I’m all good, Imekari. Last one.”

All in all, they had enough shards to get them through the Cold rooms, and one of the Fire ones, so, there was four rooms, twelve orby things—nine that made Ink more resistant to Cold magic, three that helped resist Fire—and an ass ton of gold. It wasn’t all for keeps—they gathered it up, some of it would get split between them all ‘cause they was the ones hoofin’ it out here and finding everything, and the rest would go back to Haven.

Inky’s breath hitched when they walked by the unopened door, and she shook out her Marked hand. Oh, they was sort of closeish to the last Rift.

“You okay, Ink?”

She nodded. “Last Rift feels big, like, really big. We should probably rest up and tackle it tomorrow.”

That’s what they did. Rested, fueled up good at breakfast, and made the trek out to the farthest northwest corner of the Oasis.

The Rift was nasty on its own, Ellie got up high—Solas was even higher than her, standing at the top tier of the scaffolding near the Rift, Ellie followed suit and took the second tier, Sera stuck with her, popping off baddies with her bow, but shite! There was Despair demons like crazy, two, maybe three of them all at once! And those Shade fuckers, and friggin’ Terror shits. Ink was gonna try to help the guys on the ground, manipulate the Rift like she could mid-battle, to stun their enemies but when she raised her Marked hand to do just that, “Crap, I have to get closer, there’s no way I’ll close it from here, I thought…shit I thought I was close enough, it feels that way,” she said sounding confused as she stared between her Mark and then the Rift. She went forward, like she meant to drop down off the tier, it wasn’t a far drop.

But what she did was step in range of a Terror’s portaling. It sensed her and bam! Diving into the ground, popping up in the air, right on Ellie. Sera was startled, reared back and almost toppled off the damn scaffolding herself, but she managed to catch herself on the railing.

Railing that Ellie, shite. She screamed when the Terror swatted her, a great claw against her face, her body, tossing her backward, over the railing and crashing against the wood slats and tumbling. Rolling, and rolling until-“Inky! Sera screamed. Solas was already casting against the Terror and Sera, shit she wasn’t sure how she got down, felt like she flew just, next thing she knew she was down and-

Too late, too late, too fucking late, Ellie had tumbled under the railing and had been hanging on by her Marked hand and then she was dropping, her staff was left up by the railing and she was plummeting into darkness—

Fadelit darkness. Inky had been close to a Rift. The second one. Fucking Rifts, high and low in this place*. Shite!

Sera had Ellie’s staff in hand and raced down after her, screaming for the others as she ran down the ramp to the ladder she slid down as fast as possible, don’t be dead, don’t be dead, don’t be dead, oh Maker please help! Gods, Elgar’nan, whoever the fuck, just help!

Ellie was surrounded by wraiths and a Rage demon was reared to strike down on the girl laying limp, her bleeding face in the dirt.

Sera…she wasn’t sure what happened. Frick frick frick, just. she was too close, had her bow on her back, Ink’s staff in her hand, and…her blood felt like it was on fire, fear and panic and anger welling up in her chest, and all she wanted to do was protect Ellie, there had to be some way, she couldn’t…she couldn’t just-

Something cold and powerful broke out of her, sent Sera to her knees and for a moment she thought she might black out she…what had…oh piss what just- the- the Rage demon was frozen solid, fists just an inch over Ellie’s head.

And then it shattered into a million pieces under the weight of the Iron Bull, dropping down on top of it, landing with his back to Ellie, his boots in Rage rubble, Solas and Dorian casting against the wraiths.

“Imekari? Shit, shit, babe come on,” Bull growled, the sound ending in something like a whine as he knelt and gently placed a hand on her back, making to roll her over so he could lift and carry her.

“Do not move her, she could be injured-“ Solas started.

“We got fifteen seconds before that motherfucker pops out more demons, so what do you suggest, Elf? I know what’s at stake, I fucking- I’ll- it’ll be on me, but right now, in this moment, we need to get her out of here. Sera too, shit, Ser’, you with us? Fuck.”

They escaped through the side tunnel that led out to the sort of balcony you could see the waterfall from, look down into the Oasis, Sera…everything was hazy and it took a moment to realize she wasn’t running with her friends she as being carried, laying against someone’s back, her head on their shoulder, their hands under her thighs. Solas.

Next thing she knew they were coming up on their camp, her ears were ringing, and she felt dazed but-

“Put me down.”

“Sera? Da’veh- da’len, you should rest, are you hurt? What do you need?”

“I need down! Help Ellie, I’m…I’m okay.”

He did, catching her against his side when she stumbled, frick. Bull was already kneeling on the ground, laying Ellie down like she was made of glass and he…shite, he looked wrecked, scared, had to rise up and walk away hands gripping at his horns in frustration.

“Twice torn he wants to help you both—Sera, I can help Ellie, let Solas help you,” Cole said. Just where the frick had he been?! Ugh, that wasn’t fair, he’d been down with his daggers, helping the others fight the Rift. Still! “I wish I would have portaled to save her, too, I am sorry I wasn’t fast enough, did not see until it was too late.”

“Help Ink, Cole,” Sera rasped out as Solas helped her sit on the ground.

“What hurts, da’len? How can I help?”
“Head’s pounding,” oh, oh shite, she groaned, “my hands-“

She…she almost threw up just, she was scared, and confused, and what the fuck. Her hands were burned, blazed red and blistering from the tips of every finger to the heel of her palms like…like they’d been ice burned. She heard a sickening pop too, like a joint being popped back into place was that…that wasn’t her? What was happening-

“I-I-I I don’t kn-know-“

“Shh shh shh, da’vehnan, shh, hold them still,” Solas instructed. She tried but they was shaking, agony pouring up from the blistery burn, shite shite shite, the pain cut into her lungs, left her winded but Solas got balm out of his pack, thick, heavy Elf root salve he quickly uncapped and then he very gently took her left hand, holding the back of it as he delicately applied treatment, “I am sorry, I am so so sorry, da’len, I know it hurts, please bear with me emma’asha.”

Hurt like hell but he got her hands slathered in ointment, and he got out with that numbing stuff Ink and Bull sometimes used—he’d wrap the bandage around the back of her hand and when he brought it up to wrap over her palm he’d brush the numbing cream onto the bandage before laying it over the injured flesh, stung for all of a second before going blissfully numb. Did that for both hands and when he was done he asked to make sure they weren’t hurting her before he took her hands in his and raised them to press a kiss to her knuckles.

“Here is potion for headache, da’len,” Solas said, bringing the uncorked potion to her lips and tipping it back, helping her take it, and she downed it in a swallow. “You should rest, lie down, sleep if you can.”

Sera shook her head, her throat felt tight, eyes stinging, “I-I wanna stay with Inky,” she insisted, shaking her head. She- she couldn’t just- she wasn’t sleeping until Ellie woke up.

Solas and Sera sat in the wings while Cole worked on Ellie, frick. He’d had to get her out of her boots and socks and armor, laying in her breast band and her leggings, one pantleg rolled up to the knee, her shin was turning black. There was slashes in her armor, gashes in her left shoulder, a cut around her side just under her ribs where talons had struck to knock her off the scaffolding. Ground under her was bloody, but the wounds had stopped bleeding now, Cole was just finishing applying salve to the cut in her side. Solas gave Sera’s shoulder a squeeze before he went and knelt at Ellie’s side, down by her legs, and Cole offered approval before the Elf man began rubbing Elf Root salve into the bruising on Ellie’s shin while Cole moved on to her face, frick, her head was bleeding, he treated the cut to her temple first, worked on all the more serious dermal injuries before,

“This one will scar,” he said as he finished dabbing just a bit of salve to a deep, black split in her lip.

Bruising was cropping up all over her arms and shoulders and chest, Marked hand scrapped from catching the railing and hanging by that hand alone. Her left shoulder was turning black and Solas helped Cole stabilize that arm because apparently, the Spirit had started his treatment of Ellie by popping her dislocated shoulder back into place.

“I…I can’t tell while she is unconscious. She isn’t deep in, I could bring her out—we need to make certain, I am sorry, the Iron Bull,” Cole said.

Bull shuddered where he stood with his back to everything and then he came and knelt at Ellie’s feet, everyone gathering still, silent, watching.
“Do it,” Bull rasped out.

Cole closed his eyes, and after a second, Ellie opened hers, slowly, lids fluttering, breathing picking up, and she winced, tears forming in the corners of her eyes, shite shite shite, why was they waking her up-

Oh frick. Oh no no no no no no no, fuck. Please no. The Iron Bull looked haggard, and he was…tears was already falling from his good eye as he gently rested a hand on one of Ellie’s feet.

“Imekari?”

The girl moaned, and then, “B-Bull?” she gasped, face scrunching like everything hurt, friggin everything probably did, and Sera really really hoped it was everything please please please please please please please please please.

“Imekari, tell me what you feel—outside, not inside,” Bull asked, his voice sounded hollow as he started rubbing circles on the bottom of Ellie’s foot with his thumb.

“E-everything hurts, I- I- what happened? Where- where is Sera? She w-was up there wi-with me did she fall? Is,” she gasped in a sharp breath of air, groaning before she could ask, “is she hurt? I- wh-why are you rubbing my feet?”

Oh thank everything, shite. Sera was almost lightheaded, she was pretty sure she stopped breathing, frick.

“Sera’s here, Solas got her patched up. What about your hands, Imekari? All good there?” Bull asked. Dori was sittin’ near and he took Ellie’s right hand in his, and she gave it a good squeeze, the Mage’s face lighting up as he squeezed her hand gently back, “Good show, sweetheart. You’re alright, both hands working?” Dorian asked.

Cole’s head snapped back as he jolted like he was waking up, “It is all fine—bruising, and sore, there are breaks, cracks in bone but they will heal. She needs to recover, but there’s no tingling, no disconnects, everything stayed where it should.”

It was stupid, so so so stupid but Sera started crying, full blown, snotty nose, clumsily raising a half-numb hand to her mouth to keep her quiet as she sobbed she’d just—she was so relieved, she’d been so scared. Bull looked like hell, relieved, but shite he— it’ll be on me he’d said when he moved Ink away from the danger. He’d been ready to take the blame if Ink, shite, if she’d been hurt bad, if moving her made it so she would never walk again, lose use of one or both of her hands.

Inky was in so much pain. Her poor body ached agony from head to toe, tears slipping down the sides of her face as she did her best to answer Solas’s questions, before he offered sleepy potion, and Elf root tonic—pain relief and sleep. She nearly choked as she tried to quiet her groan as Solas carefully helped her sit up, supporting her because she couldn’t raise her head, but she got all the potion down and Cole helped, doing some kind of Spirit shite to help her knock out faster.

“Maker’s breath we can’t- we can’t expect her to try facing those things again,” Thom spoke up, “No one lives out here, the place is abandoned, we should just leave the damn things, can we…should we move her back to Haven?”

“No, she needs to stay, rest—we have everything we need here,” Cole said. “Let her sleep. We should help her and Sera get comfortable, let them lay down—I’m sorry, Sera you…you can’t hold her, you will hurt more than you comfort, but you can lay near her, hold her hand if you are gentle.”

Solas helped her clean up, her hands was just useless. He wasn’t weirdy about it, just, helped, got her washed up good in the pool, and helped her dress in her sleeping clothes. Bull helped Ink, got her clean and as comfortable as possible, laid her down in the tent, Sera laid down beside her, stayed a good foot or so away so she wouldn’t risk reaching out and clinging to her in her sleep. It…she almost started crying again, it was dumb, she was being a baby but she was so tired, arms felt like lead and her hands was clumsy and she didn’t want to accidentally paw Inky too roughly, she wanted-

Cole knew. He carefully lifted Sera’s hand and laid it on top of Ellie’s Marked one. She couldn’t ruddy feel it but it mattered, even made Sera feel better, comforted that she could see she had a hand on Ellie as she slipped off to sleep.

She felt something like a scream building in her throat, she nearly choked on it as she cought herself, stopped the cry before it started, shite. Her heart was pounding in her chest and she had to catch her breath as she pushed herself up—oh hands. They was back, feeling better, feeling period. It- she’d dreamed- Ellie wouldn’t wake up, and it wasn’t anything Cole could get her from either, she’d just been dead dead dead-

But she was fine! Alive at least, Sera tried to focus on that.

Oasis wasn’t quite so fun anymore. Solas and Bull consulted with Adan and Stitches via messenger bird, and they advised as they could—wasn’t anything to do, the best thing…the least painful thing was to let her sleep it off. Administering broth and her regular potions, and consistently dosing her to keep her asleep, ‘medically induced coma’ or whatever. Everyone was sort of cycling between checking on her and coming to try and cheer Sera up which…it was sweet, almost did cheer her up but…ugh this was horrible. Once Sera had enough feeling in her hands she sent off her own letter, to ‘sandra cause—frick! They needed a mom! Marehis, oh man, Sera wasn’t sure what to do about that. Mare’ needed to focus, if she found out Ellie was so badly hurt, it’d do the exact opposite of that…she’d let Solas make the call. So! Cassandra!

She expected the Seeker to…to hate her fucking guts, blame her, say she was coming to ensure Ellie’s safety but…she got ‘I’m proud of you’ and ‘you did well’ and-

She hadn’t said his name out loud. She only barely thought it, it was dumb. But he was there. She was sitting on a stool in front of the Requisition table, laying her head down in her arms over the letter Cassandra sent her, and Cole was at her back, arms wrapped around her middle as he hugged her. “It isn’t your fault. No one could move fast enough to help, she is alive, and she will feel better soon—when she wakes up, she’ll be recovered, and she’ll want lots of hugs and playing, and she will not blame you. She loves you, Sera. She’ll always love you, always always. Cassandra does too, and Marehis and Solas, and all of your friends, and Teetness.”

Sera sniffled, huffing a laugh, “Don’t call her Teetness. S’my thing.” Wait frick, “She love-“

“It isn’t the kind that scares you. It’s like the beginning of love, before you realize you have it. She’ll tell you when she knows. You’ll tell her when you know too. Everything happens in its time, you’ll move together, work together, it will not demand or condemn.”

“…kay.”

“You should tell Solas, about the blast. He will help,” Cole said before he vanished.
Oh frig. Everyone...everyone had just assumed Ellie cast against the demon before passing out, Solas was the only one that saw how bad her hands had been, they thought she'd scrapped them bad trying to get down to Ellie, that she'd fallen a little and been attacked and in shock, and Sera...Sera wasn't gonna say otherwise. She didn’t want to talk about it. But she needed to, it almost...she as on the verge of just, having total breakdowns over it- shite, what the fuck had she done?! She...that’d been like—she froze something! Made of fire! Not in a freezy chest! And she just about blew off her hands to do it!

Sometimes she could pretend it hadn’t happened, but it had, and she couldn’t handle it, not...not without help so she and Solas went away. Took him to the shitty ‘garden’ area, some dumb bitch named Elizabeth couldn’t grow shit, it was just dusty desert, with a nice little look out you could drop off of if you weren’t careful.

“You believe you cast against the demon of Rage?” Solas asked when she was finished recapping the crazy. Sera nodded. “Have you...have you been dreaming in the Fade?” he questioned. “You...your nightmares-”

Shite, that was embarrassing. She had a few...three nights in a row, bad dreams. Bull always woke up, held her, let her cry, and Solas would come and hold her hand just...sitting and being there. They didn’t say a ruddy word about it though. Because gross! Feelings!

“Just nightmares, nothing that feels like the Fade.”

He looked...was he disappointed to hear that? Oh, maybe it was just that he felt bad she was havin’ bad dreams, he reached out and patted her hands condolingly, and then, “The Fade and magic are tricky things. Elves...there are theories that we were once all mages of some level. You were near a Rift, an open portal to the Fade, holding a conduit of magic, a staff, meant to amplify power. Under the right conditions, anyone could cast as such, it was extraordinary circumstances. Your body picked up residual magic and you used it to save Eleanor. There is no magic fully waken in you, da’len.”

So...she wasn’t suddenly turning into a mage or some bullshite. That...she felt a lot better about it, hearing him explain. Shite.

She felt even better when Ink was able to come to. Just a little bit, she was tired, but she wasn’t hurting quite so terribly, and she was thanky to everyone for helping her so much, and she was able to sleep with people again—Inky slept on top of Bull, and he was a big 'un so, Sera could squeeze in too. Big warm cuddlefest, Inky was safe, Sera was safe, and everything was going to be alright.

And the following morning, when they was all sitting out at breakfast, it sounded- Ellie’d been asleep, but she woke up and she squeaked and then after a minute she came swaggering, full blown pep in her step, out to join them.

“What’s up?” she asked, but then she motioned for them to stop, as she stood in the middle of their circle and, ‘I’m up! Check it!’ and then she gestured down which...frick it would've been hilarious if she was a dude, 'What's up? I'm up!’ but she wasn't pointin’ at her junk, but her feet!

Oh frick! Her night clothes! Leggings had come to the tops of her feet and now they was tight around her shins, just above her ankles! Friggin!

“Well hot damn, Imekari!” Bull cheered, “I barely recognize you—fresh haircut, you’re out here trying to be twice as tall as Tethras. We’ll have to reintroduce you to everyone in Haven.”
“Dunno how my armor will fit, but I’ll make it work. Hmm,” she looked at her wrist watch, she must have put it on when she woke up—she didn’t wear it during fights or sleep time, “we’re still good day-wise. How’s everyone feeling?”

“All good, boss-girl, you ready to head out or something?”

Ellie nodded. “Right after we’re done sealing the Rifts.”

Friggin! What the-

Everyone was chattering over one another telling her no fucking way that was happening! There were two, huge ass Rifts, right up on each other! She- she almost-

“I understand if you guys don’t want to, but they need dealt with. Who knows what could come of the temple—we found so much stuff there, more people might get sent out to investigate and explore the area and we can’t leave Rifts around terrorizing our people, or anyone else. I have a plan.”

Her boots were super pinchy but she managed to squeeze her feet into them, and they covered the bit of exposed skin where her armor leggings rode up too high, her sleeves fell a little short at the wrists but gloves, while super hot, helped. Plan…worked out pretty good. Shite, she’d really thought about it. They hit the low one first, they could get to it and handle it without triggering the upper Rift, get it sealed and settled, even rest if they needed to before going and handling the last one.

Didn’t need to—rest that is—first Rift Sealed, the last one was toast! They went back up and faced the final Rift the Oasis had to offer them.

And when Inky raised her Marked hand to cast against it and seal it shut, Sera closed her eyes and followed, finding her Mark in the Fade and pouring will into it as hard as she could.

“Wow! Holy crap Ser’ was that you?” Inky asked when the Rift crackled closed.

Sera blinked open her eyes and looked to the younger girl, “Was I…was I any help?”

“Are you serious? That was amazing!” Ellie enthused, “Pack it in guys, let’s go home! We’ve got a Breach to seal—you can all take naps with the Mages and Templars, Sera and I got it!”

Frick yeah!

Bull was relieved they were going to be leaving the Oasis behind soon. It'd been real, it'd been fun, but uh, it hadn't been real fun. Couple days of splashing around and lazing waterside didn’t super make up for the fact that they almost broke Krem’s girlfriend. His Imekari. Shit.

Kid was up, moving around okay and they took out those Rifts like pros. She was still hurting, sore, and Bull was worried—cold could sink right into his damn ankle, like it was finding old cracks and digging in, breaking it again. Heading home…she was a kid, young and resilient, he just hoped she didn’t end up with bones that ached and pained in the chill because shit, it’d been bad. She’d had…he could hear the cracking, grinding of bone in her spine, her ribcage, her arm had come clean out of its socket-

“Excuse you, my wondrous form is right here, thank you very much.”

Oh. Heh it wasn’t…it was a little wondrous. Dude pushed his luck too much but something about that was endearing in itself. Dorian had asked him to follow him—everyone was getting ready for the big push out of the desert. They’d already packed up, he and Bull, so the Vint fancied one last look-around. Led Bull up to the temple, didn’t feel weird anymore it was just…a nice place, secluded, high up over the waterfall. Huh…no one’d hear them up here he didn’t think…

“Sorry, distracted-“

“Ellie is fine, safe. Cole assures me she’s healing well. You…shouldn’t be so very hard on yourself, Bull. You made the best choice in the moment, and it worked out swimmingly enough. You should refocus, you’re always encouraging others not to dwell on the past, let old fear corrupt the truth of what is in the now or some such Qunari rot,“ Dorian came close, arms up over Bull’s shoulders, hands hanging behind his neck. “Perhaps I need to Reeducate you?”

A low growl rumbled up from his chest, “Watch yourself Sparky, I might take you up on that.”

“Does the Iron Bull have teacher fantasies?” he asked with put on appalment.

The Iron Bull had a little bit of everything fantasies…more and more concerning the Vint-it- this was fun. Just. Fun. They’d been talking, since Bull offered to be a good listener after all that Time Travel bullshit. Light stuff, heavy personal stuff, everything. And it…it was something that worked both ways, somehow. As much as Dorian joked and made light, could claim the center of attention he…listened. Accepted, when Bull felt compelled to share the heavy things. And then First Day Eve rolled around and there was ache, and loneliness. Dorian was mid existential crisis, being so far from everything he knew, feeling the fear of the future, and somehow—he knew how, he was the Iron Fucking Bull, gift of Koslun—that turned into ‘you’re not alone’ fucking. Just…giving the guy something familiar. That uh. They kept coming back around to. Just. Because Human brains are bad at the whole ‘memory’ thing, they need lots of reinforcement, reminders.

“I’m afraid this isn’t the time for exploration…I must admit, I’ve actually lured you here under false pretenses. It wouldn’t do to get carried away when we’re expecting company.”

False pretenses, huh? “If this is the part you reveal you’re a Venatori sleeper agent, I would like to point out, I have had my suspicions and totally regret not listening to my gut instinct and crushing your head between my thighs.”

“You could do that?” Dorian asked sounding more impressed than petrified, “Why do I like this? That sounds horrendous, horrible, terrible way to die-“

“At least you’d die doing what you love:“

“Sucking cock or hearing you beg?”

“Mouthy,” Bull accused him, chuckling at his own pun. But then he heard something that had him pushing the Vint back and away from him, oh whoops, at least the sand wasn’t very hard? Shit, knocked him right on his butt, but in Bull’s defense, “-rian and the Iron Bull should be waiting for us,” Imekari’s voice echoed through the passage way, the cavern that led up to the Temple.

“Don’t be nervous kid, it’s gonna be all good. Bull’s a reasonable guy and you’re right, to want to bring him in on this.”

…Tethras. Huh.

Bull wasn’t blind—not totally anyway, there was something up. Some conspiracy between Tethras and the kid. Dorian was involved? What the fuck was up?

He guessed he was about to find out. Location made sense—Dorian hadn’t led him up here for sexy fun times with the cover of the falls keeping their more sensitive hearing members from overhearing them. They were getting privacy for a top secret, private conversation.

Imekari was nervous? Scared she might upset him. He helped Dorian up, brush himself off, and apologized, rolling his shoulders and trying to relax. There were fallen pillars out front of the Temple just sitting at the edge near the falls, so he took a seat, kept his posture open, tried to make himself smaller and approachable. Even if she pissed him off, if she’d done something she shouldn’t’ve, he wasn’t…shit, he wasn’t going to hurt her.

“Imekari,” he greeted warmly waving her over as she and Tethras emerged from the cavern. She smiled and waved, still armored up and ready to hit the road though she was hoofin’ it barefoot, she needed new things bad. He could get her reoutfitted, the way he did his guys, just, bill the Inquisition though…he might just let it go, she was technically… He wasn’t sure what was next, after Sealing the Breach. Inquisition’s purpose was stopping the guy behind it now, the Elder One, and his existence was enough to secure Bull staying on the job, working with them. But uh…he didn’t see returning the Par Vollen anytime soon, he was out for the long haul, next few years at least, rolling with the Chargers. And uh. Well. Stitches did a damn good job, but he could always use help. An assistant. A co-healer. Imekari could hold her own in a fight, knew her stuff healing wise, could keep her cool under pressure. Depending on what the future held, when all of this was over, maybe she’d roll with them.

Ellie and Tethras joined them, sitting across from Dorian and Bull on the other pillar, kid’s knee was bouncing like mad, wringing her hands and she swallowed and said,

“There’s something…I’m not sure how you’ll like that we haven’t included you, I’m sorry I haven’t been up front with you about it, but it’s important this stay secret. The Iron Bull. What I’m about to tell you, you have to promise me, right now, that you will not breathe so much as a word of this, to Cremisius.”

…well that was…definitely the most difficult promise she’d asked him to make. Depended on why she was making him promise…though he’d have to promise to find out he supposed though at his hesitance she said, “It isn’t bad or to hurt him, just the opposite. Keeping him out of this…he’ll reap all the benefits of the good that might come from it and be completely protected from any bad if this falls through. Please, I-I don’t want to hurt him.”

Well fuck, neither did Bull so he said, “Alright Imekari, you have my word. Whatever this is, I’ll keep him out of it.”

She heaved a sigh of relief. “Thanks. Has he…has Cremisius ever talked to you about his father?”

“He says things, anecdotes, advice his old man gave him. And uh, I know he’s not around or whatever, back in Tevinter, but Krem uh, it doesn’t sound like he’s dead or anything.”

Ellie took a deep breath. “Okay. The least ‘betraying his confidence’ version I can give you is this—Cremisius’s father is a slave currently indentured to the Magister House Tilani. I’m… kind of trying to get him freed? Dorian and Varric have been helping me, and now, we need you.

Fuck. Krem…he’d been more open, Bull just about lost his shit when the little Vint admitted he’d almost been married off to some bastard two, maybe three times his damn age. Fucking, engaged at ten. He’d talked about it bumping his family status up, keeping them from slavery, shit. He…kid had to be blaming himself, hadn’t he? Bull wasn’t sure how he felt, what sort of person, what kind of parent foists that on a kid? Live a lie, play wife and mother for some old fuck to keep the family from slavery. But it spoke volumes—his father called the engagement off and…took the fall himself. Kept Krem out of it, oh man, being aqun-athlock and Sopporati had been shit enough, being a slave?

“What do I need to do?”

Ellie gave him the rundown—turned out, the head of Magister House Tilani, was Maevaris, Varric’s goddamn cousin through marriage-“Wait, your Maevaris?” Bull asked Dorian.

“She’d spit on me for saying as much, but yes. My Maevaris.”

Alright. She’d been damn good to Dorian. Sounded like a good woman. Hopefully she was good to her slaves. Varric petitioned Maevaris, as her cousin, to forgive the debts of Tonio Aclassi. They’d filled out petitions and forms to verify Krem’s identity as Tonio Acclassi’s son, Cremisius Aclassi was a citizen in good standing, and he had a stable, disposable income. Bull’d wondered why Ellie had asked about Krem’s legal problems—back when they were in the Hinterlands, when they had a beat by themselves, she checked with him to make certain all that garbage had been cleaned up, that there was no longer a price on his head. Kid worked his ass off, pinched every copper he could and still scrape by to send half his pay to his mother, and as much as possible of the rest to the Imperium to settle his fines so they wouldn’t try coming after his mother, and would stop pursuing him.

Maevaris had paid off the Aclassi family’s debts, and Tonio was working to repay her through his service. Varric’s petition would be a forgiveness of upkeep—that she’d forget the cost of feeding and clothing and caring for Mister Aclassi, let his work count entirely toward paying off the debt she paid off for him.

“Cremisius was fifteen when his father was enslaved so…it’s only been around two or so years now. But she’s taking our petition seriously,” Ellie said. “She wants to meet me, you, Varric, and Dorian in Val Royeaux—we need to leave today if we want to make it in time.”

“Why does she want to meet me?”

“You’re Cremisius’s employer—she needs to know for certain that if something happened with the Inquisition, Cremisius can take up payments to her for his father’s service. It’s an exchange of sorts—he’d work for the Inquisition, his wages would go to Maevaris until his debts all paid off.”

Alright. Cool. Everything settled, laid out, they agreed to be ready and presentable when they got to Val Royeaux. Ellie enlisted Cole as a bit of help—there was no hiding what was going on from the Spirit so, he was tasked to make sure Sera and Solas and Thom were distracted—keep this all in-house until everything was official, and Tonio Aclassi was safe and sound and in Inquisition headquarters a fully fledged member of their banner. Shit, he really understood keeping Krem in the dark. It’d wreck him if he got the hope of his father’s freedom dangled in front of his face, only to have it lost in the eleventh hour. Bull did not like a wrecked Krem, nu-uh. He’d be there to pick up the pieces, just didn’t like them being broken in the first place.

So they set out. Dorian got pretty well acquainted with Russel though, since the Vint rode along with Sera most of the way. Imekari joined Bull on good old Bitsy after they left the heat of the desert, the warmth of the western woods. It was cold as shit as they neared Val Royeaux, it was full blown snowing in mid-Orlais. They had a set time and date to meet this Maevaris and they’d be damned it they missed it, but getting put down for almost a week hadn’t been in the game plan— they had been meaning to leave the Oasis either the day they first made an attempt at the last Rift, or the day after, give them time to get to Val Royeaux at a nice pace, give them a few buffer days. But uh, that was definitely gone. Long riding days, hard ones, horses being run through their paces, and with the jostling and the cold, it was damn painful, but it helped, sitting in the saddle before Bull. Warn, and braced, he had her relax against him, kept her secure in his hold trying to keep her from getting knocked around so hard.

They arrived in Val Royeaux, in the dead ass of night…well, early morning. Four in the morning, the day they were supposed to meet Maevaris. The Marchands were kind enough—they still hadn’t managed to sell off their Val Royeaux apartment and they were considering keeping it, since they reestablished their alliance with the Inquisition and they would have business here from time to time. Place was sweet.

“It’s very big, so be careful not to get lost—buddy system it up, call for Cole if you get really lost okay?” Ellie said as she gingerly pulled off her cloak. “Get some rest everyone.” Kid was stiff as fuck as she headed down the main hall, Sera tentatively trailing after her.

Thom was out like a damn light the second he was horizontal—picked the room he stayed in last time, told Bull he was free to share or uh, he’d winked and said, ‘do whatever you want’.

What he wanted was sleep. And for 1pm to come already Koslun’s balls he was antsy. Shit. He’s a fucking huge ass Qunari! What if he scared this Vint woman senseless and she called the whole thing off!

What he got was Dorian…what the fuck, was this some kind of mage bullshit? How? He meant to go to bed! Ended up ass naked in a marble bath with Dorian in his lap just…not even fucking, what was this? They were just bathing. Soaking, more like it and-

“Are you feeling better? Stress wise and uh…do you need potion or anything, for your ankle?” Dorian questioned gently.

Huh. Getting what he needed, he supposed. Yeah, it’d been a pretty bad leg day but, “All good now, thanks.”

“Maevaris is a harridan. A battle axe really, I assure you, she’ll be more enchanted with the broadness of your chest than fearing the horns on your head. We’ll have a pleasant chat, lovely lunch, and get this settled.”

“…quit being so unabsorbed with yourself and go preen in a mirror or something.”

“With pleasure. I assure you I’m only able to be quite so selfless because I can see my reflection in the water fixture nicely. Although it does make my nose look big.”

“Your nose is big.”

“Lies from the very pits of the Fade!” Dorian declared it, “My nose is proportionate and stately, it compliments my miraculously symmetrical, deliciously handsome face with perfection.”

Cole was…fucking a weird ass anomaly, but a lifesaver. Only reason anyone woke up in time was him appearing. Startled the shit out of Dorian. Bull’d been out, way out, hadn’t heard the Spirit’s arrival but Dorian’s arms around him tightened and he heard, “Vasta Fass!” panicked, it had Bull holding the Vint Mage closer, tighter against his chest as he cracked open an eye, brain already processing just how to flip the guy over to get him behind Bull while the Qunari attacked whatever was intruding but, nope. Just Cole. Perched on the bedpost like a big ass bird.

“Oh! I like birds! You should check on Ellie. She is awake but sore, warmth will help.”

Bull sighed. “You people just use me for my body.”

“You’re just now catching on?” Dorian asked, “You think I share a bed with you for your personality? You come up with the most atrocious puns.”

“Bite me.”

“Maybe later, if you’re good.”

Fuck. Okay, focus, up, out of bed, where the hell was Imekari’s room?

End of the hall, huh. Nice set up, and he could hear the hollow echo under foot, there was a secret passage way to get the hell out of this joint if shit hit the fan. Ellie was still…half asleep, dozing in the bed, laying in her sleep shirt on top of the covers like she hadn’t climbed under them to begin with, Sera was under the covers at her side, snoring away. Bull crouched on Ellie’s side of the bed.

“Hey Imekari,” he rumbled out softly, “Rough morning?”

She cracked an eye open to look at him. “Don’t know what you’re talking about.”

“Cole says you’re sore.”

“Ha. If I were sore, could I do this?”

… “Uh…do what, babe?”

“Somersaults. Am I not doing them? I’m pretty sure I am. Feels like I am.”

“Sorry Imekari, you’re still laying down. Cole says your cold? Why didn’t you snuggle up?”

“The air hurts my body, but my clothes hurt my body more. Blankets are my enemy. My dearest allies have betrayed me, and I am so alone.”

Ahh. Hence the no pants policy. “Okay Imekari. I’ll run you a warm bath, no more clothes until it’s time to get dressed. Half past eleven now.”

“I love you so much, the somersaults I’m doing are dedicated to you, the Iron Bull, actual love of my life.”

Hell yeah! “Cole,” he said quietly as he went to get the bath going, nice sunken tub in the floor of her room. Spirit showed up and- oh, cool. Didn’t care for how in people’s heads the guy was but it was helpful. Cole appeared holding a plate with a few slices of warm, buttered bread from…somewhere, maybe the kitchens? Was anyone up?
“Thom, he made breakfast when Solas woke up. Thom had me try a pancake, it was very good. Varric is awake and getting ready. Do you want me to wake Sera? I know where she keeps Ellie’s potions.”

“Go ahead and grab ‘em, thanks.”

Kid held her breath as Bull helped her sit up, ate a slice of bread and downed her potions, pushed the other slice in Bull’s direction in case he was hungry. He helped her over to the tub, seated on the edge and she held up her arms so he could pull her sleep top off before she slid into the water, wincing before sighing in relief.

“Thanks, the Iron Bull, really.”

“Don’t sweat it, Imekari.”

“Wasson?” Sera mumbled before she flinched and sat up, hair flopping as she looked around, “Ink? Huh, toast. Inky, did you leave me bed-toast?”

“You can have it if you want, I think there’s more in the Kitchen if you’re hungry.”

“Sweet! What’re we doin’?” Sera asked as she climbed out of bed, bread in hand, munching as she came and sat next to Bull by the edge of the tub.

“Just cleaning up, chatting with Bull, we have a meeting here in a bit. What’ll you be up to today?”

“Solas says this place has a big library, we was gonna check it out.”

“Cool! Have lots of fun, I’ll come find you whenever I get back.”

“Good luck with your meetin’ things, Ink. I’m gonna go get more breakfast, you want any? No? Kay, I hung up your clothes ’cause wrinkles or whatever. They’re on the door.”

Bull cleaned up, Dorian and Varric were lookin’ sharp, shit, Dwarf actually brushed his hair before pulling it back, and Imekari had brought along one of her nicer outfits for meeting with Maevaris but uh…they definitely fit weird. Solas had taken her measurements for her and she sent her clothing and measurements off to Haven, and they returned adjusted. Someone had taken silvery fabric that Bull supposed complimented the green-blue tunic and leggings, sewn a panel in the back of her tunic that started at the hem, and tapered up at the small of her back, helped it fit better. Sleeves and pant legs had been cut so they fit, didn’t vice themselves around her forearms and legs, and silvery material had been sewn to the end of her sleeves and the bottoms of her leggings, so her wrists and ankles were covered. She checked her face in the mirror by the door, took a deep breath and then turned to face them.

“Okay. We got this,” she encouraged, “Let’s go scare-seduce some Orlesians with our cultural diversity and our astounding good looks.”

Varric offered her his arm and Dorian and Bull followed after them. They did make a bit of a sight. Yes world. Hello. Qunari are running the streets of Val Royeaux, quiver in fear you tiny bastards. He thought it might be hard to look tough with Imekari holding his hand as he trailed close behind her but nope, even with 5’2” of smiley enthusiasm attached to him didn’t stop the Orlesian couple that was coming up the stairs as they were going down from screaming and turning tail to run away in their dumb, clacky shoes. Funny as shit.

They were set to meet in the open-air café just down the way, he was expecting a bit of chaos to ensue, a dwarf, a Vint, and a Qunari walk into a bar with a kid with a glowing hand. But the maître’d just bowed and said, “Ahh, welcome Lady Herald, Master Tethras, Master Pavus, Master the Iron Bull. Magister Tilani awaits.”

Damn, they thought they’d get there early and claim a spot but uh, Magister Maevaris Tilani had apparently beaten them to it in grand style. Place was empty save the host, a waiter and-

Holy shit. Holy fucking shit. Imekari stopped in her tracks the moment she laid eyes on them.

“You must be Ellie,” Maevaris spoke, before looking to her cousin, “Varric.”

“Mae Mae,” the Dwarf greeted warmly, going to where she sat to kiss her on the cheek, “causing trouble?”

“Always,” she assured, “Dorian, it’s good to see you again. You seem to be doing well for yourself.”

“Certainly,” Dorian nodded. “You look well, Maevaris, fetching as always.”

“And you,” she looked Bull up and down appreciatively, though what she said was, “my word you really are an oxman.”

Oh shit. Come on Imekari, “He’s a person,” Ellie said. Too late, she’s gonna fight her. “His name is the Iron Bull.”

“My apologies, I did not mean offense—it is merely what they are called in Tevinter.”

“Racism’s not a lovely thing to be known for, is it?”

“Is it a racist sentiment? They have horns and they are strong, both positive qualities found in Ox. He walks around calling himself a Bull.”

“The Iron Bull is his name, his chosen mode of address. Calling people animal names is a way of talking down to them and comparing them to animals and stripping them of personage. Your hair is beautiful, just like the Iron Bull’s horse, Bitsy’s mane is beautiful—you’re both strong and regal ladies, but you’d be insulted if I called you a horse.” Huh, yeah, lady was blonde like Bitsy.

“My word you are a little spark, aren’t you?”

“Kid, she really doesn’t mean anything, she’s messing with you,” Varric promised, reprimanding, “Mae Mae, knock it off. Tumbles will actually fight you.”

“Dorian tells me she’s passionate about our mutual cause, I was merely testing her ability to argue her case, seeing if she would argue it in the first place.” and when Varric sighed and shook his head, she defended, "Forgive me for being curious about the Herald of Andraste that’s got you wound so tight around her adorable little fingers—you’re right, she’s like a little doll, I could just eat her up,” the Tevinter woman enthused, and then she motioned to the empty seats around the table, “Do please have a seat. I’ve ordered something to warm us up.”

Imekari sat in the seat across from Maevaris, looking to Bull before patting the seat at her side, across from Mister Aclassi, Bull nodded to him as he sat. Varric sat alongside Maevaris.
Dorian, on Ellie’s other side across from the Dwarf.

A waiter came and dropped off mugs of…huh. Orange juice—warmed up, steaming hot with…smelled like honey, little cinnamon stick Maevaris used hers to stir her drink before sipping.

“Oh gosh, that’s good,” Ellie said after taking a sip. Seemed like a weird combo but yeah, it was pretty good, sweet, tangy, warm.

“Orlesian beverage, I can never remember the name of,” Maevaris said, “but it is delightful in this weather isn’t it? Now, tell me about yourself, young lady. Varric is complimentary of course but he has a way of telling you so much and nothing at all at the same time.”

“I get paid by the letter,” Varric shrugged.

Imekari was nervous, shy because she wasn’t quite certain what sort of information Maevaris would be interested to know about her, but she talked about her work with the Inquisition, the different lessons she had in Haven, a twenty minute rundown on Anya, a little bit about their time in the Oasis. The woman had question after question about their cause, Ellie's opinions on the Mage-Templar conflict, how she would see them reform, kid was so busy talking Bull was almost worried she wouldn’t get to eat when their food came. Decent meal, some kind of white, fluffy fish in cream sauce, and sliced up potato reassembled with cheese baked onto each slice, big helping of green beans, and Maevaris was all snark as she scooped her serving of green beans onto Varric's plate.

“My, you’re leading a rather extraordinary life right now, aren’t you?” Maevaris said as their dishes were cleared away.

Ellie nodded. "It's been pretty wild."

"Now. What interests you in this exchange?” Maevaris asked.

Imekari licked her lips as she finished a sip of her drink, setting the cup down before she said, “Your dress is just beautiful, Magister Tilani.”

That...wait...was that an answer?

“…thank you. It is Jaques Brodeur. Your ensemble is lovely as well.”

“Thanks! It only fits so well because I had it tailored—you’re familiar with Aclassi?”

“…not as a brand name. You mean as in Tonio Aclassi?”

“His son, Cremisius, actually,” Ellie smiled as she leaned forward, extending an arm out to ward the elder Aclassi who’d yet to speak a word, and now he sat staring wide eyed at the girl as she smoothed back her sleeve to show him the inside of it, bit of a trick having to read upside down since it was meant to be read by the person wearing it, but, “You’ve got this,” Tonio Aclassi read softly, the little message stitched in blue thread before meeting Ellie’s gaze. “My Cremisius did this,” he breathed, “My son is here, in Orlais?”

Ellie laid her hand over his, “Cremisius is in Ferelden, actually, with the Inquisition. He’s safe, and healthy, and happy—he has a really great life, with friends and work and everything,” she assured him. “He always tells me I’ve ‘got this’ when I’m about to do something important I’m nervous about. I told him I needed this outfit for an important meeting,” she shrugged. “He said you always liked to sew little encouraging or personal messages into the sleeves of your customer’s clothing. Cremisius has told me lots about your career as a tailor—I’ve just had a bit of a growth spurt recently so I’m rather in need of one. No offense to Cremisius, he did wonderfully with this outfit but it’s not exactly his day job right now, I’d hate to make him busier. Adjustments are nice, but I really do need all new things tailor made. I would like for that tailor to be you, Mister Aclassi.”

Ellie looked to Maevaris as she sat back, “My former tailor’s no longer feeling ‘the Maker speak inspiration’ to her, and my advisor, Lady Josephine came up with suggestions but she’s leaving it up to me, who to hire. The Inquisition will pay well—a lot more than what Mister Aclassi’s current valuation of his services is. His pay will go to House Tilani until such a time that his debts are paid off.”

“You wish for me to forgive the debt he owes directly to me for his upkeep?” Maevaris asked.

“I would appreciate it, certainly.”

“And what will happen if the Inquisition disbands before I’m paid?” she looked to the Iron Bull.

“Krem, er, Cremisius Aclassi is my Lieutenant, second in command of my Mercenary crew—the Bull’s Chargers,” he said. He'd be damned if he let the kid start splitting his paychecks between both parents though, shit. If something happened and the Inquisition busted up before Tonio paid his debts…well, maybe it was time Bull got some damn shirts. Bull’d make sure there was a place for him with the Chargers.

Gob smacked was an interesting look on the Aclassi men. “Cremisius is a Mercenary?”

“It’s rather a long story,” Ellie said, “and it should be him, that tells it to you, Mister Aclassi. But yes, he works with the Chargers, that’s how we met. The Iron Bull signed his men on to work with the Inquisition to help stop the Breach. They’ve been an amazing help—the Iron Bull travels with me when I go to close Rifts, and Cremisius has served as temporary body guard for me when I was without one for a while,” she smiled and shared with Tonio, “he saved my life—someone tried to poison me and Cremisius caught them, totally kicked their butt. He’s very strong, and brave, and handsome—gosh, he looks just like you.”

“And he’s uh, fiscally responsible guy,” Bull assured. And he felt like he should ease any worry he could, not just of Maevaris but the elder Aclassi, “Half of his pay goes to supporting his mother back in Tevinter, the rest is disposable income he saves most of, doles a little money out for things like drinks with friends, dates…birthday present for his little girlfriend.”

“He…” maybe he laid it on too thick the guy looked overwhelmed. Proud, and so relieved after years of not knowing how his family was dealing in the aftermath of his enslavement, having confirmations that they were alright, and more than that, his son was thriving. “He has a girlfriend?”
Maevaris was staring at Ellie, little Imekari was blushing, “Varric informs me you’ve recently celebrated a birthday, haven’t you, Lady Herald?”

Ellie regarded her silently for a moment before holding out her left wrist toward the center of the table pulling her sleeve back, “Cremisius got me a wrist watch for my birthday…actually he got me my birthday for my birthday really—I’d never celebrated it before and he made sure everyone worked together and threw me a really great party.” Well, if that wasn’t confirmation enough, her left sleeve had Hi, lovely. stitched inside of it.

Yeah, time to let it all sink in for him, Krem’s out here living his best life, hair game’s never been more on point, he’s got a good gig, great friends, and he’s got the Herald of Andraste pretty crazy for him.

“I trust this isn’t the result of a passing fancy?” Maevaris asked cautiously.

…he actually hadn’t thought about that. the implications of what might happen with this if things went south with Krem and boss-girl. but uh, then he realized it was because there wasn’t anything to worry about-

“I’d plans to try and help however I could to get Cremisius his father back the moment I learned he was enslaved, and that was before I knew Cremisius was interested in me. This, is completely separate from my relationship with Cremisius. I owe him so much—”she looked to Tonio, “you, Mister Aclassi, I owe you. You made and raised the most amazing, incredible, kind, compassionate, brave man I’ve ever met, and you deserve to get to see that, see the amazing life he’s made for himself. I’m just repaying my own debts, really.”

"Very well. Have your Inquisition send a contract for the exchange, Tonio's transfer to Ferelden, and my payment schedule...and Mister Aclassi will be joining your cause, no later than the end of Nubulis."

Why the fuck couldn't Vint's just say- "Drakonis..." Ellie breathed. Shit, they were in Guardian now, less than two months somehow sounded like forever but, "Thank you, Magister Maevaris."

All said and done, they had the makings of a deal, and Maevaris was sweeping away with Tonio trailing after her, though Varric, fuck, he was a good guy, he caught up with Maevaris and drew out their goodbyes, gave Ellie the chance to talk to the guy a moment.

“I haven’t…Cremisius doesn’t know yet, about all this, I want to make sure everything works out okay, before he knows, you know? But um, I just…he loves you, so so much, and he misses you, and he’s really proud that you’re his father and just…thank you” she said, hugging the man tight, “thank you for putting Cremisius first, ending things with Cornelius, keeping your family from slavery. I can never thank you enough.”

“Thank you, for everything you are doing. Keep…make sure everything is settled before you tell him, please,” Mister Aclassi said, then, “he is happy?”

“He really is. Strong and capable and safe. Drakonis will be here soon, you’ll see him and he’ll be so excited to see you. He keeps some of your things—your pocket watch, and shaving kit,” Ellie told him, smiling as she brushed her thumb along the scruffy hair along his jaw.

“I’m grateful. Hug him for me, would you?” he asked, and Ellie nodded, before the man looked to Bull, “You have been in charge of my son?”
“More like he’s in charge of me. I’m a real handful,” Bull said.

“Thank you—you seem like an honorable man. Watch out for my bello mimo.”

“You got it.”

They saw them off, safely out the gates of Val Royeaux.

“Tumbles, that went great, you did good kid,” Varric said as they made the walk back toward the Marchand’s.

“Thanks,” Ellie breathed a sigh of relief. “Drakonis. Drakonis Drakonis. Gosh that feels like tomorrow and never at the same time.”

“I feel you, boss-girl,” Bull said, carefully wrapping an arm around her shoulders, didn’t seem to hurt her, she leaned into his side and hummed appreciatively, “But we’ll have plenty to keep us busy…I mean there’s still a hole in the sky.”

“True! First though…I hope you don’t mind, you don’t all have to stick around if you’d be bored, but I’d appreciate someone staying with me?” well they sure as hell weren’t leaving her all on her own in the middle of a Gaspard-Celene warzone. “I kind of need new shoes. I love Harritt, and I’ve been trying to make these work all week, but I can’t feel my toes half the time, and when I do they hurt.”

Yeah, she needed new shoes…new everything like she said but Drakonis was still a bit of a ways off, “You need anything else while we’re out here? Nothing back in Haven’s gonna fit you well babe.”

That got him a grin, something hinting on the mischievous. “Well…actually, yeah, I’ll have Mister Aclassi make me new things. But in the meantime, Cremisius is already making adjustments to all my clothes. Something he’s doing in his spare time, and while Lady Josie’s making sure the Inquisition covers materials, he’s refusing to charge for his time, labor…since technically Cremisius was once an employee of his father’s workshop, has the skills he does to adjust my clothes because of that, and considering the fact that he’s even using designs his father created, we’re putting labor payment on the books and it’ll go straight to Maevaris when she signs his father over. It’ll help knock a chunk out of his father's debt.” She said. “I don’t like the idea, that technically he’ll be indentured to the Inquisition, but his pay will be actually existent—what would take him a decade to work off in Tevinter should only take…math hurts my brain. Less than a year, I hope. Then he’ll be able to actually be paid, keep his job with the Inquisition if he likes it, or he can do whatever he wants. He’ll be really, for real, free!”

Well damn. Alright then, “Alright boss-girl, I’m down for shoe shopping.”

“Hell yeah, Tumbles, you know we’re all about shoe shopping. You picked the shoe shopping trifecta,” Varric was on board.

“Oh, most assuredly,” Dorian agreed, “there are no others in your arsenal of companions better equipped for such a task.”

Bull snorted. “Think they’ll have anything in my size?”

They did not, but, it was pretty slim pickings anyway for just walking out the store with a new pair of shoes. Everything was custom this and that, but Imekari found a model pair of ankle boots that fit her well enough, damn good, just, new shoes needed breaking in. They were cute, and Varric found no end of amusement in the Orlesian population’s reactions to Bull following after the little Human girl running around their shops, showing him different shoes and asking him his opinion.

“-sta Fass! You insufferable charlatan, that’s ten times what you paid me for it!”

Okay…Dorian had slipped away—vendor caught his eye and he said he’d be right back, been gone for a beat though and Bull could hear him shouting. He looked to Varric and nodded in Imekari’s direction and the Dwarf stepped up and got swept up in her new mission—Operation: Marehis’s birthday present.

Some vendor across the way was hassling Dorian, Bull wasn’t sure what was up, but it sounded like he was refusing flat out, to sell him something.

“Perhaps if you introduce me to the young Herald of Andraste. She has the sort of influence I’m sure, she could get me entry to the Celestine League. Then of course I would reconsider my price point, since it is a family heirloom after all.”

“I’ll do nothing of the sort,” Dorian seethed, turning to storm away though he missed punk ass merchant’s jaw drop, and got stopped because he just ended up turning directly into Bull’s chest. This stupid mother fucker.

“You’ve got about ten seconds to fix whatever this is before I ruin your whole damn day.”

The guys mouth worked like he’d never used words before but when Dorian turned to face him again he cleared his throat and said, “D-d-double what I p-paid.”

Bull let out a growl. “Half it.”

“Deal!”

Dorian handed over…shit, just a silver, and what he got was defiantly worth more than that. He’d pawned it or something it sounded like, was getting it back—this asswipe gave him a fucking silver for this big ass gold medallion?

“I was handling that you know,” Dorian snapped at him as he stormed off, Bull following after, guy wasn’t walking back toward where they left the others though, just stomping across the bazaar, toward the café.

“You were walking away, I just gave you some backup, what’s the big deal? Where are you even going?”

“Away from you, you- horrible, nosy, insufferable lout!”

“Hey, what the fuck, why’re you pissed?” Bull caught up to him, grabbing his shoulder so he’d stop and turn to face him—whirled around real fast, huh, guy could use a cape for all his dramatic flair.

“I-! I don’t know,” he said, then frustrated with himself he shook his head, “No, no, I do know—I wanted to handle that on my own, it was my problem, not yours! I’m…I don’t need someone else coming in and fixing everything for me, I’ll not be some dependent, shrieking violet!”

“Pretty sure you mean ‘shrinking’, and you are shrieking, Sparky,” Bull said levelly, “Look, I didn’t mean to overstep. Guy was giving you a hard time, rubbed me the wrong damn way, and then he had to go try pulling Imekari into it. You did good, walking away when he made that demand, you deserve whatever that is,” he looked to the medallion clutched in Dorian’s grasp, “just for looking out, not using your connections to the Herald for your own selfish shit.”

Dorian sighed. “It’s done…thank you. I do appreciate having this back.”

“Mind if I ask what it is?”

“It…is my heraldry. Proof of my claim as a member of House Pavus. I was not exactly flush with funds when I made my way to the Venatori base in Orlais, I had to pawn it off, to that lovely gentleman. I…I don’t even know why I want it, just-“

“Hey, it’s your name. It is what you make of it, whatever shit’s attached to it doesn’t matter when it comes to you and what you do while bearing that title. You want your claim to it? That’s not unreasonable,” Bull said. The guy huffed and then his arms were around Bull’s neck, pulling him into a very warm…very public kiss—he was pretty sure someone dropped their shopping bags, women shrieking, babies crying, they were causing all kinds of mayhem in Val Royeaux. Eh, whatever. “Dorian Pavus is out here doing some pretty great things.”

That got him a rich smile that…alright, he wasn’t mad he put it there. “And if you’re lucky, you’ll continue to be one of them.”

He was so fucked.

They regrouped, and Imekari was ecstatic over her shopping successes. They made it back in time for dinner, Sera and Solas had taken charge of the meal and-

Ellie gasped when they entered the kitchen, “Vivienne!”

Madam de Fer was sitting at the kitchen table, supervising the cooking underway but she rose immediately, eyes widening as she took in sight of the kid, “Eleanor, oh my dear girl look at you! You’ve grown so much, and your hair, I must say it’s rather inspired,” she complimented as she came and swept Imekari up in a hug.

“Thanks! I grew two and one-fourth inches!” she enthused, oh yeah, the 1/4th inch mattered, counted, she was damn proud of it, “And the Oasis was hot and humid, and I just couldn’t ‘hair’ there, you know?”

“Oh most certainly,” Vivienne said, pulling back, she raised a hand to cup the kid’s face, “darling, Sera and Solas tell me you were injured, are you quite recovered now?”

Imekari nodded. “Uh huh, everyone’s been such a great help, I’m feeling better all the time.”

Madam de Fer tsked, “Poor thing, I’m so grateful you’re alright. Well, come, sit my dear, you’re to tell me all about your adventures while I’ve been away, over dinner.”

Ellie smiled. “We’ll catch up! How’s Duke Bastien? Did you have a nice visit?”

“He is well. I caught him up on all our wonderful little adventures. Thank you, darling, for asking. Now, what was the Temple like?”

It was late when Bull knocked on Imekari’s door. Sera was off somewhere…real buddy buddy with Solas lately, always working on one thing or another. Ellie’s voice called him in and he found her sitting up in bed, setting aside the copy of the Chant Red’d given her for her Birthday.
“Hiya the Iron Bull, what’s up?”

“Nothing much uh just…” he really wasn’t sure he should do this, but damn if she didn’t deserve it, at least if she wanted. “Imekari, you’ve done great things, since you’ve joined the Inquisition. Accomplished a lot. You’ve proven your strength, pushed through a lot of pain, and you’ve had the back of every person in your camp all the way. Reminds me of me, when I was sent out from Par Vollen, traveling the Free Marches, building my crew. When I figured myself out, became the Iron Bull, I got a little blasphemous*, marked the occasion literally. Thought I might offer you the same,” he set the little kit he wrote Stitches to send his way, from his things in Haven, down onto the bed. “Open it. You don’t have to say yes—hell, you don’t even have to decide right now just, know the offer’s on the table, and you can holler at me anytime you feel like taking me up on it.”

“Oh my gosh…” Ellie breathed as she opened up the box, taking in the tools, and then she smiled, “Really?”

“Really.”

“…I’m totally taking you up on this but you do realize…I’m pretty sure Cassandra and Marehis will murder us.”

“Oh definitely. B-Quad?” Bull asked as he held out his ringed pinkie finger.

Worked even better since Imekari hadn’t taken her jewelry off for the day yet, still had her pinkie ring on, “B-Quad!”

Oh man he was so dead. But it turned out sweet, Imekari was pleased and excited though uh,

Madam de Fer came bursting into the room just as Bull was gathering up his things, a missive in her hand as she announced, “Eleanor, there is an emergency in the Fallow Mire, Commander Cullen’s men have gone missing, Lord Berand and his men haven’t reported in either and Scout Harding has sent for you—” she stopped as soon as she looked at the kid, “Eleanor what in heaven’s name is that, behind your ear?!”

“Oh! Viv tits, did you tell her Lace-“ Sera was saying as she slid into the room after Vivienne and she stopped to stare before grinning like mad and cackling up a storm, “Inky got inked!”

“Today’s the day right? You get to go home?”

Oh, Elgar’nan yes, she did indeed. Marehis had never felt quite so very excited while washing dishes before, but each dish washed was another moment passed that drew her closer and closer to her departure. She missed everyone so terribly—it was such a blessing, Sera’s scheme, using Thegans to pass along the steady confirmation that all was well.

“I do,” she replied quietly as she passed him a dish to dry.
“Are you excited to see your daughter again—Liana right?”

Marehis smiled, her heart felt full just thinking of it. Using Ellie’s middle name allowed her freedom to talk of the girl, like a separate person from the Herald of Andraste. Only Thegan knew Marehis was in the Inquisition, she found him trustworthy enough to divulge that much to. And the young man had been rather helpful, kept watch himself, passed along anything he saw that might be of interest to Marehis’s investigation. “Yes, she’s traveling right now but I hope to catch up with her soon enough.” She’d have things waiting for her at the dead drop, payment for her work, a debrief on Ellie’s current location and mission.

“She works with you, in the Inquisition?”

“She does.”

He nodded. “Badassery runs in the family I guess. You guys ever met the Herald of Andraste?”

“We work together occasionally,” Marehis allowed.

“Ellie or uh, dunno, Eleanor? I saw her at a party of Madam de Fers last year, filled in for Krissy down in housekeeping. Think you could tell her ‘hey you’ for me? It’s a Marcher thing, show of appreciation for her representing us and all.”

A strange request, but benign. And the Dalish man was from the Free Marches, a city Elf like Marehis. She couldn’t think of how it might be a threat or some mode of flirtation even, not with the way the young man was in constant pursuit of the gardener, William. “I’ll pass it along, if I get the chance.”

Though that chance was frustratingly out of reach. When she was safely away from the Marquis estate, reached the dead drop, she got the news of the situation in the Fallow Mire. Ellie and her party were already on their way, and so, Marehis followed after, hoping to catch up as soon as possible.

It was quite the wave of emotions, having so much mail waiting for her, Leliana passed it along now that Marehis was out, on the road. Ellie had sent her nearly a dozen precious little notes, reporting positive progress they’d made in their time apart—things such as Cremisius drew me a picture of Anya! It’s just the cutest! and, Marehis, the nugs are sooo adorable! We took a day off for vacation! Sera and I played in the water like, all day, it was just the best! We made fizzy lemonade again! I missed you lots though—maybe we can come back to the Oasis sometime together! Oh, that would be so much fun, perhaps they could take a proper vacation sometime. And then there was In Val Royeaux now! I miss you! I met Varric’s cousin today—we went to lunch and she introduced me to this drink, it’s super super good, it’s like, oranges and cinnamon and honey? Just yum! It’s served toasty warm! Have you ever tried that? I’ll make us some when we’re home! <3 And I got new shoes! The Iron Bull and Dorian and Varric took me shoe shopping! It sounded like quite the time.

And then there were missives from Solas. One wishing her well, a sort of ‘welcome back’ he had waiting for her to read when she was finished with her mission. The other, read more like a report that laid out some horrific accident Ellie had been in, Elgar’nan the girl had fallen off a story high scaffolding rig, and then plummeted into a mine.

They’d searched, scouted out the Oasis as thoroughly as they could but moving beyond the Temple, exploring the caverns, there were drops and turns and dark places. Finding Rifts topside had been easy enough they were in plain view and dangerous to get too close to, not when they could not be closed—you ran the risk of being overpowered by the constant barrage of demons. It was...frustrating beyond belief and it felt like a failure on her part. And she wished more than anything she’d been there, in the Oasis, to help her girls.

But her work was necessary, spying upon Gaspard’s ally had given way to Leliana now knowing his next moves, in regard to how he would deal with Ellie and the Inquisition. Too, she’d found evidence—proof positive that the Trevelyans had conspired with Gaspard to end Ellie’s life, though the duke had perceived it as a plot to mildly poison the girl. He’d been under the impression she would suffer Blood Lotus hallucinations, be made ill for a day or so—the Trevelyans knew otherwise, that she could very well have perished from their ploy. Reckless, the Duke…was reconsidering his stance with the Inquisition. He’d been ramping down his threats—from his first attempt to flat out murder Ellie, to his most recent threat which was, to his mind, a harmless warning not to trifle with him. He was planning to offer some form of peace, a truce of sorts, try to gain Ellie’s confidence now that the Inquisition was becoming such a force to be reckoned with, given they had now the support of both Mages and Templars alike, backing from the Chantry. He saw her as an opportunity—if he could sway her to find favor with him, over Celene, there was no telling what influence she could bring to bear for him. An interesting development, Marehis thought—if nothing else, perhaps it was an opportunity they sorely needed. The Advisors were uncertain just how they would get members of the Inquisition into Empress Celene’s upcoming peacetalks, a ball thrown in her Winter Palace where Ellie’s adventures in the future confirmed Empress Celene would be killed. Perhaps Gaspard could be made aware of their interest and see it as his chance to garner Ellie’s favor.

Needless to say, she was relieved to read Solas’s report in full—by the time he wrote to her on the subject, it was after Ellie was recovered enough to face the Rifts properly and seal them with success. It had been bad, and Sera had been injured as well though he did not go into much detail—just assured Marehis that despite the danger, Ellie had not been alone, Sera had been diligent, brave, gone to Ellie’s aid immediately and been a miraculous help. All Father guard and bless that girl all the days of her life, may the Dread Wolf never cross her path or speak in her ear.

And bless Seeker Pentaghast. Oh, she’d missed the Nevarran woman—they crossed paths just south of Haven, both on their way to meet Ellie and her party.

“Marehis! Oh, thank the Maker you’re here, you’re well I trust? How was your work in Orlais?” Cassandra asked in greeting when Marehis joined her, riding alongside the Seeker along the path to the Fallow Mire. The Seeker looked to the steed Marehis was astride. “Is…that one of Master Dennet’s horses?”

“It is…a horse. That will be living with Master Dennet’s horses now. His name is Phillip and he was liberated from a work farm in the south of Orlais.”

“Marehis,” Cassandra laughed out in gentle reprimand.

“We’ve a need for speed,” Marehis offered. Oh Ellie would so love that turn of phrase-

“Very ‘rhyme-y’, Eleanor would certainly approve.”

“Have you heard from her? How is she? Solas informed me of her fall.”

“Sera wrote to me—do try to be an encouragement to her if she speaks of it, Maker, the girl was beside herself. Ellie is well, she wrote to me on her way to Val Royeaux.”

Ellie was well. Well and...goodness it felt like Ages since they last saw each other, pronounced even more so by just- she was taller! And her beautiful hair—it was still lovely but heavens, her hair was gone! She bore bandaging just behind her ear, was she still recovering from some injury? Oh, there was a little scar across her lip, where it’d been split, lips that a sigh escaped from as news came in she was expected to fight some Avaar leader in exchange for the hostages they’d made of Lord Berand and his men, of Inquisition soldiers.

“Well, shit.” She shrugged. “Guess we’ll have to go kick Avaar butt. Varric—start the books, twenty coppers say he wipes the floor with me.”

“Woah woah woah boss girl,” the Iron Bull spoke up, Marehis thought he would reprimand her self-defeatist attitude but, “bet with silver or go home. Coppers? Please.”

“Fine, five silver!”

“Tumbles, if you win that bet you won’t exactly be able to cash in on the reward,” Varric said.

“Yeah but it’d be weird to bet on myself, like, ego much? And I’m just not as young and spry as I used to be. It’s okay—remember me as I was: Cold and distant in my final hours, not unlike the harsh embrace of death.”

“Da’vehnan…” Solas ventured, “are we perhaps suffering such dramatics because we’ve held off on lunch for so long it is now dinner hour?”

“Probably, my brains kind of swimmy right now. I’m either high on swamp fumes or hungry…possibly both.”

“Eleanor, come,” Cassandra intoned, reaching out and beckoning the girl, pulling her close to her side, “let us sit and regroup.”

“Come on old man,” the Iron Bull said, elbowing Rainier’s shoulder, “let’s get some grub worked up.”

Oh, the girl was finding some difficulty moving, stiff and sore as she moved to sit around the campfire with Cassandra, Marehis coming to sit at her side. “Are you in pain, da’vehnan?”

“Just getting stronger, soon I’ll be able to arm wrestle the Iron Bull with only my pinkie finger.”

“No more teaching Inky weirdy Qun sayings!” Sera snapped at Bull as she plopped down at Rainier’s side and took up the role of sous-chef.

“Pain is just weakness leaving the body,” the Iron Bull offered up with a shrug at Marehis’s questioning stare.

“Do you want potion, sweet gir-“ Marehis was offering but… “da’vehnan?” she raised a hand to rub circles on the girl’s back, her head was bowed, eyes closed like perhaps she’d fallen asleep?

“Eleanor?” Cassandra questioned.

“She’s in the Fade right now,” Cole announced as he appeared, materializing seated on the ground before Ellie, facing the girl. Elgar’nan! The boy needed a bell, “So many people think that, but no one has given me one. We should eat, prepare ourselves, but we need to move forward, get to the Avvar before they hurt our people—Ellie is looking, she didn’t mean to start without warning anyone, but she really is tired, her brain keeps skipping steps, forgetting she’s left things
“We get back to Haven, Imekari’s taking a damn break,” the Iron Bull said, “Seriously, let the kid just sleep and eat and veg for a few days—I see her set foot in the War Room or down on the practice field, I will start a mutiny. We’ve had nothing but long riding days since the Oasis and I think we’re passing burnt out with her.”

“She walked around our campsite for fifteen minutes yesterday morning looking for the shoes on her feet,” Dorian lamented. “—we let her, too. It was the closest thing to a break she’s taken since word came from the Mire. Dreadful place, this. The weather is horrific, and the neighbors are rude.”

“The Avvar are bastards,” Marehis agreed wholeheartedly.

“I believe he’s referring to the undead,” Vivienne said.

“Keep an eye out,” Varric cautioned, “a few come crawling up out of the swamp every few hours, assholes.”

“I’m never gonna be able to sleep here,” Sera complained, “what if swamp zombies sneak up on us and try to eat my brains?”

Solas rested a hand on her shoulder, “We will sleep in shifts, da’vehnan, do not worry, your brains are safe.”

“Kay…you’d let them eat your brains first right?”

“Oh most certainly—I’ve not even a strand of hair to defend myself, I’m likely the easiest target.”

“Wear your hat you baldy git! Din’an Heem!” given the context, you’ll catch your death, she assured him, shoving his shoulder gently, earning his laughter before he rose up onto his feet and came to sit at Marehis’s side, he offered her a little wink before whipping his hat out of his vest pocket and pulling it on over his head.

“How are you, vehnan?” he asked as he wrapped an arm around her shoulders, pulling him against his side, pressing a kiss to her hair.

“I’m well, you emma lath?”

“Pleased you’ve returned. You’ve been well missed,” he said.

“Missed the hell out of you too Seeker,” Varric called, “don’t get me wrong, we had lots of fun with the kid, but I invest in condoms for a reason. Varric Tetrhas was not made to parent.”

“Who the frig you need to use condoms for, Dwarfy, Bianca?” Sera teased Varric winked, “Just don’ttell her husband.”

“Ruddy weird!”

Cassandra shook her head. “Eleanor is whole, you’ve done well to protect her. All of you.”

Ellie was quiet, contemplative when she roused, nodding her thanks to Marehis when the woman handed her a bowl of stew. Everyone seemed ravenous, ate eagerly until the pot was empty.
“There’s a path through the Mire,” Ellie spoke up. “A place we can make camp about half way through but…it’s going to be dangerous.”

“We got you, Imekari, just lay it down for us, what’s our play?” Bull asked.

This path through the Mire was marked with Beacons. Places where Veilfire could be lit but doing so summoned demons that called upon mass reinforcements of undead from the surrounding area…which was apparently the goal. Slay the demons, the undead fall fully-dead, and the area is secured. Working together, all their allies united, it was quick enough work, dangerous, but doable.

And the moment they were in an appropriate place to set up camp, they assembled their tent and gathered in the warm reprieve from the cold, soaking rain.

Their Mages worked together to help get everyone dried off and then it was very much so time for rest.

“I’ll take first watch,” Bull volunteered.

“I’m with you,” Thom agreed.

The Iron Bull nodded before making the half knee-walking, half crawl to Ellie, sitting before her where she sat in her bedroll and taking her hands in his. “Imekari. Deep breath in…deep breath out. Relax your mind, focus on good thoughts, and get some rest. We can only help if we’re able to help—part of that is being at our best.”

Ellie nodded. “Be safe during watch.”

It was pure relief to be back sleeping soundly in Solas’s arms, Ellie tucked up against her, Sera snoring softly against the younger girl’s ear. They were warm, and safe, and they would handle whatever came with the morning.

A ‘Skywatcher’ came with the morning. After breakfast, they journeyed onward down the path and came across a large Avvar man, Amund, who was studying the most bizarre Rift they’d seen. It…she could see it, feel the hairs on the back of her neck stand on end the way they did when such a thing was near, but it was like a thin crack in the sky as opposed to a full-blown tear that demons could pour out of.

Because it was dormant, but it may well not be so for long. Amund did not attack them, let them be about their business, and Solas encouraged Ellie to manipulate the Rift if she was of a mind to—go ahead and let it tear open so it could be dealt with and sealed entirely.

This Skywatcher was amicable enough, gruff, but he did confirm their soldiers wellbeing—that they fought well, were alive in their captivity. He was rather moved by Ellie’s sealing the Rift that marred the sky—he believed she was sent to heal his deity.

"I'm talking about the Lady of the Skies. Do you not know her?” he asked Ellie, “Can't you see the warnings she writes through the bird flocks in the air?"

"Preposterous superstition,” Madam de Fer huffed.

"Preposterous is what you wore to a bog, Orlesian.”

“Skywatchers serve their tea scalding.” Dorian commented quietly to the Iron Bull.

“He doesn’t have any tea,” Cole whispered to the Human man.
The Iron Bull patted the Spirit on the shoulder. “No he doesn’t buddy, ‘cause he just served it.”

When at last the final Beacon was lit and dealt with, they were pleased to say they had a clear shot back out of the bog—no more undead would come to shore.

At least—the way behind them, was clear.

“There are too many of them!” Cassandra called out, strong and clear, “To the gate, run!”

Elgar’nan their numbers seemed endless but their troupe managed to race their way past the gate, and with Sera’s agreement, the Iron Bull launched the Elf girl upward, to catch the railing of the highest most part of the ramp overhead that she could pull herself over while the others distracted any assailants on the wooden structure that led to the gate controls, keep them from targeting Sera as she got to the controls and slammed the gate shut behind them, cutting off their undead enemies access.

“Cripes,” Sera breathed a sigh of relief as she leaned against the control. Though she cackled at the declaration of,

“Son…of three…entire bitches!” Ellie rasped out as she caught her breath, “So many corpses!”

“Take a breather Imekari,” the Iron Bull said, carefully massaging at the back of Ellie’s neck, concerned. The Fallow Mire was horrible, and they’d found signs of plague, it was like some horrendous, cocktail of disease waiting to befall them all—rain and cold and deceased rising up from their watery graves, abandoned as they’d been inflicted with contagion. Ellie had to cough to clear her lungs and still there was the low rattle in her breathing that ticked at Marehis’s worries. “We should regroup. Sit tight a minute.”

Ellie nodded, and Sera had been working with the lock on the door near the gate controls—she pushed open the door. “Ink, come explore a bit, cover over here.”

It was nice to take a beat from the endless rain. And the room produced a tome that may be of interest to the Wardens, the Inquisition was still collecting and returning any such item to the Warden’s headquarters.

They took account for potions, hydrated and made certain everyone was still alright, uninjured before they made the final push into the heart of the Avaar fortress.

The Hand of Koth was the single most obnoxious person being Marehis ever had the pleasure of bringing to demise. He was larger than the Iron Bull, and sought a fight with the young Herald of Andraste, a Human girl the size of the ridiculous battle axe he fought with—and in the end he did so with the assistance of his syncophants! He’d challenged Ellie to a fight, one she had to fight just to get to, and while they certainly had no intention of having the girl face off on her own against the man, it…just seemed entirely incredulous that after all his boasting and bragging, he was a pathetic, little man, hiding behind the security his father’s army gave him.

Ultimately, he, and his men, lay dead. Cole was of use, knowing precisely where on the large man his key was hidden, and he handed it to Ellie.

Their soldiers and Lord Berand, his men, were all safe, and accounted for to Marehis’s eye as Ellie pushed open the door. The human Lord looked up from where he sat with his back to the wall, seeming in prayer, and he smiled gratefully,
“Lady Herald.”

“Is everyone alright? Is anyone injured or sick?”

“Few minor injuries—” the words no sooner left his mouth than Ellie was passing around Elf Root tonic from her stores, for any who might need it. “Thank you, my lady, we’ll head back on our own from here. The Avvar are dead?”

“Yup, coast should be clear…mostly, there was a bit of an undead situation by the gate. We’ll go check on it, and see where to move on from there,” she assured, addressing their numbers, “You’re all getting out of here, alright? Patch up, and go at your own pace, we’ve a camp established nearer by where you can rest and eat. Good work out here, everyone, you were all very brave, and I’m proud of you,” she told them, before nodding to Lord Berand and taking her leave—Rainier found another Warden Artifact he wanted her approval on to move, it would be rather the trick, they were large, abandoned banners.

“I can’t believe she came,” one of their Inquisition soldier’s breathed.

Lord Berand huffed lightly, amused. “Told you she would.”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish
Then—awake, alert
Bellanaris—always
In’Garas—mix of 'to dwell' and 'come', "welcome"
Ir abelas—I’m sorry
Emma’asha—my girl
Emma lath—my love
Basra=Non-Qunari

*This is a reference to an in game scenario where Sera claims to fill a practice dummy with bees and everyone is like "wtf how'd you do that?" and she's like "?!?!? dunno? piss off?" there's all kinds of implications that Solas believes Sera has untapped magic and a connection to the Fade, and implications of her Fade sensitivity in game so, here ya go.

*Then Shiral—as in the Dalish word "then" Solas is wishing her 'diligent travels'

*Reference to the Antivan bar mentioned way back in chapter one Ellie pov.

*While Solas’s disdain for tea is a tip of the hat to his writer, Patrick Weekes’s hatred of tea, it's also canon that stimulates like caffeine keep Mages out of the Fade when they sleep.

*Electromagnetic Induction—So so so not a scientist this is all just playing with what little I know and pretending it would work! The idea comes from induction cook tops—you metal pan heats up and can cook whatever's inside, but if you were to place your hand directly onto the cook top, it wouldn't burn you, it requires a conductive metal to create heat.
Sera has a variety of nicknames she can give a romanced Inquisitor, Cole provides explanation for them, I felt Teetness was best fitting for Lace, and I figure she'd get a nickname since Dagna gets 'Widdle'

The Miner in the Oasis like, always asks why you're following her...when you literally just walk up on her and I think it's absolutely hilarious.

Playthrough tip, if you have a character with a staff or bow, you can stand outside the third room and fight, the Reverent and corpses can be hit from there, through the door and you'll usually be out of range of the Reverent's grabby hand.

this is inspired by my first time completing Rifts High and Low, I was doing a Rogue playthrough and up on the scaffolding shooting down to stay out of range of the Despair demons, and I accidentally hit my 'shooting and backflipping' button that launched my character backward, and her ass ended up falling right into the mine. Only she died because they're cowards who give us fall damage. Anyway, to recreate this with a Mage character I changed the configuration of what attacks you from the High Rift, hence shades and Terrors instead of just Despair demons with a few wraiths.

*Drakonis is March...which is a bit of a pun, you'll see*

According to canon lore, Qunari don't do tattoos—all of their markings are warpaint. However, my brain is dumb and got fanon and canon mixed up, I've seen so many edits of Bull with tats that I've already described him with tattoos under his harness, SO, I reason it with Bull being so 'worldly' as the Ben Hessrath are legit concerned he might be, which is ultimately why he has the assignment he does, he's good at blending in socially with the rest of the world once they get past the horns and the whole being the size of three Vints in a trenchcoat.

UPDATE: Next chapter titled and mapped. "To the Breach" ETA 2/16
To the Breach

Chapter Summary

Coughs and colds, a little family drama. Returning to Haven and recuperating before at last, handling the Breach!

We are, at last, in our last Chapter of Haven. Sorry.

Chapter Notes

Thanks so much to everyone reading! I appreciate all the Kudos and comments! I hope you enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was relief to have their people secure, hostage situations were tenuous and Cassandra disliked Eleanor having to take charge of such a thing. Cullen had been absolutely nerve wracked over the entire affair, and Cassandra was admittedly excited to share the news, send word that it was handled, their people safe, and their party would be returning to Haven forthwith. Too, another bit of fortune from the situation, was that they found yet another agent for their cause, in the Skywatcher.

The great bear of a man was waiting for them when they stepped foot out of the fallen Hand of Koth's throne chamber, and he had apparently cleared the throng of undead that bombarded them at the gate. He knelt before Eleanor and offered her his allegiance to their cause...he would be of some use to Lady Josephine, work as one of her many connections for peace talks, relations with the Avvar to keep from further conflict in future. Eleanor smiled, she did not shake his hand, but she did dip to bow respectfully in thanks, before they parted ways—his first act of service would be to assist with their soldiers and their making way from the Fallow Mire once they were recovered.

"Well done," Cassandra said, breathing a sigh of relief as she moved to wrap an arm around Eleanor as they descended the stairs from the Avvar fortress, and it...it shouldn't have felt so much like a slap when the girl ducked away, sped her pace down the steps to avoid Cassandra's hold. Had she done something? "Eleanor?"

The girl stopped at the bottom of the stairs and turned to face her party, "Sorry, sorry," she apologized unmarked hand raised to rub at her temple, "but um, I'm definitely not feeling too great, and I'm running a fever. I don't- if it's contagious, I'd hate to get you guys sick."

Cassandra's stomach plummeted and she nearly reached out to verify the girl's ailment but she did appear flushed, and weary, unsteady on her feet.

Cole was fast to Eleanor's side, "I can't get sick, Ellie, I can help, let me. Here," he said, turning his back to her and kneeling, and with some small hesitation he removed his hat. Eleanor's mouth opened to protest but, "I can do it, it's okay," the Spirit assured kindly, and the girl thanked him as she climbed onto his back, arms around his neck and ducking her head to rest against his shoulder, he was able to put his hat back on and the massive bit of headgear did do well to shield Eleanor's head from the downpour. The boy hoisted her up with ease Cassandra hadn't been expecting of the slight Rogue, but carried her securely, there was no fear of him dropping the girl.

Sera groaned, distraught that Eleanor was poorly, "I'll cuddle-walk with you 'sandra," she said as she came and hugged the woman's arm to herself.

Cuddle-walking indeed...well, it certainly was a bit of comfort. Oh, she had missed Sera in her absence. And there was the added benefit that the girl could hear so well, speak against Cassandra's ear relaying Solas's quiet reporting as their group had a bit of a conference as they began their journey back across the Mire. It was best to get out of the horrid place as soon as possible, delaying here further, trying to have Eleanor recuperate in the very environment that made her ill was ill advised.

So they set a steady pace, Eleanor croaked out question as to where they were going as they passed their infiltration camp.

"Ink, shh, don't- just be sleepy okay?" Sera requested. "We'll be to Russel soon."

"Mmkay." Maker, she had to cough, a horrible hacking sound that tore at her throat.

Cole rode in the saddle with Eleanor, Sera riding with Cassandra as they made their way north, putting some distance between themselves and the Mire until they got out of bounds of the never-ending rainfall, found a suitable place to stop and make camp. Eleanor looked wholly miserable.

"What is it you feel, darling? We should consult Adan," Madam de Fer fretted.

Sera pulled the scarf Eleanor had made for her out of the safety of her pack and wrapped it so it looped around her neck and the lower half of her face, like a makeshift medical mask so the girl would not refuse her, going to Eleanor as soon as she was out of Russel's saddle, she'd practically fallen from it and Sera was quick to brace the girl. "Shh Ink, you're okay. Baldy, you do your bond thing and get Adan what he needs. Cole, make with the steamy stuff yeah? Ink's lungs is starting to get clogged up sounding." Oh, it was heartening to have a glimpse of the care they'd entrusted Eleanor to, Sera taking charge, supporting the girl's weight as she led her to sit where a fire was being constructed. Varric was already taking Eleanor's things into the tent to prepare her bedroll, Dorian was rifling through their supplies in search for extra blankets before he dug into his own pack and pulled out a clean pair of thick woolen socks for Eleanor to borrow if she liked, for extra comfort, warmth. Thom set about getting some warm tea brewing while the Iron Bull took a seat near Eleanor launching into a humorous anecdote from when he was 'Imekari' and misbehaved during a meal, got creative with his interpretation of the Tammassran’s orders to eat his vegetables—an offer of something Eleanor would find precious and fun while she sat holding a cloth steaming with Embrium tincture that Solas helped Cole produce for her to her face to breathe through.

Cassandra waited until the girl was finished with her tea before she spoke, "Do you wish to clean up, Eleanor? It would be best to do so before you lay down."

She nodded, oh the girl was exhausted, and Cassandra was grateful she seemed to have forgotten her resolve to keep at distance from her party members as she allowed Cassandra to help her, wrap an arm around her shoulders and walk with her to the stream. While yes, it would not be ideal to have contagion spread...oh Cassandra did not rightly care insofar as she herself was concerned. Solas had let Cassandra lay eyes on his report to Adan before sending it off, it sounded like a cold, if it were viral, it would not be so debilitating to the Seeker that she would regret being of assistance to Eleanor.

Marehis joined them, the women helping Eleanor strip off her armor, Cassandra almost didn’t realize she’d reached out to touch the long line that slashed from just under the left portion of her collar bone to wrap around her shoulder, a shorter mark on her bicep, and a third low on her ribcage, all drawn there by the talon of a Terror’s hand.

“I think they’re healed up good,” Eleanor offered, sniffing with congestion, “they don’t hurt anymore.”

“I’m pleased to hear that,” Cassandra said, truly she was. and it seemed…Eleanor did not shy away, she did not seem ill at ease or discontented with the possibility these marks may linger still, perhaps be scars to stay.

“Let’s get you cleaned up, sweet girl,” Marehis said, her voice tight in her throat. They took the opportunity to wash up themselves, assisting Eleanor, though when it came to the bandaging behind her ear she did not wish to clean whatever was under it just yet—the Iron Bull had taken to changing it apparently. Some benefit to her hair being so much shorter came in that it was easier to clean, and Marehis did seem to delight in indulging the girl with a bit of a scalp massage as she took up the task. Though it did turn out to be some small manipulation—the Elf woman lulling Eleanor into relaxation before voicing Cassandra’s shared concern, gently probing to be certain Eleanor did not find her appearance wanting due to her latest additions. Cassandra was nervous when Eleanor heard the question and raised a hand to trace along the scar across her lip. But then she smiled and said,

“I think they make me look kind of like Cassandra, and she’s beautiful!”

And blushing, and entirely honored. Too…she’d quietly felt the pang of disdain for her facial scars, when she first acquired them. The symptom of shame that came from being taught they were a mark to her beauty, and while she’d never entirely adhered to such standards…there was some measure of something ingrained in her younger self that beauty and worth went hand in hand. She could still remember how absolutely mortified—to the extent she’d sought a good cry over the matter, hiding under the comfort of her bedding—one day in Chantry when one of her aunts took sight of her face during what was meant to be an encouraging moment of fellowship. The Chantry Mothers had instructed the congregation to greet one another and wish them well—her aunt had taken it as opportunity to inform her, very loudly for all around them to hear, that Cassandra looked ‘just dreadful’ and she was certain there must be a cream that would ‘fix that horrible thing’ on her face. Now…she was rather glad of it, it felt like vindication for young Cassandra, she might not have felt so ashamed if she knew one day there would be a young girl who found no fault in her appearance because she’d found a positive example in her.

She had also found positive example in the Iron Bull, apparently.

“Don’t uh…just remember, you’re the ones that left her with us-” Bull started when he let Eleanor into his lap so he could make with changing her bandaging.

“With you,” Madam de Fer seethed over Dorian’s chortling at the Qunari’s expense.

“With me. If you’re gonna be mad, be mad at me. Imekari was down with it, turned out damn sweet and she likes it.”

“She does!” Eleanor confirmed. “Don’t be mad at the Iron Bull either—he offered, and I accepted because I wanted to. I love it!”
And that was the only reason...well one of the reasons—the girl was ill they were hardly going to rail at her when she should be resting...that they did not begin shouting at the Iron Bull. Even though he’d-! The Qunari had marked her! Given her a tattoo! To commemorate her growth and strength or some such nonsense—!

Ugh. It was not nonsense, not entirely. And it was admittedly...fitting. The Iron Bull had tattooed the Inquisition’s sigil—the sword derived from the constellation Visus*, and the all-seeing eye, the symbols that split to represent the Seeker and Templar orders. All in all it was beautifully done.

After consulting with Adan, the healer was certain that the girl had in fact developed a cold, verging so very close to respiratory illness in the girl. After weeks of hard, tireless travel after being so seriously injured in the Oasis, she’d hardly been afforded opportunity to fully heal, and then the barrage of horrible cold and rain in the Fallow Mire, it worked together to wear her down and leave her bedridden by a cold. Most fortunately, it was not the viral sort. Though it did claim one victim more.

"Hanging in there Sparky?" The Iron Bull sounded somehow concerned and amused all at once. He was seated alongside their poorly party members in the warmth of Madam de Fer's tent. The Human man was making quite the spectacle of himself, sprawled out with Eleanor, complaining of his every angst with fervor. It was rather a stark contrast, Eleanor was quiet, insisted she would be alright when she was capable of speech, apologetic when her hacking, liquid clogged coughing startled or woke her companions, whereas,

"I hate you. I am dying, you brute," one would certainly think so. "And here you mock me! I can’t breathe!"

"Sure are talking an awful lot for someone who can’t breathe."

"I'm sorry you don't feel good," Eleanor consoled him sleepily as she turned in her bed roll and settled against the ailing Tevinter. "Get lots of rest, okay? I hope you feel better soon, being sick isn't fun."

The man nodded and he did seem to deflate, albeit chagrined that the girl sought to comfort him while she was ill as well, "I suppose we're due a nap. Are you comfortable, Ellie?" he asked as he held her closer, the girl's head resting on his chest, the girl hummed contentedly. And it turned out his demanding demeanor was beneficial to the girl—while she would not always ask for what she needed, he had no problem being a voice for them, for days the Tevinter could be heard complaining loudly whenever he or Eleanor needed tissues or soup or something to drink—it certainly saved the girl’s voice and allowed her to rest and focus on the next breath. His voice was soothing when he asked Eleanor quiet yes or no questions, and then he would bark orders at the rest of the party.

They held their camp as travel was out of the question. Marehis was beside herself, constantly the woman sought to be at Eleanor's side such to the point she did not sleep at all the first night in camp. The woman had training, she could remain fully operational without rest or sustenance, but neither was it necessary she do so now. She'd anxieties, the potent fear that while she sleeps, Eleanor may stop breathing.

The second night, when she seemed she might continue her vigil, Solas saw fit to assure, "Vehnan, Cole doesn't sleep, he can be of assistance—wake us if need be—and he is monitoring her constantly," Cassandra heard Solas speaking softly to Marehis as they settled in for the evening. "You must rest."
"I do appreciate Cole's abilities and diligence," was all Marehis offered in response.

"Emma lath, do you trust me?"

"Of course."

"I will be monitoring Eleanor myself in the Fade, my body will be here resting, but I will be seated at her side, keeping watch. If her body enters distress, I will wake."

That seemed to placate the Elf woman. All fell into restful sleep.

Though it was rather startling when Cassandra felt an intrusive presence, opened her eyes to find Cole’s face hovering just over her own.

"Ellie is having a nightmare in the Fade—Solas is observing her body, not her mind, they aren’t together and if I go to her it won’t help. She needs to wake up but it might be dangerous—she is so scared."

Cassandra sat up, she wasn’t certain just what might happen, but she wasn’t about to suppress Eleanor unless she were a danger to herself—"Solas," Cassandra reached and shook the Elf Mage’s shoulder, “Marehis—wake up, rouse the others. Bull—help Dorian from the tent.”

“What-?” Marehis asked, half asleep and confused.

“Eleanor is experiencing a fever dream in the Fade. You must all either be prepared and protected or get out before she wakes.”

None chose to wait outside, it was mutually decided that Madam de Fer, Solas, and Dorian would cast Barrier to defend from Eleanor lashing out in confusion or fear or just magic pouring from her unbidden. Everyone was up, seated in their bedrolls, Eleanor was sweating profusely, mumbling incoherently in Antivan.

Barrier coasted across her as she knelt at Eleanor’s side, and laid her hand on her shoulder, the girl whimpered as she shifted restlessly, and Cassandra spoke, “Eleanor. Sweetheart, wake up, you are safe, it’s alri—"

Oh, Maker, magic did flood their quarters as Eleanor gasped, sat bolt upright with a cry, but it was nothing malevolent. Their tent was filled with a burst of purple light, and for a moment Cassandra was concerned the tent might fall in on them, it shook but thankfully held.

“I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I’m so so sorry,” Eleanor rasped out what sounded like dream-struck rambling as she gasped in air to catch her breath, and Cassandra moved forward to hold the girl as she sobbed.

“Shh shh shh shh, Eleanor, you’re safe, everything is alright,” Cassandra sought to soothe, hand threading through her hair to massage at the back of her head, “you’re safe.”

Madam de Fer stepped out momentarily, returning once she had a mug of something warm in hand. The girl was just laying against Cassandra, finally catching her breath after being so upset. The Grand Enchanter came and knelt, pressing a kiss to Eleanor’s head as she placed a hand on her shoulder and informed her there was tea for her if she wished. Eleanor sniffled a sob as she sat back from Cassandra’s hold, wiping at her eyes.

“Here Ink,” Sera offered a handkerchief for the girl to blow her nose, and she had to cough up drainage from her lungs, “good job, you’re okay, all clear now?” she asked and when Eleanor nodded the older girl took back the handkerchief, “lookout, coming through, lung gunk on the move!” she announced like it were some great hazard she half crawled through the tent with to take it out and dispose of in their communal laundry—towels, washing cloths, and the like all went together in a satchel they took turns emptying and cleaning…it was Cassandra’s turn next, but perhaps she could guilt the Iron Bull into taking her turn as he permanently marked Eleanor’s precious skin. Ahh, Sera was back, trampling over her fellow party members to get back to Eleanor and sweep the girl up in a hug, “squeezing the sad away!”

Eleanor let out a quiet hum, something that ghosted on giggling and then, “Thanks, Ser’.

They were silent as they gave her a moment to collect herself, wake up and become aware of her surroundings proper. Madam de Fer passed along a warm mug of tea, which Eleanor accepted before turning about so she could sit in Cassandra’s lap, oh it was sweet to be there for her. Marehis came to sit alongside them, placing a hand on Eleanor’s knee.

“What had you so distraught, sweet girl?” the Elf woman questioned.

“I got stuck reliving a memory in the Fade. I didn’t…it didn’t feel like something I could wake up from just, like it was happening all over again,” she sniffled. “And then it started seeming like I wasn’t stuck, but that I was just there, for permanent. That nothing since then had actually happened, it was all just a dream I’d made up. I was worried I was really just five and scared and fantasizing some life I could have lived.”

“You life now is very real, da’vehnan,” Marehis assured, gently pinching the girl’s thigh a bit as if to prove as much.

“Good! Cause I love it lots.”

“You wanna talk about it, Imekari?” the Iron Bull asked.

The girl was quiet, contemplative as she sipped at her tea. Then, “Um. It started when I first started Fade Dreaming. Just the worst time I had dealing with demons before Envy.”

_Just what was your closest encounter with demon possession, what exactly is the great standard set by the Herald of Andraste?_ Madam de Fer asked, during her first lesson with Eleanor, met with nothing but polite refusal. Cassandra had been admittedly curious, wishing the girl to speak of it if it would bring her comfort, and now that such a time was at hand…the Seeker was admittedly nervous.

“When your magic wakened?” Solas asked.

Eleanor nodded. “I didn’t know what was happening, the first time I dreamed in the Fade. I thought it was just a bad dream, and when I woke up I went to mi Tia,” her chin quivered and Cassandra pressed a kiss to her hair, listening as the girl spoke, “—I was cold and scared and she always knew what to do, whenever I had nightmares or got hurt or sick. Except when I told her what I’d seen, she uh…well I guess it scared her. One minute she was taking me to the kitchens for warm milk, but after I started talking about my dream she dropped me, started panicking and asking me questions and the next thing I knew, I was being dragged to the time out room. I wasn’t sure what I did, she’d never had a problem with me coming to her about nightmares before, waking her up. She woke up all the other caretakers it sounded like, they were just yelling for what felt like hours, just back and forth, arguing over what to do with me, how could this be happening to someone so young, I must be evil or meant to be demon possessed, how could they be sure I wasn’t already? How to protect the other children? And then they had to go about the day like normal, get everyone up, meals and lessons, but they kept me locked in all day. I wasn’t let out until all the other kids were put to bed. They kicked me out...in a pretty literal sense. I was little and hurt and scared, and I didn’t know where to go, what to do. I was so tired and hungry, and I’d been bleeding pretty badly, I ended up unconscious, back in the Fade.”

“You must have been terrified,” Dorian breathed, eyes misting with tears.

“I didn’t know what was happening. There was all these strange, horrible voices, things—these scary monsters coming and offering me help, telling me they’d do horrible things so I could ‘be avenged’ and others just trying to trick me into letting them heal me, making themselves look nice and telling me they’d make me feel better. I didn’t understand anything—no one sat me down and explained I was a Mage or had magic, or that I’d even been Fade dreaming. Everyone was just suddenly scared of me, wanted to hurt me, wanted me gone. I thought I must have done something horrible, I was so sorry,” she said, wiping at her eyes.

“You,” Madam de Fer rasped out with conviction, “did nothing wrong, Eleanor.”

Eleanor nodded. “I know that now. But I really didn’t at the time. ‘s’where I got stuck, in my nightmare just—sad and scared and ashamed.”

“You’d nothing to be ashamed of, Ellie. Accepting a demon’s help in innocence—you didn’t know any better,” Dorian was quick to console.

But Eleanor shook her head, “I didn’t accept a demon deal. At least I don’t think I did? I didn’t know what demons or magic were, but I did know the Maker. I started praying for Him to forgive me for whatever I’d done, for His help and...there was this woman, an Elf she...she seemed nice. She made everyone else go away and...I couldn't understand what she was saying, but she made me feel safe. And when I woke up, I was in the street where I’d passed out, but I was fine. I wasn’t hungry or thirsty or hurt anymore.”

“Could she have been a Spirit perhaps?” Solas asked.

"That was Faith," Cole spoke with certainty, "you reached out to the Maker in the Fade, needed His help and He sent you a Spirit of Faith."

Cassandra was stricken with silence, holding the girl as tightly as she dared. All were quiet and...well there was quite a lot of avoiding eye contact as handkerchiefs were shared and passed around without comment.

“Thank you, Imekari, for telling us,” the Iron Bull rumbled out, “trusting us,” Eleanor offered the Qunari a tired smile, "Thanks everyone. I'm sorry I woke you guys up."

“Nonsense, Eleanor. If anything I woke them, and it is hardly a matter of fault," Cassandra assured, once she was certain of her voice again. "Would you care for potion, before attempting sleep again?"

“I feel a lot better now...but I am kind of scared I might get stuck again,” she admitted.

“Da’vehnan,” Solas ventured, “have I ever told you the story of a benevolent Spirit I call ‘the Matchmaker’?” and when the girl shook her head, “There is a small village* blessed with the presence of a spirit that looks into the hearts of the villagers, pairs its occupants with gentle loves that suit them best. If you give me a moment, I could manifest my memory of this place in the Fade if it piques your interest.”

“Really?” she asked, smiling softly at the idea, “Gosh that does sound nice.”
“Excellent,” Solas said, nodding before he laid back down in his bedroll and closed his eyes to focus.

Oh, he had better ensure the girl’s safety, peaceful rest. “Have a pleasant time, sweet girl,” Cassandra said, pressing a kiss to her hair. “Get some rest.”

“Sweet dreams, okay Inky?” Sera wished her.

“If you’ve need of anything da’vehnan, please, don’t hesitate to wake me,” Marehis intoned.

The girl nodded. “Thanks everyone,” Eleanor said, tiredly, oh Cassandra did hope she got to rest undisturbed now.

The Iron Bull was the first to step out of their tent. There was a sort of party meeting…consoling session more like it. All but Solas and Cole, who remained with Eleanor, the Spirit assuring he’d watch over the girl and make certain she was well. The others gathered around the rekindled campfire, Madam de Fer and the Iron Bull working together to make something warm for everyone to partake of. Tea, with an offer of a ‘little something to take the edge off’ from the Iron Bull. When it seemed none would refuse as much, the Qunari poured rum into their pot of black tea…and it was admittedly complimentary. Admittedly, it was unadvisable, she would repremand Eleanor if she mixed drink and potion, but Cassandra was an adult who knew her limits and it was hardly a strong drunken-bent drink. Warm, and the ache in Cassandra’s head resigned as she sipped her beverage, oh but her heart hurt, ached as Sera sniffled quiet sobs—she was seated beside the Seeker and the Nevarran woman reached out and pulled the girl to her side, with a bit of crouching the Elf’s head could be tucked just under Cassandra’s chin, the woman rubbing Sera’s arm to comfort.

It was Varric who found words first, his voice sounded scrubbed raw, as it was he had to clear his throat before saying, “Well…it’s no fucking wonder the kid’s such a wreck when she thinks she’s pissed us off,” he sighed wearily, holding out his tea cup to be refilled—he’d downed his drink in two swallows. “She honest to the Maker thinks we’ll just cut her off, turn on her if she doesn’t toe the line."

No fucking wonder indeed. Eleanor had been apologetic—borderline terrified it had seemed to Cassandra—when the girl thought she’d accidentally disturbed the Seeker’s sleep the first time the woman ever roused the girl from a nightmare in the Hinterlands, wholly relieved when she realized Cassandra had merely already been awake for the day. It had baffled her at the time, the girl’s reticence to rely on her for comfort from bad dreams, how timid she had been to take Cassandra at her word that she was to always come to her for such, that it was in fact fine—good to do so.

“Inky was terrified when she came to talk to me after the Trevelyan bullshite,” Sera said, “just about had a panic attack, shaking and crying—I messed up I messed up I messed up! Like she thought she was going to get the boot for misbehaving.”

Get the boot made Cassandra’s stomach turn—she could vaguely remember Eleanor describing her departure from the orphanage as such when asked about her upbringing when they first met, in those first tumultuous days in Haven, and now she feared it was a pun of the most horrific sort. A way of offering truth without its fullness to the ears of people she was just getting to know.

“We have to do something,” Marehis breathed.

“About those bastards, or Ellie-girl?” Thom asked.
“Both,” Cassandra was certain. “We must resolve, here and now, no matter what comes of this Inquisition, Eleanor will never live in fear for having magic, not ever again. She will know that she has allies and friends who care for her unconditionally, that she will not wake up one day and find our regard for her gone. Too,” she said, “I believe I shall consult Lady Josephine. Eleanor is certain the orphanage was near the Antivan-Marches border. Perhaps it can be located. We will see if some reform can be wrought, make certain such a thing never happens in that orphanage again. Antiva’s Circle fell in the rebellion, if such a concept still exists in future, we should see to it their country has more than one institute for magical people, provides education for those lacking magic so that they know how to handle such a situation when someone is revealed a Mage.”

Madam de Fer had seemed rather beside herself, Cassandra had not witnessed the woman openly cry, but even she had a handkerchief in the hand she’d balled in the fist she had pressed to her lips as she stared into the fire, she looked such a way Cassandra saw fit to offer, “Vivienne, you did not know, when you first spoke to Eleanor of her aptitude against demon possession.”

She raised her head, “I was cruel—“ the woman stopped, clearing her throat, seeing fit to change the subject, “It is rather something to think of, as well…” Madam de Fer ventured thoughtfully, considering something as she took up her mug from where it sat before her, sipped at her tea. “The Chantry, Circles, they teach us well, not to call out to Demons in the Fade, condemn Blood Magic. But none can stop a demon from seeking you when blood is spilled, we’re taught precious little but resistance. Eleanor’s understanding of why you must never accept assistance from demons is commendable, but perhaps…I wonder if her earlier experience could be replicated. If Spirits are…truly benevolent things of the Fade…we could preach against intentional Blood Magic and teach to seek the Maker when demons are upon you without your call. It would be a powerful tool to implement in our order of Mages, I could see it putting a stop to abominations in our ranks, and if taught appropriately, perhaps lend to fewer new Mages falling victim to demon influence.”

Oh, that was…that was certainly a thought. And the idea of Faith—it had many forms. One did not necessarily need to seek out the Maker. There were Dalish mages, that perhaps could use their faith in their gods to attract a Spirit of Faith in the Fade, call on them for assistance against demons when they descended. The implications were many and Cassandra, Madam de Fer, Dorian discussed the possibility, it would be heartening if something that once spoke devastation into Eleanor’s life could be used for the betterment of others.

Though they did need to seek their beds again. By the time their conversation wound down it was only Madam de Fer and Cassandra speaking—Dorian was rather exhausted still, on the upturn from his illness but still, he’d fallen asleep, the Tevinter Mage snoring against the Iron Bull’s arm.

“Kadan?” the Qunari rumbled out, carefully shaking the Mage’s shoulder, and when he didn’t rouse, the Iron Bull took him up in an arm and lumbered back to their tent. His horn ornaments made for rather an amusing sight, but they did do well to allow the Qunari to pass through their tent without tearing it rather spectacularly.

In the pale, dim light of the tent, Cassandra saw movement as she lay in her bedroll, but when she looked, it was merely Cole. The young man had gone to Rainier, she could make out the Spirit apparently being of some comfort to the Mercenary. There was the quiet shuddering of someone suppressing being heard crying, and Cole spoke softly, “You’re scared now, that they blamed themselves, that they thought they’d done something to deserve Everett’s blade. They didn’t think of blame, they just wanted not to die. Go to sleep. I’ll stay with you.”

The following morning saw Eleanor and her party gathered around their campfire discussing how and when it would be best to move forward. Dorian had been down for all of two days, and he seemed rather recovered this morning. Eleanor was steadily recovering, felt she would be well enough to resume their return to Haven with a few more days rest, was grateful for the care taken with her. Today was the first she was strong enough to join the others outside of the tent for a meal.

Word came for the Iron Bull as they ate, and the Qunari swore under his breath in what sounded like Qunlat, as it looked like…she did not wish to pry, but a passing glance at what he received merely looked like an envelope with his own handwriting on the back. Eleanor was resting against Marehis, practically asleep, though she did crack open an eye to look to the Iron Bull when he said, “Imekari…uh, you talk to Krem recently?” and the girl nodded, they did send letters back and forth, and the girl had been excited to share with Cassandra and Marehis the beloved picture the young man had sent her of little Anya playing in Haven’s snowfall. “He say anything about his mother?”

Cassandra was not certain what kind of mother this young man had but Eleanor…Maker, the girl actually growled before she offered a tight, “Uh-huh.”

“Slow your roll babe, uh, I meant recently-“

“I mean recently too-“

“Kid, she’s…she might be…” the Iron Bull sighed, wrenching a hand at the back of his neck as he gently informed her, looking miserable as he held up the missive he’d just received, “I just got a return to sender on his last paycheck.”

Oh. Oh Maker how horrible, Cassandra’s heart hurt for the young man. Had the Lieutenant’s mother passed?

“Good riddance,” the girl snapped. But then, “Oh! Wait—okay, I promise I’m not being a total bitch—his mother’s just fine, honest. Cremisius was pretty sure she’d stop accepting his paycheck here soon. It’s his business, I’m sure he’ll talk with you about it whenever we get back to Haven.”

The Iron Bull breathed a sigh of relief, “Shit, seriously? Why- right. His business. I was checking with you to see…I thought it meant his mother was gone, wasn’t sure if he knew or not, so I wanted to check with you, to figure out if I’d need to break the news to him when uh…well. No worries now I guess. Imekari, maybe you should nap a bit, we’ll wake you when lunch is on.”

Though Cassandra wasn’t certain just how ‘on’ lunch would be. She’d assisted in preparing breakfast and while she hadn’t said anything that might alarm Eleanor, she’d been horrified to find that…well they had been on the road for longer than intended—the trip to the Fallow Mire had been an unexpected excursion, and having so many interruptions in their plans, while they’d been prepared…one could only prepare so much. Their food stores were wholly depleted now, and Cassandra was glad the girl took up the suggestion to nap, she may be unsettled to witness the uglier parts of food preparation when one must go out and hunt it for themselves as it seemed they might need to until Haven could send supplies—she already had plans to write Adan, she would-

Ahh. There was no need. When the Seeker voiced her concern once Eleanor was in the tent asleep, she was met with both results, and an explanation as to the Iron Bull’s necessity to know if he would need to be breaking heartrending news to his Lieutenant when next he saw him…and why he thought Eleanor should go ahead and find rest before their meal.
“Don’t sweat it Seeker—I’ve been keeping my good eye on our stores, saw they were getting low and already handled it. My guys are on it, we’ve got rations rolling in, special delivery.”

Special delivery indeed. When Eleanor rose from her nap, she joined the others around the fire and it was sweet to see her expression light up when their surprise guests appeared from the tree line, toting supplies for their camp.

“Horns up, Chief!”

“Horns up!” the Iron Bull greeted his lieutenant jovially. Cremisius Aclassi, backed by the whole of Rainier’s men, Cyril raising a hand in greeting to Thom.

Ahh, not Cremisius—it was the young man, certainly, but he’d permitted Cassandra call him Krem, if she liked. She had been addressing him mostly as Lieutenant before but…they’d bonded after a fashion, in their time in Haven. Between shared care of Anya, and his checking up on those Eleanor cared for—to report back to the girl, Cassandra was sure—they’d become more familiar and…there was a comradery between them, now.

_The young man had seemed poorly—features pale and wan—exhausted, one day when Cassandra caught sight of him pacing apprehensively at the top of the stairs, before Varric’s tent. Cassandra stopped to make certain he was alright, did he need Adan?_

“Uh…not really, just uh,” he swallowed, the young man sounded incredibly nervous, “…Stitches is out with the Chargers on rounds, and I need um…”

“Lieutenant?”

“I need bandaging…fr-from Threnn.”

_Bandaging from Thre_

Ahh. Threnn supplied- Well. That certainly cleared up a few things for the Seeker…oh it was no wonder the boy was fearful. Cassandra could understand his hesitancy going to an unfamiliar person in search of something that might bring scrutiny. She rested a hand on his shoulder. “You needn’t seek the Quartermaster. Come, follow me young man, we’ll get you sorted.” And he’d been wholly relieved to follow her into the Chantry, to her own quarters, and she knelt at her desk to fetch the basket she kept underneath it, showing him where she kept it, “My own monthlies are light enough, regular to a degree I needn’t rein it in with potion. This should suffice, I trust?” she asked handing him a portion of her supply.

He carefully took the bandaging in hand. “Yeah, just breakthrough bleeding*, potion keeps it away year-round but uh, sometimes it pops up out of the blue.”

“If you’ve ever need, I always have some on hand, you’re free to it, without question. If you prefer…Adan has interns in his quarters? If you’re experiencing any other symptoms and wish discretion I’ll send a note along with you—I do not usually request potion for cramping and the like, you could speak with Adan freely of what you need, request as much as if you’re seeking it on my behalf.”

“Th- thank you, Seeker.”

_She offered him a smile. “We’re hardly in a work setting just now, consider calling me Cassandra.”_
“Consider calling me Krem?”

“Certainly. Krem, you are to come to me, if you are ever discriminated against—if you’d gone to the Quartermaster and she treated you unjustly, I would see such things corrected.”

“So far so good, and Chief and I have a good understanding of our own.”

“Cremisius I assure you, you’re hardly alone. I’m certain there are members of the Inquisition in similar circumstance, it would not do for any to lack medicinal treatment or the like—it would stay between us, but if there is someone working in service to the Inquisition unwilling to serve or work with all of its members, it must be dealt with. The same would be done of any mistreatment of bigotry. Our cook is diligent and serves well but that means nothing if he refused to serve Elves or Dwarves.”

The young man nodded. “That uh…thanks, I appreciate it. I ever see something I’ll let you know.”

It was a pleasure to be there for the Lieutenant. Such that a part of Cassandra’s Haven routine, in Eleanor’s absence, now held sparring sessions with the young man, specialized training as he was in charge of his Charger’s instruction, gave demonstration and correction, but he usually sparred and practiced against the Iron Bull. As the Qunari was away, and Cassandra the time and interest, she and Commander Cullen worked with the young man, encouraging him. It was only fitting considering the encouragement he was with the Commander—Cullen was appreciative of the assistance the Lieutenant had been, seeing the man struggle with claustrophobia and providing him reprieve without question or embarrassment.

“Cremisius!” Eleanor greeted cheerfully, though her enthusiasm earned her a bit of coughing.

“Hey lovely, still feeling rough?” Krem asked sympathetically as he walked right past the Iron Bull who looked mildly offended his Lieutenant beelined straight for his girlfriend seated by the fire.

“My tits not perky enough or something?” the Iron Bull grumbled quietly to Dorian who assured him,

“I do have an affection for your lack of perky tits.”

Ugh. “They are young and in romance, do please desist with saying ‘tits’,” Cassandra chastised, met with the pair’s quiet laughter, Maker help them.

“I’m feeling better,” Eleanor promised, as the Lieutenant came to stand behind her, resting a hand on her back and she tilted her head back to look up at him. “This doesn’t count as picking up—not while I’m rocking an upper respiratory thing, it’s not supposed to be contagious, but I don’t wanna risk it, you know?”

He favored her a smile before bending to press a kiss to her hair, “Got it. Huh, brushing your hair different?” he asked.

Her…her hair was barely an inch thick from her scalp-?

“New shampoo,” the girl returned with certainty.

Oh. They were precious.
“Ahh, well it’s real cute,” he said, gently scratching at her scalp, “I like it.”

“Hmm thanks…it’s growing on me,” the girl informed him albeit giddily, and Cassandra heard the Iron Bull chuckling as Krem shook his head at her pun, though he did bend to look at Eleanor’s exposed tattoo, she must have written him because he was not surprised to find it there and merely offered a grin and a ‘thumbs up’ that it looked nice.

“Alright, Lieutenant, you’ve got a job—quit fraternizing and get to work. Lunch. No hanging with your little girlfriend until she’s got a meal in front of her.”

The young couple each had their own looks of mischief on their face as Eleanor tucked her feet up under her and leaned back to spin in her seat to face the Lieutenant, the announcement that she had ‘a meal’ in front of her now crossing her lips just as the young man—who was now blushing rather fiercely—pulled the satchel off his back and started withdrawing covered ceramic pot.

“Chicken noodle soup, and…” he carefully balanced the pot in the palm of his hand, using the other to pull a canteen off the back of the satchel, “Haven’s finest selection of orange juice.”

“Koslun’s ass I got too many smartass kids. Alright crew, bring it in, let’s get lunch on the table, Lieutenant’s abandoned us.”

Said Lieutenant waved absently from where he was now sitting with Eleanor, “Uh-huh, sounds good Chief.”

They’d brought an excellent resupply of food, and their party and guests opted for making sandwiches, though Eleanor and Dorian both apparently got to consume soup Krem had prepared for them ‘Tevinter style’ which meant, while there was indeed chicken, the noodles were round, hollow, and it was rather a bit more involved—carrots, celery, onion, garlic, bay leaves…overall something hearty for their recovering members. And apparently Eleanor had enjoyed some sort of beverage comprised of cinnamon, honey and orange juice the young man brought along as it would be a nice treat full of vitamins, too honey did have medicinal properties, and cinnamon was good for treating colds according to Cyril. The Mercenary healer asked after Eleanor and Dorian, providing fresh potion for them.

While the Spirit was not one for eating, he did materialize, seated in lotus position before Eleanor and the Lieutenant as they started in on their own meals.

"Hey Cole,” Krem greeted amicably, “good to see you, how've you been?"

The younger boy rocked back, hands gripping at his feet, and he beamed a smile to the Tevinter, "I've been well! I am not hurt or hungry or tired, and I am happy. You worry for those things for me, Ellie does too, it is nice. I'm glad you're feeling better about your mother. The Iron Bull was very worried when he got your paycheck returned to him, he likes getting things in the mail, but it scared him shit, shit, how the hell do I tell him? What do I tell him? If you explain, he'll feel better. And so will you."

“Return to...oh. Thanks for telling me Cole, you're a pal,” Krem offered a wink, taking the Spirit's spouting information in stride as he looked to his leader, "Sorry Chief, didn’t mean to worry you with the whole return to sender thing—didn’t know until after pay went out, but uh...I guess that’s mother’s way of saying she won’t be needing my support anymore. She's fine both health-wise and financially.”

“She get a job or something?” the Iron Bull asked...was...was the woman unemployed?
Allowing her son to solely—she should not be judgmental, she hardly knew the situation, but the young man had quite a lot of responsibility foisted upon him.

“Getting married, actually. My father’s…legally, my parents have been divorced for a few years now,” Krem explained. Dorian nodded to the Iron Bull as if to confirm that were the case? Were the Tevinter men so close the Lieutenant had already shared as much with him? “and apparently she’s moved on. Got the invitation last week. No worries, I'll not be requesting time off.”

“...married?”

“Uh-huh. To Cornelius.”

Cassandra was uncertain who this Cornelius was, but the Iron Bull looked rather aghast at the notion, a mix of shock and quiet outrage. “You’re shitting me.”

“Nope. He’s always come around checking in on her after everything, apparently, and quote ‘one thing led to another’. They’ve invited me to the wedding if I’m willing to behave appropriately.”

Eleanor took in a breath like she was preparing to yell and somehow restrain herself from doing so, burying her face against Krem’s shoulder, letting out a frustrated sound…Cassandra could now understand her earlier outrage at mention of the Lieutenant’s mother. Behave appropriately indeed, the absolute nerve.

“You wanna fill them in on the good part?” Krem offered the girl.

“The part where I get to meet your mother and thank her for making you and then slap the crap out of her? I thought that was just a dream—Sabes qué, I’ll do it!” the girl was hardly in any condition to go picking fights and yet Cassandra was mildly afraid she’d need to keep an eye on her, maybe hide the girl’s riding gear so she would struggle to prepare Russel for an impromptu journey across Thedas to assault a Tevinter woman.

Of course, Cassandra was also of a mind to join her. Where in Tevinter was Cremisius from?

“s’okay El,” he chuckled warmly, “eat your soup, go to your happy place—I’ll fill them in.”

Eleanor nodded, taking hold of the Lieutenant’s wrist to pull his arm around her shoulders and she settled against his side before she resumed eating.

“What’s the story, kid?” Varric asked.

“I get this invite—and I thought I’d just ignore it,” Krem obliged, “but it uh, well I mean it’s some bullshit on so many levels, and I thought about writing you about it,” he said to Bull, “but mail call also got me a letter from Ellie asking after me, and as mother says: one thing led to another. Told her all about it, and she asked if she could see the invitation…then she asks if I’d be okay with her sending a response on our behalf seeing as my mother said I could in fact, bring along a plus one—and in ‘crazy-world’ where I’d actually accept such an invitation, that’d be Ellie. So I said yes.”

“Shit, you wrote his mother?” the Iron Bull asked Eleanor who nodded.

“Sent her a SWACK,” the Lieutenant was delighted to inform them.
“Swack?” Sera asked, sounding excited for some reason, “You sent her a punch, Inky? In the mail?” ahh. Such a thing would delight the Elf girl, bless her.

“Sealed with a kiss—a letter with a lipstick stain on the envelope seal,” Cassandra informed her.

“Oh. I was wonderin’ why Inky was getting all dolled up for the Fallow Mire.”

“Take note—I was already feeling the cold coming on—thought it might be an act of biological warfare,” Eleanor informed them. “I was going to be nice, really, but then I actually read her letter and lost my cool, just a little bit.”

“And it was just a little bit amazing,” Krem assured, grinning with pride as he continued, “Mother got a lovely letter from the Herald of Andraste. Ellie even put an Inquisition seal at the bottom to notarize it so she knows it’s legit—saying she’s so very sorry but we’re terribly busy sealing the Breach and saving the world, it’d be impossible to attend her wedding, but she was honored for the invitation and wished them the best, hopes they enjoy the wedding present for many years to come…that Cornelius should have an appreciation for them. El ordered them something we’re going halfsies on—how much do I owe?”

“Oh,” Eleanor held up two fingers and the young man dug into the sack of money on his hip to hand her two silver coins, “thanks.”

“What’d you get them?” Krem asked.

Eleanor bit her lip seeming wholly amused as she informed them, very casually, “We got them a dinner set,” she looked up at him, “Shatterproof. porcelain. plates.”

The Lieutenant looked as though he were in awe of her before he burst into laughter, the Iron Bull letting out a low whistle. “Shit. Do not piss Imekari off.”

…Cassandra was uncertain just how vengeful dinnerware was, but it certainly seemed to lift the young man’s spirits about the entire situation. He held Eleanor more securely against him, pressing a kiss to the top of her head.

It was maddening, this young man certainly- how dare his mother- he was a fine young man! Honorable, and brave, and compassionate, and kind, and if that woman did not wish to be the sort of mother he deserved- she-

Maker most high, preserve her. She was hardly a substitute for a maternal figure, but she was a reliable woman who could be depended upon for guidance and care. The Iron Bull had lamented having too many ‘smartass kids’ underfoot, Cassandra was certainly glad of it.

Even more so when the Lieutenant pulled Cassandra aside under the premise that he needed her ‘eyes on something’ from Haven. They walked to the edge of their camp, and the young man handed off a bag marked from Adan’s. Oh Maker, she’d- she’d been of a mind to write Adan to verify he would send refills, Eleanor had taken the last of her potion supply this morning, while there was still stomach and calming draughts to spare, even potion for sleep, she was wholly out of the sort she took for depression, monthlies.

“I checked with Adan to see if there was anything I needed to pass along. Refills of Ellie’s potions, fresh jar of Embrium salve, and uh…this,” he said, extending a smaller bag from the Healers to the Seeker, “I made sure they didn’t get mixed up.”

Ahh. When she realized he was merely offering resupply of Eleanor’s potions she wondered at his discretion but…

“Thank you, Krem.”

“No problem.”

“I appreciate your discretion in this matter…I hope it’s understood I prefer Eleanor not to know?”

“Know what?” he asked, smiling assurance her confidence would be kept. Then, “You’re uh…just, she’d understand, if you told her—you don’t want to put that on her and I respect that but…I mean you’re talking with someone, right? Cause I’m a Herald of Andraste certified ‘good listener’ if you ever need it.”

Cassandra raised a hand to rest on his shoulder, giving it a squeeze. “Sweet man. I have shared confidence with others on this matter, and I am indeed taking your advice to look after myself,” she assured…in point of fact, it was the Lieutenant’s cautioning her to do as much when they spoke on First Day Eve that gave Cassandra pause to take stock with herself, realize that she may need to resume medicinal treatment for her depression, a mild relaxant to halt the onset of panic attacks. She’d been struggling as of late, with the stresses of her station and having Eleanor so far out of reach. Cullen was of comfort, she’d found she could rely on him for accountability and council, as he had with her in his own struggles with Lyrium. And Marehis had been an ally in ensuring Eleanor was not made aware—she was not ashamed, she simply did not wish to worry the girl—the Elf woman made certain her attention was occupied when Cassandra stepped away to consume her own potion before joining the others for breakfast. She thought the Iron Bull might be aware, the Qunari smelled the familiar potion on Cassandra’s breath, but he’d made no comment, just given the Seeker a nod that spoke to his own discretion.

“I’m glad,” he said.

“I assure you, your offer goes both ways,” Cassandra said. “If you ever needed council outside that which the Iron Bull can provide…a woman’s perspective, you may certainly speak with me.”

“Thanks, I appreciate it.”

“Of course.”

Eleanor was dozing when they returned, Sera had taken up the task of letting the girl lay against her by the fire, when the Chargers prepared to take their leave, return to Haven.

“Imekari, your boyfriend’s getting ready to hit the road,” the Iron Bull offered amusedly, a gentle attempt to wake the girl—she needn’t if she were truly exhausted, but she would feel badly if she missed their departure.

The girl shifted, did not open her eyes but her Marked hand reached out, waving, “Oi, guapo—ven aquí,” and she smiled when the Lieutenant came and took hold of her hand. “Be safe.”

“You too. No more mine diving, alright?”

Eleanor sighed as if disappointed, “Well, there goes my whole afternoon,” and then she smiled, “Tell Anya I miss her, and I’ll be home soon.”
"You got it. Feel better."

She did. A few days of solid rest, and Eleanor was back in form, in rather festive style. Cassandra woke, their last day holding camp, to the smell of pancakes and the sound of Eleanor and Sera giggling, Solas’s voice muffled as it filtered through the tent from outside. Eleanor appeared in the entryway, peeking in and catching Cassandra’s eye as the Nevarran woman had sat up in her bedroll, the girl was mischievous as she raised an index finger to her lips as a sign for Cassandra’s silence before the girl carefully tip toed her way to where Marehis was sleeping before she essentially crawled into bed with the Elf woman, snuggling in close, arms around her minder who stirred at the welcome intrusion. The girl was quiet, allowing Marehis to rest more, have a lie-in, though the woman only took a moment to bask in the comfort of resting with her ward before prompting,

"Da’vehnan?"

"Mmm, good morning Marehis, did you sleep well?"

"I did," Marehis said, "How about you, da’len?"

"Good! Are you hungry? We made breakfast!"

"Already?" Marehis asked, and feeling the girl already had her wrist watch on, the Elf woman raised Eleanor's wrist to inspect the time. "Goodness, its nearly gone nine."

Ahh. Had it? Cassandra supposed they’d all been due a lie in then. Their party roused for the day, congregating around the fire, met with…well, quite the feast of pancakes. One stack, in particular, was adorned with a handful of little candles.

"For me?" Marehis asked when the stack was placed before her.

"Uh-huh!" Eleanor enthused, arms around the woman’s neck as she hugged her tight, humming with her enthusiasm before she said, “Happy Birthday, mamí!”

Oh, it was incredibly, almost heartbreakingly sweet, Marehis looked overwhelmed as she held the girl close, “Thank you, sweet girl.”

“Sera and Solas helped me make breakfast for everyone! I wasn’t sure how to wing a cake out here, but Cremisius brought lots of things for pancakes and thought it might be a good substitute. He says happy birthday! Anya too!”

“Oh, tell him I say thank you to them both. Pancakes are an excellent birthday treat,” Marehis assured.

“I got the light, Ink,” Sera said as she struck a match and lit the candles.

The whole of their company joined in to sing ‘Happy Birthday’ to the blushing Elf woman before she closed her eyes and blew out her candles. When they’d eaten their fill of pancakes, Eleanor handed her a cloth giftbag, bouncing excitedly in her seat as she watched Marehis open it.

“Oh da’vehnan, it is beautiful,” Marehis breathed, as she withdrew a silvery necklace—a delicate chain off of which hung what looked like…it was a constellation, not one Cassandra knew off the top of her head, but it looked like silver lines connecting sparkling stars made of small diamonds.

“Madam de Fer told me about it—this little shop in Val Royeaux that makes custom jewelry? It took a little bit of figuring out, ‘cause of the Breach and all but,’ Eleanor explained, blushing fiercely, she seemed shy to explain, “Kingsway* 1st, 9:41, these stars were over Haven.”

“Kingsway…” the woman gasped, “the day you woke—the day we met after your assault on the Breach, oh!” Marehis cried out, hugging Eleanor as tightly as it seemed possible. “I love it, so very much.”

After giving them a moment, “Vehnan,” Solas extended his own gift to Marehis, wrapped in twine bound cloth. The Elf woman unwrapped it to reveal a woolen sweater coat, a cheery yellow that matched the scarf and hat Eleanor had fashioned for her. There was a patch of evergreen fabric cut into the shape of a heart and sewn into the breast of the coat, and when she lifted it to try it on,

"Oh, emma lath," the woman breathed, ghosting a hand along the second item of clothing she found hidden beneath her coat. It was admittedly precious—Solas had fashioned a similar coat of evergreen wool with a heart patch the yellow of Marehis's coat, presumably meant to be worn by Eleanor.

"Gosh, that's so sweet Solas, it's so pretty! But um, aren’t birthday presents supposed to be for the person whose birthday it is?” the girl asked, confused.

"Da'len it most assuredly is a gift for me," Marehis insisted as she helped the girl don the coat over her sleep top. It wasn’t so big on the girl that it would be awkward to wear, but it did leave room to keep her from growing out of it anytime soon. “Ma seranas vehnan, they are beautiful, and so warm,” she was pleased to report as she pulled her own coat on.

“Here Mare, got you spy stuff,” Sera handed off a leather folder holding a thick stack of parchment inside. Was it…had the young Elf compiled a dossier? “Friends is always watching now, in Haven, and they report to me all the time—no big red flags but reading everyone’s things together…I think there’s a few holes in um, security. So, I put together a little something you might wanna pass on to Spy-tits.”

“Oh da’assan, I certainly appreciate it, thank you so very much—for this and all of your ‘spy stuff’, your Friend was of excellent help to me in the field- oh!” the woman took pause, “I’d forgotten—da’len, Thegan, Sera’s Friend from the Marquis estate I worked last month, he’s from the Free Marches? He wished for me to pass along a ‘Hey you’ to you.”

“Hey you?” Eleanor asked, albeit confused.

“He said it was a Marcher thing.”

“Like…slang? That doesn’t…” Eleanor took in a surprised gasp of air and then, “Wait, Thegan—that’s a Dalish name, right? He’s an Elf?”

“Yes, a City Elf.”

“Did he say anything else to you? Talk about the Free Marches at all?”

“He did not speak of his past very much. He mostly helped me with my mission, gathering information, but we were amicable, I would speak of my family and he would occasionally have something to share of his boyfriend—“

“Elf, likes men,” Eleanor listed, “is he an apostate?”

“I don’t believe so…though he did express sympathy when I spoke of my daughter being a mage, that it must be scary, the uncertainty the rebellion and Conclave have caused. And he had a magical artifact of some sort, a necklace—"

“Charmed to vibrate at the top of the hour? And then he’d stretch like this,” Eleanor said stretching her arms over head.

“Y-yes da’len, how did you…?”

Eleanor let out an excited shriek, it was piercing even to Cassandra’s ears, Maker, and then, “That’s Sam!” she cried with excitement, “Hey you—that’s what I always greeted him with when we first met!”

“It isn’t a Marcher thing?”

“Nope! It’s a gender-neutral thing! Ahh!” she squeaked.

“Well shit, Tumbles,” Varric breathed, sounding excited for the girl, “That’s great—the guy’s in Orlais?”

“You want his info, Ink? I can pass along anything you wanna write him,” Sera offered.

The prospect sent her gasping, “Holy crap! He’s gonna flip when he sees I can write! Sera! You're the best!”

Sera whooped at the prospect of being 'the best' in Eleanor's eyes. Varric was rather insistent the girl be given time to sit and write to her friend, offering up his own ink and parchment for her use, and he sat with her, ready to be of assistance if she wanted to use a word she knew how to say, but did not know how to spell exactly. The Iron Bull and Sera both had written Cassandra on the matter—Eleanor having divulged Ava’s demise, that it was met while the girl was away helping her friend go into hiding after rebellion broke out. It’d been a matter of turmoil between the girl and Tethras apparently, and the Dwarf was eager to encourage her now, and it earned him a hug and a kiss on the cheek when she was finished.

“T’he gan is ‘T-h-e-g-a-n’ right?” Eleanor made certain before the sent the missive off. “Even if he’s reaching out because he wants to be in touch, he’s still in hiding so I figure I should use his ‘now’ name.”

Sera nodded. “That’s smart, you did real good Inky. Now, you wanna hug or be hugged?”

She did not usually ask...ahh. She meant how would Eleanor prefer to ride. The girl insisted Sera get to be 'hugged' today with Eleanor seated in the saddle behind her, since she very well deserved it, and apparently Sera had been doing quite a lot of riding Russel on her own or taking the reins and having Eleanor ride before her. Maker, they'd held such a fierce riding schedule...even before word came from the Fallow Mire? Well it was a bit of fortune considering they would have been farther away when word came, otherwise. But still, had meeting Varric’s cousin been so very important? Eleanor had still been recovering! And it had to have been exhausting for them all...especially Sera. Cassandra and she had an understanding similar to that which she had with Eleanor. Sera still struggled with the occasional nightmare after the incident in the Oasis, and she was to wake Cassandra if she struggled as such. She woke twice so far since being reunited in the Fallow Mire, to comfort the girl. There was something...Cassandra was hoping to catch the Elf alone, resume their training in Haven, get her somewhere out of earshot of the others so they could sit and have a talk. Sera...there was something she wasn't saying, about the incident, she would begin to speak and then stop, seem panicked, scared to speak further, and if she could be made comfortable with disclosing whatever the matter was to Cassandra...well the Seeker would certainly be glad to help her however she could, but she would need words put to the issue
It was wonderful to be back on the road once more, heading…well, Haven certainly did feel synonymous with home now. Eleanor was practically overflowing with excitement, and it was admittedly catching—a day and a half of riding lay between them and Haven, and with each mile traversed, Eleanor only grew more excited to be returned to Haven.

“Eleanor, come now, settle—do you need potion? You’ll need rest if you wish to actually be lively come morning,” Cassandra chided, the girl had chosen to sleep alongside the Seeker…except sleep would not be the word for it, the girl was wide awake.

“I’m fine Fade Dreaming if that’s okay with you,” and when Cassandra nodded, she continued “—I’m just! So excited!”

“Da’vehnan,” Marehis offered, amusedly, “sleep, we will be in Haven tomorrow.”

“That’s why I’m so excited! I can’t wait!”

“Imekari,” the Iron Bull spoke from where he lay on the opposite side of the tent, “if you fall asleep, it’ll seem like time has passed very, very quickly—you’ll get to Haven even faster. You need your eight to ten hours babe, s’what all the healers manuals say.” Had the Qunari read as much to know how to care for a Human child? And had he read such for Eleanor, or was this knowledge from when he first found himself giving care for his young Lieutenant? The Qunari was terribly tender hearted.

Eleanor sighed, sounding exasperated, even as she settled more comfortably against Cassandra, snuggling into her side as she lightly complained, “Gosh you three, I’ve got so many bossy mommies.”

Well now. That—goodness. Cassandra now found herself feeling wide awake.

“The Iron Bull is the mom!” Cole offered up giddily.

One would have thought it was Wintersend*…oh Maker! They’d! Had anyone remembered Wintersend?! It was Guardian 16th, the 1st had long since passed! She doubted any in Eleanor’s party had taken note of the day—they’d been tirelessly traveling from Orlais to the Fallow Mire, too it would have been inappropriate for those in Haven to celebrate with forces missing, possibly dead. Perhaps a bit of celebration could be brought to bear, a small gathering of Eleanor’s party to commemorate the occasion so it did not pass them by, a first Wintersend with the girl.

Passed or no—one would have thought it was Wintersend morning, the way Eleanor was eager for all to rise, bouncing around their camp, helping with every last thing she could to speed their morning routine—could they pray on horseback? Cassandra assured her horseback prayers were reserved for emergencies, the Maker should be communed with reverence and focus whenever possible. But breakfast was another matter—they prepared things that could be eaten as they traveled, as it stood, Eleanor rode with apple in hand and slices of toast in her coat pockets…as Solas intended. Literally, the Elf had taken into account Eleanor’s snacking, and lined the pockets in leather that could be wiped clean if say, chocolate melted in them or there was juice from fruit, or mess from butter. From toast. How had this child not grown an entire foot? Likely all her energy went into her exuberance.

Exuberance that was somehow outmatched when they arrived in Haven. By one, Cullen Stanton Rutherford. Maker. Preserve. Them all.
“Stand aside!” Cullen…no one was impeding his path to Eleanor, but he still saw fit to warn off any who might dare get between the former Templar and the 5’2” ball of energy who leapt from her steed and was currently running at full speed to Haven’s gate to meet him. “Eleanor!” he declared as he swept the girl up into his arms, hoisting her high as he hugged her.

“I’m back!” the girl announced, arms around his neck squeezing tight.

“You are! Are you alright? Cassandra informs me you were ill, you’re feeling better? You fell into a mine! What happened to your hair—did it get hurt when you fell? You’re alright yes?” he knelt as he set her on her feet, splaying his hands before her, “How many fingers am I holding up?”

“Eight and two thumbs!”

And she was in his arms again, “Good girl! Oh, I’m so glad you’re back safe. Your hair is adorable. Is this a new coat? It’s very cute.”

“Solas made it for me! And look-it!” she said, pulling back and twisting her leg so he could see a side profile of her boots as she pointed to them, “You got me these ankle boots, they’re the best!”

“I did? Ahh yes,” it took Cassandra a moment as well to recall the man had sent the girl money when she wrote she would be in Val Royeaux. “They’re very fetching, I’m quite the savvy shopper.” And then he…Maker the man looked almost sad, “you want to say hello to everyone else now, yes?”

“Yes…no…I’m very conflicted, I missed you a bunch. Like so much! My heart was very sad.”

That…that got her a third hug and the Commander actually whined before deciding, “I’ll quit my job.”

Oh for heaven’s sake.

…Cassandra had admittedly considered the same when her most recent job description kept her from following the girl to the Oasis. But that was rather beside the point.

“Do it,” Eleanor encouraged him. “I’ll hire you to work with me. Traveling places and sealing Rifts and taking naps.”

“Ha! You hear that?” he asked over his shoulder to his fellow Advisors. “The Inquisition hasn’t once offered me nap benefits.”

“Eleanor,” Leliana said, bemused, “please do not poach the Commander of our Inquisition forces.”

“Me? No, I would never…” and then whispering to Cullen, “I’ll have Varric help me write up a contract.”

“And I will give that contract serious consideration,” he promised, finally releasing the girl, “Alright, I suppose the others can have their turn.”

“Okay! We’ll catch up more later, papí!”

That certainly did not help the man in his reticence to share in Eleanor’s return, Cullen looked wholly dumbstruck—struck dumb while Eleanor hugged and greeted the rest of her Advisors before going in search of Anya and Cremisius, Marehis and Sera trailing after.

“Did she…was that…am I?” he rambled haplessly.

Lady Josephine did seem amused to inform him, “Papí is Antivan, an equivalent for papa or daddy.”

“No it isn’t-“ he insisted, as if the woman was out of her mind. “I- that- What just happened? What do I do? Do I call her something? Am I crying or am I having a stroke?”

“You…don’t appear to be crying, so I certainly hope you aren’t having a stroke,” Cassandra offered as she approached the former Templar.

“Ahh, hi, you’re back,” Cullen greeted her warmly, though in view of Haven’s practice fields he daren’t do more than that in such an out in the open, professional setting. They were technically on the clock, though he did look like he very much wished to be through with their business for the day, “good. We have a meeting and I’m possibly stroking out.”

Oh she rather understood the sensation, but it was only when they entered the Chantry she announced, “Eleanor has become increasingly affectionate insofar as…she has referenced Marehis and myself as her…mothers.” The Iron Bull as well come to think of it but- Maker. Certainly...certainly the emotions were there, but to actually hear the girl acknowledge as much was overwhelming.

“Oh Cassandra, your aunts would be appalled—you a mother, unwed to your child’s… papí,” Leliana, oh the woman was horrible! Lady Josephine was giggling!

“Well…” Cullen supposed, “we are in a Chantry, I’m sure mother Giselle is around here somewher-“ Maker! “Perish the thought! We have work to do, do we not?” Cassandra questioned as she led them toward the War Room.

“Oh certainly, there is much to be done” ahh, blessed Lady Josephine, “we’ll need a cake, and flowers, music, and would you prefer a gown, or ceremonial armor?”

She was surrounded by traitors. “I will disband this Inquisition, I swear to the Maker.”

“Would you care for the authority to do that?” Leliana proposed as they entered the War Room, closing shut the door behind them as they took their stations.

Ahh. The purpose of their meeting. “Certainly not. Have we any new candidates for Inquisitor?”

“Chancellor Roderick has put his ginormous hat in the ring, for our consideration,” Leliana drawled.

Ugh. “Absolutely not, I will not abide that man have any power over Eleanor. Or any of us, for that matter.”

“Agreed,” Cullen voiced.

“It certainly wouldn’t be appropriate,” Lady Montilyet agreed. “I cannot think of any of our Chantry allies that would fit the role.”
“It isn’t something our noble allies can take up without causing major backlash,” Leliana said.

“True…are there any in Haven?” Cassandra asked, “Eleanor’s party?”

“Ahh yes,” Leliana drawled, "who would you prefer—the false Warden, the drunken writer, or the Qunari Ben-Hessrath spy?"

“Madam de Fer?” Cassandra offered levelly.

“I had such an idea earlier before her last trip out of Haven,” Lady Montilyet said, “it…did not go over well, she wants no higher rank, not within the Inquisition—she sees that we can get things done but she doesn’t necessarily wish to go down with the ship should things break down between the Inquisition and world leaders. Too, Orlais would have a field day if we raised their Grand Enchanter so high.”

“Any,” Cullen suggested.

“…that puppy is precious, and she would be the most adorable Inquisitor—do not tempt me,” Lady Josephine warned.

"That is ridiculous," Cassandra assured, indulging in a rare bit of jesting but she could hardly resist,

"Eleanor would be the most adorable Inquisitor," the Seeker and Commander spoke in unison. Leliana, eloquent as always, snorted.

“She is rather the Inquisitive girl,” Leliana offered.

“She is a girl, full stop,” Cassandra insisted, then sighed. “We’ve still time. Our Templars and Mages still prepare to take on the Breach, Madam de Fer has new training to implement in our Mages, I’ve further work with our Templars, and Eleanor…well, she has worked hard, went above and beyond to secure our hostages from the Fallow Mire. She will be given time off. No schedule, lessons at her leisure if she wishes them, as few meetings as possible—and I do mean that, if we can handle it ourselves, we should. We’ve no need to announce an Inquisitor when we’re so very busy handling the Breach, once its sealed of course, we’ll have little excuse and be expected to produce a leader to truly be taken seriously as we pursue this Elder One, seek to rebuild after the Rebellion and get justice for the Conclave. Without the Breach looming overhead, it will be easier for bodies of power to turn a blind eye to the problems still at hand, it is then we shall truly need an Inquisitor at the helm.”

“Lady Josephine actually had a bit of inspiration about that—Sealing the Breach,” Leliana informed them.

“We’d love to hear it,” Cullen encouraged.

“It is just a thought, but perhaps…all holidays fall on the first of the month—yes?” Lady Montilyet asked.

“Certainly—in fact I believe we should do something for Wintersend even as it as passed, we have not celebrated with Eleanor.”

“Oh goodness, yes, certainly,” Lady Montilyet was quick to agree. “As for the Breach…well, there is no holiday in Drakonis.”
“Save the Lady Seeker’s birthday,” Cullen quipped.

“Of course,” Josephine said, smiling as she suggested, “the Breach is something that threatens the world, its closing will be celebrated in the Ages to come, I’m certain. So, perhaps we should promote that. I propose we seal the Breach Drakonis 1st, 9:42.”

“Well then,” Cullen said as they thought it over… “happy birthday to you.”

It was quiet, in Ellie’s cabin, save for Anya’s huffy snores. Krem was working on sewing an extension onto one of El’s leggings, the sort she’d need for practice. Alterations to her clothes had been a hell of a job without a proper sewing machine, but it uh…it was a damn good distraction, something that served a purpose, kept his mind and hands occupied. Had the fire going, keeping it warm, he’d spent all morning…not taking out his troubles on poor unsuspecting firewood. Maybe a little bit. He’d gotten enough wood split to keep Ellie’s cabin warm through winter—Wintersend his ass, more like winter will never end. 16th and still, cold as shit, snowing all to hell. Fucking. Wintersend blows.

It wasn’t like he celebrated the damn day, not much anyway, aside from drinks with friends or something, and yeah he sent and received nice little letters from Remus, put a little extra in the cut of his pay he sent to Mother, passing along a little note that he hopes she’s well—a little note she always ignored. But then this Wintersend rolls around, and after years of zero contact that wasn’t Remus mediated, he gets a letter direct from his mother. And yeah, to my beautiful daughter Cremisius had been a kick to his brain’s bullshit, but he’d been so damn…just…he’d been excited! Relieved! He’d been expecting a passive aggressive Wintersend well-wish, Maker forbid he have a bit of hope. He thought maybe she was trying in her own way. A start, even a bad one, was a start, you know? It was relief, like, he felt like…the way you do when you royally screw up and your parents finally calm down enough to come talk to you about it. Except he hadn’t done anything wrong! He hadn’t done anything wrong, had he? Fuck.

“Fuck!” he swore when Anya suddenly shot up from where she’d been sleeping at his feet and started barking like mad, startled him, made him jam the needle right into his index finger ouch. Hadn’t gone too deep though, caught mostly callous—still.

Though uh, finger didn’t take a lot of the focus once the door to Ellie’s cabin swung open and-

“Baby Anya hi! Mwah mwah mwah mwah!” Ellie, she was already kneeling and getting an armful of super excited puppy, peppering Anya’s face with kisses, “Oh my gosh you’ve gotten so! Big! You had a growth spurt too, huh?” and then she gasped, that…yeah, that was nice. He’d hoped she’d like it, “And you have a little green coat!” just a warm fleece thing she had to put her head through, help keep her warm and from getting too snowdrenched when she went out, covered her back…had a little hood on it that yup, Ellie saw, pulled it over Anya’s head, “Oh my gosh you’re so cute! Did Cremisius make this for you? Oh he’s just the best!”

“He certainly tries.”

That got another gasp out of her…didn’t sting that she hadn’t noticed him right out the gate, she was real excited when she did take note. He set his work aside on her desk in time for-She’d been literal about picking up where they left off. Hands on his scarf, feet on his boots, except he didn’t have to crouch, just lean down a bit as she pulled herself up to kiss uh, okay, yeah. His brain went dead silent, arms coming up around her because that was his job right? To be supportive? He supported the hell out of this.

“Uhh…Ink? I’m gonna just set my pish down and go check in with Lace.”

Marehis was clearing her throat, “And uh, if Mister Aclassi is staying and you wish a moment alone…I will be posting guards and touching base with my handler.”

“We don’t need to know what you’re touching with baldy.”

“Da’assan my handler is-“ and when Sera chortled, “very funny. Have fun with Miss Lace. Send for me when you’ve need, Ellie. Good to see you Mister Aclassi.”

Were they talking? What was going on exactly? Did Ellie just nip at his bottom lip?!

She had! And then she was pulling back just enough to twist a bit to look at the Elf women still standing in the door way, offering cheerily, “Have fun! Tell Mister Butler and Lace I say hi!”

“Say hi to Kremmy-boy for me!” Sera cackled as the Elves took her leave, closing the door behind them.

Ellie giggly when she looked up at him again, warm and rosey cheeked and smiling, “Sera says hi.”

“I uh, say hi back, I-I know how words work, honest-“ nope, didn’t, they were gone again. More warmth, Ellie’s smile against his lips and she was kissing him again.

She was blushing when she pulled away again, “Sorry, gosh I missed you. Hi.”

“Hi,” he offered back with a laugh, bringing a hand up to the side of her face, she was here! Back, and safe, and there was kissing and that, yeah, he was pretty stoked about all of that. Maker’s breath it was relief times a thousand to have her back, here, warm and welcoming. She was…this was…

“Cremisius?”

“Sorry I uh…”

It wasn’t exactly his idea of getting her in bed but the next thing he knew, Ellie was pushing him back till he was sitting on the edge of her bed before she began pulling off her coat and gloves, laying them over her pillow, kicking off her boots.

Then she went to the door, popped her head out to say something to a guardsman before she was back, pushing him back further so he’d scoot to sit with his back to the wall, then she climbed in his lap and held him tight, tucking his head up under her chin.

Cremisius Aclassi, after over a month of basically not seeing this girl, and finally getting to kiss her—proper, damn good, going places kiss her—was currently a Maker damned sobbing mess.

And he didn’t fucking know why! And somehow the smell of coconut oil, like she’d used so me on her neck, helped as much as it hurt. Killed him and was soothing as hell he wanted-“It’s okay,” Ellie promised, pressing a kiss to the top of his head, “you’re okay. Whatever you need, whenever you’re ready, I’m here.”

And that was the problem! Not- not really, he wasn’t mad at Ellie, shit. He was…he was pissed at his mother—hated her. Hated! And that wasn’t very good of him, was it? But this was…what he had, what was going on with Ellie, what he felt—this was everything his father had ever told him, taught him, was this what he’d felt with mother? And how the hell, after years of building a life together, helping each other through hardship and heartbreak, how could she just, snub that? Cast it aside, move on from it like Father hadn’t given over his livelihood, his personage to keep her safe, whole, taken care of? He was out there, and yeah Krem got not wanting to be alone he really fucking got that. Did she think he wasn’t alone? Not…not anymore, not with his life now, with Bull and the Chargers, and everything the Inquisition, Ellie, had given him. But he’d been damn alone when he joined the military—and that’d been her choice, she couldn’t stand him, couldn’t bear to look at or speak to him, wanted him out, wanted him gone. He had to manage not being homeless and keeping his mother from becoming so herself. It’d been brutal and isolating and after everything, it didn’t matter what he’d done, it didn’t matter his circumstance, or his intentions—it’d ended with rejection. And that was just the bitch of it, huh? Everything ended with rejection.

And the thing was, when he first understood what he had in his hands—a wedding invitation—he’d been scared shitless for her. Thought she’d fallen on hard times despite everything he’d done, he thought he hadn’t worked hard enough, that she was looking for a way out on her own and it was his fault. He was terrified she’d turned to Cornelius for help and he was taking advantage of her—the guy’d gotten a lot of flack for trying to marry beneath his station in the first place, and to have been ultimately turned down, been the rejected party in that situation? No Laetan woman would raise a finger for his attention after that. If he wanted marriage, yeah, Liviana Aclassi was a last surefire resort. He’d been terrified for that woman and then—

_There’s always been something there, between Cornelius and I, but I was married, a mother by the time we met and fucking, what? That was supposed to make this okay? It wasn’t supposed to sound totally messed up? ‘Hi honey, I’m marrying your ex fiancé—but don’t worry, that doesn’t imply I signed you up to marry him, expecting you to go through the hell of spreading your legs for a man twice your age, growing a kid you might not get to see reach age 10 if it doesn’t start casting right out of the womb, let you wake up one day to find he’s been fucking me on the down low this whole time.’ And the thing was, he’d seen it! Not…not really, but he’d seen things. Lingering hands and glances, laughing at that bastards every attempt at a joke, always making a fuss over her own looks whenever he was supposed to be coming around. He’d always just excused it as…well there was a level Mother was always trying to maneuver people, she was like that with almost everyone, trying to be charming and charismatic, and she’d never so much as set foot outside the bedroom without fussing with her hair, dressing, putting on makeup. Never caught them getting things off but…when he thought back, his Father had seen something, that was for sure. One day in particular when he was fourteen, they’d been coming home when his father was done with the day’s work and…Krem and his mother’d had a row that morning, so Father spotted him a few coppers to stop in the bakery on the corner, get something that might help with smoothing things over while Father went on ahead. Krem got home and Cornelius was leaving—said he’d stopped by to see his fiancée but he had somewhere else to be, sent Krem off with a pat on the head like the patronizing cock he was, and mother and father were in the kitchen having it out, his father was appalled about something being inappropriate and mother was insisting he’d gotten it wrong, hadn’t seen what he thought he had. Well guess what?!_

“What is he going to do? He—” damn it he was sniffling, real smooth, right? And it was stupid. Pointless almost, he wasn’t even sure where his father was, let alone…if he was ever getting out, would ever be in a position to find out his wife had moved on, his son was on the other ass end of the world. They’d been in a hell of debt, hundreds of thousands in silver…somehow that felt better to think of than the smaller number when converted to gold, shit. Gold. Scary fucking currency. They’d put themselves in debt just to make Krem in the first place, they’d barely owned the house, and had loan after loan to keep the business going. Slaves were lucky if they made actual copper sized dents in their debt in a day, in a week if their masters were real bastards, and he sure as hell had no clue what sort of master Magister Tilani was. But still the question just fell right out of his stupid mouth, “What is he going to do?”

“Depends on who ‘he’ is,” Ellie said as she sat back to look at him. “Cornelius…be a bastard. If you’re speaking in reference to yourself—be super, super loved, have a cry, talk it out, and eat whatever sweets Flissa’s got around right now. Anya, come cuddle Cremisius, kay? Need help baby girl? Good job!” Oh Maker bless that pup, she was big enough to paw her way up onto the bed, jump off her back legs and up she went, sniffing around before climbing into Ellie’s lap, front paws on Krem’s shoulder as she rose to lick his face. Hoarse laughter tore from his throat when he had Anya licking at one cheek and Ellie rapid-fire peppering kisses to the other. When they were through with their bombardment, pulled a smile out of him, Ellie shifted so she could sit with her side, her head leaning against his chestplate, and Anya settled to lay in Ellie’s lap, letting out an appreciative ‘wuff’ when Krem started petting her.

“I mean my father. It’s stupid, I know, just. I don’t know how he’s going to feel if he ever gets out, you know? Mother just…packing it in like this, this whole thing.”

“When your father gets out,” Ellie insisted, “yeah. It kind of kills me that your mother’s doing this to you guys but…if this is what she’s doing? Your father doesn’t need that, and neither do you. She made it sound like this was a long time coming. If anything I almost wish she’d done it sooner—it’s shitty, but if she really wanted Cornelius, wanted Laetan status, she should have just divorced your father and been done with it, instead of pushing for you to marry him for his status. I hate that she put you through that, and I hate that she’s putting you through this now. But…this is all for the best. She gets what she wants, and you can live your own life without her.” and then she raised a hand to his cheek, made certain he was looking at her, meeting her gaze as she looked up and asked, “Do you trust me, Cremisius?”

“Absolutely.” There wasn’t a question about it, just, yeah. He did.

“Absolutely.” There wasn’t a question about it, just, yeah. He did.

“I know. I know your father is safe, and healthy, and alive. And I know that he is doing everything he can, so you can be together again. And when that happens, yeah, he might be sad, have some regrets about everything back in Tevinter, but he is going to be so, so so so so incredibly proud of you. He is proud of you, and he loves you, and he wants you to be happy.”

Hoped so. And Maker if she wasn’t convincing, and just- He wasn’t sure what sweets Fliss’ had coming their way but uh, he was good. Anya was…somewhere, no offense to her, he wasn’t exactly focused on that, except insofar as she wasn’t in Ellie’s lap anymore so there wasn’t another thing to take into account as he caught her lips with his own, Ellie steadily kissing him back as he moved until Ellie was laying back, a contented hum against his lips before she pulled back oh—yeah, breathing was a thing…nice thing, left her neck exposed, and he could verify that dry weather had her moisturizing with coconut oil, which was a nice mix with the salt of her skin.
There was this sound though, just barely noticed it like…something being chomped at, the smack of a mouth full of food…he definitely wasn’t making that noise.

Ellie’s hand on the back of his neck flexed three times, oh shit, okay, backing off- oh, it was reassuring though, when she said, “Cremisius…love what you’re doing but uh, Anya’s looking me in the eye right now.”
He looked up to find Anya staring at them, seated on Ellie’s coat, with, “Where’d she get toast?” pup had butter on her nose and everything.

“Pocket toast,” Ellie offered up simply.

…that checked out.

It was probably a good thing. He wasn’t sure what he was doing exactly, he was…a little all over the place right now, what was he even on? Hi, welcome back, how about I cry all over you, vent my parent-issues, and then suddenly get frisky while your dog watches, she’s got a snack and everything let’s give her a show? And he definitely didn’t want to push too far, too soon.

And there was a knock on the door that so wasn’t made by a little Human hand, had him shooting up and back, almost falling off the bed but Ellie’d sat up, letting out a surprised squeal as she took hold of his hands and pulled to keep him balanced on his knees on the edge of the bed, kept it so he didn’t fall and allowed him to stand up just as the door swung open.

“There you are, Cookies-and-Krem—not just a name pun. You’re the 'Cookies' part, Boss-girl.”

Ellie let out a little gasp, big smile as she announced, “I love that!”

Maker help him, Bull was chuckling, putting his eye on the situation and even if he hadn’t seen anything, there was hearing and…was there anything to smell? Damn that Qunari, what the hell did he want-

Guy had a tray in hand from Flissa’s and was setting it on the food of the bed in the same motion he used to pull Krem up and in for a hug. Not a headlock, just, a straight up, big, warm, long hug. Real long, by the time the guy let him go, Ellie was sitting, smiling at them as she held Anya in her lap, the pup still licking butter off her own nose.

“You invite Krem-dip to the blowout tonight?” Bull asked Ellie.

“Nope,” Ellie said, popping a bite of muffin in her mouth.

Kind of strange, someone else inviting him to a Charger party…but Bull usually planned the things, and he’d been out with El so, something they’d put together. “Of course, lovely, party sounds good.” Would any day, wasn’t quite in the mood but getting there. Between the three of them, plate of muffins didn’t stand a chance, though two cups of coffee didn’t stop Ellie from zonking out, asleep against his shoulder. Like puppy mother, like puppy daughter he supposed—Anya was snoozing in Bull’s lap. Guy’d been damn nervous to touch her back before they left Haven last, she’d been so much smaller and he was obviously worried he might accidentally hurt the pup, but she was bigger, sturdier now so the Qunari indulged in petting her head.

“How you feeling, Cremisius?” Bull asked quietly.

Well damn.

“Better. Like shit—but better shit.”

“Always here if you need it, kid—shanedan.”

Didn’t know a hell of a lot of Qunlat—’cept the curse words, and Shanedan. Greeting usually. Meant I’ll hear you. And with them…yeah, either of them needed to step aside and hash out the heavy stuff, that was the call. Or in this case, the offer.

Yeah. Bad enough he’d already…how the hell was- she kissed him, and he cried—sobbed all over her—aired his angst, and she’d just, rolled with it, listened, held it down. Still, wasn’t his finest moment, and he wasn’t feeling like having a repeat session. “Thanks, I really appreciate it. Kind of talked out for right now.”

That got him a little smirk. “Talking, huh?”

“I swear—we were just-,” okay, that was a look, “we mostly just,” he amended, “talked.”

“Just, you know. Be safe, courteous…generous-“ wagging his- ugh, gonna shave those damn eyebrows!

“I’ll murder you in your sleep.”

“Be my guest. Got a clause in my will that says you get a nice chunk of gold if you ever do manage to get the best of me.”

Huh. “Could probably use a new binder,” he supposed.

“No probably about it, shit, would you stop growing? I’m filling you up on coffee from now on, brat. No more milk and veggies, you’re on a strict coffee-muffin diet,” Bull complained, raising a leg to kick at the bottom of Krem’s boot, his feet were hanging off the side of the bed. “Thought you were looking different, taller, got Skinner to get your measurements for me,” when…when the hell had Skinner taken his measurements?…nah, didn’t really wanna know.

He hadn’t shot up another foot or anything. It wasn’t even that he’d gotten taller, just…he’d gotten Cullen and Cassandra, really.

They’d been training him and uh, Seeker had an understanding of how different training, different exercises toned and shaped her own body. She sat him down and had a conversation in private one day and she just…Seeker of the damn truth’d him in the single most gentle definition of that title. Didn’t make him feel uncomfortable, and got him to open up, explain any aches he had about his body without shaming them or speaking like they needed changed—she made sure he knew he was exactly as the Maker intended, in a sense that didn’t sting. He used to resent that idea—like the Maker had wanted him to be miserable, that’d He’d made him wrong on purpose, but he hadn’t. Maker made him a man, it was society and rhetoric that said he had a body that didn’t match. So he laid out the things that got to him, ticked at his dysphoria, and she listened. Cullen had seen Krem in his sleep shirt sans-binder a handful of times since Krem usually made sure to go out and check to make sure the bonfire was still going warm, and not out of control nights when the Commander was taking the unspoken invitation to sleep under the stars on the Charger’s field. Guy never commented, there was no sudden change in how he treated Krem, so he gave Cassandra the ‘okay’ when she asked if he’d be comfortable with her consulting Cullen. After a few days of brainstorming with the Commander, they introduced Krem to a routine that they were certain would give him some control over the things he couldn’t change. And it really had, Maker—binder had fit better after the first week of training, had to be bound tighter because working his shoulders, his chest, he’d dropped a little of the fatty tissue there. Was cutting it pretty close lengthwise now though, he’d bulked up in his shoulders and arms, filled his armor better now, and the…muscle was filling out where there had once been sloping along his sides between his ribcage and his hips, now it was a straight shot. Took his ab game to a whole new level.

“No way your ab game is better than mine.”

“You wanna bet?”

“You’re on, brat—ab-off later, you and me. New binders are waiting for you back on your cot, you good armor wise?”

“All good Chief, thanks.”

“Don’t sweat it. Hope you like ‘em.”

‘em? Like…like them? As in plural? Just how many had he gotten?

Answer was three. They were waiting for him on his cot when he left Ellie so she could get some proper rest, not just sitting up leaning against his shoulder. He’d woken her up just so she could clean up if she wanted, shown her the progress he’d made with her clothes, they were basically all done—sleep clothes would be more comfortable than the nicer set of clothing she’d been wearing. She’d liked it—what he stitched into her sleeves for her meeting in Val Royeaux, said it went great and his tailoring’d been a big help. She was sweet. Sweet, and currently napping with Sera, Lace, and Anya—Elf came back around with her girlfriend just before Krem and Bull split. When he got back to the Chargers tent he found his new binders and…uh…huh. There was a thin leather-bound parchment pad and a slender, rectangular leather box beside them with a little note, Happy Wintersend, asshole. For the next time you wanna send your girlfriend something. Or make me something nice—not opposed to posing for tasteful nudes. Bull’s handwriting, pushing at the bottom edge, the inside of the case slid upward to expose what was inside. Real nice…nice set of oil pastels. Sketching pad. Sweet.

Wait. He thought it over as he stored away the pad and pastels in his trunk. Was…was Ellie his girlfriend? Should he ask her? They’d laid it out they were dating, exclusively. Had that been that conversation? Bull’d called Krem her boyfriend, but did she call him that?

He was pretty sure he’d rather crack open Haven’s frozen lake and go for a swim than ask Bull.

But uh. Bull wasn’t the only member of Ellie’s party.

“He isn’t!” Cole- holy shit- enthused as he appeared on Krem’s cot. “You wanted to talk to me, I wanted to talk to you too. You were hurting when you brought us food but you didn’t want to hurt openly in front of everyone, it would have made it worse. You shouldn’t be embarrassed about crying. Men cry—all of them, even the Iron Bull, he cried when he was scared he’d broken his Imekari.”

Oh, shit, “Thanks, Cole but uh…I know that—crying being okay. And he probably wouldn’t appreciate you talking to people about that.”

“He wouldn’t mind, he isn’t ashamed. You shouldn’t be either. Ellie did not see you as less than, did not think you were not a man. She comforted not to coddle but to console, it hurts her heart when you hurt. She liked when you were kissing her- oh, I’m sitting on your chests. Sorry. Here—I’m not heavy, not as I am, I didn’t hurt them I don’t think, is it okay to hand them to you?”

His chests? Oh, “Uh, sure, I was just about to put them away, thanks.”

Cole popped up off the cot and carefully gathered the binders into a neat stack, handing them off to Krem, “Ellie will think they are handsome—she always thinks you’re handsome—she will like these, but she will also like what they make feel right. It scares you sometimes, when you think that someday she might see—she wouldn’t see something that did not fit, she would want you in any way you would give yourself to her. Like with the Iron Bull, and the Chargers—your body isn’t wrong, and neither are you.”

Well. Uh. Damn, all he’d wanted to know…well yeah, he guessed in the back of his mind things like that were always ticking away at him, but he’d honestly just been wanting-

“Oh! If you asked her, she would like it, she would say yes, and it would make your heart warm. She has introduced herself to…others, as your girlfriend, when they’ve asked. She has also called you her man.”

“Really?”

Cole nodded earnestly. “Misgender my man? Not to-freaking-day! she was very angry when she read your mother’s letter.”

She really had been…shatterproof plates, damn, that…that almost made the whole thing feel worth it, honestly. “Thanks uh, for the info. I appreciate it. You ever need anything, I meant it when I said you could come to me.”

That…kind of got him a little more than he bargained for. Glad to help, just, he hadn’t expected Cole to take a seat and say,

“What do you do if someone is having thoughts about you…and you like those thoughts, have them yourself about them in return?”

…”Well,” Krem said, closing the trunk at the foot of his cot before he took a seat on the lid. “That depends on what kind of thoughts I guess.” Please don’t be weird sex or murder, please don’t be weird sex or murder…please don’t be weird sex and murder.

“She thinks I am very handsome—am I very handsome?” he wondered, sounding curious, not insecure.

“Yeah Cole, you’re very handsome,” Krem assured.

“Oh, good. Thank you. I think she is made of healing—she is light and kindness, and she makes people happy, and lighter for knowing her, hearing her. I want to know her and she wants to know me. Both in who I am and in…I…see what people do together, they need it—like you, and Ellie, or the Iron Bull and Dorian, or Cassandra or Cullen or Thom or-”

“Yeah, lots of people uh, like uh being together in all sorts of ways.”

“Sex.”
“Yup.”

“I do not need it. It is not something I want, not in the way a lot of people do. But I would not dislike having it with her. It would make me happy to make her pleased. It is like... I do not need to eat, so I do not want to eat, but I do not mind eating when it makes Thom or Ellie happy that I enjoy their cooking—and I do enjoy it, it tastes good but it is not to satisfied a hunger, fulfilled a need. Is it... is it okay that I do not need it?”

Huh. “Of course, Cole. Everyone’s a little different er, sexually. Just like the eating thing— it’s not wrong, as long as you’re not doing something against your will, you’re fine. Sex is more serious though, don’t do something if you aren’t okay with it, ever. If you don’t want to do it in the way like…” shit, how does Cole-brain work? “Like, you don’t want to hurt people, right?”

Guy looked real serious, “Yes. I do not want to hurt anyone ever again.”

“So—the way you feel about hurting people, if you ever feel like that in any situation, especially sexual Cole, speak up, make it clear, and if she—or whoever you’re with—can’t respect that, or if you ever feel uncomfortable, or unsafe, walk away. Or, you know.”

“Poof.”

“You got it.” And then… “You... you know how to be safe, right?”

“Oh yes, I have my knives, and I can teleport.”

“Not... not what I mean. You... sex is invasive, and you never know how many partners the person you’re with has had in the past—if they’ve picked up something that could spread to you, you want to avoid that-“

“There is the man from Starkhaven, she liked the way he-“

Okay, Cole could know exactly how many partners whoever this was had had, “Don’t need a list. Just, you want to be mindful of STD’s is all. I don’t know how this,” he gestured to Cole in general, “works uh... he might have had sex before you came into the picture, you know? So you might want to stop in at Adan’s or go to Stitches, get tested. I can go with you if you want. It’s not bad or scary, I’ve been tested before.”

“Because you’ve had sex?”

“Yeah buddy, I’ve had sex.”

“But if you haven’t, you do not need testing?”

“Not that I’m aware.”

“Okay then. Sera should test, and the Iron Bull, and Dorian and Lace and Thom and Cyril and-“

“Again, don’t need a list of people who need er, tested. I’m sure they’re handling their own business.”

“Oh. Ellie doesn’t need to be tested! She might be the only one in Haven... aside from Anya. And most of the horses. Should the nugs get tested do you think?”

Holy- she- wh- uh... what?
He cleared his throat. “My point is—you should get tested, make sure you’re clean and clear before pursuing uh, sex. Also I’m not sure how everything works for you but there’s a chance, since you do uh…” how technical did he need to get?

“I have a penis and testicles.”

That worked. “Yup, that’s great bud, you’ll want to make sure to use condoms—they’ll help protect from catching or spreading disease, and uh, keep from any accidental pregnancies.”

In full, serene sincerity, “If she wants my penis and I want to share it with her, I will bring a condom.”

“Yes. The Iron Bull uses them, I know how to now too.”

That’s some nightmare material right there. “You know he’s um-“

“Very big.”

“Yup, big. You’ll want to make sure you’re using the right size for you—use something too small, that’s just not gonna work, but neither is something too big. Uh. Why don’t we just go to a healer now, okay? Get this settled so you’re ready whenever whatever this is goes down.”

“That’s alright. Adan is busy brewing…Stitches is having fun right now, I wouldn’t want to disturb him. I can see enough—this body is not diseased, and I will make sure I’m prepared in the future. You did not answer the question—what do I do when someone is having thoughts-“

“Oh. shit. Yeah. Sorry. Needed more information, and got sidetracked—strike up a conversation with her. Get to know one another, maybe have a meal together? Be honest about your interest, without overwhelming her. We're uh...talking about Maryden, right?” Cole nodded. Yeah, lady seemed like she was interested in the Spirit...huh, ”Biggest thing I see that could be an issue is this...you have abilities she doesn’t. Remember she can't read your mind, so you have to be upfront about things, and make sure she's comfortable with you knowing what you know—it isn't like you can help it, so she needs to understand that, know what she's getting involved with. If she isn't comfortable, back off. Number one thing though, Cole—if you mess up, if you make a mistake, no matter big or small...you have to own up to it. It's different from dealing with hurts—if you mistreat her, or embarrass yourself, you better be prepared to make up for it, or roll with the punches. It isn't right, to do something that hurts someone, and just play with their memories, make them forget it so you can get away with it and move on like it never happened. Relationships can be hard, messy, but if you want one, those are risks you have to be willing to take.”

"I understand that, and I wouldn’t, but I am glad you would be honest and make sure that I knew,” Cole said. “You are a very good friend, Krem.”

Yeah, well. “You’re a good friend too,” he checked his watch, “got some time if you want an excuse to hang around the Tavern—I could use a drink.”

“I will pay for it, since you need it from being my friend-“

Well shit, that wasn’t- “Cole, being your friend isn’t driving anyone to drink. It was a joke, mostly, and if I’m a little uncomfortable working through a conversation like that with you—that’s on me, it’s got nothing to do with you and everything to do with some subjects just being awkward for some people;”
That got him a brilliant smile and, “Then I will buy you a drink because we are friends!” and then he was gone. Huh. Might wanna let the guy know part of being friends…and especially part of being more than friends meant less ‘poofing’ and more hoofing it with the person you’re going somewhere with.

Didn’t know if it was better or worse, that he left the tent alone. Damn. It.

Bull. Dorian. Thom…all the core Chargers—Stitches was having fun, huh? Assholes. Seated on the ground in lotus position looking like a fucking kindergarten class, smiling like idiots. Listening, or getting a whispered play-by-play, for their less sensitive-of-hearing members. The Iron Bull started a slow clap…clap…clap before they all offered up cheers and whistles,

“Good lesson teach’,” the Qunari chortled, “You should be a motivational speaker-“

Oh, “Fuck off.”

“Any suggestions how? Good position to start with? Foreplay tips?” Uh-huh. Leaving now, Krem ignored him and started heading for the gate. “Hey! Get back here and teach me how to wear a condom damn it, I’m out here riding blind!”

“Eat me!”

Least it got him a beer—two because Cole appreciated Krem intentionally thinking of the tip that if he did ever go out with Maryden, he should stay with her physically, walk alongside her everywhere. Except the bathroom. They sat and listened to the music, waited for Maryden to get a break and then Cole got her some tea—honey and lemon in it, seemed to impress the woman that he’d thought to do that for her, was good for her throat when she worked she said as the Spirit led her to sit by the fire, leaving Krem at the bar with his drinks. Offered them a wave when he took his leave—he’d done his part and he had to go get ready for dinner.

New binder fit sweet. So it was a tunic night, armor could take a break, and when he finished washing up and getting dressed, Bull was in the clearing by the bonfire and,

“Hey brat! Get over here, you and me, ab-off, no holds barred.”

Had a beat before he needed to swing by Ellie’s. “You sure you wanna do this old man?” Thom barked a laugh at that getting thrown at Bull for once.

Ass was flexing like mad, sucking in his gut, “I was born with abs of steel. Par Vollen rings with songs of their glory. An Orlesian Marquess once paid five gold just to lick their crevices.”

“Lick yourself,” Krem shot back, and uh…well, it was nice to feel confident in pulling up his shirt, just under his binder.

Bull relaxed and let out a whistle, “Damn ice-Krem,” he said, reaching out and patting Krem’s stomach, “out here getting your gains, gonna have Orlesian nobles lining up dropping ten gold just to look at ‘em.”

“Twenty if they wanna touch,” he said as he dropped his shirt.

“Stop teaching the boy to whore himself, you rotten bastard,” Thom snapped, lobbing a handful of snow at the Qunari. “Nice work, Krem—training hard?”

“Just different,” Krem shrugged.
“Seeker’s doin’ a good job. Uh…” Bull cleared his throat, “Said she and Cullen’d still train with you, if you want. Invited me to join, but uh, it’s up to you—don’t got to if you don’t want me to.”

Was the Qunari sick or something? Taken a blow to the head? “Why wouldn’t I want to train with you? Hell yeah, you wanna join us, that’d be sweet.”

He…looked like he was relieved to hear that? Something doubtful in his, “Really?”

Okay. “Shanedan,” Krem waved for him to follow, blacksmiths was empty now, so they went to the fence and, “What’s up?”

“Nothin’,” Bull assured, “just telling you what Seeker offered.”

“She say something to you? Try to make you think I don’t want to train with you, I’ll set things straight-“ did not want to actually fight Cassandra, but if she was putting some kind of random nonsense in Bull’s head- why would she do something like that?

“Slow your roll—she didn’t say anything Krem. Just me, I guess.”

“Well what the hell’s the matter with you then?”

“Noth-“

“Pretty sure I’m Cole’s best friend. I will tell him to haunt your every sexual encounter into the next decade if you don’t cut the crap.”

Bull sighed, leaning back to sit on the stone fence, shrugging. “Dunno. It’s stupid, just…I feel bad I didn’t think about uh, all the stuff Seeker did, when she took you on. Working with what you got.”

There wasn’t anything to feel bad about. “I only have most of what I got to work with because of your training. I can kick dudes two, three times my size’s ass because of you. Seeker just came at it a different angle because she’s got experience living in a body like mine, dedicated to training that body in the way that suits her best—made her capable of helping me do the same for mine.”

“Why don’t you want to talk to me about your family stuff?” that…what? “When did I stop being the guy you could come to when shit gets real?” oh he looked remorseful, stressed. What’s happening? “Is it because I’m on the road too much or whatever the fuck? I’ll…I have to report on progress to seal the Breach, but that’s right around the corner I swear Krem, no more road trips unless Imekari absolutely needs me—”

“Of course she needs you, what the hell are you talking about? Woah woah woah woah stop. Are you…worried I don’t need you or something? That I’m replacing you? Dude. Seeker training me just happened, I wasn’t getting in as good of workouts because I’m fighting Humans and Elves and a Dwarf instead of a Qunari big enough to require his own postal code. It took a Seeker of Truth and a former Templar to substitute for you—not replace. And I don’t resent you being on the road, are you serious about not going? Shit you want me to lose my fucking mind? I only sleep at night when I read things like ‘your girlfriend went through a time portal’ and ‘Ellie took up propelling without a rope into a fucking Rift-filled mine’ because you’re out there with her. And I didn’t want to talk earlier because yeah, I had a good talk with Ellie but that doesn’t replace talks with you. Because sure, there’ll be things I want to talk with her about but there’s always going to be things I can only talk about with you like…” Krem sighed. “I can’t go pick Ellie up and vent about how Maker-damn embarrassed I am.”

“…what the fuck are you embarrassed about? Someone embarrass you? I’ll kick their ass.”

“Go ahead—you and me haven’t sparred in forever, you bastard, abandoning me for a life of travel,” Krem said. “I uh…Ellie and me were just, picking up where we left off, everything was cool—she was back, and safe, and we were kissing and I started uh…I cried. Specifically, like a baby. For a solid seven minutes.”

“You two seemed cozy when I broke up the party.”

“You only had an order from Flissa’s because Ellie was just throwing everything she could to comfort me together—I’m pretty sure I got snot on her, and she just let me. Sent for some comfort food, held me while I bawled, and parcel through my venting, brought it back around to making me feel better, lifting me up. Rolled with it even though it was just totally crazy, we were just greeting each other after her time away, kissing, it was so not mental breakdown material.”

“Making out with the Herald of Andraste give you a ‘come to the Maker’ moment?”

Krem heaved a sigh. “I just…I like her. A lot. So much and…nothing ever feels like it sticks for me, you know? I’m with this amazing girl and we’re feeling all these things and it just got me thinking—what if this is what my parents felt. And if that’s the case then what the fuck is this for? Twenty years. Twenty years my parents were married before uh…”

“Their divorce?”

Krem nodded. “They were married five years before having me. Took them that long to conceive. It was hell, for both of them, and they got through it together. And for as long as I can remember: My father woke up, every morning, got ready for work, helped make breakfast, told my mom she was beautiful, kissed her, told her he loved her, and then he’d leave. Go, work all day, hard, underappreciated work he always managed to find some shred of satisfaction in and she’d always find a way to dump on because she wanted more—better house, designer clothes, the ‘right’ friends. He’d come home and the first thing he did—ask mother how her day was, ask how he could help. And it wasn’t like she didn’t ever do anything—she kept the house clean, lunch was all her, and she looked after me, and you know how hard that is. But, he put so much more into everything, always giving and usually it was just her taking, spitting it back in his face whenever she felt like it, wanted her way with something. He put everything he had into their relationship, into his relationship with me, and she just- none of that matters to her. She was looking for something better the whole time, I’m about a thousand percent positive she cheated on him, and now she’s marrying someone else-,” he stopped, had to take a breather there, Maker he was ranting but Bull was someone he could do that with. He always listened, always understood. “You wanna know why my parents are divorced? Because slaves don’t have marital rights.”

“Oh man, Krem—I’m sorry,” Bull consoled, warm hand on his shoulder.

“Yeah well, you know how it is when you’re Sopporati. If you look around and everyone in your family is free—you’re the slave,” bad joke. Shitty one. “My father gave her everything, gave up everything, and she- she-“

“Isn’t Ellie,” Bull said. “And your mom’s doing you both a favor by getting the fuck out of your lives.”

“…wh…what? Ellie?”
“Imekari,” Bull rumbled out, laying a hand on his shoulder, “yeah, I mean you kid. That’s a lot of bullshit, and your mom’s throwing away a hell of a man for what she thinks is better—if all she’s gonna be is a drain on your lives, let her go. And don’t let her get in your head, make you get it twisted. Sounds to me like you only got so upset earlier because you’re waiting for this to blow up in your face, you’re afraid you’ll give it all away and get left in the dust. But dude, I had an existential crisis earlier because I thought Ellie was taking my big ass place in your life—that’s how much she puts into this. Trust me, you don’t even know the half of it. I’m not saying you guys are forever, but you got a damn good shot. And if it does end, it’s not going to be because you two didn’t try. You both give, and receive—not take, receive. You both bring something to the table, build each other up. No one’s slacking off around here. And if she does—if you wake up one morning and something’s changed, shitty as this situation is, now you know the signs, red flags. You know what you deserve, you ever find yourself not getting it? Make a change.”

Huh. Well then. “See?” Krem asked. “I need you.”

“Damn straight you do, fucking mess out here without me,” Bull said, tousling Krem’s hair, ass. “Might need you too, brat.”

“Who else is gonna teach you how to wear a condom?”

“Oh yeah, maybe you should demonstrate for the class, make sure everyone knows their stuff. Seriously,” Bull said, “I worry about Rocky sometimes.”

Worry? “Pretty sure that’s his kid we see, always waves at us when we pass through Ostwick?”

“Right? How many little Rocky’s does the world need really?”

“If you feel like getting my dick out of the trunk, we can make sure he gets some practice in before the entire population is just Rocky with different hairstyles.”

“Probably shouldn’t brandish your dick at dinner though. More of a dessert thing.”

“Sounds right.”

“You good to pick up boss-girl?”

Shit. He checked his watch and, “Yeah I’m late.”

“Good luck with that.”

Didn’t need it. Almost felt like he would but Sera was more snippy that he was late.

“Ugh! There you are! You worried Inky!” she complained, when she opened the door, hand on her hip. Though, “And me. You okay Kremmy-boy? I’m sorry about your mom’s marriage pish getting you down.”

“I’m okay, feeling better, thanks. I’m sorry I’m late.”

“Don’t be,” Ellie said as she came to the door, pulling her hat on, left her cloak unclasped and caught his eye before turning in a circle…oh, showing him they fit, nice. “I wasn’t worried in a bad way. Just, you’re always on time, I thought maybe something happened, I was getting ready to go down and check on you, you’re feeling okay? Up for getting together?” she checked as she secured her cloak.
“Got caught up with something, I’m actually pretty great,” he promised, offering his arm, and she smiled, accepting it and waving bye to Sera. Anya shuffled after them as they headed for the gate. “Had a good talk with Bull.”

She hugged his arm tighter, “Good, I’m glad.”

He nodded. “Sorry I’ve been so weird today.”

She snorted at that! “I feel like I’m weird most of our days, and you’re always down for that. Besides, you’re kind of dealing with a lot right now, I get feeling confused and sad and needing comfort.”

Yeah, comfort. “Ellie, I…shit, I hope you don’t think that earlier…that I was just using you to feel better. Uh. I got carried away, I shouldn’t’ve and I’m sorry—you don’t have to…just because I’m ‘dealing with a lot’ doesn’t give me license to do anything you don’t wanna do, you shouldn’t feel like you have to go along with anything you aren’t ready for because I’m having a bad day.”

“Don’t want to do-? Oh!” she sounded surprised, “I thought- we were just kissing, were… were you thinking about…?”

“No, no way! Well not no way. I mean I want to- I mean you- we-“

She stopped just outside the gate, let go of his arm and raised her unmarked index finger to his lips to shush him. “I only stopped you because I figured we were about to have company—not by the Iron Bull exactly, but Fliss’a’s pretty good at getting orders out as soon as possible. And I really wouldn’t want to get too crazy in front of Anya? That’s just kind of weird, but Mabari are sturdy pups—she could stand to play in the snow for a while, and there’s no end of people that would look out for and play with her. Hesitancy other than circumstance? None, not really. Except um…”

Ellie doesn’t need to be tested!

“…I’m feeling a lot better after everything, but my back still hurts when I lay on it, especially if someone’s with me, it was pretty ouch just lying back?” oh shit, he hadn’t meant to hurt her- “So…huh…I’d probably have to be on top.”

Sh…wh…top…

She just, said that, kept on walking like he was right there with her, “At least, if you want to anytime soon? Anyway, don’t worry about today. You didn’t do anything wrong…Cremisius?”

Him? Was she talking? What just happened?

And Qunari eat ass. Group was dead silent when they approached everyone was just staring at Bull, who was purple, had half his fist shoved in his mouth, pretty sure he wasn’t breathing.

“Uh…Chief?” Stitches asked, he’d been stoking logs in the fire with a long thin, broken off tree branch and he raised it to poke at the shoulder of Bull’s harness. “You with us?”

Sounded like he was choking on air, and then he pulled his fist out of his mouth, “Yup.”
Yup.

“How you feeling, Ellie-girl? Glad to be home?” Thom asked, and Ellie’s hand caught Krem’s, pulling him along to come sit by the old Mercenary and his…manfriend, Ellie called him, because Thom hadn’t been a fan of ‘boyfriend’.

“I am, gosh I missed everyone—all of you,” she said looking to the Charger’s gathered around, “What did I miss while I was gone?”

Skinner came and plopped herself down in the snow, Anya settled into her lap almost immediately and she said, “I have fought sixteen shem’len for their honor, while you were away.”

“All at once?” Ellie asked, concerned-mixed-awe.

“No. One at a time. The Lady Seeker lets me spar her shems. I have disgraced them all.”

“The Templars?”

Skinner was preening. “Yes.”

“Wow! You’re alright, yeah?” Skinner nodded. “Good! And you didn’t hurt them bad or anything, did you?”

She hadn’t, Skinner was just the best scrapper they had, could put them down fighting dirty, harsh and fast. Seeker thought it might teach them some humility or something. Might have just been more punishment for the whole ‘standing idle by and watching the Order descend into the hands of Red Lyrium crazies’ thing. She was still real pissed about that.

Dinner was good…big…everyone rolled out just about every single one of Krem’s favorites. And…was there some sort of need for Human sacrifice or something? He’d been slotted to take the fall? Cause everyone was talking like they were at his funeral—offering up their stories about his time with the Chargers like they were filling Ellie in or something.

“When I first began traveling with the Chargers, Krem came into my part of camp, stepped through it on his way to make pee,” Skinner was saying. Why. The fuck. Was this happening. “and I put my knife in his calf.”

“Oh no,” Ellie sympathized, he had his arm around her, and she had his other laying in her lap as did that thing, tracing her fingers along the underside of his forearm.

“Got the scar to prove it,” he assured.

“Yes,” Skinner said. “And when Stitches got my knife out and stopped his bleeding, Krem took my knife. He cleaned it, sharpened it, and returned it, said my hit had been a ‘good one’ and apologized for stepping into my camp. I had been afraid—waiting for a shem to come into my space, try to push for what was mine. And when one did, I defended it. And then he showed me I did not have to. That my space was respected, my claim to it secure, what was mine was not mine because I drew a circle around it, but because it was mine, and I was safe with these strangers, they had welcomed me into their space and it was unjust to make it unsafe for them when they had made it safe for me. That was the first night I slept since Edgehall.”

Oh. Shit. He…he hadn’t realized she hadn’t been sleeping, that…that was like a week after they met.

“You know Ellie, Tuesday dinners were supposed to be Mondays?” Dalish asked before Krem could say anything to Skinner—what? Oh. “We’d been in Haven for three days and everyone was taking in the Inquisition, out doing their own things, we ran drills but, I thought it was important that we make a point to try and be together at least once, a set aside time that was guaranteed. So I got word to these berks, got everything together to start cooking for the whole crew. Krem was already in the clearing, had the fire going, helped me cook. And he was the only person that remembered to show up,” a chorus of apologies rang out across their guilty members, “and Krem just shrugged, said ‘more for us’ and said it was too bad everyone was busy, reminded me that we were in a new place and we were all having so much new information thrown at us—schedules and security protocols, and reports from Bull, it was little wonder my one ‘dinner, Monday, six o’clock’ after running drills slipped through the cracks. And then he cleaned up—said I cooked and he should do the dishes. Kissed me on the cheek, thanked me for dinner. When I came for morning drills, everyone was doing pushups.” She deepened her voice to mimic him, “‘What time is dinner tonight?’” then, “‘six oclock!’, ‘and what are you gonna do?’ ‘apologize to Dalish!’ Tuesday night dinners became a thing, and every single Monday since, barring unforeseen disaster, Krem always has dinner with me.”

“I uh…I hadn’t been trying to blow up the Shaperate, not exactly,” Rocky said. “Family didn’t care what I meant, when it was done. I got kicked out, banished topside, I…I wasn’t even sure what was happening, never seen the damn sky, the sun before and suddenly I’m just on this elevator bleeding, barely conscious, and when I come to, boom. Topside. Little explanation, no chance to defend myself, just, cut off. Anyway, I’d been experimenting, trying to get my prototype blackpowder to work and I just about blew the whole damn camp off the map. And immediately I think, this is it, I’m gone—there’s all this yelling and my ears are ringing. And when I open my eyes, it’s Krem. Keeping pressure on this huge gash in my chest, yelling for Stitches. He didn’t care I’d just burnt down tents and nearly choked him to death with smoke, his first concern was me. Bull asked what happened and Krem just, shrugged it off ‘little experiment got out of hand, no biggie, I’ll help clean up’. Patched up tents, checked in to make sure I was fine—ended up with a respiratory infection from smoke inhalation, got sick as a dog—no offence little pup,” he nodded to Anya who was still licking clean a bowl Skinner was holding for her. “Never held it against me, just, said he was glad I was alright.”

“When everyone started to learn Sign for me, Krem sat down, and apologized for not taking the time to breakdown the language barrier,” Skinner said but Grimm was signing to her. “He said he felt like he did not include me enough, but he was wrong. Every morning since he joined the Chargers, Krem would ask if I slept well, if I was hungry. Asked me if I liked the things we ate or not, when we’d go, eat in towns, he’d point out things he knows I like on the menu, order for me so I don’t have to point and hope the waiter sees it right. Never made a big deal about it, or made me feel like I was incapable just, was mindful, offered support. He made a point to check on me after skirmishes to make certain I was alright, kept close in fights so I was never in need of a voice to call for help—help is there. There was never a language barrier between us—no one speaks my language more than him.”

Well. Damn.

Then Stitches opens his big dumb mouth. “We get close to the Tevinter border, and Bull says he’s got a contact to meet in a town on the other side. Told us to hold camp at the border, he didn’t want us getting caught up in any ‘Qunari in Vint territory’ nonsense, said he could stay incognito without us. So we sit tight. Six hours later, this kid comes lugging Bull—got the oaf’s arms around his neck, dragging him into camp. Kid’s covered in blood, shouting at the top of his lungs that we better fucking be the Chargers because ‘this asshole’ says his crew should be here—and mind you, we don’t know this kid from the Maker, Bull’s bad off, we don’t understand what the hell happened, so it takes a few seconds to try and process what’s going on, in the meantime, this lunatic’s got a sword out, isn’t sure we’re Bull’s crew or not since he’s kind of expecting a crew of Qunari—this Vint kid, dragging an injured Qunari, literally hoping he’s going to get him back to his Qunari friends for help—demands to know if any of us is a medic, says I better ‘fix him or else’. So, we help get Bull down and I start working on the big bastard, assure the kid he’s got him to the right crew—we’re the Chargers, this is our Chief, he’s in good hands, what the fuck happened? He does his best to explain, help with holding bandaging to wounds, handing me shit I tell him, gets the hell out of my way when I say to make himself scarce—one of Bull’s baby blues is clean gone, and uh, well, getting that patched up wasn’t pretty. Chief rouses, not sure where he is, where’s the boy that brought him in? Strong, can hold his own in a fight, he’s got a job if he wants it—then he’s out like a light. I try to help this kid, he is so not interested, and he looks like shit—beat all to hell, hurt bad but the only thing I can do is let him have a go with my supplies in private, holed up in a tent, offering instruction blind.”

“I spot the brat a clean shirt,” Stitches continued, “tried to get him to give me details. Kid’s basically shutting down, won’t give me his name, says he was having trouble with a Tribune, Bull stepped in and saved his life, and that’s all we need to know. I tell him to get some rest, think over Bull’s offer. Three days, I swear to the Maker, this kid is wide awake, busy as fuck—checking on Bull, checking in with me, bringing Bull medicine, food, water. Helped make meals he doesn’t eat a bite of, and the only words out of his mouth are him asking if he can do something, helping Dalish mend tenting, or me preparing bandaging or potion. Morning four rolls around, and I hear this shouting, loud enough to end the damn Age—you crazy bastard, you don’t even know me! What the hell were you thinking? And Bull just rolls with it, cool as can be. Convinces this kid to stick around—cost Bull his eye right? We’re a mercenary crew, we’ve got work, and with Bull recouping, we’re down the strength of ‘ten men’—so he’ll just have to make up for it. Be his Lieutenant, his eyes on the field, watch out for his crew, help them fight, talk nice with the people that pay us, handle everything Bull would be doing until he’s back in working shape. Tells him if he needs anything at all, he can trust good old Stitches. Mind you, what I hear at the time is ‘I’ve taken a blow to the head and suddenly think the Chargers is a babysitting service, here’s your blankie, cry to Stitches if you need a diaper change.’”

“What I saw…was Krem. Kid the size of Bull’s arm, fight like hell, fierce, and brazen, first man on the field, last one off—always checking on everyone, helping me prioritize injuries, patching up people where he can for me when there’s too many injured and not enough hands. He learned our tactics, pored over our mapped out strategies, our rules, like they were the Chant. When we’re on the move, he’s helping Bull, training with him, getting him back into fighting shape working with half his vision. Seemed like there really were ten of him—when he wasn’t with Bull he was with everyone else; do we need anything? What can he do to help? He handled our clients, spoke on Bull’s behalf, talked us up without making promises we can’t keep—nobles can be cheap as shit, always trying to knock down the agreed upon price when it’s time to pay up, and he didn’t back down, negotiated and maneuvered until we’re leaving with what’s ours, and then…when was it?”

“Justinian I think,” Dalish said.

“Yup. Krem hasn’t so much as spent a coin, that we can tell, and Bull explains he’s been sending most everything back to Tevinter, clear up his legal crap, support his mother, holding on to what little he keeps back in case of emergency. We get this job—fight off fifty damn bandits trying to take this village, and when all is said and done, the best the villagers can do is pay us in rice. Which you know cool, you can eat rice. Can’t do much else with it, and we’ve all got our own things going on. I was in a bit of a paycheck to paycheck situation after some bad investments,” being shit at cards, “and I send a chunk of change home every week to help my brother, his family and that isn’t done lightly so I’m trying to figure out what to do. Krem says I can just take all the coin we made off the village job, no problem.”
“…but they paid in Rice? Did you sell it?” Ellie asked.

“Turns out they were able to scrape a little money together, passed it along to us,” Krem said, shrugged.

Stitches snorted. “Yeah. They managed to scrape together the exact amount of money I send home every week. And Krem just so happens to get a nice little letter from Tevinter saying if he’s short on his payment again, there’ll be consequences.”

Only had so much money saved up, covered mother and uh, other things first. Imperium had enough money, it could survive one shit payment on some bullshit fine. “I swear half of all mailed currency gets eaten by the delivery birds.”

“Lying little bastard,” Stitches shook his head. “But Maker help us, we love you.”

“Pretty sure that was the first thing I thought, first time I laid eyes on the brat,” Bull spoke up. “I’m heading to this bar to meet my Viddethari contact. And I see him alright—hightailing it out of the bar, doesn’t so much as stop to hand off the info I’m after just, running like hell because there’s a damn Tribune cutting loose on some guy, and he knew I was coming so he was getting out of there before I showed up and could get him involved in some fight because who’re these assholes gonna go after? Some guy, or huge ass Qunari? And I figure, hell yeah they’ll come after me! So I bust in looking for a good fight. Find this kid, back against the bar, surrounded by a Tribune, beat to hell but he’s holding ground like he’s got the advantage, still got enough fight in him—their leader just shouted about making an example of him, and this brat shouts back ‘You wanna make an example? Suck my dick!’ so. First thought, holy shit, second thought, I love this kid. And I gotta see this through—mostly did. And I got no regrets. It was a good damn fight, and at the end of the day, eyepatch bags me my weight in lays, and I gained the best damn lieutenant this side of the Waking Sea…and that’s only ‘cause he can’t be on both sides of the Waking sea,” he winked at Ellie as he stole her line.

“Sounds about right,” Ellie said, taking Krem’s hand in hers. “Cremisius Aclassi is an honorable man, respectful, compassionate, trustworthy, selfless, and brave.”

“Damn straight,” Bull said, reaching in a pocket and pulling out parchment, folded over, from across the fire it looked…oh, yeah that was mother’s hand- “We, are your family Cremisius. You found us. Fought with us, cared for us, been there for each and every one of us.”

“Even before we were members,” Thom saw fit to remind him.

“Tonight is to focus on what is. Who you are, not who someone wants you to be. Leave the bullshit behind, and move on with the truth,” Bull intoned, passing his mother’s letter, that damn invite he’d sent off for Ellie to read, back to him. “You are Lieutenant Cremisius Gistin Aclassi. And your family? It’s your father, the Chargers, and whoever the hell else comes your way that builds you up.”

To my beautiful daughter, Cremisius.

Words seemed less powerful when he could crumble them in hand, toss them in the Charger’s fire, and watch them be gone, forever.

He held Ellie tight, and looked to his Chief. “Horns up.”

“Horns up!”

And things…things really were looking up. Everything, really. He…there was this pressure off him now, like he could actually take it all in and enjoy the things he had in his life now. His time with the Chargers, his friends, with Ellie. With the people in her life.

Seeker apparently saw fit to make up for a lacking Wintersend. Nothing big but Cassandra invited him along too, a get together in Haven’s Chantry. Just Ellie and her party, her advisors, gathering around a big table in the great hall, having a huge meal, indulging in way way too many gingerbread cookies, lots of warm cocoa, and exchanging little gifts. Though Sera and Solas’s was pretty genius—they’d worked together to make Ellie some kind of humidifier, a long necklace made of a thin, white leather strap that held this two-inch long leather pouch that was corked at the top. It would make the air she breathed in less harsh and dry when she was out and about in Haven and she was totally floored by it—the two Elves got big hugs and kisses on the cheek. Sera was a freaking genius…Solas too, sort of, if he wasn’t such a sketchy bastard.

Ellie had totally forgotten Wintersend existed, but she passed around little slips of parchment paper torn from one of her notepads Varric kept her rolling in, little personalized vouchers they could cash in with her—a Haven version of a spa day with Vivienne, an afternoon of reading with snacks and warm drink with Cassandra, things like that. He felt a little awkward he didn’t have anything to give anyone, except maybe Ellie but he was holding off until later—but it’d been pretty spur of the moment, Seeker inviting him just that morning, to festivities that took place at noon.

“Happy Wintersend, Krem,” Cassandra said, a small, pleasant smile on her face. She was seated across from him and Ellie, sliding a little box his way.

“For me?” Krem asked uncertainly, but the Nevarran woman nodded, gesturing for him to go ahead. So he carefully opened the small gift box. There two little golden pins, one the shape of the Chantry’s sun emblem and the other, a sun inlayed with ebony, a ring of red bridging the gap between the tendrils of light—a symbol that represented the Maker. Huh.

“These once belonged to my brother, Anthony. He wore them on his coat collar and would touch them, say a prayer before closing in on a dragon, said it held his prayers and helped them hold true. He was older than I—around your age, while I was ten. I’d had a nightmare, he had to leave for work and I was fearful, so he took them from his coat, pinned them to my nightgown and insisted they would keep me safe,” she cleared her throat. “They did, I believe. I stored them away for safe keeping after his passing. Now, I think he might like them passed on to another brave young man I would see safe.”

Oh. Oh man. “Thank you, Seeker. You’re certain?”

“Truly. I would be honored if you accepted them, Cremisius.”

“I promise to keep them safe.”

“The intent is they keep you safe, sweet boy. May I?”

They were seated at the end of the table so when Krem nodded, Seeker just came around and he lifted his chin so she could pin them to the high collar on his gambeson.

So uh, late Wintersend was…pretty special. Good food, good company, overwhelmingly kind gifts he wasn’t certain how he deserved. And when all was said and done, Krem and Ellie walking back to her cabin afterward, he decided to offer…it wasn’t a gift really, just…asking, flat out, if she’d agree to be considered his girlfriend.

She seemed to take it as a matter of consideration. “On one condition.”
“Name it.” He had dragon slaying pins now he was feeling ready to take on whatever she needed to make this official.

“If I’m going to be your girlfriend…then you have to be my boyfriend.”

Oh man, he was smiling like a damn loon. “You drive a hard bargain…but it’s a deal.” Good deal, sealed with a kiss and everything. Maker!

Life. was so. good. Everything felt like they were riding high. Both in lifted spirits and their focus on the Breach. Word went out in Haven they’d a set date to seal that thing once and for all, and everyone was preparing.

Some preparation was resting, relaxing. Ellie got some time off to just recoup after months of nonstop—run for your life, the world is ending! Okay you stopped the world from ending, let’s teach you how to keep it that way! Go here and seal this, fight that, survive these crazy circumstances! But no schedule didn’t mean she didn’t have a routine and for some reason, the Maker was finally letting things go Krem’s way. Ellie’d come around to check in on him, bring him water or a snack when he had breaks in work, training. She’d usually eat lunch with the Chargers except for her lunch dates with Leliana, sometimes Lady Josie. They spent a lot of time just hanging around, reading together, and he finally met Sam, sort of. It was wild but Sera’d had a connection to him all this time and hadn’t known it, so now he and Ellie wrote pretty consistently, and the guy wrote Krem, asking about him, seemed like he was making sure Ellie was dating someone he'd approve of, and it was a relieving sort of cool to have a sort of pen-pal friendship with someone just like him. Other than reading and writing, there was a lot of playing with Anya, Sera, Cole. Spirit had been helpful with pulling off some scheme of Sera’s. She wanted to prank Haven’s cook, give his staff some relief and Cole was to tell her the perfect time to strike—when there was enough ‘hurt’ and stress pressing everyone to require a little break of pace to ease the tension.

Ellie and Lace went up to Cook after the mess was closing out dinner, and they were just finishing cleaning up. The Herald of Andraste and sweet Scout Harding distracted the guy while Sera and Krem set up the little catapult Sera and Lace had built, pushed it into position and got it set to strike. Cole was playing ghost, unseen but watching and waiting to signal Ellie and Lace when it was time to let the Cook turn around and face his fate.

Ellie nodded when Cole did…whatever it was he did to signal. “Thanks so much for all your hard work!” she enthused.

“Have a great evening!” Lace said to the man in farewell.

“…yeah,” Cook said, and then his gathered staff staring at Sera and Krem caught his eye, “Oi! Quit lollygagging. You’re done for the day, you can come back and be bitter disappointments to me in the morning-“ he was saying as he turned around and-

SMACK!

Cook got a nice, big old face-full of thick, gloppy vanilla cream pie, pie tin sliding off his face and clattering to the ground.

Everyone, even the staff members caught up in shocked surprise and laughter, bolted when Ellie squealed, “Run!”

It was fun. She always invited him along no matter who she was having dinner with too—didn’t always take her up on it just to make sure he didn’t overstep, make it seem like he wanted to take away from her time with the others. Commander was big on what he declared to be ‘family dinner’ which always meant Ellie and Cassandra—but it could turn into Flissa’s being full of each and every member of her party. Been just a uh…little awkward, first time Krem came along to dinner with Ellie, to eat with Cullen and Cassandra. He wasn’t sure what he’d done—Commander had been fine with him, amicable and cheery as always this morning, even got a warm greeting when he and Ellie arrived but when Cullen helped Ellie out of her coat, took her scarf to hang it up for her, it looked like…like the Commander saw something that didn’t sit right with him, had him tense.

“Would you pass the potatoes please, papí?” Ellie asked.

Cullen lifted the ceramic bowl near his plate, “Of course Ellie, sweetheart, most precious light of my life, you can have whatever your heart desires. But if they burn you, I will be obligated to destroy them.”

“Um…they seem cool enough to eat,” Ellie offered, uncertain.

“Lots of things seem harmless. But all potatoes can burn you.”

That got him a confused look. “Like, in the world? I guess? You’d have to cook them first I think.”

“That’s the thing, eventually they are. All potatoes just go around, looking to be cooked—and they either plan to make you happy, or break your heart!”

“Oh sweet Maker,” Cassandra complained, elbow on the table, head resting against the palm of her hand.

“Am I the potatoes?” Krem whispered to the Seeker.

“Undoubtedly.”

“If Cremisius were a potato, he’d be a sweet potato with lots of cinnamon sugar,” Ellie was certain. Not sure that helped.

“Oh, that’s what they want you to th-!” the Commander started.

“Cullen. Cremisius is indeed the Human equivalent of a pleasantly warm, non-burning sweet potato in your ridiculous analogy. And Eleanor is a young woman-”

“She calls me papí,” Cullen whined.

“And Lady Josephine is nearly thirty and does the same of her-“

“Potatoes aren’t going around giving Lady Josephine-” he huffed, whispering across the table like Ellie wasn’t sitting right there, fully capable of hearing, “h-i-c-k-e-y-s!”

“Hick…hickeys?” Ellie pieced together.

Cause uh, yeah, she knew how to spell now. Cullen slapped a hand on the table, “Damn these Tevinters!”

Whoa, whoa wait, “No one’s giving anyone hickeys!” he swore.

“Cullen. I put that there—I do apologize again, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, reaching across the table to pat her arm Oh…oh! Her neck! Ellie’d joined them when they trained that morning, wanted some practice herself. Seeker’d accidentally caught her hard in the side of her neck with a fighting staff. Definitely not a hickey, and all Krem did was offer sympathy when he saw the bruising forming up later, pressed a little kiss to it which she assured helped ‘make it better’ and she was basically a certified Healer so, that was legit. “It is a bruise from earlier today.”

“It wasn’t a big deal, trainings supposed to be a little rough,” Ellie said.

“Oh. Well then,” Cullen seemed to feel better about it, “Forget I said anything. Ellie—hiccies aren’t real.”

Ellie nodded, agreeing, “They are not.”

Yeah they were, but uh, be a little weird for the Commander to go checking under Krem’s shirt. Nice ‘not real’ mark on his collarbone.

So. Maybe some people were giving out hiccys.

They weren’t…doing a lot more than that. They had time alone, and they really enjoyed it but he just…wanted to make sure he did right by her. By them both. Be absolutely, one hundred percent positive and ready before they took any major steps. So, for now, waiting. And communicating, which was good. They both agreed they weren’t ready, just…not right now. Bit embarrassing to start with, but Ellie didn’t have any hangups when it came to discussing the two of them…being together. Having sex—shit! He wasn’t new! He wasn’t sure why he was so nervous, weird about it. There was some element of it that came from what Cole said. About Ellie uh…

No. It was him. It was Krem being nervous as hell to be Ellie’s first. What if he messed up? What if she doesn’t have a uh, nice time, ends up disappointed, or hurt or-

Well. Body confidence was booming at least. He just about thought ‘pregnant’, but uh, thank the actual Maker that wasn’t another thing to add to the list of things that could go wrong.

“She wouldn’t get pregnant, but she could die.”

So. Uh. He might have taken to chatting up Cole again—Krem and the Spirit were lying on the floor of the Charger’s tent, laying in opposite directions but their heads were side by side, thankfully he’d taken off his hat…but what the actual hell was he on about?

“Uh. Cole, buddy—nervous as shit I’ll mess things up but uh, not that spectacularly.”

“Oh. Not with you—I mean after. You aren’t extremely nervous it will be an unpleasant time, Cremisius. You are scared it will be the only time.”

“What’d you mean?”

“The Breach is big, and so is despair. Ellie is always warm acceptance—you know if you get off to an uncomfortable start, she would not ridicule or rebuke, she would be patient and work with you, you would both find comfort and care. You are afraid it will be like before—when you found the fullness of acceptance, love, someone who finally saw you for who you were and then they were gone. Taken. You were terrified in your early days of the Chargers something horrible would befall them, waiting for the other shoe to drop, that they would all be taken away. And now with Ellie, you find it again. You are afraid it is too much—scared that if she sees you and accepts you, she will do so, so greatly that the Maker will finally take notice and take her away.”

“So. In my fucked-up brain, I think that if I have sex with Ellie, the Breach will kill her?”
“You’re always scared the Breach will kill her. You’re just afraid it will hurt so much more—it is later your fucked-up brain will tell you it was somehow your fault.”

Maker he was a bad influence. “Don’t say ‘fucked’.”

“Alright.”

There was another big meal in the Tavern—they’d have the place to themselves for their get together, meant for Ellie’s party, the Advisors. It was the 28th and they…they were going to seal the Breach. Tomorrow. Trying to anticipate the event being made a holiday or something and honestly, yeah, he could see it being a huge matter of celebration—didn’t matter what the rest of the world did, if everyone gets to walk away from the Breach safe and sound, Drakonis 1st will be a permanent holiday on Krem’s calendar.

“…anything?” Krem could hear Ellie talking to someone, voice filtering through the slats of Flissa’s windows as he headed for the door.

“Ruffles assures me she just got confirmation from the Free Marches,” Varric was saying, “Transport just cleared customs at their northern border this morning.”

“Thank the Maker,” Cassandra praised.

Ellie let out an excited squeak, “Yes! Wow wow wow, okay. We can keep our chill a little while longer. Maevaris wrote to check up on me actually, says I should—”

“Call her Auntie Mae-Mae? Figures sh-“ Varric went dead silent when Krem came in—everyone was uh, real quiet. Cullen, Cassandra, and Varric were seated at the bar Bull, Marehis, and Ellie were behind the counter, working together chopping veggies. “How the hell you doin’, Boyfriend? Long time no see!”

“You know, it’s been so long since drinks last night, I almost forgot what you looked like,” Krem drawled, though he did worry, “Am I interrupting something?” Everyone was either looking right at him or avoiding his gaze entirely.

“Nah, just yacking. Come on, take a seat,” Varric invited.

“Certainly, join us, Krem,” the Seeker encouraged, patting the empty stool at her side. “You’re having a pleasant day I hope?”

Uh. Aside from everyone being a little weird just now, “Yeah.”

“If you are hungry there are hors d’oeuvres,” the Nevarran woman offered, reaching to pull the plate of little crackers topped with little bits of meat and veggies to sit in front of him—Varric snickered and got a glare for his trouble from Cassandra as she said, “The lieutenant hardly ate a passable lunch, I am in my right to worry.”

Cullen came to stand at his back, hands on Krem’s shoulders, massaging as he assured, “It’s okay to be nervous, but do rest assured, we are all prepared, ready. Tonight is for fun, enjoy it.”

“If you are hungry there are hors d’oeuvres,” the Nevarran woman offered, reaching to pull the plate of little crackers topped with little bits of meat and veggies to sit in front of him—Varric snickered and got a glare for his trouble from Cassandra as she said, “The lieutenant hardly ate a passable lunch, I am in my right to worry.”

“Just wasn’t real hungry—day off, so it wasn’t like I’d worked up an appetite or anything, s’all good,” he promised, Maker this lot was…nice. Good to him. “Thanks,” he said, taking a cracker and taking a bite. Commander gave his shoulders a squeeze and then a pat on the back.

“I’m going for a water run—mija, quieres una rellenar?” Cullen asked, Antivan spoken carefully as he tested his growing knowledge of the language. Ellie’d been using more Antivan lately—turns out, ‘guapo’ means handsome.

“Sí!” she chirped, bouncing on the balls of her feet, “Gracias, papí!” she called as Cullen took a pitcher, grabbed Ellie’s canteen off the hook by the door on his way out.

“How are you feeling, sweet girl? Are you nervous?” Marehis asked,

“Nope! Everyone’s been working so hard, and I feel ready,” Ellie said, nodding her head. “I know we can do this as long as we work together.”

She...she was saying that, sounded real cheery, confident but she sniffled, had started to cry.

“Hey,” Krem said, rising and going around the counter, getting Ellie to face him as he rested his hands on her shoulders, tearfully looking up at him, “you are ready. Everyone is. Tomorrow’s going to go amazing, you’re going to seal the Breach and show the Elder One he’s got absolutely nothing on the Herald of Andraste. You’ve worked so hard, and I know you can do it,” he promised, resting his forehead against hers, “You’ve got this, El.”

She sniffled again, shit, he’d meant to make her feel better, but her shoulders were shaking like...crap was she going to cry worse?

“Cremisius...thanks...” she said, sounding...was that laughter in her voice? “I was just chopping onions, though. But I really do appreciate you.”

Oh. There were little chunks of white vegetable stuck to the blade in her hand and yup. Onions. Onion tears. Cool cool cool.

Bull was already chuckling. Bastard. Krem sighed, closing his eyes. “m’I ever gonna live this down?”

“Hell no!” Bull assured him, Varric was outright laughing, Marehis giggling into her hand. At least Cassandra was on his side—smiling, warm and she had this look on her face like she thought it was all adorable, nope. Not that much better than laughing.

Felt better when Ellie kissed him on the cheek and assured him it was an easy mistake...a lot better when he was back in his seat and-

“Ellie?” Cullen was worry the moment he returned from the pump, “Sweetheart, what’s wrong, what can I do?” Sera and Lace were following him in,

“Who the frick made Inky cry?!”

It was an easy mistake! Though Sera had a bone to pick with the onions now, took over for Ellie, the Elf girl hacking away at the produce like it deserved it. And it did, damn it!

Tavern was pretty packed and it felt like a party, there was this high energy, excitement and anticipation rolling through everyone as they talked a mile a minute, eating and laughing and drinking. Maybe a little too much—Krem got giggly drunk. In his defense, he’d only meant to have one drink, Varric’d broken out a nice bottle of bourbon he offered from. But one glass turned into two. And then the Dwarf had insisted Cassandra deserved a stiff drink after everything, hell, she’d done just about everything to get the Inquisition where it was today. And yeah, Krem agreed she deserved a drink but uh...given her current medicinal routine, that wasn’t advised. Seeker turned the drink down but Varric poured her one anyway and Krem snatched it up and knocked the glass back like a shot...definitely wasn’t a shot but he’d sort of panicked. Kept his “Not cool dude. Seeker wants to keep a clear head, leave her be. Got it?”

Varric was looking at Cassandra hard for a moment, then Cullen and back, “…got it.”

“Thank you, Cremisius,” Cassandra intoned quietly, pressing a kiss to the side of his head.

Oh man, so uh…yeah. Varric’s bourbon was big time meant for being sipped, holy shit, everything was warm and hazy, and Ellie found his giggling at everything cute which was…she was sweet. Beautiful and sweet. Pretty pretty lady. Loved her.

“Come on, Cremisius. Here,” Ellie…where was? He was pretty sure they’d just been in the Tavern. He was sitting in Ellie’s desk chair now. Who was licking his feet? Where were his shoes? He’d been wearing socks right? Was Ellie doing that? Huh, hadn’t pegged her for a foot girl. Oh wait, cold wet nose. Anya was a foot girl, that he knew. Oh hand…his hand? That was his hand right? Yup. Mug in it, Ellie was pressing it into his hand…that was his hand right? “Drink.”

He snorted, giggling as he grinned, “Think’ve had’a bit too much to drink, El-Elllllie, Ellie. El-leee. Do I say your name right?”

Hmm…water. Water was good. Love it. Got two mugs of it, Ellie making sure he was okay with her putting a little Elf root tonic in the second. Why the hell not, mixed drinks are welcome!

“Cremisius, we’re gonna sleep now, okay?” Ellie asked when he was done, “Do you need help with your binder?”

Sleep…now? “Kay, you uh, you wanted to be on top right? Which way’s top?”

“Just sleeping,” she insisted gently, “it’s bad to sleep with your chest bound.”

He nodded hmm…almost asleep sitting up, was that bad for his chest? Oh his binder loosened up, Ellie’s hands under his shirt undoing the stings and then she gave him privacy to pull his shirt open and slip the leather off over his head, heard it hit the floor as he tightened up his tunic strings again though Ellie was back, carefully picking up his binder and laying it on her desk. Huh, had she worn pajamas to dinner? Pajama dinner. Pa-jam-a pajama was a weird word.

He could kick his own ass he was pretty sure when he woke up the following morning. Still dark out, at least it seemed that way from grayish light in the room. Dinner…too much bourbon…

He asked which way was top.

But he had Ellie, warm, sleepy, laying against him, her head on his chest and that was enough. Didn’t like that he’d made an ass of himself but uh, this? Was pretty damn perfect.

“Are you feeling better?” Ellie asked, voice soft with sleep as she sighed, snuggling against him.

…didn’t have a hangover surprisingly enough. Oh yeah. Elf Root water…did Stitches know about that? Bastard never had a hangover! “All good now. Sorry about last night.”

“Don’t be. I saw you were just sticking up for Cassandra—though it’s your business if you did want to get a little loose, as long as you aren’t hurting anyone.”
“How bad did I embarrass myself?”

“How… I mean, your rendition of Sera Was Never was heartwarming. She sang along with you.”

He groaned. “I sang?”

“Uh-huh. No worries, I called it a night when you were done, and Marehis and the Iron Bull helped me with getting you back here. Sera was pretty looped and so Cassandra let her go sleep with her in the Chantry.”

“How was everyone cool with me coming back with you?”

“They trust us, it isn’t their business what we do,” Ellie listed, “and you might have shouted ‘Not for sex! We aren’t ready!’ when I said we were going back to my cabin.”

“So. If you wanna toss me into the Breach, I totally understand.”

“Just throw the whole boyfriend away, huh? Nah… I think I’ll keep you if its all the same. Get some more sleep if you can, okay? Big day today.”

Yeah, it was. But it started out simple enough… a little bit perfect. Warm bed, Ellie in his arms, Anya curled up against his side.

The Breach would still be there when they woke up.

“Nervous, Ink?”

Ellie smiled to her friend as Sera handed off her gloves. They were almost ready, armoring up for the day ahead just in case the Breach wanted to spit a demon or two before they could seal it. Harriott was amazing! He’d made Ellie new armor now that she was a bit too big for her britches in the literal sense—old armor was tight on her calves, vised by what was supposed to be covering her ankles, and the sleeves of her armored tunic had fallen short of her wrists, it’d all been very pinchy. The Inquisition’s blacksmith had really done it again! It was a little silly but she liked the idea—she asked him if it would be okay to make her armor the tawny brown Inquisition scout armor used like in Marehis’s armor and the pretty lavender kind of leather Cassandra’s armor used. It turned out super pretty—brown armored tunic, matching gloves and boots, and then her long overcoat and leather leggings were purple.

“A little bit? I’m confident in everyone just…I’m a little scared, you know?”

“Oh my brave girl,” Marehis said, coming and adjusting Ellie’s armor’s overcoat, “Everything is going to be alright.”

“Mare’s right,” Sera said, “If… if it don’t feel right, if something’s going wrong, you stop, and you tell us okay?”

Ellie nodded. There was no stopping, she was going to seal that damn thing no matter what, and she knew she could, it was just… sort of like after having bad experiences in the Fade, being afraid to go back with Solas. She knew how to keep herself safe, and she trusted Solas with her life, but she’d been terrified the first time they tried meeting each other in the Fade and exploring.

“You ready Anya?” Ellie asked the pup, receiving an enthusiastic bark in return—gosh she was so big now! And strong! Everyone had done such an amazing job of looking out for her and Ellie had made sure she ate really well and got enough sleep and all the exercise! All of it! Mabari had so much energy! She was coming too, it would be sort of like a test start—depending on how well she traveled and things, to see if she could come out into the field with Ellie now that she was big enough. Harritt made her Puppy Armor! A plated harness she wore over the evergreen poncho Cremisius had made for her.

Armed and armored, packs all set for the day ahead, they went to regroup with everyone. Her party was set to meet in the Tavern, have the morning meal together, make sure everyone was on the same page for the day.

It was a little early still, but Ellie was surprised it was just Cassandra and Varric in the Tavern. The Seeker was seated at the table by the fire, she had an omelet and toast and juice in front of her already, but she was just sort of picking at the omelet and Varric was cleaning up a pan behind Flissa’s counter.

“Ahh, good morning ladies,” Cassandra said, holding out a hand and Ellie went and joined her, the Nevarran woman humming a bit as oh! Ellie’d been meaning to sit beside her but she didn’t mind being pulled into Cassandra’s lap. “Would you care to split this with me?” she asked, offering her a fork.

“Sure!” Gosh, she was hungry and Varric’d really…gone all out, the omelet was huge, and stuffed with spinach and ram meat and carrots and peppers, and he’d made five or six slices of toast split into triangles. And a mug of orange juice…oh and there was a mug of tea, wow, had he and Cassandra had a fight or something?

“Where’s the rest of breakfast, Dwarfy?” Sera asked.

“Seeker was the first one here, I just thought she should eat!” Varric defended, “People got to right? Big day ahead of us and shit. But of course I uh, was planning on making breakfast for everyone. Coming right up.”

“I believe I’ll help,” Marehis said, going to join him. Sera came and sat across from Ellie and Cassandra, taking up a slice of toast.

“What did Varric do?” Ellie quietly asked Cassandra,.

“I do not know, he has been almost annoyingly considerate all morning, this is the second omelet I did not ask for,” Cassandra replied before she sipped at her tea. “How did you sleep?”

“Good, I spent time with Solas and Cole,” Ellie said, “it was fun.”

“And Cremisius is well?”

“Yeah, he’s okay…it was nice,” Ellie admitted shyly. It’d been super nice—she’d been a little worried he’d get sick after drinking so much so fast but Elf Root and water always did the trick it seemed, and it’d…she always felt safe sleeping alongside her friends, but it was just a different sort of safe maybe. She liked waking up and having him there.

“I’m glad, Varric’s bourbon is nothing to trifle with.”

“I’m real sorry about that, Seeker,” Varric said, putting the pan over the fire to cook, “Really. I uh, didn’t know you were- er, not drinking.” Oh. That must be what he’s feeling so badly for then? He certainly liked apologizing with breakfast food.

“Was real good, ‘sandra, nothin’ wrong with cuttin’ loose,” Sera said as she bit into her toast, though she just about choked when Varric snapped,

“She doesn’t have to drink; step off her junk!”

“Varric!” Cassandra chastised, “Do cease that tone with Sera. Honestly.”

“Sorry, just, your business. Overcompensating for being a dick last night I guess.”

“Well do stop.”

“You got it.”

Aside from Varric’s…weirdness, breakfast was great. Her party gathered and ate, discussed the game plan—together, they and the Advisors would lead their Mages and Templars to the Breach. It was a bit of a way there and back, not a bad trip out, but Haven’s cooking staff was working tirelessly to get both breakfast for everyone through and done and send them off with lunches they could stop to eat on the road. They’d get time to rest though—they wouldn’t be back until later this evening, and then it seemed like there was going to be a pretty big party to celebrate.

“It feels weird, after all this time, there’ll be no more Breach in the sky,” Ellie admitted when they were getting ready to head for Haven’s gate.

“We’re with you, Ellie-girl,” Thom said with certainty, “you’ve got this.”

“You have everything you need before we leave?” Cullen asked her, looking her over from head to toe, tugging her hat down a bit more to cover the tops of her ears, adjusting her scarf, “You’re warm enough? You’ve extra water for your necklace?”

Ellie nodded—Sera and Solas were the absolute best in life. “Yup! I’m all set!” it was steaming nicely with water and Embrium—she had a little flask of it now she kept strapped to the back of her canteen, Cremisius had given her the idea because he always walked around now with a little flask full of Embrium water for her, just in case.

“There is something we would like you to have, Eleanor,” Cassandra said, clearing her throat as she came near, holding her sword in its sheath…oh, wait no, it was a little smaller than Cassandra’s, and her sword was on her belt so…

“For me?” Ellie asked.

“You’re trained to use it, and the Commander and I have discussed it at length. If you wish it, you should have it in case you’ve need.”

Wow. She nodded, “Thank you,” she said, and Cassandra helped to fasten the sheath to Ellie’s belt. It wasn’t too heavy and she was sort of excited to use it? She didn’t want to go on a murder rampage or anything but like, a duel, or something.

If Cremisius’s father was sad over that horrible woman marrying Cornelius, that lady was getting challenged to a duel!

The journey to the Breach wasn’t as horrifying this time it…was like a big, organized walk through the sunny, snowy countryside around Haven. The bridge was mended that once fell under Ellie and Cassandra’s feet…wow that seemed like a long time ago. Ellie’d been pretty sure Cassandra was going to kill her. Like, a thousand percent positive that was how their relationship was going to end. She was super glad to walk arm in arm with her now, Marehis on Ellie’s other side, it was very warm and honestly grounding. She could focus on the people with her, on the certainty they had, and on her breathing—everything was going to be okay.

It somehow felt like it took forever to get to the Temple of Sacred Ashes remains, everything had been so adrenaline fueled and frightening and new, it almost passed like a flash when Ellie thought back on it.

But she was here and now. She was stronger, could use her Mark the best she knew how, and she had all the power of the rebel Mages, and fallen Templars on her side.

The Chargers were going to stay up high, with Lady Josie and Anya—Rocky was absolutely amazed by the crater, staring down into it while the rest of his team mates were staring up into the Breach. Cremisius only tore his eyes from it for a moment, gosh he looked nervous, but when he looked to Ellie he forced a smile, mouthing, ‘You’ve got this’ raising a hand to touch the prayer pins Cassandra had given him, pinned to his gambeson. She nodded, smiling back.

“Are you ready, Eleanor?” Cassandra asked.

“Let’s do this,” Ellie nodded, her arms were free now, they’d separated as they got to the temple, but she reached out her unmarked hand to Sera who clutched it tight, shaking like a leaf, but she shook her head fiercely when Ellie offered that she could stay up high, not get too close to the Breach.

“Imekari,” Bull grumbled out when they got to the drop off down into the crater. He’d been very quiet since they got to the Breach. “You’re a badass.”

“‘s’what B-Quad’s all about.”

“Our people are ready when you are, Ellie,” Cullen said, his hand went to her shoulder and it seemed like he wanted to pull her into a hug but she was about to do a pretty grown up job here in a sec, work with a lot of people who needed to see someone capable of the job set before her, not a crybaby little girl that needed a hug. Even though she was a hundred percent a crybaby taller-little girl who really did want that hug! Cullen was getting so much hugs when this was over. Everyone was. If the Breach sealed shut, the whole Inquisition could just line up and get hugged!

The Iron Bull was amazing help getting down into the crater, she was worried he might hurt his ankle, being the first to drop down, but he was careful and then reached up to help Ellie down, Cassandra, Cullen, Solas dropping down into the crater after her.

Oh gosh, Marehis too—it didn’t matter she couldn’t suppress or power anything, having her near boost Ellie’s spirits and that counted! And no one was going to just make her go back up...might be funny if they tried.

Drakonis 1st, 9:42, Eleanor Trevelyan raised her hand to the sky, and backed by the power of the united Mages and Templars under the banner of the Inquisition, the Breach was sealed. Power tore from her hand and plunged into the Breach, her entire body felt energized and burned from head to toe as power surged into her Mark, flooded the connection it held to the Breach and with one final painful pull, it snapped shut with a resounding CRACK.

Ellie’s ears were ringing, pounding with the hyper thumpthumphumpthump of her heart racing, stomach rolling like she might be sick as she fell to her knees, catching her breath.
“‘vehnan?’” Marehis’s voice warped into being, like she’d been speaking from far off and her words were suddenly loud in her ears.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, there were hands on her shoulders.

Ellie pushed to her feet, tried not to make it too obvious she too Cassandra’s arm and was leaning on the woman a bit, “All good.”

More than all good, she was great! The Breach was gone! Gone gone gone gone gone! The Elder One could suck it!

And so could image! Cullen swept her up in a big bracing hug when the Iron Bull helped her up out of the crater, and then the Commander let her ride piggy back, head resting against his Pauldrons because she—while totally, out of this world excited and relieved and happy—was completely and totally exhausted…

“…is she alright?”

“She is fine, vehnan, merely tired.”

“Can I get her anything?” hmm…Cremisius was sweet.

“She will be alright,” Cassandra assured. “She can rest here, undisturbed, Adan is nearby if needed.”

Voices had been hazy, like hearing them half in the Fade, and half awake. Anya was curled up against her when she woke up. She vaguely realized she’d been laid down in Cassandra’s room and—

WAKE! UP!

She sucked air into her lungs as she shot up, panic panic panic in her veins as her magic screamed something was wrong wrong wrong wrong wrong.

She shot out of bed, slamming into the door before pulling it open, Anya yipping, confused but following as Ellie practically fell into the hallway, catching herself on the palms of her hands and pushing up—move move move!

Cassandra and everyone, her party, advisors, Cremisius were standing just outside the Chantry, seemingly admiring the scar in the sky that was once the Breach, talking, but they needed to be moving.

“Imekari?”

“Eleanor, child, what is it?” Cassandra asked as she went to her knees, catching Ellie and holding her by her arms as she crashed into the Seeker.

“Something’s wrong, something’s coming, it’s bad, we need to move, everyone has to get out of here, now!”

“Did you have a nightmar-“

“Cassandra! Listen to me. I am awake, and my magic is screaming. We just sealed the Breach the Elder One massacred thousands of people to open—he is pissed and he is coming!”

“Him and what army?” Varric wanted to know.
“I don’t fucking know but it looks bad,” the Iron Bull announced.

There was fire in mountainside hundreds of lights heading for Haven.

War horns sounded across Haven, and in the hills and they were running, all of them, to the gates—Cremisius broke off with orders from Bull to round up the Chargers, find everyone, and-

And what. Haven…Haven literally had one way into the Inquisition base.

That was currently being flooded by…huh. Well then. Ellie wasn’t certain if it was a copycat situation or if great minds thought alike.

There had been a great number of mages unaccounted for in the rebellion, from Redcliffe, Alexius had some woman named Calpernia that approached him initially with the offer from the Elder One, to save Felix’s life. And Cullen had been…very disturbed when Sir Barris mentioned a Templar named Samson, that he’d been in Therinfal Redoubt off and on over the past few months before the Inquisition came and put a stop to what was going on there.

Now, it would seem, the Elder One had his own army, a mix of Rebel Mages converted to the Venatori, and Templars. Red lyrium Templars, they…they didn’t even look Human anymore as they thundered across the frozen ice of Haven’s lake, stormed the walls. Everyone had been celebrating, no one…no one thought there would…Maker.

“We need to get everyone to the Chantry,” Cullen called out as they came out of Haven’s gate, Venatori and Templar bodies littered the area, the Chargers holding ground and protecting the gate.

“We’re on it!” Cremisius assured, leading the Chargers back into Haven while Ellie and her party headed for the practice field…

Battlefield, it was a battlefield holy crap. Where was her staff?

Back in Cassandra’s room. Cool cool cool. She had her knives, and they hadn’t taken off her belt, so, sword! Except her hands were a little busy right now—her party worked together with Inquisition forces, they needed their catapults up and running and someone had to turn the dang-the- the spinny things! Twist twist twist until the catapult was in the correct position and reared back to fire, and she could do it! She shrieked when the catapult was released, it was so loud, and the platform she was on shook! But take that! Elder One didn’t have catapults, so there!

Dumb! Mean! Jerk old man! Haven was her home!

“Something’s wrong, they aren’t firing,” a scout called—oh crap, yeah, there was another catapult group, but everyone had been celebrating, maybe no one was manning-

No one was manning the other catapult because they were all dead.

Magic was burning with her anger, her…grief could wait, she needed to focus, these men were dead, but there were hundreds more that needed saving, “Keep them off me!” she called as she rushed ahead to work the catapult controls.

Thwack! Ellie covered her ears as they launched their second catapult into the mountains. Hopefully it squished the Elder One like a pancake!

Probably not, but a girl could dream.
“Harritt!” Ellie called out when they were heading back to the gate, the Blacksmith was trying like mad to break into his own cabin but the door was blocked.

“It isn’t—” necessary? Didn’t matter, he was trying hard to get in so Ellie— oh! Staff! There was a staff leaning against the low stone wall kind of conveniently but she wasn’t going to question the Maker. She grabbed it and cast at the debris to bust it up, boom! Rocky’d be proud!

“Thank you, my lady,” Harritt called as he rushed inside.

Wait Harritt… what about the Horse Master? Oh! “What about the horses?” Ellie asked, turning to her party.

“I’ll hit the stables Ellie-girl, you get to the Chantry,” Thom volunteered, rushing off.

“Da’vehnan!” Marehis called out in reprimand as Ellie broke off from the group, “Imekari, there Chargers are all clear, no one’s in there!” she could hear Bull shouting. Yeah, but there were things! She yanked the nearest case off of its pillow and used it as a sack as she took the lock to Cremisius’s trunk in hand and burn burn burn burn ouch! Hot Metal! But she sent a blast of cold and it turned into a chunk she could drop onto the floor, yikes.

When she had all she could get in the sack she twisted it and tied it closed, rushing out to rejoin her party.

“Imekari what the fuck—“

“I have what I need, let’s go!” she said, slinging the sack over her shoulder.

They made it back to Haven’s gate and Maker. The streets were flooded with enemies. There was a woman, a Templar, Lysette, Ellie asked Bull to go help her, she was being bombarded by Red Templars.

“Seggrit needs help,” she heard Cole murmur and then he disappeared, reappearing on the roof of a cabin used as a stockroom and dropping into it through a hole blown in the roof. Everything was on fire, Haven was burning. But Cole busted open the door and got out with the Human man intact, thank the Maker!

“Eleanor, the Chantry!” Cassandra half-reminded, but it sounded almost like a panicked demand.

“I’m not leaving people trapped! I’m looking!” she called back, and she could hear—, “Flissa’s in trouble!”

She bolted for the Tavern running as fast as she could, bounding into the burning Singing Maiden oh crap!

“Flissa!” Ellie cried out, setting the sack down and trying her hardest to hoist a fallen beam off of the woman. Smoke burned in her lungs, painful tearing breaths that choked in her throat— ugh! Not right now! Body! Cooperate! Save Flissa!

“Ellie no, get out of here!”

“Imekari!”

Bull! Get on over here you big beautiful badass! Muscles! Get it! He practically threw the beam off of Flissa, hoisting the woman to her feet, and Ellie over his shoulder, she just narrowly grasped the sack in hand before he was whisking her off, though he placed her on her feet the second they were outside.

“Shit, shit, kid, are you okay?”

Embrium steam from her necklace was helpful, soothing in her lungs as she forced air into them, “Adan-“

“Fuck-“

“Trouble!” she croaked out, she didn’t need him, he needed them!

Adan and Minaeve! They were pinned down under…why were there heavy pots of oil just in the middle of the square? Who put that there? Why did they just want people burned alive?!

Fire was traveling trails of oil leading up to the pots but Madam de Fer blew them into solid ice! And Ellie helped Minaeve up while Bull got Adan to his feet, and they both bolted for the Chantry—seemed about that time!

Oh! Threnn! The Quartermaster was under attack just outside the Chantry—it was an emergency so Ellie cast Barrier over the woman, she could apologize later for saving her life! Her party worked together and cleared the Chantry yard of enemies, Threnn rasping out her thanks before heading into the Chantry, and they followed, Thom catching up with them, helping to pull the door shut behind them.

“Now what?” Ellie asked they…well there wasn’t anywhere else to go—they were in the actual back of Haven. The Chantry was built into a mountainside. Haven was just one big deathtrap now they were sitting ducks! Baked ones! That wasn’t funny but it was!

Maker bless Roderick. There was a way out—a old mine carved a path through the mountains but-

Okay. Think think think. You want out, you want gone! You need to escape! How? Once upon a time she’d seen several ways of sneaking out of Haven, now she just needed that on a mass scale—

“There’s still one more catapult, right?” Ellie asked.

“Eleanor?” Cullen prompted.

“The Elder One isn’t taking Haven. He doesn’t even want it,” Ellie said. “Think about it—what did he want in Redcliffe? Therinfal? Me."

“He certainly cannot have you!” Cassandra snapped.

“Mami, listen to me. Everyone needs to get out of here, get to the mines—if I go off, the Herald of Andraste, heading for the last of our trebuchets, that’ll distract his forces—he wants me! So everyone can get into the escape route while—“ Cole. Be quiet, she thought to the Spirit, “while we get one last good hit on his forces before we get the hell out of here.” It wasn’t a lie.

Cassandra’s eyes looked wet with unspilled tears, “We’re going with you.”

“Absolutely,” Marehis agreed.
Okay, yeah, that would work, she’d…she’d figure it out, she needed help getting to the catapult so, “Thank you,” she said.

“Alright, we’ll work together and get everyone to the mine, be safe, Eleanor,” Cullen intoned.

“Cremisius!” Ellie called out, hoping to be heard over the din of the panic ringing in the Chantry.

“Ellie!” Cremisius found his way to her, a hand reaching grasping hers, “Maker, you’re alright.”

“I have to go, here,” she said, handing him the pillow case, “This is yours.”

Cremisius snorted. “Great minds, huh?”

Oh. Oh Maker he’d- the scarf she slept in was being used like a sack, she could see the edges of her box-

“Keep it, yeah? We’re getting everyone out of here—help Cullen okay?”

“Where are you going?”

“We have a job to do—you do too, go and be safe okay?” Ellie pled. "Keep Anya with you.”

Cremisius nodded, swallowing harshly.

Great minds, yeah. They squeezed each other’s hands three times.

I'm scared. I don't want to do this. I love you.

Maker watch over them all, keep them safe.

Haven was devastation as they carved through the path of Red Templars and Venatori, toward their final trebuchet.

Please please please let this work!

Really felt like it did. The second they were in the clearing around the trebuchet, there were forces all around them, congregating, trying to overtake her party. She was scared for them, but a little grateful the bombardment was overwhelming enough they weren’t watching just where she was aiming this last shot.

The Elder One wasn’t going to be able to follow after their people, no way in hell.

Seemed like hell already though with the huge, honking walking mountain of Red Lyrium attacking—they were almost there, almost done! She had the catapult in position and it was almost ready for launching. Someone would have to do that, it was the only way. So.

And then there…there was the dragon. Big, scary, nightmarish dragon.

That…worked things out pretty perfect, actually. One last offer of help and hope from the Maker. The Dragon’s assault blazed a path between Ellie and her companions, even as Marehis had been pulling her along when the Dragon appeared, she’d lost her grip and then boom! Wall of fire between her, and everyone else—they needed to run, Cole! They need to run!
Get to the mine, get to the mine, get to the mine!

Oh. Oh crap.

The…Elder One, she presumed. He did look old and ancient…and like three times taller than Bull. Big, big gray, lyrium warped monster man with hands like the claws of a terror. Okay, breathe breathe breathe breathe! She needs to get to the trebuchet. She was just gonna bolt for it-

“Enough!” that horrible voice she’d only heard from the Breach called out, oh he, he was definitely—how the hell had he survived the blast?! “Pretender,” he accused, “you toy with forces beyond your ken. No more.”

“You don’t scare me you big-! Jerk!”

“Words mortals often hurl at the darkness. Once they were mine. They are always lies.”

Just a little bit! But fuck! Him!

“Know me,” he said, “know what you have pretended to be. Exalt the Elder One: that is the will of Corypheus. You will kneel,” he said, raising his hand what? Was she supposed to kiss his ring? He wasn’t even wearing one and-

“Make me!” cause that was literally the only way that was happening. This asshole came into her home! Killed her people!

He hummed at that. “You will resist. You always resist. But that ends here. I have come for the anchor, the process of removing it, begins now,” this…Corypheus? Stupid name! What was that he had in his hand? An…an Orb? Her Mark began to thrum like it was near a Rift.

Ouch ouch ouch!

The Orb was glowing, burning red as pain shot through Ellie’s Mark, sending her screaming as he…it was her fault? Something about planning for years and ye- hurt hurt hurt hurt hurt! She didn’t steal! Her ears were ringing, her magic was on fire, it cried out in her blood! Ahh!

She screamed when he yanked her up by her arm, glaring into her Mark like it disobeyed him while he ranted and raved about raising Tevinter high and correcting this Blighted world and how he’d seen the throne of the gods and it stood empty.

He was a liar! The Maker sat in the sunburst throne and He was always with her!

Even as this monster threw her, hard, she was flying like, like she weighed nothing to him and she hit the wall again-

No. not a wall. The Maker was with her—and the Elder One would just have to deal with that, he played into His will and he didn’t even know it!

She was on the trebuchet!

Admittedly, it was a little touch and go, by the time she was able to stand, he was there, in her face, hoisting her up by the collar of her coat and ranting in her face some more.

“You know what your problem is? I mean really, master tip for your bad guy schemes—listening?” Ellie asked, holding his gaze.

“You think you-“
His turn to scream—thank you Sera and Solas! He hadn’t been paying attention to her hands, and she popped the cork off her steam necklace splashed him in the face with the burning, boiling water and he dropped her to her feet.

“You talk too much!” she let him know as she drew her sword and cut the tension line on the trebuchet, and it launched overhead, the Elder One snarling as he twisted about to see where she’d shot, following its path right into the mountainside directly over Haven village.

It was her flashiest escape ever, and she was admittedly proud. She’d faked heart failure, pretended to be blind, and even resorted to spooking Druffalo, but she’d never once used an manmade—nope, sorry guys but—\textit{woman}made avalanche. Until today.

She ran as fast as she could, racing and running, maybe she could catch up—

She fell into the shaft just as snow swept over the opening.

\textit{Crack!}

It…it was so cold. She was freezing, but alive. Cool. Ugh.

Okay, head pounding, she’d hit it when she fell, but at least it was still attached? Small blessings. Legs still work, arms—up we get.

She really needed to stop falling into mines.

The tunnel was cold and dark and empty, but the former footfalls of her friends, her people —Haven had escaped through here, she was certain. She was too. Or at least she hoped so. A little bit. She kind of thought she was going to die doing the whole ‘trebuchet into the mountainside’ thing but the Maker wasn’t done with her yet. Possibly. They’d see.

Her Mark was on fire, it burned with…she wasn’t sure, it just, it hurt! Cory-face had done something to it, it thrummed with some kind of new power and she wasn’t-

She’d been stumbling along the path and came to an open area in the mine to find herself face to face with two despair demons, and in a moment of panic she raised her Marked hand and \textit{pop!}

She…she made a Rift. A small one that stunned the demons and held them writhing as it…it looked like it was sucking them in, absorbing something from them until they withered away, out of existence, and then her tiny Rift snapped shut.

“I’ve seen too much weird shit today.”

Everything hurt, she was sore, bleeding just…wasn’t sure from where, her brain was…she couldn’t think really everything felt slow and sluggish, and she was pretty sure she had a concussion.

And no more Embrium steam in her necklace, extra flask was empty.

Clearest thought she could manifest cut sharp across her consciousness and it almost sent her turning around to go back because—
It was gone. Marehis's necklace, she’d been wearing it for good luck with the Breach and now it was gone, it must have fallen when…she’d touched it, she remembered, when they left the Chantry to head for the trebuchet—

Corypheus had torn it from her, his claw caught it when he took her up by her coat collar.

Dry, harsh air cutting through her lungs, freezing cold, and a snowed over path met her when she emerged from the Mine. There was…there was a vague path made of debris, a dying fire that mocked her when it flickered out in the wind…where…where did everyone go?

Her magic rang in her veins when she heard the howl of a wolf in the distance. And despite everything that said that wasn’t safe…she followed it into the wilderness.

Their calls would lead her home*.

Chapter End Notes

There's only a few things that aren't 100% explained with context--words in different languages.
Antivan:
'mi Tia' this means 'my aunt/auntie' sort of like the friend of 'Mija'--you can call any important female figure in your life 'Tia', no blood relation required.

Guapo, ven aqui--means 'come here, handsome.'

Cariño is a Spanish term of endearment, meaning 'sweetheart'

Qunlat: Kadan, which is Bull's term of endearment for a Romance, it means 'heart'.

*Visus is a sword-shaped constellation that is the symbol of the Templar Order.

*The Matchmaker is a Spirit Solas will tell Inquisition about in Skyhold if you ask about stories from the Fade.

*Breakthrough Bleeding--is an unfortunate side affect of continuous birthcontrol, when you take it so you never have your period, sometimes your body is like "I'm doing it anyway!" and gives you, usually, like a mini-period.

*Kingsway is September

*Wintersend is the sort of Solstice-y celebration in Thedas, it comes at the 1st of Guardian (February).

*Since Dorian, Cole, and Roderick are all accounted for already in this fic, there isn't anyone to come pounding on Haven's gate to warn them about the impending attack. Since Ellie's magic is always about that #SurvivalLife it acts as a substitute.

*It took. two. playthroughs. after Tresspasser. for me to get this. I always thought it was lame, they have you hearing Wolf calls in the woods but you don't get attacked by wolves as you try to follow the Inquisition's trail. But then I realized duh. Dread Wolf. If you follow the sound, you're going in the right direction. So thanks for being a pal, Solas, you lying liar egg.
UPDATE: Next Chapter titled, mapped, mostly written, to be posted by March 1st! Heads up, I'm not 100% certain because my draft is still saving okay, but it is getting on the longer side, so this might end up being a double chapter update due to AO3 character limits. Be sure to check the Chapter Summary up at the top to make sure you're in the right place! Next chapter picks up right where we left off, directly after the attack on Haven--if you're in Skyhold, you've gone too far!
All were seated in devastation, gathered around one of the many campfires lighting what was left of Haven's Inquisition. Quiet, crying, even Anya was aware the loss they’d been dealt, the pup whined, seeking to comfort Cullen, laying at his side. Lady Josephine had nearly been sick from her sobbing into Leliana's lap, she lay crying, staring into the fire before them. The Spymaster had sought the Chant, and was met with Lieutenant offering up the very copy she’d gifted Eleanor, the woman was quietly reading as she stroked her friend’s hair. Dorian was lying on his back in the snow, staring up into the sky as he wept in frustrated silence. Marehis was sobbing heartbreak into her hands, as she sat at Solas's side while Adan examined him, offering the woman a consoling hand on her shoulder as he informed her the Elf was stable, to call on him if there was any change before he took his leave to tend their wounded. Oh Maker, Cassandra prayed Solas would wake. She...she was not certain she would ever sleep again. It was well past midnight, her body was weary, heart ruined with despair, but every time her eyes slipped closed and she began to fall asleep in her seat she heard the most horrible-

She heard Eleanor screaming.

They had been separated by a wall of fire, heard that horrible voice from the vision they witnessed at the Breach, his words were unperceivable but there was no mistaking it was him. And then Eleanor's screams. Solas, his connection wide open, monitoring the girl, he’d cried out in agony, convulsed, his body seized up before he fell limp and unconscious in the snow. The Iron Bull had taken him over his shoulder and carried him, Marehis had needed to lean on Cassandra and Vivienne to move forward half carrying, half dragging the Elf woman.

Eleanor...Solas was still alive. But his reaction, her...her horrifying cries...

The resounding crash through the mines, echo of the devastation befalling Haven. An avalanche.

“She was talking to Justinia a great deal,” Leliana murmured, gently gliding a hand along the edge of a page before turning it seeming moved.

Talking?
“Justinia?” Cullen asked.

Leliana cleared her throat. “I lent Most Holy my Chant when she’d need of it before the Conclave, knowing well her habits.”

Ahh. Justinia wrote often in the margins of the Chant. Her thoughts, notes for her sermons, a visual conversation between herself and its contents. And when Cassandra peered at the open text in Leliana’s hands she saw the scrawling cursive of Justinia’s hand, with replies beneath them. Not answers from the Maker, but from Eleanor.

“The Maker Appears to Andraste,” Leliana read quietly. “Eyes sorrow-blinded, in darkness unbroken, There 'pon the mountain, a voice answered my call. "Heart that is broken, beats still unceasing, An ocean of sorrow does nobody drown. You have forgotten, spear-maid of Alamarr. Within My creation, none are alone." The Spymaster huffed, sniffling. "Justinia was preparing for the Conclave when she wrote alongside this passage, ‘What glory to see the Maker’s face and know He is with you. I have faith in His promises, but I feel the weight of this impossible task before me. I am surrounded by allies and yet my heart feels as though I am alone. I fear for the future I worry I am unprepared to guide His people into. I know His heart weeps for His children as they seek war with their brothers and sisters, I pray He shows me how to remind them we are all His children.’ Eleanor,” Leliana seemed to lose her voice.

Lady Montilyet sat up, wiping at her eyes before laying eyes on the girl’s handwriting herself. “Oh mija,” she whimpered out, taking the Chant in trembling hand. “The Maker is always with us. It’s how we show love for one another that reveals His love for us all. His love is endless and if we open ourselves to that, it gives us the capacity to love the same—I love so, so many people, so very much. I know you did too. You reminded people of the Maker’s love every day—how you loved Leliana, and Cassandra, how you did your best to bring everyone together, how you wanted to move forward, doing what was best for not just some, but with all of us in mind. I can’t remember meeting you, but I know we did—the fact that you wanted to take the time to talk to some nobody little apostate, listen to whatever it was I had to say, show love to me by having my voice in mind as you worked through whatever the Conclave could have held? No one can ever doubt His love if they knew you.’”

“Goddamn it, Tumbles,” Varric swore.

Indeed. The girl had shown the ultimate form of love, and Cassandra wanted to part of it, could hardly stand it—couldn’t stand it. How could her loss be proof the Maker loved them?

"I should have sent her with Cullen," she found herself saying. The Commander wrapped an arm around her shoulders as she spoke.

"Come on Seeker, don't do that to yourself," Varric said, "Here," he offered his canteen. She was terribly tempted, it was likely hard drink that would interact with her potions, quiet her hurt, make all a blur she would not have to consciously experience, but he assured, "It's just water. You should uh, stay hydrated." Ahh. Cassandra shook her head in quiet refusal.

"I had her," Marehis sobbed out, "I had her in my hand, all I needed to do was keep pulling wh- why-?" she could not voice her pain further and Madam de Fer, who'd been pacing the length of their parties camp, was quick to her side, seated and wrapping her arms around the Elf woman's shoulders, pulling her close.

"Oh my darling, you cannot blame yourself."

Cole let out something like a whine, he was seated at the Lieutenant’s side, curled up against Krem’s arm, hands gripping his head like he were in pain. Perhaps he was, the Spirit of Compassion, made to hear Hurt...there was hurt in abundance just now and precious little to do about it but he did try. "It was not any of you," Cole spoke up. "It was him. And ultimately her."

"You watch your mouth boy," Rainier ground out, murderous, even as he had to sniffle, red faced and tear streaked as he warned "don't you dare blame Ellie."

Cole was insistent as he spoke from Eleanor’s mind. "I have to get them out of here, he just wants me. Everyone can get into the escape route while-Cole. Be quiet-we get one last good hit on his forces before we get the hell out of here. It isn't a lie. She was never going to shoot at his men, but they would get hit with what she did launch the trebuchet at. And someone had to launch it. She couldn't let him follow us, so she buried Haven, and it's escape route with it. If he comes for us, he will have to go around the mountain range. But he won't. He just wanted her. And she knew that, wanted to keep us safe." And then he winced. "I am sorry. I did not mean to make it worse."

"We won't leave her buried in the snow," Cullen said. "We can't."

Absolutely not. They could not leave her abandoned they- she- it was so cold, Eleanor hated to be cold-

Her sweet girl. Precious, innocent Eleanor. Oh Maker, what was she going to do? How was this happening? Why? Her chest ached so fiercely, anguish fresh, burning in her heart, in her veins, she wondered if this was the very agony she could inflict upon those with Lyrium in their blood, perhaps it was recompense, once upon a time she sought to make that girl feel this, what a wretched thing that had been. She felt like she might die of her grief, and if that made it so she might be with Eleanor again, perhaps the Maker was showing her compassion after all. How could He let this happen? How could He expect her to survive this?

Krem was sitting on the ground, curled in on himself, arms around his legs, his face buried in his knees while the Iron Bull sat at his other side, an arm around his shoulders. "Stop talking like she's dead!" he raised his tear streaked face to snap, "She isn't!"

"Krem-" Bull started, gently.

"She isn't!" the young man practically roared in the Qunari's face

Oh Cremisius.

"No you stop!" Sera rallied to the Tevinter's defense, rising from her seat. "You stupid- you stupid arseholes! Inky isn't dead 'cause- because she can't be! She can't- she can't survive the Conclave, survive the Breach and every single damn thing in between, just to get k-killed by some old git! She's alive!"

"Sera," Cassandra sighed.

"She- she- screamin' don't mean n-nothin' 'sandra, I'll-," the girl stomped her foot and started screaming, fierce and loud into the sky, and Cassandra shot to her feet, went and covered the girl's mouth before she alarmed someone or alerted something unwanted's attention, as it was Cassandra could faintly hear the echo of a wolf cry in the distance. Sera cried against her hand but finally stopped her din, and when Cassandra pulled her hand away, "See? 'm not dead. So neither's Inky. W-we hav- have to go back! We have to f-find her! She- she- sh-" the Elf girl's eyes were wide and she clutched at her chest as she started hyperventilating.
The Seeker pulled her fast against her. "Sera. Sweetheart, breathe. Try to match your breathing to my own. Good, good, just focus on the next breath," Cassandra tried to soothe, holding the girl close as she trembled and fought her panic. And it was of some help to Cassandra, every heartbeat felt like she were one away from the thing rending literally in twain, stopping forever, but Sera bringing her focus outward brought her some semblance of...well it made her certain she was still needed. She wanted to lay down in the snow and sob until she had Eleanor in her arms again, but Sera needed them just now and that was a binding line between her grief and her semblance of duty.

Dorian sluggishly rose into a seated position from where he'd been laying in the snow, and Cole seemed to perceive what he was after, moved so the Altus could sit alongside the Lieutenant, pull him against his shoulder, Dorian meeting Bull's gaze with tear-filled eyes as he ground out with just the barest bit of tremor in his voice, "Let the boy grieve, Bull. This is only natural. I know you do not like him hurt, but he is." Cassandra could understand, the Iron Bull trying to keep the young man from putting a voice to denial, that those hurting around him would only hurt more for hearing it but it was natural. Oh Maker he is so young, and this is so hard, his sweet heart.

Eleanor was still resting, sleeping peacefully with Anya at her side, poor girl. Sealing the Breach had exhausted her. So much so, Cassandra found herself wandering back to her quarters for the fifth time in an hour just to lay eyes on her and make certain the girl still breathed, was merely resting to recover. Her Mark had not vanished with the Breach, but reports were coming in from the field that there were still Rifts to be closed, so perhaps...perhaps when they were gone for good, her Mark would leave then.

Night had fallen and celebrations were still underway, residents of Haven dancing and making play in the snow, enjoying the starry sky above that shone with just the barest bit of green scarring left still in the heavens, the only indication the Breach had been there to begin with from where they were standing. Lieutenant Aclassi stood atop the drop outside the Chantry, looking up at the sky.

"It is still sinking in, isn't it?" Cassandra asked as she joined him, he startled a bit but smiled as he looked to her.

"Yeah that was...Maker. I still can't believe...you know the first time I saw her, this tiny thing popping out of the Chantry, arm in arm with Marehis. She was real excited about something and just- she looked like she made joy."

Ahh, Cassandra could understand that, and it was incredibly precious to hear, "You sound as if you were rather," what was the word Marehis had used to describe Eleanor and Cremisius's first encounter?..."smitten."

The young man snorted, "Oh yeah, big time. She's just beautiful and compassionate, and she immediately welcomed me, assured me I would get face time with Lady Josie and sat me down to a proper meal. I'm looking at this girl and I'd heard all these things about the Herald of Andraste, demon slayer, sealer of Rifts, her assault on the Breach. I didn't realize I was seated across from her, until Marehis said something, called her the Lady Herald, and even then it didn't click until I saw the Mark myself. It all seemed impossible you know? Still does." he shook his head, and then, as if he were shy to say so, "I...I love her, you know?"

"I've had reason to believe as much, certainly." Cassandra assured warmly, "does she know?"

"I think so? I just...I haven't said it yet," he admitted, "I...I mean I've said it before, to people. My parents, Chargers, Bull. But I've never...this is all new, in a way at least. The last time I told someone I was involved with I loved them it was so Mother wouldn't slap me when we got home.” Violence, Cassandra literally wished violence upon that woman. "I've never done this, the dating thing, the relationship thing, for real. I mean..."

Oh. Oh goodness. Was the young man seeking advice? Cassandra was certainly more than glad to deliver it, pleased he would seek her council. "You struggle with just how to convey your feelings for Eleanor?"

"Little bit. I mean what if I say something and she...it's too soon or something? It's not like I'd want her to say it out of obligation, just to be polite or kind because she doesn't want to leave me hanging."

Cassandra rested a hand on his shoulder to reassure him he needn't look so very concerned, "Cremisius, I know without doubt, she would go to the very ends of the world for you." Cassandra could not say exactly what taught her that, but Eleanor had more than proven as much during her time in Orlais, Cassandra knew now why it was so very vital, why the girl would wholly ignore the need to rest and recover after the Oasis, to get to some supposed casual lunch date with Varric's cousin. "Sweet man, tell her how you feel, plainly, and I'm certain she will return the sentiment in full."

"...do you think it'd be lame to tell her tonight?" he asked.

"Tell who what? Whipped-Krem, what the fuck, why're you up here with Seeker instead of partying your ass off? The end of the world is cancelled!" the Iron Bull's voice sounded as the Qunari approached, backed by the whole of Eleanor's party, Marehis, who detached herself from Solas to go slip into the Chantry to peek in on Eleanor.

"Why the hell aren't you off partying?" Krem shot back.

"I am the party, brat. Came to get Seeker, figured she was up here checkin' on Imekari. How's the kid doing?"

Hmm. Cassandra's hand still rested on Krem's shoulder, so she gave it three gentle squeezes, and what she hoped was an encouraging smile, to privately convey it would indeed not be 'lame' if he felt compelled to confess his love for Eleanor when she woke this evening. "She is well."

And now she wasn't. Cassandra's heart hurt.

"m not- I'm not grieving, sh- she isn't-" Krem whimpered and the Tevinter Mage shushed him, a hand cradling the back of the Lieutenant's head to hold him closer as he let him cry, the Iron Bull looked remorseful, rumbled out an apology as he used his great arm to wrap them both up, tears falling from his good eye as he pressed his lips to the crown of Cremisius's head, his hold so fierce as if he were trying to physically hold the Tevinter men together.

Mother Giselle was seated in the open-faced tent near their fire, holding congress with her fellow Chantry clerics and Sisters, Chancellor Roderick, holding vigil for them, praying over their camp, for those they lost…for their fallen Herald.

For Eleanor.

“Shadows fall/And hope has fled. Steel your heart/The dawn will come…”

Mother Giselle’s voice*. And while it certainly felt like no such dawn would come, Leliana, Cullen, eventually all including the Iron Bull—she was uncertain how he knew the hymn, but he joined in out of respect—were singing. Save Cassandra, so suddenly found herself being supported by Sera as she held the girl and wept, wishing with everything she could back—that she could go back to that night in the Hinterlands, what a fool she’d been then! She’d had Eleanor within arm’s reach, but she’d sat so very far from the girl even as they kept watch, sang this very hymn together after a rather wretched day trying and failing it felt like, to secure the Hinterlands. She should have held her then, she should have always held that girl whenever she could! She did not feel the Maker’s peace as the whole of their camp sang of His promises, she felt hollow, and world weary as the final note rang out.

The cry of a wolf pierced the night sky, Anya jumped up from her seat and began barking like mad before racing off followed by Solas…oh thank everything, he shot up, gasping in air he used to cry out,

"Ellie is near!"

Dorian and Madam de Fer's gazes snapped up, the Mages speaking in unison, "Her soul is in the Fade?"

That…oh Maker that was such a horrific prospect and somehow selfishly Cassandra was grateful for it, that the girl had sought them was…was she scared? Confused? Did she even know she was dead? Had she something to say to them?

Sera had shared with her, in private, what Solas had explained as the young Elf girl picking up residual magic and unnaturally casting to defend Eleanor—Sera had shyly admitted to being petrified she might be becoming a Mage. Of course, such a notion was ridiculous but…Cassandra had never wished more for such a possibility—she felt she could dedicate herself to such a thing, if it meant she could speak with Eleanor again before the Maker reunited them.

"Have we Lyrium?" Madam de Fer asked in earnest "oh good heavens we must help her-"

"She is not in the Fade, she is here," Solas insisted. "She approaches our camp as we speak but she is injured, weary, she cannot even cast- south, follow the ridge, go!"

Sera launched herself at the Apostate, hugging him fiercely while Marehis rushed to get Adan. Cullen was on his feet barking for soldiers to follow as he and Cassandra, raced to seek-

"There! I see her!" Cullen called out as they ran. “Good girl, Anya!”

And now Cassandra did as well, in the distance oh, "Thank the Maker!"

But more would be asked of Him. Eleanor, weak and limping, barely able to pull her legs up out of the snow that she sank into up to the tops of her knees, frigid cold. Cassandra's heart shuddered when the girl collapsed onto her knees, but Anya was there, supporting some of the girl’s weight, licking at her face in enthusiasm that surely helped to keep the girl conscious. And in the next moment Cassandra was there, able to lay hands on her. On she and Cullen both, the man had beaten her by a millisecond, had Eleanor in his arms and Cassandra had hers around he and this precious girl, oh however had she survived?

Only barely, it seemed. The girl rasped out a breath that sounded like relief and then she was unconscious, in the arms of those she trusted. Cullen cradled her in his arms, setting pace for their camp, for Healer Adan.

And Ser Stitches it seemed. The healers waited for them when they returned, it looked like everyone was on strict orders to keep at distance so they could work but all stayed to watch and "Ma da'vehnan! Elgar’nan, Mythal, halani!" Marehis sobbed out in urgency, Solas and Sera holding her the only thing keeping her on the sidelines it seemed. Solas paled, burying his face against Marehis’s hair, stricken by her cry.

Rainier looked rather the hypocrite, he visibly took a few steps forward only to step back with a hand on the Lieutenant’s arm,

"We should stay out of their way, my boy."

Krem swallowed as he watched Cullen lay the girl down by the fire, “M-Maker, is she…?”

"Gonna be okay brat, I hear her,” Bull assured, “Sounds tough, but so is she.”

Cassandra had never been so relieved, never in all her life and still trepidation flooded her, she felt it seeping into her bones—Eleanor was here, she was alive, it was more than they had mere moments ago. But there was so much wrong, battles still to win in order to fully secure the certainty of her life.

Her complexion was practically grey, cracked lips bleeding and turning purple. There was a gash at her left temple, it had bled profusely, the girl’s face was caked with half-drying half-freezing blood. At Solas’s instruction, Adan removed the glove from Eleanor’s Marked hand, for an instant Cassandra was struck by the horrific impression that her Mark had spread but no, it merely burned brighter. There was something else shining near her Mark, it was...Maker, metal of some sort had burned a hole in her glove and melted in the palm of her hand. When Adan rolled up her sleeve it revealed thick, harsh rings of bruising from the Elder One’s hand. There was no steam coming from the necklace Sera had crafted for her, no smell of Embrium, which, at the moment, was vital.

“Damn it girl,” Adan swore as he used the implement he put in his ears, pressing its other end to Eleanor’s chest to listen to her lungs, “did you lot just hold her over every fire in Haven? Smoke inhalation is bad enough, but this air is killing her, and she—” he sighed in harsh frustration when he twisted the top off of Eleanor’s Embrium water flask and found it despairingly empty.

“Here,” Krem wrenched his arm out of Thom’s hold, pulling a flask from his hip as he went to Adan, “It’s just Embrium and water, little bit of um, Elf Root tonic too since Stitches said it was okay. Cole said something to me about the air scraping, and that just sounds like it’s tearing her lungs up or something, so I worry.”

“Give it here,” Adan instructed, taking the flask in hand and filling the necklace, “Boy. I could kiss you on the damn mouth ‘little bit of Elf Root’ that’s exactly what she needs right now, as much Elf Root as her body can process, a straight shot of it to her lungs. We need to get her hydrated I’ll work on that—Liam do you- ahh good.” he said when he realized Stitches was already soaking a cloth in Elf Root tonic.

The Charger’s Healer cleared his throat. “You remember what to do, yeah? Done this loads of times,” he said, to the Lieutenant, extending the cloth to Krem. Offering him the opportunity to put himself to use, give him something to do that would occupy his focus and give him the satisfaction that he was doing something that would help Eleanor.

It was a simple enough task, the young Tevinter took the cloth in hand, which trembled for a mere moment as he looked scared he may well hurt the girl before he pushed past that bit of unnecessary insecurity. Wholly unnecessary, it brought Cassandra a sense of relief, contentment as she watched how very carefully the young man treated the injury to Eleanor’s head.

"Maker, what the hell did that?" the Lieutenant asked when Stitches moved on to Eleanor’s hand, examining it as he thought of just how to go about how to treat it.

"I think she uh, burnt the lock off your trunk," the Iron Bull supplied, "Pretty bad ass."

"She-," Krem took a deep breath, bracing himself before he began helping Stitches as the Healer worked to extract the melted metal from her palm, it left a trail of blistering— it was horrible, and Cassandra could only bear to watch because as bit my bit the injury was exposed, the Lieutenant steadily applied Elf Root tonic that did much to set it to rights.

"Her shoulder," Cole offered to the Healer's now that they'd done what they could to treat her more serious injuries like her head and lungs.

That...that horrible creature, it had wrenched Eleanor's arm almost cleanly out of her socket it was partially dislocated, and the pop was as sickening as it was swift for Stitches to get it fully back into place. For a second time. It was the shoulder she'd dislocated in the Oasis, it had only within the last week or so been regaining its full range of motion with the help of Elf Root treatments.

Madam de Fer’s tent had been one of the many things lost, abandoned in Haven’s demise, but they did have shelter—while their evacuation plans did involve Haven’s gate, they did have rather a good system in place despite their pitfalls. They got Eleanor settled as comfortably as they could in these conditions; Marehis was at her side, holding the girl’s unmarked hand as she slept. Where were they going to go? Did any of their allies know what had happened? They needed to make contact, first with those they had in the field, then their allies for assistance, find a place for the Inquisition to rebuilt headquarters, redirect their supply of food, materials, ingredients—

Everything Eleanor owned was in her cabin, save for what she had on her person or in her pack—Marehis had kept it after their assault on the Breach. A small mercy came in that they had been prepared for travel—none of them had unpacked from their journey to the Temple of Sacred Ashes, neither had they stopped in their own quarters except to lay Eleanor down in Cassandra’s. They’d had their packs, which meant they had some medicine, sleep clothes they wore on the road, and the like. But…oh, she thought it was albeit befitting, that Eleanor’s turn of phrase fit the situation—Cassandra’s heart was indeed very sad that the home they had provided the girl was gone, all of her things, while they were just things…they were moments—all of her books, her coming of age presents, her first celebrated birthday.

“Hey,” Krem approached Cassandra as the Nevarran woman stood in the entrance to the tent they’d laid Eleanor to rest in, watching over the girl, “sorry to disturb you but I’ve some things for you.”

This young man. Oh this sweet, blessed, most precious boy! Cassandra found herself caught up in her moment of realization she barely realized she’d started to cry, let alone pull the young man in for a fierce hug until he was hugging her back and words of gratitude fell from her lips, “Cremisius, thank you, Maker bless you, truly.”

She didn’t need to unwrap the silken scarf Eleanor often slept with, to know what he had done. But when she finally did…oh, ‘I’ve some things for you’ he did. She had wondered how he had Eleanor’s Chant on his person—he’d collected it when he stormed her cabin before their retreat. But that was not what the Lieutenant meant.

Not only had the young man the presence of mind to save Eleanor’s things, he’d also taken the opportunity while their numbers congregated in the Chantry to grab a few things from Cassandra’s quarters—a few books, her own supply of potion, but most importantly he had rescued her locket, the sole image she had of Anthony.

“What’re you still doing up? Should be getting some rest,” Varric’s voice drew her gaze up from the locket in her lap. She was seated by their campfire when the Dwarf approached her, looking half asleep himself though he was more aware, startled it seemed and then, "Oh shit. Crying. Uhh, hey," he attempted soothing as he came and...wrapped Cassandra in a hug, patting her back, "Seeker it's okay. Everything's gonna be alright. We've taken a hard hit but we're all gonna work together, get back on our feet."

"I am fine, Varric-"

He pulled away from her then, "No one's fine right now. And you... Look, I uh, I'm not an idiot, okay? I know. Why you can't drink? I've got your back, Cassandra. I’m serious, whatever you need."

"You...know?" Cassandra asked, uncertain. And when the Dwarf hesitantly nodded, “Have I been displaying symptoms?” she asked, concerned, mildly horrified. The Iron Bull being aware, she understood, but Varric? She thought she was doing well, her medication was assisting her as it should. Had she been behaving strangely?

"No!" he was quick to assure, “You uh, I mean you’ve probably cried more in the past twelve hours than you have in the past twelve years but no one’s gonna bat an eye at that I mean, shit. Everyone’s got plenty of reasons to need a good cry session.” That much was true, Cassandra allowed. “You been feeling alright? Adan checked you out after everything?”

She would not seek the Healer if Haven’s destruction had sent her spiraling. Cullen, Sera, Leliana—she had friends and allies she could rely on, “My injuries were minor, potion set me to rights.” Varric looked wholly relieved to hear that. “I trust you have not said anything to anyone?”

“No one’s gonna hear it from me. Except I’m sure Cole knows because of his whole ‘thoughts’ thing but I pulled him aside, told him to keep his mouth shut if he hears you or anyone else thinking about it. But uh...I mean, Krem knows? What about Cullen?”

“Cremisius is aware, he...provided potion from Adan’s, when I was running out, and I trust his discretion. Cullen is aware, certainly, he was the first I consulted before seeking Adan.”

Varric nodded. “Yeah, of course. Curly took it well, right?”

“He has been supportive,” Cassandra assured.

“Good. Cuz otherwise I’d have to kick his ass,” Varric informed her. “Look, everything’s pretty up in the air right now but you gotta take care of yourself, alright? You need anything, break, some rest, I can yell at people for you.”

Cassandra huffed. “I hardly know where to begin giving orders, nor would it be appropriate for you to take over my station—if anything, Cullen would stand in for me in such a scenario, as I would for him.”

Varric nodded. “Alright, just let me know if there’s anything I can do. I’m uh, real proud of you, you’re handling this all pretty incredibly considering everything,” he said, patting Cassandra on the shoulder. “Get some sleep, okay? You need anything before hitting the sack? We’re good on water or uh, you hungry or anything?”
“I am well, Varric. Thank you.”

“No problem, Seeker.”

Rest came easier to her than she expected, sleeping comfortably alongside Cullen in their shared tent, potion of course helped tremendously. And her gratitude to the Lieutenant for securing such potion had her sitting up in her bedroll first thing, gasping, “Mister Aclassi!” Oh good heavens!

Cullen sighed with sleep, sitting up and staring at her through half-closed eyes, “The young man has already laid claim to my precious mija’s heart, do not tell me he’s managed to steal mi cielo’s as well.”

“I meant the elder Aclassi—”

“You’ve not even met the man!” Cullen complained, sighing, “It will be incredibly awkward but if I must, I will duel him upon his arrival. Which will be fine,” he assured, “I considered as much last night, spoke with the Iron Bull and Varric on the matter. Leliana can get word to his transport—too assure them Cremisius is well and safe, we are just experiencing a change of address.”

“Oh. Good,” Cassandra breathed, relieved. And then, “Cielo?” she questioned.

Cullen smiled, something warm as he kissed her on the lips, the Commander humming as if he’d tasted something sweet before saying something sweeter, “I have slept well in the confines of your quarters, this tent have I not? I’ve no need to seek the open air when I have you—mi cielo, my sky,” he took her lips with his own, pushing her to lie back as he rolled to hover over her, “my heaven,” he insisted.

Good Maker, god in the heavens.

“Uhh,” the Iron Bull could be heard clearing his throat, and Cassandra peered around Cullen’s shoulders to see the Qunari’s silhouette against the tent, he was standing just outside its entrance, “Morning. Sorry to interrupt. Healer’s gonna wake Imekari, get some food, potion in her system, if you two wanna be there.”

She was certain Cullen understood when she pushed him off of her as if he were on fire and she’d no intention of putting it out, abandoning him to rise on his own and run to catch up with her as she dashed from the tent.

Marehis was asleep, her hand still covering Eleanor’s as she slumped over in her chair, head resting against the Herald’s cot. She stirred when Solas put a hand on her shoulder, “Vehnan? Ellie will rouse a moment if you wish to see her.”

She was certain Cullen understood when she pushed him off of her as if he were on fire and she’d no intention of putting it out, abandoning him to rise on his own and run to catch up with her as she dashed from the tent.

Marehis was asleep, her hand still covering Eleanor’s as she slumped over in her chair, head resting against the Herald’s cot. She stirred when Solas put a hand on her shoulder, “Vehnan? Ellie will rouse a moment if you wish to see her.”

“Ma seranas,” Marehis said, pressing her hands to her face as she shook herself awake, sighing as she sat back, and her hand rose to lay over Cassandra’s when the Seeker came to stand beside her, resting a hand on the Elf woman’s shoulder.

Solas closed his eyes and focused on their bond, and after a moment Eleanor’s eyes sluggishly opened to stare at them, bleary as she slowly came to her senses.

“Good morning, little Herald. You’re safe. We have broth and potion; can you sit up?” Adan asked gently.

She could not, she couldn’t even speak it seemed, she was utterly spent, falling back asleep already as Marehis climbed into the cot with her to support her, help her sit up while resting against the Elf woman who carefully offered her sips of broth it felt like a miracle to watch her take, Cassandra was unspeakably grateful to see even the smallest semblance of progress toward healing.

Although that progress seemed halted when Adan began administering potion. Marehis had her potions on her person when they fled Haven, thank the Maker. Elf Root tonic, and her potion for depression were accepted readily enough but when he offered a third bottle she held up a weak, trembling hand to stop him, shaking her head.

“Ellie?” Adan asked. “Sweetheart, you took a pretty nasty bump to the head, it’s okay to be confused—this is just for monthlies, you take it every day.” he assured her.

She took in a rattling breath, and quietly croaked out, “St-Stitches.”

“No, you didn’t need any stitches-“

“Liam.”

Ahh. Mister Stitches then.

“Hang tight Boss-girl, I’ll get him,” the Iron Bull said as he bound off to fetch his company Healer.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, confused. Perhaps the girl was truly disoriented.

“Well if it isn’t my least favorite patient—and I say that because I hate your need for healing little love,” Stitches greeted the girl amicably as he swept into the tent, ready to assist.

“We’re having trouble getting her to take this,” Adan spoke quietly to the other healer, handing off Eleanor’s potion.

“Well that’s alright, we’ll get it sorted—feeling overfull, or like you’re working with too much in your system right now? Sounds crazy but more water will help…” he stopped when he met Eleanor’s gaze, the girl was looking at him very hard before she looked to the bottle in his hand, and back again. “Ahh. I think I understand. We uh…it’ll be okay.”

“Please,” Eleanor rasped, tears in her eyes, and with her unmarked hand she formed a series of…Cassandra was uncertain, the Iron Bull had mentioned the use of Sign Language in his camp, “Please.”

“You’re absolutely certain?” Stitches asked, and when Eleanor nodded. “I’m sorry, could I ask for a moment alone? Healer/patient confidentiality.”

Eleanor nodded, and Marehis pressed a kiss to her hair before very reluctantly helping her to lie down and leaving her alone in the care of their healers.

It was dark again, when she woke—no prompting in the bond for the first time in days, just slowly becoming aware of the world again on her own.
Haven was gone. She broke it. H- he’d broken it, but she’d buried it, it was gone.

And it wasn’t. Haven wasn’t just cabins and tents. More so, it was the people who lived in it.

So many of them were dead…the Mess hall had been wholly torn apart she’d seen one of Sera’s Friends pulling a staff member away from-

Oh Maker she felt sick. Brains were meant to be on the inside of a person’s head, they were such delicate organs- Cook didn’t deserve-

“You are awake,” a thick Orlesian accent at her ear spoke, and Ellie blearily looked up to see Mother Giselle seated at her bedside, holding a book, huh. She vaguely heard someone softly reading the Chant now that she thought of it.

“—you are being unreasonable!” Leliana was shouting at Cullen. Ellie’s gaze went to the campfire in the middle of all their tents, the Advisors, Cassandra, Marehis…everyone it looked like, all of her party, even Cremisius and the Chargers were seated nearby, circled up and listening like there was some big meeting underway.

“The Inquisition has nowhere to go, you can’t expect-“ the Commander argued back.

“Stop yelling, all of you!” Lady Josie shouted, “We will never make a proper decision if we cannot hear ourselves think!”

“I agree,” Cassandra said.

“Brilliant,” Cullen snapped, “that’s one thing we can agree on.”

“Hey, check the ‘tude Curly. Everyone’s stressing right now,” Varric spoke up.

Oh. They were arguing about where to go from here. Yeah…they probably needed to get moving if they could, but they could run themselves to death if they had nowhere to run to.

“No child, you should rest,” Mother Giselle insisted when Ellie sat up. Ugh. Yeah, body was protesting too, she was so sore all over, and her chest was on fire, in terrible pain both physically and emotionally, her shoulder was pounding with pain with the beat of her heart, and she could already feel her hips aching.

But, she’d kind of buried their last home without so much as a ‘by your leave’, so she should help with finding them a new one. And she was still…she was still part of the Inquisition, right? Even though the Breach was sealed?

“I should help,” Ellie said, yowch, maybe…maybe with lots of listening though, her throat was just, fire, speaking felt like a knife dragging along the back of her throat. It wasn’t like she was going to be coming up with any big solutions she thought, but she could still be an extra set of ears and maybe having her sitting there awake would…everyone seemed to try harder to get along better around her, and what they needed was team work right now. She smiled her thanks when the elder woman rose to her feet and took her Marked hand, grasping at her elbow to support her as she got down off the cot. She was still in armor, her skin felt somehow itchy and slimy and gross like it was slowly sludging into becoming one with it, but at least it was warm.

Oh, Anya was there, she’d been resting under the cot, but she came out now that Ellie was up, awe. That was sweet she’d stayed with her, Ellie guessed she hadn’t been allowed on the cot huh? “Hey girl,” Ellie offered, and the pup yipped, rubbing against her legs almost like she was helping support her, push her along as she took the few steps to the tent post. Maybe being upright wasn’t a good idea, her head was pounding, and her vision swam as she leaned against the post.

“Hey,” someone came close and had their hand up under her forearm, more support—Cremisius raised his free hand to cup her face, thumb brushing along her cheek, “you’re awake. How’re you feeling?”

She offered him as good a smile as she could manage just now. Maker she was glad he was alright.

“Eleanor,” Cassandra said, everyone had been sitting in pouty silence it seemed like, but they looked up when the Seeker said her name and came to join her and Cremisius. “Sweetheart, you should be in bed.”

Ellie shook her head, wrapping her arms around the Seeker’s neck, the woman hugged her back…poor Cremisius’s arm was sort of trapped between their stomachs but he just moved so he was hugging Ellie from behind. Hug sandwich—that was totally a remedy for ‘post-traumatic-home-demolition broken heart’. Which was officially a disease, and Ellie was sort of dying from it right now.

“I want t-to be with-,” she winced at the sharp tear in her throat, and Cassandra shushed her before the Seeker and Lieutenant each took one of her arms, Anya shuffling after them as they brought her to sit by the fire, Marehis immediately offering her a place at her side, pulling Ellie into her lap oh gosh, the woman was crying, warm tears against Ellie’s neck. Oh, her neck...that...that reminded her, and now she was crying too, the words tore from her throat, "H-he g-grabbed me, I-I'm so s-sorry mami," she whimpered into the woman's shoulder.

“Shh shh shh,” Marehis hushed, “oh sweet girl. What are you talking about?”

"The Elder One grabbed her, took her up by the collar of her coat to pin her to the trebuchet," Cole supplied. "His hands are like claws, they cut the chain of your necklace and it fell into the snow, she is sorry she lost it. Do you hate her?"

"I could never!" Marehis sounded horrified at the notion, "Oh da'vehnan, that necklace was just a thing, you are what I care about, I'm grateful it is your arms I have around my neck than my mother's necklace, do not even think of it, your life is far more precious."

“We have any…?” she heard Cremisius asking.

"Ahh, in my pack, it's just in there," Madam de Fer spoke up, gesturing to one of the nearby tents, “help yourself, darling.”

“Awe Inky,” Sera said, coming to sit in front of her, Anya climbing into the Elf girl’s lap. “Don't be sad okay? S'hard to be mad at you, when you're sad.”

"M-mad?" Ellie croaked out.

"Only 'cause I love you, you little! Friggin jerk! Next time you wanna run a little suicide mission, have Cole fill in, yeah? He’s already dead, and you’re not allowed to die!"

‘I’m sorry’, she mouthed. She really was. Sera nodded, reaching out to rest a hand on Ellie's knee, "s'okay Ink."

“I am not dead,” Cole corrected, “but Ellie, I could have launched the trebuchet and escaped. Oh. You did not want to risk me, that is kind- ahh. Corypheus would have gone after you, followed us into the mines before its entrance could be buried in the snow.”

Varric visibly startled, “Whoa whoa wait, Corypheus?”

“That is what he told Ellie his name was. Exalt the Elder One: that is the will of Corypheus. You will kneel. Make me! he did but you did your best,” Cole assured her, “You were very brave. Screaming is response to pain, and it was very painful—it is not your fault he tried to remove your Mark but he only made it worse, it feels more now, doesn’t it? Oh crap crap, demons! But it startled you worse when the Rift appeared, but then it sucked up the demons and sealed them away in the Fade, Rift closing behind them—it took all of your power, that is why your magic is quiet, not gone, just resting.”

“Shit. Uh, like-” Varric started.

“Yes,” Cole said.

“Well. Shit.”

“He did something to your Mark—tried to remove it?” the Iron Bull questioned.

Ellie nodded. She didn’t much care if it hurt, “Asshole.”

Marehis let out a wet sounding laugh as she kissed the top of Ellie’s head, the adults around her offering up a little laughter of their own, Cremisius smiled, snorting—he was back with…oh that was sweet, it’d been tea he was after earlier, he’d found a little pot to boil water in and got it hanging over their fire.

“Cremisius, come,” Cassandra said, waving the Lieutenant over to sit with her while they waited for the water to start heating up. “Mister Aclassi has been very helpful—he’d a flask of Embrium mixture for your necklace, it was empty when you found us.”

“Keep him distracted—I have to get this thing launched! He’s busy talking, just pull the cork and—there! You talk too much!” Cole said, “She threw boiling water in his face so his hands would not hold her pinned. She used her sword to cut the line and then she was able to run.”

Cassandra’s eyes looked teary, “Truly?” Ellie nodded.

Everyone seemed to be calmer now, no more arguing at least, thought that might have been because everyone was just quiet while Ellie sat and sipped at her tea. It helped a lot, soothed her throat, and warmth in her belly soothed a bit at the start of cramping lower. “Thank you, Cremisius.”

He nodded. “Of course. Are you hungry?”

“I’m okay.” She didn’t…she was kind of worried about that—food. How much did they have exactly? Were there hungry people in their camp? She didn’t want to risk taking something someone else might need more than her. They needed…they needed a lot, and they needed it fast.

“You haven’t been given anything other than a little broth today Ellie-girl,” Thom fretted.

“Certainly child, you should eat if you’ve the ability,” Madam de Fer agreed.

“I’ll whip you up something light, alright sweetheart?” Cullen asked, oh gosh, eyes—he looked hopeful and sad? Was he guilt ing her into accepting food? She nodded, so, it worked.
“Thanks.”

The Commander smiled as he got up to set about ‘whipping something up’ though he came and stopped to press a kiss to her forehead, gosh.

“Eleanor?” Solas prompted, “Would you come with me for a moment? There are things I wish to discuss.”

Huh. “Sure thing,” she felt a little better, but she wasn’t the steadiest on her feet when she rose to go with him. Did they really need to talk in private? Was it something bad?

Marehis stood up with her, supporting her when she swayed, “Is this truly necessary?” she asked him.

“Vehnan, I do apologize, but I should examine the Mark—a precaution, after such a violent intrusion with it. If Ellie is at ease, I would prefer our examination be contained. It will involve Rift magic interacting with her Mark and should anything go awry, she and I would be able to remain unharmed, but I cannot say the same for any bystanders.”

Oh. That…that made sense, she guessed? And she definitely didn’t want to hurt Marehis. It…it did feel a little different. It burned more, brighter she thought but not bigger like it’d spread or anything. Ellie nodded, they should check it out.

“You be careful with Inky!” Sera called after them.

Solas’s arm was around her, supporting her as they walked through camp…and away from the Inquisition’s camp entirely, which yeah. Examining her Mark, that…that made sense. It did. So why did something feel off? Just…maybe she was on edge, paranoid after everything. She was safe with Solas.

He led her to this lantern. Something that could be lit with veil fire just, sticking up out of the snow. Like someone had put it there…and Solas approached it like he’d known precisely where it was, but that could make sense. Ellie wasn’t really sure—oh. well. It was Drakonis 3rd. But he’d had time explore the area around their camp, and maybe a scout or something told him about it. Still it was a little disconcerting, just, him walking them right up to it and lighting it with a wave of his hand.

And then he let her go, sitting down in the snow with her, and he explained something of the Orb Corypheus used. That it was ‘his people’s’ and he would help her however he could with understanding and retrieving it—it needed out of Corypheus’s hands. That he would appreciate it if Ellie would keep the Orb’s origins to herself because he only said as much so she would trust his guidance on the matter, but he would prefer no one else know the Orb could be connected to Elves. That he feared the world at large would blame them for the Breach entirely, if word got out.

…”You’re certain it’s Dalish?” she asked.

“I am certain of its origins, da’len.”

And then he got to the lantern he’d led her to*. That it was one of several that lined a mountain path—a path they could follow to a place he’d discovered in the Fade. Skyhold. A fortress, long abandoned, that would suit their purposes—they could merely set up there, claim it as theirs, they were welcome to it. She felt strange about that too—that he’d just sat there while the others argued over where they could go—but then…well she supposed it made sense when he laid out that everyone needed someone they could depend upon right now. That she’d already done much to make herself that person—a symbol of hope, making the ultimate sacrifice for the Inquisition, only to survive. Losing Haven was heartbreaking and moving forward would be hard. If she showed them the way, guided them along this path of light, and brought them to Skyhold, it would do much to heal them emotionally, spiritually, and ultimately provide for them physically. So he wanted her to be the one that lead the way, but he wished to discuss it with her beforehand.

“I would not pressure you, da’vehnan, but if you seek my council on the matter, it is what I would advise.”

It scared her a little, to try to step up for everyone like that, but it was the closest to genuine Solas had been since he opened his mouth in the past hour. Yeah, she was tired, and sore, and hurting in about fifty different ways—she’s not the best at math and right now she doesn’t need to be, it feels like fifty!—but lots of people were hurt, they’d elderly and injured—if she set the pace, everyone could keep up, stick together, there’d be no way someone got left behind, and everyone could help each other.

And so she agreed.

And then Solas walked her back to camp.

“Just a heads up,” she spoke quietly as they walked, “I’m um…going to be running my courses here soon, I’m not bleeding yet but-”

“You are cramping,” he offered sympathetically.

“Yeah so…I mean I’m okay—physically, I mean I’m still beat up, but I don’t think I need monitoring, you know? I mean Cole will be watching out for me and can help if I need it, and he can do that without actually experiencing symptoms with me, and it’s kind of embarrassing for me, and I feel badly, and I think the last thing we need right now is both of us being a hormonal cramping mess,” she offered, trying to tease.

“Ahh, I appreciate it da’vehnan. If you are certain, I would allow you discretion—I will not seek the bond unless there is an emergency.”

“Thanks, I appreciate it.” She really did.

Oh Maker she wanted to cry, this…this was all…what was happening? She…she was pretty sure Solas was lying to her. In fact she knew he was. There’d been a pretty major wall of fire and debris between them, and Corypheus was huge but he’d held the Orb low, close to his side, she hadn’t even seen it until he was using it, and when he did? She’d worried, asked after everyone with Healer Adan, Solas—she’d been horrified to hear how awful a state he’d been in but…maybe…I mean he’d been with her in the Fade? Seen it then? But there was something in how he was speaking. Something in how he was speaking, how he wanted her secrecy—she could understand, in fact she did understand, that if word got out about the Orb being Dalish, Elves would be persecuted further. But that was something they could keep in-house—no one outside the Advisors, they should know everything there is to know about this orb shouldn’t they?

And then there was the fact that his reasoning for pulling her aside?

Bullshit.

“Ahh, there’s our Herald now, and how fares the dread-Mark?” Dorian asked, trying to go for jovial, he was sweet. And his insincerity came from not wanting to be too open with just how very much he was worried. It wasn’t the wrong sort of lie, it was a mix of both their pride.

It was on the tip of her tongue. She wanted to call him out a bit, wanted to tell them he hadn’t even bothered to look at it. But if this…getting him to stay out of the bond would be pointless if she tipped him off to his face.

And so she did the only thing she could think to do in front of everyone, in front of Solas.

They were sitting on Ellie’s bed, she and Cremisius, knitting like mad to finish her list of scarves and hats she wanted to make before leaving for the Oasis. The Tevinter was just finishing the Iron Bull’s horn cozies as she was casting off another scarf.

“Whose that one for?” he asked, taking up her parchment pad sitting between them, she liked what he’d done with her first gift from him, a little parchment tag with twine and he was helping—had everyone’s name on a slip of parchment he’d tear from the pad and carefully cut a hole in with his knife big enough to put twine through without tearing up a bunch of paper.

“Solas.”

“Cool, got it,” he said working his magic with the tag before handing it off to her so she could lace it onto the scarf however she liked, “I’ve never really talked to him much. He uh, nice? What’s his story?”

He...huh. “I dunno really—he is nice, the nicest! But I don’t know a lot about what he was doing before the Inquisition. He studies the Fade a lot? And...he grew up in a village.” But uh, what village she couldn’t say. Was he...was he from Ferelden? Or the Free Marches? His accent wasn’t...she’d never really heard anyone speak like him before, so that wasn’t super helpful. “He doesn’t talk about it I guess. Why?”

Cremisius shrugged. “Dunno, just curious. I mean that’s kind of weird he doesn’t—sorry, not my business.”

Ellie shrugged. “I guess it is a little strange...I mean everyone has things they’d rather not talk about.”

“Their entire life though? I mean Thom was pretending to be a whole other person and he still gave you real things about his past—where he grew up, his family, his time in tourney.”

Ellie mulled it over a bit. “Well Solas talks about the Fade a lot, that seems to be the part of his life before that he cares the most about so, it makes sense that’d be what he focuses on?” and then, “Are you worried or something? About Solas?”

“Just curious I guess,” he supposed, and for a second it looked like he was making to scratch at his forehead, but he quickly extended his thumb and pinkie finger out. The Sign for ‘bull’, but it was also a signal of sorts. An understanding they reached—Ellie knew there would sometimes be things he couldn’t talk about in relation to his work with the Iron Bull, and that was okay, so if he ever needed to be dishonest with her, or she walked up to something in conversation that he couldn’t get into—‘Bull’ and it made anything he had to lie about more honest and let her know not to press.

But it also told her there was something to press. So here and now, when she had things to be ‘just curious’ about with Solas, she went to Cremisius. He was seated by Cassandra still, and she held out her arms, readily accepted, and she sat in his lap, curled up against him, and laced her unmarked fingers with his, offering him a kiss on the cheek.

And then she very gently squeezed his hand three times, “Solas checked it out.” and then she ran the back of her Marked hand under her chin, like she was reaching to scratch an itch on the side of her neck, but the motion—brushing the back of your hand under your chin, it was the sign for ‘lie’.

Cassandra’s hand was resting on his shoulder and he steadily met Ellie’s gaze as he casually raised his free hand to grasp the Seeker’s thumb tapping the back of her hand three times. “Is it bad?” Cremisius asked. Then going for teasing, “The Iron Bull will go full-blown mother-hen if it’s bad.”

Was that…was that code? Cremisius never called the Iron Bull erm, well, ‘the’ Iron Bull except the few times he’d been formally introducing him or something, he was always Chief or Bull. And he definitely signaled Cassandra? What was going on?

“I’ll fuck something up if it’s bad,” the Iron Bull assured.

“Nothing too bad,” she said hoping…and she didn’t want them getting the wrong idea, that Solas had taken her off to hurt her or something. Just, “Burns a little. More than usual. But it isn’t anything detrimental.”

“Ahh, yes,” Solas cleared his throat, sounding a little uncomfortable…that might be good. “Truly, I have deduced the Mark is not spreading or causing harm. It has merely gained a new ability Ellie will grow used to in time.”

“Good,” Dorian said to her, “we can’t have you turning Breach green from head to toe—you’d clash horribly with the furniture plan I’m visualizing for our new headquarters, we’d be a mockery.”

“I actually think Solas and I found a solution for our current homelessness situation,” she offered up as brightly as she could.

“Truly, mjia?” Lady Josie asked in earnest.

Ellie nodded. Gosh she was tired. Though Cullen brought her warm soup, and she just loved him so much. It helped with the lump in her throat, warmed her up, gave her reason to pause and think as she, with a little help from Solas, explained about Skyhold, that Ellie knew how to lead them there.

“You discovered this place in the Fade?” Leliana asked, “Are you certain of its existence, Eleanor?”

Ellie nodded. It better exist. And Solas said, “I verified it myself.”

“Eleanor, you’re certain you’re well enough?” Cassandra worried.

“Uh-huh,” nope, but they couldn’t stay here, she’d be moving forward anyway, and doing things this way, she’d be the one setting the pace, she wouldn’t be trying to keep up with anyone to save face. “I can do it—I’m the one that knows the way, right? We’ll work together, same as always—my party’s just, a few hundred strong this trip.”

And so, it was decided. Come daybreak, they’d start heading that way. For now, her party members discussed the finer details—checking in on each other too, it sounded like, which was nice, and Ellie just sat and listened, resting her forehead against Cremisius’s neck and trying not to be too obvious with the crying thing. It was happening, she needed it on all of the levels, and anyone who brought it up could actually fight her. Cremisius rubbed circles on her back, quietly comforting.

“Imekari,” the Iron Bull said as things started winding down, “you wanna bunk with me tonight? Madam’s tent was a casualty, you’d be warmer hanging with me.”

“Thanks,” she agreed, wincing as she stood up.

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis worried.

“’m okay, just tired.” And officially needed bandaging. And a bath. And a hug. Pretty sure she’d get at least two out of three in the Charger’s camp.

“Get some good rest sweet girl, don’t hesitate to send for me if you’ve need,” Marehis insisted, pressing a kiss to Ellie’s temple before letting her go.

“Come on Imekari, we’ll get you settled,” the Iron Bull said.

They did—The Iron Bull and Cremisius led her to where the Chargers were staying, their tent was empty for now, and the Qunari said he’d give them a minute. A minute in which Cremisius returned Ellie’s scarf, her things he- he’d saved lots of the important stuff, even Cole’s rocks. And most importantly right now—

“They were laying out, so I grabbed ‘em real quick,” he explained when she launched herself at him for a hug. She hadn’t been sure how the Breach would go down, how she’d feel afterward, but there was supposed to be a party, and she’d thought she’d be totally wiped once it all wound down so. She’d laid out one of her dresses, and a set of sleep clothes so she didn’t have to go digging around for them, and Cremisius had rescued them! And her boots—the little ankle ones Cullen ‘got’ her! It was a little embarrassing, but she was grateful he’d saved her nicer underthings too—it wasn’t-! She’d laid them out to wear later, but she wasn’t exactly planning on anything too…just…she’d been planning on dressing up for the party! She hadn’t known she’d end up sleeping through it. And yeah, maybe she kind of wanted to make sure that if Cremisius saw her in her underthings, they were the nice lacy white ones. That she was so so so so so not going anywhere near until her uterus was done with its hissy fit, her regular things would suffice for now though Maker she needed new things so badly-

Mister Aclassi!

Oh she’d asked about him, duh. Wow her brain was kind of just…not the best right now. She’d asked if she could see Cullen and Cassandra again before falling back to sleep the first time they woke her up. They already reached out to the transport and now, they needed to get them instructions to get to Skyhold. She hoped he was safe, and that…Maker, had anyone heard what happened to the Inquisition? She hoped he wasn’t scared for Cremisius, she promised him he was safe!

And he was. She’d been so scared something would happen when Haven was falling. But he was safe and healthy. And Mister Aclassi would have plenty of work when he got in…she wondered if maybe…she would wait to speak with him again first, but everyone had lost so much, uniforms—not armor, the sort that cleaning and kitchen staff wear—sleep clothes, plain clothes, and she knew the Inquisition wanted to replace things like that for their people…obviously he couldn’t do that for the whole of their numbers but he was a designer—he could benefit from designing new things for their people and helping out with some of the workload of production.
As it stood for now, she didn’t think she’d be dressing up anytime soon anyway but she had sleep clothes! She needed those in her life, right this minute, Maker preserve her soul.

“Thank you, Cremisius, seriously. They’re just things but they’re important to me and I’m so grateful you saved them.”

“Are you kidding? El, you nearly burnt off your hand—” had she? Huh, she sort of remembered her Marked hand being wrapped up the first few times they woke her for potion, but it was gone now, and her hand looked all better. “I can never thank you enough for rescuing my father’s things.”

“It’s not like you didn’t do the same for me, and you kept Anya safe.”

“Yeah,” he said, “can we just make it clear I will resent you leaving me grieving single puppy father? That’s just not where I saw myself at seventeen.”

“But it’s such a good hook though,” she teased, “—big sad eyes, an adorable puppy—the Iron Bull would have to be fighting people off left right and center if you wanted any peace.”

“I’m serious, El,” Cremisius stressed, oh he did look serious and she set her things aside, and he took hold of her hands, “I can’t- if you hadn’t-” he took a deep breath, seemed like he might be avoiding her gaze for a moment before he met it and then, “…I love you. So much sometimes it scares me because of days like that—it’s hard enough hearing your near-misses in the field but actually living through one? You being gone, and it seeming impossible for you to come back…I know it comes with the territory, and you can’t make any promises—”

“But I can. Nothing fate altering but Cremisius,” oh gosh, “I love you too. I think I’ll always love you, no matter what. And if something does ever happen to me, and we’re together, I wasn’t completely kidding about finding other people—if you ever found someone else who loves you the way I do—even better than I do—I would want nothing more than that, whether it’s three days, or three years later.”

“Three days?”

“I’m developing a pattern of threes? I woke up three days after the Breach, was gone in time for three seconds…and again with Envy huh, kooky. Anyway, you hear I’m dead, give me a few days I might come around and I’ll be a majorly jealous bitch to whoever is trying to steal my man before my body’s even in the ground.” Cremisius chuckled, shaking his head, and she said, “My point is, I can’t promise I’ll always come back. But I can promise you I will always try.”

“I can work with that.”

Mmm, kissing was nice his lips were warm—

And so was her entire face when the tent entrance flapped open.

Skinner entered the tent, hands behind her back. “Leave,” Skinner said, and it took a second to process that she was kicking Cremisius out, not her. “I will help the small one dress.”

“Oh I wasn’t going t-,” he rambled, flustered, he looked to Ellie, “I mean I would help if you needed- I wouldn’t be weird about- I’m just yeah, gonna, check on the thing.” Ahh, yes, checking on the thing was always important, of course.

She had been nervous about that, dressing. Her shoulder felt a lot better than it had when she was slowly trudging her way through the snow, but Maker it hurt. Skinner came and set down something on a nearby cot—oh. Bandaging and a wet cloth. She helped Ellie out of her armor, and once she was set bandaging wise, and they carefully got her sleep shirt on, Skinner gave her a gentle shove so she sat on the cot before the Elf woman handed her a wet cloth to clean off her thighs, the smaller trails down her legs while Skinner took up her leggings, “I will wash the leather in the snow. He will not see it.” she solemnly assured. “Thank you, small one, for bleeding for him.”

Ellie nodded. “Thanks, for helping me.”

“I am pleased you are not dead.”

The Iron Bull didn’t press or question right out the gate. When he and Cremisius returned, they got settled in. They just laid down, Bull letting her lay on top of him, on her stomach while he held her, arms resting at the small of her back, and Maker did that help.

“The Iron Bull?” she asked quietly. She was being rocked by the rise and fall of his breathing, didn’t feel like he was asleep yet.

“Yeah, Imekari?”

“I think…” it…it made her so sad. She didn’t want to cry again but she was. “I think Solas lied to me.”

“Yeah?” he asked, thumb rubbing circles on her back. “Safe to talk about it? He won’t feel you feeling anything he’d question?”

“I made sure he won’t be paying attention to the bond, because um,” she used her Marked index finger, drawing ‘o-v-e-r-e-e-s’ against his chest. He snorted.

“Not how you spell that babe.”

Blah! “Spelling can kiss my ass.”

She was jostled a bit as he chuckled quietly, sighing, “Alright Imekari. Smart move, getting him off your back. We’ll compare notes in the morning, okay? Get some sleep.”

“Okay.”

When she woke next it was still dark out…and she wasn’t sure what these cots were made of, but like, wow they could hold up a lot. The Iron Bull, Ellie on his chest, Cremisius ended up tucked up against his side at some point in the night, his head was next to Ellie’s, and he’d fallen asleep with his hand over hers. And Anya, to literally top them off, was laying across Ellie’s legs.

The Iron Bull woke next, and they decided they should get up for the day. Cramps were bad, so bad, and she was amazed she didn’t bleed through her sleep clothes, but it worked out okay, she didn’t feel anything wet when she brushed her hand under her bottom, didn’t see anything on the front when she got Anya to scooch off and then executed the most elegant acrobatics to get up with as little chance of any spillage as possible. Why did her body need to do this again? It was dumb. Dumb!

But you know who wasn’t dumb? The Iron Bull! He was so! Smart!

She pulled on her overcoat and shoved her feet into her boots, making to lead Cremisius and Bull to the lantern Solas showed her, but the Qunari had them swing by another tent on the way. Apparently it was all part of their covert operation because the Iron Bull stopped outside the “Ca-caw! Ca-caw!”

“Shhhh!” Cassandra hissed as she emerged from the tent, “I heard you approaching, do not wake Cullen or so help me-”

Oh. “Is papi okay?”

“Eleanor, good morning,” Cassandra startled a bit as if she hadn’t seen her, “Cullen is fine. He is merely tired, as is expected. This has all been trying.”

“Are his headaches really bad?” Ellie worried.

Cassandra seemed hesitant to say much but she came and put her hands on Ellie’s shoulders and admitted, “He had rather the rough night, but he is sleeping peacefully now. We shall look out for him today, yes?” Ellie nodded, and Cassandra smiled warmly, before she dropped a kiss to her hair, “Very good. Now, come.”

Ellie giggled, “Um, I think you forget we’re playing follow the leader today huh? You come with me.”

The Seeker conceded and Ellie led them to the lantern Solas lit last night, sat them down, and listened.

“The Iron Bull,” Cassandra said, “this started with your suspicions.”

The Qunari nodded. “Look. Imekari, I got nothing against the guy, but there’s a lot of shit that doesn’t add up.”

The Iron Bull had found everything about Solas’s involvement with the Inquisition suspicious and when she thought about it, yeah, his entire appearance after the Conclave had been terribly convenient, sounded even more so when the Iron Bull talked through his suspicions. That Solas… he might have known what was about to go down. Had known to keep the distance he had to “watch the proceedings”. Which was total crap—Ben Hessrath agents had been watching the Conclave had all perished in the blast, so where exactly was he watching from? And how much he knew about the Mark, and Rift Magic. Magic that apparently, Humans were incapable of learning—the Iron Bull had been listening to just about every last thing Solas has ever said within earshot, paying attention to conversations he had with Madam de Fer, Dorian—the Tevinter Mage, who was apparently in on the conspiracy as well as he ‘did so love subterfuge’, found the spy business to be very sexy, had even outright asked the Apostate Elf why he couldn’t be taught for the purposes of reporting back to Bull, and Solas had given him some explanation of it being a very unnatural form of magic for Humans, that the reason Ellie’s Mark was so very painful was because it wasn’t meant to be on a person, period, let alone a Human—its magic conflicted with hers. So was it just something Elves could learn, and why wouldn’t he just outright say that? Solas knew a lot about it he wasn’t saying—Rift Magic, Ellie’s Mark, and worse, the Conclave it felt like. And then there was the whole ‘time magic amulet’ thing. Huh. Ellie hadn’t thought about it—she hadn’t been sure what happened to the amulet after Redcliffe Castle, but she was glad it was gone. But Solas… his insistence they hang on to it, and ultimately his ease of banishing it? He’d said it was a difficult task apparently, but the Iron Bull wasn’t exactly buying that, and Ellie…

She hated that she was inclined to distrust the claim too. Especially when Cassandra could attest to just how unsettling she’d found the whole thing, that it was what prompted her to speak to the Iron Bull about his suspicions in the first place. They’d begun a joint investigation of sorts, trying to figure out where Solas came from, what he knows, how he knows it, and why he’s being so incredibly secretive about all of this.

So, she filled them in on what Solas had said last night, about the Orb.

“What Orb?” Cassandra asked.

“The Iron Bull, do you know what I’m talking about?” she checked with the Qunari before answering.

“No clue boss, what’s up?”

“So neither of you saw Corypheus with the Orb?”

“Babe, I’m the tallest person you know, and I barely saw anything through all that fire,” the Iron Bull said. Eh, she kind of knew Corypheus now, and he’d seemed a lot taller than the Iron Bull, Maker, her shoulder was still ouch from being hoisted and thrown around like a rag doll by her wrist.

“Corypheus had this Orb, kind of…” she used her finger to draw a circle and some swirly lines sort of like what it had looked like. “it’s what he used to try and remove my Mark, I think it’s what he used to open the Breach to begin with. He called my Mark ‘the Anchor’ said I stole it, and he wanted it back. He said something about wanting to bring Tevinter back from it’s ashes? I dunno he was really ranty.”

“Head still bothering you, El?” Cremisius asked quietly.

Little bit, she was pretty sure it was from falling headfirst into a mine…again? But it could be from…she didn't want him suspecting anything, that she was currently hosting her long-kept-at-bay monthly guest. She needed to suck it up and stop being a baby about it, she realized then she was rubbing at her temple. “I’m okay.”

“When we are settled, you should sit down with Leliana and recall all you can of your encounter with the Elder One. We saw precious little of it and heard—“ Cassandra stopped and cleared her throat, “very little.”

“Yeah, that’s what got me worried about all this—Solas stuff. Because see, I didn’t say anything about what happened. But last night he fakes pulling me off to the side to check out my Mark and instead starts telling me all about how he knows this Orb that Corypheus used, and how we have to get it from him, and I’m supposed to trust him about anything he says blah blah about the Orb. And I’m not supposed to tell anyone about it, full stop. But I didn’t promise him or anything so, hi, telling. He said he was worried if everyone knew it was Dalish, Elves would suffer for Corypheus’s crimes but we can keep that in house, can’t we?”

“Imekari,” the Iron Bull considered it, “this asshole seems like just about the only one that knows anything about your Mark. So…until we have something solid, find something that says he needs taken out—we got plenty of other shit to report on to the Ben Hessrath. Orb’s origins can hold off until later, maybe never, we’ll see. I get the level of bullshit that could come from people blaming Elves for this. You cool with me giving them Corypheus’s name, the low down on what happened in Haven?”

Ellie nodded. “If you want, I’ll sit down with Leliana tonight and you can sit in on it with me, or just use her report or I can do a separate sit down with you and answer anything you want if there are spy questions you’d rather Leliana not hear you asking. Oh!” she remembered! “I took notes…I think,” she was pretty sure, at some point, the hazy memory of leaning against a tree, desperately trying to get something down in writing. She dug around in her overcoat pockets and, ha! “Here!” she said, offering over her parchment pad to the Iron Bull who squinted and then handed it off to Cassandra.

“Elder One = Core-if-ee-iss (sound),” Cassandra read, “Tevinter. Bad Orb. Looks like a big Darkspawn, says he saw where the gods live and no one is home—real mad about it. Called Mark an Anchor…” she flipped the page, “My na…”

“What’s up?” Cremisius asked.

“Is it illegible or something?” Ellie asked, “My handwriting’s not the best when I write too fast and it was super cold—”

“You wrote this when you were trying to catch up with us,” Cassandra commented quietly.

Ellie nodded. “Yeah, just in case-‘ oh. She sort of forgot. She’d sort of… “I wasn’t sure um…I wasn’t sure I’d find you. But if anyone ever found me…” she shrugged. She’d written her name, that she was with the Inquisition and they would need this information. That she loved them.

Cassandra cleared her throat. “I do appreciate you did all you could, to ensure we would get this. Would you mind terribly if I held onto this, passed it along to Leliana?”

Ellie nodded. Cassandra tore the page from the pad and handed it back to Ellie.

“So,” Cassandra pressed on. “Solas did not examine your Mark at all when he pulled you aside?”

“It seemed like he was so busy convincing me to rely on him when it came to the Orb and keep it secret he totally spaced on the excuse he gave Marehis so no one would follow us.”

"…should someone look at it?" Cremisius worried.

Ellie shrugged. "I dunno anyone else but Solas who could. And it really doesn't feel badly different, just burns more. The Rift thing saved my butt, but totally wiped my magic."

She was kind of scared if she thought about it too much. She hadn’t really felt her magic at all since Haven. She dreamed in the Fade last night because she hadn’t taken potion, but…but she thought maybe the Mark might make anyone dream in the Fade, not just Mages. Though her Mark still burned so, it must still be in conflict with something and that was hopefully still her magic. It’d been drained in a scary way that made her worry it might not recover. It would…she was pretty sure, just, scary walking around knowing she can’t cast to defend herself even if she had a staff.

Huh. She had a really bad track record. She lost her staff at the Conclave…then at her first assault on the Breach. Sera had to rescue her staff in the Oasis, but she left it behind in Haven’s assault. Found a staff while dealing with Haven…and ultimately it was somewhere off in the snow. Possibly down in the mine? When had she last had it? Anyway that was one…two…four. Four of them. In like, less than a year!

In her defense, she only lost them when she lost consciousness. That happened a lot in the Inquisition. Thank the Maker for Healer Adan.

But she had her friends. And her knives. And her sword! So…maybe if she just let her magic take a break it’d be back in working soon!
And she had a plan now, with Bull, Cassandra, and Cremisius. An understanding, at least, to be mindful of Solas, and as soon as Humanly possible, Ellie would try to get Marehis alone out of earshot of the Elf Apostate.

She hated this, she hated it so so much. But there was too many sketchy details, and suspicion, she couldn’t risk this—the Inquisition, or Marehis.

Armored up, everyone rallied for a little breakfast—Inquisition headquarters had emergency stores of things the kitchen staff knew to grab when evacuating or to pull from if they’d been put under siege or something—rice, oatmeal, hardtack bread, and there were jars of preserved things like broth stock and jams. And everyone in her party had a little something just from things being left from traveling. Things were a little on the scarce side, but they’d make it through. Every little bit counted, so she asked Cole to keep her informed if he could, make certain she wasn't filling her belly at the expense of someone else in her camp.

Thom was the best! He got a big kiss on his beautiful cheek for rescuing their horses! He’d gotten to the stables and had them loose, free to run, they’d only just beaten Ellie to finding the Inquisition by a few hours—smart, brave horses! Russel was safe and sound! She hadn’t even wanted to think about something happening to him, sweet horse. The sweetest, he nuzzled Ellie’s face in greeting when they crossed paths again and he was very good about letting a stranger ride him, one of their injured.

Sera carefully offered something from her stores—she kept an emergency supply of some of Ellie’s potions on her, like the kind for asthma attacks…she wasn’t currently having an asthma attack, but she wasn’t exactly going to try playing tag anytime soon—her chest still felt rough, and the last thing they needed was for her to end up in some sort of medical emergency while she was supposed to be assuring everyone everything was going to be okay and leading them to safety. An ounce of prevention is worth more than a pound of cure…even though in this case the prevention was technically a cure. They’d be mindful of how much they used, save some for an actual emergency and in the meantime, Ellie had some nice medicinal steam going from her necklace which helped. so. much.

Once it seemed like everyone was just about ready, Ellie and her party, her advisors, the Chargers taking up their flank, started walking to get to the head of their camp, begin the procession forward to Skyhold. Cassandra and Marehis walked close behind her.

And they marched.

It was hard, but a little fun? Lots of singing—Marching was tiring and boring and long, and they weren’t entirely sure when they were going to get where they were going. When she’d traveled with Trevelyan, or her friends now, they’d passed the time talking, but it was hard to have a hundreds-of-people conversation, so: hymns and some of Maryden’s songs—oh Maker!

“Maryden is in Orlais, touring, she is happy and safe and she misses me,” Cole informed her quickly he…gosh he was busy and she appreciated him. There was so much hurt happening over Haven it was a wonder he had the two seconds it took for him to hear her panicked thought, her fear for the minstrel and come to quell it fast with reassurance before blinking away again.

Cullen looked exhausted as he followed their party, and as the sun got higher in the sky, it shone blindingly bright off the snow, it hurt Ellie’s eyes a little, but it seemed like it might actually be killing the Templar who squinted against it. Ellie shrank back a bit to walk alongside him.

“Ellie, sweetheart you’re doing great,” Cullen cleared his throat, “do you need anything?”
“Just wanted to walk with my favorite papi is all,” Ellie assured him brightly, taking his hand in hers, and then quietly in case it might embarrass him, “if you want to close your eyes, you can, I promise I won’t let you trip or walk into anything.”

Cullen sighed and for a second she worried he was insulted or wouldn’t go for it, but he wrapped an arm around her shoulders, “I’ll simply have to catch the both of us if we fall.” It was nice, warmer to walk like that.

Every mile was marked with a veil fire lantern Solas would light as they passed. They came across fifteen. Entire. Lanterns. By the time nightfall came and they really should set up camp. She was so hungry—officially ‘the dread bleeding is upon me, I want to eat everything in life’ hungry and until they got a better grasp on just how much farther it would be to Skyhold, and just how long it would be before they could get supplies rolling in, lunch was only a thing for people who really needed it. It wasn’t a strict thing, anyone could eat but it was just a ‘make a conscious decision while our resources are limited’ thing and it didn’t feel right to her, to eat when a majority of her ‘hundreds strong’ party weren’t. Though she did end up sharing an apple with Cassandra—no one in her usual party ate lunch, Lady Josie was feeling shaky but she wasn’t used to being hungry or traveling so hard so she was grateful but hesitant about Ellie getting her a bowl of rice, but she felt better when Ellie said it’d give Anya someone to eat with! Because puppies didn’t have to ration their food, that was just a rule. Varric insisted Cassandra eat something to the point of pressing an apple from his pack into her hand and saying he was just ‘having her back’ and giving Cullen side-eye like he should back him up. So, Cassandra offered one of her disgusted grunts and used her boot knife to halve the apple and offered half to Ellie.

She was so glad when they could finally stop for the day, set up camp, dinner was still on the table (pun intended), it was well deserved, and it would be hard for anyone to sleep with an empty belly that hadn’t had much of anything since breakfast.

Cole was a big help calling her attention to people who needed a moment of her time, sometimes it was just walking by a section of camp so people who’d only heard the Herald of Andraste was still alive could actually see it with their own eyes, have assurances of their own. And it was nice to be able to touch base with people, some she vaguely knew, and then regular faces like Flissa! Gosh she’d been so scared for the barmaid! Tavern-owner-turned-Chantry Sister*, apparently, Flissa wanted to serve the Inquisition differently now, her brush with death made her want to pursue her faith more, help others do the same, which Ellie thought was super sweet, though she’d miss her cooking!

“I’ll still be around, just serving in different ways. You’re welcome to have dinner with me anytime sweet lady,” Flissa assured.

Ellie got to pray with lots of people, she thought she knew most in Haven, and their faces were familiar but there were so many she didn’t know.

And some she sort of knew. Cole prompted her, led her to where a group of men were gathered together, talking, eating. Oh! Lord Berand was with them, and some of them were his men she was pretty sure…ohhh, they were the soldiers from the Fallow Mire.

“My lady,” Lord Berand greeted as she approached. “Maker, I’m so relieved you’re alright—we were all devastated when we heard what you did, back in Haven. That…that was incredibly brave.”

More like it was just incredibly necessary, “Everyone was brave, you all did an excellent job keeping it together and moving forward, getting out safe. And I am glad to see you all again, I’m so relieved you made it back safe from the Fallow Mire—I didn’t even realize you all were still in Haven, I hadn’t seen you around,” she said, looking between Berand and the Inquisition soldiers.

“‘My men and I left Haven on assignment before your party returned, we just got back in time to see the Breach dealt with,” Lord Berand said.

“We…we actually did wish to speak with you, lady Herald,” one of the soldiers spoke up nervously, “but we…were ashamed, are ashamed. Were keeping scarce because erm…we have said unkind things, my lady. About you. That you were not um…”

Oh. That was why Cole told her to come here. Apparently they were the men that said those awful things Skinner beat them up for—that Ellie was mentally unstable, which uh, she kind of was? And a slut, which she wasn’t really except insofar as chocolate or feta cheese is involved—for the right snack, Corypheus probably could have had Haven if he wanted it. But she definitely hadn’t been sleeping around with Varric and Thom. And yeah, she’d seemed inadequate to handle the Breach that day so, it was mean, but understandable they’d blow off steam by disparaging her among themselves. But they were apologetic now, had been wanting to apologize to her but they’d been too afraid to approach her, had regretted that dearly when they thought she had died and they missed their chance, and then everything had been so busy once she was back and up and they were moving forward they hadn’t been able to approach her. Her approaching them seemed to do the trick though.

“Don’t even worry about it—I’ve never been super mad about it. You didn’t hurt my feelings or anything, and even if you had, we still work together for the Inquisition, and you’re still people—my people, a bit of mean gossiping wasn’t going to make me turn a blind eye while you were in danger. I’m really glad you guys are safe, and I appreciate your apology.”

"Th-thank you, my lady."

While she appreciated the opportunity to get to know so many different people, she…she was pretty wiped, and was so incredibly relieved when she circled back to the head of camp.

"It's just us here, right?" she croaked out, voice spoken-hoarse, as she joined her party and advisors huddled around their campfire. Thom offered her his canteen when she came close, yeah, water should probably be a thing, she smiled before taking a few sips and passing it back.

"Certainly, Eleanor," Cassandra said and then, well, she knew the deal, "Josephine, Leliana, Cullen do not be alarmed-"

Oh yeah, they were new. Ellie offered a reassuring smile before she flopped onto her back, "I am so old, this form is weary. I am ready to perish. My body is decaying, my bones are dust, and my soul is attached to this mortal coil only by the strength of my agony."

"Wh- why shouldn’t we be alarmed by that?" Cullen asked uncertain.

"It is a jest," Cassandra assured him. "Mostly."

"Oh my lady," Josie offered up a giggle at her dramatics while Leliana shook her head.

Sera flopped to lay in the snow next to her, "Tough day ain't it, Inky?"

Uh-huh. "I should have just called it quits, laid down in the snow to die after the second—second dead fire pit I crossed paths with catching up with you jerks."

"Were they at least warm?" Dorian asked, sympathetic.
"Little bit, but the first one burning and dying the second I got close enough to benefit felt like a major 'screw you' from the universe."

Awe, double awe- Sera snuggled up to her, arms around Ellie as she kissed her on the cheek, and Anya came and started licking at her face, trying to rally her. Sweet puppy. Sweet friends.

"I love you all. so. much."

She really did. In the next moment Anya was moving out of the way like she knew what was about to go down, and Ellie rolled Sera off her just before the shing of her sword unsheathing and clang!

“If it isn’t the Krematori,” she said calmly, just—letting everyone know he hadn’t suddenly gone rogue or something.

Cremisius laughed, then, “Die Herald scum!”

Scum? Rude!

Ellie pushed his blow back as she got on her feet standing! Was so! Gross! But fighting! Kind of fighting. She wasn’t sure if he was taking it easy on her or what, but it was a good bit of a workout, trying to fight without magic or the use of her left arm really. Practice dueling around their campfire while the adults stared in confusion, not entirely sure if they should stop their before-dinner sword fight.

“Kremmy-boy, what the frick?!” Sera shrieked.

Ellie got him pushed into the snow, her sword at the collar of his gambison—he’d definitely gone down too easy but eh, it was mostly just ‘am I capable of unconsciously reaching for my sword to defend myself if I need to’ practice more than anything. And then she sheathed her blade, and he his as she offered a hand down and pulled him up, pulling him forward and wrapping her arms around his neck, pressing a quick kiss to his lips before turning to address their confusion, though the Iron Bull was just chuckling, since he was sort of in on it too.

“I haven’t been able to cast since the whole ‘a Rift popped out of my Mark’ thing, so I asked Cremisius to keep me on my toes, surprise attacks as practice for actual attacks,” she said, “Gracias, guapo.”

“That…is incredibly responsible of you…” Cullen struggled, “…but do not do that ever again, I almost killed the boy.”

“Sorry,” Cremisius offered laughingly, “s’why I waited ‘til it was just us—I figured if I attacked the Herald of Andraste in front of the whole Inquisition I’d be pretty screwed.” Plus… Anya really did love all the running around she got to do while they marched but even she got tired, and Cremisius hefted the pup up on his hip when she whined at him earlier, walked the last several miles carrying her “Darling, do quit rough housing and come,” Madam de Fer interjected, waving Ellie over-oh. okay, she wasn’t uncomfortable or anything, but Vivienne didn’t usually pull her to sit in her lap the way Marehis or Cassandra did. “You’re shaking, you’ve hardly had a thing to eat today, and we must put that to rights my dear. How are you feeling?”

“I’m okay, tired, and yeah I’m starving but dinner’s on soon, you’ve got to be hungry too. You’re feeling okay, right?”
“Certainly Eleanor,” Vivienne assured, “now, you cannot make use of your magic still?” Ellie shook her head. “If you wish, I would try something.”

That something was meditation—Ellie and Madam de Fer seated with the girl in her lap while Vivienne rested palms up on Ellie’s knees while Ellie laid her hands in hers. It took a minute but Ellie could feel Vivienne’s magic gliding through her the way her magic usually did, pressing at different points until she got the most subtle push back, gently prodding at her magic, encouraging it, and then, “Master Pavus, I’ve a suitable response, would you care to assist me?” Ellie vaguely heard her say.

“Resp…ahh, brilliant. Yes of course. Shall I…?”

“Be seated as I am, before us, mind our knees touch dear-”

Dorian tittered at that. “Madam de Fer you do honor me, but whatever will people say?”

“…and place your hands over Eleanor’s, you know I adore you but do not try my patience, I am working here you realize.”

“Ahh yes, quite. I do apologize. Let’s see here.”

“What the frig is they doin’ to Inky?” Sera asked quietly.

“A transfer of sorts, da’len,” Solas supplied, “Ellie’s magic has been tested to its limits and now it is exhausted, it is not unlike rousing someone from unconsciousness. As Madam de Fer and Ser Pavus have magic like to Eleanor’s, they can offer it support, and leave some of their own power behind to blend with her own.”

“Oh. Shouldn’t you help then?”

“Ahh. The key is like magics I’m afraid,” was all he had to say.

She wasn’t sure about any of this but it was soothing enough. Her magic started coasting again like normal, weaker, but it was there, thank the Maker. Her magic let Dorian and Vivienne’s magic guide it along, but the glide of their magic slowed, dragged along her Mark, but their magic shielded hers, and for the several minutes they meditated like this…it was the first time, save the few seconds with Madam de Fer in their first lesson, that her hand felt like hers again, no burn or sting of the Mark.

She flinched when their magic slipped away and left hers to coast on its own, Mark’s burn returning in force, though gosh she was glad her magic could do that again, it felt a lot better, stronger.

“Are you alright darling?” Vivienne worried.

“Not much worse for wear-“ Dorian said.

“I was addressing Eleanor, my sweet, do wait your turn.”

“Thanks you guys, my magic feels a lot better. Are you okay?” she asked when she opened her eyes. Poor Dorian was pale, sweating, Madam de Fer’s head was resting against the back of Ellie’s.
“I am well, Eleanor,” Vivienne assured thought she rested against her a moment more before pressing a kiss to the back of her head, raising a hand to brush against Ellie’s hair. “My dear girl I’m so pleased we could get that sorted for you, it must have been frightening to be unable to cast for yourself, and it wouldn’t due to have you in such a state.”

“I certainly could not abide it,” Dorian said, “Ellie, you are to tell us if you need further assistance.”

Ellie giggled, reaching out and poking him in the shoulder, “That’s very ‘mother-hen’ of you Dorian.”

“Oh do not think you’ve domesticated me young lady,” he spoke haltingly, “But I do… worry for you. As you are my dear friend. So you’re to come to me when I can be of help to you.”

Dinner was winding down and they were getting ready to go rest for the evening when Harritt approached their campfire.

“My lady, I’m pleased to see you survived,” he greeted as he came to kneel where Ellie was seated with Cremisius and Marehis. He looked over his shoulder to make certain the Seeker couldn’t see as he handed her, “something I grabbed before hauling out, thank you for getting me back into my cabin.”

Ellie gasped as she took the item in hand, “Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh, I love you! You’re amazing and incredible and just the best!” she informed him as she launched forward to hug him—big hug! “Cremisius! Any objections to dating a married woman? I’m marrying Mister Harritt.”

“Hey, if he makes you this happy, I say go for it,” Cremisius agreed amicably at her enthusiasm.

“Let’s just slow our roll here Tumbles,” Varric interjected.

“You promised me we would dissuade her from marriage until she is older,” Cullen complained to Cassandra.

“Eleanor, do please reconsider marrying the Inquisition Blacksmith,” Cassandra drawled.

She’d totally let her if she knew what he’d saved! Yes, yes, yes!

She’d find out soon enough!

Leliana and the Iron Bull sat down with Ellie for a while, and she did her best to report everything she’d seen and heard in her meeting the Elder One. And they worked together with Bull, helping him write up his report to the Ben Hessrath to break the news of what happened to the Inquisition—report that the Breach was sealed, apparently there were still Rifts all over the place which…gosh, she felt awful she was a little relieved to hear that. But she’d been…scared. Really scared. She loved everyone she worked with in the Inquisition, but when it was all over with, when there were no more Rifts for her to seal, they…theys wouldn’t really need her anymore. So…what would happen? Maybe they’d still let her help? She could do things! Like cooking and cleaning and fighting and- and- lots of stuff! She could! Blah! Anyway, the Iron Bull reported that the Inquisition was still standing, their agents in the field were still active, and everyone that had been in Haven were just relocating to a new headquarters.

Which...sort of reminded her, "Leliana, um, how's Lady Josie feeling? Is she too tired to talk right now, do you think? If you guys are up for it, the Advisors and Cassandra, I'd like to talk to you about something."

"It is sweet of you to worry, but I think Josie's up for a chat, the Iron Bull, would you give us a moment then, please? Send the others our way, would you?"

"Can't say no to you Red," the Iron Bull assured with a wink, patting Ellie on the head as he rose and went to get the others.

"Hello, mijita, you wished to speak with us?" Lady Josie asked as she came and knelt to sit beside Ellie, raising a hand to brush back the girl's hair.

Ellie nodded. "Um...I'm just gonna launch right into this I suppose? We uh...beds, uniforms, desks, parchment, ingredients for potions, food—we need a whole lot of everything after Haven. And I know we have emergency funds or whatever but um...I mean those aren't endless, right?"

The adults all shared uncomfortable looks, "We will be alright Ellie," Cullen said, "We've allies that will lend us aide we're certain, once they hear our plight."

"Well...what about an ally that already knows our plight?" Ellie asked.

"You've someone in mind?" Leliana asked.

"I am someone in mind. Me. Hi, Eleanor Trevelyan?"

"Absolutely not," Cassandra refused, "Eleanor we will not accept a substantial donation from you, we are your- we are to- you are not to take care of us, that is for certain."

"Agreed," oh gosh, wowza, she never thought she'd hear Cullen, Leliana, and Josie all say that word in unison over anything! They once argued over what to order for lunch...and they could all order whatever they wanted for themselves, they were literally arguing with what the other person wanted because Cullen wanted potato soup and Fliss' makes that with lots of garlic, Lady Josie did not want him smelling up the War Room.

"I thought you might say that, but it isn't a donation, except for the minimal amount I can donate to get a...what did Varric call it? A tax write-off? I've never paid taxes before, should I really be getting a write-off?" blah, she wasn't even sure what taxes were, so, she waved her hands dismissively before reaching into the inside pocket of her overcoat, "I talked to Varric about it at breakfast, and he's been kicking it around in his business brain all day, went over this with me during dinner—see what you think," she said as she offered the folded parchment to Lady Josie, who scooted to sit beside Leliana and hold the parchment so she and the other adults could huddle around and read it.

"You...you wish to invest with the Inquisition?" Cullen asked.

"Uh-huh. I'll put in enough money to help us out, keep us making progress with our new Head Quarters without anyone having to go without pay, and if anyone else wants to chip in, cool, but we won't exactly have to go to our allies with our hats in our hands, you know?"

"It would see her repaid in full, and then some eventually," Lady Josie reasoned as she finished reading.

"I do admit, people merely donating out of solidarity, and not having to play suck-up to those who would not do so without it is...appealing," Leliana said.

"Indeed, Cullen Rutherford sucks up to no man," the Commander said, and he got a look from Cassandra.

"You purchased Eleanor a puppy for her birthday."

"I'm sorry, Ellie, has your gender identity changed? No? I do believe I said man," he corrected, winking as he assured, "I've no qualms sucking up to women."

Cassandra looked like she was restraining herself from outright praying for the Maker to 'preserve her from this man's antics' as it seemed like she often did, as she returned her attention to Ellie. "I still do not like it," Cassandra said, "but it is...an acceptable compromise."

Ahh! "Really?!" Ellie cleared her throat, "I mean...excellent, I'll have my people contact your people..." and then she thought about it, "Lady Josie, please write yourself on the details."

The Antivan woman smiled, laughing as she assured, "I'll see to things just as soon as...well, I'll need a bit of parchment, Varric has some, yes?"

Skinner always rose early to keep watch in the night and Ellie asked her to wake her up. It wasn’t as scary as Cremisius warned it might be...though maybe that was because Ellie was used to waking up to Sera right in her face.

“Small one. I am waking you. You are pleased?”

“As pudding, thanks Skinner,” Ellie rasped out sleepily, beckoning with an index finger for the woman to lean in even closer and Ellie pressed a kiss to her cheek. She was a little startled that she got a kiss on the cheek right back!

“Have a pleasant day,” Skinner trotted out before leaving the tent.

“Kid,” the Iron Bull rumbled out quietly, “I’ve seen you manage some weird fucking things. That’s top five.”

“Top three,” Cremisius offered up still half-asleep.

“Get some more rest if you can, I’ll be back when it's time to head for breakfast,” Ellie said, giggling when, the moment she was off of Bull, the Qunari used the arm that was laying under Cremisius to pull the Tevinter man up to replace her, and the Lieutenant settled in comfortably enough laying atop the Iron Bull and his ‘pillowy man bosoms’. Anya was still snoring away as she lay across the Iron Bull’s thighs.

The sun had just barely begun to rise as Ellie scurried through camp to where Cullen and Cassandra set up a tent, and she listened for a moment just...being cautious—she didn’t think many people would have the energy to get up to much in times like these, but you never know. They were awake but just talking quietly to one another before getting out of bed for the day, wishing each other good morning.

So she waited for a pause and then she slipped into the tent, Cullen and Cassandra rousing at the intrusion though they seemed to realize it was her, Cassandra readily welcomed Ellie crawling into bed with her, snuggling in close.

“Did you have a nightmare, sweet girl?” Cassandra asked as she brushed a hand across Ellie’s hair, the other rubbing her back.

Ellie shook her head, Cole had been staying with her in her dreams while she slept, kept her from nightmares in the Fade. She smiled against Cassandra’s neck, “Happy Birthday, mami!”
Cassandra was very quiet for a moment, oh. Oh Ellie hadn’t meant to make her cry, she could feel a few tears on the back of her neck. “Thank you, Eleanor. Oh, I am so pleased to hear you say that,” the Seeker said, holding Ellie tighter. “This is a most blessed birthday present indeed.”

Ellie pulled her head back to look up at her. “Oh this isn’t a birthday present, this is just—happy birthday, I’m glad you were born, and I love you so much so let’s cuddle! I have your actual birthday present if it’s okay to move my arm.”

At first it felt like Cassandra was just going to keep holding her, which was fine by Ellie but she did loosen her hold so Ellie could get her arm out from around her and hand her the little cloth-wrapped present Harritt had rescued.

Cassandra sat up and Ellie rose with her, tucking her knees up under her, kind of bouncing in place, she was just a little excited to see if Cassandra liked it.

The Seeker carefully pulled back the cloth. “Eleanor, this is lovely,” she said, hand brushing over the book cover.

“Harritt helped me bind it.”

“You made- ” Cassandra stopped and opened the book, and then she smiled, warm and seeming pleased and proud, “oh sweet girl, you- Thank you, Eleanor, truly. I will cherish it always, I cannot wait to start.”

She did and she didn’t—Cassandra got Ellie laying between her and Cullen and they just sort of laid there for a bit until it was time to get ready for breakfast. When Ellie came back from changing into her armor to join everyone for breakfast, Cassandra was seated by the fire with her nose in her birthday book.

“Where’d you get new reading material?” Varric asked as he squinted at the freshly cracked spine, trying to get a look at the cover for a name.

Cassandra was beaming, like, gosh she looked so happy, “It is a birthday present. A novelette by my favorite author,” she said jerking her head in Ellie’s direction as she turned a page.

Oh gosh! Ellie just about choked on her breakfast, she was pretty sure she heard everyone’s heads snapping in her direction.

“Kind of—it’s only little. Dorian had me write a story as an assignment and he liked it well enough, so I worked on it a little more, and Sera proof read it for me before I copied it down onto the nicer parchment!”

“Truly?” Dorian asked, “I trust there is a dedication to me?”

“Uh-huh!” she said.

“Ha! As it should be. You see Tethras, I would read your books if you dedicated them to me.”

“Sparkler, I haven’t published anything since we met,” Varric said.

“And what was stopping you before?” Dorian asked.
“I literally didn’t know you.”

“That’s hardly an excuse.”

Varric snorted, shaking his head, then, “Oh man, Seeker, come on—you gotta let me read it when you’ve finished.”

“Oh come now, don’t be unreasonable,” Cullen spoke up. “You’ll rush her-”

“He is rushing me? You’ve been reading over my shoulder this entire time,” Cassandra said, “Are you even getting through the whole page?”

“Of course not love, you read too fast for that. I was going to suggest you read it aloud and we can all enjoy it together—it shouldn’t take long, you’ve nearly finished it already. Do some voices, turn it about to show everyone the pictures, it’ll be like a proper Chantry storybook time.”

“I’ll not do voices,” Cassandra assured drily. Why not? She always did voices when she read to Ellie! It was cute!

“Wait! There’s pictures?! Oh come on, don’t triple threat me kid,” Varric complained, “I can’t compete with author, illustrator, and ridiculously cute.”

“I’m only a double threat then,” Ellie corrected, “Though maybe it’s like one and a half? Cremisius is also super cute—and he’s the illustrator part.”

Varric flopped back in his seat, laying in the snow. “Fuck me, they’re a power couple.”

“Woah woah, I wanna see,” the Iron Bull said. “Just the pictures—won’t turn down a read-along though.”

“Do be careful with it and do not lose my place,” Cassandra warned as she passed him the book. The Iron Bull kept a thumb where her page was—gosh, she was almost done! It was super short though, so. He flipped through the pages to look at the pictures, whistling appreciatively when he found them. The Seeker smiled, “It’s rather a lovely way of conveying a part of the story left unwritten—it is a tale of the littlest dragon slayer, a young girl that goes about miraculously slaying dragons, but in the illustrations...”

“Oh shit, that’s so cool,” Bull affirmed, holding up the book to show the others one of the first images—she’d gotten the idea from Anya! The pup was absolutely certain she was a little mage because Ellie would cast and let her pretend she'd done it. So she'd written a little story about a girl slaying dragons, but the pictures would show it was always someone watching over her, following her around and letting her build her strength and confidence while actually doing the heavy lifting. Until one day she can do it all by herself! Which...Ellie wasn't going to count Anya out for being the first actual puppy mage. She was pretty sure Russel was secretly a magical horse.

“Thank you, Krem, for lending your talent. They are beautiful,” Cassandra said. They’d turned out so cute!

“Glad you like it,” Cremisius said, extending her something between his index and middle finger, a smooth silver oval with a little loop on the top like it was meant to have a chain threaded through it, “you can do whatever you like with it but it’s something I thought you might like. I was keeping it safe in my father’s shaving kit, El grabbed from my bunk so—happy birthday.”

Cassandra accepted the little oval. When she flipped it over, there was glass and her hand raised to her lips as she looked it over. “You sweet man—you are to come here this instant and hug me,” she held out an arm and the Tevinter man went and gave her a good hug, awe! It was so nice!

“What is it?” Ellie asked when they were done.

Cassandra turned the glass portion to face Ellie...with Ellie’s face, and it wasn’t a mirror, though they were both blushing, “You drew me?” she asked him. It was a small, colorful portrait of her face all smiley and blushy, just, when had he done that? Her hair was longer and if she looked close enough she could see that it'd been black-and-white before he got all fancy with his oil pastels, like he'd drawn it while she was away in the Oasis. Gosh, it was super sweet. And it seemed like it meant the world to Cassandra. "It's really pretty."

"Hard not to be, considering the subject," he offered with a little wink. He! That wasn't fair!

"sandra!" Sera, wow, loud! The Elf girl bound into breakfast, and sort of crash-collided with the Seeker, hugging her tight. "You was born today right? Happy Birthday! Many more n' pish. Oi, you lot sing to her yet?"

"They have not, nor do they need to. I appreciate the sentiment, but it is wholly unnecessary."

...yeah. Weeeeeeelllllll.

They did sing. As a group. As they marched. Ellie threw it in with their march-singing and boom! An Inquisition-wide 'Happy Birthday Caaaaaaaassandrraaaaaa!' unfolded.

It was fun, lots of fun, and it did seem to lift a lot of spirits. But marching was still hard. Ellie was sick and sore as they reached their twelfth mile-marking lantern. Three less than yesterday, but they did end up calling it a night because it was already getting darker, had they marched slower today? Maybe. She was the one setting the pace, and as it was, she was stiff and sore and she could very distinctly feel something running down her leather pantlegs and that just...needed to stop right now.

She sat as still as possible just, brain-willing her body to cooperate with her until she could get some privacy to make with cleaning up and changing her bandaging ugh. Her underthings were...she was just going to burn them the second she didn't need them anymore.

"Ellie?" Cremisius came, sitting at her side, resting a hand on her back, "We got the tent set up, you said you need a minute?"

Ellie nodded, opening her eyes and smiling her thanks as she stood oh ouch ouch ouch, she flinched at the stabbing cramps. They'd been steadily stabbing while she sat but standing made it feel almost like tearing cuts and,

"Oh shit, El, you're hurt, fuck, what happened-"

Cool. She'd given her boots from Harritt a break because they could honestly rival the Iron Bull’s feet stank right now, and worn her ankle boots that her leggings met but couldn’t tuck into so. Her blood was officially in the snow, and she could just kind of curl up and die right now, that'd be cool, thanks.

"I'm not hurt, please shut your handsome face before you scare someone. I'm fine, I'll just be a minute."

"Bullshit, Ellie, come on, what's wrong? Why-?" he went very quiet for a second before his arm wrapped around her back, hands supporting her arms as he quietly walked her over to the tent which uh, really helped, she definitely wasn't feeling the whole walking thing anymore.

Skinner was waiting already with her sleep clothes laid out and bandaging which she quickly hid behind her back when Ellie and Cremisius came in, but the Tevinter man held out his hand, gesturing for her to hand it over. "We're good here."

The Elf nodded, handing over the bandaging and reaching out to squeeze Ellie's arm as she passed, and left them.

"You should sit."

So she did. Cremisius knelt and set the bandaging down beside her on the cot, before he started taking off her ankle boots, stripping off her socks.

"These need washed."

"I don't have more," she said quietly was he...what was happening right now? Was he mad? "Yeah you do," he pulled the pack off of his back and dug out a pair of his own socks that had been in his trunk. He set them on the cot. "Do you need help?" he asked. She shook her head, 'no'. "Kay. How's the underwear situation? You don't have any others except- you'd rather not use them?" she nodded. "I get that. No worries, get your things off, I'll give you a minute," he said, taking up the bandaging and stepping off to the other side of the empty tent, his back to her while she got out of her armor. She startled a bit when he came back over, but he had a hand over his eyes, sort of exaggerated his movements like he were trying to make light as he blindly found the cot and rested...huh, he'd lined some underpants with bandaging, and it all looked clean. And then he turned his back and gave her space again so she could deal with just...so much yuck, this was so incredibly gross. She got in her sleep shirt, got off the old...gross...everything and Skinner had left a wet cloth she tried her best to clean up with before putting on the underthings he'd left her.

"You decent?" he asked. She felt kind of dumb, she nodded at first, but his back was to her, duh.

"Mm-hmm."

He turned back, she'd bundled up everything gross in her leather leggings and he took that in hand, was leaving the tent only to find Skinner standing on the other side of the entrance as he opened it. They didn't say anything just, she held up her hands and he handed over everything for her to take, leaving them.

"So. Monthlies huh?" he asked as he turned to face her again. "Funny thing those. You know, weirdest thing happened here recently."

"Weird things are always happening it seems," she offered.

"Uh-huh. See, when shit hit the wind in Haven, I had a vial of my own potion for monthlies left—you know, little vial of stuff you saved from my trunk?—and Stitches promises me as soon as he's up after the 'we Sealed the Breach' party, he'll make fresh, which yeah, that's his usual routine. Well, obviously that doesn't work out. But, Drakonis 2nd, mid-morning, Healer Adan rolls around. Says he was thinking of me, and knew Stitches would procrastinate, and he'd already gone ahead and made potion for me, which he grabbed before hitting the road. Which is flattering but when I think about it, of all the vital, important things he could have reached for, and he grabs potion. That he's never made for me before. For me."
Ellie bit her lip nervously.

"Probably should've tipped me off when he said he'd miscalculated when accounting for my height and weight, and I'd need to take doses two bottles at a time to work." oh. Yeah, it wasn't like they had bigger bottles just laying around to cover up the fact that the potion had been made with someone smaller than him in mind.

"Are you mad at me?" she asked.

Cremisius sighed. "Little bit, yeah. El,-"

"I'm sorry we didn't tell you, and that we lied," she insisted, "but it- it's perfectly safe Cremisius, I promise, honest. It's the same formulation Stitches uses, I swear, if I thought for a second it would hurt you or something I wouldn't have done it. I know it's shitty to give you something under kind of false pretenses, and not give you all the details but it's safe, it's what you've always taken, and as soon as we're settled everyone will be back to their regularly scheduled potions regimen."

He looked at her like she'd just grown a second head. "...you...you think I'd be mad because you had the Healers use subterfuge to have me take potion I regularly take? Shit, El I'm not mad for me. I'm mad about you! Honey, look at this," he said, crouching and taking her left ankle in hand, and her brain sort of filled up with that sensation so much she almost didn't see- Oh. She knew she was sore all over, but she hadn't really looked at herself at all since Haven, it wasn't like there were any mirrors around or she'd been doing a lot of bathing. Her legs were covered in all sorts of different bruising, the skin was all black, purply, yellow-green. "You just...Ellie, you're hurt," his voice broke over the word. "You've got enough problems right now, and you're beat up bad enough on the outside, choosing to be beat up on the inside too? I...your heart is in the right place, but you should have talked to me first. I would've said no, El."

"You could have," Ellie agreed. "But I couldn't have. I wasn't exactly in a conversational condition, it was an emergency situation I had maybe three minutes of consciousness left to deal with it in? Otherwise yes, I promise, I would have talked with you first. Cremisius, this...it sucks. But it just physically sucks for me."

He stared at her sharply at that, "You think I can't handle my brain's bullshit? Kind of been handling it through way worse since forever," he snapped.

"Which is why I don't want you handling it now," she explained, “—it shouldn't be something you have to handle, not if there's some other way. You're one of the strongest people I know, never doubt that, never assume I think you're incapable or something that's just- okay. You've been through so much, made so much incredible progress and you deserve to get to keep that, not have something that could be avoided pick away at it. Just, follow this thinking. There are certain potions I need to deal with physical illness, that can be taken...basically any time, by anyone, for any reason, even if they have no reason at all. Stuffy nose? Embrium tonic. Sore throat? Embrium tonic. It's a Wednesday? Slap some Embrium on it, all it does is clear up your chest and sinuses. Anyone can benefit from that at any time. You could have benefited from what you had in your flask, but you let Adan use it on me."

"Because you have asthma!" he said like she’d lost her mind.

"Yeah. It's something that I need, but you could still use for yourself."

"You could barely breathe."
"A physical form of bullshit. It's not any different from what your brain does to you. I have asthma. You have gender dysphoria. Respiratory illnesses are bitches for both of us," she offered that up lightly and it earned her a bit of a snort. "Just because it wasn't life threatening exactly, doesn't mean it isn't serious. This is gross, and I hate it, but I don't hate my body, or feel inadequate, or wrong or any of the complicated, horrible things you could feel on top of in general monthly crap. I can't- I couldn't just sit by and let you go through that, watch you go through that —that is what would have beaten me up inside. This? I'll take this over that, any day."

Cremisius was very quiet, and then he stood up and left the tent.

She...she really messed up, hadn’t she? Crap! Damn it! She-

But then he came back, looked terribly serious, and he had a wet cloth in his hands as he came and knelt at her feet. And then he took her ankle again and started carefully cleaning the tracks of dry blood off her calves, only meeting her gaze when her legs were clean up to her knees and he stopped to make certain he wasn’t pressing too far, out of bounds, before he began to wipe at the blood left on her thighs, and she...really hoped the Iron Bull wasn’t around to hear her heart hammering in her chest.

“If roles were reversed, and it was me,” Cremisius finally spoke as he worked, “…you would help me, however you could. I would appreciate you affording me the same opportunity, Ellie. Okay? You just...you’ve been bleeding badly all day, and you didn’t stop to change out bandaging.”

“No real privacy to do that in out in the open," bathroom breaks were awkward enough to work out as it was, "and...”

“You didn’t want me knowing. Found out anyway so that didn’t really work out, huh?” was he...? oh! Teasing, teasing was worlds better than upset, "It’s okay. Tomorrow just, be honest with me. I could help you, you know? Get you privacy, breaks when you need them, anything. Alright?”

“Alright,” she agreed, and Cremisius nodded, pressing a kiss to her knee.

"Here, get comfortable. Now, in all honesty," he stressed teasingly, offering her a smile as he handed off her sleep bottoms, "how're we feeling?"

She was kind of beyond exhausted, so he suggested she just lay down for a bit—he’d get her when dinner was ready. Which turned into her waking up with someone holding her, too spindly limbed to be Cremisius or the Iron Bull...Marehis was laying with her in the Chargers tent.

"Hey mami."

"Hello sweet girl, how are you feeling?"

"I’m okay.” Napping had helped, cleaning up had too. And now, dinner—everyone else had already eaten together, but they’d saved dinner for Ellie, Marehis offering her what looked like double, maybe triple dinner? The bowl was full all the way to the top!

“Da’vehnan, you should have told us,” Marehis chastised lightly as they sat on the cot while Ellie ate. “This travel is arduous, demanding—da’len people feel more hungry during their monthlies because their bodies are hungry*. Your body is working all day performing this process, burning more energy. On top of this journey? As it stands you may have been consuming the whole of what is offered to you at breakfast, dinner, but you are still starving yourself—you will only make yourself sick and weak.”

*[The term 'are' is used to emphasize hunger in the context of the journey and the body's energetic needs. This is a creative use of language to underline the importance of food intake during strenuous periods.]

“Sorry, I didn’t think about that,” and then…it felt a little mean—Bull knew too, but she hadn’t outright said anything to him—but she had said something. “But, I didn’t mean to keep it a secret from you or anything, I told Solas he should avoid monitoring me for a little bit unless he wanted to feel cramping in parts he doesn’t even have,” she offered a little jovially, making light.

“Did you?” Marehis asked her, which sounded a bit like she’d gotten him into trouble. “And he agreed with this?”

Ellie nodded, he had—and she hadn’t felt him in the bond at all. She…she didn’t want—she didn’t know what she wanted! She just…wanted to make sure whatever this was, whatever he was hiding, it didn’t hurt Marehis! Maybe he wasn’t hiding anything! Maybe he was just coincidentally shady? But it did seem…she should have told Marehis herself, but didn’t it seem a little weird that Solas spent most of the day with her, they shared a tent and he hadn’t said anything? It looked like it really bothered Marehis.

Marehis sat with her while she ate, wow it was a lot, she almost felt overly full but the Elf woman insisted she eat every bit of it. And then as the Chargers started filtering in for the evening, Cremisius smiled when he saw the empty bowl, kissed her on the forehead to be sweet…and distract her so he could snatch the bowl out of her hands and go clean it out himself. Marehis asked the Iron Bull if he or the Chargers would mind at all, her joining them while they slept.

The Iron Bull sort of looked to Skinner as he slowly said, “I…think that would be just fine…”

Skinner grinned, something that looked almost evil—a mischievous sort of evil. “Soon, we shall outnumber the Shems.”

“Sounds like its cool then,” the Iron Bull said.

So, they got two cots side by side, Ellie laying between the Iron Bull and Marehis.

Well. It was out there now. Varric poured almost an entire jar of jam—he would have dumped the whole thing if Ellie hadn’t stopped him!—onto her oatmeal and patted her on the head, saying it was poor substitute for chocolate but at least it was sweet. Cullen came and felt at her forehead like he were checking her temperature and asked if she needed anything—asked if Ellie wanted carried the rest of the way! She did, damn it! But she so wasn’t saying that! And Cremisius was great help when she started to feel like new bandaging needed to be a thing—the Charger’s dispersed into the crowd to inform them they were due a break, and with the help of the mountain range having large rocks cover could be taken behind, he and the Iron Bull stood guard while she did her thing. And he let her nap when they broke for lunch, she ate a little bit, and then Cremisius let her rest against his side and sleep for a little while until it was time to be chipper and play march conductor again.

Thankfully, after five days of marching…they’d been about five miles out from Haven when she found them, apparently. It was seventy miles total, from their old home to their new. And Maker.

She might just kiss Solas...if things weren't so...yeah—when they came up over the ridge on the 8th of Drakonis, could finally lay eyes on and know with certainty there was such a place as Skyhold and it was huge, it was nothing short of head-spinning relief.

“You did well, lethallan,” Solas commended her as they came to a stop.
“Eleanor, my word,” Lady Josie breathed.

“That…just might work,” Leliana supposed with some levity.

“You’ve done an incredible job Ellie,” Cullen said, “now, lets go see if anyone’s home, shall we?”

There wasn’t. Solas had been right about that much—Skyhold lay big and empty and perfect! It was definitely old and long-abandoned, full of little critters and cobwebs and dust, Cole warned Ellie to wear her scarf up covering her nose and mouth just to enter the great hall but Maker. They had a great hall! They had a frigging palace! And courtyards and a barn—stables for their horses, a big one! And- and- and just! Everything!

“We can do this,” Ellie breathed with relief as she and her party, the advisors examined the Great Hall, “We can rebuild here.”

“But the real question,” Dorian said, “is can we bathe here.”

“True.”

They could, eventually. It took all hands on deck—not specifically just for bathing—but they dug in, and cleaned the place up, cleaned it out—got rid of all the mice and rats and nugs that had claimed Skyhold for their own. They got Lady Josie set up in an office, and she set to work contacting everyone—allies, government bodies, and most importantly right now, their suppliers—telling them of the Inquisition’s relocation so they could get food and ingredients and the like rolling in. So they dug in and kept the progress going, Leliana had an excellent place to keep her birds now, an actual rookery! She sent word to all of their agents in the field, to keep them updated and reestablish contact with them. There was a place for a tavern, and while Flissa wasn’t about the bar tending life anymore, there was a Dwarf man, Cabot, who set up shop, had people cleaning the place out so he could get it up and running.

Gosh it was great when things started arriving—Lace was incredible help leading teams and scouting the area and getting directions they could pass on to others needing to find their new headquarters. It took a few days but soon they had things that would let them make this place somewhere really, truly livable, and everyone ended up with their own space it seemed like. Dorian found he liked the library—he didn’t say where he would sleep but um, Ellie was pretty sure it wasn’t in the plush, comfy chair in his claimed portion of the library. And Madam de Fer had ordered some sort of daybed, a pretty desk and chair, and then two huge chairs for entertaining she said—she set up high in the balcony area where she could overlook the Great Hall or the courtyard. Solas wanted to stay in the lowest portion of the library tower, where he had a daybed and a desk, close access to books and the kitchens weren’t too terribly far either. Branching off of that was a walkway to where Cullen claimed an office, and it really did seem to suit him best—there was a little loft above it where his bed went, and Skyhold didn’t exactly have a hundred percent of its roofing, so, there was a major hole overhead that worked out pretty well, let him breathe the open air and see the stars overhead at night, and it was comfortable for him and Cassandra. Varric had a room in the same wing of Skyhold where Marehis claimed one, off overlooking the gardens, but the Dwarf took to hanging around the Great Hall, by the fire, they got him a desk and chairs and he could be warm and have a place to write…and be in a good spot to catch all the whispers and rumors of Skyhold, get some nice material for his writing. Though he was doing an awful lot of letter writing it seemed, apparently he had a friend who might be able to help them with Corypheus! Cassandra had seemed more suspicious than relieved to hear that, but as far as Ellie was concerned—any friend of Varric’s was a friend of hers!

Oh! Places! Thom wanted to stay in the stables of all places though, but it seemed like he was warm enough out there—Ellie checked! She’d been worried he’d freeze his butt off, but nope, he had a cozy little set up, and he could have some space, he was a big introvert at heart—liked being with the Chargers, they were great friends just, he needed time to decompress and be by himself—so the stables gave him that. And he had space to really get some woodworking done—Varric made the yuckiest joke about that blah, but hey, as long as he wasn’t doing it in front of the horses or stable hands…he could knock himself out.

The Chargers set up camp near the Tavern, of course, the Iron Bull was almost always in there when he could, had a little chair he’d squeeze into—Ellie asked if he wanted a bigger chair, because they’d get him one but he said he was fine…comfortable enough and it apparently emphasized his bigness? She…she wasn’t going to question that. Whatever floats his boat. Cole was all over the place, working hard to help, but he liked to stay in the Tavern—not on the first floor like Ellie thought he might, because that’s where Maryden would be, but she was still in Orlais so maybe that would change. For now, the Spirit took to staying on the tippy top floor of the Tavern, being up high really suited him for some reason, and he was happy and comfortable up there he said…Ellie still got him some pillows and blankets for his corner and a little candle in case it was too dark.

It…it kind of made Ellie sad, when she and Sera realized there was this great spot in the Tavern, second floor with a big window and window seat, and Cabot said Sera was free to use it—it’d keep people from wandering in there drunk and falling out the window or something, discourage people from finding privacy in the Tavern to get up to something other than drinking and paying their tab…especially since if you really were hard up for coin, you could always slip in here, get on the roof, and it was a safe enough drop down for most.

“Oh Inky! Come here,” Sera said, when she was showing the place to Ellie. She waved her over for a hug, squeezing her tight, “It’s nothing against bunking with you Ink, friggin it’s the best—and we can have sleep overs ‘n pish all the time! Whenever you want—your place when you find a room of your own, and you’re always welcome to come cuddle with me here! It’s just nice having your own space.”

“You’re not um, still mad at me or anything because of Haven?”

“Of course not! I didn’t like you being so danger-y but that was real brave Ink. This doesn’t have anything to do with you in a bad way, honest. Just…even though the Breach is gone, there’s still gonna be a lot on you, you know?” was there? Traveling around and sealing Rifts would be the same work she was doing before she supposed, but…somehow it didn’t feel quite as significant, without the Breach overhead. “And I wanna be there for you when you need me, but sometimes you’re just gonna want everyone to leave you the frig alone. Maybe with Kremmy-boy?” she teased.

Ellie blushed, hiding her face against Sera’s neck as she hugged her tighter, “That’s not ‘everyone leaving me the frig alone’,” she pointed out.

There wasn’t really anywhere to be alone—she didn’t have a room yet, she wasn’t really sure where she’d set up. For right now she was bunking with the Iron Bull or Lady Josie—the Antivan woman had a hard time sleeping in a new place their first few nights in Skyhold and Ellie’d slept in a bedroll with her, and that turned into sleep overs in her room overlooking the gardens. Cassandra and Cullen let her sleep with them too—because they liked it, and because Solas had invited her to sleep with him and Marehis and that…just wasn’t on right now, she was kind of afraid to Fade dream with him, and she definitely wasn’t in a place of feeling comfortable sleeping in the same bed as him, but Cassandra spoke up and said she and Cullen had already invited Ellie to spend the night with them, but maybe another time.
Which didn’t happen because after a solid week of nonstop work, cleaning, and moving in, well, she didn’t need to share rooms with anyone anymore.

“Eleanor, sweetheart, it’s time to wake up.”

_That is Cassandra, Cole said in the Fade, you should go. Good luck today, Ellie, you deserve it._

_Deserve it?_

Oh, she was awake now. Mmm, it was warm—she didn’t think it would be, because of the hole and everything, but between the blankets, and being literally between Cassandra and Cullen, Anya was laying across her legs, head resting on Cassandra’s hip. They were so toasty and safe, it was just the _best._

“I’m awake, promise,” Ellie mumbled out, rolling over to snuggle against Cassandra some more.

“Are you now?” Cullen asked, amused, and Ellie felt a dip in the bed, oh—his place was still warm, but he hadn’t been in it when she woke up. He was back now, oh! He…how exactly had he gotten it up here? He had a tray with him? There was a ladder? She really hoped Cole helped or something, it couldn’t be safe otherwise. As it was she’d been scared when Cullen hoisted Anya up, holding her on his hip with one arm while he used the other to do the whole climbing thing, but it worked out well enough…she was still nervous about getting Anya back down, but the pup had really wanted to go with them! They needed a puppy elevator! Sera could probably figure something like that out!

Oh, but the trays! The Commander brought breakfast for them! Like! Actual breakfast! Biscuits, eggs, sausage, potatoes—no more emergency stores!

"Gracias, papi!"

"Only the finest breakfast the Inquisition has to offer for my girls," he insisted, dropping a kiss to Ellie’s head as he petted Anya and offered Cassandra a wink.

Cassandra gave a dismissive sound at being considered one of his "girls" but that was all the fuss she made. They dug in and chatted—Anya ate so many eggs! She was such a hungry puppy! She was so much bigger now, she could lay across Cassandra and Ellie’s laps with her legs hanging off the sides, but she’d always be a puppy to Ellie. She used to be just the tiniest!

"Eleanor," Cassandra said as they finished up, Cullen set the tray down on the floor and Anya followed after it, looking to lick their plates clean, "there is to be a ceremony of sorts this morning."

"For Haven?" Ellie asked, somber. Lady Josie had been working on a memorial service, she let Ellie help sometimes, which was…nice in a way, she was glad to be part of paying tribute to those they’d lost.

“That is this afternoon,” Cullen informed her, “however…”

“The memorial service would be complimented nicely if our Inquisitor said a few words, we believe,” Cassandra said, “as we have come to a decision on that front, we will be announcing the Inquisitor this morning—hold a bit of a ceremony in the courtyard for Skyhold to bear witness. But first we shall have our first official War Room meeting, to prepare you.”
“Do I get a sneak peek? Since I’m the Herald of Andraste and all that?” Ellie asked.

“We do wish to discuss the decision with you before a formal announcement is made, certainly,” Cassandra said, “Have you the time?” she asked, tapping at her own wrist.

Oh! “Uh-huh, just a sec,” Ellie said, carefully rolling over Cassandra, kissing the Seeker on the cheek as she bounced from the bed to get to her pack, and dug out her watch, “six fifty…” she squinted, it was just barely past the line “six!”

“We’ve four more minutes Cassandra,” Cullen said, and when she nodded, the Commander waved for Ellie to join them again on the bed they- they had to get going somewhere right? But when she went to them, four arms shot out to whisk her back into bed, nestled between them. Well, if a cuddle session was on her schedule, who was she to complain?

But she got what they meant by ‘four more minutes’—at 7 o’clock sharp, Ellie heard gentle rapping on the door to Cullen’s office, and then the steady thunk, thunk, thunk of someone climbing the ladder, but the adults didn’t move to see who it was, so she hoped it was who they were expecting.

Oof! Marehis! The Elf woman just crawled right up the center of the bed and laid on top of Ellie, smiling against Ellie’s cheek before she started peppering it with kisses. “Hmm good morning sweet girl, did you have a pleasant evening? Did you sleep well?”

“I did!”

“Excellent,” Marehis said, “now, you’ve a bit of a day ahead, I’m here to help you get ready, escort you for the day.”

Cullen took Anya and carefully made the climb down out of his loft. Skyhold presented the opportunity to actually wash up a bit, she’d been able to scrub head to toe a few times since they got here, so she was already clean though Marehis decided to indulge in massaging oil into Ellie’s hair—her scalp really, it got so dry in this weather—which was just super relaxing, which was nice —she was a little nervous honestly, about who this Inquisitor would be. She was worried it would be someone entirely new, or someone that…what if they didn’t like her? This would be someone who had power and influence over everyone in the Inquisition—what if she messed up with them and they sent her away? They could actually do that! She knew her friends—her family, would fight something like that but if the Inquisitor says ‘the little apostate brat has to go’ that probably isn’t a gentle suggestion.

Once she and Cassandra were armored up for the day, the Seeker let Ellie help with braiding her hair-crown! And then they were off, “Eleanor~” Cassandra was already chastising as Ellie climbed down onto the ladder…and proceeded to, as the Seeker feared she might, slide her way down to get to the bottom floor faster.

“Elgar’nan, da’vehnan,” Marehis swore as Ellie giggled. They were such worry warts!

“That looked like spectacular fun—can you show me how to do that?” Cullen was asking.

“Cullen Stanton Rutherford, don’t you dare encourage her!” Cassandra snapped as she descended the ladder.

“Me? Encourage my sweet Ellie? I wouldn’t dream of it.”

Marehis was shaking her head as she joined them, and wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders as they left Cullen’s office to cross the walkway to Solas’s little piece of Skyhold. But he wasn't there when they passed through into the Great Hall, Josie's office...oh! They were making the room at the end of that hall the War Room, cool! It'd been one of the things she hadn't been allowed to help with—there was a door across the hall from Harritt's new forge she wasn't allowed to go into for some reason. There was a table set up...wow, even bigger than the one they'd had in Haven! There wasn't anyone else there save for Lady Josie and Leliana waiting for them, but that was okay, she supposed they wanted to talk to her first before introducing her? Lady Josie usually did give her a run down on guest's likes and dislikes, how best to speak with them and stuff, she supposed that yeah, it would make sense to do the same before she meets their future Inquisitor.

The…their chosen candidate for Inquisitor’s likes were chocolate, puppies, hugs, and words that start with q-u. Their dislikes were brussels sprouts, spiders, secrets, and words with confusing silent letters in them. And you could talk to her just about anyway you want as long as you’re being honest.

“M-me?” she asked. That…that was definitely a sign she wasn’t meant to be Inquisitor—that wasn’t a very good question at all, and questions—inquiring—was like, the whole job wasn’t it?

“Yes, Eleanor,” Cassandra said. Cassandra. Who was she and what had she done with her overprotective mami that didn't even want her sliding too fast down a ladder? Did she have a fever? What was happening?!

“Ellie,” Leliana spoke up, “what we need out of an Inquisitor is a face for the Inquisition, someone reliable, who can lead us, who people can look to and find purpose for the cause we serve. And ultimately? That person has to be able to do what is necessary for the Inquisition as a whole—and you’ve more than proven yourself in that regard.”

“I…I have?”

“Absolutely. When it came to the security of our members in Haven, when you realized they could indeed be saved if only with your sacrifice, you did not hesitate to do so,” Leliana said, “our understanding from Cole is you saw obstacles in your way—our thoughts and feelings on the matter, that we would have stopped you if we’d known your true plan—and you figured out a way around them, did what you needed to do, to get your people—your people—out and safely away, and having the presence of mind to think steps ahead of the enemy—what if the Elder One had given chase? We do not know still if he’s traversing some treacherous mountain path trying to go around to where we came out when we went through the mountains—because you sealed our escape route behind us. And even when you did not know if you would reach the safety of our camp, you did all you could to ensure we would have the name of our enemy.”

“You are fair, and loyal, and you accept guidance from your betters,” Lady Josie said, “and you are an encouragement—a leader.”

“You’re all really okay with this?” Ellie asked, looking to Cassandra.

"Make no mistake Eleanor, I still...this is not something I would have ever dreamed I would ask of you," Cassandra assured, "but I have prayed tirelessly, endlessly, for the Maker to provide for us in this regard, and again you are the one He has sent."

"You think so?"

"We have exhausted every avenue, but none seem...they all have their complications, their pitfalls, the could not serve this Inquisition without their political ties restricting our progress, and at the end of the day...there are none we can be certain of, who would serve as you have."
Cassandra was quiet for a moment and then, "Eleanor, are you aware Cole reports to Leliana?"

The idea hadn't ever really crossed her mind, Cole reporting to anyone. She shook her head 'no'.

"Indeed. We often lost track of you during our travels, when we made camp for the evening—we believed it to be something in the vein of that evening you took time to rest before dinner, that you were merely seeking seclusion to save face while still recovering after Haven. But you were not. You spent your day leading us forward, with all the hope and encouragement—we hadn’t any solid evidence Skyhold was truly here, and if it was, would it truly serve us? Such unsteady promises are hard to make with a brave face, but you did it, you made people believe, and then you delivered. And when you weren’t doing that, you were bolstering that work by seeking to meet the needs of those in your ‘hundreds-strong’ party. You prayed with people, offered forgiveness to those who wronged you because they needed it, and you…you considered others in all things, even when it came to your own health, chose not to eat when a great many of your people went without, and when you did, you did so only when you knew there were none wanting in your camp. You chose to endure ailment that could have wholly been avoided in you, for the sake of another, an act of love that…as I have been allowed to know you, Eleanor, I am certain you would have done regardless of personal connection."

Regardless? Oh! Of course! She would—she wouldn’t let anyone in that situation go without something she could give them access to.

And then Cullen sighed, seemed very contemplative for a moment, Ellie…Ellie was pretty sure she’d start crying if they kept on like this…sounding so proud of her, and confident in this crazy decision.

"I wanted to make you Inquisitor ages ago just to spite Roderick," Cullen shrugged.

"We do have another we can fall back on, Eleanor, if you truly cannot perceive yourself in this role. But it is not unlike what you have already been doing for the Inquisition—you will be representing us to foreign dignitaries, helping as we mend ties between the Mages and Templars, and assisting us in our pursuit of the Elder One," Cassandra said, "and in addition…we have several prisoners now, that we have not been able to give trial as we have no Inquisitor. You would be the one to decide their fates. As you have been at the center of the problems they’ve caused, seen first hand the fullness of their crimes, your insight would be invaluable to an Inquisitor deciding their punishment."

That…had actually been a worry for her. That they’d bring in an Inquisitor they would make sit down with Ellie to listen to her input, only to conflict or watch them disregard everything she had to say just to do whatever suited them or their agenda over that of the Inquisition's.

"Ellie? Sweetheart, you don't." Cullen was soothing, quick to pull her in for a hug, Marehis and Cassandra laid hands on her shoulders as she started to cry, she couldn't help it!

"I-I'm okay! I want to do it, if you still want me after this," she sniffled, "I was so scared! I...I was really really worried about what might happen if I sealed the Breach and all the Rifts closed with it. And then w-we found out there's still R-Rifts and- I know that makes me a horrible person- b-but I was afraid you wouldn't need me anymore a-and I'd have to leave if I didn't work for you- or i-if I messed up with a new Inquisitor they m-might-"

"Eleanor," Cassandra chastised, "you are not a horrible person, and...oh dear girl, do not accept this job if you're only doing so for the security it brings in that regard."
"We would not have sent you away, child," Leliana rasped out, looking mildly horrified at Ellie's upset, "Eleanor, you're not invaluable merely so long as there are Rifts to seal-"

"I know—I can cook and I can clean and I can fight and I know healing things and I have like, I dunno, a bunch of the Chant memorized, and I can read, and write and stuff now, I'm not the best but I could help with- I dunno, Chantry things? There's just lots of stuff I can do!"

"You would not have had to resort to going from Herald of Andraste to being a chambermaid, Eleanor," Lady Josie spoke up, "what Leliana means is, while we certainly appreciate you would wish to earn your keep...we would not merely have sought to terminate your relationship with the Inquisition the moment your Mark no longer was of use."

"Eleanor, we..." Cassandra seemed to steel herself and then she cleared her throat and said, "We are a family. You will always have a home with us, no matter the circumstance."

"She is right, da'vehnan," Marehis said, "If the Inquisition disbanded tomorrow, you would be free to go on your own way, but you would also be more than welcome to go with whoever you choose to, any time you choose to."

"If you choose me, we will get another puppy," Cullen stage whispered his attempt to bribe her before he kissed the top of her head when she giggled. He was such a nut!...Anya might like having a friend though? Someday, one puppy was enough for right now. They'd talk.

Ellie smiled as she pulled away, almost wiped at her eyes with the back of her hands but Lady Josie offered her a handkerchief. "Thanks," she said, cleaning up the mess she'd made of herself but she...it made sense, when they said it out loud, she just...this was new territory, people who she could rely on like that, for permanent. "Um...am I out of the running for Inquisitor?"

"Certainly not," Leliana said, "you are in the privacy of a meeting with your advisors—you've seen us all work up in to varying states of anger and distress in the War Room. You were not here for the meeting sweet Josie threw her clipboard at Cullen's head."

"It slipped," Lady Josie insisted, red faced.

"Right upside the back of my head," Cullen chortled.

"You are a young person, with quite the complex situation...too, I understand your monthly is still at hand?" Leliana asked, and Ellie nodded, not wanting to voice the lie—until she got a chance to sit down and talk with Marehis in private, she was 'having her monthly' indefinitely, forever, she was sure she could get a note from Adan and everything that says so. "We did not realize these were worries for you until you voiced them, Eleanor," Leliana said, "you feel better about them now, yes? You are not to accept this position merely out of fear of being cast aside."

"I'm not—accepting out of that, I mean. It's...scary, but I want to do it. Um...you can fire me if I'm really bad at it, right?"

"There will be a learning curve I'm certain," Cassandra allowed, "but we've every confidence in you, Eleanor. If you truly are 'bad at it', yes, we will have a discussion and work to set the situation to rights."

Ellie nodded. "Alright. I'll do it."

"Excellent!" Lady Josie enthused, oh gosh was she bouncing?

"We must settle her contract and make the announcement first, Josie. Then you can have "your fun," Leliana assured the Antivan woman.

"Of course, yes, just, here-

Ellie turned to look as the old door to their new war room was...pushed open with force that would have sent their old War Room door crashing into the wall, but as it stood, this door was bigger and old, it creaked on its hinges and slowly came to an anti-climactic stop to reveal a sorely disappointed Varric.

"Can someone grease this thing up and let me try again?" the Dwarf complained, "This entrance blows."

"It is a highlight of my day," Cassandra said, amused, "when I am on my deathbed, I will look back on this moment and savor it."

"Glad it puts a smile on your heart there Seeker. How you feelin'? Having a good day?"

"I am well," the woman drawled, almost sounding annoyed with him, "as are we all. This is indeed a great day, Eleanor has agreed to be our Inquisitor, as I'm sure you're aware, thus you are here."

"Yup, Maker bless Cole. Love that kid, maybe gimme a heads up on the door situation next time little buddy," Varric called into the air as if Cole could hear him...he probably could. "You're moving on up huh, Tumbles? Or is it 'Inquisitor Tumbles' now?"

"I like it," Ellie teased, "it'll strike fear into the heart of the Elder One when he hears Inquisitor Tumbles is coming after him," she looked to her Advisors, "that's part of the job right? Going after that jerk."

"Certainly," Leliana nodded.

"Good!"

"You are truly eager to face him, da'vehnan?" Marehis worried.

"You bet!" Ellie informed her...serious, but she went for jovial, punching her unmarked hand to her Marked palm, "I wanna climb up on the Iron Bull's shoulders, and punch him in his stupid Darkspawn face!"

"You'll do no such thing. Unless you want me to have a heart attack," Cullen insisted, and then he realized, "—is that why you two don't like Ellie sliding down ladders?"

"Yes!" Cassandra and Marehis groused.

"Oh good heavens—Eleanor, no sliding down ladders in front of your mothers! You give them an awful fright."

The implications of 'in front of your mothers' earned him bemused glares from Cassandra and Marehis, and was likely why Varric snorted as he came and laid out the parchment he had in hand on the War table.

"Alright kid, this is just an addendum—an add-on to your contract with the Inquisition that gives you your new rank, updates your job description, little boost to your hazard pay because of stupid Darkspawn face. Still managed to get you weekends off, amnnnd a sweet fluffy allowance for your uh wardrobe needs."
Ellie gasped excitedly, looking to Lady Josie, "Did you get a chance to look over Mister Aclassi's designs?" she still couldn't believe he'd done them on the road! Ellie had literally flipped over backward—she'd been sitting when mail came during lunch and she had all of two seconds to register it was something to keep out of view of the Tevinter man sitting right beside her, so she'd thrown herself back out of her seat, tucking the envelope close to her chest as she did a little backward somersault to roll over her head and onto her feet before announcing she needed a 'private minute’ and raced away put eyes on what the elder Aclassi had sent…admittedly, the backflip was well deserved because,

"For Inquisition staff uniforms?" Lady Josie asked, “I did, and I must say Eleanor...I'm rather excited to see what he does with you, I adore them, I sent them off to a few credible local tailors we have worked with in the past to assist in their production, I thought he might appreciate the sentiment of patronizing them."

"The transport made contact with you guys right? I haven't written him much because I'm afraid Cremisius will see. I feel like we're out of the woods with this, but he still wants it to be a surprise...which reminds me, Varric, would you mind doing me a favor here in a couple days?"

"You got it," Varric assured.

Lady Josie was riffling through her clip board papers just to verify, "Yes, they made contact yesterday, the Blades of Hessarian met them on the beach, hosted them, and saw them safely out of the Storm Coast."

Yes yes yes yes yes!

"Good," Ellie breathed a sigh of relief. Closer. So close!

She was excited. And nervous-scared. Cremisius…hadn’t been pleased the last time she kept something from him. Hopefully he understood about this, and if he was mad…well it would be fine. They’d fought, and gotten over it…and she was pretty sure he’d come around on this.

“Are you ready to sign, Eleanor?” Leliana asked.

Oh! “Of course, thanks Varric for always being my surprise lawyer.”

“You mind if I put that on my resume?” he asked as he handed her a quill.

She read it over first, because Varric had her promise to ‘never ever sign anything ever’ without reading it for herself, first. It really was just a little update, to some of the things that had been contingent on their staying in Haven too—now it said she was to be provided housing in Skyhold, weekends off when she was here, cool!

So she signed. And then it was time for the announcement. Like. A big one.

When they first said there would be an announcement of the new Inquisitor, she thought, cool, there’ll be a big get together of everyone and someone will be proclaimed Inquisitor. But then they said it was just going to be her, so she kind of thought, it was something they’d just put in a bulletin or something, mixed in with Tavern and dining hall menues, ‘hey, you know that Herald of Andraste kid? She’s Inquisitor now, surprise!’.

But nope. Nope nope. Leliana left them literally to go ‘get in position’ and she was very afraid of that phrasing. What position? Why were there positions? What was happening?!

“Do not look so very worried Eleanor,” Cassandra said as she walked with her arm wrapped around Ellie’s shoulders, down the Great Hall, “it is merely ceremony, it would be done with any who was appointed Inquisitor. You will merely go to Leliana—we will all be with you—and be bestowed with a weapon with which you will serve the Inquisition, after which you will be announced as Inquisitor and say a few words acknowledging that. That you are honored, perhaps a mission statement if you are so inclined. Blacksmith Harritt is rather pleased with his work and sends his regards.”

That sneak! “He didn’t say anything about any of this when I checked on him the other day!” he’d been very excited about his new set up and grateful again, that she got him into his old cabin—he’d been able to rescue a family hammer!

“He likely did not realize its purpose outside of replacing weaponry for you—traditionally, the Inquisitor is presented with a sword,” Cassandra sounded…the sort of amused she did when Ellie was in for what the Seeker hoped was a pleasant surprised.

Cassandra let go of her, and fell back to flank her with Cullen and Lady Josie, Marehis dropping a quick kiss to Ellie’s hair before breaking off, saying she’d be near if she needed her and set off for…dunno, somewhere she needed to cut through the library tower to get to. And then there were guards waiting at the doors to the Great Hall, throwing them open when Cassandra cleared her throat—Ellie could hear the sound of Leliana’s voice calling out to be heard, but the words were muffled through the door, and then…

Oh gosh. Everyone was in the courtyard below. Everyone—all of Skyhold was gathered to fill every tier, and when she looked up she saw the Chargers lined up high on a battlement over the gate…which was likely a security position but um, it was also nice to see the Iron Bull…and Cremisius, the Tevinter was grinning like mad and offered her a thumbs-up.

She’s got this.

This situation…and a new weapon.

She’d keep better track of this one. She’d try to, anyway.

Leliana stood down on the platform where the stairs then turned down to meet the ground level. Ellie was so nervous her limbs sort of felt numb, and she was pretty sure it was some sort of divine intervention that kept her from tripping, but she made it to Leliana, who waited patiently, presenting Ellie…with a very pretty, brand new staff, long and silvery, the head of which shaped the Inquisition’s sigil. It matched her tattoo!

Oh gosh and her magic really liked it, wow! Could she go fight Corypheus now? She was gonna go fight him.

She would. Someday, they knew who he was now, and they’d find him, and they’d stop him, together.

“I am honored to represent the Inquisition,” she said, resting the butt of the staff on the stone underfoot. “The Inquisition—and everyone in it, we are not only Mages. We are Soldiers and Rogues and Templars—we are the stable hand, and the kitchenmaid, the blacksmith, the horse master. We are our scouts, and our raw recruits, we are our veterans, and we are those we lost in Haven. Maker guard their souls and give them peace—may our Dalish brothers and sisters be safe from the tricks of Fen’Harel and find blessing with Elgar’nan beyond the veil. Those we lost died bravely, and we will honor them. Corypheus must be stopped—too many have been lost to his crimes, at the Conclave, in Haven, in Redcliffe, and Therinfal Redoubt. We know his name, and we know what he wants. We will find him, and we will stop him, reclaim justice for the Divine and her people, for our people. And we will do that together!"

The Iron Bull made a motion—‘big finish’ in exaggerated sign as everyone hollered and cheered and the Qunari raised a fist overhead, so, she guessed she was supposed to top it off. She raised her staff high and…oh Maker, there was something…affirming, relieving. A Mage standing high, raising a staff, the action only spawning further cheers and encouragement—not cries of fear or anger.

Cassandra was announcing when it would be time for the service for Haven, Ellie felt light headed as Cullen and Josie were whisking her away, back into the Great Hall, an exit or something she supposed? Her staff came holstered and she slung the strap over her shoulder just before- Oh, nice! Cullen was sweeping her up in a hug the moment they crossed the threshold. Oh!

He wasn't planning on putting her down! He'd hoisted her up against his chest, her chin on his shoulder while he kept going his merry way down the hall, the Advisors, Cassandra rushing to catch up, Marehis came running back. "That was incredible Ellie!" Cullen said, "You did so well!"

She felt like a rambling mess at the time, so, cool!

"It was excellent Da'vehn'an!"

"You were wonderful, my lady," Josie agreed, "Cullen do slow down, I am in heels and I will beat you with my clipboard if you do not let me have my fun."

Cullen slowed it way on down and let Lady Josie get ahead of them as he just...kept carrying Ellie down the hall, it was very snuggly so she wasn't complaining!

Oh. Oh Maker.

It was about to be very snuggly. Lady Josie led them to the wing of Skyhold she hadn't been allowed to set foot in since they arrived. There was a creaky old corridor that circled around, stairs, a platform, more stairs—should Cullen maybe put her down? This was a lot of stairs! Oof! He did put her down when they got to the door, and Lady Josie looked like she was about to bust out of her skin with excitement as she stood with her hand on the door handle, and Cullen put his hands over her eyes, "I promise not to let you trip or walk into anything," he said, sounding amused and so...gosh everyone was excited! Even Leliana seemed eager, following quietly behind them all.

"There are stairs," Cullen warned, "up up up."

She could hear giggling echoing from somewhere, Anya letting out a few barks—Ellie wondered where she'd gotten off to!—as they trotted up the steps, and then Cullen was moving, for her to turn left when they got to what felt like the top.

"Alright, are you ready my lady?" Lady Josie asked, shushing when there were more giggles, and then, "these are your quarters."

Cullen removed his hands and she opened her eyes and- and-

"Surprise!" Sera and Lace announced from the bed—they threw the last of the pillows they'd apparently been putting in place by the headboard and jumped into the bed, big smiles on thier faces and Anya was already making herself comfortable, laying on the foot of the bed, panting excitedly.

She...had a room. Like. Like a huge, massive room she had no idea how to even begin to process having. "Santa mierda, que Maker me ayude." Holy shit. Maker help me.
Josie gasped, and then giggled, "Te gusta, mijita?" Did she like it? Was that even a matter of question?

"The frig is all that?" Sera wanted to know.

Whoops, they broke her brain. She was sort of mentally screaming about all of this in Antivan. "It's beautiful!" she assured in Trade so all the adults could understand.

She...there was no way she deserved all of this. It was incredible, her bed was ginormous and there was so much light! And the fireplace was amazing and there was a huge couch, and Maker she had book cases! With like! Books on them! She'd need a ladder to reach- oh! There was a ladder! And a huge desk that had to weigh a ton.

"Oh, I'm so glad you like it!" Lady Josie enthused, oh gosh she must have done so much work for this!

"Thank you so much!" Ellie enthused as she hugged Lady Josie.

"Of course, oh it was such a pleasure to arrange!" she assured as they pulled apart.

"You like it, Inky?" Sera asked as she bounced off the bed and came to Ellie, "I told you you needed your own space."

"Sera! You're ridiculous! And we are having so many sleep overs—you're absolutely positive you don't want to bunk with me?"

"I'm good where I am, but thanks for wanting to share," Sera said, pulling her into a squeezy hug. "Lace 'n me are gonna go get drinky before Cabot has to close*. You want anything from the Tavern? You can come with if you like."

Ellie smiled, shaking her head, "I'm good, but thanks for asking, have fun okay?"

"Good seeing you honey," Lace said and Ellie leaned a little so the Dwarf woman could kiss her on the cheek before heading out with Sera.

"What would you care to do now, da'len?" Marehis asked her.

She...was actually totally wiped, now, this was...a lot of change. Skyhold was change period, on top of everything else? Her morning felt like it'd been stretched into days—absolutely incredible, humbling days but still, days. "Actually, if there isn't anything I need to see to, I think I'll lay down for a bit?"

"I asked Sera and Miss Lace to see to it your pack and all of your things were moved into your quarters," Cassandra said as she came close and rested the back of her hand against Ellie's forehead, before using that hand to smooth her hair back, "get some good rest, you have done well today," she said intoning, "you deserve this, enjoy it."

"I've a bit of work I need to get to, but I'll see you later," Cullen said as he came around to be in front of her, "I'm so proud of you sweetheart."

Oh gosh. "Thanks, you guys, for everything."

The Advisors and Cassandra took their leave, Ellie waving bye to them.

She was feeling...was happy-sad a thing? She was so incredibly blessed, happy for all the crazy amazing opportunities she'd been given, and her speech thing had gone okay right? And she had a room now! But her heart still hurt after Haven, and she...

She kind of felt empty, like she was going numb underneath it all, but that didn't make any sense.

"Da'vehn'an?"

Ellie startled a bit when Marehis came and rested a hand on her arm, looking at her as if the Elf woman were a little concerned, "Is something the matter?"

"Just tired, I really am beat." She just needed a nap! Processing time! Marehis helped her out of her armor and into her sleep clothes, and then she laid down with her in the bed, Anya climbing across the bed to curl up in front of Ellie while Marehis held her from behind, gently playing with a lock of Ellie's hair, it was getting a little longer now, just springing out a bit more from her head in actual little curls instead of the kind-of-curly fluff she'd had.

"Is everything alright, da'len?" Marehis asked quietly once they were settled. "With us, I mean."

With...with them? What? Oh. "Of course, mami, why?"

"I...perhaps it is nonsense, but it was...I had some difficulty keeping up with you as we traveled, and I got the feeling you might be avoiding me. A feeling—you've not been unkind or cold just distant, but I know you were busy. I just wanted to make certain everything was okay."

Oh. She had been avoiding Marehis, actually. Not because of her though! Just! She couldn't stand not speaking to Marehis about things she couldn't talk to her about until they were alone and...oh gosh, what was she thinking? Napping could wait, this was the first time since Haven that they'd been entirely alone.

"Solas isn't stopping in or anything is he?" she checked, she was half tempted to press the bond and see if she could figure out where he was but she was scared she'd get caught peeking.

"He just got some new books in he was planning on getting into today, I can send for him of course, do you wan-"

"No! I-," Ellie sat up, oh gosh, she didn't know where to start.

"Da'vehn'an?" Marehis asked carefully as she sat up with her, "What is it?"

Okay, she wasn't super sure where to start...though maybe it should be with a confession, she felt so so bad about it. "My courses ended our second day in Skyhold."

"...alright," Marehis said, uncertain. "You...are you experiencing something we should seek Adan over? Or would you prefer speaking with Miss Elan?" Elan...oh yeah! She was head Apothecary now, and Adan was super chipper about it, he'd never really planned on being head Healer for the Inquisition in the first place, his impromptu promotion had blindsided him and now he can do work he loves without all the stress and bureaucracy of being super in charge. "You've been cramping still, having head aches since then."

"I was lying, I'm really sorry. But it was so Solas would stay out of the bond, it's sort of why I stayed the night with Cassandra and Cullen instead of um, you guys. He's the one I've been avoiding, not you...well you a little bit because it wasn't safe to talk to you until we could do that, you know," she gestured to the room, "alone. Except for Anya. But we've got puppy/mama Marehis looked very grave. "...has Solas done something?"

"Maybe. I'm...I'm scared Solas might not be who he says he is."

Marehis was very quiet as Ellie carefully walked her through the best she could. The Iron Bull's and Cremisius's suspicion, Cassandra's, the things they'd seen and heard. The things that made Ellie suspicious, what he'd said about Corypheus and his Orb—well before Ellie had even been capable of talking about what happened in Haven—and his lying to keep Marehis from following them. That he had all this weird convenient knowledge about everything going on, and zero explanation for it that actually held up and...where the hell was this 'village' he grew up in, Ellie wanted longitude and latitude on that! Get her a map!

That wasn't the most serious thing but seriously, did Marehis even know anything about his past?

...apparently not. But she did have some weird stories he'd given her. About a 'schism' he claimed to have witnessed when he was growing up. He said there were Elves that believed in the gods, while others in his village that believed the gods were merely people, from a time when Elves were all magical and immortal. They did great things in their lives, and were proclaimed gods because of their power that outshone the rest of the Elves. Until there was a civil war of sorts among them—Elgar'nan and the others saw to the death of Mythal, murdered her, and Fen'Harel, the Dread Wolf, had avenged her, seen to it these Mages couldn't hurt his people further, lead them into further devastation. He punished them by creating the Veil—the Fade, and locking them away forever, and with that action, cut off a great many Elves from their natural born magic, and made them mortal.

"That...that's a lot of deflection to the question, 'where did you grow up'," Ellie said. Maker that...was all so wild but, "C...Corypheus, he said something about there being no gods. That he'd seen their thrones stood empty—I thought he meant all gods like the Maker, b-but-" she gasped, reaching to clutch Marehis's forearm as she promised, "I swear I'm not saying I doubt Dalish gods exist, oh my gosh, I'm sorry! Just! It's weird Solas has stories like that and he's got all this insight to things like the time travel amulet Corypheus gave Alexius, and the Orb. I mean, it sounds now like they both believe the same things about the Dalish gods."

"It was merely stories, lore, da'len, Solas..." Marehis seemed to be thinking about it, like she wasn't certain if they'd ever properly had a conversation about his personal beliefs.

"I offered to pray with him once, because he was worried about you, back when he couldn't say as much? While you were away after the Butler/Farrier thing. And Solas said he doesn't bow to the Dalish gods."

Ellie's heart leapt into her throat, and Marehis startled, pushing Ellie behind her as she drew a blade, when a voice sounded.

"He does not have to, Ellie," oh gosh Cole...it was just Cole, perched on the foot board of her bed.

"Elgar'nan child, you gave us a fright! What are you doing here?" Marehis asked.

"I heard your hurting, you and Ellie because you are afraid you cannot trust Solas."

"What do you mean?" Ellie asked when she could find her voice. "I mean about what you
"He does not have to, because he is one. Ellie," Cole said simply as if it were common knowledge*. "Solas is Fen'Harel."

Chapter End Notes

Dalish:
Halani=help

*Switch around with the song--one part feels, one part I need Cullen's dramatic ass singing while still maintaining that with smol Inquisitor, ain't nobody singing when she wakes up for real, they wanna pounce with "OUR BBY PLEASE VERIFY YOU'RE ALIVE, WHAT CAN WE DO? HOW CAN WE HEAL YOU?"

*Lanterns= I think they lead you to Skyhold? You see them a few different times in the cut scene journey. Looking at maps, measuring, math, I figure it's about 70 miles from Haven proper, to Skyhold. After reading up on foot travel and averaging times it takes to travel certain distances, 5ish days seems about right, with them being down to 65 when they start heading for Skyhold, they have to average 13 a day to get there, so, having a few varying days of 'we knocked out 16 miles' and some 'we have gone 12 miles and now we must go back for snacks' days, it works out.

*A Human Inquisitor is the only Human in canon we see who can use Rift Magic. It doesn't come up as a classification we see in any other non-Elf mage, even the person who can train you in Rift Magic when you play Mage Inquisitor during "Specializations for the Inquisitor," is an Elf woman 'Your Trainer'.

*Flissa's fate=if you save Flissa from Haven, when you get to Skyhold Cabot is running the Tavern, and you can find Flissa running around Skyhold. If you talk to her she thanks you for saving her, and her only dialog options after that is to tell you she's still serving the Inquisition, just in a different way now and then she giggles, which I swear on my life I thought she was implying that she was serving sexually...and then actually looking it up and reading about it, she's serving in a Chantry role and wants to be a Sister. So. Thanks for the context, bioware!

*Nourish yourselves my duderuses with uteruses. Ya need to up your caloric intake during ya period by at least 200-500 more calories a day when the flood is upon you. Break out the chocolate or your snack of choice, and be blessed.

*So, every chapter I publish, the very next moment after initially publishing I have a visceral moment of "OH MY GOSH I FORGOT _____ IDEA/PLOT POINT or REALIZING _____ IS A CONFLICT" and last chapter's was--I had Cassandra and Cullen give Ellie a sword bc Herald ends up with one despite their class in the cut scene with Corypheus, and instead of being like "oh! and here I have a sword!" I was like "it can be a nice gift, here are some feels"...however, I forgot that you get a sword. for being. Inquisitor. It's part. of. the. initiation. gah. But coincidentally, I got her dropping her staff left right and center, so I thought it'd be a nice switch up and a major statement, to bestow a Mage Inquisitor with a Staff. SO, it kind of worked out.
*If you talk to Cabot, one of the first dialog things he has is saying he'll be closed soon for everyone taking a breather to remember the loss of Haven. Also he's dating Elan Ve'mal (head Apothecary once in Skyhold)? Like? It's so cute and I love their little background romances?

*In the Twitterverse, writers of Dragon Age have confirmed that they believe Cole knew Solas's identity and purposes the entire time, this is why in 'Return to Haven/First Day Eve' there is no 'Ellie thoughts' on Solas, because Solas refuses to interact with Cole until he can speak with him privately, get initial impressions out of the way for fear Cole might reveal who he is, and fathom out how to move forward with him. I set the stage so he'd be inclined to share that information with the rest of the class. This is one plot point I'm a little nerve-wracked over exploring—I was always planning a bit of an early reveal, but I'd always thought to do it more slow burn than this. I decided last minute to just go full blown 'whats up, what's good, you've been banging the Dread Wolf, woof' and I'm screaming but I'm going with it. Pray for me. Just not to the Dalish gods, thanks.
Settling and Secrets

Chapter Summary

Going backward to go forward. Starting shortly after finding Skyhold, following the point of view of Ellie's Advisors and Companions as they settle in Haven, and a certain tailor arrives.

Oh. And they discover Fen'Harel. But minor details.

Chapter Notes

Thank you so much for your patience! I promised this part up a day or so ago. I got struck by the actual Blight! Not really, but I've been sick and I had some major changes to make to this part due to last minute decisions in the last one, so I'm sorry for the wait, but it's here! This covers all the in game conversations Inquisitor has with their companions and advisors, with twists and changes due to the content of this fic/young!Inquisitor. Thanks for reading! <3

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Josephine's eyes ached as she endeavored to read the same paragraph over again for the fifth time...the sixth? No, it was the fifth. She thought. She'd written the impertinent thing! But proofreading was vital, it would not do to send something in need of further scrutiny-

Of course, she could always take a break. Such opportunity rarely presented itself, but,

"Hola Lady Josie, que pasa?" Eleanor chirped sweetly as she came around the desk to hop and seat herself with her bottom resting in the empty space to Josephine's right.

"What's up indeed. "It would seem you are, my lady," both being up on her desk and physically upright. "How are you feeling?" they had been in Skyhold not even a week and the girl had been helping nonstop, but Leliana had been by earlier, complained of her worry for Eleanor. Oh, the Spymaster did not like at all how much easier it was to so openly care for their young Herald, but she did, and Josephine had known she would! Oh, her heart had absolutely melted the very moment she laid eyes on the girl after she joined the Inquisition, she was just a child! Leliana had endured much she did not always share with Josephine, things that hardened her resolve...but there were things that had softened her as well over the years, and Eleanor was all soft. Apparently she'd been assisting in clearing rubble and mess from the Rookery, so Leliana could properly set up. However, this was the fourth thing she'd tasked herself to do before noon on the Herald of Andraste's self-imposed schedule to help make progress in Hav- Skyhold. Josephine had to remind herself. As it was, the girl had been visibly weary, pitched on her feet when she rose to them after hefting a heavy box up the circular flights of stairs to the top of the tower and setting it down where Leliana instructed, and the Spymaster had ordered her to lie down. As she hadn't a room for herself yet, Leliana had seen her to Josephine's room, she claimed she came by to inform her as much since it was her room after all. Josephine had merely jested, asking if Leliana had sent her off with a story of Schmoooples®, only for the Spymaster to appear wholly gobsmacked, stumbling over her words as she seemed to be trying to deny such a fact while asking how Josephine knew.

"Oh, loads better now, thanks so much for letting me crash in your room. How about you? Everything um, okay?"

"Certainly Eleanor, why do you ask?"

"Just checking in I guess. You're always holed up in your office so I worry, you're taking breaks right?" She...she currently was, was she not? Speaking with Eleanor as opposed to rereading her missive for a sixth...or would it be seventh time? There was something wrong with it she knew, she just couldn't find it. "I mean gosh, there's so much you're doing right now, if there's any way I can help, let me know, okay?"

Oh, bless her heart, it was so very sweet of her to offer but Josephine's work needed done in her own hand, to be credible. Too, it also worked for her peace of mind that it was done, and done correctly for that matter. She was certainly not mentioning Lady Forsythia's...colorful existence to the young lady. The woman was mean spirited, strong willed, and extreme, but a necessary ally for the Inquisition Lady Josephine hoped Eleanor never had to entertain. As it stood, the Ambassador had barely convinced the woman not to set soldiers after them for...ugh, it was a terrible misstep, Josephine knew better, she should have been better prepared, known of the feud between the Lady and her brother before she reached out in interest to strike an alliance with him as well. She was hardly going to bring up such a threat to the young girl after Haven, so she merely said, "I have everything well at hand, although I will admit it is times like these I miss my staff from the Antivan Embassy. We would often discuss the day's visitors and how best to set about the task at hand, discuss tactics and the like."

Eleanor brightened at that, oh it was precious to see, and she was glad she'd chosen to exclude any mention of her current task. Even more so when the girl said, "We could talk tactics if you want! I'm a good listener!"

Well...that would sort then, wouldn't it? She was rather burned out on her letter writing as it was, and perhaps a change of pace would right that.

The upper battlements surrounding the gardens were vacant, it was a side of their fortress that faced a steep cliff, the air was bracing. While Josephine detested the southern climate, how very cold it was here, the air was the freshest there was she was certain. And too, the chill meant it was that much warmer to walk arm in arm with the young girl as they chatted, discussing matters of the upmost importance.

"...right on the parlor floor, in front of everyone at the soiree! Who does such a thing?"

Eleanor giggled sweetly, "The Duke of Kellington apparently," she said, hugging the Antivan woman's arm more tightly.

She'd gotten rather sidetracked, starting with why she thought the Iron Bull should endeavor to find a shirt to wear around their noble guests had turned into the tale of the Duke of Kellington dropping his pants before all, one warm summer evening. She'd been getting to, "And then there's Cole's lurking. He frightens our guests half to death! Lord Genart still won't return our letters. And Sera, she walks around, I swear, with the same glob of mustard on her armor for who knows how long. Dorian refuses to take anything seriously unless it suits him. And then there's-" Good heavens. The sun had visibly moved overhead as they talked, it was now beginning to set, just how long had she been going on? "I apologize, I've lost track of the time."
"Good! That means we're having fun!" Eleanor enthused, smiling brilliantly.

"You are very kind, mija. You must think me a terrible gossip." Had she been setting a bad example for the girl? She really should be more mindful.

"You aren't gossiping exactly—you're blowing off a little steam while letting me know how we can better help when we have fancy guests, I'm the one who asked you to anyway. And I like talking with you," Eleanor insisted in earnest. Ahh. True, she had asked, but Josephine had forgotten all semblance of decorum, she should not have complained so poorly of the people she worked with. 'Cole doesn't always understand boundaries very well, but he's working on it—it might help if...I know you're busy and you might not be comfortable talking with him, but if you are and you have time, you might want to sit down with him and talk him through the importance of not startling our guests, come up with some rules. He hears hurt and goes for it. But um...I mean if he startles people too badly he can make them forget. So if it does happen again, maybe just let him do his thing, they really don't remember a thing that happened while he was interacting with them, honest, and it doesn't hurt them."

Ahh. Josephine had been there when Cole startled the Lord, began speaking of...personal matters not meant for the Ambassador's ears, and she gave Lord Genart escape. She had not known exactly, how Cole's power worked, but she trusted Eleanor and if the matter could be avoided in future, and she would find time to speak with the young man if that would help.

"Dorian's going to flirt no matter what, but I can talk to him if you like? Sera...I'll try to see if she'll clean up ole' mustard boob but I honestly think she keeps mustard there just in case she needs it."

"There are situations in which one needs such instant access to a small amount of mustard?"

"I find myself in them all the time, s'why I hang out with Sera so much really," she said with all seriousness, such that it took Josephine a second to catch on.

She smiled as laughter bubbled up in her throat. "Very good my lady."

"Don't be so hard on yourself, okay? You have such a hard job and you do so incredibly. You deserve a break every now and again," Eleanor intoned, and then she did take proper look at the time, but perhaps she'd an eye on it because she said, "Thanks so much for letting me hang out with you, but I promised the Iron Bull I'd meet up with him here soon. I'll walk you back though, yeah?"

"I would appreciate it, certainly," she agreed, she did truly wish she'd more time to spend with the girl. But she'd her own duties to get back to. Figure out whatever is the matter with her missive to Lady Forsythia, get it sent, draft the new agreement with Lord Belmont, and see to it the order goes out for the new dining set. And then she really should get back to mama, but she keeps forgetting to write her and-

And dinner, apparently. A member of the kitchen staff was setting down a tray on her desk. Goodness, she'd wholly forgotten it...lunch too it felt like, but when had she sent the order out?

"Your order my lady," the servant said as she dipped a curtsy to them.

And then, "Thanks, Abby!" Eleanor said, "I really appreciate it."
"It wasn't any trouble. Have a blessed day lady Ellie, Lady Montilyet," she said as she took her leave.

"Thank you Eleanor..." Josephine said, it was so very sweet of the girl to think of her. "I understand you've another appointment, but we really should have a meal together sometime soon."

"Totally!" Eleanor agreed, "Just put it on my schedule," she said, offering a little wink before she left the Ambassador's office, "have a great evening, Lady Josie, don't work too hard, kay?"

Hmmmm, whenever the new dining set comes in, Eleanor will be the first guest to eat from it, Josephine decided as she sat down at her desk again, it really was nice how much room her new office had here in Skyhold, they could have a proper set up-

Ahh. That was what was wrong with her missive to Lady Forsythia.

It was a bit of misfortune, having to rewrite an entire page to fix a single word, but it was an important one.

All is well here in Haven, we've settled nicely.

All is well here in Skyhold, we've settled nicely.

“She running late?”

Koslun’s ass this guy worried too much, not so much as a ‘hello’ huh? “She just got here—she’s up at Sera’s getting changed, calm your dick.”

“I haven’t seen Marehis hot on her trail lately,” Krem defended as he dropped into his usual chair, just got in from keeping guard, patrolling the battlements. While everything was still settling Bull lent out his guys to fill in gaps places, Stitches helping the Inquisition's wounded, sick, everyone else taking up slack in the guard. “I mean Leliana still has someone on her right? I know everything’s pretty crazy right now, but-“

“She’s got her big bad boyfriend watching out for her like it’s his job,” Bull said, favoring the guy a little wink as he said, “Oh, and you too.” Got him a snort from the brat. “So I think she’s good. And Marehis is still trailing her, in range to put the smack down on anyone that shows their ass, but yeah, she’s been giving Boss more space than usual.” Killed the kid she hadn’t been able to get the woman alone, so she distanced herself from Marehis in general, which told her minder to give her space it seemed. Bull was almost worried Solas suspected something—guy was always trying to be around when Marehis and Ellie were together but...that just checked out as regular behavior he guessed. He might be sketchy as hell, but one of the few, solid, honest facts about Solas What-Ever-the-Fuck his last name is, was he loved Marehis, and despite himself it felt like, he loved Ellie. But there was something out there he might just love more, and that could be dangerous.

“Ready!”

Awe man, but what the hell could that asshole love more? Imekari, cute as shit in mercenary armor, came hopping down the tavern stairs like it was a game and she was havin’ loads of fun. “So,” Ellie asked as she reached them waiting for her at the bottom, “What’re we up to? Why the…er…disguise? This is supposed to disguise me, yeah?”

“Yeah Boss, tonight you’re rolling with me, incognito. We’re just gonna go have a few drinks—you want the water flask, or apple juice?”

She seemed to take it into consideration. “You know what, it’s been one of those days—hit me with the hard stuff.”

“Apple juice it is,” and then smiling to Krem, “Later loser.”

“If this goes stupid, I’m kicking your ass!” Krem said as he rose to his feet, reaching out to take Ellie’s hand and pull her toward him—that was sweet, gave them a second. Guy had a hard time letting the girl out of sight without something—a hand on the shoulder if they really needed to keep it kiddy-friendly, like Mother Giselle, the Maker, and Andraste were watching, but in the middle of the Tavern it bumped up to their usual kiss goodbye. Well. A chill variation of it. Boss-girl was a biter.

Eh, it’d be fine—nothing would go ‘stupid’. No one was gonna get real loose tonight or anything, he was just taking Imekari around to get some face time with the little guys in the Inquisition, the people that keep this whole thing moving forward—their soldiers. Figured it’d do her some good, help keep her grounded…give her good insight for things.

Advisors were eyeballing her for Inquisitor, he knew it, they knew it. Hell, he was on board just as long as Imekari was. Shit, he’d joked about her being Inquisitor before but for her to actually have the job? New danger, new responsibility. Which he was down with, whatever she needed. He’d have her back in the field and uh, he’d already volunteered his services with the Advisors. Part of being Inquisitor was judgement, and if Ellie needed someone put down, she could count on him, the way he sees it, he’ll be lucky if he actually sees anything come of that—Rainier situation was enough to tech him that. If even Ellie thinks death is the only form of punishment that can be called on, chances are she’s right, kid wouldn’t use it to show off the power of her station, if she’s ordering executions it isn’t lightly, and they’re probably the sort of person Bull would be glad to kill.

“So, what’s our top-secret mission all about?” Ellie asked as she left the Tavern with Bull.

“You. Come on, keep it low profile, just listen for a bit,” he said as they approached the little set up a few of the soldiers had—table, short stools to sit on, to just drink at or play cards. These two were just the drinking sort.

Kid had a bit of a weird look on her face like uncertainty…he’d thought this would be right up her alley, getting to know people. Maybe she was feeling shy? She wouldn’t have to talk though, he had a good cover for that.

“Hey, how’s it goin’? I’m Bull, my merc group just joined up. This here’s Grim, she doesn’t talk much,” he introduced, as he and Imekari took a seat to join them, patted her on the back, she snorted quietly and then shrugged and grunted. Hell yeah, get up in that persona Imekari, just sit back and learn some new things about your-

Oh shit, wait, maybe this was about to get stupid, the female soldier put her hand on Imekari’s forearm but then, “…the Qunari is with you?” she asked quietly, eyeing Bull warily and he realized it was a defensive action, she intended to pull the girl behind her for safety if something weird was up with Bull. Wait. Huh maybe he miscalculated, should’ve brought more people along so it didn’t look like a giant Qunari walking around with a little mute human girl. Yup, reflection, Imekari broke out into giggles. Giggles.

“Yup, he is! It’s all good, honest, he’s my friend. The Iron Bull this is Mira and…Tanner right?”

Mira and what now?

“Got it in one,” Tanner assured. “How’s little Anya?”

Fuck him.

“She’s great! Sleepy though—I was going to bring her along but she’s conked out hanging with my friend Sera.”

So. Mira, it turns out, used to work as Guard Captain for a Lady Pendell, and Tanner…is some asshole from ‘near Jader’ and he wasn’t sure if his lesson was shot, or just entirely unnecessary, because fuck him sideways, she knew these guys. Not like they went way back or anything, but she knew their faces, had gotten their names when they were helping with moving into Skyhold, and they knew hers. Which yeah, in hindsight…if she was just another full-grown adult running around in mercenary armor, yeah, no one would question. But uh, yeah, the little Human girl stuck out more distinctly from blending in with her elders.

Bull sighed as they made their way back to the Tavern. “Alright, that was supposed to be…just. I got the ability to know everyone under my command. You don’t exactly have that luxury, but I thought a few familiar faces would help, give things perspective.”

“I love it!” Imekari enthused, bouncing in place like she were excited about something. Oh, “I think we should make this a regular thing! Like once a week when we’re in Skyhold, you and me, we can have dinner or drinks or whatever and try to find new people, hear their stories and perspectives and stuff. If you want, that is.”

Not his usual idea of dinner and drinks to hunt randos, but uh, yeah, with Imekari, that sounded just about right. "You know what kid? That sounds good to me.”

"Oh! I almost forgot—say, if the right tailor was brought to bear, would you consider a shirt? Lady Josie would appreciate it if you'd wear one when she introduces you to noble guests. You arouse and confuse them apparently and there's already been three cases of threatened divorce."

Three huh? "Sure thing boss, whatever she needs." Ambassador worked hard, he wasn't gonna make her job harder.

"Well if that's the case, Dorian keeps either flirting with everyone she brings by the library on tours, or telling them crazy stories. Josie posts schedules for tours and the like..." Wasn't sure what that had to do with him. "Think you could distract him sexually during those times? Your place, obviously, not the library unless we're selling tickets and you keep it tasteful."

..."I think I can handle that."

She smiled at that. "Good," she said with some relief. But then, suddenly worried, because technically she’d given him options. "Wait, which one?" Bull just grinned and kept on walking. "I'm serious, the Iron Bull! Which one?!!"
*While Primaetas Root has been extinct since the Second Blight, studies have shown that dried Red Moss cut from a wandering hill has similarly restorative effects if handled properly. Red Moss has a high level of toxicity in Humans, Elves, and Dwarves, though Qunari metabolize the moss at such a rate it seems to have little effect on their species. Through careful experimentation, we have found an emulsion of Silverite and Elfroot Extract can counteract the fatal toxicity, leaving only the beneficiary elements of Red Moss. Mage fire is-

“Good afternoon, Madam de Fer!”

Goodness, what was the time? Madam de Fer admittedly startled when the girl approached, she quickly closed the text she was poring over, casting subtle heat across the parchment page she’d been taking notes on to dry the ink so she could slip them beneath the text without smudging her progress. She had lost track of the time she realized, laying eyes on the small, ivory clock she kept at her desk, Eleanor was on time, but she’d meant to be better prepared for the girl’s arrival.

“Good afternoon, Eleanor,” Vivienne said as she rose from her desk, hands smoothing along her thighs as she stood to rid the silvery-white material of any wrinkles. Oh, how incredibly precious. They almost matched to an extent. The girl hadn’t much just now in the way of clothing, but her young suitor had apparently ransomed things from the fiery devastation of Haven. Eleanor had chosen to wear the sole dress she owned now, altered to fit by adding a panel of silver to the bottom of the skirt so it fell just past her knees, matching material cuffing her wrists to lengthen her sleeves. Though she’d still a bit more leg showing, wearing those darling ankle boots she’d gotten in Val Royeaux. Oh, Vivienne was itching for an opportunity to whisk the girl off for a bit of shopping, she did hate she’d so narrowly missed the chance in Val Royeaux, but her shopping spree with the likes of the Iron Bull and Varric was amusing enough to hear from dear Dorian.

Ahh, she was admittedly pleased to see the hair combs she’d had gifted the girl for her coming of age, as they were silver, inlaid with sapphires, they matched rather well with her dress, she’d used one to pull back a portion of her hair out of her face…it displayed the scar on her temple, across her lip more predominantly, not a move Madam de Fer would have taken but the girl was beautiful and seemed to be so at ease with the marks that they merely accentuated that, so she was hardly about to say anything that would derail the girl's spirits.

“You look stunning my dear,” Vivienne complimented as she greeted the girl with a hug, she was pleased she had to cross the balcony to do so, that Eleanor had been mindful of her space and stood at the banister near the turn it took to lead you to the library.

“Thanks! You’re always so beautiful!” Eleanor said with such sincerity, “Thank you for inviting me for tea.”

Certainly, she really should have been keeping more careful watch of the time. If she stepped into the library there should be someone around to take their order-

Oh. A servant arrived with a tray, though they seemed timid, perhaps a bit confused. “Madam de Fer? Lady Herald? I was told to bring you this but I…I can’t rightly recall who.”

“Oh, that was probably Cole,” Eleanor said. Ahh. Well, the Spirit was strange but at least he was useful.
“Do set it over there,” Vivienne said, and as she was in the presence of the Herald that expected graciousness even to the lowliest stable hand, she added, “thank you.”

“Of course, Madam,” the servant said, setting the tray down on the small table between the chairs she’d had set up just for such an occasion.

“Please, come take a seat my dear, make yourself comfortable,” Madam de Fer said as she gestured for the girl to do so. Oh. She’d not taken even a moment to tidy up, had she? She did enjoy the convenience of having her office and quarters be one, but this wouldn’t do. Eleanor chose the chair that still had a book upon its seat, a blanket draped over its arm. She had been reading late into the night and taken chill…though she did not recall actually rising to fetch that blanket, and she certainly hadn’t sat down with it.

It was a mild embarrassment, but Eleanor made no fuss, she simply afforded Madam de Fer the opportunity to take a seat in the empty chair while the girl took up the task of neatly folding the blanket and hanging it neatly over the back of the chair before taking up the tome. “An Alchemist’s Guide: A Grim…Grimoire of Philters, Elixirs, and Tonics.”

“A riveting read,” Vivienne assured her drily, as the girl set the book aside so she could take a seat. She’d searched cover to cover for what she eventually found was the extinct Primaetas Root. Dorian, who seemingly took up residence in the library had graciously taken what information she could give him and found her the text she’d been reading all morning.

“Are you working on a potions project?” Eleanor asked with interest as Vivienne began pouring tea.

Nothing that was any of the young ladies business, but, “After a fashion, a niche study I’m currently enamored with.”

“Cool! It’s fun to learn about different little things people don’t know much about—it means there’s more left to explore.”

Exploration would indeed be fun, if Vivienne did not long for something quick and simple that met her urgency. “You may borrow it if it’s sparked interest in you, I’m finished with it for now.”

“Oh, thanks! Did it help you any?”

“It led me to further study. Unfortunately the Primaetas Root has been extinct for quite some time.”

“Oh Ages,” Eleanor sympathized, “but Dorian and I were reading a few days ago…gosh I can’t remember the title, but it’ll come to me—it sounds crazy, but Red Moss is a good substitute it said.”

“Crazy?”

“Because it’s poisonous—there’s an emulsion you can put it through to separate enzymes, create a concentration of the beneficiary ones, while nullifying and reducing away the toxic ones. You have to use magical fire though, since there isn’t really a fuel source that creates natural fire hot enough, plus your heat needs to be spot-on consistent or you risk enzymes melding together again and leaving poison behind or losing the healing properties’ potency. It’s super tricky.”

…ahh. That was how Master Pavus was able to find her book so quickly. She would have to take note about the fire, that would save her a bit of reading she supposed…though no, it would be irresponsible to rely solely on Eleanor’s memory, still. “Is it?”

“Uh-huh,” Eleanor paused, taking a sip of her tea, “I mean the text says the potion starts degrading the moment it’s exposed to light, but even magical fire burns with light so even if you brew in total darkness it seems like you’re still compromising its integrity from the start.”

She…oh. Well goodness. She’d considered that fact—that she would need to find a windowless room to prepare potion in, and she thought to work by the light of her fire. “You believe fire light would degrade the potion’s properties as sunlight would? I thought it a reference to natural light.”

Eleanor shook her head. “I mean yeah, there’s key differences between sunlight and the light we get from fire but the issue, usually, with a lot of potions ingredients is light itself—exposure to the energy our eyes perceive as light can deteriorate them. Red Moss and Ghouls Beard are similar like that—it mostly grows in the shade and the best is found from caves—it’s the most potent, you know? Because it’s had the least exposure to light of any kind.” Madam de Fer nodded as she handed Eleanor a cup of tea. Yes she had considered that to a point, had planned to instruct her suppliers accordingly, that she only wanted materials derived from dark places. “Thanks. But anyway, this process, you’re basically stripping the Red Moss down to its most basic, most potent form, and that takes away any protective coating it had to defend from light. But it’s what allows the Elf root to sink in and boost the healing properties and nullify the toxic ones so you’re not breathing poison—definitely a potion you want to wear a mask for—and Silverite purifies but it also protects. The Silverite is why it take three days for the potion to completely deteriorate after contact with light, but even with that it still starts to lose potency after…huh, dunno. Ava worked with similar things, and they were perfect until maybe after an hour or so before they start to lose potency.”

“How would she have advised its brewing then?” Vivienne asked, albeit curious.

“Complete and total darkness, but she had a lot of know-how, working blind. I would practice a lot before hand if I had the chance to. Make a base to set your cauldron on, out of ceramic, so the fire can heat it from the inside and remain completely covered, and then your potion could be heated that way. You’d have to practice and get your timing down to a science of how long it takes for everything to get to the right temperature at every single step, how long before the enzymes separate, and then when to divide them, and then how long it takes to reduce the nullified toxins away. Vivienne? Are you okay?”

Had she some strange look on her face? “I am well, merely thinking, darling. “ She…good heavens. She could have made something that would have been wholly useless by the time she reached Bastien, there were some precious three days before the potion was wholly ruined after initially exposed to light and- and she did indeed want it to be as potent as possible. Perhaps she could secure use of a lab in the University of Orlais. She would handle those arrangements when the time came, as it was she wasn’t wholly satisfied with her findings, there were other properties she was looking for in this remedy she just hadn’t found yet. But she would keep looking…and perhaps…“Eleanor, would you care to assist me when the time comes? I would like to experiment with this remedy after a fashion and I could use another set of hands, another mind cognizant of what is going on as we practice, and perhaps ultimately formulate a perfected potion.”

“Really? Oh gosh, I’d love to!” the girl offered sincerely. Then, "Um…you’re okay, right?”

Okay? Was it so out of character that she seek her assistance? She’d done so in the past...and may well do so in future. Ahh. But that was not what she meant. “Oh yes, my dear, of course. It is experimental, I said, I’m seeking to make this treatment more powerful as a matter of pure interest.”

“Well, count me in, I think it’d be super cool—I mean there’s all sorts of horrible diseases that Primaetas was used to treat, there’s a reason it went extinct during the Second Blight. You might end up making something that could replace it, cure the Blight.”

She hadn’t considered that aspect of it but yes, perhaps it could be beneficial to many. But first and foremost, it must be beneficial to Bastien.

"So, Eleanor. How are you liking Skyhold? It's shaping up rather nicely I believe."

"It's amazing, I'm so glad we found it. You're comfortable up here now, right? Do you need anything? I asked about getting you a few of those...oh gosh, what are they called? They're like walls you can move around?" that...wasn't a helpful description. "A..." she snapped her fingers as she sought for the word, and came up the Antivan version as she still blanked on it's Trade counterpart. "Tabique?"

She brightened at that, "Yes! Partitions!" though she took interest in, "Hablas Antivan?"

Hm. Well. She...supposed, given her present company... "Si. Mi familia son de Rivain*. As they are sister countries, Trade and Antivan are commonly spoken. Mine was the first generation born in the Free Marches, Wycome," but that was enough of that, she cleared her throat, "my dear you were telling me something about partitions?"

"Oh! You can use them for privacy when changing or cleaning up or as like a 'do not disturb' sort of thing, leave them up to block the view when you come in from the Library or the garden rooms, so people can walk by without being all up in your business when you're trying to sleep or just want privacy or something. Lady Josie helped me pick some out, I hope that's okay."

"I'll surely appreciate it Eleanor, thank you." It was only fitting she supposed, Lady Josephine had enlisted Viviene's assistance when picking things out for what may just be Eleanor's quarters should she accept the position of Inquisitor. It was...rather deserved, Vivienne thought. Strange, and true the girl was young, but she was disgustingly brave, almost to a fault, and with the proper guidance, she had the makings of an excellent leader. Vivienne...cared for the girl, but she had not been expecting how very gutted she would be by her demise. But she had been, to such a point she...she had spent time with the girl in the past but still, she did wish to have more when they were in Hav-Skyhold. As it stood, the young lady was to resume lessons with her once things were better settled, and they had tea dates set to schedule. Perhaps she could be persuaded to take dinner with the Grand Enchanter some nights. For some reason it felt awkward, clumsy to request time with the girl, something in her pride still did not like her showing that she outright wanted time with her.

It seemed their time was winding down though, all too soon their tea grew cold as they chatted, and when Madam de Fer offered to reheat the pot, Eleanor took note of the time on her wrist watch.

"Thanks so much for inviting me for tea, but I promised Thom I'd meet up with him here soon. Do you need anything before I head out?"

"Of course not my dear, oh do never mind the tray, I'll handle it," she said when it seemed the girl was about to take matters into her own hands. "It was a pleasure to have you," Vivienne assured, then, "In fact, I was wondering if you would consider having dinner together when we are in Skyhold, a dedicated time set aside for the event."

"Really?" Eleanor asked, looking absolutely delighted at the prospect, "Oh gosh, that'd be really great!"

"Splendid, I'll make note with Lady Josephine."

Skyhold’s air was wintry chill, wind whipped through the battlements as Thom stood in wait on the wall just over the stables, the satchel over his shoulder was light enough, even as it was filled, it swayed and he firmed his grip on it, definitely didn’t want all of that hard work go to waste. He smiled when he heard the sound of boots clattering up stone steps, as if their wearer were skipping up them, it was plain enough who it was even if they’d not set a time to meet. Too, the bouncing curls that came into view were a good warning she was about to arrive, her hair was longer now, she had a nice head of springy curls—Maker it’d given him a good startle when she first revealed she’d chopped it clean off—but now she could even wear those comb things Madam de Fer had given her. Had she dressed up for this? It was awfully cold out to be running around in a dress but at least she was wearing her armor’s overcoat.

“Hiya, Thom! You look so handsome!” she encouraged. He’d cleaned up a bit, armor was clean, shaved, trimmed up his hair. This was the first year in many he could face this day with pride in his accomplishments, a clean slate.

“Thank you, Ellie-girl. You look lovely.”

“Oh gosh, thanks! I figured I should dress up, you know? And my dress matches my hair combs so it gave me an excuse to wear them for Vivienne,” huh, true, the woman wouldn’t want her wearing them with just anything. It was nice to see she still wore the bracelet Thom had made for her. “We just had tea!”

Ahh. “You had a pleasant time, I trust?”

“Uh-huh!” she assured him, and then she looked to him expectantly, unsure just what she needed to do.

It felt foolish, asking her. But she’d…Maker, she’d taken a break from playing moving manager—running around the whole of Skyhold helping however she could—and come across Krem, apparently, when the lad-

Thom had mentioned Liddy’s birthday coming up, talking with Cyril when they were having dinner as a group, all the Chargers together. He wasn’t sure how he was going to swing his yearly ritual for her, felt right badly about it. Next thing he knows, Krem’s showing up at the stables, Ellie-girl at his side, the two of them toting armfuls of paper flowers she’d found Krem making up for him, and used her break to help him complete the task—it was quite the feat, thirty-eight in total.

Maker, he was beyond grateful there weren’t sixteen more. Haven falling had been hard enough, but he hadn’t even been able to begin processing the blow of Ellie’s loss. Horrible, it’d been nothing short of hell. Everything was ruin, everyone was struck hard, and in the middle of it all, they’d lost the most precious, irreplaceable thing. And then there she came, somehow, some way, she’d survived. He hadn’t been able to sleep those first few nights, he just kept pacing, and checking in on her, because he couldn’t believe, he couldn’t believe it that she was alive, and they would get to keep her.

“Alright sweetheart come stand with me,” he instructed, and she took his hand and they walked up to the edge, standing before where the wall dipped for firing weaponry, paper flowers would be the only ammunition flung from these battlements today…Maker willing. He set the satchel down and took two flowers in hand, Ellie took one in her Marked hand and waited. “I usually take a flower, and pretend it will carry what I say to her.”

“It isn’t pretend if that’s what you believe. She does hear you.”

Thom had to clear his throat. Seemed silly to be struck by that…sometimes it seemed silly to be stuck on this—Liddy had been gone nearly thirty years now. But that was thirty years that could have been waking up and making her breakfast, tying her shoes—she’d known how, he was sure of it but she always liked him helping her, he’d thought it an annoyance at the time. Tie her damn shoes every day for the rest of their lives if it meant she was still around. She was supposed to live, have a life, find a nice boy…or a girl, she’d only been nine when she’d passed there was no telling what the future might have held for her. Find someone that made her happy, build a life, maybe end up with Thom having little nieces and nephews to dote on. In another life, he knew he would have been there, guiding and protecting her. In this life, one day out of the year, he got to be her brother again, do something for her.

“Thank you. I um, I say whatever it is that’s on my heart to say to her. Give her a little update, what I’ve got going on in my life…this year will be pretty wild to recap.” This year he could actually be proud of what he had to say to her. “And then I set this flower loose, offer up the rest in silence and then uh…” usually drink himself into a stupor, have a very public cry in an unfamiliar pub and be off to the next thing come morning. Didn’t think he’d do that bit this year though. He was more of a social drinker these days, a round with the Chargers, the occasional nightcap whenever he had a headache and was trying to head for bed. “would you like to have dinner in the tavern, me and the guys after this?”

“I’d love that! Can Anya come? I think she’s hanging out with Cremisius anyway right now I didn’t take her with me to Madam de Fer’s—she’s house broken but she’s very nervous about being in a new place and keeps the chair he sits in when he’s hanging around the Tavern.”

Thom chuckled, squeezing the small hand that still laid in his. They got serious then. Thom filled Liddy in on the wild ride this past year had been—regretfully informing his sister that, if he started the year at her last birthday, it began like any other. He was a liar, guilt and shame dictating his every deed, living on the greatness of another. Now, he had his life back, and everything that had been good about it, friends, his crew, his man…and while it would have been embarrassing to admit as much out loud, he’d already told her, but he thought about it, appreciated it in his heart, that he had this little girl again. Someone who looked up to him, depended upon him, worried for him. He had all the best pieces of all his old lives woven together by the most important thing—the thing that the lack of, led to his ruin in the first place. Purpose. Ellie, the Inquisition, his found-family, they gave him purpose in spades, and he could never be grateful enough for that.

“Your brother’s the bravest,” Ellie said to the flower in her hand, “He’s so very smart and strong, and he’s living a good life now. He has a great job, lots of friends, and he’s very loved—I love him lots, so thanks for sharing him with me,” Maker help him—he thought he’d skip his cry all together this year but uh, nope. Just didn’t need drink to pull it out of him. “I’m very proud of the man he’s turned out to be, and I’m sure you are too.”

They tossed their flowers over the battlements, and then Thom let go of Ellie’s hand, took up the satchel, and together they cast the others into the wind to follow after.

“I hope they end up somewhere nice where things can grow!”

“Grow?” Thom asked as he wrapped an arm around her shoulders, and they started the walk to the Tavern.

“Well real flowers would have seeds in them, eventually they’d decompose and possibly leave new flowers behind. All this paper…I was feeling a little badly about littering? When Elan heard there was a garden here, she might have gotten ahead of herself because she had Josie order just a bit too many seeds. The ground is mostly hard but there are a few nice pots for growing ingredients right now, so we had a bunch left over—Elf Root. Cremisius and I dropped a few seeds into the flowers, eventually the paper will break down and maybe some day there’ll be a nice patch of Elf Root around to help someone.”

“I think she’d like that.”

Leliana rubbed at her temple as she listened to Marehis’s report. Her agent was taking a moment to touch base with her, since her ward was otherwise attended. Safe, in the care of the Bull’s Chargers.

“You’ve done well to guard her as we traveled, I know that cannot have been an easy task. I’m not fully confident we’ve found every possible hole in Skyhold security,” there were literal holes in Skyhold’s infrastructure, although some were conveniently located. Her personal favorite, being the one in the dungeons. Cassandra’s too it seemed…the Seeker of Truth may have held Knight-Captain Denhem at it’s edge, only her hand grasping the fabric of the back of his shirt keeping him from slipping over the edge and plummeting into…well, they weren’t certain just how far the drop was, and it would be a pity if he survived. And too, it was an Inquisitor’s job to pass judgement on the man. Still, it may well come in handy, as it was, the cells surrounding the hole would be ideal for storing prisoners they wished to make uncomfortable or wished to question further.

“Thank you,” Marehis said quietly.

“Is there something on your mind?” Leliana asked. The woman was usually more talkative than she was behaving tonight. “Losing Haven has been hard on us all. How are you coping?”
“Oh I…Elgar’nan do not get me wrong, I feel the loss of Haven, but it…it was nothing while enduring the loss of E- I- I honestly am uncertain just how I still have this job after that. The girl was in my very hand, Leliana, and furthermore I should have-”

“We cannot change the past, nor should we, honestly. Eleanor acted of her own accord, she is at the center of a great world turmoil, the decision she made was…reckless, but what needed to be done in the moment—that does not mean I like it,” Maker she…her heart still ached if she thought of it too long, nearly losing the girl—believing they had, it had been heartbreaking, horrifically so. “You are not at fault, Marehis, you serve well, above and beyond.”

“I…thank you, but I don’t…I am concerned,” Marehis said. “That perhaps I have failed Ellie in some way or done something wrong or- has she seemed distant with me, since Haven?”

“How so?” Leliana asked.

“She just…she is not as…we used to talk, about everything, all day—during breakfast, as I escort her about her day, and especially when our days are at a close—but I cannot recall the last conversation I’ve had with her that has equated to more than asking after one another, and ensuring she’s well. And she has not…maybe I’ve coddled her too much? She hasn’t wanted to sleep with me since Haven…but it seems only where I am concerned—she was sleeping with the Iron Bull and I spent a night in their tent…of course her monthly is upon her and the Qunari is warm. But since we’ve been in Skyhold, not a single night has she wanted to spend with me. At first I thought perhaps she wished to give Solas and myself opportunity to,” she cleared her throat, “reconnect. But…I don’t know. I don’t even escort her as I used to, I’ve been keeping my distance because I fear maybe she does need space from me? But I do not know why and I haven’t a moment alone with her to broach the subject.”

Ahh. There were eyes and ears everywhere, and while Cassandra had clued Leliana in to suspicion of Solas, Marehis was still in the dark and would unfortunately remain so for the time being. It was complicated, and honestly if she had any concern as to Marehis’s capabilities, it was that in how she could overlook such questionable behavior. But love was blind, and too, Marehis did not have all the reasons to suspect that they did. She had not been there to see what Cassandra or the Iron Bull had born witness to, and the shady apostate had kept her from following he and Ellie to the discussion that led to the girl’s suspicion. Ultimately…this was something terribly personal, and Leliana did understand the need for both subterfuge and care—Marehis would best understand, if it was Ellie that spoke of this to her. She would trust her ward with little question—whereas if the Iron Bull or Cassandra approached her, even Leliana, she may be able to brush it off, and even when discovering Eleanor had reason to suspect Solas, may believe it was merely the manipulation of the adults in her life that brought her to that, as opposed to the man’s actions. And Cremisius bringing it to her attention was out of the question, she may just see that as the young man seeking to drive some toxic wedge between the girl he is dating and those she loves.

But Eleanor speaking to Marehis about Solas requires the man not being anywhere around, and the two of them being wholly alone. Neither of which had happened since Haven it seemed. And it was rather difficult to outright ask in front of others to speak privately with Marehis, they were hoping for a natural opportunity to arise as to wholly keep the Elf apostate from realizing their suspicion. If they tipped him off, he may run.

There was giggling echoing up the staircase that immediately sent Marehis smiling, turning to face the stairwell to Leliana’s Rookery. Seconds later, Eleanor, arm in arm with Lieutenant Aclassi arrived, the two of them looking lively and content. Oh, it was admittedly sweet to see them together, Josie just adored their pairing to pieces.
Although Eleanor visibly startled when they reached the top of the stairs, flinching and exclaiming in surprise, “Marehis! H-hi! Gosh, s-sorry I thought you were er, following us.”

Marehis’s ears twitched. “My word, da’vehnan, are you alright? Did I truly frighten you or are you experiencing panic?” she worried.

“Oh,” Eleanor raised her free hand to her chest, “I wasn’t expecting you here, is all, I’m all good. Um, I was just looking for Leliana actually.”

“…oh.”

“Me?” Leliana asked.

“Uh-huh! I just wanted to check in with you, tomorrow’s Monday and we um…well we usually had lunch dates when I’m home—but I totally, totally understand if you’re too busy, I just wanted to touch base with you, make sure you knew I was still interested and everything.”

Oh, she’d nearly forgotten, and she did enjoy her time with the girl. “Certainly, Eleanor, I would be pleased to continue our Monday afternoon tradition. It is admittedly a pleasant way to mark the start of a fresh week.”

That sent the girl blushing. “Oh gosh, yeah, I think so too!” Eleanor said. “How’re you doing up here? Are your birds happy?”

“They seem to enjoy the Rookery, yes. This set up is admittedly more comfortable. Thank you, Eleanor, for your assistance yesterday…Josie says you were feeling better after you laid down, I trust you’re truly well?” The woman still incessantly teased about Leliana’s…it hadn’t been softness in the least! She-! She merely- Eleanor, while a legal adult was still very much a…a young adult. Little more than a child. She’d been exhausted, and concerningly lightheaded yesterday and Leliana suspected she lifted more than she should—she’d carried a great many things up all…two flights of stairs just to get to the Great Hall, and then up two more to get to the Rookery proper, and Eleanor’s shoulder still troubled her a great deal. Anyway the girl was tired and possibly in pain, and needed to recover, so Leliana did her best to provide as such. Which involved tucking her in and telling her a story about Schmooples—that Nug was precious, and Eleanor had adored learning of Leliana’s pet.

At least Josie had not guessed her…it hadn’t been singing, humming. She’d hummed a bit as she waited to ensure the girl would sleep. Just a bit. The girl needed rest!

“Oh gosh, yeah, all better!” Eleanor assured. “Is there anything else I can do for you? You’re all set up here, right?”

“I am, thank you Eleanor. You’ve had a pleasant evening? Marehis informs me you dined with the Chargers? Was it a date night perhaps?” she asked, eyeing the girl’s state of dress.

Eleanor let out something like a squeak at that and then she looked to the Tevinter man at her side, “I-! I’m so sorry! We’ve been so busy and I- gosh, we haven’t really had a time just you and me-“

“El, you’re kind of busy running the Inquisition right now?” Was he…did he suspect Eleanor’s upcoming promotion? “Don’t stress it, we’re good, I see plenty of you. You want to make a point to do something though?”

“I’d really like to, and I feel badly, I think we should.”
He kissed her temple. “Don’t fret about it then. I’ve taken note, and I’ll ask you proper sometime. We’re not turning into those people who go about ‘penciling each other in’ out of obligation. Not without a decent fight.”

“Kay. Thanks,” Eleanor giggled, hugging the arm she held. “Oh! Sorry! Side tracked—not a date night, I had a sort-of funeral to attend? And tea with Madam de Fer.”

Marehis looked to the overcoat Eleanor had worn, as if only now realizing it matched Leliana’s and Cassandra’s armor. “Oh, indeed it does—it looks just beautiful with your complexion da’vehnan.”

Eleanor blushed at that. “Thanks. I wanted to match Cassandra a bit.”

“Ahh, that is nice.”

“Oh! You too, you know? My boots and gloves, and my tunic? They all match your scout armor!” Eleanor enthused as if she truly did like that aspect.

“Was…was it intentional?” Marehis asked, interested, “The decision to make your armor that color, or was it a move on Harritt’s part to use material he had around.”

“Oh… I guess that might be a benefit, I hadn’t thought about that, that it might make it easier on him,” Eleanor admitted. “But it was my idea—I wanted to match you both, because…I dunno, you’re my mamis and it’s sort of like having you right there directly with me, protecting me in the field.”

Oh, Marehis looked wholly moved by that. “I…I like that very much, da’vehnan. Harritt did a wonderful job on your armor, it suits you well, has protected you through such harm,” she cleared her throat. “Sweet girl, it is getting rather late—I wouldn’t rush you, but do you plan to retire soon at all?”

“Hmm yeah, why?”

“If you’ve no other plans for where you’ll lay your head tonight, perhaps you could spend the evening with me?” the Elf ventured, reaching out to brush back the un-bound portion of Eleanor’s hair. “We could have a sleep over of sorts.”

“Really?” Eleanor asked, as if she were excited for it. Yes, it would be wonderful opportunity, if she could get the woman alone-

“Certainly—I could… we haven’t nail polish but I could still treat you to a manicure if you’d like, do your hair, just a nice bit of pampering. Solas may even indulge in a manicure, he could honestly use one, and he could make us some of that milk tea you adore…da’vehnan? What is it?” Marehis questioned when Eleanor’s expression fell at mention of… well. She certainly wasn’t going to get Marehis alone tonight, was she?

“Um… actually I’m sorry I—“ she swallowed, paled as she seemed stricken in the face of disappointing her minder, unsure how to… there was some risk, Leliana understood, of Eleanor falling asleep near Solas. The man may seek to dream with her in the Fade, or search through their bond—and they were uncertain his limits with that. It was best to avoid those situations all together. It would not do for him to suspect they suspected him.
“Ellie?” Marehis worried.

“Oh man, El, just hitting you all of a sudden, huh?” Krem offered, sounding truly sympathetic when he said, “Courses are a right pain.”

...was she truly still running her courses? It'd been well over an entire week. Though potion to suppress monthlies could make them strange for a while when you suddenly stopped taking it. She would touch base with the Seeker, just for peace of mind that Eleanor was not unwell. It could be subterfuge after a fashion, the girl was using her 'current state' to keep Solas from monitoring her.

“Yeah,” Eleanor agreed, “I’m really sorry Mare but um, I just don’t feel very well, my head’s sort of pounding and I’m cramping pretty bad. I th-think I just wanna lay down with the Iron Bull, if that’s okay?”

“I...could get you a warm waterskin?” Marehis tried, oh she did miss the girl. "There is a massage technique for the lower back that may hel-"

"You don't need to go through all that trouble really," Eleanor insisted, "I wouldn't be any fun, I'm pretty miserable and just want to go to bed, and you'd just be reheating waterskins and I wouldn't want you to be up all night over me. We'll just do it another time, promise."

"Oh...oh of course, da’len, I am sorry," Marehis said. Though she worried, "The pain just came on you all of a sudden? Is it sharp? You’re certain it is your monthly?"

Eleanor nodded. “Yeah, I’m sure. I really should go lay down.”

“I’ll see her safely back to the Charger’s set up,” Krem assured, “—her things are at Sera’s anyway still, from last night. Stitches can check on her and everything.”

“Is that alright with you, Ellie?” Marehis asked. "It would be no trouble for me to walk you-"

“Yeah, you...we interrupted your meeting with Leliana, sorry,” Eleanor apologized. "You go ahead and finish up, have a nice night okay?"

“C-certainly. Feel better, da’len,” Marehis said, swallowing harshly as the girl and her escort turned away and began their descent down the stairs. Marehis was still facing Leliana, looking wholly forlorn, her lip quivering for a brief moment before she called out over her shoulder, to be heard by the girl, “I love you, ma da’vehnan.”

There was a beat, and then from down the stairwell, “I love you too, mami,” the girl called back, a little flat, like she were trying not to cry. Oh.

It did not matter if their suspicion led to anything of import. When this was all over, Leliana might well take a page from Cassandra’s book and hold Solas over the dungeon hole.

---

...wonder if she really likes me...maybe it's foolish- but maybe...maybe that guy was right. Huh. Can’t remember his name. Funny hat though. Elan doesn’t care about status or race, she just...I guess I’ll write her back...
...damn it, oh man, Seeker’s gonna be so pissed. But it’s fucking Corypheus! Hawke...we need him. Shit...will chocolate work on her? It does for monthlies. Maybe I’ll get my chocolate supply restocked before that bastard gets here. Yeah. Keep it in my pockets at all times. Should probably do that anyway, poor kid’s still cramping all to hell apparently.

...Frick! I lost the friggin- oh. There it is. Inky’ll be by later, maybe when I’m done with my meeting with 'sandra we should...

“Cole?”

He could hear very well, all of the hurts in Skyhold, from up here. He was above, he thought it let him hear everyone loud and clear. But that was louder, too loud—not too loud but louder than the rest. Was it real? It was all real but-

He opened his eyes. Oh, Ellie. I hope he’s okay, gosh it’s so dark up here was she afraid of the dark? Lots of people were, it felt like. This can’t be comfortable. Why can’t it? He was comfortable, he thought. But his body had...was it aches? Sometimes he felt them in this body’s stomach, they went away when he ate, but then it had to do other things that were time consuming and foreign to him. He’d never had to do them in the Fade. So he tried to avoid eating or drinking too much. The ache did not bother him so much as being slow to respond to those who needed him because he was...’answering the call of nature’ the Iron Bull had called it, when he had been...fearful of what was happening, and the Qunari explained. That had amused the Iron Bull—not unkindly, but he had found it fun to ask if Cole was ‘scared shitless’ when it was all over. Oh. It was a pun, that was funny! Maybe it was okay then, if it could make the Iron Bull laugh. Maybe he would make shit again if the Iron Bull was very sad.

Oh, the aches. He felt them other places too sometimes. When he stood here for a long time, shoulders hunched, head hanging as he listened, when he stopped listening he would notice them. Something in his neck, his back. His feet. Aches like in his stomach when it was empty, or his bladder when it was full. Bodies were strange.

“You’re worried about me, Ellie?” he asked with outside words. She was awake, she couldn’t hear his inside words.

“Just a little,” she admitted. That was a lie, she worried a lot, for him. So did Krem. They were kind. “Here, I brought you some things.”

She giggled when he asked her that. “No Cole, I put things in the pillow cases so I could bring everything in one trip. They’re for you—so you can have light up here whenever you need it. And pillows and blankets so you can be comfortable. And a book in case you get bored or something and no one’s up to play with you.”

That was sweet. “This is Charlotte’s book,” he said when he looked at it.

“Uh-huh, I thought you might like having it—it’s a very good book, it has lots of interesting stories. And she was your friend, I think it’s nice if you have it.”
“Charlotte was Cole’s friend. She felt very badly for him. She tried to get him food. They almost put her in a cell for that. Her parents pulled her from the Circle then.”

“I’m sorry,” Ellie said. She meant it. He hadn’t meant to make her sorry.

“It is not your fault. You are my friend now, that makes me very happy.”

“That makes me happy too,” Ellie smiled. Oh good, he fixed it, mostly. “Huh. So…Cole was friends with Charlotte, but not you?”

“She did not know me. I did not have many friends before the Inquisition.”

“But you did have some?” Ellie asked.

“Rhys. And Evangeline. A Circle Mage, and his Templar keeper. They were my friends but now they are gone. I lost them.”

“Lost them?”

“They are not dead. They just are not with me anymore. And that is good. We were friends, but I made bad choices Ellie. I was a bad person. I do not deserve them as friends. I do not deserve you or Krem as friends. But you still want to be—even hearing me say so makes you want it more, you are sad I would disparage myself. That is kind, but I was not. I took compassion and corrupted it, I almost became a demon through my own fault. My friends are better off without me.”

She did not think that was true, but she didn’t argue with him on the outside. “Cole, why…I mean do you want to talk about it?”

“You helped me with the dying soldier—the one who was in so much pain?” he prompted, questions for questions sometimes gave the best answers.

Ellie nodded. It made her sad he was dead. But she was glad he was no longer in pain. “That was hard, but he was so miserable, in so much pain and there weren’t resources to make him comfortable or heal him it…it was a hard call Cole, but that is a type of compassion—there are things worse than dying, and you spared him that.”

“There are. But I did not use to ask, Ellie. I did not wait until worse-than-death was at the door. I saw, and I judged, immediately in the moment and I killed. In White Spire. When I became Cole. I had to stop them—the Templars, they kept bringing in new mages*, planned to make them Tranquil, and when…” the last time a mage knew Tranquility was reversible, it had gotten them marked for death, he did not like Ellie dead, her soul would go to the Maker, and he did not want that to happen for quite some time. “The Templars were slaughtering Mages themselves. So I got to them first, ended their suffering before they could be made Tranquil or experience the fear and pain of being locked away, scared and confused before a Templar came to end their life. You wonder why I did not simply kill the Templars? I did try, but more replaced them, and they were crueler to the Mages because they did not know it was me. They thought it was them, punished them worse, I made that mistake once, I did not make it again until…until later. I made a friend in Rhys, he always remembered me. I tried to keep him safe, but I messed up. I killed a Templar again and he was imprisoned for it. He is free now. That is all that matters. Evangeline watches over him. They do not need me.”

Ellie did not think that was true. But maybe she was thinking that about herself? She hugged him. He liked hugs. This body did too, it was comforting, something that was the opposite of aches. “Your friends do need you—we love you lots, okay Cole? That... sounds like a very complicated situation. I honestly don’t know what to think but I know you. You’re kind, and compassionate. And I’m glad you’ve moved on from that—I mean you didn’t ask then, but you did ask last week. Keep asking, and listening to your conscience, okay? You help lots of people, and I’m very proud of you for who you are today.”

That helped his aches too. Not the ones in this body, but in him. “Thank you Ellie,” he said. He wondered if she would cuddle with him if he laid the blankets out. Sera had soft places in her room she would share with them if they asked.

She did. She had to meet with Cassandra, but they were welcome to her room. Krem too when he was done with his shift, he sat on the window seat and Ellie laid with her back against his chest, and Cole laid on top of her, on his front, his head resting on her stomach. He did not mind taking off his hat if it meant Krem would reach around to make play with his hair, Ellie’s hand rested on his back, rubbing circles that soothed... could she hear aches like he heard hurts? Were they the same thing perhaps? His back did not ache as it had when he was standing all of the time. Maybe he would do that less.

Maybe he would do this more. Laying, loving, listening. No hurts to hear, just Ellie reading from Charlotte’s book.

It was very comfortable.

Well. Inky was having all sorts of fun, wasn’t she? Sera hadn’t expected not to be the one to have this room’s first threesome in it. Wait... would Teetness be down for a threesome? That’d be... hmm... thoughts.

“You don’t like having those around me because I might say them out loud,” Cole said. Frick! Right! Shite! She thought they was sleepin’! When Sera got back from training with ‘sandra, the three of them was looking like they were conked out—Kremmy-boy was dead aslee, and Inky looked like she was sleepy too, her book hand was limp, the book resting against Cole’s back, and she’d forgotten he didn’t really sleep. He looked like he was though, eyes closed, laying against Ink all comfy cozy... maybe too cozy, Ellie was cool with it right? “She is, but you can ask her yourself to make sure.”

“Whassa’ matter bud?” Krem asked, half asleep, eyes scrunching but stayin’ closed, he had a hand on Cole’s head, fingers scratching a bit.

“Mmm. Nothing is the matter. We are all safe, and warm, and comfortable. And Sera is here, that is good, I’m glad she’s back.”

Inky yawned real big, holy crap! “Hey Ser’, sorry, we’re in your space, right? Didn’t mean to fall asleep...” for someone who didn’t mean to fall asleep, she was doin’ a piss poor job of staying awake. But that was all good. Sera... had something that might help her with the whole, ‘waking up’ thing.

“Ink, you busy right now? Are you real tired?” Sera checked she... she was worried about that, she wasn’t real sure where Inky slept when she wasn’t with her. So that made her worry she wasn’t sleeping. But Cassandra said she was, Marehis too, but still.

She let out a little groan but she was stretchin a bit, arms reaching out over Cole, before she sighed, shakin’ herself a little, “I’m awake! Whatcha’ need?”

“Nothin’ serious, just looking for a little girl time if that’s alright.”

“Sure thing Ser’. You heard her gents—out!”

Kremmy-boy sighed, arms tightening around her as he settled more comfortably, looked like he was about to drop off to sleep again. “Technically, according to Tevinter—” he wheedled, wowza he really comfy wasn’t he? Didn’t want to leave.

“Tevinter has no power here! Or anywhere! Okay some places,” Ellie allowed. “But they have no power over your pants! Or what’s in them, or what’s in your soul! So saith the Herald of Andraste, on this day, whenever the heck it is, at whatever time it is!” she declared sleepily, raising her Marked hand high before dropping it to her side. “I had to go digging in storage to find candle things for Cole and didn’t want to risk banging up my watch.”

“If you three knuckle heads’ll get up, it don’t got to be just me and Inky,” Sera decided, “I was thinkin’ it was but…ugh. You’re all my friends. And I think I got enough pish for all of us.”

Oh frig, Cole perked up at that, pushing himself up on his hands, so he could turn to look at her, “I am your friend?” he asked like it meant the frickin’ world to him!

Blaaaaah. “Yeah, Cole. You are.” He was, weird as shite, but he was a damn good friend so.

“That does mean the world to me! You are a very good friend, Sera, I am happy I am one for you.”

They got untangled from one another and Sera hopped up on the window seat, pushed open the window that sat direct over the roof. “Follow me.”

She got close enough to the edge of the roof that there was room for Inky, Krem, and then Cole to sit.

“Ser’. I love you,” Ellie said as she rested her head on Sera’s shoulder, “Remember that, if I fall twelve feet to my death. And by that I mean if I fall, leave me where I lie. Just let the embarrassment kill me off, thanks.”

She was just bonkers. “No worries Ink, here.” Sera untied the sack she’d tied to her belt once she was done in the kitchens, frick yeah, they was still warm! She’d made a batch so, there was plenty. She passed them along and Inky perked up immediately.

“Sera! You made cookies!” she enthused, soundin’ excited and proud, as she passed cookies down to Krem n’ Cole.

“Yeah Ink, just like you taught me, I used your recipe and everything!”

“Oh, this is very important to you, I am glad you let us come,” Cole said, “I will eat your cookies.”

“Thanks,” Sera said, kicking her legs nervously. “I just…well I didn’t used to like cookies very much. It’s kind of dumb. Lady…there was this baker when I was little yeah? And Lady always told me never to go ‘round to his place, to stay away because he didn’t like Elves, right? A real racist bastard. Except it turns out, he wasn’t. But he was Lady Emmauld’s cookie connection. See, I go to her one day cause I dunno, I’m tryin’ to connect with her, do family stuff. All I know is, lots of kids around, they learned shit from their parents. Daughters was learning how to make cookies from their mums so I thought, why the hell not? Lady makes great cookies. Except she doesn’t. Turns out all those years she was getting her cookies from the bakery, bringing them home and puttin’ ’em in a dish and then takin’ them to functions and shite, passing them off as her own. Because there was some bullshit about being the perfect homemaker or some shite—good mum’s make good cookies, and as long as it looked like she was doing it, bully for her,” Sera sighed. This was just, stupid! She felt stupid for rambling on but she had…she had a point she was gettin’ to for Inky. She...had thought about it a long time, and didn't think it was important enough to bring up. But then friggin’ ruddy Darkspawn Tevinter bastard from hell comes busting up Haven, breaking Inky, and...she hadn't wanted to believe Ellie was dead. But part of her had. And when they got her back...you only got people back so many times before they got taken away for good. So. “She let me hate Baker, let me feel hated because of her stupid pride. So I just didn’t like cookies much after that—pride cookies. But then you come along, Ellie. You’re like a proper little mum, you know? Running around, looking after everyone, always trying to take care of ‘em, even me, from day one. Then you go and you actually know how to make cookies, and you take the time to teach me how to make ‘em too. And that...dunno. Just helped me like em a bit more again.”

“It healed a hurt!” Cole enthused. “Forced family is pain and suffering, but found family is love and acceptance. Lady Emmauld saw you as a puzzle piece she could force into place, clipped your wonky edges to make you fit. You taped them back on as best you could, and Ellie loved you even when she didn’t know you’d fit, you didn't have to, you just had to be you.”

Frick!

Inky smiled real big though, and hugged Sera tight. “I’m really sorry Lady Emmauld did that to you, Sera. I love you lots, and I’m so proud of you! Mwah!” kissed her good on the cheek.

“Same here, Ser’,” Krem said, “thanks for sharing with us. That was real big of you.”

“Yeah well, we’re all friends ain’t we? So. Friendship cookies!” Sera declared them, clackin’ cookies with Ink, Cole and Krem doin’ the same before they all decided to take a bite.

…

Well. These’d wake a great-gran from the dead but not cuz they was sweet.

“…wow Ser’! You did a…sensational job!” Ellie encouraged. Sensational, which could mean assaulting to the senses.

“…they’re so…flavorful,” Kremmy-boy tried, as he soldiered through chewing the bite in his mouth and swallowing it.

Cole gulped his down and smacked his lips. “My mouth does not like them, but I like them because you made them for us.”

Mmhmm, thanks for keeping it real, Cole.

“These taste like the inside of a salt filled arsehole!” Sera cut to the chase, blah! What the frick! She followed the recipe!

“…Sera, you’re the best, but uh,” Ellie ventured, “did you mix up your salt and sugar?”
Well frick! There was only supposed to be like, a pinch of salt and cups and cups and cups of sugar! They was both white and came from sacks in the kitchens! “Think the horses can eat em?” Sera wondered. Shame for all that salt to go to waste.

“You know what, they might,” Krem said, “we can check with the Horse Master first. That’d be a nice treat for them I think—you did a great job Ser’!”

“Poisoning us and making horse treats!”

“That’s two birds with one stone!” Ellie said, “That’s like, genius level multitasking!”

Sera couldn’t help but laugh. “Okay. Maybe next time we’ll make ‘em together—all of us. We’ll be a cookie club.”

"Sounds good to me, Ser’," Krem said.

"Yeah!" Ellie agreed.

"I am also excited!" Cole announced. Shite, Sera was starting to find his weirdy stuff more adorable than annoying. "I am adorable?"

“Absolutely precious babe,” that was Bull's voice? Where's he at? "Sera? Why the fuck are you trying to poach from my club?” Oh frig, haha, Bull came out of the Tavern, was down on the ground lookin’ up at them. “Why’s my Imekari on the roof? And my Lieutenant? Cole, I’m worried for you too buddy, you’re my funky lil’ Spirit friend—you start to fall you poof to safety, okay?”

“Okay!” Cole agreed.

They was headin’ down anyway, might as well take a short cut. So Sera held out a hand and Bull reached up, helped her drop down, offerin’ his other to Kremmy-boy.

Dropped him right into the bushes though. Safe landin’ that didn’t hurt anything more than his pride. It was friggin’ funny, even Inky couldn’t help it—she at least tried to seriously reprimand Bull and asked if Krem was okay before busting up into laughs.

“You drop Inky you know right where my arrows is goin’,” Sera saw fit to warn though.

“Come on Imekari, I got you,” Bull said, offering up both arms.

Ellie slipped off the roof and he caught her right up against his chest, he was all smiles and scrunching his nose at her, big softy he was.

Kremmy-boy was still brushing himself off, shaking his head.

“Hey Chief, want a cookie?”

…He asked me to look after you, in the end, the horrible man. I assured him I would get word to you, tell you everything that has happened.
I do hope to see you again soon, my friend. You were looking well, better I have seen you in years, perhaps the South suits you?

Give my love to Varric, and Ellie.

—M

It was the fourth time he’d read over the missive. And still, its contents hadn’t quite felt like they’d properly been absorbed by his brain. It said what now?

Dorian startled when suddenly there was a weight against his midsection, arms wrapping around his waist. A hug. He blinked to clear his vision as he pulled the letter aside and looked down at his intruder, though he really needn’t see to know who it was.

“Hiya Dorian. Figured I should stop you. Stairs are right over there, ya know? They’re faster than wearing a hole through the floor if you want down.” Ahh, he’d been pacing as he read, just how long had she been there? “Cole said you needed me? You seemed kind of busy when I first came in, so I chatted up Enchanter Fiona for a bit but um, I mean, you seem upset. Is everything okay?” she asked, her chin pressed high on his stomach, concerned eyes peering right up at him.

“I’ve just got a letter from Felix.”

“Yeah? How’s he doing?” she asked. "Did his Healers get the stuff we read about? Even if it can't um, heal him, it could really help with any pain or discomfort he's in. Though Madam de Fer seems to have an interest, in it. She's working on some kind of variation on potion made with Primeatas Root using Red Moss.”

Ahh. Well. “He did thank us for the information. He told me he planned to speak to the Magisterium. And he did. They’re currently in session—Maevaris is absolutely delighted.” The woman did love when the whole of their Magisters were in one room, like fish in a barrel. Not that Maevaris ever fished. But she did enjoy torturing Tiventer's leadership however she could, having them all together made it that much more fun and easier.

“Oh yeah, she’s in the Magisterium.”

“Indeed. She wrote to me as well. Felix stood on the senate floor and told them of you. A glowing testimonial. There has been no official reaction but Maevaris says everyone back home is talking,” Everyone included Halward, he supposed. He...did his parents know he was in the Inquisition? There was some small part of him that wondered what they thought. If they knew. What they were saying about him. What they thought of the Herald of Andraste Felix rhapsodized about. “Felix always was as good as his word.”

Oh. Oh dear. Well, at least their lessons on grammar stuck.

“…was?” Ellie asked softly. Past tense.

“I am sorry Ellie. Maevaris wrote me as Felix could not. He’s dead, the Blight caught up with him.”

Fasta vas! The girl’s eyes filled with tears, chin dimpling the way it did when she might cry but would not, and then she asked, “Are you alright?”
“He was ill…and thus on borrowed time anyhow.”

“That doesn’t mean you don’t get to be sad.”

That…was true. He was, in point of fact, very sad. Not devastatingly sad. Not ‘lay down in the snow and wait for the sweet embrace of death’ sad, not ‘only feeling capable of carrying on because there was a young Tevinter boy in need of a good cry over the loss you share’ sad. But he was at least ‘feel this for a while, take brandy breaks to numb the pain, and grieve like a normal human being’ sad. He could survive that well enough on his own.

But he wouldn’t have to.

“Tevinter needs more people like him. He was someone who always put the good of others above themselves.” Perhaps one day Tevinter would have a mage of that caliber, she’d already the spirit and integrity down, she merely needed the citizenship…which could easily be arranged through marriage…perhaps he should drop hints with Cremisius. They were still young, but Tevinter was hardly going to save itself now was it?

Ellie offered him a little smile. “They have you. You talk like you think he was a better person than you—he was more up front with it, but you have…pride or something, you’ve been turned away when showing your true self and that makes you mean. Acerbic,” who was teaching her these words? Him. But how dare she use them against him, "so people turn away on your terms, not because you’ve opened yourself up and they’ve found something wanting. But you aren’t wanting, Dorian. You’re amazing, and brilliant, and underneath it all you’re kind, and compassionate, and you care a whole lot more than you dare let others think.”

That…was utter rot. Just. Where was her child minder? Shouldn’t she come fetch the girl for a nap or something? Maker. Ahh well. “It’s nice to see Felix wasn’t the only good sort hanging around here,” he allowed. They were to have a moment it seemed. Bah. He was hugging her back now, how incredibly lovely and pathetic. “I want brandy.”

“I want apple juice—lets go get wasted! I’ll make sure you don’t make bad decisions or have a hangover or anything,” she promised as she let go, after a fashion. Just one arm, stepping aside so they could walk with their arms around each other. He rested Maevaris’s letter on his desk as they passed and down the stairs they went. It was admittedly faster than wearing a hole through the floor. "I'll tell the Iron Bull to come tell you how handsome you are, bet I can get him to feed you grapes! He's already shirtless, that's like half the job of grape feeding!"

“That sounds delightful.”

His head pounded with ache, the sort that consumed most of his focus, reverberated through his skull like the beat of a drum. Or perhaps more like a hammer beating down upon his head.

The pain was such it consumed most of his focus…that…was…had he just been considering that? He’d been forgetting things. He had taken his Lyrium kit out of the desk drawer last night and set it out on his desk, he’d been keeping it locked in since they moved…Cassandra had hidden it from him on the journey—he’d asked her to. There had been…it had been worse than usual, given their situation. And the snap and strain at his heart, losing Haven, the home they made there was one thing. When they had lost Ellie?

He’d…a struggling relationship, with his Maker. His time in the Circle Spire had pretty well worked that into him. Just the barest bit of thought on the subject made him sweat, the walls of his office feel very, very close, but he wasn’t in the cell again, he wasn’t.

Ten…nine…eight…seven…six…five…four…three…two…one…

He was in his office and nothing more. Now. He’d a bit of a renewed sense of reliance in the Maker he once felt…distant. Because only a god could have saved that girl that night. How in the world had she survived Corypheus, let alone…how had she found them? They’d been traveling en masse, left something of a trail but it sounded like it hadn’t been very helpful all told. And she’d been so hurt, so focused on just being able to drag the next bit of air into her lungs and force it back out to take on fresh, he…divine intervention had surely been at hand. He found himself praying to that god more as of late. Because Maker help him.

Ellie was his sweetheart—his sweet heart. She brought out everything pure in him and was intrinsically inseparable from his beating heart. She was precious and meant to be protected but now…now she was also Inquisitor. And there were things…she deserved to know.

So. As he’d been forgetful as he was coming down from a horrible flare of his symptoms and still recovering, he’d taken his Lyrium kit out of the desk drawer and laid it on his desk. He’d almost made to put it away as swiftly as possible but then he remembered why he put it there in the first place. And too it was…a bit of an exercise. Open it up, look inside, to be so very, very close to the tools he needed to take on what his body craved without lifting a finger to do anything of the sort. He used to have to sit on his hands until they were clumsy and numb, and then slam the kit shut so he could not feel the Lyrium’s call. Now he could sit here, kit open wide like it was just another tome on his desk, he could even trace his fingers across the symbol of Andraste, it did nothing more to sate the ingrained desire for Lyrium, but neither did it chip away further from his resolve. He would not touch the stuff, never again, not for as long as he lived. The Order would have no hold over him. Not after Kirkwall, and certainly not after Therinfal.

And certainly not while he had Ellie to think about. He could do this. He could. And he would. She would not see him go mad, his mind lost to the degenerative state Lyrium eventually induced in non-magical consumers. He could not regret the choices that set him on the path to the life he lived now, but he was certainly not taking the things he did regret further still.

“She will be here soon,” Cassandra said. Oh, Maker, he had not heard her come down. She was armored, ready for the day, putting the final pins in her hair to keep her braid in place. “Do you wish for me to stay?”

Yes. But that was true of all days. “I’ll be alright. Thank you, for offering, love.”

“Of course,” Cassandra said, coming to sit at his side, leaning back against his desk as she looked him over as if she could verify every last detail of his well being by sight alone…admittedly she probably could at this point. As he would not be keeling over in the next several hours, she offered him a soft smile and a kiss to his temple before she pressed her lips to his. “Send for me if you’ve need,” she intoned. “Have a pleasant day.”

“You too.”

“I will be back for dinner.”
“Oh and I count the hours. Time passes like the slow blade of cruel fate across—”

“You will cease your poetry Commander, that is an order.” Good, he hadn’t had more than a starting line really, but he’d counted on her interrupting him.

“You turned down your chance at being Inquisitor,” he reminded her. “Only Ellie can stop me now, and I do believe our dear girl would only assist me in my endeavor. Wooing her—”

“Do not say it.”

“Her mami—admit it, you love that she calls you that.” The woman had laid awake her first night back in Haven and had rather the moment of elation over the milestone, there was lots of blushing and happy sighing involved and it was incredibly precious.

“I’ll do nothing of the sort!” Cassandra snapped, speaking quietly as she’d already begun to open the door, “Focus on the task at hand, wooing me is the least of your—”

“Who’s wooing you?” Eleanor wanted to know, speaking from curiosity as her head popped through the door before the girl proper popped in to the room, arms around Cassandra’s waist. “Is it Papi? Because I approve! I’ll hold her still—dale papi, dale!” she encouraged, oh and she smiled all the more when Cullen laughed.

“I will be late for my shift, Inquisitor,” Cassandra insisted, endeavoring to set the tone. “I believe you have a meeting with the Commander of your armed forces?”

“Indeed I do, Lady Seeker,” Eleanor returned smoothly, unrelenting in her hold. “But not for another two minutes. I know what’s up, so I came early for hugs. And I already have Barris covering your morning shift. I talked to mami yesterday, about what to do for dessert. She wanted your opinion on it though, she’s not sure it’ll be any good. Cole had some interesting ideas though.”

Was the girl suffering a stroke? She’d said Barris, dessert, Cole, referred to a second mami which he was pretty sure was Marehis? But so very close together like they were all connected and made sense? Did they make sense? Cassandra seemed to think so…she seemed very grave for just having been given the morning off to talk dessert with Marehis.

“Are you alright?” she asked the girl quietly.

She shrugged. “It’s officially 8 o’clock, so I kind of have to be,” she said as she pulled away from the Nevarran woman. “Lady Seeker,” she nodded.

Cassandra could not help but grin as she returned the nod in kind, “Inquisitor.”

He was concerned and admittedly confused, but Ellie was not visibly upset. Still it was worrisome, and he almost used it as an out.

But no. He would not do that to her. Rob her of knowledge he would give any other Inquisitor seated before him. Before, his boss, if there was one to be had, had been Cassandra.
When she came to him nearly a year ago, to take up this task, Commander of the Inquisition, he’d disclosed to her on the spot.

“I’ll not take Lyrium, Lady Seeker.”

“Ahh. I am sorry you’ve had to endure withdrawal. You needn’t worry, Ser Rutherford.
We’ve an apothecary on hand and a steady supply of lyrium through the Chantry-“ “Cullen.”

“Pardon?”

“Just Cullen, Lady Seeker. And I’ll not be taking Lyrium, not from you, or your Inquisition, or anyone else. I’ve my kit still full, perfectly preserved, untouched since Kirkwall. I have been enduring withdrawal. It is my choice to do so. You understand the complications that involves, yes?”

“…I do.”

“Then you understand why I cannot possibly work for you.”

“Does your withdrawal truly debilitate you to such a state you could not do your job?”

“I- well…no, I just thought-” he rambled.

“You assumed. What is that precious little saying—when one makes assumptions, they make an ass of you and me?” You and me?…Assumed. Ass u me. huh. Clever little pun, he might like her. “If you wish…I would monitor you. I know your career, Cullen, your merit. I would not ask this of you if you were not the one for the job. And I would best know when you truly work at your limits, if withdrawal from Lyrium is compromising your duties.”

“…you would?”

“Certainly,” Cassandra assured. “We leave for Haven at dawn.”

Hmm…he wanted to marry that woman someday. Everyday.

“…tattoo of Cremisius’s name on my butt. I just think it’s be super cute, you know? I know—Cremisius Gistin Aclassi is a lot of letters, but I got a lot of ass so. I might as well use it.”

Maker above, god in the heavens what the hell was going on!!

“Eleanor Liana Trevelyan!” he shot out, wait, she'd been by the door hadn’t she? She was seated now, in the chair across from him. Grinning like something was the height of hilarity.

“Cullen Stanton Rutherford!” she shot back in mock tones of his shocked outrage. “You’re the one not paying any attention, I was talking to you for like five minutes! Did you just call a meeting so I could sit here while you stare into space? Or is there something that needs my attention?...if you were just trying to give me an easy first morning as Inquisitor that ship has sailed papi, I’ve had a day and a half, and I’ve not even been up for three hours.”

She… “You are not seriously considering a tattoo on your…places?”

Oh goodness she did have quite the laugh at that, she practically screamed with it, wiping at her eyes with the back of her hands as she caught her breath. “No! Honest. I mean I love Cremisius, but no way am I getting his name tattooed anywhere on my body.”

Oh Maker, he’d made rather the spectacle hadn’t he? He hadn’t meant to ignore her to the point she saw fit to give him a heart attack.

“Good,” he sighed. “I do apologize, Eleanor. I did call you here for serious reasons.”

She looked serious—not panicked, just prepared to take whatever it was he had to say to her and roll with it. He’d seen that look on her face several times in the past few weeks. Food shortages? Cool, they’ll handle it. More hands needed for healing? Here’s two more, and she’s good at giving instruction for others. Cole had apparently confiscated every single dagger in Skyhold, because high stress equated high tempers, and fights had been breaking out behind the scenes, all over the place—Eleanor had spent the entirety of two days—that he could pinpoint in exactness due to this very expression—dealing with it. Having Cole show her exactly who each and every dagger belonged to—returning the ones that had been taken because the Spirit saw a blade and a hand that might wield it, and taken it just in case. And for the ones that had been ready to strike at another—at a member of their Inquisition—she sat them down and apparently discussed with them every implication of that, and all of the ramifications that would bear. A moment of anger could cost them their allies’ life. They were still recovering from Haven. Infection could set in—they might not have ingredients to save them. And if they do, what is used on them in an event that could have been avoided, might not be around for someone who suffers a fate out of their control. And what was worse, they severed trust with each other—not only in the wounded party, but in those around them. How could she even trust them if they hurt another member of the Inquisition? What was to stop them from hurting more, even the Herald of Andraste. They were to have each other’s backs, be open and honest about their frustrations instead of bottling them up until they boiled over at knifepoint, and save their blades for their enemies in the field. And, if they ever thought to harm another member of the Inquisition ever again, she would let the Iron Bull hold them over the dungeon hole. Leliana was a marvelous influence.

But now, well. She took a great deal in the Inquisition personally, but this was truly personal he feared.

“Eleanor. You are aware that Templars imbibe Lyrium, to perform their duties, yes?”

She nodded. “Has there been a shortage?” she asked.

“No sw-., no,” Cullen cleared his throat. “As you are now head of the Inquisition, I feel it is my duty to inform you that I…have chosen not to take Lyrium for quite some time.”

She was very quiet, regarding him unblinkingly for a moment and then, “How long is quite some time?”

“Since Kirkwall’s rebellion.”

She visibly startled at that, sucked in a gasp of air that shuddered through her before she closed her eyes, she took in a few sharp breaths that sounded mildly concerning like she might be having a panic attack, but she slowed her breathing, and he could see her mouthing something silently to herself.

It took her a moment, and then she took a deep breath, looked to him. “So. Your headaches, migraines, come from w-withdrawal?”

“Yes.” They might always be a part of his existence. There were no known cases of a Templar fully coming off of Lyrium addiction and moving forward until their body no longer suffered for the lack of Lyrium of which they’d been ingesting high doses on the daily for decades.

“Okay. Can I ask why? Um, why you choose not to take it, I mean. I know how withdrawal works.”

“Yes, I did. I saw the control Lyrium had over my fellow Templars, saw so many that could have walked away from the corruption if they could have abandoned their need for Lyrium full stop. I never wanted to bend a knee to the Order again, not in a capacity where I was working mindlessly for reward. The only thing still keeping me bound was my need for their steady supply of Lyrium, so I let it go.”

"This could kill you," she said quietly.

"I know. I would, however, prefer to die a free man. And thus far, I've made it through the worst of it." the initial withdraw from Lyrium was maddening, by far one of the most harrowing experiences of his life but now, "I've handled it well, and perhaps someday I'll be through with it, full stop."

“That’s…understandable. And very brave.”

He had to clear his throat. “Thank you, Eleanor.”

She bit her lip, nervous before she asked, “Um, is it...is it really bad? Is there anything I can do to help?”

“It is manageable. You already help, in ways you can’t even imagine sweetheart. Cassandra is monitoring me—as she has from the beginning—to ensure I’m capable of fulfilling my duties to the Inquisition.”

"Good. Okay. Um, thanks for telling me."

"Certainly."

"I'm proud of you."

Oh. Well then, that certainly did help. He closed up his Lyrium kit, and tucked it away in his desk once more. "Thank you, Ellie."

"Um, I have a meeting with Varric next, and Marehis is busy, Cole walked with me here. I can call him if you're busy or don't feel lik-"

Ahh. "I could do with some fresh air, I'd be happy to escort you, Ellie. Thank you for taking our precautions seriously." She could have very well taken the lapse in supervision to go about on her own. As it was, while he was glad they could provide a home for the girl, give her her own room, he hadn't been able to sleep until he confirmed with Leliana thrice that Ellie's quarters was secure, the door locked and the only people with a key were the Spymaster, and the two residing in the room itself, Eleanor and Marehis. He hadn't known Marehis was spending the night with the girl until the Spymaster sighed and informed him that Ellie was hardly alone. He just...oh Maker, he could not abide anything happening to her.

So, sword at his hip, an arm around his girl, they walked along Skyhold's walls, to where Varric had told Ellie to meet him and his 'friend'.

His best friend.

Oh Maker above, Andraste...all of the other gods if they were so inclined.

"Hallo, Cullen," Hawke greeted amicably, "Long time no see?"

"You know Varric's friend?" Ellie asked him.

..."Unfortunately," he looked to Varric. "Cassandra is going to kill you."

The Dwarf sighed, hand wrenching at the back of his neck. "Yeah Curly, I know. Look, we need his help, I'm tryin' to get him in and out of here as fast as possible, maybe the Seeker doesn't need to kno-

"Ha!" Fat chance! He certainly wasn't going to go down for this when Cassandra found out, she would undoubtedly so there was little use hiding it from her. "Enjoy the rest of your life. Ellie, if you've anything at all to say to Ser Tethras, I suggest you do so now."

"Papi?" Ellie questioned him.

Hawke's eyes widened at that, a ridiculous smile spreading across his face, "Papi?"

"Yes. Not what you're thinking, but if you so much as hurt a hair upon our Inquisitor's head, you and Varric can have a lovely joint-funeral dedicated to your friendship."

Hawke gasped, looking to Varric, "Oh man, that's exactly how I wanna go out though, wouldn't that be sweet?"

"Fenris will be jealous," Varric warned, but, "Lets do it. No open caskets though, Rivani will steal my chest hair."

"The things she wants to do with it require it still be attached. I'm thinking cremation, get an urn shaped like a tankard, our ashes mixed together for eternity."

"You are the only man ever I'd want to be inside of or inside me-"

Ellie squealed in surprise when Cullen covered her ear with one hand and used the same motion to pull her close enough to cover the other ear by pressing it up against his side.

"Gentlemen!" he reprimanded. Good. Heavens.

"Sorry Tumbles, got caught up in the bromance," Varric offered the girl.

She wriggled her head out of Cullen's hold, "What is even going on?!"

"Garrett Hawke," the man decided to introduce himself bowing his head to her.

'Garret' Varric mouthed, looking as though he hadn't even ever acknowledged his dearest friend had a name other than 'Hawke', nor did he particularly care for it.

"...as in 'Champion of Kirkwall' Hawke?" Ellie asked for clarification and when the man nodded. "Cassandra is going to kill Varric, and I kind wanna punch you in the face, honestly." Did she need a boost?

"Well, I honestly wouldn't blame you," Hawke said, kneeling, bringing himself more level with the girl. "Varric's told me a lot about you, to the point I've considered coming to officially duel you for his friendship," he offered with a wink, and then, "I am sorry, Ellie. There are many things I regret about Kirkwall's rebellion. I regret even more, the mess you're in now. With Corypheus. I have fought him before...to the point that I thought he was dead. Varric informs me he is not, and that is why I am here. To help in any way that I can, in your pursuit of him."

Ellie nodded. "Okay. So...let's talk."

"Do you want me to stay with you, Ellie?" Cullen offered.

She shook her head. "I'm okay, Varric's with me, and the Tavern's right there, Cole, Sera, Bull, Cremisius, I've got options. Besides, I know you're busy," she said, then, "Vas a chismearle a mami?" Are you going to tattle to mommy? oh he did so enjoy learning Antivan.
"Mami?" Varric asked, he'd precious little knowledge of the girl's native language, but that word was plain enough. "Oh shit, come on-"

"Si, mjia. Big time."

"Look just, break it to her gentle okay?" Varric asked, "Don't let her get bent out of shape over this, I know she's got a lot going on right now-"

"You've been awfully concerned for her lately," Cullen said, Maker, the Dwarf had practically made himself a nuisance even to Cullen, as of late, "should I be concerned of your intentions?"

"What? No! Wait, I don't mean that like 'oh gross no' Seeker's- Just- I'm just happy for you crazy kids, okay? What you two got going on is really cool."

It is really cool! And really strange for the Dwarf to feel the need to point that out, but... "Alright. Well then. I'll take my leave, do take care of Eleanor, would you?"

He. Was so. Fucked.

And Hawke was just laughing his ass off at him as Cullen went off to... bah. Didn’t need Antivan to know Curly was gonna go rat him out to Seeker. Oh man. She was gonna be so pissed. He... he didn’t want to piss off Seeker in general but he was pretty sure a hormonal Seeker was gonna be a whole new world of hurt. Wasn’t sure chocolate would save him now.

Oh. But that reminded him. “Here kid, how you feeling?” he asked as he offered her a little bar of chocolate from his coat pocket.

She accepted it, though when she unwrapped it she broke it off into three pieces, handing some off to Hawke who was looking at him like he deadass was offended Varric never offered him pocket chocolate before. Well his ass didn’t have his body violently betray him once a month, did he?

“Thanks for the chocolate—monthly’s gone now but I still have tastebuds,” she said as she sat on the edge of the wall, gestured to the space before her for Hawke to sit if he’d like.

Thank literally everything, he’d been damn sorry for the kid, all that bullshit going down and then on top of it all, she’s beat to hell and got an angry uterus. “Glad to hear it.”

And Hawke was laughing again. Cackling, the bastard. Varric almost hoped he’d fall. “So that’s why you wrote me all those months ago, asking what I do for Bethany?”

Yeah fat lot of good that’d done him. Leave out the nice waterskin and mostly avoid contact, which was a real bitch when we lived in Lowtown, why the hell do you think I’d spend a week at the Hanged Man once a month? Can’t go too long without hearing your dulcet snores? Seriously considered turning her over to the Templars—Maker help them reign her in. Hadn’t been the expert advice he was looking for.

“Bethany’s your sister, right? Is she still with the Grey Wardens?” Ellie asked, concerned. Sweet kid. He sat down on her other side, he’d thought he’d give them space to talk but uh, Cullen had walked her here…so Marehis might not be around? He didn’t see the Elf woman anywhere and she usually was never too far away from the kid, Ellie’d talked about ‘options’ for an escort so. He figured he should probably stick around and make sure she was safe. Wasn’t sure what her schedule was like and he needed Hawke gone before Seeker could come wring both their necks, but he’d pass her off to whoever she wanted when they were done. “We um, haven’t heard from them since the Conclave. They’ve gone missing, did you know that? She isn’t missing, is she?”

“Ahh, no, she’s fine—safe, with friends, I pulled her from her station when things went sideways in Kirkwall,” Hawke assured her.

“I’m glad she’s okay.”

“Thanks. She’s real excited about you—Herald of Andraste, now you’re Inquisitor I hear?
And a Mage? That’s pretty kick ass. Lot of pressure though huh? Lot of responsibility?”

“This isn’t even the craziest thing I’ve had to deal with in the last twenty-four hours,” she said, leaning back to rest the back of her head against Varric’s shoulder, “would it be acceptable to institute an Inquisition-wide nap time? Everyone just shut up and take a nap for a solid hour?”

“Hey, you’re the boss now, I’d be down,” shit. What the hell happened? Kid did look damn tired, but he thought it was her monthly crap. She hadn’t even been Inquisitor for twenty-four hours yet, who the hell was making her job hard already? He’d kick their ass!

Oh man, Hawke got serious then. Guy tried to keep things light, just about the only way to handle half the bullshit he’s dealt with in the last decade. But he sighed and offered a hand to the kid, and she took it with her Marked one, Hawke holding it while he opened up about how he felt, when things were starting to get real in Kirkwall. One day his family was just scraping by in Lowtown and the next, he’s responsible not only for his entire family, but an entire city.

“I made decisions, did things I felt were right for my people in the moment. And somehow, someway my actions affected even a little girl in the Free Marches that I would never have even met if it wasn’t for all this,” he said gesturing vaguely to encompass this entire bullshit situation. “That’s insane. You? You’re going to be making an even bigger impact with this Inquisition, and it’s going to take a lot of support to deal with that. So. I get if you don’t particularly like me, but if you ever need advice or anything—don’t listen to Varric, he’s an irresponsible dumbass,” he’d just been waxing poetic about looking out over Kirkwall’s streets from his balcony and about the weight of his responsibilities, what the fuck, where was the love?!,
“and do make contact with me, anytime alright?

Ellie giggled. “I don’t hate you or anything. I don’t even dislike you just…I had to be mad at someone, you know? I guess I’m that someone for a lot of people now, huh, when the Inquisition does things that people might not like or hurts someone.”

“Can’t let it get to you, or you’ll never get anything done. You’re gonna do a lot of good, Varric’s a dumbass but he’s a good judge of character and he can’t shut the hell up about yours.”

“You’re being the friendship sort of mean to Varric right? Because I will fight you.” Hell yeah! Get him Tumbles!

“You really do say that, I love it! Isabella’s gonna flip!” Hawke laughed, “Oh man, yeah I’m being the friendship sort of mean, no worries. Varric ever told you about Isabella? She’s a big fan—you’re Antivan though right, not Rivani?” Ellie nodded. “Still, spunky kid. Don’t lose that okay?”
“I’ll try. Thanks—for being so nice and offering me advice and things. But you said something about how you killed Corypheus? Didn’t seem to stick, I’ve got a butt bruise still receding from being slammed against a trebuchet. He’s big and mean and crazy. And ugly.”

“You got that right Tumbles,” Varric said. Ugly asshole. Fucking asshole whipping her around like a doll. Did not like that, did not like that at all. Weirdly glad that was the only place she was getting butt bruises from though. Oh man, she’s an adult kind of and it’s none of his business—but he had to remind himself of that when he was coming back from the Tavern after everyone went for drinks after the memorial service yesterday. Tumbles and Boyfriend had been real uh… looked like he caught the tail end of a face sucking session way in the back of the Great Hall, there wasn’t really anyone around and they were by her door, and he was low-key terrified she was about to invite the guy into her new room, christen the place or something but nope, she said something, and he’d nodded—kissed her a few more times—then went their separate ways.

But uh, there were bigger issues at hand. Hawke really did know how to find trouble, didn’t he? Maker love him.

“I’ve got a friend in the Wardens, his name is Stroud— he knows where the Wardens have gone, and it has something to do with Corypheus’s return. But there are Wardens working for Corypheus, trying to track him down and stop him from getting help. I know where to find him, and I can give you his location, if you come, he’ll tell you everything he knows.”

“Where is he?” Ellie asked.

“Crestwood.”

“…that…that’s on the map in the War Room, near the Storm Coast. It’s rainy isn’t it?”

“Very, unfortunately.”

“Sabes qué,” she complained, "haven’t the Wardens ever heard of any tropical locations?”

“Apparently not,” Hawke supposed.

“Okay,” Ellie sighed. “You don’t want to chat up my Advisors?”

“I’d probably best get out of here before I get Varric into trouble. I should make contact with Stroud—I’ll send word to your people on when and were to meet up.”

“I’ll tell them then, be safe okay?” Ellie cautioned him, leaning forward and hugging the guy who looked a little startled—yeah, she is a hugger, he warned him. He was either walking out of here with a black eye or a hug, there was really no in between when it came to Tumbles.

Though uh, Varric might end up with a black eye.

Hawke pulled his hood up over his head and walked with them to the Tavern, get Ellie with someone who could see her to wherever she needed to go next, probably the War Room… maybe Seeker would be occupied with this stuff for the rest of the day? A Dwarf can’t dream, but he can daydream can’t he?

“Varric!”

Nope. Can’t even do that. Hawke—asshole! Ass! Hole! He hightailed it out of there when they were leaving the Tavern and walking by the armory to get to the gate, fuck! Seeker had apparently been waiting for them just outside the Quartermaster’s office since Cullen Tattle-tale Rutherford told her they were meeting in the battlements above.

“Was that-?!” she pointed as—shit how fast was he running? He was already out the gate!

“Heeeeeeey Seeker,” Varric greeted, just, gonna start with sucking up, “you know—you’re lookin’ real cute? Has anyone told you you’re glowing lately? You’re just killin’ it today.”

Shit, would it be healthy if the popped a blood vessel? She looked like she might pop a blood vessel. “Oh, I’m killing something alright. We need to talk—now!”

Ohhhh she had not been so- so viscerally angry, outraged with this Dwarf since she met him. And they’d had quite the tremulous relationship! The nerve! The absolute gall he had to lie to her face, to Most Holy through her! He dragged her around for days during his interrogation! Days she should have spent handling the Conclave’s preparation with Justinia, should have been there, and present to perceive the threats that had been awaiting her that day! And then to invite Hawke here, have him speak with Eleanor, and slip him out like! Like he could keep this from the Seeker?!

He’d gone with her compliantly when she took him up by his arm, pulling him into the armory and upstairs so they were not doing whatever this was for all and sundry to see, throwing him forward the moment they were alone, “You lied!”

“You kidnapped me! What was I supposed to do?!”

“You could have told me the truth! We needed Hawke and you knew where he was!”

“I didn’t know why you needed him—I thought you were trying to take him down! I didn’t know about the Conclave—” oh goodness sake, what- what bullshit, but he elaborated, “I didn’t know that was what you wanted him for! You never said! I mean yeah, I made some educated guesses, thought maybe you wanted to ‘bring him to justice’ in front of everyone, send a message to whichever side the Divine was favoring and convince them to end this shit, but I swear Cassandra, if I known—“

“You didn’t need to! The Most Holy Divine wanted to know something—and you should have supplied answer! This is not a game, Varric! It was serious and you- we needed him! Hawke was the only one Justinia believed could help her bend the ear of both Mages and Templars, and if anyone could have saved Most Holy it would have been Hawke!”

Several things happened at once.

There was a very, very familiar, very surprised-mixed-hurt sounding gasp.

All of the blood drained from Cassandra’s face, her heart stopping for all of a horrible beat.

And Varric made an ass of himself, coming to her defense—Cassandra’s defense.

Oh Maker, she did not wish to turn around to confirm, but she did. Eleanor was standing there, pallid and Cassandra regretted nothing more in her life, than the fact that she had said something so thoughtless that made the girl look like…like she were desolately accepting some truth.

“Eleanor, I-“ she did not meant it, not-not how it sounded.

“I’m sorry, C-Cole said I could find you here, I heard y-yelling and um,” she was shaking and Casandra was uncertain if she were about to cry or yell or flee, but Varric made quite the spectacle of himself to keep her from any of those options, to get her to stay and talk this through.

“Whoa whoa whoa, kid, hold on—don’t take what Seeker said personally, okay? That’s all on me, I’m the one she’s mad at. She didn’t mean that—she’s pissed, and pregnant, you know that’s not a good mix—“ and then he blanched, “oh shit. Oh shit, I’m so so sorry Seeker I swore I wouldn’t say anything- fuck!”

“Pregnant?!“ Eleanor and Cassandra asked in unison though Eleanor sounded far more excited with the accusation than the Seeker who railed, “What on the Maker’s green world would make you think I am pregnant?!“

“You…you mean you’re not?“ he asked, sounding entirely shocked—what was there to be shocked about?!

“Of course not!” Maker!

“Well I- I- you’re the one who said you couldn’t drink! And we even talked about it—you worried you were ‘displaying symptoms’ and said Cullen knew and he was supportive!”

“Because I have chronic depression I am currently medicating myself for, Varric! I am not with child outside of the fact I am currently in the same room with Eleanor!” Cassandra snapped.

“Well I— I would certainly not imbibe alcohol if I were and you saw me drinking less than a month before your cockamamie suspicions arose, just how soon do you think women know they are pregnant?”

Oh, Varric went very, very still, “…Human women don’t know they’ve conceived like, right then and there when it uh, happens?”

“No!” Was…was that the case for Dwarven women?

“Uh-huh…Fuck. Uh…I got some people I should write. Just uh. Check in on things. Are we uh, good here?”

“We most certainly are not good! You—“ ugh. He truly thought her pregnant? That explained his recent behavior—constantly checking in on her, making certain that she was not hurt or hungry or thirsty or in need of assistance or a break, he…while misguided and severely mistaken…if she truly had been in such a situation…loathe though she was to admit it, Varric was first and foremost…a good friend. And…and while she still resented his dishonesty she could not fault him for his loyalty. That was loyalty he extended apparently now to her, and most importantly, to Eleanor, and she was glad that if the Dwarf ever did fall in to nefarious hands, he would rather die than give up anything that could lead to Eleanor’s harm. “Go. We will discuss this more calmly later. Right now I should speak with Eleanor, and you should investigate your potential for unknowingly siring bastard children.”

“You’re a real pal.”

“Obviously,” Cassandra found herself…it was not giggling, but it was giddy laughter she supposed, oh Maker but she was struck by, “You offered me so much chocolate yesterday!”
Fifteen times he had gone out of his way to encounter her! She likely would have eaten her weight in the stuff if she’d accepted his every offer as opposed to the one time she did take a piece.

“I dunno, I see a uterus thing, I throw chocolate at it until it feels better. Seriously, I stocked up for uh, the whole ride. So, you need chocolate, I’m your guy.” ‘The whole ride?’ Cassandra was honestly tempted to see this great stash of chocolate the Dwarf had imported to supply a pregnant woman for the next several months. Somewhere in Skyhold there was a mountain of chocolate, and she hadn’t the slightest clue where he could have stored such a thing. “And I was feeling guilty, I knew calling Hawke in would piss you off, but Ellie needed him.”

“And you chose to sacrifice Hawke’s anonymity to aid Eleanor. I do…appreciate it, Varric.”

“I am sorry Seeker, honest. If I’d known what you wanted him for…I don’t know how that would have gone down. But I’m sorry for everything it put you through.”

Cassandra nodded, and Varric sighed, leaving them, giving Eleanor a pat on the arm as he passed her.

Oh. The poor girl looked rather bewildered and confused and possibly upset, Cassandra waved her over, opening her arms, “Oh sweetheart come here,” she was grateful when the girl immediately obliged, let Cassandra hold her close, press her lips to her hair mmm, it smelled like Marehis had freshly washed it—well, she suspected Marehis as the woman had practically been dying for contact with the girl, to do anything with her or for her outside of guarding her from a distance. “I regret you heard what I said—I was not blaming you, I do not blame you for Justinia’s death”

“B…but you’re right. If…if H-Hawke had been there instead of m-me—”

“Then he would be the one with the Mark on his hand perhaps, and we would never have met, you would be dead, and I would not wish that for the world Eleanor.”

“Dunno, that might not be such a bad thing.”

Was that more of her macabre humor? “Eleanor?” it…it did not come off as humorous in the least. Cassandra pulled away to look into her face.

“I just meant it…it might not be a bad thing,” she said, looking to her feet, “if Hawke was the Herald instead of me. Just, he’s done stuff like this before, and he’s bigger, and stronger, and older and stuff, you know?”

“You have said so yourself that you are plenty big,” Cassandra offered, trying to go for something lighter, “and you have gotten stronger, and older. You’ve risen to the occasion, Eleanor, truly. We are all so very proud of you.”

The girl nodded. “Thanks.”

“Are you…are you upset with me?”

The girl shook herself and then met the Seeker’s gaze and it took a second but she seemed to produce a small smile for her, “Nah, I mean after all…being pissed off and pregnant isn’t a good mix.”

Cassandra smiled, hugging the girl close, “Oh I could kill that Dwarf, what was he thinking?”
“Your um, depression though, is it really bad mami?” she asked, her hold tightening around Cassandra’s back.

She shook her head, “No, sweet girl. It was, for a time. I…was experiencing worsening symptoms, sleeping for longer than I normally should, a loss of appetite, intrusive thinking—I did not realize the issue however until your Cremisius advised that I should take care of myself, it gave me reason to analyze my recent behavior to ensure that I was doing as much, only to realize there was something indeed amiss. I sought treatment with Adan during your time in the Oasis.”

That had Eleanor pulling away, wide eyed and truly looking upset with her, “But you just said! You! You drank! That was months ago—you drank while-“

“Eleanor, it- I am an adult-“

“So am I!”

“It is not the same and you know it- I should not have done so, but I know my limitations Eleanor, I am capable of—what I drank was tea laced with rum that was shared among our party to calm and console our nerves one evening as we returned from the Fallow Mire, it was nothing strong, like Varric’s bourbon—if I had consumed drink such as that at our gathering before we faced the Breach, yes, I would have had a severe interaction with my potions. As it was, it relieved a headache, and made it easier for me to find peaceful sleep, I was in full control of my actions, I remember everything with clarity, and I certainly did not black out.”

“Why was everyone so upset? I didn’t see anything like that-“

“You were asleep.”

“And? That doesn’t answer the ‘upset’ part!”

“We were merely up, discussing, processing the things you revealed to us, of your first encounter with demons in the Fade.”

The girl deflated at that. “So…so I made you need to drink?” Eleanor asked, and then, “Y…you said you needed m-medication while I was gone I- did I do this? Did I make your dep-“ her chin was quivering.

“Eleanor! Sweetheart, child, no!”

“B-but-“

“Eleanor Liana Trevelyan, look at me,” Cassandra intoned fiercely, taking the girl’s face in-hand and drawing it so she need only lift her eyes to look into the woman’s face. “You are not responsible for my own, or anyone one else’s mental health. I have dealt with depression for far longer than you have even been alive. I have good times—good years even, years where I suffer no ill consequence, maybe the occasional bad day but that could be simply life than my brains’ incapability to consistently supply the chemicals I need to be a healthily functioning member of society. You have done nothing more so than bring me so much happiness my sweet girl.”

Eleanor sniffled as Cassandra pressed a kiss to her cheek. And when she pulled away the girl smiled slightly, “That’s the second time I got full-named today.”

“Truly?”

She nodded. “Papi said it earlier…he was staring into space and wasn’t responding to anything I was saying when we started our meeting so I might have gotten creative and just started saying things to get a reaction out of him. Like getting Cremisius’s name tattooed on my butt.”

Oh goodness, Cassandra could not help but smile at that. “That certainly got his attention I trust?”

“Uh-huh!” oh, it was nice to hear her giggle. “Gosh, wow. Okay. I’m on like hour five of my first day Inquisitoring and my daddy has Lyrium withdraw and my mommy has depression, and my other daddy might secretly be an ancient Elven god, and my other mommy might have depression, and I have to go to rain-town to find a whistle-blowing Warden to stop Corypheus from whatever the hell he’s trying to do and I’m just really ready for a damn nap. Can I retire?”

“Certainly, we will need to discuss your Warden-finding but we can wait for you to nap if you’ve need.”

“I meant from the Inquisition.”

Oh goodness, she was jesting but, “Do you truly regret your position?”

Eleanor sighed. “No. Maybe. Ask me again after my nap for real—we do need to talk about the Warden stuff but um, well, you talked to Marehis, yeah?”

Ahh. “Yes. You are ready to move forward with her plan?”

Eleanor nodded. “I’d do just about anything for a nap right now, so yeah. I’m in.”

It’d been rather a quiet day—following a quiet night. He’d missed Marehis at his side, but she’d pulled him aside after the memorial service yesterday and lamented that Eleanor was…well, the girl was hit rather hard by Haven’s loss, sad, and tired, and still sick from her monthlys to a point that Marehis wished to spend the night with her, have Cole join them and he would monitor the girl for abnormality, perhaps she was suffering some greater internal issue. It certainly was not normal for her to suffer so much for so long, perhaps her body was having a horrible response to having been put on medication in the first place, or perhaps immediately bringing an end to taking that medication was causing it, either way, it could indeed be something they needed the Healers to get involved with. Oh he did hope nothing was terribly wrong, he…admittedly did press the bond, and it had shaken him, how much despair, and dread, and hurt he felt, how much pain she was in, emotionally and physically—her head pounded with ache and he was certain she’d been sobbing, and her stomach had hurt horribly, she’d felt nauseous in an extreme that almost sent him retching. He’d pulled away, and…well he certainly didn’t pray, but he did take a moment to wish well for her, think positive things in the hopes perhaps the universe at large would take note and heed his warning that if anything detrimental happened to that girl, he would not abide it.

He…oh he loved her. The notion had been unimaginable so many months ago when they first met. He thought he could never care for anyone that was not his kin. He could barely find palatable Elves in the waking world, Marehis had taken him quite by surprise, Sera too. He’d only been able to find true friendship, companionship with those of his friends who were trapped in the Fade. Spirits…some, who he had lost to corruption, been twisted into demonhood or…perhaps lost in the way Cole was lost. He could never be certain, maybe what was Elven was still alive in him, he did not know personally, the Elf turned-Spirit of Compassion that now possessed the body of Cole, so he could not know if they were altered irreparably.

Smart, Smooth, Smiling, but Shy, Secretive—Solas is the best, he’s so kind and intelligent and worthy, he does not need to hide himself! He is so loved for who he is!

Those were the words Cole had spoken from Eleanor’s mind when he began his interrogation of the Spirit after the fall of Envy in Therinfal. I know you by another name. But you were always Solas, the other came later, a title. You do not want me to call you that? Okay. What do you want to know?

That had been most of what he’d wanted to know—if the Spirit would be his demise or not. But the Spirit had no reason, nothing to prompt him in any way that might lead him to disclosing his identity…nor, did Solas think, would any believe. The only person who had reason to suspect him was the Iron Bull, and while he had a soft spot for the ‘kid’, it was merely play, petting the boy so he did not bite—the Qunari feared what the Spirit might do if provoked. And he certainly would not take stock in anything wholly outlandish the young man had to say, he still took any of his proclamations with a grain of salt.

There was a gentle knock on the door to the rotunda Solas had taken refuge in, before it swung open and Solas grinned, setting his book aside as he rose to his feet.

“Ellie,” he greeted oh, had…he had missed her—she had been so very busy as of late, Marehis had worried the girl was upset with her, but that was merely his vehnan being too hard upon herself, Eleanor adored her, she was just overwhelmingly tasked with something Solas had been reticent to give her, but she had surely stepped up, and fulfilled it to a T. It had been no small task, guiding them here, claiming Skyhold for the Inquisition, and now, she was Inquisitor. “Ma da’vehnan,” he said, and she offered him a smile when he made to hug her, pull her close, it was relief to hold her it surprised him then, how much he truly had missed this—when last had they hugged? Not since Haven. But he had honestly been fearful to hold her when she woke from the aftermath, he had felt the horrible pain inflicted upon her Mark, and she was still in agony, not in her hand, but her head, her spine, goodness he feared the future functionality of her left shoulder. Corypheus had been brutal. That…bellanaris din’an heem! Foul, corrupt creation. He should have never…he had been a fool to entrust the Orb to Corypheus. He thought the man would die! That awakening the Orb through ritual at the Conclave would leave the activated Orb in the ashes for him to collect and make use of but it had not. No, the only thing that came from the ashes was a Marked mortal girl who did nothing to deserve it’s cruel fate to begin with, he…he was in conflict. In August he would have seen her dead, a casualty among mere mortals, misguided elves that had nothing to offer his people, the best thing any of them had to offer the world, he thought, was their demise leading to the Orb working as it should once more. Allowing him to set things right. But now…so much had changed. He was more horrified, outraged at the bruising on this girl’s arm that meant his hand had held her, than that the other had held his Orb-

“Papi, you’re hurting me.”

He gasped, pulling back immediately, he had not meant to hold her so tightly it caused her pain, “I apologize, truly da’vehnan,” he shot out hands brushing along her biceps to soothe, ahh, he’d been hugging around her shoulders, he should have been more careful, “have I agitated your injury? Do you need potion sweet girl?”

She seemed to be assessing his words and then, “No, I’m okay.”

He nodded, and then it struck him, now that he was past his initial panic. “I…you have not called me that before.”
“Well, I love you just as much as I love Cullen, I’ve loved you even longer than him even,” she said plainly, and oh…oh it was indeed true, her love was spilling into the bond even now though there was something painful, sad in what she was feeling. But physically…her stomach was upset, and her head still ached, her shoulder was sore but not to great detriment.

“Have you had a hard day, Ellie?”

The girl swallowed, chin quivering, and she wrapped her arms around his middle, Solas resting a hand on the crown of her head, oh this poor child. “I’m really tired, and sad, and I’m scared. I really need to lay down and- and I know you’re probably busy but I w-was hoping-“

Oh, “You needn’t even ask, da’vehnan, past the point that obviously a verbal request is the best method to convey your needs,” he supposed. “Do you wish to lie down with me here, or shall we go to your room?”

She looked as if she felt badly to say as much when she pulled away but, “Um…actually—please don’t take this the wrong way but I’m exhausted and sleeping with mami was helpful—I like sharing with other people but I haven’t really had a bed to myself in months except the whole, being unconscious after Haven thing. I mean even last night, I know she didn’t mean to but she slept with her head on my shoulder for most of the night, and most positions with people end up with me waking up and it hurting-“

“Ahh, of course. You needn’t fear sweet girl, I could sit in a chair and find sleep or I could even lie down here, and you in your room—we would not be too far from one another to find each other in the Fade. In fact I have something in mind that may help you feel better, if you wish?”

Ellie nodded, offering him a small smile, “I’m gonna go get ready—wash my face, put on jammies, so it’ll be a couple minutes.”

“Take your time, I will be ready whenever you are.”

She nodded again and made to leave though she paused in the door way, looking back to him, “I really do love you Solas. A whole, whole lot.”

“As I love you, da’vehnan. Go, sweet child, get some rest. I’ll see you momentarily.”

He laid down on the daybed up against the wall, the sounds of activity in the library over head did little to disturb him, it was a library after all. He closed his eyes, focused, and cast his mind into the Fade as quickly as possible. He traveled through an older version of Skyhold, one he felt more familiar with, in days of old when it was his, and he made through the pristine building until he reached the room that now served to house Ellie.

Oh. She was there.

Not Ellie, Mythal*. The All-Mother, and to some degree of irony, soon-to-be-mother. Round and ripe in her pregnancy, her nightgown could no longer billow out to mask the fact, even when she stood. As it was, now In the Fade, she was seated on her bed, she was still warm and rosey cheeked, humming contentedly as she brushed her long raven hair. Her smile was blinding as she looked up to him and,

“Solas, my love, you’ve returned.”

An answer was at his lips, and there it died. Because she was not addressing him. Not as he was now. Oh how he wished he could reach out, shake the man that stepped through him to be at her side—lay hand on the life they made, take her lips in his own. He wanted to stop him, warn him of the fate that was waiting them, warn him of the terrible, terrible mistakes it would lead him to make-

It was strange but in the same moment he realized he loved Marehis just the same. He still mourned in his way, felt the loss of Mythal. No one had been more pure than she, more compassionate, she had been the best their people had to offer, and they slaughtered her, despite… despite everything. But he could not, even if he brought down the veil, return Mythal’s full self. If even a piece of her spirit lived on it would always be in some vessel that consumed her, precious little of her true being shining through. And it had horrified him, when he first realized that the fact no longer hurt as it had once before. He would always love her, always miss her…but if she appeared before him now, true and alive he would not want her as he once had. He would love her, they would have a beautiful amicable relationship, but Marehis held his heart captive now. He had changed in so many ways, in ways that scared him sometimes, but even now, standing with this vision before him—it’s beauty could steal his breath but in his heart he wished it were truly him, standing before Marehis, Ellie in her arms or even-

He should focus on what he came here to do, this—the imagery of the All-Mother in gestation was a powerful one and it had clearly addled his brain. Now was certainly not the time to bring further life into this world. But if he did do so…he had not wanted such since he woke. But he did very much like the idea that he might one day do so with Marehis—

And it scared him that his very next thought was, he would like that child to know Ellie. Be loved by her, raised at her side. That if she herself had any children in the future, they would know each other. And-

Once upon a time, mortality had stricken him scared beyond comprehension, he grasped at immortality like a man dying of thirst reaching for the last vessel of water on this world. Now it startled him that he felt little fear in the idea of growing old with someone, meeting death…it scared him. He did not know what truly lay beyond this life, would he be punished for his sins? Would he and Marehis go to the Fade with their kind? Or would they be reborn? A mortal life with those he loved, sounded almost like comfort now, and immortality, to live past their loss, he thought he would still have Marehis, he prayed what he planned would work but…Ellie. She, any who came from her, eventually they would be lost to him.

Task at hand. Presently the past was gone, and the future unclear, now Ellie needed him, needed healing. Needed Haven.

He’d just barely constructed his memory of Haven village when she appeared—Ellie, in soft, clean pajamas, socks that seemed too big for her, but comfortable on her feet though the moment she took in the sight around them,

“I should have worn boots, yeah?”

He chuckled. “I suppose. Are you…does it please you? Are you distressed, at all?”

Eleanor seemed to consider it, head nodding side to side before she looked to him. “I miss Haven, and it’s kind of sad to be here but…I like seeing it again, the way it should be.”

“Good,” he said, extending an arm to her, and pulling her to his side, “come.”

He did not bring her here to remind her of darker days. They walked the halls of the Chantry—he’d seen little of the War Room, but there was a table, a large blank sheet in its center and she giggled, moving forward from his hold and she dipped her fingers in the inkwell on the table and—“War room meetings suck?” he laughed out as he read what she had scrawled out in large lettering across the empty parchment in her mischief.

“Balls—big yucky ones,” she elaborated, “the Iron Bull’s after a week in the desert with no bath.”

“Oh da’vehnan that is absolutely nauseating imagery,” he laughed.

“And now you know what a War Room meeting feels like—you’ll never wish you’d attended one,” she enthused as if she’d done him some great service. This child. What was he to do with her?

She was at his side again, holding his hand as they walked into the snowy courtyard, looking up at the clear sky, “This is what it would have looked like, huh? The sky over Haven without the breach?”

“Yes, it is.”

“It’s strange being here, everything looking so much the same, even when everything is so, so incredibly different,” she said as she released his hand, stepped away as she stared into the sky, like she were endeavoring to get a closer look. And then she sighed, shrugging. “Well, this has been really nice Fen, but I’m done looking around for now.”

Fen? “Da’len?”

She turned around to face him, calm, though playing mild confusion, “Fen?” she offered as if he’d merely not quite heard her the first time. “Oh, do you not like informality? Fen’Harel then. That’s your name, isn’t it? Or do you really just prefer Solas now? Cole isn’t sure.”

…Cole.

“Da’vehnan, I’m not sure what-“

“Oh, you’re not sure? That’s okay, I’ll catch you up. You’re Fen’Harel, the Dread Wolf. You know about the Orb somehow, Cole says it was yours? Not because you saw Corypheus with it. See, when you pulled me aside to talk about finding Skyhold, and to come to you first if I learned anything about the Orb or the Inquisition got to it, you messed up big time. I hadn’t said jack to anyone about what happened in Haven. I mean I’d just woken up really, and you whisk me off, already know about something you couldn’t without having seen it, and apparently not only did no one else in our group see anything, you were out like a light,” she stopped, seemed genuinely sympathetic, “I…I am sorry you felt what Corypheus did to my Mark, that it hurt you so badly,” and then, “but I just…nothing felt right about that. So I talked to some of the others, and it turns out, some of us found question with your whole relationship with the Inquisition to begin with. And then I finally get Marehis alone to talk to her about it, try to find something to redeem you, verify that you aren’t totally sketchy—that it was all just coincidences or paranoia—and Marehis told me all about your ‘legends and lore’ the supposed ‘schism in your villiage’. Where is that by the way? Was that even real?”

“It…I…”

“And she’s talking about your faith and I remember…you don’t really have any that I know of. And then Cole shows up. Because Marehis and I were so hurt and confused by all of this—why would you lie to us? What did you have to hide? Was it bad? Could we trust you? We love you with all of our hearts, it would kill us if it turned out we couldn’t trust you. And just as he’s showing up, I’m telling Marehis that you don’t believe in the Dalish gods—you said to me once, you don’t bow to them. Surprise surprise, Cole outs you as being one. Is that true?"

“Da’vehnan-“

“Is that true?!” she shouted, voice echoing loud and fierce in the Fade. and then her expression crumbled, "Don't lie to me...please."

…

“They were never gods, da’len,” his voice was hollow, he felt hollow. "They were just mages, the most powerful of all our people. They overstepped their bounds, corrupt with their own power, and I brought them low.”

Her chin quivered, body shaking as she clenched her fists. “Did the Orb belong to you?”

“Yes.”

“And how does Corypheus have it?”

“I…gave it to him.”

Her head snapped down, eyes closed as she could not bear to look at him for a moment, he…how long could they sleep? How long would it take to right this? What should he do? If he- he couldn’t hurt her. More than he already had but, something must be done she could not tell the others. But…but it sounded like they already knew. He needed to fix this, get her on his side, see what he saw-

He wasn’t even sure anymore, what he saw.

At least, in this very moment, about his personal views on mortality and morality and the future.

He saw very well, what happened next.

Ellie looked up with him, anger in her expression as tears streaked her face. “Say hello to Cremisius.”

And then Haven blanked before him, their connection lost, and she surged into their bond to force him awake, sitting up in his bed as he gasped for breath.

And Cremisius Aclassi stood in wait, and he almost did not see the fist reared back, ready to strike past the murderous expression on his face.

“Hey there friend.”

A blow to his temple, the other cracked off the rotunda wall.

Fen’Harel fell unconscious.
His damn hand still hurt, but it was real fucking worth it.

He knew how to punch just...might have punched the guy a hell of a lot harder than he needed to. As hard as he could. Just making sure it knocked him out. You know. For security reasons.

Marehis and Cassandra were in charge of interrogating him. Fuck. He could really kill that guy. Marehis had been devastated—she loved him, thought she knew him, trusted him with everything, her heart, her body, and now he might be someone that, if she’d known who he was, she never wanted anywhere near her to begin with. So, now he had questions to answer. Bull was due to take a turn here soon, sometime. Last he heard, the guy was being talkative but there was a lot to talk about.

So, in the meantime, everyone stepped up, pitched in. Krem’d just come off a shift he’d taken for Rocky on the wall—stupid sap had hit on Elan, and Cabot had challenged him to a drinking competition for her honor or some crap. Dumbass forgot the guy was the fucking barman—now, no one was gonna accuse him of cheating, but Rocky walked away with a pretty nasty hangover to end all hangovers, and Cabot walked off, fit as a fiddle, closing down the bar because there was ‘nothing else to serve tonight’ and whisked Elan off for a stroll in the moonlight. Anyway, Rocky was sick as a dog, so. Krem took his shift, it was six in the morning and he was tired as shit, he shaved because it was morning and he’d needed it a little, then he’d been too hungry to sleep so he left his binder on, threw on a shirt and off he went—then bed!

But, he’d smelled fresh coffee when he rolled through the kitchens for a quick bite to eat before bed, and inspiration struck...well he just wanted to see her, alright?

He was part of the circulation of people trusted with guarding Ellie while Marehis was down in the dungeons with the Dread Wolf. That was just...beyond wild. So, he had a key to her place—Ellie’s. Let himself in, up the stairs and just...took a moment.

Maker, she was beautiful. Sleeping peacefully, thankfully, everything that had happened...she deserved some break from it all. Anya was curled up at the foot of her bed, good pup, protecting her mama. He almost felt badly to wake her, but she’d need to get up soon, for the day ahead, she had a War Room meeting at 7:30, and Mother Giselle wanted her to give a talk or something to the Chantry Sisters in the gardens at 10, and lunch and then the whole afternoon was blocked off because the tailor was finally getting in, and they weren’t sure how long that would need to go on, Maker. Madam de Fer had apparently helped her with ordering new underthings, and she liked stealing Krem’s socks, a few of his shirts to sleep in because—with big eyes, pouty lip she lamented that she just ‘didn’t have anything else’. Like he was gonna fight that? Nah. But she’d been rolling in her armor on the day to day.

When she was begrudgingly clasping up her armored tunic for the ‘bajillionth’ day in a row, he floated the idea that she could just go around naked. He certainly wouldn’t be complaining. That got him a playful swat to his side and, You’d get plenty of complaining! It’s too cold to have my tits and my bits all over the place! Plus papi would have a hay-day over it all, hurt himself going between trying to get me covered up and punching people out for staring. Which made a good point, he had been internally lamenting Skyhold not being a summery location, but uh, yeah, might end up punching some people so.

He knelt by her bed, carefully reaching out, brushing curls back from her face, “El, love? Time to wake up.”

She let out a little groan cracking an eye open just a sliver to look at him. “Have to?”
“Mmhmm,” and then the magic words—literally as close to casting magic as he was sure he’d ever get in his life. “I brought coffee.”

Oh man, that got him a big smile, happy humming as she rolled over more, sat up a bit to kiss him just—fuck, sometimes he was positive there was magic involved, like pouring sunlight into his soul. And then the coffee cup was snatched from his hand and her lips were on it when she sat upright. Dumb coffee—it didn’t even need sunlight!

Well…coffee was a plant right? So a little…but not anymore! Fuck off, ya plant juice!

She sighed contentedly. “Thank you, Cremisius,” she patted the bed, so he rose and sat on the edge, the motion made Anya open her eyes to investigate, look and see it was just Krem, and then went right back to sleep. They’d be concerned she was too docile but uh…Leliana tested having a total stranger come in while Ellie was ‘napping’ her first afternoon having a room of her own, before the memorial service, just to see how Anya would react. Pup had fallen asleep, but Ellie saw the moment she heard the down stairs door being messed with, she perked up, woke up, and the second the guy got to the top of the stairs Anya was growling, barking to alert Ellie and then shot off the bed, would have torn out the guy’s throat if Ellie hadn’t called out Parshaara, Qunlat word Bull taught her that means ‘Enough’, Anya had been trained to respond to it by stopping immediately whatever it was she was doing whether it was eating something she shouldn’t or running or tearing into an intruder. Guy walked away with a cheery ‘thanks’ from Ellie, a silver in hand from Leliana for his service, and soiled underwear Bull was pretty sure. Anya could put the hurt on.

Ellie pouted, “Lazy baby, mama’s gotta go to a War Room meeting and you can just sleep your little puppy life away huh? You sure you don’t wanna go decide between— “ she caught herself, “technically I’m not supposed to talk about it. But um. There might be a few countries interested in getting the Inquisition to voice an official opinion on them? Like? What even?”

“Seriously?” like an alliance or something? Damn. “How do you even decide that?”

“Coin toss. Or rating the people I know from those countries on levels of their hotness and going with the highest scorer. I know so many sexy foreigners.”

“El, you’re an Antivan with Free Marcher citizenship, living in Ferelden. You are a sexy foreigner.”

“Says one of the sexiest foreigners I know!” she enthused, leaning forward to peck him on the lips, giggling. “Thanks for the coffee and making sure I woke up on time. I don’t mind Cole waking me up but this was really nice.”

“Just wanted to see you before I head for bed. Took a shift for Rocky and I’m dog tired,” looked to Anya, “yeah I’m talking about your people, sleepyhead.”

Did she just wuff at him in her sleep? Could she hear him? Just how much did Mabari understand anyway?

“Oh gosh, um, you’re going to sleep now though, right? You don’t have anymore work?”

“Nah, Chief’s uh…” why did he feel guilty saying it? It was the truth, and he could do it! It just…it was weird to accept. “Chief gave me the day off today. For stepping in for Rocky, and I’ve got a hot date tonight so, beauty rest, making sure all the plans are in order, I got a busy schedule.”
“Hopefully not too busy…” she said, “You’ll be awake this afternoon? The tailor will be in this afternoon and I…gosh, it feels silly but it’s kind of the closest thing to dragging my boyfriend out shopping with me? I’d really like your opinion on some things.”

“Don’t gotta drag me anywhere, lovely, that sounds good to me. You sure? Not complaining, I mean I’m not gonna turn down the opportunity, possibility of a nip-slip-“

She gasped, wide eyed—“Don’t you dare wish that on me, I would actually die!”

He chuckled at her exaggeration, took a second but then, “But uh, just don’t…you don’t think you need my okay on the things you wear, right?” Been drug into the ‘bring your betrothed to the tailor’ situation before, by mother, toting Cornelius. That man had say on every last thing Krem wore when they were out together. Had an image he was going for, on top of the in general image he had to uphold just because of his status. Shit he didn’t even want to wear in the first place, double, triple didn’t want to wear it. Definitely wasn’t gonna play that shit with Ellie, she could wear a damn potato sack if she felt amazing and comfortable wearing it, anyone that had a problem with it could fight him. Girlfriend’d look fine in a potato sack, start a whole damn new fashion trend.

“Of course not, I just think it’d be kind of fun, you know?”

“Sounds like a plan then, I’ll ask Cole to let me know when I should get a move on.”

She let out an excited squeal, and it earned him another kiss, “Thanks!”

Well hell yeah! He’d meet this tailor every damn day if it made her that excited.

So he was sent off to bed ‘Inquisitor’s orders!’ to get some good rest. Passed Sera on his way out—she was first watch this morning.

“She gasped, wide eyed—“Don’t you dare wish that on me, I would actually die!”

He chuckled at her exaggeration, took a second but then, “But uh, just don’t…you don’t think you need my okay on the things you wear, right?” Been drug into the ‘bring your betrothed to the tailor’ situation before, by mother, toting Cornelius. That man had say on every last thing Krem wore when they were out together. Had an image he was going for, on top of the in general image he had to uphold just because of his status. Shit he didn’t even want to wear in the first place, double, triple didn’t want to wear it. Definitely wasn’t gonna play that shit with Ellie, she could wear a damn potato sack if she felt amazing and comfortable wearing it, anyone that had a problem with it could fight him. Girlfriend’d look fine in a potato sack, start a whole damn new fashion trend.

“Of course not, I just think it’d be kind of fun, you know?”

“Sounds like a plan then, I’ll ask Cole to let me know when I should get a move on.”

She let out an excited squeal, and it earned him another kiss, “Thanks!”

Well hell yeah! He’d meet this tailor every damn day if it made her that excited.

So he was sent off to bed ‘Inquisitor’s orders!’ to get some good rest. Passed Sera on his way out—she was first watch this morning.

“Hey,” she greeted, sounded a bit tired but sad was more like it.

“Hold up,” he said, stopping her before she could go in, stepped up, took her up in his arms and gave her, what Ellie would classify as, ‘the biggest hug in the world’.

“Kremmy-boy!”

“That’s better,” he said as he let her down, she was smiling so, she was good to go.

“Thanks, just friggin- baldy! Everything’s so crazy and it makes my brain hurt and my heart sad and blah. Thanks for the squeeze. You wanna come keep watch with me?”

“Yes, but, I’m off to bed. Inquisitor’s orders.”

“Lettin’ the power go right to her head already,” Sera sighed, shaking her head. “Get some good sleep Kremmy-boy, have sweet dreams ‘n pish.”

“Thanks.”

Morning was full of Rogue surprises. Varric and Cole were waiting for him when he got to the Charger’s setup, Spirit stood with an arm up, fingers on some of his hair pinched between them.

“It grows back!” he announced when Krem got in range.

“Yeah buddy, it does.”
“I did not know that it would—Ellie said it would, so I cut some, and it did!”

“Kid’s real excited about it, my old gear went up in flames—I don’t got a sweet little girlfriend running into burning buildings to save my shit, so. I was wondering if you’d do me a favor? Let me borrow your shaving kit real quick.”

Oh. Shit uh, there was a part of him, like a little kid screaming ‘no!’ because, yeah, didn’t want anyone touching the only thing he had of his father’s. But yeah, he wasn’t gonna be an ass about it, and he trusted Varric, Cole. So, “Sure thing, I’ll just grab it real quick.” Wasn’t smart to share razors but there were scissors and things, clean backup razors Varric knew where to get in the lower parts from the time they’d worked together on Thom’s mug.

He only thought about it once he’d handed it off to Varric, shit, “Uh, wait, my uh, father’s pocketwatch is in there.”

“Uhh…” Varric started.

Maker. “Here,” he motioned and Varric carefully opened the box, and Krem pulled out the watch for Cole to see.

“Ooohhh, it is beautiful, it is not surprising pockets like to watch it,” he was even more excited when Krem popped it open, “It moves! Outside and inside tick tick tick tick, it is very soothing, and the magic feels warm, nice, like love.”

Huh. Cool. He uh, seemed real fascinated with it and…the guy was going for his first actual hair cut, he barely liked taking his hat off so Krem wasn’t sure how he’d cope with actual parts of him coming off. “Soothing huh? Hey Cole, bud, why don’t you hang on to it for me for a bit?”

Cole gasped in excitement as he took the pocketwatch in hand, “It worked!”

Worked?

“Works! He means it works. The watch. And him holding onto it. Uh. Thanks for the loaner, Boyfriend, promise you’ll get it back. Get some rest okay?”

He…yeah, tired. Trusted them. So bed.

There was something…sort of picked at the back of Krem’s mind as he slipped into his cot.

But it never did fully occur to him that one Varric Tethras, face as smooth as a baby’s bottom, had specifically needed his shaving kit.

He’s here! They’re ready! Go!

Fuuuuuuuuck him, Cole’s voice in his mind wasn’t…it didn’t feel bad but it was still startling as shit. But that was a damn good way to get someone up. So. That worked. Felt rested, got up, binder on, and it was just a casual thing, someone would be standing guard for Ellie and it wasn’t like his binder didn’t offer some protection, plus he had his sword, so he just pulled on his trousers…wasn’t entirely sure how long this would go, if he’d have time to change again before his date tonight, and Ellie’d had her dress laid out, said she wanted to show this new tailor what he was competing against since Krem’s handiwork had been brought to bear, so he guessed she would be wearing that now, keep it on for their date. She’d saved the nice crimson tunic Bull got him for First Day-Eve so, he went with that. Red for letting love in his life huh? Dinner and a nice stroll through Skyhold would hold plenty of that for him he was sure, just being together? That felt like everything.

He…wasn’t exactly sure if he should just walk in or not, Cole had come to get him, but still. He knocked a few times on the door before he reached for his key, but he heard Anya let out a few barks and Ellie call, ‘Coming!’ so he slowed his roll, waited…pretty sure she slipped and caught herself because he heard the steady patter-pat of her feet as she hopped down the stairs and then the skid and ‘oh!’ and her giggling before patter-pat, patter-pat all the way to the door. She opened it up to peek her head out,

“Why hello Cremisius, fancy meeting you here.”

“Quite the happy coincidence indeed,” he agreed with a grin. “Am I interrupting?”

“Nope! You’re right on time! You look so handsome by the way,” she said as she threw open the door to invite him inside. Maker she did look cute in her dress, she didn’t have cloth draping off of her six ways to Sunday yet, but maybe this was just a ‘measurements and style’ consultation or something.

“You look beautiful, how’s it going?” he asked the last part quietly.

“So great, come on, I can’t say for sure but I think you might really like him,” she said as she looped her arm through his, pulling the door closed behind them. “I hope you don’t mind, but I invited my boyfriend, to get his opinion!” she called to be heard upstairs.

Him? Huh…he…well that would be hypocritical to be jealous or feel weirdly about or anything. For goodness sake, his father was a tailor-

His…his father was-

His heart stopped when they reached the top of the stairs.

His father…was a tailor.

“Hello, Cremisius.”

His father was the tailor.

“Papà!” tore from his throat like he was five years old again, Ellie had already let go of his arm and he was launching himself across the room fast enough…Maker, it felt like if he didn’t if he wasn’t quick enough the man would be some false thing, some horrible trick, there one second and gone the next he-

He was alive! He was here! Salt and pepper hair neat and tidy, slicked back. Clean shaven, in his suit, pocketwatch chain hanging between where it was looped around a lower button of his suit jacket, and where the watch itself sat half-peeking from his pocket. It was like he never-!

But he had, he had been a slave, sold himself to save their skin, “I’m so sorry!” he wailed against his father’s neck.

“My son, I am sorry. I will do everything in my power to make up for what I have done, not standing up for you, my hand in forcing that horrible life upon you. Oh, meus bello mimo!”
It took a good solid while of holding onto him to really feel like this was a solid thing, he was here, he was real. He hadn’t done a real thorough security check on the room though, there could still be a Magister in the closet waiting to pop out and go ‘surprise!’ and take him back, he didn’t have to go back? How...how was he ever away from back? How was he here?!

He pulled away, raising a hand to hold his father’s face, it was real. Few more lines, marks of age, but that smile, those eyes. It was all the same. His father raised a hand to cup his face in return.

“Maker, my boy. You’re as tall as I am! You’re so handsome and- and Ellie tells me you are a soldier now, a mercenary, how- however did that happen? How exactly did you get hired by a Qunari? The Steel Druffalo?”

“The...The Iron Bull he...you-“

Ellie.

He turned around, found her sitting on her bed, holding Anya...as much of her as she could, the mabari’s lap on the bed, her front paws on the other side of Ellie’s legs while the girl held her around the neck, sniffling, crying—happy crying but still.

“Ellie...you...”

She looked startled like she’d been spotted or something and, “Don’t mind me! I’m just-! I would leave but I might get assassined- I can get in the closet-“ the room with the ladder in it?

“You can get over here,” he said, and Anya jumped down from off of her, she wiped her eyes with the back of her hands as she stood up and came to them. “Lovely...I literally watched you seal the Breach, and come back from the dead. And I still can’t believe how the hell you managed this.”

“Lots of help. Um. M-Magister Tilani? I was asking Dorian abo-about slavery, when we first met, because...I really did want to help, ever since you told me? And there wasn’t anything he could do exactly—his family is from the Qunaris, and he knows the Magister Tilani, but she isn’t family and he owed her so many favors, he couldn’t petition her. But V-Varric he, his cousin—Maevaris Tilani.”

Mae-

Oh, Maker.

“That’s why she wanted to meet you in Val Royeaux.”

“Uh-huh!”

“Why...why didn’t you tell me you were doing all of this? I could have hel-“ oh fuck, “You didn’t pay-“ they owed the world! Enough money to probably put Ellie into debt if she paid it all off on her own!

“I am in service to the Inquisition now,” his father said, “Magister Tilani forgave my personal debts to her, and the Inquisition will send payments to her for my work here, to work off the debt she paid for me, provide my room and board, Healers, as benefits not burdens on my debts. Cremisius, I could be free come next year.”

“I didn’t tell you at first because I was afraid,” Ellie explained carefully, like she was worried it might make him mad. “I am sorry, I just…if I dangled the possibility in your face and this fell through? I’d never be able to forgive myself for that, hurting you that way. And then—it isn’t an excuse, honest, but I promised your father I would keep it from you, for the same reasons, and then when it was really happening, and close enough to be more certain, he really did want it to be a surprise. So. Surprise?”

“Father have you seen the view from that balcony?” Krem asked, raising an arm out behind him to point, wasn’t even sure it was a wall with a balcony on it but he had a 50/50 shot in this room. Father actually huffed a laugh, turned his back and Krem pulled Ellie forward and kissed her like her life depended on it. He could think of a few situation’s he’d be willing to say ‘let it go’ on his own, but on hers? Literally not on her life.

She had to catch her breath a quick moment when he finally pulled away, hand on his chest as she leaned against him, “Wowza…you have any friends that need freedom? Cousins?”

“Aiming the free all of Tevinter now?”

“…I will actually try, I have thoughts Cremisius, they keep me up at night—they being ‘it’ and ‘it’ being the fact that slavery exists.”

Maker.

Their date night plans went off without a hitch, just, way better than what he’d been thinking. Cole ratted him out to Ellie, his plans, which weren’t super top secret or unimaginable, but still. Bro code. Couldn’t hold it against him though—he just worked things out in the kitchens, made arrangements for a nice dinner for two to be delivered to Ellie’s room, set them up good, have a good meal, moonlight, all that. She tacked on a third order and boom. Dinner for three, nice bottle of wine she added on because he hadn’t been planning to drink on a date just the two of them, but it was something nice his father could indulge in, Krem accepted a glass, and when his father made to pour one for Ellie, she shook her head ‘no’ and said no thanks but then she gasped and assured,

“I’m not pregnant! I just don’t drink!”

…”Uh. Didn’t think you were, El?” Krem questioned.

“Sorry! Varric—he um. Cassandra isn’t drinking, you know?” He did. “And Varric has thought she was pregnant, ever since he found out.”

He...

Krem couldn’t help it, felt bad for the guy but damn, he couldn’t stop laughing! He! What the hell?!

“This Varric is quite the character—Tethras, the author, yes?” father asked.

“Uh-huh!” Ellie nodded.

“What attracted him to the Inquisition?”

“Cassandra kidnapped him and interrogated him for the location of his best friend. Garrett Hawke, the Champion of Kirkwall.”

“And then Dorian, he is Tevinter? How did he come to join your cause?”

“Time travel!”
“Truly?”

“Yup!”

“And The Iron Bull?”

“Well, that’s quite the doozy,” Ellie said, “you see he heard about the Inquisition’s efforts to seal the Breach and he wanted to help,” wasn’t allowed to mention Ben-Hessrath stuff, “and he sent the most handsomest Charger he could think of to deliver their offer to the Inquisition.”

“I was snotting all over everything.”

“You were sick!” Ellie defended. “And had a cute butt! It balanced out.”

Was she drinking? He sniffed the champagne flute in front of her just to make sure it was just bubbly apple juice, that tracked. “When did you-? What?”

“Watched you walk all the way to Haven’s outer gate, guapo.”

“You were ill?” Father asked as he set down his wine glass.

“Just a cold,” Krem assured him. “Ellie helped a lot. Wasn’t exactly comfortable going to Adan when I didn’t know him from Andraste, but she made sure I got treatment I felt safe getting, didn’t let me leave without having eaten and fill up my canteen, good news for my boss, and I think even a meal for the road.”

Father had a few questions about that. Healers, and feeling safe being treated. Krem broke it down the whole ‘sometimes people are assholes about treating people like him’, that uh, he’d actually joined the military to support himself and mother, losing that gig and having to go on the run because a healer hadn’t reacted well to what was or wasn’t in his pants. Told him about Bull, how he saved him, gave him a new place to start over, good work with good people.

“Mother um…she doesn’t accept my checks anymore. I don’t know if you’ve heard…” he looked to Ellie who shook her head ‘no’ that she hadn’t told him.

“I have. Remus told me.”

“…Remus?” Krem asked.

“I went to Remus, before I went to Magister Tilani to ask him to take on my debts, allow me to serve his house. I asked your cousin to look out for you, as he could, and made contact with him when I was released from House Tilani, to keep him appraised—he informed me of their marriage, but I knew well before then. I am only surprised they waited this long.”

That…there were several things messed up about that sentence (but some level of the messed up was a little nice since, yeah, cool he didn’t seem shocked or torn up over mother). And really, the last thing he wanted was a fight with his father, and it could just be a case of simple correction, but, “Her.”

“Cornelius is as much to b-”

“Not mother and Cornelius—you referred to Magister Tilani as ‘him’. She is ‘her’.”

His father’s eyes widened at that, “Oh I meant no offense—I was truly talking of the male Magister Tilani—her father. Athanir.”
Athanir...why was that name familiar?

He...he-

“You mean that Altus that test—oh Magister? That tested me for magic way back when I was like, eleven?”

“Yes, Cremisius. He recognized our situation. That while we did not acknowledge as much, we had been blessed with a son. He offered sympathy to me—that he had struggled at first in the wake of his own child revealing to him that she was a woman born into what we would perceive a man’s body. But he had been quick to accept, and support. He hoped his Maevaris would grow up to live in a world that accepted her as such, and he hoped she might carve a path for even Sopporati may live as themselves, that you could live in a country where your true gender could be acknowledged. When I had to do something—indenture myself or enslave us all, I remembered him, thought perhaps he would be sympathetic still, find use for me somewhere in his home and spare my wife and child—surely he would not allow you to be enslaved, knowing your status. Unfortunately Athanir had passed, some years before—but his daughter Maevaris took up his seat in the Magisterium, and she readily accepted my plea.”

That...he had always on some level wondered how they expected one person to repay the whole of the debt they owed, why he and Mother had never been taken later on but...Maker.

This was all...a hell of a lot to wrap his head around. He...his father was alive, healthy, happy. Sitting here chatting away with Ellie, and he could see—the man had already looked to make certain her attention was occupied checking on Anya—his father looked to him and it was this...look. He liked her. Adored her—adored a girl that he was dating. His girlfriend! Adored him being the boyfriend in that scenario! This was-Incredible. And overwhelming. And Father had been traveling a long way to get here, it was hard in a way letting the evening with him end, but understandable when he admitted he was tired.

“We...I regret we did not actually get around to discussing your clothing, my lady,” Maker he did sound tired, but “If-“ he seemed like he might offer to stay, work, fearful he may have abused any kindness offered to him.

“Oh gosh! You must be exhausted, I’m so sorry, I really didn’t mean to keep you!” Ellie assured, rising to her feet, “If you’ll follow me, I can show you to your room!”

She offered her arm to his father, and...oh, that was, yeah, good. Gave his father someone to walk with, lean on if he needed to, since Krem couldn’t really. Yeah, shit, he was the only one here—she’d made sure they had privacy which meant, no one was standing guard but him. And he’d been pretty distracted the past few hours. So, he followed, ready and on guard.

They walked down the great hall, but turned left, before the exit, into asshole’s old place, and up the stairs to the library, and across the indoor balcony—two big Orlesian-style partitions blocked off Madam de Fer’s set up, they walked between them and the banister and then out to the wing of rooms over the garden. His father’s was the last one, but yeah, the others had been claimed so.

“Sorry it’s quite the walk, and if you get lost, call out for Cole. He knows to come—he’s a Spirit, but he’s very friendly and he will never hurt you. You can trust him, he’s our friend,” Ellie assured his father as she opened the door to his room.
“This…is mine?” his father asked, surprised.

“Uh-huh, is it…I mean do you like it? We can change things around if you like, get different color bedding or some pictures or anything you need.”

“No I…thank you, this is…this is more than enough, this is all—you’ve done too much for this family, bella.”

“You made the actual best human being I’ve ever had the honor of loving and being loved by. You’ve done so much for me already. Thank you. Do you need anything? There’s stuff to wash up, and we had to guess for sleeping clothes, but they should at least be comfortable.”

“Thank you.”

“I’ll leave you to it,” Ellie said and then she stopped and, “oh wait…oh I can call Cole—“

“Whoa, I mean by all means if you want him now, go ahead,” Krem interrupted, “but I was planning to walk with you, lovely, I wasn’t going to leave you.”

“I can walk back on my own, I mean I’m in the building I live in, and—“

“El. Not happening—I’ll walk you.”

“Have a pleasant evening,” father said to them, “be safe, and have a good time. I will see you tomorrow.”

“Breakfast, and I’ll introduce you to the guys tomorrow, if you’re free.”

His father huffed, almost sounding amused as he said, “I believe I am.”

Door closed, arm wrapped around Ellie, they made their way quietly through Madam de Fer’s, the library, and left in the great hall, down the steps. Ellie smiled as she snuggled into his side. Bit cold, but they wouldn’t be out here long. Just. Maker.

“El?”

“Yeah?”

“I love you.”

“I love you too.”

Maker help him but, “I’m probably gonna ask you to marry me someday.”

“I’m probably gonna say yes someday,” she returned.

“On one condition.”

“Yeah?” she asked.

Seriously. “I need an exact play by play, of just how Varric told you he thought Cassandra was pregnant.”

“I will do voices,” she warned, ”and Cassandra was there.”

Oh man. They might be out here longer than he expected. He held her more tightly.
“Hit it.”

Chapter End Notes

Dalish:
Bellanaris din'an heem!=a curse, basically a wish to make someone dead.

Tevinter:
Meus bello mimo=slang/colloquial that means 'my handsome child!'
Bella=beautiful

*Schmooples is Leliana's pet Nug, she gets them during Dragon Age Origins. Once in Skyhold you can read a note on her desk she's received from the people she's entrusted her Nug's care to during the events of DA:I.

*When you receive the mission 'Bring Me the Heart of Snow White' from Vivienne, you can read notes she's taken in order to craft this potion for Bastien. Everything she's reading from in this 'tome' can be found mentioned in the notes she's taken in-game. Since Primaetas Root was used to cure the Blight it just made sense to connect a few things, and I wanted to do something more personal with Vivienne than the conversation you have with her in-game after you arrive in Haven.

*I had just finished writing Varric's POV and mention Isabella so, I'm looking up Rivain, and WHO DO I FIND ON THE LIST OF NOTABLE RIVANI PEOPLE? MADAM FREAKING DE FER! So, I had to throw that in.

*Cole's backstory is canon, he used to be the Ghost of White Spire after the rebellion. Templars brought mage recruits in in droves to kill and make Tranquil as many mages as possible it seems. Rhys and Evangeline are involved in War Room missions, you can send someone to find them for Cole, which makes him upset until it turns out they were in real trouble and the Inquisition saves them, and then he's pleased you meddled. There is a second mission where you can deploy them as agents of the Inquisiton.

*Stroud is the default Warden that you meed in-game, but if you play with specific choices from your Origin's playthrough loaded into your state of the world during character creation, Alistair and Loghain are also potential Wardens that could be Hawke's contact.

*Alright friends, buckle in. Next chapter will have all the low down on Solas being Fen'Harel, what he discloses in his interviews. But this bit comes from speculation that Solas did once master Skyhold. His whole motivation for creating the Veil in the first place is the fact that the Evanuris (the Elven mages that are now known as gods) teamed up to murder her in her temple, and he went full blown revenge/punishment mode on them, used the Orb to fuck their shit up, created the veil, the Fade, all that jazz. So. Lots of play room and speculation on the ins and outs of that motivation and whatnot.

*Been a hot minute--Krem PoV mentions being tested for magic and Athanir in chapter 13.
Daddy Issues Part 1

Chapter Summary

All the Evanuris tea, Mister Aclassi is in the building, some sweet Cullen/Cassandra fluff to end this part off. Part two will involve Marchis's view on everything, Sera's betrayal, annonnnnd Diego's loyalty mission. Bull's too. So, lots of Daddy issues to go around, but that won't be out for awhile now, but I'm posting this now to keep consistent with updates.

Couldn't fit this in the end notes-- there's an " by the line from Cole to Solas, "They can trust you again but you have to earn it" = "Seriously considered bumping this fic up a chapter to do an epilogue of Trespasser. But no. This hoe egg is gonna earn some damn redemption because it has to make sense so. It's not entirely mapped yet, and I'm not sure if it'll be added to the end of this fic or made a separate sequel fic. But Trespasser is officially happening.

Chapter Notes

Back at it! Thanks so much for leaving Kudos and commenting!

Also I might have gotten possessed by Tonio Aclassi. Like. His Pov was not planned for at all? And then it just happened, and it happened so hard. This chapter is 70 pages long, and 57 of them belong to him and I'm sorry?

On a funny note, I haven't played DA:I in so long. Ya'll I done bamboozled myself because I have so much of this fic permanently in my brain! I get to the Hinterlands for the first time and I'm running around the lake, back and forth, looking because I'm like, "WHERE is Thom?! Where he at?! Why aren't he and his conscripty guys l o a d i n g- oh. Blackwall isn't available until after you return from Val Royeaux in canon...duh."

ALSO SHOUT OUTS! To Jessie for the idea of actually implementing the dungeon hole in Solas's interrogation that 100% slipped my mind as a possibility and I loved it, and it inspired a good cut-off point for their scene that I am 100% sorry for. Double sorry to do this sort of late, but I didn't want to give away the near-the-end-of the last chapter, and ran out of room in the end notes but a big thanks to Secret_Life_of_Fireflies for the idea of Krem being the one to punch Solas in the face. She made the suggestion in a comment on a previous chapter and that's how that panned out!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was a feeling, like floating. Wind was whipping across his body, clothing snapping in the breeze, the chill of it cool across his face. His head pounded with ache and his eyes felt heavy.

And then the crack of a hand slapping him across the face.
A voice that he last heard sweetly wishing him pleasant sleep, that she loved him, now speaking with hard disdain.

“Wake up.”

And what a wake up it was, oh- oh- oh-

His heart was thundering in his chest, blood roaring in his ears as even his magic cried out in alarm and panic. He was floating. Correction he was suspended, only Marehis’s hands on his tunic keeping him from dropping, plummeting into the waterfall.

The last thing he remembered, was the Lieutenant. More accurately, his fist.

And now he was being held over the Spymaster’s beloved ‘dungeon hole’.

“V-vehnan, I can expl-“

Oh heavens! That wasn’t- that did not help his situation, Marehis loosed her grip for a millisecond that jolted him, spoke to the threat that she would surely drop him if he could not mind his tongue. “Do not presume to call me that.”

“O- o- of course.” He- yes, that was understandable.

“Do feel free to take your time, Marehis,” Seeker Pentagast’s voice drawled.

“We can always step in for you if your arms tire,” the Spymaster’s offered.

“That depends entirely on him,” Marehis said. “Are you prepared to answer our questions?”

“You needn’t- I would answer your questions,” Solas assured, though he certainly did desire ground beneath his feet, the fall was far.

She pulled him forward and turned, releasing him in the same motion she pushed him so he staggered blindly toward the door.

Alright. They were in the dungeons. He did have some reticence…he was not in the position to negotiate, but neither would he speak if there were-

Oh. There weren’t. other prisoners, that is. The Inquisition had taken care to evacuate and transport the enemies they’d been holding in Haven’s dungeons. Knight Captain Denham. Magister Alexius. And then there had been that strange Avarr fellow that they found…throwing Ram at Skyhold’s walls, vengeance for cutting down the Hand of Koth in the Fallow Mire. But now, their cells were empty, the only prisoner here was him. Ironic, to be a prisoner in his own home, but justified.

“I appreciate the discretion,” he offered as he took a seat on the chair he assumed was for him—there was a table, with chairs on either side, but only one had restraints—cuffs linked to the back of the chair meant to hold his hands low at his sides. If he did endeavor to cast—which he would not—he would do little more than cast at the ground directly beneath him. When he was seated, Seeker and Spymaster were on either side, binding him.

Oh, but he did regret their privacy, when Marehis found purchase on the seat across from his and informed him, “You should. Ellie had to sit in judgement over our former prisoners, decide their fates on short notice, so we might handle this.”
“Is…is she alright?”

“She’s none of your concern,” Marehis snapped. “Neither are your questions welcome as you’ve far too much to answer for yourself.”

Well. He supposed that…that was fair. But still, there was nothing keeping him from…he would just dip into the bond quietly, nothing Ellie would be aware of, he would be swift, just…he didn’t even know where to begin. But this had to be frightening and confusing and she’d been so upset, sad, and angry in the Fade. And it was due to his secrecy, his betrayal.

And now? She was tired and sad, nervous, and sick to her stomach, light headed—was she ill? What time was it? Had she eaten today? She had a habit of lacking an appetite when she was upset but Cole had been of help with that, it hadn’t been the case for some time now but—should he needed to speak with Marehis, he had to make this right, but who was with Ellie? He was uncertain the time of day but it had been daylight when they were in the open part of the dungeon and he could sense she was over him—in the War Room then. Which usually meant she was not alone, at least Lady Montilyet would be with her, and too there would be her…her Papi, Cullen.

He almost wished it had been manipulation on her part, calling him such before revealing she knew his secret. But she had meant it—every word. She loved him, she hated mistrusting him. It had not been manipulation so much as assurance—there was worry, in the bond. For him. She had been making certain that before they perused this truth, before he found himself in trouble with the whole of those whose trust he’d betrayed, that she loved him, and that came with the hope that this could be made right.

“What is your name?” Marehis started with.

“Solas—that is not a lie. Fen’Harel is a title, something our people called me when I brought our leaders low.”

“You…Solas you’re not even thirty.”

“I ceased aging at twenty-five* but I have been of this world again for a few years. There is a ritual, our people could slumber agelessly. Such ritual served as…living for so long can be daunting, some would choose to sleep through times they may deem unpleasant or boring. Some choose to take turns—all their loved ones to have children who could enter the world without breaking the balance, and one day someone else would find rest so they could rise again for a time. I, for instance, have been asleep for Ages.”

“Ages?”

He could not help the smirk that rose to his lips. “I am the reason when our people speak the word ‘Solas’, it means ‘pride’. It once meant tranquility*, my mother found that fitting. I suppose it used to be.”

Ahh. Well. They all looked rather dumbstruck. Should he get right into it then?

“Our people, long ago, used to be a society of mages—every one of us magical, and immortal, but the greatest of us were members of the Evanuris. If you wonder at the structure of Tevinter? It is rather a similar construct. They were the most powerful of our people, and all others lived in servitude of them. Elgar’nan, Falon’din, Dirthamen, Andruil, Sylaise, June, Ghilan’nain—I was born into the servitude of the All-Mother. Mythal. She earned the title of all mother due to her kindness, her compassion for her people—the Evanuris loved to war with one another, would send their people into battle over any trifling matter that struck them, but Mythal never did as such, always endeavored to reason with the others, many wars were avoided because of her charisma, her compassion and ability to bring people together.” Solas cleared his throat. “And then they killed her—Elgar’nan, the others. They conspired, and came together to murder her in her temple.”

“…why would they do such a thing if she was on such good terms with them all?”

“Lust for power. Fear. She…it was my fault, ultimately,” Solas confessed. “Mythal…I grew up in her home, served her the whole of my life, saw her beauty and compassion, and somehow, some way, she saw me. Despite my lack magically, she saw promise in me, allowed me to serve directly with her, trained me, and ultimately we fell in love. She removed my Vallislin, and claimed me her equal.”

“You were powerful enough to make the E…Evanuris,” she tested the foreign word, “fearful of your union?”

Solas scoffed, “Hardly. Vallislins…all slaves to the Evanuris bore them, were marked, as a sign of ownership. When the Dalish mark themselves, that is the ritual they uphold When Mythal claimed me equal, she meant that I could be free, if I wished it I was not a true equal to Mythal, magically—but our child might have given them cause for concern.”

“You have a child?”

“Had. Almost. None of the Evanuris had heirs—population control was rather imperative where immortality is concerned, mine was one of the last generations born at the time. When we discovered Mythal was with child, we did everything we could to hide it—Skyhold, is where we took refuge, none but myself were allowed to leave its confines. But we were betrayed. Mythal was called by her people to her temple under false pretenses, by the time I discovered the truth it was too late. I was too late. She was dead, our child with her.”

Marehis was silent a moment, and then she nodded.

I am here. Listening, and confirming. I will tell them if you lie. They trust me. They can trust you again, but you have to earn it. Ahh, Cole.

“I am sorry,” Marehis offered, sincerely.

“As am I. I ignored every tenant Mythal once upheld. I abandoned compassion for vengeance. I was certain they would stop at nothing to have their power, and without Mythal to voice reason in their midst, they needed to be stopped. That is where I suppose this story begins,” he said. “I…I was not strong enough, not of my own power, to take on the Evanuris. That is where the Orb of Destruction comes into play. I could not kill them, but I could ensnare them. I used and lost the bulk of my power to fuel it, and in the destruction…well the action is what created the Veil to begin with. The Fade.”

“…you…created the Fade?”

“Yes. Sealed the Evanuris and their most loyal followers within it. They became Spirits who accepted their fate, or Demons, desperately seeking to return to this world through the bodies of others. Cole, the Spirit that resides in his form, is Elvehnan*. A follower of Mythal that was a casualty of my recklessness.”

“Elvehnan?”

“Elves is short for something, v- Marehis. My actions cut us off from the source of our power, without the Evanuris, a great many of us lost access to magic, and our descendants even more so. We began to age. I did my best to assist our people in the transition, but I had lost so many to the Fade. So many souls I never intended to cast beyond the veil. I tried to get them passage to this world, but it was futile, I did not regret bringing down the Evanuris, but I did regret the consequences. I chose to slumber, laid dormant and unaging for…far longer than I can record. When I woke, it was to the horrifying discovery that our people had fallen so low, become secondary citizens in their world, our people run around painting their faces with the marks. I thought perhaps the Evanuris had been punished for long enough, and could be returned. But I was too weak to power the Orb myself. That is when I made the grave mistake of entrusting it to Corypheus.”

“…entrusting it?” Marehis questioned. “Corypheus has the power to control the Orb?”

“There is—there is something you must understand,” he implored, looking to Leliana, Cassandra. “I… I come from a time when Humankind was undiscovered. Before Shartan rode with Andraste and created the Dalish people, I was long asleep. Humankind, Qunari, Dwarves—I did not understand how you came to be of this world. When I woke, and realized all I had robbed my people of—their immortality, their connection to magic, their history, saw them still branding themselves like they were owned by the Evanuris, that now they worshiped them as all-seeing gods when they can do little more than hope to possess a mortal vessel. All I wanted was to make things right—bring down the veil and return my people to their former status. You were all little more than…I saw little difference between you, and the over population of nugs and fennecs we found invading Skyhold. While we handled them with as much compassion as possible, none… none save perhaps sweet Ellie would have shed a tear over the decision, if we’d needed to exterminate them altogether.”

“I quite assure you that has changed! I only say as much to ensure…I was misguided, uninformed. I have learned. Thought better of my earlier…I do not feel as I once did. Certainly—truly. I did not realize I could…I have come to respect you, Lady Seeker, all that I have worked with in the Inquisition. I-I love Ellie. I would- I had never felt such torment than the realization of such. I love her such that I would lay down my life for her. Will submit without argument if what I reveal to you today calls for my execution. I did not know. It was like when we first went to the Hinterlands—found Templars and Mages waring in the Crossroads, needing cleared so the refugees could be safe. I saw a gathering of beings with value I could not comprehend and thought little of Corypheus’s willingness to destroy them if it meant my people would be returned. When I realized Corypheus desired the Orb, I did not think he would survive the means he would have to go to in order to power it. There was to be a gathering of Humans, he planned to make it his sacrifice—he had Humans with him, ready to help him bring destruction, help him with the sacrifice needed to power the Orb, they went into the Conclave knowing just how many would be lost, that they themselves may well be among the fallen. They were fine with seeing their own kind fall, it only justified by own stance I thought. But I thought he would be among the dead at the Temple—that in the ashes my Orb would be there waiting, and powered, ready to use so I could bring down the veil, and release my trapped people, return the free use of magic without pulling it from the Fade, and with that, our immortality, and eventually, our status, and the world I woke up to would pass on without suffering. But he survived, took the Orb with him, and Ellie had somehow managed to interfere with his plans—he could have fulfilled his plans then and there for mass destruction beyond the Conclave, had she not interfered. The Mark on her hand, it comes from the Orb. She interacted with it and came away bearing a vital power from it.”

Leliana’s slap was expected and deserved, Cassandra’s fist balled up the collar of his shirt as she raised him up in his seat, chair tipping forward as she raised him, “You knew! You knew who was to blame for the Conclave, you yourself are party to its destruction and you let us interrogate a child—Eleanor could have been executed for your crimes-“
“And I did not care. At the time, it mattered little to me. When I told you I could keep her alive I was not certain I could, I was merely trying to position myself so I might be close enough to figure out how she ended up with the Mark and discover where the Elder One went with my Orb. That magic…it is wholly incompatible to Eleanor’s own. Were she an Elf she would certainly have an easier time with it, but even as it stands there are fundamental differences between the magic we can wield now that we are cut off, have to pull magic form the Fade, than the pure, unadulterated Elvehnan magic that emanates from the Orb. I did everything I could in those days you let me tend to her, to take the Mark upon myself, but it would not move.”

“If it is so very foreign, how did Eleanor become Marked to begin with?” Cassandra demanded to know, releasing her hold, the chair he was attached to jolted him as it tipped back to be upright once more.

“I do not know, but I surmise she interacted with the Orb directly, in a gambit to stop Corypheus. We heard her interrupt him at the Temple. Something must have happened, that allowed her to lay hands upon it, it interacted with her magic, perhaps…” Solas sighed. “Her behavior—her kindness and compassion, it is such there are times I wonder if she could put Mythal to shame. Even now- I have had a hand in the things that have made her life so very painful. She is only Marked because I allowed Corypheus my Orb when I know now I should have protected it from him d-destroyed it even. The Conclave would have unfolded as it should, and p-perhaps she would be leading a normal life with Trevelyan. She knows this, certainly, she has reasoned that I am to blame and yet she st- she is angry with me. But she would hear me. L-loves me still, as much as she always has. She cares about the plight of my people—is so very mindful of our struggle, it is ingrained in her—when we went to Val Royeaux, without question she sought to use her privilege as a Human to shield myself and Marehis, Sera. In the Hinterlands, she showed unyielding determination to help Elves and Humans alike. She mourned the Elves that laid down their life for the Inquisition on the Storm Coast, recited rites I did not know lived on- I almost-“ he had to clear his throat. “When Mythal was felled, a piece of her lived on. A fragment of her soul broke free to live on in a vessel of her choosing—is alive in this world today, but I have not discovered where. I thought…originally I- I mourned her so that I did not think I would ever love again, and when I found myself falling for y-“ he stopped, he did not want to press. “Falling for another, I thought perhaps the explanation was that she lived on within them. That is not the case. When Ellie knew rites from days of old, I thought perhaps it was Mythal in her, that she had claimed a Human vessel and that was why the Orb bestowed its power upon her. But I have since discovered she learned it from her time with Elves, that our people still use those rites. Fittingly so—they do not mention any of their supposed gods, not even Falon’Din.” He shook his head, “I digress. I’ve had many theories, but the strongest still is this—Ellie has exhibited traits I once accredited only to Elvehnan, perhaps the Orb saw familiarity there  that it did not find in Corypheus. Further still, there is the fact she is a Mage. Cole’s body is Human, but able to house a Spirit—an Elvehnan I trapped in the Fade. I believe that is only possible because he was a Mage. But ultimately I cannot be certain, perhaps any who laid hands upon the Orb, given the right circumstances, alignment of the stars, even someone as non-magical and non-Elven as a Dwarf, someone filled with anger and lacking in empathy could come away Marked.”

“These Humans,” Leliana pressed, “the ones you say were assisting Corypheus, they were Venatori?”

“No, I didn’t know of the Venatori until we began encountering them on the Storm Coast. They were Grey Wardens. I do not know the severity of the corruption within their ranks, but Varric’s Hawke, bearing witness to something concerning in that regard isn’t unfounded.”

“Go on, we have this well in hand,” Marehis assured.

“Certainly,” Leliana agreed, leaving them, he supposed, to update or check with her own sources. She had been investigating the Wardens’ disappearance, but he was certain even as suspicious as the Spymaster could be, she had not expected them to be so heavily tied to the Divine’s death.

“You understand you are admitting to aiding in acts of terrorism,” Cassandra said. “That you knew the devastation that would befall the Conclave, provided the means by which it was wrought.”

“I do. I did not understand at the time—not in full, I promise you that has changed. If I…” he could scarcely believe it but, “if I could go back, destroy the Orb, I would. I was a fool, at first when I woke I did not understand, and then I did not want to understand—if I could have I would have kept the whole of our team at a distance, I- I was determined to see my plans through, bring back those I locked away but-“ he sighed, depleted, truly. “Ellie. Knowing her, did not allow for distance. She was persistent, almost annoyingly so, in the initial days after facing the Breach. Always seeking me out, to speak, so readily taking up my offer of tutelage—I did not expect a Human to be capable of learning from me, but while our magics are not compatible. She took instruction well and I found it to be not unlike any other matter of learning—she is shorter than the Lady Seeker, but you were capable of teaching her to fight with her own body despite its differences from yours. But I thought she would grow bored, find meditation pointless, think my knowledge of the Fade, posed as theories, to be ridiculous. She listened and did not judge the fact I find Spirits to be a source of companionship—because truly, the Spirits I consider friends are. I have known them since before the veil, and it is…”

“I can imagine that would be frustrating, heartbreaking even,” the Seeker allowed. “To be so separated from loved ones, have people dispute that they can be your loved ones because they do not understand the situation.”

He nodded. “But I must say I consider myself surrounded by more corporeal loved ones. Ellie brought me closer to those around her, I found myself considering her a friend early on and as we traveled…I found myself faced with having to work more as a team than I originally planned, in order to properly care for the girl. When I bonded with her despite the inherent differences in our magic…I spent quite some time in a state of denial, not of the bond, but of its implications. I have bonded similarly in the past, am still bonded to many of my old friends, and should I ever encounter the vessel of Mythal…I will certainly know it.”

They had some questions, about his last time in the Fade with Ellie, garnering just how much he had confessed to the girl. Which was little, after offering up a recap of their time together, he assured that he confirmed Ellie’s accusations of being Fen’Harel, and that the gods had merely been mages. That he had given the Orb to Corypheus. At the questions from the women before him now, he discussed his plan at length. That his goals of bringing down the veil may well destroy the world that is, and he…there was no one he could pray to, certainly, but he did hope Cole’s confirmations were assurance enough that what he was speaking was truth—that yes, he had once thought to wholly destroy the world that is, to return the world that was. But he had…he had come to realize that those actions bore consequences he would have to learn to live with. He did not have the right to play god any more than the Evanuris once had. In trying to take down the tyrannical, he himself had become just that. Blindly so. Cole did make himself known, physically, after a time. To speak for himself.

“I do not miss the way it was. Serving as I did, I could not help people the way I can help them now. I like helping. Lots of us do. Demons wish to take on mortal forms but that is because of evil and jealousy and hurt. They could not accept the way things changed, want to force going back, like you did, but just for themselves. I miss Mythal too, she was kind.”

“You knew Mythal?” Solas questioned. He did not remember Cole.

The Spirit nodded. “I am a Spirit of Compassion. Spirits of Faith, Compassion, and Wisdom come from those who wore Mythal’s Vallislin, served in her house. We did not lose our immortality—we gained a natural order*. We did not die because there was no place for us to move on to. Now there is. There are Spirits of Enlightenment that come from Falon’Din’s, Purpose from Andruil, Anders—his Justice, he comes from Elgar’nan’s house. Spirits of creativity once served June, and Spirits of Home, and Health—healers, they come from Sylanise. When the Dalish pray, Solas, their prayers are heard—not by the Evanuris, but those who come from them. Why do you think they are believed to be gods? So much was lost when the Veil rose. But we serve as we can, in many ways it is better than before. Vallislins they are not brands anymore, they are worship, an act of conversion really. When Dalish die with pure hearts and a chosen patron, they become Spirits and walk the Fade, help serve from the other side. Those who chose to live a life of wickedness, with darkness in their hearts, they become demons—but even then, we- we try, do our best to try and help them find a way to become a higher version of themselves, they can learn acceptance and love, become Spirits if they try. If an Elf does come to believe in the Maker, serve Him in life, He takes them in death—as thanks for when Shartan helped Andraste.”

That…he- how had he not known? “I did not realize-”

“You did not ask!” Cole…goodness, the boy snapped at him! “You didn’t even think to!
You woke up and felt regret, twisted by selfish desires and you did not stop to think for even a minute that the world moved on without you.”

“But I have spoken with-”

“With the Spirits you are bonded to—I- oh! You are making me angry!” Cole sounded as if that alarmed him more than anything. More frustratedly he pressed on, “You say your thinking is different now, and it is, but just because your thinking has changed—Solas, your attitude, and actions have to change with it! Think! Listen to the words coming out of my mouth! Spirits. Come.
From. The Evanuris. But your Spirit friends, none of them are aligned with a house because they are aligned with you!”

“That is- I know they consider the Evanuris gods, but I removed their vallisli-“ he stopped.

Fen’harel.

Oh. Oh dear.

“My friends, they…are bound to me,” he finally reasoned out. “Bound to the purpose of Fen’harel. They serve me.”

“Exactly. So of course they aren’t going to dispute your thoughts and ideas about the Fade or the worth of our current existence. They mimic you! You didn’t free them, Solas. You made yourself just like the Evanuris to destroy them, and now, those who serve you—the ‘rebel god’— do just that. Serve. I do not know how you might change that, but you must be careful in the future, remember that they are not so much your free-thinking friend, but they are your charges. You are responsible for them.”

“We are not godless?” Marehis rasped out, looking to Cole.
Cole nodded. “It just doesn’t work exactly as you once thought it did. When you cried out, prayed for help with Ellie, I heard, and I serve Mythal. A Spirit of Paternity came on behalf of Elgar’nan, you did not see him, but he was there just on the other side, in the Fade, watching over Ellie.”

“What is the implication of Solas’s bond to Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, “Her- her soul, is it bound to him like those who serve him in the Fade?” Oh goodness. That…that would not do for the girl, at all—he would always take care of her, truly, but she loved the Maker so very well, and it would break her heart to be separated from those she sought to be reunited with in death.

Cole shook his head. “No. They serve him now because he trapped them in the Fade while they were bonded in servitude. What he once took as friendship, he turned into service when he pursued the Evanuris for revenge—eh stopped thinking of them as friends and more so as tools. So that is what they became. Ellie, she is bound to him in their friendship, she doesn’t serve him, can think separately from him, she does not see him as a master, but a mentor. Her papi. She is very sad about everything that is happening now. She hopes we can all work together to make it right.” The boy perked up then, “Oh! He- Mister Aclassi—he is near! I’m supposed to let Lady Josie know when to greet him and I- oh I would very much like to meet the man that made Krem.” He looked to Solas, “He isn’t sorry he punched you.”

Solas huffed, shrugging, “I can’t say I am either.”

Marehis looked to Cole. “You’re free to go on, you’ve done very well today, Cole, I appreciate you assisting us.”

“I will check on Ellie for you,” he said before disappearing.

He was nervous to suggest as much but, “I could tell you how she is feeling—”

“You will stay out of the bond or so help me Solas we will suppress your magic altogether,” Marehis seethed.

That would certainly be unpleasant, but he pressed on, determined to be as forthright as possible, “I cannot fully comply with that—”

“You will—!”

“-because I will not retract my arrangement with my magic—I will not risk her, Ellie. If she is in danger, feels fear she needs rescuing from, it will alert me, and I, you. I will not compromise on my knowledge of her safety—it is also, currently, your knowledge of her safety as well. Cole can make certain of her other spectrums of wellbeing, I will not press the bond for further information. Not more than I already have.”

“You have been in the bond today?” Marehis asked.

Solas nodded. “Quickly, for a moment when we first sat down. I just…wanted to make certain she was alright. She was nervous this morning, and heartsick. She felt unwell—like perhaps she was experiencing anxiety that made her sick to her stomach.”

“She had a War Room meeting this morning, concerning our international political ties, Marehis,” Cassandra offered, like perhaps…was the Seeker taking pity on him? Trying to sidetrack Marehis’s ire, make up some other excuse for Ellie’s distress? “I have a meeting with Barris, and then Cullen soon. I do worry Markus is trying to manipulate Eleanor to side with Nevarra because he is, technically, family. While I’m certain Lady Montilyet was able to convey my opinions on the matter, I should speak with her, make certain she does not allow my relationship to Nevarra control her decision.”

Oh. That would be a very stressful War Room meeting, discussing political alliances on such a large scale. Being Inquisitor would be hard, and he had already...well, he’d certainly complicated her first day of it, it seemed. Her first day after her inauguration, and she’d had to reveal him as the threat he’d been, and handle all of the Inquisition’s prisoners, find them punishment out of the dungeons so they could be used for this. Whatever this was—his interrogation, his exoneration, or more likely his execution.

“Tell her I will be back to her as soon as I am finished here. And I am sorry to have missed her talks today.”

Cassandra nodded, offering the assurance that at the very least, “Cullen cleared his morning to be there for her. I’m sure she could be persuaded to give us a repeat performance.”

He hated this. Hated how very remorseful Marehis looked. She should be with her daughter— their daughter! Be able to make certain of her safety herself! Watch her- oh her talk! That was why she still felt so very near—if he allowed his magic to graze the bond ever so slightly, he could tell she was now directly overhead, no longer in the War Room, but in the Chantry Gardens. Madam de Fer’s suggestion that Ellie would lead a worship service had taken root—at the girl’s shyness to take up such a task, Mother Giselle had proposed she merely speak at one of the Chantry Sister’s Chant studies, one of the smaller services they held during the week. While he did not worship the Maker, he had come to be certain that such an entity existed, and Ellie...well he was remiss that he couldn’t be there, to see the girl’s speech. Oh he was so proud of her, when she spoke before the Inquisition, became Inquisitor.

It was strange. Almost like coming full circle. The desperation he once felt to bring down the veil and undo his deeds was now turned about, into desperation to confess his crimes and make things right. He had much to think on, he hadn’t realized the way things worked, and he hadn’t... he hadn’t stopped to consider that maybe he’d done enough. Playing god once had done more than enough damage. When he made to do so again, he’d only made things worse. Killed so many people it hadn’t been his place to victimize, and left a little girl painfully Marked, and cleaning up after him.

When the Seeker left them, Marehis took a deep breath, seeming to brace herself now that they were alone.

“I am sorry-“

“Shut up,” she snapped, glaring at him.

Certainly. Understandable.

Cole appeared then, a tray clattering in his hands as he materialized, “Mister Aclassi looks just like Krem! And he is kind! I brought lunch because you are hungry. And you are sad—but Ellie’s garden talking went very well, she helped heal hurts! She is going to meet Mister Aclassi soon and Sera will leave her—then it is my turn! I will guard her, I will help keep her safe!”

“Thank you, Cole,” Marehis said, nodding as the Spirit set down his tray.

But she made no move to touch it after the Spirit disappeared.

“You should eat,” Solas ventured carefully.
“I’m not feeding you, if that’s what you’re-“

“I said nothing about myself. I understand I am a prisoner, and what is more, I have betrayed you. I’m hardly concerned about my own stomach. You forget to eat when you are too caught up in your work, I’m sure you’ve not even had breakfast—go ahead. I will still be here, ready to answer your questions when you are ready to ask them.”

Marehis sighed. And then despite herself, she rose from her seat, keys in hand, pressing the sharp-ish edge against his throat as she intoned, “One wrong move and I will make you regret it.”

“Certainly.”

She unshackled him, allowed him water and her bread while she worked on the Ram meat and carrots Cole had brought for her. They ate in silence, Marehis taking a bit more time than she would usually. Stalling perhaps, but more likely she was collecting her thoughts before directing her questioning further. It was rather a lot to parcel through.

“What was your connection to the amulet Alexius used to travel in time?”

He quickly swallowed the gulp of water he’d taken, “It’s none save that I can deduce how it was constructed. Do not get me wrong, with immortality at their disposal, the Evanuris did do intensive research on time travel—competitive, rival research, so they were often more preoccupied plotting how to beat out the others by debilitating their progress than making actual progress of their own. Alexius’s amulet was hewn of materials we often used for magical artifacts—but that could be pure coincidence as they were also natural materials that conduct magic nicely, the sort used for building staffs. But the magic, it is not coincidence. Alexius’s research was useless until Corypheus shared with him the power of Elvehnan magic. That it has inherent qualities that link it more powerfully to the Fade than Human magic, as the Fade itself was created with our magic. I deduce he garnered a great deal of Elvehnan magic to power his amulet, using the spells he devolved while researching and developing time magic.”

“How would he access that, exactly?”

“Alexius had the power in the future Ellie witnessed—the power she has now, to open Rifts. And it seemed his amulet used similar power to open Rifts that would act as portals through time, I can only suppose Corypheus lent him the ability, first to bind it to the physical amulet used to travel through time, and eventually, gave him the ability full stop, as Corypheus’s reign of terror ensued. I sensed—” he stopped and took in a deep breath. He… “I sensed the Orbs power in his amulet but you must believe me—I did not know it was what controlled his time magic. I did not realize until it was too late, and E-Ellie and Dorian had already disappeared, that it was Alexius’s amulet letting off a magical signature matching the Orb of Destruction. I thought the Orb to be physically present—that Corypheus had lent it to his loyal follower, and we had been presented with an opprotunity to obtain it. If I had known, Marehis, believe me. I would have banished the amulet then and there, before it could bring Ellie to harm.”

Oh she looked rather incensed to hear him say as much- “You hesitated to banish it!”

“I hesitated because I was tempted by it’s power—as we all were—to go back! I considered- I thought perhaps it could be used to stop the Conclave, but when we reasoned it out, discovered what Alexius ultimately realized, that the amulet could not go back farther than the moment the Breach exploded into existence, I…” he sighed. “I will admit, I did consider the fact that I intended to bring down the veil and return our people’s former status as immortals. Time Magic would do wonders to keep the Evanuris in line, just the threat that I could have the power to
She scoffed in disbelief. “If they need such power to keep them under control, why in the world would you ever consider bringing them back?”

“I just…I did not know how much we would lose-”

“Lose? What? The entire population living as slaves to the most powerful eight members of society? Or the terror seven of those eight wished to inflict at their every whim upon their slaves by sending them to fight in pointless wars that served their own egos? People die, Solas. That is life. I do not regret my mortality if it means we are not bound to them in life and serve our living people in death.” She huffed, shaking her head. “Though I must admit this is all making me consider conversion.”

“I…I have come to accept as much—if it truly works as Cole describes…” he flinched, he had no reason to doubt him. "I have been struggling, as of late, with my decisions.”

Marehis nodded, taking in a bracing breath. “So. You did not create the amulet, it is banished now? You did not commit some trick to whisk it away for safe keeping?”

“Absolutely not. It is gone, veh-“ it came too naturally to his lips, he needed to watch himself. “It is gone,” he promised sincerely. "Permanently.”

“Alright,” she moved on, “Why did you lie about examining Ellie’s Mark?”

“I merely wished to speak with her alone.”

“And so you let her walk around with this new development unchecked? What if it is dangerous?”

“It is not unchecke- Marehis- I love that girl more than my own life. I would never compromise her safety. In point of fact, I forgot to keep up the ruse when I told her of Skyhold and the Orb’s Elvehnan origins because I know with certainty her Mark is safe.” It...should have tipped him off that Ellie felt something was amiss when they returned to camp and she so readily lied for him. But he thought it an act of taking up for him, merely realizing he’d just wanted to speak with her alone and not finding it questionable herself, so there was no need to get him into trouble with the others. Though he had been, admittedly, in some trouble with Marehis when she discovered Ellie was running her courses and had told him about it, that he had not been monitoring her as they made the trek to Skyhold. Were he not a Mage, he would surely have frozen to death, sleeping cast from their tent when she ceased sharing a cot with Ellie among the Bull's Chargers. "It is not spreading—it is more painful, but not harmful. Corypheus attempted to remove it by dominating it, opening it up and pouring power against it to prove he is stronger than it, than its current master, and that it should transfer to him. All he managed to do was leave it with more power than before —she already had the ability to close Rifts, and now, she can open them. Because of her will—her desire to see the veil repaired, when she tears open Rifts, they pull any abnormalities away with them as they close—deteriorate any near by demonic presences.”

“Why did-“ Marehis cleared her throat, took a moment. “This whole time. Were you using me to keep us blind to your true nature? Or was it some sort of game for you?”

“No! Of course not-“

“There is no ‘of course not’ about it!” she snapped.

“Vehnan, I assure you, falling in love, it was not part of my plan. I joined the Inquisition with the desire to understand the Mark, if I could, master it, find my Orb, and bring down the veil. I had no intention of getting close to anyone, not truly. And then Ellie happened. And then you. You are beautiful and intelligent— she huffed at that, “do not doubt that. Ellie is not an imbecile for having trusted the likes of Rainier, or myself. Neither are you—I’ve no doubt with all the pieces you two managed to put together with your suspicions, Cole informing you of my former title was unnecessary—it merely got you there faster. Now. My feelings they were not- are not false. I am sorry if you feel I am a stranger now.”

“How did you think that was going to play out, exactly? In the long term? Did you honestly think I would sit by and be compliant with destroying the world?”

“Potentially destroy. And no. Not exactly. I did—“ he sighed. “I don’t know. Knowing Ellie, I did...begin to postpone certain aspects of my plans. I thought, perhaps...Elves naturally outlive Humans, even as we are no longer Immortal. I thought to see her through the rest of her life and then, once she was safely at the Maker’s side...”

Marehis scoffed, shaking her head.

“But that started turning into wanting more for her! She might be a mother, one day, and I thought I could not bear to harm someone who came from her. Or any who came from them—“

“And if Ellie chooses to never have children, the world is fair game?!“ Marehis asked, incredulous. “Will you lose your love for her kin as the generations pass? How many greats need to be before the word grandchild before you decide to play god again?” That was improbable...well, save him taking to ageless sleep again he supposed but- that was hardly- he was not of that mindset any longer!

“No! Marehis-“ she had to understand, “Humans did not exist. At least not to our knowledge, not in the time I walked the world! Forgive me if it took getting to know them beyond the realm of seeing them as appropriators of our culture*, suppressors of our people, to see them as worthy of sparing. I thought I left our people doomed—to live oppressed lives here that only lead to...nothingness in death. Or worse, if there is a hell—there is certainly no heaven for Elves, at least not as I understood it—I did not realize we could pass on to be with the Maker or our own people in the Fade.”

Marehis rose from her seat, hands slapping the table, “You knew who destroyed the Conclave! You knew the Elder One we’ve been pursuing—you let Ellie run blindly, chasing him, she was sent through time and tortured by a demon. She has lost loved ones and been betrayed, known grief she should never have felt! She is a child Solas, she had not so much as killed another living being before the Inquisition! And you let search for this monster, allowed him the opportunity to track us down, Why the hell were we living in Haven’s Chantry village with only one clear cut way in or out, a place we could be cornered in like rats, when a bare seventy miles away you had your safe haven, your Skyhold just waiting to be reclaimed? If Corypheus had sought to attack us here-“ she stopped shivering with disgusted frustration. “But no. That is just another thing you kept from us and instead you allowed Corypheus to come, and destroy our home—lay his hands upon our child! All of that could have been prepared for, possibly avoided altogether if you had stepped up and told the truth to begin with!”

“I would have been executed and our people reviled—at the time I thought I was preserving our future.”

Marehis hoisted him by the collar of his tunic and pulled him back into the broken portion of the dungeon, fists balling up his shirt as she turned and pushed him back to hold him dangling, his feet just barely scraping the edge of the dungeon hole, his heart pounded in his chest, fear and adrenaline flooding his veins as he gasped for breath.

“Preserve our future?!” Marehis railed with outrage. “You destroyed us—your own people, and then you failed to learn your lesson the first time. You say our pantheon were never gods, and here you have tried to play as much over and over again! You are a monster! You are a monster and I hate you—could see you dead this very instant, there is little that could stop me except for the one thing—the one thing you know would have kept you alive if you’d confessed sooner! You are the only person we know of that could understand the Breach, the Rifts, Rift Magic—Ellie’s Mark. If I could I would kill you now, you would never harm my daughter again-!”

“Stop!” Cole’s hand was on Marehis’s arm, “Stop it, now, Marehis-“

“Cole-“ Marehis refuted but she paled, gave Solas such quick rescue from his precarious position when Cole declared,

“You are hurting Ellie!”

It was nerve wracking and exhilarating to walk through the great stone gate of Skyhold. He had never seen Haven, heard only of it in a polite missive from an Ambassador Montilyet. That it was a lovely place, cold, but safe and there would be a home for him there. Then he traveled, his escorts—Slavers for the Imperium who were more used to taking from, than delivering to Ferelden—delivered to him the heart wrenching update of Haven’s demise. It had taken far too great a moment than what he could bear for them to follow up with the information that Cremisius was alive, well and unscathed by this ‘Elder One’s assault. He was almost ashamed it took him so long to think to ask after the girl—Ellie she had said her name was, but of course that name hadn’t gotten him answers, it took asking after the Herald of Andraste. ‘Come back from the dead’ sounded miraculous and horrifying. They had been on the ship from the Free Marches at the time, and there was talk of returning him to Tevinter if there was nowhere to deliver him to. But another letter from Ambassador Montilyet and it was set to rights—he was allowed to read this one himself, and she apologized for any distress recent news had given him, but he could be rest assured—Cremisius was safe, Ellie was alive and recovering, and they were headed for new Headquarters.

And when he did arrive at this new Headquarters, he was alone for the first time in quite some time. After a fashion. The Slavers stood at the end of the bridge, watching and waiting to make certain he did not make a run for it, and he delivered himself through the gate, worn shoes on his feet, Lady Montilyet had warned that Haven would hold chill, but Skyhold was certainly cold as well, and he was surely not dressed for it.

It had been embarrassing, admittedly. Meeting that girl in Val Royeaux. He was grateful, he could never be grateful enough, but between learning he was in the presence of the Herald of Andraste, and that same presence was in point of fact his Cremisius’s girlfriend? It had been an unfortunate shade of humbling, to sit there in his burlap shirt and trousers stained from work. He had been excited, and terrified at the prospect of tailoring again—he certainly had done nothing like it in the past few years. He’d worked the grounds, and occasionally in the kitchens of the Tilani household. Now he stood entering a place of strangers looking for any sign of the men that had accompanied the Herald, Ellie herself, even his Cremisius but...he was afraid to see his son after so long, and too...he was embarrassed. His pride, what little of it he had left, it could hardly abide that his son would see him like this, but there wasn’t anything to be done for that. He deserved worse, for the things he had done, the mistakes he made.

“Cremisius is asleep, safe, sound. He will be surprised. He misses you.”

The very serene voice startled him out of his skin, sent him gasping and turning his attention to a strange boy in a very large hat, had he been there this entire time? As he approached the gate? He had not noticed him.

“I was here, you could not see me, that is okay. I brought Lady Montilyet, you can see her just fine. I did not mean to scare you, I wanted to see you—you made Krem.”

Krem...ahh, Cremisius. “I had some hand in his making, yes,” he allowed, he’d hardly borne the brunt of the work.

“I am very glad, he is my friend. I heard your hurting, for privacy—Ellie...huh, she could not hear it, she doesn’t do what I do, but she does? She asked Varric to get your things from Krem—he can be surprised, and you can have your pride. Josephine will take you to them.”

“Cole,” a voice spoke in gentle reprimand as a woman...she looked markedly like Ellie, save perhaps in the ways of height and hair, “Are we within acceptable boundaries?”

The boy nodded eagerly, seeming pleased and proud with himself as he listed, “I did my best not to startle him, I am three feet away, I let him speak back to me, oh! But I forgot a few times. I am sorry. I thanked him for making Krem!”

“And that was very sweet of you, we are all rather grateful Cremisius Aclassi exists,” the woman supposed, looking to Tonio then and smiling softly, “Hello Mister Aclassi-“

“I forgot hello!” Cole lamented physically drooping in disappointment.

“I am not offended, er, Cole,” Tonio offered. “You have been very welcoming.” Confusing, but kind.

The boy perked up at that, breathed a sigh of relief. “Oh. You are kindness, like Krem. I hope I can be your friend too. I will go now, there is a sad man that should eat but isn’t, and Marehis is very sad and worried for Ellie, I will go tell her she is fine and her garden talking went well.”

“Do not interrupt her work, but yes, go ahead, thank you Cole,” Josephine said, dismissing him with a nod. Was she some sort of Mage? Or was the boy-? What had just happened—he had been standing there and then he was gone!

“I do apologize,” the woman said, “Cole is specially gifted.”

That...was not an entire explanation but enough of one he supposed. He nodded. “I apologize, I am Tonio Aclassi, I am here to report to Ambassador Montilyet.”

“I am Ambassador Montilyet, it is an honor to meet you, Mister Aclassi. Please, do follow me—we will get your paperwork settled, and I will see you to the Inquisitor’s quarters.”

In- Inquisitor? “I am to meet the Inquisitor?” he asked as he trailed after her, across the courtyard and up a flight of stone steps.

“Of course you- oh. Inquisitor Trevelyan I should say—Eleanor has received a promotion since you met.”

That was a bit of information. He was silent as he followed carefully behind the Ambassador. That boy he said Cremisius was asleep? It was the middle of the day. Was he sick, or injured? A soldier, Ellie had said he was now. Working for that large Qunari fellow. He…could not wrap his head around it. How had his son been drawn to such work? He was no bigger than Ellie the last time he saw him, Liviana once- oh, he should have- he should have taken Cremisius and left her then, but she was his wife. He was supposed make certain her needs were met and they could barely afford to live as a family unit. Divorce was out of the question, but- he should have done things differently, so many things. Liviana once smacked Cremisius across the face so hard he’d gone down, fallen like a doll cast from a child’s hand. He could not imagine his son training against a Qunari or fighting in a battle. Let alone…Ellie had said something of him being a bodyguard for her for some time, saving her from an assassin?

All told, he could not imagine his son. He was not certain if he saw him now he would recognize him. Things seemed different, good for him here. Everyone he had spoken with spoke of him with respect, for both his character and his gender.

Varric Tethras was in the Ambassador’s office, waiting for them. He greeted them amicably and Maker, Tonio did not realize how weary he was until he was afforded the opportunity to sit down.

It took several minutes to realize that Mister Tethras was not there simply out of a matter of curiosity, he was standing in as a lawyer of some sort, carefully explaining the terms of their agreement, ensuring, it seemed, that the deal was satisfactory for him it was…a far cry different from before. Opposite, in fact. When he swallowed his pride and went to Magister Tilani, he’d been clean, polished, and humbling himself, begging to sell his servitude. Now he sat looking sorely out of place in the Ambassador’s office, broken, but being treated almost as an equal. Perhaps equal full stop, he…wasn’t sure what to think. He was in service to them still, wasn’t he? He was here to work. He was a slave, he was to take what he was given, and say thank you when most of it was taken back and away.

“…as you see fit. You would meet them in my office, if that would suffice, and all of your materials would be provided by the Inquisition. There is an appropriate mirror in Eleanor’s quarters of course, but I’ve seen to it another will be set up here, and well, whatever you need. Your sewing machine has been delayed I’m afraid, but I’ve been in touch with the courier and…Mister Aclassi?”

He startled, realizing he hadn’t been paying attention. “I am sorry, my humblest apologies, truly,” he shot out, bowing his head, bracing himself.

“Mister Aclassi have you eaten today?” the Ambassador asked.

That…was not exactly what he was expecting.

“Yes, miss,” he responded should he look up? What did he- he didn’t know the rules here.

“A meal, Mister Aclassi,” the woman clarified firmly.

He wasn’t certain just how to answer that, but the woman held up an index finger and rose from her seat, “Just a moment.” She left them, and when she returned she resumed her seat and cleared her throat. “I was merely explaining the extent of your work here. You could find customers among those within the Inquisition, but we’ve also several noble allies that come and visit our headquarters. We would like to advertise the attraction, so to speak, the chance to be tailored by the man responsible for the Herald of Andraste—our Inquisitor’s—wardrobe. Of course we will only do so if and when you feel up to the task, we would not wish for you to take on clients that are not to your liking or too much of a burdensome workload.”

He- turn down client- what- burdensome?

Perhaps his mind was hunger-addled. Very few of the Ambassador’s words were making much sense.

“You would see Eleanor in her quarters of course, but that would not do for other clientele. You would meet them here, in my office—entertain them, take measurements, discuss design and the like. There are a few places where you could properly set up a workspace—I thought perhaps…it is a bit of a walk from your quarters but, we’ve an empty spire of battlement just above our Requisitions office, there is ample space for growth should you take on staff or assistants. And while I regret we could not get you suitable quarters near the Bull’s Chargers, I thought perhaps it would suit to have your place of business nearby—there is a walkway that would lead you right to their quarters, which branches directly off of the top floor of the Tavern—where you could take meals. Of course you’re also free to put in orders for delivery from there or the kitchens—whenever you are hungry, Mister Aclassi. Meals are provided to all who serve the Inquisition, it would not be detriment to your debt. The same is to be said of the Healers services, and of course your board.”

A serving girl came and laid a tray down on Ambassador Montilyet’s desk, “The Herald sends her regards, Lady Josie—she is behind schedule, her talks with the Chantry sisters still continues but she will be done as soon as possible.” Oh, it took a moment to realize she was wearing the uniform, one of his designs. It was strange and bewildering, an honor to see his work again.

“Thank you Abby,” the Ambassador said, then, “how did it go?”

“Oh my lady it was beautiful. A message on the way we consider ‘for what every man has, another has lost’ that just,” she shook her head, “it was very moving. She is still caught up talking with some of the Chantry sisters, and Chancellor Roderick it seemed when I left, but she promises to head for her quarters as soon as they are finished.”

“Wait, has she even had lunch yet? Is that asshole giving Tumbles a hard time?” Varric asked, Maker, the edge in his voice. Was this Chancellor an unsavory fellow? Should she be giving him audience?

“It sounded like a pleasant conversation,” the servant girl said.

“Uh-huh. We good here?” Varric asked the Ambassador, “Bianca just wants to go check in. Take a look around.”

Ambassador Montilyet sighed. “Varric, please do not brandish your weapon in the middle of the Chantry gardens-”

“She’s not a weapon, she’s a lady—and ladies need to be held every once in a while, taken on a leisurely stroll through the gardens. Keeps the romance alive,” he winked, “Gonna just, woo my girl. If Roderick pisses his robes, sweet deal.”
He wasn’t certain who Bianca was but if she frightened this Roderick…that was apparently a good thing?

“Is Ellie in danger?” Tonio asked as he and the Ambassador were left in her office.

“Certainly not. Varric is merely overprotective. To a point,” she sighed. “Eleanor and the Chancellor have a tremulous past. He would not be permitted within a mile of the Inquisition, let alone Eleanor herself, if he were a danger to her. I would be brandishing weapons in the Chantry gardens.”

Had this Ambassador weaponry to speak of? She didn't seem the type. Not incapable, just, more the person to call upon the guard, than the one guarding.

He ate what he was offered, and was truly glad for it, it was certainly the best meal he’d had in quite some time. House Tilani…Magister Tilani was not an unkind mistress. But he did not work with her directly. Their food certainly hadn’t been…it had been mass produced a sort of gruel that had once been so unappetizing in his first few days he could recall turning it down, before he felt the sort of desperate hunger that made gray gelatinous paste taste like relief. The true hellions were fellow slaves appointed positions of power and authority over their counterparts, and he had most certainly been beneath them. This…the Inquisition, was leagues apart. He wondered where the servants quarters were, just how many he would be sharing with—he’d nothing on him worth stealing anymore. He was glad to be sleeping apart from Cremisius if his son had a better living situation than he.

He was allowed to read over the deal set for him before signing his own name and that…was when it really clicked for him.

“This…this is correct?” he was almost afraid to ask. It felt almost foolish, but if he saw something amiss and didn’t say something…it would be wrong to trick them and only disservice himself and them.

“Have I made some error?” the Ambassador fretted before rising to lean over her desk to peer at what he was pointing to. “Ahh. I do apologize you are not left with more, we…I hope you are not insulted by the valuation of your services, there is only so much room in our current budget but if you wish to negotiate—”

“H-heaven’s no I- my Lady I merely- I thought perhaps you’d tacked on a number too much by mistake.” A number or three too many.

“Certainly not. The cost of your labor, your expertise have been accounted for. Eleanor passed along your designs already as you saw—they are truly exquisite. I can see where Cremisius gets his talent from.”

“Talent?” he…his son was a soldier, he wasn’t certain what talent in that he could have gotten from his father.

“For illustration of course. The Iron Bull had me secure him suitable supplies to draw in his free time—oh!” she sat back in her seat and opened her top desk drawer, retrieved a small leather-bound book and she flipped through the pages and turned it about so he could see. “Seeker Pentaghast allowed me to borrow it, a birthday present from Eleanor that your son assisted her with. See?”

Oh it stole the breath from him. Surely yes, this was his son’s work, a sun setting on a mountain range, a dragon laying fallen and a small girl standing before it striking a victory pose.
while behind her stood a woman, armed, armored, sweating and looking rather bedraggled like she’d had quite the time protecting the child from harm and besting a dragon. Maker…his Cremisius was drawing again? He’d not…he had not done so in years. A sign, a dangerous one that he should have seen, he should have known what his child was feeling—hopelessness, despair at his impending future.

I’d rather die he’d said, trembling, sobbing. His certainty though, that was the worst part. I…I don’t want to die but I’m scared papa. I know I’ll do it. I can’t live like this.

“There are more, you may look through it if you’d like,” the Ambassador offered kindly.

“I…I do appreciate it, but my hands, my Lady—I would not wish to dirty it.”

“Certainly. Another time then. If you’re satisfied with the terms of your agreement, we can be on our way, you’ll have the opportunity to clean up.”

Ahh. The terms. Maker he could scarcely believe it was not a mistake. The Inquisition had taken on his debts to Magister Tilani. They would make monthly payments on it from his own salary—a salary big enough to make such payments while still leaving him with nothing grandiose but he need not pay for essentials like food or housing or health care. It was enough that he could do things, go for drinks, shop...he could save up. Put more into his payments or purchase things, gifts for his son—his birthday! Oh he- he would- he could celebrate the day with his child!

And what was more he could make more, far greater progress if he took on further clients for the Inquisition. He could...

He thought he would die an old man in House Tilani. Now freedom seemed truly within reach.

Or…or maybe it was in hand. This...was nothing like his servitude before thus far.

He signed. And then he was led back out into the great hall, and through a winding corridor to a door that lead to a flight of stairs and-

“Wait!” a girl’s voice shrieked, “What if it’s poison?!?”

“Yeah, it’s been here a couple hours, but it’s been covered this whole time and it’s still a little warm, it should be fine to eat,” that was Eleanor’s voice, he thought.

“Not ‘gone bad’ poisoned—poison poison!”

“Why would it be poisoned?”

“I…I dunno I’ve never done this before!”

“We eat together all the time, Sera!”

“Yeah but not like this! Shit, how does Kremmy-boy know when pish is poison? He kicked that guys ass before you could even take a sip!”

“Memorized the face of everyone that works in Haven, at Flissa’s tavern, knows their schedules and knew that man had no business bringing our drinks,” she explained as if it were simple.

“Well I haven’t ruddy done that!”
There was chuckling, warm and rumbling and a deep voice said, “You want me to take a bite first for her Ser’?” and then, “All good Imekari, knock yourself out.”

“Thank you! I’m starving,” she said, and she’d a mouth full of...it was some sort of food wrapped in thin…bread…something. He certainly wasn’t sure what it was. But the girl looked up when Ambassador Montilyet led him to the top of the stairs and her entire expression lit up, she put her food back on her plate, raising a hand to cover her mouth and swallow quickly before, “Mister Aclassi!” she called out, cheery relief in her voice as she came around her desk and rushed to meet him-

Maker she- she was hugging him- she shouldn’t, he was not- he must be filthy, and her dress was so very lovely, she should not-

“I’m so glad you made it! How are you feeling, you’ve eaten yeah? Are you tired? How was your meeting with Lady Josie-“

“My lady, perhaps if you took a moment to breathe between questions, he could answer you?” the Lady at his side offered laughingly, amused at…well, she really was Inquisitor now, wasn’t she?

The girl pulled away, stepping back though she’d taken hold of his hands still, giving them a reassuring squeeze as she offered an apologetic, “Sorry, I’m just a little excited you’re here,” and then she gasped, twisting about to look at the Qunari, “I could do somersaults!”

“I could do somersaults, chip my damn horns doin’ them but man am I glad to see you,” the large Qunari, Cremisius’s boss he…what was his name again? Oh goodness, he had only been introduced once, but it was an important name, he should have remembered it. The metal… something? Had Lady Montilyet said it earlier? He was too embarrassed to ask in front of the man himself, he may well be insulted, and he would not wish to upset the man his son worked for.

“Thank you,” Tonio said, “I am well, and your Ambassador made certain I ate. Our meeting was productive, I have signed everything.”

Ellie’s “Oh, that’s so great!” was overlapped by barking, then the scrape of a Mabari’s claw-tipped paws across stone as a pup descended upon him, appearing from behind the desk and rushing to meet him, goodness! He- it startled him, but they seemed friendly enough, jumping on him—up with its front paws on his shoulders and he didn’t know what else to do but try to catch the Mabari against him, it was not so big it could stand at his height—heavy thing though, and oh! He ended up on the receiving end of some very generous licks to his face.

“Anya! She’s a good dog honest, I think she thinks you’re Cremisius—he spoils her rotten, still carries her around like she’s a puppy! She didn’t walk half the trip here from Haven, I swear—I can get her to stop if-“

“She’s quite alright,” he assured, though he did kneel to let the Mabari down before he raised a hand to pet behind her ear. Another woman that had captured his son’s heart? He was big enough, strong enough to carry her around? Half way sounded like the girl meant it as exaggeration but Maker…his trip had been shortened some seventy some miles due to their move.

Ellie was bouncing a bit in place. “Anya just gave you a bit of a bath, but you probably want to clean up and everything right? I set everything in there,” she pointed to a doorway to the left of her bed, “there’s a mirror and everything, clean water—if you need more just holler and we’ll get you set! Your clothing’s in there—I hope it fits good, we used the measurements you sent us for a uniform, but you aren’t technically servant staff, you’re more specialized so I thought there should be a difference, so people aren’t stopping you all the time asking for drinks or directions.
Cole did his best from Cremisius’s memories to figure out what would suit you best. And Sera’s girlfriend—oh! This is Sera!” Ellie introduced the lanky Elf girl seated on her desk who raised a hand to wave to him. “Sera’s girlfriend—she’s an Inquisition scout, and her ma’s a seamstress. Of course you’ll need more than one, but we thought you might like more of a hand in that in future—unless you’d prefer someone else do it of course, Lace’s ma is happy to work with you! Just, whatever you want or like. I feel like I’m rambling now I think, sorry.”

“You should eat, mija,” Lady Montilyet gently chastised. “Whatever that…is it…?”

“Not what you’re thinking. Molly brought it to me for breakfast, it’s soft tortilla wrapped around sausage and eggs and cheese and potatoes. It’s a bastardization of proper Antivan fare but I can hold my entire breakfast in my hand so I’m not even mad.”

Tonio had been given instruction so…he gave the pup one last pat on the head and went into the closet—more of a side-room really—and closed the door behind him. There was a small vanity tucked away in there and a mirror and…

Three things, he took note of first. His old shaving kit. A proper suit folded carefully to avoid wrinkling, with his pocket watch resting atop it. And a new pair of shiny leather shoes.

There was lamplight, plenty of it to see by as he stripped and used the washbasin at hand to clean himself, scrub until he was as clean as possible, it took a moment for him to realize she had left out fresh soap for him. It soothed the aching dryness in his skin, and when he was done he shaved, a proper, good shave. He expected the sort of gel he used for styling to be long expired but his son apparently—of course, he used likewise to style his own hair, the jar in his shaving kit seemed fresh and the familiar scent was comforting as he plied it to his hair.

This suit. That ‘Cole’ had divined something from Cremisius’s memories? It did very much look like the sort of thing he used to wear, this Lace’s ma was a fine seamstress.

He…well Maker, he felt like himself, very well looked like himself again even.

When he stepped out of the side room, it seemed the others had taken their leave. Lady Montilyet, the Qunari, Sera. Eleanor was seated at her desk, poring over some document she held in hand, he was glad to see her hand-held breakfast was gone had she…she must be terribly busy.

It was the pup, Anya that alerted her that he was done, the Mabari ‘wuffed’ at him and the girl looked up from her work, “Oh!” she exclaimed, and then smiled reassuringly, “Oh wow, you look so handsome! Do you like it? Everything’s comfortable?”

“Certainly, I truly appreciate it, I…I am not certain where to go next, we have a meeting?
Or are you busy—“

“Oh, sorry, just- it’s been a crazy day and I was trying to get everything done so the afternoon can just be free and clear—if you give me just a second, I need to sign this and then we can chit chat until Cremisius comes! He’ll be by in a little bit, I hope you don’t mind waiting? He really should sleep a bit more.”

Ahh yes. “Is he—“ he didn’t wish to interrupt her further but, “is he alright?” his watch said it was nearly three in the afternoon now.

“Oh gosh, yeah,” she assured him, “come on, take a seat, please, make yourself comfortable—you can just leave your old things in there, someone will be by soon to take them.”
Ahh, he stepped back into the side room and put his old clothing he’d had bundled in hand on the vanity. “Tea will be here soon, I’m parched, would you care for some? Oh! Crap, sorry, you were asking—” she stopped, took a deep breath, and held up an index finger before she took up a quill, dipped it in her inkwell and hurriedly scanned the final paragraph of the missive in hand before she signed the bottom and set it aside with a sigh as he took a seat in a chair across from her desk.

“Okay. Cremisius is fine—I saw him this morning, he brought me coffee before he went to bed. Rocky, one of the Chargers? He got sick last night and couldn’t work his shift patrolling the walls. Cremisius has the day off today, so he stayed up and took his shift for him, so he’s catching up on his sleep now. He works so hard, today’s like the first day off he’s taken since…well gosh I’ve never really known him to take one really, unless he’s being tricked into it. But we really wanted him to be able to spend time with you so, it all worked out! Cole will wake him soon.”

Oh. His son took pride in his work, it sounded like, worked hard? Helped his friends, brought coffee to the girl he was pursuing, saw to the start of her day before he laid down, he…everything he had heard—everyone he had interacted with so far had nothing but compliments for his son, had been excited to meet him simply because he was his father. He was excited, to meet this man his son had become in his absence.

Tea arrived shortly after and he gladly accepted a cup, when had he last had tea? It was altogether pleasant. Though, when they were alone again the girl seemed to take the opportunity to broach something that might not be entirely easy.

“I want to make something clear though. Before you meet,” she said bringing his attention back. She looked very serious, almost grave. “Cremisius has spoken very highly of you—do not get me wrong, he loves you, so much and he’s so proud of you. And he’s said that you have been…understanding to a degree—like with the three-squeeze system to help him when he struggled when he was little, before he even understood what was happening with him. And that you came to accept him, for him, before you left. And I will never be able to thank you enough, for what you’ve done—sparing him a life of slavery, instilling him with advice and encouragement before you parted ways. But that…it—” she took a moment, thinking very carefully before she said, “I understand it can be difficult, Cremisius is your child. You couldn’t have known when he was just a baby, you were raising him the way you thought was best, and he struggled just as much to understand his own situation—but eventually he did know, and he did speak up. And while you did eventually listen, you cut it very, very—” she sighed, frustrated, and cut to the chase, “You cut it too damn close. I am grateful you made the right choice, chose a living son over a dead daughter, but it should never have gotten that far. Do you understand that?” she questioned fiercely.

“Y-yes. Oh, most certainly I…have many regrets. That is the greatest of them all, I assure you.”

“Good,” she said, ”Keep it that way. Because I swear to the Maker if you so much as put a single inkling of doubt in his mind about who he is, and the man he’s become, you will regret that far worse. He’s worked so hard, been through so much to get to where he is—so be careful. If you have questions, ask him—privately. It is up to him entirely, who knows, and who doesn’t. And if he gives you certain boundaries, even if you don’t get them, you follow them without complaint.”

“Absolutely. I…I would never want to hurt him, truly.” He had made so many mistakes, he hoped to never repeat them. But he was glad there was someone looking out for his son, would seek to protect him, even from his own father. That…took a measure of courage, she spoke as if he still had Cremisius’s good opinion after all.

“Just making sure. I don’t think badly of you, honest, just- giving you a warning/crash course in getting reintroduced to your Aqun-Athlock son. Qunari term—someone born one gender, living as another.”

That— he never realized that was a facet of Qunari life. Maker, their god truly was looking out for his son, delivering him into the hands of someone who would readily understand his situation. He had been uncertain, almost afraid for his son, just—the Qunari was large. And a Qunari. And his son was very, very Tevene. It was a caustic mix, he thought, but perhaps not, he had been nothing but outright kind to Tonio.

Anya had been laying at his feet, but her head perked up and she yipped before it sounded like the door downstairs swung open.

“Eleanor?” a Nevarran accent called up the stairs, followed by a male, “Sweetheart?”

Ellie smiled and called down, “Hasta aquí, mami, papi!” in…Antivan. The young lady did share a similar complexion to the Ambassador, and just now, similar accents.

Oh goodness, was he about to meet the young lady’s parents?

If…if they were it…well he wasn’t certain just how that worked. They were very, very white, the pair of them. A very fierce looking woman came bounding up the stairs, followed after by a blonde man whose tired expression broke out into a smile when he laid eyes on the people seated at the Inquisitor’s desk. “My word—“

“He does look like the Lieutenant,” the Nevarran woman said quietly to her male counterpart and then, “Mister Aclassi, I am Seeker Cassandra Pentaghast, it is an honor to meet you.”

“Cullen Rutherford, a pleasure,” the man came forward and Tonio rose to his feet to accept the hand he offered for a…handshake, when had he last had someone look him in the eye and shaken his hand…said his own name?

“Tonio Aclassi,” he introduced himself. “It is an honor to meet you both, you have raised quite the remarkable daughter,” he complimented.

That seemed to give them pause with something that quietly overwhelmed them, sent them looking bashful and then to one another and Ellie saw fit to giggle. Had he said something?

“Thank you, Mister Aclassi, but we cannot take too much credit for her upbringing,” Cassandra said.

“Hardly any really,” Cullen followed.

“Raised myself mostly, so thanks!” the girl enthused, met with the Commander’s laughter.

“We have only been in Eleanor’s life a spare…” Seeker Pentaghast thought on it, but Ser Cullen readily supplied,

“Seven months, two weeks, six days and nineteen hours and some odd minutes,” and then at the surprised looks his accuracy got him, “our first assault on the Breach was a remarkable day.”

Ahh. Well then. That explained how the very visual differences between them all. He had considered perhaps adoption was a possibility he just hadn’t considered it such a recent, perhaps unofficial one, but very real all the same. She…raised herself, she said? Oh. Oh!

He almost apologized but he…hadn’t been paying much attention when they first met—at least not at first. If the girl had been made to speak of herself to the Magister, he hadn’t taken much note. He hadn’t been told why he was to accompany Magister Tilani to Orlais. He thought he was just there to carry her shopping, and he was, Maker that woman shopped like she was solely responsible for the economic success of Val Royeaux. But then she had him sit alongside her at lunch and that was certainly out of the realm of the ordinary. Then Magister Pavus’s son, the Dwarf, and A Qunari walk in with this little noble girl she looked like. By that point he’d been so nervous he’d been focusing on breathing, had hardly heard past panic. This was all different and that…didn’t usually mean ‘good’. Different treatment, different assignments, from what he’d seen and heard over the years, when your master took greater note of you than before, they were either testing to see if...well perhaps a new rumor had been spread, or information leaked from their house and they were displeased, thought you were responsible and testing you. Giving you something to observe and spread—a Magister having lunch with the Herald of Andraste and her er…they had been…he had never said such a thing, but many were speaking of the rumored Qunari in her company as a um…pet. Regardless, Maevaris meeting with them, and the man she considered her cousin through scandal that still rocked the Magisterium, would be a point of serious intrigue for any Magister regardless of how very benign the conversation could be. Aside from panic, he’d been making a point not to listen—he couldn’t accidentally disclose any part of this conversation in passing if he couldn’t remember what was said. Though a fellow Tevinter in attendance that made it less likely that she was testing him. The Altus could gossip about her far more credibly, quickly than slaves passing things along until it got to a higher up, or another Magister.

And then there was the fact that this girl knew his name. ‘Mister Aclassi’ she’d cried out in surprise. Shock. Which set his panic even deeper because the only other probability was...well usually sudden kindness—a gentler job, closer to the Magister, being made to feel a promotion might be at hand, being fed a fine meal, usually meant you were eating your last meal. That you were about to be used for Blood Magic. He hadn’t witnessed much if any Blood Magic in house Tilani, but that did not mean she might not be here to offer him over to the Mage she was meeting with, an old friend of hers she called him. The girl was just that—a girl, young and seemingly...he was not certain of her accent, was she Ferelden? A Marcher? Not Tevinter, and not a Mage he thought, she didn’t carry a staff and she was certainly old enough to do so. His mind decided to interpret her shock as horror, that she knew well what fate awaited him—how else would she know his name? Magister Tilani had made arrangement to give him over to Magister Pavus’s son, there were rumors...he had been in her home nearly two years ago, injured, and there were rumors among the servant staff that he had nearly been a victim of some dark ritual, that his own parents had set upon him. Perhaps...perhaps he sought vengeance, he’d come to Magister Tilani for assistance once before, who was to say he was not coming to her now for a slave to sacrifice for his revenge?

“...you’re familiar with Aclassi?”

His attention barely piqued at mention of his name again. Oh Maker, what would happen to his soul if he was sacrificed to Blood Magic? If they made a demon enter him or--Then the horrible thought, would they go after his Cremisius, seek him to take up the debt he was repaying? Send slavers, a tribune after his son, who knows what they would do to his boy if they...if they did not agree that he was one, and certainly once he was documented and appointed he would...he would have to dress as the female slaves did, answer to--any sense of self he had found would be stripped from him-

“...not as a brand name. You mean as in Tonio Aclassi?” Brand name? Perhaps he should have been paying better attention, just what in the world were they talking about?

And then words that made his heart stop completely in his chest. Words that set him on the path he was on now, offered him relief he had not felt in years, and answer to all the questions that spawned his pressing fears.

“His son, Cremisius, actually.”

“Is Krem here?” Cullen asked, looking around.

“He will be soon,” Ellie said. Oh, soon.

“We apologize for interrupting,” the Seeker offered, “I have been assisting with a matter of import today and wished to check in with Eleanor while I had a moment to do so.” Was she apologizing to him? He started bringing Cremisius to the shop the very day he was fully weaned from his mother’s breast. Otherwise he would find himself constantly leaving his workshop to go and lay eyes on his child, hold him, hear him. Smell him—even when he got older, while he lost the ‘new baby smell’ there was something that was entirely his son, familiar and comforting, just, he would hold him close, head bowed, and breathe. He would never have gotten any work done the first several years of Cremisius’s life if he hadn’t started bringing him to work. If he begrudged this woman the only moment she could spare to seek her daughter and make certain she was well, he would certainly be the darkest pot in existence calling the kettle ‘black’.

“And I- oh, thank you, Inquisitor,” Cullen said when Ellie perceived his need, handed over the missive she’d signed earlier, “you read over everything?”

“Uh-huh,” Ellie said, “Sera helped with the words I got stumped on—I mean I can sound them out and stuff just, wasn’t sure what they meant."

The Seeker came and rested a hand on Ellie’s head, smoothing back her hair, “You’re coming along quite nicely with your reading, Eleanor, but I am pleased Sera was at hand…Marehis promises she will return as soon as she is finished,” Cassandra said, though she looked around now as well, “who guards you now?”

“Anya!” the girl informed them, and then assured, “Cole too—no worries, he’s here, just, you know. On the down low. I thought that’d be better than having someone openly hanging over us, you know?”

“As long as you’re secure, I’ve no issue,” Cassandra assured. “You’re well, yes? You’ve had a good day? I am truly sorry I could not be there this morning.”

“I was pretty anxious earlier, but our meeting went fine; Lady Josie explained your stance on things…you’re absolutely certain you’re okay with saying no to um, him?“

“Eleanor. I care so very little of my family’s good opinion—I’m actually outraged they would seek to manipulate you in such a manner. If it were feasible, I would have us transported to Nevarra so you could go before Markus* himself, deliver this decision to his face while Cullen stood at your back cheering you on in some ridiculous manner.”

“I have considered it,” Cullen told her, “and there would be dancing involved.”

The Seeker fought a grin at the man’s words, trying to maintain seriousness as she intoned, “Of course Markus is quite literally insane and such a move would be unadvisable. Moving forward with R-” Cassandra took pause, looking to Tonio, “with who you have chosen, will be rejection enough. Now, I was hardly apologizing for missing our War Room meetings—apparently they suck?”

The…the Fade?

“Oh certainly, that is the most pressing of his crimes thus far,” Cassandra assured, “I meant your talks—Marehis and myself, we are sorry we could not be there, but Cullen assures me you did so well.”

“She was the best one,” Cullen bragged.

“I was the only one!” Ellie argued laughingly.

“That doesn’t make my statement untrue!”

She snorted. “Uh-huh,” she drawled. Though then she seemed…he was not certain, just a moment of something like being dazed passed over her before she cleared her throat and offered up a smile, continuing on normally, “Everyone was super sweet, and I had a nice talk with Roderick. Don’t feel bad about missing that, gosh you- how is um. Everything?” she asked the Seeker.

“As well as can be expected,” the woman sighed. “Thank you, for agreeing to swiftly see to so many trials so we could clear the space for this purpose...though a great deal of our work has taken place more so in the back of the dungeons.”

“There isn’t really a back-“ she stopped as realization dawned in her face, “oh. Ohhhh…” it sounded like that explained something to her, but she took pause again and Tonio was beginning to be concerned,

“Are you well, my lady?” he asked just, sweat had begun to bead at her forehead and she seemed to be taking very controlled breaths.

“Ellie?” Cullen backed his questioning.

“I’m fine,” she said, before asking, “This morning? Around sevenish? You um,” she shook her head as if to clear it, “was that going on? You were with them just a little bit ago, was… are they doing that again?”

“We woke him around seven, yes,” the Seeker confirmed, “When I left they were speaking peaceably but...Eleanor?”

“Um. I don’t think he’s reaching out or anything on purpose, or trying to make me fe-when there’s too much of something from either of us, it spills into the-“ she stopped, thinking before carefully trying to explain, “this morning I got really sick to my stomach and lightheaded, dizzy and panicky like um-”

“Like one might feel while hanging from a great height. You are experiencing this now?” and when Ellie nodded the Seeker spun about on her heel to rush from the room, but that boy appeared, Cole.

“I will be faster,” he informed her before disappearing again.

“Is everything alright?” Tonio asked, confused and…concerned, Ellie was resting her head in her hand like perhaps it felt like it were spinning, and she was trying to steady it.

“Ellie, sweetheart,” the Commander came around the desk to kneel at her side, “what can we do?”

It was very confusing, he wasn’t certain just what was going on. Was she unwell? Their conversation made very little sense, but it didn’t seem like his business—like they were trying to guard what they were speaking of in his presence. He sat quietly while Cullen rubbed circles on her back, though he…oh he did feel he should do something when tears slipped from her eyes, she hastily wiped at them and whispered something about “Solas lo siente,,” that…was very similar to Tevene if he wasn’t mistaken, something about someone being sorry. Which hardly seemed to pacify the Commander, he looked like he might murder someone. The Seeker was pacing like she were very well considering doing just that.

Her teacup was empty so Tonio refreshed it, offering it to her it…it was something, he wasn’t certain at all if it would help, but she returned him a small smile of thanks and carefully took the cup in a slightly trembling hand and cautiously sipped. “Thanks, sorry um, something complicated is happening right now—I’m okay, everything’s fine, honest.”

“You did not say you were feeling unwell this morning,” Cullen spoke in gentle reprimand.

“I wasn’t feeling horribly enough to stop our meeting, I mean it was pretty important. And I did speak up with Sera, took potion, er, a few times today—I thought it was just my regularly scheduled War Room anxieties having an extra kick. Spicing things up, keeping things interesting so I don’t grow bored with it all, ya know?” This was all a terrible amount of pressure to place upon someone, she’d been expected to save the world from that ‘Breach’ he’d heard about, and she’d done it. Now she found herself…she was truly the leader of the Inquisition? It was little wonder she had such anxieties. At least she seemed to have a good sense of humor about it all.

The Seeker sighed came and pressed a kiss to the girl’s head, “I will go speak with Marehis. Do keep us appraised. We must be mindful of your…bono?” she attempted something Antivan. There were similarities between Tevene and Antivan, but he wasn’t extremely well versed in his countries dying language.

“You know what, you’re not entirely wrong? But that’s more the money one, not the connection kind.”

“Ahh. Do you need anything?” Ellie shook her head, no. “Has er, Cole returned?”

She nodded. “They stopped, I feel better. Cremisius will be here soon too, so, Cole can come help out if you need him?” the Seeker nodded.

“Have a pleasant evening, do let us know how everything goes,” Cullen said.

“Send for us if you’ve need,” Cassandra intoned before she stepped away from the girl, Commander following after her. Anya let out a little whine and left her place at Tonio’s feet to go to Ellie, lay with her front legs and her head in the girl’s lap.

“I’m sorry everything’s so secret-y,” she saw fit to apologize to him, “That…will be something to keep in mind too—Cremisius knows a lot of things, has a lot of information he has to keep confidential to do his job. If he won’t discuss something, it’s likely because he can’t, it’s nothing personal.”

Ahh, of course. His son had such high security clearance? “He would know all of what you just discussed?”

“Just about all of it, yeah.” That was good. He hoped…Cremisius was something of support, if he was choosing to be involved with her. “I’m so sorry this is such a weird day, I really did hope you’d be made to feel more welcome.”
Was she…was she serious?

“My lady, you’ve made me more than welcome, if I feel out of place it is simply because I am to some extent, this is all very new. I am not er…insulted or displeased. You are dealing with a complicated ‘weird’ day, I merely get to observe it and enjoy all of the pleasant things you’ve gone out of your way to arrange for myself, my son.”

She nodded. “Um, you don’t have to call me ‘lady’ or anything—you can call me Ellie if you like!”

Oh. “Certainly. You may call me Tonio if you wish.”

That made her smile. “Thanks!” and then she giggled when Anya trotted out away from the desk and started running in small, tight circles, panting excitedly before she stopped an let out a few short, happy sounding barks. “I think that means Cremisius is here!” she said, and then there was a knock at the door downstairs. “Are you ready?”

He was the one who felt poorly now, excited, and terrified made a nauseating mix. How had his son fared in his absence? Was he angry with him? Would he…should he have sprung this on him? It was too late to consider that, but what if the boy needed warning, to stop and consider if he wanted the father who had abandoned him back and in his life, working in the same facilities as he-

His son. He…oh Maker, he was about to see his son.

Ellie made haste down the stairs, and he almost wondered if he should have gone with her, it sounded like she slipped, but then the door was opening and she greeted her guest, and then the door was closing and she called up to him, “I hope you don’t mind, but I invited my boyfriend, to get his opinion!”

His opinion…certainly would matter, yes.

Oh. Oh Maker.

His son. His Cremisius. He was grown—he had grown, so very much. He had to be nearly a foot taller than when last he saw this boy. This man. Tall and so very strong—that night, the first and last time he’d truly seen his son, he’d been waif thin, so very small. Now he looked every bit the claims of his work as a soldier. He hardly recognized him, even as he felt the smile breaking across his face, and greeted, “Hello, Cremisius.”

Oh, but he was very much his Cremisius still,

“Papà!”

And he was strong, his boy winded him! And he could not be more glad of it, he was holding his son—his most precious child, his Cremisius!

It felt like physical heartbreak to hear this boy apologize to him of all people. He had nothing to apologize for!

When his son did finally calm it was only because he realized Tonio was in fact here, when he should be in Tevinter, and just how had that happened? Ellie had given them a moment as best she could, they were in her quarters after all, though this girl, she offered to retire to a closet if they wished more privacy.
And then Cremisius bid her closer, absently suggesting Tonio turnabout and he obliged but-

It did not feel right of him, but there was an element of concern...he worried, about the implications of his son’s gender. That he might be found undesirable, face so much rejection. That he may either be alone or settle for someone undeserving simply because they are accepting. Ellie clearly...all of this was born of love, something pure, he had seen it when they met in Val Royeaux. She had been genuine, in her insistence that she would want this, do anything in her power to make this happen, despite their personal standing. But to see...they were truly just like any young couple. This girl loved his son, wanted him, desired and made him feel desired it seemed. And what was more, Cremisius did so likewise, he had never in his wildest dreams believed his son would have something like this. It almost felt as though a bit of role reversal had taken place—his son was teaching him what real, true love should look like, it was certainly not the picture he and Liviana had painted for him. That had been...he had a kind of love for his wife, the sort born of obligation. He had done ‘right’ things, but most of what he did do was to make up for the fact that it what they had was hardly ideal. The imperative need to produce a Mage heir did nothing to incite romantic chemistry between two incompatible people.

But here, what Cremisius was experiencing, the example he was living by was a far cry from what he had borne witness to from his parents, even farther than what he had been taught to expect for himself from them. Cornelius had been demoralizing control, force, and farce. This young woman, she made his son feel like the man he is. Loved him the way he could only pray someone would love his son—completely, totally, genuinely.

It was quite the evening, quite the meal and yet somehow they talked far more than they ate. He felt badly when he learned it was meant to be a date night of sorts for the two of them, but they were glad for the intrusion, there was no awkwardness when their meal arrived. Steak, crispy rounds of potatoes, carrots glazed in honey, and a bottle of sweet red wine he...could not even remember when last he ate like this. Cremisius made swift work with uncorking the bottle and poured a glass for his father before he poured another for himself though he made no move to do so for his young lady, Tonio took up the bottle to offer her some but she smiled and politely declined, satisfied with the juice she’d been supplied with though the moment she declined she seemed startled and then assured,

“I’m not pregnant! I just don’t drink!”

He...had not been concerned of such. But should he be? There were...obvious changes in his son, he had been mildly alarmed to see how very erm, flat chested he was now but when they hugged he felt something sturdy beneath his tunic something that seemed to bind his chest. That was a non-magical solution, but were there magical ones? Blood magic that might alter his form? But Cremisius chuckled when Ellie posed the unnecessary assurance, said there’d been no concern that she was, so that put doubt in the notion that his son was indeed changed in such a way he could unwittingly impregnate his girlfriend, or that she would be the sort to er, step out on him. There were other feasible methods for them, of course, but those would require the young couple intentionally seeking to become parents which...was unlikely at this time, was it not? He and Liviana had gone to great lengths to produce a child and in the end it had taken a ritual that would have brought forth new life so long as at least one in their pair had the ability to carry a child, and even then, further still had been the need to secure that life. A Healer came weekly to ensure their child was healthy, cast protections to Liviana’s womb, and she had the vilest smelling potions regimen, things meant to aid in the success of her pregnancy. And too, there were...things that had been more the stuff of wives tales, supposedly they would increase their child’s magical potential. They had both suffered through the poultice of lyrium-infused valerian root (ghastly stuff) and sea holly—while it has a pleasant enough name, it stank of Mabari droppings—that was to be applied upon her stomach before going to sleep each night. But Cremisius, oh he had been well worth it, he...could not have loved someone more so very instantly, than in the moment the Healer first let him hold his child.

And now that babe was a grown man, working for the Inquisition. It was incredibly fascinating to hear just how so many of the people he’d met had joined their cause, although explanations like ‘time travel’ were certainly wild. And it was incredibly...it was nice to hear the girl speak so enthusiastically, of her interest, that the Iron Bull—that was his name! he would remember it now after so sorely messing it up—had sent the handsomest Charger to put in their offer to join. Cremisius blushed as he countered with the fact he had been ‘snooting all over everything’, and she defended her stance, that he had been sick. He seemed well enough now, of course, but still it...one of the greatest burdens of their separation had been worry, fear. That some horrible fate had befallen his son in his absence, that he was hurt, or sick and Tonio would have no way of knowing, no way of helping him. It ached in him enough he had to question it—wanted to know just who had been there for him, if anyone. And again, “Ellie helped a lot” had secured him treatment he felt...safe in receiving. Apparently that could be an issue, of course, just the vulnerability of being placed in a situation you could be outed to a total stranger, let alone the possibility a strange Healer may take issue and refuse treatment. Ellie had perceived these worries, listened when Cremisius insisted he needn’t see this ‘Adan’ fellow and she had taken such care of his son, accepted him from the start. He’d been concerned, by the things he had witnessed—the pitfalls and perils of being Herald-turned-Inquisitor but his son seemed to know well what he was getting into and found the situation well worth it, and after seeing them together, hearing these things, he could not be more certain he loved the pair the two of them made.

And then he learned just what had driven his Cremisius—his sweet boy who could not abide poisoning or injuring the mice and rats that endeavored to take up residence in Tonio’s workshop, in their home, would carefully capture, take them up into his hand and find safe haven for them—to join the military, become a soldier. It had been the most viable method of taking care of himself, his mother, but to join as a woman would have meant a betrayal to himself, to the life his father had given himself up for to secure for him. Too, it was less pay and there was some measure further of gender bias—he could receive benefits for his family, as their sole provider, in the men’s unit as opposed to the women’s. So he found a Healer that would allow him to lie about his age, and in the eyes of the government, his gender, on his documentation. Tonio Aclassi was not a violent man, but he could certainly wish harm upon the Healer that sent his son on the run, would not hear his case, saw and would have him fined for forgery, falsifying government documents—exorbitant fees he would be enslaved to work off if he could not pay them outright which of course he could not possibly afford.

He would die grateful to the Iron Bull. Getting involved and aiding his son when he had been in peril—a tribune, Maker. He had risked his life, sacrificed a piece of his own body, there could well have been a future where a blue-eyed Qunari worked for the Inquisition, no need of an eyepatch and no Tevinter Lieutenant at his side.

He had worked so very hard, secured such a miraculous life for himself. He’d taken on so much responsibility, and it...if he was heartbroken over Liviana it was that she would seemingly never appreciate the sacrifices their son made for her. She and Cornelius deserved each other—it made him sick to his stomach, when he thought now how foolish he’d been. Seeing Cornelius’s proposal as kindness, as the man seeing their situation and wishing to help out in the best way he knew how. The kindest thing that man would ever truly do for Cremisius is take his mother off of his hands.

Everything had been so very exhilarating, exciting, but ultimately he was exhausted. He did worry he had not earned his rest—while it seemed Ellie had secured so much of her day to be dedicated to his initiation into the Inquisition and his reunion with his son, he had thought they were meant to get something of his work for her done, but they had not done so much as even speak of what he might produce for her or taken measurements. But she was immediate insistence that he must be tired, had offered him her arm, to escort him. He thought Cremisius would wish to walk with her but he...seemed to be taking up a defensive position, watching and guarding as they made their way through Skyhold, up through a large library and across the inner balcony to a hall overlooking what he supposed were the gardens Ellie had spoken in earlier. There were several doors lining the wall, perhaps multiple entrances to fewer rooms than there were doors so servants could steadily pass in and out without hinderance or maybe they were small rooms that held however many was possible-

He...had not been expecting a room of his own. His quarters, truly, he was even given a key. He had not even thought of his shaving kit, that he’d left it in her quarters, but no—when servants came to clear away his old things, it had been taken as well, brought here to sit on top of the chest of drawers. They provided him clothes for sleeping in, and what was more, an actual bed. He was not...he certainly felt out of depth. He had received so much kindness today he hardly knew what to do with it, and when he spoke of his gratitude, he was met with further kindness still —You made the actual best human being I've ever had the honor of loving and being loved by — what more could a parent wish to hear of their child? It was all overwhelming, and while he did regret their time together for the day was over when Cremisius insisted he see the girl safely back to her quarters, he was grateful that he would have time alone to process. And too, something in saying goodbye was thrilling because he was saying so while secure in the idea that tomorrow, they would see each other again!

“Breakfast,” Cremisius said, “and I’ll introduce you to the guys tomorrow, if you’re free.”

He huffed a laugh at that, Maker. If he’s free? After everything today, “I believe I am.”

He was alone, safe in a room of his own. He washed up as he changed for bed, there was even tooth brush and paste for him at the wash basin, more soap, and the sleep clothing they left for him...he could not remember when last he was so very clean and comfortable. When he lay in bed, beneath thick, warm covers, he had only the sparsest moment to offer up praise and thanks to his Maker before sleep consumed him, deep and satisfying, restful sleep. No one was going to steal his things, there were no task-masters ready to strike if he did not rise the very moment he was called.

There was however...quiet giggling, the sound of ‘shushing’ and something was crawling, causing the mattress to heave and dip until someone very warm curled up against his side.

He opened his eyes to find the pup, Anya, had taken up residence in his bed, which was admittedly welcome, comforting. Even more so, was the sight of Ellie and his Cremisius, seeming bemused with the Mabari, Ellie had a tray in hand—oh, the two of them were armored, Maker his son truly did look like a soldier.

And young Ellie, setting the tray on his bed, she...looked like a Mage. Was she? When he thought on it, he had noticed a staff sitting propped up against the bookcase at her back the other day, but it bore the Inquisition’s seal at its head. He thought it ceremonial, but she was currently putting fire in the hearth of the small fireplace that warmed his room. Without the assistance of a match, just, from her own hand.

The Maker was either the greatest comedian, or a horrible bastard. He did not wish to get ahead of himself, but what irony would there be, that years of struggle trying to force a mage daughter out of Cremisius, he may just provide one for them. A Mage daughter-in-law.
“Sorry,” Ellie said, “we really didn’t mean to wake you—“

He sat up, hand reaching to pet through the soft fur of Anya’s side, “There is no need to apologize, it is time I rise, yes?”

“Oh gosh, you can rest some more if you’d like, we were just bringing you breakfast for whenever you got up.”

“We grabbed you a tray while we had the chance,” Cremisius explained as he and Ellie took seats to his right and left, on the end of the bed.

The girl whispered Parshaara to Anya when the pup perked up like she might try to help herself to its contents, “You already had breakfast silly girl, you keep eating everyone’s food on top of it and you’ll be a right chunk—a beautiful, adorable chunk that I’ll still love to pieces, but you’ll be pretty miserable joint-wise, it’s just not very healthy for you,” Ellie lectured. The pup may or may not have understood but she laid back down, tail wagging contentedly as she made to observe his breakfast instead of consuming it.

He had slept deeply, through the promise of breakfast with his son—it was nearly ten in the morning! He had never slept that late in all his life! They had been up, the pair of them, since five, had already eaten, had quite the start to their days—but it was a blessing to see them first thing, and while they were likely busy, the couple sat with him while he ate, kept him company.

“Bull’s got Stitches on orders to come check you out here in a bit if you’re up for it,” Cremisius said, “Physical, checkup, eye exam. Make sure you’re all good.”

Oh. That was certainly generous, but, “He needn’t go through any trouble for me, he is your company healer is he not? The Inquisition has offered me access to their healers.”

“Which includes Stitches—but Adan would see you too if you wanted,” Ellie said, “he said he’d be glad to. Elan is head apothecary for the Inquisition now—she’s brilliant—but we figured you might be more comfortable seeing a male healer. You really should have a checkup, everyone needs them. Kind of weird to get used to, I know.” And then she smiled, “My first Inquisition checkup…well, the first one I had I was actually awake for, meeting Adan. We’re going through, asking me all kinds of questions, and he asks me if I’m active and I’m thinking, well I’m constantly on the move, always going from place to place, up walking or running or working all day so I say, ‘oh yeah, all the time’ and Marehis could not stop laughing! She got it way before I did, I was confused until he clarified he’d meant sexually! It was so embarrassing! I thought Marehis was going to pee herself!”

Oh goodness, he found himself laughing, that…would indeed be an embarrassing miscommunication. Though he wondered, “Who is Marehis?” he was…decently certain that hadn’t been someone he met yesterday, but the name sounded vaguely familiar. The Seeker had mentioned her he thought.

“Oh, she’s my mami too, like Cassandra—she was hired to be my bodyguard once the whole ‘treason’ thing was cleared up and I’d been declared Herald of Andraste.” Treason? He would really need to have a proper discussion with someone and get the whole of what he had missed—he’d barely heard of the Breach, had seen it on the horizon when they were traveling, and noticed it was gone. But he didn’t know where it came from really, or how the Inquisition came to be the source of its demise. “She’s usually with me but um, she’s got other work she needs to see to right now, but you’ll meet her sometime!” she said cheerily, though it sounded like she was reassuring herself to some degree.
Cremisius laid his hand over hers, squeezing gently, “She’ll be done soon, El. Sounds like she’s just about got all she needs. She’s doing a sit-down with Bull this afternoon, see if she has enough information to answer any questions he’d have.”

Ellie nodded. “He told me. I’m just not entirely sure um…I don’t know how she’ll be feeling, she might need some time off, you know?”

Cremisius nodded, though he was confused at, “When did you see him?”

“First thing—he came to cuddle! And Sera, and Cole, and Dorian. I um…my room got super cold.”

Truly? Her room quarters had been rather pleasant, toasty warm even as the sun had set last night. The fireplace in her rooms was large and burned plenty- “Thought it was a little chilly when I came to pick you up. Fireplace bothering you again?” Cremisius asked her quietly. Bothering her? Oh.

Haven had burned in the night.

“Little bit,” she admitted, blushing as if embarrassed, “it’s stupid—“

“Hey, it’s anything but stupid, lovely. I would’ve stayed.”

She smiled shyly. “That would’ve been nice, but I didn’t know it was going to be a thing until after you’d already left, and I wasn’t really…Cole had to come put it out. He got the Iron Bull because it’d be cold and that woke Dorian and his initial wake-up whining as they headed my way woke Sera, but it worked great! We were very squished as it was anyway. I mean Cole doesn’t really sleep, but—”

“Guy likes to cuddle though, I’m always game, he could’ve just laid on me. If you need me next time, have him get me, okay?”

“Kay,” she agreed.

That was sweet. He was not sure how the young lady’s parents might feel of such a thing, but they spoke of being with a great many people. He supposed ultimately, it was no one else’s business but their own. He trusted this Ellie with his Cremisius. And from what he had seen, his son was a proper gentleman and he had this sense of…care about him. That was not something he had lost, he had always been something of a constant source of support. He had not lost his sweetness, his compassion, those were not gendered modes of personality, they were intrinsically Cremisius. As much a part of him, as they were of his young lady, who looked to Tonio now and smiled, saying,

“I have a meeting here soon, but Mister Stitches will send me word when he’s done with your checkup, and as long as you’re feeling up to it, maybe this afternoon we can get started on my wardrobe? Only if you feel like it—“

“Of course, I apologize we did not get to it yesterday,” Tonio replied.

“Oh gosh, it’s not your fault everything was so crazy!” she insisted. “Have you eaten enough? We can get you more bacon,” she offered, giving Cremisius a bit of a teasingly reproachful glare ahh. Well then, he had eaten everything off of the tray except…he had been certain there was bacon. He’d eaten the whole of his potatoes, and a hearty helping of scrambled eggs but no-
He’d not noticed, he’d been merely relieved at having an actual proper breakfast, the company of these two wonderful children that he did not realize the most blessed thing had occurred. Something normal, something that had not happened to him in years.

His Cremisius had taken—stolen—his bacon. In lean times, they could get by without notice from their son by making up a single serving of the stuff, and putting it only on Tonio’s plate, because regardless of quantity, even if Cremisius had bacon aplenty with his own meal, the boy wasn’t done with breakfast unless he’d eaten at least some of his father’s bacon. There had been mornings—too many he…oh he had not liked that, worried—when his child would dash into the kitchen, insist he was running late, and he’d snatch a few slices in hand, kiss Tonio on the cheek as he did every morning in farewell, before he’d run out the door. On those mornings, foregoing a larger, proper meal. Liviana had wanted his measurements down, and too, upon reflection he was certain some measure of depression had been involved, he’d had practically no appetite, had not eaten much of anything in the days that led up to the rehearsal dinner.

“Always after my bacon, whatever am I to do with such a horrible child, eh?” he asked and it was merely natural, a habit, reaching out a hand to tweak at the tip of Cremisius’s nose, and the boy grinned, blushing but not seeming off put by the gesture. “I’m well and full, truly, I could not eat another bite,” he assured Ellie. “You have a meeting to get to?”

“Yeah, but um, I could see if someone will switch out with Cremisius—” she was offering.

“El, I already agreed to work this shift, I’m not backing out. For one thing, I definitely don’t want to, I mean I’m getting paid to walk around with you, and I might get to have a good fight…in front of you, these are all big positives in my book. Besides, sudden shift changes throws off the others and Leliana has to make adjustments to how she runs things—there’s literally so much paperwork that happens it’s a nightmare. Case in point: she just finished taking account after Tuesday’s wild game of ‘pass the Inquisitor’ having you bounce from Cole to Cullen to Cole to Cassandra to Wolf-boy, to Marehis, to Bull. She’s gonna physically cringe from the trauma of it all when I put down in my minutes 10:22am, the Inquisitor requested an unscheduled change in the guard—request denied.”

“You’d tattle on me?!” Ellie asked in mock shocked hurt.

“That’s my entire job, babe,” he informed her, “tattling on you all day long.”

“Rude!”

“I’ll be sure to pass your feedback on our process back to the Spymaster, she’ll appreciate it.”

“You can’t please all of the red-heads in your life, Cremisius, we’re a complicated people! It’s her or me!”

“Hmmmm…for your safety, I think I’m gonna have to go with her, sorry lovely,” he apologized laughingly, smiling as he asked, “Will you forgive my grave transgression if I invite you to dinner with the Chargers this evening? Dalish is making some favorites.”

“Spicy chicken rice stuff?”

“Yup.”

“And your papa’s coming?”

“He certainly is—I mean you are, right?” Cremisius checked with him, “It’s a Thursday, we don’t get together for family dinners outside the regularly scheduled Tuesday ones for any old thing."

Family dinners? “I would be honored,” he assured.

Ellie seemed to take it under consideration. “Hmmm…well I guess in that case—10:25 the Inquisitor forgives my grave transgressions. And says I have a cute butt. I will actually pay you to write that down in your reports.”

“Oh, lovely, come on,” he complained with a sigh, “now I gotta put ‘and tried to offer me bribes to dictate my report herself’ that’s just not a good look, the Inquisitor manipulating the system like that. Today it’s to inform Leliana—and the whole of your security team that I’ve got an amazing butt—”

“I said cute.”

“It’s spectacular—tomorrow,” he continued without missing a beat, “it’s outright lying on them, saying you were dutifully attending the sick or something when really you were off…” oh, that gave him pause, “…I can’t even think of something bad you’d be getting up to?”

She was indignant at that, “I do bad stuff! All the time! I’ll remind you I’m a hardened criminal—I literally have a solid decade of crime under my belt, Cremisius. I’m a menace and I really must be stopped.”

Cremisius snorted at that, “Oh I do quiver in fear, please won’t the Maker rescue us all from the scary five-foot Apostate?”

“I’m five foot two and one quarter!”

Cremisius rose back from the bed, untied a sack from his hip that clinked with coin and tossed it onto the bed at Ellie’s side, raising his hands in submission, “Alright, let’s keep a level head here—don’t hurt us, just take it and be on your way, villain.”

Ellie looked like she was made of mischief as she looked to Tonio, “Abby will be by to take your tray, do you need anything at all?”

“Not a thing,” he assured her, not certain what was so-

Ahh. The girl grinned brilliantly before she snatched up the coin purse and bounced off the bed, giggling as she fled with Cremisius barking out a laugh as she reached the door and Cremisius quickly leaned to give Tonio a kiss on the cheek and clicked his tongue at Anya in the same instant he gave Ellie chase, out of his quarters and he did hope they would be careful on the library stairs.

Oh. Something in his heart sang at that—not only that he was here, with his son, able to receive a kiss on the cheek but…it was another thing he’d feared he’d lose, if not eventually to age, then to identity. That Cremisius would either feel he was too old to wish to display such a sign of affection to his father, or that he would feel emasculated doing so. Tonio’s own father would have brawled him in the street if he ever attempted such a thing with him…of course their relationship had been such that he wouldn’t wish to kiss the man on the cheek in the first place.

There was a knock on his door just as he was finished brushing his teeth, and he opened it to….a very dark-skinned man, who was certainly not the pallid, blonde-headed girl that brought the Ambassador his lunch the previous day. Though he was armored in a cuirass that smacked a closeness to what Cremisius wore-“FUCK ME STRAIGHT TO HELL THERE’S TWO OF YOU. LIAM BENNETT,” HE INTRODUCED HIMSELF, GIVING TONIO A FIRM HANDSHAKE, “EVERYONE CALLS ME STITCHES, SAME CAN GO FOR YOU. WE ALL GOT NICKNAMES IN THE CHARGERS, I SUSPECT YOU’LL FALL VICTIM TO THAT SOON ENOUGH, BULL’S JUST GOT TO MULL IT OVER IN THAT HEAD OF HIS.”

STITCHES? AHH, “YOU’RE THE CHARGER’S HEALER? IT’S A PLEASURE TO MEET YOU, ER, THANK YOU, SER, I’M SURE YOU’RE BUSY.”

“NOT A PROBLEM—THOUGH DON’T TELL BULL I SAID AS MUCH, HE’LL THINK I ACTUALLY ENJOY MY JOB. MIND IF I COME IN?”

“OF COURSE, PLEASE.” HE...HADN’T THOUGHT TO INVITE THE MAN IN—IT HAD BEEN A LONG WHILE SINCE HE HAD DOMAIN OVER ANYTHING, HAD THE RIGHT TO ALLOW OR DENY ANY WHO WOULD COME INTO HIS SPACE.

“ALRIGHT, JUST A FEW THINGS TO START WITH,” STITCHES SAID, MOTIONING FOR TONIO TO BE SEATED, HE PULLED UP THE DESK CHAIR FOR HIS GUEST AND TOOK A SEAT ON HIS BED. THE HEALER REMAINED STANDING AS HE DUG AROUND IN A POCKET AND PULLED OUT A FEW SMALL SLIPS OF PARCHMENT. “GOT SOME NOTES FROM MY UNOFFICIAL ASSISTANT, BOSSY LITTLE THING. WOULD YOU LOOK UP AT ME PLEASE?” HE ASKED, AND TONIO OBLIGED. “UH-HUH, PALLID INNER EYE, CHECK, YELLOWISH TINGING AROUND THE IRIS AND IN THE SKIN, CHECK CHECK...HANDS PLEASE,” HE ORDERED MORE SO THAN ASKED, TAKING HOLD OF HIS HANDS AND EXAMINING HIS FINGERTIPS, THE PADS OF HIS FINGERS WERE YELLOWISH, streaks of white. “Damn,” he muttered something under his breath before turning them over to look at his fingernails, they were...rather strange looking, truth be told, he was a little concerned they would fall off. “Kay. I don’t know what the hell- you’ve got way too much of some shit, and not enough of the rest. Vitamins, minerals, that sort of thing. I’m going to give you something—it’s like a purgative, but magical. You’ll sick up in about twenty minutes, but after that you’ll be right as rain—you’ve got bad copper toxicity, and that needs corrected as soon as possible.” Purgative sounded wholly unpleasant, but he nodded, and the Healer began digging around in his medicine bag, “What exactly have you been eating might I ask?”

“ER, A...IT’S A PASTE, SIR? GREY, DOESN’T TASTE LIKE MUCH OF ANYTHING. BREAD SOMETIMES?”

“Yeah, okay, shit. Dunno what the hell they put in that, but you’ve been getting a ton of copper from somewhere. And not much of anything else it looks like. You just had breakfast, yeah?” Tonio nodded. “Alright, probably for the best—might not seem like it, but it’ll be easier on you if you’re sicking up with food on your stomach first. I want you to start a fast tonight—no eating after midnight at the latest, and I’ll swing by again in the morning before breakfast—get you tested proper, for specifics but from what I can tell you’re anemic, deficient in most of your damn vitamins and minerals. I’ll get you started on a proper supplement regimen and we’ll keep a good eye on your diet alright? Make sure you’re getting all the proper nutrients there.” He handed him a small vial of black liquid that looked thick, was sort of...glowing? Magical, he’d said.

His son trusted this man, so he swallowed it in one nasty gulp, and answered the whole of his questioning the best he could, how much he weighed, height, how er...many times did he have to relieve himself in a day? Was he sexually active or...the man broached the subject carefully, clarifying that he would need to know if he’d had sexual contact of any sort, ‘didn’t have to get into specifics unless you want’. Blessedly, the answer was ‘none’ which was more than many could say. The Healer took his chin in hand and instructing to keep his mouth open as he checked his teeth for issue. He’d had to ask one of his roommates to assist pulling out a rotted molar last spring, but no new problem came from that. Then the man rose from his seat, went to stand against the far wall, and pulled out a sheet of parchment he held up. He had Tonio read off different lines on it—randomized letters, the occasional miniature silhouette of what he recognized now to be the Iron Bull’s head. Oh Cremisius had fashioned the sheet for their company Healer, a bit of amusement and ribbing for their ‘Chief’ who had regular eye exams. Hand over his left eye, read the third line, hand over his right, read the fifth, top line please both eyes open. Then there was this wild set of spectacles, thin wire frame but with all of these swiveling glass panes attached that could be raised and lowered before his eyes. He was to try them each and see which combination, if any, would assist allow him to see even the smallest line of lettering on the vision sheet. Miss Abby did come and take his tray while they worked, that was kind of her, he wasn’t entirely certain where the kitchens were exactly. Was he allowed…where exactly was he allowed to go, in Skyhold?

“Alright, that’s enough for now.” He said as he took the spectacles in hand, took down which combination of lenses had been of assistance. “I’ll get the order out, should be here first thing next week. How’re we feeling?”

Very strange for the past several minutes, lightheaded, and there was his pulling sensation almost, in the upper right side of his stomach—not his stomach, actually-

“That’ll be your liver. Where copper’s stored in the body—too much of it and that’s one of the first organs to go, which is pretty uh, not good. No worries though, potion’s literally pulling it out of your liver, should be moving lower? Yup, into your stomach. Feeling nauseous?”

So much so he nodded, as opposed to opening his mouth to speak, he worried he might be sick on the man otherwise.

“Okay—here we go, we’ll have this rinsed out when you’re done, no problem,” he said, emptying his wash basin of soapy water into the pitcher used to fill it in the first place, and then passing the empty bowl to Tonio. “Been through this loads of times—entirely up to you, I can stay, or I can give you some privacy.”

“Privacy, if you would.”

“Good man.”

He…certainly felt ‘good’, better at least, once he was through. Maker, there was a lot of…orangish black gunk.

It won’t be gross for me. You should lie down and rest some more, I’ll take care of this. that…he wasn’t sure what that was, but he did lay down, fell asleep for a time.

When he woke it was nearly one. His throat felt raw but…there was a steaming cup of honeyed tea on the bedside table, he had the impression…he’d begun to stir because he’d just barely perceived a hand carding through his hair, a kiss to his temple just moments ago. Now there was a note on his nightstand.

Feel better. Ask for Cole if you need anything. Dinner is at 8 in the Tavern. Love you ~ Cremisius.

His sweet boy, oh. The tea soothed his throat, lifted his spirits. Though to look at the time, he wondered when was he to meet with Ellie? No one had come for him, but it was likely to happen soon. Or was he supposed to go to her? Was he allowed to leave his quarters unpermitted?

He washed his face and shaved. Tidied his hair once he dressed for the day. He was just working up the courage to set foot outside the door when a polite knock rapped against it.

Oh. An Antivan, but not Ellie. “Good afternoon, Ambassador.”
“Good afternoon, Mister Aclassi,” she greeted in kind, looking him over, “you look very handsome in your suit. You’re feeling better, I hope?”

“Yes miss, thank you. The Inquisition has been very generous.” He hadn’t realized how… he supposed he’d merely gotten used to it, but now that he’d been purged of the toxicity in his body, offered a few proper meals, gotten ample rest, he felt better than he had in ages. He’d not realized just how exhausted he’d been, worn out—wrenched out, like a washing cloth. He felt much better, worlds apart from even some twenty-four hours ago.

“I was wondering if you’d plans for lunch? I thought you might wish to share the meal with a familiar face since the Chargers are out of Skyhold for a while, and Eleanor has joined them.”

Out of Skyhold? “That is very kind of you, but you needn’t trouble yourself.”

“It is no trouble,” she assured him.

“Then I would be honored.”

She favored him a warm smile at that, “Excellent. Come, we’ll eat in my office,” and as he closed the door behind them she asked, “Have you been given a tour of Skyhold yet?”

“No miss.”

“If you would like, I could provide that once we’ve eaten?”

“I would certainly appreciate it. Am I…I’m not entirely certain when I’m allowed from my room, what exactly is off limits?”

She offered her arm, so he accepted it, and she led him. “You…sir I assure you, you’re free to move as you please—you’ve no restriction to remaining in your room at certain hours. You’ve the run of Skyhold—there are a few restricted areas, but they are off limits to most. I will show you. You’re not a prisoner, Mister Aclassi, Skyhold is your home now and you’re welcome to it. Ahh.” The partitions were folded back to reveal a desk and chair, a daybed, two high-backed chairs. There was a very regal looking woman seated in one of the two high-backed chairs, one leg crossed over the other, a book in hand, though she looked up as they arrived and Lady Montilyet said, “Good afternoon, Madam de Fer—Mister Aclassi, this is the Imperial Grand Enchanter of Orlais, Vivienne de Fer, she volunteered to assist in court relations and she goes into the field with Eleanor, as needed. Vivienne, this is Tonio Aclassi, Cremisius’s father.”

Maker, a Grand Enchanter? He bowed his head. “An honor to meet you, Madam de Fer.”

The book in her hand snapped shut and she offered him a nod of acknowledgment. “How wonderful. I’m informed you are a tailor?”

“Yes Madam.”

“I look forward to seeing your work on young Eleanor—Lieutenant Aclassi has obligations to the Chargers to fulfill, so I shall be taking over guard of Eleanor when they return from the Chargers’ little mission. I will be sitting in on your session later.”

It took a moment to realize who ‘Lieutenant Aclassi’ was. “I would be honored, I’m grateful for the opportunity.”

“Quite.”
“We’ll leave you to your study, Vivienne,” Lady Montilyet said, “Have a pleasant afternoon.”

“You as well, darling,” she offered in dismissal.

“Mission?” he asked the Lady as they entered the library.

“Oh yes, it’s quite the story- oh, Dorian.”

“You really are here, splendid!” the Tevinter man was seated in a chair tucked away in an alcove of the library. “The more of us the merrier I say.”

“Thank you, Altus Pavus, for your help.”

“Please, Altus Pavus…is not my father’s title, but neither would I care to go by it. Do call me Dorian. While I do so love to take credit for marvelous things, especially if I had to put minimal effort into them—in all fairness, that is certainly the case here. Ellie and Varric are more responsible, they worked rather tirelessly to make this possible.”

“Still, I am grateful to you, sir. My son speaks highly of you, and you’ve been a friend to him. I appreciate that.”

“Well, if I am, it is only because he has been a good friend to me. He’s a good man, your son.”

“Thank you.”

Dorian waved them off, and Lady Montilyet led him almost back around to the door they’d come in, to show him the staircase leading up, “That is the Rookery—Leliana, our Spymaster, operates from up there, only security personnel are allowed past this point. However, it is also the method by which mail is sent—her birds—that table there,” she pointed to the nearby desk with locked up boxes sitting atop it, there were slits cut into their tops to slide folded letters into. “If you wish to send anything—orders, personal correspondence—do so there, they’re checked at the top of every hour. Of course if you need anything bigger than a letter sent out, let me know and arrangements can be made.”

A woman in lavender armor, just a bit of ginger hair showing from under her hood, was coming down the stairs, reading something she crumbled in hand before looking up to see them, “Oh. Josie. Abby informs me you’ve miraculously remembered to order lunch for yourself today.”

“It is no miracle I merely- oh. I suppose I do keep forgetting,” she said mostly to herself it seemed. Had she not eaten yesterday? She’d gotten after everyone else to take time for a meal! Well, he supposed he was glad she remembered to do so today, even if it seemed she only did so because, “I’m about to have lunch with Mister Aclassi,” she said. “Tonio, this is Leliana, our Spymaster.”

“An honor to meet you,” he assured.

“Ahh, Mister Aclassi I am pleased you’ve arrived. I’ve had the pleasure of working with your son, he’s a sharp young man,” she looked to Josie again, “I’ve a meeting with Marehis, before her sit down with the Iron Bull.”

Lady Montilyet nodded, “Do give her my love.”

They parted ways then and Lady Montilyet led him down the stairs, and into the Great Hall, walking directly across the hall and out into the area below his quarters, she spoke as they circled the walkway around the gardens, “These are the Chantry Gardens, all are welcome here at any time to simply enjoy them or seek guidance from our Chantry members, to meditate or pray. There are worship services every Sunday for any who wish to participate, and smaller sessions throughout the week. Schedules are posted in common areas,” she came to a stop at the bottom of stairs opposite the entrance, “These, are a thing of evil,” she insisted, even as they were walking up them. “I cannot tell you how many times I have sought my quarters this way—you would think they lead to the rooms above, but they do not.”

Oh. Truly, they did seem to be placed to lead up to the quarters overhead, but they lead to the outer battlements instead, and did not branch off to give access to those rooms. “That would be disheartening,” he agreed, to be coming in after a long day only to find you’ve gone the wrong way and must walk back and across, and upward and around to get to where you were going.

“I am just there,” she said, pointing down to what he was decently certain was the door next to his, “we are neighbors, along with Marehis. You are comfortable, where you are? Is there anything more you need?”

“It is more than enough, thank you.”

“It was hardly any trouble. Come, let’s head to my office, shall we?”

She led him through her office this time, however, down the corridor to the large double doors, “This is another restricted area—the War Room, where Eleanor meets with myself and the rest of her Advisory council.”

“War room?”

“It is much less exciting than it sounds. It is mostly where the four of us bicker amongst ourselves or handle minor affairs, occasionally Eleanor stands in and gets to listen to us, be a tie breaker of sorts, finalizes major decisions—that is when it is truly exciting.”

Maker, it still sounded intimidating to him.

They sat down to lunch in the Ambassador’s office, which of course he was welcome to any time—there was a hook on the entryway door that she could hang notice on if she was occupied with an important visitor to the Inquisition or handling a confidential matter in her office, she would let him know, of course, when he could disregard that.

“You said I could take on clients, yesterday?” he ventured as they ate, “From Inquisition allies?”

She dabbed at the corners of her mouth with a napkin before speaking, “Certainly. Whenever you’re ready to do as much, I’ll advertise your services to visitors, and in the following update—I pen a newsletter of sorts to keep our allies and donors up to date on the Inquisition’s progress.”

“I would be ready. Am ready, I mean.”

Though that seemed to give her pause. “Truly?” she asked, “We’ve not even finished your tour, you’ve not seen your workspace.”

“But I have one, yes? As soon as I’ve a sewing machine, and materials, I can get to work.”

“I mean that you haven’t taken time to acclimate. You’ve traveled very far, you’ve only just reunited with your son—you should take the time you need to recover from your journey, get a feel for the bare basics of what you will do here in the Inquisition before you take on so much. You may find you’ll overwhelm yourself. Sir with all due respect, an hour ago you were keeping to your rooms because you feared you would be barred from leaving them, forbidden from anywhere of interest in Skyhold, even from your own workspace except for specified times. You’ve a limited grasp on what your life with be like here.”

“I…you have all been so kind to me already I-“

“You wish to prove to us you are worth our kindness? That is clear enough already, and you’ll make certain that idea even more so as you take on Eleanor as your first, and preferably only client for right now. Let your work speak for itself, see how you do with a single client, and then, when you’ve had time to see where you’re at, how you’re adjusting and recovering, I would gladly help you branch out.”

“I apologize if I overstep-“

“There is no need to-,” she stopped and cleared her throat, taking a moment before she looked to him, rising to her feet as she spoke with certainty, “Mister Aclassi. You are not a slave of the Inquisition. What you signed yesterday was the same sort of contact every Inquisition recruit has signed, including myself. While there are certainly some differences, freedom is not one of them. You could stand up, walk out that door, and straight out the nearest sign of civilization, rent a room, have a drink, a meal, go shopping, anything. You would certainly receive reprimand for missing your appointment with Eleanor, and if you made a habit of frivolously disregarding your work, you would of course be dismissed from your role of tailor. Of course, there is the matter that we have taken on your debts to House Tilani, and you owe us for that, you would of course be free to take up employment elsewhere whether that be a different role within the Inquisition, or a position elsewhere—we would work out a livable payment plan, and you would work your debt off in that way. And if you failed to comply with that, it would be a matter we would take to court—you would need to find legal representation, counter our argument, perhaps the judge is a fan of the Imperium, likes your candor, and ultimately dismisses our claims—we would be left with your debt, pay it off to Magister Tilani, and you could go on your merry way. Free, no more so than you are in this very moment. You may sleep, rise, eat when you wish, you may go anywhere within Skyhold save the two—eventually three—places I will have shown you. If you choose to continue our tour that is, you’ve the freedom to tell me to go to hell with it all. It would be very rude, and hurt my feelings, but you would not be punished, you would not be starved or beaten, or have privileges revoked. You can take on clients, if you wish. But you can also have your meeting with Eleanor, and take a week, take two, three even, to acclimate. Make some progress for her as you can. Take weekends off—evenings! Have dinner with your son, see him whenever you wish. Make friends! Take a lover, get married, make another wonderful child, your first is certainly an incredible young man. You have every freedom available to you under the Maker’s sun. You are beholden to no one, and any obligation you take on, it is your decision alone. If Eleanor came in here this very moment and demanded you make her ten dresses by nightfall, you could look her in the eye, tell her that is wholly unreasonable, and refuse her request. If she asked for something as simple as a pair of gloves in that time frame, and you are too weary to take it on? Say so and move forward accordingly."

“Gloves are actually rather tricky,” he returned, as it seemed she had run out of steam. “You’ve got to fit every finger just right, so they are comfortable and offer range of motion while still being as form fitting as possible, and we’ve not even discussed for what they are for—working in, riding, dining, dancing. Leisurely strolls in the garden—Ser Tethras prescribed as much for keeping romance alive, I certainly hope my son is taking notes.”
She was looking at him rather incredulously and then she broke out in a smile, light laughter lilting into a relieved sigh. “I am pleased you understand. I do apologize if I lost my temper, I merely—” oh she was blushing rather fiercely as she resumed her seat. “I merely wished to make things clear.”

“It was rather impressive, and I certainly appreciate it. I…did not realize, exactly, the extent of what has been done for me here—you do realize that makes me all the more grateful?”

“Well, it would be poor gratitude to work yourself useless,” she said.

“I understand. I will follow your advice. Acclimate,” he smiled, “I do believe I’ll hold off on providing Cremisius a sibling.”

The Ambassador giggled at that, “I do suppose that would be rather a drastic way of marking your newfound freedom,” she conceded, having the grace to blush. “I did mean to imply a bit of natural progression—you will be just as free several years from now as you are today. Do not work yourself to death—enjoy your work, do well at it. But take breaks and make connections, not just business ones. Have a life and enjoy it.”

“I have been, I believe. Thank you, Ambassador, for inviting me to eat with you.”

“You may call me Josephine, please. Hopefully in future, you will accept such invitations because you wish to do so, not because you perceive it as some sort of order.”

Did she think-? “I may have had the misunderstanding, did not know necessarily I could say ‘no’, but that does not mean I accepted out of a lack of freewill, Lady Josephine.”

She smiled at that. “Good. I mean that I am pleased you are glad to be here, it is only conducive to the inquisition that we get along. We will share my office eventually. For your work.” She cleared her throat again and asked, “We should…if you care to, we should see to finishing the tour.”

He held up an index finger which gave her pause as he finished drinking his tea, and she smiled at him extending himself in such a way not rising to set to task right away so he could do something that benefited himself before moving forward. And when he rose, he offered his own arm—it was not an obligation, but courtesy he could willingly extend.

He also took up the tray, in his free hand, as she led him into the hall—sort of, she opened the door and pointed diagonally to the door across the hall from Eleanor’s quarters, “That is the Forge—if you wish to requisition a weapon for personal defense, or armor, or have need to work with leather or metal and the like, Harritt is our Blacksmith and he would be pleased to assist you and give you access to his workstations. Now, to the kitchens.”

There was a rather massive expanse of…basement? It was vast, empty, darker than upstairs, and the Antivan woman hummed a bit under her breath for a second before she steadily lead them across the room, she seemed mildly embarrassed but she said, “I get lost every time I come down here—I had to make up a tune to help me find the kitchens or else I end up in this horrible little library that is the stuff of nightmares, truly,” she shivered at the thought. She lead them to a door near where the room branched into a small hallway, “That,” she pointed to the hallways only other door, “is the wine cellar, you’re technically permitted inside but we do not advertise as much commonly, we would prefer people order their alcohol through the servant staff so we may keep track of our stores, and too, we would rather people not er…”

“I’ve never been one for heavy drink,” he assured her.
Neither have I. And if you should meet our spymaster and she says otherwise, do remember she is a professional liar and is certainly not to be believed,” the woman insisted. “She is my dearest friend. I have perhaps indulged too much in her presence and she will never let me live it down,” she admitted as she pushed open the door to the kitchens. They were mostly empty now, save for a few servants attending to prep work for the rush of evening meals to be upon them in a few hours. “You may send in orders for any meal of the day you wish—I believe there are menus on your desk? They list the weeks schedule of what is being served to the general population from the kitchens, and then there is the Tavern menu—the Herald’s Rest, run by Cabot, you may order your meals from there as well. Orders can be sent along with anyone in servant uniform, and there is a mailbox of sorts nailed to the wall just outside each kitchen entrance to submit orders from here if you wish. Cole would also assist you if you’ve need—I do hope you can grow to be comfortable with him, he accredits you for the existence of, quote, his ‘favorite person’.”

“Then perhaps we shall get along splendidly—we already have so much in common, sharing the same favorite person.”

“He’s a wonderful young man, and I simply adore he and Eleanor—are they not simply precious? You have not seen much of them, but they have such care for each other, so tenderhearted and thoughtful. Oh,” she breathed a contented sigh as they exited the kitchens and emerged outside, a set of stairs leading down to what were quite obviously stables, an area of shops.

“I do find I approve of them,” he said, “he is every bit the gentleman I would expect him to be, and she truly does love him as I would wish someone to.”

“Oh most certainly—I cried like a child when they let us in on her plans for you. We could not wrap our heads around it at first—we were all worried sick, Eleanor’s advisors, Cassandra when we read the Iron Bull’s reports from Orlais. She’d been so badly injured and refused to take time to recuperate, set such a harsh pace for Val Royeaux when it must have been so very painful. We thought it was merely to appease Varric, because she did not wish to disappoint him by cancelling on his cousin.”

Oh. That had been their very last day in Val Royeaux, their last few hours, even. Magister Tilani was supposed to meet with them in the middle of her trip, she’d some tentative plans to spend time with her cousin and his friends, but they were delayed, “Injured?” she had seemed….well he wasn’t sure. He’d not been paying much mind, and then when his attention was finally brought to bear, she could have looked a sight and he would have thought her the loveliest thing in existence for what she was doing for he and his son.

“Oh! She is much recovered now, but she did give us quite the fright. There was some trouble, with sealing Rifts in the Oasis, she was struck by a demon and fell into a mine.”

“Rifts?” he asked that…he wasn’t sure what that was?

“They are like small Breaches—the sky Breach, not the clothing sort. Demons come from them. Eleanor and her party have closed several across both Ferelden and Orlais.”

There was another door he was not permitted beyond, and it would hopefully remain that way—the prisons. And then there was the Tavern, but something caught her attention that had her moving them forward to a flight of stairs alongside the forge, “Your workspace is just up here, and I do believe…ahh, good.”

The door at the top of the stairs was wide open, voices and chatter, a loud grunt of effort and the Iron Bull’s voice, “Shit—Krem-cheese n’ bagels, ease up, I got it, give that thing a rest.”

“You better keep a good grip on it—set it down gentle—drop it and I’ll drop you right out the window,” Cremisius warned, grunting and as Tonio and Lady Montilyet came to the top of the stairs, they could see him releasing hold on-

Oh Maker. The Chargers had been on a mission for this?

His workspace was indeed spacious, clean, freshly repaired roofing, lamps hanging but there was ample sunlight. And the Iron Bull and his son, squabbling over…over a sewing machine.

Cremisius breathed a sigh of relief, rolling his shoulders as he rubbed at his forearm-

His heart leapt into his throat. He’d not moved this fast since- since, Maker, Cremisius must have been an infant, toddling toward open flame in their fireplace. Tonio was there, taking his wrist in hand, only this time it wasn’t to wrench him away from danger, but to see the result of some that had come and passed. The underside of his arm was unarmored, tunic torn and bloodied and there- “Cremisius!” he cried out, alarmed, there was a horrible slash, bruising that wrapped all the way to his wrist. “Cuore mio,” bubbled up from his throat.

“s’fíne Papà, look,” he nodded his head in the direction of the sewing machine. “Mission successful, Ambassador, we got that shipment back safe and sound. All of them.”

“All of them?” Lady Josephine asked.

“Assholes—just a bunch of thugs playing highwayman in the mountains,” The Iron Bull explained. Lady Josephine had said something about their shipments being delayed, apparently the issue was bandits. “Nothing organized or official, wasn’t a direct action against the Inquisition just taking advantage where they can. Just got a hold on Elan’s order that was supposed to come in today. We got it all squared away.”

There was the skitter and scrape of boots and clawed paws on stone, coming up the stairs behind them, “Hiya Josie,” the sound of a kiss being pressed to a cheek before Ellie appeared at his side, “Oh good, hold still okay?” she asked, looking to Tonio’s hold on Cremisius’s wrist, “We cleaned it, but Elan helped me whip up something proper to put on it.” She had a jar in hand, full of translucent green salve, and was swabbing some up on the tips of index and middle fingers, looking to Cremisius who nodded before she plopped it to his injury, though the boy grinned as he dipped the fingers of his free hand into the jar and, “Look up,” Cremisius instructed.

“I need to see what I’m doing-“

“You did it, it’s done,” he insisted laughingly, and Ellie, satisfied with her handiwork, looked up at him and let him dab salve on- Maker!

“Bella, child what happened?” Tonio asked, there was bruising on her neck, her chin, a scrape across her jaw.

But she giggled as Cremisius carefully applied salve, “I was casting from the Iron Bull’s shoulders, and we forgot that trees branches exist! In my defense, I’ve never lived in a world where I’m tall enough to worry about even little trees’ branches.”

“Real sorry about that again, Imekari. You’re all good, right? No concussion?” the Qunari worried.
“A funcussion!” she corrected cheerily, “And no, Elan cleared me—you can ask Cole, he came to check on me and walked me back—I’m all good!”

Well, medicine applied, their injuries seemed to be...less daunting, clearing up. It...had startled him, he’d known Cremisius’s job implied such a thing might happen, but he hadn’t liked that aspect to begin with, and he certainly didn’t like it coming to fruition. Especially not on his account.

He’d a sewing machine now. He wasn’t sure how they’d gotten it all the way here, fully assembled, but Maker it was beautiful. Too, they’d rescued a few rolls of fabric, warm grey cotton for sleep clothes, beigey material meant to make clothing for training in. A few skeins of woolen yarn for socks. Maker, he was going to make clothing again.

“Take a minute to take it in, yeah?” Ellie’s voice drew him from his staring, “I’m gonna clean up a bit. Do you still feel like meeting?”

“Certainly,” he assured. He’d want fresh measurements, and to discuss style, color schemes, and what sort of material he’d need to order for her nicer clothing.

“Great! I saw Madam de Fer on my way in, she’s coming to pick me up so,” she looked to Cremisius.

“Oh, you’re sure?” and when she nodded, “Thanks lovely—I’ll see you at six.”

“Have fun with drills,” she said, popping up on tip toe to peck him on the lips before she went to the door, and waved, he could see Madam de Fer’s head as she’d been descending the steps, heard faintly her offered, “Darling! Come, shall we?” and the two were off.

“I believe I’ll join them, since we’ve concluded our tour,” Lady Josephine said, “would you care to return to the castle with me or...” she looked to Cremisius.

“Oh, I could show you the Charger’s set up if you want,” he invited Tonio, “got to get ready for drills anyway.”

“C-certainly, I would love to,” he did wish to lay eyes on his son’s set up, just...make certain he was well in that regard, though he looked to Lady Montilyet, “Thank you, Lady Josephine, I had a wonderful time.”

“I enjoyed it as well, thank you. Have a lovely day,” she wished them before taking her leave to follow after Ellie.

“This way,” Cremisius said, waving him along, through the door opposite the one they’d entered by. There was further walking along the top of Skyhold’s wall until they reached the room that merged with the top floor of the tavern*.

The door swung open to reveal a room around the size of his own workshop, it felt like it was warm enough to be habitable, but he was still reassured when he saw his child had a few warm blankets on his cot. Not a bed, exactly but it didn’t feel uncomfortable when he was offered a seat on it. The room was lined in cots, seven total...eight, there were two right alongside each other that he supposed was to bear the Iron Bull’s width, set up beside Cremisius’s. When he sat on his son’s bed he realized it...was even warmer, because the wall was shared with the attic of the tavern, he could feel warmth under his hand when he felt the stone wall, and that...well that gave him something that choked him up, to some measure. This Qunari he...he made certain he slept within reach of his son and gave him the warmest possible place to sleep in their arrangements. He had been taking care of his boy, all this while, and that sent relief into his bones, calmed the ever-nagging anxieties he’d felt these past years because every moment he had been afraid, worried for his son and his wellbeing. And the Iron Bull had provided.

There was someone laying down on the cot just on the other side of the Iron Bull’s. He thought her sleeping, but she cracked open an eye to stare at him in a way that made him feel like he was being dissected, addressing Cremisius as the boy began unlocking the trunk that rested between the heads of he and the Iron Bull’s cots.

“Who is that?”

“Skinner, this is my father Tonio—no knifing him, alright? This is Skinner, she bites,” he warned, undoing the straps and clasps of his chest plate to remove it before he began working the straps that kept his vambrace in place.

The woman sat up in her cot, regarding Tonio critically, speaking accusingly, “He is a shem.”

“Did you think he wouldn’t be?”

“You are unlike most shemlen.”

“Hate to break it to you Skin, but I didn’t just materialize from the ether, shemless.”

“How unfortunate.”

“It’s a real shem.”

“Are you going to continue using shem as a pun for shame until I stab someone?”

“Laughing was the response I was looking for,” he shrugged, ”but as long as ‘someone’ isn’t my father, you do you babe.”

“Ha.” The Elf offered drily, looking to Tonio, “You love Krem?”

She...was speaking to him now, yes? “Of course. With all my heart.”

“Stitches informs me hearts are the size of our fists. Show me yours.” He...al-alright. He made a fist and held it up so she might see. She made a fist of her own and looked to it, then back to his. “It is even bigger than mine. I suppose it will do. He has been good to you, Krem?”

“Yeah Skinner,” Cremisius assured as he undid the leather straps on his cuirass, “he’s the best.”

“Has he been kind to the Small One?”

“Uh-huh, Ellie already loves him ‘loads’.”

“Good. He makes clothing?”

“Yup.”

“We will talk,” she spoke with certainty to Tonio. “You will make me socks. I have money. And ideas.”
Cremisius’s murmured, “Oh my god don’t say ye-“ was overlapped by Tonio’s, “Gladly.”

Was his son shaking his head at him? “You beautiful fool.”

Had he done something he shouldn’t? He would be glad to work for his son’s co-workers, even the eccentric ones.

“I will not use the socks for murder,” she assured Cremisius, “The Small One has taught me other uses.”

Did she not want the socks for her feet? What uses-

He did not want to ask. Cremisius seemed satisfied with her assurance they were not for murder and if ‘small one’ was Ellie, he certainly couldn’t imagine the girl teaching her some other abhorrent thing to do with socks.

“That’ll be real sweet Skin, papa’s got work to do for El, but he’ll get around to helping you out sometime,” he said as he pulled- should…he didn’t say anything so Tonio just remained seated. It seemed a natural action for Cremisius, the Elf woman certainly had no reaction that said otherwise to his son pulling his torn tunic off overhead as he took up a wet cloth from the washbasin seated on a stool beside his trunk, wiped off his face and neck before scrubbing at his arms, underarms. He’d nothing on underneath his tunic, and there was bruising forming all along the back that faced his father as he finished and pulled something leather from his trunk. Oh. He had gone without the er, binding clothing he had been wearing last night, while he was in armor. Tonio did not wish to make him uncomfortable, but he did look when his son began lacing up the sides of the chest piece, trying to discern just how it was fashioned, to see if perhaps…it was of fine quality, it must be expensive. Perhaps it was something he could make for his son, in future. If he were open to discussing as much, perhaps he could even make improvements upon it—more comfortable, suit his son’s needs the best, and there were ideas of how to make something of that caliber that might be easier to put on.

“You are running drills with the Sergeant and his shems next, yes?” the Elf asked.

“Overseeing them, yeah, Thom wants help prepping them for our next away mission and Bull’s got a meeting—Core crew can just hang, do whatever until dinner.”

The Elf smiled. “I will sharpen my knives.”

Cremisius let out a weary sigh as the woman leapt from her bed and ran from the room through the Tavern exit. “She’s literally going to sit on the Tavern roof and sharpen her knives while she watches Thom’s guys train,” he explained as he pulled a clean tunic overhead. It was then he seemed to realize, “Oh shit, that uh…was okay, right? Doesn’t matter who’s in the Charger’s camp, we’re all pretty comfortable changing in front of one another, I didn’t think to—“

“I’m pleased you live in such a comfortable environment. All of your chargers know? They are…no one is unkind to you?”

“Nah, they’ve all been good from the start. Bull really set the tone, but uh, I dunno. I’ve not really run into too much of an issue. The occasional rude question or accusation from a stranger. Bull’s never tolerated anyone working for him that can’t deal with it—last guy that had a problem got his head put through a wall.”

“Good. On all accounts. May I ask…” he looked around just to make certain the rest of the cots were empty and there was no one else in the room, “may I ask questions about your um, clothing?”

“I have plenty of clothes papa, but yeah, if I need anything new, obviously I’m gonna come to you.”

“And put whoever made that handsome tunic you were wearing last night out of business?” he teased.

“Don’t know him from the Maker…or her? Bull hooked me up for my first date with Ellie, a First Day Eve present. Oh speaking of—do you need drafting materials? You can use my stuff if you want,” he said, pulling a sketch pad and leather case that Tonio could assume held pencils or pastels.

“Lady Montilyet assures me I’ve been supplied. But may I…?” he held out a hand and Cremisius shrugged, blushing, shy to offer up the sketchpad but he handed it over for his father’s perusal. And then, what he hoped was teasing, “I’m not about to become too terribly acquainted with Miss Trevelyfan?”

“Papa,” Cremisius complained as he sat on the cot and flopped onto his back.

Tonio chuckled as he opened up the sketchbook. Oh, it was such a blessing to see this again. His son’s work. He wondered if Liviana had kept any of it hanging in their home…Remus said the place was up for sale, that she had moved onto Cornelius’s estate into a guest home—like that mattered, the pretense. It was no matter now, Tonio was here, with his son, looking at…quite a few comical sketches, things that showed the Chargers in different settings, at least he recognized the Iron Bull, Stitches, Skinner, so he assumed the others were in their crew as well. A few held additions of Dorian, Ellie, Cole, and that other girl he’d met yesterday…Sera was her name. There was a few images of Anya, she had apparently indeed been around since she was a pup. There was a page of little images of Ellie’s face, like practice, drafts—the corner of that page was missing, cleanly cut away with precision. And then a few more that…were nothing sordid, but it was obvious she was on the young man’s mind.

“These are all lovely, Cremisius. This was a present?”

“Thanks. Yeah, I drew a few things for El, and Bull figured he could be an ass at Wintersend, got me this, stupid nice pastels, ugh, and that’s on top of the new binders. I swear I could kick his ass.”

“Binders?” Tonio asked, and Cremisius tapped his chest twice. Ahh! “That was what I meant—when I had questions about your clothing. It is called a binder?”

“Oh! Yeah, Stitches lectured me about six ways to Sunday when he found out I’d been using bandaging before. That’s super dangerous, apparently, but it wasn’t like I knew any better, had access to anything different in the military. Bull got me set up real fast, counts them as part of my armor in the budget.”

“That is kind of him, I suppose they act as a bit of armor whenever you go without? You don’t wear them under your cuirass?”

He shrugged. “Sometimes, just depends on the day? Most days, I can do that with no problem but uh, dunno. Some days it feels like everything I do is wrong, that everything I’m doing is fake and no one can possibly…that everyone just has to think I’m a fraud or something. So I double down, binding, and armor. And sometimes it’s just a straight up comfort thing, it’ll tick away in the back of my mind, bug me, being able to er…used to be…my armor’s made to fit me binder or no, but my chest used to fill it out different, press up against the inside of it. Doesn’t do that anymore though, since I’ve been training with Seeker Pentaghast, Commander Cullen, they’ve been a big help, helping me work to a build I’m more comfortable with.”

So they knew? “You…the word is ‘disclosed’ yes? You disclosed to them?” because he was dating their daughter? Or because he worked for their organization?

“Yeah, ‘disclose’, ‘come out’, same deal. With Cullen it was just that he was around enough he saw me in my sleepshirt—sleeping in binders is a no-go—and just rolled with it, never said or did anything to treat me different. He’s nice—he’ll roast me alive if I ever hurt Ellie but that just comes with the territory. Then with Cassandra…Stitches keeps me stocked up with continuous potion to stop monthlies—but even with that, from time to time there’s gonna be breakthrough bleeding. Stitches was out and I wasn’t prepared for anything like that, so my only other option was to go to the Quartermaster. Which…I mean it wasn’t like I couldn’t have just said I was getting bandaging for Dalish or Skinner, but I was nervous and really feelin’ the dysphoria. Cassandra saw something was wrong, and when I explained I needed bandaging from the Quartermaster she just said there was no need—took me to her room and showed me where she keeps her own bandaging for monthlies, said I’m free to it whenever I have need, no questions asked—gave me a way to ask healer Adan for any potion I needed by saying it was for her. I mean he knows too, I’m safe with all the major healers around here, just, he had a lot of new apprentices and trainees in his quarters, so it gave me the freedom to say what I need without worry.”

That…was incredibly kind. Oh, he was grateful beyond words to these people who treated his son so very well. He wished…Maker he wished he’d gotten it. Understood, done everything he could to provide his son with his sense of self sooner. He wished he hadn’t lived in such denial, that he had just accepted his son as his son, point blank, the very moment he had an inkling of his true gender instead of…being so foolish. Afraid. A coward. He’d been terrified he would only make things worse for his son, scared that it might just be some misunderstanding. He once worried what sort of life he might have if he began to live as a man—now he wished he’d had such opportunity much sooner. He hated his cowardice; never again would he be so weak. He may not be the Iron Bull, but any who would seek to discredit his son could…could…there would be consequences! He would certainly fight them. Verbally and perhaps physically, he could dole out a solid trouncing!

Too, their discussion, it did remind him he should seek getting a supply of bandaging to have on hand, for Cremisius if he ever needed it, or anyone who might have such troubles, it certainly wouldn’t hurt to be able to make it available. He’d always done so before, in Tevinter, had monthly supplies in his workshop in case his child was in need of it, but he was glad to hear Stitches was a reliable source of potion. Oh, Cremisius had been so miserable, heartrendingly heartbroken at each and every refusal to supply him with such in Tevinter. But it hadn’t only been er…Liviana did not think it wise given the circumstances, but it had also been…something they could not provide, financially. Now he wished his debt doubled if it meant his son had been brought some level of ease, hadn’t been so miserable, so distraught and disparaging of his own life that he wished to end i-

“Father?”

Tonio shook himself, “I apologize, I was merely thinking. I am sorry you were unwell, breakthrough bleeding? Does that happen often?”

“Nah, just a real bitch when it does. Awkward, having to change bandaging, and if I don’t do it often enough I risk bleeding through my socks- uh. Helps trousers fit right, sort of a comfort thing like binding.”

Socks? On his fee- oh. Oh it took a second, but it clicked that a folded up pair of socks, especially thick ones might serve as appropriate er, stuffing. “You put bandaging over them or?”

Ahh, Cremisius seemed a bit embarrassed, shy to explain such an intimate thing he worried his father might judge, but no. His only thought was he would need his son’s measurements—already he could think of superior methods for this. As it stood, it required two sets of underthings, even in non-bleeding times, for ease when using the restroom and it was likely sanitary—wearing a pair of underwear proper, and then a second pair with his sock in it, secure from falling out, though shifting was still a concern. Though Ellie had lost almost the whole of her wardrobe and had been in need of underthings—he had apparently shared the pairs that us would usually use to keep his socks secure which resulted, apparently, in them falling out place after he changed for bed one evening on the journey to Skyhold. In front of his young lady, as she had been bunking with the Chargers.

“Oh,” Cremisius seemed to be in good humor over it so he offered a chuckle. “I’m sure she thought nothing of it?” he hoped so at least.

Cremisius was grinning, blushing as he said, “Socks hit the ground and rolled to land at her feet, and she just giggled, tossed them back to me and teased me for being so forward—throwing myself at her when the others could come in at any second, but she ‘appreciated my enthusiasm’,” he sighed. “I love her.”

“I’m very pleased of the match you make,” Tonio agreed, offering his approval. Though his mind was still working with ideas, he was certain he could fashion something better, clothing wise, for his son—underthings with a pocket for packing stuffing into, that Cremisius could have to his liking, whatever made him feel most comfortable. There’d be no risk of anything falling out or moving. He carefully propose the idea, ultimately he did use Cremisius’s sketch pad, just putting down a quick in-general image to explain what he had in mind.

“Oh, shit, really? Yeah papa, that’d work great.”

“Come to my workshop tomorrow, when you’re free.” He would need measurements and Cremisius’s input on materials.

“Sure, as long as you aren’t too busy,” he agreed, looking to his own time piece .”Just about time, I better get down there before those assholes think they’re getting an easy day. Or that Skinner has been given license to murder them. I can walk you back to the castle if you want.”

Tonio nodded, flipping closed the sketchbook and Cremisius locked it away in his trunk.

“What exactly does she want me to make her socks for?” Tonio finally gave in to his curiosity.

“Dolls I think. There’s a lot of refugee kids after the Conclave and rebellion happening all over the place. Ellie’s been trying to start up a little something through the Inquisition, to get them toys—Thom’s a bit of a carpenter, been working on it with her, and she had the idea for sock-dolls, Skinner wants to help with that, apparently. I’ve been making stuffed nugs* when I get the time,” he explained as they made their way into the attic of the tavern, down the stairs.

“Nugs?”

“Got wings on ‘em, Ellie thinks they’re the ‘cutest’. Bull thinks they’d be fun to shoot from a catapult and see people freak out over flying nugs.” That might certainly be an amusing sight. “Oh—actually I wanted to run something by you. I know getting Ellie’s things done is top priority, but it’s for her? I’ve been saving up—I’d like to get her a nice blanket, something enchanted to stay warm, heat up however she’d like it—she’d love it just in general, but it might help when uh, if the fire goes out or anything in the night. It’d take a long time for me to knit one or sew by hand, I thought I would just order one from Orlais or something, Madam de Fer gave me a few recommendations of where to shop—but that was before you showed up. With your sewing machine, I could order materials and Dalish and Dorian are down for helping with the enchanting part, would you mind helping with putting it together?”

“I would love to.”

“Thanks papa,” his son said as they reached the castle stairs, offering him a warm squeeze to his shoulder as they parted ways, and then Cremisius went to join a group of men gathered between the forge and the Tavern, all geared up for their drills. He worried a bit, Cremisius had taken off his armor, was in tunic and trousers, but he had his sword still—oh. It looked like he might be bragging about his earlier adventures with the Chargers to rescue the Inquisition’s shipments from bandits, he showed the healing mark on his forearm, and something told Tonio the Iron Bull had told him to take it easy in his lessons—truly observe and correct, more so than participate.

Tonio made haste then, to Ellie’s quarters, he almost worried he had kept the girl waiting, it was nearing four now. But when he arrived, she was seated on her bed, wearing comfortable bottoms he supposed were meant for sleep, and a tunic that was much too big for her…Cremisius’s he thought. Madam de Fer was seated behind her using some kind of heat magic, calling warmth into her hand as she held sections of the girl’s hair in it, to dry it after being washed, speaking to the girl who was holding over her mouth and nose, it steamed with something that smelled medicinal to him.

“Delate,” Madam de Fer said.

“D-e-l-a-t-e,” came the girl’s certain, muffled response.

“Correct, definition?”

“To accuse or denounce.”

“Excellent, darling. Abecedarian.”

“Oh gosh,” the girl breathed, scrunching up her nose as she carefully executed its spelling, “Abecedarian. A-b-e-c-e…d-a-r-i-a-n. It means ‘related to the alphabet’ or referencing something being in alphabetical order.”

He worried he was interrupting but he cleared his throat and the girl looked over to him and smiled, pulling the rag away from her face as she greeted,

“Hiya! Sorry, I have a test tomorrow, Vivienne was just quizzing me! Did you have a nice time with Cremisius?”

“I did, thank you,” Tonio said.

“Don’t sweat it, Vivienne’s almost done with my hair, it needed washed and my head gets stuffy if it stays wet too long.”

“You should not have gone out in this weather, child, honestly,” Madam de Fer complained, “breathe into that until it ceases steaming or I will make your hair a sight. Perspicacious.”

The girl sighed as she brought the cloth to her face again, “P-e-r-s-p-i-c-a-c-i-o-u-s. That’s you Vivienne, to have keen insight or acute mental vision—you’re just the smartest!” the woman looked rather bemused with the compliment. Then to Tonio the girl said, “Lady Josie left you some things on my desk, we can get started here in a minute.”

He went to the desk, as bid. There were indeed fresh parchment pad and charcoal sticks, pencils to sketch with, though…were they still meeting? It looked like she was in the middle of some sort of treatment, “Are you feeling ill, Ellie?” he worried.

“Nah-“

“The child has asthma, and her lungs still recover from smoke inhalation barely two weeks ago,” Madam de Fer spoke as if to remind the girl she should be more careful, and she certainly should be! He’d wondered at the necklace she wore, it steamed almost constantly—Cremisius had refilled it last night while they ate, and he realized that was why it smelled so familiar.

“This is normal treatment I’ve been doing once a day since we got to Skyhold,” Ellie insisted, “Elan said I’m fine to travel and stuff.”

“I would have gone with you if it was so very dangerous, Eleanor. Honestly darling, you should go nowhere without your party.”

“Bathroom’s gonna be a tight fit, but if you insist—”

“Do desist. Both with your incessant nonsense and waving that thing about until the steam has run out, or I will start you a second one. Campestral.”

“C-a-m-p-e-s-t-r-a-l. Referring to the open country—a rural area.”

“Very good my dear, I believe you’ll do superlatively,” the woman insisted, sounding proud. Ellie blushed, thanking her.

He supposed they should get started, and Ellie could focus on finishing her treatment undisturbed—he opened the canister of charcoal sticks, there were pastels in the bottom portion, colorful, which was perfect. He opened up the parchment pad and swatched the different hues, mixing as needed to make different shades, and then he sat before Ellie and held it for her so she could examine it, point to colors she favored, and he circled them for reference. Turned the page and took the colors she liked to swatch them with differing color schemes, sets of three or four colors he offered for her examination to see if they were to her liking. Madam de Fer seemed approving as well, which was rather the vote of confidence.

When the steam died off from her cloth, Madam de Fer took it from her, and the girl followed him over to the large tri-fold mirror that had been set up for her use, to the right of her fireplace. It was wonderfully warm, and he was glad of it not only for himself, but since measurements were needed. The girl stripped to her underthings, and he made quick, accurate work of taking her measurements. Madam de Fer’s eyes were on him like a hawk the entire time, and he was glad the girl had such a dutiful chaperone—he was no dreg, but this was a position craved by such, he’d been glad to be his own child’s tailor because of the horror stories that came from entrusting your child’s body to the care of others who would use their occupation as a means for treachery.
The door downstairs swung open as he was taking down her final measurements and a sullen voice croaked out, “Da’vehnan?”

Elie gasped and was practically flying down the stairs in the next instant, “Mami!”

“Oh, da’vehnan—” she raised her voice then to call up the stairs, “Mister Aclassi I do apologize if I’ve interrupted—“

“It’s okay mami, come on,” Ellie invited.

“Very well,” she called up, “I’m coming up unless you’ve issue?”

…but he wasn’t certain what issue he’d have, “Certainly, join us—Marehis I presume?”

He heard a gasp and then…it was almost comical, the girl was a head or more shorter than her, but still, it was a bit humorous to see the girl of sixteen having been gathered up in the woman’s arms, to sit on her hip, arms wrapped around the Elf woman’s neck while she carried her up, almost protectively like she was wary of the adult voice that called back but then, “Oh. It is Mister Aclassi, just the senior. Elgar—” she blanched, and then shook herself, letting Ellie stand, “I am glad to see you’ve arrived, I apologize, did I interrupt your fitting?”

Hadn’t she already addressed that…oh. Oh! She thought—she initially thought it was the junior Aclassi Ellie was entertaining in a state of undress. Would they be? In the middle of the afternoon? Of course, were he a young person in love, perhaps yes, any time of day would seem appropriate for, er, being together. But certainly these two were not shirking their daily obligations for such activity?

“But not at all, please, join us. I’ve just finished taking the young lady’s measurements. Um, I understand you’ve been handling an assignment, I can…we could always pick this up another time if you wish for time alone with Ellie.”

The Elf woman smiled her thanks, pressing her lips to the girl’s hair as she took a deep breath, but shook her head, “I would not wish to disrupt this, she’s in terrible need of new things. I apologize I haven’t been able to come meet you sooner, it’s an honor to make your acquaintance, I would very much like to sit in on this, if it wouldn’t disturb you.”

“Oh, of course not, please, join us.”

“Marehis, darling come,” Madam de Fer invited her, patting the empty space at her side. “You should see what he has in mind for Eleanor’s wardrobe, the color schemes at the very least seem marvelous.”

Marehis nodded, joining the grand enchanter who wrapped her up in a hug once she was seated at her side, Vivienne sighed, “You need only say the word darling, I would end him.”

“I do appreciate the sentiment.”

Ellie had her bottoms back on, and he noticed she struggled a bit—pulling the tunic on overhead was easy enough but raising her left arm high enough to slip into the sleeve seemed a little bit of a task, made her wince.

“Are you injured, Ellie?” he asked.

She shook her head, “Not really—I dislocated my shoulder a few times, it’s still healing up.”
Injury was still injury until it was healed, to his mind. “Would you mind trying something?” he asked, and when she nodded he instructed her to remove her shirt taking her right arm out first and then bunching it up to pull off over her head before sliding the shirt off completely by pulling it down off her left arm—it needn’t move at all to do so. Then put it back on similarly to how she’d done so before just, letting the shirt hang off her neck, pull the top open wide enough that she only needed to bend her elbow to slip her arm into the sleeve and pull it the rest of the way up her arm before sliding her right arm into its own sleeve.

“Oh gosh, that’s smart—I usually have help or just, go so fast when I do it myself, I haven’t really stopped to think about how I put stuff on or take it off.”

“If you are comfortable with the size I could make your sleepshirts and the like just as big, in this style. Even your practice clothing, it could be made to cinch appropriately with drawstrings at the waist, wrists, once you have it on, so it wouldn’t be in your way in training. Too, dress tunics, trousers, I can fashion them where you need only your right hand to button them up.”

That had her smiling brightly as she said, “I hope Cremisius understands when I marry you—it’ll be awkward at first, but I’m sure we can make it work.”

Madam de Fer sighed at his confusion, “The child offers marriage as a form of gratitude, Eleanor you really should learn to pen thank you cards as supplement,” Marehis giggled in agreement.

“But then the offer of marriage would in writing and that’s so much harder to go back on, someone might take me seriously you know?”

“Eleanor, if I begin to find gray hairs from dealing with you, my fury will know no end,” Vivienne assured.

“Rude! Gray hairs! Never—you just watch Madam de Fer, if anything, I’ll keep you young!”

That got her a derisive sound. “We shall see about that,” the woman conceded.

Tonio pulled over a chair and sat before the foot of Ellie’s bed, the girl climbing back on to sit, though Marehis immediately pulled her into her lap, holding the girl close. Maker, the woman looked exhausted—had she been awake their entire separation? But she seemed to be clinging to the normalcy of this interaction just as much as she did her child, so he offered no further excuse to cut things short. He began talking style with the girl beyond what he had proposed he could do to give her independence when dressing. What sort of designs did she like—fabric patterns, preferred types of material, thickness—the weather certainly warranted lining finer materials with something more substantial. He sketched as they talked, drawing up a few different designs he had in mind—what she had worn before in Val Royeaux had been lovely, but there were things he felt he would do differently, and now he had the opportunity to do so.

“Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh!”

“Triple ‘oh my gosh’s, I find I agree,” Marehis said as she peered at the example he offered the girl as they talked.

“I’ll have samples of fabrics to show you soon, Lady Montilyet will put me in touch with weavers in the Hinterlands.”

“Cool! That sounds great!” Ellie said.
“You would like a few more dresses also, yes?”

“Uh-huh, what are your views on pockets?”

“In dresses? A necessity. C-” he stopped himself from saying his son’s name immediately, good heavens. “Contrary to popular opinion. I have always deemed it necessary to make dresses for young people with pockets included,” he rambled in an effort to make certain it sounded like he’d just stumbled over his words. Even when he was small—Liviana thought it silly but Cremisius had a great many things to carry! Snacks and rocks, the occasional pocket-sized animal—a mouse once, a few frogs somehow—and more often than not Tonio’s shiny metallic thimbles ended up being found in the wash with Cremisius’s clothes, sticky from being slobbered on by a toddler. It was a wonder he never choked on the things.

“I love that! Hit me with the pocket dresses!”

They talked design until he had a decent enough idea of what she would like, for dresses and too Madam de Fer brought up the point that they may have need for the girl to wear a proper gown to some function or another on behalf of the Inquisition, and Ellie shyly asked if he could make certain Cremisius didn’t get a sneak peek at some of her dresses, things she might like to wear for dates. Of course he vowed on the sanctity of Tailor-Client privilege, sealing it with a pinkie promise.

“The name Trevelyan, it sounds like the name of an older clan that comes from Tevinter*—they’re noble, yes?” he asked. “Would you care for your heraldry on any of your clothing? Either from the Trevelyan house or the Inquisition?”

“Oh gosh, I’m not really a Trevelyan? Not a noble or anything—I was kind-of adopted by the mage I attended the Conclave with, Maxwell Trevelyan, and he um. He named me his heir—I didn’t have a last name until recently. Or a middle name. Getting full named is scary! Cullen and Cassandra full named me the other day,” she said to Marehis.

“I have been informed of your misdeeds young lady—you nearly gave Cullen a heart attack,” Marehis said in tones of reprimand, then, “…but since he is well, I had quite the laugh when I was in need of it, so thank you.”

“Oh! But the heraldry—that’s super sweet of you to think of, and if it isn’t a bother or anything, I think it’d be cool to have the symbol for the Inquisition on some of my things ‘official Inquisition business’ things…you can find noble heraldry?”

Tonio nodded. “I know who to contact for heraldry records, and I’ve old contacts, historians and antiquists who could help me find the correct heraldry for non-Tevene households.”

“Oh, so you could find Heraldry for noble houses from anywhere?”

Anywhere? “I could certainly try.”

“Not for myself. I’m not interested really, I just remembered Lady Josie saying something about how her family lost their old heraldry when they stopped being a source of trade—in Orlais. They used to have ships or something? She’s been looking for a copy of it for a while but hasn’t had any luck, maybe you could help her with that?”

Oh. Old Orlesian heraldry? He wondered if old Barnabus* was still milling around Orlais, he was certain to be able to get ahold of something of that caliber. Lady Josephine had explained their mailing system, he would write a letter later, he took down a quick note to do so on the corner of his sketch sheet—if it was something the lady was in search of, perhaps finding it would be a start to thanking her for all her kindness.

“Holy crap! It’s almost five thirty!” Ellie squeaked when she checked her watch. “Mami, are you sleepy? Charger family dinner tonight—do you want to come, Vivienne? Dorian will be there. He’ll be with the Iron Bull, and they can get groady, but he’ll be there!” Groady? He wasn’t certain what that meant, but it sounded unpleasant and he supposed perhaps while the Iron Bull and Cremisius got along, the Altus from Tevinter might rub the Qunari the wrong way. But why would they end each other’s company then?

“While I am honored you would be kind enough not to exclude me my dear, I’m afraid I’ve plans for the evening that involve not witnessing anything ‘groady’ in Skyhold’s lovely tavern. Seeker Pentaghast and I are having dinner. Ser Rutherford is free this evening—he may join your Charger’s feast.”

“Oh Cremisius made sure papi knows he’s still always welcome in the Chargers camp even though they don’t really share camp-space anymore! I hope you and Cassandra have fun!”

“If you’re well at hand, I would like to prepare,” Madam de Fer said.

“Oh gosh, yeah, thanks so much for guarding me—it was fun!”

“It was certainly my pleasure darling, I did have a splendid time. You will dine with me tomorrow, yes?”

“Of course!” Ellie enthused. “Um, Anya’s doing better, Skyhold isn’t so scary for her anymore, would it be alright for her to come?”

“Certainly, I’ll make sure there is suitable refreshment for the dear thing, and you can tell me how brilliantly you do on your test,” Madam de Fer said, pressing a kiss to the girl’s temple, “Have a pleasant evening.” Then she rose from the bed and took her leave.

"Test?" Marehis questioned, and then, "Oh da'vehnan! Your spelling test! I was supposed to quiz you! Oh sweetheart I'm so sorry!"

"Mami! It's fine!" Ellie assured her, "Cremisius and papi and Vivienne helped me. And the Iron Bull tattled on Dorian throwing in some words he didn't put on the study guide!"

The Elf woman breathed a sigh of relief. “I’m grateful the others have stepped up in my absence,” she said, asking, “Do we need to leave for dinner now, da’len?”

“Oh! Sorry! Side tracked—wow my brain! Okay, I asked if you were sleepy because you have time to nap! We’re having our first official Cookie Club meeting at six—Cremisius, Sera, Cole and me, they’ll be coming to pick me up soon. We’re going to make dessert and then dinner is at eight! You can join us if you want, but you could sleep here if you like, I brought up some of your jammies and things for whenever you finished, just in case? Anya’s out playing with the cats* but Cole promised to bring her back—she’ll cuddle you!” and then, leaning to press her forehead against her minder’s, “I can cancel though—I mean they’ll still have dinner and stuff, and Cremisius can help Cole and Sera. We can just coop up in here, order dinner, just be you and me mami, if you need.”

“Ma seranas my sweet girl,” Marehis breathed, kissed Ellie’s cheek. “But that is unnecessary. I’m more tired than I am hungry—I believe I’ll rest until you return, do have fun with your friends da’vehnan."
“You’re sure?” Ellie checked.

“I will actually jump off the balcony before I put my armor back on today—I’m just going like this. Plus shoes. Socks! Oh gosh,” she looked to Tonio, “I need socks bad, I’ve been using Cremisius’s.”

Oh, that was sweet, he was proud to hear his son was taking such care of the young lady he was interested in—ensuring she was safe, and warm, and had the things she needed. “I’ll see to it you’ve a proper wardrobe as soon as possible. Socks and all.”

“Thanks! If you like, you’re invited to help us make dessert in the kitchens!”

He was rather antsy to get started on his work…of course if he did so, he may not stop and miss dinner, which would be ill return for their kindness since it was apparently in celebration of his arrival. And he craved time with his son—to meet the rest of his friends, soak up all he could of this new life. “I would be delighted to join you.”

“Yay!” and then she gasped when there was a knock at the door and the sound of muted barking, “Cole! Everyone can come in!”

Tonio rose from his seat. There was liveliness that came up the stairs, oh. Cremisius had always been something of a loner in Tevinter, it was heartening to see him now, a friend on either side, ambling up the stairs, laughing at some amusement, “Papa! This is Cole and Sera.”

“You’re friggin Kremmy-boy’s da! I just about flipped out on you yesterday but Inky had me keep my chill—still!” the Elf girl tackled Tonio in a hug. “Friggin! Boss this is!”

“I am sorry I could not get better acquainted with you yesterday, Sera, Cole,” he offered to the boy who brightened when acknowledged. “I am pleased to meet my son’s friends.”

“Sera, da’assan, do let the man breathe,” Marehis chided.

That sent the Elf girl gasping, letting go of him, “Mare! Holy shit, I didn’t see you, hi!” she rushed to collide with the Elf woman seated on Ellie’s bed, hugging her, if it was even possible, more tightly than he had Tonio. “I’m so sorry ‘bout-“

“There is nothing to be sorry for, I am sorry I-“ oh it seemed like she might cry, but she steeled herself, hugged the girl back. “There will be much to discuss. Debriefing tomorrow morning, you are invited, we…there will be questions. I would ask that you join Ellie tonight when she returns to her quarters. I would prepare you,” she said, her gaze meeting Cremisius and he nodded, a promise of discretion it seemed. “Go, have fun,” Marehis said, kissing Sera’s forehead before letting her go.

Ellie nodded, giving Sera’s hand a squeeze as she and the Elf girl rose from the bed. “I just need-“ she stopped when Cremisius waved her back, toward the bed and then she smiled and hopped to perch herself on the footboard, and Tonio wasn’t certain what he was about until his son knelt—he had a pair of thick, clean socks in his hand and he unraveled their set to pull them onto Ellie’s feet for her.

“Shoes?” he asked, and she pointed to where there were, two pairs by the banister lining the stairway. “Alright, what are we feeling tonight? Knee highs or ankle boots?”

“Ankle boots please!”
“Then ankle boots the lady shall have,” Cremisius agreed, taking up the boots and bringing them to Ellie, shodding her feet, and then rising in the same motion he-Maker, he hoisted the girl over his shoulder, eliciting a giggly squeal, “Alright! Let’s head out!”

“Cremisius!”

His son turned side to side as if trying to see someone behind him, “Did you guys hear something?”

“Krem wants us to deny hearing anything for fun-ness! I can’t hear anything,” Cole enthused.

“Not a thing!” Sera agreed as she followed Cremisius toting Ellie to the stairs, he took up the girl’s overcoat as he passed where it hung over the banister and slung it over his arm.

“Holler if you need anything Mare,” Cremisius called over his shoulder.

“No!” Cuddle mami, got it?” Ellie’s order was audible apparently, Anya yipped and broke for the bed, climbing up to lay across Marehis’s lap.

“Thank you. Have fun, be safe,” Marehis called after them, nodding to Tonio. He was pleased to be invited along, though he did wonder what he should do with his materials—he would merely need to be mindful of them he supposed, or...he was decently confident he knew his way, and at the very least knew how to get directions if he separated from the group to put them away-

“Mister Aclassi, I can put your things away for you, if you do not mind it. I know the way, and where you want them,” Cole said as Tonio made to follow after the young people. The boy seemed eager to help.

“I wouldn’t wish to trouble you, but I’d gladly accept if you’re willing-“

“It isn’t trouble! It’s help! I like helping,” Cole nodded, taking Tonio’s sketch pad and drawing case in hand before vanishing, and then reappearing no sooner than their group was at the door to leave, falling in alongside Tonio. Sera stepped back to sling her arm over the boy’s neck, and he hummed contentedly at the contact. “Lace likes her too.”

“What?!” Sera asked, squeaked the question more so than shouted. “Oh. Pish. Really?”

“Yes. You will see. It will be good.”

“It?”

“Dinner. And what you’re thinking too probably, but that isn’t what I meant.”

“That’s-! Not what I meant either! Friggin’ shush it. But uh. Thanks.”

“What are you two all secrety about? Or is it Cole-fidential?” Ellie questioned. It seemed she accepted her fate as a shoulder ornament, she used her elbows to brace against his back so she could support her chin in her hands and comfortably look up and back at those who followed after them.

“Just a Cole thing. S’not a big deal,” Sera said. “What kind of cookies are we making Inky?”

“Mmm same as last time, just, a bit snazzier—pinch of cinnamon, chocolate drizzled on top because it’s a special occasion, and Varric’s got mad chocolate to burn through.”

“How mad?”

“If I’d known he had such a marvelous stash earlier, I would have constructed a statue of Mister Aclassi in honor of the occasion.”

“Don’t think I could eat a statue of my father,” Cremisius informed her.

“I must admit, I’d find the notion sweet but disconcerting,” Tonio agreed.

“We wouldn’t eat him! He’d just be extra-chocolate Tonio! Hanging around the basement, being a pal to all. You could have set him up in your workshop and played hooky or have a stand-in when you’re sick!” Ellie suggested to him, and then she gasped, “I should make a chocolate me! Sit her on the Inquisitor’s throne, and she’ll dole out judgments from now on.”

“Watch that sugary bitch go full blown executioner on us, which I’m all for really,” Sera said, “—not judging, you did good Ink, but I still think you should’ve let Bull lob off Denham’s dumb pointy head. Friggin Red Templar bastard—” “Pisses you off he called me a bitch?” Ellie guessed. Who called her such a name? Who was Denham?

“Pisses me right off! But not just that Ink, I mean shite, he knew what he was working for—led you right to Envy! I get being all friendly with Felix and Dori, being understanding Alexius’s shitty situation made it…blah! A little understandable that you’d let him try to make up for trying to erase you from bloody friggin time! But Denham- friggin’ I’ll lob his head off right now! He don’t got no excuse!”

…Erased from time. Did she mean the Magister Alexius? He thought he’d been merely tired, seeing things when he passed the man that he’d served in Maevaris’s home a little over a year ago, working alongside a mage in Skyhold’s library. When he’d visited Maevaris, she’d sent him away rather abruptly. Violently, according to one of the poor serving girls who bore witness to the altercation, she’d been pouring them more wine and the man had been saying something about ‘Venatori’, and the next thing she knew, Maevaris was casting against the man, calling him a fool and a charlatan and if he dared set foot in her home again with this nonsense, she would make his second departure a permanent one. She’d been preparing on their journey back from Val Royeaux for the yearly congress of the Magisterium*, apparently she wished to denounce the Venatori further and make their practices in Tevinter a punishable offence under the law, considered terrorism.

“You like listening to things—talk or music when you work,” Cole spoke to him, quietly, under the girls’ conversation, “when you are working, I can come and tell you all of the things you missed between the Conclave and now, answer your questions.”

“I would certainly appreciate it,” he agreed.

“I trust Delrin and Fletcher—” Ellie was saying to Sera, “Denham hurt the Templar Order more than he hurt me, I mean even if he knew about Envy…it wasn’t personal. But for the Templars—they gave everything to the Order, served it because they believed in the cause and wanted to serve their Maker in the way they felt best. Denham and the Red Templars corrupted that, took that from them, there’s not even technically a Templar faction of the Order left now, it’s literally just the eighteen recruits we got out of Therinfal. They aren’t really considered Order members anymore, they’re Inquisition soldiers that perform Templar duties. Denham and those like him did that to them—so it’s only right they get a say in what happens to him. If they want his head lobbed off, that’s their choice to make. Delrin says they’re leaning towards exile though—to the Sea of Ash*.”

What in the Maker’s world was a Red Templar?!

“Who the frick is Delrin?’’ Sera wanted to know.

“Barris.”

“Oh. Him. Sorry Ink, I don’t mean to be yacking at you about Inquisitor pish, you did friggin amazing. Just. You let Kremmy-boy deck Solas! I wanna fight people too!’’

“I promise, the next time I need someone punched for me, you’ll be the first person I go to.”

“Oi, I thought I was the first person you’d go to—it’s part of the deal!’’ Cremisius complained teasingly as he lumbered down the stairway Lady Josephine had shown Tonio to use to get to the basement.

“You already had your turn,’’ Ellie supposed, “No worries guapo—I’ve got plenty of honor to defend.’’ Cole was smiling brightly and seemed like he were about to say something, but Ellie snorted and continued, “You’ll always be the sexiest person I go to though. Sorry Mister Aclassi,’’ she said to Tonio, “—if I didn’t say it out loud, Cole might have so I may as well own it, ya know?”

…why would Cole say- oh had Cole some interest in his son? Oh. Oh that was…sweet, that the boy had a crush so long as he did not make Cremisius uncomfortable or Ellie for that matter-

“Oh. No. I have a crush on Maryden—or I like her very much,’’ Cole said, “crushing sounds…not good. I would not want to crush her. Krem is very handsome and my best friend and he makes me feel safe, but I do not want to share my-“

“Buddy, we’ve been working on this,’’ Cremisius interrupted, “please do not say the ‘p’ word to my father, in this context. I will die.’’

“Oh!’’ Cole chirped and then amended what he’d been saying, “But I do not want to bump beautifuls with him.’’

“Oh my god,’’ Krem lamented, “how is that worse? Who taught you that? No wait, let me guess-“ “Dorian,’’ the four young people chorused—Cole in confirmation.

How had…he hadn’t voiced his thought. But it seemed that happened a lot around Cole, actually. Tonio ventured, “Lady Montilyet says you are specially gifted, but I am not exactly sure what that means.’’ Ellie had mentioned something of him being a Spirit the other day he thought, but he wasn’t certain what that meant.

“Cole is a Spirit of compassion, and has powers meant to help others,’’ Ellie explained, “he can hear people’s minds—when people are hurting he hears it and he can go to them, by teleporting. Of course if he’s talking to you, focused on the discussion, he can hear your thoughts casually which is why sometimes he answers when you haven’t said something out loud.”
“Uh-huh, hold up,” Cremisius took pause stopping just before they could enter the kitchens, and he set Ellie on her feet, turning to face their followers. He wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders as she smiled and hugged him around the waist, though he spoke to Cole, “Bud. Look here. I dig that I make you feel safe, but that implies you’ve been feeling unsafe. Someone doing something to mess with you? What’s going on?”

“It is not any one thing, no one is intentionally harming me,” the boy assured serenely.

“Do you feel unsafe a lot?” Cremisius pressed.

“Oh. All of the time,” Cole informed them, unbothered. Well that certainly wouldn’t do. “Bodies have chemicals that make fear, and this one does it a lot. I feel badly that I cannot heal all of the hurts in Skyhold, and that makes this body anxious. And then there are so many…I make people scared, they do not understand what I am, and what people do not understand…there are often startled thoughts of killing me that my body takes seriously. It has learned to always be afraid. Unless I am with you or Ellie or Sera or the Iron Bull or any of our friends.”

“You need me, you come get me, okay? Want me to come stand in and have your back when you’re talking to antsy people, just say the word.”

“We can always call on you, Cole, is there a way you can call on us like that? We could get you a horn or do you think that would startle people worse?” Ellie questioned.

“I…it- you- it startles you, but you do not think to hurt me—I can speak to your minds when we are near each other like we are here in Skyhold, but-“

“Do it!” Ellie and Cremisius and Sera insisted. Cremisius saying, “I’ll run it by Bull to see if he’d be freaked or not—it wouldn’t be anything personal if he wouldn’t want you doing that to him—but seriously Cole…”

“We call on you all the time for all sorts of things,” Ellie picked up for him, “you should be able to rely on us too.”

“We’re your friends, you floppy-hatted git!” Sera said. “So anyone makes you feel weirdy, they gotta answer to us. Got it?”

“You…are very good friends,” Cole said, raising a hand rub a fist against his eye, “my eyes are salty.”

Salty? Oh. Tonio pulled the handkerchief that had been folded into the breast pocket of his suit jacket, and offered it to the boy, “Here child,” though when he did look up at Tonio the man wondered if he…he spoke of his body like it were foreign to him, a Spirit, Ellie said. He said his eyes were ‘salty’ not crying so he may well not have done so before, so he handled it much the way he had for Cremisius, when his bello mimo was small and upset, and handkerchiefs were big and confusing—to either be tossed away in frustration or played with when he felt better. He raised a hand to Cole’s cheek to keep him looking up and used the other to carefully wipe at the corners of his eyes, “are you alright? They did not mean to upset you.”

“I am alright, thank you.”

“Your powers are strange, take getting used to, but I’m very glad you have them, Cole. I am grateful for all the help you’ve given me since I’ve arrived, for all you have done for Cremisius,” Tonio said, pleased to see the boy preen from his praise.

The kitchens were lively—servants preparing to take loads of trays out for deliveries, “Molly, hi!” Ellie greeted enthusiastically, hugging the girl before Sera joined in.

“I set everything up myself, everything’s safe,” she reported to Sera who nodded.

“Seriously Molls, you’re a total babe.”

“What are Friends for?” Molly supposed shaking her right wrist, huh. She wore a woven bracelet that matched the one he’d noticed on Cremisius’s wrist, Ellie, Sera, and Cole’s as well.

Apparently, they were symbolic for more than just friendship, but for Friends with a capital F. As they set to the task of mixing up a few large bowls of cookie batter, Sera filled Tonio in on the organization she worked with—offered to fashion a bracelet for him if he’d like. She promised she already told people not to ‘mess with his stuff’ he and his workshop would not fall victim to their pranks, and he could rest assured that he could trust any who wore one of their friendship bracelets.

“Oi! How’s pensive is tailoring pish? Can little people hire you?” Sera asked.

“Certainly,” he assured.

“Sweet! Josie sweetness says you’re busy with Inky’s things, but I’ll be sure to tell Friends they can go to you once you’re all open for business!”

“I appreciate the advertisement,” he grinned. Cremisius handed him the eggs needed oh. Well, at least he’d not lost practice with this, working the kitchens. He took both eggs in one hand and tapped them against the counter top before pulling them open over the bowl.

“Cripes that’s fancy!” Sera shrieked over Ellie’s, “That’s so cool!”

Oh it was fun, to be included in their ‘cookie club’ of which he was now an honorary member. They whipped up several dozen cookies in the two hours before dinner—the first dozen had several taken from it once they finished drizzling them in chocolate, put on a nicer plate and Cole whisked it away to provide dessert for Madam de Fer and Seeker Pentaghast, and a few more plates that were sent to any in Ellie’s ‘party’, her friends around Skyhold, one of which was delivered to Lady Montilyet. Too, when they were finished, they cleaned up and left two of their dozens as offering for the kitchen staff, Ellie fished a little parchment pad out of a pocket on her overcoat and wrote up a little thank-you note so they knew it was for their own enjoyment.

He was almost worried the Tavern was over-crowded, that there was certainly no way to host this proposed dinner here, when he realized the crowd was their dinner party. The whole of the Chargers he’d seen in Cremisius’s sketch book were gathered around a large table before the fire place, with the addition of Dorian, a dwarf woman he could assume was Miss Lace from Sera bounding forward and taking a seat in her lap, and Commander Cullen. Maker—Elves, Dwarves, Humans, a Qunari—people that you could visibly see came from all parts of the world, soldiers and rogues and mages, it looked like a gathering of world peace even as they were all squabbling over something.
“—his favorite, you assholes, get it straight!” the Iron Bull said, Dorian was seated… almost in his lap, they were seated so very close their thighs touched. Ahh. ‘Groady’ apparently meant the Altus rubbed the Qunari the, er…right way, he supposed. That was quite a pairing.

“Bullshit!” Stitches snapped back, “I’m his favorite. Of course I am, I’m the one doling out potion and expert life advice.”

“Like what? Krem puff needs life advice, who’s he gonna come to? Me. Wise beyond my damn horns.”

“Grim. He and Krem have the most enlightening conversations,” Skinner said.

“You’re all wrong. You simpletons. You fools,” the Dwarven Charger spoke up. “I am, by far, the superior Charger.”

“What the hell are you lot on about?” Krem asked as they joined their party, he and Ellie taking their offering of cookies to the other Elf in the Charger’s group, a willowy woman with the sort of facial tattoo he’d seen on Dalish slaves in Tevinter before Ellie went to sit across the table from the Iron Bull, on the Commander’s lap—there were few empty chairs around the table, maybe one or two.

“Krem de la Krem, my man! Tell these toolbags who your favorite Charger is,” the Iron Bull ordered.

“If you say anyone but Bull, I’ll buy your drinks for a month,” a very light skinned Human man said—not Cullen, they hadn’t been introduced yet.

“No problem, you crazies. Rocky’s right, you’re fools,” Krem informed them, and the Dwarf that had said as much earlier seemed pleased with himself but deflated when Krem wrapped his arms around the Elven woman who had taken their dessert and set it at the end of the table for later, “Dalish is my favorite Charger. Makes my favorite food, doesn’t give me grief, has never once called me a ridiculous nickname.”

“Ha!” the woman, he supposed who went by ‘Dalish’ said, patting Cremisius’s arm and kissing him on the cheek before letting him go.

“Don’t be an ass,” Cremisius drawled, dropping into the open chair on the Iron Bull’s other side. “You know you make the top three of my favorites in general. Ellie, you and papa, then Cole.”

“Hell yeah! Cole, buddy, take a seat—you too Papa’classi. Sit down with your bad self.”

Cole took an empty seat that was near the fire, and too it was near the woman playing a lute, music for the Tavern it seemed. She smiled at the Spirit who blushed and turned his attention to her, she kept playing but started up a conversation with him, asking about his day. Maryden, Tonio assumed. Huh. He would have to pull up a chair for himself he supposed though Cremisius was already looking around the table and he rose from his seat and offered it to his father. Tonio accepted but he wasn’t certain where- ahh. Well, the Iron Bull’s thighs were rather massive, the Tevene boy sat right in the Qunari’s blind spot but that didn’t seem to bother him, the weight was a familiar one and the Iron Bull made a rumbling sound in his chest as he raised a hand to tousle Cremisius’s hair.
“Alright assholes, Spirits, Boss-girl,” the Iron Bull winked to Ellie. “For anyone blind in both eyes—this here’s Krem’s father, Tonio Aclassi. Sound off, make him feel welcome, ask him embarrassing questions about this brat’s childhood. I’ll start—when, if ever, did he stop wetting the bed?”

Oh, he did not wish to be mean, but it was a bit of fun, “You know, we had consistent dry nights after he turned three.” And it earned him laughter from those around the table.

“Hear that El? I’m all kinds of impressive,” Cremisius snorted, and Ellie giggled.

“I’m Rocky, nice to meet you, this here is Grim,” the Dwarven man said, gesturing to the Human man seated next to him who waved to Tonio in greeting, “—he doesn’t do the speaking thing, but you hang around us long enough you’ll probably pick up on his sign language.”

“Thom Rainier,” said the Human man who offered to pay for Cremisius’s drinks, the man at his side raised a hand in greeting,

“Cyril, good to meet you.”

“It’s an honor,” Thom insisted, “your son is one of the finest young men I’ve ever served with.”

“Thank you—it’s an honor to meet you all,” Tonio said.

“I’m not a Charger, but I’m super glad to meet you, Mister Aclassi. I’m Lace Harding,” the Dwarven woman at the table introduced herself.

“Pleasure to meet you miss, please give my regards to your mother, I do appreciate the work she’s done for me.”

That sent the Dwarf blushing. “Oh golly, it wasn’t a problem—I’ll tell her.”

“I’m Cole!” Cole needlessly, but enthusiastically introduced himself.

“Yeah you are buddy,” the Iron Bull said, “who’s the fox? She wanna join us?”

“She’s a Human, but it’s okay if you got confused, your eye is tired because you need to sleep. Foxes are beautiful and so is Maryden! She makes music that heals people’s hurts,” he turned his attention back to the blushing woman, “you are hungry, you should eat with us, it would make me very happy to sit with you.”

“Oh, I do suppose I am due for a break,” the minstrel* decided, “just let me get her put safely away,” she said before bringing her strumming to an end and heading up the stairs with her lute.

The Iron Bull whistled. “Okay. What the hell? How are my boys bagging red-heads and my ass is landed with this one?”

“This one?” Dorian asked, insulted, “I’ll have you know I’m both an international treasure and a universal delight.”

“Didn’t say I was landed with you, Sparky. Could’ve been talkin’ ‘bout blondie over here, got a mean smolder Commander, Seeker treating you right?”

The Commander sighed, resting his forehead against the back of Ellie’s head. “Please “Indeed!” Dorian agreed. “You will not seduce the Commander—if someone could, it would be me. Our chess matches are very invigorating.”

“No,” Cullen was certain, though where he was uncertain was, “if I were...hmm, Ellie who would I be with if I weren’t with mami and was inclined toward the masculine population?”

“Thom!” she readily supplied, sending the elder Charger choking on his drink. “He looks like an older male Cassandra, and he’s a big softy romantic at heart! He even likes Wintersend romance serials!”

“I do not like them,” Thom said, “I merely...agreed that there was nothing wrong with enjoying the occasional—“ “Occasional?” Cyril drawled.

“Oh bloody hell, they’re good!” Thom conceded, earning the table’s laughter.

Maryden rejoined them, and Cole sent Cremisius a rather blinding smile—the Spirit had been making to rise from his seat to offer it to the songstress when he heard her on stairs, but Cremisius had cleared his throat and it looked like Cole were listening to something and then he resumed his seat and Maryden smiled and readily sat in his lap. They sat and chatted amicably, the table had a dozen different conversations overlapping each other, it was a wonder anyone could keep track of who was saying what to who. Tonio was pulled into conversation with Stitches, at first just talking about how he was liking Skyhold, and eventually slipping in that he did want to check in—assure Tonio the order went out for a proper pair of spectacles for him, and to make certain he was well after their appointment.

Which caught Cremisius’s attention. “Yeah, what the actual fuck did you give papa? Cole came and told me how sick he got, and he was out cold when I took him tea.”

Stitches looked to Tonio, a refusal on his lips, but Tonio nodded that it was fine for him to speak freely—he didn’t personally mind—he would explain himself, but the Healer could likely better do so, quell his son’s worry.

“Purgative lad,” Stitches said, “you know I wouldn’t give him something he didn’t need. Good tip on the cooper build-up in his eyes, little love,” he winked at Ellie, “Might not have caught that myself. Hard to tell sometimes, with brown eyes.”

“Oh yeah! Gosh, you had to take purgative for it?” she asked, sympathizing, “Wow, I’m sorry, that sucks.” She looked to Stitches, “How...um, that’s, I mean it happens but—I mean are his kidneys—“ she worried.

“Functioning normally,” Stitches assured, “The amount he chucked up, he had to be consuming the stuff. Pretty sure it’s in that paste shit but I don’t have the foggiest idea why the hell they’d load sl- servants up on copper.”

“Well I mean it is a necessary nutrient, in the right quantities,” Ellie thought it over. “We need copper for cardiovascular health, it strengthens the immune system, helps our brain communicate with the rest of our body—it’s a nifty little thing, but too much of it in your system and your organs can’t hang and start to shut down.” She tilted her head side to side, thinking and then, “Sera?”

Sera looked up from chatting quietly with miss Lace, “Yeah Inky?”
“You and S- you guys used copper in my necklace thing, right?” Ellie asked, fiddling with the white leather necklace.

“Yeah sweets, remember? Did a science lesson on it. Electromagnetic induction. I learned you about copper being a conductor, which…” the Elf girl prompted.

“Oh conductors and insulators are opposites right?” Ellie asked, “Insulators protect against or stop electricity while conductors carry voltage-“ she went very quiet then, paled.

Ahh. That did make sense then, he supposed.

“El?” Cremisius asked.

Tonio smiled reassuringly to the girl. “I was never harmed in such a way,” not to great detriment—little more than the initial ‘stay in line or you’ll get more of this’ introduction he’d been given to their Laetan task-master’s brand of punishment. Once he had slept through the call to rise, but the warning shock had been enough to prevent that from happening again, Maker, he’d felt it for days. “I worked hard, kept my head down, stayed to myself, never attempted to run.”

Ellie swallowed, nodded. “I’m- I’m sorry. I’m really glad you’re safe,” she looked to Dorian, “I thought you said House Tilani—”

Dorian sighed wearily. “It is horrible and disgusting, but a…precaution. I don’t necessarily agree with it, but that is the standard. Magisterium dictated. It costs masters little to feed their er, people, and it- those in ownership are elite few in comparison to the number it takes to serve them, they make up a fifth of the population of Minrathous if slaves were accounted for in the census.”

“So making them-“ easier to control, to kill if necessary. Ellie shook her head, “Nu-uh. Nope. Papi, nuestra carta ha sido enviada?” she turned her head toward Cullen.

His eyes went a bit wide at that, and he seemed to consider it a moment, mouthing her words to himself before he decided he did understand her sentence and, “You signed off on the first draft, but Lady Montilyet hasn’t finished working up the final document for your signature,” he said.

“I have a debriefing first thing tomorrow morning, but do you think we could call an emergency War Room meeting for after?”

He seemed to give it some consideration. “I don’t know, can we?”

“Oh yeah, sorry,” Ellie cleared her throat and rephrased, “I have a debriefing first thing tomorrow morning—there will be an emergency War Room meeting after.”

Cullen grinned, “Of course, Inquisitor, I will inform your advisory staff.”

Oh, Cremisius looked rather stricken, despite Tonio’s assurances. He rested a hand on his son’s on the table top, “Everything is well. I am here now,” he offered. Cremisius’s jaw set, like he wasn’t certain how to reply to that, like he might argue, hash out the issue further but a second hand placed itself on his son’s body—the Iron Bull laid a hand on the back of Cremisius’s neck, and the boy sighed, relaxing.

“Listen to Papa’classi,” the Iron Bull intoned, though then he spoke as if in offer, “Shanedan? Lots of big things been going on, we haven’t really had a minute to get into it.”
Cremisius snorted, smiling. “Dorian’ll be pissed if you’re up all night chatting with me.”

“Why would I be? Am I no longer allowed to watch?” Dorian questioned. “I do enjoy your little talks. You two say the most disgustingly sentimental things a Qunari and a Tevinter could possibly say to one another, it’s as blasphemous as it is amusing, and when it’s over you thank me like I actually did something more than observe and silently judge. Your syntax, of course, not your actions, it’s healthy to vent but you really could put more effort into it, at least try to wax poetic about it all.”

“Wax yourself,” the boy shot back.

“I’m insulted you think I don’t—shave this glorious form? And risk nicking it? Perish the thought.”

That got his son laughing. Tonio was glad of it certainly but…well it…it would be foolish to be jealous, it was only understandable after all. He had been out of Cremisius’s life for so long, and even in the few years leading up to their departure, there had been a growing rift between them, Cremisius withdrawing from his family more and more as the wedding approached. Their discussion the night before he left was one of the first conversations they’d had in…Maker, he wasn’t certain how long—there had been weeks upon weeks of days filled with little more from Cremisius than one worded sentences. When he looked back, his son had been silent for days, nodded to everything, and when the engagement party was unfolding, smiled when it seemed appropriate. I don’t love him! I’ll never love him, and I will never be anyone’s perfect wife! was the first thing he’d heard from his child in days. Ahh but that was all to say—once upon a time his bello mimo could be crying as if his heart had broken, and Tonio could always take him by the hand and knew exactly what to say to get him smiling again. Now it seemed that power lay with the Iron Bull, and the members of his found family. Tonio could only hope to earn that ability in time.

“Hi!” a cheery voice addressed the table, and all turned to see a small, ginger-haired Dwarven woman, waving to them in greeting. “You guys are the Chargers right?”

“Dagna!” Ellie offered, excited, “Oh my gosh, hi! You guys this is Dagna—she’s the Inquisition’s new Arcanist!”

“Well hey there, cutie!” Dagna greeted the girl, “Gosh, I didn’t know you were going to be here- oh! Your boyfriend’s a Charger, duh!” She gasped, pointing to Cremisius, “Is that him? Oh wow, he is handsome! Hi boyfriend!”

“Hey, pleasure to meet you,” Cremisius said with a wave, "Ellie’s been real excited about you joining up.”

“I hear a red head, Krem-puff, she a red head?” the Qunari asked Cremisius quietly.

“I am!” Dagna chirped cheerily.

Cremisius almost fell out of the Iron Bull’s lap as the Qunari swiveled around in his seat to lay eye on their guest, “Asking for the Chargers huh? I’m their leader, the Iron Bull, and what brings your fine self to our party?”

“Oh-“ Dagna was cut off of course by,

“I invited her!” Sera…and miss Lace both, offered up—and they looked rather surprised about it, looking to one another, both seemingly caught up in explaining.
“Uhh…” Sera said.

“I just-” Lace started.

“She’s new!”

“Yeah, she’s new and really sweet—“

“The sweetest, and Inky likes her—“

“Yeah I uh, just thought we should make her feel welcome!”

“Ditto!”

“Yeah, it was really nice of you two!” Dagna enthused.

The Iron Bull sighed, shaking his head as he resumed facing the Commander and Ellie, “Every damn time,” and then, “Pull up a seat, everyone’s welcome with the Chargers.”

“Thanks!”

Though there were truly no more seats to pull up now. It was clumsy, but Lace suggested she could ‘squeeze in’ if that was alright, which it apparently was. Sera and Lace switched places—Sera seating herself in the chair and Lace sat upon her right thigh, Dagna hopping onto Sera’s left.

“Golly you guys know how to make a girl feel welcome,” Dagna giggled.

“You…you’re an Arcanist?” Rocky asked, “I need every detail on just how exactly that happened.” It was admittedly strange for a Dwarf, people characterized by their lack of magical capability, to take up such a magic-heavy study, but Maker, this Dagna was passionate about it.

Dalish stood and stretched, Cremisius and Cole rose with her, following her to the fireplace. They helped her with the task of dishing out heaping servings from the pot over the flame, filling bowls, passing them out, Cremisius wedging between Tonio and the Iron Bull to deliver their meals, pressing a kiss to Tonio’s cheek, “Eat up, you want seconds, just ask,” before his mouth was level with the Iron Bull’s ear quietly apologizing, “Sorry, fork’s in your bowl on your right—three o’clock, pepper shakers at two if you want,” and then he was off again with Bull’s,

“Thanks brat.”

Maker, it was delicious, he could understand why it was a favorite for his child. Warm, spicy rice and chicken, peppers, broccoli, peas, carrots. He was pleased his son had no further quarrel with eating his vegetables. Ellie was apologetic when a Dwarven man—Cabot, the Tavern’s owner apparently—came with water and ale for their table, “This is okay right?” she asked of their…ahh, he supposed it might be unorthodox, to use his Tavern to cook in, eat a meal he wasn’t getting paid for.

“I didn’t have to cook for a huge-ass party which is my jam any day of the week, ’s’long as these assholes pay for their drink, I’m game. You want juice, babe?”

“Uh-huh, thanks! Can I put in an order for Marehis? To go, please, I’ll take it when we’re done here.”
“You’re the boss,” Cabot said, “Usual dinner? On it.”

“Thanks!”

“Yup.”

It was altogether a wonderful meal, and the cookies were rather the hit, earning their makers a round of thanks.

“Friggin Kremmy-boy’s da can crack two eggs with one hand! It was so cool!” Sera enthused.

“Papa’s always been able to do that,” Cremisius said.

“Hardly always, but I did get lots of practice,” Tonio supposed, it always amused his child how he could do so, he found himself making more eggs than probably necessary when Cremisius was little, just to see the toddler giggly and clapping at the trick. “My bello mimo—when he was just a little thing, he would just clap and laugh, got the biggest kick out of the trick.”

The Iron Bull grumbled something under his breath that sounded like a claim he could crack ‘fuckin’ half a dozen eggs with one hand’, but it was rather overlapped by Ellie letting out a little squeal and, “Cremisius had to be the cutest baby!”

“He was,” Tonio assured. There…he wasn’t certain if it was still there, or if it would be disconcerting for Cremisius, but he took out his pocket watch. The mechanism was purely magical, there were no gears that turned the hands, you could press in on the clockface and it would swivel, flip to the other side to hold a portrait. He quietly slipped his pocket watch out of his pocket and opened it, held it low for Cremisius to view it, made certain his son saw as he pressed the clockface, could see the edge of the old family portrait, he and Liviana standing, Tonio holding up young Cremisius between them—an offer, he could share it if he liked, or tuck it away.

“That- oh. I didn’t know it- wow,” Cremisius smiled as he took the watch in hand revealed the picture himself, elbowed the Iron Bull before he held it low in his range of sight so the Qunari could take a look.

“Oh man, Imekari,” he rumbled out, close to a coo.

“Oh-huh?” Ellie asked.

“Not you right now babe, I got Imekari out the ears,” the Iron Bull said, “Krem-cake, look at you, cute as a damn button.”

“Oh, positively precious,” Dorian agreed almost sounding like he found it sickeningly sweet.

Cremisius passed the pocket watch back to his father and gave him a nod that it was fine to share the portrait, Tonio grinned and passed it along to Ellie who lit up and took the pocket watch in hand, “Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh! Cremisius! You’re only tiny!”

“He was two, when we posed for that,” Tonio supplied. It was a simple black and white portrait, photography was still a relatively new concept, while it had Orlesian origins, it had gained some popularity in Tevinter, advanced to some degree over the years. Though for all its ability to capture an image in an instant, it took, Maker…months, nearly a year—he’d all but forgotten they’d posed for a family portrait when they arrived in the mail, an even smaller copy had been placed in a locket Liviana wore, and a larger one hang over the mantel in their home. Cremisius was clothed in a white gown all children wore regardless of gender when dedicated to the Chantry —the very reason they’d marked the occasion.

“You absolutely have to show this to Cassandra sometime,” Cullen insisted.

“He’s so! Cute! Cremisius! I can’t handle this!” Ellie enthused as she passed the picture on, “How were you this adorable?! Little chubby cheeked baby! And you had so much hair!”

“He was born with a head of it, if you can believe it,” Tonio informed her, “He was so little, weighed barely six pounds and I’m certain most of it was hair.”

“Oh my goodness,” Ellie breathed.

“Oh do shut up!” Dorian gasped, sounding appalled at the information like he startled him to think of Cremisius being that small and vulnerable—the Iron Bull’s jaw had dropped, and he looked down at his own hand as if he were certain he could have likely held a baby Cremisius in his palm, he likely could have.

“Shite, Kremmy-boy it’s hard to imagine you was so little!” Sera exclaimed, Lace nodded in agreement.

“Awe! Cute! This is you, huh boyfriend? Gosh you’re so smiley. Your ma’s really pretty. Oh! And you’re handsome too Mister Aclassi,” Dagna complimented.

“Thank you,” Tonio said.

Dalish openly cooed over the picture, Rocky and Stitches gave Cremisius a bit of heckling over being ‘adorable’, that Grim fellow smiled and swiped his index and middle finger down his chin* which seemed a positive reaction. Miss Skinner blinked at it, expression souring. “I don’t like it.”

“Skin?” the Iron Bull asked over Cremisius's mildly insulted, "What the hell?"

Skinner passed the locket back to Tonio, informing them all, “It makes me want to produce offspring.”

Goodness.

It was all great fun, but their evening together wound to a close. Sera and Miss Lace were to walk a bit with Dagna, return her to Skyhold castle, and Cremisius rose to escort Ellie back to her quarters, and Tonio was the recipient of two farewell kisses to the cheek.

He did take leave of the Tavern, but he took to the stairway up alongside the forge, to his workshop. He’d rested most of the day away, a good meal in him, and he was more than inspired. He wished to take the opportunity, get a jump start on his work, as best he could. Though he almost regretted returning to his workshop—Cole had returned his things, parchment pad, materials, his sketches to his room- oh. I know the way, and where you want them Cole had said, and he’d meant it apparently. He’d perceived Tonio’s desire to get to work, his things were waiting for him on a table in his workshop. Tonio lit the lanterns in his shop and set to work.

And Cole further made good on his word. At first Tonio was concerned the boy should be asleep, but he was given the assurance that apparently, Cole needed no such thing. As Tonio worked, the Spirit appeared and offered the man a recap of sorts, answered all the questions he’d had since his arrival—about the Breach, the Inquisition, all major world events he could care to know that had transpired in his absence. It was…rather a lot, the south had a rebellion across all of their Circles, the Conclave, the Divine’s death—it didn’t much affect Tevinter, of course, but still, Divine Justinia sounded like an admirable woman and many good souls were lost in the destruction of the Temple of Sacred ashes.

Though there was a knock on the workshop door, he would have thought perhaps it was Cremisius—it was the door that led in the direction of the Tavern, the Charger’s quarters—but the sound was off, harder, more thunking than rapping.

“The Iron Bull—I’ll leave you to talk, you really should,” Cole said, “You’ll do good work, but remember to get some rest,” he intoned before vanishing.

The Iron Bull? “You may come in,” Tonio called.

The door swung open and the Qunari had to duck to step inside, “Hey. You uh, busy? Krem-pie’s out like a light, and I heard you tinkering away in here, thought I’d uh, check in.”

“Please, sit,” Tonio offered, gesturing to the stool he’d pulled up across the table from him for Cole to be seated. The Spirit had sat on the table to be situated higher, that was his prerogative he supposed, the Iron Bull nodded and sat, he’d two glasses palmed in his right hand, and placed them on the table.

“Imekari’ll skin me if I give you anything stronger right now, something about alcohol being bad for you when you have deficiencies—she calls apple juice the ‘hard stuff’ so, I thought it might work. Got vitamins and shit in it.”

“Imekari?” it sounded as though he meant to reference Ellie, but he’d used it before, talking of Cremisius.

“Qunlat—means kid.” Ahh. Well that sorted didn’t it? “Drink?” he offered, pouring apple juice from a waterskin.

“Certainly. Thank you,” Tonio said checking the time before he sipped, he still had an hour to spare before he would need to be strict to the Healer’s order of fasting. Cremisius was ‘out like a light’, “I trust you had a good talk?” he asked. “I did not…I hope he is not distressed by the implications of my time in servitude.”

The Qunari nodded, sighing as he rubbed at the back of his neck uncomfortably. “Yeah. Look, you’ve…I’m sure it was rough, hard. But if you can—whenever you’re ready you should probably talk to him about it yourself.”

“I hoped to spare him the details—“

“To protect him or yourself?”

“Him of course.”

The Qunari shook his head. “That’s not how that works my guy.”

“He’s- I understand that Cremisius has grown but he is a child—“

“Yes. He’s a kid. Your kid, and he’s gonna have questions. He’d feel a hell of a lot better, cope with whatever he’s struggling with—he’s been worried for you, these past few years. Scared. He’s got this shitshow of possibilities, of horrible things that might have happened to you, and they’ve been cooking up there for a while. If you can work through giving him answers…he’s basically been thinking you’ve been living in hell for the past few years and it’s all his fault—he said you already told him not to blame himself. But he’s been doing that every damn day for a while now, it’s gonna take a hot minute for his brain to think something different.”

“I…he- I’m not-“

“Look. He uh. He was guilty as shit about uh…he tell you about how we met?” the Iron Bull asked.

“Oh,” Tonio breathed, “certainly. Maker, I- I have been meaning to thank you. You gave much to save my son and I will always be grateful—that you saved him that day, for all you have done for him since.”

“Well he blamed himself for that. And uh…it was a lot- might not seem like a big deal but it’s something I had to adapt to, losing half my sight. I don’t do vulnerability, or letting people see me struggle. But the guy thought he ruined my damn life, and letting him in on my recovery, helping, being uh, open, honest about the bad—because whatever I was experiencing, was a lot better than what he was beating himself up with.”

Oh. That- “I will speak with him, certainly. I apologize I’m…that makes sense. I’m afraid I’m out of practice with all of this. Being a father.”

The Iron Bull snorted at that.

“Have I offended?” Tonio asked at the derisive sound.

The Qunari shook his head. “Look. Krem- we talk a lot. A whole fucking lot. So you and me need to make something clear about your parenting choices. Cremisius was a child. I don’t know what the fuck flies in Human world but ten is nowhere near the age Imekari should get shackled into marriage to someone your damn age.”

“I absolutely agree- I- there is no excuse. I was wrong to put Cremisius in such a situation.”

“Yeah,” he agreed, but, “Hit me with some excuses though because I really need to understand just what the fuck you were thinking.”

Tonio sighed. “We were in rather a desperate situation. Business was declining, we were so deep in debt. I have no other source of…I’m trained in nothing else. I took up work, manual labor, several nights a week on our city docks to keep us scraping by but even that did little to keep us afloat. Cornelius was a friend. He’d been incapable of bringing himself to marry after losing his wife and child. I was…not in my right state of mind, exhausted, fearing my family would be indentured, and my wife, and a man I considered a friend, he…they sat me down when I was getting in from work and proposed, well, his proposal. Cremisius was young, but that only meant he would er, eventually grow to be a suitable…um. Be able to provide a suitable heir—he was a Laetan, while they’re not wholly immune to slavery, they’ve certainly a more forgiving system in place for their debts. And as it stood, he was very wealthy—is very wealthy, his household controls trade for the whole of our city. The arrangement…it secured a future for Cremisius—at the time, I swear to you, there had always been struggles, with his identity, but we did not know. I did not know that he was…I did not know he was my son. I did not know that I was dooming him to live a life that would harm him, bring him so much misery. While Cornelius was not ideal romantically—marriage does not necessarily need to be so. Liviana and myself were betrothed to one another from birth. Cornelius’s age was certainly a concern, but he had no problem waiting until Cremisius was old enough to start a family…of course I- I did not agree fifteen was an acceptable age but it was…there was no healer that spoke against it. Liviana and myself were married at fourteen, many are—we lost our first child in the spring of the year we turned fifteen. Cremisius would be taken care of, have a life and a family and be able to pursue his interests—he has always been something of an artist, he would be free to pursue that without risk of indebting himself. But I should have…I should have stopped it sooner. Cremisius railed against the arrangement—he threw a tantrum when news first broke, but he seemed to accept it for a while, and then it was never ending arguments between he and Liviana. I should have stood up for him, helped him stand his ground, ended the engagement—I should have never agreed to it in the first place. There are many ‘should have’s about it all.’

“Marriage is a weird-ass concept. But I get…you were following example. Trying to secure a good life for your kid. Being manipulated into it”

“I was a fool,” Tonio corrected, “and I take full responsibility. I…I knew my wife was having…I knew there were others. It was not ideal, our situation. I never stepped out on her but neither did I kick up much fuss when I realized she may be seeking others to fulfill certain needs. I guess I thought it was a way of making up for the lack of our situation. I did not realize Cornelius was one of her dalliances until…well. I caught them together, a few months before the wedding. They insisted I’d misinterpreted what I saw. I should have called things off then and there, realized it was all manipulations so they might be together without the scandal of breaking up a marriage and marrying a Sopporati divorcee.”

“Ironically enough, yes.”

“Do you? I never would have deduced as much,” Tonio supposed teasingly.

“Aclassi guys, always gotta give me grief,” the Qunari lamented, “Guess I can deal with it. Sorry for the uh, inquisition. Just making sure…you’re cool with Krem being Krem. That all that bullshit in Tevinter wasn’t something you’re still hung up on, planning to repeat somehow—that you know it was garbage.”

“Certainly. Thank you, for looking out for my child. Though I believe I had a rather similar conversation with young Ellie. She has imbued me with the fear of the Maker should I ever hurt Cremisius.”

The Iron Bull shook his head. “Damn, Imekari keeps beating me to the punch.”

“She loves my son, as do you it seems?”

“He’s uh, a good kid. You raised a pretty incredible son.”

Had he? “I provided for a child, I believe you are more responsible for the man he is. I must confess I’m admittedly jealous.”

Was he…did this Qunari truly love his son as much? So much so he felt insecure now that Cremisius’s biological father was around? Tonio offered, “As are you, after a fashion.” It seemed no different to him than Ellie’s arsenal of parents and guardians.
“Me?”

“Certainly.”

“Huh.”

There was rather the timely knock on the door, gentle rapping followed by the son in question poking his head in, rubbing sleep from his eyes, “Papa, what’re you still doing up?” ahh, he was dressed for bed, had he woken and come in search of Tonio?

“I was merely getting some work done, the Iron Bull has been keeping me company,” Tonio said.

Cremisius blinked at that, still waking up it seemed, “Oh. Bull, hey, there you are.”

“Papa Bull,” the Qunari corrected, “—just got certified by your old man, brat!”

“‘m’not calling you that,” the boy mumbled out as he staggered over to join them, just laying against the Iron Bull’s back, pressing his forehead against the back of the Qunari’s neck, “Had the dream again.”

Dream? “Shit,” Bull sympathized, “Everyone in the Inquisition is actually Venatori dream, or you’re making out with Boss-girl and when you pull away she’s Rocky?”

“Second one. And she doesn’t turn into Rocky, it’s just my worst nightmare—he’s her biological father and suddenly she looks just like brown, red-headed girl-Rocky.” That…did sound horrific.

“Sorry kid.”

“You weren’t in your cot, winded myself falling into it, you ass, woke Dorian.”

“My bad,” the Qunari chuckled, lumbering to his feet, “just hanging with Papa’classi. Knocking back a few drinks Imekari style. I’ll walk you back—kid shit, you already kicked your fuckin’ socks off,” the Iron Bull sighed. Ahh, that was a habit of his—he couldn’t fall asleep if his feet were too cold, but he always managed to kick them off in his sleep. Cremisius let out an umf as the Qunari deftly hoisted the boy over his shoulder, and, “Back to bed.”

Cremisius was already half asleep it seemed, Tonio was a little nervous that his son had walked the battlements when he was so tired, but even as he was he raised a hand to point to Tonio and intone, “Shouldn’t be working so late—get some rest, got it?”

Tonio smiled. “I’ll not be at it too long. Sweet dreams, Cremisius.”

Tonio Aclassi worked until his watch made him aware it was three in the morning and he made a neat stack of soft sleep clothing for the Inquisitor, dimmed the lanterns in his workshop, and made his winding way through Skyhold, and back to his quarters.

He was not the only person working late he supposed.

“Ambassador,” he greeted politely. The Antivan woman was just unlocking the door to her own room, she smiled as he passed by.

“Mister Aclassi. You had a pleasant evening, I hope?”

“I did. My meeting with Ellie was very productive, we had a lovely dinner and I’ve gotten a good bit of work done.”

“How excellent.”

“Your evening was well?”

“Certainly,” she said, then, “I would love to see what you have in mind for Eleanor’s wardrobe, I’m remiss I could not attend your meeting. Would you perhaps be willing to discuss the finer details with me? Over dinner, perhaps?”

“Certainly,” he agreed.

Lady Montilyet offered him a warm smile, “Wonderful.”

Skyhold was quiet as Cassandra walked alongside the Commander, taking in the night air before retiring, it did seem to help Cullen wind down, fall asleep with greater ease when they took the time to relish in the peace and quiet of their new fortress, walk the walls and feel the security Haven’s fall had robbed them of. Oh, but it was a relief to be back in his office, his quarters. He afforded her the opportunity to ascend the ladder before him—he always followed her up closely, it was ridiculous and welcome, flirtatious. Too…a bit of protectiveness. Something she noticed in him where she and Eleanor were concerned. There were little things—always having an arm up, ready to keep them from falling or support them when they ascended stairs or walking on the side that bore more passersby when they walked alongside one another. And she knew when he woke from nightmares because she either woke the same instant, finding herself being pulled into a defensive position—the man crying out as he moved to protect her from danger that was not present—or if he had gentler waking, she woke when morning came, his leg over her thighs, her head tucked under his chin, arms around her as a hand cradled the back of her head and he held her so very close like he could envelope her, physically shield her from any and all harm. And never did it feel like coddling, or that he did not think her capable of defending herself. It merely made her feel…it spoke to his desires, made her feel cherished in a way she had not expected someone to make her feel. It made her feel loved.

Maker, did she love this man.

“Did you enjoy your time with Madam de Fer?” Cullen asked as they prepared for bed.

“Certainly,” Cassandra assured. The woman was an excellent hostess and they’d taken to having meals with one another, since the Enchanter did not care to dine in the Tavern. It gave the woman some company. Too, she’d been one of Eleanor’s guards during the day and that provided the opportunity to get insight on how the girl was faring. Ugh…Cassandra was not certain how to feel, or what to do about the situation—if there was anything to do. Eleanor had apparently ordered a bottle of wine for her dinner with the Aclassi men. However, between the two of them, the Misters Aclassi had not drained the bottle, left half of it abandoned in her room. When Madam de Fer returned Eleanor to her quarters to clean up after her impromptu mission with the Chargers, the girl had handed it over to Madam de Fer to take for herself or dispose of as she saw fit, with the shy admission that while she had not imbibed a single drop of the drink, she had certainly been very tempted to do so. Ugh. Cassandra had set a horrible example for the girl. She was not certain if she was more upset with herself, or with that horrible Elf.

Strange how once upon a time Solas had seemed a blessing—a miracle that showed up when they most needed it, someone who had some semblance of understanding about the Breach in the sky and the Mark on their prisoner’s hand—and Sera seemed a horrible curse. Now their roles were reversed.

“How was dinner with the Chargers—with Eleanor?” she wondered.

“Fun. She seemed well, in good spirits, and Mister Aclassi is acclimating well. He has a picture of Cremisius—as a baby.” Oh! Ugh. That sounded incredibly precious. “It had Skinner wishing to, quote ‘produce offspring’ and I honestly can’t blame her,” he said as he pulled back the covers and slipped into bed.

Cassandra huffed, beating a fist against her pillow to fluff up the sides before climbing into bed alongside him, shaking her head as she warned, “Do not allow Varric to hear you speak as such,” that had Cullen turning onto his side to face her, “I have discovered why the Dwarf has been endlessly annoying.”

“Truly?”

“Certainly.”

“And when he learned as much he assumed it was because I am with child. That is why he was so attentive and overly concerned for my wellbeing.”

Cullen’s eyes widened at that, “He thought you were pregnant? I thought you discussed your depression with him.“

“He took that conversation as- ugh. I suppose it wasn’t wholly clear—I thought he had realized I was taking medication, when he asked if you knew I merely said yes, I did not elaborate what you knew. I suppose him threatening to ‘kick your ass’ if you were not supportive should have tipped me off to his line of thinking but-“

“He should certainly kick my ass if I were anything less than supportive of your decision to treat your depression,” Cullen said. Though, “He truly thought as such?” he smiled, “you know, when I did question his recent behavior, accused him of having something of an interest in you he said, ‘I’m just happy for you crazy kids’ and he thought what we ‘have going on’ was ‘really cool’…I thought he was speaking purely of our relationship…I can’t say I disagree on either account.”

“Either?” Cassandra questioned.

Cullen shrugged, though he seemed almost shy. “Our relationship is, in point of fact ‘really cool’. And perhaps, someday…if- if you were so inclined…”

“Cullen!”

“In the future- far far off in the future—never if you have no interest-“

“I…have never thought about it. Not much.” It had more than crossed her mind of course, marriage and children had been things crammed down her throat since the moment her infant body was saved a scarce millimeter from the carriage floor and Antony called out ‘I caught him, I caught him! Oh! He’s a girl!’ . Antony had been rather caught up in the idea he would have a baby brother. He adapted, however, it took all of the moment he first held her to love that he had a baby sister. But marriage, babies of her own—it had been something she’d had to rebel against to have any say in her future, stay the course of her training, her career. Eleanor was most assuredly her child, she felt that with such a ferocity—she could hardly abide the idea of losing her. When...whenever Solas spoke of his own past, Maker, it was almost inconceivable such things could be true, but Cole had confirmed every word and...the Spirit was forthright. To the point that when Cassandra had the passing thought that they would trust him until he took off a mask and revealed he had an entire other name and horrific backstory of murder and betrayal, the Spirit had informed them all out loud that his name, before the Veil, was ‘Theron’ it meant ‘he who hunts’ but he had not used a name in literal Ages, neither did he wish to hunt any longer. He wanted to be Cole. And he had, he confessed, been something of a murderer, an executioner in the White Spire. His blatant honesty of course only furthered their assurance that they could rely on him to tell them if Solas was lying. So when he confirmed Solas’s heartbreak, that Mythal had been murdered, their child...she could understand it, to a degree. She could level cities in Eleanor’s name. If someone took her, or Maker forbid, took she and Cullen both? The possibilities would be limitless, just how far her fury could take her.

So...needless to say, the way she was feeling...marriage, a child, children. These did not seem like such a foreign concept any longer. She did not wish to cement such a thing, just yet, but in the next few years? She could see something like that in the future. M...marrying this man. Having their life with Eleanor. And perhaps...

“In the far far future...perhaps it would be ‘really cool’,” she offered. It felt like vulnerability to even allow that much.

Cullen smiled, “Truly? Perhaps?” he asked, taking it as it was—that what most would perceive a mere inch of commitment, was indeed truly a mile in this circumstance, as far as Cassandra was concerned.

“Perhaps,” she agreed, with a smile of her own, and then she- it was not a squeak or a squeal, but the man was smiling, and his lips were ticklish on the sensitive skin of her neck as he rolled over in bed to straddle her, peppering kisses to her neck, her collarbone before taking her lips with his own, kissing her soundly before he chuckled and,

“Perhaps we could do with some practice then?”

Hmm, indeed. “Where would we be if we did not train?”

Chapter End Notes

Antivan:
Hasta aqui=up here!

Tevene:
Cuore mio=my heart

*25 is about the peak age of maturity, when our cells start breaking down and we start aging in a deteriorative way.
*Solas old AF and Fen'Harel is, a title for him, not his actual name. So either he slaps the name 'pride' on himself, but more likely, is that after his whole 'YEETing the gods' thing, the name Solas came to mean 'pride'. When I think about Solas I like that the name sounds like 'solace' which means to be alone--which, when you look at Solas's tombstone in Nightmare's part of the Fade during Here Lies the Abyss, his ultimate nightmare is to die alone. ANYWAY I digress. Solace, being alone has the implication of being at peace, being undisturbed, 'tranquil' so, I whipped it around to the definition that it's possible that once upon a time, someone loved this egg head and named him something nice.

*Canon, OG 'Elves' were called 'Elvehnan', which is why in this fic, Solas usually tip toes around calling Elves anything other than 'his people', because they aren't Dalish--that's the name Humans gave them. They're 'Elvehnan'.

*Kay kiddos. Once upon a time, after Solas done yeet the gods, Elves discovered that Humans existed. They origionally blamed Humans for the loss of their connection to magic and immortality. Anyway, Shartan--when Andraste was doing the whole 'big adventure that made her the center of Andrasten religion' thing and got the Maker to be like "you know what, Humanity? You cute, I'll keep you" the Elf, Shartan rode with her and as a thank you to the Elves for their help, they were given the land called the Dales, thus Dalish. But uh, Humans changed their tune about that eventually.

*The Fade working as Elf afterlife for non-Andrasten Elves isn't canon but it's implied just in little details that make me think this is how it works now. It's a system that makes sense. All Dalish 'gods' mentioned are canon, and the kind of Spirits I've linked to them match the description of what they're considered god of. How you behave and who you align yourself with in life as an Elf, dictates how you serve in the Fade in death. Solas has spirit friends he knows from before the Veil, and they work with him--in his loyalty mission 'All New Faded for Her', you see one of his spirit friends, she speaks in Dalish, has no Vallislin, like 'Your Trainer' has no Vallislin, I take this to mean they work with Solas/he removed his friend's Vallislin when she joined his cause to take down the Evanuris, binding her to him/serving the idea of Fen'Harel in the Fade.

*The Tevinter Imperium is literally just a Human Evanuris.

*Markus Pentaghast is the current ruler of Nevarra, and Radonis is the name of the current reigning head of the Tevinter Imperium, since his name is a bit more rare, and would tip Mister Aclassi off that the Inquisition has been asked to pick political buddies with either Tevinter or Nevarra, it goes without saying. In game, when Josie proposes the idea to the Inquisitor, she recommends siding with Tevinter since it is an older power that will likely still stand in the future, as opposed to the dwindling, questionable strength of Nevarra. You can ask if it'll bother Cassandra, since she's literally a Pentaghast and Josie will tell you the Lady Seeker could give absolutely zero craps.

*if it's been a minute since you've played, Tonio's workshop is in the stone room on the corner of the wall, directly above the Requisition's office, and then the Chargers I've placed in that stone room that branches off the attic of the Tavern, where in game there's just a broken bed with an axe sticking out of the foot board.

*Iron Bull dialogue in game reveals Krem sews winged nugs--Bull asks Cassandra if they can borrow a catapult to launch them
*If you play as female Trevelyan, Dorian reveals that you're distant cousins and the Trevelyan line descends from Tevinter.

*Barnabus is the merchant you can go to complete 'Heraldry from a Herald' in Val Royeaux. cough cough

*Skyhold has cats running around according to Cole's 'weird behavior' where he has the cats dance and play for the Cook to see and laugh at. So, Anya has some kitty friends!

*Maevaris is mentioned in DA:I in a War Table mission "A friend in the Qunaris", you get from Dorian. Maevaris is addressing the Magisterium about the Venatori and wants them further denounced and acted against in Tevinter, Dorian suggests the Inquisition support her in that endeavor.

*Options for Denham's trial are execution, Conscription, Exile to the Sea of Ash, and being handed over to the Templars for them to punish. I combined the last two-- handing him over, and letting them decide to exile him.

*Just a fun trivia thing--I'm not talented or patient enough to do so, but all of Maryden's dialogue in game is in Iambic Pentameter.

*Grim uses the sign for 'sweet' to describe Krem's baby picture.
Daddy Issues Part 2

Chapter Summary

Disclaimer: We cover a lot of loyalty and side missions here, so any dialogue taken from in-game to use here belongs 100% to DA:I, writers, producers, etc. I own none of it! If I did, Krem would be romanceable and we wouldn't be here now would we?

Wrapping up Solas reveal, Ellie has a spelling test and gets Dorian's loyalty quest, and the Qun has one or two demands.
We're handling all the major daddy issues.

Chapter Notes

Here we go! Thank you so much for reading, and all the lovely Kudos and comments! I hope you enjoy!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was warm, when she woke. A body on either side of her…one laying directly on top—the smell of coconut oil and mustard and puppy dander, which somehow made a perfume she so loved. Her sweet girls. She wasn’t sure how long she slept, but her girls had just slipped into bed with her, Sera snoring against her ear, Ellie’s face pressed into her neck to shield her eyes from the orange-red glow of firelight against the darkness, and Anya was a comforting weight across their legs. Oh, she hazily remembered their return, Ellie's at least. Krem had seen her safely back and she roused Marehis gently, had brought her dinner she scarfed down, topped off with cookies they had saved for her. She had been ravenous, and still so tired, Ellie must have taken care of whatever dishes she'd left empty.

She would not be falling back to sleep tonight, but that was alright. She needed this—a moment of peace and quiet and comfort. She carefully carded a hand through Ellie’s hair. She had missed her terribly—she thought her child had found her wanting, had lost faith in her ability to keep her safe after Haven’s fall. That she resented her. And all along- ugh! She could not believe—

She could not believe she had not seen anything more questionable about Solas’s lack of a past. She should have realized he- just- she should have known! And she definitely should have realized Ellie was avoiding him! She had seen her open enthusiasm at the prospect of spending time with Marehis evaporate the very moment Marehis made mention of Solas.

What he tried to do to Sera! Oh!

She felt- she felt foolish and used and she would be requiring everyone that wanted to come within even a mile of her children to have a severely good reason, and an elaborate background check. She would want to lay eyes on their parents, their birth certificate, they would have to be able to point to the village they grew up in on a damn map—name that village! Have three childhood friends as reference!

That wasn’t all entirely plausible, not for everyone. But Cole could verify their identities at least. While he hadn't done so right out of the gate with Solas, that was merely because he did not realize he should say anything. He explained as much when apologizing for her hurt. It wasn’t until they brought Solas so heavily into question themselves, delved down the right path of thinking, that the Spirit realized they needed to know they were working with Fen- oh she wanted to cry. Wanted her own mother, because- she had trusted him! She had loved him, trusted that man with her heart and her body—trusted him with her girls! And he had betrayed them.

“Mami?”
Oh! Oh she could kick herself if the motion wouldn’t risk unsettling Anya or hurting the girl’s on either side. She’d begun to cry, quietly but of course Ellie was roused by Marehis’s tears falling off the Elf woman’s jaw onto the girl’s cheek.

“Da’vehnan, shhh, everything’s alright. Go back to sleep-“
The girl hugged her tighter, “I’m sorry you’re sad, mami. I’m so sorry about all of this-“
“It is none of it your fault-“
Oh she did not like that she could feel Ellie’s chin quivering against her neck. “B-but I-I’m the one who got all stupid and matchmakery- it was none of my business, I shouldn’t have-“ “Shh, no, sweet girl- you- I assure you-“ Marehis sighed. “Your teasing did little to prompt our relationship—we had already been interested in one another.”

“So…are you and pa- um. Are you guys broken up?”
Were they? It was somewhat implied when your lover revealed themselves an ancient being you’d been taught to avoid, hate, and fear the whole of your life, who was now responsible for several horrific acts of terrorism. “Right now we are certainly taking a break.” She could not abide the man at the moment. But neither…she was not certain just how she could trust him ever again. But she was not about to- part of her wanted to march down into the dungeons and toss him right into the dungeon hole, but she wasn’t about to rip away someone Ellie loved. Too…she hated it but still, she loved him. Perhaps that was what made her hate hurt. It would be up to Ellie entirely, just how the Inquisition moved forward with Solas, and if her child still wanted some semblance of a relationship with the man she considered a father-figure…well Marehis wasn’t certain how to handle that, there was a part of her that knew there was a level it would be unjust to keep her from that, but it was so dangerous, she- she- she couldn't trust him!

“I’m sorry about baldy,” Sera mumbled in her ear, her arms around Marehis’s waist holding her more tightly, “You wan’ me to punch him?”

“Sera’s very jealous I let Cremisius deck Solas.”
That almost sent the woman teasing, but then she remembered, her remorse fresh, “It…it did not hurt you, when the Lieutenant punched Solas, did it?” she was grateful when Ellie shook her head ‘no’, “Da’vehnan, I am so sorry—I should have been more mindful of your bond in my interrogation-“ oh she could have done so much worse than fear and a bit of vertigo.

“It was an accident—you didn’t know. And it um…it wasn’t like he was doing it on purpose or anything.” Marehis did have to concede that that much was true. Ugh. He…really did love this girl. Still, it ached that she had inflicted such discomfort and fear upon Ellie, even unintentionally. “Plus, I mean, it was an interrogation—you had to do what you had to do to get answers.”

Oh. She was- she was so ashamed. In the moment, she’d been so angry with him, so hurt that yes, even as he was still speaking truth, even as he’d been nothing short of forthright since they woke him, she’d- she just- he had not cared! Had not given a single care for this girl when they first met, and what was more, he’d been trusted to care for her! They had relied on him to keep her alive in those first few days—after the Breach initially opened and after their first assault on the thing. Once upon a time, Solas would have let this girl die from her Mark if it meant it would transfer to him, let her be executed for his crimes while he pursued his madman’s scheme to bring down the veil. And while that had changed, coming to the realization that she had trusted this man in those days was a harsh blow.

It was still early, they did not need to be up for hours yet, for the debriefing…and a bit more questioning. Of Sera, and Marehis was not allowing such a thing to happen without the girl being prepared. Ellie put up no qualms with sleeping further, when Marehis said she should rest more, it took no more than a few minutes for the girl to drift off again. Oh, she must be so tired.
Sera reached out to brush the girl’s hair back from her face, pressed a kiss to her temple before looking to Anya—the pup was awake enough and when Marehis and Sera climbed out of bed, Anya curled up next to Ellie to keep her warm.

Marehis took up one of their blankets and took Sera by the hand, to lead her out onto the balcony across from the bed, they could seat themselves behind the fireplace, stay warm as they talked and it gave them privacy. They sat with their backs against the wall and Marehis draped the blanket over their shoulders and took a moment to collect her thoughts.

“What’s up Mare? You know I’m not all Elf-religioni. Um, you okay though?”

“I am.” Her religion was somehow the same as she’d been taught, and completely different at the same time, their gods were real...they just weren’t gods. Eternity in the Fade was not wholly appealing to her, and she was...she might speak with Cassandra and Ellie, she was sincerely considering dedicating herself to the Maker. But that was not what mattered right now. “Sera, Solas has confessed to something you should be made aware of.”

Apparently, as Elves were all once magical, they were all born with some natural affinity for it. According to Solas, any Elf could nurture their magical state, and if they were not already a born mage, they could certainly become such. He had since verified this with others he’d met in his time since he woke. And more recently, with Sera. Without her knowledge, and certainly without her permission. The poor girl was wide eyed and speechless as Marehis carefully explained the magic Solas had sensed in her, that her training with him had been his subtle way of influencing her to nurture the talent she didn’t know she had, and ultimately that she truly had cast, of her own power, against a demon attempting to attack Ellie. That her ability to power Ellie’s Mark so greatly was because of her own magic. Oh her poor girl, she was trembling and it certainly wasn’t because of the chill.

“Da’vehnan-“

“S-s-so w-what? Am I some kind of freak half-mage or some shite? I’m not gonna start having Fade dreams am I?” Sera let out a startled sound, brought her fists to her temples like a vise, “That asshole asked if I was Fade dreaming when I was freaking out about what happened, and he- he friggin! He was disappointed—he friggin wanted me to have been! He-!”

“Shhh shhh shh, emma'asha,” Marehis cooed, pulling the girl close and rubbing her back, “you are alright. Cole has confirmed you have not er, fully awakened your own magic. If you ever choose to do so, it will be just that—a choice.”

Her chin quivered but she nodded, “K-kay. It’s no offence to Inky—I don’t mean that Mages is freaks but I just- frig!”

“Of course, da’len, he should not have manipulated you into such practice. I- I am so sorry.”

"S'not your fault," Sera sniffled. Wasn't it? She felt a fool for letting this man into her life, trusting him with Ellie, Sera. And she had! Implicitly! One of the few reasons she felt a modicum of certainty for their safety when they traveled on to the Oasis without her or Cassandra was the fact that she was leaving them with him! “Thanks for giving me a heads up. Um. I’m gonna be questioned?”

“Not as if you’ve done something wrong, da’vehnan,” if Solas had somehow managed to get Sera into trouble, Marehis certainly wouldn’t be leading her into questioning, she’d be managing her escape. “I swear you are not in any sort of trouble, the Iron Bull will have questions, as will Leliana merely about your experience with Solas in the time he was attempting to er-“

“Turn me into a friggin mage! That tears it—if I see baldy, I’m swinging!”

No one would stop her. To make an informed decision was one thing—to be manipulated unwittingly into a life altering situation? He had this delusion that all Elvehnan had once been magical, and Sera having such an open access to her own magic already meant she would take to it swiftly and it would feel so natural to her that she would not dislike the change, it would feel right, and she would be glad of it, thrive. It did not matter if such a thing changed her life permanently for the better—it was Sera’s life!

Oh! She just-! She was so infuriated with him!

Sera calmed, enough to sniffle out that she was done, wanted to snuggle with ‘Inky’. They rose to return to bed, Marehis wrapping an arm around Sera’s shoulders.

“What if he’s watching us in the Fade?” Sera asked in fright, that sent Marehis’s eyes opening wide, heart pounding because yes that would certainly be very disconcerting.

She could kill him.

“Let’s…just try to get some sleep, da’vehnan.”

“Kay.”

Sera curled up against the younger girl and Marehis climbed into bed to hold her, oh her poor da’assan. Her sweet girl—how could he?! She wasn’t going to focus on that now—she was going to hold this girl and help her through however she was feeling about all of this, comfort her and make certain she slept pleasantly. Hmm, she may need a bit of a trim if she wished to maintain her current style—oh she had the most precious ears! They were adorable, and the girl had grown to be less self-conscious of them. Sometimes when they hugged or laid down like this Marehis would press kisses to her ears the way her own mother did and they would flutter just adorably she almost couldn’t stand it! It made her wish the use of time magic herself so she might find her girls when they were little ones—rescue them from orphanhood, she would certainly do a much more suitable job than that horrible Emmauld woman or those so called ‘caretakers’ in Ellie’s orphanage. Human toddlers were adorable in Marehis’s experience, and Sera! Precious blue-eyed sweet-eared baby she must have been!

They did rest a while longer. and the kitchens delivered breakfast for them. It was a relief to be back in a sort of familiar schedule, something normal. Their schedules did not always allow for the morning ritual of prayer and breakfast, but they did try their hardest. Cassandra needed to touch base with her people this morning—Barris and Fletcher, to ensure the Templars were well in hand so the rest of her morning was free and clear for her to spend in debriefs and meetings—she was likewise protective of Sera, did not wish the girl to face Leliana and the Iron Bull’s questioning without the Seeker there to either guide or offer support, and too, to be there for Ellie. So Marehis would do her best to keep up routine, get back into the schedule they’d lost with Haven—breakfast and prayer.

When Marehis was just finishing getting their meals set before the fireplace, Sera was already sitting up, petting Anya to rouse her and the pup yipped and bound off the bed to sit patiently at her food bowl and wait for them to join her before attacking its contents.

“Inky sweets, s’time for breakfast.” Ellie stirred slightly, but merely rolled over and settled back into dozing, “Ink?” The girl mumbled unintelligibly in response, almost fully asleep again.

Marehis sat on the edge of the bed and brushed back her hair so she could rest her hand on her forehead. “Da’vehnan? Are you feeling unwell?” Her skin felt warm from sleep, but not feverish.

“M’okay, just tired,” Ellie sighed, and after a moment she sat up, rubbing sleep from her eyes, “Sorry, I’m up.”

“We could always send word, delay things if you need more rest,” Marehis offered.

Ellie shook her head, “This is important, and then there’s the meeting, and I still have lessons later—I’m okay.”

“Breakfast is ready, sweet girl,” Marehis said, “there’s coffee.”

Ellie nodded, and while it didn’t pull a smile from her, she did rise and they sat before the fireplace. They sat in silence, and for Marehis…she just meditated, she supposed. She was not inclined to offer up prayer to the Evanuris, not as she understood the system now. Perhaps in an emergency—if she was truly in need of a Spirit. Breakfast with her loved ones was no such situation. She held Sera and Ellie’s hands while the girls prayed to themselves…mindful now, to take Ellie’s Marked hand in her own. Apparently- Solas had finally seen fit to mention that Sera’s tendency to hold Ellie’s Marked hand came from her underlying magic being attracted to it—her Mark could sense someone more compatible laying hands on it, the action distracted it from attacking Ellie’s magic.

Marehis released all hold of her hand when breakfast was underway, it was either that or feed the girl. Which she had no objections to, but it was a touch too close to babying her, Ellie might find it embarrassing—she needed her Marked hand for eating as her other hand was occupied with holding a report she was poring over, only setting it aside to break out her parchment pad and take down notes, absentmindedly taking bites of food every now and again. Sera fretted she wasn’t eating enough and took up the task of maneuvering a piece of toast in Ellie’s eyeline, “Inky! Open up!”

Her distracted, “Wh-?” was cut off by a squeaked, “mf!” as the Elf girl unceremoniously shoved toast in her mouth. She did take pause to take a few bites of the slice properly before setting it on her plate, downing a few gulps of coffee before resuming her work.

“What’re you readin for? You’re super ready for your test today,” Sera said.

“Just brushing up before my advisor meeting, there’s a few things I want Josie to consider me adding to my letter for picking sides,” she said distractedly, jotting something else down before she stretched and rose to her feet, going to brush her teeth, and the moment her mistress was up, Anya was gulping up any left overs on Ellie’s plate, licking it clean.

Ellie did seem reticent when it came to donning her armor again, and Marehis was more than glad to offer her an excuse to put it off a moment more, pulling the girl into her lap to wet and comb her hair, style it a bit, just another thing she had sorely missed. She had wanted desperately to indulge the girl, offer some level of pampering and comfort when she was so poorly as they traveled, when she was taking up the task of making Skyhold a livable space for the Inquisition. Oh she could throttle-! It- it didn’t matter now, because now she could do as much. The weekend was upon them and Ellie would have no obligations, neither would Sera. Perhaps the girls could be persuaded to spend their downtime together, have a weekend in, Cassandra could join them even. She wanted to catch up—Ellie had made mention of Sera and something about Miss Lace and Miss Dagna that sounded like…well Ellie hadn’t been certain, and she hadn’t wanted to gossip, but Lace and Sera had invited the Inquisition’s anarchist to dinner, and neither had told the other about it and they seemed rather flustered about the whole affair. Oh! She felt like she’d missed out on so much! Had her child taken a further step with her relationship with her boyfriend? Was her dear da’assan forming a Dwarven Harem? What was happening in their beautiful little lives? She wanted all the details! Well, maybe not all of the details, but anything her girls wanted to share with her, she’d gladly listen to—it had gotten to the point she missed their voices, if they took up the task of reading the Chant aloud to her she would not grow bored.

The elder Mister Aclassi had apparently been a busy man—Abby arrived when they called for their trays to be cleared away, bearing a few sets of clothing meant for sleep, some meant for practice or casual wear, which seemed rather a relief to the girl. And oh, he’d done such lovely work—Ellie was able to slip her shirt on comfortably, and where it cinched at the waist so it did not billow out to be in the way or get caught on anything and the hem could fall at her hips, cinches at her wrists that gave her the option to have open sleeves or close them for training made the casual clothing seem somehow both more comfortable, and more dressy. He’d embroidered a little greeting—Ciao, bella into the inside of her sleeves, it was altogether very cute, and her sweet girl seemed relieved to be able to go the day without donning her armor.

She did still carry her staff though. That was a bit of a change Cassandra had taken note of with Marehis—Ellie did not set foot outside her quarters without her staff during working hours, it was symbolic of her station, and too it would likely work as a sign—she did not carry it in her down time, so if someone had need of her in an Inquisitor capacity, they would know she was readily available, working, when they saw her staff. Marehis took point, flanking her as she led them from her quarters to meet in the War Room, Anya close at her side. She expected Sera would be walking alongside her, she usually sought constant contact with the girl when they were together, but the Elf girl hung back, walked alongside Marehis, speaking very quietly, “Ink wasn’t hungry again.” She…she’d eaten breakfast-? “That’s four days in a row now that we know of—Cole said she barely ate when he was with her, her first day on the job. A few bites at breakfast, and then she was off to Commander Dreamy’s office and then just nothing the rest of the day. She didn’t eat until like, almost three in the afternoon the next day when I was with her and that was only cause I um—Cole was so worried about her and all the parents are busy right now so he came to me, and it got me worried, but she’s been eatin’ good in bigger groups, so I had Cole get Bull to come and say he just wanted to see Kremmy’s da arrive safe, and Krem put in his report that Anya ate most of her breakfast yesterday. Sounded like an accident but the same thing went down this morning.”

But- oh. Oh goodness. It had, hadn’t it? Damn it all- how long had this been happening? She’d been keeping careful watch of the girl but she hadn’t had a meal with her after they arrived in Skyhold, not until the day she became Inquisitor. She’d been eating well enough then hadn’t she? What- “Has Cole offered any enlightenment on the issue?” Marehis asked quietly.

Sera sighed. “Only that it isn’t like before where she was hungry, and her brainy stuff made her ignore it when bad pish happens—she’s just flat out doesn’t have an appetite. She ate good at dinner last night though so it- I don’t know what the frig.”

Marehis wrapped an arm around Sera’s shoulders oh—anyone worth their godhood bless this girl. All of the ‘parents’ may have been busy but Cole had done well to go to Sera, she made Marehis proud beyond words with her care of Ellie. “Thank you, da’vehnan.”

“Hola, Lady Josie!” Ellie offered up cheerfully. It almost startled Marehis to realize it was the most energized she’d heard the girl sound today. She would see if the girl would be agreeable to an appointment with Elan or Adan today, she must be coming down with something. There was a bug going around as they came up on the beginning of spring, it was still working its way through Skyhold.

The Ambassador looked up from her work, rising from her seat, “Oh Eleanor, you look absolutely precious, mjia!” Lady Josephine sounded delighted as she had the girl turnabout for her, “Mister Aclassi did a marvelous job.”

“Oh-huh,” the girl nodded, smiling for the Antivan woman. “I really love it.”

“Come,” Lady Montilyet said, coming around her desk and offering her hand to Ellie, “Everyone is congregated in the War Room.”

The War Room was rather full, of people and voices overlapping one another, not arguing just lots of conversations happening at once, reviewing what they had learned from Solas, speculating on his future, though that silenced when they entered—replaced with-“Eleanor,” Cassandra greeted warmly.

“Oh sweetheart-“ Cullen started, running a hand over his face as he leaned back in his chair and then pitched forward to rise to his feet.

“Official meeting,” Leliana reminded in singsong.

“Do not care” Cullen returned as he steadily approached, ”my girl looks absolutely precious.”

“Papi!” Ellie laughingly complained as he swept her up in a hug, blushing at his compliment.

“You do!” he insisted as he set her down. “Doesn’t she?” Goodness, he looked prepared to fight any who would deny it.

“Very pretty,” Leliana agreed, amused.

“Ellie is beautiful!” Cole offered up enthusiastically before cheerfully realizing, “Oh! She is wearing different clothes!”

“Mister Aclassi has done splendid work, you look lovely,” Cassandra agreed.

“Thanks,” Ellie replied shyly.

The War Table was clear, chairs placed around it which seated the Iron Bull, Cassandra, Cullen, Leliana, and surprisingly enough, even Cole was sitting in a chair-

“It is not as fun as sitting with someone else, but it makes Lady Josie happy that I can sit still!” the Spirit announced.

“I’d let you sit with me buddy, but we’re about to get into an important meeting,” the Iron Bull apologized.

“Meeting schmeeting,” Sera declared it, and Cole smiled brightly as the Elf girl squeezed in to share the chair with him, wrapping the Spirit up in a hug, “I got you Cuddly!”
Oh, it was sweet how that sent the boy gasping in delighted surprise, “Instead of Creepy!” Sera blanched at that, “Shite, I haven’t called you that in like, weeks and weeks I don’t think but um, I am real sor-“

“It is okay, it takes time to get used to something strange, a Spirit in Human form is very strange. And you have always been very afraid of the Fade. And I used to always poof places and that can be very startling. Now you like me—and my floppy hat!”

“Love you and your floppy hat!”

Ellie took a seat at Cole and Sera’s sides, patting the empty chair next to her for Marehis to sit, with the door secured behind them and guards in the hall she supposed it would be alright, she was a part of this meeting after all though…well she certainly hadn’t wished to speak it- she felt so ashamed, but Cassandra had been kind enough to sit down with her before she finally returned to Ellie yesterday, talk through everything with her so that the Seeker could speak on her behalf—offer up everything that they knew now about Solas.

“Thank you all for coming,” Leliana said, starting them off. “Understand that everything we speak of in this room is absolutely confidential for the moment, and may only be spoken of with those present—save of course, Lieutenant Aclassi as he has appropriate security clearance and has helped us greatly in these matters.”

“Oh cool,” the Qunari sounded like he hadn’t expected as much, but had been full well planning on cluing his Lieutenant in, “I dig permission—could’a had me begging for forgiveness though, Red,” the Iron Bull winked.

The Spymaster smirked, moving right along, “Seeker Pentaghast, if you would.”

They all sat in silence as Cassandra reported all they had learned of Solas’s identity—his past. They started with his crimes, that he was responsible for Corypheus having the Orb, that he handed it over knowing full well what the monster intended it for. Though that came also with…the explanation of his further reaching past. That he had been born in a time Elvehnan had never encountered Humans or Dwarves or Qunari—the Iron Bull seemed to find that almost understandable, Solas’s earlier lack of remorse over the loss of Human life, it was…fairly similar to the Qun’s mentality that Qunari were meant for world domination, and they had Ages to get used to not being the only sort of people on the planet. That Solas woke to find strange people on his world, that he would see their brothers and sisters so very casual about murdering them and find no fault in his own decisions to aid in that—it was the only thing between him and returning the world to what he thought ‘rights’. Oh, Ellie looked like she might cry when she learned of Mythal’s demise, the life of their child. All seemed sympathetic, but…well grief could take many dangerous forms but sealing away their murderers along with the majority of the Elvehnan population was a bit extreme. Ellie blanched and Sera shrieked at the knowledge that Solas created the Fade—that the Orb he used to fulfill that act was the one Corypheus now had, Solas’s hand in the Conclave.

That he had originally only endeavored to be close to the Mark, take it on himself before pursing the Orb and complete his plans, when he gave himself up to the Inquisition.

“Oh,” was Ellie’s hollow response, oh- she looked desolate but there was something like acceptance, like she’d expected as much. “I see—“

“But it changed!” Cole offered up rapid fire, urgently, “It isn’t- he wasn’t using you or pretending! Ellie he changed! He loves you, so so much and you know that!”

“It’s okay Cole—“

“Da’vehnan, he does. Do…do not doubt that sweet girl,” Marehis offered, raising a hand to rest on Ellie’s shoulder. It was truth, and she could not abide how much hurt being allowed to think otherwise would put in the girl, “yes, his motives were selfish and bent on something horrible to begin with, but he has…moved on from that. He came to love you before he even bonded to you da’len—such a bond could not form unless he felt as such. Elvehnan would find themselves bound to their loved ones, connected through their magic like,” she had to think on it, how he described it, “magic would come to naturally form a relationship that mirrors it’s master, but he did not expect he could do so with a Human.”

“Cuddly—you got all sealed up and made Spirity because of Solas’s Dread Wolf shite?”
Sera asked.

“I did. He did not mean to—he sealed away the Evanuris and all its followers, Mythal was a member so those in her house were sent away. There were Elvehnan that were not enslaved, not technically, they escaped and lived in hiding, they, and anyone Solas and Mythal lifted their Vallisilins from, they remained in the waking world.”

“Why wolf?” Ellie asked, still staring into space as she thought.

“Eleanor?” Leliana questioned.

“Dread Wolf—why wolf?” Ellie elaborated.

“He was a shepherd, da’len. In his youth, when Mythal found promise in him—it was because of his affinity with wolves. How your magic,” Marehis cleared her throat, but Ellie nodded that it was alright to say as much out loud, she supposed by now all present knew well of it, “how your magic has the ability to help you find things of import—treasure and the like. Solas’s magic gave him the ability to communicate with them, control them even—steer them away from the flock. Da’len?” the last word shot out in alarm as her panic spiked, oh goodness, she’d gone ashen!

“S-Solas can—” she shook her head as if to clear it.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked, concerned.

“Inky,” Sera whined, “you’re scaring me.”

“Sorry,” Ellie hurriedly offered, clearing her throat as she collected her thoughts, took a few deep breaths. “W-when um…I was trying to find you—catch up, after Haven? Um. Well I wasn’t exactly—” she swallowed and then restarted. “I was hurt, bad. I was in so much pain, concussed, I could barely breathe, let alone think straight. I couldn’t see where I was going most of the time—I mean the notes I took were the last coherent thing I did, I was just blindly stumbling, barely able to take in the next breath, that was just about where all my focus went—breathing and taking the next step forward. The only reason I got so close to camp was because I…there were wolves. They kept howling and my magic just kept telling me to follow, that I could trust it, that they would lead me back to safety. Except it wasn’t my magic exactly—it was pretty toast after the Rift, but it was something familiar like—”

“Solas’s magic,” Cole confirmed, nodding. “Solas wasn’t comatose, he was in the Fade—looking for you. The wolves saw you as easy prey, but he stopped them, took control of their pack and used them to guide you, kept you safe as you made your way to the Inquisition’s camp.”

He…he had not mentioned as much, in his interrogation. Of course they had no reason to think he had anything to do with Ellie’s miraculous recovery from Haven’s fall, so it had not been in their line of questioning. But he…he’d truly gone to such lengths?

Cullen huffed softly. “Well. I certainly accredited her survival to be the mercy of a god—I almost feel rude for assuming it was the Maker.”

“Shite,” Sera breathed. “Inky’d be toast…double toast if Solas wasn’t er, who he ruddy is.”

“Double?” Ellie asked distractedly, though she turned her attention to Sera.

“Uhh…you know how ‘sandra said Elvehblahblah used to be immortal mage pricks? Solas thinks all today-Elves have mage-shite. And uh, apparently he was being all sneaky with his training, when I was leaning to help you with Rifts and the Breach? Trying to uh…make me magey. And it um, kind of worked, a little bit. Friggin just about killed me, scared the crap out of me, and I want to be pissed as hell—I was, but…” But?

“W-wait, Solas- he tried—” Ellie blanched, “Without even asking you?!”

“I didn’t have a clue he was doin’ it,” Sera said, “End of the day, I can’t be too mad at it—Ink, you’d be dead. When you fell into the mine in the Oasis, Solas had been doin’ all this shite to wake up my magical potential or whatever and I think it…when I reached you I was too close to shoot, my bow was holstered so I could carry your staff to you anyway, and friggin, this Rage demon was just,” Sera pinched her index finger and thumb together, “this close to bashing your head in. And I just…panicked. Wanted with everything to save you. Next thing I know—bam! Icey pish is blasting out of my hands, and Ragey is frozen solid.”

Ellie’s chin quivered, “Sera…”
“Whatever it was didn’t stick though. It was just the once and Solas was all mopey that I didn’t start Fade dreaming afterward.”
“I’m so sorry he tried to do that to you—“
“I’m not, not really. I mean it’s ruddy fucked up. But it saved you—“
“I’m not-! It’s your life, Sera, Solas manipulating you into doing something like becoming a mage against your will is so not worth- that was so stupid, I can’t believe h- he would try to do that to you without your knowledge!”
“Inky, I’m pissed at him too, I’m just sayin’ it worked out, kay? I love you, I en’t gonna be mad that I was able to protect you.”
Ellie sighed, frustrated. Then she reached for Sera’s hands, the older girl gladly obliging, and Ellie asked, “You’re okay now, right? You haven’t been Fade dreaming or feeling badly? You said it just about k-killed you?”
“Blistered up my hands real bad is all, just scared me bad but Solas um, he made sure I healed up okay.”
“Good!” Ellie insisted, rubbing the back of Sera’s hands with her thumbs, “Since he’s the one that got you all magicky in the first place!” and less angrily, sincere, “Thank you for saving me Ser’.”
Sera launched herself into Ellie’s lap, hugging her, “Inky! Of course I saved you—you’re friggin’! You’re littler’n me, s’my job to look out for you!” she said, pressing an enthusiastic kiss to Ellie’s temple.
Oh, Marehis loved them, her heart ached it felt so full, a soothing ache after all that had happened in the past few days. Solas may have betrayed her trust, stolen some level of security she felt in the decision to send Ellie and Sera on to the Oasis without her—but Sera certainly hadn’t betrayed any such trust. In spite of everything, she could trust her girls to look out for one another.
“Ser’,” the Iron Bull spoke up, “we have a few questions about your time training with Solas.”
She certainly could trust her girls to look after one another, Ellie’s hold on the elder girl was protective as she leveled the Qunari a fearsome look as she defended, “Sera didn’t do anything wrong!”
“Imekari-“
“You wanna go?!“
The Iron Bull rumbled out a hearty laugh at that, “Simmer down boss girl, it’s all good—not interrogating her,” he assured, “she can stay in your lap even, no one’s blaming Sera for anything, we just want to get a feel for what exactly Solas was playing at, help look for warning signs in case he took it into his head to train anyone else like that.”
“He used to—not from scratch but he used to help less powerful mages waken their magic further,” Cole informed them, “Solas has found magic in many of the Elvehnan he has met since, when he can get close enough with them—he found it in Marehis too, but when he saw how much raw potential Sera has for Magic, she seemed like a good first attempt at trying to help an Elf cut off from their magic, it would not be quite so difficult considering she- S- Sera won’t like—“
“He used to—not from scratch but he used to help less powerful mages waken their magic further,” Cole informed them, “Solas has found magic in many of the Elvehnan he has met since, when he can get close enough with them—he found it in Marehis too, but when he saw how much raw potential Sera has for Magic, she seemed like a good first attempt at trying to help an Elf cut off from their magic, it would not be quite so difficult considering she- S- Sera won’t like—“
“You aren’t a mage but you could be, if you pursued it. Magic is in you, active and alive, you use it all of the time and you don’t even realize it. Whenever you’re experimenting or excited about something, your magic is awake and helping you, it prompts inspiration and keeps you safe from harm when usually, for other people, things would go awry.”
“Like the friggin’ bees,” Sera breathed in disbelief.
“Like the friggin’ bees,” Cole confirmed sagely, nodding.
“We all have some connection to magic?” Marehis asked.
“Yes. It is why Ellie’s Mark is distracted by you when you hold her hand. Your magic is quieter than Sera’s, it would take more training, more time than it would for her to fully activate her magic, but it is there. I can hear it.” it…she did wonder if it was something she should consider coming to understand, if it would help her protect Ellie— “It already does!” Cole chirped excitedly, “Oh, your magic loves Ellie just as much as you do, it is where your intuition comes from—it’s always watching for things under the surface you might not see and listening to Ellie’s own magic.”

That…was reassuring. It had been frightening, at first, when Solas made such claims—that there was magic even in her, that there was something she thought of as foreign to her, living inside of her throughout her entire life. But that it was such a piece of herself, that it had been assisting her all this time was comforting.

Sera detailed Solas’s practices, having her meditate, questions on her training with Seeker Pentaghast, how learning to suppress magic and the Breach had given her the tools to perform the reversal—he called it powering Ellie’s Mark, and it was to a degree, but it was encouraging her magic to amplify. He’d had her start with activating one of the Dalis-Elvehnan artifacts. Something he admitted to fashioning; his followers had scattered them. In Solas’s interrogation, he confessed that he had intended to use them to measure the veil, find thin places, survey the Fade from this side to find the ideal spot to bring down the veil, find where it was weakest, where he could get a firm grasp on it and cast it aside, the world be damned. They had genuinely served now, to discover Rifts, but oh did it make her blood boil that Solas had led Ellie to so eagerly helped him, and his original intent was to have her let him find these artifacts and activate them for his ulterior motives.

“So, it doesn’t sound like the guy was just adding another member to a secret mage army,” the Iron Bull concluded, Leliana nodded.

“Sera,” Cassandra said, sounding grieved, “I am remorseful that our training gave Solas such a foothold. I do understand if you are disinterested-“

“It en’t your fault ‘sandra, you and me trainin’s a right blast! And I’m…glad I can do things like power Inky’s Mark, according to baldy and all his bullshit, it gets so boosty when I help because I’m Elf-blahblah. What’s happened is happened, Inky’s safe, Breach is closed, and Wolf boy is behind bars. So, win win sorta-win.”

“So, Inquisitor, have you any questions?” Leliana asked.

Ellie took a breath and seemed to consider it. “I would like to take some time and think everything over before um, doling out a judgement.”

“Of course,” Leliana agreed.

“Certainly, Ellie, take all the time you need,” Cullen said, “we understand this is difficult.”

“Don’t sweat it Boss girl. When you come to a decision, you and me will sit down and hash out what, if any of this, I can send back to the Ben-Hessrath,” the Iron Bull said, promising, “they won’t hear a peep from be about any of this mess until you give the go-ahead.”

Ellie nodded, “Thanks, the Iron Bull,” and then to her Advisors, “I want to speak with Solas myself.”

All of the adults around the table fell silent and Marehis had never understood the phrase ‘bite your tongue’ more—she secured the muscle between her molars to physically restrain herself from the immediate refusal that rose to her lips. She did not like that the man was even in the same vicinity as the girl at this point, to let him be in the same room as her? Lay his eyes upon this sweet girl, hear her voice—speak in her direction—

She was admittedly sore given the circumstances. She loved that man such that she considered- she thought- marriage had certainly seemed a prospect! She had been more than prepared to give him forever before she learned just which plane of existence he was planning to take the sentiment on. Now it felt like they had divorced, and she was keeping their girls! He couldn’t have them! He couldn’t look at them, he couldn’t think about them—he could not speak their names! He didn’t deserve to!

Ellie wasn’t just a girl she was Inquisitor but! Marehis was her mami! That- that should count for something! She should be able to put her foot down shouldn’t she?

Unfortunately, no. That wasn’t right, or fair. But why did she have to be the right and fair one?! ‘Surprise I’m an Elven god’ was certainly not right or fair!
“Certainly, Eleanor,” Leliana agreed, hesitantly, and she did offer Marehis a mildly apologetic look. “Let us know when you feel you are prepared, and we can make arrangements.”

Ellie nodded. “Thank you. So…crazy meeting debriefing us on the Dread Wolf is over?” she asked, and when her advisors nodded. “Cool beans—emergency advisor meeting please! How is talking about international affairs suddenly my easy thing today?” she wondered, sighing as she rested her head against the table top for a moment. “Two-minute table power nap and then, important emergency meeting.”

Marehis reached out to stroke the girl’s hair, “You can go and rest a while if you need to da’vehnan. You can always meet later.”

“Nope,” Ellie raised a fadelit index finger to declare “—Inquisitoring first, then studenting, and then a big nap,” she turned her head to look at Marehis, “Can we stay in tonight mami? The kitchens can send things, or we can order from the Tavern.”

That did sound absolutely perfect, especially if the girl was truly looking forward to dining. She seemed to have forgotten she had a dinner date with Madam de Fer, but worst case scenario, Marehis would pull the woman aside and apologize, and Vivienne was understanding, would agree if Ellie was so weary she forgot a commitment she’d made, she certainly did need to take a break from it all. “Certainly da’len.”

Ellie nodded and then her forehead was against the table again, resting her eyes while the War Room was returned to rights—the Iron Bull rested a hand on the back of her neck as he passed, oh he was sweet to her, able to massage her neck and shoulders with one great hand for a few seconds before bending over—Sera squeaked as she laid flat against the table and Marehis had to scoot back ever so to avoid his horns as he leaned down to press a kiss to the back of her head, “Have a good one boss-girl.”

“Thanks,” she said as the Qunari rose up, patting her on the head before leaving them. Ellie’s unmarked hand reached out to tap at Marehis’s knee, “Can everyone be invited to dinner in my room?”

Oh, that struck her as- it- it was almost something reminiscent of Marehis asking her own mother if she could have permission to go to the market with her friends, or invite them for a sleepover…though in her youth, Marehis had been something of a brat, always asked a bit more whiningly because she was certain her mother would say no, find some such chore for her to do. Did this girl think she needed permission? It just…it was nice, it made her feel as if she really was—

“You are really her mother.” Cole was taking his leave—walking, he did so more and more lately, he was likely planning to walk with Sera—but he stopped to wrap his arms around Marehis’s shoulders, the brim of his hat resting atop her head as he whispered very quietly.

Sweet boy. “Certainly, da’vehnan,” Marehis said, “that sounds wonderful.”

“I know everyone you want to invite, Ellie! Sera is nervous to leave you and Marehis today, but she will have fun!” Cole announced excitedly, “Sera we can go invite everyone! Ellie doesn’t want to cancel her plans with Vivienne, just include everyone, be more comfy than formal, we can tell her—“

Sera gasped and for a moment Marehis worried Sera did not appreciate Cole announcing her ‘mind stuff’ but, “Cole! Friggin can I watch and you poof to Viv?!”

“And let you be the one to invite her—if it is timed right-“

“Double startle!“

“Don’t be too mean,” Ellie offered up quietly.

Sera giggled, laying against Ellie’s back and hugging her around the waist, pressing a big kiss to the younger girl’s cheek before she promised, “You got it Ink!”

“Do you need anything before I step out, sweet girl?” Marehis checked once Cullen finished his bit of flirtation that was bickering with Cassandra over just where each piece that marked their War Table map, at least it bought Ellie a few more moments rest. She rubbed her back as she offered, “I could bring you back a snack, or are you thirsty at all?”

Ellie shook her head as she sat up, leaning back to look up at Marehis, oh her girl had such pretty eyes. “I’m okay, but thanks mami.”
Marehis kissed her upturned forehead and offered polite farewell to the advisors, entrusting Ellie’s potions to Seeker Pentaghast.

Well, she was certainly going to try to get something on that girl’s stomach, at this point she would see her eat her daily caloric intake in chocolate if she would just do so! But first, she was going to Adan, she just- this was ridiculous! It was more than time to put her foot down. She gave Ellie space when the girl had needed her! She had known something was amiss, and she let self-doubt corrupt her intuition, let her relationship with Solas cloud her judgement—she should have seen it, she had seen it and written it off as pure nonsense that she’d misunderstood when Ellie so clearly deflected offers of being together the very instant Solas became involved. She needed to listen to her child, and her instincts—she was seeing warning signs and she was going to make an appointment with Adan, he knew Ellie’s medical history best, and the most familiar of their healers and she wanted to consult with him now.

“—watch your consistency there, love,” the Healer was ordering…was she interrupting something? Oh, Mister Stitches was with Healer Adan when Marehis entered the Apothecary, but the elder Aclassi was also present—the man was perched on the exam table, and the Healers were working over a cauldron of something purple and bubbling. “Marehis—” he greeted though he looked around her as if to make certain she wasn’t heralding a medical emergency, still he asked, “—is the Herald—”

“Ellie isn’t with me,” she assured. “I do apologize, I didn’t mean to interrupt,” she said, looking to Mister Aclassi.

“Oh goodness, it is fine,” the Tevinter man assured warmly, waving her concern off, “I can—”

“You will sit there until this potion cools—” Adan commanded, “we’ll want to observe your first dosing to make certain you’re not allergic to Spirulina.”

“Krem’ll murder us if something I give you makes you sick again,” Stitches seconded the notion.

“What did you need? We’re nearly finished here,” Adan said as he turned put out the flame under the cauldron to let it cool.

“I wished to consult with you about Ellie, just a check in since we’re really getting settled—please, I have time, we can speak once you’ve finished,” Marehis insisted, Cole knew to get her if Ellie’s meeting was going to be ending any time soon.

“Oh! It’s good you stopped by—the Charger’s own supplies of potions ingredients is back in order, and I just finished Ellie’s um…” he did not wish to divulge her medical business in front of Mister Aclassi, of course.

“Ahh, but three sets of hands bottling a month’s worth of potion will certainly get the job done quicker,” Adan picked up on what his partner was getting at, “—you uh, need anything, Mister Aclassi, while you wait?”

The tailor shook his head, “Not at all, thank you.”

The Healers left the exam room and Marehis…wasn’t exactly certain what to do, if she should step out or strike up conversation-

“Elan’s just finishing up in the other room,” Stitches said, “this isn’t ready to bottle yet,” he jerked his head in the direction of their cauldron.

“Ahh, but three sets of hands bottling a month’s worth of potion will certainly get the job done quicker,” Adan picked up on what his partner was getting at, “—you uh, need anything, Mister Aclassi, while you wait?”

The tailor shook his head, “Not at all, thank you.”

The Healers left the exam room and Marehis…wasn’t exactly certain what to do, if she should step out or strike up conversation-

Oh, Mister Aclassi had already dropped from the exam table to grab a chair, “Please, have a seat—I do apologize for the wait,” he offered before resuming his own place on the table.

“Thank you—it isn’t a problem, I just needed to speak with Healer Adan while I have the time. I am usually with Ellie throughout the day, she’s otherwise occupied at the moment, I thought I should take the opportunity while it was available.”

“Oh, Mister Aclassi nodded, though he did venture, “the Inquisition was rather set back with potions ingredients? The Chargers as well?”

“Haven’s loss was hard on all fronts,” Marehis nodded. Oh- she supposed he was worried, she would be if Cremisius were her child…in point of fact she had been worried for him when she heard of shortages, “The Chargers were still able to supply um, appropriate potions to their members.”

“Oh, oh truly?” Mister Aclassi sounded relieved, albeit uncertain as that conflicted with what they’d just been discussing-

“This is not knowledge for public consumption, but I usually keep Ellie’s potions on my person,” Marehis shared, “when she realized a certain charger would be without potion, she substituted with her own.”

Mister Aclassi looked taken aback, eyes misting over as he swallowed and said, “Ahh, Maker bless her—I paid compliment to the Seeker and Commander the other day, but you and I haven’t had much opportunity to speak—you have quite the incredible daughter.”

“Thank you—you may call me Tonio, if you wish.”

“Marehis,” she confirmed likewise. “He is exactly the kind, compassionate young man I would wish for her. And he’s an incredible friend to Sera.”

That sparked a bit of realization in him, “Ahh, I wondered if that might be the case, I didn’t wish to assume-“

Marehis smiled, “She is not biologically mine, of course,” the girl was only a scant seven years younger than her, nineteen going on twenty soon, “but yes, I consider her my da’len.”

“Well then you’ve been blessed with two incredible daughters.” Oh she certainly had, hadn’t she? “I do appreciate the friend she has been to my son.”

“He’s been a wonderful friend to Sera,” he was always looking after her, protective of the girl Ellie loved so much. “Oh! Ellie’s new clothing is wonderful, she looks absolutely precious and it fits so well, she’s so much more comfortable, being out of armor.” Did Sera need new clothing? She didn’t have much, and Sol- they- it had been taken under consideration, between herself and certain parties, that they should provide her more clothing. For comfort sake, and too, the girl was dating, she might like...there was something pure and fun and exciting to put on something special for a date, dress up a bit.

The tailor blushed, seemed bashful to accept compliment, “Oh, thank you. I am pleased to work with her,” he said. Then, “You’re feeling better today, I hope? I am…uncertain what exactly has been going on, you had some sort of business to attend to?” he asked, “I do not wish to be nosey just- you seemed…seem upset.”

“I...let someone into my girls lives, who turned out to be...not exactly who we thought he was. We are still parceling out everything, deciding how to move forward.”

“Let into their lives?”

“His was? My erm,” she cleared her throat, “boyfriend.” Quite the term for a man who was born literal Ages ago...quite possibly before they started counting ‘Ages’ oh would one of the gods just strike her down already? How-? How did such circumstance occur?!?

Tonio nodded, seeming sympathetic, “I am sorry to hear that. Broken bones tend to heal faster than broken hearts,” he mused, and Marehis found herself nodding, it certainly felt like it might work that way. “I...when Cremisius was young, there was a family friend. He endeared himself to my wife and myself, there were many years I considered him my best friend. Ultimately he revealed himself as little more than a leech of sorts, a predator—he did not have the pure, helpful intentions he pretended to have for my child, and I allowed myself to be blind to every indication that said something was wrong. That you see this person for who they are now is to be commended, that he was someone so close to you and you were willing to hold him accountable takes integrity and strength.”

“I couldn’t not question him when Ellie brought her concerns to me.”

“Then you handled it far better than I—it was not until I almost allowed things to go too far, came far too close to losing my own child, that I did the right thing.”

“This person tried to kill Cremisius?” Marehis asked aghast. Solas had not given a care if Ellie lived or died in those first days of their acquaintance, and the mistakes he made before they met had brought her so much harm but he’d never hurt her himself, would never dream of bringing her harm as things stood now. He…when Cole interrupted them, with warning that they were causing Ellie to be panicked and ill like she was experiencing Solas’s punishment the man had been wildly apologetic, remorseful to a point she thought he might cry for having hurt her further still. He let Marehis scream and shout in frustration, blame him until her voice was hoarse, and then he quietly wondered if she needed anything for her screamed sore throat—and then he requested- he requested the Seeker or Commander could come, and suppress his magic for the remainder of their meeting so it could not reach out to Ellie in distress no matter what they did to him. But the man was forthcoming and Marehis, oh the very thought she’d unintentionally laid hands upon Ellie made her stomach roll, she could not abide it. They spent the remainder of questioning seated and civil, with Cassandra and Cullen alternating shifts to stand by in case of emergency.

Which was good of them, though Cullen was rather…he could not stand Solas’s betrayal, it left him raw that the man had been given a position in Ellie’s life as something of a father figure, and he’d inflicted such a horrible blight on the role. He’d made a comment in passing that perhaps the man deserved to be made Tranquil—and it was a possibility for judgement that would be on the table; the man had more than used his Magic for unprecedentedly horrific acts, people were Tranquil for far far less than sealing away unquantifiable amounts of people into a man-made realm of magic, and following it up with handing over a weapon of mass destruction to a mad man, with the intent to power it through Human sacrifice that led to the death of thousand. And that was only the first charge of many the Inquisition could bring against him.

“That would likely sever the bond,” Solas said to Cullen’s suggestion, “I’m hardly in a position to stop you, Ser,” he cleared his throat. “If…if Ellie…if something happens. If I am to be executed, should I have any say in it, I would ask you make me Tranquil first. It would be a far gentler experience for her, magically, to lose connection to me, than feeling my death in the bond before it is lost. That- it is horrific to fe- please. Do not allow her that experience.”

“You were bonded to Mythal?” Marehis asked quietly.

He looked absolutely haggared, like even now he felt ill at the memory, “Yes. I felt them die.”

Mister Aclassi shook his head, and Marehis flinched, startled when his voice brought her back from her thoughts, “No, no it- I set my son on a life path that would have made him unbearably miserable, demoralized to the point…he would have preferred not living. That is what I regret more than anything, that my child was suffering, and I ignored every sign that something was wrong. He was somehow bone weary exhausted and yet he constantly needed to be doing something if he were awake, always on the move to occupy his time, his mind with anything other than circumstance. He lost his appetite, his interests in anything that he once enjoyed. He withdrew entirely from his life, pressed on until he could not take anymore. I am so grateful to see how far he’s come, but there are so many things I wish I had done differently.”

Marehis’s mind almost felt like it came to a violent halt.

“I apologize, I’m a bit um, loopy, forgive my rambling I haven’t eaten yet today,” the Tevinter man apologized and at Marehis’s startled look assured, “I worked rather late, I only just woke, and my appointment today required I fast.”

“If you are free for lunch,” Marehis ventured, “I know Ellie would be delighted if you joined us, Cremisius as well if he is free.” Regardless of what was happening, it was clear…while breakfast was touch and go, eating with so many witnesses, or perhaps it was being distracted with being surrounded by so many friends, Ellie reportedly ate better. With her mami and…well, for all intents and purposes, Sera was something of a sister to the girl, was another story—they were family, and that was wonderful, and that came with the comfort that she could be herself, there was no pressure for her to behave as if she were fine when she wasn’t. It was heart wrenching that it finally clicked for her, that her child had been withdrawn and tired, almost numb seeming all morning, only able to conjure up a smile out of force, to appear happy, normal in front of Lady Montilyet. Her current self was…possibly suffering worsening depression. Elgar—ugh! She could not believe she had not realized it! It was staring her in the face!

“Certainly,” Mister Aclassi said.

“Excellent, she’ll be so glad,” Marehis hoped so at least. They would have a pleasant lunch, and she would consider how to move forward with her suspicions.

“Marehis…if you do not mind me saying as much—I may not know the exact details of your situation, but you cannot blame yourself for another’s deceit. When your child came to you and expressed concerns…not everyone would have listened to question about someone they are so close to, someone they wish to trust. It is more often easier to believe a pack of beautiful lies than an ugly truth. Do not beat yourself up for believing him. You know the truth now, you can use that to move forward however you need.”

“I do not know how I’ll ever forgive him.”

“I’ve found forgiveness is something best done for ourselves. I…could be angry, upset with my ex wife, and the man she has chosen to marry—the man I once considered my best friend until they manipulated such a horrible situation for our family and Cremisius. But without those mistakes, my son would not be living the life he does now. I would not be here, getting to bear witness to it, live it with him. And if Cremisius’s mother ever…ever saw the error of her ways, was willing to be the sort of mother my son deserves, I would not keep her from him—oh. Oh my dear lady, I apologize, I did not mean to—” the man was already up off the table, coming and offering a handkerchief which somehow made it worse, damn that man and his handkerchiefs!

Marehis sucked in a sniffling breath, red faced with embarrassment, her throat was too tight to speak past and she was crying, practically sobbing, she was making a scene of herself it was ridiculous. But Mister Aclassi was kind, patient, she accepted his offered handkerchief and the man patted her on the shoulder, crouched so he was more level with her and waited until she calmed to offer a quiet, sympathetic, “It is alright. It is alright to be hurt and to grieve.”

She swallowed, “It has just been very trying.”

“Understandably so.”

“I’m so angry with him, and I’m so scared how all of this will affect my girls.”

“Well, they have quite the spectacular support system it seems. The Iron Bull has been amazing with my Cremisius and he loves your girls, and from what I have heard and seen, Sera and Ellie have Cassandra, Cullen. Cole is a wonderful friend, his…existence is strange, but we are blessed by it I believe, he adores Ellie and Sera. My son loves them, would gladly be there for them as they struggle I believe. I am rather new, but I am rather a good listener.”

“Did you make this?” Marehis asked, waving her cloth armed hand.

“That is curtesy of Miss Lace’s ma, but I can make handkerchiefs, yes.”

“Do you- I would certainly appreciate it if you could-“

“I was planning to make up matching ones for Ellie’s nicer clothing, and I’ve plenty of material at hand to produce a good amount of plain ones to go around if you wish. I can have them to you this evening- ah, do not even consider paying me. The materials are already covered, the labor is minimal to say the least—easily covered when one combines the ‘friends and family’ and ‘broken heart’ discounts.”

It was ridiculous, but his light jesting did make her laugh, oh she felt silly. Foolish and embarrassed for having gotten so very worked up in front of someone who was practically a stranger. But he was a kind stranger, Krem was certainly his son. “Thank you,” Marehis said as she wiped at her eyes, returning his handkerchief to him. She was burning hers. Anything that man had given her, it felt strange to be almost grateful that a great many of her personal belongings had perished in Haven’s blaze. She’d half a mind to burn her clothing as well, she did not need much…perhaps when Mister Aclassi was finished securing Ellie’s wardrobe, she would see to obtaining her own.

“Think nothing of it my dear,” he waved her thanks off.

“Oi—we en’t done with you yet Aclassi, Maker’s balls I knew two of you would be a handful,” Stitches complained as the Healers returned, “you’re just as bad as your son—up on the exam table old man and take your potion!” the Healer ordered, ladling out a vial full of purplish potion to dose the man and see if he reacted negatively.

The Tevinter man did as instructed, and Healer Adan handed Marehis a bag full of fresh potion for Ellie, oh maybe that would get a genuine smile out of her girl. “Thank you,” she said.

“We’re almost done here,” Adan said quietly, clearing his throat, “you can uh, wash your face if you wish, before returning to uh, the little’un.”

Marehis did quickly wash up, cleaning her face in the Healer’s water basin. Mister Aclassi was not allergic to whatever ‘Spirulina’ was, thank goodness, and the Tevinter man was sent on his way, and Mister Stitches took his leave to rejoin his crew.

“Would you be free to speak with Ellie if she needs it, later?” Marehis asked Adan once they were alone.

“Of course. You didn’t come here to ask that,” the man reasoned.

“I am concerned. At first I wrote it off as Ellie coming down with the bug that’s been going around but um…after thinking it over some more I wonder if perhaps she could be experiencing a worsening of her depression.”

Adan blew out a breath, considering. “That wouldn’t be out of the realm of the norm. People experience fluctuations in their depression all of the time, but after Haven, and her hormones getting fucked all to hell yo-yoed by ‘no monthlies’ and then ‘very sudden monthly’ her chemistry set’s probably a little haywire at the moment. What exactly has been concerning you?”

Adan listened carefully as Marehis detailed her worries, and when she was done he said, “Keep a close eye on her. Try talking to her about it and see if she’ll swing by—we’re overdue a checkup anyway, she should come in, I could just schedule her in and we could touch base as normal, she might be more forthcoming that way.”

Marehis nodded, good heavens, yes it had been a while since they had a mental health checkup. “That sounds good.”

“We might need to look at an adjustment to her potions regimen, and she’s confiding in you still?”

Oh. “We…with everything that has happened I’m afraid we haven’t had a chance to catch up—but we will make up for that this weekend.”

“I’ll try to get on her schedule for Monday then—take the weekend to assess and touch base. Medicine has its place but sometimes all we need is a break, time to rest and vent and have our mami’s tell us everything’s going to be alright.”

That was certainly what was going to happen. For both of her girl’s, Haven had been so frightening and Sera had gone through so much since the Oasis, and Marehis did not wish to speak out of turn with the Healer but she was working over how best to bring it up to Sera. The girl had an out-in-out panic attack when it seemed Ellie had been lost, and she’d shared with Marehis before, that she once struggled with as much when she lived under the roof of Lady Emmauld. She felt horribly she hadn’t risen to be of comfort to the girl, but she was so grateful to Cassandra, for knowing immediately what to do to help her. She would see to it—try to catch Cassandra today, or tonight, the woman would clear her weekend for their girls.

Marehis made it back with a few minutes to spare, the Advisors were still talking and there was the sound of quill against parchment, “How do you spell sufficient?” Ellie’s voice asked.

“How do you think it is spelled my lady?” Cassandra returned.

Ellie sighed tiredly but after a beat, “S-u-f-f-i-c-i-e-n-t?”

Marehis jumped when Cullen gave off a loud cracking clap, “Excellent job sweetheart-!”

“Cullen do calm yourself,” Cassandra offered amusedly.

“She killed it, Cassandra! I still spell it ‘suf-f-i-s-h-ient’ on a good day,” the Commander said.

“It’s a hard word!” Ellie offered in his defense, “Trade is weird! Dorian says it’s all of the other languages horrible bastard child.” There was one last long scratch as Ellie finished her writing. “Okay. I’m really really sorry this needed redone but-“
“Oh mija it is fine,” Lady Montilyet assured. “this is important and if we can have any influence on Tevinter’s treatment of their slaves now we should do so—there is no telling what influence we may have in the long term.”

“If we make ourselves something the Imperium comes to rely on for their outer nations relations…gosh I dunno I just feel like we have to do something if we can. And you’re right about them being the more long-lasting power—no offense-“

“Do not trouble yourself,” Cassandra said, “I know Nevarra’s troubles believe you me. This was the wisest move to procure a strong ally and with time we may be in a position to bring reform to an unjust system.”

Ellie sighed with relief. “Cool. Okay, I’m comfortable with this draft if you guys are.”

“It is excellent,” Leliana assured, and while there was no verbal response from the Seeker or Commander, Lady Montilyet said, “Splendid! If you would sign off on that then, I’ll work up the formal missive and have it on your desk this afternoon, Inquisitor, you’ll need only sign it.”

“You’re amazing and I love you—anyone else have anything to add?” Ellie proposed.

Cullen cleared his throat, “Only the addition that I love you, with the whole of my heart,” and then, ever the professional, “Inquisitor.”

Oh that made the girl giggle, and it was wonderful. “Back at you, Commander! Meeting adjourned! Do you think mami is back yet?”

Marehis pushed open the War Room door, “I am, da’vehn— you are ready to depart?” she asked as the girl came to her side and she pulled her close, “I hope you do not mind it but Mister Aclassi would join us for lunch.”

“Oh!” Ellie nodded, “Papa or Cremisius?”

“Both, if the Lieutenant is free.”

“That sounds good—great!” Ellie said, “Anyone else up for joining us?”

“I’ve business to attend, but thank you,” Leliana apologized, excusing herself.

“I’m taking lunch in my office, I’ve some things I would like to see to before dinner, but gracias mija,” Lady Montilyet said, pressing a kiss to the girl’s temple as she passed to take her leave.

Cullen and Cassandra looked to each other, and then nodded, “Certainly,” the Seeker said, “we would love to join you.”

They convened in Cabot’s and Marehis was relieved to see Ellie eating so well—she did offer down the occasional bite to Anya but the pup was sweet and always after food, one would think they never fed her! But it was no more than what she would normally give away and the Lieutenant did join them, and his plate bore a large amount of fried potatoes from which Ellie stole bites—was habit enough he knew to order extra. And at Cullen’s suggestion Mister Aclassi showed off an image of the Lieutenant as a babe that was wholly heart melting, oh! He’d been simply precious—Cassandra had outright made a high-pitched borderline cooing sound she immediately slapped a hand over her mouth to stop as she tried and failed to hide just how very cute she found it and the Commander’s “It’s very cool, isn’t it?” sounded loaded and sent Cassandra pink as she cleared her throat and hastily passed the picture along to Marehis as the Nevarran woman offered, “It is. Very cool,” and then after a beat, “I hate you.”

Ellie’s brow furrowed in concern, “Mami?”

“Don’t fret it Ellie,” Cullen reassured her, “your mami is a complicated woman and she is very much in love with me.”

“I will cast you from the battlements,” Cassandra assured him.

“Oh that my final gaze upon this world would be your beautiful face, I would truly be blessed.”

“I- do shut up!”

Krem whistled, “Hear that El? They’re just fine—’sandra’s already saying ‘I do’. ”

The Seeker huffed, indignant before she threatened, “Cremisius I will triple your laps around the walls this afternoon I swear it.”
Ellie giggled, leaning into her boyfriend as she whispered something Marehis was certain was not meant for her ears, that if the Tevinter worked up a nice sweat he should seek her out after his workout, she may well be done with her test by then and it would be reward for her spelling accomplishments.

“I’ll smell,” he whispered back, confused.
Her lips were against his ear then, assuring, “Uh-huh, good.”
Krem blushed and cleared his throat, “You know what, you two? Cutest couple—just think about it Seeker, your cheekbones, Cullen’s eyes—“ “Laps and pushups,” the Seeker threatened.
The boy grinned, “Sweet.”
“Cremisius, do cease giving them so much grief child,” Tonio reprimanded.
Krem offered a rueful smile, “Sorry papa—sorry Cassandra, Cullen.”
“Oh, sorry to me? Whatever for?” Cullen asked, clearly pleased with the boy’s teasing—if he knew it derived from Ellie’s encouragement that she apparently liked her suitor sweaty then he may not feel as such but, “You know what, I’ve always liked you Cremisius, Ellie—you’re dating a fine young man!”
Marehis offered Cassandra a sympathetic smile that sent the woman huffing in amusement and shaking her head at the Commander’s antics.

All things considered…Marehis delivered Ellie to the library after lunch with a wish of good luck, and once Dorian had given Marehis an awkward hug out of sympathy she was sure, she ascended to the Rookery. From there, she could keep watch but remain scarce for the girl so she would not be nervous while testing, could do so with focus and er…in case she did receive a visit from the Lieutenant after she was done.

Perhaps Solas’s being in the dungeons was something of a blessing for him as the man was spared any embarrassment when Ellie led the Lieutenant into the lower staircase that led from the rotunda below, up to the library, the girl squeezing when it sounded like perhaps the young man lifted her and um. Well. It sounded like a bit more than kissing but not…not too tawdry that she would intervene—purely out of decency sake, of course. If they truly wished to be…close, she would certainly give them space to safely do so in the privacy of Ellie’s quarters. As it stood, she let them have their time, and when Ellie questioned where Marehis had gone, she descended the stairs to join her sweet girl, and the bashful Mister Aclassi who was adjusting the collar of his tunic as he cleared his throat, “Hey Mare! Just uh, checkin’ in on our resident spelling wiz,” uh-huh. Oh they were precious. “before cleaning up to meet papa,” he said, and Ellie looked up to Marehis as she announced,

“I aced it!” she said, offering up folded parchment for Marehis’s perusal, Dorian’s elegant script congratulations and a large ‘A’ at the top. Oh!
“Oh da’vehnan! I’m so proud of you!” Marehis enthused, sweeping the girl up in a hug, Oh it was so nice to see her seeming proud of herself, “Thanks mami!”
It was rather fortunate the young people were done acquainting themselves in the stairwell, Mother Giselle was coming up the stairs, passing by with a polite, “Excuse me,” as their trio pressed against the wall to let her by.

“You must show everyone when we have dinner tonight,” Marehis said, “What is next, da’len? Your schedule is clear now.”
“Nap time?” she asked hopefully.
“Certainly,” Marehis agreed.
“Have fun with Papa’classi,” Ellie wished her boyfriend who pressed a kiss to her forehead, and Marehis got a kiss to the cheek from the Lieutenant, sweet man.
“Get some rest,” he said, and when they entered the rotunda he opted to walk the walls to his father’s shop.

Though their move forward was halted when Dorian’s voice rose—Marehis had heard Mother Giselle speaking with him but she had not been paying much attention, though now there was not much choice in the matter, even Ellie could hear the Tevinter man shouting,

“I’m being clucked at by a hen, evidently!”

“Don’t play the fool with me, young man!”

“If I wanted to play the fool, I could be rather more convincing, I assure you!”

Ellie was already turning back, Marehis following behind as the girl dashed up the stairs to see what the fuss was about, smooth things over more likely—Dorian did not always get along with Mother Giselle, he took some measure of thrill from riling the woman up but in this case it sounded like she’d done as much of him.

“Your glib tongue does you no credit,” Mother Giselle’s voice echoed down the stairs, and as they reached the top,

“You’d be surprised what credit my tongue gets me, your Reverence,” the Tevinter snapped back and Marehis cleared her throat, getting his attention that not only was he saying such things to a Chantry Mother but there were tender ears listening. “Ellie, Marehis.”

“What’s going on here?” Ellie asked neutrally.

Mother Giselle’s mouth worked for a moment, so Dorian supplied, “The Revered mother is expressing concern about my ‘undue influence’ over you.”

“You know,” Ellie said, “I am a bit envious of your glorious mustache, I’ve been thinking of ordering one of those fake ones for costumes? We could match.” Dorian quietly snorted, smile twitching at his lips.

“Quite,” Mother Giselle said awkwardly, “It is just concern, your worship you must know how this looks…”

Oh. Oh Ellie crossed her arms over her chest, took up a pose that forewarned the oncoming ‘tude her girl was about to take as she listed just what it looked like to her, “You’re yelling—in a library—at my best friend, and interrupting my plans for a nap. A nap I’ve been looking forward to all day mind, so could you please be more vague about your concern?” Marehis had to bite her lip, she was not certain if she might start smiling or offer up reprimand for the girl’s tone. Though she was albeit tempted to let it stand—Maerhis was perturbed with the interruption in their plans to nap as well.

“You might need to spell it out, my dear,” Dorian informed the Mother, getting Ellie to smile a bit—a spelling test of sorts for the Orlesian woman.

“This man is of Tevinter. His presence at your side, the rumors alone—“

“You’re interrupting my nap, to be xenophobic, toward Tevinters. Cremisius is from Tevinter—are you concerned of my every connection to the Imperium?”

“Oh my lady, I do not disapprove of- I am aware that not everyone from the Imperium is the same. But insofar as your connections to the Altus of…ill repute, Ellie, the rumors…”

“I’d like to hear what these rumors are exactly.”

The Mother looked wholly awkward then, abashed as she said, “I…could not repeat them, your worship.”

That seemed to pique Ellie’s interest, “Repeat them. So you’ve shared them before?” she asked pointedly.

“I…I mean no disrespect, Inquisitor, only to ask after this man’s intentions,” Mother Giselle said, “if you feel he is without ulterior motive, then I humbly beg forgiveness of you both.”

“Well, that’s something,” Dorian supposed as the woman took her leave.

“She didn’t get to you, did she?” Ellie worried, resting her unmarked hand on the man’s forearm.

“No, it takes more than thinly veiled accusations to get to me,” he assured, patting her hand, “it is your good opinion I care about, not hers. Do rumors bother you?”

“Only in that I don’t like people speaking badly of you when they don’t even know you,” Ellie said, looking stricken at the thought.

Dorian sighed, pulling Ellie in for a hug that seemed more natural for the Tevinter Mage, “Don’t fret it, I quite assure you I’ve made a point of having something of a bad reputation,” he promised cheerily, dropping a kiss to her hair, “I’m your ‘best friend’ am I?”
“Uh-huh! So if people want to be mean at you I have to fight them—and I’m very tired right now but I’ll do it!”

“Go on and get some rest then,” Dorian said, rubbing her arms as he pulled way, “I’ll see you at dinner.”

Ellie nodded, popping up on her toes to kiss him on the cheek, “If not, it’s because I’ve officially mastered magical invisibility.”

“Da’vehnah, you’re already imbued with so much Fade magic it’s concerning, you’re absolutely not to try developing spells all your own,” Marehis teasingly forbade it as she pulled the girl into her side and waved her farewell to Dorian…though the thought did spike a bit of fear, if the girl did turn invisible and they could not find her…surely Cole could find her. They would not need to turn to Solas.

She’d do her best to keep her eye, and maybe a hand on her child at all times, just to be safe.

On both of her children, oof!

“Friggin, about time!” Sera complained as she collided with Marehis the moment they set foot into the great hall, “Took ruddy forever!”

“Sorry Ser, I didn’t know you were waiting for us,” Ellie apologized.

“You should have joined us da’assan,” Marehis said as she wrapped her free arm around the Elf girl, heading for Ellie’s quarters, “you could have seen our young Inquisitor squaring off with Mother Giselle.”

“What?!” Sera asked, caught between surprise that such a thing happened, and disappointed she’d missed it.

“I got a little mouthy,” Ellie admitted, though, “She was being mean to Dorian!”

“Good job Ink, no one gets to be mean to Dori. Cept for me because I’m only friendy mean. Or Bull, being sexy mean. Or Viv being friendly-sexy mean!”

It was such a relief to be in for the day, the door secured behind them and no more obligations laying ahead of them—Cole was a blessed being, he heard a passing thought Marehis had as she mentally planned just how to tackle the weekend, and gone to the Iron Bull with it. The Inquisition had commandeered a large, heavy tub that required the Iron Bull lugging it to and fro, but he’d little complaint—it was a bit of exercise and Ellie had only endeavored to find them something that size due to considering the Iron Bull may want to indulge in a soak himself. When they arrived to Ellie’s quarters, the tub was waiting with warm, bubbly water.

“Would you care for a bath, sweet girls?” Marehis asked.

“Frick yeah!” Sera had a growing exuberance for, “Bath time, Ink!”

Ellie giggled when the older girl swooped her up in a hug and kissed her on the cheek before the Elf girl challenged, “Last one in’s a rotten egg!”

Of course, challenge or no, Sera proceeded to help the younger girl undress because her ‘new duds’ had so many ‘tie-y things’, it was sweet. She couldn’t abide Ellie hurting, was making certain she didn’t agitate her shoulder or lingering aches in her back—being slammed against a trebuchet by a monster who, Solas had confirmed to be nearly twice the height of the Iron Bull, had not exactly been a gentle experience.

But soaking in a tub of bubbly bathwater with Sera was surprisingly gentle, even as the Elf girl did make play, tickling at Ellie’s ribs with her toes and occasionally splashing in the suds, and seeing how great a mass of bubbly foam they could pile atop their heads. Marehis kept watch and simply enjoyed getting to see them unwind, sitting alongside the tub she got to help with their washing, Madam de Fer had taken the task of caring for Ellie’s hair so Marehis wrapped it up securely to keep it from getting wet, and her bathing provided opportunity for the woman to massage Elf Root oil into Ellie’s back, her shoulder to assist with its rehabilitation. And Marehis got to scrub Sera’s hair good—the girl had gotten better at bathing herself, but oh her sweet girl loved having her scalp scratched and massaged, it was almost reminiscent of petting Anya. Out of the bath, of course. Anya liked playing in puddles, with an affinity for muddy ones, and then she was very distraught at being placed in a body of clean water, plied with soap—she currently sat by the fire panting contentedly...silently judging the bath-takers Marehis was certain.

All cleaned up, changing into their pajamas, Sera offered up a cloth steaming with Embrium and Elf Root Elan insisted upon at least once daily for Ellie to breathe. The two insisted Marehis indulge herself in a good long soak, Ellie plying a bit of pyro magic to the tub to warm it back up while Sera hugged the woman around the waist and whispered that she’d be awake and watching out—Ellie could nap and Marehis could relax. It was silly—not Sera, she was sweet—but Marehis realized then guards would be on the lookout outside of Ellie’s quarters, and Anya was a diligent guard dog. But she’d been on edge, watching like she were waiting for some sort of attack. She supposed she was just- sealing the Breach, having that thing gone and no longer looming overhead as an ever-present doom for them to face, it had been the most relieved, relaxed she’d felt in so long. She was so proud of Ellie, of all of her companions for their efforts, and looking forward to celebrating with her and then the night ended in devastation. Being so relaxed now, some part of her worried if she let her guard down for even a moment, Corypheus would appear.

He did, after a fashion. Marehis was half dozing in the bath, warm water soothing every ache until she was practically asleep—and then suddenly she was very, very awake because Solas was at her side, she shot up in the bath gasping as she crossed her arms over her chest- just- it wasn’t anything he hadn’t seen but he didn’t have the right to see the girls in or over her heart! And just how the hell was he-

He raised his hands in surrender, hurriedly explaining, “I am in my cell, you are asleep—I am waking you because I am about to wake Ellie from a nightmare, she- it will be through my magic, she won’t have to see me but she is so frightened and Sera is endeavoring to wake her but she doesn’t realize it is something she can wake up from.”

Marehis woke with a gasp, jumping up out of the bath and snatching up her robe and catching herself when she slipped, wet feet and stone floors were not a graceful mix, but if Solas’s appearance in the- it can’t have been the Fade- had he always the ability to communicate with her in her sleep? That wasn't important- oh she hated him and his confusing Elf-Magery-Fade business! Agh! If Solas appearing hadn't been jarring enough, Ellie's heart hammering in her chest was horrifying.

“Mare!” Sera called out with some relief, the girl was sitting up, distressed.

“I know,” Marehis breathed out, tying her robe closed as she went to the bed and Ellie shot up, gasping in harsh gulps of air she used to scream, and Marehis climbed onto the bed and grasped Ellie's hands in her own, "Da'vehnan, da'vehnan it's alright, you're safe!"

"Corypheus he-! You have to run- you have to run mami, S-Sera please! He'll hurt you!"

Ellie sobbed out frantic, trying to push Marehis away, Anya whined as she padded up to lick at Ellie's cheek, which seemed to wake the girl up, and Marehis felt tears welling up in her eyes, oh her poor girls! Sera was already crying, pulling Ellie in tight and Marehis wrapped her arms around them and holding them close.

“Sweet girl, you were only dreaming,” Marehis promised.

"C-c-corypheus w-was- Haven was burning and everyone was dead and he had me, mami," the girl squeaked out the word around a sob, voice tight as she buried her face against Marehis's neck.

"You're safe Ellie, we are all safe, and alive, we are in Skyhold,” Marehis hoped to ground her.

"Inky, everything's okay, you're okay yeah?” Sera tried to reassure, “Cor-sniff-a-piss is a dumb, greasy git and I bet you crushed him in the snow, squashed him flat!” and then the Elf girl let out a startled shriek, horrified when that only made Ellie's sobbing harder, before the girl cried out,

"N-no, I just b-buried Haven. It’s g-g-gone and it’s all my fault!"

What? “Da'vehnan, shush, no, sweetheart you didn’t - it- it was Corypheus who destroyed Haven, you rescued it’s people—the Chantry or the Marquis who owned the land can always reclaim and rebuild, sweet girl. You cannot rebuild the people you saved with your actions.”

But Ellie shook her head, “It was stupid! I’m so stupid! We knew the Elder One was a threat, knew he was behind the Breach—I didn’t- I didn’t even think, I should have thought! We should have tracked him down first and put a stop to him and the Venatori and everyone working for him and- and stopped him before closing the Breach!”

That may have been plausible—if Solas had been forthright. Leliana was an amazing Spymaster but until Corypheus revealed himself, they’d pictured a Human madman, some wrinkly, elderly Mage with an agenda against the world at large for the treatment of his fellow mages. They hadn’t a single lead on just who the Elder One truly was. Though as it stood, perhaps it hadn’t been far off the mark—Solas confirmed Corypheus had been Human, once upon a time—and his crazed ranting at Ellie had revealed he’d some connection to Tevtiner.

“We hadn’t the ability to do such a thing, Ellie. We—you are not the sole mind behind the Inquisition’s decisions, it is an effort of the Advisors as well, their resources and agents. All of that in culmination and we didn’t know where the Elder One was operating from or how many were in his forces—we did not know he would have the ability to descend upon us the very night the Breach was closed—“

“But I should have!—”

“Ellie!” Sera snapped, “You friggin! Little dummy! You’re not stupid, but you’re a dummy—bein’ so hard on yourself! We didn’t know about that Darkspawny shite! And we thought he just had like, a few Venatori, and maybe a couple Red Templar blokes—we got the Mages and we fought all the Red Templars at the fancy Redoubt place. We thought he was some scaredy baby hiding behind a scary monocle!”

Ellie’s despairing quieted, sobbing dissolving into sniffling that turned into little giggles as she wiped at her eyes and pressed her hand to her mouth as if to restrain herself from the correction, but Marehis- oh it was- blessed Sera, Marehis couldn’t help herself, laughter bubbled up in her throat as she offered, “Moniker, da’assan. I think you mean moniker.”

“Whatever the frig, there wasn’t no way we could have known Haven was gonna get blowed up. The shitty thing about you burying Haven is that you was doin’ it and thinking you was gonna bury yourself!”

“It wasn’t- it wasn’t like I was trying to kill myself, Ser’, I just- he was coming after me, if I’d gone into the tunnel with everyone he would have just followed me. So I needed to be at the trebuchet, distract him from everyone escaping, and I needed you guys to help me get there and—“

“Yeah. All of us. So, in your plan, if Cory-face hadn’t had a friggin dragon, if we hadn’t gotten separated, how was that gonna go down? We were all gonna stay and pull the lever together?”

“No! We- you- I dunno. I was kind of making things up as I went along, I…kind of thought we’d um…you guys were getting out of there, it was my plan, and you’re all my responsibility. So.”

She…she thought they would have stood by and—“Da’vehnan!” Marehis reprimanded, “We would never have abandoned you, left you to do such a thing on your own—“

“Well yeah, I know that, so in a way Corypheus was like, super helpful, or his dragon was at least,” Ellie sighed tiredly, “I mean if we hadn’t gotten separated I was um…well I was pretty sure—I’m kind of slippery? And it wouldn’t have been lying, to yell for everyone to run for the mine, I just…wouldn’t have run with you.”

Sl…slippery…had she- had she pulled away when Marehis took hold of her? That was behavior they could not have in future. “Ellie. You are to never work to put yourself out of our protections.”

“Sometimes I have to do dangerous things mami, if I hadn’t stayed behind, Corypheus could have just followed us through the mines, the Inquisition might have gotten wiped out. I had to make sure he couldn’t follow us, someone had to stay back and launch the trebuchet—”

“Cole could’ve—“ Sera argued.

“He gets hurt just like all of us, Sera! Just because he’s a Spirit- he might not be dead-forever dead, but he wouldn’t be— it wouldn’t be the same!”

“He can poof! And his body was ruddy beaten to shit and dead when he got all up in it so-
Pretty sure he could get flattened like a pancake and poof out of the avalanche a-okay or at least alive and we could’ve helped him or whatever—you bounce back from shite but not pancaking!

“Dunno, felt pretty pancaked when I fell into a mine,” Ellie offered up like she was teasing but,

“It isn’t funny! “

“Sera-“

“You can’t just toss your life around like that! Dying wasn’t the answer to saving Haven—“

“It’s- it’s not more important than everyone else’s life, especially not collectively!” Ellie insisted, "Ser’, I get- I get you guys would be sad," devastated. Marehis hadn't been entirely certain she would survive it, she'd felt like she was dying, "but the Breach was sealed and So- um. The Rifts probably could be dealt with by someone able to experiment with Rift Magic enough.”

“So?! You think that’s the only ruddy thing you have to do?! Seal the Breach, seal the Rifts, and what? That’s it?! That’s shite! You’re supposed to grow up, Ellie! You’re supposed to go do any schooling you like, date who you like, marry some lucky guy, gal, or non-binary pal and ruddy! Have a life!” Sera lectured before she yelled “You’re not allowed to die until after I’m dead as a doornail and waiting for your dumb face with the Maker! And probably ‘sandra and Cullen and everyone because you’re gonna live a long-ass time, got it! And I have dibs on your first ghosty hug, that’s just-! Friggin I called dibs so everyone else can suck it!”

“B-b-but I don’t want everyone else to-“

“We’re all living to be ruddy a hundred! We’re all different ages but-

“I’m the littlest!”’ Ellie complained at that.

“Well then marry someone younger than you! Or if you’re dead set on Kremmy-boy, either he gets a few extra years, or you get a few short, and you die at the exact same time. Super old and wrinkly. In bed. S’up to you two if you’re getting up to anything freaky or not.”

“Sera!”

“Yeah, like that but Kremmy-boy. Though- ruddy, ‘Cremisius!’ is a real mouthful to be all scheechy during sex—” well then, this conversation had taken rather a turn, hadn’t it?

“No it isn’t!” and when Sera let out an excited scream at that Ellie turned so red her cheeks nearly matched her hair! “We- I- we haven’t- Cremisius just isn’t a mo- you- shut up!”

Sera was giggly at Ellie’s embarrassment, squeezing the younger girl more tightly, “Awe Inky! I’m only teasin’.” She pulled back, raising a hand to bop Ellie on the nose with an index finger, “You and Kremmy-boy haven’t…?”

“Nope!”

“Oh da’vehn, that is nothing to be embarrassed over,” Marehis assured warmly, brushing back the girl’s hair, “you shouldn’t do anything until you’re ready. You’ve been rather busy, and only just had private quarters of your own, if you ever needed,” Marehis cleared her throat, “time, wished for privacy, you need only let me know—“

“I know it isn’t embarrassing but it’s not exactly the sort of thing I want to advertise to my mami—“

Marehis shrugged, that was understandable, she’d been rather embarrassed when her own mother found out she was um…sexually active. Of course that only happened because the woman—who was supposed to be at the bakers!—had forgotten her coin purse and returned unexpectedly, walked in on them, and Marehis had sworn up and down that was the first time. And it was. She certainly hadn’t lost her virginity in the confines of a fishing canoe some three years prior, no.

“Well, it is understandable you would want privacy just to have a moment to yourself—everyone needs time to decompress, I would have no reason to assume anything of it.” The Lieutenant’s comings and goings would be noted for security purposes of course, but for Ellie’s peace of mind, she wasn’t about to bring that up.

“I guess not,” the girl conceded shyly.

“Da’vehn..I did not realize you felt as such, about Haven? You cannot blame yourself. It was through no fault of your own that Corypheus is a monster, or that he attacked Haven. Sometimes that is the natural thing, it is the easiest course of action, for us to blame ourselves.”
Well, she certainly felt like the pot and the kettle. She…she had no way of knowing Solas’s secretiveness of his past had anything to do with being Ages old and for all intents and purposes, an Elven god. Any pressing to his past made the man seem pained and reticent, uncertain how to speak and so she left it be, thought it was something hard for him to discuss outside the realm of his journeys into the Fade. Now, she understood, it had been just that. Solas…had endured hardship. Heartbreak she could scarcely comprehend surviving herself. Losing…Mythal, their child. Seeking his revenge, vengeance she could understand seeking herself because everything help her, the only thing that kept her dragging in the next breath when she thought Ellie was lost was the thought burning in her brain that she would find that monster, and she would destroy it, leave it in ruin, inflict every ounce of fear and pain upon it that it dared to inflict upon El- she…she’d spiraled, it had admittedly gotten very dark. And too, he thought he was saving his people by locking away the Evanuris. And then when he did, things happened he had not expected, had not intended. Woke to a strange world that seemed broken to him, met with so many things that hadn’t been there when he slept. His past…was something that pained him to speak of. She had not been wrong about that, the rest? There was certainly no way she could have suspected such things were true.

Ellie sighed, “I guess. I just- I all of these things keep happening, the Conclave and Venatori and Time magic and Red Templars and Haven falling, I’m always involved somehow and so many people get hurt and die and I keep- I dunno. I just-”

“Ellie!” Good heavens, Cole gave them a fright! He appeared on Ellie’s bed, hovering crouched just over the mattress, “It’s okay, it is okay! I know who you need—oh, Marehis and Sera are helping I-I think, but I got-“

She was glad she heard the thud of familiar footfall in the corridor leading to Ellie’s room before the door flew open with a bang and, “Imekari!” was roared out like a battle cry before the Iron Bull raced up the stairs, stopping and assessing the room like he were looking for danger, great axe drawn for a fight. He sighed, deflated as he tossed his weapon to rest on the couch that sat alongside the banister, “Cole buddy. You- come on man I ran up so many fuckin’ stairs. Imekari, love you, comin’ in, laying it down, holy shit,” the Qunari complained as he came and Ellie and Sera giggled when the bed heaved violently with his weight cast upon it, as it stood, Cole had to teleport so he was not in the way, standing now at the bedside while Marehis had to be swift to grip the headboard and keep an arm around her girls to keep the three of them from being popped off of the bed.

“Oh, next time I will let you know if it is an emergency or not, I am sorry I made you scared your Imekari was in danger,” Cole apologized.

“Cole said you needed me—need usually means sexually, which uh, wouldn’t be the case, so that leaves fightually.”

“Awe!” Ellie cooed, leaning forward to press a kiss to the Qunari’s forehead, “Thanks for doing the stairs to save me!”

“More like the stairs did me babe. But you’re welcome,” he blew out a breath as he’d finally caught it well enough. “What’cha need?”

“I um, I’m sorry,” Ellie offered, genuinely confused, “I don’t know-“ “Survivor’s guilt!” Cole declared.

Survivor’s guilt?

The Qunari let out a rumbling sound in his chest and he was immediately up, and situation himself so he was facing them, seated in lotus position and holding out his arms, “Imekari. Come ‘ere,” he intoned, and Ellie scooted to be seated in his lap, smiling as she was met with his warmth and snuggled into his chest and the Iron Bull sighed as he wrapped his arms around her, rested a hand on the crown of her head. “I’ma tell you a story, Imi-kadan. Sad a shit. But the main character is a sexy favorite.”

“Cremisius?”

“What? No, forget that guy. You think he's a ten? You should've seen me—younger, just as musclicy, smooth as the day I was damn born,” gesturing to his horns as he claimed, “I have these bad boys so everyone is forewarned that I'm a solid eleven. Just young, rock hard, ready to take on the world,” he set up his tale. It…was ‘sad as shit’, traumatic for the Qunari it seemed, even now, he spoke of it very carefully, holding the girl close and Marehis realized he was grounding after a fashion, seated in the comfort of Ellie’s quarters, warm fire at his back, one hand in Ellie’s soft hair, another rubbing circles along the muscles of her back, breathing in the smell of her conditioner. It helped him speak of his time in Seheron. He had made some mention of it before, but now he laid out all he had survived, the baker that gave him silent warning that saved his life while the rest of his men were fatally poisoned, and Tal-Vashoth slit the baker’s throat. A school house suffered a similar fate—poisoned the very same, an act of terrorism by the same faction of Tal-Vashoth. That ultimately he took what was left of his men, and sought this faction out, went to their fortress and took their revenge…or tried to, at least. It was where he earned the bounty of his scars, he had nearly died—he only survived because the Tal-Vashoth believed him to be dead.
Even then, his rescue was hazy for him, all he knew was he survived, and him alone. His men had perished and their mission was wholly a failure. It was after that, that the Iron Bull struggled with his sense of self, with depression to the point it was either allow himself to be felled by Tal-Vashoth, or turn himself over to the Re-educators.

“Ultimately I felt like my surviving was a failure in itself. That I should have died with my men—there wasn’t any way anyone was walking out of there but Tal Vashoth if I gave away something was up with the baker, and I know that, but I was convinced I should’ve just, known it was a trap, fallen into it with the others. And then it was my fault we failed at the fortress, I led them, I let them die, and I got to walk away. And I couldn’t think of one damn good reason I deserved that.”

“Don’t say that! The Iron Bull- you’re the best! You’re brave and strong and smart and kind! You didn’t deserve any of the things that happened, except getting to survive! And it wasn’t—“ “Imekari, I don’t feel that way anymore, I’m just layin’ it down for you. Survivor’s guilt is a thing. And everything you just said about me? Same things apply to you in droves, babe.

Conclave, all the shit that’s gone down since then, none of that is on you. not your fault it happened, and there’s no fault in the fact you survived. Might take you a minute to come around to that fact, but that’s what it is—a fact,” he said, letting her pull back so she could look up into his face, “Ellie. You ever start feeling like I used to—apathetic about your own survival or uh, looking to end it, imi-kadan—little heart—you gotta come to us. To me, anyone, I’m serious. Even if it’s just in passing thought. You hear me? I’m gonna need you to pinkie promise it boss girl.”

Ellie nodded, offering up her unmarked hand, pinkie extended to wrap around his, and Marehis had quite honestly never been so relieved to see someone swear upon something—she-sh could not stand the thought, that the girl might feel moved to end it herself, it was unthinkable-

“I…” she started, then, “It’s not like I want to die, or I think about killing myself or anything but um…” her chin quivered and she looked down at her hands, wringing them nervously and the Qunari took them in hand, his expression grave like he were bracing himself and even still he looked as gut punched as Marehis felt when Ellie confessed, “I keep thinking I should have died, that it would st-stop Corypheus or fix things somehow. Wi-wishing I hadn’t been the one to survive the Conclave, I mean there had to be a thousand other people way more qualified than me, that could do this better, make less mistakes, be stronger and bigger and more capable.”

“Ellie…” Marehis breathed. Sera was wide eyed, mouth working, and it seemed like she might shout, start railing at the girl to convince her otherwise but Marehis held her more tightly, shaking her head and pressing a kiss to her cheek with a quiet ‘shh’.

The Iron Bull took a deep breath, blowing it out slowly, “Okay. Okay—good job keeping your promise Imekari.”

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis ventured gently, reaching out to rest a hand on the girl’s back, “perhaps we should consider a mental health checkup. You have not had an appointment with Adan in quite some time—since before the Oasis.” They should have sought one after her return from the Fallow Mire but she’d been given a break of sorts, seemed in such good spirits, and their Healers had been so busy, working to train underlings as the Inquisition grew, and preparing for the assault on the Breach.

“Mmkay,” Ellie quietly agreed, nodding. “I have been feeling kind of um…I dunno. The way I used to feel, before I went to Adan for help. Empty? Not all of the time, just,” she shrugged.

“You have been exhibiting symptoms I find concerning. Lack of appetite, being so very tired,” Marehis said.

“I am tired, just all the time. I kind of… I dunno, it’s how I felt in the Hinterlands the first time, sort of wanting a break but like—it’s weird. Like I don’t want to die, I just- I just want to not exist for a bit? And then be right back at it, no consequences, no one knows I was even gone, just…” she sighed in quiet frustration.

The Iron Bull cleared his throat, “Alright boss girl. Well, that isn’t possible,” he paused like he was thinking very carefully about something that worried him, and he raised a hand to rest atop her head, “But you can take a good break this weekend, longer if you need it-“

“I’m Inquisitor-“

“Yeah. You can declare a national holiday or something, give everyone a damn day off,” the Iron Bull informed her, it was likely exaggeration but still, “you can take whatever time you need babe.”

Ellie seemed hesitant to accept as much but she did nod.

Sera cleared her throat, “Inky? Sweets, there’s still time before dinner and pish.” The older girl exaggerated a yawn as she stretched, “I’m real sleepy. Nap some more? Cuddly can get in here, you’re not busy, are you?” she asked the Spirit.

Cole nodded, “I am very busy—I am going to nap and keep Ellie from nightmares in the Fade!”

“Clean up and get in here,” Sera instructed, rather amusing to hear the young Elf admonish someone on hygiene but the Spirit removed his hat and jacket, started shucking off his boots and socks before going into the closet to seek the wash basin. Marehis rose from the bed, “Bull, would you mind assisting me with draining the tub, please?” she asked. It was heavy enough it was almost worthless to bathe in if you hefted the thing yourself afterward to empty it.

“You got it,” the Qunari agreed.

“You can nap with us if you want, the Iron Bull,” Ellie offered as she went to Sera when the older girl motioned for her to curl up against her, oh her da’vehnan—Sera, she held Ellie tightly, pressing her lips to the top of her head.

“Alright boss-girl, get some rest,” he said as he got up to assist Marehis, and Sera laid back with Ellie in her hold, Anya whining a bit as she came and laid down against Ellie’s other side.

Sera was always timid about song—dancing she would do even without music, at the drop of a hat at any given time—but she was cagey when it came to singing, even though heavens her girl had the most beautiful singing voice. She used it now, singing softly as she played with a curl of Ellie’s hair, lulling the girl into sleep where Cole would keep her safe.

The Iron Bull did not necessarily need help with hefting the tub, but Marehis helped him nonetheless, to get it out to the balcony behind the fireplace and pour its contents over the edge into the river below.

“Bull?” she asked quietly, out of earshot of the Human girl.

The Qunari sighed. “Gonna be okay. Important thing is she’s talking about it.”

“Cole?” Marehis asked when she heard the closet door open, the young man had been returning to the bed but he appeared on the balcony at Marehis speaking his name. “We have asked you to keep us appraised to Ellie’s health, we did mean all realms of her health.”

Oh, the boy was crestfallen, looked so very disappointed in himself, “I am sorry—I-I am trying but I can’t hear- I hear hurts. Ellie isn’t hurting not in a way that is necessarily painful, that she can acknowledge. When she is numb her hurts are quiet, but there under the surface festering, they go to a place I can’t hear them. I did not realize she was feeling this way. I can’t even hear her guilt—but I knew to get the Iron Bull because I heard your hurting, and when I came I heard what Ellie was saying and it sounded like his old hurts.”

“I am not displeased with you Cole, I merely thought there was clarification needed—you do so well, and I appreciate your help,” Marehis promised, and the boy sighed, nodding. Marehis rested a hand on his shoulder, raising the other to brush the hair back from his face and press a kiss to his forehead, smiling when he made a happy little sound at that, “Go on and join the girls, give them sweet dreams for me, would you?”

He nodded eagerly, “I will!” and then he dematerialized and appeared in the bed on the other side of Sera, arm over the Elf girl and resting his hand on Ellie’s arm as he settled in to ‘sleep’.

“Adan is getting on her schedule for Monday, should I have her see him sooner?” Marehis worried to the Iron Bull as she sat back against the banister.

“Monday gives her the chance to decompress and maybe you can take some inventory on how she’s doing, and what she needs before her appointment, but if you got something in you that says you should go sooner, I say go with your gut—hell, she can nap the whole way I’ll carry her, have a full blown intervention.”

“Thank you but that isn’t necessary. I’ll confirm with Adan and Lady Montilyet. I plan to speak with Cassandra and Cullen tonight, keep them appraised and get their input.”

“Good.”

“There was something you weren’t saying earlier,” Marehis prompted.

The Qunari nodded. “Just uh, wasn’t sure if I should bring it up to the kid, but that ‘not wanting to exist for a bit’ thing is a kind of suicidal thought, that sounds benign but that’s what makes it pretty bad.”

It was likely why the girl struggled with mixing drink and potion, desired for times when her mind wouldn’t be able to process or record anything going on around her, but oh that could be dangerous. Too- just- she hated this, hated that the girl was feeling this way. It almost startled her when she found herself the recipient of a very warm hug, strong arms wrapping around her frame and lifting her so her feet were off the ground and a chin rested atop her head,

“Hey. Everyone’s got your back. We’ll regroup and work together, keep an eye on her, be there for her.”

Marehis sniffled. “Will you hug her? At least once a day. You’re very good at hugging.”

“On it. Hug her every hour on the hour if it would make this better,” Bull swore and then, “And you know, I’m good at way more than hugging. Things aren’t too great with Wolf-boy, you know you I’m always around to uh, work out frustrations.”

She snorted as he released her and she shook her head, smiling. “And just what would Ser Pavus think of that?”

“One, Qunari don’t usually do the whole monogamy thing, two—Sparky’s down, says there’s enough of me to go around. No pressure, just letting you know you start getting antsy, need a little something like that, I’m always down to help out a friend. Even my brunette ones.”

“I’m honored, thank you, but I’m well.” And if she did truly need to er, work out sexual frustrations…well, while the Iron Bull was kind and she was certain he would do so without awkwardness or making it anything more, but “Leliana and I have an understanding,” she said with a shrug before she turned to return to the bedroom.

“Damn it, where the hell is my red head? They’re running around here left right and center—you know what, forget what I said about my brunette friends, if Sera dyed her hair you’d all be a matching set of red-head thieves.” Would they? She supposed as much was true. “You see her last night? Had two of ‘em!” he quietly complained as they returned to the bedroom.

“Perhaps Dorian can dye his hair for you,” Marehis quipped, her girls were fast asleep, Cole was resting curled around Sera’s back, sweet boy. “If you are staying here, I should go, make some arrangements, make dinner happen.”

“Go right ahead.”

She did. But it wasn’t Cabbot’s she sought first.
Solas was seated in his cell, facing the bars, arms hanging over his knees, head hung though he did look up when she approached, “Ellie is alright?” he asked.

“You can see that for yourself,” Marehis supposed.

“I have kept my word, Marehis. I only realized she was suffering a nightmare when her distress cried out in the bond.”

“I mean you are free to look. Monitor her, as you please, so long as you do not cause her distress yourself.”

Oh goodness. He looked at her like she just offered him the world, “Truly?” he breathed a sigh of relief. “I do not know how you did it. When you were separated while the Venatori infiltrated the Inquisition, when we went to the Oasis,” he listed, “I…I have not liked not being able to know she is safe.”

“You should monitor her if you wish. It was good of you, to get me. How…how did that work, exactly?” she wanted to know. “When I was in hiding there was an evening I swear, I saw you. in the cargo bay of a ship I’d stowed away on-”

Solas nodded. “Yes. I was worried, scared for you, as was Ellie. I just- I wanted to make certain you were safe, alive, so I reached out to you in the Fade, and made contact through… through your magic. That is what I did this…afternoon?” he guessed the time.

“Yes.”

“I apologize that I disturbed you.”

“Certainly.”

“She’s sleeping well now. She feels better about something; Cole is making play with her in the Fade. Tag, with the run of an empty Skyhold.”

Maerhis took a deep breath, restrained herself from- she wanted to cry and she hated that she could feel her chin quivering and that had caused the man to sit up and come to the bars, be so very concerned he forgot himself. She was so frustrated, sad that the girl wasn’t…she wasn’t in danger necessarily but she did feel wholly safe.

“That- that is good,” she offered nodding but, “She is struggling, having th-thoughts- that she deserves to die, that that would fix things somehow or-“ Marehis pressed a hand to her eyes, “I don’t know.”

The man went to his knees, hands gripping the cell bars, devastated, “I- she was debriefed today I- oh I’m-“

Oh. She wished a great deal of penance from this man but she could not allow him to think he had led someone—especially someone he loved—to thoughts of s- of thoughts related to suicide. “It was not the debriefing, she has had such feelings before, she shared them with me when you first returned from the Hinterlands. She has been having thoughts, feelings like that since Haven fell, she feels some guilt for having to bury it. Cole is kind and helpful, but he says he hasn’t been able to hear these feelings in her and I- I would appreciate if you-“

“I will be on guard, certainly. Marehis I swear to you, if I feel she may be a danger to herself, I will sound alarm. Truly. I can communicate with Cole, and send him to get you or the others, go to Ellie himself, if things are truly dire I may be able to be of help through the bond. Too you should consider her magic has always been a powerful ally in the past, keeping her alive, if nothing else it should step in and dissuade her from anything drastic.”

“You…you have been able to send calm to her when she has bouts of panic, can you… could you fix this? Send her continuous-“ what? Will to live? She already had that and she wasn’t certain it could be quantified as an emotion but-

“I will help as I can but I should not interfere continuously—if that was necessary I swear to you I would do it, I would not sleep the rest of my days if it meant she would be fine but veh-“ he cleared his throat, “Marehis, if we wish for healing, forcing her to feel something her mind truly doesn’t feel won’t be of use in the long term, it may only further rob her of the ability of doing so on her own.”

“But you will monitor her? Continuously?” she intoned, a pointed reminder of his omission that he was no longer keeping track of the girl in the bond after Haven- she- they had nearly lost her! Marehis could scarcely sleep upon her return, the girl had barely been able to draw in breath and she had- she had required resuscitation twice in the first night. She’d only been able to cope with the distance the girl put between them as they traveled because she thought Solas was monitoring her, would alert them and aid her if she’d some further complication. At the time, she thought she could never be more angry with him. Of course, as always, the man managed to outdo himself.

“I will. I…I do not know, but if you needed it, there could be some system put in place, for me to report to someone at regular intervals.”

Marehis nodded. “I will consult Leliana,” it would take consideration, they did not wish to trust Solas with writing materials for fear he would communicate with some form of ally that way, but they would figure something of the sort out. “I hate you.”

“I know.”

“I hate that I have to come to you now.”

“I know that as well. But you did not have to—you did so for Ellie,” Solas said, “Thank you.”

“Do not thank me, she is my child, I would go to the D-“ the Dread Wolf himself, she nearly said but. Well. she already had, hadn’t she? “-damned ends of the world for my children.”

Solas nodded, and then, “Would you…” he seemed hesitant.

“What?” Marehis snapped, impatient.

He swallowed, head hanging as he spoke quietly, “I do not know how exactly things will move forward. I may be imprisoned permanently, or exiled or executed. No matter the result, it is not likely I can venture into the field with Ellie. I-if you…” he sighed, “if you wished for the benefits of such a bond, ve-. If you wished for another to be bonded with her as I am, I believe it is possible.”

… “Another?”

“You.Your magic if called to spark, the bond is already there, it is just not as active, potent as my own. Your sense of intuition, it works but it is quiet, you’ve always mistaken it for mere worry or gut feeling but it is your magic. You bonded to Ellie even before myself—magically and then emotionally.”

“What do you mean?”

“The night that Human…Daniel? Danner?” he sought to remember, “He made to assault Ellie under the guise of a mistaken dinner delivery? It was the first night I sensed the life spark of your magic—it takes time find it, weeks, months, but a handful of days knowing you? That night it flared to life in such a way it was visceral when you arrived in the Tavern. It was your magic that made you so very concerned over her mood that day, and then when you defended her, felt the threat posed to her, and she was so frightened you were injured her magic reached out, and while she did not cast upon you, the bond formed. It…you were so miserable when Ellie first went to the Hinterlands. She had been in your care for barely a week, because she stepped out of range of the bond. Ellie is endearing but she was gone for far longer than you had time to get to know her, you’d greater opportunity to grow detached. And Ellie was miserable when you were reunited in the Hinterlands by surprise—she’d hardly slept or eaten, was sick, pained—while yes, her excitement did perk her up, it was your magic, powered by your own excitement that reached out and spurred her exuberance, I could feel it in the bonds-”

"Bonds?"

Solas’s mouth worked a moment, voiceless, and he was blushing when he found explanation, "I- I-. Vehnan I have not loved another the way I love you since the Veil. When-when you ceased contacting me and went into hiding I was worried, and then Seeker Pentaghast came to inform me of the reason behind your sudden silence and- there was an instant, before Cassandra explained in full, when I thought she was telling me you had been harmed in the field or- or perished. I realized I could not abide losing you, your mere absence was distressing. When I found you through your magic, made contact, that was the moment my magic bonded with your own. I…am sorry if that knowledge distresses you now."
"Your magic-"

"Is bonded to yours. Yes. It is not like Ellie's and my own, she has full access to her magic, further still there is the fact that she has an extremely intimate relationship with her magic, and has for more than a decade. As Elvehnann, you have had your magic for the whole of your life like a mage, but you've never been connected to it, as it stands it is...I can find you more easily in the Fade, and I can make limited contact through your magic, as you saw, it requires you to be in a state where you are closest to your magic, which is to say, sleep. If you gained access to your magic, you would be able to use it fully as I do, be capable of feeling what she is feeling, her magic would be able to communicate with yours. Our own bond would be...more, but I swear to you, Marehis, I would stay out of it as much as possible, even teach- er, Cole could teach you, how to keep a sense of privacy. I...I have thought to offer the same to Ellie but given the circumstances- I- I have always feared she might um- she is a child and I wish to protect her. As I do not use the bond to cause her harm, nor do I judge or ridicule anything I find there, I did not feel it was needed, or even right to do so."

Alright, she was going to ignore how very...Sera would term it 'weirdy' the idea of being bound to Solas unawares made her feel and focused on the possibility it posed. "I could have a similar bond to Ellie? I would have to become a mage?"

Solas considered her phrasing, "You would have to wake your magic, but you needn't pursue magery unless you wished to, and even then, if you'd some passing interest you could treat it as little more than a hobby. It would not be as hard for you as it is a human—magic is more natural for you, even if you do not realize it. Dalish handle their own mages so well because they've a more natural grasp upon it, and further still there is the fact that Humans handle mage-hood the entirely wrong way. If a mage has no interest in pursuing their magic, they needn't, we had very few who studied their powers, I certainly didn't in my youth. At most, Magic was little more than a tool for how we lit our homes, cooked, occasionally protected ourselves, and formed deeper familial bonds, and communicate with loved ones across some distance. Only the Evanuris studied further, developed branches of magic. You would have magic, it would be yours to use or not use as you saw fit. If you or Sera did pursue it- I was so concerned over whether of not she was Fade Dreaming in the Oasis because she’d been suffering nightmares and I worried she was experiencing something out of the norm—that she had indeed wakened her magic and was continually Fade Dreaming, that is rare in Elvehnann and dangerous*. It is usual to Fade Dream the eve your magic awakes, it is when you are most intensely connected to the Fade, but after that it requires dosing with Lyrium. I...you would not be alone. I may not be of comfort, but Ellie could join you, Cole—any of our mage friends, to assist you that first time, keep you safe and calm."

She...had far too much on her mind at the moment, she needed to think. "I will consider it." And then, "Are you bonded to anyone else we should know of? Varric, perhaps?"

"Much as I do adore the Dwarf, no. I am still bonded to many of my friends in the Fade. Spirits. But I...my magic is bonded to Sera's as well, after our time in the Oasis, rather incidentally I assure you, but when she was injured it- I realized if I could take her injury from her, place it upon myself I would have, that I love her as I do Ellie."

"Ahh. Well then, I'm sure you can tell Sera wishes to trounce you." Or at least she’d been very willing to fight the man when she first learned he’d been endeavoring to make her a Mage without her knowledge.

"Tell? No, but it is not beyond the realm of imagination. That is rather understandable. I owe her more than an apology- I- I did not- I was not thinking correctly. I...if it makes sense it is only because I have come to care for Sera. When first we met I thought her vapid and childish, insufferable, and her racism toward her own people appalling. When I actually had to get to know her, came to realize it was self-hatred wrought from abuse- she is kind and funny and more intelligent than I dared think she might be and her magic, Marehis, it is- if she ever chose such a thing for herself, she would be quite the force to be reckoned with. When I realized she had never been trained as such, I sought to bring her up how I would any Elvehnann child—nurturing magic it- it is commonplace. No different as I understood it to our discovery that Ellie could not read and righting it. More comparable it is as if a child has been made to lay lame the whole of their life simply because no one took it to task to teach them how to walk—teaching them to walk would change every facet of their lives just as becoming a mage would.”

“Walking would not introduce them to demons or the threat of possession—” Marehis argued.

“Knowing Ellie is enough to prove one can walk into dangers even more serious than demons,” she found nothing amusing about that, yet he was fighting a smile? Oh, “Was it wise to house her with such a fearsome flight of stairs between her doorway and her bed?” he meant, “I swear even in the Fade she trips.”

She did suppose that yes, perhaps it was rather similar. “You will have to speak with Sera yourself.” If she wished it. And if he got the chance. “She is rather grateful her unwitting education saved Ellie’s life in the Oasis,” then, “Ellie made claims today, when she was debriefed on your status of ‘Dread Wolf’. That the only reason she found our camp when Haven fell, was because she was led by wolves.”

The man flushed at that, “Ahh. Yes. Well,” he shrugged.

“You did not mention of this.”

“You did not ask—you did not know to but I hardly…I did not consider it yesterday, neither am I trying to make up for what I have done by throwing up every instance I have rescued the girl. If I were doing that, I would remind you all that girl would have perished collecting Shards in the Hinterlands.”

Marehis had to cover her mouth with her hand to keep from smiling. She still recalled the letter she received from Solas detailing the girl’s headlong fall into a gulch—that if she heard of the incident she was to be without fear, he casted Barrier that shielded her from detriment. She cleared her throat, “I suppose that is true.”

He seemed to regard her for a moment like he was measuring something, like a person judging if they could extend their hand to a Mabari without being bitten. “…may I ask how Sera faires?”

"Sera is well," she allowed.

He seemed relieved to hear as much. "And Ellie? She was nervous this week, about her upcoming test, the bond is a powerful thing but it does little to divine her grades."

"Oh, she got an 'A'," Marehis was proud to inform him.

"Truly?" he breathed, "Oh she's come so far. She-" he stopped and then swallowed, like he'd a lump in his throat. She hated...she hated that she was certain she knew exactly what he was thinking of, that he was missing the girl, and how she'd come to be so confident in her reading that even his more arduous texts, she would endeavor to read aloud with him.

This…was getting too familiar. Speaking so amicably, chatting about the girls. She came here for a purpose and now she was done. “I should see to dinner.”

He nodded. “Of course. Have a pleasant evening.” Marehis nodded, turning to take her leave. “I am sorry.”

She did not look to him. But, “I know.”

She hated this, hated him…maybe it was she hated that she had to hate him for what he had done. Dinner—she had girls to feed and things to take care of to secure their safety.

She stopped in at Cabot’s—the Tavern usually spelled fun, and it had more variety food-wise than what the kitchens could provide on such notice. The Dwarf grumpily took up the order, but it would be done, delivered. And she lastly popped in to Lady Montilyet’s office, to make certain Ellie was scheduled appropriately.

“Yes, Healer Adan sent word to make certain space was clear in her schedule for Monday afternoon,” the Ambassador assured.

It may be overstepping but, “Has she War council to hold or judgments, diplomatic meetings?”

“A War Room meeting yes, to touch base on affairs, see if she is prepared to dole out judgement for- to move forward with- to see where she is on handling our recent inter-party upset.”
the woman decided to call it, “and speak of when she might journey to Crestwood, but we have yet to hear from Hawke. Other than that, she has lessons with Cassandra and Cullen, and then Sera later in the afternoon.”

Marehis nodded. She would discuss that with them tonight then. “Thank you, Lady Montilyet.”

“It is no trouble,” she assured, “Do give Ellie my love?”

That, she could certainly do. Back in Ellie’s quarters, Marehis climbed into the bed, crawling up the middle to lay alongside her girls, Cole wriggled over to make room on his side, and the Iron Bull cracked open his good eye to acknowledge her return with a nod, he was laying on the other end with Ellie resting atop his chest, Sera curled into his side with a hand on the girl.

It was only as she was growing comfortable that she realized she’d been traipsing about Skyhold in her robe. Well then. At least it was closed?

When Marehis woke, it was because the Iron Bull was informing her someone was approaching the door, “Seeker and Commander, figures they’re early.”

Ellie was still fast asleep against the Qunari’s chest, Sera snoring next to her so Marehis rose and went to get the door before a knock could sound, quietly closing it behind her—Cassandra and Cullen were indeed early, and that suited, “Ellie is still resting—dinner is on of course, but I…
if you can I would request that you try to make time for her this weekend, we are planning to stay in and rest, relax.”

“Certainly,” they agreed in unison.

“I think an intensive Mami-daughter weekend is needed, papis too, if you’re well,” Marehis assured the Commander—he’d some….nothing contagious it seemed, but some sort of chronic ailment Marehis had noticed, he had such horrible migraines. “I have received new information of how Ellie is faring, and I would appreciate it if we could have a meeting of sorts to discuss how to move forward, as a group. The sooner the better.”

“That sounds dire,” Cullen pointed out.

“I do not disapprove—I trust your judgement,” the Nevarran woman promised, resting a hand on Marehis’s shoulder, “Even with your very casual fashion decisions,” she offered in jest.

She could feel her ears burning red, “I did intend to dress—do come in and make yourselves welcome, you can wake Ellie if you wish, I’m sure that would be pleasant for her, I’ll just be a moment,” she said, leading them into the room and dashing up the stairs to fetch her clothing and step into a side room to change.

She heard a blessedly happy, sleepy sigh from Ellie, before she quietly greeted, “Hola papi, que pasa?”

“We’re here for dinner. Did you have a pleasant nap, sweetheart?” Cullen asked warmly.

“Uh-huh! Cole and I played tag and explored around Skyhold- oh!” the girl gasped and when Marehis returned the girl was looking to Cole, bouncing a bit in place as she shook Sera’s shoulder, the Elf girl snorted in her sleep before shooting up in bed, haphazardly hugging the younger girl, though the action looked more like a reflex to throw her own body over her to shield her than anything else.

“’m up! You sleep good Inky, Cole made you have happy dreams yeah?” Sera asked.

“He did! We have a mission before dinner! A Friend’s mission!”

“Pranky one or serious one?”

“Serious one—real quick, we should be back before dinner arrives,” Ellie said, looking up to Marehis, “is it okay if I go with Sera and Cole somewhere real fast? It isn’t dangerous, we’d be right back,” she promised.

“Certainly da’vehnans, have fun, be safe,” Marehis wished them.

“I will get Krem, he can help!” Cole declared as he vanished and the girls scrambled out of bed, and the adults shared a laugh as the duo rushed down the stairs and the door shut behind them.
“You’re a trendsetter I believe,” Cullen said to Marehis. Well, at least they were in pajamas.

“We got company,” the Iron Bull inclined his head, “sounds like Tethras and Sarge. Huh, Madam and Sparky are takin’ up the rear, ten to one they complain they didn’t get to be fashionably late or some shit.”

They did not complain so much as apologize that they weren’t late, but Madam de Fer was interested to hear how Ellie fared on her test from the girl herself, and Dorian had backed the woman’s decision to cast aside the social demand. Though that did lead to the Enchanter complaining at the girl’s absence.

“She’d some mission to attend,” Marehis said.

“Nothing dangerous?” Vivienne worried.

“Certainly not, and if it is, Sera and Cole are with her, and he did say he was fetching Krem to aid them—I trust together they will all return safely.”

They did, safely…and a bit dirty, they’d all dust on their faces and hands, on their clothing, but they also were smiling and seemed very excited as their quartet ambled up the staircase, Ellie seemed genuinely excited as she looked to Cassandra, “Mami, look! We found Tio Anthony!” she announced.

Cassandra’s eyes widened, “T-tio…” oh, uncle.

“Friggin’ rat stole him*, little bastard,” Sera swore.

Cassandra looked dumbstruck as the four of them came to where she’d been seated, leaning back against Ellie’s desk and the girl offered up an old locket that looked like it had seen better days, there were smudges on her shirt like she’d used it to clean it off the best she could.

“I-“ the woman’s eyes looked misty, oh bless her. She took the locket in hand, opening it to check on the image inside, “Oh I thought I had lost it,” like she’d been beating herself up and was relieved she could stop.

Cole shook his head, “No, a rat found it in your dresser, he thought it would be nice for his home, he did not know it was precious to you, would hurt you to miss it.”

“We found it when we were playing in Skyhold in the Fade,” Ellie said.

“Thank you for rescuing it. I trust none of you were harmed?”

“Cremisius was lots of help, he got the rat to come out and held him so Sera could reach in and get the locket out—I tried but my arms are too short.”

“Thank you Cremisius,” Cassandra said, met with the Tevinter boy blushing and waving it off,

“It was nothing.”

“It was a very large rat!” Cole corrected.

“Thank you all,” Cassandra offered tightly, it was a bit of an armful but she did manage to get her arms around Cole and Krem who pulled along Ellie and Sera between them to hug the Seeker.

Dinner was a much needed boost. They had an indoor picnic of sorts, spreading out a blanket, pillows and seating themselves on the comfortable arrangement to eat and chat, and Sera was enthusiastic to remind Marehis about sharing Ellie’s graded test—she wanted to see it herself and when she was done looking it over and cheering on the younger girl, before passing it on. Miss Lace wasn’t in attendance, neither was Dagna, but the Elf girl still had two dates of sorts, or she attached herself to a pair—Krem had no qualms sharing his seat at Ellie’s side with Sera—she seemed…their earlier conversation had clearly gotten to her, she was glued to the younger girl’s side, always had a hand on her.

“Inky! You’re so friggin’ smart! You learned so many big words,” Sera enthused as she passed the test on, and it was sweet to see all of the adults rally to be encouraging to the girl, and if Cullen was proud of who he termed his ‘precious, brilliant girl’, the Iron Bull snatched up the test, and slipped it into his harness, the strap that went across his chest so the ‘A’ was displayed proudly, a walking advertisement of the girl’s grade. Of course, his chest ornament made eating a task to avoid dirtying it but somehow the Qunari managed.
And they did get a surprise visit of sorts—the pleasant kind—when Mister Aclassi stopped by. He of course checked in on the younger members of their group, asking after their days and dropping a kiss to Krem’s hair before offering Marehis his promised handkerchiefs.

“I thought I’d best get these to you before it got too late,” he said, sounding apologetic that he’d taken so long. Oh they were nice, white, and for he had said they would be ‘plain’ there was a bit of lace around the edges, three for each of them, she and her girls—he’d embroidered their first initials in the corner and…oh the man was sweet. He’d apparently taken note of the necklace Marehis wore, the one Ellie had gotten her for her birthday, he’d apparently laid eyes upon it when they spoke earlier and been able to accurately embroider the constellation along an edge of each of her handkerchiefs, and for the girls’ he’d embroidered peonies for Ellie and… buttercups for Sera, apparently he’d learned Varrie’s nickname for her.

“Thank you, they’re beautiful,” Marehis said.

“It was no trouble,” he assured.

“They’re really pretty!” Ellie enthused, “would you like to stay and eat with us?”

“Oh, I do appreciate the invitation bella mia, but I’m afraid I’ve plans already—I’m due at the Ambassador’s office.”

“You have a meeting with Tia Josie?” Ellie asked sweetly.

Tonio nodded. “Dinner—she wished to see our plans for your wardrobe.”

“Oh! Gosh, yeah, she really really loves what I wore today, gosh it’s so pretty but like, still practical? I wore them to a War Room meeting and I usually wear armor or my super fancy things for those and I didn’t feel underdressed, but I’m also not nervous about wearing them for practice fighting. Though gosh I’ll feel badly if they get torn up,” she confessed.

“Oh, do not worry, I took into consideration your day-to-day,” Tonio assured, explaining, “There are seams at the elbows of your shirts, not just the shoulder, and too, just under the bust just where it cinches. Pantlegs are sectioned to seam at the ankle and knee—if any piece of it becomes torn or worn out to the point it would need to be tackily patched, or replaced entirely, I can do so easily without having to recreate the whole of the item of clothing, just remove and replace the damaged section.”

“Oh wow, that’s so smart!” Ellie complimented.

“Cremisius’s injury yesterday inspired it actually.”

“Oi, Bull, just put ‘muse’ on my resume,” Krem informed his boss.

“Bull snorted, “As many variations of ‘Krem’ I gotta come up, what makes you think it isn’t already on there? You’re just one inspirational son of a bitch Krem-fraiche.”

“You were injured?” Cassandra asked, concerned—she and Cullen were seated at Krem’s other side and the Nevarran woman reached out to brush a hand against the shaved portion of the young man’s hair scrutinizing him like she would be able to tell just where he’d been injured and if it had been healed properly by looking into his face.

He smiled, “Wasn’t a big deal—this asshole had some kind of scythe blade on a chain?”

Krem explained, “Swinging it around everywhere, kept trying to get it to grapple around Bull—“

“How sweet, great brute that you are he still felt compelled to rescue you,” Dorian teased the Qunari.

“He had Ellie on his shoulders, and he was making some way too close calls to snagging her and that was just a big ‘fuck no’ so I intercepted and got a hold on the chain, the end wrapped around my arm, blade ended up in my arm but I was able to pull the bastard in close,” he grinned, “I do my best work up close and personal,” Ellie giggled, ducking her head shyly while Sera cackled.

Cassandra huffed a laugh, “That…is rather an ingenious move, and I am proud of you for keeping track and care of Eleanor in battle,” she took his chin in-hand and pulled him forward to press a kiss to his cheek, “Sweet man, I trust your injury is healed? Good. You are to take care of yourself Cremisius, do try to be more careful.”

Tonio looked pleased, relieved to see- oh. Well, she supposed it was a sort of relief to see that, while there was a tremulous relationship between the Lieutenant and his horrible mother, he had something of a mothering figure in Cassandra. Someone who gave him acceptance and guidance, encouragement, a positive association with a maternal entity.

“Have a pleasant evening,” Tonio wished them.

“You too!” Ellie answered.

Dorian took a great measure of fun in reenacting his library altercation with the Chantry Mother—Ellie turned red and launched herself at Cassandra and Cullen to hug them as if doing so would endear them, particularly Cassandra, enough that they would not seek to rebuke her for her attitude with a member of the Chantry.

“That was horribly rude,” Cassandra insisted, but she meant, “Mother Giselle, has she harassed you like this before?”

“Only when she’s bored I assume,” Dorian drawled.

“She had better find better ways of passing the time then,” Cassandra decided, “Eleanor did well to defend you I think, and she does seem to care for the girl’s good opinion—if that is not efficient enough to dissuade her in future, do let me know, Dorian.”

“You’re not mad I got mouthy with a Chantry Mother?” Ellie wondered, her arms still around the woman’s waist, looking up at the Nevarran woman who favored her a smile and shook her head ‘no’.

“If you had taken the tone unjustly, certainly, that would be wildly inappropriate. She is a member of the Inquisition, and you are Inquisitor—you saw her acting out of turn and brought correction to the situation as is your right and responsibility, I am proud of you, for how you treat your friends and allies, Eleanor.”

Ellie blushed, hugging the woman tighter, “Thanks mami.”

A smile came to the Seeker’s lips as she rubbed the girl’s back and ventured, “If you truly wish to show your gratitude, Eleanor, perhaps you could deliver the sermon your mamis missed you giving?”

“And various uncle figures of ill repute,” Dorian offered up as further incentive.

Oh the girl looked so abashed as she resumed her seat, worrying her lip, hands fidgeting in her lap, Sera giggled and took hold of them to play a bit, wriggling fingers to tickle at the palms of Ellie’s hands while the girl gathered her thoughts,

“Baby version? I don’t have the big ‘Chant Study’ version in me,” she said and the Seeker nodded that that would sort. “Kay, it was just on the Commandments? Transfigurations Chapter one, verse five,” Ellie started, “With a focus on the first sentence: All things in this world are finite, what one man gains, another has lost. It goes into a decrying o theft—that we shouldn’t steal because it also takes away our fellow man’s livelihoods and peace of mind, and that makes the Maker sad. But it’s not just that—it’s a very literal verse. Things are finite. When someone has something—that’s something someone else doesn’t have, whether it’s a loaf of bread or a place to sleep—if I’m in my bed, I’m taking up that space, and it’s gone for everyone else,” she explained, smiling a bit as she shrugged, offering her current audience, “well. Most everyone. You lot know I’m all about sharing, sleepovers are my jam. But, coming up…I didn’t have a lot to share,” she said, “Usually when it came to the ‘gain/loss’ situation, I was in the ‘loss’ column. And that’s what made it one of my favorite verses. I mean it’s awful when you don’t know where you’re going, where the next meal is coming from, when and where it’ll be safe to sleep—if it’ll stay a safe to sleep once your out. and then I learned that verse and it was…comforting. Nice. Because it tells me one thing—if I’m in the loss column, that means someone else somewhere got to be in the gain. A meal I missed was one someone else got, if I couldn’t find a place to stay, it meant the beds were filled with others who got to have a safe place for the night. If Templars were chasing me, it meant those same Templars weren’t off chasing someone else. Thinking about it as other’s gains instead of just my loss made it better, it was kind of relieving. Yeah, I was experiencing the bad of things, but that just meant there was good from it somewhere else. And ultimately it helped me be content, when I lose, I know it’s not in vain for no reason, and when I gain? I know I’m blessed, and I’m so grateful, because I understand the cost it comes at.” She shrugged, offering a shy smile as she said, “I’ve gained a lot lately, I’m so incredibly blessed by all the amazing people in my life, and I’m so grateful for you.” Well. Marehis was certainly glad she'd acquired new handkerchiefs.

When she fell silent Cullen started clapping and insisting, “It was even better the second time!”

“Damn Boss-girl you preached the hell out of that!” Bull cheered...possibly blasmephemously, given the Qun.

Marehis was uncertain just how to move forward as dinner wound down. She had been able to communicate the need to have a group meeting to Cassandra and Cullen, but Ellie had returned before she could include the rest of the class. And now she was admittedly concerned at the girl’s current behavior—she’d resumed her seat, and dropped out of the conversation, been quiet and contemplative, staring into space for the better part of five minutes. But, “Hey Cremisius?” Ellie asked quietly, her gaze still focused ahead a moment before she turned to look at the Tevinter.

“Yeah El?”

“I um, I made the Iron Bull a promise earlier, and I forgot, honest, but I just remembered I made a similar promise to you too, awhile back. Can we go on a walk, please?”

“Course lovely, as long as it’s alright with Marehis,” he said, looking to the Elf woman, “I’ll be watching out.”

“Of course da’len, I trust you,” she assured him, “go on, take all the time you need.”

Sera didn’t let the girl go without one last squeezy hug. “Hey Ink? I love you lots. Kay?”

“I love you lots too,” she promised, kissing the older girl on the cheek before Krem assisted in donning her cloak and linked arms to escort her on their walk. “Oh! We’ll be back, I’m sorry, I’m kind of scatter brained, I don’t mean to be rude to you guys—”

“Go da’vhenan, no one is insulted, we’re finishing up anyway,” Marehis stepped in, “go, be safe.”

She held up a hand for everyone to remain silent, and waited until the young couple made their way out of the corridor proper, and she heard the door to the Great Hall closing behind them. “Well that sounded serious,” Dorian said, looking to the Qunari, “Just what have you made the girl promise?”

“Ellie—” Marehis started but,

Sera let out a frustrated sound, hands slapping against her knees as she cried out, “Inky wants to die!”

“She doesn’t want to die, da’vhenan,” Marehis corrected, slinging an arm around the girl’s shoulder’s and pulling her sideways so she leaned against her. “She has assured us of that,” she assured the other’s, who all looked…bewildered, to say the least.

“Shit,” Varric breathed.

“Kid’s struggling with some major survivor’s guilt after everything,” the Iron Bull said, explaining the promise they struck, and the resulting admission from the girl, Marehis assuring she had already seen to it that she’d arranged a check up with Adan to address her feelings, the dip in her depression, and putting forth the suggestion that they all take the weekend as it goes, and did Cullen and Cassandra think perhaps she could have the morning off of War Room meetings so long as nothing of great import had happened? Their agreement was immediate.

“We should not have pushed Inquisitor upon her so soon, it is too much pressure,” Cassandra lamented.

“She just needs time, Cassandra,” Cullen defended.

“Eleanor is doing well in her role of Inquisitor, she handled her judgement hearings beautifully, and her Chantry talks, oh,” Madam de Fer breathed as if moved.

“Inky…Inky’s a good Inquisitor,” Sera said, “She just has to work through her depressy shite.”

Cassandra sighed, nodding. “I did not mean to imply that I thought her abilities lacking, I just wish she did not have so much on her,” she said, Cullen rested a hand on her shoulder, squeezing gently to comfort.

“We’ll give her a nice weekend, do what we can to make sure everything’s relaxing and “fun,” Rainier said, “We’ve been so busy she hasn’t had a lot of time with Russel, I know the girl misses him, she’s always popping by the stables to check on him, brush him-“

“She’s always popping in to check on you, Sarge,” the nickname rang like ‘dumbass’ from Varric’s lips, “Loves that horse, but it’s you she misses and checks in on.”

“We should try to spend Sunday as a group,” Marehis voiced, “I thought tomorrow could be something of a mamis-daughters day, just staying in and relaxing, giving her time to rest while still surrounded by people she might cheer her while still making her feel comfortable just being, feeling whatever she’s feeling without the need of a brave face. She was exhausted, subdued all morning, and the very instant she was in sight of Lady Montilyet she immediately- she behaved no differently than usual but that is the thing. She obviously wasn’t feeling as smiley and chipper, but in front of others,” she sighed.

“I am still invited or do you think she would be falsely cheerful for me?” Cullen asked.

“We’ll simply have to see, you’re such a comfort to her and-“ well she certainly couldn’t find much cheer with her currently incarcerated papi, could she? “- I just think she could use that right now. Would you and Cassandra mind at all, spending the night tomorrow night? We could surprise her with news of our day in at breakfast.”

“Certainly,” Cassandra agreed.

“We’ll bring it up when we come,” Cullen said, nodding. “I will make muffins.”

“Muffins?” Cassandra questioned.

“My mother’s recipe,” and at the Seeker’s wry stare, ”She passed it down, and I make it edible.”

“I certainly hope so, you’ve only referenced your mother’s cooking as a tool for torture.”

“That is the only possible reference I can make,” he assured, “I promise nothing but comforting breakfast food.”

“Excellent.”

“Should I stay tonight or head back to my place?” Sera asked Marehis, “We’ll do things on Sunday?”

…w-well yes, but, “Oh, do you not wish to join us tomorrow da’vehnan?” Marehis asked.

“I thought it was just Inky and you guys-“

“I did say ‘daughters’ da’len.”

Cassandra smiled at the Elf girl’s surprised look, leaning over in her seat to scratch at Sera’s hair affectionately before pressing a kiss to her cheek, “We would not dream of excluding you, sweet girl.”

“Blah!” Sera complained, blushing fiercely.

“I don’t see why it should be so ‘blah’, the ickle Herald considers you a sister,” Dorian drawled, “siblings do traditionally share parentage.”

“Who the frick says I’m Inky’s sister?”

”‘Inky’ did, Buttercup,” Varric informed her. “least that’s what she said when- oh. Uhh...never mind.”

“Friggin what?” Sera demanded to know.

“When she was trying to figure out a birthday present for you!” Cole announced. “It’s almost Cloudreach and Ellie has been trying and trying to figure out what to get you, she’s so embarrassed that she can’t think of what you might like, but you are not a very ‘things’ person. So she asked everyone—all of her friends and companions in Skyhold, saying she wants to make it special because she loves you and you are like a sister to her.”

Dread Wolf take- Blah indeed, the Dread Wolf could not take her! But Cloudreach! It was soon to be upon them—Ellie had voiced that very concern to her the day of her initiation to Inquisitor and she’d forgotten! Sera’s birthday was the 4th! Oh she was a horrible mother, she- heavens, what in the world would you get for someone like Sera? The girl truly wanted for nothing, she had interests of course, maybe-

“She…she really went to all of you worrying about this? Saying that about me*?” Sera asked, her voice sounded tight, was she upset?

Maerhis’s ears twitched when she heard footfalls in the corridor, and then Ellie and the Lieutenant were bounding up the stairs, holding hands, and it looked like perhaps her new handkerchiefs had gotten some use—Krem had one balled up in his free hand and while their faces were clear, one or both of them had been tearful, from what Marehis could smell. The young couple seemed fine now, though, “Sera? What’s wrong?” Ellie asked, releasing Krem’s hand to start heading for the Elf girl.

Sera surged to her feet and almost stepped on Dorian as she broke out of their blanket circle and collided with Ellie—tackling the younger girl, literally, they went to the ground in a hug, Sera falling onto her back with the younger girl held to her chest fiercely as she said, “Inky! You’re my little sister and you made sure everyone knows it! That’s friggin the best birthday present ever?”

Ellie giggled, humming contentedly into Sera’s shoulder, “Really?”

“Yeah really!”

“Cause I did get kind of an idea, if you’re down for it,” Ellie said, scratching behind her ear. Oh, did her tattoo itch? The Iron Bull did beautiful work and it had healed splendidly.

Sera gasped for some reason and, “Yes! Inky! We gotta—on my birthday?”

“Uh-huh!”

“Sweet!”

Sweet was rather the term for their weekend. They all slept so well, and Ellie seemed lighter with the day ahead of her free and clear. And she was sincerely pleased and surprised when, on the strange occasion that Marehis allowed her to answer the door on her own, she opened it to find a pajama clad Cassandra and Cullen, armed with a plate of fresh blueberry muffins and followed after by kitchen staff bearing trays of breakfast. They gathered before the fireplace to pray and eat. Cullen’s muffins, oh the man was brilliant. He’d taken on the challenge that Ellie hadn’t been exhibiting an appetite in the mornings and offered something that would compel her to ignore that without force or stress—she wasn’t going to let the man go through the trouble to do something so nice for them and leave that with anything that looked like ungratefulness, and of course it only stood to reason muffins—dessert—had to wait until after she’d consumed everything else on her plate, and she did well to earn the reward, Anya only made off with a rasher of bacon she snuck off the girl’s plate when she settled into her lap.

“Gracias papi! These are so yummy!” she enthused, popping another bite of blueberry muffin into her mouth. They were delicious, Marehis had to agree…and the fact that Sera was cleaning the crumbs off of her shirt by plucking them up and eating them made it clear the girl felt the same way.

“Thank you Ellie, I’m glad you enjoy them. Would you care for the recipe?” he asked. "It is mine to pass down after all."

Oh, that sent the girl gasping excitedly, genuinely excited! Oh she could kiss Cullen if that wouldn’t be wildly inappropriate! “We can make them together sometime?” Ellie asked him.

“Of course we can sweetheart,” the man assured her warmly.

They spent the whole of the rest of the day gathered on Ellie’s bed…well, all of them once Sera’s hair was seen to, it was in need of a trim so Marehis saw to that, garnering a chance to chat with the girl alone while Ellie was occupied, nestled between Cullen and Cassandra, Anya laying across their laps while the Seeker read aloud for them. Marehis led the Elf girl out onto the balcony so her hair could be easily swept away, sitting near the balcony railing while she worked.

“How are you doing, sweet girl? Since Haven?” Marehis wondered.

Sera shrugged, “Haven was right shit—I mean it was great, but what happened, that blows. Friggin’ Corif-in-piss is- I still can’t believe half this shite is happening.”

“Neither can I,” Marehis admitted.

“He- he’s so friggin big, Mare. I’m so scared he’s gonna come after Inky again—she’s so-his handprint took her whole forearm!”
“That was terrifying, but we are safe and secure here in Skyhold, we would see him coming from-”

“Miles away, yeah, Not-Beardy gave me a similar spiel. Just-“ Sera sighed. “Haven really freaked me out. We thought we were safe there, I mean all the shite in the world could happen when we were out in the field but Haven always felt safe, any threat that popped up there was either avoidable or things we could handle.”

Marehis nodded, kissing the back of Sera’s head, “I know. Hopefully we will grow to feel more safe here as time passes. Sweet girl-,” Solas, “someone made mention that you have been having nightmares since the Oasis. And you had a panic attack-“

“It was just-! Frick, it wasn’t a big deal, I don’t even know why I got so freaked out, just-“ what was she talking about? It made sense she was under duress directly in the face of losing someone she cared about- “how’d you even hear about it, Lace swore she wouldn’t tell and there wasn’t a whole bunch of people in the Tavern-“

“Da’vehnan, this is why I wished to discuss this with you—miss Lace has not broken confidence with you, I was speaking of your attack right after we escaped and made camp after Haven.” And too, Solas had informed her of one she’d suffered while walking the battlements with him one of their first evenings in Skyhold, that she was still struggling with this was worrisome.

“Oh.” Sera said. “It en’t…it’s not as bad- I used to get ‘em a lot when I was younger. But I haven’t had them in forever and then- yeah I keep having nightmares that I-Inky dies and it’s all my fault. And I’m so scared all the time that I’m gonna do something to mess it up, put her in danger. Or I’m not gonna be fast enough or strong enough.”

“Sweetheart I am so unspeakably proud of you for how incredibly you do, the lengths you go to protect Ellie, but she is not your responsibility all of the time—I left her in your care, the care of the others when you were in the Oasis and you went above and beyond. I am always watching, she has so many friends and allies—you have so many friends and allies. Remember that. I am always here for you da’vehnan, if you need me. You have so many friends and allies. Remember that. I am always here for you da’vehnan, if you need me. You can always come to me if you need to talk or vent. And if you’ve ever need of it, sweet girl I would go with you if you needed to speak with Adan or Miss Elan, if you find you’ve a great deal of trouble sleeping soundly, or-“

Sera sighed so Marehis fell silent. But then, “I dunno. It seems dumb to go to him for something that only happens every once in a while. I mean it used to be all the time when I was younger, Lady never- I never saw anyone about it.”

“She did not approve of seeking help?” Marehis asked, aghast.

“She always called it ‘throwing a fit’ said I was just pretending or whatever for attention.”

“Well no one is accusing you of such a thing now,” Marehis assured. “Da’len you do not need the weight of the world on your shoulders to feel that way—people drown in all measures of water, being deeper below the surface does not make one more drowned than someone laying unconscious face first on the surface.”

“Kay, I guess…maybe,” the girl allowed. “Thanks Mare. I promise to come to you if I need you.”

“I am glad.” Marehis breathed with quiet relief. She did not want to press the girl too much on the subject. “You are happy with your space in Skyhold?” she wondered, a bit of a change in subject, it was still related. She hadn’t been there more than once, but it was safe, and warm. The first evening the younger Elf lived there, while Ellie was secure with helping Leliana, Marehis slipped into the room and made certain there were enough pillows, brought her blankets, and seen to it the door could be securely locked—it hadn’t had one before, but Solas had- they had both had the concern for the girl sleeping on her own in the Tavern where the place would be full of drunken people. Solas had voiced the worry, and Marehis checked the door for a lock and when they found none, the man had disappeared for all of five minutes and returned from somewhere with an iron bolt for the door, and they’d worked together to install it so Sera could lock the door behind her.

“Yeah, it’s real sweet—I told Inky she could sleep over any time she wants, and she did a few times before she got her room, do you think it would be okay still even though she’s Inquisitory now? Like safe ‘n pish. I keep the door locked when I’m sleepin and uh S- someone warded the windows, same way the ones in Ellie’s cabin were? Made it so they open to magic from Inky, or me tappin on them in a specific way.” Someone? Solas. He’d thought of as much in the following days, pressed a kiss to Marehis’s head as he informed her he’d seen to it the girl was secure-

“I don’t see why not,” Marehis agreed.
“And you’re always welcome to come too, it’s a bit of a squeeze but Inky always lays on me and I only take one side of the window seat.”
“I’m glad it is spacious enough for you,” Marehis offered, oh it was bad of her but she couldn’t help smiling, “Miss Lace likes it?”

Oh the girl blushed, tips of her ears reddening, “Yeah, it’s a nice set up. She um, stays over when she’s in Skyhold—told her she can sleep there even when I’m bunking with Inky.”
“Oh, “I hope she is not frustrated you haven’t been sleeping there the past few nights-“
“Nah, Lace…she knows how important Inky is to me, it don’t bother her none.”
“She is a very sweet young lady,” Marehis said as she finished up, “a very lucky one, I think I’m all done, you look beautiful as ever da’assan.”

“Thanks Mare, you’re the best,” Sera said, popping up onto her feet and turning about to help Marehis rise once the woman gathered up her sheathed razor and scissors. And once the implements were tucked away in one of Ellie’s desk drawers, it was sweet to hear the Elf girl giggle as Marehis caught up to her at the edge of the bed and wrapped her arms around her, falling onto the end of the bed together as Marehis peppered kisses to the girl’s ear.

“Mare!”
“They’re so precious and you’re hair is adorable!” Marehis laughingly enthused.
“The cutest! Lace is gonna love it,” Ellie insisted, giggling as she teased, “Danga’ll like it too-o!” in singsong.

Sera let out rather the eloquent squawking sound as she slapped her hands over her eyes.
“Dagna?” Marehis asked, interested, dying to broach the subject.
“Ahh yes, you did seem very comfortable the other night at dinner,” Cullen teased the Elf girl.

“I thought you were dating Miss Lace?” Cassandra asked, lowering the book in hand to look to Sera, “Is the Inquisition’s Anarchist giving you undue attention?” she worried.
“Nope! N-nothing like that, she en’t bothering me or nothing um,” Sera laughed nervously, “Yeah it’s…I dunno. We really like her?”
“We?” Maerhis prompted.
“Lace ‘n me. It’s-“ Sera blew out a frustrated sounding breath, “I dunno! Friggin' weirdy, I don’t know!”
“It isn’t weirdy,” Ellie corrected, smiling as she sat up, rocked forward to press a kiss to Sera’s cheek, “It’s polymamy silly!”
“I don’t feel sick-“
“It’s not a disease—it’s a kind of relationship. Like I’m polymami-y. I love Cassandra and Marehis the same, just like I love Cullen and the Iron Bull and So- I just, I love lots of people, I have similar relationships with them, and I don’t love any of them any less just because I love more of them. You’ve been my best friend for a while now, but I didn’t stop loving Sam when you and me became friends, just like I didn’t stop loving you when I became friends with Cremisius or Dorian or Cole,” Ellie shrugged. “You like Lace, and you like Dagna. As long as Lace likes her too, and Dagna likes both of you, I don’t see a problem.”
“Huh. Dunno. I guess that makes sense?”
“It does,” Marehis offered as she thought it over, “I did not have to start loving Ellie less to love you as well, neither do I love you any less than I love her.”
“Well put,” Cassandra agreed.
“Frick! Stop- stop being all lovey it’s freaking me out!”
“We can’t help it!” Ellie enthused abandoning her place between Cassandra and Cullen to crawl across the bed and just lay on Sera, “We just love you so so much! Mwah mwah mwah “Inky! Blah!” Sera laughingly complained as she was bombarded with Mabari and Ellie’s kisses, Marehis reaching out to tickle at the Elf girl’s ribs, “I ruddy love you lot too!”

All in all it was a pleasant, lazy day well spent. Sera lay with her nose in the latest newsletter from the University of Markham, Orlais’ resting at her hip for later. Cullen must have been in need for the break himself, he lay with Ellie on his chest, his arm around Cassandra’s shoulders and his hand had been playing with the Seeker’s loose locks but it had stilled, the man dozing for most of the day while Cassandra and Ellie shared a book the girl was reading for her lessons with Dorian—something fictional and light that would still stretch her current vocabulary. Technically it was a bit of homework, though she did sleepily mumble that her eyes were getting tired and Marehis smiled bemused at, “Would you mind reading to me mami?” it was so sweetly asked, and she did not think Cassandra could deny her anything when she used the ‘m’ word. As it was, the Seeker nodded, pressing a kiss to Ellie’s head as she held her closer and allowed the girl to slip in and out of consciousness, rest while Cassandra read aloud.

Marehis…was avoiding reading, mostly. She’d made a request of the Seeker that the woman had of course made good on, but…ugh, she did have better things to do! She’d seen to Sera’s hair, and then gave the Elf girl a pedicure as she read, cleaning and painting her nails now that they were set up well enough to indulge in such things. ‘Buttercup’ yellow was pretty, and the girl liked it well enough—while she warned that they’d get ‘right chipped’ when she made to use her bow again—Sera subjected herself to having her fingernails painted. The Seeker even allowed Marehis’s procrastination—when Maerhis was finished painting Ellie’s finger and toenails lilac, Cassandra assented to matching with her…

It was a bit of mischief, but Ellie was giggly delight as she took the lilac nailpolish and with and mirthful nod from Cassandra, as it could be easily hidden or fully removed if the man did not care for it…Cullen ended up matching as well. While the man slept, Ellie removed his socks and painted his toenails. While he was surprised to wake with his toenails a different color than when he’d fallen asleep, his only question was why they hadn’t done his fingernails.

Eventually Marehis ran out of excuses though—Ellie painted her fingers and toes a pretty pale pink color and once they were dry…could she paint Anya’s claws? The idea was sound but when she looked to the pup with the thought in her mind, Anya had stared back and gave a quietly growl-laced huff that implied she had best not attempt such a thing. So.

It was after lunch when Marehis cracked open the weathered copy of the Chant Cassandra brought for her. She took a deep breath, and supposed it would be wisest to start with the first page, introducing herself more formally with the possibility of a change in religion. But she’d…she’d some interest in the section Ellie had taken her Chantry lesson from, and at her request the girl took the Chant in hand and flipped to the book of Transfigurations, the first chapter listing the Andtrasten Commandments, a code to live by she supposed.

These truths the Maker has revealed to me: As there is but one world, One life, one death, there is but one god, and He is our Maker. They are sinners, who have given their love to false gods.

Lovely.

“I don’t like the use of sinners either, but that’s only because of how people misuse the word. We’ve learned to use it to shame and guilt people, to mean ‘bad person’ or ‘evil’. Yeah, sins can get pretty extreme and make you evil or a bad person, but the word itself just means imperfect. Everybody sins and falls short of being absolutely perfect all of the time, and that’s okay, that comes with the territory of being a person—it’s okay to believe in other gods, but…” Ellie shrugged, “I guess maybe it really was a forewarning that the Evanuris aren’t gods in the same way the Maker is? And if you think you’re getting exactly the same deal with them, you’re making a mistake. I would rephrase it like ‘Giving love to false gods is fruitless’ or something—it isn’t anyone’s fault if they’ve been brought up to believe in Dalish gods, and they do exist on a level, and there is a system in place now that works, just, not as flowery and love and light as the Dalish have been led to believe. They don’t know the history of the Evanuris, that they weren’t gods to begin with and aren’t really gods now. That when they die, they’ll serve the next generations in the Fade either as Spirits, or um, terrorize them as demons. And the only person alive that was involved has been painted a ‘trickster’ god, so even if he did try to explain, it’s not exactly believable on a wide scale. I wish there was some way of letting people know about that without making them feel disrespected or hurting them—because its forever, you know? How many demons are created purely because people die thinking they’re going to some happy, beautiful ‘field of flowers’ afterlife and wind up in the Fade?"

Certainly, it was distressing enough to Marehis and she was still alive.

“Do not think of it, sweet girl,” Marehis said, brushing hair back out of her face—she was supposed to be relaxing, not trying to figure out how to fix a system misunderstood, left broken for a thousand years. “Thank you, for explaining—I appreciate your understanding of Andrasten religion.”

The girl nodded, “You got it mami, I’m always down for talking faith! I’m sorry it doesn’t work exactly like you thought, but um, it doesn’t sound horrible, being able to help people, being a Spirit of something pure in the Fade. Mythal sounds like she was nice, and you always pray to her,” hmmm yes, how lovely it was, to discover she was praying to her lover’s ex…girlfriend? Wife? Who was dead? But not entirely? It made her head hurt. “I think it’s nice, you have an understanding mami to mami. It’s really sad what happened to her and her baby, but it might…I dunno, be nice for her, to hear from someone Solas cares about so much, reaching out to her, talking to her about people Solas loves. He’s made some beyond crazy mistakes, but he…he wasn’t lying about loving us—you me and Sera.”

That…was true. And Marehis, oh it hurt her heart to think of the fate that had befallen Mythal. No one should have to suffer so much. “That is a very sweet thought da’vèhnan.”

“It’s…it’s really hard, figuring out what to do about Solas,” Ellie confessed. “It’s kind of like judging two people—the man he was, and the man he is, and if there’s even a difference between them. With Thom…I can’t imagine the man he is today ever repeating the same mistakes, he never meant to make them in the first place, the man he is today is worlds apart from who he used to be. And yeah, Solas joined the Inquisition for totally selfish, borderline-psychotic reasons, but he’s helped a lot, tried to fix this—while hiding the hand he had in it to begin with,” she sighed frustratedly. “And I mean with the other things I had to sit in judgement on, I was personally involved but it was easier to look at the facts of everything and deliver judgement based on what they did, regardless of how I feel—I mean there wasn’t much ‘feel’ to Denham or Goat-thrower man. But, I mean, in my heart I just wanted to send Alexius home when we arrested him, let him be with and bury his son, then gotten him back for punishment.”

“We could not have had Alexius returned once he was safely in Tevinter, even if the man was contrite enough to turn himself in, the Magisterium would likely have held him captive if need be, refuse to let us have him,” Cassandra offered, “you did do your best—compromised. Encouraged the man and his son to reconcile before Felix’s passing. This situation with Solas is…difficult to measure out. And it is far more personal to you than even Alexius’s case. While your role as Inquisitor demands you consider the facts…” the woman sighed, sat up on her knees to be before Ellie and take the girl’s hands in her own. “Eleanor. You would not be the Inquisitor you are, if you were not the incredible, compassionate, justice-driven young lady I am so very proud to consider my daughter. You will come to a decision on this, and I have every faith it will come with a balance of what is right to pay penance for what evil he has wrought, and what is right, in return for what good he has done since.”

Oh her da’vèhnan, the girl’s eyes welled up with tears, “That isn’t- you can’t just- I’m really happy and sad now and I need a hug!”

Cassandra gladly obliged, pulling the girl close and pressing her lips to the top of her head, holding her while the girl seemed to be hugging the woman with everything she had.

“Sandra just parented so hard,” Sera whispered like she were in awe.

“She just keeps making it cooler,” Cullen said as if in agreement.

“Is that code for something?” Ellie wondered, voice muffled from being pressed into Cassandra’s shoulder. “You two keep talking about something being cool.”

“It is code for nothing at all!” Cassandra assured…nervously, voice pitching high, was she embarrassed about something? Her cheeks pinked as she pulled away from Ellie, patting the girl on the head in a motion that looked like she was going for nonchalance but um…well, failing, it was choppy and awkward.

“Well, it is code for nothing right now,” Cullen supposed, ”But in a few years…”

“Decades!” Cassandra snapped.

“You…you do realize we don’t necessarily have decades er, n-no offence-“

“Full offense! I am only in my thirties! I will have you know my great grandmother Genevieve Pentaghast gave birth at fifty-nine*—“ she immediately fell silent and turned very, very red.

Oh. Oh goodness.

Sera let out a loud, happy sounding scream as Ellie slapped both hands over her mouth, staring wide eyed at Cullen and Cassandra, and squealed.

Strangely enough, imprisonment was maddeningly dull to the point Solas lamented his interrogations were over. No one came any longer to question or barb him. No one came at all, save for the guards who brought him his meals that came at surprisingly regular intervals, and the one instance Marehis came down to speak with him. He’d…he’d been expecting more yelling, and foolishly there was some small part of him that said she must have returned to seek to smooth things out, talk things through—cast all blame from him and forgive him purely because of love, but that was as unrealistic as it was unworthy. Marehis was not some flighty love-struck fool, and he deserved every bit of her ire.

What he was wholly undeserving of, and still received, was her compassion—granting him permission to monitor the bond, and trying to take the blame from him, Ellie’s current struggles. It did make him feel better, that she would try to comfort him but…no. Ellie—Ellie would be living an entirely different life, she would not know the wonderful people she did now, but she would have known others—she had known Trevelyan. They would have had a life together, and she would not constantly be thrown into situation after situation that worked her to her very limits, tried and strained her until she snapped. He had given Corypheus the Orb. He’d stood idle by while the man carried out the assault on the Conclave. He had expected to walk over his ashes…it made him sick to think now Ellie’s ashes could well have been those he stepped on if things had gone to plan, and walked away from the destruction with his Orb, powered and ready to take down the veil.

His Orb that destroyed the temple, Marked her, made her a target for Corypheus to handle personally. None of this should be happening and it was, because of blind ambition and pride.

He was grateful he could monitor the bond again, it gave him something to do, and the peace of mind that he knew where Ellie was, how she was faring. And it was something of reprieve—that he got to vicariously experience her weekend, the love and rest, and recovery she felt so deeply it rang in her magic. There were times she felt empty, passive about it all, but the feeling did spark back up, come through again and he was glad of it. Happy for her, relieved. She was nearer come Sunday evening, in the tavern he thought, her exuberance so great since that morning that he knew she must be surrounded by the whole of her party, of those she cared about the entire day…he’d woken in the morning with his magic panged with the long-forgotten ache of missing his own father, drifted back to sleep and searched to find what made it think of the man that had passed Ages ago, before Solas even came to work in Mythal’s home. What he found was the Inquisitor’s party having taken over the kitchens after the breakfast rush—Ellie standing alongside Cullen and the duo mixing up batter for something with a great many blueberries in it, the girl dutifully following a recipe written out before them, asking the man about his ‘mami’ and why was her cooking considered a form of violence? Her recipe was ‘super’! Marehis was perched on a counter top with her chin resting on Sera’s shoulder, arms wrapped around the younger Elf who had been smiling as she watched the bit of chaos ensuing as the likes of the Iron Bull and Varric tried their hands at baking, the Qunari was surprisingly gifted at it, partnering with the Dwarf who had…the sort of baking abilities expected of the gruff, drunken author. Sera had been amused with the Dwarf and Qunari bickering over if they’d added the butter yet, when she paled and looked…looked directly at him—Solas. Glared in his direction and then looked around like she weren’t entirely sure what she was looking for or where it was.

“Da’vehnan?”

“Thought I saw…er…never mind,” the Elf girl sighed and turned to face Marehis, hugging the woman tight. “We’re gonna have fun today, yeah?”

“Certainly da’len.”

“I thought about um. What you said? I set up a thing with Elan,” the…the Healer? Was she ill? “Not ‘cause she’s Elfy, just, dunno. Feels weird going to a stranger but it feels even weirder going to someone I know pretty good.” Weir- oh. Oh he was glad she was going to seek some form of help with her panic. Marehis detailed the attack she’d had after Haven and Solas…he’d shared with the woman last week, the panic Sera experienced a few nights into their living in Skyhold—they’d been meditating together and Sera wanted to find places to explore in Skyhold—a bit of preparation so she could take Ellie exploring without fear of running into any places that were too dangerous to enter due to crumbling infrastructure or anywhere that she termed ‘scary’. They’d been walking the battlements and the girl lost her breath in the least pleasant way, could not catch it, became overwhelmed with how high up they were, and there wasn’t ‘any ruddy railing! Someone could fall!’ she nearly did, but Solas had had her, held her and coached her to breathe with him before she hyperventilated to a point of passing out while he quietly dipped into his magic to reach out and seek some communication with her own, instruct it to assist her, help her find calm again.

“Would you like me to go with you? I would not wish to intrude, but if you wanted me there…”

“Sandra said she’d go with me if I needed, and ‘sides someone has to stay with Inky-“

“Sweet girl, I would take the time for you—I’m going to Ellie’s appointment tomorrow, that is no more important than your own. There are a host of people capable of stepping in for me—if you want me there, I will be.”

“Kay. Yeah um, I’d like that.

Ellie let out a surprised squeak that got all Elves attention—Fade-hidden and those in the waking world alike. Solas looked to find the girl smiling despite herself as she tried to glare at Cullen—the man had gotten batter on his finger and wiped it on her nose, catching her by surprise and earning a giggly, admonishing, “Papi!”

He left them. His magic was merely…equal parts sentimental and jealous, wanting comfort and that bled into seeing Ellie with a father figure and making it wish for his own, and then jealousy of Cullen—that the man was able to be with her and enjoy a role Solas longed to return to, not take from the man of course, but share.

Even as it stood…still, there was ache in the bond—Ellie missing someone. Him. She missed him, and it was blessing and burden, he was thrilled she could still find it in herself to miss him, and hated that he could not go to her. He needed to fix this—part of that was complying with his imprisonment but it did not stop the constricting feeling like someone was holding him back from launching forward and actively doing something to make this right.

While he could not leave his cell…that did not stop him from receiving yet another visitor. In the Fade, late Sunday evening. He was meditating, sifting through the bond while Ellie slept to see if he could ensure she slept pleasantly—she’d done so without taking potion, she would Fade Dream and he did not…it had been horrible, she’d been so very frightened and heartbroken at whatever she witnessed in the Fade while on her own.

Though she was not on her own now, exactly. There was a painful press in the bond, like someone jabbingly poking at his magic with spite in mind—so he hunched forward, relaxed and sought sleep.

He woke in the Fade to Ellie seated across the bars from him ‘criss-cross applesauce’, arms crossed over her chest, sporting quite the impressive glare.

“I’m sure you have questions,” he offered.

“Uh-huh.”

And then she cried. Sobbed uncontrollably as she frustratedly tried to temper it—she had apparently come here to yell at him, but she was so upset, and hurt, and sad.

“I’m so mad at you!” she wailed once she could speak.

“Understandably.”

“I want to hate you—I really really do, and I can’t! And I hate that!” she cried, reiterating, “I am so mad at you!”

“I’m sorry.”

“You should be!” she sniffled, “I’m-I’m sorry too.” Whatever for? “I-I’m really sorry about Mythal, and your baby. Does it make you sad to be here? Er, Skyhold I mean.”

Does…does it make him sad? Was that her first question? “I lived some of my best times of my life here. It does not sadden me to return, I am glad it can serve as a safe home for you. You are safe here, Ellie, I swear it. The only sadness I feel in relation to Skyhold is that I did not offer it sooner. I should have, I see that now, it was purely my own efforts to not be caught out, have my past revealed, that kept me from offering it before—but this place is yours, to secure you, to do with what you see fit.”

Ellie nodded. “The Inquisition can really rebuild from here and it does seem a lot more um, sturdy than Haven. I’m glad you let us use it.”

“I do not think you understand da’vhehnan. Skyhold was mine, now it is yours, as in you personally. You allow the Inquisition to use it. I have no say in who domiciles here any longer.”

He had already made that plain with the Advisors, now that the truth was out there. There had been some concern in their council that Solas had dominion over Skyhold. He’d immediately given it over—to Ellie herself, she was his da’len despite everything he had done, and if she needed to cast him from this place as punishment when she sat in judgement over him, she was free to do so now—they would be secure in their claims to this place without him.

She stared at him a moment, and then, “Kay. Um. So…you really never met a Human before you woke up in our time?”

“No even once—I’d no idea such a entity existed da’vhehnan, I woke up and suddenly there were Dwarves and Qunari and Humans—it was mind boggling to say the least.”

“Oh gosh, I just about crapped my pants the first time I saw the Iron Bull! He’s the first Qunari I’ve ever ever seen! And I at least knew Qunari’s existed, had some context for what they would look like. That must have been scary for you,” she said. Then, “You must have been asleep a really long time.”

“Ages,” he assured her. “I went to sleep before they even began counting Ages.”

She looked dumbstruck by that, and yet, “Huh. I guess that’s why your accent’s so funny.”

“It is not ‘funny’-“

“It is too funny!” she argued cheerfully.

“I quite assure you my accent was once common among Elvhenan. Low born Elvhenan at least.”

“Really? I mean it’s funny as in ‘weird’ like I’ve never been able to place it, you’re the only person I’ve ever met who talks like you do. But it sounds super fancy to me."

“I assure you I sound like a yokel in comparison to a member of the Evanuris.”

“I’m sorry for what they did,” she offered. “Um. I don’t…it doesn’t make it better, but…it’s really sad, that must have been so scary for Mythal. But she’s the ‘all mother’ now, and people pray to her for help with babies and children all the time, and the way things seem to work, she gets to help! Her people go to those who pray, and help them. And um, mami, she used to pray to Mythal all the time, like every day when we did prayer time in Haven? And I dunno...like, I love Cremisius. If we ever broke up, or I died or something, I would still want him to be happy, find someone else and be loved, have a great life. So I figure Mythal feels the same way about you. So getting to know Marehis through prayer, and hear her praying for your safety, about the um, children in your life,” Ellie shrugged, “in a way, all of those things kind of give her the experience the Evanuris took away. Sorry, did any of that make sense?”

Was...was she punishing him with kindness? Was that the play she was taking with this? Come try her best to comfort him over something that happened Ages ago, that led him to do horrible things that affected her in the present day?

He had to clear his throat, “I believe it did. Thank you, Ellie. That is a comforting sentiment.”

She rocked her head side to side as she thought about further questioning and came up with, “You used to be a slave?”

“Yes. We were never beaten or starved or punished. We were cared for, and in return for that care, we worked together as a community to serve each other, and first and foremost, our masters. However that came with fulfilling their bidding—the Evanuris thought themselves gods long before the people of today claimed them as such. They would send us to war with one another over petty rivalry that could have been better settled with a reasonable conversation between the High Mages.”

“Did you ever have to fight?”

“No. Mythal never played into such nonsense, and she always held herself as a voice of reason to the others, stopped many rivalries before they started. However...there was one time, Falon’din had said something in passing—a rude remark that Mythal and Sylaise and Anduril should err...it was sexual in nature and demeaning, meant to disrespect the women in their ranks and instead of war per se, Mythal met this with the host of the women in the Evanuris sent all of their male slaves to Falon’din’s main estate to just stand and crowd his property. While in a state of undress.”

She gasped at that eyes alight with mirth as she asked, “Naked?!”

“As the day we were born. Thousands of us in his courtyard, his estate was not unlike Skyhold—”

She squeaked, giggly at the imagery of Skyhold’s courtyard filled with a sea of naked Elvehnan.

“Um, so you were in Mythal’s house?” she asked, “How did that happen? Did your parents work for her?”

Solas shook his head, ‘no’. “In truth, we come from albeit similar circumstance, da’len. It is a lack of parents that put me in Mythal’s house. I was born to Elgar’nan’s house, my mother was lost in warfare, my father passed after a counter attack for Elgar’nan poisoning Anduril’s people—she’d a very ‘eye for an eye’ mentality. Mythal took in all who found themselves orphaned in their youth, I joined her House in my twelfth year.”

“You were so little,” Ellie breathed, “It must have been hard, scary to start all over again all on your own in a new house. I’m sorry you lost your parents like that.”

“Mythal was kind, and all in her house had faced similar circumstance, we looked out for one another and could lean on each other for support.”

“That’s so good,” she smiled, relieved. “Did you like working in Mythal’s home—oh! Mami said you were a shepherd, and told me about your um, affinity with wolves,” she seemed shy as she said, “Thank you for saving me.”

“Of course, da’vehnan. I would always rescue you.”

She nodded, seeming uncertain what to say to that. She returned to, “So, you liked working in Mythal’s home?”

“I did, I found my work satisfying, peaceful. My life in her home was something of a dream state, there was hardly any strife with the other houses, I tended to fields, the flock of sheep she cared for, and found myself surrounded by friends and loved ones,” he did not wish to be cruel, but he did want her to understand, “Imagine your life now without Corypheus or threat of the Fade, demons, none of the dangers, just doing meaningful things that kept Skyhold running smoothly and safe, always with your family and friends. That was my life before Mythal’s death, before the Veil.”

“Gosh, I… I get you wanting to take down the Evanuris so very badly.”

“They took everything, everything good in the world—and not just for me, my experience is shared across all under their rule, there were few who truly prospered, lived lives wholly unaffected by the Evanuris’ cruelty. With Mythal gone…it was not purely vengeance I worked from, da’vehnan. She was the only one ever capable of protecting the people, with her gone? Power gets redistributed and there are wars over that—who gets her slaves, her lands? Who can lay claim to her magic? We did not have the Fade as we do now—now when a Mage dies their magic returns to the Fade. Then, it was more of a tangible resource that could be harvested. I took Mythal’s magic and hid it, and eventually it is the power I used to work the Orb of Destruction and create the veil, seal the Evanuris away forever.” At the time, he thought it was what she would have liked—having such a hand in stopping the Evanuris once and for all.

“That’s so insane—I mean it all sounds wild but I can’t believe you made this,” Ellie breathed, something caught between awe and quiet fright.

“It is why you are always safe with me here, da’len. Some demons have grown more powerful than what I can manage, but for the most part I…have a sense of domain. That is why I have such control over what I can witness in the Fade.”

“Oh,” Ellie chirped, “I guess that makes sense. I just thought it was experience or something, that eventually if I got old enough I could pick and choose what I experience here.”

“You can, when you enter the Fade with myself or…I assume Cole was with you when you laid down?”

Ellie nodded. “Yeah. He’s giving us space, but he said he…huh, he had to ‘let me in’,” she said. Then, “So…you made the Fade, and after seeing the consequences like ‘no more immortality’ and a loss of magical connection and stuff, you decided to undo it?”

“Yes. But it is… prison, it works with restraint, and time—time is so meaningless to us da’vehnan, when you are alive for long enough a decade passes like a minute, a hundred years is nothing. In order to truly inflict punishment and correction upon the Evanuris I had to make certain they felt the eons passing endlessly, something they would find themselves unable to endure so that upon their release they would be malleable, repentant and able to be corrected, controlled. So I went to sleep so I might live to reach an Age to bring them back.”

“You…used Mythal’s power to make the Orb do its thing before. You needed it powered up again?”

“Yes. Corypheus and I found one another, and I saw it as ample opportunity to revive the Orb and set things right—to what I thought was right at the time. He heard of its power, but he did not understand, could not comprehend—he sought to murder the Divine, believed the purity of her soul would be enough to power the Orb. He barely understands what he’s using, but of course I was counting on that—I did not intend for him to live after using it, I thought he would perish in the blast.”

Her chin quivered, “Did you know everyone was going to die?”

He hated this. Hated himself. “Yes. That… was the point, da’len. It- it was a meeting of Mages and Templars—all people who have magic in quantities big and small, they were meant to die, you were all meant to die, and the Orb being Elvehnan, it would keep your magic from being reabsorbed by the Fade, it would be attracted to it and power it adequately enough.”

“Adequately? There were hundreds of people Solas.”

“Mythal was a powerful woman. The Evanuris, they are not considered gods today because they were street magicians, Ellie. They had god-like power, beyond your wildest imaginings.”

“Are you sorry?” she asked quietly.

“Yes. I acted blindly, Ellie—that does not excuse what I did, but I do wish for you to know
I regret it now, trying to take down the veil. I already bungled the system so badly, caused so much pain for my own people, I did not need to doom us all to fix a mistake I made before recorded history.”

“Do you know how I ended up Marked?” Ellie asked.

“No. I can only surmise that you touched the Orb at a critical stage in powering it. What is on your hand is a power the Orb had—to close up the veil, and now the ability to tear holes in it.”

“What would you do if you had the Orb back? Would you kill a bunch of people trying to power it some more? Bring down the Veil? What would bringing down the veil do? You talk about wanting Spirits to walk alongside us but somehow I imagine there’s no ‘us’ in that equation.”

“That was a bit of wordplay. Spirits used to be Elvehnan—when they were corporeal, they walked this world,” he conceded. “I wished to make them so again. But I…I will admit I am not even certain bringing down the veil would make them so—they’ve no bodies to return to—” he shook his head, trying to get back into focus, such lines of thinking were pointless because, “I do not know what I would do with the Orb, Ellie, but I certainly would not use it. Hide it, destroy it, but I would never—I swear to you, never use it to bring down the Veil. I was willing to risk the unknown, but that is because there was so much here I did not know. In destroying the Evanuris I became no better than them, I see that now.”

Ellie nodded, quiet and contemplative. He did not want to disrupt her, but…oh he missed her, the bond was a blessed substitute, but a substitute all the same, ”You...you've had a pleasant weekend?” he asked.

"Huh? Oh! Yeah, it's been really great. We had like the best lazy day yesterday, I um, kind of needed a break. So, just a lot of relaxing, it was nice."

"Relaxing? You were terribly excited about something yesterday-" he cleared his throat, he was uncertain if Marehis had asked he be discreet about monitoring her, "your excitement was so great it spiked in the bond enough to be felt," which was truth.

"Yesterday? I mean it was great hanging out with everyone- oh! Do you mean Saturday?" He supposed so, so he nodded and she considered it, "Huh...oh! Sera and me, we were so excited because Mami's having a baby!" she announced gleefully, and Solas was so very startled he almost fell out of the Fade, back into consciousness- he- they- they had always been careful-

"M-Marehis-?"

"Oh! Gosh! Sorry sorry sorry! Cassandra! She isn't pregnant, just, um, she and papi are thinking about it in the future," she explained, oh thank the heavens. He- it would not displease him in the slightest, but this was hardly the time. "Sera thinks it's crazy Cassandra wants to risk all that heartburn, Cullen's hair is so wild we're positive he had to have been born with it."

"Heartburn is some indication of hair?" he wondered. A bit of masochism he supposed, Mythal had suffered a great deal of heartburn.

"Oh! It's a kind-of wives tale? People have lots of heartburn when their babies have lots of hair—but it's more like babies have lots of hair because their parent is making a lot of estrogen? Higher estrogen causes heartburn."

"I wish them happiness then, and um, a lack of heartburn, I understand it's rather unpleasant," Solas offered. "I'm glad you and Sera had such a fun weekend."

Ahh, mention of Sera set her questions back on track, "Why did you try to mage-ify her?"

“It was foolhardy of me, da’len—I will apologize to her if I am given the opportunity. You came to me already a mage, nurturing your magic is one of my greatest pleasures. When I discovered the potential Sera has for it, I thought it would be horrible, irresponsible to not encourage her magic like I would of any young Elvehnan I would come to care for before the Veil. She is so very scared of magic, so I thought it best to…there are many children who dislike eating their vegetables, I have seen people go to lengths such as hiding them within their meals so they eat them without their knowledge, before introducing them as something they might enjoy eating. So I encouraged her magic through training to do something she wanted, would find purpose in—to help with the Rifts and the Breach. Then I introduced the real thing, on a level she could perform. Gave her a taste for it to see if she might like it. I woke up her magic enough that she was capable of casting while under a great duress, wild magic, something any Elvehnan could be capable of if circumstances aligned and they were desperate enough.”

“Sneaking her magic veggies, huh?” Ellie posed the question with an edge to her voice, like the comparison was pathetic. “And all the secrecy because she’s afraid of magic? Isn’t that like, the exact reason not to do something like that to her? Solas! That was selfish, and horrible! She got hurt! And she didn’t want it! Do you understand that? What you did was wrong!”

“It was, and I am sorry.”

“You should be! That was so wrong! And you hurt Sera! She said it felt like it almost killed her!”

“It was, but I had no intention for her to be hurt—in her urgency she channeled magic through her own body, before fully opening her connection, I am so sorry that happened, believe me da’vehnan it killed me that she was injured.”

“You were disappointed she didn’t become a mage!”

“I was admittedly pleased at the prospect of her having access to her natural born right. I could ease her into magic-“

“Easing her into her magic?! Do you hear yourself? Do you even realize how crazy and manipulative you sound?!?”

“I only mean that if she’d wakened her magic, I was prepared to help her if-I thought I had pushed her too hard too soon, realized I was doing something dangerous, thought I had done something irreversible to her! If I had, I was going to take responsibility, help her find her footing with her newfound power, do all I could for her.”

“You shouldn’t have done any of it! It’s Sera’s life! If you’re so worried she should embrace her magic or whatever you should have talked to her about it! Been honest! If it freaked her out too much to pursue it—she shouldn’t pursue it!”

“I know, da’len that was an offer made purely to put her mind at ease-“

“Bullshit! You can’t just keep trying to push people to- Solas! I understand all Elv-Elvehnan were magical in your time but don’t you see you’re just trying to make the Elves in your lives like the ones you knew before?”

That…that wasn’t true. Was it? “I…I did not consider as much.”

Oh, the girl growled at him. “For an old-ass man you need to grow the hell up!” she shouted at him, "The people in your life aren’t yours to manipulate and control—they’re people! They’re going to do things and be things that don’t fit the picture perfect idea in your brain of what they could or should be! If you ever try to trick my Mami or Sera into magic again, I will make you regret it!”

It felt like a door slamming in his face. One instance she was there, seated before him, railing. The next she was gone, awake again, her outrage pulsating in the bond. In his urgency he chased after her, after a fashion—immediately found himself where she was in the waking world, in her quarters, her bed with Marehis, the girl gasping as she shot up in bed and Marehis was wakened in the same instance, resting a hand on her back as the girl caught her breath, “Da’vehnan? What is wrong?”

“Sorry, I’m okay, sorry can- can we just go back to sleep? I’m sorry I woke you up.”

“Sweetheart, stop apologizing, you need to calm yourself, your heart is pounding. Did you have a bad dream?” Ellie shook her head, and Marehis felt at her forehead, and then wrapped her arms around her to bring up blanketing with her, rubbing the girl's arm, "you're chilled. I'll make us some tea, take deep breaths,” Marehis instructed, rising from the bed to head for the fireplace, “—can you tell me five things you see?”

“The stars, my bed, my blankets, Anya, and my beautiful mami!”
Oh she was beautiful, blushing as she smiled softly at the compliment. She was beautiful, perfect and wonderful as she was— he did not need her to be a mage—his advice before, it had been purely for her own and Ellie’s benefit, had it not? He just…it was like with Skyhold. He did not wish to leave any loose ends behind—if they still wanted the benefit of someone being bonded to her, they should know they would have that ability, shouldn’t they? Had he seen something lacking in Sera? He thought her brilliant and sweet, and he’d lamented her upbringing, that Lady Emmauld had found her wanting and made her feel that, taught her she was—she was—! Sera was perfect as she was. Magical aversion and all. It had been wrong of him to try and change that—quelling her fear of it to give her a sense of security was one thing, thrusting magic upon her was another.

“I didn’t have a nightmare, I’m not scared or anything,” Ellie said as Marehis worked. “I um, kind of went to see Solas.”

“You visited him in the Fade?” Marehis asked levelly.

“Uh-huh. Are you mad? I wanted to talk to him on my own somewhere just…dunno, it seemed like the best place to do it without any outside pressure or interference, nothing that would have to be official or documented so we could get out anything messy without um totally screwing him later down the line.”

“He’s in a great deal of trouble da’vehnan. Did your talk reveal anything new?” Marehis wondered.

Ellie shrugged, flopping back against her pillow to stare up at the ceiling. “I don’t know what to do. I’m so mad at him, and I can’t believe the things he’s done. but he’s also done good things, and even though…I mean he could have just walked away from the Breach, from the Inquisition when he realized he couldn’t get the Mark from me. He could have tried to figure out how to handle Corypheus on his own—he’d have never gotten caught for the things he did. But he stayed, risked that—hid it, but still, it was a risk—to stay and help get rid of the Breach and stop the people that work with Corypheus,” she reasoned out, chin quivering as she pressed her hands to her eyes. “And he- I still love him, it’s so dumb!”

Marehis sniffled quietly, taking a deep controlled breath as she kept her back to the girl, “It is not dumb, da’len. It is normal. I…love him too.” She cleared her throat, and it wasn’t until the kettle she’d hung over the fireplace came to a boil that she turned to face her ward, brow creasing with worry when she saw the girl still despairing, and for a moment Solas forgot himself, that he was in the Fade—he opened his mouth to offer to see to the tea, let her go to the girl more quickly. But Maerhis was returned to her soon enough, seating herself before Ellie as she offered her a cup, “You will come to a decision on this—no one expects it of you overnight.”

Ellie sighed and sat up, “Thanks mami. Are you mad I went to see Solas?”

The woman hummed a bit as she considered it. "Well. I do appreciate you were honest with me, and it is your prerogative where you go in the Fade so long as you are safe.”

Solas sighed. He…he wanted to stay, to just be with them even if it was only through the Fade. But he had already disrespected their sense of privacy already.

He settled for staying in his cell and studying the bond. It was the closest he could be with those he loved, he did not expect he would be seeing any of them again until they decided to move forward. And that did not seem to be happening anytime terribly soon.

It wasn’t. And he still received another unexpected visit.

Ellie’s appointment had been trebulous, he’d felt her anxiety in the bond, followed by relief…and then shortly thereafter, anger spiked across the bond, outrage.

And then a little while later, she was back—not in the Fade, in the waking world, with Mister Aclassi er… It was his understanding in his absence, the Lieutenant’s father had arrived—it was Cremisius who joined Ellie as she descended the stairs to the cells, the girl was stamping her feet like perhaps she was working off some of the anger still thrumming in her. The Lieutenant, ever the dutiful boyfriend, was hefting rather the large sack over his shoulder for the girl, he set it down before Solas’s cell, leveled him a glare and assured, “I’ll be right outside the door, don’t try anything Wolf-boy or I’ll do more than black your eye.”
“Thanks for helping me, it’ll be fine,” Ellie assured him, popping up on her toes to kiss the Tevinter on the cheek. He nodded, and left them.

“Have you reached a decision?” Solas prompted.

“Nope! Don’t ask again, it makes my brain hurt—I’m just here to bring you some things and give you a heads up. I’m going to be going out of range of the bond for a while, on mission. We’ll be leaving in a bit, so don’t freak out if you can’t feel me anymore or something—I’ll be with everyone.”

“Mission?”
“Uh-huh,” was all she had to say about it.
“You brought me things?”
“Yup! Just…you know. Don’t get any ideas, I just…” she sighed, frustrated with herself and then she pulled open the bag the Lieutenant had brought down, sliding items through the bars—pillows and blankets, and a great many—oh. His books, study materials from his quarters. “Here. I don’t know how long we’ll be gone. So,” she shrugged.

“Thank you, da’vehnan. This is very kind,” he said. “Do, please be safe.”

Ellie nodded. “Thanks,” she said, turning to take her leave though, “Um. Hey Solas? I love you. I’ll see you when I get back, okay? We’ll figure this out.”

His throat felt tight, he almost feared she might leave before he could force the words through,

“I love you as well, da’vehnan.”

There was something, quiet ticking coming from something wrapped up within one of the blankets she’d given him.

She left him her wrist watch. She was allowing him to know the...the time, the date, mark its passage which somehow returned a bit of sanity being so timeless had picked away at. And with it, came a little scrap of her notepad paper torn away, saying Planning on being gone a week or so. You’ll be in the loop time-wise. We’ll talk when we get back. <3

He sighed as he settled in, it was a relief to have softer things to find purchase in, and his books. It was blessing to have something else to occupy his mind. He...losing connection in the bond, while it was different, than experiencing the loss through death, but still, it was largely unpleasant for him, for his magic, focusing on his studies would occupy his mind from the sensation, help him ignore it.

Though there was one thing more to occupy his headspace, to consider while Ellie and the others were away. He had one visitor more, before their party left.

She kicked the prison door open to hit the wall with a resounding bang.

“Alright baldy, you’re a fucking asshole, and I hate your stupid guts!”

“S-Sera,” Solas cleared his throat, setting his book aside and rising to his feet as she stomped up to his cell door. “I am so s-”

“Sorry, yeah yeah yeah, blah blah blah—can it!” Sera growled, "We're ruddy leaving in an hour and and and and." she stomped her foot with frustration as she very frustratedly screamed the very last thing he expected to hear,

"I need your friggin' help!"

Mother Giselle was officially a bitch in Ellie’s book. She’d felt badly when she called her that in the Fade with Envy, but nope! It was a thing!
The absolute nerve!
She pulled Ellie aside in the Great Hall after she was done with her appointment with Adan, she...she felt a lot better about things. She wasn’t going totally crazy, yeah she had a lot of hormone whiplash and trauma, and guilt, and it had just been grinding her down and she’d felt so ungrateful—like it was horrible of her to feel that way because she had so much good in her life! Cremisius had cautioned her about being open and honest about suicidal thoughts and things, but he’d…he’d felt like that when he had so many awful things happening in his life, she felt so dumb when she talked to him about her own experiences, but he’d just held her close as they walked the battlements and pressed a kiss to her head, listened and understood. “You don’t have to have a miserable life to be miserable, love, that’s not how depression works. You’ve got a lot of good around you, but you’ve been through a lot—whatever you need, I’m here.” He was the best.

And Mother Giselle was the worst! Anyway! After her appointment, Mother Giselle waved her over and was going on about Dorian. Again. It turned out she’d been in contact with his parents! His father at least. And that— that jerk! He’d sent a ‘retainer’ that just sounded awful! Like he wanted to hurt Dorian, take him home by force! His father had wanted Mother Giselle to make it so Dorian would go to the Hinterlands, meet this retainer—without informing him beforehand! She thought the best way to do that was to have Ellie trick him—which was a big, big nope!

Ellie tattled to Dorian right away, and she was taking him to the Hinterlands, alright! Meet that retainer, and dare him to try and touch a single hair on Dorian’s head with Ellie standing there! Oh she was going to fight so many people!

Try to kidnap her best friend?! Freaking bring it!

Dorian chuckled when Ellie let out another frustrated huff as she tightened up the straps of Russel’s saddle, the Tevinter patted her on the head—it was kind of nice, made her wonder if that was why Anya liked being petted. “I like your energy, but maybe save it for the retainer.”

“If you want me to go in swinging, I will. I’ll punch him so many times!”

“Maybe try talking to the guy first, Imekari,” the Iron Bull suggested as he offered Dorian a hand, helped him into Bitsy’s saddle before climbing in after him.

Oh well. At least the Iron Bull was here—everyone was here! A big big group going together! Both-Aclassi’s big!

Everyone in Ellie’s party was coming except for currently imprisoned papis. And non-imprisoned papi’s but Cullen didn’t go with them usually anyway. Marehis was coming too! And the Chargers—Bull and Thom’s men—they had an Inquisition mission! They were joining them, at least part of the way to the Hinterlands. Once they got to where the road forked between there and Haven, the Chargers would head there®, to survey the damage done, set up a memorial in honor of those they lost, and see if there was anything or…or anyone they could get out of there. Ellie…she was pretty sure everyone who had been alive at the time when they gathered in the Chantry, had made it out, but part of her was really really scared that…what if there’d been someone still trapped when she caused the avalanche? Or injured—looked dead but really hadn’t been? If she’d killed her own people-

Arms swooped her up in a great big hug! Sera! “Inky! Cole says you’re thinking hurty thoughts! Stop it! Don’t make me get squeezy!” the Elf girl threatened pressing an enthusiastic kiss to Ellie’s head.

Oh, that made her giggle, and she felt it! Felt how much she loved Sera, how amused she was, “Thanks, sorry—overthinking, I’m okay.”

Sera set her down, “All good, innit?”

“You’re all ready now? I put your pack on Russel, is that okay?” Ellie asked, Sera’d been very pacye when Ellie went to go pack after talking with Solas—Mami and Sera had been busy so Cremisius went with her to see him. Sera was all set to go, and said she wanted to help her pack, but she’d mostly paced, just about worn a path in the floor walking back and forth while Ellie and Marehis packed up, and then she let out a little growly sound and announced she had to ‘friggin do something!’ and stomped off without her things.

“Sweet, thanks Ink. Am I riding with you, or are you going with Kremmy-boy?”

“You can ride with me if you want—Cremisius isn’t sure how his father will do on his own, we’re pretty sure he’s never ridden a horse before.” Mister Aclassi was coming to the Hinterlands too, since it wasn’t for something super dangerous, and he would like to meet his suppliers in person, have a genuine rapport with them, and get to lay eyes and hands on the things he was going to use, fabrics and the like to make sure it was what he was going for, for Ellie’s fancier things. And it was kind of a baby-step—Ellie’d felt so badly that Cremisius would have to leave so soon after being reunited with his father, and Mister Aclassi was so nervous about his son going off, doing a dangerous job, but his first time leaving Skyhold he’d get to go with him, at least part-way, and they’d be back together even faster since Cremisius was going to join them once the Chargers were done in Haven. They’d be in the Hinterlands a few days, touching base with the refugees, checking in on Castle Recliffe to make sure it was still Rift-less, and just having a little fun. Like a working-vacation! Papi was very jealous he couldn’t come.

“Please be safe—you’ll write me, yes?” Cullen asked as he came to say goodbye, hugging Ellie tight tight tight!

“Uh-huh!” she promised.

“Good—be good for your mothers and have lots of fun,” he intoned.

She smiled a bit, “I mean, I can either be good or have lots of fun…”

That made the man grin, “I know—just my fatherly duty to at least pretend to encourage you to behave,” he winked mischievously as he conpired, “You keep your mamis on their toes.”

“You got it!”

“Commander Rutherford, I heard that!” Cassandra reprimanded him as she joined them.

“Hmm, did you? Oh no, I do so hate enraging you-“

“This is hardly the time for such nonsense. We are leaving,” Cassandra sighed, “and I will miss you. Keep me appraised.”

“To the weather? Inquisition business-“

“To your wellbeing you horrible man!”

“I will, and I will miss you too,” Cullen promised, and Cassandra smiled even as she held up a hand to cover Ellie’s eyes, the girl giggled because she knew they were kissing, she could just turn around if she really didn’t want her seeing, it was silly!

Anya yipped for attention, her tail wagging excitedly—she got lots of goodbye pets and kisses from Cullen—she was so pumped! It was her first official mission! She’d trained so good, and her test run had extended from just an afternoon facing the Breach to full on week long journey to Skyhold, so, she was ready…but gosh Ellie was nervous about taking her out. Just- she was just a baby! A strong baby that could tear the throat out of a grown man with her teeth—but that still has the word ‘baby’ in it!

Everyone saddled up and ready, they were on the road. Anya trotting along…there was a running bid on just how long she would whine to be let up to ride along. Awe, Mister Aclassi looked so cute! That probably wasn’t what he was going for—but Cremisius had insisted the man wear something protective so he was in Inquisition scout armor, and he was so out of his element in it, but it did seem to help when Lady Josie came to say goodbye, hugging Ellie and wishing her well, and uhh,

“Oh! Mister Aclassi! I almost did not recognize you!” Josie said, smiling warmly as she reached out and took his hands, “You look very handsome in armor—both Aclassi men, you’re quite the dashing pair.”

“You’re too kind, my lady,” Tonio said.

“Do have a pleasant time in the Hinterlands and be safe.”

“Thank you.”

He did look very handsome, but he’d never worn armor before—he needed so much help getting into the saddle! But it was nice, he got to ride along, seated in front of Cremisius, it was nice to be little spoon in the saddle—it was like a constant hug!

Mmm, Sera was very into hugging today, Ellie ended up holding Russel’s reigns even though usually the person in back was in charge, but Sera just wrapped her arms around Ellie, just squeezing, humming quietly.

“Are you comfy, Mister Aclassi?” Ellie asked, horseback riding could be very hard if you weren’t used to it.

“Good mission ahead, fresh air, with my papa and my girl—comfy as hell, lovely,” Cremisius assured with a wink—oh he knew what she meant!
“Not you, gaupo, don’t be a mister smarty pants!”
Tonio chuckled at that, answering, “I am well, bella. Comfortable. Nervous, but Cremisius’s horse seems a pleasant sort. I am excited to see the Hinterlands.”
Well, it’d take a little while longer, that was one not-pro about their move, they were further from the Hinterlands, but they made good progress. It was amazing how much ground you could cover when you had a smallish group and everyone was on horseback—even resident warrior pups because Anya did her very best the first three hours and then she started whining for her papi Cremisius to let her up, sweet baby!
They stopped for the evening to take in dinner and rest up—they’d split up in the morning, but for now—camp party! Felt that way with all the Chargers around. Sera wasn’t picking up the spirit really, she was kind of quiet today except for the humming and occasionally asking Ellie how she was feeling, which was sweet but um...kind of smothering? She shouldn’t have told mami and the Iron Bull about how she’d been feeling in front of Sera, it was dumb, of course she would be freaked—Ellie’d be way way way beyond worried if it were the other way around, gosh if Sera ever-
Oh. She didn’t like that at all, Sera feeling er...that way, like she deserved to die or something. That kind of helped. Anyway, Sera just, wasn’t acting super normal.
“Hey Ser? Is everything okay?” Ellie asked the older girl quietly as they were gathering up kindling for the Iron Bull’s bonfire.
“Huh?” Sera asked distractedly, then, “Yeah, sure sweets. You’re okay?”
No worse for wear than she’d been when Sera asked five minutes ago, “I am, but I’m asking about you—are you feeling badly or something?”
Sera was quiet for a moment and then, “’m’okay, but um, I kind of have a headache? You got potion for that, right?”
Oh ouch, yeah she kept some of her headache potion in her field bag. She held the kindling she’d been gathering up close to her chest with one arm so she could raise her unmarked hand to feel at Sera’s forehead for fever, she didn’t feel warm—that was good! But she looked kind of miserable, awe, “Gosh, I’m sorry—yeah Ser’, go ahead, my field potions bag is on the ground by Russel, help yourself!”
“Thanks, Ink.”
“I got this—drink some water and go ahead and take half a bottle of potion, if it isn’t working beyond the initial burst of relief after five minutes, take the rest—you should lay down while it kicks in, I’ll check on you when dinner’s ready. Mami’ll probably lay down with you if you want!”
“I shouldn’t leave you—“
“It’s fine—I’m in earshot of like half of everyone we have with us, and Cole’s always around. Go on, please? I’d feel just awful if you got sick.”
Sera sighed, “Kay,” and then to the air, or well, Cole, “Cuddly! You come watch Inky!”
“I’m here! I’ll help you Ellie—here,” Cole offered as he materialized, taking the bundle Sera had in her arms and then turning to do the same of Ellie’s, “I am being a gentleman! Lady Josie is teaching me!”
Oh! That was sweet, “Thank you, Mister Cole!”
“You are welcome, Mister Ellie!” he returned enthusiastically, oh he was the cutest! He was really trying!
Sera snorted at his fumble, but, “You’ll get the hang of it Cuddly,” she assured kindly, reaching out to squeeze his shoulder as she left.
“Is Sera okay?” Ellie asked him quietly when she thought the older girl might be out of earshot, “Is there anything I can do?”
“Everyone’s been very loud today, it is hard to sort through. Dorian is scared about meeting the retainer, it frightens him that there is even the smallest chance he might be captured and sent back to his parents’ home. The Iron Bull and Vivienne and you are all worried for him.
The Iron Bull is nervous about something, he wants to talk to you about it, he just isn’t sure he should—he will not tell you if you go to him, let him come to you, it will help if you settle things with Dorian and have some down time in the Hinterlands. Marehis hurts over Solas, she is worried about you and Sera, and Cassandra is worried about leaving Cullen, he is investigating the Red Templar leader, he might know him and that makes him sad. Mister Aclassi is scared to see Cremisius go tomorrow, he does not want him to get hurt. Varric is still feeling badly for Hawke—keeping him a secret from Cassandra, he dislikes that he has hurt her. Thom is the least quiet of everyone, which is strange, because he is usually the loudest. He does not hurt so much anymore,” Cole rattled off as they collected more kindling, Ellie let him, he usually couldn’t help it, and even if he could…well it was helpful to know how she could help. “I think she is worried about you, she’s never traveled with you without Solas there. It makes her nervous. She wants to know how you are, how you’re feeling, stay patient with her and be honest with her.”

Kick the retainers butt…maybe go to Tevinter, kick Dorian’s parents butts! Let the Iron Bull come to her…which was funny considering he’d been coming to her for this daily thing of hoisting her up in a hug. Maybe she should give Mister Aclassi extra hugs. Mami too—boy troubles needed cuddles, weather it was your son going off to do potentially dangerous work, or your ex-boyfriend was a Dalish god. Talk to Varric and Cassandra. Be honest with Sera. She could do that.” “Thanks Cole.”

The Spirit nodded, “Come on, Krem is getting nervous how long kindling is taking—the others too but he wants to sit with you, he will miss you when he goes to Haven.”

Ellie nodded but first, “Wait— you said what everyone else needs, what about you? Are you okay? You got to say goodbye to Maryden, right?”

The Spirit smiled serenely at that, “Oh, yes. We miss each other, but I am not sad or hurting. I know she is safe and we will be very happy when I return to Skyhold,” he informed her.
Then, “Thank you, Ellie. For thinking about me. I am sorry I was so angry with you,” he said as they started the walk back to camp.

When had Cole been mad at her? “Did I do something?” she worried.

“You saved Rhys and Evangeline. Oh! But that was not why I was mad—I was angry you tried to find them for me when I said they were better off without me. But you found them anyway, the Inquisition did because you asked, and found out they were in trouble—you saved them, and I am so very happy you did. So I am not mad anymore.”

“Oh gosh, I just asked Leliana if they could find them so you could talk to them, Walker* did everything—tracking them down and arranging their rescue.”

She might not have done any of the heavy lifting, but she still got a kiss on the cheek! Cole was sweet—she hadn’t even realized he’d been upset with her and that kind of bothered her, he was one of her best friends, she should have known they’d had an issue but…well, Cole wasn’t the sort to get in someone’s face over something he was upset about.

He did want to sit with her—the moment she and Cole returned with Kindling, Cremisius was seated with his father and he just smiled so! Gosh he was handsome! He reached out and took Ellie’s hands, but she didn’t sit with him, she didn’t want to get too comfortable before checking, “How’s Sera?” Ellie asked, she didn’t see her so hopefully she did really go rest. She might lay down with her—neither mami had, Maerhis and Cassandra were sitting with everyone.

“The dear girl was poorly so she’s lying down,” Madam de Fer verified, awe, she even looked kind of concerned for Sera—that was progress!

“She wanted to be alone,” Cassandra said, “we said we would check on her when dinner is prepared.”

Alone huh? Ellie got that, Sera always emphasized alone time being important. So, she joined everyone—even though Anya was a little seat stealer! Cremisius was sitting on one end of a fallen log he and the Iron Bull had hauled over, between his father, and sneaky little Anya had hopped up to lay across the other side, head resting on her front paws though she did look up to Ellie and ‘wuff’ like she wasn’t doing a thing in the world!

But that was fine, Cremisius chuckled when Ellie stuck her tongue out at the pup and pulled her in to sit on his lap, and Ellie coughed quietly to cover her surprised gasp—was he wearing something different? She never really noticed his socks until they came tumbling out of his underthings. They were more of a comfort thing for him, but whatever he was wearing now was um...just a bit more noticeable, “Everything all good?” he asked. With her seat, or with life? Either way,

“Uh-huh.”

“Mmm, good,” he said, smiling against her hair as he wrapped his arms around her, was it weird that somehow made her feel safer than the armor she was wearing?

She was going to miss him tomorrow—it wasn’t like they’d never gone separate places for work, but still. Being back in Haven for so long, facing the Breach, the journey to Skyhold, it would be weird to wake up to a day Cremisius wasn’t in.

But he was in this day, and it was nice. Sera too! She joined them once it was time to eat. Dinner was actually really good. Oh! Not that the Iron Bull was a bad chef, gosh, he was the best, just...yeah, she guessed she had been more depressed lately. She hadn’t been very hungry, nothing appealed, nothing had any taste, it was weird! It was crazy she could have some of the best food she’d ever been offered in her life at her disposal, and not want any of it. Talking about how she’d been feeling, just saying it and being heard had helped so, so much. Tonight, she enjoyed every bite, and listened, and just drank it all in. Everyone was chatty and lively, Sera seemed to be feeling a lot better now, and Cremisius was joking along with her—had the Elf girl shooting water out of her nose! Cleansing, and hilarious. Oh, she was so glad Sera seemed to be feeling better!

Could have done with less giggling—not that she didn’t like Sera being happy, just- gah! Madam de Fer didn’t have a replacement for her tent yet, so they were all either camping out in the open or sharing Inquisition tents. Since they were so little, Sera and Ellie bunked together in one, but the Elf girl was super giggly over it all, like she was up to something—and she was!

Cremisius took first watch with Thom and some of the other Chargers, Anya would probably sleep outside, right now she was keeping watch too, and it sounded like Mister Aclassi stayed up for a bit—Ellie saw them chatting when she turned in. Ellie volunteered to take second watch with Sera but she woke up to more giggling from her and someone wrapping their arms around her middle, mmm Cremisius had slid into her bedroll and Sera said, “Cuddly’ll keep watch with me, you get some more shut-eye or,” she snorted, way too pleased with herself, “whatever, kay Ink?”

Sneaky! The sneakiest!

Ellie sighed, turning to face Cremisius, resting more against his chest—it was so nice he was used to it now, he smiled and sighed contentedly, holding her closer. It’d startled him the first time she curled up against him when he wasn’t binding, he’d taken off his armor while helping her study, and she’d just sat with him like normal, and it took him a second to realize it was normal, they always sat together like that, it wasn’t any different. She liked the sturdy support against her back or under her head when he was binding, but she also liked how warm it was to lay like this, strong muscle, softer tissue, it was just him, and she loved it.

“Cremisius?”

“Yeah lovely?”

“I’ll miss you tomorrow,” she said.

He nodded. “I’ll miss you too.”

“Can you do something for me?”

“Anything.”

“Will you be honest with me? About everything you find in Haven?”

He sighed and thought on it a moment, rubbing her back, “Of course. It’s all gonna be okay honey, you did what you had to do. You saved everyone that got into the tunnel, and I mean you scoured Haven pretty thoroughly,” had she? She’d just kind of been panicking it felt like, running all over the place with no clear sense of direction except ‘oh no, I think I hear my friend yelling for help’. What if there were people who couldn’t yell? “We’ll get through it, okay? You did good, and so many people survived because of it. That’s what’s important,” he reminded her, pressing his lips to the top of her head. “Don’t think about it anymore. Put some happy thoughts in your head and try to get some rest. You’ll get to check in on all the Refugees—there’s even toys to hand out this trip. And papa’s excited to meet his suppliers, and you might get to beat up on some assholes trying to mess with Dorian—you love beating up assholes that mess with your friends. It’s your favorite kind of violence,” she giggled at that, could feel him smiling against her hair.

“Anya’s never seen the Hinterlands before, she’s gonna have a major blast with all the fields, and streams, and nugs to chase,” he went on, okay, he was definitely trying to lull her to sleep, voice dipping lower, cresting softer over his lips, hand massaging at her back.

Woke up with his hand on her butt—but that was normal too, when they fell asleep together. Had his other hand on the crown of her head, just his subconscious ‘protecting the goods’ he called it—the brain and the booty.

The Chargers took off after breakfast. Not before Ellie got a very sweet goodbye kiss, and Cremisius got the tightest hug from Tonio, Ellie was pretty sure Cullen’s hugs were shorter,

“You will be safe?” Tonio questioned him, not relinquishing his hold.

“Always am, papa.”

“And- and you make regular contact on away missions, the Iron Bull tells me. You will do that?”

“Yup, s’what the big lug pays me for.”

“Are you sure you’ve had enough to eat-”

Cremisius chuckled, patting his father on the back as he pulled away, “Yeah papa, we’re all set—it’ll be all good. Once we’re done I’ll catch up with you guys. Go, make some good connections, and have fun. Watch out for Ellie for me?” What?! She already had like, all the adults she knew in life looking out for her. But she guessed it made Mister Aclassi feel better—like it was something he could do for Cremisius, a way to help his son. So. Eh. More the merrier, she was down a papi anyway.

“Certainly.”

Sera and Ellie tackle-hugged Cole—he volunteered to go with the Chargers partly because he was really feeling the angst Mister Aclassi felt at Cremisius going off, and the relief he felt at the idea that someone like Cole would be with him, and Ellie was glad he’d have someone joining him on the journey to the Hinterlands. And Cole might be able to get into places the Chargers couldn’t to recover things from snow-buried buildings, from Haven’s Chantry.

“You be safe, Cuddly, you got it?” Sera intoned.

“I will be!” Cole promised.

Anya was such a papi’s girl! Like mama like daughter she guessed. The pup whined at Cremisius when he started leading the Charger’s away, and he had to give her lots of pets and a firm ‘Parshaara,’ so she would stop trying to follow him, and make a promise of sneaking her treats and taking her for a good run when he got back, but she has to stay with her mama—they couldn’t focus on the task at hand if they had to keep track of Anya, they weren’t entirely certain what the avalanche would have left behind for them to look through either, they didn’t want her getting lost or hurt.

Cassandra let Mister Aclassi ride with her the rest of the way, it was really sweet to hear them chatting, mostly about the Tevinter boy. She loved that her mamis and Cullen all loved Cremisius so much. And the Iron Bull let him read any field reports he got—getting them meant everything was cool, and they’d be marked differently if there was an emergency, so he put off reading them until the end of the day and would claim his eye was tired, that since his Lieutenant wasn’t there to take up the slack, his papa could do it for him, and Mister Aclassi would quietly read Cremisius’s reports out loud to him. All in all, Skyhold added half a day’s travel to their old routine of getting to the Hinterlands. Which wasn’t bad—they had their routine, and Ellie wasn’t all alone when she meditated, she thought she should still keep up the practice even if she didn’t have Solas around. But Sera joined her—Vivienne did too sometimes—but every single night Sera made a point of reminding Ellie they should take some time to meditate after dinner, which was really sweet of her. Dorian was always invited, but he wasn’t really feeling it this trip. Gosh he was “We’ll go meet your father’s retainer first thing, okay?” Ellie said, sitting next to Dorian by the campfire their first night in—the lake-side camp was a favorite spot for them so they’d made their way there when they arrived. It was just a short jaunt down to the Cross-Roads and up to Redcliffe, if they took Russel, they’d make it in no-time. It…it was just going to be them—they’d thought it through, talked about it, and Mother Giselle was to bring Dorian to the retainer, she’d only been in contact with Dorian’s parents through her poking around into his background, her concern for his association with Ellie. But the Gull and Lantern didn’t exactly have great sight-lines, it wasn’t like anyone would really see them coming, as long as he showed up seemingly alone, or with just one person, and a small one at that, the retainer wouldn’t get spooked and run off before they could be spoken with, and sent away. But it scared Ellie, that she was going to be the only one to help him if things turned violent—she would kill for Dorian, like full on, plan and execute an actual murder for him—but she’d feel horrible if she wasn’t able to protect him, if he got hurt of taken. Thankfully, they would be given a head start and then the others would be along and arrive separately, hopefully they’d have backup if they needed it.

“Well, I mean breakfast is the most important meal of the day or some such rot. We’ll have to eat first thing. And then we really should brush our teeth…and you know morning is the ideal time for chess matches—“

“You once threw a mug at the Iron Bull’s head for asking how you slept, too early in the day. You insisted no thinking was allowed before noon.”

“You believe I need to think to play chess? How quaint—“

Ellie reached out and rested a hand over Dorian’s. She was scared, but so was he. “Hey. It’s going to be okay. I will actually destroy anyone that tries to harm a hair on your head, if your parents want you back, I’ll fight them. The sooner we deal with this, the sooner its off your back and your parents get our very polite, eloquent, ‘fuck off’.”

Dorian barked a laugh at that, “Good heavens! The Hearld of Andraste, telling Magister Pavus to fuck off?” he shook his head, squeezing her hand, “Oh, Ellie. I do adore you. Thank you—I know you’re going through something right now, I am regretful my business has fallen into your lap—“

“It isn’t your fault—Mother Gisselle should have minded her own business, if anyone is to blame for this, it’s hers for going behind everyone’s backs and giving your parents access to you,” Ellie said, “And we’ll have lots of fun once this is over and…um…I dunno,” she shrugged, “being busy helps? Being with everyone, and doing good things, things that help, helps.”

Dorian nodded, “I am pleased to hear as much, but Ellie…there is a difference between taking ones mind off of ones problems, and ignoring them altogether. Er, avoiding your unpleasant thoughts doesn’t make them go away. You need your thinking to change, that only comes with…well, thinking,” and then, over his shoulder, “did I explain that correctly? I refuse to memorize your psychological vocabulary, I’ve a refined lexis palate, and their mouth-feel is simply atrocious.”

“You’re a real bastard, Pavus,” the Iron Bull grumbled from his tent

“Oh, if only. We would not be here if I were, by definition, a bastard,” Dorian said, looking to Ellie, “I was worried, about you taking up my bit of a quest when you’re struggling. I had the thought last night that you should be reminded to focus on repairing your train of thought, Bull fed me some jargon to help me explain, but it apparently didn’t stick—the problem isn’t that you are alive, Ellie. Your little sermon—all things are finite? People are finite as well, and world-altering situations will always find a way to have the needed roles filled. If it was not you in Corypheus’s line of fire, it would be another. You are not the problem. You are, in fact, as you’ve proven again and again, acting as a solution. We’ll stop him.”

Ellie sniffled, sitting up on her knees to hug him, “You’re the best, and I’m punching the retainer in the face! Just wham, as soon as we see him!”

She…did not do that. While it would be super easy—they’d been expecting to walk into a busy Gull and Lantern only to find it empty—the person they were meant to meet was the only one present. But the second she saw his eyes as he stepped into view, called Dorian’s name, well, she didn’t need her friend to confirm,

“Father,” Dorian greeted hollowly. “So. The whole story about a ‘family retainer’ that was some kind of what? Smoke screen?”

“Then you were told,” his father sighed, looking to Ellie then, at her Marked Hand, “I apologize for the deception, Inquisitor. I never intended for you to be involved.”

“Of course not. Magister Pavus couldn’t come to Skyhold and be seen with the Dread Inquisitor. What would people think?” Dorian sniped. “What is this exactly, father? Ambush?
Kidnapping? Warm family reunion?” he sneered.

Magister Pavus sighed, “This is how it has always been.” Like this was Dorian’s fault!

“He has a right to be angry—you tried to trick him here,” Ellie defended, “He has every right to be furious.”

“You don’t know the half of it!” Dorian assured her, “But maybe you should.”

“Dorian, there is no need to-” his father tried to interrupt.

“As you well know, I prefer the company of men. My father disapproves.” Yeah, he’d not gotten super into it, but she’d gotten the gist his parents weren’t thrilled and disowned him or something for it, or made him miserable or scared enough to run away—which was dumb of them!

“You alienated your son because of who he loves? I think you’ve got it confused—Dorian’s your son. You have to love him. He’s a man—but he doesn’t have to love women. That’s not how that works.” She had to physically stop herself from herself from saying ‘the Maker put the prostate where it is for a reason’ at least on people born with penises. It was normal to be attracted to people born equipped to work with that! “This is seriously what this is all about?
You’re trying to what? Kidnap him so you can whisk him back to Tevinter and force him to marry some girl?”

“I wouldn’t doubt it,” Dorian spat. “You’ve no idea the lengths he-“ “Dorian, please, if you’ll only listen to me-“ Magister Pavus started.

“Why? So you can spout more convenient lies?” Dorian looked to Ellie—oh she was throwing hands! Magister Pavus was getting punched! Dorian looked almost sick, frustrated tears welling up in his eyes, that counted as making her friend cry in her book. “He taught me to hate blood magic. ‘The resort of a weak mind.’ Those are his words.” he railed, “but what was the first thing you did when your precious heir refused to play pretend for the rest of his life?” he asked.

“You tried to change me.”

…ch…change? Like use blood magic to change him? Make him- not like men anymore?
Or make him compliant, unable to voice his ‘wants’ any longer?

How exactly did they need to stage the room to make it look like self-defense? Dorian would alibi her, right? An accident would work too. Was it believable that Ellie was just getting her boot knife out to let it get some air and accidentally tripped into Magister Pavus like, five times?
She was very clumsy, no court in the land would convict her!

“I only wanted what was best for you-“ the Magister tried.

“You wanted what was best for you!” Dorian accused, “For your fucking legacy!
Anything for that!”

Dorian is hurting, badly. Do you need help? Cole! Oh, he was here!

Cole, is there anyone else here with us? In the Gull and Lantern? Do you know if Magister Pavus has anyone in Redcliffe with him to attack us or anything?

Hmm…no. No he is alone. He is hurting too. He is sorry for what he tried to do to Dorian, regrets that he hurt his son, that he sent him off and drove him into such a dangerous life. He wants Dorian to go home with him because he is scared for him. He wants with everything to make things right.

Okay. So maybe she’d hold off on murder conspiracies…for now. It was so, so incredibly wrong, what Dorian’s father tried to do, but if he…if he really understood that…was sorry and would never do something like that again…maybe he’d learned. Now he just wanted to protect his son. If Dorian was game to give him a little foothold back into his life, that was his choice to make, but…well he was a bit angry, and hurt right now, so much so he obviously wasn’t considering it. But…the resort of a weak mind, he’d said that before. Dorian, he’d said that when he first joined them, when Vivienne barbed him with questions about if they needed to worry about him being a Tevinter mage, if he might use blood magic. And she knew he had his heraldry necklace—he’d only sold it because he desperately needed the money and…and it was the very, very last thing he sold, he’d held onto it until he absolutely had to give it up, and then the very moment he got the opportunity to get it back, he did.

Dorian was at the bar, leaning against it sort of catching his breath, or maybe he was just trying to control his breathing so he didn’t blow up any more or cry or something. Ellie joined him and offered, “Hey. You got a lot off of your chest. You have every single right in the world to walk away from this right here, and right now, never speak to him again, but um…I’m kind of going through my own papi issues—“

“With a man that practically framed you for terrorism and treason and was willing to let you be executed for his crimes?”

“Uh-huh. I’m pissed, and I don’t know that I’ll ever forgive him…but he’s gotten to explain himself a bit, and I plan to talk to him more when we get back, to see how we can move forward,” Ellie said. “Tevinter is a long way away. You don’t know when you’ll see him again—I think you might regret not hearing what he came here to say, because no matter what, if you don’t know, you’re always going to wonder what he wanted. And eventually you’ll regret never truly finding out.”

Dorian sighed, before offering another thing he’d said to her before, “You’re a disgustingly intelligent little thing aren’t you?” he asked resignedly with a wink before he stepped back from the bar and approached his father. “Tell me why you came.”

“If I knew I would drive you to the Inquisition…” the man tried to explain but seemed at a loss, he clearly hadn’t expected Dorian to actually hear him out.

“You didn’t,” Dorian said. “I joined the Inquisition because it’s the right thing to do. Once, I had a father who would have known that.”

Magister Pavus seemed urgent then, afraid Dorian might leave, “Once I had a son who trusted me. A trust I betrayed,” he found his words then, “I only wanted to talk to him. To hear his voice again. To ask him to forgive me.”

Dorian looked…well he kind of looked like he could use a hug…maybe from his father? She reached out and took hold of his hand, “Hey, I’m gonna go touch base with the others, they’re here. Mister Aclassi wants my opinion on fabric and things, we’ll be a while.”

“I’ll join you shortly.”

Ellie smiled and then looked to Magister Pavus to offer a polite nod, but still, “It wasn’t great meeting you!” she offered in farewell. Whoops, Dorian made a sort of choking sound at that. She was glad they were going to talk things out. Stepped out to give them a little bit of privacy, and ended up securing them even literally bigger privacy because mister Qunari ears was listening in! She almost broke her nose running into him as she exited the tavern!

“Ow!”

“Shit, sorry Imekari,” the Iron Bull rumbled out, raising his hand up under her chin to raise her face to him while she rubbed at her nose.

“And I forgive you!” she assured him, he was just worried for Dorian. But he would be okay, so she took the Iron Bull’s hand, “Come on, stop being a nose-breaking nosey pants and come help me shop. Papa’classi is here right? Meeting suppliers?”

He was! Oh gosh it was so good to see him seeming so in his element, he was chatting away with the different vendors in Redcliffe and when Ellie joined him he smiled and caught her up, introduced her to the different merchants and showed her different rolls of material they had available. Which was so much fun—she got to touch so many soft things! And it was all so pretty. Mami sideled up to join them, linking arms with Ellie—Sera was paling around with Thom and Varric, so Maerhis took the opportunity to ask about getting clothing for her from Mister Aclassi, looking at different fabrics that she might like, asking Ellie’s opinion. She was going to be so cute!
Sera really could use more things, so Marehis was going to set something up so she could be fitted for a new wardrobe for her birthday! There was this really pretty red flannel fabric that reminded Ellie of Sera’s old tunic, except not diagonal—Sera always looked so pretty in red, and when she started talking about the idea for a dress, Mister Aclassi asked if someone had anything to write with, she offered up her notepad, there was still a few sheets less, Varric kept her stocked and he always poked fun of how many she went through—she had things to remember and keep track of! Tonio drew up a little sketch of a knee length, long sleeved shift dress with a high button-down collar, that was so many words he rattled off after she said ‘dress’ wow!

“The collar and cuffs would be black to match the lines of course,” he spoke as he finished sketching.

“Do you think maybe you could make her a little flannel bow-tie?” Ellie wondered, running her index finger along the plaid material, it was nice! It’d be so warm!

“I believe I could,” Tonio agreed.

“Ohhh she will love that da’vehnan,” Marehis breathed, pressing a kiss to Ellie’s head. She was so excited! Sera would have comfortable new clothes for running around and date night things and sleeping clothes! She was going to be so snuggly! Her girlfriends would have to wait their turn or join them because napping was going to be so comfy, and Ellie called sister-dibs! That was a thing, right?

Dorian seemed…okay. A little tired and sad but…lighter, like there was some pressure off of him now when he joined them.

“Kadan?” the Iron Bull asked when he approached, a hand ghosting over the small of the Tevinter man’s back.

Dorian sighed. “Well. That was more than enough of that—my father is returning to Tevinter- he has transport, he is fed, he is clothed, he will have an extravagant roof over his head come nightfall so do not even think of commandeering his care, Ellie,” he was quick to instruct her, well gosh! Fight her for worrying about people! He was…he was a very, very bad father, but he was still a person.

“Do you feel any better?” Ellie asked. Gosh…she really, really understood why Dorian was so afraid before. Blood magic was- it was the worst, that had to have been so scary when his parents tried to- ugh! He didn’t need to change! “You’re the most perfect person in the world!” she assured him, context be damned, it wasn’t necessary because he was! The most perfect! And everyone that thought otherwise could fight her! Just start a line behind Mother Giselle!

“I am, aren’t I?” he supposed, smiling softly, “Thank you, Ellie. We had a talk. He’ll give mother my love. Maybe in another two years I’ll write them or some such rot,” he said, leaning against the Iron Bull. “I will be insufferable about this in the coming days I hope you know. My demands start with a back rub and a steak dinner.”

“You got it. Gonna be ram steak, but I’ll cook it how you like, Sparky.”

“I suppose that will simply have to do.”

It was super good! They made up steak and potatoes and Varric broke out a bottle of brandy he’d brought along for Dorian, it was very sweet of him. They were just getting started eating when the Iron Bull’s head quirked to the side like he heard something, and then he sniffed the air and a smile spread across his face.

“Incoming, in 5…4…3,” the Qunari counted down.

Ellie could hear footfalls behind her and Anya started barking up a storm! She smiled, it had to be- oh gosh she’d missed him so much!

“Cremisius!” she greeted as she stood and turned to see him and- Oh wow! He missed her too she guessed, Cremisius stopped when he arrived in camp, stared at her a moment and then he was walking right up to her and wrapping his arms around her, pulling her to his chest and just held her like he needed to, which was fine by her.

“I love you,” he said, very serious.

Haven was hard. He almost lost you.

Cole. “I love you too, Cremisius.”
He pressed a kiss to the top of her head and then cleared his throat, pulling away. “Recon’s all done Chief. The guys are transporting everything we uncovered to Skyhold as we speak.”

“I looked everywhere!” Cole announced as he appeared, seated in the Iron Bull’s lap, and the Qunari rumbled out a quiet laugh as he patted the Spirit on the head. “Everyone that was alive when we evacuated, made it into the tunnels, we did not leave anyone behind and you did not bury anyone that could have been saved.”

Ellie pulled back to turn and look at him, “R-really?”

“Really,” Cremisius assured, reporting, “We set up the memorial Lady Josie arranged, lots of stuff burned in the cabins from what Cole reported back but he got out lots of things from the Chantry still intact, the guys are transporting everything we uncovered to Skyhold. Well. Almost everything,” he said as he let her go and stepped back, digging into a pocket on his field pack, holding something that clinked a bit in the palm of his hand before he stepped behind Ellie, “Cole was able to show us where the last trebuchet was, took some digging and Spiritual guidance, but…” something cold was on her chest, looping around her throat and he secured the clasp at the back her neck-

Ellie’s mouth dropped open as she slapped a hand over it, he- he-

Her chin was quivering as she turned back around to launch herself at him, arms around his neck as she hugged him as tight as she could, crying out,

“You found mami’s necklace!”

Marehis gasped and Ellie let go so the Elf woman could see the necklace as she approached them, her eyes wide with surprise as she raised a hand to touch the necklace safe and sound, and then she hugged Cremisius, cooing out, “Oh da’mi! Ma serannas—bless you, sweet man!”

“Oi! We’re matchy now, Kremmy-boy!” Sera announced giddily, “Mare calls me da’assan—means arrow-“

“Little arrow, it is a term of endearment,” Marehis assured to gently embarrass the Elf girl, “Blah! Whatever!”

“Da is merely diminutive, ‘little’ as in ‘young’—mi, is blade.” Marehis offered Cremisius. He shrugged, “I can dig it. Um…you cool that I left the uh, charm on there?” he wondered. “It’s Ellie’s I figure it’s up to her if she wants it or not.”

Charm? Oh- oh! That sneak! Not Cremisius, Solas! Her little charm, it wasn't an accident or trick of the light, upside down it was a Wolf! What a jerk!

...kind of a sweet jerk. That...was nice. That he wanted something that really represented him...actual him. Even if he couldn't tell her, he wanted her to have something that said he was always protecting her. Wolves had certainly saved her life.

“I still want it. Um. Is that okay, mami?” she checked.

Marehis nodded, expression soft as she brushed Ellie’s hair back. "Of course, da'vhenan.”

Mister Aclassi was very patient, but Cremisius chuckled and dropped a kiss to her hair before going to his father who, the moment his son was approaching, stood up so fast he nearly spilled the contents of his plate, Cole appeared and took it in hand so the Tevinter man could go to his child and hug him properly, rattling off questions—was he hurt? Was he safe? How did it go? How were the others? Was he hungry? He could have Tonio’s plate-

“Slow your roll, papa’classi—figured Krem’d be in, plenty for him,” the Iron Bull assured, already making up a plate for his lieutenant. He sniffed a bit, looking to Cremisius and then, “Steak’s just about ready, why don’t you go wash up?”

“Got it,” Cremisius said, coming to Ellie and holding out his hand, “getting the lay of the land, think you could show me where to put my things?” Ellie nodded, leading him into the tent his father would be staying in, Cremisius sat down on the trunk of Tonio’s materials-haul with a grunt, undoing the straps of his chest plate, “Didn’t want to freak papa out. Think you could help me with this? I was running low on potion when this Rogue bastard caught me, slipped his blade right up under my cuirass—Cole was a big help but-“

Ellie was already helping him get his cuiras off and getting it over his head before casting it aside, his tunic was bloodied and she met his eye for the half second it took to know that yeah, it was fine for her to pull up his shirt, that was kind of the point. Cole had wrapped it up and it looked like they’d gotten a little Elf Root tonic applied to at least part of the slash just along his rib cage and down to his hip bone, half-healed, the bleeding slowed greatly. Part of it had clotted to a full stop but that was only part, and what hadn’t stopped was stitched, a bit sloppily like he’d had to do it himself, and the whole of it was inflamed and messy like he hadn’t been able to clean up at all. It made her stomach twist, it was just so ouch, and—“Sit right here, do not move—I’ll be right back-“ she was instructing but, “Here!” Cole announced as he appeared, Ellie’s field potions bag in one hand and her canteen in the other.

“Thanks,” Ellie said, and he vanished once she had her things, she poured a bottle of Elf Root into her canteen and shook it up, dousing a cloth from her field bag before she handed the canteen off to Cremisius with instructions to, “Drink.” And, “Sorry—this will sting, but then it’ll feel better,” she promised, carefully cleaning up the injury and the mess of dry and fresher blood off from around it.

“I can take these out and get this healed properly,” Ellie informed him and he nodded, steeling himself like he expected it to hurt terribly, “You’ll feel some pressure,” she cautioned before taking her sharp set of scissors—tiny ones meant for this sort of thing, and cleaning them well before using them to snip the sutures, careful to pull the end out by the knot so it didn’t tear through his skin, and pulling the rest out in short, quick pieces, and then she held clean cloth over the newly opened injury while she got another bottle of Elf Root and then pulled it away while she applied potion. She cleaned up the mess, getting rid of any sign Mister Aclassi might see that Cremisius had needed an injury tended.

“You feel okay? Sick or light headed at all?” she asked as she checked his pulse, just being safe, making sure it wasn’t thready, that nothing concerning was creeping up, but it was all good. She liked her vitals the way she liked her boyfriends—steady and strong! So Cremisius was basically killing it today.

He shook his head ‘no’, “Nah. Tired, but I’ve been on the go all day. Headache, Elf Root usually helps with that-” he wondered at.

Ellie smiled, “It’s a little busy with the whole ‘internal healing’ thing. No worries,” she said, opening her field bag up and digging around—it’d been a minute since she used potion for headaches, she hadn’t this trip so it took some digging to get to it, but Sera…had, hadn’t she? Huh. it was all there she was pretty sure…maybe Sera just hadn’t needed it after all. Oh well- huh. She hadn’t really looked in here much, but um…one, two…she always had three vials of lyrium, she tried to keep fully stocked in case Solas needed it, but she never used it herself and um, he wasn’t here. That was weird coming up short, but not super important she supposed. She handed Cremisius headache potion, and when he downed it, she pressed a kiss to his forehead for good measure.

“Well look at that, all better already,” Cremisius said, grinning as he wrapped his arms around her waist to pull her closer. “Thanks, lovely. Missed you.”

“Did you?” she asked teasingly. “Or did you just miss having a healer on hand?”

“Mmm, it is a benefit—that and you’re a hell of a lot cuter than Stitches,” he supposed, kissing her once…twice, huh, third time was for keeps which was very, very nice, his hand slipped up under her tunic to rest against her back, mmm, his hand was warm-

“Bello, your food will be getting cold-“ Tonio started as he came in and…yeah, they all sort of stopped frozen, the three of them annnnd if people could die of embarrassment, she was pretty sure that was happening right now. “Ahh. I am sorry- er- t-take your time!”

“Be right out,” Cremisius assured as his father practically fled, oh gosh! Cremisius chuckled, resting his forehead against hers, “Join me for dinner?”

“It’s a date,” she giggled. “You might wanna put on a shirt first though.”

Everyone fully clothed, Ellie and Cremisius joined their friends and family—the Iron Bull thought it was just hilarious which was kind of nice—Cole was right, something was on his mind, and Ellie hoped he’d come to her about it soon, this waiting around thing had her worrying about him. Mami Marehis was very sympathetic about it all when they were getting ready for bed—about getting caught kissing her kind-of dressed boyfriend, looking like they were getting up to something when Tonio interrupted, it was embarrassing, but apparently it was a right of passage of sorts. When Marehis was Ellie’s age, she got caught by her mami—like! Right in the middle of everything! Cassandra assured Mister Aclassi would be more focused on his own embarrassment than anything he’d seen—she once walked in on Tio Anthony and a Chantry Sister! Sera and Ellie just about died laughing!

Oh! Sera! “Hey, Ser”? Did you get into my field bag at all the other day?” Ellie asked as she brushed the older girl’s hair—she always got it so super tangly when she scrubbed it with a towel to dry faster.

“Uhh yeah Ink, headache stuff, right?”

Oh, “You took some? Huh.”

“What?”

“Nothing, guess I’m just losing it. I swear I had three bottles of lyrium and six headache draughts but…gosh I must have been looped when I was helping Healer Adan,” oh man, what if she’d gotten a bunch of potions mixed up? Accidentally brewed too many of some and not enough of the others, his stores could be inaccurate- it wasn’t like someone would end up with the wrong potion, but they’d run out sooner than expected at the very least and- “So you didn’t get into it at all? A bottle didn’t fall out or something?”

“Friggin, I dunno Ellie, shite—not my fault you lost your mage crap,” Sera snapped, defensive.

Oh. “I- I’m sorry, I wasn’t blaming you or anything, honest, I didn’t mean-“

“I’m not responsible for your pish, you gotta keep track of at least some of your own things right? Cripes, you’re friggin sixteen not six, you’re not a baby!”

“Sera,” Marehis gently reprimanded, “It was only a question there’s no need to-“

“It’s okay,” Ellie said. She…yeah. It was pretty…pretty silly, selfish wasn’t it? Someone else was always in charge of a bunch of her other potions, and everyone was always doing everything for her, she was an adult, sort of, she did need to be more responsible, she probably messed up Adan’s stores, or she lost the potion herself which was so dangerous, just leaving Lyrium around, she needed to be more careful! She was just the worst sometimes, honestly. “I’m sorry, Sera, really-”

“Whatever!” Sera huffed, rising to her feet and stomping from the tent. Oh- oh crap! She- she hadn’t meant to make Sera mad or upset- she wasn’t- what just happened?

“Eleanor…” Cassandra ventured, “You are certain your lyrium stores were full?”

“No. I mean yes, I thought they were,” she amended, “I always keep it full for Solas or if Vivienne or Dorian run out, I haven’t used any-“ She shook her head, “That isn’t important, um, what should I-? She- I didn’t mean to upset her-“

Oh man she messed up, she wasn’t sure how- oh. Her stomach did somersaults, Sera had gone out on her own when Lady Emmauld died, had to steal and stuff, but she was pretty flush now—she must have thought Ellie was judging her or something, that she was jumping to the illogical conclusion that Sera of all people had stolen a bottle of Lyrium to make some quick cash just because of things she’d had to do to get by before—which was crazy! Ellie was the last person throwing stones over stealing. She shouldn’t have said anything, it was dumb! She stood up and went after Sera, she needed to apologize- she was such a jerk!

Sera wasn’t in sight but there was this very agitated…something, like someone…huh. Sera did have magic even if it wasn’t active, it was like someone with very agitated magic had passed through leaving an air of it in its wake, Ellie followed it across the shallow stream and up the hill toward the lake where Sera was very-angry pacing. She sighed when Ellie approached and stopped her pacing but she wouldn’t look at her, gosh-

“Sera, I’m so so sorry, really. I swear—I swear on everything I wasn’t accusing you of stealing anything, I’m sorry I made it sound like it was your fault or something. I was just…I’ve been forgetting things?” She felt like she was always forgetting lots of things, that’s why she tried to write everything down. She’d brought the problem up and Cassandra shared she sometimes struggled with forgetfulness as a symptom of depression, and she’d been concussed, mami said to just be patient with herself. “Little things like why I walked into a room or if I’ve put something away or not, I mean I packed and repacked my field bag because of it- I thought maybe you would know what happened, be able to say ‘oh yeah I saw it all there so you or someone must have used it’ or ‘it was that way when I looked’ I’m sorry I made you feel badly.”

“Friggin’ shut up! Shite, Ink, you- you’re making me feel like shit- I-“ Sera growled frustratedly, “Stop apologizing, okay? Just stop. Frick, I- just forget about it, okay?”

“But you're mad and that’s totally totally okay,” Ellie assured, “I’m…kind of annoying, I get that, there always being something with me? I just wanted to apologize and t-tell you I get it and I’ll um, I can give you space—you can have the tent with mami’s to yourself and I can sleep somewhere else o-or we can set you up your own tent if you need to just be totally alone or something. And if you’re still upset with me or just want more space you can have Russel, honest, I can ride with anyone-“

“Inky, shite, it’s not that I don’t want you hanging around- just-“ Sera came and hugged her very hard, tight so much it almost hurt but it was better than refusing to look at Ellie, wasn’t it? “I’m not mad at you, and you didn’t do anything wrong.”

“Then why did you get so upset?”

“Would you care to confess?” Cassandra’s voice sounded and Ellie pulled away to look to the Seeker as she joined them, Marehis on her heels, the two of them looking very peeved-geesh! What was going on?! The Iron Bull must have used too much salt in his cooking tonight because everyone was salty! “I’ll extend the opportunity to you now, if you choose to decline that privilege, it doesn’t matter, I will be having a word with you here and now about this, young lady.”

“I er,” Sera gulped eyes darting back and forth between Cassandra and Marehis, and then down like she was trying to see- oh Cassandra was holding something behind her back. Sera let out a shuddering sigh like she might cry and then, “You didn’t loose any potion, Ink. I…I stole it. A bottle of your Lyrium.”

… “You…” Ellie was confused, why-? Cassandra held out the bottle she’d found in Sera’s things? “I don’t understand, Ser’, is something wrong?” did she owe someone a bunch of money or something? Did she need help?

“How long has this been going on?” Cassandra asked levelly, tucking the Lyrium into an empty potions slot on her belt. “Sera, how long have you been using Lyrium-“ the air sort of whooshed out of Ellie’s lungs but-

“N-never! I swear Sandra, honest to the Maker, I’ve never- I’m not an addict or anything- I mean I was gonna take that but s’not-“ “Da’vehnan!” Marehis exclaimed, appalled.

Cassandra stomped right up to Sera, and then she pulled her into a hug, “You absolutely fool-headed child,” she spoke with conviction, “I know, I know you are struggling right now, but this, this is not the appropriate course of action. Seeking a temporary high will not fix anything, take away any of the things that give you angst. You must speak with us, and seek seek help. I would always be there for you, hear you, hold you, help you. If you need a break or time or rest you would have it, but you have to-“

“I wasn’t ruddy trying to get high- just- stop it!” Sera sobbed out, and Cassandra loosed her hold when the Elf girl pulled away, wiping at her eyes with the backs of her hands, “I wasn’t being a bitch to you because I want space from you, Inky—I was being bitchy because I was afraid you-you were gonna find out I’d stolen Lyrium and be mad at me. I don’t friggin want space from you—I wanna ruddy be bonded to you!”

“…bonded?” Ellie asked, confused.

“Like baldy is!” Sera frustratedly explained, “I wanted lyrium cause- cause I figured it make’s Mages all Fade dreamy right? I thought- it sounded like the only thing I didn’t do when I got all magey in the Oasis was Fade dream, I thought if I meditated a bunch and did shite that Solas says makes my magic active or whatever and took lyrium, I’d go to sleep and boom! Fade dream, wake up a mage.”

“Solas told you to do this?!” Marehis- oh holy crap, Ellie was pissed too but Marehis looked more like ‘Murderous’ right now. Oh, Ellie was too! She was going back to Skyhold and telling the Iron Bull he could lob Solas’s stupid! Head! Right off! Maybe then the Qunari would feel cheery enough to talk to Ellie about whatever was bothering him! Two birds, one head!

But,

Sera growled in frustration, fists clenched, “He wouldn’t freaking help me! I asked him- I went to see him before we left and I practically begged that asshole to help me wake my magic up and he bloody just- spouted all this nonsense, that he was sorry he tried tricking me into magic and that I’m ‘perfect the way I am’ and- and- ugh! That don’t help me none!”

“Sera,” Ellie breathed, “chica, you don’t have to be- we’re sisters! That’s like, the bondiest bond there is! You don’t need to be a mage-“

“But we don’t have baldy around and what if you need it?! Cole can’t always hear you and- and- it’s not just that, honest. I-“ she was quiet, shaking out her hands nervously as she collected her thoughts, “I…maybe the Oasis messed me up. But I felt my magic shite and it was scary and it hurt but- but it also felt- I dunno. Good? Like- like when I first got into chemistry, or when I found the Friends, or when I joined the Inquisition and actually got um, into it for more than just ‘I need the damn hole in the sky closed so I can go play!’ it felt like, this is what I’m supposed to do. I mean I dunno if I wanna be like, a magey mage. But the way Mare was talkin’ about Solas explaining it, where magic’s just a part of life, how you light fire or protect yourself, do littler day to day things,” she shrugged. “I dunno, maybe that’s stupid-“

Oh. Kay. Solas could keep his head. Probably, anyway, execution…he didn’t destroy the Temple himself, but he gave Corypheus the means to do so and did nothing to stop him. People hanged for less.

She shouldn’t have to be making decision like whether or not her papi should be executed! Blah! Focus!

