“Sera, it’s not stupid,” Ellie said, taking her hands in her own, “if you genuinely, one hundred percent want access to your own magic for yourself? There’s absolutely nothing wrong with that. I mean, as someone whose grown up a mage I think it’s bat-crap crazy to actually want- it’s not that it’s a bad idea on a personal level, but it’s sort of like…like if race was a choice—if you’d been born a Human and someone said ‘hey you can become an Elf’, while Humans are in no way better than Elves, based on the society we live in, on all the disadvantages Elves face socially, politically, it’s kind of better to be Human. The world is…might be changing? I don’t know how things will be for Mages after all of this, but Sera, it’s bad. I mean it’s really bad. I love my magic, and I wouldn’t change anything, but it’s not something I would recommend lightly. There are so many wonderful things you can do with magic but there are so many downsides to consider, and you have to consider them because if you pursue this, you’ll have to live with them.”

“I…didn’t really think about it, I mean we work with Mages and no ones throwing any of you into Circles or anything, but…there en’t any Circles to throw people in right now,” Sera sighed. “I’ll think about it some more.”

“And you will do nothing to pursue it until we can have an appropriate understanding of just how you would do so,” Marehis insisted. “Da’vehnan, if your bid with Lyrium hadn’t worked, if it merely affected you as it does non-mages- what would you have done? Tried again?” Sera shrugged and nodded, “That would have just led to another ‘again’ and another.”

“You could have become addicted, Sera. And that- there is no known- Templars struggle with Lyrium addiction eternal,” Cassandra took a deep breath she blew out slowly before reaching out to card a hand through Sera’s hair. “It is late, and it is chilled out here. Come,” she intoned, waving Sera forward and the Elf girl went to her and the Seeker wrapped her arms around her shoulder, rubbing her arm the way she did for warmth. “I believe we’ve cocoa in our stores. Lets indulge in a cup, shall we?”

“Ohh that sounds excellent,” Marehis agreed, coming and taking Ellie’s hand to pull her close, playfully conspiring, “let’s see if we can be sneaky.”
Huh. Yeah, cocoa with everyone would have been the nice thing to do…but there was something fun about trying to not get caught doing something innocuous, just to have a shared venture. Sera- oh it was so relieving, she was giggly which made Ellie giggle, and they kept shushing each other- but it was just a vicious cycle! They were not made to be covert assassins, but no one came out to disturb their ‘sneaky’ cocoa session.

“I’m real sorry, Ink,” Sera whispered when they were settled in their tent, Sera’d basically conjoined their bedrolls which was fine, it was very warm, and who was she to turn down snuggling? “for everything? I shouldn’t’ve lied or stole or gotten all pissy with you.”

Ellie hummed in consideration, before she kissed Sera on the tip of the nose, “I instantly forgive you!” she promised. She was going through a lot, and mami said something about Sera struggling? “Everything’s okay, right? Are you okay?”

“Been kind of anxiety-ish, for a while. Not as bad as when I was littler, but um, the mom-squad took me to see Elan. I’ll have potion around just in case, an’ I’m supposed to be mindful or whatever about ‘triggers’ n’ pish, do groundin’ and meditation and shite.”

“We can be twinsies!” Ellie quietly enthused, “I do grounding every morning when I wake up, and we meditate together. Does mami keep your potion for you?” she wondered.

“Haven’t got it yet, Elan’ll send it when she’s got it brewed up.”

“If you want, um, I mean, if you ever need potion,” panic attacks were kind of wild, it was hard to self-administer things when you were swept up in suffocating to death, or at least feeling like you were, “mami keeps my potion for me when I need it, you do too. I could keep yours—I’d be super careful and take care of it and help-“

Sera held her tighter, nodding against her shoulder, “Yeah Ink, I trust you. Thanks.”

The Hinterlands got so much more fun then! They had all of their business out of the way with the ‘retainer’ dealt with, and Mister Aclassi’s shopping done, so! Fun! They had a little bit more business but it was exciting and so great! They went to the Crossroads and Redcliffe, and took all of the toys Thom and Cyril had cobbled, and Cremisius’s stuffed nugs, and the sock dolls! She was so so glad they’d had more than enough to go around, and all of the kids! Sweet babies! They were so excited! And cute! The Iron Bull was literally a huge hit—it took all of five minutes for them to want to climb on him and ride around on his back. And Cremisius, gosh, he was worn out from how much he’d played—so many little girls had looked at him, and thought he was just the handsomest, and they cast him as the handsome prince or brave knight that would ‘save’ them from the dragon, and it was just so-

She’d never…gosh she’d never ever led a life where she thought she might grow up, get to be older full stop. Let alone things like marriage or…did…did she want children? To be a mami? She loved Anya loads, loved being a puppy mom, but like, for a kid? She…she wasn’t sure but something about seeing Cremisius being so very good with the children, playing and chatting with them, and just being so very sweet with them…did he want to be a father? He…might be really good at it. Should have it, if he wanted it. And she wasn’t exactly sure every role she’d play in that but if it was something they wanted in the future…that’d be uh…

She supposed that would be ‘cool’, as mami and papi termed it.

Blah! But that was like! Way way off! Way off!

Right now, it was chilly at night but Spring was on, and the Hinterlands warmed up pretty nice in the day time, so there was lots of splashing and playing around in the lake near their campsite, they played so much tag! And Anya loved all the open space to run around and play in! Anmmnd she kind of liked it too, all the tall grass. It was um…conducive to laying with someone you wanted privacy with. They got very bad at playing tag because Cremisius kept going after her and they’d go to the ground and um…kissing counted as tagging, right? So maybe they were good at it after all? Sera and Cole always left them be, Cole making it more fun for Sera because he’d ‘cheat’ a bit, poofing around and she’d have to listen and really hunt him down to find him.

But there was a thing as too much sun, which seemed crazy after so much wintry mess, but one afternoon found Ellie lying in her bedroll with Cremisius, reading in the cover of the tent for some shade, while Vivienne and Marehis were working together on making lunch and,
“Hey Boss-girl, you uh, got a minute?”
Yes! She had several minutes! All of the minutes! The Iron Bull! He was here, and he wanted to talk!
So she popped up, handing off her book to Cremisius, “I do! Whatcha’ need?” she asked.
They went to sit very dangerously—not really, but Mamis would pitch a fit—with the legs dangling over the edge of the steep drop by the dormant Occularm, Ellie kicking her legs a bit, just, excited and nervous.

Apparently, the Qun had come calling. They wanted to ally themselves with the Inquisition—however, in order to do so, they would have to help one of their agents on the Storm Coast. The Ben-Hessrath discovered a Red Lyrium shipment would be coming in for Venatori collection on the Coast, their demands for allegiance were that the Inquisitor, the Iron Bull, and his crew to help interfere with it's delivery, make certain it didn't fall into Venatori hands and was destroyed.

“I think this could be an incredible opportunity for the Inquisition. And gosh, I mean the Qun gave us you, and that’s the best! Of course I want to help!”
The Iron Bull blew out a sigh of relief. “You’re sure?”
“Positive! You and the Chargers are up for it, right? Is it cool to bring everyone or does it have to be just me?”

“Your people can come, and uh, they get that you’re Imekari. Young. They don’t mind you having protection, but we should be a little more selective, this'll be a delicate operation and we don't want to tip off the smugglers with our numbers,” he explained.

Ellie nodded. “Cool! So…Storm Coast? When do we need to leave?”
They left the following morning so they could get Mister Aclassi safely back in Skyhold and assemble the rest of the Chargers. The trip back was short but...interesting.

Sometimes Cassandra read things, these books she insisted Ellie never ever read, and there was one she'd brought along with her this trip she was super cagey about, always sneak-reading it, Ellie only knew about it because she'd come into the tent on more than one occasion to find Cassandra hurriedly tucking the book under her pillow. But Ellie got curious because of the cover! She was pretty sure-

"Eleanor!" Cassandra cried out in surprise their first night on the road. Ellie was sitting in Cassandra's bedroll, looking over the front of the book, and she was right! Varric Tethras was printed at the bottom of the cover!

"Why are you embarrassed about reading one of Varric's books?" Ellie asked, handing it up to her mami who snatched it in hand and then plopped down to sit alongside Ellie.
"They are horrible," Cassandra insisted, "and wonderful. It's utter filth and tripe but-"
"But it's your cup of utter filth and tripe?" Ellie supposed.
"You did not read any of it, I hope. It truly is, er-"
"Nope, doesn't sound like it'd be my thing, but if it's your thing, that's great! I'm glad you enjoy it."
Cassandra nodded, "I do...it is a pity, this is only part of the series, the last so far but...oh there should be more, and there was to be, Varric merely hasn't released it yet."
He hadn't, huh? Maybe...maybe that was the common ground they needed? Varric and Cassandra, to move forward after he brought Hawke to Skyhold. He'd been looking for a way to apologize to her, and breakfast food only went so far.

"Hey Varric?” Ellie asked quietly the next day while she helped him make lunch, Cassandra and Cremisius were off doing a perimeter check. "What ever happened to that book of yours? Swords and Shields?"

The Dwarf man froze mid carrot-chop, and then he looked to Ellie, absolutely horrified. "Fuck. I regret everything I've ever done. How bad's the damage kid? Oh shit, oh shit, Aveline fucking warned me if I published crap like that, if I ever had kids that read it I'd regret it, and I do, and I owe her a drink. You didn't get to chapter seven, did you?"
"The latest one," Ellie said, she couldn't help it, he was so freaked! She giggled and assured him, "I didn't read any of it, honest, but I saw the latest chapter, your name on the cover, and wondered why you stopped publishing them?"

"Ahh, shit kid, Swords and Shields is the worst crap I've ever written, barely sold enough copies to pay for the ink."

"Really? Huh. Mami's a fan."

"Your mami's kind of going through a lot right now with her boyfriend being an Elf god. If she needs a little tasteful book porn to get through, more power to her."

"Not Marehis, Cassandra."

"Shit. Seeker likes Swords and Sheilds?"

"Loves it! She's super bummed you haven't put out another chapter."

"Huh..." Varric seemed to consider it. "Thanks uh, for the heads up."

She wasn't sure exactly what went down, just later that afternoon, Varric sent out something on a messenger bird, and then the following morning he had a package from Harrits with a note attached, 'I'm not running a bloody printing press', Ellie saw when it came in. All Ellie knew was when she and Sera came in from washing up in the stream, Cassandra was blushing, curled up in her bedroll, and holding a book with a freshly cracked spine.

"You are absolutely never to touch this, it is garbage. But you may lay next to me and read the Chant. Perhaps pray for my soul."

"On it!" Ellie said.

It was good, a relief really, to get Mister Aclassi safely back to Skyhold. And getting in a quick hug session in with Papi! It was great! And very squishy, Ellie was almost worried she'd be a little bruised!

"Here, take my hat, your armor is warm yes? And you have your scarf?" Cullen listed off like a checklist, Ellie nodded—she was double hatting it! He'd just put his on over the one Cremisius made her! Two hats and a hood! And her scarf! "If you become ill from the Coast again, I will lose my mind, and burn that place to the ground, I don't care how difficult the rain will make it, I will find a way."

"I believe you," Ellie assured. "I'll be safe. We'll catch up when I get back, um...would you...would some one please tell Solas my trip out got extended? I kind of promised him I’d come see him when I got back, but we need to get going if we’re going to make the meetup."

"I would be absolutely delighted to inform him," Cullen said, pleasantly, but kind of sinister like he was pleased he could go rub it in Solas’s face that he’d gotten to see Ellie and that she wouldn’t be in to see him until later than expected due to a mission he definitely wouldn’t be briefed on—she could only give him the heads up that she was heading out of range of the bond because she promised her advisors and Marehis that she would give him absolutely zero information about where she was going or what she was doing. "Be safe."

"Be nice," Ellie returned, popping up on her toes to kiss her papi on the cheek. And dipping into the bond a bit- gosh she felt badly at how much excited relief came from Solas’s end. She sent something that she hoped was apologetic for her sudden in-and-out and assurance that they were still on for when they got back...and maybe something that had been their way of conveying I love you.

I love you too.

Papi’s needed to just be papi’s! Not dalish almost-gods and accomplices in terrorism!

"You all ready to hit the road, Imekari?" the Iron Bull asked as he rejoined them, the Chargers at his back.

"You bet!"
Well. Coast was raining all to shit, and this was nerve wracking as shit.

When he first got word from Par Vollen he’d…hell, he’d been dead empty for a moment, coming to terms with what might be inside, prepared for it, even though…well, he thought- he was supposed to have more time. He reported in. Any correspondence he got from back home was in response to his inquiries. Otherwise, nothing. The only thing he was expecting to get from them was change-of-orders—which meant moving on from the Inquisition…or moving on full on—returning home.

He was half excited and proud that the Inquisition was being deemed worthy by the Qun, and that…would help with shit, if certain things came to light. Them approving of the Inquisition, oh man, if they got more involved, actually saw what he saw out of Ellie—that she was Baslit-an—he might not be in as big a shit pile as he was making for himself out here.

Because this is where you get to the other half, where he was not excited, and ashamed. This was not how this was supposed to go down, at all—he was supposed to report in, maybe meet with the occasional contact. Always alone, always away from his crew. This? Was up close and personal, a Ben-Hessrath agent would be all up in his junk, and he…had more junk than he probably should. His job was to blend in, infiltrate, and report what he sees. But there was a difference between reporting in and being reported on. Now he was going to have someone from back home seeing him, seeing his ‘not at home’ shit. Crew he cared for. Tevinter lover. Tevinter Imekari…having Human Imekari, he’d gotten…he’d gotten too close—if roles were reversed, if he got a glimpse of an agent living their day to day the way he was, he’d get yanked out of the field so fast his head would spin.

At this rate, his tattoos were the least extreme of his worldly activities. And he was pretty sure he was in for a hell of a time over it when he reported back. So.

He was fucked. In none of the ways he liked. Wasn't gonna be for a hot minute—Sparky was back in Skyhold, him and Madam de Fer. Mages and the Qun were always a caustic mix, and he didn't need an agent looking too close at what Bull had going on with a Vint-ass mage, but he sure as hell didn't want to do something that hurt the guy, fuck, he was still raw after shit going down with his father. He wasn't about to drag him along into a situation where he couldn't openly lay claim to the guy. There was no real reason to, mid-battle, but if whoever the Ben-Hessrath sent asked the right or uh, wrong questions, answers that might keep Sparky safe might also hurt him in ways he sure as hell didn't need right now.

Madam had no interest in this mission or the Coast, she hated sending Imekari off without her, but it was best, the fewer mages, likely the better. Cullen got a lead on something about the Red Templars so Seeker was back in head quarters helping him, and Ellie left Anya with them, she wasn't sure the pup was cut out for covert operations. And uh, if mages were a risk, Cole definitely was. No way an agent wouldn't take one look at him and try to take him out or report in that Bull was batshit crazy. All in all, they had Tethras, Sarge, Sera, and Marehis, good size group to knock out this mission successfully, not so big it'd fuck it up.

Oh man. He just had to keep his cool. Keep his damn mouth shut, get through this assignment as quickly and cleanly as possible. Let them see he was infiltrating, not infatuated.

Because he wasn’t.

“The Iron Bull?”

Oh just- fuck! The kid stepped right up to him and wrapped her arms around his waist, hugged him as tightly as her little body could, shit she put effort into it. “You hugged me this morning, but it looked like you needed one for yourself. Are you okay?”

“Right as rain.”

She smiled up at him, “You wanna nap with me after this is done, or will you and Dorian be getting up to sex things? The rain’s making me sleepy. Gosh, you think it’d stop being so cold up here.”

“Yeah babe—we’ll get our nap on once we’re through. Thanks for looking out, always down for hugs but uh,” he pulled back careful, didn’t wanna jolt or jerk her around, rested his hand on her head—the motion kept her in place while he took a step back, get some distance. “Now it’s time for work. You in, boss-girl? My contact should be here soon.”

“You got it! Inquisitor Trevelyan at your service!” she promised, standing tall, sporting her most serious, determined look.

They make it through this all good, he was gonna nap the crap out of this afternoon. Get his Vints in on it, have a big old worldly nap party. He was on the outside damn it! Outside life was different from inside life, they’d get that, wouldn’t they? He wasn’t fucking Tal-Vashoth, knew his place. When this was over, it was over, no questions asked, no resistance.

Heard someone, barely heard them—Ben-Hessrath, definitely—slipping through the woods, coming to join them at the meet up point. Huh…wait…oh shit, hell yeah!

“Good to see you again, Hissrad,” the agent that joined them said, oh man he had his same old swagger back and everything.

“Gatt!” Bull greeted, “Last I heard, you were still in Seheron!”

“They finally decided I’d calmed down enough to go back out into the world.”

“Boss-girl, this is Gatt, we worked together in Seheron,” he introduced him.

“It’s a pleasure to meet you, Inquisitor. Hissrad’s reports say you’re doing good work,” Gatt said.

“Shanedan, Mister Gatt, I’m Ellie,” she greeted, bowing her head a bit, “It’s great to meet you—you’re a friend of the Iron Bull’s? I forgot his name was Hissrad,” she quirked her head to the side as if thinking, “I thought you said the Qun didn’t give you names, but numbers?”

“And titles, which bring about nicknames,” Gatt assured. “Hissrad—“

“Means ‘Keeper of Illusions’—” Bull started.

“Liar,” Gatt corrected with the accusation, “it means, liar.” Yeah well Gatt’s short for Gaatlock because of someone’s damn temper, so he could bite him.

“Well you don’t have to say it like that.” Bull growled. Kid got it, the work he did, and he’d always been upfront and honest with her when he could. Still, there’d been too many motherfucking liars in her party, he didn’t want her getting the wrong idea.

Imekari, damn it, she giggled at that, and he caught himself smiling. Wasn’t bad, smiling, just, shouldn’t get caught doin’ it so damn soft. Gatt…he was pretty sure Gatt bein the one they sent would be his saving grace here, but that still didn’t mean he could get by showing anything too genuine. “Liar huh?” she smiled to Gatt, “I look forward to working together.”

“Hopefully this will help both of our peoples,” Gatt said, “Tevinter is dangerous enough without the influence of this Venatori cult. If this new form of Lyrium helps them seize power in Tevinter, the war with Qunandar could get worse.”

Yeah. They’d already seen what this shit could do with Red Templars. “With this stuff, the Vints could make their Slaves into an army of magical freaks,” Bull said. “We could lose Seheron…and see a giant Tevinter army come marching back down here.”

Gatt nodded, “The Ben-Hessrath agree, that’s why we’re here.” He pointed to the coastline, and jumped right in to laying out the plan, “Our dreadnought is safely out of view, and out of range of any Venatori mages on the shore. We’ll need to eliminate the Venatori then signal the dreadnought so it can come in and take out the smuggler ship.”

Ellie nodded, considering, then looking up to Bull. “What do you think, the Iron Bull?”

Honestly? “Don’t know,” he had to admit. Guts had been twisting with equal parts excitement, and out-in-out panic at the idea of a dreadnought run anywhere near Imekari or his…his crew. Which was stupid, this was the mission. Still, “I’ve never liked covering a dreadnought run. Too many ways for crap to go wrong.” She met him with that steady gaze, told him to lay it out for her, she got it, this was work and if he needed her to hear something, even if it would freak her out, she’d keep her cool, keep her head in the game. “If our scouts underestimate enemy numbers, we’re dead. If we can’t lock down the Venatori Mages, the ship is dead.” He sighed, “It’s risky.” Not even his favorite kind of risky either.

“Riskier than letting Red Lyrium into Minrathous?” Gatt sniped. Asshole. “This is risky, yes, but it’s our best chance to destroy the shipping operation permanently. My agents suggest two possible locations the Venatori may be camped to guard the shore.” He pointed East, then West. “We’ll need to split up and hit both at once.”

“I’ll come with you, boss,” Bull assured Ellie. Had her people with her but this was definitely part of what he signed up for, protecting her from the big and the bad, and after all the prep he’d put Krem through for this? The guy’d probably turn on him in battle if he tried going with the Chargers, he wanted Bull watching Ellie’s back big-time. “Krem can lead the Chargers.” Confident about that, his guys would be alright. He had them cooling their heels near by, didn’t exactly…even though it was Gatt, he’d feel a hell of a lot better about this going down without a hitch, without coming out on the other side being pulled from the field, if the agent the Ben-Hessrath sent had absolutely zero contact with his crew. “Let me fill them in, and we can move out when you’re ready.”

Kid nodded, “Got it, you’re good on potions, the Iron Bull?” and when he nodded, “Cool, I’ll touch base with everyone, be there in a minute.”

Gatt stayed close to Imekari, which checked out. The guy was definitely here to see if she was everything Bull was writing home about, see what the Qun would be getting into with her. Worked for him—he gave Krem and the guys a solid run down, and he…felt okay with this. Mostly. Scared as shit, but he trusted his guys and he’d given Krem as many playthroughs as he could come up with. They were ready. They were.

Figured he should wrap this up—he could hear Imekari asking, real sweet if Gatt had potion for himself, if he needed anything at all. Bull just about whipped around and went to—dunno, cover her? Throw her over his shoulder and bolt? Kid asked if Gatt wanted in on Barrier—promising she’d no intention of casting on him, especially not without his permission, but they would be fighting alongside each other, he could have the extra protection if he wanted it. Didn’t go too bad, guy was definitely uncomfortable with the question, did not like it at all that the Inquisitor was Saarebas, and dude wasn’t known for keeping his cool, but he had some restraint. Bull heard Marehis click the release on the knives she kept braced in sheathed to the inside of her forearms when Gatt stiffened and stopped breathing, ready to stop him before he started if he was going to take violent offense to the kid’s offer.

“I’ve no need of your magic, Saarebas. Focus on our enemies.”

“No problem!” Ellie cheerfully accepted, “I promise I’m good at avoiding allies in battle, you don’t have to worry about backblast or me hitting too close to you. Focus on defending yourself and let me know if you get hurt, okay?”

“You’ve miracle healing magic in the south?”

“No, but we have miracle healing knowledge,” she offered, giggling. “Miracle’s an exaggeration, but I’ve got lots of healing gear in my field bag and the know how to back it up—no magic, just good old fashioned potion and bandaging.”

Gatt chuckled, uneasy, but polite. “Noted.”

Better than him stabbing her.

Ellie came to join Bull and his guys, Gatt was…kind of in a stare-off with Marehis, just standing very still as if he pretty sure she was going to strike if he made to follow Imekari. Tamassran through and through, she did not like the guy’s attitude, at all, the wild-card he presented himself to be.

“Once they’re down, fire up the signal. That’ll let the dreadnought know it’s safe to come in,” Bull was saying when she stepped up alongside him. Krem favored her a quick wink and for him,

“Understood, Chief.”

Uh-huh. Yeah. They were ready. Still, “Remember, you’re gonna want a volley to start. But don’t get suckered into fighting at range. They’ve got mages.”

“It’s alright. We’ve got a solid archer on our side,” he quipped, wagging his brows at Dalish. Yeah yeah.

“Get in close and take their Enchanter down before he takes over the battlefield.”

“He’ll be dead before he knows it.”
Fuck him, this kid. “Just…pay attention, alright? The Vints want this Red Lyrium shipment bad.” Lost a shit ton of it between all the Lyrium they’d destroyed in the field, and Therinfal Redoubt. Hitting Haven hit the Inquisition hard, but Imekari hit Corypheus’s forces harder it sounded like—she got out with most of her people. Lots of his Red Templar freaks couldn’t say the same.

“Yes, I know. Thanks, Mother.”

_Bite me! “Qunari’s don’t have mothers, remember?”_

Krem offered him that damn cocky half smile, “We’ll be fine, Chief.”

Well they fucking better be.

“Alright Chargers. Horns up!”

“Horns up!”

He looked down to Ellie, “Ready when you are.”

She nodded, nervous as hell, heart was already thundering in her chest but, “Let’s do this.”

This, went off without a hitch. At first.

Held their own good against their group—they took out half the camp, catching them unawares, those farthest away, near their post watching the coast just barely got time to get their shit together to put up a reasonable fight. Still, fuck, he’d warned Krem about Enchanters but it took a minute to track all of theirs down, take them out—

Kid was between Barrier cooldowns, Bull was bare-ass, well, bare-armored so he knew she was too and damn it the Enchanter was beyond distracting. He’d made a move at Imekari and Marehis was going after him—left her open to a stray rogue to come slipping up quick and quiet behind the Human girl,

So Bull got double daggers against his arm as he wrapped himself around the kid and held her close, took the hit on his bracer, little slice just below his elbow where the armor didn’t cover as the rogue followed through, but uh, Bull whipping his war axe around lobbed his head off before he could do more damage and that was the last of their opponents, Sarge was just finishing off the final Enchanter. Still, shit, he- he’d gotten there right? Been a hot second she and the rogue had been in his blind spot, Bull felt the guy right up on her as Bull pushed him away and pulled Ellie to him. He took Ellie’s shoulders and got her right in view, looking up at him,

“I’m okay, are you?” Ellie asked, already taking his forearm in hand so she could examine the little thing, practically a cut on his arm, pout on her lip, “Ouch. Here,” she said, uncapling a bottle of her health potion must be keeping little rounds of cotton cloth in her potions stores on her belt because she covered the bottle opening with one before tipping it and then swiping the wet cloth along his injury, sealing in its wake. “Thanks for saving me.”

“Always got your back, boss-girl.”

Always…maybe…maybe not always. Fuck.

Gatt sent up the signal for the dreadnought just a half second after Krem sent up his teams—good, damn good. “Already sent theirs up, see ‘em down there?” he offered Ellie who breathed a quiet sigh of relief. Yeah, everything was cool.

“I knew you gave them the easier job,” Gatt accused—lightly, like a joke. But he wasn’t joking. Re-educators really did a number on him, huh? Damn. This…this might be bad.

Ignoring that, get him focused on their progress, how good Bull’s outside the Qun connections were panning out, and uh…it was a damn cool sight, he was excited to show Imekari, “There’s the dreadnought,” he said, leaning her way, and pointing to the water for her gaze to follow. She breathed in an excited gasp, “Wowza,” she declared it. Damn straight.

“That brings back memories,” not all of them of bad. Dreadnoughts were a pain in the ass to cover, but amazing, made the job feel worth it, to see in action.

When the job went off without a hitch.
Drednought fired off her first shot, landed it solid on the smuggler ship, the boom reverberating through the air, even he could feel it, Imekari jumped, eyes wide with excitement and her heartbeat stuttered to the sound, little hand clenching at the baggy fabric at his left thigh.

“Friggin’ boom!” Sera cheered.
And then he heard boots crunching in the rubble on the shore below, gaze immediately drawn to it and, “Crap.”
Fuck. This couldn’t be happening, how the hell had they missed-
Who the fuck was sending them intel?! How had they missed an entire third Venatori patrol?

“We can signal them, they can fall back, right?” Ellie’s voice was tight with panic, breath hitching in her chest.

…”Yeah.” Shit shit shit, because,
“Your men need to hold that position, Bull,” Gatt insisted.
“They do that, they’re dead,” Bull made sure he knew this- they were part of his cover here, he…he couldn’t be expected to work with the Inquisition further, right? No point of a mercenary leader if he didn’t have a crew- come on, please, please.

“If they don’t, the Venatori retake that post and the Dreadnought is dead,” Gatt said, making sure he knew. “You’d be throwing away an alliance between the Inquisition and the Qun. You’d be declaring yourself Tal-Vashoth! With all you’ve given the Inquisition, half the Ben-Hessrath think you’ve betrayed us already! I stood up for you, Hissrad! I told them you would never become Tal-Vashoth!”

Half the Ben-Hessrath*…

*My agents suggest two possible locations for the Venatori may be camped to guard the shore.

We’ll need to split up…
Knew you gave them the easier job.

Hissrad means liar, huh?

So that was how it was. He’d shown his damn hand, given too much, and now his guys were meant to pay the price. He’d gotten too close, carried away, and the Ben-Hessrath fucking knew it.

He lost them, he was going to lose his crew because he couldn’t get out of his damn feelings for five minutes and think about the shit he was sending home. Somewhere, somehow, he got too revealing, and now it was coming back around.

And he could look to Imekari. She was Inquisitor, his boss. She said to call the retreat, it at least took some of the blame off of him, he might be able to back track and appeal to the Ben-Hessrath that he was following orders—theirs to get in and be close to Inquisition higher-ups, and hers, the highest higher-up the Inquisition had to offer. Alliance wasn’t going to work out smooth if she felt they were responsible for her boyfriend’s murder, would it? But there was another level of her being Inquisitor. It was her job not to let things like that—let her relationship with Krem, or anyone get in the way of doing what needed to be done, and it would wreck her, she would blame herself, blame her decision if she called off the attack and Bull was exiled from his people. And she knew, she knew the stakes. She knew part of this- she knew dating a mercenary might mean someday, he didn’t come home- to-to her or to his friends…his father…

And he couldn’t look to Imekari. Couldn’t let her make this call.
“Never say never I guess,” he offered Gatt, bringing the war horn to his lips, and blowing. It. This mission. His chances at ever going home.

“Their falling back,” he said. Relieved. Mostly relieved. He…he wasn’t sure.
Pretty sure this was the most collateral damage he’d seen a defeated dreadnought take out with it.

Gatt was breathing hard, way he did when he was about to lose his shit, “All these years, Hissrad, and you throw away all that you are. For what? For this?” he asked pointing Ellie, “For them? For some basra Saarebas dog.”
And he was Tal-Vashoth, nothing to lose. “Baslit-an. She’s Baslit-an, and you breathe another fucking word like that, neither of us will be reporting in, to the Ben-Hessrath. We’re done here.”

“His name is the Iron Bull,” Ellie said.

“Don’t be, Imekari. I’m not.”

“I’m sorry it’s going to sink-“

“Dreadnoughts don’t sink.” Pulled her to his side more to shield her eyes as he raised his arm to do the same for his own. Self-destruct protocol was a bitch. Really was.

“Come on. Let’s get back to our boys.”

Chapter End Notes

*There’s a mission in DA:2 called ”Night Terrors” where Hawke and friends help out an Alienage family because a young Elf named Feynriel keeps having horrific Fade Dreams but only because he doesn't understand how to use his own powers, he's a Dreamer, who can manipulate the Fade and control what goes on inside it when he enters it. Hawke goes into the Fade (no matter what classification they are) through a special Dalish ritual, and helps Feynriel wake up. I figure an untrained Elf continually Fade dreaming would be a concern for Solas because they might need specialized, more direct training for fear that they are a Dreamer and can accidentally get into all sorts of trouble they weren't expecting to get into.

*This comes from dialog you hear when traveling with Cole and Cassandra after moving into Skyhold (I think the move prompts it, I've only had Cole in my group before Skyhold once, and even then it wasn't until after the move that this conversation came up) where Cassandra thanks Cole for rescuing her locket with Anthony's picture in it, it was stolen by a rat (a very big one!) and he found it when she was hurting over it, and returned it to her.

*When Romancing Sera, you receive the quest ”A Woman Who Wants for Nothing”, where Sera says she got the Inquisitor a hat (a present) that she's stuffed and used as a dummy Corypheus to beat up on. This prompts Inq to get a present for her, but she can't think of anything and goes around asking all her companions for advice, when she talks to Sera in her quarters and confesses she's been trying and failing to come up with something, Sera picks up on the fact that she's gone around telling everyone in her party that they're together, Sera's her girlfriend, and that is the best present ever! So, this is an adaptation of fulfilling this quest in this story.
*Genevieve isn't canon, but the oldest woman modernly recorded both getting pregnant and giving birth naturally, was 59 at the time.

*When you first get to Skyhold, one of the Charger missions on the War Table is for them to go to Haven to see if anything can be recovered/leave a memorial for the place.

*Locate Rhys and Evangeline is a War Room mission Inquisitor gets after talking to Cole about his friends. Walker is the agent that locates them, and prompts the mission for their rescue because they've been captured by Templars. They can deploy any of the Advisors, if you use Leliana, she has Walker extract them and get them to safety. Upon completion the mission statement prompts letter from Rhys saying he remembers Cole and still considers him a good friend, and a message from Cole to the Inquisitor where he says he was very angry with them for trying to find Rhys and Evangeline, but now he's glad they did and is grateful they're alive.

*All of Gatt's dialogue about how the Ben-Hessrath feel about Bull, how they're supposed to carry out this mission, and the job Bull gives his crew is canon compliant, and comes straight from the game, and it's always made me think it's basically an intentional hit on the Chargers, not an accident or some misfortune that befalls them, but something that was always part of the plan Gatt's here to execute. The Qun is a little interested in an alliance with the Inquisition, and Ben-Hessrath are a lot interested in correcting and controlling Hissrad, reminding him he can't really have a connection with the people he works with, that it's a job and his duty, and testing him by making him prove he will choose the 'right' thing and abandon his Basra crew to secure an alliance for his government.
Here Lies the Abyss: Heading to Crestwood

Chapter Summary

Bull’s out of the Qun, so, some Dragon slaying is called for to cheer him up. Dorian plies some Tough Love, and Ellie Sits in Judgement over Fen Harel before going to meet up with Hawke and friends in Crestwood! Also Sera celebrates a birthday! I'm good at summaries.

Chapter Notes

I own nothing! Everything belongs to the creators of DA:I!

I'm back! Winding down Pride month with a new Chapter! Happy belated Pride everyone! <3

I'm going to be slowing down (I know, it's already super slow, I'm so so sorry!) with chapter updates, due to work, because I'm a person and I need food and shelter to survive, and money is required for both of these things. This fic will be finished, and I appreciate your patience! <3

Please enjoy! Thanks so much for reading!

ALSO if there's any interest—I posted a newish fic since the last time I updated this fic, a conversation in Chapter 15 of this fic between Thom and Ellie sort of inspired me to write a divergent story, a real short one that I'll be updating with the finalish chapter soon, that explores the idea of Thom going home to see his mother after his time in the military, before the massacre, and instead his life is set on a bit of a different course, after meeting a little stargazing Antivan on his way to Markham. So if you want some baby Ellie and younger Sera aka "Seda Emmauld" (introduced in the chapter I'm going to be updating it with soon) 'Under the Changing Stars' is where you can get some of that.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Krem was antsy the whole way through the woods, taking a back-trail Thom told them about, suggested they use if they did have to retreat, he- Bull called them off, so they ran, but the Dreadnought, that explosion rattled their bones, holy hell. The Qun didn’t exactly seem like the sort of people that would accept an earnest ‘we tried!’.

Oh shit! Krem’s stomach plummeted when they caught up with the others, Bull was trudging though the mud with everyone just giving him space, following after him, looking like a funeral procession the mood was so very dire and he- he was carrying Ellie- oh Maker what hap-

He just barely heard her voice speaking against Bull’s hear before he set her on her feet where she was for all of a second before she winded Krem, jumping up to wrap her arms around his neck, he could feel her tears on the side of his neck.
She sniffled, sounding like she was on the verge of sobbing, “I di-didn’t kn-know what to do- are you hurt? You’re okay right?” she checked, chin quivering as she pulled back to look him up and down.

Little sore, beat up but they’d gotten off pretty light, considering. “’m fine, El.” Well that didn’t do anything but make her cry worse. She just started sobbing, oh man, it made his heart hurt more than anything the Venatori’d come at them with. He rubbed circles on her back, resting a hand on the crown of her head, “Shhh, honey hey. We’re all alright,” he promised.

Okay…yeah, sort of. Bull looked like hell, and everyone kept stealing glances at him, looking for something but only for the barest moments and then they were full blown averting their gaze. No one was saying much of anything as they made their way to camp, Krem kept an arm around Ellie’s shoulders, she just shook and she wouldn't stop, and he wasn’t sure if it was from the cold or if something spooked her, bad. No one spoke so much as a word while they made their way to camp, and even then, dead silence as Thom built up a warm fire under the bit of cover the Coast’s evergreens provided.

“Uh…”shit, no one was saying anything about what- what the fuck happened, what was going on? He was Lieutenant, but damn it if he didn’t even know how to start and he felt shitty that all he could think to ask was, “Chief? How did it go?”

“I’m Tal-va-fucking-shoth now. That’s how it went.”

Oh. Fuck.

Oh man, he could feel the sob working through Ellie's body as he rubbed her back, trying to comfort. “I’m so, so sorry the Iron Bull,” she whimpered out.

“I made the call Imekari, I knew the cost, and I was willing to pay it. Benefit of that was supposed to be you not beating yourself up for having to make the decision yourself—so cut it out, alright? Gonna break my damn heart and it’s not in the best shape right now.”

“Is there anything we can do?” she wanted to know, “I mean maybe we can find Gatt and talk to him before he says anything-“

“Nah boss-girl. Today was a test of my loyalty to the Qun. I failed. End of story.”

“Cause I can murder him,” she continued right along, “I’ll jack him up and forge a letter of recommendation to the Qun that you’re the Qunariest Qunari that ever Qunaried!”

“Love it, love your thinking there babe, but that’s not gonna do any good.”

“Well I mean they wanted you to prove you’re more loyal to them I-“ she gulped but, “the Iron Bull, you can report in about Fen’harel if you think-“

“They wouldn’t accept a report from me if it laid out the perfect plan for world domination, and no offense, but that craps so wild even if they did read it, they’d consider it an insult, me just being a dick and sending them something ridiculous. No—Imekari, that just now, was a set up. They’ve already tested me once with the lives of my crew. Pretty sure that’s what they’d get around to if I got let back into the club.”

“But that’s so dumb! I don’t- I mean I understand dreadnoughts are important, but loosing it shouldn’t be a reason for full-blown excommunication!”

Bull shook his head, “Imagine the Inquisition was facing Corypheus’s forces, and then all of a sudden, I stop killing his guys and start killing yours and it turns out I was on their side all along. That’s the equivalent of what I did today, in the Qun’s eyes. You might be all about forgiveness, but the Qun doesn’t forgive.”

Ellie nodded, sighing. “Sorry, I don’t mean to poke at it, I just- if I could fix this for you, I would, the Iron Bull.”

Bit of a rueful grin twitched at Bull’s lips. “I know. I appreciate it,” he sighed tiredly, running a hand over his face. “Alliance is off. I’m out of the Ben-Hessrath. I’m still your guy as long as you want me, Imekari but I’m basically just muscle now-”

“Bull,” she declared it—bull crap—“You’re not just muscle! You’ve got a big beautiful brain—yeah, you’re not going to be Ben-Hessrath, but that doesn’t stop you from putting you spy skills to use for the Inquisition, you could even see if Leliana would put you in the field as one of her agents if you wanted that kind of work again. You’ve still put us in contact with a lot of Ben-Hessrath agents already from what you’ve done for the Inquisition—Leliana can keep those contacts up I’m sure.”

“I could send word to her right away,” Marehis offered, “to see about securing relations with the agents and informants you’ve put us in contact with.”

Bull nodded. “Yeah, yeah that sounds good—good thinking you two. I’ll give you a list-”

Marehis shook her head, rising to her feet, she went to Bull and out-in-out kissed him on the forehead, “No need, Leliana and myself can sort through correspondence, I believe you’d planned to nap?” she prompted,

The Qunari sighed, “Alright. You need me, holler.” Marehis nodded and went to the requisition table to get to work. “Come on Imekari—you hittin’ it with me?”

“Oh-huh!” she assured, asking, “You wanna be big spoon or little spoon?”

“Might squish you if I’m little spoon.”

She nodded eagerly, cheerfully declaring, “If that’s how I go, that’s how I go!”

Bull actually laughed at that, so that was nice, shit. This whole thing had gone all kinds of sideways. He lumbered to his feet, walked right up to Ellie, and Krem took his arm off from around her shoulders because, yup, big guy just slung her over his shoulder like a sack of potatoes as he said, “Come on, little spoon, let’s lay it on down. You want in on this Krem de la Creme?”

Really? “Sure, in a minute,” Krem waved them on and Bull headed for a tent. Huh, so that was the ‘mega-tent’? Cool. Once they were out of sight he waited a second and then signed Follow me, standing and the Chargers followed him, trailed after by Ellie’s party, Marehis abandoning the requisitions table and they walked down the slope to the beach, to the shore where they were out of earshot of Bull.

“What the hell happened up there?” Krem wanted to know.

“Oh da’mi,” Marehis whimpered, reaching out and- yup, another hug, and a kiss on the forehead, while she fuzzed, wanting assurance that he was truly uninjured. She gave them the run down—what happened with their side of the mission, how that Gatt bloke ordered Bull to let things play out, not call a retreat so the Venatori would be focused on killing the Chargers instead of sinking the Dreadnought. That Bull chose them, even when it meant being excommunicated from the Qun. Just- he could never go back, ever, he just lost his entire way of life, his future.
“The Small One’s plan was sound,” Skinner ground out, drawing her daggers. “I will hunt this Gatt and I will slay him. Krem will lend me use of his binder and I will impersonate him, and the Iron Bull will not be removed from the Qun.”

He'd be glad to, and he hated to burst her bubble, but, “That might not work out, Skin.”

“I will at the very least infiltrate Par Vollen and hold hostage their leading officials to instill in them the fear of me, until they reinstate Bull,” and then she sighed. “May I at least please commit murder against the Qun-Elf? The Iron Bull is already kicked out, we have nothing left to lose.” Well, at least she said please? …that was actually pretty tempting but their attempts at alliance had failed so spectacularly, the last thing they needed was open rivalry with the Qun. So.

This was bad. This was stupid, stupid bad. He was grateful that big bastard saved their lives but- but fuck! Was it seriously worth- he’d die for that stupid oaf, whether that meant physically or for his livelihood. They all would. If he’d thought it was important enough, that the Inquisition needed his country more than his crew…well hell, it’s how he’d always thought he’d go out since he joined on. Big bad fight, horns pointing up*

Well. There wasn’t anything they could do about it now. Except ‘lay it on down’. Krem shot off a few quick messages to Skyhold to update papa, just let him know he and Ellie were alright, safe. And uh...he didn’t get into specifics, but Dorian...he wasn’t sure if he ever said as much, but dude definitely loved the big lug. So he just gave him a little ‘hey we’re safe but things went to shit and Bull’s hurting’. Then he dumped his boots and cuirass outside the tent, and settled in next to Bull who had an arm wrapped securely around Ellie, holding her to his chest in a way that reminded Krem of a kid needing to hold their favorite doll to sleep. Though the second Krem laid down he was half-startled by the oaf blindly slipping his arm up under him, and hoisting him up and in so he was squeezed into the space left on the Qunari’s chest. Well. He was warm, and there was an embarrassing factor—it shouldn’t be, but it was—that he liked sleeping with Bull like this, safe, like there wasn’t an ounce of danger in all the world. And he was right up next to Ellie who hummed in her sleep, stirring just a bit, enough to snuggle against Krem, twining a leg with his. So, zero complaints.

And there were definitely no complaints when there was a bit of disturbance—a welcome one. After a minute, Chargers started filing into the tent, Marehis, Varric, Sera, Thom, joining them to lay all around their Chief, their friend.

They did, however, wake to loud complaining, shit how long had they fallen asleep? Three hours? Holy shit had the guy sprouted wings and flown?

“Fasta vass! My word, this is the most ghastly place in all of existence,” Dorian voiced his qualms with the Coast, feet splashing in the mud, “Where the hell is everyone?”

Ellie stirred, mumbling, “Guapo? Honesty time? Did you just hear Dorian’s voice or have I officially gone absolutely insane?”

“You’re all good for now—I hear him too,” he assured, pressing a kiss to her forehead.

She nodded and sat up a bit on her forearm, leaning so she could kiss the Qunari on the cheek. “The Iron Bull, someone’s here to see you.”

Bull grumbled tiredly, cracking his eye open to look at her. “I heard ‘im,” he sighed. “You brats wanna get off me?”

“No, but that’s ‘cause it’s cold. And I love you. But we’ll get up—Cremisius, would you Dorian was drenched, but he’d been able to figure out ‘the hell’ everyone went was the tent, so he was coming in, brushing past Ellie and Krem on their way out and just flopping onto Bull like the Qunari was a mattress.

“I do not know what happened. Krem’s message sounded dire, so I came. You are to hold me until I regain feeling in my limbs it is freezing here.”

“You didn’t have to come, Sparky,” Bull grunted.

“And yet here I am, incredible, isn’t it?”

Bull sighed, bit of a smile just at the corners of his lips. “Yeah, yeah,” he drawled.

Marehis, Thom, and Stitches followed after Ellie and Krem, looking through their stores.

“What are you thinking of making, da’vehnani?” Marehis asked the girl.

“Cake,” Ellie said.

“Pancakes?”

“Cake-cakes!”

Uh…yeah. He wasn’t sure how to swing it without an oven, but apparently putting batter in a frying pan and covering it with a lid over the campfire worked just as well. She had a stash of cookies she broke out, and then they melted chocolate, mixed it up with some butter they warmed and let it cool which…was pretty damn good, made softer, sweet chews of the stuff.

Which was baffling enough to everyone that went along with it, let alone Bull who was one of the last people to emerge from the tent and lay his eye on the sweet feast.

“Uhhh…” was all he could manage as he tried to think of just what to ask.

“We’re having dessert for dinner!” Ellie announced.

“Dessert for dinner?” Bull parroted uncertainly.

“Uh-huh!” she enthused, explaining, “The Qun is dumb, it’s cancelled—they gave you up, fuck ‘em!”

“Imekari, don’t say-“

“Fuck ‘em!” she insisted. “They make dumb decisions like dessert not being important, and you not being a total psychopath being a character flaw. We’re making good life choices here in the Inquisition—celebrating that we get to keep you for permanent and eating cake!”

Bull rumbled out a quiet chuckle, shaking his head and shrugging. “Fuck ‘em,” he supposed, seating himself at Ellie’s side before he maneuvered her to sit on his thigh.

That was as much as they talked about it—Dorian didn’t look shocked out of his mind that Bull wasn’t a member of the Qun anymore, but Krem figured they’d been talking while everyone was working on dinner. Dessert. Which was good, almost stomach-ache levels of sweet, and Sera straight up landed herself with a sugar high, but Bull was eating good, and smiling, and pretty content after such a shitshow of a day so, overall, it was well worth the extra elbow grease they put into brushing their teeth.

Bull was real quiet as the evening wound down, everyone started filtering into the tent to get some shut eye, and maybe give the guy some privacy. Ellie stood and stretched, kissed Krem on the cheek and wished him good night, hugged Bull with some extra effort, and she whispered something against his ear that had the guy rubbing her back and saying, “I’ll keep it in mind. Thanks boss.”

“I’ll leave it out for you, just in case,” she said before leaving them.

To their silence, it seemed. Krem wasn’t sure what to say. Varric had poured them all mugs of his bourbon, just straight up leaving the bottle at Bull’s feet, knocking back his own drink and heading for bed.

“Well, this is all well and good, but I’m knackered,” Dorian confessed, Krem would be too he supposed if he’d ridden at break-neck speed to turn the six hour leisurely jaunt to the Storm Coast from Skyhold into three. Though the Tevinter looked at him, hard, like he was trying to say something without saying something audible. But uh, he got the drift, he thought? Krem nodded and Dorian smiled and said, “You may enjoy the swing of my hips as I walk away, I assure you the sight is spectacular.”

Bull huffed out something close to a laugh. Did take the dude up on the offer though, so Krem stared into the fire and let them have their uh, moment, sipping at his bourbon as he tried to think of what exactly the fuck to say. Thanks for not letting us die? Sorry about the loss of your entire religion?

“You wrote him?” Bull broke the silence. Well, at least Krem could follow along.

“Yeah. Was that okay?”

Bull shrugged. “Not a bad idea. Kind of had me worried there though,” he admitted. “Heard his voice and thought it was just me. Madness setting in already,” he cleared his throat, awkwardly, tense before he said, “Cremisius.”

Oh shit. Krem took a few more burning sips of his drink before meeting Bull’s eye. “Yeah?”

Guy was tense in his silence and then, “I get bad, start going crazy—when I’m not me anymore, you kill that bastard and walk away like nothing happened.”

“I’m not going to kill you-“

“Not asking you to. I’m ordering you to kill this body if the mind inside of it losses it,” he said, like that was much better. “I’ll be uh…keeping my distance. I’ll go wherever Imekari goes, keep her safe, and I’ll still be your Chief but I’m giving you the heads up now—I’ll need you to be ready to take over, permanently. I’ll up your pay. If you’re not interested, I’ll talk to Sarge. In the meantime, I’ll make arrangements—mega tent is nice but I think I’ll hole up somewhere else tonight, and see about getting a place to sequester myself in Skyhold when I sleep.” Normal people would call that ‘getting a bedroom’ but okay. “Laying down for a while was fine-

“Because you weren’t asleep. I know.”

Bull nodded. “Can’t be too careful, I freak out or something, I don’t want to be anywhere near Imekari, you guys when that happens.”

“When that happens, huh?” Krem asked. “So, what? You’re just throwing in the towel? You’re Tal-Vashoth now, so that automatically means you’re doomed to be crazy—“

“It’s how it works, Krem—“

“Bullshit! Literally, that’s total shit coming out of your damn mouth, Bull. Of course the Qun says everyone that doesn’t fall in line is automatically evil or crazy, that there’s some terrible consequence, you’ll just fall to pieces if you don’t have the Qun leashing you. Bull. Look at this—look at us. You stopped living under the Qun for way more than six hours ago. If you were actually going to suddenly go insane, it would have already happened—when you got your tattoos, started seeing sex as more than just a routine mechanic of being alive, eating what you like, drinking what you like. Sharing your Ben-Hessrath techniques with your men, with Ellie. Teaching her Qunlat? She’s Saarebas, and a Human one at that. But you sleep with her, protect her, you’re there for her way more than your job description demands. You’re there for all of us more than the Qun wanted you to be, that’s why we’re here today. You didn’t choose to forgo the Qun today, Chief. You made that choice a long time ago, Ben-Hessrath just wanted to verify it for themselves. If you’d made the choice they wanted, they’d have probably taken you back—you’d be free of the crew that was ‘leading you astray’ and rededicate yourself.” Krem sighed, “Look. You go crazy, sure, I’ll take you out in a heartbeat. But maybe just don’t go crazy.”

“Just don’t? Just like that?”

“Just like that.”

Bull nodded. “Okay then.”

“So no ’sequestering’ yourself or whatever the fuck. If you’re worried you’ll freak out in your sleep, take potion or whatever, shit, I get you might uh,” have nightmares, “not sleep well. Pulling yourself out of your life isn’t going to grant you stability, that’s like being afraid your house is gonna fall in on itself, so you rip it off its foundation.”

“Oh, I see how it is,” Bull accused, “you don’t want a promotion ’cause you’re thinking of switching things up, going into construction.”

“Yup, and you’re gonna fuck up my whole life plan if you go off the deep end and I gotta babysit your crew.”

Bull grumbled, sounded almost frustrated but he said, “You’re a good kid, brat,” then he sighed. “Alright. I’m gonna hit it. Imekari said uh, she’s leaving potion out, that I can try a couple bottles of what puts her to sleep, and if I want, she and Stitches’ll whip up some.”

“Sounds good,” Krem said. “We’re all here for you, Chief. Need anything, just say the word.”

Bull nodded, tousling Krem’s hair before lumbering to his feet, “Alright, that’s enough of that crap. You comin’?”

“Yeah, in a bit,” Krem said. Then, “Hey Bull?”

He stopped before the tent, looking over his shoulder. “Yeah?”

“Thanks.” Thanks didn’t even begin to cover it.
Got him a grunt and, “Right back at ya.”

Krem made sure camp was secure before heading to lay down, did a quick perimeter check, passed one of those weird ass glowing skull things and…huh. Okay, not laying it down just yet. There was someone down below, on the beach. Familiar someone, so,

She didn’t seem to notice him as he approached so he stepped a bit more solidly to make sure his footsteps were crunching in the stony shore, cleared his throat before prompting, albeit concerned, “Hey lovely, whatcha’ doin’ out here?” Alone, from what he could tell, unless Cole was along for the trip with Dorian, but the friendly Spirit wouldn’t have kept his arrival unknown. Ellie was standing just at the edge of the tide rolling in, in her night clothes, but at least she put her cloak and boots on before coming down here. He trusted her, trusted her to come to someone if she was thinking about throwing herself into the ocean or something but still, it was worrisome that he didn’t even see Marehis shadowing her, keeping an eye on her while giving her space or anything.

Ellie turned to look up at him, hastily wiping tears from her eyes, “Cremisius, hi. Just um, kind of needed to breathe? Think a bit. Today was hard,” she shrugged, sighing contentedly as he wrapped his arms around her, tucked her head up under his chin.

“I get that,” he said, rubbing her back.

She sniffled, “I- I was so scared Cremisius. I d-didn’t know what to do, I just froze. I didn’t want the Iron Bull to be excommunicated but I couldn’t just let you all die and I just- I was so scared that anything I could say would make it worse or-“ oh man, he pressed his lips to the top of her head when she started sobbing, “I was so afraid you were going to die and- and-“

“Hey, shhh shhh shhh shh, sweetheart, it’s okay,” he promised, “We’re all okay, alive, and we’ll get Bull through this. I’m sorry you were given such a scare. It wasn’t- no matter what went down, Ellie, none of it would have been your fault.”

“Kay,” she said, leaning back to wipe at her eyes.

“You uh…you know if anything-“

Oh man, her expression crumbled at that, “Don’t,” she begged, burring her face against his chest.

“C’mon El. Lovely, if anything ever happened to me, I wouldn’t- I wouldn’t want you to even be sad. Do you even realize how incredible these last few months have been? You, and Bull, and the Inquisition—you’ve given me so much, I wouldn’t’ve had any regrets. I’d want you to move on, find someone that makes you happy, treats you right.”

Ellie was pulling back but not away which was nice, he liked having her so close, warm against him as she looked up into his face. “I love you, Cremisius.”

“I love you too.”

She wrapped her arms around his neck and popped up on her toes to press her lips to his, something long and deep and fierce. Uhh…was it wrong to wonder if maybe he should request more hazardous working conditions? It was, it was terrible but she wasn’t even done kissing him and he was already needing to figure out just how to have it happen again, and again and again. Addiction, in the sweetest sense.

And then she’s lowering herself but he follows, not breaking their kiss even as she’s on her feet, her hands on his chest, pushing him but not away, she’s walking so he moves with her until his backside meets an abandoned sailboat flipped over on the shoreline, he’s right up against the curve of it’s side and it’s low enough he can sort of lean back, sitting on it. Wasn’t sure how long it’d been there, but it seemed sturdy enough, which was uh, good considering the moment he was seated, Ellie straddled his hips, her knees finding purchase against the boat as she wrapped her arms around his neck again, so he brought his arms up to support her, hand on her bottom, the other slipping up under her shirt to support her back and relish in the warmth of her skin. She nipped at his bottom lip before pressing a kiss lower, on his jawline, leaving a trail of kisses along his jaw as she worked her way down to his neck.

“I’m ready,” she whispered against his skin, before taking some between her teeth, nipping, sucking the way she did so well he was pretty sure it had to be illegal.

“Ready?” for…for what? Were they doing something? Why were they down on the shore again? What was happening?

She giggled into his neck, “For sex?”

“Oh,” he said, “Cool,” he supposed as she kept up the good work of hickey making. Took a second. Maybe more than a second, his brain was only a little bit distracted right now, “Wait, wait wait, right now?”

“Is that okay?” she asked.

“Uhh—El, lovely, I’m always down for it, whenever you’re ready but we’re not doing anything, not here at least.”

“Oh gosh! Right, um,” she looked over her shoulder to peer up at their campsite and then, “I mean we just have the one tent, but we could get our bedrolls and go on a walk, there’s a cave—“

“Honey,” he offered laughingly, pressing his forehead against her own, “I mean not here as in the Storm Coast full stop. We are so not having our first time on the floor of some cave.” Especially not for her first first time. Wait, “Ellie, you had a big scare today, it’s normal to uh, want to be close, but I don’t want you rushing something before you’re really—“

“But I am!” she insisted, “I mean I’m not rushing—I am ready, I have been for awhile now, just, you know. We decided we weren’t going to do anything until after the Breach, and we’ve been just a little busy since then.”

Okay, that was better, but still, “Then you’ll still be ready when we get home. We’ll do things right—have a nice date, if you’re still in the mood there’ll be a soft bed, maybe a little candlelight? And uh, you should probably check out my uh…“

“Saartoh Nehrappan?” she prompted when he fumbled with his words. Fuck him, he still had trouble pronouncing the clunky Qunlat phrase for what Bull called a ‘strap on’ in Trade.

He nodded. “You know. Just to make sure you’d be comfortable?” it wasn’t like the thing was massive, he didn’t have some sort of crazy complex, it was a good size for getting things done. If she uh…still wanted to go that route, was cool with penetration, it should be something she has a say in, if he needed to get something different she’d be more confident handling or satisfied by, he would.

“Kay,” she said, biting her lip before she sighed, blushing, “I’m sorry.”

“Nothing to be sorry for, lovely. I mean I’m flattered as hell you’d get so worked up over me even a cave—possibly full of spiders—would seem appealing.”
She squeaked at that, hugging him almost like she was looking for actual protection from the action, burying her face against his neck, “I didn’t think about the spiders!” she half-shrieked in panic as he chuckled.

“Come on, pretty sure there’s no spiders back in camp and we should probably head that way before someone raises alarm you’re not there and Skinner starts cutting people in a panic to find you. She’d straight up stab everyone if she thinks you were lost.”

Ellie giggled at that, “She would not!”

She would. Skinner was straight pissed—Thom was the one who figured out Ellie wasn’t in her bedroll, he’d been checking on her before he laid down and saw she was gone, and Bull went looking, saw she was on the beach talking with Krem and left them be, told everyone they were cool.

“Crem-isius!” oh holy shit Skinner whipped out his name, “How dare you steal away the Small One without telling anyone! My heart—it hurts, it is exhausted, you made me feel fear!”

“Sorry, sorry!” Ellie chirped, kneeling down to sit with Skinner and take hold of her hands, “I was safe, honest—I went to get some air and Cremisius joined me, he made sure I was safe. I’m sorry I scared you.”

Skinner blinked at that, processing, before breathing a sigh. “If you need more air I will cut a hole in the tent. Do you wish that, da’len?” double holy shit, Skinner never used Dalish.

Ellie giggled at the suggestion, shaking her head ‘no’, “That’s okay, I’m fine now, but thanks, that’s really sweet of you.”

Skinner let out something like a frustrated growl and then she patted Ellie on the head. “I would destroy many things for you.”

“Awe, thanks Skinner!”

“That…was almost normal,” Bull said to Krem under his breath.

“The Small One is very precious to me!” Skinner snapped at him.

So much so Krem’s plans on getting to sleep alongside his girl were pretty well shot. Between Marehis and Sera on her left, and Skinner wrapping herself around Ellie’s right side, it was an Elves-only event. Dorian was laying with his head against Bull’s chest and he reached out and grabbed Krem’s wrist, pulling to get his attention and jerking his head to indicate Bull’s free side. Eh. Not a bad spot to end up in he supposed. Unless there was something to that whole ‘Qun madness’ thing, but he was on the oaf’s blind side, he could take him. Probably.

Though uh, might not have felt so safe when, Ellie fast asleep against Skinner, the Elf woman ran a hand through the girl’s hair and assured them all, “If anything were to happen to her, I would kill everyone in this tent, and then myself*.”

Bull sighed, “Yup, spoke too soon.”

They were just finishing breakfast and working on packing up to hoof it to the stables they’d left their horses at, when word came from Skyhold…which was almost funny, because it came from the Storm Coast, to Skyhold, and then back again. From the Blades of Hessarian. Their scouts had apparently caught sight of Red Templar activity on the Coast. The Inquisition had some people look into it, and they found an operation working out of caves on the far side of the Coast, near this weird Dwarven door Ellie and her party had found but couldn’t get through last time they were here.

“Yay, we’ve more reason to stay in this wretched place, oh my heart is overjoyed,” Dorian offered with false cheer as they began the trek through the woods.

“That’s the spirit, Sparky,” Bull chuckled, clapping the Tevinter Mage on the shoulder.

“Watch your step here, Ellie-girl, it’s slick,” Thom cautioned as they made their way up a zip-zagging slope upward that had the most _comforting_ sign warning of rock falls. So, Krem was pretty glad Thom’s words had Ellie slipping her arm through Krem’s and keeping close. Helpful for him too, really—he’d woken up with a bit of a stuffy head from all this cold and rain, it wasn’t too bad and it cleared up as they walked along, sharing the Embrium steam from her necklace. That was uh, pretty damn good idea Sera and Wolfy had. Bastard.

They broke for lunch once they reached their furthest most camp, just about a half mile out from the reported Red Templar activity. Bull’s leg was bothering him and Ellie complained she was cold and tired, which led to him sitting and resting his leg instead of assisting with meal prep, while Ellie sat in his lap, reclining against his chest. Hand genuinely seemed to be hurting or something, getting to her, she rubbed at her Mark like it was sore—Sera was helping Marehis with getting food together and Dalish was out on patrol with Grim and Rocky to make sure the area was secure, but Sera looked to Skinner, “Oi, Stabby. Go hold Ink’s hand for a bit, kay?”

Ellie immediately stopped rubbing at her hand—like if she moved fast enough they’d think they hadn’t seen it at all—and Skinner came over, looked at the Mark and uh, Well, she didn’t hold Ellie’s hand, but she sat on the ground in front of her and then reached back, took hold of her wrist and let her rest her hand on top of her head. Which was technically contact with an Elf, seemed to help. He...he used to resent his parents’ wishes that he’d turn out to be a mage, the only appeal had ever been a boost in status and that paled with him. But he almost wished he were one, now, able to distract the Mark for her.

Parents...he really hoped Papa was completely in the dark about what went down yesterday, he was already worried enough about Krem’s job. He’d already been dropping hints that he’d be drumming up more business here soon, that he’d need an assistant, and if Krem wanted he was more than welcome to fill that role. If he found out how badly things could have gone on their end, he’d freak—demand Krem come to work for him, and he didn’t want to hurt his father’s feelings, but that just wasn’t going to fly. It wasn’t that he _didn’t_ want to, but he _didn’t want to_—he’d always be down for helping out around the shop on his down time from the Chargers, sure, but he...this was a big part of who he was now. Might not always be that way, but for now, it was, he didn’t plan on letting his contract run out at the end of the business year, that was for sure.

Lunch was good—they regrouped and came up with a game plan. With their numbers, they hoped taking out the Red Templar operations here would be something of a breeze. And it’d be good—they came here to stop a Red Lyrium shipment, maybe it wasn’t being sent to the Venatori—they were working in conjecture with the Red Templars, they had the same boss. So, the Venatori smuggled, and the Templars were processors of it or something, maybe they’d end up stopping that shipment after all. That’d for sure help Bull, he thought, and the Inquisition, turn yesterday’s failure into today’s victory.

“Be super super careful guys,” Ellie cautioned as they approached the Dwarven door, “Red Lyrium is dangerous—do _not_ touch it, and try to be careful breathing around it. We still aren’t entirely sure how everyone got so sick with it in the almost-future.”
“Got it, Imekari. We’ll keep sharp,” Bull promised.

Bull was able to get the first door open easy enough, let them into this cavernous area that led to a natural walkway around the mountainside, though their right was wide open to the ocean, waves crashing and Krem’s heart sort of pounded to the beat, shit—he could swim but armor wasn’t exactly the best swimsuit and he was kind of afraid Ellie’d fall in.

She nearly did, shit, he hadn’t meant to but he’d been flanking her and she stopped abruptly, bending over to pick something up and he—Maker literally murder him, please? Bull was chuckling—had to restrain himself, bury his face in the crook of his arm to keep his full-blown laughter from giving away their position. Because Krem knocked right into Ellie’s butt, and she’d started falling forward, splaying her free hand to catch herself as she stumbled and Krem just— he didn’t want her falling and getting hurt so his hands automatically went to her hips, pulling her back against him—

It-! He just-! Bull could bite him! Sera too—she turned bright red and shrieked. It was perfectly innocent, he wasn’t intentionally dry humping his girlfriend in the middle of a mission!

“Sera, shhh,” Ellie chastised as she rose, giggling a bit as she turned to face Krem, it was only then he realized he hadn’t taken his hands from her hips. She smiled up at him and showed him what she picked up, “Look—it—magic found a key. I wonder what it opens.”

Turns out it opened this huge-ass door*. Working their way through, taking out those Red Templar bastards, Maker, they were monsters—they found a few nodes of Red Lyrium Varric took particular pleasure in blowing to smithereens. And then there was one of those Elf Artifacts. Ellie bit her lip, paced in the corridor for all of five minutes thinking it over and considering what to do about it—it was right near a drop off into a ravine that emptied into the ocean, Krem would have been more than happy to dump the damn thing for her.

“Sera, Mami, come here a minute please,” Ellie said, “the Iron Bull, would you and the Chargers mind checking out the next chamber with everyone else?”

“You got it boss-girl,” the Qunari assured.

Wasn’t too sure what went down, but they cleared out the lower chamber and when they came back, the artifact was blazing wild with Fade light, Sera was kneeling, catching her breath, sandwiched between Ellie and Marehis, the younger girl asking questions against Sera’s ear, Sera nodded a few times and then she took a deep breath and popped up, offering her hands to Marehis and Ellie to help them up.

“Ready to finish these assholes off?” Bull asked.

“Everyone feeling okay? Any injuries need looked at?” Ellie checked first, bottom lip pouting out when she saw Grim’s face was bruised and his right hand looked messed up, knuckles busted and bleeding. She bounced her way to his side, pulling out a bottle of Elf Root tonic, uncorking it with her teeth before dousing one of the bandage rounds she kept in her belt and reaching out for his hand and carefully brushing potion along his knuckles—Stitches followed suit, looking over an injury on Thom’s upper arm, Skinner and Dalish both knocked back health potion for themselves. “Everyone all good? Cool! Let’s move!”

Cleared out the final chamber, this big cave mouth that led directly out onto the water, had a little dock set up and everything. Seemed wild they didn’t get their shipments in to this port, but Krem supposed that while the Venatori and Red Templars may work for the same people, it didn’t mean they knew that, or if they did, that they trusted one another to let them directly into their area.
“Da’vehnan?” Marehis questioned in Ellie’s direction, she was standing on the docks staring out across the water, hard, like she was looking for something through the fog.

“Magic feels funny,” Ellie said distractedly. Funny? Like sick or something? She was squinting and then she gasped, looked flat out excited and then she let out something like a squeal, which was definitely excited as she jumped in place, whirling about and declaring in sing song, “The Iron Bull! I know something that’ll make you feel better!”

“What’s up, Imekari?” Bull asked, coming to stand with her. She took his hand, and used her free one to point across the water, Krem could just make out the silhouette of a land mass through the fog, and Ellie announced, “We’re going to fight a dragon!”

Was it physically possible to think two complete, clear thoughts at once? Because Holy shit, yeah! A dragon! And Cassandra’s going to kill us zipped across Krem’s brain in perfect unison.

Because fuck yeah—a dragon! That’d put the pep right up into Bull’s step, and give them a damn good fight! But Cassandra was going to murder him—murder him dead, let Dorian resurrect him, and then murder him twice for letting Ellie go anywhere near a dragon.

“Dragon seems pretty dangerous, and we just came through a pretty big fight El-“ he- he started-he tried! He did! He wanted it on his damn gravestone—Here lies Cremisius Aclassi, son, boyfriend, Lieutenant: the handsome bastard tried.

Because Cassandra might kill him but Ellie was all big, beautiful, hopeful eyes—were they sparkling somehow? How was the light hitting them like that? Who made her this damn pretty- she was pouting! And then she said, “Please, Cremisius?”

And then Bull the ass that he was, he dropped to his knees to be Ellie-height, put his big dumb eye on him and pouted, “Yeah, please Cremisius?”

They were the bloody bosses! "I guess."

They both hooted cheers at that, Bull shooting up onto his feet shouting, "Hell yeah! Let's go make some Creme-brulee!"

Glad to hear that have Ellie gasping out, “Oh!” followed by, “If that bitch burns my boyfriend she’s so dead!”

The Storm Coast was, without doubt, the most wretched place on the planet, Dorian was certain. Atrocious. It took its own name far too seriously, all this rain, and it was freezing, and- and the events that passed there had hurt the Iron Bull, and that- that just did not sit well with him. No one got to hurt that man—he was a good man, terribly honorable, disgustingly compassionate, unrelentingly selfless- it was- he didn’t deserve to be kicked out of a bar, let alone his entire culture proper.

He did seem a good deal more cheery about it all, in the wake of their Dragon fight. Dorian didn’t think he’d ever seen him so satisfied—which was rather insulting mind, because he was certain he’d more appeal than a dragon. Didn’t he? Hmm, he had put on a bit of weight since joining the Inquisition…of course he’d lost a great deal of weight in the past few years. And the only note the Qunari had made of the change was positive, an appreciative rumble in his chest as he gripped fistfuls of the Tevinter mage’s buttocks, said he was glad to see more meat on his bones. So yes, Dorian was certain he should be absolutely insulted by how very elated dragon slaying had made the Qunari.

“Hold still, would you?” Dorian chided, honestly. They were in for the evening, regrouped in their camp and patching up from their Dragon fight. Bull’d been clawed right along his back, up over his shoulders and they’d been able to get it to cease bleeding, but he was quite the bear to bandage—large enough it took two to do it, and Dorian was assisting Stitches with that as the Charger’s regular assistant Healer was rather preoccupied and…being held captive, after a fashion. By the Charger’s Lieutenant, he was seated with Ellie laying against him, Marehis and Sera were fussing over the Inquisitor while she sat, breathing copious amounts of Embrium and Elf Root Steam from a rag—this dragon had flailed a great deal of lightning, left smoking rubble in its wake, and there’d been one point she’d panicked because her Mark produced rather the spectacular Fade tear. Her new ability granted at the hands of Corypheus seemed to render the Dragon paralyzed, it got caught in the midst of it, thrashing limbs moving sluggishly and then stopping altogether. The tear itself seemed to inflict some damage upon the beast, and likewise they were able to take their swings at it without risk of being hurt. Between so much smoke, and surprise, and how very draining this ability was, her asthma was in a bit of pique.

“We beat a fucking dragon, Sparky! A Sparky dragon!” the Iron Bull defended his restless enthusiasm.

“I hate that horrendous nickname but you aren’t to give it away to some reptilian corpse,” Dorian snapped.

“Jealous?”

“Hardly.”

The Iron Bull chuckled at that. “Whatever helps you sleep at night.”

This great buffoon helped him to sleep at night, is what! Hopefully, with some luck, this dragon fight would sate his appetite for such adventure quite some time.

“Good job today guys,” Bull said, addressing the group once Stitches finished dressing his wound. “We took out some serious Red Templar business today, and managed to stop and destroy their red lyrium operations. And we slayed a damn dragon, got some damn good materials for the Inquisition—all in all…” he decided, “Storm Coast was a success.”

His men and Ellie’s party offered up little whoops and cheers.

“Think we’ll head out tomorrow, boss-girl?”

“Uh-huh!” she chirped, muffled, but cheery through the cloth she was breathing into, “We’ll hoof it into town and get our horses—you can tell Russel how our mission went!” she offered him the honor.

“You got it, Imekari. Hungry, babe? We’ll get some dinner goin’ and call it a night.”

It certainly was—half their members, Ellie included were out like a light before the meal was through, even Dorian felt himself dozing off, they’d had rather the taxing day. He was almost jealous of little Ellie when she was spared the task of taking herself to bed as Krem took her up in his arms and carried her into a tent, who was going to carry him? He was tired! Not ‘a horrific Fade Power popped out of my hand by surprise and drained me of my worldly energy’ tired, but he was certain he was fairly close.

Of course, he hadn’t expected his idiot lover to hoist him over his uninjured shoulder, it was…appreciated, but absurd. And lovely, he didn’t have to lift a finger to make his way to his bedroll, or Bull’s bedroll, a large thing that covered nearly the whole of the floor of one of the small Inquisition tents, they were rather spoiled by Madam de Fer’s dearly departed tent, thankfully a replacement was underway…though this wasn’t too terrible. Cozy, it was the first time he’d said as much about a small space and truly meant it. The Qunari’s body heat alone made the space deliciously warm, bedding soft, and while the man had thrown Dorian over his shoulder like an utter barbarian, he laid him down with care, gently.

“I ever say thank you, for coming?” Bull asked as he laid behind him, wrapping his arm up under Dorian and holding him against his chest, a warm hand splaying low on Dorian’s chest.

“Hmm, no, you never do, and you really should—it is a gift after all, from me to you—“

That drew a smile from the Qunari, “You know what I mean. Thank you, Kadan. For coming here.”

“Ahh. Well. You’re welcome,” he certainly couldn’t have just lazed about in his library chair with a good book while the Iron Bull was er, hurting. Mostly because Skyhold’s library doesn’t have many good books to speak of.

“Man that was a good fight,” Bull breathed as he relaxed beneath him.

“Apparently. What was that you said, when we were fighting it? Tarsid annie halsim?”

His bungled pronunciation earned him a warm, quiet chuckle against his ear, “Taarsidathan halsaam,” the Iron Bull corrected, teeth nipping at the tender flesh of his ear lobe, “means: I will bring myself sexual pleasure later, while thinking about this with great respect.”

“Oh, how lovely.” But wait- that, that was almost famil-

“Mhmhm. You can watch if you want, I can make it worth your while.”

“Can you now?” Dorian couldn’t help but tease, smile pulling at his lips. “When I think on it, haven’t you said that before?” and then, “You’ve shouted it!” On at least three different occasions while they were together, “The Iron Bull…do you pleasure yourself while thinking back on our dalliances?”

The hand on his front slipped dangerously low, “Definitely, Kadan—if you’re quiet, I can return the favor…”

Hmm…he could stand a little…

Nothing. He could stand nothing at all, apparently. His next conscious thought was wondering what the bloody hell was going on with the damn moon—sunlight was pouring through the slack in the opening of their tent. He’d fallen asleep, the Iron Bull snoring against his face, drool on Dorian’s cheek. Not the bodily fluid he would be flattered to receive there, he needed a bath.

A bath! Not a shower! Maker this place was hell, wet, disgusting hell. At least the rain assisted in cleansing his face as he plopped—gracefully—into the seat across the fire from Ellie who was assisting Thom and Varric with breakfast, a great many eggs sizzling in a pan, bacon in another, bread warming on a stone by the fire. There was some sort of hair chain—Krem, his hair in good form, was styling Sera’s for her, while she brushed Marehis’s who was more playing with Ellie’s hair than anything else, making quiet chatter with the girl while she cooked.

“Good morning, Dorian!” Ellie offered once he was seated, “Breakfast will be ready soon—did you sleep well?”

“I did, yourself?”

“Uh-huh! Gosh, Dragon slaying is hard but it should honestly be prescribed to help with troubles sleeping because I was out last night.”

He was glad to hear it, glad to see her consistently in genuine spirits. That…had been a level of motivation in his trip to the Coast. He wasn’t exactly certain what went wrong, but whatever it was, Ellie considered herself responsible for Inquisition operations, for the actions of her team and the like, and to some extent she was but she took it hard, usually found some way or another to lay the blame solely upon herself. He was pleased to see she was working through this, not punishing herself for the Qun’s utter foolishness. It was hardly her fault. She—she was ridiculously—she had a dangerous amount of empathy—that wasn’t an endeavor to be pithy, that was truth, it was dangerous. She’d been so sad when she learned the details behind Dorian’s departure from his parents’ home. Had felt so terribly he’d been hurt in such a way. But she was also…kind, perhaps wise. He’d been nervous, exposing that truth, admitting he’d nearly fallen prey to a Blood Ritual meant to alter his very mind, addle him, at the hands of his mother and father. Something about it felt pathetic, and there was a measure of fear that he would not be believed, he was sure there were many who wouldn’t. Maevaris only believed him because her father had railed against such practices—there were many in the Magisterium who came to Athanir when Maevaris came out, offering condolences and saying if he wished to do something about it there were any number of rituals that would change her mind, her thinking on her own gender. Dorian had fled, hidden, and then cowered in the face of meeting a ‘retainer’ that might return him to his parents and he’d feared Ellie would…would think him a coward. But he should have known better—Cole had already verified as much, granted it was back before they were wholly certain they could trust the Spirit that came to their aid in the Templar fortress.

“…why doesn’t he understand he’s so much more than circumstance? He can build better than what was broken because he is brave,” it almost felt like prophecy now, given,

“I think you’re very brave,” Ellie said, taking a moment to speak with Dorian in private—checking on him after his discussion with his father. Maker, this girl worried for him it was…annoyingly appreciated. “It’s not easy to abandon tradition and walk your own path. It took courage, to speak with your father, Dorian.” Kissed him on the bloody cheek. Made him feel proud like when he’d first woken his magic, been accepted to the Circle of Carastes*. That was ridiculous. Oh, he loved the girl, it was awful. Loved her, loved this life. Loved…

“Hell yeah, breakfast—Imekari, gimme a cheek girl, mwah,” the Iron Bull was awake, kneeling to kiss Ellie on the cheek while he snuck a piece of bacon straight out of the pan with his bare hand and tearing off a bite with his teeth, “You make the best damn bacon- hey!”

Apparently she did—the half of what was left of the strip in his hand was taken between the teeth of one Cremisius Aclassi and stolen, the Lieutenant agreeing, “Yeah, she does,” around the mouthful.

For whatever reason that had the girl blushing as she admitted, “I asked your papa how you like it,” with a shrug. That got the softest smile from the Lieutenant and he leaned down to kiss the top of her head, murmuring that it was sweet of her.

More savory, Dorian thought—their meal, it was very good. And then they were off, walking, trudging through the yuck and mud, at least…well at least he wasn’t Varric or Rocky though the duo had formed a Dwarven alliance of sorts, supporting each other, an arm slung over each other’s shoulders as they synchronized their steps, one not taking a step without the other when they got to particularly treacherous mud they sunk into up to their knees. They’d pride to defend he supposed, Sera saw how far the shortest members of their group were sinking and shrieked that someone needed to ‘Save Inky!’ Thom was near and knelt so Ellie could ride piggyback, which sorted, she was still exhausted from yesterday, it took all of five minutes for her to go from chatting amicably with the Mercenary to falling asleep on him mid conversation. Thom was rather the good sport about it all, humming quietly—it was almost pleasant, he was flat just about every other note, but he had the spirit.

The horse Dorian commandeered for his impromptu trip to the Storm Coast was…a resentful creature, it was eyeing him, when they arrived, glaring. With the intent to kill. It was an emergency! The damn brat Lieutenant had been vague in his missive, ‘we’re safe but Bull is hurting’ what the hell did that mean? Was he physically hurt or emotionally? Was he sick, did he need help?! He’d admittedly run the horse rather harshly, and he was sorry, paid the stable hands extra to make certain the beast was cared for with specialty. But he supposed money didn’t mean much to the creature.

It did warm up to him after Ellie insisted Dorian thank him, and try feeding him a bit. He didn’t think he was going to be thrown any time soon, at least. Still, he did not like riding on his own, it was nerve wracking to say the least.

And that damn Qunari—too kind. He rode alongside Dorian’s steed, hands on the reins of Bitsy’s saddle but his elbow was sticking out further than what was necessary, far enough that should Dorian find himself unsteady or falling, he had something to take hold of…light as he was holding the reins, perhaps Bull was prepared to whisk him to safety. Which was ridiculous. And appreciated.

It was relieving to see Skyhold standing strong, waiting for them when they returned, passing across the bridge and through the gates where- oh goodness, Tonio Aclassi wasn’t exactly a young man but he could certainly move rushing down the steps into the lower courtyard.

“Bello mio! My boy!” the man was greeting as Krem chuckled and dismounted his horse, his father colliding with him to take him up in a crushing hug. “Let me look at you—were you injured at all? You must tell me everything—have you eaten?”

“I’m fine papa, not hurt no, I had breakfast-“

“Oh!” the man exclaimed like his child had just informed him he was dying this very instant of starvation, "You must be famished!"

“Yeah, let me settle some things,” returning and watering their horses, helping unload the great many resources they’d pulled from their dragon slaying, Dorian was glad he was merely bedding a Charger and not one of their crew, “and we’ll catch up-“

“Cremisius!”

Well the Lieutenant was a popular young man. Seeker Pentaghast was the next to assault him with a hug, followed shortly thereafter by Commander Cullen, “Are you well, sweet man?” Cassandra questioned, taking his chin in hand and looking him over.

“I’m fine,” he assured laughingly.

“Good,” Cullen breathed with a sigh of relief, clapping the Lieutenant on the shoulder. “Now, if you’ll excuse me,” he cleared his throat and turned to look through the crowd of Chargers and Ellie’s party and their horses, calling out “Where is my child? Bring her to me!”

The Iron Bull was at Dorian’s side, had just assisted the man from his saddle and now he was chuckling, seeking out the Inquisitor and hoisting her from where she’d been just gotten out of her own saddle, and raising her high as she shrieked in delighted surprise, “Imekari’s incoming!”

“Excellent! Sera—I see you, do come here,” Cullen intoned as the Qunari set Ellie down before him, Cullen was hugging her when Sera approached and found herself wrapped in the Commander’s other arm before he pressed a kiss, one each to the girls’ temples, launching into questions about their wellbeing.

Although Ellie seemed a bit nervous to discuss one particular aspect of their recent questing, so much so she confessed to it almost immediately like it was some grievous wrong doing she wanted to apologize for and work through before she stressed.

And with good reason.

“You did what?!” the Nevarran woman shouted at the top of her lungs, whipping around and looking for the Iron Bull, “You! You took my children dragon hunting?”

“Uhh, it just kind of happened, and it was all around a success, no one got hurt and Imekari and Sera stayed out of the thick of it—Bull was hurriedly assuring, looking like he was genuinely contemplating running for his life…he’d taken several steps back and his hand was on the small of Dorian’s back now like he might throw the Tevinter Mage over his shoulder and run for the hills. How very romantic, but Dorian would kill him—a life on the run was not the manner to which he was accustomed in the slightest.

“I can see that!” she snapped, ahh, apparently the issue at hand was, “You took them dragon hunting for their first time, without me?! The absolute gall!”

Sera grunted derisively, “S’not like we really did anything, ‘sandra, Bull and Mare wouldn’t let us in on any of the fun,” she complained, “We was just watching mostly. ‘cept when her Mark popped off.”

That sent the Seeker low, crouching to be level with Ellie as she laid her hands on her shoulders, “Your Mark produced another rift?”

“Uh-huh, I didn’t mean to, I just- the dragon was so big! And I thought it was going hurt Marehis, and it just- pop!” Ellie explained. “It stopped the dragon in its tracks, sort of froze it or something? But I’m pooped—I’m sorry we went dragon hunting without you mami, but you’re free to join me for a recovery nap.”

Cassandra raised a hand to Ellie’s forehead, “It left you drained, as last time? Do you require assistance from Madam de Fer?” Bah! Dorian could kick himself! He should have- he should have thought to offer as much, much sooner! He’d been exhausted himself, but still, this girl she- she was his friend, precious to him, had been an ally of the best sort and was constantly taking care of him. Roles reversed, she would have passed out nursing his magic back to health!
But Ellie shook her head, “I’m not as in bad of shape as I was after Haven. I kind of want to see how long it takes to bounce back naturally? If it’s something I can recover from on my own, that’ll help with deciding if, how, and when I use it, you know?”

“That is sound,” Cassandra agreed, looking for Marehis and when the Elf woman approached, the Seeker looked to Cullen who nodded and looked like he was about to set off up the stairs while the Seeker wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders, but Cole appeared, halting him with,

“I can do it!” the Spirit assured, and then he hugged Ellie and Sera, “I am glad you are safe. I’ll join you in the Fade when you sleep. Sera, Dagna has been working very hard today, caught up in her work—Lace asked me to watch out for her while you’re both away—she needs a break but doesn’t realize it, if you go to her she would stop and enjoy being with you, and it would make your heart lighter.” he said to his friends and then he vanished.

“As luck would have it, our schedules are clear;” Cassandra said to Ellie, or at least Cole was racing off to make them clear. Dorian had read a report over the Iron Bull’s shoulder at breakfast that said when they returned, he was to round up Ellie and her party and report to the Ambassador’s office for debriefing and then Ellie would be expected in the War Room.

The Seeker and Commander began leading Sera and Ellie away…well, Sera was sprinting ahead, rushing up the stairs fueled by the incentive of getting to woo a certain Dwarf when she reached the top. And Ellie let out a yawn and that was all the Commander needed to take her up in his arms, clearly if she was yawning she must be too exhausted to even consider using her own two legs to carry herself to her quarters.

Cole reappeared with his arms around the Iron Bull’s waist, brim of his hat bending back as it was pressed to the Qunari’s stomach, humming with effort, he did seem to be hugging Bull with the whole of his strength.

“Thank you. You are hurt, but you stopped so much more and this…this hurts you less.”

“Yeah, I know,” Bull supposed, patting the Spirit on the back.

Cole was very quiet for a moment, and Dorian wasn’t…entirely certain how to handle this situation but there were tears, great fat wet tears hanging in the Spirit’s eyes when he looked up into the Qunari’s face. “You saved my friends. Cremisius from dying, and Ellie and Sera from dealing with that loss. I- I’m-“ his chin quivered, and Bull rested a hand atop his head.

“Don’t sweat it, kid,” he said, carefully raising his other hand, wiping under the younger man’s eyes with the back of his index finger, “I’ll get through my shit, I got no regrets.”

Cole nodded. “I know you are scared. If you start to go mad, I will tell you, but it isn’t in you, the Iron Bull. They said it would be, but it isn’t—you’re just you.”

“Thanks, buddy.”

Cole pulled away, and then he looked to Dorian, eyes unfocusing as he spouted Spirit nonsense, "Glittering to gloss a hidden hurt. Unlearning not to hope for more. Stumbling steps where the wall used to be", and then smiled, “Don’t be nervous, he will like it.” Kaffas! “Ellie is going to be asleep soon—but I can do that in the Fade and be with Mister Aclassi in the waking world.”

“Something up with Krem’s papa?” Bull questioned, worried.
The Spirit looked to him, “You’re hurting—oh. Mister Aclassi just worries I do not eat, wants me to join him and Krem for lunch. I think I will, and I will eat—you’re very sad and I think it will make you laugh!”

“Uhh…” Bull seemed to be drawing a blank on just why the Spirit’s eating habits would make him laugh, but, “knock yourself out bud, have a good time.”

“I…I do not think I can knock myself out, and even if I could, it doesn’t sound like I could have a good time then—”

Bull smiled, assuring, “Just a saying—have fun.”

“Okay!” Cole said, vanishing from sight to catch up with the Misters’ Aclassi.

The Qunari blew out a breath, “Alright. I got shit to do,” he said, Dorian wasn’t sure what, his Lieutenant and crew had already abandoned them in the courtyard, returning their horses to the stables, their satchels at the ground by Dorian’s feet but Bull approached and took up the straps to both, slinging them over his own shoulders while he laid an arm across Dorian’s, leading him toward the steps to the upper courtyard…or Skyhold’s castle more likely, since, “Better touch base with Red. Might take a little off of Imekari’s plate.”

Oh, certainly, it also supplied the opportunity for him to walk Dorian ‘home’ after a fashion, to his alcove in the library. The Qunari’s arm slung over his shoulder, making solid eye-contact with Mother Giselle as they passed her in the Great Hall. Well then. That was…Dorian did not think the woman would be bothering him further—if not for fear of the Iron Bull, then fear of Ellie…though it should be Sera she was on the lookout for, he’d caught a glimpse in Sera’s things, of what looked like plans for sneaking pins for the Revered Mother to unwittingly sit upon when she led Chant studies and an ant infestation in her bedchambers.

It was wonderful to be back—he was not getting old but his bones did feel a great deal of relief being able to sit in a proper chair, soft cushions, pillows, and fuzzy blanket he did not need… but Ellie had kindly insisted he keep on hand because ‘gosh’ it could get drafty. Oh and Vivienne, she was a dear—there was a book awaiting him, sitting atop the stack he’d left abandoned on the little side table beside his chair, an older necromancer’s tome he’d been on the look out for but hadn’t quite the influence to find. Perhaps Skyhold’s library had a few good books.

And some interesting things to see. Like Sera trailing after the Inquisition’s tiny Arcanist. She seemed small even for a Dwarf, but she clearly had a big hold on the Elf following her around, giggly and giddy to help her search Skyhold’s library for texts she needed for reference. Sera carrying all of the books they collected, though Dorian supposed it was smooth of her—the Elf girl offered herself as something of support, setting the books aside while Dagna climbed the ladder for reaching the higher shelves, Sera would stand with her hands gripping each side of the ladder, it let her be very close to the Arcanist as she pursued her studies. And too there had been one point the Dwarf woman had been studying a text for so long, verifying it was the edition she needed while standing near the top of the ladder, and she seemed to forget she was up on top of a ladder and turned from it like she could just step away, letting out a surprised yelp as she started falling, slamming her boom closed on her thumb but that was a pretty mild injury given she’d been up nearly three times her own height—Sera shrieked and caught the smaller woman against her chest.

“Cripes! You okay?” Sera worried, Dorian lowered his book and looked to see if Sera needed help, an offer of Elf Root tonic for the girl she was sweet on—her field bag wasn’t on her and he’d his at hand.

“Yeah,” Dagna hissed quietly, shaking out her hand, she looked up at the Elf girl and smiled, blushing slightly, “thanks for saving me.”

But Sera pouted at that, supporting the other woman with one arm while she took hold of her injured hand to examine it, “Oh, Widdle*, your poor thumb,” she fussed, pecking a kiss to the reddening skin and then she seemed to be taking something into consideration, looked about and saw Dorian and…he wasn’t certain but it seemed like she’d something in mind she didn’t want others to see, or maybe just him? He wasn’t sure. “C’mon sweets, that all the books you need? I’ll carry ‘em and walk you back,” she said, sliding the stack of books into one arm while she took hold of Dagna’s hurting hand in the other,

“Oh!” the Dwarf woman chirped in surprise, “Wow, that feels nice—I didn’t know you were a-“

“Hey, you’re working on somethin’ about Red Lyrium, right?” Sera…changed the subject, he supposed? “We just took out a bunch of Red Templars on the Coast, got real close to it, enough to make observations n’ pish, we can compare notes, yeah?”

Dagna’s giggles echoed up the stairwell as they made their way to the Great Hall, “Sure!”

That was admittedly strange, but his attention was garnered by one of the Inquisition’s scouts tentatively approaching his alcove, “E-excuse me, Ser Pavus?”

Dorian gave it a moment and then looked up from his book, raising a brow, “Yes?”

“The Iron Bull has requested you meet him on the southern battlements.”

…well that was new. Was the Iron Bull using Inquisition scouts—Leliana’s scouts—to request sexual rendezvous? How deliciously naughty. He…would not stick around for any retribution from the Spymaster if she found out and thought it an inappropriate use of her resources.

He was decently certain which were the southern battlements, but that could mean the entire expanse of Skyhold’s frontmost wall but when he exited the rotunda, the Iron Bull was easy enough to spot, in the little walk way to the left of Commander Rutherford’s office, he was certain Cullen wouldn’t mind him cutting through…and too, the man wasn’t even in his office, he may well still be with Ellie and Cassandra either napping or handling their War Room meeting—either way.

“You wanted to see me?” Dorian asked as he met the Iron Bull…he’d something more lewd in mind for greeting, but he guarded his tongue in front of the wall’s patrol. Huh, he wasn’t certain just how adventurous they were about to get—did the Qunari mean to risk being caught in public, or were they going for full-blown voyeurism?

Not voyeursim—kaffas! One instant the Iron Bull was grinning and raising his hand in a wave and the next, the Qunari was swinging around to deflect the oncoming assault of—just who were they hiring to guard their walls these days?! That was a knife! One of them flung a knife at the Iron Bull that embedded itself in his arm, and he threw it back at them, slicing their throat-

“Bull?!” Dorian called he- Fasta vass! He was a fool, he’d not even brought his staff—he hadn’t thought that would be the staff the Iron Bull required!

“I got ‘em!” Bull assured over his shoulder, grappling with the second traitorous guardsman.

“Erost issala, Tal-Vashoth!” oh- oh that was Qunlat, a phrase that got the man hoisted high and thrown over the battlements.
“Yeah, yeah,” Bull said, “My soul is dust. Yours is scattered all over the ground though, so…” he turned to face Dorian, “Sorry about that, I thought I might need backup, but I guess I’m not even worth sending professionals for.”

He-?! “You knew assassins were coming?!”

The Qunari shrugged. Shrugged! “Little change in the guard rotation tipped me off.”

“Well why the hell didn’t you warn me ahead of time?!”

“You go through years of Ben-Hessrath training to hide facial expressions when I wasn’t looking?” he questioned and at Dorian’s disgruntled expression, “See? Like that.” Bastard! “If I’d warned you or the guards, the assassins would’ve been tipped off.”

That…was fair, he supposed. Oh hell, his arm was bleeding, “You’re hurt, how bad is it?”

“Fine, Kadan,” Bull rumbled out, sounding almost embarrassed as the Mage took hold of his arm to examine it, assuring, “hurt myself worse than this fooling around in bed.”

“Those were assassins, the- the knife could have been poisoned!”

“Oh, they definitely used poison. Saar-qamek*, liquid form. If I hadn’t been dosing myself with antidote, I’d be going crazy and puking my guts up right now. As it is, it stings like shit, but that’s about it—hey. Stop lookin’ so damn dire. This wasn’t even a hit, it’s just a formality. Making it clear that I’m Tal-Vashoth.”

Don’t look dire?! It was Saar-qamek! It literally induced madness! Would have sent him crazed, and if they hadn’t had to kill him themselves if- if it hadn’t killed him on its own- “Amatus,” Dorian breathed, voice catching in his throat. He swallowed, “Come. We should see this tended and- and make sure- it needs cleaned immediately—and you’re to report this to Leliana, I swear-“

There was a softness in the Iron Bull’s face as he rested a hand on Dorian’s shoulder. “Don’t think they’ll come after me again, but I’ll make a note with Red to be on the look out-“

“You will, damn it! You could have died! Or been- Bull, what if they made such an attempt while you were with Ellie or- or Cremisius-“ oh the very thought that they could bear witness to something so horrifying, having to defend themselves- never mind that Ellie would hesitate to raise a defense against her beloved Bull for fear of hurting him, the Human girl was so very small, she couldn’t possibly even begin to stand a chance against a crazed Qunari, and while Krem at least had practice going against Bull, knew his weak points, he- he’d hardly be glad to use them, it would be nothing short of horror for him to have to slay his mentor- oh hell, he was not tearing up-

“Hey, I know—I know, Kadan,” Bull gently assured, raising a hand to cup Dorian’s face, thumb swiping under his eye, “S’why I called you. This won’t happen again—either because they won’t send another hit, or because Red’ll be on the lookout and another won’t ever get through. It’s all good.”

Dorian nodded, ugh. He was afraid if he spoke he’d do something horrifying like cry, so he pulled the Iron Bull along, through Cullen’s office and to the Charger’s quarters where he found an appropriate washbasin and cloth to clean out the injury as thoroughly as Humanly possible. He may well have over done it but the Qunari was patient, let him fret and fuss. Bull’s field bag was at hand and he- well it could have been serious! So the idiot was to sit and down a health potion and let Dorian apply Elf Root tonic straight onto the injury proper, or so help him! Saar-qamek, fuck!

The Iron Bull received Dorian’s treatment without complaint, only let out the barest chuckle when the man made his attempts at bandaging the already healing cut. He was hardly a Healer, but he’d managed well enough, he supposed when he was done.

“All right, that’s okay,” the Qunari assured. “Thanks for patching me up, having my back.”

“Well you’re not welcome. Being welcome implies you’re free to do so again and you absolutely are not!”

He had the nerve to chuckle at that! H-hands on Dorian’s hips, pulling the Mage close, standing in the space between Bull’s thighs. “Not welcome, huh? That just applies to getting ‘assassined’ right?”

“Assassined?”

“Imekari used to call her own brushes with assassination. Before she learned ‘assassinated’—”

“My _god._” To his absolute horror, that sounded about right.

“I know.”

Dorian shook his head. “I suppose you’re welcome to everything save being assassined.” He certainly wasn’t saying ‘Katoh’, at the very least.

That brought a warm smile to the Qunari’s face, something warm and pure in his eyes mixed with something…that dangerous bit of something that spoke to the depth of desire that scared Dorian to a degree, just how much this man could _want_ him. Not that he was afraid of the Iron Bull, just— he wasn’t certain _how_ he could want— Dorian was not lacking in self-esteem certainly, but there was always something that said he wasn’t made for continuous consumption, he was divine as the occasional delight, but nothing consistent. Consistency seemed equal parts laughable and…and unobtainable. Perhaps that was why it was laughable—better to laugh off something that could be painful, than let it hurt, he supposed.

Bull’s lips were just a hair’s breadth from his…

And then the door swung open from the tavern, and there was a low, pain-ridden _moan_ that was so concerning it had Dorian whipping around to lay eyes on its source.

Cole, leaning against the doorframe, a hand clutching his stomach, clearly in pain.

“I have eaten and digested an entire meal, the Iron Bull,” Cole said, and it did not sound like it was sitting well with him, “I- I have to do th- that thing again. It hurts, but it made you laugh last time.”

That thing again?

Fasta vass. He was dating an entire imbecile.

“You are a terrible influence and you are no longer welcome to parent this Spirit child!” Dorian snapped. “He was _frightened_ and _ill_ and you _laughed_—“
“The kid doesn’t understand how taking a dump works, you look me in my eye and tell me that isn’t even a little bit funny—" the Iron Bull started.

“Horrible influence!” Dorian insisted. “We’d best get him to the facilities, I suppose.”

The Qunari sighed, “I’m sorry—oh man, buddy, honey you didn’t have to make yourself constipated just to make me laugh—come on, I’ll hold your hand, maybe teach you some knock-knock jokes.”

“Knock-knock jokes?” Cole questioned weakly as the Iron Bull went to him, let the Spirit lean against him for support to lead him to the nearest privy.

“Yeah babe, they’re classic, work every time. Next time I’m down in the dumps, whip out one of those bad boys and I promise I’ll laugh my ass off.”

“It…it will make you feel better?”

“Hell yeah it will.”

Utterly ridiculous. Maker, did he truly love this man?

Don’t be nervous, he will like it, Cole said.

Dorian certainly hoped so. “Go, handle your mess—I’ve important research to see to.” He should consult the blacksmith. Or maybe Sera, she knew something of homemade jewelry.

“Yeah yeah, go hit your books, I got this,” Bull assured, deciding to take the Spirit up in his arms, “Come on buddy. Let’s go take a massive dump.”

The Iron Bull was an utter imbecile. A sweet, compassionate, idiotic imbecile, and the Qun couldn’t have him. And if…if Dorian was lucky, he might just get to keep him.

Her body felt heavy when she woke up. She wasn’t sure if it was still ‘a whole-ass Rift popped out of my Mark’ exhaustion still lingering, or the fact that she had two Humans and a Mabari piled on top of her. Not on top of her, Anya was laying on her, and Cullen and Cassandra had an arm around her, and maybe she could just sleep for five more minutes…

She was back in Skyhold though, she probably had things to do. And she would get to them. In five more minutes.

“Are you awake now, Eleanor?”

Maybe. “Whose asking?”

She felt Cassandra smile against her hair, “I am, child.”

“Depends. Do I have to do anything?”

“…there have been certain developments in your time away we should discuss, you and your advisors—do you feel up for such a meeting? We napped instead of partaking of lunch—we could order dinner before considering how you would like to move forward, if you need to take the rest of the day, you’re certainly free to do so.”

“Mmmm definitely dinner first,” Ellie voted, “Do you feel like putting the order in, mami? Just whatever they’re serving out of the kitchens today, but like, double. Maybe triple. And coffee. And I love you.”

“And I love you likewise sweet girl—certainly, I’ll see to it at once,” Cassandra assured, dropping a kiss to Ellie’s hair, a hand running through it, pulling a bit on a curl as Ellie snuggled against the woman more. After a beat, “Eleanor?”

“Yeah?”

“Do you plan on letting me rise?”

“Sure.”

“…that would mean relinquishing your current position. Unfortunately in order to send word to the Kitchens, I require the use of my extremities. The whole of my body, in fact.”

“Kay.”

“Cullen? Would you please either take our order to the kitchens, or our child—either will work.”

“Oh, my love, I would go to the ends of this world for you…” papi mumbled out, and Ellie giggled as he grunted, snaking an arm around her waist and pulling her along as he rolled onto his back so she was off the Nevarran woman and resting on his chest, “but not the kitchens. Not when I’ve the option to laze with my mija, while her beautiful warrior mami forages for our dinner.”

Cassandra snorted, shaking her head as she rolled out of Ellie’s bed, disappearing down the stairs.

“How are you feeling, papi?”

“Hmmm…well, I’m very glad you’re home, safe,” she poked him in the ribs—he knew what she meant! He smiled, chuckling as he stroked her hair, “I’ve had a lingering migraine the past few days, but it’s beginning to recede. Getting a little more rest certainly helped I think—I’m alright sweetheart, really.”

Ellie nodded, she wished…she understood why he was doing this, she respected it and gosh it was just incredibly brave, but she wished there was some other way, that he didn’t have to be in so much pain. “I’m glad.”

“How are you feeling, mija? You’re adjusting to Adan’s changes?”

“Yeah, it- it’s helping, I think? I feel better, and I’m actually feeling when I’m not, Cole can hear me better too, I’m not just either ‘happy’ or ‘numb’.”

Papi rubbed circles on her back, “That’s good to hear. I’m proud of you—we all are.”

That was nice. Being Inquisitor…she knew it would be hard, but she hadn’t been exactly prepared for ‘forming a historical alliance between the Qunari nation and an outside force, or let your boyfriend and his crew die a horrible entirely preventable death’ hard. She was really worried about the Iron Bull.

She almost lost Cremisius. And Skinner and Stitches and Dalish and Rocky and Grimm. But if anything had happened-

“Sweetheart? Oh, Ellie, what’s wrong?”

She sniffled, “S-sorry I just- Cremisius- the Chargers, they al-almost- they could have died.”

“But they didn’t. I know that was scary, oh my girl—it’s alright, I understand. Maker, if anything ever happened to Cassandra, to you? I…I was not entirely certain how I would move forward after Haven, when we thought you were lost. Loathe that I am to admit it, somehow sealing away the entirety of the Dalish pantheon and nearly destroying the world feels almost reasonable.”

Yeah. She still…she knew what she was going to do, she just hadn’t done it yet so she kept going in circles with it over and over again in her head. “I think I’ll sit in judgement for him soon. I’d like to talk that over with the advisors…so, dinner, War Room meeting. We’ll catch each other up to speed,” she gasped, sitting up, “Oh crap! I promised Solas I’d be by to see him when I got back—“

“I saw to it he was made aware of your return—he knows you’re recovering sweetheart, you hardly owe him your time, he’ll see you when you allow him to.”

She nodded, but still, “Wake me up when mami’s back with dinner, please?”

He chuckled at that, sighing sleepily, “Good luck with that. I’m certain she’ll wake us.”

She settled in, focused on her breathing, how safe she felt now that she was back, everyone she loved was nearby. Cole had been with her in the Fade as she napped, he was still listening, worked with her Magic to help her fall back asleep…

Solas was in his cell, awake, reading one of his books. His cell looked a little more livable, he’d a proper cot, a lamp and- oh, oh wow, papi let him have the letters Ellie wrote him—she’d written to keep Cullen updated, assure him she was safe, how everything was going in the Hinterlands, that they’d business on the Storm Coast, and her most recent one that they were all alright and coming home—they were hanging up on the wall of his cell, that…was kind of sweet?

She hated this!

He looked up then, almost directly at her, and then, “Ellie?”

“I’m here,” she said…not that he could hear her, exactly, but she dipped into the bond a bit, as much as she could with her magic still being very dramatic about Rift making—it wasn’t nearly as bad as it had been after Haven, she could already cast a little bit and everything!

Solas set aside his book and bowed his head for all of a moment before his shoulders went lax and then he was in the Fade with her, looking back up, directly at her, rising to come to the bars…she was pretty sure he could walk through them if he wanted. But he kept his distance and that was appreciated, she almost wondered if he stayed in his cell even in the Fade all this time.

“Admittedly, I have not—I haven’t left Skyhold, mind, but I will confess to some wandering the grounds when I sleep, just…checking on things. I have not been given any boundaries with my time in the Fade, but if it would put you at ease, I would not stray from my cell even when you are not with me.”

“Well, I mean usually when people are in prison they can’t just leave their cell whenever…but everyone can find escape in their dreams. So,” Ellie shrugged. “Would you mind coming with me for a minute?”

“Of- of course.”

She wasn’t entirely sure how he pulled off his Haven trick, but she’d figured out a little something of her own. “Follow me, it’s a bit of a walk.”

His cell door swung open in the Fade and he tentatively came to stand alongside her, hand reaching and then retracting like he was stopping himself from touching her. “I…I am relieved you have returned safely. You are well, I hope? The Commander sent word you were in recovery, were you injured?” he fretted.

She shook her head. “Not badly, anyway. We um…we kind of fought a dragon?” she said as she motioned forward for him to walk alongside her, up the stairs that lead from the dungeons to Skyhold’s courtyard. “Sera and me had to stay on the sidelines, mami put her foot down big time. But it really cheered the Iron Bull up I think—um, you know about us going to the Storm Coast to see about an alliance between the Inquisition and the Qunari?” he nodded, “That…didn’t go too great. There were more Venatori than what we were prepared for, and the Iron Bull um…he’s been excommunicated. It came down to letting the Dreadnaught do its thing and the Charger’s dying, or him sounding the retreat and letting the Dreadnought go down. The Chargers are safe, so,” she shrugged.

“That…that is good,” Solas said, “I am…I am sorry for his loss, but I am glad he made such a choice. And while I certainly don’t hold the Lieutenant’s good opinion I respect him, he…is an honorable young man, his care for you is genuine, as long as he makes you happy…”

Ellie blushed, nodding, “Yeah, he does.”

“Good,” he said, then, “…now what was this about fighting a dragon? You, Sera, and Marehis avoided the beast you said?”

“Mami made Sera and me promise to stay back. She went on ahead though, s’why um—I needed a nap because my Mark did the whole ‘Rift’ thing again ‘cause I was scared she was about to get eaten,” oh gosh, he blanched at that and she was quick to promise, “She’s fine though, the Rift stopped the dragon in it’s tracks, sort of slowed it down and paralyzed it a bit so she could get away and everyone could get some good hits in without risk of it fighting back…kind of mean, or unfair at least to hit something that can’t hit back, but it was a very big dragon—it could breathe these blasts of electricity I swear my hair is still staticy!”

He chuckled at that, his hand reaching out to card through her hair, “It does seem a bit more unruly than normal,” he said, Ellie giggling.

And then they sort of remembered the whole…he’s the Dread Wolf and she still has to parcel our just how you punish a supposed god for an Ages old crime against the whole of the world’s population, and aiding in a modern day act of terrorism in an attempt to undo you first act of terrorism. He seemed to choke on a breath, immediately pulling his hand away, almost falling as he stumbled back to put more space between them in the stairwell, but he caught himself on the wall, clearing his throat.

“My apologies, Eleanor.”
She nodded. She wanted to say it was okay. But that was mostly because she wanted it to be okay. She wanted to be able to have dinner with him again, hang out, learn from, just—she wanted to hug him and go on walks and all the things they used to do—a month ago she would’ve just giggled and hugged him, and probably gotten a super comforting really nice kiss on the forehead that made her feel safe and loved! Those were her two favorite things to feel! This was dumb!

She took a deep breath, and made her way to the top of the stairs, pushing open the door and—

It worked!

“…w-where are we, exactly, Ellie?” Solas wondered as he entered what was definitely not an open courtyard.

Gosh, it was just like she remembered it…which was kind of why it looked the way it did, it came from her memories. Dark wooden floors, large logs that made up the walls of the cabin, the ceiling was even leaking a little drip drip drip into a big blue porcelain bowl on the floor. Tattered grey rug covered most of the floor, there was a corner where the fabric frayed worse, probably because she used to sit there and tug at the strings nervously, habit, something that kept her hands busy. Big bed with a ginormous red quilt in one corner, little cot with a bundle of soft, grey knitted blankets in the other—closer to the fireplace…and the window, in case there was a need for quick escape.

“This is Ava’s cabin,” she said, taking a seat in her usual chair by the fireplace, gesturing to…well, this was just a Fade version, and it shouldn’t really matter anymore, so, she offered Ava’s rocking chair to Solas. That was…that was the only time Ava got very um…mother-ish? When Ellie got scared at night, sometimes Ava would let her sit with her, as she rocked, a hand on Ellie’s back to keep her from falling the woman would say. Sometimes she hummed, it was nice.

“Da’veh- Leth- you- you did so well, constructing a place from memory in the Fade w-well done,” he stumbled over the compliment, trying to reign in his enthusiasm, he looked like he wanted to jump up and start examining the place top to bottom just to see how she’d done in detail, but he sat down in the rocking chair, giving it a few test rocks since that seemed all the examining he felt he should do given their current awkwardness.

“Thanks,” she said, “I dunno, I always felt safe here, and I kind of wanted to see if I could do it, your Fade trick with Haven? I just couldn’t swing something so big.”

“In time I’m sure you could construct anything you care to,” Solas encouraged. “You wished to speak?”

Ellie nodded. “I’m back. And I’ve um…I’ve come to a decision about everything. I still have to talk it over with the Advisors, but I’ll be sitting in judgement over you soon. I’ve already written Leliana and Josie about it—it’ll be as private as we can possibly make it, no one from the public, or lower ranking in the Inquisition will be permitted to attend except the members of my party, and the Advisors. One of them will be walking you from your cell to the Great Hall, probably the Iron Bull? We haven’t made it common knowledge that one of our own um…you know. Only a few of Leliana’s most trusted people have been guarding the prisons since your incarceration, and Cole’s been wiping you from their memories of their time down here, as far as they know, they’re just standing guard over empty cells. It’d probably be a blow to the Inquisition’s reputation, not to mention moral if everyone knew we found a reason to lock up one of our core members, an even bigger blow if we couldn’t supply the reason.”
Solas nodded, blowing out a breath, “I am sorry, truly Ellie, to have put you in this position. I promise to respect any decision you must make.”

“I just wanted to kind of talk you through what to expect out of the next day or so, so you aren’t um…scared when you’re being brought to judgement. I also had some questions I guess?”

“Of course, you may ask me anything of my crimes.”

“Not your crimes, not really,” Ellie said, “we…while we were away Sera…wanted access to Lyrium, she thought if she drank some and slept she’d wake up in the Fade, be able to use her magic. It’s something she’s genuinely interested in pursuing, I’ve talked with her about it a lot since uhhh she made her interest known, “ she didn’t want to tattle on her or anything, and it wasn’t like Solas was super privy to family drama…even though he was currently the center of some major family drama. “So…she’s working on waking her magic up. She hasn’t Fade dreamed yet, but um…well we’re getting there we think?”

“…truly? She…she came to me for assistance but I refused. I’m cell bound for one, and she wouldn’t have been able to find any decent focus if she were to stay here while you were out in the field. Too I thought…she seemed panicked, terrified at the prospect of going out into the world without someone bonded to you and your party down a mage. I worried fear was her sole motivator, and did not wish to let her go forward with something irreversible when she might so easily feel differently about it given a bit of time.”

“Thanks, I’m proud of you for hearing that and not manipulating her or something, it must have been tempting to just say yes when you had her um…she made it sound like she pretty much begged for you to tell her how to wake her magic up.”

“I only regret that it sent her looking to do so on her own, tampering with Lyrium unguided can be so very dangerous.”

“It’s okay, mamis set her straight, and um…well, we’ve really talked it out with her—it’s not just life changing personally, but socially, you know?”

Solas nodded. “I regret I…I did not consider as much when I first endeavored to wake her magic. But I should have, goodness. The world I woke to is far more condemning of magic than the one I destroyed. Any girl her age would be celebrated for making a commitment to magical study.”

“I’m sorry it isn’t that way now—but I really do hope it can be like that, in the future. For now, she’s surrounded by people who wouldn’t condemn her for magic, and she wouldn’t have to make it a widely known thing—she doesn’t want to be a Mage even, she just…wants to explore that part of herself, something she uses the same way she uses anything else in her life, like her other abilities. Instead of matches, she can just call up fire for herself, it has a lot of application science wise, or for her pranks, or fighting even just using her bow—flaming arrows are always a catch—and she loves the idea of being able to cast things like barrier to help out in fights. Something she can use, but it’s not what she relies on entirely—sort of like I can fight with my sword but I more naturally go for my staff, she’s more likely to go for her bow, but she could use magic if she wanted or needed.”

“That’s perfectly normal for Elvehnan, many of us didn’t even study magic, it just manifested in our day to day lives as a tool we used,” Solas said, “So…you would like some assistance?”

“Maybe a little? We um…Sera told us about the way you tried to coax her magic awake, so she’s been meditating with me every day and stuff like that, trying to reach out to the Fade. And when we were in the Storm Coast we found one of your old artifacts, so mami and I stayed with Sera and let her activate it herself. She did such a good job!” Ellie cleared her throat, “Um. Anyway, she’s had more control—last time she poked at her magic she was only able to call it up in an emergency and accidentally blast cold, but now if she focuses she can call cold into her hands—we haven’t tried a staff yet, I mean she tried holding mine for a bit but my magic’s grown since I joined the Inquisition and I’ve been working with it since I was little, so her magic couldn’t really do anything with it. I’m going to help her make a staff for herself, something for her to start with.”

“She hasn’t dreamed in the Fade?”

“Uh-huh. We’re not super sure why her magic is only representing with ice magic, but we’re pretty sure it’s just ‘cause that’s what her magic sparked as. I mean when I’m afraid or startled and casting out of pure urgency, I cast barrier—the first time I ever produced magic, it was um…well my magic was trying to protect me, so, my first time casting, it was barrier.”

“They feed me,” he assured her, “I am well. My own supper will be along soon no doubt.”

“Okay, good. Um. I’ll see you later then,” she said, “Do I…need to bring you out of here? You won’t be stuck just ‘cause it’s something from my memory, right?”

Ellie?

He shook his head no, that it’d be fine, but when she rose to her feet, preparing to wake up, “I am proud of you, Ellie,” Solas said suddenly and- oh Maker the bond was thrown open, like his every word was laid bare, honest and sincere, and she would feel the instant they were anything but that, “You…you are one of the most remarkable people I have ever known. I am sorry, more than I can ever say for the circumstances I forced that bore our meeting—but I am not sorry that I know you, know the Inquisition and the people in it. You were my first positive example of what Humanity had to offer the world, and you’ve given me so much hope for the future. You’re…you’re a beautiful, brilliant young lady, and I’m so proud of the woman you’re becoming. You deserve every happiness, ma’davhenan, and I hope you find it. I am sorry for the battles you will face because of my actions. But I know you will overcome them. I don’t have any regrets where you or Sera or Marehis are concerned, not in my love of you. You will do what you must, and you are not to have a single regret of it—I deserve everything that is coming for me, I’m sure any fate you hand me will be far more kinder than what I deserve. Don’t carry your decision with you, don’t let me burden you further, do what must be done, and move forward knowing you did the right thing.”

…”Solas…do you think I’m going to kill you or something?”

“The Advisors have some instructions for my execution. If you wish to perform it yourself I understand, but truly, you needn’t even be there when it happens. I’m certain the Iron Bull can adequately see to it I am no longer a–”

“What instructions?”

“It’s best you don’t know, merely something that will ensure you do not feel anything unpleasant in the bond.”

He’d given her some things to think about, but…it was more like further validation for her decision…

He’d messed up pretty bad. And she wasn’t sure when exactly she’d think on this and stop being mad about it. So. She’d let him sit with the uncertainty of his future a little while longer— everyone else in her party would have to wait until his trail, so would he.

Da’vehnani?! Oh! Crap! That was Marehis, she really better wrap this up.

“I’ll see you later,” she said…mad, unspeakably, but still, “I don’t regret knowing you either.”

She woke to the smell of dinner, and a bit of ache in her shoulder as someone shook her with urgency, overlapping voices, “Ellie? Sweetheart-“ Cullen’s voice again, but it wasn’t his hands on her, it was, “Da’vehnan?” Marehis.

“Why en’t she waking up?!” Sera was screeching over Cassandra’s quiet, urgent,

“She took nothing, you’re certain?”

“Y-yes- oh Maker,” Cullen swore, voice wavering, “I’m almost positive, but I feel back to sleep too, damn it-“

“I’m up!” she promised, rubbing at her shoulder as she sat up, “Sorry-“

“Oh, da’vehnani you- you scared us,” Marehis said, half-reprimanding as she pulled Ellie in for a tight hug.

“Sorry—I got caught up in the Fade-“

“Were you stuck again, sweet girl?” Cassandra worried.

“No! I was just talking with Solas—I promised him I would whenever I got back from the Hinterlands. Um,” she looked to the Elf girl still staring at her, keeping a distance like she was afraid of getting in the way, “awe, Sera, I’m really okay,” she assured as she reached out and Sera took her hand, came to sit on the bed with her, “—were- did you think I’d done something?”

“Uhhh…” Sera droned.
“We were perhaps mildly concerned you were unable to be roused because you’d imbibed potion, not necessarily in dangerous amounts,” Cassandra confessed.

…kind of ouch? But a little fair? She’d been honest with them, especially mami—Cassandra. She had a lot of experience with lots of the things Ellie found herself struggling with, and it was helpful to hear her say what she was experiencing was normal, that she’d dealt with similar things. “I did promise I’d come to you guys if I needed help, if I thought I was going to do something…cr…drastic? I’d at least have woken papi up and talked to him about it before I knocked back something extreme. Or even just regular old sleep potion since we made dinner plans and that’d definitely have me sleeping through them.”

“I’m sorry, Eleanor, when you didn’t wake I panicked,” Cullen sighed, “I didn’t even think- I do remember now, you asked me to wake you because you intended to speak with Solas in the Fade.”

“Everything’s okay,” Ellie promised, “Sera, mami, you’re joining us for dinner yeah?”

“Indeed sweet girl,” Marehis said, “I was just coming to check on you and Cassandra already had Sera in tow.”

“Let’s dig in, yeah Ink? You’re hungry right?” Sera asked, cheerful.

“Uh-huh, starvning,” Ellie said, “let’s eat!”

She really was after having just a nap for lunch, and Maker, there was something about food from Skyhold’s kitchens that resonated as ‘home’ with her, it made it that much better.

“Oh! Sera, did you have fun with Dagna?” Ellie asked.

Sera turned pink! Ducked her head a bit as she picked apart another dinner role, “Yeah Ink, it was nice.”

“Ooohhh nice?” Marehis asked, teasingly.

“And what is this young lady’s intentions with you, Sera?” Cullen asked, “She has feelings for you, and your Miss Lace?”

“Sounds like it, yeah.”

“If she hurts Sera do we have to take it out on Lace too?” Cullen wondered, looking to Cassandra and Marehis, “Are they to be considered a unified pair, or is this more an ‘heir and a spare’ situation where if one of them must be dealt with, at least Sera will have the other?”

“Dealt with?” Sera asked, uncertain.

“Reprimanded. Possibly fired. At the very least we would shun them socially and speak ill of them if it made you feel better. I don’t allow anyone regardless of gender to hurt my mijas and simply get away with it, it would be no different than if the Lieutenant broke Ellie’s heart.”

Sera snorted, “I’m a big girl, I can handle my own breakups,” she said, overlapping Ellie’s,

“I wouldn’t want you to hurt Cremisius if we broke up.”

Cullen smiled, assuring them, “Vengeance will be mine.”
Ellie shook her head. “Oh, Ser’? Um, I talked to Solas, like you asked? You should see him if you want, he’ll check out your…”…she wasn’t entirely sure she should say as much in front of Cullen?

“Oh, my magic pish?” Sera asked, “Cool, I’ll go talk to him later then. Not too much later, I got plans with Widdle.”

“That’s good to hear,” Marehis encouraged. “Da’vehnan, what about you? I can stay with you tonight unless you care for privacy?” privacy…oh right, private time. That was sweet of her to offer she guessed? But,

“Unless you want privacy, space to just be on your own tonight sure, you can sleep here, any of you can,” Ellie said, she…was definitely still all about the whole ‘private time with Cremisius’ thing, that was happening as soon as possible, but um…she really was still beat after everything they did on the Storm Coast, and yeah it might be nice to fall asleep with him after everything, but uh, she definitely didn’t want to pursue their first time again and totally mess it up a second, more spectacular way—somehow falling asleep before or…oh Maker, during, seemed even more mortifying than ‘Hey you almost died and that scared me, let’s just go ahead and have sex for the first time in front of the Storm Coast’s resident Spider population’ had been.

Spiders were so gross!

Dinner, however, was delicious. And when they were done…she had zero pride left in her that instilled a need to change—she was holding an official War Room meeting in her pjs and anyone who had a problem with it could actually bite her. She still carried her staff though. It was an ‘official’ meeting after all, so technically she was on the clock.

In point of fact, the moment she had her staff in hand, Sera cleared her throat and said, “Hey Ink? Can I talk to you about something? It’s a uh, kind of official business thing. A Friend’s mission.”

“Sure thing, what’s up?” Ellie asked, and Sera took her hand, leading her out onto the balcony to the left of her bed, the Elf girl hopping up to sit on the balcony banister in a way that made Ellie’s heart sort of thump in her chest, Maker, she should be careful!

“So there’s some noble shite going down in Verchiel—real bad business, and the only people hurt is little people. I was wonderin’ if maybe the Inquisition could patrol through, just a walk-through, show a bit of ‘umph’ to put the noble pricks in their place.”

Ellie nodded, gosh, that did sound bad, “Of course, Ser’,” Ellie promised, “I’ll ask Papi to send some of his people through, no problem.”

“Thanks Inky, you’re the best!”

She got a big squeezy hug for it! She wished all of her Inquisitoring business could end like that. She’d get so much more done!...she got a lot done, but she felt like she’d be much more productive in the whole ‘hunting down and stopping Corypheus’ thing if it resulted in the great honking darkspawn man suddenly revealing himself with a change of heart and using his ginormous arms for hugging—he would probably be the best hugger if he wasn’t a great big evil scumbag waste of long arms!

Cassandra and Cullen walked her to the War Room, Marehis too—she’d been planning to walk Sera down to Solas’s cell but Sera complained she didn’t need the woman to follow her down to talk to ‘baldy’, she’d be just fine, she didn’t need babied…
Ellie might have sent Cole a thought to send Cremisius. She saw him meeting Sera at the top of the stairs to the Great Hall and the echo of his voice greeting her casually, jovially as he offered to walk the girl. It wasn’t babying, she didn’t think, just…she trusted Solas…to be untrustworthy. So, unless you were paying visits through the strange safety of the Fade, it was probably best to go in pairs.

“Bella!” Tonio greeted enthusiastically from…huh he had a little desk in the corner of the room by the fireplace, opposite Josie’s now in her office, it was just enough space to keep a business ledger, spare parchment, quill and ink. And a cup of tea it seemed, that was nice! She was glad to see he’d set up, expanded his business a bit more! He hugged her as she entered Josie’s office, “My Cremisius says your mission to the Storm Coast had some minor hiccups—you cast something from your Mark? You’re feeling better I hope?”

“Uh-huh, thanks for checking on me,” she replied…oh oh gosh there was- there was a new addition to Lady Josie’s desk, this little gilded ship and when Ellie peeked over at it it seemed to have an Orlesian family crest on it—the one Lady Montilyet had been looking for? Tonio said he could find as much, oh gosh! “I’m glad to see you’re set up here!”

“Indeed, I begin seeing new clients this week—you, of course, are my top priority, you’re free to order my services whenever you require my dear,” he assured her, “I completed your first order—everything is taken care of, but of course we’ll do a final fitting and make certain everything is to your liking—at your earliest convenience.”

She wasn’t sure when her earliest convenience was going to be…probably not any time too soon.

Hawke made contact! Outside of the few letters he and Ellie had exchanged. He was…really sweet, she felt badly for disliking him so much before, he’d checked in on her, offering advice and making sure she was okay. Like, getting enough sleep and eating, and things like that? He wrote the Inquisition, informing them he was currently in Crestwood, and his Warden contact was ready and willing to meet with Ellie and her party, so long as he didn’t fall into Warden hands—he was the Warden they’d been hunting on the Storm Coast all those months ago, he’d done a good job of evading them so far and he wasn’t about to go with them now.

“So, Crestwood, I take it we need to leave as soon as possible?” Ellie supposed.

“It would be advised,” Leliana seemed regretful to inform her.

Ellie sighed. “…I’m sleeping on the horse. The whole way. And possibly through this meeting. Cassandra, I give you permission to puppet me through the whole thing—just prop me up, swing my arms around, talk in a squeaky voice.”

“I will do no such thing,” Cassandra assured her.

Ellie slapped a hand to her heart, “It’s like you don’t even love me! Papi!” she complained, he had no problem with informality during official meetings.

“Sweetheart you stay here, just take the week off, laze around your rooms—get me a curly red wig and I will go in your stead,” Cullen went right into it, raising his voice to offer, “Hello! I’m Inquisitor Ellie! Good golly gosh it’s freezing here!”

“That’s perfect!” Ellie enthused, “I’m almost having Envy flashbacks—you’re like a thousand times better at impersonating me than they were!” she giggled, sighing. “Okay. We’ll head out…maybe tomorrow? Let me touch base with everyone and see who feels like going. The Iron Bull might not be up for it yet, and that might affect whether or not Dorian goes, and it’s rainy so Madam de Fer might not be up for it—it’s a whole thing,” she shrugged, “I mean I’m sending Cullen in my place.”

Leliana fought the smile tugging at her lips, “Very good, my lady. Take what time you need to regroup and keep us appraised.”

“Will do!”

Lady Josie leveled her a warm, sympathetic smile that…was enough warning for what she was about to say next, “My Lady, we wonder if you’ve come to a decision regarding Fen Harel.”

Ellie sighed, nodding. “I have. I would like to sit in Judgement over Solas before we leave for Crestwood. Everyone um…feels okay with my decision?”

“Eleanor, the decision is yours,” Leliana said, “How we feel has little to do with us following orders. Your reasoning is…sound, and we understand it is tenuous…” her mouth worked a moment and the Inquisition’s Spymaster looked wholly uncomfortable before she said, “You’re certain this arrangement won’t cause you er…the last time there was discord such as this, with Rainier…I would not want you to be sick, as you were then.”

…awe! “Thanks, Leliana, but I’ve thought about it, and talked it over with mami—all the mamis!” Ellie assured her, “and Healer Adan. Um, it’ll be okay. With all the crazy things that have happened, this doesn’t feel super stressful. Stressful, but not ‘burn a hole through vial organs’ stressful’. But thanks for worrying about me!”

The Spymaster offered her a small smile, “Just…if it is overwhelming, if you do find you wish to recant your decision, I will gladly enact your whims.”

“…didn’t get enough of holding him over the dungeon hole?” Ellie wondered.

“…perhaps.”

“I didn’t even get a turn,” Cullen lamented.

“Me either!” Ellie giggled.

“I would have appreciated a turn,” Lady Josie confessed, teasingly snippy.

“Well, if you’d to, your window of opportunity is closing in…” Ellie sighed, “A few hours? Tonight, I’m thinking—it’d be a good time, easy to clear the hall, and you know, cover of darkness and all that.”

“Excellent my lady,” Josie said, “shall we reconvene in the Great Hall at midnight, then?”

“Ooohh spooky, I dig it,” Ellie agreed, “maybe the Maker will bless us with some fog tonight? Keep the candlelight low in the Great Hall, just, really set the mood for bringing an Ages old Dalish god to justice;” she gasped, excited, “I will actually pay every single person that wears a hooded robe to conceal their face and chants in a dead language. Tevene! It’s not dead-dead but its dying and Solas isn’t a fan.”

“We’ll see what we can do,” Leliana assured.

“Cool! Meeting adjourned?” she asked, and her advisors nodded. “Double cool! Cole!” she called to the air, “Send me my boyfriend at his earliest convenience please! Judgement’s gonna be way past my bedtime, and I’ve gotta get my nap on! Open invitation, anyone that wants to come get snuggly!"

“Cullen,” Cassandra spoke the name like reprimand, “come, we’ve to prepare for this evening, and I need to check in with our Templars.”

The Commander sighed, “Of course,” he agreed, though he stopped to drop a kiss to Ellie’s forehead, “get some good rest mija.”

Cremisius was waiting for her in her quarters when Marehis...dropped her off. Gah! She’d been serious! She really did mean nap!

“You Cole’d for me?” he asked, amused as he unlocked her door and threw it open. “Sera’s still down with Solas, Cole joined them though, he’s helping with…whatever they’re doing. Ser’ had me cooling my heels in the hall.”

Ellie nodded, it was Sera’s business who knew and who didn’t and…yeah Ellie wasn’t entirely certain how the others would react to the Elf girl developing her magical ability. “Thanks—sorry for Coleing you all over the place, but she was going to go by herself. And the dungeons are so,” she waved like she was grasping for something far out of reach.

“That is an awful lot of stairs, and you’re still pretty beat, huh?” Cremisius sympathized, wrapping his arms around her and resting his forehead against hers when she nodded, “sorry lovely,” he sighed, “well then, naptime, come on,” he said, and Ellie squeaked in surprise when he crouched and slipped an arm under her knees before swiftly rising, carrying her up.

“Cremisius!”

“Hey, I’m just following your orders—you summoned me to avoid climbing the stairs, so, no stairs allowed,” he said with certainty, setting her on her bed, “fireplace all good—you warm enough? Good—Anya, come on baby, we’re napping.”

The pup just kind of looked at him like she was confused…she had just taken a nap afterall, but Ellie was already shaking herself to stay awake. But when Cremisius laid down with her, Anya got it in gear—little man stealer! She laid right next to the Tevinter man, curling up against his other side as he slid into bed next to Ellie, arm around her shoulders, letting her rest her head on his chest.

“Mmm, warm,” she sighed contentedly, snuggling against him.

Cremisius chuckled, smiling against her hair, “Sleepy, Inquisitor?”

“The sleepiest—maybe that’s what I’ll be known for! History’s sleepiest Inquisitor.

“Oh, most assuredly—I mean you take enough naps I’m sure everyone will forget all about the whole ‘saving the world from Time Magic’ thing, or sealing the Breach, kicking Corypheus’s ass.”

“He kind of kicked mine. More like swung it into a trebuchet, but still.”

“We’re talking about what you go down in history for lovely—books’ll be all about how you knocked him into the next Age.”

“And the tremendous record breaking nap I’ll take when I’m done!”
“The nap to end all naps, that’s what we aim for in this Inquisition.”

She giggled, he was the best. She felt really badly that, um, “...I’m kind of...leaving tomorrow? Hawke made contact so, I’m Crestwood bound!”

“Bring me back some rain—didn’t get enough of it in the Storm Coast.”

Ellie snorted, but, “I’m really sorry about um...I mean if I wasn’t absolutely positive I was gonna zonk out here in like two minutes—“

“Hey,” Cremisius reprimanded gently, pressing a kiss to the top of her head, “I said we’d make a proper date of it—you see me buying you dinner? We’ve not even gone for a stroll in the moonlight, and...nope, I don’t think you have any candles in here anyway. You gotta go to Crestwood? That gives me time to get things in order. If you’re still interested—“

“I’ll definitely still be interested.”

“-then, Miss Trevelyen, would you do me the honor of going on a date with me, upon your return from Crestwood?”

“It would be my pleasure.”

“Good,” he said, squeezing her a bit, “get some rest, lovely.”

He did not have to tell her twice. She barely heard him tell her once.

“Imekari?”

Ellie woke up to the Iron Bull crouching alongside her bed, which was fuller than it had been when she drifted off she was pretty sure. Cole and Sera had joined them. huh, she thought the Elf girl would still be with Dag- oh, awe! That was sweet! Dagna was there too, gosh she was tiny, Ellie almost didn’t see her curled up against Sera!

Oh! The Iron Bull, right, focus, what time was it? She fell asleep with her watch on, oh! Quarter till 11! “Time to get up, yeah?”

“You got it babe,” he confirmed, “Marehis is still working out some final details with Red, sent me up...down?” he wondered since...huh yeah she wasn’t sure if her quarters were technically upstairs or downstairs from Leliana’s...downstairs she was pretty sure. Yeah. “To get you. Need any help getting ready? Papa’classi’s coming with some of your new duds—not in the loop for what’s on tonight, he just knows you’ve got something important to do.”

“Sounds good,” she said as she sat up- and then she reached out for the Qunari’s forearm, “oh my gosh, what happened?” she asked, pulling his arm a bit closer so she could take a look at the um...interesting bandaging job on his bicep.

“Oh,” he said like he’d forgotten it was even there, “Just leaving it on so Sparky feels better—little accident with a knife earlier, Dorian patched me up, it wasn’t a big deal.”

Ellie pouted, but he didn’t say anything when she took a peek under the bandaging...yeah it was just there for show now, she couldn’t see anything at all, no indication he’d been hurt in the first place. Still, she pressed a little kiss to it and replaced the bandaging, poor Dorian had been freaked out huh? Just...just what kind of knife accidents were they getting into?

...ummm...on second thought, the Iron Bull was into some pretty wild stuff so...she probably didn’t wanna know.

“Okay,” she sighed, “let’s get on with it then, shall we?”

The rhythmic thud of heavy boot falls down the uneven prison stairs told Solas it was time. The Iron Bull was coming for him, as Ellie forewarned. That had been…kind of her. To keep her word about speaking with him upon her return, and for using the opportunity to privately prepare him for what was to come. Through it, he’d gotten to spend his final hours with girls he loved as if he’d sired their being himself. Gotten to see Sera make genuine strides toward her magic, talk theory and give her…every last piece of advice he could instill in a child seeking to nurture their magic, he spoke until his voice was raw and he was glad of it, he just prayed there was nothing he had forgotten, it felt like…something he thought he might never experience, sitting with an Elvhenan child and teaching them of their magic. And he’d gotten to bear witness to Ellie make progress with her manipulation of the Fade—copying his own methods, it made him unspeakably proud, and he’d spent some time after just sitting in her creation before he…he’d spent a great deal of time in the Fade while the Inquisitor and her party were away, holding council, he held one more such meeting when Ellie took her leave. He was not certain if…if he was to be executed, he was not certain just where he would go, in his afterlife. Cole said that all non-Andrasten Elves went on to serve as members of the pantheon’s Spirits. But he did not align with any house, not any longer, neither was he wholly Andrasten—though he did believe the Maker to be real. He wasn’t sure if that would take him to the Maker’s side, or if his lack of allegiance to any Elvhenan leader would make him some outlier among Spirits in the Fade or if…if he would be considered a member of the Evanuris—there were many unknowns. So. He’d made certain of one thing—he’d not universal pull over those who resided in the Fade, but with those he did have alliances with, friends and enemies alike, those few demonic beings who avoided him to steer clear of his wrath—he’d called them to congress and made it clear that in his absence, Ellie and Sera were to be considered as they considered him. They were to be left alone—if Ellie sought to continue studying how to manipulate the Fade as he’d shown her to, they were not to raise a hand to stop her, disturb her. His friends would keep watch, and protect these girls whenever they were in the Fade. If Sera ever did follow through with waking her magic, he trusted Ellie and Cole would be with her, and his friends would gather discreetly, and make safe her time in the Fade, no demons would tempt her—not without getting through them first.

Through him, if he was one of their numbers.

...do you think I’m going to kill you or something?

Ellie’s question had given him some small reason to think perhaps what was coming wouldn’t be execution…but that hope was minimal. There were worse things than death, but some things…called for nothing but a swift end to someone’s miserable existence.

Ellie certainly wouldn’t do the deed herself. But she could hand down the decree.

“Sup Wolfie.”

“Good evening, the Iron Bull,” Solas greeted civilly as he rose to his feet, “I trust you are well? I am…sorry, to hear of your excommunication. But I do thank you, for the Lieutenant’s life. Ellie- He is very dear to her, and an honorable man, and it would be a shame for him to be reunited with his father only to be taken away so shortly thereafter. There…is no greater suffering than losing a child, not that I have experienced, Mister Aclassi—the Elder, he sounds like a kind man who has already endured so much, I am glad you were able to spare him.”

“…uh-huh. yeah,” he scoffed as he fiddled with the key ring in hand, searching for the one that would unlock Solas’s cell, “You’re full of shit—you’re not ‘sorry’ I got kicked out of the Qun.-“

“I am, at least insofar as the loss you feel from it. While I have been deceptive of my connections to the Conclave and my knowledge of its unfolding, I have been true in my regard for I am glad you brought yourself to think outside the boundaries of the Qun. You do realize I detest that system because of the one I brought low? The Evanuris was the Magisterium with the mental machinations of the Qun. I distrust both modern governing bodies with equal measure. If you are to be here, guarding and guiding Ellie, be someone she looks up to, I am pleased you are wholly free thinking, honorable, and loyal to her.”

The Iron Bull grunted, swinging the cell door open and gesturing for Solas to turn his back, he complied, he was to be bound he supposed, “Right now, I’m guiding your ass to Judgement.”

Solas nodded as the Qunari…brought one of his arms up to pull the sleeve of a robe over it, apparently he was to dress up a bit for his hearing? Ahh. Then he bound his wrists in handcuffs, tugged the sleeves down so they covered them, he could walk without displaying he was a prisoner if there were any prying eyes about at the late hour. More privacy granted, given the Iron Bull pulled the hood overhead, given its shape, sloping as it did, it could be anyone walking before the Iron Bull…

Anyone. Including, apparently, Master Pavus.

Solas let out a slightly startled sound when the Qunari linked arms with him as they stepped out into the night air, he’d gone from relieved to breathe fresh air for the first time in weeks, to utterly confused.

“Dorian’s robe. Gonna burn it when you’re done with it.”

Ahh. further subterfuge…did anyone at all know he’d been imprisoned, outside their inner circle? Would his execution truly be held in such secrecy? That…would be wise, less shameful and embarrassing for himself, his loved ones.

He steeled himself, taking in the cool, fresh air in measured breaths. It was strange that millennia could pass and the winds that whipped through Skyhold still smelled just as he remembered them in times before. He counted the stairs as they walked them…56 individual stairs*, 58 foot falls to cross them and the landing in between flights…

The Iron Bull pushed him forward the moment the doors were closed behind them, and then put a hand on his shoulder with a bruising grip to usher him down the very vacant, very dim Great Hall. Even the fire that usually roared at all hours was doused, the only light came from the two candelabras that sat, one on either side of the throne.

Eleanor’s throne.

Around it, stood equal lines of those who would be in attendance. The entirety of Ellie’s party, her advisory staff. To the left of her throne stood Lady Montilyet, clipboard in hand, and to the right stood Marehis, on guard of her ward, Solas could feel her eyes on him…maybe he was already dying, executed by her glare. He almost wished it would kill him—he did wish it if it would make the woman feel better, and Ellie’s job easier.

Oh. Ellie. For all she might be handing out death sentences, he thought her beautiful. She wore a warm green blouse that...he vaguely could recall Madam de Fer referring to such tops as ‘peasant’ style but it had never struck him as the stuff of rags, and it certainly didn’t seem ‘peasantly’ here. It was tucked into black, high waisted, form fitting trousers, shod in the grey, heeled boots she favored since Cullen ‘got them’ for her in Orlais. Had she gotten a manicure for his trial? Her nails had been clean when she visited him in the Fade, but now they were evergreen, silvery stars dotted on some, the Inquisition’s sigil on each index finger...

And she was wearing the most solemn expression on her face as the Iron Bull brought Solas before her, shoving him to his knees, and pulling back his hood.

Lady Montilyet stared at him a moment...somehow the gentle Antivan woman who had a kind word for everyone looking at him so very disappointed made his shame feel fresh. Then she cleared her throat,

“My lady Inquisitor. Before you this day is the Apostate Mage, Solas, formerly known as Fen’Harel. He has confessed to crimes of terrorism. He has confessed to not only destroying the world as he knew it once before, but delivering the means by which he would see it destroyed a second time—his Orb of Destruction made by his own hands—into the clutches of a mad man—our enemy Corypheus. He did so knowing in full the plans Corypheus had for the Orb, that he was going to go to the Conclave, take captive the Divine Justinia, lay her body sacrificed to activate the Orb, knowing very well that the ritual would likely resolve in some failure, Corypheus would fumble in his handling of power he did not understand, and the Conclave as a whole would be destroyed—the lives lost were expected, as they did, to power the Orb of Destruction, which this man before you intended to take ownership of again for the purposes of bringing down the Veil and destroying the world a second time. When he discovered Corypheus survived the Conclave and made escape with his Orb, he joined the Inquisition under false pretenses, in the hopes he would find his Orb through our pursuit of those responsible for the Conclave, and ultimately find it, powered and whole, to make use for his plans.”

Ellie let out a low whistle, “…those are some pretty serious crimes. You’ve done so much damage. What do you have to say for yourself?”

“There is nothing to say, Inquisitor,” Solas said. "I will not make this more difficult by muddling my crimes with motivation—you know all you need.”

“…you wanna make my job less difficult? I won’t ask again, Solas—What. Do you have to say. For yourself?”

Oh. He felt prodding in the bond then, almost violent like Ellie’s magic was smacking his upside the head. So he cleared his throat, and for the third time since he’d been caught for these crimes, he told his story, this time for the whole of her party to hear. Spoke of the world before, the Evanuris, their crimes against their people, against him from his own birth, to the death of Mythal, the woman he loved, for the fact she carried life they laid slain along with her. That she had been the only one who had ever been capable of reining in these disgustingly powerful Mages, that enslaved the whole of the Elvehnan population to serve their will, live and die by their word, at their leisure. And he brought them down...to the tune of so many innocents caught in the fray, he’d only wanted to lock the Evanuris away, seal them someplace they could not hurt their people...and they took those people with them, left behind only those he managed to free from house loyalty, clear of their Vallaslins before he constructed the veil. And when he did so, he cut off so much of their ties to magic—even his own magic had been weakened immensely—they lost their immortality, and he’d no ability to undo what he’d done then. So, he slept, planning to build his strength and rise to a world where those surviving Elvehnan had cycled through generation after generation of magical progress, when he woke there could very well be a solution already performed, if not, a solution may be in reach. What he found were his people devastatingly demolished, spread far and wide, divided and conquered. He’d never dreamed of anything outside the realm of Elvehnan, and woke to a world of Humans, Qunari, and Dwarves. And then his first introduction to Humanity were things like discovering they’d subjugated his people, appropriated their culture to the point the Evanuris was essentially alive and well in the form of the Tevinter Imperium—and then Corypheus, with his Warden allies. Human men and women who knew the plans Corypheus had for the Conclave, understood the risk, and were willing to see their fellow man perish for his plans. Human life did not matter even to Humans—so why should it have mattered to him? He…hated to bring the fact up but…his time with the Inquisition had not started off much better.

“I saw people of all races clamoring for justice but not willing to do the footwork of it, running around looking for any who they could cast blame upon and ultimately it was, what turned into my first experience with a Human child. Ellie you were fifteen. Do you know the last time I met a fifteen year old? Never, and I have been alive since before your people counted Ages. I was of the youngest generation of Elvehnan, I was a babe of babies, I never met anyone younger than myself, and I certainly never met a child. And then here you were this impossibly young person…the prime suspect of the crimes committed by men. And the Inquisition was without question ready and willing to take you in for questioning. To interrogate you—no tracing down your kin, no offer of defense, I was ordered to keep a child alive long enough to be tortured by adults of her own race. I administered Lyrium to you, to prepare your blood so that it might boil at a Seeker’s command if you were not complacent in your questioning.”

Ellie nodded, “Yeah, that doesn’t exactly sound like the right foot to get off on with an honorary member of the ancient Elvehnan pantheon, planning on destroying the world. So. What happened?”

He scoffed, and he could not help the smile that tugged at his lips, “I met you.”

“It’s you! You’re the hands with the nice voice! She’d exclaimed excitedly, jumping up and hugging him with all her strength—he had not been hugged since…he almost wondered if he’d been hugged since before his father passed. This girl he did not have a single care for immediately cared for him—offered gratitude to him in his language when she realized he was ‘Dalish’*. Had nothing but respect and sympathy for the plights his people faced in the modern world, understood the nuances of the crisis, took expert care of when she used her Human privilege, and when she needed to step back and let he or Marehis handle whatever abuse was at hand for themselves. She was kind and compassionate and just, and over time he realized those same qualities resonated in people like-

“You were my first example of Human kindness, how much love and compassion there was to be found in Humanity. And through you I got to know others like you—the Seeker that I once qualified as yet another excuse to justify my plans for world demolition, she is incredibly brave and honorable, has kindness and humility, compassion, she knew true, genuine regret for how you were treated in her care—it took me weeks to feel truly guilty for having not cared for you in those first few days when I was trusted to do just that. Cassandra was contrite before you even faced the Breach for the first time.”

Oh, her magic warmed against his—a silent ‘thank you’ for not just laying out her own sin unjustly and leaving it there without spelling out that he understood she was not a monster.
“I joined the Inquisition to find my Orb and destroy the world. Instead, I’ve found every reason I was wrong—every reason I should cease playing pretend as a god and leave the world as it is, seek only to help its progress, not throw it all away in the hopes of replacing it with what came before. I have met Humans and Dwarves and…a Qunari, come to know them, grown respect for them—all of you. I am sorry, truly, immensely sorry for the harm I caused at the Conclave—if I could go back, explain to myself what there was to find in this world, if I could do things differently? I would.”

Ellie cleared her throat. “When we find your Orb, Solas, it will be destroyed. Is that clear?”

“Absolutely. I have made notes on every method I surmise will work to do so—they are in the Spymaster’s care.”

The Inquisitor nodded. “Very good,” she took a breath and then said, “I have considered all of the facts, your crimes, your motives, the work you’ve done in the Inquisition, and I have come to a decision.”

Solas nodded, hanging his head and closing his eyes so she would not have to look at him. It was alright. it would be fine. He steeled himself in the bond—all of them.

Marehis. Cool, quiet anger thrumming in her blood, icy rage and hurt-mixed-distrust, all directed at him.

Sera. His palms hurt like it might bleed—nails biting into flesh, she must be clenching her fists so very tightly. Oh, her magic may be presenting as ice, but there was nothing but fiery rage in her, angry and confused, conflicted and hurt.

Ellie. Nervous, so much so she felt ill of it, like she might be sick, and she’s so, so very tired. She grips the arms of her throne like a form of focus, grounding almost, squeezing them so fiercely the tendons in her hands ache from the strain, and she uses it to form her net words…

Underneath it all, love. They love him. And he will remember that, be grateful for that unto the next life.

The Inquisitor’s voice rang out with solid certainty, delivering his punishment in full:

“You will be indebted to the Inquisition for the rest of its days. You will serve as a member of my party in the field whenever I call upon you and whenever we face missions pertinent to the Corypheus investigation, you will guard and protect its members with your life. When we are not in the field you will be in the Hinterlands serving in any capacity the people you made refugees, need, helping them to rebuild. When the time comes—you will help us take down Corypheus, and obliterate the Orb of Destruction. Tonight is your last night in Skyhold for the foreseeable future.”

…She wasn’t sure if Inky was a the world’s biggest softy, or a total badass.

Either way, it was uhhh…pretty awkward, hoofin’ it to Crestwood.

Sera felt awkward, all the way down to the itty bitty bit of magic continuously present in her blood that stuck around as long as she took the time to focus on it, meditate with it every day. That was real friggin’ weird…but really friggin’ cool. Like! Frick! It was stupid and scary and dumb and and and-

It felt the same way becoming a Friend had. Or when Marehis and ‘sandra made sure she knew they was her moms as much as Inky’s. Or when Ellie said they was sisters for the first time. Like she found something she’d been missing her entire life, but it’d always been out there waiting. And now she had it…kind of.

She was gonna wake it up all the way! She was! She just wasn’t…ready yet. Friggin’ dumb! But Inky was all sympathy when she talked about it with her, night of baldy’s trial. They stayed up real late after, Sera and Marehis had basically just been wired, she wasn’t exactly sure how they managed any sleep after that. Ended up keeping Ink up just, yammering away about her talk with Solas, and where she was with her magic pish.

“Well of course, it’s totally reasonable to be hesitant with magic, Ser’. I mean this is actively making a life changing decision—even more so than sex, I mean yeah between differing parts, there’s the concern of pregnancy which can be pretty life changing but even then, it doesn’t always have to be—case in point, me! You can get rid of a baby, a child any time, just up and abandon it somewhere if things are too much for you. You can’t abandon magic—once its with you…it’s with you. Every day for the rest of your life. If you commit, you’re committed, no backsies. Take the time you need—it’ll still be there whenever you’re ready.”

Compared it to sex! Like she was a ruddy virgin all over again! A magic virgin! Gross! …felt a little badly she kept her up so late though. When it was time to leave for Crestwood Inky was all squinty-eyed, dark circles under them, hands in her pockets as she hunched in on herself, walked right into Bull and mumbled out that as Inquisitor she was commandeering his horse and ordering him to hold her and let her nap all the way to Crestwood.

“Probably not gonna make it there in one day babe.”

Ellie groaned at that, “You know what I mean! Don’t be insubordinate! It’s no fun when its with me. I. am so. sleepy. I would kill a man for looking at me funny. And I’m on the verge of laughing at everything every five minutes. I- I need to sleep.”

Bull chuckled, resting a hand on her head, “Alright Imekari, sorry for the flack—I got you girl.”

Annnnyway. Things was awkward havin’ Solas with them. Bit of a relief—anytime a fight broke out they knew there was someone with a constant handle on if Ellie was okay, he called out the minute her barriers were down and reported if she was hurt…kind of seemed to make her feel like she was being babied—before she’d usually have the chance to speak up herself if she got injured, but part of the deal…at least as far as his presence being tolerated by Marehis went, was open lines of communication regarding Inky’s wellbeing. And…she couldn’t really begrudge the guy when ‘The Inquisitor is in danger!’ and ‘The Inquisitor is well/The Inquisitor has been injured, she needs blah blah blah blah blah’ was the only words Marehis would let him speak in her direction. Dude straight up stopped using contractions when he spoke just so he’d have more words to say, she was pretty sure, always called Ink ‘Inquisitor’ which seemed like…either distancing himself or making it clear he was respecting her, her authority over him. Other than that…no one really talked to him. ‘cept Cole ‘cause he’s a little dummy, he just can’t help it though—but he only talked to Solas when it seemed like his Spirit pish was just full-blown compelling him to…usually it was stuff that made the bloke sad, about how hurt everyone else was over the shite he’d done. Other than Cole? Occasionally Inky, she greeted him most mornings, sometimes just a nod of acknowledgement, sometimes a full ‘Good morning, Solas’. Seemed like she made a point of making sure the man got addressed by name, someone talking to him while looking him in the eyes at least once a day—if no one else supplied that, she would. And she sure as hell was the only one checking up on him after fights. Varric and Bull seemed to be bonding over who could make more ‘Wolf’ references in relation to the man in a day, Madam de Fer usually tagged on to whatever they came up with, just, snootier—least twice already she’d wrinkled her nose when they settled into camp and complained she could smell wet dog and Dorian would laugh. Anya was back in Skyhold with Kremmy-boy, so, definitely wasn’t her. Thom…didn’t much associate with the guy but he’d pass him things when they ate as a group, or hand him his whatever if Solas was helping with the cooking or something, didn’t say a word to him but he also didn’t chime in with Bull or Varric’s jibes. Sera if they was all alone, would let him ask her how she was, answer him eh, nicely or whatever.

The trip to Crestwood though, that took a bit longer than originally planned—Cullen wrote to say he’d had a patrol go through Verchiel and her Friend said the reward would be waiting in this lil’ place just southwest of Crestwood. So, they was makin’ a little pit stop.

Just in time for her birthday! Frick! She…was pretty excited. Never really celebrated much—Lady always threw a little something, it was always unbearable though. When she was out on her own, she did it up pretty right—drinking, dancing, somethin’ sweet, celebrated with whatever friendly faces was around. She was already pumped about Ink’s present—Krem drew them up something real friggin sweet, and Bull…shite, that crap with the Qun had him down, but he promised he was up for fulfilling his promise to help with Inky’s idea for Sera’s birthday. It’d count as his present too, so.

…speaking of presents…the guy had a new bauble around his neck. Just all of a sudden-like. Dragon tooth split in half and hanging on a silvery chain, and Sera was pretty sure he’d done something like that for Ellie’s birthday—split a little tiny tip of a tooth to make the matching pinkie rings him and Ellie wore. Didn’t see anyone running around with a match until she caught Dori one morning, stumbling out of the tent, just finishing up tying up his robes, and there was this chain hanging loose around his neck, huge honking half a Dragon tooth hangin’ off it, that he tucked into his robes for discretion or whatever.

She was pretty sure that meant they was Qunari-married now, right?

Tooth…Dorian…Bull…Birthday! Right, her birthday! Anyway, she was looking forward to it, she’d already spotted ingredients to take another swing at campfire-cake-making which was just gonna be yum! And sometimes when she walked near the tent Cassandra and Marehis was talkin’ all hush-hush like, obviously trying to keep their voices down so Elf ears couldn’t hear.

But she definitely heard Ellie shushing everyone, bit of a commotion going on outside when she woke up Cloudreach 4th. Then Inky came crawling back into the tent to snuggle up to Sera…huh, she’d gotten to sleep in a bit, yeah?

“Hola chica,” Ellie chirped when Sera opened her eyes, “did you sleep well?”

“Mhmhm. Yeah Ink—you?”

Ellie nodded before she popped up, bouncing in place a bit, “Breakfast is ready, if you are?”

Frig, she was so cute, just excited! “Sure thing sweets.”

Ellie took her hand and rose to her feet, pulling Sera up after her and rushing out of the “Happy Birthday Sera!”

Oh holy frick! Everyone—even Madam de Fer!—said happy birthday to her all at once as soon as she and Inky came out of the tent.

…well, almost everyone. Solas wasn’t to be seen…she didn’t think he got off anywhere, must just be keeping out of the way, which…part of her wanted him here? Mostly she was just glad he wasn’t sitting right there making it super awkward. Still…

She knew Inky well enough by now—bloke wasn’t starving or anything, Ink probably brought him breakfast already. So.

“Wowza, thanks you guys, shite, everythin’ looks amazing,” Sera said as she plopped down with Inky. Marehis sat down right next to Sera—hugging her real tight and kissing her on the cheek, and Cassandra was alongside the Elf woman, hand reaching out to pat Sera on the knee.

“Good morning da’vehnan!” Marehis said.

“Yes, Happy Birthday sweet girl,” Cassandra said, “Cullen sends you his best wishes, he felt badly he couldn’t come along and be here for your birthday but he did send his present along as well.”

…present? Seriously?

If it was a puppy Sera was gonna host a little rebellion against all this parenting crap! Loved Anya to pieces, so did not want the responsibility of her own pup. She was more a cat person, really.

“Tell him thanks for me, yeah?”

Breakfast was friggin’ the best! Great big breakfast sandwiches made out of buttery, pan-fried toast and thick portions of egg, bacon—it was a favorite for Sera, she didn’t like all the friggin’ rules that came with forks n’ knives n’ pish. Kind of felt the ghost of old anxiety, from days when she had to eat all proper or she got the cane for embarrassing Lady? Eating with her hands was stress free, just yum, and she loved it! …kind of loved how friggin’ hilarious it was, Vivienne eating a breakfast sandwich…she didn’t even use a knife and fork like Sera expected her to! She just! Went at it with her hands! Dainty like, but still!

“You full, Ser’?” Ellie asked after Sera finished scarfing down her third sandwich. And when Sera smiled and nodded, lickin a bit of salty grease off her fingers, Inky got real smiley, looked like she was absolutely up to no good and then she swatted Sera on the knee and shouted, “You’re it!” before jumping up and bolting! Just!

“No fair!” Sera laughed as she scrambled to her feet to chase after her! Friggin’! Fast little thing! Short little freakin’ legs—she had too much practice running around to keep up with everyone else!

Oh…oh frick—this was so cool! When Ellie tagged her it hadn’t just been…Sera didn’t realize it until she was running but Ellie’s magic? It reached out and sort of tagged Sera’s, there was this quiet thrill, an extra bit of giddiness bubbling in her blood her- her magic was having fun, boosting Sera’s own enjoyment and shite it- her magic felt love—loved, it loved Ellie’s magic! and Ellie’s magic loved it right back!
Ellie squealed when Sera caught up to her, even more when the Elf girl did more than tag her, she tackled her, taking her up in a squeezy hug that made the younger girl giggle, “Sera, we’re playing tag!”

“I just friggin’ love you, okay?”

“Magic’s more awake? Yeah that happens for me too but like, times a bajillion. Sometimes your magic’s going to feel conflicting things but it’s usually trying to help you.” It was gonna be even stronger? Holy crap, it already kind of made her feel like she was high or something. “I love you too!”

Sera hummed a bit…and then spun around real quick, startling Inky as she was abruptly put on her feet and Sera tagged her—on her good shoulder—before rushing off, “Oi! No fair!”

What was no fair was Cole! Ruddy little cheater! Friggin’ cute about it though—he loved playing tag, he’d just poof around after them, randomly pop up to get in the mix of the chase, but he always stuck around when he’d been tagged, running off and letting them chase him.

Solas was with the others when they returned to camp, sipping water from his canteen. Everything looked packed up one of the tents so Sera and Ellie could get armored up before heading out.

“Good morning, Solas,” Ellie offered politely before disappearing into the tent to Solas’s returned,

“Good morning, Inquisitor.”

“Morning,” Sera said, nodding his way.

Friggin’ she talked to the bloke every once in a while, she wasn’t totally ignoring him, but still he looked surprised, like the acknowledgement meant the world to him, his eyes got a little misty she thought, frick! “Good morning, Sera. I wish you a most pleasant, blessed Birthday.”

“Cool.” Felt weird saying ‘thanks’.

Ink was still working on her armor when Sera came in, finishing up the clasps of her armored tunic, “Do you have a preference for when we do presents? We were thinking we’d do cake and things tonight when we make camp if that’s okay with you—sort of celebrating after we get our work today out of the way.”

“It’s up to you guys—we can just do it tonight or whatever. Don’t need presents Ink, I mean breakfast and tag was a blast.”

“It’s your birthday! We have to celebrate! You were born, and that’s like, the best thing ever—I’m so happy you exist!” Inky enthused. Well. Sera’s ears was just permanently red, so, cool. “I just feel badly Dagna couldn’t be around for it—you’ll see Lace as soon as we get to Crestwood though,” she reminded Sera, shite, she missed Lacey.

…magic did too. Which made her sadder at first but then it kind of…helped? Like being sad about something with your friend. They was sad ‘cause you were, and sympathizing, assuring it’d be okay—they’d see Lacey real soon! Dagna and Lace made her magic all warm when she thought about ‘em, friggin’ cuties!
Day was pretty fun, they made their way to the place her Friend asked to meet, and everyone seemed pretty chipper—she got to ride with Inky again since the Human girl wasn’t so friggin’ sleepy, holy crap Rift magic really put her down, but it only took about four-ish days for her to start getting’ her pep back, so, hopefully that was the norm, and Solas had brought up the idea that magic in some aspects was like a muscle—you push them hard enough to tear, rest up, they heal up stronger. So, she’d be able to handle it even better next time, they figured. It was great riding together again, Cassandra and Marehis on either side of them, chattin’, asking what Sera’d like to do for lunch, if she knew this Friend very well—she didn’t, never met ‘em before, bloke seemed kinda new?

He…he was really new. Didn’t have a ruddy clue.

“…wait, this is weird,” Sera said as she led their group on foot to where she’d expected a freaking town or something. Magic sorta felt uneasy about it too, kind of like a little kid, hiding behind Sera for cover and comfort. Made her feel braver, like if Inky was scared, Sera’d step up and take charge, make her feel safe. So she did just that, stomping out into the middle of the freakin’ sloppy muddy middle-of-nowhere pisshole this ‘Friend’ told her to come get her coin at. What the fuck? What was on? Sometimes Friends wanted to make personal connections with each other, have a face-to-face exchange so they know who they’re dealing with in future, but most of the time everything was done through letters and rumors and pish, you drop off rewards someplace and the rewarded come to pick it up. But she could ruddy hear someone nearby but they hadn’t approached yet and that- blah! Made her paranoid as hell. Shite, Ellie was right alongside her, just following Sera’s lead. “I was expecting a village or something. The people that leave me stuff don’t trek out to places like this,” Sera said, “give me a city and I’ll give you a tour, but surprise surprise, I don’t know stupid woods or ruins.” Definitely didn’t look like the sort of place she’d be getting a Birthday drink in. Oh piss there was movement, Sera’s arm shot out in front of Inky to sort of put the younger girl behind her as some random Human bloke came stumbling out of hiding, “What’s that?” she snapped. Human bloke. Still—friggin’ what was going on?!

“Don’t hurt me,” he begged, “Harmond made me do it!”

“We aren’t here to hurt you,” friggin’ Inky! She was already stepping forward and resting a hand on the man’s arm, “Calm down—everything’s alright. Is something wrong? We’re with the Inquisition, I’m sure we can help.”

“Had enough help,” the man half heartedly snapped, “I complain about a fight and suddenly I’m an agent or something?”

 “…you were the one with the rumor out of Verchiel? My Friend?”

“You’re her? You’re the one he’s waiting for!” her magic sort of prickled up in her blood at that, like it was warning her to grab Inky and run-

Several things happened all at once.

The bloke wrenched away from Inky, turning tail so fast he nearly bit it, ducking low to catch himself as he shouted to someone—“It’s her! She’s here! Red Jenny!”

Sera felt barrier from everyone who could cast it in the blink of an eye—Vivienne’s freakin’ lightning fast, hit her even before Ellie, Dori and Sola’s all washed over her simultaneously.

And she was knocked back. Not down, but someone bodily got between her and whatever the fuck that dickhead was shouting for, a hand firm on her wrist as she was pulled behind them, they reached out and pulled Ellie back in the same motion to have both girls safe from-

Two arrows. They shot out of nowhere and hit her ‘Friend’ square in the chest. Made her stomach turn hearing his heart puncture—he was dead before he hit the ground.

The person in front of them drew his staff, and a second boost of barrier came up over her before he rained down lightning on mercenaries ambushing them, it was a trap. She lead them into a ruddy trap. She led Inky and Marehis and ‘sandra into a freaking trap!

She led Solas into a trap. And he ruddy protected her. Heard that man announce someone was ‘waiting’ for her, thought it was Sera who was going to be getting arrows in the chest, and put himself between her and their unseen enemy. Her and Inky.

Was Marehis that got her hands on the archer—they came out of the woodwork with the rest of their mercenary friends and she was on him like…like a mother, yeah, ripped him a new one. Two new ones. In the throat. With her daggers.

Wasn’t too much of a fight, what with four ruddy mercenaries coming at their group, Sera barely had her bow knocked-

It was a good thing she didn’t, the thing was still limp in my fingers, not even to the bow yet, otherwise Solas might have impaled himself with arrow in his gut—the guy whipped around fast the moment the mercenaries were down, staff sheathed as he rounded on Sera and Ellie, wrappin’ his arms around them real tight, one of his hands resting on the crown of Sera’s head, she could hear his heart practically thundering out of his chest, breathin’ real panicky, as he leaned a bit, nose to Sera’s hair, and then he pulled back looking them over.

“Are you hurt, da’vehnan?” he worried, Sera, she guessed since he was probably ass deep in the bond right now making sure Ellie was alright.

“Nah, ‘m all good.”

He seemed to sort of realize how uh…informal he’d gotten? His hands immediately pulled back off their shoulders, put ‘em behind his back as he cleared his throat as everyone regrouped around them. “My apologies, Sera, Inquisitor.”

Ellie’s chin quivered a bit, and then she pulled him into another hug, squeezing him a bit before she pulled away and informed him, angrily, “Mad at you. Love you. You protected Sera and that makes me happy and love you more and hate this whole dumb thing—so hugs and snapping! Thanks for protecting Ser’ and me—jerk!”

…like mother like daughter Sera supposed—Mare was glaring at Baldy like she wanted to maybe knife him and bed him. Probably at the same time. Yikes. “You’re unharmed, sweet girls?” she checked with them, Cassandra was already in their space, hand on Sera’s shoulder as she looked her over.

“Yeah we’re fine, thanks everyone,” Sera said.

“Asshole over there seems like he’s in charge,” Bull said, bringing their attention to some Human git in fancy duds waiting in the wings, watching them.

“This is all a tragic misunderstanding,” the man called out, his voice like the vocal embodiment of a total wank. “Let’s all sheathe our weapons, you walk out, and we’ll discuss this like business.”
“The Iron Bull,” Ellie sweets said, “be a pal and break this asshole’s neck if he makes another move. I’d like to know what the hell this is all about.”

“You got it boss,” Bull agreed.

“Don’t believe a word this pissbag says, Inky,” Sera warned. She could be too forgivey sometimes. Case in point: Solas.

Though…yeah, he’d done bad, but he’d been doing better. Was a better person than the one he’d been when he did…all that. So letting him be the person he is now, the one that fought with them, protected them, loved them…might not be too forgivey.

‘Cause there was pish Inky just straight up didn’t forgive.

“There, that wasn’t so hard, was it?” Lord Asshole asked, friggin’ condescending as fuck. “We identified the confusion and we worked past it, I’m Lord Pel Harmond.” He looked Inky up and down, her staff, armor, the Mark. “I do hope, Inquisitor, that you continue to respond to reason. After all,” his gaze went to Sera, “your choice of company is hardly virtuous.”

She’d show him some virtue—shove virtue right up his crapper!

“Friggin’ user you are, another noble prick who punches down,” Sera snapped.

And then he looked to Ellie. “We’re the same, you and I,” Bull freaking shit! “Well, perhaps that is overstating it,” he corrected, but like his mistake was comparing someone lesser to him and not the other way around, ass! “You are nothing like me, but we both need people.”

“You’re all talkative now, but you attacked us—laid in wait for my sister, and you murdered her ‘Friend’.”

“Sis- you and this-‘ bet ‘knife-ear’ was teeterin’ real tempting on his lips. He cleared his throat. “It was my understanding, until this very moment, you had been tricked by this Red Jenny. I attacked them on both our behalves.”

“Arse-biscuit,” Sera muttered.

“Quite,” he drawled. “Inquisitor? Herald, I don’t want to be your enemy. I am barely invested in being hers,” he sneered in Sera’s direction. “If you are willing to recognize an opportunity. We could be exceptional partners.”

So. Maybe Inky wasn’t always so forgivey.

“I already have several exceptional partners,” Ellie assured him coolly. “Better than you, any day. Sera?”

Didn’t have to ask her twice.

Sera tossed her boot knife at him. Just clanked against his chest, blunt side, nothing that would hurt him, but that’s not what she was aiming to hurt him with.

Dumbass bent over to make a show of picking her knife up to mock her or whatever, “Now what was the point of that?”

Point was while he was busy posing, she’d taken the few casual strides it took to close the space between them, kick that fucker in the danglers, sending him to his knees before grabbin’ hold of his head to send it into her knee. Heard the squelching crunch of his nose breaking off it, friggin’ sweet.

“Mother pissbucket frigging bastard shitebag pissface!” wanted to keep goin’ at his stupid, ugly face but his nose was already broken, and…and Inky might’ve given her the go-ahead but she was right there watching so Sera just- "Eat it, you lop-eared son of an arse-nut rot-suck piece of shite!” she shouted, kicking him in the ribs till she was sure, while this bastard still got to walk away…he got to with some broken ribs. Then she put her hand in Inky’s Marked one, gripping tight. “Come on Inky. Let’s get out of here, yeah?”

“Go with your sister, da’vehnan, we’re with you,” Marehis said, coming up behind them and pressing a kiss to the back of Ellie’s head, sending them off-

Ohhh. Sera walked off with Ellie, heading back to where they left their horses, just barely cought the sound of Mare uhhh…well. Taking care of things. Sera hadn’t been willing to beat a man to death with her bare hands in front of Inky, but she had no problem—neither did Marehis—with his throat getting slit while the younger girl wasn’t looking, was out of earshot.

Well. That’d be fun for Lady Josie to explain…but uh, the bloke had been coming after the ‘Friends’, not the Inquisition. So. No real reason for anyone to know what went down here, if there was no one alive that would tell. Cool. Probably for the best, anyway—Sera’d…oh she’d bad enough leading them into a trap, if Ellie’d gotten hurt or if this asshole went and- and tried to get some kind of revenge or something for the Inquisitor slighting him and letting her knife-ear’d bitch sister beat the crap out of him?

Some Birthday, huh?

Shite. That poor bastard. She felt bad, for the littler bloke that got killed for…for what?
He’d gotten a rumor to the Friends, sounds like it was on accident, but it happened, and this asshole hunted him down, made him get Sera out here just to end up killing him. Friggin’.

Ellie was weepy about it as they walked away—best if they didn’t mess with anything, bury anyone, and let people find the dead mercenaries, Lord, servant, come to their own conclusions, so Sera kept her walking, feeling…pretty weepy herself. Frustrated crying. This was supposed to be good they were trying to help that poor bastard. They had helped and then that Lord got his dick in a wad over how embarrassed he’d been, chickening out and backing down like a little bitch because the Inquisition sent soldiers through on patrol—would catch and call out any bullshite he’d been pulling on his people. This was crap! And heartbreaking and humiliating and just! Shite!

Magic…was quieter, she hadn’t sat with it yet today, she’d lose the connection she had at the moment, have to get it back again if she didn’t do so soon. But it was still there, quiet and reassuring, comforting her, like friggin’ an internal hug, sending soothing waves of calm that tampered down the sort of- she’d kind of felt like she was on the verge of something panicky—Inky could’ve gotten hurt or killed, or Cassandra or Marehis or- any of them! and it’d be all her stupid fault! Sort of! They trusted her with this and it’d been a ruddy cock-up! She was embarrassed and scared and ashamed and angry and-

And…magic helped. She’d been worried—Ellie said it made things stronger, if you was feeling the same thing your magic was, it amplified that feeling, so that made Sera…scared, about the whole ‘committing’ thing. Thought that maybe Inky struggled with things like depression ‘cause her magic was depressing her—making her double sad and double angry or whatever, but…
no, she’d been right and magic feelin’ conflicting things to help with whatever you was feeling.
Her magic didn’t make her sadder—it was doing it’s best, friggin’ running out on her even faster because it was putting everything it had left in their connection to making her feel better.

“Sera? H-hey,” Ellie sniffled, stopping her as they reached their horses, “i-its okay, I’m sorry that went down like that, but it wasn’t your fault—everythings going to be okay,” she promised, pulling Sera into a hug. Oh. Sera’d started full on crying but-

“’m not sad Ink—I mean I am but not- I- my magic’s dy-“ she gulped, hugging the girl back. It wasn’t dying, she just had to get it back but still, she- she- “I wanna wake it up—for permanent! I don’t want to keep calling and losing it all the time, I wanna keep it! No backsies!”

“Really?” Ellie asked, kind of excited but like she was trying to stay neutral, failing just a little bit.

“Yeah, r-really.”

Ellie pulled back, reaching up to cup Sera’s face in her hands, thumb away her tears, “Kay. Alright. As long as you’re ready, I’ll support you a hundred percent. You wanna sit together and meditate when we make camp? Birthday-girl isn’t supposed to help cook dinner anyway.”

“C-can um,” the others were closing in but they hadn’t really caught all the way up yet, still, Sera made sure her back was to Bull and used the little hand-sign alphabet they’d learned for chattin’ up Grimm, just makin’ an ‘S’ with her fist, “h-help?” he- he was just friggin good at it, knew what he was doin’. The night she went to talk with him before his trial he’d sat her down, had her communin’ with her magic in a snap. She wanted it back now, damn it! But things was weird with Baldy so, checking with Ellie first. Cause if she was so pissed at him she didn’t want to associate with him for anything like this, dude would be dead to Sera, that’s just how it worked!

Ellie looked at her for a beat and then she subtly did the sign for ‘sneaky’. Sera wasn’t sure what that meant but she figured out it was the quick, private way Inky was saying to go along with her. The younger girl leaned against Sera a bit as the others joined them, like for support.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked immediately followed up by Dori—friggin’ worry wart he was, he hated it but he was a ruddy mother hen!

“Ellie? Did that scoundrel hurt you? I couldn’t see around my mountainous lover.”

“I’m okay,” Ellie promised, “but um, I dunno, that was all really out of hand and I’m still kind of recovering, strength and magic wise and that just kind of…” she shrugged, “I’m feeling pretty wiped. Um, Solas?”

Bloke looked full startled Ellie was even addressing him, it wasn’t even morning or anything! “Yes, Inquisitor?”

“Would you mind meditating with me? I know I didn’t want help before, but I kind of need a bit more pep in my step if I’m going to stay conscious for Sera’s Birthday.”

“Of course, d- Inquisitor. It would be my honor to assist you.”

Ohhhh frick, yeah, that- that was good. Sera…hadn’t thought about anything other than just getting her magic to work, like yeah, it’d be pretty outing to suddenly be all chummy with Solas and want his help meditating, and if the other Mages could tell he was doing something to prompt magic, help it wake up, they’d just go with the obvious assumption he was doing so for Ellie, ‘cause she asked, duh. It gave Sera cover so…yeah, she could take her time and figure everything out. She wasn’t even sure she wanted anyone to know about this, other than the people who already did. Oh, ‘cept Lace—she’d talked it over with Dagna, and that was only cause magic liked her so much too, when it heard her fall and her poor little thumb was hurt, it just sort of reacted, wanted to help so it did. Dagna was keeping it on the down low but she thought…she thought it was really cool—sooooo amazing that Sera had natural magic in her asleep that she could work with and build on and grow, which was nice, she’d been kind of scared about that, what people might think, especially her uhhhh girlfriends. One down, one to go—Dagna said it was entirely up to Sera who she told and when, especially in regards to Lacey, but if she wanted, Sera could wait until they was all together again and Dagna would be there to support her and Lace both which…

Friggin’ everyone needed two girlfriends! Inky should try it, Kremmy-boy was supportive and he wasn’t the jealous type, she could have herself a handsome, devoted boyfriend and two girlfriends! That was so much ‘friends’!

Cassandra came and felt at Ellie’s forehead, “How poorly are you feeling?”

“Just tired, I’m okay.”

“You poor thing,” Dori sympathized, “Ellie, you’re aware I can be of assistance, yes? Co-magical meditation requires like magics working together, after all.”

“Yes my dear, you should look to your Human allies if you’ve need,” Vivienne said.

“Oh. I mean I still don’t want help—Solas can tell me how to do it all by myself without outside assistance, show me what I need to do, things like that. He’s already taught me cool stuff with the Fade that he couldn’t show me with his magic but could still teach me because I saw what he did and he explained it a bit. So. It’s really no offense to either of you, you’re welcome to join us, just,” she shrugged. Poor Inky really didn’t like all the fibbing but she…she did it for Sera. Friggin’ she was the best!

“Get off Inky’s dick,” Sera snapped, “If she want’s Wolfie’s help, she can have it—it’s not like he doesn’t owe her one. Or a thousand.”

“How are you faring, Sera?” Cassandra wondered then, turning to her friggin! Feelin’ at her forehead too what the fri- oh stress-fevers. Sera’d talked to her about them, she used to get them back in the day, ended up with one not too long ago ‘cause friggin’ everything on this fucking planet kept trying to come around and kill her- her- her kid sister! “You feel a bit warm—Marehis?” she prompted.

“Hmm,” Marehis came, felt at Sera’s cheek with the back of her hand before resting her palm against her forehead, “Uh-huh, oh da’vehnan, come—let’s get someplace suitable for camp and you can relax. Do you want to ride with me?”

…no. Yeah. Maybe?

Friggin!

“…sure.”

Marehis friggin smiled! Took Sera along to her horse and Bull tagged along like…nice, big dummy. Marehis could get into the saddle and then Bull helped Sera up—she wasn’t dizzy or sleepy or nothin’! But it was nice of ‘em.

Didn’t have to ride far…sort of back tracked a bit, got out of range of the rain—they could still make it to Crestwood tomorrow, but tonight, yeah if they could hold of on the rain a bit more, they would.
Adults got to cookin’, most of them anyway, Marehis sat nearby without any distraction, probably because Sera and Ellie were seated with Solas—the mom squad told Sera she’d probably relax more taking a nap or something, offered to help her bathe if she thought that might do something, but uh, nah—meditation was exactly the thing she needed to wind down right now. So, she sat with Ellie, Solas between them and…

It worked! Son of a bitch did it work! Solas’s magic reached out and prompted her own, got it to come back, be active again in Sera. She was relieved, she’d been kind of nervous that the second she finally decided she really did want magic around for good, that’d be the moment it up and quit on her. But it didn’t—it was back! And it missed her! Friggin’ boss!

Dori was there when they opened their eyes, like right there, seated in front of Sera. “How are you feeling, Sera? You aren’t falling ill I trust? My friendship does have its limits, I cannot possibly be associated with you if you’re both ‘hardly virtuous’ and diseased,” he teased.

“You don’t get your dick in a twist—I’m feelin’ better already,” Sera assured, looking to Solas and Inky then, “Uhh…thanks. For letting me join you.”

“It was my pleasure, Sera,” Solas assured, venturing further, “I am pleased you are feeling better. I am sorry, for how events unfolded this evening. Please do try to have a pleasant end to your evening.”

She would. It was gonna be yum! And then presents! And then a liiiiiiiiiittle ouch. But fun ouch!

Then possibly ouch-ouch because the mom squad might kill her.

Dinner was just about ready when they joined everyone, it was real good—real big beef sandwiches, these onions, what was it called? Caramelized onions on top. Didn’t taste like caramel though—but they was still friggin good she thought. Fried up potato wedges. It was the best!

Though as soon as Solas cleaned his plate he excused himself—he wasn’t the first to finish, but he was the first to call it a night.

Oh…because sandwiches and potato wedges might not be the best—close second, but not the best best.

Cookie cake.

She’d just started liking cookies again only to find out there was something even better out there—cookie cake! Holy crap!

“Eleanor’s idea—does it look correct, sweet girl?” Cassandra asked Ellie who nodded, “Yes! Gosh, sorry I wasn’t any help but you guys did amazing!” Ellie encouraged, looking to Marehis, “Would you light the candles, mami?”

“Certainly, da’vehnan.”

Inky held her hand real tight, kind of bouncing in excitement alongside Sera before their party launched into ‘Happy birthday to you! happy birthday to you! happy birthday dear Seeeeraaaaaaa!’

Wild, everything that happened today, coming back and having some Birthday cheer but…maybe that’s just what a day like this called for. She felt like she messed up, it was nice having all her friends, her um…family around, being all dumb and happy she was born and shite. Used to have birthdays she wished she wasn’t. This definitely wasn’t one of them.

She was pretty sure even Viv sang! Ha! Bitch could totally tolerate Sera now and she knew it!

“Presents!” Ellie declared it, “Me first!”

“Tumbles!” Varric complained. What, had dwarfy gotten her something?

“I’m Inquisitor! This is a direct order—you watch yourself Tethras, I’ll commandeer the whole order of things, pick people by favorites. I love you but like—you know you’d be in line a bit.”

Dwarf sighed and gestured for her to get on with it. Inky already figured out her present though, and it wasn’t something they’d be doin’ right here, so…

Oh. Oh she’d gotten Sera something else too.

A book.

Didn’t have a title, it was just a reddish brown leather journal looking thing, for a minute Sera thought that’s what it was—a journal for her to keep a diary in or something but uh, nope.

“It’ll only open up for you,” Ellie said as she handed it to her, and when she pulled open the cover yeah, frick, holy crap something zinged across her magic, felt like she’d used it a bit to actually get the thing open-

It was a lexicon.

It was a freaking handwritten Inky-explaining spell lexicon! With friggin’ notes and things inside it all about how certain spells might feel when she uses them, tips and things on cool down times and how to use different spells in day-to-day life, not just in battle n’ pish but for regular stuff! Sera flipped through it, it had a little bit of everything, seemed like, like Ellie was making sure she had a sort-of survival guide to navigating the world with magic—there was even some spells that came with little explanations underneath that Sera could use as cover if she found herself in a situation she had to use magic but didn’t want people knowing she used magic. When the hell had she even found time to do this?! Freaking!

Ellie grunted when Sera collided with her, just! Big hug! Full on tackling!

“Happy Birthday, sissy!” Ellie giggled.

“Inky! This is amazing! You’re the best!” she sat up, “I dunno ‘bout what you lot are thinkin’ but you’re pretty screwed.” Especially since Sera was pretty sure this wasn’t Ellie giving her something super cool to back out of her other birthday plans, it was just an kick-ass addition. Possibly more cover for their later plans—it’d look weird if it looked like Ellie hadn’t gotten her anything.

“Tumbles, what the hell? Stop trying to put me out of business! I’ve got chest-hair to feed!” Varric complained, “The hell she write this time?”

Sera stuck her tongue out at him. “None of your beeswax Dwarfy—friggin’ eat your chest hair!”
He chuckled, coming up to offer his birthday present…another book.

“This en’t one of your Sword and Sheild shite things, is it?

“Sort of but uhhh, it might float your boat. I’ll want your input before I send out the final draft, you, any of your uh, lady friends have anything to say about it, I’ll want to hear,” Varric said, “Tumbles and Mae-Mae’ve been on me about ‘representation’ and shit in my fictional works. I write what I know, but I know a lot of people and their experiences so…took a shot, if it’s crap, let me know, maybe I can fix it.”

Sera’s mouth dropped open when she looked at the cover and she peeked inside just to flip a bit to make sure…oh holy frig- “This one’s just about girls!” like! Girls meetin’ and goin’ on adventures and fallin’ in love with each other and shite! As more than friends! “Friggin’ boss! Thanks dwarfy!”

Frick, she ended up with so much books! Dori found one she’d been after—Chemistry text she used to have, hadn’t taken it with her when she gave over everything Lady owned, ‘cause technically it was something Lady bought, it wasn’t really Sera’s. Glad to have a copy of her own. Viv got her a scarf…silk shite, but it was bright yellow, real pretty and soft and Sera actually liked it! And Thom whittled her a bracelet to match the one he’d made Inky! Friggin’ sweet! Cole, sweet dumb-dumb, he made her something! He’d Lady Josie if she would get him a jar, and she’d found one for him apparently, spare from the kitchens but Cole hadn’t known where to look or how one went about getting things really—glass jar that he filled up with paper. Little slips of paper he’d scrawled on—it was a ‘Hurt Healing Kit’ so if he ever couldn’t get to Sera, like he was away or something, they were separated or she just didn’t want his company, she could just pop open the jar and pull out a scrap of paper at random and it’d have something written on it that might help her feel better. Like little complements or something-

“All of the things people love about you!” Cole explained, “All of the things that make you, you! Special and cared for and deserving of love! So whenever you forget those things, they’re in there to remind you! Oh!” he chirped surprised when Sera gave him a squeezy hug and a kiss on the cheek.

“Damn Kid, you really stepped your Birthday gifting game up,” Varric complimented.

“Oi!” Ellie snapped, “I love the birthday rocks from Cole! All of them! Cremisius saved them and they live on my bookshelf at home! You can fight me Tethras—stop testing me today!”

“Hey, you wanna go, Tumbles, we’ll go!”

“I will hug you! For so long! And it will destroy you!”

“Varric do cease provoking hug violence from Eleanor, honestly,” Cassandra chastised.

Cassandra…

Frick!

“This is from Cullen, Marehis, and myself,” she said as she seated herself alongside Sera. “Today held a rather offensive example—we are a strange mix of family, and claim to one another may fall into question. While we can do nothing—nor should we—about the visible differences that would make people like that Lord Harmond question your relationship to Eleanor…it might seem silly or foolish but Cullen thought of it and I found it sound…sweet. Assisted in its design. Though Eleanor was of some help.”
“I was?” Inky asked, confused. Huh, guess ‘sandra and Cullen hadn’t shared their present plans?

They hadn’t. ‘cause part of it was for Inky, and that was the best!

They got them this! This necklace! Two necklaces, but they shared a single charm—it split in half when you pulled it apart so they each wore part! A heart—one Sera’d recognize anywhere, it was the exact shape, familiar way Inky always drew hers, they always dipped in a bit more at the bottom on the right side—an inward curve that always ended up there when Ellie drew little hearts in her messages to people. S I S T E R S emblazon in it right down the center of the charm, where it split so it couldn’t really be read unless the pieces were together! It was-

“Cullen’s a ruddy genius! You too ‘sandra! Thanks!”

“You, Sera, are meant to wear this portion,” Cassandra said, taking the half of the heart with the curve near the tip, and helping Sera put it on, leaving Ink with the half that had a near-perfect straight slanted line from the tip up to the curve of the top, Marehis helped Ellie put her part on. “There is a piece more to it,” Cassandra said, pulling at something ’round her neck—Marehis was pulling at something around her own neck too-

Oh. Oh they meant something that would mean all of ‘em was family.

The little curve just before the tip of the heart? Marehis and Cassandra were wearing matching necklaces with arrowhead charms on them, but the tips was wonky—curved to fit perfect into the ‘imperfect’ dip in the heart that made it Ink’s handiwork.

Cassandra cleared her throat, “Cullen wears one now as well. So. Should any question our bond—we’ve a physical link after a fashion.”

Any one of them at any time could just whip out their little arrow head made to fit Sera’s half of the heart and bam—who’d have something like that they shared with some random acquaintance? Silly-ish but she didn’t give a shit, it was amazing.

“The Iron Bull?” Cassandra asked then, “Have you anything for Sera, or was Dorian’s present a joint venture?”

“Nooo, hate the kid, didn’t get ‘er shit. She’s a good friend to my Lieutenant, Imekari’s sister, just a real pain in the ass overall,” Bull prattled off, “I got something Seeker—Sera knows.”

“…when…?” Sera ventured carefully.

“Whenever you want babe,” Bull shrugged.

“…Inky?” Sera asked, looking to the Human girl. Was she still up for it? Did she want to wait or-

“Ready whenever you are!”

“Now work?” Sera asked the Qunari.

“Hell yeah it does—come on Imekaris,” he addressed them both as he lumbered to his feet, “Private Charger business—you losers aren’t invited.”

Hell yeah they wasn’t!
Though frick she almost wished she’d fessed up to ‘sandra and Marehis, gotten them to come along and hold their hands or something holy crap tattoos were more than a ‘little’ ouch! Lots of ouch! But...not too bad, especially once she got used to it—she hadn’t known what to expect, but Bull was consistent with his needle jabs, so, gave her a rhythm to get used to and deal with. Felt bad Inky was doing it too but over all?

It was freaking sweet!

“Alright babes, keep that shit clean and covered, you hear me? Least until it heals—you can use Elf root on it after you give it time to settle—day or so.

“Thanks!” Sera and Ellie giggled when they spoke in unison.

Overall she’d gotten some new books, new scarf, sweet jewelry, and a tattoo—Krem had drawn up this little circlet of Elf Root vines woven together with a few yellow buttercups in it, circle sat just on the inner flesh of Sera’s left wrist—Ellie’s on her right wrist, so when they stood facing each other the tattoos were mirrored. Bull did a banging job copying Krem’s drawing in friggin, different shades of green and yellow ink—ruddy thing had depth to it, it was freakin’ art!

Qun could actually fuck itself, Inky was right! They wasn’t about tattoos, and Bull was boss at them!

‘sandra had this bemused smirk on her face when the girls rejoined camp again. “Have you injured yourselves, my sweet girls?”

“Oh no,” Marehis offered false concern, “whatever could have befallen our most precious da’lens.”

They knew! Like! All along! “Shush! You was all pissed at Bull when he Inked up Inky—and her friggin’ nickname is Inky! That’s like, just meant to be! So—we didn’t do nothing!”

“Can we see this ‘nothing’?” Marehis asked.

“We are admittedly curious—and certain the Iron Bull did a lovely job as he did with Eleanor’s first tattoo.”

They let them have peeks under the bandaging Bull’d put on them, the women nodding their approval, “Very well done,” Cassandra said.

“I think it’s very sweet,” Marehis complimented. “Come—let’s get ready for bed, shall we da’vehnans?”

Sera nodded. “I wanna wash my face before bed, is that cool? I’ll be right back,” she said. it wasn’t a total lie—she’d wash her face good. and be right back. She just planned a little ‘in between’ thing she was omitting.

“Of course,” Marehis said, “we can join you if you’ve need.”

“Nah, you guys get ready for bed, I’ll just be a minute.”

They wasn’t real keen on letting Sera go off on her own, but it wasn’t like she was out of ear shot if she ran into trouble, and Cole was always around, they trusted him not to let anything happen to her.

She did too. Which was why she was paying someone a quick visit before sleep time.
“Hey, Solas?”

Dude hadn’t gone to bed…she didn’t think. Huh, it was funny how hard it was to tell on someone who didn’t have any hair to give away that they’d just been tossin’ and turnin’ or not. He popped his head out of the tent almost immediately. Solas had a tent all to himself, which might seem nice but uh…the way this Inquisition ran, it had to be pretty miserable, being sequestered.

“Sera. Ahh. I um…I apologize if you perceived my absence as rude, I felt you might enjoy less awkward festivities. But I did not forget the celebration of your birth,” he promised. "If you would not like a present from me, I do understand, but if you wish, I do have something."

...seriously? Hadn't he just been under lock and key? When had he gone present shopping? She kind of doubted they let him have much, he'd had books n' pish in his cell, maybe he did somethin' like Inky had. Umm, "Wasn't here about that, honest. You don't have to give me somethin' but I won't uh, turn down your present or whatever."

He nodded, "One moment," he said, pulling away from the entrance she could hear him digging around in the pack he always carried around and then he was back, extending something to her, a uhhh sort of wrist bracer or something, had two deep lines that split it into sections, ornately engraved with designs of flowers and herbs that Sera couldn't quite place, like she'd never seen their like before. "This...this was something that belonged to my parents, myself in my youth," he explained, pulling at one of the sections, oh, it was something that could be split three ways, before he snapped to together again. "It was something to denote a bond, either familial, friendship, romance. As my parents were born to a generation still allowed to reproduce, my father presented my mother with this when they began courting, and when they did eventually decide upon union, he presented her with it's third portion, for her to pass on to their progeny. When they passed I was left with the bracelet made whole, ironic as that is. I hadn't even thought of it since I woke but recent events had me reflecting on my life. Given...it is not something even in my youth I thought I might use for myself. I thought perhaps you might find use of it...given it can be used to denote even budding relationships, and is capable of being split thrice...while I have not been privy to group gossip as of late, it is my understanding you've two lady loves. If you're uncomfortable with the notion of course you may keep it whole for yourself, to present if and when you would like."

...it was kind of nice. Pretty, she wasn't usually one for flowery pish but yeah, being so ancient, she was pretty sure the flora represented on it was extinct and that was weirdly cool, like, you wasn't going to just find something like this anywhere else. "You're sure?"

"Certainly. I would not have offered."

"..cool. Thanks, it's real pretty," she said, accepting the offered bracelet, yeah she wasn't sure...when exactly, but she liked the idea of, er, sharing it. "I um actually came here not 'cause of birthday stuff though."

"Of course, how may I be of service?"

“No service, just uh…I’m gonna, um. I wanna make things be for permanent—you know?” didn’t wanna say what exactly, Bull wouldn’t be eavesdropping on her, but he can’t help what his ears pick up and he might be intentionally listening if he heard her come talk to Solas, looking out for her or whatever.

“Truly?” he asked, sounding pleased-surprised, “That is- I am happy for you, if that is truly what you wish.”

“I um…need potion.”
“Of course,” he said, disappearing into the tent and returning a second later with a vial of Lyrium he handed to her. “You’ve still food on your stomach? It helps, both with your body handling its digestion for the first time, and with how well it works within your system.”

“Yeah I’m good,” Sera assured.

“I would suggest taking it as soon as possible if you wish to do so tonight—you’ll find yourself restless for a time, it wouldn’t due to have you miss the whole of your sleep.”

“Oh, frig yeah, can I…?” she shook the bottle a bit and he seemed to get the hint.

“I will take care of the empty bottle, of course. You…are not making your mothers aware?”

“Inky knows. Cole too probably, and I’ll think it to him before I sleep—he’s promised to be with me, Ellie too. Cassandra and Marehis get it, support it, but…I just kind of want to get a feel for it? Before I tell more people.”

“As is your prerogative, of course,” Solas encouraged.

Sera nodded and she didn’t see anyone out and about so, she popped the cork out of the vial and knocked it back friggin tasted- she wasn’t sure really but it was this weird mix of burning and freezing and wowza! She shook herself a bit, frick!

“Be well, Sera. If…if you’ve need of me, of help, just call, I would come to your aid. I trust all will go smoothly, and I wish you and Ellie safe passage in the Fade.” A ghost of a smile tugged at his lips, and he left it on a lighter note, that the Fade could be fun, “Might I suggest endeavoring a game of tag? Ellie and Cole seem to enjoy as much there.”

“Sweet!” she said. Huh. She trusted Cole and Ellie with everything—wasn’t a single thing in the world she didn’t trust them with. Solas?…she trusted him to protect her. Put her and Ellie first. So. That was enough for, “Uh…thanks. I’ll have people, but um…yeah we run into trouble,” she shrugged.

“Dareth shiral.”

So. She washed her face…might’ve run to the stream, and back super fast frick she had energy! And she sort of popped around the camp a bit looking for Cole instead of just doing the ‘brain thing’ but he came to her, poofin’,

“I know, I will be there—it will fun, Sera, I promise I will keep you safe. I can help you with falling asleep if you like.”

…yeah she might just need that, “Thanks, Cuddly,” she said as she headed for her tent.

So.

Twenty years under her belt, Sera Jones fell fast asleep, with a mother on either side of her, and the person she was pretty sure she loved most in the world, ever, laying on top of her—and together, she and her sister entered the Fade.
Marehis was uncertain, just which place she despised more: the Storm Coast, or Crestwood. Both were equally dreary, though the rainfall in Crestwood was not quite as thunderous, it fell far less harshly than the downpour ever present on the Coast…

She found she preferred the Coast’s monsoon. Crestwood should, perhaps, burn.

It wasn’t as though they’d gotten off on the right foot after all, oh, that whole horrible affair with Lord Harmond—she was proud of Sera for walking away in front of her sister, and was glad to have ended his life herself, she would not have some putrid man seeking to bring vengeance upon one or both of her children, it was bad enough the threats they received on the daily toward their Inquisitor, Sera thus far had remained untargeted and she wished to keep it that way. The man had laid in wait for her, expected her to come alone, brought mercenaries to end her life—when the Human boy, Sera’s ‘Friend’ called out that Sera was this Red Jenny they were waiting for and Marehis heard the strain of a bow being pulled taut, her heart had stopped, brain flooding with just how to stop what she feared to be coming next and-

And Solas. He’d moved only a split second before she had, she’d been trying to rapid fire consider conflicting information, she heard the man shout that ‘its her!’ and it sounded like he meant Sera, and then she heard the sniper's bow string and habit and reflex had her brain perceive the threat being to Ellie, who was the regular target of such attempts. Solas hadn't given it a moment’s consideration, ran on pure instinct it seemed. Immediately put himself between harm and h-…

Their girls. He would die for them, had done all he could to ensure their safety, seemingly lost his composure to the fear- the threats to Ellie were continuous, something that had always been since they met her, they didn’t like it, but it was a norm. To have Sera suddenly and unexpectedly become a target? Some horrible person who abused his power, his people, angered because this girl put a stop to it, looked at their daughter and saw someone worthless, beneath him. Dared to rid the world of her the way one might swat out a fly. It was horrifying, and she well understood how Solas could lose his need to distance himself out of penance to hold close the girls he’d just feared losing.

Marehis and Cassandra had risen early to go take over the night’s watch from the Iron Bull. They could hear something of a chess game going on between he and Solas, after a fashion—there was no board before them when Marehis peeked out of the tent when she heard both their voices before resuming the task of pulling on her boots as she and Cassandra dressed for their shift, they were merely exchanging piece positions back and forth, an entirely verbal game, it seemed an exercise of sorts.

“You win again, congratulations,” Solas offered politely. “I am pleased to see Madness has yet to rob you of your faculties.”

The Iron Bull snorted, “You let me win again, Wolf boy.”

“I assure you I’m merely luring you into a false sense of confidence—I do promise to decimate it when the moment is right.”

“Yeah yeah,” the Qunari shook his head, and then there was some hesitation as he and Solas rose to their feet, the Qunari giving Marehis something like an apologetic look before he ventured, “Hey. Um. Good looking out today.”

It…certainly had been. Marehis bit her lip as she looked to her sleeping girls. So much went wrong tonight but it could have been devastatingly so much worse. She’d been so afraid Sera might suffer nightmares after everything, but it looked like she was deeply asleep, the girl was even smiling in her slumber as she held Ellie close.

“I am grateful for his actions as well,” Cassandra quietly admitted. “Despite everything he is…still a strong ally. Dependable, where it matters.”

“…do you still have-“ Marehis started, but Cassandra nodded, already offering up what the Elf woman was asking for. It felt foolish but…she told herself it was necessary to display some gratitude, vital to reward good behavior out of the man prone to doing so much harm. And this was something the man likely deserved. Sera was reticent to show much comradery with the man since his betrayal but it was clear she still held regard for him, as Ellie did.

So. She paid a short visit to his quarters while he still kept the Iron Bull company.

And come morning…the man had a silvery chain that dipped down under his shirt, he pressed his fingers to the concealed arrowhead charm it bore, giving Marehis a grateful look, a respectful nod. Cullen had made such arrangements for this present their first week in Skyhold, well before the reveal of Solas’s origins. She was beyond grateful to Cullen—she felt badly, she hadn’t been able to think of what to gift the girl with, though she supposed even Ellie had struggled, to the point she’d gone and sought advice from all and sundry. Cullen provided something that could come from all those who held her in similar regard.

So. Crestwood had its pitfalls and highpoints thus far. Their day started out pleasantish enough. In fact it was very sweet, felt like a physical warmth to her heart to see her Sera so excited —rushing down the bank to collide with her girlfriend.

Girlfriends. The moment Sera was taking one dwarven woman up into her hold, the other —Dagna—came sliding out of a tent, striking a pose with arms out and hands splayed as she wriggled her fingers and announced, “Ta-daaaaa! Happy Birthday!”

Sera let out an excited screech, keeping one arm around Miss Lace as she reached out the other to swoop up Dagna into their hug, “Widdle!”

“Did you have a good birthday, Ser’?” Dagna asked.

“The best! I mean some bullshite went down with my Friends thing yesterday, it’s a whole thing—but my birthday was still bangin’! Even more now, I mean shite I was already excited to see Lacey but- you- how the frick are you even here??”

The Dwarven Arcanist giggled, “Lacey-doll gave me directions, short cuts and things I can take because I traveled all on my own—“

“Dagna, shite, that’s so dangerous—“ Sera breathed as she released her hold on the women taking a hand in each of her own.

“Oh I can take care of myself, it wasn’t any trouble. And I wanted to see you on your birthday, and I missed Lace loads!” she blushed when Miss Lace kissed her on the cheek.

“She was fine honey,” Lace assured, “I gave her directions along the route I took—I cleared it out on my way in. Now, uhh, please try to keep your voice down? Sound sometimes disturbs the um…undead.”

Sera slapped her hands over her mouth, letting out a shriek into them. ahh.

The first thing Marehis despised about this place. It’s undead. Furthermore, the reason for them.
Ellie had been giving the women space, now wishing to disrupt their greeting but she was here for business. “Undead?” she asked Lace.

“Inquisitor! Ellie, hi honey, I’m glad you guys made it in okay.”

“Oh my god! I forgot, duh, you’re going to be here!” Dagna enthused as the Human girl approached them, “Hey cutie! Where’s Boyfriend?”

“Back in Skyhold,” Ellie sighed offering a little pout at the thought, oh, their last mission out with the Lieutenant in tow had nearly ended in losing the young man, but even Marehis found she too missed Cremisius. That sweet man had sent along his own birthday present, in the form of a birthday well wish and a pair of warm brown fingerless leather gloves he’d made for her that she already adored—they came at breakfast, and Sera immediately put them on, they would assist in her archer’s grip, guard the knuckles at the base of her fingers, however the right glove was shorter than the left, it only covered down to the…er, Sera termed it her ‘thumb crotch’, leaving her palm exposed. For holding hands with Ellie, apparently—so Sera wouldn’t feel she shouldn’t wear them for fear of not being able to make direct contact with the girl’s Mark whenever they held hands. “I bet it’s at least not raining there. It rains constantly here, doesn’t it?” she asked Lace.

“…it certainly seems like it,” the Scout regretfully informed her. Marehis heard Dorian groan as he leaned his head against the Iron Bull’s arm, quietly complaining and asking his lover just why he decided to tag along on this mission.

“Rude!” Ellie informed the sky above in reprimand. Cassandra quietly snorted at Marehis’s side. “Kay, rain, undead? Anything else?”

“There is a Rift—Rifts plural all around but the main one they’re having issue with? It’s way out there,” Lace pointed to the great amount of water their camp overlooked. Ahh. Lovely.

“My Mark has done weirder things, maybe I’ll suddenly be able to breathe underwater?” Ellie tried.

“Miraculous as you are Eleanor,” Dorian complimented, “I do not recommend attempting such a feat.”

“Crestwood was the site of a flood, ten years ago during the Blight. After it appeared, corpses started walking out of the lake. Maybe someone from Crestwood who knows the area better could give you an idea on how to get to the Rift? Maker knows they’ll want help.”

“We will,” Ellie promised, “I’ll head that way now, touch base with the locals and see what we can do, ummm,” she turned to her party, “everyone feeling up to paying the town a visit?” the general consensus was yes, so, ‘Cool! Hey Ser’ you’re still technically the Birthday girl since you’ve got a Birthday visit from your girlfriend—everyone else is going, you can stay and have a nice visit and stuff before they have to leave, yeah?”

“As long as it’s cool with you Inky—you come get me before you go fighting any Rifts though, okay?” the older girl intoned seriously.

“You got it!”

“Thanks, I appreciate it.”

“Of course! Have fun and stay safe, okay? Use the war horn if you need us back here,” Ellie cautioned, popping up on her toes to plant a kiss to Sera’s cheek, “Mwah! Love you lots! It was great seeing you Dagna and Lacey!”
“It was great seeing you too!” Dagna enthused, pulling Ellie in for a hug. “You stay safe out there alright, cutie?”

“You guys too,” Ellie replied, clasping hands with Lace before returning to the adults. “Hiya! So everyone’s up for hitting the town? How are we doing on potion—everyone’s all stocked up?”

“I believe we’re all well, Eleanor,” Madam de Fer assured, reaching out and pulling the girl’s hood more securely overhead, “Are you warm enough, my dear?”

“Uh-huh, are you?” Ellie checked.

“Certainly,” the Grand Enchanter grinned, adjusting her own hood in a way that gave the girl a peek at what was underneath, she’d an ivory cloak she wore in such weather, but her head would not be bare without it, Marehis smiled when she realized her friend had indeed kept the white knitted hat Ellie had fashioned for her some months prior, was wearing it even now despite the fact it likely wasn’t silk.

Ellie led them on foot, down the hill and across the lake shore along the path to Crestwood.

Only to be halted by Wardens fighting undead. Of course. Well then, the enemy of my enemy?

Was apparently truly not my enemy—Marehis had been prepared to fight off the Warden’s assault once the undead were down, but that made no move against Ellie, except to thank their party ask her if she’d seen their fellow Warden, Stroud, who was wanted for questioning. To which she could, in full honesty, reply,

“I have not seen this Warden Stroud. But I’ll certainly try my best to find him.”

“They are scared,” Cole announced, subdued. “They think they are going to die.”

Ellie stopped and turned to look at the Spirit, “…like, right now? It doesn’t look like anything’s coming at them, are they scared the undead are going to overpower them? We…I mean the Warden’s have been up to something shady but those two didn’t attack us, should we walk them out of Crestwood?”

“They are not afraid they will die here. It’s…a call, it’s very strange—they both sound the same, or they have the same sound inside them, I don’t like it,” the Spirit said, fidgeting nervously with one of the clasps on his jacket.

“Like they’re thinking of the same thing—replaying a bad memory they share in unison,” Cole shook his head ‘no’, “or like a sound or something?” he nodded, “Both of them at the same time? That’s…really weird,” Ellie rested a hand on his raised forearm, “I’m sorry Cole.”

“Hey buddy, don’t sweat those assholes,” Bull sought to comfort the young man, laying his hand on the back of his neck, his grip big enough to give his shoulder a reassuring squeeze.

“Da’len?” Marehis questioned when Ellie closed her eyes for a moment—there was not much light to be had just now, this place was doom and gloom in exactness, she likely wasn’t shielding them from piercing light aggravating a headache. Was she tired, or feeling lightheaded? Her hand on Cole’s arm was rather firmly attached, perhaps for support-

Cole lets out a happy sounding hum, ”Ellie is thinking happy thoughts for me,” and then,
“The Marchands home is so very warm, covers of Cassandra’s bed soft, safe with she and Marehis on either side—it is because we love you, the Seeker says, no one has ever loved her before, or at least they’ve never put words to it, she’s so happy because she loves them too!” Cassandra let out a bit of a strangled sound, blushing at hearing she was perhaps truly the first person to express love of Eleanor. Cole let out a contented sigh. “Thank you. I can’t feel the Wardens anymore.”

“Brains might be messed up, but I didn’t hear them mention any new leadership, maybe Corypheus hasn’t gotten in real deep with the Wardens?” the Iron Bull offered the possibility as they drew nearer to Crestwood’s village, a ‘half-glass full’ view of Warden Corruption—perhaps they weren’t entirely corrupted yet?

“I’ll try to keep my toes crossed,” Ellie supposed.

… “Toes, Ellie-girl?” Thom questioned.

“Well yeah—I’m always down for optimism but my fingers are pretty busy what with all the undead.”

“Eleanor, honestly,” Cassandra huffed, amused.

There was nothing amusing about the number of undead they came upon assaulting Crestwood’s guard. Maker—she...she was tentatively Andrasten, working on conversion, step one: swearing to the Maker arbitrarily at any inconvenience—so, Maker, this was a miserable place. They needed so much and she could already see her da’vehnan working their circumstance over in her mind, thinking of what all they could do to help.

And it took all of two minutes for her to earnestly agree to trekking out even further into the mess and danger of the rain and wildlife to find some woman named Judith and check in on her for her friend. “We’ll make sure she’s safe. You stay safe too, okay? Is there anything else we can do?”

“You got a solution to the undead, we’d certainly appreciate it,” the man offered half-jesting.

“We’re trying to get to the Rift in the lake,” Ellie nodded, “is there any way to get out there?”

“You’re not serious?” and then she waved to him with her Marked hand, “O-oh. I-Inquisitor. Honor to meet you, miss. Mayor knows the area better than anyone—he just lives up the way.”

“We’ll touch base with him then, thanks so much.”

The man nodded. “Maker watch over you.”

The Mayor…was a very nervous man. The moment they arrived his heart was thumping out of his chest, only increasing as he described just how to get the dam up and running again—it had fallen into disrepair, but if they could get it up and running again, they could drain the lake and simply walk into what used to be old Crestwood. Unfortunately, the area had been claimed by bandits of the worst sort, he cautioned, otherwise he assured them he would have seen to it the dam was repaired and running again already.

He was lying. Marehis wasn’t sure about what, exactly, perhaps all of it? Or why, but the Iron Bull made the man very uncomfortable with his cool stare, like he was examining the Mayor’s soul and found it wholly wanting. Good. He deserved to be made uncomfortable, lying to “We should be careful, boss-girl, something’s not right with that guy,” Bull cautioned as they made their way from the town.

“It has to be very stressful being mayor—he’s in charge of everyone, you know? He has to take care of them and there’s so much going wrong right now, I’d be nervous too,” Ellie found sympathy for him. He certainly better deserve it—Marehis would murder the next person to harm this girl’s trust. She already killed one man on this trip for one of her daughters, she’d gladly do so for the other. In point of fact, that was the new policy—people that came into their lives and hurt her girls were to be executed on the spot, by order of the unofficial rank over Inquisitor in this Inquisition—the Inquisitor’s mami.

“Cole, can you check on Sera please? Subtly—I don’t want to interrupt them if they aren’t finished yet, but I did promise Sera I’d go back for her before Rifting it up. It’s no rush we might have to swing back this way anyway depending on the lay of the land once the waters down.”

“You wanna take on bandits and go Rift fighting in one night babe?” the Iron Bull checked.

“I’m not leaving these people to deal with this another night, and I think everyone would sleep just a bit better if we could do so without fear of our brains getting gnawed on.”

“I will check on Sera,” Cole promised as he vanished from sight.

“Just let Sarge keep watch, guy doesn’t have enough brains to worry about,” Varric offered up.

“Oi! Thom’s the smartest, he- he- I don’t know he’s very good at picking out horses! And doing hair!”

Thom snorted, “Thanks Ellie-girl.”

“Whose the smartest in your party, Tumbles? Aside from you,” Varric questioned.

“The Iron Bull, hands down, all day, every day.”

“Hell yeah, Imekari, whoa,” Bull said as Cole reappeared…his face very very red, eyes wide. “Buddy, everything okay?”

“Sera…” Cole said slowly, “is busy. Very very busy.”

Ellie let out a screaming squeal as she slapped her hands over her mouth, red faced but excited, “Oh my gosh, really?!”

“Her talk with Lacey went very well.”

Talk? Marehis wasn’t certain what the boy meant but Ellie certainly did, she bounced in place cheering, “Yay! I knew it would, oh gosh that’s so great! Okay we’ll leave them to their Birthday sex—did it seem safe?”

“They were not using condoms, but I do not know what they would put them on,” Cole said, “Oh—should Lace be wearing one over her tongue if she’s going to keep licking Sera’s—”

Ellie slapped her hands over her ears screaming, “I meant from zombies oh my god!”
“Damn,” Varric said, “Buttercup knows how to do birthdays.”

“Oh!” Cole chirped, understanding then, “Yes, Inquisition soldiers are giving the camp space and protection on Scout Harding’s orders.”

“Cool!” Ellie said, “Let’s leave them to their fun and go kick some bandit butt!”

Though it wasn’t bandits they found, at first. They had to pass through what seemed like a closed down tavern, wholly abandoned save for…well, Sera was clearly not the only youth out and about in Crestwood seeking, er, privacy. The young couple startled as the Inquisitor and her party entered the space, apologizing profusely for occupying the space, and immediately vocalizing plans to move their get-together to a cave-

Ellie giggled, “Mmm trust me, Spiders and sex aren’t a good mix—it’s just dangerous out here is all, we’re passing through to go take care of the bandits up ahead so…do your thing, and then be about your business, alright? You two have um…everything you need? ’cause your parents will definitely find out you’ve been having sex if you wind up pregnant. And no, the pull out method doesn’t count—I’ve helped deliver so many pull-out babies.”

Ahh. Well then, apparently that bit of information was all they needed to send them returning to the safety of their respective homes where they could avoid such circumstance.

“Ava allowed you to assist in deliveries?” Madam de Fer wondered sounding almost aghast, it was an albeit…graphic area of medicinal care, but most Healer’s work was graphic.

“Uh-huh—I had two major life skills before joining the Inquisition—putting babies into people, and getting them back out.”

… “Putting babies in…?” the Enchanter stared at the girl like she was out of her mind… which in truth Marehis was a bit concerned with the phrasing, Ellie didn’t exactly come equipped with the means to impregnate anyone.

“Lots of people struggle with pregnancy and fertility issues—sometimes it’s just as simple as they just needed to try at a different time or a change of diet, or maybe they need another partner to step in—like a surrogate or a sperm donor…or just another partner, steam things up a bit. Sometimes people get so worried that they’re not going to get pregnant they basically shoot their chances at getting pregnant, it helps to stay in the moment and have fun with the process.” And then, “Soooo if anyone ever needs help—making, baking, birthing, I’m a professional!”

Well. Cassandra looked like she might be a permanent shade of red. It would be sweet, Marehis thought—there was a bit of a pang in her heart when for the barest of moments the thought of having Ellie’s help, at least be a hand to hold when she and Solas brought life into the world but that was certainly never going to happen, the thought was merely habit. But if Ellie could be of assistance in labor when Cassandra and Cullen pursued biological parenthood, that was just as sweet. Of course the prospect itself still embarrassed the Seeker beyond words.

Though her embarrassment seemed forgotten in the face of pressing danger. The bandit fortress was…a fortress. Large. Full of men armed and armored to defend their claim to it.

The doors were stout and sturdy, closed shut and barricaded against outsiders, though Ellie did try her hand at it, the girl charging at the doors and pushing on them with all her might—it was a valid effort she…she certainly did try, grunting with the effort before she let out a frustrated sigh and politely rapped her knuckles against the door.
“Hello! I know no one ever expects the Ferelden Inquisition, would you mind opening up please at your earliest convenience?”

Oh, her da’vehnan. The Iron Bull lent his strength to the matter, and his axe, breaking the doors down to gain them entry.

This place, Maker, they truly had been holding it hostage for quite some time. It was extremely well established for just another bandit post, their numbers were great, it seemed like they’d had charge of the place, indeed, the full ten years since Crestwood’s flood.

…due to mechanical failure of the dam?

“Huh…I guess maybe they…fixed it up?” Ellie wondered.

Marehis wasn’t about to say anything, at least nothing of the sinking suspicion that they were verging closer to the Mayor of Crestwood’s lies. It seemed none of the adults were inclined to. But the room the dam controls were in? It…it had not been entered in quite some time. Quite possibly since the flood, the air was so stale and- “Da’vehnan, stay here please, let us handle it,” Marehis instructed firmly, relieved that the girl nodded, she’d already pulled her scarf up to cover her mouth and nose, good. The room was full of dust, even she felt a little suffocated,

“I got it,” the Iron Bull said, “Mare’s right, you stay back Imekari.”

“I’m with you,” Thom volunteered in kind, assisting the Iron Bull in turning the large crank. Ellie squeaked, hand reaching out to grasp Marehis’s arm when the building rumbled and shook, the clank of gates in the wall being thrown open sounded and then, the roar of rushing water drawing from the lake.

“It’s working, da’len,” Marehis assured in case the girl’s ears weren’t sensitive enough to hear the water,

Ellie blew out a sigh of relief. “Kay, how’s everyone feeling? I understand if anyone is exhausted or done in, we can move forward in the morning, but if we can, I’d really like to get a handle on this whole ‘undead walking out of the lake’ thing.”

“Hey kid, if you can still hang, we’re right there with you,” Varric said.

“I’m still hanging, I mean the lake should be gone, so, it’s just walking down there and zip zap gone, right?”

…unfortunately, it was not that simple.

The lake was indeed fully drained by the time they made their way back to their infiltration camp…though they needn’t go all the way there to pick up Sera, she was on the shore, or what used to be the shore, in her armor, hair soaked, soap on her face, “Oi! What the frig?! Girl can’t take a scrub without the ruddy lake disappearing!”

Ellie giggled, pouting sympathetically as she swiped her thumb along the bit of suds on Sera’s cheek, “Awe sissy, I’m sorry! If I knew you were getting your scrub on I’d have waited until you were rinsed off…but I mean it’s zombie water so…”

“Oh, pish, didn’t think about that, yuck! I need a bath from my freaking bath!”

“We’ll clean up real good once this is all over, promise. Did you have fun with Lace and Dagna? Are they still here?"

“...They already started headin' for Skyhold—they told me to say ‘bye’ and love you n’ stuff. You guys were gone forever, what’s up—you drained the lake?”

“Uh-huh! And conquered a fortress for the Inquisition! Used to belong to bandits,” she rolled her eyes, drawling, “but like all of Human history—they’re dead now so it’s ours.”

“...tea,” Dorian said, like he had to admit it.

“Damn Imekari that was a self-burn and I respect it,” Bull said.

“Thanks!”

“Oh shite,” Sera breathed, looking the girl up and down, before spreading her assessing gaze over the rest of them, “I- you were supposed to come get me!”

“We are getting you—now, before going to the Rift, remember?”

“I just said ‘Rift’ cause that’s what I thought we was fighting! I didn’t know there was a ruddy bandit fortress! I meant fightin’ in general! You’re okay right?”

Ellie nodded. “Yeah, mostly just bruised egos,” mischievous grin on her face as she so blatantly lied, “the Iron Bull really struggled with getting the Fortress door open, I had to knock it down all by myself, it was a whole thing.”

The Qunari snorted, “Yup, Imekari showed those doors who was boss.”

Sera giggled, “Alright Inky—you’re okay? Kay—let’s go kick some Rift butt!”

There was a great deal of butt to kick, however, none of it was Rift butt.

Solas...she was not paying attention to him outside of the fact that she did not trust him implicitly and therefore kept aware of his movements in case he took it into his head to flee his service to the Inquisition, so she noticed when he stiffened, grew so very tense as they made their way through old Crestwood...admittedly this place made her feel wary, the hairs on the back of her neck stood on end. And that was before a spirit out-in-out passed by before her very eyes. And a second, shouting to them in hauty tones and demanding they take some sort of vengeance for her or some such nonsense.

“...umm, well, if we run into them, I promise we’ll take care of it,” Ellie offered, and then very quietly, “mami, do you think she can follow us?”

“I’m not certain,” Marehis had to say, this spirit had been loud, but not very mobile like her counterparts. She seemed affixed to the spot she floated in.

Ellie nodded, “Well, we’re walking away now.”

“You do as I’ve ordered!” the Spirit called after them.

“We’ll see!” Ellie called back, over her shoulder.

They did see another of Solas’s artifacts, Ellie took the liberty of lighting it...though perhaps Sera did while Ellie made a show of it to cover for her sister’s dabbling with magic, but that was about as close to the Fade as they got here—the Rift wasn’t to be seen, at least not from up here, but it was near, Ellie attested.
So they searched, there...there had to be a way to get to it, didn’t there?

Solas halted as they neared the last cabin near the cliffside their camp stood atop, the Spirits seemed even more restless here, following the path around the base of the cliff, so they followed suit but Ellie was already moving to investigate the cabin as they had the rest of the destruction of old Crestwood.

“Eleanor, stop!”

Marehis startled a bit at Solas’s demand, and Ellie stopped in her tracks at the bottom of the stairs that led up to the cabin, turning to look at the Apostate Elf, “…um…what’s up?”

“It- the Spirits- it isn’t safe,” he tried.

“It literally looks like the least scathed building in the whole place.”

“I mean it isn’t- Ellie I do promise I am trying to protect you, let’s just follow the path, deal with the Rift.”

She stared at him a moment and then walked up the stairs despite his advice, but it seemed she’d already come to some conclusions. She did not enter the cabin though, she only rose up the stairs enough to see the faded sign over the doorway, hanging open enough to see a great deal of the inside of the cabin…

“This was the mayor’s home,” she announced hollowly. “And um…” her voice waivered, “well, it…it seems his cabin is pretty empty. For a place that got abandoned in such a rush.”

Oh. Oh no.

“I’m not…I’m not totally naive. When we found the dam controls intact I thought the bandits had done it—assumed control of the dam, flooded Crestwood to get rid of the locals all those years ago,” Ellie turned to face her party gathered at the bottom of the steps, looking to Solas, “The undead. They aren’t trying to attack the town. They’re trying to get to the Mayor, huh?”

“That is the general consensus I’m perceiving,” Solas seemed regretful to inform her.

“You were hoping I wouldn’t find out?”

“Yes.”

“You just wanted to let him get away with it?”

“Of course not- da’vehnan I would spare you anything vile and painful in this world that I could, there is so much ugliness you’ve come to know. I’d planned to speak with the others later, privately, and handle it amongst ourselves without your having to know.”

Ellie’s chin had already begun to quiver. And then she was dashing down the stairs and-

And she went straight into Solas’s arms, shaking and crying, the man startled for all of a second before returning her hold, and resting a hand atop her head, the other rubbing circles on her back, “H-h-he- there are children’s bodies in- and their families and- he just- why?! Why would he do such a thing?!”

“I don’t know, oh ma da’vehnan, I do not know. I am so sorry, sweet girl shhh,” Solas sought to soothe, “I’m sorry.”

“...yeah, you guys really need me for the Rift?” Bull asked quietly, “I just gotta go execute someone on behalf of the Inquisitor. Just real quick.”

He just might, this...Marehis had not thought there was anything that would send Ellie calling for an execution in her judgements but this...if this didn’t do just that, she wasn’t certain what could. The man certainly better have some way of explaining for himself.

“If we close the Rift, Ellie, it will help the Spirits here rest,” Cole spoke up. “And when we bring Crestwood’s Mayor to justice, they will know.”

The girl took in a shuddering breath, nodding against Solas’s chest. This...oh it was conflicting. But Marehis supposed sometimes you simply needed a proper hug from your papi, and Cullen was several miles away. Ellie sniffled as she pulled away and Solas kindly offered up one of his handkerchiefs, wiping at her eyes for her and saying, “Let us help them, shall we, Inquisitor?”

She nodded, agreeing, though she blushed as she wiped at her face with her hands, seemingly embarrassed to have lost her composure, to have sought comfort from the man in front of the others. “Thanks.”

“Of course,” Solas assured softly, taking a few steps back to allow her more space.

“I’m gonna put so much arrows in that Mayor sack of shite,” Sera muttered under her breath, going to join the younger girl and taking her hand, “C’mon, Inky. We’re followin’ the um, floaty ones, right?”

It was certainly macabre, Marehis had the distinct impression she was setting foot into some sort of horrific campfire story, following the spirits of the dead, down into a dark cavern, her girls were huddled close together, Sera held Ellie’s Marked hand so very tightly, putting the younger girl behind her a step as they led their group. Though not for long—the girls stuck together of course, but Cassandra drew her sword and took point ahead of them.

“Stay behind me, and stick together,” the Seeker said as she took the lead, heading down the darkened path, Dorian came up close behind them to light their way as they walked—long dimmed torches hung in sconces that lined their path, and the Altus called them to flame. It was greatly appreciated, the path was uneven and often steep, especially when they reached the series of ramps that led them further and further down into the dark—Sera’s grip on the younger girl only tightened, her breath hitching when she made the mistake of looking down and seeing the treacherous drop into the chamber below*

“Inky, you stay real close, watch your step, kay?” Sera gulped, pulling the girl closer so Ellie was secure with Sera’s body between her, and unguarded edge of the ramping.

“You too—this is so not built to code!” Ellie complained as if she was a great authority on the matter.

“I’m sure there’s a suggestion box here somewhere we can file a proper complaint,” Dorian drawled.

It was Marehis who needed to be more mindful of just where she was going—she’d been paying such close attention to the girls, making certain they were safe ahead of her, she did not see the place where the uneven boards underfoot had too much space between them, a space the toe of her boot slid into instead of finding solid footing, and she let out a startled sound when her hands met only open air-

And then an arm snaked around her waist, a hand gripping her arm to pull her back to safety, feet on the ground, her body secure against another’s.

She pushed away from him, as much as she dared given there was a drop behind her.

“Are you Injured?” Solas asked quietly, his hand still on her arm, as if he were worried she might still step back far enough to be sent plummeting.

She slapped at his hand, “Do not touch me.”

“I apologize.”

“Well- just- keep your hands to yourself. If I fall to my death so be it,” she snapped, rejoining the group. She should be closer to the girls anyway, the other adults had been crowding them though, but she supposed they worried for them as she did. Still! She was their mother! There should be space reserved so she did not have to be so close to the likes of- of Fen Harel!

She was not grateful to him! And he did not smell pleasant In the slightest!

Ugh, the undead truly did not smell pleasant—there were several of the creatures roaming around the different levels they traversed, Cassandra, Thom and the Iron Bull backing her, made short work of them though. And then the scent of sulfur was almost overwhelming when they finally did reach what seemed to be the bottom of the cavern—they’d stepped into a very high layer of the Deep Roads, into Dwarven construction, Sera shrieked, pushing Ellie behind her when a…oh Maker, a demon of Rage almost the height of the Iron Bull rose up out of the ground.

The Qunari seemed to take great offense to the creature’s size, charging the thing before Barrier even swept across their numbers from their host of Mages, but once Madam de Fer cast fearsome ice to freeze the thing solid, his efforts in hacking against the beast sent it crumbling.

“I think…that was what that Spirit lady was so mad about before, so…cool,” Ellie supposed, her giggles trailed after by a snort, as she addressed Vivienne with a smile, “literally,” she said, holding up her hand for a high five the Enchanter bemusedly indulged in.

“Quite,” Vivienne supposed, “I’m pleased it amused you, darling. You’re uninjured? Excellent.”

“We’re really close to the Rift now,” Ellie spoke with certainty, “is everyone alright? All good on potions and things? ‘cause um…it’s really big.”

That…seemed almost understatement, given the great number of shades, Demons of Despair and the entire Revenant the Rift produced.

It was large, a head taller than their Qunari, and Marehis was certain she could beat the thing to death with her bare hands, her outrage was so raw when Ellie had been occupied attempting to manipulate the Rift with her Mark, in an effort to stun their enemies only to be interrupted by a great, ghoulish hand bigger than her body that the Revenant produced with some foul sort of magic to grasp the girl within and whip her through the air from one side of the chamber to slam her against the ground at its feet,

“Ellie!”
A loud, horrified, anger fueled scream tore from Sera’s throat-

And in the next instant, Marehis’s heart thumped panic in her chest as Sera rushed the great thing as it slammed its fists against Ellie’s back, there was a warning building up in Marehis’s throat to tell her child to stay back but then icy magic broke from Sera’s hands, blasting against the Revenant and freezing it solid where it stood, rearing back to strike again.

“Someone bloody break this bastard in half already!” Sera barked the order as she slid on her knees to be at Ellie’s side, “Inky? Shite, shite, shite. Sweets, are you with me?”

“Mm-hmm,” Ellie winced out, rolling gingerly onto her side and Sera supported her, pulling her back against her chest and moving backwards on her knees to scoot them out of the way as the entirety of their Warriors rained down blows on the Revenant, Marehis found herself torn between wishing to beat against the thing herself to defend her girls, and the need to protect them and make certain they were alright—Cassandra was assaulting the monster with enough fervor for both of them, so, she went to their girls, kneeling before them.

“Da’vehnan, oh sweet girl, here,” Marehis’s hands shook as they pulled healing potion from her stores and unstoppered it, guiding the bottle to Ellie’s lips, “drink, carefully,” the girl choked on the potion, coughing up more than she managed to swallow, face scrunching in pain, “Oh honey I know,” Marehis sympathized, oh she hated this, “Solas!”

“I am here,” the man said, dropping down on one knee, “Inquisitor, Ellie—let me help you,” he pled, taking her hand in his and then closing his eyes, dipping deeper into their bond and for a moment it looked like he himself might be in pain as Marehis endeavored to administer potion again, this time Ellie was capable of swallowing, breathing out a sigh of relief as she drained the last drop,

“I want a second in her system, Solas, can you do that?” Marehis asked quietly and the man opened his eyes and nodded, accepting potion from her which he began administering as Marehis turned her attention to, “Sera, da’vehnan, my sweetheart let me look at your poor little hands,” she worried, oh goodness, the injury to them the last time wild magic poured from them had sounded so severe. She took Sera’s hands in hers and peeled back her gloves, Maker, she was surprised the things hadn’t been destroyed in the wake of her magic- oh ouch, she- she’d been meaning to, to take a peek underneath and see how badly her child’s hands were injured but the things were so cold they burned Marehis’s fingers,

“‘m fine Mare, it uh, didn’t hurt me none, see?” Sera asked, holding up her right hand so Marehis could see the flesh of her palm in the space Krem had left ‘palmless’ in the glove on the hand that usually held Ellie’s Marked one. Oh there- there was a rune in the very center of each of her palms, she’d been so focused on getting the other glove off she hadn’t noticed it- had...had the Lieutenant sent her something meant to allow magic pass through? Sera examined the runes herself, eyes widening a bit and then she blushed, tips of her ears reddening. “Inky. You’re boyfriend kind of a genius. A dumb sweet genius—I’ma kiss him, is that cool?”

“Kay, I’m cool as long as he is, but fair warning, it’s a capital E Experience, might end up liking boys too,” Ellie warned. “Big guy down? What about the others?” she asked, looking about to verify their host of enemies were defeated.

“They are all down, Eleanor,” Cassandra assured as she sheathed her sword, “Can you stand?”

Ellie nodded, accepting Cassandra’s hand up, rising to her feet with a quiet groan, leaning against the Nevarran woman momentarily before raising a hand to the Rift and casting against it, “Looks like it Imekari,” Bull assured her as everyone seemed to be checking in on one another, helping with bandaging or health potion. Madam de Fer even checked on Cole, asking if the Spirit was injured, the boy assuring her he was fine and he could help her with the gash on her forearm. The Qunari crouched before her with his back to the girl, “c’mon boss-girl, I got you.”

He did. Ellie leaned against his back, wrapping her arms around the Qunari’s neck, her legs around his waist and he brought his hands up under her thighs to support her as he rose to his feet, “Just rest yourself, to camp?” he asked.

Ellie let out a little whine and sighed, “No—gotta go yell at a murderous Mayor. Gonna yell at him so much. And punch him. And burn his cabin to the ground.”

“You’re the boss.”

“Arson! Arson! Arson!” Sera cheered as they made their way from the chamber, the adults all looking to one another as they tried to surmise an exit strategy.

They found the path through continued toward an exit opposite their entrance—fresh air wafting in from somewhere ahead, through a tunnel where they crossed paths with a family of nugs. Cassandra just beat Marehis by the barest of margins to the inspiration to tell Ellie of Leliana’s pet nug*. The girl was half-conscious where she rested against the Iron Bull, let out a tired huff of a giggle,

“She has a little portrait of him, she showed me at lunch one day…” Ellie spoke softly, was steadily falling asleep.

“She is exhausted,” Solas said, sparing her the need to address him herself, “Elf root helped a great deal with internal injury, if we can get more water in her system we should administer more health potion when we make camp tonight.”

“If we can,” Cassandra said, “I believe it would be prudent to make camp in the fortress we took back tonight—it is something we should claim for the Inquisition to keep others from reclaiming it and making Crestwood unsafe again, they’ve not the forces to run it themselves.”

“Good thinking,” Thom agreed.

Ellie’s slumber did not last very long, her heart thumped harshly in her chest and she startled awake, clenching her Marked hand as they came upon what looked like the inside of a cave, with a long cavern that fresh air was being drawn in from the outside through, their exit, “Rift. Close. Not too bad, but—and I mean this in the least suicidal way—kill me.”

“Sorry boss-girl, can’t do it, it’s like the one order I can’t follow,” the Iron Bull informed her.

“Traitor!” she declared him.

“S’why they kicked me out of the Qun babe, I’m an insubordinate bastard.”

“If you refuse to kill me you’ll be punished! Where’s Lady Josie? I’m sitting in judgement over you right now, your butt is my throne!”

“Hell yeah it is, my butts an amazing throne, just ask Dorian,” the Qunari wagged his eyebrows to the Tevinter Mage who turned an impressive shade of red, muttering a Tevene curse under his breath. “What’s my sentence Inquisitor?”

“I demand you carry me the entire rest of the day! Unless you’re injured later or tired and then I’ll carry you! Either way, there’s carrying involved and we’re together because I love you!”

“So it is said, so it shall be!”

“You know if my throne in Skyhold could talk, Lady Josie could save her voice. Though my favorite thing she’s ever said in life was announcing that guy attacked Skyhold’s walls, with a...goat*,” she mimicked her Ambassador’s speech. Solas looked flummoxed at the idea someone had conducted an assault on Skyhold using livestock, he had missed a great deal in his imprisonment she supposed.

As he deserved to. Horrible man. Awful. Despised! She despised him.

And no, the way he stepped between Sera and the Rift that immediately greeted them upon their exit from the cave did nothing to change that. He no longer had the right to earn love for loving her children.

The Iron Bull hung back for the duration of the fight, which was almost like a break, some menial exercise compared to the one they just fought, though he closed his good eye when Ellie held up her hand to seal the Rift, shield it from the Fadelight.

“To the Mayor’s!”

Indeed. The abandoned Mayor’s home. And not the one still standing in Old Crestwood.

Ellie hopped down off of the Iron Bull to look around the cabin, going to the Mayor’s desk where the man had left a letter, apparently of confession, both to flooding his own town with his people trapped in their homes, all those who were sick or suspected to fall ill of the Blight soon enough. An effort to forcibly quarantine them in a permanent way. As well as to a confession of fleeing, just now, to avoid the Inquisition taking him in once they discovered his crimes themselves.

The girl let out a strangled scream of outrage as she slapped the letter back down onto the desk and walked away, pacing the length of the cabin a few times before, “We have to go after him-”

“Inquisitor you are angry now but you are also injured, and exhausted—we all are,” Solas offered up in reasoning.

“Fine!” she snapped, “I’ll go after him myself!”

Bull sighs, “Imekari-”

“Don’t ‘Imekari’ me! Move!” Ellie demanded when the Qunari stood between herself and the door.

“Eleanor-” Cassandra started.

“He killed people Cassandra! His people! Intentionally. He did something he knew would kill them and he- he just- he doesn’t think he deserves to live with the consequences of that! Solas accidentally destroyed the world—accidentally! He was only trying to lock away a bunch of power hungry crazies! And he didn’t run—not once! This asshole knew exactly what he was doing and he’s actively trying to get away with it and he can’t—I won’t let him, I’ll kill him myself!” she looked up at the Iron Bull, “Now! Move!” she stares him down with so much determination that ultimately just crumbles with her expression and she rests her forehead against the Qunari’s stomach, shoulders shuddering as he rests a hand atop her head. “He can’t get away with this,” she whimpers out, miserably.

“Don’t worry Imekari. We’ll get him.”

“I can get him Ellie, I can bring him in for you,” Cole volunteers, “he thinks he can escape but they follow him—the Spirits, their hurt, they haunt him, I can follow them following him. I can bring him to Skyhold.”

“…really?” she asks, and the Spirit nods eagerly, “kay, thanks Cole—be safe, alright? Don’t let him hurt you. You’re okay to go by yourself?”

“Yes, I will be safe.”

“We’ll send his confession on to Skyhold then, Leliana will have a cell waiting for him. Thank you.”

“You are welcome!” the boy offered in return, and then he looks determined as he vanishes from sight.

The Qunari crouches and with an arm under Ellie’s knees, he swoops her up to hold her against his chest, her head resting on his shoulder as he carried her.

“Is Inky okay?” Sera worried quietly to Solas as they took their leave of the village, heading for the fortress.

“She’ll require treatment when we stop for the night, but she isn’t in mortal peril. She’s exhausted and angry, upset,” Solas accounted, though he cleared his throat, assuring, “I’m certain you’ll cheer her up—you are a good friend. A good sister,” he encouraged. Then, “You are well?”

“Yeah,” Sera said, nodding.

“…was that…you, who cast against the Revenant?” Madam de Fer questioned carefully.

Sera was quiet for a moment mouth opening when Dorian let out a haughty laugh.

“Oh my dear, you must truly be exhausted my darling Madam de Fer,” the Altus interrupted, “’t was I who cast against the Revenant, obviously—however could you not recognize my flawless technique?”

“Yeah,” Sera giggled, “I mean pfft, seriously, me?”

Madam de Fer shook her head, “Perhaps I need medical assistance as well, Maker, I could have sworn…well, I’ll certainly be getting a good nights sleep tonight, you are none of you to disturb me whatsoever,” the Enchanter intoned.

“Wouldn’t dream of it, Viv,” Sera promised, giving Dorian a grateful look and he nodded. Sera linked arms with her Tevinter friend, squeezing his arm as they walked.

Ellie was very much out when they returned to the fortress. Marehis was grateful that the Iron Bull had carried her all that way, but even more grateful when he passed the girl off to her, let her take Ellie into her arms, supporting her weight on her hips, the girl’s head resting against her shoulder as Marehis wrapped one arm up under her bottom and the other rubbing circles on her back as she walked through the fortress they’d seized, Sera trailing after her as they looked for a suitable place to rest. There was a proper bed in the place it seemed had once belonged to the bandit leader. The sheets were…suspect. So, Cassandra stripped the bed and she and Sera unrolled their collection of bedrolls, between the four of them, there was suitable safe space to lay on, and Marehis let Ellie down carefully. The Human girl roused long enough to strip off the more constricting parts of her armor, essentially she sat in bed in her underthings and downed a full canteen of water, health potion, and then she flopped back and was fast asleep again.

“Poor Inky. Today was a mess,” Sera breathed, taking Ellie’s Marked hand in her own as she sat beside the girl.

Cassandra nodded in agreement. “Sera…did you cast against the Revenant? That was a remarkable amount of control.”

Sera looked about, listening for a moment to ensure they were alone before nodding, “Yeah…thanks.”

“It was a compliment, but I meant it was a remarkable amount of control given your current tentative magical state.”

“Ummmmmmm…” the girl hummed seeming guilty as she worried her lip. Then, “I kind of…’went all the way’ with my magic last night. Inky knows, Cole too, they were with me.”

Cassandra’s mouth worked for a moment before she found, “In the Fade? I…didn’t realize you were leaning so heavily towards making this permanent. I’m not displeased of course, as long as you’re content with the decision?”

“I really am,” Sera said. “I mean I’m nervous as hell for people to find out but…it just…feels right. I…I love my magic. Weird, after being scared of it for so long, but…after everything yesterday, when I lost my connection to magic again I just couldn’t imagine going through that again, wanted with everything to just get it back as quick as possible—that’s why Inky was all ‘I need Solas’s help meditating’ n’ pish, ‘cause he knows how to just pop magic right back awake.”

“So you took Lyrium?” Marehis summized, “Are you feeling any ill effects?”

“Nope! I don’t have a hankering for it or nothin’ though um…Inky thinks that now that I’m all ‘mage-ified’ I’m out of the woods of bein’ able to get addicted to Lyrium. Now it’ll just…do what it’s supposed to. I mean I only got a little bit high off it when I tried it last night, it mostly just went into my magic. I’ve gotten waaay more stoned off of—“ she halted that sentence, eyes wide as she retracted, “prayer. To the Maker. For He is so great n’ pish.”

“And pish,” Cassandra said as if seconding the ending to a prayer, bemused, though she smiled when Sera snorted.

“I’m proud of you, da’len,” Marehis assured, taking hold of Sera’s free hand. “You did so well today. Thank you.”

“Just wish I’d been…dunno, faster. I know I should probably just get it out already, with the others but—“

“We are all responsible for protecting one another, Eleanor’s safety is not your sole responsibility, young lady,” Cassandra intoned. “Your magical status is entirely personal, I pressed because it is something you’ve chosen to be open with me about—it is your business entirely who knows and who doesn’t. I am pleased Dorian aided you. He is privy to your recent developments?”
“Nooooot exactly, but he was there when we was in the Oasis, and he’s bangin’ Bull so I’m sure he knows about Solas trying to magic me up before, and um…I might’ve used a little bitty bit of magic in front of him back in Skyhold, tried to be inconspicuous but uh, he’s basically the shiniest, sharpest knife in the drawer. Doesn’t totally shock me he figured it out.”

“When did you use magic in Skyhold?” Cassandra questioned, worrying, “Were you attacked?”

“No! My Widdle got hurt! Slammed her little thumb in a book,” and at Cassandra and Marehis’s incredulous looks she defended, “it was bruising!”

Cassandra fought a smile she lost to, laughing a bit as she pressed a kiss to Sera’s forehead, “Oh my sweet girl. So, your Dagna knows?”

“Lacey too, I talked to her about it today.”

“Ahh, so, she took it well,” Cassandra said. Very well, according to Cole.

“Uh-huh,” Sera nodded, blushing furiously from the tips of her ears…quite possibly to the tips of her toes.

Marehis felt restless as they settled in for the evening. There had been a bit of regrouping for an effort at dinner, but everyone was so tired they essentially compared what food they had ready to eat in their packs and made a communal pile of fruit and bread and whatever snack food they had on hand and shared. Ellie slept through the somewhat-meal and Cassandra and Marehis did try their best to join her, laying alongside her while Sera went to keep watch with Varric and Thom.

She laid awake for hours it felt like before she sighed and rose up, Cassandra followed in kind, offering quietly,

“I cannot sleep either. Would you care for something warm to drink?”

“Mmm, maybe something stronger than tea?” Marehis suggested.

“We’ll see what we can find, I’m certain Varric has something that will suit you,” Cassandra supposed, resting her hand on Ellie’s forehead momentarily, checking the girl over before they left the room in search of something to drink.

Varric did in fact offer up his bourbon, Sera asking Marehis to save her some for when she got off watch duty…she supposed it would be alright, the girl was more than of drinking age and while she did have potion for her anxiety attacks, it was nothing she took regularly. Cassandra couldn’t imbibe but she did brew up some tea, the smell of chamomile was pleasant and Marehis was inclined to share a cup with the Seeker who eyed the bourbon bottle sitting on the table they seated themselves at. Cassandra took a sip of tea before looking from the bottle to Marehis and saying,

“Before you’re in a state of less-than-perfectly-clear thinking…I would like to propose something.”

“Is it something you think I’d be more inclined to say ‘yes’ to, once I’m drinking?” Marehis wondered.

“…yes, but I realize that would be rather unfair of me, and I would not appreciate such a manipulation were roles reversed, so, before even your tea laxes you…” Cassandra cleared her throat. “I have seen signs of a Dragon’s presence, here in Crestwood.”

Oh! “Goodness. Are we safe here?”

“Certainly,” Cassandra assured, “it is further south of here, we are likely not even within the area it considers its territory. Her, territory, if I’m not mistaken.”

“You would know, I suppose. You are a Pentaghast after all,” Marehis offered.

Cassandra nodded. “Yes. I am. And loath as I am to embrace all the Pentaghast name implies…” she cleared her throat once more, and met Marehis’s gaze before she spoke to what was pressing her,

“I would like to take our daughters dragon hunting.”

Chapter End Notes

*I HAVE NEVER MURDERED MY CHILDREN, but I have read pages of in-game dialog, combing through for specific convos I wanted to quote without playing through the whole ass game again waiting to hear. If you let the Chargers die, there's a companion conversation that occurs as you're out and about with Cole and the Iron Bull, where Cole tries to assure Bull that Krem specifically didn't hate him, in the end. He quotes Bull's thoughts, because he thinks Krem must have hated him and been thinking about how he should have expected Bull to betray them like this, and Cole reveals that no. Krem was proud, and his dying thought was "Horns pointing up." so THAT destroyed my actual heart and I had to share the sadness.

*This be a blatant shoutout to Brooklyn Nine-Nine, the line belongs entirely to them, it's an iconic Rosa Diaz line that kills me every time I hear it!

*I swear TO GOD I have walked by the dead body on the Storm Coast that has the key you need to finish getting through the Red Templar's set up and I get to the door so many times, and I'm always like "where the hell is the key?!" deadass can't find it until I google the mission and I'm like "duh, it's literally right in there, it's the first thing you can loot when you come into this mission area, dummy." disrespect the personal space of corpses in video games, kiddos! They might have important keys on them!

*The Circle of Carastes was Dorian's first Circle, after he got kicked out for getting too rough in a duel with another student, he went from Circle to Circle. I mentioned his schooling in a previous chapter, but my resources for this fic just got an update, and they've given his Circle a name! So I threw it in!

'*stumbling steps where the wall used to be' this is a line of dialog that Cole says randomly when you're walking around with Cole and Dorian, and either Inquisitor or the Iron Bull is romancing him. It's a fav so I had to throw it in.

*Widdle is canon the nickname Sera gives Dagna--if you don't romance Sera, she always gets together with Dagna!

*Saar-qamek is Qunari poison that induces madness, and I'm 100% convinced that they induce madness in all deserters, it isn't that living outside of the Qun makes Qunari's insane, it's the Qun being petty and bad at breakups.

don't fight me on this, there are 56 steps on the staircases up to Skyhold Castle if you're coming at it from the prisons, you don't wanna know how I know (I counted, I am that bitch)

'Dalish being in '', Solas doesn't consider himself Dalish because he's Elvehnan, he comes from before there were 'Dalish', and I've tried to be careful in this fic with having Solas not refer to himself as Dalish, in fact his first reference to the Dalish language is calling it 'Elvish' when he asks Ellie if she speaks it, because to him, it is, it's the Elvehnan's language.

*the ramps that lead down in the cave you fight the lake Rift in? I've fallen down the space in the middle, twice. Died the second playthrough it happened in because I wasn't as leveled up, but the first playthrough I fell in? I survived and the MOMENT my character hit the ground the huge-ass Rage demon you fight down there? It comes POPPING up out of the ground, I screamed, it was a time and a half.

*there is a family of nugs down in this chamber you pass on your way out and if you have Cassandra in your party she talks about Leliana's pet nug. If you kill the nugs, you earn disapproval from Sera. And me, because why would you kill that nice nug family, that's just rude.

*we discovered this man attacking. The building. With a...goat' is also one of voice actress Allegra Clark's favorite lines (she says in a fan interview at a Con I've seen floating around), it's one of the actual best 'Sit in Judgement' scenes.
Here Lies the Abyss: Return to Skyhold

Chapter Summary

This is another double-chapter update! We cover the last half of our heroes time in Crestwood. Dragons are slain, the Order is left in ruin, and that's before returning to Skyhold where Josie is having some loyalty mission drama, matchmaking plots are hatched and breakfast is served! Here Lies the Abyss, Promise of Destruction, An Ideal Romance, Happier Times, Of Somewhat Fallen Fortune, all coming at you! Enjoy! Next stop, Val Royeaux!

Disclaimers: all mission dialog pulled from Dragon Age Inquisition 100% belongs to Bioware and the writers and everyone that owns the rights and whatnot to DA:I. Implied sexual situations, but no heavy smut!

WARNING: Everyone is safe, but there is some delving into suicidal thoughts and reaction to that in this chapter, zero attempts are made, but there is discussion about the topic that's respectful and non-graphic/violent but I just wanted to be safe in case anyone just full-stop can't touch on the subject. I tried to set it up so it can be read cohesively while skipping those parts, and they're marked, beginning and end with numbered dashes —

Ex:
Everything's okay
1—1 (heavy stuff about to start)
SKIP
1—1 (heavy stuff over!)
Good to go!

Chapter Notes

I'm back! I'M ALIVE! Hi! Welcome! If you've read this far/still reading along with updates—I love you! <3 <-- that's my entire heart and it's all yours! I'm back with not one, but TWO chapters and I hope it was worth the wait!

IF YOU NEED TO SKIP (cont): I couldn't fit everything in the Chapter Summary. There are 3 places you can skip in the opening scene (until the first line break) and then after that, there's only 1 more in Ellie's Point of View a few scenes later (so 4 total). All scenes are marked with bolded and numbered — in the left hand margin where they begin and end. so 1—1 marks the beginning and end of the first, 2—2 the beginning and end of the second, and then 3—3 and 4—4 of course. I genuinely promise everything's a-okay and there's nothing graphic but if you have zero tolerance for touching on the subject of suicidal thoughts, it's marked off and can be read without it! I think! This bitch ain't beta'd so we're relying solely on the terrible organ I try to pass off as a functioning brain!

ALSO: The literal sweetest reader, RockingAndRolling has started writing their own DA:I fic incorporating a few aspects from To Seek the Truth that they enjoyed! RockingAndRolling has a chapter up so far of a fic titled: No Place Like Home. I'm including the summary here, if ya'll are interested go show them some love!

"Jane Perkins did not live a normal life on Earth. She bounced around from house to house, passed off between relatives like she was a toy to be shared between children.
So she never really knew what 'home' was. But she knew for a fact that home was not this weird place with something called the Breach hanging in the sky. With a mysterious yellow mark with no known connection to the Conclave on her right palm, she'll have to figure out how to get home before she dies- either by slipping on her face or by being torn apart by demons. That is, if she wants to go home."

See the end of the chapter for more notes

It was late when Cassandra finally found slumber, the day had been long to say the least, tiring, droves of zombies, demon hordes, and back to back Rifts in the Fade? The stuff that makes long nights of sleep, by the time she was horizontal, she was equally comatose.

Solas’s, “Seeker?” did not even stir her.

But Eleanor's, “Mami?” Comatose or not, the cry of ‘Fire!’ or scream of a Dragon could not have roused Cassandra with such immediacy. She found herself haphazardly launching herself forward in the bed she’d claimed in their recently acquired fortress, nearly colliding with the girl already climbing into bed with her,

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked softly, “Child what are you doing out of bed? You’re injured-" Maker, the girl was crying Cassandra realized as she pulled her in, holding her close to her chest. She…she was wearing Solas’s vest. She had gone to bed in her underthings, but her sleep clothes had been in her pack, hadn’t they? Just what happened? “Did you have a nightmare sweet girl?”
Eleanor shook her head ‘no’. Oh, Solas was there, looking rather hapless, Maker he was ashen actually, “Did something happen?”

Solas cleared his throat, “Eleanor, you will explain, yes?” the girl nodded, sniffling.
“Marehis is keeping watch of the fortress, I think I should let her know where you are.”

“Th-thanks, I’m sorry.” Ellie whimpered out.

“Do not apologize da’vehnah.” Solas breathed. “Speak with your mother. If you’ve need, just…I am here, whatever comfort that may be. As are all of your friends.”

“Eleanor?” Cassandra asked once the man left them.

“I um…I woke up and n-no one was there and I um-“ the girl hyperventilated momentarily, “I was having all these horrible th-thoughts-“ she shivered, pressing herself further still against the woman as if for warmth, omitting whatever she'd intended to speak of and saying, "we can go back to sleep, I’m sorry I w-woke-“ “Solas said to talk to me, you should, if you've need,” Cassandra gently pressed, rubbing the girl’s back. She would hear her out before they endeavored sleep.

1 — 1

“What thoughts were concerning you sweet girl?”

“I um…I k-kind of,” she sniffled, pressing her face against Cassandra’s shoulder as she said,
“I don’t know! I just woke up and I was alone for the first time in forever, no mamis or Sera or anyone, C-Cole’s hunting down M-Mayor Dedrick, and I just realized…I don’t know my brain just immediately said…I- I could- there’s no one to stop me if I-“ she struggled for her words, and then, very quietly, like the idea had quite literally been put to bed and she did not wish to wake it, "if I put an end to things. That things like my Mark and Rifts and Corypheus, losing people I love, would be over for me. And that didn't seem like such a bad idea, I- I mean I even started thinking of h-how-" she word squeaked out over a sob and she did not seek to finish her sentence.

Sleep was now the furthest thing from her mind. “Alright,” Cassandra said softly, taking a deep breath as she stroked the girl’s hair, holding her more tightly, oh thank everything, thank the Maker she’d gone to someone, “Alright, thank you, Eleanor. Do you want to talk about it?”

“I’m scared mami, I’ve never- I mean I’ve felt so embarrassed, ashamed, or in pain that I've wanted to die, but I’ve never-“ she whimpered. “I’ve never felt like I’d ever act on it. And then tonight, when I realized no one could stop me, I had the thought that if I wanted to, I could. I don’t want to die mami, I don’t know why I would-” a sob tore from her throat, “I’m scared!”

“Oh my sweet girl, love of my heart shhh,” Cassandra held her as tightly as she dared, assuring, “You’re safe, I am here, and I am proud of you for coming to me. This is…well, depression is a terrible thing, but this is one of the worst symptoms…Eleanor sometimes your mind is not entirely your own. Not unlike possession, unfortunately.”

Eleanor sniffled, “Wh-what do you mean?”

“You know with certainty that you, in your heart, truly don’t want to die?” Eleanor nodded, “When you have an asthma attack, it is not you causing yourself to lose breath—it is your disease. When you have thoughts that don’t feel genuine to yourself? It is your mind’s illness. You did not perceive yourself to be alone and capable of committing suicide. Your mind, currently battling sickness, found you alone and its disease took the advantage. If an enemy found themselves capable of breaking into our fortress, slipping past those keeping watch, found you wholly alone, vulnerable, it would be the ultimate time to strike, they would not be your enemy if they didn’t take the opportunity presented to them. Unfortunately you're battling an internal enemy we cannot simply be rid of. And believe me sweet girl, if I could wring depressions neck? Slay your anxieties? I certainly would.”

“Thanks mami,” the girl sighed, “I wish I could scoop my brain out and dunno, put it in Elf Root tonic until it’s all healed up, slap it back in my head.”

Cassandra laughed softly, “That would ideal,” she offered the gentle jest, “perhaps you could try washing your hair with Elf root?”

“I do!” Eleanor chirped, sounding a bit more like herself, smiling slightly, “Vivienne does hair masks with me, Elf Root and Crystal Grace literally heals damaged hair, it makes it so light and bouncy and really helps it grow—she has to trim her hair immediately after,” Eleanor whispered then, as if it was a secret that required the upmost confidence, “she has the cutest little curls!”

There was a soft knock on the door…though part way through the knocking process, the door was essentially kicked open. Marehis and Sera respectively.

“Da’vehnann?”

“Where’s Inky?!” Sera demanded to know, and then, “Ahh! Sweets! C’mere!” she instructed though she was the one rushing to the bed, nearly winding Cassandra as she collided with her and Eleanor before wrapping her arms all the way around the younger girl, rocking as she squeezed her tightly, “I love you, I love you, I love you! Mwah!” she pressed a kiss to her hair. “You’re the best, you’re amazing! Um,” Sera gasped, “I’ll be right back!” she…was gone just as quickly as she arrived, it was jarring to say the least.

Marehis was much gentler in joining them, seating herself on the edge of the bed, brushing Eleanor’s hair back from her face, “Oh ma da'len,” she breathed a sigh as she held her close, “What can I do?”

“Hugging is helping,” Ellie promised, “Um…I left everything in the room I woke up in, I just kind of…Solas told you everything?” the woman nodded. “I started thinking like that and…I dunno, I was scared I was really going to do something so I just bolted. Solas found me,” she blushed, fidgeting with the hem of the vest that fell almost to her knees.

“You truly did leave everything in your room sweet girl, I was wondering at your most recent fashion statement,” Marehis said humorously, smoothing the woolen fabric on Eleanor’s shoulder.

“I’m sorry um…that you have to talk to him all the time, because of me. I know it has to hurt you and I’m so so-“

“Da’vehnun, shush, any discomfort in this situation is Solas’s fault. Do not worry yourself,” Marehis said, “You were saying you left everything in your room, is there something you need?”

“Potion? My whole body is out to get me tonight, my brain, my back.”

“Your potions and a snack,” Marehis offered a bit of rhyme, nodding, “coming right up—it might cheer you and your potion will process more thoroughly. I have your potions on me sweet girl.”

“There are chocolate covered raspberries in my pack,” Cassandra said. The girl ate nutritiously enough she supposed it didn’t hurt to indulge in a sugary midnight snack. She leaned over the edge of her bed and pulled her pack up and dug out the little drawstring bag, of which made Eleanor giggly on sight, which was admittedly wonderful. Eleanor had taken the little tag attached to one of the drawstrings between her fingers, “Oooohhh, they’re from papi! That’s sweet,” she said, “literally.”

“Indeed,” Cassandra agreed. The man was ridiculous. Oh she missed him…the chocolate did admittedly help, and it would cheer the man to hear Eleanor enjoyed the treat, that it made her smile after such a trying day.

…of course, hearing such a thing might send Thedas into a sudden lack of chocolate covered fruit that had only recently become popular, he might bankrupt himself showering the girl with it if it pleased her so much.

Sera was breathless when she returned, Maker, the girl had run all the way to where she’d left her pack in the room Eleanor had been sleeping in, and back, bearing…one of her birthday presents.

“You! Sit and friggin listen!” Sera demanded, pointing at Eleanor before she rushed to the bed again, twisting the lid off of the glass jar she had in hand, her gift from Cole. She pulled out one of the many slips of paper and opened it up, “Kay…you always say the funniest things!”

Eleanor giggled, “Sera, those are about you.”
“Well it’s true of you too, Inky! You’re always saying friggin’ hilarious shite!” Sera argued, tossing the little note aside before fishing out another, “And Lacey loves how your-“ Sera’s ears went bright red, cheeks pinking as she quickly refolded the note. “That- um. Nope. Kremmy-boy’ll probably like it-“

“Sera!” Eleanor shrieked.

“What! I’m just saying!” Sera defended, “Oh! You’re a true friend—you’re like, the truthiest friend!”

“I believe Cole means you’re genuinely a friend,” Marehis said, amused.

“Well freaking that applies to Inky too!” Sera reasoned, moving right on to the next, “And you’re a good big sister!”

“I’m younger than you,” Eleanor smiled, rolling her eyes playfully.

“Well friggin’,” Sera sniffled, chin quivering a bit as she teared up, throwing her arms around Eleanor who hugged her back, “I’m only a good big sister because I got a good little sister so- so I can’t be that without you!” she wailed against the girl’s shoulder.

“…and I would hope when the time comes, that you would be an excellent elder sibling,” Cassandra spoke up, running a hand through Eleanor’s hair. “I believe Sera’s sentiment is sound. You must remind yourself of the things you’ve to live for, reinforce those things to your mind when it tries to convince you should end things.”

“Thanks Sera,” Eleanor said softly against the Elf girl’s hair, ”I’m sorry-“

“Oi! No apologizing, just…don’t think like that, if you can help it Inky. I mean shite,” she backtracked, “I know you can’t help it, you’re brain sicky. But just…if you can, yeah, try to remember the good stuff. Because you’ve got good stuff Inky, you do. And I know all this shite with the holes in the sky and old Elf bullshit, and Cory-face is scary and hard but it…it won’t be forever. We’ll handle it, get through it, and you’ll still have all the good stuff from it left over! Cause you’ll have all of us! And you’ll be able to live however you want! You have ways out other than…other than that! You’ve got all kinds of people who love and support you, who would do whatever you needed to be okay, just…don’t let yourself think you’re trapped. Okay?”

Sera would not be removed from the girl’s side for the rest of the evening, Cassandra certainly didn’t mind sharing her bed with them, Marehis as well. Potion seemed to relieve Eleanor’s aches, further still when, well, Cassandra felt indulgent, wanted with everything to remove every form of suffering from this girl. While she could not strangle an illness, she could soothe physical ache—it was usually something Pentaghasts did after Dragon slaying, but Eleanor had been injured more than Cassandra believed she would be when they took on the…Northern Hunter. Cassandra was certain from the signs she’d seen as they trekked across the countryside—Cassandra uncorked a vial of Elf Root tonic and poured it into her hands, not too much that it would be a horrible mess. Just enough so she could massage the stuff into Eleanor’s back, while the girl lay against Sera, Solas’s vest pulled up to allow the woman direct contact, oh this poor thing. Cassandra was relieved to see the gradient of bruising up and down Eleanor’s back begin fading, and it truly did seem to lax the girl—she fell asleep in Sera’s hold.

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis whispered, brushing Sera’s hair back, “You should get some rest.”
“I’m twenty and two days,” was what the girl said in response, staring into space.

“You are,” Cassandra supposed as she finished cleaning excess potion from her hands with a rag, resting her hand on Sera’s shoulder, the girl seemed troubled by the matter.

“Lady had this cousin or something that died when I was littler. Like ten, eleven or something. He killed himself.”

“Oh da’len,” Marehis offered breathlessly, “I’m sorry. Were you close?”

Sera shook her head, “Didn’t know the guy. But uh, that’s when I figured out, yeah, you can do that,” she sniffled a bit. “I um…I decided if I couldn’t get out from under Lady alive, I could at least do that dead. So I picked a number, a deadline,” she snorted, “sorry. Bad pun,” she cleared her throat, “I picked twenty. Today I’m twenty and two days.”

“And we’re certainly glad of it,” Cassandra breathed, “sweet girl, if you need to talk—“

“I’m fine—I wasn’t brainy sick, not like that anyway, it was just…an exit strategy out of her House if I couldn’t find another way, it’s not something I’ve ever considered since. I just…I wanna make sure Inky gets here. Gets to the point where she looks back and says ‘wow I’m still here’ and feels good about it. That’s all I’m trying to say. We gotta do our best to make sure that happens for her. Starting with kicking Corypheus’s big Darkspawn ass.”

“Agreed,” Marehis said, pressing a kiss to Sera’s temple.

“Sera,” Cassandra swallowed, “I understand your situation was different, but if you do ever find yourself considering such an exit strategy again, know you can come to me and I will always help you.”

“Myself as well, da’vehnvan.”

Sera wiped at her eyes a bit, “Blah, I was just…my birthday coming up, it just sort of hit me how different everything is from how I was scared it’d be, so it’s been on my mind. Scares me that Inky feels the bad things I used to.”

It…and this was not a word she commonly used in reference to herself…but it frightened Cassandra, likewise. It was something she was familiar with. In her youth, the tender days after she lost Antony, she wished to die in the same way a child wishes to live next door to their dearest friend. All of the people she loved, were with the Maker, so that is where she wished to be. And then as she grew older, struggled with the cycle of depression, while she’d never truly in her heart of hearts wished to die, she certainly had felt like it. She understood what Eleanor was experiencing, but that was what was so frightening—Eleanor was strong, but she was so young, and more than that she was much softer and more tender hearted than Cassandra had been at her age, and the Seeker had truly struggled.

So, she held her girls a bit more tightly, thankful to the Maker she could do so, and fell back to sleep.

1——1

Cassandra woke to interesting chaos unfolding in the courtyard. Their people had arrived, Inquisition scouts and soldiers coming to secure and hold this fortress for them, a great crowd of their members scurrying around setting up tents and tables and cots all under the direct supervision of the Herald of Andraste, Inquisitor Eleanor, clad in Solas’s vest secured closed with Cassandra’s missing belt, staff on her back, hair wild as she cheerily offered directions and helped heft whatever she could. Well, more so, she’d go to pick something up and Varric, Bull, and Rainier, even Dorian, ran around her beating her to the task and carrying whatever crate or bundle of bedding or tenting she’d been reaching for wherever she pointed. And Sera was trailing after her closer than the girl’s own shadow.

“Sandra!” Sera greeted as she heard the Seeker approach.

“Buenos dias mami!” Eleanor offered as the girls turned to face her.

“Good morning,” Cassandra returned warmly, “is there anything I can be of assistance with?”

“I think we’re just about good here,” Eleanor said, “everyone’s just getting in and setting up. Mami and Vivienne are working on breakfast, and Solas is checking on Cole. Hawke says hi!” she offered up at little slip of parchment for Cassandra’s examination, ahh, a confirmation of he and Stroud’s location. “We’ll head his way after breakfast!”

“I trust you’ll be armored for this meeting?” Cassandra saw fit to tease.

“What? I can make it work,” Eleanor defended, “Dorian says it’s ‘an entire look’.” Well, she supposed the vest did look something like a dress on the girl.

“It’s wasted on Solas honestly,” Dorian said as he rejoined them, “He wears it, and looks like a homeless wilderness vagabond.”

“Guy looks like that without it,” Bull rumbled out with a shrug.

“Some boots with an appropriate heel, matching handbag?” Dorian continued, “Our Lady Herald could walk the streets of Orlais setting the latest trend. Though admittedly olive is more a fall color.”

“I fall all the time, so I’m set!” Eleanor giggled.

“Imekari,” the Iron Bull groaned at the jest even as he grinned, shaking his head as he pulled Eleanor to his side, her head resting against his ribcage, the act sending the girl smiling as she endeavored to wrap her arms around his waist and hug him tightly, grunting with the effort.

“Inquisitor?” a familiar voice asked, as if unsure she should be interrupting.

Eleanor let out a little gasp, “Charter!”

The Elf woman looked surprised, “You remember me?” Cassandra supposed Eleanor’s initial interrogation in Haven was memorable enough for the girl to recognize all her then-captors who named themselves.

Apparently what was so memorable was, “I’d never forget a fellow redhead!” Eleanor assured, “What can I do for you?”

There was a scout, code named Butcher, missing. He’d yet to report in and Charter was rightly concerned—if Eleanor and her party wouldn’t mind keeping an eye out for him when they went out into Crestwood today, it would certainly be appreciated.

“Of course,” Eleanor promised, “I’ll keep you updated. Thanks so much for looking out for him.”
Sera didn’t seem quite so grateful. She linked arms with Cassandra as she followed after Eleanor and the Iron Bull, Dorian to breakfast, and let out a quiet, annoyed huff. “Need a friggin’ sign or something—no bothering Inky before breakfast. She’s gonna worry about that Butcher guy all day!”

Perhaps not all day. It was on their journey to Stroud’s hideaway that they were assaulted by Venatori forces and found their missing Scout’s body.

Eleanor knelt at his side, head bowed for a moment of silence her party respected before she said, “We’ll get word back to Charter and send someone for his body,” Cassandra thought for a moment the girl was holding the dead man’s hand as some form of post-mortum comfort, but she removed a bit of parchment clutched in it, “I swear to the Maker, if one more person- ugh!” she shot to her feet, stomping her foot in frustration before she whirled around to look over her allies. “Everyone in this party with a secret identity has been exposed already, right? Because I’m like, up to here,” she thrust her Marked hand high overhead, jumped to raise it further, “with all this double agent, betrayal bullshit.”

“You alright there Ellie-girl?” Thom asked gently.

“If that’s even my real name!” the girl lamented, “Who knows at this point!” she sighed, “We’ll need to get this to Leliana right away. Venatori tracked Butcher down because they had an inside connection he was pretty sure. He lost them but they found him. Because someone! Is! A jerk! If it’s Charter she loses her redhead status! Dying her hair! And prison or something I don’t know.”

“Charter seemed genuine in her concern,” Cassandra offered, it hadn’t seemed like the woman was up to manipulations in bringing the issue up to Eleanor, in fact it hadn’t seemed like something the woman did lightly. “I do not believe her asking you to look for the man was a way of evading suspicion.” Charter was craftier than that…if she’d done this, Butcher would have died none the wiser.

“Oh that is a relief,” Dorian said, “it would be a shame to lose such gloriously natural red locks to dye—I say that is the harshest punishment I believe you’ve come up with for a traitor in our midst.”

“Um I banished Thom for like four days and then I didn’t talk to him for like, I dunno, a week-“

“Tumbles, you talked to the guy every day once he was back in our camp,” Varric rolled his eyes, “You still suck at the silent treatment.”

“You suck at the silent treatment!” Eleanor eloquently rebutted. “And Solas totally would’ve gotten the hair dye punishment if he had any hair to dye.”

“Very good,” Vivienne approved.

Eleanor pouted a bit, “Is it weird I’m kind of sad it likely isn’t Charter responsible—just ‘cause that means she’ll be sad her friend is dead?”

“Oh my dear girl, do not fret,” Vivienne wrapped an arm around Eleanor’s shoulders, “Leliana will find the culprit and Butcher will be avenged.”

“Are you safe, mami?” Eleanor questioned Marehis, “Leliana’s not going to send everyone running again?”
Marehis looked over the parchment Eleanor found on Butcher’s body herself, “…no da’vehnan. My position is secure—he suspected someone in his inner circle, our network is large enough now there are several branches, each of them isolated from one another, but Charter herself should be careful. Leliana will have few suspects and even fewer to interrogate.”

“Good,” Eleanor nodded, pressing the palms of her hands against her eyes momentarily as she took a deep breath she steadily blew out. “Okay. Leliana will handle it, and it’ll be fine,” she dropped her hands and offered up a look of determination, “Let’s go meet Hawke and his friend.”

Considering Varric was Hawke’s best friend, that did not instill much confidence in Cassandra, the man’s sense in friendship.

Of course…it would seem he’d recently made another friend who…might tip the balance in favor of his sensibilities. She certainly had Cassandra’s favor.

“Hiya Gare!” Eleanor waved to the man as they approached the cave entrance.

“Half-pint, you made it!” Garrett Hawke greeted warmly, arms open wide before he took up the girl in a bracing hug. “How’s it goin’ kid? Eating all your vegetables?”

“Mm-hmm,” Eleanor offered, a bit strained like she hadn’t quite enough air, “Goin’ kind of ‘ouch’ right now though, you’re squishing me.”

“Put’er down, dingus,” Varric snapped, ”kid got whipped around all to hell yesterday—fucking Revenant.”

“Shit!” Hawke’s eyes widened at that as he some how set Eleanor down on her feet with equal measures of care and clumsiness, “Oh hell, honey how many toes am I holding up?” he asked as he splayed his fingers before her. Toes?

“None…” she said with some uncertainty as she took hold of one of his hands and carefully examined his thumbs, “…yeah, none.”

“Does my thumb looks like a toe?” Hawke wondered with some measure of concern.

“Just the one,” Varric assured him. “s’cute.”

Hawke grinned, “Thanks babe,” then to Eleanor, “Alright, holy hell kid, I’m glad you could make it—sorry you had such a rough time getting here. If we could’ve come to you, I promise we would’ve, but the Wardens are pretty antsy to get their hands on Stroud.”

Eleanor nodded, “We ran into some Wardens looking for him on our way into Crestwood, but it sounded like they were moving on to look for him someplace else.”

“Well, you ready to beat them to the punch?” Hawke asked.

“Let’s do it!” Eleanor readily agreed.

“Allright, little dark in here, stay close and watch your step,” Hawke advised, taking Eleanor’s hand in his own, arms swinging a bit as the duo entered the cave.

“What the hell? Am I chopped liver?” Varric wondered. “I call your toe-thumb cute and I don’t get so much as a hello? You’re just walking off hand in hand with your shiny new best friend?”
“Baby girl can’t help her hand’s shiny, she got fucked over by an ancient Darkspawn of old,” Hawke defended.

“Oh quit complaining, I’ll hold your hand, Dwarf,” Rainier said, stepping up and true to his word, holding Varric’s hand, much to the Dwarf’s chagrin. Though he kept the man’s hand out of sheer stubbornness as they entered the cave.

Personal differences aside…Cassandra was heartened to see Eleanor had a friend in Hawke. The man certainly took his responsibility seriously it seemed—he’d given Eleanor the offer to write him whenever she needed, to vent or for guidance, and Cassandra hadn’t pried…much, but the girl had offered up his letters to her of her own accord, and the man was always kind, thoughtful in his letters, giving her advice and sympathy. It was no small thing, the responsibilities Hawke held in Kirkwall, not wholly unlike Eleanor’s with the Inquisition, and overall she seemed to benefit from his advice.

And his quick thinking, Maker!

There was a makeshift wall ahead with markings from the Banner of the Blind Men painted across it…slavers. Comforting. Of course it’d already been cleared out. But that did not mean it was wholly safe—Eleanor and Hawke were ahead of the others, Hawke pushed the door open wide and led the girl in, the pair of them looking about like this Stroud wasn’t immediately in sight.

Because he was apparently lying in wait, so when the door opened it concealed him from those walking into the room. He walked out from behind the door, sword already drawn and pointed directly at-“Eleanor!” Cassandra called out in firm warning.

Eleanor turned about as Hawke whipped around, putting himself between girl and blade and shouting, “Hey! Hey watch it! It’s just us, I fucking told you she’s just a kid, put that away, Maker!”

“I apologize,” this Warden said, sheathing his sword. “My name is Stroud and I am at your service, Inquisitor.”

“I’m always down for making new friends,” Eleanor offered breezily as if the man hadn’t just had a weapon leveled at her throat a moment ago, “you’ll be my new best friend if you can explain what the heck is going on with the Wardens and Corypheus.”

The man sighed a bit, “Hawke has informed you of his dealings with Corypheus?” he checked, and Eleanor nodded. “When Hawke laid the man slain, Weisshaupt was happy to put the matter to rest. But Archdemons, they can survive wounds that seem fatal, and I feared Corypheus might possess the same power. My investigation uncovered clues but no proof. Then, not long after, every Warden in Orlais began to hear the Calling.”

Oh. Oh Maker help them all.

Oh Maker! She must write Leliana at once! Neria!

Hawke looked as aghast at the notion as Cassandra felt, Stroud must have been tight lipped about that facet of this dilemma, “Maker, why didn’t you tell me?” the man breathed.

“It was a Grey Warden matter. I was bound by an oath of secrecy,” Stroud was remorseful to explain.
“Gosh, I’m sorry,” Eleanor offered with breathless sympathy, reaching out to rest a hand on Warden’s forearm. Then, “The Calling is um…what is it, exactly?”

“It en’t a disease or nothing is it?” Sera asked Cassandra quietly, “I’ll be friggin’ pissed if he gets Calling pish in Inky’s asthma.”

“It is nothing contagious,” Cassandra whispered against the girl’s ear, putting an arm around her shoulder, the Elf girl humming a bit, contentedly as she leaned into the Seeker’s hold and listened to the Warden speak.

“The Calling tells a Warden that the Blight will claim soon claim them. Starts with dreams. Then come whispers in their head. The Warden says their farewells and goes to the Deep Roads to meet their death in combat.”

Hawke paled, “And every Grey Warden in Orlais is hearing that right now? They think they’re dying?”

“Yes,” Stroud confirmed, “Likely because of Corypheus. If the Wardens fall, who will stand against the next Blight? It is our greatest fear.”

“Oh my gosh,” Eleanor whispered.

“So Corypheus isn’t controlling them,” Hawke spat. “He’s bluffing with this Calling and they’re falling for it.”

“Is…is the Calling they’re hearing real?” Eleanor asked, “Or is he just mimicking it somehow?”

“I know not,” Stroud seemed regretful to inform her. “Even as a Senior Warden, I had heard only the vaguest whispers of Corypheus. The Wardens believe it to be real, and they will act accordingly. That is all we know for certain.”

Eleanor’s brow furrowed a bit as she gently squeezed the man’s arm, “So…are you hearing it too?” and then she gasped, her other hand grasping at Hawke’s elbow, “Bethany! Oh my gosh, your sister—she’s a Warden right?”

“She hasn’t made mention of any of this, and I’ve made arrangements for her…she’s someplace safe, hopefully out of range of this mess,” Hawke assured.

Eleanor breathed a sigh of relief, looking to Stroud who nodded. “Sadly, yes,” he cleared his throat, “but do not let it trouble you. What matters is uncovering what Corypheus has done and end it. This cannot stand.”

“How is he even doing this?” Eleanor asked.

“He is a Magister as well as Darkspawn—and he speaks with the voice of the Blight. That lets him affect the minds of Wardens as we are tied to the Blight ourselves. It must be how he created the false calling.”

“So…the Wardens disappearing—they’re just going underground?” Eleanor wondered.

“We are the only ones who can slay Archdemons. Without us, the next Blight will consume the world. Warden-Commander Clarel spoke of a Blood Magic ritual to prevent any future Blights before we all perish.”

Apparently. “When I protested his plan as madness my comrades turned on me. Grey Wardens will gather in the Western Approach, there is an ancient Tevinter Ritual Tower. Wardens are meeting there and so must we, to find the answers we’re looking for and see just what Corypheus is trying to gain from all of this.”

Eleanor took a deep breath and nodded. “Alright. Of course. We’ll go, and we’ll get to the bottom of this. Is this thing like ‘we need to start running now to make it there in time’? Or is this an invite only shindig we’ve got a little time to go ballgown shopping for?”

"You needn't trouble yourself with a ballgown my Lady but yes, we've time. Their machinations require the moon be in some such state, there's a set date."

"Cool! There's a few more things to do here. Get us the details as you can, and meet us in Skyhold. You'll be safe there, and we can go to the Western Approach together! Is there anything we can do for you now?"

Stroud shook his head. “I should move—thank you, Inquisitor, for coming to meet with me. Maker watch over your efforts here.”

“Thank you, what you’ve done is very brave. Be safe,” Eleanor wished him, clearly uncomfortable with the man going off all on his own in such a state. The Calling. Maker. “You too Hawke—you’re going with him?”

“I’ll have his back,” Hawke assured, pulling Eleanor in for gentle hug, “you be careful out there honey. Keep in touch?”

“I will,” Eleanor promised, offering a small wave good-bye as the man nodded to Varric in farewell and then chased after Stroud.

It took all of a beat for Eleanor to round on her party, Rainier in particular, and launch herself at the mercenary, hugging him fiercely.

"So like, I'm always happy you're you, because that's amazing, but I'm extra relieved you're not really a Warden," Eleanor informed him, the man's eyes widening in a bit of shock as he blushed a bit, clearing his throat as he rested a hand on the crown of her head.

"I erm, I'm glad as well, Ellie-girl."

Though the girl did give him a bit of a playful swat to the chest and a shove when she pulled away from him, "If you had let me keep believing you were a Warden and I was worrying about you over this nonsense I'd kick your ass when I found out the truth! So that's for being almost an entire jerk!" she explained, somehow the reprimand relaxed him, like at the very least he could be glad he'd avoided letting his lie stand further still.

"I'd've deserved a good ass kicking if that were the case," Thom readily agreed, smiling as the girl giggled and nodded.

Eleanor joined Cassandra, bumping into the woman’s side, and the Seeker wrapped her arm around the girl’s shoulders as they made way out of the cave.

“The Western Approach...that’s like, out near the Forbidden Oasis?” Eleanor checked after thinking over the map on their War Table. Cassandra nodded, and the girl let out a falsely-appreciative hum. “That’s not very sexy of the Wardens, I hope they know that.” Oh goodness.
“I’m sure it embarrasses them tremendously,” Dorian assured.

“If you think you’re going to need a haircut Tumbles, just get one before we go,” Varric begged, “disappearing with half your body weight in hair and reappearing with 90% all of it missing was 100% terrifying.”

“My girl I’m sure there’s something we can do to keep your hair from torment in the humidity, you’ll let me work with it before doing something drastic?” Vivienne hoped.

“Oh gosh, really? Sure!” Eleanor smiled, “You know, I’m liking this more and more now—I’m gonna get my hair done! And maybe the Western Approach will be fun? Somewhere between the heat and the Blood Magic rituals and Rift sealing—Leliana has reports of them out that way.”

“Oh certainly, da’vehnan,” Marehis assured, trying to find the brighter points of visiting a desert wasteland where, unlike the Oasis, there would be precious little reprieve from just…sand, and unbearable heat. “We’ll take in some sun. And there’s certain to be potions ingredients we do not usually have the opportunity to collect fresh.”

“Yeah, you and me’ll go ingredient picking!” Sera promised. “And humidity isn’t fun for your hair but your lung’ll dig it, right? We can play!”

They did make play in their new fortress. Marehis convinced the girl to let the Elf woman speak to Charter as a coworker, break the news to her that Butcher had been found dead and there was a spy in their midst—Charter was off to report in to Leliana herself, Butcher’s missive sent on ahead so their Spymaster would be ready to put her to work when she arrived in Skyhold.

Cassandra called a meeting of sorts up in the highest most tower of the fortress where there was a spacious room, a large table for them to gather around—to handle the work of finalizing their claims to the fortress they were holding, and write up reports to Skyhold of what transpired since their arrival in Crestwood and their meeting with Hawke. It was admittedly comforting not to burden Eleanor with the work, it was even more so a comfort to hear the echo of the girls giddiness bouncing through the halls—Sera and Eleanor’s giggles and laughter, friendly smack-talk as they made chase of one another through Caer Bronach—as Cassandra cleared her throat and broached the subject of…well, Eleanor’s struggles in the night.

2 — 2

“The girl is suicidal?” Vivenne asked, aghast.

“Been suicidal, princess, keep up,” Bull snapped.

"I meant more pressingly, in a way we might be concerned she will act upon the impulse, Qunari," the woman quietly seethed in tones that concerned Cassandra she might lay waste to the man.

But the Qunari sighed, running a hand over his face as he sat back in his seat, "Sorry, that was rude, my bad. Just…fuck, I’m glad the kid went to you, Seeker."

That…was still something of uncertainty for Cassandra as she looked to Solas. “Was she? Coming to me when you…what exactly happened last night?”

Solas cleared his throat as all eyes fell on him. “I sensed something disturbing in the bond—her magic simultaneously calling out in urgency while also…distancing itself, growing quiet. Like her mental state was endeavoring to keep her magic from making me aware something was the matter. I ran, of course, as fast as I could, I nearly collided with the girl, I found her wandering listlessly in a hall a ways from her room, breathless like she’d been running herself. She was crying and lamented she was lost, begged that I take her to the Lady Seeker,” he nodded, looking to Cassandra, “to answer your question in full—yes, she was coming to you.”

Varric’s fists pounded against the table top, the table itself scooting a few inches as he pushed up and away from it, a snarling sound breaking past his lips before he shouted, “Goddamn it! This is such bullshit, I fucking knew something like this would happen. Shit!” he swore, kicking at the wall as if it were the source of all his frustrations.

“She is sick, Varric, she- it is not that Eleanor truly wishes to die,” Cassandra offered, gesturing for the man to calm himself, Maker. “Her mind is perceiving problems she has no control over and is merely, in a disturbing, drastic way, trying to shield her from them—Corypheus, Red Lyrium, the Venatori, none of these things can hurt her if she is not of this world to hurt.”

“Well we have to do something!” Varric shouted.

“Which I am at present, trying to do!” Cassandra raised her voice back at him, slapping a hand to the table top, “Be seated and calm yourself—you’re hardly helping!”

There was the din of Sera’s voice rising in song, very loudly like the girl was trying to sing herself hoarse with a single verse—‘Maker loves me this I know! For the Chantry tells me so! You sing too Inky!’—echoed up the stairwell from the corridors below.

“I believe that’s Sera’s way of saying we should be more quiet if we don’t wish Eleanor checking in on our quarrel,” Solas offered quietly.

“You shut your fuckin mouth wolf boy,” Varric snapped. “All this shit is entirely your fault.”

“Indeed,” Vivienne agreed.

“Fault is hardly the pressing issue just now, Tethras,” Dorian snapped, speaking up. Oh. His eyes were glistening as he glared at the Dwarf, his words carefully measured, “What matters. is how we handle this. sit down.” the word pitching dangerously low.

And so he did. “…sorry.”

Dorian cleared his throat before proceeding. “Ellie has been on her own on plenty of occasions without incident, but we’ve had the luxury of having a resident Spirit capable of knowing when she is in need, who could be at her side in an instant. Cole will be back, and in the meantime, there are at least eight of us, I think somewhere between the whole of our party, one of us can be with the girl at all times. Have you consulted Adan?” he looked to Cassandra and Marehis.

Cassandra planned to, but thankfully, “I spoke with Ellie when we woke for the day,” Marehis said. “She agreed I should send word—it is a worsening of a symptom, a more active than passive thought.”

“That’s all we can do?” Thom asked, worried, “Just, watch her? Write a message to her Healer?”

“Oh there’s certainly more we can do,” the Tevinter Mage said with false cheer before, more seriously, “I’m hardly a functioning adult, but listen well,” Dorian Pavus warned coolly. “Amatus,” he said to the Qunari, “I am ashamed of you.”
…alright then. Did the man mean to occupy their time with a lover’s spat?

“…the fuck I do?” Bull asked.

Dorian ignored the question, going right along with, “You as well, Varric, and Vivienne. And I’m ashamed of myself,” the Altus assured, looking to Solas. “You…are a despicable person. You had your reasons, and I am sorry for your suffering, but motive does precious little to the harm you’ve caused. Personal tragedy does not undo the damage of the temple you scourged to the ground trying to ‘fix it’. That being said. You are a member of this team. Ellie…needs you. So that means she needs us to work with you.”

“We have worked together remarkably,” Solas offered, albeit confused. “I am grateful for the role I maintain, your ire is certainly deserved.”

“At you, yes. But we have been acting like children in front of Ellie,” Dorian looked to his lover, “making jests and mocking, the Wolf comments and the like. The decision she made to handle Solas’s betrayal was hard, but necessary and when we make hostile comments, even passive aggressively…well, it’s still a form of aggression. That has to wear on her, knowing we resent working with him, and it was her call to make that so. I’m hardly calling for friendship bracelets and hair braiding lines, but in front of Eleanor I suggest we borderline get there, and save our disdain for when we are not around a wide-eyed impressionable teenager.”

“…shit,” The Iron Bull sighed wearily, rubbing a hand over his face. “When the hell did you become a responsible adult?”

“Perish the thought,” Dorian scoffed, “I am merely…being a passable friend. Eleanor has shown fine example of it, I suppose it’s merely rubbing off,” Dorian look rather disgusted at the notion, “like some sort of horrible, infectious disease. I actually want to play nice with those I dearly dislike just so it might…make…someone who isn’t myself,” his nose wrinkled like he smelled something foul, “…happy. Ugh.”

“Dorian is right,” Marehis ventured, looking to Madam de Fer, “While I do appreciate the offence on my own behalf, on Ellie’s for what she has endured due to the actions of Fen Harel…we should endeavor to not rub our resentment in Ellie’s face, that we must still work with him in the field,” she sighed, looking to Solas, “with…you, in the field. I do appreciate…”she grew very quiet, a small sound in the back of her throat as she swallowed, chin quivering for all of a moment before she cleared her throat, “Thank you. For going to her last night. For taking her to Cassandra and making certain I knew what was happening.”

“I…I hope you know I would prefer you had no reason to be grateful to me,” Solas promised, “if Ellie could be safe, healthy, have no need of my aid, I would want that for her.”

Marehis nodded, worrying at her lip as she adverted her gaze like she’d reached her limit with looking at him. “We will do our best for Ellie.”

2 —2

The girl seemed lighter when they had Solas prompt her in the bond to join them, she and Sera racing one another, pushing open the door and practically falling into the room, giggly and breathless.

“Tumbles babe, come’ere,” Varric intoned, “I gotta get my hug on.”

“Sure!” she readily agreed, going to join him, it was somewhat amusing to see the Dwarven man pull the taller girl into his lap, having her lean against him, his chin resting on her shoulder and her head resting atop his as they sat holding one another. “Is something the matter or did you just need a hug?”

“Nah,” Varric assured, “Touch starved all to shit my entire childhood Tumbles, I got hugged maybe once on accident, Bartrand trying to strangle me to get at my inheritance before he remembered he was the older brother. Other than that? Zero hugs for this guy. Gotta make up for it from time to time.”

Eleanor gasped, “Really?!” the girl pouted, squeezing the Dwarf more tightly, humming with the effort, “Oh my gosh! If I’d known you when you were tiny I’d have hugged you all the time! Baby Varric had to be just the cutest!”

“I was born the same way I’ll die—one handsome bastard, my mother screaming at me probably.”

Eleanor giggled at that, pressing a kiss to the top of the Dwarf’s head, content to sit with him as she joined their talk.

They made no mention of the previous night—if she wished to broach the subject in front of the whole of their party that was one thing, but to ambush her…well she may be embarrassed or ashamed, feel her confidence betrayed. Instead they were able to catch her up on the reports they’d worked together to write up, assure her their claim to this fortress was secure, that they would use it to help the people of Crestwood rebuild and secure their own lands, and that Charter was safe, heading to meet Leliana to handle the breach in security.

Eleanor nodded. “She came and said goodbye to me before she left, and we prayed for Butcher together. His name was Timmy!”

And his death had been delivered through the betrayal of Abernale Harish*, codename ‘Painter’, an agent of Leliana’s who found some promise of title with the Venatori if he betrayed his allies, according to his signed confession Leliana sent along for Eleanor to see. Now he was sitting in Skyhold’s prison, indefinitely, until Leliana decided to move further with him—Eleanor let the woman have discretion in how she handled her own agents.

They stayed in the area—sleeping in the fortress was safest, but in their waking hours…it seemed to help, Eleanor leading her party about, helping the people of Crestwood. It heartened her, the difference they made. They were able to assist in the uncovering of lost souls in old Crestwood, locating the bodies of those lost and reporting their locations to a Chantry Sister working to arrange proper burial for them. They checked in on the woman, Judith, the friend of that man who sought Eleanor’s help their first visit to the village. The woman was a naturalist of some sort, sent them hunting down a Wyvern of all things, an aggressive thing that was harassing the locals, going out of its territory to do so.

Likely, because of the Red Lyrium in its territory. The thing was driven mad it seemed, made more violent under its influence.

It was especially vindicating, to demolish the shards of it they could, a bit of vengeance for the nature it disturbed to destruction.

They also cleared several groups of bandits, slavers, that focused on the area for one reason or another, made Crestwood safer from future assault. Their work was satisfying and tiring, Sera had made it habit to sit with Eleanor at dinner, and more often than not the younger girl fell asleep against her sister, which seemed to be the Elf girl’s goal. Sera had been inseparable from the girl, especially when she was asleep—the moment Eleanor fell asleep, Sera followed almost immediately.

Well, not sleeping exactly.

“Sera is meditating,” Solas informed them, the second night in a row the girls seemingly fell asleep in unison at dinner. He’d waited for privacy to voice the observation—he and Thom Rainier escorted Marehis and Cassandra to the room they kept with the girls, Cassandra had carried Sera, Rainier carrying Eleanor while Marehis kept guard as they walked, and Solas had made an excuse of going over something he observed in the bond with the women to linger after Rainier left them.

“You’re certain?” Cassandra asked. She’d considered the possibility in passing—Sera usually snored.

Solas nodded. “I’ve sensed it in the passing days, Sera experimenting further with her magic while in close proximity to Eleanor.”

Well the younger girl did have a great deal of experience with magic, and knew well of Sera’s recent access to it. But apparently, Eleanor was unaware of Sera’s experiments. Cassandra and Marehis asked after it, in case the girl needed guidance or some assistance, access to Lyrium or the like, while Eleanor still laid sleeping, allowing the girl to sleep in for as long as they could.

“Inky’s been fallin’ asleep without potion and I don’t want her to have nightmares. Cole isn’t here to keep her safe in the Fade, and Dori n’ Viv ain’t big on Fade Dreaming, and Solas is…Solas. So,” Sera shrugged, “I make sure I’m with her. If I hold her Marked hand, I don’t need Lyrium or nothin’ to get in there, and once I’m in, I’m there until…there’s kind of a skip, when I actually fall asleep I sort of fall out and then right back in, friggin’ head-rushy that is. And then I make sure Inky’s safe, give her a bit of warning when I feel like I might wake up.”

So, she became the recipient of a rather fierce hug—Cassandra nearly struck Marehis’s face on accident, both women opening their arms wide and lunging at the girl.

“Sera, child, I do love you,” Cassandra intoned, pressing a kiss to the girl’s hair.

“Da’vehnan that is such- I could not be more proud of you,” Marehis breathed.

Sera blushed, ears turning pink as she said, “Ink’d do the same for me.”

Cole was returned to them…the morning of their fourth day in Crestwood. He’d been gone scarcely two days when he reappeared in their fortress…in the breakfast campfire almost—Rainier cried out in alarm and reached out to pull the boy to safety before he could finish sitting in the fire properly.

“Maker, boy, are you alright?” the man worried.

“Oh. I am sorry, I did not mean to land in your fire—I’m not hurt, and I do not need breakfast, and I am not crazy,” he seemed to be addressing all the worries from those gathered, the whole of Eleanor’s party, “I poofed too fast,” and then he looked to where Rainier’s hands were still at the Spirit’s elbows and said, “…are you hugging me? I’m supposed to be hugging Ellie.”

“Oh gosh, I am glad you’re back,” Eleanor said, “and I’d appreciate a hug but you don’t have to—“
The Spirit vanished and reappeared at Eleanor’s side, sweeping her into a hug, tucking her head under his chin as he held her tightly. “I do, I promised Krem.”

“When the hell did you see Krem?” the Iron Bull asked. “Thought you were hunting down that Mayor prick.” Cole’s capabilities of travel were extraordinary, but had he truly been able to hunt Crestwood’s Mayor down, turn him over to their agents in Skyhold, and return to Crestwood so quickly?

Apparently not. “Near the Storm Coast—that is where I caught Gregory fleeing, trying to get to water and a boat. I sensed Dalish…she is an archer and she found me in the Fade with her archery, she says. She was looking for me, so I let her know where I was, and Cremisius came with the Chargers to take Gregory to Skyhold and send me back here, and I’m supposed to hug Ellie, so I am. Also Cremisius loves you—he told me to tell you. He loves you so much sometimes he cannot breathe because of it, like his heart is so full it takes up too much space and his lungs have no room—he did not tell me to tell you that but it would not embarrass him if you knew, now know.”

Well, Eleanor was blushing fiercely, a little teary eyed as she hugged the Spirit a bit more tightly. “I love him too…pretty much sums it up, kind of inconvenient with the whole asthma thing,” the girl jested a bit. “That was really sweet of him, I didn’t realize he was taking the Chargers out and doing something to get you back faster. Um…” she looked to the Iron Bull, “I hope you aren’t mad? I didn’t know he’d do that, but it’s my fault—I wrote him the morning after Cole left, about um…” she shrugged, “just personal stuff, that I missed him.” Not entirely a lie, she did love the Spirit, and it was her right not to disclose everything. “Cremisius wrote back that Cole would be back soon, I just didn’t realize he meant ‘taking matters into his own hands’ soon.”

“’Course it’s fine babe, the guy’s in charge when I’m not around,” Bull assured, “Usually runs things by me but uh…not mad that he didn’t, kinda him stretchin’ his leadership legs a bit more,” it sounded like he appreciated it, respected it that the young man moved forward without his Chief’s say-so.

“Krem’s a freaking badass!” Sera cheered.

It was certainly a blessing to have Cole returned to them—a relief that Crestwood’s Mayor was captured and ready for Judgement whenever Eleanor saw fit, and that she had all her allies in the realm of mental health.

3 — 3

“You just want it to be over—Corypheus stopped, the rebellion ended, for your friends and family to be safe,” Cole explained to Eleanor when they were in the privacy of their quarters that evening, the Spirit joining them, seated on the bed with Eleanor ‘criss-cross applesauce’ as the girl called it, Cole reaching out to take her hands in his. “Your mind just came up with the fastest solution for yourself to experience that—that is where the passive thoughts come from. When you were presented with the opportunity to really act upon it, those thoughts became more pressing, desperate, because it might be the only chance of you being willing to go through with it.”

Eleanor nodded. “That…yeah, that makes sense,” though she startled a bit, assuring, “Not that it makes sense to do that! I just mean it makes sense my brain doing that, mistaking that as a helpful solution because it’s what’s fastest for me.”

“Be patient with it, it is trying to help, it just doesn’t know what to do—it’s looking for an immediate way to fix things, you have to remind it that things take time, and that’s okay.”
Eleanor pitched forward in her seat and pressed a kiss to the Spirit’s cheek. “Thanks Cole.”

“Thank you, Ellie. You prevented so much hurt, stopping yourself and going to get Cassandra. It…” Cole seemed to consider his words carefully, “you are full of hurts because of the Conclave, and the bad things that have happened since. But your hurts can heal—that is how you get rid of them. Dying doesn’t get rid of the hurt, it only gives it to other people.” Then, softly, “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to make you sad,” he promised, reaching out to wipe at her tears with the back of his index finger.

“It’s okay,” Eleanor sniffled, “um…I think…that helped.”

“It did. Sometimes heals have to hurt.”

3 —3

Cassandra and Marehis were seated at a table in their room, working to finish their daily reports—the Elf woman still had need to document Eleanor’s day-to-day for security purposes, and Cassandra, their groups efforts in Crestwood…which seemed to be coming to a close, Hawke had made contact with them, he and Stroud taking a rather round-about way of getting to the Western Approach to evade Wardens on their trail, they would need to get moving soon in order to meet them, they’d secured their holds in Crestwood and helped the people as much as they could, directly.

Save for the resident dragon.

She’d been considering it their entire time in Crestwood. It almost felt foolish, or petty—Cassandra had never been one to subscribe heavily to the Pentaghast tradition, it was their duty to slay dragons, so she did, but it had never been something of sport, nor had it been something she considered a milestone. At least, she thought she didn’t. And then that damn Qunari came home to Skyhold with Eleanor and Sera and when she thought she’d missed their first Dragon fight, oh! It almost felt as if…well, granted, she did not meet these girls until they were well into their teens, but it felt similar to how she imagined being faced with the risk of missing her child’s first steps would feel. She still had the opportunity to guard and guide them through the event, if they truly wished aid in a battle against a dragon themselves. But still it was facing a dragon. While ideally they would walk away with sore muscles and perhaps a few burns, that was the ideal. So much could go wrong.

She’d had a hazy, nonsensical feeling dream that they went to the dragon’s lair, and after giving their group a dismissive look, it promptly gobbled Eleanor up whole and laid down to take a nap and for some reason they did nothing to aid or avenge the girl, Cullen was there for some reason and he merely shrugged and said ‘That’s fair’.

_I assure you I would never react such a way in waking life_, he wrote when Cassandra informed him of the matter in her last letter, allowing, _but you’ve every right to be upset with me—that’s perfectly valid, I was an utter fool in your dream and I apologize._

“He misses you,” Cole’s voice startled her. Somehow his addressing her so suddenly was more jarring than the way that the boy was now crouching on the table top, knees tucked to his chest, arms around his legs as he peered down at the Seeker, he had some affinity for being up high and she’d come to accept this about the Spirit. He smiled at that and said, “Thank you.”

Cassandra huffed quietly, grinning when Eleanor asked, “Who misses mami?”

“Cullen,” Cassandra answered over her shoulder, turning in her seat to face the girl. “I miss
That sent the girl gasping and flopping back in bed albeit dramatically, “I miss Papi too! So much! I just wanna-!” she made an unintelligible sound as she reached for Sera, sitting up again to somersault forward, landing with her legs around Sera’s waist, wrapping them around her securely before doing the same with her arms around the squealing Elf girl’s shoulders, pressing her cheek to Sera’s as she essentially hugged her sister with her entire body. “I’m hugging him! So much! For like an entire day when we get home after this mess!” and then, “Do you suppose Corypheus is the way he is because he doesn’t get enough hugs? Have we tried that? Put me in a catapult, launch me at his dumb darkspawn face, and let me get a good grip around him—if all else fails I can choke him out!”

Sera’s voice was a bit strangled as she assured, “She really can! This is great but I’m loosin’ air here Ink.”

“Sorry Ser’,” Eleanor giggled, pitching forward to send Sera laying on her back before loosening her hold on the older girl and just laying atop her instead.

Sera snorted, laughing as she ran a hand through Eleanor’s hair, “All good sweets. You cozy? This is snuggly, I vote mamis just throw a blanket over us and call it a night.”

“Already ahead of you—your boobs are good neck support,” Eleanor complimented sincerely…her head did rest on the girl’s breast bone, neck fitting just between the softer tissue of Sera’s chest.

“Thanks! Your boobs is cushiony—squishy Inky!”

“Da’vehnans,” Marehis giggled, amused at their antics.

“I can put a blanket over them,” Cole volunteered serenely, and then he leaned forward a bit…an act that seemed albeit physically impossible seeing as he maintained his crouched posture and just leaned with no viable ability to support the action save for, yes, the ability to float, Cassandra supposed. He did so to speak directly into Cassandra’s ear, “You should ask them—Marehis was worried but she still supports bringing them along,” before he vanished and suddenly reappeared on the bed armed with a blanket from…somewhere, that he draped over Eleanor and Sera before dropping uncertain kisses to each of the girl’s heads, “Have sweet dreams,” he wished them before disappearing from the room.

“I know you wouldn’t choose to do something that would be of detriment to our girls,” Marehis quietly assured Cassandra, she’d heard Cole of course and knew well what topic was on the Seeker’s mind. “I trust you have this in hand? I promised Vivienne I would sit guard with her tonight.” Cassandra nodded, smiling her thanks when Marehis took up her report as well as her own, to handle their sending for the Seeker.

“What’d’you wanna ask us ‘sandra?” Sera wanted to know, ahh. Yes, hearing.

Cassandra cleared her throat. “There is a dragon in the south-“

“And you want us to stay behind,” the girls droned in unison, Eleanor giggling, “Jokes on them—when they’re gone, their snacks are ours!” the Human girl conspired.

“Hell yeah—Dori’s got that crunchy almond chocolateish bread stuff that’s just banging!”

“Biscotti?” Eleanor checked, and when Sera nodded. “Yes!”

“Well, you’ll certainly be free to snack to your hearts content,” Cassandra said, “it may be all the more satisfying after a dragon slaying—if you’re inclined to join us I can assure you’ll work up an appetite.”

Ellie let out a startled shriek when Sera sat up swiftly, the motion having the Human girl laying at her side now though Eleanor was sitting up, the pair of them staring at Cassandra, excited but cautious, “…really?” Eleanor checked.

“…you feelin’ okay ‘sandra?” Sera wondered.

“I’m in excellent health,” Cassandra assured, amusedly, “and I am sincere—I would not pressure you to participate, but if you wish, I would be honored to have you join us in our efforts to rid Crestwood of their dragon issue.”

…for girls who had just been about to fall asleep, they were wide awake now.

Eleanor bounced in place, she and Sera patting the space on the bed before them in eager invitation and the instant she was seated, Cassandra found herself pulled into laying on her back them, the girls settling in her arms.

“What kind of dragon is it?” Sera asked.

“Is it like a zappy one like last time or is it cold or fiery or…wait can what else can Dragons do? Are Dragons mages?” Eleanor wondered.

“Oh! What if it’s like a brain zappy one? Can use mind blast or whatever?”

“Oh ouchy, that’s gonna be so much headaches—I can make potion!” Eleanor enthused.

“It is a Northern Hunter—so their power is lightning,” Cassandra spoke warmly, amused at the outright enthusiasm as she sought to answer their questions. “Dragons are not mages, but they are inherently magical.”

“Ohhh, you know what I have spindleweed out my ears!” Eleanor informed them, “Rashvine too—there’s this super great recipe for Electrical Resistance in the potions book Adan gave me for my birthday!”

“Oh sweet!” Sera cheered.

“You wanna help me make it, Ser’?”

“Hell yeah!”

“Yay! We’ll cook some up first thing—enough for everyone to have a couple doses on hand! Oh! And regeneration tonic, gosh that stuff is a lifesaver,” Eleanor breathed. Though she seemed to be struck with something that bothered her, “Wait! The dragon doesn’t have babies, does it?”

“It does not,” Cassandra assured. It was admittedly too young to have had offspring*, Cassandra was certain, but she didn’t feel that fact would necessarily hearten the girl.
Eleanor nodded. “Kay. And it really needs gone?”

“Its current territory is rather contained but that is only because previously, they could only claim the land it had—now that the lake is drained and the land beneath it exposed, the dragon has been veering nearer and nearer civilization, I fear it will attempt to take Crestwood village, or our own fortress here if we do not act before we leave.”

“Just checking! You know,” she shrugged. “I’d feel badly just going out of my way to do something to someone who wasn’t hurting anyone…she will eat the people right?”

“Northern Hunters will eat anything, from nugs to Wyrvern—and yes, people.”

Eleanor’s eyes widened at that, “Nugs?! Oh gosh she might-“ the girl stopped, eyes darting between Cassandra and the ceiling like she was trying to advert her gaze and not look the woman directly in the eye as she said, “…not eat any nugs in Caer Bronach…because there aren’t any.”

“…there aren’t?” Cassandra questioned, playing along, admittedly fighting a smile.

“Nope!” and then Eleanor did meet her eye, and forthrightly assured her, “I can promise you there is not one nug in all of Caer Bronach!”

…meaning the very walls could be full of the things, there was just certainly more than one.

“Well…I would remind you that is a good thing, given that nugs do carry diseases and it would be unsuitable to risk something spreading among our numbers,” Cassandra said, “…however…any offending nugs found on the premises could be safely relocated to a more suitable habitat.”

“Really?!” Eleanor asked, eyes alight at the prospect. “…mami I might have found some nugs in the wine cellar,” she confessed.

Albeit more concerning than the secrecy surrounding the nugs was, “What were you doing in the wine cellar?”

“Following the nugs!”

“Ahh.” Of course.

“…can they stay inside until the dragon is dead?” Eleanor ventured.

Maker help her, if Cullen got word of this he would never let her live it down. Cassandra did not…hate nugs. But neither did she enjoy the things.

Be that as it may, “…certainly sweet girl, your nugs can stay.”

“Gracias mami! Mwah!” Eleanor pressed a very enthusiastic kiss to the Seeker’s cheek. “I’ll introduce you! There’s Nuggy, and Squeaky.” Maker help them, she named them, “—he talks with the cutest little squeak! Eep eep eep!” the girl demonstrated, “and then Pretzel Paws—cause she like pretzels—and Money Bags, and Cremisius. He’s got gorgeous brown eyes!”

…”Money Bags?” Cassandra wondered.

“Her nest is full of coins!” Well then.

Nuggy…as Cassandra came to discover come morning when Eleanor guided her to just where Caer Bronach’s wildlife resided…was a Fennec. Or at the very least, had the body of one,
“He’s a nug in his soul!” Eleanor insisted, as she held the creature in her arms, petting his fur and pecking little kisses to his head. “He acts like a nug, and lives like a nug,” Cassandra was not certain the vast difference in lifestyle between to two species, but that sorted she supposed. “all his family are nugs and he’s Money Bag’s son! So he’s a nug!”

“Ahh, I’ll make certain our scouts know not to separate him from his family then,” Cassandra assured the girl.

And she was rewarded with, “I’m definitely putting stevia leaf in your potion today—it sweetens without interfering with the potions integrity and it actually dulls the bitterness of Electrical tonic and makes it taste almost…spicy? Like what papi considers spicy, not the real definition of spicy.”

…it admittedly was, strangely enough. They gathered together as a group just outside the current standing boundary of the Dragon’s territory, taking pause to ingest potion and go over their plan just once more.

“I don’t like it,” Sera decided, smacking her lips, tongue licking at the roof of her mouth like she sought to rid it of the taste, “it’s purple, it should taste purple!”

“Whatever does purple taste like, my dear?” Dorian wanted to know.

“You know,” Sera eloquently explained, shrugging. “Purple.”

“Grapey with a sugar high,” the Iron Bull explained simply, rolling out like common knowledge.

Sera snapped her fingers, pointing to the Qunari, “Exactly!” and when Cassandra cleared her throat the Elf girl looked to her.

“Sorry ’sandra,” and Bull’s, “Seeker”, overlapped.

With everyone’s attention brought to bear, “Mages and archers—stay out of range of it’s wind,” Cassandra intoned. “She doesn’t have quite so wide a wingspan as some dragon’s might, so she cannot produce as great a gust to pull you in—you’ve a bit more safe standing to fire from, do bear in mind she’s a great deal of tolerance for electrical attacks, but a weakness to Spirit magic. Everyone else with me, try to flank her and stay out of range of her mouth…she will endeavor to consume you, and when generating lightning in her throat, sparks do stray. If for any reason you need to retreat, do so—call out if you can, we will draw fire and assist as we can. If I call a retreat—or if Eleanor, our Inquisitor does so, it is to be immediate, there is to be absolutely no argument or heroics. Eleanor will summon a Rift to paralyze the beast and we will evacuate the area and regroup.”

There was a chorus of “Right”s and “Of course”, everyone taking one last moment to stretch, hydrate before taking on the dragon.

Cassandra saw Marehis draw uncustomarily close to Solas, at least what seemed as such as of late, “Your connection is open?” she verified quietly with him, the man nodding. “I will be with the warriors.”

He nodded again. “I will make certain she is safe—she and Sera both,” Solas vowed, pleading quietly, “Do be careful ma’- Marehis.”

She nodded, going to Sera and Eleanor, offering them a reassuring smile and wishing them luck with warm kisses to the cheek. Cassandra joined them, doling out likewise and then asking,
“You’re certain you’re ready?” the girls nodded, both with matching looks of determination, so, “Very good,” she said, brushing Sera’s hair back to make certain it was holding its position, styled to stay out of her face, and then pulling Eleanor’s scarf up so it fit snugly and securely over her nose and mouth—regardless of their distance, the Dragon was certain to kick up dirt and dust, the air they fought in would be fouled. “Remember my instructions on how to breathe if you are pulled into the dragon’s wind.”

“Scream our heads off,” Sera offered, somewhat in jest, but only just so. Truly—it was more often easier to breath in, it was almost as if air was forced into your lungs, but getting that air out to pull in fresh and lessen the risk of passing out? The air had to be forcibly pushed from one’s lungs—the best method Cassandra found of doing so effectively, was through using the air in her lungs to scream*.

“Do not grab onto each other if one of you is pulled in, and do not resist its pull, you will only injure yourself. You’re to…“

“Get low to move faster and control your speed by rising to slow down,” Eleanor nodded.

Oh thank the Maker these girls had listened, “Brace yourself for impact with the Dragon’s limbs or one of our warriors or duel weaponed rogues,” it wouldn’t do to not credit Cole and Marehs, “—if we hear you coming we will certainly try to catch you, no matter what someone will come to you and you will follow their lead on how to proceed,” she intoned, satisfied as they nodded eagerly in agreement. “Maker watch over you both—I am proud of you, for joining us.”

“Thanks ‘sandra.”

“Gracias mami,” followed by a unified,

“Be safe.”

The Northern Hunter was napping in the mid-morning heat it seemed, lazing atop a stone structure that seemed to be the ruins of a fortress not unlike Caer Bronach.

Of course the moment the wind picked up, their collective scents carried with it? The Dragon was up on all legs with a screeching roar.

And Eleanor screamed—a small, startled sound, surrounded by Sera’s shrieked, “Frick frick frick frick!”

Reasonable reactions for first time Dragon slayers. If they did not wet themselves, they would...admittedly do better than Cassandra had, her first endeavor in Dragon slaying.

“Hell yeah! Come and get me! Big tasty Iron Bull comin’ at you—buttered up and everything!”

The Qunari truly had oiled his body with butter before leaving their fortress...he’d done similar in the Hinterlands. How the man survived, both dragon slayings and in life, was a wonder.

“I’m a jealous lover, mind, you wench!” Dorian called, at the Dragon in warning.

Dragon fighting with the Inquisition was a world apart from the rigorous, religious practice that had been passed down the Pentaghast line.

And Cassandra admittedly did not mind.
Neither did Cassandra mind Sera cheering, “We slayed a friggin’ dragon!” directly into her ear as she carried the girl on her back, arms bracing Sera’s thighs, the girl’s arms around her neck. “’sandra did you see?!”

The Seeker chuckled, grinning wide, “I do believe so.”

“That was so cool!” Eleanor was giddy, riding on Marehis’s back.

It was…ugh, the phrase was one to ring eternal in Cassandra’s life of late…very cool. Oh! Her girls had done it! And they were safe! Cassandra could not be more grateful—they’d listened to her every instruction…with some minor creativity. Sera, in an effort to keep Eleanor back, ended up getting just within range of the Dragon’s ability to kick up wind to pull her in, and while Eleanor did not grab on to her sister…neither did that keep her from walking directly into the Dragon’s pull and follow after, drawing her sword when she caught up to Sera and screaming at the Dragon to ‘not even think about eating my sister!’

It put her girls in position to assist her in the final blow, their hands overlapping Cassandra’s on the hilt of her sword, which was genuinely of assistance—it took a great deal of effort to thrust a blade through Dragon skin—even if one is precise beyond measure and lands such a blow right between plates of scaling, into the tender webbing between…what is considered tender on a Dragon is the equivalent of a thin layer of stone, and that is over several thick layers of leathery flesh and muscle before reaching a vital organ.

“I am proud of you Sera, Eleanor. Thank you for joining us today,” Cassandra said.

“Killin’ it boss girl! Sera—serious moves out there. Have I mentioned I love the Inquisition?” The Iron Bull wondered. “cuz I didn’t kill no three dragons in a row under the Qun.”

"The lack of dragon slaying sounds like the most compelling argument I've ever heard for joining the Qun," Vivienne drawled, exhausted, brushing a glop of dragon blood, something that looked like a clot of the stuff, off of her armor. “I need a bath.”

“We’ll take like, the bathiest bath when we get back to base!” Eleanor guaranteed giddily. “Do you want help? I’ve got your back—in battle and the bathtub!”

“Darling, I do so appreciate you, but you should not belittle yourself to bathing your compatriots,” though it did give her the thought, “Hmm, Dorian would you lend me the use of your lover for bathing purposes?”

“Oh certainly,” Dorian agreed.

“I’m not a library book,” the Iron Bull half-heartedly complained.

“Of course not—Skyhold’s library hardly has such an interesting collection as the one you would be permitted in print,” Dorian assured.

“Dori, you should join them!” Sera insisted…for some reason.

“…I should?” the Altus asked.
“Yeah. Just leave all your pish in your room or whatever and go take a soak with your bestie and your boy!”

“…are you wretched results of differing-sex intercourse planning to steal my biscotti?”

Eleanor scoffed. “Bold of you to assume either of us was born and not hand placed here, fully formed, by the Maker.” The Tevinter Mage was a horrible influence, honestly.

“Yeah!” Sera was on board, “We’re the Maker’s gift to Humanity, and Elf-ity, and Qun-ity—all the itys!”

“The itty bitty ity committee!” Eleanor declared them.

“Give ‘em the damn crunch bread—that craps hard as shit, and look at ‘em,” Bull appealed to his lover, "Cute as hell, little Imekaris off their first Dragon fight—you want a cake Imikaris? I’ma bake you a cake.”

He did. He truly did. Maker bless that Qunari, he was truly beyond enthusiastic about his Dragon fighting.

All told…it was excellent cake he managed to bake in a cast iron skillet. Though Cassandra admittedly lost her appetite when word came in from Leliana.

There had been…

There was the fact-

Bah! It was two fold*. Their time in Therinfal Redoubt had left Cassandra…with a mild obsession in figuring out just what went wrong when, when had the Lord Seeker been replaced. How? Upon full examination of the situation, Envy was, at the end of the day, a shape shifter—a demon who possessed a person to learn their mind, and then used that knowledge when they took the shape of that person, moved forward in their own body. So…was he still alive somewhere, consorting with the enemy? Been in on the plan from the beginning and willingly allowed a demon to steal his identity for Corypheus’s plot? Or had it been horrific, as Eleanor’s encounter with Envy—the demon forcibly entering Lord Seekers mind and taking what he needed to move forward as the man, leaving him dead in it’s wake? If he was alive, where was he?

…which lead to the thought…where were the Seekers? Any of them, save Cassandra herself. Had they vanished? The attack on Haven had held Mages and Templars both who fell in line with Corypheus, corrupted by him—had he stolen the minds of the entirety of the Seekers of Truth? Were they working with him, or were they in hiding, biding their time before joining the Inquisition’s cause? Or were they ignoring the world’s issues in full, waiting for the dust to settle like spineless cowards?!

She’d asked Eleanor if she minded Cassandra asking Leliana or Josephine to look into her fellow Seekers whereabouts, the girl of course was immediately agreeable.

Of course, mami! Let me know if I can help!

Well. Perhaps her assistance would be necessary. Maker.

Inquisition agents were dead, because of her investigation.

Assumed dead. But…most likely dead.
Leliana sent agents to track the Seekers, there was documentation, reports, leads that told them the host of the Seekers of Truth had each separately been heading to Ferelden. And then her agents picked up on the rumor of a Bann heavily tied to the Seekers—Bann Loren. He’d disappeared, not been heard from in months, he’d not set foot out of his seat of power, Caer Oswin.

And Caer Oswin, was where all communication with their scouts died. Presumably them, with it.

They were seated around the fire, out under the stairs in their fortress walls, gathered together celebrating their successful slaying, chatting about their move forward, to Skyhold and then the Western Approach, when word came, Cassandra reading it over, hoping…well certainly hoping for better.

“Mami?” Eleanor asked curiously, sitting up—she and Sera had been seated at her side but once they finished consuming their feast, the girls laid on their backs, exhausted and ‘friggin stuffed!’. The Human girl scooted to be closer to the Seeker, eyes alight with curiosity and a bit of concern. “Is everything okay?”

She didn’t…oh Maker she did not want to tell Eleanor their people had perished.

_Cole._

_I understand. It will be okay—you can wait._

His voice in her mind was disconcerting to say the least, but she was glad of it. So, Cassandra cleared her throat, smiled for this sweet girl and said, “An update came from Leliana—I will read it in full in the morning.” she brushed a curl behind the girl’s ear, earning a smile in return as she rested her forehead against Eleanor’s, “tonight—let us enjoy our victory. I am so proud of you.” As a daughter, and an Inquisitor. Tonight she would be the former. She should be allowed that much.

“I’m proud of you too!” Eleanor enthused, snuggling against the woman, “Thanks so much for today! I feel so much better about leaving tomorrow, the Rifts are all gone, there’s less Red Lyrium, the undead situation is under control, and there’s no more big hungry creatures looking for people to snack on. They’ll actually have a shot at rebuilding, recovering from what Mayor Jerkface did.”

“I believe so as well.”

“Well then what the hell we sittin’ around for?” The Iron Bull wanted to know. “Shots!”

“Yeah!” Varric cheered.

“Where the hell’s the apple juice—you want apple juice right Imekari? Looks like whisky…”

“I love whisky!” the girl blanched a bit, “…not that I’ve ever…had…whisky. Because underage drinking is…bad?” and then she looked to the Iron Bull, “And I love apple juice too!”

“Da’vehnan,” Marehis giggled.

“My word darling,” Vivienne breathed, announcing in lofty tones, “you are as horrible at lying as you have taste in alcohol—my dear when you are capable of imbibing again, I will introduce you to white wine.”
“I would love to meet her!” Eleanor agreed. “But for now—shots! Apple juice! Hit me, the Iron Bull!”

It was admittedly fun, in its silliest form, to ‘knock back shots’ of apple juice with the girl, Sera joined them for the most part...though she did imbibe a few genuine shots of whisky, growing giggly and exuberant, though Eleanor was sober and just as giddy as she was pulled along into Sera’s tipsy dancing...Cassandra found herself dragged into the fray. Which meant Marehis must subject to it as well—Cassandra was not...shimmying around the camp fire to no music without another adult being made part of the fun embarrassment. Though even Madam de Fer allowed Eleanor a dance—proper Orlesian waltz with the Grand Enchanter taking the lead, perhaps it was a bit of practice, Bloomingtide was approaching, after all and Lady Josephine had successfully secured them invitations to the Empresses ball at the Winter Palace. A party posing as ‘peace talks’.

What was peaceful was their evening. A bit of drunken singing, dancing, celebrating their successes in Crestwood before a restful nights sleep to prepare for their journey tomorrow.

Of course...it would be most wise to detour to Caer Oswin on their return to Skyhold. So. Morning meant informing Eleanor.

But after breakfast. Immediately after breakfast. Yes there was discussion of the rout they were taking that would no longer be relevant but...

Oh, she hated this.

“Would you care for more oatmeal, Eleanor?” Cassandra offered when the girl seemed nearly done with her meal.

“Awe thanks mami, but I’m okay,” the girl cheerily declined.

“More coffee then, sweet girl?” Eleanor liked the beverage! She was not stalling.

“I still have some,” she shook her half-empty mug so Cassandra could hear the slosh of liquid before taking a sip.

Maker help her. “It needs topped off, I believe,” Cassandra sighed, frustrated. Mostly with herself. “You should remain hydrated. Have you taken your potions? It wouldn’t do to fall out of schedule.”

The girl seemed a bit confused, staring as Cassandra poured more albeit uninvited coffee into her mug. “I took them just before breakfast like normal mami,” Eleanor said softly, and then, “Is...something wrong?”

“There is a matter I must bring to your attention but I am somewhat reticent to do so, and I am stalling—toast?”

“Like toasting to something or are you offering to make me toast for the stalling thing?”

“I would accept either at this point, my uncle was notorious for his long-winded toasts.”

“...here’s to your matter and handling it together!” Eleanor cheered, raising her mug, “And...you making me toast, because I gotta feeling it’s bad news, that always goes good with carbs.”

That worked.
She carefully buttered two slices of bread before dropping them in the still warm pan and placing it over the fire. And sat in silence.

“Soooo…” Eleanor said as…well, no one was speaking, the whole of their party simply staring and waiting for something. “Is it bad?”

“Potentially,” Cassandra allowed.

“Is it about papi?” the girl worried, eyes scanning their surroundings like a question of if Cassandra needed to speak with her privately of some complication with Cullen's Lyrium addiction.

Oh! “Of course not, Eleanor. Cullen is well.” Suffering a continuous migraine for the better part of a week, ever since he'd reviewed reports from Therinfal and Haven's demise. He'd yet to say just what stressed him to the point his symptoms flared, but Cassandra was patient, he would come to her if he'd need.

“I love you, totally don’t wanna rush you, but one of my super powers right now is chronic anxiety—in my brain, you’ve found out you’re dying, the Inquisition has gone bankrupt, Skyhold is burning, and Corypheus has actually taken over the world already, I’m just in a coma and you’re about to tell me I need to wake up.”

“Damn Tumbles. Those individual scenarios or an ‘all-at-once’ thing?” Varric asked.

“Mmmm,” Eleanor hummed as if it were a decadent treat, “somehow it’s both at the same time.”

Ahh. Well, that certainly wouldn’t do. “Leliana sent word on my investigation into the Seekers disappearance…”

Eleanor listened intently as Cassandra explained Leliana’s findings…that their people had not reported in since heading for Caer Oswin.

“Well,” Eleanor decided, sipping gingerly at her coffee, “I suppose we’re off to Caer Oswin—Varric, start the books! I want to put ten silver on us…” she hmmm’d thoughtfully, “you know what, I’ve had enough negative thoughts this morning—I’m choosing to be positive. Ten silver on us not disappearing!”

“I could do with a vacation,” Dorian said, “I’ll match—ten silver we do disappear.”

Eleanor nodded, smiling as she rose to her feet, “Let’s go check it out,” she said, stretching as she stood and then, “Just a note: it’s going to be like, tremendously disturbing if every single f*cking branch of the Chantry has been conspiring and corrupted by Corypheus. I’m sorry Mami, I know they’re your co-Seekers but if they’ve gone rogue for Corypheus I’m hand kicking their traitor butts. Personally. With my sword! No magic just me,” she feigned holding her sword in hand, assuming proper form as she beat down on invisible foes, “Bam! Raaa! Hyah! ”

“You’ll show ‘em Ellie-girl,” Rainier encouraged before he looked to Cassandra, offering her a solemn nod. “We’ll get this sorted, Lady Seeker. I will pray this is all some great misunderstanding, that your comrades are safe and uninvolved.”

So did she.

Cassandra had prayed often in her life. There were times the entirety of her waking thought was one great continuous communication to the Maker, never-ending prayer, over her future, her fears, her loss. She prayed the night Haven burned, with everything, for Eleanor’s safety and it had been granted.

So she had already been granted mercy beyond measure. Asking yet another impossible thing to be provided was admittedly selfish. She did not begrudge whatever His Hand had done in this, she was sure He’d been merciful further still, even if it was not visible.

She…she walked away with her allies, with her children, and what was left of their Order in her hands.

Caer Oswin, while in the exact opposite direction of Skyhold, was at the very least close to Crestwood…not ‘exact opposite’. Eleanor did see fit to point out on their map that while it was east—it was at least ‘south east’

“So we’re already getting some of the south part down!” the girl explained as they rode along, “I can already feel my mattress! I mean I dunno if we’ll be staying the night in Skyhold, but I’m laying down for like, at least five minutes—that’s an official Inquisition mandate!”

“I’ll make certain Lady Josephine takes note, da’vehnan,” Marehis warmly assured.

They earned more than a measly five minutes in their beds.

Caer Oswin was not unlike hell. In fact it was exactly that. It was hell.

Lord Seeker was not dead.

He had betrayed them all. Led the entirety of what had been left of the Seekers to Caer Oswin, and turned them over to the Order of Fiery Promise. They’d been…oh Maker she hoped their deaths were swift. But if Daniel was any example…they had been defiled and tortured to death.

Daniel, had been tortured to death.

We Seekers are abominations, Cassandra. We created a decaying world, and fought to preserve it even as it crumbled. We had to be stopped. You don’t believe me? See for yourself.

The man had handed her their Order’s most protected writings, meant only for their leader—their highest Lord Seeker—to read.

And apparently Lucius read it, and it sent him to madness.

So it sat untouched on the floor of Cassandra’s tent. The Iron Bull and Rainier had set up their camp, and the first words Cassandra found herself capable of speaking since they left the Caer were, “I would like to be alone.”

She could not bring herself to look at any of them, even as she felt Eleanor’s lips against the side of her arm, “Go on mami, get some rest.”

She did rest, she supposed. She sat straight down on the tent floor, and laid the cursed seeming book before her. It was hardly an active afternoon.

She was thoroughly demoralized. Felt empty, like someone had taken barbs and used them to scrape every last thing in her, lines of agony torn in their wake.

What…what did this mean? What was she- was she still even a Seeker? A lone Seeker, the entirety of the Order in one woman? What was she to do with that?

“’sandra?”

Her fists clenched on reflex as she snapped, “I do believe I said I wished to be alone!”

Oh. Maker, what was wrong with her? She’d- she’d not even heard the girl come in, and Sera was standing before her, flinching at her tone, a plate in hand.

“S-sorry I um…” she fumbled with her words, panicky, ”w-w-we tried calling you for dinner- I’ll just leave this-“

“No!” Cassandra plead, though given her initial reaction, her meaning went unclear, Sera was already bending to set the plate down on the floor, ducking her head a bit as if to hide her face and Cassandra reached out and rested her hand on the girl’s forearm, “you do not have to leave, sweetheart, I- I apologize. Thank you for bringing me dinner I- I did not hear you call. Have…have you eaten sweet girl? Oh! Please sit.”

Sera nodded slowly, taking a seat on the ground. Ugh, her eyes were puffy, as if the girl had been crying earlier, just the barest bit of moisture shone along her eyeline but she was able to blink it away, oh the woman felt just…just awful she’d taken such a tone with the girl unjustly. “We already ate, food was gonna get cold and you should eat, I mean frig that…was a lot of fighting. Inky was worried.”

“She may come in as well, Maker, Sera I am sorry, I should not have snapped at you.”

“s’fine,” Sera shrugged. “Been a long day, hard. Ink’s out, passed out in her dinner, Bull and Dori got her.”

“Where is Marehis?”

“Around,” Sera shrugged. “Not a hot lung day—dusty gross fortress place full of who knows what in the friggin’ air, lots of hard crying. Breathing’s real raspy so Bull wanted to make sure she stayed warm, laid out by the fire with her, with Dori, he’s complaining ’bout how ‘domestic’ it is.”

“Eleanor is unwell?” Cassandra worried.

Sera shrugged. “Little bit, baldy says she’s okay,” the girl snorted a bit, “…he’s been givin’ Mare updates like every ten minutes.”

“If she wishes reprieve I could have words with him.”

“She’s um…kind of asking him for them half the time? So…”

Oh. Goodness. Well, that was Marehis’s prerogative. “Thank you, for bringing dinner.”

“’course,” Sera nodded. “…um…everything’s gonna be okay, you know? You’ve got us, and the Inquisition, and you’ll…I mean you’ve done a kickass job with the Templars.”

“I could rebuild the Order,” Cassandra supposed, her voice came out hallow sounding so she cleared her throat.

“You peeked at the leader book any?” Sera wondered, head jerking in the direction of the damned text.

“No.”
“Well…maybe you don’t need it,” Sera said as if it were that simple, in a way that made it feel as if it were. “I mean you can do anything you want ‘sandra. You look in the book and don’t find nothin’ worth using? Throw it away, we can friggin’ toss it in the fire or something, all that old dry paper? It’ll burn real nice. Anything useful? Use it. You can rebuild the Seekers better than they was, or start something new if you want, or just keep going with the Inquisition, go off on your own path when that’s over—fuck an Order. You’re amazing—a friggin badass warrior mum. You’ve been doin’ spectacular things all your life—nothing’s going to stop you from keepin’ on doing that. I mean shite, when I’m all ‘fully-formed grown up’? If I’m half as incredible as you, Baldy’s gonna have to grow hair and rip it out of his scalp ‘cuz the Elveh-na-na-na-na’s old fake gods people done broke out of the Fade and are blessing me for some reason.”

Oh, Maker, “Sera, I do hope you are aware that I love you. I mean truly,” Cassandra said, taking the girl’s hand. “You are already a remarkable young woman, and I am so very proud of you.”

“Oh friggin’ whatever!” the girl half heartedly snapped, blushing fiercely. “I just- I’m supposed to be cheerin’ you up!”

“You’ve accomplished cheering me a great deal.”

“You’re still not eating,” Sera complained. Ahh. She supposed lacking appetite was a symptom of melancholy.

So, Cassandra took up the offered plate, fork already sticking into a roasted potato she raised to her lips and took a bite of, offering up a small smile of thanks for good measure.

She did smile more, in good humor, when she joined the others outside the tent—for one thing there was no tomfoolery at hand, as though they were all endeavoring to be on their best behavior as to not irk the Seeker. Vivienne wasn’t one to cause issue, though she usually made some pithy comment about Cole’s proximity and the boy was currently seated practically over her shoulder as he watched with fascination the process through which Marehis was assisting the woman in a manicure. Varric? The man had taken it upon himself to sit and play chess with Thom Rainier—there was not even coin on the board and the man liked displaying just how much was at stake, so Cassandra could assume there was none, it was purely a game…just…to play the game. Solas was sitting apart from them all, meditating. And then of course, by the fire there laid the Iron Bull and Dorian, the two speaking quietly, in hushed tones as to not wake the utterly exhausted girl sprawled out on the Qunari’s chest.

“Is Eleanor well, Solas?”

Everyone kept being about their business even as Cassandra joined them, spoke. Their eyes went to her, she was certain, but it was Solas alone who answered, opening his eyes to say,

“The Inquisitor is fine—fatigued, sore. I am holding congress as I can with her magic, as is Master Pavus more directly, ensuring it is well.”

“…something wrong with Inky’s magic?” Sera asked.

“It would be wise for…Cole, or any who would join her in the Fade,” Solas spoke ambiguously as to not announce Sera’s ability to do so to the rest of the group, “to avoid doing as such until we’ve given the all clear.”

“She reached out with her magic to help that—” Dorian sighed, frustrated and his lover gave him a nod so the Tevinter man rose to his feet and stretched, drawing nearer to Cassandra and Sera to speak so he did not rouse Eleanor. “She thought she might be able to rid that Daniel fellow of the demon tormenting him. She did…ease its hold, how painful it was for him, to some degree. The demon died or, er, returned to the Fade, once the Seeker passed, but it left something dark latched to Eleanor’s magic.”

“Shite,” Sera breathed, “is that bad? That sounds bad!”

"It’s the equivalent of a magical sore or battling a cold,” Dorian assured as if that were some point of relief. And true, Cassandra supposed it could be worse but she did not like the girl having an actual cold, never mind a magical one.

It meant the girl relied on her other areas of fighting experience as they made the return trip to Skyhold, tired more easily with her magic still expelling its own energy ridding itself of whatever darkness had clung to it. And she was…well, she was normally around Cassandra more often than not, but she rode with the woman on the way home, was constantly with her, idly following her wherever she went…which meant Dorian and Vivienne became more present in the Seeker’s orbit, the pair of them taking every available opportunity when the girl was still to sit with her and commune with her magic, assist it. She was not very talkative in the slightest which…

“Okay. It’s quiet as fuck around here,” Varric complained their second afternoon on the road to Skyhold. Eleanor had fallen asleep in the saddle before Cassandra, “is the kid possessed or something? She’s acting weirder than Cole—no offense bud,” the Dwarf assured the Spirit.

“I am not offended,” Cole assured serenely from the saddle he shared with Sera, seated before her, her chin resting on his shoulder so she could see to steer their steed. “I am weird and that is good!”

“HECK yeah it is, Cuddly!” Sera encouraged, hugging the boy to her a bit more tightly.

“Has she said jack-all today?” Varric asked. “She didn’t even say good morning!”

“She is concentrating, Dwarf,” Vivienne drawled snippily, “It is no simple thing, she is not possessed, she is keeping herself from as much, a feat which requires her full focus. Do forgive her for not dropping that focus for pleasanntries.”

“I’m not complaining to be a dick about it!” Varric snapped, “I’m worried.”

So was Cassandra, admittedly. It was disconcerting, to say the least, having the girl mute and dazed, her attention only garnered during the occasional attack from bandits or wildlife, wandering almost listlessly after Cassandra like some somehow lifeless animated doll. Solas assured them Eleanor was well—of her own mind, and would be soon rid of any trace of demonic poison on her magic, he could do little more than monitor her, and Cole was capable of doing that. Still, Cassandra hoped the girl was more herself before the Elf man left them—they would be in Skyhold tomorrow. Solas had already broken off from their group, to report to the Hinterlands to aid the refugee effort there for however long it was until next he was called into the field once more. Given they were uncertain just when that would be, there was the possibility the man may not even make it all the way to the Hinterlands before he was called back, but inconvenience was part of the punishment, after all.

And then that evening, as Cassandra prepared for bed, the shadow she had in Eleanor fell into her bedroll with her, the girl snuggling up against her, eyes closed as she hugged the Seeker. Cassandra sighed softly, content as she ran a hand through the girl’s hair, and while she didn’t expect a reply,
“Good night, sleep pleasantly, sweet girl,” she murmured, dropping a kiss to her hair as she settled comfortably with the girl’s weight against her.

“He loved you very much mami,” Eleanor said quietly, her voice so very small, “Daniel. He was glad he saw you before he died and he thought about you celebrating after his Vigil. You said it was one of the best moments of your life—going through your Vigil, the moment you made it through. His was the moment he came out of the Vigil hall and you were there waiting for him—you were so proud of him and that made him proud of himself. You helped him to his room, and he was exhausted but so excited he couldn’t sleep and you stayed up with him, talking. He thought you were amazing, looked up to you, kind of like how we look up to you? Sera and me,” she sniffled, chin quivering a bit as she pressed her face against Cassandra’s shoulder.

“Eleanor, what—how do you—”

“It’s just stuff I saw,” she shrugged. “I thought maybe if I could get rid of the demon in him, he’d be able to get help, we could stabilize him with potion and get him out of there, but um…” she sniffled, “I couldn’t. I tried, but all I could manage was to kind of…quiet the demon. Make it so Daniel could think without feeling what the demon was doing to him. He died thinking about how you smiled when he came out of his Vigil. He wanted you to know that*.”

Oh. Oh Maker. Mentoring Daniel had been struggle, not unlike her initial time with Eleanor—their time together made her feel closer to Antony in a way, taking on similar a role of guidance as her brother once had for her, it pressed pain that made pure her resolve to see him complete his training with success, become a Seeker of Truth. She’d never grown quite so open as she’d come to be in her time in the Inquisition—she’d never spoken to the man of her pride, her regard for him. She was relieved that even if she never said the words, that knowledge still got through to him, and it felt like a balm soothing an ache knowing his final thoughts, that he did not die regretting his decision to become a Seeker, regret knowing her. Cassandra cleared her throat, eyes stinging with tears as she sniffled and said, “Thank you, Eleanor.”

“Inky?” Sera’s voice sounded as she came into the tent, rubbing at her wet hair with a towel, she smiled when Eleanor shifted a bit, looked upward to her, a sign she was present and engaged, no longer dazed, “Hey sweets, you feeling better?”

Eleanor nodded, yawning, “Yeah, my magic feels like it’s all mine again.”

Sera let out a happy whoop at that, sliding on her knees to join them and laying on her stomach, on top of them, Cassandra huffed as the Elf girl buried her face partially against the Seeker’s neck and partially against Eleanor’s hair, “Good! Friggin’ missed you, Ink!”

“I missed you too,” the girl said, sincerely, “gosh, that was kind of crazy. We’re…are we on the road to Skyhold? Or are we already on our way to the Western Approach? Is Corypheus dead? What year is this?”

Mildly jesting at the end, but the girl genuinely had precious little recollection of their time since leaving Caer Oswin. She seemed startled but relieved they’d be in Skyhold come morning.

“I’ve been really out of it—I promise I’ll go to bed soon mami, but there’s some paperwork things I should really catch up on first.”

“Would you care for assistance, Eleanor?” She’d made great strides with reading comprehension, writing on her own, but she did still sometimes seek guidance in expanding her vocabulary—either to say something she wished to say ‘fancier’ or to understand words she’d not encountered before that she couldn’t figure out from context. Cassandra would gladly stay up with
The girl just smiled, leaning forward to press a kiss to the Seeker’s cheek and said, “Nope! I’ve got it—you get some good sleep!” before she rocked back to somersault backward to land on her knees and rise, leaving the tent, passing Marehis on her way out and hugging the woman in greeting and farewell before wishing her sweet dreams.

The women admittedly did not sleep until Eleanor rejoined them, but whatever work Eleanor had found so pressing must not have been that great a task—she was gone all of an hour. She was out of their tent for ten minutes before Marehis whispered she could hear the girl offering pleasantries to a messenger bird, wishing it safe flight, and then Cassandra felt herself drifting off when she heard the flutter of wings, a bird crying to get Eleanor’s attention…and then it was sent off again before Eleanor was tiptoeing back into their tent, tripping on the edge of the entrance and catching herself on her hands and knees, “Shh!” the girl hissed quietly…at the offending fabric she’d tripped over, Cassandra supposed, before she crawled back into Cassandra’s bedroll. The woman kept her eyes closed, feigning sleep, though she did pull the girl closer to hold as she fell asleep. Sera had made a point to sleep alongside her since Caer Oswin, and she snuggled against the Seeker’s back.

Cole…did not forthrightly say he’d influence on Cassandra’s dreams, but she found that at any point, if her sleeping mind did take her to back to the courtyard of Caer Oswin, when she reached the crimson doors that led to the hall where Daniel perished, they always opened to reveal Skyhold, or snow-filled Haven, some pleasant memory of time with Cullen, or making play with Eleanor in the snow on her birthday.

She still had not so much as turned the cover of the Order’s book by the time they rode into Skyhold. She would…eventually. She would need to, certainly to more accurately report on just what happened, why Lucius was sent to madness.

But she should settle in, a bit. They would regroup and assess when and how to move forward with the Wardens, and she really should see how the Templars fared in this last bit of absence, and Cullen—she should make certain he was well.

She’d a great many things to do! She would get to it. She would.

Eleanor had finished the streak of riding with Cassandra, though the moment they were within Skyhold’s walls the girl was out of her saddle, startling Cassandra, Maker, she would have slowed down! She wasn’t sure if she appreciated or could curse Rainier for his training Eleanor to safely drop from a steed in motion—such a feat was meant to used in emergencies!

“Papi!” the girl called, rushing forward the meet the man, “I love you! I missed you! Corypheus is ruining, like, the entire world, I have to go fifty-bajillion-thousand miles away again soon so I’m already pre-missing you and I want to hug you so prepare yourself!”

…perhaps it was an emergency of a sort.

Cullen looked weary but relieved, grinning as he opened his arms for the girl and readily accepted her as she jumped up, wrapping her arms around his neck, her legs wrapping around his middle as she enacted her full-body hug. The Commander wrapped an arm to support her, a hand carding through her hair,

“Oh sweetheart, I’m glad you’re home safe,” he breathed, “I am sorry Corypheus is ruining, like, the entire world. We’ll set it right,” the man promised, pressing a kiss to her hair before he pulled back, Eleanor maintaining her hold even as she leaned back to look up at him as he said, “Your orders were received and will be enacted in full this evening.”

“Did the supplies come?”

“Yes—they’re…the same kind they use in Chantry, should I feel strange about using them?”

“Nah, she’ll like them even more I think?”…’she’ who would like what? “Chantry was just the fastest place I could think of that would take ‘hey! Herald of Andraste, I need like a hundred of these yesterday, thank you and be blessed’ on such short notice. You found the book you wanted?”

“I did. I appreciate your planning.”

“You’re the one who planned everything, I just helped a bit because I love you and support your goals,” Eleanor said, dropping off the man and saying, “I’m going to see Josie—Hawke and Stroud are in, right?” Cullen nodded. “Good! Mami! I’m going to mi Tia’s office and I may or may not also be on the look-out for my boyfriend so I can kiss his face—you’re welcome to join me or shadow or whatever, I’m just keeping you appraised to my schedule.”

For a moment Cassandra thought the girl was speaking to her, but of course, her bodyguard ‘mami’ was the one she was referencing. “Certainly da’vehnan—if I see your boyfriend I will certainly point him out to you so you can stay on schedule,” the Elf woman giggled as she followed after the girl already ascending the courtyard stairs.

“Tall daughter! Sera!” Cullen called, “You’re alive and well I trust?”

The Elf girl snorted, handing Russel’s reins over to one of the stablehands collecting their horses before she rushed to Cullen and gave the Human man a bracing hug. “Hiya! I’m still kickin’. Sorry um…that you sent those soldiers to Verchel and it sort of blew up with that Lord bastard.”

“You’re hardly to blame,” Cullen said, brushing the girl’s hair back out of her face, “Lord Bastard was entirely at fault—you wanted to help those people, and we did, hopefully things will be better for them moving forward. I’m pleased to have helped you, sweetheart.”

Sera blushed at that, seeming embarrassed at the man’s open affection, though she smiled, “Thanks.”

“Anything for my most wonderful child—you’re not abandoning me to go kiss some boy’s face, are you?”

“’course not…” Sera breezed, “I am abandoning you to go kiss my girlfriends faces though.”

Cullen sighed with put-upon disappointment, “Oh if you must,” he lamented, kissing the girl on the forehead, “Go on—have fun with Miss Lace and Dagna…do try to make certain your newer girlfriend does not cheerily blow up Skyhold? She was working on something earlier when I was in the smiths and it looked over-all concerning.”

“Can’t make any promises,” Sera cackled before bounding up the stairs toward the tavern in search of Harding, Cassandra supposed, the woman could often be found there when she was in Skyhold.

“Lady Seeker,” Cullen greeted with warm politeness, smiling as he turned his attention to her, “I would ask how your trip went but I’ve received two…three? Possibly five different letters on your more recent developments.”
“Possibly five?”

“Eleanor wrote me just last night, and Sera twice before her, Marehis, and there was also… Madam de Fer has never made it a point to write me, but a few days ago she did see fit to do so, casually reporting on your time in Caer Oswin—base facts we needed, that you arrived, discovered the fates of our Scouts and the Seekers, and Lord Lucius was alive but now currently isn’t—so we aren’t to pester you for the finer details unless you care to share them.”

Huh. That was…unexpectedly kind of the Grand Enchanter. “Of course…I am always here, to listen, whenever you are ready,” Cullen quietly assured, taking her hands in his as he drew near.

“Thank you,” she offered back, not quite certain just what to say beyond that. She would discuss it, certainly, just…she was still on the precipice between numb acceptance, and unrelenting grief, and there was likely a healthier peak she should endeavor to reach before spilling her truth on the matter.

But she needn’t say anything she supposed, the man dropped his voice to conspire, moving on to, “Eleanor may have dropped a hint or two you could do with a break. I would hope you’re capable of clearing your schedule this evening?”

Truly? Had this ‘hint dropping’ and mysterious ordering of candles the important work Eleanor just had to see to before bed? “…I suppose that could be arranged,” she allowed. It was easy, in fact, her schedule was wholly cleared.

Ugh, it should not be so very impactful, make her vital organs flutter of all things, just because he smiled warmly, one that met his eyes as he said, “Excellent. Would you cross Skyhold’s bridge around say…six o’clock?”

They would be leaving the premises? She would make certain Eleanor knew they would be gone, that she’d no need of them, but, “Certainly.”

“Dress warmly—it will be chilly. But I’m certain we can stay warm, and there will be sustenance where we’re going.”

“Which is…?”

“A surprise of the highest secrecy,” he assured her, “you’ve not the security clearance I’m afraid.”

That sorted she supposed, she’d business to attend that would keep her mind occupied. She’d several reports from Barris waiting for her on the desk in her quarters—Cassandra, at Eleanor’s leave, had the man run point on several missions since their time in Skyhold, two of which had been handled in her recent absence, as well as updates from Leliana, Josephine. A note from the elder Alassi, Tonio, a polite welcome back, wishing her well and hoping her journey had been safe.

There was also a small plate from the kitchens, with a single blueberry pastry atop it, and a note—Heard you were incoming and they just so happened to be making these for dessert in the kitchens—Cole said a while back, that they were your favorite so I snagged a few. Welcome back. – Krem

Snagged a few? He’d left her one, and perhaps eaten the other himself, there was just the faintest thumbprint on the edge of the note, made by a hand with blueberry filling clinging to its fingers. They were not necessarily her favorite but…they were delicious, held a bit of sentimental value she supposed. The Spirit had caught her once when she passed through the kitchens when they’d made such a treat before and the scent reminded her of Antony’s smile—her brother sharing a similar pastry with her. She’d been on her way to a meeting and when it was through, there’d been none of the pastry left, Cole offered to retrieve some for her, she’d refused at the time. It was heartening, that the Lieutenant had thought of her. Sweeter still to have somewhat shared the dessert with him.

And it tided her over, gave her a boost of sugar to put to use seeing to her correspondence, crossing Skyhold to lay eyes on her Templar recruits proper, hear from them directly, about their recent successes in Ansburg and Jader, getting a feel for...the bit of politics that might come to bear in future. From what she heard from Barris’s fellow Templars, the man was well respected, idolized...and she supposed that was reasonable.

There had been Demon Horrors rampaging in Ansburg, and a rumored Abomination in Jader—what a horrible mess that was, it could have been so much worse without Barris’s cool-headedness, he’d calmed the masses claiming some poor boy was an Abomination and realized he was merely a Mage, newly coming into his powers, the Templars made rescue of him and Barris gently explained just what was happening to the young man, and offering him a place with the Inquisition—he could train with their mages, learn to control his powers under their guidance.

And before Ansburg and Jader, there had been Val Colline—Venatori assaulted the place, raiding it, and Barris led their Templars, took the town back and initiated the relief effort the Inquisition was still enacting, helping Val Colline rebuild.

All in all...she’d a letter of recommendation heading for Eleanor’s desk—for Barris’s promotion.

One she penned very carefully, letting it consume her focus for the better part of an hour...

It should not bother here there were still two entire hours before she was to meet Cullen. Rediculous! She- she could read! Or pray, or train, or- there was any number of things she could occupy her time with other than a man!

Oh she wanted to know just where they were going and what he had planned and she wanted to already be spending time with him. What was he so busy doing?

Likely something important. It was foolishness, the impatience she felt, it not unlike some hormonal teenagers whining, honestly!

...truly.

Cassandra had no further duties to attend, so, she decided to stretch her legs further, hand deliver her letter of recommendation to Eleanor’s quarters herself, guards were posted which meant Eleanor was in and Marehis may be off elsewhere...the girl had not been alone since their first evening in Caer Bronach, so worry did tick in the back of Cassandra’s mind, in her chest, that Eleanor may be alone now...would she be alone this evening?

...perhaps, but she was not alone now, apparently.

There was just the faintest sound the Seeker could hear, of Eleanor giggling just before Cassandra knocked on the door, and once the woman did knock there was something of a ruckus—a gasp and then a crash and Eleanor shrieking which was alarming enough to send the Seeker throwing open the door and calling, “Eleanor?” as she began ascending the stairs.
“Guapo!” Eleanor hissed in quiet, giggly reprimand before calling down, “Hola mami! Como estas?”

...she wasn’t sure but she’d been around Eleanor and Lady Montilyet enough that she was vaguely certain it was a form of pleasantry, “I’m well,” Cassandra said as she came to the top of the stairs...to find Eleanor grinning and mischievous, blushing or...perhaps it was more she was flushed, recovering her breath. She was seated on the bed, legs criss-cross, hair partially out of the bun Marehis had worked it into earlier.

“Lieutenant,” Cassandra greeted, albeit amusedly, the young man trying so hard for nonchalance, casually leaning against the fireplace, a great distance from his girlfriend...who had recently found a love of moisturizing lip balm that tinted her lips just a slightly darker shade of pink than they were naturally—Cremisius Aclassi was not one for makeup, and his lips were currently looking a bit more shiny, faint lip prints on his neck just beneath his jaw and trailing down. Well then, “I trust I’m not intruding?” she asked.

Eleanor’s chirpy, “Nope!” overlapped Krem’s, “Of course not!”

“Certainly,” Cassandra chuckled. “I apologize—I was just bringing something for Eleanor’s consideration when she has the time.”

“Oh, don’t mind me, I was just about to get going myself,” the Lieutenant said, and at Eleanor’s giggle he defended, “I was!” before he crossed the room...again...to capture Eleanor’s smiling lips in a chaste kiss, “I’ll see you tomorrow.”

“It’s a date!” the girl enthused, bouncing a bit in place with her excitement as the young man left her.

“Have a pleasant evening, Cassandra, I’m glad you’re back safe,” he offered sincerely as he came to the stairs, Cassandra stopping him just a moment,

“Thank you,” she said, raising her empty hand to wipe the bit of lip stain—just that which was on his lips—in case...well, it might be discomforting for him—Dorian was very much a man and he dabbled in the use of eyeliner, lip balm, and she was certain she’d seen him applying some sort of shimmery something or other to his forehead, his cheekbones so they shone when the light struck him just right—but Cremisius didn’t, to her knowledge, and from what he’d offered up of his past, it may be disconcerting if he caught himself in the mirror with any semblance of being made up as he used to be forced to.

He blushed a bit, smiling, “Thanks.”

“Thank you for the pastry—I do hope we’ve time to catch up this stint in Skyhold.”

“Father was actually hoping you and Cullen, Ellie and Marehis would join us for breakfast tomorrow.”

“I would be glad to,” Cassandra assured, “I’m not certain of the Commander’s schedule but I’m sure—“

“You and papi will be back!” Eleanor volunteered cheerily, smiling even wider somehow, Maker.

“Will we? From where?”

“Uhhh...I dunno!” Eleanor insisted.
“You don’t?” Cassandra questioned, doubtfully.

“Gosh, you know I think my Conclave amnesia is bleeding over into all the C’s in my life, I can’t remember a single thing about my papi Cullen’s plans tonight or yours or,” Eleanor looked up to the Lieutenant, “oh my goodness! Who are you, you devastatingly handsome stranger, and what are you doing in my room?!”

The young man chuckled, shaking his head, “I was just leaving—no worries, I’m sure you’ll have your memories back by tomorrow... of the people in your life with C-names at least,” he blithely assured.

“You know,” Eleanor said, “I haven’t the slightest clue who you are or what you’re talking about, but you’re so dashing I believe you!”

“Have fun with her,” Krem offered Cassandra, patting her on the bicep as he passed, descending the stairs, “Cullen too!” These children!

Ugh. She would. Once she knew where they were going and what they were doing.

Which it seemed, she would be discovering, as it happened. Ahh well.

“I’ll not interrogate you further,” she promised the girl.

“Good! You have something for me?” Eleanor wondered.

“I do.”

The girl gasped in delighted surprise, going for theatrical as she asked, “Is it another puppy? Oh Anya will be just jealous!”

“It is not another puppy,” Cassandra assured, waving the sealed letter she held in hand, “It is nothing you need to look at right away, just whenever you’re doing paperwork next, do try to give it notice.” Though she did wonder, “Where is Anya?”

Eleanor thrust out a hand, beckoning for her to, “Gimme, gimme!” so, Cassandra passed off the letter and took a seat on the edge of the girl’s bed, which admittedly felt warmer than she’d expected- oh, huh. There was a blanket Cassandra didn’t recognize, silken evergreen material with runes she did recognize as those for fire enchantments uniformly embroidered along it in golden thread. When the woman smoothed a hand along it Eleanor beamed, offering, “It’s a gift from Cremisius!” she explained first as she slipped her thumb under the sealed edge to brake open the letter as she explained, “Anya’s with Noam*.” ...Noam? Cassandra’s confusion must have been visible, “Noam Willit—our newest mage! Anya warmed right up to him, started following him everywhere and so Delrin wrote me and asked if it was okay that Anya was hanging around him so much, if I minded her sleeping in the mages’ quarters and things like that—he’d make sure she was being fed and stuff. Noam was so withdrawn when he first got to Skyhold, he’s so shy and scared, being a new Mage, he’d a rough time of it, figuring it all out and everyone in his life turning on him because they thought he was an abomination, but having Anya around makes him feel safer, calmer, and she likes him lots! I met him today—he’s sweet.”

Ahh. The Mage who had been declared an abomination their Templars had rescued. It was certainly understandable the young man would be suffering anxiety from such an event. “It is sweet of you, to lend him Anya’s assistance, I know you miss her.”

Eleanor shrugged, “She’s a strong independent woman—if she wants to sleep with him now that I’m back, she can, I don’t mind, she knows where I am when I’m here,” she said, looking over Cassandra’s letter, she felt mildly silly sitting here while the girl did so, but it was the appropriate channel—the letter of recommendation would be part of what certified his promotion if Eleanor deemed to give him one, which, “Oh my gosh! Of course!” Eleanor answered immediately, “That’s so great!”

“You approve, I take it?” Cassandra asked.

“Uh-huh! Yeah, I’ll sign off on this—there’s like a ceremony or something right?”

“Certainly, it would be similar to when you seat yourself in judgement—we would call Barris and the Templars into the Great Hall and Cullen and myself will speak, announce the promotion, and then you will speak to your approval, anything you care to say about his service, and then swear him in.”

“I can use my throne for promotions? I should do that more often!” Eleanor enthused, “Do you want a promotion mami?”

“I believe I’ll pass.”

“Ookay,” Eleanor said, as if to say ‘if you say so’, smiling as she said, “Do0oo you want help getting ready?”

“You will not tell me where I am going?”

“Nope!”

“Very well,” Cassandra sighed. “Cullen advised me to dress warmly.”

“Your armors good but maybe drop the metal plating? You won’t need them, Cremi—” the girl slapped her hands over her mouth.

You won’t need them Cremi—Cremisius what? “…Eleanor?”

“Cremisius…is a wonderful and handsome boyfriend. I just, you know, love him so much I talk about it randomly—“

“Eleanor! You haven’t the slightest clue where Cullen is taking me,” Cassandra accused, in almost proud disbelief, “you- you misdirected me so I would not interrogate your ‘wonderful and handsome boyfriend’. Honestly!” These horrible, terrible sneaky children! The sentiment included Cullen!

“He didn’t tell me where, but it’s close by, and Papi asked Cremisius to help him make sure it’s cleared out of, you know,” Eleanor shrugged, “bandits, wildlife, anything that might interrupt, and help him set everything up.”

Cassandra shook her head. “Very well. I shall go without metal plating this evening then, I suppose.”

Eleanor nodded, a hopeful smile at her lips as she asked, “…can I do your hair?”

… “I suppose that would be appreciated.”

“Yay!” the girl cheered, rising to her feet on the bed and taking bouncing steps off to go fetch a hairbrush she meticulously cleared of hair before racing back over to Cassandra, sitting behind her on the bed and unpinning her braid so it fell from being wrapped around her head.
“You’ve got the prettiest hair! I love it!” she enthused as she ran her hands through Cassandra’s hair to loosen it out of its braid, combing lightly at the tips to rid it of tangles before pulling back a portion of her hair on either side of her face, binding it at the back of her head with a hair tie.

“So your hair’s all flowy and down but like, out of your beautiful face! Mwah!” she adorned Cassandra’s scarred cheek with a kiss as she scooted off the bed and stood before the woman, “Do you trust me? I promise I wouldn’t burn you, Vivienne taught me this little trick for styling hair with magic—calling the warmth of fire into my hand and using that to manipulate your hair’s shape and making it stay put. Can I use that on your bangs?”

“Of course,” Cassandra allowed, Eleanor’s hand did seem to be radiating warmth as she took the end of Cassandra’s bangs between her middle and ring fingers, pulling gently to press the back of her index and middle finger against the hair she was pulling taut, and after a moment she released it and then ran her fingers along the hair so it spread evenly. When she was permitted to rise and look in a mirror, her bangs no longer lay flat against her forehead, but curved softly over it, her hair in loose waves around her shoulders, down her back…it was certainly a much softer look than what she was used to sporting. And it was…nice. a different sort of fierce, there could be strength and power in softness, she’d learned.

“Gosh mami, you’re always beautiful but papi’s going to be like—super wowed!”

“Well, he’s endeavoring to surprise me, I suppose it’s only just I do the same likewise,” Cassandra said, pulling the girl against her, “Thank you, Eleanor. You will be well, this evening? Do you have any plans?”

“Girls night!” Eleanor informed her. “Lady Josie needs cheering up so Leliana and me, we’re all getting together.”

“Is the Ambassador alright?” Cassandra worried.

“She’ll be okay, she’s just got some personal things going on right now—we’ll have a meeting tomorrow to discuss our itinerary but I’m going to Val Royeaux this week.”

“Val Royeaux?”

“Uh-huh! For Lady Josie.”

Goodness. To think the girl once balked at the journey to Orlais for fear of it being ‘like a million miles away’. “Well, we’ll discuss everything tomorrow then. I trust you’ll have a pleasant evening—Cremisius knows where we are, as does Cole, I’m sure, if you’ve need of us, send for us, is that clear?”

“Si mami, I’ll be fine—don’t worry about anything, go have lots and lots of fun!” Eleanor, upon checking the time, started pushing at Cassandra gently, ushering her toward the stairs, “Enjoy yourself!” she smiled mischievously, before swatting—she swatted the woman on the behind! Encouraging, “Bring me home a baby sibling!”

“Eleanor!”

“What-anor! I’m just saying—get it!”

Get- Maker most high, help her, preserve her, and guard this horrible, precious child.

Bring home a- honestly!
She might not even— it was not as if they were insatiable, wanton, maniacs. They did not have to carry on at every available opportunity like teens mimicking heat! Even if she and Cullen were so inclined to make love, it would be safely done! Like adults!

Though… if they made love ventured ever-nearer to, if Cullen was so inclined she would bed him in the wilderness, very quickly.

The sun had all but set, the last glimmers of it disappearing as Cassandra, dressed warmly, hair ridiculous but pretty (Varric Tethras approved, whistling and doing some nonsense shooting motion with his fingers when she passed him on her way out of Eleanor’s quarters), crossed the bridge from Skyhold’s gate. Alone, unescorted. Which was certainly no trouble, but she did expect the man to meet her at the bridges end…and that was not so.

What awaited Cassandra, was candlelight. Round, white, sweetly scented candles lit a path into the darkness, off of the road from the bridge, so she followed it. It would either lead her to Cullen, or someone with his boots who walked this path setting candles in their wake.

…a path of candles that led to a circle of candlelight that Cassandra was surprised and albeit confused to find empty.

And then it was full of Cullen’s voice, as the man stepped out from behind a tree, an open book cradled in the palm of his hand from which he recited,

“On aching branch do blossoms grow, the wind a hallowed breath,”

…it is, is it?

“It carries the scent of honeysuckle, sweet as the lover’s kiss.”

The woman raised her hands to cover her mouth, uncertain if she were shocked, or about to grin unbearably—she gently pushed the man as he passed her, making a spectacle of himself, pacing as if he were on some grand stage as opposed to some stretch of woods he’d made private for them. Maker help them the man was reciting poetry. About- heavens! She would never!

Once! When Cullen was very tense and she thought it was adequate reward for his own generosity with her just the morning before.

“It brings the promise of more tomorrows, of sighs and whispered bliss!” he proclaimed, a hand raised high as he went on with his dramatics,

And then he swept around and knelt before her and Cassandra would slay the man if he dared so much as think of producing anything resembling a ring, Maker help her nervous-pounding heart.

“You can’t be serious,” she offered, finding her voice.

“I can, and I am.”

“And that is the poem you chose?”

The man smirked! Returned her snark and sarcasm with, “Do you have a better one in mind?”

…perhaps, perhaps not. She took the book he held out, in her own hands, examining the page. Huh, perhaps it did suit, just not from Cullen’s perspective. “Carmenum di Amatus?” she questioned, impressed for the fact that, “I thought this one was banned?” most Tevene literature was, in the south.

…of course there were a number of Tevinters at hand. One in particular, with a penchant for the literary-

“Dorian’s recommendation.”

Hmm, well the Altus would enjoy the Commander’s reading such a thing aloud. An attempt at a bit of mean fun at Cullen’s expense, like a prank—recommending Cullen read an albeit smutty poem written from the perspective of a man about his male lover. Tonight however… Cassandra found it fitting, so long as she stepped in, the found purchase, leaning against a tree, holding the book comfortably in one hand, the other resting at her breast—returning the Commander’s favor for an earnest performance as she read, “His lips on mine speak words not voiced, a prayer,” her eyes followed Cullen as the man passed her by, winding a path around the tree, she listened for him as her gaze returned to the page, “Which travels down my spine like flames that shatter night. His eyes reflect the heaven’s stars, the Maker’s light. My body opens, filled and blessed, my spirit there.”

Just the barest sound of his footfalls behind her, warm breath on the back of her neck,

“Not merely housed in flesh,” he recited from memory, whispered, “but brought to life.”

Well then.

“Shall we read another?” Cullen wondered quietly playful, eyes alight with amusement and something Cassandra only saw there when he looked at her, something that wanted and waited for her to satisfy it.

And so she did, casting the book aside in poor fashion she may feel badly for later if it is damaged, but that was not her most current concern. Cullen had no Eleanor to recommend he leave metal plating for the field of battle, not the field he converted into something of a bedroom, clasps seemed all the more tricky when you desperately wanted them undone.

The man had not been lying when he spoke of sustenance before. He did intend a picnic, once they got around to it—Cassandra had not found herself ravaged on the forest floor…there was a blanket, thick and warm they laid upon, nearly fell asleep upon all said and done. Maker, she’d not- she had never before indulged in such a relationship—one with quite so much open closeness, and certainly not one that…she’d had clear, concise lays, in the past. ‘We will meet here, at this specific time, for this exact amount of time, and go our separate ways’. This was…walking into a situation with the resolve that they might not do anything more than be in each other’s presence tonight, and all of five minutes later all bets, and clothes, are off. It was admittedly terrifying, in its own respect, to want someone in such a way that it was all consuming when it wished to be, logic and forethought be damned. It was…

The very sort of thing she had read about, in her many books. It was the very thing she’d sought, wanted from a relationship if she so chose to commit to one. If she was going to pursue such a thing—a continuous, committed, romantic relationship—it had better be the ideal romance and nothing less.

This felt very ideal, and something more.

There was a gentle tap of index finger against her forehead, Cullen’s eyes peering into hers as he smiled warmly, amusedly, “You…are thinking way to hard about something. Whatever is on your mind?”

“I am not thinking hard,” she assured him. “I’m merely thinking.”

“Intensely,” he argued.

“Actively,” she corrected. “Would you prefer me capable only of the occasional passive thought?”

“Perish the thought,” he whispered, chuckling lowly before he smiled against her lips, a gentle kiss he pulled away from with, “Anything you care to share?” he wondered gently, brushing the back of his hand down the line of her cheek, she indulged in pressing a kiss to the palm of his hand before drawing closer to settle in, resting against his chest.

“I love you.”

“I love you,” he returned sincerely, dropping a kiss to her hair before saying, “…you seemed mildly panicked earlier, when I knelt? That I might be offering you jewelry?”

…”I was not panicked-“ she defended, ugh, his laughter shook her slightly, and he pressed his lips against the top of her head as if to hide his smile, though she could very well fell it as he took a moment before assuring,

“I’d not a ring in mind…not presently. But I would like to gift you something.”

“…is it a puppy?”

“Mmm…no, but do not tempt me,” he warned, offering like conspiracy, “I find Skyhold’s mabari-cat ratio disconcerting,” he grinned when she huffed, and pressed on, “No, actually, what I had in mind…was this.”

…she was not certain where on his person he’d just retrieved the item was, they were both wholly naked, and yet he had some sort of coin in his hand, showing it to her.

“Do you presume to pay me for my services?” it did not even look like proper currency.

“Oh, Maker- I did not mean to insinuate-“ he sighed when he realized she was teasing, ”I’m not even sure it’s of any worth,” he explained, “save sentimental.”

“I did not mean to make mockery,” Cassandra quietly assured, raising a hand to trace a finger along the token in Cullen’s hand, “it has sentimental value?”

“I love my brother and sisters but…they can be very loud. I used to escape to this dock on a lake near our home, this perfect, peaceful place I could always go to clear my head. No matter my anxieties, whatever burden, I could go there and for a time, everything could fade away,” a rueful grin quirked at his lips as he drawled, “of course, my siblings always found me.” Ahh. “The day I left for Templar training, I went to that place, one last time in the event I may not get the chance to return to it. My brother found me, and he gave this to me,” he explained the coin, “It just happened to be in his pocket, but he said it was for luck. Templars, as you know, are not supposed to carry such things. our faith should see us through.”

Cassandra could not help her smile, “You broke the Orders rules? Why Commander, I am shocked.”

“Until Kirkwall, I was very good at following them, most of the time. This was the only thing I took from Ferelden that the Templars didn’t give me,” he said, “You…you walk into danger every day, guarding Eleanor in the field. Every time you leave…well, it is hard, and it is always a blessing to have you safely return, but I do worry. I thought…perhaps, if you cared to indulge me, you having this, the token I’ve had on me—through…Kinloch Hold,” he spoke the name carefully. “Kirkwall, the Conclave, Haven’s fall. Well…”

“It has kept you remarkably safe, I should say,” Cassandra said, taking the coin in hand and examining it before closing her hand around it, “I’m certain at Eleanor’s side I’ll more than test its miracles.”

“Do your worst,” Cullen permitted, pressing a grateful kiss to her lips before he breathed his, “thank you. I know it isn’t real, but it is still a comfort to me.”

“Perhaps there will be a break of pace, and you’ll be able to journey to your peaceful place, that lake, find some reprieve from your worries.”

“Perhaps,” Cullen allowed, “though there is little need. I’ve rather a similar place here, to go to when I’ve need to clear my mind.”

“…you come here? To this clearing?” the place did seem well tamed, but they’d only just made certain of that, Cassandra thought.

“I’m speaking of the woman in the clearing, Cassandra,” the man assured, “you…are my peaceful place.”

“You…are utterly ridiculous,” Cassandra assured him likewise.

“Oh most certainly. That does not make it any less true,” he said, “…if I could ever offer you the same…just know, Cassandra that if you need me, I am here. I am always here, to listen, whenever you are ready.”

Ahh. ”Thank you, Cullen. Caer Oswin was difficult. I will decide how to move forward, and I appreciate that I can rely on you.”

“You are an incredible woman, and I’ve no doubt you will take this downfall to build something amazing. The Inquisition was ruin, the Divine who ordered it, dead, our only semblance of hope a strange mark on a young girl’s hand. We have all done our part but you, Cassandra, you did this. You kept the Inquisition together and moving forward in the face of Chantry backlash, and you have been there every step of the way, building what we have today. You, are unstoppable at whatever you put your mind to. So take the time you need, arm yourself with knowledge, and when you see what must be done, you will do it.”

“You will stop this instant, or I will…become emotional,” cry, embarrassingly enough, and she would not have it! “and you will have to be punished for it, and that would be poor, but necessary reward for your kindness.”

“It is not kindness. It is truth,” the man insisted as he sat up, Cassandra with him, and he pressed a kiss to her forehead, hand carding through her hair, “But it wouldn't do, to see you emotional,” he teased. “I wouldn’t want to risk falling out of such a beautiful woman’s good graces. Have I told you that you look ravishing tonight?"

“You’ve expressed the sentiment in several ways this evening, save for words.”

“How neglectful of me—you are breathtaking,” he whispered, smile on his lips as he rose to his feet, leaving her momentarily as he sauntered, naked as the day he was born, to fetch a basket he’d left nearby, returning and armed with it, and another blanket he draped over Cassandra’s shoulders as he resumed his seat at her side. “And likely hungry, so, dinner is served,” he informed her, opening up the basket, first and foremost, handing her a…very lovely bouquet of pink roses. Andrasten, like the candles, though that did not mean they came from the Chantry—they were—they were costly, ridiculous things! Beautiful, and she was wholly flattered but- Maker!

“How neglectful of me—you are breathtaking,” he whispered, smile on his lips as he rose to his feet, leaving her momentarily as he sauntered, naked as the day he was born, to fetch a basket he’d left nearby, returning and armed with it, and another blanket he draped over Cassandra’s shoulders as he resumed his seat at her side. “And likely hungry, so, dinner is served,” he informed her, opening up the basket, first and foremost, handing her a…very lovely bouquet of pink roses. Andrasten, like the candles, though that did not mean they came from the Chantry—they were—they were costly, ridiculous things! Beautiful, and she was wholly flattered but- Maker!

“Cullen!”

“Eleanor has a gardening friend from Val Royeaux—who just so happens to apprentice under Empress Celene’s Royal Botanist*. She wrote him, and he set me up in rather generous fashion.”

Well then…she supposed that sorted. She indulged in breathing in their sweet fragrance, petals soft against her nose before she favored the man a smile, teasing, “They are gorgeous, but they’re hardly an appetizer—dinner was served, you said?”

“I did, and it is—proper Orlesian style where the first course is always meant to merely be viewed and not eaten. Adapted with my Ferelden sensibilities—I find it a terrible waste to use food for it,” he pulled a covered tray out from the basked, “your second course, milady.”

Ahh. Cheese on points of toast, that Cassandra could certainly eat. “Wonderful,” she said, and she reaching out to rest a hand on the man’s knee, “Cullen—thank you.”

“Just wait ‘til you see what’s for dessert.”

“I am serious,” Cassandra insisted, curling up against him as they settled more comfortably for their meal, “this has been a welcome reprieve. Thank you, for thinking of me, arranging all of this.”

He wrapped an arm around her shoulders, pulling her closer, assuring, “You’re most certainly welcome.”

She’d missed Skyhold—she missed her family and her friends, her boyfriend, her puppy!

Papi was off getting ready for tonight probably, and mami had work to catch up on, Sera was chasing after her girlfriends and her boyfriend and her puppy were no where in sight…but she had mami Marehis! The ultimate bonus of having double mamis! There was always one around!

And double Aclassi men! Cremisius might be off in the wind, but that was fine—the Aclassi men got even better with age! Tonio Aclassi was better any day! At least until Cremisius was back in kissing range. But for now, Ellie could hear Tonio’s voice through the door from the Great Hall—the inner door to Josie’s office was wide open and Ellie just caught, “…troubling you, my lady. You have my ear—if I can be of any help whatsoever, I would.”

So she stopped right in her tracks, Marehis bumping into her and raising her hands to rest on her shoulders, but she so was not interrupting because she heard sniffling and,

“That is generous, Mister Alassi,” Lady Josie said, “you’ve been very kind. I apologize, I did not mean to— it has been a trying week.”

“Oh, do not trouble yourself—everyone deserves a good cry now and again.”

“Oh,” Josie sighed with some effort, through a sniffle, wiping at her eyes with her hands before fanning at her face, “I really must compose myself—Eleanor is set to return today and I would like a moment of her time if she can spare it. Oh, I cannot allow myself to be seen like this.”

“You are lovely as ever Lady Montilyet, you needn’t fret so.”

“You’re much too kind.”

“You’re much too hard on yourself.”

“Inquisitor!” a cheerful voice chirped, oh crap! Well not crap—Molly! She was the sweetest! But crap for getting caught—who put stairs to the basement and kitchens in this little nook between the great hall and Josie’s office?! Mythal, probably. Well Ellie was going to have some prayers for her later!

“Hiya Molls, I just got back—like just now, just got here, just this instant! Hi! Wow, you look super pretty today!”

The serving girl blushed at that, ducking her head shyly as she hugged the bundle of folded sheets in her arms a bit, “Thank you, my lady. I’m so pleased you’ve returned—do you need anything at all? I’m just running these up to Madam de Fer’s. She ordered it done before her return and she…scares me.”

“…then I’d run like, run! ‘cause we just got in and I’m not sure how long she’ll be chatting up people in the library—turn right at the top of the library stairs and go that way, she won’t see you if she’s talking to Enchanter Fiona.”

“Oh, Maker bless you,” the girl said, dipping a curtsy, “Have a wonderful day,” before scurrying off.

And then Mister Aclassi…after it sounded like he’d landed on his feet and crossed the room, like he’d been sitting up on Lady Josie’s desk, appeared in the doorway, blocking it more like, like he was trying to stall. “Eleanor! Oh bella, you’ve returned!”

“Hola Mister Alassi!” Ellie greeted cheerily, hugging the man—he was a good bit taller than her and she went along with giving Josie a bit more privacy so she didn’t tippy-toe it, just hugged him right around his middle, her face pressed against his chest before she pulled away, looking up at him, “How’ve you been? I missed you!”

“Oh my dear girl I missed you as well,” the man assured, looking flattered at the thought she’d missed him, awe! “I’ve been well, business has been growing splendidly—I’ve assistants now. Paid assistants whom I did not have to bring into this world myself and wait until they were higher than my knee to put to work!”

Ellie giggled at that, “Oh gosh, that’s so great! I’d love to meet them!”

“Certainly—please, do feel free to stop by my workshop any time my dear,” Tonio invited.
“Marehis, I’m pleased to see you’ve returned as well, you were safe?”

“As safe as my sweet girl,” Marehis answered truthfully, wrapping her arms around Ellie’s shoulders and swaying a bit as she smiled, “I’m glad to hear things are going well for you Mister Aclassi.”

“Oh do please call me Tonio—you’ve insisted I call you Marehis. Lady Pentghast is returned as well, yes? Cremisius is running an errand for her right now. Or, for the Commander I think…” he said as if he weren’t quite sure. “He rushed off from breakfast this morning after filling me in on the details but he was rather hurried about it.”

“Mami’s back too, yeah,” Ellie nodded. Gosh, that was so sweet of Cremisius! Boyfriend points he lost for not automatically knowing the instant she was in-range and impatient to kiss his dumb, handsome face were re-given, with bonus points! Helping papi! Helping papi woo Cassandra!

“Excellent! I was hoping perhaps the four of you would like to join Cremisius and myself for breakfast tomorrow morning?”

“Oh gosh, that sounds great!” oh! “Can we?” she checked with Marehis- oh, she might not feel like it’s polite to refuse to his face if she didn’t want to, but she seemed genuine as she said,

“Certainly da’vehnan—thank you, Tonio.”

“Of course,” he said, smiling wide, gosh! He looked so handsome—he was starting to look a lot healthier than he had when he first got to Skyhold, his color returned, hair seemed a bit thicker, and he had more fullness in his face.

Oh she wanted him and Josie together so bad! There was no way he was secretly a Dalish god!

…okay so much crazier things had happened since the Conclave, there was always at least a minor chance he could be. Heck, he could be the Maker incarnate at this point and it honestly wouldn’t faze her.

“Is that Eleanor?” Lady Josie asked, ready to be seen, Ellie supposed, there was the soft click of her heels against stone and the woman appeared at Tonio’s side, her eyes were just a little bit red but other than that, there wasn’t any sign she’d been crying as she smiled warmly, reaching out for Ellie, “Oh my Lady, I’m so pleased you’ve returned!”

“Hiya Josie! Gosh I missed you!” Ellie insisted, hugging the woman tight, little bit more effort because she was sad! And Ellie was going to, in the least nosey way possible, figure out how to help her! She pressed a kiss to the woman’s cheek before pulling away and saying, “Gosh you look so beautiful today!”

“Thank you, Eleanor, you’re lovely likewise,” the Antivan woman assured, blushing a bit at the compliment. “Are you here to see me by any chance?”

“Uh-huh! I just got in and I missed you! So I thought I’d stop in and catch up—is that okay?”

“Oh! That’s…that’s actually excellent my lady- I mean that would be excellent all of the time, but it’s particularly-” Lady Josie shook herself, restarting and explaining more calmly, “I was meaning to catch a moment of your time—would you care to join me?” she invited Ellie in.

“Of course!” Ellie said, taking Josie’s arm and giving it a squeeze, trying to be reassuring.
Josie seemed…gosh she seemed so nervous as they sat down at her desk.

“I just need to grab my ledger and then I’ll be out of your hair,” Tonio assured as he scurried over to his desk and took up the wide leather book laying atop it, tucking it up under an arm as he offered, “Shall I send for anything for you ladies? Something to drink—to eat?”

“Oh! Yes, mijita, have you eaten?”

“We had breakfast before we set out—“ Ellie started.

“You must be famished! Oh, Tonio, would you send for refreshment? It’s hardly in your job description.”

“It’s no trouble, I would not have offered if I was not pleased to do so,” the man assured, “It was wonderful to see you bella mia—if I see my Cremisius I will send him your way.”

“Gracias!” Ellie said, “You just got promoted to my favorite Aclassi!”

“And I cherish that promotion, however long it may last,” he chuckled, taking his leave and closing the door to Josie’s office behind him.

“Gosh, he’s the sweetest,” Ellie giggled, “has everything been going okay—you two sharing workspace?”

“Oh certainly,” Josie nodded, “he’s more often in his workshop, and Mister Aclassi has been very considerate, and his services have appealed to many of my guests, and he’s so very polite, he’s been an excellent help in hosting our allies, making a good impression. Just last week I was at my wits end with Lady Cordelia and Tonio stepped in—asking her about her gown and talking a bit of shop with her to give me a moment’s break from her…trying nature.”

“I’m so glad—not that you had to deal with a trying ally, I don’t know how you do it constantly, seriously you’re an actual saint—but it’s great Tonio’s been such a great help! He seems to be adjusting well.”

“He’s thriving, I’m…I’m very proud of him,” Lady Josie confessed, blushing a bit.

…she wanted to smoosh them together so bad!

Molly was back! This time with a big tray laden with a pot of tea and cups, a platter with a pile of neatly stacked finger sandwiches they munched on, chatting politely while Josie seemed to collect her thoughts.

But between the three of them, the sandwiches disappeared and the tea was drained. Josie cleared her throat, hands fidgeting momentarily before she looked to Ellie, mouth working like she was just prepared to speak.

“You’d something you wanted to talk to me about?” Ellie offered gently.

Josie gave her a grateful smile, though she sounded embarrassed as she spoke—as if confessing, “I…must explain something first, about the Montilyet’s fortunes.

Her family’s fortunes? Hmm… “You’ve mentioned they used to have ships—that they’re into trade?” that was all Lady Josie had ever said about her family’s money to Ellie. She was Lady Josie, so Ellie figured she was well off, she was always dressed nicely with her jewelry and everything.
We are—in trade. However my family has been forbidden from trade in Orlais for quite some time. It..." she seemed like she felt awkward to talk about this with Ellie, “it devastated our finances. The Montilyets have, in fact...been in debt for over a hundred years.”

Oh...oh gosh, “Debt? Is it bad? Gosh, I’m so sorry, I had no idea, Josie if you need a raise—”

“Do not trouble yourself, I’m not asking for such—there are precious few outside of our family that know our situation,” Josie explained, “for generations we’ve done everything to keep creditors at bay. Sold our lands to stave off interest. It is...it’s just infuriating to see my family reduced to this!” she vented, sighing, “I’m to become head of our house. If I sell any more of our land, my family will become destitute. That cannot be my legacy to them.”

Ellie gasped, “Destitute? J-Josie gosh I- Tia! Why haven’t you said anything before?! Do they...I mean they’re eating, right? Is this turning into a ‘we don’t know where the next meal is coming from’ situation like now, because they...I know Haven became dangerous but we’ve a solid fortress here in Skyhold—you’re family would be safe, they can come be here with you for however long they needed.”

Oh, crap—she hadn’t meant to make the woman feel badly or embarrassed, but Josie’s face went bright red and she ducked her head-

“I do not believe you share the same definition of ‘destitute’, da’vehnan,” Marehis said quietly...she kind of sounded angry about it?

“I am not- I’m not blind, I understand there are worse- I realize to whom I am speaking,” Josie said, half-heartedly defended, “that is part of why I am remiss to bring it to Eleanor’s attention,” she looked to Ellie again, “We would not be paupered, Eleanor, but my family...has a certain manner to which they are accustomed and to take them from that...I worry. My sister is...” it seemed like she wanted to say something a bit more harsh, but she settled for, “young, flighty, lost in her daydreams. My brothers are trying to rebuild our fleet with their own hands,” her eyes misted with tears, “is it wrong to hope they never know hardship?”

Well...no, Ellie wouldn’t want any of the people she loved to struggle, it sounded like Josie had taken so much on herself with their welfare, it had to be stressful and scary. “I understand this was difficult for you to open up about, Josie. Thank you. If...if there’s ever any way I can help, please, just say the word.”

“I did not fumble through all this for ventings sake,” Josie assured her, seeming frustrated as she said, “I’d almost solved our problems, for a while. I negotiated a chance to reinstate the Montilyets as landed Traders in Orlais. We could rebuild with that. But when I dispatched paperwork to Val Royeaux—” she closed her eyes, bowing her head a bit as she said, “I’ve just learned my carriers were murdered, and the documents restoring my family’s trading status destroyed.”

“Like- like they were murdered just so the documents could be destroyed?” Ellie asked, aghast. Maker. “Who would do such a thing?”

“Leliana made inquiries that bore success. A Comte Boisvert, a nobleman in Val Royeaux, reached out to me personally, and claims to know who killed my messengers. I wrote to him and he refused to speak on the matter through correspondence, so I arranged to meet with him but he...has a request,” Josie awkwardly confessed, “That you come when I meet with him, so he’s seen publicly conferring with you.”

“Me?” Ellie asked. Oh. Inquisitor, duh. And then she and Marehis spoke in unison, just Ellie’s, “Of course!”

Opposite, Marehis’s, “Absolutely not!”

Oh. Oh whoops.

“I understand it is not ideal—” Josie started.

“Not ideal?!” Marehis raised her voice! “Da’vehnan, sweet girl, stay. You are no longer a part of this conversation,” she said…very firmly, her tone sort of made the hair on the back of her neck stand on end, “—allow me to assess a few things before you give your word to something, it is a matter of security. If you’d just stay right here? Lady Montilyet—a moment?” Marehis rose, gesturing to the door to the left of her desk that led to the hall to the War Room.

Which is where Ellie thought they’d go to speak but when Josie nodded and followed after the Elf woman, the moment the door was closed behind them Ellie could hear,

“Have you lost your every sense?!” Mami! “I’ve heard nothing of this request from Leliana so correct me if I’m wrong—you’ve not checked with her before bringing this up to Eleanor! This Comte you don’t even know is claiming some knowledge as to who murdered your messengers demands you meet with him in person—what if he murdered them himself?! He could be connected to anyone in the world—to Gaspard who has, on more than one occasion, directly set assault upon my child I- I cannot believe you would make this request to her face without so much as- Josiphene! This is reprehensible! This could endanger her—I do not know we could approve such a journey and you’ve presented it to her! Now, she will be dead-set on assisting you! If Leliana and myself feel she should not go, she will be guilt ridden if we do not permit her to go for fear of her safety or she will go despite our warnings, compromise what precious little security we can provide her in this life! You, have compromised that!”

“What am I supposed to do, it is my family, Marehis—this was an attack against them! People who worked for me are dead, I am aware this could be a trap but I do not believe he would do so publicly- but I- I do understand- I am sorry. I should have run this by you before bringing it to Eleanor’s attention.”

“You should have run it by me, allowed me to properly investigate the matter myself, waited for my approval or lack there of, and proceeded accordingly with whatever my verdict was!”

“The assault was on my families affairs I did not perceive this to hold a possible threat to Eleanor-“

“I did not sleep with the Dread Wolf because I was enticed by the threat he so obviously was to my child! I do believe we’ve well learned enemies can come from anywhere!”

“I’m sorry. Marehis, truly. I’ll rescind my plea to Eleanor, and if you would be so kind, do please investigate the Comte for corruption, and if you are unsatisfied with her safety I…I’ll figure something out.”

Mami sighed, gosh, she sounded tired. “You’ve met Ellie, yes?” she offered a bit of a laugh, “Right now she’s likely thinking of seven different ways to help you,” three! Two of them involved different ways of sneaking around behind Mami’s back to help so…if she was on board, those were out! “you’ve spilled the pot, there’s precious little we can do but mitigate the situation—you will have appropriate security and I will not stand idle by while you take Ellie to meet some stranger—I am sitting in on this meeting and that’s final.”

“Of course, absolutely—thank you, Marehis.”

“I hope this is worth it.”

“I do understand this seems frivolous. I assure you I’m wholly demoralized for coming to Eleanor of all people for this. ‘Please help me regain my families vast wealth so we do not have to downsize from our illustrious lifestyle’ on its own sounds materialistic, to make the appeal to a girl who has known poverty and homelessness the bulk of her life? If I did not believe this was what was best for my family, I promise you, I would not be going to such lengths.”

‘Our’ illustrious lifestyle? Ellie…she didn’t think Josie was leading that illustrious of a life. She worked really hard for the Inquisition, like…constantly. So much she was worried the woman didn’t sleep or eat nearly enough. And she…she’d seen to it Ellie had been outfitted, gotten a wardrobe, but Josie wore more or less the same thing over and over again, alternating every once in a while, and she never smelled or anything, kept her clothing clean and tidy. And she never did anything…for herself. Ellie wasn’t sure what she did with her paycheck but she had a good idea now, every penny went to keeping her family afloat in one way or another.

“I didn’t mean to sound judgmental before, your problem is not frivolous, Josie. I apologize if I insinuated otherwise.”

Mami seemed a lot more calm when she and Josie returned, resuming their seats while Ellie did her best to look like she hadn’t heard a thing. Because she hadn’t! She didn’t even have ears!

“So…when does this Comte want to meet?” Ellie asked.

Josie sighed as she sat, “As soon as possible.”

“Cool! Oh gosh! We’ll be in Val Royeaux together! That’ll be so much fun!”

Josie offered a small smile at that, it even reached her eyes a bit! “Oh, certainly. I would be pleased to take in the city with you, mija. Thank you for assisting me with this, I’m truly grateful.”

“Mmmm I wouldn’t be too grateful,” Ellie warned, fighting a smile as she informed the woman, “Between you and Madam de Fer and Leliana, I’ve gotten a decent idea of how the Game works. I’m already in it, and this is just another play as far as I’m concerned. You need this from me, so now, you owe me a favor.”

“Oh! Of course, Eleanor.”

Ellie hopped up from her seat, hands splayed on the Ambassador’s desk as she leaned across it to press a kiss to the woman’s cheek, “I’m cashing in! I want a girls night—no arguments ‘cause it’s my favor so you gotta! You and Leliana meet me for dinner in my room—bring jammies! Prepare to be pampered!”

Josie raised a hand to her mouth, a few giggles escaping before she began full on laughing, “Oh, Eleanor. Sweet child—I did not think you would ask anything untoward of me, but Maker,” she wiped at her eyes a bit, “Alright. This will be something of a genuine favor—persuading Leliana to join us will be quite the task.”

“I believe in you!” Ellie assured. “Was there anything else you needed? I wanna check in on Gare and Stroud, and I’m on the look-out for my boyfriend if you see him.”
“Oh, Ser Hawke and Stroud have been holding congress in the tavern since their arrival,” Josie said, “Cullen and Cremisius have been in and out of Skyhold all day doing something that is, to quote our illustrious Commander: none of my ‘beeswax’. If the Lieutenant comes this way I’ll certainly send him along.”

Cremisius was the best!

“Thanks!” Ellie said, Marehis rising to follow her out.

“Certainly, Eleanor,” Josie said, though, “I would…I would appreciate if what we’ve discussed here remained between us as much as possible? I…truly, there are precious few who know my family’s situation.”

Oh…oh! “So…Leliana…does she know?”

Josie’s gaze dropped to her hands, seeming shy, embarrassed, “She worries for me enough as it is. It was by the grace of Andraste that she did not discover just what business I had my couriers handling, she assumes it is Inquisition business as usual, that the attack was nothing personal against my family’s interests. If she knew…if she knew the pressures on me to right this for my family- I would just prefer she didn’t, if that were at all possible.”

“Easy peasy!” Ellie chirped, because she! Had! Ideas! “Mami and I’ll set up security things—they won’t be in the know about your situation either, promise! And if Leliana asks…well…do you trust me?”

“Certainly.”

“I’ve got a plan—leave it to me!” she assured, holding out her unmarked hand, pinkie finger extended.

Josie breathed a sigh of relief, wrapping her pinkie around Ellie’s, “Thank you, Eleanor.”

Ellie nodded, but, “Um…just- I would never ever go back on my word, but…maybe you should tell Leliana? I know she worries, but she only does that because she loves you—you’re her best friend. I know if I had a problem like this, I could go to Sera, and yeah she’d worry, but she’d probably feel a lot better about it if…well if she found out later, once it was resolved, she’d be happy for me, but she’d probably feel like I don’t trust her, or I don’t feel like I can rely on her, and she’d wish she could’ve helped me, and the same goes for me if roles were reversed. Just think about it, okay?”

The Antivan woman grimaced a bit, but nodded, “…I will consider it. Gracias, mija. Do have a pleasant day—I will see you this evening.”

Ellie nodded, taking Marehis’s arm as they left Josie’s office. “Okay—Tavern! You feel up to it mami? Um…I mean Cole’s around, and we know just about everyone in Skyhold if you need a break~”

“Oh, do you wish privacy da’vehnan? I would merely shadow you~“

“Oh gosh, no, it’s not like I want you to follow- or that I don’t want you here, it’s just…I dunno, you work all the time too. If you needed a break, that’d be understandable. You seem kind of um…tired.”

“I’m well sweet girl,” the woman sighed a bit, “I was merely concerned, I do not appreciate negligence of your safety,” she said, hugging Ellie’s arm a bit, “I am perhaps experiencing a bit of
You can have time off whenever you need it mami. I mean I know we’ve talked about this before and you don’t mind being with me all the time, but just because you don’t have to go places with me, doesn’t mean we can’t still spend time together! I mean there’s lots of people who can step in to follow me directly—you’d still be my favorite though!” she promised.

“I’ll think about it, da’len. Just…oh, if anything happened I would never forgive myself for not being there. And too…I worry so, time would hardly be a break, I would merely be worrying.”

“Cole can always give you updates—whenever you get worried, he’ll come tell you I’m okay! Or he can come get me and I’ll come assure you myself!”

“I’ll consider it, sweet girl. Thank you, for thinking of me.”

Well of course! “You’re always thinking of me!” So was,

“Oi! I was just thinking of you sweets! Get over here Inky, join the party!” Sera invited loudly as Ellie and Marehis entered the Tavern. Sera and Dagna were over at the bartop with Garette and Stroud, “Mustache here’s finally starting to loosen up!”

“I laughed at Hawke’s jest, I’m Human afterall,” the Grey Warden softly defended, sipping at his drink before he startled, “Oh! My Lady, Inquisitor- ahh. Inky?”

“S’not short for Inquisitor!” Sera complained, though she snorted, “Inky is short for an Inquisitor though.”

“Hey!” Ellie argued playfully, “You come down here and say that to my face!” she giggled, hopping up onto a stool next to Hawke, “Hiya Gare.”

“Hiya half-pint—buy you a whole pint?” he offered, slapping coin on the counter.

“Mmmm if it’s orange juice, I’m in!” Ellie agreed.

“Changing it up on me today huh?” Cabot asked from behind the bar, wiping out a mug, “Oh the excitement. I do live for the days your preference in juice changes—what’ll it be tomorrow.”

“My foot in your ass juice if you don’t play nice with the kid,” Hawke warned.

Sera snickered, “Ass juice.”

“Da’assan, that’s disturbing,” Marehis complained.

“So…what’s new with you two? I’m so glad you made it here safe—are you liking Skyhold?” Ellie asked Hawke and the Warden.

“We’ve been made very welcome, thank you,” Stroud said, raising his mug to her.

“This was way hotter when I was Varric’s dirty little secret though,” Hawke said.

“Not that secret—mami knew you were here like, two minutes after you got here last time,” Ellie said.

“Hmmm mami…Seeker Pentaghast?” Garette checked to make sure, “Opposite Cullen who you call ‘papi’?”
“Uh-huh! Don’t cause them any trouble today okay, they’ve got a date tonight, mami really needs it.”

“Oh my god he’s dating Seeker Pentaghast and he’s got a kid. What the hell? You think you know a guy—if you told me the day I met Cullen that he’d one day up and turn his back on the Order, bag a woman like the Lady Seeker and be a father?” Hawke whistled, pitching low.

“Maker.”

“I get up to take a leak and the brat steals my seat!” Oh! Varric! He was approaching, er, returning, Ellie supposed.

“Whoops! Just keeping your seat warm!” she assured, hopping down and patting the stool in invitation.

Of course, once he was seated, “Oof!” he grunted as Ellie climbed back up to sit in his lap, though his arms went around her middle to hold her securely, chin resting on her shoulder, “so, what were you gabbing about?”

“Gare’s last visit here—though I was politely working to…when are you leaving?” Ellie asked their guests, “Not that I’m sick of you or anything, just, it’d be cool to know when I have to go to the back-assward Western Approach.”

Stroud filled her in while she sipped at her drink. There was some kind of moon cycle nonsense—they needed to meet at the ritual tower on a day the moon was rising in some such house with some such fullness. Which would be the 18th of Cloudreach, a week and a half away. So…cool! The planets were literally aligning for this!

“Hey mami? Would it be okay to stop by Mister Aclassi’s shop really quick?” Ellie asked Marehis.

“Certainly, da’vehnan.”

“Oi!” Sera called, ”Thank ‘im for the sweet duds! I got in to this bangin’ wardrobe upgrade waiting in my room with a birthday letter from him! Thanks to you too, Mare’!”

“Of course sweet girl, you’ll have to let us see sometime!” Marehis insisted.

“Woah woah wait—you’re- are you with Cul- does that bastard have two-?” Hawke…didn’t seem capable of forming coherent sentences just now. Oh gosh! Did he think Marehis was with papi?

The Elf woman giggled, offering a wink as she said, “The Commander is a very handsome man,” and simply left it at that, wrapping an arm around Ellie’s shoulder’s as she ushered her from the Tavern to Hawke’s bellowing,

“What?!”

Ellie giggled, oh gosh that was fun! She was pretty sure Hawke’s jaw was on the floor! Her papi was very handsome!

And so was Mister Aclassi! He looked so happy in his workshop! Wowza he could work a sewing machine, foot rhythmically pressing the peddle as he smoothly guided fabric under the needle, he could do that without looking! Cause he looked up as Ellie and Marehis entered, smiling in greeting before he brought his machine to a stop as they approached.
“Hi! Sorry, I don’t mean to interrupt,” Ellie apologized.

“Oh think nothing of it my dear!” he greeted warmly. His sewing machine was next to a work table and it was mostly clear so Ellie hopped up to sit atop it, peeking over her shoulder—he did have assistants! They were busy though, packaging orders, so they were busy.

“Do you have a minute? I wanted to run soomething by you, but it’s a little private.”

“Is everything alright?” he asked, albeit concerned as he stopped his sewing.

“Oh yeah! Mostly. It’s um…it’s to help Lady Josie.”

“Lady Montilyet spoke with you,” he assumed, sighing with relief, “Good. I’ve been worried about her. I…can help her, you said?” Ellie nodded. “What can I do?”

“Well, you have suppliers from the Hinterlands which is super super great, but maybe you’d be interested in taking a look at materials and things in Val Royeaux?” it wasn’t fibbing, exactly, “We’ll be attending Empress Celene’s ball at the Winter Palace in Bloomingtide and Josie wants us to be dressed to the nines!”

“Oh! Why did she not merely say so?”

“She’s got other business in Val Royeaux that’s stressing her—an alliance meeting we’d be attending there, and she wanted to run everything by me first before consulting you.”

“Well, certainly.”

“It’s a little short notice, we’ll likely be leaving in the next few days.”

“I’ll make do,” he assured, unbothered. “After all, I’ve a bit more help now—would you care to meet them?” he smiled when Ellie nodded, taking both her hands in his and she hopped down off the table as he rose to his feet, calling, “Johnathan, Audrey, this is Inquisitor Eleanor—my Cremisius’s Ellie.”

Mister Aclassi’s assistants! Right! Oh they seemed sweet! And they were pretty excited for the job—Johnathan had apprenticed in a tailor’s shop in his hometown but it’d been in Kirkwall, the shop was burned to the ground so he’d been out of that line of work for a while, didn’t expect to get the opportunity again so soon, especially under the Inquisition, and Audrey studied fashion at the University of Orlais! She had family that died in White Spire and she joined the Inquisition when she heard they were working on the whole ‘stopping the war between Mages and Templars’ thing.

“It’s really great to meet you both!” Ellie said.

“It’s an honor to meet you, Inquisitor,” Audrey said, Jonathan nodding in agreement. “I don’t mean any disrespect of course, it’s kind you’ve come to see us, but we just finished Madam de Fer’s order. W-w-we should really get going!”

Was everyone scared of Vivienne? Should she be scared of Vivienne?

…she had frozen a man solid in the first two seconds they knew each other. So. Maybe.

“Mami…don’t hate me?”

Marehis looked startled at that, “I could never!”
“Tavern again—just a second, then checking on Anya, and then I promise, I’m all done running around.”

“Ahh. Is this…sweet girl what are you planning?”

“I’m devious! I’m evil! I’ve got plots afoot mami—I’m a menace!”

“Somehow I think the world will survive your maniacal influence,” the woman supposed as she escorted her back to the Tavern.

For a purpose! A big, sexy purpose!

“The Iron Bull!” Ellie called as soon as she walked in the door.

“Usual seat Imekari,” he hollered over the crowd, “—you need me to come to you babe?”

“I’m comin’ to you babe!” she called back, weaving her way through to his seat at the back of the Tavern. “How would you like a job?”

“Got a job—remember? Sent my smartass Lieutenant to Haven, you came and met me on the Coast?”

“I mean like a Chargers mission—you guys busy this week?”

“Depends on if we’re doing something for you or not Boss-girl.”

“Cool! Well I’d really appreciate it if you guys could escort Lady Josie and Mister Aclassi and Marehis and me to Val Royeaux! Keep everyone safe, work a little bit of security detail during a meeting I’m going to be having with a potential ally, maybe squeeze in a little more helping me shoe shop? Josie and Tonio are going to be looking for ideas for things for the Winter Palace.”

“Sounds like a good gig, Imekari. I’ll let the boys know.”

“Thanks!” she turned to Marehis, “Okay…last thing on my list, I promise—I miss Anya, and Delrin wrote me to say she’s been hanging around some fellow named ‘Noam’. I want to meet him yesterday and make sure he’s got nothing but good intentions for my baby.”

“Reasonable,” Marehis agreed as they wove their way through the Tavern again, out into Skyhold, hugging Ellie proper, arms around her shoulders as they walked, pressing a kiss to the top of her head, “Thank you, da’vehnan. I would have handled getting you a proper security detail for your trip, but the Chargers are more than adequate, and I suppose they’re unlikely to be spying for Leliana.”

“Yeah, if they do see or hear anything about Lady Josie’s you know, thing,” Ellie shrugged, “they won’t be obligated to tell the Spymaster. I’d feel badly separating Tonio and Cremisius.”

Gosh, Cremisius would worry sick about his father out there traveling—being there with the Iron Bull and everyone around looking after one another was so much wins!

Noam was sweet! Shy and quiet like Delrin had said, nervous when Ellie approached him once Cole let her know Anya was with him in the mages barracks, but that was either because she was a stranger or Anya yipping up a storm and running off from him to come greet the girl, or maybe a mixture of both things, gosh, the Mabari did seem to make him feel more secure in his surroundings, he did relax after Ellie knelt and Anya started climbing on her, licking at her face real excited and he realized the barking was just ‘Yay! Mami’s home!’ and not ‘get back evil doer here to hurt the next Apostate they see!’.
“Hi baby! Hi hi hi! Mwah mwah mwah mwah Mami's home! I love you! I missed you! How are you my pretty girl?” Anya let out a happy sounding bark, pawing at Ellie and in constant motion trying to get maximum contact, spoilt little baby! She was so eager for pets and kisses!

…Ellie kept looking over her shoulder every two minutes trying to spot Cremisius, so…she didn’t have much room to talk.

Noam was standing by a tall bookshelf, staring wide eyed at her, a little weary, "H-hello. You're er, Anya's yours?"

"Anya belongs to herself, thank you very much!” Ellie cheerily informed him, smiling as she rose to her feet, "But yeah, she's my baby, Cullen introduced us on my birthday! Thanks so much for taking such great care of her, Delrin says she just loves you. So you must be pretty great! I just wanted to check in on her and put a face to a name—I’m Ellie—you're Noam Willit, right? Our newest mage?” he nodded timidly, "Oh wow! Thanks so much, I really appreciate you joining the Inquisition. How is everything? You know your way around Skyhold? Everyone’s treating you right?"

"Y-yes miss. Everything is…good, here. Everyone has been kind. Your Templars they… saved me, Ser Barris and his men."

Ellie nodded, "I read his report to Seeker Pentaghast, I'm so sorry for everything you went through,” she cleared her throat feeling a little uncomfortable but, "You didn't do anything wrong, you know? Being a mage. I kind of had a similar experience when my magic was discovered, and just- if you ever needed someone to talk to I'd be glad to."

"You’re a mage?” he questioned and when she nodded. "I'm sorry you've similar experience. It might be nice speaking with someone who understands. Most people here, they are kind and they mean well, but it is…different. I- I appreciate the offer."

“Anytime!” Elle assured, "I mean I'm not always around but feel free to write me, I'll put you on the list to send through so Leliana would make sure your letter got through to me in the field, and when I'm in Skyhold Cole usually is too um…I don’t know if he’s introduced himself or if you’ve been told about him—he’s a Spirit of Compassion? I able to find you if you need him and he’d get me, or let me know you’d like to talk and I’ll make time for you—to talk about anything that’s on your mind.” gosh, he seemed kind of young, not quite in his twenties yet like a lot of the mages in Fiona’s camp. “If you want I could introduce you to my friends! They’re all really great, and you’d have more familiar faces around Skyhold.”

“Really?”

"Uh-huh! Yeah! I’m busy tonight, but hmm…lunch tomorrow?"

Noam nodded, "We break for lunch noon hour.~” he stopped himself, blushing, “of course, you know that, you’re a mage.”

She supposed so? That was a normal lunch hour, she wasn’t sure what being a mage had to do with it, but she shrugged, “That sounds great! I’ll make sure everyone can come! You know where the Tavern is?”

“Ser Barris saw me around when I arrived.”

Did Barris need a raise? Because he was getting a raise! And an invitation! “Well, meet us “O-okay,” he agreed.

“Great!” she said, looking about to see where Anya was, awe, she was already right back to standing at Noam’s side, against his leg, his hand was able to rest atop her head, scratching gently. “Anya baby, watch after Mister Noam, okay?”

“You’re certain?” Noam asked, surprised.

“Uh-huh! My schedule’s been so crazy and it hasn't been safe to take her out into the field with me lately,” Ellie hadn’t been certain taking the Mabari to someplace ridden with Blight in the last decade was healthy, so. “I really appreciate it, someone's been looking after her for me!”

"I'm glad to, th-thank you for letting me.”

"Of course!” Ellie said, “I'll see you tomorrow—have a great day, okay?”

“You as well.”

Anya offered a little happy yip as Ellie waved ‘bye’. Okay she checked in. With everyone… where was Cremisius?

A young man did approach her, but it wasn’t her boyfriend. A soldier of Cullen’s met her as she and Marehis got down into the courtyard, heading for the stairs up into the castle but, “Inquisitor, the Commander would like a moment, if you could spare it.”

“Sure thing!” Ellie said, “Is he in his office?”

“Yes miss.”

“Thanks!” she said, looking to Marehis, “you wanna go down and up? Or up and over?”

Skyhold's layout was a kind of insanity, really.

“Up and over has fewer stairs,” the woman reasoned, as they continued up the stairs into the Great Hall. Sound reasoning, Ellie was just always a little nervous walking through Solas’s old ‘room’ sort of set up he’d had in the rotunda at the base of the library tower. Was it dumb she kind of missed him and…hoped he was doing okay in the Hinterlands? If it was, fine, she was dumb!

“Eleanor, sweetheart, please, come in,” Cullen waved her in once she and Marehis got to his office, “Thank you for coming—I was meaning to catch a moment of your time more than just our hellos at the gate. Marehis, you’re well I hope?”

“I am,” the Elf woman assured.

“Excellent,” Cullen nodded, gesturing to the chairs before his desk, “please, have a seat.”

Oh…he seemed kind of nervous or pensive about something. “Is everything okay, papi?”

“I wished to discuss a matter of importance with you privately, before bringing it to discussion at the War Table,” Cullen said. "The Templars in Therinfal—many of them, when their corruption was complete...went on to follow Samson. He was a Templar in Kirkwall, until he was expelled from the Order. I’ve…” his eyes darted to Marehis and then back to Ellie, “handled Lyrium addiction in my own way, and he his, apparently. But Maker. Red Lyrium is nothing like Lyrium given by the Chantry,” he shook his head. “As you know, I’ve been working on trying to find their source—Red Templars require Lyrium just as often as their normal counterparts. They’re using trade roads to transport shipments of Red Lyrium, many of them passing through the Emerald Graves.”

“Oh! That’s one of the places we have reports of Rifts from.”

“Yes, a refugee leader—Fairbanks? He’s asked you come to the area for some time now, given there are Rifts in need of sealing and the potential for a lead as to where Samson is, how to stop Corypheus’s Red Templars? If you could investigate this, Eleanor, I would appreciate it and I believe it benefit our efforts against Corypheus greatly.”

Ellie nodded. “Alright. I’m heading into Orlais this week anyway—we’ll talk over everything at the meeting tomorrow.”

“Thank you, Eleanor. This…is dangerous, you may come in contact with Red Templars, just—be careful, sweetheart.”

“We will be—everyone will stick together, and we’ll all be safe!”

“I’ll pray for as much. Thank you, Eleanor,” he nodded.

“No problem!” she said, then, “Do you need any help for tonight?”

“I believe I’m all set, thank you again for all your help,” Cullen said, “but I should prepare—brush my hair.”

“Brush your teeth! Mami really likes your cologne just, you know, don’t go overboard?”

The man chuckled as he rose from his desk, dropping a kiss to the top of her head, “I’ll certainly be careful.”

“Have fun tonight papi! Oh! Do you wanna have breakfast with me and mamis and Cremisius and his papa?”

“You had me at ‘breakfast with me’.”

“Yay!” she cheered, hopping up from her seat, and pressing a kiss to his cheek, “Hasta manana, papi!”

“Hasta manana,” he nodded.

“I know you love them, but da’vhenan,” Marehis sighed as they made their way from Cullen’s office, back into the castle, “you really must stop meeting with your advisors—they give you such perilous tasks.”

“Only like once every four or so get-togethers. The other times I get like, cake, or dinner, or to cuddle. That’s like…only 25% danger! That’s so much less danger than 100%! Which is how many dangerous get togethers I’ve had with Corypheus!”

“Somehow I don’t find it all that comforting that the people in your life bring you 75% less danger than your mortal enemy.”

“Corypheus wishes he was my mortal enemy!” she smiled as they passed Varric, done with the Tavern, sitting at his writing desk in front of the Great Hall’s fireplace. “Varric’s my mortal enemy!”
“Damn straight Tumbles—keep your enemies closer,” the Dwarf commended, giving her a thumbs up without looking up from his work. Marehis giggled, shaking her head.

Marehis stopped just outside the door to Ellie’s room, smiling as she said, “Sweet girl, if you’ve no need of me, I should touch base with Leliana on a few things—I’ll arrange for guards. Does that suit?”

“Sure thing—try to get some rest tonight okay? You’re totally invited if you want to come be with Leliana and Josie and me, but if you’d rather have the night off, I mean, I’ll be with Leliana.”

“I do think I’ll take the night for myself,” Marehis said, pressing a kiss to Ellie’s forehead. “If you need me, da’vehnan, you’re to send for me, come to me, immediately. Alright?”

Ellie nodded. Yeah, she got Marehis was…not super comfortable leaving Ellie all on her own. She hadn’t been alone, she didn’t think, since that um, night in Crestwood.

Maybe she still wasn’t—she’d just made it to the top of the stairs when she figured out just where Cremisius was!

Poor guy was laying on her bed, it was a tunic day! He looked so handsome! He was sweaty, kind of catching his breath like he’d just run around a lot, he lifted his head to look up and see that it was her before dropping it and rasping out,

“Hey, lovely…you…here…cool.”

Ellie smiled, “You being here is cool too, Cremisius, um…you okay?”

He sighed, pushing himself up on his elbows, “Been all over the place looking for you! Stable hand that brought in Russel said you were headed for Josie’s, got there and she sent me to Hawke in the Tavern—he sent me to father’s workshop, he sent me back to the Tavern to talk to Bull, and then that asshole didn’t know where you went so. I came here.”

“Guapo?”

“Yeah?”

“…you’ve met Cole, right?”

He just stared at her…kind of seemed like a little bit of the light left his eyes before he flopped back onto the bed. “Fuck me.”

She giggled, shrugging as she plopped down on the bed next to him lying on her side, “I thought you wanted to have a big fancy date night first, but okay,” she shrugged.

“That’s not- I- you know I didn’t mean-“ he huffed indignantly; gosh he was the cutest! She pressed a little kiss to his lips, earning a smile. “Missed you, ‘m glad you’re back.”

“I missed you too,” mmm, another kiss, ‘cause, “thank you, for bringing out the Chargers and getting Dedrick from Cole.”

“Yeah well…sounded like you needed him. How um…how’ve you been feeling since then, lovely? You need to talk about it?”

Gosh, that…that’d been scary. She worried at her lip, nervous, not entirely sure she knew how to begin explaining but Cremisius wrapped an arm around her, pulling her in close. Mmm he was warm, and he always smelled so good just, he always made her feel safe. So…she just started talking.

She’d just woken up and her brain skipped right over grounding to just…hyperfocusing on how she was so tired of trusting people who—she’d felt really badly for Mayor Dedrick! So sorry that his town flooded and his people died! And it turned out he’d done it to them himself! She loved Solas and he hurt her! Hurt Marehis and everyone! And even Thom, as much as she loved him now, was so proud of how far he’d come…he’d done something horrible, run away instead of facing it, pretended to be something he wasn’t, Maker, what if she hadn’t known still? Would he be pretending to this day? So meeting Dedrick, wanting to help him, thinking he was a respectable person, she just felt stupid, embarrassed. And then that just sort of funneled right in to thinking about all the awful things that kept happening, and scaring her because what was next? So many horrible things had already happened, and each one seemed worse than the last—losing Max, time magic, Envy, losing Haven, finding out the person responsible for all of this had been right under their noses all along, someone they trusted more than anything. And she still loved him and she hated that, and she hated that they still had this stupid, weird bond thing and that Marehis was reliant on that and- and she hated how miserable that had to be making her. She hated how miserable everything was. These things just kept happening and…

And they didn’t have to. Not anymore. At least not to her, right? And maybe they’d stop happening for the others too—maybe the Mark would go away if she died? And Corypheus wouldn’t come for the people she loved anymore, maybe his plans would be totally foiled? That was a genuinely stupid way of thinking about it she realized after the fact, but in the moment it felt like the perfect solution. And then she realized that yeah, she could do that, maybe it was for the best, and there was no one around to stop her if she-Wait! She didn’t want to die! Yeah, there’d been some awful things that had happened but there was so much good too! She loved her life! She had so many amazing people in her life that she loved! And the Inquisition had done so much good and she was proud to be Inquisitor! And she wanted Corypheus stopped—she wanted to stop him! Beat his dumb Darkspawn face in and then skip off into the sunset with her party!

You ever start feeling like I used to—apathetic about your own survival or uh, looking to end it, imi-kadan—little heart—you gotta come to us.

Maker. She had promised the Iron Bull. And she’d never felt like that before, felt so certain she should do something like that so, she ran and…she’d promised the Iron Bull, but she’d just wanted her mami, but- but- it wasn’t Marehis's fault but Ellie always felt like absolute dirt breaking things like this to the woman who did everything for her, just making her worry more, and Cassandra seemed like she’d be the one to really understand.

Kind of embarrassing she just ran for it, especially with Solas finding her, but he’d been nice about it, just wrapped her up in his vest and made sure she wasn’t hurt, took her to Cassandra.

"Marehis wrote Adan for me and he wrote me back," she said, "I did my best to describe everything in writing and he actually cut my depression potion in half? It sounded crazy to me but it seems like…dunno, it's helping, and I have an appointment with him sometime here soon while I'm in Skyhold," she shrugged. "He said it might be my depression fluctuating? That taking too high a dosage can cause suicidal thoughts as easily as too little a dose*. Cassandra said she's experienced the same thing before,” gosh it sounded scary when she talked about it—she said she'd had compulsive suicidal thoughts for like, a week straight before she could get in contact with a Healer at the time and it'd been because it was time to take a break from potion. "Which, I hate she's gone through all this too, but she's been just amazing help.”

“I’m glad you went to her,” Cremisius said.

“Me too. Cole helped to, explaining it, that it’s not...me, it’s my brain being its extra sexy self.”

He chuckled at her making light, offering, “You know, that happens again you can always come to me," in all sincerity, gently teasing, "...with clothes, without clothes, I’m not picky.”

“Cremisius!”

“What?” he laughed, pressing a kiss to her cheek, “Seriously though. I know I can’t always go out with you in the field, but I’m always here.”

She nodded, humming contently as she snuggled against him, here...felt warmer. Not just normal I've got the toastiest boyfriend second only to the Iron Bull' warm, it almost reminded her of the soothing warmth like Dalish's warming-bandages or Vivienne's old tent...Oh! "This...isn't my blanket.”

"Hmmm, yeah it is,” Cremisius said as if he was confused, "You don't remember? You've had it for..." he seemed to be counting in his mind, "word you were arriving today got in at six so...since six o’ five. Made up your bed with it, got the fireplace going to make sure it'd be warm in here when you got back," and then he smiled, "Do you like it?"

"Cremisius! Where- it's- it's so beautiful and toasty and I love it!” she assured, reaching behind her to pull the blanketing up around her as she rolled to lay stomach to stomach atop Cremisius, gosh he had the handsomest smile as he laughed softly, brushing a hand along her cheek before pressing a kiss to her forehead.

"I'm glad. Papa says the material is soft but durable," awe his Papa! He made this? Gosh it was beautiful! This warm green color she just loved, golden thread making up the warming runes all across the fabric, Maker, little blossom shapes decorating the space between runes. Oh she could kiss him! "It'll travel well if you take it with you,” Cremisius said.

"Mmm good, then we'll be nice and toasty!” Ellie giggled, “Did the Iron Bull tell you about your newest assignment?”

“...no? Someone hire us?"”

“Me! Your papa and Lady Josie need to go to Val Royeaux for Winter Palace prep, and I have a meeting with a Comte so...I figured, why have one Aclassi when I can have both!”

“Papa hasn’t said a thing about needing to go to Val Royeaux,” Cremisius said, his confusion genuine that time.

Ellie shrugged, casual, “Josie brought it up to me, and I brought it up with him.”

“Uh-huh,” he said doubtfully, smiling as he shook his head. “You want them to smoosh?”

She sighed, groaning as she leaned into him, “I want them to smoosh so bad!”
“They’re cute together. Papa doesn’t seem quite ready to make any moves on anyone, but I think it’d be good for him, once he is. A gentle push in the right direction might not be amiss.”

“…booking them a carriage ride from Skyhold to Val Royeaux and back is a gentle push?”

“From you? Yeah. They’re just lucky you haven’t convinced her to let papa tailor her a wholeass wardrobe.” Ellie smiled sheepishly, and he sighed, “Maker help us.”

“Josie really needs new things!” Ellie defended, pouting a bit, Cremisius chuckled, kissing her until she smiled which took maybe half a second, and she was going to explain…um…she was going to—there was something. She was sure about it before he moved on to kissing her neck. Wardrobe? What had they been talking about? Cremisius was distracting! She could be distracting right back!

…she was about halfway down his neck, trailing kisses when he put a hand under her chin to guide her back up to his lips, the Tevinter man kissing her soundly before nipping at her bottom lip. Bottom…pants…wardrobe…Josie…

“Varric!”

Cremisius’s eyes went wide as he just stopped still and stared at her, thankfully seeming amused because her face went bright red. “Uh…babe I’m not sure what to do with that.”

“I didn’t- I wasn’t- I-” she swatted at his chest, “You distracted me! I forgot what I was going to say and then I remembered! I need to talk to Varric before I meet up with Lady Josie for dinner tonight!”

“You want me to grow mad chest hair, Bull insists he’s got a drink that’ll do that,” he assured.

“I’m serious!” she complained, “It was brain babble—I was about to ask if you’d send Varric my way whenever you leave, just to come whenever he has a minute.” She smiled, “I like your chest just the way it is,” she assured, pressing a gentle kiss to the bit of breastbone his binder left exposed. He sort of went very still at that, oh! Crap! She looked up at him, worried, “Sorry, was that—“

“Uhhh that was good, nice, good,” he sort of rambled.

Ellie giggled at that, “So it’s in the ‘good nice good’ category?”

“Uh-huh,” he nodded, kissing her, “I suppose I can get Varric for you,” he agreed, kissing her again, “In a minute.”

…it was more like five minutes and they only stopped because there was a knock on her door oh! Ellie let out a startled squeal—what if it was Varric?! Had Cole heard and sent him their way?

“Eleanor?”

Cremisius moved back, back and away! He practically flew off the bed, he almost fell! “Guapo!” she hissed quietly in warning as she sat up, smoothing the blanket back behind her before she scooted to sit against the headboard, straightening out her tunic as she called out, “Hola mami! Como estas?”

Cassandra relaxed the moment she reached the top of the stairs and saw Cremisius, looking to Ellie as she said, “I’m well.”

At least the woman seemed amused. And excited for her date with papi! Oh gosh! Ellie was excited for her! She hadn’t even gotten a chance to ask Cremisius for details…which was probably good. She was good at keeping fun or important secrets, but she wasn’t great at keeping things from her Seeker of Truth mami. So. Probably best she didn’t have any clue about tonight. Aside from the whole “flowers and candles and where can I find a good poetry book?” Ellie’d asked Dorian and he asked what for, she said papi was planning a date for Cassandra, and he said he knew just the perfect poem! Papi could find it in a book in Dorian’s alcove—he picked it up from a vendor in Redcliffe the last time they were there, surprised to find a Tevene text so far from home, though given their recent Tevinter invasion what with Alexius and time magic and all that, one of the Venatori had apparently pawned off their poetry collection.

And speaking of poets—Varric! Cremisius remembered to send him! He came ‘round just after mami left. Oh, she hoped he hadn’t embarrassed her-

“Seeker’s got a smokin’ new do’ tonight.”

He…probably embarrassed her.

“What’cha need, Tumbles? Boyfriend said it was important.”

“It is!” Ellie assured him, patting the space before her on the bed in invitation for him to sit down and get comfortable because, “I need help writing a contract!”

“Lady Josephine? You're feeling better now that you've discussed things with Ellie, I trust?”

Oh, sweet man. Josephine smiled as she looked up from opening the return missive from the Comte, Tonio was standing in the doorway to her office though when she looked up to him, he entered, bearing a saucer with a cup of tea atop it that he placed carefully on her desk within reach without it sitting on her paperwork. “Your favorite,” he offered quietly.

Oh, Jasmine tea—bless him, “Thank you,” she said, taking up the tea cup and sipping—it was just the boost she needed to parcel through the last of her work before she should be heading to meet Eleanor, Leliana. “Yes, I feel much better.”

He nodded. “My Lady…if you wished for me to accompany you to Val Royeaux to prepare for the Winter Palace, I would not have denied you—it’s truly no trouble and I’m incredibly honored to assist in designing what Ellie and her party should wear.”

…Josephine had just barely the slightest clue what he was talking about. Of course, he would be assisting in—why did—what?

“I’m sorry?”

“You needn’t apologize—Ellie explained everything, that you wished to discuss the decision with her before having her ask me. And I’m admittedly enticed by the idea of travel with my son again—it scares me half to death but Maker can that boy put up a fight—we had dinner before his evening shift and he informed me the Chargers will be providing security for our journey.”
Oh! Oh Maker- had Eleanor truly-?

If she had it- it was utter genius. Brilliant! Oh Leliana, the others, no one would question their journey to Val Royeaux at all! Cremisius would- the Chargers! They would guard them—Eleanor—with their lives there, during the meeting with the Comte, and none of them…save perhaps the Iron Bull…would feel compelled to tattle to Leliana for any reason and perhaps the Qunari could be persuaded to keep the matter in confidence or at the very least, stay back and guard their rooms while his subordinates protected the Inquisitor and Ambassador. “Oh I’m so glad!” Josephine said, relieved, “Truly, I’m pleased you would join us, I understand travel is not necessarily in your job description, and you just came off of a hard journey to get to Skyhold, and you were so tired when you returned from the Hinterlands. I did not wish to push you if Eleanor did not think it wise. She’s a mind for Healing, I trust her judgement if she…agrees with me, that we should…” why did his work take them to Val Royeaux?

“Find design ideas, materials that may better suit a ball. My suppliers from the Hinterlands are excellent, but you can’t exactly get Orlesian silk from Ferelden,” he supposed.

“Ah, yes, exactly,” Josephine nodded. Maker, bless that girl the whole of her days, that was sound alibi and…truly, something they should do, this trip would not merely serve to keep her family’s collective heads above water, but to truly service the Inquisition properly and that…helped, with how terribly selfish she feared the endeavor might be.

She might have arranged a fruit basket be delivered to Marehis’s quarters. She still felt the sting of this disagreement, like she’d been slapped, she hated that she’d had to go to Eleanor. She just prayed the woman did not hold it against her, or believe her to be wholly uncaring for the girl and her safety above her own financial prosperity. She had not even considered the Comte may take advantage of Josephine’s situation to lay a trap for the Inquisitor.

"Though my lady, if-" Tonio struggled with his words, brow creased with worry. Oh, what was the matter? "I hope I have not given you reason to think I would react abhorrantly to such a request. It concerns me you were sent to tears over the notion of asking this of me."

…ahh. She was still embarrassed for having gotten upset so openly, but she'd only just received the Comte's demands, that he would not speak to her of his pertinent information as to why such an attack was made on her family's attempts to do business in Orlais without first speaking to the Inquisitor herself, when she was faced with having to lay this out for Eleanor of all people? She'd shed a few frustrated tears that Tonio had witnessed and immediately set about voicing concern and endeavoring to find out whatever was the matter, what could he do, was she feeling unwell? His concern had turned her few tears into open weeping and now…he perceived it to be from fear of making a demand of him, oh. Goodness. He was such a gentle man, she was certain she could make the most uncalled for demands, be openly rude about it, spit in his face and he'd merely wipe his face, invite her to sit at his desk and talk her through whatever inspired such a tantrum. She wasn't scared of the man in the slightest, grateful as she was that Eleanor had provided a solid alibi for their trip to Val Royeaux, she felt badly he feared as much because of it.

"My upset had nothing to do with my nerves regarding requesting your company, I assure you."

Oh, that did not seem to be of much help, while it seemed to quell one worry, it rekindled another, "My lady, what troubles you so? If- if it was not something Ellie could help you with-you're certain there is nothing I can do? I'd be glad to listen, if you need someone to talk to."
She could not even speak of this to her dearest friend. But that was of no matter, goodness.

"There was no trouble, I-" Blah! "I admittedly am coming upon my er…” she hated to do so, it took almost pathetic but she could not fabricate some horrible lie that would be convincing, nor could she tell him the truth, so she cast blame upon, "I am having the painters in."

"The painters…” he seemed unfamiliar with the phrase but her blushing and dancing around the subject, trying to assure him she had been crying over nothing at all, "oh! Oh Lady Josephine, I apologize, you needn't say a thing more. I know well the er, discomfort and discontent one can experience at this time. If ever you find yourself in need of bandaging I keep some in my desk for such a thing."

"Truly?" Josephine wondered, surprised.

"Of course. I happen to know a great many people with uteruses who occasionally need as such. So I keep some on hand. The drawer on the left, there is coincidentally a small bowl full of wrapped chocolates along with them," he said, his smile mischievous, oh, he was sweet.

"Thank you, I'll have to remember that, if not for monthlies, then for a midnight snack," she said, finding herself giggly at her jest, smiling when his expression warmed at that and he offered his own amused chuckle. She cleared her throat, "Thank you, Tonio," she said, endeavoring to get back onto topic, “truly. I’m pleased you were agreeable to a trip out of the country. And it’s so fortuitous you’ve the chance to travel with Cremisius—you must take the opportunity to do something fun. There are a great many attractions in Val Royeaux—you should take in a show or the opera—there’s several museums. Oh! Cremisius may find himself inspired! His own works are just beautiful. When the Iron Bull asked me for recommendations to secure a Wintersend present for his Lieutenant I directed him to a shop in Val Royeaux—he may like to look around for himself.”

Oh, the man truly was handsome when he smiled, “That would be splendid. You needn’t trouble yourself…but if you do look up entertainment for myself and my son, you must include yourself and Ellie—won’t you? Cremisius would relish the chance to take her out and I enjoy her company—your company as well, and I would feel better about your efforts to secure tickets and plan such things if you were included in the fun. Too…Cremisius may find himself distracted, it would be pleasant to have company to engage with when he’s otherwise preoccupied with his girlfriend. Won’t you please join us?"

“I wouldn’t wish to impose,” she wouldn’t…if she were imposing. If it wasn’t however…
well it truly did sound wonderful, she was admittedly excited at the prospect that the trip could be a bit of fun in Eleanor and Cremisius’s schedules.

“You could never be an imposition, my lady. You’re more than welcome—I insist. Unless of course, it would be an imposition to you,” he amended.

“It wouldn’t be I…well I would be delighted, truly,” Josephine assured. “It will be excellent —have you any preference for our schedule?”

“Anything you believe may be enjoyable is sure to be a treat. Thank you, my lady. I do appreciate this.”

“Well, I appreciate your agreeing to this trip. And the tea,” she nodded to the cup on her desk, “thank you.”

He nodded. “Well, I shouldn’t keep you—you’ve work still?” she smiled, nodding. “Do try not to work too hard, should I send for your dinner?”
She shook her head, “No, I’ve plans with Eleanor this evening.”

“Ahh, I should leave you to it then—have a pleasant time.”

Josephine was certain she would.

_Leliana_ was perhaps, doubtful.

“Josie, honestly—if I must endure a sleepover of all things, you must at least suffer with me on time.”

Leliana’s voice startled her, Maker! Oh!

Josephine sighed, blushing as she carefully folded the return missive from the Comte and slipped it into the drawer of her desk and folded up her final reply to confirm their arrival, sealing it. Goodness. She suppose she let the time get away from her again. “I apologize—thank you, Leliana, for indulging her.”

“Why is it, exactly, you owe Eleanor a debt of favor?” Leliana wondered, eyes alight, the sort of look she got on her face when she was in pursuit of some truth.

Thankfully, Josie was not subject to interrogation, regretful though she was, to mislead her friend. “That is the Game, I’m afraid,” was all she offered up, smiling to soothe the Orlesian woman’s concern. She needn’t. it would be fine. They would go to Val Royeaux, and it would all be sorted out.

She hated going to Eleanor for this. She hated going to _anyone_ for this, but to sit before that girl and- ugh, she used the word destitute! It was certainly poor phrasing on her part. But that is what it felt like, if mama and papa couldn’t be taken care of in their old age, enjoy the things they did after working so hard for so long? If Yvette had to support herself? Perhaps she would, one day, but it was certainly no time soon, not of her own ability, and Josie…did not wish circumstance to force her to grow up too soon. Not if she could help it.

“Do we truly require sleeping garments?”

“Eleanor requested as much,” Josephine said, “I’ll need to stop by my quarters-“

“Already done. I packed for the both of us from your things,” Leliana said, “I sleep in the nude.”

“Leliana, honestly,” Josephine giggled. Goodness. She'd not expected such a thing.

Likewise, she wasn't expecting the first words out of Eleanor’s mouth when the girl swung her bedroom door open to invite them in,

“Josie, I’m so glad you’re here!” Eleanor greeted, followed immediately by, “You’re fired! From the Inquisition! Effective immediately! Hi Leliana!”

“Eleanor?” Leliana questioned, alarmed.

“I- I’m sorry, I’m confused,” Josephine admitted…wholly uncertain the level of authenticity brought to bear. “Eleanor I- I understand if you are upset with me but surely we can talk this-“

“You don’t gotta fire her Tumbles. It’s just an addendum,” …Varric Tehtras’s voice sounded from above. Likewise confusing.
“Oh!” the girl chirped, “Varric! Jerk! I’ve been steeling myself for like twenty minutes preparing to fire Josie for nothing! You saw me! I’ve been all solemn-faced silence!”

“Sorry kid, thought you just needed to take a shit.” Oh my.

“That’s scrunchy-faced silence and you know it mister!” Eleanor shouted up at him before returning her attention to her guests, “You’re un-fired! Please, come on in! Varric will be leaving in just a minute!”

The Dwarf man was seated behind Eleanor’s desk, pouting when Josephine and Leliana reached the top of the stairs on Eleanor’s heels, “I don’t get to stay for your slumber party?”

“Girls only!”

“Bianca’s a girl! I’m her plus one!”

“Bianca’s a woman!” Eleanor argued, “And she’s free to stay—you make with the legal mumbo-jumbo and hit the bricks!” she pecked a kiss to his cheek, “I love you with like, all of my heart.”

“Awe shucks Tumbles, not in front of Bianca,” the man complained half-heartedly, “Ruffles, c’mere. Got something for you to sign.”

“Because I’m un-fired? Why is my occupancy called into question?” Josephine worried.

“Because I’m like, sixteen and I don’t know how contracts work,” Eleanor shrugged. “I thought I needed to fire you so I could re-hire you with a new contract—I forgot about addendum thingys!”

“I know babe, figured it’s what you wanted so that’s what I’ve got written up here,” Varric assured, “ready for Ruffels to sign.”

“Yay!” Eleanor cheered.

… “An addendum to my contract?” Josephine asked, “Eleanor, honestly I- what is going on?”

“Ummm, I had a peak at your contract with the Inquisition and realized you’re grossly undervalued! See, you were hired as our Ambassador, right?”

“Yes, I was,” Josephine said…still confused.

“So as Ambassador, it’s your job to negotiate relations between the Inquisition, allies, and potential allies.”

“It is.”

“That’s it.”

“Pardon?”

“That’s it!” Ellie insisted, “That’s your entire job description! But for months you were my etiquette tutor—you still are whenever I need it! And you’ve taken care of every aspect of my schedule, day in, day out, every time I’ve been in Haven or Skyhold. You balance my time between schooling and field work and important meetings—you screen people before I meet them, you send countless letters on my behalf, you schedule my every Healer’s appointment. When do I see Adan?

“Tomorrow morning, straight after our meeting,” unless the girl needed him sooner, Maker, she seemed rather wound and Josephine hadn’t the slightest idea what was going on.

“See! You’re not just our Ambassador—you’re my personal assistant—you’re pulling two entire jobs missy! And we’ve been barely paying you for one! And I mean you’ve hardly had the benefits that should be afforded an ambassador of the Inquisition, let alone the Inquisitor’s personal assistant! I mean I have a clothing allowance—why don’t you?”

“Eleanor you represent us to noble allies,” not to mention the child hadn’t a scrap of proper clothing to her name when she was thrust into her position as Herald.

“So do you! Way more than me—not only do you have your own meetings but you’ve always sat in on every single one of mine! That’s double meetings! You see everyone twice! So you should have like, double clothes!”

“Mija—”

“So, fixing it! I mean we’ve upped hazard pay for basically everyone—except for you, and you’ve got just as much on the line—being in the Inquisition makes you a target, and you were in just as much danger whenever Haven fell. Skyhold is secure but there’s always a bit of risk, and you don’t even have hazard pay. So. Somewhere, you’re overdue a boost.”

“…Eleanor—”

“Is correct, Josie,” Leliana said, “and I agreed—she sent a message run her decision by me, and while Cullen and Cassandra are occupied this evening, I trust they would not dispute this.”

“If they do I’ll never talk to papi again—two seconds and he’ll cave. And mami isn’t technically an advisor so…her vote only counts if she says yes. That’s the rules.”

“Official Inquisition bylaws?” Josephine offered quietly, jesting, earning an enthusiastic nod from the girl. She- she did not- this was not at all what she was expecting to happen tonight. “May we discuss this more privately, mija?”

“Sure! Varric—bricks! Josie will need time to read everything before she signs, so we don’t need your notarizing skills.”

“First time a woman’s ever kicked me out of her bedroom over no longer needing my notarizing skills. Gotta say tumbles, it hurts the same,” he sighed wearily as he dropped from his seat.

“We’ll have a guys-only Skyhold sleep over sometime,” Eleanor promised. “Not tonight…or tomorrow night—but some night! As soon as she’s being paid properly for it, Josie will put it on my calendar!”

“Sounds like a plan,” Varric affirmed, waving the girl down to crouch so he could kiss her on the cheek. “Have a good one, ladies.”

“We can talk outside—Leliana if you wanna get changed feel free, and there’s cookies and cocoa by the fire—Varric helped me move the couch! There’s blankets! Get snuggly,” Eleanor ordered the Spymaster, who stared wide eyed at the girl before turning that same gaze to Josephine.

“I suppose I’ll get snuggly,” she said, sounding discontent with the term, “Have a pleasant chat,” though the Orlesian woman did draw nearer to press a kiss to Josephine’s cheek and whisper, “you deserve this, Josie, hear her out,” she intoned before slipping away, the pack she’d brought slung over her shoulder as she made use of the little dressing room they’d erected in the closet to the left of Eleanor’s bed.

The girl herself took Josephine’s hand in hers, and a stack of parchment from her desk, and led her out onto the balcony, past the fireplace. “It’s toastier out on this one.”

“How, I- I was serious before, I wasn’t requesting a raise, and while I certainly appreciate the sentiment, my family cannot be supported on my salary alone—“

“It’s not for your family, Josie—it’s for you,” Eleanor insisted. “We’ll go meet with the Comte and get your family’s affairs sorted—you’ll be allowed to trade in Orlais soon! This isn’t charity… and I mean if you want to think about it that way, then the line starts behind me. I wouldn’t have anything if it wasn’t for the Inquisition—you work hard and you genuinely deserve something for that work, and I’m sorry I never considered that before all this, but I never saw your contract with the Inquisition—that’s not the best excuse though, I’ve thought about people needing benefits because of their kind of work for other members of my party, and my Advisors,” her hand squeezed Josephine’s, “I’m sorry, Josie, really. I should have done this sooner. So…let me make this right, okay?” the girl quietly pled, so sincere and hopeful. Oh.

Josephine sighed, taking the parchment Eleanor offered in hand, “I will…consider it.”

It felt like some reward, how the girl’s expression lit up with relief, “Great! Take your time and read it over when you get the chance, okay?”

“Certainly.”

“Great!” and then, turning toward her room, “Dinner will be here soon!”

Josephine caught Eleanor’s hand to halt her from returning to her quarters, “My lady- Ellie.”

“Yeah Josie?” the girl wondered curiously.

“Muchas gracias, mija,” Josephine sniffled, speaking past a lump that formed in her throat, just- “Mister Aclassi stopped by my office to discuss our trip to Val Royeaux—that is perfect, and Marehis, she is…agreeable to the Chargers securing us?”

“Ohh-huh! Mami was with me the whole time I was talking to Mister Aclassi and the Iron Bull, she didn’t have a problem with it!”

Oh! “Oh sweet girl, you must be exhausted!” the girl did not operate as Josephine would have—sending missives with proposals and awaiting replies, she’d run about Skyhold securing what she needed! She’d just gotten in from that horrible Crestwood place and then she barely had a half hour to sit and relax before Josephine unloaded her personal strife onto her shoulders and then she- she’d been running around and making arrangements and working up contracts and- “Come mija, let’s get comfortable, rest for the evening. I’m not sure what one does at a slumber party, but please, don’t keep yourself awake on our account—we would all benefit from a good nights sleep.”

“It’ll be great!” the girl was agreeable, “Let’s get cozy with Leliana!”

And so they did, Eleanor believing it to be ‘just the cutest!’ that Josephine and Leliana were wearing matching pale pink nightgowns, the girl joined them, trading her tunic and trousers for a large sleep shirt that looked…well, Cremisius had frequented his father’s workspace at odd hours to check in on the man when he used the space late at night, since it was so close to his quarters…
too, it was admittedly nice, Josephine often worked late hours so the company was welcome. Cremisius would stop in and wish them good evening, occasionally bringing something to eat or drink, and sometimes that happened out of armor, in his sleep clothes. Eleanor seemed to have procured a shirt from the Lieutenant’s collection, it fell to her mid-thigh, though Josephine made certain she was…warm, and admittedly covered, with blanketing gathered in her lap as she before Josephine on the couch, when their meal was delivered.

“This is delicious, Eleanor,” Leliana said from her end of the couch, wiping at her mouth with a napkin once they set aside their bare plates. “I’ll have to brag to Varric that you throw a spectacular slumber party.”

Eleanor giggled, “He acts like our entire life in the field isn’t just one big continuous sleepover.”

“You can have your promised sleepover tomorrow evening if you wish—we won’t need to leave Skyhold until the day after, I’ve just received confirmation of our meeting with the Comte,” Josephine informed the girl.

“Oh! That works—I mean I still can’t get together with Varric and the others tomorrow night um…” the girl blushed a bit, shyly sharing, “I’m kind of having a sleepover with Cremisius.”

A sleepover…oh.

Oh!

Oh goodness!

“I see…that is- is- would this be…your first sleepover with the Lieutenant?” Josephine wondered and when Eleanor nodded, “Are you nervous?”

“A little,” the girl supposed. “I mean I know Cremisius would never um, that I’m safe with him, and I’m ready, just…” she shrugged. “I’m kind of scared I won’t be any good? I’ve um… never had a sleepover before.”

“Why Eleanor I’m honored,” Leliana gently teased. Oh, she was even smiling as she reached out to tickle at Eleanor’s side.

“You know what I mean!” the girl laughingly defended.

“There’s no shame in being inexperienced,” Leliana assured, “miraculously, even the Iron Bull was born a virgin. He kept that status until the tender age of fourteen when he had a night of exploration with a lifelong friend.”

“Leliana honestly, how do you know such things?!” Josephine half-shrieked, scandalized.

“It is my job.”

Somehow that did not seem to fit her job description and if she was not careful, Eleanor would seek to give her a raise for knowing the minute details of her companion’s sex-lives. Gracious. Well, Josephine was hardly an expert with such things but, “If you are truly ready, I’m certain…Cremisius is a sweet man, and he loves you, genuinely. He would not do anything you were uncomfortable with, and I’m certain he would be patient.”
“You’ll find what feels right for the two of you—it is not something you can be ‘bad’ at, no one is grading you, it’s a joint effort. It is not so much the act, my dear girl, but who it is with,” Leliana assured oh, that was almost heartbreakingly sweet to hear from the woman. Though, “…in this case, when it is an act of love. When it’s purely a physical thing, yes, some proficiency should be brought to bear.”

Josephine’s face burned bright at that as she covered Eleanor’s ears as if she could keep her from hearing the words after the fact, “Leliana!” The Spymaster giggled like an absolute child!

“What was your first sleepover like?” Eleanor asked the Orlesian woman.

“Let’s see… it was… wonderful, with someone I love dearly to this day,” Leliana offered, without graphic detail. “Did you know my lady love is the Hero of Ferelden?”

Eleanor gasped at that, eyes wide as she excitedly launched into, “Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh! Really?! Oh! That’s how you knew about the tunnel thing in Redcliffe, right?”

“Yes.”

“The Hero of Ferelden… I um… I’m sorry, I’ve read Varric’s book about Hawke—is she in a book? I haven’t heard of her, except that one time you mentioned her. What’s she like? What’s she do? Does she work for the Inquisition?”

“No, no, she’s currently on a quest of her own at the moment,” Leliana chuckled warmly, “Neria,” she spoke the woman’s name as if it were the loveliest word in spoken language, “she is a mage—Dalish.” And a Warden, but the Orlesian woman would not be offering up that information for the girl if she didn’t already have it herself. It would only burden the girl if she knew someone Leliana dearly loved was in peril that pressed the need for them to stop Corypheus’s current plot.

Josephine worried after the woman given what they’d just learned of the Calling—they’d had a sleepover of a sort, staying up late in Leliana’s tower, waiting for word back from the Warden. She’d apparently not yet confessed to Leliana, her struggles with the Calling, believing it genuinely to be her time and not wishing to inform her lover until it was absolutely necessary… given she was questing in the West, and Leliana was performing her own duties in the Inquisition… such a thing would mean the two would not see each other again, in this life. Leliana was able to inform her that this Calling was likely false—Corypheus’s doing, telling her to resist it and stay where she was and stay her course. They did not find rest until Neria wrote back with confirmation that she understood.

“A mage! Oh gosh,” the girl worried at her lip a bit, the bit of flesh slipping from her teeth as she said, “I can I ask something kind of personal? It’s something I’m worried about, moving forward with Cremisius. Does Neria… do you… um…” oh goodness, she was blushing. “Do you feel anything from her magic, when you’re together?”

“Eleanor, honestly it’s a bit of a rush to just jump right into magic play—“

The girl’s face blazed red as she shrieked! Hastily assuring, “Not that! I meant like… emotionally or whatever!”

“Hmm…” the Spymaster thought on it, “yes, actually. I do.”

“Did it scare you? Is it something I should warn Cremisius about? I wouldn’t want him to be afraid but um…” she blushed, ducking her head shyly as she leaned back, against Josephine, snuggling against the Ambassador a bit, oh, this was nice—she was so excited and overjoyed to arrange and provide these quarters for the girl but there had been some mourning that Eleanor would no longer have need to stay the evening with Josephine as she had so often when they first found Skyhold. She—she saw Haven burning every time she closed her eyes in those first few weeks and she could not sleep for fear she would wake to Skyhold in utter ruin, and Eleanor found her up late their first night there, taking the night air when she’d felt suffocating fear, took a single look at her Ambassador, took her by the hand and said she did not wish to sleep alone, gosh, I hate to be a baby, but would you mind if I slept with you Tia Josie? Eleanor slipped into the bedroll Josephine had to use at the time, warm and content and—Duermete mi nina, duermete mi amor, duermete pedazo de mi corazon. Eleanor’s quietly singing lullabies Josephine had sang to her younger siblings when they were babes, had brought the woman to tears, but sent her to peaceful sleep for the first time since Haven. Josephine indulged in making play with the girl’s hair, dropping a kiss to the top of her head. “My magic loves him too, you know? A lot. Like I’m sure Neria’s loves you.”

“It was not frightening for me, but I’m rather at comfort with magic. It could be startling for some—you should discuss it with the young man, though from experience, it is pleasant and…if you’ve been in passions without delving into an out-in-out…slumber party,” the woman grinned, “Neria’s magic would make itself known to me when we expressed physical—when—when we merely kissed or ‘made out’, as the youths call it.”

Eleanor giggled. “Cremisius hasn’t said anything about it, so…yeah, we’ll talk about it, beforehand. Thanks,” she offered sweetly, before leaning her head back against Josephine’s chest to look up at her, “What about you, Tia?”

“What about me, mija?” Josie wondered, confused.

“What was your first sleepover like?” the girl questioned.

Sleep…

Oh. Oh! Oh. Josephine’s mouth worked to find appropriate words…

“Josie?” Leliana asked softly, intrigued. “We’ve discussed this—we have haven’t we?” the woman wondered, looking as though she were trying very hard to think back over the entire course of their friendship for some discussion that…well, likely never occurred. “Not even with Cecily?” Leliana asked, utterly dumbfounded. "You always spoke er...passionately about your relationship."

“Oh goodness, no!” Josephine assured. "I mean we were in love but we were never together in that way!" The woman—well, they had been girls at the time—had been Josephine’s first ‘crush’ so to speak, but they’d done nothing more than kiss, charm-school sweethearts after a fashion. It was something that ended immediately upon Cecily’s betrothment to the son of a Ferelden Bann. “It…may seem strange or embarrassing but I have…maintained my purity the whole of my life.” She’d only one other relationship in her life, with a man who took up interest in her when she first started as an Ambassador living in Orlais, but months in…once he wished to pursue a more physical relationship and she informed him she would not be doing as much, they’d decided to resume being nothing more than friends.

“Oh!” Ellie chirped, wide eyed as she assured, “Oh Tia—I didn’t mean to make you uncomfortable. Are…I mean it’s so totally okay if you’re not um…I mean do you not want to have sex? Like in a general sense, is it just something that’s never appealed to you? Or is it like, you’re only sexually attracted to people based on personal things and not outward appearance.”

Josephine blushed, “Goodness! I— I mean I’m only—of course I’ve…desired people in the past, er, I find people physically desirable of course, regardless of personality unfortunately, is that not what sexual desire comes from?” she wondered, tentatively. She wasn’t certain this was a Eleanor shrugged. “Not for me! Everyone’s different Josie, some people don’t like sex—some people like all of the sex! And then some people fall in the middle! The first time I saw Cremisius I thought he was very handsome. Um…” she seemed to consider it. “I wasn’t… I liked him as a friend and he had a crush on me, and my interest was kind of… people around me saw a girl being interested in being friends with a boy and heard wedding bells I guess, ‘cause that’s the norm. I didn’t see him giving me my hat or sending me paper flowers as flirtation but just offering genuine friendship, which, is what it was, he wasn’t pursuing me yet even though he thought he might like me that way. The way sexuality works for me? I have to know a person first, really, truly know them. Like I know Cremisius is handsome, so is Varric and Dorian and papi, and Gare, and Papa Aclassi, and the Iron Bull—just like how Sera and my mamis and Vivienne, and you and Leliana are gorgeous. But sexual attraction just doesn’t spark in me until I know about who a person is.” She blushed, “Then I really got to know him once we were back from the Storm Coast the first time. And the more I got to know him, the more I started liking him as more than just my handsome new friend. I mean as I saw him being such an amazing friend to me and caring about me so much? Protecting me? I started kind of crushing. When… when that assassin Gaspard sent? The one who tried to poison me when Cremisius was my bodyguard?”

“Ahh,” Leliana hummed, “that was a rather dashing display of bravery, even I might have swooned if I were you,” she supposed.

Eleanor shook her head, “No—I mean that was like, super brave—but when he went to make sure that Flissa was okay? Big wow,” she breathed as if still impassioned by the act, “I could’ve kissed him on the spot if, you know, it would’ve been appropriate. The more I learned about how kind and compassionate Cremisius is… well,” she smiled, shrugged. “Tomorrow night has been kind of a long time coming and if anyone interrupts us I will for real be doling out actual firings.”

Josephine smiled, “I’ll make certain any who wish to contact you at the time are screened by me and told to come to you at a more convenient time,” she promised.

“Good! Oh, but my point is—that’s normal tia! I’ve always found attraction in people regardless of what they have going on on the outside, but it comes entirely from me knowing them well enough to see what they’re working with on the inside, in their hearts and souls and minds. So wherever you fall on the spectrum is normal too!”

Ahh. “Well…I’m…I’ve no prejudice, insofar as gender is concerned. It isn’t that I fall on the, er, spectrum in the same place that you do, Eleanor, I… have had relationships with people I’ve desired greatly and haven’t laid with them,” Cecily, Raul, Daliah, Ton- oh! She-! Mister Aclassi was hardly a past romantic interest. Neither was he a present or future one! Bah! Why had he come to mind? She supposed he was… she was only Human! The man could wear a suit well! He was handsome, and kind, and gentle-spirited. But they were- it would be wildly inappropriate for her to seen liaison with someone who worked just the literal stone's throw away from her own desk! “…that is rather the point,” she pressed on, “I’ve…it would be albeit improper for me to lie with someone before marriage a- and…well,” she blushed, embarrassed, but, “I’ve always found romance in that notion. Saving oneself for someone you’re intending to be the only person you share as much with. So while I desire, I…” while she had been assured the idea was prudish and made her boring, unappealing to some, “choose to abstain.”

“Oh! Gosh! Duh—that’s a thing!” Eleanor seemed to remind herself, like she should have thought of that to begin with instead of assuming Josephine was wholly adverse to sex itself, “It’s not a sexuality I don’t think but it’s a perfectly normal sexual-decision!” she assured, sitting up and wriggling about to face the Antivan woman, sitting on her knees, taking Josephine’s hands, “A perfectly wonderful, valid thing! That’s really sweet and beautiful!”

Was it? sometimes she did worry that she’d allowed love to pass her by in her life simply because she did not give in on her conviction. Sex was an incredibly intimate, vulnerable thing—it would be hard enough to allow herself to become so revealing, let someone know her in such a way. She…wanted that to be with one person—them and them alone.

She hadn’t realize she’d been sitting in silence until she felt lips pressing a sweet kiss to her cheek, arms around her neck as Eleanor hugged her tightly, practically snuggling with the Antivan woman as she said, “You’re so beautiful and wonderful and if you want love, you deserve it and you deserve to have it in the way that best suits you! Don’t ever let anyone make you feel otherwise!”

Josephine sniffled, hugging the girl back. She’d not meant to grow emotional, but she had—this was incredibly ridiculous, she hardly set out tonight thinking they’d discuss such things but…she was glad they had, it was…well it was the first time such a discussion ended pleasantly, without mockery. “Gracias, mija.”

“She’s such a sweetie, Josie! The girl enthused, wriggling a bit until she was resting with her back against the couch, laying on her side against Josephine, an arm looped over her waist.

Oh, it was truly comfortable, warm by the fire, and they spent the rest of the evening chatting as they sat together, Eleanor convincing them to let her do their nails, cleaning and painting them as they discussed their upcoming trip, their trio wearing masks of clay Madam de Fer had gifted Eleanor that smelled heavenly, like lavender and mint, and left their skin feeling clean and fresh. And oh, Val Royeaux sounded more and more exciting by the minute as they talked. She was thrilled the girl was agreeable when Josephine spoke of her and Tonio’s plans, and Leliana did not call a single aspect into question—she was immediately bored at the prospect of them going to Val Royeaux for mere fashion’s sake, and lost all inquisitive interest when she learned the Chargers were in charge of their security. She wished them well, that they would have a pleasant time together. Josephine hoped they would. They so dearly deserved it.

She only realized they’d fallen asleep on the couch before the dying fire when she was roused by someone pulling blankets more securely around them, adjusting the cushion under Josephine’s head so it would be more comfortable and she wouldn’t wake with a crick in her neck. She almost thought it was Leliana—the woman wasn’t on the couch, Josephine and Eleanor were stretched out along it entirely—but she could hear the woman ‘not snoring’ somewhere else…probably stretched out herself, across the Inquisitor’s comfortable bed.

“Marehis?”

The woman startled a bit and raised a hand to softly press her index finger against her own lips before whispering softly, “Are you comfortable? I didn’t mean to wake you, I was just checking on her,” she explained, carding a hand through the girl’s hair.

Josephine nodded, inviting, “You’re welcome to stay.”

The Elf woman shook her head, “Oh no, I promised I would take an evening for myself,” she rolled her eyes. “Still, I woke up and just,” she shrugged, “needed to lay eyes on my girls, I just came from Sera’s.”

“You’re an amazing mother, Marehis,” Josephine complimented softly. She admired how well the woman had taken to her role in Eleanor’s life. Oh! Maker—how could she have forgotten Marehis? Thinking upon it, Eleanor had been speaking of the fun they would all have together—five tickets for everything, maybe six if…well Solas may be out of the question. Perhaps Vivienne or Dorian Pavus would join them? The Iron Bull found some enjoyment from the opera. She just…worried the Elf woman wouldn’t find Josephine’s company interesting. Though Tonio would be there as well. She would figure everything out when she didn’t have a sixteen year old sleeping on her, half-asleep herself. She’d been talking to someone just now, hadn’t she?

Oh. Marehis, the woman chuckled and pressed a kiss to the Ambassador’s forehead. “Get some rest, have pleasant dreams,” before she dropped a kiss to Eleanor’s hair and took her leave.

---

“Cremisius.”

...Cremisius Gistin Aclassi—might as well whole name him, ‘cause the whole first name rolling out of Bull’s mouth had the same affect—stopped dead in his tracks, his hand on the doorknob of the Charger’s quarters, about to step out into the top floor of the Tavern.

“…The Iron Bull,” he returned not moving a single inch, keeping his back to him.

“I’m going out with the boys today—Thom’s guys—to clear out some people causing trouble on the road to Skyhold. Not gonna be back ‘til late. So. Anything you wanna share?”

How did he know? Ellie hadn’t told him. How did he know?!

“Red keeps me informed.”

The fuck did Leliana kn- girls night.

“You uh…got a problem with it or something?” Krem wondered…worried, stepping back from the door and turning to face the Qunari seated on the edge of his cot. Was mostly just them—Grim was out like a light, Rocky was snoring away in his cot, Stitches was probably bunking with Adan, and everyone else out doing Maker knows what. “She- I’d never if she wasn’t down for it, you know that right?”

Guy nodded, looking grim as he lumbered to his feet, crossing the room to put a hand on Krem’s shoulder, and stared him right in the eye.

And then, shit eating grin on his face.

“Good fucking luck having breakfast with her papi.”

…

“You’re an asshole.” Bastard was cackling! People were trying to sleep!

“Shuddup!” Rocky called from his cot, somehow still snoring as he spoke. Grim had a damn good arm—he hit Bull square in the shoulder with his pillow without getting up.

“He-ey!” Bull growled at them, halfhearted menace, before returning his attention to, “I’m just messing with you Krem-puff. You uh…need anything before tonight? You’ve got everything?”
“m’all set, thanks.” He had everything he needed—got damn nervous when Cullen came to him about ‘candles and flowers’, literally was ready to shit himself up until he realized he wasn’t getting busted for the orders he’d just gotten in, but the Commander was asking his help to set up his own date-night things for Cassandra. He’d already put in orders for dinner, dessert, bottle of sparkling apple cider as sort of a tip of the hat to their first date. Ellie’d been a little wide-eyed when she got a sneak peek of his harness before she left for Crestwood, but after a moment she decided she would be comfortable with it, it was, er, a good size and ‘very handsome’ she assured. Still he uh…we’ll he’d had it a while, and…dunno, just felt this was a different chapter of his life he was in, no more bedding strangers or having one-night stands, so, new chapter, new piece. Same size, same padded leather, just, it felt like the right move.

“Want it engraved?” Bull’d asked when Krem asked he put in the order.

“Pretty sure it’s not gonna get mixed up with someone else’s here,” Krem’d said.

“You’re so certain?” Skinner spoke up from her bunk as she carved a sharper point to Dalish’s arrows. Woman did genuinely shoot from time to time.

“Didn’t mean your name,” Bull said to him.

... “I swear to god, you put my girlfriend’s name on my dick, you’re dead.”

Guy scratched out something he’d written down on the order, “I wouldn’t dream of it.” Ass.

Had the key to Ellie’s room so he’d set everything up for tonight while she was getting ready. War Room meeting, mage lesson with Vivienne, then lunch which he was under strict orders to attend, and then she’d have one final sit down with her advisors before doing out judgement on the Mayor of Crestwood, then she’d be at Marehis's getting ready, and that’s where he’d pick her up. There was this weird conflict where he felt like there wasn’t nearly enough time in the day, just wanted everything to slow down…but if he opened the door to the Tavern right this instant and it was dinner time already? That’d be cool too.

“Bello! My son has arrived!” Papa greeted warmly as Krem rushed down the stairs to the second floor of the Tavern, little bit of skip in his step—nervous, but it was gonna be a good day, already was one—Papa had this huge grin on his face as he met Krem at the bottom step, taking his face in his hands, and pressing a kiss to his cheek, “Isn’t he handsome? I swear every time I turn around I find my boy’s gotten handsomer!” Maker, it was just breakfast, he wasn’t being auctioned off or anything.

Wouldn’t mind being auctioned off if the winning bid was placed by, “The handsomest!” Ellie agreed, oh. talk about ‘every time I turn around’ someone looking better, she was just- she’d clearly slept well, bright eyed, smiley, hair loose. And it was his shirt she was wearing, just tucked into her own trousers, looked like a sneaky way of wearing pajamas out and about Skyhold. Hung off her shoulder just a bit in a way that was uh…well the seat across from her was empty and clearly meant for him which was probably a good idea, if he got too close he’d do something stupid like kiss her on the shoulder in front of their parental figures, the Maker, and Andraste. She was seated between Cullen and Cassandra at a table on the Tavern’s middle level, dining area next to the windows, same wall the door to Sera’s room was. Huh, would she be joining them?

…she’d been knocking back shots with her girlfriends at 2am when he’d been heading to bed after his shift, so…probably not.

Cullen leaned back in his chair, Cassandra mirroring him as if she knew he was seeking to speak with her behind Ellie’s head, “I thought I was the handsomest?” he quietly complained which had the Seeker rolling her eyes and sighing exasperatedly, like she’d expected he was going to share a private, genuine concern and not his, er, ‘nonsense’ she’d call it.

“You’re the handsondest papi,” Ellie said without missing a beat, “It’s the Iron Bull, and then you and Mister Aclassi, and then all the other fathers in the world in descending order until… huh, do you suppose Corypheus is a father? He’s on the bottom if he is.”

“Let’s hope for the world’s sake that thing has never procreated,” Marehis lightly drawled, as she joined them—mother and daughter sharing a similar look, chestnut hair was loose and wavy around her shoulders, sleep shirt tucked into her trousers like she’d just rolled out of bed and made her way here.

“Hola mami! Did you have a good night?”

“I did, Lady Montilyet gifted me dessert and I made good use of the oils and clay mask you had sent to my quarters, sweet girl, it was truly relaxing,” Marehis said, sliding between Cullen’s and the chair to the table behind him to put her arms around Ellie’s shoulders, press a kiss to her temple, “how was your evening, da’vehnan? I trust you, Leliana and Josephine had a pleasant time?”

“Uh-huh! We talked for like, hours! And Leliana let me paint her nails and braid her hair this morning! And Josie and I slept on the couch but it was sooo comfy, she’s the snuggliest!”

“That’s good,” Marehis said, squeezing the girl a bit before letting go and coming around to sit on the other side of Krem, pressing a face smooshing kiss to his cheek as she sat and offering, “Good morning, da’mi.”

“Morning Mare’.”

“I’m glad to hear you had such a pleasant evening,” Papa said, “I was worried Lady Montilyet would work until she’d forget to join you.”

“Oh we had just the best time, she really got a chance to relax! And we’re super excited about Val Royeaux.”

“Val Royeaux?” Cullen asked.

“We’re going shopping—just because Corypheus is trying to end the world doesn’t mean we can’t look good stopping him!” Ellie giggled. “Mister Aclassi-“

“Papa or Tonio please, bella mia,” Papa insisted.

Oh man Papa loved this girl and that just…upped the love factor Krem already had for her too, impossible as that felt. Asked about her every day when she was away in Crestwood, even after Krem convinced him Ellie would absolutely love it if he wrote to her himself—she had, Krem’d just gotten a letter from her when a second one came one day with her excitedly gushing that his Papa wrote her, making sure she was doing well, asking if she needed anything. She assured him herself she was fine. The guy knit her socks anyway, thick woolen ones he had to knit himself instead of just cutting and sewing already woven material—sat down with Krem, learned how to knit, and sent her socks. Because she mentioned the weather, unsure what else to talk about—she didn’t exactly want to scare the man with ‘we were attacked by a horde of bandits’ or ‘I was manhandled by a Revenant and flung around a Deep Roads chamber like a ragdoll’—and once he heard it rained almost non-stop in that part of Ferelden and he was worried she was cold.

“Papa Tonio and Tia Josie need ideas and materials for the Inquisition’s debut at the Winter Palace! So we’re making a bit of a vacation out of it! I’ve got a meeting with a potential ally, and then the rest of the time is free game until their done or I have to go to the Western Approach. Fair warning—if I’m having an amazing time and have to go kick some Corypheus-lacky’s butt in the middle of it, it will be a butt kicking of epic proportions.”

“Oh, poca amore, do not even think of such things when we are in Val Royeaux,” Papa pled, reaching across the table to cover her hand with his, “enjoy yourself. Lady Montilyet will be making arrangements for us to have a pleasant time.”

Maker help them all, Ellie looked like she was about to shoot through the roof she was so excited, damn these match making schemes—if the Heald of Andraste wanted people to smoosh, they were getting smooshed. The Lady Ambassador was sweet, gentle and kind, and if she liked his father, could love him? Well…mother certainly moved on well enough—his father deserved that and more.

“So! Anyone who wants to come,” Ellie shrugged, “it should be fun!”

Sounded like it, he hoped it would be, damn did she deserve some actual substantial fun, a decent break. He’d been…Maker, petrified when Ellie wrote from Crestwood, tear stained parchment that said she missed him and she was scared and struggling…he straight up started heading to Crestwood, was gear up to just bolt and go to her but by the time he’d gotten his horse saddled it sort of clicked in his brain—he had responsibilities of his own and he could help Ellie better living up to those responsibilities than shirking them to do the ‘dashing boyfriend swooping in to kiss everything better’ move. He got the Chargers together and they went and got that bastard Mayor from Cole so he could get back to Ellie as soon as possible. And Cole just about hugged him breathless, and Ellie was relieved to have the Spirit’s take on what was happening to her, so all in all the better move.

“You’ll be meeting a potential ally?” Cassandra asked, nodding her thanks as Cabot brought their drinks, water and coffee all around. Ellie pouted when the coffee mug before her hadn’t been filled quite as much as possible, lots of room for cream, but Krem’s was pretty full and he wasn’t real big on black coffee so…kind of nice he got a big smile when he switched around their mugs.

Though uh, apparently a smile wasn’t all he got for his trouble—he just about died when his father choked a bit on his water and then he felt the man’s ankle brushing against his as the elder Aclassi quietly, nonchalantly as possible, guided Ellie’s foot to meet Krem’s, the girl’s eyes widening as she blushed big time oh man. Wasn’t mad about the resulting session of ‘footsies’ though, they couldn’t exactly hold hands the entire meal what with all the plates and cups uh, parents, so it was a good substitute for all she’d accidentally foot-handled his father.

Cullen thanked him for about the dozenth time for all his help the other day and Cassandra was uh…kind of rosey cheeked, the gentlest bit of a consistent smile in her features so, yeah, he was glad to help, the Seeker…she’d been through a lot lately too, he couldn’t imagine…it probably wasn’t the same but he was sure it’d be pretty close to what she’d went through if he came back to Skyhold one day and found all the Chargers, tortured to death. She gave everything to the Seekers, it was her life, sort of like Bull losing the Qun. But…he had his friends, his family, his mouthy Tevinter lover. And Cassandra had them—Sera and Ellie, her friends and family she’d made out of the Inquisition, and she had Cullen.

Poor bloke looked beat though, ate as much as he could manage and then he was sitting back in his seat, arms crossed over his chest, head lulled forward as he dozed. Cassandra’s arm was angled like the woman was reaching over Ellie’s lap under the table to rest her hand on his knee as she ate, everyone chatting quietly.
“Will you be joining us in Val Royeaux, Lady Cassandra?” Papa wondered.

“I hate to disappoint but given recent developments...I’ve much work to do here;” though when Ellie opened her mouth, likely to refute that—insist the woman deserved a break of pace too, “your papi and I may take a day trip in your absence. Some place he’s always found peaceful, for a bit of respite before I must join you in Orlais.”

“Oooh fun! Dale, mami,” Ellie giggled, snapping her fingers.

“Honestly child,” the woman shook her head, fighting a grin.

“Da’vehnan, leave her be,” Marehis gently reprimanded.

“Do you know what your child said to me last night?” Cassandra asked the Elf woman.

“Oh dear—my child?” Marehis questioned, amused that she now had sole claim to the girl apparently.

“Yes, entirely when she behaves as such,” the Seeker assured, “she swatted my backside,” she whispered the last word, motioning Marehis to lean forward so she could lean and whisper the rest against her ear...which turned bright red.

“Eleanor Liana!” Marehis gasped out in delighted shock.

“What?!” Ellie defended, “She’s the one that wore papi out!”

Cassandra looked like the single most frightening tomato Krem’d seen in his life—and he hadn’t been a fan of the fruit-maybe-vegetable as a child. “I did no such-!”

Papa was laughing hard into his napkin as he did try to rein it in, Krem was just basically losing it, wheezing as he rested his head on his arms on the table to hide his face from the Nevarran woman.

“Mija,” Cullen’s voice had Krem looking up—the guy’s eyes were still closed, looked like he was asleep even as he smiled and offered the amused reprimand, “you wear me out—leave your mami be.”

“Rude!” she accused, pressing a kiss to the Commander’s cheek, “You wanna go halvesies on headache potion papi?”

“You got a headache, lovely?” Krem asked, concerned. Shit, it wasn’t like one of those bad ones she had after Envy did a number on her mind, was it?

“He’s getting the whole thing, I’m being sneaky—Papi doesn’t like taking potion,” she stage whispered to him as Marehis passed her a bottle of potion across the table, “Stop being such a sweet considerate boyfriend and help me here!”

Krem snorted, relieved, though he stage whispered back, “Part of the job description El, can’t just turn it off.”

“Hey! I fired Tia Josie last night, I can fire you too mister!” she teased, though she startled the hell out of Papa.

"Y-you fired Lady Josephine?” he asked in startled shock.

“No worries, I un-fired her! I was just trying to give her a raise! You two are okay with it, “Ahh. I have been informed my vote does not count if I say no,” the Seeker said, “it is fortunate I believe your reasoning to be sound though we will all be-” Cassandra stopped as if she stumbled on something she shouldn’t say in front of others, confidential. "supportive, of her raise, not just you, Eleanor, though it was very honorable of you to put forth as much." Supportive? Oh. Money had to come from somewhere, right, everyone chipping off a bit of their own pay to boost the Ambassador. "Lady Montilyet has taken on rather a heavier load than what she was initially signed on for, and she’s done so from day one, unasked."

“Oh!” Papa said, “Oh, that’s wonderful, yes, she does so much deserve it.”

“When did you talk to Varric?” Ellie wondered.

“He and Hawke were waiting up for us,” Cullen complained as he downed the offered potion, nose wrinkling as he gulped it. “Though for all their mockery they were, underneath it all, being considerate.”

“There were reports of attacks on the road to Skyhold that came in last night,” Cassandra said, “he heard stayed up to await our return at dawn to make sure we got in safely, were not subject to ambush.”

“You stayed out all night?!” Ellie squeaked.

“We fell asleep,” Cassandra said, sipping at her drink, cheeks just…possibly permanently pink.

“Was it ‘cause of mami’s hair?” she wondered, Seeker scoffed but Cullen gave a series of big nods, and the girl’s smile doubled, “Yes! I knew it! My master plan is working!”

Krem huffed a laugh, “You do realize they’re together already, right?”

“My mija’s matchmaking schemes know no bounds,” Cullen said, approval ringing in his voice.

“Ahh, bella mia, you’re a matchmaker?” Papa asked, sounding amused.

Wouldn’t be amused if he realized the little sparkle in her eye was that of a predator in observing its prey as she smiled at him, more like showin’ her teeth. Maker preserve his Papa. “I am!”

“That is beautiful, to see the potential for love and to nurture it,” he sagely commended, reaching across the table to pat her on the hand.

“I think everyone should have someone if that would make them happy! Love’s important, I mean anything at all in the world could be happening, everything could be lost, and it would still be there because its one of the few things…maybe one of the only things that’s truly infinite. You can have so, so much, and there’s always more!” she enthused sweetly, light in her eyes just genuine joy and just- Maker she was pretty, and proving her point cause-

“Maker, I love you El,” Krem breathed without thinking about it, taking her Marked hand and giving it a squeeze, earning a giggle and,

“See?” she said, “I love you too!”
Cassandra was grinning, shaking her head, “Sweet girl you’ve had too much caffeine—we’re cutting you off.”

“You can do that—caffeine, coffee, they’re both finite. I still have love!” she declared rising to her feet—standing on top of her chair—and thrusting an index finger to the sky, and with heartfelt enthusiasm, “It, and it alone will power me through another horrible Advisor meeting! To the War Room!”

“Are our meetings horrible?” Cullen worried.

She continued to smile, enthusiasm and mirth never slipping even as she announced the assurance, “They’re awful! We always decide I should do something terrifying I’ll eventually go through years of therapy to recover from if I survive—if I didn’t love you all, you could never trick me into going to them, they are, in fact, the worst! Someone’s gonna have to carry me! ‘Cause I don’t wanna go! The Western Approach is far away and hot, and my boyfriend is here and hotter!”

The Commander seemed bemused as he stood, wrapped his arms around her thighs and the small of her back, hoisting her as he said, “Perhaps our final War Room decision today can be upon a dessert to treat ourselves with afterward—no terror required.”

“Let’s do it!”

“To the War Room!” Cullen declared, hefting the girl over his shoulder and carrying her off.

“Bye Papa Tonio, bye Cremisius! Have a great day!”

“Farewell Ellie, do mind your head!” Papa cautioned as he waved back, Ellie relaxing to hang over her father’s shoulder so she didn’t bonk her head on the floor overhead as he descended the stairs.

“You’re absolutely certain you’d like to make a child with that man someday?” Marehis teasingly asked Cassandra.

“Somehow that display only affirms my decision,” Cassandra drawled as if that were concerning, sanity-wise. She looked to Papa, “Thank you, Mister Aclassi, for inviting us to breakfast.”

“Oh, no—thank you for joining us, we really must make certain we take a meal together when we can,” Papa insisted, rising when they did and nodding his head respectfully. “Have a blessed day, Cassandra, Marehis.”

“You as well,” Marehis said, going to catch up with Ellie. Cassandra took pause as she passed Krem, resting a hand on his shoulder.

“Thank you for all your assistance yesterday sweet man, and for keeping guard of Skyhold last night,” she said, massaging his shoulder a bit, as she intoned, “get some good rest. You’ve the day off I understand it?”

“I do.”

“Perhaps we could train together this afternoon? I understand you’ve a lunch date—after?”

“Got some date-night prep of my own but yeah, that sounds great,” Krem agreed.

“Excellent,” she said, dropping a kiss to the top of his head, “sleep well.”
Papa looked wistful as the Seeker left them, his arm slinging over Krem’s shoulders as he pulled him in, pressed a kiss to the side of his head, “Well bello, are you full? Do you need anything at all?”

“I’m all set—you need anything Papa?” he checked, “You look very handsome today.”

“Thank you, I’ve a meeting with a potential client this morning,” ahh. Which meant a meeting hosted by Lady Josephine…but the guy always made sure he looked his best for clients, so.

“Knock ‘em dead papa,” Krem encouraged, pecking a kiss to his cheek, “I’m gonna hit the hay.”

“Sleep well my boy,” Papa wished him, heading down stairs though Krem stopped a moment cause the guy didn’t head for the door—he went to the counter and asked Cabot something. Guy was usually a dick to everyone, but Cabot actually smiled, Krem could hear the happy din his voice made when he greeted his father and shook his hand over the counter, ignoring the customer already trying to get his attention to ask Tonio what he could do for him, nodding and disappearing into the little back room and coming back with a platter of…burnt muffins? Oh, not burnt just brown—chocolate. Huh. If he was still hungry Krem would’ve sat with him, but he picked out a muffin and smiled, thanking the barkeep who…honest to the Maker Krem had never seen him say the words ‘not a problem’ he made asking for a glass of water feel like you asked him to run ten laps around Skyhold to pour his sweat in a glass for you to drink…ended up usually tasting like you’d done just that honestly. Anyway, Papa was off and out the door, muffin in hand, a skip in his step. Okay, cool, time to sleep.

He did. Hard sleep, so much he couldn’t recall even dreaming when he did wake up, weight against his side and chest, something pressing against his cheek. Ahh, brim of a hat.

“Heya Cole,” Krem greeted groggily. Brim was making his cheek sore and suddenly the hat was…pretty sure Cole sent it flying across the room. “Mmm, thanks.”

“There was so much hurt when I got in,” …in his cheek? “Stroud’s mind is full of it from the Calling—it is loud.”

Oh. Oh shit, sounded like the poor Spirit was in pain from it. “Hey, I’m sorry buddy,” Krem went for soothing, rubbing circles on the boy’s back, “What can I do?”

“You’re very happy, content, that helps. Sera let me lay with her and her girlfriends—they were all very happy earlier but now their heads pound with ache from their fun. I heard you sleeping peacefully and came here.”

“Well, you can hang with me all you want today, just uh…well, all day if you need it,” didn’t wanna cancel on Ellie, but they wouldn’t have to cancel exactly, they could eat with Cole? It’d just be a normal date, maybe they’d get to just sleep in the same bed which was-

“Oh no, I would not want to interfere—I will help you set up if you let me, and then I will leave,” Cole insisted, smiling softly, “I have so many friends in the Inquisition, there are many places I can go. You are just my favorite.” And then he smiled bigger, “Oh! That makes you happy!”

Krem laughed a bit, running his hand over his face as he tried to wake up a bit more, “Yeah bud, that makes me happy. Wanna come to lunch with me?”
“Ellie invited me! She’s a favorite but she has so many things to do today, and I’m…hurts hurt me less when I’m more corporeal. Stroud is not so loud when I sit like this.”

“Then you do what you gotta do—I’m sorry there’s no turning off his um, hurt. For you and him.”

“I have tried to help, he thanked me but it’s something I cannot do—I tear to untangle and there is only more to cut, catch, caught,” he shuddered, though his voice verged on seething as he quietly admitted, “I…I hate Corypheus, and that makes me feel darkness. I do not like it.”

“We’ll get that bastard, don’t think about him,” Krem said, “He’ll get what’s coming to him. Focus on your friends,” pressed a kiss to his forehead, “you’re okay, everything’s gonna be okay.”

The Spirit hummed a bit, before, “You should get ready for lunch—I can help you with your strings.”

“Thanks bud.”

Guy didn’t do too bad of a job helping Krem lace up. Hadn’t shaved after he got in from his shift, he’d just laid down until breakfast so, quick, careful shave, just in case he didn’t get a chance to later. Ended up helping Cole a bit too when the Spirit got curious and wanted to try cleaning up the faint whispy fluff he got under and around his jaw.

“It does feel clean!” he was delighted to find, face upturned as he rubbed at the now smooth skin under his jawline.

“Lookin’ good—you wanna see if Maryden'll join us? I know it’s lunch but she’s gotta eat too, and we can sit nearby if Stroud’s stuff isn’t getting to you so bad.” With any luck, maybe the guy wouldn’t be in the Tavern? And it’d probably do Cole some good to get to see the songstress —she’d be glad to see him too.

Oh, guy’s eyes widened at that, “She will think I am so handsome?” and Krem nodded, so, “I will ask her! Would you walk with me?”

“Just gotta put on a shirt—too early and too sober to be topless in a bar.” What would Papa think, afterall, he mused.

“He would laugh, be pleased you were so comfortable with yourself, but worry you were cold.”

…that checked out.

Tavern wasn’t overly crowded—most people ate lunch wherever they were working, or outside more often since they were nearing Bloomingtide and they could at least pretend it was getting warmer what with the more consistent sunshine overhead. Stroud and Hawke weren’t at the bar, they usually had something—meetings and things with Leliana or Cullen—seemed like they slept odd hours too. So, for now, Cole seemed okay as they reached the first floor, and he greeted Maryden excitedly, showing her he shaved and earning a smile and a little kiss to his now smooth skin as she voiced her approval. Seemed like he had it in hand and Krem could hear the lilt of Ellie’s voice, cheerily chatting with someone.

Oh—Anya’s boyfriend, Noam something or other. She’d been hanging around him since he arrived with Barris—guy stopped by the Charger’s quarters to check with Krem if it was okay. Anya was Ellie’s so he was fine with it as long as she was, and he checked with her first to make sure she’d be cool with him passing along how to reach her in the field to the Templar so he could check himself—she was fine with that, and with Anya Mage-sitting their newest recruit, so, that sorted.

Oh, he was here too. Barris, alongside Ellie as she went on about a mile a minute, the Templar nodding to Krem with a smile, who offered a nod back, grinning as he wondered if Ellie realized she could talk faster than most people could keep up. Maker, Papa did an amazing job on her new clothes, she was wearing one of the nicer vested off-shoulder blouses and leggings he’d made for her, dark purple blouse, black gloves, vest, and leggings—tucked into what looked like brand new black boots, he supposed pajamas wouldn’t fly for a lesson with Madam de Fer.

“-good, Enchanter Fiona said to Madam de Fer you’re catching up so well!” she was enthusing, letting out an excited gasp as her gaze shifted from Noam to, “Cremisius! You’re awake—yay!” she greeted, reaching out her hands for him to take, pulling him to her as she popped up on her toes to press a kiss to his lips before turning her attention back to Noam, “This is my boyfriend, Cremisius! Cremisius, this is my new friend Noam!”

“Nice to see you again,” Krem said, offering his hand to shake, which the other boy took tentatively before returning his hand to where it’d been resting atop Anya’s head, scratching a bit as she panted contentedly, offering Krem a little ‘wuff’ in greeting, and he gave her a little wink and a nod of approval—pup still got excited whenever he came around but she was doing a good job of sitting still and comforting their new Mage friend.

“Sopporati—no magic here,” Krem assured.

“Mmm, I wouldn’t say no magic,” Ellie giggled. Smiley as she caught him up, “We were just talking about how Noam’s coming along with his magic—he just got out of lessons.”

Noam nodded, “I didn’t see you—you don’t train with the rest of the Mages?” he asked her.

“Sometimes I help Enchanter Fiona if she asks me to, but my schedule can get pretty crazy—I had lessons with Madam de Fer today.”

“Oh, are you um, an advanced student or a teacher or something?”

“Oh gosh, I’m just a student, nothing advanced or anything! I’ve just known my magic for a long time so,” she shrugged, “So if you have any questions or feel like you’re just not getting something, I’m always down to talk magic!”

“The In-“ Barris started.

“Del-rin!” Ellie sighed out the complaint, rolling her eyes theatrically.

A smile tugged at the Templar’s lips, “Ellie,” he amended, ‘is modest. She’s hardly ‘just a student”—I’ve seen her thwart possession by a demon of Envy,” he looked to the girl, sounding almost concerned, “And Seeker Pentaghast reported your recent struggle against demonic influence—you tried to rid a person of a demon who was, er…physically injected into their bloodstream? Her reports said you battled some sort of ailment to your magic the endeavor left, you…you’re feeling better I trust?”

…a demon physically what into someones what? Ellie- Ellie fought something like that? Her magic had been ‘ailment’ed? “El,” Krem breathed, hand resting against her back.
“Oh! Oh gosh!” she gasped, remorseful, “I’m sorry! I wasn’t like, hiding it or something—I’m fine, all better now magic and all, I was pretty wiped yesterday but two good sleeps in a row and I’m a-okay,” she promised, “I was out of it for a few days, that’s all, I didn’t really come around until the other night, and I got caught up making sure papi had something planned to cheer mami up after everything.”

Maker. His mouth worked for a moment, just-“I’m completely ridiculous aren’t I?” she asked sympathetic, he nodded, shrugging. “You still love me?” she hoped.

“Big time—no more experimental demon fighting.”

“No promises.”

“Huh…try not to get into fights with experimental demons?”

“Oh! I can try—I’m like amazing at trying! I spent ten entire years trying not to get caught for Apostacy and…I mean honestly to this day, I’ve never been apprehended for that specifically so…” she looked to Barris, feigning concern he might interfere with that.

Templar shrugged, raising his hands in defeat, “Hey, we’re a post-Circle society. Seen the Lietennant spar against the Iron Bull…seen him spar against Seeker Pentaghast, I’d rather not test him trying to arrest you.” And then he regarded her a moment, “…don’t much care to test you either.”

“Awe Delrin,” she smiled, “I’d like, destroy you,” she assured sincerely…for all of a second before, “Or at least confuse you a lot if you don’t speak Antivan—it’s my go-to move when getting arrested! Well, almost getting arrested, which is why it’s my go-to.”

“Antivan?”

“No hablas Trade!” Ellie snapped, Antivan accent on the loose, “Conozco mis derechos! Apartate! Soy un ciudadano Antiva! Exijo que me lleves a una Embajada!”

“…yeah, I give up, you’re free to go,” Barris chuckled.

Noam started…giggling? Quiet spurts that bubbled into full blown laughter as he pressed his hand against his mouth as if he could catch the sound as it escaped him.

“Damn El, what’d you say?” Krem asked.

“Sh-sh-she-,” stuttering ‘cause he was breathless not scared, which was a nice change of pace, “you used to demand to be taken to an Embassy?!”

She giggled, shrugging, “It’s not like they understood me most of the time, but if they did I mean…hey, why not?”

His laughter calmed and he wiped at his eyes with the back of his hand, sighing, “I’m sorry.”

“Oh gosh, don’t be,” Ellie said, “You look so handsome when you smile!” she sweetly encouraged, the mage boy blushing and ducking his face at that, so she said, “You guys ready? Everyone’s here, Cole’s inside, I can’t hear her, but I can feel it in my heart that my sissy’s awake and getting ready to come clomping down the stairs ready to eat because she’s starving.”
“Let me guess—you’re double hungry?” Krem supposed with a grin.

“Got it in one! We’re not twins but we’ve got conjoined hunger!” Ellie insisted as she led them inside, the moment they crossed the threshold there was the thunder of six feet slapping down the stairs and then,

“Inky!”

“Sissy!”

And now she was off to hug Sera, big jump, arms around the Elf girl’s neck and just hanging there.

“…they’re sisters?” Noam wondered, bit confused.

“Warned you they weren’t twins,” Krem joked, smiling and getting a smile out of the timid mage.

“Noam! This is Sera!” Ellie introduced them, “And these are her girlfriends—Dagna and Lace!”

“It’s a pleasure to meet you,” Lace said.

“Awe hey Noam-y!” Dagna greeted cheerily. “Noam’s a cute name!”

“It’s very nice to meet you all,” he answered shyly, Anya gave an encouraging sounding yip, licking at his hand.

“C’mon Noamy,” Sera said, “let’s grab a table and get something to eat—you can tell us how the Inquisition’s goin’ for you so far.”

Maker he was shy, but surrounded by the resident welcoming committee, they coaxed the basics out of him—he wasn’t entirely comfortable yet, with being a mage, but he was growing to enjoy it, he liked his lessons, liked most of the people he had lessons with, the Mages instructing them were patient. He seemed to grow more comfortable, started asking about everyone else, earnest to know about them.

“I mean, I know Ser Barris is a Templar and…” he looked to Krem, “you’re a Lieutenant but not a Tempar I take it? You work w-w-“

“With the great honking Qunari?” Krem offered, smiling and it put the boy back at ease, “The Iron Bull—don’t let him scare you, he’s a big softy.”

Sera snorted real loud at that, “Frig yeah—I seen him holding Inky, singing her lullabies when she’s sicky. Well, when she got sick bad on the Storm Coast anyway.”

“He runs a mercenary crew—the Bull’s Chargers. I’m his Lieutenant, so, second in command,” Krem explained. Noam nodded.

“That sounds exciting, you must be very brave,” he acknowledged.

“Cremisius is one of the bravest people I know,” Ellie assured sweetly, she was seated… almost in his lap, their chairs were right against each other so they sat with legs touching, her hand squeezing his where he’d rested it on her thigh, fingers interlocking. At least until she let go a bit to trace little patterns along the palm of his hand.
“Miss Dagna, you’re the Inquisition’s Arcanist?” Noam checked.

“You bet’cha!” the Dwarf woman was pleased to say.

“You must really like magic—to choose to study it.”

“Oh gosh, I love it. and I’ve learned so many incredible things while working for the Inquisition I mean between the Red Lyrium and all the demon samples and gol-ly, I just, I could stare into the Inquisitor’s Mark for forever studying it if I could,” Dagna sighed, though, “I mean, she’d probably let me but her boyfriend might want her hands for himself,” she giggled, winking at Krem.

Noam chuckled nervously at that, and then, looking to the Dwarf woman seated at his side, “You Miss Lace? What do you do?”

“I’m a Scout,” Lace said, gently slapping Sera’s hand away when the Elf girl tried to take her girlfriend’s distraction as an opportunity to sneak a potato wedge off her plate, Sera sighed and got up from her seat at the end of the table to go put in another order for more—Ellie raising her free hand to wave to the girl to get more for her too, she smiled sheepishly when Krem chuckled at that, pressed a kiss to her temple while Lace explained, “I usually scout ahead of the Inquisitor’s party, make certain there’s a clear, safe way for them to get where they need to go, and lay down a good idea for them of what’s in the area—things they should investigate, dangers to avoid, that sort of thing.”

Noam nodded. “That sounds dangerous.”

Lace shrugged, “I enjoy it, and it’s worth it when our Lady and her party make it safe,” she said, smiling to Ellie who beamed back at her.

Sera wasn’t back just yet so Noam moved onto, the Spirit seated at Ellie's side, oh, that was sweet there was like a little chain sort of, Ellie's Marked hand in Krem's, and once she finished eating she'd slung an arm over Cole's shoulders, a hand in his hair scratching and massaging a bit like she knew the Spirit needed a little extra love today. Maryden had been able to take a bit of a break and eat with them, peppered a few kisses to the top of his head and promised she'd be thinking pleasant thoughts for him. Noam tentatively addressed him now, "Um…what about you, C-Cole, is it?”

…who smiled serenely and informed him, “I am Cole!”

“Yes you are, Cuddly,” Sera said as she plopped back into a seat…which was Lace’s lap now, apparently, the Dwarf woman grunting before she wrapped her arms around her girlfriend’s waist, could be heard giggling as Sera went on, “Cole’s Spirity, he hears when people Hurt inside, like in their hearts’n’pish and then he helps them heal. ‘cause he’s like, Compassion. So he’s a real sweetie and you don’t gotta be scared of him none if he comes poofing around to help you, alright?” Noam nodded, timidly, but he nodded, so Sera smiled, “Good!”

“What about you Mis-“

“Jus’ Sera’s fine,” Sera cut him off. “Me and Cole got the same gig here—I mean not Spirity gigs, but people jobs—we party it up with the Herald of Andraste. Last week we slayed a Dragon! It was friggin’ sweet!”

“You slayed a dragon?” Noam asked, wide eyed.

“Hell yeah, didn’t we Ink?” Sera asked Ellie.
“Like…” Noam looked to Ellie, “y-you went with them? You’re er, part of the party too?”

That got him a bit of a confused look. “um…yeah,” Ellie said simply with a shrug. “I mean gosh, I’d never make my team go out without me. Sometimes I have to stay behind, for my safety, but I mean I’d be a pretty bad leader if I just said ‘hey that’s cool, looks deadly—you guys go on ahead I’ll catch up’ when we come up on big fights.”

“Leader,” Noam laughed like she’d made a joke or something—not meanly, just, like he thought she’d said something she meant for him to laugh at but uh…everyone just sort of looked between one another, not quite sure where the disconnect was and he realized she wasn’t kidding about the leader bit, “Y-you lead the Inquisitor’s party? Inquisitor Trevelyan doesn’t do that herself?”

“Oh!” Ellie said, going to explain but,

Cabot could be heard sighing tiredly as he dropped a few platters of potato wedges onto the table, and Noam startled a bit when the guy clapped him on the shoulder, “Kid. She is Inquisitor Trevelyan.”

“…is…was he serious?” Noam questioned.

“Uh-huh. Ellie ‘Eleanor’ Trevelyan,” she let go of Krem’s hand and ungloved it to wriggle the fingers of her Marked hand in a wave.

“It’s out! Gimme!” Dagna implored, grabby hands, so Ellie obliged, leaning over Krem who…eyes up, he- there were people present and if the Maker loved him even a little, he’d get a much better view later. She offered her Marked hand to the Dwarf girl sitting across from Sera and Lace, “Sera said you had a nasty Rift fight in Crestwood, I wanna see if it did anything…pretty pretty,” she cooed over the Mark, Maker.

“Thanks!” Ellie said, waiting patiently as the Dwarf looked.

“I…I’m so sorry I didn’t- oh Maker, please, forgive me,” Noam rambled out, ashen.

“No one’s upset with you hun,” Ellie warmly assured, “it’s my bad—I kind of thought you knew already and I didn’t want you thinking you absolutely had to come to lunch with me or anything so I didn’t whip out my title when asking you, and I don’t usually go around introducing myself that way on my own anyway. I forget, and I’ve had like two or thee name and title changes since the Breach and just as many concussions so,” she shrugged, ”you get what you get.”

“But why would you want to have lunch with me?”

“The same reason I want to have lunch with everyone—I’m hungry and I want to be friends, lunch is an efficient way of getting both. I like hanging out and having fun, but I’ve got things to do so a girl’s gotta multitask ya know?”

“Hey kid, you know how you ask me to do stupid shit and I tell you I don’t gotta do jack?” Cabot called from the bar as he cleaned out a glass, and Ellie nodded. “…st’n till the top of the hour.”

“Thank you for reminding me! I love you, you beautiful rebel!” Ellie said, using her free hand to blow him a kiss he swatted at. “I really really did enjoy this Noam, and I’m really sorry, but I’ve got a meeting with my advisors before I pass judgement on something this afternoon. I hope we can do this again sometime.”
“That would be nice,” he agreed softly, “Thank you.”

“No problem—Dagna, love you, die for you, but I need both of my hands for important Inquisition business right now.”

“Awe, okay cutie, go on with both your hands,” Dagna supposed, releasing her hold.

Important Inquisition business was unsnapping these two leather pouches that were at her hips, almost like little hard cases meant for carrying potion or something but uh…they were empty. At least until she used both hands to grab fistfuls of potato wedges, and stored them away for later.

“Have a great day,” she offered the table, and Krem thought she was gonna scoot out and go around, but she just stood up, turned on the ball of one foot to straddle his lap and press a quick kiss to his lips and his brain was still playing catch-up, just barely heard her ask, “Walk me?”

“Walk?…oh! Through Skyhold. Cause assassins and stuff. “Sure lovely.” Did he say words? Yeah, he said word, good job.

“Gracias!” she chirped, unstraddling him to stand on his other side, heading for the door and he only just barely remembered to at least offer a wave to the table as he shot up and followed after her. She called over her shoulder, "Cole! He'll be right back, okay?’

“Okay!” the Spirt called after them.

Yup, yeah, it was okay. More than—Ellie’s giggling echoed through the entrance to the Great Hall as she pulled him aside, through the doorway that led into the Chantry Gardens though she stopped there—doors closed on either side of them as she pulled Krem into a kiss he gladly obliged.

“We’re still on for dinner tonight?” she asked as she pulled away.

Uh, hell yeah. “Of course.”

“Great!” she said, though she worried at her lip a little, “Um…so, this is just like a heads up in case it would bother you or be a deal breaker or something—because I’d never ever ever want to do something that made you uncomfortable or not feel safe.”

He raised a hand to cup her face, thumb brushing along her cheek, “El, honey, whatever it is it’s okay to talk about,” he promised. She…did she want to get experimental or something? He hadn’t really planned to do anything too wild for her first time. He wasn’t…uh…he didn’t necessarily have the same appetites as Bull or Dorian but uh…he also couldn’t imagine her being into anything too crazy either.

“Ummm when we’ve made out and stuff, have you felt anything?” Probably whipped out the incredulous look too fast but it made her snort raise a hand to her mouth as she giggled, “I mean from my magic, silly.”

“Have you uh…been casting or something when we make out? Not getting enough practice in in the field?” he teased.

“No you goof, it’s- um. I mean it’s my magic so I feel it, obviously, it sort of um… responds?” she tested the word carefully, “when we um. Are together. Leliana said she can feel her girlfriend’s magic when they’ve kissed and things, and then again when they’ve had sex so, if you feel stuff from my magic too…that might be a thing? And if that freaks you out I totally totally-mmf!’” she startled a bit but smiled into their kiss as he cut her off, just- that’s what she was nervous about?

“S’long as it’s your magic? I’m cool with it,” he assured, “I trust you, lovely—you and your magic both. I mean I love you, and I can’t love you and feel something different for your magic—it’d be like loving only half of you. Which I mean, if I had to pick half, I’d go with the left,” he said, “cause you know. The power and all that,” he smiled, their hands were intertwined and he raised her Marked hand, shaking it a bit before pressing a kiss to her knuckles.

She nodded, like that made sense, “And my left boob is just a little bit bigger than my right one so…”

Huh, “Is it?”

“Maybe it is. Maybe that’s a red herring. You’ll just have to find out,” she shrugged, smiling mischievously. “The art of seduction, Cremisius, is mystery!” she informed him laughingly as she squeezed his hand and started pulling him back into the Great Hall. “Have fun with Cassandra—no getting hurt or anything, kay? I mean that goes for in general but the art of seduction also requires not being too beat up to seduce. It’s in the rule book.”

He snorted a bit, “You’ve read it?”

“I wrote it!”

…this was either the absolute worst…and absolute best conversation they could be having as they passed Mother Giselle. She looked a scarred, uttered a quiet, startled, ‘Oh, good Heavens!’ She’d pissed off Ellie, been vile to Dorian so…he was going with best.

“Hola Tia Josie!” Ellie greeted cheerily.

The woman startled a bit, “Oh! Oh goodness! Hola sweet mija, oh I had just the most wonderful time last night—thank you again,” she said as she set aside the paperwork she was reading over and rose from her seat, “Cullen and Leliana should arrive momentarily. Hello Cremisius, I hope you’re having a pleasant day?”

“I am—your days been pretty busy huh?” Krem supposed, offering, “I can put in a lunch order for you.”

She blushed at that. “Both Aclassi men have made such offers today—your father beat you to it, I’m afraid.” For a second he thought that meant she’d already eaten but, “Something is coming. I’m hardly starving, the sweet man had a muffin waiting on my desk when I returned from the War Room this morning.”

Ellie’s hand squeezed his almost painfully hard as she endeavored to suppress a happy squeak—would’ve been ear-drum bursting. Krem figured, but she managed to keep it down at non-wild levels as she said, “That’s so nice of him! And only fair, mamis, papi, and I went for cake after our meeting! Huh...should we get something for Leliana?”

“Oh she made the mistake of teasing Tonio for not providing enough muffins for everyone and the poor man immediately went and brought one back for her, she shook her head, “your father is far too kind, Cremisius, but I suppose that is where you get it from.”

“And my strong chin—wonderful to see you again my boy!” Papa greeted as he entered, carrying a tray, “your lunch my lady.”

“Tonio, honestly-” she started.
“They’re rather swamped in the kitchens, your meal was prepared and waiting with no one available to bring it, it wouldn’t do to let it get cold and you must be famished,” he insisted, setting the tray before her on her desk.

“I- I did think it would take awhile for it to arrive, I haven’t the time to eat just now I’m afraid, I have a meeting with the Inquisitor and her Advisors presently,” Lady Josephine apologized.

“We’re just chatting in your office Tia—you can eat!” Ellie said, plopping down into the chair in front of her desk, “I’ll be eating! I brought potatoes! Here, you want some? Papa Tonio?”

Lady Josephine broke out in a smile, giggling as she gently reproached, “Oh mija, goodness, surely Mister Aclassi did not work so hard on your wardrobe to have you filling your potion cases with greasy snacks.”

Papa looked confused at that. “Why ever would I make her potion cases? It was my understanding Marehis carries Ellie’s potions, I quite assure you they’re being used as intended— they’re snack pockets, my Lady.”

“I wasn’t messing around when I hired Papa'classi—the man knows what he’s doing!” Ellie informed her, taking a bite out of a potato wedge.

“I’m pleased my designs serve you well bella,” Papa said, leaning down to drop a kiss to her hair, “I hope you have a pleasant meeting.”

Ellie wrinkled her nose a bit, “Kinda have to decide what to do when I preside over a Mayor who murdered his own people in like, an hour or so.”

“How horrible, I did hear something about that,” Papa sighed, and then he knelt at Ellie’s side, taking her Marked hand in his, “Would you be opposed to a moment of prayer bella?”

“…not at all!” Ellie chirped, pleasantly surprised. Krem uh…wasn’t sure what- okay, praying? Lady Josie folded her hands and bowed her head, and Papa and Ellie bowed their heads as he rubbed circles on the back of her hand with his thumb and brought his other hand to rest on the crown of Ellie’s head so…Krem bowed his head and closed his eyes.

“Holy Maker, we thank you for another day together, to be with those we love. We ask you pour your guidance and wisdom upon her as she deliberates over this decision, bring peace to her with the choice she must make, and lift the burden of it from her heart. May she find relief from the deeds this man has done as she delivers her judgment, and may he find peace when he is returned to you at the end of his days. Bless this beautiful girl that brings my son so much joy,” he asked… “…and bless Cremisius, my most precious child, bless the Iron Bull and the Chargers and all of the Inquisitor’s party, bless the Inquisition and all who serve it. Amen.” Oh man, couldn’t end his prayers any other way, huh? Maker bless his papa—Krem sent up the prayer himself before opening his eyes. Oh, Ellie was a little teary eyed, wrapping her arms around his father’s neck.

“I love you so much,” she mumbled against his shoulder.

Papa chuckled warmly at that, “Oh bella, I love you,” he assured, patting her on the back. “Be well my dear.” She nodded, pecking a kiss to his cheek before he rose up. “I’ll leave you to it.”

“I’ll be on my way too,” Krem said, he said he’d meet Cassandra and then he planned to wash up and get ready for tonight…though uh, he should check, “Marehis is coming ‘round right?”
“Oh! She’s with Leliana—they’ll be here soon,” Ellie assured. “There’s guards right out in the hall, and Lady Josie’s got a pretty mean swing with her clipboard.”

“I can stick around until they get here,” Krem shrugged.

“Goooo you promised mami—you’re supposed to train right? And you love training with her!”

“I love you breathing more, if only by the barest of margins,” he assured.

She held up her Marked hand, “Cremisius, on my honor as both a person and a redhead, I absolutely promise not to get assassinated before mami gets here.”

“…promise?”

“Absolutely!” she smiled, "Go—have fun! Be safe!"

“Will do,” he said, giving her a little kiss goodbye and waving to Lady Josephine before he left the room with his father…closed the door behind him and then stood to lean his back against the wall across from the stairs, arms crossed over his chest as he waited. Papa chuckled, patting him on the shoulder as he left him.

Marehis did show up a few minutes later, Leliana at her side and Cullen behind them though when the Elf woman opened her mouth to greet him he raised a finger to his lips before patting her on the shoulder and pecking a kiss to her cheek and he whispered, “I’m not here,” before moving aside to let them through.

“Hello da’vehnan,” Marehis said as she opened the door to Lady Josephine’s office, Krem was almost out the door into the Great Hall with Cullen and Leliana as good cover if Ellie could see around Marehis.

“Hola mami!” and then, “Buh-bye Cremisius!” Damn! She was giggly about it though, so.

Cassandra…didn’t really do giggly, but uh…she seemed a whole other level of tense…pissed off as he approached her on the practice field with Cole at his side—she was beating down on a pair of practice dummies with her sword like they deserved being chopped to bits and sent straight to hell when she was through. Maker.

“Oh, she is upset with Him but she’s more upset with herself,” Cole said quietly. With herself?

“Cassandra?” he greeted tentatively. From out of swinging distance, just in case.

The woman finished the blow she was on before stepping back and turning to face him, catching her breath. “Ahh…Krem…come, shall we spar? Greetings Cole.”

“You don’t need me, I’ll just watch,” the Spirit serenely offered. Kay. Yeah, Krem had this…maybe? “You do!” he assured before he uh…vanished. Nice.

“He does what?” Cassandra questioned, confused.

“Want to spar with you,” Krem said, “but uh, only if you’re finished working out whatever that was, ’cause I got a date tonight I’m trying to be chipper for, I’m not looking for a deathmatch.”

She sighed, sheathing her sword. “I apologize, I was perhaps working out some frustration—
I would do no such thing upon you in training sweet boy.”

Instinct was to ask if everything was okay but uh, she’d been through a thing or two lately so. “You need to talk about it?”

“No,” she shook her head. Though she sighed again, “I- I thought I would make progress today with…” she cleared her throat. “I have been entrusted with an important tome, the writ bestowed upon the highest Seeker in our…now demolished Order.”

“Dwindling.”

“Pardon?”

“Dwindling—if you wanna stick with a d-word. I’m used to offering words to El,” he shrugged. “Seekers aren’t demolished, Seeker. You’re still here.”

That got a bit of a smile tugging at her lips, “I suppose that much is true. Unfortunately that means I must decide how to move forward and I’m…struggling.”

“You…I mean you still feel the Seekers should be a thing, right?”

“I do, I’ve dedicated everything to the Order, I believe in it, but…so did Seeker Lucious. And then he read that damned book and apparently…found it wanting. I am admittedly fearful of what I might find when I consult its contents.”

“You know when I got landed with a book I thought looked like a bad time in school I always just took a peek at the table of contents and skimmed the important looking chapters.”

She huffed a bit of a laugh at that, “This is hardly a school assignment.”

“…a superior gave you a book that’s supposed to teach you how to run the Order, and that’s left you with an assignment: to run the Order. You’ve been putting it off for almost an entire week and it’s due…” he bopped his head side to side as he thought it over, “honestly a reformed Order was due Ages ago, at least if you ask most people. It’s technically a group project but you’re stuck doing all the work yourself. So yeah, it’s basically just like every school project I’ve ever had to do.” he offered her a sympathetic smile, “I understand this is hard. But if you’re just going to keep beating yourself up about it, and you really wanna tackle this? I say baby step it.”

“Baby step?”

“You know. Little itty bitty steps? I wasn’t totally kidding about that table of contents thing—I mean it’s got something like that, right? If it’s got an introduction, try that out. If it’s got a chapter dedicated to how to move forward if the Seekers face a set back like this, or something about…how the founding members got everything rolling? Go for it. Avoid anything that looks like a world-view-crumbling secret in it until you’ve put the effort in—gotten to a place where you feel confident that you’ve armed yourself with the knowledge you need to get the Order started back up…and then arm yourself with the knowledge that will test whether or not it really should be. I mean you’re starting over from scratch—if you read the worst of the worst and think it can be rebuilt without it, go for it. If you come to the conclusion it isn’t worth saving, know you’ve absolutely done your best and absolve yourself of the responsibility.”

The Seeker regarded him with quiet surprise. “That…is devastatingly sound advice,” she said.

“Yeah well you’re pretty devastating with a sword so I figure I gotta cheer you up or die training with you.”

“Oh, the Iron Bull is correct when he terms you a ‘brat’,” Cassandra assured him, warmly, bemused smile on her face. “That will be three laps along Skyhold’s walls. If you’d care to join me?”

Oh cool, she didn't always run with him, but, “Be glad to.”

It was fun, running the walls, pushups, a little practice sparring the Seeker before a scout approached to inform her it was time for Ellie’s ruling.

“I promised her I would attend,” Cassandra said.

He nodded. “No worries, me too.” Well, it was an unspoken thing but he was pretty sure he was supposed to attend his girlfriend’s important career events? “Cole, you good to come along buddy or do you need me to hang with you someplace else?” Judgments could uh, hurt and he was pretty sure the Spirit was still with them.

Cole reappeared before them, “It will be fine, Ellie is lighter for having prayed with your father and she feels good about her decision.”

She looked like it, serious but confident as she sat in her throne, offering Krem a small smile when she saw him in the crowd next to Cassandra who murmured greeting Cullen as the man approached to stand with them.

“Ahh, I’ve not missed anything?” Papa asked quietly as he filed in just behind Krem.

“No, just getting started,” Krem whispered back.

“I’ve not seen her hold congress before, and it seems like such a harrowing thing, I wished to show support, ahh,” he raised his hand to wave a bit when Ellie saw him, Maker.

Guy was sweet. Little embarrassing sometimes…but sweet.

“Inquisitor,” Lady Josephine said, “we bring before you today Gregory Dedrick—“

“Oh, Lady Montilyet plays a part?” Papa whispered. Krem nodded, refraining from pointing out that this wasn’t a school play or something and just smiling and nodding, though when the man opened his mouth again, “Yes, you are talking too much,” Cole cheerily assured the man's internal concern.

“Oh! Of course, thank you my boy,” he said, patting Cole on the shoulder, kept it quiet as Lady Josephine laid out the asshole’s crimes for all to hear.

“Have you anything to say for yourself?” Ellie asked. Good job, her voice carried well. It wasn’t a play but still, projection was important and she did a good job!

“Th-there’s no cure for the Blight!” the man pleadingly insisted, “And I- I couldn’t convince people to leave a sick child or loved one behind.”

“So you herded the infected into once place and flooded Old Crestwood?” Lady Josephine questioned him, "Were no innocents caught in the waters?”

“Nearly everyone in the village was infected—I swear it! Have mercy, I couldn’t tell the survivors I’d drowned their own families to save them. I-I couldn’t.”
Ellie nodded as if she supposed that much was true, but, “Well, you’ll have to. Gregory Dedrick it was the people—your people—of Crestwood® that you wronged. You will be returned to them and confess your crimes. They can decide what to do with you. It was not just Crestwood citizens in the village—there were refugees fleeing, trying to get help. The Inquisition won’t be funding a confession tour for you to go around Ferelden admitting to every area affected by the Fifth Blight what you did when refugees came to your town seeking sanctuary, but everything you have left in this world—your home, all the shiny possessions you made certain would be safe from the flood waters so you didn’t have to start all over like every single other survivor you ‘saved’? Everything you own will be sold and the money donated to agencies that assist in the rescue and aiding of Blight Refugees.”

“No- no no no please—” he started begging as guardsmen came to lead him away, “Maker. I should’ve drowned with them.” Yeah dude, that’d’ve been pretty ideal. Bastard.

Seemed safe enough to talk now, everyone was dispersing or moving to get a shot at talking to Ellie as she stepped down from her throne, so, “That seemed a just decision,” Papa said. “Are… are we supposed to clap?”

“Nah. People mostly show up to either play kiss-ass or keep the betting pool alive.”

“People place bets?” he rasped out, shocked.

“Kind of is—not on specific culprits, just er…how many judgements before she doles out an execution.”

“That is a terrible thing to bet upon!”

Yup. Krem wasn't sure it would make his father feel any better telling him he had an entire gold down on Ellie never opting for execution…girl was just a bit too creative for that.

And now…he needed to go make with the creativity. Ellie was occupied until tonight so he was off—wash up, set up, pick up his date!

Cole was brilliant help…for one, it was faster to wash up with the Spirit boy helping with his back. Skinner came around wielding a straight razor, thankfully it was to offering neatening up his hair a bit. Which was nice of her…sweet, the woman even pecked a kiss to the back of his head when she was finished, and wished him,

“Have a pleasant evening with the small one,”

"Thanks Skinner. Ouch!” she was twisting his damn ear!

"You will remember you are not finished until you are both finished."

Maker! "Yeah, of course!” knew his basic bedroom etiquette, didn't need his ear twisted off over it.

Papa’d made him a few new things, tunics and trousers that fit amazing, were lined for warmth and…too, the man had taken painstaking care to make it so the lining of his tunics matched up perfectly with his binder—an exact cut out in the lining so he didn’t have to er, feel self-conscious about the potential for the outline of his binder being visible through his tunic. Made it so uh, he could wear a tunic fitted tight across his shoulders and chest and it just…looked entirely like any other guy wearing it. New underthings were a bloody lifesaver—no more socks! Or more like he had a shit ton of socks now because none of them were going into his pants anymore, they were packed by design, the stuffing sewed into just the right place, he didn’t have to think about it anymore. So, evergreen tunic with silvery buttons, black trousers, black boots… yeah, he felt pretty good.

“Oh you feel handsome!” Cole was pleased to enthuse, informing him, “And Ellie will think you are so handsome!”

“Thanks bud.”

“You are welcome!”

Maker it was a lot easier to get everything ready when the person you were working with could read your mind. It was almost like working with a mirror—Krem setting one side of the table a Friend on the servant staff had been good to set up in Ellie’s room, while Cole set the other. Lady Josie was kind enough to tack a few extra white candlesticks onto the order for Skyhold’s candelabras and chandeliers, helped him find spare silver candle holders for them to put on the table, and the Ambassador got him names—a chandler for some nice, thicker scented candles he set up on the nightstands, and a botanist for some roses, red, just a few of ’em in a little vase he set in the center of the table. And Stitches had been a real pal and gotten him fresh, whole, Embrium blossoms he placed around, on the table, the nightstands, scattered around and on her bed. Ellie genuinely found the blossoms to be pretty and it didn’t hurt to have them around the girl, they were good for preventing uh, respiratory issues and he uh…well he’d had one of the top three most uncomfortable conversation he’d ever had with Stitches, trying to er…sort out if uh- what sort of complications might come up with um, asthma and- and uh, having er-

He so did not wanna risk Ellie’s night ending with an orgasm-induced asthma attack. Not happening. Nope.

Krem was just about to grab a few logs to put in the fire place to get it going but Cole gasped excitedly, just about startled the crap out of him because…huh, they’d been working in silence the whole time, hadn’t they? Maker. But it was understandable, ’cause Krem got damn excited too when the Spirit announced, "Ellie is ready! She's excited and nervous and she feels so pretty! Do I need to go tell her she's pretty?" he wondered.

"You can, but you don't have to, I'm pretty sure that's my job," Krem said. Maker, what a job, easiest gig he’d had in life.

"Oh good! You should go then. I can make fire, everything will be perfect! There will be guards outside and I will be watching for danger but I promise not to watch your date! Maryden and the Iron Bull said I should not!"

"Thanks bud, I appreciate it. You're feeling better?" Krem double checked.

"You would let me stay if I wasn't, and Ellie wouldn't be sad or angry or jealous," Cole informed him, deciding, "that makes me so happy! I feel better, I will be fine! Your papa wants to make me new things, I do not need them but he worries about my body being comfortable and clean. We are having dinner and he will use the tape that tells him how big my body is! The Iron Bull wants to compare measurements but he said it the way he says his sex jokes, does he want to have sex with me?" the Spirit wondered, "If he needed to, I would, he's so nice and full of healing when he does it with Dorian, and the kitchen hands before him. He helped Adrian heal the hurt her ex-husband left, she started dating again because the Iron Bull reminded her of gentleness and control, that she never has to be scared again, no one is allowed to make her feel that way."

"…I think he's good Cole but that's uh, sweet of you?" Krem said. Maker, Bull was a good guy…obnoxious though, last thing he needed to hear was his sexual prowess being 'healing'. "I'm gonna pick up Ellie. You have fun with papa, okay?" he intoned, clapping the boy on the shoulder, pecking a kiss to his cheek, "Thanks for all your help, seriously."

"You are welcome!"

Felt pretty welcome when he got to Marehis's room, the woman answered the door, smiling as she greeted, "Good evening da'mi, you look very handsome. Da'vehnan, your date is here."

"Oh yay! That's so much better than assassins!" Ellie could be heard cheering, heels clicking across stone and Marehis ducked behind the door to press a kiss to Ellie's cheek and offering an exchange of 'goodnights' and the order to 'have fun' before moving out of the way so the girl could step out, closing the door behind her before she turned to face him as she said, "Mami wouldn't let me answer the door just in case, but gosh, wow. If you were here to kill me, I'm like, pretty positive I wouldn't even be mad about it."

Was…was she talking? Neat skill, great skill, he'd have to pick it up sometime. Papa was the one who really taught him how to talk he was pretty sure, maybe he'd be down to help a guy out re-learning the ability 'cause- well, he'd put just as much effort into making his son speechless to begin with. Ma-ker. "W-we- I just- we're only going to be at your place tonight you- Maker. I might be the only person that actually gets to see you," he was pretty sure there was something wrong about that, something selfish. Tonio Aclassi could make a damn dress, and whoever the hell Ellie's birth parents were? They could make a damn daughter. Illusion neckline hit high around her shoulders with thick dark blue embroidery all around that dipped down to a point in the center just below the dip at the base of her throat between collarbone, and then a few dangerous inches of sheer, dark blue material before the uh, solid sweetheart neckline that only just kept the mystery alive, covered her to her waistline, and then the skirt- Krem's heart just about lept into his throat, because for a moment his brain just saw the sheer material again but it couldn't be seen through, the skirt of her dress was made up of several layers of silky, sheer material that fell to her knees, at least in the front, hemline dipped a bit lower in the back, down to the middle of her calves. Feet were slipped into matching heels with a bit of leather-lace along the back of her ankles. "You…you look amazing El."

She blushed at that, oh, hair was loose except the left side was pulled back a bit, held that way by the hair combs she'd gotten from Madam de Fer, lips a bit darker than usual, red, pretty. She was just so pretty, gorgeous and, "You're the only person I really want to see me tonight so, I'm glad you like it," she said, smoothing her skirt a bit under her unmarked hand.

"The dress? Yeah, I like it," he supposed, "It's that its you whose in it that I love." Did that make sense? Had he said it right?

Ellie was beaming and blushy and shyly taking his hand as she stepped forward to press a feather-light kiss to his lips before linking arms with him, so uh, yeah, he was pretty sure he said something right.

"Eleanor!" Madam de Fer called as they passed by her quarters, partition's half-open. The woman had been seated in a high-backed chair reading but she set her book aside and looked up at them, "My darling girl," she breathed, "you look absolutely divine! Oh I do hope our trip to Val Royeaux gives you proper opportunity to dress up, Mister Aclassi has done miracles with your wardrobe."

"Thanks Vivienne!"

"Certainly," the woman gave a regal nod. "And Lieutenant, I daresay you make for quite the strapping escort for our Lady this evening, very handsome. Your father's work as well?"
"Me and my clothes, he's a very talented man," Krem offered with a grin.

"Quite," the Enchanter agreed, somewhat amused. "Oh darlings do have a splendid evening."

"You too!" Ellie wished her, hugging Krem's arm a bit tighter as they continued on into the library. Practically empty this time of night, Enchanter Fiona offered Ellie a warm smile and a polite nod as they passed her by where she was restacking the books near Dorian's alcove, likely because the Tevinter mage wasn't around to complain about the titles inhabiting the shelves near his chosen spot. Bull was probably back by now, the guy was likely off uh, welcoming him home.

He was nervous, once they were at the door to her quarters, he knew everything would be just as he left it but Maker, he just- wanted everything to be perfect, was afraid what he'd done wouldn't nearly be enough. He just slapped some flowers and moodlighting on her room, that was it!

You'd think he completely re-did the place top to bottom and shifted the heavens or something, Ellie looked so surprised, gasped as her mouth dropped open and she stepped away to look around, turn about to take it all in before she looked to him, breathing, "Cremisius," she sounded amazed, "it's beautiful, gosh, you did this all for me?"

"Cole helped with set-up, but uh yeah. You like it?" he made sure, bit of nerves left over just 'cause, he could be, and uh, well there was still plenty of light but the overhead lamps were out, just candle and firelight, moonlight pouring in. He hadn't thought about it until they were standing in the middle of it all that fire and night didn't always end well for them and it might hit home with Ellie.

"I love it," she said softly, looking at him…like he was what was so amazing about it all, sort of a head-rush really, and that was even before Cole's gentle assurance that silenced the last bit of anxiety in him.

When she thinks of fire and night now, she will think of this, of you. Enjoy it.

Chapter End Notes

Antivan:
No hablas Trade! Conozco mis derechos! Apartate! Soy un ciudadano Antiva! Exijo que me lleves a una Embajada!=I don't speak Trade! I know my rights! Back off! I'm an Antivan citizen! I demand you take me to an Embassy!
Duermete mi nina, duermete mi amor, duermete pedazo de mi corazon= "Sleep my girl, sleep my love, sleep piece of my heart" these are the opening lyrics to a Spanish (Antivan) Lullaby Durmete mi Nino(a)/Sleep my Child

End Notes:
*Abernale Harish=this is the canon name of the person who betrays Butcher, and his code name is Painter (so I assume he falsifies documents for Leliana). This can be read in the War Table mission end-note when completing Expose the Double Agent

*Crestwood Dragon=the dragon in Crestwood is the easiest dragon to slay in-game, it doesn't drop other enemies and it also doesn't fly around too much during your fight. Being low level and not having any babies to throw at you, and also being described as smaller in the DragonAgeWiki page, leads me to assume she's a young dragon who hasn't had a clutch yet because she's just barely not a baby herself

*the screaming to breathe thing=when you're being pulled at high windspeeds with a great deal of air being pushed around that can mean air being pushed into your lungs that's hard to push back out to do the whole 'breathing' thing, you can only get so much air in you before you need to breathe out and get new air in, and the easiest way I've found to push forced air out of my lungs (while riding Rollercoasters, not slaying dragons, unfortunately) is to use the air to scream

*Cassandra's loyalty mission is affected by observations made during In Hushed Whispers and Champions of the Just, and since we do both for this fic, both their contributions to Cassandra's worries about the Seekers are accounted for

*Cole usually comments on the other's loyalty missions, especially when it covers trauma, but there's zero dialog between him and Cassandra about Promise of Destruction, so Ellie pulling some things from Daniel's final moments to help Cassandra cope is sort of a fic-fix for that

*Noam Willit is a canon mage character pulled from the War Table missions you assign to the Templars and his backstory comes from that!

*Carmenum di Amatus, okay, "on aching branch do blossoms grow" is 100% phallic, the point of view is that of the poet (a Tevinter man) about another man, which is why Cassandra is bemused in-game at the choice of poem and probably too why she takes over and reads it to male Inquisitor. You pick the book up in Redcliffe which, yeah, was just invaded by Vinatori, and I could 100% see Dorian suggesting the poem in the hopes the Inquisitor (or Cullen, in this case) is standing in the moonlight rhapsodizing about another man's penis to Cassandra

*Ellie meets a gardener in CH 5, I have him being connected to the woman you can go to in Val Royeaux for flowers and she offers flowers she makes special for Celene. There's tulips but then she mentions rare flowers that would be perfect, so I assume that's what Inquisitor ends up with, we don't actually see the flowers in the Romance cutscene, so, after some research I decided to make Andrasten Roses based off of Juliet Roses 'cuz they're pretty and a bit fancy/rare

*Guard yourselves my babies! Be patient and gentle with yourselves and be mindful that when you suffer mental illness, your actual brain is sick, and from our brains come our thoughts which means...they're not necessarily our thoughts 100% of the time. I learned this the hard way about two months into writing TSTT, dealing with near-constant compulsive thoughts like that even though everything in all other areas of my life was going 1000% awesome, I was genuinely petrified over it and couldn't figure out what was going on, and I unfortunately had just been to my doctor and couldn't afford a non-insured visit. SO my ass had to research some things on my own and I did the DUMB RISKY thing of cutting back on my medication, and while it worked out for me PLEASE NEVER DO THAT, go the Ellie route, always contact your medical provider, via Inquisition raven if you have to! Take care of yourselves my neuro-atypical guys, gals, and non-binary pals!

*Mayor's of Crestwood's judgement is fanon, in canon you can give him to Ferelden or the Wardens the wardens if you're done with Here Lies the Abyss (both which just play 'pass the prisoner' to people he didn't directly hurt which is 'meh'), or you can execute him and that's just a bit too easy. He provides inspiration for the best type of punishment when he cries about not bearing to confess to his people, and that's exactly what he should be made to do, he made a decision for them and now he's got to live with it.
Chapter Summary

Next Chapter! Of Somewhat Fallen Fortune ended up getting it's own entire chapter because reasons and I'm sorry but also you're welcome.
Josephine Montilyet arranges a bit of a reprieve for the Inquisitor and friends in Val Royeaux, planning to handle her family's misfortunes swiftly, surely there was some confusion and her couriers were targeted in the hopes to destroy documentation important to the Inquisition. Unfortunately, even the most meticulous plans run awry, Here lies shenanigans: false romances turning into real romances, the foil to the 'sharing a bed' trope, Minister Seduction, Orlesian Theatre, and the Iron Bull introduces Ellie to Espresso.

Chapter Notes

As per usual I own nothing. I reiterate this because I reference the play Tartuffe by Moliere in this chapter and...this may be a surprise...but I'm not a 397 year old Frenchman. So I own nothing of Tartuffe, or DA:I.

Here's part two of this update! Fun Fact: I...have never, ever, in the history of this fic pre-Chapter 24, spelled the name 'Josephine' correctly on the first try. Every single time it has been written in this fic up to this point, I have misspelled it horribly and had to go back and correct it. Don't know why, my brain just entirely Refused to spell it right, I always put "Josiephene" or "Josiphiene" or some such horrible cock up of her beautiful, beautiful name. Until this chapter: Friends, I finally did it, I finally learned how to spell Josephine correctly and I swear I will scream if I ever accidentally misspell it again.

Heads up that we do get a little risque with nudity and whatnot, but there's no explicitly written out sex scenes, just glancing/passing references to sexual encounters and a bit of couples bathing. I will likely be bumping this fic up to an 'M' rating in future, since we do get pretty wild with language and mention a great deal of sex and we might be getting full on smut, so if you eventually have to click 'proceed' to read this fic, no worries you're still in the right place and I promise to mark sex scenes off with warnings so any readers who might not exactly wanna read that can skip around it easy peasy. I wouldn't be concerned with it until we begin approaching "Wicked Eyes and Wicked Hearts", which won't be for a few chapters yet.

Also, there's a lot of end notes so I'm putting a translation of a Tevinter (Italian) Lullaby used in this chapter, here:

Fa la nana bambino/Go to sleep my little one,
Fa la nana bel bambin/Go to sleep my lovely son,
Fa la nina, fa la nana/Close your eyes and go to sleep now,
Nei braeceti della mama/In the warm arms of your mother.

The next time I update: Adventures in the Emerald Graves/Empress Du Lion/Shrine of Dumat
The journey to Val Royeaux was incredibly pleasant.

Mostly.

It had, admittedly, gotten a bit more complicated than Josephine expected. Minorly.

Eleanor was- oh Josephine could never be grateful enough for the efforts the girl had gone to, she’d arranged everything splendidly! The Chargers were more than capable of protecting them, their time in Val Royeaux would be a delight, and they would certainly be some of the best dressed attendees at the Winter Palace come Bloomingtide if Josephine and Tonio had anything to say about it. And they certainly did—Eleanor knew well Josephine would have work to attend, and Tonio may well need to as well, and doing so from horseback was not necessarily possible. She arranged a covered carriage to draw them to Val Royeaux while the Chargers and those who joined them from Eleanor’s party, save, er…well, that Rocky fellow was their carriage driver, accompanied by the Charger Grim? Their duo was apparently knowledgeable in the task of guiding horse-drawn carriages…or at the very least,

“Those assholes are the best damn get-away drivers in Thedas,” the Iron Bull had assured.

“I do hope we’ve no need of their evasive maneuvers,” Tonio had quietly jested to Josephine, or at least he offered it up with some amusement in his voice, seated across from her with his sketchbook in hand as their carriage pulled away from Skyhold's courtyard. “I worry it would mean Ser Rocky has vandalized something of import and incited the local authorities to give us chase.”

The Ambassador offered a bit of soft laughter, “Oh certainly, we wouldn’t want that.”

“Hmm,” the feminine voice at Josephine’s side sounded, “that might be the most excitement we see on this trip.”

Leliana.

Which was where Josephine’s complications arose.

Oh, she did not begrudge her friend joining them…she didn’t, did she? She’d- she had not felt disappointment when she learned the woman would be joining her and Tonio on their trip. Not outside the realm of…well Leliana had ways of figuring things out despite every effort to keep as much from happening, and having her along only further guaranteed that. She was only grateful….oh she was worried for the woman, her gratefulness was selfish! But she was glad that the woman had business of her own she would be attending in Val Royeaux whilst Josephine and Eleanor met with the Comte.

“There is an agent of Corypheus, Eleanor and Dorian’s time in the future bore some insight to her role, and Enchanter Fiona made mention of her more than once. The Mage Calpernia, working with the Venatori. I will be investigating leads on her whereabouts and involvement, at an estate in Val Royeaux.”

So. The Spymaster was along for the journey. Hopefully she would be too preoccupied with her own business to trifle with Josephine’s.
Oh, she hated this! Leliana’s initial breaking of the news she would be joining them had been handled poorly, on the Ambassador’s part. She’d been so nervous, waiting for the other proverbial shoe to drop—Eleanor’s plan seemed so seamless, it felt like some trick, of course somehow, someway, something would interfere. And then Leliana approached her in her office with,

“Eleanor informed me in full of your plans. I’ll be joining you on your little adventure to Val Royeaux.”

She…she’d meant that Eleanor had shared their itinerary, and that there would be a group handling their security during an alliance meeting so…Leliana wouldn’t need to, meaning her scouts would be free to do their Spymaster’s bidding, which suited, because they had a mission.

Without that context, however, Josephine heard, ‘Eleanor broke her word and told me every excruciating detail you’ve shared with her of your family’s financial failure and now I’m getting involved’.

“El-Eleanor told you?” Josephine had asked with quiet shock, throat drying up, heart pounding in her chest as Leliana nodded. And then, well, not so quietly at all, “She’d no right to do such a thing!”

“Josie?” Leliana questioned, startled at her tone.

“I have everything handled Leliana, I do not need you to interfere- you do not need to go to Val Royeaux! My family's issues are our own, I’ll deal with them and Tonio and myself will make the trip bear progress for our efforts at Court.”

“Josie calm down, Maker. I’ve no plans to ‘interfere’, I’m merely…well I was intending to join you in your journey as I’ve business to look into in Val Royeaux- what's this about your family?”

…

“You- I-“ oh Maker, she’d truly blundered this, hadn’t she? “I apologize.”

“Are they pressuring you about marriage again?” Leliana worried.

“N-no!” Josephine was still trying to catch up, think, curtail the damage she’d just done, oh Maker! She’d been furious with Eleanor when it was she herself that went and started railing about her family!

“You’re lying,” Leliana accused, though, “…wait,” she gasped, looked irritatingly excited about something, and got the most mischievous smile on her face as she, to her mind, ‘put it all together’. “You…don’t want me joining you…and Mister Aclassi, on your journey to Val Royeaux.”

“Of course I do,” Josephine insisted.

“You just burst a blood vessel insisting I shouldn’t!” Leliana laughingly informed her, “Josie- oh my word, I apologize, I didn’t realize I would be intruding. You like him don’t you? Oh, I know well your parents expectations but…perhaps they will understand?” the woman offered sympathetically, “You haven’t told them yet, have you? I mean the two of you aren’t even in courtship yet. You should at least test the waters before seeking their approval.”
They weren’t to be in courtship period! Oh! Josephine- well she did open her mouth to deny the woman’s claim but- “Oh my word. Josie!” Leliana exclaimed, sounding almost scandalized, “Have you tested the waters? Come now, you needn’t be so shy with me. I’m no fool, Josephine Montilyet—why else would you react so, passionately?” Leliana seemed amused with herself.

Josephine felt her face flame, ducking her head shyly. Why else would you react so, indeed? “I-” oh Maker she hated this! “I suppose I’m nervous, yes er…I was looking forward to my time together with Tonio on this journey,” that…was truth, she did enjoy the man’s company. “but yes, it is nerve wracking that um…such a dalliance might displease my parents. If I…truly came to love him and they would not approve, well…” she shrugged. “So er…for now, we are keeping a professional appearance, my parents, no one, needs to know.”

“I completely understand.” No, she truly didn’t. “So…I’ll just be riding alongside Eleanor’s party I suppose, you’ll still have your time alone. I’m sure Eleanor will be delighted-“

“No!” Josephine…well she certainly didn’t- oh she detested Leliana being under the misconception, she certainly didn’t want Eleanor under it as well! “She- she isn’t aware. My outburst over her informing you of the details of our trip was solely derived from the fear you would discover my er…infatuation,” this was overly complicated but she muddled through, “As you’re now aware there’s no harm in you joining us, in fact it’s likely for the best—we wish to keep things professional, I said, no one will assume we’re doing anything untoward in your presence.”

“You’re certain?”

“Of course.” Not in the slightest but at this point…well, she suddenly understood Eleanor’s appreciation for naps, she needed one just to process what damage she’d done and un-done only to create more elsewhere during this one messily conversation.

Leliana was a wonderful, blessed…exhausting friend.

Even more so as, upon Leliana disappearing from Josie’s office, the Ambassador rose from her seat…

And she did not run, exactly. But she did set a swift, jarring pace, the rapid click-click-click-click of her heels echoing across Skyhold’s stone floors, through the Great Hall, up the stairs, and around the library until she was passing her own bedroom to go directly to the door at the end of the garden-hall and not exactly pounding, but knocking on the door with urgency- oh. she knew he would be in, given the late hour but she flinched when her mind caught up and informed her he would be in at this hour…because the man was trying to sleep.

The door swung open in just as much urgency as she’d knocked, the man seeming alarmed as he peered out, “Lady Josephine? What is the matter? Has something happened?”

“I need to speak with you, privately,” she cast her apologetic gaze along his sleep clothes, feet bare against the cold stone floors, “I’m sorry, truly, to disturb you.”

“Do not concern yourself, please, come in,” Tonio invited, stepping back and holding the door for her to enter and she nodded for him to close it when he made to leave it ajar. This was wildly inappropriate but she’d just had a wildly inappropriate conversation. And now she needed to have another.

“Please, you’re welcome to sit, my Lady,” he said as he straightened the covers of his bed straight, smoothed them before gesturing for her to find purchase there while he moved across the room to seat himself in his desk chair so she could sit in the more comfortable seating he’d to offer without making her feel uncomfortable. Well, more uncomfortable than she already was. “Whatever is the matter? How can I help you?”

“I- I don’t even know how to begin,” she confessed, sighing, “I suppose…first and foremost…I should apologize.”

He immediately insisted she’d no need to apologize—she was always to come to him if she’d need, he did not mind her intrusion. But that was not necessarily what she was apologizing for…so she explained, face ablaze as she informed him of her discussion with Leliana.

“I meant to correct her but- I- I admittedly…there are personal things I have to handle in Val Royeaux. Private family business I do not wish for anyone else to know about, especially Leliana.”

Tonio nodded as he listened, “I understand, you’re nervous, keeping something from your dearest friend. You…overreacted when she informed you she would be too close for comfort on a journey you’ve secrets to deal with, and now…” he seemed a bit confused, “I’m not entirely certain how a supposed romance with me was her immediate conclusion to jump to. But I do understand your reticence to risk her treading closer to your truth whatever it may be. I’m not angered with you, for lying about such a thing—I assure you, it’s an incredibly honoring notion,” he offered kindly, a warm smile at his lips. He…he was far too kind. “What is it exactly you need me to do?”

“Nothing. Er, I’ve assured her we do not wish to be public. But um…well, Leliana will be with us, watching, and likely…” she clenched her eyes shut wincing with embarrassment, “she will likely have us being watched.”

“So…nothing, but…enough to satisfy the idea we’ve a secret liaison?” the man supposed, Josephine sighed, nodding.

“Yes, if- if that is understandable.” Of course it wasn’t!

“Of course it is. We’re secretly not in a secret relationship,” he shrugged. Oh Maker her head hurt. “I would do nothing to embarrass you, my lady, I assure you. We will merely work together, as we’d planned. And we’ll be attending social outings together—we…we’ve customarily offered you my arm when we’ve similar destinations in Skyhold and walk together, it is an action natural to us that could be perceived as romantic by your friend without seeming so to anyone else. Leliana will believe we are…how did she put it? Testing the waters? And then you can inform her you’ve done so and found them wanting, that you’ve graciously dumped me, and lo that I am heartbroken, I completely understand and respect your decision and wish to resume a professional relationship—and I do hope we can still be friends.”

Oh, goodness. “Of course. I do promise to let you down gently,” she jested lightly.

“I certainly appreciate it.”

She certainly appreciated him. Such a horrible, childish scheme to be caught up in! The man hardly needed such drama. The very instant their ruse was no longer needed, she would end it and treat the poor man to dinner for his troubles.

As friends! Friends dined together!

Now she felt nervous about the whole thing. She did not…dislike the man. She found him handsome and kind and interesting. But now she sat, Leliana at her side smugly observing them, overthinking anything and everything.
“Are you alright, Josie?” Leliana gently questioned.

Josephine startled, oh! Oh goodness, she—she’d not been paying attention. “I apologize, I was distracted, thinking,” she cleared her throat, reading over the schedule she’d written up and placed to be seen first and foremost on her clipboard, “we’ve much to get done, in Val Royeaux. Several appointments with suppliers and I’ve only just finalized a schedule for shopping, looking about for ideas and inspiration,” she cleared her throat again, what—oh. She would blush, she was certain if she wasn’t turning green, she felt—was she truly so stressed she felt ill of it? She’d something of a headache, small but present since she’d woken that morning, and now it worsened several fold.

“Do you get motion sick, my lady?” Tonio wondered.

She swallowed, releasing hold of the clipboard in her hand to steady herself against her seat, “I—I’ve traveled perfectly fine before.”

“Do you often read when you travel?”

“…no, I suppose not?” She’d sat in shocked silence as she mourned the Conclave, weeping the whole of her initial journey to Haven, when Leliana called for her aid with the Inquisition. And before that, “I usually travel with family, friends, we chat or rest.”

Tonio nodded. “I’m unsure as to why, exactly, but reading while traveling can make you experience motion sickness. Do you need potion?”

“Should we call for a stop and uh, pull over?” Leliana worried, raising a hand to rub circles on Josephine’s back.

Possibly. Oh, that would be devastatingly embarrassing. “No, I-I am fine.”

“You should lie down,” Tonio advised, “keeping your head still will help, close your eyes and rest.”

Leliana was kind enough to lend her lap—let Josephine lay on her side while the Spymaster continued rubbing circles that soothed. She felt overwhelmingly dizzy when she first went horizontal but that dissipated and it did help, Leliana’s legs offering support under her head while the woman carded her other hand through Josephine’s hair and kept it still, she did not feel the motion of the carriage quite so fiercely, and she heard Tonio open the window in the carriage door—she worried for a moment he meant to call out but no, it was merely to let fresh air in that— that was much better though it did let in chill-

Oh. Josephine did crack an eye open to peek because she felt material draping over her, the soft fabric of Tonio’s suit jacket.

“I apologize, Leliana, I’ve nothing else on hand—I could call for something if you’re chilled.”

“I’m fine, thank you,” Leliana said, sounding pleased.

“Do let me know, my offer stands,” Tonio assured her. And then there was the rustle of parchment as he settled back in his seat.

“Does it not bother you to work?” Leliana wondered quietly, her voice just above a whisper.

“I’ve no trouble with the task but my mama always got on to me about it—would insist I shouldn’t do my homework while riding, that I’d get sick that way,” Tonio replied in hushed tones, “but it’s never bothered me. Though perhaps that was born of necessity—it was the only spare time I had, usually, to do such work.”

“How much schooling did you attend, if you don’t mind my asking?”

“University, if you can believe it,” he said. Truly? Tevinter did not have non-magical modes of higher education. “My family farmed but I’d always had an interest in artistic ventures, and ultimately clothing. My mother made certain I was allowed to complete my schooling, and I began an apprenticeship under a tailor in the city, a connection from my er, uncle in-law. From that my interest and abilities grew but my master was…a difficult traditionalist, while I’d a mind for design, he discouraged me from it to the point we rowed so much I respectfully declined further tutelage from him. Which meant I would not be inheriting a place in his shop, or the business itself eventually—that suited, I wished to start a place of my own but that required some certification, if not through apprenticeship, then I had to find some other way. A friend encouraged me to apply to a program offered to Sopporati citizens through Markham University, he’d done likewise to become an accredited tutor to non or pre-magical Altus children. I completed courses by studying the materials and submitting work through university courier. At semesters end there were examinations proctored by volunteer staff from local Circles,” he chuckled softly, “I spent the whole of my childhood doing homework on the wagon ride home from school, and the first few years of adulthood completing assignments as I commuted between home and the library and work and back.”

“Work?”

“Two…three jobs,” he said with more certainty as he thought about it, “in the mornings there was the fish hatchery, and then I served as a line cook at a restaurant up the street from the library I frequented and then nearer the end of my education I took on a third job as janitorial staff at a Circle.”

“Maker, three jobs?”

“Hmm yes, and still unable to keep our heads above water. I was able to make enough to support my wife…we’d no children the first few years of marriage, but a great deal of medical debt. And then she became pregnant with my Cremisius in my final year of University, and I was to be graduating and opening a shop of my own. I only barely remembered to seek out my diploma—Cremisius was born to us earlier than planned, but then he’s always been one to make an impression.”

Oh, good heavens, truly? “That must have been terrifying,” Josephine spoke up, opening her eyes, finding focus in their voices had helped her steady herself. Mama and papi hadn’t planned upon having further children when Claude came along and then it was topped off with the boy arriving earlier than expected, it had been truly frightening, mama was so scared, she’d already been concerned having another child at her age, they were terrified babe and mother would be lost, the woman had clutched Josephine's hand tight and wept, speaking of how proud she was of her and instilled the promise that she was to take care of her father and siblings. She felt a pang of sympathy for poor Cremisius's mother to have gone through that, to have been so young and just becoming a parent, to have that adventure start with such struggle.

Tonio nodded. “We were fearful, but Cremisius…oh, he was so small, but strong. I remember holding him—he could fit just so, his body in the palm of my hand, head cradled by my fingers, and I reached out with my other hand.” Oh, as large as his hands might be, that was such an incredibly too small a size for a baby. Tonio held out an index finger and then he snatched it with his other hand, giving example that despite the Lieutenant's small beginnings, “he just reached out and grabbed my finger so tight,” he smiled, proud. “Like he was letting me know he was the man in charge now,” he chuckled softly, “though he got motion sick regardless of what he did when we traveled. I’m amazed he can ride so proficiently,” he looked to Josephine, smiling warmly as he informed her, “It always comforted him, to wrap him in my coat...though he always returned the favor by inevitably being sick in it.”

Josephine breathed a laugh, assuring, “I’ll try not to follow his example.”

“So long as you try,” Tonio supposed with a warm grin.

His amusement only grew when they broke pace for lunch, stopping and being able to stretch their legs a bit, Tonio assisted in her decent from the carriage, allowed her to lean on his arm as he walked her nearer to the stream they’d decided to make a bit of camp by for now, when Cremisius approached, pointing an accusatory index finger at his father.

“Heard you been telling stories about me old man,” ahh. The Iron Bull must not have been able to resist teasing the boy. "I haven’t gotten motion sick in almost an entire decade!"

“Cremisius, my word son,” the man spoke with false concern, “Stitches should examine your head trauma—you’ve seemingly forgotten every summer trip to the countryside from the ages of seven to fourteen.”

“If you wanna fight, we’ll fight!”

“Cremisius, leave Papa’classi alone,” Eleanor’s sweet voice chided as she joined her boyfriend, slipping an arm around his back as he wrapped an arm around her shoulders to pull her close. Oh, the two seemed in good spirits, there was less…shyness in how they expressed physical affection for one another in front of others, it was something entirely comfortable for them now, Josephine hoped that meant things had er…gone well, during their sleep over. “Are you okay, Tia?”

“I am, I was a bit unwell before but I’m feeling better,” she assured.

“Awe, your poor body thought it got poisoned, huh?” the girl sympathized, lower lip pouting out a bit.

“…poisoned?” Leliana questioned. Josephine was confused likewise was that…a turn of phrase she was unfamiliar with? Something the youths were saying? There was a word Eleanor had become delighted with as of late. Josephine had needed assistance in revising an official document the girl had penned—their mission statement to be put to print in informative literature and in their declarations of peaceful intent with the nations of Thedas, assuring they were not endeavoring to take on any government bodies, they merely wished to seal Rifts…and ‘yeet* Corypheus off the face of this world’. She’d found the girl in her quarters under the tutelage of the Iron Bull, using their psychology lesson to play chess and when she made question of the word, the Qunari had groaned in embarrassment of her lack of knowledge.

“We can show you!” Eleanor insisted, excited at the prospect, “Yeet me! Yeet me, the Iron Bull!”

To which the Qunari responded by hoisting the girl up, crying “YEET!” and throwing her across the room. To a bouncy, but safe landing atop her bed but still, Maker! It’d given Josephine an awful fright. She…was admittedly fearful now what action a slang term involving ‘poison’ might incite.
Apparently none save Eleanor’s giggling as she explained it wasn’t slang at all, “One of the common, recognizable symptoms of being poisoned is feeling like you’re moving when you really aren’t, which is precisely what you feel when you’re in a moving carriage—you’re sitting still while it’s moving you and your body gets sick in response, thinking you’ve been poisoned and trying to make you throw it up. You were sitting with your back to the driver, right?” Josephine nodded. “You should switch seats if you can—if you sit facing the direction your moving in, maybe try to keep looking out the little window facing out the front of the carriage? Your body will realize you’re feeling real movement and stop being so dramatic.”

“Bodies are strange,” Cole spoke up as he materialized at Cremisius’s side. Oh! Josephine hadn’t realized he was joining them! Boy looked to her then, “Oh, I promised Sera I would come and stay with Inky, watch after her and Kremmy-boy and his Papa and Bull and Marehis and Dori and Viv,” he listed, as he’d likely been instructed, “when she and Lace leave.”

Ahh. It was only Marehis, Madam de Fer, the Iron Bull, Dorian Pavus, who were joining them in Val Royeaux. Solas would remain in the Hinterlands until such a time as the Herald was preparing to move on into more of an official mission field. Cassandra was in Skyhold making headway in how to move forward with the Seekers, making progress with her Templars though they answered more directly to Knight-Commander Barris now, oh it had been delightful to use their Great Hall for his promotion ceremony, Eleanor had certainly been more pleased to do it, and Mister Aclassi thought it a much more splendid time than prisoner judgements, though he’d complimented Josephine’s role, that she’d done well questioning the former Mayor of Crestwood before the Inquisition.

Oh, yes, the Inquisitor’s party. Hawke and Stroud were still preparing in Skyhold but they would be making their way to the Western Approach ahead of the others and report back on any sign of Warden activity—Varric was joining them, he was apologetic to Eleanor and sought her blessing which she readily gave even before he explained he quote ‘can’t risk Hawke leaving my chest hair for Stroud’s kickass ‘stache’. Stash of what? Hopefully nothing illegal. Oh! Mustache…well, it was a bit much in Josephine’s opinion, but yes it was a rather large amount of facial hair. Sera was assisting in other ways—Cullen had a mission for Eleanor in the Emerald Graves, they would be going on to there from Val Royeaux and Sera was going on ahead of them, with Scout Harding and Thom Rainier backed by his portion of the Charger’s to clear some sort of group terrorizing the area—the Freemen of the Dales—before Eleanor arrived to seal the Rifts. Val Royeaux held little interest to the Elf girl, and she’d been excited at the prospect of going someplace warm and green with life and adventure with her girlfriend.

Lunch was pleasant, the Iron Bull was admittedly quite the chef “he puts the ‘chef’ in ‘chief’!” Eleanor had been pleased to inform them, oh, sweet mija, she brought Josephine fresh water to drink and some crackers to make certain her appetite was in hand before she attempted the heavier meat and potatoes the Iron Bull prepared for them, and pressed a soft kiss to the Antivan woman’s cheek.

“If you need you can always try riding with me or mami—Russel’s very gentle, he’d be careful for you. I’m so sorry you can’t get any work done but don’t let it bother you, okay? Just rest and relax, we’re making good progress. Do you want to bunk with me tonight, Tia?”

“That would be wonderful,” Josephine said, delighted at the prospect. She did not necessarily enjoy…camping, and her experience with it was that of their journey from Haven, but she’d a feeling it would be a much-improved encounter with the act, this trip. Though she wasn’t certain just how much she would sleep, she really did need to get things done.

And so she did. Leliana…ugh. The Spymaster took Eleanor’s instruction to ‘switch seats’ to mean she would have the whole of the seat to herself—she got into the carriage and stretched out, lounging on the front seat of the carriage so no true switching could take place, Josephine had thought to swap places with Tonio, but oh! The woman was smirking as she was insisting she was going to rest her eyes for a while.

Tonio merely assisted her assent into the carriage and allowed her her choice of window seat. It was rather conducive to getting work done after all—Josephine was able to sit and take in the view as they rode along, listening to the soft timber of Tonio’s voice reading her paperwork aloud. It wasn’t wholly appropriate…but the man spent quite a lot of time in her office, had overheard matters of confidence on more than one occasion and nothing had come of it, he’d not gone about shouting sensitive information from the battlements. The rest of their time riding that day was spent with him reading aloud, interrupted only by her requesting revisions on things she’d written herself, the man neatly crossing things out and writing in things to be amended later, and then the occasional need for her signature on things, the man holding the parchment still against the surface of his sketchbook cover, prepared to immediately point wherever she needed to jot down initials or signature so she did not have to risk scanning the page herself.

“Thank you, Tonio, truly. I did so need to get through these documents…oh goodness—was that everything?”

“Unless you’ve more elsewhere,” he said, riffling through the documents attached to her clipboard to make certain, “I believe we have.”

Josephine huffed in disbelief, “I thought for certain I would be going through all of this for days.”

“Perhaps this process was a bit swifter? You’re far too hard on yourself my lady, I’ve seen you pore over a single-page document for hours trying to catch mistakes. You trust I am reading correctly, and you’re markedly more decisive it seems in making correction being able to hear your work aloud.”

Huh, perhaps she should- it would be unreasonable to have the man read her every work but perhaps she would begin reading aloud when she could. “Well, thank you—you reading was accurate and well paced.”

“I’m rather the professional—I’ve read Cremiusi bedtime stories until he was fourteen.”

“Was he so slow to grow out of it, or were you?” Leliana asked with some amusement.

Tonio smiled a bit ruefully at that. “He grew out of it for a time when he was seven. But uh, after his tenth birthday…he learned just how dire our circumstance was, was under a great deal of pressure, expected to grow up far sooner than should have been asked of him to keep our family from slavery. So, I suppose we resumed the bedtime ritual to be something of a comfort for him, hold firm to a bit of his childhood.”

“I apologize, I was merely teasing I did not mean to bring up something unpleasant.”

She seemed genuine in her contrition then. However the following day she maneuvered the conversation around to ask,

“Do you miss your wife at all?”

How the Spymaster worked them to that of all things from a conversation that started, ‘we’ve splendid weather today’ Josephine was amazed and shocked.
“Leliana!” Josephine chastised, appalled. Maker! They’d been speaking pleasantly up until that point, it was rather a nice day—Josephine hadn’t a thing that needed her attention, she could take the time to enjoy the view of the world passing by, having a nice conversation to the soft scratch of the Tailor’s charcoals against sketchpad. He’d work aplenty, Josephine admittedly felt badly she’d monopolized his time the other day—he’d a growing client list to satisfy, needed final designs to present to Lady Forsythia of all people. It had been…unpleasant but relieving to have the Lady visit Skyhold proper—she’d only done so to have Josephine apologize to her face for daring to reach out to both the Lady and her estranged brother to support the Inquisition. Which had unfortunately…well, ultimately fortunately occurred when Tonio Aclassi was in search of his ledger—he had left it in his desk and she’d not made her meeting known to him, Lady Forsaythia was the last person she wished to unleash upon the poor man.

“Lady Forsythia, please, I ask you forgive me. I apologize sincerely for connecting the Inquisition to your brother—“

“Do not even mention that waste of a trifling pissant.”

Josephine cleared her throat. “Of course. My apologies. I am sorry, for wronging you and betraying the allegiance you offered us by accepting the allegiance of your…” she opted for “enemy. The blame resides solely with myself, it was an egregious error on my part and I hope you won’t reflect poorly upon the Inquisition and its cause.”

“That is what you call an apology?” the woman sneered, in tones that implied she wished nothing short of kneeling before the Lady and begging her forgiveness with gnashing of teeth and rending of clothes.

“It certainly sounded like one,” Tonio’s voice sounded from the doorway, “Perhaps you’ve not the understanding of how apologies work as you owe one to the Lady Montilyet for your rudeness—I’ll gladly show you; I apologize for the intrusion—I seemed to have forgotten my ledger.”

Josephine had been horrified, borderline humiliated—she wasn’t sure if it was because the man had overheard their conversation or because he’d spoken so brazenly to Lady Forsaythia of all people. She expected the woman’s wicked tongue to come into play—her “And just who the hell are you?” had been met with a calm, polite “Tonio Aclassi, Tailor to the Inquisitor.”

“I thought I saw something about that in the quaint little newsletter Lady Montilyet scribes. You’ve a bit of backbone, do you? Excellent. I’ve sent every designer in my employ to tears since I was capable of speech. You might be fun, if you prove a challenge—you’ve a thicker skin than most, don’t you?”

Apparently, he did. “It is fine, my lady,” Tonio said softly…and sharing a look to make certain they were on the same page as he carefully reached over to lay his warm hand over hers where it rested on the seat at her side. Oh! “It’s my understanding that Leliana is your dearest friend, she’s every right to be curious about such things.”

“You needn’t answer,” Josephine insisted, “I apologize—“

“You needn’t fret, it’s a reasonable concern,” Tonio supposed, looking to Leliana, “I will always have a type of love for Liviana for having given me Cremisius. But romantic love was never something we shared, and she lost all appeal as she’s continually rejected and tormented the precious life we made. I’ll never wish her ill, but neither will I ever feel anything more than I would for a perfect stranger. To answer your question: no, I do not, nor will I ever miss my ex-wife. I could never feel something for anyone who couldn’t love and accept my son the way he Was...was Cremisius’s mother truly that terrible of a person? Whatever could she not love her own son for? “Cremisius is a wonderful young man and you deserve to be very proud of him. He’s compassionate and brave and the sweetest boy I’ve ever met.” Save perhaps Cole, a literal Spirit of Compassion.

It was admittedly heartwarming, made Josephine smile when Tonio looked to her, expression warm as he gently squeezed her hand, “Thank you, my Lady,” he said with sincerity, and then to Leliana, “I do hope my answer was satisfactory?”

The Spymaster looked between them, then to their joined hands before raising her gaze to meet the man’s, “And then some,” she assured as their carriage rolled to a stop. There was a gentle knock on the door not a moment later and Cremisius popped his head in to announce,

“Hey Papa, Sera’n’Lace are heading out if you wanna say goodbye. Should probably take your chance before Ellie gets ahold of her.”

“Ahh, yes, excuse me ladies,” the man said, setting his work aside and releasing Josephine’s hand to join his son, and the moment the carriage door was closed behind him, “Josie,” Leliana half-whispered in delighted accusation, “my word, you’re blushing,” she giggled at her friend’s embarrassment as Josephine realized yes, she just might be and the observation only made her blush more.

“That was incredibly rude of you Leliana, honestly,” Josephine reprimanded, “Tonio’s previous marriage is entirely his business, it’s an incredibly personal, possibly painful subject.”

“Excruciatingly so if it turned out to be something that would ultimately bring a potential relationship with you to ruin. He can hurt all he likes—he can rot in hell if he breaks your heart—I’ll not abide you entering into something doomed from the start.” She sighed, “if you fear he will be upset with you because I am your friend and I’ve offended him...I will apologize,” she allowed, put upon, rolling her eyes the way Yvette did when Josephine reminded her that regardless of her status or her ideals for the future that changed with every passing whim—her school marks mattered! Maker, if she got one more dwindling grade from her tutors Josephine was going to rip her own hair out or suffer an ulcer, possibly both! That girl just lived to see her elder sister bald and dead, she was certain of it some days! “He seems...slow to anger. Which is a quality I can appreciate for someone endeavoring to woo you. I must say, thus far, I approve. He’s gentle, considerate.”

“He is,” Josephine softly agreed.

“And Maker the way he looks at you—“

“He does not look at me inappropriately!” Goodness! She would not have brought the man into this if she realized Leliana was going to be giving cause to defend him at every turn!

“No, in fact the way he looks at you is entirely appropriate as far as I am concerned,” Leliana agreed, “I was not accusing him of leering Josephine.”

“...then what are you accusing him of?”

“Nothing save for him looking at my ‘dearest’ friend like she is the most precious, cherished person he can lay eyes upon,” Leliana was more than pleased to inform her, “of course his only other company at the moment is my charming self, so perhaps it’s merely a result of your being a form of salvation from my pleasant company.”

He- he did not- “Do-! Shut up.” Ohhh she did not like saying that, it was terribly- it was mean! “Please.” That was better. “I believe I’ll see Sera safely off, Eleanor may be in need of comfort,” she decided. Some air was in order and-

He didn’t look at her like anything! Other than a friend. Maybe he did look at her as such—friends were precious and to be cherished!

Case in point…Eleanor was cherishing her most precious friend as Josephine joined them. The younger girl was something of a permanent human-shaped attachment to the young Elf woman’s frame, her arms around Sera’s neck, thighs form-fitting the dip between ribcage and hipbone like perhaps the girl was truly meant to just sit there for the rest of her life…which it seemed she was fully intending to do.

“What lots of fun,” the girl mumbled somewhat miserably against her sister’s neck.

“You too, sweets.”

“And be super safe,” she sniffled, hiding her face against Sera as she pled, “please please be safe.” Marehis was near and she rubbed circles on the girl’s back.

“I’m gonna write every single day, and I gotta turn in reports n’ pish and- and you write me too, okay? You’re going to have so much fun you won’t even be worried about me-“

“Jokes on you, I’m super talented—I can have fun and worry at the same time! s’why I’m Inquisitor I think.”

“Probably—no worrying allowed! Just have Kremmy-boy….” she began whispering something against the girl’s ear that had Eleanor’s skin flushing and Marehis flinching…the Iron Bull was grinning and shaking his head, walking away from the road a bit like he’d some excited energy he was putting into his stride.

“Sera,” the girl complained, “I’m gonna miss you saying stuff like that and getting to go ‘Sera’!”

“I got some doozies in the ‘dirty joke’ catalog—‘s even funnier in writing, little doodles? I’ll have you feeling like I never left!”

“Kay. They’ll be super penis-y?”

“It’s the only shape I know how to draw,” Sera assured.

Eleanor nodded, sighing as she pulled back, hands resting on the Elf woman’s shoulders. “I love you.”

Sera smiled, pressing an exuberant kiss to the Human girl’s cheek, “I love you too.”

“Be well, da’vehnan,” Marehis wished her, hugging her tightly, “if you need me—if the area is too dangerous and you need to leave I will come at your call, you understand?”

“I’ll be okay, promise—Lace’n’me’ll stick together. Take care of yourself and Inky.”

Marehis nodded in agreement. Though it wasn’t the Elf woman Eleanor sought comfort from as Sera and Lace broke off on their own course, south.
“The Iron Bull!” she called in distress.

“I’m comin’ Imi-kadan,” the Qunari announced in a voice that carried all the seriousness it did on the battlefield from what little experience Josephine had witnessing the Inquisitor’s party in the field, and he swept the girl up into his arms. “Gonna be okay, you wanna ride with me? That make you feel better?”

“…maybe.”

Oh, mija. It had been hard on her to leave Cullen and Cassandra in Skyhold, Sera…Maker, Josephine couldn’t think of a time since the girl signed on with the Inquisition that she’d not gone into the field with Eleanor.

Though Dorian Pavus seemed to feel he was the wounded party in this scenario. Admittedly, he did lose his seat with the Iron Bull, but he got to join them in the carriage, which took all of two seconds for him to enjoy.

“This is delightful,” Dorian decided, “Maker, why ever haven’t we traveled by carriage before?”

“It isn’t conducive to field work and our destination is a proper city,” Leliana supposed.

“All such ventures should be to proper cities, honestly this camping and constantly running about the wilderness business is ridiculous.”

“You’ve a comfortable place in Skyhold, no one makes you follow Eleanor into the field,” Leliana amusedly informed him.

“The brat takes my lover from me if I stay in Skyhold and whatever am I supposed to do then? Read a book? In that library? I’d be more likely to take up the thickest tome I can find and bash my own head in.”

“I have tried but I’ve yet to hear back from any Tevinter’s Circles,” Josephine promised, “I apologize, I’ve not many Tevene connections.”

“…you are in charge of securing things for the library?”

“After a fashion. I process the orders, and requests for things come to my desk before they’re sent out. Specialty texts usually require reaching out to universities or noble allies who collect rare tomes.”

“Ahh. You get…all specialty requests?” Dorian asked, albeit nervous…Josephine smiled encouragingly, nodding. It was…understandable, for him to be so er…impassioned about acquiring the caliber of magical text he was used to, but the requests had been becoming a bit more…crude.

“I…feel like a garbage human being. I do sincerely apologize for my er…latest sentiments.”

That she could, quote ‘take the newest copy of Divine Galatea’s autobiography* and shove it up-’ well, her privates. She wouldn’t have to continually order the thing if someone wasn’t…the book was never checked out, but it had notably been destroyed, repeatedly. Understandable, she supposed, given er…the woman’s contributions to society. She didn’t necessarily like having the book in the same building as Eleanor, she prayed the girl never read it. If she went the whole of her life and was never made aware that such a thing as the Right of Annulment existed, that would be a blessed thing indeed. It was…Josephine didn’t like thinking of the moral complications of such a rule it was inherently disgusting that a Chantry Mother of all things could give license to Circle authorities to slaughter the whole of their mages…but- death never felt like something there should be ‘buts’ about! The right existed for a reason, but it was horrible and the fact that a mind could conceive a things such as that was sickening. It was such a horrible amount of authority that could be—had been—grossly abused in the past five years.

“It’s quite alright,” Josephine assured.

“It’s incredible if you can get anything out of Tevinter these days,” Tonio spoke up, “I er… well I overheard things in my time in Magister Tilani’s home. What little isn’t banned or illegal to have in the South has been discouraged from foreign circulation.”

“Suppressing knowledge in the South in case they’ve a mind to use it for their little spat or create issue on Tevene soil? Oh how do they come up with these things?” Dorian drawled.

It was not a terribly unwelcome intrusion. Dorian and Leliana struck up debate over non-magical techniques for evading magical protections…likely in preparation, on the Spymaster’s part for whatever mission she was about. Josephine was minorly concerned—there had been some mention of breaking and entering Comte Vinicius home. She had a feeling the less she knew about it, the better she’d feel, so long as Leliana returned safe and sound. Tonio worked steadily all the while, smiling a bit amusedly when he caught on that Josephine was looking over his shoulder trying to get a peek.

“You’re free to sit closer if you’d like, I don’t mind if you look. In point of fact I would appreciate your input.”

…well, the man did offer. So Josephine rose a bit, side-stepping and smoothing her skirt under her once more as she sat alongside the man and watched his progress as he added color to his sketches.

“Do tell me if you see anything you believe will warrant complaint from Lady Forsythia.”

“It is Lady Forsythia, she will always complain. Your work is lovely, think nothing of it.”

“I’m glad you approve,” Tonio said. “It’s my understanding you’re in the market for a tailor. I wouldn’t offer undo pressure but if you were interested I would gladly take you on as a client. I’ve the time and it may be more convenient for you. Unless of course you wish to tailor shop in Orlais, they’ve a great deal more variety and talent greater than mine.”

She wasn’t sure about their talent being greater, but certainly…er…priced as if they were. Josephine had considered getting one or two new things, clothing she could alternate through for important meetings so she didn’t appear to be unclean—she wasn’t, she kept everything laundered and pristine, neither did she often do much roughing about—but she…was reticent to drain the funds the Inquisitor had set aside for her to do so. She did not want to wholly…abuse wasn’t the word…she didn’t want to use it needlessly. So she had been thinking to ask him once she saw a lull in his workload. It would be…more convenient, and there would be nothing to consider insofar as shipping costs she doubted the man would charge her postage from his desk to hers…

The was the matter of taking measurements, but he was incredibly professional, made his clients feel at ease and she’d…she would be nervous but she had no doubt he would make certain she wasn’t uncomfortable.

“I was actually planning to ask you, when it seemed you might have the time.”

“I’ve always time for you, cara mia,” he insisted. ‘Cara mia?’ Leliana mouthed to Dorian who silently supplied what looked like ‘my dear’ though after a moment’s consideration he shrugged 'darling'? “I would be pleased to assist you in expanding your wardrobe.”

“I need only a few things,” she assured.

“Whatever you need,” he said, “at the friends and family discount, of course.”

“Absolutely not!”

“It was my understanding I’ve free reign in how I conduct my own business?”

“Of course you do,” she did not mean to insinuate otherwise.

“Then my pricing is at my discretion. You can pay the amount I prescribe…or you can refuse to, but I’d hate to see you the subject of one of Ellie’s judgment sessions for theft.”

…neither did she, truly. Even if it was the more pleasant sort like the morning they left—Eleanor called session to order and together they celebrated the promotion of Ser Barris to the Inquisition’s Knight-Commander, oh, that had been so wonderful! The young man certainly deserved it. While she was grateful for her recent promotion she would not have wanted any such ceremony, she blushed her way through Eleanor proclaiming her ‘Super Ambassador, Reina of Personal Assistants!’ and witnessing Josephine’s signing the bit of parchment that made it official.

“Well, I wouldn’t wish to incite Eleanor’s wrath,” she teasingly supposed.

“Wise as always, my lady,” he approved.

She did not feel very wise, all told, once they met with the Comte.

The supposed Comte. Maker.

Their stay in Val Royeaux started pleasantly enough. They’d arrived in the evening, and Josephine had taken it to heart to stay with Eleanor, while Marehis slipped off to do some last minute recognizance before their meeting with the Comte. She didn’t want Eleanor worrying about the Elf woman’s mission, she was already fretting about Leliana taking her leave to Vinicius’s estate, so Josephine…returned the girl’s kindness she’d shown when they first moved to Skyhold, asked to spend the night with Eleanor—it would be a bit of fun and it wasn’t as though the girl would otherwise be occupied, her boyfriend wasn’t to be distracted, he was to be on guard first thing come morning, lead the Chargers as they played the role of security in tomorrow’s meeting while the Iron Bull rested—the Qunari would be awake the whole of the night keeping guard over the estate and Madam de Fer would see after the place while the others were away during the day.

It was a wonderful evening, fun that there was some routine this week to getting into soft, clean sleeping clothes and climbing into a bedroll, or in this instance a proper, absolutely incredible bed, alongside the girl. Eleanor was warm enthusiasm as Josephine began brushing out her hair before bed and allowed the girl to take over for her. It was…soothing. Relaxing to have her hair brushed as she sat on the bed before Eleanor, legs tucked up beneath her, seated on the heels of her feet while Eleanor sat up high on her knees behind her to carefully brush the Antivan woman’s hair, sweetly complimenting how soft her hair was, “It’s thick like mine but smooth and silky like my mamis’! I love it!”

Josephine blushed, smiling softly, “Gracias, mija…do you need any assistance with your hair?” the Iron Bull had sat down with the girl their first night on the road and assisted in cleaning and conditioning it—Josephine was uncertain if it was for love of doing Eleanor’s hair, or if the exercise was meant to spare her discomfort with reaching overhead, she wasn’t certain just where the girl was with regaining mobility of her left shoulder.
“If you want to you can but I’m kind of um…” she shrugged, “letting it go for a few days—it’s good for it and um, Cremisius says he wants to learn how to do my hair so I was planning on letting him help me next time.”

Oh that…that was incredibly sweet. Oh! If Cremisius and Eleanor- oh it was such a precious thing! Was the young man considering it because he’d like to take up the task for the girl whenever she couldn’t or…was he perhaps thinking to the future? That someday there might be a little girl with her mami’s curl pattern or- oh a sweet baby boy with such beautiful hair? The idea was heart melting!

Though…though that future was at constant threat. Josephine always feared as much—prayed never-endingly for this girl when she went into the field, for Cremisius when he was on-mission. And now she’d threatened them both, she discovered, when Eleanor, Josephine, and Marehis made their way, Cremisius and the Bull’s Chargers alongside them to keep guard during their meeting.

She’d not expected such trouble.

_I did not perceive this to hold a possible threat_, she’d said.

And the moment, the very instant Josephine and Eleanor made to sit down at the Comte’s invitation? Marehis’s hand was on her daughter, pulling her back and away as she ordered,

“Lady Montilyet get back.”

Her voice had such stern urgency Josephine responded immediately, nearly tripping over the chair legs as she backed up, standing with Marehis, just a bit behind the Rogue as she put her own hand on Eleanor’s wrist to make certain the girl stayed behind them what-“Marehis?” Josephine prompted. She trusted the woman but she was just a bit confused.

“I investigated the Comte myself,” the woman said, “as per our agreement. And unless he’s lost twenty years and fifty pounds in the twelve hours since I laid eyes on him last night…you are no Comte Boisvert.” And then, as if listening for something, “Maker, do you have the man restrained?”

“I mean the good Comte no harm, as I likewise mean no harm to yourself or your Inquisitor,” the…man assured her. “I’m a representative of the House of Repose.”

“An assassin,” Marehis snapped.

“Professionally? Yes. Socially, I do tend to let my acquaintances live. And that is what this is—a social encounter, making your acquaintance. Please do sit—we need only come to blows if you truly wish to.”

“I’m not like, super dressed for fighting and I smell cake, I’m sitting!” Eleanor decided smoothing her hands along her skirts oh—_Tia Josie! We’re twinsies today!_ The girl had excitedly informed her when they dressed for the day, Eleanor debuting a purple dress Josephine had delighted in assisting her securing the ribbon in the back, it was incredibly precious fun, a sort of compliment that the girl was so ecstatic to match the Antivan woman. She slipped her arm out of Josephine’s as she pecked a kiss to Marehis’s bicep and side-stepped between the two women to sit across the table from the Comte’s imposter. “Hola! I’ve never actually talked to an assassin before…well, Leliana kind of counts…but like, not one that hasn’t tried to or wanted to kill me at some point, so! Hi! I’m Ellie. Is there a reason you wanted to speak with me in particular other than murder? Because I’m not going to lie, you’ll be my favorite assassin if you just brought me here to chat and eat cake and drink…is that tea?”

“Black tea, it complements the cake I’m assured,” the man spoke pleasantly as if there was not a thing in the world amiss and he’d truly invited them here for a tea party.

“Yum! So, what’s up? If you’re here to threaten mi Tia I’ll fight you, dressed for it or not—my tailor’s in town with me so, easy peasy to get it fixed!”

“I’m not here to threaten your…Tia, but to bear her fair warning given the circumstances.”

…the circumstances.

Josephine’s stomach plummeted, she’d no appetite for any of the assassin’s offerings, cake, tea, information. Eleanor blanched the moment he revealed he did truly know why Josephine’s curious had been murdered and her documents destroyed.

_There was a longstanding contract between the Du Paraquettes and the House of Repose to eliminate anyone from the House Montilyet in the event they endeavor to conduct trade in Orlais._

“…isn’t there an expiration date on assassin contracts? I mean the people who ordered it…the people they had in mind when they ordered it are all dead by now!” Eleanor insisted. “You can’t hurt Lady Josie—she didn’t do anything wrong! Her family really ne-“

“That’s enough, Eleanor.”

Marehis’s look was fierce as she regarded Josephine with sharp rebuke. “Your tone, Ambassador. The Inquisitor is here because she is helping you.”

_She is sitting across a table from an assassin and it is your entire fault!_ Josephine understood her words to mean. It is what they felt like and oh, they were right she- Maker this was a mess. And ugh, she’d truly spoken out of turn it…it was patronizing to hush her Inquisitor. But it was Eleanor who offered up a,

“Sorry,” the girl said, reaching out and laying her Marked hand on Josephine’s knee and squeezing gently before she looked to their host, “What I mean is—why does this contract from so long ago even apply today? And what…I mean you’re here, warning us, which is nicer than just outright murdering Josie, but it’d matter a little more if you could explain what we can do to stop this.”

“As long as the contract still exists with the House of Repose, we may only cease following it to the letter if a member of the Du Paraquette’s House cancels the contract, or your Lady Montilyet rescinds her interest in reinstating her family’s business with Orlais.”

“…there’s like, not a chance I could say ‘pretty please’ and you’d go rip up that contract and make it cease existing, is there?” Eleanor wondered.

“I’m afraid not. This meeting was a courtesy, I’m afraid—once this interaction is over, do not expect further kindness.”

“You’re still being nice right now though?” Eleanor checked.

“Yes,” he supposed.

“Cool! So like, can I have the key for that thing?” she nodded in the direction of the- oh Maker! Was true Comte was in the cabinet?! “Before you leave. I’ll let you get a head start before I let the Comte out if you want.”

He regarded her for a moment with quiet amusement, before he retrieved the cabinet key from a vest pocket, “It has been a pleasure dealing with you, Lady Trevelyan.”

“You too—mami…we don’t have to fight him, do we?” Eleanor implored her bodyguard, “I mean Cremisius and everyone is right outside and they’ll totally kick his butt for us, but I really appreciate him coming and warning us first, and he hasn’t hurt any of us.”

Marehis’s mouth was ground in a firm line, expression grim as she glared at the man, assessing and considering before deciding, “Leave, if you ever harm a hair on my child’s or Lady Montilyet’s heads, I will decimate you.”

“Of course,” the man nodded, rising from his seat and bowing a bit, respectively, “Good day.”

“You too!” Eleanor replied—Marehis’s hand was low, on her arm to keep her from rising from her seat momentarily until the assassin was clear from room. Then the girl was up and dashing over to the cabinet to free the Comte, “Don’t worry! If you’re hearing a voice that isn’t mine, that’s just Cole—he’s a friend! He found you!”

“Are you alright, Josephine?” Marehis asked softly, hand resting on the Antivan woman’s arm now, though the act was more for comforting, than restraint.

She felt ill, and frightened, and mortified—horrified! She’d brought Eleanor headlong into a meeting with a member of the House of Repose!

And her response was tears, apparently, horrible things welling in her eyes as she hastily wiped at them with the back of an index finger, “I’m- I’m so sorry, I swear to you Marehis I did not kn-“

“Oh lethallan, sweet lady—of course you didn’t know,” Marehis offered, soothing. Oh, perhaps the woman was being more forgiving than she was with herself. “Ellie is safe—you are safe, I swear to you, I will make certain you’re unharmed while you figure this out. Leliana-“

“Oh please no- Leliana will be furious with me, and if she would worry for my family’s financial state, this will certainly send her to her wits end.”

“I would prefer her at her wits end than you at the wrong end of an assassin’s blade, Josephine, and she will only be concerned because she should be—you’re in danger.”

She was. Oh Maker how had this happened?

“I- I will tell her then,” Josephine vowed, “whenever she returns from Vinicius’s estate.”

…though that was apparently unnecessary.

The true Comte was…pleasant—he’d initially threatened to sue the Inquisition for his distress but Eleanor reasoned out that he wasn’t just some random victim*—he’d talked to Josie, hadn’t he? Written her to join him in Val Royeaux for information about her couriers? No, he hadn’t—that had entirely been forgery on behalf of the House of Repose…but she’d danced so close to the truth of things the man confessed he owed a debt of favor to that particular league of assassins, that he’d been restrained and tied because he kicked up a fuss whenever their representative came to collect on his debt, the true Comte wasn’t necessarily for or against the Inquisition, but he certainly didn’t wish their ire, he’d not wanted to be involved at all. Unfortunately that is the price one pays when…well,

“You didn’t have to have him killed,” Cole had announced, serenely, “You could have told him you loved him, that you were afraid he wouldn’t share or too much pride would keep you from asking when you needed money. But that’s just money, he was your brother—you can get money from anywhere, I have some in my pockets and I don’t even need it, but I cannot fit your brother’s life in my pocket. His wife doesn’t forgive you. That’s why she won’t sleep in the same room with you—she knows and she hates you for it. She could have loved you if Geoff died some other way, you seemed so kind to keep her, take her as your own wife when she could have been cast out. But she found the things you leave in boxes locked and low, beneath the loose tile in your bed chamber.”

It…got a touch personal and the man forgot his grievances, at least with the Inquisition.

The inquisition had grievances enough.

They’d been tight-lipped about the whole thing—Eleanor merely offering up that there’d been some complications in her meeting that would be discussed later, asking the Chargers keep their guard up around the Marchand’s home. Josephine would prefer Skyhold’s walls but this place was a bit of a foretress all its own, just, an unfamiliar one. But she’d allies all around—Cremisius stood in the hall outside the room Josephine claimed, a small sitting room with a writing desk…in the middle of the home…with no windows. Yes, she was certain she would be safe there.

From all assassins…save one.

Her heart leapt into her throat as the door banged open—gilded doorhandle slamming into the marble wall with thunderous sound.

And Leliana stormed into the room, eyes wide with rage.

“Josephine Cherette Montilyet!” the woman spoke at a near-roar, hands slapping against the desk as she leaned over it to rail at the Antivan woman. “How dare you keep such a thing from me!”

“Whoa whoa hey—everything good here or should you maybe back off?” Cremisius wondered firmly, standing in the doorway. “You alright Josie?”

Not in the slightest. “I’m fine.”

“She’s a liar and I could kill her,” Leliana assured over her shoulder, “but she is safe from me, Lieutenant…thank you. Do please close the door.”

“Are you okay with that?” the young man checked with Josephine.

…no, not entirely. But at the same time, also, yes. She’d rather the whole of the house not hear what was happening just now, “I’m well, Cremisius—please close the door. Perhaps you could check on Eleanor? I’m sure she would be delighted to see you before she retires for the evening.”

“Alright. Cole’ll get me if you need me.”

“Thank you,” Josephine said. Truly. She…she may need to, oh Maker, Leliana was livid. “Marehis told you, I presume?”
“I have sources, Josephine, outside Marehis and the Inquisition, and I received word not an hour after I escaped Vinicius’s estate with- it’s been a trying night and now I’ve been informed your family is in debt, and you are the subject of an assassins contract!” the woman growled in frustration. “I have people who can be in the House of Repose within the hour—they’ll go, and destroy this contract, and that will be the end of things.”

“No Leliana please- they will not simply let your people waltz in and destroy documentation. Your people could kill or- or be killed!” Josephine cried out, reaching to grasp at Leliana’s wrist before the woman could attempt taking leave to do such a thing! She- she wouldn’t- couldn’t have people dying for her! “I have already come to an agreement with Eleanor—the Du Paraquettes can rescind their contract with the House of Repose.”

“And why ever would they do that?! You’re not thinking Josie-”

“I’ve done nothing but think, thank you!” Josephine refuted, voice straining as she insisted, “The Du Paraquettes have lost their noble status some years passed. If I return them to their former standing, I’m certain they will agree to revoke their ancestor’s ill wishes against my family.”

“Returning their status will take time Josephine—time you already don’t have-“

“Please,” Josephine pled, “Eleanor has already agreed-“

“Because she is a child and she trusts you and you’ve not presented her with all of the facts with- with this dishonest streak you’ve suddenly taken up!”

“Marehis suggested the very same—she offered herself to lead your people into the House of Repose to destroy the contract but I,” begged, “convinced her to see my case. She has an appreciation for bettering the lives of those my ancestors feuded with, turning an unpleasant situation into something that benefits us all.”

“Your death benefits no one-“

“Neither does another dying for me!” Josephine's conviction poured up from her throat, tears welling up in her eyes, it was enough to give the Spymaster pause. Which only agitated the woman further, she redoubled her decision to be incised with Josephine until this was resolved.

“This is nonsense, you-“ Leliana let out a frustrated sound, “Cole!”

The Spirit materialized…the same as always but there was something timid in his landing the barest bit of pause between his feet softly broaching the ground as he stared at the women with wide-eyed…oh dear, was the poor boy afraid?

“Very,” he assured aloud.

“What?” Leliana asked, though she shook her head, physically swatting the matter away, “Nevermind! Cole, you will tell me this instant every last thing Josephine has been lying about!”

“She lied when her Abuelita asked her who ate all the chocolate meant for the Miguelitos and she insisted she had not, and when her mother asked if she looked fat when she was pregnant with Antoine-“ the boy started. Maker! She’d been a child! And she had not eaten all of the chocolate!...Laurien too, had played culprit to the crime.

“I mean recently!” Leliana snapped, “Since organizing this farce of a trip!”

“Oh!” the boy chirped, thinking. “She lied when you came to her office—she didn’t want you to come because she didn’t want you to find out her family was in debt and her couriers were murdered and she was meeting a Comte for information and he wanted to meet Ellie…though she didn’t lie about him wanting to meet Ellie. and he wasn’t really a comte—but Josephine didn’t know about that. Does that count as a lie?” he wondered. “It wasn’t truth, but it was Josephine’s truth at the time? My body’s head hurts.”

“The Chargers are here to protect Josephine and Ellie because Marehis was afraid the Comte wanted to hurt the Inquisitor. Mister Aclassi is here as cover, but he is truly here to go shopping—it was not the original plan, but it became the plan. And to go to the theater. And museums. And to hold Josephine’s arm because that’s what a gentleman does. She makes him feel like sunlight, and he makes her feel safe and at peace, warm like when you return to your home and the hearth is ablaze and you might never be cold again.”

“…so they are dating?”

“Yes.”

“Good,” Leliana sighed. “I will go speak with Eleanor myself—this isn’t over Josie. I will respect Eleanor’s wishes but I’ll see to it myself she’s fully informed, and we will do everything to make you safe.”

“Thank you,” Josephine said, breathing a sigh of relief as the Spymaster took her leave. Then, “Thank you, Cole, for…being discreet.”

“Discreet?” the boy wondered, confused.

“For er…lying about Mister Aclassi and myself. Our…agreement to start dating.”

That only prompted further confusion. “But…you did agree to start dating. In his quarters, after you told Leliana.”

“Falsely—mutual deception. We are not truly in romance. It is fake,” she reminded him.

He just stared at her, uncertain about her words, but wholly certain in his own,

“But it isn’t fake.”

Val Royeaux was lovely—he’d not quite enjoyed the place when he was there last, though this was rather a different circumstance. It was beautiful, dare he liken it to Minrathous? It wasn’t quite as expansive, but just as extravagant…perhaps more so. His homeland did admittedly go for a more menacing air with their superiority. And it was a wonderful experience he was excited to share with his child!

His child…and the whole of the Chargers…and great many Inquisition scouts. The latter two were not persistently present but they could be seen all around as they made their way throughout their day, some attempting to casually blend in with the market place while others were visibly standing guard.
It was strange, though perhaps it shouldn’t be? Just…Lady Montilyet had been so very grave when she and Ellie returned from that Comte meeting. Whatever ‘snag’ had been caught must have bothered the woman, oh he hoped she wasn’t beating herself up—whatever it was, it most surely wasn’t her fault, the woman was unfailingly compassionate, polite and graceful even in the face of utmost disrespect. Ahh, but the point was…the woman was rather cagey about the whole thing the following day and…their security was increased, doubled by his guess, Inquisition scouts pouring into the Marchand’s in droves. Just, overnight. When he made to question it, concerned, Lady Montilyet had insisted it was mere precaution, they were traveling with the Inquisitor after all, and she was to be enjoying the city unarmored, often in formal wear. Was there some greater threat to sweet Ellie that had risen during their meeting? He’d yet to bear witness to any such attempt or threat upon her life but oh he could— he could dole out a sound-

He was not one for violence! But he would slay a man with his bare hands—he was known to be agile with fabric shears! Any who dared harm a hair upon that girl’s head could see just how very much so!

He was certain Cremisius would handle it splendidly…but should his son be having an off day…Tonio would be keeping his shears concealed in the deep inner breast pocket of his suit jacket. Just in case.

After all, if someone was after Ellie, Lady Montilyet may well be in danger as well. They would be spending their days together, after all. Perhaps that was what had the woman on edge was…was she fearful?

They were just leaving the…oh what were their names? Marchand. The Marchand’s home, Ellie spoke highly of them oh, those poor people, losing their daughter at the Conclave. He- if anything befell his son, he was uncertain just how he would carry on. Ahh but—as they were leaving the Marchand’s home Josephine seemed…tense, despite the pleasant schedule they had ahead. He’d only just overheard Ellie offering something like reassurance—quietly speaking to Josephine in the front corridor as they prepared to leave, “…be in public all day, and everyone’s on guard. Everything’s going to be okay, we’ve got the ball rolling with the Du Paraquettes. We’ve already heard back from Countess Dionne and I pinky promise I’ll do my absolute best talking to her today. Cole will let us know the instant Judge Auld gets back with us, everyone’s got something they want and we’re pretty resourceful—his signature’s as good as got! Try not to worry, okay? Have some fun today.”

“Gracias, mija,” the woman had said, her voice just a bit tight before she cleared her throat, tucking a loose curl behind Ellie’s ear as she pressed on, “I’m certain we’ll have a wonderful time —do enjoy yourself, please.”

“Is everything alright?” Tonio questioned softly as they walked along, offering the Lady his arm as they began the rather perilous descent down the spire’s winding staircase to reach the lower level of the Bazaar.

She stared at his arm momentarily, hesitating for some reason as if she were nervous to take it, but she accepted it, hugging his arm a bit with her own as they followed Ellie and Cremisius… who were descending the stairs arm in arm but hopping a bit—skipping steps together and oh, it was precious to hear his bello mimo chuckling softly as he indulged his girlfriend in a bit of nonsensical fun as they followed Madam de Fer down the stairway. Marehis brought up the rear of their party with Dorian and the Iron Bull flanking her, apparently a point for keeping guard—Tonio had held the door open for the woman but she smiled her thanks and motioned for him to go on ahead, she would be following while they made their way through the city.
“I am fine,” Josephine breezed, convincingly for most, perhaps but he was certain something was amiss. “You’re well, I hope?”

“Oh certainly,” he said, though, “Concerned but content—I understand if you’ve something private you’re dealing with, but if you need to speak about whatever is troubling you, know you have my ear.”

“I-” she started, as if she were about to reiterate her ‘am fine’ point. But, “Thank you, Tonio.”

“Of course, cara mia,” he gently assured as they stepped out into the Bazaar. “Bella,” he called to Ellie who twirled about, to face him, walking backward with her arm looped through Cremisius’s as the young man guided her steps, “where are we headed?”

“First stop—shopping!” she giddily announced, “Tia says you’ll get to meet a few suppliers directly! And I…might get more shoes.”

“And so it begins,” Cremisius said with a put-on sigh, assisting the girl in whirling back around to face the road ahead, wrapping an arm around her to hold her to his side, “my girl’s gonna be a shoe fiend huh?”

“Not a fiend,” Ellie gently defended, “just…I like shoes. I like dressing up and being taller and there’s just so many different ways to do that!”

“Hey, I’m not complaining. I think heels were commercialized for women for sexist ideals but uh…as long as you like them,” he smiled, leaning closer and it was only through being directly behind them Tonio was able to overhear as the young man spoke against her ear, “I’ve got zero issues with how those ideals look on you,” which sent the girl giggling. Good heavens! Well, that was hardly an appropriate way to speak to a young lady in front of all and sundry…but it didn’t seem unwelcome and it wasn’t as if he were shouting; it was a private flirtation.

“Hands where I can see them, Lieutenant,” Marehis gently chided from behind them, ahh, his hand had been slipping—cupped the girl’s backside through her dress for a brief moment before he returned it to rest at her waist. So, perhaps not an entirely private flirtation but the boy was trying, Maker preserve him.

“Sorry Mare,” Cremisius called back. The Iron Bull snorted…and subsequently startling a couple passing by, alarmed that the Qunari might…what? Be preparing to go on a rampage? …that might be entertaining, the Iron Bull running through the streets of Val Royeaux, inciting panic in his wake. It would serve them right, honestly, Tonio was prepared to take it to blows when their first discussion with a supplier started with him insisting that while the ‘knife-ear’ was welcome to stay if she didn’t touch anything or pester his customers, the ‘Oxman’ would need to stay outside. Like a dog!

Little Ellie nearly did take a swing at the man for referring to her mami with a racial slur but the woman in question had already come up behind the girl and hugged her tightly, wrapping her arms around her so the girl’s arms were pinned to her sides while her mother pressed a kiss to the top of her head and told her not to pay it any mind, and Madam de Fer had a hand on Cremisius’s arm, low on his wrist like she’d only just caught the boy’s arm before he could strike the man for his insults, speaking in low tones against his son’s ear, her warning earning her small, appreciative smile from his son as he nodded and settled for glaring at the shop owner. Tonio…found an even more satisfying form of vindication.
“Well then, thank you for not wasting our time—I assume a man’s work is only as worthwhile as the man himself, and you’ve done us the courtesy of revealing you’re utter garbage up front,” Tonio said in gracious tones, turning away with Lady Josephine on his arm the woman’s eyes were wide with shock as she heard him speak what was quite possibly the rudest thing he’d found it in himself to say to another person, but thankfully she seemed impressed, as it was certainly deserved. He announced…projecting his voice to be heard throughout the shop, if not by passersby on the street as well, “if it pleases you, Inquisitor Eleanor Trevelyan, I’ve absolutely no wish to bring the Inquisition’s business to this establishment. Shall we try next door?”

Ellie beamed at that. “That pleases me greatly! Come on mami, let’s take the Inquisition’s business elsewhere!”

And so they did, thankfully, without further incident. Their next venture into a store offered a polite young man who greeted them all respectfully, and the only thing he had to say to the Iron Bull was to call to him, ‘good sir’ that he might prefer the side entrance—it was open to the marketplace and had no low doorway to pass through in order to enter the shop proper, so he needn’t risk his horns.

“They’ll be on mission—the Inquisitor and her party,” Josephine spoke softly to Tonio as the shopkeeper allowed them the run of the place, browsing without him over their shoulder, but waiting in the wings in case they had questions or needed assistance. “While it is purely investigative work there will also…they are there to protect someone of great importance Corypheus wishes to bring to harm. So…”

“You fear they’ll need to be battle ready?” Tonio surmised.

“Exactly. Which…”

“Doesn’t lend much in the way of high fashion. But, we’ll make do—appropriate colors and ornamentation, while being able to conceal armor and weaponry as needed, easy to take off and replace at a moments notice without suspect?”

She smiled, blushing a bit though she seemed amused, “Yes. I appreciate we’re on the same page.”

“Always,” he assured with a warm chuckle. “That’s a shame—I was looking forward to providing Ellie a proper ballgown…though I am uncertain how well my son would survive.”

“Oh,” Josephine breathed, wistful, “my sweet mija attired for the ballroom—everything you’ve made her thus far is absolutely breathtaking. She dressed to match with me yesterday and I do believe my heart is still in liquid form, it was entirely precious.”

Ahh yes, he’d not seen much of Ellie yesterday but he was most certain he knew precisely the dress she was speaking of, “I showed her the material as a sample from our time in the Hinterlands and she was absolutely delighted with it—asked specifically for a dress to compliment your usual attire.”

“Oh truly?” the woman asked, seeming incredibly honored, “That’s- oh goodness. I must admit I love that.”

“You’ll have to keep an eye out as we look around today—point out anything to me that you may like for your own wardrobe. Even if you would prefer our suppliers in the Hinterlands, having an idea of what sort of material, colors, patterns you might enjoy will be a great help to me.”
"So long as we do not get the materials confused," she agreed, "It would not do to have the Iron Bull showing up at the Winter Palace wearing a silk dress."

"Ambassador, that's exactly what the Winter Palace needs and you know it," the Qunari saw fit to point out over his shoulder from where he stood examining accessories with Ellie and Cremisius. "Imekari, babe. Your ears pierced? These’d look cute with your little get-up today."

Josephine made a soft sound, almost like a laugh as she murmured, “The child is Antivan,” as if that guaranteed her answer.

“Oh! They’re so pretty! Earrings are cute but I don’t have anywhere to put them—the only holes in my head are the ones the Maker put there.”

…but not, Josephine looked up from the bolts of fabric they were looking through, “Truly mija?”

“Huh?” the girl questioned, turning to look to the Ambassador, “Oh! Piercings—yeah, it’s just not something I’ve ever done?”

Josephine’s mouth worked momentarily before she found, “Oh,” like that was something unfortunate. “Well carina…if- if it were something that interested you, I would be honored to arrange as much for you. It wouldn’t er…would it be an issue for you?” an issue? Ahh. Blood.

“No issue at all I don’t think it’s just um…jab and done, right?” Ellie checked, and Josephine nodded. “Um…yeah actually, I’ve never really thought about it before but I like earrings—yours are super pretty, and Vivienne’s!”

“Gracias—oh I’m certain you’ll love it, it’s a minorly painful procedure, it will heal as it should almost instantly once your earrings are in, it is traditional your first set be dipped in Elf Root tonic before wear so they maintain your piercing while healing the skin around it. Actually mija there’s a jewelry store near here—if you would like we could stop there and see if there’s anything there you’d like as your first earrings?”

“Oh yeah!” Ellie chirped, nodding, “I think I know where you’re talking about—it’s where I got mami’s birthday present!”

Oh. Lady Montilyet blanched, eyes wide as she looked about to make a bit of panic-mixed-apologetic eye contact with the Elf woman. “Your mami, yes,” her mouth worked a bit like she wasn’t certain just what to say.

Marehis offered the woman a kind smile, “It sounds like a marvelous idea, unless you wish to go to a professional, it is something we can handle ourselves.”

“Oh wow, could we mami?” Ellie wondered excitedly, “That’d be so cool!”

“Leliana is capable, unless Josephine wishes to do as much herself?” the woman informed her, “If the Iron Bull has the sort of needles he uses for tattooing? They will suit just fine,” she said to be heard by Ellie and then, coming closer from where’d she’d taken point at the shop entrance, nearing Lady Josephine and Tonio she spoke more quietly, a hand on Josephine’s arm, “My Lady—the Inquisitor is a young woman, I trust she’s fully capable of making such decisions about her own body for herself, she needn’t her parents’ permission,” she assured, “I suppose it’s a bit difficult to be the fun auntie that whisks her precious niece off for little adventures when her ‘mami’ must always be in attendance…I apologize if my unrest about our trip to Val Royeaux made you assume I’m anything less than pleased with your relationship with Ellie. She adores you and you’ve been nothing but wonderful to her.”

For some reason the words sent Lady Montilyet nearly to tears, “I’m- I was wrong to ask her to meet with the Comte and I’m- I’m so sor-“

“It was fine, Josie. Oh, lethallan—you’re…more affected by our visit. I know you would never do anything you thought might bring ma’da’vehnan harm. I’m sorry if I insinuated otherwise when you proposed this trip. Everything is fine—I’ve seen not one single threat since we’ve departed our quarters.”

“Truly?” Josephine asked, sighing with relief when the Elf woman nodded and gave her arm a gentle squeeze. “I-“

“The Iron Bull?” Marehis called over her shoulder, “Would you watch over Ellie for me? I’ll just be a moment. Da’vehnan you are to stay in The Iron Bull’s sight at all times,” she intoned.

“Si mami, is everything okay?” the girl asked, looking between the Antivan and Elf women.

“Yes sweet girl, just taking a minute,” Marehis assured, leading Josephine away—the Ambassador mouthing ‘my apologies’ to Tonio as she stepped off in the middle of their search but that was…that was fine, Maker, it seemed like…like perhaps the woman needed a moment to compose herself.

“Hey Imekari—you’re supposed to stay in my sight, keep it out’my blindspot.”

“I’m holding your hand!” Ellie complained, reasonably enough, though,

“You…or the very friendly assassin that knifed and replaced you while you were in my blindspot?”

“That’s fair,” she conceded. “I don’t wanna hold your hand right now anyway.”

“Ouch—babe, Sparky’s just keepin’ my seeing side hand warm, I’ll drop him right now if you wanna switch.”

“I beg pardon?” Dorian scoffed with mild offense though, “She said she doesn’t wish to hold hands with you brute—did it perhaps occur to you she wishes to hold hands with me and you’re the one being ‘dropped’?”

“Awe Dorian, I love you with like, everything but I was actually talking about—Madam de Feeeer!” Ellie called, getting the Enchantress’s attention, “Hi! Wanna hold hands and help me shop? I’m looking for accessories!”

“For fashion or to a crime my dear?” the woman wondered as she joined the girl, bemusedly taking her hand and leading her into the Iron Bull’s line of sight.

“Hmmm…I haven’t totally decided yet but you’re my go-to for either, obviously,” the girl assured to Vivienne’s amusement, “I’m leaning toward fashion. Dorian says they have to match or compliment my outfits and/or shoes? But there’s so many different colors of things I’m not sure what goes with what.”

“Oh never you worry darling, let’s see what we can find,” she invited warmly, wrapping an arm around the girl’s shoulders and keeping her in view of the Iron Bull as they browsed.

“I apologize for leaving you,” Josephine’s voice spoke softly at his side, oh! She returned, Marehis had an arm around the woman’s shoulders and offered her a gentle squeeze, whispering something quietly against the Ambassador’s ear she nodded to, and then the Elf woman was off, leaving them as she set a casual pace around the store, a bit of a patrol. Lady Montiyet, oh, it looked as if she might have been crying—she’d just the barest bit of moisture in the corners of her slightly-reddened eyes.

“It was hardly any trouble,” he quietly assured, offering up his pocket square, it was what the accessory was for, after all. She smiled her thanks before carefully dabbing at her eyes, sniffling a bit.

“I don’t mean to look a sight, I’m-“

“Fine?” he finished for her, “And lying, which is your prerogative. My lady if you need anything at all, you need only ask, I would not press you for details you’d not wish to give.”

“We’re handling something of a delicate matter—more I cannot say in public—I…became just a bit overwhelmed, needed air,” she sighed, lamenting, “I should not have distracted Marehis so.”

Tonio was quiet as he considered it a moment before breathing the offer low enough not to be overheard, “If you need, you’re more than free to distract me,” he assured her, saying, “Whenever my Cremisius found himself overwhelmed as a child, I instilled in him the idea he could always come to me no matter where we were. He need only squeeze my hand thrice, and I would know something was the matter, and if he cared to endeavor to put it to words later, I would gladly listen. The same could be said of you.” He offered his arm.

The Lady took his arm, side brushing against his as she leaned into the contact a bit, giving his arm a single squeeze, some of the stiffness leaving her frame as she sighed with quiet contentment. “Have you found anything to your liking?” she wondered.

“For the Winter Palace? I was thinking Inquisition colors, this fabric is traditionally used in military uniforms—for parades and the like but I know well there are ways to...weave the raw materials with reinforcement, thin metal threading that will offer some protection and assist in its durability,” he dropped his voice a bit out of politeness for their current shop keeper, “and I’m assured there are suppliers in this city capable of getting us just that if we cannot get as much here.”

“That sounds splendid,” Josephine said, “appropriate uniform, everyone wearing the same thing, any who go in armor will be unsuspected.”

“If it is so very dangerous should you not all go in armor?” Tonio wondered...worried. “I could see to it your uniform has a more protective inner layer. It would be entirely comfortable—at least Eleanor assures me it is.”

“...her clothing is armored?”

“Appropriately,” he said, “the bodiced vests she’s taken to wearing are inlayed with bone for support and protection, an internal layer of insulation before the comfortable cushioned lining. They serve as protection for the vital organs in her abdomen. Her cloaks have a layer of leather between the outer cloth and inner lining, at least around her shoulders and chest—I’d like the girl safe, not er, trapped because she can’t move about in her cloak.”

“You truly arranged for as much?”
“I spent the week she was on the Storm Coast with the Iron Bull and the Chargers...” huh, he’d not many details on it. All he knew was the Qunari was technically considered Tal-Vashoth now. “in the forge with Master Dennett, making certain it was just right.”

She hugged his arm a bit tighter, some emotion passing through her features like gratitude that almost moved her to tears—was the woman truly so distressed or was er...perhaps her monthly still at hand? Though he understood perhaps she was moved, “Thank you, oh Maker bless you—the cloak she wears now? It is protective?”

“As well as warm.”

“P-perhaps her dresses could be made more er...be protective in the same way her vests are?”

“I believe she’s wearing one now under her dress,” he said, the lines had been albeit noticeable when she turned to face them before and her skirts had been slightly trapped between her hips and Cremisius’s thigh, pulled the top of her dress more tightly against her body.

The woman relaxed several fold, entirely from how tightly she’d been holding herself. The change was so drastic it startled him for fear the woman had found herself collapsing—he unwound his arm from hers to splay his hand high on her back, making to catch her, his free hand grasping her arm just below her elbow, Maker, she’d given him a bit of a fright but she was alright, in fact she seemed wholly relieved as she breathed out a staggering breath, “That is excellent. Oh,” she sighed, “I worry for her so. You understand, of course. Thank you, Tonio.”

“Of course,” he returned, “if I didn’t worry likewise, I’d not have thought of such things,” he supposed with some mirth, offering it up humorously in the hopes she might...ahh, yes, she smiled at that. Good. Perhaps she truly would enjoy today.

She seemed to. They found materials for the Winter Palace and the woman did open herself up to questioning for her own wardrobe. She was insistent she would rely on their Hinterland suppliers, so...they would. Mostly. He might have...it was important to order a bit more fabric than necessarily needed—it wouldn’t do for a misstep leading to having to make a separate order after all, shipping fees, and time constraints were the stuff of nightmares. It was only appropriate to adorn their uniforms with something that represented Orlais and the Winter Palace in particular, so while it would clash minorly, it was a necessary mode of respect to adorn their uniforms with sashes made of sapphire blue Orlesian silk...and the color was so very striking when the Lady held some in her hands. So, if he just so happened to have material left over from their uniforms...well whatever else was he to do with it? It would have already been paid for by the Inquisition, it would be a terrible shame to let it go to waste so, he intended not to. Too, he’d been mindful as they came to a shop that was exclusively dedicated to the trimmings of outfits—decorative cording, buttons, lace. Lady Montilyet’s eye was caught by golden buttons molded to look like rose blossoms—while that wasn’t what exactly what they were looking for uniform-wise, and they did eventually settle on gold buttons the shop would have sent to them emblazon with the Inquisition’s seal—Tonio quietly made purchase of enough of them, enough to use for the closure of a dress if not for decoration. Oh, Josephine was so relieved when they concluded their search for materials for the Winter Palace—finished off with Tonio making arrangements with the owner of the shoe store Ellie seemed rather fond of, for appropriate footwear, the poor shoemaker looked bedraggled by the time he finished taking the Iron Bull’s measurements.

Josephine was beaming, oh, she was absolutely elated as their group made their way to the jewelers. She stepped out of his hold only slightly—resuming their former arrangement, of merely walking arm in arm. He hadn’t realized they’d been walking with his arm around her and a hand gently resting on her arm until then, Maker, that was…likely too familiar, inappropriate. But perhaps it had lent to the cover of er…it was his understanding they were still presenting themselves a budding couple in Leliana’s eyes? Josephine had yet to call the gambit off, so he assumed so. They walked arm in arm though the jewelry store, Magister Tilani had favored this place when last he visited with her, though this was a markedly better experience. Oh, Lady Josephine was simply- just radiant with her delight as Ellie sidled up to them and took the Antivan woman’s free hand to walk around, looking in every case of the jeweler’s selection earrings.

“Studs or very small hoops are traditional for starting out—it can get uncomfortable the larger the earring you wear mija, so it is best to start out with a more palatable size, something that will acclimate your ears to wearing ornament.”

“Ohh,” Ellie nodded, “that makes sense! Gosh, these are all so pretty, I really don’t even know where to begin.”

“What do you think of these, mija?” Josephine wondered, “Yevette had similar when she was pierced, oh she was so precious, I used to pester mama constantly to let me hold her,” though, “And then we taught her how to speak and I’ve not had a moments peace with her since.”

Ellie giggled at that, looking over the pair of earrings Josephine pointed out—holding them up to the girl to show her how they would fit when she looked in one of the mirrors hanging about the shop. Oh they were lovely—tiny hoops that would just leave a breath of space between the silvery loop and the bottom of her earlobe, adorned with a tiny dangling pearl.

“Oh they’re beautiful,” Marehis sincerely encouraged. “Do you like them, da’vehnan?” the girl nodded.

“Excellent choice darling, they’re simply precious,” Vivienne assured.

“Think they sell nipple rings in this joint?” he…albeit unfortunately…overheard the Iron Bull asking his lover from where the couple stood idly waiting, at the counter just behind them. Good heavens.

“…are you asking out of amusement or are you entertaining the idea—“ Altus Pavus let out a bit of frustrated growl, “it’s too late I hate how much that appeals, we’ll browse shall we?”

He was approaching old age, was he not? There came some promise of a loss in the hearing department, didn’t there? It would be…appreciated at times such as these.

Though he found himself wishing he’d the Iron Bull’s capabilities to hear. Ellie broke away from their party, Marehis at her back as they neared the fountain before the open-air cafe.

“I’ve got somebody I need to speak with really quickly—I’ll be right back. You guys can go ahead and see about lunch maybe? If everyone’s hungry. I’m always hungry,” she elaborated, “What I’m saying really is: I love you Cremisius, please get me food? I’ll make it worth your whiiiiile,” she sang and Tonio wasn’t certain this was necessarily appropriate in front of everyone… though the girl seemed to make some fun out of frightening her elders with near-impropriety.

“Oh yeah?” Cremisius wondered drily, well learned in his girlfriend’s antics.

“Uh huh—you can sit with me while I eat! See the whole process go down, hand me napkins, tell me I’m pretty with food on my face.”
“You are pretty with food on your face—it’s a look you never cease to make work.”

“That’s why, out of all the people I might marry, you’re like top three in the running.”

“Who’s number one?”

“Lord Woolsley.” Was the young lady expected to marry a Lord? Oh Cremisius—W asn’t bothered in the slightest. “Oh yeah, him. Saw him in his pen in Redcliffe—that’s fair,” he acknowledged.

“Lord Woolsley is a vibrantly colorful Ram who lives on a farm in the Hinterlands,” Lady Montilyet quietly informed him. Ahh. Good. He did recall spotting such a thing when they were in Redcliffe—if all else failed…Ellie would look splendid in a sunset-schemed fur coat. He might arrange for it otherwise that ‘One-Eyed Jim’ fellow did shear his special ram to make yarn and the like, Tonio just felt it more a summery look, he’d be in contact once the season was upon them.

As it stood, while he could not overhear her conversation with whoever it was she’d gone to meet, it seemed their meeting had gone well. She was all smiles and offered a thumbs-up to Lady Montilyet when she joined them at their table in the cafe.

“Countess Dionne is really nice and I got um,” she tapped a finger to her temple, “Cole’d. Um…on a scale of one to a thousand, how terrible is it if I ask Inquisition soldiers to do something I might not actually do myself…because like…if I had to, I would do it…I think? I just really really really would not want to at all, in the slightest.”

“What did Judge Auld request of you?” Lady Montilyet asked, concerned. “If he was inappropriate—“

“Oh gosh nothing groady…at least not that kind of groady, I’d never ask someone to take one for the team for that! Unless the Iron Bull was into it or something. No, he wants people to go with him hunting for—” oh the girl looked like she might be ill, she buried her face against Cremisius’s shoulder, “for…”

“It’s spiders, isn’t it?” Cremisius assumed.

“Uh-huh,” she said a bit miserably, the young man chuckled as he wrapped an arm around her, pressing a kiss to the top of her head.

“Scale of one to a thousand? Solid one. Not everyone’s as er…cautious—“

“Terrified!”

“Of spiders as you are,” he assured, “it’s okay lovely—they’ll be fine, he wants some soldiers or something for a hunting party? Cullen knows his men, he wouldn’t send anyone incapable of squaring off with some spiders.”

“But it’s spiders—they’re supposed to be as big as horses Cremisius! I didn’t need to know there are spiders that big!”

“Oh, pica amore—do not fret,” Tonio offered, “Spiders that size sounds improbable, I guarantee it is mere bragging. When he returns from his hunting, successful or not, they will be said to have been the size of dragons.”

“You promise?” she asked, offering up her unmarked pinkie finger from across the table.
He was certain enough…and too, there was little chance of the girl discovering otherwise if he was wholly inaccurate and there were truly such monstrous spiders. And it felt like a precious bit of fun to intertwine their pinkie fingers “I promise.”

“Kay! I’ll write papi when we get back—or I can run up now if—”

“No mija, please, put it out of your mind for now,” Lady Montilyet insisted, “eat, enjoy yourself. We’ll work on it together—I’ll write Judge Auld to inform him of our agreement while you write Cullen.”

“That’ll be fun!”

“I suppose it might be,” the woman agreed, smiling warmly. “We’ll do so when we freshen up before we’re due at the museum?”

“Oh yay! That sounds great!” Ellie enthused. “Um…so like I get we go and look at stuff but that’s what people also do at theatres and hi—I’m uncultured, gorgeous swine—I don’t really know what museums are? Do I clap? More importantly—can I clap? Are there snacks? Is there fire involved?”

Oh…oh good heavens. Had the child truly never gone to something of the sort? Would this trip hold her first ever visit to a theatre as well? Oh, that was a bit exciting in a way—he’d loved introducing Cremisius to theatre in his youth, at least in the ways he could afford to. There were plays held during holy days in Chantry, and free puppeteering at a local library, the occasional performance at the amphitheater, they usually caught by slipping in after the ticket collectors were off counting their bounty, and finding seats in the back row just after curtain’s raised.

“Museums are usually…you can speak freely,” Josephine started, “unlike in the theatre, though there is a bit of assumed volume control, it is polite to not disturb others enjoying the museum so…I suppose clapping would be permitted if you’re quiet about it but it is not wholly traditional. There’s no performances—it is a place that displays art and historical relics for us to see and learn about.”

“Like walking through a book?!” she asked excitedly, oh, that was an entirely precious observation, Cremisius nodded as if to say he supposed that was true, burying his amused smile at her exuberance against the girl’s hair.

“…that…is accurate,” Josephine supposed with surprise.

“That’s so cool!”

“There likely won’t be any fire and it’s best to keep foodstuffs out of museums—it wouldn’t do to risk anything getting on the art.”

“…do I need to unpack my snack pockets before we go?”

“So long as you do not leave a trail of crumbs mija, your snacks can stay in your dress pockets.” And then, after a moment’s consideration, “…there are pockets in your cloak aren’t there?”

“Uh-huh.”

“They are likewise for snacking?” she surmised.

“Tia, if there’s a pocket I can put my hand in, it’s got a snack in it,” Ellie said. "Cremisius keeps crunchy pretzel bites in his pockets for me!"

“Didn’t even have to tell her I started doing it—day one she just went right for the pretzels,” Cremisius snorted, half-complaining, “not so much as a ‘hello’, just comes up from behind me, a hand fishing in my pocket—I thought someone was making a pass at me.”

The boy’s eyes nearly fell out of his head when his girlfriend cheerfully informed him, “I was! The pretzels were just a nice surprise.”

“Mija,” Lady Montilyet smiled even as she gently reprimanded the girl, “we really should make time for a few more etiquette lessons before the Winter Palace—you must at least exchange pleasantries and ask nicely before reaching into someone’s pockets.” That…was quite possibly the closest Tonio supposed the Lady could dare bring herself to something akin to a dirty jest, it was beyond mild but still caused the woman to blush brilliantly, a mischievous smile on her lips as she ducked her head a albeit shyly. Oh, and it was…there was something heartwarming, to see her giggly after such a trying time she’d been going through, whenever Tonio outright chuckled at her teasing.

Their group did return to the Marchand’s for a few minutes while Ellie and Josephine saw to their letter writing, affording time to change and wash up—Cremisius joined Tonio in his quarters as the young man had been going about in his armor that morning, apparently on the job as he escorted his girlfriend around, and now he’d the afternoon to…escort his girlfriend around.

“Oh, I weep for you—your job must be unbearable,” Tonio teased as he finished cleaning his face in the washbasin, smiling to his son’s reflection in the mirror while the boy finished buttoning up his tunic.

“Yeah, it’s an awful gig I’ve got going here,” he lamented. He smiled saying, “It’s kind of the best. I mean I get there’s lots of people who aren’t down with working with their significant other but when your girlfriend’s job is being a walking target for the single most powerful Chantry body currently presiding over Ferelden if not the entire South and she's got an ancient Darkspawn maniac out to get her? I feel a lot better having her back.”

“That’s certainly understandable.”

“…what about uh, you, papa?” his boy wondered gently. “You…got anyone you might be interested in?”

…oh. He wasn’t certain- he didn’t wish to say something that might be overheard by Leliana’s…Josephine warned the woman was crafty and could have ears anywhere. Neither did he wish to upset his son with feigning a relationship of that nature. But they had said they were ‘keeping a professional appearance’ before others—it would be perfectly reasonable for him to include his son in that equation given it was mere ‘budding’ romance. So, he deflected a bit, “Why do you ask?”

“No reason,” Cremisius assured. “Just…you know, if or when you’re ready for something like that, I’ll be happy for you. S’none of my business, as long as you’re happy.”

“Well, there’s nothing to speak of just now. If or when,” Tonio returned his words to him, “it would be entirely your business. Cremisius. I could never love someone you didn’t approve. If ever I did invite someone into our lives…it is our lives.” He would not stand for a repeat of Liviana—he’d hardly consider giving into interest unless he was absolutely certain the woman’s stance on such things. Cremisius had never disclosed to Lady Montilyet and while she was nothing but kind, outright caring for the boy, Tonio wouldn’t dream of daring for something more until he knew for certain the woman would accept his child in full. He, and his son deserved nothing less.

Oh- but- that was ridiculous to think of, they were not truly in romance. It was false, a mere favor for his friend while she handled…something she’d yet to disclose. Goodness, this deception business was certainly not in Tonio’s wheelhouse. Maker, he’d taken it a bit too seriously just then.

“It isn’t false!” Cole’s voice complained as the boy materialized.

“I uh…trust my papa to be honest with me, no worries,” Cremisius said in reply.

Oh, it was wonderful to see him—the Spirit had been keeping scarce this trip and Tonio had been concerned, worried for the boy when he was er…incorporeal? “Oh, I am fine!” Cole announced. “I am happy and safe. I really do not need to eat. Thank you for worrying about me—I have been watching and keeping Josephine safe! Leliana asked me to. But she has asked me to do something else now, it is important, a ‘test run’ for something she might have me do later. I am supposed to practice being secretive—it is hard. Am I doing a good job? I need to do a good job.”

Oh goodness, for Leliana, certainly, the Spymaster required secrecy for most of her occupation it seemed. “…I’ve no idea what this important ‘something else’ is so yes, Cole, you’re doing wonderfully,” Tonio encouraged. “You will be safe while doing this secret thing?”

“Yes! I will try. I am supposed to practice not getting caught. I cannot be hurt if I am not caught, I think,” he said, giving the matter serious thought before nodding, “Yes, I should be safe.”

“You’re heading out now?” Cremisius wondered, and when the other boy nodded, his son placed a hand on his shoulder, giving a few comforting squeezes, “Be careful—things go south you poof to safety. This is just a test, it’s not worth getting hurt over, if you run into trouble, port out and call in the reinforcements,” he intoned. “Thanks for handling this—don’t beat yourself up if you can’t, the uh…situation’s being handled pretty smoothly so far, seems like, so we might not even need the ‘non-test’ run.”

“I will be careful with myself,” the boy promised serenely before vanishing from sight.

“Is it very dangerous, his er, mission?” Tonio questioned tentatively.

“Most I can say is Cole’s seeing if he can sneak into enemy territory*, take or leave something, and get out without alerting anyone to his presence. If he can do that, there’s something Leliana wants to get out without detection, if she sent her own people in it would…almost definitely end in enemy casualties and that’s a no-go this time.” Tonio supposed he looked the surprise he felt, but it was…strange to hear the Inquisition’s Spymaster’s name, and her intentionally seeking for their enemies to survive her plans for them. “It’s something she wants to do for Josephine—a backup plan for one of her Ambassador-ing things, if her more polite options fall through, and they have to do thing’s Leliana’s way, she wants to see if she can do it in a way Josie will approve.”

Ahh. “I will pray for his safety and the success of Lady Montilyet and Leliana’s endeavors.” That must be what she is so very stressed over—worried her er, more polite options will fail and Leliana may have to get involved in some potentially violent way. He could certainly see the sweet, compassionate Lady not wishing death even upon their enemies.

All told…Tonio was albeit ashamed to admit he wished death upon those enemies she wished to spare.

Their arrival at the museum got off to a bit of a rocky start. The Iron Bull was on patrol with Dorian—neither of them finding an interest in enjoying the place themselves, so...there was no Qunari for the guards to be concerned with, but upon their arrival, there was a bit of protocol in place. The Museum had certain standards for just who could enter its halls, only people of status and their guests were permitted. Cremisius was of course, Ellie's guest, Lady Trevelyan, Inquisitor. And Tonio would be considered a guest of Lady Montilyet. Marehis, however, when she made to enter, a member of security staff stopped her...rather rudely—Ellie and Cremisius were ahead of them by some distance as they'd entered first, but now that distance was growing too grate for Marehis's comfort and when she made to follow them, the security guard placed his hand upon her forearm to halt her.

"Excuse me-“ Marehis started in tones of quiet outrage.

"I apologize Ambassador Montilyet, but is this Dalish with you?"

"The woman you're so rudely manhandling is Marehis,” Lady Montilyet firmly offered back. "And you will unhand her this instant."

"Ahh. I mean no disrespect, but as a safety precaution we take into account all of our guests, make certain they are here to enjoy our exhibits and not er...well, there's a great many valuable items in here you understand. Mare-iss?” he pronounced the syllables of woman's name slowly as if making certain he was getting it right and while the woman herself nodded, he released hold of her arm and continued addressing Josephine, “Is she...servant staff? We do not normally allow more than a single guest to our esteemed visitors.” Tonio was certain they'd had no issue with the Lord that entered before them, a woman on each arm, neither of them seeming to be his wife.

"Oh do desist with this,” Vivienne snapped, stepping forward and taking Marehis's arm in her own, “Marehis is my guest.”

"Madam de Fer!” the man...cried out in fright, that suited. “You are...friends?"

"Lovers," the Grand Enchanter corrected. Oh goodness. Tonio nearly began to laugh, he had to restrain himself for fear of er, bringing question to her claim. Lady Montilyet took in a breath, catching her own mirth in her chest as she hugged Tonio's arm more tightly hiding her smile against his shoulder, her own shoulders shaking with unspilled giggles.

"I- I'd no idea to whom I was speaking,” the guardsman insisted, looking to Marehis “I apologize madam, please er, enjoy your visit.”

"However could I not, on the arm of my lady?” Marehis wondered, grinning before she doled out a kiss to Madam de Fer’s cheek.

"I recall the last time I was here their powder rooms locked?” Madam de Fer pondered, as she led Marehis forward, entering the Museum, “We’ll simply have to see if that is still so.”

Lady Montilyet nodded politely to the guardsman as they passed, following after the others, murmuring quietly to Tonio, “I’m not certain if this day will end with my sending the museum a note of apology or a missive railing against their racist practices.”

“Could you not do both?” Tonio wondered, and as they caught up with the women, “Marehis, are you alright?”

“It’s...not fine,” Marehis supposed, “but thank you, sweet man. I’m fine—and while it’s trying...well...” she was smiling as she nodded her head in the direction ahead, ahh. Yes, he supposed he understood it being well worth it, to give their children such a pleasant time. Ellie and Cremisius were the picture of youthful enthusiasm…Maker his son looked just-joyous, soaking in every ounce of this as he found more interest in seeing Ellie so carefree, absorbing the sights around her in wide-eyed delight, mouth moving a mile a minute as she spouted off...probably questions, Tonio hadn’t the hearing to be certain, but Marehis seemed amused as she asked him, “Is the Lieutenant very knowledgeable in higher art?”

“Oh, he’d a great deal of interest in his youth. He lacked a formal education on the subject but he was always looking at illustrations for inspiration, trying to copy different styles while he worked on his own. I recognize some of these names,” he realized as they neared the wall displaying a large oil painting of a field of wildflowers, “artists he followed or learned of after their time.”

“He’s so very talented,” Lady Montilyet breathed, “I wouldn’t wish to burden him—I’d not expect something overnight, it would be in his own time, but if he’d interest, oh, I would love to have his work in my office, if not around Skyhold—he’d certainly be compensated for his talents.”

“Cremisius enjoys illustration in his down time, I’m certain if you asked him he’d gladly hear your request,” Tonio assured. They’d yet to go searching for art supplies but...well, he’d a bit saved up—he hoped he could indulge his child in something he might enjoy using, and too he was watching rather closely as they went out and about, trying to decipher if there was anything catching Cremisius’s eye, something Tonio could use as a birthday present. Justinian followed Bloomingtide and oh, he was excited beyond words to be able to be with his son—prayed daily that this year the Maker would bless them and there would be no mission calling the boy out into the field so he could celebrate the day proper. He’d broached the subject with the Iron Bull—asking if there was anything in particular they did on Cremisius’s birthday. They usually marked the occasion with a drink and a good meal and…er...well, the Qunari had chuckled albeit awkwardly, unsure if it would displease Tonio but “Kid uh...he was sixteen turning seventeen and uh...shy but interested, it was something he needed to get out of his system, a uh, fear to face. Being with someone without fear of rejection. Guy hadn’t played the field any so I set him up. Nice girl—tavern waitress, pretty, sweet, cool with everything.”

“Oh. Cremisius has had a girlfriend before?”

The Qunari snorted, “Noooo, it wasn’t even a date, just...uh, mutually consenting adults getting together and uh, blowing off some steam.”

“You arranged for Cremisius to argue with a young lady on his birthday?”

He had not—he had, however, arranged for them to...engage in the vulgar word for lovemaking, assuring Tonio that his son had been ready at the time, it was not something he would have set up otherwise, it had apparently been something he’d needed. The Qunari seemed reticent to inform him of as much, but Tonio was hardly offended. Once upon a time, Cremisius’s purity had been something of a requirement but that was more a precaution, Tonio making it clear to Cornelius that he would not be laying so much as a finger on Tonio’s child during their engagement. But it was none of his concern now—so long as his son was behaving as a gentleman, not taking advantage or being taken advantage of. It was strange, the subject had come up more than once recently—with the Iron Bull while they were still in Skyhold, and then on their journey...Leliana. In alarming fashion. She’d not said anything in front of Lady Montilyet, no, she saved the conversation for...well. She caught Tonio alone. When he’d woken in the night...and had need of a chamber pot. Or, well, a bit of shrubbery or tree...thankfully the Spymaster had let him finish buttoning his sleep trousers before she announced her presence, startled the daylights out of him—had she just stood by watching and waiting?—before she asked him his opinion on sex. Or...er, lack thereof, he supposed. “What if you were with someone who was utterly in romance with you but...was chaste. Did not wish to consummate your relationship until you were wed?"

"I would never wish to lie with someone before they wished to—if they want the security of marriage before the vulnerability of the marriage bed? I’d certainly have no complaints. I’ve never laid with someone outside the bounds of matrimony."

"Good. I suppose I’ll see you alive and well come morning then." He...was pretty sure she smiled at him.

Falsely dating the Lady Montilyet seemed rather a perilous role. Something told him if the woman were truly in courtship, did wish to be wed Leliana would be putting her loved one under such scrutiny she may well arrange their death the eve of their wedding. Which...well, he supposed was her due, she would not do so without good reason, to spare her friend, and the danger was well worth it, if someone worthy enough came along, they would be glad to endure it. He was—not to say he was worthy, hardly, just...Josephine was a woman well worth such efforts.

"Oh!" Lady Montilyet said as they toured the museum, already thinking ahead it seemed, she wished to inform him, "There is a show, tomorrow evening, that I have reserved us tickets for to be picked up upon our arrival to the theatre—I was concerned Eleanor and Cremisius might not enjoy outright Orlesian opera, it is not for everyone and there are a select few that bore even myself to tears. I do hope you are a fan of satirical comedy? I thought it best not to take them to something terribly dramatic or dark but neither did I wish to er...go with something too childish that might make them feel patronized. This play in particular has smart comedic enjoyment with a bit of edge given it has technically been banned for the last decade and only recently has its production been reapproved."

"A formerly banned work of art? How scandalous," Tonio chuckled, "I’m certain your selection is sound, we’ll have a marvelous time. How much are our tickets?"

"Two silver each—it is best enjoyed in a private box and too, more secure. I will be couriering our payment along later this afternoon so those two do not get any ideas about paying for the whole of our group, let alone themselves."

"Oh certainly, perish the thought," Tonio said, "the five of us? Or is Marehis bringing her esteemed lover?" oh, his teasing earned him a bit of distant giggling from the Elf woman who overheard him, throwing him a smile over her shoulder he returned with a nod.

"It will just be the four of us who require tickets—Marehis would prefer a bit of acting herself—she’ll be working security for Eleanor as a theatre attendant," Lady Montilyet shared quietly. Ahh. Well, that would be a bit less tight then—eight silver wasn’t as dear as ten after all. Josephine had done so much for them in her careful planning, he wished to repay her. Too, it would be something of a ‘date’, would it not? In fact,

"Have you plans for dinner tomorrow evening?"

"Cremisius has already asked Eleanor on a bit of a date and we will meet them at the theatre. I’m certain we’ll have dinner—either in the Marchands or out before our theatre excursion."

"I was thinking ‘out’," Tonio offered, "if you would join me—it would be my treat, as thanks for this wonderful trip you’ve done so much to plan."

The woman blanched at that, looked almost shamed-faced as she turned her attention to the flooring ahead of them, while the ornate rug underfoot was a marvel, it didn’t seem to be why she suddenly couldn’t look him in the eye as she spoke with soft sobriety, “It…I assure you, this has all been poor repayment for the help you and Eleanor and Cremisius have been to me.”

He brought them to a halt as they rounded the corner, facing the woman as he loosed his arm to take her hands in his own, thumbs rubbing gently against the backs of her hands as a light prompt for her to look at him and when she did, “Cara mia, you truly mustn’t be so very hard on yourself.”

“I have caused nothing but trouble for you with Leliana…the last person you wish for trouble with. And this- I’ve personal problems I have gotten Eleanor involved with and it- it has taken a turn I didn’t foresee and I’m- it could bring about repercussions.”

“They’ve taken a turn…you didn’t foresee? Meaning things happened, outside of your control, that you had no knowing influence upon?”

“Well yes,” she said, albeit confused.

“Tesora,” he breathed, “Then it is none of it your fault,” he insisted, “you cannot blame yourself for the actions of others. I do so hate you’re struggling with something so hard, I only wish I could help you. But this has been a wonderful trip for the others involved, myself included. For that, of course I am grateful. Ellie hardly seems to begrudge whatever has happened—you must be more forgiving with yourself.”

“You are being far too kind to me.”

“Well, someone has to be, if you insist upon doing otherwise, my Lady,” he said, there was a scout…someone he recognized at least, from Leliana’s people currently attired in the uniform the museum required of their attendants. The young woman was blending in well but clearly watching after them or…was she spying? Josephine had warned of as much. Lady Montilyet seemed upset, and he did not wish risking the Spymaster hearing as much and thinking he’d been unkind. Neither did he care for how very worried she still seemed so, he offered the Antivan woman a gentle smile and pressed a kiss to her forehead, the crease in her brow diminishing immediately, the woman was blushing a bit as he pulled away. He hoped he hadn’t made her uncomfortable—they were excellent friends, and it was not an action he wouldn’t do with his own son or Ellie, he’d kissed Cole on the forehead whenever he saw the Spirit before bed…he assumed the Spirit did something like sleep? To wish him sweet dreams. He certainly wished Lady Montilyet sweeter thoughts.

The woman cleared her throat, smiling as she looked up at him, “So…you wish to dine with me tomorrow evening, Mister Aclassi?”

“I do, I insist cara mia.”

She gave it a moment of consideration, blushing as she nodded, “I would be delighted.”

“Excellent.”

“What is…tesora, if I might ask?” the woman wondered as they walked to catch up with their group.

Huh? Ahh, “It is…a bit of a colloquialism the Tevene equivalent of ‘sweetheart’, it translates directly as ‘treasure’.”

“And cara mia is ‘my dear’?” He nodded. "What is it you call Eleanor? Pica—in Antivan that means ‘little’.”
“Tevene and Antivan do have similarities I suppose—picca amore means ‘little love’, ‘a’ denotes the feminine. Bella is beautiful while bello is ‘handsome’.”

“Ahh! That is—there is yet another similarity, ‘o’ and ‘a’ denoting gender. Mija or mijo is the informal way of saying ‘mi hija, mi hijo’ it means daughter or son in the masculine but can be used to refer to any young person you’re close to. Cremisius, you call him ‘bello’…mimo? Dorian said that means mime? The boy does have quite the sense of humor.”

Oh. “I suppose it is a bit of a homograph—mimo in the context of speaking of a child not in the miming profession, is slang, a shortening of ‘bambino’ which…well, I suppose he’s a bit old for me to be calling him such, but it means ‘baby’. It cannot be helped I suppose,” he smiled as he spoke a bit more loudly, to be heard by the young man as he and his girlfriend were currently just across the hall now, at the opposite wall, “he’ll always be my bello mimo!”

“Oh! Keep it down,” Cremisius reprimanded.

“Yeah, you’ll wake the art!” Ellie insisted, leaning toward them in Cremisius’s hold, the boy chuckling as he stepped with her to stand behind her, keeping his arm around her waist as the girl stage whispered, “And that piece I’m pretty sure is about corruption in the Chantry is already woke!”

“…did she mean awake?” Lady Josephine asked him quietly.

“…no…I don’t think she did. I believe it is something to do with being awake to the reality social and political injustice?”

“Ahh,” Josephine said, nodding. “…are we woke?”

“I would like to think so?”

Ellie was particularly excited about their trip, but she was ecstatic to get back—she was expecting a letter from Sera and she wanted to write her mami and papi about their time while it was fresh in her mind and Vivienne had apparently promised the young lady she would teach her Crema Catalana before Eleanor could be ‘corrupted by the Orlesian bastardization*’ and the girl was thrilled that the Enchanter wished to cook with her, prepare dessert together for all of them to share.

“We’ll need to be mindful ladies,” Madam de Fer cautioned, “We’d hardly any workout in the way of fights at all on the journey here, all this leisure and eating, if we are not careful we will put on…vacation weight,” she said, as if it were a ghastly thing, juxtaposed by Ellie’s reaction to the prospect, “Vacation makes you gain weight?!” Ellie asked, sounding excited. He supposed as much was true—lounging around, eating all the locale had to offer.

Cremisius grinned, pulling the girl into his side, “Uh-huh, nothing to be ‘mindful’ about in my book,” he said, hand slipping lower on her back and Tonio couldn’t quite see out of his peripheral vision but the girl squeaked before giggling, murmuring a very soft, teasing reprimand of “Papito!” as her arm around his back squeezing a bit tighter as she snuggled into his hold.

“This is a body positive inquisition!” Ellie declared it. “Only size that matters is the size of your heart!”

“Hear hear,” Tonio seconded her decree.
“Shall I write up an official mandate, mija?” Josephine wondered laughingly.

“Yes p-lease!”

Maker, it was such a wonderful day, Tonio was admittedly prepared for a nap before dinner, they’d been on the move all day...he wasn’t certain just how they all handled constant fighting and travel and adventure when a day of mere shopping and a museum was perfectly exhausting all on its own. But, Tonio Aclassi had one mission more. Of the most covert sort.

Lady Montilyet had arranged for a courier to take get their payment for the tickets she reserved for them—she’d been so reticent to accept his offer of dinner, he wasn’t certain she’d allow him to pay for the theatre as well, so, subterfuge. He would intercept.

It did not start off quite as he’d planned. First, there was a scout that approached...rather tentatively, even as Tonio offered the young lady an encouraging smile, he wasn’t about to bark orders at her or anything of the sort. She was Leliana’s—the woman who was watching he and Josephine while they were at the museum. She was just in time to answer the door when a knock sounded, and she invited in a gentleman dressed in appropriate attire for a footservant, mask over his eyes and nose as expected of most Orlesians, she startled when Tonio addressed him, but when Tonio made to offer his coin and told him he could be on his way to the theatre.

“Ahh, I apologize monsieur, but I require Lady Montilyet’s signature, she’s to give me payment herself. Security protocol, you understand.”

“Sir,” the Scout said before taking her leave and heading along the corridor toward the space Leliana had claimed as a ‘control center’ during their stay in Val Royeaux.

The man had just turned the corner down the hall when there was another knock on the door Tonio answered to a young man, eyes masked, a white linen satchel hanging across his torso that appeared to be heavy, the boy seemed to need to catch his breath.

“Can I help you ser?” Tonio asked.

“Are you with the Inquisition?”

“Tonio Aclassi, how may I assist?”

Relief washed over his face as he smiled pleasantly, “Oh excellent—you wouldn’t believe how turned around I got getting here. Thank the Maker, your name’s on my list! One of the ticket reservations is yours right?...oh wait no, Cremisius...oh! Tonio as well,” he realized as he read over his clipboard before looking to Tonio and introducing himself, or well, his business, “Val Royeaux Messaging, here to collect from Lady Montilyet to the Odeon Theatre?”

“Oh,” he held out the clipboard for Tonio to look at oh- extending a quill for him to sign, “Someone else just arrived from your company—they needed a signature from Lady Montilyet?” he wondered as he signed and handed over the coins he’d been holding in his hand for this…transaction...

“We deliver a great many things monsieur,” he supposed with a shrug. “I only know my own route.”

Was Lady Montilyet expecting something else today? Tonio had asked if he was a courier, the man that came before...

“Have a blessed day!” the courier wished him.
“You as well.”

…something…something did not feel right.

He was already heading for the room Lady Montilyet had claimed as an office, when- oh Maker- a quite literally blood curdling scream pierced the air and Tonio had not gone running so fast in his life.

…he wasn’t certain just what he expected to do, he’d- he’d hardly any experience in fighting, it made him wish- he always wished he’d done more to stand up to his own father, perhaps he’d know more about throwing punches than taking them.

But he was not the only Aclassi in the building—in the room, even, when Tonio threw open the door. Just seconds before he reached the office he heard Josephine scream out in utter fright and panic,

“Cremisius!”

He’d thought it a call for his son. And it was. In a way.

The man he’d stood idle by as he waltz right into their quarters, was…rather dead it seemed, unmoving, lying on the ground, his neck at quite an unnatural angle—it was a wholly horrific sight.

But what was more horrifying for Lady Montilyet was the slash across Cremisus’s arm and chest and- oh Maker he was only in his tunic, not his armor oh-

It seemed they’d had the same concern—Josephine was at Cremisius's side, a hand on his uninjured arm and the other on his chest, trying to lay eyes on what devastating injury might lay there.

“Cremisius you-” her breath caught in her throat and she blinked a few times as if amazed, her hand reaching out to touch the leather she found beneath his tunic. “You…”

“Uhh…it’s leather, yeah. Pretty thick. Keeps my chest in check and uh, protected.”

Josephine looked into his son’s face, her eyes glistening with tears before she threw her arms around his neck and hugged him fiercely, hand cradling the back of his head to pull him to her as she cried out “Oh thank the Maker most High you are exactly as he made you!” her shoulders shuddered as she shook, “If you- if you'd been wholly unprotected- oh Cremisius I thought he hurt you, you blessed boy!” she declared him, pressing a kiss to his cheek before she pulled away, “Are you injured at all, mijo?”

“Barely a scratch,” he insisted.

“Your arm! Oh, carino,” she cooed out before crying for, “Oh- Cole! Eleanor!”

“Cole isn’t in—bello, I believe Ellie is in the kitchen,” Tonio spoke, “Stitches is around, I can walk you—“

“Tonio!” Josephine startled, only just realizing the elder Aclassi was there, “You- whatever are you doing here?”

“Something seemed amiss and then I heard you scream, of course I came.”
Which only seemed to upset her further, “You— you could have been injured! Or killed! You or Cremisius or— or anyone!” her expression crumbled before she pressed her hands to her face, chin quivering as she wept, “oh Maker this is such a mess!”

Oh, oh this had to be terrifying and upsetting. He wasn’t certain— the man had clearly meant Lady Montilyet true harm or Cremisius would not have taken such drastic measures— had he done the man in with his bare hands? He’d no sword at his hip— whoever would wish to do this woman harm?!

“Shhh, cara mia,” he sought to soothe, pulling her in for a hug— oh, she was so distraught, crying into his shoulder as she tried to regain her composure.

“Uhh…someone should stay here with Lady Montilyet, I’m good,” Cremisius assured, patting the woman on the back as he passed, “everything’s going to be alright,” he promised before leaving them. They were not alone for long— Tonio could hear the thunder of the Iron Bull running through the halls of the estate, he’d clearly come when he heard the disruption and he was swift but oh Maker, it was blessing Cremisius had been close at hand.

“Shit, is she hurt?” the Iron Bull shot out as soon as he bound into the room, gaze assessing as he took in the scene, wholly concerned as his eye fell on the Ambassador.

“Are you injured at all?” Tonio wondered quietly, her head shook ‘no’ against his shoulder as she sniffled. “She is unharmed.”

“Josephine!” the Spymaster’s voice was somehow fierce and frightened as she stormed the room. “Oh…Maker. Josie you could have been killed. We’ve tried things your way— please let me handle this!”

Josephine looked…incredibly conflicted, pale and wan from stress, “I— Cr—Cremisius could have been killed—I do not want any to die for my sake b—but I— oh I would certainly preserve his life over— oh I never meant for this!”

“Leliana stop it, right now!” Ellie’s voice… well, goodness, she was taking quite the tone with the Spymaster, it almost made him fear for her life, but the woman fell silent and tore her stare from Josephine to look to the…Inquisitor, he supposed, the girl was speaking in her power. “you’re not allowed to come storming in and make demands while she’s down! Give her a little time to process and breathe before she goes making decisions on whether or not to compromise on her convictions. If there’s another way we’re not sure yet, until Cole gets back. We’ve made amazing progress with Josephine’s way— this was serious, I know you’re scared, they got someone through, but it’s been handled— everyone is safe. We’ll lock down the house for the rest of the night— no one in or out— and regroup in the morning. Hopefully we’ll have more to go on and we’ll give Josephine the help she needs to decide on how to move forward. Have I made myself clear?”

“Yes, Eleanor,” Leliana said, addressing Josephine more subdued, “I am sorry, Josie.”

“Good,” the girl popped up on her toes to press a kiss to the Spymaster’s cheek as she passed her by, before drawing near and resting her hand on Josephine’s shoulder, but addressing Tonio, “Cremisius told me his side of things and said you just showed up right at the end of it—that you felt something was amiss?”

Oh! “Yes I was there when he entered the house—I was by the front entrance when one of Leliana’s scouts…” he… was reticent to speak against one of the Spymaster’s people, he certainly didn’t want to throw false accusations about but, “One of your people—a woman that was shadowing us at the museum— opened the door for him and told him where Josephine’s office “…Marehis?” Leliana questioned, confused.

“No! Good heavens no—the other woman, a Human? Short, middle-aged. She’d a scar just here,” he gestured to his own cheek.

“She she was here just before Cremisius showed up.” Josephine spoke up, “she said she was switching off with the man you had standing guard outside my office, Leliana.”

Ellie shook her head, “Guapo said he was making rounds to check on you and he only dropped in—came into your office to chat with you a while because he noticed no one was standing guard, he thought maybe there was a gap between people or something.”

“She was just with you, wasn’t she?” Tonio asked the Spymaster, “this scout woman we saw? I thought she was headed to speak with you after letting someone into the house.”

“No,” Leliana said, stone-faced as her fists clenched at her sides, “But I know precisely of who you speak and she will be dealt with.”

Ellie nodded. “Papa, please walk Josie to her room and let her have a minute, okay? We’ll get this all cleaned up—it’s going to be okay Tia.”

Josephine did not look up, Tonio was almost worried she hadn’t heard, but when he rubbed circles on her back to gently get her attention and the woman nodded, replying, “Thank you, mija. Cremisius is alright?”

“Devastated—that was his favorite tunic, but I’m sure Papa can work his magic on it,” Ellie teased, “He’s already healing up and he’s living the dream right now. My dream—him, cooking shirtless. I mean Dorian’s in there too, and I’m bringing him back a clean tunic so soon it’ll just be the cooking part, but I guess a girl can’t have everything.”

“…Sparky’s cooking?” the Iron Bull questioned.

“Never!” Ellie insisted, as if scandalized before assuring, “He’s supervising.”

Josephine moved with him when he made to step away and offer his arm to walk her to her quarters so he opted for wrapping an arm around her shoulders, still trembling just in the slightest, but she finally raised her face, offering up a smile that took…well, it took a great deal of effort to produce, “Thank you, everyone.”

“I’m sorry I had to get yell-y at you,” he heard Ellie saying to Leliana as he began leading Josephine from the room. “I love you, big time. You’re ma Tatie! But you’ve got a rep to protect and me saying that all the time isn’t going to help that. Our only witness comes pre-dead so,” he did not look back over his shoulder but he could hear the soft smack of the girl’s lips peppering kisses to the Spymaster’s cheek. “Je t’aime beaucoup!”

Ahh, the Orlesian woman scoffed softly. “Je t’aime. Awful child.”

He was not entirely certain just where Lady Montilyet had claimed quarters, but she’d stayed her first night in Ellie’s room as a bit of a sleepover and…Cremisius had been present in the room he was bunking in with his father last night, as opposed to keeping guard, so he assumed that meant Ellie had been otherwise occupied with company. His son was a gentleman, he’d not gone into detail but…Tonio was relatively certain the two were…wholly intimate. The morning before they left he’d been just getting ready to go into the corridor before Josephine’s office to run downstairs and get a quick bite of breakfast before heading to his workshop and he’d seen his son. His son, who wasn’t one for heavy drink or staying out until all hours of the morning, so it took Tonio by surprise to find Cremisius in a giddy, seemingly drunken daze, rosy cheeked as he staggered…or perhaps it was swaggered his way through Skyhold’s Great Hall, barefoot, trousers rumpled and his wrinkled tunic entirely unbuttoned, heading in the wrong direction—Tonio had seen him leave the Inquisitor’s quarters, and head for the forge, stop, swing around on the ball of his foot, not even noticing his father standing just before the door he was likewise intending to use until he bumped into Tonio—looked to him with a…he would term it ‘goofy’ grin on his face.

“Papa! Hey, how’s it goin’? Isn’t it a great day? Maker it’s a great day. You hungry? Lovely’s up, I’m getting us breakfast.” His breath hadn’t smelled of booze so. Love-drunk, he supposed.

A pity that in a city as renowned for romance as Val Royeaux, the young couple hadn’t been afforded opportunity to at the very least lie in the same bed, all of their dating activities involving their elders. But…well, apparently there was good reason Ellie was sharing her room with the Ambassador, staying so close with so many supervisors at hand.

Lady Montilyet was apparently, the focus of a league of assassins. Outside the realm of her dearest friend.

There was a small seating area immediately upon turning right as you entered the rather elaborate bedroom—cushioned chairs, a loveseat, surrounding a low table. He led Josephine to sit in a chair though he’d not wanted to be out of reach of the woman while she was so upset so he found purchase on the low table before her, holding her hands in his once they were seated.

“My Lady? What happened?”

“Cremisius came in to ask if I needed anything. He’d only just agreed I could commission pieces from him when that man came in, saying he was a courier, he-” a squeak escaped her throat and he released hold of her hand to offer her- oh. His pocket square was gone, but that was because it was already in the possession of the Lady from this morning, she withdrew it from her dress pocket, crumpling it in hand as she wiped at her eyes, “When I invited him to my desk so I could sign, he came around the desk and Cremisius just…oh I do not know if he saw something amiss but it must have just struck him oddly, he’d risen from his seat and was already moving- in the same instant I realized there was a knife at my ribs, Cremisius’s hands were on him, pulling him back over the desk. He struggled for the knife and when Cremisius lost hold of the man’s arms he was injured, n-nearly worse. But thankfully he-” she took a deep breath, clearing her throat and saying, “was able to defend himself.”

“He is safe,” thank the Maker most High, "and I am proud of him for defending you.”

“He could have been killed. And Eleanor had only just left my office, if she had been- oh if- if anything happened to either of them-“

“Ellie is rather capable of defending herself,” he reminded her. He might like to see someone even consider to bring harm to the Ambassador. “You are telling yourself scary stories. Eleanor wasn’t in your office, and Cremisius is alive and well, and you are safe. Leliana will uncover just why that man was sent here to bring you harm and it will be handled.”

He’d been endeavoring to console the woman not- not send her bursting into tears anew, hiding her face in her hands. Oh, Maker-

Truth poured from her lips then. Every facet of her private personal peril. The Montilyets financial issues, the apparent grudge with the Du Parraquettts that outlived their ancestors and was now afflicting Josephine Montilyet as she endeavored to save her family from financial ruin.

“I…I understand wishing to spare your family in this way, but Josephine—“

Her chin quivered and she ducked her head in repent, rushing to cut him off as she expected, “I understand it must sound materialistic and selfish to you- I’m so ashamed—“

“My lady you’ve nothing to be ashamed of. I was not about to speak in reprimand, but offer what I can of advice.”

She offered what she could of an appreciative smile, sniffling before she said, “I…would gladly hear it.”

“I do not mean this to patronize you but perhaps consider sharing this burden with your parents? You are to be head of your house, but you are not so, yet—if they knew the risk you were putting yourself to, Josephine I can assure you, from my own personal experience, different as our circumstances are…they would not want you to do this to yourself. I can promise you. Cremisius was once the bearer of the burden of our financial futures, and that situation nearly led me to burying my child. My wife and myself we were not quite so quick to accept our son as…well, the swiftness of your acceptance is second only to perhaps Ellie’s immediacy.”

“…his mother she- does she- is that why she does not accept Cremisius?” Josephine rasped out, horrified at the notion. When Tonio nodded she looked nothing short of outraged, “He’s- he is one of the single most incredible people I have ever met and his mother- I can only pray to someday have a child as wonderful as he. I would claim them before the world, there is nothing to find shame in! If he was anything else—a boy by the definition that suits the likes of Liviana he may well be dead—his shirt was torn for the man trying to stab him! I will pay to repair or replace his tunic, it would be such a shame, its so very handsome on him. And too, what he wears beneath his tunics?”

“A binder.” he offered up the phrasing.

Which she nodded as if committing the term to memory. “If his binder has been damaged, please, I wish to replace it.”

“That will all be handled In due time,” Tonio offered gently, taking hold of her hands in an effort to refocus on the more pressing issue. Too, binders were quite a bit more expensive than tunics, Tonio would replace it if there was need. “Once the burden of our financial futures was on Cremisius. We arranged a marriage that would secure our family from slavery, and I have never regretted a decision so much all of my life. When I realized the threat to my son’s happiness was so great I might lose him altogether? Foolish as it was for me to let it get that far, it is why I made the sacrifices required to keep that from happening. Your parents, if they had to choose between your precious life and their current lifestyles? They would chose you, cara mia, a thousand times over.”

Josephine released a shuddering breath at that. “I-I know. But if I cannot prove I can handle such situations…my parents will not have any peace of mind in my future leadership. They have worked so hard the whole of their lives, they deserve to enjoy themselves now. I have promised to manage our affairs and- if it is not myself who fixes this for my family, who will? My own children? It is risk, but it is also necessity, if we are to keep the Montilyet name from shame.”

“My Lady—you’ve kept so much of this entirely to yourself. Tried to handle it all on your own but no one was built to bear so much of their own singular strength. You went to every effort to keep this even from your closest friend, share the pieces only after they are revealed to those around you by force of circumstance. This is— it is entirely unhealthy. You must allow yourself to confide in someone. Even if it is just for the sake of allowing yourself the release of venting— sometimes such things lead to the solution being revealed in the moment, or your confidant seeing things about your situation you’re too close to it all to see yourself.”

“You are correct—if my parents were aware of the situation, they would interfere, forbid me to do what I am doing and that… I refuse to get them involved, they cannot know about this… possibly ever, I would not wish for them to worry for me. I confided in Eleanor first and foremost but only when it was absolutely required and she is just- she is only a child, she has so many responsibilities, I would not add my troubles to her own anymore than I already have. Leliana- she means well but she worries so and her immediate response is to handle things swiftly and violently, she does not… she does not understand my conviction to get through this without needless death.”

“And what about Tonio Alassi?” he wondered. “I certainly wasn’t having children at the age of five so there is absolutely zero possibility I am your parent—you’ve no reason in the world to listen to any advice or concerns I have, if I demanded you do something you don’t wish to do… you’ve no pressure at all to listen to it. While I’m too young to be your father, I am in my thirty-sixth year of life, so I’m no child. Neither do I have a host of assassins at my disposal, nor am I one to offer violent advice. Cole insists I am a good listener.”

“…you are,” Josephine nodded. “But I wouldn’t wish to burden you.”

“Cara mia I would hardly feel any burden knowing it is something shared with you so you might carry it more easily, please,” he implored, “let me be of help to you.”

She breathed something like a sigh of relief, nodding, but she had to confess, “I don’t even know where to begin.”

“Eleanor brought up options? Leliana wished for you to do things ‘her way’, but you’ve a way of your own you’ve been attempting to handle this situation with?”

“Yes. Um. The contract with the house of Repose can either be canceled, or destroyed, and I would be free to arrange for the Montilyets to begin trade in Orlais once more without incident,” she explained. “Leliana insists I allow her to let her people infiltrate the House of Repose and destroy the contract, but I cannot- I will not have further death from this, not on my behalf, from her ranks or theirs. I’ve been endeavoring to arrange the contract’s cancellation—the Du Parraquettes fell from power, so they’ve not the station nor reason to cancel their ancestor’s arrangement. We’ve made all the arrangements we need to sponsor their return to their former station—Eleanor spoke with a noblewoman who has agreed to sponsor them, and a judge has agreed to sign off on it, she need only speak with one person more—who will ratify the decision, and it will be final.”

Tonio smiled his relief, “Well that is splendid—I am scared for you,” that felt like understatement, but he’d little intention of allowing a thing to happen to this woman, and more capable people than he were already set to the task,” but… well, if this can be settled quickly? It sounds like you’ve nearly met your goal,” he encouraged. Too… it seemed a thing of confidence, Cole’s mission, so he wasn’t about to go into specifics, but, “And… Leliana is doing what she can to respect your ideals—you must believe that. She loves you, if she could find a way to do things without violence, she would do it, and she is trying to.”

“She is?” Josephine asked, soft realization dawning in her features, “Truly?”

“Of course—tesora who would not move mountains for you if not Leliana?”
“I have not…we’ve argued so much over this, I’ve given her poor reward for her efforts. I really should apologize, I’ve made this beyond difficult. I just…”

“What is it?” he questioned gently.

Her chin quivered as she gasped out the softest sob, “I…I just- I’ve never…discussed this with Leliana, I fear she would feel I am judging her for her station, and too I am so ashamed. If Eleanor ever knew? Oh Maker. Oh and she dislikes—has hated herself for having to defend herself, lay enemies slain, I'm not certain if it is more horrific she might think badly of me, or that she might think I would judge her for her duties as Inquisitor. My convictions do not derive from basic decency I—” she looked…albeit frightened, steeling herself before meeting his gaze, though Maker there was utter shame in her eyes, “…did I ever mention, I used to be a Bard?” she asked softly.

…there was certainly nothing to be ashamed of, it was rather a lovely profession. “ Truly?” he asked, “You’ve a lovely voice,” he supposed.

That sent the woman blushing, “Oh heavens no, I- I did not sing, I mostly entertained with playing the lute, making charming conversation—telling stories and the like.”

“You hum when you’ve no guests in your office and a great deal of paperwork, I’ve always found it pleasant. What is that…duermete pedazo…de mi corazon?” he spoke the words he’d heard her sweetly sing under her breath, he darn’t sing them, Maker! He was not one for singing. Unless his audience was young Cremisius—he’d been informed babies were always absorbing everything around them but would have precious little specific memories from infancy, so…it was a safe admirer, the man seemed no worse for wear now, for having spent his first few years of life being lulled to sleep by heinously out of tune Tevene lullabies.

“A sweet little song that gets stuck in my head courtesy of Eleanor I- I did not realize I was even sing- that is not the point,” she insisted, shaking her head as if to clear it before she pressed on, “You are sweet Tonio but you must spare me kindness until I’ve gotten to my point, I assure you it is entirely undeserved.”

“I apologize—do please continue,” he implored.

“…point of being a bard, was to spy. Many young nobles put on a mask and practice playing the Game in such a fashion. I was attending University in Val Royeaux when I learned of Bards. There was such an air of romance about them—stories of secrets, trysts, and fascinating people,” she informed him. “A group of us—young gentry from Antiva—decided that this exciting life was for us. During one particular intrigue, I encountered a Bard sent to kill my patron. We fought,” she said. ‘Or perhaps ‘scrapped’, is the better word, both of us terrified. We were at the top of a steep flight of stairs—the other Bard drew a knife and I pushed him away from me,” she looked down, like she could not bring herself to meet his steady gaze any longer and instead stared at their joint hands, her own growing lax like she thought he was about to release them as she said, “You can imagine the result.”

“Josephine,” he breathed, “my word. You were so young and you were only defending yourself—it was he too who was fighting, and he’d drawn weaponry, would have cut you, seen you thrown down the stairs just as easily and somehow…I doubt he would be sitting here this day lamenting the life he took from you.”

“But it was such a waste!” she lamented, “When I took off his mask, I knew him! We’d attended parties together! If I had stopped to reason, if I used my voice instead of scuffling like a common thug—” she took a breath to collect herself. “I’ll always wonder who that young man would have grown into.”

“Well, people can change cara mia, but…that man—he came with the intent to kill where you sought only enjoyment and a bit of excitement. He could have killed you, and certainly your patron—took something meant for fun and escalated it to an entirely different level. What would have happened if you’d spoken up? Would he have stopped fighting you? I hardly think so, he’d violence as intent from the start. You may have convinced him not to harm you, but he would have done what he came to do and you would have born witness to it or interfered and either been killed or had to kill him regardless.”

“Maybe. We will never know,” she said. “That is why I cannot abide my family’s fortune be wrought from bloodshed. I will not participate in the taking of lives, not when it can be helped.”

“I understand,” he assured her, rubbing circles on the back of her hands with his thumbs. “Josephine—have faith. Ellie and Leliana, they are on your side, and they will help you make this right. You will be safe, and no further bloodshed will be required—I have spoken that truth into the world for the Maker to manifest, so I am certain it will be so.”

She smiled at that, huffing a bit of a laugh. “You are certain? Well, that is actually reassuring,” she breathed a weary sigh. “Oh, I- I am frightened, Tonio. That Cremisius h-had to take another’s life for me- oh Maker I am so sorry.”

“My son has never been one for cruelty—he used to clear out infestation of creatures that endeavored to take up residence in our home, in my shop by taking them into his own hand and carrying them away to safe haven. If he could have done the same with an assassin, I assure you he would have—as he could not diffuse the situation? I assure you, we are none of us upset that your life was preserved—that man came here to do harm, that was his choice, you cannot blame yourself.”

“Can I blame myself for my own actions at least?” she wondered, almost snappish. “I’m…I despise the danger I’ve put Eleanor in. I love the time we are getting to spend together but I hate that it only puts her in proximity of the danger befalling me. I’ll not be able to sleep tonight for the fear someone will come for me then and- and Eleanor might be harmed, the Inquisitor fast asleep in the same bed as myself.”

Well… “Perhaps we can serve all plots you’ve afoot this trip,” he suggested. “You’ve still some need of our gambit as um…potentially courting?”

Josephine’s mouth worked momentarily, like she meant to say something but could not. Was…oh, perhaps she feared they would be overheard? He supposed someone might be shadowing them now. He scooted a bit closer, knees softly knocking against her own as he smiled encouragement, lowering his voice further to speak in a hushed whisper, ”You could join me in the quarters I share with Cremisius—Leliana will not find such a thing suspicious, and you could inform Ellie you’ll be sleeping elsewhere and I’m er…certain the young man will join her, so we would be alone. We can have guards posted and I sleep rather lightly.”

She still seemed a bit at a loss for words but finally worked out, “That is extremely generous of you, but I’d hardly like putting you to harm.”

“I am volunteering, it is a decision I have made knowing full well the danger, and accepting it—anything that happens is my choice. I do not have fear—I’m hardly their target, nor am I something as tempting as the Inquisitor, they’ve no reason to kill me.”

“…true. But um…well, Leliana erm…she actually would find it suspicious if I joined you in your quarters. I…” she blushed fiercely, “She knows well my conviction to remain abstinent until marriage. I would not be love making and sleeping alongside a man I was unwed to.”

Tonio grinned, expression warm as he was pleased to inform her, “Well, that is excellent then—there are two separate beds, cara mia, on walls opposite one another. Leliana’s guards will certainly see as much, so…”

“Oh!” she gasped, “that- well…yes. I suppose…I would not object to something of the sort. I might…I do not like the potential danger but it does…soothe me, make me feel safer that you would be in the same room.”

“I’ll certainly sleep better knowing you’re safe in bed…across the room from me,” he assured.

“I do think that will work splendidly*.”

She’d never had much opportunity for cooking—not in her schooling, or adult life—but in her youth? Some of Josephine Cherette Montilyet’s most cherished memories was standing on a stool alongside her abuelita—her namesake—at the kitchen counter making Conchas. Abuelita Cherette had…oh she had been such a beautiful, kind woman, a wealth of wisdom. She’d taught Josephine so much about compassion, responsibility, instilled so much excellent advice about love and business and life and…

Now, when Josephine needed it most? She could not for the life of her recall a thing her sweet abuelita had taught her. she lived a great many of Cherette’s lessons in her daily life but…oh Maker, what would she say, if she knew the troubles Josephine found herself facing now. She…well…

If there was anyone in Josephine’s family capable of calmly and collectively accepting that her mija was the subject of an assassin’s contract, it would have been Cherette—she likely would have laughed, kissed Josephine on the cheek, accuse her of being her danosa chiquita, and immediately having some wonderful insight to share that would give Josephine absolute peace about her situation. But more so…

Oh! She just- she didn’t know what to do! Tonio Aclassi was the single most- he was kind! And oh, he could make Josephine laugh—he’d such a gentle sense of humor, the barest bit of bite to it that spoke to cleverness over cruelty. He was sweet, and kind-hearted in his every action. If…if they were truly…in courtship? Nothing would please her more. But they were not. They were merely pretending.

And yet…Josephine had neglected to inform him that was no longer necessary. Not really. She’d only requested as much when it placated Leliana’s curiosity at Josephine’s reticence to have her join them in Val Royeaux, a cover to keep her friend from discovering her financial troubles. Now that Leliana was well versed in the Montilyet’s downfalls, their spiral into debt and their only hope for recovery was now blockaded by an assassin’s blade.

Oh it was so wrong of her! She should have told him the very instant Leliana found out their true reasons for visiting Val Royeaux! And she certainly should have done so the moment the topic came up organically, she meant to but then he- he drew so close and he was so kind and something short-circuited in her mind when he started talking about spending the night together and only redoubled when he respected her convictions and somehow that sent her momentarily considering throwing them away which was entirely nonsense! And- Cole had- he’d said such confusing things! Confusing and…true—every word of what he said Josephine felt, was accurate. Except for the…the ‘real’ part.

But then she didn’t tell Tonio. And they went about their trip and…nothing changed. She realized not a single thing had changed since the moment before Josephine made such a ridiculous request of him to falsify a relationship with her. They still spoke as they normally did, walked together without discomfort, enjoyed one another’s company without…any change whatsoever. Except…it felt different. Before…Josephine had always felt a bit nervous, being so close to the man, scrutinizing her every word and action because she feared coming off as engaging in impropriety. Now…as much as she had making her nervous, her time with Tonio was effortless. She no longer feared her behavior coming off as if she might be interested in the man more than just her coworker and friend, because she was supposed to be behaving as such. Which brought her to the realization that she only feared looking like she might feel something more…because she did feel something more.

And she hadn’t the slightest clue what to do! How exactly- should she say something? Confess her feelings to the man? What if that was wholly inappropriate? The man had only- he’d—

...he’d been with the Inquisition scarcely more than a month! Nearly two…but not quite! Before which he was enslaved! Enduring trauma! He’d been married for more than a decade before his time in House Tilani and surely there had to be some baggage there, some reticence to desire courtship. He had his business and reunion with his son to occupy his time! He needn’t- he needn’t concern himself with—

With…behaving as normal. Conducting business as usual, socializing and taking meals and escorting Josephine about Skyhold as…as usual. So…perhaps…

Oh this was all so confusing! Even more when- when their ruse led to them sharing quarters. It had been…it had been so pleasant! He escorted her to his room, informed her he’d claimed the bed on the left wall and she was free to take the one on the right, and she was to tell him if she needed anything at all in the night. Then he pressed a kiss to her forehead as he wished her sweet dreams…and then gave her the room. Allowed her to change into her sleep clothes wholly in privacy, and she was not certain just what to do but he had wished her good night so, she went to the bed that formerly belonged to Cremisius, pulled back the covers, and settled in. She left the lamps lit, and she’d admittedly some reading. Nothing for work—a book Cassandra had recommended. She’d…a taste in books that the titles alone could make Josephine blush, but this was a novel she’d even recommended to Eleanor, so, thus far it was rather tame, a short fictional work about a young girl coming of age and discovering a hidden world laying locked within the family’s grandfather clock. While very whimsical, perhaps that was what made it so very pleasant to read. She’d only turned the page when there was a soft knock on the door and Tonio’s voice sounded and she called that he could come in. There was the briefest moment she was nervous she’d gone about this wrong—should have stepped out and offered him the room, surely the man would need to change? But he had already, it seemed. He’d just done so elsewhere, walked the halls in his sleep clothes and carried his neatly folded clothing to the wardrobe where he hung it in swift precise motions before turning to address her,

“You’re comfortable I hope?”

“Yes, thank you.”
“Excellent—sleep well cara mia, I’m only just there—if you’ve need of anything, you are to wake me,” he smiled when she nodded her agreement. And then she realized he’d carried something in with him.

Tea. He’d brought a warm teacup of what smelled like lavender and chamomile and perhaps cinnamon?

And he only drew nearer to her side of the room to set his offering upon the nightstand next to her bed before going to his own.

His…own. Which…had Cremisius’s trunk before it—the Charger’s seal emblazon on the faceplate while the trunk at the foot of the bed Josephine occupied, bore the Inquisition’s seal. Tonio’s trunk, it dawned on her. He’d told her to sleep in this bed, had he not—

This bed, which was the farthest one from the door. So if there was an intruder in the night, she would be further from reach and- and perhaps Tonio might wake, be able to do something to defend-

“I’m turning out the lamp by my bedside now, my Lady,” he said, assuring, ”but please do not take that to mean you must do so with yours—enjoy your reading as long as you please. Sleep well.”

“You as well,” Josephine found her voice, had to clear it, “Thank you, Tonio, for everything.”

“Think nothing of it.”

She…admittedly stared into the book she brought unreading, and thought everything about it. For how long, she did not know. It wasn’t until she heard a distant clocktower ringing in the top of the next hour and it startled her slightly, made her realize she’d been sitting there with her lamp on when, well, he’d insisted it was fine but it was still rude to make so much light when there was another seeking sleep. And she should likewise—it was well beyond time to go to sleep!

Which was admittedly a bit easier, not only was the albeit cooled tea calming all the same once she got around to sipping at it, there was something about knowing the man was just a few feet away that made her feel more secure in closing her eyes and going to sleep. She did so far more easily, not only was the albeit cooled tea calming all the same once she got around to sipping at it, there was something about knowing the man was just a few feet away that made her feel more secure in closing her eyes and going to sleep. She did so far more easily than she had when trying and failing while in Eleanor’s quarters, where she admittedly lay awake and utterly terrified that the moment she closed her eyes her own problems would bear an assassin taking Eleanor’s life in her stead.

And ultimately…a nightmare that such a thing might happen startled Josephine awake just as the barest bit of greying light peeked in through the curtains in their quarters.

“Josephine?” Tonio’s voice asked, husked with sleep as he sat up in bed. “Are you alright?”

“I’m well,” she insisted, smiling as she said, “please, rest some more, we’ve quite the day ahead.”

He nodded, oh, he looked almost endearingly sweet, sleepy as he was, and he settled back against his pillows, eyes drifting closed. Which secured the privacy she needed to gather her things and well, she wasn’t about to go through the estate in her nightgown, ‘boring’ as Leliana insisted it was, so she opened the wardrobe a bit—the door would shield her if she accidentally woke Tonio. Though she wondered why she was so very concerned—he was hardly a scoundrel and too he’d agreed to tailor a few pieces for her. He would be taking her measurements for that. Still—the door stayed propped open until she was dressed, and then she carefully straightened up her bedding, and took the empty teacup on her nightstand and quietly left the room, nodding to the Elf woman she recognized from the Iron Bull’s team er…Skinner? Yes, Skinner.

“Where are you going?” the woman questioned, squinting a bit as if scrutinizing Josephine like she must be up to absolutely no good.

“I’m…merely waking for the day. I thought perhaps I would go to the kitchens?”

“Perhaps, or you are?” the woman bitingly requested clarification.

“I…I am,” Josephine supposed.

“Then I will escort you. And I will kill any who cross you.”

“…thank you, Miss Skinner, for keeping guard.”

“I am pleased to kill shem’s. To defend the Small One’s aunt is an honor.”

Hopefully there would be no need for that. But she was decently certain the woman would be truly upset to hear as much so she merely smiled politely and headed to the kitchens.

Where she stood now. Seeking her abuelita’s guidance. By making a mess of the place under Skinner’s…mildly alarmed stare…as Josephine opened every cabinet in search of the ingredients she would need, and then proceeded to make up dough, for Conchas.

“Tia?”

Oh, “Eleanor!” Josephine greeted the girl standing in the kitchen’s doorway, hair wrapped in a silky blue scarf, clad in one of Cremisius’s sleep shirts and her own sleep bottoms, feet bare, rubbing sleep from her eyes while she leaned into Skinner in greeting, the Elf woman’s face still held it’s stony expression but she let out something like a…pleased, happy hum. “Good morning mija,” Josephine said, “what…what are you doing up this early?”

“Is that dough?” the girl questioned sleepily. “M’ pretty sure my body sensed the preparation of carbs happening in a kitchen I have access to.”

“It is. I thought I would make Conchas for everyone, a nice treat for breakfast.”

“Que? Conches?” she questioned, confused, “Like…the shells? I didn’t know you could eat them.”

…you could not—not proper seashells, but, “The pastry? They are Antivan—small, sweet pastry that are made to look like seashells.”

“Ohhh that sounds pretty,” she said.

“They are,” Josephine assured, “And delicious. Would…would you care to help me?”

“Asi?!” Eleanor asked excitedly, enthusiasm infectious, it had Josephine giggling as she assured,

“Certainly, if you’re up for it—you’re rested? Your ears healed up without incident?” Josephine checked as the girl drew nearer and tilted her head to offer her right ear for Josephine’s inspection. Oh! Her sweet earrings were so precious on her! Just adorable—she’d sat alongside Eleanor last night while Leliana took up the task of piercing the girl’s ears cleanly and without incident, oh, it hurt her heart a bit that there was a bit of pain in the process but the girl bore it well, and Marehis dipped both earring darts into Elf Root tonic before handing one off to Josephine and allowing her the opportunity to help put in Eleanor’s first set of earrings. They should have healed immediately but still there was a level…Josephine irrationally feared that anything wrought from her decision making during this trip was bound to end in utter, wholly unforeseen, improbable levels of disaster. Thankfully the girl nodded, smiling as she said,

“Oh yeah, they aren’t sore at all or anything!” she was pleased to inform her, “And they’re just the prettiest! I really really love them! Madam de Fer says I’ve opened up a whole new world of accessorizing and she’s very excited…and proud, I think?”

“I’m pleased you like them so well, it was a pleasure to arrange for you mija. My own ears were pierced when I was dedicated to Andrasten church in my youth, as is traditional in Antiva.”

“Oh that’s sweet! Gosh I’m learning so much cool stuff this trip! I’m excited to help you with the…Conchas?” she tested the word pronounced appropriately.

“Yes, please, let’s get to work then shall we? Wash up and I will show you what to do.”

The girl did as she was told, washing her hands before joining Josephine at the counter and it was…oh it felt special being able to impart this knowledge on someone so dear to her, and Eleanor was so eager to learn. It hurt her heart, what precious little of her Antivan heritage the girl knew, though that was certainly no fault of her own. She…the girl had never spoken of it plainly with the Ambassador, but that did not seem to be because of a lack of trust, but a desire to spare the woman’s feelings, but she knew enough to know the girl had been violently ousted from her home in Antiva, had not found peace in returning once she moved on to the Free Marches. She’d an excellent grasp of the language, and she grew more and more comfortable with Josephine sharing things with her—the first time she asked the girl if she was Antivan, or perhaps descended from as much, after she’d giggled over Josephine oathing in Antivan after slamming her thumb in a ledger she’d been consulting and setting aside as Eleanor came to speak with her, she’d been cagey about answering, said she was from the Free Marches.

“Ahh, that is a shame. Oh! Not a shame you are a Marcher, Lady Herald. It is just…well, I was admittedly excited that you might know Antivan.”

The girl had stared at her for a moment, eyes shining with some unspoken concern as she worried at her lip before shrugging, “Yo se Antivan. Prefieres eso?” I do know Antivan. Would you prefer it?

“Oh! Um…si. If you’re certain you can keep up—do stop me if I say something you’re unfamiliar with.”

Looking back, that had one of the least…halted conversation she’d had with the girl in her earlier time with the Inquisition. She’d often needed to ask what something meant or it took her a moment to figure out an unfamiliar word with context—she’d not nearly the vocabulary then that she’d now developed under Dorian’s tutelage. But in what was apparently her first language? She was perfectly capable, and she grew more comfortable speaking in it around Josephine, some days it was what they conducted the entirety of her etiquette lessons in. Which was inadvertently a bit of culture she could offer the girl—if she’d been given a proper Antivan upbringing, young ladies and gentlemen were given such lessons, and it was often the transitional period that assisted their learning Trade, lessons began conducted entirely in Antivan, before eventually children were taught how to introduce themselves, pleasantries in Trade.

Conchas…were a bit more fun than etiquette lessons. Oh, it was such a joy—messy but that was what aprons and wash basins were for. They washed up a bit after preparing the dough and sat chatting while they allowed it to rise—Eleanor offering to use a bit of heating magic to prompt it to do so faster.

“It shouldn’t hurt it, it just helps speed up the carbon-whatever reaction that results in the dough rising. Sera would know how to explain better than me,” Eleanor admitted.

“There is no harm in trying,” Josephine supposed, it was not unlike leaving dough to rise in a warmed pan. “It would be nice if we could extradite the process.”

Eleanor nodded, smiling as she pulled heat into her hands, splaying them on either side of the covered pan. Though, “Sometimes,” she said, as if in thought, “faster doesn’t always mean better…” she looked up to Josephine then, “I’m really proud of you, you know?”

…”Th-thank you, mija but…whatever for?”

“How well you’ve handled everything. I mean this has been a pretty scary situation for you but…you’ve stuck by what you believe, even at the risk of your own life. And I mean…you could have just let Leliana fix this for you but you’ve chosen a route that fixes things for yourself and…helps someone else too.”

“I have?” she wondered…truly confused. All she saw was inconvenience and danger upon those she held most dear—none of this helped them in the slightest, all it did was cause worry and strife and put—put their most cherished lives in danger!

…so it had not occurred to her in the slightest, “The Du Paraquettes?” Eleanor prompted, pointing out, “I mean…the thing you’re trying to save your family from, their family has already faced.” Oh. Oh dear—Josephine hadn’t considered that. “But this is their second change to rebuild!” the girl cheerily observed, “So I’m really proud of you for sticking it out, even though it’s been so tough, and finding a solution that helps others instead of hurting them—I know the plan would be to only hurt any assassins that got in the way but our people could’ve gotten hurt too. And I mean I’m not mad we’re sparing the people who work for the House of Repose—Leliana’s kind of an assassin and I love her a bunch, she’s still a good person. And the man that came to chat us up about this whole thing to begin with, he didn’t seem like he goes around in his free time kicking puppies,” she shook her head like she was reprimanding herself, getting back on topic, “My point is—you’re a total badass for sticking up for what you believe to be right and finding a solution to your problems that lifts people up instead of tearing them down. I’m really proud of you and I’m glad you’re my tia!”

She did not necessarily feel like a…um…’total badass’, she almost thought she might cry but she managed to clear her throat and suppress the impulse, “Gracias, mija.” Though she found herself feeling a bit guilty. Eleanor did not know just how often she’d lied on this trip, and she felt admittedly terrible how much subterfuge she’d had the girl herself arrange. She’d handled everything rather well, all told, been swift to assist Josephine, shown wisdom of her own in her decisions regarding this situation. She’d handled their conversation with an assassin of all things with all the confidence she’d had in any of her diplomatic affairs, when an assassin threatened Josephine's life, laid injury upon Cremisius the girl had tended his wounds and come to handle the aftermath, made certain Josephine was well, stood her ground against Leliana who spoke not one more word of pressure toward her since. Josephine had yet to set foot in that room but Leliana did seek to speak with her again last night, only to assure her another assassin would not slip through and Eleanor arranged the body's removal and the girl herself had cleaned and tidied her office to rights.

...Eleanor...had exercised wisdom and care, as she often did. Josephine had started this process seeking her abuelita’s wisdom. Perhaps her Mija had some to share.

“Eleanor…how…” she shook her head, she wished to do this carefully so she started over with a vital clarification, “I do not want you to think I am speaking against your relationship—that is entirely what I am nor doing—but how exactly…did you decide to allow Cremisius to pursue you? Him…being someone you work with—you subordinate even.”

“Huh…well…” she seemed to give it a bit of thought, “I did worry about that, really. I would never ever want someone to feel pressured to be anything to me—friend, more-than-friends, familia,” Josephine huffed a laugh as the girl gently pumped her hip with her own with what seemed to be an affectionate move. “So, I’ve always let people take the lead—I didn’t call you tia until you started calling me ‘mija’. Mamis and papys happened after they said they made it clear they love me that way. The same goes for Sera even! I wouldn’t have ever pursued Cremius unless he expressed clearly that was something he wanted from me, which meant—he had to make the first move. Why do you ask?” and then, mischievous smile on her face, “Tia? Do you have a crush on someone?”

“No!” …she was a grown woman. She did not have a crush! “I was merely curious, I…if I were interested in someone, I would not wish to risk impropriety or to pressure them in that way.”

“Well…is it someone you work with? You…I mean I know you’re kind of ranked in the Inquisition but you’re not like, directly over anyone—you’re our Ambassador, you work with outside people on outside things. You might help with finalizing contracts and things but you don’t really…no offense but you’re not really the boss of them? I mean I listen to your advice and input but if I thought you had a conflict of some sort, I’d take everything with a grain of salt, maybe consult Varric or someone. So you don’t really hold any kind of position of power over anyone in Skyhold,” she shrugged, “so, it’s up to you, you know? I trust you tia, you’d never hurt someone—use your best judgement, it’s pretty great! You’re a genius when it comes to the Inquisition’s relationships with outside forces, so, I’m pretty sure you’ll be the best at personal relationship decision making. Test the waters and see what happens—worst case scenario, you’re like, super good at apologizing I mean you apply food to the solution and everything—I wish you would cross me!” the girl insisted. “Imagine the chocolates!”

Josephine could not help but to grin, “You believe I would apologize to you with chocolates?”

“Proper Antivan chocolate would literally be the only way to pave the smooth road back to my heart!…or just saying sorry and meaning it and giving me a hug! Dealer’s choice!” she supposed, though in seriousness, “Tia—if you feel comfortable, I think you should be honest with whoever it is you’re interested in, and if they aren’t interested? They’re a big dummy! And I know you’ll respect that, just make sure they know that too! Kay?”

“…kay,” Josephine returned her precious sentiment.

The dough rose up nicely, and Josephine instructed her to allow it to cool. In the meantime, they whipped up streusel that they might not have gotten to use if the Ambassador hadn’t found it in herself to chastise the girl to keep her from eating it at the same rate they were preparing it. And once the dough was broken up, there was something relaxing about rolling it between one’s hands making it take shape—Eleanor watching intently before copying Josephine’s movements to make perfect rounds of dough they spread along their pan before topping them with flattened rounds of streusel they carefully drug the non-serrated edge of a butter knife through to score it so it looked like the lines along cockle shells. that was meant to be baked and Eleanor thought the fruits of their labor were so cute! And she declared them yummy—Josephine heartedly agreed, they turned out splendidly! She had admittedly worried the experience would turn out like her first unassisted endeavor into making Conchas…she’d attempted as much one day in university and it had resulted in what came out more like bread. Hard, tooth-chipping bread. Thankfully it had not been a tooth of Josephine’s…unfortunately it was the tooth of a boy she had been admittedly trying to impress.

“These are the best! Don’t tell Vivienne—it was fun making dessert with her, but these take a lot more fun work!” more playing with messy ingredients was involved certainly. “And you can dip them in coffee! I’m not even supposed to have coffee with dinner!”

“That didn’t stop you from having coffee at dinner, lovely. Wondered where you went, now what’s this?” Cremisius wondered as he joined them, leaning in the doorway, yawning and shaking himself a bit—he was dressed for the day, armed and armored, but he looked like he was still waking up, and apparently it wasn’t his hunger that brought him to the kitchens but his search of the girl he’d expected to find sleeping alongside him, “Should’ve figured I’d find you with your other lover.” Other lover?

Eleanor smiled to Josephine as she informed her of the romantic sentiment that, “My heart belongs to Cremisius—my body belongs to pastry.”

“Mmm, that sounds like a wonderful arrangement da’vehn,” Marehis hummed as she joined them, arms stretching overhead as she crossed the kitchen before she wrapped them around the girl, “Good morning sweet girl—what’ve you gotten into?”

“Tia taught me Conchas! So, so far, we’re basically just having the best day! I’m calling it now—nothing but great things today! Yummy breakfast! And I have a date with Cremisius tonight! You’re coming to the theatre with us, right mami? In disguise, but like, you’ll get to watch and stuff?”

“I’ll be more so paying attention to ‘and stuff’ but yes da’len—I’ll have a pleasant time.”

“Offer still stands if you wanna double date,” Cremisius assured the Elf woman.

“I don’t know that my tagging along on your date with Ellie is a double date.”

“Yeah it is—I’d be pulling double duty—Maker gave me two arms for a reason Mare’, escort a lovely lady on each, pull out your chairs, fight off other people’s unwanted advances. I even got two cheeks on my face for a goodnight kiss, you know, if I’m lucky and you ladies have a nice time,” he winked.

Marehis waved him over and when he came to her she revealed he’d already earned such a kiss to the cheek, “I do appreciate the offer, sweet man, but no thank you. Please, enjoy yourselves tonight.”

“What about you Ambassador?” Cremisius checked with Josephine, “You and papa are going with us right? You’re welcome to join us for dinner too.”

“We’ve plans of our own this evening, mijo,” she said, “but thank you.”

“You and papa Aclassi are having dinner together?” Ellie asked, wide-eyed, backing up from the counter a bit as her hand reached ever so slightly in Cremisius’s direction.

“Yes. He invited me—an all too generous ‘thank you’ for my hand in planning our outings on this trip.”

Eleanor made an almost alarming, near-squealing sound she caught in her throat and quieted almost immediately, Cremisius taking her hand and letting her squeeze seemed to help somehow, before the girl smiled wide and said, “Oh gosh, that’s so sweet of him! I hope you two have a wonderful time!” she said, leaning into her boyfriend, her head resting against his bicep. Oh-

“How are you, Cremisius?” Josephine asked, “Your injuries are healed?”

He gave her a confused look before realization dawned in his face and he gave his arm, Eleanor’s along with it, a few test swings as he grinned reassurance, “Oh yeah, almost forgot about that, honestly. Good as new—seriously, don’t sweat it, I’m just glad you’re alright,” he said, leveling her a warm smile. Oh, this sweet, handsome boy.

“Likewise,” she assured him. She had been petrified! She thought that man might have dealt something deadly against this boy! Praise the Maker he’d been wearing something protective, that shielded his sweet heart from harm. She was admittedly relieved to see him in armor today.

She certainly was not the only person relieved to lay eyes on this boy today, “Bello!” Tonio greeted with warm enthusiasm as he joined them, “And my Ellie—I followed the scent of something sweet and found my favorite children!” he rejoiced as he came to the counter and wrapped his arms around their shoulders.

“Tia and me made Conchas for everyone,” Ellie informed him.

“How wonderful—that was very kind of you—they smell delicious!” he complimented, “Oh and they look just beautiful, it is almost a shame to eat them. You’ve been cooking all this time?” he wondered, “You must sit, please,” he gestured to the kitchen table, Skinner…had been standing just behind it but she’d apparently slipped out, Marehis was here and apparently the woman had been pulling double duty of her own, ensuring Josephine’s safety as well as Eleanor’s. “I’ll pour the coffee—would you prefer tea, cara mia?” he checked with Josephine, “I can get some brewing shortly.”

“Coffee would be wonderful,” she assured, smiling her thanks.

“Then coffee you shall have—get comfortable,” he insisted as she and Marehis, Eleanor and Cremisius took seats around the table, oh—Cremisius let Marehis take whatever seat she wished first and then he pulled out chairs for Josephine and Eleanor before seating himself opposite the Elf woman who sat where she could keep an eye on the door—his back to the door while he sat nearest to it, he pulled his chair out a bit so he was…Josephine supposed he would be able to see anyone entering in his peripheral and rise up in defense more swiftly. Josephine and Eleanor had already had coffee underway, brewing, but the kettle of finished product was poured by Tonio before he brought a tray to them oh- sweet man, he’d placed a concha on each saucer, neatly served alongside their tea cups full of warm coffee…Josephine’s was topped with frothy milk. Cafe con Leche*, was an admitted favorite, and it only just occurred to her—she’d never ordered as much in Skyhold, but any time Tonio appeared with a cup of coffee for her, it was always prepared as such. Maker she’d said she preferred her coffee that way on one occasion when Tonio questioned if it was common for Antivan women to take their coffee black—Eleanor did so—and she confessed it was a bit of an atypical order opposed to cream or sugar, and she didn’t wish to make a further step for the kitchen hands just to make the beverage for her.

“Thank you,” she echoed the others as they all thanked the man placing beverages before them,

“Of course,” and instead of seating himself, he clapped his hands together and began rolling up his shirt sleeves, he lacked his suit jacket but she supposed that was because he’d been prepared for needing to cook—he was turning to move on toward the wash basin as he declared, “Bello, you’re armored—you’ve work today? You must eat first! Eggs and bacon? I’ll make enough for everyone, I’m sure the whole of the house will be up and about soon enough.”

“Thanks papa,” Cremisius said, “Day off technically but something came for Ellie,” he reached in a thigh pocket on his armored leggings and retrieving a bit of parchment he handed off to the girl. “From Minister Bellise? Didn’t read it but I dunno, the ‘You’re cordially invited’ bit on the envelope implies my girl’s got a mission, so…”

“Oh! Gracias guapo!” Eleanor thanked him, taking the envelope in hand and slipping a finger under the seal to break it open “Maaami! Pretty please braid my hair? Should I wear a dress? Cremisius, will you be very jealous if I try to persuade Minister Bellise with my body?”

“Gotta do what you gotta do,” the boy shrugged.

“Right now, I gotta eat breakfast. And then yeah, we’ll need to get ready to head out before noon—I’m officially invited to a party at Marquis Wiscotte’s estate. Minister Bellise will be there and I’ll chat her up an see if she’ll ratify everything and bingo! All done!” she looked to Cremisius, “Cole’s okay, right? He was so sleepy, he said I should go to uhh…he said I was needed in here,” had the Spirit sent Eleanor Josephine’s way? “But I felt badly, leaving.”

“Wasn’t a problem lovely, guy got his cuddle on with me. Not sure if he’s actually sleeping but he said his body needs to rest so,” he shrugged.

“Cole will need more water I think, when we check on him,” Eleanor said, “I got him to drink some more before he laid back down but potion uses so much and he doesn’t really do the whole ‘consistent hydration’ thing.”

That got Tonio’s attention as the man came to stand at the island, a bowl in hand he was cracking eggs into, “Cole has returned? He needed potion—is the boy ill?” he fretted.

“Got banged up running a mission for Leliana—she sent backup but the guy really did try to do it all on his own, kept getting spotted and had to keep making people forget they saw him, but then more people came, it got real complicated. He got it though, reported in last night—just about gave us ruddy heart attacks, he just appeared at the foot of the bed,” he seemed to recall something and leaned closer to his girlfriend to say more quietly, “I reported to Leliana for him while you were doing your thing,” the girl nodded before the young man addressed his father again, “Ellie patched him up, he’s been laying with us since he got back in. Bull’s laying with him now—I’ll take them a tray.”

“Ahh, bello—that is very sweet. I’ll assist you if that suits,” Tonio volunteered, “I wish to check in on Cole, poor mimo.”

Oh, poor Cole indeed. The Spirit was kind, she felt terribly he’d had such a rough time of it. The boy did not eat often, but he’d a fascination with different tastes—it made her wonder if he might delight in…oh what were they? Tiny multi-colored candies, small and sweet and easy to chew, did not fill one up terribly and each color represented a different flavor. Ah-ha! Jelly beans! They were neither jelly nor beans but…bean shaped Josephine supposed. They originated in the Free Marches, but had become popular in Orilais, especially as they grew nearer to spring, the colorful confections were something of a common treat for Summerday and she’d plans to stock up while they were in Val Royeaux—send some home to Yvette who adored the sweets and Claude* who was reportedly eating them out of house and home as he neared his fifteenth birthday, Laurine would balk at the gift, claim he was hardly a child but he and Antoine both had notorious sweet teeths. She also intended to have some to keep in her desk, gift some to Eleanor and Cremisius, Sera and Cole. Perhaps she’d arrange something of a ‘get well’ present for the Spirit boy, gift him his portion sooner rather than later.

She decided she would certainly do just that upon visiting the dear boy, Maker. Marehis and Eleanor slipped off to ready the Inquisitor for her meeting...oh, she prayed that went well, that this would all be over soon and all their efforts were not to waste. Josephine joined Cremisius and Tonio in carrying a few trays to the room Dorian and the Iron Bull had laid claim to. She’d been...a bit concerned what they might find there, the men were...very...engaged. Often. But she trusted they would be doing no such thing with Cole in their midst, she was just worried there might be...artifacts, lying about. Perhaps paraphernalia was the better word? Ugh. She hoped if they had been up to anything...graphic, there was no evidence lying about. She did not need to know the contents of the several oh-so-discreet, sometimes alarmingly large, packages the Iron Bull received billed under...nothing like what the Iron Bull would need, last Josephine checked, the Qunari would not subscribe to a service called ‘Chantry Monthly’ and what he received hardly seemed to be pamphlets on Andrasten religion.

Thankfully, the room was tidy enough, a bit dark as the curtains were drawn, but someone had gotten the fireplace going strong enough to offer light to see by. The Iron Bull laid with Dorian tucked up against his side and Cole laying atop his chest, the Spirit boy was dressed in what looked like a borrowed set of Cremisius’s sleeping clothes—they themselves weren’t stained but the material was white and thin enough to see the outline of bandaging wrapped around his chest and left shoulder, the bandaging itself was stained, a dark blotch low, where it wrapped around his ribcage. He’d a bandage on his cheek, another wrapped about one forearm and his ankle was secured in a splint—good heavens! What in the world had Leliana put this boy through?!

“I tried, I really really did. I am sorry. I can do it—I can,” the boy was hoarsely insisting as Josephine approached, Cremisius and Tonio at her back—she’d a tray with warm drink in her hands while Tonio carried a tray of breakfast and Cremisius had his hands free to keep guard. “But this body has to be done being broken. And then I can use it to do it again, I know how to now, I figured it out! I can get in to the House of Repose.”

Josephine found herself struck speechless. Had...oh Maker was this because- had Leliana entrusted him with a test of skill to see if he might be capable of infiltrating the House without bloodshed? Not without bloodshed, Cole was certainly worse for wear, oh mijo.

“Cole, love you buddy, shut up,” Cremisius said in...gentle, soothing tones, like loving reprimand as he took a seat on the free edge of the bed, reaching out to brush the Spirit’s hair out of his eyes, “Focus on resting up and getting better before we discuss moving forward with any of that, you’ll be in pretty rough shape for a few days Ellie says. But we’re here, everyone’s going to help take care of you, okay? Ellie’s going to go see if she can settle things without having to go to the House, and I’ll be tagging along to have her back for Marehis—she’ll be hanging around running security while we’re gone, but if you need us just,” he tapped his own temple twice as the boy smiled gratefully. “Dunno how far range that goes but the estate we’re headed for isn’t far.”

“I...there’s so much hurt in Val Royeaux,” the Spirit fretted.

“And now you’ve hurts that need helping,” Tonio said, setting his tray on the bedside table before kneeling beside Cremisius and carefully taking hold of Cole’s hand, oh, his knuckles were scraped, and the Tevinter man turned his palm-up to press a kiss against the inside of his fingers, like the action might heal the broken skin on the other side. He rubbed circles on the Spirit’s palm with his thumb as he intoned, “There will always be hurts to heal—I promise you, when you are feeling better you’ll be free to go about tending to them as you please, and I’ll keep an eye out myself. If I see anyone I can ascertain to be feeling distress, I’ll certainly endeavor to brighten their day—sometimes a kind word can make all of the difference. You cannot be of help to anyone if you are not first and foremost of help to yourself. I know it is strange for you, having a body to take care of but you must take care of it. Your needs are different than most people, but that does not mean they can be ignored entirely. Ellie suggests making certain you are hydrated—do you feel up to sipping some water for me, dolce mimo?"

Cole nodded, sighing a bit tiredly. “It has to sit up to do that. I don’t know why.”

“You’ll spill all over yourself and my bed, for one thing,” Dorian informed him, rather pleasantly, like he didn’t wish his usual sarcasm to scathe, “and everything goes a bit more swimmingly when one is sitting up to swallow.”

The Iron Bull huffed a laugh, “You gotta trust Sparky when it comes to swallowing.” Oh good heavens!

“The Iron Bull—honestly!” Tonio reprimanded, as the Iron Bull began sitting up to help Cole do so as well, “Folly that mouth of yours—there is a Lady present, apologize to Josephine.”

“Oh shit- uhhh shoot, sorry Ambassador, didn’t see you come in,” he apologized, “What you got over there? Thought I smelled coffee.”

It had been rather mortifying but, all told, she’d expected worse. She smiled and moved on with, “We did bring coffee—there is also water, here,” she’d not yet set her tray down but there was room on the free nightstand on the side of the bed she stood on, oh—it was the side Dorian lay on, lazing against the Iron Bull’s blind side, there was something sweet about that, that the Iron Bull kept Cole in sight and…found comfort in the man he loved—trusted—laying against him, even if he could not see him. Dorian gave her a bit of a wry look as he patted the empty space at the edge of the bed at his side in invitation and she nodded her thanks, carefully seating herself there with a glass of water in hand. “Do you need assistance?” she wondered as she offered the glass to Cole.

He was delivered assistance, regardless. He just- he was injured, and Josephine felt just horribly the poor boy had gone to so much effort for her. She held the glass to his lips for him to sip, Tonio smiling as he offered gentle encouragement, “There we are bello, sip carefully—excellent, you’re doing just splendidly my boy.”

Oh, Josephine pulled the glass away when she feared the boy might have just a bit too much water in the back of his throat, gave him a break, and Tonio plied a handkerchief to the boy’s lip.

They sat chatting quietly, it seemed to soothe Cole—everyone making pleasant small talk, not speaking or thinking on anything unpleasant while Dorian and the Iron Bull partook of breakfast. And the Spirit was just precious when Dorian offered him some his own concha—Cole nibbled at it, he did not like eating great quantities, but what he did consume sent him smiling and offering up,

“You made them with so much love—you were worried you couldn’t recall everything she taught you, but that was the most important thing your Abuelita said! In all things, do them with love!”

Josephine’s mouth worked for a moment, she…oh, goodness. Yes, she’d not forgotten that, not entirely she supposed, and that helped a great deal. “Thank you, Cole. I’m pleased you enjoy them.”
They did—even more so when the door swung open and Eleanor popped inside, swung a bit, her hands on the doorframe and outer handle as she leaned forward into the room and informed them, “Dip your concha in your coffee and you’ll be able to die with zero actual regrets—they. are so. good.”

“Inekari! Now it’s a party,” the Iron Bull decided, breaking the concha he had in hand in half and soaking up a bit of coffee, humming his approval, “Mmm man, yeah, that’s banging—Cole, babe, you wanna bite?”

“It makes it taste different!” the boy was pleased to find, smiling to Eleanor as the girl perched herself on the foot of the bed. “You are worried about leaving—don’t be. You will do well, and Lady Josie will be safe.”

“Thanks! I brought more potion for you—if you take it you can lay down, okay?” Eleanor assured, she apparently used her pockets for potion today. Oh she was simply precious! Tonio had fashioned her a silken dress in Inquisition red—Josephine was albeit concerned the girl truly was prepared to seduce a favorable sentence from the Minister, the neckline was rather a plunging one a V that stopped low between her breasts was she wearing—well, Josephine hoped it wasn’t too, er, chilly out, goodness. Could the girl go about that way comfortably? Josephine would be sore if she hadn’t…support. At least the dress bore long sleeves that met her wrists, a long skirt fell cleanly to the floor, just barely hovering off the ground when she wore her heeled boots. Oh, Tonio’s work was just exquisite. And she did like that the man was truly dedicated to plying pockets to his designs, Eleanor pulled a few vials of Elf Root tonic out of her dress pockets which she passed off to the Iron Bull who in turn passed the excess to Dorian to place on the bedside table for later, “Try to take another dose every four hours—get some good rest today and stay hydrated, that’ll really help. You mind if I take a peek at how your leg’s doing?”

“You can look however long you want to,” Cole assured, nodding.

Eleanor smiled, scooting to sit on her knees before him, “Thanks!”

Cremisius took Cole’s hand in his, an offer of comfort while Eleanor gingerly took his splinted foot in hand to unwrap her bandaging and check it’s healing progress. “Your bandaging is a little loose now—the swelling’s gone down, huh? That’s really great—your bruising’s getting darker but that’s just your body doing its job, Elf Root’s helping to heal up faster.” Oh Maker—it was Josephine who peeked at the young man’s injury—it was rather grotesque, his foot looked an angry sort of purple-nearing-black, it just- looked incredibly painful and Josephine could not abide the sight for more than a mere glance before she looked up, Tonio offered her a sympathetic smile. “Cole, this is serious, so you need to listen good okay? I do not want you on this leg for the rest of the day, got it? No poofing and landing on your feet, keep your weight off it entirely for at least…” Eleanor checked her wristwatch, “Hmm…the next twelve hours? Keep the poofing down entirely, you’re not to leave bed unless you need to, and if you do, ask someone to help you get around.” She gave him a reassuring pat on the knee, “I’ll check on you whenever I get back. You’re absolutely sure you still want Cremisius and me to go out tonight?” she seemed to be double checking.

“Oh yes please—you would not mind staying in, you’re so—” oh goodness, the Spirit swallowed like maybe he was moved to tears and endeavoring not to cry as he smiled, his entire expression lighting up, “you’re so worried about me, you love me so much you wouldn’t regret staying with me to make sure I feel better—that on its own makes me feel so much better!” he assured, “You’re all so happy and excited for your dates tonight, it would make me so happy that you get to go enjoy them. Have fun—I promise I will not hurt my leg.”
“Thanks, I love you a bunch,” Eleanor said sweetly.

“You do!” Cole said as if it was a joyous matter of fact. “I love you too.”

“Get some good rest, think happy thoughts, and I’ll see you when I get back,” Eleanor assured, pressing a kiss to her fingertips she blew to the Spirit before looking to Cremisius, “We need to get going if we’re going to be on time. Well, fashionably late—but on time to be fashionably late. Socialites are loco,” she complained as she bounced in place a bit to assist in popping up off of the bed, the Iron Bull whistling approval of her efforts as she bowed. Oh Maker, Josephine couldn’t help giggle at the sight.

The young man huffed an amused laugh, nodding his agreement, “Yeah they are,” he said, looking to Cole and leaning forward to press a kiss to his forehead, “Feel better buddy, I’ll see you in a few.” Cole nodded as he closed his eyes and relaxed against the Iron Bull…and truly did appear to be as asleep as the Spirit could be. Cremisius- oh, she thought he was getting up but he was merely leaning to his father and…oh that was so sweet, the boy pressed a kiss to Tonio’s cheek, “Stay out of trouble old man.”

“Likewise bello mimo. Have a pleasant time—you too bella mia,” Tonio called to Eleanor.

“Yes,” Josephine said, somewhat pleading, “Be well and safe—Mija do not entertain favor with the Minister.” Bellise could be…she was rumored to be ruthless. Which was exactly the sort of thing they needed on their side, but Josephine shuddered to think what she might ask of Eleanor if today’s conversation led her to demand something of the Inquisitor. Josephine had done her upmost to word their correspondence to imply any such thing would fall to the Inquisition as a body and should be delivered through Josephine herself.

“We’ll be super safe—it’s just a quick ‘hey, hi, hello’ and then voila,” Eleanor snapped her fingers “All of this is as good as settled! C’mon guapo—oh! This is like a pre-date! A roleplaying pre-date! It’ll be like you’re my dashing bodyguard and I’m the beautiful Inquisitor you’ve vowed to protect!”

“Lovely…I am your dashing bodyguard and you are the beautiful Inquisitor I’ve vowed to protect,” he said as he joined her.

“Yeah,” she said as if that much were obvious, accepting the arm he offered as they took their leave, “but we’re like, resisting the attraction—we have to keep things professional, there can’t be anything going on between us, it just wouldn’t be right! But oh man do we secretly want to sneak off behind a statue or a fancy shrubbery or something.”

“Magister Wiscotte better have some fancy shrubbery, then,” Cremisius supposed.

“Good god, they’re just going to get worse, aren’t they?” Dorian wondered once the young couple had taken their leave, “Just…being…so…” he flapped his hand like he was drying to flick some sort of disgusting gunk off of it.

“In love?” Josephine offered laughingly…quietly, mindful that Cole was trying to rest—the Spirit let out a contented humming sound as the Iron Bull began making gentle play with his hair. She smiled as she said, “They are sweet.”

“Deadass though—if I could have anything in the damn world,” the Iron Bull confessed, “it’d be for Krem to uh, you know. Have been born with a set up he’d never struggle with? But I’m pretty sure in some convoluted way the Maker’s lookin’ out for the guy because damn I’m glad we don’t have to worry about little Tevinter-Antivan babies running around, ‘cuz potion’s swell but Imekari’s got it bad, I mean Krem’s a responsible guy, but the poor kid’s only Human, and he’s pretty much uh…dude can’t say no to that.”

“It’s hardly his fault,” Dorian drawled, “I’m almost positive that girl has stayed out of Circles the whole of her life by bat ting her eyes and pouting her way out of Templar confrontations. She talked me into dessert last night, it was horrible. Delicious but I should not have—was not going to but then…” his nose wrinkled like he smelled something foul. “She said ‘please’ and insisted I’m handsome and deserve to ‘treat myself’ to my heart's content. Lieutenant Aclassi is doomed.”

“Oh if they wish for children it would be the most precious thing,” Josephine enthused, assuring, “in the far future of course.”

“It would be quite the beautiful combination,” Tonio supposed, “oh but Maker bless sweet Ellie, between the two of them? The hair on such a babe will be the stuff of legend.”

Dorian scoffed, “It would be a shock for all the Ages if their progeny was born bald headed.”

“Imekari aren’t allowed to have Imekari until- dunno. Ellie’s gotta get taller or somethin’ and Krem’s gotta…dunno,” the Iron Bull struggled, settling for, “Stop being Imekari!”

“Ahh, my friend I am sorry—I was just discussing with Lady Josephine the finer points of Tevene and we came to the conclusion that Cremisius…will always be my handsome baby. It is the doom of all parents—your children grow and grow and you see all of the wonderful person they’ve become…and yet, your first impression is permanently ingrained in your mind at all times. I swear to you I startle at least once a day because I realize my bello mimio walks about armed with a sword of all things—what babe wields weaponry? I think, he could surely injure himself! And then I’m reminded he is not the tiny thing I held…Maker, I think a week straight, his first week of life, small and precious child I had to protect, who needed absolutely everything from me.”

“Shit, that level of parenting crap doesn’t apply to me right?” the Qunari checked.

Tonio smiled ruefully, knocking the back of his fist against the Iron Bull’s bicep, “I’m afraid it does.”

“Damn. At least my first impression was ‘this kid can put up a hell of a fight and take a hell of a beating’, but uh…needing to protect- fuck.”

“Language,” Tonio reprimanded.

Josephine smiled, reaching out to dole a sympathetic pat to the Qunari’s shin, “I’m unoffended, the man is coming to the realization he is…the word would be ‘screwed’, yes?” though…oh, she wasn’t sure it was her place to say anything but, “The Iron Bull…it is sweet you wish for Cremisius not to struggle but…he would not be the strong brave boy so full of fight, so strong he could withstand whatever he faced when you first met, if he’d not the experience of bravery and strength he’s had to live in his life to be who he is. He’s such an incredible man because of the man he is.”

A near-beaming smile spread across Cole’s face even as he kept his eyes closed, “She wouldn’t change him for the world!” he said…as if he were affirming the notion to someone.

“I would not,” Josephine agreed.

Dorian tapped his elbow against his lover's ribs as if to prompt his attention and the Qunari rumbled out a laugh for some reason.
"You are thinking very loudly," Cole quietly commented, eyes closed, though she supposed that was his polite method of announcing they were disturbing his finding rest.

"Ahh, shhh, I apologize bello," Tonio said, carding a hand through the Spirit's hair, and apparently something in the Tevinter man's thoughts prompted,

"Oh, yes, that might help. It always helped Krem."

The elder Aclassi chuckled softly, offering an apologetic glance across the other adults in the room before he quietly began to hum and then, very softly, "Fa la nana bambino*, fa la nana bel bambin. Fa la nina, fa la nana, nei braeceti della...mamma."

"I think that's you," Dorian whispered to the Iron Bull.

"Yeah yeah," the Qunari grumbled. "I'm the mama."

Oh it was sweet, once more did the Tailor repeat the gentle lullaby and then he pressed a kiss to Cole's forehead and wished him pleasant thoughts, and then he offered his arm to Josephine who felt rather certain if they did not get out of range of Cole, the poor Spirit would be subject to several loud thoughts over just how incredibly precious she had found the exchange—had—he used to sing to a tiny Cremisius? Oh goodness! She did try to put it from her mind.

…though their conversation did inspire a bit of concern for Josephine, and she found focus in that as they left the Iron Bull's quarters. Did the boy struggle still? She would not change him for who he is, but if he had things he wished to change for himself? Well, she would certainly support him. Tonio had spoken as if he and Cremisius’s mother had not been supportive of their son’s gender in his youth, that woman maintaining her stance even as her son had grown into a remarkable man oh— that- the very thought made her blood boil! She was not one for violence but she could understand the desire to— to deliver a slap to someone’s face for their foolheadedness, she certainly wished to write a strongly worded letter railing at the woman. She would refrain but the sentiment stood!

She’d a bit of work to do still, a few things she wished to check on with this concern in mind, so, she sought out her office. Tonio asked to join her if she wouldn’t mind. He’d no claimed workspace and he’d a few designs he wished to review before presenting them to a client. Too…it did seem like the man was reticent to let her out of sight after yesterday’s intrusion. So, he joined her, arm in arm through the estate, and he seemed to understand…oh she’d just a bit of reticence in returning to the room, but it was nonsense. Still, he waited until she nodded before he opened the door for her, the man stepping foot inside first and looking about, goodness—he wasn’t even armed, nor could she imagine he raised a hand to hurt anyone, but he had let go of her arm, had a hand splayed and raised behind him as if he were prepared to push her from the room if there were any unwelcome guests inside but it was clear. And clean—there’d been a mess made of the things on Josephine’s desk when Cremisius pulled the assassin over it but Eleanor had left the rug spotless, no longer bore signs of blood or ink from her overturned well—everything was returned to its proper place, full inkwell and fresh quills waiting at her desk, all of her paperwork in order. Too there were even flowers—a note before the vase in Eleanor’s hand with a wish of a good day and the promise her troubles would be over soon, oh.

Tonio took a seat in one of the chairs across from her desk—she offered him space upon it but he insisted he’d no need, he sat with his ankle crossed over the opposite knee, his sketchbook propped up in his lap, oh, he must be nervous, he was fidgeting with the charcoal pencil he had in his hand, making it wave back and forth in a rapid blur as he reviewed his work.

“T’m certain it is lovely,” Josephine offered as she set about her own work, searching through the center most drawer in this desk, it was deceptively shallow, holding pens and ink, spare parchment—the bottom could be raised to reveal its true bottom, and in that space is where she stored all their important documentation for this trip. Ahh.

There had been a bit of a discussion, when the crossed the border into Orlais—the Iron bull and Cremisius speaking with the patrol they met with that allowed them to enter the country. She’d not known what about, she supposed the two heads of the Charger’s were merely talking through all of the Charger’s differing points of origin so they would be allowed through without further question but now she saw just what had caused concern. Cremisius’s identification papers, they’d gender indicators on them, marked rather unfortunately with an official ‘F’ which meant likewise his birth certificate must also still appear as much.

Well. That couldn’t stand. Josephine was uncertain Tevene law on the matter, but Magister Tilani could not marry her deceased lover from clan Tethras because same-sex partnership could not be concreted and she was considered, legally, a man, and she was a Magister. If she’d not been able to change her identification officially, Josephine had little hope Cremisius could go that route just now. For now, she’d enough connection to Orlais, Antiva, one of them would bear what she needed—the boy would not be questioned on their return trip, that was for certain. Not if Josephine had anything to say in it—she spent the better part of the next hour drafting letters to a few Judges she knew from her time as Ambassador in Orlais, a few connections she had in Antiva, Ferelden… she did not know many people from the Free Marches but when Leliana investigated Thom Ranier after his reveal on the Coast, there was…oh she could only just barely remember, but there was someone connected to him recently elected to office in Markham on a pro-magic political platform. A non-traditionalist at the very least, perhaps they might be of assistance in this matter—securing Cremisius a more security-sensitive form of identification that would give him an expedited process when he was stopped at ports of entry. She would not use Cremisius’s gender identity opposing his government identification as her reasoning for her request, she’d no right to speak of it with those who did not know, not without Cremisius’s permission, if she absolutely had to say as much she would wait for the boy’s return and discuss it with him before taking action. As it stood, she could get by merely detailing his accomplishments in his career under the Iron Bull, his service to the Inquisition and insisting he was a valuable agent, and he required unencumbered travel. That would be one concern addressed.

…there was…another concern. Did…did Cremisius struggle with self-image? He was always so confident and charming when Josephine saw him, but that did not mean he did not struggle privately. Was there something to be done? It seemed…it sounded like some culmination of mental and physical health…were there Healers knowledgeable on the subject? Adan, Elan… even Ser Stitches, they were all general practitioners or more so trained in battlefield tactics.

So. While they awaited Eleanor and Cremisius’s return, Josephine set focus—she’d many a letter to write.

It was easy work when it was for something she felt so important, was so pleased to do, and could do so in the quiet contentment of Tonio’s company, the soft scratch of quill and charcoals filling the silence with what she thought might be the most soothing of sounds.

Orlesians were bloody weird.

It’d been a bit nerve wracking, going to some Marquis party with Ellie on such an important mission—he was damn scared for Josie, Maker, whatever had a sweet woman like that done to deserve so much bullshit? Thankfully, Minister Bellise was…

For a woman who was “well positioned” enough on her own without the Inquisition’s help, and “much too old” to be charmed, she uh…was pretty easy to charm, didn’t seem to mind the position Ellie offered.

“What can you possibly provide that will make your petition worth my effort?”

Ellie smiled, mischief twinkling in her eyes as she drew nearer to the Orlesian woman, hands clasped behind her back…Maker her gown was something sinful—she’d been joking when she asked if he would be jealous if she used her body to persuade the Minister but uh…he…he’d been pretty sure she was joking.

But her, “I don’t think we’ll be missed from the party for a while…” sounded pretty…suggestive.

Orlesian’s were ruddy weird with their masks—this Minister wearing one that covered her entire face but could not conceal the utter shock in her voice as she shot out, “Are you quite serious?”

“For the pleasure of your company, Minister? Absolutely.”

…and then Ellie offered the Minister her arm.

…and began enthusing about the beautiful gardens around Magister Wiscotte’s estate.

…and proceeded to escort the Minister through the rose bushes and regaled her with the tale of her Tia Josie and the beautiful Montilyet family and oh, yes, raising the Du Paraquetts up would muddle the lower nobility—but not the Minister’s ranks, it would just be one more family spreading-thin the regality of being a minor noble and perhaps making it even more elite to be considered high—and too, wouldn’t it be simply wonderful, stylish even, for the Minister to have the benefit of a returned—renowned—Antivan trading house favoring her? Lady Josie’s family conducting business in Orlais would be the Minister’s chance to jump into the trend of purchasing Antivan fare-

Oh. Oh Maker. Because the Inquisitor and Herald of Andraste was Antivan. Shit, Krem’d not even noticed but yeah, when they’d been walking through Val Royeaux, he’d overheard people shopping around for Antivan silk, roses, teas—the little Cafe even started offering some piss-poor rendition of Antivan rice. The Inquisition was becoming increasingly popular and what was more, their Inquisitor was—and whose to say if entertaining the Inquisitor might earn you more favor with her if you were able to offer her things from her homeland? Orlais had a lot but they weren’t exactly a meltingpot—they were exclusionists among exclusionists, the only reason Josie could even dream of resuming trade in Orlais was because if you go back far enough, before her family fled to Antiva, laid down roots that spread until their children were full-Antivan? The Montilyets were an Orlesian household, nobility. That was the only reason they’d the right to trade in Orlais. They would be an exclusive sort of merchant, bringing in merchandise no one else could get their hands on that was about to be trending big time in Orlais.

And the Minister? Was all about being on the cutting edge of that trend.

“I will expect a list of vendors before their merchandise is available to the general public, and given first look over their wares.”
“Oh gosh Minister Bellise, you drive a hard bargain—but I believe that can be arranged. The Montilyets will be honored by your patronage.”

And then when the Minister was safely returned to the party, Ellie took her gracious leave… and the very moment the great double doors to the Marquis’s home was closed Ellie was squealing jumping excitedly before she wrapped her arms around Krem’s neck and kissed him like he’d just sweet talked a Minister out of her coin purse as a favor in return for her ratifying the Du Paraquette’s rise to nobility.

It hadn’t been the roll in the rose bushes Krem had been expecting, but Maker did it turn out great.

And uh…there was a bit of loitering in the Marquis garden Maker he’d known Ellie had little grabby hands but how she managed to only just unbuckle the belt of his armored leggings and slip her hand into his trousers and just-

Probably not what the uh, designer had in mind when he made packed underthings but Maker help them all Cremisius Aclassi left a Marquis prize rose garden lips near-bruised, bitten, the bite thoroughly kissed to soothe, the recipient of through-the-pants hand job that uh…legs were trembling all the way to the carriage.

…he was damn glad Leliana’d had a few of her people planted at the party and tagging along running security because uhhh, personal bodyguard got distracted. Wouldn’t’ve, but Ellie’d whispered assurance against his throat when he opened his mouth to inform her—loved everywhere she was heading except the timing—but “Guapo, love you—feel a lot safer with you here—but Mister Bruce is taking point with my security today.” Ahh. Carriage driver—Leliana’s scout but Krem just about checked him right out the gate—would have taken him out because he’d seen it, the guy was an assassin. Just, not there to kill any of their people—he was Leliana’s, a regular face Krem saw all the time, he’d been part of the team of Leliana’s people that regularly protected Ellie, ever since Haven. It just took a second to observe through the initial ‘oh shit there’s an assassin’ panic for it to click that he recognized his face, this whole thing had him on edge.

So, Maker bless Bruce. And carriages—comfortable as hell, they claimed one side, Krem stretching out with his back against the carriage’s side, Ellie resting against his chest, legs between his as she put her feet up with a contented sigh as she relaxed against him, interlocking the fingers of her unmarked hand with his, tilting her head back to smile up at him, eyes alight with relief.

“You think it’ll be okay? Tia will be safe soon?”

“You did amazing El, don’t even sweat it—Josie’s safe and she’ll stay that way, and this’ll all be over soon,” he assured, she closed her eyes, humming contentedly as he pressed a kiss to her forehead. “Proud of you, Inquisitor.”

That earned him a warm, nose-crinkling smile as she giggled, “Gracias, Lieutenant,” she thanked him, though she let out a small, startled squeal when the carriage began rolling and they swayed a bit in their seat with the motion. But he wrapped an arm around her waist to secure her against him, smile pulling at his lips as she snuggled in, resting her head on his shoulder, softest smile on her lips as her eyes drifted closed and he was a relieved when he felt her breathing change, soundly asleep. Oh, good, damn did she need it. He pressed the barest, feather-light kiss to her hair to wish her sweet dreams.

She’d barely slept last night he was pretty sure. She was exhausted—worried at her lip and apologetic as she said she was glad he would be joining her, but she had things she needed to look over and she was waiting to hear back on some things and- he cut her off, kissing her soundly and then flopping onto the bed and rolling onto his side of the mattress and said he was beat anyway, stretching out, arms behind his head as he lounged, closing his eyes. Though he did find himself cracking an eye open to look at her and make sure she knew uh…just because they’d introduced sex to their relationship, it wasn’t a requirement for their every bit of alone time. Just because they could, didn’t mean he was expecting it at every turn—he wasn’t expecting anything, if they were both in the mood for it? Cool. But he’d never make that a demand of her—ever. The least sexy thing in the world would be sex as an obligation.

“I don’t feel obligated,” she’d explained, “I just feel badly. We’re on a nice trip and I’ll be leaving for the Emerald Graves soon—rude of them to use my favorite color with the word ‘grave’.”

“Absolutely, what were they thinking?” he certainly didn’t care for the name either ‘grave’ was not the kind of word he wanted in the name of a place his girlfriend was going.

“So…I dunno. I was hoping we could spend the night together, and I, you know,” she shrugged, “planned on it being a bit more fun than laying around bored while I do paperwork.”

“Uhh, I’m incredibly entertained lovely—working my shirt, showin’ off your bangin’ reading and writing skills? Hot. This is…” he shrugged, “a normal night. Maker willing, we’ll have nights like this the rest of our lives-

“Ai, papito!” she complained, pouting at him as she took up the stack of parchment before her and swatted him with it, “Don’t go praying to the Maker I have to do paperwork every night for the rest of our lives!”

He chuckled at that—“I just mean normal nights. Being together, wrapping up the day, settling into bed, going to sleep.”

“Mmm, sleep. That does sound nice,” she agreed, leaning over to peck a kiss to his forehead, “Okay guapo—pray away, it’s officially Herald of Andraste approved!”

He had—said his prayers, drifted off to sleep, woke up when Ellie’s weight left the bed a few hours later and he blearily realized she was cleaning off her side, putting everything she’d been working on away before climbing back into bed to snuggle against him and get some sleep. and then maybe an hour later he was wide awake when Cole came falling into bed with them—appeared out of nowhere bleeding and drenched in sweat as he gasped in harsh breaths of air he used to inform them his body was having trouble breathing. That had Ellie casting to throw on all the lights in the room and launching into action—telling him to lie flat on his back and Krem took hold of his hand while Ellie carefully lifted the boy’s shirt to check at his ribs—skin was bruised maybe the bone too but nothing was broken, he’d taken a hell of a blow to the liver. Apparently that shit agitated your nervous system into hyper-protecting your brain and that meant hyperventilating trying to get air in and the heart pounding to course blood to the brain and…he would be fine from that, he just needed to lie on his back awhile. So, he did just that. Krem did his best to try and comfort the poor guy while keeping him conscious, talking him through his mission, Maker. Ellie made quick work getting potion in his system and patching him up, and she didn’t want him going anywhere for a few hours until she was absolutely certain he wasn’t going to go into distress, or she’d missed something—she asked Krem to go get Stitches for a second opinion and he sent the guy running while she stopped by Leliana’s. Spymaster was…she wasn’t heartless, but people didn’t always…think like they were looking at a person when they were looking at Cole. And she was intense and serious about her operations—this being a test run for something for Lady Josie was uh, another level of intense—so, Krem reported in for him and then got back in time to greet Stitches on his way out. Lay it on down with Cole in between them and uh...he was pretty sure Ellie hadn’t slept after that, staying awake to watch and listen for anything going wrong in the Spirit boy’s body. Then she’d been gone entirely when Krem woke up again so.

A nap on the carriage ride home was more than called for. Bruce was kind enough to take a few extra laps when they got to the massive roundabout that led to the gates Val Royeaux, just... Ellie’d done her part—if Josie didn’t trust that, she wasn’t paying attention.

She was—absolute attention as they returned to the city. Ellie was pretty much down for the count at the moment, hadn’t stirred in the slightest when Krem made with the careful work of sweeping her up and carrying her from the carriage, nodding to the guards as they let them pass through the gate, and the moment he entered the Summer Bazaar to head for the spire to the Marchand’s Josephine was there—waiting out in the damn open! With papa but that was just him tagging along with a woman marked for assassination until the Du Paraquette’s were in position to cancel their ancestor’s contract! Marehis and Leliana were masters of holding it down with security but still, Maker, Krem felt about as panicked as Josephine appeared when she rushed forward to meet them.

“What happened—was she injured?! Were you attacked mijo?” Josephine questioned immediately, hand ghosting over Ellie’s head like she was afraid to agitate something but wanted to stroke her hair or check her for fever.

“Everything’s fine,” Krem quietly assured, “meeting went off without a hitch—Ellie got the Du Paraquette’s ratification secured and bagged you your first customer once you’ve got operations rolling in Orlais. She’s just beat, fell asleep on the ride home and I’m not inclined to wake her unless its an emergency or something. Didn’t get a lot of sleep last night.” Josephine sighed in relief, smoothing Ellie’s hair back.

“Maker oh, bless this girl a thousand times over,” the woman breathed, words dropping from her lips almost like a prayer as she pressed a kiss to the top of her head. “Thank you for watching over her, Cremisius.”

“Yes bello,” Papa commended quietly, it shouldn’t feel so overwhelming hearing two words ringing with so much pride, but it did. “You’re well? Did you enjoy the party? Have you eaten?” he asked as they made their way to the spire.

“It was nice, but we didn’t exactly join the party.”

“Are you hungry sweet man?” Josephine fretted, “Your father and I made lunch for everyone not too long ago, there is still plenty left I can warm up for you. Soup, a sandwich?”

“Sounds great—I’ll take a tray for Ellie too if you don’t mind? If she wakes up and finds I’ve cheated on her with lunch she might break up with me.”

Papa chuckled, patting him on the back, “Make yourselves comfortable—I believe it is your turn to be catered to in your quarters yes?”

“Oh yes—please, go relax and enjoy the rest of your day, I truly appreciate all you and Eleanor and everyone have done for me this week,” Josephine intoned, “Think nothing more of it and enjoy every bit of the remainder of our vacationing in Val Royeaux—I was able to secure dinner reservation for you and Eleanor at a wonderful bistro across the Bazaar from the Marchand’s. It means going down one spire and up the other but I assure you the dining is worth the stairs.” Hey, so far Lady Josie’s recommendations were amazing—the museum yesterday? Maker, he saw works he thought he’d only ever see micro recreations or read piss-poor descriptions of. Seeing the real thing? He might’ve er…gotten a bit caught up in it all, it felt like Ellie spent more time watching him take everything in than she had actually looking at the art herself, she insisted he was ‘so cute’ and kept feeding his high about it all, asking him all sorts of questions about the art, what he knew about his favorite artists.

He’d been a total dork and he was fine with that. Ellie’d insisted he was ‘just the cutest!’ so it was a win-win situation really—get his high-art jollies, endear his girlfriend, zero complaints.

Krem offered a reassuring smile and a nod to the Lady telling him to indulge in the rest of his day off. He was gonna check in with Leliana first though just to make sure he wasn’t still needed in Josie’s guard rotation, but uh yeah, he planned on enjoying the rest of their trip. They were in Val Royeaux. A year ago if someone said he’d be enjoying a night of fine dining and theatre in a place like this with his girlfriend and his papa? Probably would’ve decked ‘em, taken it as some sort of sick mockery. Maker. Wasn’t sure exactly what he did, but he felt a little more than blessed.

Bit of a change of plans as they got into the Marchand’s—not for Krem, but Lady Josie. There was a scout there waiting with missives for Josephine from a Judge Moreau and a Senoria Diaz—it sent Josephine wide eyed and very excited and he wasn’t sure what they were bringing to the party with her Du Paraquette’s problem but he was grateful, Lady Montilyet seemed relieved and insisted she would respond to them immediately though that had her looking to Krem,

“Oh! Wait, your lunch—I’ll see to that first, certainly—“

“Nonsense cara mia,” Papa smiled even as he offered up a put upon sigh, ruffling Krem’s hair a bit, “I spawned this child and am therefore responsible for making certain he eats for the rest of his life so long as I still draw breath,” Krem snorted quietly, shaking his head. Papa took Josephine’s hand in his and squeezing it gently before raising it to his lips, kissing her knuckles. “I’ll see to their lunch—go, handle your letters,” he insisted, enveloping her hand in both of his as he patted her hand in a motion that seemed like assurance.

“Gracias,” Josephine said, smiling warmly as she squeezed his hand before releasing it and stepping away, heels quietly clicking down the hall as she headed for her office…cheeks definitely blushy.

Maker help them all was that- were they-?

Papa was smiling…like he had been, all the time—ever since he joined the inquisition he’d just been so…so damn happy—with work and the friends he was making and with his family. And…on more than one occasion, Josephine had been part of the ‘work’ and ‘friend’ equation that directly put that smile on his father’s face so…

If she was in the running to work her way into the ‘family’ part of that equation? As long as she made his papa happy…he was down. She was sweet, had a real sense of compassion, treated everyone equally with respect. She uh…definitely reacted a hell of a lot cooler than the last person that caught sight of Krem’s binder—well, bandaging at the time—and put two and two together. Oh thank the Maker most High you are exactly as He made you! were the last words he ever expected to hear from someone just on-the-fly getting to know that personal detail about him. Kind of struck him…like it tore at something that ached—which felt stupid, it was an incredibly…now when eh thought of it, it was soothing, but he only got to realizing it was soothing when Cole helped him piece together what it soothed.

“This is nonsense—foolish nonsense! I swear, Cremisius! Sometimes I wish you were never born!”
Cole uh…brought it up when Krem first woke up that morning and Ellie was busy with pastr...y fault, Cremisius—you father won’t last a month in slavery. He’ll be dead before the year is out! Cornelius would have saved us from debt and you threw it all away over utter foolishness —and—Out! I want you out of this house or so help me, I will not be responsible for what happens! Great times that’d been.

Cole shook his head as if saying ‘no’. “It’s not that they were the last—it is that they were the first.”

“Huh?”

“You’d never put it to words with your mother before—you tried to explain, just like you had with Papa, but she wouldn’t listen, didn’t care why you were so miserable. She didn’t even care that you were so miserable. You told your mother that you are a man, finally found it in yourself to confess that truth, and she the first thing she said was she regretted making you,” Cole’s chin quivered and he raised a bruised index finger to poke at Krem’s cheek, “I’m glad she made you. Papa is too. It felt strange for you the first time you realized the Iron Bull accepted you as a man without dispute, even more strange when Ellie did the same, no explanation needed—confused until you realized they had context. You disclosed to Cassandra but that was careful, concise, you offered telling information because you felt safe enough to share it. You could have taken the time to put on armor or your binder when you went out into the cold to check on Cullen when you saw him fighting fear in Haven’s night, but you felt safe, that you would not come to harm from a man like him knowing and you were right, that was willingly displaying something you usually keep secret with strangers. Josephine has no context, no lead up, you did not build up conviction to tell her—you never had a reason to tell her so you never expected her to ever know. But then the unexpected happened and without your will in it, she saw—she saw the fullness of the kind of man you are and she loves you more for it…and she has no reason to, while your mother has every reason to love and accept you and you’ve given her time and space to get there and she still hasn’t, might never. That’s why it hurts.”

“…huh,” Krem nodded. That uh…yeah. Okay, that tracked.

“Josephine didn’t mean to make you hurt, she would never want to hurt you. Ellie is hearing to heal some of her hurts right now—if you go and see her she will feel so happy to see you! Oh, Ellie too, but she is always happy to see you…” the Spirit gave it some thought, “well…Josephine is always happy to see you too. I am too! And Sera. And the Iron Bull and Cassandra and Cullen most of the time he just worries—if you hurt Ellie’s heart he will have to be ready to turn on you—and Varric and Dorian and Skinner and—“

It uh. It was quite the list, and he’d already un…well he hadn’t sat down and thought about who was happy to see him, but he uh, figured as much anyway. He had amazing people in his life he was glad were there, and uh…they felt the same about him.

Anyway—if uh…something was going on with papa and Lady Josie? That was alright in his book. She was already important to Ellie, being important to papa didn’t change much for him—Lady was important and he made careful sure Leliana and Marehis didn’t need him for her security protocols today once he got Ellie in her bed—she stirred a little when he took her shoes off and massaged at her feet a bit, he didn’t know how she hung in there with ‘stylish’ footwear, he always hated heels, mostly because the whole ‘mother making him wear them’ thing but also because son of a bitch they hurt like hell to wear! So he plied a little gentle pressure to anything that felt painful tight in her soles before indulging in tickling the tender skin just on her insole—sent her gasping and smiling even as she softly complained “Anya, no tickling, mami’s sleepy.”

…wasn’t sure how he felt about his fingertips being mistaken for a mabari’s tongue but uh, he was wearing leather gauntlets so that was fair. He’d get washed up and lay it on down for an afternoon nap once he was back—Leliana was satisfied with how Ellie’s meeting went and she was confident her uh…security problem had been handled. She was down a few…three…more people—apparently there had been a mole in her ranks uncovered while Ellie was in Crestwood, some bloke code-named Painter betrayed one of Leliana’s agents to the Venatori. Unfortunately, Painter had friends—people in Leliana’s ranks that couldn’t believe he’d ever betray them and were resentful of Leliana ousting him after an investigation she launched on the words of a dead man in the middle of red-Templar-filled bandit territory. She laid waste to their friend, so they were trying to return the favor Krem supposed, Maker. He was relieved she was alright, that this crap would be over soon.

He popped by Bull’s room on the way back just to check on Cole…Ellie was apparently checking on him too, in the Fade, Bull and Dorian were out, taking full advantage of getting to lay around all day with the injured Spirit who peeked an eye open and smiled serenely before relaxing again, eyes closed as he offered the mental message, I am okay, my body is healing. Ellie says your mission went well! I am glad you are back and safe.

Me too buddy—good job resting, you’ll be good as new in no time. You take more potion? Anything I can get you?

You can rest and eat—I’ll be glad you are taking care of your body too!

Krem huffed a quiet laugh, closing the door carefully before he dropped by his father’s room—it was empty as he expected it to be, he still had the bulk of the things he’d brought with him in there and he stripped off his armor, Ellie got on to him about the importance of keeping everything clean…down there, after uh, sex and…yeah. So. He washed up a bit using a rag from his trunk and water from the basin before dropping the rag in his laundry bag for later, quick underthings change for good measure, he was changing out of his armor so he’d need to put on trousers anyway. Made sure his trunk was locked up and everything was at rights in the room before heading out, chestplate and gauntlets grasped tight together in one hand, armored leggings over his arm as he made the trek back to Ellie’s.

“Mijo?” Josephine’s voice called from her office as he walked by—the door was left open and he stopped, backed up a few steps to lean inside.

“What can I do for you? Everything okay my Lady?” he checked.

Josephine smiled at that, “Oh, nothing at all but thank you for your concern—I do need just a moment of your time,” she said, waving him in so he went and took a seat across from her at her desk. She nodded it was alright to put his armor down on her floor as he sat. “I apologize if I’ve interrupted you but I’ve something for you and it’s a bit sensitive—I should place it directly into your hand and then you must promise to safeguard it, Cremisius.”

“You didn’t have to get me anything—seriously, Josie yesterday wasn’t a big deal, I was just doing my job—the Chargers are here to protect you and uh…last time I checked I was still their Lieutenant. Been a minute though, Bull might’ve shaken things up while I was out with Ellie.”

She huffed a bit of a laugh at that, “It is not—it is not something I have gotten because you defended me yesterday. Cremisius…” she held up an index finger and rose up from her seat, going and closing the door to her office. “Marehis is with Eleanor now—one of Leliana’s Human associates is guarding me for the moment.”
Krem nodded, “Yeah, I laid eyes on your people as I walked by—everything was as it should be,” he assured.

“I was speaking to assure you—that we are speaking in privacy,” Josephine said as she returned to her desk, clearing her throat. “Cremisius, I am sorry something so personal was revealed to me without your intent, yesterday—if others saw and have risen issue with you, you are to let me know and I will- well it will certainly be corrected.”

Oh! “Didn’t run into anyone who doesn’t already know, and it wasn’t super noticeable,” he assured. She only realized anything because she was right up in his space looking for injured skin and found a knicked up binder. Only person he ran into was Skinner who…got in his space, sniffed him, and then grunted as she…poked him in the cheek with raised index and middlefinger, softly smacking her lips…like it was some weird substitute for kissing him on the cheek? Total weirdo, and he loved her to death. “It wasn’t a big deal, you don’t have anything to apologize for—pretty sure you weren’t the one with the knife.”

“I did grasp hold of my envelop opener,” oh shit, he did his best not to smile but damn if he couldn’t picture Josephine shanking an assassin with a delicate silver envelope opener without it looking entirely ridiculous, “I… I do not abide violence, but—” she shook herself, breathing out a shudder. Yeah, definitely wasn’t a laughing matter, “I just- when I thought that man might hurt you it felt imperative, that I should protect you—you’re more than capable in battle but…mijo you’re so young, not that much younger than my brother Antoine, my brother Claude turns fifteen in August. I look at someone as young as you and to my mind you are a child, someone to be protected because you’ve the whole of your life ahead of you left to live. I… I care for you very much on my own as it is—you are also a son, you’ve so many friends, you’re my mija’s boyfriend so your life is very precious, especially to me. so it is, in fact, a very big deal to me that you were in danger. However, that is not the point I was getting to.”

“Oh, sorry uh…so why are you giving me something for what happened yesterday?”

“It isn’t for- until yesterday I did not previously have the understanding that your gender indicators on your identification might be different from the gender you actually are. I realized that might make it difficult whenever you travel internationally, having to er… explain. You should not have to do so, and I apologize you haven’t had as much afforded to you sooner,” Josephine said, fishing something from a desk drawer she slid across the desk toward him, waiting until he took hold of it before releasing it-

It…was a very small leather-bound almost-book? It was thin, a piece of leather folded over and sewn to a tight crease as its binding, the Inquisition’s heraldry emblazon in gold on the front cover, and inside were just a few pages—one with the Inquisition’s seal stamped on the bottom of the page, Lady Josephine’s signature alongside it—then there were as many pages as there were countries south of Par Vollen, the next page had the heraldry of Anderfels stamped on it in ink, the signature line blank, but on the following page? The ink stamp was covered up by Antiva’s heraldry wax seal emblazon on it with the signature of a Judge Diaz. Then Ferelden, wax sealed, with the Arl of Redcliffe’s signature, and then the Free Marches with… huh, Rainier? A Judge Margret Rainier*, her name on the signature line. Orlais was sealed and signed by Judge Moreau, and Nevarra…was sealed and signed by a Duke Tythas Pentaghast*. Even bloody Rivain was sealed, signed by a Lord Luca Zeyase*. Tevinter was the last, just an ink stamp, no seal or signature.

“I’ve no connections to the Anderfels, though I suppose that is not so much of an issue. I did try but I’ve likewise no connections in Tevinter that could be brought to bear and they’ve very much closed off outer contact—I will keep trying, I’m certain I could get someone to sign it is just a matter of the Tevinter government allowing their leaders to sign such a thing—"

“Don’t uh…don’t sweat it I…don’t really have a reason to go back there, you know?”

“If you ever needed to I would want you to have the ability.”

“I can get in with my identification as it stands uh…what…I mean this looks neat but what is it, exactly?”

“Oh!” Josephine chirped, “I apologize, I should explain—carino, when next you find yourself crossing into another country, like our return to Ferelden, when we reach the checkpoint you can present that instead of your identification. It is a form of extraditing the travel process—if you display the booklet alone you should go unquestioned as you pass through, and at the very most, they will merely check to make certain the country you are entering is signed and sealed appropriately and you can go on your merry way.”

“But it…I mean my name’s not even in it?”

“It does not so much represent you but the body you represent—the Inquisition. it is a writ that means you are an Agent of our institution we require to travel internationally and for security reasons your identity does not need confirming. I have something similar,” she said, pulling out her own identification- oh, it did look kind of like what she’d given him only had Antiva’s, “but it is only legal for me to use when traveling on business as an Ambassador from Antiva, representing my government. Still, it does not hurt to keep on my person, I just use my formal identification for travel otherwise. You, however, are constantly on Inquisition business as of late, so there is no occasion you cannot use that as identification—even in legal circumstance. You’re a good boy, but if you were to ever get into any legal scrapes and found yourself detained by city guard, you would need only present that as your identification—they would make contact with the Inquisition and it is through that we would secure your release, they need not even know your name, your personal information, they would say they’ve detained our agent and provide your writ’s serial number, and we would proceed accordingly,” she smiled, “I would secure your release, and your father may see fit to ground you. Or are you too old for that?”

“…dunno. Papa actually gets mad enough that he says I’m grounded…I’m grounded,” he was pretty sure. Though uh…technically, grounding meant being banished to the confines of your home and Skyhold…was his home? Even if he got specific about it go to your room! you’re not allowed out except for work and meals—and that is if you’re good! technically Ellie’s quarters counted as his room now…

Damn. Maybe he wanted to be grounded? He should get grounded. Sorry Bull, can’t go out drinking tonight—I’m grounded.

Josephine was chuckling at his acceptance of being groundable at seventeen, “Very good. In all seriousness mijo, I hope it serves you well—you are to guard it, you can understand why such a document would be beyond dangerous if it fell into the wrong hands?”

Oh shit, yeah, fuck. Some asshole running around representing the Inquisition able to pass through without question? “Yeah—yes ma’am. I- wow I mean you didn’t have to do this for me—”

“Nonsense. As Tevinter does not have the laws required to acknowledge your true gender on your identification or birth certificate, I found an alternative solution. You cannot- it isn’t right that you must defend yourself while you’ve done nothing wrong merely to set foot in another part of the world you’re completely free to enter. I…understand disclosure can be an intimate thing, it is unacceptable that you must do so with strangers who have no business knowing something so personal. It is none of their business what my body looks like underneath my own clothing, neither is yours.”

That uh…yeah, it was really sinking in he- Maker, there was always…this horrible fear that came with having to show his identification. In the military he’d been given identification, that was part of the whole ‘forging official documents’ charge he got landed with so uh, he’d had to return that to the government to be disposed of once he started settling that mess, was finally able to pay off his fines thanks to Bull. Had to go back to using his legitimate papers and yeah, it was always a little panic-raising to have to address it when his identification came into play—something kind of died in him when he knew someone looking at his identification, saw ‘F’, looked up at him and…
didn’t question it, saw ‘ahh, just a tomboy’ and not ‘boy’. And then it was an altogether, sometimes-worse fear that cropped up when they saw his gender marker and looked at him and thought something was off—why was he trying to conceal his identity? They had to look through warrants, question him up one side and down the other. It…went faster when he spat out his spiel, him and Bull explaining he was aqu-anthalock, no one wanted to spend a lot of time questioning a Qunari, he just got…usually a funny look, occasional outright mockery he just had to take on the chin or hold their business up for forever dealing with the aftermath of responding to rudeness from an authority figure with defense or correction. To…be able to avoid all of that? Just, full-stop?
That- that was…

“Oh Cremisius—if I have caused offense- I assure you I had no intention,” Josephine was apologizing. For what? Oh- oh, his uh, eyes itched big time, tears welling up in them, yeah he might be crying a little. “Sweet boy I promise you if you are concerned I’ve disclosed your personal information to the persons who helped me secure this document—do not. I wrote them of you, yes—a young man who serves the Inquisition unfailingly in crucial roles without which we would suffer in our mission, and we need you to be capable of traveling unquestioned. I would never betray your confidence—in general, but especially in this matter—”

“Sorry, it’s stupid,” he sniffled, shit, he swiped at his eye with the back of his hand, “I’m not upset with you, far far from it—I wasn’t assuming you said something you shouldn’t’ve, the thought didn’t even cross my mind. Just uh…this means a lot Josie. Big time—thank you.”

She relaxed at that, nodding, “It was my pleasure. I apologize I did not arrange as much for you sooner.”

“You uh…didn’t have any reason to,” Krem shrugged, though, “I hope you don’t think…it’s because I don’t like you or something. I like you—I mean I love you for everything you’ve done for Ellie, for my father? I don’t think he’d have adjusted to life in the Inquisition so well so fast without your friendship,” he smiled, laughing a bit, “I mean, when you think about it…you’re kind of the only reason he’s here?”

She startled at that as if it was news to her. “Pardon? I don’t know what you mean?”

“Weren’t you the one who got her clothing whenever she first fell into this whole Herald thing?” when he mistook her for nobility when they first met she insisted her clothes were all Josephine’s doing. “She could have just run around in her armor all the time, gotten plainclothes for sleeping in but uh, you made sure she was appropriately outfitted for her station. If you hadn’t done that, she might never have thought of hiring a tailor for herself as a way to hire my father.
And I mean you were the one who suggested he might tailor for the inquisition as a whole—servants uniforms and things like that, offering his services to nobility—that was all you, Ellie said.”

Josephine was blushing, ducking her head shyly, “That…it was merely a suggestion, a product of bouncing ideas off of one another once Eleanor informed me she wished to replace her former tailor with one from Tevinter using the agreement she struck with Magister Tilani.”

Uh huh, yeah yeah, Lady was way too humble sometimes, Krem would always be grateful for her help getting his father back. He shook his head, let it be, “My point is, me not disclosing to you—it had absolutely nothing to do with you. I mean I like Cabbot fine, but I don’t have any reason to disclose to him so I haven’t…to my knowledge—he serves some killer booze,” Krem couldn’t help but grin, huffing a laugh when Josephine smiled at his jest. “I have nothing but respect Madam de Fer but I’ve never said ‘hey, by the way, this is what I’ve got going on under my clothes’—Sera’s one of my best friends and I haven’t done that with her either…that’s probably why she is one of my best friends, really, things like that don’t even matter to her. Everyone who knows only does because either I’ve had a reason to tell them or they’ve figured it out on their own because of circumstance or knowing someone else like me. I mean, I fit makes you feel better—I’ve never disclosed to Ellie. Granted her magic told her what was up, but still. It applies kind of—I’ve never had a reason to sit her down and tell her what was up, so I haven’t. There was never any reason to disclose to you so…I didn’t. That doesn’t mean I don’t love or trust you.”

“Thank you, Cremisius—I understand, truly, it’s entirely your business, and I’m grateful for your trust now.”

“And uh…honestly? You reacted…really well. It meant a lot to me, what you said?”

“Well, I meant it, I assure you…Cremisius, if there is anything I can ever do for you—if you ever need to talk or um, need support, I would always listen.”

Krem had to stop himself from laughing—Lady was being sweet, it was just…Maker he felt like he had his choice of adults to go to for guidance and support—Papa, Bull, Cassandra it wasn’t that it was funny it…was a good kind of overwhelming. “Thanks, I really appreciate it.”

Josephine smiled warmly, though that slipped as it looked like she just remembered something, “Oh mijo! Lo siento—lunch! Your father should have it ready by now and you must to be famished—come, oh you’ve not had a moments respite since you’ve returned,” she fretted as she rose from her desk, coming around to see him out or, well, he just realized what she just realized—he had his armor to carry and the writ was small but he didn’t really have anywhere to put it at the moment, so, “here, I’ll carry this shall I?” oh, she took the little leatherbound writ in hand, and made to follow him, she smiled when he offered his arm. “Thank you, Lieutenant.”

Though uh, guy couldn’t please every Antivan woman in the building he supposed—he could hear Papa’s voice as they neared Ellie’s room, Marehis’s offering some laughing reply as Ellie giggled. Which came to an abrupt halt as he and Josephine stepped into the room, “Oi!” Ellie complained, “Tia! Hands off my Aclassi guy—get your own!” Mmm, subtle as always.

“Mija, I’m appalled—you’ve always been one to share…”she took a moment to look the girl over, seated with her legs curled up underneath her on the bed, hair falling out of its braid, still wearing the dress she picked out for partying it up that morning, half eaten sandwich in her hand. “I’m genuinely appalled you’re eating in bed in your lovely dress.”

“I’m hungry and sleepy and changing is soo,” she waved her hand toward the partition her robe and sleep clothes were hanging over, like it was so far out of reach and she had no strength to get up and go all the way over there, change, and come all the way back “It was either eat naked or eat in my dress, tia. I mean I’m cool with it but mami says its rude when I have guests.”
Krem smiled as he crossed the room, kissing her on one cheek as he raised the other the other to brush crumbs off the opposite corner of her mouth. “Thanks for not traumatizing Papa—I mean I’d get it, but he’d feel real improper. Some rot about ‘manners’ or ‘decorum’ or something.”

Ellie giggled as she patted a bit of empty space on the bed beside her, “Come on—get comfy and eat, Papa brought us food! He’s the sweetest and I love him! So much!”

“Oh, it was my distinct pleasure bella mia,” Papa assured warmly, tweaking at her nose a bit before dropping a kiss to her hair. Oh man it was…

…he was pretty sure his heart was never going to not threaten to burst when moments like this crept up on him. Like the realization sweeping over him again—the one he’d had the moment he got to the top of the stairs and saw his father alive and well for the first time in years followed by the realization his father wasn’t just here he was staying. His father was here, and he was proud of him and loved this life they had—loved the girl he loved. He didn’t realize it, how much it would mean to him, his father approving the life he was living but every time there were these pure moments of acceptance?

He…Maker he loved his damn life.

He had a key to the nightstand while they were using the Marchands—Ellie’d given him the key so…well, first night it was just in case they did ever have a moment to themselves, a place to secure his harness so it wasn’t just somewhere anyone could find it and it was close at hand. When he came to bunk with her last night he’d added his shaving kit and things so—double locks, a locked nightstand and a locked box, hopefully that would keep the writ safe. He’d take it with him when he went out, there was a sturdy pocket in his belt for things like that, parchment, important documents. Maker, he still—it felt crazy the Ambassador had done something like that for him and he was more than a little nervous it might backfire on them somehow. This was…a lot, and she trusted him so, he definitely wasn’t going to let her down. Josie followed him to the bed, offered the stack of letters she brought along for him and he smiled his thanks, putting them in the drawer before closing it up and putting his armor away in the mostly empty armoire Ellie showed him to when he joined her last night. He was in his plainclothes, worn one of his nicer tunics under his armor since they had such a fancy location to go to, Ellie smiled when she realized he was wearing red too, “We’re matchy!” she squeaked, leaning forward and pressing a kiss to his cheek as he sat beside her on the bed, “Mwah! I love it! I’m wearing green tonight if you wanna match on our date!”

If it pleased her so much? He’d match her every day of the week, damn…actually now it struck him that yeah, Papa’d been making him tunics, dropping them off in his quarters every once in a while since he got back, each one a different color that…yeah, were the same colors of new things in Ellie’s wardrobe. “I’ll see what I can do,” he said, smiling when she nodded enthusiasm and then…huh, she checked her watch and then looked up at him, tapping the clock face discretely like she was only trying to get just his attention on what time it was…nearly two in the afternoon? What was important about-

Mouth dried up a bit when he went to ask her—she just stretched her arms overhead, twisting a bit, looking him directly in the eye, giving him a bit of a look like there was something he should catch on to—oh! Yeah it’d been a few hours since he last stretched so yeah, he followed suit, arms over his head, copying her as she lowered her arms behind her to stretch some more—had to lean forward to do so while sitting down so, it worked for pecking a little ‘thank you’ kiss to her lips for reminding him.
“Did you have a pleasant time at the party, da’mi?” Marehis asked, she and papa were seated on the bed before them, Josephine had joined them, sitting on papa’s other side. Mare’ was right in front of Krem so she was able to reach out and stroke his hair a bit—was sweet, she did that sometimes.

“Yeah, it was pretty nice—garden was pretty amazing,” he offered up, trying not to smile too much when Ellie leaned in, giggling into his shoulder as she sat more on her hip to sit against him while they ate. Wasn’t sure if it was just wanting to be close to him…or to more easily sneak bites of pickle off of his plate when they fell out of his sandwich like that made them fair game—though he put his sandwich down for a minute to sip at his soup and when he picked it back up there was a bit more meat in it than there’d been when he put it down so…that was fair. They ate their fills, chatting with the adults as they ate—Josephine offering to get them more if they were still hungry, saying she could return their tray to the kitchens but Papa beat her to it,

Josephine sighed, “I will be joining you and helping clean up,” she insisted before turning her attention to Krem and Ellie, “Do either of you have need of anything else? You’ve time to rest and relax before your dinner reservation—Cremisius, your father and I will meet you in the Summer Bazaar at a quarter until eight so we may head to the theatre together—“ Josie gasped. “Oh dear—the theatre never did send a courier, I’ll have to contact them.”

“It’s been handled, my Lady,” Papa assured, the woman looking up at him, confused.

“What do you mean?”

Papa shrugged. “The Courier came to the estate yesterday afternoon…as a recipient of one of the tickets, I was able to sign what he needed and send him on his way.”

“But I- you didn’t have the payment I prepared- Tonio Aclassi!” uh-oh.

“I’m sorry cara mia, is there a problem?” Papa was…smiling at the prospect that he might’ve just ticked off Josephine.

“Yes!” she informed him, “You- I demand you-! You cannot just-!” she seemed at a loss for words.

“I’m sorry, but I’m a free man, am I not?” Papa wondered, “I’ve money I’m free to spend as I please?”

“I- you- I cannot even- “ Josephine blustered, stomping her foot before she declared, “My wits end, Mister Aclassi! I’m at my wits end—furious! You- you can do such things, but you should not have!”

"Why ever not?”

“Because I have said so!”

“Hmm…” Papa seemed to consider it, “Now, I’ve not Cole’s innate ability to quote thought or memory with accuracy, but…I do not recall you laying down such a boundary yesterday. If you had, I quite assure you tesora, I would have discussed it with you beforehand. You’ve my sincerest apologies for my unwitting transgression-“

“I-! You’re not allowed-oh! You are allowed to do anything you please within reason and the law but I would ask that you cease speaking for- for a moment! Allow me to compose an articulate argument, honestly! You are the most- you’re infuriating!”
“Apparently.”

“Do not laugh at me!”

“I assure you I am not—I’m smiling but not laughing. How could I not smile when in your company tesora?”

“Do desist being so pleasant we- we are- this is not a pleasant conversation!”

 “…are we having a disagreement?” he wondered.

“Yes!” Josephine informed him.

“Have we met an impasse?” Was this…was he flirting? Was this what he and Ellie looked like when they argued? ‘cause Josie looked a half-hearted sort of miffed, where yeah she had something she was genuinely upset about but she was having a hard time staying upset about it… and papa looked absolutely delighted, like he enjoyed the woman’s reaction and he was pleased to rise to the challenge of figuring out just how to set things to rights.

“Absolutely!”

“May I offer a compromise?” he asked. Josephine nodded, albeit reluctant. “You’ll allow me this indulgence—treating yourself and these wonderful children we have the company of to a night of the theatre—and I will allow you to treat me in kind when we’ve returned to Skyhold.”

“We have dinner regularly in Skyhold and our meals are compensated!”

“Oh my Lady, I assure you, I’m no cheap date. We’ll dine in Skyhold’s finest establishment, and nothing less.”

“It does not matter where we eat in Skyhold! Oh! I am taking you to dinner tomorrow evening and you will order the most expensive thing on the menu so help me!”

“I see your counter offer, Ambassador. Once more—you may take me to dinner tomorrow evening and I will have my choice of meal—I’m not cheap but neither am I one for fish eggs or snails.”

“That is…fair. This was exhausting.”

“There is time to nap—you should lie down.”

“I will. After we do the dishes! Do not distract me!”

“Oh, I wouldn’t dream of it.” Holy. Shit. Papa was flirting.

…did Papa have game? Papa might have game.

Josephine sighed. “I apologize for losing my temper—do forgive me, Tonio…Eleanor, Cremisius, Marehis,” she nodded to the Elf woman who sat watching with wide-eyed delight, a hand over her mouth to hide her amused smile. Ellie’s was currently pressed into Krem’s shoulder, he was pretty sure she was holding back a scream of joy after watching such an encounter. They uh…yeah, something was up.

“Nothing to forgive,” Krem spoke up for them, shrugging. Found a bit of fun in being the one to say, “Papa, stop giving Josie so much grief.”
Guy didn’t look super sorry but, “I do apologize—I hope my Lady can forgive me?”

“I will take the matter under consideration,” Josephine supposed.

“Is there nothing that might serve in my favor?”

“I could be swayed,” she allowed, “Have you plans before dinner?”

“To earn your forgiveness, of course.”

“Then you will pay penance in that tea you make and the use of your reading voice. We’ll have an afternoon of leisurely reading.”

“I’m to read aloud?”

“Yes. You do so well, I wish to continue my book but I might truly nap,” Josephine halted in the door, “Eleanor—it is a book Cassandra thought you might also enjoy. I’m not far into it if you wish to join us?”

“…will there be proper cuddling space? Ideally for three to four people.” Ellie wanted to know, “Follow up question—tea and…?”

“The sitting room just down the hall with a wonderful fireplace—there are multiple couches, the one for ‘fainting’ is particularly wide but any one of them would be suitable I believe. And I’m certain we can find some sort of appropriate accompaniment for the tea,” Josephine assured.

“Does that sound okay to you, Cremisius? Mami, you’ll come be cuddly?”

“Certainly da’vehnan…three to four people?” the woman wondered.

“Ellie, me, you and Cole,” Krem supplied, earning a kiss on the cheek from Ellie for knowing just where her thoughts went, “We miss the poor guy, and he likes listening to people read.”

“Plus the Iron Bull and Dorian might need a break.”

Krem snorted. “They’ve been in bed all day entertaining company they can’t get up to much around except thinking about what they’d like to get up to. Cole’s probably the one who needs the break,” he smiled as he pressed his lips against the top of her head before he assured, “I’ll go get him—you get comfy. Sleep shirts are in the top drawer.”

“That’s why you’re my favorite boyfriend.”

Hell yeah he was!

Lazy afternoon felt like just what the Healer ordered. Cole was looking a lot better, more color in his cheeks, and the guy definitely had some of his strength back—no pressure meant no pressure so Krem carefully took him up in his arms—Cole wrapped his arms around Kerm’s neck, had a pretty solid hug the whole way to the sitting room the Spirit directed him to since uh…place was pretty big and he was pretty sure there were exactly, no exaggeration at all, a hundred sitting rooms and at least a dozen of them were on the same hall as Ellie’s quarters. Josie was already pretty comfortable, reclining on a loveseat, pillows at her back she could really just fall asleep against if she was in the market for a nap. Papa sat in a wingbacked chair alongside her, near the fireplace with a book in hand, reading glasses perched on the tip of his nose. Ellie was sprawled out on the fainting couch, hair loose and he was not sure what the pants situation was because she was in one of his sleep shirts, thick knitted blanket pooling in her lap…with an empty plate she was handing back to Marehis, with just a dusting of cookie crumbs left as evidence apparently there had been something to go with the tea. Girl looked equal parts mischievous and apologetic and that was enough to just- Maker she was cute, was she allowed to be that cute? Once Krem got Cole situated, seated on the edge of the couch while Krem laid it down next to his girl, pressed a kiss to her lips, caught the barest bit of flavor left from her snacking and whispered a soft “Thanks, cookies were good—chocolate chip, right? Yum.” sending her blushing as she waved Cole on. Let the Spirit—oof—get his full-body cuddle on, guy liked either being little spoon, or laying directly on top of you, there was literally no in-between, today’s position of choice was the latter. Ellie settled against Krem’s side and Marehis joined them after a while—woman had paced around the room while papa started reading, but she eventually laid next to Ellie, wrapping her arms around her daughter’s waist, fingers tickling at Krem’s side in a gentle heads-up her hands were about to be sandwiched between them. It was a pretty cozy set up and he had zero complaints.

“Me neither,” Cole hummed out contentedly, awe. Guy loved getting the hair at back of his head scratched, Ellie’s Marked hand was obliging as the girl half-dozed against Krem’s shoulder listening to Papa read. Few hours just laying around, being warm and comfortable listening to Papa read over the sound of his pocketwatch ticking—he left it out and open, resting on the arm of his chair while he read, eyes drifting to the clock face every few page-turns.

“…I believe this is as good a place as any to stop, would you agree, my Lady?” Papa wondered, smiling wider when he realized the woman was fast asleep. Krem uh…might’ve closed his eyes then because he was pretty sure everyone was on different levels of zonking out—Marehis was probably technically awake just resting her eyes, and Ellie’s hand was lax on the back of Cole’s neck, and uh, Krem was decently sure the wetness seeping into the shoulder of his shirtsleeve was drool, and the Spirit was doing his best to rest. So…no prying eyes…until Krem heard the soft rustle of fabric as his father rose from his seat, and he peeked his eye open to…not spy. Just. Recognizance. Papa was up, and then down, on one knee at Josie’s side, smiling softly as he brushed a loose tendril of hair out of the Antivan woman’s face and murmured softly, “Cara mia? It’s nearing five, you instructed I keep track.”

“Hmm…” Josephine hummed a bit as she woke up, “Oh. Oh, Tonio I apologize, you needn’t’ve kept reading,” she sat up, raising a hand to papa’s cheek, “you’ve been reading aloud for hours—your throat must be hoarse.”

“Hardly—too, was I not serving penance for crossing my Lady? I hope I’m forgiven.”

“Oh I did not mean to genuinely allot true punishment—let’s get you some tea, come along sweet man,” Josie took Papa’s hand as she rose from the couch, smoothing her skirts. Krem stopped his peeping just a split second before she cleared her throat, “Mijos? Eleanor, Cremisius, it is time to prepare for tonight. Cole, carino, how are you feeling sweet boy?”

“Oh, it does feel nice when she calls you that!” Cole was happy to announce oh- Krem kept his eyes closed, hiding his face against Ellie’s hair because he uh…yeah, it was nice—same way it was nice when Cassandra or Marehis called him ‘sweet man’ or ‘da’mi’. Did he have mommy-issues? “Yes.” Oi! Mind your own conversation! Josie just asked you something bud you should talk to her—it’s rude not to, remember? “Oh! My body feels a lot better, it doesn’t hurt so very much. It still feels tired though,” his brow furrowed a bit, “I’ve been resting all day, I promise. I think I did it wrong.”

“Awe, no honey—you’re doing a really great job,” Ellie let out a sleepy sigh as she opened her eyes and smiled to the Spirit, “You’ve been resting just fine—your body’s been using energy all day for processing potion and healing up, if you hadn’t been resting you wouldn’t feel any better at all! It takes a lot to heal—Dorian and Bull are going out tonight so you can get cozy their beds, I’ll have you get a little more potion in your system before we leave tonight, apply some fresh Elf Root cream to your ankle—would you feel comfortable trying a few sips of my sleeping potion? You’ve been doing well with potion that has similar ingredients—it might coax your body into a few hours of actual sleep—Stitches will be checking in on you to make sure you’re your body doesn’t react negatively, and you should be perking up again by the time we get back and Cremisius will help you test your ankle out to make sure it’s healing how we think it should. If sleeping potion works well you can try a little more if you want to get a good night’s rest and come morning you’ll be back to happy healthy Cole!” As opposed to happy but hurting Cole, yeah, that sounded better. “Mwah!”

“You heard the lady,” Krem said, “Lets get you set up.”

Pretty sweet set up—he and Ellie made sure the Spirit was comfortable, stuck around a minute, each of them holding his hands to comfort him as he relaxed and his body fell asleep. Breathing was normal and he reached out to Ellie’s magic she said, nothing concerning, just warm assurance that he was alright.

There was something kind of homey about getting ready for their date together? Ellie helping him with his binder, pressing a little kiss to the leather over his shoulder once it was secure. And uh…well Maker, he wasn’t sure what the hell but his throat dried right up when she stepped out from behind the partition and turned her back and asked him to help her button up. Hair was gathered high on the back of her head in a big fluffy ponytail which was a look but it also helped with keeping it out of range of his task. Lots of buttons, pearls that lined her spine, but most of them were done up except for the top ten, the highest most where her collar stopped just below her hair line, yeah, might be a bear for her to get to on her own. This opaque lace emerald green number with a high collar, long sleeves that tapered at the back of her hands, floor length skirt that fell clean from her hips. She smiled her thanks when he got her buttoned up and waved her to seat herself on the edge of her bed legs swinging as she waited.

“Black ones pretty please!”

Ahh, boots…kind of fun to help put on, Ellie blushing as he raised her skirt to her knees with one hand as he slid the zipper closed, lip tugging between her teeth as she smiled and smoothed her skirt once he was finished.

“Feeling shy, Inquisitor?” he wondered gently, teasingly.

“Not shy at all, Cremisius, just…after this morning I just want to make it perfectly clear—you’re the only person I truly wish to seduce,” oh…oh Maker, he rose up to his feet when she did, boots gave her just a bit more height, smile closer to kiss but not…quite yet, breath warm against his neck as she quietly assured him, “When…I wear more revealing things—just any one can see what I’m showing off, anyone who sees me, if they’re not you? They’re not getting anything special.”

“…and uh…when you dress like this?”

She smiled her approval, “This means there’s a more private viewing in store, for a specific audience with a single member—you. This morning any old person could’ve been able to tell I wasn’t wearing a bra. Tonight? Well, you’ll be the only one to see for yourself,” she raised up on her toes a bit, lips just a breath away, “are you curious Cremisius?”

“Can you blame me?” he played along as he wrapped his arms around her, hand on her back for uh, support as she rose up on her toes to kiss him…other hand just—left hand, wasn’t as dominant, didn’t get as much attention from his brain so it was a bit of a simpleton, didn’t know any better than to just automatically rest on her bottom- oh. Maker.

Dress was skin tight, smooth beneath his fingers.

“Care to make an educated guess?” she teased.

“My guess is you might risk feeling a little uh…cold tonight, lovely.”

“Well, the Inquisition’s nothing without a little risk, huh?”

Val Royeaux was turning out to be pretty spectacular. Maker—Lady Josephine knew how to plan a good time. Restaurant she got Krem and Ellie set up in had been spectacular—great food, no weird stuff or bizarrely tiny portions…so much so Krem almost didn’t have it in him to move except to recline in his seat and stare at the ceiling, his attention only captured by Ellie cautioning, “Cremisius…don’t freak out.”

Yup, that had him sitting upright in his seat and looking to his girl who uh…was seated with her arms crossed on the table top, resting her head on them, wait shit, was she sick or- she sighed, “I’m pretty sure I’m pregnant.”

Oh. Maker help them all, he snorted, laughter bubbling up in his throat, “Food baby?”

Nodded her head, without looking up “Uh-huh.”

“Alright—I’ll get the check, dunno if the courthouse’ll be open this late but I’m sure we can find someone willing to get a judge for the Herald of Andraste—you’ll set a new trend for green wedding dresses, unless you wanna wardrobe change?”

That got her looking up at him, eyes alight with mischief as she accused, “Cremisius Acassi are you trying to make an honest woman out of me just because I’m with your food-child?”

“S’only the right thing to do.”

Oi! Girl poked him in the face as she leveled an accusatory finger in his direction, “No proposing to me just because you feel obligated—marriage is also the last thing you want out of obligation, tied with sex!”

“Agreed,” he smiled, taking her hand and rubbing circles, “Just teasing. No worries, lovely,” raised her Marked hand to his lips, “You’ll know when I’m serious.”

Yup, that was fun, sent her cheeks burning red before she leaned to press her lips softly to his cheek. And she left her hand in his like a permanent thing, the whole way to the theatre…Papa and Josie looked pretty cozy too. Nothing inappropriate just, Lady was walking hip to hip, arm in arm with the Tailor, and uh…Krem got a bit distracted when Ellie apparently found her seat wanting, decided his lap was more suitable, sighing contentedly as she settled back against his chest, gave him a more up close view, Maker she was excited it was almost more entertaining to watch her watching the play so…he almost—almost—didn’t notice when Josephine’s hand slipped into Papa’s about ten minutes in. Though that hand went to her mouth as her expression broke out in startled surprise, she uh…hadn’t expected…the play* was about this well-off family that opened their home to boarders and ultimately a conman—guy pretending he was this holy man, a false ‘Priest’ playing a devout and pious Andrasten, whose love for the Maker inspired the man who owned manor to write him into his will, take the Priest in as a part of the family and only a few members suspected the man wasn’t all he was made out to be. Josie apparently hadn’t anticipated the er…Priest would attempt to seduce the lady of the house and uh…they got pretty into it. Guy was open-mouth kissing his castmate on the neck and the actress was…pretty vocal. Ambassador startled, slapping her hand over her mouth while the other, armed with a fan she snapped open to block Krem and Ellie’s view while she clenched her eyes shut. Didn’t do much to stop the screechy-moans or somehow amplified wet sucking sound that smacked off the walls of the theatre for what was probably less than a minute but felt like it dragged out five before papa’s chucklelaced,

“I think we’re safe.”

“Goodness—my apologies mijos I hope you are not scarred.”

“Insulted—what was even the point?” first time Ellie used the little opera binoculars Marehis in an attendant’s uniform had slipped them when they entered the private box, the Inquisitor raised them to her eyes now, squinting down at the actors on stage, “he just got her neck all slobbery—go big or go home!”

“Carina, shhh,” Josephine gently reprimanded though she was blushing and smiling like she’d found some amusement, still, “do mind your volume.”

“Me?” Ellie offered a giggle whisper to Krem, waving a hand in the direction of the stage, “she’s the one screaming her head off over getting drooled on.”

Krem snorted softly, smiling as he quietly supposed, “Guess that’s why it’s called acting.”

Play was right stressful when member after member of the family got disowned because they decried against the con Priest in their midst—but eventually, once the lord of the manor himself got screwed over by realizing the guy was after his wife and his fortune the whole time when he got booted from his own home. Ellie’d sat all the way forward on Krem’s lap—out in out gasping when the Priest revealed the document the lord of the manor had signed himself signing over his estate to the Priest. Krem couldn’t help but laugh softly when Ellie heaved a sigh of relief and relaxed entirely against him as the Emperor of Orlais showed up to save the day and cast the priest out, return the home to its rightful family. His laughter earned him a pout he indulged in kissing away. Peeped over at the adults to make sure they weren’t giving them a show or anything but uh…Josephine had her arm looped through Papa’s like she’d hugged it when the happy ending began unfolding, the Ambassador resting her head on the Tevinter man’s shoulder and uh…oh man, Papa was smiling as he dropped a kiss to Josephine’s hair.

Felt like he was about to spill over as he held his tongue the whole way back to base—though he just about forgot what he was keeping quiet when they went to check on Cole.

Guy had a visitor.

Madam Vivienne de Fer was seated primly in a chair at the Spirit’s bedside, tome poised in her hand as she crisply turned the page before lowering her book to look to the young couple.
"Ahh. Lieutenant, Eleanor, my treasures—you’ve had a marvelous evening I hope?"

Ellie nodded. "Si Tia. How was your night?" she wondered, sounding almost cautious.
Confused, because uh…what exactly was the Enchanter here for?
"I was meditating to clear the last bit of Lyrium from my system before finding my bed this evening."

Ellie gasped at that, "Oh gosh, did something happen? Was there an attack?" she worried. Oh yeah, Madam wasn't big on Lyrium unless she absolutely had to take it.

"Do not fret so, child. I'd an experiment this afternoon that required intensive, continuous use of magic, I took draught to ensure I would be able to work uninterrupted. As to my being here, whilst I was meditating the...Spirit was in the Fade. Nervous, as it is apparently his first time with a sleeping body, he apparently became discontent to stay within his sleeping form and escaped to the Fade only to wander the Marchand estate until he could not find his way back. I allowed him to follow me. I...was merely keeping him company, making certain that he did not endure further duress. As he is an acceptable ally and...your friend," the woman cleared her throat, snapping her book closed in one hand while the other brushed at her thighs before she rose from her seat. "As you have returned, I trust he is well at hand? If you'll excuse me."

Ellie and Krem shared something of a wide-eyed look as the woman left them, that had been...strange, but sweet they supposed? Maybe Madam wasn't quite so put off by the Spirit as she liked to let on.

Cole was drowsy as all get out when they woke him, Ellie gently pressing different places on his foot and ankle before she tested guiding his foot to tilt forward and then back and when that went without incident Krem got an arm up under him, supporting his back as he sat up and looping the Spirit's arm over his shoulders to help him rise up off the bed an tentatively test putting pressure on his ankle.

"It is sore but I can walk on it," Cole affirmed, and he unwound his arm from around Krem's shoulders to test that theory, letting out- oh Maker, a giggly squeal as he fell into Krem who caught him quick, it didn't hurt to put pressure on his foot, he was unsteady on them, "my feet work but they don't want to."

"Yeah buddy, lets take a lap and get you back in bed."

"Great job!" Ellie encouraged, as she helped him get Cole horizontal again—Spirit flopped onto the bed, it took a little bit to get him laying with his neck supported, feet at the foot of the bed, and she pulled his blankets up, made sure he was—in her medical opinion—snuggly before she doled a kiss to his forehead, brushing his hair out of his face, "Okay carino—you did so so so good today. Do you want more sleeping potion or do you just want to let it wear off? I still want you resting the rest of the night—your ankle healed up perfect, your body will feel good as new getting to fully rest without having to process anything heavy from tonic or ointment, and you should wake up without any soreness and all of your energy back."

"I was scared, at first it was strange to be in my sleeping body. Madam de Fer read to me, her voice is honey when it doesn't harm. I was able to get more comfortable with going inside my body while it slept," the Spirit blushed as he softly confessed, "I...I think I liked sleeping. I would like to try again."

"Then sleeping potion it is!" Ellie announced, fetching the bottle from the night stand and helping him sit up to drink it before he laid content and comforted under his blankets, "Dorian and Bull will be here when you wake up and we'll be excited to see you in the morning! Tomorrow's free and clear so once you're all better we can go Hurt Hunting okay?"

"Oh...that would be so nice," the boy breathed oh man, a few tears slipped down his cheeks, "thank you for loving me so much, for being my friends. My body being so hurt was scary, but you made me feel safe.”

“You are safe,” Krem promised, raising the Spirit’s hand to press his knuckles to his lips before giving his hand a few solid pats, “don’t worry about a thing. Think happy thoughts and get some good rest.”

Guy was out like a light in no time so they left him to sleep. And it was a little fun to have a bit of a swing in pace—one second of Krem and Ellie sighing in relief before…an admittedly, dare he say devilish? Smile broke out on his face and he whisked the girl up into his arms, arms supporting her knees and back as he started the walk back to her quarters, Ellie letting out a surprised squeak,

“You are safe,” Krem promised, raising the Spirit’s hand to press his knuckles to his lips before giving his hand a few solid pats, “don’t worry about a thing. Think happy thoughts and get some good rest.”

Guy was out like a light in no time so they left him to sleep. And it was a little fun to have a bit of a swing in pace—one second of Krem and Ellie sighing in relief before…an admittedly, dare he say devilish? Smile broke out on his face and he whisked the girl up into his arms, arms supporting her knees and back as he started the walk back to her quarters, Ellie letting out a surprised squeak,

“You are safe,” Krem promised, raising the Spirit’s hand to press his knuckles to his lips before giving his hand a few solid pats, “don’t worry about a thing. Think happy thoughts and get some good rest.”

Guy was out like a light in no time so they left him to sleep. And it was a little fun to have a bit of a swing in pace—one second of Krem and Ellie sighing in relief before…an admittedly, dare he say devilish? Smile broke out on his face and he whisked the girl up into his arms, arms supporting her knees and back as he started the walk back to her quarters, Ellie letting out a surprised squeak,

“You are safe,” Krem promised, raising the Spirit’s hand to press his knuckles to his lips before giving his hand a few solid pats, “don’t worry about a thing. Think happy thoughts and get some good rest.”

Guy was out like a light in no time so they left him to sleep. And it was a little fun to have a bit of a swing in pace—one second of Krem and Ellie sighing in relief before…an admittedly, dare he say devilish? Smile broke out on his face and he whisked the girl up into his arms, arms supporting her knees and back as he started the walk back to her quarters, Ellie letting out a surprised squeak,

“You are safe,” Krem promised, raising the Spirit’s hand to press his knuckles to his lips before giving his hand a few solid pats, “don’t worry about a thing. Think happy thoughts and get some good rest.”

Guy was out like a light in no time so they left him to sleep. And it was a little fun to have a bit of a swing in pace—one second of Krem and Ellie sighing in relief before…an admittedly, dare he say devilish? Smile broke out on his face and he whisked the girl up into his arms, arms supporting her knees and back as he started the walk back to her quarters, Ellie letting out a surprised squeak,
“Would you like to take a bath with me, Cremisius?”

He uh…definitely liked the implications of Ellie and bathing. And she did have a pretty amazing tub in this room and…they’d never bathed together before but that was a thing people did, right? First thought that flashed across his brain was, he couldn’t bind, at least it wasn’t the best thing to sit and let his binder soak, but that was dumb— it wasn’t dumb, just, he’d gone around without his binder on under his shirt lots of times around Ellie, and he’d taken his binder off the first time they were together and uh…that’d gone well, really well he…hadn’t gone that route before, he’d always left it on during uh, sex. He’d never been with anyone he felt like he could risk being that open with and it…it was her first time, something she’d never done before and…she’d never done before, Ellie was making herself vulnerable and trusting him completely with it, so he felt it was only right to meet her half way with that, trust her in return and that trust had been rewarded—there wasn’t even a moment of trepidation in him that followed his binder hitting the floor. So…this shouldn’t be a problem. He wasn’t sure why the question that somehow hit him like it was perfectly reasonable request and like she’d just asked if he’d like to go fight a dragon in his birthday suit.

Oh. Cuz he…couldn’t wear anything in a bath. Every other situation there was always…he’d never had every single part of himself entirely bare—he’d gone without his binder but he’d had his harness that first time. He hadn’t considered that as a form of covering until now and-“Cremisius?” Oh Ellie was sitting up, his hand in hers as she brushed his hair back, “What is it, carino?”

“Uhh…”

“Hey,” and she smiled, gently, closing her eyes as she pressed a soft kiss to his forehead. “It’s okay if you don’t want to.”

“I want to, definitely,” he promised, just, “Just nervous.”

“Then we’ll figure it out,” she promised in return. “Whatever you need, okay? If you want to work through it together, we can. Or I can give you privacy and you can get in first if you think that will be more comfortable. If it’s something we can’t get to tonight, mi amor, that only means that maybe we’ve something to look forward to in the future.”

Maker that was…he’d known she’d get it but damn.

“Can’t think of anything in the world I can’t work through with you, El.”

Her nose crinkled up with her smile at that, “Me neither, guapo. I’ll follow your lead, whatever you need. Say the word—this is just like any other situation with our bodies, we’ve got every bit of say in what does and doesn’t go on with them, you need to stop, we stop,” she fanned herself a bit, “I mean I might need to stop—I’m serious Cremisius I just barely caught my breath, and I mean you getting all sexy and sudsy in the bath- seriously I might have an asthma attack just thinking about it.”

“…just like all situations with your breathing, say the word and I’ll get you potion,” Krem returned. “C’mere, turn about—first things first; buttons.”

That was something he could handle no problem. Start off easy with something that would take him a bit of time—might not of had to but he undid every last button from the nape of her neck to her tailbone, pressed a kiss to the back of her neck when he was finished, let her tug at her sleeves to pull the dress forward, down her arms before she turned to face him, blushing softly as she held out her hands for him to take—yeah, she might need off the bed to get her dress off, pushing it down and stepping out before laying it out on the bed, offering up a cheeky smile as she put her hands on her hips and announced, “Record time!” real proud of herself, and then she was close, rising up on her toes as she pulled on his tunic a bit so he ducked his head so she could capture his lips in a kiss, “I’ll run the bath,” then, “Cremisius….the entire future of our relationship relies solely on your answer to this next question,” she intoned with grave severity, staring him right in the eye. “Bubbles…or no bubbles?”

He blew out a breath, that uh…that was a tough one. But, after some careful consideration, “Bubbles.”

“Lord Woolsley lives to see another day as a single man,” she informed him, patting him on the shoulder before slipping away to set about getting the bath ready, her back to him as she crouched at the side of the sunken tub. Smile tugged at his lips when she sat down at the edge of the tub, bottom meeting the cold marble floor sent her letting out a little squeak as she shivered, extending a leg to turn the faucet with her foot, legs swinging as she waited for it to fill, humming quietly to herself. Giving him a minute. Cool.

Socks, boots, shucked them no problem, threw his tunic on the bed next to her dress started in on the laces of his binder and uh, “You wanna help a fella out?”

Little bit of a splash as she pulled her knees up to her chest and spun around on her bottom, rocking forward onto her knees and then back to rise up, arms shooting out to steady herself when she nearly slipped and fell before beaming a smile his way and giving him a thumbs up like she hadn’t nearly bitten it, every aspect of her rise was intentional.

“You know lovely, you should consider a career in ballet.”

“Right?!?” she agreed, coming to him and meeting his gaze before she began undoing the laces under his left arm while he had a go at the ones on his right before slipping it off over his head, Ellie setting it down carefully on the bed, her finger rubbing over the scar in the leather from his assassin encounter the other day before she turned to face him, smiling softly as she asked, “Alright handsome, how do you wanna do this?”

He sighed, taking her hands in his, bringing her Marked hand up to kiss her Fade-lit palm. “I uh…if you want to…”

Unmarked index finger went to his lips to hush him, “There are exactly zero situations in which I don’t want to, I literally only need your permission. You’re cool with me undressing you, where, when, why is inconsequential—I’m down, it’s done. Here, in the street, in the Great Hall, at Mother Giselle’s funeral,” girl leaned to her left to rap her Fadelit knuckles against the mahogany bedpost. “Done!”

Snorted softly at that. Maker help him, alright, “Alright lovely. Healer way—battlefield tactics.”

“Meticulous and quick—you got it guapo,” she nodded, and then her hands were low, unbuttoning his trousers and then her thumbs- he definitely didn’t have a problem with the way her thumbs slipped between the fabric of his waistband and his skin. She had a solid grip on his trousers and underthings, meeting his eye as she said, “On three. One,” tip toeing it to press a kiss to his jaw, “two,” another at the base of his throat-

Before she was dropping, dragging his clothing down and letting him step out of it before tossing them over her shoulder as she knelt before him, looking up at him with eyes alight. “Do you trust me, Cremisius?” He found himself nodding dumbly. For a moment he thought- he wasn’t sure what he thought, Ellie’d…taken to sex with as much enthusiasm she had with anything else she learned so he’d had a half-panicked, half-rejoicing split second thought she might be about to return his earlier efforts but uh…it was still a half-panicked thing and Ellie didn’t half-anything—she wouldn’t do something like that unless he was entirely, vocally on board. All she did was rise to her feet, and then her hands were on his shoulders and he had caught her against himself when she pushed herself up to wrap her arms around his neck, thighs on his hips as she wrapped her legs around his back and he had a handful of bottom and her hair and her lips were on his and-

She uh…was skin to skin with him, so it would be hard not to feel where she sat on his lower stomach and she- she’d seen, that- it felt like there would always be a difference between knowing something on an intellectual basis and knowing from seeing. Lots of people could be cool with the idea of something but when they got down to actually seeing that something? There was always the chance they’d feel differently and she…she had just as much of a positive response as she had that night in Skyhold…maybe more of a positive response. She wanted him, was wet and warm and she definitely couldn’t blame the bath on that just yet.

So he pulled back a bit, pull his lips from hers before pressing a kiss to her forehead, and she squeaked as he held her more securely, arms around her back as he started walking toward the bath…careful to side-step the patch of water she’d dragged up, gave her bottom a little smack to prompt her to get down so she could get in the bath but that just had her legs tightening around his waist and she giggled and let out a pleasantly surprised, approval-laced, “Papito!”

That- was she- would Ellie be into being span-

That…was not conducive to the current objective.

“Set it on down, lovely—bath time.” He’d answered correctly with the serious ‘bubbles or no bubbles’ inquiry so, there would be other nights to address other things.

Maker bless the Marchands—they knew how to pick a damn bathtub. Deep enough to sink into, be comfortably submerged and he wasn’t feeling so self conscious any more but that didn’t take away from bubbles helping with that comfort. And Ellie in his lap? Reclined, relaxed…there wasn’t a single bad thing about bathing together and he wished they’d done it sooner—it was definitely becoming a thing when they got back to Skyhold. Comfortable as hell, he would’ve dozed off if he didn’t have the sudden panicked realization Ellie’d dozed off when the girl nearly slipped under the water entirely, her hand lax in his—he snaked an arm around her waist pulled her tighter against him with a bit of a jostling motion that had her startling awake with an apologetic, ‘Whoops!’ But the rest of their bathing went without incident, helping each other scrub up, wash each other’s hair—he got a decent head massage out of it, and once they were out of the tub, seated before the fireplace to warm up, dry off and Ellie…Maker help her, for some reason she let him have at her hair. Reason was he’d asked. And they got through it well enough—got more coconut oil on her than her hair the first time he got a glob in hand and tried working it into her hair and missed, but at least it worked as an in general moisturizer so, his girl got a bit of a shoulder massage out of it, and his efforts got him a grateful kiss before they climbed under the covers.

“Any paperwork tonight lovely?” he wondered as he settled in next to her.

She shook her head, “Nope! I already wrote mami and Sera back earlier. Oh!” she gasped, smiling as she handed him an open letter that had been sitting on her nightstand, “Noam wrote me, it was sweet—Anyah scared him half to death and he felt badly and wrote to keep me in the loop, I feel badly he was so scared but it was honestly funny.”

Oh, it was marked as an emergency, poor guy—it was a page long apology basically, but bloke had nothing to apologize for. He’d been leaving the tavern and Anya’d gotten real excited seeing Cullen for the first time in few days—the Commander and Seeker Pentaghast had taken a little time off, gone on a little trip to the area Cullen grew up in, they’d written about it—but all Anya knew was her papi was home so. Like mother like daughter? She picked up the Commander’s scent, saw him riding into Skyhold’s gate and wham! Right down the stairs she went, tumbling the whole way, ass over teakettle, rolling onto her feet at the bottom of the steps and bolting for Cullen before Noam could so much as register if she was okay or not. He was so incredibly sorry, sounded wrecked but he promised—he’d looked her over and Cullen had too and he’d taken her to Adan and Elan and…apparently was insistent both Healers examine her for injury, even Enchanter Fiona had been consulted…and everyone was certain the pup was unharmed, not so much as a scratch or sore from her tumble, Anya wasn’t limping or anything though he promised he was carrying her the rest of the day and he’d try to keep up with her from now on.

Felt bad for laughing but Maker, he could just picture Anya doing something like that, scaring the crap out of everyone and just popping back up like it was no big deal, wholly unaware of the potential danger she just scraped by and bolting to get pets from the Commander. “Poor dude, you wrote him back already, right? Mabari’s are tough and it wasn’t his fault—Trevelyans girls are excitable and hyper focused on physical affection.”

She nodded, “Yeah, I promised him I wasn’t even mad and I thanked him for thinking to write me anyway. I hope it makes him comfortable with it? I told him he could write me if he ever wanted to talk about his transition but he hasn’t taken me up on that, so…hopefully this was sort of a push in that direction? It’s hard—not knowing what’s going on with you and everyone being so scared of you and being just…one day everybody’s okay and the next everyone you love is just throwing you away? He seems so scared to open up, but it’s not…it’s not easy to just deal with that on your own.”

“You don’t…you don’t still worry about that ever happen um…with us, do you?” Krem ventured. “Any of us I mean. Not just between you and me, but with er…everyone? I’ve been kind of meaning to try and bring it up since the Dread Dick.” He really had, just…Maker, he knew it was hard to talk about er…abandonment. Used to get his dander up in a flash when Bull made his first attempts at playing Re-Educator with him, figure him out—what brought him to military work? What was his mother like? Danced around the idea of Papa’s existence like he wasn’t sure if he was dead or not and if that was gonna bring up something he shouldn’t risk—deadass Liviana Aclassi huh? Bull’d squinted at the envelope once…probably more than once before, but that was the first time he’d been able to successfully read the smallish handwriting with his good eye once Stitches got the bastard some glasses. Li-va-na…sounds like the name of a stone cold fox. Your mom taken or do you think I have a shot? Think she might dig the eyepatch?

“Might. Just don’t let her know you earned it saving her waste of a kid.”

That had shut the guy up about it for a hot minute…now Krem knew he could trust him, that the oaf really did mean well, and yeah, opening up more about it had helped. Looking back he could see it all more clearly—they’d appreciated how hard he worked but he hadn’t needed to knock himself out proving himself. Part of how hard he worked when he first got signed on with the Chargers…a lot of it had been guilt driven, trying to make it up to Bull, make up for Bull. And Papa always instilled in him, that if he found something that put a spark in him he should give it his all and that’s what the Chargers had done, and he felt like…somewhere out there, his father was working his ass off for his family—had always worked his ass off for his family, and now it was Krem’s turn to step up and be a damn man and do just that. But underneath it all…yeah, there had been this fear that if he didn’t push it, couldn’t be everything for everyone in any way possible, he would be found expendable and they’d give the snot nose brat that lost Bull his eye the boot.

Ellie blew out a breath, sent one of her drying curls flying upward to rest atop her head, “Well…I mean yeah, when we first learned Solas was lying the whole time it felt like ‘yeah, that makes sense, of course he didn’t mean any of this—he said he loves me after all’,” she shrugged, “but…well his entire problem became that he does love me and mami and- and lots of people he’s come to know through the Inquisition. But uh…” her head rocked a bit like she was physically sifting through the thought. “I guess…I don’t really worry that everyone will cut me off all of a sudden if I can’t live up to who they want me to be but um…I kind of still expect it?”

Oh shit, seriously? “Honey that…I mean expecting it and worrying about it kind of sound like the same thing?”

“mmm…I don’t lie awake at night terrified it’s going to happen—if I got into a fight with someone, I still have a sort of ‘knowledge’ on a level that they might decide to be done with me but I just sort of…it doesn’t hurt? And in a way that’s kind of nice but…I mean is something wrong with me? I-I was so heartbroken when I thought Varric was going to leave because of our fight over Thom but I dunno, Solas made me angry but the thought that he never loved me just sort of hit like I should’ve expected it all along and I was okay with it? And then um…well I kind of had a fight with Sera,” she danced around the topic-

“Yeah lovely, she talked to me about it.” She’d kind of been worried Krem already knew she and Ellie had had it out—that Krem was going to be pissed at her over it. She’d come at him apologizing for it and Krem hadn’t a clue what she was talking about. Girl forgot her sister might be honest, but she wasn’t a damn snitch.

That made her smile, resting her head against his shoulder, “I dunno, I offered to give her space if she needed it and I…felt like yeah, this might be where she finally gets sick of me. She’s my sister! I love her with my entire heart and I just felt like I wouldn’t be sad if she didn’t love me anymore which…I mean gosh when I say it out loud it sounds horrible!”

“Hey—you’re not horrible. Honey…this has all been since Haven fell—before you got back from Crestwood?” she nodded against his shoulder. “Lovely, you went all that time with your whole system messed up hormone-wise, and you hadn’t had a consultation with Adan since before Haven and you came home from Crestwood and babe, he’s changed up your potions regimen for a reason. You needed an entirely new formulation for your depression. Not feeling strongly about something that would usually devastate you while yeah, that almost sounds ideal—it’s a little nice when bad things don’t hurt, right? It…sounds just like loosing interest in something you love doing—sadness is a normal healthy emotion just like happiness, your brain not producing those uh chemicals?” that uh, that sounded like the right words? “Just sounds like…nothing wrong with you, just a symptom of your depression. One that might be dealt with soon—you’ve just gotta be patient with yourself. You’ve only been on new potion for maybe a week? Takes time for it to really start doing its thing in your system enough for you to notice a change positive or negative.”

“Oh…” she breathed, sitting up a bit and wiping at her eyes, oh, he hadn’t meant to make her cry but uh…maybe it was a healthy response to sadness? Oh. Relief more like it, but that worked too, he didn’t exactly want to make his girlfriend cry because he’d made her sad. “Yeah I- I didn’t even think about it like that.”

“There’s nothing wrong with you lovely. Sera could never hate you and want nothing to do with you, but if she suddenly did? You? You’d be devastated whether or not your brain is up to the task of responding that way. Just like you still love her even when you’re not necessarily feeling that in your system.”

Ellie took a deep breath, and sighed, nodding. “You know, you’re like, the smartest? Maybe Noam should write to you?”

“Guy’s welcome to, I’m always down for more friends. But you’re the one whose been in his shoes, it’s your experience that’ll really help him with his if he lets it. You’ve learned a lot, and you’ve got so much compassion. You just need to direct that compassion at yourself every once in a while, okay?” he intoned, resting his forehead against hers, “Be nicer to my girlfriend.”

She sniffled, smiling at that, “Or what?”

“Dunno... didn’t think this far ahead. But don’t think you can get away with it just ‘cause you’re cute.” Pressed a kiss to her forehead and wrapped an arm around her shoulders, let her rest against his chest as she dozed off. Waited until she was asleep though, before he checked in on his own paperwork.

Lamp light was low, but enough to see by as he broke the seals on a few reports he wanted to lay eyes on before going to sleep.

Sera had checked in. He’d gotten letters every other day or so from the Elf girl, checking up on him but and keeping him updated. She was off with her girlfriend in the middle of heavy Rift territory and he wasn’t sure if that Fairbanks fellow would still be keen on the Ellie heading his way after a week of Sera and Lace scouting—they were either saving the actual world or wreaking total havoc, it was hard to tell from Sera’s reports. They were erratic, swear-laden complaints that there were too many fucking Freemen of the Dales! Shite! They were working on fixing that—Thom reported direct to Leliana and Krem to pass along to Bull as needed—it sounded like they were making great progress, and he seemed proud, that they were making the area safer for Fairbanks people and cutting down on direct danger Ellie would have to encounter, but he was also concerned. It...Thom and his men had joined Sera in the Emerald Graves to have her back while she helped with securing the Inquisition’s foothold there—they could’ve seal any Rifts without Ellie around as it was dangerous going what with demons and Red Templars. And then there were the Freemen—deserters from Orlais’ civil war and trying to claim the Dales for themselves and they did not appreciate the Inquisition’s interference in that. Which complicated the Charger’s mission.

Thom and his men, they were just supposed to be a defensive detail but uh...they’d gone more on the offensive, making it their mission to clear out Freeman influence, borderline going rogue but Thom sent in a report to explain the situation and Cyril and Klaus had each taken it to task to damn the risk of pissing Bull off by chancing a show of disrespect and write the Charger’s leader to basically say if he had a problem with them hunting down the Freemen and getting them the hell out of the Emerald Graves before Ellie could set foot there, he could shove it, fire them, they didn’t care, they’d go back to prison, whatever, they were cool with that—at least this time they’d be locked up for something worthwhile.

There was talk from the Freemen of capturing the Inquisition’s young Inquisitor, holding her hostage to force the Inquisition to back off. And with that talk came...they’d heard threats, seen them in intercepted reports—between notes on the weather and the safety of their holds from the nearby Rift, there were pitches, ideas for how to get the Inquisitor—which was helpful, kind of told them what exactly to look out for—and just what to do with her while they waited for the Inquisition to move out of the Emerald Graves, hell, anywhere else in Orlais the Freemen wanted their influence gone from. Which was enough to give Krem nightmares, or at least the sort of horrible worries that bred them. So…yeah, Bull signed off no problem on finding every last Freeman of the Dales and eradicating their movement from the area before Ellie arrived to meet Fairbanks and his refugees, seal up the Rifts. Latest report looked good, they’d gotten rid of two Freeman bases so far—

He’d be sending this report on to Cullen. Apparently they’d discovered just how the Freemen got such a large foothold in the Emerald Graves—they had a sponsor. The Red Templars —led by an ex Templar bloke named Carroll. Red Templars and Freemen bastards working together. That’s what the world needed.

Might’ve left the lamp light as it was, tucked his reports away in the nightstand and just…
held on to the sound asleep girl for a bit, steadily breathing in the scent of coconut oil and lavender as he rested his chin on her head. He’d forgotten to wrap her hair, damn, but she hadn’t wrapped her hair last night either—everything on the bed was silk so she figured her hair would survive and that was fine by him, it was soft, warm, smelled like his girl and he could fall asleep knowing —knowing that in this moment, right here, right now, she was safe.

…soft…warm…her hair also got in his mouth. At least it was there when he woke up. Ellie was a blanket hog but that wasn’t so much of a problem when the person hogging all of the blankets slept directly on top of you, made him part of her sleep cocoon, her hair in his face, snoring directly into his chest. New bruise there…had she bitten him in her sleep? Had she gotten snacky in the Fade? Girl was apologetic, pressing a sweet little kiss to the bruise before peppering kisses all the way up to his lips and wishing him good morning before casting their blankets off and bouncing off the bed to announce it was time for breakfast…and he had a hell of a time swinging out of bed, making a blind grab for a robe hanging off the back of a chair and chasing her to the door to wrap her up before she went traipsing out into the hall in her birthday suit, girl was giggly about it, donning her robe and staying in his hold the whole way to breakfast. Cole was waiting for them. Papa too, teaching the Spirit how to make breakfast—Papa insisted he might like the ability for himself or to perhaps impress Miss Maryden, he offered with a mischievous wink.
Boy had all his color returned, the faintest bit of bruising clearing up here and there, but over all?
Good as new and excited for the day ahead—they promised him a day of healed hurts, and that’s what they were gonna do.

So…they spent the day in the Summer Bazaar. Bull joined them as extra security…and the poor bloke was likely bored since Dorian was off with Madam de Fer for a spot of what they termed ‘serious shopping’. They got a table at the cafe and let Cole go to town. He could get the job done well enough on his own but sometimes it helped having back up—knowing if things went super sideways Ellie and Krem were there to help him out, and sometimes they could help either because Cole felt like they would know what to say or because whoever it was might be more comfortable being approached by one of them—especially if the person hurting was a girl, having a random guy appear out of nowhere to chat you up could be concerning enough on its own, it was another thing for him to start accosting you over your private personal problems, so Ellie usually tagged along, walking arm in arm with the Spirit boy as he scurried around Val Royeaux addressing everything burdening the minds of the social elite. Turned out…everyone’s got shit to deal with. Krem mostly just hung out, saved their table, sipped some kind of warm, sweet, creamriddled coffee drink, and spent some time sketching. Lady Josie’d asked him for some art for her office—she’d given Papa the name of an art supplies store and he was going to meet up with them in the cafe after a meeting with a client he’d somehow managed to pick up at the theatre the other night, some Comtess that apparently adored the dress Ellie’d worn and been delighted to discover her tailor was available.

Meeting must’ve gone well, Papa was in high spirits as he joined them. Dude kissed Bull on the cheek in greeting, thanked him for watching over Ellie and Cole while he borrowed their mimo.
“m’not Bull’s mimo,” Krem groused.

“Hey—watch how you talk about your tamassran,” Bull snapped back, “I did not carry you around for…how long does it take to cook a human? You’re little as shit. A month? Two tops?” he shrugged and settled on, “I didn’t bring you into this world to disrespect me.”

“…you didn’t bring me into this world, period.”

“S’what I said,” the oaf smirked, “Hey—tell my girlfriends the Iron Bull’s thinking about them,” he instructed with a wink.

Papa laughed, slinging an arm over Krem’s shoulders as they made their way to the little shop, nice little place tucked away in a corner on the next level of shops above the road to the cafe—owned by this sweet older couple, kindly ladies who…apparently did have a thing for Bull. Got excited when Krem introduced himself, ‘Cremisius Aclassi’ and they recognized his name because a huge…’gloriously handsome’…Qunari had apparently graced their shop a while back shopping for his Lieutenant Aclassi the last time the Herald and her party were in Val Royeaux and the ass had gotten him art supplies for Wintersend, they were disappointed Bull hadn’t come along with him today.

Huh. Ladies left him and Papa be as they browsed—canvases and their assortment of oil paints, getting fancy with it for the Ambassador’s office—so… “How are you, papa?”

“Well I’m wonderful my boy,” the man assured, sniffing at a jar of Orlesian blue paint and offering a soft, surprised, ‘huh’ like he could tell what they’d gotten the pigment from and hadn’t quite expected it before capping and setting it back down. “I’m in this beautiful city with my bello mimo—I could be no better.”

“Sorry, I guess…I just…last time you were here probably wasn’t that great? For the most part, anyway. So I guess I’m just checking in with you…making sure um…you’re doing okay? Being here…being in the Inquisition? It seems like you’ve adjusted really well but I’d hate if I didn’t make sure everything’s really okay?” It had been a lot, Papa’s time in House Tilani. He’d opened up with him about it his first week in Skyhold, apparently Bull’d suggested he should. It wasn’t as big of a nightmare as Krem’d feared—his absolute worst case scenario for how his father might be living if he was even still alive was…darker than what he could really stomach considering. But Papa sat him down and laid it out for him cleanly enough, the day to day being a slave in House Tilani wasn’t exactly sunshine and rainbows but it was survivable. Still, it was a pretty drastic change, going from being a slave to his life in the Inquisition.

Papa smiled warm, hand massaging at Krem’s shoulder as he nodded, “I…actually thought Magister Tilani may be about to sacrifice me for blood magic, when last I was in Val Royeaux. It turned out my change in station was so I might meet your sweet girlfriend and be given the chance to truly earn my freedom. Which…is what I have, here in the Inquisition. I have work I enjoy, family, friendships, I want for nothing and what is even more important, I can be there for my son, make certain he can say the same.”

“Still uh…no ‘more-than-friendships’?”

His father regarded him with consideration for a moment. “Cremisius, is my seeking courtship on your mind?” he wondered, “Do you…want me to pursue someone? I…I believe you’ve several strong women figures in your life you may turn to for maternal guidance—“

Oh, shit, “No—definitely not asking you to go out and find me a mother or something,” Maker! “I just…I mean don’t take this the wrong way, I’m not accusing you of anything but um…”
“Can two people who work in the same facility and share common interests not merely be friends?”

“I mean of course they can, but um… I mean I dunno, just—maybe it’s just me but you two seem flirty is all. The playful bickering, things like that.”

“Well I could not honestly bicker with Lady Montilyet, I don’t think, the woman is too sweet for genuine meanness. I…” Papa seemed to consider it a moment, “Josephine has had many personal crisis as of late, I’ve merely been helping as I can—being her friend when she is in need of one. If ever that changes, you will be the first to know.”

“Pretty sure you lot’ll be first. And Leliana.”

“…undoubtedly.” Papa conceded. Then, “I enjoy my life, Cremisius, truly. I have much to be thankful for, I’ve been blessed beyond measure,” he insisted. “It is interesting you would bring up Lady Montilyet—when we return to the Marchands she wishes to speak with you, if you’ve a moment.”

“Sure thing.” Krem nodded. Lady need a change in guard or something later tonight? She was safe right now, he figured, going over the rotation in his mind. Bull was with Ellie, Dalish and Skinner switched off taking guard of Lady Montilyet last night so Marehis was probably with her now.

Bull… was with Ellie. And he had been with her in the cafe, unsupervised… for the better part of two hours. Hadn’t meant to spend so much time in the shop but they’d gotten caught up in it, lost track.

Papa helped him tote the supplies he picked—paint, a few brushes, and the shop owners agreed to have canvases sent to Skyhold, gave Krem their card so he could contact them in the future if he needed anything else. Papa took one too—he’d chatted with the ladies about different dyes, materials they used to get pigment for paints and pastels and the like, because yeah, from time to time he had to dye his own fabric or thread and he’d thought it interesting their use of plants—plant oils took to cloth better than minerals, apparently. They regrouped with the others in the cafe—they’d all successful times, Cole had Cole’d the crap out of a majority of Val Royeaux’s current population, and uh… Bull was a dumbass. He’d gotten a little carried away with being able to do ‘shots’ of something that had more of a kick than juice with his ‘boss girl’—no alcohol, he’d never encourage her to mess with her potions like that but uh…it also wasn’t a whole lot better.

“Cremisius!” the girl was up and on him—hands on his forearm as she bounced in place, “Crem-is-ius, Crem-is-ius, Crem-is-ius! Hi handsome!” her whole weight was on his arm as she pushed herself up on it to kiss him on the cheek, “Mwah!” she giggled as she landed on her feet, “I love you!”

“I love you too. You okay?” he asked… worried. Was she- was she experiencing some kind of manic swing or something? Girl was sort of vibrating out of her skin—literally tremors working through her as he wrapped an arm around her and rubbed circles on her back as she wrapped her arms around him to hold him tight letting out a little happy sounding grunt with the effort. Bull was staring at her… kind of the way Rocky stared at something that blew up more violently than he’d originally anticipated, “The hell you do?”

“Uhhh…” Bull droned, eye wide.
“Good heavens!” okay, Papa’s out here basically swearing, for him anyway. His tone was startled and scathing—he was at their table, examining these…really tiny porcelain cups, table was just about covered in them, there had to be at least twenty of them. He’d raised one to his nose to confirm before he started leveling accusations but, “You gave this child espresso?! H- how many of these did she imbibe?!”

“Uhhhh…shit, double shots so I cut her off at like, uh-“

“Eight! Eight! Eight! Eight!” Ellie chanted wriggling with each word before she pulled back in Krem’s hold to look up at him, to cheerily announce, “Four is half of eight! I said that four times!”

Oh man, “Yeah you did babe,” Krem encouraged and earning a smile as she snuggled against his chest.

“That’s- that’s not bad right?” Bull worried.

Papa looked incredulous. “She is neigh some sixteen years old and weighs as much as a single one of your arms, the Iron Bull! She should maybe have had one of those horrid things but none would be preferable! Oh good Maker, how many have you had?”

“Dunno, rest of them?” there…there were so many oh Maker help them all. “Took em on a test run before I let her have any-”

Yeah, what good that did. “We should do espresso before dragon fights!” Ellie gasped as if she’d just been struck with a genius thought, “The Iron Bull! Let’s go fight a dragon!”

“I…should not be trusted with Imekaris—kid’s all yours, you’re the ultimate Papa,” the Iron Bull…signed over his parenting rights it sounded like. Maker help them.

“Oh I’ll ultimate papa you—honestly- to bed with you, the Iron Bull—come,” Papa sighed, motioning for Bull to stand before he got up under his arm, wrapping an arm around Bull’s back while the Qunari put an arm over his shoulder, “you may not feel it yet but you are about to be rather miserable I’m afraid. Cole, sweet mimo, would you please go inform Dorian his lover may be in need of assistance? Bello—Cremisius, you’ve Eleanor?”

Uhh yeah and he wasn’t sure what eight double shots of espresso were about to do to the girl but uh…she had a big high to crash down from, so.

“Cremisius!” she objected the moment Krem knelt and got a hold on her, wrapping an arm around her waist and getting her over his shoulder, “I’m fine! Put me down! I just- need- more-!” he…was pretty sure she was reaching behind him, trying to grab at one of the cups on their table but he was decently sure they were all empty, and a hundred percent sure she shouldn’t have any more so he kept it moving, started heading back to base.

“Honey, I love you, but I need to stop you from chugging more espresso more than I need you to not make a scene so it’s entirely up to you how this goes down,” Krem informed her.

“The Iron Bull!” like he could help her, “Your Lieutenant is being sexy and insubordinate!”

“Can’t do a damn thing about either boss-girl,” the Qunari apologized, though uh, there was a very unfortunate wet sounding rumbling coming from his stomach, “oh man, crap didn’t do anything but moving right on through.”

“Yes, espresso is very…you will be sick and in need of the facilities certainly,” Papa sympathized.

“Papa’classi!” Ellie complained, appealing to the man, “Tell Cremisius to put me down!”

“Oh bella, I’m sorry but I believe my son is behaving wisely at the moment,” Papa had to say, as they entered the spire to the Marchands home. “The Iron Bull, honestly, whatever possessed you to give her so much espresso? The girl is seizing.” Maybe? She was definitely wriggly.

“I’m trying to free myself, I just can’t reach- gah!” Ellie let out a frustrated growl, felt her hand slapping against the small of his back.

“Lovely, you trying to reach my butt?” Krem asked.

“No one else is punishing you!” and then she let out a frustrated growl, when she still couldn’t quite reach, “If you don’t put me down Cremius I swear, I will sit in judgement over your offenses! Caffeine deprivation in the first degree!” and then she groaned, going limp and accepting her fate...or more so succumbing to the down side of seven shots of espresso, and uh… whipped it on around to gentle whining, “Papito, I’m dizzy and nauseous and my head hurts.” Yeah he could uh, feel her heartbeat against his shoulder blade going a mile a minute. Could you overdose on caffeine?

“Hey asshole I’m pretty sure you poisoned my girlfriend,” Krem snapped as he let Papa go ahead and open the door for them, Cole appeared at his side and took hold of the bags the tailor and Krem had in hand smiling assurance before disappearing to be a pal and put it away for him, a soft I’ll get Mister Stitches in his mind as the boy vanished from sight. Maker bless him. He set Ellie on her feet though shit, she really was dizzy, caught her against himself. “Hey honey, you’re okay.”

“Awe shit, didn’t realize it’d hit her so hard, had sixteen shots of the stuff and it didn’t do—“ Bull…started. And then he went very quiet, except for this sort of...low, rumbly growl bubbling up in his chest. Huh. Making its way through and just hitting his system with uh...sixteen double shots worth of caffeine? Fun. So...Bull might die. He’d make fun of the oaf if after everything he’d ever faced, an afternoon of caffeinated dumbassery was what brought him down.

He got Ellie to bed, dress she was wearing today was simple enough, pale blue sweater dress that was comfortable enough to lay around in, and she conjured up a grateful smile to kiss him with when he undid the clasps of her bra for her so she could get comfy, pull it out the collar of her dress and sent the thing sailing blind.

“Forgive me for manhandling you?” he checked.

She nodded, smiling sheepishly, “I’m sorry I didn’t appreciate you carrying me—the me now appreciates you looking out for caffeine high me. She wasn’t totally wrong though—if Val Royeaux had a dragon, it’d be toast!”

“Oh totally,” Krem agreed. What was he supposed to do with this lot? How exactly did they survive in the field?...pretty sure the answer was Cassandra, Marehis, and the grace of Maker Himself. Otherwise Bull and Ellie and Sera? They’d’ve tipped the mayhem off the charts.

Cole...it was sweet, the Spirit appeared with a glass of water in hand and potion from Stitches that he immediately raised to Ellie’s lips, holding it for her like they’d had to do for him when his body was beat up, she took the glass of water herself though, pecking him on the cheek before chugging it. And the second she was laying back, Cole climbed in with her, curling up against her side, brow creased with worry.

“Hey buddy, she’s okay,” Krem promised, rubbing circles on the Spirit’s back.

“She doesn’t feel good—I do not like it,” he swallowed, blinking a bit like he’d tears in his eyes, “I knew bodies ached but I did not realize how it feels until mine was hurt badly and still, I have some disconnect, I don’t feel it fully—you and Ellie have to live in your bodies, you’re more connected to them, you feel the hurt in full.”

“Mmm, but we’re also used to having bodies carino,” Ellie said, snuggling against him as she let out a contented sigh, “I’ve had headaches before, it’s not as bad as you think and I’m starting to feel better already,” she promised. Though uh, Marehis came to check on her the minute she heard the girl’d returned and gone to lay down and Ellie cracked an eye open to peek at who was coming into her room before, albeit pathetically offering up, “Mami, caffeine betrayed me, I don’t feel good—come nap with me.”

“Oh, Da’vehnan,” Marehis sympathized, offering Krem a smile and a pat on the back as they passed each other—he’d just been heading to go touch base with Josie. He motioned, pointing his thumb over his shoulder and mouthing ‘be right back’, and the Elf woman nodded.

Though he might be right back, he knocked on the door to Josie’s office before cracking it open, the woman was at her desk which was…covered in parchment, a hand worked into her hair as she pored over something intensely—Papa said she wanted to talk to him but she seemed more than a little busy.

“My lady?”

She startled, softly gasping before she smiled warmly, “Oh! Cremisius, mijo—just the young man I wanted to see, please have a seat. Your Papa informed you I wished to speak?”

“Yeah,” Krem nodded as he sat across from her, “Everything okay? Marehis is with Ellie now but I laid eyes on your guard now—did you need me to take over this evening?”

“Oh no—thank you for thinking of me sweet man, but please, I whole heartedly beg you enjoy your day off. You’re having a good day I hope?”

“Yeah, pretty great mostly—Cole helped a lot of people it looked like and I got started on your commission—sketches I can bring by whenever you wanna look at them to see if I’ve got the right idea what you want. Papa took me paint shopping which was…really great,” he smiled, “Thank you, again, Lady Josie. You put a lot into this trip and getting to spend so much time with him? Doing so many great things? A year ago I-“ he swallowed, clearing his throat. “I wouldn’t’ve believed you if you’d said I was going to get to spend a leisurely afternoon with my father.”

“Oh, Cremisius, it was entirely your father’s idea taking you out this afternoon—truly, he is…well, he is a wonderful father and I’m so pleased you had such a marvelous time. I look forward to seeing your work.”

Krem nodded. “All in all, day’s still pretty good.”

“I…heard there was a mishap with Espresso?” Josie checked.

“Yeah…little bit,” Krem chuckled, and she offered up an amused, relieved smile at that, “Ellie’s got a headache and Bull might have a heart attack, but a quick nap for her and that berk manages to stay attached to this plane of existence? I call this day of vacation an all around success.”
Josephine shook her head, “I should have warned Eleanor the dangers of Orlesian caffeine.”

“Oi—espresso’s Tevene, my Lady. Not proud of much from my homeland but our cuisine? Everywhere else in the world pales in comparison. Not just because our lot tend to run darker skinned.”

“Oh, Cremisius. I understand you’ve had a very misguided upbringing…but make no mistake—Antivan is by far the superior heritage of food and dining. I’m dying to impart more lessons in Antivan cooking upon Eleanor—she and I, we must make you and your father a proper Antivan meal.”

“So we just have to sit there and compliment your amazing cooking? We will—but that’s hardly a fair fight. Name the day, papa and me’ll step up, have a little cook off against you two huh?”

“Oh that would be absolutely delightful! I will feel badly when we beat you of course, but I am fond of Tevene.”

“You realize if I put a whole pizza in front of Ellie and tell her it’s all hers? Her votes a hundred percent gonna swing in our favor.”

“That may be true but I happen to know your father has an appreciation for Antivan spice,” fuck him sideways was that inuendo? Nah. Lady didn’t have it in her for that. Well…maybe for that, but not saying something about it to another person’s face. “And I’m certain Eleanor making either of you anything will secure our victory.”

“…yeah I’m pretty sure Ellie could give papa a plate of mud and he’d thank her and say it was high cuisine.”

“Oh he loves that girl so. But that is only because she loves you so—it would be impossible for him not to love someone who loves you as he does.”

Huh. Yeah, that would be pretty impossible he figured. Which uh…

Maybe…maybe papa hadn’t gotten the memo but Josephine? …probably didn’t love him as much as Papa, obviously, but…guy had loved mother once upon a time and Lady Montilyet?

…he was pretty sure she loved him more than Liviana Aclassi ultimately could. Pretty damn sure.

“Carino, I asked that you join me because…it if you are at comfort to speak with me on the subject, I would like to talk of; you.”

“Me?”

She nodded, “Your aqun-athlock status. If I may.”

Well…he wouldn’t be entirely sure until he knew exactly what about it she wanted to talk about. Sometimes people had questions…ones they had no business asking and either didn’t care or didn’t know any better. Josie wasn’t the sort to not care, and she might have something to genuinely address and if it turned out to be something he didn’t want to talk about? She’d respect that. So he nodded, and she cleared her throat, “I did not name names but I did reach out for…I did a bit of research,” she shyly confessed, “I must admit I’ve never knowingly encountered such a concept—but um…if you experience a great deal of dysphoria still? That is the word, yes?” he nodded, “I would be more than happy to help you find someone who specializes in that area of ...specializes? “What do you mean?”

“There are therapists who can assist in coping mentally, emotionally, with gender issues. Too there are Healers who would not be able to alter anything about your body necessarily, but could assist on a chemical level—emotional and mental health, and physical to a degree, there are ways of...” she was looking at one of the open letters on her desk, scanning the page for something and reading off, “encouraging the production of...test...testosterone?” she looked up, inquisitive, “Did I say that right?” she asked him.

Uhh...“Beats me?” didn’t have a ruddy clue.

“It is a hormone all people have but um...” she searched the letter a bit more before looking up and explaining, “there is estrogen and testosterone? Everyone has quantities of both but traditionally...” she seemed to struggle for a second before concluding, “bodies like mine produce greater quantities of estrogen than testosterone which has some bearing on my traits that are considered traditionally feminine. Likewise in bodies like your father’s, testosterone is more predominant than his estrogen levels, which affect his masculine traits.” Oh yeah, estrogen... Ellie’d said something about that before, she knew words like that anyway. “There are potions, dietary changes, exercise regimens that could be of assistance in helping your body to produce a chemical balance that your mind would react to more positively, would help you grow more comfortable in areas you might find discomfort in.”

“I uh...huh. I mean I’ve gone to Stitches for things like uh...nixing the whole ‘monthly’ thing but I never...I dunno, I just didn’t think there were Healers for this sort of thing specifically.”

“I thought perhaps that might be the case—they are not exactly commonplace, but they do exist. If it is something that interests you, something you wish to pursue for your own comfort and health, I thought you should be made aware of it,” Josephine reached out again, arm laying across her desk, hand open and he took that as invitation to place his hand in hers, getting a smile as she squeezed his hand gently, “I meant what I said—you are just as the Maker made you when He formed your most precious life, Cremisius. None who truly love you would wish for you to change in any way—save for any way you might wish to change for yourself. I only bring these options up for you because it is your every right to know of them, to pursue or not by your own discretion based solely on what you need for yourself, carino.”

He...wasn’t sure. He’d always thought—hell, his binder and a well-placed sock, and he was good to go. But yeah, he’d never dreamed there were people who actually took this thing that affected him his whole life so seriously that they would dedicate their own lives to figuring it out and ways to...to help people with it. It was a little overwhelming but...yeah, “I’ll...I’ll think about it.”

She nodded, giving his hand another squeeze before releasing it and pulling back to straighten a stack of parchment on her desk. “You may have the replies I received from my inquiries—they will give you names of potential Healers and more information you might wish to have for yourself as you ponder. If you’ve no need of them—wonderful. If you do, please, do not hesitate to come to me and I would gladly assist you in any way to make arrangements for you, Cremisius.”

He nodded, “Yeah um...thanks—seriously I- I’ll let you know.”

“Too if...if you would like—you’re a very polite young man, a gentleman by all accounts,” Josephine assured, which coming from her was a pretty major compliment, “but...I would understand if you have perhaps been raised to adhere to feminine standards—if ever you feel uncertain about masculine forms of etiquette, conducting as much in scrutinized social circumstance, you may always come to me.”

Yeah…he had the basics covered, but um…hell, it felt stupid, but she was the one who offered, “I’m uh…a little nervous about the Winter palace.”

“You will be addressed appropriately,” she assured him…kind of like she’d slap someone if they misgendered him or something.

“Not so much about attending but uh…I mean I did alright at First Day-Eve but…” oh man, “Bull kind of taught me how to um. Dance.”

“How to dance…the lead?” Josephine asked wide eyed and covering her mouth to hide her smile because yeah—it was definitely hilarious and she was probably worried he’d think she was laughing at him. “Oh-“ she cleared her throat, composing herself before assuring, “Cremisius, if you can lead the Iron Bull in dance I’m certain you’ve mastered the skill,” and her expression warmed as she thought back on it, “You did very well dancing with Eleanor First Day-Eve. Oh I was so pleased you enjoyed yourselves! You do not feel confident in taking to the dance floor in a more formal setting?”

He blushed, “It’s stupid—I mean we’ll be running a mission but uh…you know. If we can have a dance or two? I…I just wouldn’t want to embarrass myself or spend the whole time worrying I am.”

Bull’d given him some instruction, practice, but that did little to counterbalance hours upon hours for days of weeks of years spent having it drilled into him in those Maker-awful ‘charm’ lessons to let himself be led instead of leading.

“Would you feel comfortable learning at Eleanor’s side? She’s a great many duties to tend to in preparation for the Winter Palace and one of them is to learn dance, for herself. She will be a point of focus for everyone that evening watching the Inquisitor play the Game—she must do so in good form, so, she will need to be instructed in dance herself and require a partner for her lessons…”

“Yeah?”

“It might be a bit more incentivizing for Eleanor if she can learn with a partner she’d be excited to dance with—you will learn exactly how to lead her as she follows in a fashion suitable for an Orlesian ballroom. I would be absolutely delighted if you would join us.”

“I’d be pretty delighted to join you.”

The woman started clapping, lighting up with her enthusiasm, gushing, “Oh wonderful! It will be such fun!” she sighed with some relief. “Thank you, Cremisius, for sitting and talking with me. I’m sorry if it was all a little overwhelming I just- you’ve done so much for myself, the Inquisition—for my mija. You deserve so much happiness and when I learned you might struggle with inherently being yourself I…it hurts me in the same way Eleanor’s do—for her, I schedule and plan—make certain when she has an appointment with her Healer it takes absolute priority, happens for her exactly when and as she needs it to. So I suppose I reflexively wished to do the same for you, I apologize if I came on…too strong?”

“Hey,” he shrugged, smiling assurance, “I’m never one to complain about a strong woman—thanks for all of this. I need anything scheduled, you’re the one I’m coming to. Reina of professional assistants, right?"

She blushed at that, “So I have been told. It is my pleasure to assist,” she assured. “Gracias, mijo, for trusting me.”

“Well, gracias for being someone I can trust,” he returned. “Was there anything else you need? I should check on the caffeine junkies,” he should at least make sure Papa wasn’t single handedly caretaking a sick Bull. Guy could do it, he had no doubt, but still. And if he could get in on nap time with Ellie and Cole, he definitely wasn’t passing up on the opportunity. But, more importantly, “You’re good on security for the rest of the day? Bull might be down for the count this evening. You get nervous or something you can always come have dinner with Ellie and me—welcome to do that regardless,” he assured.

“Oh, that is sweet of you to offer but I actually have plans with your father this evening,” she...was blushing, but then she looked a little guilty about it? She shook her head, explaining, “to return the favor of last night’s dinner of course. I will touch base with Leliana and make certain we’ve appropriate security, I promise. Oh! I- I would not wish to exclude you—if Eleanor is feeling better perhaps you’d like to join us?”

Didn’t want the Lady going out of her way to buy them dinner and uh...definitely didn’t want to interrupt their dinner date. “Nah uh...you two have fun.”

“We will,” Josephine smiled and then caught herself, “Your father is excellent company, he- I truly appreciate his friendship.”

Kind of had to fight how big he was smiling, just- Maker she was shy, so, “Always nice to have dinner with friends—I’m sure he’s looking forward to it. Have a good time, yeah?”

Lady Ambassador was still blushing but she nodded. “Do give Eleanor my best.”

Josephine had never been more nervous in her life.

Everything was...going wonderfully—the Du Paraquettes were cancelling the contract with the House of Repose, it was a matter of looking over the final confirmations from all parties that the Montilyet’s troubles with the House of Repose were a thing of the past. They were on their final day in Val Royeaux, concluding their bit of vacationing, and perilous drama aside...they’d all had a marvelous time.

Perhaps...too marvelous a time.

Ohh! She felt despicable! Despised herself for holding her tongue—it had been days!

Three entire evenings had passed since Josephine no longer needed the ruse of a relationship with Tonio. And she had yet to inform him of such a thing. And it was horrible of her! And she was going to tell him! She was determined to, today, their final in Val Royeaux.

She had tried to do so sooner. Really and truly. There had been countless moments over the past few days—the entirety of their evening out with Cremisius and Eleanor, Josephine had opened her mouth to broach the subject with Tonio while they were dining together and- and-
Nothing. She was often met with things that left her silent to allow the facade to last just a bit more…while simultaneously being the very reason she should cease abusing this man’s trust. The waiter would come and Tonio would address him with such warm encouragement—the young man was nervous, very polite and courteous, eager to please, but apparently he was new and that…did not always receive patience. There were many patrons that evening that were outright cruel to the young man when he proved to be uncertain about the ins and outs of the menu, brought their beverages but mixed up which went with which person, Josephine had startled when a Comte some tables over shouted at their waiter, slapped a hot dish out of his hands and insisted he’d never been treated with such unprofessionalism in his life because the young man had served the Comte’s date, placing her meal before her first, before serving him and he apparently found the action a sign of disrespect which was beyond baffling but resulted in the Comte storming out after screaming in the young man’s face. Tonio did nothing to berate him when he mistakenly brought the wrong order—Josephine didn’t wish to kick up fuss…and he didn’t, he very gently informed the young man that ‘his Lady’ had ordered salmon, not steak, patting the boy’s hand and assuring him he would get the hang of things—even seasoned professionals had such slip ups. The waiter was more than apologetic, bringing them fresh bread and refilling their wine glasses promptly while they awaited the corrected order, chatting amicably between themselves, the Tevinter man waiting to eat until Josephine was able to likewise. She felt a bit badly for the wait but they did have a great deal to talk about-

Their arrangement came up not even once…though Josephine’s mind was occupied on other things—her research for Cremisius for example, they’d been relatively alone, in a more secluded part of the restaurant, and were careful in the words they chose as she spoke of it with Tonio before she dared bring up the subject with his son, just, she did not wish to overstep her bounds. She worried the boy might be insulated or disconcerted by her interest in aiding him—it was something he lived with, he may well already know every last thing Josephine had learned but Tonio seemed rather taken aback that there was such a thing as a Healer that dedicated themselves to the study of gender dysphoria. He held no objections to her bringing it up with his son—she thought perhaps the man himself might like to do so but he insisted he felt comfortable with Josephine doing as much, she had done the work of finding resources for Cremisius and she might be better prepared for such a talk, and too Tonio worried…if he brought such a thing up, Cremisius might pursue seeking a Healer’s advice out of worry his father finds something wanting in his son’s masculinity, that he’s being told that he should seek such assistance as opposed to being informed that he could.

“You’ve such a gentle way with your words my Lady, I feel he would clearly see the genuine nature with which you’re bringing this to him—to arm him with knowledge so if he does wish to pursue a Healer or finds he does need therapy, he knows he has the options to do so. I…” the man sighed, “I’m remiss I did not consider this myself I- he has been open with me about his struggles, I thought… I don’t know. I suppose…he’s done so well with the Iron Bull’s encouragement, and Ellie, Maker bless her, I’ve never seen him have a trace of doubt in himself at her hand. I would like to think I have been an encouragement to him, that I offer support, and I- I’ve so much to make up for in this regard, I feel like I’ve done nothing but fail him at every turn in his youth and now- I just never thought to consider there might be healers who specialize in this realm of medicine. That you immediately thought of it, made inquiries and laid so much groundwork, I admit I am a touch jealous—I should be capable of knowing how to help him.”

“It is perfectly normal for a parent to believe they can solve their children’s troubles all on their own, instinct really, it seems—to wish the ability to kiss all ails and make them better.” Josephine chuckled when the light jest made the man stop looking so very grave and smile a bit, “I assure you I only thought of as much because…well, I suppose a similar instinct—when something is hurting the people that I love, my immediate reaction is to help. Usually that help is from outside of myself—I am skilled in speech and planning and little else,” she assured, “Eleanor has her own health struggles—physical or mental—the only thing I can do to help her is assist in scheduling appointments for her. When I learned Cremisius might have struggles of his own, my immediate thought was to do the same, but…well, one cannot make appointments without someone to make them with.”

She felt almost like she’d been rambling in an attempt to comfort him, but the man picked up on, “When something is hurting the people you love?” he smiled, eyes alight as he wondered, “You love my Cremisius?”

“Of course I love Cremisius, how could I not? We’ve gotten to know one another well since he came to work with the Inquisition—he treated me to lunch his first week in Haven, as thanks for…apparently he found me to be very understanding when it came to the Charger’s acclimation to being in Inquisition headquarters? And Eleanor’s return from the Coast saw him guarding her during all of our meetings and lessons. We’ve had a great deal of occasion to get to know one another,” Josephine smiled, “There was once, when Eleanor and her party journeyed to the Fallow Mire—this horrible place in the south that is essentially a disease-ridden bog—she fell ill and her party made camp while she recovered but this was- oh! It was just after you met!” she realized, “They went straight from Val Royeaux after their exploration of an Oasis in western Orlais, to southern Ferelden, and their travels with so many unexpected occurrences left them depleting their food stores entirely—the Chargers were up for the task of delivering a resupply to tide them over until their return. Just before the Charger’s departure, I was giving one of our allies a tour of Haven, and found Cremisius in the tavern where he was making use of its kitchen—preparing soup to bring Eleanor.”

“Oh my bello—truly?”

Josephine nodded. “It was the sweetest thing,” she assured him, “your son is a remarkable young man—he is extremely easy to love. That is-”

“What, my lady?”

She…had only just stopped herself short of saying that is easily said of you both she- she did not-

Well, of course she had love for Tonio. He was a wonderful man, her friend. To know him was to love him, was it not?

"That is..." she’d said, "the Maker's honest truth."

It was. And it also wasn’t- she should have told him! Not- not an embarrassing, impractical confession of emotion, she should have segued into speaking of their arrangement! That there was no need for it any longer, thank him for all he has done! But no. She had a nice dinner and lovely time at the theatre with the children they so loved and then another pleasant night in his quarters and-

And then her talk with Cremisius went so well. And Tonio was so grateful, joyus to hear how well it went when they went out for dinner once more and- and-

She had informed the elder Aclassi that Cremisius was indeed taking up her offer of etiquette instruction. At least insofar as the realm of dance was concerned.

“That will be wonderful,” he’d enthused, squeezing her hand as they were joined atop the table. “I’m certain you’ll make quite the eloquent gentleman out of my bello mimo. Dance will come naturally him I'm sure—he's an Aclassi man, and that is no such ridiculous pun, my father had little tolerance for social graces, but the one bit of civility and romance he did indulge in, was dancing with my mama.”

Oh, she could not help but tease, "So dance comes naturally to all Aclassi men?" she'd wondered.

"Certainly," he assured, "if you wish, I believe I could be of assistance if you'd need of demonstration in your etiquette lessons."

"Truly?"

It led the man to feel compelled to prove as much, delighted spark in his eye as he rose from his seat and bowed, deeply, as he looked to her and asked, "Would you care to test my truth, Lady Montilyet?"

She should not have said yes. Oh she should not have said yes! It was horrible!

Only because it was amazing. Breath stealing in fact, she thought her heart was about to beat directly out of her chest as the man led her to join the few couples indulging in dance near the small orchestra that provided their establishment with beautiful music. He was perfectly at ease as they took their place, and then he'd spoken lowly, not unlike he were auditioning for the role as an assistant etiquette instructor.

“Now, a gentleman must always be respectful,” he began, "hold her hand like so and keep his supporting hand high, here," he said as he held her hand and placed the other high on the slope of her back, just above the small of her waist—"this is where he must support her from. That is what dancing is—when one leads, their one job is to lead. But following? Oh, it is more like flowering—the one who follows is often tasked with something beautiful that she alone must do...and he must support her, make a space where she can do so with the confidence that with him at her side her footing is secure wherever the dance takes them.”

She'd found herself struck speechless, smiling encouragement and silently praying the romantic atmosphere the bistro wished to tote with low candlelight to combat the dark of night would help to disguise just how very red her face was as they danced. Tonio saw fit to hum softly as they danced, and then he leaned in to be heard as the orchestra played out their final, albeit loud flourishing ending.

"Was that suitable, my Lady?” he wondered teasingly, speaking in her ear.

Now he may never wish to speak to her again, once all was told. And she would well deserve that.

Their final day in Val Royeaux, it was easily said that Josephine Montilyet had never been more nervous in all of her life. As she sat in her office as she pored over every last missive she’d received over the past several hours from the Du Paraquettes, Leliana, and the House of Repose…while awaiting the company of Tonio Aclassi to confess her grievances. Never had she let a lie stand for quite so long...neither had she been faced with documents had never meant quite so literally life or death. She read the letters thrice more before she was satisfied she understood its contents in full.

The Du Paraquettes’ ascension into minor nobility had been successfully ratified. They would be returned to a modest estate that had been claimed by a bank and been sitting empty since their downfall some generations prior.
They knew well it was only by the Inquisition, and Josephine Montilyet’s hand, that they regained this much of their former status. They’d no personal quarrel with the Montilyet family and now found themselves thoroughly enfeebled. They immediately repaid this kindness by officially and completely cancelling the contract their ancestors had set upon Josephine’s life.

The House of Repose was satisfied, and pleased to conclude their business with a an official letter offering rescission of intent. None from the House of Repose would seek to harm any in the Montilyet family, all agents in the field had been advised and retracted, and Josephine had their genuine assurance she was free of their mark upon her life.

She…read over each piece of parchment that laid every guarantee their efforts had worked, just once more. To make certain.

“…and then I was thinking I would strip bare and douse myself in honey, feathers—to be appropriately covered, as I do plan to stroll the streets of Val Royeaux, get some air. It’s a bit of a fashion risk but I am an artist—an eccentric.”

“Whatever are you—” Josephine startled, nearly knocking her inkwell over as she looked up to Tonio staring at her, utterly amused with himself. Wait—Maker! When had he even arrived- oh. “You…knocked and I did not pay a bit of attention as I permitted you entry…and you were talking and I was not listening?” oh good heavens.

“You seem to be listening just fine, I truly wish to make a name for myself while we’re in Val Royeaux,” he insisted innocently before smiling assurance, “Oh I apologize—the look on your face, it was entirely precious cara mia.”

She felt herself blushing. “I was distracted. I’m nearly finished, please, sit carino—” oh!

He did. And then he asked, “You called Cremisius that the other day, did you not?” well… the man’s hearing wasn’t failing him…she supposed that was good.

“I…did,” she said, face warming. “It is not a bad- it is the term of affection equivalent* to calling someone ‘honey’.” The sentiment had flown from her lips the moment she laid eyes on Cremisius’s injured arm, though…she knew with certainty she meant the sentiment toward the sweet boy, so much so it had happened more intentionally later. Now it- well it had been just as unintentional as the first, perhaps in exact opposite fashion—her panic came after she unintentionally uttered the word. Oh Maker that was hardly professional-

But it left the Tailor unbothered. Likely because…it would be a perfectly natural endearment if they were truly in romance. Which they were still feigning.

“That you prepared to have your measurements taken?” Tonio wondered.

“I…must confess that I have lied,” Josephine started…an albeit ironic way of starting such a discussion because she meant, “I asked that we meet to handle my measurements so…Leliana would keep her people scarce as we talk. The threat to my life has passed,” she assured when worry woke in his features, “but Leliana is nothing if not vigilant, she insisted I still have guards until she feels satisfied the House of Repose has had time to adequately recall all of their agents in the field that may not yet be in the know that I am no longer a target. I wish to speak with you without being overheard so…I allowed us to be overheard lying, saying I wished to have you measure me so Leliana would be mindful to set Human guards.”

“Surely the woman knows we would not be up to anything…untoward.”
“We wouldn’t but I’m…shy, and she well knows this. It would, in truth, make me albeit self conscious knowing someone could overhear,” she explained, and Tonio nodded in acknowledgement—the man did have the habit of either announcing the numbers to an assistant who wrote them down or spoke them quietly to himself to commit them to memory as he loosed hold of his measuring tape to take up a pencil and jot the number down.

“…so…I am not here to tailor you? What did you need of me then, my lady?” Tonio wondered.

She found herself sighing because, “Ironically enough, about further subterfuge I feel very badly about committing.”

“Oh, cara mia, you feel badly for having mislead Leliana about the purpose of our meeting today?” he wondered, almost amused that she would be so easily guilted. “It needn’t be a lie.”

“It won’t be in the scheme of things,” Josephine supposed, “we will get around to the task eventually.”

Tonio smiled gently, “True, but my lady I meant it needn’t be a lie at all—not even the duration between now and fulfilling the task at a later date—if you were comfortable there is no reason I cannot measure you now. It would be one less thing to do, we could discuss design as we travel. I would be able to start on your order as soon as we return to Skyhold.”

Oh Maker. She…this conversation would be difficult as it was. To be in her underthings and the man so close? But when she opened her mouth to insist she did wish to speak with him she found she hadn’t the slightest clue where to begin—but he would not leave this room without a full confession and a profuse apology! So, “Very well. I…will collect my thoughts, I did truly mean to speak with you but, I admit, as much as I have gone over it again and again, I’m still a bit unprepared.”

He offered her a reassuring smile, “Alright then. Speak to your heart’s content whenever you’re ready. Shall we get started?”

“Certainly,” Josephine nodded, oh goodness, she was already…admittedly embarrassed. Perhaps she had not thought her agreement through—this- this was a difficult conversation enough on its own without- bah! She would indeed take the time to compose her thoughts, it would give her something to focus on other than the fact that she would be standing…before someone she held interest in…in her um. Underthings.

She was pleased, when the man turned his attention to his sketchbook to allow her privacy while she stepped into the corner of the room behind him and began carefully removing her amulet, dress, leggings…should she remove her shoes? Likely. Oh she did hope her feet didn’t um, smell. “I’m ready.” she called once she was standing before the fireplace in- oh. In nothing but her bodice and bloomers! She’d had her measurements taken before it shouldn’t be embarrassing but she-

She felt incredibly immodest as it stood. And yet at the same time, while she did not wish to have sex before marriage, neither did that mean she wished to be found wholly undesirable. And Leliana insisted she’d the underthings of an old woman—had mocked her when the Spymaster waltzed right into Josephine’s bedroom when she was still dressing for the day and the Ambassador had been startled, shrieked and reached for her robe to cover up and Leliana had laughed and laughed nearly wept from her efforts before she choked out “J-J-Josie, you’re practically in a Mother’s habit!”.

Oh! Brassieres were only becoming popular in Orleis! And therefore elsewhere but still, she found them…considerably impractical. What would one do if their shirt or dress blew upward? Eleanor wore leggings under her dresses which would cover her underthings should her skirt rise...or perhaps that was merely a concern for warmth—regardless, they served the same use as bloomers, it was an extra layer against chill and prying eyes and Josephine never wore as much without panties, that would be unsanitary! Under clothing was meant for modesty sake, was it not? To offer support and keep things covered if something unfortunate occurred to your overclothes.

They were _not_ grandmotherly!

The man finished scribbling something down in his sketchbook before snapping it neatly closed or, well, open but folded back on its hinge so only one side stayed open for him to write down her measurements, which he set on a small round table off to the side of the fireplace and unrolled his measuring tape, sparing her nothing more than a moment’s glance before he offered up an encouraging smile, “Let’s get started, shall we? Stand up straight.”

Josephine hadn’t realized she’d been shrinking in on herself a bit—she stood taller, straightening her shoulders and following his instruction as he measured, very cleanly, precise as he pulled the tape taut and slid his hand along its extended length swiftly to see where the end would meet with the tape before stepping back and jotting the number down. He’d just begun measuring the length of her arms. It felt silly but she asked, shyly, “Are my…” oh, she could not find it in herself to say ‘underthings’ to the man, “is my current attire…outdated?”

“It’s your dresses are beautiful, still well in style, my Lady,” Tonio assured, jotting down her wingspan before saying, “you may relax your left arm, do keep your right one up.”

Josephine nodded, correcting, “Not my dresses.”

“Oh—no, I do not believe so. This is very common—a great many of my clients wear likewise. It seems to be a matter of preference now a days. Some women prefer how they feel in more modern underthings, find bodices itchy or impractical as it is a bit more to button in the morning, and too certain styles fit better with brassieres. You look lovely, I assure you.”

Her face warmed at that, she— it came off like a polite compliment, lacked any hint of flirtation, and she did wonder further still, “Would it be rude if I questioned how you might tailor…um…would you tailor someone you were in romance with? Or would it be unprofessional to take them on as a client?”

“I don’t see why it would be—I’m currently tailoring you without issue,” he said with a playful smile at his lips as he came around to stand before her, measuring around her right wrist, “But no—measurements, undress, these are common parts of my occupation and I would never sexualize them with anyone regardless of relationship, that would be wholly unprofessional,” he insisted as he stepped away to write down his measurement, “Even as undress can be associated with romantic situations, the sentiment still stands—they would be undressed for me to measure, not for me. They are separate matters, with separate appropriate responses. The former requires professionalism,” he said, stepping back to stand close once more, gaze returning to hers as he concluded, “I would save rhapsodous attention, for the latter. Raise your left arm again, please.”

Could a brain melt? Josephine felt like her brain might be melting into her stockings. That-surely that shouldn’t rob her of her words. He was being entirely professional and she was reacting a fool! But did the man have to be so- tall and handsome and- and excellent in choosing cologne? Or was that aftershave- that was not the point! “I apologize if that was impolite to ask,” she heard herself say. Good, she was forming sentences, that was reassuring. She was even raising her arm as instructed!
“Not at all,” Tonio assured kindly, “your left arm please, my Lady?”

Ahh. Yes. She’d raised her right one again hadn’t she?

“Was this what you wished to speak with me of before?” Tonio wondered as he worked.

… “No,” not entirely, but she was getting ahead of herself she supposed. She had worried the man might not work with her if they pursued one another. But the man might hold no interest to begin with—or lose all interest once she confessed she’d not kept her word. “Your work as a tailor has hardly been a matter of subterfuge.”

“Ahh yes—forgive me, I’d forgotten subterfuge was your point of topic,” he chuckled.

Josephine nodded. “I…have admittedly…omitted truth recently. More so it is that I have not kept my word and I feel terribly about it—must right it. But I…feel I must also explain why I would break my word. Though, I must confess, that seems a bit silly.”

“I do not believe it would be,” Tonio said, “if you’ve broken your word with someone, I’m certain you did so with valid reason—it is not like you to do something in unkindness after all.”

“Oh! It isn’t!” Josephine assured, he finished with her arm but his hand raised, fingers gently pressing upward on her wrist when she made to lower it so she kept her arm up as he wrote, “I promise, it was not in meanness I was acting.”

“I would never assume you would,” Tonio assured likewise as his arms surrounded her momentarily to bring the tape up to wrap around her chest- oh! He’d had her arm remain raised so he could side-step and wrap the tape so his hands would be high on her ribcage, just below her arm pit. She was a bit less flustered with that, than she would have been with er- his hands being so very close to her breast.

“I’m glad,” Josephine said as he took down her measurement, “…because…well…the person I’ve broken my word with,” she ventured as he encircled her again, tape lower, around her waist, “…is you.”

That gave him a bare bit of pause as he raised his eyes to meet hers, “Me?” he asked, a bit confused, no condemnation in his stare just open acceptance. “How, pray tell? We’ve no word of bond that I know of save that I have promised you I would gladly listen whenever you’ve troubles to share.”

“…and to assist in misleading Leliana,” Josephine prompted, ducking her head, ashamed.

Tonio seemed to take that as her needing a bit of space, he looked to his measurement before stepping away to write it down and then he- well he dropped his sketchbook to the floor between her feet- oh. he was kneeling, to take measurements lower. Starting with her hips! Oh heavens! But he made swift work of it, horrible number it might be; advice had been…only one of the things her abuelita had passed down. But he soon moved on to her legs, she found it easier to stare ahead than to stare at him as he prompted, “Would you care to explain what you mean?”

Josephine nodded despite the fact he wasn’t looking up. “In truth…I only needed that bit of cover…before Leliana discovered my troubles. I expressed such distress at her coming on this trip she assumed it was because I…well she presumed I…have an appreciation for you in a romantic light, that I wished to be alone with you. Since I could not say I did not wish for her to come on this trip and find out my family’s financial state, as that would then be informing her of such…I appreciate you, agreeing to this but um…well, the cats are out of the proverbial bag,” she rambled, oh! “I- I apologize for not informing you days ago—I-I-I should have but- Leliana was so upset with me for having lied to her.”

Tonio looked up at her, smiling as he assured, “My Lady, this has been a very stressful time for you, and I can certainly understand you neglecting to say anything for fear of upsetting your friend.”

“That…is not necessarily…entirely my reasoning.”

“It isn’t?” he asked, brow furrowing in confusion.

Josephine cleared her throat, “Leliana was upset with me already—for having lied about why we were coming to Val Royeaux in the first place. So she called upon Cole to lay out every lie I’ve told to her this trip and when he did not say our attempted romance was false, she was relieved and I could not bring myself to say otherwise to her and…”

“My lady?”

“Cole…um…spoke some…truths. Personal ones, ones that I know on my end to be true. And when I thanked him for deceiving Leliana, telling her we truly are…enamored with one another…he…”

Tonio seemed to be recalling something for a moment and then he looked up at her, “He informed you we have been…unbeknownst to ourselves…sincere?” he carefully ventured.

“…yes. And…I found I…quite selfishly enjoyed the idea. I- oh I am so sorry, it was horrible of me—I should have confessed to Leliana and told you the moment our arrangement was unnecessary, it was foolish- but then I realized how at ease I was conducting ourselves as such, and we were having such a wonderful time and-it was selfishness entirely on my part and I apologize—” she stopped babbling, horrified how revealing she’d been and grateful Tonio had raised his hand to politely halt her near-rant.

“My Lady,” he said, “if you would, allow me to conclude my work here before we continue this conversation? Just a few measurements more and then you can re-attire—you’ll be more comfortable, I’m sure.”

Ahh. Yes. She certainly would be. Was it too early in the day for drink? She could have wine, surely?

She was less anxious once she was dressed once more, Tonio resuming his seat before her desk as he made some final notes in his sketchbook, awaiting her, and when she came to join him he smiled and gestured to the matching chair beside him, as opposed to her returning to her desk chair. It was a bit more appropriate for a non-business discussion and too the wingback chair was more plush.

Which was of potential benefit, as it was a perfect chair for fainting deadaway in—she was certain she might when the first words Tonio had spoken in the stance of ten minutes was,

“Would you permit me to court you?” at her surprised stare he said, “I’d an interesting encounter with Cole myself, just before he took his leave for his mission. I’d been having a conversation with Cremisius and the subject matter had me thinking of our arrangement. It is not false, he said. At the time we assumed he was assuring Cremisius my words were truth—that I would never be able to be in romance with someone unless they were someone he approved of, who accepted my son in full,” he explained, gaze unfaltering as he met her eye, “you happen to meet all three criteria.”

Her throat felt incredibly dry. “Th-three?”

“You are someone Cremisius respects and adores, you accept my son in full, and I would love nothing more than the honor of romancing you,” he said simply, reiterating, “Would you permit me to court you?”

Her mouth worked momentarily, and she only just found her words, “I- I- yes. Absolutely. I would be incredibly honored.”

“Then I would be incredibly honored if you would allow me to court you, no falseness about it. A bit of truth you can mend what trust you’ve broken from Leliana with. And a bit of well-deserved ‘selfish’ enjoyment for us both,” he returned her earlier word for it.

She smiled at that, eyes alight as she asked, “Truly?”

“In the fullest definition of the word.”

“I will…confess to Leliana that I misled her…and then inform her that it has led to genuine interest. Er…a confession, of genuine interest. I do assure you I was interested before.”

Tonio favored her a warm grin, “Likewise, cara mia.” And then, “you’ve gotten what you needed to, off of your chest?”

“…I have,” she supposed. “With you, at least. Now…well, I should…”

His smile only grew, “…would you like for me to join you while you speak with Leliana?”

“You…would be willing to do that?”

“I have a feeling if we are truly pursuing romance, uncomfortable conversations with the Spymaster will be a staple of our relationship,” the man supposed, wholly unphased as he rose from his seat, offering his hand to her and assisting in her rise. “Though it is well worth it, given staples such as this,” he swung their joint hands a bit as he rubbed the back of her hand with his thumb, earning him a smile…which only grew as, “and this,” and…well. Her brain, her heart…the entirety of her vital organs melted directly into her shoes as the man pressed a kiss to her forehead. “Shall we?”

“We shall.”

Chapter End Notes

*I hope the girl who created Yeet as we know it is having a good day and knows that I love her with my entire heart.
*After Here Lies the Abyss and dealing with the Wardens, Dorian's cutscene involves a mini rant about Divine Galatea's autobiography and I think it's fitting they have him voicing frustration with that particular thing, because they could have picked anything but they chose a Divine that would particularly be reviled as an example of the brutality of the south in Tevinter, and horrify mages in general because it was under her administration that the Right of Annulment was integrated into the Chantry, which when called upon allows Templars to execute every last Mage in their care and it's been enacted I believe three to five times in the past 5 years leading up to Dragon Age Inquisition.
*Getting Josie to Val Royeaux to talk is clearly a set up, and the way its executed I don't believe the Comte was just some random guy they picked to lure her there, the House of Repose wouldn't go pissing off a Comte they have nothing to hold over, so I figure it's them collecting a favor.
*My dumb ass has never played this mission but apparently when you side with the Templars and move to Skyhold, it unlocks a quest with Leliana called "Under Her Skin" (which is a mirror of Cullen's quest to find Samson if you side with the Mages) but while I've sided with Templars before I guess I just never checked in with Leliana as often as I should have because I had 0 clue this mission existed before this fic. So. Leliana is hunting down Calpernia and wants the Inquisitor to investigate an ally of hers in Orlais, Vicinus. It's there they find a memory crystal that Leliana reviews and then plants in a Venatori base. I have Leliana handling the mission herself in this fic, and I figure since the mission later involves her sending an agent to plant the memory crystal elsewhere, it would fit with having her trying to find a more Josie-friendly way of destroying the contract on her life.
*there's a dispute whether the dessert popularly known as Creme Brulee was invented in Spain before or after the French started popularizing it.
*this is the one fic where your otp share a room with two beds and that brings them together, it's the chaos twin of the "ohm there's only one bed what'll we do? fall in love I guess?" fic trope *technically the Cafe in Cafe con Leche is espresso, but you can get a similar deal with good coffee and steamed milk.
*Josephine has an unnamed brother, as he's listed last on her info page I just have him being her youngest sibling and named him Claude.
*Fa la nana, Bambino" is a precious Italian lullaby I've been dying to inform ya'll Tonio 100% sings to tiny Cremisius because I said so. There isn't a technically 'gender neutral' term in many languages (it's becoming more and more commonplace) but traditionally when referring to children in a gender neutral way, using masculine endings to words means "people in general" in spanish, itallian, etc. Like when Josie says "mijos" to refer to both Ellie and Krem, she means "children", not "boys". When Krem is a baby Tonio isn't certain about what's going on with his child but calling him bello mimo (handsome baby) or bambino (child, which can be percieved as masculine but is also gender neutral) seems to be his jam.
*In Under the Changing Stars I flesh out Thom's backstory and put a name and story on his mother, Margret Rainier. This is technically a spoiler for my final update of UTCS, and yes this is lead up to Thom finding out what's been going on with his mother after all these years. Why? Obviously I enjoy putting too much work into my plot points.
*Tythas is a relative of Cassandra the Inquisition checks on in "Investigate Hunter Fell" because he's got a string of lovers/acquaintances and one of them is a Venatori spy.
*Miraya Zeyase is Queen of Rivain so I use her last name for an official from Rivian Josie can call on as a contact, he's loosely a fanon cousin of the Queen.
*The play I describe is basically Theada's version of "Tartuffe", a French play by Moliere, which was banned for a decade or so after it's initial debut at Versailles, due to it's satirical message about false piety being seen by King Louis XIV as a challenge to the Roman Catholic Church.
*Carino is closer to 'sweetie' or 'sweetheart' but be recognized as 'honey' instead of the literal 'miel'
Before the Dawn: The Emerald Graves

Chapter Summary

Tackling "Before the Dawn" before we wrap up "Here Lies the Abyss", because thems the rules!
Fen'Harel returns to somewhat-still-familiar places as the Inquisitor and her party journey to the Emerald Graves. Sera's a badass, Solas repents, and forehead kisses are, indeed, the best.

Disclaimer: NO Seekers were fatally harmed in the slight cliff hanger of this chapter. The next chapter is well underway, I'm sorry I can't fit all the words in with character restrictions but I promise to update as soon as possible. Also I'm sorry and I love you all.

Chapter Notes

Hi all! I'm back! With another Chapter! Yay? To newbies, Hi! Welcome! I love you! To those of y'all still reading this--I love you with my entire heart. So much. Thank you for sticking with this nearly million-word-long fic. What are you doing here? What am I doing here? Loving you, I guess!

Also, as always, I promise I would be forthcoming and post major warnings about anything Actually bad happening, this is a heads-up that we walk right up to a triggering situation, but I promise everyone walks away perfectly fine and ultimately unharmed. Well, except for the people who cause the triggering situation, Spoiler Alert: Cole kills them! This was a method of dealing with the Freemen and a tiny thing that happens because of it sets up a future minor plot point with Ellie's wrist watch.

I'm not a medical health professional, but this chapter does touch on FTM Transitioning using Testosterone therapy. There's loads of research and information out there, I did my best to make sure I wasn't pulling from biased or hurtful sources, but authentic studies/info from our handsome community members who have shared their experiences as they've traversed transitioning. If anything looks inaccurate or YikesTM please correct me if you've the energy to and I will always be grateful for it!

Edit: I apologize for the inconsistency that was in this chapter when it was first uploaded, that unfortunately took me 2 days to realize. I had Vivienne in the tent when Sera discusses her magic...and then later the moment when Vivienne actually becomes privy to Sera's magical state she reacts as if its news to her (as she is supposed to! That was the plan! I just failed my self in enacting said plan!). I try to do whole chapter read-throughs before posting but unfortunately where I took brain breaks (where I lay on the floor for a few minutes resting my eyes and mumbling incoherently into the Void) left me coming back to it totally spacing on the fact that Vivienne's there earlier in the scene even though she's silent throughout the majority of it. It has since been corrected! So I apologize to anyone who read before the correction could be made. NOW I have Vivienne leaving to make tea before magic-talk can take place in the tent so...if ya'll want a fictional cuppa, made by a beautiful badass Circle Mage, you're
It was a strange thing, for Solas to return to this place. What did they call them now? The Emerald Graves. They were lush and vibrant as ever and he was not certain, but perhaps they’d grown more lovely in his absence. Of course the last time he’d traveled through these wilds, he’d been under urgency, fear and panic and fire coursing through his veins and the only thought on his mind was…well, every interaction he’d had with Mythal’s people over the last century, everything he’d seen and heard from them—who among them had done such a thing? Called her from their home when she was hardly in any state to travel—a single jarring jump might have seen their child born directly into the saddle—headlong into what he feared would be a trap, unfortunately had been. His return trip had been equally distracted, he could barely remember it, though there’d been something jarring when the Inquisitor’s party found the boundary, where Orlais spread into what his people now called the Dales and they were surrounded on all sides by green—the landscape was so overgrown it struck him as so familiar he thought they’d somehow mastered teleportation and found themselves instantaneously in the Arbor Wilds. The Emerald Graves appeared just as the older, untamed wilderness he’d laid Mythal to rest in, performed the ritual that allowed him to lift her dwindling magic to power his plans. But no, no if he’d the right perception of the world’s current map, her Temple was south of here, her grave further in the west. Younger forest had merely grown in the several Ages since he went to sleep.

He felt gentle prodding in the bond, something like question and comfort. And then softly, from the saddle of the horse riding alongside his own, “Is something wrong?”

Oh, it was relief to have her back in range of the bond, Ellie and Marehis both—even as he did not dip into his bond with Marehis, there was a level of comfort that came that the connection existed, that he could discern the woman was at least still of this world, he would have to be rid of his magic entirely not to have some feeling of her or Sera and Ellie in it, it was not unlike not being able to help seeing someone standing directly in one’s eyesight. He could not feel Sera quite yet but they’d a report from her just this morning that Ellie had read aloud—for his benefit, he supposed, as Cassandra and Marehis had read it over her shoulder as the girl read quietly to herself first and then something like realization sparked in her magic when she looked up and saw Solas… he was across the fire from her, staring very hard, admittedly trying to read the missive it backward from the barest outline of ink through the parchment and she’d offered a small smile and cleared her throat, and announced to the group that Sera was well, would be waiting for them at the Inquisition’s infiltration camp and would lead them to Fairbanks, the secondary camp she and Rainier had settled.

It’d been a kindness, and she was extending it further still. “I’m well. I am…somewhat familiar with the area—it has changed in my absence but there are some discernable landmarks I recognize. I…hope it can be of help.”

“Oh wow, you’ve been here- like way way back when?” Ellie questioned, interest piqued, a bit of wonder in her eyes. “Is it super different now?”

He favored her an amused grin, given, well yes, he was currently traveling with person beings who might not have ever existed if the world had continued being populated solely by Elvehnan. “Indeed—but I suppose you mean the landscape specifically? Yes, it is rather changed. I…admittedly may have planted a few of these trees myself. Myself and Mythal’s worshipers.”

She drew in a quiet gasp, “Really? Oh my gosh! It’s so beautiful, wow, is it…cool to see? You seem kind of sad, being back here makes you miss it, huh?” she offered, sympathetic, oh her magic twinged with it.

“I am not sad,” he assured, "merely nostalgic I suppose,” he said, smiling kindly in the hopes to relieve her. He…he would not delve into darker memories with the girl. No, if she wished it…oh he was so pleased to be reunited with them, have her speaking in his direction without quite so much hesitation or resentment burning in her chest. No, she felt…excited and curious, like she’d a million questions she would love to ask of him, and he wanted nothing more than to indulge her in each and every one with something that would not burden her—anything he could think of that might build her excitement or sooth her sweet heart to know of the days of old that could seem so very dark now that their sins were bare before her and she knew the truth about the old world.

While it’s governing system, its sole populace was nothing to repeat in the future, it was not wholly without merit. There had been some truly wonderful things.

“Oh. Good,” she nodded, worrying at her lip momentarily before something deflated in her. He supposed she was still nervous to have an outright unwarranted conversation with him in front of the others. He…did not want anyone to worry he was seeking to have Eleanor’s ear in privacy, but he was tempted to ask if she might join him in the Fade. There they could speak without reservation if she so chose.

Or…in the waking world, through the grace of her mother. “You planted trees before the veil? It was my understanding you were a shepherd.” Marehis asked conversationally, seated in the saddle behind Ellie, her arms wrapping albeit tighter around the girl almost possessively but that was just, she wouldn’t want to give him leash only for him to take it as a blanket invitation back into the girl’s good graces. She…didn’t sound accusatory, like she thought him lying, so that was some genuine improvement.

“Not just myself,” he said and then…oh. He…supposed they’d an audience of sorts. There had been idle chatter all around them—Cole was astride the steed with Lieutenant Aclassi, the sole Charger save the Iron Bull joining them on this venture, as apparently the young man had been given time off from commanding the Chargers…which he allotted to use to follow his girlfriend into the field. The Spirit was quiet and focusing on the task at hand, or perhaps he was communing with the creature on a level as the Tevinter man had encouraged the Spirit when he asked if he might endeavor to command their steed on his own, sat quietly in the saddle behind him and let him focus. Dorian, the Iron Bull, and Madam de Fer had been chatting with Seeker Pentaghast about the finer points of their respective trips. It had been relief to meet them south of Val Royeaux on their way to the Emerald Graves, he’d beaten Seeker Pentaghast there by the barest margins. It felt heady, the rush of relief that filled him immediately when he came in proximity of Ellie and Marehis, laid eyes on the girl after their time apart, she’d been seated around their dinner campfire under the dark of night and her eyes had lit up, Magic bubbling in excitement when she realized he was there, relieved to see him safe but the only thing she could bring herself to say was “Oh! Solas, you’re here—good! There’s dinner.” Which was quite a few more words than he expected but still, they were nothing in the wake of the elated “Mami!” that tore from her throat as she leapt up from the seat she made of boyfriend’s lap and ran to meet Seeker Pentaghast, hugging her tightly and word and after word tumbled from her lips as she launched into,

“We had so much fun in Val Royeaux! I got to wear so many of my pretty dresses Papa made for me, it was fun to dress up! I matched mi Tia! And Cremisius agreed to match with me, oh he was so handsome!” The aforementioned young man was seated at the fire alongside his leader, he offered up a smile and a wave to the bemused Seeker currently in the vice-grip of Ellie’s full body hug, “And we ate so much food! Do you know about Conchas mami? They’re Antivan, Tia Josie taught me how to make them, you can dip them in coffee! Ahh! I tried Espresso!” he was not certain what that was but the word had caused the Seeker’s expression to turn into open shock and then quiet reprimand as she hugged the girl closer so she could give the Qunari a fierce look over her head when the girl informed her, “The Iron Bull and me, we did Espresso shots together! They upset his tummy something fierce though and I ended up with a headache…so it was the closest thing to a wild night out? Except it was the afternoon, and I got to take a nap with Cole. And Cremisius! He brought me dinner when I woke up, it was super sweet of him. Oh we went to the theatre! And a museum! Cremisius is so smart, he knew like, so many of the artists, he could guess just by looking at the paintings who did what and he was right, every single time I’m pretty sure? He was the cutest!” it was admittedly sweet to see…well, the young couple were dearly in love, and it was something of comfort to Solas’s mind that while Ellie’s compliments may be well deserved, the young man didn’t have arrogance in him, was humble enough to receive them bashfully—he blushed and ducked his head as the Iron Bull chuckled, clapping his Lieutenant on the back of the neck, “Tia’s going to teach us how to waltz for the Winter Palace!” and then she gasped and...somehow dancing at the Winter Palace reminded her of something...he supposed was equally terrifying as dancing before the whole of Orlais most well-versed players of the Game, “Mami, are there Spiders as big as horses? Papa promises there aren’t but that Judge Auld person I had to write for Tia, he says there are, and I figure you’d know.”...there were. But apparently either Seeker Pentaghast had no such knowledge, or she was as resolved as all other adults in the girl’s life were to ensure she never discovered such a horrifying thing.

The night had had been full of catching up for the Seeker and the young people in their camp. The woman seated herself alongside Ellie as she resumed her seat with the Lieutenant, his chin resting on her shoulder as he and his girlfriend answered Cassandra’s every inquiry—to their wellbeing, every detail of their time in Val Royeaux—the Nevarran woman offering up a few details about her time in Skyhold. She’d apparently done some looking into reform of the Seekers, and even as she offered up nothing scandalous, she blushed through every question the Inquisitor had about her trip with Commander Rutherford.

There had been little opportunity for the adults to chat before they retired for the evening, but they’d been making up for that in the light of day. Their conversations had halted now, however, and Solas could feel eyes on him as he was addressed about his time before...well, any of their ancestors existed.

“There was once a great war that waged between Elgar’nan and Andruil, here in the south—they left the land you now know as the Dales a scorched husk. Where there is now lush, green life, there was blazing destruction in the wake of an argument over their respective territories—Everything from there to the edge of the Arbor Wilds once belonged to Andruil and Elgar’nan sought to take it from her...and in the end? Mythal talked them to reason—they’d done nothing but kill their own people over petty pride and left the lands they so sorely craved in waste, destroyed their prize in their attempts to win it. And it left it in her hands—it was a culmination of shame and...simply not wishing to have the responsibility of the land they soiled. Mythal already had claim to the lands of the Arbor Wilds, these wilderness neighbor her own, and she sent her people to task of healing it. We spent...oh, I cannot rightly recall, perhaps three...four decades, nearly half century making a home here and planting, growing shelter and food to coax the fled fauna into returning to their former home. I was there when the first of the Halla returned to this area.”

“Oh wow,” Ellie breathed, wistful, “That sounds...gosh, that had to be cool to see!”

“It was indeed,” he supposed. “My skills as a shepherd were brought to bear then,” he informed them, albeit...not smug, but it felt like a bit of flirtation to return the woman’s question to her with an answer. “Helping guide them, circulating through the foliage so they did not over consume from tender flora, kept guard of them when they took to the stream.”

“Was it super hard to herd Halla? Can you talk to them too?”

He shook his head. “No, I’ve not the magical affinity with them, but in my youth I’d a spiritual affinity with them I suppose. Too...they’ve an enjoyment of Vehnan Root, and music.”

“Vehnan Root?”

“...what we now term Elf Root, as it has a great many healing properties that brings so many loved ones back from the brink of death.”

“Ohhh,” Ellie breathed. “Oh I like that! I’ve always kind of been nervous that calling it ‘Elf Root’ because it’s pointy is racist,” true, if it was likening it to Elvethan ears...he’d certainly yet to see such a wild pair of ears on one of his kinsmen. “That’s so pretty, and sweet, it’s actual name. I’m glad you taught me it!”

“I’m glad it pleases you,” he assured.

“What kind of music do Halla like?” she wondered next.

“...the same as most, I suppose,” he avoided exemplifying it before the whole of her party. “Soothing, melodious tones. Nothing somber, airing on the side of lightheartedness.”
Thankfully it was enough to satisfy the girl, “That’s so cute!”

Perhaps it was. And he’d a likeness for the word, saw the definition of ‘cute’ play out to the letter when they neared the infiltration camp. In the same moment he felt Sera enter the orbit of their bond...he felt it two fold, like there was a separate bond linked there, Ellie and Sera’s...and that was met with a high-pitched scream of delight rising in the distance, the din of someone scrambling through the brush and Ellie let out her own squeal of excitement, was bouncing in the saddle she eventually launched herself from the moment the litany of, “Inky Inky Inky Inky Inky Inky Inky!” echoed from the wilderness because it was followed shortly by Sera bursting from between trees and flinging herself at the Human girl who had only just rolled to her feet to meet her with a bracing hug with her own cry of, “Sisssy! Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh! I missed you so much my heart hurts!” Ellie exclaimed, her party coming to a halt behind her.

“Mine too! I mean it’s fun ‘venturin’ with Lacey but shite I missed you! You had lots and lots of fun in Val Royeaux right?”

“Uh-huh!”

“And you didn’t get assassined none?”

“Nope! And Josie only got almost assassined once! Cremisius kept her safe!” …was the girl being genuine? Solas thought the concern for assassination to derive from...well, the normal threat level of as much befalling the girl. Whatever caused assassins to threaten the Ambassador’s life? “I only had tea and cakes with the Assassin from the House of Repose. Oh and Tatie too—Leliana took me to tea to thank me for helping Tia Josie.”

So perhaps Ellie hadn’t mentioned every last aspect of her trip last night, but he supposed Seeker Pentaghast had well been in the know.

“She truly was safe,” Marehis offered him quietly. She was not looking at him, at least she wasn’t now that she addressed him, he supposed she’d noticed his quiet worry-mixed...jealousy? That was the closest word to it. perhaps it was merely longing. His punishment was merciful, what made it punishment was the fact that while he was in the Hinterlands he could not be with those he loved, that he was still albeit estranged and not fully in the know as he once had been. Scarcely more than a month ago, he would have known every in and out of Ellie’s interaction with an Assassin’s House. “If...it had been a threat directed at the Inquisitor, we may have been inclined to excuse you from your work in the Hinterlands, so your ability to monitor her safety could be brought to bear,” she allowed even.

The Marchand’s guest rooms were something of luxury, beds soft, warm but that was more on account of the woman falling into bed alongside him with a breathless sigh—he’d only just dropped into it himself after he and Marehis raced through the halls of the estate, slipping from view of their fellow party members once they left Eleanor to slumber after Madam de Fer’s salon.

“Do you think she suspects us?”

“Mmm...no, there is nothing in the bond that speaks to that.” he felt a warm grin tug at his lips, “I suppose our liaison is still that of upmost secrecy.”

“How very thrilling,” the woman conspired, pressing a kiss to his jaw as she settled in against his chest, leg looping over his own.

“If our romance were to come to light, do you suppose the thrill would die?” he wondered.

“Oh Solas,” the woman had offered sympathetically, in tones meant to sooth concern. Then, simple assurance, “Absolutely.”

Somehow he did not imagine his joining them in Val Royeaux would have been quite so pleasant. Awkward, was a more appropriate word. Too...above everything, he was grateful there’d been no reason to call him there, that Ellie had not been put to threat. So, “I’m...glad that was not necessary.”

Marehis nodded, indifferent. Though that melted when Sera...apparently grew impatient to be greeted by the woman—to be fair it was Sera who’d been preoccupied, between Ellie’s exuberant greeting and having only just extracted herself from a ‘Krem and Cole sandwich’ she’d demanded from the young men she’d missed—and now she slipped a foot into the holster to rise up and seat herself backward in the saddle, straddling the woman’s thighs, “Oi! Hey you! You miss me or what?”

“Hello Da’vehnan,” the woman offered up amusedly, hugging the girl tightly, “Of course I missed you, sweet girl,” she assured, brushing the girl’s hair out over her face, though, oh. Goodness. The girl had a thin, shimmery scar across the peak of her right cheekbone that had certainly not been on her person when last Solas laid eyes on her. Marehis gingerly traced a finger along it before peppering kisses to the mark, sending the girl blushing and scrunching up her face as she squirmed, albeit embarrassed at the woman’s affection, “I missed your beautiful face!”

“Frig! I missed you too, barmy! You have fun in Val Royeaux? Inky said you got to go see a play, took a day at the museum with your,” the girl snorted, giggling before she offered up the word, “lover?”

That…oh. It was foolish to be jealous, wasn’t it? He…Marehis was not his, not in the least, and he’d most irreparably lost their former standing. If she…if she had found it in herself to move on from that, after he hurt her so? He would be glad of it.

“We had a lovely time,” Marehis assured as Madam de Fer sounded a haughty chuckle.

“Good!” Sera said, “Sandra—you and Commander Dreamy had a fun trip?”

“We did,” the Seeker allowed, “I’m excited to hear of your own excursion. Cullen has had nothing but good things to say, he’s very proud of you—he told me to tell you as much.”

“Silly, he’s written me that like, friggin’ a dozen times already, I believe ‘im!” Sera half-complained, almost shy. Oh, he was grateful for this…that the Commander looked on this girl and loved her perhaps as much as he did Eleanor, that she could find something of a respectable fraternal figure in the Human man. “Well…let’s get you lot up to speed then,” Sera supposed, holding out her arms as she leaned to the side in the saddle and Ellie was there, holding her arms up to the older girl as Sera slipped out of the saddle and Ellie giggled as she supported the Elf girl’s weight, kept her from falling face first out of the rather tricky seating situation she’d been in and then Sera was on her feet, hugging Ellie again with a groan of effort before turning her back to the girl, kneeling as she reached behind her to get her hands on the backs of Ellie’s knees and pulling her forward, the Inquisitor giggling as she wrapped her arms around Sera’s neck and her legs around her middle, accepting the offered piggy back ride. “Oof, alright!” Sera said as she rose up, jostling the Human girl a bit as she secured her arms under the girl’s thighs, “Follow me!”

So they did, riding carefully along behind them as Sera led them along the freshly worn path to the Inquisition’s camp. Sera did catch them up with how many Rifts were present in the Emerald Graves…a great many, Solas supposed it would be as such. So many Elvehnan had passed on from this world in this area in the days of old, Rifts seemed to tear in places a great deal of magical people had passed on and left the veil so thin in their wake that when Coryephus endeavored to bring it down, tearing open the Breach, such places tore too. Sera’s hands massaged at the underside of Ellie’s thighs like the girl sought to soothe her sister as she informed her that there…was a grand total of eleven Rifts in the area. The Lieutenant quietly cleared his throat, rubbing at his nose with the back of his hand as he turned his face away so if Ellie happened to look up at him she wouldn’t bear witness as worry washed over his features. They…were not necessarily on the best of terms, Solas supposed, he and the Lieutenant—perfectly understandable that the young man might thoroughly hate him—but he had nothing but respect, cautious care for the young man that had done so much for the Inquisition, for their Inquisitor in particular, so he offered a small, sympathetic smile that was met with neutrality…well. He did not bare his teeth at the very least, the young man had very expressive eyes that communicated well he would love nothing more than for his stare to strike the Elf man dead where he stood. That was admittedly fair, he rather…well.

The next few days would be painful, for this girl. Her Mark would be torment until they were through. And Solas regretted nothing more.

“Don’t gotta seal them all in one day Ink. Hell, you don’t even got to seal them all,” Sera was saying. “I got ‘em sort of…categorized for you? A game plan, if it’s any help. There’s seven that are real trouble, and even then there’s only three that are top priority.”

The girl hummed a bit, squeezing her arms around Sera’s shoulders like a hug as she quietly assured, “I can do it. What’s your game plan, chica?”

“So top three are all local—one of ‘em is off northeast of our infiltration camp, but it’s not in an area we got a lot of traffic in, everyone’s good to avoid it so it’s something I figure you can catch on your way out of here,” Sera informed her, ‘First two I reckon are tippy top priority, should be taken care of as soon as possible—is the two south most Rifts hangin’ round the Pavilion. Freemen had Fairbanks and his people ruddy well trapped in this shite canyon place they was holdin’ their ground from when we arrived—his people are movin’ to a new set up we was able to secure for them and those Rifts is…there’s a way through but everyone’d sleep better at night with them gone, there wouldn’t be any risk of someone accidentally straying off the beaten path and triggering a demon horde. They’re uh…real nasty Ink. Huge. Fucking Pride demon level. Even if you could just get the south east one down, they’d have a hell of a lot more breathing room.”

“Kay. We’ll definitely kick that one’s butt today and we’ll see how everyone’s hanging before we decide if we can hit the second one. I don’t know how I’ll feel in a few days but the me right now doesn’t want to leave this place without closing all the Rifts so…ya’ll are in charge of reminding the me in a few days that might not feel so giddy about it—I don’t know that bitch yet, but she can’t be trusted if she’s willing to leave the sky all holey so keep me-her accountable. I promise a third, future version of myself will be grateful for it.”

“We will remind you, da’vehnan, but I have faith in every version of yourself,” Marehis offered. Oh. he did not need the excess worry permeating his magic from their bond to tell him she was horrified at the notion of facing nearly a dozen Rifts, what sort of pain that might inflict upon this girl. The Rift nearest their camp was not even in view, he had to focus to feel the barest glimmer of its presence but Ellie’s Mark was already stinging more intensely.

“You’re a friggin boss Inky,” Sera encouraged the girl.

She…she was. But apparently she was not alone in that.

There were a number of scouts gathered in their infiltration camp, but it would be hard to miss Lace Harding, the Dwarf woman had actually risen up to stand atop a table to wave at them as they came into view.

“Inquisitor! I’m so glad you made it, gosh, I was wondering where Sera got off to!”

“Hiya Lace!” Ellie called, raising her Marked hand to wave back.

Though the pleasantries stopped there, the casual atmosphere turned more…serious. Not sternly so, but it felt very much like a leader had stepped foot into camp and gotten the rapt attention of the Inquisition’s scouts and soldiers…and Solas thought momentarily that leader was Ellie. She was the Inquisition’s leader after all, but after,

“Inquisitor,” a scout addressed Ellie with a polite nod, the man looked to Sera, “South’s all clear ma’am. Bear situation’s handled and there’s been zero Freeman activity in the south or the north western quadrant. Butler’s due to report in from the north east any minute now.”

“Good—if you don’t hear back from him in the next ten minutes, send for an update from Direstone camp. If he hasn’t reported in with them, send a runner to tell me—I’ll be in Fairbank’s digs for a bit yet, I’ll have Thom and his men run back up and extraction or whatever, make sure they haven’t gotten themselves into trouble, I told them I just wanted eyes on that weirdy house, they en’t supposed to go in it, but shite happens,” Sera shrugged. “Bears aren’t gonna be a problem anymore? Good. We don’t want no trouble with their mama—keep our hunters out of her space and she’ll stay out of ours I figure. Camp should be safe to leave with just a few essentials here—I want you lot,” Sera pointed to, well, the group of scouts gathered around her, her finger indicating five of their numbers, “and you,” she nodded to two Inquisition soldiers to her left, “Fairbanks people are on the move today, you lend him a hand—shouldn’t be no trouble from the Rifts if they stick to the path Lace n’ me mapped out, it’s smack in the middle but out of range of both those shite things—Inquisitor’s here now. I’m taking her to meet Fairbanks in his old set up and we’ll take a crack at the southeast Rift. Make sure our people know just ‘cause the Inquisitor’s in town don’t mean all the Rifts is gone overnight—I want updates going out every shift change to make sure everyone’s on the same page as some areas’ll be safer to travel in while others are still no-gos. I don’t wanna hear anyone gettin’ Rift burned because they don’t read their reports—they’ll get my foot in their ass so far they’ll have an excuse not to read cause my toes’ll be their new eyes.”

“Of course ma’am.”

“I wanted patrols on the path to Briathos’ Steps, and dedicated guard circuits holding the perimeter—everything’s set there right? The Inquisitor and her party will be joining their camp tonight.”

“Yes ma’am,” another scout spoke up. “I came from there this morning. The Inquisitor’s tent is as you left it, patrols are reporting all-clears from the area, no Freemen, no stray demons, and the wolves have been cleared.”

“Great job everyone, we’re kicking some real ass here, I appreciate all your help,” Sera said, like a wish of farewell though no one moved. “Oh. Right. Dismissed or whatever.”

“Ser’,” the Iron Bull spoke up, it sounded like he’d only just found his voice, “Don’t take it weird but that was fucking hot.”

“Yeah it was, my lady’s real bossy,” Lace affirmed as she drew nearer, raising a hand to blow a kiss up to Sera before using that same hand to swat at the Elf girl’s backside. “She’s really been holding it down around here.”

“Friggin’ Commander’s the one who put me in charge or whatever,” Sera was blushing from cheek to the tips of her ears, “so I had to do something, right?”

“On the contrary, Sera—it was you who took charge,” Cassandra said, “Cullen merely acknowledged your efforts to ensure you went without question. You were leading talks with Fairbanks and gauging the severity of the situation here between the Rifts and the Freemen and sundry of your own initiative and,” oh goodness, the woman almost seemed moved to tears, she was so very proud as she stood alongside Sera, raising a hand to pat the girl on the arm as she cleared her throat. “Well. You’ve done remarkably. You should be very proud of yourself.”

“Just…” Sera shrugged, “just wanted to help. Make this shite show less of a mess for Inky to deal with,” she supposed. “Shite needed done so I did it.”

That pulled a bemused smile from the Seeker as her hand went to cup Sera’s cheek thumb brushing along the mark there. “I don’t suppose I could have said as much any better myself.”

“Mmwah!” Ellie doled out a rather enthusiastic kiss to the girl’s spare cheek. “You’re amazing Ser’, seriously. You didn’t have to, but you really stepped up!” And then she patted the girl on the shoulder so Sera released her hold of Ellie’s legs and let her drop to her feet, the Inquisitor hugging Scout Harding in greeting and thanking her for everything she’d done—brightening, a happy skip in her magic flooding the bond when the Dwarf woman informed her she would be staying in the Emerald Graves, at least for the time being. So, it would seem their party wouldn’t be wholly without Dwarven influence in Varric’s absence.

…he’d received a letter from the Dwarf, actually. He’d not expected to hear from…well, anyone, but certainly not Varric Tethras. He’d a question about fauna—complained the Western Approach had him ‘ass deep in hyenas’ and wondered if he had any advice with getting them off their backs. ‘Goddamn Quillbacks—have those fuckers always been around?’ …no, actually. Phoenix’s were even stranger, they sounded like some horrible bastardization in the evolution, or perhaps devolution of Griffons. So he offered what he could of advice, he knew well if he left food out for creatures when he meditated or slept in the Fade in their habitats, often they left him be. They restocked on potions, made certain everyone had what they would need before the day ahead, Ellie quietly shaking out her hand, exhaling through a spike in its burn. Sera took her sister’s Marked hand in hers, raising it to kiss the back of her hand before rubbing circles with her thumb, swinging their arms a bit as she called ‘dibs’ on walking with ‘Inky’. She gave her a quiet rundown on what the refugee leader Fairbanks was like, as they made their way, through the forest and down a steep path into, yes, a very cavernous place indeed. Hmm.

Ahh, that was why this place seemed unfamiliar—it used to be a river, inlet from the river that still ran through the Emerald Graves. There was a great deal of water beneath the ground under their feet, but once upon a time the heights of this canyon used to be just perceivable above the waterline—where the Inquisition’s infiltration camp was, had once been riverbank. Deep Mushroom grew along the canyon walls—that was what reminded him, helped him realize he’d been here, in this very spot exactly before—when it was underwater. While that particular plant life had not existed in the time before, back before the days of the Blight’s existence, this whole canyon had once been one solid, great rock formation in a river, it’s walls coated in bioluminescent algae. There had been…it had been his first experience with swimming, doing so in that river, diving deep to watch the array of color fluctuate through a range of blues, purples, to pale white. They would dive and collect it to take up above the water, leave homages to their patrons and each other, dedications to the forest they were trying to restore through etching murals into the algae and taking what was scraped off to used as light in the world above. It was less dangerous to carry in their lamps than firelight—and smear along paths they took to light the way in the darkness so any who were lost could find their way back. all of the trees were taller now and he wondered…he would look up this evening. Perhaps, somewhere up there, their handprints still glowed like starlight.

“Oh,” Cole breathed at his side. “That would be nice. That makes me happy.”
“What’s on, cuddly?” Sera wondered over her shoulder as she and Ellie led their party.
“Nighttime will be beautiful here,” Cole informed her.
“Maybe we’ll do a little nighttime exploring while we’re here then,” the Lieutenant said, “do a little star gazing?”
“Oh,” Ellie breathed at that, “Yeah, that would be fun. This really is a beautiful place,” she complimented softly, reaching out with her unmarked hand to trace her fingertips along the canyon wall. Oh it- oh he’d forgotten. The algae, it had been dim in the day, so much so that even now he didn’t realize until she raised her hand that that same stuff still existed—coated these walls. Sunlight met it, making the algae itself dim, but when Ellie’s fingers brushed against it? The tips of her fingers, her unmarked hand blocked the light and let what was under her hand glow in her wake, dragging a glowing trail that disappeared almost as quickly as it appeared as she walked along. It felt familiar, like watching his child trace steps he’d once taken, even as she walked where he never could have imagined dry land would exist one day—once upon a time Solas, in a time when that name meant tranquility, had walked the waking world marking light along bark and stone to guide those he loved to places they called home.

There was a startling sound, a heartbeat thunking and the stuttering in someone’s chest and Marehis flinched, breath catching in her throat like she choked on a gasp.

“You okay there, babe?” the Iron Bull was addressing the Elf woman, his hand high on the gentle slope of her back, rightly concerned as all of the aforementioned sounds had come from her. Solas- oh he carefully skirted the bond, worried she- well he wasn’t certain what would cause her heart palpitations or to lose her breath at the moment-

Sera told me to tell you, Cole’s voice spoke in his mind, passing along a message from the Elf girl, her words were strange to hear in the Spirit’s voice, ‘Shite, I friggin’ missed Inky too but damn. Glad you love her an’ pish but keep your emotions to yourself, friggin’ just about started ruddy crying! That’s just dumb!’

Ahh. The bond then, was the culprit. He’d- oh he hoped Marehis didn’t think he’d intentionally sent her his er- feelings. Being somewhere so- Elvethnan had precious little concept of not seeing their projects to fruition—it was not as if they could perish of age, there had been many mages, scientific minds that saw the long-reaching effects of their earliest most discoveries. But when Mythal perished and Solas banished their leaders to the Fade? He…didn’t know what the waking world would hold for him. It was the first time he thought perhaps he’d never see what would become of a project—of this place, the little sea of saplings they planted long ago. He’d seen the trees mature, but he never imagined this. The river drying up and leaving such a thriving, enormous world of greenery in its wake. It made him proud, and homesick, and remorseful for his actions—lament he could not just openly- they knew, these girls, that he was from the time before, and he wished…he wished he’d never hurt them, that somehow, someway they could know each other as they do now without any of the harm he caused, and he could share in this with them in full—take them exploring, tell them every last story he could possibly think of, delight them in this place as it delighted him.

So. Apparently he was feeling rather a lot, and that unfortunately bled into his magic and the bond, startled the woman who was not accustomed to magic.

“Mami?” Ellie stopped walking to turn and look to the Elf woman.

“I’m fine da’vehnan,” Marehis assured, nodding before she looked up to the Qunari and offered a small reassuring smile, patting his arm and he nodded, removing his hand from her back. Oh. It struck him then, the familiarity of the Iron Bull’s hand on her body, and he…called people babe, as a form of casual affection…but he even called Dorian as much. Too…the Qunari was very casual in many respects so perhaps were- they might be-

It…was none of his business.

What was entirely his business, thankfully, was the small wave of Ellie’s magic coasting against his own, pressing a tap, tap-tap against his magic as the girl met his eye momentarily before resuming their course ahead. It was…it was a way they once expressed the sentiment I love you or…well, I love you too was her meaning this time. He was remorseful he’d made Marehis uncomfortable, Sera too but he…was glad to have that little bit of something he thought lost. When he was first revealed, he believed he might never feel that inside…it was not an inside-joke, because it was not a joke full stop, but it was a private code of sorts, dipping into and out of the bond with their magic in a specific pattern only they knew the meaning of. It used to be a near-daily occurrence, he would find himself proud over something the girl had done that left him expressing the sentiment, he might do something she found herself giddy over or grateful for and there it would happen. To feel that again was…

If he was not careful, he might have Sera taking swings at him for making her openly weep from his emotions. He imagined Marehis might well stab him, and he might lose what little he’d rebuilt with Ellie. So. He ground himself in focus on the task at hand, one foot in front of the other, cast wherever the Inquisitor needed him to.

Ahh, he’d wondered where Rainier and his men were—he’d expected them to be waiting with Sera but she’d apparently put them to use. He was not entirely familiar with the Iron Bull’s secondary Chargers…but he supposed that wasn’t entirely necessary given,

“Klaus!” Ellie exclaimed, excited to see the Human man who had been reaching to heft a crate but his fingers stilled around the handholds and he immediately turned, smile tugging at his lips as he opened his arms, braced for impact as the Inquisitor released Sera’s hand and rushed to hug Thom’s second in command. “Hiya!”

“Hey yourself sweetpea. Oh, I’m glad you made it here safe—Thom’ll be-”

“Ellie-girl?!” Rainier’s voice…rather boominly implored from on high, echoing down through the canyon—goodness. The man was high up on a tiered walkway that allowed those down in the cavern’s epicenter to ascend upward, it seemed like a tactical decision—if they were attacked and such a thing came to this place? They would be equipped to fire down from on high, he supposed, pull up their ladders to keep enemies from climbing. Thom Rainier was not necessarily an elderly man, but he wasn’t young and it was honestly surprising how swiftly he moved—dodging his way between a few passersby as he abandoned his station and slid down one ladder, ran further still, and then slid down another—he was admittedly breathless as he met them but he tiredly swung out an arm that Ellie put herself in the hold of as she stepped away from Klaus, hugging Rainier around his middle as he wrapped his arms around her, catching his breath as he rested a hand on the crown of her head, pressing his lips against her hair- oh. he looked…the man looked so relieved he might cry. Had there been some great cause of worry? The other Human man, Klaus—he was not necessarily very close to Ellie but he seemed beyond relieved to see her, had been enthusiastic in his greeting. “Damn am I glad to see you girl. You’re okay? Had a nice time in Val Royeaux?”

“Uh-huh, it was lots of fun! I missed you though.”

“Oh hell, sweetheart—I missed you too,” he looked to Sera over Ellie’s head as he asked, “Everything all good getting here?”

Sera nodded an affirmative while Ellie assured, “Uh-huh!”
“We had no trouble,” Marehis spoke up, meeting his gaze with intention.
“All clear all around—’cept in the northeast, but Butler’s on that. Depending on what we hear back, I figure if there’s anything, you lot can handle it, yeah?” Sera said to the Mercenary who nodded.

Northeast…oh. It was the only place that scout, ‘Quill’ Solas supposed his name must be, had listed as still holding a potential for Freemen activity.

He’d been just about to drift off to sleep himself, the sleepy haze from Ellie in the bond as the Human girl settled in for the night, warm and content as she rested…her magic felt as at peace as it did when she was with her mother. But he supposed that must be Cassandra, because he was startled fully awake by Marehis entering his tent, a finger raised to her lips as a signal for quiet—though perhaps it was that she didn’t wish to prolong a conversation with him by cluttering it with explanations and pleasantries, she had a singular objective.

"You are to monitor the Inquisitor at all times, her state of being and her proximity—she is not to be more than twenty meters away from you at any given time—if you feel her moving out of range, say the distance you are from her presently?" his tent was opposite the campfire from the one Ellie, Marehis, and Madam de Fer had laid claim to before Cassandra’s addition. “You are to lay eyes on her and confirm her location and if you can’t see her or she slips out of the perimeter I’ve set with you—you are to raise alarm immediately,” she fiercely intoned. “Do you understand me?” And when he nodded, so did she before she offered, “Good.” And took her leave.

He thought it was some measure due to Ellie’s recent mental health struggles, he’d been restless because he- he could not perceive anything unusual in the bond—her symptoms of depression seemed to be improving as of late, she felt recharged after her time in Val Royeaux, had a state of contentment about her more often than not. Had she given them further cause for concern? He’d studied the bond several times over before he found sleep. Now he supposed…was Marehis’s charge of proximity due to some threat from the Freemen? He’d…kept his word. To his own detriment even, he had…well. Ellie had gone out of sight, alone Solas thought and unfortunately it was albeit too late for him to realize it was not adrenaline from oncoming danger Ellie was feeling but er…the thrill and excitement of a more…private sort. He’d caught the unfortunate sight of the Lieutenant standing with his back against a tree, his hand pressed to his mouth to quiet himself while Ellie…

He was going to pretend the girl had merely been tying her shoe while looking upward at her boyfriend and reciting the Chant. Her lips a good, safe distance from his private parts, and not directly making contact wi-

He was not one for prayer, but if he were, he was decently certain he would pray Ellie and the Lieutenant had gotten their passions out of their system now that they were more directly in the field. Though Marehis had been amused at his expense when he returned to camp sans Ellie and informed her the girl may be occupied with something he should not be bearing witness to, would Cole give them privacy but also guard them? Blessed Spirit.

He was startled momentarily, he’d lost focus—Ellie was not currently in view. Well, more over she wasn’t currently still attached to Thom Rainier, though the man still had a hand on her—arm around the back of her neck while his elbow rested on her shoulder, bent upward so his hand could rest on the crown of her head as she turned her attention to another Human man, Fairbanks. She was shaking his hand and rattling off questions—how was he doing? Gosh it was so great to finally meet him, she’d heard so many wonderful things—did his people need anything? Anything at all? Oh they’re moving today—everyone could help carrying things and if they wanted, after their horses got a bit of rest maybe the steeds could lend to the effort!

“We’re going to clear the southeast Rift first thing,” Ellie assured him, “maybe it’s neighbor too. Either way you’ll have a bit more room that’s safe to move through—if we can, we’ll come back and help you move! Do you think you’ll like your new headquarters?” she wondered.

“They’re perfect,” he assured her, “we appreciate all the Inquisition has done for us already. Your alliance has been more than helpful.”

“Our alliance?” Ellie asked, smiling as she regarded the man with curiosity before she looked to Sera, “Are we already allied with Fairbanks and his people?”

“Nah Ink, that’s your job, I just did mine—make contact, see what needs done around here,” Sera shrugged.

“Mmm, no alliance here then, but that’s why I’m here,” Ellie said, “seal the Rifts, and see if you’d like to continue your relationship with the Inquisition or step it up a notch.”

“Oh,” Fairbanks said, albeit startled. “I…I perceived— you’ve…your people cleared out the Freemen and saved my people from captivity—

“Well yeah, of course our people helped you. And if all we got in return for that was the ability to keep our camps up to intercept Red Templar movements and make sure the area stays Rift and Corypheus free? Cool. You want to work with us more than that? We’ll chat about your future in the Inquisition while I’m in the area. You’ve got some serious commitments to your people here, I understand if you don’t want more, but from everything I’ve heard—our Ambassador could definitely use your help with relations between the Inquisition and the Dales. You could even handle relations between your own people and Orlais more…directly—either yourself or someone you would trust in the Inquisition, talking to people at Court to make sure your people aren’t further displaced.” She rested a hand on his forearm, “Take a while to think it over. I’ll be around for a few days, we can talk it over and you can think about how exactly you might like to work with us, if you’re interested.”

The man nodded, minorly reticent at, “I…would not be one for speaking at Court.”

“I get that,” Ellie assured. “Sera has kept your confidence; she takes that seriously but um…I don’t necessarily count as ‘blabbing to people’.”

Fairbank’s mouth popped open for a moment as he started, looking between Sera and Ellie. “Oh. Oh! Ink—” he cleared his throat, piecing together that Inquisitor Trevelyan and Sera’s ‘Inky’ were in fact the same person and not some little sister back home she wrote of…some secret? “She did inform me she would be um, sharing certain information with you.”

“I’m where my sissy’s secrets got to die!” Ellie assured, “So no worries okay? It’s totally your business and I’m super proud of the path you’ve chosen and the spirit you’re keeping your privacy in. So if you do want the benefits of working with the Courts, we’re going to work with you on that—you’ll never have to do anything you’d be uncomfortable with.”

“Thank you. I would be honored to work with the Inquisition further.”

“Great! Think on your role—both what you’d like to do with the Inquisition, and how it will affect your work here—and we’ll sit down together and get everything worked out.”

“At your discretion,” he agreed, nodding even as he blanched a bit, looking the girl up and down as he said, “I can spare men for your efforts against the Rifts, if it pleases you, my lady.”

“That’s super sweet but I’d hate to take your people from you, they’ve got enough work cut out for them today. I might borrow Thom’s men if that’s okay with you and him—working together we should have it covered,” Ellie assured, confidentially enough, though her hand blazed since they walked so deep into the canyon, nearer the Rifts. He tried to send what he could of comfort. He hoped whatever it was Cullen so sorely needed from this area and Fairbank’s allegiance was well worth it.

“My prayers will be with you then,” Fairbanks offered, bowing, “By your leave, Inquisitor.”

“Are you okay with your men helping with the Rift?” Ellie asked as she turned to face Rainier directly, apologetic, “I did mean to ask, I promise it’s not a demand or anything if you’d rather-”

“Hush girl—you’re Inquisitor, my men are yours to make demands of,” Rainier assured, “Let me signal them and we’ll be ready when you are.”

“Thanks, they’re um…probably going to be pretty tough. Make sure everyone’s good on potion and Cyril has his healer’s kit on him, yeah?”

“I’m on it,” Klaus stepped up, earning a nod from Thom, “Be back in a jiff,” he promised before racing off—onward and upward out of the other side of the canyon, Solas could hear his signal horn calling the Chargers return.

Ellie exhaled, hands on her hips as she paced from Fairbank’s soon to be cleared desk that appeared to be his center of operations, walking back in the direction they came—stopping just before the narrow trail, head lolling back and to the right, neck cracking with the motion before she rolled her shoulders. The Lieutenant gave her a moment to herself before he quietly approached her, laying hands on her shoulders and she breathed a contented sigh as he massaged at them, whispering against her ear, “You’ve got this, El. We’re with you all the way. You need to stop? Just say the word.” Ellie nodded. “How bad’s the Mark?”

“Two,” she replied softly, the young couple speaking quietly—a private conversation, at least for their Human compatriots. Solas heard Dorian groan and offer a quiet complaint to Bull that he would, in fact, be nauseated if the young man was initiating some sort of disgusting display of physical affection with his girlfriend in the middle of a field mission.

“And how bad is it really?” the Lieutenant offered in tones of amusement, lightening their subject.

“Five here. Six back there,” her head nodded backward, toward their gathered group. She swallowed. “These are going to be really bad, Cremisius. I’m…I’m scared—what if someone gets hurt or—“

“Hey—it’s going to be okay. We can do this. If it’s too much to handle? Call a retreat, we’ll work together, get everyone to safety and regroup. Cullen would always send you soldiers, and I’m sure the guys aren’t all the way back to Skyhold yet. If you wrote Skinner that you were scared and needed help in a fight? She’d sprout wings and fly her way down here.”

Oh, relief flooded the bond. This young man made Ellie feel safe, made the nervous buzz in her magic quiet and work to console its Mage. The girl offered up a wet sounding laugh, sniffling as she raised the palm of her unmarked hand to wipe at her nose before taking a deep breath before she turned to face him—the rest of their onlooking group, her eyes were a little red, features tight with strain, but the Lieutenant managed to put a smile on her lips. “Thanks, Cremisius.”

“Of course,” he nodded, wrapping his arms around her to pull her in for a hug, hand rubbing circles on her back while the other rested atop her head as he pulled her into his chest. And then he called over his shoulder. “Oi, Ser’, Cole—you want in on this?”

“Squeeze time!” was Sera’s agreement, as she ran to join them, wrapping her arms around the Lieutenant and Ellie, Cole materializing at their side to join their hug, humming a bit with his efforts. The young people held their congregation until the Spirit’s arms tightened around the young couple’s backs and he quietly announced that Thom’s men had regrouped and were on their way to join them and they relinquished their hold on one another. Ellie seemed more content. Sera slipped her hand into Ellie’s Marked one, giving it an affirming squeeze as they rejoined the group, almost in synchronicity with Klaus leading Rainier’s men who offered up a chorus of overlapping greetings.

“Hey guys!” Ellie greeted in kind, “Thanks so much for all your hard work here—I really appreciate you joining us with the Rift. Klaus gave you a run down?” the men nodded. “And everyone’s good on potions? Cyril, is there anything at all you need more of?”

“Got my field kit on me—we’re all set honey,” Cyril assured, patting the satchel on his hip. “Great! Okay—stick together, watch out for each other,” she looked to the Thom and Bull, Cassandra, as she addressed the group, “Thom, The Iron Bull, Seeker Pentaghast and myself—if any of us call a retreat, we mean it big time—get out of there, if you can either run back the way we came or…any direction south or west will work to avoid running into another Fade Rift, and we’ll regroup here. Is everyone ready?”

“Yes, Inquisitor.”

Ellie sort of startled at their unanimous agreement, giggling, “That was kind of cool! Okay, follow us,” she said, swinging she and Sera’s joint hands between them as they headed for the path northward out of the canyon, the Lieutenant walking close behind with Cole at his side, the Spirit clasping hands with the Tevinter man and humming...something—it sounded vaguely like a lullaby, nothing Solas was familiar with but it just had a simple cadence to the tune, it was pleasant.

“It is! Papa Tonio sang it to me when my body was broken.”

The Lieutenant’s brow raised, a mix of amusement and mild confusion but it seemed he was rather used to Cole’s picking up random bits of thought and communicating to them verbally. “Oh, Fa la nana bambino? That’s sweet.”

Ellie let out an excited gasp at that, “Papa sang? And I missed it?!”

Her boyfriend chuckled warmly, “Papa…he’s shy, his voice isn’t bad, not always the best with the keeping on tune but he’s got his lullaby’s down. I’ve always been a fan.”

…the girl let out rather the shriek, unadulterated giddiness spilling into the bond as she was happy to decide, “That’s too cute! Cremisius! I love Papa with my entire heart and I miss him!”

“He misses the hell out of you too, lovely. Maybe you and me’ll write him when we’re done for the day?”

“Letter writing date! I love it!”

Cole was delighted to offer, “I can show you my memory of him singing to me in the Fade—oh! Or of him singing to Krem when he was small—he had not sung it in so long he had to think back, warm wriggly weight—Cremisius is so lively tonight. Oh…we can stay awake a bit longer, can’t we? I’ve barley seen my child today. He let you make play with the buttons on his suit jacket, you nearly chewed them off, but they were too big to fit in your mouth and you were teething, so very miserable with it he was glad to see you finding relief.”

She looked entirely in love with the prospect but, “Cremisius…if you don’t want me to I won’t, honest,” she promised.

“Don’t got a problem with it lovely,” the Lieutenant assured.

She stopped for a moment to pop up on her toes to kiss the Tevinter on the cheek. “Let’s go kick Rift butt! I’ve got letters to write and the single most important thing in life to see in the Fade! If I die from cuteness overload, Tia has my will!”

“Imekari,” the Iron Bull found issue with that. "You’re not allowed to have a will!” it was certainly a macabre thing for a young person to have, but reasonable considering the circumstances.

“Um, I’ve got a crap ton of stuff and I mean, I’m gonna die someday, probably. Money, and Solas gave me Skyhold so I like, super had to make sure the Inquisition could still use it if I bite the big one. It’s not like I can take anything with me, it’d be dumb to die with it. And I wanted to make sure Anya and Russel and my rocks are taken care of—I’m a responsible mami!”

Had the girl obtained jewelry in their time apart? She’d piercings she showed off to Cassandra, the Human woman raising her hand to touch one of the delicate pearls dangling from Ellie’s ear but that was not quite the Human definition of ‘rock’ when it came to something of value. Humans had the tradition of gifting each other with rings to signify a deepening of their relationship with one another, when marriage became a consideration, Solas had heard in passing, women gathered around a friend insisting she show them her ‘rock’ from her significant other when they proposed marriage, Solas- she- she was too- oh he had no say in any such thing but he was rather startled by the thought that Ellie and Mister Aclassi were moving so quickly…oh. No, the Lieutenant hadn’t gifted Ellie a rock of that sort—but Cole had, on her Birthday, he only just recalled, in a literal fashion. She’d made certain they’d be taken someone would inherit the things she pass? That…seemed entirely plausible, as a thing the girl might do.

That may well be happening sooner than any of them wished it.

Their chatting had been distracting for the girl, but as they drew nearer and nearer to the Rift Ellie fell silent, jaw set as she seemed to be carefully controlling her every breath, Marked hand clenching Sera’s tighter until ultimately she shifted the energy put into squeezing, to hold her hand stiffly, palm held fast against Sera’s while her fingers stretched taught to keep from squeezing her sister’s hand too harshly. It felt more like the vice grip was on Sera’s heart, it hurt so for the younger girl, something like sadness and anger and the build of adrenaline surging in the bond from the Elf girl.

Demons of Pride—demons, in the plural—of Pride—poured from the Rift.

…he had not realized Barrier could feel like a shove, like someone brushing by you and striking you in resentment even as they coated you in protection, but Dorian and Madam de Fer seemed of one accord…ironically enough, they were of one accord with Solas: this was his entire fault they, he, resented him for it.

Somehow he preferred the scraping burn of resent-laced Barrier against his magic, to the bubbling balm of love and protectiveness that came with the wash of Ellie’s Barrier over him, her Magic bracing his like a hug, as it had always done before.

Though he- he let out a startled gasp because-

Sera. Oh his brilliant da’vehnan- she was casting! He could not be more proud of the gentle knock of her magic struggling to surge, extend outward of herself, he felt guilt and honor that she chose him to be included in it...though perhaps it was merely because of his proximity. Ellie fell in line alongside the Mages, Solas taking up post of staying close to the girl as per his promise to and Sera was very clearly targeting the younger girl with the brunt of her focus.

She needed every bit of it—Sera’s bit of barrier might have been the Inquisitor’s saving grace when the girl, in an effort to keep one of the Demons of Pride from finding attraction in Fairbank’s people in the distance, Ellie screamed at the top of her voice and cast against the demon as she charged at it, endeavoring to get it to focus on her, follow her back into the fray of Rift and underestimated just how great the Demon’s gate would be. It was a great lumbering thing, but it took all of two steps to catch up with the small Human girl scrambling underfoot…and then literally, she was about to be underfoot-

Solas had gotten separated from her when she broke off—but while he had no limbs the length of a Pride demon’s, he was still swift enough to meet her in the same moment the beast caught up with her and pull her to his chest before pushing her down and falling with her—his body over hers as the Demon of Pride’s foot came down on them as they both fell face-first into the Emerald Graves high grass.

“Are you hurt, da’vehnan?” Solas shot out, the girl was still underneath him, bracing herself for impact.

She shook her head ‘no’, catching her breath. She wasn’t seriously injured, her face hurt, back and shoulder aching, knees and elbows sore from her landing but oh it could have been so much worse. “Are you okay?” she worried, magic reaching out to his like clasping hands, wanting confirmation they were well.

“El!” the Lieutenant’s voice hollered over the rush of battle—followed by the rushing of the Iron Bull and Thom Rainier charging at the Pride demon, forcing it back and away, off of Solas and the girl before the Demon could put its full weight on them, and the moment it was off, back turned on them and Cremisius coming to…well, Ellie’s aid was more likely, the Lieutenant was at their sides, hand on Sola’s shoulder to push him off-

Oh. No, the Lieutenant’s hand rested on his shoulder and pushed gently as if to still Solas, “Hey hey hey, take it easy, shit, that was a lot on your spine—you feeling your limbs and everything? Anything hurt bad?”

“I’m well,” Solas said. He was not substantially injured—sore, he would certainly be feeling this exchange tomorrow, but he would be alright.

“Tell that to the back of your head dude. That thing definitely doesn’t clip its toenails. Sit up careful,” he instructed, pulling a healing potion from his belt, taking the cork between his teeth and spitting it aside and then his hand was off Solas’s shoulder to get a rag from a thigh pocket that he doused in potion before pressing, putting momentarily stinging pressure on the back of Solas’s head, oh, he was bleeding he supposed. Then the Lieutenant’s hand was on the Elf man’s shoulder again to help him as he rose up on his knees, straddling the girl’s legs, Ellie was already rolling onto her back to face them, peering up into Solas’s face with open concern. Solas reached back to place his hand over the rag at the back of his head so the Lieutenant could er...stop assisting him and put his focus where he truly wished it to be. That was...well, he certainly hadn’t expected the young man to spit on him if he was on fire, let alone tend his wounds on the battlefield. The Tevinter nodded before turning to kneel at Ellie’s side, speaking in quiet urgent tones to assess if she was alright.

“Hmm...pretty sure I’m dead and you’re like the handsomest angel like, ever...” Ellie informed him, groaning a bit as he helped her to sit up, “Nope. Still alive. m’okay,” she promised.
Sore, the demon’s efforts to crush her had been thwarted, but it had broken through the last of what Barrier had been surrounding her. Bruising, she’d a clotting scratch on her eyebrow, a bleeding split in her lip that Ellie seemed to not much notice as she pecked a kiss to the Lieutenant’s lips, announcing, “And now I’m all better!”

“You scare the hell out of me, you realize that?” the young man informed her.

“Fear…can be a powerful aphrodisiac?” the girl supposed in uncertain hope.

“…if that’s something Bull told you I’m kicking his ass—I’m kicking your ass Bull!” the Lieutenant called as he rose up and helped Ellie to her feet before offering an arm to Solas, “Well? Can you stand or are you turning into a wolf or something?”

Solas huffed a bit of a laugh as he accepted the offer to use the man’s arm to pull himself up onto his feet, nodding his thanks as he pulled the rag away from the back of his head, erm…

“You can just keep it,” the young man assured, pressing potion into Ellie’s hand as he kissed her temple before taking up arms again and jogging to back Cassandra up against a very persistent Greater Shade.

Ellie knocked back the potion her boyfriend had left her with before casting Barrier across the field once more, Solas shaking his head to clear it, yes—battle, barrier—he cast just a split second after her and kept close to the girl the remainder of the fight he- he certainly wasn’t letting her run headlong after a Pride demon all on her own again.

And she was not alone, not at all as the last demon was felled, and Sera was immediately at Ellie’s side, taking her sister’s unmarked hand and squeezing tight as an offer of assurance. Cassandra focused to suppress the rift and their Mages, Cole, Sera—they poured power into Ellie’s Mark as she raised it high and tremors working through her body as she put everything into the effort of sealing it closed with a resounding crack!

Sera was rounding on her sister immediately, imploring “Inky?”

“Eleanor?” Seeker Pentaghast asked, the woman had to clear her throat to do as much, the woman almost sounded congested. She rested a hand on Ellie’s back as she joined the girl who was leaning forward, hands on her knees as she caught her breath.

“I um—“ she swallowed through a wave of nausea, shaking herself before saying, “I’m okay. Whew. Gimme a minute? E-everyone regroup. S-see how we are on potion,” she instructed before sitting straight down on her bottom, head between her knees as she…was likely assessing whether she wanted to simply lay down and die—in which case they would simply call it a day and get her into camp, tucked away in a soft bedroll—or if she could manage second Rift, which may be just as difficult as the first.

Solas tentatively approached, seating himself in lotus position at her side, and upturning his hand to offer his palm for her Marked hand, which she peeked at when she felt him sit down before hesitantly placing her burning hand in his, doing his best to wholly distract the Mark with his own Elvehnan magic without putting more harm to Ellie’s. It was an effort, like pulling the Mark up toward himself, leaving only the barest bit of connection between it and her person so his Magic could interact with it without also interacting with her magic unpleasantly—it was a frustrating thing. It offered her some relief, but it was like mockery—he could pull and pull, give her respite, but the core tendril of connection the Mark had to this girl would not relent, could not be severed, save, perhaps-

He shuddered to think what the future might hold for this girl. That someday the only way she may ever find relief from her Mark is to sever her own hand.

“Solas? Are you okay? Does your head really hurt?” Ellie was asking, looking to him, brow furrowed with concern.

He cleared his throat, offering up a smile, “I am fine da- I’m well, Inquisitor. Just focusing,” he assured.

“You’re sad,” she gently accused…raising the index finger of her unmarked hand to poke him in the cheek.

“Merely wishing I could do more,” he supposed truthfully.

He could hear Marehis sighing, almost defeatedly—she’d been anxious to draw nearer to Ellie but...there was something that spoke to mistrust and resentment, like she thought Solas had offered his assistance out of a need to try and put himself in a space Marehis would occupy—but she came to her ward now. Sera was pacing the area before them, working off nervous energy he supposed—the Lieutenant was making himself useful in following his girlfriend’s instructions as opposed to going to her side, though he did keep casting his gaze over to her every so often as he helped Cyril take into account who was injured and how to treat them swiftly, if they could make a second Rift attempt. Cassandra was at Eleanor’s back, kneeling herself now with her hands on the girl’s shoulders, rubbing them with her head bowed like she might be in prayer over the girl. Marehis sat down before Ellie, on her knees, taking her unmarked hand in her own while the other rested on Ellie’s knee.

“Da’vehn? How are you feeling?”

“Kind of wanna lay down in the grass and call it a day—it’s very soft,” she informed her mother.

The woman seemed albeit amused as she raised a brow at that, the hand on Ellie’s knee coming up to ghost an index finger over the scratch on her daughter’s brow, “Is it?” she wondered, eyeing the split in her lip. Oh, he was sorry he’d sent the girl face first into the brush but it had been rather a split second thing.

“But, I know I should just get it over with. I can do it. I can. I’m just not going to enjoy doing it.”

Cole materialized beside Marehis. “You will feel better once it is over—it is hard, but it being harder is what will make you so much more proud and relieved once it’s all over.” Oh, the Spirit looked remorseful, “I’m sorry it hurts. I’m sorry. We- we will fix it—every time. Every time your body gets broken, we’ll make it better. We will nap and- and have potion, and eat, and- and I will show you anything in the Fade that makes your heart happy. And I love you,” he concluded his list.

“I love you too,” Ellie said, "thanks for making me feel better.”

“What’s the word Ellie-girl?” Rainier asked as he approached, “Everyone’s okay, and Sera’s got her people on bringing in a resupply of potion.” Oh. Solas hadn’t realized Sera had left them, but she was still near. “Let Cyril give you a look over, okay?”

Ellie nodded though, “I’m okay—but Solas- oh! Oh gosh, your head! Thom can Cyril pretty please look at P- Solas’s head? The Pride Demon tried to squash it.”

Solas softly cleared his throat, “I’m fine, da’len.”

Cyril whistled as he’d already stepped around to examine the injury, “Nasty bruising, but the gash is closing up good, knocking back healing draught will set it to rights. Scale of one to ten, how’s your headache?”

The man hadn’t asked him if he had a headache to begin with but he supposed it went without saying. “A four, at most,” he did not wish to break contact with Ellie’s Mark just yet… there was a Rift still nearby after all, it was only reasonable someone of magical origin hold her hand. Certainly.

He did not have many excuses to do as much as of late, certainly not in the last few weeks. What was the term…? Bite him. Anyone who thought it pathetic would be right, and they could bite him.

So—he kept hold of Ellie’s Marked hand and merely withdrew health potion with this free hand, and copied the Lieutenant’s earlier methodology—taking the cork between his teeth to rend it from the bottle before dropping the thing from his mouth and taking his potion. Ahh. “My headache is already receding—the Inquisitor has minor scrapes, bruising, tendon and joint soreness in her shoulders and back. She’s also entertaining mild nasal congestion.”

The Healer set about checking the girl over, getting her to imbibe potion while he dabbed ointment on the few scrapes on her face. “Catching a cold are you, little love?” Cyril worried.

Ellie shook her head, “I don’t think so, I don’t feel crummy or sick-tired or anything. My nose is like, a teensy bit stuffy and my throat’s a little scratchy but that’s probably just ‘cause I’m really thirsty.”
“Oh!” Marehis chirped, immediately pulling…oh, she’d two canteens at her hip—her own and Ellie’s. “I apologize, I forgot to return it to you—here, da’vehnan,” she insisted, uncapping Ellie’s canteen and handing it to the girl. Ahh, the woman had taken the task of filling their water that morning and slung the girl’s over her shoulder out of habit of taking the girl’s water around at her hip while she walked around…well, Haven was where the habit started, but Skyhold and now, Val Royeaux was where it continued he supposed.

“It’s okay mami, thanks for carrying it for me!” Ellie said before gulping…well, she nearly drained the thing, he’d water if she needed it, but there was still water sloshing in her canteen when she stopped, taking in a sigh and a sniffle, clearing her throat. She set her canteen down and pulled a handkerchief from an overcoat pocket, a plain white—oh. Not entirely plain, he supposed, there was a bit of lace about it, flowers and an ‘E’ embroidered on them that…well, it was not his own handiwork. That was to be expected. The girl quietly blew her nose, taking a deep breath before reporting, “All good!”

“Alright. You tell me if you feel poorly, okay honey?” Cyril intoned.

“You got it!” the girl promised before she rose up to her feet, the adults rising up with her. Ahh, she’d apparently spotted a runner handing off potion to Sera—she, the Lieutenant and Cole had made up a team of dispensers, replenishing everyone’s stores. Solas hoped the boy remembered his own. Though the girl did stop to look up at the Seeker as the woman rose up behind her, “Mami? Are you sniffly? You sound kind of congested and your eyes are pretty red—pretty, but also red.”

The woman offered up a derisive sound, that did sound albeit strange like something in her throat made it difficult to produce her patented grunt, “I am…admittedly a victim of hayfever, given the right circumstances. Unfortunately what makes the Emerald Graves so lovely also produces a great deal of—“ she stopped, “Eleanor. You’re to wear your scarf up around your mouth and nose. Maker—you’re certain you don’t feel poorly? If I’ve hayfever that means there is allergen—a great deal of pollen in the air.”

“Oh!” the girl squeaked, raising a hand to pull up her scarf though the Seeker beat her to it—the Nevarran woman already had her hand on the evergreen material that bunched as it looped around Ellie’s neck, and pulled it more taught so it hung from the tip of the girl’s nose to her throat. Though the girl returned the action after a fashion—the woman’s hand’s fiddling with her scarf while Ellie’s went to the Seeker’s throat, finger tips pressing gently at the underside of her jaw, along her throat, “Awe mami, you’ve got a little swelling. You have to be feeling pretty crummy—you don’t have to—“

“I’m fine,” Cassandra insisted. “I’m well enough to fight—I’m not weary, or lacking in my usual strength, it is more so an in general inconvenience than anything else.”

“You’re taking medicine and laying down as soon as we get back to camp, missy!” the girl sternly intoned, though she was cheery at the prospect of, “We can be recovery buddies!” which swung to concern the moment it seemed something occurred to her, “Cremisius!”

The Lieutenant was immediate to respond, turning about on the heel of his boot to cast an assessing gaze over their congregation around Ellie, making certain his girlfriend wasn’t calling for him to physically defend her from some danger, “Yeah lovely?” he asked as he approached.

“Do you get hayfever?” she worried, “Mami gets it, and she thinks pollen and stuff might mess with my asthma—do you feel any congestion coming on, guapo?” she motioned for him to come closer, and the young man grinned, stepping forward and leaning to oblige her as if he expected what she wished to check—she repeated the action she’d done to check Cassandra for swelling? “Your glands are as perfect as you are!” she was pleased to inform him, pulling her scarf down momentarily to peck a kiss where she’d just examined and then she stepped back and raised her arms overhead, stretching her arms overhead and twisting about, an action which the Lieutenant copied, taking a deep breath as if testing his lung capacity before reporting, “M’all good lovely, but thanks for thinking of me,” he said, pressing a kiss to her forehead. “You’re okay? Are we heading to the next Rift or calling it a day?”

“Next Rift so long as everyone else is up for it.” Ellie said, linking arms with the Lieutenant as they moved to address the rest of their party—chat with everyone and make certain they were well before announcing their next move.

Though Cassandra’s next move apparently would be dictated by, “If Eleanor suffers an asthma attack because of this place and its horrendous pollen count I will be punching a tree,” she informed Solas.

...a rather violent response but the trees would well survive it. Deserve it even, he supposed.

Madam de Fer approached, resting a hand on Marehis’s back, “Were you injured at all, my dear?” she checked with the Elf woman.

Marehis shook her head, “No. Thank you,” she offered sounding…well, very grateful. He was rather tempted to check the bond, there was a sense of worry that emanated from Marehis’s place in his magic and it spiked in battle…and now, as the enchanter addressed her before Solas, it was mixed with nervousness.

“Of course, I could not see my lover harmed,” the woman offered warmly, a hint of teasing that was...well, flirtatious he supposed. She pressed a kiss to Marehis’s cheek before throwing a particularly haughty look Solas’s way and wrapping an arm around Marehis’s shoulders, rubbing her arm as she led the Elf woman off, lips against Marehis’s ear as she spoke in very hushed Orlesian. He was not sure if he gratified or cursed his lack of knowledge of the Human language but Trade had been the more pressing vernacular to tackle, he’d little interest in learning languages that would soon be dead...though those plans had wildly changed so, perhaps he should pick it up. Or not if...it would likely be best if he’d not the ability to translate the Enchantress’s words. He...had known they were good friends—to the point Solas had endeavored not to speak ill of the arrogant woman when in Marehis’s company, though he’d not been entirely certain just why his veh= why she would find such easy friendship in someone so heavily steeped in Orlesian racism, enough that she would be so compliant with it. Well...once upon a time, she had been, that could not necessarily be said now, he supposed—she’d a discussion with Ellie about it, had...been derisive in regard to Sera, in the past, but that had changed with time and perhaps been from how very different the girl was from the Enchantress, rather than her heritage.

But were they- were they quite seriously-

It was none of his concern!

What was entirely his concern, however, was Ellie—namely her well being. The second Rift, was no kinder to them than the first, and its sealing left the girl on her knees, trembling, tear streaked, and wheezing.

“Cyril-” Rainier called out,

“Oh it!” the medic responded as he went to the Inquisitor, “Okay honey, just keep breathing,” he intoned, digging through his medical kit. Marehis was kneeling at Ellie’s side and he handed her bandaging, “Keep pressure on those gashes, gotta get that bleeding stopped.”

Marehis nodded, blanching as she pressed the bandaging against the gash on Ellie’s hip Pride demon’s claw had put there, another was lower on her thigh, the woman’s eyes clenching shut and a whimper tearing from her lips when a strangled breath caught in Ellie’s throat and the girl wept, bile blazed in her throat and she raised her unmarked arm up press her mouth into her elbow, wailing agony she tried to stifle. Sera let out an anguished yelp into Cassandra’s shoulder as the Seeker had sought to comfort the girl when she panicked when Ellie went straight down upon sealing the Rift, and Marehis was openly sobbing, “I’m sorry, I’m so sorry da’vehnan.”

Eleven. Eleven Rifts had torn in these heavens. And it was his fault—their fault. Him and Elgar’nan and Andruil—it had been the old ‘gods’ warring that caused so much death in this area, so many magical souls wearing the space between this world and any others that would dare touch it, thin. Ultimately his Orb that rendered those worn places torn. Left torment burning this girl who did nothing to deserve such a fate.

And it sent Solas to his knees, prayer falling from his lips as he gripped tight Ellie’s Marked hand.

“Mythal, Elgar’nan, Andruil! Halani!” his ancient tongue poured from him, words they would have to hear, they must! “Ma’da’len da’vehnan is pure and blameless. It should shame us, the harm we have caused. Please, my love, if any part of you is still of this world, come now and save this child. Elgar’nan, Andruil, it is in your house she suffers, because of your wars. Now grant her mercy. I stand in your holy places, sit at your altar, and I am sorry—I am sorry for what I have done to you, what I have done to this world, what I have done to her—it is my fault! Give it to me, take this Mark and the pain it causes and place it onto me! On my hand—onto my very heart, I care not! It was I who tore the sky, let me heal it, let this Mark torment me until my dying breath! Please!”

Magic broke from his skin, pure, and powerful, something that did not come from his magic alone-

When he dared open his eyes, he was remorseful the glow in his palm did not stay there—stayed stuck still to Ellie’s hand. Oh- oh curse him to his dying day he should not have appealed to his enemies for her life, it was him. They had little reason to aide him, even—even Mythal she—he’d done nothing but bring her shame. And now they had only…oh they punished this girl—her pain only multiplied, felt fresh to hi-

Oh. Oh. it felt fresh to him because it was. The rolling nausea and nerve-searing pain, lung-stinging breath, and the tears in flesh—it was on him now, in him. Ellie…was no longer conscious, but it was more like she’d been put under a spell that granted peaceful sleep, no longer injured, her breathing sounded clear—

“Solas!”

Magic or no, bodies…did not, apparently, appreciate sudden unwarranted injury. He was uncertain what happened next he- he thought he’d heard Marehis’s voice calling his name, and then nothing, his body had gone into shock, he supposed. Because one moment he was relieved at the transferred agony, that his prayers had, in some small way, been heard. And then the next he was awakening from darkness…into darkness. Nightfall, and a tent overhead…

A…larger tent, than what he had recently been prescribed. The Inquisitor’s tent is as you left it, a scout had informed Sera, earlier, and now he knew that meant a reincarnation of the Storm Coast’s ‘mega-tent’.

He…he was in the…

The mega-tent! Cole’s voice cheered in his mind. Solas, savior, saved—the Iron Bull carried you when you were injured. Your body aches less now. You should talk to Marehis, she has needed to speak with you since we left Skyhold, but she could not write you, not for herself and this needs to be handled in person. She is putting it off, she is scared, but if you speak to her now she will talk. I’m not allowed to talk about it, she told me, so I can’t tell her—but you can, it will ease her fear. She will be a little sad though, but only a little. When you are done you should join us—Ellie and Sera are light and happiness with Krem and I on the hill looking at the stars, but they are worried for you and will feel so much better seeing you. You would feel better, that seeing you will make them feel less anxious instead of more.

Marehis wanted to talk to him? Had- had wanted to talk to him…since she was last in Skyhold? Whatever for? She was scared, what-

He shot up in his cot- oh. that was an improvement from the former mega-tent—this one was…albeit larger, and full of cots instead of just a bedroll between one and the hard ground.

And on the cot across from the one he’d been resting in, Marehis was seated, elbows on her knees, head in her hands though she startled when he sat up, looked up at him. “You’re awake. How…how are you feeling?”

He…thought he would have to go in search of her, but she…she was here? Had waited at his bedside? “I’m…” oh. He was better—an ache that protested when he moved so quickly, lingering in his lower abdomen and thigh, but those wounds were nearly closed it felt like, they were not bleeding any longer, did not feel enflamed. He was tired but not terribly so. “I’m well. Recovering nicely. Thank you.”

She nodded. “Cyril was the one who aided you. Ellie. She…she checked your bandaging when she woke up,” Marehis huffed softly, a tenderness in her features as she amusedly informed him, “and before her ‘letter writing date’ and after dinner, and again before going star gazing. If you find lip prints on your bandaging…it is lip balm, Vivienne has gotten her hooked on the stuff.”

And the sweet girl had kissed his injuries healed, he supposed. It certainly felt like it had worked now, warmth settling in his chest and spreading through him like he’d been the one doused in healing magic. “That was…that was kind of her. She needn’t worry, I’m well. She…is alright? She fell unconscious I- I hope my er…actions did not cause her ill effect.”

“Cole said it was…part of the blessing imparted on her, she was merely asleep, allowed rest so her body and mind could catch up so to speak—just as it is startling to be uninjured one moment and badly so the next…”

“Ah. Yes, I suppose that might have been confusing, take some processing.”

“She woke maybe an hour after we returned to camp. She was so worried for you, you needed rest so she laid with you for a while, monitoring you for a time to make certain you were healing well.” Oh…oh she had- truly? It felt foolish, pathetic even but a lump rose in his throat, he’d…he’d not thought she would do such a thing with him ever again—he wasn’t certain he might cry because the blessing that such a thing had occurred again, or because he’d missed it, been wholly unconscious, not even entered the Fade.

“…thank you. Thank you for what you did…” she cleared her throat, “for what you said.”

He felt his brow raise, not in suspect, but rather in surprise, “You could understand what I was saying?” it was…the variation of Elvehnan language…most of it had been lost in what was now considered Dalish, it was rather untranslatable.

“There is…it you have said it yourself, our language has a certain rhythm to it so that even if one cannot fully understand it*, the meaning can still be conveyed. Too, Cole confirmed what Sera and I heard.”

Ahh. “Cole…has said you wish to speak to me. Of something you’ve instructed him not to speak of?”

Marehis paled, and for a moment he was absolutely certain she was about to jump up and flee but she placed her hands on either side of herself and gripped the edge of the cot as if to steel herself, taking a few deep breaths before she dared to look at him. “I…we have a…bond, yes? Like what you share with Ellie?”

“…I did.”

“…I did.”

“What…” she gulped, goodness the woman was shaking. “What of their conception?”

“That is hardly- Marehis I cannot undo- of course I felt-“ he wasn’t even certain how best to articulate such a thing was the woman wishing to dredge up an argument blaming him for feeling satisfaction as he laid with his previous lover?!

“We were you able to tell in your bond when it happened!” Marehis snapped, “When their life formed—could your bond tell you she was with child?!”

Oh. “Yes. Certainly it-“ it had been an immediacy. Not an immediacy upon the completion of their lovemaking—it had been the following day after they laid together when Solas felt the change in the bond, the confirmation that life had sparked in his beloved. “We knew the moment it happened. I knew, at least—and then she, shortly thereafter of course, I,” ran three miles in what felt like a matter of seconds and nearly collided with the woman in her temple—she’d felt his excitement and urgency to get to her and come running to meet him and- well. “I informed her.”

“You felt…you felt her in your bond, as she died? As…as your child was lost?”

“…I did.”

“…in…inform you of…?”

“Would you inform me?” Marehis wondered softly.

“If you felt such a thing in your bond when last we were together would you have informed me?!”

Oh good- “Of course—immediately, velnan, I would never have kept- do- are- I do not understand, do you believe you are…?”
“I don’t know! I-“ her face crumbled, “I was not- my own potion fell through when Haven was lost, I ran out shortly before we found Skyhold and-“

Ahh. They had er…consummated their discovery of safe haven. But, “I have not felt any such thing occur in the bond, I promise you. If I had, I would have informed you immediately.”

She nodded, teary eyed, “I- I have not bled, and I only realized as much…I should have weeks ago, while we were in Crestwood and I did not. I waited, but nothing, and I- I’ve been so exhausted and just have not felt like myself, so I went to Elan and she- her tests left her fairly certain I’m not-“ she stopped, swallowing. “Adan offered his opinion, that I have been…stressed. Had anxieties upon me that have left my body with an imbalance of sorts, hormonally, that is to blame, I’ve been prescribed potion, a supplement that might correct the imbalance and um, encourage a return to my natural cycle but it…I am hesitant to resort to as much if there is a chance-“ she took a deep breath, “I do not know exactly, what I would do moving forward if I were with child, but I would rather the decision be my own than be made for me through misfortune. There is…little known of how such potion might affect an unborn child.”

Understandable. “I felt no such thing. You’ve…experienced rather a lot, these past few months, to find yourself in a time of burn out is more than understandable—exhaustion and difference of mood can just as likely be symptoms of…of, well, anxiety, and Elan is a competent Healer,” he offered assurance. “I…could examine the bond, if that would put your mind to ease. Though if that brings you discomfort—Cole, he informed me you wished to speak of something you’d told him not to speak of, he took that very seriously and reported he has not even spoken of it to you—but if he could, he said he could alleviate your worry.”

“I’m…reticent to release my stance with him on this. Cole is sweet and he means well and I trust him but I- he’s so close with the girls and Cremisius, I would hate for him to accidentally bring this up with them. Would you? Examine the…the bond? Pl-please.”

He nodded, closing his eyes and focusing. Oh—he could certainly sense her anxieties in full now, she was riddled with them, fear and angst of what had come to pass, and what was waiting in the future. Everything…had been rather traumatizing. It was not an easy thing…any of it—finding herself caretaker of someone who was in constant danger, finding herself loving that someone more than her own life. To have fallen in love and been so sorely betrayed, found herself unwittingly welcoming danger she felt she should have defended her daughters from…

Thankfully, her only children were Ellie and Sera. He- oh he did not- he would never regret a life made from their love, but he would never wish that upon her, the trauma of facing whether or not to carry that life, the trauma wrought from either of those paths. So he was ultimately relieved to inform her, “You are not pregnant.”

Her entire body relaxed as she rested her head in her hands, “Oh thank the Maker.”

Ahh. She was…Andrasten, now? That would be more than reasonable, he supposed.

Indeed,” he agreed softly.

She breathed a sigh of relief, “I was- oh I was so worried.”

“As was I, for a moment,” he assured. “I’m relieved, truly. Though whatever…whatever you had done, Marehis, you…would have had support. And Madam de Fer…well she might have delighted in the fun of jesting she’d impregnated you.”

Marehis offered up a wet sounding laugh at that, wiping at her eyes, “Oh, certainly.”

“You shared with her, your concern? I apologize if that made…if that caused any strife in your relationship.”

“I did, I- I could not stand by and let Ellie go into battle without me. I didn’t wish for Ellie or Sera to know of my concern unless…unless there was something to be concerned about and it was staying that way. So I confided in Vivienne and she assured me she’d make certain I’d come to no harm that might threaten…well,” she cleared her throat, “She’ll be as relieved as I am.” And then it seemed to occur to her, “Oh! She- she’s been casting more on me- I didn’t stop to think it might keep her from casting Barrier on the girls-“

Marehis, honestly, you had rather the legitimate concern,” too, Solas hardly minded Marehis being wholly protected just for herself, she endured so much danger in her station it was a relief to hear she’d been made to be unharmed for once…mostly unharmed, there was faint bruising on her face and arms, the outline of bandaging under the torn leather over her left calf. It had been quite the arduous day of battle; she could have walked away so much wo- she could have not walked away. He shook his head, clearing his thoughts, what had he been saying? Oh yes, “And I still felt Madam de Fer casting upon us all. She likely ingested Lyrium to keep up with the demands on her magic without lapsing her previous promises of protection.”

“Oh,” Marehis breathed, “Oh bless her.”

“She…is a good ally—strong and a woman of integrity. I’m pleased she’s such a suitable match for you.”

That…that earned him another smile from her, something wholly amused, her eyes were alight with it and he- oh he could die at this very instant and be glad of it, he could scarcely believe he’d caused such a reaction in her again, was privy to her open regard once more. She raised her hand to her lips as she stifled a giggle and then, “You…you do realize she is jesting of our status? We are not…we are excellent friends, but not lovers.”

“Oh! I- she said- I was informed you spent the day at the museum with your lo-“ he was babbling. “It is none of my business. I just assumed she was sincere.”

“She was, after a fashion. I was met with poor reception on one of our outings in Val Royeaux, my being an Elf. Vivienne stepped in by insisting I was her guest—her lover, to dumbfound the guardsman as penance for his rudeness.”

Oh- oh thank- it was not his place to be grateful but he- oh he would simply cease thinking of it, he was pleased, damn him. “That is a shame, you make such a striking pair.”

“We do, don’t we? We were the talk of Val Royeaux, I assure you,” she offered with mirth, and oh it was so…it was reward enough in itself, how casually they were speaking now. He was uncertain he deserved it but he was grateful, however long it lasted. “Thank you for…for confirming everything for me.”

“You’ll…er…trust your Healer’s advice?” he wondered, hoped. If she…if she needed potion…well it was not for everyone, but she’d sounded as if she were confirming her current state to make certain it was safe to pursue potion.

She nodded. “I…” she bit her lip. “We will be traveling together for…a good while. A few weeks,” she supposed, “if…if you would…”

He would do anything. “What may I do for you?”

“Would you…perhaps…Adan warns me I might er- that there may be complications with venturing into potion for hormonal imbalance. I’ve never taken something of the sort, there may be changes, unwanted or harmful and I- I cannot risk such a thing interfering in the role I play for Ellie, or- oh if I lashed out at her, at Sera? Oh I would never forgive myself-“

“You wish for me to watch out for your behavior?”

“In…in the bond, if you would. If you would be able to perceive a shift in my mood, perhaps be able to stop me from reacting to it in front of them, I would certainly um, appreciate it.”

“If that is what you wish, I would gladly help you,” he assured.

“Privately. This is a matter of confidence, you understand? I do not want- I wouldn’t wish to add to Ellie and Sera’s worries. Cassandra- oh she wept when she-“ Marehis stopped and cleared her throat. “Ellie became aware that the Lady Seeker was struggling, she worried it was her own fault, that she in some way rekindled the woman’s depression. If they thought such a thing on my account for even an instant, that they are at fault for my anxieties, that I’ve been made ill from them, oh I would not be able to stand it.”

“They will hear nothing of it from me but…well if I may be candid? Ellie discovered the Seeker’s issues rather unexpectedly, was given context that allowed her to jump to such a conclusion and part of her conclusion was wrought from the fact that it was kept in secrecy from her. if you sat them down and discussed it, talked them through it with the assurance it is of course none of it their fault, that would safeguard them from any future potential for them to discover without your preparation for such a thing. My monitoring you could be an assurance for you all, rather than a secret to stress you further that…does not seem conducive to lessening anxieties by adding new ones. Perhaps…perhaps Sera…I’m not entirely certain she knows how to intensely navigate the bond but there is one between the two of you, if you would be more comfortable with her monitoring you—"

Marehis shook her head. “I will consider discussing this with them, you are right enough about that. But I would not dare to burden Sera with this, she- she’s made so much progress, my word, she’s just flourishing here. She has her own anxieties, I would hate for my mine to possibly confuse her with her own, experiencing them in the bond. But thank you for…for considering how uncomfortable I might be with this situation.”

He nodded. “I am sorry for my part in…what you are going through.”

“…well. I honestly believe you are. So I suppose that’s something,” Marehis sighed clearing her throat. “I should’ve had a shift keeping guard I should get to.”

He nodded again, “I- Cole—.I’ve been invited to join the children in their star gazing? To assure the girls that I am alright. I- I would not overstay my welcome if…if you are alright with my joining them?”

“Oh. Um. Certainly,” she offered up tentatively. “I will feel more secure that they are safe. They’re capable themselves and too Cole and Krem would never allow harm to come to them but…well. The Spirit can sometimes be overwhelmed and distracted by their friendship and,” she cleared her throat softly, “Ellie does have a way of capturing the Lieutenant’s full attention. The poor boy may well not even be aware there is a beautiful starscape overhead to look upon.” Well, invited or no, Solas was sure an adult in their midst might ground the Lieutenant, he might enjoy the stars more so then. “Do you…you’re certain you’re well? Do you need someone to assist you? They are not far—laying just beyond the wall outside, on the hillside, it will be a downward slope and I’m certain they would not leave you abandoned there if you needed help returning to camp.”

It was nice, being able to speak with her again, beyond blessing that she would be permitting him to freely delve into their bond, and…it was selfishness now, that made him wish to stretch the time more—she’d already spent rather a good bit of time speaking with him in privacy, had met her limit, ventured past it, perhaps, so he would not keep her thought he was tempted to feign how severely his injury hurt so she might walk him to meet the girls—but that would be unworthy of him, so…he would refrain. “I’m well. Thank you for…for speaking with me.”

He was rewarded by the woman rising and offering him her arm…but there was a bit of wariness in the bond from her, reticence to offer him such assistance so he merely offered up a smile in thanks before holding his side with his left hand and pushing up off of the cot with his right, it was painful but not unbearably so and it was well worth it, the relief she felt…a bit of gratitude that he’d politely turned down her offer of assistance.

Warm brown eyes peered up into his own. Eleanor had likened Cremisius’s eyes to whisky when in the sunlight. Under the low lamplight of their tent, Marehis’s eyes were pools of honey, and just as sweet. Pink lips parted to offer politely, just the barest bit of warmth that spoke to her sincerity, “Enjoy your time with the children.”

He was rather certain it was unjust of him, that after his bit of restraint he wanted nothing more than to lean forward and close the distance between his lips and hers. It took more effort to quell that desire than it did to put one foot in front of the other, put weight on his injured leg—though that did help, the bite of pain did pull his focus, snap him back to the task at hand.

Chill had settled in the air as night fell in the Emerald Graves, the crackle of fire drew Solas’s gaze to the group gathered around the source of warmth, The Iron Bull was nowhere in sight though he supposed the Qunari was elsewhere or Marehis would not have felt at liberty to speak so freely. No, none save Madam de Fer knew of their discussion—her eyes were on them the moment they emerged from the tent and she rose to go to Marehis, wrapping her arms around the Elf woman and peering down into her face as Marehis smiled and shook her head ‘no’. Relief washed over the Enchanters face as she smiled and hugged Marehis tightly, hand resting on the crown of her head as she pulled the woman close and…while she looked wholly indifferent as her gaze fell on Solas, she mouthed a soft ‘thank you’ before she pulled back to meet Marehis’s eye, smiling warmly as she brushed a bit of hair out of her face to be safely tucked behind her ear.
“Come my darling, shall we relieve the Iron Bull and Ser Rainier?”
“Certainly,” Marehis agreed, walking off with the woman arm in arm.
Seeker Pentaghast and Ser Pavus regarded Solas with a polite nod as he approached, the Nevarran woman offering up, “How are you feeling, Solas?”
“I am alive, Seeker, and well. I hope you were uninjured in our fight? Your…hayfever, is it?
It is not too detrimental?”
“It is merely an annoyance,” she assured. “I will…refrain from violence against your trees.
They cannot help what they create and they are lovely.”
It felt like a sweet enough sentiment, that the woman was refraining from as much as a form of gratitude since he’d claimed a measure of credit for the Emerald Graves’ foliage. “I do hope you feel better soon.”
The woman nodded. “Thank you. For safeguarding Eleanor, for-,” she cleared her throat, and he was not entirely certain it was from congestion the need arose, “for what you did to safeguard her. I understand it cannot have been an easy thing.”
“Would you believe that was my first attempt at prayer?”
“I’ll admit it was rather impressive then,” Ser Pavus offered up. “Perhaps next time you could pray for something even more delightful like a rain of chocolates from on high.” “I’m rather afraid what might be sent in substitute for chocolates—I did not get necessarily what I prayed for, mind. I- I am sorry my efforts did nothing to remove the Inquisitor’s Mark.”
“You did try, and you- you spared her a great deal of pain in the process,” Cassandra said.
“Are you hungry? There is broth in our stores or left over dinner that we can warm.”
“I’m not particularly hungry, no—but thank you,” which was truth, he was off put from the thought of food just yet, and too, “I’m expected elsewhere just now,” and if he grew direly hungry, there was likely sustenance to be found somewhere between Sera and Ellie. “If you’ll excuse me?”
he asked politely.
“Certainly,” the Seeker nodded, Dorian nodding likewise before Solas passed their campfire to walk to the edge of the stone…ahh—the entire camp fit on the rather massive landing between two great flights of stone stairs. He stepped off the edge of the landing, past crumbling wall, onto the hillside where…oh. Oh there they were. Ellie and Sera laying out on a large blanket with Cole in Sera’s hold, the Elf girl playing big spoon for her Spirit friend as they watched the sky above, Ellie lying alongside the Lieutenant, legs twined, hip to hip as her head rested against shoulder as she peered up into the heavens and the Lieutenant…well perhaps he wasn’t distracted at all—he almost seemed asleep, arms behind his head, eyes closed as he dozed. He did seem rather exhausted and it was rather a relaxing environment, his dearest friends safe around him, Ellie content and staring up into the heavens with wide-eyed wonder.
Though the girl’s wonder-filled gaze was transferred as Solas approached—her magic spiked in the bond, like a happy leap it’s mage nearly copied in physical form as Ellie sat straight up and turned her head to lay eyes on Sol-Tears welled up in her eyes, breath catching in her throat the split second before…well before the most wonderful word he felt there might be in the Antivan language burst from her lips, “Papi!”
Ahh. So. He was being blessed with multiple points he could die happily this evening. How very kind of the universe.
The Lieutenant startled as Ellie scrambled away from him and ran to nearly collide with Solas as he made to join them, only just stopping herself, sliding a bit in the slick grass with a little shriek but Solas caught her outstretched arm to steady her and then her arms were around him as she hugged him, mindful to do so above his injury—it stung still but oh, he was glad of it if it meant she- she was hugging him. “Are you okay?” she asked, chin pressing against his ribcage as she looked up at him, her chin quivered as she tearfully reported, “I keep trying to check on you in the bond—I can know where you are and that you’re still alive b-b-but it wouldn’t let me f-feel anything that’s wrong with you so I- I couldn’t just look there to figure out if you’re in pain or healing incorrectly or something that- that’s never happened before-“ “Well, I did request you be spared of these injuries and you have been, in full I suppose. Do not fret so, da’len—I am fine.”

“It hurt really really bad,” she argued.

“They might have, yes, when they were fresh—I’m not in a great deal of pain now, I assure you.”

Green eyes peered up into his, sparkling like the precious stones that namesaked these forests, wide and glittering and full of carefully held hope as she extended the barest bit of trust to secure, “Promise?”

Solas smiled, offering her his most sincere, certain, “I promise.”

“Kay,” she allowed, and he—oh he could not abide her tears, he took her face in his hands and thumbed them away, venturing to drop a kiss to her forehead as she confessed, “I was really scared when everyone told me what happened. You’re sure you’re feeling better?”

“I am—I’m healing well. Your mother informed me I’ve had an expert Healer checking my bandages several times over, I trust all is well at hand.”

“Well I had to,” she pouted, “I couldn’t tell anything in the bond. Did Tio check them?”

His mind blanked…Tia was Lady Montilyet, “Tio?”

“Oh—Cyril! Because he’s Thom’s manfriend and Thom’s mi tio!”

Oh. That was nice, it spoke to…well she’d just called him ‘papi’ but he wasn’t certain just how much longer he might be blessed with that title. But hearing the former Blackwall impersonator was now ‘Tio Thom’ spoke to the hope that rebuilding what he lost with these girls might not be wholly impossible. “I have not seen him since I woke—”

She drew in a startled gasp at that, “Well gosh what’re you doing out here, silly?!”

Oh, she—did she not wish to see him? “Cole said I should join you, if I’m unwelcome—”

“Oh golly it’s not that! Just lemme peek,” she insisted, pulling away to pull up his shirt, he vaguely wondered who changed his clothing, he’d been put into sleep clothes, and he wasn’t certain Marehis was feeling quite so forgiving she’d do as much for him…his magic gave him the impression that the Iron Bull had taken the task and he wasn’t certain just what to do with that. Ellie gently lifted his shirt and examined the bandaging underneath, “you haven’t bled anymore and…she very carefully pulled on the material to peek behind it, “still no sign of infection! You don’t feel feverish or anything, do you?” he shook his head and she smiled her relief, “Yay!” and then, “Um…do you wanna come sit with us? We have cookies!”

“I would be delighted.”

“Oh gosh, yay—Papi you have to come see, it’s so pretty!”

Her unmarked hand slipped into his and she led him to join the others, Sera was sitting up looking tentative for all of a moment as she asked, “You um…you okay?” to him, he supposed. “I’m well—”

Well, and winded as Sera launched herself airbound and collided with him, he wasn’t entirely certain how they didn’t go tumbling down the hillside, she nearly knocked him off his feet, “Don’t ruddy scare me like that you jerk! Friggin! Thanks for saving Inky but shite, maybe don’t give those Evan-erlis-blah people the go-ahead to maim you!”

“I’m not wholly familiar with prayer, I did try my best,” he jested lightly. He had missed this—would miss it when…well, he wasn’t certain. But surely…surely he would not be allotted so much affection from these girls, not for much longer.

Ellie was returning to the blanket, sitting on her knees at the Lieutenant’s side as she poked him in the ribs, “Papiito, despierroto.”

…he wasn’t sure he much cared for the word ‘papito’. Was it…was it a derivative of ‘papi’? That…was mildly disconcerting.

“Thanks lovely, you’re pretty ‘despierto’ yourself,” the Lieutenant complimented without opening his eyes.

Ellie giggled at that, “I am…because I am awake—it’s your turn now. Scoot! Um…Solas is up and joining us…that’s um…okay, right?”

“S’long as it’s okay with you two, I don’t have a problem with it,” he warmly assured as he sat up, wrapping an arm around her to pull her to him and press a kiss to her hair as he met Solas’s gaze…a stare that spoke to a mix of gratified acceptance and ‘I’m watching you’. Fair.

More than fair, the Lieutenant did indeed ‘scoot’ so Solas could find purchase in the space between Ellie and Sera, Ellie resuming her seat at her boyfriend’s side, though she was somewhat seated on Solas’s uninjured side as they sat down, he politely declined their offer of cookies though he was tempted to indulge in one—they appeared fresh, like they’d been made recently, still warm from their baking. When he took note of that he…oh they informed him there was now a ‘cookie club’. Consisting of the Lieutenant, Ellie, Cole, Sera, and apparently ‘Papa’classi’ was an honorary member when they were in Skyhold. Oh, it was…it ached and soothed at the same time—ached him that he was missing so much but soothing that they were obliged to catch him up to speed, sitting together and speaking amicably before reengaging their time with the stars—he supposed the stars could wait for them, if anything else there was a greater probability of another night than there was of another night like this. A night where his…oh his children spoke to him as if he had not burned and betrayed their every sense of trust. Sera blushingly told the tale of how it all started —this club of theirs—and he…well. He was certainly glad that horrible woman she grew up with was no longer of this world, and that she had such wonderful friends in the young Aclassi and Cole. And apparently the elder Aclassi was capable of cracking eggs in a rather impressive manner, taking two in hand and neatly breaking them against one another. It pulled a smile from the Lieutenant as he wryly commented,

“Aclassi men know how to crack open some eggs.”

Which got a snort out of Sera who squealed and slapped her hands over her mouth as if to stifle just how funny she found the statement. Ahh. He…supposed his head was somewhat egg shaped. It was…a mild enough threat, more so a bit of jesting so Solas…well, at this point laughing at himself was hardly beneath him. “How fortunate it seems you’re just as knowledgeable in how to repair them,” he said, “I am grateful for your assistance earlier today.” He tentatively sought…not to butter the young man up, that was likely implausible, but it would be unjust to let the Lieutenant express kindness unrewarded. If that assisted his standing with the young man that held Ellie’s heart then that was only further blessing from the Human man Solas did not know if he rightly deserved.

“Wasn’t a big deal. You had Ellie’s back, I had yours,” he supposed.

“I hope you were uninjured?” Solas asked. There was a healing bit of burning below his ear on the sharp corner of his jaw, and bruising on his chin.

Oh, Ellie pouted at that, which turned into a pucker of lips to press a kiss to the Lieutenant’s shoulder as he replied, “Cracked a few ribs.”

“I’m sorry guapo,” Ellie apologized. Had she herself injured her boyfriend?

“Healer’s orders are healer’s orders,” the Lieutenant said as if in understanding.

“It’s just best not to risk it—first thing tomorrow is the earliest I’d be comfortable with trying again, and if um…if it doesn’t feel right I know it sucks for you but in this instance your physical health takes priority.” …oh. Oh! Solas had thought…well it was nighttime, he’d merely thought the young man’s attire was just his being prepared for bed as his girlfriend and friends were, restrictive clothing wasn’t necessarily conducive to sleep after all.

“I’m feelin’ okay El, no worries,” he assured. “S’not like there’s really anyone in our camp who isn’t down.”

“If Viv-tits friggin has a problem with it she’s gettin’ a surprise ice blast to her bits,” Sera decided.

“Nah—she’s cool,” he assured. Why…why wouldn’t she be?

“Oh! You didn’t tell me you talked with Tia Vivienne—it went well?” Ellie hoped.

“Nah, she just uh, gets it? When she thought I was gonna deck that shopkeep for throwing slurs at Marehis, she played hold-back man for me*, reminded me I probably don’t want to end up in Orlesian prison* full stop, but if I was gonna go for it, she’d have my back, stick with me, say I’m with her and make sure they didn’t throw me in a cell with a bunch of strangers if her presence alone couldn’t keep them from arresting me.”
“Oh I would’ve kicked so much butt! That jerk is who should’ve been arrested! Calling my mami- ugh! He would’ve caught major hands if mami hadn’t been all huggy to keep me from violence! I still want violence—can we go back and slap him?”

…a jerk had called her mami…what? Solas did not find Val Royeaux to be particularly interesting on its own but the prospect of inflicting vengeance on behalf of the Inquisitor and her mother was entirely enticing.

“You can probably swing by on your way home,” Krem supposed. “I know I might when I gotta get back to babysitting Bull’s bastards.”

“Someone was disrespect—” Solas stopped himself. He wasn’t sure he should be asking for details—he’d been sitting contentedly, listening to what Ellie and Sera wished to share with him.

“This asshole—potential supplier for Papa. Called Bull an ‘Oxman’ and said he had to wait outside, but uh ‘our knife-ear’ was fine as long as she didn’t touch anything. Papa turned him down on the spot and made sure everybody could hear him taking his—the Inquisitor and the Inquisition’s business—elsewhere since obviously, all he had to offer was garbage.”

Ellie giggled, “It was the best!”

“Your father sounds like an honorable man,” Solas complimented forthrightly. “I’m pleased he was returned to you. I hope he is adjusting well.” It had taken, well, almost an embarrassing amount of time when he looked back on it, for him to fully realize he was truly free—that Mythal had made him her equal, that living his life without his vallislin meant he was not subject to cruelty for cruelties sake from the Evanuris, he was a person not a thing to be ordered about, he had thoughts and opinions and they mattered even if they did not necessarily suit everyone around him. Of course he eventually took that too far but still, it had taken him some time to fully accept he was free and just what that meant. But Mythal had been patient with him, her encouragement paramount in his acclamation.

“Seems to be, yeah. Thanks for uh, asking.”

“Of course,” he said. Though, “Madam de Fer believes you could not handle being detained? You’re…I imagine you’d give any who offered you trouble a taste of their own medicine.”

The Lieutenant shrugged. “It’s uh…little bit of a ‘more likely to get violent and discriminatory’ situation for me.”

Truly? “For a Human?” …because he was Tevine? He hadn’t…he hadn’t been of this world very long but he hadn’t noticed anyone turning Ser Pavus away for his national origins.

“Different is different—I pass on the daily basis so I know I definitely don’t get it as bad as a non-human but still.”

Different…is different?

Solas stared at the young man blankly for a moment.
And then he came to the most horrific realization.

“How utterly barbaric.”

“Being labeled one gender at birth and living as another?” the Lieutenant phrased it for him, informing him that unfortunately, “Uh, yeah dude.”

How utterly barbaric.

“That is- I’ve not heard of such a ludicrous thing since-" Solas blustered. Well since Humanity decided Ellie was solely responsible for the attack on the Conclave! "Humans discriminate against you for your spirit?”

The boy squinted at him as he thought it over. “Was gonna say ‘a little bit of everyone’ has discriminated against me for it but uh…nah, just Humans. Never met a Dwarf or an Elf that wasn’t cool with me because of it, Qunari actually have a word for what I am—“

“Who,” shot from Solas’s mouth unbidden but compulsion proved stronger, “you’re not a ‘what’. And while you’re not entirely your identity, it is still a facet of who you are—just as Ellie’s being a mage does not make her a ‘what’ being a mage is part of ‘who’ she is.”

“Uhh…y-yeah,” the Lieutenant agreed.

“Elvehnan have a word as well. Several, in fact—it is a multifaceted thing, a spectrum—a beautiful one. The Evanuris filled their council with members who found themselves in equal measure masculine and feminine or neither at all. They were held in high esteem, for what is closer to a god than a mortal who transcends the duality most mortals only receive a single half of? Humans preach the Maker is a man but that is—” he stopped, clearing his throat, “that is rather off the point. Erm. I’m rather pleased to hear that it seems at least, like the Dalish may not have wholly lost every shred of their former culture—that they do not discriminate against those we once held in either equality or higher esteem.”

“So…I’d be one of the, er, equal ones? In Elvehnan society?” the Lieutenant wondered, curious.

“You may consider Cole for guarantee if you do not believe my words, but I assure you—were you born with a perfect half of duality, you would be no more a man than I am, save perhaps the fact I’ve been a pathetic excuse for one in recent…and not-so-recent history. I’ve such a measure of respect for you, Lieutenant, because you were born with a closer-to-perfect duality—the masculine imbued into the feminine and extending itself outward. To reach beyond the confines of your flesh requires a knowledge of self and a secure sense of wisdom not everyone can simply come by. I’ve never been under the impression you were ‘passing’ for anything, Mister Aclassi—there’s nothing to pass for. You’re not pretending to be a man, you are one, I’ve never had reason to consider otherwise.”

Ellie had been doing this…little impatient bounce, more of a rock of her hips that shook her frame as she kept her bottom lip caught between her teeth as if to forcibly seal her mouth shut as Solas and the Lieutenant talked, and when her boyfriend met Solas’s words with nothing more than a nod and a look that spoke to thoughtful consideration, Ellie’s eyes darted between the men’s faces back and forth and back again before her eyes went to Solas and she tapped him on the shoulder. “Papi…do you think the Maker being considered entirely masculine is Chantry propaganda…?” she wondered.

Oh. Oh he didn’t wish to stir an argument with her, he would relent if it did something to pick at her faith but, “I personally am inclined to believe as much, yes.”

Her expression broke out in a brilliant smile as she shrieked with excitement and rocked forward—somersaulted to land on her knees and roll up onto her feet, arms extended overhead with her fists to the sky as she leapt, “I think so too!” oh, it seemed like something of a relief in her to find a kindred spirit on the subject, she…well, she proceeded doing some sort of wriggling that seemed like a happy dance before she dropped back onto the blanket, on her knees before him, taking his hands in hers, “Like its so dumb—literally it’s straight up heteronormativity. Because the Maker takes Andraste as his ‘bride’ well then obviously he must be a man! But that’s dumb! Sera’s not a man and she’d totally have a bride if she were a god—she’d have two! Or three!”

“If I can’t take three Inky I can’t do it,” Sera groaned, as if exhausted at the prospect, “it’s too much orgasms, I’m fittin’ for my frggin’ heart to wear out between Widdle and Teetness.” That was…not the turn Solas saw the conversation taking and yet it continued further still.

“But Lace is usually in the middle,” Cole spoke up as if confused. “or is Dagna the middle? Huh, you’re all technically between each other. But you are usually on top. Or laying on your back, you call it sixty-double nineing-“

“Cuddly! Don’t go yapping my bedroom strategies!” Yes, good, back on-

“Ohh, that’s smart,” Ellie complimented, “so like, you and them,” she made something of a stacking motion, one hand and then the other directly over it. Then, “You on Lacey, Lacey on Dagna, Dagna on you. Neat! I was worried how you were getting on comfortably with just the windowseat.” Solas had not been concerned with the subject at all, heaven help them. "If you ever want, you know I’d be totally okay with you having a date night or whatever in my room there’s like, a bajillion other places I can sleep in Skyhold.”

“…might take you up on that if you’re really cool with it, Ink,” Sera admitted.

“Of course!” Ellie insisted.

“Oh,” the Lieutenant complained, “I didn’t bide my time playing the long game romancing the Inquisitor just so the fancy bed can get slept in without me.”
“Sorry Kremmy-boy, girls only event!” Sera insisted.

“Cremisius—sharing is caring,” Ellie lectured, “And like, you’ll be getting back there without me in a few days so…you’ll have the big fancy bed all to yourself. I recommend,” she rolled back to being between Solas and the Lieutenant, flopping onto her back with legs and arms stretched out, “this position! Everything’s loosey goosey! And it’s just the best! Besides if Sera’s in Skyhold that means I’m in Skyhold—you and me can bunk in your bed with the Chargers! That’d be so much fun!”

“I’d literally rather walk naked through a field of thorns than sleep together in the same room as the Chargers.”

“Why? Dorian sleeps with the Iron Bull in the Charger’s quarters. And I bunked with you all the way to Skyhold from Haven!”

“Yeah but that was er…you know. Before.” Before what? “The teasing’s going to be so much worse now.”

“Gosh. I guess…you can sleep all alone in your little cot without me…I mean that’s probably a good thing we’d like have to be like,” she turned on her side, scooting to lay directly against the Lieutenant, “super super snuggled to even consider safely falling asleep without worrying about falling out. I mean golly, I just wouldn’t feel safe at all unless you were holding me.”

Oh. Marehis had not been inaccurate about the Lieutenant growing distracted—the young man seemed to entirely forget himself, eyes focused solely on the girl before him as he gulped, blushing as he said, “Y-yeah. I uh. Th-that wouldn’t—”

“Be very comfortable at all, I know,” Ellie said as she rolled to lay flat on her back, a bit more space between them as she settled closer to Solas. “I can bunk with Skinner or Dalish or the Iron Bull and Dorian. I’m sure they won’t mind!”

“I don’t mind!”

“Good,” Ellie said. “If they tease us I mean—that’s kind of their thing? They’re supposed to. They got it out of their system before, once they get run out of ways to make ‘claimer of Antivan virginity’ jokes, they’ll leave us be.”

…cl-claimer of Antivan what?

Ahh. So. His bit of hope that the Lieutenant had been so worked up over Eleanor's ability to recite the Chant while tying her shoes was dashed. They’d all truly entered such a stage in their lives? That was understandable, but there was still a part of him that screamed they were impossibly young—because they were, Ellie and Sera and the Lieutenant. Once upon a time he’d lived in a land where none were younger than he, save perhaps by a matter of days or months and he was centuries old. These children been alive mere minutes in comparison. They were not- they shouldn’t be-they were but babes! Good heavens!

He’d…never been much privy to the conversations of teenagers, were they all like this? Bouncing around from talk of the stars, to politics, to gender, to religion, to sex—all in the same conversation?

Well. If they could bounce around, perhaps they could bounce back. Solas softly cleared his throat, “I believe we were discussing the Maker?”

“Sorry baldy,” Sera snorted.

“Whoops!” Ellie apologized, "Yeah, anyway, so like, the Maker—actual gods and stuff, the Elvehnan believe if there were such an entity, they’d be like, genderless?"

“They would be where gender comes from—a perfect whole of the entire spectrum in a single being,” Solas corrected, "Denoting the Maker as merely the masculine is to ignore an entire half of who the Maker is. In fact it could be speculated that Andraste is a metaphor to make up for that lack, Humans splitting the Maker into two halves instead of one whole. Placing the feminine energy as the lesser—the mortal reaching upward to ascend unto her god, as opposed to being an equal part of that god to begin with. Or, Andraste is truly a historical figure, and the Chantry is wholly ignoring the feminine part of the Maker’s duality, a way to make women in return, less than or submissive in society.”
“Vivienne says that’s why Rivain is godless or whatever. Well. She calls it godless ‘cause she doesn’t much care for their system,” Ellie said. “They’ve got more of a matriarchal system and they don’t follow Andrasten religion—they worship multiple spirits and gods of differing parts of the natural world*, sort of like the Dalish do? Like you’re the trickster god, Mythal’s the mommy god, June’s the god of crafts,” she was saying.

“June was actually gender fluid,” Solas saw fit to inform them, “a great deal of their crafting was out of necessity, to express themself on the day to day basis as their energies fluctuated. As well as encouraging the crafting of wares.”

Ellie’s mouth dropped open at that, “Sweet!” she cheered. “Gosh that’s so cool! But Rivain has a system that’s like, super repelled by the Chantry so I wonder if it’s sort of conspiracy-y. Like the feminine being hidden in Andrasten religion in the major aspects of the Maker themself, only allowed in lesser, non-god level roles. I mean in the south we’re like, super feminine power—with Mothers and stuff because the Divine is always a woman. But in Tevinter they always have a male Divine and ignore the southern Chantry.”

“Figures we’d be that asshole,” the Lieutenant said, “find the part that’s suppressed and suppress it more is basically Tevinter’s trademark.”

“Huh. I thought Tevinter’s trademark was making all my favorite people,” Ellie pouted. “You mean they’re not up there mass producing Aclassi men and Dorians?”

“Nah, only way they’re ‘kicking out’ those is by literally kicking us out of the country.”

“Rude! But their loss is our gain,” Ellie shrugged. “Gosh—do you think the Maker doesn’t like being called ‘him’? Would…they…have preferred gender neutral pronouns? Or would mixing it up from time to time be more respectful?”

“Huh. I’m not certain I can speak for the Maker,” Solas supposed…he’d done rather a bit too much presuming the role of a god, so, he didn’t wish to speak out of turn. “But I imagine it matters not. He is as much he as she or anything in between so being called one or the other likely doesn’t invoke the Maker’s ire. Perhaps it might be more appropriate to consider the content of your prayer—just as I addressed Mythal, I called on Elgar’nan and Andruil, as they all held power here at one point, and too, they were appropriate to call upon due to their stations. In a likewise manner, as the Maker is an all-encompassing god, if you’re speaking to him of more masculine matters, then perhaps his masculine energy is the best mode of address—and the feminine on more feminine matters and so on.”

“Ooooh! Bet-sies!” Ellie declared, “how much do you wanna put on Mother Gisselle flipping an entire Chantry over me leading Skyhold in prayer and addressing the maker with different pronouns throughout?”

“Not really a matter of whether or not she will—cause she will, it’s just a matter of when,” the Lieutenant supposed. “my money’s on letting you slide the first few times.”

“Friggin’ she’ll bust a blood vessel the minute you call the Maker a lady!” Sera was certain. Goodness, he’d not realized Ellie…it sounded like the girl no longer much cared for the Chantry Mother. When had that changed? She’d expressed some frustration with her when she left for the Hinterlands while he was still prisoner in Skyhold’s dungeon.

“Mother Gisselle is a bitch,” Cole sagely informed Solas. “I want to bet on all of the bets! Because I do not know, or much care, or understand money, but I would like to make you all feel validated in your opinions!”

“Cuddly I friggin love you you little weirdo,” Sera snickered.

“Papi? What do you wanna bet?” Ellie wondered. Oh, she wanted his opinion on their fun? “I…would think Mother Giselle would be immediately offended,” Solas supposed, “but not voice as much until she could pull you aside after you concluded your prayer.”

“Ohhh yeah, she is like that—very sneaky, trying not to get caught being mean or judgey.”

He wasn’t certain just how much money he might get if he were correct…it didn’t seem to be an official sort of bet besides, but he was…well, he enjoyed being included, it was…exhausting the energy it took to keep up with their exuberance but perhaps that was just part of getting old. Or being injured. Or both.

* In the text, reference is made to the natural world and spirits, which could be interpreted as different aspects or deities in the natural world, reflecting a matriarchal system and distinct from Andrasten religion.
But it had been rather a long day for them, likewise. So it was well worth the exhaustion to be rewarded with his...his child smiling up at him after such a difficult day, one in which he felt the very real fear she might perish, and say, “You’re like, the smartest! Oh! Guys! Stars! Papi—I wanted to ask you if the stars are the same now or not! Like, do we have all the same constellations as way back when? Or are they different now? Or did they used to have different names? Or—” he did not save her from one asthma attack just to have her breathless blurt of never-ending questions send her into one from merely not stopping to breathe.

“Da’vehnan,” he chuckled out, warmth bubbling up in his chest, it quelled the fear that he may be overstepping. “Why don’t we lie back, and I’ll tell you all that I know of the heavens overhead, yes? Would that suit?”

“Yes please! Hit me with the star facts!”

“Friggin I wanna know what’s up with the tree glowing!” Sera implored as they laid back. “Ahh—I am in fact knowledgeable in both these arenas.”

Ellie hummed contentedly at his si- she- she snuggled against him, her head resting on his chest as she peered up into the sky, declaring him, “The smartest!”

He was an utter fool. That was both why they were here today, and why he’d much to make up for. He’d started with providing them with truth when he was found out, and serving his punishment without complaint. Now...he’d the much more enjoyable act of penance.

He got to lay on a soft blanket in the soft grass of the Emerald Graves, tell his children the tale of his people reviving the forest around them and making their mark, leaving what was actually glowing handprints that now hovered high overhead in the treetops, visible under cover of night in an array of soothing hues. He nearly...it was something that left him in stunned silence, the closest he came to crying he- he could scarcely believe...it was not the sort of ending to this day he dreamed he might have when he woke alone in his solitary tent that morning. He was nearly...moved to tears when, upon informing them that the bioluminescent algae was still alive and well, growing to this day around the Emerald Graves, Sera wondered at making nightlights out of the stuff, seeing if it could be used in her personal experiments—if he’d like to help her. Followed by Ellie voicing how much fun it would be, how very ‘cute’, to leave their handprints somewhere in the Emerald Graves before they left, to commemorate their being here. Both were such wonderous prospects—both were things he’d never thought he’d get to enjoy again, walking these woods with people he loved and marking them to make memories, or being part of Sera’s experiments... That had been a heartbreak all its own, he’d never had quite so much fun in his young adult life, as she seemed to generate, it had been thrilling that day in Haven when word came from the blacksmith that the rune stones Solas had ordered had indeed come in, and he went to Ellie’s cabin to find Sera—the girl’s face had immediately lit up, declared it was ‘friggin time to get clackin’! It took the whole of an hour but they managed to rig up a system—tying a Ice Rune to one end of a rope, laying that rope along through hole drilled through a post they planted in one of Haven’s clear fields before leading the rope through tree branches—keeping the rune elevated as they pulled back to get some distance while holding firm the rope in their hands and then, once they felt certain enough of their safety...they dropped the Ice Rune to ‘clack’ against a Fire Rune.

It did not have an immediate reaction. But that had apparently been their maker’s design, a safeguard that...did not quite serve for safety in their case—seeing no obvious initial reaction made them begin returning to their experiment, thinking it a ‘dud’, only to have the runes react violently—repel each other and letting off rather the startling small explosion that left their bones rattling, Solas pulling Sera to his chest as he turned his back on the explosion while the girl screamed and then, once she was certain neither of them were ‘friggin dead’ declared it ‘sweet!’. And it had been just as fun taking lunch together and sipping cocoa as they discussed just why the runes reacted the way they did—could they install a continuous delay in the runes they meant to use in Ellie’s Embrium steam necklace? Unlikely. But Sera worked around to the proposal of a transitional rune—something that could be slipped between one rune and another that had matching runes on either side—Fire to Fire, Ice to Ice, so if they used a wholly magical solution to heating steam without burning Ellie with the device, as opposed to electromagnetic induction with perhaps a few magical failsafe’s worked in, they wouldn’t be handing the girl something that would blow up quite literally in her face just moments after its creation.

That was one of her favorite days, Cole offered silently, compassion prompting. Part of her did not think you would actually keep your word about being interested in pursuing an experiment with her, and when you did it healed so much hurt. You listened and made her feel heard, did not make her feel dumb or her thoughts feel pointless. It was fun when the runes blew up but she was also scared—both because it was scary but also because she thought it meant she messed up and you would be displeased with her, turn on her. And you did—you turned to protect her, made her feel so very safe and loved that it startled her more than the explosion had. And then you did not yell or belittle—she was safe and that was all that mattered to you. She mattered to you. Cocoa tastes even better when talking with someone you share it with, sweet sips between thoughts shared without condemnation. She fell asleep thinking of how you said you were so very proud of the work you did that day.

They were dozing, Solas vaguely aware that he himself may well be falling asleep soon if he was not careful…the Lieutenant was already sound asleep at Ellie’s side, Sera snoring in Solas’s ear, Cole was laying lax with his eyes closed.

Ellie yawned softly against his shoulder, shaking herself a bit even as she settled more comfortably against his uninjured side, “Papi…m’sleepy. Are you?”

There was bit of a feverish thrum in his head, he’d been unconscious for so long this day and still, yes, he was certainly sleepy. “Mmm.”

“Sissy and me were planning on Fade dreaming tonight—will you show us the Halla’s coming back?”

If…if there was anything out there that might hear his prayers—he was grateful for all he’d been given this evening, and very selfishly…he prayed he would get to keep it come morning.

“With pleasure, da’vehnan.”

He spent the evening in the Fade reliving one of the most beautiful nights of his entire life, with Sera—his da’vehnan was capable of dreaming and being guided in the Fade! Oh her magic was expressing itself so beautifully. Ellie at their side, Cole following after, and they watched with wonder as he wove for them the memory of the night the first Halla returned to the Emerald Graves after the great war…singing softly with his younger self as he bestowed the lyrics upon his daughters, so eager to learn—Tel garas solas-an. Arlathan.

He woke to sunlight poring through the trees, casting a glistening glow on the dew that gathered around them, to find these girls still resting at his side, their male counterparts holding them in turn, gathered together as there had been chill in the night…but also someone who watched and waited, and draped them in warm blankets when she discovered them sleeping soundly in starlight. The taste of vehnan leaves lingered in the back of his throat like someone had sweetly administered potion to see his fever broken, injuries tended.

His cheek was still warm from where lips had pressed a wish of sweet dreams their daughters had secured.

Tel garas solasan. Arlathan.

_____________

Cassandra Pentaghast despised hay fever. Ever since she was a child and had been introduced to the ailment during what was supposed to be a relaxing day trip to enjoy the spring air and take in a nice picnic with her brother and a few aunts and uncles to celebrate the coming of warmer weather that left Cassandra wholly miserable, and not because of the social graces or her aunt’s terrible attempts at R’fissa*—her chicken was always remarkably dry, like sand in ones mouth. Hay fever, without a doubt, the singlemost meddlesome thing. It was wholly pointless—to what purpose did such a reaction serve? To grow so congested and- and disgustingly mucus ridden? Her head felt over-full, she ached from head to toe as their time in the Emerald Graves pressed on.

And the absolute worst of these symptoms was the sniffling, lung-clogging breathing not coming from the Seeker.

It sounded at her side, warm weight ever present there since they returned from their next endeavors in Rift Sealing. “You want more Embrium salve on your back mami?” rasped from Eleanor’s throat.

“Mmm, no sweet girl, but thank you. Do you wish for more?” the woman wondered as Eleanor had sat up in their cot, had a jar of the stuff in hand.

“Uh-huh,” the girl sniffled, grunting with the effort as she attempted uncapping the jar before letting out…rather the pathetic little groan. “I did woman kind proud today, so…papito,” she hoarsely called.

Krem slid into the tent a moment later, as if the Iron Bull had relayed the girl’s call for him and he came running, “Si, mi reina?”

Oh, was the Lieutenant learning his girlfriend’s first language? That was sweet, sweeter still when the girl giggled, offering up the jar with a little pout, “This lid is being mean to your girlfriend.”

The young man made a show of rolling his shoulders and cracking his neck, his knuckles before taking the jar in hand…and a look that certainly spoke to the thought ‘oh shit’ crossed his features before he offered up a…attempting to be reassuring smile to his girlfriend before turning his back on her and putting a bit more effort into his twisting the jar lid which…thankfully bore success that left him breathing a sigh from his work, turning victorious with the jar uncapped, “Here lovely.”

“Gracias guapo!” Eleanor thanked him, accepting a peck to the lips as she’d assurances she wasn’t contagious, it was simply. The damned. Pollen count. “Aquí por favor?” she asked, pulling at the strings of her tunic—his tunic, one he used for sleeping—to loosen it enough to slide it down her shoulders, holding the fabric up on her chest as she let the back lower to expose her upper back.

“Si, mi reina,” he readily agreed after giving the Seeker a glance to make certain the woman wasn’t going to be uncomfortable with his placing treatment on her daughter but it was hardly a sexual thing, so she nodded her assent though he halted when her expression sharpened and she reached out for his hand before he could dip his fingers into salve.

“What happened here?” she questioned, Maker! The boy’s knuckles were scraped and bruised all along his fingers! Had he punched someone?

Oh. Not someone. Some thing.

“Should punch a tree*,” Rainier had jested when Cassandra glared at one after rather the vicious sneeze.

Anthony had once suggested as much. And once again, when Cassandra had been truly miserable with her sickness, he’d punched a tree they were passing by on horseback as she rode in the saddle before him, holding her close as she’d- oh, it had been one of the last times in her youth that Cassandra had giggled at something, but she had, she’d giggled at her brother bashing his fist against a tree in retribution for making his sister so sick.

It seemed the young Aclassi had likewise taken matters literally into his own hand, seeking vengeance for his girlfriend and her mother. “Hey, not to steal Adan’s thunder but if you two start feeling better—I might’ve given the trees the what-for.”

“Awe, guapo!” Eleanor cooed, “Rub salve into your knuckles too, kay? It’ll heal that right up!”

He offered up a little wink at that, “Si, mi reina,” he chuckled before he dipped his fingers in salve.

That…was a third time he’d said that. “Lieutenant Aclassi,” Cassandra chuckled out, mildly suspicious. She’d no great knowledge of the Antivan language, but she was beginning to think perhaps it was a bit more expansive than the Tevinter’s, “como estas?”

And the young man smiled and said, “Si, mi reina,” as he rubbed salve between Eleanor’s “…is that the only sentence of Antivan you’re capable of forming?”
“Still learning,” he shrugged, favoring her a…ugh, endearingly charming grin. This boy, honestly. “Just figured I’d master the important words first.”
“Mmm, it might not be the most important words,” Eleanor corrected smilingly, “te amo…”
“…Te amo” the Lieutenant followed.
“Con todo…”
“…Con todo.”
“Mi corazon…”
“Mi corazon,” he nodded. “Uhh…” as he parcelled through the words to at least guess at what they might mean.

“Do you have a translation, mami?” Eleanor questioned the Seeker, eyes alight.
She knew well her ‘papi’ had indeed used the sentence enough Cassandra had no choice other than to know exactly what it meant. Ahh well, it was a sweet indulgence, to rest her forehead against her child’s as she translated the truth of, “I love you with all of my heart.”
“A-plus mami!” she enthused, sniffling as she pressed a kiss to Cassandra’s cheek, and the Lieutenant was wiping his hand with a rag before pulling up his girlfriend’s shirt for her, dropping a kiss to her hair.
“You ladies need anything else?” he wondered, “Got some tea coming up if you’re interested?”
“Oh, that’d be the best guapo,” Eleanor said.
It…was indeed the best. Krem left them momentarily and returned with warm mugs for them, passing Cassandra’s off with a sweet kiss to her cheek as he rubbed a few circles on her back and informed her, “Little bit of vanilla and honey for you.” That was a wholly ridiculous gesture. And wholly appreciated. “Rest up mama, feel better.”

…perhaps hay fever…annoyance as it was…was not entirely horrible. She despised Eleanor being unwell, but she did not despise that it meant she got to take rather the lazy afternoon dozing and relaxing with the girl. Oh, she’d missed her, it was selfish but she was pleased to have the time alone with her child. She’d been admittedly glad to skip out on the pretentiousness of Val Royeaux, but she missed this. Being with Eleanor and Sera and…well, perhaps the others in their camp as well. Marehis certainly—absolutely. And…well Dorian was good company when one wished to engage in particularly scathing witty conversation. Madam de Fer as well. And the Iron Bull, certainly, the Qunari was surprisingly easy to speak with of anything, mostly battle strategy for Cassandra’s comfort but when she was so inclined, the Charger’s Captain was rather insightful and…comforting. And for all Rainier had once been fooling them, playing a character—he’d a remarkable one. A deeply rooted sense of honor and loyalty, he was more quiet company but when he did speak it was always in kindness or…if he did speak something that could come off as unkind it was always jesting, he’d a smart humor he rarely unleashed but when he did it was usually for comfort or comradery. And there was a sweetness in Cole that was admittedly heartwarming, Cassandra admittedly had a level of love for the Spirit man who was such a faithful friend to her daughters and the Lieutenant. Oh and she certainly missed the young Aclassi.

Did she miss—she did not—miss Varric. No. Absolutely not. Perhaps, insofar as she missed the bit of amusement that came with complaining of his surly antics. Yes. That was it.

They were not best friends! But they were friendly. Had some sense of loyalty to one another. Insofar as working in the Inquisition—that was all!
Even if the Dwarf wrote inquiring to Cassandra’s well being after a week or so into his journey across Orlais to the Western Approach. He was merely...probably looking for her to offer up something he might make fun of. She was certain he’d cackled the night away with Hawke making rude, inappropriate jokes when she informed him she was taking a trip with Cullen. Well hell, it’s about time you took a break Seeker. Have a nice time, don’t do anything I wouldn’t do her foot!

Bah. They might be better friends than she cared to admit but she hardly wanted such an expansive inner circle. Never in her life had she been in a position where she could look on so many individuals in a single glance and every one of their faces were ones she trusted to belong to people she could turn to at a moment’s notice and find comfort or advice or aid of any sort in and out of battle.

It was sweeter still when she woke from her nap to find Eleanor still asleep at her side and discovered that they had been joined by Sera and Miss Lace. Cassandra was not wholly certain the propriety of cuddling with an Inquisition scout, but the young woman certainly deserved a nap, and too she was Sera’s girlfriend. Though for all that was true, Sera was laying against Cassandra and lace had laid alongside Eleanor. Well, it was more like sitting—the woman was seated at the head of the cot, her back against one of the tent posts with a pillow for cushioning and Eleanor’s head in her lap, carefully finger combing the girl’s hair and humming softly. Somehow the scout cuddling with the Inquisitor seemed much more appropriate.

“Oh! Hello ma’am,” she murmured softly to Cassandra, “Golly hay fevers a pain, huh? You need anything at all? Dinner’s on soon, Krem’s had it cooking all day and says it’ll be done soon.”

All day? Ahh, the young man had been about something that morning, putting ingredients into a stock pot he placed in the low burn of their campfire with promises from those holding their camp in their absence that they would keep it burning. She did smell something...well, she was able to smell again now, that was wonderful—she smelled something absolutely delicious.

Which incited a bit of giggling, “You hungry too ‘sandra?” Sera wondered, eyes squinting open as she smiled, her arm around Cassandra’s middle so yes. She supposed the girl had been rather privy to the absolutely appalling grumble her head resting below Cassandra’s breast, the girl had literally curled up to lay at her side, and she’d the hearing of an Elf, it almost made her apologetic but she wasn’t certain a person’s organs had much room for volume control.

“Perhaps,” the woman offered. Hmm. ‘Too’ implied, “Are you, sweet girl? When...when did you last eat?” they’d had breakfast before going out to face more Rifts, but it’d been so exhausting, Cassandra had just been miserable as she fell into her cot, Eleanor following suit and they’d fallen dead asleep for the better part of an hour before they could either one of them consider changing out of armor and cleaning up. She’d only barely heard Sera quietly checking on them, roused because someone was brushing her hair back to feel at her forehead for fever before the Elf girl informed them she’d ‘be right back’—she, Cole, and miss Lace had joined Thom and his men to handle the bit of trouble they’d discovered at a Chateau d’Onterre—their initial concern had been that the Freemen of the Dales had taken the place as a last stand of sorts and Cassandra was more the curious what had happened as it had sent the girl crashing into the cot with the Seeker the moment she returned and curling in on herself, holding Cassandra so very tightly and trembling a bit though...huh, Cassandra vaguely remembered this happening, blah, her head was just...full of mucus and little else it felt like, but she could at least remember now that she thought on it, that she’d stirred when Sera joined them, felt her trembling and woke enough to make certain if the girl was alright—she’d insisted she was merely cold and that had been accepted to her sleep- addled mind but as she woke, and potion and rest had worked their respective magics, that did not seem quite so an acceptable response.

“Lace and me grabbed lunch when we set out with Thom’n’them, no worries,” Sera assured, however, “Right starvin’ now though.”

Eleanor sat up...with an air not unlike a woman suddenly risen from the dead, she’d been so very soundly asleep and her body seemed compelled to rise faster than she was prepared for but, “I...don’t know what day it is...but whatever cooking, I want all of it.”
Miss Lace giggled, “We better get out there and get some for ourselves then before she goes telling the Chef—Krem’ll beat us all away with his big metal spoon if he hears Ellie wants all of it to herself.”

“Cremisius cook—” Eleanor sucked in a gasp that thankfully sounded clear, “Chicken noodles!”

“Chicken and noodle soup?” Cassandra wondered, she did smell chicken but…something of cream as well.

“No like, a thousand times better!” Eleanor assured her, swinging out of bed, though she turned back around immediately to wrap her arms around Miss Lace, “Also like, super duper surprise waking up to my Lacey! We should cuddle more—sissey’s a Dwarf hog!”

“You’ve got Varric!” Sera defended

“And like, absolutely no offense to him but he’s always got Bianca on him and that makes it hard to cuddle. Also…Lacey always smells like flowers. And Dagna always smells like fire and that’s nice? Varric…doesn’t smell like flowers or fire, he should really up his scent game.”

Miss Lace giggled, blushing at that, “Oh golly, we can cuddle any time honey, you don’t even have to be sick—how you feelin’? Dagna’s only written like…” she looked to Sera for confirmation.

“Dunno, three times today at least, askin’ after you and ‘sandra,” Sera said.

“Awe! I’ll write her after…dinner?” Eleanor guessed the time.

“Oh! Dagna’d love that,” Lace confirmed but mention of dinner hour being upon them reminded the Dwarf woman to check the time, “I gotta run—little bit of recon for our Red Templar mission,” she said, and Sera groaned a little miserably at that, earning the assurance, “just two sleeps and we’ll meet up,” she informed her girlfriend, blowing a kiss the Elf girl’s way before nodding to Cassandra, “Seeker,” and a wink to Ellie, “Inquisitor.”

“Mmm…freckles,” Sera said wistfully as her girlfriend left them, and then she shook herself out of her reverie for her girlfriend’s sweet face, “Uh-huh, yeah Inky, that’d be sweet if you wrote Widdle, she’d um, feel a lot better,” Sera said, “right worried about all these Rifts. You’re um…” her chin quivered a bit before she cleared her throat, “You can’t feel any of the Rifts here in camp, can you?”

Oh, Sera’d taken such painstaking care to map out the exact distance between this camp and any of the surrounding Rifts. Cassandra suspected the girl out and out measured until she was directly under the things, triggering them, fighting and fleeing the demons they produced, all to ensure that when she selected a base for Eleanor, it was one she would truly find rest in—she could come home and be safe, recover without the added burn of a not-distant-enough Rift tormenting her even in her sleep.

“Nu-uh, not a one!” Eleanor assured.

“Whew. Just- just checkin’. Friggin’ forgot to yesterday,” Sera lamented, “You couldn’t feel the ones we closed today neither, right?”

Eleanor shook her head, “Not from camp!”

“Sweet! Yeah, we’ll um, we’ll write Widdle after dinner, ‘kay? Give her an update. Shite—you lot haven’t eaten since breakfast!”

Which was, of course, an emergency apparently…to be fair, the Seeker suppose she’d be just as urgent if Sera had skipped lunch after so much fighting and scouting. But that was her right as…’mami’.

Horrible, blessed word. Ugh. It was still an embarrassingly thrilling title.

But it was a role she dearly enjoyed, walking with her arms around her girls as they made their way out to join the others. A blessing about the Emerald Graves was…the weather was admittedly pleasant. No rain, no unbearable heat, and the chill in the night was not unpleasant—she’d been worried when Marehis reported that er…Solas and the children had fallen asleep under the stars but they were apparently comfortable, she’d taken a blanket to them, assured that she would check—on the girls, she insisted—through the night. If…Marehis was feeling more forgiving toward the man, that was her prerogative entirely. Cassandra was beyond relieved for her that she’d confirmed she wasn’t with child, that…if Marehis had found herself truly in such a situation, Cassandra, Vivienne…she could think of no one in their group who would not offer support no matter her decision, it would complicate her role with Eleanor but only insofar as being her body guard and that was something that could be handled in her stead, but oh she would worry endlessly, and she already abused herself over the slightest misstep in Eleanor’s care—she would feel guilt beyond belief if another took her place, and if something befell Eleanor in their care? Oh, she would never forgive herself—feel she’d failed her. That was just the occupational stresses—the implications of carrying her half-estranged, somewhat-forgiven, sometimes-the-rage-feels-fresh lover’s child were many and tenuous, each and every one of them daunting.

“Should I be concerned I, of my own volition, chose to kill that Lord who threatened Sera?”
the woman somewhat jestingly wondered last night. When she’d spoken to Cassandra of her worry, she’d listed er…changes of mood, irrational behavior such as murdering the Lord that laid in wait to kill ‘Red Jenny’ on their way to Crestwood—worried she’d only done as much due to a dip or rise in hormones. Upon reflection with what they knew now could be easily explained by her anxieties and too…

“Not at all. If you hadn’t, I would have.” Cassandra assured, “Or Cullen even—either journeying directly to the Lord and murdering him in his home, or through favor with Leliana—and he certainly cannot be suffering pregnancy hormones either.”

The woman certainly looked more relaxed now…she’d held herself a bit tensely when Cassandra first laid eyes on her seated around the fire with the whole of Eleanor’s party, Thom’s men, the Lieutenant standing nearest to the fire as he stirred the great pot he’d set cooking that morning. But the Elf woman’s right ear twitched thrice before she twisted about to look and she relaxed upon seeing them coming to join the proverbial party.

She prayed it would not become a literal one—she wanted to eat, pray the Maker un-Make every last bit of pollen in the air, and return to bed. She would maybe write Cullen. She should check on him—she was miserable with a mere sinus headache, it made her sympathy greater for his migraines. How the man continued to function…oh, she missed him, prayed he was feeling better. Unfortunately he was not likely to cease stressing over Samson and his ties with Corypheus until they had more information. Which they would not…until they could investigate the leads here in the Emerald Graves, and they would, starting tomorrow—Eleanor had sealed two Rifts northward of their camp, and tomorrow they had their designs set on a single Rift found on a road that wound along the river. It was also a road that the Red Templars in the area had been reportedly using to transport Red Lyrium, to where they were uncertain, and from where was also a concern.

“Hey Seeker,” the Iron Bull greeted, slinging an arm over Sera’s shoulders as she and Cassandra sat alongside him on one of the fallen stone pillars they’d situated to circle their campfire, resting his hand on the back of Cassandra’s neck which was, in fact, appreciated, Maker bless him and his warm hands, “Imekaris—how you feelin’ babes?”

“Well enough,” Cassandra offered though,
“My brain is full of snot and my heart is full of sadness that my mami’s so sick,” Eleanor reported. Oh, sweet girl, she needn't fret so-“Ditto,” Sera agreed. Sweet girls!

“Oh no, is your head stuffy too sissy?” Eleanor fretted, leaning forward to look across Cassandra to Sera.

“Not like, literally or whatever. Just in solidarity,” the Elf girl confirmed, smiling when Eleanor giggled,

“Thanks!”

“Alright you bastards, wait your damn turn,” the Lieutenant…was indeed swinging a large metal serving spoon to cast off Rainier’s men gathering around his pot, just as foretold, “ladies first,” he insisted before looking to Cassandra, “How you feelin’ mama? You want crackers to start or are you all good to dig into something heavier?”

“I’m fine sweet man. What you’ve made smells delicious,” she complimented earning a warm smile, the young man blushing as he shrugged.
“Egg noodles, cream, chicken stock, peas, carrots, and…” he sighed, as if put upon as he fully expected,

The Iron Bull rumbled out an appreciative growl, “Big ol’ set of chicken breasts.”

“Oi! No objectifying our dinner, the Iron Bull! Apologize to the nice chicken and thank her for her sacrifice!” Eleanor insisted. Rightly so, honestly.

That elicited a hearty laugh from the Qunari, “Sorry Imekari—and sweet lady Chicken. Thank you for your glorious sacrifice, may your protein live on in our rippling muscles.”

“Amen!” Eleanor cheered.

Cole sweetly offered to help Krem dole out portions for everyone, the young man filling plates the Spirit carried, first two to Cassandra and Eleanor, offering up an apologetic kiss to Sera’s cheek for his body’s lack of a third hand and a promise he’d be right back.

Marehis wrapped an arm around Eleanor’s shoulders, quietly checking on her ward, asking how she slept, if she needed anything at all.

“M’okay mami, potion and everything’s helping lots,” Eleanor assured, she looked around their fire, “Um…where’s pa— um. Solas?” she wondered.

Marehis worried her lip momentarily before offering up, “Your papi is out on an errand with Ser Cyril, he should return soon.”

Eleanor nodded, seeming incredibly shy as she nervously picked at the food on her plate with her fork, “Um…I’m— I’m really sorry, I didn’t mean to— if it makes you sad or upset mami, I won’t—“ “Da’vehanan.” Marehis breathed, pulling the girl a bit closer, resting her chin atop her head, “Solas…I am still hurt insofar as his relationship with me but…I do…trust him, with you, sweet girl. He has…proven himself. I’m wary in my trust but it is still there. And my feelings on the matter do not have to be your feelings on the matter. I’m grateful for all he did for you the other day, for us. If you have love of him still, sweet girl, wish for him to maintain that role in your life? You deserve to have it, so long as he is willing to act in it the way he should, holds himself to the standard of being a reliable person in your life, which…is a role he takes very seriously. So long as he does not put you to further harm or danger, or abuses his role, I’ll have no qualms with it.”

“What Solas did for you is above and beyond what my own father has ever done for me,” Dorian voiced from across the campfire, “and I still refer to him as such.”

“It is not something I take lightly,” Vivienne supposed from his side, “to have humbled himself before his enemies and…well. It is one thing to vow to a loved one you might take on their ailments for them, it is another entirely to truly endeavor do it and bear its success so well.” Hmm, yes, he’d not complained once, been very reserved in accepting assistance for his injuries, lots of regal nods and quiet assurances he was alright though…well, upon one of the instances Marehis disappeared in the night, slipping out of the cot next to Cassandra’s and returning several minutes later, she reported the man had been suffering fever, a mild inset of infection from his injuries but potion set him to rights. He’d fallen asleep in his dinner that night, wholly exhausted, and…it had been Krem, of all people who stepped up and patted him on the shoulder to rouse him and asked if he felt like talking—using the excuse of striking up a conversation, wishing to know more about some aspect about Elvehnan society and words they used for their gender spectrum. The Elf man had seemed delighted to engage in such a conversation, Krem slinging an arm over his shoulder and the two went to speak in in the tent—the young man was comfortable around them all but it could be considered a sensitive topic, and it gave the Elf man the ability to retire without announcing how very weary he was. And the Lieutenant returned after awhile, stretching as he sighed and sat alongside Eleanor who pecked a kiss to his jaw in thanks.

“S—so…umm…no one’s going to be um…m-mad if I’m…dunno. Nice to Solas?” Eleanor timidly questioned.

Dorian let off a haughty laugh…a bit of laughter shared by all the adults around the fire—nervous laughter emanating from Thom’s men as they weren’t entirely certain just what struck them with such amusement even as their Sergeant was chuckling with genuine mirth.
“Oh my darling girl,” Madam de Fer…oh goodness, she was struggling to speak around her laughter, hand pressing into her chest as the other was raised to her lips, trying to hide just how widely she was smiling, “you absolute treasure, have you- have you considered y- y- your candor with that man to be one of m-meanlessness?!”

“I’m mean!” Eleanor defended, looking incredulously to her boyfriend as the young man cackled. And she insisted, indignant, “I can be mean!”

“O-of course,” the Lieutenant did try to agree, clearing his throat and what certainly must be the most important sentence in his Antivan arsenal, “Si, mi reina!”

“Oh, meh!” Eleanor stuck out her tongue at him before pouting, “I made fun of him not having hair!”

…when she insisted she would have subjected Solas to punishment via hair dye if…if he’d hair to dye?

“Our Inquisitor’s cruelty knows no bounds,” Cassandra softly drawled go Marehis who giggled.

“Imikari…that was baby-level shit talking,” the Iron Bull informed her. “Dorian’s melted the skin off an Orlesian man with a single glare for—and I shit you not—serving him biscotti with coffee.”

“You absolute heathens!” Dorian scathed, “You serve biscotti with Vin Santo—or not at all!”

“We had biscotti and coffee for breakfast in Crestwood,” Eleanor spoke up, confused.

“Oh my sweet, sweet Eleanor. I love you, you simple treasure—that was biscotti della salute. It is exceptionally less dense and only allowed to be consumed at breakfast, never after noon, even as you awful children still managed to do so.”

“Okay, watch who the fuck you’re calling simple,” the Lieutenant warned, leveling the man a glare before looking to Eleanor, “See lovely? That was probably as mean as all your ‘meanness’ combined, directed at Solas. Guy got off pretty easy which…” Krem shrugged, “I suppose is fair. Honestly, I think we’ve all been a little harsh on the poor fella.”

“How you figure that?” the Iron Bull wanted to know…Cassandra was admittedly curious herself. Solas had tricked and betrayed them all, the Dread Wolf with his designs on his Orb of Destruction—planning to destroy the world after all of their work to repair it.

“I mean c’mon—end of the day?” the young man grinned, “Solas’s just a dog chasing after his ball*.”

Eleanor slapped her hand over her mouth, a peal of giggles escaping her as Sera…oh goodness, the Elf girl sounded as if she might simply be, in her own words, ‘losing it’. Even Marehis was laughing so hard she had to hold her sides.

And so the whole of their campfire erupted in mirth, the Iron Bull coughing as he’d laughed so hard he choked, wiping a tear from his eye as he said, “Shit. Shit. Out here on your time off earning a damn raise, brat.”

Cassandra was only catching her breath when- oh. Oh goodness. Solas and Cyril returned to their camp, the Elf man looking upon their reveling group with wide eyed curiosity and then he- he-

The man had a round, orb-esque jar in hand with a slow slosh of thick, golden-brown liquid inside. And he tripped, losing his grip on the object and he raced to catch it deftly in his grasp before it could crash to the ground.

Marehis screamed with laughter. And she was not alone in her amusement, oh Eleanor was gasping, and Sera screeched—trying to quell her own mirth as she raised Eleanor’s embrium steam necklace to the girl’s nose for fear the girl was on the edge of a laughter-induced asthma attack, Krem was kneeling before his girlfriend now, redfaced and face tear-streaked from his own laughter as he tried to somber up and calm Eleanor down.

Solas looked incredibly amused by it all, though that may be because he’d three bonded in his vicinity experiencing so much amusement at once, he’d a smile at his lips even as he said, “I apologize da’vehnhan, I wouldn’t wish to ruin your fun but I’m worried it will turn into something of a medical emergency if you don’t cease your laughter,” he said, clearing his throat and Cassandra supposed he must be sending the girl waves of calm to center her before she teetered over the edge.

Her mother teetered over the literal edge. Marehis fell out of her seat, catching herself on her elbows.

“Marehis! Good heavens,” Solas breathed, alarmed as his hand shot out and then stopped retreating and then stilling midair like he was quite uncertain what to do with it, “Are you quite alright?”

“I’m fine!” the woman was beaming, smiling so very wide and redfaced and wheezing, fanning herself a bit, eyeing the man’s hand before lowering the arm she used to fan herself to brace herself against the ground before offering up her left hand to accept his and pull herself up, breathing out a long, controlled breath. “The Lieutenant was just exemplifying that he should perhaps consider a career in comedy.”

“So I heard,” Solas said, his cheeks, the tips of his ears reddening, as he smiled, “it was very clever. I’m pleased such amusement could be made,” and then he cleared his throat. “Would I be permitted to make something to drink, or is the fire still in use?”

“Knock yourself out,” Krem supposed with a bit of a wink, and Solas grinned, seeming amused at the subtle jest at the young man who once leveled him unconscious in a single blow inviting him to do the same in…good humor. Cassandra…well. She felt akin to Marehis in the respect that she could appreciate things being less tense, and respect Eleanor’s relationship with the man, but there were moments her rage felt rekindled for the Conclave. Though the Lieutenants joke did…bear some genuine wisdom. Being forever angered at Solas for his actions was akin to being forever upset with sweet Anya for her tender days in Haven when she had, indeed, wet Cassandra’s bedding before she’d been properly housebroken—she hadn’t known any better. Solas’s explanation had been brutal to sit through, that he once saw them as no different than an unexpected infestation upon the world he once knew and…well, she could certainly understand he’d changed—the Cassandra who had never met Eleanor would have had the true vermin infesting the Inquisition’s fortress in Crestwood exterminated without prejudice, and she would not have batted an eye at it…in fact she may well have done so even to this day, if not her love of Eleanor, and the girl bringing revealing that there was…well, a sense of life to the creatures—that the Nugs, biological or otherwise, had value. Little lives of their own that mattered simply because they existed, and they did so without causing harm, and their extermination for the mere crime of making a home in a place the Inquisition wished to reclaim was not enough to warrant death. It…was not unlike Solas looking upon the world he wished to reclaim. He’d had no Eleanor to instill in him the value of Humanity, Dwarves, or Qunari—not until he’d already soiled the Temple of Sacred Ashes. And now he knew better…and was doing better, mourned his mistakes.

And he was continually determined to be of aid to them. Show mercy where he’d once known callous indifference. Solas…the Dread Wolf himself…had spent his afternoon in the company of a Human, scouring the Emerald Graves for the sake of Cassandra and Eleanor.

“When you are through eating, da’vehnan, I would request you make a bit of a strange fashion choice while you are outside during our stay here,” Solas said, holding out something for Eleanor to take. Cassandra almost thought it a strange undergarment but no—it was a mask, a thin rectangular sheet meant to cover Eleanor’s mouth and nose, that had string on each corner that could be tied together at the back of her neck to hold its place, though the string seemed…it was very plant-like. In fact it was. The man had gone into the wilderness in search of sweetgrass and Elf Root-er. Vehnan Root, Cassandra supposed. He’d then sat with Cyril while the man was on alert for any trouble and Solas had worked the long strands of grass into fine threads he soaked in fresh solution he made from Vehnan root and water before weaving the sweetgrass into a fine mesh that would shield Eleanor’s lungs from…well, he was uncertain if it would help entirely with every particle in the air, but at the very least it should help with the horrible amounts of pollen.

“Really?” Eleanor asked, setting her plate aside, putting the mask on properly and taking in a deep, deep breath. Oh goodness, flakes became visible on the outside of the mask, one could actually see the pollen drawn by her breath finding an obstacle in its way, only to fall and float away when the girl exhaled and exclaimed, “Neat! Oh my gosh that’s so cool! Gracias papi! Golly I won’t miss that.”

“You mean you don’t enjoy vast pollination choking your airways?” Dorian asked aghast, a playful smile at his lips.

“Nope!” Eleanor assured smile evident in her eyes as she- oh. oh good heavens. Maker preserve them—“I mean don’t get me wrong—I’m new to the whole sex thing so who knows? I might be into choking. But out and about just trying to live my life getting choked by not Cremisius is definitely not my jam.”

…Cassandra’s eyes felt like they may well truly fall directly from her own head. The Iron Bull’s entire face was a startling shade of purple—she’d think the man were the one choking to death if she wasn’t vaguely aware that was the natural tinge of blush in Qunari skin, the poor man rumbled out a growl as he regarded his Lieutenant with scrutiny and then he voiced his true conflict, “I wanna high five and punch you at the same time.”

“You know, I’m pretty sure that’s how the fist-bump got invented,” Krem ventured.

“Good point,” the Qunari seconded the notion, raising a fist to…thankfully, merely bump fists with the young man who was blushing fiercely.

And then the Lieutenant was subject to a smack on the back of the head from his Chief when he threw Eleanor a silver coin along with a pleased, goofy smile and said, “Damn babe good going—you did get him to blush.”

“I told you!” Eleanor said, catching the coin in one hand as she lowered her mask with the other, to resume eating once she was through pressing a kiss to her newly won coinage, “mwah! Right in the shoe fund—gracias the Iron Bull!”

“Okay that’s it, that’s where I draw the line. You two gotta break up—it’s only cool when me and you gang up on Krem-puff, boss. You two can’t go ganging up on me! You,” the Qunari pointed a great finger at the Lieutenant, “stay the fuck away from my Imekari!” and then he pointed at Eleanor, “Same goes for you!”

“Well…damn, I guess…it was nice while it lasted?” Krem supposed of their Qunari mandated breakup.

“Eh,” Eleanor shrugged, nonchalant as she stuck a fork into her next chosen bite of chicken and noodles, “if you say so.” Winking as her face broke out in a smile she couldn’t fight at her own amusement.

“Solas,” Dorian spoke, almost imploringly, “What is it you’re using our campfire for? Planning to burn our camp to the ground, are you? Please say yes. I wasn’t on board with your whole ‘end the world’ ideals before but now, yes, I’ve experienced enough disgust with these horrible children, please end it.”

“I’m afraid, disturbing as young love can be at times, I’m rather reformed from my old mentalities on the sanctity of the world as it has become,” Solas spoke with put-on regret, “I am, alas, merely making tea.”

Tea? While Cyril got a plate of food and sat alongside Thom, Solas brewed up a steaming pot of cinnamon tea, and he used the warmth of the fire to very gently soften a small bowl of butter before he poured the contents of the jar he’d had with him to stir into the butter—he’d several jars actually, he’d gotten them out of his pack once he settled into camp and handed them off to Cole who offered to put them where the Elf man wished—in their food stores.

Honey.

The man had gone off in search of honey. Bee’s hives. From which he’d extracted, somehow, someway, several small jars of raw honey.

For Cassandra.

Solas sliced up an apple, the slices he then stuck into the bowl—dipping their ends in the honey-butter mixture and letting them line the sides of the bowl before he handed placed it at Cassandra’s feet as he handed her a warm mug of honey-laced tea.

“Dessert, I suppose—you may wish to take up eating honey in the mornings, Lady Seeker, it is excellent on oatmeal and the like,” Solas said, “Bees collect and process the pollen that’s making you so very ill, if you introduce it into your body this way, it may teach your immune system to cease regarding it as the enemy. It was a common practice we had—many of my friends in days of old, they would get horrible hay fever, and it was discovered that those of them who consumed honey* in their meals and tea began suffering fewer symptoms, some of them being cleared of issue altogether, and it became something of a staple in our cuisine.” Ahh. She’d wondered why he’d gone to retrieve so much when they had a bit of honey already in their stores, though she supposed Ferelden bees may well be working with different plant life to produce their Honey.

“You get me any bees?” Sera wondered, since he seemed to be allotting a great many gifts.

“Oh ma’da’assan, I did consider it, but these are not the sort of bees that get in the business of stinging enemies. Honeybees are as sweet as what they produce,” Solas fondly informed her, a warm timber to his voice. “There is plenty of honey, and it is rather delicious—you should indulge if you’ve the liking for it.”

“Sweet! Ohh Inky—think they’d be good for cookies?”

Eleanor gasped, “Oh my gosh! Sera! Honey cookies are like—big yum! The cookie club is having so many meetings in the Emerald Graves, and I’m not mad about it.”

“Thank you, Solas,” Cassandra said to the man, “I do appreciate this.” It sounded strange, inviting the very pollen that made her so ill to begin with into her body but she supposed the man wasn’t trying to poison her. Cole would warn her.

I would! The boy’s voice chirped assurance in her mind, Solas and I did not meet in the time before, there were so many of us—but I worked in Mythal’s house and my old body, it used to get hay fever too! The honey helped and it was very delicious. My body used to wake up in the night even though it was supposed to be sleeping and decide it was time to eat some? Is that normal? Well, midnight snacking was rather normal she supposed, though she didn’t often indulge. Oh! Midnight snacking! You used to midnight snack with Anthony, oh…thank you for sharing that with me, you felt so happy and safe, and I feel it now! You made Sera and Ellie feel that on your way to the Storm Coast—for the first time? They thought you would be angry with them, pulling pudding pranks on Solas and Varric and then-Blackwall-now-Thom. You weren’t, you ate the leftovers with them and it was so much fun! Lady would have beaten Sera bruised if she pranked one of her guests…or ate pudding for that matter, and Ellie was so scared if the prank made anyone mad, she’d be sent away—you made them feel safe and let them enjoy their fun, and you didn’t realize it but you felt close to Anthony again and that was nice for your heart.

Ahh. Well then. That was…well that was nice to hear—it wasn’t nice that the girls had been so traumatized, but she was grateful beyond words that she’d not done something in the moment to only further instill that trauma, but had instead done something to soothe it. Cassandra almost didn’t hear Solas’s response to her thanks, “I appreciate being…allowed leash,” Solas offered up, bemused with the pun and the Iron Bull snorted. “It was kind of you all, to trust I was not up to anything nefarious and that I would not flee the Inquisition while in familiar territory you may have giving me chase in.”

“Oh. I would have stopped you or hunted you down,” Cole announced with serene assurance—no heat of threat, just the simple fact the Spirit was capable of tracking his thoughts and location. “I am a very good finder.”

“That is true,” Solas supposed.

“Papi, come sit,” Eleanor invited, “Cremisius made chicken noodles! It. is so. amazing.”

“It smells wonderful, I was envious of whatever camp was producing such a wonderful aroma. Thank you…Krem,” the Elf man tested using the boy’s more informal name as opposed to addressing him as ‘Lieutenant’, “for cooking.”

“See?” Krem asked, as if pleased, “Way less of a mouthful than Lieutenant Aclassi. You’ll have more room for food that way—come grab you a plate,” he gestured with his fork to the pot he’d moved from the fire to rest at his feet.

And so Solas did, the Tevinter man putting a heaping portion onto Solas’s plate, and Eleanor pressed a kiss to Cassandra’s cheek before giving her an imploring look, a way of asking without voicing the request, and Cassandra nodded, patting Sera on the knee and motioning for the girl to sit more closely with the Iron Bull. The Elf girl took that and ran with it, somewhat startling the Qunari as his empty thigh on his blind-side suddenly bore her weight and Sera announced, “Stealin’ your boyfriend, Dori,” humming contentedly when the Qunari wrapped his arm around her waist to seat her more securely.

“I suppose that suits so long as you return him in his current or better condition,” Dorian drawled.

“That’s ‘borrowing’, Sparky,” the Iron Bull informed him, “Ser’s stealin’ me. that means you’ve got to work to get me back. File a report, call the guards, rend your clothing and cry into the sky—it’s a whole thing.”

“Oh Sera honestly—these are some of my favorite robes, now I must tear them?” the Mage complained.

“Theives don’t care what you’re wearing, Dori, we’re a ruthless lot!” Sera declared. Cassandra shook her head, bemused so much chaos had been caused by simply needing to scoot down so Solas could find purchase in the space between she and Eleanor—the girl acting as a buffer state between he and Marehis, so the Elf woman would not be too uncomfortable or feel like Eleanor was choosing the man over her, Cassandra supposed. It seemed a much more amicable situation, surprisingly enough, than what it brought to mind—Windersend in the Pentaghast home, where Cassandra and Anthony sat across the table from their cousins who had looked not unlike they faced death every time the aunt and uncle hosting their party opened their mouth to speak—they’d been going through rather the messy separation and spoke to one another through their children, ‘would you tell your father this’, ‘well would you tell your mother that’.

Thankfully, somehow, ‘your lover is actually an Elf trickster god responsible for the power the worlds current most greatest enemy wields’ bore a more mature response in Solas and Marehis than ‘I was unaware, until our seventh year of marriage, that your father likes to frequent a house of ill repute thrice weekly to dress as a Chantry Mother and be whipped by a Dwarven man, until climax’ had in Cassandra’s aunt and uncle. Loren Pentaghast, the Senior*, was a troubled man. And that had been a very troubling Wintersend—Cassandra had been seven and her aunt had been a wildly unguarded chatterer once she downed a bottle of wine. Anthony had been wholly bewildered with how to handle a young Cassandra’s questions about the appeal men found in dressing like Chantry Mothers and what was a house of ill repute? Whipping sounded terribly painful, were Dwarves somehow gifted at making it painless and somehow fun? What was this ‘climax’ and why was Aunt Elaine so very angry because it wasn’t as if she was ‘enjoying it either’ but she ‘sure as hell wasn’t going to the whorehouse!’? Was that a different thing than a house with a sickly reputation?

Cassandra supposed that once upon a time, when she’d someone in her life she trusted to give her all the answers forthrightly and knowledgeably, she’d had the ability to produce never-ending questions, just as Eleanor could. Oh, the girl was infectiously curious about Solas’s former life in the Emerald Graves, if he liked what they looked like now, if he knew then just how big the trees would someday grow, how far their forest would expand—how many trees had they planted? What kind? Had the trees changed at all besides just getting taller? Did it make him sad they had to use some of their branches for the Inquisition’s campfires? It didn’t, he said, but Eleanor still promised she would make sure everyone used oil or algae for lamplight to see by and not make fire just for light, but solely for warmth to cook with—and be extra careful to not start any forest fires, oh gosh that’d just be the worst! Scary and horrible!

“You needn’t fret so, da’vehnan,” Solas intoned, “put such thoughts out of your mind. I do appreciate the care you have for this place. Are you full, da’len? Allow me to get you seconds. Or would you care for dessert?” he seemed…eager to assist her, to soak up any interaction he could have with her while he was still in her good graces, as if he feared, perhaps, it would not be a permanent thing.

“Papi…it’s me. And I slept through lunch.”
“…seconds and dessert then,” Solas supposed. “Sera, the same for you?”
   “Frig’ yeah!” Sera cheered.
   “You were gone for quite some time this afternoon; I trust your venture was successful? You were uninjured?” the man wondered, fretted as he took Sera and Eleanor’s plates to be replenished by Krem.
   “Cyril made sure everyone got patched up okay, it wasn’t too bad,” Sera said, shrugging—she’d a bit of a tick, this nervousness that made her shrug twice, like she’d begin the action, rethink her casualness and then insist upon it, committing to nonchalance regardless of its existence. So, Cassandra was rather certain she was lying, or at the very least, downplaying her experience.
   “Oh gosh! You guys went to investigate Chateau d’Onterre, right?” Eleanor asked.
   “Y-yeah Ink,” Sera replied.
   Eleanor regarded the Elf girl with curiosity, head tilted as she asked, “Sissy? How’d it go? You’re okay, right?”
   “Not even a scratch on me Ink—honest,” Sera assured, and that much was truth, Cassandra was certain, there was nothing in her daughter that spoke to deception on that front. She nodded her thanks to Solas as the man returned her refilled plate to her and resumed his seat beside Eleanor, handing her a plate she ignored as she stared at her sister, questions building on the tip of her tongue that Sera curtailed with, “It was actually kind of funny—scary but in that fun way, like walking through one of them ‘haunted house’ or woods with yer friends. You know, people say a place is haunted and then you get all worked up about it and everything scares the bejeebers out of you even though there en’t nothin’ to really be scared of?”
   Eleanor was quiet, paying rapt attention to her older sister as the girl launched into the tale of Chateau d’Onterre, setting it up as a wholly amusing story of she and Lace and Thom and his men jumping at every shadow and creak of the old estate because it was dark and old and spooky when, in the end, “All that place is now is a big old dumb empty house.”
   Now it was empty. The girl was more forthright in her report that she processed through Cassandra while Eleanor was off bathing with Marehis and Madam de Fer that evening after dinner, with instruction to ‘just get it to Leliana’ and never let it hit the Inquisitor’s desk. Because before Sera and the Chargers cleared the place, it had indeed been something of a genuine nightmare—some hellish situation where a demon had worked its way into a child in that home once upon a time and it left in its wake a place demons broke through into the world and several undead—family members the possessed child had tormented and laid slain.
   “Oh, Sera,” Cassandra breathed once the report was sealed and sent off toward Skyhold and she’d returned to the tent to take Sera into her arms, seated in Cassandra’s cot…well, laying in it now, Cassandra holding her so very tightly to her chest, hand carding through silken fine blonde hair that smelled freshly of soap. “I am proud of you, for taking on so much responsibility. I’m grateful you’re endeavoring to shield Eleanor from knowing such a horrible place existed.” Oh a tale of demon possession, of an entire family being murdered? If Eleanor never learned of such a thing, Cassandra would be eternally grateful, what a horrific thing to know of.
   Sera nodded, “Th-thanks. Um…” she gulped, “its cool if I bunk with you tonight, yeah?
   “Sweet girl, if you’ve a nightmare in the night I do promise, I will be here when you wake—you are to wake me, you understand?” Cassandra made certain.
   “Thanks mum,” Sera said, speaking the word with what sounded like it fell from her lips naturally, without condescension—she’d usually only use some variation of the word when she lamented Cassandra and Marehis mothering her, putting the ‘mothering’ in ‘smothering’ when they worried over her in the past. Oh, Cassandra despised how quietly pleased she was, she was not blushing as she held the girl a bit more tightly, hiding her face against her hair.
   “Sissy!” Eleanor cheered as she entered the tent, cheerily joining them by climbing into the cot and laying partly on Cassandra, and partly atop Sera as she put an arm around her. “You feel like you needed a hug! but I was naked and mami wouldn’t let me run back to camp without pants on! And then you felt better and I missed it, and I’m glad and I’m hugging you now anyway!”
...Marehis had only required she wear pants? “Eleanor honestly, where is your sleep shirt?” Cassandra- oh the girl was topless! Bare breast against Cassandra’s arm! Good heavens, what were they feeding this girl?

“Oi!” Eleanor complained, “I was in a hurry! And boys get to run around with their shirts off!”

Marehis looked wholly bemused as she entered the tent, sharing a look with Cassandra that spoke of defeat and acceptance. “She argued for equality and who am I to deny her that?”

“Tits out for equality!” Sera cheered and Cassandra held her a bit more tightly when she felt the girl reaching for the hem of her own sleepshirt to join her sister in shirtless solidarity.

“Tits in for warmth and comfort—you will catch chill if you go about without a shirt,” Cassandra said, and Marehis looked stunned, ‘why ever did I not think of that?’ written on her face as she extended her arm and came to join them, holding out Eleanor’s sleep shirt.

“Fine!” Eleanor conceded, accepting the item of clothing and sitting up to pull it on overhead, “But I’m putting on my shirt as a person who is cold and not as a woman who is oppressed by societal standards!”

“There is a time and place for everything, Eleanor,” Madam de Fer’s voice was silky smooth as she entered the tent, “a woman’s breast is best reserved for the bedroom and the beach.”

“Ohhh, gosh, there’s like nothing better than warm sun just all over!” Eleanor agreed.

“Mamis, if the world still isn’t cancelled this summer—we should go to the beach!”

“That sounds like fun, da’vehnan,” Marehis agreed.

“So long as I may choose to keep my breasts reserved even from the beach,” Cassandra drawled.

“Of course mami, they’re your breasts, its up to you what you wanna do with them!” Eleanor encouraged.

“Ellie-girl,”…Thom Rainier’s voice sounded from his cot on the far side of the tent, and Cassandra’s face blazed with embarrassment—she’d not realized he was there! She’d thought the tent empty! But no, the poor man was laying on his cot, an arm draped over his closed eyes to keep them wholly shielded, and apparently, “love you, but m’ just trying to get some sleep.” and dying from his embarrassment at having overheard such a conversation.

“Do you believe in gender equality, Tio?” Eleanor wondered.

“All damn day, m’ just a shy old bastard.”

“Yay!” Eleanor beamed, dropping down from the cot and rushing to Rainier’s, pressing a little kiss to his forehead, “Then have sweet dreams!”

“Thanks honey.”

Maker, the girl was in good spirits. Warm enthusiasm as she returned to them, climbing into the cot and then Sera’s lap when the Elf girl and Cassandra sat upright in bed, she was grateful they’d already set cots directly beside one another so they touched and gave them room to handle having so many people piled into one space, Cassandra shifted to put her weight on the adjoining cot, Marehis seating herself at her side and sharing a bemused look with the Seeker, smiling to Vivienne as she left the tent announcing, "I'll put on a bit of tea, shall I darlings?"

“Gracias!” Eleanor called before more quietly questioning, "Sissy—where do you wanna go in the Fade tonight?" in hushed tones to keep the Human man on the other side of the tent from overhearing.

“Mmm…sup to you Ink. Got anywhere you wanna see?”

“Can you show me the haunted mansion?” Eleanor wondered. “You made it sound kind of fun like, spooky fun, I’d like to explore it with you!”

Oh, dear. In wishing to shield the girl from how very horrific the place had been, she’d unwittingly made it appeal to her. “Eleanor, Sera has had a tiring day, spent much of her waking time in that place,” Cassandra spoke up when Sera looked like she was uncertain just how to respond, “she may not wish to spend her sleep there as well.”

“It sounds interesting,” Solas’s voice sounded as he entered the tent. “I do not mean to interrupt but I’ll admit to some curiosity myself. Sera, the Fade allows us to see things we wish to.
if you would allow me I’d be honored to assist you in reconstructing your memories of Chateau d’Onterre.”

“Papi,” Eleanor whispered imploringly, jerking her head in Rainier’s direction to instruct his discretion.

“Hey Thommy-boy m’a mage now, yeah?” Sera called to the Human man.

“heard you the first time lovey, s’great. happy for you,” he grumbled tiredly, turning in his cot to lay on his side and put his back to them.

“Thom and his guys know. Bull and Dori too. Krem’n’me had a talk about it last night while you was gettin’ the cookies off the tray and we was settin’ up the blanket n’ pish.”

“Uh-huh,” Eleanor was aware, ahh Sera needs to talk to Cremisius Eleanor had said last night when they made question of her dallying with the task of taking their cookies to their picnic spot. She checked, “It went well, right?”

“Yeah, yer boyfriend’s a dumb sweetie,” Sera voiced almost like a complaint, “Thanked me for trusting him and gave me a hug and made me feel safe! It was dumb!” Ahh. Sera…did not go easy, into vulnerability. She likely hadn’t realized just how vulnerable a thing exposing her magic was until the Lieutenant addressed it on a level that made her feel secure and gave her the realization that she’d something to feel secure from. “He’s the friggin’ best.”

“Indeed,” Marehis softly agreed, “I’m pleased you’ve felt comfortable allowing others to know your magical status, da’len.”

“We’re very proud of you,” Cassandra saw fit to add.

“Dumb!” Sera declared it, blushing fiercely as she looked to Solas, “You um…you’ll help me reconstruct things um…right?”

“Certainly,” Solas assured, “it will be just as you described this evening, you’ll be able to enjoy the tale you told our campsite.”

Oh. Oh goodness that- that sounded…

Solas…was continuing to act as a reliable father figure, and Cassandra was glad of it. It sounded like he meant to seal away Sera’s fright of the place, give her a place in the Fade she could desensitize from the fear she felt that day and enjoy in the delight she’d woven into her rendition for Eleanor—help secure her in the knowledge that whatever passed today was in the past, and staying there, and she could move forward and be safe and replace something that might give her nightmares with a pleasant, whimsical dream.

“Thanks um…thanks,” was what Sera settled on, hugging Eleanor tightly as she said, “Yeah Ink, Chateau d’Onterre it is! Let Solas and me set it up okay? Then you can come. Cole too if he wants.”

“Cool!” Eleanor agreed, beckoning Solas closer to their cots with an index finger and when he drew near enough she sat up on her knees and kissed him on the cheek, “Sweet dreams, papi!”

“Sweet dreams, da’vehnan.”

They seemed to be—Cassandra lay awake long after Sera fell asleep, watching and waiting for any sign of distress from the girl but none came, save perhaps a soft snort of laughter and sleep-riddled mumbling, the softest smile on her lips as she and Eleanor dozed together with Solas in the Fade.

“They are having fun—I will join them, but you’re worried so I wanted to tell you that you should sleep. Your body needs it. I’m sorry the pollen makes it sick,” Cole offered quietly, nearly startling Cassandra who hadn’t seen the boy come to crouch alongside her side of the cot. “Sorry. You are kind to me but I know you are not always comfortable with mind speak—you don’t care if anyone hears what I’m saying right now though, so I thought I could talk with my mouth.”

“Thank you, Cole. For all of your talking,” Cassandra assured, it took a bit of uncomfortable twisting—she’d been laying with her chest against Sera’s back, but she turned enough so she could face the opposite direction, press a kiss to Cole’s hair as the Spirit was in the habit of removing a particular item of clothing before bed. “Have pleasant dreams.”

“Oh,” Cole breathed, blushing, “thank you. I hope you have pleasant dreams as well,” he wished her before vanishing and reappearing in the Lieutenant’s cot just a few feet away, the Tevinter man rousing momentarily before pulling the Spirit closer, tucking his head up under his chin as he held the blonde boy more securely to sleep, oh. It was sweet, the Spirit sighed contentedly, wriggling a bit as he snuggled into his friend’s hold.

Morning dawned sunny and clear, Solas had assisted the Iron Bull with breakfast preparations, the two working…rather amicably together, which was nice, Cassandra supposed. The Qunari had been as immediate to aid the Elf man when he fell prey to Eleanor’s former injury, as he had been in his suspicion of the Elf to begin with, had Sera relay to them her interpretation of what was said by the man before magic swept through the forest around them. It had struck him as it had Cassandra, the seriousness of his request—that he genuinely willed it to be granted, that those he appealed to could place the Mark on him, not to destroy the world but to take on Eleanor’s more painful role of healing it, that they may even add to his suffering, place the burning blaze over his heart. If such a thing didn’t kill him immediately, it would certainly make his every heartbeat agony for the rest of his surely shortened days.

Cassandra exited the tent alone, she did tend to rise a little earlier than the others, well. Eleanor had risen some time ago before anyone else in their camp—Cassandra hadn’t realized the girl had left the tent until her return, the girl falling into the cot face first. The Seeker had softly questioned the girl’s absence, to which she responded a sleep-laden mumble of ‘trees’…which, in the Emerald Graves, was not entirely specific but the girl was safe and sleepy, laying against Cassandra wholly asleep almost the moment she hit the proverbial pillow, or in this instance, Cassandra’s shoulder. Which suited until the Seeker rose of her own accord an hour or so later, still early, just as the sun was rising. That was…good. For one, Cassandra did require a bit of respite from constant contact with so many all at once, being able to take a moment to collect herself, to not need to address or be addressed helped her handle the day ahead. Too, it meant a continuing improvement upon one of her major symptoms—when she was in good health, mentally and physically, it was usually in her to rise after a sufficient amount of sleep, early before even the sun did. When she was ill, especially in regard to depression…well, a good warning sign was usually Cassandra finding herself sleeping without reason—going to bed even before her usual hour for retiring, and sleeping in until the sun or duty woke her. Of course her life now occasionally gave her cause to remain in bed even after she woke, but she was awake and enjoying those reasons, be it enjoying the quiet company as Cullen or Eleanor or Sera slept at her side, relishing in getting to just be still and silent and hold her children safe.

Or. On Cullen’s good mornings, relishing in an albeit less silent form of company. She was mildly concerned she still might have a splinter in her back from er…

Ugh. They made love under cover of night and fog on a lakeside dock near Cullen’s childhood home. It was embarrassing and wonderful and she would never tell a living soul so long as she lived, so if there were such a splinter still lodged in her skin, it had better get comfortable because it was staying there, she would quite literally die before she requested assistance with its removal, because just how did a woman who went all and sundry armored and well clothed, did she get such a thing? No one could know. She was nervous even Cullen having the information. If…if they broke up…she might have to kill him. Not for revenge, but reform—no one got to bed her in strange places, know her every detail, body mind and spirit, and get to walk around the world unattached to her with such knowledge, it was simply unsafe.

Though their camp…also seemed albeit unsafe.

“Where are our soldiers?” Cassandra questioned the Iron Bull, when, in her moment of silence and reflection, she realized the camp was void of Inquisition scouts—Miss Lace had taken them and a few of their soldiers for her reconnaissance mission—but now it was also without any of their soldiers.

“Not the only one whose gotta keep an eye out today,” the Iron Bull jested, informing her, “There was some Freemen still hanging around, south of our camp a few hours ago, one of the soldiers got me and Thom’s guys, they had a report waiting for me when I got up to make this slop—Freemen were approaching for attack but our soldiers held them off. Thought we’d gotten rid of those bastards, so our soldiers are out there givin’em hell, the ones that retreated, trying to see if they’ll lead them back to wherever the fuck they’ve been hiding out.”

Oh goodness, yes. They would certainly be on guard, “I’ll warn Marehis and the others, we’ll keep Eleanor close to camp today.” It was time consuming but Cassandra…oh, she was reticent to have multiple Rift-sealing days in a row, not with the level of Rifts in this vicinity—they were all so powerful and painful, hard to fight and even harder it felt like to seal, for all who assisted in suppressing the Rifts or powering Eleanor’s Mark. So, a day off was due.

What Cassandra did not realize, was a day off was due whether their Rift-sealing schedule permitted as much or not.

Sera sighed contentedly when she woke from her slumber, a blessed thing—Cassandra had been so very worried she would suffer nightmares in the Fade but she rose the perfect opposite of her sister—upright in an instant, babbling a mile a minute to Cassandra about how much fun she and Solas and Eleanor and Cole had, earning a smile from the Seeker who kissed her on the cheek and offered congratulations for having slept so well. She expected…a little more pep in Eleanor’s step than what they got when they roused the girl for breakfast. She did not seem…grumpy, exactly, just…groggy.

“Are you feeling poorly, da’vehnan?” Marehis questioned, feeling at Eleanor’s forehead for fever. The girl shook her head ‘no’, the motion almost like a wrenching one to cease the contact with her skin.

“Tired,” she offered up seemingly almost falling asleep again even as she was sitting up, head lulling forward before she jerked awake. “Wh-what?”

Eleanor offered up a quiet little groan—Sera had risen entirely out of the cot and was standing alongside her still bedridden sister, taking Eleanor’s arms in hand and pulling her forward to help her up, “C’mon Ink, breakfast! There’ll be coffee, yeah?”

The Human girl stumbled with sluggish steps as they exited the tent…maybe they should have brought breakfast to her. She blinked a few times at the hand holding hers, “Sera?”

“Yeah sweets?” Sera asked, though,

“Imekari, lookin’ spiffy,” the Iron Bull sincerely complimented the girl. Oh yes, their Inquisitor was in high fashion for the Emerald Graves, her hair was a sight, sticking out wild around her, a literal stick had woven its way into her hair, a leaf caught in another clump of curls, Solas’s mask hanging from her neck, and the Lieutenant’s sleepshirt almost fell to her knees. And a sock. One, on her right foot. She had somehow in the night removed her bottoms and left sock…in her sleep?

“Uh-hum,” Eleanor offered back, stumbling to his side where he was seated in lotus position on the ground before their campfire, stirring a pot of oatmeal. The girl leaned against his arm, head resting on his shoulder. “Warm.”

“Lovely, you lose something?” Krem wondered amusedly at her single sock.

Eleanor mumbled unintelligibly. “She came back to bed this morning and mumbled something about trees,” Cassandra offered, it was the only clue she had, what good it did them.

“Oh,” the Lieutenant nodded…as if he perfectly understood the girl’s earlier single worded response and left their congregation, disappearing behind their tent. That- what? Ahh…Cassandra almost felt foolish for her earlier confusion—the girl had gotten up to use the facilities—the stand of trees just north, behind their camp—and…left her bottoms there? Forgotten or were they in need of cleansing? She hadn’t said anything when she returned to bed, now in the light of day Cassandra could only vaguely recall waking when the girl fell back into the cot alongside her.

“Da’vehnan? You were securely in the Fade last night, do you not feel rested?” Solas voiced his concern.

Eleanor shook her head, “Papi?” she questioned, squinting at him as if not wholly certain, and when the man nodded she replied, “Jus- jus’sleepy.”

Solas’s brow creased in worry, gaze going from Eleanor to Cassandra and then Marehis as he said, "She is incredibly drowsy. Could she have accidentally imbibed sleeping potion when she returned from the trees?" Oh. No, Cassandra thought she would have heard something if Eleanor had mistakenly uncorked draught.
Of course it turned out, she hadn't heard anything.

Krem’s voice was full of urgency as he strode back to them, Eleanor’s forgotten clothing in one hand, bottoms, underthings and her missing sock clutched around the handle of what Cassandra believed was one of Cole’s daggers, and a small… was it a dart? In the Lieutenant’s other hand as he questioned their numbers, “Where’s Cole?” as he continued moving toward Eleanor.

Cassandra looked about, as did they all, she- she’d thought the Spirit had been asleep with the Lieutenant- he had been but… he was no longer in sight, she realized she hadn’t seen him in the tent upon waking nor was he outside the whole of their tent’s occupants sought breakfast, “He isn’t here,” Cassandra verified as Krem went to Eleanor, dropping her clothing, Cole’s dagger clanging against the stone underfoot as he brought a hand to her face, guided her to look up at him,

“El? Honey, were you hit with this?” he asked, voice carrying battlefield urgency as her head lulled against his hand, eyes lethargically blinking as she did try to focus on what he was saying, trying to show her, “shit shit shit—Cyril!”

“Fuck,” the Iron Bull rasped, fists clenching as he looked like he wished to strike violence against himself… Cassandra felt similarly about her own self good- there- it had been a diversion. The Freemen attack, that must have been only part of their numbers drawing fire while- while the others what? Poisoned the Inquisitor?!

“Help her sit,” the Healer instructed, Krem wrapping an arm around Eleanor’s waist as he went to his knees, helping her descend with him to be seated on the ground, “Hey sweetpea, okay, can you hear me?” he asked.

Eleanor nodded, swallowing before her mouth opened to permit a small, “Mhm.” And then she shuddered, insisting, “I don’t wanna go.” Go?

“Defiantly not lucid, shit. Can you tell me what hurts honey?” Eleanor softly hummed some quiet affirmative sound as she fell unconscious.

“I don’t feel anything from her other than extreme drowsiness,” Solas voiced when it seemed Eleanor could not, “I’m having difficulty feeling her in the bond but she is there, nothing hurts or feels as if she’s suffering some sort of organ failure.” The Elf closed his eyes, forcing his focus, “There is… the back of her head hurts, an external pain going internal like she bumped her head.”

“Krem, get my kit,” Cyril said, and the Iron Bull wrapped his arm around Eleanor to support her where she sat while her boyfriend rose to follow instruction, “there’s a bottle of clear solution in the front on the left, un cap it and pop the tip of that in there and bring it here,” he said, calling after the boy, “mindful not to prick yourself lad!” as he examined the back of Eleanor’s head, “not what’s got her like this, but yeah she’s got a little bump, huh.”

“Ahh!” Dorian cried, pointing urgently, “there, just there on her shoulder, chest, front whatever—there’s a pinprick in her sleep top.”

“Good eye, darling,” Vivienne quietly complimented for all she looked wholly stricken, watching as the Healer pulled Eleanor’s sleeve from her right shoulder to reveal a small clotted over spot where she’d bled from being stuck with a dart.

Krem was back with a bottle of- well, it was blue now, the solution he offered Cyril, medical kit in his other hand to set at the Healer’s side, “Turned blue real quick, white flakey shit in it, what’s that mean?”

The Healer blew out something that sounded like a sigh of relief, “Okay… okay she’s going to be fine, nothing I need to brew up something for or urge out of her,” he said, sighing as he looked to Eleanor. “Chief, you carry her? We should put her to bed until it wears off.”

There was a bit of crowding that happened, everyone trying to follow after the Healer and Bull all at once as they disappeared into the tent, so no one quite made it through and then the Iron Bull was returning, Krem just slipping past him as the Qunari exited the tent saying, “Give him a minute, dunno that Boss Girl would want everyone in there for a sec, Cyril’ll give us the run down, tell us what to do.”

“Whatever do you mean-” Cassandra’s complaint was joined by the whole of the Inquisitor’s party voicing issue with being kept outside, though that died as the Healer was joining them not more than a moment later, for all it was dire circumstance he looked rather relieved.

“Alright. She was hit with sedative, kind meant for Mages Qunari’s ruddy use, just thankfully in a dose that won’t do her mortal harm—something meant to knock her out for a few hours and keep her magic quiet, she can sleep it off. I could dose her with something to absorb it, keep it from affecting her as hard but anything I have that would do that would also mess with her potions, the things she takes regularly wouldn’t be doing their job for a day or two so it’s best to just let this pass. She um, she’s got a knot on the back of her head, a little bruising at her elbows like she fell back but other than that she’s okay. I uh…checked for interference, confirmed there is none—sorry, I should’ve asked one of her mothers to stand in but I’ve never um, handled something like that before, I was worried you’d all try to come in and I wasn’t sure the girl would much care for having everyone around for that particular checkup, she’s uhhhh comfortable with me as a Healer and Krem, and I hope you trust he would murder me dead if I’d been up to anything improper.”

“She wasn’t interfered with- the girl was poisoned!” Dorian argued.

“He means sexually, dear,” Vivienne hushed him, both her tone and her words sent the Tevinter Mage pale and silent.

Sera was incredibly pallid as she voiced, “Freaking did someone try to-“

“No,” oh good heavens he startled them- Cole! “Some wanted to, in the Freemen. It was in some of their men’s thoughts, their dark places,” he informed them hollowly. They all turned their attention to the voice that sounded behind them, Maker, he- the Spirit’s stare just as hollow as his voice as he appeared at the edge of their camp, appearance just as startling as he was walking with a single, blood drenched dagger in hand, sleep clothing tattered and torn, blood splattered all along his clothes, on his face, in his hair. “But I heard and I stopped them, helped Ellie up and sent her back to bed. And now they are dead.”

“Cole…” the Iron Bull spoke as if wary, even as he addressed the Spirit with, “buddy…you should’ve gotten us.”

“I did not want to,” Cole informed them as if it were as simple as that. “Ellie was safe. I wanted to hurt them, and I did not want you to see. No one saw—your men still look for them but they will not find them, I did that already.” Ahh, their forces were still hunting the Freemen that distracted them while the others…had they been laying in wait or had they just so happened to come upon Eleanor separated from the others? “They waited. Their mistake was acting—I could not hear them from where they were hiding, spying to see when best to strike. They will not strike again.”

“Less they friggin come back as- as undead,” Sera whimpered.

Cole’s stare was empty as he looked to her and informed her, “They would need bodies left behind to do that.” …ahh. Well, at least he was thorough.

“Shit…you hurt any?” the Qunari asked.

“I hurt them all,” Cole assured.

“No Cuddly,” Sera squeaked out, “are you hurt?”

“No. I did not have to spare them like the House of Repose. I could cut and tear until they were all dead. And now they are. My body is tired,” he said, began moving like he meant to join Eleanor in the tent to lay down.

“S’also messy babe,” the Iron Bull said, putting himself between their numbers and the Spirit as he rested a hand on the back of the boy’s neck to still him. “C’mon, bud, bath time. You like bath time, remember? You and me’ll go get you cleaned up. Once you’re feeling better, then you can lay down.”

“You worry if you’ll have to snap my body’s neck. You wonder if that will stop me if I need stopping. You can but you don’t have to,” Cole somberly assured, “I would leave my body before I would use it to hurt any of you. Unless you wanted to hurt Ellie, steal her freedom, threaten her family, make her scream and bleed and bruise and starve her, make her know thirst, feel fear until the Inquisition gave you what you wanted—“

Your nature has been tested greatly today—you should cease talking and we will all turn our focus to everything being alright now,” he intoned, both to the Spirit and perhaps he was telling the Iron Bull to make certain to guard his thoughts, keep them of a positive nature around the Spirit at this time.

“The first time Ellie hugged you it scared you because you hadn’t been expecting it and you were worried of what it spoke of. You hadn’t been hugged since your mother died. And now this Human girl you cursed, was small and mortal and trusting and you were scared she might someday threaten your resolve...now the memory makes you happy, because she was also warm, you didn’t realize how warm it would feel to have someone hold you so tightly because they were happy to see you, and it meant she was safe and you’d been so scared for her after she collapsed at the Breach. Her eyes were like starlight when you told her you were uninjured and you wondered, just briefly, if all Humanity started out as such—small and pure and precious.”

“Yes,” Solas said softly as he took Cole’s hand, he and the Iron Bull walking the Spirit away, toward the river to clean him up.

“The first time you saw Marehis was the night you returned from the first attempt on the Breach. You were in the Tavern with Varric. She was talking with Flissa, trying to cheer her up, they laughed together and you thought she had the most beautiful smile...” Cole’s voice died to Cassandra’s ears but Marehis was wide eyed and still, blushing before she shook herself and seemed rather focused on not hearing, as she looked to Cyril.

“She just needs to sleep?” Marehis rasped and Cyril nodded.

So, their breakfast was rather forgotten as the Inquisitor’s party gathered in their tent, seated around the cot that bore Eleanor laying, fully attired courtesy of the Lieutenant, Cassandra eyed their laundry bag resting half-closed by a trunk near the tent entrance, Eleanor’s abandoned clothing, the pair of socks reunited, rested in it and he’d taken it to task to dig fresh sleep trousers from Eleanor’s trunk to cloth her in. Double layers of socks on her feet as she slumbered atop the Tevinter man who just stared into space, holding the girl as tightly as he dared, the only word he spoke while they waited was ‘Good’, when Cassandra informed him what information Cole had offered—that it was indeed the Freemen, an organized attack that distracted their forces while the others endeavored to take captive Eleanor, and Cole had stopped them, confirmed the last of their numbers in the Emerald Graves were dead. Sera was rather inconsolable—crying into Dorian’s chest as the Tevinter Mage had taken it to task to hold the girl through her upset. It took the better part of an hour, but Solas returned—at first alone to gather fresh clothing for Cole and then minutes later, he and the Iron Bull escorted the Spirit, shaky on his feet, back into the tent, clean and calm, looking more like himself for all he looked exhausted.

“I’m okay,” he said, his voice small but assuring enough.

“Yeah you are honey,” the Iron Bull encouraged, tousling the boy’s drying hair before releasing him from his hold entirely so the Spirit could do as he pleased, lie down or...well Cassandra thought he was going to, but the cot he approached was the one Dorian and Sera were seated on, the girl’s chin quivered momentarily before she nodded and the boy joined their hug, wrapping his arms around them as he sat on Sera’s free side.

“She is safe,” Cole said against Sera’s shoulder, “and it wasn’t your fault.” Her...her fault?

“Yes it is!” were the first words Sera had formed since they entered the tent, sobbing as she insisted, ‘Friggin’ stupid! She told me she was waking up to go to the bathroom and I ruddy should have woken up and gone with her! That’s like, rule number one of girl rules! No one goes to the bathroom alone!” Oh, Sera.

“It is not a practice we’ve maintained in the field,” Marehis said, “I’m always with her when we’re awake for the day—Sera, you cannot blame yourself, I should have considered it, I should have instilled in her the habit to wake me if she needed to leave the tent in the night.” Were they quite serious?

“It is neither of your faults,” Cassandra voiced, “honestly—Marehis, you cannot think of every last thing, Eleanor is grown, she is fully capable of managing to use the restroom, that this one instance became threatening is not because of anyone save the people who made it so, and now they are dead, thank the Maker and Cole. Sera, sweetheart, you could not have known Eleanor was in danger and I’m certain those men had more than one dart as ammunition—if either one of you had been with her you may only have been in danger yourselves, not preventing it.”

“Oh,” Solas breathed, “a toxin meant to quell magic could have been devastating in either one of you for having so little or lack of it. I- I am sorry, Marehis, Sera, everyone. That my bond was wholly worthless in this,” he said, jaw setting and Cassandra did not need Cole’s ability to hear thought—expression alone was enough to know the man’s mind was likely screaming with rebuke, that he should have been able to do more, realize Eleanor was in danger, that things weren’t right with her that morning.

“Wouldn’t say that,” the Iron Bull spoke, “not your fault they shut her magic up, you’ve done what you can. And those assholes got that from somewhere,” the Iron Bull quietly rumbled out, “and I’ll find ’em. Whoever the fuck gave Humans fucking Qunari poisons. Qun’s the only place that has easy access, they use that shit on our Mages, it could’ve damn killed her,” he rasped, enraged.

“ Took apart the dart,” Cyril’s voice spoke up from where he’d been sitting with Thom, “there’s internal mechanism, looks like they just tipped their darts with the stuff, thank the Maker for small mercies.”

“It is no small mercy she is safe,” Vivienne murmured.

“I’ve only truly prayed once in my life,” Solas said, “but it was rather effective. Would it be of comfort, perhaps er…if we, as a great majority of us are Andrasten, took a moment to pray to Ellie’s god?”

“I would thank Mythal, too,” Marehis spoke up. “It is her we have to thank for Cole.”

“Ser’, you good?” Krem had to clear his throat to speak, “you um. You and Cole can get in on this if you want, plenty of room,” he invited before burying his lips in Eleanor’s hair. Sera sniffled and nodded, giving Dorian a squeeze in thanks before releasing her hold on one Tevinter man to trade him for the other—she and Cole falling into the cot next to Krem and Eleanor, Sera snuggling up against his side, her arm looped over Eleanor’s middle as she rested her head on Krem’s shoulder, Cole curling up next to Sera, curled up in the fetal position at her back, his forehead resting between her shoulder blades. It was Thom who…oh, the man had been tearful this entire time, eyes rimmed red, sniffling as he rose from his cot to drape a blanket over them, tucking it up under Cole’s side while Krem pulled the other end around himself and Sera and Eleanor. Though the Lieutenant’s hand didn’t return to Eleanor’s back, he instead swung it back so his arm was underneath Sera, hand resting on the crown of Cole’s head.

“Blessed are they who stand before the corrupt and the wicked and do not falter.”

Oh it should not make her want to cry, but tears sprang into Cassandra’s eyes unbidden at the Lieutenant’s offering of the Chant, pouring it over the Spirit in blessing. She sniffled, clearing her throat before putting forth, “Blessed are the peacekeepers, the Champions of the Just.”

“Blessed are the righteous,” Marehis softly replied, her newfound study of the Chant brought to bear, “the lights in the shadow.”

Madam de Fer took Marehis’s hand to offer it an encouraging squeeze as she finished the verse, “In their blood the Maker’s will is written.”

“Thank you, Maker,” Krem spoke again, head bowed and eyes closed, everyone following suit as he led them in prayer. “Sorry, wrong Aclassi here—papa’s better at this. But uh. Thanks—thank you for…well hell, thank you for Ellie. For protecting her and watching over her even when we can’t.”

“Praise Him most high, for that,” Cassandra voiced her agreement.

“Thanks to um…none of you other pricks be listening, okay! Back off!” Sera started her own prayer…to the Maker? Ah, no. “Thanks Mythal. For um, Cole being Spirity and able to hear shite people’s shite thoughts. If you’re um…out there, protectin’ Inky, being mum over everyone, I appreciate it.”

Marehis sniffled. “Thank you for all you have done for my child, ir abelas tu ma lathbora viran, ma seranas tu eth emma lath, ma’dalen,” she sucked in a harsh breath over a sob and Cassandra opened her eyes thinking to cross the space between them to pass her a handkerchief if she’d need, but she stilled herself and closed her eyes again to offer privacy as Marehis’s hand reached out, clasping Solas’s and garnering his attention as she offered him, “ir abelas tu ma lathbora viran. Sincerely. I could not- if anything happened to Ellie or Sera I could not-“

“I…did not handle my own losses very well, as you can see, I’m nothing to commend, lethallan, but I thank you for your condolences. I am…grateful beyond measure for the girls’ safety,” girls in the plural, it sounded like he meant. Sera would do anything to defend Eleanor but there was precious little of that attitude that could be brought to bear when one was wholly unconscious. Oh if Eleanor had been captured- if she and Sera both had been taken or- or if Sera had risen to her defense and woken on the forest floor having failed- oh. Cassandra said another silent prayer of thanks that none of that had come to pass that…for all intents and purposes, this was little more than a disrupted morning the Inquisitor got to sleep in.

“Hey…sounds different,” the Iron Bull whispered, breaking the silence they’d been sitting in. Solas nodded,

“Yes, she’s regaining consciousness.”

…Cassandra was uncertain just who was responsible for the craftsmanship of their cots, but Maker bless them the whole of their days—it bore the weight of the four young people, Cassandra and Marehis rushing to sit together at the end of the cot Eleanor was on, and then Dorian, Vivienne, and Thom finding purchase along the side of the cot Sera and Cole had claimed, the Iron Bull kneeling at the end of the cot. Solas stood in the wings while Cyril went around to go down on one knee alongside Eleanor, to be level with her and gauge her response to waking if- if something was going wrong, if she was reacting poorly to coming out from under the sedative or if she was confused or scared or- oh Maker just what did she remember? What had she witnessed?

Eleanor’s mouth dropped open in a long yawn, eyes watering as they squeezed shut more tightly before they slowly drifted open.

“Mmm,” she patted one of the arms wrapped around her torso, Krem’s “guapo,” and then Sera’s arm, “Sissy…double mami’s,” she acknowledged, feet wriggling under the blanket as if she were pointing to the women at her feet…with her feet, “Tio’s and Tia’s everywhere…where’s Cole?”

“Here,” the boy announced his presence softly at Sera’s back.

She yawned again, rubbing at her eyes with the palms of her hands before sitting up and announcing, “This is the best wake up ever!” she…she was enthusiastic to say, “Golly, what time is it? Did…” her brow furrowed in confusion as she shook her head as if to clear it, “Did I sleep in or something?” she questioned, checking her watch and then she let out a horrified gasp, “Oh Maker! Oh no!”

Oh…oh dear she must be remembering something horrible, she- she sounded devastated, “Eleanor, it is alright, you are safe,” Cassandra promised.

Eleanor’s chin quivered as her voice pitched with a tearful squeak of remorse, “Cremisius, I’m so, so sorry!”

The Lieutenant’s eyes went wide in his head, “El,” he breathed, “sweetheart, you have absolutely nothing to apologize for-“

“I broke my watch!”

“W…what?”

Eleanor pouted as she twisted about to offer up her left wrist to the man so he could see the cracked glass on the wristwatch he’d gifted her on her birthday, “Papito look! I’m so so so so sorry I don’t know how that happened, I promise I always try to be careful with it, I never wear it into fights or anything or-“ and then she sucked in a gasp, “those jerks!”

“They are dead,” Cole announced.

“Good!” Eleanor…in uncharacteristic callousness was cheerful to accept, although Cassandra heartily agreed, yes, good. “They- they caught me literally with my pants down! I was just trying to pee! How did those assholes know I wasn’t out there trying to go number two, huh? That would’ve served them right, trying to kidnap me and I’ve pooped myself. That’s going in the idea book for if I’m ever captured—more fibrous diet, be ready to drop a major messy stink bomb on the enemy at any time! Ugh!” she growled, pouting further over the crack in the glass of her clockface, “at least it’s still running but still that really pisses me off,” and then her lips quirked in a smile as she snorted softly to herself, “get it? Piss?” Oh honestly, it was not a joking matter! “Did I wipe?” she wondered.

“Yes, you’d just finished when they hit you with their darts. Some missed, one didn’t, I am sorry, I did not hear them until they were close enough but then I came and I stopped them Ellie,” Cole promised.

“Oh yeah,” Eleanor said as she tried to recall just what had transpired that morning. “I got pushed in the dirt and I was able to scramble backwards when they tried to grab me the first time—assholes stole my pants! Well, grabbed them when they grabbed my ankles and I was able to wriggle out cause again—my pants! Were down! That’s just rude! There was a hand on my wrist, and I couldn’t shake it off, my brain was trying to tell my legs to kick him where the sun doesn’t shine but…did I kick him?”

“You tried to, your leg did move it was just very weak and did not make contact, I kicked him for you. Many times,” Cole assured. “I made sure you made it back to bed safely.”

“Thanks Cole…good in the pants department, thanks whoever put those back on for me! I was worried they ran off with those or something,” and then she gasped, “Did they steal my sock? I want it back!”

“Reunited with its match in the hamper as we speak,” Krem softly assured.

“Good, because I already thirst for vengeance over my watch, if I was running around with only one sock in a pair? You don’t split up pairs of socks for permanent, Cremisius, it’s just not right!”

It isn’t in her hurts. She was scared when they grabbed her, she was so confused—she didn’t want to go with them! But I sent her back to bed, she wasn’t sure what was going on, everything was so hazy, it took her a minute to realize the people grabbing her now were her family—Sera, the Iron Bull, Cremisius, and while they sounded worried, she knew she was safe. The Freemen scaring her feels like a distant fear you recover from—like when the mabari pulled you by the wrist with its mouth and Anthony got its teeth off of you, pulled you to his chest, roaring for the beast to leave you be. He made you feel safe, wiped your tears and put ointment on your hurts, inside and out when he told you he was proud of you for being such a brave little girl. You don’t even remember that now, though you do find yourself uneasy around big unfamiliar mabari—there is a small scar on the inside of your right wrist, a little divot in the flesh ointment did not clear away.

Ahh. Truly? She…oh she really did have almost no memory of this, but there was indeed such a scar on her person she’d just never quite pinpointed at what point in her life she’d gotten it, and too a weariness she’d noted but had instilled in herself to ignore—it was a phobia, she reminded herself she could easily lay slain a maddened mabari out for her blood …however it was admittedly a good thing Cullen had brought Anya into her life as a pup, if she’d returned to her bedchambers and found a full-grown mabari? Well, her reaction may have been a touch embarrassing. It may or may not have involved putting the man between her and the beast, climbing up onto her desk because surely she would be untouchable there, and drawing her sword until she was certain the thing meant her no harm. She wasn’t sure what iteration of that Compassion-talk the others were getting but the others seemed to be listening to something.

“Inky,” Sera giggled, going along with the girl’s lightheartedness, “you’re a friggin’ nut.”

“That’s what my potions regimen is for! Have I taken any of that by the way?” she wondered, looking to Cyril, “Tio should I play skipsies and just get back on schedule tomorrow? Or is it okay to take it and just knock it back earlier and earlier until I’m back to my ‘taking it at breakfast’ routine?”

“s’gone nearly four honey I…” Cyril blew out a breath face scrunching as he scratched at the back of his head considering it. “You um…do you mind letting me run a few tests first? Just to make sure all that craps out of your system first?”

“Umm…rude—fieldwork means less school! No tests, only fun stuff!” Eleanor teasingly complained. “What kind of tests are we talking?”

“Little bit of blood, swab of your saliva and um…”

She held out her hand as if to accept something, “You want me to go pee again, huh?”

“If you wouldn’t mind pumpkin,” the man offered albeit apologetically as he withdrew a small glass jar from his medical kit and handed it to Eleanor.

“Cool—who wants to go with me?” Eleanor wondered, “Or are the bathroom bandits apprehended and everything’s cool?”

“I’m going with you!” Sera decided immediately, “Friggin’ no more going to the bathroom alone inky, you hear? Like, never!”

“That’s gonna get a little weird when we get home sissy ‘cause I got nice facilities back in my quarters, am I supposed to just jaunt out into the hall and ask a guard or something to come watch me? ‘cause that’s how we get rumors of the Inquisitor’s rampant sexual harassment and her weird fetishes real fast.”

“You assume that I haven't already started such rumors?” Dorian drawled.

“I can always count on you, Tio!” the girl beamed a smile his way.

Earning a scowl as the man raised a startled hand to his heart, refuting, “No! Rude. I refuse this atrocity, stop—ugh my heart is doing something unseemly and I detest it, do- do cease…what is it? Is this affection I’m feeling? I don’t like it, I’m send it back.”

“Kay but if you do…you’re kind of just reciprocating my affection which means,” Eleanor informed him, “…you’re being affectionate.”

“Perish the thought!” Dorian halfheartedly snapped and Eleanor giggled, bouncing off the cot on to unsteady feet, but her sister was close behind, catching Eleanor up under her arms and helping her stand steady, looping an arm over Eleanor’s shoulders as she escorted her to, well…

Cassandra wasn’t wholly certain if Sera would want Eleanor returning to the scene of the crime, and Marehis followed after them in case the girl’s sought an alternative lavatory situation elsewhere and needed guarding. Dorian groaned as he flopped forward on the cot at Cole and Krem’s feet, complaining, “Oh god she’s diseased me!”

“Called you Tio and you loved it?” the Iron Bull chuckled.

“I assure you, I hate it!”

“Would it make you feel any better if she called you Zio?” Krem wondered amusedly. Was that the Tevene counterpart?

His teasing made Dorian blush, “Do not encourage her!”

“S’my whole damn job dude,” the younger Tevinter informed him, “24 hours a day, 372 days of the year, for, Maker willing, the rest of my life.”

Cyril set up for his testing—he remained seated on the ground alongside Eleanor’s cot and pulled out two clear jars he poured clear solution in once they heard footsteps approaching.

Marehis returned before the girls did, hands around the jar as if trying to offer the liquid inside a bit of privacy from those in the tent as she discreetly passed it off to the Healer who nodded and took a dropper from his kit to fill with…well, ahem. Urine. Ugh. And then he dispensed it into one of the jars of solution he’d set up. Eleanor and Sera were there just a moment later, Eleanor announcing, “I did it, it was dumb, but I did it and I’ve washed my hands. Pretty sure that was more traumatizing than the whole ‘almost getting kidnapped’ thing. What’s next Tio?”

“Sorry little love,” the man apologized, “sit here,” he gestured for her to return to the cot and she sat with her back to her boyfriend who sat up, looking rather…well, the man had said he would be taking blood from her and the Tevinter man didn’t seem like he liked that very well, he wrapped his arm around her middle, seating himself directly behind her and pressing his lips to her shoulder, watching over her shoulder as the Healer dug around in his kit, Cole mirroring him as he curled up behind the Lieutenant, face against Krem’s back as he hugged the other boy around the waist in solidarity of…well, their mutual dislike of Eleanor being subject to pain. However, Cyril produced a slender wooden rod with a bundle of cotton at its end, “open up please, say ‘ahhh’” the Healer instructed, dropping his mouth wide open to exemplify.

“Ahhh,” Eleanor copied him, nose scrunching as he swabbed at the inside of her mouth.
When he was finished, it sounded like she were licking the inside of her mouth to rid her of the taste that was, apparently, “ick.”

“Sorry honey. We’re almost done. You um…you’re okay with me taking a little blood? It’ll only last a second, a pinprick, in whichever arm you prefer,” he informed her.

“You can have righty,” Eleanor said as she offered up her right arm for Healer inflicted torment. Well, the left one had been through much, Cassandra supposed. Thankfully her right arm was subject to merely a pinprick—he had an instrument not unlike the one Adan had sent Eleanor to test Dorian for his nutritional deficiencies upon his introduction to the Inquisition. Krem’s hold on the girl tightened, eyes closed as he rested his forehead against her shoulder, not daring to look as Cyril took the girl’s offered arm in hand and pressed the fine, sharp tip of the glass implement into the tender flesh of her inner elbow, Cole let out the softest whine in sympathy.

“One-two,” the Healer softly, swiftly counted before pulling the thing away, “Good job, you did so great,” he commended.

“Thanks!” Eleanor replied, raising her unmarked hand to rest on the back of Krem’s head, scratching gently at his scalp, “I’m okay carino, that didn’t even hurt.”

The young man just shook his head against her shoulder, “Didn’t like it. Nope. Nu-uh.” Cole nodded his agreement against the Lieutenant’s back.

“Not a fan myself,” Cyril agreed, “but…blood’s clean, everything else too. You get something on your stomach babygirl and you can take your potion, we’ll start you on an ‘hour-back’ routine, get you sorted before you leave the Emerald Graves, okay?”

“Okay!” Eleanor agreed, before cheerfully demanding, “Somebody feed me! And maybe somebody else catch me up? Do we know what that kidnapping business was all about or what?”

Ahh. She supposed they’d not explained it was the Freemen making their attempts to take her hostage as they’d threatened to. The Iron Bull offered first and foremost, “Ime-kadan—you want pancakes or that cheese noodle stuff?”

“Ohhh, hit me with the cheese please!”

“On it, just take a minute babe Cabot sent it prepped, just gotta warm it up,” the Iron Bull said, grunting as he pushed up on his knee to rise, “c’mon,” he invited, coming around the cot to stand behind where Cyril sat on the ground and offer his hand to Eleanor and when the girl took it she squeaked as he pulled her up, Krem’s hold leaving her as the Qunari pulled her high against his chest, “Gonna be keeping you on my seeing side for a bit imekari, not diggin’ having you out of sight.”

It seemed none were ‘digging’ having the girl out of sight, Cassandra wasn’t certain she’d be able to find even a bit of sleep tonight if she did not take potion to do so, she could somehow already feel herself lying wide awake, the low aching high of fear in her heart keeping her awake and alert until sunrise. They all followed after the Iron Bull and Eleanor, Krem digging through their stores for a pot and the prepared food Cabot had sent them the other day with a missive that read,

Haven’t seen the brat Inquisitor around the tavern in a minute. Make sure she eats or whatever. Not that I give a damn. Here’s some of that shit she likes.

Eleanor had smiled pure exuberance when the package had arrived, hugging the little slip of parchment to her chest as she squealed and said, “Awe! He’s just the sweetest!”

He was in his own right. And his offering of macaroni noodles and copious amounts of savory cheese sauce smelled delightful as the Iron Bull warmed it over their campfire.

“It was the Freemen of the Dales, da’vehnan,” Marehis explained. “They…” she cleared her throat, “they’d plans to capture you, hold you hostage to make demands of the Inquisition—our removal of the stance we hold here in the Emerald Graves in exchange for your safe return.”

“Gosh, okay yikes,” Eleanor said.

“I am so sorry da’vehnan.”

“I should’ve gone with you when you said you was getting up Inky, shite, shite I’m sorry,” Sera seconded her mother, Eleanor had taken a seat alongside the Iron Bull by the fire and Sera slid on her knees to wrap her arms around the girl, squeezing her tight.
“Sissy, mami stop!” Eleanor insisted, hugging the Elf girl back, “It’s not your fault! I’m the one who went out by myself, and I mean even then it’s not like I knew there were people plotting to kidnap me or whatever—we didn’t know! These Freemen jerks just—just attacked.”

It…it struck Cassandra then, as it did, well, the Iron Bull, Sera, Thom, Marehis…the Lieutenant’s jaw clenched and he looked rather like he might like to hit something. They had informed everyone that Eleanor was a target of the Freemen of the Dales. Save…well…Eleanor.

“We…” Marehis started.

The Lieutenant came, venturing far too close to the fire for Cassandra’s peace of mind but the young man did so to sit on his knees before Eleanor, taking her hands in his. “El. I’m so sorry. We’ve been getting reports all week of our scouts intercepting messages between Freemen leaders with talk of a hostage attempt. I—they—they fucking scared me senseless, literally I lost all sense because damn it, I—I should have warned you, I just— I was—“

“We were all trying to protect you—thought we could protect you physically from the Freemen while also protecting you from knowing their horrible threats,” Marehis assisted the young man in explaining, “sweet man it was not on you to do that. Ellie’s security is my responsibility. Da’vehnan,” Marehis addressed the girl. “I…there are times in my duties where I am selective with what I allow you to come to know. It is not to hurt or mislead you—there are just-if I informed you of every last thing I check for danger you would never wish to set foot outside your quarters. There are so many dangers in your life you already have in your mind, if I can spare you even just a few of them? I do. I…” the woman blanched, looked like she might be ill. “I…I wasn’t thinking clearly. I thought we would be vigilant enough but I didn’t consider you not knowing might endanger you itself—if you were aware you’d such a threat at hand…”

“If you told me to, yeah, I definitely wouldn’t have gone anywhere without someone with me, I promise to wake someone up to go with me next time. But um… I mean you weren’t totally wrong mami—you guys were vigilant enough, ‘cause we’ve got Cole!” Eleanor noted brightly, removing her unmarked hand from Krem’s hold to clasp Marehis’s hand and squeeze it reassuringly. The woman looked like she might be on the verge of tears, and the girl was endeavoring to cheer her up, “He heard them and he stopped them from taking me so don’t feel bad, okay? I know it’s super hard, running security for me, and yeah, I know I don’t know everything you do to keep me safe, but I still know ya know?” she giggled at the excessive use of ‘know’, eliciting a small, huff of a laugh from Marehis whose chin quivered as she raised the hand Eleanor gave her to her lips to press a kiss to her palm. “You do everything for me mami! And you do such an amazing job!” Eleanor encouraged, “I’m not mad—you made a call that um…seems like everyone else made too, so obviously it’s not like, unreasonable to come to that conclusion. Just…I get that I don’t need to know there’s spiders as big as horses because I’m not in an area those live in. but if I did go into a place like that? I’d trust you’d tell me the truth about them so I’m prepared, yeah? Everything can probably work like that. it was fine if we’d avoided Freemen territory altogether, but once we were, yeah, I’m…I would like to hope I don’t go out of my way to make your job hard mami. I love you all, and you’re so amazing, keep me so safe! But I can help keep me safe too, so let me in the know so I can help out, kay?”

“We have fallen out of practice, coming together to go over security measures—we’ve all been set to task at different things, our responsibilities have piled up,” Cassandra voiced—she’d had a conversation like this their first time in Val Royeaux, Eleanor asking to be included in the adult’s conversations that they usually held once she was put to bed, talking of things they would rather the girl not know were such threats to her, to keep her from fear. Their days usually concluded with a security briefing of sorts, after that—going over the day’s adventures, voicing improvements that could be made, instilling precautions in Eleanor to take for herself. But after Haven, there had been so much scrambling just to make things stay afloat that others fell to the wayside. “I’m regretful to say I didn’t warn Eleanor because I just assumed she’d been told—a mistake, in retrospect.”

“Well I friggin’ wasn’t going to tell her!” Sera said. “It’s ruddy scary! Inky if- if we could’ve pulled it off, shite, that would’ve been like, the best—you wouldn’t have to be worried at all, and you could be safe, that’s double wins!”

“Yeah…sorry Imekari,” the Iron Bull spoke up as he scooped rather the large portion of noodles into a bowl for the girl. “I uh…should’ve told you boss-girl. Krem, dude, I’m sorry, I let you down in that. Wasn’t on you to tell her, you help with her security yeah, but that’s just it—you help with it, you’re not in charge of running it, you’re in a position where you’re around her a lot so we keep you up to date on possible threats to watch out for. It’s our responsibility, updates should have been going to boss-girl, too.”

Sera was worrying her lip so very fiercely Cassandra feared the girl might bite through the flesh entirely, groaning a bit before she urgently confessed, “Inky I fibbed about my mission the other day—!”

“Mmmm, yeah, but that’s kind of like the spider thing,” Eleanor supposed with a shrug, “I didn’t have to go to the actual haunted mansion, so you didn’t have to tell me it was dangerous unless you wanted to talk to me about it Sissy. Cole said it was in your hurts, that’s why I wanted to talk about it. When you turned it into a fun story instead I thought…maybe that’s what you needed, to have a fun memory to replace the scary one, and papi agreed to help.”

“You knew I was lyin’ when I was talkin’ about it last night?” Sera wondered timidly, “You…you wasn’t mad?”

Eleanor shook her head as she assured her sister, “No, not exactly. In that case, it wasn’t a big deal. But um,” she looked to the adults to address them, “I mean…I’m not a little kid. I’m not necessarily a full-blown grown up but I don’t…yeah, okay, things scare me and they might make me sad or angry or make me cry or whatever but that’s just…you either want me to have normal Human emotions or you don’t!” she said, albeit impatiently. “I appreciate the spirit you guys are in when you try to shield me from things but I’d…appreciate it if you didn’t coddle me so much. I’m sorry if I fail and don’t always have the best response to things, that I’m such a cry baby sometimes, but that’s just tough toenails! Deal with it! I’m in this too—it’s not all on you guys. And that has to suck for you guys, when you act like it is because you’re left handling it all on your own when I could help! Cremisius, guapo you—” she looked to her boyfriend, "I wish you’d talked to me about what was making you so scared when we were going to sleep all those nights in Val Royeaux. I mean I’d wake up because you were holding me so tightly, you’d stay up being sneaky about reading those reports you always kept locked in your nightstand and I…I didn’t go poking around to read them because I trust you and I’d never want to invade your privacy but carnio, if I were lying awake at night terrified something was going to happen to you or…or terrified of anything for that matter, wouldn’t you want me to talk to you about it?”

The boy’s mouth worked momentarily before he offered up, “Of course, El.”

“You were upset because I didn’t consult you when I asked Stitches to let you have my potions after Haven—mad that I was keeping how crappy I was feeling from you and dealing with it on my own when I could’ve told you and let you help me. This is kind of the same thing—I don’t like that you chose to worry about this all by yourself. Because that’s what this is—we’re a team, Cremisius. If something is worrying you? Or if you’re having a bad day or you’re sick, or something’s pissed you off, I want you to share that with me! Just like I’d want you to share the good things! It isn’t being very nice to yourself to not let me help you! So,” she insisted sternly. Though she smiled as she leaned in close, pressing her forehead against him, intoning, “Stop being mean to my boyfriend.”

“Or what?” he returned, it sounded almost like this were some inside conversation, a running thing between them.

She smiled sweetly, pressing a kiss to his forehead, Cassandra wasn’t certain what response the young man expected, but he got, “Don’t test me Aclassi—I’ll ruin your Maker damned life, and then I'll leave you for Lord Woolslly and we will laugh and laugh and laugh.”

The young man’s eyes were wide at that, snorting with surprised laughter. “Only like tests from your Tio Dorian, huh?” the Tevinter Mage could be heard groaning in disdain.
Eleanor nodded, “Or sissy—she always lets me blow stuff up during science tests!” a startled look on her face as she looked to Cassandra, and then Marehis, and back again, “uhh…I mean…my other sissy. The bad one. Sera’d never let me blow something up a science test! She gives me good…perfectly safe…parchment and pencil tests.”

“Yup! Parchment and pencil! No pyrogenics allowed!” Sera insisted.

Cassandra breathed a sigh of relief. Maker this day had gone so awry, things…things finally felt settled so she cleared her throat, intoning, “Thank you, for hearing us out, Eleanor. Now, eat your supper—if we delay your potions regimen further it will only make it that much more difficult to get back to schedule.”

“Oh! Right! Thanks mami, gosh, I forgot about mac’n’cheese! How the hell did that happen? It’s mac’n’cheese!” she said, as if her failure to stay on task with eating the stuff was the gravest sin. Krem moved out of the way, which was likely wise when one was between Eleanor and foodstuff, and the Inquisitor held out her hands to receive the bowl the Iron Bull had filled for her, hungrily digging in. Which was fair, she’d not eaten all day and it was nearly five.

So, an unconventional day ended with an unconventional meal. Eleanor got to eat her absolute fill of cheese-ridden carbs, and the Iron Bull reheated the large pot of oatmeal he’d prepared that morning after unlidding it and giving it a careful sniff to make certain it would not send their masses food poisoned.

“Ellie I…I did something. It…wasn’t wrong, but I felt wrong. Like when I was in White Spire,” Cole spoke up, there had been amicable small talk among their numbers but they fell silent as the Spirit who sat alongside them even as he did not eat, addressed Eleanor.

She regarded him silently for a moment before nodding, “It’s okay Cole. You wanna talk about it, carino?”

“I- I wasn’t sweet,” he said, as if correcting her. “I killed all of the Freemen. And I did it…very violently. I was harsh and cruel and I did not care, I was glad. I wanted them to suffer but that is not me, I’m supposed to be compassion.”

Eleanor worked that around in her mind for a moment, head tilting side to side before she decided, “Hmm…no. You’re not supposed to be any one thing, Cole. There’s duality remember? Like papi was talking about! You’re compassion, but there’s a flip side to that—cruelty. When you wondered if I wanted you to kill that sick soldier in Skyhold, that was cruel—but you meant it kindly, you wanted to end his suffering, it was compassion expressed in cruelty. Today you um…well you were pretty pissed off I guess?”

“I could hear what they were thinking of doing with you. and it made me very angry.”

“Everyone gets angry sometimes Cole. I mean Thom and Sera and them, they said they thought I was safe because they’d ‘eliminated’ the Freemen, people don’t tend to get eliminated all on their own—I assume they’ve been going around, and because the Freemen have been violent and posing danger, refusing to see any reason, they’ve been being dealt with. um…I know mami killed that Lord that threatened Sera—I’m glad that he’s dead. I’m glad he can’t hurt anyone anymore and he pissed me off, the way he spoke to my sister, his whole attitude—he’d have gladly seen her dead. So…that puts me and him in the same boat right? Except just one thing,” Eleanor said, “he would have gladly seen Sera dead because of his own stupid pride, selfishness, his need to feel superior to her. I’m glad he’s dead because he wanted to hurt someone I love, and would have if no one had stopped him. So which one is it, Cole? Are you glad they’re dead because you feel that you’re better than them and they don’t deserve to live? Or are you glad they’re dead because you know they would have hurt people that you love for no reason other than their own selfish pride, to feel big, and now they can’t do that anymore?”

“Oh. Oh, the second one, yes.” Cole said as he nodded.

“Being cruel just to be cruel is wrong. But sometimes, when you’re letting compassion guide you, cruelty is necessary in order to do the right thing. It’s not fun to give people stitches—it hurts, but you have to do it sometimes to stop them from bleeding out and help them heal up. It’s a part of who you are, and it doesn’t have to be a bad thing. You’re sweet, and compassionate, and funny, and you understand what people are feeling and you do your best to try to help them—sometimes that takes a bit of cruelty. And all of that, all together? It makes up you! And I love you carino—not because you’re supposed to be ‘compassion’, but because you are you! You’re Cole!

Oh…oh the boy’s eyes were wet as he wiped at them with the back of his fist, “Okay…okay. Thank you, Ellie. I…I was so scared I was becoming something bad again. Solas and the Iron Bull helped make me light again, but I am glad I talked to you.”

“Eleanor…” Solas said thoughtfully, as if he were thinking something over himself, “you…believe the duality in spirits has a balance?” he wondered.

Eleanor nodded. “Uh-huh. Well yeah. I mean…okay so like you have Compassion and Cruelty. Cruelty on its own—ehh, bad. Compassion done in order to be cruel? That’s fake compassion, it’s wrong and you’re wrong,” Eleanor said, “but cruelty from compassion? As long as your base is compassion—that that’s at the core of what you’re doing and you’re acting directly from there? Cool! Like…pride and purpose are counter points right? It’s important to know your worth, know your purpose and pursue it, have confidence in it. But if you take it to a prideful place, where it’s all about how great you are? Blah. But there’s absolutely nothing wrong in taking pride in your purpose. The bad nature doesn’t have to sit in a corner all by itself—it’s there for a reason! It’s a component of the good part, it’s not an either-or thing. Spirits who become despair, I’m sure used to be Spirits of joy or hope—it would be pretty hard to tell when you’re happy if you’re happy all the time! Knowing there are bad things, feeling sad when you’re supposed to be sad makes being happy that much better. So I’m sure there’s a purpose for despair in things like hope and joy, I mean hope only comes from necessity—you have to hope for better things because you know the worst is possible. Without that knowledge of the bad stuff? Without the potential of despair? All you’d have is certainty. You can’t really hope tomorrow’s going to be a good day if you don’t understand the potential for despair,” she prattled on. “Uhh…did any of that make sense? It makes sense in my head but uh…it’s my head, when that’s doing things that don’t make sense to me, I’m usually in trouble.”

“I believe I’m following your reasoning,” Solas supposed. “All morality holds a duality.”

“Uh-huh! Dark and light. You can’t get more than a selfish sort of light out of darkness—lighting a lamp in the pitch, you can see your path and you think ‘oh, I’m in the light! I’m doing the right thing!’, but you’re still surrounded by darkness. Starting from light? A place that’s bright can be full of light and encompasses everyone it touches, but at the same time, all light casts a shadow—darkness supporting the light.”

“I suppose…once upon a time, if I’d truly been acting of love instead of vengeance derived from hatred I may well have made better choices,” Solas said thoughtfully. “Could there have been a better way to deal with the Evanuris?” There usually was always at least a few other options before one should consider mass murder, Cassandra supposed.

“If you’d stopped and really acted out of your love for Mythal and your baby and your people?” Eleanor said, “Um…I mean…you’re considered part of the pantheon now, right? You had followers. And Mythal made you her equal. I mean you probably could’ve taken her place, you know? Stepped up and did what she used to do, maybe even better than she did. I mean absolutely no offence, I’m sure she did the best she knew how to, it was probably the least confrontational for herself way—but it sounds like she catered to their egos and talked them down by stroking them enough. You were right that they needed confrontation, just…you did it all by yourself, so you took drastic measures to ensure you’d succeed. If you’d had the backing of Mythal’s people, of your own? Gone to them and said ‘hey, enough is enough’, maybe recruited from the other Evanuris’s houses? You probably could have turned the whole system on its head,” she supposed and…Solas looked rather like stunned and…well, Cassandra supposed it must be an overwhelming thing, to be a formerly immortal being, a person whom with it was impossible to pinpoint just how truly old he was, reflecting on things that happened before Humans were around to count the Ages—to have once been so certain of what he was doing, that there was no better plan whatsoever and have a girl who had been alive all of a blink of his eye, a fully countable sixteen years of life under her belt, propose a plausible alternative to his once ultimate plan was nothing short of confounding and possibly hair-rending unbelievable. “I mean that’s kind of what we’re doing right now. The entire Chantry’s been corrupted so the Inquisition is stepping up and making it right, speaking truth to power and hopefully kicking Corypheus directly in the balls.”

“…told you. Ashakari,” the Iron Bull said. ahh. ‘one who thinks’? “Babe…when the hell do you think about shit like this?”

“Mmm basically anytime I’m not thinking about Cremisius’s butt.”

“Dude…a boycrazed teenager came up with a better plan for Elf-peace in like…what, the fuck long have we known about wolf-boy? A month? A damn month.”

“I’m well aware how very humbling that is,” Solas assured him, the man was even blushing a bit as if embarrassed. “I did many things I regret whole-heartedly now…though I…I am not sorry you exist. You understand that, yes? I am remorseful, but I could never regret that what has come to pass in the dawn of the Ages has led to a world where you have come to be.”

“…papi,” Eleanor breathed, smiling as she blushed seeming almost shy the man had said such…well, it was indeed a moving sentiment.

“How very sweet, I too am glad I exist,” Dorian declared, “what a wretched world it would be, otherwise.”

Solas’s lips quirked in a bit of an amused smile as he offered, “I…did mean the sentiment to encompass this group as a whole, actually. While yes I certainly mean it in a way that feels more in regard to Ellie and Sera, those I have come to dearly love,” …rather the mouthful to replace saying ‘Marehis’ but even his roundabout way made the Elf woman cringe ever-so and blush. “I am glad you exist, Dorian Pavus. Just as I am glad this world produced the Iron Bull and Seeker Pentaghast and Madam de Fer, Ser Rainier—all of you…even Varric, lo that I do owe him ‘drinks for forever’.”

“The frig for?” Sera wanted to know.

“He has expressed the deep wish to make a publication modeled after my ‘batshit crazy life story’ but he would not wish to incidentally make public my transgressions with the Inquisition, write something that people could draw lines from, to me, and discover it is not quite as fictious a work as he’d like to sell it as. So, as he is being so gracious to guard the highlights of my past, I owe him drinks eternal.” Had the Dwarf truly termed his change of heart as gracious? It had taken hours of War Room negotiations between he and the advisors for them to talk him down and make him sign a promise of confidentiality on the matter—because ultimately, if the connection were made to Solas and the Inquisition, it would not only be potentially Solas and the Inquisition hurt, but Eleanor as Inquisitor. It was a historical role all its own, to be Inquisitor. To be so young and a mage taking on that mantle, it would be unjust if her works went overshadowed in history by her falling for the tricks of ‘Fen’harel’, any progress she made for the future societal betterment for Mages may well be thwarted.

Sera snorted. “Tell’em that’s dumb—if anything you owe Inky drinks for forever.”

“Oh! Papi, do it,” Eleanor pled, “because I don’t want you indebting yourself or encouraging the destruction of Varric’s liver. And I like free drinks. And mine are cheaper! The most expensive juice I drink is orange juice and that only appeals when the stars align just right, I’m a big apple juice girl and apples are like, all over the place you could probably make it yourself and save your money,” she nodded, smiling though she looked albeit crestfallen as if something had just occurred to her.

“…you’ve made yourself want apple juice, haven’t you?” Solas supposed amusedly. Oh goodness.

She nodded. “Si, real bad.”

“Well, this one’s certainly on me,” he assured, rising from his seat to go fetch her a glass of the stuff from their stores.

Eleanor sighed contentedly as she rested her head against Cassandra’s shoulder. “I missed having an in-the-field papi!”

Oh…Cassandra had been considering carefully what she would be writing Eleanor’s ‘out-of-the-field’ Papi…thinking over if she should send along the days events in her own words to quell his worries—there would be a report and Cullen would surely read it, there would be no keeping the Freemen’s attack from him. Not that she wished to keep it from him necessarily, she just knew well the man already worried endlessly when they were in the field, this would only absolutely petrify the man…

Though if she also mentioned Eleanor was well and enraptured with having an ‘in-the-field’ papi, jealousy may well send the man crossing boarders to get to the girl forthwith and wholly derail their operations to indulge his mijas in play and pampering until he laid claim to some horrible title like ‘all-around-universal-favorite-of-his-daughters-hearts’ papi.

Cullen’s return missive was swift when Cassandra wrote the man after dinner, he demanded evidence ‘his children’ were safe. And he received it—Cassandra had Eleanor and Sera write him that they were well, and on Cassandra’s parchment to reply to him…the Lieutenant granted them rather the nice surprise. Their party sat around the campfire for the rest of the evening, socializing and being together, enjoying each other’s company as Cassandra wrote up assurances to Cullen’s response, and when she voiced his worry, Krem asked,

“There uh, anything in there you don’t want me accidentally seeing?” pointing to the parchment in Cassandra’s lap.

She was not one for writing smut. Not often. One time! while in the field after Haven fell and emotions were rather high and she missed the man. And he’d started it! But upon their return to Skyhold…well. Leliana had snorted when she found herself quoting one of the more benign sentiments expressed in those letters and Cassandra had been horrified to realize the woman had read their post!

“In my defense, Cassandra, it was only after my agent in charge of checking field correspondence for interference rose suspicion to the er…sudden, graphic change in your letter writing style. We had to…read rather thoroughly to confirm the letters were genuinely yours and Cullen’s.” Leliana grinned, devilishly delighting in, “She requested a change of position once we were through.” …which was understandable.

“…no, is there something you would like to add?” she wondered as Krem motioned for her to pass her parchment to him. He withdrew a pencil from a thigh pocket and offered her a little wink before saying,

“Hey lovely, gimme a smile. You too Ser’,” he said to the girls laughing and making play with some….ridiculous game—sitting on their knees before the fire, knees touching as they held out their hands to one another, Sera’s hovering over Eleanor’s upturned hands while the younger girl stared with wide eyes waiting for her sister to strike. Delighting in one’s attempts to smack the other’s hands while the other endeavored to anticipate the slap and whisk their hands away at the last second. Though now their attention turned to the Tevinter man, turning their smiles on him, Eleanor lowering the pollen filtering mask so he could see. He grinned, nodding as he wondered, “and uh, what’s the sign for ‘I love you’, again? The short way.”

“Oh!” Eleanor said, holding up her unmarked hand, to him, palm forward as she made a fist and raised her thumb, index, and pinkie fingers, and Sera giggled, copying the younger girl as she stuck out her tongue at the Lieutenant.

“The frig you want all that for?” Sera wondered.

“Never you mind—be about your business,” Krem dismissed them, “You leave bruises on my girlfriend’s hands Ser’ and we’re gonna have a problem. Same to you El, don’t be too rough on my best friend.”

“No promises guapo!”

“Yeah Kremmy-boy—it’s go big or go home!” Sera agreed, their attention returning to their game while Krem began scratching pencil against parchment to make whatever addition he wished for her letter to Cullen.

Oh, it was ridiculous game but it was admittedly adorable to watch. And albeit hilarious when it became apparent Solas was struggling with having so much exuberance in the bond—between Eleanor and Sera’s delight in the game and Marehis’s enjoyment in watching them, and his own natural amusement in their antics…well. The poor man erupted into something of a giggle fit, blushing ears and cheekbones as he slapped a hand over his mouth and excused himself, rising to get a bit of distance from their campfire and breathe in some fresh air.

Marehis…was likewise blushing when, after a moment of staring after the man with rather the warm smile at her lips, she realized she was doing so. She quietly cleared her throat and shook herself, her gaze returning to the girls, though she saw Cassandra looking to her and offered up a bit of an embarrassed smile. The Seeker smiled back, kindly, taking the Elf woman’s hand in her own and offering it a reassuring squeeze.

“He loves them. It would be hard not to be happy with that,” Cassandra whispered quietly. Cullen’s shared love of Eleanor and eventually Sera was a…well, it certainly hadn’t turned her off from pursuing the man in a romantic sense. She loved how he loved and cared for them. And while she’d no attraction to Solas, well, she certainly had an appreciation for how he loved the girls.

“Papi, do you wanna turn?” Eleanor wondered when the man returned, more grounded and calm from his overwhelming mirth.

“Hmm…” the Elf man considered it, but he’d not necessarily wish to play a game that involved, even in fun, slapping the girls hands. “I was thinking perhaps, if it would please you da’lens, I could teach you a game I played in my youth. It may well still be around today, you might even already know it—it’s great fun if I recall correctly.”

“What’s your game, papi?” Eleanor wondered in delighted curiosity.

“Ena Alas Hamin Ghilas,” he rattled off in the Elvehnan tongue, or, “Up, Down, Stop, Go.” It was rather the perfect way for expelling Eleanor’s energy after she’d spent much of the day comatose—Cassandra had been admittedly worried the girl would struggle to sleep in the night either from anxieties of the things that had come to pass that day, or from sleeping most of the day away, but that worry lessened as Solas led Eleanor and Sera in something called ‘Up, Down, Stop, Go’. The rules were as simple as they were complicated, it was a game of opposites, apparently—Solas sat with the adults, calling out instructions to the girls and it was up to them to remember to do the opposite of whatever he said. So if he called ‘up’ they were to drop down, ‘down’ they were to jump up and raise their arms high overhead, ‘stop’ meant run as fast as they could, and ‘go’ meant to, of course, stop still wherever they were. What resulted was a lot of frantic running about, screaming and giggling as the girls crashed into each other, helped each other stay in the game by haphazardly following each other’s lead. Cole joining their fun did them no benefit strategically but the Spirit did add to their great fun, he was well versed in the game…knew the rules, but that did nothing to assist him in his ability to follow them any better than his friends. Ultimately Solas’s command of ‘stop’ had sent the girls and Spirit running for each other, colliding and stopping still the moment the Elf called out ‘go!’ Eleanor squealing as Sera cackled and Cole had laughter bubbling up from his chest as he did his best to help the girls remain upright, they were stopped but they weren’t being very ‘still’ about it. And when the command for ‘stop’ came again the Spirit vanished from sight—poofing away and leaving the girls shrieking as they toppled to the ground, laughing and squealing as they scrambled to get up on their feet and run.

“Here,” Krem said as he leaned to hand Cassandra her letter back.

It may feel irrational. But if anything happened to this piece of parchment, Cassandra would hunt down whoever was responsible, and she would utterly decimate them.

“Cremisius…my most precious and beloved son,” Marehis claimed him on the spot as she laid eyes on the Lieutenant’s handiwork. Maker bless him, the whole of his days. He’d drawn Eleanor and Sera as they had been, seated by the fire, smiling and holding up their hands in the sign for ‘I love you’, Sera’s nose scrunched, a single eye open as she stuck her tongue out. “This is beautiful. Are you…” she looked to Krem, “are you capable of repeating this?” she wondered.

The young man was blushing at her praise, shrugging as he said, “S’long as Cullen holds onto it,” he would. Or Cassandra would promptly, as the girls called it, ‘dump his ass’. “I can ink it when I get back to Skyhold, transfer it for you to have if you want an exact copy.”

“Thank you, sweet man,” Cassandra said, “I appreciate this, Cullen will too.” He would be absolutely delighted with it.

“No problem,” he assured. “You uh…think they’re tired yet or can I get in on the fun?”
Cassandra needn’t voice that the girls would only regenerate their exuberance at the news Krem wished to join them—Sera heard his words and announced, “Kremmy-boy’s in!”

Krem grinned, assuring, “I’m dale-ing!” as he went to join them. The Iron Bull found it amusing to watch his Lieutenant make play with Eleanor and Cole and Sera, laughing as he alternated between giving his friend’s chase, somehow always right there for any such ‘go!’ orders to stop alongside his girlfriend, arms around her waist to hold her against him to assist her in keeping upright and in the game, of course. That was most certainly his only motives. Oh, it was sweet.

The day had hardly gone at all to plan, but at the end of it? Cassandra lay in a cot with Eleanor, Sera, and Marehis at her sides, safe and sound, the younger women wholly exhausted in the best way—spent from their fun, getting to bathe and relax and lay with each other at the end of the day, chatting and still…goodness, it was almost like the girls were speaking an entirely made up language the way they spoke with each other, quietly but excitedly, words falling rapid fire from their lips until they began drifting off, coaxed further still by Solas’s soft announcement, his voice in the dark of their tent, coming from his cot.

“Da’vehnans…if you’re ready to sleep I’m certain you’ll have pleasant dreams,” he enticed them. It sounded like, in fact, he’d planned upon it, already set up something for them to enjoy in the Fade.

“Have fun, da’lens,” Marehis wished them, Eleanor in her arms, she pressed a kiss to the top of her head. Eleanor nodded sleepily, ready to drift off.

Sera looked nearly asleep herself but she yawned and snuggled into Cassandra’s hold—she was laying atop the woman on her stomach, face against Cassandra’s neck though she looked up at the Seeker to intone, “Everything’s okay, ‘sandra. Get some good sleep, sweet dreams—you get any nightmares, wake me up, got it?” pecking a kiss to Cassandra’s jaw before settling against her once more.

“Likewise, sweet girl,” Cassandra returned. It was kind of her to worry but Cassandra did her best to focus on every single thing that had gone right today, and thankfully, the bit of dreaming her mind indulged in that evening was full of camp firelight and the people she loved most running and playing in the Emerald Graves under the stars—all present in waking life and…well. the mind could do what it wanted, and apparently that was Cullen, the man well and chasing after the girls with…with someone she recognized but couldn’t quite place from where, a young man who wasn’t Cremisius running alongside the Tevinter boy, and just when Cassandra was overwhelmingly curious.

“Hey sticky,” a similar cadence to the word ‘sissy’ that Cassandra had been labeled with in her youth when she’d not been quite so adept at stealth and been caught on more than one occasion sneaking berry pastries that left her face and fingers sticky with the evidence, Antony always had a handkerchief on hand dedicated to cleaning her up in the blink of an eye before she could be subjected to lectures from an aunt or uncle making her feel mischievous and safe, eliciting her laughter as he teased her for the mess she’d made. The smile that made her feel that way was on her now as the young man approached her, “You um…you can hear me? See me and everything, right?” he checked, waving a hand before Cassandra’s face.

“Yes, Anthony. Of course.” It was her dream after all.

“Doing real good for yourself. They’re great, Cassie, really. Total cuties, Sera and Ellie, right? Little one calls me ‘Tio’ which is…pretty damn wild to be an uncle…wilder somehow to hear about you being a ‘mami’? ‘course I mean, I held you the second you were born, felt you take your first big breath in life and…” his gaze swept over her, a grown woman in Seeker armor, a sword at her hip. “You’re always going to be this impossibly small thing in my mind, my baby sister. Dunno, you probably don’t remember but uhh, mother’d have a hell of a time getting me to put you down when you were just a baby, I used to insist you were my baby. She was just reminding me about that last Drakonis.”

“Drakonis?” Cassandra wondered.
"Well yeah. Think about you all the time Cassie—but especially when your birthday rolls around. The fifth...you’re getting old huh?" he teased, poking her in the cheek, laughing when she swatted his hand away though- oh. It- his hand felt solid and she carefully dared to take it in her own. “I’m glad your happy—don’t settle for less, got it? Second that Rutherford fellow stops treating you right, drop him. You’re real grown up, s’crazy, Maker, you’re just- I’m real proud of you. You know that, right?"

Cassandra woke with...the strangest sense she wasn’t alone. She wasn’t, of course, she was in a tent full of people, several of them laying directly on top of her come morning, she was almost having trouble breathing what with Sera and Eleanor making something of an Elf sandwich—Cassandra and Eleanor, with Sera between them. There was an arm hanging over their sides from a body atop Eleanor’s...Cole, laying, or at least simulating it—he mustn’t be corporeal just now or she would certainly be incapable of breath under so much weight.

“’sandra?” Sera’s voice was soft with sleep, “you okay?”

“Certainly,” she assured, sniffing ugh, she- well she supposed that had been...a strange, emotional dream, her eyes were perhaps a little watery.

“Mami? Did Tio come say hi like he promised?” Eleanor’s voice wondered.

“…” oh. Oh goodness she- that had been-? To her horror her tears were fresh in her eyes as she swallowed, clearing her throat and answering, “Yes. He...he did. You...you do mean Anthony?”

“Uh-huh! Tio came to see us, he startled the crap out of papi! Cause he wasn’t expecting a guest but um...he came to say hi! Well, to see you, duh, but he was worried you might not see him, he said he’s never sure if you have or not when he’s come around in the past, and he found it easy peasy to approach us in the Fade and we did our best to help him get to you, I was worried it wouldn’t work.”

“We made a mami pile,” Sera informed her. Ahh. So, the amount of bodies she had atop her made further sense. “You’re okay, right? You’re not um...you’re not sad or anything, yeah?”

“Far from it,” Cassandra assured, mind still grappling with...she’d had true communication from- that had genuinely been Anthony’s...spirit? Anthony himself? He’d come to her before and she...hadn’t seen him? Oh, she was grateful she had now.

He was proud of her. Approved of the life she’d made.

He...he thought of her on her birthday. He and their parents.

It wasn’t until mail call that morning, when she realized the date. At this time of year, in Nevarra, there was surely heavy snowfall on the ground.

It was the anniversary of Anthony’s death.

And...ironically enough, as this was certainly one year she did not feel she would need a long good cry, the parcel that reminded her of the date, bore a great many handkerchiefs.

Tonio Aclassi was indeed the sweetest man. He had apparently learned Cassandra was suffering hay fever, and when he discovered one of Eleanor’s most precious ‘mamis’, a woman he expressed gratitude to for being in his Cremisius’s life as a source of compassion and guidance, he’d felt terribly worried for her and sent along a care package of sorts. There were new handkercheifs for dealing with congestion and fresh medicine from Adan’s for respiratory and sinus congestion—he’d apparently fretted they might not have something of the sort in the field like they did healing potions and Lyrium—and small packets of tea, a mix of cinnamon, ginger, and Elf Root...along with a mug she did not recognize from the kitchens in Skyhold so...had the man- had he purchased her a mug for fear she did not have one in the field? It was a beigey ceramic thing with water colored blossoms, roses or peonies or some such blooming flower in purples and pinks all around the outside of the mug and it was entirely unnecessary and she adored it. Almost as much as she felt wholly thrilled with-“Cremisius,” Cassandra said as they sat around their breakfast campfire, making certain the young man was looking at her as she instructed, “you will find out what your father has spent to gift me get well presents so he can be subtly repaid.” Either through arranging for Josephine to make slight additions to his paychecks or Leliana to have her agents leave coin in his pockets until such a time he was repaid in full. A mug…may or may not have been entirely costly, but the small leather-bound book he sent along? It did not come from Skyhold’s library, it bore no seal from there—he had to have purchased it and it was rather the new publication, something Cassandra hadn’t been aware of but was now admittedly excited to read. It was a devotional, penned by a sweet Mother the Seeker had actually met in her time working with the Divine, Charity, who had been permitted to write as it was merely something of a written down collection of the Mother’s Chantry sermons put to paper, along with excerpts from the Chant. And too, according to Cassandra’s scanning the index, anecdotes about blessings and miracles the Mother had witnessed in her life, may well mention Divine Justinia’s works, there was a portion dedicated to her memory. Oh, she would…inform Leliana she had such a book, mention it in passing to test the waters for if she would hold interest in reading such a thing.

Eleanor was also the recipient of something—a parcel, and not from the Elder Aclassi. Though it was Sera Krem handed it off to at first—it was labeled to be delivered to her, but once Sera’d caught sight of the handwriting she let out an excited, “Widdle! Oh- Oh! Frick!” she exclaimed, turning to Eleanor, “Inky, this…this is for you. I um…oh Maker um just…just open it, kay?”

“…kay,” Eleanor said albeit wary as if uncertain at her sister’s nervous excitement. The Elf girl was alternating between pacing and bouncing in place while Eleanor worked to unwrap the brown paper from around her package from Miss Dagna. She unveiled a long, slender rectangular wooden box that had no latch to keep it closed, bearing the Inquisition’s seal emblazon on its top—uncovered when Eleanor moved to take up the slip of parchment on top of the box. Though that parchment fluttered from her grasp as the backs of her fingers made contact with the box as she made to lift the missive to read, the girl sucked in rather the harsh gasp, yelping as her hands flinched away from the box which toppled from her lap to fall face down at her feet unopened as if by sheer coincidence of physics playing out or…there was magic involved to keep the box sealed shut. What was more the concern was why she dropped the box, which was due to Solas’s voice breaking harshly past his lips, loud and fierce and startling,

“Ellie! Don’t!”

“P-papi?” Eleanor wondered wide-eyed at his tone, “What gives?”

“It- It is imbued with Sera’s magical signature, it will only open to her hand, it will-” his voice trailed off and…and it was his turn to stare wide-eyed at the girl as she…well the look came into her face like realization and hse offered a quiet ‘oh!’ as he spoke and quickly leaned over to collect the box in hand to extend it to her sister, “…hurt your magic,” he finished what he’d meant to say even as he found it to be untrue.

“Why come papi? Sissy’s magic doesn’t hurt mine. Yours doesn’t either—you know that,” Eleanor said, confused.

“Y-yes, because I’ve- I’ve only ever interacted with your magic using Rift magic,” Solas explained. Poor explanation, apparently.

“Nooo…” Eleanor shook her head, “Papi, you only use Rift magic to interact with my Mark. But you cast barrier on me all of the time, and that doesn’t hurt my magic. I mean papi! We’re bonded! And we play together in the Fade all the time! Why would you think your magic would hurt mine?”

“Be…because it is Elvehnan? While your magic, beautiful as it is, is Human. The…the Mark hurts your magic, does it not?”

Eleanor stared at him, dumbstruck. “Is…is that what you mean when you talk about ‘like’ magics? You mean magic from people of the same race?!”

“Well…well yes.”

“I thought you meant like as in Rift magic interacting with Rift magic. But you…you mean it like Elf magic only interacting pleasantly with Elf magic?” Eleanor asked, aghast. And when the man nodded? She declared, “Full offence—that’s so dumb! There isn’t any difference between our magic, Solas! You made a new branch of magic—when you took Mythal’s magic and twisted it into the Orb of Destruction to make the Veil! It’s not that it’s Elvehnan magic that makes it hurt mine. It’s that it comes from your Orb of Destruction. Natural magic—your magic and mine, it gets along just fine,” Eleanor assured, holding up her unmarked hand, a white glow of just pure undirected magic glittering in the palm of her hand. “Come on papi. You won’t hurt me, honest!”

The man was tentative, but he held up his hand, carefully calling his own magic, flinching when their hands made contact before he relaxed and...oh. The poor man still looked startled and confused and ashamed somehow as he stared at their joint hands. “See?” Eleanor giggled. “Yeah, sometimes there’s opposites and things, but papi, magic is magic. It’s no different between Elves or Qunari or Humans—if Dwarves could access magic, I’m sure theirs would be the same too! What hurts, what makes the Mark so awful is it’s from the Orb. Magic isn’t exclusionary, it’s your Orb and the things that come from it that are. You took magic and made it into something it was never supposed to be. You made something unnatural, meant to destroy, and that’s what it does.”

Solas’s mouth worked momentarily, he looked mournful. Oh…to have taken his love’s magic and twisted it into something vile…Mythal was a deity of compassion…creation even, when one considered the implication of being an All-Mother, motherhood was something of creation—if not of life itself, then a creation of love. These were all forces that stood against destruction, and that is what he’d used her magic for. And too, to have for all this time believed there was something different between the magic Elves possessed, and that of Humanity? It was a last bit of distance, a wall he’d put up between himself and the rest of existence outside his race.

“Oh papi, don’t be sad! This is happy!” Eleanor insisted, interlocking her fingers with his, “I love hugging magics! It’s like, the best! I love you and my magic loves you too!”

Solas’s chin crinkled in a way that looked like perhaps the man was pushing past the need to cry and offered up a genuine smile, eyes alight as he murmured, “As I do you, ma’da’vehnan. I did not realize my misunderstanding I—” he cleared his throat, and moved like he were going to hug her but wasn’t certain he should…which was of course a wholly ridiculous form of reticence. The girl scooted to hug him fiercely, humming with the effort before looking up to her sister,

“So sissy? What’s in the box?”

“Oh yeah,” Sera jerked a bit, her attention back on the box in her hands, “shite—Widdle meant well, honest. She was scared it’d get stole or something, didn’t want anyone to be able to get their hands on it to examine the magic and whatnot, so, she um…” she examined the missive Eleanor had dropped, “she sealed the box so it’ll only open for me. Sorry, shite, she’s- she doesn’t know your magical signature very well, she’s mostly studied the Mark, but she’s got something with my magical signature on hand er, well, she wears it on her wrist, so she used that to sort of copy it into the enchantment on the box, keep it shut so it’ll only open if I touch it-”

“It will only open if you cast against it, my dear,” Vivienne de Fer offered the bit of information in cool, controlled tones. “It requires being touched directly by your magic. Which, apparently, you have.”

“Uhh…”

“You absolutely idiotic, foolheaded girl,” Madam de Fer seethed. Ahh. Cassandra had thought they were well past the days when she felt most certain their relationship would end in Cassandra reaching her limit with the Orlesian Enchantress and challenging her in an arena where one of them would not come out alive. Apparently that end was now. Cassandra’s hand was on the hilt of her sword as Vivienne, eyes wide, looking wholly outraged, had risen up and crossed the distance between she and Sera, hands raised-

To plant a hand firmly on each of Sera’s shoulders, before pulling the girl to her chest in…in a…hug. That...what?

“You should have come to me the moment your magic wakened! Oh my dear girl you must have been petrified!”

“I uh…wasn’t real scared, Viv, it was um. I kind of...woke it myself?”

“Oh.” Vivienne said…and then, “All the more foolish!” she reprimanded, though not of the girl’s choice, but “You should have consulted me! Who better than I could assist you in mastering and guiding your magic?” Solas…was not looking at anyone in particular but he stared off into the distance with rather the wryly bemused look upon his face. Who better indeed—though admittedly he had been on the thinnest of ice at the time. “I’ve much to impart on thwarting demons in the Fade, I could- I am the Grand Enchanter of the Orlesian Court!” she informed her of the tip of her resume’s iceberg.

“…and you uh…kind of hate me?” Sera saw fit to remind her.

And the woman looked wholly aghast at the notion. “I do not hate you. I dislike you after a fashion due to your lack thereof. But make no mistake, you absolute horrible urchin. You…are an admittedly remarkable young lady and have proven yourself as an asset to this group and I…” Vivienne cleared her throat, pulling her arms away from Sera, lowering her hands to rest on her hips, turning her head away from the Elf girl, eyes closed even as her head was held high almost like a last bit of haughtiness she wished to uphold even as she informed this horrible urchin that she, in point of fact, “I have a fondness for you.”

“Uhh...a....fondness?” Sera questioned.

Madam de Fer loosed a weary sigh. “A love, if it must be termed that way.” And then she relaxed her stance, looking to the Elf girl, “You’re acclimating well? if you’ve any questions or find yourself in need of magical guidance, you may come to me, you understand?”

“You…wanna give me magic lessons?” Sera asked uncertainly.

“Perhaps.”

Eleanor gasped excitedly, grasping her sister’s wrist and popping up on tip toe to bring her lips to Sera’s ear, “Sissy…” the girl began whispering and Marehis smiled at whatever it was she said, which, was apparently, “Maybe I could join you n’ Ink whenever we’re in Skyhold?” Sera wondered.

“Oh very well,” Madam de Fer acquiesced. “That would suit—but you must take this seriously girls. If you cannot behave and stay focused, I will separate you. And if you are lucky, I will only do so insofar as lessons are concerned. Do not test me.”

Sera’s, “Got it!” overlapped Eleanor’s, “Si, Tia!”

“Excellent. I will make certain you are kept aware of when Eleanor and I are scheduled to meet. Do try to be tidy.”

“I’ll be on time,” Sera assured.

“I said tidy, child. But yes, do be timely as well.”

The Elf girl snorted, “Alright, you got it Viv.”

“Now, if you would, do demonstrate your magical prowess,” Vivienne invited, gesturing to the box still underfoot. Sera squeaked and crouched to lift it up, the blue haze of icy chill appearing in the palm of her hand, earning a nod of approval from the Enchantress who voiced, “very nice,” before gliding her way back to her seat at Dorian’s side. “Did you keep Sera’s secret from me?”

“…I…did,” the man slowly confessed.

“You’ve more loyalty to her?” the woman wondered, as if he very well shouldn’t.

“Well, she is my friend. And we’ve a solidarity mind, given our preferences.”

“Your preferences?”

“I only bed gloriously muscular men, and she her many fine feminine conquests.”

“And you assume gender dictates my preferences?” the woman wondered as if intrigued.

“…I…did,” the man supposed again. “Just…what is your sexual preference, if I might ask?” The woman smirked, wholly amused, “Power.”

Respectable.

The box did open under Sera’s magic, and she showed Eleanor its contents with a nervous smile, “Me n’ Widdle’s been working on this for you for a while now. Um…you like it?”

“It’s cute!” Eleanor enthused and when Sera nodded the younger girl took the box’s contents in hand revealing a glove of sorts—a nearly black green glove, fingerless save for a single hole for a thumb, made to cover a person from the palm of their hand all the way up their elbow. Her elbow—Eleanor’s. the palm of the glove bore a small, smooth runestone the exact size of Eleanor’s Mark, the sigil emblazon on that stone was embroidered in lyrium-cool silver thread, forming a line of runes from the fabric on the underside of Eleanor’s wrist all the way up to her inner elbow once she pulled it on, rolling up the sleeve of her sleep shirt to examine it,
“It don’t hurt none or anything, right?” Sera worried.

Eleanor shook her head ‘no’ as she looked at the Runestone seated over her Mark, “It feels a little…weird? But not bad weird. Or good weird? Just, like something my magic isn’t sure about but it isn’t doing anything wrong,” she decided, looking up at the older girl, “What’s it for?”

“H-hopefully you’ll see. Just…lemme know what it does today, kay? If it hurts or does something you don’t like, you take it off, alright Inky?” Sera intoned, firmly without really stating what the object was for, it seemed terribly important to the Elf girl but…well it seemed there was a measure of she had something in mind of what it would do, she just didn’t wish to get the younger girl’s hopes up in the event it didn’t do whatever it was its creator had in mind.

It was somewhat alarming for the adults when, as they armored themselves and made their way to their next Rift near the river along the road to where their Inquisition scouts had confirmed there would be Red Templar activity for them to infiltrate and see if they could find evidence against Samson for Cullen, Eleanor let out a startled gasp and practically jumped, knocking against Cassandra who was swift to bring her hands to the girl’s shoulders, bracing her as she assessed the girl for harm, “El, you cool?” Krem asked of the girl as she stood, halting their progress forward as she stared at the runestone nestled in the palm of her hand.

“Ink?” Sera asked, apprehensively.

“It’s…warm?” Eleanor said as if questioning it, “and…vibrating.”

“Uh-huh. Inside or outside?”

“Outside, I don’t feel it in my Mark or my magic, the stone itself is just kind of pulsey.”

“Kay,” Sera said, looking about and then, “Ah! There’t’is,” she pointed to a low tree branch with one of her Red Jenny bracelets tied around it, just a few paces behind their group, “You’ve just stepped in range of the Rift—like the usual distance you start feelin’ ‘em. ‘member me ‘n you got the distance down,” Sera said, and Eleanor nodded. “So…right here, your Mark should be doin’ its thing—burning more and snapping against your magic, right?”

“Uh-huh,” Eleanor nodded.

“Well…is it?” Sera wondered, so very nervous, hands fidgeting before her as she looked close to tears she was so very afraid for what the girl might say.

“It…” Eleanor’s mouth worked for a moment and then she looked away from the glove to look forward and walk ahead of their group, further down the path, stopped, and then returned, looking wholly dumbfounded, “it doesn’t,” she said, chin quivering as she stood before them, raising her gaze to look up into the older girl’s eyes, her own brimming with tears, “my- my Mark doesn’t hurt!”

“Really?!?” Sera squeaked out excitedly.

Eleanor was beaming, smiling so very wide, what seemed to be truly happy tears spilling down her cheeks as she confirmed, “Really!”

Sera let out an enthusiastic hoot as she swept the younger girl up in a hug, spinning about as she cheered, “Hell yeah!”

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis asked, like were timid to do so, as if, should she question the seeming miracle of a thing too harshly it may cease working but,

“This glove thingy,” Eleanor termed it, “when I put it on I…well there’s a level where I’m used to my Mark burning all the time so I don’t much notice it when it’s just, you know, normal level ‘ouch’, so I didn’t realize at first I wasn’t feeling my Mark but um…I can still feel that the Mark is there, it’s just more like a pressure now against my magic than a pain. Now that we’re in range of the Rift the runestone is getting warmer—not bad warm, it’s kind of toasty! Like, a cozy warm! And it’s vibrating.”

“Y-yeah Ink, its um…it’s supposed to warm up like your Mark gets warmer—how hot it get’s is sort of relates to how powerful a Rift is gonna be—and starts sparkin’ against your magic faster and faster the closer you get to a Rift. Your Mark’s just doin’ it to the Runestone now,” Sera explained, blushing fiercely when she felt the whole of their party’s eyes on her, looking for just…just how had such a thing come to be? “Solas was all ‘like magics blah blah’, how Elf magic distracts the Mark from Ellie’s magic ‘cause they’re compatible n’ pish. I hypothesized that if Inky had a Rune chock full of Elvehnan magic, the Mark would get distracted just like when we hold hands n’ pish, stop attacking her magic to try and get on the Elfy magic. Only catch is…well, when Inky holds my hand she’s not directly holding my magic—if she was doin’ that somehow, I’m pretty sure it’d burn the same as her Mark. But see… Um…and me n’ Solas did this experiment a while back about opposite forces in magical nature, tried clacking an Frost Rune against a Fire Rune—they sploded big time!” the girl giggled a bit, snorting before she shook herself, was more serious as she said, “we figured out how to make a transitional Rune that would allow Frost and Fire to sit nice n’ cozy next to one another. So…that got me thinking, maybe the same could be done to trick the Mark’s racism. Puttin’ a Runestone with magic that won’t interest it so much right up against Ink’s hand that can act as a buffer between her and another Runestone full of Elf magic it wants to get at. Um…the…” she chuckled nervously, a hand wrenching at the back of her neck, “Sorry, blabbing, boring shite—“

“On the contrary da’vehnan,” Solas was immediate to correct her, “this is incredibly fascinating.”

“I unfortunately must concur with the Elf,” Vivienne agreed.

“If you do not give us your conclusion Sera, I will rip all of my glorious hair from my head.” Dorian’s encouragement came threat laced. “However did you get such a thing to work?”

“So like…I tested how much proximity Inky needs for the whole ‘Elf magic distraction’ thing to work—we don’t gotta make skin to skin contact, but we still gotta be pretty close, like if we held our hands like this,” Sera exemplified by taking Eleanor’s wrist in hand to guide the girl to raise it before Sera brought her own hand to hover just the barest bit of visible distance between them, ’her Mark starts getting distracted detecting Elfness. Having it burn directly outside of her hand is still ‘ouch’ so, the rune touching Inky's hand was enchanted using Human magic that the Mark thinks is just an extension of Ellie’s, it's channeled through that while trying to latch onto the Elf magic it senses nearby, in the second Runestone I got Solas to enchant since uh...well I figure he made the Mark so it sensing his magic nearby makes it try to go back to him. There's this transitional seal between the two, like a lining in the glove between the two rune stones, that has lyrium threading to make a low resonating rune that matches the Human magic rune on the Human side, and then an Elf powered one on the Elf side so once the Mark is distracted it kind of stays on that side while you're wearing your glove. Sort of like opening a door for someone but they can't figure out how to get back out? Which means when you pour Mark power through the Runestones, both of’em will be filtering mad power through them which um...just, be careful with it Ink, okay? You feel them cracking or getting to hot, take it off—we’ll check it when we’re done with the Rift today to see how much if any damage is done to the runes, ‘cause Dagna n’ me are pretty sure they'll eventually wear out, since instead of the Mark attacking your magic, it’ll attack the Human Rune as it passes through trying to make contact with the Elf one. We did a test run by having that lil Noam fellow cast using a test glove made of Frost and Fire runestones set up the same way—having him push frost magic to filter through the fire rune, into the frost rune, and Maker bless him he kept it up as best he could for an hour just casting and recharging and casting again, had Dori come down to the Forge and he worked on it for frick, dunno—”

“Three entire hours,” the Tevinter complained. “Without so much as an explanation, just ‘oi Dori, come cast n’ some pish for me, yeah?’”

“It was for Inky!” Sera defended.

“And if I had known that…I would have still complained but at least had the knowledge of just how very whiny it all is in the scheme of things. I much prefer being ashamed of myself in the moment, darling, you know this. I don’t do second-hand anything—clothing or emotions.”

Sera snorted, shaking her head, “Yeah yeah—anyway, Dori casted on it real hard for three entire hours and the Fire Rune started cracking. We had him stop and uh…I tested it after that, castin’ real gentle to watch how much more the Fire Rune could withstand…which, we now know is dangerous. I’ll be keeping track of how sealing Rifts accelerates damage done to the Runestones and get it down to an exact measure like—if you can seal seven Shade-level Rifts as opposed to three Pride level Rifts before you gotta replace your stones, shite like that, so if you ever end up in a bad area where there’s a lot of ‘em you’ll be able to judge when you need to take that friggin thing off until you can get to replacement stones ‘cause it will blow up direct in your hand and it’s a real bitch we’re definitely trying to avoid—“

“Sera!” Eleanor cried out alarmed, overlapping Marehis’s shocked, “Da’vehnan!” the Elf woman was only a second behind Cassandra who had already reached out to take Sera’s own gloved wrist in hand—the girl still wore the casting gloves Krem had fashioned for her, and the Seeker had wondered to why she had taken to wearing them in the wrong order—the left glove on her right hand, right on her left, which was doable so long as she wore them backward—so the space the Lieutenant had left open on the heel of her hand to make contact with Eleanor’s Mark was on the back side of her hand instead of exposing the flesh of her palm as intended. Cassandra peeled back the material covering Sera’s right palm to reveal milky white, shimmering scarred flesh on the heel of her hand where raw lyrium had poured out of a broken runestone onto her skin.

“Sera, that was so dangerous,” Cassandra found her voice to rasp reprimand.
“Well duh! That’s why I had to test it for myself—wasn’t just gonna let Inky figure that out all on her own! We was worried it’d do something like that so we had to test how much magic could get poured through one of those bad boys before they popped, I’d rather that happenin’ on my hand in Skyhold with Widdle and Elan on stand by.”

“Sera Elizabeth Seraton,” Dorian…for all he’d just made up the entirety of Sera’s middle and last names…scathed, “you should have explained to me what you were trying to do! I would have done it, like all endeavors with my hands—to completion! I did not leave you to your work so you could maim yourself, child!”

“Certainly,” Madam de Fer rasped, “Sera…I do wish you had come to me before, but certainly once you were magically injured—Elan is knowledgeable but—“ the Enchanter swallowed, drawing nearer to press her lips against Sera’s ear for a second time that day, whispering in tones of fierce intonation, Sera grimacing before nodding, and whatever she’d confirmed sent the Human woman clenching her eyes shut in what looked like a moment of sympathetic devastation and she-well. She pressed a kiss to the side of Sera’s head before whispering one thing more, patting the girl on the shoulder before she pulled away and Cassandra was uncertain just what had transpired but Marehis had obviously heard, Solas as well—the man looked equal parts astounded and grateful and Marehis mouthed a silent ‘thank you’ to her friend.

“Sissy,” Eleanor squeaked out, taking Sera’s hand, “I’m so sorry you got hurt, it…it had to be so scary, does it hurt still?”

“Nothing to worry about Ink,” which was not a definitive ‘no’, “‘sides…we’re kind of twinsies now,” the girl offered like that was some comfort, holding up her hand. Cassandra supposed the burns on their hands mirrored each other. “That’s kinda cool, innit?”

Eleanor sniffled, pressing a sweet kiss to the scar on Sera’s palm, “Thank you, Ser’.” “’course, El’. M’ the big sister—s’my job to look out for you,” Sera nodded, pulling the younger girl in for a fierce hug. “We’ll keep an eye on your Runestones and replace ‘em as needed.
Dagna made a few last minute changes to it—we started out with just a glove that’d cover your palm but um…just in case your Mark got spready again,” Sera reached out to rap her knuckles against the bark of the tree they were gathered under, “we wanted it to be a bit more sleeved and the magic there is all done with lyrium thread which…we got by wingin’ the test glove’s rune sewing but cripes is Krem’s papa a ruddy genius with a needle and thread. Dagna filled him in on what we were doing and asked if he’d do his thing to the final design of the glove itself, he drew up the final draft, put the final product together. He found this fabric that’s like amazingly thin so it’s not too thick once layered, and still super breathable n’ pish—it’s a similar set up to the hand part, there’s inside runes direct against your skin, a transitional layer, and then the Elfy magic is in the thread on the outside. This’ll hopefully help keep it from um, hurting so bad—and in theory it’ll pull and guide the burn down to the Runestone. At least the painful part, not the physical spread.”

“Sera, you- you and Dagna and papa are geniuses!” Eleanor enthused, “gosh it’s just- it’s beautiful and my Mark doesn’t hurt badly at all! And I think it’s cute you picked Spirit runes, ‘cause Spirit’s my favorite!”

Sera giggled, smiling like she found that precious but, “Well yeah Ink, and being all Spirit Runey help boost barriers you cast and barriers cast on you—at least we’re pretty sure it will.”

“Really?!” Eleanor asked excitedly, “Sera! That’s the best! You’re the best! You’re getting so much hugs today! And Sera’s boss of dinner tonight! No cooking for her, but she’s in charge of picking! And I’m kissing her, and Dagna, and Papa’classi—so Cremisius you better get cool with that.”

“Already there babe, they definitely deserve it,” the Lieutenant assured, “Seriously Sera. You’re incredible, you know that?”

Sera groaned at the compliment, blushing fiercely, but, “…thanks Kremmy-boy.”

“You did damn good Imekari,” the Iron Bull commended Sera, clapping her on the shoulder. “Baking you a damn cake. Or cookies—whatever the fuck, you’re getting dessert.”

Sera deserved…oh Sera deserved everything in life, Cassandra felt that with most certainty even before she’d done such a thing for Eleanor but-

She could prank Skyhold to her heart’s content for all Cassandra felt now. She’d never truly do substantial, unjust harm to anyone and if there were any who had a problem with it, they would be free to bring their complaints directly to Cassandra who was more than willing to duel them over it, Nevarran style—which meant naked, at dawn, with axes.

Sera clutched Eleanor’s hand tightly as they made their way through the wilderness to the Rift, the girl softly reporting her glove’s progress to her—keeping Sera up to date with how it warmed and vibrated, though their movement within their cloth confines was mutedly audible to Cassandra as they neared the Rift—there was a rattling sound from the stones knocking each other through the fabric as the Rift overhead began producing demons for them to fight.

And Eleanor’s barrier felt ever stronger as it coasted over Cassandra. Oh, Maker bless her girls, endlessly, endlessly, amen.

Cassandra was almost drunk with relief as the Rift crackled closed, Eleanor snapping it shut and taking a moment to catch her breath, fanning herself a bit before she licked parched lips to announce,

“It freaking worked!”

“Wait shit, seriously?!” Sera checked as if uncertain, “Ink, you’re…you’re not lyin’ right? Solas?”

“The Inquisitor speaks truth, da’vehnan—while it’s still requires physical exertion to seal Rifts, the same can be said of any spell, Rift Sealing is merely an extreme, that is why her heart made that sound—she’s well, unharmed, and the magical experience was wholly painless as you intended.”

Sera stared at the man, wholly silent, as if she were still trying to comprehend what he’d said.

And then she began giggling.

“Frick yes, Inky!” she declared, arms overhead as she cheered, “I’m a genius!”
Inky herself about different things—pain levels, where exactly the pain was, or did it resound across her magic, and if so, how far? But Ellie got all blushy and dumb brave-pride or whatever had her insisting it wasn’t anything for Dagna to worry about, she could ‘deal’, she as ‘fine’! She hadn’t wanted to make the Arcanist feel badly for her…and Dagna hadn’t wanted to outright say ‘Oi! I’m only asking because I need straightforward answers because I’m trying to fix this for you!’ because, what if it didn’t work? Widdle hadn’t wanted to get her hopes up. But once she realized Sera was on to it too, wanting to help find a solution, boom! Inky was easier to get answers out of, ’cause Sera already knew how shite it all was, and um…well Krem kept Ink’s confidence good, but he knew Sera’d never use anything he ever said about Ellie for his girlfriend’s harm, he could trust her, so together they managed to get enough data for figuring out how to make this shit work. When Krem asked, Ellie was always open and honest about pain levels, and when Sera didn’t focus her questions so much on how much the Mark hurt but how far it could hurt in relation to a Rift, she got forthrightness! They were able to cobble together all the variables Dagna needed to take into consideration and Lace kept their correspondence on the matter tip top private once Sera and Lace had to leave Skyhold with the Heralds party to head for Orlais, and they’d spent their first week there handlin’ those ruddy Freemen and scouting Rifts, Lace had been a friggin’ lifesaver—Sera’d been measuring distances from Rifts to places Inky’d be out of range, so her Mark wouldn’t be so ‘ouch’ all the time when they wasn’t Rift hunting. It was Lacey who was marking trees at the outer limits where Ink’s Mark would start to react to nearby Rifts. However the hell Sera ended up with two, perfect, freckly, brilliant girlfriends, she wasn’t sure but she sure as hell wasn’t questioning it.

Really…really wasn’t questioning it. Shite, Lace was so pretty. And sleepy—poor babe, she looked exhausted when their party met up with her n’ her scouts near where Red Templars had set up camp—stopped along the road to rest and pish before carting Red Lyrium from wherever to wherever.

“Inquisitor,” Lace greeted softly, smiling to Ink as they approached, “I’m glad you could make it.”

“Uh-huh, hold please,” Ellie stopped her, and uh…well, just walked right up to Lace and hugged her real tight, awe. Teetness was blushy as she hugged Inky back, and the Human girl pulled way to press an appreciative kiss to the Dwarf woman’s forehead before…huh. Ink had grabbed what Lace left marking the tree for them—that said they were in range of a Rift…oh! “I was wondering where your Red Jenny bracelet went—thanks for helping Sera and Dagna,” Ellie thanked her quietly, taking the Dwarf woman’s hand and sliding the woven bracelet back on, tightening it securely once it was in place.

“Of course,” Lace nodded, awe, sweet thing! She was permanently red, “Gosh, I’m just glad um…its working, I hope?” she wondered, looking to the friggin sweet-ass finished product! Krem’s! Papa! Was! The! Best!

“It’s working great!” Inky assured. Cripes! Another hug—on Sera, not from Inky. Sera’d been getting random hugs from all over—Mare and ‘sandra, the mom squad had squeezed her breathless when Ink sealed the Rift no problem and no magic ouches to speak of, the women peppering her with kisses and praise like friggin’! Weirdos! And then Madam de Fer, she hadn’t gotten all scary huggy again, but she’d rested a hand on Sera’s shoulder and commended her ‘work’. And Dori’d kissed her on the cheek. And Bull’d did that thing where he palms your whole ass head in his hand and its warm and comforting and you feel stupid safe for all the action implies he could crush your head in a single hand. Mm, it was Kremmy-boy now, Sera realized. The Tevinter man had come up behind her and wrapped his arms around her shoulders, his face buried against her neck as he mumbled, “You’re the best.” Shite! Ugh. Krem was…she’d felt weirdy when he said she was his best friend. Mostly ‘cause she didn’t trust blokes much. Most of the time they was raised to go after one thing, and that was definitely not a thing she ever wanted to give ‘em. Dori and her were friends, but like, he definitely didn’t want anything like that from her, and there was always this kind of distance? They could hug and shite, and she trusted him to help her if she needed it but there was still just some level of departure in it, neither of their worlds would end if they woke up to a day that lacked each other’s presence even in passing thought—it was nice when they was together, they always picked right back up, but there wasn’t any real ‘ouch’ to being apart. But she thought about Inky every day, hated being separated from her—that was a big nope now, she was never going on mission without Inky ever ever again! And…well she could deal with being away from Kremmy-boy but she…missed him when they were. And she thought about him, like seeing something and instantly thinking ‘Krem’d be friggin excited to draw that!’ or eatin’ something and thinking it might be something he’d enjoy ‘cause he likes spicy food, or trying to remember how something went down ‘cause it was funny and he’d laugh when she told him about it. He always made her feel safe. Kind of how Cullen did, shite that bloke was lovey, she hadn’t even…it hadn’t crossed her mind that Inky loving her might make the adults in her life look at that and say ‘ahh, they’re sisters? I guess I’ve got a second child now’. There was something in her that said when people were lovey at her, it had to somehow be a lie or a mistake. They didn’t know what they was talking about. But Cullen…well he wrote Sera just about every day when she headed for the Emerald Graves, making sure she was okay and just…shite, he’d read reports, and write her to say how proud he was! Like, gross! That made her feel proud of herself and that was just! She didn’t know what to do with that! She was used to trying so hard for the barest bit of recognition with Lady, build herself up and think ‘okay, this is it, this is the day I finally managed to do everything the way Lady wants it done and she’ll have to at least say something’ and…nothing. Usually just when she thought she got it right, she got the cane and Lady screaming at her over some dumb thing she’d managed to peg as Sera’s fault. Now she wasn’t even trying, she was just…being alive? Seeing shite that she could do and doing it to help Inky. And she got hugs and kisses and ‘I’m so proud of you’s. Ugh!

It all made her feel very squirmy! And she hated it! And she loved it and never wanted it to stop! Krem was her best friend too! And Cullen was- was freaking the first person she could think of she’d ever want to consider a ‘da’. Maybe…maybe Solas too. ‘cept he hurt Mare. And Inky. So she was pretty sure she’d die mad at him, even though she loved him, and that was dumb. Could you be mad at someone and love them? Inky seemed to do it, sort of, but she wasn’t good at holding on to anger, once she got a reason to drop it, she did, boom, just like that, whatever anger she’d been carrying around thunted to the floor abandoned. She’d been just festering with resentment over Kirkwall, how everyone turned so hard on Apostates, Ava’s murder, and when she found the person responsible…there’d been blame, then balm, the minute she learned to accept it, she did and thunk moved on. And Solas had done a lot of hurting, she definitely…there was a level Sera was pretty sure she’d never fully trust him with everything ever again, but she could trust him to, ironically enough, always do right by Inky.

Ugh! Boys was dumb and confusing! She was pretty sure that was why she liked girls so much—at least when they did evil they was pretty and smelled nice while doing it!

Mmm, Lacey smelled nice when they was all done fightin’ for the day, little bit disappointing but kind of promising? The first of the correspondence they was able to intercept from the Red Lyrium traders was a letter that told them they wasn’t getting it from the Deep Roads. They returned to camp and Inky was orchestrating everyone in camp coming together to get dinner ready while sending Sera and Lace off to nap or ‘whatever’. Lace was…kind of sweaty? But like, in a good way, where she just smelled like her, and forest and earth, barest bit of flowery pish that was in her shampoo and the deodorant stuff she put under her arms and ‘round her bits—kept ‘em from chaffing, under her tits or between her thighs. She’d been pinky from head to toe when Sera’d caught her dressing for the day back in Skyhold, rubbing translucent, flowery balm on places other than where she’d only seen Viv put under her arms while drily suggesting Sera do them all a favor and do the same.

“You okay, Teetness?” Sera checked, cripes the Dwarf woman was really sleepy, laying against Sera, head against her chest as she…well, her breathing had been evening out, like she was falling asleep and then she’d jerk, like she was trying to stay awake.

Was tickly—Lacey’s hair against Sera’s neck as she nodded. “Just thinking.”
“In general? Or is it somethin’ you um…wanna talk about?” Sera asked, little nervous. Only a little. Thinking sometimes meant the other shoe was droppin’ and it was time to realize Sera was…well, Sera, so why the hell was someone as amazin’ as Lace wastin’ her time with someone like her?

Lacey’s legs shifted, separated as the Dwarf woman sat back and up, straddlin’ Sera’s tummy as she pushed up, hands on her shoulders lookin’…shite, lookin’ real nervous. Oh crap. Oh crap crap crap.

“I want you and Dagna to meet my parents.”

The frig?

“Um…wh- um…huh?” Sera…what was happening? Her brain felt like…the way it did when Solas use to try blabin’ at her in Elfy. Throwin’ foreign words at her that her brain wanted to translate but couldn’t quite…but almost? What?! She understood the words, she thought, on an individual level but not…not all strung together like that. The fuck did that even mean?!

“My parents have been freaking out since Haven, you know? They’re safe where they are and I won’t let them come around Skyhold to see me just…just in case. But they really want to see me, so…” she took a deep breath, and sighed, “So I’m taking some time off next time we’re back in Ferelden, just like, a day or so to detour and see my parents and- and I want you to come with me. Dagna too. They’re um…they really wanna meet you guys and I dunno, I-“ cripes, she was blushing real hard, gaze down like she was embarrassed to look Sera in the eye, “I really want them to meet you too.”

“Well uh…” shite. Okay. So…Lace wasn’t breaking up with her, she didn’t think? “I- erm, I can’t ruddy speak for Widdle but um…” shite! What did this even mean?! She loved Lace and her parents sounded sweet, and there was a level she kind of wanted to thank them for friggin’ making Lace. So. “I…yeah.”

“Yes?” Lace asked, smiling with timid relief as she met Sera’s eye, “Really?”

“S-sure Lacey. Yeah. I’d…I’m cool with meeting yer er…parents.”

Yup! Super cool with it! Lace leaned forward, thighs a little squeezy around Sera’s ribcage as she pressed a real nice kiss to Sera’s lips, “Oh my gosh you’re the best! You’re the best!”

Oh frig, Lace was the best, friggin’…Sera was warm and tingly, fingers itchin to get someplace on Lace to return the favor when the Dwarf woman sort of grinded against her a bit, like she was just getting’ comfy where she was sittin and kissin’ Sera real deep, the way left the Elf girl breathless and dazed before her lips was travelin’ down her neck, Sera’s heart thumping in her chest as the woman started sliding—pushing herself back, this real slow rock of her hips as she drew them backward along Sera, clever little fingers undoing the buttons of her sleep top to expose more skin to press warm lips to until her hips were over Sera’s, rockin’ her hips in this way that caught the seam of her sleep bottoms, her underthings right up against her in the best way, like scratchin’ a satisfying itch. It was dumb, felt almost embarrassin’ how- how the woman’s rapt attention, a hand on one breast, lips on the other, clothing seams rubbing her, getting her excited like she was a ruddy teeny-bopper all over again and this was the first time she ever figured out she had somethin’ goin’ on down there, bundle of nerves it felt good to rub on.

Also liked getting er, other things. Lace…might’ve had herself a right snack before dinner, Sera screechin’ as quietly as she could because she only just remembered they was in camp! In a cot she’d curl up next to ‘sandra and Mare and Inky in! With ruddy a whole ass Qunari cooking dinner just outside who could definitely hear everything they was up to and- and-

If Solas and Mare heard um…anything…she…she was kind of cool if the crippling embarrassment decided to kill her.

But uh…huh.

They fell asleep for a bit, Lace finally drifting off now that she’d gotten her question off of her chest, didn’t wake until…well Sera wasn’t’ real sure what time it was, but she could smell dinner real strong now, like everything had cooked together real good and it was getting about that time to start doling out portions but there wasn’t a whole bunch of people around to serve.

“…hey Thom, where’s uh…everyone?” Sera asked as she and Lace made their way from the tent—somethin’ smelled right good and her stomach was defiantly saying it was time for dinner. 'cept everyone was out. Like. Everyone. Just Thom sat around the fire, stoking it to keep it burnin’ under the pot the Iron Bull had been laboring over before Sera and Lace laid down, there was a pan under the pot now, the pot was sittin’ on top of it on the grate over the fire and it smelled like something was baking.

“Uhh…” Thom looked between Lace and Sera before he shrugged, “They’ll be back in soon.”

“From where?” Sera asked.

“Quick errand—they touched base, everyone’s safe. Here,” Thom said, offering up a bowl that had been at his feet, had a little bit of left-over cookie dough in it, “Ellie-girl says you and Miss Lace are to have first crack at licking the bowl.”

Freaking- they went off without her! “I don’t want cookie-dough! I wanna know what the frick is up!”

“Don’t sweat it Ser’,” Lace said. Lace! She’s supposed to be on Sera’s side! She was already dippin’ a finger into the bowl she’d accepted from Thom, “Mmm, seriously—you’ve gotta try this.”

There was the sound of footfalls on the path south of camp, and Sera could hear the lilt of Inky and Dori talkin’ with each other, Kremmy-boy laughing. What the fuck!

“Oh!” Inky chirped when she and her party made their way to camp, “Sera! You’re awake,” she smiled.

“Sorry Inquisitor,” Lace said, “I did my best to keep her distracted.”

Dis…distracted?

“Did you ask um…” Inky seemed real excited, smiley as she came right up to Lacey and took her hand, bouncing a bit.

“Yay! Oh my gosh oh my gosh oh my gosh! You’re going to have so much fun!” Ellie enthused, “Just send the time off request right to me and I’ll sign off on it, okay chica?”

“Thanks honey,” Lace said, poppin’ up on her toes a bit to kiss Inky on the cheek. She… awe. Sera felt a little—well she was confused as shit at what was goin’ on!—but she felt a little bad Lace had been so nervous to ask her about coming to see her parents she’d had to confide in Inky over it, like she was scared Sera’d react bad or something. But she was also…dunno, it made her feel comfy warm all over that her Lacey loved and trusted Inky so much she felt comfortable going to her and um, that Inky’d had faith in Sera when Lace was nervous the Elf girl might not like being asked something like that.

It was kind of…Sera wasn’t sure how to feel about it. sometimes people made a big deal about introducing their girlfriends or whatever to their parents, ‘cause they only did that if they was feelin’ serious about their relationship, like it was something they were going to be keeping for permanent so their parents might well get use to them comin’ around. That kind of scared her, a little in that…well she’d never had a relationship that felt for permanent. Only relationship of any kind she’d ever had was with Lady, and she’d prayed for that to end like crazy. Everything else since then? Sera’d had girlfriends, but it was always something that lasted maybe a week or was just a ‘when we see each other we know we’re down to have a drink and bang’. Everything after Lady was temporary because…anything more than that terrified Sera shiteless. Just- she’d thought she’d die in Lady’s house, that her whole entire life for forever was going to be dictated by her, for permanent. The Friends of Red Jenny appealed because…it was a mix of havin’ a name slapped on you without any permanence to the connections you made—she only interacted with people in spurts, or never at all, just having vague impressions of people she’d never meet, helping her piss off some noble prick who deserved it, no strings attached. Actual friendships hadn’t been…the Inquisition, Inky was the first person she ever felt like she was actually her friend. She hadn’t really understood what the word meant until her. And then Friend became Sister and that…people was sisters forever. For permanent. Just like people became moms and dads for permanent.

And when she thought about Dagna and Lace…for permanent didn’t scare her anymore.

There was arms around Sera’s middle then, a hat brim bending against her ribcage as Cole kind of tackle-hugged her, humming contentedly. “It doesn’t and it’s wonderful,” he breathed, “I’m sorry you were worried—you don’t have to be. We were all safe, no one is hurt. I had an idea and it was helpful! I helped!” he announced, real happy about it.

“You’re always helpful, Cuddly, that’s kind of your whole thing,” Sera said, hugging the Spirit back, rubbing circles between his shoulder blades. He’d been…a little scary with his help yesterday but hey, Sera wasn’t about to complain. Friggin’ dirtbags deserved it, she only wished she could’ve helped.

“I’m sorry I scared you,” Cole said softly, and then he pulled back, looking eager to please as he announced, “Lace’s scouts found more Red Lyrium movement and I thought I could go! I could sneak® and get the things Cullen needs, the words on paper that prove Samson’s plot. The others agreed I could try, but not without them waiting nearby as back up in case I got into trouble. They wanted me to be safe! I scared them yesterday and they still want me to be safe.” Cripes! He was a little teary over it!

“Oh, buddy, c’mon,” Krem said, coming to join them, clapping a hand to Cole’s shoulder, “who among us hasn’t dropped into camp covered in the blood of our enemies? Why do you think El makes everyone take so many baths?”

“Bathing is nice even when there isn’t blood,” Cole said. “My body likes being clean.”

“We’ll wash up real nice after dinner then,” Kremmy-boy promised, massaging his shoulder a bit, “clean, comfortable pajamas, weather’s supposed to be nice tonight—might be good for a little more stargazing.”

“Mmm,” the Spirit hummed—Sera was excited at the idea and her magic…cripes! Inky and their magics was real excited in the bond, and the little bit of the bond she could feel Solas in was warm too, so, Spirit had a bit of joint excitement vibing around him, making him smile as he nodded. Magic was friggin’ wild, the bond was even wilder.

Huh. She kind of wondered…the bond with Inky was the strongest one she had—magically. Probably non-magically too but that wasn’t the point! Sera felt…she wasn’t sure. Was she shite at bondness? She couldn’t really…she tried, like, all the time to get a read on Ink, but she only really felt things from Ellie when there was big things emanating from her in the bond, stuff so strong that anyone who had a bond with her could feel it, probably, without even wanting to. She wasn’t sure she was doing it right—Solas could check on Inky anytime! Well, within like, a certain distance or whatever the frig. And distance…shite, Sera hadn’t slept her first night on the road after-

She might have had a panic attack. Her and Lace had gotten ahead of Thom and his guys, scouting ahead when Sera and Ink stepped too far away from each other for the bond. When Inky was out of range, her magic sort of panicked and made her panic too because frick! They couldn’t really check on the Human girl to begin with, but they could, at the very least, feel that she was there! When she slipped off…shite. Sera’s magic got the impression it meant the girl was dead or something which didn’t make any ruddy sense and oh Maker, shite shite shite, they wasn’t going into dangerous territory so that meant either they walked right into some Orlesian pricks traps or…or Inky…

She’d seemed fine. Not happy to see Sera go but happy in general. But people…didn’t always seem their worst when they was at it. and maybe they left her alone again. Or maybe it was bad enough she didn’t care who was around as long as-Anyway, Sera’d panicked big time and Lace hadn’t known what was going on, it was kind of hazy just one minute she was close to blacking out and the next Lace was holdin’ her real tight and breathin’ the way Sera was supposed to when she was panicking real bad, her chest movin’ against Sera’s sort of got her in the right rhythm, the Dwarf woman’s hand in her hair as she held onto her and whispered assurance, groundy things, “Your name is Sera Jones, you are in Orlais with me, your girlfriend, Lace Harding. You’re sitting on the ground, it’s uh…dirt. Kind of muddy, kind of not? It’s soft whatever it is, it’s giving under your knees a little, right? You feel that honey? And it’s drizzling out a little, the rain is cool and the air is warm. The wind is blowing. We’re safe. I love you. Your name is Sera Jones…” and repeat.

And they’d made camp there—started with just, getting out of the rain and then Sera’d been so zonked, shite. She hadn’t slept but she was just exhausted, tired and quiet. Wasn’t until morning she realized- shite! She hadn’t said a damn word! Not a single one since before her freak out and Lace had to be just-! Confused! And scared! And tired of Sera’s shite! She was gone!

And…and then she wasn’t. “Hey honey-locks,” Lace’s voice was at her back, hand on her shoulder rubbing circles, comfort that also worked to get her attention if she could give it, “I made some breakfast if you’re hungry. Brought it with me, some fresh water too—the rain’s all stopped if you want some fresh air. Do whatever you feel like, if there’s anything I can do I’m right here,” she said, dropping a kiss to Sera’s temple. “Um…mail came, Inquisition birds found us in all this mess,” she giggled, “Thom and his men are okay—caught up with us last night and I said you weren’t feeling well so we’re holding our position. They secured the area for us before I sent them on ahead, we’ll catch up with them once you’re feeling better, okay? No rush. I’ve got some reports I’ll be looking over unless you need anything—Ellie-bug sent you something, I’ll leave it right here,” she said arm coming around to place the little folded up bit of parchment, sealed on itself, just beside Sera’s face, “unless um…if you’re tired and you’re comfortable with it, I can read it to you if you want?”

Sera sat up, taken Lace’s hand and just held it for a bit, shifting to sit in her lap, pretty Dwarf smiling up into her face, “Mmm, there’s my pretty girl,” she said, hand resting on Sera’s cheek, “There’s my Sera. Hi,” she’d pressed a sweet little kiss to the tip of Sera’s nose.

“I’m sor-“

Sweeter kiss to her lips. “Missed your voice,” she sighed, real happy-like, “Don’t be sorry—there’s nothing to be sorry for,” Lace insisted. “Sweetheart…you were sick. I’m not going to be mad at you for getting sick—mentally, physically, or any other ‘ly’ out there. Gosh um. Did I…did I do it right? I tried to do everything Elan and the- the books said, the only thing I didn’t do is give you potion but you- you’ve got a bunch in your bag, different ones, I think some of them are for Ellie? You nodded when I showed you one of them, um, the purply-blue potion in the square bottle? But you wouldn’t take it and I- I’m not sure if I’m supposed to…if that’s like, part of it? You not wanting to take it in the moment but you need someone to make sure you do? Or if it’s sometimes you need it, sometimes it’s best to let it ride out on its own sort of thing. We…should probably go over that sometime.”

Yeah, shite she- she’d never really sat Lace or Dagna down and said ‘hey, I’m seeing a crazy person Healer and she gave me potion to chill me the fuck out’ but…she wasn’t sure, she felt weird giving her girlfriends a list of instructions on what to do if she had a panic attack, felt like bossin’ them or putting an inconvenience on the-

Lace…had known what to do.

Lacey had…she’d…

I tried to do everything Elan and the books said.

“Elan talked to you about me?”

Hadn’t asked cuz she was mad or something. But Lace gasped and launched into a panicky, “Oh god! Not about you, she- I’m not sure if you’re seeing her or Adan or anyone really—I didn’t ask if you were her patient but the first words out of her mouth were ‘I can’t confirm or deny who my patients are’ so if- if you are seeing her she’s mum-quiet about it. Gosh no I- I went and um…consulted with her, for her medical opinion on how to best um, be able to help if I’m with a partner who has anxiety. Dagna and me, we- oh gosh- oh crap!” Lace was right worried, frick, quick to scramble for, “ I mean- it was all my idea I swear, I’m so sorry, please don’t be mad at her! It wasn’t intentionally going behind your back, it’s just…we- we know, you know? Sort of like…I’m sure if Krem hung around Ellie enough he’d put a thing or two together and figure out she’s got asthma. We…um. It wasn’t mean, we weren’t gossiping or talking badly about you, just, I noticed things and I- I read everything I could find about it in Skyhold’s library but there’s not like, a whole lot of mental health books? And the few that there are had all this information in it and I wasn’t sure what really works or what applies, or-gosh I dunno, some of it went over my head when I read it but that’s just, you know, sometimes I do better hearing things. I was going to Elan to parcel though everything I read and see if she could point me in the right direction on how to help you—m- my partner,” she clarified she’d not used like, Sera’s name or whatever, “—if you needed it, what to do if you had a really bad panic attack or something, and I told Dagna I was going to because…well if- if she’d noticed those things too and was worried and didn’t know what to do like I was um, I just wanted to make sure she knew she could come with me. Oh crap, I’m- Sera I’m so sorry if—"

Sera returned the favor, cuttin’ her off with a kiss, more salty than sweet cuz piss, she was bein’ a cry baby! But Lace, shite, “You didn’t do nothin’ wrong,” Sera assured, Dwarf woman relaxing against her, relieved. Shite, Sera was the one with anxiety? Crap, poor Lace’d gotten all worked up. “I wasn’t accusin’ you of nothing I just- Lace! You…you went to someone for me! And you read up on shite and you- I dunno. Just… I didn’t think…I wasn’t sure what you’n’Dagna would do if you knew and I um…well I wasn’t expectin’ you’d want to get all learned up on it like that for me.”

“Well why…why wouldn’t we?” Lace asked, confused. “it’s not any different than you writing neater and bigger for me, or building Dagna models of her plans, things she can interact with on a physical level while she figures them out in that brilliant brain of hers.” Well yeah, Dagna was…she called it bein’ a ‘tactile learner’, she couldn’t do the whole ‘processing information’ thing without somethin’ physical, either moving around herself or having something she could put her hands on and figure out how it’s supposed to work and Lace has friggin’ dyslexia or whatever the frig Inky called i-

And…Sera’d seen Dagna be grabby with Ink’s Mark, she couldn’t really figure out what little was possible of figuring out without seeing it up close and touching it. Bull’d said something about his Ben-Hessrath people workin’ with people who was kinesthetic learners, putting them in fields that suited movement and hands on experience. Dagna’s field involved a lot of readin’ which usually meant sitting but Sera’d talked it over with Josie sweets and the woman agreed Sera could um…if she could figure out how to and do it without leaving the books damaged, she could unsew a few pages from their binding—sort of surgically remove littler chunks of big tomes that Dagna needed to read with the intent to sew them back in once she was done, so the Dwarf woman could pace and read without risking droppin’ a huge ass book on herself or tireing out her arms. And Sera was good at buildin’, little things, mechanical things that made her magic sing—Dagna’d do her best to describe her ideas and Sera’d come up with physical representations of those ideas, either in something purely symbolic or something in prototype form like with Ink’s runestone bracer. And Sera’d seen Lace…not like, crazy struggle, but it always took her a minute to parcel out shite she read—she double checked everything she read, reading and re-reading before moving on whatever it said. Sera’d asked her about it once and she’d blushed and admitted sometimes…she said she was ‘kind of dumb’, and that wasn’t freaking okay! Lace said that sometimes her brain would just put words together weird and she’d mix them up with other words, and letters could get wonky when she looked at them—which was crazy, Lace called it, ‘cuz words was however they got written down, right? Sera’d thought it was something Ink might have heard about before and she threw out dyslexia which…Sera read up on. Started sending Lace letters in bigger, block-i-er writing instead of curvy writing, did her best to write real neat instead of just, shite! Sloppin’ words on the page and sending them headlong to the poor woman, crap! Her earlier letters had to be garbage to try and read!

Oh. Oh she got it then. She’d just been- she liked them! Loved them, Dagna and Lace and if…if they was having a problem, she wanted to help them. So…they um. Felt the same way.

“You okay, Ser’? Y-you’re kind of spacing…crap um, hey—everything’s okay, your name is-“

“Sera Jones and I’m safe, in a tent, with one of the two most amazing girlfriends in the entire freaking world.” Sera calmly interrupted her, pressin’ a kiss to her forehead. “You said there was breakfast? Mail from Inky?”
“Uh-huh,” Lace said, “here,” she picked up one of the bowls she’d left sittin’ by Sera’s knees, and handed it to her, “gosh you haven’t eaten since yesterday morning—so eat up, okay? If you need seconds, just say the word. I um…you want me to read you your mail? Your poor baby blues look pretty um—pretty,” she insisted, “but pretty tired, kind of achey.”

Yeah they was, she’d sort of…had she blinked at all last night? Dry and achey as shite, she was tired, sort of felt like she’d fall asleep as soon as her tummy was full and she knew Ink was okay—mail from her direct sounded like ‘okay’ but she’d want to hear it to make sure, “You’d um, be up for that?”

“Of course!” Lacey insisted, taking the letter up and slipping her thumb under the seal before resting against Sera a bit more comfortably as Sera set her bowl down—oatmeal, she carefully spooned into her mouth without droppin’ any on the girlfriend who cleared her throat and carefully said, “Hi!” giggled a bit, smiling probably because she knew Ink’d be super cheery saying hi to Sera, shite it was just cute! “I…miss you so much!...I love you!...I love your…face? Yeah—she said she loves your face! And um…I love your whole…exis…existence! Please be safe! Awe,” Lace pouted a bit like she saw something sweet, “And have lots of fun with Lace!...And write me about- oh. And write me all about everything—gosh I miss you! uh…” she squinted at the page some more, “that’s it, she didn’t sign off or anything, but the inside and back side is written in her hand—from Ellie to sissy—so,” she shrugged, yeah, it was definitely a letter from Ink, could’ve sent it without any outright indicators it was pretty obvious all on its own.

Wait. Frick…where had that all started? Oh! Sera was shite at the bond! And it sucked big time when Ink stepped out of range! That…had to be pretty hard on Solas—he knew she was safe on an intellectual level but his magic experienced something that felt like he was going off somewhere Ellie and Sera and Marehis didn’t exist, and he…probably didn’t like that very much given that um, people dying was them existing someplace you couldn’t reach them. Maybe she’d write him more or somethin’, when he was in the Hinterlands again. Ink’d been more forgivey but…she was the Inquisitor, and Solas had committed crimes he was payin’ for so Sera wasn’t sure if she’d be backing off on Solas’s punishment until Cory-face was dead. But at least…ugh. Solas was like, friggin’ ancient. He’d had magic for forever, and she’d had yeast infections longer than she’d had her magic wokey. But Inky! She could feel Sera like crazy it seemed—she’d come runnin’ the other night when she felt Sera all scared and sad, talkin’ to ‘sandra about that shite mansion place, announced she knew Sera already felt better by the time she got to be all huggy. Sera couldn’t even- shite! She’d done fuck-all when the Freemen tried snatchin’ Ellie! and she’d tried. She wasn’t real big on playin’ slappy games with Inky, didn’t really care for doing something where the point was to slap the crap out of the other players poor little hands. But she’d wanted to see if she could feel it in the bond, feel the sting of her own slaps on Inky’s skin. And nothing! It was shite! Was she just bad at it? She couldn’t really use the bond to do shit—feel or find Inky or…Solas said she and Mare’ had a bond but her magic didn’t much feel like it did. Blah! All she could do is sit around and wait for little waves of big feeling from the Human girl, and friggin’ get the freak out of her disappearing out of range. It was dumb!

Oh. Inky stepping out of range…sucked…but only if Sera realized it was happenin’. ‘I tried to keep her distracted’ Lace had said—friggin! “So someone freaking explain why come I wasn’t with you lot Red-Lyrium Letter hunting!!” Sera snapped as they sat down to dinner—Bull made this real thick stew Sera liked, warm gravy and carrots, potatoes, chunks of Druffalo beef, just yum! Lots of buttery toast- they wasn’t allowed to distract her anymore! She dunked a slice of toast in her bowl of stew and let it sit there while she picked a person to glare at…not Lace, not Inky, not ‘sandra, not Kremmy-boy—Solas! Yeah! She wouldn’t feel real bad glaring at him, and he was like, mega guilty of all sorts of pish so he should be easy peasy to guilt into talking!

“Ellie did not wish to drag you out into the fray again, we all feel you rather deserve to have some time off and,” he cleared his throat, “be with your girlfriend. So, Cole sent miss Lace Ellie’s orders to keep you occupied while we headed out, sans Thom, to stay and guard you while… maintaining your privacy, should you need it.”
Oh, piss, “Cuddly, you’re okay, right?” Sera checked. The Spirit didn’t look injured or anything.

“I’m not!” he said…like assurance? Oh he was answering her inside words, not her outside ones, cool—guy wasn’t hurt. “I got what Cullen needs. We found paper! One confirmed Samson is purchasing the Red Lyrium, that he wanted to double his order and they…mention his armor looking strange, ‘templar’ like but not quite Chantry regulation. And then there was a third letter—the traders had a mage helping them, he tried the Red Lyrium and said it was very strong like ‘serving brandy in an ale tankard’?” Unexpected kick to it, huh? “But eventually he starts foaming at the mouth, which is apparently very bad for bodies to do. They had to lock him away in a storehouse because he was suffering Lyrium madness and they don’t it, they think it is very dangerous what they’re distributing from Sahrina Mines.”

“Papi’ll get back to us soon but…I’ve got a little hunch we’ll be going wherever Sahrina Mines is,” Inky said. “Who wants to run the books for Varric? Fifty silver it’s somewhere absolutely miserable!”

“Wherever else would you think Red Lyrium could be mined from, darling?” Viv wondered, amused. “My money is with the Inquisitor.”

“Well damn Imekari, you know I’m all about rebelling,” Bull said, “and I sure as fuck don’t wanna trek out someplace miserable—fifty says the Red Templars are mining their demon-juice from tropical paradise and they’ll all conveniently drop dead once we get there.”

Sounded like the Qunari was just wantin’ to fund Ink’s shoe collection some more. But maybe he was just tryin’ to be funny and put a positive spin on things, Inky wasn’t exactly goin’ around collecting on any of her bets. Though Sera was decently sure Dwarfy was keepin’ legit tabs on them, planned on enforcin’ his books someday to make sure everyone paid up whatever they owed each other. Frig. Might burn that bitch—Sera was either way up or way down and she couldn’t remember friggin’ which.

Okay…they was safe and yeah, it’d been kind of nice—real nice—to get a break, she…hadn’t really realized she needed one but now that she’d had it her body was a little ‘duh’. She’d been kind of…they’d taken days off since Inky and them arrived, because poor sweets needed it big time after hitting such friggin big ass Rifts. But their first break-days came with…well the Freemen had still been out there and what’s-his-tits, Fairbanks, she’d checked in with them for Ink—just…not putting them meeting off, but she wasn’t real big on the guy bombarding Ellie with allegiance talk on her days off so Sera’d been keeping him updated for her, on their progress with the Rifts and just telling him to keep considering what he wanted for his role in the Inquisition once Ellie was ready she’d invite him to talk herself. So Sera’d alternated between layin’ with Ink and runnin’ around trying to get leads on Freemen activity and Fairbank’s pish. And she definitely hadn’t been takin’ any days off once they caught up with Thom and them, she’d felt just awful they’d gone ahead of them, ended up in the Emerald Graves before her and Lace when they was the ones supposed to be scouting ahead.

So…yeah. Break was a relief, she’d gotten a big stress off her noggin’ with her and Dagna’s rune bracer working for Ink, and she’d gotten to relax with Lace and now…it was time for honey cookies! Those was the best! And star gazing was the best! And…Solas might be the best. Kind of. Maybe.

The best…whatever he was. Cullen was the best at bein’ a da though. Cause he wasn’t a lying sack of shit old Elf god. And he gave better hugs. More on him to hug, guy had muscle and pauldrons, and he just kind of made Sera feel…she was a little taller’n him but still, the Human bloke managed to make her feel small in a way that made her feel safe when he hugged her. Dumb!

But Solas was the best when it came to er…magic shite. Sera’s frustrations with it, anyway.

“Something troubles you, da’assan,” Solas said as he snapped the blanket he was spreading to lay flat on the ground—they was star gazing again tonight and Lace was finishing up some reports she needed to get to Leliana before end of day, getting it done before joining them, Kremmy-boy and Cole was bathing it up, and Mare was helping Inky with snack duty. Sera’d made sure Marehis was cool with her helpin’ Solas lug blankets and pillows out to the hillside, didn’t uh…dunno. Just kind of felt weird—she didn’t want Marehis thinking she’d ever pick baldy over her, Mare won every day of the week! Solas could friggin’ eat it!

But he could also be a decent da. So. Sera sighed, “I’m…I’m bonded to Inky, right? And M-Mare too, yeah?”

“Certainly,” Solas nodded.

“So am I just magic-stupid or something? Cause- Cause Inky can be all up in her bond with me, she could probably tell me m’ bout to be a sad bitch before I even know what I’m gonna be sad about! But I only feel stuff from the bond when like, her magic is all spilly or wh-when she ‘n me are-“ shite, her chin was quivering-

And…Cullen’s hugs might be better, but Solas’s was still okay. The guy had dropped the pillow he’d been placing on the pile and swept Sera up in a hug, “Ma’da’vehnan,” he breathed, rubbing circles on her back, “oh. I’m sorry—I did not know you and Ellie would be going separately into the field, I heard nothing of it until I joined the Inquisitor’s party on their way to the Emerald Graves. If I’d- oh, I wish I had prepared you for the event in case it should come to pass I just…I didn’t wish to overstep, and you’re usually rather inseparable. Oh, still. I apologize, da’len. I should not have sent you unprepared. I hope…I hope you were alright?”

“Well I wasn’t freaking great! My magic said Inky was dead!”

“So…it’s not broke, it’s just busy,” Sera nodded. Cripes, yeah, that made sense. If she was a little dumb baby, she’d be learning about all that shite too, need a minute to learn how to talk.

“Ellie has had her magic for far longer, it has grown with her, knows every facet of her core personality and how she thinks, it has seen the sun rise and set with her a thousand times over. So it can indulge in learning new things—she’s never had a bond with another before me, and she could not perceive me in the bond for quite some time, weeks da’len, it was not until we were on the Storm Coast meeting the Iron Bull that Ellie could even begin to lightly sense me in the bond, and even then she could not so much sense my emotions but that the bond was existent and she could send things to me through it—little flashes we’ve come to develop into a language of sorts even as she has grown in her abilities with it,” Solas said, squeezin’ Sera’s hand assuringly and-

And then he called a little icy magic into his hand, holding it up and nodding to her so she um, she copied him, held her hand up to his and his magic sort of knocked against hers in a short little pattern, like a tap, tap-tap and, cripes it was…she could cast actual spells now but this felt stupid hard! But she did it! She copied the pattern back, might’ve left Solas’s fingers a little blue but he smiled real wide, warm as he said, “Excellent, da’vehnan! Oh, my sweet girl, you did so well,” he enthused and then he sort of caught himself gushin’, blushed a bit and cleared his throat, more chill as he said, “So you see? Perhaps it would comfort you to practice as such with Ellie. The signal I just taught you it is two fold—the one pulse is Ellie and I’s way of greeting one another, a sort of hello we sometimes use. It, with the additional double pulse has always been um…well, it was her way of conveying to me she loves me, as best she could with what little she could send in the bond,” awe that was sweet, he was sort of just…blushy, ramblin’ a bit, this sort of fond, distant look on his face like…pride in his kid’s silly little accomplishments, baby things. Sera’d sort of seen it—not from Lady, but like she had this memory one of her first nights on the road after Lady died, she was in this Tavern and Inn run by this little family, little kid art tacked to the wall behind the bar—shite work, but like, it was little kids! And their da had been dumb proud of it—saw Sera starin’ and he refilled her drink, launchin’ into which kid did the drawin’ she’d been staring at, how old they was—just this tot obsessed with color waxes and makin’ pictures her da doted over.

Ugh. It was cute, he was bein’ too cute! Solas. Made her feel like hugging him again and they’d already done way too much of that—he en’t even done any crazy god-callin’ magic to save Inky’s life in the last 24 hours or nothing! So.

Guy blinked at her, startled when she flicked him in the cheek, and then he raised his hand to rub at it, chuckling softly, “I apologize. If I may offer some advice? Your magic…all magic can have times of struggle, but your magic is very new, there will be other times it might reach out to you in the way it did when you moved out of range of the bond. You felt ‘Ellie is dead’ from your magic, but…how magic communicates with us, especially young magic, it can be somewhat rudimentary—it was likely not a statement, Sera, but a question—‘Ellie is dead?’ your magic was looking to you for the answer. When you became frightened at the prospect, believed it to be true, Magic mirrored you, likely amplified whatever panic or sorrow you felt at what it was interpreting as news you were confirming. There will be times your magic does not understand what is happening and will look to you for guidance. If ever you find yourself separated from your sister again, be it by choice or even…there are times in the field I have found myself out of range, you must focus on the task at hand and keep yourself safe—when your magic proposes that Ellie’s absence in the bond means she has perished, you must simply inform it that it is mistaken, that she has merely stepped out of range. Your magic will often times be a source of strength and assurance for you, ma’dar’vehnan. Occasionally you must return the favor.”

Yeah…yeah that all made sense. Shite, Sera felt a lot better about it, magic did too.

“Sissy! I brought! Snacks!” Inky declared as she cannonballed into the pile of pillows, landin’ almost in Sera’s lap, cripes! Double cripes! Lace was ridin’ piggy back on Inky! The girl was gigglng as she launched herself into Sera’s lap, Inky laying against her, Lacey relaxing to lay against Ellie’s back as the girl informed them, “Mami’s carrying them! But I carried Lacey!”

Lacey was still gigglng up a storm over it, “She really did, golly—thanks sweetie.”

“No problem!” Inky said, hugging Sera, “Honestly I was just beating you to Sera so I got dibs on first snuggles. For…5…4…3…2…1….okay!” Ellie squeezed Sera tight before letting go, Lace rolling off of her back as Ellie rolled closer to Solas, “You’re free to stargaze with your girlfriend! Hi papi!” Ink moved it right along, climbing into Solas’s lap, the poor bloke still looked startled at all get-out like he expected at any minute Ink’d hate him again. Which was dumb, considerin’ Ink hadn’t hated him really. “Mmm, warm.”

“You are likewise warm, da’vehnan,” Solas offered, feeling at Ink’s forehead as he rubbed her back, holding her secure as he reclined in the proper nest they made. Mare was along shortly—Krem and Cole tagging along, the boys carrying the snacks and mugs while she had canteens of…Sera’s money was on warm cocoa, pressing a kiss to Sera’s temple as Krem handed her and Lace mugs that Mare filled with—yup! yum! Uhh…and drinks and snacks was always boss with a show and…it was kind of interesting watching Mare and Solas interact, but uh…woman sat between Sera and Solas. Probably so she could sit with Sera and Inky at the same time, and it left Solas’s other side open for Kremmy-boy to be near his little girlfriend who…was kinda snoozing away on Solas’s chest.

“She fell asleep?” Marehis asked as she sat on her knees, sounding quietly amused.

Solas nodded. “I believe she’s entertaining a mild fever, she feels feverish to the touch and the bond is confirming.”

“Oh…” Marehis reached out, hand just below Solas’s on Inky’s back, “sweet girl,” she shook her head. “Does it feel like she is ill? I…” Mare sighed, “I believe it may be a stress fever.” Awe, those wasn’t any fun.

“Ah. Has something happened?”

“Cullen wrote back. He is grateful for our work here and once we have concluded our business in the Emerald Graves…Sahrina Mines awaits investigation in Emprise du Lion.”

Solas nodded as if understanding, “So Ellie, of course, is thinking of everything that needs done here and wants to push to get it all done—”

“-yesterday,” the Elves said in unison, pokin’ fun at Inky’s way of giving herself impatient timeframes to work in when she was determined to get things fixed and happening. Gross.

Mare shook her head, “She will…I understand Sera’s invention lessens the pain of Ellie’s interactions with Rifts but,” Marehis let out this woosh of breath, “it…the physical toll on her.

Maker, I- I’m always so petrified her heart won’t catch its beat again when she seals those horrible things. I would appreciate…” she cleared her throat. “It is why I was delayed and the young gentlemen caught up with me,” she gave Krem and Cole an appreciative nod, before looking to Solas, “I’ve consulted with Cassandra and the Iron Bull. We’ll be presenting a united front with Ellie, putting our foot down in an appeal not as subordinates to the Inquisitor, but as Ellie’s parental figures—she is not to try and seal the six remaining Rifts in a single day. I would appreciate your cooperation with that.”

“Of course,” Solas readily agreed. “I understand Ellie’s desire to remove all known Rifts but perhaps I could dissuade her from sealing unnecessary ones—ones that can be wholly avoided for the time being without causing harm. She could always return to the Emerald Graves at a later date and …well, perhaps such a date will bear more progress in regard to advancements with Rift Magic and our understanding of it. We may have other means to seal the Rifts or develop ways to suppress them to the point they needn’t be sealed—if she could be spared the burden of dealing with them I would be glad of it.”

“You…you truly believe such a thing could be possible? Marehis wondered.

“I am not ordinarily a man of faith but I have always had as much in magic, I suppose. I hope that either through some efforts in Skyhold or my own field research a solution could be found.”

“You do research…?”

“During my time in the Hinterlands, in the evenings when I have finished my community service, I believe it is called? When one dedicates themselves to the betterment of a community they have wronged as penance? I study the nature of Rift magic as it interacts with Humanity. Um…how to remove the Mark from Ellie, alternative methods of dealing with Rifts, how the Orb of Destruction might-“ he stopped himself, assuring ‘I whole heartedly believe it, itself, should be destroyed, but it…it clearly left its power on Ellie, and I’ve some hope it could take it back, remove the Mark it placed on her before destroying it. I would never attempt to go against the Inquisitor’s ruling, I would wish to work within it. The Inquisition would take custody of the orb should it be recovered from Corypheus, and any circumstance I would be anywhere near it would be strict and controlled, solely for the purpose of removing the Mark, and then destroying the damned thing.”

Mare looked like she was thinking it over, nodding before asking, “This is what occupies your free time in the Hinterlands?”

“Ellie considers matters of Spirituality and morality every waking moment she is not otherwise occupied with love-sickness,” he supposed with a shrug, “I consider matters of the Fade and the Rifts torn into it.”

Mare’s brow raised at that, “When you are not otherwise occupied with love-sickness?”

“Of a less enjoyable sort than Eleanor’s perhaps, as I’ve more to mourn in that regard.” Well shite. That was one way of saying ‘I’m a sorry asshole and I miss you’. “And I’ve not the sort of appreciation for the Lieutenant’s backside as she does—I’m an in-general fan of your existence, mind—but it does not occupy my headspace so I’ve plenty of time for other realms of thought.”

“Thanks,” Kremmy-boy snorted softly as he…yup, guy was bad at stargazing, he could give fuck-all about the stars, he was laying on his side, hand carding through Inky’s hair. Cole was real quiet, curled up against Krem’s back, arms around the other boy’s waist, lookin’ real sleepy-like, the way he did when he put himself in the Fade, probably playin’ or chattin’ with Inky while she was zonked out, hopefully he was talking some sense into her, helping her sort through shite.

There was something tickling at Sera’s arm- oh. “Can I help you Lacey?” she wondered.

Lace was…sometimes Sera wrote on her arms and hands to keep track of shite, there was the soft rub of a wax pencil against Sera’s arm now, she just wasn’t the one writing.

“What about this?” Lace proposed. She’d drawn up a list of the final Rifts in three columns —each day started with a Rift that was high priority to close before leaving and one that Inky could choose to leave open if she wanted, but she’d definitely not be fucking around with more than two Rifts in a single day, “three days, at the very least, to wrap up things here. I’ll need that long just to get to Emprise de Lion to scout ahead—golly it’d be nice if I had time to lay down some ground work and assess the situation there before the Inquisitor shows up, I mean I’ll work as fast as possible but I’d just hate to let the Inquisitor down…” she smiled softly watching to see if the others were picking up what she was getting at.

“Oh,” Marehis breathed, “bless you sweet Lace—yes, that will work splendidly, Ellie would not rush you for the world. Framing it that you need more time would certainly lax her own schedule.”

“Yer a freaking genius Lacey!” Sera cheered, mmm, big snuggles for her genius girlfriend!

“I just hope it helps? She should at least spend the rest of the week here, and you can take it easy getting to Emprise du Lion. I’ll send my recommendations for a good route from here.”

“I’ll have her back,” Krem promised, awe…really? Dumb, sweet, ugh! He was just the best! He shrugged when Sera smiled at him and said, “Gotta head back to Skyhold soon—Emprise du Lion’s on the way.”

Sera nodded…and held her Lacey tighter still, cheek resting atop her hair, “I’ll miss you.”

“Miss you too Ser’,” Krem grinned when Sera stuck her tongue out at him.

Lacey giggled, “You too, but that’s what makes it fun, getting to be excited to see each other again,” though she pouted a little bit, “Miss Dagna like crazy though.”

Sera groaned, “I knooooow. Widdle’s getting so much kisses when we get back.”

Lacey’s nose crinkled at that as she smiled real cute, “Isn’t she like, the best to kiss? I mean you’re the best being kissed by,” friggin ditto! “but she’s just like, gosh. So cute.” Yeah Danga’s always grabby and enthusiastic, got these adorable little sounds she makes that’s just! Friggin the best!

“You’ll have to wait your turns,” Inky mumbled, yawning a bit as she snuggled against Solas’s chest, still-kind-of sleepin’. “Cremisius, I’m making out with Dagna when we get back to Skyhold for inventing my glove and also just for existing in general.”

“Hey, gotta give credit where credits due,” Krem supposed, “how you feelin’ lovely?”

“m’okay, just got sleepy,” she said, and then Solas coughed around a grunt as the girl on his chest wriggled about, elbowing him in the ribs as she shifted to lay on her back, “Papi—star facts! Wait—did I hurt you?” she worried.

He chuckled softly, “Hardly, da’vehnan,” Solas assured as he settled more comfortably, wrapping his arms around her tummy and taking a deep breath as he regarded the heavens overhead. “Well, lets see…I’m afraid I’ve rather exhausted my current knowledge of these constellations with you.”

“She hasn’t shared this knowledge of the stars,” Marehis said softly, “if you’d feel like catching those of use who were absent up to speed.”

“I would be delighted, if that suits,” Solas assured and uh…no one was really arguin’—wasn’t like anyone was feeling super chatty they was just out here to doze under the stars, and baldy had this nice timber to his voice, could be real soothin’ when he was all talky for a long time.

Though Inky and Kremmy-boy was talky for a long time too—Sera wasn’t down with gettin’ bug bit all to hell again, so she’n Lacey headed back to camp and Marehis and Solas and Cole followed, joining the rest of the adults around the campfire, giving Ink and Krem a bit of time to themselves since yeah, dude would be heading out tomorrow. Sera couldn’t really hear what they was saying but Krem was talkin’ an awful lot, Inky listenin’ contentedly from the looks of it the few times Sera got up to stretch her legs and take a peek at the hillside to make sure they was still there and safe n’ pish. Little cuties fell asleep.

And Sera figured out what they was talkin’ about come morning. Cuz Krem wanted to talk to them about it too—Sera and Cole. They was helping him pack up while every one else was working on getting breakfast underway and Inky popped up on her tip toes to press a kiss to Krem’s cheek.
“Have a good talk, carino. I’m just outside if you need me,” she reminded him.

“Thanks El,” he nodded, kissin’ her on the forehead before letting her leave. Oh, shite, guy seemed kind of nervous as he sat down on a cot, “Um…you two mind sitting and talking with me for a minute?”

Sera made to sit in the cot across from him but Cuddly literally vanished and reappeared in Krem’s lap. “I know, and I love you and I love that you want to talk about this with me and I am sorry you are nervous but you do not have to be.” So, Sera followed the leader as best she could—plopped it down right next to Krem and Cole, resting her head on his shoulder.

“Ditto—what’s up Kremmy-boy?”

Guy smiled at that, resting his head against hers as he held on to Cole, hand scratchin on the back of Cuddy’s neck the way that always soothed the Spirit as he took a beat, and then, “Well uh…I am a boy, just…not in the traditional sense,” he started out. oh. yeah, Sera nodded against his shoulder, quiet as she listened. “But um…so…I struggle sometimes. My brain freaking out over my body feeling wrong to it. doesn’t happen a lot, but it’s…you know. A thing. Apparently it’s a thing Healers study and uh…Lady Josie helped me get in touch with some.”

“You’ve been feelin’ bad about yourself?” Sera worried. Shite! She hadn’t seen anyone uh, questionin him or being a dick about whether or not he’s got one. Was someone in Skyhold doin’ something to mess with him or was it like other mental health things where there didn’t need to be anything necessarily going on for your brain to be committing bullshit? If it was people, she’d be putting so much arrows in them! If it was just Krem’s brain, well…no arrows. Cept metaphorical ones full of like, love or whatever the frig.

“No like bad-bad? Mostly just occasional moments of dysphoria where I’m embarrassed as shit or just wanna crawl out of my own skin. Um…so I’m meeting with someone on my way back to Skyhold, a Healer who specializes in,” he shrugged, “All this. to uh, talk about…treatment?” he supposed was the right word. “See if maybe I can find a better balance that’ll make me more comfortable uh, hormonally I guess? Do things to boost um, my testosterone.”

“You want someone to go with you, Kremmy-boy?” Healers was scary sometimes and getting help for things was hard. Sera felt just dumb going to Elan over her anxiety pish, but having Mare and ’sandra with her really helped. Inky might not be able to go with him but Sera…well she didn’t like leavin’ inky none but she’d do it for them, if Krem needed his friends and Inky needed her boyfriend to have support.

Krem shook his head. “Nah, Lady Josie checked her out for me to make sure I’d be in good hands and it’s just a uh, consultation.” Ellie wrote papa last night after Cremisius talked about this with her, because he said he’d written his father about it—but Krem won’t ask outright for his papa to go with him, in fact he told his papa not to even worry about it. While he would like his father there it is travel, and he worries papa is already so busy and would not want him to feel badly or trouble himself. But Josie wrote Ellie back—his papa had already left Skyhold and will be waiting for him at the Healers, to be there either in the appointment with him if he needs it, or afterward to support him. Awe sweet! “I might start like,” he shrugged, “diet changes, maybe a potions regimen. Not a huge deal, I just wanted you guys to know, because you’re my friends and I trust you, and uh, there might be changes so I thought I’d give you a heads up. And…I kind of need a favor.”

“Sure thing,” Sera said.

“I talked to Ellie about this last night just, you know. She’s my girlfriend, and she knows some stuff about this sort of thing but uh…something she didn’t bring up that Josie passed along in her information from the Healer is a word of caution El says she isn’t worried about—I said if it did worry her, or if she was nervous about it or sees anything that scared her I’ll drop this, and I swear I will,” Krem assured, “I…just don’t know that I’d be in the right mindset to actually do that if I did have a problem so, that’s where you guys come in. I might experience uh, mood swings, and sometimes there’s been issues with things like this where uh, patients become more aggressive or irrationally angry. If uh…you notice anything off with me—I start getting angry for no reason or dunno, have bad swings just, hold me accountable, okay? I’m um. Shit I’m scared I might mess things up. If I ever hurt El or- or any of you,” he swallowed. “That would kill me—I can handle things as they are right now, I can. So if trying to make me feel better in my own body makes things worse for the people in my life, it’s not worth it to me. So, I’m asking you guys to keep an eye out, I’ve already talked about it with Bull—you guys see anything concerning, go to him.”

Oh, frig. Yeah, shite that’d be bad but- but that was like, a bad side affect of somethin’ good Krem would be doing for himself. Trust him to take something that might be real good for him and worry more about it hurtin people he loves. “Trust in you, Krem. It’s not in you, to ever want to hurt Inky. But if we get worried, see red flags, we’ll go to Bull,” she promised, taking his hand and squeezing it, “It’s gonna be okay Kremmy-boy. If this is something you gotta do, I’m really proud of you for doing it. If you need anything, just let us know, kay?” she pressed a kiss to his cheek.

“I will keep track of your hurts Krem, I will help you if your mind makes hurts out of your healing. It is okay to struggle. We love you, we will always help.”

Awe, Kremmy-boy sniffled softly, “Love you guys too.”

“This um, treatment stuff, its supposed to make you feel more like yourself?” Sera asked. She kind of had a million questions cuz like…well it was something medical he was doin! She’d wanted to know everything about how to help Inky with her medical stuff!

“I guess? Give my body a chemical balance that matches what my brain needs it to be, there’s a whole thing,” he said, handing over an envelope. Oh cool! Yeah, huh. So like, Kremmy-boy’d be introducing more testosterone to his body, it’d do pish like encourage muscle development, redistribute muscle and fat differently. Holy frick! ‘Subtle bone changes’ sounded ouch, but she supposed it wouldn’t be, it just meant shiftin’ and changing over time like, in his face, or whatever, same way bones did as anyone grew up. And shite like that wouldn’t be real noticeable or happen right out the gate, some of this stuff would take years. Awe. Poor babe might get smacked in the face with the acne stick, skin would start...thickening? And getting oily. Sera’s face oiled up like crazy, Viv-tits called her greasy once—Inky was right pissed about it! But she also set her up with this pepperminty cleanser and uh...what-its-tits...witch hazel! That shite, Sera used it from time to time when doing the whole bathing thing and her face felt more comfy bein’ not so slicky. Maybe she’d send some Krem’s way—the Healer’s pish recommended a cleansing routine would help and she wanted to help! If...if there was any uncomfy things that came with this, she’d want to help. She...she wanted Krem to be happy with himself! And healthy! And have all the nice things!

“Ser’” Krem chuckled a bit when, well, Cole was still sittin’ on him, but now Sera’s knees were kind of on his thighs and the Spirit’s lap as she threw her arms around the Human man and just! Squeezed! Big squeezes! “It’s not...it’s not something major, I’m not really sick or doing something dangerous—I’m gonna be okay,” he soothed, running a hand through her hair, sort of scratchin’ her scalp, frick! She loved gettin’ her scalp scratched! Damn it!

“You’re my best friend and I love you and- you’re the best boy! The best one, Krem-is Aclassi! It’s you! And then Cole! And then Bull! Then Cullen, then Dorian. Thom’s cool too. Solas is friggin’ the dread wolf but like, he has his moments. Oh! And your papa’s the best!”

“Had to get it from somewhere I guess,” Krem joked lightly, rubbin’ circles on her back, “Love you too.” Kissed her on the forehead! Blah!

“Forehead kisses are the best,” Cole cheerily agreed, “they make everyone feel so happy and safe!”

Krem smiled, dolin’ out a forehead kiss on the Spirit boy—little cutie, he friggin’ loved shite like that, bein’ loved on, he got all big smiles and blushy faced.

Krem was blushy faced when it was time for him and Lace to head out. Sera was pretty sure he was gonna have to walk all the way to Emprise du Lion and his Healer’s appointment with Inky attached...possibly kissin’ him the entire time.

“I love you.” Huh. That was...the fifth time she’d said as much in that last three minutes. The Tevinter man was patient though, “I love you too,” he steadily returned, amused.

“And I’ll miss you. Like a lot. And I can’t wait to see you, and- you’re gonna write, right? Like...”
“No less than usual when you’re in the field El—don’t let yourself be distracted, I’m defiantly not gonna distract you. But I’ll keep you updated, I promise.”

“You will?” she pouted. Pretty sure just to trick the Vint boy into kissing her.

Trick he was a sucker for every time. “Each stop,” he promised as he pulled back, “after my appointment. Anytime I need you lovely, trust me, you’ll hear from me.”

“Same to you, you need me, write me. Everything’s gonna be okay. Stay safe, alright? Red Lyrium’s no joke, if the Red Templars are out there en force—if you guys need backup you know the Chargers are always at your service, Inquisitor.”

“Don’t tempt me, I will literally pay you to go with me everywhere and be in kissing range 24/7.”

“Mmm…not complaining…but paying me to be available for kissing implies I’m a gigolo.”

“An honorable profession, and if that’s your next career move guapo I’m like, so in. I’m just going to need to be a priority client.”

Krem hissed like that was gonna be a toughie, “You’ll definitely be my favorite client.”

“Fair, your business decisions are entirely up to you—I’m just here to support your goals,” me! Big one”—she demonstrated, puckering her lips to press an enthusiastic kiss to his cheek, “mwah!”

“Will do,” he promised, tucking a loose curl behind her ear and pressing a kiss to her forehead, “be safe.”

“Will do,” she returned giving him a little wave as he and Lace hit the road. Dumb road!
Taking Lacey and Kremmy-boy places that wasn’t here!

But they got to see Lace not too long after. Inky kept them on a pretty tight schedule—three days of Rift Sealing and chattin’ up Fairbanks to secure his allegiance with the Inquisition, and the last Rift they sealed on day three? Was on their way out of the Emerald Graves to hit the road for Emprise du Lion. Thankfully…Lace’d only taken a day and a half, her and Krem treading the path ahead and writing to inform them—both of them wrote Inky directly, Krem doublin’ up with letters to Dorian and Cassandra too—that Emprise du Lion. Was freezing. Fucking. Cold.

He uh…must’ ve written his papa too, cause they got big time deliveries from Josie sweets—she raided everyone’s business for him, ‘cause he got Krem’s letter asking him to send Ellie’s warm things since their original plan was mildly-springy Val Royeaux, mild woodlands of the Emerald Graves, and the blazing heat of friggin the Maker-damned desert!

Not freaking! What the hell?! Was this place cursed or whatever the frig?!

So anyway, yeah. Thank friggin tits and Josie and Krem’s papa, because they got their left behind coats and hats and scarves and gloves and- and freaking someone had knit Sera a sweater!
Oh yeah, Krem’s da had when he realized he’d just about missed her birthday—Marehis had put in an order to him, friggin’! She’d gotten Sera extra clothes, and this dress…that also got sent along ‘cause Dagna heard what Josie was up to and had been going to send it her way anyway so it got thrown into the mix. Sera hadn’t been real big on dresses before but this one was like, friggin’ perfect! Neat little thing that fell to her knees, long sleeves, all this black-lined red plaid that just!
Cute! Came with a matchin’ bowtie for the high collar! And it had pockets. And the skirt had matchy shorts to wear under it so she didn’t have to follow any dumb dress rules! So…yeah, Mare was the best, Papa was the best, and Dagna was the best cuz Sera’d been going to write her to see if she’d pack this very outfit to bring along for Sera to change into for uh…meetin’ Lacey’s parents. That was sounding more like a definitive thing they’d be doing before returning to Skyhold after all this pish and Sera…wasn’t sure about parents. Frick! Like, she definitely wanted to meet them! She was just…really wantin’ to make a good impression. Because they was Lacey’s parents!
What if they didn’t like her?! Oh cripes—what if they didn’t like Dagna?! Or what if they only liked one of ‘em! Shite! Maybe three-sies was a mistake, there was too many variables for ‘could/couldn’t like!’ Frick!

She’d be dressy, and maybe have Marehis do somethin’ with her hair, clean it up style-wise.
Did she need new shoes? Ink’d help her. Yeah! And ‘sandra taught her how to do eyeliner good but um…maybe she’d do it for her though? She was nervous, felt like…actually armoring up probably wasn’t in the cards but Viv taught her there was other kinds of armor to be worn across different fields of battle. She didn’t put so much umph into her appearance because she found herself wanting—she did it cuz she’s frickin’ boss, armoring herself up with her pretty clothes and make up and perfumes was just a way of makin’ sure when she walked into the room, everyone knew who they was talkin’ to. So…yeah, put her best foot forward, put out effort that said she was taking meeting them seriously, told them ‘I’m one of your amazing daughter’s girlfriends and I freaking love her and I don’t know what the frick I did to deserve her either, so just be chill!’

Was already freaking chill in the Emprise. Fucking piss-ass blizzard!

“You’re toasty, right Ink?” Sera friggin’ fretted. It was cold! She pulled at Ink’s scarf, the way ‘sandra and Mare did to keep it snug around her neck, ‘cause sometimes it got caught up under her armor. Her gloves was secure, and they…well they had back up Runes ready to roll, the original runestones had gotten into right bad shape, big Rifts burned ‘em down fast—they probably could’ve been good for another big Rift after sealing the last six in the Emerald Graves but Sera was not riskin’ one of those things breaking direct in Inky’s hand, shite! Lyrium burns hurt! Sera’s palm was still, like a burnin’ itch always there, patch of skin in her left palm just hurt all the time and she definitely didn’t want something she made to ever hurt Ellie. Sera was nervous—there was Rifts all around and Krem had helped Lacey test run one of ‘em down on the ice. Friggin’ had to run for their lives cuz there was pride demons!

“Uh-huh,” Inky nodded, “Are you cold? Gosh Sissy your cheeks are all rosey—you’re the cutest!”

Blaaaaah! Squirmy! Friggin’ loved Inky! “Face is a little freezy,” Sera allowed. Maybe that was why Viv was so into icy magic—when you applied cold, ya didn’t need blush!

Friggin’! Inky and Marehis, they was really ‘like mother like daughter’ ‘cause they took Sera’s face being cold as reason to each attack a cheek to pepper with warm kisses! Cripes!

“Oi!” Sera- friggin got giggly! Her magic was all dumb happy, warm and cozy and kind of… dunno, felt like her and Ink’s magic was huggin’ if that was a thing? Was sweet and Sera…she did her best, tried sendin’ the tap, tap-tap across the bond-

Tap! Tap-tap! Right back at her from Inky! Oh friggin’ yay!

Double yay! Lacey was waiting on them as they walked into camp—hoofed it the last stretch on foot, ‘cause path was steep and the whole area was pretty yick, they’d spared their horses for now—poor Russel didn’t like being cold any more than his mistress—found them stables nearby.

Frick Lace was pretty—Inky thought Sera was cute all rosey cheeked? Lace was just… wowza. Awe, but she looked pretty beat—tired and sad, though she offered up a little smile to Ellie, something that spoke to relief they’d made it in safe. Teetness deserved so much naps.

“Inquisitor,” she nodded to Ellie, “We’re on the outskirts of Sahinia . This is what’s left of the town. The lucky ones got out before the river froze over—the rest are penned in by Rifts and Red Templars. We’re the first friendly face they’ve seen in a long, long while.”

“The entire river froze?” Inky asked, aghast.

“It got really cold, really quickly. Sahinia relies on its river for everything, trade, food. They weren’t expecting this.” Shite! So this weather just freaking…just came out of nowhere? They’d never had a cold snap like this before, where they could anticipate having a shite winter?

“Gosh, that’s just horrible,” Inky breathed, “I’ll check in on the townsfolk. The Inquisition is here to help, lets make sure they know that.”

“The entire river froze?” Ink asked, aghast.

“Let’s get out there and take it back from them.”

“We’ll go kick major Red Templar butt Lacey—you and me, let’s go!” Ellie cheered, hand shooting straight out for a high-five from the Dwarf woman. That pulled a warm smile and a giggle from Lace as she high-fived Ink and agreed.

“I’m with you Inquisitor.”
“Great! You guys can just, you know. Chill out, take a nap—Lacey’ll go whoop the Red Templars and be home for lunch!”

“Oh certainly, do have fun Eleanor,” Cassandra encouraged, bemused.

“Awe, c’mon Imekari—you can’t leave old Iron Bull out of the fight,” Bull complained.

“Well… I guess anyone who like, really wants to come can tag along—but no slowing us down!” Inky warned fiercely, pointin’ a lecturing index finger at Qunari. And then she smiled real warm at Lacey, “I think I’ve actually got enough people with me for the day ahead so… maybe you can show those Templars what-for by sticking around our infiltration camp? If you nap that’ll really stick it to them,” Inky assured, pressin’ a kiss to her scout’s forehead. Awe, that— Inky was the best. She’d seen what Sera’d seen, Lace real worn out. “Great work out here Lacey, you’re the best. Get some good rest—Inquisitor’s orders. We’ll take it from here.”

“Thanks sweetie.”

Cripes Sera was glad Thom’s men was still having their backs out here. Red Templars… they’d put up a mad tough fight in Haven, at that Redoubt place too and Red Lyrium? That shite was friggin’ terrifying looking to Sera. Magic felt a little creeped by it—she’d been able to stay way far away from that shite when they found it in Crestwood. If they was mining this shite from around here? Yikes. Was it bad Sera was hopin’ that meant the Red Templars had mined it all and hauled it off for their friggin’ schemes?

Inky made her way around the locals—oh man. Town was wrecked. The biting chill was just ‘bout the only thing keeping any color in Inky’s face as they made their way through just… friggin’ ruins of a place. People didn’t even have roofs over their heads for the most part. Few shite tents, a building their Mayor or whatever was working out of, a bedroll in the corner, a few benches? Shite.

“Cassandra,” Ink waved the woman over as they took pause outside the Mayor set up. Er, ‘Mayor’ wasn’t the right word Sera guessed, she was ‘Mistress’ Poulin. But she was in charge of runnin’ Sahnia or whatever. Cassandra went to Ellie, bending so the girl could talk into her ear for a minute, real quiet—private, but like, no one with Elfy or Qunari ears could really help but overhear so… “Mami, would you please send a message to Skyhold? Emergency level, to be handled immediately—Tia knows where my seals are in my desk in Skyhold.” Seals? Oh, for banking documents n’ pish. Shite! Bull was all rumbly in his chest over it, the quiet kind that said the Qunari whole heartedly approved. “Tell her to make a transfer from my account to the people we get our stores from, for our Orlais camps? I want food and water, medicine, Inquisition tents here as soon as possible for the town. Cots, bedding, coats—if papa can, I want just warm tunics and trousers in different sizes, underpants, socks. Tell Josie, ‘sin limite’, please?”

“Seen…?” she tested, uncertain.

“S-i-n l-i-m-i-t-e.” Cassandra nodded as she committed the spelling to memory. “Adan has an Orlesian apprentice um, crap,” Inky hummed real soft to herself, before freaking coming up with “Esmee, I’m pretty sure?” shite! Did her little name-song thing freaking work for everyone in the Inquisition?! “Gorgeous skin like Tia Vivi, just like a little taller than me? Ask Tia to get me her information and write up an offer for her, send something for me to approve by end of day? I’ll write her myself before bed, and in the meantime I’m going to ask if Cyril would consider sticking around here until we get a Healer secured for them.”

Casandra nodded before rising to confirm, “I will send word to Skyhold, Inquisitor. Do stay within the town perimeter until my return,” she intoned, Ellie nodding in agreement. And then, shite, ‘sandra almost looked teary eyed as she tucked a bit of hair behind Inky’s ear, “I am proud of you, Eleanor,” she said, voice real warm, “you are growing into a remarkable young woman.”

Inky got real blushy at that, “Gosh, it’s just— they really need help bad. We have to do whatever we can.”

“Certainly. I will return shortly,” the woman promised, resting her forehead against Ellie’s, voice real soft and quiet, almost like the way she prayed over them sometimes, “Take heart, and take a deep breath, my sweet girl—the Maker will provide. We will handle this—we will help these people.” Gave Inky’s shoulders a squeeze before casting her gaze over them all in a sort of… well on Sera it felt like warm regard and on everyone else it was pure ‘if anything happens to my children in my absence, I will be the standard by which you set your definition of pain and terror’. Yikes. Yay for Sera though, these dummies should’ve played more tag and thrown more pies or whatever the frig it was Sera did that got her landed Inky’s sister. Oh frig—Bull runnin’ around with a high-pitched voice, actin’ all effiminent to pass off as Ink’s sis. That’d be hilarious!

“I can make paper words,” Cole volunteered when Cassandra’s gaze landed on him. Oh, Cuddly had been shrinking back a bit, clutching Bull’s hand. Oh man, hurts had to be pretty loud here and Ink was getting to them…this would be a way of helping. “I can write down exactly what Ellie wants, and Lady Josie will be happy I am using politeness! She taught me how to write letters properly and now I can write her a proper letter!”

“Our ambassador taught you to write letters?” Viv wondered wryly.

“She thought it might be another way to help heal hurts without frightening her guests. If I could do some ‘gentle’ groundwork in person and then write them of the more ‘intimate’ details because they may feel more comfortable handling that through reading and writing instead of face to face,” oh shite! Brain! Quiet until Cuddly is gone- wait, maybe he should know. Poor sweetie, Sera…well she kind of was in the know on how Leliana operated and her hand was pretty obvious in this, it wasn’t right to trick Cuddly! “It isn’t a trick,” Cole assured her, “well, not on me because I know Leliana suggested the idea to Josie, in a move to potentially have documents full of leverage over the powerful people who visit Skyhold. Lady Josephine doesn’t know and it would hurt her if she did—she does not care as long as she is not in the know, that is a lot of how she and Leliana’s friendship works.” Cole smiled at that, “I am glad that is not how our friendships work. Thank you for worrying I had been tricked and wanting to untrick me.”

‘sandra…wasn’t sure what all the ‘trick’ stuff was about but Sera nodded to him to take credit for the brain-thoughts he’d been responding to, and Cassandra let out a soft ‘ahh’ before confirming, “Yes…thank you Cole, if Eleanor has no complaint,” Ink smiled and shook her head that it was fine, “I would appreciate being able to stay here. We will wait for you,” she assured before the Spirit vanished.

Nothing exciting happened while Cuddly was gone though. Inky asked Cyril if he’d mind her volunteering his healing services to Sahrnia’s people, and of course the guy was down for it, immediately promising to stay with the people here until the Inquisition could send someone else. She went and shook hands with Lady Poulin. Damn, lady was stressed but um…dunno. When Ink was asking for a rundown on the situation with the Red Templars she got kind of…heart-skippy, beating erratically, this loud thunk thunk in her chest that didn’t sit right with Sera—didn’t think the bitch was goin’ into cardiac arrest, so, that left lyin’ through her teeth. About what, Sera wasn’t freaking sure, but if she friggin froze the lake herself or- or whatever the fuck was going on with leaders of towns screwing their own people over with water, Sera was putting! Arrows! Everywhere! And no one could freaking stop her!

“Heads up Imekari,” Bull rumbled out soft as they left, Inky turning to look up at him, “Lady uh, might be sketchy. Something didn’t sound right, got real nervous about you asking after the situation with the Red Templars.”

“I agree,” Cassandra said. “She was lying, I am just uncertain as to what.”

Inky sighed. “I hope for these people’s sake their leader hasn’t betrayed them,” she ran her hands over her face as she took a deep breath, fingers going to her temples to rub at some ache there, poor sweets. “Okay,” she cleared her throat, “Cole’s on his way back now, we’ll meet him on the way to, well…there are Red Templars holding a position southwest of here so, we should probably go take care of that. Lacey sent me a report last night, Leliana agrees it might be a good place to set up camp if we can oust the Red Templars.”

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis addressed her concerned, shite, Ink kind of looked like she might sick up which wasn’t any good. Poor sweets barely ate half her breakfast.

“Ellie, would you take my hands?” Solas asked as he went, crouched in the snow to kneel before the Human girl who took hold of his offered hands with a nod, looking at him like she wasn’t sure what was happening. “Unclench your jaw and relax your shoulders da’vehnan, and put your focus in the bond.”
Ink did as instructed. Well, Sera was pretty sure, anyway—she heard the girl’s teeth scrape against each other as she unclenched her jaw and she visibly relaxed a bit. Still pretty bond blind though, dang it! She wanted to know what was happening! Inky seemed to be relaxing more, less overwhelmed, breathing regulating more and she looked more confident in moving forward.

“Gracias papi,” Ellie blushed, pressing a kiss to the guy’s forehead since it was in-range for her at the moment, sent his ears right blazin’ though.

“Of course,” he assured as he rose up and fell in line as Ellie moved to lead them through what was left of Sahnia. Cassandra looked to him in curious question and he informed them, “The Inquisitor was on the verge of…either overwhelmed tears or a panic attack, neither of which are conducive for her at the moment when we are about to head into battle. She was rather a ball of almost literal knots of nerve and tension in the bond, whenever Mythal faced such circumstance, such devastation in her lands that only she could fix, it was the faith her people had in her, those who were bonded to her, that would help instill in her the confidence to press on. These are dire straits, and while she may feel otherwise about herself and her abilities, I have every faith in Ellie. I have poured that faith into the bond, to imbue Eleanor in it and drown out the doubts that plague her.” He smiled real warm as he looked to Sera and held out his hand to her, so she took it and cripes! Ahh! Yay! That was…that was ruddy sweet of him. Sera’d been feelin’…well she felt bad! She wanted to help Inky too! ’cause she believed in her like—like the most!

If Solas had ‘every faith’, Sera had every faith times infinity! Inky could do freaking anything she put her mind to!

And she’d been feeling shite that she couldn’t make Inky feel that in the bond but Solas was helping her now, sort of like guiding someone by the hand to help them take someone else’s hand in theirs, he pulled on her confidence in Inky and sent it through to help him ground the Human girl in that sense of belief. And Inky gasped and let out what sounded like a happy squeak of surprise when the bond got more full of nice feelings. Friggin yes! If Inky couldn’t believe in herself, they could believe in her for her!

Huh. Marehis was lookin’ real thoughtful about all that—Solas stepping up and helping Ellie, friggin believing in her so hard the girl went from feeling failure, to faith she could handle this, help these people and face the Red Templars with success. And Solas was real blushy…was he peepin’ in the bond? Sera thought he wasn’t supposed to do that! Did Mare’ know?

“She does,” Cole said as he appeared at Sera’s side, “she gave him permission.” Wait, frick. Really? Huh. Their business. Was they…like…relationship-y again? They hadn’t been slippin’ off with each other or anything, but they was…Marehis wasn’t so ‘if you was lit on fire I’d stand in front of you drinkin’ the last cool glass of water and watch you burn’ with him at the moment.

“Oh, no. Our birds are fast but not that fast. But I did ask the fastest one to please take my message to Skyhold—she feels good today, and the wind is favorable, and the small freckled one—that’s what she calls Lacey—gave her her favorite treats this morning, she wants to do a good job for her. Sera likes Lace’s freckles too—do not worry,” Cole said to Sera, “Lace loves Leliana’s birds but she loves you and Dagna more.”

Sera snorted, she uh, hadn’t exactly been worried about that but still, “Thanks Cuddly.” Cripes he was a silly sweet one. He hummed at that and took Sera’s hand. Oh, that was nice, hopefully…her and Solas and everyone focusing on the task ahead, thinking positive thoughts for Inky was helping, giving him something else to focus on other than all the hurt-thoughts coming at him from every remaining Sahnnian.

There was this Human* bloke just sort of…holdin’ his own at the battlements southwest of town. Ink shook his hand and introduced herself, said the Inquisition was there to help and he said his name was ‘Michale’ or something, he’s here hunting some- some shite demon bloke! Ishmael, the fuck kind of name was that?! But he couldn’t chase him through Emprire du Lion with all these ruddy Rifts and Red Templars about, and he’d seen Sahrina in the state its in and thought his sword was better put to use defending the town and its people.

“If we can help you find Ishmael and deal with him, let us know, okay? Are you set up okay out here? Do you need anything? I'll have supplies coming in for the town soon, and we’re hoping to recover some ground from the Red Templars today—if you need a place to stay, you’re welcome in our camps—Andaran atish’an!" she assured him…for…some reason?

Guy looked…dunno, there was a softness as he regarded her with a little smile, “Ma seranas, Inquisitor. Dareth shiral.”

Awe, Inky smiled real big at that, “Dareth shiral!”

So. There was Red Templars. And wolves. Like, big fucking wolves driven bat-crap crazy from Red Lyrium shootin’ up out of the ground near where the Templars was holding position. Magic got screamy, was scared of it and Sera was glad her job was just shootin’ ‘cause that meant she got to stay way the fuck back from that shite! Frick!

Oh. Solas…he’d said magic was like a baby now, right? New, and little, and would sometimes need her to tell it things. And Inky was always talkin to her magic, so…we’re okay, I’m not going anywhere near that Red Lyrium shi- uh, stuff you don’t say swears at babies! We’re safe.

Well, from Red Lyrium. Red Templars was shite!

“I…” Inky gulped as she tried to catch her breath, “is everyone o-okay? Cole, gimme a list—worst to okay.”

Sera was okay, little scraped up but potion was more than enough to set her alright—still, knocked some back so Ink didn’t fret over her. Viv and Dori was helping each other, dabbing each others scrapes with Health potion, and Thom was helping patch Bull up. Cole wasn’t hurt—Mare had sprained her wrist real bad, and the Spirit boy was at her side uncorking potion for her, Solas friggin’- the guy looked stricken, hands twitching like he wanted to reach out and help her bad, Sera had to make eye contact with him and point at her own arm for him to snap out of it realize he should probably take potion for the gash on his.

Worst on the list was Cassandra.

Chapter End Notes

Dale=I feel like I haven't translated this word and it's pronounced like "dah" like Dahlia, and then "lay" like. Laying. and it means "Go!" which can mean literally "go!" or "you go you guy/gal/non-binary pal!" and it's usually a form of enthusiastic encouragement.

Despierto=get up!

Si, mi reina=yes my queen

Sin limite=no limit

Dalish: Tel garas solasan. Arlathan.=Come not to a prideful place. This is a place of love. (Arlathan is also the OG name of a major Elvehnan city/their capitol) ir abelas tu ma lathbora viran, ma seranas tu eth emma lath=lathbora viran translates to- the path to a place of lost love- and equates to longing for something you can never really know. So this passage translates as "I am sorry for your loss/the child you longed to know, thank you for the safety of my love, my child."

During a convo between Sera and Solas in-game, Solas blathers at Sera in Dalish and when she informs him she doesn't know that talk, he assures that their people have been known to be capable of garnering understanding of their mother tongue by rhythm of the speech alone. That comes in handy when an Old God whips out pre-Age Elf language.

*Ya’ll if you had any idea how many plot points I map out and ultimately don't touch on due to my shit brain, I don't know, you'd probably be a little concerned. I set up Vivienne's moment with Krem and didn't have adequate follow through last chapter, so, I had to squeeze it into this chapter. Vivienne being an ally! Yas!
*Trans men and women suffer greatly both in and out of the criminal justice system but even just getting arrested is dangerous and volatile and there is a disgusting lack of protections in place, and what few there are are often ignored and abused. If you didn't know that, now you do! Do with that information what you will! Knowledge is power and whatnot.
*Rivain isn't Andrasten, it doesn't subscribe to the Chantry. Rivaini people are usually polytheistic and worship spirits and gods/goddesses of nature and morality.
*R'fissa is a Moraccan dish. Nevarra is based on an ancient middle-eastern civilization, at least it was last time I read up on it? There isn't a direct correlation but a lot of their culture came from a middle-eastern civilization/old germanic civilization, but I can't find the exact source I took that note from. They've got a more euro-centric vibe somehow but eh. My headcannon is their cuisine involves Baklava and R'fissa and Tagine.
*Companion dialogue between Cassandra and Blackwall has Cassandra complaining of her hayfever, which she does in canon suffer from, and Thom suggests she should punch a tree. This is one of those places the writers were trying to draw lines between Blackwall and Anthony, a big 'ouch' of his betrayal for Cassandra is the familiarity of having someone be sort of 'older-brother-ish' to her, have all these things that remind her of her deceased brother, and for him he's got the loss of Liddy and is sort of getting to stretch his older brother legs in this relationship, only to have that ultimately disintegrate in the wake of "Revelations".
*Solas being a dog just chasing his ball is something I saw in a tweet and FRIENDS I can't find the tweet anywhere but I can't take credit for that line, and I need whoever tweeted that to know I love them and hope they're having an amazing day and if they need a wife who owns absolutely nothing, look me up. --> *Correction! It was a Tumblr post and the amazing SiberianSpring was kind enough to find it for me! This joke comes from a delightful post by the wonderful Fibrochemist (Ethanamide here on AO3).
*Consuming honey local to an area you normally get allergies being in/going to can potentially help with said allergies. It's not like, hard core proven, but it has been known to be a thing for some people!
*Loren Pentaghast is in canon a cousin of Cassandra, so. I gave that cousin a father he's named after.
*If you don't want to fight the Red Templars while recovering the letters in the EG you CAN tell your people to halt and then using a Rogue character with the ability to activate Stealth (best done once "Lost in Shadows" is unlocked) you can sneak and collect the letters and then slip back out.
*Micel de Chevins is, in canon, half-Elf. He of course passes for Human but he loves his Dalish mama and her culture and I had to give that a little love in this fic because he's a child of my heart.
Before the Dawn: Emprise du Lion

Chapter Summary

Emprise du Lion missions. Leadership continues to disappoint, Red Lyrium is a literal nightmare, thankfully it's Veil-thinning affects can unlock immense rage-fueled power in local Dalish gods, and Varric has a hair cut.
(No fantastic Dwarven chest hair was harmed in the making of this fic)

Happy 1,000,000(+) words!

Chapter Notes

Hello! I'm back! And I'm so sorry I haven't uploaded since last year! (I'm more sorry for making this joke this late in January!) Happy Belated New Year!

I do not own anything! Any dialog from the game or quotes from codex entries (all letters and their contents found in Sahinia Quarry are canon) belong to Frostbite/Bioware/Anyone but me. I'm also not a Middle-High-German fluent Knight-Poet by the name of Wolfram von Eschenbach famous for 13th Century Chivalric Romances. I promise. I give you this cryptic promise so I can fit all my end notes into this chapter—the first *'s note can be found here:
*The method Ellie uses is Tube Thracostomy, first mentioned historically in Wolfram von Eschenbach's work: Parzival (circa 1210-20s) where he describes treatment of a Knight's injury, basing that description on medical care he himself received for a similar injury he maintained where his lung collapsed some years prior to his fictitious work's circulation. It's a method of dealing with injuries like this that was developed before his time, but he has one of the earliest examples smart people have found written down.

NOTE: An absolutely amazing reader PsychoLeopard made the perfectly sane suggestion of providing break points since my scenes and chapters do tend to run a little long, and ya'll have lives! You should be free to lead them! And it's much easier to do that if you have a reasonable stopping point, so! I give you—Soft Breaks! Soft Breaks are marks I've made at points where you'll have come through a good chunk of story and you're at a place where if you drop off and came back, you'll be at a decent point to pick up again. I made these marks every 5-10 pages depending on what was going on in the story to make sure it's not a horrible place to stop if you need to! There are 14 soft breaks total and they are all marked with bolded and underlined — marks in the left hand margin (so they look like distinctive, noticeable equal signs that at the same time don't obstruct your reading experience if you're godless and time has no meaning and you just wanna consume your fic whole-chapters at a time. If that is the case for you, please know I both fear and respect you) . The first break like this appears in the first scene, just before Sera reads a letter from Cullen, you'll see the mark to look for if you'd like an author-recommended break point!

As always thank you so much for reading and I love you, I love every single thing about you because you're alive and reading my fic!
“Mami s-sit, c’mon, I’ve got you,” Inky said as she took the Seeker’s weight against her and helped lower her to the ground, shite, Cassandra swallowed a pained sound as she went down, and Ellie had her lie back while she knelt at her side, “I need you to breathe for me, in through your nose, out through your mouth. I’m taking your chest plate off, I’m sorry, I know it’s cold. Stay awake for me mami, kay? Sera? Can you come hold her hand?”

Sera wasn’t gonna argue with that, shite! She knelt at Cassandra’s side, holding her hand while Inky was workin’ real quick with her buckles and straps to get her friggin’ chestplate off, how the hell did she and Commander get anything done with all that noise? But she got it undone—there was a freaking hole in the front of her chestplate where one of those friggin’ Shadow freaks tried to run her through! It hadn’t managed to break all the way through, but some Red Templar bastard’s sword was able to strike that literal hole in the Seeker’s defenses, pierce the leather underneath, and left a gushing, deep wound bleeding high on her tummy, shite! Shite! “Okay mami, this is going to hurt—you’ve got bleeding on your lung, it’s punctured, potion can fix it but I need to drain the air and fluid in your chest cavity first. I need you to look at Sera, okay? Keep looking at sissy and hold her hand and I promise I’ll be done soon and you’ll feel all better.” She looked to Sera as she opened ‘sandra’s leather under armor to expose the gushing, broken, bruised injury underneath, Inky warning, “You’re gonna wanna keep your eyes on mami’s face, this is gonna be kind of yuck.”

Did not have to tell Sera twice. Shite! Inky- Inky was talkin’ she was pretty sure, talking through whatever the frig she was doing. She smelled- shite! Why did Inky have super alcoholy alcohol? Oh, to keep shite sterilized or whatever the frig. And then all Sera’s ears was focused on was the sound of something slicey and jabby and- and this horribly squelchy sound. ‘sandra was pale, drawing in these just awful, painful breaths and Sera- shite she hoped she didn’t get her tears in ‘sandra’s lung stuff cuz she was crying, pressing her forehead against Cassandra’s, “S-s-s-stay awake, o-okay?” Sera stammered out, shite. She was supposed to be reassuring! “Inky’s got you and I’m- I’m right here. You’re gonna be okay.” She…she was gonna be okay, right? Frick frick frick.

“I…will be fine,” ‘sandra- shite! She- she shouldn’t do that! Shouldn’t talk! That took air she was struggling for! “Don’t cry.”

“Shhh, just shush, m’okay, you’re not fine. Just zip it and stay awake or I’ll—I’ll friggin’-! If you die then Mare has to be my favorite mum,” ‘sandra’s brow furrowed at that. “Well yeah you’re my favorite, dummy. No offense to Mare’s just…dunno. She’s Inky’s favorite in a way, cause she was her mami first, you know? As far as mums go, you was like my mum first, before I warmed to Marehis that way. So you en’t allowed to bite it, not till you’re a hundred—I done ‘splained it to Inky! You was there! So stop actin’ like you’re new—you know the damn rules!” ‘sandra offered what she could of a smile at that, that…that was good, right? Sera was distracting her from the horror fest going on with her body while keeping her focused on the task of staying freaking awake.

Alright, Ser’? Can you help mami sit up a little?” Ellie asked, “Support her head and shoulders while I administer potion.”

“Oh it,” Sera said- oh frick she shouldn’t’ve looked! There was something sticking out of ‘sandra’s side—long slender silvery stick, jabbin’ into ‘sandra’s side must be hallow* or somethin’ cause pourin’ out of its end was blood just soakin’ the snow, shite! Wasn’t lookin’ anymore, just, got her arm under ‘sandra’s shoulders and supported her head with her free hand while Ink poured potion past the woman’s lips.

“You’re going to feel some pressure and ‘ouch’ and then a little burn that’ll turn right into soothing cool, okay? Keep looking at sissy,” Ink instructed. Sera heard a yicky, squelchy sliding sound, “pressure for three…two…one, ouch,” Ink announced apologetically, ‘sandra’s eyes clenched shut momentarily but she nodded that she was okay, “and burning, just for a second mami, I promise…kay…how’re you feeling?”

“It does not burn anymore,” Cassandra croaked out confirmation, “Thank you.”

“You’re lung is gonna feel weak for a while, it probably feels kind of weird breathing right now huh?” Ellie said, and Cassandra nodded. “You’ve gotta be careful for a few days, okay? I want you resting the rest of the day. I’d feel better if you got at least twelve hours of solid, sound sleep. The Iron Bull, come sit with mami and keep her warm until we- we get our people out here with tents and things. I’ll send up the signal and we’ll set up camp.”

Bull came and sat with Cassandra—Mare too, kneeling at the Human woman’s side and pressing kisses to her cheek, whispering thanks to the Maker that she was okay and promising she’d write Cullen for her. Inky sent up the signal and uh, Sera… didn’t feel anything from Ink in the bond but her own magic said to get up and follow Ellie so, she did—Ink had used the war horn to signal their infiltration camp to send supplies their way to set up camp, and then she disappeared behind boulders lining their camp and when Sera stood up to follow her she heard why magic said follow, even ‘sandra flinched at the sound of Ellie hurling her guts up, shite!

Cole was already there when Sera came up behind Inky kneeling, poor sweets. She was uh, really hurlin’ it into the snow, yikes. Half-digested oatmeal looked friggin gross! Cole let out a sympathetic whine as he knelt at Inky’s side, casting his hat off as he rested his head on her shoulder and murmured assurances that she was going to be okay, Sera crouched on her other side to rub circles on her back, pull her hair out of her face before the braid Mare had worked it in could get all vomity.

“s’okay Inky, ‘sandra’s okay, you did a really great job.”
“I’m sorry, I’m- I’m o- “ um… dry heaving now, so not quite ‘okay’.

“Shhh, shush. We’ll sit here until you’re not sicky anymore, I’ve got potion if you need it, okay sweets?” Inky nodded, leaning against Sera when she was done and catching her breath, shite she was shaking real bad.

“She needs potion, greeny-white,” Cole said as he vanished.

Frick! Yeah, good, he was off to get it then, Sera didn’t have those ones on hand but Mare… oh cripes, she hoped Marehis did. “Does your tummy hurt real bad?” Sera worried, even more when Inky nodded, resting her head against Sera’s shoulder, catchin’ her breath. It took…it took a while for ulcer things to happen, right? Took weeks for Ink to develop one last time. She’d been pretty stressed the whole way here, and then actually getting to Sahrnia and seeing how shite it all was, ‘sandra getting that badly hurt and having to do something medically ‘ouch” to help her was definitely taking a toll.

Red Templars was shite! And they could freaking rot for all Sera cared!
Sera pressed a kiss to her temple when Cole showed up again, unstoppering potion as he held it to Inky’s lips for her to sip at, real careful until she downed it all, trying to keep it down.

“We’re just gonna sit here until you feel better, kay Inky?”

“Kay,” she agreed, noddin’ and closing her eyes. Mmm, kay, it was cold as shite, but it was warm sitting like this, especially with Inky in her lap and Cole coming to wrap his arms around them, pulling them to his chest—he was a skinny guy but he had enough room for their heads, tucking Inky’s under his chin.

“You will feel better,” Cole said, kind of of sounded like he was assuring himself more than Ellie, shite he sounded teary, “it will be okay.”

Let them sit for a minute while Ellie caught her breath good before, “I need help up,” Inky sniffled, oh, yeah she was real shaky, Sera was nervous the girl might go face first into her uh, pile of vomit, but Sera rose up with her, supporting her weight. Something in her big sister brain went off and she just wanted to carry the girl, but they had people coming. Soldiers and things Inky was supposed to be boss of so, she just wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders and helped keep her upright, Cole trailing after them like a worried pup.

“All good, Imekari?” the Iron Bull asked.

Ellie nodded. “Sorry, yeah, I’m okay. You okay mami?”
sandra looked exhausted, layin’ against Bull’s side but she nodded, Mare’ was holding her hand and when the Seeker gave her hand a squeeze the Elf woman offered her a smile and voiced the question ‘sandra was too tired to, “Are you alright, sweet girl?” Marehis asked, “Cole came and made theft from my potions bag,” she assured they wasn’t about to let it slide if Inky shrugged or brushed it off like she hadn’t just been sick or needed potion.

“M’okay, potion helped. How’s your wrist mami?”

Was fine, at least Sera’d seen it get taken care of, but the Elf woman held her wrist now—wrong one, that was how fixed up her wrist actually was, she didn’t even remember which one had been hurt in the first place—and said, “Would you look at it for me please, da’vehn?”

Oh, ‘cause it got Inky sitting down instead of standing around or pacing while they waited. Ellie immediately knelt before Marehis, doting on her poor little wrist, checking it for bruising and carefully pressing and asking how badly gentle pressure hurt, Marc…fibbin’, but just enough to pass it off like it was still sore—not enough to need anything done to it, but just enough to double check everything was okay so Inky wouldn’t immediately pop back up again. Ellie carefully tested each of Marehis’ fingers, massaging at her knuckles and peppering the hand with kisses when she was satisfied her mami would make a full recovery. And then her attention was on ‘sandra, checking her for fever. The woman was practically falling asleep, laying against the Qunari and Ellie gave her a run-through of sorts, “Don’t be scared to fall asleep, okay mami? We’re going to take good care of you,” Inky promised, “Everyone is safe, we’re secure here, and we’ll settle in for the day, okay? So absolutely zero worries! I’ll write papi and make sure he’s okay and doesn’t need anything, and if anything happens I’ll help! And if I can’t do it, I got a lot of people around me who can help me! and…oh! Okay—do I have permission to administer sleeping potion?”

“Of course, Eleanor. Whatever you deem necessary I’m fine with,” Cassandra tiredly assured, brushing her knuckles along Inky’s cheek.

“Kay—so, if you fall asleep soon, don’t worry about it,” Ellie said, raising a hand to cover the one resting against her cheek, givin’ ‘sandra’s hand a little squeeze, “Mami and Sera will help me—we’ll make sure you’re clean and comfortable, in warm jammies and a cot as soon as that becomes available. We’ll keep you warm. You need to stay hydrated, so we’ll be administering fluids however you can best take them on. The only potions I’ll use is sleeping, and a few doses of Vehnan Root and Embrium tonic, um…there’s potion that would help with your recovery that I’ll whip up fresh—that all sounds good to you?” she wondered, running through every last thing…oh. Oh! ‘cause ‘sandra might not be cognizant of what’s goin’ on around her if she’s sleepy, it might scare or confuse her, so Inky was going over everything she might start to wake up to, so she knows what to expect and can know that she’s safe and nothing weirdy is going on—she can just doze off with the peace of mind that everything’s going to be okay. Cassandra nodded. “Okay. So don’t worry about anything—get some good rest, and when you wake up, you’ll be all better, okay mami?”

‘sandra offered her a tired smile. “Do not worry yourself either, love of my heart. I trust under your care that I will, in fact, be all better when next I wake.”

Inky nodded, shite, she looked like she wanted to cry. Sera kind of wanted to cry too. Mums wasn’t allowed to get sick! Or hurt! Or anything! Nothing bad was supposed to happen to them—full stop!

“That was some damn good moving on your part, Imekari,” the Iron Bull spoke quiet, mindful of the sleepy woman laying against him, his hand went to rest on Inky’s shoulder, “you did good. We’re all here, and we’ll help however you need. Your mami is safe, and she is alive because of you. That took some damn guts kid,” he complimented but uh, yikey word choice, he even grumbled a bit like he caught it too and assured, ‘I’d be throwing up if I wasn’t holding the Seeker ‘cause uh…pretty sure no matter what state she’s in, she’d rise up and totally kick my ass. I hire Healers for a reason—shit at it myself.”

“You did very well, da’vehn,” Marehis assured, pulling the girl to sit in her lap.

“I couldn’t’ve done it without Sera’s help—thank you sissy,” Inky said, shite! She didn’t need to be all teary eyed over it! “I know that was hard, and kind of gross but I really appreciate you being brave and watching mami for me.”

“Wasn’t nothin’ ink, glad I was helpful,” she’d felt…pretty well useless in the moment but um, shite, she was glad she’d kept it cool and did what Inky said.

“Here, da’len,” Solas spoke as he approached, sittin’ in front of Inky criss-cross applesauce, holding out a canteen. “You should drink. It is merely water,” he assured.

Little bit of a mischievous smile on Inky’s lips when she raised the canteen to them and got a whiff. “Uh-huh. Has it truly come to this, Dread Wolf?” she wondered drily, as she accused, “Trying to poison me with Vehnan root. Tsk, tsk, tsk.” What the frick-?! Oh. Vehnan root. Elf root. So not-poison then.

“Indulge me in my nefarious schemes if you would please, da’vehnan. I promise I mean you only the upmost harm.”

Inky giggled at that, sipping away at the ‘tainted’ drink, “Gracias papi, my throat really hurt and my stomach was still a little sore—they feel better now.”

“At last! My dastardly deeds have gone perfectly to plan for once,” Solas, frick, the guy was fighting the little smile tugging at his lips as he said, “how refreshing.”

Inky raised a hand to her mouth as she giggled, and that sent the Elf man grinning as if he’d just friggin’ done like, the most amazing thing ever, eyes all crinkly and happy as he shared a little laugh with Inky.

“Oh shit,” Bull warned, “he’s making puns now—this bastard is truly our worst enemy boss-girl.”

“The Iron Bull, don’t be so dramatic. Our worst enemy is the instatement of the ‘no shirt no shoes’ rule. I mean us? Having to wear shirts? By like? Law?” Inky shook her head, “Orlesian criminal and civil justice system is fucked up.”

Poor Bull had to take in a deep breath, hold it as he shook out his laughter, tryin’ to keep it quiet, though ‘sandra was out like a light, poor mum. Sera’d write Cullen too, just…check in on him, make sure he was okay. Guy got real bad headaches, like, big ouch and she thought sometimes stress made them worse. Hearing ‘sandra was hurt, even though she was…she was fine, she was going to be okay, still. It’d freak him out big time. He already hated that they was out here on account of his investigation—he hated that his orders sent them to the Emerald Graves and Emprise du Lion, sent them after Red Templars and put them in the way of Freemen shite. So…he was getting letters! To make sure he was okay, and give him reassurances that they was all safe and staying warm and looking out for each other, and that this shit would be worth it when everything was said and done. Whoever the fuck this Samson asshole was, he was getting arrows in the balls.

Ellie was up the moment she saw…freaking she’d been watching Bull’s ears! Waiting for them to twitch when they picked up the sound of their soldiers and scouts getting close! Marehis was up the second Ellie was, hands on her daughter’s shoulders to support her because shite she-Sera wasn’t sure she should even be standing. And then freaking! She drew her staff! Oh maybe she was gonna use it for support- nope. Nope nope. Inky carried it horizontal at her side as she trekked over to the more open part of the clearin’ just ahead of the mouth of this cavern shite that just…dunno. Something felt off about it. Inky steered clear of it though—she was walking around the clearing and using her staff to scratch…marks? Triangles some places and then rectangles others and when she was done she leaned a little on her staff, swallowin like she thought she might sick-up, but she didn’t, just sheathed her staff again and was heading back to their gathered group just in time to meet their arriving reinforcements. Sera was relieved when Lacey came with the others to bring supplies, got a big hug from her little girlfriend, and she was right worried over Cassandra, frettin’ and helping Inky whip everyone into gear.

“Thank you for coming, I really appreciate all the hard work you guys are doing out here, seriously—if I wasn’t all battle gross right now, all consenting parties would be getting major hugs,” Inky assured, smiles and laughter scattering through their troops, and she nodded before offering up in full seriousness, “Seeker Pentaghast was injured and needs a place to recover. I’ve marked our campsite up—triangles are where I’d like tents, rectangles are for our base of operations, potion stores, food stores, requisitions table and our trusty war horn. I want a barricade on the northern end before the mouth of that cavern, there’s serious Red Lyrium energy coming from that way and I’m decently sure those scratching sounds coming from it aren’t the friendly neighborhood fennecs.” Freaking scratching sounds?! Shite! What- what was making that? Sera didn’t wanna know! “Red Templars will want this position back badly, so I need heavy guard rotations—three rotations of five and five on either side, operating five hour full-alert shifts.” Huh. oh. So like, first rotation would get ten hours to eat and sleep while the other rotations went—second rotation would get ten while third stepped up and then first again, and third would rest during first and second rotations…cool. That…made sense? Shite, she really did want everyone fully ready, no half-assing their posts. These freaking Red Templar freaks was no joke. “I want scouts reporting our position and condition to the infiltration camp who will transfer those reports to Skyhold—every hour on the hour. If they don’t hear from us, they’re to assume we’ve been hit and need backup, to send word to Skyhold to get further reinforcement asap, get someone out here assessing the situation and figuring out how to move forward. Does anyone have any questions? Concerns?”

“Ready Inquisitor!” assurance rang up from their troops.

“You know it’s real neat how you all do that at once, like, it’s a major power trip and honestly I don’t know how I’m going to handle the whole ‘the world is fixed and the Inquisition is no longer necessary’ thing because I’m pretty sure I’ll be fully addicted to it by then,” Inky sighed. “That’s a future me problem though, we’ll let her handle it. Current you guys, get to work—thank you and I love you all,” Inky waved them off, letting them get to work. “Kay, no one should be coming our way, and everyone’s over there busy, so...the Iron Bull, stay with mami but um, keep your eyes shut, okay? No peeping—you’re here for warmth not peekies. Everyone who isn’t Marehis or Sera, if you’d please be so kind, circle up—give us a bit of a wide berth and keep your backs to us—you know, to stay on guard and give mami some privacy, please and thank you.”

Oh. yeah. River was ruddy frozen—they couldn’t freaking take a bath! And it was cold as shite out here anyway!

Inky was getting so much betting money—Sahrnia sucked ass!

But, they had canteens of water and clean rags, so. They managed. And they was able to keep ‘sandra warm against Bull, the Qunari keepin’ his eyes and mouth shut the whole time, even when Sera was pretty sure he could definitely tell ‘sandra was topless for a few minutes—she needed cleaned up! Shite she was sweaty and bloody, and Ink had bandaged her up good but she changed her bandaging out for fresh—the skin was still bruised and scraped up, looked like she’d like, fallen and hit herself at a weird ass angle where her tits wasn’t what hit first, and she scraped her stomach along her ribcage, well. Scraping and there was this one clean line, just a little thing but it was different from the rest of the injury, shite, Inky’d had to cut into her a bit huh? Weirdy but whatever she’d done, it didn’t...it had sounded gross, and there’d been so much freaking blood, but it wasn’t like she’d chopped the woman open or anything, just made a teensy little incision that freaking saved ‘sandra’s whole-ass life. Frig. Inky plied ointment over the mark—the whole injury too—but it looked like she was worried, like maybe ‘sandra might be pissy if something Ellie put on her scarred. And then fresh bandaging. Marehis was helping with washin’ the woman up and shifting her as needed, so Sera dug around in Cassandra’s bag to get her sleeping clothes, and they got her in her sleep shirt before Inky was hittin’ the rest of her, washing her up careful with a clean washrag.

“Dale mami,” Inky said all complimently of ‘sandra’s bits.

“Da’vehnan,” Marehis laughingly chastised.

“What? I’m just saying! She’s cute and super healthy!”

Really? Sera felt a little blushy ‘cause uh...well, they was a little similar—her and ‘sandra in the uh, downstairs region. Like duh, vaginas, but not all vaginas looked exactly the same from the um. Outside. And Inky said it was...healthy? Sera’d always been a little self-conscious ‘cause um...her lady parts, outside of ‘em, the lips or labias or whatever the frig, had a little more dangle to them than what she’d seen on most of the girls she’d been with. And there was…she wasn’t much into it—much!—but there was the occasional like…smut mag. These things where women was all drawn up, uh…in various states of dress. Sometimes zero dress with everything uh…out there. And their business was always drawn real neat and tiny, so she’d kind of worried something was wrong with hers\(^8\).

But there was nothin’ wrong with ‘sandra once all was said and done—they got her squeaky clean and in fresh jammies—double socks because it was freaking cold! And by the time they was done, their tent was up—Sera’d arranged for the big one they used in the Emerald Graves to be transported here with them, it’d been set up real nice and everyone laid claim to their cots, they got Cassandra comfy and bundled, Inky asking Bull the stay with her please until their tent got warmed up. Cole too—he was to monitor ‘sandra close, call for Inky the very second something happened, if Cassandra was in pain or running a fever or waking up or something felt wrong. Inky was pretty religious with the potions—first thing first, she poured her refill flask of Embrium for her steamy necklace into a tea pot she uh, heated direct in the palm of her hands until it was steaming and she asked Dorian if he would watch it, get it steaming again if it stopped—help moisten the air in the tent for ‘sandra so her poor healin’ lung wasn’t breathing in scrapey dry air, boost her protection from respiratory infection with the Embrium in it. ‘Mami’ was to have sleeping potion twice, one Ink administered once they got her settled in the tent, and once again in six hours—that’d give her body enough time to healthily process it before adding another one to the mix to keep her sleeping safely for at least twelve hours straight—if she slept more, more power to her, she needed it. And hydrating, nutritive potion every four hours until she was awake. And Health potion—every four hours. ‘sandra had…Inky said it was ‘vitamins’ she took every morning, but Sera was pretty sure she meant her depression potion, just, being cool with it—she’d make sure that got taken with nutritive potion when they had breakfast if she slept through it. She announced this schedule to…well, everyone, so they knew if something wasn’t happening at a certain time, someone needed to jump in and take care of it. But Inky was pretty much in charge of it all—administered potion to Cassandra before disappearing from the tent for…well Sera thought she was just checking on how everything was going outside but she didn’t come back. Solas slipped out of the tent a moment later, saying he was going to assist her and Sera…she had that panicky feeling again—like she had whenever Inky was sick? That if she let Cassandra out of sight for even a moment, something awful would happen. But curiosity-mixed-concern got the better of her when she felt…something ‘ouch’ in the bond. Wait…

Oh frig! She was doing it! She was worried about Inky and her magic was checking up on her and letting her feel…shite! Where the frick was Inky’s steamy necklace?! She’d been wearing it, hadn’t she? Sera had smelled it real strong for most of the day but…it wasn’t doing its thing now. Or did it just not work full stop? No, no, it worked—Inky’s breathing didn’t get real rattley when she wore it and Solas confirmed her lungs didn’t hurt so much breathing in cold, dry air. But freaking ouch! It was like scrapey little knives in her lungs! So what the fuck?!

Inky was at the potions table, Solas at her side, both their hands involved in holding and adjusting this little cauldron over uh…well, their hands. Like, Inky had a hand palm-up on the table, and Solas did too, both conjuring matching fire into them, and in their hands rested the cauldron. Solas was using his other hand to hold the cauldron still and secure while Inky stirred and occasionally stopped to chop up shite and throw it in.

“Um…hey Inky, I can refill your necklace—”

“Not right now Ser’,” Ink said, not…snippy, but short like she didn’t have a whole lot of focus to spare. She was really paying attention to her potion, huh? probably didn’t realize,

“It’s empty, sweets, I can just—“

“Not right now!” Though she reached out in the bond with something that felt like ‘love you’ and ‘sorry’. “Lace is doing something go b- go help her, kay?”

Kind of felt…hand throwy at the ‘b’ sound, ‘cause that sounded like the start of ‘bother’. She wasn’t tryin’ to be a freaking bother! She was trying to help! But Ink’d caught herself, hadn’t been trying to be mean. Sera just felt…well, shite. Because she- she wanted to help! And all she felt like she’d done was…bother Inky. She was good at sciency stuff, had helped her with potion before but…well it’d been easier stuff and uh, they’d had a proper set up—fire, instead of Inky having to make the kind of heat required for them. And she’d gone into it with Sera, not starting on her own and having someone come up and pick at her attention. But Solas had come out to join her too! Oh. She probably sent for him. Why hadn’t she sent for Sera?! She— …well she wasn’t like, real good with fire. Or any good, really, she couldn’t cast any fire spells yet. Only thing she was like, good-good at with magic was icy pish and uh…that was the exact opposite of what Inky needed.

Blah! Okay, this was some bullshit, Sera’s brain was doing some bullshit! She wasn’t useless—no one thought that! No one she loved, anyway. And she wasn’t a bother, and no one was treating her like she was! She could help—Inky didn’t just need potion, she needed camp running smooth! And Sera was boss at that! She would go see Lacey and see if she could help—not ‘if’, ‘how’!

She wasn’t going to say bother, Cuddly got all mindy on her, she was going to say ‘be with’ but worried that might sound inappropriate like she meant you’d permission to go get Lace from her work to be with her girlfriend. There are thoughts I heard when we arrived, I told Ellie because she would want to know. There’s gossip that bothers Lacey, that the Inquisitor plays favorites because you’re so close and Lace is with you. It hurts Ellie that anyone would think badly of Lace, so she wanted to be more careful, make it sound completely professional because it is. You’re professional, you can help.

Oh, okay, Sera was going to kick major arse if she heard anyone say shite about Lacey! Inky didn’t play favorites out of nepotism or whatever the frig. She played favorites cuz Lacey was her favorite! Freaking Lace worked hard, the Inquisition wouldn’t get fuck all done without her. Cripes that pissed her off! Ugh! Sera helped Lace unload things into their stores for food and pish. And word had come from Skyhold—Cullen to Inky and Sera, and Josie to Cole for Inky. Cole mind-talked to gave her permission to read Josie’s letter to him so she looked it over—Esmee’s info included and a uh…yikes-looking transaction list that confirmed a shit load of stuff was hauling ass to get to Sahrnia already. And papa had tacked on to Josie’s letter, asking after Cole and everyone, and assuring he and his people were all working on getting warm clothing sent out before this evening. Kay. So Sera set aside Esmee’s information and the offer Josie wrote her for Ink to approve, and then she wrote to the infiltration camp, a report that said to be on the look out for Tailor Aclassi’s delivery and to distribute it to the townspeople as soon as they could, gave them a heads up about deliveries of tenting and food and water coming in for Sahrnia too—if they needed more hands on deck, they was to send word to them, and they would send who they could spare.

—

Sera, oh Maker I hope this finds you well. Are you hurt at all, sweetheart? Ellie wrote and said you weren’t hurt, that she is fine (is she? Cassandra warns she’s not allowed to use that qualifier) but your mami was injured—recovering, but it was rather serious? A punctured lung sounds extremely serious. Please, be careful out there. I love you and I miss you and I’m so incredibly, ridiculously proud of you every time I get a report from the Emerald Graves—sweetheart you were amazing! And I’m sure you’re doing amazing in Emprise du Lion. Be safe, watch out for your sister, and do tell your mother she is to cease this punctured lung business—injury to her person is injury to my very heart, and puncturing ones heart is rather a fatal blow. She’s killing me—your mother is killing me, when she is better, please inform her of as much. You’re not hurt, are you? Please take care of yourself sweet girl.

-Cullen

PS Or…would dad be a more correct term? If, you know, there is to be a term at all. Entirely up to you.

Really?
PPS Cassandra did write to inform me you have called her ‘mum’. You did not hear this from me, but she is incredibly honored and absolutely loves this development and I will not be at all insanely jealous.

PPPS Would da work? Or papi—Sera is Antivan. Very fitting for my girl, ‘to be!’: Or father? That’s a bit formal for my liking but it also makes it sound like I’m well off and own an estate and drink old expensive bourbon while staring into large fireplaces—you could get away with so much probably ‘oh my father will hear of this!’ whenever someone crosses you. Papa is acceptable but I would be worried about confusion between myself and Mister Aclassi, how your mothers handle both being ‘mami’ is astounding.

PPPPS Absolutely zero pressure, I ramble because I’m nervous and trying to work with you if you’ve some wish for a change of address with me but aren’t sure which you would like. Call me assface for all I care. Please don’t call me assface—small amount of pressure to resume calling me Cullen, but again, entirely up to you.

PPPPPS This is just in case you enjoy the abundance of p’s needed to denote each additional post-script. Josie is glaring at me—she claims I’m using an excessive amount of ink! The nerve! It’s a perfect amount of ink to convey my important letter to my perfect child!

Freaking Cullen was a nut! And freaking her- her dad, so yeah! The whole letter wreaked of it, if she hadn’t thought as much before she would certainly think so now, Maker!

So she dropped him a little note, Hey Dad. Yeah I’m okay, it’s freaking freezing here though! Inky is taking real good care of Cassandra, she’s got a whole potions schedule for her and everything. So, Inky’s watching out for Cassandra, and I’m watching out for her. You’re doing okay, right? We’ll keep reports coming in—don’t worry about this none, we’re here and we’ll handle it and hopefully when all this shite is through you can punch this Samson bastard in the face or something. Drew a crappy little ugly dude face, ‘cause she figured that’s what Samson freaking looks like, and drew little arrows in his dumb face!

Kay. So, food stores were settled, guard rotation looked good, set up how Inky ordered. Oh, food—lunch! Thom was already poking around their stores though, so she made sure he was planning on whipping up lunch, asked if he needed any help—freaking, Inky needed to eat! Once she was done with her whatever-the-frig she and Solas was up to. It looked like a lot of work. Mare even checked on them, quietly asking if they needed anything. Dabbled a hankie at Solas’s forehead and brought Inky water to sip at before joining Sera and Thom, helping get lunch handled.

Ink and Solas looked relieved as all get out as they finished their potions project, friggin’ Solas was sort of leaning against the table for support for a minute, Ink’s hands was shaking something fierce as she reached for vials to pour potion into.

Sera approached, little nervous but, “Can…can I help Inky?”

Ellie blinked a bit, like she was trying to focus and then she smiled real tired, “Please sissy? Thanks.”

“Course.” Yeah, she could do this no problem! Real carefully she poured potion into the vials Inky had set out, filling- shite, all this for a single vial of pish?

“Can…can you hold it up to the sunlight for me sissy? Sun shining directly through it, and tell me what color it is?”

Sera nodded, uh…sun had moved and it was right cloudy overhead, but she got the potion in the light and oh- shite. It- it’d been this murky grey color but now, “s’white, inky? Goldy streaks all through it.”

Ellie heaved a sigh of relief, “Thank the Maker,” she breathed. Then, “And papi,” she took a beat and Sera set the potion down on the worktable, raised her hand to rub circles on Ink’s back.

“You want me to fill your necklace now Ink?” Sera wondered.

“Oh, gosh! Thanks for thinking of me sissy, I’m sorry I was snappy,” awe. Was sweet, but she didn’t gotta be sorry for bein’ focused on something important. Still nice to get hugged though! “I’m okay um…can I use your Embrium water please?” she asked.

Oh! “Sure thing Ink,” Sera said, handin’ over her flask. Inky didn’t move to refill her necklace just yet, but Sera wasn’t the one who needed it, wasn’t a big deal if Inky held onto it, clipping the flask to her belt. “Lunch is on,” Sera told her, hoping, “your tummy feels better?”

Inky nodded, “Uh-huh! Thanks—I’ll eat in a minute, Mami should take potion before it cools. You go ahead, kay sissy? Gosh, I forgot all about lunch, make sure you eat good,” she fretted, looking Sera over, “You’re okay? You’re warm enough?”

Huh? Oh, was in her sleep shirt—friggin tits could only dig being in armor for so long, she’d wanted to get more comfortable, had her overcoat draped around her shoulders so she wasn’t freezing. “Yeah Inky, I’m fine. You okay?”

Ink nodded as she stepped way from Sera, cool—she was okay on her feet, not so shaky anymore as she took the potion she’d made and dashed off to the tent. Solas smiled warm when Sera offered him her arm, just, guy looked warn out and she figured he would be ready to eat too—she was gonna make Inky a plate for when she was all done with ‘sandra. “What was that stuff?” Sera asked.

“I don’t rightly know. It was rather the large mix of Vehnan root, Crystal Grace, Embrium,” Solas sighed, “we made quite the concentration, that stuff may well be capable of waking the dead.”

“Maker’s Breath,” Viv said, she’d come out for lunch with Dori and Bull, Thom filling a bowl of stew for her.

“Yeah, cripes, it’s crazy all that only turned into one friggin vial.”

“It was not an oath, child, but the name—the potion is ‘Maker’s Breath’. Its an extreme concentration of healing properties for handling debilitating respiratory illness—brewed to perfection, a single vial is all one needs.”

“Da’vehnan,” Marehis greeted as Inky emerged from the tent, though the Human girl went to Sera first, looked like she was gonna hug her but something…huh, her magic told her to stick her arms straight up? Which was weirdy, made her overcoat slip off her shoulders and onto the ground, but okay? So she did and Ellie let out a little happy squeak before- frig! Awe! Inky Sweets had gotten Sera’s sweater for her! She pulled it over Sera’s arms and head, the Human girl picking up Sera’s fallen coat to drape it back over her shoulders and then Ellie’s arms were around her neck giving her a squeazy hug, frig! Sweater was tasty! Like…dunno, Ink’d…gosh. Her magic was already ‘xhausted from holdin’ fire for so long and she’d still managed to squeeze out a bit more to make Sera’s sweater feel cuddly warm! Made Sera wanna hug her and lay the frick down for a nap it was so cozy! But naps could wait, Ellie finally sat it down to lunch, sitting in Marehis’s lap, snuggling up to her and signing real content.

“Mami’s sleeping really good and she took potion so well! Her chest sounds clear and she isn’t developing infection, potion should keep her from doing that…still want a dose of Vehnan root in…gosh, pretty soon, wowza, were we brewing for two hours papi? Gosh, I’m sorry just…um, it kind of…it takes longer to brew at the lower temperature but—”

“It comes together stronger—yes,” Solas assured, “I do understand the methodology of ‘low and slow’. It was pertinent to get it in the Seeker’s system quickly after such an injury, but yes, taking the time allotted proves beneficial as well in the final result, I’m pleased to have helped you to your mother’s benefit, Ellie.”

“Eleanor,” Viv spoke up, real careful, like she was caught somewhere between bein’ worrying about pressuring Ink with her question and bein’ scared of what her answer might be, but, “is there some...reason you do not come to me when you’ve need of magical assistance?” she wondered.

“Huh?” and then Inky gasped, “Oh gosh! Tia! Awe, I love you loads—honest! There’s all sorts of stuff I’d come to you for if I needed help, I just- I wouldn’t want to mess you up.”

And now the woman was just confused. “Mess me up?”

“With your own potions project. Gosh, you practiced so much in Val Royeaux, I mean you spent days at the University. You’re practicing to get your timing down just right, yeah? Developing muscle memory and reinforcing it—I’d hate for it to come down to your final project and you’re so caught up in what you’re doing your hands remember something we did with potion I didn’t necessarily need you to help me with. I’ll come to you if I need help with learning a spell or demons, or hair trouble or problems with bossy nobility or just needing a hug from my favorite tia!”

Viv’s brow raised at that, “…truly?”

“In and out of the field!” Inky assured, “Well, except out of the field you’re tied—it’s still first favorite! Just! With Tia Josie—I’m sorry! But I love her to pieces of pieces! When we were all shopping together my heart was so happy! It was the best Tia-Mija date ever!”

Shite, Viv looked ruddy…like she was horrified to find herself moved, almost teary at that. Madam had to clear her throat at that, “Well…perhaps we shall make time for another such outing. Too, I…delight in Lady Montilyet’s company, there is no reason she cannot join us when we’ve meals together, save her own schedule perhaps but we could work to suit that. If it…if the notion pleases you, my dear.”

“Tia!” Inky said, almost screamy with excitement, “That’s the best idea anyone has ever had in life ever! Yes please!” and then she was real gaspy with excitement, “Podemos hablar en Antivan todo el tiempo?”

Viv uh, got real blushy, softest little smile on her face as she supposed, “Si te gusta,” with a nod. Speakin’ warm as she assured, “Of course, my darling. I will write Lady Josephine and make arrangement. Something to look forward to, upon our return to Skyhold.”

Oh shite- oh shite! Inky…Inky smiled but her chin was a little quivery, eyes tearing up as she nodded, snifflin’, crap!

“Oh da’len,” Mare rubbed Ellie’s back.

“Sorry! Sorry! I really do love it,” Ink assured, hastily wiping at her eyes and smiling to Viv, “gosh, yeah, I miss Skyhold just awful.”

“s’okay to be homesick Inky,” Sera said—they was getting fists! Fists to the face if anyone so much as thought making Inky feel like she was a baby for missing home and the people there! Cripes. Sera’d only heard once from Kremmy-boy, and Ink…well Sera knew she thought the world about the sort of treatment he’d be getting—she’d never heard of it but once she did it made sense to her, she felt almost dumb for not thinking of it herself before, testoster-whatever helping with um…shite, what had Krem called it? Gender…dysphoria! Yeah, anyway, Krem’d connected Ink with his Healer Goode. Which uh…was good? Like a good omen maybe, havin’ a Healer already labeled that? Healer Goode was real sweet, Krem told her that his girlfriend was into healing, would be supporting him through all this so she sent along a shite ton of information, booklets and a pages long letter offering her insight and letting Ellie know she could feel free to write her anytime with questions and if she was ever in Elmridge*, Healer Goode would love to meet with her. Didn’t come off like a ‘I wanna rub elbows with the Inquisitor’ invite either, ‘cause Krem wasn’t in the business of throwing her title around and the things she wrote had to be sent through Krem—Healer Goode sending him the package marked ‘To Lieutenant Cremisius Aclassi’ with a little note attached ‘for your Ellie’. And Krem’d fessed up to yeah, keeping his connection to the Inquisition’s leader on the down low but uh…sounded like he was a little embarrassed, at least that’s what Sera got when Krem wrote to her when she asked after his appointment—’cause apparently Healer Goode posed the question “what’s your support system like?” and he’d talked about Bull and the Chargers, and his papa, his friends and mentors in the Inquisition…and then his girlfriend. To the point their appointment ran over into the Healer’s lunch break and now there was some lady Inky never met who knew she smiles like sunshine, loves coffee, her mabari, and feta cheese, and her favorite color’s green, and one time, while evading guardsmen after her and her friends for settin’ off illegal fireworks in the woods, she straight up got knocked out from running face-first into a tree and woke up off the hook for her crimes ‘cause they saw her hit that tree and thought ‘oh, the poor girl’s blind’ and he was pretty sure that was the first time he thought he wanted to marry her—her telling him that story. Sera’d never ruddy heard about that before! And Inky was pretty cute when Sera asked her about it, animated and enthusiastic as she retold it for her in front of her party the other night, it’d been a right riot.

Oh! Frig, anyway—Ink had to be missing everyone back in Skyhold but especially Krem, she was excited for him explorin’ this treatment but yeah, there was a level of nervousness too. She was ruddy terrified something might go wrong—what if there was some complication where Krem didn’t like how he was respondin’ to treatment, or worse he responded in some way that was harmful to him? What if it hurt his sense of self? There was like, things about people* who’d done this before and when they encounter dysphoric feelings or reminders of their birth identity they had worse feelings about it, could even get angry with themselves, hate it! She- she wanted him to do this for him, for his own sense of self and peace of mind and mental, physical health, but she hated being so far away—there was a difference between being able to go see him, be able to get all the information on what was happening in the moment if something was going wrong for him because she was present and being able to help or comfort him in person, and just maybe getting some mention of it in a letter, writing that she loves him and offerin’ support on paper. What if he really needed him and she couldn’t be there? And what if…what if he didn’t er…like her none, didn’t find himself attracted to her anymore? Things like that could change, when people started messin’ with their hormones, sometimes people who identified one sexuality came out the other side attracted to something completely different or…what if he did get er…super upset, feel abandoned or finds he really hates the long-distance part of their relationship more than just cutsey “I hate when you’re gone mwah mwah mwah”? And then Inky felt like absolute shit that she was worried about that because that- that just affected her and this wasn’t about her, she said—she wanted what was best for him! If this led to him being happier and healthier? Loving himself more? She wanted that way more than she needed him to love her. Which was…dumb! Sera’d be devastated if Lacey or Widdle broke up with her! She didn’t freaking want to be devastated! She usually went out of her way to avoid that pish! So it wasn’t wrong of Inky to not be thrilled at the fear of Krem not wanting to be with her anymore! That shit would hurt!

And Cullen was…he was sicky too. Real bad migraines, it scared Sera. Day before they left Skyhold this last time, she’d walked into his office to update him that she would be going with Thom’s people and Lace to investigate the Emerald Graves and found him at his desk, no lamp light, hunched over with his head in his hands, just pale—no freaking color to him whatsoever, like he- like Lady, when they found her dead. Pallid and clammy and strained, like the muscle and tendons in his head was tryin’ to squeeze his aching skull out so they wouldn’t have to put up with it anymore, just exhausted looking.

“Cullen? Shite, d-do you need-“ Adan, she was gonna say but, Cullen sat up, right startled but he smiled real big, breezed right through, “To see my brilliant child? I did! Come on in sweetheart, what can I do for you?”

It…it wasn’t any fun, knowing something was wrong, that there wasn’t much you could do to help to begin with but…it was worrisome, being away and not being there if he did need someone to get him a Healer in an emergency. And this shite with Samson, it was definitely wearing on him, had to be making him anxious, what if he wasn’t eating or- or getting enough sleep or- just in general havin’ shite headaches and then doin’ things that contribute to that even more because of all this?! Inky wanted with everything to do whatever she could to help Cullen—she hated how much this was all getting to him, it pushed her harder to want to be perfect at setting it right, go in, solve their problems, and their next report home is “Everything’s great papi! There’s no more problems in the world and you can knock back potion, eat some soup, take a hot relaxin’ bath, and go to bed!”

Sahrnia was shite, ‘sandra was sick, and so was the two most important men in Ink’s life—possibly important people in her life ‘cause Krem was definitely top two favorites of all people, and Ink was a major papi’s girl.

And there was a major time crunch—‘cause all this shite? Needed handled before the freaking Wardens did their crazy blood magic meeting in the Western Approach.

Inky was stressed and she could cry about whatever the fuck she wanted to! Sera snuggled up with Mare and Inky, tryin’ to share the warmth the Human girl had put into her sweater. It was freaking cold out!

Sahrnia was shite!
Sera…was still real shite at the bond stuff.

Ink handled her paperwork during lunch—stomaching a few bites of stew as she scratched away a letter to that Esmee lady for a change of post, if she’d come work for a few weeks with the people of Sahrnia until they was back on their feet, get a proper healer in house or…well, they might just have to ruddy relocate. Which was another thing—wrote up Josie and the advisors, talking plans for the Inquisition to assist if Sahrnia was straight up lost and its people needed moved. Sera thought…she saw the half bowl of stew and thought Inky had gotten seconds, like normal, and just hadn’t finished it. And then she took care of administerin’ potion to Cassandra, checking on her, well, every hour on the hour really Sera realized about the fifth time it happened. Cole might’ve been monitoring her, but Ink was still constantly checking her watch and going to make sure Cassandra wasn’t suffering complications. And she laid down with Sera and Mare that night, in the cot alongside the one she had ‘sandra set up in, Inky laying between them and the Seeker after she got another pot of Embrarium steam running once the first finally steamed all the way empty. She didn’t lay down just yet though, she had a little jar of…oh! Lotion pish Viv made for Sera um, after she found out ‘bout Sera’s lyrium burn. She’d um…known Lyrium burns just sort of always felt scratchy and burny, even after they was healed—Sera’d found a jar of lotion in her pack on the way to Sahrnia, Viv’s handwriting on the label, something pretty smelling and medicinal that soothed the milky-white scar on Sera’s palm real nice. Inky’d gotten the jar out of Sera’s pack and took her hand, massaging lotion into Sera’s hand before pressing a kiss to her cheek and saying she was sorry but she didn’t think she would dream in the Fade with them tonight. Which Sera thought was fair, Inky might be scared she’d see bad shite in the Fade or…or maybe she just needed a break from it. Sera didn’t think she’d ever get bored of the Fade. Crazy as that sounded, she used to be ruddy terrified of it but now it was like, the ultimate play place, she could dictate what was happenin’ while she was dreamin’! Who wouldn’t want that? But yeah, taking potion to sleep, just get some pure, deep rest where her brain would be totally off for a few hours? Sera could respect it.

So she was right confused when breakfast rolled around and Inky looked like she hadn’t slept for shite.

“Inmekari? You okay babe?” Bull wondered when he gingerly passed her a bowl of oatmeal. “Mmhmm,” she nodded, sloppin’ her food around with her spoon a bit before taking a bite she swallowed and then, “Mami will wake up today. I’d like to close the Rifts before she does.” …uhhh… “All of ‘em, Ink?” Sera asked. Lace uh…no one had been able to get straight through this shitezone. They wasn’t sure how many of those fucking things were in the area, ‘cept for the ones just right smack on the river outside Sahrnia.

Which was the ones she meant, duh. “The river ones, yeah,” she swallowed again uh, no food that time, just nerves. “They’re pretty bad and I…mami needs time to recover. If she wakes up and they’re still out there, we’ll still need to deal with them and she’s not going to like being awake and having to just lay there waiting for us to get back, plus that’s…that’s super stressful, everyone going off and leaving her to worry will just…it’s not conducive to actual rest and recovery so we’re not doing it—if everyone is with me, I’d appreciate it if we could hit them after breakfast.”

It wasn’t…it wasn’t till Inky was sealing the first Rift shut that Sera realized she wasn’t hearing the vibrating rattle of runestones resonating from Fade Magic gettin’ forced through them. Because they wasn’t.

“Is everyone good on potion? No one hurt real bad?” Ink checked, everyone had to dip into their potions but nothin’ serious. “Okay then, lets hit the second and call it a day.”

“Inky!” Sera screeched, friggin’ alarmed, she-! “You’re not wearing your bracer! Shite—Cole—”

Ink’s hand was on her arm as she- frick, “Stop!” broke fierce from her lips. “Cole’s watching mami!”

“It’s just real quick Ink, he can bring your bracer and zip right bac—“

“Its fine,” Ellie insisted, voice a little cracky—dry, hallow sounding. “my own fault forgetting—I’ll remember next time, won’t I?”
That…didn’t…okay that sounded almost creepy, like- like punishing herself? “Inky.”
“Da’vehn an, do not be so hard on yourself. Cole can stay put, I’m no Spirit but I’m swift, I can-“ Marehis was offering.

“Keep it moving to the next Rift faster then. It’s literally right over there, why would we waste our time?” Ellie drawled almost…almost a literal eyeroll accompanying her tone.
No one was hurt real bad but uh…they was all staring at Inky like she done went and grew a second head. More like a second personality. Since when did she talk back at Marehis?

“Inky.” the name shot out of Vivienne and Solas’s mouths in unison before their very separate, overlapping, “-take that tone with your mother again and I’ll take that glib tongue of yours and freeze it.”
“-apologize to your mother this instant.”
Ink was already moving forward…toward the next Rift which-
This whole fucking place was shite.

“I’ll be sorry for her then,” Sera said, restin’ a hand on Marehis’s shoulder, “let’s just go close that thing.”

“If the Inquisitor insists on behaving like a brat-“ Viv started.
“Look where we are!” Sera snapped, “Fucking what? A shit shoot from camp? Two freaking huge ass Rifts within a mile of our beds last night. The Inquisitor has been holding it down for twenty four fucking hours with no sleep, fuck all to eat, in nerve sizzling pain that only gets worse the longer we stand around. She can be plenty sorry when she isn’t about to keel over, okay?”

“Why the hell hasn’t she been wearing her bracer?” Dorian wanted to know.

“She can’t!” oh Sera was- she was about to catch a tude! Start fightin’ the grown ups for sicky Inky!

“Sera is correct,” Solas rasped as if he’d just…the fuck was he doing all day?! He was the one actually good at the bond and he was just now using it?! “These Rifts, they are powerful, proximity to our camp alone would have worn her runestones down twice over at the very least, if not thrice, had she worn her bracer the whole of our time in their reach. Runestones, unfortunately, do not grow on trees.”

Gotta be made. With rare-ass ingredients. Shite. And Ink…she wasn’t punishin herself she was just literally dead-ass tired, didn’t wanna say she was hurtin’ but didn’t have the energy in her to dance around and spout off some cheery bit about them being able to press on with the power of love or some shite.

Vivienne sighed out a frustrated sound, "She could have returned to the infiltration camp, none of us would begrudge her that-"

"Infiltration camps even closer to the Rift and even if it wasn’t, ’sandra couldn't ruddy be moved and if you think Inky would just leave her right now you're out of your freaking mind," Sera argued.

“Shit,” Bull swore softly as they started following after Inky who stopped short of settin’ the Rift off all on her lonesome, frick that would’ve been bad! They needed to catch up! “No wonder kid forgot to put it on when it was time to move out.”

Sera…wasn’t too sure she’d actually forgotten. “Anyone check on ’sandra last night?” She sure fucking hadn’t. Shit. She’d been ruddy tired and just slept hard until she smelled breakfast. Checked on ’sandra once she was up, pecked a lil’ kiss to her cheek and made sure the blankets was snug around her. They had been, cuz ink hadn’t shared them with her, she’d bundled her mami up, and laid at her side wide awake and watchin’ all night.

“I woke and made sure she was well,” Marehis said. Awe, sweet.

“And was Ink up?”

“She-” Marehis blanched. “She said she was merely re-heating the pot of Embrium solution and then she would return to bed.”

Yeah…sounded like one of Ink’s ‘not-a-lie’s—she’d be returning to bed. Didn’t mean she was going to sleep. “Ink’s scared shitless ’sandra was gonna have some complication in the night.
If she fell asleep and something happened, she’d never forgive herself. Huge ass Rifts burning at her Mark probably helped her stay ‘wake.’

“Might be the only thing keeping her awake,” Bull rasped out.

Ink was standin’ kind of shaking herself, jostling on her feet like she was working out some nervous energy Sera wasn’t sure where the fuck she got ‘cuz she had to be about out of energy for forever at this point but when they caught up to her she cleared her throat, chin quivering.

“I’m sorry, mami, seriously,” she snifflled, “I’m being a bitch and none of you deserve that—"

Oh, Mare was arguey at that, “Da’veh!”

“You’re all out here doing this for me, it’s early and miserable out and we’re down a badass Seeker of Truth. That wasn’t right and I’m sorry.”

“I forgive you, sweet girl—I’ve said things to my own mother that would make your snapping sound like an ‘I love you’.”

“I do love you mami,” Ink promised, soundin’ miserable with herself and Mare pulled her in for a hug.

Did not love the second Rift though, but they survived it, if only freaking barely. Everyone drained their potions real hard, and Thom was limpin’ it back but Sera offered her shoulders for support. Bull’d have done it but he was a little occupied. Second the Rift was sealed, Inky was on her knees, workin’ to catch her breath, trembling and the Qunari had immediately scooped her up and started carrying her back to camp, Marehis on his heels.

“I’m okay,” Ink sniffled as they neared the frozen riverbank, “th-thanks the Iron Bull.”

“Should lay it down Imekari,” the Qunari intoned when she swayed as he set her on her feet. “I have to check on mami, she’ll be waking up soon,” though, whew. Okay. Ink had put her runestone bracer in the chest they kept in camp of important armor pish, broke it out now ’cause there wasn’t any Rifts around to wear it down, but it…Maker she was glad it could distract her Mark, keep it from burning full stop and that wouldn’t wear her bracer down bad.

And um, she did finally get to ‘laying it down’.

Ink stopped real still the moment she stepped into the tent.

“Good morning Eleanor,” Cassandra greeted soft warmth in her voice. Cole’d piled most of their pillows up so she didn’t have to put any effort into it, was just propped up real comfy, a little tired but cozy. But she was up and warm and readin’ the book Papa Aclassi had sent her, Cole was seated criss-cross on the cot next to hers holding onto a warm mug of tea for her.

Sera could smell salt, Ink was definitely tearing up, breath a little shuddery before she asked, “How are you feeling?”

“She is recovering—she is tired but not badly.” Cole readily reported, “Her lungs do not hurt, her breathing is back to normal, she does not have an infection or bleeding or blood clots.”

“I am alright, sweet girl,” Cassandra confirmed.

…Inky hyperventilated for a hot second before a sob tore from her throat and she just went full weepy, crying, “I was so scared! I’m so gl-gl-glad you’re alright, I— awe sweet babe, she was cryin’ too much to talk.

“I am alright, sweet girl. Are you?”

Ink nodded even as she fell into the cot alongside ‘sandra. “I’m really tired mami, my everything kind of hurts right now and I’m…I’m so…” she snifflled a bit, voice petering out on her as…shite. Being armored up wasn’t uncomfortable enough to keep her conscious. “I’m so glad…”

Cassandra rested a hand on Ink’s back, “…would someone care to explain my child’s current state?”…well. Already recovered her mum bear glare. Yikes.

“Your body was badly hurt.” Cole said simply as if that were, in itself, explanation. And then, “Oh. She stayed up watching over you, I watched over you but she needed to do it herself, could not sleep because she was scared you would die. She did the same thing when my body was badly hurt. She thought she messed up again. She didn’t mess up before, but she feels like she did, she couldn’t let it happen to us.”

Well at least ‘sandra was as confused as everyone else, “Cole?”

“A boy from Ava’s village, he was playing with his older brother, playing swords but with pitch forks, and ended up with one of the tines in his throat. His brother ran with him to Ava, and Ellie was visiting. Ellie had never helped with that before—Ava talked her through treatment. She did as instructed, there was nothing else she could have done, they plied stitches and potion and ointment and rest and prayer and still, Ellie woke in the morning to discover he had died in the night."

“Maker,” ’sandra breathed, running a hand through ink’s hair, playing a bit with the part that had unwound from the braid Mare’d put it in.

“Ellie did not have Ava to talk her through this time, we are in terrible climate for recovery, everything is against it—Sahrnia needs so much, the Inquisition needs so much, we were not prepared for this quest to take so much, so long. Everything is scarce. So she has been making sure nothing is scarce for you. That you were warm, had good air to breathe. She used the last of her Embrium water, Sera’s, to do that, there is only so much left in her stores, she is saving it for emergency—the if of you needing it disarming her need for it, it is just plain water in her steam necklace now.” Shite! Sera thought it smelled different—still smelled like Embrium ‘cause it usually had the stuff in there all the time, it lingered even when the necklace was empty. “Then she watched and waited, guards until you were safe and sound, burning in her Mark to keep focused. Now she is full of relief.”

Viv cleared her throat. “Dorian.”

“Yes dear, I’m with you,” he immediately…agreed?

“We will go prepare more Embrium water.” Oh! Sweet!

“Ellie hid her Embrium so no one could use it for not-Cassandra,” Cole said, “It is in her socks. Not the ones on her feet—the clean ones in her pack.”

Sera dug around in Ink’s things for them—she needed ‘em anyway, the socks. “Kay, you lot do that—thanks,” she said, handin’ ink’s stash off to them. Pfft. Inky had a stash. Just wasn’t anything fun, cripes, she was such cute little dork!

Sleepy dork. Dumb, sweet Ink.

“Let’s get Inky cleaned and cozy,” Sera said, Mare nodding, pressin’ a kiss to Sera’s temple as she murmured, “Excellent thinking da’vehnan.”

Everyone cleared out, even Cuddly made himself scarce, he wanted to help the others. ’sandra sat up more to offer, “I would be of assistance if that suits? Eleanor made certain I was clean the other day after all.”

“Mmm yes,” Marehis hummed as she dug out clean sleep clothes and wash cloths, “She was very complimentary.”

“…complimentary?”

Sera snorted. “Dale on yer bits, ’sandra,” she tattled with a giggle as she fell into bed alongside her and Ink, pullin’ the girl’s boots off. Frick! Good thing she hadn’t hid none of her Embrium in her wearin’ socks. Maker, stinky Inky!

“You’re super cute and healthy, in Ellie’s medical opinion,” Marehis teased, “We’re in agreement, of course.”

“I’m…my…” ’sandra was bright red, very tentatively pointin’ at her chest.

“I said yer bits mum,” Sera corrected, “not your tits.”

…well. Her lungs was workin’ good cuz she took a deep, deep breath.

“Maker preserve me.”

There was a sentiment Sera had expressed multiple times since their arrival to Emprise du Lion, that Marehis whole heartedly agreed with. It fit this whole experience rather well. Sahrnia is shite.

Succinct, accurate, the stuff of poetry really.
She wasn’t certain what was worse, really. The Red Templars, the Red Lyrium, or the red in her underthings.

Ugh. She was relieved in that regard, unpleasant as it all was—she’d been petrified for weeks when she realized she’d missed her monthly when it should have reared its ugly head in the wake of losing both Haven and access to potion. Adan had only barely gotten enough to supply Ellie as quickly as he had. Solas’s assurances were enough to set her mind to ease enough to pursue potion that would encourage her to return to her own er, natural rhythm. But it was even more assuring once, well…

She’d been wholly asleep—Ellie was curled up against her chest, Sera wrapped around her sister in their sleep, snoring softly against the Human girl’s ear, Cassandra…oh it was such a relief to hear her breathing clearly and strong, Sera’s head tucked under the Human woman’s chin as the Seeker held her close. Marethis startled when she felt a hand at her back, warm and familiar gently stirring and she had conflicting thoughts.

She felt certain she was safe…and felt like she’d been stabbed. Like a boot knife had been left sheathed in her lower stomach.

“Marehis?” Solas’s voice was just barely falling from his lips, an effort not to wake any but her, “You are cramping and I believe erm, you may begin bleeding shortly. I wished to let you sleep as long as you could but you may wish to mitigate the chance for blood stains in your clothes and bedding. Doing the wash will be quite the task while we are here.”

Yes she could uh, feel said blood endeavoring to make its debut. Ugh, her back was stiff, sore as she held her breath to quiet herself as she detached from her sleeping girls and sat up to deal with this…somehow. She was uncertain just where she should go to handle this. How did Cassandra deal with her monthlies in the field when they were all camping together, under the same fabric roof? She was not about to wake her and ask, but,

There was a hand on her back, another taking hers to support her rise from the cot, letting her lean on him as she winced. There was a reason Marehis did not entertain her monthlies. They were horrible. She did not enjoy wasting weeks of her life in misery, nor was she in an occupation that allowed for a fourth of the month where she was not at her absolute best. It was infuriating in a way—she had a tolerance for pain, could go days, weeks enduring the circumstances of torture, her mind remaining sharp and in control of her every faculty while injured and starved, parched. And somehow monthlies could send her to her knees, utterly exhausted and tetchy, and hungry. For food and blood, in the metaphorical sense of course…almost literal as she once broke the binding of a textbook over the head of a boy in her class who tried her patience during such a time—he pulled on her ear while complaining her knife-ear was blocking his view of the chalkboard! She wasn’t in a place of peace to stoically handle the slight and educate him from his ignorance. So. She brained him with a book instead. Red stains found in the wash always forewarned her mother to leave warm meals at her child’s door and let her stay locked away where she could be of no harm to anyone.

And she did not want this affecting her ability to defend her children, and she certainly did not want it to—oh, if she was cruel to them? If Ellie had rolled her eyes just twenty four hours too late, she may have encountered a Marehis she’d never wish to meet. Of course…perhaps this development would prove useful—she’d never endured her monthly in full force since becoming one of Leliana’s Nightingales. Maybe she could afford her girls a few days of rest—lounging around their campsite staying warm and safe while she went forth and singlehandedly beat every Red Templar in Emprise du Lion to their deaths fueled with only the burning rage that accompanied her in times such as these.

She…wasn’t certain just where they were going, but Solas escorted her from their tent, stopping only to shod their feet…the man knelt to do so for Marehis so she did not have to bend over and do so herself, before leading her out into the night.

To another tent. A small one, set up behind the boulders near the edge of camp—so the rocks were between the tent and the camp itself. She wasn’t certain this condition required such privacy but she supposed with everyone in the camp in mind…she would be admittedly embarrassed if any woke—more so because she was accepting assistance from Solas than the fact that she was enduring a perfectly natural bodily function—and the barrier between them and camp may well keep even the Iron Bull from waking and investigating Marehis missing from her cot. He…had a sense of protection over Marehis, may well tear the camp apart to find her if he discovered her missing. The Iron Bull had been a source of comfort through this time. The Qunari had allowed her to sob her heartbreak into his chest in the wake of Solas’s betrayal, offered support, swearing a sort of allegiance to her as his Imekari’s Tamassran, that she could always rely on him be it for protection or comfort. Or sex—she was to know he would always be willing to do so at no disservice to her, solely for physical relief and perhaps emotional comfort but ahh she… had not yet felt the dire need to ride the Bull. But who was to say? Sex could…alleviate cramping, and the Iron Bull would not shy away from his offer due to her monthly. So. Maybe. The Qunari was very warm and Sahrnia was very cold.

Not…as cold as it had been just a moment ago.

Solas led her to a tent that was rather toasty, like perhaps the man had carefully cast warmth into the tenting fabric as he set it up—he walked her to it, opened the entrance to see her settled and then gave her her privacy, informing her if she needed him, he would be aware and come to her, before taking his leave. There was lamplight and bandaging awaiting her…a kit of sorts for…for perhaps the coming days. A pack, full of bandaging and a…oh. Rice bags. He’d taken soft knit fabric to fashion two slender bags he filled with rice before sewing closed and- and what seemed like some sort of soft fabric belt made to button securely around her hips and hold the bags in place against her lower back and stomach. He’d already warmed it, it was emitting the most soothing- oh-

She hated him! Utterly despised!

What in the world gave that man the right to- to do such dastardly things—endeavor to destroy the world, lay devastation on her child’s hand, and- and then do things like- be steadfast with her girls, pay open penance for his crimes, lay his heart bare before his enemies and pray for them to strike against him for the salvation of her daughter, and then- be-

She understood it now—Sera’s earlier candor with the man, when once upon a time she outright demanded Solas be mean to her, in the wake of Solas showing care for the Elf girl he’d initially disliked, called his kindness ruddy weird. It was! He was not allowed to be so confusingly kind to her!

Because there was a level where Marehis felt it was dearly deserved—the man should grovel at her feet the whole of his days, wait on her hand and foot and beg her forgiveness for time eternal, to pay penance for what he had done. But there was also…every bit of redemption he showed was dangerous to her resolve. To- to hate him for the rest of her life!

Ugh! She would cease caring that he was being so very thoughtful! She would!

He…would just…have to cease being so very thoughtful first, perhaps.

Oh! She hated him!

And he was awaiting her by the fire of their camp when she returned, a mug of warm tea in his hands. And he disliked the stuff. So.

"It is for you, of course,” Solas confirmed with a bit of humor as he handed it off to her. “I…trust you are feeling better?”

“That is not obvious in the bond?” she wondered…perhaps a touch snappishly.

He smiled softly, “It is, I suppose, but there is a politeness in asking,” though, “…as it apparently annoys you, I shall be mindful of it in future.”

“Saving it for when you truly wish to annoy me?” she wryly wondered.

His lips twitched upward, “Perhaps,” and then he chuckled warmly, “I apologize—I do sincerely not wish to upset you. I’m unfortunately doing a poor job of it, apparently. It…” he was silent momentarily, as if considering something or perhaps focusing more on the bond, “before I amend this—do know you may come to me or any of our mage acquaintances to have your rice bags reheated.” And then- he-
He pushed her.
He set the mug of tea aside. Rose up from his seat by the fire. And then pushed her down, onto her back to make a soft landing in the snow, something warm and teasing in his gaze as he nodded and then he left her.

He-!
She’d…she’d been so annoyed with his kindness she’d wished for him to be mean. He’d somehow done a simultaneously perfect and piss-poor job at it.
She swallowed tea past the lump in her throat, grounding herself its warmth as she took a moment before returning to their tent. Solas…she wasn’t certain just where he was, he was not yet returned to his cot, but she’d a certainty he’d not abandoned their camp.
“Everything all good?” the Iron Bull’s voice rumbled out quietly from where he lay in his cot with Dorian against his chest.
“I’m well sweet man,” she softly assured before slipping back into bed alongside Ellie.
The girl stirred…only due to, “Mmm, warm mami,” she mumbled out, snuggling against the Elf woman, head against her chest as she pulled closer to be middle-to-middle and share in the warmth from her rice bag…which would only assist in it retaining its warmth, being caught between two warm bodies and she’d hardly any complaints with the situation.
Sera snorted in her sleep, “Y’cold Inky?” she fretted…almost wholly asleep, just barely awake enough to question her sister and then…proceeded to strip herself of her blankets to cast them over the Human girl, “Stay warm, kay?” before rolling away to lay almost directly on top of Cassandra.
“Sera?” the woman questioned quietly as the action roused her, her hand coming up to card through the Elf girl’s sleep-hazarded hair. “Is it a nightmare, sweet girl?”
“Gave Ink m’blankets.”
Marehis wasn’t certain if the barely-waked woman accepted that as a ‘yes’, that Sera had dreamt to her own horror that she’d given away all of her blankets, or a ‘no’ that she’d truly done as much in sweetness to her sister. The Seeker offered a quiet, “Ahh,” without further explanation, merely holding the girl more tightly, rubbing her back as she fell back to sleep.
Marehis…was the last to wake out of the whole of their party. And she’d been in competition against a woman recovering from the collapse of a vital organ, and Ser Dorian Pavus—a man who despised having to remove his body from his bed before one in the afternoon.
“Mami?” was what roused her, Ellie’s voice soft…behind her, not before her—how was the girl casting her voice? Oh. When Marehis opened her eyes the cots in her eyeline were empty and she carefully rolled over to face Ellie who was kneeling beside their cot, Sera standing a few feet behind her looking…well, worried. Marehis was worried as well, just what time was it? Her girls were armed and armored, her youngest sniffing was she crying? Oh no, no she was entertaining a case of the sniffles Solas had promised to keep her updated on—he was to split his time, ugh. She hated- it- if she were to react badly to potion, she hardly wished for it to be in a way that unleashed itself upon the girls. And if there was some complication…Solas would defend their girls if he felt something that said Marehis was incapable of doing so be it from sickness or exhaustion that her body failed her in this time. So there was a bit of necessity, his keeping close focus on her in the bond, but- oh he hadn’t realized Ellie’s misery their first day in Emprise du Lion—he’d been in the bond when they were in battle with the Red Templars, but afterward, he’d resumed focusing on Marehis. It hadn’t been until he felt the sting of Ellie’s snap at her that his magic had apparently sent him focusing on the Human girl for an answer as to why she’d take such a tone with her. “Papi says you aren’t feeling very well today—we brought you breakfast.”
“Your tummy hurt Mare?” Sera worried, “Do’y want potion?”
Oh, her sweet girls. Perhaps they needn’t be concerned she’d ever have a negative reaction toward them—she felt entirely too emotional, like she might cry, but only because- oh she had such sweet girls! She loved them so much sometimes her heart felt literally over-full like it might truly burst and she would gladly die of her love of them!
“Oh mami, are you in pain?” Ellie worried, unmarked hand against her cheek to thumb away, well, tears that had formed in her eyes unbidden, ugh.

“Oh, no sweet girl I’m sorry, I’m fine,” Marehis promised. “I’m…well I’m currently entertaining my monthly guest. I’ve had a need of change in my potions regimen that requires er, ceasing taking the one that keeps me from the experience altogether.”

“Awe, mami!” Ellie cooed, hugging her tightly and pressing a kiss to her cheek, “I’m so sorry! Monthlies suck!”

“They do indeed.”

“Shite Mare, I’m sorry,” Sera sympathized.

“Oh! Is that why you were so warm last night?” Ellie wondered and when Marehis nodded, “Is it something magical or does it need re-heated?”

Oh, “I would appreciate if someone would reheat it, yes,” Marehis confirmed.

“We can do it!” Ellie volunteered, “Mami, you eat up—if you want seconds just ask, kay?

Sissy, you wanna try learning a little fire magic? And we can make fresh potion for mami!”

“Sure Ink,” Sera agreed, awe, her sweet girl looked shy and excited at the prospect of learning something new magically, being able to help.

She had such sweet babies! Lights of her heart! Oh, she loved them!

Warm oatmeal, honey…cinnamon sugar? There was something that spoke to Solas’s intervention in the addition to their morning meal.

More so when seconds were delivered by her girls before she could even do more than wish for them.

“Mami! We brought you more oatmeal and there’s toast! And here’s potion for um…cramps and headaches si?” Ellie sounded like she was confirming with Sera.

“Yeah, s’what he said,” Sera nodded as she and Ellie handed her a second bowl of oatmeal and set a plate of warm buttery toast at her side.

… “He?”

She didn’t truly need confirmation. “Papi! He made potion before breakfast, he’d just been letting it cool down and rest until you needed it. I wondered why we had ingredients for it, it was really sweet of Adan to think to send ingredients so you could have fresh potion whenever you were ready for it.”

…she was unaware of any such arrangement. Had- he- she hadn’t thought to write Skyhold’s Healers for potion to handle the symptoms of monthlies, it had been so long since last she had endured one she hadn’t considered much in the way of preparation but…well. Someone had. Adan was an excellent Healer but he’d thought her starting her potions regimen to encourage menstruation as soon as he’d provided as much to her. The only person who knew, in full, her current medical business was. Well. “That was sweet of him.” Solas.

“Ink and me got your rice things warm again for you,” Sera said, handing the cursedly blessed thing back to her.

“Thank you, ma’da’vehnan,” Marehis smiled, and as her child drew near she took her sweet, sweet face in hand and pressing a kiss to her cheek, earning a warm blushing cheek to kiss and the barest bit of just precious giggling. Her sweet ears were blushing! She could just eat them up, truly!

Oh! She wanted to stay in today—no Red Templars or Lyrium or horrible plots, just her and her girls safe and sound at her side.

“Mu-um! You’re welcome, cripes! I thought monthlies was supposed to make us right bitches!” Sera complained—oh! Mum! The girl snorted, “Figures—Inky got all screamy ‘bout how much she loves ruddy everyone durin’ hers. And that was ‘cause she was pissed off!”

“Ohh! Mami! Cremisius let me beat down on dummies when I was all upset and bleedy! We’re going to go beat down on some Red Templar dummies today!” Ellie enthused, “But you can stay at camp if you don’t feel good, we promise to send updates—“

She did want to stay in camp! With her girls. And that unfortunately was not in the cards, was it? “I’m well enough,” she would be—she’d get a change in bandaging and knock back potion, she- she was not sending them out without her and she was wholly certain—she felt a type of violence in how dearly she loved her girls today, that violence could easily be targeted with menace at their enemies. Oh if anyone lay harm on these girls-“Kay mama, you need any help gearing up?” Sera wondered.
   “I have it well in hand but thank you my loves.”
   “We’ll let you get dressed,” Ellie said, and then she brightened further still, her hand going to Sera’s wrist, “Papi wants our help with something!”
   Did he now?
   Ugh. Despised him.
   Everyone was ready for the day when she emerged from the tent, Vivienne was the first to approach her, warm hands on her shoulders massaging as she pressed a sweet kiss to Marehis’s cheek, “You’re certain you feel up to joining us today darling?”
   “I am.” Marehis assured. She would be. More so once potion kicked in, but she had already delayed them so much she was hardly going to do so further-“I apologize, we’re nearly finished,” Solas’s voice was promising, though he chuckled asugh. Her girls were giggly, delighting in something- a…delay of sorts. They were gathered around the fire, brewing some such concoction, “Solas is teaching us honey water!” Ellie announced. “It’s going to be so hydrating and yum!”
   “It certainly will be…except there seem to be a pair of mischievous da’lens running around stealing swaths of honey.”
   Sera and Ellie, oh goodness, their mouths dropped open in unified shock as Ellie gasped out, “J’accuse, papi!”
   “J’accuse,” he heartily assured, warm laughter in his chest. “Oh but certainly I mean a different pair of mischievous da’lens. You and Sera would never.” he was certain.
“Damn straight! N’fact I think they went that way,” Sera insisted, pointing over Solas’s shoulder toward the lake as she dipped a sneaky little finger into a squat pot of honey at his side to steal another taste from.
   …it was not until Marehis’s potion fully kicked in and the rolling pain in her stomach ceased that Solas led the girls in filling their party’s water stores with warm water laced with honey, something beneficial that would be a bit of a treat as they traveled today.
   They would sorely need it.
   The caverns just beyond the edge of their camp. The only path through Emprise du Lion?
Were full in equal measure, of Red Lyrium and Red Templars.
   The caverns themselves was a tight, cramped space for battle—they had to push forward and be victorious, there was no running back to the security of their camp, their hold there was precarious as it stood. Maker these Red Templars were wretched things!
   Even as they were felled. Sera stopped breathing altogether—she hyperventilated momentarily and then sucked in a breath she couldn’t find it in her to force back out as she fell straight down onto her bottom, hands clutching at her head.
   “Sera!” Ellie beat Cassandra and Marehis to the girl’s side only by the barest of margins, Ellie sliding on her knees to be before her sister, hands on Sera’s shoulders, “Chica, carina, breathe breathe breathe, gimme your hands okay?” she implored, hands slipping to take Sera’s, palms lapsing palms and the Human girl shivered as she poured icy chill in to her hands, pulling on Sera’s own magic as she promised, “It’s okay, it’s okay—the Red Lyrium can’t get to you—you’re safe in my sissy! She loves you so much and she’d never ever ever let anything bad happen to you! I love you, and my magic loves you, and you’re so so safe!”
   Sera shuddered out a breath of relief, crying as she released hold of her sister’s hands to wrap her arms around Ellie’s neck, “I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I know m’supposed to comfort it b-b-but it was so scared and I got scared and-“ “It’s okay Sera! It’s okay—don’t be sad with yourself,” Ellie pled, pulling back and thumbing away Sera’s tears, “I’m so proud of you, you’re doing such a great job, it’s okay if something scared you both! Red Lyrium’s terrifying chica! I was only keeping my cool holding Tio’s hand!” Oh, Dorian was clutching the Iron Bull’s arm rather tightly now and Marehis had seen him holding Ellie’s hand the moment before she came to Sera’s aid. Oh…oh goodness, this horrible place! There was Red Lyrium growing out of every rocky surface. Grey stone with Red Lyrium growing all around had to be an all-too-real reminder of the horrific future Ellie and Dorian had witnessed at Alexius’s hand.

“Here sweet girl,” Marehis said as she crouched at Sera’s side, lifting the girl’s canteen to bring it to her attention before uncapping it for her, “drink a few sips for me, won’t you da’len?”

Sera sniffled, oh, please don’t let this horrible place be giving both of her girls colds, her poor da’lens! “Th-thanks,” she offered before gingerly sipping at her water, color returning to her features now that she was calming down.

“Sera darling,” Vivienne’s voice sounded, “I myself am unfamiliar with communing verbally with my magic in the way Eleanor does, and I’m rather discontent with the amount of Red Lyrium about. Our magics represent rather similarly, if you wish, we could commune as we pass through this unpleasant place.”

…it was a very round about, very sweet way of asking Sera to hold the Enchanter’s hand. Marehis was albeit confused, thought that Ellie would hold her sister’s hand but oh, Ellie was already shivering rather fiercely with what little ice magic she and Sera had shared, and chill was altogether unpleasant for her, made her poor shoulder ache with old injury—she would give her sister what she needed, but she needn’t do so to her own detriment when someone could step in for her.

“Here da’vehnan,” Solas spoke up, kneeling before Ellie and taking her chilled hands in his, raising them to his mouth to breathe warm air from his lungs onto them as he rubbed them between his own and then his palms glowed warm orange as he returned warmth to her hands. Oh…he seemed to delight in the newfound discovery that…well, magic was magic, that while there were different channels it could take, there was no difference in magic between races. There was light in his eyes as Ellie smiled her thanks for his efforts. “How are you feeling? Are we prepared to move forward?” he wondered.

Ellie nodded. “Uh-huh. Ser’, are you okay?”

“Yeah Ink, m’okay, promise,” Sera said, squeezing Vivienne’s hand as the Enchanter helped her rise to her feet. “You warm enough Ink? Shite it’s freakin’ cold.”

It was…and as they journeyed through the cavern, they discovered why.

Red Lyrium? Was very…very warm. Blazing hot in a way that sent Marehis almost feeling ill, like a sickening heat rolling off the horrible stuff.

“Oh my gosh,” Ellie breathed, holding Solas’s hand tightly as she almost hid herself against him, the Elf man relinquishing hold of her hand to wrap his arm around her shoulders to hold her close to his side, something about it altogether protective- that- he wasn’t allowed- it wasn’t-! It felt altogether barbaric that the man being protective of her child immediately instilled in her a desire to perform the very act that might create another with him of all people! Even more so when just barely a week ago she’d been wholly petrified at the very thought! Oh! Monthlies were nonsense! Or maybe she was nonsense. She wasn’t sure.

The Iron Bull was extremely protective of her children—maybe she would focus on that. She might indeed ride the Bull to keep herself from utter foolishness!

…which felt like indulging in a brand of utter foolishness to spare herself from another. Oh! She hated this!

And she hated Red Lyrium!

“Guys um…sissy? Science time. The facts! Sahrnia is place that relies on it’s river that’s reliably been a source of trade year-round because it’s never had a cold snap like this ever. The entire river froze for the first time in life in the middle of Spring. And there’s blazing hot Red Lyrium all over the place—so much of it, Red Templars are mining it from the area.”

“Friggin’ Red Lyrium’s stealin’ all the heat!” Sera screeched her scientific conclusion, “Shite!”

“Crap,” Ellie agreed, growling out a frustrated, “Ugh! We’ve got to- there’s got to be a way of getting rid of it. If we can’t Sahrnia m-might never get it’s river back! This whole place will just “S’gonna be okay Ink,” Sera encouraged.

“Eleanor,” Cassandra spoke from Marehis’s side—the Seeker had offered her arm as they moved forward, “We will help Sahrnia however they need it. If all else fails, we will assist those who are left of Sahrnia in relocation, offer any in their ranks who wish to join the Inquisition a place to rebuild with us. You needn’t press yourself to solve their climate issues.”

“Red Lyrium is a menace to the world! I wanna fight it mami!” Ellie complained.

“We’ll fight it, hell yeah Imekari! Break this shit up with our bare hands if we have to,” the Iron Bull assured.

“Amatus,” Dorian sounded exhausted in a way that implied he did not ever believe he would be the sort of person to be the protective uncle rather than the fun one, but, “do not encourage the child to touch dangerous substances with her bare hands.”

“Do stay away from it if you can, da’vehnan,” Marehis cautioned, worry twisting in her stomach. All she could think about was that horrible future Dorian had described for them, of the Red Lyrium disease that plagued them all. If such a thing befell any of them, oh, she could not bear to even think of it. They weren’t even certain how such contagion spread! Ellie, oh, she was already suffering a bit of congestion from this horrid weather, what if- what if breathing around so much of the vile stuff did something irreparable to her girl-

“Ellie, would you do me the distinct honor of a favor?” Solas ventured. She did not owe him a thing in this world! How dare he- “I apologize da’vehnan but it is concerning, so much Red Lyrium around. We’ve not the slightest clue just how those in our ranks became infected by Red Lyrium in the future you bore witness to, if you would please wear the mask I made for you? I made it to filter pollen but perhaps it would behave likewise with lessening your exposure to Red Lyrium.”

“Oh! Gosh, yeah papi. I can do that easy-peasy!” Ellie readily agreed…pulling up her mask from underneath her scarf. “Favor granted! Huh, you know, we’re in Orlais so…now you owe me a favor!”

“Ahh, the formidable Game,” Solas acknowledged. “Well, I must say I’m rather glad if I’m to play with you.”

“I dunno papi…I can drive a pretty hard bargain,” Ellie warned, “I once made Tia Josie make Leliana have a sleepover with me! They wore matching nightgowns! It was the cutest!”

“I’ve no objection to matching nightgowns if it would amuse you da’len,” he supposed, smiling as he earned her laughter echoing through the cavern.

This was all very exhausting, this swing between- between hatred and appreciation, distrust and lust, and back again.

The Red Templars had well established their hold on Emprise du Lion.

The absolute bastards.

They laid their claim on another of the Red Templar’s holds. Well guarded by a- a Behemoth. There were more Red Templar Behemoths. The one assaulting Haven had been nightmare enough, they’d managed to make another and Marehis prayed it would be the last.

Ellie…had been out in out terrified, at the prospect of Spiders the size of horses. And yet she’d not even hesitated to run charging at a mountain sized monster made of Red Lyrium.

“Imekari’s all tuckered out,” the Iron Bull said, as he cradled the girl to his chest. Sera was riding on his back, she’d jumped up to wrap her arms around his neck when he hoisted Ellie up after she struggled to raise herself up on her staff after she, Vivienne, Solas, and Dorian had cast in unity a fierce blast of cold* to finish off the Behemoth. “How you doin’ Seeker? Mare? Momsquad holdin’ up?”

Cassandra and Marehis were holding one another up a bit, walking with their arms bracing each other’s backs, and after consulting her Elf counterpart with a look, Cassandra offered, “We’re well, the Iron Bull. Let us prepare camp and rest, Eleanor will tell us where we stand when she wakes.”

“Is she alright?” Marehis asked as they settled, seating themselves in a circle around a dying campfire the Red Templars had been so kind enough to leave them, Thom making himself busy building it back up, his men were securing the area and sending up the signal for the Inquisitions forces to send supply to them for a third camp in Emprise du Lion.

“Exhaustion, she has minor injuries to be tended,” Solas confirmed. Sera had kept hold of the Iron Bull—her feet on the ground now as he was seated before the fire—and now she relinquished her hold looking somewhat panicked and eager at the same time.

“Her knees is scraped!” Sera announced sounding concerned but…excited? Awe, her sweet da’len, she’d confessed in Marehis…well, she said she’d spoken to Solas about her frustrations with her abilities in the bond, and that he had offered her guidance. She came around the Qunari to look over her sister, “And her ribs is ouchy—they en’t broke are they?”

“I don’t believe so,” Solas assured. “Health potion will set it to rights.” Thankfully that could not be said of the Red Templar that- ugh, vile thing. He’d charged Ellie and knocked her onto her back brought a steel boot down harsh on her ribcage in the split second it took Marehis to tackled him to the ground, shins landing on his shoulders as she took his head between her thighs and…well. there was precious little coming back from one’s skull being wholly detached from one’s spine.

Sera took care in rolling up Ellie’s leggings, voicing her confusion at ‘how the frig’ her knees got scraped up but her armor was just fine as she dabbed the injuries with a potion moistened cloth, Solas steadily offering the rational that the force of contact with the ground drug her leggings against her skin—she’d technically scraped her knees on her own armor as opposed to the ground tearing through it to scrape her flesh.

“Oh. Ruddy dumb that is,” Sera decided.
“Most certainly,” Solas readily agreed with her, sounding amused to do so.
“Pfft, whatever,” Sera snorted.
“How are you feeling darling?” Vivienne asked, she’d seated herself alongside Marehis and Cassandra, raised a hand to brush back a bit of hair that had fallen into the Elf woman’s face. “Do you need a moment?”

“If I may,” Marehis said, though she was reticent to…Sera confessed a type of paranoia where she felt certain her loved ones would perish if she could not lay eyes on them while they were at harm. She felt something admittedly similar, there had always been something of a lingering worry for her ward when they left each others sides, that something would happen in her absence. That worry only worsened in her after Ellie slipped from her grasp and a wall of fire kept her from strangling the creature that pulled what they thought to be dying screams from her child.
She’d had something of…well she supposed it was a panic attack, when she thought back on it, that evening Ellie gave her reprieve from her duties while she hosted Josie and Leliana for their sleepover. She’d woken in the night and something just- she hadn’t seen or heard from Ellie or Sera in hours and her mind launched into horrific scenarios, most of which made absolutely no sense—they were in Skyhold! They were safe—there was every reason to believe they were absolutely in perfect health! But her mind just kept spiraling into this fear that something was amiss and…she’d a measure of intuition, she usually did know when something was off with one of her girls…and then she realized she hadn’t, not always—she hadn’t expected Ellie’s suicide scare in Crestwood, it wasn’t until Solas came to inform her he’d gone to Ellie’s aid and brought her to Cassandra that she was aware something was the matter, and even then- oh, there was part of her that worried about Ellie’s seeking the Seeker in her moment of vulnerability, that she hadn’t thought of Marehis, that…maybe Marehis had said or done something that made the girl cautious to bring such issues up with her. She’d…she’d responded correctly, hadn’t she? When Ellie came to her upon her return from her first venture into the Hinterlands and confessed her symptoms of depression, had Marehis given her some reason to believe she could not come to her? What if…what if she found herself feeling this way and- oh the balconies in her quarters were so very high-She’d nearly been ill of her fright, couldn’t catch her breath, it felt like a great weight had settled against her heart trying to crush the air from her lungs and…and she had to move, go, she’d run all the way to the Great Hall and—and realized what a sight she must be, gasping for breath, expression haggard and deranged as she stopped in the doorway between Fen’Harel’s quarters and the Great Hall. She’d told herself they were in Skyhold and nothing seemed amiss. She would calm herself, neither of her girls should see her so-so worrisome, she’d concerned herself, honestly. So. She took in the night air, heading first and foremost to see Sera. Oh, her girl had been having a bit of fun with her girlfriends, drinking and making lively in the Tavern in the middle of the night. There had been a warm hand on her back then—Cremisius, sweet man. He’d just been returning to the Tavern to head to the Charger’s quarters for sleep after his shift and he’d questioned if she was alright, asked her if she would join him, he’d appreciate the company if she was up for it.

And then the Lieutenant gave her his usual seat in the Tavern, where she…she could lean and peek over at Sera if she needed to but the girl wouldn’t necessarily spot her, gone up to the bar and returned with a warm mug of cocoa and…for all that he’d invited her into the tavern for company, told her he would ‘be right back’ and disappeared up the stairs only to return moments later, crouching to pull thick woolen socks onto her chilled, bare feet before shodding them in slender leather slip on shoes, “Skinner’s, Bull got them for her but she refuses to wear them. You like ‘em, keep ‘em.” And then he looked up at her, smiling kindly, “Everything okay?”

“Certainly,” she assured. He was beyond sweet, but…well it would hardly be appropriate to- she barely knew where to even start speaking of tonight and if she were to do so, it certainly wouldn’t be to a boy who did not deserve half the burdens he carried already, she was hardly about to add her own to them. Oh, he was so tired, sweet sleepy da’len, and it was a sweet ache to her heart, the knowledge that if she began rambling about her anxieties he would sit with her and listen until the sun rose if she needed it. “Get some rest, da’mi. Have the sweetest dreams.”

She’d had sweeter dreams once she laid down again after laying eyes on Ellie sleeping contentedly in Lady Montilyet’s embrace before the warmth of the fire.

She was similarly…in the embrace of someone who loved her, the Iron Bull would not let even a trace of harm befall the girl in Marehis’s absence.

“Huh?” Sera said, sounding confused as she looked to Solas and then, her gaze went with some uncertainty to Marehis as she said, “Hey Mare? You mind if I tag along? I gotta take a leak something fierce.”

Oh. “Come along then da’vehnan,” Marehis invited.

Sera did join her—slipping under the bank at the edge of their newfound camp that dipped low enough they required bridges overhead to safely traverse…especially with a cart full of Red Lyrium, Marehis supposed. It would um…suit, they supposed, for privacy and relieving themselves. Though…

“Oh frig, cool,” Sera giggled from where she’d chosen to squat, supposing, “I did have to go.”

Marehis spoke over her shoulder to the girl, “I’m happy for you da’len?” had she feared she wouldn’t truly need to?

“You um…you okay Mare?” Sera wondered.

“I’m well da’vehnan. I’ve survived monthlies before.”

“I just mean…dunno. Kinda bad at this,” she confessed.

Marehis had successfully finished the gruesome task of changing bandaging…it was little wonder the first time Ellie endured as much she thought someone had truly attempted to murder her. She turned her attention to Sera who’d…why had she removed her socks and boots? Wait, was the girl stripping wholly naked to go to the restroom?…was that a superior way to handle peeing and whatnot in the field? Sera must think so, she was seated on a rock pulling her socks on—oh her sweet little toes had to be so cold!—when Marehis asked, “Bad at what, da’assan? There is precious little you cannot do if you put your brilliant mind to it sweet girl.”
“Oi! Stop mummin’ at me for two seconds and lemme mum you back!” Sera snapped, groaning, “m’bad at… well not bad at. My magic’s a right baby! Just little, so it’s busy learning baby stuff. Like about sunlight n’pish. And so it’s not super good at figuring out the bond— s’getting better! I felt Ink’s asthma shite our first day in Sahrnia, and her scrapes today. But um…I dunno, Solas can feel you er…sorry if that’s weird? But we’re bondy too! And I can’t feel shite from you. Which I was trying to do ‘cause um…Solas sort of told me you didn’t wanna go off on your own, I guess? Dunno! It just came off as a ‘you need me’ for something and I can’t figure out what it is, so I thought I’d be like, ‘sneaky talk’ to get into it but I’m shite at that! So I guess…if there’s something wrong, or something I can help you with Mare, please just tell me? ‘cause yer my mum and I love you and I wanna help!”

“Come here sweet girl,” Marehis said, opening her arms and breathing a sigh of relief as the girl came to her, hugging her tightly, “oh, ma’da’len, you do help,” she promised. “I was merely…I worry, when I must leave you girls. I suppose my worry was so great it spilled into the bond and Solas sensed it, was…kind enough to suggest you come with me so I have one of my girls at hand.”

“Mare, we’d be like, two feet away.” Sera said, though she looked at the bank and…well. Marehis was not wholly certain just how they were going to get back up it. It had been a simple thing to slide down into it, it was altogether something else to…climb? Back out. It was certainly higher than a mere two feet, and they were far enough away from their campfire Marehis was a bit embarrassed she might have to raise her voice and scream for the Iron Bull to assist them. “Kay so like, a little more than two feet but you know what I mean.”

“I suppose my monthly is merely getting the best of me,” Marehis offered with a shrug. And Sera stared at her, regarding her a moment with…something in her deflated as she stared at Marehis, “Um…shite. Mare? Wh…why’re you- are you lying?”

“Da’len I’m…definitely experiencing my monthly,” Marehis assured.

“No I know just, that’s not what’s bothering you I don’t think, and you don’t think that either.”

Ah. There it was. The snap of monthlies, the sharpness it could imbue in her, she opened her mouth to- to inform the girl that as of right now, the only thing bothering Marehis was her—

“You are not allowed to hurt Sera!” Cole informed her fiercely as he materialized between them, putting Sera behind him with his hand reaching back to take Sera’s hand in his. “You don’t want to, not really, but you will if you say that to her and then you will be in her hurts! And I will be upset with you! And you will also be upset with you! You can be upset with me instead, I like that better, it doesn’t hurt my friends.”

Marehis took a deep breath, Maker, she- she didn’t want to hurt anyone, oh goodness, she had almost said something so unkind, “I apologize—da’len I promise you are correct, I do not wish to snap at Sera, but I’m not upset with you either, Cole, why would you think I would be? You’re defending Sera, I’m pleased you would do so.”

“You…you are upset with me though,” Cole insisted. “Because I knew, and I did not say. It is quiet in you, but it is there, your resentment. I…I am sorry I did not say anything about Fen’Harel. But I…hearing is confusing, I thought…it did not occur to me it was a hurt—something that needed to be known, because no one did know so it wasn’t hurting anyone but Solas that he was Fen’Harel.”

“Oh. Oh da’len, you are sweet, and I love the friend you are to my girls, I promise I do not resent you-“

“You say that, but you won’t let me help you!” Cole cried out, oh goodness the boy looked devastated over it, “it is there, in your hurts! You were hurt I did not say anything until you and Ellie began feeling hurt about Solas lying about his identity! I am sorry, I- I want to do better, I want to help you better! You were scared for weeks, terrified—I could have told you immediately, the moment you felt fear at missing your monthly that you were not carrying anything other than anxiety. Anxieties- Marehis, I can help you! But you have to let me! You’re full of hurts and they make you so scared you will fail in protecting your daughters again, you fail to face the actual danger to them!”
"I- what-"

"It is killing you!" Cole insisted. "Marehis, your body has stopped working because of it! You thought- you thought your irrational actions, forgetfulness, the pain and sickness you’ve felt could be symptoms life, but it is not! It is death! It is your anxieties literally destroying you! Wearing on your brain and your heart and your stomach- those- those are all important things! Your body needs them to not be destroyed!" he informed her as if truly afraid she did not understand that. And perhaps she didn’t, she- oh. She had thought- she’d found herself feeling hazy in her thinking, found herself forgetting things easily—little things. Did she lock her own chamber doors before leaving Skyhold? Was it 5 or 6 when last she checked on Ellie? Were the potions in her stores today’s or tomorrow’s—Ellie had taken her potions as normal this morning, yes? When had she last heard from Sera? Wait, had she sent the girl anything when they were apart? And then she’d a habit of keeping Ellie’s canteen on her person when they were together in peaceful places—Haven, Skyhold, Val Royeaux—so the girl could have it at hand without having to carry it about, it wasn’t exactly a fashionable accessory, but it was a necessary one in the field! And she’d wholly forgotten to hand it off to the girl when they prepared to meet the others in the Emerald Graves—what if they had been separated?? Sera had potion now, was…had she given it to Marehis? No…no she didn’t think so. Her mind was…rather frayed, and…and she supposed she’d found her chest aching more and more lately, her stomach burning, leaving her nauseated- oh. Yes. All symptoms of anxiety as…as Solas had said. and Adan. And Elan. And…now…Cole. So. There…may just be something to it.

"There is!" Cole agreed, "You are anxious all of the time! From the moment you wake up, until the moment you lay down, and then you are anxious even in your dreams! You are so scared Corypheus will come and he will take your daughters away, or Solas will reveal he’s still working with him, betray us further still by handing Ellie over to his partner in crime, or- you are scared of so many things happening to Sera and Ellie and yourself that it consumes you. It made your body so sick it stopped working! Potion makes you have monthlies again but it does not solve your anxieties that will deteriorate you in other ways. It is bad for you to be scared all of the time! I can help you, Sera and Ellie and the Iron Bull and Cremisius and Papa and Leliana and Josephine and Cassandra and Cullen and Dorian and Vivienne and Thom and Varric and Solas, they love you! They can help you! But you have to let them! You have to trust them and stop blaming yourself for things you cannot control! It is not your fault Mythal died or that Solas created the veil! It is not your fault he did not understand the value of non-Elvehana life until it was all too late! It is not your fault Corypheus wants to destroy the world! But it is your fault he is different now! It is your fault that Ellie knows she can be loved, that she is alive and safe today! It is your fault that Sera loves herself even her Elfy parts!"

She would have fallen if not for Sera’s arms around her, and then Cole’s as he joined them, hugging Marehis rather fiercely. She was…well admittedly crying, almost too much to speak, trembling be…because it was cold. That was all. Very cold out, Sahrnia was just- just awful. "I…I don’t know how to stop being so afraid."

"Well…” Sera ventured, "it might help sayin’ what scares you. You know, um, telling people? Mare, we- we had no idea you was so worried all the time. You…you’ve been sick over this?" and when Marehis nodded Sera’s arms held her tighter, with almost bruising strength, "Mum! Everyone gets sick sometimes, you gotta get help when that happens! That’s freaking what we’re here for! I…I get brain sicky over shite that scares me, overthink things ‘cause I…er…worry about ‘em, I guess. I don’t always get talky about it ‘cause um…well if I recognize it’s happenin’, Bull and Elan’ve taught me uh, how to work through it? Or Cole comes and lets me know its happenen’ and then he helps me. Or if I can’t handle it, if I try to talk myself through it and that don’t work…I know I can go to Inky or you or ‘sandra.”

“You do?” Marehis- oh she felt foolish checking, just- well Ellie went to the Seeker more often, it felt like, when it came to matters of mental distress. And Sera, something had been troubling her so much Ellie had gasped, dropped a bar of soap into the river, cried out with the upmost urgency that ‘Sissy’s sad!’ and fled. Marehis had had to run after her with her clothing, and only then could she get the girl to hurridly hop into her bottoms before declaring ‘shirts are stupid!’ and informing Marehis she would be doing her daughter a grave injustice if she kept her a moment longer arguing that she should put on more clothing than she would demand of a boy. By the time they made it to the tent, however, Sera had thankfully been comforted already…by Cassandra.

“’course I do,” Sera said, and then she looked at Cole momentarily before squeaking out, “Cripes! Mum! We don’t trust ’sandra more or something! You…I dunno. You’re busy making sure Inky’s safe, keeping after her, I don’t like bothering you with my problems when you’ve already got so many you’re dealin’ with. If I distracted you from keeping Inky safe? I’d never forgive myself.”

“Ellie trusts you, Marehis,” Cole promised, “And she loves you so much. But so much is already on you and her mind makes her feel like dirt when she considers going to you, looking you in the face and saying that after everything you do to make her safe, all the ways you make her happy, something is still the matter. There isn’t any fault of yours there, there isn’t anything you can do to make her feel otherwise—you do the best you can, and so does she.”

“I…” Marehis was objecting.

“Can’t do anything more, Marehis. And you can’t do it alone.”

“Ain’t a character flaw that you can’t do everything all on your own, Mare,” Sera said, “Let us help you, okay? I mean…if you really wanna help Inky? Last thing she needs right now is her mami falling apart because she refuses to take care of herself. She’d rather know you was strugglin’ and be able to help you, than find out after the fact once you’ve worked yerself into the ground. I mean would you prefer asking for help, or forcin’ us to help you? Cause that’s all that leads to—you refusing to ask for help just leads to you completely breaking down, sick or- or real bad off, and then we gotta help you anyway.”

Marehis sniffled, “I…would appreciate help getting out of this ditch.”

Sera stared at her for an entire minute as if trying to comprehend the words that had come out of her mouth, “…oh! The literal ditch huh?” she snorted, “yeah I figure we’re right stuck down here Mare.” There was a path forward through a rise of a plateau, but who knew what enemies may lay at the end of the path or how well they could make their return to camp through it.

“I will get the Iron Bull! Vivienne is holding Ellie now. She wants to but she doesn’t—she does it now because you are gone and Cassandra looks tired, the Iron Bull is patrolling. She trusts Dorian and Thom but…being more comfortable with a woman holding her while she sleeps gives her an excuse to do so, so it looks like she has to do it instead of wanting to do it. She wonders if it would be telling if she hummed. It was her choice, she tells herself, her dedication to the Maker and the Chantry that made her get rid of any chance of having children of her own at the risk of passing on her affliction. Ellie is already sick with it—magic—and a child, and sometimes it makes her heart ache. She wonders who her mother was, if she made a different choice than her that led to the same result—”

“Cole,” Marehis smiled reassuringly she- oh she felt badly he’d thought she resented him—she didn’t! Or if she did it was…it was not with him, it was with the situation. She truly did adore the boy- oh, he brightened at that, good. She hoped that progress wasn’t lost over the gentle reprimand, “I know you mean to help, and you do not intend to cause harm, but it is not your place to discuss Vivienne’s private business.” It…wasn’t a sore spot, necessarily with the woman. At least, she did not make it seem as much but Marehis had found it albeit horrific, when…well when Marehis first brought her concerns up with the woman she’d…well she’d wondered how Vivienne had handled any such scares in her own relationship with the Duke. She had no children to Marehis’s knowledge and…well they’d rather the long relationship and Vivienne…there was some sort of potion she took, but it wasn’t for the suppression of monthlies, and condoms um…well Vivienne had once—rosy-cheeked from their second bottle of wine the two shared in the privacy of her quarters in Skyhold—had shared a laugh over the Duke’s disdain for such measures, that he found them uncomfortable and too, they were unnecessary as she’d only ever laid with him, and he’d kept clear of sexual disease. When Marehis carefully voiced the question as to how Vivienne went about ensuring their relationship remained a childless one, Vivienne had offered up a smirk and the casual explanation that, “That has never been a concern. The year my magic came to fruition I was encouraged…well. Bleeding is a risk for Mages and too, there are many studies that suggest children of mages, especially when carried and birthed by a mage directly, are at high risk of having magic passed along to them. One cannot menstruate or risk pregnancy if you’ve not the organs to do so. As they are non-vital, I opted for their removal before my first blood.”

That did not sound like the sort of decision a twelve-year-old should be encouraged to make. Something so utterly permanent that…well there were people in their twenties and thirties, decades older than she had been who wrestle with the idea of whether or not they wish to be a parent. And there was something sad in that…that in her childhood, someone looked upon Vivienne de Fer and said the world would not benefit from her passing on her traits, that she had nothing good to offer in the creation of another life.

“Oh!” Cole chirped, “I…I wasn’t meaning to say Vivienne’s private things…I didn’t really. Odette* made that decision. But she lives with it as Vivienne. Bodies and names are strange.” he scratched at his head before he vanished to fetch the Iron Bull.

—

“C’mon Mare, no more work today. Ink’s out and I’ll watch out for her when she wakes up, you just…dunno, nap? Oh shite, s’lunch—still! You nap, we’ll worry about lunch, and you just eat and rest up and um…if there’s anyone you wanna talk with? Things you wanna get off your chest, we’ll make that happen,” and when Marehis opened her mouth, “No friggin’ buts! ‘cept your butt in bed!”

Marehis smiled, pressing her lips to the girl’s temple, “No buts indeed. I mean to thank you, sweet girl.”

Though it did take a moment for anyone to get anywhere—The Iron Bull was indeed capable of hoisting them out of the ditch, but…he had slid down the bank into it to do so, and gave them the much needed boost out. It took the whole of Thom Rainier’s men holding each other around the middle to form a chain to heft the Iron Bull out of his self-inflicted predicament when the Qunari found he could not raise himself back out of the ditch of his own power.

“The hell?” Bull complained, once he was seated securely on higher ground, “You assholes know how to make a guy feel like a fat ass.”

“Oh no, s’not you Chief,” Thom…wheezed as he worked to catch his breath, “it’s…it’s us. Bunch of weak bastards.”

Sera offered up a giggly laugh, “Kremmy-boy could’ve gotten you out of there with one hand.”

“Ahh. Marehis huffed a laugh, taking the Qunari’s offered arm and going to sit with him by the fire. Oh, Cassandra was tired, the woman was dozing in her seat, she startled slightly when Sera sat on her knees at her side and wrapped an arm around the woman to support her, pull her to rest against her side where the Seeker relaxed and offered her a smile before looking to Marehis and offering something of a sympathetic look, shaking herself a bit to wake up more. Oh, to be awake to…get things off of Marehis’s chest, she supposed. Ellie was resting…very hard. The girl was congested to the point of snoring, loudly as she slumbered in Vivienne’s arms, the woman admittedly looked a bit alarmed, like she was not certain just how the girl was producing such a loud sound…though she did nothing to pass the girl off to anyone else even as the Iron Bull and Marehis returned.

And…they were all staring at her, Thom’s men giving their fire a wide berth as they patrolled the area. And the Inquisition’s reinforcements had yet to show up…Ellie was asleep and Marehis…would discuss this with her much more gently at a later date, purely to assure her that Marehis was seeking assistance.

Marehis…did not experience the bond as her girls might, but she did feel something, occasionally. Their first day in the Emerald Graves she’d been struck with pure, unadulterated, overwhelming love of her children and something that ached like the most painful-pleasant bit of nostalgia in her chest, and an instinct that told her the feelings belonged entirely to Solas. That he was feeling those things in such abundance they resonated with enough strength in the bond that even she could feel it. Now she felt something similar, an ache that was wholly painful—worry-mixed-adoration, like the concern for something entirely precious being put to danger and sadness that spoke to the mourning and fear that such danger was being ignored. She hated that she’d tears in her eyes as she met Solas’s fraught stare, but she opened her mouth and spoke.

For perhaps a solid ten minutes. Of her every fear and remorse since Haven had fallen. She found herself in the comfort of the Iron Bull’s warmth as the Qunari slung an arm around her shoulders and held her to his side as she wept and she…well she realized why they called it ‘venting your spleen’, truly it felt as if, while frustrations flew from her lips a balloon of pent-up anxieties deflated somewhere inside her. She was scared for her children, she was scared for everyone that was important to them, she lay awake worrying about where next a threat or betrayal would befall them. She was scared to trust her own instincts lately—how could she? She’d entertained the culprit behind the Conclave, trusted him with everything. Was it some failing on her part? Surely she should have- should have realized something was amiss. Ultimately she just felt so…incapable. After Haven alone? She’d spent hours appealing to Leliana, surely- surely someone else was more qualified to guard Ellie? She would be heartbroken to leave Leliana’s ranks but she…she could not- she could never abandon Ellie, she would just maintain her role as the girl’s maid servant. Someone who knew what the hell they were doing would take over her protection. When Solas’s involvement with the Conclave came to light? She’d all but tendered her resignation—she had written it up but…it felt like selfishness that kept her from turning it in. She-could not leave her girls. Her fears multiplied from there, felt innumerable, and she- oh she’d been so inadequate in her position because of her anxieties, she realized that now that yes, her forgetfulness, haze and exhaustion were all symptoms of them and she didn’t even know where to begin dealing with that. The more she worried, the less useful she was—which spawned further worry!

“What do you need us to do?” was the first question asked of her, and it was from Cassandra. And she felt wholly worthless replying, “I…I don’t know.”

“Well that doesn’t work Mare,” the Iron Bull decided…staring at her almost in challenge to refute him as he said, “you’re gonna sit down and decide what the hell is best for you to fix this shit inside yourself. Don’t worry about the Imekaris. ‘cause at the end of the day, we got them, okay? and you not being at your best is only a detriment to them—only way to be at your best? Is to do what’s best for you. You need potion? Go for it. Therapy? Hell, I’m down to throw re-educator knowledge at you. If you just need a damn break? Take it. You need to take a few swings at this asshole?” he pointed a thumb at Solas. “I’ll hold him down, keep my bad eye on the situation till I hear you calm down.”

“We are here, darling,” Vivienne insisted, taking hold of Marehis’s hand. “Be gentle with yourself my dear, the Iron Bull is correct.” she scanned her gaze across their numbers. “Eleanor has every imaginable bodyguard at her disposal in the field. Do not even consider her security—when we are in camp, enjoy your time with Eleanor and Sera. In the field? Fight as any party member would—we already have an eye on her at all times, I assure you.”

“I don’t even know what these Red Templar bastards look like, honestly,” the Iron Bull agreed, “Just been swingin’ blind at ‘em keeping the good eye on Imekari.”

“You will cease assuming you are solely responsible for Eleanor,” Cassandra voiced, “I…found myself in a similar situation when you were being chased by Venatori, Marehis. Feeling wholly inadequate, a failure at every turn because I could not keep every bit of harm or discomfort from Eleanor in your absence,” she offered a rueful grin, “I vented my issues and…came nearly to what could easily be mistaken for tears, in Varric’s presence. He’d similar advice for me. To rely on our allies, and cease beating myself up.”

That…she- oh she appreciated them, and she felt worthless, ungrateful because- oh she just was not certain that would even work to ease her worries-

“Most of them do not exist!” Cole insisted.

“…Cole. Treasure that you are. I’m not certain I follow,” Vivienne drawled. For all Marehis was certain he’d been addressing her personal thoughts, she wasn’t certain she followed either.

“I don’t talk to your inside thoughts because you don’t like it! It hurts you to accept help from me,” the Spirit almost sounded like he was whining, he felt so complaintive about not being allowed to help the Grand Enchanter. “It is rude to interrupt people’s conversation,” the boy saw fit to remind her eliciting something of a surprised…thankfully amused, stare from her before she waved for him to please continue and he looked to Marehis once more, “Marehis…a great deal of the threats you’re fixating on, worrying they’ll happen? They do not truly exist. Some of them entirely, and most of them no where near the moment you’re existing in. They are all coming to you, from you. You consider them—which is your job—but then you focus on them, and that makes them feel real and pressing when they are not.”

“Ink does groundy things most mornings um…we do ‘em before we wake up?” Sera said, “but we can just like, wait until we wake up and do them with you, mum. You think that might help? It helps um, me be in the habit so when I do start freaking out…well, depends on whatss freaking me out, but more often than not I can er, tell myself where I am and what’s really happening, and I feel better. And me and her do the meditate-y stuff um…” she shrugged, “whenever we’re in Skyhold most nights and before bed in the field. And I know if I need to, I can say ‘hey, I’m feeling this’ and Ink’s always there to listen and help.”

Marehis nodded. “If…if it wouldn’t be a bother, waiting until you are awake, yes I would um…it would be nice to join you, I think. In the evenings as well,” she agreed.

“Course it wouldn’t be a bother Mare, jeeze,” Sera said, “Um…it kind of sounds like you’ve been talking mean at yourself? I do that too sometimes, but you and ‘sandra and Ink, all of you lot’ve taught me it isn’t true, the mean things I can say at myself. So…if I start thinking something you lot would never say to me, that’s the first clue that helps me realize I’m overthinking something to the point of letting my brain sickness fuck with me over it. Once I realize that, I can usually brush it off and refocus. Like I was worried I was botherin’ Inky the other day, ‘cause I interrupted her when she was busy with making potion for ‘sandra, something real hard that takes lots of focus. I got all spiraly thought wise, worrying I’m just useless or whatever but…well none of you’d say that about me, not even Viv, so,” Oh…oh thank everything that was still truth, if she’d said something of the sort in a snappish mood. “I realized I was fine, just overthinking, and figured out where to move on from there. Mare…you’re the only one saying you’re inadequate and shite at protecting Inky.”

“You are!” Cole agreed, “You’re the only one those thoughts exist in.”

….aah. Truly? “After everything?” Marehis asked…quite truly surprised, “I’ve made nothing but mistakes since Haven- I- I did not realize Ellie had been drugged-!”

“Mare. Babe,” Bull snorted, “Imekari doesn’t do mornings any different when she’s not hit with sedative.”

“Morning happens too early.” Dorian insisted in the girl’s defense. That may well be true but- but- “It was from my hand she fell into Corypheus’s!” Marehis insisted.

“Good lord, Marehis!” Dorian exclaimed sounding appalled, “You honestly- the Iron Bull’s arms are the length of your entire body—if any should be commiserating not sweeping Ellie to safety when we fled Haven, it should be he. Or Cole with his ability to teleport. Or me—we saw a wall of fire and panicked, I cannot tell you the number of times I have kicked myself for not thinking ‘oh, perhaps if I stop for two seconds and act like a damn mage, I can cast chill to make way through the flames and give the girl an escape’! And believe you me, sleeping with the Dread Wolf—I have given worse men than Solas access to the temple that is my body in exchange for, I kid you not, a sandwich. Did I know what a sandwich was beforehand? No. No I did not. I had never consumed as much outside the realm of hors d’oeuvres, but a week without food makes what sounds like some sort of horrible dish made of literal sand seem a fair trade for carnal relations.
You? You’re golden my dear, there are swaths of people who have done worse. And we all trusted him, believed his ‘I’m just a friendly Apostate passing by when I saw the Conclave go ka-poof, oh do please allow the shine of my scalp to light the way through these dark times’ bit.”

“I do believe that is precisely what he said to clear suspicion with me in my initial investigation,” Cassandra drawled, holding Marehis’s gaze. Ahh. Yes. Even the literal Seeker of Truth had dropped suspicion of Solas early on.

“We could hardly fault you for believing him when we all were played a fool,” Dorian concluded. For all the man could be rather catty he did have a sweet compassion in him.

“For the record I suspected him on sight,” the Iron Bull rumbled out.

“Yes amatus, delight of my heart, you suspect everyone on sight. If Cremisius revealed himself to be the spawn of Corypheus laying in wait to betray us all this entire time, you would be none surprised.”

“…names being so similar is real damn freaky,” the Qunari defended the bit of conspiracy. Marehis, oh she huffed a laugh at that, “I’ll gladly play the fool—you’re not to suspect Cremisius of anything more than being a perfectly wonderful young man.” Though, “Thank you all for…for listening, offering support.”

“Take a little time, figure out what you gotta do, okay?” Sera intoned.

Marehis nodded. “I will—do not worry da’vehnan. I…I would appreciate it if we kept this to ourselves. Ellie—”

“Uh…Inky’s in the Fade right now and I’m like kinda super positive she was watchin’ for our soldiers to get in before making herself wake up to help set up camp but um…yeah she probably heard everything.”

Marehis blanched at that, “Oh! Uh…” she looked to the girl sleeping against Madam de Fer…though if she were in the Fade did that mean she was standing away from her body? How did that work, exactly? She cast her gaze about uncertainly, “Da’vehnan I- um. I hope you don’t take it badly, that I wished for secrecy, I just did not wish to cause unnecessary concern—”

There was a sharp inhale as the girl sat up rather immediately sat up in Vivienne’s hold, startling the Enchanter a bit, “Mami, s’not unneces- un- unnecessess-” the girl groaned a bit when she struggled with pronouncing the word, resting her head back against Vivienne’s shoulder, “Tia. Mi cerebro esta rota. Eres mi mami, es mi trabajo preocuparme.”

“Ahh,” Vivienne cleared her throat and informed Marehis, “Apparently, the Inquisitor’s brain is not currently cooperating with her—you are her mami, and therefore it is her job to worry for you.”

“Gracias,” Ellie yawned, leaning sideways until she was falling out of Vivienne’s lap into Marehis’s, “love you,” before she was steadily falling back to sleep.

"Sera," Vivienne voiced the question, "how is it, exactly, you knew where Eleanor was in the Fade? She could have been anywhere. Was it the bond?"

Sera snorted, "Not the bond, just my eyeballs."

The statement had Dorian's eyeballs nearly falling out of his head, "You can see into the Fade…from the waking world?" Sera shrugged, "Dunno. Always been okay-ish at seeing shite in the Fade, apparently. When I think back on it. Was one of the things that told Solas I got magic big-time. I’m not like super at it—I can’t see Ink non-stop. But I know she’s here, and I know where to look ‘round for her, and if I get an impression of where she is I…I can’t like, look right at her, but I look through where she is, and see her that way. Like creepin’ on someone you don’t want noticin’ you starin’—so you focus on a spot behind ‘em to still have them in sight.” Sera's voice dipped quieter as she informed them, looking to the stand of their proposed camp where one could see past the fallen behemoth's Red Lyrium nest in order to see the road. "Ink's pacin' a right storm over there."

Cole looked to Sera, smiling brightly, "I can do that!” he assured her before vanishing from sight, and after a moment Sera quietly announced, "Cole’s ‘stractin’ Inky in the Fade, it en’t like any of us are new to camp set-up, I got a pretty good idea how she’d want it and shite she’s sleepy,” Sera said worriedly.
“I don’t think she feels very well at all,” Marehis agreed, feeling at her child’s forehead, “she’s not feverish but she’s coming down with something unpleasant.”

“Oh,” Solas let out the mildly startled sound when he took that as reason to investigate the bond, “so she is.”

With…certainty. Oh. It sort of struck her then. She could think something was the matter all day long and it truly isn’t, but when she knew something is wrong? She knew it. She’d worried endlessly her girls may get ill—the horrible weather, restless nights, the overall stress of the situation—but now it was a certainty. She could have…well she could have found more focus in those moments before, spared herself from worry and waited until the actual reason to worry occurred—because she would know it once it was certainty. She knew her girls! She’d not taken offense in the moment the other day when Ellie snapped at her, because she may not have fully realized the situation but something in her said it was to be expected, to let it go because it was not that Ellie didn’t respect her—something entirely else was the matter and she should focus on figuring out just what. It had been a scarce moment before Sera spoke on her sister’s behalf, that Marehis realized they were not very far from camp, the Rifts had to be near enough to feel through the entirety of their time there and Ellie was carrying herself stiffly, a slump to her left shoulder that occurred when the formerly twice-dislocated appendage ached with old pain.

She’d…been terribly unkind to herself, hadn’t she? She could not know everything, but she knew enough.

——

So, when Ellie stirred despite Cole’s efforts to keep her distracted from realizing their reinforcements had arrived to set up camp, Marehis held the girl more tightly and intoned, “Da’vehnan, you are ill, you will do no one any favors if you do not rest and recover. The camp is in good hands—you will rest until it is set up, and then you will eat, take potion, and go to bed.”

“Bossy mami,” Ellie lightly accused, a small smile at her lips as her nose crinkled and she tiredly agreed, “kay.”

Marehis…put everything else from her mind. She told herself they were in camp, surrounded by allies, and her only concern? Herself and her girls. Sera was entertaining symptoms herself of being unwell, a rasp in her voice like her throat was sore and she was tired when she sat down alongside Marehis and Ellie, resting her poor head on Marehis’s shoulder. Oh her da’lens! The afternoon had gotten away from them as they fought their way through Emprise du Lion, it was essentially dinner time by the time camp was settled and Cassandra with the assistance of Cole and Rainier was seeing to getting food on the proverbial table.

“Da’assan,” Marehis offered softly, rubbing circles on Sera’s back, “dinner will be on soon, we can clean up after and relax until you fall asleep.”

“You’ll relax too?” Sera checked and Marehis nodded, “Sweet, s’do it.”

S’do it, they did. They would be subject to the mere act of wiping sweat from their bodies during their time here, wouldn’t they? The very instant they had access to the necessary facilities they were all indulging in a nice warm, proper bath.

…

It had been something she’d seen many a time in her recent education in Adrasten religion—the idea that the Maker would always provide. So would, apparently, Fen’Harel.

There were tents for their soldiers, and their reinforcements moved along the tent for the Inquisitor and her party. And then there was one tent more, that Solas sat spelling for the better part of an hour to warm while the Iron Bull seemed to be assisting in building a secondary fire to warm a great pot of water over, and Vivienne disappeared into the tent Solas set up, leading a few soldiers who carried, well,

There had been preparations for the horses they’d left in the comfort of city stables—which meant there was an unused troth at hand, a long metal tub that could be used. As a tub. For bathing.

Altogether it allowed her to rouse her girls for dinner, see them eat their fills which was not much, Sera hadn’t much of an appetite, but she did join her sister in sipping at broth—it was ‘yum’ and soothed her throat, didn’t upset her stomach. Vivienne prepared honeyed tea for everyone, sitting herself at Sera’s side as she quietly offered her…well, it sounded something like comfort, like she felt badly that the girl was poorly, and giving her advice—words of caution to consider when managing illness as a Mage, and Sera promised she trusted everyone’s judgement if she started doing ‘weirdy shite’, and if she felt uncertain about Fade dreaming she’d take ‘sleepy potion’, the sort prescribed to Ellie as it would keep her from the Fade. She’d a good understanding not to accept anything, even benign seeming from anything in the Fade, but the heavy presence of Red Lyrium in the area made demon activity more aggressive and if illness clouded her judgement, she may even unintentionally accept a demons deal. Solas assured he would guard the girls in the Fade but he well understood Sera’s reticence, she was so new to magic and too…

Sera groaned…rather miserably for all she was soaking with her sister in a warm bath steaming with Embrium that soothed their symptoms, though the Human girl had fallen asleep while Marehis was washing her hair. “I know m’not supposed to take any demon deals but I’m kinda scared I would if they promised Inky wouldn’t get sick no more.”

“She’s alright sweet girl,” Marehis promised.
“I don’t like it,” the girl pouted.
“I don’t like it either,” Cole’s voice all but had Marehis jumping out of her literal skin—Maker! The boy appeared, seated beside the tub. Sera did not seem to mind his presence and neither did Marehis believe he would join them to invade their privacy for inappropriate reasons. He shook his head, ‘no’, “I came to make Sera laugh. Though I am afraid to make her laugh, her throat is so sore—I do not like your bodies being sick!”

“Awe, Cuddly—we’ll be okay.”
“I went to Mister Cyril, he says potion will help, and sleep—Ellie is sleeping, should you sleep now? We would keep your body safe from the water. Oh! And staying hydrated, you are doing a good job by being in the bath!” he encouraged, “But it would not be good for you to be wet and return to the cold, so you have to be made dry before you leave the tent,” he sagely informed them. “I got all of the warm things and put them in our tent, blankets and pillows and the rocks from around the fire.”

“Da’mi-“ Marehis started though she was interrupted by Cole’s exuberant gasp, the boy was wide eyed with excitement as he rocked back with a burst of energy and announced,

“That is what you call Krem because you love him!”
“I do,” she assured, “it is a term of affection that works for you both da’len.”
“My old body used to be da’assan like Sera, but it makes me happy this body can be da’mi like Krem because you…you love me?” he checked.

Marehis nodded, she did, increasingly so at this moment, the sweet boy was admittedly precious when he was so very rosy cheeked and enthusiastic, but, “While I love you and the efforts you’re going to, to make the girls well—the rocks from around the campfire are there to assist in keeping the fire contained and creating something of a marker for those nearing it to keep a safe distance.”

“Oh!” he chirped in surprise, “I will put them back!” he assured as he vanished from sight.
He ultimately…had to put many things back.
The Iron Bull came and took both girls into his arms once they were clean and dry, Sera offering up a bit of argument that she could ruddy walk but that did not stop her from leaning into the crouching Qunari’s open arm immediately, letting out a happy little hum at how warm he was as he hoisted the girls against his chest and made his way out of the tent to head for the one they would share for sleep.

Very well-blanketed sleep. The cots Cassandra and Marehis shared with Ellie and Sera had a great, massive pile of blankets. Not unlike a mountain.

“…Cuddly,” Sera said, blinking in surprise as she took in the sight, “we…we have blankets, you know.”

Cole materialized at the foot of the cots, smiling enthusiasm as he nodded, “Yes. Now you have all of the blankets!”
…”All of the blankets da’mi?” Marehis questioned.
“Yes.”
 “…in camp?”
“In all of our camps. At least the ones in Emprise du Lion. The others are too far, I did not want to be too far away if Sera or Ellie needed anything.”
Ellie and Sera were jostled a bit in the Iron Bull’s hold as he did his best to contain his laughter, rumbling out a mirthful, “Oh…buddy.” Ellie’s eyes cracked open to investigate the disturbance.
“Cole,” Cassandra spoke up from behind them, she’d only just entered the tent and had a hand over her mouth trying to hide just how widely she was smiling, “sweet boy…why?”
“Ellie and Sera are sick—they need blankets so they can be warm.”
“So do our soldiers and scouts,” Cassandra reminded him.
Cole blinked as if wholly confused. “They are not sick.”
“But they may well become sick if they lack the means to warm themselves,” Marehis returned.
Soft realization dawned in his face, “…oh.”
“We only need our own blankets sweets,” Sera assured him, “you want me to help you put them ba-“
“No!” Cole nearly yelped, sounding alarmed, “you should not go back out into the cold, this was supposed to help you stay warm! I messed it up!”
There was a soft, cracking cough, and then a little peal of giggles from Ellie, “C-Cole! Y-y-you-“ oh she let out a small scream of laughter she had to cough after, Sera joining in her giddiness. “Oh, Carino! This was really really sweet, I’m sorry you have to take everyone their blankets back, but it made me and Sera’s hearts so happy that you love us so much you’d do something like this!”
“Oh!” the Spirit blushed, “It did!” he breathed a sigh of relief, “Good. So many people say laughter is the best medicine, I am so happy I made you laugh!”
“Thanks Cole, you’re the best,” Sera encouraged.
Oh, he did mean well, it was altogether very sweet and he was immediate in his correction, disappearing with the majority of his blanket pile in his arms as he vanished from the tent.
“Sissy, I know you like Fade dreaming, but if we sleep-potion it, it’ll really help us feel better when we wake up,” Ellie reasoned.
“Sounds good Inky, yeah, let’s get some good sleep,” Sera agreed as she separated herself from the Iron Bull and held her arms out to the younger girl, hugging her tightly…and proceeding to walk forward to the cots while she held her sister fast against her chest, it took a great deal of effort but she did it laughingly as she deposited Ellie onto the cots first, “Ink and me’ll be all good Mare, you go take a bath and get ready for bed, kay?”
There was something akin to deja vu. Solas invading her bath—at the beginning as opposed to the end as he had in Skyhold. Well, it was more like she invaded—he was merely replenishing the tub with clean warm water and there was the faintest scent of something medicinal she couldn’t quite put her finger on. He blushed as he cleared his throat and rose to his feet, “I apologize, erm, it is ready. Enjoy yourself,” he insisted.
“Ma seranas,” she offered, clearing her throat, “I do appreciate the help you’ve been.”
“Of course,” he nodded. “I’m pleased you’re feeling better. Sera and Ellie are well,” he thought to assure her, “they are…talking, giggly over something as they’re waiting for potion to send them off to sleep.” Oh. It should not be so heartachingly sweet, the utter adoration in his features as he spoke of them.
“You’ll miss having them with you in the Fade,” Marehis supposed, albeit sympathetic.
“Ahh,” he grimaced slightly as if it hadn’t quite occurred to him, “Yes, I suppose I will. But I…I am pleased I can wake to them—grateful. I’m not certain who I should thank for the change in sleeping situation, but I do…know such a change could be revoked if you bid it. I appreciate the grace you’ve shown me, allowing me to be close with the girls while I can be.”
“It’s only because of your own actions toward them,” Marehis assured. Too, she’d not much say—it was the Iron Bull who laid Solas to rest in the tent Sera’d prepared for their whole party, there had been more room for Cyril to work with, stitch his injuries closed and administer potion and what not. And Ellie had been so panicked when she regained consciousness, terrified because she could not be made aware of Solas’s wellbeing outside the fact that he was at the very least alive and near, in the bond, and they were hardly going to banish the man while he was injured, even less so once he had their Inquisitor physically attached to him. And to revoke the change after he’d made it so clear he would serve Ellie as any of them would…well, he was a party member. So until he began acting as otherwise, he’d be treated as such.

“Well, do enjoy yourself. If you’ve need of anything…”
“T’m sure you’ll know.”
“I’ll send someone you’d erm, be comfortable with assisting, should you need it,” he promised.

…that should not invoke the thought that they’d bathed together before, she wasn’t entirely discomforted at the thought of-

“Your hair is very greasy,” Solas said.
“…excuse me?”
“Your hair, Marehis,” the man steadily returned, “you’re rather the sight. Whatever will people say, Madam de Fer’s lover walking about in such a state?”
“Are you endeavoring to pick a fight with me?”
“I’m endeavoring to make you upset with me, I suppose,” he shrugged, “I rather prefer that than you being displeased with yourself—” he cleared his throat. “I’m messing that up though, aren’t I? Well. Oh,” oh he looked pleased with himself as he realized, “you’re annoyed with me now,” with a little satisfied nod as if- oh!

She was annoyed with him! How dare he be so-! So-!
He bit his lip and ducked his head as he swiftly took leave of the tent and that…that was good because she only barely trusted herself to not go after him, she certainly would not risk kissing him in the middle of camp. And that was what she’d been inspired to do, for some reason.
Who got so upset and annoyed with someone that they wanted to kiss them of all things?!
She was a little scared the end of her monthly may not be the end of such distressing swings and she wasn’t certain what that meant or what to do about it.

Her first thought was to kill Solas. And she liked that more than wishing to kiss him, it felt like a much more sane way of handling things, all things considered.

It was vehnan root. The extract of it, in the form of oil, that she’d smelled when she came in. He’d poured it into the bath water, she discovered as she lowered herself into it and she had never been so upset to have her every ache alleviated from her body. She spent most of her bath stewing over that, until Vivienne peeked in to check on her.

Her annoyance renewed with the information that Solas had suggested Marehis may need help with her hair.

She didn’t, not necessarily but it was something of a relief, a luxury to have someone else massage shampoo into her hair, and Cassandra joined them with warm tea and a bit of a smile on her face, for all she looked a bit confused.

“I’m…supposed to say I thought you might like some tea.”
“Solas made it,” Marehis sighed.

Cassandra nodded. “I did think to bring you this, if your potions regimen permits?” she wondered, offering up a flask, “Borrowed from Ser Rainier so. It is wine.”

“Wine is my potions regimen, thank you,” Marehis smiled when Vivienne chuckled softly at the jest, Cassandra’s eyes crinkling with her amusement as she passed off the flask for Marehis’s consumption. Yes, she…was relatively new to Andrasten religion but in this moment—at the end of a hard day, her girls safe, friends at her side while she soaked in a warm bath with a fun flask of red wine?—she was absolutely certain there was a Maker, and He did in fact love her.

“Are you feeling any better, darling?” Vivienne worried.
“…I am, I think,” she confessed. Once upon a time, when her ward had looked up to her and informed her that merely seeking help from Adan, being open with the fact that she was struggling and getting help for that struggle had been enough to offer her a sense of relief, Marehis had found that questionable, worried Ellie was downplaying how she was feeling to press on with her day. But…well, now she knew from personal experience that yes, “I’m…relieved, I…feel like perhaps in part, my anxieties were worsened by the fact I was trying to hide having them.”

“It is a difficult thing to be vulnerable with,” Cassandra sympathized, “but when we are, we can best help each other, can we not?”

Marehis nodded, leaning to press a kiss to the woman’s cheek. “How are you feeling?” Marehis wondered, she’d expected Cassandra to be asleep by now.

“I’m well, feeling much better. Eleanor insists I not stay up too late,” she sounded bemused, “but I am waiting for word from Skyhold, Leliana and Cullen really. I had Sera pen her theories about Red Lyrium causing Sahrnia’s winter to linger and hold, worsen to the point it has frozen the river in a permanent fashion. So far we’ve had no ill reports, but Sera fears there is a need for caution where we take our water from. Snow is the only clear source we can find with the river in such a state, and snow so near the Red Lyrium may well be tainted by the stuff, the last thing we need is Lyrium madness spreading through our ranks. She wants to collect samples tomorrow to send for Dagna’s examination,” Cassandra shook her head as if to clear it, like she’d gotten off topic, “I’m concerned Cullen will be distressed by new developments, it is not a necessarily pleasant thing that every time we learn something new of Red Lyrium it is always something devastating or sinister.”

“It would be nice to discover the stuff heals all ills if processed the right way,” Marehis supposed, earning a huff of laughter from the Seeker who nodded.

“He is…oh he is petrified we’re drawing so near to the quarry,” there was an amused smile at her lips as she said, “I mentioned Eleanor’s brush with attitude Vivienne informed me of, that she was rude with you the other day? Cullen may have suggested you take issue with it even as she has apologized—ground our Inquisitor for talking back to her mother.”

Oh, Marehis smiled at the thought as well because she was certain he meant, “Ground her—so she will simply have to return Skyhold to serve such punishment and miss out on all of her regular social activities?”

“Yes—no Rift Sealing, Red Templar slaying, Grey Warden dealing for at least a month until she has learned her lesson. He acknowledged that may well lead to the world ending, but he also acknowledged he doesn’t much care.”

Ridiculous, wonderful man. “How is he?” Marehis worried. “Has he been feeling any better?”

Cassandra sighed, oh, Marehis made to rest a hand on her shoulder but that might be inconsiderate given her hands were currently wet and would only soak the woman’s sleep top. Vivienne neatly dried her hand on a towel and offered comfort herself, that was sweet and the Seeker raised a hand to overlap Vivienne’s. “He assures me he will be fine though his migraine persists and Cremisius,” she had to stop and clear her throat, “oh he has only just returned to Skyhold but he reports his belief that Cullen has not slept in days. So, I’m waiting to hear either from Cullen, so I may offer console and insist he get some rest, or from Cremisius with confirmation that the man is in fact in bed at this hour.”

Oh. Oh! She’d meant to write him! Krem, sweet man, oh she was just dying to know how his appointment went. Cassandra had written, asking after him so she could always ask but…well, it was the Lieutenant’s business entirely, while Vivienne may or may not have negative ideas about his gender identity, that didn’t mean the man would be comfortable with her being privy to discussion about his medical business. Too, he’d spoken to Marehis and Cassandra separately, she wasn’t certain if that meant he only wished her to have certain information while he got more personal with the Seeker. He’d spoken of it briefly with Marehis, seeking to confirm with her she understood he would be undergoing treatment he wasn’t wholly certain just how it would affect him—oh, she’d hugged him and voiced her support, wished him the best, and it made for excellent practice with praying to the Maker, she hoped Krem was well, that this treatment would be nothing but a blessing to him And he’d gone to Cassandra before agreeing to see a Healer, apparently—when Cassandra met with them on the way to the Emerald Graves, the young man had pulled her aside in the evening and while they stayed in sight of camp, Marehis couldn’t quite hear what was said, but she’d seen the young man looking wholly nervous as he confided in the Seeker and she’d hugged him fiercely, and they’d talked for hours, Marehis and Ellie had headed for bed before they returned to camp, and it felt like she’d been asleep for quite some time when she was roused by Cassandra softly apologizing as she joined them so late.

“The Lieutenant is well?”

Cassandra met her eye to inform her, “Nervous, worried about Cullen,” she listed the two separate things together—nervous in relation to his treatment, coupled with cover before Vivienne, “but he is well. Very excited to be returned safely to Skyhold with his father.”

“Is there…” Vivienne started, curious and careful all at once, “…something going on between he and Lady Montilyet?”

Marehis wondered at the mischievous quirk to Cassandra’s lips followed by, “I should certainly hope not,” she drawled, “as Cremisius is still dating Eleanor and too, Lady Montilyet, lovely as she is, is hardly an appropriate match for the young man. Goodness, she is nearly twice his age.”

“Oh you know well just which Aclassi I meant,” Vivienne reprimanded.

“Hmm…well, I’ve not gossiped of it, I wasn’t present in Val Royeaux as you two were, but I do have a sense of…I think they would compliment each other well. They’re both sweet, gentle-spirited people.”

Oh…

It should not be such delightful fun—but it was! Marehis was giggily with her joy at the prospect and that had the other women looking to her, and Vivienne’s hand slipped into her bathwater, which glowed a soft shade of redish orange for all of a moment to make the water warm again as she insisted she know every detail Marehis was willing to share.

Which was all of the details she knew. Her bathwater grew cold again as she and Vivienne sipped at the flask of wine while Marehis filled the women in on their time in Val Royeaux—that Leliana informed her Josie and Mister Aclassi were testing the waters of a possible relationship…which ultimately led to the revelation that they had not been entertaining any such notions, it had been a lie to cover up the Ambassador’s distress that Leliana was joining them in Val Royeaux, a farce turned factual by the end of their trip, apparently. Oh, Cassandra may be incapable of mixing wine with potion, but she was as rosy cheeked and giddy as her wine-drunk counterparts by the time Marehis was through with what she knew of the tale, eyes alight as she breathed,

“That…is incredibly romantic. Oh!” she blushed, hiding her face in her hands as she grinned, “Just- unspeakably precious,” she sighed, albeit embarrassed with herself as she cleared her throat and excused herself, “I…should check for messages from Skyhold. Do either of you ladies need anything?” she was met with both women shaking their heads ‘no’ and she nodded, leaning forward to press a kiss to the side of Marehis’s head, “Sleep well. I’m glad you’re in better spirits. If you’ve need of me in the night just wake me.”

It should not make her feel so very warm but it was quite literally a heartwarming sentiment that the Human woman imparted on her, adding her to her list of people who were permitted to rouse her if they’d need of comfort.

She had…she had such wonderful friends. And she’d not much been acting like it, had she? Not feeling like she should rely on them—that was what friendship was for. To rely and be relied upon. She laid down, clean, warm and dry, and pleasantly tipsy, this warm heady haze thrumming through her pleasantly as she crawled into a cot with her girls, and slipped off to sleep.

—

She woke to sunlight peeking into the tent and a soft, “Mami?” voiced against her shoulder before the girl who mumbled it snuggled against her more and began falling asleep again, met with a snort from Marehis’s other side, an arm snaking across her to rub circles on the young Human girl’s back as Sera said, “Sweets, s’time to get up. Doin’ it out of the Fade, remember?”

Ellie nodded, eyes struggling open and Marehis felt her daughters’ arms tighten around her as her youngest murmured, “What we see, issy?”

“Hmm, well. Sleepy Inky,” Sera listed, poking her sister in the cheek and getting a smile and a soft giggle from her, “mama’s awake, there’s blankets, a lamp hanging over head, and the roof of our tent.”

Ellie’s hand shot out a little blindly to thread her fingers into her sister’s hair, softly scratching at the Elf girl’s scalp, “I feel blankets and my pillow, and Sera’s hair, and my mami,” she let out a yawn, “what’s three things you hear mami?”

“Well…” Marehis rasped softly, voice rough with sleep. oh, this was…it was quite the pleasant way to start the day, “I can hear my voice,” she supposed, but more blessedly, “and my da’len’s sweet voices,” and if she listened closely enough her ears were sensitive to pick up, “and their precious heartbeats.”

“What’s smell?” Sera wondered.

“Coconut oil and mint,” Marehis listed. Sight, touch, sound, smell…that left taste. Vivienne had reminded Marehis to brush her own teeth—it wouldn’t do to fall asleep with them freshly coated in wine, but now her mouth was rather tasteless-

A soft kiss was pressed to her cheek, and something warm raised to her lips as her child giggled and Marehis trusted Ellie enough to part her lips and allow her to deposit…candy. A disk of albeit spicy, sweet cinnamon candy that melted on her tongue after a moment and allowed Marehis to announce, “Cinnamon. Da’vehnans. Where…?”

“Mami. If I have to explain snack pockets one more time I’m gonna recommend Papa patent them or something because apparently its a foreign concept.”

Decreasingly so. “You sleep with candy in your pockets?”

“It keeps them warm! And sissy and me have a piece when we wake up—we always do taste outside of the Fade! It’s called mental health care, mami!”

It was certainly a sweet start to the day, both literally and otherwise—Marehis could not help herself, she started laughing, Ellie and Sera smiling up at her. “I love you da’vehnans.”

Light grew greater in the tent momentarily, the soft sound of someone clearing their throats, before offering pleasantly, “Good morning,” Solas greeted them, “Breakfast is ready. I thought perhaps you would appreciate a moment if you’ve need? The Iron Bull is doling out portions and we’ve decided to eat in the tent so those of our numbers entertaining colds can remain out of it until there is need.”

“You’re bringing us breakfast in bed?!” Ellie wondered excitedly, and when the man nodded. “Bed is my favorite place to eat!”

“I’ll be along with it in a moment then,” he assured before stepping back out and securing the tent closed behind him. Ahh.

“I need up, sweet girls. Just a minute,” Marehis excused herself to answer the…very distressing amount of blood pooling in her bandaging. She hated her monthly—absolutely despised.

“Oh! Check your pack, kay?” Ellie requested.

…her pack was just under their cot when she rose, and in the top of it could be found a clean pair of her underthings already lined in bandaging…under which there were glistening bottles of potion for cramping and a little note reminding her to allow someone to reheat her rice bags if she’d need—the note was written in Sera’s hand, but a sweet little heart drawn in Ellie’s stood in place of a signature. She was struck with something like…it felt akin to when she felt things from the bond, experienced Solas’s emotions—in her mind she could see clearly her girls kneeling in the dark, using the glow of Fadelight from Ellie’s palm to see by as they conspired to make their mother’s morning a little bit easier.

She loved her girls—absolutely adored.
Breakfast in bed was a delight even in the field. And there was something alleviating to her usual anxieties, about staying in the tent, it made the world feel somehow smaller and safer, the assurance that they were all secure more certain. Ellie and Sera curled up against her in the warmth of their covers, and Cassandra was the one who passed along her bowl of oatmeal as she joined them once more in their cots, while Solas served Ellie and Sera heaping bowls, eyes alight with mischief as he smiled to them—a bowl in each hand…and then a plate piled high with slices of warm buttery slices of toast appeared from behind his back…floating somehow in midair.

Ellie breathed in an excited gasp, “You’re doing it again—papi! How’d you do it?”

“What the frig?!” Sera backed her curiosity, “When’s he done that?”

Oh, that had Ellie pouting a little bit, but it was at the memory of, “My heart was so sad because I hadn’t seen mami in forever! When she couldn’t come back to Haven and Cremisius had to be my bodyguard instead? Papi brought me a midnight snack and told me stories about the Fade until I was able to sleep.”

“He tucked her in, kissing her on the forehead and wishing her sweet dreams,” Cole announced serenely, “It was overwhelmingly sweet, made her heart feel full in a way that was almost painful. She could not remember anyone having done anything like that for her since she was little, just the glimmer of memory from her life before she dreamed in the Fade, something she thought she’d never have again.”

Ellie blushed fiercely, looking almost painfully shy as she hid her face against Sera’s shoulder, the older girl giggling and wrapping an arm around her as she sympathized, “Awe, Inky!”

Marehis was not teary eyed at the thought, oh! But she was…unspeakably grateful, she hated how much so, that when she hadn’t been able to be with Ellie, Solas had stepped in in such a way, and while the man had taken so much from this girl through his actions before they even met…he’d given her much since then. Precious things, things Marehis hadn’t quite considered she’d been robbed of far too soon in her youth. Solas looked a bit overwhelmed, he had to quietly clear his throat and then he offered the girl reprieve.

“It is an adaptation of Barrier, da’vehnan,” he spoke as if explaining.

“Huh?” Ellie asked, peeking up at him.

“My floating plate trick, it is something that was common practice among those whose job it was to serve at mealtimes. Force magic requires something of continuous movement at an advanced rate to a predesignated destination or direction—but if I hold something just so,” he took the plate of toast he’d set down on the cot back into his hand, holding it so there was just the barest bit of distance between the edge of the plate and his torso, the soft pulse of magic sounded as he explained, “And I cast upon myself with the plate in my vicinity,” he slipped his hand out from under it, “barrier supports the weight of the plate, creates a channel of orbit for it to pass through around me as barrier is made to cast evenly across a space,” he said, and as he stepped back the plate shifted to slide around him before he brought it back before him and pulled it from it’s spelled space, rested it on the cot once more, “it also serves to keep the foods heat contained, keeping it warm without burning the one carrying it.”

“Oh that’s so cool!”

“Friggin’ sweet!” Sera cheered.

“Gracias for showing us, papi!” Ellie thanked him, leaning forward, which prompted the Elf man to crouch to be more level with her so she could do as she pleased, pressing a kiss to his cheek.

“It is my pleasure to teach you, da’lens,” he assured.

“It is my pleasure to eat this toast if you’re done playing with our food,” Marehis offed teasingly as she made theft of a slice. Her girls! Teasing her girls and not- not him!

And he chuckled warmly! Such rudeness! “Well, if you’ve need of more, let me know.”

She was not blushing as she pulled the plate closer so the girls could more easily reach— they’d neither one of them raised a spoonful of breakfast to their lips. It was true they’d been talking, but they could do so while shoveling breakfast into their mouths, they’ve well proven that almost every morning she’d known them. Warm, thin, salty bread might be gentler on their tender stomachs if they were still so poorly. Oh her poor girls! Just the faintest bit of congestion sounded in Sera’s breathing, only slightly better than Ellie’s, but drainage was a horrible thing, bile and phlegm could build up and pour into ones stomach, making everything seem wholly unappetizing.

“Mmm, Inky, you-” Sera was saying as she leaned out of the cot to rummage about in a pack the moment Ellie affirmed, “Uh-huh! And we can-“

Sera gasped excitedly, “Yeah!”

“Do you know what they’re saying?” Cassandra quietly wondered to Marehis.

“I was just about to ask you,” Marehis replied, honestly.

Oh, Sera had taken up three vials of potion in hand, two warm red potions—cold medicine—and a pale, nearly white potion used to calm a burning stomach, save for the faintest tinge of green that said it was mixed with Elf Root tonic…vehnan root tonic? That was a nicer name. It was something Adan and Stitches had developed to curtail any potential for another ulcer. Oh, it was sweet—Sera setting clinking bottles down and uncorking cold medicine for her sister before she uncorked one for herself, clinking potion with each other before knocking it back with good cheer, and then she passed along stomach calming drought Ellie drank steadily, nose scrunching that spoke to potion tasting ‘yick’. And then once their hands were no longer occupied with potions bottles, the girls pulled their blankets up around their shoulders before…ahh, calling chill—Sera into her left hand, Ellie into her right, and they proceeded to hold hands throughout the meal, their magic communing while they ate.

Oh that was- it seemed like a bit of further grounding for Sera and her magic, Ellie using her magic to send reassurance and security and encouragement to prepare her sister’s newly wakened magic for the day ahead. It was…interesting. Marehis hadn’t thought much about magic before…well it didn’t much cross her mind before she had a child—now children plural—who had magic. But magic was something alive in her girls. Vivienne regarded their communing with curiosity, though she waited until the girls were finished eating to question the practice…but hadn’t…oh. They hadn’t explained anything. Marehis just…well she had a sense of what they were doing. Huh.

“Sera’s magic isn’t used to lots of stuff—we thought maybe my magic could teach hers things!” Ellie said, “So we’re gonna try letting them have like, magic-sissy time!”

That got a wry look from the Enchanter, something caught between bemusement and genuinely finding the idea precious, “Your magics are sisters then, are they?”

“Oh-huh! Sera’s my big sister, but her magic’s just a baby! So my magic gets to be big sister to her magic! It’s so much fun! I like being the big sister!”

Sera snorted, “Why come Ink? S’there a difference?”

“Yeah!” Ellie insisted, setting her empty bowl aside and scooting back as far as she could in their cot before rising on a knee and moving to seat herself directly behind Sera, wrapping her arms and legs around her as she did her best to tuck the older girl’s head under her chin, “It means I get to be the protecty one! And I love doing that! I just! want to! love you!” she enthused, grunting with her efforts as she squeezed her sister before pepperings kisses to the top of her head.

“Already do love me! Cripes!” Sera laughingly complained.

==

It…was heartachingly adorable. And when Cassandra was assisting Marehis with her armor while the girls were out rallying with their party to prepare for the day ahead, the Nevarran woman’s face blazed when Marehis giggled and asked, “Ellie loves her magic being a big sister, just how do you think she’ll enjoy the role herself someday?”

Cassandra scoffed softly at that, “Do not look at me. That will not be my doing, not for years. A decade at the very least before any such thing will occur.”

“A decade?”

“…maybe not in its entirety. But still years!” Cassandra insisted, letting out something of a miserable groan, “They truly shouldn’t be so precious,” she complained. “You are not to say so much as a word about this with Cullen ugh. He’s…he is pleased you are well, but I do think he’s mildly disappointed you are not expecting.”

“Really?” Marehis asked. Oh, sweet man, had he gotten excited at the prospect of a little one underfoot? She’d…well, she was far more glad it wasn’t the case, but there was a small, small part of her that had been…a little happy with the prospect. Under the layers of crippling betrayal and fear and distress at it all, but still, it had been there, she did not wholly abhor the idea.

“I think he was fully prepared to walk around his office performing his regular duties with your child in his arm all day while you tended your duties with Ellie.”

“…somehow I feel my scare being merely a scare is more blessing for you then,” Marehis chuckled, “I would have had free caretaking—you would have had Cullen following you about with a baby, trying to convince you that you and he should endeavor to make them an adorable friend their age.”

Cassandra let out a derisive sound at that, shaking her head. “Are you prepared, Marehis? Potion has settled?”

Marehis nodded. And mention of potion brought up, “…you saw Ellie take another—”

“Yes,” Cassandra sighed. “We…we are running out of time to handle our missions at hand, I’m- I regret the pace we’ve had to set, and there is precious little end in sight until we’ve thwarted Corypheus’s plots for the Wardens. I’m…”

“Petrified,” Marehis offered her own word for it, decently certain it was the same for the Human woman.

“Exactly. I just pray…we’ve a few weeks before the Winter Palace, hopefully there will be sufficient time for recovery before she’s launched from one battlefield to another…” her nose wrinkled in disdain, “worse sort of battlefield.”

“You may be incapable of openly fighting anyone at the Winter Palace…but there is some hope for private violence. Too, you could always challenge anyone who annoys you to a formal duel.”

“…Marehis, if you’ve need of a false lover when we are before the Orlesian courts, I would be honored to stand in for Madam de Fer.”

Marehis laughed at that, oh. “That would work splendidly—between my race and your status as Nevarran noble-pariah I’m certain our pairing could insight a great many duels.”

Oh, Cassandra chuckled warmly at that, wrapping an arm around Marehis’s shoulders as they took leave of the tent.

…Marehis had not heard much of what was going on outside the tent, but Ellie was seated near the fire, directly in the lap of the Iron Bull to encapsulate herself in warmth, and before them was a rack made to hold…something. Ahh slender glass vials—test tubes Sera called them when she appeared. She and Cole came running back to camp from the field they’d battled in the other day, collecting samples—some of snow, others of dirt—into tubes they brought to Ellie so she could mark them with a paint pen with labels—S1 for ‘sample 1’ S2 and so on—and then scribbling down into her parchment pad notes of where each sample was pulled from. How close to a source of Red Lyrium each sample had been collected, Cole scraping snow from around the base of a Red Lyrium shard so Sera’s magic would not have to venture too near, while the Elf girl handled samples closer to their camp. Oh, it was so sweet, them working together, Sera including her sister in a way that gave her something substantial to do while not tasking her with running in this horrible weather just yet.

“Wanna see if the Red Lyrium does anything to the environment other than just absorb all the friggin heat, if it’s poisoning the ground or getting into the snow, we definitely don’t want to be using Red Lyrium tainted snow for our water supply,” Sera cautioned, sniffing with congestion as she passed the last of the samples to Ellie. “If Sahrnia’s got a snowball’s chance in hell of surviving,” oh she smiled, just adorable with her pleasure at Ellie gasping and giggling at her pun, the rumble of approval from the Iron Bull’s chest, it lessened the blow of, “the last thing they need is to try rebuilding and growin’ shit in dirt that’s gonna put Red Lyrium crap in their crops.”

“I think we’re all set—does it look okay Ser’?” Ellie wondered, worried as she showed the older girl the notes she took down.
“It looks great sweets!” Sera encouraged, “Let’s get this packed up and sent off to Widdle, she’ll be so excited!”

Unfortunately… well, Marehis was pleased Miss Dagna would be having a pleasant day, oh she adored Sera’s sweet girlfriends—but unfortunately for them, there was precious little excitement in the day ahead.

Ellie’s rune bracer was snug and secure on her hand, blessed thing… Marehis just wished it hadn’t begun rattling.

The Inquisitor grimaced at that, looking off in the direction she’d been leading them and then the other with a little sigh.

“There’s a Rift that way I think,” she informed them, “but um… scouts said it’s that way to the Red Templar’s claiming the Tower of Bone. We’ll be making camp there so… is everyone cool with Rifting first? Worst-case, we can always just return to the camp we’ve claimed and take on the Red Templars once we’ve recovered. I kind of… I’d hate to derail everyone’s bedtime schedule but um, we’re harder to see in the dark than they are, what with all the glowing and whatnot. I’ve been kicking around the idea of night-fights.”

“With who, Imekari? ‘cuz that’s a kick-ass idea and this is the first I’m hearing it,” the Iron Bull said.

The girl blushed at the praise-mixed reprimand, “With myself?” she supposed tentatively, “I dunno, if I said all my ideas I’d sound like a lunatic. I think a lot!”

“Always free to sound like a lunatic with me, boss-girl,” the Iron Bull assured, resting a hand atop her head as he came to walk alongside her—Marehis was almost miffed, the Qunari interjected himself between she and Ellie, but he was certainly capable of defending her, and too it was likely warmer for her to walk with him so close. Oh. Marehis didn’t realize she’d been holding herself tensely until she relaxed at his joining Ellie… that may well be why the man stepped up. They were surrounded by allies, it was not on her alone to keep the Inquisitor safe, she had to remind herself.

Marehis was entirely miffed when, after the cataclysmic sound of runestones cracking against each other as the Rift snapped closed… they did not cease their rattling. Which meant a second, unseen, Rift was somewhere nearby.

They came to a place where there was a great ominous door in the side of the cliff before them, and Bull’s hand went to Ellie’s back when Marehis heard her heart skip a beat as she startled a bit, “Imekari?”

“Magic found something,” she said, slipping from his hold to investigate a- oh there was a body!

“Da’vehnan!” Marehis reprimanded, she- she shouldn’t touch something that has been dead for who knew how long-

“Oh!” Ellie chirped, crouched before the body as she stopped and looked back at her mother momentarily, “Uhh… right! Sorry!” she looked back to the corpse, “Hi! I’m Ellie and I need in your pockets please and thank you!” before she reached into a pocket on a battered leather overcoat to remove a key.

“Eleanor?” Cassandra questioned with mirth, albeit confused.

The girl was smiley as she rejoined them with her found key, “Tia Josie says I gotta say hi and ask nice before putting my hands in people’s pockets—thanks for reminding me mami!”

She wasn’t certain if in moments of misunderstanding such as this she should be concerned the future of the world as they knew it rested on the shoulders of this girl, or if they were proof positive she was exactly the balance of methodical and tenderhearted leader they needed.

“Huh, papi—ven aqui, look,” Ellie instructed, bringing Solas to her side and holding the key up for his inspection.

“Oh,” he said in soft surprise, “it… it is a key shaped like a griffon. What an interesting find da’vehnan.”

“It’s so cute!”

"..."
It took a bit of umph to turn the 'cute' key in the ancient lock, so much so when she completed the task she offered up a grin and flexed her arms, and the Iron Bull was at hand to offer her an encouraging cheer of, “Hell yeah, Boss!” and a high-five as she pocketed the key in her overcoat.

He was also at hand to wrap an arm around the girl and pull her behind him when they were met with what was essentially...a cursed tomb of a place filled to the brim with blighted Darkspawn and undead...led by a Hurlock Alpha.

A Hurlock Alpha they’d been wholly unaware of until it made its presence known. Ellie and Sera had found themselves separated from the Mages by the great number of Darkspawn and undead—they’d been wise and stuck together as they made their way to the top of the stairs that led to a platform where there were twin sets of double doors, and it was from up there they resumed their flinging spells and arrows down on their enemies, Marehis and the Iron Bull—their other Warriors among them edging closer to the stairs to join them.

And then the Hurlock Alpha emerged from a corridor at the top of the stairs. From the door directly behind her girls.

“Girls, get back!” Marehis ordered when the girls screamed and narrowly dodged the swing of the Alpha’s axe, Sera reaching behind her to pull her sister along as Marehis rushed past, “Behind your father—now! Bull!”

Solas got the girls behind him and The Iron Bull was immediate to drop to his knees and basket his hands, gave Marehis a proper foothold to jump from with the Qunari pushing her along, propelling her higher and faster so she could get a vice-grip around the back of the Alpha’s head, her legs wrapping around his neck to ply pressure to his airways, arms around his helmet and using her weight to pull his head up and back so the thing couldn’t see to strike, pulling his posture open—it could not slouch so protectively around his vital organs, left its middle open for the Seeker, Rainier—two swords struck organs, sheathing their blades in the Alpha’s belly and up under his ribcage to puncture whatever vital organs they could while the Iron Bull lodged his axe directly into the Alpha’s spine.

It was mildly embarrassing, the surprised yelp that left her throat when the Hurlock plummeted forward, dead—Barrier, fierce and protective and urgent coated over her as she found herself going down with the beast, thankfully she’d the presence of mind to hit the ground arms first, relaxed her hold the instant before she made contact with the ground so she wouldn’t bash her head against the stone floors and instead roll forward safely onto her bottom.

The next assault on her person came in the form of two bodies colliding with hers in a hug, “Mami!” and “Mum!” were overlapping as her girls rushed to meet her, kneeling at her sides and hugging her fiercely as they offered…unified praise and reprimand. Ellie’s,

“You did such a good job!”

And Sera’s, “That was so cool!”

“But it was so dangerous!”

“Yeah—friggin’ barmy!”

Marehis found herself giggling oh, it had been...well an exciting bit of fun for all it had been dangerous, and her girls concern was as precious as it was needless, “I am fine, da’vehnans. Barrier was swift to soften my fall.”

“Sera! Gosh, wow mami fell so fast I didn’t even have time to think to cast.” Ellie gratefully commended her sister, eyes gleaming with so much pride and adoration for the older girl, who snorted, “Wasn’t me,” Sera said.

Ellie ‘hmm’ed a bit, curious as she began hugging Marehis more tightly, pressing her cheek directly against hers and then she let out a happy sound like she was being tickled before she announced, “It’s my papi’s magic! Hi! I love you too—gracias for protecting mami, mwah!” she pressed a kiss to- well, it was Marehis’s cheek, but she supposed it was for the bit of Barrier still shielding said cheek.

Solas, Vivienne and Dorian just behind him, joined them at the top of the stairs, blushing a bit, “I am pleased your mother was unharmed.”

Mostly, potion healed up the few bruises and scrapes she’d gotten, swallowing quickly because the Rune bracer was emitting the most violent rattling sound.

==

Behind one door, had been a Hurklock Alpha. Behind the second? Was their mystery Rift awaiting closure in a crumbled, half-ruined room that held a devastating drop they were by no means nearing. No no. Absolutely not.

Marehis had an appreciation, a love for Ellie’s magic—it was something that secured her daughter’s life so often, gave her companionship and guidance in her so often solitary youth. But she could strangle it for drawing her child’s attention to something across the broken portion of the room once the Rift was sealed closed.

She was inclined to slap Dorian when the man only encouraged her efforts and used magic to call up crumbled stone from below to make a haphazard path to cross, oh she could-

She- she nearly did, it was only a hand on her wrist that kept her from raising her hand to strike the man—Maker! It was one thing to be frustrated with the man but to raise her hand in actual violence against him was another, she just-

“…you okay Mare?” Sera asked quietly, coming to her as Solas’s hand slipped from her wrist and the man whispered against her ear that he would keep Ellie from harm before leaving her as Sera wrapped her arms around Marehis’s waist. She was fine she- “Hey mama, breathe with me for a minute, okay? Everything’s alright. Don’t gotta um…” they were surrounded by friends, but on the field of battle—in the field! This was not- she was beyond embarrassed-

Her heart was thundering in her chest, throat tight, something that had been building up in her in the moment before her hand nearly raised so she could cross the distance between herself and- and Dorian! She adored him! She would never—never—raise a hand to someone unprompted in anger like that, she’d felt an urgency to do something, and she’d felt so overwhelmingly outraged.

She was…apparently…having a panic attack.

“Don’t gotta be loud—just think. Five,” Sera whispered softly. Oh…five things she sees? Thinking them, that was doable, felt less obvious she was having such a moment.

She could see Vivienne and Cassandra…and Ellie. All three of them standing at the edge of the makeshift bridge—item number four—Dorian had made, her child safe with Cassandra’s arm around her shoulders as they watched what Marehis used as a fifth momentary truth to ground herself back into the present as it was—Solas making careful progress across the bridging to where Ellie’s magic instructed in the girl’s stead.

“Four.”

Touch. Her hair, some had fallen out of the bun she’d pulled it into that morning, it was against her cheek. Her armor was secure around her. Rice bags still emitting warmth. Her wrist was still warm from where Solas had held it- she supposed that did not count, or maybe it was that she didn’t want it to. Number four was Sera. She could feel her sweet girl hugging her, the reassuring beat of her heart against Marehis’s that helped her own heart catch its rhythm again.

“Three.”

Sera’s voice. Ellie’s calling out for her ‘papi’ to be careful! Solas’s voice calling back to his da’len that he was fine, warm encouragement that her magic had made such an excellent find, oh he was sweet with her.

“Two.”

She smelled atmosphere, the sort of scent that sealed Rifts left behind. She smelled Sera, the salt from her sweat, a rust from drying blood on her armor, and underneath it all she still managed to somehow smell like mustard even as she hadn’t had a bite of anything with that stuff on it since yesterday.

“One.”
Marehis took a deep breath, and then pressed a kiss to her child’s cheek, the faintest mix of dirt and sweat on her lips when she was through. “Thank you, da’vehnan.”

Ellie was speaking sweetly with Thom, asking if he would mind his men coming to collect the Grey Warden artifacts they’d found in this place before she came to join Marehis and Sera. “Mami? You okay?” she worried.

“I’m just fine sweet girl. Did you find what you were looking for?” Marehis checked, brushing hair out of her face, oh, “Da’vehnan, you feel warm.”

She nodded, sniffling. “I’m okay and um...if everyone else is still up for it, I’d sleep a lot better getting the Red Templars off the high ground so close to our camp.”

“You sure Ink?” Sera asked tentatively, and when she nodded the older girl wrapped an arm around her shoulders. “Okay. Just stay close to me, alright sweets?”

Ellie did stay close to her sister, thankfully. The Red Templars were very determined to keep their hold on the Tower of Bone, the high and low of it too—the Iron Bull, Thom, Cassandra, Marehis and Cole rushed down the circular ramping to face the Templars in the lower portion of their camp, their Mages and archer kept to the level high-point of the ramping to cast Barrier and assault on their enemies from on high.

And the second the last of their Red Templar foes were felled, Marehis looked up to her girls and saw the moment Ellie fell—directly into the hold of her sister who pulled her close and seated herself down quickly, safely away from the frightening edge of the ramp. Cole vanished and reappeared at the girls’ side offering She is alright, she is safe, she just needs rest. Sleep and potion and love, you are good at getting her all three, to Marehis’s mind as she and their warriors rushed to meet with the rest of their group.

“You did so well, da’assan,” she could hear Solas praising Sera warmly as they drew near, “so well. Sweet girl, if you let go of your sister, I can take her to secure ground, alright?”

“Y-y-you’ll be careful right?” Sera worried.

“Absolutely.”

Oh. Oh, Sera was staring at the edge of the ramp with horror struck eyes. She’d been a mess, blamed herself endlessly when Ellie had fallen in the Oasis, from scaffolding she’d been fighting alongside Sera on before plummeting into a Rift-filled mine, and it was rather the perilous drop—Ellie would have hit a lower level of ramping, perhaps broken something but it wouldn’t have been the devastation Sera was reeling with the fear of her reliving. Marehis knelt at Solas’s side, “Da’vehnan? Look at me sweet girl,” she smiled reassuringly, pressing a kiss to the girl’s cheek, and she sucked in a deep breath and met Marehis’s gaze. “oh, there’s my girl’s beautiful eyes. Solas is correct, you did perfectly. Will you walk with me? Hold my hand?”

Sera nodded, oh she was just shaking, the hand in Marehis’s trembling, but she relaxed when Marehis put an arm around her shoulders and they made their way off of the ramp and back onto steady, sturdy ground of the plateau the Tower of Bone rose upon. “M’okay, m’okay, shite, sorry.”

“Do not be sorry,” Cassandra intoned, “Come, sit sweetheart, you should rest.”

Solas had seated himself in the center of the area they’d be making camp in, thanking Rainier as he took claim to the campfire the Red Templars had been kind enough leave them, Thom building it back up. Ellie was resting against the Elf man’s chest, eyes clenched shut, still catching her breath through her mouth in painful rasping gasps.

“It is alright da’vehnan,” Solas said as if in encouragement to Ellie, “relax, rest—you will be fine,” he promised and Marehis was beyond grateful Cassandra was at hand, she supported Sera, her hand on Marehis’s forearm the only thing keeping the Elf woman upright when a wave of dizziness swept through her. It- it was more like exhaustion and Solas was apologetic as Marehis knelt at Solas’s side, “Da’vehnan? Look at me sweet girl,” she smiled reassuringly, pressing a kiss to the girl’s cheek, and she sucked in a deep breath and met Marehis’s gaze. “oh, there’s my girl’s beautiful eyes. Solas is correct, you did perfectly. Will you walk with me? Hold my hand?”

Sera nodded, oh she was just shaking, the hand in Marehis’s trembling, but she relaxed when Marehis put an arm around her shoulders and they made their way off of the ramp and back onto steady, sturdy ground of the plateau the Tower of Bone rose upon. “M’okay, m’okay, shite, sorry.”

“Do not be sorry,” Cassandra intoned, “Come, sit sweetheart, you should rest.”

Solas had seated himself in the center of the area they’d be making camp in, thanking Rainier as he took claim to the campfire the Red Templars had been kind enough leave them, Thom building it back up. Ellie was resting against the Elf man’s chest, eyes clenched shut, still catching her breath through her mouth in painful rasping gasps.

“It is alright da’vehnan,” Solas said as if in encouragement to Ellie, “relax, rest—you will be fine,” he promised and Marehis was beyond grateful Cassandra was at hand, she supported Sera, her hand on Marehis’s forearm the only thing keeping the Elf woman upright when a wave of dizziness swept through her. It- it was more like exhaustion and Solas was apologetic as Marehis and Sera sat with Cassandra’s help, by the fire, the strange feeling passed and he explained, “I meant to only encourage Ellie to sleep, I apologize,” and then after a moment more, brushing the girl’s hair back out of her face, rocking a bit before he looked up to the Qunari among them. “The Iron Bull. If you would do me the favor of sitting with her, keep her warm?” Oh, yes, she would be admitted warmer in his hold.

“You got it,” the Qunari readily agreed, seating himself beside the fire and taking Ellie in his arms while Solas rose, quietly announcing he would see to potion. “Shh, I got you Imekari, just the good old Iron Bull. Sera, babe, you want in on this?”

Sera nodded, crawling to lay face down alongside her sister. “Friggin’ colds is stupid!”

Cole let out something like a low whine. “Fever makes their bodies ache, they are so tired!
Sera has a headache!” Oh da’assan! Marehis fumbled in her own stores for potion but their last scrape left her stores depleted, and Sera’s weren’t any better- ah. Well then. She supposed that was why Solas was emptying his pack of raw ingredients and crouching by the fire, endeavoring to prepare fresh. Good. “Where is your manfriend, Thom? He has to make them better!” Cole insisted.

“Uhh…” Thom looked to Marehis and Cassandra, “I can call him—he’d come. Only haven’t done it ‘cause of Ellie-girl’s orders for him to stay with Sahnia’s people until a replacement healer arrives.”

“Yeah well, I say we mutiny,” the Iron Bull spoke, concerned. “Imekari’s starting to feel warm to me and uh…that probably isn’t great.”

“I’m certain a compromise could be met,” Cassandra reasoned, “Send Cole for word on if there is pressing need for him with the refugees, if there is no emergency, instruct him to come to us. Our Inquisitor would not begrudge her sister receiving healing—and Cyril may as well examine her while he is here, should he not?”

Thom nodded, “Alright, go on boy.”

Cole breathed a sigh of relief, “Thank you. I know you are mad at him right now. He did not mean to hurt you, but you know that,” he said as he vanished from sight.

Oh dear, “…Cyril has caused you some offense?” Marehis questioned the Mercenary gently.
The man sighed. “Complicated,” he said, running a hand over his face, “I uh…Lady Josephine asked me about my mother recently for um…well something just barmy, didn’t sound like something she could go to my mother for—I couldn’t offer any advice on the matter because I didn’t think it was actually my mother she was talking about. I figured the last person in the world who could help Lady Montilyet secure official documents from the Free Marchs government would be a sticky-fingered drug addict from downtown Markham. I spent most of my childhood bailing her out of jail. She kicked me out not long after Liddy passed, and I haven’t exactly looked back since. Apparently…she’s really turned things around. Cyril used to go home to see his family before uh, prison. He’s even visited with mom, known she sobered up and—” he blew out a frustrated sigh. “He’d badger me to visit but I always refused, I could be a right asshole about it—ever really let him get a word in edgewise. It’s not exactly his fault he didn’t tell me if I made it so he couldn’t.”

“You wish you had gone home when your mother wrote you after your last tour with the Orlesian military. It makes you sad you’ve had second chances offered to you when you couldn’t be bothered to do the same to your mother. You wonder if things would be different, if the Callier Massacre would never have come to be,” Cole said as he reappeared at the Human Charger’s side.

“Thom, with our without you, Gaspard made his decision, you were not a deciding factor—Mercenaries are found anywhere. But you wish you’d given your mother a chance, and still some part of you feels it can’t be true, that there must be some other Margret doing all of the wonderful things you hear your mother’s name doing, that your mother could never change. But she has, she is in Cyril’s memories, the last time he visited his parents before Gaspard ordered Callier’s death.
He checked in on your mother—how is Thom? Did he get my letter? Thank you for trying, thank you for loving my son. You are right, she is not the mother that let you raise yourself, put her next high above your next meal. She is beautiful and kind and healthy. She’s better now. So are you.”

The Human man reached out and pat Cole on the shoulder. “Thanks lovey.”

Cyril arrived shortly after their reinforcements came to begin setting up their camp, and Thom greeted him quickly but um…albeit more passionately than the shy Mercenary usually did. It may be because there were no young eyes save for Cole’s upon them, or as penance for his upset, but Thom greeted the man with a very thorough kiss and an apology for being cross with him.

“Yeah, well, you’re a real asshole Thom Rainier,” Cyril drawled the sarcastic exaggeration of his usually tenderhearted lover, “but I suppose that’s part of your charm.” And then, “Now, where’re are my patients?”

He barely had a question out with Sera before she was waving him off and insisting he ‘freaking help Inky already’. Cole must have passed along her symptoms because Cyril responded by handing off potion for her congestion, something to help with her headache and fever and instructed her to rest as he looked Ellie over.

“Her fever’s high. Chief, I know you mean well but I’ma need you to keep your distance from her for a bit, the way she’s going you run the risk of overheating her. She needs to cool down but being out in this, shivering is only going to make her internal temp rise—we need her out of armor and in bed as soon as possible.”

Oh. Sera did not care for that at all, she was certain Ellie would be miserable if healing required the lack of blankets and being able to be held. They got their tent situated, and Ellie was laid in a cot as soon as possible in her sleep clothes, sans socks, no blankets, Cyril insisted nothing more than a sheet could be permitted, and the one they did provide the girl was sweated through quick enough they thought it might best best she go without, oh Maker. It was misery to- she was afraid to even hold the girl’s hand, even Cassandra was tentative, chilled a cloth in the snow to rest against Ellie's forehead before daring to press her own against her child's to whisper a fervent prayer for the Maker's hand to bring healing to this girl. A chilled cloth that swiftly lost its heat against the poor girl's burning forehead.

It was Sera's hands that provided a bit of much needed assistance.

She had been seated on a cot opposite the tent from her sister, watching and waiting and worrying, lost in thought. Solas was seated on the ground at the foot of Ellie’s’ bed, eyes closed as he voiced an encouragement-laced, "Da'assan," and a nod.

“Oh, frig. Really?” Sera checked, as if he’d approved of something she’d been considering and wasn’t sure of, but with his ‘go-ahead’ she hopped down off the cot to scramble to Ellie’s, scooting a nearby cot closer so she could sit with her legs criss crossed before her on its end, seated directly behind Ellie's head, and then she splayed her hands at her sister's temples and called icy chill into her hands.

“Oh, brilliant, Ser’,” Cyril commended, "if you can keep that up—take breaks, for your sake and hers, it’s best not to apply direct cold for too long, but if you cycle through and stay consistent, that will surely help."

Sera nodded. “Hey Cole, she…she’s okay in the Fade, right?”

The Spirit nodded as he said, “Fever makes her bleary, everything seems a little hazy and confusing but she knows she is safe. Solas is with her, keeping guard from demons.”

Oh, she felt wholly useless. Sera’d the ability to help with her magic, Solas the ability to guard her in the Fade—

…there was more to life than magic. She’d the ability to do a great many things. She had been speaking unkindly to herself, Sera was correct and…and it helped, yes, her advice that if she found herself having thoughts—words that no one who loved her would say to her—they may well be incorrect. She wasn’t useless. She could help—fever sweats were incredibly dehydrating, Cyril himself warned of that. She could not hold her child’s hand or cuddle with her to comfort, but she could offer cooling relief—sit at her side and put careful drops of water past her lips, and there was so much snow at hand, it wasn’t difficult to dash out and get washcloths freshly chilled and come back to wrap them around Ellie’s wrists—applying cool to ones forehead and wrists, it helped bring fever down, at least in her experience with it, her mother always did as much for her when she was ill.

“Comin’ down good, she’s responding to potion well.” Cyril said as he checked her temperature once more before brushing her hair back out of her face, seeking to gently wake her, Ellie’s eyes drifting open to blink up at him.

“Mmm, hola tio,” her voice cracked softly from her throat.
“Hey honey, how you feelin’? Hanging in there?” he checked, and when she nodded, “your fever’s coming down nicely and you’ve started responding to potion.”

“Sera’s okay?”

“Yeah sweets,” Sera assured for herself. “This okay? Sorry it’s cold.”

Ellie let out a happy little hum, “Feels great sissy, you’re the best…”

Oh, the encouragement only left the poor girl tearing up as the Human girl was too weak to remain conscious much longer, drifted back to sleep so immediately. Marehis claimed a seat on the cot Sera sat on, wrapping her arms around the girl’s waist and pressing a kiss to the back of her precious ear! “You are doing so well da’vehnan—she will be fine.”

“Don’t worry about it honey,” Cyril offered kindly, checking once more, “you’re still feeling better?”

“You’re all doing a good job. I feel confident Ellie-girl’s on the rebound—some good rest, keep her hydrated, and she’ll be just fine,” Cyril promised. “I should be heading back to Sahnia, but listen—her fever goes up again, dose her with potion and start doing everything you can to bring it down and send for me at once. If I don’t hear from you, I’ll swing by and check on her tonight.”

“You uh…you could spend the night if you wanted to. Keep an eye on her,” Thom shyly invited.

Cyril smiled warmly, “Depends on if I can leave Sahnia to its own devices for that long but I might just take you up on that.”

“Alright. Be safe love.”

“Always am.” Oh Maker, they were adorable.

Cole looked conflicted but he offered, “I will make sure he makes it safely back. I- I will be right back,” he promised them, drawing nearer to the cot to timidly offer up a kiss to Ellie’s forehead while Sera took a bit of a break from plying cool, sighing in disappointment, “forehead kisses always make people feel better. Oh!” he chirped, looking to Marehis and Sera, and then his gaze went around the different members of Ellie’s party gathered in the tent who sat by watching the…well, the admittedly precious exchange, “It made all of you feel better! Oh, I am glad,” he said before vanishing from sight.

“…friggin’ love Cole,” Sera sniffled.

“Are you alright, da’vehnan?” Solas voiced. Oh, he’d woken when Ellie had Marehis supposed. “It is sweet of you to do this for your sister but her fever is no longer dangerous and another can assist her in this way. You should not wear yourself out, da’len—you are not well.”

“You do look rather peaked, sweet girl,” Marehis fretted.

“You should rest, you could join your sister in the Fade if you wished, she is feeling better. You could make play or I could show you anything you care to see,” Solas enticed.

“Think you could teach Ink and me another one of them weirdy songs?” Sera wondered. The man favored her a warm smile as he nodded, “Certainly, da’len.”

“Is Solas’s singing so very entertaining?” Marehis wondered quietly.

Sera shrugged, “Mostly just teaches us the words and plays his little fluty thing,” she blushed a bit, “Songs are pretty, and s’fun to sing with Inky.”

Oh. Oh that was sweet. Cole had mentioned it before*, Sera’s lack of pleasure in singing even as she did have…oh she had such a beautiful singing voice. Marehis had found it in herself to tentatively question Sera’s dislike of an act she was so talented in. She’d outright denied any such great ability to sing, insisted she was shite at it, then shrugged, sniffing a bit as she groused, Lady used to make me sing at Chantry all the time, ‘cause she got so many compliments on it—how pretty the little knife-ear she tamed could sound, wasn’t it a friggin’ glorious testament to the Maker blah blah blah blah. Get her ego stroked to death, and then all I’d hear is how I messed up, was off key or looked weird or whatever she could think of to make me feel like dirt for it all later. It was sweet to hear she found some enjoyment in it now.
“Oi Viv, you feel like um, taking over for me?” Sera wondered to the Grand Enchanter who was perched primly at the end of a cot, reading from a small, silvery tome she briskly closed as she gave Sera her attention, “Certainly darling. I will keep watch over Eleanor—do get some rest.”

The poor girl looked rather done in, exhausted both physically and magically though Marehis wondered if perhaps that would benefit her—she would be restful for the next several hours and wake renewed. She did seem to be improving, only the faintest bit of congestion still sounded in her breathing and she seemed mostly exhausted from the work they’d done that day rather than from the energy-theft of illness. Marehis assisted her in cleaning up, getting into her sleep clothes, brushing her hair—it did not take much to detangle such thin, fine hair but Sera never shied away from indulging Marehis in brushing it a bit more thoroughly than necessary, the brush was gentle enough it was albeit relaxing to have it scrape gently across ones scalp, “Put all worry from your mind, da’vehnan,” Marehis gently intoned, “We are safe here in camp, we’ve secured this area rather thoroughly, we will be watching out for you and Ellie. Rest, and enjoy yourself in the Fade,” she wished her, sweeping hair back behind the girl’s ears, pecking a kiss to one that fluttered just adorably as Sera blushed and relaxed further against her mother, “have the sweetest dreams.”

“Thanks mum—you get some rest too, yeah?” Sera returned as she twisted about to press a kiss to the edge of Marehis’s ear, oh her sweet da’len!

Sera laid down as closely to her sister as she dared, afraid to risk the delicate balance they’d struck to get her fever down to a safe level of ‘feverish’. She did take hold of Ellie’s hand before she relaxed in her cot and drifted off to sleep.

“I believe I’ll join them,” Cassandra voiced tiredly. Oh yes, Marehis was still amazed the woman had rebound from her injury so swiftly, she’d fought so well today, “you should as well, Marehis, if you’d like.”

Something in her mind felt panicked at the thought, like the fear that if she went to sleep she would wake to something horrible having happened because she was not awake to do something…but this was something in Ellie she’d only just reprimanded the girl for. Well, not reprimanded—it was hardly the girl’s fault, but it was something that needed correction, something she needed help to overcome, feeling that she alone would be to blame if something befell those she cared for, that she needed to push herself beyond her very limits to ensure their safety when…well, she’d help around her, others she could rely on when she was worried Cassandra may suffer complication—she’d Cole monitoring her, the boy would have woken Ellie immediately if something had been amiss. Too if something had happened? It would not be for lack on her part. It was anxiety, not necessity that kept her wired and wary all night. She was to tell her loved ones what she was fearful of and seek assistance she would rely on.

“I am tired,” Marehis confessed. “If…if there is any change in the girls I would ask someone wake me.”

Thom, Vivienne, and Dorian spoke in unison offering up their own, “Of course,” overlapping Bull’s, “You’ve got it.”

Solas was back to guarding and guiding Ellie and Sera in the Fade, but there was something…she felt it when she laid down alongside Sera and Cassandra, once she was comfortable, there was a feeling she was becoming familiar with, something that said she was experiencing something from the bond. It was…warm and comforting, it relaxed her as she fell asleep, the last bit of waking sensation before she drifted off was…almost startling but it sent her right to sleep—she could hear her girls, their voices in the Fade a sweet harmonious tune that was just…oh.

She hated how much love she felt for the fact that she was allowed by Solas to experience such a thing, given such a beautiful reassurance that her girls were safe and enjoying themselves together as they slept under guard of those she trusted to do so.

Marehis was woken in the night by someone reporting that something indeed was amiss with her girls.
“Mami?” Ellie’s voice was directly in Marehis’s ear...oh! Oh goodness—Marehis had rolled over, from the edge of the cot she’d been sharing with Cassandra and Sera, onto the cot Ellie laid on, laying herself directly atop the Human girl! Oh, had she made the girl uncomfortably warm or hurt her? “Mami my body is so hungry and you’re laying on it—I love it but I need up.”

It took a moment for her mind to catch up, “Oh! No, sweet girl stay put,” Marehis insisted. Oh, ugh, she felt almost ill as she sat up, cramps were horrible things. But, if she got out of bed, she could get potion—and then food, yes, she could see to it. “How are you feeling, da’vehnan?”

“A lot better,” oh, she even sounded it, her breathing was clear and her color returned, the rosiness to her cheeks nothing threatening. “Are you hungry mami? Ser’?”

“Ruddy starvin’,” Sera announced, yawning as she sat up and stretched.

“Am I dreaming or is there talk of food?” Dorian’s voice wondered from his cot.

It seemed everyone had fallen asleep—well, those of them that could, Cole was awake, he almost startled Marehis as the boy was perched on the foot of the cot like he’d been keeping literal guard of them as they slept. None of them had eaten since breakfast and it had gone eight according to the cracked face of Ellie’s wristwatch. Marehis announced her intent to get dinner underway and everyone set about checking on one another, seeing if they were tired still or hungry.

It was Marehis who checked on Solas, but that was purely on accident—she nearly stepped on the man as she made to exit the tent! He was still seated on the ground, hunched forward, snoring softly. Oh. he….well he sounded congested now, it was chilly to be seated on the cold ground without so much as a blanket to retain warmth and goodness, he’d fallen asleep like that, keeping careful watch over Ellie and Sera in the Fade. They were awake now and he- that couldn’t be comfortable and- oh she hated it but, “Solas?” she questioned softly, tentatively placing a hand on his shoulder.

He startled a bit under her hand, and he....he seemed like he’d wakened and was merely considering whether or not to open his eyes like perhaps he could prolong her contact with him by feigning sleep—she felt annoyed at herself at the fact she wasn’t immediately annoyed with him, had somehow found it endearing. He opened his eyes and offered up something of a sympathetic smile,

“I…apologize, I’m awake. Did you have need of me, Marehis? There is still potion isn’t there?” he wondered. Oh. did he think she was waking him to demand he make her potion for her cramping?

Fool man, “I’ve already taken some,” she assured, “The girls are awake and need dinner, I was just about to see to it. Are you hungry? If you’re tired still you should seek a cot.”

“Ah, I should have woken with them, they did not say they were hungry but...well. Ma’da’vehnan have quite the appetite, it may be wiser to always assume that was what was waking them,” he supposed, amused. “I could assist with dinner if that suits.”

Well, she wasn’t inclined to stop him so she nodded as she stepped away and began heading from the tent though she winced when she heard the rather painful sounding series of pops from Solas’s spine as the poor man rose from his seated sleep. She heard the muffled sound of his voice speaking warmly as he checked on the girls now that they were awake before he followed her out of the tent, Cole following after him, though the Spirit went digging in the potions supplies before heading back toward the tent, Marehis’s questioning gaze at his back had the Spirit cheerfully announcing,

“I am helping!”

Well, he certainly sounded happy so she was happy for him, certain he was being of great use with whatever task he’d taken up.

Apparently her girls had a potions project in mind—Cole brought them what they needed and by the time they warmed stew and bread, they’d concluded their experiment in brewing in the tent. Solas hefting the pot while Marehis carried the stack of bowls, utensils safe in the top most bowl while she took up the platter of bread loaves in the other hand and Cole was sweet enough to open the tent for them so they could enter with ease, begin doling out portions to their party members seated and waiting on their cots Ellie and Sera smiled at them as they entered and then, “Gracias for making dinner, gosh it smells so good!” Ellie complimented before ordering, “Papi, ven aqui—potion time, mister!”

That got a confused look from the man as he set down the pot of stew on the ground and went to Ellie who stood up on the cot, the weave sinking under her feet, making her squeak as she nearly toppled over but she caught herself on his shoulders, pressing a kiss to his cheek as she handed him what looked like potion for colds, and then she held her hand out to Sera who handed her...oh, the woolen hat Ellie’d knitted the man months ago, he still had it? The girls had gotten it out of his pack and now Ellie whisked it onto his head, intoning, “You got to keep yourself warm,” she pouted a bit, “I didn’t realize you weren’t someplace comfy when we were sleeping.”

“I was someplace entirely pleasant while you were sleeping da’vehn,” he assured her, “I’m fine, da’len, I’m certain this will clear my bit of stuffiness right up.”

“No getting sick—no one in this Inquisition is allowed to get sick or hurt bad anymore,” Ellie informed them all, “that’s a rule!” she said, dropping down onto her bottom, the cot bouncing with the motion as she rejoined her sister and declared, “Your Inquisitor has spoken!”

Their Inquisitor was through speaking for the time being as she devoured several bowls of stew she wiped clean with slices of bread though she did eventually get around to voicing some curiosity, “Tio Thom, whose Maggie?” she wondered. Maggie? “Cole said I should ask about her?” Thom blushed a bit, embarrassed as he cleared his throat, “My uh…mother.”

Margret- oh! Oh! long for Maggie! Maggie

Oh, that got an excited gasp from the girl as she was struck with the realization, “Thom! You have a mami?!” though that overlapped Marehis’s rather excited, “Maggie Rainier is your mother?!” oh she wasn’t certain why she hadn’t- oh she hadn’t thought about the woman in a few years but she’d thought Thom had a striking resemblance to someone but it had been years since she last saw Maggie—she’d not laid eyes on the woman since before Kirkwall’s Circle fell and the Mage Rebellion kicked into full gear, and Leliana recruited Marehis in full.

“...yeah,” Thom offered up almost tentatively, like he was afraid he was about to hear something unpleasant but,

“Oh my word I- I didn’t realize—oh I never realized she’d such a hard time of it coming up,” Marehis breathed, “Maggie Rainier is the sweetest, most incredible woman I’ve ever met,”

Marehis assured him, “she goes to my family’s restaurant, I used to wait on her all of the time,” oh, the woman...well sometimes she ate with friends or her clients, but she usually came in alone. Marehis had always wondered at that, “she helped my mama refinance our business, helped us get out of debt and properly own restaurant it- it is difficult to do so outside of the Alienage but Maggie was unrelenting, and- oh brilliant, the mind on that woman is incredible. I can’t believe I didn’t make the connection—you’re her Thom! We have a copy of the article Markham’s newspaper put out on your victory at Tourney hanging behind the counter, she was ecstatic, so very proud of you. She...” Marehis thought on it. She realized then, why she missed the connection.

The Maggie Rainier she knew...well five, nearly six years ago, Marehis had gotten the impression something terrible happened to Maggie’s son—had come to assume he was gone for good, either disappeared or dead. She’d gone from almost always having something to bring up about him—how he was doing in the Orlesian Military, how proud she was of all he’d done—to seeming in mourning. The general assumption had been that Maggie Rainier’s son died in Orlais war—there were few in Markham who kept up with Orlesian politics, she’d never heard of the Callier Massacre until it came to light its perpetrator had been working with the Inquisition under the guise of ‘Warden Blackwall’. Oh how awful, Marehis knew now the sort of trouble he’d gotten into, Maggie would ache to help her son—Cyril had been keeping her updated apparently, and he certainly couldn’t do that if he was in prison and Thom was on the lam, that must have been horrible to loose all connection to him. “She loves you, very much. I’m sure she would have been able to help you, if you’d gone to her.”

“Really?” Thom wondered. “Cyril said she put herself through school and got a few degrees.”

“Like I said, a brilliant mind for it—she was regretful you didn’t know you could go to her.”

Ellie was looking back and forth between them trying to absorb everything, and then, “Oh! That Judge—Margret Rainier—Cremisius said she helped him get identification! Oh gosh that’s so sweet, I didn’t realize…” she blushed, “um, sometimes I forget last names are a thing people share and it means they’re family. I thought it was cool she had the same last name as you,” she giggled at having missed the full connection. “I’m sorry though um…does her being a judge make things awkward for you?”

“It may well do so,” Thom supposed, “I um…I don’t know. She wasn’t exactly sparkling when I was coming up, made a lot of bad choices where…if she’d made good ones, even just decent ones,” he shrugged, “Liddy’d lived to see her ninth birthday at the very least. But she’s…she has a life where she uh…she’s apparently turned things around for herself I guess.”

“Do you wanna find out?” Ellie wondered, “Tio! We can write your mami a letter- oh! I can write her! And explain to her how good you’re doing! How you’re helping the Inquisition and keeping me safe and being my favorite tio!”

“I do beg your pardon?” Dorian interrupted, appalled.

“Thom does my hair and makes me snacks—I’m only Human!” the girl lamented, “I love you just as much and you’re my favorite for shopping and school stuff and you always smell very nice, and you’ve got the nicest mustache! Thom doesn’t even have a mustache anymore!”

“I do not usually settle for being tied,” Dorian said, shooting the Iron Bull a rather fearsome glare when the Qunari rumbled a quiet laugh at that. Oh goodness. “But I suppose I can make the exception for you.”

“So you just go around saying that to everyone I guess,” Bull snorted.

“Oh do behave!” Dorian reprimanded.

“Yeah!” Ellie agreed reproach was necessary, “And be careful with my Tio’s circulation! You two use a safeword, right?” Who taught her such things?! “Good!” she said when the Qunari nodded and then she returned her attention to Thom, “Anyway, if you want to reach out but you’re afraid to, I can write your mami and see if she’d write you? I don’t think I’m biological war-farey anymore, I feel like, so much better! I think I fevered it out.”

“Y- you don’t have to put yourself to any trouble Ellie-girl-” Thom objected.

“It’s no trouble—I mean if you don’t want me to, I won’t but of course I want to help you Tio. I dunno, I know I’m young and having mami’s is a little new for me but now that I have them? I mean I’m always going to want them in my life. I think everyone needs their mami’s, age doesn’t matter, as long as they’re good mami’s. If you want to see if yours is, if you would like her in your life? I want you to have that! Everyone should have a mami!” she took rather the deep breath to loudly declare, “Anyone who needs a mami—I’m your mami now!”

The Iron Bull huffed a laugh, “Qunari’s don’t have-“

“You do now! All of you! Have Josie send a formal decree to Par Vollen!”

“Nah, those assholes don’t deserve you as their mami, Imekari,” Bull said, “You got your hands full with me.”

No. Those assholes didn’t deserve this girl’s consideration. That vile Gatt—he provided the leak ofSaarebas tranquilizer into Freemen hands. Or he was part of the leak. The Iron Bull…oh, blessed man he’d…chosen to be creative when describing the Herald of Andraste. Bull had personal sources that told him the Herald was a Mage, but he kept that detail scarce in his early reports to Par Vollen—he’d figured the Qun would demand he infiltrate the Inquisition, and he knew well that they would have less reticence in those orders and fewer demands on how he was to handle things if they didn’t know about the Herald’s Apostacy. Gatt had been the first member of Ben-Hessrath he’d allowed to realize Ellie’s Mage status. Unfortunately he was not the last. Gatt had taken that information directly to a fellow Viddethari agent—an Arvaarad responsible for the guarding Saarebas—and from there…well. When news traveled that the Freemens of the Dales wished to capture the Inquisitor, that wish was made known to that Arvaarad, and she supplied them with something that would keep Ellie’s magic from defending her, would render her unconscious—would have killed her if they’d just hit her with a full dose of the stuff! She was 1/4th the size of a Qunari Mage, if-

Needless to say, the Iron Bull was blasphemously praying to any deity who cared to hear, that he would in fact see his dear friend Gatt again someday to properly thank him for his hand in Ellie’s harm. Marehis prayed she was with him.

“Mami?”

Marehis startled a bit, looking to the girl staring up at her with concerned curiosity, “Yes? Are you still hungry da’vehnan?”

Ellie shook her head, “No—thanks for making dinner, gosh, its so late um…is everyone okay? What happened? I kind of…I remember fighting and then Sera was hugging me and then I kind of remember the Iron Bull but everything was kind of brain foggy after that.”

They filled her in—camp was secure, they’d set up and sent for Cyril, who returned to Sahmnia. They’d all been keeping to the tent, resting and waiting. Ellie listened, worrying at her lip a bit,

“The Iron Bull. I’m thinking again…you wanna kick it around with me?” Ellie wondered. “Hit me babe—what we thinking?” the Qunari immediately encouraged.

“Papi and me, we looked around Sahmnia quarry ‘cause scouting and Cole says he can hear lots of hurt coming from there—they’ve got villagers from Sahrina captive all throughout the quarry, locked in cages. It’s…there’s a lot of Red Templars, the Iron Bull—a lot. A behemoth too. Getting the villagers out safe is my priority. So I’m seriously considering…if everyone feels up to it, and doesn’t think this sounds totally bat crap crazy—we’re rested, we’ve eaten, I mean any sleep we’d be getting tonight would have to be potion induced as it stands so…wanna go kick some Red Templar butt?” she wondered. “The way I’m thinking—we’re a lot harder to see in the dark than they are given that they glow and we don’t,” she looked to her Marked hand and shrugged, “…mostly. Same goes for their captives—if they can stay quiet and just run for it?”

“Cover of night will make it harder for their captors to realize they’re escaping and go after them,” the Iron Bull agreed.

Ellie nodded. “I was thinking we could split into groups,” she said, “each one handling a different thing—our warriors would go in with a few of our mages and face the Templars head-on, draw their fire and attention. They’re focused on the attack while Cole and I go around hitting their cages and getting people out, keeping them calm, telling them how to get to our camp here.”

“You’ve got a lot of good thinking here boss, but uh, night also makes it harder, more confusing—captivity can really fuck with your head, not sure how well they’ll be able to navigate their way out and to safety, especially in the dark.”

“Oh!” Sera chirped, “Ink!” and then…then she just held up her hands, splayed them before herself as she patted the air.

Ellie let out an excited gasp, “Genius, chica!” she enthused. What was genius? She loved that her girls had such a way with each other but sometimes their two-worded sentences left a bit too much to the imagination.

“Oh, that is an excellent suggestion, Sera,” Solas encouraged—how did he know what they were speaking of?!

“We have glow stuff from the Emerald Graves!” Ellie explained, “We can mark a path on trees and rocks and things with glowing marks that can be seen in the dark—they can follow it back to camp and we’ll clean it up as we return, I mean worst case scenario it’s something that won’t be visible come morning so we have time. We can give them little lanterns so they can see as they’re making their way out of the quarry—it doesn’t make a lot of light, so they won’t be drawing attention to themselves.”

“The quarry is very confusing itself, da’vehnan,” Solas said, offering, “I’m…rather certain of the path through, I could mark as much for ourselves and the captives to use to find their way out.”

Ellie nodded. “Kay so…three groups? Warriors and mages drawing fire, me, Cole and another mage or someone to help in a fight to protect the villagers, help us get them out, and then you and... well I don’t want anyone doing anything entirely by themselves so take someone with you, kay?”

Someone, between the Warriors and Mages with their specific jobs, left either Marehis or Sera joining...either Cole and Ellie in rescuing the villagers, or Solas in lighting their path.

Sera immediately volunteered to go along with Solas...but Marehis needed no magical bond with her child to know she wanted to stay with Ellie. If anything strange happened in the bond, if they got separated by the vast distance the winding paths of Sahrnia quarry could make and lost track of one another in the bond? Oh, it would be beyond detrimental for Sera or Ellie to panic. It had been albeit startling when they left the range of the bond when they went their separate ways to the Emerald Graves and Val Royeaux—Ellie had startled, it was only the Iron Bull’s hold on her in the saddle that kept her safely seated, eyes wide as she hyperventilated momentarily before she whispered to herself “She’s okay she’s okay she’s okay—she’s with Lacey, and Thom, and Cyril and Klaus and everyone—she’s okay.” it would be dangerous if they experienced that in the field. Too there was just something that made her feel better, that her girls would be together—be able to look after one another, have Cole giving them aid. It was not necessarily a riskless job, but it felt a great deal safer—they could retreat far easier if there was need.

“Stay with your sister, sweet girl,” Marehis said, “your ability with arrows will be hard to use in the mine’s maze, whereas closer quarters suit my daggers just fine—areas where the villagers are captive should be more open, allow you to defend yourselves in that way if you have need, and I would feel better if Ellie and Cole could have magical support I cannot offer.”

“You sure Mami?” Ellie worried.

“Of course, da’vehnan,” Marehis assured. It would be fine.

It would be.

It wasn’t.

It was! In that their mission was successful and everyone made it through without loss of life or limb. But only barely.

Ultimately, she hated Red Templars, she hated Red Lyrium, and she hated Mistress Poulin. She hated Solas! And she hated that that was something akin to a lie!

They’d a great deal of this bioluminescent substance that they marked the way from their camp with. Though Ellie brought their party to a halt, she Sera and Cole slipping down the bank along the broken bridge near their Tower camp. They reappeared a moment later, Ellie showing the adults small, shiny gold ring that's inscription indicated it belonged to refugee's they'd seen in Sahrnia, an Elderly woman Ellie had stopped to comfort when she was mourning the loss of this particular family heirloom that was now safe and found, securely tucked away in Ellie's overcoat pocket as she led her party to Sahrnia Quarry.

Solas continued to mark the path as they neared the towers and barricades that marked the edge of territory surrounding the quarry. The first cage of captives was just before one entered the quarry, Sera standing guard with an arrow knocked while Ellie and Cole made to comfort the villagers, calm them for their escape while Ellie used the light of her Mark to see by as she made swift work of the cage’s lock. Meanwhile their warriors, Dorian and Vivienne descended into the quarry, drawing the attention of the Red Templars as Marehis and Solas followed after, quietly, marking the path so the Inquisitor and her party did not end up lost, any captives further in could find their way out, Marehis keeping guard while Solas dipped his fingers into a pot of glowing substance to draw arrows pointing to their entrance that would act as their exit from this horrible place, scouting through the quarry to mark the way throughout. It would make for an easier exit for them all, eventually, Maker this place truly was a maze*. Oh, she hoped- she could hear their allies fighting the Red Templars, she hoped they were safe, and she hated being separated from the girls—if all went to plan they would not even be involved in squaring off with the Red Templars, but still, any number of things could go wrong.

“The girls are well, lethallan,” Solas’s voice was a bare whisper as he drew another mark along the cavern wall.
“Where are they now?” Marehis wondered.

“Hmm…half a mile behind us, in the east,” he was quiet for a moment, head tilted almost like he meant to physically allow himself to hear something better though it was internal speech from Cole, apparently, “they are unharmed, but I felt distress from Sera, sorrow from Ellie—they are alright, Cole informs me there is a woman, a villager from Sahrnia, dying from Red Lyrium poisoning, Ellie is praying with her and holding her hand, has promised to take a letter for her husband.”

Oh…oh Maker, “Oh my girls, that poor woman,” Marehis shook her head. She rested a hand on Solas’s forearm so he would halt, “Can…you can comfort them, yes? Are you able…I’ve limited understanding of the bond or if I can do anything in it but is there any way—”

He nodded, closing his eyes momentarily as he took a deep breath, loosing it before opening his eyes and confirmed he’d done exactly she wished, even as she’d failed to vocalize it, “I have sent them your love, the compassion you feel for the woman’s situation.”

That…was twice now he’d done so—offering her confirmation that Ellie and Sera were well before she could ask, sending them comfort from her, before she could ask. “I thought you could not focus on all three of us at once,” Marehis softly accused—he’d claimed as much the other day. She’d railed at him for not telling her immediately that Ellie wasn’t sleeping, was feeling ill to the point she could not eat, all while existing in range two Rifts burning torture into her Mark while they slept soundly in their cots. He informed her that while their existences could be felt in unison, deeper specifics could not be focused upon in such a way—he had to do so one at a time. He could switch between them rather seamlessly, but he could not know Ellie was unwell in the exact same moment he was monitoring Marehis so closely—he apologized for forgetting to resume monitoring Ellie when they were in battle against the first Rift, it wasn’t until Sera spoke up to her feeling her sister was lashing out from strain that he was reminded to resume focusing on the girl.

“I do not need magic to know when you are worried for the girls or wish to offer them comfort. You are always worried for them,” he gently teased, “and you are a good mother. If you hear Ellie or Sera are in need, you wish to fulfill it.” He adverted his gaze, arm slipping from her hand as he turned to continue down the path, “I do not need the bond to know you.”

She—oh she nearly yelled at him—in fact momentarily she forgot herself, that they were on mission, and followed after him swiftly, mouth opening to—well she would think of something!

Something clever to—make him regret saying something so—she wasn’t sure! But it was something he wasn’t allowed to say, that was for certain.

And she ran into him—he stopped abruptly, his hand shooting back behind him, resting low on her stomach before she felt a pulse of magic reverberate from his hand as Barrier coasted across her while he pushed her backward as he turned, pressing his back against the cavern wall and guiding her to do the same, she heard him holding his breath and that told her to do the same and then yes, she heard it—running footsteps in the passage just before them, they were nearing a place the path could be followed left, right, or forward on, and just a moment later Red Templars raced down the slope of the path before them to get to the lower levels of the quarry where their Warriors fought…thankfully leaving them undetected.

“My apologies,” he offered softly for the intrusion, startling her and putting his hand upon her without warning. Or maybe it was for the glowing fingermarks left on her armor from where his hand had pushed her back. Either way.

“We should keep moving,” Marehis replied.

She had not enjoyed him being so close! Not in the slightest!

They moved quickly and undetected—save for the instance where they were met with escaped villagers who stopped still and frightened as they assessed whether or not they had just run into enemies but Marehis gestured to the steel insignia on her chest just under her left portion of collarbone that bore the Inquisitions seal, while Solas—well, he raised his glowing fingertips in a bit of a wave—he was the one responsible for marking their escape route.

“Oh thank the Maker,” one whispered.

“Maw-seran-nis,” another offered in…well, a sweetly intentioned mangling of their native ‘thank-you’.

Marehis nodded, quietly intoning, “Go, quickly, quietly.” She did not have to tell them twice. She slapped a hand over her mouth when she felt a yelp rise up in her throat, oh good heavens! The behemoth in this place could be heard roaring in fresh anger, the ground trembling underfoot. She almost didn’t realize her other hand had gone to grasp Solas’s arm, her heart was thundering in her chest-

“Marehis, it is alright—Ellie, Sera and Cole are in the quarry maze but they are far from where our allies are fighting the behemoth. They are heading for the area Cassandra and the others just cleared, to free the captives there.”

She released a breath she hadn’t realized she’d been holding. Oh, she hated this place. It was frightening and she was so worried—for her girls and her friends, oh she prayed Cassandra was alright, if anything happened to her Ellie and Sera would be inconsolable- she was scared for them and angry at this Samson, at his Red Templars and Corypheus, and-

“Marehis—you need to breathe and focus, do you- we need to keep moving but if you need a moment-“

And she was angry at him!

“Stop it!” she hissed, pushing him away. “Stop- stop being so- kindly and caring and knowing every last thing I need!”

“If I’ve offended-“

“You have! Greatly!” she assured him, “And then you haven’t. You- you’ve lied and betrayed and hurt me and my children and now you- you guard them with your life and show them unspeakable care and compassion. You take every bit of anger and abuse I throw at you for penance and- and I can’t- it kills me, Solas! It destroys me!”

“…wh- why ever- I’ve- I have hurt you, Marehis, unforgivably. Why should I not live in remorse of that—to do you unkindness after all I’ve already done to you, your family, the world? Why would my erm…endeavor to not hurt you further, hurt you so?”

“Because I still love you, you jackass!” she railed at him. “I love you and it kills me—I mean what do I even do with that?! You’re Fen’Harel. That reputation was frightening enough, but to know how you earned it?! That it is your fault Corypheus could carry out the destruction of the Conclave—that it is your Mark that left an innocent girl with blame for an act of treason she was a victim of, you left her responsible for the aftermath of your mess. So how, after all of that can I even consider- I can’t imagine anything ever being the same after that. and so it’s devastating, because I shouldn’t love you and ultimately I- I can’t. I can’t do anything with that, we can’t be.-“

And even as she said that…well.

There was the sound of the ceramic pot clattering against the stone underfoot as Marehis went from pushing him away, to grasping fistfuls of Solas’s vest and pulling him to her and his response was immediate—a hand on her bottom, another in her hair as she forgot herself entirely. Where they were, what they were supposed to be doing. That only an entire idiot would list every last reason in the world they should not be with someone ever again, and then proceed to kiss them like they were dying and the antidote was hiding beyond their lover’s lips.

Ex-lover! What was she even-

His…his response was immediate in other ways. It was not…chillingly cold in the quarry, Red Lyrium was to blame for that. And Solas did not necessarily wear armor. He wore the equivalent of plain clothes under his vestment, it was Marehis’s understanding they were enchanted to be protective but they were soft cloth and while they may keep some dangers out it did little for…for anything from within.

“This is- I-“ she wasn’t sure what she was thinking or what she was doing, she wanted him—and she wanted him on the other side of the planet now! Far away where he can’t be- here and confusing and making her lose her every bit of sense-

She ached to be with this man. And it terrified her. and met her with the definition of what the Iron Bull had assured her she could come to him with, if she found herself feeling such a way she needed such attentions.
His hands were on her hips then as he placed her on her feet and she gulped in gasps of fresh air—that was it, she needed air, air to think, oxygen to her brain to form coherent, rational thoughts—

She lost all sense of thought when one hand undid the clasp at the front of her armored leggings, and another tugged the zipper all the way down—

And- and proceeded to pull at her leggings, her underthings in a smooth motion that got them up under her bottom which was now pressed against the warm cavern wall, then down just under her knees.

“Lasa nuvenin?”

She was not even capable of thinking of forming words. How did the mouth work, exactly? She wasn’t certain anymore, she barely comprehended is this what you wish? Let alone the cognizance it took to do more than dumbly—in all senses of the word—nod her ‘yes’.

She wasn’t entirely certain just how her legs ended up over his shoulders, leggings behind his head as she was held fast against the wall, seated—

She’d forgotten how mouths worked and Fen’Harel was kind enough to impart on her his knowledge on the matter. He…knew very well…just how to handle lips, teeth, and tongue against tender, wanting, flesh until she cried, tears slipping from her eyes as she shook and trembled and—

He supported her weight on his shoulders as they caught their breaths and her legs worked through their trembling good- good god indeed. And when she felt certain she could stand again his hands were on her hips and he did the reversal of what he’d done to seat her, goodness—he raised her up higher while ducking his head out from under her leggings and her feet thumped against the path as she found her footing again and he released her allowed her to uh, pull up her things…s-secure her bandaging…it was only the act of doing so that reminded her, made it do she didn’t let out some cry of alarm when she saw just, an alarming amount of red on Solas’s mouth and chin and- and a little bit on the tip of his nose, some staining on his tunic. He’d handkerchiefs on hand, of course, doused one in water as he cleared his throat and…passed it to her, before he took a second he wetted before turning away to wipe at his face. Oh. Oh! That was erm, considerate, she undid her leggings to clean herself up for um, well—if one did not necessarily have to go to the restroom after intercourse, it was wise to at least wipe up.

“Uh-“

“Keep it. Or…well, the Iron Bull may well be able to erm…smell so—“

She tossed the handkerchief at him, eyes wide with alarm as she panicked demanded, “Burn it!” Burn everything! Was she clean enough? What about her underthings was there anything- what about him?! He’d…visually calmed down in regards to his…body’s earlier excitement but had he…was she wondering out of fear there was something for the Iron Bull to detect or out of worry she’d just left him unsatisfied…which was beyond the pale, she shouldn’t be concerned about that at all! He’d-! Despicable things he’d done! But had he?

“Yes,” he drily assured her, “and it would be a kindness if perhaps you could cease focusing on such things just now, if only out of mercy for those we are here with,” Solas said, clearing his throat, “Ellie is calling.”

Marehis’s heart stopped in her chest, the statement was the verbal equivalent to having had a bucket of ice-cold water thrown over her. What was she even doing?! What was wrong with her?! How could she have just- just- lose all sense on mission. “Is she hurt?!”

“She is fine, nothing a little potion and perhaps a hot bath can’t remedy. The villagers are out, and the behemoth is down. We’re regrouping to investigate the Quarry for evidence.”

Marehis nodded. “Good,” then, “This…this doesn’t mean—“

“I didn’t think it would,” Solas assured her. “I…was merely fulfilling my promise to do… whatever it is you need, to navigate this trying time. Anxiety, menstruation…such release can be beneficial for both.”

She was somehow frustrated and grateful he could make it all sound so clinical, like she hadn’t lost her actual mind and merely accepted assistance from an ally.
Solas collected the pot he’d dropped, capping it carefully and returning it to his pack before leading her through the Quarry until they were somewhere in the midst of it all near a disconcerting amount of Red Lyrium and the great, slain Behemoth that once guarded it. Was that...why were their great pendulums hanging in this place holding large shards of Red Lyrium? Was that decorative or did it serve some even more menacing purpose?

Ellie greeted them with a smile, waving them over, “Hola mami! You guys okay?”

“We are fine sweet girl,” Marehis assured, going straight to her girls, raising her hands to get a bit of her girls in each hand, tucking tendrils of hair behind their ears and resting her hands on their cheeks, “how fared your mission?”

“Everyone um,” Ellie sighed a bit, “everyone made it out okay, Cole’s popped out to check and make sure everyone made their way to camp and help get them settled for the night, they’re not bad off—Cole said Tio Cyril came back to check on me but our soldiers filled him in on our mission, he’s sticking around to checking over the villagers, and I’ll make sure everyone’s okay when we get back. Tio and our soldiers will escort them back to Sahrnia tomorrow, I’m thinking some of us will go with them? Just to make sure they get back safe and assure Mistress Poulin that the Red Templars have been dealt with and I um, I promised I’d take something to this place near Sahrnia so,” she shrugged.

“You did real good Inky,” Sera encouraged, her arm around the girl’s shoulders as she rested her cheek against Ellie’s hair, “Camps gonna be friggin’ full tonight, all the villagers we saved and um...”

“Da’len?” Solas offered as he drew nearer, ugh. He rested his hand high on Ellie’s arm, “I know it is sad, but take heart—that woman, she was so ill for so long with Red Lyrium poisoning, death was mercy. She would have passed this night whether you were here or not—that you were here, could bring her comfort? You made what could have been terrifyingly lonely final moments something bearable, of certainty and comfort that her final wishes will be carried out. I am proud of you.”

He made her sweet girl cry! But only...only minorly, and it was a healthy response to something saddening, Ellie sniffled, “Thanks papi,” she cleared her throat, “um. Everyone’s okay right? There’s something...a few things here I think? Magic said so, anyway. And then there was definitely something up um,” she turned to point back up a sloping path to a higher level of the Quarry. “There’s this place where there’s like, an office or something we should check out. Then we’ll be all done! We can go back to camp and have victory snacks!”

“We follow your lead, Inquisitor,” Cassandra offered warmly.

...for all she’d just had warm regard for Ellie, when Marehis walked forward with her arm around the Human girl’s shoulders she heard something of a rumble from the Iron Bull’s chest and then a strangled sound as something—an armored elbow—hit the Qunari hard in the ribs as Cassandra hissed, “Do mind your business.”

Was she a sight? Her hair was a bit out of sorts, her braid loose where Solas’s hand had woven into it but that could be from in general gravity or a fight—that would be a far more reasonable assumption!

Perhaps she was being paranoid. The Iron Bull was...well it hurt him when Ellie hurt and she was sure there was a level of difficulty, distrust in seeing Solas comfort her, perhaps he’d had some non-verbal reaction of jealousy and Cassandra was reprimanding him to keep Ellie from witnessing a moment of immaturity in her elders.

Maker knows Ellie’s circle of adults had immaturity in spades this evening. At least from one of her mamis in particular.

Magic brought Ellie’s attention to a few different areas up in the scaffolding. Marehis and Sera followed directly behind her, and it was sweet, the Iron Bull pacing just off to the side of the scaffolding, following them from below, good eye trained on their progress as he watched and waited, ready to play catcher if there was an unfortunate fall to be had.

Ellie took up a few sheets of parchment they found, scanning them under the glow of her Mark to make certain their importance and announcing they were letters* from Samson and his upper ranks—one penned by Samson speaking to the horror of the Red Lyrium transformation, giving the instruction to keep pumping those suffering through their change with Elf Roof. They had been growing the Red Lyrium in these parts apparently, somehow, someway with quote “materials” Samson sent them. How vile.

Marehis snatched the second letter—from some ‘Captain Paxley’—out of Ellie’s grasp to re-read more thoroughly when she saw the girl was through and her own eyes caught her child’s name on the page near the end. The Venatori’s spies have seen Inquisitor Trevelyan herself heading toward the Dales. Show her we haven’t forgotten our brothers and sisters lying dead at Therinfal. ‘To my fellow captains’ ugh. So this missive had been widespread. “Let me have this please, da’vehn? It should go to Leliana first and foremost—I do promise she will send it on to Cullen after, so he has everything from our findings here.”

“Security stuff?” Ellie checked and when Marehis nodded, “Okay mami, tell Tatie I say ‘hi’.” Hmm, she would, even if at risk of her occupation.

Marehis and Sera were not the only members of their party nervous about Ellie’s scaffolding adventures. The Iron Bull was pacing just off to the side of the scaffolding, following them from below, his good eye trained on their progress as he watched and waited, ready to play catcher if there was an unfortunate fall to be had.

…her child took this as inspiration to skip out on ladders altogether for her descents. She stepped up to the very edge of the scaffolding holding her arms out and the Iron Bull let out a rumble of laughter as he invited,

“Come on Imekari, I got you. You too Ser’.”

The girls took each other’s hands and jump together to drop into the Iron Bull’s hold—which was thankfully swift and secure, he had the girls in his arms the instant they were in reach and let out a playfully menacing growl, overlapped by their startled shrieks and giggles as he whirled about with them in his arms before he placed them on their feet. Just in time for another ladder, though Cassandra was already following the girls up the scaffolding, so Marehis stayed below once she’d joined the others.

Solas softly cleared his throat, like he was staving off a bit of coughing perhaps—was the man getting ill? There was something…foreign, in the way the bond was, that felt like-

Marehis gasped and whirled about because it felt- it felt like a warning, that the man was informing her there was something behind her she should deal with but the space behind her was empty.

“Darling?” Vivienne questioned softly, concerned, “Are you alright?”

“Yes, sorry I um, thought I heard something,” Marehis offered in return, sending Solas a reproachful glare. Why did he think to startle her?! Was it some sort of flirtation? It hadn’t felt playful in the slightest, he’d been genuinely warning her of something, it felt.

“Here my dear,” Vivienne said, removing the overcoat of her armored attire and handing it to her, “It’s a bit too warm with all this Lyrium for my liking, and you appear chilled,” she excused the act before stepping closer to whisper, “you’ve a bit of staining. Understandable at this time but potentially embarrassing, I understand.”

Oh. Oh! Had she gotten…gotten blood on the back of her leggings? She did not think she could bleed through leather but perhaps her earlier misadventures had gotten blood on the back of her leggings—either way…understandable at this time implied Vivienne thought it was merely something naturally occurring from her monthly. Solas nodded encouragement for her to accept the offered coat so she supposed yes, that was what he’d meant to convey to her. She took the Enchanter’s coat, though she felt a little badly for it—the Quarry was warm but outside of it, Emprise du Lion was in perpetual winter, and while Vivienne’s armor had a high collar…it left her bosom rather exposed, her arms bare save for gleaming golden bracers at her wrists.

Marehis’s attention was drawn back to her girls as she heard Ellie sigh, tiredly. “Well…this is probably why Cole isn’t back yet,” she said softly to her sister.

“Shite,” Sera swore as she read over Ellie’s shoulder, hugging the girl from behind.
“I feel so bad—that’s such an awful situation gosh…papi?” she called down to Solas, “Can Cole hear me from here?”

“If he is at the tower camp? Ye…Yes,” Solas supposed, “I believe so—you’ve need of him da’len?” he worried.

“Not for me,” she assured, and then after a moment of consideration, “Sissy, arriba?”

_...ven aquí_ was ‘come here’…_arriba_ was…

It was up. _Arriba_ was up, as in up on her sister’s shoulders. Sera knelt with her back to her sister and let the girl _sit on her shoulders_ so the Elf girl could raise up to her full height, the Maker had blessed her with perfectly parallel daughters—Sera was as tall as Ellie was short, and the combination was frightening just now—they were already up so high! To what end did this girl need to be higher?!

Reception, apparently. Ellie closed her eyes and focused for a moment before she announced, “He can hear me!” and then she held up the letter she’d found to read to herself…well, to _Cole_.

And then she explained, “We found a written confession by one of the villagers we saved tonight, he um…apparently murdered his brother in law and wanted to get that off his chest before he died. He’s still alive though, so…I thought I should give Cole a heads up in case this is in his hurts and Cole thought to touch on it—he _might_ be repentant, but he might be violent, I suggested waiting until we’re all together.”

The Quarry Quandary was full of just wonderful information, wasn’t it? “We will handle it da’vehnan,” Marehis promised, “Sera please be careful.”

“Mami, getting down’s easy peasy!” Ellie assured, Sera’s eyes going a bit wide as she tightened her grip on Ellie’s knees when the girl proceeded to lay back and hang upside down from her sister’s shoulders, arms down so her hands were splayed and Sera let go so the girl could catch herself on her hands and flip herself forward…rising up on her feet, one foot atop Cassandra’s, the girl yelping out apology as she moved hurriedly to get off her mother’s foot and the Seeker had to wrap her arms around the girl to keep her from bouncing off her foot and over the edge of the scaffolding.

“She’s beauty, she’s grace,” Dorian drawled.

“She’ll pop you in the _face_,” Ellie threatened. Truly? “Don’t make me come down there and kiss you Tio! I’ll do it! I’ll do it _twice_!” Ahh.

“Alright, I relent—my most sincere apologies, Lady Inquisitor,” Dorian was immediate to assure.

“You’re already insulted! I’m piping mad!” Ellie insisted, “The Iron Bull!!”

The Qunari was swift to catch her as she dropped from the scaffolding…and he assisted her, holding her up so Dorian’s face was well in reach of the girl he usually towered over, allowing her to take his face in her hands and adorn his cheek with a long, enthusiastic kiss. “Mwwwwwh! Vengeance!”

The man scowled looking caught between disgust and adoration before he let out a frustrated sound and pecked a kiss to the girl’s cheek in return. “You are without doubt the worst person that I make acquaintance with, I hope you know. Horrible child.”

“Tatie says the same thing—that’s how I know she loves me.”

Dorian was intelligence personified as he responded to that by sticking his tongue out at her, and of course she returned the gesture as the Iron Bull set her on her feet, chuckling at their bickering.

They found more correspondence from Samson further in the Quarry. Samson writing, demanding they send double the Red Lyrium to someone named ‘Maddox’, so he could modify Samson’s armor—claiming this armor gave him extraordinary power, and with it he was certain Corypheus would choose _him_ as ‘the Vessel’. If Marehis remembered correctly, their mission against Venatori in Orlais had born similar illusions from Calpernia—she was preparing to be some vessel for Corypheus. And that was twice now, that something they found had mentioned Samson’s armor wasn’t it?

“There was a letter in the Emerald Graves,” Ellie nodded when Marehis voiced the question,
“one of the people transporting Red Lyrium—he mentioned Samson’s armor being weird, said it looked Templar-y but not like any Templar armor he’d seen.”

“Excellent catch Eleanor, Marehis,” Cassandra said, “this will certainly be useful to Cullen—perhaps this strange armor will make bare some weakness to exploit.”

“We all done here Imekari?” the Iron Bull asked.

Ellie shook her head, “Sorry guys, magic pinged when we were near that office place—it’s not far from here, honest. We’ll take a quick look around and then I promise we’re finished and free to snack and relax!” she assured, “Thank you everyone for helping out tonight, I’m sorry if I’ve totally derailed our sleep schedules, I promise—fresh potion all around to help us get back on track for anyone who wants it.”

Ellie was certain of step as she led them through the Quarry’s passages, though there was a place where two paths met that Marehis found herself halting to look about for something, just… she’d the strangest sense again, like the feeling of being spotted by something that was going to follow. She saw nothing, heard nothing. Was…was Solas doing something to make her wary with the bond?

“Stop,” she hissed the whisper as she swatted him with the back of her hand.

Solas met her gaze, “Is something the matter?” he wondered…worried. No hint at all of deception in him, and strangely enough…even as she’d unknowingly entertained his lies these past months…that gave her insight to know exactly what it looked like when he lied—even if it was about something he was dedicated to passing off as truth. He was being forthright, and he did do something in the bond—it felt like a cursory glance, as if checking her for something, and then gentle reassurance that he found nothing of concern. Concern of what? Oh. There was the distinct impression in her mind now—they were surrounded by Red Lyrium, the heat of it, the stench, it smelled bitter and of heat and decay. And one of the initial symptoms of Red Lyrium poisoning was paranoia. He must not sense anything to be amiss with her so…

Ugh, was she being paranoid? If not due to Red Lyrium, then perhaps…perhaps it was some symptom of her anxieties.

“Mami?” Ellie wondered. The Inquisitor, the whole of her party had stopped to stare at-Marehis hadn’t meant to fall so far behind her ward! Everyone was ahead of her, save for Solas and now Ellie’s gaze was going from her, to Solas, and back again though the questioned, “Is everything alright?”

“Everything is fine, da’len. I thought I saw something—it is dark, and all this danger about tonight, I’m on edge I suppose.”

Ellie smiled holding out her hand in invitation, and Marehis could not help but smile likewise, grateful to her friends who let her weave between them to get to her child and take her sweet hand. “Just stick with me mami—everything’ll be okay! Everyone did such a super great job clearing the quarry, and we got all the villagers out, and we’re finding so much great stuff for papi! He’s going to be so proud!” oh the girl seemed excited about it, like she expected a great deal of affection from the man when they were together again and could hardly wait. She squeezed Marehis’s hand as she continued leading them along the path, prattling right along, “We’re safe! And we’re together! And the path is nice and smooth, sturdy under our feet, and the stars are really pretty, and the quarry is warm. Kind of stinky though,” she raised her Marked wrist to her nose and sniffed. “I still kind of smell like lotion though mami, see?” she held her wrist up in offering and Marehis let out a chuckle as she sniffed. Coconut oil and vanilla were much better than bitter decay. “And I can still taste dinner! Can you?”

“Yes, da’vhenan,” though ahh…Solas had apparently brushed his teeth directly after dinner, before they left camp. It was his toothpaste she could more predominantly taste in her mouth.

“Kind of yicky after a while, huh?” Ellie supposed at Marehis’s uncertain tone, “we’ll brush our teeth later!” Delightful idea.

It was a bit of a climb, but they made it to the office area—it was quite the feat, but it was quite a few levels between the ground level of the Quarry and the office, several ladders between the two places so all of her party gathered together in the small, cramped space. Which sorted—there was only one place they needed to look, and their Inquisitor had entered the room first, gone straight to it as her magic guided her directly to the final piece of evidence they needed to collect this night.

“Da’vehnan?” Marehis questioned softly when she heard the girl draw in a very deliberate, controlled breath and smelled the faintest bit of salt, like tears had welled up in the girl’s eyes but not fallen.

Ellie cleared her throat, wiping swiftly at her eyes before turning to address her party. “I’ll want agents of Leliana going with us when next we return to Sahrnia. I’ll speak with Mistress Poulin myself before they take her into Inquisition custody,” she informed them before elaborating, “she’s apparently…been selling her people to the Red Templars, in exchange for resources. The people we saved tonight weren’t kidnapped—they were sold,” she met Marehis’s gaze, eyes red from unshed tears, oh her girl, this hurt her heart so much and she was truly endeavoring to show less upset in the face of what was…becoming a sad, depressing, angering pattern of behavior in people who held positions of power they’d encountered as of late. “Our prisons can hold her while she waits for me to Sit in Judgment right? It might be a minute before we’re back in Skyhold but uh…I don’t want her running while she has the chance so we’re not leaving here without her.”

“Good call, boss-girl,” the Iron Bull gently praised.

Marehis nodded. “Yes, Inquisitor. I’ll make proper arrangement with Leliana when we return to camp,” she promised.

Ellie nodded, letting out a small, “Gracias,” before handing off the damning letter to Marehis who swiftly cast her gaze over it just in case…it felt like mixed fortune, that Ellie’s reading comprehension was on par for the Red Templar’s level of vocabulary, she’d read correctly. Damn. Damn this place, and damn this whole situation and the people who created it! She would see to it Leliana got this along with Marehis’s letter passing along the Inquisitor’s instructions.

The girl took a deep, bracing breath she blew out as she said, “Alright—we’re done here, great work everyone!”

==

Marehis wrapped an arm around Ellie’s shoulders, holding her close, relieved at how the bit of contact had her relaxing into Marehis’s side, and she got a smile out of the girl by pressing a kiss to her cheek. “Come da’len—we’ll return to camp and ensure the villagers are well, and you can take a warm bath, some cocoa and get some rest,” she said as they stepped out into the night again. The moon overhead was just past its zenith so, “it is not so very late, if we rest upon our return to camp we can resume our schedule as normal.”

“Thanks mami, you’re the best,” her girl sweetly replied. Was she truly? It made her feel giddy with pride.

Maybe Andrasen religion wasn’t for her. The Maker did so love, it seemed, to bless her with moments of triumph and pride before tearing it all out from under her. Not unlike someone hugging her and patting her on the head, so that when she relaxed, her pain was that much more amusing when life metaphorically kicks her directly in the crotch.

Ellie slid down the ladder ahead of her, Marehis following after once the girl was safely out of the way—it wouldn’t do to drop directly onto her. Ellie was already at the second ladder, making her descent to the ground.

She’d not quite shaken that feeling, the paranoia picking at her nerves, the innate fear that something was following them. There were several sounds she’d heard since joining the Inquisiton that could invoke horror and suffering in Marehis on impact. The crack of a Rift in the distance. The sound of Ellie’s heart stopping, pained screaming tearing from her throat as a time-shifting Rift burst in the sky. The crunch of her child’s bones under the boot of an enemy thrice her size.

The ear-filling screech of metal being torn through, the squelch of skin and sinew and grinding snap of bone, all wrapped in an anguished scream that stole all the breath from her Show her we haven’t forgotten our brothers and sisters lying dead at Therinfal.

A Red Templar Shadow. Those—those fucking invisible freaks. They moved in stealth, breathing undetectable, heartbeat slow and sluggish, so quiet it sounded like the echo of any around like the ghost of their own heartbeats. Their only discernable trait was their stench—the vile odor of Red Lyrium this wretched place was drenched in.

And it was only when they struck their gift of invisibility unveiled them. This Shadow revealed himself.

With its horrifying Red-Lyrium Shard of an arm running Ellie through.

She wasn’t…entirely certain what was happening. There was this high-pitched ringing in her ears as everything blurred together, this horrific image of some twisted, demented creature that should never have existed, impaling the girl that made up half of her beating heart, while her other half—her Sera screamed in absolute gut wrenching terror, the sound blending with cries of anguish and alarm from every member of her party. Her family.

And of her father.

The almost-sickening warmth wafting up from the caustic amounts of Red Lyrium in this place was suddenly overpowered by cold, dread, chill. The air was like ice, felt thick in her lungs like it had a fullness to it—the smell of atmosphere like when the Fade was near, close enough to touch the waking world through a Rift. But there was no Rift.

There was only Fen’Harel.

Solas’s staff blazing with power that shone through his very skin it— it almost looked like that day in the Emerald Graves, when prayer poured from his lips and power broke from his body that left it torn with Ellie’s wounds but that— that had something like neutrality in it—enemies and allies granting him his wish without much weight of their own heart in the act, the faintest hint of something vindictive in it, like impish amusement at getting petty revenge. This?

Every part of it felt like Solas. And it was wrath.

There was something like fire—literal, pitch black flame burning from- from Solas’s eyes, the whole of his eyes black, twin voids that looked for all the world like they might be the source of all rage as he came to the edge of the lowest scaffolding, voice thick, reverberating with power.

“Ir, Fen’Harel—ma halam,” he ground out before he dropped from the scaffolding, the air underneath him moving as if he dictated its will, his descent was controlled, left the ground at his feet quaking beneath him and he- he brought his staff directly down, struck and shattered the Shadow’s arm at the elbow to detach the beast from the girl, Solas catching Ellie against him and carefully lowering her down as the creature reared back, screaming in pain. And that was before Solas roared—a sound that tore from him with fury and venom before he launched himself at the Red Templar, shouting the threat—the purest promise—“Ma emma harel, bellanaris din’an heem!”

Solas…splayed his hands on the Red Templar Shadow…and the creature was eviscerated.

Light broke from its every pore, the sound like stone cracking and crumbling before it disintegrated into a pile of smoking, useless rubble and ash.

That Solas fell into. First onto his knees, and then collapsing face first.

Ellie’s eyes were wide cast, taking her air in harsh gasps, pale and trembling and Marehis was petrified she was going into shock. Marehis was the first one down and at Ellie’s side, Sera- she’d no ability to manipulate gravity at the moment but she dropped straight down off the scaffolding to scramble to her sister’s side. Marehis she- she knew precious little what to do. it was an alarmingly large thing at its base—the size of marehis’s fist—tapering to a fine point that protruded from Ellie’s back with- it was covered in blood and- and tissue- it looked like the thing had skewered an organ from her body, left it a burst broken fleshy mess coating the Red Lyrium shard-

And then…not coating the Red Lyrium shard, but crystalizing to become part of it.

Oh. Oh Maker she knew—she did know what needed done and now. She had potion, Vehnan root, several vials left over in her own stores and- and-

“Frick frick frick we- h-hold on Inky we- we’ll get it out—” Sera was saying, hands ghosting over shard of Red Lyrium lodged through the tissue just above her right hip and inward and up to break out of the back of her ribcage and Marehis’s hands were snatching her child’s away before she could risk doing what she was about to be warned against,

“Don’t touch it!” The Iron Bull’s voice roared, “Get back! Sera—that fucking thing’s the only thing keeping Imekari from bleeding out,” the Qunari said as he slid down the ladder to join them, “She’ll bleed out quick if we don’t do things right—Ser’ I need you to focus, you wanna help? Go get Cyril—get in range of Cole and get Cyril here now.”

Sera bolted, racing off to do as instructed as the Iron Bull took Ellie’s hand, “Imekari, breathe, keep breathing alright? Doesn’t sound like that thing pierced your lung.”

“U- u-“ each sound popped from her mouth with a gasp around them before she could work out, “under- pr- pressing-“

“Shhhh shhh shh, okay, okay,” he soothed, “just focus on keepin’ the air coming in and out baby, we’ve got everything else. You’re gonna be okay.”

“Dorian, Vivienne—one of you! Come, I need Fire,” Marehis called out, the Mages had made their way—Cassandra was at Marehis’s back, resting her hand there and murmuring that she was here if need for her arose, oh bless her. Dorian was first to Ellie’s side between he and Vivienne and Marehis- oh they had to move quickly, “She’ll choke if we administer potion, I need one of you to get these,” she held out vials of health and regeneration potions, “vaporous, get her breathing them in, they will strengthen her lungs and draw potion into her bloodstream. The other I need with me, calling fire into their hands—you will have to be immediate.”

Vivienne had taken vials of potion into her hands, uncorking them and working to heat them though her gaze went to Marehis, “What would you have us do?”

“We cannot leave something toxic like Red Lyrium in her body—we must remove it, and quickly. Her wounds need cauterized—exit wound, while I pour potion to circumvent internal bleeding, and then immediately after, the entrance wound.”

Dorian blanched but ground himself like he would push through the disgust for Ellie- oh. oh it wasn’t disgust at the gruesomeness of helping the girl, the poor man looked devastated at implementing a healing tactic that would cause so much pain.

“Darling, take these and get them in her system, my hands are ready to serve such purpose,” Vivienne said, passing off the bubbling bottles of potion to the Tevinter Mage who looked wholly relieved to be given a task that was pure healing. “I’m with you.”

“Bull,” Marehis looked to the Qunari-

“Got it, on your order,” he knew well what she needed of him he- Marehis had a great deal of upper body strength but this was not the time to test it, she would do her child little help if she only made things worse by wriggling the implement about in her wounds. The Qunari squeezed and released Ellie’s hand before scooting to be lower at her side, right before the shard of Red Lyrium and Cassandra knelt behind Ellie, taking the girl’s head in her lap and holding the hand the Iron Bull had to let go of to take hold of the Lyrium shard.

“I am here, Eleanor. The Maker is here, He is always with you,” the Nevarran woman was whispering to their child, “Though I am flesh, Your Light is ever present And those I have called, they remember, and they shall endure. I shall sing with them the Chant, and all will know, we are Yours, and none shall stand before us. Though I am flesh…” the Chant repeated on, a litany from the woman’s lips as she prayed over the girl, pleading with their god.

Marehis unstoppered a vial of regenerative potion and took a deep breath to utter two words it took all of her will to say, “Do it.”

The Iron Bull pulled the shard of Red Lyrium from her body with one smooth motion, casting the wretched thing aside, and the very moment the tip of it disappeared into Ellie’s body Vivienne’s hand was on Ellie’s back, blazing burning heat to cauterize the wound closed, and the instant the Iron Bull was casting the wretched thing aside, Marehis poured potion into the gaping wound, the contents of her own stomach blazing a path up her throat as she bore witness to yellow-green tonic filling the space like it would a cup. She kept her mouth shut, and her eyes focused until the bottle was empty and then so was her stomach as she turned away and crawled to put distance between herself and her injured child to heave mostly-digested dinner onto dirt and stone and Red Lyrium.

Red Lyrium…that grew—the contents of her stomach, these thick lumps crystalized and became part of the bit of Red Lyrium she was kneeling before at the base of the Quarry wall, how-…People. People were the ‘materials’ Samson-

They weren’t turning the villagers into Red Templars. They were turning them into Red Lyrium*.

This whole place-

“S’okay lovey, it’s all gonna be okay, do what you need to, I’ve got you,” Thom Rainier’s voice was like a balm to her ears—she once thought she’d gladly see the man slain by her own hand for his betrayal of Ellie and now he was her trusted ally, someone she loved for gathering her hair in his hand to keep it out of her way as she heaved further still, the Human man rubbing circles on her back and blessedly offering, “Ellie-girl’s handled as much as we can do right now, Madam’s got her wound cauterized on both sides. Bull just said she’s breathing more easily, doesn’t have to keep her breaths so shallow to avoid knocking and popping a lung against that damn thing, Cassandra’s got her sipping potion and water, Cole promises he’s on route with Cyril. You need some water honey?”

He held up her canteen as Marehis turned away from the Red Lyrium to face him, seated on her bottom as she took a few deep breaths and accepted the canteen, taking a few sips to spit on the ground at her side to clear acidic bile from her mouth before taking a proper drink and nodding as she voiced, “Thank you.”

“I er, checked on Solas—made sure he’s still breathing. Skin was ice cold and his pulse was thready when I first checked him but I got potion in him and his colors comin’ back, he’s just out cold. Don’t know what the hell he did but it seems like the guy’s just plain tuckered out.”

“Ma seranas,” Marehis thanked him, holding out her hand and the man grunted as he took hold of it and grunted as he rose to his feet and helped her rise with him, sniffing as she went to check on the man for herself, kneeling at his side. Oh, his color was returned, he’d been practically grey when he fell over, but his skin was icy chill to the touch when she rested her hand on his forehead, smoothed it back along his scalp.

What in the world was she supposed to do with him?

“Ma seranas, Fen’Harel,” she whispered, pressing a kiss to his forehead.

She returned to Ellie’s side, the girl was only barely conscious, oh her da’len-“Da’vehnan, I am so sorry,” Marehis whimpered out, taking the girl’s hand and raising it to her lips.

“’m okay,” she promised, “j’s jus’ don’t like…s’loud,” she complained.

“What is loud, Eleanor?” Cassandra questioned, to little reply as the girl fell unconscious. Oh she’d a frightening chill to her—it did not speak to nearness of the Fade, but a great loss of blood.

There was the thunderous sound of Sera and Cyril running to get to them, Sera collapsing into Marehis’s side, wholly out of breath she’d run all the way to camp, literally grabbed Cyril who thankfully had his medical kit close at hand, and ran all the way back.

Cole materialized before them, the sight no longer as startling as it used to be now that they were rather used to it but, “It’s the Red Lyrium! The Red Lyrium is loud!” was very alarming.

“We’ve been here far too long,” Cassandra agreed, “we should move her-“

“Not around her,” Cole clarified, “in her. In her blood,” and then, “Where did her appendix go?”

…but what was an appendix? L-like in a book?

Not like in a book. It was apparently a small, non-vital organ that the Red Templar had been kind enough to skewer from her child’s body, the horror that set in her was beyond belief until Cyril spoke, “On the bright side—no chance of appendicitis in future. Cole, can you talk me through—how bad is her internal trauma?”

“It is healing, potion is doing what it should, there is just- there is Red Lyrium in her blood stream, in her magic. We need to get it out—Cassandra can do it but she will not like it.”
“I can…?” Cassandra looked wholly confused…and then absolutely horrified. “Cole you-you cannot be serious.”

“What’re you thinking Seeker?” Cyril questioned urgently, “If we’re going to help her, it’s gotta be now.”

“I- I’ve the Seeker’s ability to cause Lyrium to burn. It—” she thought on it, “Yes I suppose when I’ve had to,” she cleared her throat, “implement such an ability for long enough, more Lyrium has needed plied as the act does break it down, clears it from the person’s system. I—” she stopped, “Can we- what would happen if—”

“It would corrupt her magic, it can only grow stronger now that it is in her, Cassandra,” Cole informed her. “It’s feeding on her as we speak, it will consume her if it is not destroyed. I’m sorry.”

Marehis rested a hand on Cassandra’s arm, bringing the woman to meet her gaze as she said, “It is what has to be done. I know this is hard, I know it is the very last thing you want to do. But this will save her, and she will not hold this against you.”

“Save for myself perhaps,” Cassandra said, “But I suppose I can live with that,” she looked to Cyril. “What do we do?”

“Burning it um…it’s painful?” he asked.

“Yes,” she assured, “it may bring her blood to boil.”

“I’ll ready potion—Embrium and Elf root liquid-concentrate steam for her to breathe in while you’re doing this, keep her lungs going strong, help with the pain. Cole I want word—the second it’s out of her system, you tell me, okay?”

“Yes,” Cole agreed.

Cyril did what he could to rouse Ellie, talk her through what was about to happen while Dorian warmed potion to steam, but oh the girl just stared overhead unseeing, mumbling incoherently under her breath, Cole softly announcing she couldn’t hear him past the haze of Red Lyrium. Sera was crying into Marehis’s lap.

Sobbing when Ellie’s screaming wails echoed through the quarry.

And Cole’s confirming, “It’s gone,” was almost needless as Ellie laid trembling, gasping for air to catch her breath as the burning subsided—there was nothing in her left to burn.

“E-Eleanor?” Cassandra’s voice rasped out, oh the woman was weeping.

“We should get out of here,” Cyril said softly, “Get her comfortable and sleep this nightmare off.”

“I got Imekari,” the Iron Bull spoke up, “She’s mine—you assholes can fight over who lugs Solas,” he decided, taking the girl up carefully into his arm, a miserable sound coming from his chest when he pressed his nose to the girls hair like he’d been seeking comfort he hadn’t found.

“Ime-kadan needs a bath—we all smell like this fucking place.”

“We can go, we can bathe!” Cole assured, “Solas just fell into the Fade, he didn’t mean to, he’s confused. I can get him out—he can carry himself.”

Solas was roused shortly after Cole vanished from sight—the boy reappearing when the Dalish man sat up straight, sucking in a gaps of air as he looked about, thoroughly confused.

“Ellie she- she is hurt, where—” he rose shakily to his feet as if he thought he had to get up and find her, he stumbled and fell onto his knees when he turned about and faced them, a “Oh,” falling dumbly from his mouth, gaze screaming of relief as he saw Ellie lying well among the living, “What…what happened?”

“You uh…” the Iron Bull, ever the wordsmith, succinctly informed him, “you went full Fen’Harel on some Red Templar ass and then passed out like a little bitch.”

“Ahh. Well then.”

“Didn’t know you could do shit like that.”

“Neither did I, so that sorts,” he supposed, his gaze went to Ellie and he breathed “Ellie’s pain is lessening as potion is kicking in. Her body is experiencing shock of sorts, dealing with the trauma of her injury. She’s exhausted and sore, her- her veins ache? She’s afraid and confused, but that is fading in her as she rests—she is not of the Fade just now but I will seek rest as soon as we return to camp, make someplace safe for her, inform her she is safe and recovering in her camp.”
It was…good the man would be seeking rest, because he was wholly spent, Solas could barely rise, but Cole came to his aid.

“I can help you if your feet don’t want to work,” Cole offered up cheerfully, “Krem taught me how—yeah buddy, let’s take a lap!” Oh sweet boy…sweet boys, as it was the Lieutenant’s influence that had the Spirit going to Solas’s side and pulling the man’s arm over his shoulder as he wrapped his arm around his back and helped him stand.

Sera followed suit after a fashion, wrapping her arm around Cassandra to draw the woman’s attention—the Seeker had been staring into space and Marehis thought perhaps if they’d left, she would have sat there staring into space until the Red Lyrium spread to turn her crystallite. “C’mon mama, ‘m tired—let’s home.”

There was something sweet in that home merely meant camp, surrounded by their allies. But something ached in Marehis’s heart to return to Skyhold—she wanted home, a place she felt her child was truly secure, she wanted to lay her on a proper mattress, in her quarters, and let her rest until she was fully recovered.

Camp was…very full. Their rescued villagers were gathered around several fires that had been made to keep them warm, she could smell clean water and soap like they’d been afforded the opportunity to wash their faces and hands, bundle themselves in blankets. There’d been sitting in something of a silence when their party approached, Cole helping Solas into their party’s tent, and then,

“Is…is that Ellie?” one of the villagers asked.

“Oh Maker take those Red Templar bastards,” another scathed.

“Ink, erm. Ahem. The Inquisitor,” Sera spoke up, “sh- she’ll be alright. Healer Cyril’s returned so take your ouches to him. Dunno when she’ll rally but we’re all around if you need anything—rest up, we’ll get you lot some hot breakfast come morning and escort you home. Um…you’re safe here, focus on that. Maker bless?” she offered up with some unease, like she was running through a list of things she was certain Ellie would touch on if she were conscious.

“Maker bless,” rang up from their guests, with some varying with, “the Inquisitor,” and “the Inquisition.”

“Thanks,” Sera replied softly as she walked with Cassandra to the bathing tent, Marehis following close behind.

——

The Iron Bull had already entered the tent, Dorian at his side. The Qunari was merely holding the girl while his lover plied magic to the tub to warm it up. “Human’s really don’t need their appendix?” the Iron Bull questioned as if the very thought baffled him and he didn’t trust it. Marehis wasn’t certain—her job had her focused more on vital organs and their placement as opposed to non-vital ones, so…the fact she’d never been taught to stab a man in his appendix was reassuring that it was, in fact, truth, so she nodded. The Qunari grumbled under his breath.

“Fucking stupid. The hell you even have it for then?”

“To be fucking stupid I suppose,” Dorian drawled. “Astounding as my love making may make me out to be, I am not truly the Maker made flesh, so I can’t rightly know the intention behind every facet of our design.”

The tent was rather cramped as it stood—it wasn’t exactly the mega tent, the Iron Bull had to crawl about in it, make himself small and crouched to fit alongside the tub, Dorian pressed against the thing as he knelt at its side to warm it, Cassandra and Sera had knelt in the small space on the other side of the tub and Marehis was at the foot of the tent when the entrance opened behind her and Cyril peeked in, taking in the already crowded space and holding out a squat jar to Marehis.

“Here, for her burns.”

“Thank you,” Marehis said.

She took the jar in hand, but it was Cassandra that plied it. Marehis had handed it off to her because, well, someone needed to remove Ellie’s things first and foremost. And too, the Seeker…
oh, the poor woman needed to do something, anything that felt like it could make up for the pain she’d had to inflict, she seemed desperate to do anything that might bring relief to her child. So once the girl was bare, ready for the nearly warmed bath, Marehis got out of the way to allow Cassandra to come around and kneel at the girl’s side and with the upmost tenderness plied soothing ointment to the harsh burns on Ellie’s hip, her touch feather light, slightest bit of tremble in her hands as she worked, eyes darting between the healing wound and Ellie’s face in search of the smallest sign she was unintentionally causing her child further pain.

The men left them while they got the girl into bathwater that…almost wreaked of Vehnan root—it wasn’t that the smell wasn’t pleasant, it was just in a proportion that was overpowering. The bathwater was green. Dorian must have poured every last vial of Health potion he had left in he and the Iron Bull’s stores. Cassandra was silent as she took up the task of washing Ellie’s hair, making certain the girl’s head stayed above water while Marehis assisted in bathing the girl. As strong as the smell of potion was, it was…well, it was relieving to see the shift between beaten brusied skin healing as she soaked, the scrapes on her knuckles…only on her Marked hand? Oh. Marehis had held Ellie’s right hand throughout er…treatment. Her other hand had been free to scrape harshly at the ground, digging her fingers into the dirt—her nails were filthy, paint chipped. She would wait until the girl woke again to paint them—indulge her in some pampering.

“Red Lyrium is people,” the notion struck Marehis again—she’d nearly forgotten but, “it is Lyrium tainted by Blight, but it grows by consuming people. That was what they were doing with the villagers.”

Sera stared at her for a moment. “Shite, yeah. That stuff was comin’ out of us in the future right? S’what Ink said. And people was like, growing into the walls or whatever.”

“It um…consumed Ellie’s blood—the shard that was in her, I think that is how she lost so much of it even as we were careful in stopping her bleeding with its removal—the thing soaked up everything it could, would have crystalized further inside of her until it was a part of her that couldn’t be removed.”

“All her clothes’d fit real weird,” Sera said—a jest but her tone was hallow like she was just spent, trying to offer cheer to them that she couldn’t feel herself at the matter.

“Tonio Aclassi has had more difficult customers, I’m sure,” Marehis offered in kind, getting the barest smile from her da’assan. “Are you alright, Sera? You’re uninjured?”

“Yeah m’okay. Gonna write Lacey to um, keep her updated. And Cullen needs that stuff right? Letters n’ shit. And you wanted things sent to Leliana? I can um. I can do it,” Sera said. Oh she looked like she so very much wanted to do something to help but she’d little inclination to leave-

“I have brought the writing pish!” Cole was happy to inform them as he materialized in the tent, a stack of fresh parchment in one hand and an ink well and quill in the other, offerings he placed before Sera before he popped—disappeared and reappeared almost as quickly on the other side of the tent where Ellie’s armor and clothing lay in a pile he decidedly sorted through, picking up her overcoat and digging into the exact correct pocket that had the letters she’d collected and kept on her person for sending to Cullen later, before he popped back over to Sera and handed them to her, pressing a kiss to her forehead that sent the girl blushing before he left them.

“Cuddly’s friggin’ the cutest,” Sera complained as she set about her work…their work, since Marehis’s hands were rather occupied in warm, soapy water, and Ellie was comatose. She wrote up a report to Leliana, letting Marehis read over it herself but the girl had gotten the gist of how Marehis was required to report every last detail. Her note to Cullen on Ellie’s behalf was less expansive, she looked a little nervous about it but when she was through she said, “Um…feel right like dirt, lying to ‘im. But s’not a lie. I just said we had a rough night and Inky’s sleeping so I’m writing for her. I just…dunno,” she shrugged, looked almost like she might cry. “I know all this crap is stressin’ him out. This,” she waved the letters of evidence they found, “is supposed to make him feel better, tell him this shite’s all worth it. Telling him it got Inky hurt real bad might dump all over that, worry him even if I tell him she’s okay and I…I dunno it seems like he gets real bad migraines, ‘specialy when he’s stressed. I’m pretty sure it’d kill me if I wrote something that made him real sick.”

Cassandra sniffed, cleared her throat like she might speak but she smiled her thanks, a wavering thing but she managed it, so Marehis offered up a verbal, “Thank you, da’vehnan,” Marehis said, “Excellent work.”

Sera’s cheeks pinked at the bit of praise, though her work wasn’t quite through apparently. She began scribbling on another sheet of parchment, and when she caught Marehis’s curious gaze.

“Writing Kremmy-boy. Promised him I would if anything happened to Inky. And then Widdle cuz I wanna give her the details on the Red Lyrium shite. And then Lace, ‘cause I wrote Widdle and I feel mean not writin’ both my girlfriends!”

“Inderstandable,” Marehis supposed amusedly.

Cole returned to take up her letters to send them off and then Sera bounced a little impatiently in place as she built up the nerve to ask Marehis if her and ‘sandra thought it’d hurt Inky any if Sera bathed with her. It wasn’t like the girl was in the habit of striking violence against her sister in the tub, so Marehis assured it was fine, Cassandra nodding her agreement and the girl stripped herself and climbed in, scrubbing herself up and down, haphazardly wetting and scratching at her scalp before just sitting still and watching her sister until it was time to dry off, Sera endeavoring to call heat into her hands—she did manage it for a short moment but it didn’t last nearly long enough to dry her hair. Vivienne was sweet enough to check on them—‘the boy’ sent her she said, which was…admittedly a kinder term for Cole she’d taken to calling him—and she dried the girls’ hair, Sera made a little whine sound when Vivienne took up the Elf girl’s sleep clothes in hand before she could put them on but she giggled and thanked ‘Viv’ for it once she realized the woman was warming the clothes she was about to put on. She did the same for Ellie’s, sighing and plying a kiss to the slumbering girl’s forehead. The Iron Bull came, the clatter of buckets clinking together announced his impending arrival as he carried several in each hand full of more water for the bath, setting them down in the tents entrance before he crawled into the tent and gathered Ellie against his chest and rumbling out the invitation for Sera to ‘climb aboard’ which the girl giddily accepted.

She wrapped her arms around Cassandra’s shoulders first, startling the woman who’d been staring into space and pressing a kiss to the Seeker’s cheek, “You wash up good, kay ‘sandra? I love you lots. And Inky loves you lots. And everything’s okay, you got it? So…if um…if you have any nightmares or something, you wake me up okay?” the woman nodded but…well she’d not spoken a word since the Quarry, it was a bit of manipulation on Sera’s part but, “If…I have a nightmare, I can wake up and you’ll be there for me, right?”

Cassandra nodded again, and then, “Always, sweet girl.”

“Thanks mum,” Sera squeezed her more tightly before releasing her to climb onto the Iron Bull’s back, giggling the whole way out of the rather impressive exit, he had to support their weight on his knees, do something of a one armed pushup-hop to keep a girl in his arm and a girl on his back.

The Seeker was still rather unfocused, didn't realize the other women in the tent were busy helping one another drag the tub out into the chill to dump its contents before pushing it back into the tent to refill it with fresh water. Vivienne poured her last vial of Vehnan Root tonic into the water and then a vial of some sort of very expensive oil that smelled just divine, soothing, and Marehis had assumed she wished for as much for a bath of her own but, “Come darling,” Vivienne said, clearing her throat and putting an arm around Cassandra’s shoulders, “You should bathe,” she insisted.

They assisted her with removing her armor, the woman was stiff and exhausted from their work tonight and ultimately…distracted. Depressed, more so. She slipped into the tub and Vivienne put her hands in the water to provide more warmth and Cassandra made no move to do much in the way of bathing herself.

“Cassandra?” Marehis questioned gently, dipping her hand into the water to take the Seeker’s hand and raise it up in hers, pressing a kiss to the back of the woman’s knuckles as she squeezed her hand in reassurance.
“You did what you had to, my dear,” Vivienne ventured once more.
And Cassandra’s expression crumbled, and she sobbed, weeping into her hands as Marehis released the one she’d held so the woman could do as she needed to, it embarrassed her beyond belief to cry in front of others, to be so vulnerable. “I- I hurt-” the word squeaked from her throat.

“That thing hurt her,” Marehis corrected fiercely and it- oh, it made something in her loosen up, feel less fraught with tension, in the back of her mind she’d been…something akin to screaming. Screaming the entire time since the moment she saw Ellie in the Red Templar Shadow’s grasp. That this was all of her fault. She should have put herself before her child—gone down ahead of her, it was only sensible, the girl was prone to falling afterall. And she should have listened to her instincts! She hadn’t been being paranoid! She’d been right, something had been stalking them through the Quarry with designs on harming their Inquisitor. But…ultimately, it was that creature that hurt her, it had been wholly undetectable, Marehis would have looked insane swinging at thin air, been made a mockery before the thing as it watched her look for it without solid knowledge that it was there or how to find it. “Cassandra you did what you had to—you saved her. Ellie would be dying of agonizing Red Lyrium poisoning or becoming some horrible creature or turning into horrifying statue. I would prefer any statues of our child be not her encased in stone—but that is just a preference, maybe I’m crazy.”

“She- she is the dearest thing to my heart!”

“I understand, it makes it mortifying to have hurt her,” Vivienne offered rather gently, “…I had to lay my hands on her, burn her injuries to keep her from bleeding out. It…anguishes me, that I had to do so. I trust you will not hold the act against me.”

Cassandra’s eyes shone with tears as she stared at the Enchanter. “I am…oh I am grateful you assisted in saving Eleanor, I could not be more so,” she assured.

“I feel likewise with your own acts tonight,” Vivienne returned. “I’m certain I’m not alone.”

Cassandra sniffled, nodding. “What if…what if when she wakes she fears me? I- oh Maker I could not bear it.”

“Cassandra,” Marehis breathed, “oh lethallan. Ellie loves you, knows you love her—that you would never do anything to harm her for malice sake. If she experiences a period of unease, it will be through no fault of yours—she trusts you, and more importantly she has faith in you, she will work through it, if she’s a need to rebuild her trust, you need only be patient.”

“What do I tell Cullen?” she wondered listlessly.

“Exactly what happened,” Vivienne supposed, “darling, he’s hardly going to renounce you. He will understand, see the necessity of your actions—he would never assume you would harm Eleanor for even a moment unless it was absolutely required for her own wellbeing. If anything he will have compassion for the trauma you’ve endured. Darling, Eleanor was not the only person tortured by your acts tonight—we know well you suffered with her. Bodies…have a tendency to heal more quickly than minds.”

Cassandra nodded after a moment, wiping at her eyes before she let out a frustrated sigh, “Oh, I do apologize I- I’m sorry. I’m rather a mess aren’t I? Thank you, Vivienne, Marehis. You are…you are excellent friends.”

“Of course we are darling, we’re fabulous.”

“Exactly,” Marehis agreed, pressing a kiss to Cassandra’s cheek, earning a soft huff of laughter though it didn’t quite put a smile on the woman’s face, she seemed…wholly embarrassed for having gotten so upset. “We are your friends, Cassandra. Who else can you be a mess with, but us? That is the entire point of friendship.”

“That sounds rather miserable,” Cassandra said, “you having to comfort me as I react a fool.”

“On the contrary we’re pleased to comfort you. And…” Marehis cleared her throat, “it is not always great sorrow we must parcel through together and comfort one another over. If…if it makes you feel better, lethallan…it is I who acted a fool tonight.”

“Marehis,” Cassandra breathed, “oh sweet woman, you cannot blame yourself—no one expects you to bend time and space itself to protect Eleanor, you did everything you possibly could, she is alive because of your level headedness.”
“Thank you but…I do not mean Ellie’s injury. It…it has nothing at all to do with her, in fact. I…” she blushed furiously, ears and cheeks blazing.

"Well come now darling, don't leave us in suspense," Vivienne insisted.

"Marehis?" Cassandra questioned, curious.

"I- I may have confessed a lingering love of Solas and-" oh something out there, strike her dead, "and allowed him to- to…pleasure me." There, she said it!

…

Vivienne’s, “Oh darling-" overlapped Cassandra’s,

“Marehis-“

Followed by matching, unified, “-we know.”

“Well,” Cassandra clarified, "perhaps not the confession of love but the latter, yes, was very er…plain.”

“It was!?” Marehis asked alarmed.

“…my dear treasure,” Vivienne soothed, reaching across the tub to brush hair behind Marehis’s ear, “…you have Solas’s handprint glowing on your ass.”

“Your hip as well I believe,” Cassandra informed her.

That was the ‘bit of staining’ Vivienne had offered her coat as cover for. Had her girls seen?!

“You should certainly bathe tonight,” Vivienne intoned, “that algae may not er…sit right if it is anywhere…delicate.”

“It isn’t!" Marehis squeaked, oh Maker! “No I- he- his hands were not involved in that way.”

“I do hope you used protection,” Vivienne said.

“…it…it wasn’t necessary,” Marehis’s face felt like fire when they looked appalled at that—some unspoken concern she’d truly lost her mind and wanted to risk becoming pregnant—it had her hurriedly assuring, “he-! It was- he…used only his um.” Oh this was absurd! “He went down on me!”

“Oh!” the women chirped in unison.

"Marehis there is no need to be embarrassed,” Cassandra soothed, “it is perfectly- I mean that is normal in any sexual partnership, is it not? Cullen does as much…er…regularly.”

“Bastien has not kept our relationship alive with peonies alone,” Vivienne assured.

…but got her more of a look from the women as they processed that.

"And his first endeavor to do so was while you're ahem, entertaining monthly company?"

Vivienne confirmed, Marehis blushing as she nodded.

“Well then…” Cassandra spoke.

“…that is growth,” Vivienne supposed.

Oh, they dissolved into giggles, the three of them, and Marehis was…well, glad her bit of embarrassment resulted in a smile on Cassandra’s face, laughter in her voice after such a horrid day.

Cassandra endeavored to question, “Are you…pursuing things with the man or was it mere…”

“Wham bam, thank you fallen Dalish god?” Vivienne offered, “As I do believe the youths are saying.”

“Oh, I informed him immediately it- that it didn’t mean anything,” Marehis groaned a bit, “but I don’t know what it means! And I can’t- I mean he- I- I would be stupid if I even considered resuming our former relationsh-“

Cassandra stopped her, “…Marehis, I do love you but I will strike you where you stand if you finish a sentence that would label Eleanor as anything less than intelligent for resuming her former relationship with Solas.”

…she certainly wouldn’t want that. To be slapped by the Seeker or to imply her child’s ignorance. “I hadn’t exactly thought of it, in those terms,” Marehis confessed, assured. But surely, “It is a different circumstance,” she argued.

“…how? In that Eleanor is more directly affected by his actions?” Cassandra returned. “It is she whose entire life is forever changed by Solas’s actions. When you’re finished with the Inquisition you walk away with the friendships and family you’ve built here—if you truly wished it you could leave the Inquisition tomorrow, go off and completely reinvent your life however you see fit. This isn't to belittle your hurt, but thus far everything you've endured? You can recover from. Eleanor will likely never have such a luxury. There will always be some consequence of her time in the Inquisition she will live with for the rest of her life. But she’s found something redeeming in him, understands his past mistakes and feels the certainty that he won’t repeat them.
Her healing isn’t yours—but if or when you find yourself with your faith in the man returned?
However you wish to proceed is your business entirely. None would judge you either way, save perhaps the Iron Bull, who will of course be very upset you continue to elude him as a sexual conquest.”

“I’m not entirely certain of my return of faith just yet, there is still hope for the Iron Bull,” Marehis supposed.

…there was an enthusiastic whoop that echoed against the mountain range, courtesy of the Qunari. “Hell yeah!”

Well. Cassandra had been mistaken—there would be a consequence of her time in the Inquisition she would have to live with for the rest of her life. Marehis’s ears were permanently red.
She had not realized—! She didn’t think anyone much was listening!

Cassandra softly cleared her throat, taking Marehis’s hand and giving it a squeeze before she offered up something to make…her embarrassment mutual.

“Cullen and myself…had sex…on a dock.” Oh, she was not used to necessarily sharing intimate details of her relationship, but she did try. “Thrice.”

“Thrice?” Marehis asked.

Oh the dear woman was blushing, head to toe almost. “One encounter but um. Multiple reinstigations.”

Vivienne looked wholly amused and mildly impressed, “Dale, Lady Seeker.”

The once beautiful, peaceful, provincial town of Sahrnia was officially a hellscape as far as Cassandra was concerned. One that tormented the Seeker even in her sleep, sent her startling awake with the bone chilling screams of her child ringing in her ears, the thankfully false image of Eleanor dead at her hand.

She was only assured the image was false because she lay alive and…alive, at her side, pale and pained. Dorian was awake, seated at Eleanor’s side—Vivienne had been keeping watch over her when Cassandra first fell asleep. Using…using her— it felt like sin to call it a ‘gift’ now. Using her ability was draining, exhausting on its own, somehow the thing that felt like it should keep her lying awake and anguished had sent her straight to sleep once she was laying with Sera and Eleanor. Dorian was calling chill into his hand which he rested on Eleanor’s brow.

“How is she?” Cassandra whispered.

“Feverish. Solas is assisting Cyril in making fresh potion for pain,” Dorian reported, apologetic as he asked, “Did I wake you?” Oh, he’d a book in his free hand, “She’s been restless, awake but not-quite…disoriented and frightened. I thought this might comfort her.”

“Thank you,” Cassandra replied. “please, continue.”

“Gladly, we were just getting to the most riveting part,” Dorian assured her, gaze dropping to the page before he resumed quietly reading, “…Macadamize,” Macadamize? “a verb, ohh,” he spoke as if he found what Cassandra was certain he considered a dull fact to be truly interesting, “of Ferelden origins—to pave by laying and compacting successive layers of broken stone, often with asphalt or hot tar. It is a respelling of inventor or this method of road building’s name…
McAdams.” Ahh. The dictionary, ever the exciting read. Eleanor did truly enjoy learning new words so she may well be entertained. Or perhaps it was the soothing timber of Dorian’s voice, even as he was wholly bored, he put as much effort into his delivery as if he were reading a great epic to the girl. “How quaint—perhaps in time you’ll have the world call the act of ‘tripping spectacularly while in the midst of important business’ ‘Trevelyaning’?” he teased her pleasantly, a warmth to his tones and something expectant like…was the man trying to goad her into waking to defend herself? To argue and kiss him on the cheek—acts that if she were capable of, would signify she was indeed on the mend. Unfortunately she did no such thing, but as he continued reading Cassandra saw why he took up the task, the girl tensed up occasionally, drifting in an out of consciousness, she could not wake enough to be aware of little else than what she was feeling which…at the moment was fever and pain, but she could hear the man’s voice, feel his hand soothing with cool from magic she was familiar with on her forehead, and be reassured that she was safe.

“You okay ‘sandra?” Sera’s voice was soft against Cassandra’s ear, the girl’s arms were wrapped around the Seeker’s waist as she curled up behind the Nevarran woman. “You have a nightmare?”

Several. It was the third that startled her to full consciousness. “No sweet girl.”

“How you feelin’?”

Like an utter waste of Human flesh. “I’m fine.”

She also felt the sharp jab of an index finger poking her in the cheek as its owner informed her, “Mumma, Cuddly’s a little dummy that don’t give a crap ‘bout snitches get stitches.”

“I like Mister Stitches, but he is Adan’s, they are very happy together, I think it would make them very sad if I got to keep him for snitching,” the boy voiced his confusion from where he lay atop the Iron Bull’s chest. “And I only want to have Maryden. We could break up, but neither of us want to if that’s okay.”

Sera snorted, “Keep your girlfriend cuddly, it’s just a figure of speech, don’t got nothing to do with Stitches…the person, anyway.” Sera held Cassandra more tightly, “No thinking bad things about yourself! Inky’s gonna be okay,” and then, “you wouldn’t like it if I thought bad things about myself.”

…no, she would be utterly horrified if she learned Sera ever considered herself a waste of flesh. It did little to cheer her but she supposed her girl had a point, “I’m sorry.”

“Don’t gotta be sorry—just be honest, kay ‘sandra? Don’t say your fine when you aren’t.”

She did not think she would be fine. Not for some time.

She hurt her child.

Grey light entered the tent the moment before Solas and Cyril returned and the Elf man administered potion to Eleanor while the Healer pulled aside the blanketing to pull up her sleep shirt enough to get to the bandaging over her injury, horrible thing, Cassandra had not been able to stomach looking at it herself, she well understood Marehis’s upset, it had been vile. There was still some measure of…of a dent in her child’s hip, raw muscle and tissue visible as her skin had not quite gotten around to repairing itself, which was likely er…good, it gave the Healer the ability to pour regenerative potion directly into rebuilding her insides—the entrance wound was nearly four inches in diameter, tapering down to half an inch where the Shadow’s sharp appendage exited her body. That it was now less of a gaping hole and looked more like the girl had been skinned was miraculous.

“Is that pish gonna hurt?” Sera worried as Cyril unstoppered regenerative potion.

“Not badly honey,” he promised, “but it’ll sting.”

“Here mum, hold Inky’s hand with me—hand sandwich!” Sera demanded, though, “ugh, sounds right nasty. Done put me off my breakfast. Still—doin’ it.”

They were. Cassandra was…nervous to put her hand on Eleanor…what if she woke? What if she didn’t want Cassandra touching her? Sera took hold of Cassandra’s hand and laid it atop Eleanor’s so it was more so Cassandra’s hand sandwiched between the girls’. Oh her girl’s sweet, small hand! It was warm from either sleep or fever, and so little for someone who carried so much responsibility.

Eleanor stirred, gasping around a strangled, pained sound, whimpering as Cyril worked, but he was blessedly swift, replacing her bandaging with fresh. “I got ointment cooling out there—it’ll keep that disinfected and really help her skin with its come-back. Exit wound is good, checked it an hour ago and it’s healed well. Keep her from rolling onto her side or her stomach, let her rest up—nothing strenuous for a few days at the minimum—takes a lot to heal up and she’s gonna need to uh, basically recover from her recovery. Little worried about her fever—Renee’s supposed to be reporting in day after tomorrow, Maker willing—I’ll be returning with the villagers, but you get worried, something doesn’t seem right? Send for me. Once I’ve handed the reigns over in Sahnia I’ll be back for good. Won’t set out for a few more hours yet though,” he assured.

“Thank you, Cyril. Truly,” Cassandra said. Maker bless this man a thousand times for this girl’s life.

“Glad to help,” he replied, “Spymaster wrote, Requisitions Officer told me to pass along the message to you or Marehis,” he held up a bit of sealed parchment, “Early, I know, but I figured it’s a priority.”

Cassandra gently squeezed Eleanor’s hand before releasing it, patting the arm of Sera’s that was caught up under Cassandra’s body before she sat up and accepted the missive, “I’ll see to it.”

She would. Leliana had agents inbound to apprehend Mistress Poulin and transport her to Skyhold to await trial. They would make contact when they hit the infiltration camp and await the Inquisitor’s arrest…or a representative of the Inquisitor. Someone had to do it, they would either have to wait for Eleanor—Out of the question. With her victims freed, Mistress Poulin would surely flee an impending revolt. It needed handled sooner than Eleanor would be capable of doing so and…well, that suited. It was already difficult enough that Mistress Poulin could do this to her people, sell them to Red Templars to be tortured and anguished until their bitter end to be made into the horrible substance cursing the rest of her people to eternal winter, that such a situation existed was one thing, that Eleanor’s sweet heart was subject to it. Unacceptable. Cassandra would deal with Mistress Poulin herself. She…She would take on any horrible task her child would put herself through to settle their affairs in Emprise du Lion. This place had beaten the girl down—every single day of their time here had resulted in Eleanor working herself to utter exhaustion, unconsciousness. And now it had put her down for days. If not weeks! She would not work in it further, she would not rise to another day that would end in her beaten, bleeding, bruised until she was left at the mercy of her allies to keep her of this world. The next time Eleanor so much as set foot outside of their camp, it would be to go-

Home, was the word Cassandra wanted. But it was not likely to be. Cassandra was not one often to use foul language. But fuck Corypheus.

Eleanor would not do a single thing besides resting and recovering until they had to move on to some other damnable place! And that was final!

Cassandra would handle it!…and she would not handle it alone. She had the Iron Bull, Dorian Pavus, Thom Rainier, Madam Vivienne de Fer, Cole, Marehis, her Sera, a fallen Dalish god…

“Where the fuck is my kid?!” a shout echoed up from the path below their camp.

And one, Varric Tethras.

Cyril’s eyes widened and Cassandra nodded when he pointed over his shoulder that yes, he should go intercept the Dwarf as he arrived in camp before he terrorized the literal villagers or caused such a din that it disturbed Eleanor.

It was sunrise, and they’d a busy day ahead, so. Cassandra rose up and armored herself, Sera dressed but resumed laying alongside her sister, Marehis rolling over in her sleep to wrap her arms around the younger Elf to hold her closely.

“…what do you mean she’s-?!” Varric was…road haggard, Maker, his eyes appeared brusied from lack of sleep and it appeared his face repelled razors…though his hair had perhaps taken razors ransom—his hair was cropped closely to his head which was a startling change in the Dwarf’s appearance. It was his voice, Bianca, and his ever voluminous chest hair, exposed even in Sahrnia’s cursed cold, that confirmed it was Varric Tethras and not some other rude, rowdy Dwarf infiltrating their camp. He stopped arguing at Cyril as Cassandra emerged from the tent and breathed a sigh of relief, “Oh holy shit. Thank the Maker’s balls, Seeker, you’re alive!”

… “Of course I am alive, Varric. What nonsense are you on?”

“Shit I- kid wrote and said you were hurt!” Oh. She had been, yes. “Tall kid—not spirit kid or short stuff.” Sera was to thank for his intrusion? “You popped a fucking lung or something? Figured Ellie’d be a wreck over it and you assholes would need a little more fire power and- and it scared the hell out of me!” He…was hugging her now. It wasn’t as though the man had never done as much, but still, it was always a bizarre occurrence. “Don’t fucking do that!” Scare him, or collapse a lung again? She sincerely would endeavor to avoid the latter in future.

…“…you came from the Western Approach…because you heard I was injured?”

“Lungs are a vital damn organ! I thought you’d be down for the count, how the hell are you even on your feet? If this is some bullshit prank of Sera’s…I’ll have to give Buttercup a hug because fuck—Tumbles is hurt??!”

“It was no prank on Sera’s part…but I am not displeased you are here,” Cassandra supposed. “I’m jonesing here Seeker, I haven’t seen Tumbles in weeks—I came all this way expecting a hug from the kid when I got here—what the hell happened that stole my damn hug fix?”

“Eleanor was injured last night when we took back the quarry from the Red Templars. We…” had she developed some allergy to truth? She felt like her throat closed over when she made to speak of last night.

“Fill me in,” Varric inturrupted her—speaking with as much brashness as if he were truly interrupting her and not merely picking up where she’d lost her voice. He walked up to her, taking her arm in his like he was demanding she escort him and…he was. “Give me the grand tour, the hell we have a ramp for? I just came up that bitch of a hill, now I gotta go down? That tower’s cool as shit though.”

His…barrage of questions and comments gave her a moment to clear her throat, swallow the lump that had settled there, collect herself. He’d no true interest in the ins and outs of their camp, and he would see them as they walked—to the ramp he complained of—and down as she informed him of their mission. Freeing the villagers, what they discovered about Red Lyrium, their leads on Samson, Mistress Poulin’s betrayal…the Shadow that stalked Eleanor and ultimately took a piece of her down with him.

“Appendixes are just as useless in bodies as they are in books huh?”

“Books’ appendixes are important,” Cassandra argued. “Bullshit,” Varric refuted, “They’re the table of contents and the actual contents ugly bastard child.”

Ugh. This Dwarf was one of her dearest friends, wasn’t he? Awful. His argument made her smile. She didn’t deserve to smile.

“I had to burn Red Lyrium from Eleanor’s blood.”

Varric stopped as they drew near the stone archway that marked the edge of their camp, still and silent as he stared up at her, absolutely horrified. Oh, bless him—he would condemn her surely, he would condemn anyone who harmed Eleanor-

“Shit…Cassandra, fuck,” he hissed, appalled. His hand was on her forearm then, was he… trying to squeeze her harshly or something? It didn’t feel like reproach but- “I’m…I’m sorry. That had to be rough. You holding up okay? Don’t…be too hard on yourself. Don’t be hard on yourself at all, hell—you saved her. If she had that crap in her blood?” he shuddered, “She wake up yet? Is she…damn, that stuff could send her off the deep end. You got it out right away right?”

“…as soon as we realized it was present in her blood and we deliberated on how best to rid her of it, yes. I acted without further question.” It had been urgent, but what person so quickly gave way to harming their child?

Varric…breathed a sigh of relief. “Good. That shit’s no joke Bartrand…dude can’t even piss by himself, the guys so assbackwards. Red Lyrium might not be in him anymore but sickness warped his brain uh… permanently.”
That…oh she felt badly for him, compassion. She knew they had not be necessarily close before sickness set in, but still, a brother was a brother and Varric felt responsible for him, for his downfall. And too…it was a small tick toward not feeling quite so harshly about herself, she did see the necessity for her actions. She just hated her actions and she felt- surely there must be some punishment. One did not get to just- hurt Eleanor, torture her, and walk away without so much as a slap on the wrist. Sera was vicious in her protection of Eleanor, she thought surely the girl would despise her from the moment she heard her sister’s screams until the day Cassandra last drew breath, but no. She’d just called her mama, made sure she was alright after everything. Vivienne never passed up the opportunity to have what Varric and the Iron Bull termed ‘a bitch off’ with the Seeker she liked to dislike, and yet no, their frenemy relationship extended itself in the fullness of friendship when Cassandra was down. Marehis- the woman had once wished to come to blows when Cassandra was down. Marehis- the woman had once wished to come to blows over Cassandra merely frightening her over the possibility that Eleanor had been brought to harm under Marehis’s care that day in Haven after they returned from their first adventure to the Hinterlands and Cassandra unthinkingly dismissed Eleanor’s night watch, left Marehis to discover her wards homestead seemingly unguarded and running every horrible scenario of what could possibly have befallen her through the poor woman’s mind. And yet the most horrific scenario Cassandra could ever imagine happening by her own hand hadn’t so much as earned her a biting remark from the fierce Elf woman.

Someone…someone had to punish her! Corypheus would die for all he had done to the world and Eleanor, Solas was exiled to the Hinterlands indefinitely! The man who threw a goat at Skyhold’s walls had gotten off more harshly than she was! This was utterly ridiculous! Someone needed to- to beat her or banish her or- or something!

And it could not be Cullen! Oh she was so ashamed, how could she possibly tell him what she’d done? She could not imagine…he loved Eleanor most out of anything in this world. She was his daughter, his baby girl he had called her on more than one occasion! He would not possibly be able to stand even looking at Cassandra once he knew what she had done. And never had such a possibility—of someone she was pursuing romantically throwing her over—devastated her more in all her life. It was foolishness, utter nonsense, but she felt most certain if she woke to a day Cullen no longer cared for her in? Hated and despised her? She would surely die. Oh she would live! But she would be miserable doing it! She used to balk when she heard insipid people lamenting about the one that got away, it was an entirely ridiculous notion—the world was full of people, they found someone once, surely they would find someone of equal or higher caliber again, honestly. Now she was most certain if such a thing befell her, she would indeed regret the things that made Cullen Stanton Rutherford the one that got away, for the remainder of her days.

No one she would be relieved to find condemnation from was willing to do so. She would find it from within.

She returned to camp and saw to it breakfast was underway, that the villagers Eleanor so cared for were taken care of. and…Sera, made certain- ugh. She shoved a bowl of oatmeal into Cassandra’s hand, holding her own before her, spoon raised, gaze meeting the Seeker’s as if to dare her not to eat—because Sera would take nary a bite that Cassandra didn’t take herself and…oh, the last thing she would do was starve this girl. So. She consumed a bowl of oatmeal, Sera matching her bite for bite and then she doled a kiss to the girl’s temple, and intoned Sera was to eat her fill. She’d more to do before they left camp—she recalled that one in their midst was, in fact, a murderer, had confessed his crimes in writing, to be found upon his death. Cole did not have need of food so once the villagers, Eleanor’s party were up and eating, Cassandra called the Spirit aside and had him verify with her just which one of these people was ‘Louis’ and what Eleanor had thought to do about his crimes. Cassandra…well what he’d done was unforgivable—he murdered this Linette’s brother, Cassandra would…she did not hate mages as a whole any longer, but she would always hate the mage in particular who took her brother’s life. But, he’d done so in self-defense, this woman’s brother had been behaving dishonorably, been caught at it, and moved to murder the man his sister loved for fear of being turned in for his crimes, Louis defended himself…killed his brother-in-law on accident according to the letter. And…he’d no reason to lie in a letter of confession, the entire point was to get the burden of truth off of ones chest. Cole confirmed that the man remembered that night that way, that he only meant to stop his brother-in-law not lay him slain. But this was something that hurt the man—burned in his belly and carved torment to his mind every day he lived that his wife loved him unconditionally I don’t deserve her love, his note had said.

“I want to help him. Ellie does too. She believes…just walking up to this woman and say ‘Louis killed Garde’ would be ‘fucked up’*,” Cole informed Cassandra on Eleanor’s behalf. “But showing her his note of confession—letting him explain his guilt to her? Yeah, she might never want to see him again, in fact she might even decide that at first. But eventually…hurts heal. If she loves him…she knew her brother, knew his hurts and how far he’d fallen. She will be…not glad that he is dead, but glad that Louis isn’t. They can work from there—she will know the truth, and he will be free from it.”

“You feel confident in moving forward as Eleanor wishes?” Cassandra questioned and Cole nodded eagerly.

“Yes. I can do it! I can return Louis and his truth to his wife. I will be safe. He won’t harm me—violence doesn’t live in him.”

“Then proceed as you will.”

Cole nodded, staring at her a moment more, “His wife will understand. And he will feel so much better once the truth is known,” and his gaze felt assessing before he sighed as if disappointed in himself, “it didn’t work,” he murmured albeit miserably, and then he vanished, confession in hand.

Thom, Dorian, the Iron Bull, and Vivienne were prepared to leave with Cassandra, help her lead the villagers back to Sahria. Sera as well—she was insistent upon helping ‘Inky’, if the Inquisitor couldn’t be conscious for her work today, Sera would go in her stead to verify with her own eyes that everything Eleanor could possibly want done got done, exactly as she thought her sister would do it—as breakfast wound down with the villagers, she went to every single person and asked their name, laying hands on them for comfort, asking if they’d need of anything, if they were getting enough to eat. She prayed with those who asked for as much, readily agreeing with such enthusiasm Cassandra was momentarily suspicious that…well she’d never considered such a thing to be possible, but perhaps through the Fade, Eleanor was capable of possessing Sera’s body—the true Sera at play in the Fade while Eleanor set about her day in the physical form of her older sister while her own body lay healing.

All suspicion of that cleared, however, upon,

“Er, dear Maker—whussup? Everything’s pretty shite here, thanks for that. Uhh, I mean it could be worse? So…thanks for letting it not be worse. Sorry—should I start over? Blah! Thanks for uh, keeping these people alive, guarding them in your hand or whatever and helping us get them out alive. Please keep…doing your thing while we take them back to their loved ones.”

Oh the girl was trying. She’d not been one for prayer before her time in the Inquisition, she’d a…waving faith in her Maker—how could she not? She’d been raised Andrasten by the likes of Lady Emmauld, that was hardly going to imbue her in unshakable faith in a Maker of mercy when she was in the hands of a woman who likely knew no end of mercy in her own life and couldn’t be damned to demonstrate it herself toward the tender child she took into her so-called care. Most of her religious practice now came from merely wishing to spend time with her sister rather than the Maker Eleanor worshiped—she enjoyed sitting in silent prayer or listening to Eleanor do as much aloud or reading the Chant and discussing it and Eleanor…well, a great many of her take-aways from the Chant would be seen as blasphemous by the Chantry but…she always spoke her truth, and delivered it forthrightly, no hidden agenda, just eagerness to understand their Maker. Cassandra was inclined to take on the interpretations Eleanor found in their Chant, it made her wonder how truly corrupted their religion had come to be through the machinations of those the Chantry put into power—if Andraste herself appeared before todays Chantry they would lock her away for her blaspheme, and blindly follow Corypheus’s tricks to the end of the world. That was a separate matter—Sera’d no designs on being a Sister other than the one she was to Eleanor, so…her attempts were precious and appreciated, and thankfully left the villagers with no insult—they saw an Elf extending herself to pray within the bounds of their religion and took it as the kindness that it was.

Solas still looked rather done in from his…near-spiritual experience—too he’d only a few hours rest under his belt. Red Lyrium came to be in places the veil was thinned, and as it thrived it thinned the Veil further still. In the midst of a quarry full of the stuff? Solas had…it was akin to stepping into the Fade in physical form, and he momentarily had access to both the power he held in the physical realm, and that which he had in the Fade—alone they were nothing astoundingly impressive, but the power combined? Doubled? The man was lucky he was still of this world, he summed the experience to his every cell surging with power that could have rendered him a pile of ash if he’d not immediately processed that power and sent it subjecting another to that fate. It left his magic depleted, his body exhausted, so. He would stay in camp and rest, be there to monitor Eleanor while her party was gone. And Marehis was staying—to watch over her child! Oh, she needn’t be so shy and embarrassed—no one…er…assumed she was staying for any other reason. Eleanor was ill, and with their Mages leaving, the one that was staying sleeping, she would be keeping Eleanor’s fever in check ‘the old fashion way’. Which was the way everyone who did not have immediate access to Mages did it, Cassandra supposed. Marehis was hardly going to go on a sexual bender with the girl’s recovering ‘papi’ while she lay comatose a few cots away.

Let alone in the presence of Varric Tethras. Varric declared he wasn’t leaving ‘Tumbles’ unless it was for Red Lyrium—to either destroy the stuff, or its makers in the Red Templars. That suited as…well, the man was exhausted, would do little service to them in the field, but he could guard camp well, rise and defend Eleanor if she needed it, be of comfort to her if she woke—she would be heartened to see him, she’d truly missed the Dwarf, worried for he and Hawke and Stroud while they worked in the Western Approach.

…they’d truly worked. When Cassandra informed Varric their members were leaving to escort the villagers and make arrest of Sahrnia’s leader, he pitched a low whistle, shaking his head as he informed her,

“Damn. Skyhold prison’s filling right on up. We uh, caught up with this Venatori bastard, Crassius Servis* some asshole that worked with Corypheus and uh, screwed him over. Stole a bunch of his shit and sold it—artifacts or something. He was in charge of mining operations in the Western Approach, fucked a bunch of stuff up—unleashed Darkspawn on the Western Approach, hired raiders that killed this Orlesian Dragon scientist guy’s people, stole his research and then botched their own attempts at hunting the dragon there. We uh…saved it for you, pretty lady—goddess of Dragon hunting,” when she stared at him for a moment he admitted, “we tried, shit my pants, it was a whole thing.” He sighed, “He’s a real slimeball, will do anything for coin—not into the Venatori indoctrination, Corypheus just dangled a money bag in his face and he went along for the ride, he was writing a ‘candidate for the vacancy’ letter when we found him if you can believe that, trying to get another mining job quote ‘as far away from the Inquisition as possible’.”

“How unfortunate he finds himself housed in our dungeons now then,” Cassandra supposed. Ugh. Wretched sounding man. She was grateful he’d been apprehended, that was one less threat to Eleanor she would have to take on when she got to the Western Approach. “Thank you Varric. Eleanor will be grateful when she hears.”

“…yeah, she’ll probably thank me in person, but she’s already read all about it. Wasn’t exactly flying blind out there—been reporting direct to her and waiting on her word…she hasn’t shared me and Hawkes letters?” he wondered.

Eleanor…usually sent a great deal of letters when they traveled now that she’d the ability to read and write for herself. But Cassandra had noticed an uptick of sorts—she’d been worried perhaps Krem was struggling and Eleanor was writing to him more but…no. He’d written Cassandra herself when she reached out for confirmation he was well, assuring her his appointment had gone pleasantly, exuberant with his relief and gratitude that his father had made a surprise appearance to support him. So, the rise in Eleanor’s mail was apparently from Varric—reports of his time in the Western Approach, that sent her writing him back with advice or orders from the Inquisitor to aid in his works, and she submitted all of his reports to Skyhold for him so Leliana could do whatever she saw fit with the information—send more troops to the Western Approach or resources or add new information to her intelligence.

So, before Cassandra led the way from camp, she sent out a message to Leliana—a formal request for copies of reports on the Western Approach so she herself could be well informed before they journeyed there. And then she pressed on for Sahrnia.

Sera was very quiet as they walked the path…though she was very- she walked right alongside Cassandra, brushing against the woman and corralling her almost it…she wasn’t sure what was happening but the girl was very determined to keep a wide berth between herself and the right edge of the path, her right hand curved at her side like she were holding something.

“Is everything alright, Sera?” Cassandra questioned. She was behaving rather strangely. And Sera was her beautifully strange child.

“Uh-huh,” Sera said. Cassandra detected no lie to the affirmation.

“Is…something wrong with the righthand portion of the path?”

“Nah,” Sera said, “Just leaving room for Inky.”

That…well. That was a um…oh it was an entirely precious sentiment that lodged a lump in Cassandra’s throat. The girl was leaving room for her sister who couldn’t join them—how did her girls think of such things? They’d such a love of one another, it was just…wonderful. Cassandra prayed her girls’ relationship remained as such the whole of their precious lives.

She wanted to write Cullen of it—he would find it incredibly adorable.

His wife will understand. And he will feel so much better once the truth is known.

Ugh. Damnable Spirit. Dear child. He was kind. And…wise. Who would not be if they were a Spirit of Compassion who had seen every cause of hurt and its healing for who knows how long? …she would write Cullen when she returned to camp.

The happy gasp that sounded in her mind was startling but she was glad of the interruption in her heart’s regularly scheduled rhythm, that it was due to Cole’s enthusiastic and private, It did work! I did it right! Where was he? I am holding Louis’s hand. He is very scared—it will be alright. I can hear his wife’s hurt for him from here, she doesn’t know yet that he is alive. She will forgive him. Sometimes forgiveness takes time and that is okay.

The town was still in shambles as far as their buildings went, but it was…fuller—there were tents now, Inquisition tents offering shelter to the towns people. There had just been two, but their soldiers and scouts were just finishing erecting more tents to house their incoming populace. It was…it was heartening to see loved ones reunited, Cassandra admittedly ached that Eleanor had borne all the burden and consequences of rescuing the villagers and precious little of the rewards. She would be delighted when she woke and heard of their safe return but she deserved to see it with her own eyes, the overwhelming excitement and joy and relief Sahrnia came to life with as all were reunited. Cole had vanished from sight, but she supposed he was somewhere monitoring Louis’s reunion with his wife, oh the woman held him so tightly, weeping into his neck her relief that he was alive.

Leliana’s agents were awaiting them as promised, coming directly to Cassandra as she made her way to Mistress Poulin’s area of operations. It was…a surprisingly clean effort. She’d half-expected the woman to run, but there was something in her expression as Cassandra approached with Inquisition scouts on either side of her, that spoke to her acceptance of the realization she had been caught—she’d heard the reunion between people she stolen from with the people she sold. When Cassandra voiced that she was being placed under arrest by the Inquisition, on behalf of their Inquisitor, she went without question, save for the few citizens voicing their confusion before their returned loved ones solemnly informed them of her crime, and her arrest whiplashed from indignation on behalf of the leader they trusted, to resentment and betrayal as their bewildered stares turned to glares on Mistress Poulin.

“Oh,” Sera said to herself, taking a deep breath and sighing as Cassandra joined her.
“You okay ’sandra? Thanks for handling that for Inky.”

“Of course,” Cassandra nodded. “Are you well?” she checked…worried. The girl had only just begun to get over her cold, she looked peaked.

“M’okay, just sucks being out of range, you know?”

“Oh,” Cassandra breathed, “I- I didn’t realize,” she should have, Saharia was several miles from their Tower Camp! “The villagers are well at hand, we’ve no further business here unless you…would it hearten you to see Miss Lace?”

“Well yeah,” Sera smiled, offered a bit of a laugh, “but uh, Lacey isn’t here—in town or either of the Saharia camps. Sweet’s got her scouting pish so we can prep to help with whats-his-nuts. Uhh…Mikey, with his demon huntin’ mission.”

…”Michael?” Cassandra verified, and Sera nodded. Oh. She hadn’t realized- Eleanor hadn’t discussed the matter with her! She’d…promised the man he would be aided in his quest, it wasn’t as if Cassandra hadn’t expected something to come of that, but Eleanor had yet to bring it up after their initial meeting.

“Yeah, Inky’s been been writing him since we got here. Michael and Lacey and that Berand bloke—”

“Lord Berand?”

“Yeah—he and his men helped out in the Emerald Graves a bit before you lot showed up, Cullen had them running protection on the transport taking more of those Shard things we’ve found all around to the Oasis. They was headed to Skyhold but uh…dunno,” Sera shrugged. “I guess Inky knew Berand would be passin’ by Emprise du Lion on their way back from the Oasis and wrote him to see if he and his crew would take a detour to meet us here to back Michael up to take down Ishishpish—she had a letter from him this morning confirming they’re headed our way,” Sera snorted, “My Lady Inquisitor blah, dunno how Inky stands that shite.”

Ugh. Eleanor had truly written him? Oh, Cassandra supposed that was unfair. It was hardly the man’s fault his parents had once upon a time bombarded an already overwhelmed Eleanor with a horrendous marriage proposal—in the midst of the havoc of Thom Rainier’s reveal and her first ever moves in Orlais’ Game, they had made the poor girl tremble with the fear the Inquisition was about to marry her off to some strange man she didn’t know! She’d been quietly, hands clutching together in a move that in retrospect Cassandra realized was her need to have a hand held, she’d merely not felt Cassandra would be at ease doing so in the middle of an important meeting at the time, she’d been shaking and his Lady mother noticed and squealed ‘Oh yes, isn’t it exciting?!’ Eleanor had been terrified! Met the woman’s eye and politely refuted, “Sorry, just cold. I’ve got nothing against your son, but I have absolutely no interest in marriage to anyone right now.” The woman laughed it off—that all children say that, as if it were a ridiculous thing for children to say! The whole conversation had been nothing short of deplorable and Cassandra…admittedly still wished to formally duel the noble couple, when she was reminded of it, her anger felt fresh. But… it had not been their son’s fault—he’d warned Cullen of their designs as soon as he realized what his parents were up to, assured he’d not put the thought in their minds, they’d merely heard the Herald of Andraste was a young, unwed girl and saw one last shot at a summer wedding while their son still mourned the woman he’d originally planned to marry that summer! He’d proper knowledge that Eleanor was just a girl, a child that stood on a chair to shake his hand when he agreed that he and his mercenary crew would join Cullen’s forces. And he’d been nothing short of a reliable ally ever since, so…she really should not look at him in the same proverbial light as his parents. Horrible people!

There was a hand waving before her face to get her attention. Oh. Her Sera, “’sandra, you uh…gotta go number two real bad or are you just thinkin’?”

“Sera!” Cassandra- she was reprimanding! She was! It just…came out, wrapped in a bit of laughter because- oh, this was something she simply adored about Sera now, wasn’t it? To think she once found her crudeness unbearable. “Whatever am I to do with you my sweet girl?”

“Scritch the back of my head, would ya? Right itchy and your nails is longer.”

Ahh. Well, she had asked.
She did as Sera requested, walking with her to join the others as their party gathered in the midst of Sahrnia, save for, “Cole, bud—you comin’?” The Iron Bull asked.
“Mistress Poulin has left so much hurt…” the Spirit looked conflicted, and then he looked to Sera who offered him an assuring nod. “I will stay and help—I will come back. Send for me if you need me before I do that.”
“You got it!” Sera encouraged, squeezing Cassandra’s hand as she raised the other to offer Sahrnia a wave goodbye, and they began the return to camp.
They were nearing the Red Lyrium cavern when Sera let out a frustrated sound, “Freaking! They know we didn’t just swoop in and steal their in-charge person and now they’re on their own, right?! They can come to us and shite, and- and we’ll help if they need it, gettin’ someone else in charge or—“
“They know well the Inquisition is here to assist them, Sera,” Cassandra assured when it seemed the girl was about to go off on a breath-thieving tangent that was best to calm as soon as it started, “Everything was well at hand.”
“Inky’d make sure they knew! She’d freaking organize their election or something or-dunno. Something,” Sera sighed, exasperated.
“Imekari,” the Iron Bull intoned, reaching out to rest a hand on the back of Sera’s neck and shoulder, massaging gently, “Don’t gotta do things the way Boss-girl would. You’re your own kind of boss…girl,” he chuckled when she snorted at that. “She’d be real proud of everything we’ve done today, so don’t sweat it, alright? You did good babe.”
Sera sighed, reaching up with her free hand to take hold of his finger, “Thanks.”
“You keepin’ my hand Ser’?”
“Hand’s warm! And I friggin forgot my scarf,” Sera complained, letting out something like a whine, “Inky always bundles me up good before we leave camp!”...Sera was always mindful to bundle Eleanor likewise, they’d a ritual of putting each other’s hats on one another’s heads, wrapping their scarves for each other before high-fiving and if they heard the slap of skin to skin contact, that was what reminded them to put on their gloves. “I’m a freeze my tits right off if she don’t come ‘round soon!”
“Camp will be warm,” Cassandra said, “and you can rest with Eleanor, I’m certain it would hearten her to have you near—that can only aid in her recovery.”
Sera hummed contentedly. “Sounds good but um…you need help or anything, lemme know, alright?” Sera intoned.
Cassandra squeezed the slender hand in her own. "Certainly, sweet girl."

Chapter End Notes

Dalish:
Lasa nuvenin?=Do you give voice to this want? (Consent is key!)
Ir Fen’Harel—ma halam/Ma emma harel, bellanaris din’an heem!=I am Fen’Harel—and you are finished! You should fear me, I will make you dead!

*All labias are normal labias!
*Elmridge is a Ferelden town northwest of Skyhold, nearish to Orzammar and the border to Orlais. It can be dangerous territory due to Avvar activity, but passable since apparently the town survives on travelers and trade.
*Like any information I touch on about Transitioning in this fic, it is based off of modern studies because I’ve got modern day readers and a few of them might just be Trans, and I’m not about putting out harmful/outdated information when it comes to something that could truly affect or disrespect a reader's real life situation.

Be gentle with yourselves! Transitioning is beautiful, liberating, and challenging. Sometimes getting closer to obtaining your ideal self can leave you feeling that much more defeated when dysphoric feelings crop up, I wanted to touch on that to say—that sucks, and being upset about it is perfectly normal! You're not wrong if you ever feel that way, feelings are always valid! Any kind of dip in progress can feel defeating the closer you are to any goal it hits harder when your goal is in sight and one more thing gets in the way—with transitioning the dips might be felt exceptionally more harshly because you're achieving your goal by doing things that are affecting your hormonal balance and that's where we get our body's emotional feelings from my loves, so that combination of your body's feelings and your personal thoughts and feelings are likely to exacerbate each other. Too, sometimes transitioning can bring unexpected changes. Some people experience a change in general personality (a lot of this can be due to finally being able to live as their true self, mind, but some of it can come from the fact that you're rewriting a great deal of your chemical makeup which will have several affects on your brain) some people experience a changes in things from their taste in food, to their taste in people. Sexual preference changing post-transition isn't uncommon. I wanted to elaborate on this point, I do it a little already in Sera sharing Ellie's perspective but I want to make this perfectly clear—you deserve to love yourself. You deserve to be who you truly are and if you need to transition in any amount from some transitionary process to a full medical Transition in order to do that? You deserve to. Yes, it is scary, and I can understand a partner being scared of losing their relationship BUT if someone truly loves you—that's a fear they will be willing to face for/with you. You are so much more important than any one relationship, and you are so deserving of living content and whole and at peace with yourself above all else. Thank you for coming to my TED talk.

Red Lyrium Behemoths have a weakness to Ice magic!

When you look at earlier gamefiles inside Dragon Age Inquisition, Vivienne is referred to as "Odette" implying that in early game development, that was her original name. This is a homage to that, putting it into her backstory as "maybe before making a name for herself in her Circle she was Odette LastName" because I misunderstood the name 'de Fer' (which actually translates into "of Iron") for its homonym "Faire" which means 'to make' which made me think perhaps "de Fer" along with Vivienne being a French (Orlesian) name and not Spanish/Rivani like her origins, got me thinking to begin with that she might have changed her name post-magic awakening. So, she and Sera might have a bit more in common than canon Vivienne would care to admit. Thank you Isilzha for catching my mistake and teaching me the word 'Faire'!

*Cole can be quoted in game saying that Sera is great at singing but hates it, bad at dancing but loves it.

*I'm always Full Lost every time I'm in Sahhrnia Quarry. I just am. The Map is Zero Help and the Maker cannot hear me there.

*Another instance where going both Mage/Templar routs makes the paths conjoin, both canon letters are mentioned as well as Calpernia and Samson competing for a shot at 'Vessel'.

*The 'materials' are people. Red Lryium can be seen growing out of people several times in game, and I think that's why there is so much of it in Emprise du Lion—bodies!

The game implies you don't give Louis's wife his confession note if you choose to tell her. Inquisitor just walks up, says "Louis killed Garde" and then walks away like they didn't just drop a Red Lyrium Behemoth on someone's life. The secret hanging over his head is likely killing pour Louis if you go the other way. So, fic-fix.

*Cassius Servis is captured in the WA and can be judged or left to die. I sometimes forget to tackle his mission its so to the side so I figured there might be others who are like "new playthrough, who dis?"
Here Lies the Abyss: The Western Approach

Chapter Summary

Wrapping up Here Lies the Abyss! Finishing up our time in Emprise Du Lion before tackling the Shrine of Dumat, Western Approach, Adamant Fortress...and the Fade! Fun interdimensional travel!

Chapter Notes

Hi all! I'm alive! Buckle in!
I own nothing! I'm not even wearing socks at this point! Any dialog from the game belongs to the brilliant minds at BioWare and Frostbite!
This chapter is brought to you by the letter L. For long. And lesbian. Even though there isn't a great deal of lesbian content in this chapter, save for the existence of our lovely Sera! Anyway, onward!
There are 8 Soft breaks! 2 Scene breaks! So 10 breaks total!
Something to note that didn't make it into the End notes: I am aware that everyone has responses to what Nightmare says to them in the Fade BUT I have no such fantastical memory and the only written quotes I could find were Nightmare's dialog. Having Ellie respond is both therapeutic for the child AND serves a plot point coming at you in the next chapter!
Also here are the first two End Notes because Character Limitations:
*according to codex things on repairing Judicial's Crossing, Lady Josie does receive like dozens of letters daily demanding the Inquisition restore Judicial's Crossing because Orlesian Nobles are cheap cry babies.
*All the missions mentioned are canon missions for the Western Approach, this is a way of expediting in a way that makes sense and allows me to be lazy in a way that I hope doesn't wholly disservice ya'll!
I love you! You look amazing today! And I hope you're having the actual best day!

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Their return to camp was made without incident, and Cassandra released hold of the girl’s hand as they neared the tent, Sera stopping in its entrance to look back at the Seeker. “You comin’, ‘sandra?” she wondered. “You can come sit with us—lots of work you can do in the tent.”

There was, she supposed. Eleanor had made example of working from their tent, it was where she did a great deal of her reading, writing, she’d taken to seating herself in her cot with parchment all around her that she hunched over, using the hard back of a tome or a spare clipboard to give herself a surface to write on—she did so, so much Cassandra considered putting in a request that another desk be put into place wherever the Inquisitor made camp, if only to spare her spine.

Cassandra’s own spine didn’t need such mercy but she…she’d still some lingering fear, that Eleanor would wake and find herself scared and confused and taking in sight of the Seeker might…well it certainly couldn’t be a comfort, she didn’t think, and may well only frighten her worse. So she offered a bland, noncommittal sound to Sera, only entering the tent to lay eyes on Eleanor and confirm with Marehis she was well.

“She stirred while you were gone, was distressed and confused but I got her to calm down, I don’t know if she much understood me, but I told her where she was, that everyone was safe and you were returning the villagers to Sahnrnia and she fell back to sleep.”

Sera groaned, “Inky was scared? Poor sweets.”

“She will be alright da’vehn,” Marehis soothed, “I dosed her with potion Cyril left for her, as instructed, and I believe her fever’s broken.”

“Oh shite!” Sera screeched as if alarmed at the prospect and then she looked to Cassandra for that point of guidance, “Wait, oh. Broke sounds bad but that just means it’s gone right?” and when the Seeker nodded, “Whoo!”

“I am glad as well,” Cassandra quietly offered. “I’ve work to see to. Call on me if you’ve need,” she said, before she left the tent and went to the Requisitions table to see if there’d been any progress on getting the reports she’d asked for—no such luck, there was only an unsealed envelope with Tio Thom written in Eleanor’s hand which was curious but nothing that concerned her, he would see it she was sure. The only thing for Cassandra was confirmation that Leliana had an agent working on compiling what she’d requested but cautioned it was quite a lot to parcel through. Emergencies are reported as soon as possible, but Marehis’s regular reports on the Inquisitor are due at end of day. Could I trouble you for an update before then? …ahh. Her way of checking on Eleanor without outright saying she feared for the girl.

So. Cassandra sat down at the Requisitions table and wrote up a reply—that Eleanor was healing and no longer fevered, she’d yet to wake but Cassandra would make certain Leliana was made aware when that happened.

And then she took up the task of writing Cullen. It took—she felt badly how much parchment she laid waste to as she scrapped draft after draft, but it was even more difficult to put to paper than she had anticipated and she’d…anticipated it to be an excruciating experience. She’d thought her record of the destruction of the Seekers at Caer Oswin would be the most difficult thing she would have to put to paper. But she’d had such sweet encouragement, youthful wisdom guiding her as she dealt with putting down everything that had transpired and looking through Order’s tome of secrets. Krem’s advice had been remarkably useful, their training session before his date with Eleanor had been more a benefit for Cassandra than Krem. And when they went their separate ways after Eleanor’s ruling on Crestwood’s mayor, Cassandra had gone to the forge, sat at a table in its upper levels and gone to work as she listened to the clank of hammer against anvil, imbued herself in the comforting scent of fire blazing strong steel so it could be molded into something that served higher purpose.

She only barely heard soft footsteps approaching, the creak of the railing as someone held onto it and swayed to pull with their weight against it so they could make play leaning and swinging a bit as they voiced their curiosity, “Mami? Are you busy?”

Oh! Eleanor, still attired from her judgement session. Did she not have a date this evening?

…Cassandra had been, admittedly, hurting. So, Cole had sent her, hadn’t he? And she’d come. “I am working, but I am not too busy for you sweet girl,” she cleared her throat. In fact, “Come,” she said, closing the tome over her journal to keep its contents from plain sight, as she scooted back in her seat and opening her arms to the girl, “sit with me won’t you?”

Eleanor smiled, seating herself in Cassandra’s lap- oh, this was wonderful reprieve, just as she suspected—she hadn’t dressed for her date just yet but Marehis had worked with her hair, it was still drying, felt cool against Cassandra’s cheek and smelled wonderfully of coconut oil, and her child was so warm to hold.

And curious as ever, “What’s up, mami?” she wondered, the head against Cassandra’s cheek ducking to tilt sideways to try and peek between the space the Seeker’s tome left in the journal she was making use of.

“I am making record of Caer Oswin and sorting through the Lord Seeker’s tome.”

“Oh gosh, I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to interrupt! Um…how’s it going? Are you okay?
Do you want help?”

“It isn’t entirely pleasant, but I am dealing.” She swallowed, burying her nose against her daughter’s hair, breathing deep, grounding herself in the security of her hold on the girl.
She’d…she believed she’d discovered what the former Lord Seeker found so very damning.
It…was damming in Cassandra’s eyes likewise, and that was distressing.

She had been made Tranquil. They all had. Every single Seeker of Truth had been made Tranquil, and had that Tranquility broken, and that was what imbued them with their abilities and their immunity to possession. That this could leave Mages cut off from their magic and the Fade forever had only been discovered when the Order wasn’t so very exclusionary and Mages had been permitted in their ranks, before the Circle of Magi. A Mage candidate had been incapable of having a Spirit of Faith summoned to their side—they had not been found pure and were left with the ceremony only half performed. They were left as an empty vessel, incapable of connecting to the Fade…and the Order took that and implemented it when Circles came to be, entrusted them with their most sacred knowledge for the purposes of-of bastardizing their rituals to tame Mages that…well, if Tranquility had truly only ever been used for it’s original intent, it would spare them execution—the Seeker of Truth that penned that passage had thought it some great solution, that there would be no more need for death to be the final sentence for a Mage who could not be trusted to not abuse their magic horrendously, they could merely have it taken away. It, and the entirety of anything in them that would cause them to behave as they once did. Death sounded less complicated and more preferable. They could have-

They could have made their mages immune to the thing they were taught to fear most!
The reason the world at large was so very fearful of Mages was the threat of possession—this ritual was made to immunize a person from such a fate! Red Lyrium complicated such matters, had proven to lead to a more physical form of demonic torment in Seekers, allowed them to wreak havoc upon their bodies than be capable of controlling their minds, but that-that did little to take away from the truth of the matter. Once upon a time, the Seekers of Truth took truth and tarnished it in the name of oppression and fear. It was they who set up the sort of system Cassandra would never want her own child being subjected to, the broken system it was now on Eleanor to see set to rights.

She should have this information. And she would.

Just…not now. Not in the middle of a not-so-trying day, the first in quite some time, one that saw her fulfilling her duties with success, and was to end with her going on something as exciting as a date with her sweet boyfriend.

Sweeter lips pressed a kiss to Cassandra’s scarred cheek, “I’m really proud of you mami.”

What if mages could be made immune to possession? What if Eleanor would never again have to fear a demon may take control of her mind? Now the girl lay injured, she’d had that damnable stuff in her blood, if a demon had struck while they were in Saharia’s Quarry?
Even now there was the pressing fear such a thing could come to pass. She was strong, had faced demonic possession on more than one occasion and came out of it victorious but sometimes such things felt like not a matter of ‘if’ Eleanor might one day be possessed, but ‘when’.

Ugh! She would put such thoughts from her mind now, they served no purpose! She sent her damned letter to Cullen and- oh she could not abide just sitting useless and waiting!
Purpose, she needed purpose. And she found it on the Requisition table.
Word had come for Eleanor, in Cullen’s hand, sealed with his Advisor’s mark so it was official business and Cassandra would handle it if possible. Oh. It was confirmation that something had been handled already—a matter Eleanor had addressed once her scouts brought it to her attention, that Judicael’s Crossing lay just at the edge of the Tower of Bone, their scouts had informed her when they laid claim to Drakon’s Rise and scoped out the Tower to see just what it would take to make relinquish the Red Templar’s hold on it. Lady Montilyet had apparently been plagued by unrelenting letters® from Orlesian nobility demanding that now that the Inquisition was in Sahrnia, they restore Judicael’s crossing, as the Red Templars had broken it to take siege of the area—the only way in or out was through Sahrnia village, funneling through the Red Lyrium cavern, everywhere else was surrounded by impassable mountains. So Eleanor had apparently signed off on orders for it to be repaired as soon as possible and Cullen’s forces had delivered—there were passable repairs made, foot traffic across the bridge was now possible and…there were apparently sightings of dragons.

She was never so certain the Iron Bull would ravage her against any surface she deemed fit if she were so inclined, than she was in the moment she informed him she wished to go dragon slaying—two dragons. He had been laying in his cot with Dorian at his side and the Mage looked wildly insulted when the Qunari hefted him to cast him aside, lifting him off one side of their double cot to place him on the other so the mage was laying against the tent wall and the Qunari could be free to spring off the cot without trampling his lover.

“Seeker,” the Qunari growled appreciatively, “If you were a red head? Cullen’d be in trouble. unless he was a red head…swung the right way? Oh man.” Oh. No, no thank you. The Qunari was handsome but Cassandra’d no…Cassandra’d little interest in a triad.

“I am right! here!” Dorian snapped.

“Yeah, you’re great- love you, die for you, just let me have my moment.”

He had several moments. One would think it was Wintersend morn—the Iron Bull was purply-cheeked and grinning ear to ear the entire time Cassandra was certain. It was…it was a type of reprieve, pouring the whole of her focus into the task at hand. Sera remained with Eleanor and Solas as they were both rather comatose—though the Dalish man rallied and consumed a meal, was seated in meditation at Eleanor’s side by the time the rest of her party and Thom Rainier’s men had concluded their business of dragon slaying.

Two Dragons may have been a bit much to take on in one day. But she was hardly alone, they’d the numbers and potion to take on the task. And there was something in the sting of sweat-salt in her wounds, in the burning tear of her muscles and the thrum of adrenaline dying in her blood, leaving her spent, having to focus everything into putting one foot before the other, the exhaustion of wiping herself clean—she forwent a bath, the Iron Bull was well due a turn and if she soaked she may lose what pains she’d gained in their day’s endeavors. She wanted to ache from head to toe as she lay in the cot next to Eleanor’s, watch the rise and fall of breath in her child’s chest until she herself slipped from consciousness.

“Sandra?” in Sera’s voice was what called her to drag her eyes open the following day. The girl was seated on her knees at the end of the cot, still in her sleep clothes, sunlight pouring in from the unsecured entrance she must have just come through. “Breakfast’s all over but I saved you some. Things came for you to look over I guess? Bunch of pish from Leliana, a few letters from Cullen.” A few? Oh Maker, that did nothing to quell her worries. How many ways had he reviled her on paper? “You um…you okay? You wasn’t hurt bad yesterday or anything, were you?”

“No, I am fine, merely tired. Thank you for waking me, I should see to my mail.”

“Everything’s on the Requisition’s table,” Sera assured before turning her attention to Eleanor and offering up sing-song, “Innnk-y! It’s break-fast…” she sighed. “Potion again huh? That’s okay Ink—you’re doing real good, healing up, getting strengthy again,” she encouraged the sleeping girl as she leaned forward to rest her weight on her hands pushing herself forward to press a kiss to Eleanor’s cheek before sitting back on her knees and looking to Cassandra. “C’mon mama—get your breakfast on, I’ll take care of Inky.”
“I’ve potion and broth for her,” Marehis said as she entered the tent.
“Give it!” Sera fiercely insisted, “I wanna do it!”
“Alright da’vehnan, alright,” Marehis laughed, handing off bottles of Eleanor’s potions regimen and a bowl of broth.

Cassandra’s muscles protested as she rose up from the cot. She wasn’t certain if she was indulging in Sera and Eleanor’s company, or putting off the inevitable as she lingered in the tent, carefully armoring herself for the day ahead before she set foot in the direction of their requisitions table. There was a plate with eggs and toast waiting for her but it…could continue to wait.

First and foremost was Cullen’s letter…letters.

The most recent was Sera has sent me an update, she says you’ve been dragon slaying and went straight to bed upon your return to camp, I apologize for the bombardment of letters, but I was worried. Please, ciela, write me back. At your earliest convenience. To clarify—still worried.

The ‘bombardment’ was three small letters, equating to You’ve not responded and that’s scaring me and I need to know you’re okay, please send me some sign of life. Had his initial response been so horrendous he believed her unable to face him even on paper? It may well be true once she actually read the thing, but- oh, she hated that she’d worried him.

She…she really, truly hated that she’d worried him. If she’d not been such an utter coward, she would have taken up the first letter from Cullen when she saw it on the requisition’s table last night.

I don’t believe I’m capable of conveying how I feel at this moment in writing, so it is fortunate I am already on the road. Maddox is the lead we needed—I will be in Emprise du Lion as soon as possible. Leliana has leads on just where Maddox is being held, she believes her findings in Marquis Vicinus’s estate and what you discovered in the Quarry will bring both our investigations to a head. I will be in Sahnria as soon as possible. How are you? Are you hurt? I’m- there were several sentences thoroughly scratched out with frustrated strokes and then I am beyond sorry, I can’t say how much. I hate that you were all put to so much danger for this, that Ellie is hurt. How is she doing? Stay safe.

…it was an entirely…normal letter. It wasn’t a scathing condemnation. But it was very neutral, as far as Cullen’s letters went. She penned a reply, assuring him she wasn’t harmed, and Eleanor was healing. Oh, she prayed he was well, that he was staying safe himself. She would keep an eye out for further messages from the man.

It may help…if the Requisition table wasn’t so very full. Leliana had sent the reports Cassandra asked to view and…

Well. Ask and you shall receive, apparently.

Stacks of folded parchment, several inches thick and each held together with a single string of twine, awaited her on the Requisitions table, and Cassandra sat down to go through each and every one of them. It took a moment just to organize everything, Maker. Oh, the missive for Thom was still on the table—she would bring it to his attention when she was through.

If she got through in this Age. They’d been rather busy in the Western Approach*.
Varric, Hawke, Stroud, with the assistance of their soldiers and scouts, they’d taken Griffon Wing Keep in Eleanor’s name, he took note that they found one of ‘Wolfie’s weird artifacts’ there. They’d handled raider squatters laying claim to a nearby fortress, avenged the Dragoncologist, Frederic’s fallen assistants and recollected his missing research. Too they’d infiltrated a strange ruin that held…two parties frozen in fight, Tevinter researchers who had disappeared in the Western Approach had apparently been found, frozen in time, mid-fight with demons from the Fade…from a Breach, they’d accidentally formed while performing some sort of experiment. As they’d no means to handle the Rift until Eleanor arrived and no clue where to even begin dealing with whatever time magic was in place, they left the Still Ruins as they were save for a tome they took from the place at the request of Frederic, as it was apparently a manuscript of some authority on Dragon hunting. Cassandra had wondered at the hefty tome that arrived in the mail for Eleanor that she passed along with a letter of her own, she was curious why the girl hadn’t had Cassandra or the Iron Bull peruse the text but… it was apparently ancient and Tevene, Dorian may not have been able to translate the text. Eleanor had sent it along to Skyhold with a request to Lady Josephine—did she know anyone who would be willing to translate it for them? She’d a friend who had a friend…who had a brother attending Circle in Minrathous, worked in their college of Antiquities who would be happy to do so. and assisted with the groundwork of tracking the hunting patterns of their local dragon and had traps prepared for setting for the dragon whenever they’d a proper dragon hunter at hand. There was a trail of Chantry totems that made its way through the Western Approach, but their end was met with a magical barrier they couldn’t pass until they’d the assistance of a Mage. They’d done what they could to clear the area of White Claw raiders, handled the trouble with Darkspawn and secured a viable water source for their forces in the Western Approach.

There was nearly a hundred back and forths between Eleanor and Varric, and Lady Montilyet, and Leliana. And Cullen. And Tonio Aclassi. And Knight-Captain Rylen. And Lord Berand—he’d been nearing the Oasis…and written Eleanor of his position. They’d a friendship, apparently, it sounded like he’d been keeping Eleanor appraised to how he was faring, personally, how his men were, the missions they were fulfilling for the Inquisition—the letter that came across the Requisitions table in Cassandra’s request for everything on the Western Approach gave her that impression, anyway. That the man had just been writing Eleanor as normal, mentioned they were nearing the Oasis and Eleanor had written back, asking if he would consider performing a ‘teansea favors’…teensy favor, Cassandra thought she meant, but the misspelling looked intentional and was followed by a little drawn up smiley face, an inside joke perhaps. She’d requested, if he and his men were up for it, they be a bit of backup for Varric and the others as they investigated the source of Darkspawn plaguing the Western Approach. For all the Grey Wardens were using the Western Approach to fulfill their mad, misguided plan to save the world from the Blight, they certainly weren’t doing anything about the actual Darkspawn issue there. Ahh. The Lord wrote back the very same day, he must have been awaiting word from her because Cassandra did recall her gaze catching sight of the smile drawing when she heard the girl folding up her missive and looked to her to ask if she was finished working for the evening in the split second before Eleanor was sealing up her letter and sending it off before climbing into bed and pressing a kiss to Cassandra’s cheek and sighing tiredly, sweetly asking if she would ‘pretty please’ read to her from a book she’d started in her time in Val Royeaux—she was nearing the end and wanted to read more before sleeping but her eyes were feeling tired and she’d a bit of a headache and—She’d shared it like a bit of conspiracy, her lips against Cassandra’s ear as she giggled a whispered, “Don’t tell tio or papa—you’re the only one that does voices,” She did not do voices! She perhaps entertained a change of inflection when she was reading for differing characters—as one should! “so you’re my favorite reader, mami!” That sentiment felt heartbreaking now.

Ahem. Well. The point was, Berand had readily written her back, it’d had to have been nearly midnight when her letter was received, his reply was dated the very same day with immediate agreement that he and his men would…ahh, grant her this ‘teansea’ favor—so it was an inside joke—and set out at first light to meet Varric in the Western Approach. And it was immediately followed by a letter from he to Varric, letting him know that his Lady Inquisitor had bid they join forces to take on the Darkspawn, and they would be arriving forthwith.

Whatever floats your scrote –V was by far the…most disconcerting, but shortest missive Cassandra had to sift through.

It was all…on a level…disconcerting. She could not be more proud of all the work they had done, how well Eleanor had handled it all, make no mistake. But there was so much, and not a bit of this had Cassandra heard talk of, a great deal of work on all of their parts. And Eleanor hadn’t discussed a thing of it, it seemed like, with any of them, she’d just…taken up the responsibility and done it. Which was what she was supposed to do but…well, she’d always come to them for guidance, why hadn’t she done so here? Was there some…dwindling trust? Or growing arrogance? She feared it was the former—reading about a situation and being in it were two different things and her child had that understanding in full, had given orders with that in mind, there was no arrogance to be found in what came off like the girl’s best attempts at helping with the decisions that needed made, offering encouragement and advice, signing off on whatever her people were telling her they needed—she wrote Knight-Captain Rylen directly, thanking him for taking command of Griffon Wing Keep and asking if there were any concerns he wanted brought directly to her attention, and she wondered if he would mind at all, if she had a few questions. He supposed she was free to ask all the questions she liked—she was in charge, had the title of Inquisitor, that came with the territory, did it not? …Cassandra’d a feeling the man hadn’t been expecting the next letter from her to be an entire sheet of parchment dedicated to her inquiries, but that’s what he received. But he was kind enough to offer succinct, serious answers to her every question…even that of his favorite color, the single word, green sufficed and likely excited the girl…yes, in her reply Cassandra saw her written exuberance that they shared the same favorite color. She’d asked of everything from inquiries about his wellbeing, to their environment, how everyone was coping with the dessert, to the morale of his people. His answers led to her writing the Elder Aclassi with questions about cooling clothing, things that could help with the heat. A week after their initial correspondence, Tonio was confirming he’d sent scarves—one of which was green and embroidered with Rylen’s name on the underside along with a portion of the Chant he had to recite when taking up his vows to serve the Maker when he joined the Order—to the Western Approach, made of materials that he promised would protect from the sun and heat, and promised she and her party would have likewise if she wished it. She did…and she’d taken the task of requesting colors she knew her companions enjoyed which was unnecessary and time consuming and precious that she cared about such things!

Oh. Eleanor…she knew well, by now, her party member’s preferences on color. She was confident in the knowledge. So she sent it along, without asking them all for a second time to verify. The other decisions she’d handled were rather the same, it wasn’t that she didn’t trust their guidance—she only came to them when she’d need to, when she wasn’t certain of what to do. With all of these circumstance, she’d felt confident in her response and how Varric or any she wrote in this time, would handle her orders. She was…

Oh she was growing up, wasn’t she? Finding more solid footing in her role and trusting her own instincts and knowledge.

—

“Seeker,” the Iron Bull’s voice was battle-urgent as the Qunari emerged from their tent to step out, it startled Cassandra to her feet, rising up from the seat she’d taken at the Requisitions table, dropping the letter she had in hand as she looked to him, assessing. Was there some danger? Oh Maker, was Eleanor suffering some complication? The Qunari stopped when he took sight of the Seeker he’d addressed and he quickly wondered, “Uhhhh do you need a moment?” why? Oh. Ugh. She shook her head ‘no’, wiping furiously at her eyes with the back of her hand—Maker! The girl was sixteen and Inquisitor and- and- growing up was to be expected! “Cuz I can rally the troops—I hear horses, big time, hoofin’ it our way real fast. Could be friendlies but who the hell do we have on horseback in these parts?”

None, the weather was treacherous and there was precious little place to keep such creatures, and too the Red Lyrium exposure may be detrimental to them in ways they couldn’t expect. Could Cullen have made the journey so very quickly?

“The Iron Bull hears oncoming visitors on horseback—do we have eyes on the situation?” Cassandra called.

Their scouts verified the Qunari’s concern—they did have visitors but, “Inquisition colors ma’am.”

It was a moment later that a bird arrived from their infiltration camp from Lace Harding—the woman had returned from scoping out the fortress of Ser Michel’s demon, and their visitors had just been arriving, and- well. The missive was almost pointless because it came at the same time as those it forewarned of.

Lord Berand was swinging out of the saddle of his steed, wide eyed and covered in dust and grime from the road, breathless from the harsh pace they’d set as he rushed to meet them, his men stopping just short of his own steed while the Lord forwent stopping to catch his breath to nod to Cassandra respectfully as he strode straight up to her with the words,

“Lady Seeker. Scout Harding tells me my Lady Eleanor was injured, that she is here recovering—is-,” falling from his lips in urgency, he gasped in a breath lungs still trying to catch up even as their owner wasn’t entirely cooperative, “how is she? May I see her?”

“Slow your roll there dude,” The Iron Bull said…his tones friendly, but Cassandra recognized this particular brand of friendliness. It was the sort he used with Solas, back when he first suspected the man was up to no good when they met on the Storm Coast. “Take a deep breath. Boss-girl’s hanging in there.”

He nodded to the Qunari, but still, “I came as soon as I heard. What happened?”

“On Eleanor’s orders we took Sahrnia Quarry the night before last,” Cassandra said, “the Red Templars had taken captives, she made rescue of them while we cleared the Quarry but…” she cleared her throat, “Samson had them rather galvanized to take vengeance upon Eleanor for their losses at Therinfal Redoubt. A Red Templar Shadow made itself scarce, remained unperceivable and silent and waited until Eleanor was leading us down the Quarry’s scaffolding where it could catch her alone momentarily and it ran her through. She lost a non-vital organ and a great deal of blood, endured…trauma to have Red Lyrium removed from her bloodstream.”

One of his men pitched a low whistle, whispering to another who nodded at, “Holy shit.”

Lord Berand looked horrified, “Maker’s breath. She- is she- will she recover?”

“She is not in mortal peril, she’s healing as well as can be expected and our Healer assures us she’ll make a full recovery.”

“May I see her?”

Well. Cassandra wasn’t certain why the Qunari was being falsely amicable, but he didn’t show any displeasure at Cassandra’s cautiously offered, “Certainly, we’ll show you to her,” oh, that got a quiet grunt of approval from the Iron Bull so she supposed she was doing the right thing in his eye, “but I ask you do not disturb her. She needs to rest.”

“Thank you, Seeker Pentaghast. Oh, and you as well the…I mean no disrespect I just- Lady Eleanor has spoken of you- er- him-“ ahh he was uncertain if the Qunari he was addressing was truly named the Iron Bull.

“Yeah that’s me. What’s my Imekari been saying about me? All good I hope?”

“Your…” the man questioned the foreign word.

“Qunlat. Means child.”

“You love her as such, that is good—she loves you likewise,” Lord Berand assured, “she speaks very highly of you.”

And now the Iron Bull was staring at the Lord like he wasn’t certain just how to proceed, almost as if he were frustrated, like he’d wanted the man to say something offending so he could warrant the Qunari’s ire.

Cassandra cleared her throat, only just remembering to take up the envelope for Rainier Eleanor had left, “Well. Come along. You may check on her, and I’m certain she will be glad to hear you’ve arrived safely and were thinking of her when she wakes, I know you are friends,” she offered up the fact in case, perhaps, the Iron Bull wasn’t aware of as much, thought the Lord’s interest was ingenuine.

Lord Berand was practically on her heels as Cassandra led him to their party’s tent, the Iron Bull close behind, standing in the tent’s entrance almost as if he were standing guard as he watched the proceedings.

“Lord Berand and his men have arrived to assist in dealing with Ishmael,” she announced to those gathered in the tent. Solas was still comatose in his own cot. Vivienne was seated at Eleanor’s side, quietly reading…a book she’d borrowed from Cassandra that the Seeker was absolutely horrified to have read to her child but—oh. The woman was being er…creative, editing the more inappropriate parts, the section she was in was rather the graphic lovemaking scene she somehow managed to make sound like three consenting adults, kneeling in prayer to their Maker, in the throes of passion for His good work. Varric was awake, beyond amused as he listened whilst he and Thom played cards. Sera sat on the cot next to Eleanor’s, Marehis was seated at Sera’s back, making play with the Elf girl’s hair as she watched over her shoulder as she and Dorian played a game of chess.

And in the midst of this lay Eleanor, and now Lord Berand as the man came to kneel at her side, just before Madam de Fer who paused her reading to examine the Lord that interrupted them and was now tentatively resting a hand over the unmarked hand laying lax at Eleanor’s side. He closed his eyes and sat in a moment of silent prayer over the girl, before he quietly cleared his throat. “Thank the Maker she’s alive.”

“Ink’s gonna be okay,” Sera said, “How you doin’ Lordy?”

“I’m well.”

“Look like shite.” Oh goodness.

He huffed, favoring her a warm grin, “I apologize for appearing such a sight before you, fair Sera,” eliciting a snort and an eye roll from the Elf. “You’re well I hope? Lady Eleanor mentioned you’d a cold when last she wrote.”

“m’fine. Sahnia’s a right shit-hole.”

“Not quite my Lady’s words, but she warned it wasn’t the most pleasant of places when she asked we join her here,” he sighed, “thank you all, for protecting her and keeping guard of her life,” he said as he cast one more look to the slumbering Inquisitor, gently squeezing her hand before he rose to his feet. “Lady Eleanor made arrangement for me to meet Ser Michel—she was going to call him to this camp as it is closest to Suledin Keep?” Cassandra…wasn’t certain—Eleanor hadn’t known the exact day he would be arriving—

“Lacey’s on it,” Sera assured. “Inky set it up with her when she asked you to come—she didn’t want you lot goin’ in there until scoutin’ was done, Lace’s supposed to be getting back today, as long as you checked in with someone there, she’ll know to send Mikey our way.”

“She was safely in your Infiltration camp when we arrived,” the Lord informed her.

“Oh sweet! Then no worries—he’ll be ‘round soon.”

Berand nodded, “Excellent. I’ll inform my men.”

“You lot’re probably pretty beat from the road—hungry and shite, right?” Sera asked and when the Lord nodded, “Go wash up, get comfortable uhhh…Bull you wanna help me? We’ll get ‘em food. Should probably be thinking about lunch anyway.”

“We’ll wash up and assist of course,” Berand returned, “You needn’t worry yourselves.”

“Whatever goes down—we all need fed! No one goes hungry in Inky’s camp—that’s the rules!” though the girl did have the thought, “huh…maybe if we put off lunch, put it out into the universe we’re starving Inky’ll come ‘round.” And at Cassandra’s sympathetic smile the girl groaned, “I freaking miss her. Which is dumb! But I do!”

“I wish the kid’d wake up already too,” Varric spoke up, “but I want her better when she does, and I definitely don’t want her jumping into ‘fix-it-myself’ mode.” He put down his cards, folding to Rainier. “But dude’s right—you hang tight with Tumbles. I can help out.”

“Yeah, leave it to us, Ser’,” the Iron Bull said, clapping Lord Berand…very hard, high on his back palming the back of his neck fingers over his shoulder squeezing. Not massaging. Had the Lord offended him somehow?

…should she be wary of the Lord? Varric…only willingly volunteered for cooking duty when he sought to take the task from Rainier upon his betrayal. He’d little love for the task.

“I can be of assistance,” Thom volunteered likewise, rising up from the cot alongside Varric. Oh!

“Actually, there was something for you on the Requisition Table, from Eleanor I believe,” Cassandra informed him as she passed the envelope off to him.

“Inky left somethin’ for you?” Sera wondered.

The man sat back down on the edge of his cot so swiftly Cassandra was almost afraid he’d collapsed, but he sat straight down with the letter in hand, the other raising, trembling as he ran it over his face, his hand staying lax over his mouth as he—oh. Perhaps he’d need of a moment, his eyes were red and tearing up. Lord Berand made himself scarce, nodding to Cassandra as he took his leave of the tent to see to his men while the Inquisitor’s party remained as they were, watching and waiting until the man roughly cleared his throat, looking over…there were several sheets of parchment and then a small scrap of parchment that looked like a page torn from one of Eleanor’s small parchment pads.

“She uh…” Thom sniffled, shaking the bit of parchment pad paper that was apparently an added note to him informing him, “Ellie-girl said things are busy around here and she didn’t want this falling through the cracks, so she left a draft of her letter for mother on my behalf, for me to read and send so long as I’m comfortable with it.” he shook his head as he turned one sheet of parchment over, and looked to the ones still behind it, “Maker, she had to have written all this while we were preparing for the Quarry.”

“Inky’s the dumbest!” Sera complained. “I don’t mean it mean!”

“We know, da’assan,” Marehis assured, her arms around Sera’s shoulders squeezing reassurance.

“Take your time Sarge,” Varric clapped him on the shoulder. “We’ve got lunch handled.”

Cassandra joined them. As did Ser Michel, the man arrived on foot not too terribly long after Berand and his men, aided by Bull and Varric, began working to get their next meal underway.

“Good afternoon Lady Seeker,” he greeted pleasantly, looking about their camp, “Inquisitor Ellie sent for me to meet Lord Berand?”

“Ahh, you must be Michel de Chevin,” Lord Berand rose from where he’d been seated at the fire dicing potatoes, wiping off his hands to shake the Chivalier’s, “Lady Eleanor speaks highly of you, has told me of how honorably you’ve protected Sahrnia in the wake of their Red Templar struggle even as you have a mission of your own.”

“Sahrnia’s people needed defenders, if the Inquisition had not shown up when they had I do not know how much longer I could have defended the place myself,” he insisted, “the Inquisitor tells me you’ve a strong crew, I’m grateful you’ve come to assist me with Ishmael. Where…” he looked about once more, “where is Lady Ellie?”

“She’s recovering from injury some Red Templar coward struck her,” one of Berand’s men scathed.

“Curse those wretched things,” the Chivalier swore, “She will be alright I hope?”

Cassandra offered a nod. “My prayers are with her.”

Their party gathered, Solas rallying now that he’d had some proper rest and his hunger roused him from his cot. Only Sera remained in the tent with Eleanor—dashing out to grab a plate of ram’s meat, potatoes, scrunching her nose at the hefty portion of brussels sprouts the Iron Bull doled out for her before snatching up a bowl she placed a vial of nutritive potion and a jar of broth inside along with a spoon, explaining ‘Lunch for Inky’ before she rushed back to the tent…though she stopped in the tent entrance, gaze trained on—oh. There was a plate of stale toast, interesting smelling eggs that had gone untouched still on the Requisition’s table. Sera stared very hard at Cassandra, unmoving until the Seeker waved her full fork and popped a proper bite of lunch into her mouth and then she disappeared into the tent.

They discussed their plans for Suledin Keep now as Michel had Scout Harding’s findings on the place. It was a fortress, guarded by Red Templars and...two Red Lyrium infected giants. and Ishmael's hold was strong.

“He is a malicious thing—he will offer anything to keep his life,” Michel warned. “He will not be easy to get to, and he will certainly not be easy to deal with.”

“He is the one who had laid claim to Suledin Keep?” Solas asked with some interest. “I heard him working in the Fade as I slept—he is who I have been being vigilant against while the girl... girls he nearly said, but not all present were privy to Sera’s magical status. He cleared his throat, “the Inquisitor has been in the Fade. He is a spirit of choice, we must be prepared—this Ishmael can take on the form of any demonic body, be it Pride or Rage.”

“Yes, he is powerful and he must be stopped,” Michel insisted.

“We’re with you,” Lord Berand assured.

“So’re we,” The Iron Bull said, “but uh... who’s goin’, who’s keeping back with Imekari?”

The host of their Mages were going—Solas was well enough, he insisted, and he’d the ability to keep their party appraised to Eleanor's health, Suledin Keep was not so far out of range that he could not swiftly reestablish connection, he could raise the alarm if something happened which was a relief to their minds. Their warriors were on board, and Cole returned as they prepared for their mission and readily agreed to join them. Sera insisted upon coming as well, she was determined to see the things that worried Eleanor through for her, and she didn’t want this ‘demon shite’ anywhere around anymore—what if he heard 'Inky' hurting and tried to get in her?! Which was horrifying, yes, oh Maker Cassandra hadn’t even considered that possibility and now it screamed at the forefront of her mind... which she would push back—while Seekers were immune to demonic possession*, it was still wise to guard ones thoughts when interacting with them, if it could perceive her mind without overtaking it she hardly wanted to hand it ideas for a different vessel it could endeavor to possess.

“But he can’t,” Cole spoke from Cassandra’s side, the young man was looking up at her... he was addressing her concerns about Ishmael attempting to posses Eleanor? “Yes. He cannot. That is what you learned in the Seekers Tome.”

Was it? “You know what I learned?”

“Its been in your hurts. It would come out of them if you talked about them,” he advised.

“If I were to speak of them aloud, it would be in private,” she said.

“Oh!” Cole chirped, understanding. And then privately, to Cassandra’s mind, You can’t be possessed because Faith touched your mind and found you pure.

Yes but that...
...she’d been sequestered for a year, isolated in a chamber where her time was dedicated to fasting, praying, and focusing on her faith in the Maker. And at the end of her vigil, when she was empty and hallow, they branded her mind with the Andrasten sun, and called a Spirit of Faith to her side who healed the Lyrium burn and left her mind free and unbroken, unable to be chained by a demon’s will. Eleanor... had been isolated*, starved, and poured her resolve into her faith in the Maker, put her all into faith in Him... and a Spirit of Faith touched her mind and left her whole. She was not branded with tranquility - It isn’t Tranquility that makes you immune to possession. Human machinations made that, something that harms, left to be healed. Security from possession comes from a mind touched by Faith. Tranquility is... Sera would call it a byproduct. The Rite is to make yourself pure for Faith to come and judge. Demons can’t occupy a space a Spirit has already claimed.

Alright. She wasn’t certain that was entirely correct—not for doubt of Cole of course. She merely feared faith in this instance would fail her if she placed it in something she so desperately—more than anything in this world—wanted to be truth. Part of what delayed her discussing this matter with Eleanor came from...well, she hoped to plant a seed of interest—one she hoped would spread to Sera likewise, that her children would be inclined to begin considering performing the Rite herself to permanently protect themselves from possession—to know that if demons came for them in the future, their attempts to take their minds may still be frightening, require resilience to navigate, but they would never be taken over. But there would be such risk—the girls could be made permanently Tranquil if they were not fully prepared and Faith found them wanting. She would never wish that upon Sera and Eleanor. If…if Tranquility were not a necessary component…if Eleanor had already accidentally performed the Rite, if having Faith come and find one pure, make them whole was all that was required to save one from future possession?

“Lethallan?” Marehis’s voice drew her attention, “Is everything alright?”

“Are you well, darling?” Vivienne chimed in her own concern.

“Merely thinking,” Cassandra assured, “…Madam de Fer, if I may have a moment of your time, later? To discuss a matter of confidence in private.”

“Certainly,” she assured.

Marehis alone would stay to keep guard of Eleanor, Thom’s men would keep their camp secure.

And…well. Cassandra learned just what the Iron Bull’s issue was, with Lord Berand. It was very much her issue—it pushed the quandaries of how ancient Seeker ritual and Circle secrets may or may not affect her children and the world at large in the future, from her mind for the moment, so. At least it was something of a distraction. That did not make it a welcome one.

They were preparing to take their leave, Sera exiting the tent to announce “I gave Inky one last squeeze! Gentle, ’cuz like, duh. But sweets needs love!”

“I would wish Lady Eleanor farewell before we depart,” Lord Berand excused himself. Which wasn’t inherently an issue. It shouldn’t be—Sera was Eleanor’s dearest friend and sought saying an affectionate farewell, and even Varric had doled the slumbering girl a forehead kiss while voicing his own goodbyes. But Cassandra saw one of Berand’s men roll his eyes while another shook his head, muttering, “’rand’s got it bad.”

Ahh. So. The Seeker had avoided risking a third return to the tent while Eleanor slumbered, but now she followed after the Lord—Marehis was with Eleanor, she’d stab someone who dared to do something untoward to Eleanor as she slept—if the Lord came out of it with an injury they’d have only Marehis’s word for the encounter, while those within the Inquisition would readily believe and defend her…Lord Berand’s family was another story, they may well press charges against the Elf woman, so. Cassandra would bear witness to verify her claims, take blame if need be, perhaps perpetrate the crime herself if this grown man sought to do anything inappropriate.

He toed the line, very dearly. A soft smile on his lips as he leaned over to press a kiss to Eleanor’s cheek, murmuring the intonation, “Do me a teensy favor and be well soon, my Lady.”

Oh. Ugh. Had the man developed a crush on the girl? Or were his men the sort to look at Berand following his young Inquisitor’s requests as something sexual in nature? That the man simply must be currying favor with Eleanor to earn his way into her heart, or other places he’d no business being while she was monogamously engaged in a romantic relationship. Was that what he was doing?

Well. Cassandra’d a headache from the unknowns so she well understood the Iron Bull’s frustrations.
The Lord smiled warmly as he chuckled, “Oh…my Lady wrote me to inform me she’d the ability to write and wished to check up on me as…well, she’d only just learned of birthdays and in her inquiries as to birthdays led Lady Montilyet to inform her mine was coming to pass in Guardian and she expressed her well wishes and her sympathy, that now she knew they were such important days spent with friends and family, I may well be missing mine—my parents, mourning Vellania. We were only just heading to the Fallow Mire, and,” his smile grew, “she asked me the teensy favor of staying safe. T-e-a-n-s-e-a.”

Dorian let out a huff of laughter. “Oh, we’d only just covered how one spells ‘sea’ as in the water mass, and I recall that mistake in her homework—she thought surely that must be how you spell the tee and sy of teensy and was wildly upset when I informed her that while phonetically that may work, it was wholly inaccurate in writing.”

“It was a precious mistake and I…oh I did not wish to embarrass her or say something that might cause her to lose her building confidence in her newfound knowledge. So when I wrote back agreeing I would try to grant her teensy favor, I used Lady Eleanor’s spelling of the word. She was embarrassed when she was elsewhere corrected, but it truly had been…I found it adorable, and she’d some amusement with it, it’s become something of a recurring jest.”

That sounded…sweet of the man. But it did little to assure Cassandra he wasn’t sweet on the girl.

He is. Sweet and sweet on, Cole lamented.

Oh. Well. It was nice to have confirmation at least.

Though that confirmation could have been deduced on its own when they stopped to rest a moment, confirm their plans and strategies. Everyone was sipping from their water stores save for Cole, who did not partake of water often, he hadn’t his canteen on him, it was Eleanor who usually insisted the boy at least carry it with him on the off chance he did want or need it. Lord Berand saw his lack of canteen and extended himself in kindness.

“Cole, is it? It’s nice to finally meet you,” Berand said.

“I am glad you think it is nice,” Cole supposed.

“Are you thirsty? We should remain hydrated for the battle ahead—you could share my canteen if you’d like?”

“No thank you,” Cole politely declined, even as he serenely informed him, “I do not like you.”

Sera snickered, turning into Cassandra’s side to hide her face against the Seeker’s shoulder while the Lord blinked at the Spirit’s bluntness.

“I apologize if I have caused offence.”

“You haven’t yet but you will,” Cole assured.

“Well I…I will certainly try not to.”

“No you won’t!” Cole guaranteed—that he won’t try, it was clear to Cassandra what the Spirit meant, but Lord Berand smiled, somewhat relieved as he took the Spirits affirmation to mean he suddenly believed the Lord wouldn’t do anything offensive.

Cassandra would be keeping close guard of the Lord, if not to keep him from behaving unbecomingly toward Eleanor, then to preserve his life from the Iron Bull, should the Qunari take it into his head to lay slain a competitor of Cremisius. It was not in Eleanor to string someone along or do anything that would hurt her boyfriend. But she was kind to all she could be kind to, and sometimes that was confused for sexual interest. It…was a bit sad, really—those who assume kindness equals sexual interest are therefore likely only kind themselves to those they find sexual interest in, a depressing a deplorable way to live. She was gratified that Berand didn’t seem that sort of man…of course his kindness to the people in Eleanor’s life may well only be extended to them because of their relationship to the girl—someone ten years younger than he! She may be technically of age but that merely meant she was beginning her adult life, not she herself a fully-fledged adult! Ten, twenty years down the road? Perhaps such an age difference wouldn’t matter—a thirty-six-year-old would be no more or less mature than a forty-six-year-old to any significant degree. But the difference between twenty-six and sixteen? When he could find her mistakes ‘adorable’ and be well versed in not making any such mistakes himself, spelling or otherwise? That he could so easily speak of the girl as if she were a child? He’d no business pursuing such a person—and if he endeavored to, he would be corrected.

After he was lauded. He and his men were excellent help, taking on the fortress—even as half of his men, he sent with Michel to Sahrnia when, upon their arrival at Suledin Keep, Ishmael sought to distract them and unleashed a pack of Shades to attack the villagers. They immediately took their steeds and rode off with Michel leading the way to go protect innocents while Cassandra led Berand and the remainder of his men, Eleanor’s party, forward and through the Keep, overrun with Red Templar’s, their behemoths, and Red Lyrium infected Giants—Varric’s call of “Shit! Shit! Red Lyrium made those things even worse!” was very informative and helpful.

Ishmael offered himself as informative and helpful, when they at last caught up to them. Ugh. He offered Cassandra power, riches, and…virgins, of all things.

He doesn’t even have any, Cole informed her silently, with the cheery addition, I’m a virgin* and you already have me!

Ahh. Well then, she hardly needed a thing from this demon, did she?

“…Then we all live happily ever after,” Ishmael finished his rant meant to cajole her into letting him go, “Well, not all of us,” he supposed, he did intend to kill Michel upon his release from the Inquisition’s pursuit, “but who’s counting?”

Eleanor. The girl was absolutely counting both the lives this decision would affect, and counting on Cassandra to handle this in the best way possible, which thankfully meant, “No,” Cassandra succinctly declined, “I’m killing you.” Which earned her a cheer of approval from Sera. Where was she? Oh, Vivienne had taken the girl quite literally under her wing—the Enchantress stood with her arm protectively around Sera’s shoulders whilst the Human woman stared down the demon Ishmael.

Demons Ishmael. He shift into the form of a Fear demon and immediately summoned two Fearlings to assist him, horrible creatures, like large swarms of maggots* crawling over one another in an effort to propel their masses forward to attack—as if the Horrors already at the demon’s side weren’t threat enough. Their forced united were strong and fearsome, standing against Ishmael even as his health depleted and he shifted into a massive demon of Rage, following this act by…well, his dying efforts were rather impressive as he shifted form a third and final time into a demon of Pride upon which Cassandra dealt a deadly blow. A very literal example of pride coming before the fall, as they say.

“Excellent work, darling,” Vivienne complimented, Cassandra nodding, breathing a sigh of relief that the demon was slain without- oh she’d put Eleanor entirely from her mind, she had to, she could not risk that horrible creature learning the Inquisitor was near and injured—he could have turned his attention upon her or…or offered her as an option Cassandra may well have been truly enticed to accept, if he’d been able to promise to remove her Mark? The…the guarantee that when she woke she did not utterly fear and despise the Seeker? She knew better than to dare accept any such thing, but she’d rather not risk it at all. Now she wondered after both of the girl’s, she wanted guarantees Eleanor was alright- I will go, I can check, I’ll step in range and come right back! Cole promised. Excellent, now. Sera.

“Are you alright?” Cassandra checked on the girl. She’d a cut on her temple that was steadily closing, she’d taken potion, good. Cassandra raised a hand to wipe at the blood trailing down Sera’s face, though she’d not gotten her attention. “Sera?”

“Shite, sorry hi. You’re okay, yeah?” Sera worried.

“I’m well,” Cassandra promised, following the girl’s gaze as Sera was still staring at something over the Seeker’s shoulder. Oh, scorches on stone where those horrible fearlings had been laid slain. “Did they frighten you badly, Sera? What did you see?”

“Nothing,” she whispered.
Nothing? “Sera, if you’d rather not discuss it you need only say so, you needn’t lie—“
“No, mum, I saw nothing, it was friggin’—“ she shuddered, arms wrapping around Cassandra’s waist as she buried her head against the shorter Human woman’s chest plate, sniffling, “you saw somethin’ different? You okay?”

“Maggots—I’d a childhood disdain for the things.” Being raised by Mortalisi had imbued it in her, she’d been utterly…she hadn’t coped well initially with the concept of death, that one day her body would be wholly helpless, all her strength and intelligence left to be consumed by maggots, it had only worsened with Antony’s demise, she’d been utterly distraught at the notion that the body that carried her so much of her childhood, hugged, protected, was broken and lifeless and nothing more than meal for maggots. “I’m alright—we’re alright sweetheart. We will settle things here and return to Eleanor and she will be so proud of our work today.”

She would, and she’d benefit from their work. As they took their leave of the place, could render closer attention to their surroundings and Cassandra realized there were several passable sprigs of Prophet’s Laurel. She’d not- she was no Healer, she hadn’t remembered it was commonly used in Healing remedies, she’d thought to collect it since…well it was believed it had its glowing sun-esque streaks and flowerings because it had been blessed by Andraste herself*. Sera and Cole delighted in picking the stuff, “sandra! You’re freaking the best!” Sera declared her, oh, goodness. “We can make Inky potion! Prophet’s Laurel is boss at healin’!”

“I’m certain Lady Eleanor will appreciate it,” Lord Berand encouraged.
She would. When she woke. When. She would. Cassandra had dreaded it, in that she was dreading facing the girl. But it was getting to a point Cassandra would be grateful if the girl rose up and slapped her in the face, screamed and swore and declared her hatred for the woman if it just meant she was awake and recovered and…

What if she’d been too late? What if it had been utterly futile, her burning Red Lyrium from Eleanor’s blood? What if the damage was already done and she was comatose? Or woke and was…vegetative. Or had an alarming dip in her sanity? Cassandra wished she would wake in the same way one wished to have something painful pulled from their skin as swiftly as possible—a rush of pain as opposed to some drawn out affair.

Her heart leapt with excitement when she heard Sera’s voice as she neared the tent, “…
and then there was these friggin giants Ink—Cuddly got ‘em chasin’ him in circles, it was right hilarious! Bull took ‘em down easy peasy. And ‘sandra was a right badass handlin’ Ishpish. He didn’t stand a freaking chance! She told him off and killed him dead!” but she was regaling her sleeping sister in the tale of how their day had gone. Sweet. A let down, but it was heartening, how enthusiastically the girl told her story. She was seated with her legs crisscrossed, on the cot alongside Eleanor as she spoke a mile a minute. “Suledin Keep is freaking huge Inky. We gotta play tag in it! In the Fade, once you’re all better. Kay? I’m gonna go make potion for you—fresh! We found Prophet’s Laurel at the Keep! Mum saw it, I didn’t even notice! We picked it all! I’m gonna borrow your birthday potions book, ‘cause I don’t got the recipe memorized but I’ll take extra good care of it, promise.”

“You wished to discuss something my dear?” Vivienne questioned as she came to Cassandra’s side.

She did. In privacy. She wasn’t certain exactly where such privacy would be secured from the whole of Eleanor’s party and their guests in Berand’s men.

It wasn’t. They settled on the Tower of Bone. The place was called as much for the discovery of several hundred Human bones found in a hidden chamber beneath the flagstones*. The bones had been cremated in accordance to Chantry law, and the chamber itself was cleansed and sealed—it’s antechamber was still accessible, and it had taken Leliana’s people little time to unearth it upon their claim to the place. They had to pass a great deal of Red Lyrium corruption, but once at the base of the tower, and inside the antechamber proper? They were met with a proper room, four solid stone walls with doors on either side—one was sealed permanently against a place that held the dead, and the other could be closed securely behind them, offering them privacy.

The Enchantress cast to spark the sconces to light so they were not in utter darkness, resting her hands on her hips as she looked to the Seeker expectantly. “To what do I owe the dusty pleasure?”

“I apologize there is no proper place for such a meeting but I need to discuss with you a matter of strict confidence.”

“Do you plan to elucidate or shall we enjoy this miserable mise en scène until we perish? The Mortalis raised among us might be at home in a crypt, but I assure you it is not a universal feeling.”

“Are you reduced to cattiness when you lack the supervision of Eleanor or Marehis?” Vivienne sighed. “I apologize, I’m…tetchy. Being so constantly exposed Red Lyrium has been exhausting and I—” it almost looked like the woman physically bit her tongue out of reflex, like she would absolutely never be so inclined to confess such a thing.

“Are you feeling unwell or…out of balance?” Cassandra carefully pressed, “It is understandable, you could be returned to Skyhold or take time to see Bastien, you must miss him terribly—”

“It is not myself I am concerned about!” Vivienne all but snapped, sighing in frustration, “Sera is so new to her magic, and Eleanor may be skilled in thwarting demon influence but we have seen Red Lyrium give demons access to torture Seekers on a physical level, if there is even a trace of it left in her—” she shuddered, “and having so much about, its presence wears the veil thin and it…has been causing even myself to dream in the Fade without the use of Lyrium.”

Oh. Cassandra rested a hand on the woman’s shoulder, “You have not been sleeping well,” she sympathized.

“I fear for the young mages in our camp more than I am concerned with my own beauty rest but yes. I have not been sleeping well at all.”

“Yes the Inquisition’s Head Apothecary is a delight but I’ve my own Healers I trust with my personal care, thank you,” Vivienne’s tone was terse though she loosed the tension in her frame, raising her hand to overlap Cassandra’s on her shoulder, “I am reduced to cattiness when I’m unsupervised and feeling anything less than perfectly well. I do mean thank you, sincerely. It is kind of you to be concerned. You’re—”

“Expressing concern as a friend and not falseness to compromise you further.”

“Yes, that,” Vivienne patted her hand twice before dropping it back to rest on her hip, “Now you, darling. What did you wish to discuss?”

“Something that…you may be more relieved to hear of than I previously anticipated,” Cassandra supposed. “I’ve had time to sort through the Seekers tome. There are some things I will be bringing to Eleanor’s attention as she is Inquisitor and tasked with the reformation of our system at large. One of those things is a matter that Cole has communicated to me about—Eleanor and possession.”

“I know she’s thwarted possession in the past but it is not unreasonable to be concerned—”

“That is just it, Vivienne I…I do not think Eleanor has thwarted possession of her own will. Not continuously, anyway.”

After she’d a vow from the Grand Enchanter that she would not so much as breathe a word of this outside of Cassandra’s confidence, Vivienne was silent as Cassandra disclosed to her the history of Tranquility, Cole’s commentary on the matter.

“So a mind touched by Faith is immune to possession?”

“I thought the whole of the ritual would be required, but Cole insists it is not the case.”

“…it would…explain a great deal,” Vivienne supposed. “Eleanor has been easy prey for demonic influence on multiple occasions. It’s almost defies sense she would continuously withstand such attacks without a demon’s success. Too…”

“Yes?”

“Well. Her ability to find objects of value and importance to her task at hand, more often than not items that reveal truths about things—the way she could find with immediacy the letters and documents in Sahriia Quarry?” Vivienne listed. “She attributed these things to her magic, and that may well be from where they stem, but what put that ability there?”

“…you believe-“

“It is a Seeker ability, yes.”

…

She was not certain if perhaps she was sleep deprived or it was some byproduct of her depression, but Cassandra laughed. She laughed so hard she doubled over with her efforts and sent to tears.

“…Cassandra?” Vivienne softly questioned, concerned.

“Sh- she-”

“Breathe, darling, please.”

“She was five! I dedicated twice the years of her very life to becoming a Seeker!”

“I am not saying she is a Seeker proper, obviously,” Vivienne snapped, brow furrowed as she looked…almost like she was extending herself in vulnerability—to defend her claim instead of going on the offensive as if someone were mocking her and she needed to scathe them to into a puddle with her words. “But her mind was touched by Faith—that is where your immunity to possession and the powers branded ‘Seeker abilities’ are believed to come from, is that not the case? You did not read up on your ability to- the Seeker ability you possess. It was bestowed upon you at the completion of your vigil—your years of training are what qualified you in the Order’s eyes to guide you through ritual that would grant you as much.”

“I apologize I- I do promise I was not laughing at you. Just-“ Cassandra sighed as she finally caught her breath, “you’re correct, it would explain a great deal.”

“…it may be something to watch for closely in our Mage recruits,” Madam de Fer said, “Eleanor and myself have shared her methodology with those Enchanter Fiona trains—of ignoring the call of demons and pouring one’s focus into their faith in the Maker and calling for a Spirit’s aid.”

Oh. That might…she wasn’t certain what, exactly, that would mean, save for the possibility, “We may come to have those in our ranks with their minds touched by Faith, preserving them from risk of possession. Possibly leaving them with abilities they did not formerly have.” Abilities they could utilize…or abuse. It would be something to be mindful of, moving forward.

“I will move forward however you feel best,” Vivienne assured. “I can keep an eye for myself, or I can caution Fiona—with discretion, there would be no need to mention the Seekers, it could merely be a theory that has formed in our time observing Eleanor—she has only just been in close vicinity to a powerful demon influence while surrounded by Red Lyrium, injected with it even, badly injured and he could not take possession of her—I am certain he heard her bloodshed in the Quarry. She has been so disoriented, rambling in her slumber, we have all taken turn, doing what we can to safeguard her in the Fade, but demons have been crowding, making their attempts with us all.”

“Sera has not made complaint,” Cassandra worried the girl was keeping her fright in the Fade secret either in an endeavor not to worry those around her or perhaps out of pride, not wanting to appear weak in the face of a consequence she’d assured she was prepared to deal with when taking on her magic by choice.

However, there was something like relief in the Enchantress’s gaze then, even as a very neutral, “Good,” dropped from her lips.

…Cassandra was not certain if perhaps she was the one fighting possession. For a second time she feared Eleanor’s spirit at hand, but it was likely to be blamed upon the girl’s influence more than anything. Something possessed Cassandra to wrap her arms around Vivienne De Fer’s shoulders and hug her fiercely.

Vivienne…complained, it sounded like, the woman sounded wholly uncomfortable, “I have disclosed my…less than derisive feelings for the child. I would hardly wish to see her come to harm.”

In honesty, Cassandra had thought perhaps the woman was overstating her feelings for the girl in Eleanor’s presence as a form of manipulation to endear herself to the Human girl further. Something in her expression as she pulled away from the woman must have said as much because it prompted something of a frustrated huff from the Enchantress. “If you must know…having gotten to know the child…I see a great deal of myself in her. Meeting Sera today, you would never know the timid, painfully shy and withdrawn Seda Emmauld she has described.”

“Her change of address struck such a cord with you?”

Vivienne shrugged. “For all our differences, I’ve an appreciation for the mutual understanding she and I have of personal rebranding. It’s a wonder what a change of address can do…” she offered a small wink, “But all we’ve shared here today is done in confidence, is it not?”

She supposed that much was true, so she held the questions that rose to her mind, endeavoring to quell her piqued interest through personal restraint as she merely nodded in reply. She pushed open the fortress door, waiting until the Enchantress banished the fire she summoned, and they made their return to camp.

Cassandra made certain Leliana and Josephine were updated on the Inquisition’s newest conquest—they would make claim of Suledin Keep, if only to prevent the Red Templars or worse from settling there. And she checked if she’d word from Cullen—she did not but…well she felt badly for leaving him in suspense, and he was in travel, he’d likely precious little time to write, but if he could have an update waiting for him, that would sort. She sent off a quick letter, informing him Ishmael had been handled, that they were all safe.

—

She did not hear back from him. But neither did she have to.

It was not nightmares that woke her in the evening, it was the feather-light skim of the knuckles of a bare hand gently brushing her hair out of her face. “Cassandra?” whispered softly.

She felt groggy but…certain she was not dreaming, “Cullen.” Oh Maker. He was here.

As was, possibly…his ire.

_I don’t believe I’m capable of conveying how I feel at this moment in writing._

She sat up in her cot, intending to rise and take this outside, so they might talk or- or yell, if he needed to, to vent his frustrations-

She did not make it much further than swinging her legs over the edge of the cot before his mouth was on hers and he was kissing her like he was a man dying of thirst and she was the first vessel of cool, lifesaving water he so desperately needed. She could taste Elf-Root on his tongue and it alleviated the bit of headache she’d gone to bed with—though perhaps it was more so that he was here and safe and…and not outright casting her off, and it relinquished the bit of stress she’d been carrying that he might hate her for hurting Eleanor-

Somehow his words winded her more than his kiss, “Thank you,” were the first words from his lips once hers were her own once more, “Cassandra, Maker—thank you for acting so quickly, for saving Ellie, I- I don’t know what- if she’d been lost to Red Lyrrium because of this- this business—I would never forgive myself I-” he shook his head, “I would die. I truly think it would have killed me, there is no-” he swallowed, clearing his throat.

“I hurt her,” Cassandra whimpered out.

“I know, I know you had to and I’m so sorry Cassandra—thank you,” he breathed, fingers threading through her hair as the other brushed along her cheek, thumbing away her tears, “thank you for being strong enough to do that for her.”

Ugh, she was sniffling, “I thought you might hate me-“
“I don’t.”
“What if she hates me?”
“Cassandra I don’t think she even hates Corypheus—if he was willing to settle things with a polite conversation that ended in his genuine apology and a pinky swear not to try to destroy the world ever again? It’d be done. She loves you and you know that—this will not change that.”
“I’m glad you are here,” she confessed.
“So am I,” he assured, “are you alright? You were injured—you’ve recovered?” he worried.

She nodded left hand rubbing at the right of her ribcage, and then his hand was slipping under her sleep shirt, and he was kneeling to lay eyes on it herself, the bit of scarring, the angry red mark below her breast, the small pale puckering line of Eleanor’s incision in her side.

Two marks, laden with two kisses before he breathed, “Thank the Maker you are alive,” against her skin. And then he rose up, pressing a kiss to her forehead before excusing himself, “One moment,” he requested, and he left the tent.

He returned minutes later, clad in a soft tunic and trousers, smelling of soap, hair curling and damp atop his head, with his chestplate and pauldron’s in hand. He rested them at the foot of her cot before clumsily getting his boots off by stepping on the toe of one with the opposite foot to slide one foot out, and repeating the action with his socked foot—he nearly fell doing this, mind, offering up a smile when he managed to keep himself upright. It was a literal swing from smooth storybook romancing to endearing embarrassment that came with love in the flesh and oh Maker, she truly loved this man.

She truly did, oh she’d missed him. He held out his hands to her and pulled her up off the cot to hold her against him in a hug, a hand high on her back rubbing circles while the other palmed her right buttock as he maneuvered a transition of sorts—turning them about so his back was to the cot as he fell back pulling her along with him to lay atop him, the bit of bounce in the cot stirring Sera who blearily peeked open an eye to look at him,

“Hmm, heya dad-“
“She calls me dad!” Cullen quietly enthused against Cassandra’s ear, holding the woman more tightly in his excitement as Sera continued on,
“-are these sexy cuddles or can I get in on it?”
“You’re always welcome, sweetheart,” Cullen assured, chuckling as the girl rolled to lay over his arm and snuggle up against his side, her arm around Cassandra’s back as the Elf girl sighed contentedly. She’d no sooner got the man’s arm around her than he was fast asleep, wholly exhausted. When last had he slept?

She let him rest when she woke—he was feverish and she worried about the dip that seemed deeper between his cheekbones and jaw, like the man hadn’t been eating well enough. Cassandra would see to breakfast...perhaps single handedly. Everyone was rather soundly asleep, Sera was snoring directly into Cullen’s ear, but it wasn’t like the man wasn’t returning the favor. Marehis was fast asleep, curled against Sera’s back. Even Cole was prone, at least simulating dozing, against Varric’s chest.

She checked on Eleanor, still soundly asleep, before she went out into the chill of their camp. The fire was high, thankfully—she was the only person in their tent awake, but a few members of Thom and Berand’s men were gathered around the fire, sipping coffee and eating fruit and dried meat from their stores. They were much more interested in the meal of oatmeal and eggs and fried ram she was considering providing for the whole of camp, so she had more than enough helping hands to do just that. She heard movement from their tent—no one emerged from it but she clearly heard signs of life from Sera who let out a happy shriek. Had the girl not been fully awake when Cullen arrived? She must have forgotten he was here and been delightfully surprised all over again, that was sweet. Well, the man was sure to be awake now, the others would likely rouse as the smells of breakfast filled the air, so she went ahead and gathered up a plate for the man—he would do likewise for her.

Though she ultimately did not do so for him because her hands failed her. She dropped the plate of food the moment she entered the tent.

Varric was seated…receiving a hug from a fully awake Eleanor who was blushing and giggling at his theatrics as he let out an almost alarming groan,

“Oh man, that’s it—that’s the good stuff. Hawke can’t hug for shit Tumbles.”

“He can too!” Eleanor defended, her voice was weak but her defense as fierce as ever, though the sound of Cassandra’s mishap with the breakfast she’d brought startled the girl, left her jerking a bit as she looked up from the rather impressive gathering of her party around the cot, Sera was seated directly behind the girl, supporting her so it was not of her own strength she had to sit up, Cullen seated at her side while Marehis had risen and taken claim of the chair beside Eleanor’s cot, empty bottles of potion in her hands.

Eleanor’s gaze fell on Cassandra.

And then she smiled, her voice hoarse but what enthusiasm she could muster was freely given, “Hi my mami! I was wondering where you were.”

Cassandra’s mouth worked. Which was a strange way of describing such a thing, as it meant her mouth wasn’t working, at least not insofar as creating proper sounds that formed speech.

“Stop standing there like someone crazy—Inky’s up!” Sera cheered.

“Are you okay?” Eleanor worried, patting the space before her, “Come sit. M-maybe you shouldn’t be getting up so early—did you sleep enough? You’re probably still recovering. I know it wouldn’t be any fun all by yourself, but you could keep anyone you wanted except papi ‘cause he’s gotta work—but we could drop you off at the Marchand’s when we pass Val Royeaux to get to the Shrine of Dumat. You can just relax and rest up and we’ll swing back around on our way to the Western Approach—“

“Who said you’re to join us at the Shrine of Dumat?” Cullen questioned. And then, “Wait, just how did you know that was where—“

“Inquisitor—answer to both of your questions,” Eleanor informed him. “I say I’m joining you at the Shrine, and I know that’s where we’re going because Tatie found out Calpernia’s vying to be Corypheus’s ‘vessel’ when we were in Val Royeaux together, and she said that the Shrine was likely their next point of interest, Calpernia’s all mad because Corypheus says she can’t go to the Shrine even though she’s certain that’s where she could best train to be his vessel. When I saw Samson rambling about wanting to be vessel too? I figure Corypheus probably has something or someone at the Shrine working on this vessel business, and he doesn’t want his candidates interfering with his behind-the-scenes plots. As a point of reference,” Eleanor cautioned, “all of my behind-the-scenes plots involve me getting snacks, and I usually share. I feel like maybe if we advertised that, we’d get some Red Templar/Venatori converts.”

Had the girl truly just brandished her authority as Inquisitor to overrule her father’s opinion on the matter and then followed that with the assurance she was a trustworthy leader because her only conniving plots involved sweets?

Cassandra wasn’t certain if she was laughing because she truly found it hilarious, or if she was slappy happy in the wake of her child waking and- and not despising her or acting under the influence of Red Lyrium.

“Mami?” Eleanor was smiling, confused but amused, and the Seeker stepped over the mess she’d made of breakfast to crawl onto the cot and sit before this girl and pull her into a hug. Varric was absolutely correct, this was, indeed, the good stuff.

“I’m so sorry,” did not feel nearly sufficient to describe the fullness of her remorse.

“Don’t be sad, I’m okay,” she promised, followed by words the others had spoken over these past few days—a sentence she did not believe could be true until it came with certainty from Eleanor’s lips, her voice to her perspective, “Thank you for saving me.”

Cassandra brushed a hand along Eleanor’s cheek, “How are you feeling?”

“Tired. Potion is helping, but I’m definitely going back to sleep—but my mouth wants to taste real food and I want caught up on what everyone’s been doing—fill me! In and up!”

Oh heavens, Sera snickered, met with Eleanor’s reprimanding,

“Sera!”

“In ’n up,” the Elf girl giggled to herself.

They did, in a fashion wholly unlike Sera’s amusements. Oh, it was relieving to see Eleanor awake. Though it wasn’t entirely relieving to have Lord Berand make the discovery that she was—the man…wasn’t rude but he did overstep his welcome after a fashion, rushing to join them in the tent to rhapsodize over Eleanor’s recovery which was sweet, but Cassandra was worried the next words out of his mouth might be some sort of awful confession that thankfully did not come. And he made no moves to act physically—Cullen was not moving from Eleanor’s side, neither was Marehis about to give up her seat, and Sera was absolutely unrelenting in her hold—Cole took up the task of kindly feeding Sera since ‘her arms are busy holding Ellie’, apologizing to Eleanor’s hair whenever he dropped a bit of egg in it before announcing “Oh! It likes it! Just not cooked*,” which was met with Eleanor’s supposition that hair likely benefits from the proteins found in egg. Needless to say, the girl was very well surrounded so Lord Berand stood awkwardly at the foot of the cot as he visited. Which he was apparently doing until…well she hoped he would have the sense to step out once Eleanor was tired, honestly, but she was certain he would take his leave if Eleanor or one in her party asked him to. Ugh.

Cassandra did her best to articulate everything that had come to pass in her sleep, the girl looked aghast at the notion that they’d all gone dragon slaying twice in one day. She was relieved Emprise du Lion was well and secured. Cole disappeared only momentarily to get something from the requisitions table—mail for Eleanor, letters from Lady Montilyet confirming her dear friend Edouard Desjardins* had agreed to take a leadership position in the area on behalf of the Inquisition—he would oversee Suledin Keep’s operations and the people of Sahrnia could rely upon him, and the Inquisition through him, during this time as they lacked leadership.

“There’s so few people, I was wondering if maybe we could make sure they know they can work with the Inquisition. I mean Suledin Keep might be more secure than what’s left of their town, and we could always use more people, and they could relocate anywhere afterward if Sahrnia isn’t salvageable as a habitable place. The Inquisition would be a good way for some of them to find someplace new, we’ve camps all over the place, they’ll pass through lots of places in their travels.”

“I don’t know that they would all be able to find work in the Inquisition,” Vivienne voiced concern, “there are elderly members of their town.”

“So?” Eleanor questioned like it was the most absurd concern. “Granny Mae is a treasure of the world and the Inquisition would be lucky to have her! She knows so many things! And she can crochet! That’s like! Fancy knitting or something. She can read and write and cook like nobody’s business! She could help with requisitions and mail and things like that or meals in Suledin Keep, she’s old not dead! Oh! Did you give her mama’s ring back?”

Had they?

“Uh-huh,” Sera confirmed, “she sent this!” Pressing rather the long…messy sounding kiss to her cheek.

“Sera!”

“She’s a slobbery lady!”

“You’re ridiculous and I love you and I’m going to miss you when I go back to sleep!”

Eleanor informed her, “But first I wanna write my boyfriend because I miss him and he’s not making a surprise visit, is he?” she wondered, as if hopeful Cullen was about to reveal he’d hidden Lieutenant Aclassi in his pack this whole time.
“That would ruin a surprise, now wouldn’t it?” Cullen said.

Eleanor swatted her father with the letter she just unsealed, “He’s helping your troops gather for the Western Approach! Cause that’s probably going to be a big fight to stop the Wardens from whatever they’re doing. Awe, papito!” she cooed, looking to Cole who vanished and reappeared with one thing more from the requisitions table. Oh…awe indeed. Cremisius had fashioned his girlfriend an evergreen nug with Orlesian blue buttons for eyes and matching bow tie, a small parchment tag attached with the Lieutenant’s script reading Get well soon, lovely, and she was burying her face into the plush creature’s head. “He’s the cutest! This nug, and my boyfriend—I have the cutest boyfriend!”

“It’s a shame he couldn’t manage the journey to be at your side in this time,” Lord Berand said…in tones that sounded like it was a shame but to Cassandra’s ears smacked of judgement—like the man did truly believe it to be unfortunate in a way that he thought poorly of the younger man for not dropping his every responsibility and going to Eleanor’s side.

“I miss him, but I’m really proud him for all his hard work, and the longer the wait the even better it feels when we’re back together again! Cremisius is pretty smart—if I’m not careful he might just wise up and get bored of me if we were together all the time,” Eleanor teasingly supposed with a giggle.

“Only an utter fool would find themselves bored in your company,” Berand argued.

“I do seem to have a lot of crazy stuff happening around me all the time!” Eleanor supposed… Sera buried her face against the girl’s hair while Varric had to wholly advert his gaze like he was internally screaming in amusement laced frustration, Madam de Fer palmed her own face while Dorian and the Iron Bull quietly groaned, wincing as the girl cheerily breezed right past the man’s…not flirtations but competition, of sorts, toward her boyfriend. Where he implied that he himself would never bore of her were she in romance with him, she saw her friend making commentary on her currently adventurous life keeping those who kept her company on their toes. “I guess I don’t really have to worry about boredom striking until after we’ve finished this whole ‘saving the world’ business is done,” she said, wondering, “Sahrnia’s squared away—when do we have to leave for the Shrine?”

“Sometime between tomorrow and never,” Cullen said.

“Kay—tomorrow morning we’ll saddle up and hit the road. Gently. I’m riding with somebody and they gotta be down with holding me ‘cause I’m sleeping. And making sure my nug doesn’t fall—his name is William, he’s mine and Cremisius’s first born son! If I die, he gets everything!” she informed them, “Have Tia update my will!”

“Imekari,” Bull groaned the complaint of her will-talk.

“Oh! I’ve got a will!” Sera…decided, it sounded like, more than she likely actually had one written up and notarized. No, she’d a verbal one she was making before them, “m’leaving it all to my ghost—don’t none of you assholes touch my stuff! Cept Inky can call dibs on whatever she wants but she’s gotta fight my ghost for it!”

“Deal!” Eleanor readily agreed, “Now. Who wants to nap with me?”

“Sounds good Imekari,” the Iron Bull said, looking to Berand, “Visiting hours are over my man. Kid should get some rest.”

“Of course,” Berand said, bowing to excuse himself, “I wish you sweet dreams, my Lady.” She liked it less and less every time he managed to work the words into his speech. She did like that the man did finally take his leave, however. Maker.

Cullen was immediate to lie back down alongside the girl and pull she and Sera close. Oh he’d missed them terribly. Too, he dearly needed to rest, Cassandra indulged in joining them, it was the best sleep she’d gotten since…well, since Skyhold, really. Eleanor laid on her uninjured side, facing Cassandra so she could share her stuffed nug. A ridiculous thing but her life seemed full of ridiculous things that she couldn’t imagine being without.

They left Sahrnia the following morning. They…had to tell Eleanor of the existence of two Rifts on the other side of Judicael’s Crossing, but Cullen sat down and took her hands in his and vowed, his soldiers would make this place safe for any who traveled through—such travel was unlikely given Sahrnia’s current state, all were avoiding it—she was in no condition to attempt sealing two high level Rifts. If it was truly necessary, they could and would return to seal the Rifts when she’d the strength to do so…Cole’d the fear with everything else taxing her body just now, her heart might stop and they were none of them willing to risk it refusing to resume beating.

“I…I could let everyone else do the fighting…maybe we can knock me out and someone can just hold my Marked hand up and see what happens?” Eleanor proposed.

“Mija,” Cullen shook his head, reaching out to tuck a few curls behind her ear. She nodded, “Yeah, I…I know I can’t do it right now,” she confessed. But that did not mean she would ignore the danger the Rifts possessed, “Josie might hate me but…no one can get hurt by the Rifts if we close off access to them…”

“You wish to close or…deconstruct the repairs to Judicael’s Crossing?” Cullen surmised.

“Maybe? Gosh I’d feel garbage ordering your soldiers to undo all their hard work, so I’m thinking ‘closing it’. And blocking off the gate over there. People can detour around Sahrnia, there’s roads and things…those might need like, announcements or signs or something? Can we do that? I wouldn’t want to step on anyone’s toes. Who owns the bridge? Its Orlais’ road but like, does that mean it belongs to the Empress or the people or a Marquis or something?”

“The Inquisition currently holds responsibility over it. Think nothing of it darling,” Vivienne spoke up, “Allow me to step in with my court connections Eleanor, won’t you please?” she pled, “I am certain Lady Montilyet and myself, we can placate any who would find complaint with your judgement—the area will be secure, and any petty political feelings will be pacified.” She drew near, brushing Eleanor’s hair back as she intoned, “You are to put every concern you have about this matter entirely from your precious mind, my darling.” And then, with all the poise of a woman well versed in the precision and propriety the slightest hand gestures required when under the scrutiny of a ballroom of Orlesian nobility, Madam Vivienne de Fer raised a single, delicate pinkie finger as she announced, “you are to promise me—you will trust me, and therefore you will not worry.”

Eleanor smiled, linking her pinkie finger around the Enchantress’s, “I promise.” “Excellent.”

It was, oh Maker, she hoped the girl didn't allow unnecessary anxieties to press on her at this time. Worry sank in Cassandra’s stomach as Eleanor was dressed in armor and accepted the offer of Sera’s arm, leaning on the older girl as they made way to leave camp, Eleanor’s steps were careful and labored like relying on her own ability to move forward was painful, a soft sound of discomfort catching in her throat.

“My Lady?” Lord Berand approached, his greeting offered in concern, and his gaze swept across them like he was looking for someone to inform the Inquisitor she was to return to bed and when no one did any such thing he smiled and proceeded as planned. The Inquisitor’s orders were clear and when they conveyed that to Berand and his men last night, the man had readily offered up their steeds for anyone in their party that wished to ride instead of walk—especially their recovering Inquisitor. “My men have offered the services of our steeds until you can be reunited with your own—my stallion, Patrick, he would carry you and any you wish to join you. It would be best not to ride alone given your injury.” Well yes, they’d made it clear Eleanor would have someone they trusted riding with her.

“Thanks—you’re sure? I feel badly, stealing your horse,” Eleanor apologized. “Think nothing of it, my Lady,” the Lord kindly assured reaching for her free hand which she gave him, and then he guided her to him, putting himself between she and Sera who did not look entirely pleased as he led Eleanor to his steed, and then he raised her hand to his lips which was…could be a perfectly benign thing but Cassandra did not care for, “you needn’t steal anything—it is an offer and too, we could share it. If you would allow me the honor—I would keep you from harm, you could sleep all you like in my hold.” Oh. Ugh.

Eleanor blinked, albeit confused before smiling and saying, “That’s nice of you to offer but you really don’t have to, I appreciate it but I’m probably definitely going to fall asleep and that’d be boring—”

“My Lady, do me a teensy favor and cease referring to yourself with that word. You are far from boring, and I would delight in holding you—” he seemed to catch himself, his words sounding…Cassandra would term it creepy, even to himself. He had the grace to blush and step back from the young woman, “as you’re injured and need rest—it is merely an offer.”

It was altogether awkward and ugh. In righting his blunder he blundered further—she didn’t wish him having his hands on Eleanor any further but releasing her so swiftly and stepping back put the whole of her weight back to being carried by her frame alone, she winced, grasping at her side and she might have doubled over and risked falling, were it not for Cullen who wrapped his arm around her, pulling her close as he stared at Berand with quiet distrust. Well. Not entirely quiet, it was then it clicked for Cullen that perhaps a man outside the Inquisitor’s inner circle—made of those who had proven themselves to be trusted with her—offering to have her sleep and rely on his hold to secure her was a red flag. He assured him, “I am more than capable of seeing to my daughter’s safety,” he assured, looking to Eleanor with warm regard, “My own steed would suffice if you would you care to ride with me, mija?”

“Uh-huh,” Eleanor agreed, looking to Berand, “I hope it’s no offense to you—you’re the best just, I really missed my papi, and I just have people I’m comfortable with helping me because I’m used to them helping me like this, we kind of do it all the time—I take a lot of road naps,” she offered up humorously. “If you were to do it I would just feel badly and uncomfortable about having you do something definitely not in your job description.”

“Of course!” Berand assured he was unoffended, smiling, abashed with his embarrassment, which did seem genuine like he did truly understand it wasn’t an appropriate thing to have offered. “I apologize, I should have realized I would be overstepping—I do not partake of road naps but when I think about it…neither would I be comfortable with any of my men making certain I don’t fall from the saddle as I sleep,” he supposed.

“’s’because we’re right arse- er, childish,” one of his men caught himself as he jested, “we’d either be swapping coin on when he’s gonna fall and let it happen.”

Another snorted, “Make it happen ourselves.”

“Awe,” Eleanor looked up at her father as she sweetly assured him, “if you drop me for coin I will devastate you emotionally—you will never know your grand-nug and your grand-puppy will be trained to poo in your boots.”

“Oh sweetheart I’d never drop you for coin,” Cullen assured. “Unless you asked me to and it was an arrangement to split the winnings.”

“Tio taught me how to fall from horses without getting hurt—once doing that won’t actually kill me, we could rob everyone blind!” Eleanor conspired.

“Yeah babe,” the Iron Bull offered, a few laughs rumbling from his throat, “might not wanna announce your scam plans though.” His advice earned him a show of tongue from Eleanor and- Cullen. The absolute child. He raised a hand to pull down on a lower eyelid as he joined their Inquisitor, sticking out his tongue.

She’d never been one to consider marriage before her time in the Inquisition and now time and time again it worried her beyond belief that it was moments such as these that brought the topic to mind. Not the topic—the feeling. It was an emotion, Cassandra discovered, there was an actual, legitimate emotion labeled I want to marry this man, and she did not appreciate it, and she would be consulting her Healers because surely it was some misfiring due to her potions regimen.

Cassandra joined them, supporting Eleanor momentarily while Cullen got into the saddle of his own horse and then Cassandra helped the girl to get into the saddle before him—she chose to walk alongside the steed while Sera and Marehis took up riding on Ser Patrick since Lorde Berand was feeling so very generous.

Cullen assisted Eleanor and Sera in fulfilling their promise to the woman they’d discovered perishing of Red Lyrium poisoning—he led his steed to the fallen, hollowed out tree the woman had said her husband would look to when he returned from war, and Eleanor thanked her sister as Sera dropped from her own saddle to dash up and deposit the letter for the widower as instructed.

Eleanor did gingerly unseat herself—looking very much like she regretted it because it only meant she had to reseat herself later—to address Michel, who was awaiting them in Sahrnia to see them off.

But she pushed through, handling it amicably, “You know…we could always use another agent,” Eleanor said, “Someone with your experience would be a really great asset. I mean gosh you could help any of my advisors I think!”

“I would be honored to join the Inquisition,” Michel agreed.

“Great! Hmm…full nepotism, I’m assigning you to Cullen—’cause he’s my favorite and I’m decently sure he’s staring at me and I think he wants you for his team real bad.” Cullen had whispered a rejoicing ‘yes!’ as he pumped his fist when she announced Michel’s assignment, so. She wasn’t wrong. “If Josie and Leliana really wanted you, they’d be here too, staring at me—so that’s on them.” Obviously.

—

There was no vacation to Val Royeaux. Due mostly in part to the fact it anguish Cassandra straight to her core to worry and frighten Eleanor needlessly, and that was the closest they got to convincing the girl to let Cullen handle their dealings at the Shrine of Dumat—after two days of riding with Eleanor alternating between being comatose in the saddle before the Iron Bull who vowed to keep careful guard of she and her nug, and chugging vials of Vehnan root tonic, they concocted a plot to pursued the girl to indulge them. Marehis made complaint of her monthly, that it was lasting longer than what was normal for her, that she was in a great deal of pain from cramping, which was met with Eleanor’s concern and she offered to see the woman safely settled in Val Royeaux, but she really did need to see this investigation through. Their plan B was Cassandra and she failed miserably—she would have been successful if she could have borne the guilt. She attempted to feign complication with her injury and developing some sort of respiratory ailment, because surely the girl wouldn’t leave her if she were ailing from something Eleanor would feel the need to be at hand to help with, but her child looked so stricken at the sound of Cassandra’s very convincing coughs and the woman was immediately remorseful—she could quite literally feel the Maker most High looking down upon her with the threat of damning her for her cruel attempts at deception—and instead of voicing false concern for her own health she offered up a very pathetic sounding, “I apologize, I got pepper caught in the back of my throat.” Which was met by disappointment-mixed understanding from her co-conspirators, the adults at their dinner fire, and Eleanor and Sera’s unified, apparently jinxing, offers of their own waters to the Seeker. Maker help them.

They did manage to make excellent progress forward and Madam de Fer, while she could not dissuade Eleanor from her station, she could sway the girl to end their days of riding early, make camp sooner than what they would normally, to allow the Enchanter the opportunity to work on Eleanor’s hair for several hours in the evenings to prepare it for their time in the desert. It was a style that derived from Rivain—popular among pirates and psychics but it garnered popularity even cross-continent, in Antiva for its style and benefits. It was a great deal of work, took three evenings in camp for Vivienne to straighten sections of Eleanor’s curls she weaved into small, taut, conditioned braids that fell to the middle of her back until she’d a head of braids that Vivienne assured would protect her hair from the heat, her hair would support itself structurally and retain moisture, be defended from wear from their environment, and ultimately protect her hair from what Sera described as poofing all over the place. Though there was one minor complaint that came from the girl’s new hairstyle, “Gah!” Dorian yelped their first morning in Orlais’s desert when he was behind Eleanor in line to have oatmeal slopped into a bowl by the Iron Bull and the girl whipped her hair back over her shoulders to keep it out of the way, braids smacking the Tevinter man in the face, “Woman! You’ve weaponized the child’s hair!”
“That’s why it’s called a protective style, Tio!” Eleanor informed him, the man’s features scrunching as he endeavored not to laugh as the girl whipped her head to and fro to lightly smack him with her hair as she declared, “It’s protecting me!”
Maker help them all.
The Shrine of Dumat…was no holy place, not as far as Cassandra was concerned. It was filled with Venatori and Red Templars.
“I know the Inquisition really wanted to bring Mages and Templars together but I’m like, 95% positive this isn’t what Divine Justinia meant,” Eleanor supposed when she took in the sight of the enemies awaiting in the Shrine’s courtyard.
“No,” Cassandra assured her, “it is not.”
She’d been quietly resentful, how great their own numbers were because it meant Berand and his men were still insisting upon tagging along—the Lord had asked Cullen if he would like their assistance and Cullen…sweet, fool man that he was, thought it was very kind of the Lord, thanked him and invited him along without hesitation. But she was very grateful they’d the strength of Thom’s men and Berand’s backing the Inquisition’s troops and scouts that awaited them at the Shrine. Too…
She did so rarely get to truly fight in genuine battle alongside the man. And it was…
She’d thought the notion of the Iron Bull’s er…appreciation of Dragon fights to be appalling when she learned what that Qunlat phrase he shouted meant. But Taarsidath-an halsaam summed the heat of battle with Cullen at her side very nicely. It just would not be happening at any point in the near future while they traveled with so many in close quarters with their children—she had every respect for Marehis because if she’d been walking around with Cullen’s handprint on her backside for Eleanor and Sera to see, she would surely die of the embarrassment. She nearly did so when they crossed the river that led from Lake Celestine to the Waking Sea, and Dorian oh so sweetly wondered if Cassandra could do with a bit of a break—they were passing the loveliest stretch of fishing docks. Cullen? No? Everyone was fine? Eleanor perceived the man’s pettiness as a subtle way of saying that he needed a break and the girl had them stop to take on fresh water for their stores, dismounting to limp to his side and dote on the man because oh, she knew he must be exhausted and uncomfortable and she was sorry they had to have such hard riding days but she was so very grateful he was with them. Maker bless her heart. It was a sweet vengeance to Cassandra’s mind, the man was remorseful, waving off Eleanor’s concern and returning her attentions, kicking the Iron Bull from his own steed so the Tevinter man could ride while supporting the girl and reciting something that sounded akin to a children’s bedtime story in her ear.
The Shrine of Dumat was the stuff of nightmares.
They found two mages at the center of Corypheus’s plot—at the center of the Shrine’s innermost chamber. A Tevinter Magister, Erasthenes, held by some horrible ritual of binding magic of Corypheus’s designs…a magical barrier that surrounded him, kept him on his knees on the ground and cracked with waves of electricity that were surely hitting him, torturing him. He was certain, he said, Corypheus would put Calpernia in something similar—more powerful—once he’d a vessel, be it Calpernia or Samson. Corypheus apparently enjoyed having the two at odds, would see which one is truly committed, who can withstand the vessel’s burden once it was time to at last choose.
This place burned with little fires all throughout , the Red Templars had been actively attempting to destroy the place as the Inquisition stormed it and the air was full of smoke, Eleanor’s voice was muffled as she spoke through her scarf, “Can we get him out?” she asked Vivienne quietly.
“I’m sorry darling. I… I couldn’t even begin to imagine what makes up his prison,” Vivienne apologized.

“Papi?” Eleanor checked with Solas.

“I am sorry, da’vehnan. I know not how Corypheus has constructed this, it goes beyond my understanding of his magic—it isn’t Elvehnan in design, it is something he knows or created himself,” Solas said.

Eleanor nodded, looking to Cullen, “Let Leliana’s people talk with him, see if they can get some answers…and then um,” she cleared her throat, “put him out of his misery. That can’t- that’s no way- he’ll be die in there as it stands. Get your information, make sure he’s ready and then um, he can choose, to be left or to um, end it.”

“It is cruelty, to be compassionate,” Cole murmured the assurance to Eleanor who nodded.

And then… there was Maddox.

Cullen knelt at the man’s side as he… oh Maker, he lay dying, poisoned at his own hand.

“We weren’t going to hurt you,” Eleanor promised, absolutely anguished at the thought fear of the Inquisition’s arrival sent the man to such drastic measures. “We can still help y-”

He cut her off, insisting he didn’t want or need their help. The Tranquil Mage sat and died spilling his Master’s rhetoric.

“I’m sorry papi,” Eleanor consoled Cullen, wrapping her arms around the man’s neck and hugging him tightly.

“Oh mija, it’s alright,” he returned, hand cradling the crown of her head, “We should get you out of here, this place is foul.” He waved his hand to disperse a plume of smoke and for a moment Cassandra thought the man might rise up and begin swinging his arms like a Human windmill to combat the air that posed threat to his child.

“Magic says there are things here that are useful. Maybe there’s something to salvage—we’ll be real quick,” she promised.

Oh, thank the Maker. Eleanor was able to point out a few places to scavenge for information—they found tools and work left behind by Maddox, for the armor he maintained for Samson, something bastardized by Red Lyrium.

“Widdle’ll be able to do something with this,” Sera was certain, “We’ll write her as soon as we settle tonight, yeah Ink?”

They settled. Cullen settled rather hard, they’d gathered around their campfire, setting up camp even before the sun set as it had been… rather the taxing day, and Eleanor’d a great deal of correspondence to handle between her advisors in regard to their discoveries at the Shrine. Her Commander was fast asleep against Cassandra’s shoulder. Cole was sweet enough to appear before them and catch the mug of warm tea that would have poured all over the sleeping man if the Spirit hadn’t taken it in the moment Cullen’s hand laxed.

“He’s okay, he’s just tired,” Cole assured, though his words spilled over further, “He does not like how dangerous this has been, it hurts him how much hurt this has caused. He wishes things could be different for Samson, wishes he’d done more—something—when he was excommunicated. He wishes Ellie hadn’t seen the things we found at the Temple, Corypheus’s binding magic or Maddox dying or making the decision to kill the trapped magister. He misses Skyhold the way you do—wants this to be over so you can go home, sleep and eat breakfast together, train and teach. Just when he thinks his head might crack open from the pain he gets a rush of thrill because you’re back earlier than planned, or Ellie missed him during the day and came to see him, or Sera’s bursting into his office to assure him everything’s okay and Dagna didn’t blow Skyhold off the map but almost, but it’s fine. And it is, because you’re home and you’re safe and he’s never loved anything so much before.”

Cassandra quietly cleared her throat, “Thank you, Cole.”

“You are welcome,” he was serenely offering though his expression… sharpened. Like the Spirit was angry. She’d not truly seen him as much before—she’d seen the aftermath of his ire, his emptiness or remorse. It was rather the startling change, as his eyes narrowed and he turned his focus on—was he upset with Eleanor? “No. He said he wouldn’t offend but he’s about to.”

Well she supposed his opportunities were few. Eleanor had slept most of their journey, though that hadn’t stopped Berand from seeking her attention when she was awake, striking up polite conversation, offering compliment at every turn, and then there was the one instant where he offered to have her ride along with him while she slept which…wasn’t wholly malevolent but it disturbed Cassandra. Now the Lord and his men were preparing to take their leave—return to Skyhold. The Inquisitor’s party was gathered around the fire, Sera was seated in meditation with Solas. Bull, Dorian, Thom, and Varric were…playing some variation of chess where one drinks after having one of their pieces taken. Vivienne and Marehis were chatting and painting each other’s nails, though their conversations died when the Iron Bull let out a low growl, they turned their attention Lord Berand approaching Eleanor. She’d been in the mix of nail painting—Marehis had just painted her toenails while she handled her letter writing and now the girl was making a careful, barefooted jaunt to Leliana’s birds who had found purchase on a low branch of a dry husk of a tree on the edge of their camp.

And she turned to be greeted by the Lord who held out his arms and Eleanor met him with a hug of farewell but he said…something that prompted Sera to whisper, “Oh shit,” as she was no longer in a meditative state and looked like she was prepared to rise and go to her sister if she’d need. ‘Goodbye’ certainly wouldn’t prompt as much. “What’s happening?” Cassandra questioned quietly.

“He did say he was leaving, that he will miss her. And then he asked Ellie if she would consider letting him court her,” Cole said. Well then. “He’s confused—she’s just asked if he didn’t realize she was already dating Cremisius, that when she called him her boyfriend she didn’t just mean ‘a boy who is a friend’.”

“Son of a bi—” Bull was saying but the Qunari fell silent when there was the resounding crack that echoed through their camp. Of a slap. The sound of which startled Cullen awake in time to see Lord Berand’s dumbstruck expression accompanied by an angry red splotch on his cheek, and then Eleanor was storming back to camp, shaking out her hand. “What just hap—” Cullen stopped, looking outraged, “What did he do? Berand?!?” he called, rising to his feet…hand on the hilt of his sword, oh Maker, “You hold right there!”

Eleanor met her father with an outstretched hand on his forearm to stop him, “Let him go papi. He’s a jerk but I probably should’ve done that since um, you know. I’m Inquisitor. Definitely don’t need my advisory staff beating him up.” and then she sniffled, “The Iron Bull! Go beat him up!”

“Oh it,” the Qunari readily agreed, surging to his feet. “Wait! Don’t—” she sighed, frustrated, “I shouldn’t be giving orders to beat people—just- make sure he and his men are on their way. You can be mean about it—full permission to be as big of a jerk as you want.”

“I’m in,” Varric said, “c’mon Tiny. You’n’me’ll be the Inquisition’s official unwelcoming committee.”

“What happened, mija?” Cullen asked, his hand on Eleanor’s shoulder as he took hold of her unmarked hand to raise it for examination, “Did he hurt you?” he questioned. Well, did she hurt her hand on his face was more accurate but that was rather beside the point. And then his eyes blew wide in his head when that prompted her to cry of all things. Oh, the man looked miserable at her upset, “What can I do?”

Hug her apparently, since the girl wrapped her arms around his waist and buried herself against his chest. “I thought he was my friend!”

“Awe Inky, he’s just got a little crush on you—you can still be friendly,” Sera offered. “But that- he- ugh! It makes me so mad!” she fumed. “I mean if he was really my friend he wouldn’t do something like that. Trying to mess with your friend’s happy relationship isn’t being a friend! I’m with Cremisius and I love him—and he knows this! He-! He said Cremisius doesn’t cherish me—because if he did he would have dropped everything and come to my side when he heard I was hurt, not sent a ‘plaything to placate me’. Which is crap—Cremisius is where I need him to be! He wanted to come sweeping in but that’s not what I need—I’ve got everyone watching out for me and making sure I recover, what I need from him is for him to do his job and stay on task with the whole ‘saving the world’ thing. He’s done his best to keep updated on me and he took time to make me a get-well present to be here because he can’t be! Berand isn’t some great hero—he didn’t actually do anything to make me better, he didn’t drop anything, he just happened to have orders that let him be in the same area as me to do his job! And then he said I can’t be ‘serious’ about a future with Cremisius, that he can provide me some kind of- of better life or whatever! I already provide myself a good life thank you very much! and I’m very serious about a future with Cremisius!” Eleanor insisted. “We have a puppy daughter—and a son!”

“Ima get him!” Sera said, was she meaning to follow Berand for vengeance? Oh, no. She was scrambling up to dash into the tent.

“I’m sorry sweetheart,” Cullen soothed.

“It’s okay, it’s not your fault he’s a jerk! Ugh! I wasn’t- gosh I hate that- did I do something? Oh Maker, if I did something I shouldn’t’ve to make him think-“

“You didn’t do anything,” Cole assured. “You treated him as a friend and his mind made it more. That isn’t your fault. It isn’t even his entirely, he should know better but he does not. Now he does.”

Eleanor nodded, sniffling before she declared, “Mamis, my heart is sad! I wanna lay in your laps! Tia! Say fancy mean things that make me laugh!”

Cassandra moved to be seated at Marehis’s side, accepting the unspoken offer from the woman shaking a bottle of dark, sparkly blue nail polish in the Seeker’s direction, while Vivienne readily agreed,

“With pleasure darling,” she said as Eleanor came and laid across Cassandra and Marehis’s laps, her head rested on Marehis and Vivienne’s thighs and the Enchanter took up making play with her braids. “Where shall I start? Did you see the Marquis Manon when we were at lunch in Val Royeaux? He was the gentleman with the large crimson plume in his hat? I could go on about his offenses to sense and fashion for hours.”

She did just that. Madam Vivienne de Fer spent the next hour solidly roasting the Marquis with flowery language that impressed and delighted Eleanor and Sera likewise once the Elf girl returned, armed with Cremisius’s plushy nug, depositing it in Eleanor’s hold while Sera sat before the girl, enjoying Vivienne’s commentary, playing with Eleanor’s unmarked fingers, alternating between twining fingers and tickling her palm, occasionally calling magic into her hand to commune with Eleanor’s.

“Do you think Cremisius will be mad at me?” Eleanor timidly wondered.

“…Imekari, c’mon,” the Iron Bull groaned, “Don’t think like that babe—you didn’t treat that guy any different than you would any other friend. Krem’s not gonna think you were leading him on, and he’s sure as hell not gonna have a problem with how you handled it.”

Sera snorted, “Handled,” she squeezed Eleanor’s unmarked hand, “you slapped the crap out of him!”

“He insulted Cremisius! And I dunno, I guess I panicked—I thought I could trust him. But what if he- what if he’s never been my friend?”

“He was sorry by the time he left,” Cole said, sounding almost perplexed. “...He was hurting, this whole time. I didn’t realize until it was happening, but what I’ve been hearing from him, his thoughts of pursuing you...he just misses Velania. His family still wants him to marry, and you are so kind to him, have been such a good friend you soothes his aches and that makes him think maybe you can heal them. He didn’t realize in confessing his attraction to you he’d foil his chances at you ever finding attraction in him. It isn’t kind or good to try and take someone’s happiness away from them, and that is what he has tried to do, he sees Krem’s happiness and wants it for himself—doesn’t realize it isn’t Ellie that is the key to that, it’s just being with someone you love and loves you in return. It feels like meanness and many times it can be—but it was ultimately something from his hurts. And I...I did not try to help him,” the boy lamented. “I was so upset when I heard his thoughts. He had mean ones about Krem, he’s had them since he got here, that he is better than him, that he can give Ellie more—deserves her more. But thoughts like that only come from his hurts, if I’d talked to him, helped him through them, he would realize they were thoughts of jealousy of Krem and not love of Ellie. I didn’t even try because his thoughts made me angry at him! Hurt my feelings because Krem and Ellie are my friends—I didn’t realize they were hurts until they came to the surface and he did something outward with them because I let myself be upset.”

“Well it makes me mad too,” Sera said, “Cuddly, that’s just being a person—people think or say shite things about our friends and it pisses us off, we got loyalty to friends, it don’t exactly put us in the generous mood when people wanna hurt them. I’ve decked the guy myself if I heard him say something mean about Krem—he didn’t say anything but he thought it, and that’s ‘saying’ as far as you go.”

“But I’m not a person—I’m a Spirit and I ignored that.”

“You haven’t always been a Spirit Cole,” Eleanor said, “and I mean...technically you didn’t start out that way, right? You were Elvehnan. Then Solas made the Veil and when you died, you became a Spirit of Compassion. Now you live in Cole and that...well that’s like both things in one, you know? I’m sorry you’re disappointed in yourself, but it’s understandable—sometimes being a person outdoes being a spirit. I mean it works the other way more often, right? You always ignore your person-ness to handle Spirit business. With Berand, you took it personally, so it was the other way around.”

“Awe Cuddly—don’t be upset! Come get hugs!” Sera invited the boy, patting her thighs and the Spirit appeared in her lap, letting the Elf girl hold him tightly, and Eleanor sweetly offered him her nug to hold. The boy let out a happy hum as he hugged the plush thing to his chest, cheerily informing them it was indeed full of the Lieutenant’s love.

“No more new recruits to the Inquisition. I have Michel—that’s the cut off,” Cullen decided that night when he and Cassandra settled in a cot while Eleanor and Sera were off bathing, “and they aren’t allowed to talk to my children—none of them. Male, female, non-binary—no one is permitted near them save for our inner circle!”

“You are very excited to have Michel in your camp,” Cassandra teased as she settled comfortably against his chest.

“He was Empress Celene’s Champion! He bested Gaspard in single combat!* He held the line at the battle of—” he caught himself, wondering, “you’re going to make fun of me if I start raving about his resume aren’t you?”

“I am already making fun of you so do please, continue,” Cassandra invited.

“Mean, Lady Seeker—very mean,” Cullen accused even as he pressed a kiss to her lips.

“It is my most appealing quality.”

“Ahh, and here I thought your heart was what most appealed,” Cullen said, fingers lazily trailing a path up and down Cassandra’s side, “your love, and bravery, and compassion.”

“I assure you, you are mistaken.”

“Oh I’m certain I make mistakes on the daily basis, but of you? I’m absolutely correct, without doubt.”

“Should I leave so you two can practice making Tumbles a sibling or can I call it a night?” Varric’s voice wondered. Ahh, the man had shaved, cleansed himself and was standing in the tent entrance prepared for bed.

Cullen’s eyes twinkled with amusement, and he hid his smile against her hair as he assured, “I don’t mind if he watches, do you?”

“Oh not at all—please Varric, do stay,” Cassandra wryly invited, “Perhaps you’ll find inspiration for your next work.”
“This is personally my favorite position, but it is so much nicer when we’ve a few more people involved,” Cullen informed the Dwarf who was staring at them as if he wasn’t certain how serious they were or what was happening and he was amazed and horrified at the whole affair.

Eleanor and Sera could be heard chatting, giggling as they approached and entered the tent before seemingly racing each other to the cots to climb in and join Cassandra and Cullen, laughter bubbling in the Commander’s chest as Varric exhaled the breath he’d been holding, shaking his head as he went to his own cot,

“You almost had me Curly, shit.”

The following evening was their last before reaching the Western Approach and Cassandra steeled herself to do what needed to be done. While the others gathered to prepare dinner, she approached Eleanor, the girl readily joining her when she requested she walk with her, slipping her hand into Cassandra’s the girl swung their arms a bit as they walked the sandy path along the plateau they’d set camp beside to protect their tents from the fierce winds in these parts.

“What’s up mami?”

This time the question was met with Cassandra debriefing her on her discoveries in the Seeker’s tome—the truth of the origins of Tranquility.

“What do you want to do with this?” Eleanor wondered.

“I…am not sure. It is…I don’t think Tranquility entirely unneeded, but I know well it has been doled out in abuse.”

Eleanor nodded. “I know it’s super secret Seeker stuff,” she startled a bit, giggling, “that’d be a fun tongue twister I think? ‘Super secret Seeker stuff’—all future initiates should have to train to say that five times fast!” she blushed, “Sorry—I know this is serious, honest.”

Cassandra smiled gently, offering, “Serious super secret Seeker stuff,” oh goodness, it was a bit challenging to say.

Her efforts got a smile from the girl as she wrapped an arm around Cassandra’s middle, the Seeker laying an arm around her shoulders. “Yeah, Um, what I was getting at is—I know it’s sensitive information, you’re only sharing with me because I’m Inquisitor. That doesn’t necessarily mean…I’m boss of the Inquisition but you’re boss of the Seekers. I trust you and your judgement—I’m gonna work with you to do this however you feel is best for the reputation of the Order while doing what’s right by the entirety of the Chantry in the future.”

“Thank you, Eleanor, I do appreciate that.” Cassandra assured. “But I started this conversation to garner your opinion on the matter—it is a lot to take in, I understand if you need time to formulate a proper response.”

Eleanor nodded. “I mean I’ll definitely think about it, but at first blush?…brush? Blush,” she decided more certainly, though, “Am I saying that right? Blah. I think Tranquility should be reserved for the previous Inquisitor’s original intent—he gave this information to the Circles as an alternative for execution, a punishment for Mages you would otherwise have to kill. But with what we’re learning about Spirit purification, I think this goes beyond that even,” she said, “I mean…gosh, I know it takes a lot of work, it’s so amazing that Seekers have been able to do that—I’m so proud of you mami,” she assured, “But that’s to make certain, after all your hard work training to become a Seeker, you don’t fail the purity test. Seekers found impure can’t have a Spirit of Faith called to them. So…emptying yourself out of desires, you fast, you’re not allowed outside contact—you’re isolated for an entire year, made numb to daily aches and strife’s of dealing with people or conflicts or emotions. It’s just you, focusing on your faith in the Maker. By the end of it? You really had to have messed up if you’ve been desensitized to the world and Faith still won’t come to you. It’s hard, but achievable. And Tranquility being reversible…I mean it could be a final shot at reform—not always a permanent punishment. If a Mage abuses their abilities so bad there’s almost no choice left but execution, yeah, permanent Tranquility. But maybe create a system of reform for them—where they could be instilled to make better life choices with the promise of a chance at getting their magic returned to them if they sincerely change. And I mean they’d have to for it to work—calling a Spirit of Faith and having them touch your mind, breaking Tranquility only happens if you’re pure. If somehow they manage to still be an untrustworthy asshole after that? I dunno, I don’t know if they can be made Tranquil again.”

…well. “Tranquility is caused by branding a mind with Lyrium—a type of injury. You’ve still been able to maintain injury of every sort.” That earned her a slightly confused look from the girl. “That is another reason I wish to discuss this. We may have already implemented a practice that encourages mages to already do this. Because you have already done as much yourself, we’re certain,” Cassandra said. She was far more certain of it now, she’d days to consider it, had pulled Cullen aside to discuss the matter and he concurred. It had been rather the rushed vigil but Eleanor had been isolated the whole of a day, starved, made to thirst, before being put into a situation where her resolve was to put her full focus into her faith and then a Spirit of Faith came and made her whole. She talked the girl through Vivienne’s deductions on the matter. “Demons have made contact with you but you’ve always found it in yourself to resist them having power, they’ve tried to control you.” While her endeavors to always decline demon influence were commendable, Cassandra knew well there were demons powerful enough to take what they wanted by force, without setting a bargain with the person they were assuming control over.

“I mean Envy got in me pretty good though,” Eleanor offered argument. “Lord Seeker exposed his mind willingly to the demon of Envy that masqueraded as him—that demon did the same to your mind by force. In fact the thing’s plot boiled down to handling you in the same way he did the Lord Seeker who we know is immune to possession. Envy was to know you, and leave your body as sacrifice to Corypheus while it continued on pretending to be you.”

Eleanor took a moment to consider that. “Annd I’ve definitely been able to still get hurt—reinjured in ways I was injured before Faith saved me. So…”

“Tranquility may well be something that can be reintituted if we experienced backslide in someone broken of it,” Cassandra voiced the conclusion. They could not be entirely certain but…if someone required Tranquility eternal and it could not be plied…execution was always a…viable option.

“…what about people who chose Tranquility?” Eleanor wondered, “We have people in the Inquisition who chose Tranquility for fear of demon possession. If making them not-Tranquil anymore would keep them from ever being possessed…?”

“They may wish to have a connection with their magic and emotions once more, yes,” Cassandra agreed, “Yes, I’m not certain…when we should begin making moves to set them to rights but I do understand your wish to offer them the chance of rectifying their situation. Tranquility has a great many drawbacks, was always meant to be a final punishment not an optional purgatory. We will have a discussion about it back in Skyhold, with the whole of your advisors once we’ve adequate time to plan and consider.”

Eleanor nodded, hand wrenching at the back of her neck. “Okay, yeah. That sounds good—we’ll figure it out. Gosh, I’m really glad there’s a solution…”

“But it is hard to sit on that information, I understand,” Cassandra assured, resting her hands on the girl’s shoulders to massage at them, “We will handle this.”

“It’s kind of scary that choices the former Inquisitor made had such a drastic affect they never wanted on the world.”

“He did his best—followed his convictions and did what he thought was right. That is all you can do Eleanor, it is an enormous responsibility. All you can do is follow his example—you can’t know every instance this information might be used in, I’m certain that unfortunately there are many ways it can be used for abuse, you are not responsible for that. Be certain in your decisions, make sure they are convictions you can stand with in confidence, and you will have nothing to regret.”

The girl relaxed under her hands, nodding, “Thanks mami.” Then, “Is this something we should bring up to Sera? If she could be possession proof, I would want that for her.”

“I’m…uncertain. I would want her to have such protection, of course, but I would not wish to pressure her insofar as…” Cassandra sighed, “it takes a full devotion to the Maker—I’ve no doubt Sera believes there is a Maker, but faith can be a fragile thing.” There was something in her that felt she would be more disappointed if Sera attempted and failed than Sera would be, it would hurt her to see the girl struggle, and the last thing she wanted was to attempt something that might ultimately discourage Sera. “It may be something she encounters on her own, in her own time, too I don’t wish to involve her in the Seeker’s business, but…if you were so inclined, you could speak to her of yourself.”

“Like…hey Sera I think I can’t be possessed?”

Something like that. “It’s something Vivienne and I have discussed—that you were not possessed even in the middle of Red Lyrium infested countryside, injected with the stuff, so much of your blood shed. Madam de Fer, Solas, Dorian—they’ve all reported a great deal of demon activity in Sahrnia during Ishmael’s reign—if you’d been open to possession, he surely would have taken you. Cole is the one who initially affirmed with me that Faith touching your mind made you as such when I was worrying your state might leave you with such a fate—perhaps he could be of assistance in broaching the subject with Sera.”

Eleanor nodded, as she parcelled through that, mulling over just how to bring up the topic with Sera. “Kay, I’ll do my best…” she looked albeit conflicted, tentatively asking, “would you be really mad if I talked this over with people I trust? Just like…philosophical hypotheticals? Not spilling Seeker secrets about Tranquility, just asking papi about Spirits of Faith, expressing curiosity from my experience and stuff.”

“You wish to discuss this with Solas?” Cassandra confirmed.

“Just how Spirit stuff works,” she quickly assured, “Cole too, maybe? Only if that’s okay with you. I absolutely promise I won’t mention Seekers or anything. I mean I’m sure Cole already knows?” she supposed albeit uncertainly.

“He has assured me of his confidence.”

Eleanor nodded, “Good. I just have ideas and questions they’d probably be able to help me with to figure out. But only if you’re absolutely fine with it, I understand if you don’t want to risk me saying something I shouldn’t.”

Cassandra raised a hand to tuck a few braids behind the girl’s ear, “My trust in you is absolute sweet girl,” she assured. “Eleanor…I do hope you know just how very proud I am of your work as Inquisitor, of all you have done. Of all I’m certain you will do.”

The girl beamed, a happy little hum in her throat before she offered an abashed,

“Thanks!” and decided, “No matter what comes of my time as Inquisitor, if my decisions damn us hundreds of years from now, at least let the history books record that I tried my best and my mami was proud of me!”

Cassandra smiled, her arm around Eleanor’s shoulders, pulling the girl to her side as they made to return to their camp. “Well, they can certainly quote me on that.”

Cullen usually didn’t have the privilege to join his loved ones in the field. Doing so now was a relief of sorts—wonderful to know with absolute certainty that at the end of the day Cassandra, Ellie, Sera—they were safe and sound and just in reach. It was better than the short missives that assured him of that on paper—some nights he had to make the trek up to Leliana’s in order to check in with her and see if she received reports from the field. He’d asked if she could trouble one of her scouts—she often did so to bring him pertinent updates on work his agents were performing—to bring him word, verification that Marehis or Cassandra had confirmed their status with the Spymaster before turning in for the evening.

“Oh Commander, I think not,” the Spymaster amusely declined, the barest smile on her lips as her eyes seemed to sparkle from her cheer alone, “I quite enjoy reminding you that my tower rises higher than yours.”
In truth he suspected it was concern the woman worked from. On days he didn’t receive word from the Inquisitor or her party, they were likewise days he didn’t write to Cassandra—he let her set the tone when she was in the field, if she wrote him that meant she was in a space she could take time to receive a reply. So, he supposed his ability to carry himself through Skyhold and up the several flights of stairs to her area of operations, it proved something of his current health and gave the Spymaster the opportunity to lay eyes on him herself to verify he was well. There was one such evening…he could have made it, just- he’d been waiting for word from Ellie—she’d written of their progress in Emprise du Lion, that they were going to ‘kick Rift butt!’ the following day, and that day brought no word from the field—he’d been worried, had found it rather hard to focus on his work; Rifts were dangerous, Cassandra was only recovering from injury, Marehis, Maker bless the poor woman was in the coldest place they’d yet to send them while mother nature charged her monthly bill, and Sera and Ellie had tattled on one another, informing him of their colds. He’d had drills and paperwork, a migraine that…temporarily blinded him, but it was fine, mostly. He’d rested his head on his desk and the next thing he knew, the back of someone’s hand on his…forehead, and he opened his eyes to his sight returned and Leliana was in his office for a change, hurriedly hiding her hand behind her back as she seemed embarrassed to be caught showing a bit of concern. “The Rifts are sealed, and they’ve laid claim to territory the Red Templars were holding at the Tower of Bone. Marehis reports that they are planning to take Sahrnia Quarry tonight.” And that had left him wide awake. Thankfully he’d had company. Lieutenant Aclassi had knocked on his office door, and he wasn’t sure how he felt about the Maker blessing the young man pursuing his mija with such a charming smile, “Hey Commander—fancy a round of drinks?” “A few rounds perhaps.” He’d been so appreciative for the offer of company he didn’t think about the implications of going to the Tavern until they were nearing it—the Herald’s Rest was restless in the night, full of loud voices and music. But they walked directly past the building and up the stairs that led to Tonio Aclassi’s workshop. The lamp lights had been blessedly low and their company kind and quiet. The elder Aclassi was there, offered Cullen a comfortable chair and Krem poured them all glasses of bourbon that…the Iron Bull might notice the absence of upon his return to Skyhold—Cullen recognized it as the kind the Qunari enjoyed when he wasn’t drinking something gastly that put real fear in Cullen for the day Ellie may be capable of imbibing alcohol. But the bourbon was excellent, smooth and helped take the edge off of his aches and the nervous worry while they awaited word from Sahrnia, talking amongst themselves—how business was going for Tonio, Cullen and Krem going back and forth on their next moves, their forces would be moving out once the Herald was headed for the Western approach, to be ready and waiting if they’d need against Corypheus’s forces there—if the whole of the Wardens had been corrupted save for Stroud? They could be in for a battle of epic proportions. The Chargers were not exactly an army but they often worked like one—the Lieutenant was an excellent sounding board for Cullen, listening and offering encouragement as they discussed moving on the corrupted Wardens, and Tonio politely listened, he’d no combat experience to speak of but he did offer some appreciated advice about the unbearable heat—there was silken emerald green fabric pooling on his worktable and Cullen felt it safe to assume was a project for Ellie’s dessert excursions. “Is your drink not sitting with you, mimo?” Tonio worried when the boy had fallen silent for quite some time. He startled a bit when his father rested a hand on his shoulder, “Nah, I’m fine. Just…dunno. Worried. Something doesn’t feel right.” He almost wondered if perhaps the young man was psychic. Not even an hour later did word come from Sera to the two of them—the Lieutenant had stood straight up from his chair so quickly it clattered to the floor, and it almost looked like he was leaving but he merely strode the length of his father’s workshop and back, pacing as he read, “Fuck fuck fuck” falling from his lips. Cullen seconded that. On the back of letters in Samson’s hand confirming Maddox of all people was in his employ, further cryptic mention of someone becoming a ‘vessel’ of some sort, Samson’s call against the Inquisitor—that his people saw her journeying to Sahnia, to take vengeance for their losses at Therinfal Redoubt—there was a letter in Sera’s hand that everyone was alright, ‘Inky’ was out like a light so that was why she was sending things on in her stead.

Her letter to Krem was more illuminating—he wasn’t ‘fuck’ing because of what had been learned at the Quarry, in fact he’d not those particular details from the girl, she’d written him based on the promise she would send him word immediately if anything of note happened to Ellie. Oh, it had been…he was incredibly proud of the young man for launching into how best to be of help instead of losing his collective shit like…Cullen basically did. His hand still ached from where he’d struck the wall in anger because Samson wasn’t in reach to pummel senseless. Maker. Krem had caught his wrist in hand before he could go for a second swing which was wise, and pulled him into a hug that was mildly embarrassing and much appreciated. The Tevinter man offered sense and compassion, “Leliana’s been gathering her people that she wants on the ground at the Shrine of Dumat, you do the same now, yeah? You go—do what you need to do. You’ve trained everyone well, the Chargers are always at the Inquisition’s disposal, you need help just say the word. El’s gonna be okay, Sera wouldn’t say so unless she really believed it.”

Tonio Aclassi had taken up Sera’s letter to Krem and came to lay hands on Cullen and Krem’s shoulders, the kindly man offering up a moment of prayer on Ellie’s behalf—thanking the Maker for her life, asking that He continue to watch over her, guide the hands of her Healers and those who cared for her as she recovered.

Never in the years following his time in the Circle Tower had he found himself so incredibly relieved to be in such cramped quarters. After a week of nothing but tension and reports of his loved ones being injured and ill, it was blessing to wake up and be able to feel the certainty of Cassandra’s breathing, her breath against chest, the rise and fall could be felt under his hand on her back, hear Sera snoring against his ear, Ellie’s Marked hand in his—she was so exhausted in those first few days she took hold of his hand, twining their fingers so it was less likely for them to lose hold in the night, and was practically asleep before she was even horizontal—so it took a few evenings for him to wonder at why,

“Oh!” Ellie chirped, green eyes alight as she smiled, “I didn’t say anything huh? Whooops! Um…” she worried at her lip, nose scrunching a bit as she met the Iron Bull’s eyes as he passed their cots and the Qunari offered a soft ‘night Imekari’, and she spoke softly to Cullen, guarding her words in case it might embarrass him but, “I know sometimes small spaces can be scary—if that happens, squeeze my hand, okay papi? You can always wake me up if you need me!”

He had done so, unintentionally…well, more so it was just he woke, heart hammering in his chest from a nightmare, he’d only just stopped himself from crying out, and his hand had flexed around Ellie’s and the girl had stirred, shaking herself awake and squeezing his hand before releasing her hold and rolling off of Sera and…scrunch-scooting on her belly, backwards off of the cot. Sera stirred at the absence of her sister, murmuring something about not going to the bathroom alone and Ellie whispered, “I’m getting something to drink with papi, wanna come?”

Cassandra had stirred but fell back asleep when he assured her he was well, and Sera climbed out of bed, taking hold of his left hand, Ellie his right, and they went out to take in some of the cooler air the dessert had to offer without sunlight blaring down on them, though the light of the moon, the stars was rather impressive—enough to see by while he took a few bracing breaths of cool air. Something to drink was apparently…he almost thought it was wine and he’d been alarmed when Ellie poured the three of them glasses and raised hers to her lips but it was merely a very sweet grape juice that went down without the burn of alcohol but the barest burn of acidity that felt grounding, like something real that jarred him a bit into the present—he wasn’t trapped in a demon’s realm of torture, he was in the midst of a desert with his daughters partaking of…grape juice that turned into a midnight snack of juice and sweet, crunchy shortbread, his girls chatting about Sera's time in the Fade which was, apparently…
pleasant. He was glad they were able to do so pleasantly, that Solas…for all the harm he’d done, had imbued the girls with the ability to master their environment in the Fade more so than Mages were usually capable of, of course Mages did not normally have the assistance and teachings of the creator of the Fade, so.

“You’re okay, yeah da?” Sera wondered, “You have a nightmare? Or was the tent too crowdy?”

“A bit of a nightmare I suppose—I don’t rightly recall now.”

“You sure papi?” Ellie pressed with care, "I get not wanting to talk about stuff but it can really help—mami always lets me talk about things that scare me and it always makes me feel better about them, sometimes it makes them seem less scary and sometimes it just helps making me feel like if whatever scared me did happen, I could handle it.”

…if Samson and his Red Templars murdered these girls and the woman he loved before his very eyes while he could do nothing but sit there and watch, there was precious little handling it. There would only be vengeance and hopefully some swift, merciful death.
And voicing the scenario would not make it feel less scary, he didn’t think, despite his mija’s continuous wisdom—he had every faith she would be capable of reforming their broken Chantry system but in this regard he would defer to his own sense of peace in not horrifying his girls with tale of his nightmares and offering them a smile and,

“We led our soldiers into battle against the Wardens and I had not a stitch of armor or clothing on my person.”

The girls’ mouths dropped open, eyes widening as Sera reared back in her seat, cackling into the sky while Ellie breathed in gasp of surprise, “Really, papi? Totally starkers?!”

“As the day I was born.”

“I think that’s a sound battle tactic!” Ellie decided, “I mean we had to fight men in their underpants back when we met sissy—did we tell you about that?” Cassandra had, yes, at the time she’d been rather annoyed, only to be annoyed further by Cullen’s outright amusement at the tale, “I didn’t want to go anywhere near them! So maybe if we all just show up—everyone in our army—butt naked, the Wardens’ll be too uncomfortable or shocked to fight us and we can just like…dunno. Talk it out? Hey—Corypheus is tricking you! Look at all these sexy people, would we lie to you? No—lying isn’t sexy!”

“You! That’ll show’em!” Sera encouraged, “Cory-face is an ugly git—we’ll just go around, the Sexquisition and seduce his allies to our side!”

Oh Maker, he’d meant to make the girls laugh and they more than returned the favor, Cullen almost felt badly, worried their shared levity might make their camp but no one came to join them, and he was selfishly glad of it—it was so rare, the opportunity to sit and make fun with Sera and Ellie, he enjoyed sharing a midnight snack and silliness before returning to sleep sweeter dreams, Cassandra resuming her place against his chest, pressing a kiss to his collarbone as she whispered a wish for his pleasant rest. Oh, he wished her the same. Maker he- he did not mind at all, nights his mind made him suffer in this way if it meant being cheered by those he loved. And it was…it was horrible but relieving when they’d such struggles themselves—horrible in that it was heartbreaking when it happened, he felt his heart seize when he woke to tears on his chest, Cassandra trying to quiet a anguished cry she had to catch in her throat as she trembled, but it was the purest relief that his hand carding through her hair as he held her more tightly had her relaxing against him, catching her breath as she nestled against his chest. “Shhh, ciela? You're safe.”

She took a deep breath, blindly reaching out to her side to take a fistful of Eleanor’s sleep shirt, before she rubbed circles on the girl’s back until she heard a soft, sleepy, “Mami?” Cassandra sniffled, clearing her throat quietly, endeavoring to sound like she wasn’t crying, “I was just checking on you, Eleanor.”

“I’m okay, you okay?”

“Yes—I apologize for waking you, sweetheart.”

“Mmm, not as sorry as papi’s ribs.” His…ribs? Was she planning on striking violence against him in retribution for disturbing her sleep? He hadn’t woken her! He had been forewarned of Ellie’s…incompatibility to mornings, and he’d always been armed with breakfast when they endured them together in Skyhold, perhaps his mija was a hellion if waken from her slumber too soon—ah. No. She shifted to join her mother in laying almost directly on top of him, against his side partially laying on his chest as she snuggled against Cassandra, pressing a kiss to her cheek before breathing a sleepy sigh, “Have sweet dreams mami.”

“Sandra’s sad?” Sera wondered, half asleep. The woman opened her mouth but, “Mmhm,” Ellie confirmed.

“Kay, snugglin’,” Sera announced, sitting up and rolling onto her knees to crawl down the cot and then over their legs to get to Cullen’s other side. Well, Cassandra’s, to engage in an all-around, thorough, snugglin’.

The Maker had blessed him beyond measure when He made woman kind. He’d an appreciation for his own mother of course, his sisters, but his life as it stood now felt like it was made of these women who held the whole of his heart in their hands and he honestly was uncertain just what he’d been on about before. How exactly had he pushed through the days his body was wracked with addiction, withdrawal and regret and ghosts of demon torture making his every moment torment? He would never be grateful enough that he had survived those times—he’d not known then, in the wake of Kirkwall’s fall, where his life would take him. He hadn’t expected the Inquisition, and he’d certainly never dreamed it would result in his newfound family.

The matriarchs of which, were behaving very strangely. Marehis was…cagey, as they traveled, and…tetchy? She was never brusk or rude with the girls or any of the adults save Solas—which was her right. But then rudeness would swing right around into…shyness. It took several instances of her cutting the man off mid-speech to snipe at him, and sending veiled threats the Elf man’s way that Cullen recognized it for…well. Mia had been like that—combative in the face of a crush she was embarrassed about. There was a…homely boy that lived a stone’s throw away from their childhood home who had open affection for her, and he was very sweet but children can be menaces—not many were kindly to him, certainly not Mia, not openly. Not until she got to a mindset where she didn’t much care what their peers thought, ceased worrying they might judge her and she gave up the pretense—starting with an apology to the boy and ending…well…

He was Cullen’s brother in law now. So. Maker help Marehis with whatever she was dealing with, with Solas.

As for the other woman heading their family unit…Cassandra was being…extremely cautious and contrite. It was not outright obvious in the first few days—she wasn’t acting entirely out of the ordinary, but it eventually became clear that every moment they were in the camp the woman was diligent to be at Ellie’s side, always at arms length where she could see if the girl wanted for anything and was ready to eagerly provide—was she hungry? Thirsty? In pain?—the moment she saw anything even the slightest bit amiss she was immediate to offer food or potion or ointment. Sera was insistent on helping Ellie with changing bandaging and applying ointment to her injury every evening, and Cassandra always made a point of seating herself behind the girl—sitting on Ellie’s bedroll and supporting her against her chest, holding Ellie as Sera worked, Cassandra’s cheek pressed against the silken scarf wrapped around Ellie’s head—Madam de Fer was insistent she keep the practice and make it a more solid habit while her hair was braided because she did not take such diligent care with her edges to have them abused by a substandard pillowcase. Ahh but the point was Cassandra was...cowering in a way, eyes clenched shut as she buried her face against Ellie’s scarf and held the girl as tightly as she dared. It wasn’t a painful process—Ellie would chat with her sister, giggling at the first brush of cold contact from Sera’s ointment coated fingers and chat with her sister, unbothered by the process that clearly bothered Cassandra. The moment Sera was through Cassandra was immediate to ask if Ellie was alright—did she wish for something warm to drink? Or a snack? Cassandra could read to her if she’d like? It took several evenings of her mother offering her sugary foodstuff before bed that Ellie realized the woman was behaving rather uncharacteristically—being overly...apologetic, everything came off like an act of penance.

Ellie sighed with discontent and was met with, “Does it hurt you, Eleanor, to sleep in a bedroll?” Cassandra fretted their second night after the Shrine of Dumat. “We could set up a cot or- or stack bedding. You could use my pillow to cushion your hip?”

Ellie scooted from Cassandra’s lap before turning about and climbing back to sit with her knees on Cassandra’s thighs as she wrapped her arms around the woman’s neck, “Have I told you I love you a lot today? I love you a lot.”

Well, her pallor was overcorrected as blood rushed right back to her face, “I am aware-”

“But I will fight you if you keep beating yourself up over saving me. I’ll fight you and I will win,” Ellie assured.

…oh. Maker. Cullen had- he’d seen Cassandra’s behavior but he thought it was because- well Ellie was still recovering, even Cullen worried over her every time she flinched when something in her smarted, when she looked so very exhausted as they made camp for the evening at the end of the day. He thought the woman was merely worried, he hadn’t realized the woman was still struggling with her guilt but perhaps she didn’t realize it herself —she looked utterly confused in the moment before realization dawned in her features and she sighed, hugging the girl back as she questioned,

“Oh you’re certain? Well, you’ve the penchant for argument.”
“I don’t mean arguing mami. I mean brawling you in the middle of camp.”
“With fists?”
“Big time. Which is why I win. I think I can handle slapping you to teach you a lesson,” Ellie supposed.

“You believe you could bring yourself victory in single slap?” Cassandra wondered.
“Oh huh,” Ellie nodded, “Wanna know why?” she asked, pulling back to look the woman in the eye, “because I know you would never actually hurt me, not unless you needed to. So, a no-stakes brawl just to prove a point? You’re toast.”

Staring into the girl’s eyes as she smiled up at the woman Cullen was certain the woman already was ‘toast’, she had that look on her face—it almost looked strained, but Cullen knew it to be an indication of quiet vulnerability in the woman who abhorred being vulnerable in front of…any audience, but especially one as large as what they currently entertained with a tent full of the Inquisitor’s party gathered in their nightly sleepover. But she breathed a sigh and raised a hand to cup the girl’s cheek as she rested her forehead against Ellie’s and said, “Thank you, sweet girl.”

He enjoyed traveling this time around—it was much more pleasant than their march through the snowy mountains to Skyhold. Cassandra was still…it was not their first day riding this way but she still sat in the saddle before him, cheeks pink—from the sun, she insisted, even as Madam de Fer provided them all with the most wonderful lotion that protected their skin from sunburn. Sera and Ellie were on Russel, riding alongside them, Sera’s arms wrapped high around Ellie’s middle as she hummed into the girl’s ear as she dozed. Cullen was half inclined to join the Human girl in slumber—word from Dagna came…good golly gosh Commander! It’s a shame we couldn’t get Maddox’s mind on our side, everything you recovered from his lab is just Wowza. Just leave it to me, you and the Inquisitor come swing by the Forge whenever you get back and I’ll have a present for you! Here’s a hint: it’ll help our little cutie kick Samson’s butt!—which was comfort enough that he was able to put Samson from his mind for now, he was focused on the task at hand, surrounded by his loved ones, and assured of their safety, he’d a great deal of peace of mind for the first time in quite a while, and he found that blessed him further still—it was the first day in months he didn’t wake up with so much as a headache. Somehow that made him feel exhausted—a satisfied sort of tired but still, tired.

Cassandra let out a bit of surprised laughter as he leaned against her, resting his head on her shoulder, “May I help you, Commander?”

“You already are, Lady Seeker.”

She huffed at that before offering quiet concern, “Are you well?”

“Certainly, just following my Inquisitor’s example,” Cullen assured.

“Imekari’s out again?” the Iron Bull’s voice rumbled as the Qunari turned about as much as he could without unseating Dorian to look over his shoulder on his seeing side, trying to put their younger travelers in view, Sera nodded. “Damn.”

“Baby girl got a chunk taken out of her—she’s healed well,” Cyril voiced his assurance. “Perks of potion mean our injuries heal faster—drawbacks are that draws on a lot of energy, sometimes we gotta catch up.”

“Tumbles should rest while she can,” Varric said, “got a lot of shit done out here but the Western Approach isn’t exactly a picnic,” he sighed, wondering, “Think you can talk her out of some more Rift sealing, Curly?”

Oh, it had been the sweetest sort of victory when he was able to talk her through abandoning her efforts in Empris du Lion. If she’d attempted to seal a Rift then? He had a pit in his stomach as they neared the Western Approach, anxious for her first attempts since her

Sera’s humming came to a halt and she was very quiet for a moment before voicing, “Inky’s made her choices clear, ‘bout Rift Sealin’. Trying to talk her out of it kind of…looks like not respecting her decision, like you think she can’t think for herself. I don’t like her hardass friggin principle about sealing all the Rifts she can, but it’s hers, that’s her choice so…I gotta deal with it. If she doesn’t feel like she can take on a Rift—she’ll be the first to let us know, you know? She’s…you lot made her Inquisitor. So now you gotta act like it. We’re all…family-y, but whether we’re in the field or back in Skyhold location don’t matter none, it’s purpose—where she’s workin’ as Inquisitor, says things from that position? You lot ain’t her mami’s and papi’s authority-wise when she’s doing that, you’re Commander and Seeker and we’re the freakshow that follows her around. She’s our Inquisitor.”

“Damn babe,” the Iron Bull commended her.

“…well said,” Madam de Fer conceded sounding almost surprised and…perhaps quietly proud.

Oh. Oh he hadn’t-. He hadn’t thought about it quite like that. He…well he realized he wouldn’t dream of attempting to dissuade her from a Judgement ruling after she held assembly, or from a War Table decision—he spoke his piece during deliberations and the end result relied entirely on Ellie’s judgement. At Haven, it was on her orders he led their escape, he’d have been a fool to have stood there and argued with his child that her own safety should come first even as that was exactly what he’d wanted to do—he’d wanted with everything to stop and convince her…possibly to the point of throwing the child over his shoulder and carrying her out by force, in fact he would much prefer it if that was exactly how that had gone down even if it earned her ire, his heart would have much rather handled carrying her over his shoulder to safety and getting the silent treatment for a while than having her collapse in his arms from injury and exhaustion, so very cold it was not unlike- he’d almost been horrified a Spirit had merely taken possession of the girl’s dead body and puppeteered her form to them to be laid to rest.

But…it wasn’t his place to circumvent that. Mia—she disdained his occupation for the threat it put him to, she worried for him constantly. But it would be wrong of her to actively endeavor to keep him from his duties, even if something she did manage to dissuade him from something that would end his life, it wasn’t her place. Just as it…wasn’t his, with Ellie. She acted exactly as she needed to—exactly as he would expect anyone deserving of the title ‘Inquisitor’—that night. And she continued to do so when it came to matters of her station.

Rifts. Loath that he was that they existed…they were her call.

Hmm. He…wanted to hate Solas with everything in him. In fact on a level, he did. He despised his hand in all of this, but he…did understand he would not have the relationships he had today without it. And there was no going back, only moving forward.

Moving forward…he would have fierce competition for ‘favorite papi’. He was almost embarrassed how urgent he felt the need to join them in the field while they were still in the Emerald Graves when he read the words We are do endeavor to be as civil with Solas as is possible, in future. Eleanor has made her wishes to resume her former candor with him clear, and we are not to put undue pressor on her to behave otherwise. Well, it was not so much those words but the ones that followed, words he could almost hear Cassandra’s teasing as he read—Eleanor is simply delighted to have an ‘in the field papi’ once more. He brings her juice.

Cullen could bring her juice! He could bring her hot chocolate! Which…wasn’t going to earn him favor under these conditions. Unless perhaps it could be chilled? Milk infused with chocolate and made cold might…be refreshing after a day in the heat. Ha! Cold chocolate!

Fen’Harel might be a god among Dalish—but Cullen was a father among men! Well. He would certainly try to be, anyway. Which apparently meant that sometimes it was his job not to be, to step back and support from his role of Commander when his daughter was done napping and woke the Inquisitor ready to take on the Western Approach’s Rifts.

It was a gentle enough start. The rumbling Ellie’s bracer was a little jarring, but they were very close to a Rift that did…definitely need closing, it was so near their infiltration camp he was almost worried it would begin raining demons on them. He was grateful beyond measure for the things invention—grateful to his Sera and her Dagna.

And Miss Harding, blessed Scout that she was.

“Inquisitor,” Scout Harding greeted, oh—her gaze shifted from Sera to Ellie as she addressed the girl after finding her girlfriend’s face and assessing she was present and well, looked relieved to see them. Was it sexist that he did not mind Sera’s girlfriends? If Ellie announced she’d made a triad with two men, her next big announcement would be one of distress she’d surely get over eventually—of their unfortunate disappearances…ugh. If she truly loved them he’d get over it. Come to…respect them as he had the Lieutenant. But he wouldn’t be happy about it! “We’ve sighted Warden activity to the southwest but no one’s been close enough to figure out exactly just what they’re doing. The wildlife is…wild and the environment isn’t that much better—our first sighting of the High Dragon was deliriously reported by one of my men after he got too close to a poison hot spring…there’s poison hot springs honey, between that and the sandstorms? Please keep your little breathing mask on at all times, alright? It’s still holding up okay? I can send for more of that um…sweet grass? From the Emerald Graves.”

Ellie dug around in an overcoat pocket momentarily before withdrawing a small, pale green mask she pulled over her head, down to her neck before drawing it securely over her mouth and nose, “It’s still working I think—papi promises its sturdy,” …had he? When had he done this?

Ahh. He would challenge the man to a duel for the title of papi, he really would. Or perhaps give him a hug. Because, “It is, da’vehnan, and I gathered extra sweetgrass for replacements should you need them.”

“Sweet-Gracias, papi!” oh. Sweet girl. His child. She smiled and giggled, eyes glittering in the sunlight as she addressed the Elf man who regarded her with open warmth, returning her smile with his own. The Maker was testing him—he was truly supposed to let her just go off and fight Rifts and rogue Wardens and Corypheus? “Thanks for the heads up, Lace!”

Scout Harding blushed. “Of course, Inquisitor. Hawke and Stroud have been staying in Griffon Wing Keep—we don’t like announcing your movements to non-security personnel so…”

“I can surprise them?” Ellie asked, just a bit excitedly.
“If you’d like.”
“Um, I love!” she assured, “kay, we have Rift locations marked and prioritized?”
“Uh huh, ready whenever you are—we’ve got solid holds here so you need potion or a place to stop and rest, Varric should be able to show you to camp.”

“Thanks Lace, I really appreciate it,” Ellie said, turning about to seek out, “Varric! Come be my walking buddy!”

“Hell yeah Tumbles! Lemme show you around, I can give you the grand tour,” the Dwarf man drawled as he joined her, linking arms with the Human girl.

The first stop on their tour was the nearby Rift, of course…Cullen may have borne witness to his child sealing the entire Breach and he still had no comfort whatsoever with her tackling a Rift. He served as Commander, fought, stood by and supported his Inquisitor as she sealed the damnable thing closed.

And the moment that was done, he was at her side, allowed to be a father for two minutes—for every Rift he got two minutes of papi time, he decided. As a treat.

“Excellent work sweetheart—how are you feeling?” he questioned, resting a hand on Ellie’s shoulder as he looked her over for serious detriment, “Sera? Are you hurt?” he called, waving the older girl to him, oh. she’d bruising developing on her cheek “Oh, sweetheart,” he looked between the two of them now that he had them in hand, “Do you need to take a break? Are you thirsty?”

“m’fine da, barely a scratch,” Sera assured.
“I’m okay papi—potion toast?” Ellie proposed, uncorking a vial of health tonic. She’d a few scrapes, some bruising that began clearing when he and Sera clinked their own potion against hers and they knocked them back. “Everyone’s okay? Cool! One down! Eight left yeah?” she checked. Maker. No. Truly?

There’d been something like eleven Rifts in the Emerald Graves. Nine here? Not to mention those they had dealt with in Emprise du Lion…

Between his child’s last stay in Skyhold and her return? She will have sealed twenty four entire Rifts. Was this how it always was in the field? So consistently unrelenting?

Apparently. Maker, he thought the cold of Sahrnia had been awful, but the Western Approach was unbearably hot. So that when they successfully sealed a second Rift and drew near what had been christened their ‘Craggy Ridge Camp’, everyone took a moment to relax and regroup, and began shedding any unnecessary pieces of armor—there was a pile of overcoats between Ellie and Madam de Fer, Sera and Varric casting theirs off and away. Ellie threatened to ‘dismantle this entire Inquisition’ if anyone took issue with her undoing the clasps of her armored tunic to lie back and ‘let everything breathe’ while they stopped to take on water and bit of lunch. Cole and Sera joined her, lying at her side and staring into sky overhead, chatting a mile a minute about…it seemed like they were making up stories about the few clouds overhead as Sera and Ellie shared grapes and apple slices—no one was much interested in a warm meal just now. He’d little appetite himself, between the heat and the blinding sun, his head felt not unlike how he imagined it might feel if the Iron Bull tired of Cassandra’s monogamy and decided to take Cullen out of the picture by stepping directly on his forehead with the whole of his weight.

“He wouldn’t kill you that way—everyone would see that,” Cole spoke up, “and he wouldn’t kill you—he would seduce you and have you both.”
“…amatus,” Dorian wondered, “should I be concerned that it is perfectly clear the Spirit is referencing you when he lists designs for polyamorous seduction as substitution for murder?”

“Means I’m not a barbaric brute—I know how to adapt and compromise. Find peaceful solutions to everyday problems,” the Iron Bull winked at his lover as he popped a grape into his mouth.

“That is not a problem,” Cole said sounding almost frustrated as he sat up, “I was talking to Cullen with my outside voice because he might worry he is hallucinating or hurt more if I used my inside voice. Oh!” he slumped, physically dropping in disappointment, “I’m sorry—I am being rude! It’s my fault, I did it wrong—you can’t know who I am talking to if I do not say their name. I am practicing, I promise! But it is usually best to talk about private things with my friends privately, in their minds, but strangers get scared when I know their names before they tell me!” he complained. Then he shook himself, refocusing, “I’m sorry—it is okay to talk about things that bother me but I am helping Cullen right now—Cullen I am talking to you, and I would appreciate not being interrupted unless it is with help for you.”

Ellie sat up, “Papi’s head hurts really bad?” she asked Cole who nodded. The girl rose up and came to Cullen, sitting before him as she looked him over, “Scale of one to ten?”

“Mija, I’m fi—”

“Scale of one to ten,” she said firmly, though she splayed her hands before him, palms up and wriggled her fingers. Oh. He tapped the pinkie finger of her unmarked hand, dragging his finger along her fingertips until he landed on the middle finger of her Marked hand to signify eight. “You’ve taken potion?” he nodded, “When was the last time you drank water? It’s really hot out and dehydration is bad in general but like, when you’re already sensitive to it, it’s going to make it worse, add that to the sunlight—maybe you should stay—”

“I’ll drink some water—thank you for the suggestion mija.”

“Maybe,” she firmly finished her sentence, “you should stay inside for a while, cool off and rest. Not taking care of yourself isn’t doing your job!” Ellie…snapped at him. Oh Maker, he was startled that he’d made her upset with him but that was the extent of her wrath. He had not meant to be disrespectful just- he could hardly stand even the thought of staying behind, it made something in him feel worthless, but if he went? If he couldn’t rise to the challenge or worse, take their focus from the task at hand, make them have to defend him atop everything else they were trying to do and someone got hurt? How worthless would he truly be then? She took his hands in hers, “Everyone gets sick papi. Part of taking care of your job and responsibilities and the people you love, is taking care of yourself. This isn’t your usual work environment, so it’s not like needing to take care of yourself to compensate means you can’t do your job,” she assured him, squeezing his hands before she sat up higher on her knees to press a kiss to his cheek before prescribing, “Be like the Iron Bull and adapt! Instead of murdering yourself by pushing yourself when you’re sick, seduce yourself with self-care.”

“We’ve a mission,” Cullen argued.

“Oh. I’m sorry! Mami—gosh, what were you thinking?” Ellie questioned, looking to Cassandra, “You weren’t supposed to let me just lay around for days on end in the middle of a mission! You should have propped me up and dragged me around to arrest Mistress Poulin and Dragon slaying—I mean I skipped out on fighting two dragons and a demon! A demon that I promised Michel we’d help him with. Honestly I should probably tender my resignation—who wants to be the new Inquisitor? Mamis? The Iron Bull—that’d show the Qun! Tia Vivi?” she wondered, looking across the whole of her party, and even to the few scouts and soldiers in camp, “You?”

The Dalish man who’d been sorting through deliveries to the Requisitions table breathed a huff of laughter and offered a friendly, “No thank you miss. If it makes any difference, I think you’re doing an excellent job.”

“Awe thanks! I think you’re doing an excellent job!” Ellie cheerily returned the compliment before returning her attention to Cullen, leveling him a look that said, ’so?’ “Am I resigning or are you taking a nap?”

Who taught this child to craft her ultimatums with such dire conditions? He suspected Dorian’s influence. Oh. It was almost tempting to refuse further, Ellie took her sincerity seriously, she may just hold her word and truly resign on the spot. But…that wouldn’t stop her from her responsibilities sealing Rifts or being a target of Corypheus…she would have all the detriments of the role of Inquisitor with fewer rewards. So. “Well then, I suppose I’ll nap.”

Oh. How fair was it he got the luxury of a nap and earned a brilliant smile from his child? “Stay hydrated and cool down—if you’re feeling better later and still want to join us, you can! We’ll be keeping the camps updated on Rift progress!” she promised. “Can you eat? Take on what you can. Sissy,” she turned to Sera.

“Yeah!” the older girl readily agreed, jumping up and coming to take hold of Ellie’s hand before they were off…to do something. They went to the Requisitions officer and started chatting with them, a few of their reinforcements holding this camp, but for what, Cullen wasn’t entirely certain.

“Do they communicate in the bond?” Marehis wondered quietly to Solas.

“Our sisterly one, perhaps,” Solas supposed. “Sera’s gaining excellent insight when she and Ellie’s magic directly commune intentionally, but she’s still garnering experience in navigating the bond on her own…” he was silent for a moment before he softly cleared his throat, only just daring to meet Cullen’s gaze for a brief moment before he addressed him, “Sera is…she’s very scared for you. When you’ve migraines. She worries for you when we are in the field. There is something in her, questions she has but she worries it is not her place to pry I…I’m uncertain if Cole has brought it to your attention but…it does not feel like a resolved issue, so I thought it best you know so you may proceed however you deem fit.”

It ruffled something in Cullen…perhaps on him—ruffled his feathers—to have the man speaking to him…ugh. It was ultimately what soothed his initial unrest. Solas was speaking to him…father to father. Speaking from a place of love of Sera, and who was he to begrudge him that? He offered the man a nod.

Vivienne de Fer regarded him with concern, “It is worrysome that you are poorly so often, Commander. If Skyhold’s Healers have not found solutions for you there are several I could refer you to.”

“I do appreciate your concern,” he assured, sipping down just a bit more water before saying, “My treatment is well at hand—Skyhold’s finest Healer is currently handling my care and she prescribed a nap which I think will suit,” he said, leaning to press a kiss to Cassandra’s cheek before rising up to…well he supposed there were plenty of tents and someone would not begrudge him space there-

They…would not. The moment he went to ask where he might lay out his bedroll, he discovered the item in question missing from his horse’s pack and the scout he’d asked offered him a certain nod and said to follow him.

“Kay higher…higher….you can go a little bit higher Inky. How come this is the way we settled on doin this?”

“You’re almost as tall as papi so gotta play papi! Laying down your heads’ll be in the same place-”

“Oh, duh. Makes sense!” Sera cheerily conceded.

His children had gone off to see to the set up of another tent that laid wholly empty save for Cullen’s bedroll, which Sera was laying upon. He could see that, because Ellie was standing in the tent’s entrance holding its opening overhead while her sister offered suggestions for adjustment. Based on the view of someone lying with their head on Cullen’s pillow…which to his knowledge wasn’t a view that would be affected by height as it did not matter how tall or short someone if they needed the perspective of someone lying down with their head merely in a specific place…
He’d the most brilliant, wonderful girls. But sometimes they operated in a way that was not unlike Cullen’s last functioning modicum of intelligence he could cling to when he’d not slept in a week and his head was in the vise grip of pressurized torment. Though their efforts were much more endearing than his own, which usually involved nearly walking over the edge of crumbling wall when he went east out of his office and continued on as though he were taking the western wall to the Tavern…pouring from an empty vessel that once held coffee and proceeding to sip at an empty mug determinedly for the better part of two minutes before he realized it was empty…and incidentally writing Mia, with the intention of writing Cassandra. I love you more with each passing day and miss you, the girls, beyond belief. I dream of when next I wake and we are together again. Maker watch and guide you until then, all my love –Cullen had thankfully…well, he’d not used Cassandra’s name, it had been a matter of misfortune that he blindly slipped the letter into the first envelope in the stack Josephine had prepared him on his desk—the woman had been kind enough to do so because he’d lamented during a meeting earlier that morning that he’d been meaning to respond to Cassandra, complained that Mia was pestering him for an update…and he’d nieces. So, what could have been a very unfortunate circumstance earned him a very confusing letter from his sister gushing over his sudden ‘burst of emotion’, assuring she and her family were well, and wondering if he was ill because he definitely never said much more than ‘I’m alive and well, I hope you’re the same’ in his previous correspondence since joining the Order.

“Would you care for a hand, sweetheart?” Cullen asked warmly, Ellie and Sera gasping in surprise like they’d been caught, overlapping,

“Papi!”

“Dad!” Sera exclaimed as sat up, “You just hold it right there—don’t move!” she ordered and his child had come into her power as of late so. Who was he to deny her? He held up his hands in surrender and stopped right where he was while she scrambled from the tent to come to Ellie’s aid—the younger girl holding the tent’s opening flaps in their agreed placement while Sera fastened them down so they stayed that way without Ellie’s hold on them. The girl smiled her relief, offering up her unmarked hand to high-five her sister while her Marked hand rubbed at her right side, oh he hoped she hadn’t strained herself. Sera squatted a bit, her hands on Ellie’s shoulders as she lowered herself to be level with the girl which was…almost silly looking given they’d a height difference but it wasn’t great enough she needed to kneel, just bending her knees and lowering her bottom to address the girl. Well, not verbally—she looked Ellie in the eye and opened her mouth to speak but then Ellie offered a reassuring smile, nose scrunching with her enthusiasm and then they nodded in unison after their…wholly silent conversation. Sera put her arm around Ellie’s shoulder as she rose up, pulling the younger girl into her side as she turned to address Cullen…nope, it was Ellie who spoke, “Alright—ready papi!” Ellie assured him.

“Come on da—nap time!” Sera announced.

…they’d set up a tent and his bedroll…and his…grand…nug. William—strapping lad, a welcome addition to the family. For Cullen’s nap. So he might do so undisturbed, comfortably, and…not encapsulated in a confined space—the sun wouldn’t be in his eyes, but he could open them and see plainly the tent was open and the world outside was waiting for him if he’d need.

He’d loved his family, growing up—still loved them, most certainly, his mother and father, his siblings. But they all lived separate lives now—it had been that way since his teens, since he first went to join the Order, and he’d been…made to disconnect himself as much as possible. Devote himself entirely to the Order—not put too much into relationships outside of that realm. It was not as if they’d taken up vows of chastity, but connections were meant to be…limited—they could wed, but nothing could come before duty. There was always a level…no matter what your ties to someone, you must be ready to abandon them entirely, if the Order had need of you to for any at any time…
Now...he had family. In a permanent sense—it felt more permanent even than the family he'd been born to. He'd already experienced his ability to detach from the Rutherford family—his family’s ability to detach from him to allow him to follow the Order. But Cassandra...Ellie, Sera? He was out of the Order now. And even if he were not he...he could not imagine...there was no amount of loyalty that outdid what he had to them, no orders pertinent enough that they would see him abandon or go against-

If he woke up tomorrow and Circles were restored in their former fashion and there were orders to Circle his girls? Oh. There would be a renewed rebellion, made entirely of Cullen taking down any who thought it in their power to do such a thing. Once upon a time he'd hated mages. Thought they deserved Circling and everything that came with it—they were dangers that needed protected from, the world from them, and they from themselves. He still had a respect for the dangers of magic, but mages? Were like any other person, they were not inherently evil, people he should hate on sight for magic alone. After everything, he was certain if he ran into his former self he'd fist fight him in the street, no holds barred. He loved these girls. Understood...he could not be more grateful for the existence of magic now—it saved Ellie, guided and preserved her all of her life and now she was here and his. And Sera...he wasn’t certain at first, how he felt when she made the decision to wake her magic...but he’d also realized it didn’t matter—it was Sera, her choice entirely and...what they learned about Elves and magic...it sounded like a natural part of her, something she was always meant to have access to and not having that birthright if she wanted it would be nothing short of a shame. And she’d...oh he wasn’t certain she realized it but her ability to step up and take command, her newfound confidence? He knew from personal experience finding oneself, being able to stand on your own two feet and know precisely who you are and what your place is, made you capable of claiming and holding that place. He found it when he left the Order, and she found it, it seemed, when she joined the Inquisition. Lady Emmauld had taught her worthlessness and shame. Now...being accepted for who she is and coming to accept herself—in full—for who she could truly be had caused her to flourish.

His girls were capable, and brilliant and just beautiful and...

Something ached at that—something had always ached, a bitter to the sweet of how much he loved them, loved Cassandra, he...

“Dad?” Sera’s voice sounded, concerned, garnering his attention.

“Papi? Oh gosh are you um...” Ellie waved her unmarked hand before his face, his gaze followed her hand before settling on her face as she breathed a sigh of relief, “spaced out huh?”

“Time to tell your mind to zip it and get some rest,” Sera intoned, pressing a kiss to his cheek, and then, “Oh!” Sera and Ellie let out surprised sounds as he wrapped his arms around them, though they were swift to hug him back tightly. Oh, his girls.

They deserved to be loved. And they deserved to have and all know his love for them. He wasn’t in the Order anymore. He was absolutely resolved to never take Lyrium again—his mind would not eventually be lost to Lyrium madness, he’d no longer the risk of growing to be an unstable burden upon any he was close with.

His parents...he wanted his parents to know these girls. Wanted Mia and Rosie and Branson to know these girls. Wanted them to be known in return! As their...well as far as he was concerned—their granddaughters, their nieces! He wanted to know his nieces! His nephew!

“Please be safe,” Cullen...pled, he was pleading. To them, with the Maker, internally, to guard those he loved as they went on without him.

...not all of them. Cullen entered the tent and the girls left him to remove heavy parts of his armor, don the fresh tunic and trousers they’d left laying out on his bedroll, and when he laid down he heard quiet footsteps approaching, he cracked an eye to see Sera unarmored looking wholly tentative but,

“Cole says your head hurts real bad and you’re still really warm um...my magic pish is cold representing, I was able to help Inky when she had a fever, I thought maybe I could stick around and help you, if you’d be er, cool with it.”

“I’ll definitely be cool with it,” he assured, smiling when she snorted at the pun. “You’re certain you wish to stay?” he checked.

Sera nodded, “I mean I’ll be friggin’ worried about you if I leave and someone staying’ll keep Ink and ‘sandra from worrying so much,” she shrugged. “M’tired, could use a nap.”

Oh, he didn’t hesitate to wave her over, let her join him in his nap set up, she didn’t immediately lay down though, she knelt behind his head, hands splayed on either side of his head, sticking her tongue out at him and he returned the favor briefly before she began calling chill into her hands. Oh, Maker.

…magic was very much a blessing.

“It don’t hurt or nothing, right?” she worried.

“It’s wonderful—thank you, sweetheart,” he said, he could feel himself dozing, though Solas’s words jarred him a bit, ugh. “Sera…it is not a lack of love of you that I haven’t been candid about my health—the exact opposite. If you have questions, you’re free to ask them.”

“You’re real sleepy, I don’t wanna bother you,” Sera shook her head.

“I’ll sleep better if we talk, I promise. This conversation does occupy my headspace—it’ll be easier to tell my mind to let me rest,” he assured.

“Alright…uh…I mean do you know what it is? Are you um…sick?”

…he wasn’t certain what exactly he expected her to ask first—that was the most obvious first question and yet it was the very last one he wanted to outright answer. None save for Adan, Cassandra, and Ellie knew—she only knew because of her status as Inquisitor. But did he owe her an explanation on the level that she was his child? She’d allowed him his privacy—known something ailed him but did not press, just offered her support, that day in Haven. But Sera was not Ellie—he couldn’t expect her to need the same things. She’d a great deal of anxiety and it seemed she coped with it better when she had more answers than questions.

“Well…” he said, “a great many things changed for me, when Kirkwall fell. When I realized how corrupt the Order had become I left it, and all it’s trappings behind, the things that prompted blind loyalty. I…do not wish to be bound any longer so I’m not, I never want to be in a position where I rely directly upon the Order or the Chantry…this is a matter I have only been open with Cassandra and Ellie on as it pertains to their roles in the Inquisition—I disclosed to Cassandra when she offered me my position, and Ellie upon her promotion to Inquisitor so I would ask that you keep this a matter of confidence,” she nodded determinedly, prompting him to continue. “…part of achieving my independence from the Order, is through the choice to cease taking Lyrium. I had been taking it for more than a decade, so…addiction is thoroughly set in.”

“S-so that’s what gives you migraines? Makes you sick?” she confirmed.

“Yes.”

“There’s nothin you can um…I mean there nothing that can help with your addiction pish?”

Cullen huffed softly, raising his hand to take gentle hold of her forearm, rubbing a path with his thumb, “You already do. You’re my beautiful, brilliant, brave girl—you’re always looking out for your sister, your mother, me. I could not ask for more.”

“Friggin- you’re just as bad as ‘sandra and Mare’n’them!” Sera complained. “Part of looking out for you is knowing what I can do to help. Light n’ pish bothers you when you got migraines bad, sound too? And Inky said something about heat, dehydration. Stress and stuff triggers them? Or are they just random?”

“It would seem to be a lovely mixture of both,” he supposed.

Sera nodded. “I know I can be a loudy bitch, if I’ve been giving you headaches-“
“Sera Middle Name, you are to never refer to yourself as a b- as that word.”
“Sorry. I can be a loudy cu-“ she shrieked, a sound that dissolved into a giggle when he blindly raised a hand to try and cover her mouth—bopped her on her sweet nose but she relented her horrendous teasing, “If I’m ever too loud or something just tell me to shut it.”
“Oh, no my dear—you keep being loud, it’s one of the many things I l-“
“Don’t say more lovey stuff!!”
“Sorry. It’s one of the many things I unendingly adore about you.” She removed a hand from his temple to poke him on the nose! “Don’t let anyone stifle or silence the things inside you that produce so much exuberance.”

She snorted, blushing fiercely, looking down—not at him, but training her gaze on her own lap like she’d been struck shy momentarily. And then, “I won’t tell no one about um…the lyrium stuff. But you mind if I talk about migraine stuff with Widdle?”

…oh Maker, which one was Widdle? One was Sweetness. No…lots of people could be ‘sweets’, she usually said ‘Inky Sweets’ when she meant her sister…teetness! That was…Lace! Widdle was Dagna, of course, he wasn’t certain as to why she’d wish to speak of this with her, but “Not at all. Do give her my regards.”

“Kay…I don’t got anymore questions…you need more cold, or can we get our nap on now?”
“I’ve cooled down nicely, thank you,” he readily assured, pleased when she scooted and laid at his side, snuggling against him, and he relished in pressing a kiss to her forehead, hand drawing a lazy line up and down along her back as she let out a sleepy sigh, “Think of pleasant things and have sweet dreams honey.”

She nodded, settling comfortably, he was certain she was steadily falling asleep, he begun dozing off, but he woke the moment he heard Sera whimper, “It’s okay, she’s okay—she wasn’t hurt, she was fine, so she’s still fine now,” she whispered…to herself…about herself?

“Sweetheart?”
“m’okay—Ink’n them is out of range but everything felt okay—she wasn’t scared or hurt anything. Gotta tell myself ‘cause my magic’s little and gets freaked when she’s out of range…it kind of interprets it meaning she’s dead so I gotta tell it she’s alright.”

Oh…Maker. It was a fresh level of heartachingly sweet that she would choose to stay back when she knew she would feel he wasn’t certain if her magic could hear all around her but it was a sentiment he wished to intone to his child, her magic too if it were possible, “Everything is alright—we’ll see them when we wake.”

“Thanks da.”

What more could she do? Maker, this was more than enough. The heady rush that came with every time he could be there for these girls? When they claimed him as a man they chose to give the role of father? High. It was a type of high, he was certain, it released a rush that honestly soothed at the ache in his head, or at least was so grand and all-consuming his brain forgot just how much pain it was in.

So he wasn’t certain if it was the nap, or the fact that he woke to find Sera still secure at his side, Ellie at his other, opening his eyes directly into Cassandra’s who was seated behind him, stroking his hair, that saw his migraine gone.

“Hi,” he whispered, his voice felt lost from sleep and he didn’t wish to risk waking the girls. Cassandra returned in kind,
“Hello,” she greeted softly, smiling as she continued massaging at his scalp. “How are you feeling?”

“Better. You? How did it go?”
“Two more Rifts to the south, one to the north.”

… “She se- five? In one day?”

“She was utterly determined and we’d potion and not a great deal of injuries. Too, Varric, Hawke, Stroud—our soldiers, they’ve made way through the place, rid it of bandit interference, the violent wildlife so Rifts are the only threat…save for the dragon.”

“…Please tell me you didn’t-“

She smiled her assurance, “We are putting it off for another day.”

Thank the Maker. He breathed a sigh of relief, rubbing gentle circles on Ellie’s back, Maker the girl was out like a light, snoring softly against his chest, the faintest bit of bruising, scratches on her face that were still clearing up. He was remorseful he hadn’t been there but…this was just as much a place he needed to be. In a place to give his child refuge after such a hard day.

“Do you wish for me to sit in when you’ve a discussion with Sera?” Cassandra gently wondered.

“We spoke.”

“She’s alright?” Cassandra fretted, he almost loosed an actual whine when her hand left his scalp but he didn’t begrudge Sera the attention as she started scratching at the girl’s hair a bit.

“I answered all the questions she has right now, and I hope she knows she can come to me if she has more.”

Oh, she leaned down, whispering against his skin, “Thank you,” before pressing a kiss to his forehead.

He was amazed he was capable of falling asleep again, but Maker, apparently he’d needed it. He…and Cole—the Spirit startled him, he was lying weightlessly atop Cullen’s chest, mop of blonde hair directly in Cullen’s face—Cassandra was lying alongside Sera, Marehis lying with Ellie…Varric had his bedroll out at their feet, laying in the tent entrance.

“He was tired as shit didn’t know where the fuck else to sleep,” Cole pleasantly explained with Varric’s damnable language, sighing as he relaxed more corporally against Cullen’s chest.

“Are you tired, Cole?” Cullen wondered, he didn’t wish to disturb the boy if he was only just getting to find reprieve, he could stand to lay about a little while longer.

Oh, the boy let out a contented hum, “Thank you for caring that I am comfortable. I am sorry I had to use my voice to talk to you earlier, I know you were not ready to tell Sera— but she was. You were mostly not ready because you worried she wasn’t. You aren’t upset with me but my heart still wanted to say that I am sorry.”

Of course he wasn’t upset with- “Cole, I do understand it is your nature, you’re compelled to help, and you do your best to choose the best way possible…I’m not…it is nothing personal between you and I, I trust you but hearing your voice in my mind—any voice in my mind other than my own?”

“Would scare you, I understand. I will always use my outside voice with you,” he quietly assured…a bit amusing as ‘outside voices’ usually meant free leash to be loud, but he understood ‘inside voice’ would mean an ultimate form of physical silence on the boy’s behalf, so. “I will go—Thom is considering starting dinner, he should. Everyone’s bodies are getting hungry—yours is hungry, Ellie’s body is very hungry, Rifts take so much energy, Magic take so much energy—she really did try her best to stay in contact, kept sending Sera’s magic reassurance for as long as she could. Sera is always hungry.”

—

…mere talk of food roused the girls. Though they found themselves distracted from it when they saw he was awake, he received overlapping greetings of “Hi sleepy Papi!” and “Hey da” before, “how are you feeling?”

“Much better-“

Even more so when he was the recipient of dual kisses to the cheek before he was pulled to join the outside world. Desert air was refreshing, chilled once the sun had set, and the light from their campfire wasn’t anywhere near as blinding as the sun. He hadn’t meant to sleep the day but he supposed he’d needed it. Marehis and Cassandra followed after them, having been woken by the girls’ excitement and the whole of their party gathered around the
A campfire. He claimed a seat with Ellie and Sera, though Cassandra actually got Ellie in her lap, swooping in behind the girl and having her rise so Cassandra could be seated and pull the girl to her as she launched into an update on everything they did while they were out for Cullen and Sera’s benefit—the Rifts, and apparently they managed to wind a path around the Dragon’s territory, Varric leading them to the place they hadn’t been able to enter before without Mage assistance…there had been some sort of experimenting of some sort going on in that location, a great deal of Fade activity still dispersing in that area, but she glossed over it, shrugging and chalking it up to “Creepy stuff” but it was interesting that it seemed like their experiment had a focus on Spirits.*

Ellie’s hand took Cassandra’s momentarily, squeezing twice and the woman taking a deep breath before she pressed a kiss to the top of Ellie’s head, and then Solas looked up as if she’d called his name, she must have prompted him in the bond before saying, “Papi,” ah, well he supposed that was one way of differentiating between them, “wanna talk Spirit stuff with me? Cole?”

“Yes!” Cole cheered like he’d been eagerly awaiting such a conversation. Well, Spirits as a topic may well appeal to their Spirit audience.

“Certainly, da’len,” Solas readily agreed.

Ellie rattled off questions over dinner that Cole and Solas took in stride. What were the real differences between different kinds of Spirits? Faith—was she Elvehnan? She belonged to Mythal’s House, right? So why-come the Maker could send her? Or did He not send her at all? Did Mythal have to send her or does she have a sense of free will—like Cole, he goes around tracking Hurt and Healing it, was Faith listening for the prayers of those who needed her and going where she was needed?”

“Has your mind been troubled by your magic waking, da’len?” Solas worried at her questions. Oh Maker, that…was enough to turn Cullen off of his dinner, quietly clearing his throat as he set his spoon back into the bowl of stew. It had thoroughly wrecked him when Cassandra had laid alongside him in her quarters in Haven upon their return from the Fallow Mire and vented her ire, her heart break—it sounded like they beat her in the street until they thought that she was dead and left her to rot. Oh he prayed she wasn’t dwelling on that as of late, that it did not hurt her more than it already had.

“Not troubled,” Ellie assured, “I’ve just been thinking about it I guess. Not the um…bad parts, the ‘Faith’ part. I kind of wonder…if maybe Faith interacting with my magic did something to it.”

“Have you been feeling something amiss in your magic da’vehnan?” Solas voiced concern, rising from his seat across the fire to come sit before her.

“Not different for me recently, but like, since Faith. I mean I only had my magic maybe a day before I met her so…maybe…I dunno, is there something different between my magic and other people’s because of it?” she wondered, “I thought everyone had something their magic did for them like how mine finds things? Ava always told me to keep it to myself so I thought it was an ‘everyone’ thing. But the only differences between people’s magics seems to be their personal relationships with it and which spectrum of magic it presents with first.”

“…I’ve never encountered someone having a similar additional power that your magic has borne,” Solas supposed, “If…if Ser Pavus or Madam de Fer would be so inclined I wonder if maybe we could conduct an examination of sorts?”

“What, precisely, would this examination entail?” Vivienne wondered.

“I would compare your magic to Ellie’s.”

“Well I do so love hearing how superior I am,” Dorian supposed, rising from his seat at the Iron Bull’s side and sitting alongside Ellie, “but do not take it too much to heart—you outshine me in many arenas. Sickening kindness. Disgusting adorableness. Many ‘nesses’.”

Ellie giggled, sitting closer to the man and linking arms with him before they raised their free hands to Solas who splayed his hands to match theirs, “Will Barrier suit you, Dorian? Excellent.”

They called Barrier into their hands, communing magically for a moment while Solas examined them for… differences? A difference which he apparently found.

“Huh. Madam de Fer would you care to take a look?” Solas called over his shoulder.

“Certainly darling, I do so love squatting in the sand like a cat.”

Ellie gasped loudly, looking to Cullen and imploring, “Papi! Are the cats okay? They’re still eating right?”

…Maker help him, was he going to have to become a cat person? He was almost certain he was on his way to being considered as much with the Kitchen staff because, “They were in excellent health when last I saw them, they’re eating very well—miss Molly dotes on them.”…he checked in on the cats from time to time—just, in case Ellie were to ask after them in her absence—let the creatures rub up against his shins when they were so inclined. He wasn’t going to kick them away! And his hand had perhaps grazed their fur on occasion. Ugh. They were…cute in their own respect, he supposed. Slightly.

“Oh good,” Ellie breathed a sigh of relief, and she smiled at him like she was proud, “Gracias papi!”

Loved cats, grand creatures, there was room in Cullen Rutherford’s heart for Mabari and cats. “Of course, mija.”

Madam de Fer’s brow was arched as she stared at the girl with incredulous amusement before raising her hand to cover her mouth as she cleared her throat and schooled her expression before she risked… smiling too widely? She shook her head before she very primly knelt before Dorian and Ellie once Solas scooted aside and she raised her hands, calling Barrier into them to compare between the Tevinter man and Ellie. Her gaze sought Cassandra’s momentarily before she announced, “Yes I do concur, there are abnormalities—both benign and malignant—in Eleanor’s magic.”

Sera made startled sound, looking pensive, “Malignant?”

“The Mark’s tearing on her magic, darling,” Vivienne explained, “but there is something more, something wholly benign imbued in it, something that grows…in her magic, like it becomes a part of magic as it regenerates in her.”

The Mages started chatting about the implications of that—speculating on what it might mean, if there was any precedent they could think of amongst themselves. Sera was quiet and seemed to be listening, Ellie stopped, saying ‘oh!’ and then turning to look at the older girl, “Sissy! Ven aqui—wanna talk magic?”

“Um…”

“You’re more than welcome to join us my dear,” Vivienne assured.

“Yeah, sure,” Sera shrugged, claiming a seat on Cullen’s thigh since apparently that was the nearest location to Ellie to ‘ven aqui’.

The conversation was…he’d an understanding of magic to a degree but five mages and a Spirit speaking mostly of theory that went directly over Cullen’s head but it was pleasant to listen to, he enjoyed that the girls were enjoying themselves and it was interesting to watch Sera at play with learning. She was so new to it all but there was so much for her to learn and she seemed be dearly enjoying it, and it was educational enough for Cullen. Sera was quiet and listening and it was delightful to learn that—well he’d seen it before, but he hadn’t realized just exactly what it meant and now it was no longer merely just endearing, it was entirely flattering—her ears fluttered, twitching twice whenever she heard something she found interesting or she merely liked. And then when she was ready to offer something herself, had formulated something she thought worthy of contributing to the discussion, her ears did a single upticking movement in the 3..2..1 before she spoke. Maker the girl was a force of brilliance. He’d never the pleasure of seeing Ellie in an educational setting outside of the realm of physical training, save the occasional instance of her bursting into his office to proudly show him the marks she’d gotten on her work. It was fun to see her wide eyed and excited to offer up theories, lip catching between her teeth like a physical barrier to halt her tongue as she listened and considered what her mentors had to say, their only warning that she was about to hit them with questions was the surely bruising skin slipping from its constraint and flying with inquiries and ideas.

The most interesting of which was, “Do you think maybe that’s what kept me from being possessed all this time? Because of what Faith left in my magic?”

Madam de Fer looked almost deliberate in the pause she gave before supposing, “It is rather the miraculous feat to have thwarted demonic designs for so long entirely of your own power.”

“Ellie is strong, and her resolve against demons is absolute,” Solas argued defensively.

“Well yeah,” Ellie said, “I mean—hypothetically speaking if I were immune to possession like mami is—that still wouldn’t make it okay to accept demon deals. Even if they can’t get their end result you get a lot of false fixes that just lead to relying on them anyway and I’m sure they could figure out a work around with that—have someone immune to possession doing their bidding in exchange for favors. So not dealing with them full stop is still the way to go,” she assured. “Tia’s not wrong, papi. I mean wowza I’ve been in some doosies. If a demon could take me I kind of feel like it definitely would have happened somewhere between that jerk in the Hinterlands and Envy at Thernfal. And gosh…we were kind of just in the middle of demon territory, surrounded by Red Lyrium—Papi was able to break through to his power in the Fade, demons should’ve been all over me.”

Solas seemed to consider it momentarily and then, “Seeker—you’re immune to possession, Ellie says?”

“It is a boon of my status as Seeker, yes,” Cassandra replied.

Solas blinked at that, pondering that bit of information for a minute before he carefully requested, “Would you permit me to compare your Seeker Ability to Ellie’s magic?”

Cullen’s hand went to rest on Cassandra’s back to comfort and hopefully prompt the woman to please breathe because she stopped altogether, paling at the question before offering one of her own in frigid tones, “How exactly do you propose we do that?”

“I’m not thinking of anything untoward- Seeker I would never request you torture- we have seen you er…” Solas seemed reticent to speak further. “You’ve poured lyrium out for the purpose of burning it—if you could do similarly now, I wonder if perhaps I would be capable of er…examining how the power works and see if what is in Ellie’s magic is similar.”

Cassandra considered it a moment…or perhaps she was paying close attention to Ellie’s hand on her thigh—the girl’s hand was hanging at her side, index finger on the side of Cassandra’s thigh…writing? It looked like she might be spelling letters, pausing between words but Cullen would be damned if he could understand what she was communicating to her mother before the woman cleared her throat and said, “Certainly.”

Ellie stood up from Cassandra’s lap and Cullen was glad he was seated on the ground already or he might have found himself falling off balance when Sera pulled the girl into her lap, adding a second weight to Cullen’s left thigh to watch as Madam de Fer emptied the remainder of a half used bottle of Lyrium from her stores onto the ground before the Seeker. Oh, he was grateful Cassandra’s focus went to the Lyrium as he felt Ellie flinch—well, it was more like he felt Sera flinch when she did, the older girl holding Ellie more securely and making a soft comforting sound in her ear. Solas splayed a hand to match Cassandra’s as she raised it to bring the Lyrium to a boil, and Cullen thought Ellie- oh Maker was she truly in distress? It had been a traumatic thing, having ones blood made to burn, was she afraid somehow the Seeker would miscalculate and incidentally attack Lyrium in her system? She rose up out of Sera’s hold and walked—

Nowhere. She was merely climbing out of Sera’s lap and climbing into his, her hand going behind her head momentarily before her arms went around his neck and he felt material against his face, over his chin and nose—her breathing mask, she was apparently putting on him as she whispered, “Careful papi,” and buried her face in the slope of his neck. Ah.
supposed it might- yes. It probably wasn’t wise, at this juncture for him to incidentally breathe in Lyrium fumes…was that healthy for anyone? Everyone was doing well to cover their mouths and noses while Solas and Cassandra worked.

But…when they were done? Solas had been silent the whole of his examination and he looked like he was taking something under serious consideration and then he said, “Seeker…have you encountered a Spirit of Faith?”

“We’ve a great many rituals, the details of which I’m not privy to speak of with outsiders. However I…was rather incoherent during the climax of my vigil to become a Seeker, but when it was through I was initiated and assured of my status of being immune to possession, too it was when I was able to realize my Lyrium ability,” Cassandra supposed.

Their mages began speculating on that—the implications of Spirits and demonic immunity. Though Sera got albeit distracted…in truth he had a feeling she’d been distracted since Cassandra had stopped causing the Lyrium to burn.

“Hey mum,” Sera wondered, “think I can look at that?”

Cassandra looked albeit confused until she followed Sera’s pointing finger to the spot of Lyrium burned sand. Where there had been a blazing puddle of Lyrium was now a smooth solid something, shining under moon and firelight. “Certainly. Be cautious, Sera, you’ve your gloves?”

Sera nodded, rising up to go get them but Cole had vanished and reappeared with the things, and he crouched alongside her when she went to examine the Lyrium-burnt sand while Ellie resumed sitting in Cullen’s lap. Ahh, well, at least he still had one of his children. “Oi Inky—sorry I don’t mean to interrupt but I-“

“Oh!” Ellie chirped, rising up- why? To what end?! He was childless now! “Umm… Oh! I kept-“

Sera gasped, “Inky! Yes!”

And now Ellie was off! Disappearing into the tent! And Sera was not returning to his lap! Who gave him such insolent children?

The Maker. He’d also blessed him with their mother. So. Cassandra let out a muted yelp when Cullen’s arm snaked around her waist as he pulled her into his lap and she begrudgingly obliged, informing him, “If I am made comfortable and you push me from your lap the moment they return I will leave you, I swear. You are ridiculous.”

“That is why you love me,” was met with a derisive grunt but an assuring, “Yes it is!” from Cole. Sweet boy. Adored him. That sent him gasping and falling onto his back as he pulled his hat down to cover his face, letting out... Cullen was decently certain it was a happy, excited sound but it almost came off as mildly frustrated like he couldn’t fully express the depth of what he was felling. “I can’t! You all- you all have levels of love and care for me and it is overwhelming because I love all of you back just as much, some of you more because you love me less—it is not your fault, you don’t have to love me as much as I love you!” he promised, the announcement of which made Madam de Fer clear her throat and look abashed—he wasn’t certain if it was because she did not care to have the boy including her in those he loved, or if it was because she was certain she was one of the few who did not love him as much in return and she felt something about that…perhaps guilt?

Whatever it was now she was distracted—they all were. Ellie had returned, excitedly joining her sister in the sand, sliding on her knees to meet her bearing the box Dagna had sent her bracer in, she’d apparently kept it and now it was the perfect receptacle for depositing the long, paper thin lyrium sand shard in for transport.

“Tell Dagna I say hi!” Ellie requested, Sera doling out a kiss to her cheek before she popped up and went to the requisitions table to see to just that. “Oh! Wait crap—does she need-“ she was calling to the girl from where she knelt in the sand.

“She should still have my magic in the runestone I left her—she needed it for makin’ the box locky, so,” Sera said over her shoulder, shrugging.

Ellie breathed a small sigh of relief, absentely rubbing at her Marked hand.
"Mark aching you tonight, Imekari?" Bull asked gently.
Ellie shook her head, "No more than usual," she assured, what assurance that was.
"It’s just felt a little different since we arrived in the Approach," And then she looked to Solas, wondering, "Papi, do you think Corypheus is here with the Wardens?"

Solas blanched at that and the entire party turned their attention on him the- the bastard! "I am regretful I do not know the full of his plot—I thought the Conclave would be the end of his designs, I did not care much what else he planned to do. I’ve no idea where he’s taken refuge in this time—how a monstrosity his size can easily hidden is beyond me—but his primary concerns seem to be plotting against Orlais Empress and creating a 'vessel' for some likely horrific reason. It is likely Wardens he has left in charge here, he may be able to beguile a select few with his presence but I truly doubt the Wardens as a whole have seen the blighted creature they now follow.” He rose and carefully went to be seated before the girl, asking, “How does your Mark feel different, da’len?”

Ellie shrugged, “Just…like its picking up on something?” and then, very quietly, “Maybe the Orb? It feels the way it did when Corypheus was coming…and sort of like…” she thought about it, “I think it felt this way when we were in the future. My Mark was…the sky was full of the Breach and the world was covered in Rifts and there were new ones opening constantly all around us so, its hard to tell past the ouch of it all, but thinking back, Alexius had the ability to open Rifts, the way I do now.”

Solas nodded. “I doubt Corypheus would entrust a lacky with the Orb, but he has clearly seen fit to bequeath powers from it to them in the past…future,” he amended with some frustration, “despite the flow of time, you’ve the personal experience that he does as much,” the man finally landed on, time travel truly was mind boggling. Solas looked across the faces of those gathered around them, though it was Marehis’s gaze he held as he announced, “There is every chance Corypheus is near with the Orb, or at the very least he has a subordinate he’s gifted an Orb ability to use in his plots here. Either way…”

Sera yelped, abandoning the Requisitions table to scramble to Ellie’s side , wrapping her arms entirely around the girl and holding her to her chest as she screeched, “We can’t let him get Inky!” No, they most certainly could not.

Marehis swallowed, clearing her throat as she rose from her seat, schooling her features into a smile for Ellie as she drew near—passing them on her way to the Requisitions table, but she did stop to rest her hands on Ellie and Sera’s shoulders, “I will report our concerns to Leliana, da’vehnans, we will scour the area and make certain our Scouts are on high alert for Corypheus’s potential presence,” she promised before going to do just that, the Iron Bull rising to join her, the rumble of his voice speaking low as he assisted in reporting to Leliana. Ellie hugged Sera back…struggling with her momentarily as she wrestled the older girl, pushing her onto her back so she could assume the position Sera formerly held—hugging getting her chin atop Sera’s head and hugging the girl tightly to her chest with a hum of effort before she assured, “Everything’s gonna be okay! Hey—did you finish prepping your delivery for Dagna? Do you wanna write Lacey? I know she’s busy, but she’d love hearing from you! Oh! You want dessert sissy? Papi made grapes cold for us! The green kind—those are your favorite! And then we can get ready for bed—I’m feeling a lot better, so I’m skipping sleep potion tonight, you wanna play in the Fade tonight?”

Sera giggled at the rapidfire suggestions from the younger girl before agreeing, “Sure Ink, that sounds like a plan—c’mon, lets go grab some grapes, you wanna help me write Lacey?”

“Sure!”

As much as Ellie was endeavoring to distract Sera from their fresh concerns, Sera was doing likewise to some extent—taking the girl by the hand and pulling her up and along to write her letter to her girlfriend, which was apparently a matter of privacy but not from her sister. It got Ellie off where her sweet Human ears couldn’t hear the adults if they needed a moment to...plan, consider, panic. Once she was out of earshot there was a quiet overlap of voices—Varric, Thom, Vivienne, Dorian all speaking at once voicing different concerns. Was this all a trap to lure Ellie out here—their forces were immediately around her in Skyhold and the place itself was rather impenetrable, they’d the resources to outlast a siege on the place, could cut off all contact with it by blowing the bridge out—there was no other way of getting to them save for the sky, and they were well prepared for that given Corypheus’s dragon, the beast he unleashed on Haven. Skyhold would withstand a dragon attack as it was mostly comprised of stone that had since been blessed by Cassandra—both by her beautiful presence, and the literal blessing she could imbue in the place, there were several unperceivable runes that marked the walls now Pentaghasts of old had developed to defend their holds from Dragons in the days when the creatures were many and vengeful, capable of striking war against those who were so determined to slay them. Once upon a time, dragons could come in hoards to attack their enemies and the Pentaghasts were responsible for...well a great deal of just how architecture in the age of Dragon. All major cities, Circles, Chantry buildings constructed entirely of stone as to not burn in the blaze of a Dragon attack. Stone alone was a great help, but the Runes would assist in making it hold strong, keep bursts of violence against their walls from making them crumble—up to the point that literal dragons could bash their bodies against Skyhold’s walls, and they would not crumble further. The whole of their forces could survive inside the center castle, the walls, until Corypheus’s forces tired if need be. Here? In the Western Approach? They’d no such ability—they’d not the resources and the only suitable structure was Griffon Wing Keep and even that...well Cullen had reviewed the map of the place, it was very open, required tents for their people to have true shelter, and there was little stopping any of Corypheus’s forces—closing the gate just meant they either had to break through, or climb, and his dragon? It could strike them like fish in a barrel and that metaphor felt truly horrific now that there was such a high potential for it to truly apply to them. What if this was all a way of getting the Inquisitor in a place of weakness so Corypheus could strike again with her forces just out of reach? Did they have a way of escape? If Corypheus came for her...they were uncertain just how they could handle that at the moment. Ellie had come far in her training but she could only do so much, she was still in recovery—she’d been favoring her left side all evening, slumping from pain in her right side after their day of battle testing her recovery, she was in no condition to be in a fight against someone like Corypheus, even with the whole of her party at her side. They would need to extract her, make escape and get her to safety, going head-to-head with the creature was not doable just now if he was coming for her.

Oh...he prayed rather fervently that evening when they settled in for sleep—grateful beyond words to have his girls resting safe and sound between Cassandra and Marehis, pleading the Maker would guard and guide them all, keep them from Corypheus’s hand.

The following day dawned bright and blazing, Ellie and Sera making certain Cullen ate well, pushing more water on him, clinking potion bottles in a morning toast before they set out. Sera rode Marehis’s steed—Cole joining her so she did not feel lonely!—as Marehis took to Russel’s saddle with Ellie. Their scouts had no sighting of Corypheus or those they suspected were close associates in or around the Western Approach, but Marehis would be riding with Ellie at all times now, prepared to evacuate should the need arise.

Cullen personally felt the need arose the moment they came face to face with the Western Approach’s local Dragon but uh...the panic shortly passed. In point of fact...and this might not well reflect upon his fatherhood...he entirely forgot Sera and Ellie were with them, but to be fair...he forgot everyone was with them.

Cassandra Pentaghast was a beautiful, fearsome, goddess of dragon slaying. She was not one for makeup save her rather iconic eyeliner, but she certainly did not need it and that which she acquired from battle? All else paled in comparison to dust from the battlefield, blood on her face as she straddled the dragons neck and sank her sword to sever its spine from its skull.
“Dude full offense, the second you fuck up with Seeker I’m wooing the crap out of her,” the Iron Bull breathlessly informed him. “If I truly mess things up with her? You’re more than free to woo away.”

“Mami that was amazing!” Ellie cheered—snapping Cullen back to the reality their children just faced a dragon, good Maker—as she rushed to meet the woman sliding to drop to the ground, Cassandra was rosey cheeked from exertion, smiling wide as she opened her arms for the girl, grunting a bit on impact though she chuckled warmly as she commended Eleanor for her efforts—where was Sera? Ahh, well on her way, she met them both with a sweeping hug as she questioned them on their health, sharing health potion all around as they…Maker, this was fun—Cassandra was warm exuberance, everyone adrenaline fueled and feeling high from their victory as they regrouped, the Seeker chatting away with as much excitement as Ellie and Sera usually produced on their own, Cullen thought the woman omnificent as she recalled her moments of pride during their battle, listing every one of Ellie and Sera’s moves against the creature, commending their tactics, that they stuck together, avoided the beasts teeth, had their timing down impeccably when it came to avoiding getting swept up in its windstorm—she only halted her words when their party came to a literal halt before Professor Frederic’s camp where Ellie broke off to assure him the Dragon was slain and…returning with a deal struck with the man, he bowed to her before she left him and she announced he would be assisting Leliana’s forces in studying Corypheus’s dragon*.

“Oh…Eleanor—that is excellent!” Cassandra enthused. The woman he loved was literally high on her own happiness right now and it was utterly delightful. Cassandra Pentaghast was a proud mami and they let her ramble her enthusiasm freely until she was satisfied, all the way across the Approach as they went to face their next challenge of the day. Though her exuberance was outmatched by Sera and Ellie when Cullen introduced them to what he called chilled chocolate. He’d prepared warm cocoa before bed, jarred it up and put it in the cold chest overnight, and relinquished it to the girls as they rode along to the Still Ruins, earning him brilliant smiles and, Da! Friggin genius! and Papi! This is the best! It was! He was pleased they enjoyed it so much, the two of them gulping it down though Ellie asked if anyone was cramping after their Dragon fight, and she passed hers off to be finished by Cassandra, Sera sharing hers with the Iron Bull…apparently chocolate was just the thing for post-dragon battles! It helped with muscle cramps! Oh, that made him all the more pleased, to have made something that was both enjoyable and beneficial*.

The Still Ruins were eerie as they entered the scene Varric had described to them—a battle between Venatori and demons frozen in time. The Iron Bull was…stealth personified, surprisingly enough, as he hung back from Ellie and Sera’s investigation of the place, and the Qunari unsheathed a knife he kept at his hip to attempt slitting the throat of a Venatori mage only to find whatever magic kept them in stasis made them untouchable so long as time for them stood still. Inconvenient—something felt dishonorable about going around and striking mortal blows against those who could not defend themselves, but neither did Cullen necessarily feel wholly concerned about honor when it came to Venatori or demons—the last thing Rifts needed was further reinforcement for their demons.

They really, truly did not.

It was chaos the moment they finished collecting the shards and Ellie cast to set time in motion again. The effect was immediate and the whole of the temple was full of battle…which was albeit helpful in that the Venatori and Demons were so focused on one another, they did not immediately focus on the Inquisition’s addition to their party, they killed each other off well enough.

“Hangin’ in there, Boss-girl?” the Iron Bull checked on their Inquisitor once the Rift cracked closed. Ellie stood with her hands on her knees, catching her breath, Marehis rubbing circles on her back.

Ellie nodded, her voice hoarse as she admitted, “I think that was all the Rifts I had in me today…is it okay if we head for Griffon Wing Keep and call it a day?”
“Of course, Inquisitor,” Cassandra affirmed.
“That sounds excellent da’vehnan,” Marehis softly commended, pressing a kiss to the back of the girl’s head. Oh, Cullen was relieved the girl was honest about her capabilities… just as Sera had said. He really did have the smartest girls. He’d been so fearful when he heard how many Rifts she’d conquered yesterday, he worried she’d try to seal every last one in the Western Approach today on top of a dragon slaying.
“C’mon Imekari,” Bull said, pulling Ellie to his chest when she appeared unsteady on her feet earning a bit of giggling as the girl wrapped her arms around his neck, head resting on his shoulder.
“I’m excited to meet Rylen,” Ellie said, “and I really want to touch base with Stroud and I miss Garrett…” Varric visibly cringed, he still did not care for Hawke’s first name, though his expression softened when he realized she was half conscious against the Qunari.
Varric sighed, shaking his head as he warmly assured, “That asshole misses you too Tumbles.”

…he truly did, Maker help them all. Ellie stirred in the saddle before Marehis just as Griffon Wing Keep appeared in the distance, and its impressive size was only outdone by the sheer loudness of an alarmed, equally alarming cry that broke out to echo up from the pace before the gate opened well before their party was near enough to enter and Garrett Hawke came bursting from the Inquisition’s hold shouting, “Half-pint?!”
“Whole-pint!” Ellie gladly returned.
“You’re here!”
“Only physically!” she cheerily assured as Russel came to a halt and Hawke was at she and Marehis’s side, holding his arms up,
“Bring it here!” he invited, helping the girl down and pulling her to him to take her up in a hug. “Maker’s breath, I’ve been worried sick—Varric sent me some bullshit about you losing an entire organ.”
“I did lose an entire organ! The Red Lyrium ate it!”
Hawke looked dumbstruck before he said, “Shut up!”
Ellie smiled up at him, awing a bit before dropping her smile and reprimanding, “Don’t tell me to shut up!” before she giggled at her efforts of playing mad.
Hawke chuckled warmly, wrapping an arm around her shoulders as he led her toward the Keep. “Then tell me everything! What the hell happened and who do I gotta kill because of it?”
Cassandra looked amused as she regarded Varric, “I trust you’re jealous Hawke’s attentions are stolen yet again?”
“Eh. We’ve seen enough of each other out here. Guy might be ignoring me for not taking him with me to Emprise du Lion but he can suck it—his ass was asleep-“
“You abandoned me like some regretful one night stand!” Hawke accused over his shoulder as their party followed him into the Keep, “How hard is it to wake me up and say, hey, great work, I’m leaving a gold piece on the nightstand and heading out, Tumbles is hurt?”
“Gold?”
“I’m worth nothing less!” Hawke insisted.
Ellie giggled as Varric conceded, “You know what, my bad—you’re right and you should say it.” Maker help them all.
Stroud was resting, Hawke said—they would see him before they made way to interfere with the Wardens gathering, he assured. But she could meet their Keep’s esteemed leader. Rylen looked well, in his element. Cullen had forewarned Ellie that the man was… focused and direct, he said as many words as needed said and little else.
It…went about as good as could be expected. Rylen looking out of depth, his face ablaze and he could not blame the desert sun due to the silken emerald green scarf wrapped around his neck, over his head before his helmet—so, it was likely due to the one-girl ambush of their Inquisitor showering him with seemingly unending praise. Gosh it’s so great to meet him! He’s tall! Did he know he was tall? The Western Approach had been handled so well! Griffon Wing Keep was awesome! He was doing such an amazing job! She’s so proud of him! Did he like his scarf? Oh yay! Her boyfriend’s papa made it! He looks very handsome in green—Rylen and her boyfriend, she informed him.

He did not have to laugh for several minutes when he discovered the ‘papi’ she’d been referencing was Cullen. But he did. Rylen looked Cullen in the eye, looked to girl smiling up at him, and then back to Cullen before he began laughing. For possibly the first time ever in his life—it was certainly the first time Cullen ever heard him doing as much, for a moment he thought the sound was the man was yelling.

“Apologies,” Rylen excused himself, clearing his throat, “honor meeting you, Inquisitor. Need anything, I’ll be around.”

“I do have one more question,” Ellie said hopefully, as if leading up to some great request of favor… “do you like tag?”

“I…tag, miss?”

His child breathed in a startled gasp, looking bewildered and excited at the prospect, “You don’t know about Tag?! I didn’t know until I joined the Inquisition either—I can teach you if you feel like joining us!”

He politely declined, but he’d no objections to learning through example—she was Inquisitor and this was her fortress so. She had the run of the place…literally as she and Sera and Cole ran about the Keep, weaving through walkways and those at work, a few soldiers and scouts even joined in on their fun…Hawke, as well. Maker.

It looked like great fun but Ellie quietly slipped out of the game she started to go to Cassandra, catching her breath before asking if she’d like to lay down and read for a bit. The woman looked entirely in love with the notion as she led the girl off to do so. Cullen was tempted to join them, but Sera came running up to him not long after, catching herself from nearly colliding with him by bracing herself, hands on his forearms as she caught her breath, brimming with enthusiasm.

“Da- Widdle- sh- she-“

“Sweetheart, slow down—let yourself breathe a moment,” Cullen chuckled, Maker the girl was excited, she nodded as she took on a few more deep breaths and then,

“Widdle sent things—try, okay? Close your peepers!” she ordered so, he did. And a moment later he felt something sliding over his ears and resting on his nose all at once before, “Open em!”

…he opened his eyes to a darker world and it was an absolutely delightful relief for all a darker world sounded foreboding. The sunlight wasn’t torture to his eyes for the first time since crossing from forest to desert. “What…what is this?”

“Glasses! But for blockin’ out the sun”—I saw a noble priss wearin’ weirdy glasses with dark lenses in Val Royeaux, and I thought something like that might help you—lenses is obsidian,” she explained. “You um…you like ‘em?”

She let out a surprised, delighted sound when he swept her up in a hug, “I love them—Sera, you are a genius, never let anyone ever tell you otherwise. Please give Dagna my compliments,” Oh Maker, he’d have to thank the girl when they returned to Skyhold… carefully—he owed her a great deal but if he said as much she might take it as invitation to burn their dragon-proofed hold to the ground.

Blessed things—he’d seen Lyrium miners wear something similar to protect their eyes, goggles though instead of a strap around the back of his head, silver frames kept everything together and them on his ears. They looked cool as shit—in his and the Iron Bull’s opinion, Varric’s as well. Maker bless his brilliant child.

They did not see Stroud until morning, Hawke disappearing to check on the man and inform him Ellie and her party were prepared to face the Wardens. The man looked…not well. To have the Call so constant and unrelenting, it sounded horrific but the man bore it well for all it wore on him. He offered their group a quiet greeting and Ellie invited him to sit with her, the girl speaking quietly to the man in soothing tones, asking questions, checking up on him, getting him to take on a few ginger bites of toast and potion before she took his hands and they closed their eyes, the girl offering up a soft prayer for the man and the day ahead.

“Sometimes I feel things that aren’t real either,” she confessed, “I know it’s definitely not as bad as what you’re going through, just- sometimes I feel like my Mark is spreading when it really isn’t or I’ll feel like I’m in danger when I’m safe in camp with my family. Reminding myself it isn’t real and grounding myself in things that are helps.”

“Thank you, Inquisitor,” Stroud’s voice was hoarse as he spoke.

They mounted up and road from the Keep to the camp they’d stayed in their first night in the Approach—the Wardens were not meeting far from there, and camp was a safe enough place to leave their steeds. They did not wish to announce their presence nearing the Warden fortress outright, warning them he was uncertain just what they might find, to be on their guard.

…no amount of being on guard could prepare them for the horror waiting them at the Ritual Tower.

It wasn’t a traitorous Warden leading their rituals, but a Tevinter Mage—venatori. Lacky of Corypheus, leading the Wardens in some vile ceremony, piles of their brothers and sisters lay dead around the Ritual tower, at the hands of their fellow Wardens—and as another was slain by a Warden Mage, he—Cullen was uncertain—had the man been made into a demon? Or had his sacrifice pulled a demon from the Fade?

“Bind it, as I showed you,” the Venatori mage ordered.

The Mage Warden’s eyes glowed red as he waved his hand before the demon of Rage and it…became compliant. Like a leashed mabari, it followed the Warden without so much as a roar. Oh Maker, they’d truly bound a demon. The Tevinter Mage smirked as he raised his hand likewise, a glow emitting from it before the Warden went to join his fellow Mages lining the tower, standing with…their own bound demons. How wonderful. This wasn’t fresh hell.

Cole shrank back from their party, letting out a startled cry before he vanished from sight.

“Cole?” Ellie whispered, and when she received no reply she shook herself and led their party forward determinedly.

And this Venatori knew her, knew her Mark, on sight. “Inquisitor,” he greeted her, “What an unexpected pleasure. Lord Livius Erimond, at your service.”

“You are no Warden!” Stroud accused.

“But you are,” Lord Erimond sighed, “the one Clarel let slip. And you found the Inquisitor and came to stop me…shall we see how that goes?” he wondered.

Ellie took that as leave to state her business, “Wardens—this man is lying to you! He serves an ancient Tevinter Magister who wants to unleash a Blight.”

The Lord looked on her with put-upon concern, “That’s a serious accusation, little girl. Let’s see what the Wardens think…” and then, “Wardens. Hands up.”

…Every Warden gathered that remained standing, those who had demons bound to them? Raised their hands in time with Erimonds, puppets following their master as they raised the same hand he did, “Hands down.”

Hands down it was somehow more horrifying a sight than their deceased…now seemingly lucky brethren.

“Corypheus has taken their minds,” Stroud confirmed with Ellie, aghast.

“They did this to themselves,” Erimond informed them, “You see, the Calling had the Wardens terrified. They looked everywhere for help. Of course since it was my Master who put the Calling into their little heads, we in the Venatori were prepared. I went to Clarel full of sympathy, and together we came up with a plan. Raise a demon army, march into the Deep Roads, and kill the Old gods before they wake.” Ellie looked to Dorian who nodded, the Tevinter man quietly confirming, “The demon-riddled future we saw.”

“Envy gave me a preview of your plans,” Ellie said to Erimond.
“Now you know how it begins. Sadly for the Wardens, the binding rituals I taught their Mages has a side effect. They are now my Master’s slaves.”

The man sounded crazed, his words did anyway—he spoke as if he was laying out a perfectly rational plan, something anyone would find reasonable, insisted the Wardens chose this, that his Master’s plying motivation was inconsequential. They were going to take down the Old gods and put Corypheus on the Golden Throne.

“This is madness!” Solas insisted, rather ironically appealing to the man’s sense, “For all we know, killing the Old gods could make things even worse!” They knew very well that that was, in fact, the case.

That was only met with the mans insistence that Corypheus would rule and the Venatori would be god-kings of the world. So. His sanity was intact, truly.

Maker, this was all very…hopeless. Terrifying—Corypheus was laying claim to the entirety of the Wardens’ minds, binding an army of demons to his will and Erimond was horrifically correct about one thing—Demons did not need to eat or sleep, they did not need to heal or have convictions or conscious. Their Forces were strong and they were coming to have the Inquisitor’s back but they weren’t here yet and…oh Maker, what if they weren’t enough?
He wasn’t certain how they were leaving this lovely…conversation? Altercation? The man was touting his rhetoric he’d yet to attack, did he expect them to just walk away from this?
He shouldn’t.

Ellie stared at the Tevinter mage, fierce and hard as she spoke, “Release the Wardens from their binding and surrender. I won’t ask twice.”

The man sneered at her. “No, you won’t.”

Weapons were drawn by every member of the Inquisitor’s party the moment this-this bastard did something, some awful spell that sent Ellie’s Mark blazing, the girl to her knees, screaming in pain.

“The Elder One showed me how to deal with you in the event you were foolish enough to interfere again. The Mark you bear? The Anchor that lets you pass safely through the veil? You stole that from my Master. He’s been forced to seek other ways to access the Fade. When I bring him your head, his gratitude will be—” he cried out in surprise.

Because through his assault, Ellie pushed to rise up and stand on her own two feet, Marked hand raised and tugging to tear a hole in the Veil, a Rift that cracked open before the Tevinter Mage and blasting him onto his back side, scrambling to his feet and wincing as he clutched at his side and ordered, “Kill them!” before fleeing. Like a coward.

Ellie drew her staff and cast Barrier over their numbers, falling back to join her fellow Mages. Wardens backed by Demons were formidable and he prayed his Forces were prepared —he felt confident in their abilities, but Maker preserve them all.

“Ellie?” Cullen’s voice overlapped Marehis and Sera’s, “Da’vehnan—”
“Inky!” as their party rounded on their Inquisitor.
“Da’len, let me see,” Solas pled, reaching for Ellie’s Marked hand.

The girl was pale, and breathless from battle but she held out her hand for him to examine, the Elf calling Fade magic into his hand even as she assured, “I’m alright, it doesn’t hurt anymore he…I dunno, it felt like kind of like what Corypheus did in Haven, but my Mark doesn’t feel weird or different, I don’t think it has any new tricks or anything—all the ouch with none of the reward,” she supposed, “so that’s fun,” she offered with false cheer, a sardonic grin.

“You did very well against his attack I…I am proud of you, da’vehnan. I detect nothing different in the Mark,” Solas reported to their relief, gently squeezing her hand a few times and raising it to press a kiss to her knuckles, looking very much the epitome of remorse.

“You’re certain you’re alright sweet girl?” Marehis fretted.

Ellie nodded. “I really am okay—is anyone hurt?”

“We’re well, Eleanor,” Cassandra assured, resting a hand on the girl’s back in a need to make contact with the girl.

“Okay, what now? The Wardens are…in it really deep,” she sighed, looking to Stroud, “Now what?”

“He said this was just a test,” Stroud said, “there is an abandoned Warden fortress near by, a place he could properly unleash an entire army—Adamant Fortress.”

Ellie nodded, “If you can give us a location, we can have scouts lay eyes on the Fortress, give our soldiers orders to meet us there.” And then, sympathetic, she rested a hand on his forearm, “I’m really sorry, Stroud. About all of this, I know that can’t have been easy to see. Thank you—for being so brave, and going for help. We will help them, I promise.”

Hawke...looked like he was holding his tongue, flinching as he caught himself quite literally from speaking for a moment before saying, “C’mon half-pint. Let’s get out of here.”

Sera wrapped the younger girl up in a hug—cheek to cheek with the girl as she hoisted her up to hold her high against her chest and walk the bridge from the Ritual Tower to head for camp.

“Sera!”

“No Seraing!” Sera insisted. “I’m a ruddy hypocrite but I don’t freaking care! You’re not allowed to Inquisitor until we get back to base and you gotta be all ‘official letter writing’. Right now you’re my little sister who just got Mark tortured by some piss-bucket sack of shite I’m freaking freezing on sight and blasting full of arrows the next time I see him, I fucking swear.” She did indeed.

“Sissy I’m o—”

“That wasn’t okay.”

The air around Sera felt caustic, trembling with her fright-mixed-outrage, Ellie managed to wrap her arms around Sera’s middle and let her sister...deal with the things she was feeling, the overwhelming need to put the girl in a place of protection. She only relinquished her hold to place the girl on her feet when they got to camp and intoning, “Stay with muma,” before helping her into Russel’s saddle before Marehis climbed up after her.

“Cole—carino, they’re all gone, nobody’s going to hurt you,” Ellie called from astride her steed as she waited for her party members to mount their own horses. Cole...did not make an appearance but Ellie nodded as if in response to someone.

Everyone was silent as they made their return to Griffon Wing Keep.

...it was the quiet before the storm.

Marehis helped Ellie down from Russel, and Cassandra went to her, putting an arm around her shoulders to walk with her to the Keep’s requisitions table so she could send word to Leliana. Their party followed through the Keep...part way—to the first level above the small marketplace set up just inside the Keep’s gate while Cassandra and Ellie continued onward and up, to the highest level while everyone else came to a stop—some out of necessity, and some out of curiosity of just what that necessity was.

Several things broke out at once.

Cullen startled when it started—quite literally all in the same moment. Marehis was railing at Solas—he’d sensed the Orb’s power near! Why hadn’t he been prepared to defend the girl! How had he not warned them the Orb could perform such a horrifying ritual—binding people! Honestly! Hawke was getting into it with Stroud, rounding on the man and asking what the bloody hell was wrong with the Wardens?! How could they have gotten caught up in all this mess! How could they stand idle by and willingly participate in the murder of their brethren, let Corypheus lay claim to their minds?! Stroud wanted to save them? He should be more concerned with stopping them!

And over it all—volume wise—was Sera screaming, “Cole! What the fuck?!” “Sera—” Cullen started—Ellie was certain to hear and she would be swift to defend the boy, he felt certain.

“No—no I want to know!” Sera snapped, shouting at the sky, “I want to know why the hell you left Inky! You left her to face that shite bastard! He hurt her! You’re her friend—her ally! You’re ruddy not supposed to run away when things go sideways! So why the hell did you—”

“I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry I’m sorry!” dropped from the boy’s lips as he materialized before Sera, clutching at his head as if he were in pain, “I- I was scared I would hurt you! All of you! Th-th- they were binding demons—if they bound me I would have to do whatever they said and they would say to hurt you! I- I’m sorry!”

Sera looked a bit winded at the notion. “Oh.” And then, “Cuddly I…shite, okay. I didn’t- I didn’t think about that frig. Well I did—I—“

“You wanted to protect me, and then you were mad at me when I ran away,” Cole said, “I wanted to protect you too, more than I want you to not be mad with me.”

Sera nodded. “I…m’not mad at you anymore. I’m sorry I yelled at you, binding shite was scary.”

“I’m sorry you yelled at me too—your throat is sore now. Can I make it tea? Papa taught me tea. He taught me breakfast food! For Maryden, but she isn’t here, and you eat breakfast too. Do you think she would be mad at me for making another girl breakfast?”

“…s’long as we’re not bumpin’ bits, I don’t think she’ll mind,” Sera supposed, looking to the adults still…well. It was rather the quarrel…near-brawl they were witnessing.
Varric was in the mix with Stroud and Thom was coming to the Warden’s defense, while Vivienne backed Marehis in her tirade against Solas…and the fights seemed to be coming together as Solas had heard Stroud make some defence of his brethren—that they were scared and this seemed like their only option, and the Dalish man interjected that their plan was foolhearty and cowardly.

Which Madam de Fer met with the remark that that was certainly the pot calling the kettle black.

Dorian turned to the Iron Bull, pushing his lover by the chest as he yelled, “I’m outraged with you too!”

“…what I do?” the Qunari wondered.

“Nothing of note—but everyone’s fighting except us and you know I love a good heated argument, it really does check all my boxes.”

“Hell yeah it checks all your boxes!” the Iron Bull returned as if railing at the man, engaging him in his…put upon…heated argument. Sunglasses did little to shield his eyes from the sight.

Sera seemed equally disturbed, “Yeah Cuddly lets go get tea—you can make me n’ Inky toast and let these aresholes cool off or…have a mass orgy, whatever they’re doing.”

“I believe I’ll join you,” Cullen said, slipping past the other adults and following Sera and Cole to saner ground.

Thankfully, the higher levels of their Keep were quieter, the arguments unfolding below rather muted, inaudible to Cullen’s ears, and Ellie was rather absorbed in her letter writing as Cullen joined she and Cassandra, wrapping his arms around the Seeker’s waist and resting his chin on her shoulder to watch the girl be lost in her work, so much so she was half way through with another sheet of parchment before she stopped herself, set down her quill, and looked up at him, clearing her throat.

“Papi. This is for you. My brain is not working,” she deduced as she handed him half a letter addressed…to him. With orders he be prepared that his Forces may well be rerouted to Adamant. Which…Leliana would handle, and too uh…well, Cullen would do so with her when he received confirmation from her scouts—he knew to do this as he was, in fact, present.

“Your brain works just wonderfully mija,” he encouraged as he released hold of Cassandra to rub circles on the girl’s back.

“Here Inky—brain toast!” Sera said, as she and Cole came to the Requisitions table, Sera set a plate of warm toast on the Requisitions table and the Spirit slipping around Cullen to come up behind Ellie and wrap his arms around her middle, cheek resting atop her head, “I’m sorry I abandoned you,” he offered, sounding miserable with himself.

“Oh Carino!” Ellie sympathized, “I’m proud of you for protecting yourself—I would never want you to go into a situation you weren’t wiling to face. If The Iron Bull had woken up this morning and didn’t wanna go dragon slaying? He was free to stay in camp! We discovered demon binding today—that’s scary enough as a Human, so it’s probably at least a little extra scary for someone on the demon-Spirit spectrum.”

“He lied.”

“Who?”

“Erimond. He said he was full of sympathy when he approached Clarel. He was full of Pride, felt boastful and triumphant, glad at their suffering. You are full of sympathy—compassion. You are my best friend. I wish I had not left you with him—I should have stayed and warned you! I did not realize until too late he was going to use it, but I saw his thoughts he-“ Cole shuddered, “he was pleased you showed up, he was hoping to use the Mark against you, he wanted to hand you over to Corypheus himself,” he flinched when Ellie blanched at his words, “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to make it worse!”

“Mmm…no worries,” Ellie decided as she swung about in her chair to rise and take her friends hands. “We’ve handled everything we can for now, we’ll figure this out and get through it,” she promised before wondering, “You made tea right?”

“Oh, yeah—bit hot out for it, huh?”

“Oh no that’s perfect!” Ellie assured. And then, “Let’s see if everyone feels like a cup to soothe their throats—I’m pretty sure they’re argued out by now, huh?” she suggested, giggling as she pulled Sera and Cole along to gather their…squabbling party members Ellie was apparently well aware of.

Which left Cullen privy to a sound he’d only heard less than a handful of occasions in the time he’d come to know her—Cassandra dissolved into giggles.

Over some private amusement, apparently, but she said, “Ahh, Eleanor does so have a way of making me feel I am not the sole Seeker of Truth left in the Inquisition.”

Adamant Fortress was full of surprises.
Some great—absolutely amazing, in Ellie's opinion.
Some…bad surprises—very bad.
The first surprise?…they found all their missing Wardens. Every last one. Great-bad, that. Maker, she prayed there were those who could be saved. For now, they all appeared to be enemies, tough ones at that, her shoulder still smarted from where a demon possessed mage came down on her staff with his sword to force her back.

Her Mark still…it didn't hurt worse, not really, but it still burned a bit harsher when she looked on Adamant. Psychological pain, she thought—the fear of the potential for the Mark to be tested, tormented waited within its walls and she was not looking forward to that.

The second surprise? Kind of proved it was just her brain psyching itself out because she definitely didn’t notice her Mark so much anymore once the following occurred.

Papi had just finished giving off orders—he was in his element*, had his trebuchets calibrated just right and their soldiers already working the breach the walls of Adamant, sounds of chaos and battle breaking out all around, her gaze was still trained on a Dalish soldier climbing the ladder to the top of Adamant’s walls as Cullen led the battering ram forward to work on breaking down the gate—she recognized him from Haven and she let up a silent prayer for him, one of many she’d just been cycling through since they got here.

Until a strong arm wrapped around her waist, a…a somehow familiarly unfamiliar voice in her ear greeting, “What’s a beautiful girl like doing on a battlefield like this?”

“A what?”

“Excuse you-“ she stopped as she was whirled about to look at- “Cremisius!” He-! He was here! And his voice!

He smiled warmly, brown eyes alight with amusement as he chuckled as she popped up on her toes to kiss him! He was getting all the kisses! Within reason because they…they were doing something right? Oh yeah. Wardens, demon mind control, all that. But Cremisius was here! And that was amazing and terrifying because he was here and if anything happened to him she might actually lose her entire mind.

“Did I startle you?” he wondered, albeit apologetic.

Ellie giggled, “Your voice, guapo! I didn’t realize you were you! I mean you still sound like you just- like-“

Oh he was smiling so big! “Deeper now, right? You uh…you like it?” he wondered, “s’only just starting out, Healer Goode says.”

“I’ve always loved your voice, but I love it now too, even more since you love it more! You sound so handsome!”

He was blushing! And he looked proud! He was so cute! “Yeah?” he checked.

“Yeah!”

“Maker, I’ve missed you El. But uh…got our work cut out for us, don’t we?” he supposed.

“Mmm, here to report to me, Lieutenant?” Ellie asked.

He nodded, “Yes, Inquisitor. Chargers will head up the second wave once you and your party move on the fortress. We move at your command.”

“Not to sexually harass a subordinate but that sounds like a great deal more fun if we were in a completely different context.”

He laughed softly at that, “Well, not to be a sexually harassed subordinate, but I move at your command in all contexts,” he assured, and then, pressing a kiss to her forehead.

Gosh, she loved this.

And gosh, she hated this, “Be careful,” please please please.

“You too, lovely.”

“I’ll certainly try.”

A hand rested on her shoulder as Cremisius let her go, Cassandra. "Lieutenant," she greeted, pleased to see him, he smiled and nodded to the Seeker before jogging off to regroup with the Chargers, lead the next wave. "Are you ready, Eleanor?"

Nope! But there was no turning back now, the Wardens needed stopped. Corypheus needed stopped. And the battering ram was doing its thing, so, "Let’s do it.”

They did it. They really did.

She could not be more grateful for the Rune bracer, Maker. Maker. There were so many Rifts! Freshly torn and tearing, demons everywhere. Thankfully there were some Wardens who saw reason—Ellie was able to actually speak to them, and they listened! Had already wanted nothing to do with whatever was going on and she was relieved her talk with Papi hadn’t been in vain—she’d had an on-the-road War Room meeting, speaking to him as her Commander and making certain their Forces wouldn’t kill Wardens on sight, that if they saw any retreat or not fighting to leave them in peace, let them pass, fight at their side.

Unfortunately- oh Maker, she felt like- just horrible. The ritual had already begun by the time they broke through to the center of the fortress, in time to see another horrible binding in progress, a Warden slitting another Warden’s throat, a sacrifice for this- this garbage. She was so relieved that the Wardens stopped after that—that Clarel listened when Stroud spoke, told them they had been tricked.

And then…just as the Wardens were seeing sense, just when she thought yes, the Wardens would be on their side now, they could detain Erimond and figure out how to move forward from here…double surprise. A surprise guest. And a surprise trip.
“My Master thought you might come here Inquisitor,” Erimond called out to Ellie, stamping the butt of his staff against the stone underfoot with a metallic thunk…thunk…thunk “he sent me this to welcome you!”

So. The surprise guest was Corypheus’s dragon. She felt badly when they had to slay dragons—it wasn’t their fault! They were big and dangerous, that’s how the Maker made them! But she didn’t necessarily feel quite so badly about Corypheus’s dragon…or maybe it was that she felt badly for it and wanted it freed one way or another—it was full of Red Lyrium, under Corypheus’s control, bound to him probably in the same way the Wardens would’ve ended up, poor thing. Poor scary thing—yikes! Tia said braiding her hair was a protective thing, would help save it from the desert’s heat, but she didn’t think that applied to the heat of Dragon fire pouring into the halls of Adamant! Holy crap!

—

Surprise trip? Most of Ellie’s trips were surprises.
One right into the Fade in physical form? Was a new definition of surprise trip.
A very trippy trip!

As in she wasn’t sure if she was upside down or the world was because she was…standing and hanging? And everyone else was—she had to crane her neck around to lay eyes on as many of her party members as possible, everyone voicing their confusion, standing on different dimensional planes—some sideways some on the sky ground? Which was the ground ground? She couldn’t think over the sound and sensation of her rune bracer having a total meltdown because uhh…well. They were inside a Rift. Oh crap, crap! She tried to keep her cool but her breathing was panicky as she hastily tugged at her bracer to pull it off her wrist, breathing a short raspy sigh of relief when the Runestones stopped reacting the moment they were no longer in direct contact with her Mark-

Ouch ouch ouch ouch! Okay—Lyrium burns are more serious than magical ones, she had to remind herself—that was all she would be getting out of putting the bracer back on, the stones were already beginning to crack, they needed replacing before she put it back on again holy crap. She would just have to suck it up she affirmed as she tucked the bracer safely away—it wasn’t like there wasn’t plenty of things going on right now to distract her.

“No,” she heard Cole’s voice beneath her on…she was pretty sure it was the actual ground. He started quiet but growing louder with panic, “no no no no no no! This is the Fade! B-b-but I’m stuck!” he moved, pacing and then stretching like the movement was supposed to make him portal but, “I can’t-! Why can’t I?” He looked up, his eyes meeting Ellie’s, oh carino! He was so scared! “This place is wrong! I made myself forget when I made myself real, but I know it wasn’t like this!” he insisted.

Sera had let out a startled shriek and Ellie had reached out toward her and she learned very quickly where the ground was. not under her feet, very much under her head, “Shit shit shit!” she screamed as the Fade dropped her on her head, flopping onto her back—ouch! The Fade real-hurt! Rude!

Everyone was on the same level now though, so, that was nice. Cassandra was already on her feet, “Eleanor?! Sera?!”

“Da’lens, are you hurt?” Marehis implored as she stood, going to Sera and helping her stand, rubbing her arms to comfort the Elf girl as she stared wide eyed at their surroundings. “Come here da’mi, stay calm,” she invited Cole to join them, wrapping an arm around his shoulders.

Cassandra was at Ellie’s side, holding out her hand for Ellie, she groaned as she rose to her feet, leaning against the woman for a second, “Ouch. Is everyone alright?” Ellie asked. “Alright definitely isn’t on the scale anymore babe,” the Iron Bull said. “What the fuck happened?”

“I’m so sorry I-! We were falling and it seemed like either getting crushed to death or crushed to death. I just kind of…it felt like a reflex more than a clear intentional thought—I opened a Rift and we fell through.” Crap crap crap! It had been such a stupid move—what if she’d accidentally killed them all?! She’d…she’d gone through the Fade physically once before right?

“Peace, da’vehnan,”…okay, deeper voices all around. Solas’s voice was strange and-holy crap! Or holy…Wolf? He was kind of…glowing. And his eyes were fiery in a literal sense, black flames consuming them.

“P-papi?” Ellie gulped, only slightly reassured by Cassandra’s quiet assurance, “He is alright, he behaved similarly at the Quarry.”

“Your solution was sound, we have found a way into the Fade, and we will certainly find a way out—we need only find a Rift.”

…Like the great honking one they want their demon army to come busting through. Okay. Yeah. “I’m beyond sorry you guys—we’ll stick together and find our way out, I promise.”

“This is wholly unpleasant Eleanor but at least we are alive, there is…hope yet,” Vivienne allowed, strained but she was trying for comfort.

Varric sighed as he ran a hand over his face, “Anything ringing any bells for you, Tumbles? You were here like this once before already?”

She tried to think—really she did! But…nothing! Ugh! “I’m sorry, I still don’t remember anything, not between arriving at the Conclave and waking up in Haven’s cells.”

But she’d also been here recently, the um, more natural way. And…nope. Ellie tried banishing the never ending walkways of burning stone that wound the landscape before them, the Breach-green sky overhead, replace them with- with something! Anything! Haven? Ava’s cabin? Um…her quarters? Skyhold—papi’s office! A chilly afternoon in the upstairs part, warm and safe, bundled and taking a break from it all, warm cocoa, and books—sometimes reading hurt papi’s eyes but when he could, he always picked the best stories to read, ones he’d enjoyed when he was around her age, and when he couldn’t? She’d read, feel this heady pride that she could…pretty well now, if she did say so herself! C’mon—focusing on the feelings associated with a place made it easier to shape, but…no such luck.

Being in the Fade physically royally sucked.

“Oh—lets take stock,” Ellie said, taking Cassandra’s hand and reaching for Sera’s, everyone Circled up and joined hands. “We’re alive. No one’s badly hurt?” she checked, looking around and everyone nodded, “We’re not hurt. We’re together. We’re in the Fade—my portal opened in Adamant, so. We’re still there just…on the other side of the veil. We’ll get our bearings, and find the Rift out.” She squeezed Cassandra’s hand, “I have it on good authority that the Maker is with us, even in the Fade.”

Cassandra smiled gently, squeezing her hand back, “The Inquisitor is correct. We will find a way.”

Ellie took a deep breath and led them forward—right now their best bet was the great honking portal they could see all the way on the other side of this place, something like the Breach swirling in the sky above what she hoped would be their way out.

There was this conflict, where her mind was blanking but she had this feeling, head to toe, her body racked with this sense of overwhelming deja vu every hair stood on end, her skin broken out entirely in gooseflesh and she felt the imperative need to run and keep going because- something. It was the weirdest thing, her body remembering something her brain couldn’t even produce a scrap of memory to support what.

And if she wasn’t already scared…she definitely was when mami—Cassandra, a woman who ran headlong at Dragons and would spit in Corypheus’s eye if given the chance—stopped dead in her tracks, pale and wide-eyed, Stroud stopping to stare at…an elderly Chantry Mother? No…her headdress was a little different. Bigger like…

“…is that?” Stroud breathed.

“I greet you Warden,” the woman spoke with a thick Orlesian accent. Oh her voice was nice, soothing. “And you, Champion.”

…Divine-

Wait what?!

Oh, she smiled so warmly at mami, “Cassandra.”

This- this was impossible, wasn’t it? It’d been months since the Conclave there was no way someone survived that long abandoned anywhere let alone the Fade, right? And it would be just like some horrible demon to take a trustworthy shape to trick them. “Mami, you knew the Divine—is this really her?” Ellie asked.

“I- I don’t know,” Cassandra confessed, “it is said that sometimes souls of the dead will sometimes linger in the Fade but we know demons lie—beware Inquisitor.”

“I fear the Divine is indeed dead,” Stroud said, “it is likely we face a spirit or a demon.”

“You think my survival impossible yet here you stand alive in the Fade yourselves. In truth, proving my existence either way would require time we do not have,” this Maybe Justinia reasoned, looking to Ellie. “I am here to help you—you do not remember what happened at the Temple of Sacred Ashes, Inquisitor.”

Ellie nodded, “No, I don’t.”

“The memories you lost were taken by the demon that serves Corypheus. It is the nightmare you forget upon waking, it feeds off memories of fear and darkness, growing fat upon the terror. The false Calling that terrifies the Wardens into making such a grave mistakes—it’s work.”

“I would gladly avenge the insult this nightmare has dealt my brethren,” Stroud swore.

“You will have your chance Grey Warden. This place of darkness is its lair.”

“Corypheus seems to have a lot of demons at his disposal,” Ellie spoke up, “do you have any idea how he’s got control over so many?”

“I know not how he commands an army of demons. It may come from the Blight itself but the Nightmare serves willingly for Corypheus has brought much terror to this world. He was one of the Magisters who unleashed the Blight on this world, was he not?” that had Dorian swearing under his breath, a quiet Kaffas that had Vivienne smacking him on the arm with the back of her hand for saying a swear in front of the might-be Divine. “Now every child’s cry as the archdemon circles, every Dwarf’s whimper in the Deep Roads—the Nightmare has fed well.”

“Well, we’re doing our best to put a stop to him,” Ellie promised, “we just have to get out of here.”

“That is why I found you,” she explained, “when you entered the Fade at Haven, the demon took a part of you. Before you do anything else, you must recover it.”…a part of her? Ellie didn’t feel quite so bad about startling when Sera yelped and the Iron Bull let off a quiet fuck shit fuck that earned Vivienne a reproachful oi! Look from Dorian for the woman not getting smacky with the Qunari for his swears, but maybe that was because it was jarring for everyone—the several pops sounding around them like Rifts tearing all around as tiny Rift-esque orbs appeared at the could-be Justinia’s words, “These, are your memories, Inquisitor.”

…

Well she wasn’t sure she wanted them now. Maker. And what if it was some kind of trap? They weren’t her memories they were little…Fade…poison balls? Ellie cleared her throat, looking tentatively to Solas, gosh he still looked scary but he was still, “Papi?”

He held up his hand toward one of the orbs, palm glowing green momentarily as he examined it and announced, “I cannot access their contents but they are benign, da’vehnan. They do come from you—something belonging to you is in them, this is merely how they have been preserved in the Fade. interact with them how you would a Rift and when you’ve done so with them all, they will piece together their contents in your mind,” he was certain.
“If those things hurt her…” Marehis spoke in warning, glaring at Solas, awe. Go mami! Solas chuckled as if he found the threat endearing.

“Be careful Ellie-girl,” Thom said.

“If they hurt you I’m puttin’ arrows right in Justin-ie-frig’s tits!” Sera warned their group, bow at the ready.

Ellie smiled reassuringly and then…went for it. Okay. Gosh, there were a lot of them. Just what had she gotten up to in the Temple of Sacred Ashes? Were they all different memories or were they just part of one big memory? Her Mark thrummed, burned a little as she cast on them and collected them, like sealing the teeniest Rifts. Awe, that was kind of cute!

…the sensation of being stabbed in the brain and punched in the stomach was not cute. Her memory…how much of it she saw, was definitely not cute.

Wardens standing idle by while Justinia floated several feet above the ground, arms held outstretched by some kind of awful magic trapping her as Corypheus approached. Keep the sacrifice still did not sound any less frightening than it had the first time Ellie heard this at the Breach…

Though these were her memories so. She supposed the Breach was her second time hearing it. Gosh this was a literal mindfuck.

Corypheus had the Orb, activating it and green light shot out to Justinia, seemed to be pulling on her as she cried for someone to help her.

And what she got, was Ellie.

“What’s going on here?!”

“No, Eleanor! Run while you can! Warn them!”

And Corypheus’s attention turned on Ellie, “We have an intruder. Kill her now.”

Justinia took that as an opening, summoning all her might into resisting the hold of her bindings, she slapped the Orb of Destruction from Corypheus’s hand and Ellie—She—she just meant to— it was a weapon—his weapon. She’d done what she might have done any time she faced someone dangerous, if they lost their weapon and she could grab it, keep it away from them? that made sense right? But this just…she felt like she was watching a complete idiot. Because in the moment before it happened, Ellie knew exactly how this ended.

Ellie chased after the Orb of Destruction like it was a ball she was supposed to catch. Took it in her hands.

And it was in her hand—her now-Marked hand that the Orb—Her ears were ringing though the sound subsided as, “-vehnan?!” Marehis’s hands were on her shoulders as her voice warped into focus along with Sera’s screaming,

“You’re fucking dead you freaking ghost!”

“Sera, control yourself!” Cassandra snapped, “Eleanor?”

She—

It was her—

Something sort of…quieted in her mind. It was pushed to the forefront of her brain that right now they needed to get out of here. She had to get them home safe and— and they could deal with her later. She cleared her throat, blinking away tears, her voice felt raw as she spoke*, “I saw the Temple of Sacred Ashes—what we heard at the Breach? Wardens… Wardens were with Corypheus and he was holding the Divine captive, sacrificing her to the Orb and she was calling for help and I…I guess I was the only one who heard her,” what good that did her. “I interrupted them.”

That got Hakwe and Stroud bickering again—that this was all the Warden’s fault, Stroud defending that they must have been under Corypheus’s mind control or something and—

“Hey! We can argue about whose fault this is later!” Ellie snapped, pointing to the breach-esque light over the distant portal, “Right now we have to move—there’s an assload of Fade between us and that Rift. We need to stay focused and work together!”
The men looked chagrined at that, “The Inquisitor’s correct,” Stroud allowed. “Sorry honey,” Hawke said. “I will prepare the path ahead,” Justinia’s spirit said as she vanished. Ellie turned on her heel and started leading them forward, Sera right on her heels, “You okay Inky? You need potion? That looked like it hurt.” Ellie felt like if she opened her mouth to speak again she might cry because—Sera was being so nice to her. Everyone was—she didn’t need Cole’s abilities, she could practically feel the waves of concern coming off her party members…her… People who loved her like family. She messed up. She messed it all up before it even began. They were going to hate her. Cremisius was going to hate her. She…she already hated her, so. Ellie just shook her head ‘no’, she didn’t need potion and kept it moving. She was going to do this—it hurt, felt like her memories were killing her and she wasn’t sure if that was literally or just the pure devastation of it all, but that wasn’t going to stop her from getting them out. They could do this—she could do this. She was good at that now, pain had helped when mami was hurt—she’d used it to keep her awake and focused, sharp so she could handle anything that happened, she could do the same with this for now.

Ahh, we have a visitor, a deep voice crooned, echoing through the Fade, some silly little girl has come to steal the fear I kindly lifted from her shoulders. You should have thanked me and left your fear where it lay forgotten. You think the pain will make you stronger. What fool filled your mind with such drivel?

She was. If he had a problem with that, he could fuck himself. He really could.

Not only was this place full of stupid demons and her stupid memories, it was full of this jerks creepy voice! Taunting them the whole way.

Are you afraid, Cole? I can help you forget. Just like you help other people. We’re so very much alike, you and I.

“You shut up!” Ellie snapped at the sky, it felt good to yell! “Cole is nothing like you! He’s brave—he doesn’t have to hide behind some ancient evil Magister and an army of demons! He’s strong enough to stand on his own and loving enough to know he doesn’t have to! He’s brave and compassionate and you’re a coward and cruel!”

He laughed at her! That was fine, he could laugh all he liked—he should enjoy himself in his final hours after all. Or maybe not. Your Inquisitor is a fraud, Cassandra. Yet more evidence there is no Maker, that all your ‘faith’ has been for naught.

“Don’t you talk about my mami*! It doesn’t matter what I am! There is a Maker and He’s with us!”

“Yeah—piss off!” Sera shouted though she whimpered when, Sera. Sera. Sera… If you shoot an arrow at me, I’ll know where you are.

Ellie took her hand, putting the older girl behind her as they marched, “If you know where she is you know where all of us are you’re just coming to get your ass beat! Not a thing yet has been able to beat us when we all work together!”

“We’re gonna shoot you right in the danglers!” Sera cheered.

Ah, there’s nothing like a Rainier. Like mother like son—turning over new leaves are we? You spent years fooling everyone you ever encountered, you know well you can just as easily fool yourself.

“Don’t listen to him,” Ellie said over her shoulder, “you have changed. You’re brave, and honest, and you’re atoning for what you’ve done, same as papi.”

Who Nightmare apparently knew all about. Dirh ma, harellan. Ma banal enasalin. Mar solas ena mar din. She didn’t quite get all of that but the gist? He called him out for being a Trickster—mocking him for surviving the fall of his people, that he continued on to this day.

“Banal nadaas,” Solas assured.

“He is right—I don’t know all of what he just said but the persistent thing? You’re strong, papi, to have survived all that you have. He plays king in this place your—crap! She almost said ‘made’ but switched it around to, ‘ve mastered. We’ll show him whose boss, huh?”

“You’ll show him, Boss-girl,” the Iron Bull encouraged.

The Qunari will make a lovely host for one of my minions. Or maybe I will ride his body myself.

“Nobody rides the Iron Bull without permission—t’s called consent asshole! The Iron Bull’s way too strong to ever give in to you—he’s got the most brilliant mind of anyone I’ve ever met! He’s dependable and in control and you’re going to regret threatening him just you watch!”

He sounded like he was getting more and more frustrated, each time he spoke like…it reminded her the way Anya would growl when she was upset with a bone being snatched out of reach during play—she would be content as she almost got her teeth around it and then grumpy the moment it was just out of range. Huh…this asshole feeds off of fear, right? Well he can’t eat if there’s nothing to give him maybe…maybe this was helping? It wasn’t just a way to vent her frustrations—this jerk was trying to scare her friends, her family and she wasn’t going to let him!

Warden Stroud. How does it feel to have devoted your life to the Wardens, only to watch them fall? Or worse—to know that you were responsible for their destruction? When the next Blight comes, will they curse your name?

“The only destruction Stroud is to blame for is yours you big baby!” Ellie snapped, “It was brave of you to come for help—what you’ve done is our only shot at saving the Warden’s future.”

Did you think you mattered, Hawke? Did you think anything you ever did mattered? You couldn’t even save your city, how could you expect to strike down a god? Fenris is going to die, just like your family, and everyone you ever cared about.

“Have you met Hawke? His jawline could strike down a god!” Ellie assured, “Fenris is fine—and you still have family!”

“Yeah I do babe, thanks,” Hawkes said.

Once again, Hawke is in danger because of you, Varric. You found the Red Lyrium. You brought Hawke here.

“Hawke is in danger because of you, you demented freak! You and Corypheus—the only crimes Varric is guilty of is having devastating chest hair!”

“Hell yeah—you tell him Tumbles,” Varric encouraged.

What's it like living as an apostate, Vivienne? Do you really think you'll reclaim your power in the Circle... at your age?

“Tia—good people are like wine, they get better over time and you’re one of the finest people I know! Your beauty isn’t what dominates on the battlefield—it’s your magical control, and your experience is what will maintain your power in the Circle system when it starts up again—your flawless skin and snatched waistline are just sugar and cherries on top for you.”

“Thank you darling,” Vivienne said.

Greetings, Dorian... It is Dorian, isn’t it? For a moment, I mistook you for your father.

“That’s how genetics work genius—thankfully yours mean you’re super handsome tio! People aren’t their parents and parents aren’t perfect. What your father did was wrong—you’d never do that if you were a father. You’d never want to hurt someone you love.”

“Eleanor as much as I do appreciate your endeavors to quell our fears, the thought of fatherhood is the upmost terrifying thing,” Dorian sardonically informed her. He would be a great papi some day if that was something he ever wanted!

Mmm, Marehis. Your ward is doomed and you know it—you’ve been fooled at every turn, failed at every turn. Corypheus will take every one you love because you will hand them to him.

“What the fuck did I say?!” Ellie shouted skyward, “Don’t you talk about my mami you stupid asshole! If I wasn’t already planning on killing you—you’re so dead now! Double dead!”

Ugh! He was going down! They were going to kill him and his stupid demon army! Even if they were made up of mostly Spiders!

Justinia was waiting for them at the final pass to the heart of the demon’s lair. More little memory orbs waiting with her. Oh Maker…did she have to?

She did. She knew it. So.

This time it wasn’t…she wasn’t sure. It wasn’t quite so bad? She kind of remembered it already, vaguely. Running—she’d been in a place like this before—in Nightmare’s realm, just like he claimed. It was how she escaped the Temple—she’d fallen into a portal, she and Justinia both and they ran, running for their lives from Fearlings, Spiders. They were almost to this Rift, it was this steep climb to it and Ellie almost didn’t make it but…but Justinia pulled her up—and then just before they could escape something grabbed a hold of the Divine, stronger than Ellie who grasped her arm and—“Go,” the woman had pled, releasing her hold on Ellie’s arm and- and she couldn’t hold on to her! She…

She was too weak. In more ways than one. She hadn’t been strong enough to save her, hadn’t been strong enough to stay and try to fight she just…ran.

Ellie rubbed at her forehead as she looked to Justinia, “It…it was you. Or…it was JustiniaThey thought it was Andraste sending me from the Fade, but it was the Divine behind me,” but…there was no way anyone saw a woman standing directly behind Ellie in the Rift before she fell from it—Justinia had been snatched way. Unless…oh. Maybe that was when this…whatever this was, Spirit? Came to be. “And then you—she died.”

The Spirit stared at her for a long moment before admitting, “Yes.” The Divine’s visage dropped then, leaving a shimmering spirit in her wake.

“So this creature is nothing more than a Spirit?” Stroud asked.

“You don’t say!” Hawke snapped at him.

“I am sorry if I disappoint you.”

“No matter what you are, you’ve helped us today—thank you,” Ellie said.

Not…everyone was in a grateful mood. Hawke and Stroud went at it again—the Wardens were responsible for Justinia’s death! They were under Corypheus’s control! Ellie wanted to beat her head against a wall and it didn’t really help that everyone joined in—differing opinions on how to handle to Wardens! They should sent them away—they were dangerous! They should keep them around—what if the Blight returned?! “We can argue once we’ve escaped! I’m not saying it again!” Ellie warned.

“Inquisitor!” Stroud said…in warning too.

More fearlings. Yay. Because there weren’t enough of those, obviously.

They had to fight them, all the way to the Nightmare demons…nest? It looked like a nest and Papa Aclassi had lied—there was currently a spider as big as Skyhold’s castle Ellie was pretty sure.

"You must go, through the portal and slam the rift shut behind you," Justinia's Spirit ordered, "it is the only way to stop this, only then will Nightmare lose his hold on the Wardens!" And Justinia’s Spirit surged forward as she made one final request, "If you would, please tell Leliana: I am sorry, I failed you too," as she clashed a Fear demon already on the field, and then with the Nightmare itself, disappearing with a great explosion that blasted the thing good!

Just…not quite good enough.
The Fear demon was a literal nightmare to fight. Big and floating and swift to vanish just when it felt like they might be gaining ground on him, and Maker, those fearling things just kept coming and coming-

In droves. The moment Fear demon was down, demons began swarming in droves and the biggest one was staring them down with all its many eyes and Stroud called out, "We need to clear a path!" as everyone began hightailing it to the portal.

"Go! I'll cover you!" Hawke ordered.

"No! You were right, the Grey Wardens caused this, a Warden must-"

"A Warden must help them rebuild!" Hawke snapped, "That's your job!" he insisted as he looked upon Nightmare, "Corypheus is mine!"

She wished she could stay back, really. Someone had to and-

Hawke had a sister, a lover waiting for him, and Varric - Varric would be just- he already might never forgive her as it stood but he would never forgive her for killing his best friend and Stroud...there was this look in his eyes. Hawke was prepared to lay down his life, Stroud? He was ready to die.

The Inquisitor settled their arguing a third and final time. "Stroud."

"Go!" Ellie ordered, "Everyone move!"

"Da'len-" Mami reached for her.

"Go with Sera! Everyone out first that's an order!" Ellie shouted.

Marehis's eyes glistened as she nodded and moved forward, her hand on Sera's arm to pull her along safely through the Rift.

"For the Wardens!" Stroud roared.

Maker she was so sorry.

And angry.

She dropped from the Rift into the midst of Adamant and the battle still raging there, laid eyes on her party, Hawke before whipping around and raising her hand to seal the big stupid thing once and for all! See a demon army get through that!

Oh gosh, wow. See an army collapse because of that. Every demon in the vicinity dropped to the ground, dead, and the Wardens? Their Mages who had been mind-napped by Corypheus stopped...and saw sense, dropped their weapons.

"She was right," Hawke said, relieved, "without the Nightmare to control them, the mages are free and Corypheus loses his demon army." He met Ellie's gaze, speaking carefully, "And as far as everyone is concerned, the Inquisitor broke the spell with the blessing of the Maker."

Ellie nodded...she wasn't entirely sure how he knew otherwise, he was speaking like he was making sure if she was still playing along with the 'Mark being from Andraste' thing. She hadn't said a word about Solas or the Anchor or the Orb of Destruction. Varric must have...with permission, she hoped? Maker.

"Everyone needs something to believe in," she said with a little nod, and he nodded back, gesturing for her to go ahead.

"Inquisitor," a scout said as he approached, "the archdemon flew off as soon as you disappeared. The Venatori Magister is unconscious but alive. The Commander thought you might wish to deal with him yourself."

A Warden approached tentatively, questioning, "Where is Stroud?"

Her throat felt tight, tears stinging her eyes but the Inquisitor couldn't cry. Right now, anyway. She cleared her throat, "Warden Stroud died striking a blow against a servant of the Blight. We'll honor his sacrifice and remember how he was a living embodiment of the ideals of the Grey Wardens even as Corypheus tried to destroy you from within."

"Inquisitor," the Warden spoke on their order's behalf, "we have no one left of any significant rank," he said, "What do we do now?"

Well. They were fixing the rest of the Order. There was a matter of Corypheus still possibly being able to send the Calling, to find some way to manipulate their minds further but... well. Everyone had just learned a harsh lesson in believing his manipulations and giving into fear. "You'll come with us and do whatever you can to help." Ouch. Okay. She could feel Solas's disapproval in the bond, his outrage at her decision and then the bond went quiet on his end which- she wasn't sure if it was supposed to feel like a slap or not, he was probably... she hoped he was just trying to shield her from that disappointment. Sera felt proud and that kind of helped. "Stroud died for the ideals of the Wardens. In war, victory. And we're still at war. Do you believe the Wardens can still help?"

"I do, Your Worship."
"You're still vulnerable to Corypheus and possibly his Venatori but there are still plenty of demons that need killing."
"While they do that, I'll inform the Wardens at Weisshaupt what's happened," Hawke said, "Best they don't get caught off guard."
"Thank you, your Worship," the Warden said, vowing, "We will not fail you."
Hawke drew near to speak quietly to her, "Been a real honor Half-pint," he said, lines of sadness in his face even as he offered a little smile and a wink, "Take care of Varric for me, yeah?"

She nodded but um, "Do you know where mami is?" she whispered.
"Oh, shit, yeah babe, c'mon," he said, wrapping an arm around her shoulders and walking her along the stone platform, down the stairs to where her party had moved. Cullen was just joining them, Cremisius too, relief breaking out in his face as she and Hawke approached, rushing to meet her.

"El! Holy shit, you- are you-" he didn't seem capable of forming a coherent sentence, he just wrapped his arms around her, Hawke just narrowly escaping the Tevinter man's hold as he swept Ellie up. She'd asked for mami but this was just as good. Or just as bad. She didn't- she didn't deserve to be- "I love you so much, thank the Maker you're safe."
"Are you okay?" she checked.
"Yeah El, barely a scratch on me," he assured. "What about you, lovely?" he started to let her go but her arms were around his neck and she held on tighter so his hands double backed, rubbing her back, "Ellie?"

Her chin quivered as she buried her face against his neck, tremors working through her and she knew if she spoke she would just... lose it.
She squeezed her arms around him three times.
"Okay honey, I got you," he said, and she wasn't on her feet anymore, his hands supporting her back as he took her up and started moving, pressing a kiss to her temple when he felt her tears on his skin. "Come on," he said to her party, "lets get the hell out of here."

Chapter End Notes

*Fun fact! You can pass any magic barrier without magic. The game advises using opposite magic to beat down barriers but you can also smack 'em to death, it helps if you lock onto them first and order your party to attack your target, but melee and ranged attacks all work, no magic required
*Idk how I missed this but I genuinely didn't realize Seekers were immune to possession, I dunno if I just blanked on it or it isn't really touched on, but yeah, it's a thing!
*which leads me to here: this is a plot point I didn't actually plan. In fact a great deal of writing this chapter was me realizing this could be a thing, that I accidentally have Ellie going through a mini Seeker vigil and getting touched by the same sort of Spirit. I knew a Spirit was involved with becoming a Seeker but when I was researching for this chapter and saw Faith and screamed and anyway this happened and I hope it's genuinely a neat thing? Most plot things are things I've stewed on from the beginning and this is just one of those things that happened along the way and was an entire last minute decision so and maybe it's a bad idea? But I'm going with it!

Freedom from possession for everyone!

*If you take the virgins option, Ishmael will reveal he doesn't actually have any virgins on hand but if you've Cole in your party, Ishmael will concede that technically you already have one in Cole.

*Everyone sees different things in Fearlings based on their personal fears. In canon Cassandra sees Maggots, and her ultimate fear discovered in Nightmare's realm is helplessness, hence the fear of maggots being connected to our bodies being a form of helpless in death, something she observed a great deal in her youth in Nevarra. Sera sees nothingness and both Hawke and the Inquisitor see Spiders. In the Fade, gravestones can be found engraved with each of your companions' names and fears. This will be touched on more in the next chapter but everyone's fears are Bull:

*That's canon the backstory for Prophet's Laurel, people would lay it down along Adraste's path as she was led to the pyre, and after she burned her ashes blew across the leaves on the ground, blessing them. It's great for healing and regeneration potion upgrades!

*The Tower of Bone is a cool ass place if you look it up! These details are canon, they found a crap ton of bones in a chamber under the tower and had to bless.

*Raw egg proteins are glorious for hair if you're not against using eggs, I have personally brought my hair back from the brink of devastation with hair masks that involve the use of egg. (Egg, coconut oil, and keratin infused conditioner. Slap it on, let it sink in, rinse it out!)

*Edouard Desjardins is actually a long time friend of Josie! She calls on him to take over Suledin Keep!

*Michel is the only person who has been able to best Duke Gaspard in single combat

*Divine Justinia called for experiments on reversing the Rite of Tranquility. She commissions a Tranquil Mage, Pharamond who is a character in DA: Asunder. On the Chantry Trail is tribute to that, showing players where Pharamond was and a glimpse at what he was up to before the events of DA:I. This will also be touched on in the next chapter, a little side plot involving "the Right Hand not seeing what the Left Hand does".

*Professor Frederic can be recruited to Leliana to study Corypheus's dragon.

*Chocolate is great for cramps and my friends, there is nothing better than a cold glass of chocolate milk (or chocolaty dairy supplement of your choosing) post-mowing the lawn on a hot ass summer day. Or any workout in general!

*Sunglasses have been around since the Song Dynasty (12th Century), I promise.

*Cullen is mildly obsessed with calibrating the Inquisition's trebuchets, it's mentioned from time to time in idle War Room talk in game, this is a tip of the hat to Mass Effect's Garris always obsessing over calibrating his/the Normandy's weapons.

*I know in the game Hawke and Stroud see the inquisitor's memories but the others don't and it's only a catalyst for getting them to bicker in the Fade. My choice of catalyst is Ellie just saying what she remembers now because I find it kind of weird like, is the scene being projected? If so why can't the others see it? Inquisitor has to explain to them what happened. How do they see it? is is proximity? Dunno, it suited this story to do it this way!
*I need you to know this is 100% a John Mulaney Reference.

Please drop by the archive and comment to let the author know if you enjoyed their work!