Summary

What if one fact changes in Season Two that completely alters everything? What if Felicity had a past life in Gotham that no one was prepared for, not even her? Canon compliant up to the episode 2X18 'Deathstroke' only Isabel never reveals her hand. Almost two years after the events of Season Two, Felicity and the rest of the team are still coming to grips with a recent trauma and Felicity is forced to confront her past in the form of Bruce Wayne and a possible future which has her leaving Starling behind and finding out who she is and what she's truly capable of.

Notes

Foreword
Author’s Note on Content

First off, there is a Pinterest for this fic. Included are various clips, locations, and outfits that inspired this story:

https://www.pinterest.com/cijingram/

It includes some very lovely cover art by Eilowyn and Federica; please be sure to let them know that they did a wonderful job. I've never had anyone illustrate a story for me before so I am incredibly grateful and humbled by their kindness as well as their talent.

Also, before you continue (and this will be repeated many times in the notes to come) this is an AU; a very accurate AU but an AU. If Felicity appears a bit out of character in comparison to her current incarnation, please note that this story occurs in the future after she's been with Oliver's mission for almost four years. In vigilante terms that's a lifetime considering that Oliver went from a rich douchebag to an ARGUS agent in months and the Arrow in five years, so take it with a grain of salt. I think you'll still recognize her but you'll also see a stronger and more experienced Felicity than she is now. Growth is inevitable so this is a story of her growth; both up to and beyond the events of the story. This is her story, not Oliver's and not Batman's; Felicity. It's not about them, it's about her.

Some of the events in the episodes starting with the 2X18 episode ‘Deathstroke’ have been either strategically altered or ignored entirely. Although Thea was kidnapped, Isabel never revealed her hand, and know that, although this story was written during season two and contains most of the canon in the series up to that point, this story begins in what would be considered season four. Using canonical characters and events from the various comic book series that encompass Green Arrow, Birds of Prey, and the Batman universe, an AU canon was created from the end of 'Unthinkable' throughout season three and into season four. Also, although the unofficial Arrow Wiki states the character of Felicity Smoak is 26 and would be 28 during this story, the actress is only 22 and very much looks it. In this universe the character of Felicity Smoak is based on her actor’s age, making her 19/20 in Season One and 23/24 in this story.

Again, this is an AU based strongly on canon but is not canon. Please keep that in mind. The age change isn't random, there is a reason for it albeit not an obvious one. If it bugs you then ignore it.
Due to the fact that the timelines would be impossible to merge seamlessly given the that the show, as of the completion of this story, has only been on the air for two seasons as opposed to 75 years of Bat history some of the Bat Universe canon has been ignored or juggled for convenience and some of the characters reimagined while still maintaining their essence. Sometimes instead of eliminating a character, I merged them with another, but did so to further the plot. The Outsiders never happened, the Birds of Prey hasn’t happened yet nor has the JLA, and some of the events and characters of Batman comic ‘The Resurrection of Ra’s al Ghul’ have had their timelines shuffled about and their characters and backstory rejiggered. Although it is an AU it’s one that (somewhat) makes the attempt to keep up with canon when possible and nothing was eliminated or ignored without a great deal of thought and debate. Just please read it and enjoy with no preconceived notions.

I dislike wordy notes and forewords at the heading of every chapter so the bulk of my author’s notes will be at the end of this work. I try to answer as many questions in my notes as I can just in case you’re reading this in some far off future where I’m dead or my ISP has changed and you can’t email me. If you aren’t a questions kind of person it doesn’t matter and you can just skip it. If you are and you want to get in touch email me at cijingram@wildblue.net or thedemonofmischief@gmail.com with the heading Re: Still Waters and Quiet Men. One of those will hopefully find me.

PS: The comments section of this fic is where the really fun stuff happens. It should be a story unto itself. Make sure to check out and read all of the comments after finishing the chapters; you won’t be disappointed. Feel free to join in on any of the discussions. One of my greatest pleasures is the exchange of information and hearing from the people who are reading this. It doesn’t even have to be about the story as long as your minds are engaged. This story is about making you think and see things from different perspectives and the comments reflect that.

Feedback is appreciated but not required. Even if you want to use the comments section for recipe exchanges, playlists, or rec‘ing other people's fics, that’s fine. Just have fun! Settle in, it's going to be a long and twisty ride!

Enjoy---Jen

Chapter One

“Oracle to Batman.”

“What is it?”

“Are you still patrolling near the docks?”

“Affirmative,” he said as he scanned the area from his vantage site high above the warehouses and landing docks that littered the East End of Gotham. It was a high crime area, popular with dealers and smugglers, but had been relatively quiet as of late since word had spread amongst the underworld that the Batman had laid claim to this particular part of the city.

“I’m picking up something…unusual near that area. Can you change your heading to East 44th Street and Lamb in the Tenderloin?”
“Are you picking up police chatter or an alarm?” He asked already on the move, his body flying through the air as he leapt from rooftop to rooftop.

“Um, no. Not exactly, no.”

Batman frowned, “Explain.”

“I’m going to need something more specific,” he growled in irritation, his pace increasing as he neared the location.

“I wish I had something more specific to tell you,” Barbara muttered. “From what I can tell someone has activated a doctored version of the Protocol and is attempting to locate an FBI safe house location. There appears to be a Trojan in their version of the program that is pinging Watchtower their location and destination.”

“Why would they want us to know where they were heading and who are ‘they’ exactly?”

“Well, I wouldn’t say that they were doing it on purpose; Trojan remember? As far as I can tell they have no idea that the program is telling on them much less leading them on a wild goose chase.”

Wild goose chase? “So they aren’t headed to an FBI safe house?”

“That’s the thing; it is a safe house but it’s unoccupied at the moment. However the program is telling them that a midlevel Mafia informant from the Bertinelli Crime Family is holed up there. As for whom it is, the system is tracking her on its own and sending me everything from traffic cam footage to private security feeds.”

“Her?” He scowled and mentally ran through his Rogue’s gallery for likely suspects but came up blank. Selina had left Gotham years ago and from what anyone could tell she was now living under an assumed identity somewhere in Europe and none of the other women he knew who frequented the shadows of Gotham would be remotely interested in the Mob much less one that was a leftover from a West Coast defunct crime family. That meant that there was someone new in his city and he didn’t like that idea one bit. “Description and location?”

“Tall, dark hair, black leather, carrying what looks like…a crossbow. That’s different. Great, why do they always have to come here? It’s like all the lunatics in leather got a damn package deal or something. She’s traveling on your 6 about half a klick away. She should be within sighting range right about…now.” He could hear Barbara mutter something unintelligible under her breath then a surprised squeak.

“What is it?” He growled softly as he sank into the shadows. A mere second later he watched as the masked woman ran along a rooftop across from the darkened safe house.

“A dossier on our girl just opened up. Damned if I know where it came from but I have my suspicions—“

As Barbara spoke the lights came on in the safe house. “Are you sure the safe house is unoccupied? I have lights.”

“Yeah. Oooh, aren’t you just a clever thing? I am going to have to call your mommy and get her to send me some of those new apps she’s apparently been working on.”

“Oracle, stay on point!” Batman bit out as he watched his adversary crouch down and begin her surveillance.

She cleared her throat and mumbled a quick apology. “The lights are attached to the security system. The doctored Watchtower program hacked it as soon as she came within a certain distance to the target location to mislead her into thinking she was on the right path. My guess is the programmer designed it to cast a wide net so it would slow her down long enough to buy some time. It’s tapping into the power grid and sending out all kinds of goodies too. I imagine there are some really pissed off prime time TV viewers in that apartment complex because she’s got signals scrambling all over. And you better hurry because it appears to be on a timer. If whoever she had intended to play catch up doesn’t apprehend the target and turn off the signal within a set amount of time after she’s engaged, every single police scanner and phone system within twelve blocks is going to get a message to scramble on that location, guns hot.”

“Who is the programmer that has us and her running in circles and what does the dossier have on our crossbow enthusiast?” He demanded icily. He disliked being manipulated as much as he disliked outsiders coming into his territory.

“Helena Bertinelli, code name Huntress. She’s a former Mafia Princess who appears to have a well-deserved beef against the crime syndicate, particularly anyone who is associated with her late father, Frank Bertinelli. She got busted a couple of years ago but broke out and has been waging a one woman war against the mob ever since. She calls herself a vigilante now but she’s not afraid to get her hands bloody. She’s managed to rack up quite a few kills, all made guys or their associates, but if anyone gets in her way she doesn’t differentiate between cops and killers. She nearly took out an entire FBI taskforce to get to one of her targets so I suggest you take her down fast and hard.”

“Not a problem; and the programmer that has managed to hack our system and gift us with this lovely little surprise?” He growled in low tones.

“Um. A friend?”

“Oracle,” he growled warningly.

“Um, well, here’s a hint: Helena Bertinelli’s body count started in Starling City.”

Batman’s mouth tightened as he thought of a name he hadn’t uttered out loud in over four years while in cape and cowl and only rarely outside of them. “Has she contacted you directly yet? Patch her through coms,” he ordered.

“That’s the thing, this Trojan is set to trigger automatically and ping the closest Watchtower location. She isn’t necessarily in the system right now. Huntress activated the program when she tried to use whatever program she’s got loaded on her hardware. She must have designed it so that when Huntress used it she could track her movements from a Watchtower console…just maybe not ours.”

The leather of his gauntlet squealed in protest as his hand tightened into a fist. “You think that she set up a Watchtower for the ‘Hood’ vigilante in Starling City?”

“It’s Arrow now; changed his name last year along with his MO shortly after the Glades terrorist attack to reduce his body count. As for you-know-who,” There was a sarcastic bite in how she said it making it an obvious dig aimed toward him, “that would be my theory anyway. I don’t know anyone else who could get through our firewalls. After all, she helped design them, remember?”

He chose to ignore her sarcasm. There was a time and a place and he wasn’t getting into this old chestnut with her while engaged in the pursuit of a proven killer. “Find out her location and call Alfred. Have him pack me an overnight bag and bring in Red Robin then get the jet ready to leave as soon as I finish dealing with our tourist friend from Starling City.”

“Um, Batman, you do know that they have email and even phones in that part of the world? Hopping a jet seems a bit--”

“She’s on the move. Engaging.”

Huntress had readied her crossbow to send a grappling line to the building across from them. Just as her line pulled taut, Batman sent one of his razor sharp batarangs out to cut the line, causing her to falter for just a second before turning on him in a defensive posture. It was all the hesitation he needed however. Before she had time to react he kicked her weapon out of her hand and over the side of the building while catching her jaw in a powerful backhanded punch that sent her sprawling. The fact that she was a woman didn’t rate much with him considering the amount of corpses she had already left in her wake.

He leapt on to her, gripping her by the front of her leather jacket with one hand as he deflected the foot that was aimed at his crotch with the other. He twisted her around and slammed her into a large brick smokestack and pulled her arm behind her in a painful move to ensure she could get no leverage. “Try it and you’ll lose an arm.” He said quietly.

“I thought the Batman didn’t kill,” she gasped with a chuckle despite the fact that her nose was bleeding profusely.

“You can live without an arm,” he growled. “So ‘Huntress’, what brings you to my city?”

“Revenge, justice, same thing you do only I have a specific variety of scum in my sights. You can keep all the masked freaks and lunatics, I just want what I came for and I’ll be on my way.” She answered. “In fact, you should be thanking me not slamming me against walls and being all ungentlemanly.”

“I could tell, most gentlemen don’t hit ladies.”

“Most ladies don’t commit murder.”

“The term ‘murder’ only applies if you’re taking the lives of innocents. The men I hunt deserve what they get,” she bit out.

He thrust her away, allowing her a little space but making it clear with his body language and alert gaze that he could take her down again with less than a thought. “Maybe, maybe not, but you leave devastation in your wake; collateral damage. That might fly in Starling City with your friend the Arrow but Gotham is mine and you aren’t welcome here.”

“He’s no friend of mine,” she spat out as she rubbed the circulation back into her arm. “As far as I’m concerned, he and that little gang of his are just as guilty as the men I hunt. If he wants to protect them from me then he can meet their same fate along with anyone who stands with him.”

“This is my city,” Batman growled, “I say who lives and who dies here so I suggest you go back to Starling City and take your issues up with him and his so-called ‘gang’. Gotham is off limits.”

She looked him up and down contemptuously, “What is it with you self-proclaimed vigilantes and the ‘this is my city’ spiel? It isn’t ‘your’ city any more than Starling belongs to the Arrow.” She advanced on him slowly, “You want your city to yourself, fine! Keep it! Like I said, all I want is my prey and you can keep the rest. As soon as my bolts find their mark I’m out of here.”
Batman glowered at her for a moment. “I tried to give you an out but I can see you’re not interested in taking it. Whether your tactics are justified or not, you’re wanted for murder, and if you try to take your hunt to my streets then I will take you down hard.” He took a step forward, his impressive height looming above her as he fixed her with a spine-chilling glare. “Get out while you still can, I won’t be merciful a second time.”

Despite her bravado he could see her throat work as the fear he so often struck in his adversaries crept over her. “What about Marconi? He’s who I was hunting; I tracked him to this location.”

“Marconi isn’t here and hasn’t been for a while. Your information is wrong.” He stated in a tone that would brook no further argument.

She looked him in the eye, gauging his sincerity, before taking the small handheld device from her belt and shattering it on the ground. “That little bitch! I did him a favor when I turned down that contract on his geek girl; next time I won’t be so nice!” She laughed humorlessly to herself, “Even with a crossbow to her throat she managed to screw me over. What is it with the Arrow and his women?”

Batman’s hand shot out and he gripped her by the throat, squeezing in slow increments as her feet dangled helplessly above the ground. “Who?” He growled, “I want a name!”

“W-What?” She choked.

“The name of the people contracting the hit!” He growled.

“D-don’t know! C-came through an a-anonymous broker!” He squeezed and tears slipped from the corners of her eyes as real fear changed her expression from defiant into a mask of pain. “I-I don’t do contracts! I turned it down!”

He bared his teeth and picked her up one-handed; bringing her so close to his face he could feel her stuttering, gasping breath against his cheek. There was still a chance he could be wrong. “The target?”

“S-she’s just some IT girl,” she gasped as she griped his wrist in an effort to save herself. “She works for him sometimes.”

“The name!”

“F-Felicity Smoak!”

Batman drove into the cave, already barking orders to Alfred through the coms as he was screeching to a halt. “When is the jet going to be ready?”

“I decided it would be best not to call them, sir.”

He slammed the door of the tumbler and strode towards Alfred who was standing near the console, his expression livid, “And why the hell not? I need to get out there ASAP!”

“Oracle tracked down the broker believed to have contacted Huntress, sir. For the moment the contract has been placed on hold. Apparently whoever the client was, they rescinded the original offer.”

“I still need to get to her!”
“I agree, sir, which is why you’re heading to Starling City on Friday,” the butler said calmly as he removed the Bluetooth headset from his ear and turned toward his charge. “You had a meeting scheduled there already so I thought it might give us a bit more time to prepare a dossier.”

He stopped short. “I am? Since when?”

“Technically sir, Mr. Fox has plans to be in Starling City to meet with Queen Consolidated’s Board of Directors on Friday but, as you are the head of the company, I thought that it would be best to add your name to the itinerary as to avoid any questions should someone ask why you were there.” He handed Bruce who was already stripping off his cowl, cape, and gauntlets a tablet. “Here is the proposal you will be hearing as sent by Mr. Fox along with background information on the key players at the company, an Isabel Rochev and Oliver Queen.”

“Yeah, I’ve heard of Queen,” Bruce said absently as he skimmed the information. “Dime a dozen trust fund brat who came home and found religion by taking up his old man’s mantle. Heard he’s doing pretty well given all that’s been going down over there. The Rochev woman is the one I’m not familiar with but from what I heard she’s a bit shady; connections to less than savory overseas interests.”

“Indeed sir,” Alfred agreed. “However, Mr. Fox and Walter Steele were quite close, from what I understand, and although Mr. Steele is no longer the CEO he does have a vested interest in the company as his bank financed Mr. Queen’s bid to retain control. He requested Mr. Fox hear the proposal as a personal favor to him.”

Bruce set the tablet aside carelessly as he plopped down in the chair in front of the console. “While I’m sure this is all very important, I don’t have time to sit in some meeting that is probably going to go nowhere. I need to find Felicity and put a stop to this before she gets herself in trouble and I’d like not to have to involve Lucius if I can. He’s been a good friend to our mission over the years but when it comes to her—”

Alfred picked up the tablet and held it out to him, “I think, sir, you should peruse Mr. Queen’s file a bit more carefully before you make a decision.”

“Why?” Bruce frowned as he accepted the tablet again and began to read through the file.

“Many reasons, sir, not least of which is that the ‘Arrow’, as the vigilante is apt to refer to himself, only appeared after Mr. Queen returned from the island of Lian Yu, a suspected training ground for The League of Assassins.” Bruce looked up sharply but didn’t interrupt. As Alfred had suspected, anything connected to Ra’s al Ghul would instantly capture his young Master’s attention. “In fact, the first appearance of this ‘Arrow’ fellow, then known as ‘The Hood’, was when he supposedly rescued Mr. Queen from an attempted kidnapping. Furthermore, Miss Barbara was able to research this vigilante and uncovered eye witness accounts and some rather poor quality surveillance tapes which prove that this man has had advanced training similar to the type you received under the League’s tutelage.”

“So is Queen the Arrow or is he funding him?”

“I do not know, sir,” Alfred said formally although with an intrigued twinkle in his eye. “After all, five years is a long time and it is not unheard of for a, as you called it, ‘trust fund brat’, to turn himself into a costumed vigilante. Also, Mr. Queen was arrested on suspicion of being the vigilante but all charges were dropped due to lack of evidence.”

Bruce’s eyebrow rose ever so slightly as he scrolled through Queen’s background check. “Interesting. Any connection to Felicity Smoak?”
“You could say that, sir,” Alfred said, his severe countenance shifting into a slight but triumphant grin.
Chapter Two

Felicity sat at her desk as she did her best to ignore the fact that Oliver was in a meeting with that woman in his office right behind her. She was not going to look, nosirree. Isabel Rochev didn’t need any more ammunition against her and catching her peeking in on them would just give her one more excluse to insinuate that not only was she Oliver’s whore but she was also jealous and with good reason. One of these days, she vowed, pow! Right in the credit rating.

That woman was dirty as hell and she knew it. She didn’t like her, she certainly didn’t trust her, but Oliver needed her and that was the only reason she hadn’t pulled the trigger on her yet.

Not a literal ‘trigger’, but a virtual one, she clarified internally.

She snorted. One day she was going to say that out loud in the Lair just to see the look on everybody’s face. Then again, it might start a discussion about ‘The Thing’. This whole week had been one big exercise in suckitude and the last thing she needed was to put up with Oliver, Dig, and Roy attempting to be supportive while they sat around and clumsily talked about their feelings.

She heard Isabel’s fake throaty laugh and gritted her teeth in annoyance. She snuck a glare towards Isabel, pretending to be busy with QC business while updating the LAIR system remotely from her desk.

Part of her really wanted to march in there and tell Oliver exactly what she’d been up to for the last several days but she couldn’t. For once he was actually proud of the job he was doing as CEO and, even though they had lost a valuable contract (thanks to Isabel, she added snarkily), he had been putting in the hours to try to offset the loss. She wasn’t going to take that newfound feeling of accomplishment away from him even if it meant biting her tongue about Isabel and her little scheme with LexCorp.

Through the reflection on her monitor she shot daggers at the woman. Swear to God, how she could sit there and pretend everything was perfectly fine was beyond her. One would think she’d be sweating bullets the second the scandal hit the news but no, there she was in Oliver’s office playing innocent even as several key players in LexCorp’s Weapon’s Division were set to testify before a Senate Committee on bribery charges and conspiracy; crimes she was fully cognizant and culpable for. If she only knew how close she had come to getting a subpoena herself she certainly wouldn’t be sitting in the next room with that cool little smile on her face.

She’d always kept a close eye on Isabel but she was rewarded for her paranoia and vigilance when she managed to run across evidence that Isabel had conspired with an up and coming executive in LexCorp named Sebastien Mallory to bribe a member of the Senate Arms Committee into helping them get the bid on a weapons project. After they got Senate approval, QC was outsourced to develop the communications software. The problem was that Mallory screwed up and didn’t cover his tracks very well which led to an investigative journalist by the name of Lois Lane to uncover the scandal and plaster it all over the front page of the Daily Planet.

Why were guys named ‘Sebastian’ always douchebags? She wondered silently. Plus he spelled his name with an ‘e’ instead of an ‘a’. That was his parent’s stupidity, not his, but people with purposefully misspelled names bugged the shit out of her.

Lane had been working on exposing Senator Miller for a while. She suspected him of everything from perjury to using campaign funds to hire hookers but, when she got evidence that he was taking bribes, she nailed him to the wall taking down Mallory and LexCorp’s Weapon’s Division execs with him. Ms. Lane would have taken down Queen Consolidated as well if it hadn’t been for her.

Luckily for Isabel, Felicity had LAIR monitoring the security for all of QC’s servers, not just her own private system. When she was alerted that someone was hacking QC she back-traced the hack to the Daily Planet and was able to act on it immediately. Apparently Lois Lane or one of her techies had just enough skills to hack into their servers but not enough to get past her firewalls. Without alerting the hacker to what she was doing, she managed to block Lois’s inquiries while finding the information she was looking for.

To be fair, Isabel, unlike Mallory, did know how to cover her tracks, just not well enough. She found some deleted emails and some off-shore accounts Isabel had been using as her slush fund and, after a little digging, connected them to Mallory. It would have taken Ms. Lane much longer to connect the dots but knowing the reporter’s reputation it would have just been a matter of time before she got there. Working quickly, Felicity managed to manipulate the information to make it look like normal correspondence between two business associates, erased any and all incriminating files, then led Lois straight to the then sanitized versions of what she had been looking for, exonerating QC from any wrong doing while hanging Mallory out to dry. Even if he tried to cut a deal and named Isabel as a co-conspirator, there was zero proof of it all thanks to her.

Not that she was proud of that, Felicity thought ruefully as she tapped on her keyboard. Although it killed her to do it she covered that woman’s ass because she knew Oliver would be implicated by association. Like Lucius used to say, as CEO the buck stopped with him. After all they’d been through the last few years; the last thing he needed was to go through yet another scandal. She thought about fixing things on Mallory’s end as well since she knew they’d wind up losing the contract if LexCorp did, but she decided to let the chips fall where they may and keep Oliver out of the loop at the same time. Besides, alerting him to Isabel’s bullcrap wouldn’t accomplish anything. Technically Stellmoor still owned half of the company so he couldn’t exactly fire her; all it would do is further erode their business partnership. Talk about being stuck between a rock and a hard place.

As for the scandal, the article had broken a week ago and it was still all over the news. The buzz was that Lois Lane was probably going to walk away with her second Pulitzer, Senator Francis Miller stepped down citing ‘health reasons’ and LexCorp had no choice but to give up the contract while they fought the charges leaving QC and the software they had developed out in the cold. Ironically enough, as far as Felicity could tell, Lex Luthor himself was absolutely innocent in any wrongdoing this time. Although he had a reputation for ruthlessness and playing fast and loose with the rules, it was Mallory who came up with this brainfart of an idea all on his own. Technically Mallory still had his job until he was either cleared or convicted but she doubted he’d remain employed with LexCorp long enough to collect on his pension and he’d be blackballed from working in the tech industry ever again. From what she’d heard about the man, Lex Luthor wasn’t exactly a forgive and forget kind of guy. Mallory’s Harvard educated ass would be flipping burgers by the end of the year.

If only she could see to it that Isabel was stuck manning the deep fat fryer right next to him. Poor Oliver, she thought. He’d been so proud of winning that contract. Now everything was…

“Felicity,” Oliver said from behind her causing her to jump guiltily, “call Gerald at the Marchioness and let him know to ready the corporate apartments for Friday and alert the board that the meeting has been postponed while we get ready for the meeting with the people from Wayne Enterprises.”

“Wayne?” Felicity asked in surprise as she rose from her chair just as Oliver and Isabel emerged from his office. “Why?”

Oliver flashed a triumphant grin. “We just got the word a little while ago that because LexCorp’s bid was rescinded, they awarded it to WayneTech instead.”

“But--,” Felicity bit her bottom lip in consternation. Fuck, she was wrong; this was what it felt like to be stuck between a rock and a hard place. “Um, can’t they contest that? LexCorp, I mean?”

His grin widened, “Luthor and his cronies are going to be more concerned with minimizing their exposure in the press then fighting the loss of the contracts. Wayne had the next closest bid so we’re dealing with them now.”

“But Wayne Enterprises can handle their own software needs,” Felicity said, her voiced tinged with something akin to panic. “Why would they come to us?”

“Well, it’s a longshot but we’re hoping that Wayne, in the interest of appearing fair, will agree to honor the original agreement Isabel had worked out with Luthor. After all, we were completely innocent of any kind of wrongdoing and our proposal already passed the committee with a clean bill.
In fact, if they don’t agree to use our software, they’d have to start from scratch and any new proposals from them would have to go back through committee causing further delays, eating into their profit margin. All said, looking at the time crunch alone, we’re still the best possible option for them. Besides,” he beamed, this time it was genuine pride that shown through and not the smarmy fake one he reserved for others, “you know better than anyone that even if WayneTech is the top tech manufacturer in the world, we have the better reputation when it comes to cutting edge communications and software.”

“That’s great,” Felicity said, smiling despite her inner turmoil. It was rare that Oliver ever got this enthusiastic about being CEO of his family’s company and she didn’t want to discourage him.
“Congratulations Oliver, you deserve it.”

“Well,” he turned to Isabel, his fake smile once again in place, “it was mostly all due to Isabel. She got the ball rolling, not to mention the fact that we got Walter to call Fox and put in a good word for us.”

“Oh,” Felicity said, a bit more subdued this time. She forced a pleasant expression on her face, “In that case, I guess I should have said ‘Congratulations Isabel’ instead.” No good deed goes unpunished, she thought miserably.

Isabel arched a superior eyebrow in her direction and offered her a cold little smile, “Thank you.”

“Speaking of which Felicity, since you headed the team that originally developed the software before you left IT; I’ll need to coordinate with you later so you can catch me up on some of the software jargon. In fact, I thought you could join Sanjeev during the Q&A so you should probably coordinate with him as well,” Oliver suggested. “After all, we might be the mouthpieces here but you and your team did the initial heavy lifting and I’d like to see you get credit for that.”

Isabel snorted, “Oh Oliver, stop fawning over the girl! She did what she was paid to do and the only thanks she’s owed is her salary. If you want to ‘show your appreciation’ fine, but not in front of the Wayne people. Besides, I’ll need your assistant well rested for the meeting.” She looked Felicity up and down contemptuously. “Since she’s so dedicated to you and this company and obviously has an affinity for working her way up the ladder, she could prove an invaluable asset.”

The sneer in the other woman’s voice sent her teeth on edge. “Meaning what exactly?”

Isabel glanced at her nails before addressing her in an off-handed manner, “Meaning Lucius Fox has a thing for much younger women. He left his first wife for some bleach blonde cocktail waitress so he also apparently likes his women a bit on the trashy side,” she said nastily. “Having you in the room might give us a bit of an edge, so to speak.”

Oliver’s face darkened dangerously, “Isabel, I told you before that I wouldn’t tolerate--!”

“Oliver,” Felicity interrupted in a coldly detached tone that was so alien from her usual voice that both Isabel and Oliver gave pause, “Would you mind leaving us alone for a second?”
He looked at her in surprise, “Felicity, I can handle—“

“Now Oliver,” Felicity said in a near growl. “Please.”

“Yes, Oliver,” Isabel said playfully as she squared off against Felicity. “I think its past time the two of us had a minute alone to discuss a few…issues.”

“That’s not happening,” he told them both. “Isabel, I--!”

“Oliver,” Felicity cut him off and gave him a significant look. “Let me handle this.”

“You heard her,” Isabel said with a smirk. “Now run along while the two of us have a nice little chat,” she added with a great deal of sarcasm.

“Goddammit,” Oliver ran his hand through his hair and looked at Felicity as if to communicate he had her back if she wanted him to step in. Felicity shook her head almost imperceptivity and flicked her eyes back to his office. “Fine. I’ll be right here should either of you need anything.”

He stomped back into his office and sat behind his desk. Felicity waited for him to click on the speaker before reaching over to her own desk and disconnecting the line. His head shot up and he scowled at her before she again shook him off. This was her fight.

Isabel, who had been watching their byplay with undisguised amusement, spoke up. “Oh, how very dramatic! Should I call security? I just had my nails done and I’d rather not get into a cat fight today if I can help it.”

“Oh Isabel, when I’m done with you the last thing you’ll be worried about is your manicure.”

“Meaning what exactly?” Isabel asked with narrowed eyes.

Felicity prided herself on be a reasonable and logical person. Of course, the last few years had changed her somewhat, the last six months especially. A person couldn’t live through what she had lived through without it affecting their aspect and outlook but, still, she usually thought of herself as a very temperate person. Unless, of course, you pushed the wrong buttons and unfortunately for the Cold War Cunt she just hit the bull’s-eye.

She could take having to eat her pride and pretend not to have covered that woman’s ass, she could choke down her loathing of the bitch when she made her little insults, but with that little aside, she just went one damn step too far.

Despite the other woman being several inches taller than her, Felicity stepped forward in one smooth movement and got into her personal space causing Isabel to instinctively back up and feel the full force of the blonde’s surprisingly devastating glare. “Meaning I’m done playing with you Isabel. Before I just found you tedious and a bit annoying but now you’ve got my full attention and, believe me, that’s something you might want to start taking very seriously.”

“Are you threatening me?” Isabel asked in an incredulous tone, “Because I’ll have you fired and thrown into the street before you can—“

“I’m not threatening you,” Felicity said quietly as she took another step forward, “I’m making you a promise that you can take to the bank.”

“I beg your pardon?” She sputtered with cold humor in defiance of Felicity’s deadly calm.

Felicity stopped, tilted her head, and clucked her tongue in a condescending manner. “Oh honey, for such a supposedly astute businesswoman you really need to learn to do your research or, at least, take in an HR seminar.” Her eyes were hard as steel and the tone in her voice could cut glass. “I started in the IT department. I know how to dig and how to document. I could leave here right now and own you by dinner time in sexual harassment and hostile workplace grievances alone. I can unmake your entire universe with a keystroke, crush your reputation in less time than it would take you to open your email, and I can lay the groundwork to make it look like you were the mastermind behind every white collar Ponzi scheme and Fannie-Mae type Wall Street debacle to hit the fan. I can drop a dime to Anonymous and you won’t even be able to go to the ladies room without seeing a Guy Fawkes mask staring back at you. Your reputation will be kaput in the business world, no tech company will touch you, your own board of directors will forcibly retire you, and, after I do my thing, that Golden Parachute you’re banking on will turn into a noose around your swan-like neck.”

She paused to take a breath, “But if I take you out that way I risk smearing Oliver with the same stink and I like him and his family so, instead,” she stepped forward again, eliminating all pretense of personal space for the other woman, “I’m just going to Kick. Your. Ass.”

Isabel stumbled back a bit, suddenly taken off guard by the tiny blonde who had gone from adorably awkward to dark avenger in a matter of seconds. “I think not! This has been somewhat amusing but, I warn you, you will keep your hands off me or I’ll have you fired and then prosecuted,” Isabel voice warbled as her cool facade began to crumble. “I don’t give a damn if you’re Oliver’s bit on the side or not!”

“Oh, you won’t do a goddamn thing to me, princess. Know why?” She asked, her voice dripping with venom. “Because, despite the calculating and in control act you have down pat with Oliver, I know for a fact that you’ve been playing close to the edge for a while.” She eyed her contemptuously. “I might not like being Oliver’s EA but it turns out that I’m pretty damn good at it. Nothing happens at QC or on our servers,” she emphasized, “without me knowing about it. See, I did my research; I know every shell corp, every dead end off shore account, and every hinky little back room deal you’ve got going on right now and that’s just the stuff I found by barely skimming the surface. LexCorp weren’t the only ones playing fast and loose with the rules, they were just a bit more arrogant about it. You’re just lucky that I was able to cover your tracks, Isabel.” The other woman’s eyes widened slightly and, despite herself, Felicity couldn’t help twisting the knife a little, “Oh yeah, I know for a fact that you were hip deep in the kimchee with Mallory and the whole Senator Miller thing. It wasn’t pure dumb luck or the computer fairy that saved your ass; it was me. I could have buried you at any time but protecting this company for Oliver was more important to me than seeing how you look in an orange jumpsuit.” She let that sink in for a minute, “Still, the right file in the right inbox and you and your buddies at Stellmoor are facing so many Senate hearings in the near future that I suggest you start looking at real estate in the DC area because you’re going to be there awhile.” Her tone took on an icy registry, “As for this new deal you have cooking, now that LexCorp is facing sanctions, that little weasel Mallory is going to start naming names at any minute and you know it. You’re banking on the iron-clad reputations of Lucius Fox and Wayne Enterprises to pull your bony ass out of the fire only you screwed up; want to know how?”

Despite herself, or maybe because of the almost hypnotic ramble of rage being thrown at her from Felicity, Isabel asked, “How?”

Felicity’s eyes, usually an almost transcendentally bright cornflower blue, grew flinty and dark as her voice fell to almost a whisper, “Because the trashy blonde cocktail waitress Lucius Fox was married to?” She angled her head forward until she was whispering directly into Isabel’s ear. “She was my mother.”

“What?” Isabel turned, in the words of Percy Sledge, a somewhat whiter shade of pale.

“Oh yes,” Felicity said as she leaned back on her heels, hatred dripping from every drawn out syllable. “Now, you’re lucky I’m just going with the theory that you honestly didn’t know Lucius was my dad, I mean, after all, not much of a family resemblance since he adopted me after he married my mom,” she shrugged and added, almost as an afterthought, “Also he’s black and I’m,” she waved a hand to indicate her blonde hair, blue eyes, and fair skin, “not. If I had to guess, you had your boy toy personal assistant with the hair and abs do the research on him and while he may be talented in other areas,” she swept Isabel with a scathing look of contempt similar to the one the other woman had given her earlier, “I doubt his office skills are what got him the job. And, point of order,” she said as an aside, “unlike yourself, I actually do know how to keep my panties on in the office so the next time you want to label me the office slut you might want to keep your boy-candy at home.” She watched as Isabel’s creamy complexion flushed a ruddy shade of what was known as ‘color me humiliated’ red.

She soldiered on, “Had you actually bothered to look into it yourself it wouldn’t have been all that hard to connect the dots. It isn’t exactly a well-kept secret.” She stepped forward and laid a gentle hand on Isabel’s shoulder causing the other woman to flinch, “In other words, you were just being your usual delightful self but, if I thought for even one second that the little aside you made for Oliver’s benefit held even the slightest note that you, with malicious knowledge and forethought, both maligned my dead mother while suggesting I pimp myself out to the only father I have ever known I would gladly, and with great abandonment and joyful exuberance, tear your goddamn throat out with my teeth.”

The other woman licked her lips, looking decidedly less arrogant than she had just moments ago. “What are you planning on doing with that information?” Isabel asked her quietly.

“I don’t know; I could out you to Oliver, the board of directors, my dad and Stellmoor then send you to the Federal Pen, but what’s the fun in that?” Again, she leaned back and grinned giving the other woman a glimpse of said pearly whites before doing a half turn and sending a little wave to Oliver who was studying them intently through the glass walls separating their offices. “Smile and wave, Isabel, unless you want to have to explain this to Oliver.” She said through clenched teeth. The other woman smiled faintly and waved distractedly to him as he arose from his chair and began to straighten his jacket. “Oops, looks like he’s on the move so I’m afraid we’ll have to cut this short.” She paused then turned toward Oliver who had his hand on the door of his office and held up a single finger indicating they need a bit more time. His expression darkened and he let go of the pull but continued to stare at them with a deepening scowl.

“What do you want?” Isabel asked her, her eyes flicking towards Oliver.

“What do I want?” She sighed then turned back to her adversary. “Isabel, you are a woman who doesn’t get subtle so here’s what’s going to happen; I’m going to smack you a good one and you’re going to take it. Then you are going to walk out of this office like nothing ever happened and, starting tomorrow, after you’ve applied copious amounts of concealer, you will adopt a warm and pleasant demeanor in my presence. You will also watch your step from here on out because I’m going to be on top of you like white on rice, got that?” She turned a hard eye on her, “We will never speak of this again and Oliver need never know about any of this; not LexCorp, not my relationship to Lucius Fox, and not why you’re about to be laid out on the floor thirty seconds from now. Am I clear?”

“Crystal,” Isabel agreed, jaw locked and shoulder’s braced as she prepared for what she probably assumed would be an unpleasant but not too painful smack by a tiny little blonde thing.

Yeah, too bad for her Felicity trained with two bruisers twice her weight with a foot or more of height advantage who didn’t believe in coddling.
“Excellent,” Felicity smiled, and with a one-two punch worthy of the teachings of John Diggle, Sara Lance, and Oliver Queen, she laid her out cold.

“What the fuck?!” Oliver shouted as he erupted from his office and looked at Isabel sprawled out on the floor, her skirt and slip bunched up at her waist, panties flashing, as she lay sprawled across the carpeting. “Felicity, what the hell did you do?”

Felicity rubbed her knuckles and looked down at her hand with a frown. “Ow.”

As Isabel began to stir he leaned over her and helped her into a sitting position, “Isabel, are you okay? Look, we can work something out. Felicity didn’t mean--!”

“Shut up, Oliver,” Isabel garbled as she rubbed her hand along her jaw line and struggled to get to her feet. She wobbled for a moment before addressing Felicity directly. “I take it…that our business here is concluded then?”

Felicity nodded and said in a professional and pleasant tone, “I’ll call to make the reservations and have the necessary research emailed to your assistant by noon tomorrow.”

“Email it to me directly; I may be looking for a new assistant soon.” She wobbled to the door, “I’ll see you tomorrow then. Goodnight Oliver, Ms. Smoak.”

“Ms. Rochev,” Felicity nodded.

Isabel turned to look at her, makeup smeared, her jaw already swelling as the bruise began to bloom on her cheek, and smiled just slightly as she continued to rub her face. “I appreciate the initiative you’ve shown me, Ms. Smoak. Maybe when this meeting is done you and I could do lunch?”

“Only if you’re buying,” Felicity said mirroring Isabel’s own pleasant and measured tone.

“Heh, done. Goodnight.” She waved then shut the door behind her as she went.

Oliver stood in the center of the room, mouth agape. He stared at the closed door, then to Felicity, and then back to the spot on the floor where an insentient Isabel lay just moments before. Finally, just as Felicity had begun to gather her purse and jacket, he spoke, “Felicity, what the fuck was that? What were you thinking? You punched Isabel! TWICE!”

“Yeah,” she breathed, “and it felt fucking fantastic. Goodnight Oliver.”

“Goddammit Felicity!” He erupted, “Where the hell do you think you’re going? We have to talk about what happened!”

“Tomorrow, tonight I’m going home to watch TV while I ice down my knuckles so I can type up that research in the morning.”

“Goddamn it! If Isabel goes to the board or, God forbid, decides to press charges--!”

“Like I said: Goodnight Oliver!” Felicity called out just before she left, closing the door on a red-faced and utterly confused Oliver Queen.

“She did what?!” Diggle exclaimed in a combination of disbelief and utter delight.

“God damn,” Diggle breathed as he leaned back in Felicity’s chair at her workstation in the Lair. “Tell me you got that shit on tape, a security camera, something?”

“I don’t know, I’ll have to ask Felicity,” Oliver ran his hands through his hair in a gesture of frustration. “Fuck, if Isabel presses charges or goes to the board with allegations that she was attacked by my assistant I don’t think there’s any way I can protect her job. This is a fucking nightmare! Why now? What the hell set her off? I mean, yeah, Isabel was way the fuck out of line but I was handling it!”

Diggle continued to grin as he imagined the scene playing out. “Eh, it’ll blow over, don’t worry about it.”

Oliver looked at him utterly speechless for a moment. “Don’t worry about it?! She punched Isabel in the face!”

“So you lie. Tell the cops nothing happened, have Felicity do her voodoo with the tapes, and I’ll back you up and say I was there and nothing happened,” Diggle shrugged then added, “but have her save a copy because I have got to see the playback at least once before she gets rid of it.”

“It’s not funny, Dig!” Oliver scowled. “If I have to fire Felicity because Isabel forces my hand not only will that further erode my standing with the Board but it will severely restrict how much contact I can have with her. I mean, how will I explain to people that my former assistant who I had to fire because she committed criminal assault on a major shareholder is still coming into the club night after night? It was hard enough before, but now?” He rubbed his hand over his mouth then scratched at the stubble on his throat in a gesture of agitation, “Maybe…maybe it’s all finally catching up to her.”

“What?” Dig asked with a confused frown until Oliver shot him a withering glare, “Oh, that.”

“Yeah, that,” Oliver said with a humorless bark of laughter.

“I thought Felicity had taken to calling it ‘The Thing’,” Dig said.

“Not funny,” Oliver told him.

The other man sighed, “Look, it’s been almost six months. If she was going to have a breakdown it would have already happened by now,” he said reasonably.

“Maybe,” Oliver said gruffly. “The thing is, while the rest of us were recuperating she never stopped moving, she never even took a weekend to, I don’t know, decompress. She just kept going; working on rebuilding the Lair, covering for me and practically running QC singlehandedly, visiting all of us in the hospital. Hell, she even watered Lance’s fucking plants because he told her Laurel had a black thumb and killed them the last time he was laid up. Maybe…maybe I pushed her too hard. I don’t know; maybe all of this is my fault for not making her take some time to herself.”

“It’s not a nervous breakdown, Oliver,” Dig said with a note of exasperation. “Besides, if you made her take a vacation she’d just use it to stay here in the Lair updating the systems or installing equipment. If she was having trouble coping with what went down she’d tell us.”

“Would she?” Oliver asked with a frown.

“Yeah, of course,” Dig said, although there was a hint of doubt in his tone.

“Has she…talked to you about anything?” He didn’t have to specify what it was he was referring to.

Dig shook his head, his features going still for a moment. “No, but she would have. She talks to me more than anybody else on the team. There is no doubt in my mind that if this was related to that she’d have told me by now,” his voice gained in assurance as though he had succeeded in convincing himself as well as Oliver of the truth behind his words. He smiled again, the mood suddenly lifting, “You ask me this was just one of those ‘camel’s back meets straw’ moments she’s always threatening us with.”

“Felicity and that poor camel’s back, huh?” Oliver asked wryly.

“That’s what I’m thinking and, face it; this has been a long time coming. Hell, if I was Felicity I would have knocked her on her ass years ago. Worst case scenario you hire Felicity to be your head of HR or assistant manager at Verdant, something to justify her presence and a paycheck, and you just weather through. Hell, if I were you I’d just say screw it and marry the woman!” Diggle chuckled. “Damn, laid her out, huh? That must have been a thing of beauty, wished I could have seen it.”

Despite himself Oliver felt the corners of his lips twitch upward. “I was too busy trying to keep my eyes from bugging out of head to notice at the time, but yeah. The weirdest part was that when Isabel got up she pretended like nothing had happened. She even gave her a compliment and invited her to lunch.”

“And they spent how many minutes just talking before that?”

“A good five minutes, maybe less.”

Diggle grunted, deep in thought, “And they just talked? No yelling or hair pulling or anything?”

“Felicity pulled the cord to the intercom but, as far as I could see, no.”

“Huh?” Diggle shrugged, “I guess the Heartbreak Kid was right; bitches be crazy.”

“Yeah, I don’t think you’ll want to say that in front of Felicity any time soon,” Oliver said as he rubbed the stubble of his beard with a chuckle, his earlier anxiety over Felicity’s actions all but forgotten due to the other man’s assurances.

“Yeah, she’d probably lay me out too!” He guffawed. “C’mon, let’s hit the sticks today.”

Oliver got up from where he had been leaning against the workstation and followed him into the training area. “You know, still; despite how Isabel seemed to handle it, I just can’t shake the feeling that something bad is hanging over the horizon and Felicity is going to wind up caught right in the middle of it.”
Chapter Three

After a quick stop to the pharmacy for some ice packs and elastic bandages (it’s amazing how fast she went through those things these days. She even got a membership to one of those buy in bulk price clubs so she could stock up on OTC pain relievers and first aid supplies) and a trip to her favorite food allergy aware Chinese take-away, she headed home, shucked off her corporate uniform, and snuggled down into her finest fuzzy PJs and pan fried noodles. She reached over to the blinking light on her landline and slapped it to play her messages while she decided what to watch on her DVR.

//FIRST MESSAGE// the slightly feminine automated voice of her answering machine called out. “Hello. This is an automated message reminding you FELICITY SMOAK to vote on Tuesday for __.”

“Delete,” she muttered. Yeah, civic duty or not, she lost her taste for politics after the whole Blood Army thing a couple of years ago. She filled out an absentee ballot for Walter a few weeks ago but there was no way in hell she was going to the polls.

“Hey Baby, it’s Daddy. I’m stuck in a dinner meeting that’s running late so I missed your message. I tried calling you but, well. Anyway, yes I am planning on coming down on Friday and I know you don’t want to make a big deal about the whole, ‘My dad is the ‘Businessman’s Businessman’ thing,’” she snorted even though it was kind of true. Lucius Fox had an almost legendary reputation in the tech community both as an innovator and as a financial wizard. He hated it when she went back to using the last name ‘Smoak’ but understood why. Felicity had learned a long time ago that people who were desperate to get the attention of Lucius Fox would try to use her connection to him for their own gain and she wanted to succeed on her own. He didn’t like it, or the hours she worked, not to mention the infrequent visits home, but he understood and respected her for it, “but I thought you could meet me at the hotel for brunch on Saturday before I left back out.” He sighed, “You know, I’m so proud of you Baby, but I hate that we never get to see each other these days. I know that Queen boy has a mess on his hands but I miss my little girl. Oh, and your brother said to send him another care package, only next time, and I quote, ‘send more junk food and less healthy crap’ because they apparently don’t have enough of that sort of thing in the Congo. Don’t worry about him though. According to Tam he sent the same message to her so she sent him bulk packages of wheat germ and something called ‘Frookies’. I asked her what the devil a ‘Frookie’ was and she said it’s some kind of fruit juice sweetened tofu cookie.” She could practically hear him shudder at the thought. “I told her when I get ready for the nursing home that you’re in charge of menu planning.Oops, they’re waving me back in. Love you, Baby. See you Friday.”

“Love you too, Daddy,” she said as she deleted his message. She really had to speak to Oliver soon about cashing in a few vacation days. Between QC and Team Arrow the only down time she ever seemed to get is the occasional sleep-in after a concussion.

Not that she would or could ever explain that to her dad.

“Hello Former Brentwood Prep Graduate! This is Barbara Gordon, Prom Queen and Editor of the Gotham Watchtower calling to remind you of our Class Reunion on--.”

“Whoa!” Felicity hit delete, shut off the TV, and grabbed her tablet and headset before patching a secure call into Watchtower. As soon as it connected she looked into the eyes of Barbara Gordon and practically shouted, “What the hell, Barbara?!”

“Oh, so you got my message?” The redhead smirked at her through the monitor.

“What’s going on?” Felicity asked, perturbed. Not that she didn’t love hearing from Barbara but hearing her use their emergency code through her answering machine had put her into a bit of a tailspin. “Is it bad? What’s happening?”

“It’s bad, but not Joker-bad so relax.” Barbara paused, “Well, on second thought, it might be worse than that actually. Although Joker is dead so…ooh, Zombie Joker? Yeah, that would be a whole other level of suck…”

“Is everyone okay?” She said ‘everyone’ even though Barbara gave her that look that said she knew exactly who Felicity was referring to. She flushed and tried to deflect even though she knew it was futile. Barbara knew her too well. “How’s Dick?”

“Being, well, a ‘dick’,” Barbara sighed.

Felicity winced, “Yeah, I heard he left Bludhaven to Tim and went off on his own a while back but Tim said he’d come back a few times since then. I wasn’t sure you two had officially broken up.”
“Oh, we didn’t,” Barbara said with a tight smile. “No, he was very clear on the fact that he was ‘breaking up’ with Bruce but that he still loved me before pointing out that I was ‘vital to the mission’ so he couldn’t ask me to go with him. He told me we just needed a ‘little break’ until he got his bearings.”

“And did he?”

“Huh,” Felicity pursed her lips, “doesn’t that make, well, stuff difficult? Like showering and other… stuff?”

“Nope! From what I can tell he’s stuffing her just fine!” She snarked, “Besides, her hair only does that when she’s flying. Did I mention that yet? She can fly too. She’s just so flippin’ nifty that way, apparently.” She snorted, before her voice grew contemplative, “I wonder if all of her hair does that or just the bit on her head? Eh, what do I care if he gets his weenie roasted? I’m done.”

“Ouch,” she said with a sympathetic wince. She loved Dick but… “Yeah, he’s…yeah, ‘dick’ pretty much covers it.” Felicity agreed as she tried to get a mental picture only to fail miserably. “I’m sorry I’ve been out of touch the last several months. It’s just been…it’s been crazy.”

“It’s alright, Chickie,” she told her. “Tim told me you guys hardly even have time to talk these days because your schedule is all over the map so I get it. Still miss you though.”

“I miss you, too,” she said softly. “Believe me, there’ve been days when I would have loved to have a friendly bitch and wine cooler session via Skype but life has been…” she sighed. “Anyway, what is it with Dick and tall redheads anyway?”

“Fuck if I know,” Barbara said, obviously perturbed. “I spent years with that little weasel pairing evening gowns with flats just so he wouldn’t get a complex and he leaves me for an alien amazon in stilettos just when I happen to drop three feet of height.”

“You don’t really think he left you because of the wheelchair, do you?” Felicity asked tentatively. She’d known Barbara and Dick both before and after the accident that left her in a wheelchair paralyzed from the waist down and, from what she could see, he seemed to be just as affectionate and loving as ever. Of course, in the world that they occupied, relationships could change quickly. She knew that better than most.

“No,” she sighed, “I know he left because of Bruce. I mean, everyone eventually leaves because of Bruce,” Felicity flinched at that, “but it still irks me. I mean, she’s like, seven feet tall! Seriously! It must be what a Chihuahua looks like when he’s trying to mount a Great Dane!”

Unable to stop herself Felicity began to laugh so hard fat tears began to roll down her cheeks. Soon both women were laughing so hard that Felicity had to grab some napkins off the coffee table and blow her nose before she humiliated herself by blowing a snot bubble. “Oh my God! Oh that hurts! Ow!” She clutched her stomach and Barbara caught a glimpse of her bandage.

“This?” She asked, holding it up to the tablet. “Punched my, well, technically I guess she’s my boss, in the face.”
“Oh,” Barbara’s eyebrows shot up to her hairline. “Fuck me. You looking for another job, yet?”

“Nope, blackmailed her. She even asked me to lunch afterwards.”

“Okay, you now have my unending respect,” she chuckled. “Felicity Smoak, Bad-ass.”

“Well, you’re still pretty bad-ass too if you ask me.”

“Damn straight!” Barbara agreed, “I might not be ten feet tall and fly but I can still rock a Ms. Clairol Dark Auburn dye job like nobody else and I got mad hacker skills! By the way, still loving the hair, Baby-Girl. Did you go darker with the lowlights since I saw you last or is that my monitor acting up?”

“What, this? Yeah, how’s it look?” Felicity mugged for the camera. “Only my hairdresser knows for sure!”

“I like it! The contrast really makes your eyes pop,” Barbara told her. “I mean, I always dug your original color, but I can understand why you got tired of people making comments. Still, aren’t you living in the Land of all that is Blonde and Fake anyway? You’d think that if you could get away with it anywhere it’d be on the West Coast.”

“Surprisingly enough, no,” she told her. “Every time I tried to tell someone it wasn’t fake they’d shoot me a look and offer me friendly little tidbits about how ‘less is more’. I swear to God, if I got that, ‘don’t try to sell it so hard, darling’ speech from one more suicide blonde whose roots were showing…” she said rolling her eyes. “So, yeah, platinum blonde doesn’t fly well in Corporate America so I dirtied it up a little and then I dirtied it a little more.”

“Hey, do you think I could pull off blonde?” She asked with an amused smirk. “Maybe we should switch looks since you’re punching bitches out and feeling your inner redhead and I know I could definitely use more fun.”

“That’s a thought,” Felicity told her. “Eh, who knows? Maybe I will. Seriously though, if you’re thinking about trading in Rita Hayworth for Marilyn Monroe, he did it with this avocado oil based dye in shades of ‘Honeyed Happiness’ and ‘Golden Glory’ then put me on this shampoo called Bumble and Bumble to tame the frizzies and maintain the color. You should check it out.”

“Looks nice!” Her eyes glinted merrily as she stuck a naughty tongue between her teeth. “So what else have you been ‘dirtying up’ since joining the ranks of the Corporate Clones? That Ollie Queen is H-A-W-T!”

“And moving on!” She flushed, refusing to answer her. “You know, Barbara, not that I don’t love hearing from you, but why the coded message on my landline? You could have just called me on my cell if you wanted to talk.”

“Is there a glitch in the system?” Felicity frowned.

“Noooo,” she said, drawing it out. “Everything’s working just fine on our end.”

Felicity breathed a sigh of relief. “Oh good!”

“A little too well in fact.”
“Pardon?”

“While Bruce was out on patrol the other night a friend of yours pinged our system.”

“What?” Felicity asked, her heart suddenly skipping a beat.

“Calls herself The Huntress. And, as if it needs to be said, Bruce was not amused.”

“Is he ever?” Felicity tried to joke but it came out as a trembling stutter instead. This was bad—the so very not good kind of bad.

“Compared to his usual grim and stoic demeanor, he was especially unamused…particularly when your name came up.”

She shut her eyes and hung her head in defeat. “Fuck.” It figures that Helena would be either stupid or crazy enough to not only wander into the Bat’s territory but throw her name into the mix as well. She just hoped Oliver hadn’t been exposed. Next time Helena came for a visit she swore she’d arrow that crazy bitch personally. “Fuckity-fuck-fuckadoodledoo.”

“And that’s not even the best part: Guess who’s coming to town to pay you a little visit?”

Felicity swallowed, “Oh no.”

“Oh yes,” Barbara confirmed. “Just before he let Psycho-Bitch go she let him in on the fact that you’re working for another vigilante in Starling City and he got all Cave-Man about it. You know how he hates to share.”

“Wait? He let her go?!?” Felicity nearly shouted, outraged, choosing to put aside Bruce’s travel plans for the moment. “She insane! And a murderer! She’s practically the Joker with tits and a girl-on for mobsters! He should have taken her down or shipped to Arkham or something!”

“Well, Bruce isn’t exactly a fan of the Mob and since she knew who you were he let her go with a beat down, a separated shoulder, and a severe warning to leave his city and keep away from you or she’d have more than just some Robin Hood wannabe chasing after her. He even did the whole grumpy Bat-face growly thing. Afterwards he ordered Alfred to load up the jet so he could come give you a talking to but the good Mr. Pennyworth managed to talk him down.”

Felicity hung her head and shut her eyes as a bit of panic began to set in. “He’s coming down here with Dad on Friday, isn’t he?”

“Yup. And I have orders not to say anything to you so this is me not saying anything.”

“Great. If he’s coming here then who is watching Gotham?”

“He tapped Red Robin to step up for the time being.”

“Tim?” She said, thinking of her sister’s more on than off boyfriend. “I thought he and Bruce were currently on the outs.”

“Yeah, so that alone should tell you how pissed he is. In fact, the only good news is that he hasn’t said anything to your dad.”

She snorted, “Obviously! Dad might pretend not to suspect Bruce of being the Bat but he definitely wouldn’t be as happy to pretend not to notice anything if he thought I was ever a part of his whole crusade.”
“Technically your dad was the one to introduce the two of you and suggest Bruce use you as a consultant when we were developing Watchtower. I mean, he had to know that was Bat related.”

“I think Dad expected me to actually ‘consult’, not spend my days in the Batcave installing hardware and upgrading the systems while he was at the office.”

“Well, at the time the Batcave wasn’t exactly handicap accessible so I couldn’t do it, Dick can barely microwave popcorn, Tim’s almost as good as we are but he’d probably turn Watchtower into a video game arcade if I let him anywhere near it—seriously, can you imagine Bruce sitting down at his workstation and having Angry Birds or Star Wars; Revenge of the Sith pop up? I think we’ve had enough funerals in the Bat Family, thank you very much. Jason and Stephanie were already long gone—not that they would have been of any help anyway, so was Cassie but even if she weren’t she could barely speak, Damian was a worthless little psychopathic shit—not to speak ill of the dead—and Alfred is handy with research and sutures but he’s no Felicity Smoak-Fox when it comes to computers. Bruce could have done it but between the boardroom and the Bat when would he have the time?”

“I don’t think my Dad likes to think about the logistics of Bruce being the Batman too much. Remember he’s going for that whole ‘plausible deniability’ thing. He’s never even spoken about it to me except to say that if I ever need help with any ‘special projects’ business to let him know.”

“Yeah well, that’s the good news. Here’s the bad news: The reason he’s coming down is that the Huntress dropped in his lap the fact that someone put out feelers on you a while back and they were looking for an out of town contractor to get it done.”

Felicity stopped short and licked her lips. Her mind quickly scanned through any possible names who might want her dead and, to her surprise; there were a lot of them. “Who’s the client?”

“Don’t know; kind of a moot point though since the contract was rescinded around eighteen months ago. Since you’re still alive I’m guessing whoever had the wild hair up their ass got over it. Bruce, however, doesn’t see the silver lining in that and when he gets there he’s not just planning on spanking your cute little tushie—although I suspect you both might get a kick out of that—“

“Oliver or the Arrow?”

“I’m sorry, is there a difference?”

“Shit.” Felicity cursed under her breath. She briefly considered trying to convince Barbara that Oliver wasn’t the Arrow but the tone of the other woman’s voice and the look on her face told her she wouldn’t buy it. “How?”

“Lots of stuff, the clues are there when you know what to look for not to mention the fact that you appear to have a type: Billionaire Playboy by day, Masked Vigilante by night. You have heard of eHarmony, right? Match.com? They even have internet dating for farmers these days if you want to go all Green Acres.” Barbara said with a wry tone. “C’mon, Baby, do I have to give you the speech about not falling into destructive relationship patterns by channeling Dr. Phil or are you going to move to Metropolis next and try on something a little less brooding and a little more into primary colors?” Barbara paused, “You know, that guy flies. I wonder if anything of his catches on fire? Mmm, I’d risk some rug burns for that.”
She chose to ignore the other woman’s sarcasm and go for optimism instead. “But he just suspects, right? He doesn’t have anything concrete.”

“Yeah, that’s the spirit! Keep the faith, sunshine. Good things happen all the time like kittens popping out of rainbows being farted out of a unicorn’s butt because everyone knows that the Batman is a calm and reasonable kind of guy.” Felicity groaned and cupped her head in her hands but Barbara continued. “The fact that your Hottie in Green is connected to Ra’s al Ghul doesn’t help much either.”

“Wait, what?!” Felicity’s head shot up in alarm. “Oliver has nothing to do with Ra’s al Ghul!” Not quite a lie. Ra’s name had come up as they had begun to investigate the League of Assassins, plus there had been that uneasy alliance with Nyssa during the Army of Blood thing almost a year and a half ago, but Felicity wasn’t planning on mentioning that unless she was cornered. As for her own team, she had heard of Ra’s long before meeting Oliver but had held off sharing what she knew with them simply because she didn’t know enough to add anything of value. Bruce had been very secretive about his past association with the leader of the League of Assassins and had no idea she even knew as much as she did. Besides, all it would have led to is more questions, questions Felicity couldn’t answer.

Once again she wondered if keeping her past affiliation with Batman a secret had been a mistake on her part but she quickly dismissed the thought. It was too late now and the last thing she needed to do was tell Barbara that there was, in fact, some connection between the Arrow’s mission and Ra’s al Ghul when Oliver himself was still working all that out. Barbara wouldn’t dare withhold that kind of information from Bruce and few things got under the man’s skin worse than that particular name.

As if reading her thoughts Barbara said, “Maybe, maybe not, but that island he was on was a training ground for the League of Assassins and you know how he gets with anything Ra’s related. If he was a little ticked when he found out about the Arrow recruiting you, then you should have seen him when he asked me to look into this Lian Yu place: Not. Happy.”

“Yeah, I can imagine,” Felicity muttered. “When did all this happen?” She asked wearily. “What’s my timeline?”

“The Huntress was last night and the Lian Yu thing was early this morning. I waited until Bruce went down for his BatNap just in case he decided to be really paranoid and monitor even the secure channels. I’m giving you as much time as I can, Baby.” Barbara sighed and sat back from the monitor. “Look, how well do you know this Oliver guy?”

“He doesn’t know Ra’s, Barb. I’d know it if he was League and I would have called you guys first thing if he was. I’m not saying there isn’t a Ra’s connection here in Starling, we’ve been tracking it ourselves, but Oliver isn’t it. Before he met me this was a two man operation in an abandoned warehouse and they were getting by with a desktop his bodyguard picked up for him at Walmart. Barb, swear to God, they were still using McAfee because they thought it meant they were ‘secure’,” she said quietly but with confidence. Something occurred to her, “Did the client put feelers out to the League about me? Is that what has Bruce in a tizzy?”

“Baby-Girl, if the League had been given the contract you would already be dead by now and if the client pulled it before it was done, they’d be dead. The League has a strict ‘no take-sies, back-sies’ rule about that kind of thing,” Barbara said bluntly. “Whoever put out the hit contacted a high-end broker, the kind of guy who doesn’t advertise so you have to be in the know just to find him, and one who is strictly into hiring non-League assassins so either that was happy coincidence or they’re trying to sneak in under the League’s radar. That’s one of many things bothering Bruce about this. If Queen was League and they wanted to cripple his operation by getting to you, then they’d have a reason to look for an independent operator. It could be a coincidence but you know how Bruce feels about those. He thinks Queen recruited you for a reason, babe. Bruce still files you under ‘Family’ so it’s not completely outside the realm of possibility.”

“First off, he didn’t recruit me; not really. He got lucky, that’s all. He was so hopelessly out of his league with this thing he was going to his own company’s IT department with bullet ridden laptops looking for help. The fact that I happened to be the one he spoke to is a goddamn miracle, anyone else would have dropped a dime. I still haven’t completely figured that one out yet. All I know is that he asked Walter Steele who he could trust in IT and he sent him to me. He doesn’t even know that Lucius is my dad much less my connection to Gotham City and the Bat and I’d like to keep it that way.”

“Wait, you’ve been with this guy for all this time and he still doesn’t know anything about you?” Barbara huffed, “And I thought I had a shitty love life.”

“So? I blush at a drop of the hat. I blush when Pepe LePew tries to seduce the pussycat on Cartoon Network!” She said going from light pink to blood red.

“Okay, you might not be playing ‘Hide the Arrow’ with your honey in green but you like him,” Barbara teased knowingly. “Just be careful with Bruce, girl. He’s always been unpredictable when it comes to you. Remember, I was there when you went from ‘Baby’, the tow-headed little tyke who stopped by the manor every once in a while with her daddy, to ‘Felicity’, the stacked 18 year old blonde bombshell with the doctorate and the tits that defied gravity.”

“Says the woman with the ‘D’ cups,” she said ruefully then looked down at her much more modest chest. “My alphabet ends two whole letters before yours.”

“Don’t sell your bee stings short,” she told her. “They fit your frame better than mine do and you have no idea how hard it is finding a decent bra some days. Believe me, underwire is both a blessing and a curse and sports bras can only do so much. Dick liked them, naturally, but you try running around in a mask with knockers that big. One night my elastic gave up the ghost while I was swinging from rooftop to rooftop and I nearly gave myself two black eyes. Besides, those puppies were good enough to have the Grim Guy in the Cowl take a second look so enjoy them; he certainly did.”

“Hilarious,” she said flatly.

“It’s the truth,” she shrugged. “I may not know what went down between you two right before you took off to Starling City but I had to live with the aftermath. Those first six months you were gone there was practically zero crime in Gotham. He was so bad even Alfred was about to strangle him.”

“I’m sure it wasn’t that bad,” Felicity said, suddenly unwilling to look directly into the camera. “Bruce doesn’t—didn’t—have those kinds of feelings for me.”

“You’ve been gone, what? A little over four years?”

“Yeah, so?”

Barbara sighed and leaned toward the monitor. “There are only two names that no one is allowed to utter in his presence because if anyone mentions either of them he goes dark for days: Selina Kyle and Felicity Smoak.”
“She’s still missing?” Felicity asked quietly. “I thought he would have found her by now.”

“He stopped looking a while back,” she said sadly. “I think that when you left he realized that… well…” She shook her head. “When Selina left he convinced himself that something had to have happened to her. He couldn’t accept that she had just had enough of his obsession with the mission. He kept trying to change her, tame her down, but he wouldn’t change for her in return. You know how it is with him; he has to control everything and everyone in his little universe and you just can’t domesticate a woman like Selena. Then you came along and threw him for a loop and he didn’t know which way was up anymore. He was so damn confused by you it would have been hilarious if the man wasn’t such a goddamn misery to be around. Then, one day, everything just changed. You left and he went to a darker place then any of us had ever seen up to that point. I offered to talk to you for him after a particularly bad night and he almost took my head off, said to never mention you again in the Cave or anywhere else for that matter.” She shot her a sad look, “I think you made him finally realize just how destructive this thing he carries inside of him is to the rest of us. We had hoped he’d have some kind of epiphany and wake up but he went the opposite direction. After Damian died it got even worse. He even tried pushing me, Dick, and Tim out for a while. I think that’s part of what drove Dick to another team after Bruce got back from his mental health moment; that and the fact that Bruce took back the cowl. He kind of got used to being the Bat and going back to Nightwing felt like getting sent back down to the Minors for him.”

“I don’t know why Dick always had such a complex about that stuff,” Felicity said sympathetically. “I know you and he have some recent rough history but he’s a good man and he’s brilliant. I just wish he would get over it.”

“Baby, you are preaching to the choir!” Barbara sighed, “You can’t even blame it all on Bruce either. It’s that whole Bat Curse thing they all have. Dick’s own worst enemy is Dick, but enough on that. I could spend all day on that man. Tim’s the only one who ever escaped the Bat-Angst but only by the skin of his teeth. He was always Bruce’s special kid, you know; the first one who wasn’t a complete wreck before he got to him, the only one who still has an intact heart. Damian was hard for Tim to deal with from the minute he showed up on Bruce’s doorstep. And that’s really saying something; you know Tim, he loves everybody.”

“Are they back on or off?” Barbara asked.

“I can’t keep up,” Felicity snorted. “They never really ‘break-up’ per se, they just kind of wander away from each other then hook back up several months later. The word ‘commitment’ gives them both the heebie-jeebies.”

“That’s a total Bat thing, trust me. Every damn one of them would rather walk naked in a room full of barbed wire than actually commit,” Barbara snorted then grumbled, “I miss having Tim around the Cave. He was my special little buddy but he had no choice really but to take off. Like I was saying about the Anti-Christ and Timmy, that little psycho-creep had him so damned frosty from trying to kill him every five seconds he had to leave. Hell, Alfred nearly joined him! When Alfred can’t stand someone you know it’s bad. I thought for sure he was just going to lose it one day and pour rat poison on top of the little shit’s Froot Loops. Bruce was no help at all. He was practically catatonic from the shock of just having to deal with him and Tim couldn’t even sleep in the same house as the little fucker. After Bruce made him promise to stop trying to kill Tim, Damian broke into his room when he was sleeping and put a knife on the pillow next to his head because, and I quote, he was ‘trying to make a funny’. He could have taken him down but it was Bruce’s kid and he didn’t want to cause him any more pain than he had to. Instead he wound up spending more nights on my couch.
than I can count.”

She shook her head again, her countenance grim, “I could have kicked Bruce’s ass for that and Dick wasn’t much better. They were both so concerned with reining in Damian that Tim got completely left out in the cold. He seemed to handle it but I could tell he was upset. One night on the couch became two and before I knew it I had a roommate. I didn’t mind though. I mean, it’s Tim; talk about someone who’s easy to have around. It became pretty obvious he wasn’t going anywhere so I broke down and decided to build a second bedroom in the clock tower; Lord knows I have the room for it. Hell, other than my bedroom and the bathroom I don’t have any walls in this place, it’s all wide open. I was going to ask Timmy to throw up some dry wall and go to the furniture store with me so I could reclaim my couch but before I could break out the hammer and nails all the stress and lack of sleep finally got to him and he beat the shit out of the little fucker one day right out of the blue. I mean, the kid had it coming and I said as much to Bruce but for Tim it was the final straw. I know for a fact that’s what made Tim finally say enough is enough. Then when Damian died, and Bruce just lost his nut, Tim was just so angry and torn up about the whole thing. On one hand it was Bruce’s biological son but the kid was a monster, literally a monster. Bruce losing it over the kid that tried to kill him and nearly got him killed more times than he could count just felt like the worst kind of betrayal. Add to that Bruce’s whole habit of isolating himself when he’s in wounded animal mode…” She sighed, “Dick and Tim just couldn’t keep doing the push me, pull me dance with Bruce. Tim always felt like Bruce didn’t trust or love him enough and Dick always felt like he was coming up short.”

“Ironic then that he keeps going for tall redheads,” Felicity joked weakly and got an amused snort for her efforts. Oh man, she missed Barbara. Unlike most people Barbara Gordon truly admired her foot-in-mouth disease.

She smiled at her through the screen of her tablet, “I’m not trying to bring down the mood but it’s been lonely on this end for a while now, Baby. Especially for Bruce. He’s pushed everyone out but me and Alfred. He’s been getting better but a part of him has been dead inside for a while now. It’s like Bruce has been in a fog and then--Look, all I know is that the second he heard your name…Felcity, I can’t describe it. He’s an intense guy, he gets focused and everything falls to the wayside, but when he heard that Huntress chick say she held a crossbow to your throat…”

“Crap on a cracker,” Felicity said with a wince. “She had to go and mention that, huh?”

“Yeah, I don’t think you’re on her Christmas card list anymore. He didn’t react well to that information—at all.”

“It’s not like we were ever Facebook friends,” Felicity shrugged. “Gotta say, I really don’t feel all that bad about him kicking her leather clad ass either.”

“Point is it woke him up and not in a good way. He’s not too happy with the Arrow for even putting you in her orbit. Dick and I were a hell of a lot younger and dumber than you when we joined up and he had us literally juggling knives within a week, but he always acted like you were made out of spun glass. He’d bark orders and curse at us until he was blue in the face and then you’d walk in and he’d go from Bat to Bashful so fast it gave the rest of us whiplash. Even his voice changed around you.”

“I remember,” Felicity said quietly. Her dad had always called her ‘Baby’, never ‘Felicity’, and most close friends and family had gotten into the habit as well. With her dad and her siblings from his first marriage it was never, ‘Look what Felicity did’ it was ‘Look what Baby did’. Even Dick and Barbara (and to a lesser extent her sister’s occasional boyfriend Tim Drake-Wayne) would teasingly call her ‘Baby’ in an annoying way, but not Bruce. When Bruce said ‘Baby’, it didn’t sound like an affectionate nickname, it sounded…she shivered and hoped Barbara didn’t notice.

“You exposed a side to Bruce none of us even knew existed so when the Huntress practically threatened to go back and finish the job she’d started by holding a crossbow to your throat, he totally lost it. I wasn’t kidding about the shoulder. He nearly wrenched it from the socket and that was before he ever heard your name. After that he really got mad.”

“That bad, huh? Yeah, she was probably pissed because I slipped her some dummy hardware. It was the second time she’d done the crossbow thing and I wasn’t in the mood to be generous,” Felicity said, trying not to read too much into what Barbara was saying about Bruce’s feelings towards her. After all, as much as she cared for the older woman, not even she had been told everything that had happened between them. Her sister had been the only one who knew the details of their one brief failed liaison. Bruce was just being territorial as far as she was concerned, that’s all.

“Eh, fuck her if she can’t take a joke,” she said dismissively. “But back to Bruce; I mentioned the jet thing, right?” Barbara reminded her with a wry grin. “Look Baby, he’s gunning for the Arrow and he might be telling himself that it’s about the Huntress, or Ra’s, or the fact that your guy gets a bit lethal with his arrows from time to time, but it’s ultimately about you. Just you. My advice, since you two aren’t ‘involved’, is to take a mini-break and let the masks sort it out among themselves without you in the picture to confuse matters. Don’t get in the middle of it. You can come down here and stay with me and maybe visit with your dad when he gets back. Maybe if Bruce sees you’ve left Starling City, it’ll calm him down and he’ll forget about him. In fact, he’ll probably just turn around and try to convince you to stay here permanently instead.” Barbara grinned, “The Batcave is due for some upgrades and I’m sure Alfred would love to see you…not to mention that we could all reap the benefits from you and Bruce finally doing something to resolve that sexual tension that was always sparking between you. I mean, if there’s anyone besides me that really needs to get laid…”

“Trust me, everything between Bruce and myself was resolved more than four years ago,” Felicity snorted.

Barbara’s jaw dropped and Felicity realized just what a tremendous faux pas she just made. “Holy shit! You two really did sleep together? And you didn’t tell me? You bitch!”

“No, no, no, no!” Felicity stammered. “I mean, yes—no—um—no comment!”

“Oh my GOD! You did!” She howled. “You little minx! I want details! Lots of details!”

“I’m not having this conversation!” Felicity shouted. “I’m logging off now!”

“No, no, no, no! I’ll stop, I promise!” Barbara said waving frantically at the monitor.

“You swear?” Felicity asked, face burning hot with embarrassment.

“I swear!” Barbara said as she crossed her heart with her fingers.

“Fine,” Felicity said cautiously. “Look, I need to know if you have my back here. I know your first duty is to Bruce, and I would never ask you to compromise that, but things aren’t…we’re doing good work here, Barb. It might not look that way from Gotham, and we might not be as sophisticated an operation as you guys, but we’re in the middle of some pretty intense stuff and having the Batman tear through town could tilt the delicate balance we have going. I promise you, we’re not just playing Robin Hood for kicks. There are real lives on the line here and Starling City is just as important to us as Gotham is to all of you.” She put all the sincerity she could muster in her next words, “If it comes down to it, if Bruce forces me to have to make a choice between staying here and compromising my team or leaving and never looking back, I’ll leave. I will cut ties and take off to Europe or go be with Luke in Africa and try to contribute down there, but I won’t just let Bruce Wayne or Batman think he can snap his fingers and summon me back to Gotham. I also won’t just roll over or abandon my team without trying to mitigate the possible exposure of their identities as much as possible. I can’t reveal the Arrow to Bruce any more than I could unmask Batman to my team. Bruce suspecting that Oliver Queen is the Arrow and him knowing are still two very different things. If I have to use a bit of obfuscation to protect them, all I ask is that you pick up what I’m putting down and try not to unravel anything too quickly for Bruce. Buy me a little time, that’s all I’m asking.”

Barbara took a minute to consider her words, “I won’t lie to Bruce but, if you should happen to lay a few traps, I’ll do my best to fall into them, okay?”

“Thank you,” she said, exhaling a shaky breath.

“You and Bruce, always with your protocols and mazes within mazes—you already had a contingency plan for this set up, didn’t you?” Her green eyes sparkled Merrily, the mood suddenly picking back up.

“Well…” Felicity muttered, her lips ticking upward. “I had a few protocols in place in case we were exposed. I thought it was going to be a cop turning us in but it works for Bruce just as well.”

“Just you protect yourself, too, understood? Just because the hit got cancelled doesn’t mean the danger has passed.”

Danger was something she was all too familiar with these days. “If someone wanted me dead, I’d be dead, but…I’ll do my best.”

“Great, now that that’s all settled, I just have one question.”

“Shoot.”

“The tumbler?” She asked in confusion, “What about it?”

“Well, I was just wondering,” Barbara’s lips curled upwards in a saucy grin, “in regards to what you know about Bruce and the Batmobile’s specs, is it true what they say about men using their cars to compensate for the size of their—?”

“Goodbye Barbara!” Felicity said just as she ended the transmission. She sat back into the couch cushions with an “Oof!” and eyed the now cold containers of Chinese takeout with a grimace.

“Damn, I think I just lost my appetite.”

Chapter Four

Bruce leaned back in his seat aboard his private jet and glanced through the details of the Queen Consolidated proposal with a disinterested eye. Even though he had turned over the majority of the day-to-day operations to Lucius Fox he still kept abreast of everything that went on at Wayne Enterprises. He was a self-admitted control freak and that need for that level of control extended not only to his job as Batman. Still, the only thing he had on his mind was Oliver Queen and his mission and just how involved Felicity was in it.

And was she just involved in his mission or was it something else? Something more?

He looked at the picture of Oliver Queen on the tablet before him: tall, dark blond hair, rakish good looks, well-bred, well spoken, a ladies man (pre-island at least). Older than Felicity but still younger than he was by several years, he could see how she might find him attractive. She wouldn’t have touched the Oliver Queen before he was lost at sea with a ten foot pole, but the Arrow…

Felicity was good at fixing broken things and, in Bruce’s experience, it took a broken man to do what he and this Arrow did every night while guarding their individual city’s streets.

He wasn’t a pretty boy either. Used to be, not anymore. The island had aged him, scarred him, took away some of the fat he had developed as a privileged member of the 1%. Those muscles weren’t from half-assing it in some trendy gym, no. Bruce could recognize the shape and stance of a fellow warrior from a mile away. No matter how many alibis this Queen came up with there was no doubt in his mind that Oliver Queen was the Arrow.

Alfred had, as always, been meticulous in building his dossier on Queen, especially in regards to his personal life. He was both a partier and a player before the island and it appeared that he wasn’t overly careful with his women back then either. According what Barbara managed to uncover by hacking into his medical records and his attorney’s computer, he had apparently fathered a child when he was eighteen. His name wasn’t on the birth certificate but there was a confidentiality agreement on file along with other legal documentation signed by the boy’s mother where she absolved Queen of any and all financial responsibility for the child in exchange for a lump sum child support payment of two million dollars. Last year he amended the agreement and set up a trust as well as made provisions in his will including a life insurance policy, but he’d made no effort to get visitation rights or to officially establish paternity through a DNA test. In fact, he’d signed his Barbara searched but, near as she could figure, they’d been taken into Federal Witness Protection following the boy’s abduction by Malcolm Merlyn and subsequent rescue. WITSEC wasn’t handling it though; it had all the earmarks of an ARGUS operation. The records weren’t just wiped; it was like they had never existed to begin with. ARGUS being involved at all with it was a big red flag as far as he was concerned.

Another thing that bothered him about that whole situation was that after Merlyn was taken out, Queen allowed them to remain in hiding. While he never thought of himself as a particularly good father, Bruce did believe in taking his responsibilities seriously. While Queen appeared to be taking financial responsibility the fact that he would sign away his parental rights and cut off all contact to his own child so completely bothered him. Plus, he knew Felicity well enough to know that she would never be with a man who could abandon his child; the fact that she knew this about Queen and still stayed was disturbing on many levels.

It appeared that, while the younger version of Queen was reckless, the newer version was much more cautious. He’d settled down considerably since taking the on the mantle of CEO and when it came to relationships, Queen had a type: tall, beautiful, ambitious, articulate, a bit cool, a bit damaged, and intelligent. From what Bruce could tell, he wanted to find a woman who could play a brunette version of Moira Queen; in other words, someone who was the complete opposite of Felicity. Oh, she was beautiful and intelligent, but with her hair the color of winter sunshine, warm nature, and sweet stumbling speech, she was definitely not his type either before or after the island. She didn’t fit his pattern and, despite being the adopted daughter of Lucius Fox, she had not been raised in the spotlight of high society. Lucius was an intensely private man, a thing Bruce very much respected about his friend, and had kept her as sheltered and safe as he could. Felicity was many things but she was not the type of woman who would easily tolerate the life and constraints of a society matriarch.

Bruce had met Moira Queen once. She was warm and welcoming in as much as a woman born into the world of the extremely wealthy could ever be. Oh, she loved her children, worked tirelessly for charities, and was an excellent hostess, but her eyes always seemed to lack that spark of human kindness, her laugh just a little too measured and cool, and never a hair out of place. She was the type of mother who enjoyed spending time with her children after the nannies had cleaned them up and who had no idea what their favorite foods were or who their friends were because she had a staff to deal with that sort of thing. She spoiled her children, yes; but she did not raise them. Moira Queen was the epitome of the cultured elite, or had been before her death two years previously.

She and her daughter had been targeted by a mercenary named Slade Wilson who was hired by the man running against her for mayor. After allegedly murdering Moira Queen and his supposed employer, Sebastian Blood, he completely disappeared.

As intriguing as the circumstances surrounding her death were, it was also irrelevant to the matter at hand. Moira was dead and either Slade or the Arrow killed Sebastian Blood, aka Brother Blood, and defeated his supposed ‘Blood Army’ shortly afterwards. This Slade Wilson was presumed dead or on the run after the Arrow and his team consisting of known members of the League of Assassins and Amanda Waller’s Suicide Squad dropped a city block on top of their heads then trapped the rest in a tunnel and shot them full of tranquilizers before hauling them off to ARGUS’s own Super Max.

Bruce looked at the date in the file. He, Tim, and Dick had been dealing with the aftermath of Damian’s death around that time and none of them found out about the attack on Starling until it was over. It wasn’t until they were heading home on the jet from confronting Ra’s and Talia that Tim got the messages sent to him by a frantic Tam. The grid was down; landlines, cellular networks, even the internet was blacked out. No one could get any word on what was happening in Starling City. Initial reports said it was another massive earthquake but, unlike the one that was caused by the Markov device, this one was affecting the city as a whole and not just the Glades. He’d been a wreck but the minute he heard Tim’s frantic call to Tam and Dick instructing the flight attendant to have the pilot head straight for Starling he’d snapped out of it. They were halfway there when Tam was able to confirm that Felicity was safely out of the city and at a tech conference in Las Vegas the entire week.

Now…he sighed, now he didn’t know what to think. He’d been so ragged after that…

He’d had a bit of a breakdown for a while and took off for several months to get his head together. Knowing what he now knew, he was fairly certain she’d been lying about being at a tech conference. Now he wonders if, not only did he fail Felicity by not continuing on to Starling that day, but if she hated him so much that she was willing to die rather than reach out for his help.

He pushed that out of his mind and concentrated on the dossier in front of him. While the Detective in him found the circumstances of Moira Queen’s murder interesting, what he was now concerned with was her son. Specifically the choices he made when it came to the women in his life: Laurel Lance, Helena Bertinelli, and, if rumors were true, Isabel Rochev.

Laurel Lance was a former girlfriend with whom he still maintained a somewhat amicable relationship. As a former-ADA with a father on the force, Quentin Lance, it made sense that he’d keep it friendly; that was a nice contact to have in your back pocket if you spent part of your life as a murdering vigilante. She left the Starling City DA’s office a few months ago to enter a treatment facility for bipolar depression and substance abuse and was now in Central City living with her mother and doing volunteer work with Legal Aid.

Helena Bertinelli was the daughter of a crime boss and just as flexible a sense of morality. She currently billed herself as a vigilante but Bruce knew what she was the moment he set eyes on her; a killer. She had been swallowed by the dark and, sooner or later, she would have to be dealt with. If she hadn’t dropped Felicity’s name on the roof he would have tossed her in Arkham until she forgot what the sun even looked like. Felicity was his priority at the moment but, as soon as he had her back home where she belonged, taking down the Huntress was on the top of his to-do list.

As for Isabel Rochev—well; she was a piece of work. Even Alfred couldn’t find much but what he did find was more than enough to earn her a spot on the Batman’s watch list.

Just as he was fairly certain that a man like Queen had no real emotional attachment to Felicity he knew she probably had plenty of feelings for him. It was in her nature to care about someone so obviously wounded. Either way he saw his proximity to her as a disaster in the making. Any way you cut it, this man was going to get her hurt. At worst he was a bored rich boy with mental issues and a history of poor judgment, at best he was a well-intentioned amateur that was destined to either get caught or killed and he was going to take everyone in his orbit down with him. No, Queen was not going to be using Felicity any more, not if he had anything to say about it.

Alfred had also included a file on her showing that in the four years since she’d left Gotham, she went from her position as a senior IT manager at QC to Oliver Queen’s EA overnight and when she wasn’t at his corporate headquarters she was at some nightclub he owned in the slums called Verdant where she was on the books as his IT Consultant.

Bruce snorted to himself. “Subtle.”

Hell, maybe he’d open his own club in the East End called, ‘The Dark Night’.
He closed the file and settled back into the plush leather cushions of his seat. ‘Why in the hell would she get caught up in something like this?’ He thought to himself. ‘Why would she deliberately align herself with some killer posing as a hero?’

He thought back to what Barbara had told him, how she had warned him that his presence in this matter would not be appreciated. She was right, he knew that. Felicity would not be welcoming him with open arms, and he didn’t blame her. Not after what had happened between them. Still, she was his responsibility whether she acknowledged it or not. He’s the one who drew her into this world, who exposed her to the mission. She should have never been touched by the darkness that consumed him. It was his fault she was in danger, his fault that she was now at risk, and even if this was a life she had chosen for herself, if he hadn’t hurt her the way he had, she never would have fled to Starling City to begin with.

He allowed his mind to go back four years previously when everything had changed for them.

Alfred was in England visiting his sister who was having surgery and Dick had already been spending more and more time in Bludhaven, slowly cutting his ties with the team. Tim had taken his spot as Red Robin but Damian coming into the picture had strained their relationship. He had taken an away assignment to get some space and Bruce had let him go. The arrival of a biological child he’d never known about was bad enough but the fact that his son was basically a child version of the Joker had left him feeling hollow inside. His entire team was in chaos and rather than deal with it, it was just easier to let them go their own way.

Damian and Felicity had only met one time and what had happened afterwards had chilled him to the bone. It was the only time he’d ever truly lost his temper with the boy.

Felicity had come over to work on the Watchtower system and was under the console chattering merrily away when he walked in. He watched from the shadows as she and Damian interacted. The boy was perched birdlike on the desk, his eyes following her every move as she talked to him about what she was doing, programming and AI theory; about everything and anything under the sun. From a distance it was a pleasant little scene but something about the way he was watching her chilled him. He listened as Damian, in an almost sweet voice, asked Felicity if she would like some cocoa. Damian never did anything that he considered ‘servant’s work’ so it instantly put him on alert. Just as Felicity was about to reach for the cup, he stepped out of the shadows and called her over. He led her away and asked a few pointless questions about how the systems were coming along, he couldn’t even remember half the conversation now. When he was done he told her to go home and watched as she headed up to the manor before turning to the boy.

He led her away and asked a few pointless questions about how the systems were coming along, he couldn’t even remember half the conversation now. When he was done he told her to go home and watched as she headed up to the manor before turning to the boy.

The boy was almost pouting; a look of dissatisfaction had pulled his lips down in a frown. Bruce picked up the cup he had offered Felicity and sniffed it then handed it to his son.

“Drink,” he told him.

“Drink,” Bruce commanded.

“I don’t want it,” he told him.

“What did you put in the cup, Damian?”

Damian looked at the cup then back up to Bruce, “Nothing.”

Bruce gripped the cup in his fist and flung it at the wall. The child said nothing, just continued to stare at him with those dark cruel eyes so like his mother’s.

“Stay away from Felicity,” he told him in a growl. “You will not hurt her, do you understand?”

“Why does she matter?” Damian said dismissively then sneered. “Really Father, I was trying to do you a favor. You indulge these cattle you surround yourself with too much. She’s only a servant and she prattles too much. There she was, kneeling at my feet, thinking she could teach me—me! Frankly, she was acting far too above her station. Death by poison was really too good for--!”

Bruce gripped the front of his son’s shirt and snatched him up from his perch until he was looking him dead in the eye. “If anything happens to any of my people, if I find out you’ve tried to hurt anyone else on this team including Felicity and Alfred, there will be consequences.”

“You won’t kill me,” Damian said with a smirk despite the look of rage on his father’s face. “I’m your son.”

“Maybe not,” Bruce conceded, “but when I’m done you’ll wish I had.”

“Meaning?” He asked off-handedly but something in his eyes told Bruce that Damian was beginning to wonder if he hadn’t gone just a little too far this time.

He tightened his grip on his collar and shook him slightly, watching in grim satisfaction as the boy’s eyes grew wide and clenched his teeth together as he spoke in an almost feral snarl, “Meaning that if I feel you are completely beyond redemption I will see to it you spend the rest of your life heavily medicated and in a straightjacket, do I make myself clear?”

The smile was instantly wiped off his face and Damian responded sullenly, “Yes, Father.”

The next day Damian disappeared. He hadn’t even looked for him figuring he’d eventually turn up again but secretly praying he wouldn’t. When Damian returned after Felicity left…Bruce closed his eyes and tried to suppress the painful memories of his son again.

Meanwhile, Dick’s pulling away from the team had also affected his relationship with Barbara so they had gone out of town on a romantic getaway to try to figure things out. After much cajoling, Barbara had convinced him that Felicity could be trusted to run Watchtower from the cave alone. He hadn’t liked it, not one bit, especially not knowing when or if Damian would return, but his team had insisted.

The chaos that had entered his sanctuary had put him into overdrive and he’d been hitting the streets hard. They knew he’d go out alone if no one was there to monitor coms and, without someone monitoring the chatter, he’d be out there blind without any sort of back up. So, even though he vehemently expressed his discomfort at the plan, he went along with it.

Already an emotional basket case, living in such close proximity to Felicity had been a living hell for him. The littlest thing she did would send his thoughts in a tailspin. He tried hiding his reactions through gruff monosyllable speech and grim silence, but she had seen right through it. She spent the entire week living in the manor with him, cooking simple meals in the kitchen for them both, and running his coms by night. As the days and nights drew on he became more and more distracted by her: Felicity curled up in his study while he worked, not saying a word, just reading a book and bundled up in a fluffy afghan. Felicity laughing at him as he tried to figure out how to cook one of the meals Alfred had prepared and frozen for them before he’d left. Felicity’s sweet, soft chatter as she spoke to him through his ear piece as he leapt from one rooftop to another…

He closed his eyes for a moment as he allowed the pain to wash through him. He lost so much the day she left, the day he pushed her out of his life. Her name literally meant ‘joy’ and, for just a brief moment of time, that emotion had begun to creep into his cold, cold heart and it was all her doing.

For years he’d just thought of her as ‘Baby’, the little girl who would color him pictures and who Lucius would brag about in board meetings whenever someone asked how she was doing in school, and then one day that started to change. She grew up when he wasn’t expecting it. It threw him off, made him uncomfortable, so much so he’d almost managed to convince himself that the oddly protective and territorial feelings he’s started to develop towards her didn’t arise from a physical attraction but because of his friendship with Lucius.

He’d stepped in to help before, after all, although never with the other man’s knowledge. Lucius had told him of the incident that led to Luke nearly tearing the arm off a frat boy who had been practically stalking Felicity her freshman year at MIT. The boy, Sebastian Hady III (grandson of Sebastian Hady, one of the most corrupt mayors in Gotham history who had been on his list for a while) had been arrested for harassment and stalking, somehow managed to have the charges dropped due to his family’s shady connections and decided to get payback by suing them for damages he’d suffered due to his injuries. After hearing what this young man had intended to do to Felicity, the Bat paid the rich young punk a visit to convince him that it would be in his best interest to drop the matter and to stay off his radar from then on. Despite the intimidating appearance of Gotham’s vigilante in his path, money and a lifetime of privilege had convinced the little bastard that he was invincible and he arrogantly remarked that he was just trying to do the ‘little slut’ a favor so he cured him of his misconceptions by breaking his other arm in two places. At the time he’d told himself he was just looking out for the daughter of one of the few men he trusted but, deep inside, he knew that wasn’t it. Not really. If that had been the case he wouldn’t have brought her in to begin with…not that he’d meant to.

Barbara had been struggling for a way to improve the Watchtower Protocol for a while when Felicity published her article in Scientific American which was based on her doctoral thesis. The minute she read it she called him, sent him a copy, and asked him to look it over. Felicity, who had worked in the MIT Computer Science and AI Lab had come up with a theoretical AI program based on mobile applications and decryption technology she called LAIR, which would later be the basis of the new Watchtower program she and Barbara would go on to develop. It was, quite frankly, an evolutionary leap in the field of computer programming. Reading it convinced him to approach Fox on seeing if his daughter might be available to consult on some theoretical research he was working on as a, quote, ‘special project’; a code phrase they had developed by unspoken agreement for anything related to the Batman’s mission. None of them realized just how perceptive young Felicity Fox would prove to be until she fixed him with a steely eye and asked him outright that if she were to agree to build his supercomputer could she get a ride in the Batman’s tumbler?

He should have walked away from her then but she’d had that spark, that fire in her eyes that he’d seen in all of his young charges when he first encountered them. It wasn’t the same burning rage that drove him, or the overwhelming urge to prove themselves that Dick and Tim had. It wasn’t even the sense of justice that fueled Barbara to first take up the mantle of Batgirl only to lose the use of her legs and continue the fight as Oracle from behind a computer screen. No, with Felicity Smoak it was much simpler. For her it was simply a matter of right and wrong; if someone was hurting, you fixed it. If it’s the city that’s suffering, then you do what you can to bring justice to the streets and make it right again.

Felicity’s character was shaped by a painful childhood. Lucius Fox was a brilliant engineer and successful businessman and her mother, Evie, had been a beautiful and talented artist and they had a happy, if brief, marriage until she died of leukemia just shy of Felicity’s fourth birthday. As open-minded and liberal as the Gotham elite pretended to be, Lucius Fox was still a black man in a white man’s world and he was married to a platinum blonde bohemian artist with an illegitimate child who had ‘stolen’ a married man from his family.

Evie, and by extension Felicity, was most definitely given the cold shoulder at every opportunity. The same people who smiled in Lucius’s face and prided themselves on having the courage and liberal sensibilities it took to invite a black man to their dinner table saw Evelyn Fox as a conniving whore who attached herself to a married man just because he had money. It didn’t matter that she was a celebrated artist by then, all they saw was the Vegas cocktail waitress she’d been before her art career took off and that she wasn’t one of them. Felicity, even as a young child, had to endure the not so subtle whispers about Evie Smoak long after her death. She heard the words ‘bastard’ and ‘daughter of the whore’ from adults and her classmates and had taken it upon herself to shield her father from that pain. She isolated herself because of it, retreating into a quiet, almost non-existent presence within Gotham society but she never let him see how much she truly resented the mother she could barely remember and who he would love with an enduring passion for the rest of his life. She was his champion, even as a child, and she endured it unflinchingly.

The other things that shaped and defined her were her kindness, empathy, and willingness to forgive. If you asked Lucius where those qualities came from he’d say it was Evie’s final gift that taught both of them that lesson. Tanya, his first wife, had begged him to slow down, to spend time with her and their children. She’d even left him just to wake him up and get his attention and then he met another woman and completely changed. For years, he’d neglected his family but he was willing to shower a woman half his age and a child that wasn’t even his with all of the love and consideration he’d failed to show her. Understandably Tanya had been devastated and there had been a backlash against what Gotham society viewed as a rich man’s trophy marriage. After Evie passed and he’d finally understood what Tanya had gone through, their relationship greatly improved. Tanya, much to her credit, accepted his apology and never appeared to hold any hard feelings against the child of the woman her husband had fallen in love with. They became the best of friends and co-parents, even reconciling to a certain extent but never remarrying, and raised all of the children as full siblings. Felicity spent just as much time in his ex-wife’s care as his children did in his own. Tanya and Lucius were often praised by their contemporaries as having one of the most amicable relationships between exes they’d ever been witness to. Lucius often said it was the only good thing to come from his wife’s death.

Felicity may not have been his biological daughter but she had inherited that aura of integrity Lucius had around him. Bruce had felt it at that moment and he knew that she, just like her father, could be trusted with his secret. He and Lucius had never openly discussed his mission or Felicity’s involvement and he had never pressed the issue but he suspected that the older man knew she was doing a bit more than simply consulting. He’d hinted, only once. He’d said to him one day when they were alone in his office, apropos to nothing, “She’s all I have left of Evie, Bruce. Keep her safe.” And he did, he’d tried.

Unlike his other adopted ‘children’, Bruce had not tried to put her out in the streets. Even when she asked he refused to train her or to allow Dick to encourage her tentative inquiries into how he and Barbara had joined him in his mission. Felicity was only to be on the Watchtower Project, nothing more. She had access to the Batcave, knew all of their secrets and then some, but she was never to be in the line of fire. He’d even tried to see her as one of his charges, if not as a daughter then as a niece, but…

Bruce sighed as the memories he’d try to suppress came to the forefront. It shouldn’t have happened. It was a mistake, one he still regretted. He was almost twice her age, already in his mid-thirties, a grown man with a lifetime of experiences she couldn’t possibly understand. It didn’t matter that she’d graduated college and successfully defended her thesis in one of the most prestigious doctorate programs in the country; to him she should have been a child. He’d known her since she was practically a baby and his experiences had hardened him, aged him beyond his years, and she was 19 years old and sheltered to the point that she had never even been kissed.

Felicity had always gotten under his skin and brought out his most protective instincts. She was always with Lucius, always playing in his office, so he’d seen her grow up. Add to that the fact that she had been painfully shy as a child and awkward as a teenager, she slipped under his radar until it was too late. Somehow he’d missed the fact that she was just as haunting a beauty as her mother ever was until one day he looked at her and was struck dumb by it. That’s when he stopped thinking of her as Lucius’s daughter and as a woman. Between that, her intelligence, and her fresh-faced innocence, she would prove to be his utter undoing.

It wasn’t just him though; over the year or so that she spent working by their sides in between her graduate studies and other obligations, his entire family fell under her spell. Barbara had taken her in under her wing as they bonded over developing the communication and decryption software that helped run Watchtower. Dick, who’d always carried within himself a bit of an inferiority complex, found her to be a kindred soul. Here was someone even more socially awkward than himself, who felt just as displaced as he did growing up as a child of humble roots adopted into vast wealth, and who looked up to him with a bit of hero worship. Tim got along with everyone and their closeness in age combined with his infatuation with her sister made him even more welcoming toward her. Alfred was simply delighted to have one charge under his wing that could be spared the scars of Batman’s mantle while still helping to shoulder their burden. He saw her as a source of light chasing away the shadows that haunted the rest of them. He’d even tried to play matchmaker a few times, dropping hints about Bruce’s own parent’s May/December romance when he’d caught his gaze lingering a few times.

Damian had been the only exception. He, unlike the rest of them, had been completely immune to her gentle charisma. In fact, he had a murderous umbrage toward her that Bruce had yet to understand. It took him days to decide to eliminate Tim as a rival but he tried to kill Felicity within the first hour or so of their meeting. How he saw her as the greater threat when Bruce hadn’t even been in the room until the very end he still didn’t know. Perhaps it really was just that Felicity had tried to be kind to the boy. For whatever reason, it was visceral; an almost instinctual hatred toward her. Even after she left it had been there. He never mentioned her name or her absence until the day he taunted Tim about taking his place as the new Robin. In addition to making disparaging remarks about the other young man’s skills and sexuality, he brought up Felicity’s name in a less than flattering context. Tim, in response, had given him the beat down the boy so richly deserved.

He had frozen up and let it happen because there was nothing else he could do. The truth was, as the filth about Felicity poured from his mouth, he’d been so tempted to do what Tim had done he’d been horrified. He’d had to leave the room; he just couldn’t deal with it. The boy was a sociopath and a killer, but he was still a child and Bruce’s first instinct had been to...

He sighed, Tim left after that and he couldn’t blame him. He let him go thinking he’d be better off. Hell, in the end he wound up foisting Damian off on Dick because he was the only one who had the patience to deal with him. Had he continued to try to take over Damian’s training he was afraid that eventually he would lose control like Tim had and the consequences of that just wasn’t something he was prepared to deal with.

After that there had been an accident in which he had lost several months’ time with absolutely no memory of what had transpired. He had been hunting a man named Roman Sionis, aka The Black Mask, when he encountered a strange machine in the madman’s ‘collection’ known as ‘The Omega Device’. They were struggling when he fell against the device, damaging it, and then simply disappeared. Everyone presumed he’d been killed, vaporized; everyone except Tim, that is. As much as he had disappointed the boy, Tim was always his most devoted child, the only one he actually ever considered to be his son. It was Tim’s insistence that he was still alive that convinced Dick and Alfred to hide his ‘demise’ from the general public. Instead he was reportedly ‘traveling’ and concentrating on his Foundation work for a while. Not even Lucius was told the truth. Tim took the reins at Wayne Enterprises with Dick stepping into the office when necessary. He found him months later with no recollection of what had happened to him other than a few confusing and disjointed memories and hallucinations that he had never been able to make sense of. He remembered being part of a primitive tribe, of going back to meet his ancestors, even of aliens and alien landscapes where he encountered people who were parallel versions of their true selves.

Tim wound up tracking him down after he’d been discovered unconscious and lying in a pile of garbage near Arkham with drugs in his system and no clue how he got there or who had been holding him. Whatever had happened, he appeared none the worse for wear after the drugs left his system other than a bit of dehydration, some cuts, a few new and unexplained scars, and some minor burns. He’d probably never know what had happened even though he’d tried to find out. He hadn’t been held for ransom and no one had any clue as to why anyone would take him then just release him again. Sionis himself could offer no clues as he’d been killed by another member of the Bat’s Rogue’s Gallery before Bruce had been recovered. The device itself had also disappeared.

According to his sources, it and all the other items in Sionis’s possession had been confiscated by ARGUS and destroyed. When he returned he tried to reconnect with Damian and, for a short time he thought he might have actually succeeded, but then he died.

All that time lost. Damian had been dead for almost two years and he still felt like a failure. He even failed Tim in the end. After all the hard work he’d done getting him back, after all the loyalty he’d shown, when Bruce shut down after Damian’s death he had taken it to heart and left. The loss of Tim’s respect had hit him almost as hard as Damian’s death had. Going after Felicity after all that would have been unfair to her. He’d thought about it, God knows it had crossed his mind several times over the last four years, but she couldn’t have fixed him. He’d driven everyone but Barbara away in his grief and had he done that to Felicity it would have been the final blow to his already fragile psyche.

His mind flew back to how he’d catch himself looking at her, watching her as she worked and of the feelings of guilt and disgust with his own lechery that would overwhelm him. He was technically old enough to be her father, for God’s sake! To combat his attraction to her he redoubled his efforts to find Selina, convincing himself that it was just loneliness on his part. He began to use his failed relationship with the former Catwoman as a shield, putting her forward whenever she seemed to get too close. He tried to warn her off with gruff speech and a sour disposition but she always seemed to see right through it. He’d finally settled on a strategy of just ignoring her but having her in the cave manning Watchtower made that impossible.

He’d gone out on patrol that night just to get away from her and purposefully stuck to the least active sections of the city to minimize his chances of having to interact with her when he ran into trouble. One of his targets had hired some kind of meta-human swordsman to take him out. The battle had been brief and he’d managed to survive the assault with just a deep cut to the arm (despite being protected by state of the art Kevlar armor) by forcing the other man off the rooftop where he dropped nearly 20 stories only to disappear by the time he’d gotten to when he thought the body had landed.

When he got to the Cave, Felicity was there. Normally Alfred handled his injuries or he’d suture them himself, but the cut was deep and at an awkward angle on his bicep so he’d agreed to let Felicity treat it for him.

He could never decide whether it was him coming off of the adrenaline rush or the loss of blood that caused his resistance to waver that night. The only thing he knew for sure was that it had been his fault, a fact that would haunt him for years. She’d been innocent in that as well.
Felicity, despite being at an age where most girls had some awareness of their sexuality, wouldn’t have even known how to seduce him. Even if she had, it wouldn’t have been over blood and bandages while dressed in a ratty sweater, t-shirt, and blue jeans, her fresh faced beauty unenhanced by cosmetics. He’d known she had a crush on him for some time; it had been fairly obvious. Whenever she’d talk to him she’d just shine, her smile taking on a brilliance that was nearly blinding in its intensity. So much so, that it even caused his dark heart to lighten when she would enter the room and, if he were honest, it scared the shit out of him.

“Oh crap! Your arm!” She cried out as she jumped up from the console to rush over to him with a towel in her hand. She slapped it over his wound and winced as he gave a low grunt of pain. “Sorry—sorry! Ow, that looks nasty. I’ll go get the first aid kit.”

“Are you sure?” She asked uncertainly, “’Cause it’s kind of deep and you’d have to be pretty bendy to reach it. Not that you aren’t bendy,” she said quickly. “I mean, I’ve watched you work out and do all those flips and stuff. You’re bendy, just not as bendy as Dick. Not that Dick is better than you even though he’s younger.” She winced, still trailing behind him. “Crap, no. You’re not old! I didn’t mean to imply that you were old because you’re not old, just less bendy. I like how old you are. You aren’t old as much as you are well seasoned, like a really great kind of seasoned. Like a really well seasoned man-steak. Mouthwatering really…” She trailed off and bit her lip as he shot her a dark look. “I’ll just stand here quietly while you do that thing you do…all bendy and stuff.”

Bruce stripped off boots and socks followed by his armor until his torso and legs were bare before sitting on the cot in the medbay and began to clean the wound. What he really needed was a shower but the cut took priority over his desire to remove the sweat and dried blood from his flesh. Unashamed, he sat in nothing but his boxer briefs so he could assess all the damage he had taken on in the fight. He glanced up at Felicity who was now beet red with embarrassment at being so close to him in such an unclothed state and promptly dismissed her reaction. In fact, it was probably a good thing he’d made her uncomfortable, maybe now she’d leave him to his ministrations in peace. He looked at the bruises on his shins, thighs, and ran a hand over the sore spot on his jaw. The armor had done its job there at least. Some arnica and high doses of vitamin E would help with that but his torso and upper arm were a different matter entirely.

He grunted again in discomfort as he attempted to treat the laceration with his good arm. His side was a mass of bruises from the blows the swordsman had managed to land after he’d been disarmed. He’d been a strong son of a bitch and even though his armor had protected his ribs from being broken they were still badly bruised. They’d have to be wrapped before he could attempt to give himself stitches.

As if reading his mind, Felicity took off her sweater and rolled up the sleeves of her long sleeved tee, grabbing the elastic bandages from Alfred’s kit. “I could help wrap your ribs if you want? And I think Alfred has some of that glue he uses to hold together lacerations. Really, I think it needs proper stitches because the glue can leave a nasty scar but you’ve already got plenty of those so it’s not like it’ll make a difference, right? Not that you don’t look good.” She added quickly. Her eyes wandered over his bare chest and he watched as her eyes darkened slightly. “Really, really good.” She closed her eyes as soon as she realized what she had said and bit her bottom lip. “Oh man, that sounded creepy, didn’t it? Sorry. Just, I mean, you’re not horribly disfigured or anything! Scars can be attractive, lots of people like scars! In fact, there are indigenous tribes throughout Africa who use scarification rituals as a way to enhance—”

Despite himself, Bruce was a little impressed by the fact that she hadn’t backed down after her initial embarrassment followed by rambling babble. He felt the corners of his lips twitch upwards in amusement. She really was adorable. “It’s fine, really. Go ahead and start wrapping my ribs and then you can help dress the wound on my arm.”

Her face lit up and she clutched the roll of bandages to her chest like he’d just handed her a prize. “Really?”

“Just do it,” he sighed, his lips twitching upwards despite himself, and held out his arms so she could start binding his ribcage.

She focused on her task, her tongue trapped between her teeth as she reached her arms around him. Her loose white-blond curls brushed against his face as she carefully administered to him and his nostrils filled with the heady scent of her shampoo and the light floral fragrance she wore. After she had secured the bandages with a clip, she reached for the disinfectant to treat his arm. Her hands were gentle as they handled him, an apology for the sting on her lips before she’d even applied it to his flesh. When she finally touched him again with those delicate hands, he stiffened. She bit her lip, worrying the plump flesh, and he felt his ardor rise as cornflower blue eyes, unfettered by glasses, flooded with sympathy for his discomfort. He missed her glasses; it had been easier to pretend not to see the looks she saved only for him when she wore the thick dark frames. Without them, her sweet expressions were excruciating.

He was used to pain, the small sting of the alcohol and betadine a mere nuisance for him. No, the real torture was her: her smell, her touch. She didn’t seem to see the man others feared, only a man worthy of her kindness and attention. Bruce had been without such unconditional love for so long he’d almost forgotten what it felt like. If he’d had any faith at all in what he considered the pseudo-science of psychiatry he was sure there would be some sort of nonsense about his mother that would come into play. Probably something along the lines of a craving for maternal affection transforming itself into sexual desire, but that wasn’t it. There was no Oedipal Complex at play here, it was just her.

He closed his eyes and willed her to get on with it, trying desperately not to alert her to what he was feeling as she applied the suture gel onto the wound and carefully held the torn skin together until the glue had set. When it was done and she had checked for seepage she whispered, “I know that hurt but at least it was better than me trying to sew you up, right? I can’t even sew on a button much less fix an arm.” She smiled at him then, her lips soft as the love poured from her eyes and into his own.

Where did eyes that color even come from? He thought. He cleared his throat, dismissing the randomness of the observation from his mind. “Gauze.”

“What?” She asked in confusion as she concentrated on cleaning all the blood up from around the wound she had just repaired.

“For the cut; gauze—to cover the wound.”

“It’s okay,” Bruce said quietly, averting his gaze to the banks of monitors on the far side of the cave. She gathered her supplies then plopped down beside him on the cot and wrapped the wound quickly before taping it off. “There! How’s that look?”

He turned his head and examined the bandage thoroughly. “Looks good.” He looked up, realizing just how close they had gotten.
She smiled back gratefully, completely oblivious to his licentious thoughts, proud to have earned the praise of a broken man who was far too old for her, and far to hardened to be anywhere near something as pure as herself.

There was no conscious thought, no internal debate, no hesitant look followed by her silent approval. He wasn’t some fresh-faced boy who dithered over what he could and couldn’t have at that moment. No, she was the innocent, not him. He was battle-hardened, scarred, and too far gone at that point. All thoughts of common decency, of the disproportionate age gap, of the fact that this was the youngest child of one of the few men whose trust he actually valued, disappeared and he acted.

He reached for her, pulling her body flush with his own as he claimed her mouth. It was hard and almost punishing, not the kind of kiss one uses when seducing a virgin. He met her confused resistance and he plowed through. He ran his tongue over her closed lips and when she gasped he opened her up and devoured her. He cupped her head in one hand, his fingers sinking deep into her light blonde hair, tugging and allowing the silken strands to wrap around his calloused fingers.

He laid her backwards gently as he covered her tiny frame with his own, his mouth never releasing possession. The hand at her waist moved upwards to cup her breast through her thin shirt. She whimpered and the sound ripped through him causing him to lose what little sense of restraint he still had.

He pulled away from the kiss to pull the shirt up over her head then unfastened the hooks of her bra and discarded it. He kissed the pale mounds of flesh each in turn, teasing her nipples with his tongue and teeth as his fingers found the fastening of her jeans. He pulled them down without ceremony along with the plain white panties she wore, breaking away just long enough to snatch the penny-loafers from her feet so he could let the last of her clothing drop to the floor. Bruce held back for just a moment to look at her, his angel, her hair a mussed halo of light around her head, and her body flushed with newly awakened desire. He slanted his lips over hers again, pulling his underwear down just enough to free his erection then hitching her thighs up around him so he could grind his hips into her center.

She gasped, both hands pushing at his chest as she felt the sting of him against her. Bruce could feel her heart pounding against his chest in pain and fear. He pulled away from her slightly, jaw clenching as he forced himself to remain still against her even though the only thing he could think about was sinking into her over and over again until he drove out all of his demons. In all his years, among the dozens of women who’d shared his bed, he’d never taken a virgin. He’d avoided it. Virgins were complicated. Virgins made love; they didn’t just screw and leave. Again he felt the flutter of apprehension in the pit of his stomach. This is wrong, stop while you can, the voice in the back of his mind ordered but he didn’t want to stop. He was too far gone, too close. Even though he knew this would not end well, he wanted this, wanted her. He’d already had a taste of her and he would have rather faced an army with his bare hands than stop at that moment.

He watched as fear and uncertainty battled with newly awakened desire in her reflective depths and, had he been a better man, he would have done the right thing and sent her away so she could save her innocence for someone more deserving. He should have told her to wait for someone who would speak words that no longer held meaning for him, who would place a ring on her finger, fill her with his children, and live an uncomplicated life far away from the ugliness that surrounded his own. Her first time shouldn’t be on a gurney with a bloody and bruised man, stinking of sweat, his soul as scarred as his body, too filled with lust to see to it she was properly prepared before he first pressed his way inside. He should have told her to gather her clothes and never look back. “Tell me,” he commanded his eyes dark and almost hypnotic as he willed her to answer in the way he knew would bring them both to completion, “Yes or no?”

“Yes,” she said softly and he nearly growled in triumph as he claimed her mouth once again.

His rough fingers reached down through the thin curling strands of nearly translucent silk that did nothing to hide her from his gaze as his mouth claimed her tight pink nipple again. She panted roughly as he licked and sucked at her breast, his teeth scraping until she was half undone by the near painful sensations being awoken within her. He slid his fingers up and down, barely skimming the cluster of nerves that would ensure her readiness for him as he sucked hard at first her right nipple then the left. Her movements beneath him became more frantic. He took her mouth, whispering against her open lips, “That’s right, Baby. Come undone for me. Show me.” He gathered moisture from her center and found her clit.

She bucked underneath him crying out, her eyes opening wide as she opened herself up to the sensation of being made love to. He looked up into the stark wonder of her face and something dark began to curl in his belly. “Have you ever touched yourself, Baby? Here?” His finger swept over the sensitive bundle of nerves and he chuckled as her eyes slammed shut and she moaned wantonly under his touch. “What do you think about when you touch yourself? Tell me?”

“You,” she breathed and he felt his cock jump at the admission.

He took her mouth in an almost brutal kiss as his fingers increased the friction on her clit. He swallowed her cries as she orgasmed, a flood of moisture making his fingers slick. She shuddered and writhed in release beneath him. Releasing her mouth, he pressed their foreheads together as they both gasped for air. “Jesus,” he panted, “you are so beautiful. You have no idea do you; no idea just how goddamn beautiful you are?”

She tilted her mouth upward, her lips meeting his in a soft kiss. He moved his lips to coast along her jawline before making his way across her chest and down her waist. He eased off the cot and stripped off his underwear then took a moment to gaze at her most intimate and exposed self. His eyes caught hers and the dark desire he saw there was nearly his undoing. He bent at the waist, pulling her thighs apart, and swept his tongue over her folds, wet and glistening under the florescent lights from her orgasm. His senses filled with the taste of warm musk as she cried out, whimpered, and panted through the sweet torture he was now administering.

He brought a finger into her opening and carefully probed her as he licked and sucked at the sensitive bundle of fibers above. God, she was tight. He continued to explore her as he came up with a game plan. He wasn’t the kind of man who felt the need to compare the size of his dick with other men in order to prove himself but he knew he was fairly large and that this wouldn’t be easy for her. He’d have to take this slowly. He added a second finger and she hissed, stiffening not in pleasure but in discomfort. He eased back up the cot, his fingers still buried within her, and he kissed her softly in apology. “I know, Baby. I know it hurts but we’re going to take this slow, okay? Tell me when.”

Slowly her muscles began to loosen and he began to gently probe her once more. She winced slightly but he continued to soothe her with soft kisses and gentle words until she was again moving her hips to the rhythm he set for her, brushing her clit with his thumb to bring her added pleasure. After a while he added a third finger and repeated the process, careful not to tear or bruise her, until his hand was again slick with her juices. When she felt she was ready, he removed his hand from between her thighs and settled himself until he was in contact with the now vacant space. He rubbed himself up and down, gathering her moisture for lubrication before easing forward.

Her fingers gripped his shoulders painfully and he winced as she put pressure too close to the wound on his arm. “It’s okay; I won’t go further until you’re ready. We have all the time in the world.” He reached up, easing her hands downward until they grabbed his hips and kissed her once more. He waited until the pressure of her grip loosened and again pressed forward, repeating the process inch by inch until the final barrier was passed and he was finally seated fully within her.

For a moment, they just breathed. He stopped, allowing his heartbeat to calm. He closed his eyes, resting his forehead against her shoulder as he calmed the beast within him that wanted to simply take that which he now knew belonged to him and him alone. He could hear the low hum of the computers, the fluttering of wings in the shadows of the cave, the uneven tempo of her breathing. Slowly he began rocking his hips, in and out, his thrusts gradually deepening until she was gasping more from pleasure than pain. His jaw clenched as he felt himself being squeezed within her walls, the sensation almost overwhelming. He tried to keep himself centered, tried to hold off the rush of his own release, but it quickly became apparent that he would not last long enough to give her the full measure of her first experience he had desired to. That would have to come later.

He increased his strokes, pushing deeper and deeper, his mouth open in a silent cry as the blood rushed to his head and he unleashed within her. She cried out as well, in pleasure and feminine triumph if not orgasm, and he shuddered until he was fully spent.

He eased onto his good shoulder, pulling out of her as he drew her into his embrace. He felt her sob against him, overwhelmed by everything they had done and felt together.

“Are you okay?” He asked softly, kissing the top of her head, the guilt and self-recriminations already coming to bear. What had he done? Christ, what the hell had he been thinking? He was way too old for this shit and she was far too young for him. He looked down at her tears and swallowed, the first flares of panic erupting in his chest. Shit, what if he’d hurt her more than he realized? “Baby? Answer me; are you okay?”

She nodded against his chest, her breath hitching as she spoke in a small voice, “I’m good, you?”

His head tilted back and hit the padding of the gurney as he snorted in relief. He lifted his head smiled down at her, a rare and beauteous thing. “Oh, I think I’ll live.” He took a deep shuddering breath and pulled her tighter against him. “You are going to be the death of me, you know that? You snuck in under my radar and now what the hell am I supposed to do?”

She smiled, a small sad little smile, and in a voice that was hardly more than a whisper she told him, “I love you.”

There was something in her smile; something in the way she said those words that nearly broke him. He could see it; the knowledge that this was probably a one off that would never be repeated again, the recognition of the fact that he could never be hers but knowing that this was the last chance she probably had to tell him that she was his. More than anything he wanted to take that sad realization from her eyes and spend the rest of his life making sure she never had to feel that way ever again; so much so that he was tempted to say the words back to her even though they had long lost any meaning to him. He wanted that, but he knew it could never happen. He was no longer capable of that kind of life with anyone. He wouldn’t compound his sins by lying to her. If he still had a heart that could break, then that was the moment it would have chosen to shatter into a million pieces. He would not be able to fix this and they both knew it.

His heart clenched and he dropped a kiss against her forehead before getting off the table to walk over to the sink. He wet a towel and washed off his genitals before wringing out a wash cloth and taking it over to her. He patted her thighs to indicate that she should spread her legs. She blushed, but obeyed, and he carefully cleaned her wiping the blood and semen from her center before tossing it into a nearby hamper and offering her his hand. “Come on, get up.”
“Where are we going?” She asked.

“Upstairs,” he told her with an upturn of his lips. He might not be able to give her forever but he’d give her what he could for the brief time they had left. “We need to take a shower and, call me old fashioned, but there are some things that I would prefer to do in the comfort of my own bed.”

“I don’t mind.” Felicity said shyly as she reached down for her shirt to hold it against her naked breasts.

He chuckled and smoothed his hands over her goose-pimpled flesh. He leaned down to whisper in her ear, “Oh, but Baby, think of how much fun it will be without a cold draft and warm sheets?”

They made love all weekend; glorious, passionate love that made him feel young again or, at the very least, his true age and not the unfathomable decades the responsibilities placed upon him had added to the thirty-six years he’d already spent upon this planet. He allowed himself to let go of the tight control he normally maintained in every aspect of his life so that he could experience everything through her eyes. He let go of his pain, his regret, and his anger for her. It wasn’t those three words, but it was still just as meaningful in its own way.

They spent days in his bed leaving only to scavenge for food or to use the bathroom. He taught her all the ways he knew how to make love; in his bed, on the floor, in the shower. The one thing he denied her was, in fact, those three words; the very words she so wholeheartedly gave him. Every time she’d whisper them to him when his eyes were closed or when she thought his attention was elsewhere his heart would clench and he became even more determined to leave her with the best memory he could of their time together.

Thinking back on it now, he wondered if he’d done that for himself as well. He’d loved women, many women; some with a passion that bordered on true love, but she was different. Felicity was pure light, the only light he had ever felt in his entire existence it seemed. It was as though she shone from the inside and everything became clearer in her presence; emotions, thoughts… He became a better man, a better version of himself around her, and he was loathe to let that go. There were days to come where the only thing that kept him going was the memory of those words and the taste of her lips on his.

On the last night of their stolen weekend together, everything changed. He opened a drawer and seen the box of unopened condoms there and realized that he hadn’t even thought to protect her. How that had happened he had no idea. It was as though all good sense had abandoned him and he was faced with the possibility that he might have forced her into an impossible situation because of his thoughtlessness. He went to her to discuss the situation and she assured him that she had been on the pill since she was fifteen in order to regulate her cycle and that they had nothing to worry about. To his surprise he’d almost been disappointed by that revelation. That had shocked him but he chalked it up to low blood sugar or some primitive instinct that had merely crept up from his subconscious and was just as quickly dismissed. Later as he held her close, sleep pulling at him and causing his mind to wander to places it had no business going, he thought about days yet to come, of the possibilities and outcomes that he knew lay within her own innocent dreams. He dreamt of giving her the life he could never have, the family he had never wanted, and when he woke up he knew that their brief respite had come to a close.

On Monday morning he explained to her in a detached voice that he couldn’t give her the kind of relationship she deserved. He told her that whatever the weekend had meant to her, for him it was just sex and she had just been a warm body to lose himself in for a while. He couldn’t do commitment and marriage because it wasn’t possible. Not for him. He told her he did not love her but that he had enjoyed their moment. He assured her she would be welcome to remain on the team, but they could not remain lovers.

Part of him thought she’d plead with him, beg him to reconsider. He expected tears, but was surprised and then somewhat relieved when she calmly nodded in acceptance. She thanked him for his honesty, assured him that she could make her own way home, and he left her to use his shower and get dressed but not before making sure she had adequate cab fare home. He didn’t try to kiss her goodbye. At the time he’d wanted to do the honorable thing, make a clean break and not play with her emotions by sending mixed signals, but later he’d come to regret that decision. He should have kissed her just one more time. When she didn’t come back to the cave…

He should have kissed her.

The first few days after she left he was able to completely expunge her from his thoughts or at least pretend to. They had both entered into the situation with eyes wide open, the itch had been scratched, and now it was over he kept reminding himself whenever his thoughts would wander in her direction. The fact that she had been a virgin or that she thought she was in love with him was irrelevant. He had his mission and the mission was where his focus had to remain. She would only have been a distraction. To remind himself of that, when his team returned he worked them hard, determined to make up for the days he’d lost as he held her in his arms.

By Wednesday night, while staring over his city, he realized that he shouldn’t have been so harsh with her. After all, she seemed to handle their encounter rather maturely. And besides, this was Felicity and not some innocent little run of the mill teenager. She was brilliant and, although she was young, she was more poised than women twice her age would have been under the circumstances. Perhaps, just perhaps, there could develop something between them. Yes, there was a not so insignificant age gap but he was incredibly fit due to his nightly activities and still a relatively young man. They wouldn’t look ridiculous together and if anyone could handle the rigors of his double life it was her. Perhaps he had acted too hastily.

By Thursday he had left her several messages that had gone unanswered. He began to worry then. His mind began to tumble between guilt and jealousy. Perhaps she had already moved on. At her age the idea of sex without commitment or emotional fallout had become the new normal. He thought of the look in her eyes that first time, her acceptance of what was happening between them, and wondered if another man had already caught her attention. He quickly discarded the notion but the thought still lingered. Someday, sooner rather than later, there would be another man, a man who would say the words he couldn’t. Felicity was a beautiful woman, she wouldn’t be alone long. He became short tempered and snappish with his team and even more distracted.

Finally, on Friday afternoon, he bit the bullet and went to see Lucius to do the right thing and state his intentions before pursuing anything further. If Barbara knew what he was about to do she would have slapped him upside the head and called him all kinds of stupid, and she was right; he was an idiot, but that didn’t make him wrong. He’d decided sometime during the day as he bounced between feeling completely lost and distracted, to falling into a temper rarely seen outside of cape and cowl, that he would just cut through all the nonsense and marry her.

As completely insane as it was to think about it now, at the time it had sounded reasonable. He was at the right age for marriage. Forty was creeping up on him and he was getting too old to pull off the playboy routine without seeming pathetic. There would be no more rumors to deal with, no more having to explain his quick exits to whatever woman was hanging off his arm. Felicity was smart; she could help him both in the boardroom as well as on his mission. She was, after all, the daughter of Lucius Fox and although she had always seemed uninterested in the business side of the technology field he was sure she’d step up to the plate and learn what she needed to. As Mrs. Wayne she could represent him at all the inconveniently scheduled meetings he now had to miss when mission business came up, attend the endless scores of society parties on his arm and then stay and offer a distraction as he slipped off into the shadows. Also she was young enough that they could wait a few years to start a family. Although fatherhood was not something he had necessarily ever wanted, she deserved to have children and he’d make adjustments for it if he absolutely had to. After all, it was the least he could do.

Already his body was showing the strain of his nightly activities and, in a few years, he’d have to turn the mission over to Dick or Tim or some other younger man and then he could devote himself to raising a family upstairs while he trained a new generation of guardians below. He might even expand his mission globally. He’d been thinking on that for a while and Felicity could use her technical skills to help make that happen. This wouldn’t be a marriage based on hormones or the ridiculous concept of romantic love; no, they were better than that. She was an intelligent woman and once he laid it all out before her she’d see that. Besides, he did care about her deeply and they were sexually compatible; their union would be a happy one, he’d see to that. Now all he had to do was actually get her to talk to him. He walked into Lucius’s office with that singular plan in mind and determination in his step.

A little past midnight on Saturday, one week after he’d made love for the first time to the woman he’d decided to make his wife, he was sitting on a rooftop overlooking the city, cape and cowl in place once again. Felicity had accepted a job offer in Starling City that she had been considering for some time and had left earlier in the week to scout for apartments. Lucius had been proud of her, proud that she wanted to do it on her own and without his interference. The only person at the company aware of the connection was his friend, Walter Steele, who assured him he would merely look out for her as one concerned parent to another and he would allow her to succeed or fail without his intervention. There was nothing hidden or guarded in the other man’s speech so Bruce had accepted his story that this was not a sudden move for her and that it was a decision she had made long before he took her into his bed.

He should have kissed her, was the one thought that kept chasing him that night. He thought he behaved the way he had for her sake but that wasn’t true. He had been so worried about hurting her feelings, of making her feel as though he’d taken something from her under false pretenses, that he’d never stopped to think that perhaps he’d be the one in pain when all was said and done. The truth was that if he had kissed her, if he had shown the slightest bit of tenderness toward her that morning, he wouldn’t have been able to let her go.

The hardest part was when he realized that while he had wasted a week wrestling with all that in his head, she had already moved on.

For the next six months after she left town, his family had to deal with a Batman in the foulest mood they had ever seen him in since Selina had left almost two years previously.

Bruce rarely drank. He hated the loss of control that came with overindulgence, but as he sipped the glass of twelve year old Purcell’s Single Barrel Straight Bourbon held within his hand he appreciated the warm burn of it as it slid down his throat. It was the only liquor he ever drank and then only rarely. The American whiskey wasn’t as trendy or refined as the more popular single malt imported scotches but it he had been his father’s drink of choice. In the last several years he’d only tasted it four times, this being the fifth; once for Jason, once for Stephanie, once for Damian, and now twice for Felicity. That hurting her equaled the pain he’d felt at the loss of one of his ‘children’ was something he chose not to examine too closely.

He let the notes of hickory, caramelized sugar, and fruity bites of cinnamon and cherries roll over his tongue as he thought of how he’d treated her and of the fact that he had no right to interfere in her life. He left her alone for a reason but this was different. This wasn’t him going to rekindle a love affair; this was her life at stake. He’d changed and so had she. She was no longer the 19 year old girl whose innocence he had taken so long ago. She was an adult with her own life and a successful career. For all he knew she and Queen could be sharing a bed together, her memories of him merely a novelty to be trotted out occasionally. Perhaps it was Felicity who sought the Arrow out instead? Perhaps she had traded one broken vigilante in for a newer model? Maybe Queen was his replacement: A younger, faster, newer city guardian who, if caught in the same position, wouldn’t be afraid to look like a walking talking midlife crisis with a sweet faced blonde on his arm. Perhaps he had already given her those words he couldn’t and had actually meant them.

He emptied his glass and sat it down on the tray table, waving off the attendant as she offered him another. One was his limit.

He needed to keep a clear head because, even if all that was true and more, Felicity was in danger; whatever the case, whether this life was something she had chosen for herself or not, the Arrow had put her in the line of fire and that was unacceptable. Not only that but he allowed his trash to muck around in his city and that would not, could not stand.
Felicity had spent most of Thursday trying to figure out how she could head Bruce off at the pass. She wasn’t worried about the hit; she didn’t even see it as something to alert the team to. She’d dismissed it as a non-issue after only a few minutes of internal debate and realized that if she told Oliver or Diggle about it then it would take them too off-mission. It couldn’t have been Blood or Slade; if they wanted her dead they could have killed her several dozen times over by now and they wouldn’t have hired anyone to do it, that wasn’t their style. No, she knew exactly who had ordered it, the timing was too coincidental for it to be anyone else, and she was dead.

Moira.

Even from the grave that woman had a way of messing with her entire week.

She sighed, staring at her monitor but not seeing a damn thing. If it was Moira then telling Oliver would just add more pain to what he already had to endure. Merlyn, his son, now this? No, she couldn’t put him through that again, and if she was wrong then she’d been a sitting duck for a year and a half and she was still there. Between that, the fact that the hit had been canceled, and Moira Queen’s tombstone, she figured there was at least a 98% chance she was in the clear and she was willing to take those odds.

With that out of the way the only thing she had left to worry about was Bruce.

It was so weird, she thought. She’d left Gotham more than four years ago and Bruce hadn’t so much as bothered to call her but now, at least according to Barb, he was rushing down here to protect her from some perceived threat. A bullshit threat at that. Perhaps some women in her position would feel flattered by the thought of the dark brooding hero rushing to the side of the woman he had long ago left behind but she was just really, really ticked off.

So what if she’d had a crush on him for most of her life? So what if he was the first man, the only man, she’d shared her bed with so far? Yeah, it was good and all but he hurt her in the cruelest way possible in the end. She didn’t expect him to fall on his knees and declare his undying love but he could have treated her with the same courtesy he would show to the guy delivering their pizza! She hadn’t known what to expect but it hadn’t been him standing over her fully dressed, his expression hard and closed off, as he woke her up to tell her that this weekend had been a mistake and he couldn’t afford to have her distract him from the mission. He then politely and coolly asked her to get dressed and told her that if she didn’t feel up to letting him take her home that he had left cab fare on the nightstand.

Cab fare. On the nightstand. Plus enough for a tip—for her or the cabbie, he didn’t say, but that’s sure as hell how it felt at the time. God, she’d felt so dirty. Afterwards she’d muttered a few words, too numb to come up with anything witty or spontaneous, gathered her things, and cried in the shower until long after his car had pulled out of the drive.

After she got up and threw on her clothes all she wanted to do was be as far away from Bruce as possible but she couldn’t do that in Gotham; not when half the buildings had his name on them including the one she lived in. Lucius had been encouraging her for months to accept the job at Queen Consolidated his friend, Walter Steele, had offered her. She had been adamant that she didn’t want to work at Wayne Enterprises like everyone else in their family did but then Bruce started noticing her and she kept putting off the decision. Starling City was almost three thousand miles away from Gotham, three thousand miles from her family, her friends, and him. By the time the cab pulled up she had already phoned the QC Head of Resources and let her know she could start immediately; Bruce’s cab fare still sitting where he’d left it as she walked out of the manor for the last time. During the long cab ride back into the city she called her dad and told him, made travel arrangements, set up an appointment to have a real estate agent meet her at her hotel, and then started packing the minute she got home.

The next day she was looking at her new house which was small by wealthy Starling City standards but huge in comparison to anything she could ever afford in Gotham if she chose to live on her salary alone. It was a two bedroom bungalow with an open floor plan but still true to the 1940’s architecture. It was perfect; twenty minutes from QC with a small postage stamp yard in a lovely but slightly rundown neighborhood at the edge of the Glades called Adam Heights in the historical district near Orchid Bay.

Lucius had offered to buy her a condo in the safest part of town closer to Lamb Valley or allow her to take the money from her trust to get whatever she needed but she’d refused. She had sold several programs to WayneTech which had earned her a tidy sum she kept untouched in a savings account. As much as she was loathe to taint her fresh start with money from Bruce, she’d also earned that money fair and square. It was hers, not his, and so she bit the bullet and withdrew enough to pay up her lease for the first year but she also made sure to replace it as soon as she was able to. She made a point of not touching that money again and living off her own paychecks after that. It was important to her that she showed everyone, even the people she loved, that she could stand on her own two feet. The experience of her failed liaison had seriously messed with her self-esteem and she needed to reestablish her own sense of empowerment.

In fact, it had affected her so much that she only started thinking about dating again (or for the first time rather) a couple of years ago and look how that turned out. Not only did he basically break up with her after a day and get hit by lightning, but he started dating another girl while he was still in a fricking coma.

Barry, she sighed. She really liked him. He felt comfortable, safe. He might not have made her heart pound like a certain set of vigilantes did but, before the accident, he certainly wouldn’t have spent the night only to pretend nothing happened the next day. She never would have thought then that he’d turn out to be the type of guy to don a mask and go racing off into the night in a blur leaving her behind in his dust, but her curse had extended there as well. Now he was a super-speedy hero named ‘the Flash’ with a coma girlfriend and she was still alone.

And then there was Daniel.

Nice handsome rich guy who seems to really be into her and, surprise! Turns out he’s another freaking mask, she thought miserably. Yeah, if she was a superstitious person she’d think she was cursed.

Of course, Daniel never really ‘date’ dated her. They went out but he wasn’t actually dating her as much as he was trying to get closer to Oliver so technically Daniel and Oliver were the ones dating and she was just their intermediary.

Which was not only weird and confusing, but a huge blow to what little bit of ego she had left. It was all very disappointing because, despite using her to further his own mission, Dan Garret had been a really great guy when all was said and done; handsome, smart, deep, funny…even though he was a complete and utter putz for using her and preying on her emotions.

She scowled, that he had the balls to ask her to leave Oliver’s mission and be his tech instead after all was said and done, then follow that up by tossing in an offer to date her ‘for real’ just to sweeten the deal… She shook her head ruefully, like quitting the Arrow so she could be his really personal assistant in the office, the mission, and the bedroom was something she’d ever go for in a million years. Still, she kept their parting classy even though she was really, really tempted to let him have it; especially after he suggested her reasons for turning him down had more to do with the fact that she was hung up on Oliver, and not because he had targeted her by assuming she was so desperate for attention that she could easily be manipulated into spilling all of the Arrow’s secrets.

Yes, Virginia, all masks are ego-centric pricks who have their heads up their own asses.
She ran her hand over her scalp and tightened her ponytail. At least Barry seemed to like her for who she was and not because she was a potential asset to his mission…until, of course, he got hit by lightning, became a superhero, and gained a coma-girlfriend who was not only freaking gorgeous, but funny, sweet, and smart.

Yep, she was cursed.

Damn it, she thought as she rubbed her temples and stared at the sandwich on her desk. This whole thing was giving her a migraine. Her temples were throbbing and her neck was in knots. “Crap,” she sighed as she rolled her neck and heard it snap, crackle, and pop like a bowl of puffed rice.

She yawned. They were really going to have to recruit a chiropractor to Team Arrow soon. Man, what she wouldn’t give for a massage; that or a good night’s sleep. Barbara’s phone call hadn’t exactly made for sweet dreams the night before.

Her ‘relationship’ with Barry had ended before it had even begun because he told her he thought she was in love with Oliver, something she had vehemently denied at the time. Okay, so maybe Barry had a point. Maybe she was in too deep with Oliver and maybe she did have feelings where he was concerned but nothing—nothing—was going to ever happen between them. Oliver had made that very clear…in a sort of vague, muddled way…

“Because of the life I lead…I think it’s better that I not be with someone I could really care about.”

But what did that mean exactly? Did it mean that he had feelings for her? Was it in reference to the fact that he was keeping his distance from Laurel? Although he’d gone back to Laurel twice since then, both times ending in disaster.

Why he kept going back was a mystery to her; you’d think he’d have figured out by now that they were toxic together. It was bad enough before she knew his secret but after…?

Ugh.

Her mind flashed back to the first time the willowy brunette showed up to the Lair and stated her intentions to fill in as Sara’s replacement by becoming the Canary. Yeah, like that was ever going to work, she thought. The second they heard the words come out of Laurel’s mouth, she turned to Dig and whispered the words ‘I give it six months—or maybe three’.

Totally nailed it.

The only relationships Oliver was less successful with than his love affairs with the Lance sisters, were his relationships with female masks; combine the two and it’s bound to end in fireworks and tears.

Then again, Oliver’s whole intimacy dodge could just be him trying to do damage control and let her down easy because he saw how upset she was that he had slept with the Soviet Slut. It’s not like Oliver was ever the kind of guy who dealt with stuff; he was more of an ‘I have a feeling? Let me react to this by fucking up my life so completely that it destroys everything around me,’ kind of guy. His girlfriend presses him for a commitment, and he reacts by sleeping with her sister, impregnating yet another random girl at a party, and getting stranded on a desert island for five years. His dad sacrifices himself so that Oliver can live, and he reacts to his trauma by putting on green leather and shooting criminals with arrows…then goes back to sleeping with all of the same women who got him to that point in the first place, allowing the woman he has the most guilt over to don a costume and endanger herself on a nightly basis compounding his already soul crushing levels of guilt, only to repeat the whole ‘push me/pull me’ thing leading to her having a total nervous breakdown.
Can we say ‘Vicious Cycle’, kids?

Yeah, Oliver was so screwed up emotionally that not even Doctor Phil had a shot in hell of fixing him when he was on a roll. Not that Bruce was much better. I mean, really, she pondered, when it came down to it, they were basically the same man.

An inability to deal with their feelings in a nonviolent, constructive way?

Check.

A fondness for leaping from rooftop to rooftop as people are shooting them and accept that as normal?

Check.

Intimacy issues?

Oh hell to the yes.

Fathering a kid you didn’t know about who turns up one day out of the blue?

Holy fuck, we’re on a roll.

Destructive arch-nemesis that wreak havoc with their emotions and make them go stupid just by hearing their name?

Uh, Joker, Slade, Merlyn, Ra’s al Ghul (that’s a two-fer)…yeah, that list could go on for a while.

Mommy and Daddy issues?

A big check for both of them on that one. Bruce saw his parents murdered before his eyes and it set him on his path and Oliver’s dad blew his brains out in front of him after telling him to make up for his sins and his mother, who was a piece of work in and of herself, gets shish-kebaped in a reenactment of the worst moment of his life right in front of him by his arch enemy who used to be his friend. Talk about a psychiatrist’s field day.

The really sad thing was that she really couldn’t honestly say which one was worse off. They were both fairly fucked in the head at this point.

By rights it should be Bruce since he’s older and his issues were probably more wide spread and destructive. In the family category, Oliver had enabling parents who fixed everything by handing their kids a credit card and the keys to the liquor cabinet but, other than that, he enjoyed a relatively pleasant childhood. His issues started after he hit the age of consent. Bruce had an enabling guardian in Alfred, but his version of enabling involved helping him to become a masked vigilante by teaching him spy craft and arranging for him to be trained by some of the greatest martial arts masters in the world then helping him take revenge on the criminals of Gotham by becoming Batman.

Yeah, that…that wasn’t healthy but, if you had to compare them in terms of which one was slightly not as ‘not healthy’, eh…

Okay, as insane as it sounded, in her humble opinion spy craft and bat ears beat alcohol and unlimited credit limits in terms of parenting. If nothing else, at least it gave him structure.

Felicity furrowed her brow and muttered under her breath, “Okay, yeah, that says something about how low my standards have fallen, doesn’t it?”
If their family lives were fraught with angst and tragedy, their romantic lives were, sad to say, an even bigger disaster.

Not including her own experience with him, each and every relationship Bruce had ever been in ended badly. Either he left them; they left him, prison, nuthouse, or death. Not a pretty picture. Women who were bad for him he loved, women who were good for him were rejected, and women who were criminally insane? Well, see prison, nuthouse, or death.

But even with all that shiny shiny happiness going in the Bruce column, Oliver was almost worse. Bruce, one could argue, came by his intimacy issues naturally. He was just a kid when he saw his parents die and had no real concept of a healthy relationship except the one he’d seen through the eyes of an eight year old and that had not ended on a high point. To him, love equated death. Oliver didn’t have that excuse; he was FUBARed even before the island. Bruce’s life was screwed up by his dedication to the mission but Oliver’s issues...yeesh.

Oliver wasn’t so much a playboy as he was a boy who got played. As always it started with mommy: Moira Queen. Felicity didn’t trust Moira when she was alive and, although it was supposedly wrong to speak ill of the dead, she still didn’t like her very much. The woman had threatened her and she would not forget the looks she had shot her way when she called her bluff and told Oliver about Thea’s connection to Malcolm Merlyn. When she’d heard about the hit being placed on her Moira’s name was the first one that had popped into her mind. The only reason she hadn’t investigated the broker Barbara mentioned yet was because she was afraid Oliver would find out.

Already she had risked her relationship with Oliver by telling him about his mother two years ago in connection to Merlyn and then again a few months later when she’d uncovered the fact that he had a son by a girl he knocked up living in Central City. It turned out that Moira had paid her off while he was a freshman in college to say she had a miscarriage so he’d be let off the hook. Any fond remembrances he’d had of his mother were destroyed after that and she was responsible. If she discovered his mother arranged to have her killed then she shuddered to think of what the emotional consequences would be for him. The fact that the contract was rescinded around the same time she took a chance and told Oliver the truth was telling as well. Before Oliver knew the truth, killing her would have made perfect sense from a strategic point of view. After he found out however...

Moira wasn’t stupid. Oliver would have connected the dots instantly and, although Moira may or may not have known what her son was truly capable of, she’d have to be blind not to see that he’d inherited some of her darkness. He said that she claimed to have known his true identity for well over a year before the night she’d died, but Felicity had her doubts. If she did know that was worse because she shot him and didn’t say boo afterwards. Even if she hadn’t known then he was the Arrow, one would think she would have found time to send a fruit basket when she did find out, right? Holy fuck, the woman used to send engraved thank you cards to the guy who did her Botox injections, you’d think she could scrape up enough humanity to send a cookie bouquet to her own kid for putting a bullet in his chest! No one in the Lair ever seemed to notice that part except her. Still, if it gave him comfort, so be it. Lying about that was the least of her sins.

Even in her more tender and loving moments with her family there was something about the woman had set her teeth on edge. No one could argue that she didn’t love her family, because she did. She loved her children dearly but there was always a brittle aura to the woman, something that stiffened your spine and made you take a step back from her. When most people described her they used words like ‘dauntless’, ‘formidable’, or ‘iron-willed’ but those words, though true, didn’t quite fit with the Moira she knew that most people never got to see if they were lucky. This was a woman who paid off Sandra Hawke to fake a miscarriage and hide the fact that Oliver had a son, was a part of a vast criminal conspiracy, was complicit in the kidnapping of her own husband and the attempted kidnapping of her son, she shot him shortly afterwards (see cookie bouquet), was at least partially responsible for the deaths of hundreds (although not convicted), and never even bothered telling anyone that the guy she was supposedly so scared of that she let him plant a Markov device under the Glades was freaking alive! She had many words she could’ve used to describe Moira Queen (‘ruthless’ being a prime example, ‘cold-blooded ice bitch’ was another) before she died at the hands of Slade Wilson two years previously, but none of it came close to anything that would inspire the warm and fuzzies. It was as though she had this aura of frost around her that chilled you to the very bone if you got too close.

She remembered all too well the emotional fallout from that woman’s death as Oliver and Thea struggled with her passing. As difficult as it was for Thea, in many ways it had been ten times worse for Oliver because he blamed himself for everything that had happened. Again, Felicity had been forced to remain silent; all she could do is offer comfort and sympathy. She was, after all, for better or worse his mom.

Moira loved her children but something told her that setting boundaries and enforcing rules hadn’t been a priority in the Queen household. Moira was the kind of woman who thought that loving her children meant giving them free reign to the point that they never had to even think about the consequences of their actions. There were times when she, Tam, and Luke would have loved to grow up like that but, after getting to know Oliver and seeing the problems he and Thea had, she was grateful that they didn’t.

If Moira had been a strange mix of maternal ferocity and ice cold calculation, Robert had been her opposite. Oliver took a lot of his strength from Moira but most of his weaknesses came from Robert. Like Oliver, Robert had a wandering eye and was a bit of a partier. His affairs were numerous and not well hidden and Moira, despite being a strong and formidable woman, remained within the marriage without complaint. In her way, she loved him but their marriage became less about love and more about business towards the end. As a result, Oliver grew up with a warped idea of what marriage and commitment meant. Robert was also a man who, although strong in purpose and a good businessman, let women lead him around by his nose (as well as a few other choice body parts). He was probably even more permissive with his children than Moira was at times and he had a habit of running away from his problems and keeping secrets. Despite all that, Oliver loved his father very much. It was hard for him to resolve the memories he had of a fun loving, outdoorsy, brash man like Robert Queen with a man who could be part of a conspiracy to destroy the lives of hundreds of people.

Just like his father, Oliver seemed continually trapped between all the women in his life and there had been a lot of them; each and every one of them somehow related to his own parent’s relationship in some way. Laurel, so cool and controlling yet enabling and steadfast through all of Oliver’s infidelities was Moira, but Sara, passionate, reckless, and rebellious, was Robert. Helena was part of the guilt and anger he felt towards his father. Sandra…

She took a breath; Sandra Hawke was in a category all her own. In a lot of ways, Sandra was her. She so easily could have been that girl. Hell, she was that girl for Bruce; the only difference was that she didn’t have a child as a result of her one moment of weakness.

Her breath slowed as she turned that over in her mind; would Bruce have paid her two million dollars to take her child and go? No. No, Bruce would have probably done ‘the right thing’ and married her or, at least, offered to but he would have grown to resent her and their child. Of course, she also wouldn’t have taken the money had he offered but there was a big difference between her at age eighteen and Sandra. At eighteen she already had a doctorate and had completed her education, Sandra was still in school and paying for her education through grants and scholarships. She also had money and resources that Sandra didn’t. She could have raised her and Bruce’s child alone and never had to worry about juggling her education, motherhood, or money. Had she been a young, unmarried college student from a humble background and pregnant, she probably would have done the same thing. Actually, had she been Sandra Hawke she probably wouldn’t have had the fortitude to take that challenge on in the first place; she probably would have given serious thought to terminating the pregnancy and moved on with her life without ever looking back.

A pang hit her heart then as the thought passed through her mind. She might have had a termination, but who knows? While she was completely 100% pro-choice, she also knew that it was a decision no woman ever made lightly. For better or worse, she slept with Bruce because she was in love with him and her child, however unexpected, would have been the result of that love even if it wasn’t reciprocated. Connor, on the other hand, was born from what was essentially a one night stand and Oliver was young, completely irresponsible, and both his family and hers were less than supportive of the pregnancy. The fact that she chose to have him anyway showed just how strong Sandra was. She might not have been under similar circumstances.

Her situation might not have been the same as Sandra’s, but it would have held its own challenges. Bruce was so entangled with her family that she couldn’t have prevented him from knowing about his child and he would have made it an issue whether he wanted to be a parent or not. Keeping the child would have meant having Bruce in her life forever. She couldn’t have escaped Bruce’s notice simply by moving away; he’d find her wherever she went. So, really, she couldn’t judge Sandra for taking her child and the check; she couldn’t even resent her for not telling Oliver the truth. Moira however…

If Moira hadn’t already been dead she would have killed her for that. Instead of blaming his mother, Oliver had blamed himself as usual. He had been young and stupid, Sandra had been equally young and naïve; what had been a one night, one-time thing for Oliver was a first time with far reaching consequences for Sandra and her son, Connor. Oliver found out he was a father only after they had been threatened and his status as the Arrow nearly cost them their lives. Seeing no other option, Oliver had turned his back and made the conscious decision not to try to parent Connor, allowing him and his mother to go into hiding instead. Even so, it still felt like he was running from his problems again as was his pattern, only this one involved a child and that had been one thing that Felicity couldn’t easily forgive.

That…that had been hard on her to watch him do that. As someone whose own bio-dad took a runner she’d had a hard time being sympathetic even though she knew why he felt it was for the best.

Sandra had moved on, there was a man in Connor’s life already who wanted to be his father, and he couldn’t risk his son’s life or rekindle something with Sandra when he knew they would always be in danger if he was in the picture. As Oliver drowned his sorrows in half the bar’s inventory, Felicity found herself again hating Moira to the point that she wanted to confront her gravestone about it, but what would be the point? On one hand she understood the woman was trying to protect her son’s future, but she knew firsthand how Connor would one day feel when he learned that his father had deliberately chosen not to be part of his life.

To this day, Felicity couldn’t understand how a woman who supposedly loved her children so much could do that to her own grandson. It made her think about the man who contributed his sperm to her mother’s womb. The impression she’d gotten from Peggy Ann had been that he was wealthy Euro-trash but that had been her own interpretation. Maybe that emotional distance came from being accustomed to such vast wealth their entire lives? Perhaps when you lived in a world where everyone always wanted something from you, one had to learn to keep some kind of distance to guard against the backlash.
Besides Laurel, Sara, and Sandra there had been others, of course: Shado, the woman who trained Oliver on how to use the bow and whom both he and Sara had serious lingering issues over, Helena, who Oliver tried playing Captain Arrow Saves-a-Ho-Sack-Of-Crazy for not once, not twice, but three times and, surprise, was that ever a perfect example of the term ‘epic fail’ or what? And, oh yeah, Isabel: a woman whose best quality is that she can take a punch aka the Bolshoi Bitch.

If Bruce was a bad relationship risk, then Oliver was even worse. Still, it was tempting because they were both Sex on a Stick with a couple of slices of Beefcake for dessert. The most intimate contact she’d ever had with Oliver involved him either swinging her across empty space while flying through a couple of plate glass windows or leaping over a detonated landmine but (when she wasn’t thinking about dying) it sure was fun. That and the whole watching him work out while he’s shirtless thing, that’s a perk they don’t think to put in the Employee Handbook. She may never have actually licked those abs but, in her mind, there’s a whole ten course feast going on and he’s definitely soup to nuts (because some nuts are just worth the epi-pen). Then there had been the thing right before they took down Slade the first time.

She blanched. Yeah, she didn’t like thinking about that these days. For a while though, Oliver telling her he loved her had put her on cloud nine even though she knew it had been just a ruse to save Laurel and get the ‘cure’ into Slade. For a day or two afterwards she even let herself think dangerous thoughts around the words ‘maybe’ and ‘what if’ only to have them completely dashed when Laurel started becoming a regular in the Lair. And, as per usual whenever Oliver became fixated on a woman, once he and Laurel restarted their romance she was once again left out in the cold.

Yup, her love life sucked, she thought miserably. She had a crush on a guy who seemed to look right through her, her last romance was with a guy who cheated on her while he was in a fricking coma, and as for Bruce; she would never go there again even if the man knew his way around her fun places. Still, even more than four years later, the memories of their one weekend together lingered. Too bad they were attached to a complete horse’s ass.

Felicity pushed her keyboard back; laid her head on her folded arms, and groaned. What the hell was she going to do about him? Here she was thinking naked relationship thoughts about one of the few people even more screwed up than Oliver Queen and he completely dumped her ass four years ago. Worse than dumped; he erased her from his world, so why was he coming back?

She knew the answer to that; masked vigilantes who feel entitled to refer to entire cities as ‘theirs’ don’t like sharing anything.

I hate this, I hate this, I hate this, Felicity thought over and over again like a mantra. Really, when it boiled down to it, it was because she made the mistake of giving Oliver access to a system based off of the original Watchtower decryption and AI program she had developed with Barbara. This was Bruce just being territorial and, man, talk about destroying a girl’s self-esteem all over again: You tell a guy you’ve loved him your whole life, give him your virginity, spend two days and three nights making love using every move in the Kama Sutra and a few you just invent on the spot, and he dumps you and never looks back until four years later when you give his computer program to another man and he finds out about a teeny little death threat THEN he gets jealous. It’s almost enough to make a girl want to chuck her tablet and go back to analog.

No, Felicity thought as she straightened up in her chair and pushed her glasses up off her nose, I’m not doing this to myself. It had taken her four years of hard work, emotional growth, and more pints of Ben and Jerry’s than it should have to get to a point in her life where Bruce, the Bat, and Gotham were a closed chapter of her life. He will not do this to me! She vowed, I will not be one of those women who falls apart over a man! He might be Batman, but she’s seen under the suit and, physical perfection, legendary temper, and bone melting kisses aside, he’s not all that intimidating! I’m too smart for this, she thought as she took a deep breath. No Bruce and definitely no more naughty thoughts about Oliver either. No matter how naked he gets in her presence…or how sweaty…or…

So, okay, maybe she did let herself get a little fuzzy around the edges where Oliver was concerned but has she ever taken a bite out of that hunky-hunkishness of his? No. No, she has not. But she could have. She’d caught him looking a couple of times as well. She may dress for success in the office, but when she had to get suited up for formal functions she could wear the crap out of an evening gown. She might have trust issues when it came to relationships but her self-esteem, as far as her looks and brains went, was still rock solid. That said, should he ever cast his net into blonder, smarter, and more computer savvy waters (meaning her) and seek to reel her in, would she take the bait? No, he could just keep his worm in his pants where it belonged because she learned that lesson the hard way.

The very, very hard way.

Hard. Like six-pack abs kind of hard. Like the marble in Bruce’s shower when he—

Felicity frowned and opened her desk drawer and started to search through it when Oliver walked in the door. “Hey, what are you looking for?”

“No chocolate,” she muttered without looking up. “I could have sworn I had a Dove bar in here the other day.”

“No chocolate?” Oliver asked as he watched her dig around in the drawer with amusement.

“Yeah, I suddenly got a craving like you wouldn’t believe,” she sighed, giving up and looking at him morosely. “How was lunch with Isabel?”

“About as pleasant as a root canal,” he said in a wry tone. “If you want to head down to the employee lounge and see what’s in the vending machine you can, then come back and we’ll go over the game plan for tomorrow.”

“About that,” Felicity said, clearing her throat as she rose from her desk to follow him into his office and shutting the door behind her.

“Yeah?” He acknowledged without looking at her as he plopped some files on his blotter before moving over to the ‘coffee pot’ (he bought some Rube Goldberg looking brass coffee and espresso machine for his office after she refused to make him any) and poured himself a cup. “Want one?”

“No, thanks. Um…Oliver?”

“Hmm?” He garbled as he pressed the cup to his lips and moved back to stand near his desk as he sorted through the files.

“I was wondering, just how important is it that I be in tomorrow’s meeting?”

Oliver cleared his throat and set down his cup carefully, “Pardon?”

“I was wondering if it would be alright if I just skipped it and maybe took a few personal days instead.”

“What?” Oliver said flatly, his tone and posture going from Ollie to Arrow in 0.2 seconds.

“Well, I was thinking,” Felicity tried not to fidget as Oliver fixed her with a hard eye. “A few, um, personal issues have come up and I think that…well, I thought that since this is basically you and Isabel’s show, more Isabel really, that maybe—“

“If this is about yesterday,” his voice hardened and he looked at her pointedly, “which you and I have yet to discuss—don’t think I’ve forgotten about it—I don’t even mention it during lunch. I don’t know what you two talked about but she’s apparently over it, at least for the moment, and she’s too invested in this proposal right now to tank it just to score points so I think we’re safe for now.”

“Well, that’s good!” She said brightly, “Great even, but that’s not why I need the time off. And, by the way, love that tie today. Is it new?”

Oliver glanced down at the green and gold tie he was wearing and frowned at her, “What’s wrong with you?”

“Nothing’s wrong with me, why would anything be wrong with me?”

“Because all of the sudden you’re acting weird and you want to take time off so if it’s not about Isabel then what is it?”

“No.” Oliver said simply before sitting down in his chair.

“No?” Felicity repeated.

“No,” Oliver replied easily, “as in N-O, no.”

“You’re telling me no?” She said flabbergasted. “Really?”

“Really,” he told her as he leaned back in his chair and placed his hands behind his head in a stretch. “You need to get past what happened between you and Isabel and cowboy up. Get right back on the horse, as it were.”

Did he just tell me to ‘cowboy up’? Felicity’s jaw dropped open and she gaped at him for a split second before her temper flared and she began to do a slow burn. “First off, I already told you that this has nothing to do with Isabel—“

“I don’t believe you.”

“You don’t believe me?” She sputtered.

“No.”

“No?”

“Are you going to spend the rest of the afternoon repeating everything I say or what?” Oliver asked, his blue eyes glinting with amusement at her discomfiture.

“Secondly,” she said, clenching her jaw and pointedly ignoring him, “I can take a personal day if I want to, I’m only asking you as a courtesy. In fact, I have a ton of personal days, holidays, and vacation days I could take because, guess what, I work for you practically 24/7 and I’ve earned it!”

“Actually, you work for Queen Consolidated between 40 to 60 hours a week and the rest of the time you work for the Arrow which, technically, isn’t part of QC and therefore doesn’t actually come with a benefits package.”

Felicity put her hands on her hips and gave him her dirtiest look. “Do you honestly think you’re being amusing right now?”

He fixed her with a hard eye, all signs of amusement fading from his expression. “No, what I think is that I’ve had to listen to you complain about the fact that I took you out of IT and brought you in to be my EA for three years now and the first time we actually have a chance to launch a presentation for innovative software that you, yourself, had a hand in developing, you want to skip out on it; why is that? And don’t say ‘it’s personal’ and expect me not to ask questions.”

“Fine! I just…I…I have to…” she licked her lips and sighed, shifting her weight from one foot to another as she felt his heavy gaze upon her, “It’s…it’s hard to explain. I can’t talk about it.”

“Why not?” He asked with a scowl.

“I just can’t,” she bit out, flushing hotly. “Trust me when I say that it’s for a very good reason, okay?”

Oliver searched her face for a moment before his eyes widened and his expression cleared, “Oh! I see. Is it…um, you know, a—“ his eyes skittered away from her for a moment, “um, private kind of thing?”

“What?” She asked in confusion.

“You know,” he glanced down at the leather blotter on his desk. “An, um…well, like a private kind of medical appointment?”

“A what?” Felicity gaped at him, now feeling completely thrown for a loop.

“You know,” Oliver’s eyes met hers and she swore his cheeks flushed for a moment, “chocolate?”

“Oh, right! The gynecologist! Yeah!” Felicity nodded, finally catching on. “Uh-huh, that’s it exactly! I just didn’t want to tell you because, you know, female down there stuff is kind of—“

Oliver waved her off as he avoided eye contact again and looked decidedly uncomfortable, “Yeah, I—I have a sister, so, yeah. No need to go into details, I understand.”

“Oh good,” Felicity breathed a sigh of relief. “So that means I can have the personal time then?”

Oliver squirmed in his seat a little, “Look, I know how important this sort of stuff is and if it’s really something that needs to be taken care of right now then, sure. I mean, I get that we’ve been working nonstop for a while now and some things, y’know…” He cleared his throat, “Anyway, I get it, but if you could try to reschedule I could really use your help tomorrow.”

“Oliver, I—“ She began.

Oliver stopped her by getting up from behind his desk and clasping her hand in his own then looking deep into her eyes. “Listen, the truth is that it’s taken a while and I’m finally beginning to feel like I have a handle on running this place, but I still need you. I’m hoping that if the Wayne deal goes through we might actually stabilize the company enough that we can make Stellmoor an offer and get rid of Isabel once and for all. I know you want that too, right?”

“Yeah, of course,” Felicity answered as she avoided his gaze suddenly feeling a bit guilty.

He placed his fingers under her chin to lift her eyes up to his and smiled. It was that soft gentle smile he seemed to reserve only for her that always made her knees go just a bit wobbly and she felt her resolve begin to crumble. “Look, I’m sorry for pushing you earlier. Of course you can go to your appointment, don’t worry about it. I mean, you and I are a team and I’ll always want you beside me, especially on days like tomorrow, but the world won’t end because you took some time for yourself. This software is something you helped develop, it has your name on it, and I just wanted to be able to point to you and tell everyone how valuable you are, not just to QC, but to me personally. I couldn’t have done any of this without you, you know that, but your health comes first so if you need personal time then take as much as you want. I’ve got this, I promise.”

Well, crap, Felicity thought as her heart dropped to her stomach. I am so screwed. “I’ll, um, call my doctor and see if he can reschedule.”

“You don’t have to,” Oliver began to argue.

“No, no!” She waved him off. “It was just some blood work and an exam, routine stuff. I’ll just see if they can fit me in another day.”

“I’ll do you one better,” Oliver said as he moved around his desk to pick up the phone. “I’ll just call Thea and ask her to see if her doctor can fit you in this evening after work.”

“You don’t have to do that. Really, it’s not necessary,” Felicity blushed as she tried to talk him out of it. “Besides these kinds of appointments have to be made days, even weeks in advance. Her doctor will never be able to fit me in on such short notice.”

Oliver raised an arrogant brow in her direction as he dialed, “Billionaire, remember? Trust me, they’ll fit you in.”

“Fine,” Felicity said morosely. Great, on top of everything else, I just tricked myself into having to get a pap smear.

“Hey Thea,” he said as his sister picked up. “Yeah, listen, can you call your OB/GYN and see if they can fit Felicity in for an appointment this afternoon.” There was a sudden cacophony of noise on the other end of the line and Felicity had a sudden urge to beat her head against the wall. “No! Don’t be ridiculous! She’s just my friend, we’re not like that! Thea, you know Felicity and I—UST? What the hell is UST and what do you mean it’s all over the Lair? Damn it, Speedy—look, Felicity had an appointment tomorrow for her own doctor but we’ve got a conflict with work and I just didn’t want her to have to cancel and wait for another opening to pop up.” He paused as he listened to her, “I don’t know, whatever women usually need, I guess.” He placed his hand over the receiver, “It’s just a normal checkup, right?” She nodded painfully and he returned to his conversation. “She said it’s for the usual stuff, just a checkup. A what? Yeah, I guess so, whatever that is. Well, how the hell am I supposed to know—I’m a guy! Men don’t do all that stuff. Just tell them to do everything they usually do and bill me for it. Of course I am! She wouldn’t have to go there if I hadn’t asked her to cancel the appointment she had already set up, that’s why! Yes, I’m sure we’re just friends. Thea, just make the damn call! Okay, okay. Call me back when you find out. No, that’s okay, you can call me and I’ll just tell her. It’s not weird. No, it’s not. Why is it weird? We’re friends. Yes, friends talk about stuff like that! Don’t you talk to—So what if she’s a woman and I’m a man? What’s that got to do with anything? So? So what? It’s a doctor’s appointment, what difference does it make what kind of doctor it’s for? She makes appointments for me all the time! Yeah, I know she’s my EA but—Damn it! Fine, I’ll ask her!” He sighed and put his hand over the receiver again, “Is it weird that I’m asking my sister to make a doctor’s appointment for you?”

“Yes,” Felicity answered without hesitation. “In fact I’m pretty sure a goose just walked over Gloria in HR’s grave because of this conversation.”

He rolled his eyes and spoke to Thea again, “She said it’s weird. Yeah, well, whatever, just make the appointment and call me back. Fine! Call her back then, I don’t care; just make the damn phone call!
Fine, fine, I’m sorry! Thea, I said I was sorry. I am not in a mood; you’re just aggravating the crap out of me right now! Sexually what? I am not sexually frustrated! It’s a doctor’s appoint--! Damn it Thea, I am not getting into this with you! Believe it or not we actually do have work to do. Yeah, okay. Thanks Speedy, bye.” He looked over to Felicity who was holding her face in her hands and mumbling unintelligently under her breath. “What?”

She scrubbed her hands over her cheeks in an effort to relieve the sting of mortification which covered them and said, “You know, I think we may be getting just a little too comfortable around each other.”

“You think so?” he asks, offering her one of his rare but brilliant smiles.

And thus I find myself on an examination table with my legs spread wide and staring at the ceiling. Why is it I always seem to find myself in this position whenever Bruce is coming? Felicity thought as she tried to get comfortable--which is never easy when you’re dressed in a paper gown with a stranger looking at your hoo-hah.

“Alright Miss Smoak, when was your last period?” The pretty Asian doctor asked as she tapped on her tablet.

“Um…” Felicity frowned as she searched her memory. “Huh. I can’t remember, maybe two months ago? I’ve always been irregular.”

“Are you sexually active?”

“No,” Felicity sighed. “Definitely not active at all.”

“No?” The doctor asked in a tone which implied that the answer Felicity gave didn’t seem all that credible.

“No,” she emphasized. “In fact you might want to check for cobwebs while you’re down there.”

“When exactly was the last time you had intercourse, Miss Smoak?”

“Trust me, I’m not pregnant.”

“Miss Smoak,” the doctor said in a low tone as she leaned in towards her. “I know that someone else arranged this visit, in fact they were very insistent that you were seen today after the clinic had closed, but you are my patient and this is a safe place.”

Oh God, please just kill me now. “I’m sure I am but, whatever you’re thinking, you’re wrong. Really, really wrong. 31 flavors of wrong,” she stated emphatically. ”No one is doing anything nefarious, I just haven’t been able to see a doctor in a while because of scheduling conflicts and my friends were trying to help. As for the pregnancy thing, I know I’m not pregnant because babies take nine months and the last time I had sex was more than four years ago.”

The doctor nodded, accepting her answer, and made a note of it on her tablet. “Okay. Are you on birth control?”

“I was but my prescription ran out and I never had time to go back to the doctor to have it renewed.”
“Yes, you mentioned that a few times,” The doctor frowned. “And when was your last appointment if I may ask?”

“Um, four years ago.” The doctor fixed her with a slightly disapproving look. “I was busy? Listen, I know it’s bad. I had just moved here all the way from Gotham and things kind of got crazy with work so I just never got around to it.” She turned slightly toward the nurse who had been patiently standing in the corner silently. “I gave your nurse the name of my doctor back home so they should have faxed over my records by now.”

The nurse nodded and indicated something on the tablet which the doctor quickly perused before speaking. “What kind of cancer did your mother have?”

“Acute Lymphoblastic Leukemia; specifically she died from a secondary infection caused by a weakened immune system. It was fast; she died when I was four.”

“ALL can be.” She frowned, “Your mother was only twenty-three when she died?” She waited for Felicity’s nod. “That’s unusual. Did she have any sort of chromosomal disorder to put her at risk? Exposure to radiation perhaps?”

Felicity shook her head. “She had mild to moderate achromatosis due to Oculocutaneous albinism type IB but the doctors assured us that it probably had no bearing on the progression of the disease. My dad asked on my behalf because of my coloring to see if I had inherited an even milder form that accounted for my astigmatism but they said the likelihood of her passing that on were incredibly low. Her cancer was just luck of the draw.”

“I’ll note that on your chart. You indicated that there is no history of reproductive cancers that you know of on your mother’s side, what about your father’s?”

“Um,” She always hated answering this part, “I don’t know who my biological father is. As far as I know he was just a donor and my mother never discussed his medical history with my adopted dad. I doubt she even knew it to tell you the truth.”

It was always easier to say it was a donor rather than telling people that, when faced with a diagnosis of an acute form of leukemia at the age of 19 and told she would likely be left sterile from the treatments, Evie Smoak had seduced a man she’d met at a gallery showing with the sole intention of getting pregnant and never looked back. At least, that’s what she had told Lucius. Her father had emphasized the fact that, in Evie’s mind, it had been an act of love on her part, not selfishness, and Felicity had learned to pretend to accept it as such.

When Felicity turned eighteen, Lucius suggested they hire someone to track her biological father down. After she declined and he urged her to rethink her decision if only to get a complete medical history, Peggy Ann, the woman who had raised her mother and then helped raise her, took her aside and told her the truth: Evie had lied to Lucius when she told him that she never saw the man who had fathered her daughter again after their one night. The truth was that her biological father had known of her existence, had even sought them out once after her birth, but had not stayed. He met with Evie in private as Peggy Ann watched from a discreet distance, not revealing herself to either of them. He stayed just long enough to have a brief conversation and to hold her once, and then turned his back on them completely. Not even Lucius knew about that meeting or that her biological father was aware she existed. Peggy Ann had kept that secret for years knowing how much Lucius still loved her mother and recognized that if she revealed Evie’s deceptions, however well-intentioned they may have been, it would do nothing but cause unnecessary pain. Once Felicity knew the whole truth she didn’t have the heart to tell him either. Other than that one glimpse Peggy Ann had of the man, all she could overhear of their conversation was her mother calling him Henri, that he appeared to be much older than Evie, and that he was vaguely European; possibly French or Irish, something lilting, but that she had been too far away to accurately place his accent. She also found one of his business cards later. He’d left it for Evie in case she ever needed financial assistance. Her mother had apparently thrown it away but Peggy retrieved it from the trash and kept it just in case.

All it said was ‘Henri Ducard’ and it had a number with a foreign exchange. She still had the card. She kept it in her wallet for a long time, trying to decide whether or not to track him down but, in the end, she decided against it. He was the one mystery she had never been tempted to solve. He knew where she was for the first several months of her life and he never came for her and frankly, she didn’t need anyone who didn’t need her. Lucius Fox was the only father she needed. Still, it had affected her. Lucius had always been mildly worried he’d wind up losing her despite the adoption and, even though he’d tried to hide that from her, she was left with some lingering issues. The idea of losing someone she cared about deeply bothered her. It caused her to cling to those close to her and isolate herself from the rest of the world.

Then, six months ago…

“I’ll go ahead and give you a breast exam, a pap smear, then draw some blood. We’ll also screen for STDs just in case.” She looked down at her tablet again. “Would you be interested in having me prescribe you some birth control today?”

She snapped out of her disturbing reverie, “I guess so.”

“Do you know what you want? I’m see you were on the pill but there are several types to choose from that also have low dose hormones that could help regulate your period or, if you like, can shorten the duration or amount of cycles you have. Although, as with any form of birth control, it’s important to always use a condom with any new or nonexclusive partners and to continue to use condoms with any current partners that have been screened for STDs for at least two weeks after beginning your prescription.”

“Trust me, that’s not happening any time soon. People keep telling me I have a type so I’m planning on avoiding Metropolis just in case they’re right.”

“Pardon?”

“Nothing, the pill is fine, whichever you think is best. Not having to deal with a period would be a bonus though.”

“Okay,” The doctor said brightly as she slipped on a pair of gloves. “Here we go!”

“Fun times,” Felicity muttered.

Felicity’s alarm went off and she slapped it into silence as she lay in her bed contemplating the watermark on the ceiling she’d been staring at for the past seven hours. This was happening, whether she liked it or not, and she couldn’t avoid it or hide herself away. The only thing she had going for her now was the fact that he didn’t know she knew he was coming.

Felicity’s mind began to churn as she quickly put together her battle plan. Today she was going to war with Bruce Wayne.

Chapter Six

“Felicity do you have the…” Oliver’s voice trailed off as he stepped into the office and looked at his assistant.

“Do I look okay?” She asked, glancing down at her outfit. “It’s not too much is it?” She frowned. “I just wanted to make sure I looked my best today. United front, you know?”

I better, she thought, this outfit costs more than my rent. “Thanks. Everything’s on your desk,” she said as she sat back down.
After she had left the gynecologist’s office (which had been located in the most exclusive part of the city because rich people have hoo-hahs too) she decided to do some shopping. After working with two masked vigilantes, (nine if she counted Diggle, Sara, Roy, Barry, Barbara, Tim, and Dick. Ten if she counted Daniel but he was a sore subject with her so she was happy leaving it at nine) Felicity had learned that half the battle was choosing the right armor. She slipped into Neiman’s and bought a Herve Leger long sleeved bandage dress in lipstick red which she paired with a black jacket and a pair of simply styled but still very sleek black Christian Louboutins. The Manolo Blahnik’s she tried on were a lot more comfortable but she was going for red-soled stiletto devastation, not panda flats on a Wednesday.

The dress was just above the knee but still an acceptable length for the office and had a boatneck collar with a modest décolletage. The contemporary styled tailored jacket gave it just that little touch of professionalism that made everything work. The devastation factor didn’t come into play until you took the jacket off. The dress may have been designed to cover everything up but because it clung to every single curve it wasn’t hiding a damn thing. Thank God for John Diggle and his daily training sessions after Sara left because it was so tight you could almost see the dip of her belly button. You definitely had to have some ab training to pull it off.

She had eschewed her glasses for contacts, kept her hair down and over her shoulders, and her makeup simple. She traded in her normal bright lipstick for something shiny and sheer with a hint of red that didn’t compete with the color of her dress. She stopped and had her nails done in a simple and deceptively bare looking American manicure and the only jewelry she wore was the thin gold and diamond bangle bracelet Lucius had given her when she graduated from MIT, and the Boucheron gold and diamond Pivoine earrings that had belonged to her mother because she knew her dad would recognize them. Hopefully they would remind her to keep her head on straight.

The last thing left in her armory was her perfume; L’Air Du Temps. It was a sweet old fashioned floral perfume that was timeless and one that she had always loved but, more importantly, it would throw Bruce completely off his game. Alfred had once told her that it was the only scent Bruce’s mother ever wore and she was hoping he’d recognize it. The total effect she was going for was something she had decided to call ‘Sexy Demure’. She surreptitiously snuck a glance through the glass panel that separated her and Oliver’s desks and hid a grin as she saw him quickly look back down at the file he was reading.

Yeah, she thought to herself, nailed it.

An hour later she and Oliver had joined Isabel in the lobby along with Paolo, Isabel’s new EA. The other woman, who was dressed in head to toe Zac Posen, had taken one look at her, arched her eyebrow knowingly, but kept her remarks to herself. Just as well, Felicity thought, there is no way I’m fighting anyone in these shoes. They pinched her toes but her ass was poppin’ so it was worth it.

Lucius and the rest of his entourage came through the doors precisely at 10 am on the dot. The minute her dad saw her, his face lit up and he grinned from ear to ear. She smiled back but shook her head slightly and he gave her a little pout and a wink to let her know he understood then approached Oliver and Isabel with a handshake.

“Mr. Queen, Ms. Rochev, it’s very nice to meet you both. I’ve been very much looking forward to finally meeting you.” He said to them both in a tone that was both warm and professional.

“Thank you, sir. And please, call me Oliver.” Oliver grasped his hand firmly and returned his greeting with what Felicity secretly referred to as Smile #3: Professional yet casual with just a hint of teeth.

She could write a whole book on Oliver’s smiles alone and not in some Lisa Frank tweenager way.
Oliver was always so weird when he put on his ‘normal’ face that she really couldn’t believe no one else ever seemed to notice. She always had to curb the urge to either smack him in the back of the head and tell him to knock it off or laugh hysterically whenever he flashed one of those.

“I’m sure you’ve been looking forward to this visit for many reasons, sir,” Isabel said playfully before darting her eyes toward Felicity with a smug little grin.

Subtle, Felicity thought as she watched her dad’s eyes twinkle a bit at the opening she had just given him. That’s right Isabel; honor the letter of the law if not the spirit.

“No, now, Ms. Rochev, we mustn’t tell secrets out of class,” her dad said in a conspiratorial tone but slid his eyes over toward Felicity anyway.

“I’m sorry,” Oliver said in confusion as he picked up on the subtle byplay going on. “Do you know Ms. Smoak?”

“I should say he does!” Came the booming drawl from the doorway that Felicity instantly recognized as Bruce’s fake billionaire persona voice. It was even more annoying than Oliver’s fake billionaire playboy smiles #1 through #8. “She’s his daughter after all. Queen, Ms. Rochev,” he nodded toward them with barely a glance, his entire focus on Felicity. He approached her, his deep blue eyes glinting dangerously despite the wide grin on his face. Taking her hand he bent at the waist slightly and kissed her knuckles softly in a way that probably would have made any other girl swoon but just made Felicity want to give him a smack. She resisted snatching her hand back and giving him the satisfaction of thinking he’d rattled her. “Hello Felicity, nice dress.” He said with an appreciative sweep of his eyes.

“Bruce,” Felicity said in a cool tone. Anger was helping her manage her rambles, a fact for which she was extremely grateful even though the urge to try out some of the moves Diggle had taught her on Bruce’s face was almost overwhelming.

“Did he just say you were Mr. Fox’s daughter?” Oliver turned to her wearing a tense Smile #8 (tight wide lips, lots of gritted teeth that shouts ‘Lucy, joo got some s’plainin’ to do) Yeah, she’d once told Oliver her dad had abandoned her but what she failed to mention was that she meant her biological father. Her need to prove herself on her own merits had prevented her from mentioning who her adopted father was. Although she never thought Oliver would take advantage of her relationship with Lucius Fox, she also knew he might feel strange about it if he knew. She hadn’t wanted him to assume he’d gotten this meeting through their connection. Oliver was good at guilting himself into a corner that way.

“Oh well, cat’s out of the bag!” Her dad said triumphantly as he reached out to hug her and placed a kiss on her cheek. “Hello Baby, are they treating you well at QC or do I need to have a quick word with your boss over there?”

“Hi Daddy,” Felicity said returning his hug and smiling despite the fact that she knew Bruce had won this round and that Oliver would be using his own Loud Voice later. “I’m good.”

Lucius turned and fixed Oliver with a hard look. “You know Mr. Queen; my daughter hasn’t been home in almost three and a half years because she says she’s always working.”

“It’s Oliver, sir, and although I am sorry about that, I assure you Felicity is a valuable member of our team and a real asset to the company as a whole.” Oliver assured him (Smile #2, the sincere ‘I promise to respect you in the morning’ one) “In fact, some of the software we’re planning to show you in the presentation today was actually developed by the team led by Felicity when she worked for us in IT before we moved her up to the executive floor. I’m sure you know better than anyone just how brilliant she is.” He glanced at her briefly and despite the hint of irritation she could see in his expression his eyes were warm and sincere. “I don’t consider her my EA as much as I do an equal member of our team and,” he turned to Isabel to enjoin her into the conversation with more than a hint of mischief creeping in, “I’m sure Ms. Rochev would agree with me wholeheartedly on that.”

The smile Isabel used was neither warm nor sincere but, then again, Felicity thought, even on a good day you could freeze ice on the woman’s ass. She was continually surprised Oliver’s dick didn’t fall off from frostbite the one time he managed to get into her panties. “Absolutely. I’d have to say that I, personally, have gotten so much from knowing your daughter, sir. In fact, just the other day Felicity and I had a good long chat about how much she was looking forward to your visit. Of course, she made me promise not to reveal her little secret to Oliver.” She batted her eyelashes her way, the sarcasm subtle but palatable to those in the know. “Your daughter is a stickler for maintaining a certain level of professionalism at all times.”

And score one for the Blyadischa. (because what’s the use of going all the way to Russia to rescue one of your best friend’s exes from a gulag if you don’t at least leave with a few new curse words under your belt?)

“Why thank you Ms. Rochev, I’d like to think my daughter got those particular skills from me.”

And an inadvertent burn for Dad! Felicity thought as she struggled to maintain her mask of cool professionalism as she tallied up her mental scoreboard.

“Shall we?” Lucius asked.

“Can I escort you, Mr. Wayne?” Isabel asked in a more than a little bit of a flirtatious manner.

Bruce, who had never taken his eyes off Felicity, finally turned to smile at the other woman. “You know what, Ms. Rochev—or can I just call you Isabel?”

“Of course, Bruce,” she practically purred at him.

“The thing is, Isabel, that Lucius is really the one who understands this sort of thing better than I do and it’s just been so long,” his eyes swept over Felicity’s figure once again in a knowing manner, “since I’ve spent time with Felicity that I was wondering if you’d mind if she showed me around a bit before we caught up with the rest of the group?”

Again Isabel’s eyebrows twitched upwards as she looked at her and, this time; there was a look of grudging admiration along with some other inscrutable flash of something inside her cold dark eyes. “Not a problem, Bruce. I’m sure Felicity would be happy to show you around.”

Great, she thought, then borrowing a page from The Oliver Queen Pretends to be a Normal Human Being playbook she turned to him with her best approximation of Smile #1: Bored at a Charity Function but Still Making a Grudging Effort at Pretending to Give a Shit. “Really though, it’s just an office building same as any other, Bruce. I’m sure if you’ve seen one you’ve seen them all and your time and mine would probably be best spent in the conference room.”

The dangerous flash in his eyes along with the tightening of his jaw as he attempted to maintain his looie goosie playbook grin told her he was beginning to lose patience with the lack of effect his presence seemed to be having on her. “Oh, but Felicity you and I have so much to talk about and I think I’d rather hear about this communications program from the woman who led the team rather than have a bunch of salesman pitch it to me via PowerPoint. Besides, we have four years of catching up to do.”

“You know, you do make a valid point, Bruce. You should get your information directly from the source, as it were,” Felicity reached out and grabbed Isabel’s elbow, sidling up next to her and patting her arm as though they were the best of friends. Isabel stiffened slightly but, to her credit, her expression never wavered. “You know, I was just one member of the team that wrote the actual program but Isabel was its driving force.” She cocked her head to the side and flashed Isabel her most brilliant teeth grinding grin before looking back at Bruce. “I have to say that none of us here at QC could do what we do without the leadership skills of this woman. She makes us strive for innovation and excellence. If there’s anyone you should talk to about QC besides Oliver himself, it’s her.” She turned to Isabel again, “You know, you should introduce him to Marvelle down in IT first, Isabel. After all he’s been helping run the entire department for over a year now.”

A look that bordered on genuine gratitude made its way to Isabel’s face as she held her arm out to Bruce, “What an excellent idea! If you’ll please follow me, Bruce, I’ll be happy to show you around.”

Irritation flashed across Bruce’s expression for just the briefest of moments before he took her arm,
“Well, who am I to argue with two of the loveliest ladies in all of Starling City?”

Isabel giggled coquettishly and batted her eyelashes in what had become (in Felicity’s mind) her go to move, then flicked her long hair back and did a half turn worthy of the catwalk, “Do let Oliver know we’ll be with them shortly and don’t forget to pencil me in your calendar for lunch on Monday.” She wagged a playful finger in her direction, “It’s my treat.”

“I’m looking forward to it. Have fun you two!” Felicity returned in the same sickeningly sweet voice. Oh well, pissing Bruce off was almost worth the indigestion she’d suffer at having to eat a meal with that woman on the off chance she was serious. Note to self: Stop by the pharmacy and pick up a big bottle of those chewy antacids, the fruit flavored ones.

She turned on her heel and made sure to put a little extra pop in her bootie the $600 Christian Louboutins were providing because, if she knew Bruce, he was still keeping an eye on her as she made her way to the conference room. Yeah, enjoy the trailers you flying rodent costume-wearing butthead, because there is no way you’re ever seeing this Feature Presentation ever again.

The PowerPoint was well under way and the lights were dimmed when Felicity quietly made her way into the conference room and sat next to Oliver. He frowned and leaned in, “Where are Wayne and Isabel?”

“Isabel is taking him down to IT.”

“Why?”

“Well,” she whispered with a mischievous half-grin, “Bruce wanted a quick tour of the building and Isabel wanted to take him to all the frequently visited tourist traps she showed you in Russia.”

Oliver’s lips twitched upward of their own volition as he pretended to pay attention to the presentation they had both already seen seven hundred times. “I thought we were sticking to ‘What happens in Russia stays in Russia?’”

“Don’t look at me, it’s your ex playing Russian Embassy with the client, not me.”

Oliver rubbed his hand over his mouth and cleared his throat softly to cover up his chuckle at that.
“Ms. Smoak, you are being a very naughty girl today.”

“So spank me after the meeting,” she quipped softly then froze as her brain caught up with what had just popped out of her mouth.

Before she could utter a swift and rambling apology though, Oliver murmured back in a husky voice, “Keep dressing like that around the office and I just might.”

Hello. Her mouth fell open and her cheeks flushed as she looked at him. His lips twitched upwards in triumph and he said, “By the way, that’s a lovely perfume you’re wearing. Suits you.”

“Thanks,” she returned a bit breathlessly.

“Reminds me of whenever Raisa would give me a hug in the kitchen after a tough day when I was a kid,” his eyes slid towards her and his voice slipped into that dusky timbre once more. “You smell like my best memories of home.”

Felicity didn’t say a word after that because she didn’t trust herself to speak. Instead all she could think was, ‘Goodbye Perry Ellis 360, L’Air Du Temps has just become my signature fragrance.’

Near the end of the PowerPoint presentation Bruce and Isabel entered the room. From the corner of her eye Felicity watched as Bruce tried to make his way over to the empty seat next to her but Isabel headed him off and pulled him to her side instead. Apparently she wasn’t the only one to notice his intense scrutiny because she sensed, rather than saw, Oliver stiffen beside her. Knowing his territorial tendencies, she could just imagine what his face looked like right about now. What was it with masked avenger types and their absurd habit of showing their teeth whenever it looked like someone else was thinking of peeing on their tree? It was like they were all, ‘No, no! I can’t possibly love you or date you, but if anyone else looks at you or feels any kind of attraction for you, well, you’re mine…until, of course, they go away and then I’m planning on dropping you like a hot potato.’

Felicity nearly rolled her eyes at the both of them but then she paused as a thought popped into her head. The room was practically engulfed in darkness but she knew something about both these men that neither one of them knew about the other (although Bruce suspected). Both men did their best work under the cover of night and both had honed their senses to near-metahuman levels, night vision and hearing in particular. It was risky because Bruce was already ticked off at the Arrow but, hell, in for a penny in for a pound, right? Besides, if they wanted to get all caveman on her then she was going to get some of her own back for a change.

When Felicity had done her shopping at Neiman’s she had also stopped in for a looky-loo at La Perla. Under normal circumstances, Felicity was a cotton undies and 18 hour kind of girl who bought her pantyhose at Target the way the rest of the world did. That said, when she decided to go to war using the Barbara Gordon Method she didn’t skimp on the foundation, no sir. She sure as hell wasn’t planning on letting anyone get inside her cookie jar but just knowing she was packing some real heat was a necessary ego boost. She had left the pantyhose from the plastic egg in her top drawer and sprung for the real deal instead. That meant La Perla Black Label all the way: Balconette bra, thong, and garter belt in sheer nude and real silk stockings. Felicity was loaded for bear!

She reached under the table and laid a soft touch on Oliver’s thigh while simultaneously crossing her legs at the knee and allowing the silk stockings to slowly rub together on the way up making a barely audible but unmistakable sound. Casting her peripheral vision left and right she saw both men swallow and felt the muscles of Oliver’s thigh tense. Just as quickly as she touched his leg she removed her hand so that it seemed almost like an accident and made sure to keep her expression... steady and composed. She then sighed and arched her back a bit as if getting a bit uncomfortable by being seated in the same position for so long. She slowly reached up with her hand and pulled her hair back on the side visible to Bruce and tucked it behind her ear, exposing the line of her neck to his penetrating gaze. Her girls stood high and up front due to the miracle known as underwire and she shifted again as she fanned herself slightly. “Are you hot?” She asked Oliver quietly with a bit of a frowny pout.

“Hmm?” Oliver hummed as he eyes twitched upwards from where they were staring.

“I think someone turned up the heat.”

“It is…kind of warm, yeah.”

Felicity sighed in feigned aggravation and began to shrug off the fitted jacket she was wearing. “Remind me to check the thermostat when the lights come back up.” Her body twisted first one way then the other so she could toss the jacket over the arms of the empty seat beside her giving Bruce a clear shot of exactly what it had been hiding. Through her eyelashes she watched as something dark and dangerous glinted in his eyes and it was all she could do not to flash a triumphant grin. And the IT Girl Wednesday scores again!

The presentation ended and the lights slowly came back up. Felicity pushed back her chair and walked towards the door behind where Bruce was sitting. She made sure not to look at him directly as she focused her gaze on the thermostat but she felt his stare right down to her bones. She made sure to walk at an unhurried pace, making her hair bounce and glow under the florescent lights as the scent of her perfume made its way to him. She heard his sharp inhale of breath as she lowered the room temperature to 68 degrees then quickly turned to make her way back to the front of the room giving Bruce a wide berth. Even in a room full of people she wouldn’t put it past him to try to latch onto her wrist to get under her skin and she wasn’t there to play his game, he was going to play hers.

Roger Pearson, the Head of Marketing, was wrapping up the initial presentation so Felicity made her way up to the podium to stand behind him and off to the side with her shoulders back and hands folded demurely in front of her so her arms were accidentally-on-purpose framing her breasts to their full advantage. Both Bruce and Oliver now stared at her with almost the exact same intensity carved into their expressions. She, on the other hand, was giving Roger her best Dallas Cowgirl Cheerleader smile as she clapped politely with the other attendees. Roger who was in his late fifties, bald, and had the beginnings of an impressive pot belly, looked at her like he was a puppy and she had just given him the best belly rub ever. Damn, she thought as he winked playfully at her, apparently this dress is a hit all over. When he stepped aside she moved to the podium and swept the entire room a sunny smile. “Ladies and gentlemen, I think now would be an excellent time to take a brief break. There are light snacks and refreshments in the next room. Let’s take 20 minutes to stretch our legs and mingle before we come back in for questions.”

Both Bruce and Oliver quickly stood and took a step in her direction but she faked them both out by turning toward her dad and sweeping his arm in her own instead. “Mind if I escort you, Daddy?”

“Not at all, in fact I insist on it,” he said laying his hand over hers as they made their way into the next room where an impressive spread of appetizers were laid out. “Have I told you, Baby, just how pretty you look today? That was your mother’s favorite color; she always did love seeing you in red.”

“I remember, Daddy,” Felicity said squeezing his hand affectionately.

She nodded. “I wore them for luck because, well, this is the first time you’ve ever seen me doing my job and I really want you to be proud of me whatever else happens.” It wasn’t a complete lie; she really did feel that way. Besides, it was worth the glowing smile he gave her in return.

“I’m always proud of you, Baby, you know that,” Lucius said quietly but emphatically. “Come on, let’s save the business talk for the conference room. I want to introduce you to some folks on my team you haven’t met yet. After all, half the reason I came down here was to show off my little girl.”

Her dad kept a hand on her back or her arm the entire time as other members of Wayne Enterprises crowded around them leaving Oliver and Bruce no real openings to get to her. The few times that Bruce nearly managed it, Isabel made sure to cut him off at the pass with a predatory gleam in her eye and a lustful expression you could probably catch a glimpse of from the International Space Station. Oliver was the final winner though when, slick as you please, he managed to slide next to her opposite to where her father was standing and laid a gentle hand on her elbow.

“Mr. Fox, I believe we’re about ready to return to the conference room where Felicity and Sanjeev Preema, our Head of Applied Sciences, will probably be the ones answering most of your team’s questions,” he said smoothly.

“Well then, after you, Mr. Queen,” Lucius said with a regal nod. “I’m looking forward to it.”

Oliver escorted her all the way to the front of the room releasing her as the room filled back up then approached the podium to introduce Sanjeev and herself. Bruce was now looking at Oliver with murder in his eye and she briefly wondered if maybe this had been a bad idea. Yes, Oliver also needed to be taken down a peg or two because of the way he let his women complicate her life (not to mention the way he often irked her by being a total jackass), but she knew first hand that Bruce could get downright brutal when he put on that cowl and he was already itching for a fight. Honestly, if she had to choose which one of them would win in a no holds barred fight, as disloyal to Oliver as it may be, Bruce was the older and more experienced fighter. Of course, this was Oliver’s home turf so that might even the playing field.

Oliver was much more familiar with this city than Bruce was, he was younger, and (even though Oliver was heavily scared from previous injuries) he was more agile and lithe. He had an impressive musculature but where the Bat relied on power punches and kicks along the lines of Muay Thai, Judo and Kung Fu (among others too numerous to list), the fighting style the Arrow had developed was more along the lines of Jeet Kune Do, Wing Chun, and Kyudu. This made him more agile, less bulky, and better able to change his form to suit the fight at hand.

Felicity smoothed her hands over her stomach and centered herself. No sense borrowing trouble. Just because she was having a little fun with both of them didn’t mean they would get into an all-out battle over her. The very idea it could even get to that point was ridiculous. Bruce had her lock, stock, and barrel four years ago and he never even sent her a postcard and she’d been glued to Oliver’s side for the last three and a half years and he’d never so much as made a single gesture toward her in any way (the occasional look notwithstanding). The most Oliver had ever done is drop the occasional double entendre and that was just because he got a kick out of hearing her sputter and babble over it.

On second thought, she thought, I hope they do kick each other’s asses. Maybe she and Diggle would get to watch from the sidelines. Note to self: Along with antacids, pick up whoppers and microwave popcorn.

After all the questions were asked and answered and the Wayne Enterprise guests filed out to return to their hotel, Felicity’s luck finally ran out. On one side of her was Oliver, on the other was her dad, and in front of them stood a very perturbed looking Bruce with Isabel’s claws dug firmly in the arm of his navy Armani suit.

“I insist that Oliver and I be allowed to take you both out to dinner tonight,” she cooed at him then turned to the elder black man. “Felicity will come as well and you can do some catching up.”

“That would be lovely but I’m afraid I’ve already made other plans tonight,” Lucius said as he turned to Felicity apologetically. “I don’t get to this end of the country very often and we have a few more stops we have to make before we leave tomorrow. We’re still on for brunch though, right Baby?”

“Of course, Daddy,” Felicity nodded with a soft smile.

He kissed her on the cheek and gave her hand another pat before turning and heading out. “Are you coming with me in the limo, Bruce?”

“No, I’ll just take a cab,” he said to the older man. “I wanted to catch up with Baby for a few minutes before I head out.”

Lucius waved without turning back and Oliver just shot him a perturbed look, “Baby?”

“Felicity’s nickname,” Bruce said smoothly as he focused all of his attention on Felicity again. “No one ever called her by her given name back in Gotham, isn’t that right, Baby?” He gave her that soft smoldering grin that used to turn her insides to jelly and said, “She was all big blue eyes and white-gold hair with just the sweetest smile you ever saw. All you had to do was take one look at her and you’d want nothing more than to put your arms around her and carry her away somewhere safe.”

Felicity didn’t even bat an eye. She was expecting this. “Actually Bruce, only the older generation ever really called me ‘Baby’. You know, like you and Dad.” She smiled sweetly and batted her eyelashes just a little.

“Yes, but when I called you ‘Baby’, you never called me ‘Daddy’ in return.” He paused with a wicked twinkle in his eye, “Well, except for that one time.”

She could feel the looks being sent her way and she ignored them. “Speaking of dads, Dick called me the other day and said he was getting serious about that girl he’s been seeing. Who knows? Pretty soon you might be a grandfather.” Bruce flinched. It was barely noticeable but it was enough that she could count it as payback for the ‘daddy’ remark.

“You have a son?” Isabel asked, feigning interest.

“Oh yes,” Felicity answered for him. “Bruce is quite the family man. He’s taken in several foster children over the years. He might not look like it but he’s actually quite paternal,” she smiled sweetly as the vein in his temple began to throb. “You could even say that Bruce is a kind of honorary uncle. His son Tim and I went to prep together and we spent hours just hanging out with his other son Dick and his girlfriend Barbara in the basement when we were kids. I’ve known the Wayne family since I was in diapers. Why, Bruce and his butler, Alfred, practically helped raise me. They even kept my coloring on their refrigerator, right Bruce?” She could almost hear the enamel of Bruce’s teeth crumbling as he gritted his teeth.

Oliver didn’t know what was going on but he could obviously feel the charge between them building in the air because he placed his hand on Felicity’s back and moved closer to her. It wasn’t intended to be an outward sign of possession, he was instead subtly signaling to her to curb her foot-in-mouth (even though Felicity was perfectly in control for once), but Bruce’s eyes darkened and tensed and the essence of the Bat came forth. “Since you and Mr. Fox have plans, I guess Felicity and I will have to say our goodbyes here then. She and I should be getting back to work.”
“No rush, Queen. However, if you have to get back to work, that’s fine. I hope you won’t mind doing me a solid and sparing Felicity for an hour or so, though.” Bruce smiled at her predatorily. “Every time I’ve tried getting some time in to speak to her it’s like someone’s been throwing up roadblocks.”

“Nonsense Oliver, work can wait. Lunch sounds like a splendid idea!” Isabel said as she held on to Bruce even tighter. Honestly, Felicity thought, it was like watching someone try to boat a marlin. “We should all go; you, me, Oliver, and Felicity! I know just the place. It’s one of the most exclusive restaurants in Starling City and I always keep a standing reservation.” Again with the eyelashes. “The oysters are sublime. I don’t suppose you get the quality of seafood we have here living in Gotham.”

Oysters. Subtle. Next she’ll be recommending the local rhino horn and Spanish fly.

Before Oliver could agree or disagree, Felicity took a side step closer causing his hand to slide across her waist until it was on her hip and she looped her arm around his in a more than casually friendly hug. “We would but this one,” she bumped her hip against his causing Oliver’s eyes to practically bug out, “has been promising me some time alone all week and I finally got him to agree to have lunch with his sister. You know,” she said conspiratorially to Isabel like they were besties and she hadn’t rung the bitch’s bell just two days previously, “you and Bruce should definitely go though! Trust me, the two of you have a lot in common. I’m sure you’ll find tons of interesting things to talk about.” She said smiling at Bruce.

“Perhaps dinner then?” Bruce said with an edge to his tone.

“Again, sorry, right Oliver?” She said turning to the now visibly angered Oliver. Oh, was she going to pay for this one later. Oh boy, oh boy.

“Right,” Oliver said tightly. “Felicity and I are having dinner with…friends, and then we’re planning on going to my club afterwards.”

“Tell you what,” Felicity said turning on her sunshine and rainbows persona to full effect, “you and Isabel should make a whole night of it since you seem to find yourself at such loose ends. If you like Isabel, I can let your assistant know and he can clear your calendar for the rest of the day,”

“That would be wonderful, thank you Felicity,” Isabel said, that same strange spark of energy lighting up her eyes again. “Why if you keep being this sweet to me I might just have to start calling you Baby myself.” She turned to Bruce who was none too happy at this unexpected winning volley. “Come along, Bruce. We’ll take my car and afterwards I’ll be happy to take you to your hotel.”

Yeah, Felicity thought, maybe she’ll even offer you turn down service.

Chapter Seven

As soon as Bruce and Isabel left the lobby Felicity disengaged from Oliver and headed to the conference room to gather her notes and her jacket. Oliver stormed in after her and locked the door behind him. “Okay, what the hell was all that?” He demanded.

She gave him a censuring look as she shrugged on her jacket. “People are going to hear you, can’t this wait until we’re upstairs?” What she didn’t add was, ‘so I can have time to gather my thoughts and make up something that sounds somewhat reasonable.’

“No,” he said as he walked to the door that connected to the reception area and locked it as well. “I want an explanation and I want it right now.”

Felicity propped one hip against the deep walnut conference table and hugged her waist with both arms, her long legs crossed at the ankles as she looked at him. It was the same stance she often took both at the office and in the Lair but, unbeknownst to her, in that dress with her hair flowing over her shoulders like molten sunshine and her big blue eyes free from the heavy frames she usually wore, she looked like the beginning of every fantasy he’d ever had. “What exactly do you want me to explain?”

“Oh, I have a whole list in mind,” Oliver said in a growl normally reserved for green leather as he advanced on her, stopping only when he was just a few inches away. “One: Why didn’t you tell me Lucius Fox was your father? Two: What the hell is with you and Bruce Wayne? Three: What have you got cooked up with Isabel? Four—”

“Wait,” she said holding up her hand in a ‘stop’ gesture, “there is nothing getting ‘cooked up’ between me and that woman—!”

“Four,” he growled, inching forward until she could feel his breath on her face, “Why are you so desperate to avoid Wayne that you felt the need to confirm every nasty insinuation Isabel has ever made about us by practically groping me out there, and why the hell did you wear that dress if you didn’t want him to notice you? And five: What the hell else about yourself haven’t you told me?”

Felicity’s cheeks turned as red as her dress, “Are you done?”
“Not even close!” He bit out, “But you can start by answering those questions first.”

Felicity jammed her finger into his rock hard chest as hard as she could. It probably hurt her finger more than it hurt him but it made her feel better damn it! “Well, in that case, I can answer all of your questions right now: I never told you because it’s none of your goddamned business!”

“Not my business?” He asked, taken aback. “This,” he tapped his finger against the table, “this is my business! And as long as you are involved in the parts of my life that you are involved in when we aren’t here, everything about you is my business!”

“Since when?” She demanded, the rising volume of her voice matching his own.

“Since day one! Since the first day I let you in!”

“You let me in?” She snorted. “I saved your life, you didn’t let me in!”

“Bullshit!” He shot back. “We’re a team, Felicity—a team! In order to trust you I have to know who you are! You know everything about my life, Diggle’s life! Why don’t we know anything about yours? After all, this isn’t the first time we’ve had to deal with sudden revelations when it comes to you, is it?”

Her face froze, “I told you six months ago that I didn’t know anything about that.”

“And at the time I believed you; now, I’m not so sure,” he said with a cruel edge.

Felicity flinched as she moved away from him, her face suffused with a mixture of anger, humiliation, and pain, “I didn’t and you know that! Believe it or not, I don’t care; my life is none of your goddamned business either way! It’s not like you haven’t sprung a few surprises on us over the years; Sara, Helena, your mother and her whole closet full of skeletons! I didn’t know because I never wanted to! It didn’t matter to me, okay? It’s not like you’re the poster child for resolving personal issues, is it? The only reason we know as much about you as we do is because it’s your mission to begin with and, whenever anything comes up related to the island, we have to practically drag it out of you or wait until it blows up in our faces. You know about Diggle’s life because you asked him. Not once—not once—have you ever expressed any interest in me as a person. You’ve never asked me any personal questions or even had a conversation with me that wasn’t related to the job at hand. I’m just a tool to you so don’t you dare stand there and act as though I’ve somehow betrayed you when you’ve screwed me over too many times to count and yet I’m still here fighting your goddamned battles!”

“When have I ever screwed you over?” He raged, “And don’t you dare throw the executive assistant thing back in my face! I’m sick and tired of hearing it! If working upstairs beside me is such a fucking chore then just quit, damn it!”

“Fine! I quit!” Felicity spat out, her eyes filling with hot tears as she stomped toward the locked door. “Keep your job, keep your mission, as far as I’m concerned you can just shove it all up your--!”

In less than two strides he was gripping her arm, spinning her around and before she even had time to speak he was kissing her. His arms wrapped around her as he pushed her into the wall so hard the breath was forced from her lungs.

One hand slid from her back up into her hair where he pulled her neck back so he could better control the angle while the other slid downward until he was squeezing her behind through the tighter than tight dress.

And then Felicity was kissing him back, her hands wrapped around his shoulders even as the tears continued to course down her cheeks. He could taste them on his lips and his kisses grew softer though no less probing or intense. He pulled her higher onto his chest, lifting her feet off the ground, and walked her to the table where he sat her on the edge while moving between her thighs. As her legs fell open the hem began to ride up and he helped it along by rubbing his hands along her stocking covered thighs until her sheer nude panties and garter belt were visible.

He glanced down and his breath began to stutter. She knew there were reasons that they shouldn’t be doing this but fuck if she could think of any at the moment.

He pushed her jacket from her shoulders until it fell off her arms and onto the tabletop. There was a long zip at the back of the dress so he eased it down…down… down… pulling her long sleeves down her arms until her dress was bunched around her waist like a belt then released her mouth so that he could look at her unclothed state. Her pale pink nipples were clearly visible through the sheer fabric of lingerie that looked less like a bra and more like the beginnings of one finished off by something that was created either by God or the Devil. The look on his face told her that whoever it was who invented this brilliant piece of erotic architecture, someday she was going to shake their hand and say thank you.

“God, you are so…” he breathed before capturing her lips again and quickly removing his jacket as he toed off his shoes.

He had undone his belt, tie, and most of his shirt before Felicity’s brain began to come back online. At first it was just a buzzing in her head and then she began to hear the words her mind had been trying to tell her: You have been in almost this exact same position before and it did not end well, remember? “Wait, wait, wait!” She said as she used the last bit of her willpower to push him away from her and jump down off the desk, luckily without twisting her ankle in the very high heels that she had decided would probably spend the rest of their lives in the back of her closet about ten minutes after she had put them on.

Figures he’d leave the shoes, she thought fuzzily as she hauled up her top then pulled down her hemline. What is it with men and shoes?

“What’s wrong?” He asked dumbly as he stood watching her, his chest heaving as he fought to catch his breath.

Felicity pushed her hair out of her eyes and turned to look at him…which was a mistake. Woof, she thought as her eyes inadvertently traced the line of him through his mostly undone trousers. Apparently a fondness for leaping from rooftops and hunting down evildoers wasn’t the only thing he and Bruce had in common. “Uh…oh wow, you are really, really…wow.”

He stepped forward and cupped her cheek in his hand then pulled her in for another deep kiss. He ran his hand down her bare back and eased her closer until she could feel him hard against her stomach. Her brain went fuzzy again. She was just doing something, what was it again? Something about…? Oh fuck, that feels nice. He cupped her breast in his palm through her dress as the other slipped inside the still unzipped back to caress her bare skin. He began kissing a line down her neck as his thumb stroked the hard peak. When he got to the junction between her neck and shoulder he licked her and she made a noise that was something between a moan and a chirp. She would have been embarrassed but then he chuckled and started to nip and suck his way back up until he was sucking and nibbling on her earlobe, his teeth clicking against her earring, and she was just gone.

“Oh God,” She clutched him to her and pulled his mouth from her body and back to her lips. Her hand slipped inside of his open shirt and her fingers began to touch the angles and planes of him. His lips left hers after a deep, probing kiss to caress her throat.
“That feels…oh, that feels really good. That’s…that’s nice. Oh please do that…uh huh. You’re very good at this. Excellent. Gold stars all around,” she began to mumble as his mouth found her earlobe again and he chuckled low and sexy between nibbles and sucks. “Yeah, yeah. Oooh yeah. This is okay, this is good. We can keep doing this. It’s fine.”

He picked her up and placed her back on the table. He kissed her, gently working down the front of her dress so he could expose her bra then paid homage to the hardened peaks of her breasts through the sheer material. As his teeth nipped at her, she gasped, her fingers sinking into his hair as she clutched at him. One of her bra straps fell off her shoulder and he helped it on its way, exposing one of her breasts fully to his gaze before cupping it in his hand then kissing her again, his tongue exploring her mouth as his thumb teased her until her head began to swim. His other hand left her bottom to slide up her silk covered thighs, nimbly unsnapping her garters. His hand left her breast to join its mate, sliding over her thighs and tugging her toward him.

“I want you,” he whispered against her ear as one hand slipped between their bodies to find the junction of her thighs. His fingers rubbed at her through the thin lace and she gasped. “You want me too,” he said. “You’re wet for me, I can feel you,” he breathed against her lips as he began to tug them down.

“Oooh…wait. Wait…okay. Okay.” She pulled away, a bit more reluctantly this time, leaving her hands on Oliver’s chest to help them maintain distance. “This—this—this,” she stuttered and took a deep breath. “This is a bad idea. We can’t do this, not here.” She got up off the table, a bit more carefully this time, her hands attempting to keep him at a safe distance.

She managed that for about two whole steps until he pushed her hands away and moved in until he was kissing her again. “Like I said, I want you,” he told her, his eyes dark with lust. “I don’t care where we do this as long as I get to be inside of you as soon as possible.” Her breath caught in her lungs as he pressed her close so she could feel just how serious he was. He licked her lips before going in for another teasing kiss. “My place is too far away, your place maybe? Or I can call ahead and get us a room somewhere close? We can be in a bed in less than five minutes if we leave now.” He whispered against her ear before tugging her earlobe in his mouth and making her knees wobble causing her to have to grip his arm or risk falling over. “Or we can just stay right where we are and satisfy a fantasy of mine where I’ve got you bent over the desk and calling out my name.”

She squeaked and shuddered as his tongue made a rasping sound against her ear, his warm breath tickling her, and suddenly a bed sounded like a really, really good idea. Then again, so did the desk thing. Basically it all sounded good right about then.

“I want to watch you fall apart underneath me,” he whispered in her ear. “I want to know how you taste.”

A really, really--- “Bad,” Felicity said letting go and taking a few steps back this time as a precaution. “You said this was a bad idea, that we could never do this.”

“When did I say that?” Oliver asked with a frown as he took a step towards her. “I never said that. We’ve never discussed anything about something happening between us, but maybe we should have because you are just so…” He looked up and down like he was a starving man and she was a ten-course feast sent from the gods. “Remarkable doesn’t even begin to cover it,” He added with a sexy smile as he reached for her again.

“No,” she frowned, avoiding his hands as he tried to pull her to him again. “You told me—oooh wait.” Realization dawned and it hit her in the face like a brick wall. “You weren’t talking about me, were you?” She laughed mirthlessly, a hitch in her voice as the tears began to flow once more. “I see.”
“Felicity?” He frowned as he took another step towards her, “What---?”

She pointed at him, her whole body trembling with emotion as she tried to control her breathing. “You said you couldn’t ever be with someone you cared about or ever could care about but that doesn’t apply to me, does it? I thought you were trying to tell me that you could see something happening between us and you were trying to—to—” “Wasn’t it?” Felicity sniffed as she tugged on her jacket.

“Shit,” Oliver breathed as he ran his hand over his face. “Listen, that’s not what I meant--!”

He followed her around the room as she began to collect her things. “Look, when we were in Russia and I told you that I wasn’t thinking of this—I mean, I wasn’t thinking of you; not directly—crap!” He scrubbed his hands through his hair, “I meant that I wasn’t talking about us, I was talking about how it is with Laurel and me! You just misunderstood. I mean, I knew you had a crush on me but I didn’t think it would ever get to this point because I always thought of you as just a…um, well, a friend before and thinking of you in a sexual way was just wrong on so many levels and I…” he froze and a strange part of her brain watched in amusement as dawning horror spread over his features. She now knew what it looked like for everyone else when, no matter what she did, the wrong things just kept pouring out of her mouth. It was like he was possessed or something. “I swear to God that was not what I had intended to say.”

She turned abruptly on her heel and began moving towards the door. “No—no—no—Felicity, don’t, just give me a second, okay? Felicity, just let me get my thoughts together and we’ll—I’ll—wait!”

Ignoring him, she walked across the reception area where the caterers were cleaning up the remains of the spread from the meeting. The women stopped and stared at her in low whispers as she made her way to the ladies room and closed the door.

Oliver followed her, in long strides across the floor, his clothing still partially undone and disheveled. The whispers among the catering staff turned to giggles as they huddled together and watched him as he walked right into the ladies room and locked the door behind him.

As soon as he turned the deadbolt and stepped into the room he ran headlong into an older Mexican woman in a QC maintenance uniform who was wagging her finger at him and speaking in rapid fire Spanish.

“No puede estar en aquí!” She told him angrily. “Usted es un hombre malo! Voy a llamar a la seguridad en usted si usted no deja! Este es el baño de las mujeres! Pervert!”

“I’m sorry! ¡Lo siento! Yo sé que no debería estar aquí, sólo necesito hablar con mi amigo por un momento, por favor!” She let fly with even more rapid fire curses at him for violating the sanctity of the ladies so he carefully eased her cart toward the door and ducked his head to avoid her hands which were flapping a little too close for comfort. “Yo no soy un pervertido, señora, lo prometo! Sé que este es el baño de las mujeres, pero sólo voy a ser un momento. Lo siento mucho, señora! Un minuto! Yo sólo necesito uno minuto! ¡Gracias!” He said unlocking the door again and practically shoving the woman and her cleaning cart outside, before turning the lock again. He stepped into the room carefully and called out to Felicity. “Can we just talk, please? Before the cleaning lady calls security and I have to explain to the press why I was caught skulking around in a woman’s bathroom?”

“Go away!” She said from one of the stalls.
He approached, hearing her muffled sobs. “Open the door, Felicity. Please?”

He heard her blow her nose then the flushing of the toilet. The door opened and she shoved past him straight to the sinks without looking at him. As she turned on the faucets to wash her hands he stood behind her and tried to place his hands on her shoulders but she shrugged him off. “Felicity please, give me a chance to explain.”

Felicity got a paper towel and ran it under the water so she could wipe off the mascara that had ran and smeared on her cheeks. “There’s nothing to explain Oliver; I’m done. Now go away.”

“I’m not going anywhere,” he said stubbornly. ”You and I are going to fix this.”

She glanced at him as she finger combed her hair into some semblance of order. “Why, Oliver? Why do we need to fix anything?”

“Because before all this happened we were friends,” he said quietly. “I’ve lost too many friends to lose another now, especially just because of some stupid misunderstanding that happened because I put my foot in my mouth.”

She straightened her dress until she looked put together enough to risk going back to the office for her purse and briefcase then turned to him, suddenly feeling much calmer. “You know something I’ve learned after being a nervous babbler all my life? Sometimes when someone sticks their foot in their mouth it isn’t because they accidently told a lie, it’s because they accidently told the truth. Goodbye Oliver.” She tried to push past him but he put his hands on her arms to hold her firmly in place.

He sighed and looked down at her, his eyes awash in misery. “Where are you going?”

“Upstairs, so I can get my things and type up a resignation letter.”

“Fine,” he said as he released her. “You want to go upstairs then we’ll go upstairs.”

She walked past him and he took a second to shove his tie in his pocket, refasten his trousers, and button his shirt before following her across the main lobby to the elevators. He took his time because he knew she wasn’t going anywhere without him. The elevator to the executive floor required a keycard to access it and Felicity had left her purse and ID card upstairs.

They rode up to the top floor in silence, maintaining their distance, until entering his office. Immediately she sat down to her computer and began typing while he leaned heavily against the door and watched. She hit the print button and began gathering her things, shoving her personal tablet and other items into her briefcase and taking her purse from the bottom drawer. She then snatched the page she had printed from the printer, got up from her desk, and handed it to him as she shrugged the strap to her case higher onto her shoulder.

He kept his arms crossed over his chest, not making a move to take it from her. “You don’t have to do this.”

“Just take the letter, Oliver,” she told him.

“No.”

“Fine.” She sat it on her desk and made a move to the door. “I already emailed a copy to HR anyway.” He didn’t move, his large frame blocking the exit. “Get out of the way.”

“No.”
She closed her eyes in frustration, “I’m not doing this with you so just let me go.”

“You’re not going anywhere,” he said as he straightened and took a step towards her. “Not until we talk about this.”

“It won’t change what happened.” She said firmly. “I’m done and I want to leave.”

“I didn’t mean what I said,” he told her with a pained expression. “I know you didn’t know about him and about what happened on the island—”

She opened her mouth to speak and a pained sob escaped from between her lips instead.

He took a step forward to reach for her but she flinched back and his hands hung in the air as he shook his head, his mouth tightening into a pained grimace, “God, Felicity; I swear I didn’t mean it. I know you didn’t know and I’ve never held that against you, I promise. I don’t even know why I said it. I--”

“It doesn’t matter,” she said quickly, refusing to look him in the eye. “I just want to go home.”

“I can take you home,” he told her.

“No.”

“If you’re worried that I’ll try something, I won’t. I’ll just take you straight home, I won’t even touch you.” He dropped his gaze and shifted his feet, “Look, what happened downstairs…if I took advantage of the situation, I’m sorry.” He licked his lips and lifted his eyes which were flooded with pain. “I’m so sorry, Felicity. I don’t know what came over me. My only excuse is that—no, there is no excuse, but I can promise you it will never happen again. None of it; it’s done and we never even have to talk about it ever again.”

Hot tears began to sting her eyes and before she could help it they were streaming down her cheeks. “Goddamn it!” Felicity said in frustration as she wiped the moisture off her cheeks with her hand angrily.

“I’m sorry,” Oliver said as he took another step towards her, his hand outstretched as though to pull her closer to him but she backed away. “Felicity, I didn’t mean to upset you—”

“I’m not upset, you jackass! I’m pissed off!” She growled at him. “You get pissed off and you punch things, I get pissed off and I cry which really sucks because more than anything else right now I really, really just want to beat the crap out of something!”

Oliver backed up a step and put his hands to his sides and away from his body in a gesture of supplication. “You have every right to be angry and I get that, but you have to give me a chance to make this right. We’ve been friends for too long to—“

“But we’re not friends,” she broke in. “You said so yourself: You know nothing about me. Friends trust each other and you don’t trust me, Oliver. And frankly…” she looked at him, her face a mask of disappointment. “I don’t think I can trust you, not anymore, because while you, and the mission, and Diggle are all important to me…I just…I don’t think I was ever that important, not to you. Not as a friend. Not as anything.”

“Really?” She asked with a watery smile. “Then answer me this: If I hadn’t stopped you and we…if we…finished--what would have happened after? What would we have been to each other tomorrow when it was out of your system and we were staring at each other over room service? What then? Would it have been a one-time thing? Over and done in a weekend and business as usual on Monday? Would you have waited a couple of days to send me some flowers and a balloon that said ‘Let’s Just Be Pals’ for me to stick on my desk? What?”

“I don’t know!” He broke out. “How the hell am I supposed to answer that? I didn’t plan it, I didn’t expect this! How am I supposed to know what would have happened next when, frankly, I don’t even know what’s happening right now?! Goddamn it!” He growled deep in his throat, his eyes reminding her of a cornered animal as he ran two hands through his hair then scrubbed at his ever present stubble roughly. He pointed an accusing finger at her, “You—you confuse the shit out of me, you know that? You’ve got me so turned around in my head that I—“ His mouth clamped shut and he just stood there as he struggled to come up with the right words. “No one knows me, Felicity. No one knows me. You’re supposed to be one of the few people that do but right now—“ his voice dropped to a near whisper, “I never thought of you that way, not because you aren’t…” he sighed. “This is what I meant in Russia. I may not have been thinking of you, but this is what I meant. I can’t have you working here and in the Foundry and have this kind of relationship with you as well. I can’t. I’m sorry.”

Felicity nodded, her face clearing as she straightened her spine and took a deep breath. “That’s fine, and you’re right: Neither of us saw this coming and I can accept what you’re saying but…what happened, happened and—I’ve already done this, Oliver.” Her voice was husky from the yelling and the crying, but also strong and determined. “My reaction to it isn’t about you as much as it’s about me. I will never again be the girl who waits for someone else to decide whether or not she is worthy of their time or attention ever again. You wanted to know who I really am and this is me telling you now: I am not that girl, Oliver.” She said emphatically. “I would rather spend the rest of my life alone then give anyone the opportunity to make me that girl ever again.”

“When did I---? What are you talking about?” He asked, obviously confused.

She gave him a pitying look even as she realized that her words weren’t as much for his benefit as they were for her own. “I’m saying I’m someone who needs to learn to stop living her life around someone else’s schedule. I need to stop falling for the hero when the hero never falls for me and I won’t be a piece of office furniture that gets moved into the bedroom when you’re between women.”

“What women?” He asked in anger and exasperation.

“She’s my friend, Oliver! You put me in a really shitty position, do you realize that? Now I either have to lie to her and pretend nothing happened or I have to confess to someone I care about that—I—“ She felt herself choke up and he started toward her again but she held out her hand accusingly. “Do you even realize how sick and dirty I feel right now? I told you once that I didn’t have many friends, Oliver! You guys are it: You, Dig, Roy, and Sara—that’s it for me! That’s all I have! And now I might lose one of my friends, I hurt my friend, because you decided this was okay!”

“No one is getting hurt by what happened!” Oliver said stubbornly. “Sara and I aren’t together—“ She shook her head, not even wanting to hear it, “You two have something, I know you do. Don’t you think she might be hurt if she knew what just happened between us?”

“She’s my friend, Oliver! You put me in a really shitty position, do you realize that? Now I either have to lie to her and pretend nothing happened or I have to confess to someone I care about that—I—“ She felt herself choke up and he started toward her again but she held out her hand accusingly. “Do you even realize how sick and dirty I feel right now? I told you once that I didn’t have many friends, Oliver! You guys are it: You, Dig, Roy, and Sara—that’s it for me! That’s all I have! And now I might lose one of my friends, I hurt my friend, because you decided this was okay!”

“Sara…” His mouth tightened into a grim line and his voice dropped a few octaves, “Sara and I aren’t like that. Not anymore.”

“Bullshit!” Felicity snorted. “You and I both know that you had sex with her fairly recently and I’m not some cheap lay you can release your tensions on until your girlfriend blows back into town. Not that kind of girl, sorry. I don’t play musical beds, Oliver.”

“I never said you were and I would never try to make you into that!”

“I can’t do this—“ she began.

“Felicity,” he came closer to her and glanced down at her hands but didn’t try to take them in his own. “My relationship with Sara is complicated and whatever we have is less about commitment and monogamy and more about stress relief. Sara has her partners and she doesn’t care what I do or who I do it with and vice versa. We tried to make it into more but there was just too much bad road between us. That said my relationship with her has nothing to do with what happened. I won’t lie and tell you that I don’t find you attractive or that what I felt downstairs wasn’t real, but it was a mistake; one that won’t ever be repeated, I swear. I know what kind of girl you are but I also know what kind of guy I am.”

“I think…I think it’s time for me to leave.” As soon as the words left her mouth, Felicity knew they were the truest words she had probably ever spoken.

“Fine, yeah,” Oliver heaved a sigh, stepping back. “Take the whole weekend, Diggle and I can handle it on our own.”

“No, not just the weekend.” Her eyes met his and she swallowed, a hollow feeling opened up inside her and the world seemed to swim in front of her. “I quit.”

“I quit,” she repeated firmly, closing her eyes as she heard her own voice saying the words she never thought she’d ever hear herself say. “Both jobs.”

He stared at her for a long moment before his expression grew dark. “Fine.” He moved away from the door, his tone cold and seemingly indifferent as though all emotion had left him. “There’s the door. Have a nice life.”

At that moment, as if on cue, the door swung open and Diggle stepped through. Oblivious to what was happening he grinned as soon as his eyes lit on Felicity. “Damn girl, you look good! I like that dress.” He clapped and rubbed his hands together, then looked from one to the other, “So what’s the plan for tonight? Are you going to meet with the Wayne people later or are we going straight to the club?” He paused when no one answered, taking in the tense scene before him. “Okay, what did I miss?”

“Nothing,” Felicity said bleakly as she stepped around them and walked through the door. “Bye John, I’ll see you later.”

His worried eyes followed her progress to the elevators before he turned to Oliver. “What’s wrong with her? What happened?”

“She quit.” Oliver said tersely as he headed into his office to grab his briefcase.

“What do you mean ‘she quit’?” He asked following him, his tone darkening with anger. “You’re not just going to let her leave like that, are you?’’

“Yep, just like that,” Oliver said as he switched off his monitor and swiftly walked past Diggle to the door.

“Oliver, you need to go after her! We need her!”
“Just drop it, Dig.”

“You and I both know that ain’t happening!”

“Dig!” Oliver growled in the voice he reserved when he was in the hood.

“Fine,” Diggle bit out, shooting him a dirty look as he joined him in the elevator and slapped his hand on the button to take them to the parking level. “But we will be talking about this later. In detail.”

Oliver didn’t say anything. He just looked straight ahead, his mind in turmoil and jaw clenched. He needed to forget it and move on. He’d managed before she came into his life and he’d manage now that she was gone.

“We need her, Oliver!”

They’d be just fine.
Chapter Eight

The first thing Felicity did when she got home was strip off that damn dress and the shoes and toss them as far back in her closet as she could. It had been a stupid idea to buy it in the first place. What had she been thinking? What was the point of it all. Stupid! Stupid! Stupid! She shed the several hundred dollars’ worth of undergarments across her bedroom floor as she headed into the shower and scrubbed her skin until the hot water ran out then punished herself by remaining under the cold spray until it had soaked into her bones.

She toweled herself off then brushed her teeth until the taste of Oliver was replaced by toothpaste, dressed in her most comfortable pair of fuzzy fleece pajama pants and a cotton camisole top, then made her way to the kitchen. She opened her refrigerator and looked inside to find two kinds of mustard, an old chunk of moldy cheese that she promptly tossed in the garbage disposal, a jar of Claussen mini-pickles, and Diet Coke. She sighed and grabbed the stack of menus off the counter and glanced at the clock.

Holy crap, she thought. She hadn’t been home this early in…”Huh,” she said out loud. “Well, don’t have to worry about that anymore now that I don’t have a job to go to.” As soon as the words left her mouth she felt the hot tears sting her eyes. “No, not doing this again,” Felicity muttered as she pushed off from the counter and began to punch in the number to Mr. Chow’s. “I wonder if I promise to give the delivery guy a big tip he could score me a couple of pints of Ben and Jerry’s?”

Before the phone could pick up on the other end there was a knock at the door. She placed the phone back on the hook with a sigh, walked across her living room, and stared at the closed door with trepidation. What if it was Oliver? The knock sounded again and she looked at the doorknob for a second before peering through the peephole. “Fuck,” she said under her breath. Today was not her day. With a deep sigh of defeat she unlocked the door and let it swing open without even bothering to speak to the person on the other side.

“Surprised to see you home at—” Bruce glanced at the clock on her wall as he stepped inside. “Three o’clock in the afternoon.”

“If it’s such a surprise then why were you knocking at my door in the first place?” She walked back over to her phone, picking up the menu she had set down, before watching him as he took stock of her tiny house. “Is Isabel in the car?”

“Good, because I’m not buying extra take-out for that woman.” She placed her order, ignoring him as best she could even though his presence seemed to fill the entire room.

Bruce listened in as she placed the very large order and cocked an eyebrow at her. “I assume this means you’re inviting me to stay because you ordered enough to feed us and about six other people.”

“I’m stress eating and I have no food in the fridge,” she said with a sigh as she reached for a bottle of red she had hidden away in the cabinet near the glasses.

“Stress eating, huh?” Bruce said, rocking back on his heels in a way that would have really irritated her had she not felt so emotionally numb. “What’s got you so stressed that you had to order half the menu?”

“Quit my job today. It was your fault—well, mostly your fault, so no, you’re not invited. No egg rolls for you. They’re all mine.” She held up the bottle of wine in her hand with the label facing outwards. “’96 Château Lafite Rothschild Pauillac.”

“Nice vintage,” he said as he sat down in one of the barstools and peered at her over the counter. “Hmm,” she agreed. “Expensive, too. It’s no ‘97 Romane Conti, but it’s good stuff. It was a gift from Oliver.” She popped the cork and poured a bit into a glass, frowned, then poured some more before taking a sip. “Mmm, good. This is mine, too. The whole thing.”

“That’s a little selfish, isn’t it?” He asked in an amused tone, his lips tilting up slightly at the corners.

“That’s me,” she sighed softly as she looked into the dark red wine in her glass. “Selfish, and stupid, and always getting in over my head. Running away.” She took another deep swallow of the wine and let it wash over her taste buds, giving herself a moment to enjoy the notes of currant and other bold flavors on her tongue. “Quitting.”

“Doesn’t sound like you,” Bruce said quietly.

“That’s because you don’t know me,” Felicity returned. She glanced up at him, “Don’t suppose you brought any ice cream with you?”
Bruce patted the pockets of his jacket and shrugged apologetically. “Sorry, must have left it in my other suit.”

“Don’t you know you’re never supposed to come empty handed to someone’s house for dinner?” She asked as she reached for the bottle again after she drained the glass.

“You told me I wasn’t invited,” he reminded her as his eyes flicked first to the glass she was holding and then to her face.

“You’re not, so why are you here?” She leaned against the door of her refrigerator. The cool of the stainless steel against her nearly bare back caused her arms to break out in goosebumps but her eyes never left his as she waited for him to answer. “And how did you know I was home? Are you staking out my place now, Bruce?”

“We got news that someone put a contract out on you,” Bruce said, his voice changing from casual to Bat at breakneck speed.

“So what?” She asked, taking another sip.

His eyebrows drew together and he gave her a look of utter outrage, “So what? Did you acquire a death wish in recent years?”

“Contract got canceled,” she said, purposefully avoiding his facetious aside knowing that it would open a whole can of worms she wasn’t eager to take on at that moment.

“Barbara told you.” It was a statement, not a question.

“Yeah, some people like to use this thing called ‘technology’ to relay news that isn’t necessarily urgent enough to require hopping a jet,” she told him. “The contract got canceled; I’m alive, moving on. Why are you here anyway?”

“Why wouldn’t I be here?” He asked her. “I find out one of my people is in danger I want to know what’s going on.”

“I’m not one of your ‘people’, Bruce,” she snorted.

He ignored her, nodding at the wine glass again. “Red wine, Chinese food, and ice cream? Doesn’t exactly go together, does it?”

“Are you kidding? That’s what my people call a Jewish sundae, where have you been?”

“This happen a lot?” He asked, indicating the bottle. “Red wine alone in the middle of the afternoon?”

“Not usually but I might decide to start making a habit of it, who knows? I have to find something to fill my days now that I don’t have a job to go to.” Concern tinged with some other emotion flitted across his face and she quirked an eyebrow at him. “Two glasses and I’m an alcoholic already? Really?”

“Just asking,” he said, his gaze never wavering. “You’re the one determined pick up bad habits and not share.”

“Do you want a glass, Bruce?” She asked him as he moved to behind the counter to join her.

“Just a taste,” he said quietly. “I don’t need a glass of my own.”
“Do you want my glass?” She asked as she reached for it but before she could his arms surrounded her and his lips were on hers.

She relaxed into the moment, the wine having warmed her blood and loosened her senses. His kiss was soft, and familiar, and like the wine that he could probably taste on her tongue it was bold and deep and everything she remembered and more.

Before she could gather her wits to push him away he was already pulling back. He looked down at her, his expression revealing nothing, and he said, “Good wine.”

“Probably tasted better in the glass,” she retorted, reaching for it and taking another sip, partly to steady her nerves and partly to wash the taste of him away.

“I don’t know about that,” Bruce said quietly, his eyes alight with some tender emotion. He stepped back to give her some space, keeping his hands to himself. “Why’d you quit your job?”

Felicity put the glass down, suddenly no longer interested in finishing it. She stepped back a few feet, feeling the need to move, and said as she stared at her bare feet, “Told you why.”

“You did,” he agreed, leaning on the counter as she had done earlier as he loosened his tie, opening the first couple of buttons at his throat. It was a nice tie, nice suit. Blue, she thought muzzily. “I’m just still not clear on how it’s my fault. Did you and your boyfriend have a fight or something?”

“I love how you do that,” she said as she looked at him, her head tilted slightly to one side. “You can ask one deceptively simple question and get so much information in return.”

“So far I’m not getting any information,” he pointed out.

“Oliver’s not my boyfriend,” she said firmly. “Not my lover, not my boss,” she sighed, “not even my friend.”

He looked at her with those midnight blue eyes which could either burn your soul or melt your heart depending on the emotions behind them. “You still haven’t told me how it’s my fault.”

“You hurt me,” Felicity said simply.

Bruce winced and put his hands in his pockets as he dropped his gaze. “I’m sorry.”

Felicity sensed the power shift continued on. “You should have told me that four years ago.”

“I tried,” he said quietly.

“You should have tried harder,” she said firmly.

“You mean the two texts you sent almost a week after we had sex? ‘Meeting BC 1 hour’? Yeah, saw those; I wasn’t sure if you were calling a team meeting or looking for another excuse to leave money on the nightstand.”

He shifted uncomfortably, his eyes skittering away from hers for a moment, “That’s a cheap shot.”
“Cheap shot from a cheap date; saved you almost fifty bucks by paying for my own ride.”

“You dyed your hair,” he observed, seeming to change the subject and yet, at the same time, not.

“Added low lights so I wouldn’t stand out so much,” Felicity fingered the half-dried mess that hung down her back and shoulders in waves.

“I liked the way you looked,” he said, his eyes caressing her features tenderly. “You shouldn’t have to hide yourself from anyone.”

Felicity chuckled hollowly and rubbed her hand over her eyes. They hurt, it felt like they were swollen and on fire from all the crying. “That’s all I’ve ever done so why stop now?”

“Why did you quit, Felicity?”

She almost asked ‘Which time,’ but she didn’t. “I just felt it was time to move on.”

“Why?” He asked in that hypnotic tone of his.

She took a steadying breath and met his gaze with one of her own, “Why are you here, Bruce?”

Silence.

She eyed him irritably. “I’m not playing any guessing games with you and you aren’t getting in my panties tonight so cut the crap and just tell me: why are you here?”

“I’m here for you,” he said, taking a step closer to her.

She snorted rudely and began to laugh. He watched her, his eyes growing darker. “Right. Okay. Thanks for that.” There was a knock at the door and she made her way toward it without bothering to speak to him or give him a second glance.

He followed her to the door. “I’ll pay for the food.”

She chuckled darkly, “Four years of waiting for closure and you want to make up for it by picking up the check for my take-out? That’s almost as classy as how you handled it last time. Thanks, but I got it—on both counts.” She grabbed her purse and opened the door for him. “You can go now,” she told him before turning to the man standing outside with her boxes of food.

He slipped out quietly, ignoring the look of apprehension on the face of the small statured Asian teenager as she paid him, and didn’t speak again until the boy hurried past. When she moved to close the door he held it open with his hand. She looked up at him and waited.

After a moment he said simply, “I’ll be back later. There are things we need to talk about.”

She didn’t acknowledge his statement; she just shut the door and locked it behind him.

She ate a few bites then shoved the rest in her nearly empty fridge. Chinese always tasted better the next day anyway, she told herself. Maybe now that I’m going to have all this free time on my hands I’ll start buying groceries again.

She walked across the room and sat down on her couch, tugging one of the big colorful throw pillows into her lap. Bruce wasn’t going away until he got what he came for, whatever that was. Part of her hoped that when she told him she quit QC he’d drop it but something told her he was going to confront Oliver next and he wasn’t going to be doing it as Bruce.

She buried her head in the pillow to muffle the sound as she screamed in frustration. Part of her just wanted to let the two of them deal with it while she threw her self-respect out the window and went to the bodega down the street to buy ice cream in her pajamas but that wasn’t going to happen.

The ‘let them duke it out amongst themselves’ thing, she clarified to her own brain. She was so very capable of leaving her house in her slippers and fuzzy lounge pants. In fact, when all this was said and done, she vowed to spend at least a month in nothing but pajamas as she caught up on almost three and a half years of sleep debt.

If Bruce confronted the Arrow as the Bat then there would be bloodshed—probably on both sides. Plus she would also be putting Diggle’s safety on the line. The Batman would attack first and deal with the consequences later and Oliver was fully prepared to kill if the situation called for it. Between the two of them—it did not bode well.

He would do it tonight, she reasoned. He came here as a precursor to his confrontation with the Arrow and then he’d come back here, probably in full armor, to let her know she’d been made redundant in that job as well. It was a very Bruce thing to do.

She looked at her TV that had actually gathered quite a bit of dust since she’d last turned it on and wondered what kinds of options she’d have in regards to daytime programming over the next month or so. Maybe she’d even take a quick nap on the couch or something? It had been awhile since she’d slept on her own couch and not the one in the Lair. She turned it on and tried to ignore the alarm bells in her head, tried not to acknowledge the fact that she was looking at the clock every five minutes, or that she kept tapping the arm of the couch nervously as she waited for it to get dark enough for the masks to take to the streets.

Not that she was going, she thought. They could handle it, right?

Finally, around seven, she walked to her bedroom to put on some clothes. She didn’t care if Mr. Ahuhmiebe saw her in her warm and fuzzies but there was no way she was standing between two armed to the teeth and pissed off vigilantes in her PJs because, while she appreciated the whimsical nature of her fluffy Monty Python Killer Bunny Slippers and pink and purple Dead Parrot pajamas, she didn’t feel like having to explain the joke while ducking arrows and batarangs.
Felicity dressed quickly in her most ragged and frayed jeans, a thin t-shirt she had bought at some vintage hippie shop with a silk screening of Lord Ganesha sitting on a lotus (she liked elephants and he looked kind of pretty with his big eyes and all the flowers on his crown), and a really lovely camel.
colored Donna Karan wrap around cashmere cardigan that reached her knees. She’d had it forever (and it looked it with some ratty bits of pilling here and there and the occasional pull in the weave) but it felt like a big soft hug and she was going for comfort, not style. Fuck style, she thought. I’m unemployed! I can be comfortable, damn it. Besides, she wasn’t going to risk getting blood on her good clothes just in case she miscalculated and had to help suture wounds and wrap bandages.

Tugging on a pair of pink Keds that she had splattered paint on the last time she redecorated her kitchen, she grabbed her bag and headed for the club.

Things were pretty hopping that night and the lines were fairly long already. She drove her mini around the back to the employee parking lot then opened the outer door that led down to the basement. It was quieter here; the noise of the club reduced to a throbbing boom as they’d built the Lair as far away from the action as they could. She tapped the entry code into the keypad and headed down the stairs to her computers and immediately began a surreptitious scan of all the security cameras and scanning equipment she had set up on the roof of the club and on the surrounding buildings and covered it up by running a few other programs in the foreground.

Over the last several months, every chance she got, she would set up the tiny wireless cameras and listening equipment all around them, getting as many angles as possible. Even Diggle had told her after one such foray into the surrounding abandoned warehouses that it was probably overkill but she believed in being prepared. If there’s one thing she’d learned from her time with Bruce (besides taking a minute to always stop and think before letting someone get their hands on the cookie jar, wink-wink, nudge-nudge), it was that you could never be too prepared or too paranoid. Hopefully, tonight, her paranoia would pay off.

In the background she could hear the steady metallic clack of the cold steel forged eskrima sticks and the occasional grunt of pain as Diggle and Oliver went at it. They were both so focused on their training that they hadn’t noticed her yet but she didn’t think that would last—

The room suddenly grew very quiet.

---long. “Damn, I’m good,” she muttered under her breath as she typed.

She felt his presence (a very tense and perturbed presence) behind her but didn’t look up until he spoke. “Felicity.”

“Oliver,” she said back, mocking his terse tone.

“What are you doing here?”

“Running some final checks on the system and making sure all the patches are in before I leave you guys to take care of yourselves,” she said casually.

“Diggle can do that,” he bit out as he moved to stand in her line of sight.

“Oh no, Diggle can’t do that,” the other man huffed as he put the sticks back in the weapons case. “Hey girl, nice to see you back.”

“Not back,” she called out, “just finishing up a few loose ends is all. Nice to see you too though.”

Oliver stared down at her unflinchingly and she pretended to ignore him as she expanded the reach of her scans and put on her headphones to listen for chatter off Bruce’s Oracle coms. They played this game for nearly ten minutes before Oliver grew impatient and snatched the headphones off her ears.
“We need to talk.”

“What about?” She asked as she slipped the headphones around her neck but close enough to her ears that she could still pick up faint chatter when and if he showed.

If looks could kill her dad would be brushing up on the Kaddish right about then.

“Now,” he bit out.

She turned off the monitor but kept her wireless headphones on as she followed him to a quiet corner of the room near the stairs to lean against the back of the couch. Diggle stayed on the other end of the training area, giving them distance, but she could see him watching them from the corner of his eye.

“Ayl mo-lay ra-chamim—” she recited under her breath.

“What was that,” Oliver asked sharply, pinning her with his penetrating stare.

“Nothing—Kaddish. It’s a Jewish—never mind,” she took a deep breath, exhaled to center herself, and faced him. “So, is this your way of escorting me to the door so you can kick me out of the club house? Because, just so you know, I was planning on leaving as soon as my scans and updates were done anyway.”

“I’m not kicking you out,” he said quietly so Diggle couldn’t hear him but his jaw was still clenched and there was a vein throbbing in his temple. “You’re the one who quit, remember? I didn’t kick you out of anything.”

“I remember,” she agreed.

“So why are you here?” He asked as he folded his arms over his bare chest.

It was still a nice chest, Felicity thought to herself as she tried to come up with a strategy. “I told you: running scans and—“ “Patches,” he finished for her and briefly glanced down at the floor before meeting her gaze again. “And like I said, one of us could have figured that out. So, I repeat, why are you here?”

“To kiss and make up so I can complete my life’s dream of having your baby and becoming the happiest girl in the world,” Felicity said in a deadpan. “Why else would I be dressed so drop-dead sexy in a basement at this time of night?”

His eyes ran over her figure before meeting her gaze again. “Nice sweater and…elephant man.”

“Style and comfort,” she agreed.

“I liked the other outfit better,” he said, the anger in his eyes making way to some other dark emotion.

“I kind of got that impression,” Felicity joked feebly as she shifted her weight a bit.

“So,” Oliver said, his lips twitching upwards a bit.

“So,” she echoed.

“You want to get busy with making that baby now or should we start with the kissing and making up? I’m good with either/or so, if you’re game, I can ask Diggle to step outside for a few minutes to give us some privacy.” He said cocking his head toward Diggle.
“Only a few minutes?” She said in mock sympathy. “Oh wow, that explains so much about your love life.”

“Maybe I just haven’t met the right girl yet.” He said as he took a half step forward.

“Still haven’t,” she said quietly, the humor dropping from her tone.

“Fair enough,” he said, his eyes dropping to the floor once again. He took a second before looking back up at her, his face open and vulnerable. “How about the making up part without the kissing and babies then?”

“I’m not mad at you, Oliver.”

“I’m not mad at you either,” he told her. “I was. I was pretty pissed off in fact—until about five minutes ago but I think that’s because you weren’t pulling too many punches earlier and …” he paused and swallowed, “And maybe you said some things I’ve needed to hear for a while now.”

“Just because it was the truth that doesn’t mean I had a right to hurt you like that,” she said, a lump forming in her throat. “I’m so sorry I hurt you, Oliver.”

“Come here,” he said gathering her into his chest and holding her close. She sniffled a little, breathing in the clean scent of his cologne mixed with his sweat and prayed she wasn’t dripping snot on his shoulder. “It’s okay. I’m sorry I hurt you, too,” He said, kissing her hair as she hugged him back. “Does this mean you’re coming back to work on Monday?”

She took a calming breath and stepped back. “No. I’m sorry but I think it’s for the best if I left QC.”

“What?” He asked in confusion, the frown returning to his face as he stepped back and dropped his hands to her shoulders. “Is it…is it because I brought up…?”

“No,” she said quickly, her cheeks flushing in remembrance. “I’ve had months to get past that and, like you told me in the hospital, it doesn’t matter who he was; I’m still me. He doesn’t get to have that power over me.”

“I meant it,” he told her sincerely. “You are Felicity Smoak, my friend, someone I care deeply for and who I….” He stopped and averted his eyes for a moment. “You aren’t him and you’re not responsible for anything he did. Believe me, if anyone is familiar with what you’ve been going through, it’s me.”

“I know,” she said softly. “I, um, I think it would still be best if I left. I think my continued presence at QC will cause more problems, more distractions, and I think it’s for the best that, for now at least, I take a step back,” she told him.

“I told you, we’re good,” he said squeezing her shoulders a bit in emphasis. “I need you with me, Felicity. On my side.”

“I’m on your side, Oliver,” she told him. “Always was, always will be—just not in the office. Someone’s going to talk, Isabel or someone else, about the conference room—“ She snorted abruptly and shook her head, ”’What am I saying? They’ve been talking and it’s affecting your credibility with the board and everyone else who wants to use your Dad’s death, and Walter’s leaving, not to mention your Mom’s…well, you know. It would serve a lot of people’s interests to create a power vacuum and it’s more than just Isabel looking for that kind of opportunity. She just happens to be the most overt of them. Plus…” she paused for a moment before soldiering on, “I think it’s time. There are things I need to figure out and being here…it’s not your fault, but I think that there are things I need to work through on my own.”
“You do realize that you just gave me the ‘it’s not you, it’s me’ brush off?” Oliver said in disbelief then rubbed the back of his neck with his hand. “Wow, not used to being on this end of that conversation. Now I kind of understand where all those slaps came from.”

“Sucks, huh?” Felicity said with a watery smile.

“It really does,” he frowned in bewilderment. “I don’t like it.”

“I know.”

“No, I really don’t like it,” He said emphatically. ”I don’t want to let you go. Felicity, I—“

“Don’t,” she told him as she put her palm on his chest and held him slightly away from her. “Even if you think it’s what I want to hear; don’t say it.”

“Why not?” Oliver asked in a voice that made her want to shiver and go back to the whole plan he’d had about Diggle leaving the room.

“Because I’m not good for the team, Oliver,” she told him firmly.

“That’s not true at all.” He just placed his hand over hers and stroked it softly with his fingers, “You’re the one who made this a team. Before, me and Dig, we were barely functioning without you. You’re the one who pulled it together. You brought on the tech, came up with most of our procedures—you are the heart and soul of what we do.” He swallowed, his expression both pained and sincere. “I might have had the mission and the Arrow, Dig had his military background and Deadshot, but you gave us order and focus. You kept us in line and kicked our asses, called us on our shit, and showed us what we were capable of. You made it about more than just my mission, you made it our mission.”

She didn’t know whether to be flattered or vomit from the strain of having to hold back the truth from him. “I just can’t anymore. I’m sorry. Not—not now, anyway.”

Reluctantly, he pulled back and nodded. “Okay. I get it. After Tommy I had to take some time to get my head right, to confront some old demons, so I understand if you need to take a few months, but I won’t accept your resignation.” When she started to protest he held up his hand to stop her. “I’ll talk to HR and have you placed on personal leave for 60 days and, if you need more time, we’ll figure it out then.”

She wanted to protest, tell him there would be no looking back, but she’d hurt him enough for one day. Another lesson learned from Bruce: sometimes a kindly told lie was better than brutal honesty. “Thanks Oliver,” Felicity smiled, pushing down the pain. “I really appreciate it.”

Oliver, stepping back, added in a casual and offhand manner, “As for the team, take all the time you need but we both know you’ll be back.”

“Oh really, you think so?” Despite her inner turmoil, she found herself grinning at his display of arrogance. “And what makes you so sure about that?”

Oliver glanced down at his watch, “You quit, what, less than 4 hours ago and…” He grinned. “Come on, Dig! Let’s finish our workout before we go on patrol!” He called out turning on his heel as he jogged over to the workout mats, his step a bit lighter than it had been when she had first arrived.

“Coming!” Dig called after him as he put down the weights he was working with and waited until Oliver was setting up in the training area to wander over to her. “I don’t know what happened this afternoon but I’m glad you and Oliver worked it out.” He told her quietly, a soft smile on his lips.

For such a big tough guy, John Diggle could be a real sweetheart. “Me too.”

“So, are you really quitting?”

She dropped her eyes, unable to look at him, “It’s complicated, Dig.”

“Always is,” he agreed, his expression telling her more than any words ever could that he understood even if he didn’t know the reason why. “I better get over there so I can hand him his ass whipping, but we’ll talk later, okay?”

She nodded and turned back to her monitors, “Have fun. Knock him on his butt a couple of times for me.”

“Will do,” he said giving her shoulder a pat before heading over to Oliver to begin their daily ritual of beating the crap out of one another.

For the next three hours she listened to them as they went through their training, keeping them in her periphery as she completed her own secret mission under the radar. Bruce and Barbara had always been meticulous about the encryption on their coms but Felicity helped design Watchtower and they still used her base software. She could get into their systems, of that she had no doubt, so why hadn’t she picked up any chatter yet? It just didn’t sit right with her. Bruce should have made his move by now and she didn’t trust his silence one bit.

A thought occurred to her that there may be a reason for that. Earlier he had known she was home even though….oh you son of a—

She palmed some equipment and shoved it in her cardigan pocket and called out to the guys then picked up her tablet. “Hey guys! I need to go out to my car for a second. I’ll be right back.”

“Do you need me to walk you out?” Dig asked, chest heaving as he took a second’s respite from the workout Oliver was giving him as they sparred.

“Naw, I’m parked right out back and I have my panic gear and tracker on me, see?” She held up her smart phone. “I’ll be okay.”

“Hurry back,” Oliver told her. “We’re going on patrol in 30 and, since you’re still here, I figured you might want to man coms before you leave us all by ourselves to molest the workstation in your absence.”

“Funny, like the threat of you messing with my computers—” she stopped and scowled, “You try it and I’ll let Diggle shoot you with your own arrows, Queen!”

They just laughed at her and went back to their sparring as she headed up the stairs and outside. She quickly crossed over to where she was parked and began her scan. Bruce was fond of planting bugs and tracking devices but he never used the run of the mill stuff. No, Mr. Pointy Ears and Paranoia always used shielded tech that most normal sweeps would—

BEEP

“Jackpot,” Felicity said out loud as she popped her trunk. She used the flash on her phone to locate the small tracker that had been inserted into the thick felt lining and piggybacked onto the signal. With a few keystrokes on her tablet she had the tracker thinking she was on her way home then she pocketed the tech, jumped in her car, and parked it under a metal awning near the old docking ramp so the little red mini wouldn’t be readily visible to someone traveling above street level, then headed back inside.

She was a little mad at herself for not figuring it out earlier. Of course he put a tracker on her car, duh! Talk about a total face/palm moment. Bruce used trackers and bugs like Oliver used arrows.

She sat back down at her monitors and watched for movement on her security cameras. Less than ten minutes later a shadow in the shape of a cowl and cape flashed by. Okay, you smug pain in the rear…”Hey guys!” She called out as they were toweling off and gathering their equipment to go on patrol. “I’m such an idiot! I left my phone in my car and these patches are being a pain. Can you guys give me a few more minutes before you head out? Go, I don’t know,” she made a vague gesture with her hands, “hit each other with sticks for a few more minutes or something?”

“How much longer?” Oliver frowned, getting all growly. He always tensed up right before donning the hood and he hated anything that delayed his nightly prowl so she didn’t bother taking offence at his tone.

“Fifteen? Twenty tops,” she promised. A thunderous look passed over Oliver’s features so she cut him off before he could launch into a temper tantrum. He could run a multi-billion dollar corporation by day, hunt down baddies by night, but the man could still give a three year old a run for his money when it came to throwing a hissy fit. “Please? I just want to make sure you guys are safe and sound until I get back, okay?”

His face softened and she felt a little guilty for playing on his emotions like that but it had to be done. Oliver gave a long suffering sigh and scrubbed his hands through his hair. “Okay, but hurry up. Dig, want to take a few minutes to recheck the gear?”

Felicity turned off the monitors and headed for the doors. She took a few seconds to reprogram the keypad so they’d be trapped inside until she got back. It wouldn’t slow them down too much, a few minutes maybe, but she hoped their first instinct would be to wait for her return before they tried to override the system on their own. Neither of them was fond of doing that sort of thing and she couldn’t risk them running into Batman unawares. Hopefully she’d make it back before they tried but, just in case, she’d tell them she had intended to give them the new codes before they left out tonight and just got caught up in looking for her phone.

She quickly made it up the stairs and onto the roof where he was just standing there, cape whipping around him and his face obscured by shadows, as though he were waiting for her.

“You found my tracker,” he said in the Bat’s low rumble.

“You showed up at my place earlier, remember? Wasn’t hard to figure out,” she lied. Sort of lied. It really wasn’t that hard, at least, once it occurred to her but he didn’t need to know that.

“Why are you here, Felicity?” He growled.

“It’s a club,” she said lightly, “and I’m just in a clubbing kind of mood. You?”

She felt rather than saw his eyes rake over her form. “You’re not exactly dressed for the club scene.”

“Neither are you,” she pointed out. “And yet here you are.”

“You and Queen kiss and make up then?” His tone was cold.

“No,” she said, pretending confusion. “Why would you think that?”
“Because you’re standing on the roof of his club in the middle of the night,” he stated in a voice that was designed to turn her knees to jelly and not in a good way. “Where is he?”

“Not here,” she lied. “Since he took over Queen Consolidated he doesn’t come to the club that much. His sister runs it now.”

“Then why are you here?”

“Why’re you?” She shot back.

“I don’t have time to play games, Felicity,” he bit out. “I’m here for the Arrow.”

“What arrow?” she asked, feigning ignorance. “Why would Oliver have an arrow and what would you want with it?”

“Don’t play dumb, it doesn’t suit you,” he growled. “I know Oliver Queen is the Arrow.”

She looked at him and burst into laughter, grabbing her sides, “Oh my God! Are you serious? Oliver?” She snickered and wiped the imaginary tears from her eyes. “You think Oliver Queen is the Arrow?”

He was on her in less time than it took her to blink, his eyes cold and his mouth set in a grim line. “Stop playing games, Felicity, your life is at stake!” he growled. “Queen, where is he?”

“Probably at some party trying to talk a brunette out of her cocktail dress,” she shot back, not the least bit intimidated. After all, once you’ve seen a guy with his pants down around his knees it was hard to take the growly ‘I’m Batman’ thing seriously. “And, FYI, he’s not the Arrow. I can see why you’d think so but, truth is, despite the way he looks Oliver suffered some pretty extensive injuries on the island. More than 20% of his body is covered in scars and that doesn’t include all the bones he broke that never healed properly. He also has some disc issues in his thoracic spine—nonsurgical, but still. He works out but there is no way his body could handle the stress of leaping from roof top to roof top night after night. The man spends more time with his chiropractor than he does the board.” She gave him a wry half-grin, “Of course, if you’d ever seen his chiropractor you’d know why. The woman looks like Xena and wears an excessive amount of leather for someone whose job it is to provide medical treatment. He always comes back to the office sore but strangely happy. I’ve learned not to question it,” She added, just for the hell of it.

But Bruce wasn’t buying it. “Is he in the club now?”

“Pay the cover charge and find out for yourself.”

Bruce’s face got close to hers, his expression a mask of barely controlled anger, as he bit out, “What kind of supposed hero sends his girlfriend to engage the enemy while he hides like a coward? Is that the kind of man you have warming your bed now?”

“Okay, listen up, because I’m only saying this one more time and then I’m getting off this cold ass roof because this outfit was made for comfort, not for confronting pissed off anti-heroes in the middle of a cold snap!” She growled back, showing him she could do pissed off too. “Oliver Queen is not my boyfriend, lover, or even my boss anymore. He has never been my lover, boyfriend, convenient lay, or sex buddy in any way, shape, or form, and he is not now, nor has he ever, warmed anything in my house much less my bed and, before you ask, I haven’t warmed anything of his either. He made me his EA because Walter Steele suggested it to him. We were friends, just friends, at least I thought we were until he got a little too handsy in the conference room after everyone left,” she paused for effect, her voice gaining a touch of vulnerability, before putting the fire back in her tone.
“I guess he took that little show I put on for you earlier seriously. I wasn’t thinking and I should have. The whole point of his family wanting me there was so I could keep him in line. Oliver has always had a hard time separating business from pleasure and they knew I wouldn’t fall for his crap.” She eyed him in the way she would a particularly annoying cockroach. “So, now you know why I quit and why I said it was your fault, happy now? Ready to flap your wings and head back to the cave?”

He ignored the last bit but she could see his jaw tighten anyway. “If that’s true then why didn’t you just say that earlier?” He asked, waiting to see where she’d go with it.

“Why? So you could go all Bat because some asshole tried to reenact an episode of MadMen by chasing his assistant around a desk? I handled it fine by myself. Besides, my life is none of your business anymore.” Her phone buzzed a text in her pocket and she turned away from him as she glanced down at it. It was Diggle texting her.

//You okay?//

She typed back knowing Bruce was undoubtedly reading over her shoulder. //Yeah, be there soon.//

She glanced back over her shoulder at Bruce and waved her phone at him, “Look, it’s late and I’m cold. Plus, we’re obviously done here. I’ll call you if any contract killers show up to my door and ask me if I want to come out and play. Enjoy your flight back to Gotham.” She tucked the phone in her pocket and headed towards the doors leading to the stairs.

“You’re not going anywhere!” He ordered, cutting her off and stepping further into her personal space.

“You don’t own me!” She raged back. “I don’t take orders from you! This is not your city and I am not your tech anymore!” She felt her phone vibrate and she took it back out of her pocket only to have Bruce snatch it from her fingers and shut it off before tossing it away. “Son of a—” She looked over to where he had tossed it near the fire escape and turned a baleful eye on him. “I swear to God, if you broke my phone—!”

“Where is the Arrow?” He said in a dangerous undertone.

“Go home!” She yelled at him, her cheeks flushed both from her anger and the cold. “I don’t need you here! Just leave me the hell alone!”

“Yes, you do,” he said through gritted teeth. “You’re in over your head! You’re going to get yourself killed!”

“So what?” She asked him, her tone a biting mix of anger and sarcasm. “It’s my choice; mine! Not yours. Whether I choose to work for another mission, or decide to risk my life, or jump off of this building, it’s my business; not yours. You’ve done your bit, thanks for the info, and now if you don’t mind kindly fuck off.”

His eyes narrowed in anger and he pushed even further into her personal space. “Whether you like it or not you are still my responsibility,” he growled. “You wouldn’t be in this situation if not for me so that means I have to fix whatever mess you’ve gotten yourself into!”

“In case you’ve forgotten, I stopped working for you a long time ago!” She took a calming breath and gave him one last ‘go to hell’ look; “I’m done,” she said flatly. “Our business, whatever we shared, it was done a long time ago—four years ago—and this is my life now. You aren’t a part of it anymore.” She tightened her lips in anger, nostrils flaring as she stood up to him toe to toe. “Let me spell it out for you, Batman: Consider yourself off the hook. You’re forgiven for all trespasses and I hereby relieve you of any and all responsibility you may feel towards me, even if that means I wind up getting sent home in a box! I neither want nor do I need your protection or your interference. You have no right to come barging back into my life like this. Go home and don’t ever come back again!”

She spat out then turned to march away.

He placed one gauntleted hand on her shoulder and spun her around, his face in hers as he gritted out, “Enough! You do not get to throw your life away, do you understand me? Now where is the Arrow?”

“Screw you!” She spat out as she tried to break his grip on her arm but he squeezed until she winced, gasping slightly, his expression as hard and unrelenting as the hold he had on her. “Fine! Do you really want to know who the Arrow is?”

“I know who he is, I just need you to tell me where he is!”

“You’re wrong!” She thundered back, eyes tearing up from the pressure of his grip. “And if you want to know where the Arrow is so damn badly then I’ll tell you!”

“Tell me then!” He roared.

“Well, I can tell you one thing: He’s not downstairs, you arrogant son of a bitch, because SHE’S being forced to deal with you as she freezes her ass off on this damn roof! Happy now?!”

The silence between them was almost palatable before he bit out, “The Arrow is a man. I’ve seen the surveillance tapes. There are witness statements—“

“Of a man in a hood,” she finished for him. “But which man? How many men? Have Oracle run through the tapes again then ask yourself how the Arrow can go from 6’1” to 6’3” back down to 6’1”, lose and gain as much as 20 lbs from one day to the next, and change the way he instinctively handles his weapon from Kyudo to Gun Fu. Then watch him fight and you’ll see that the Arrow’s fighting style and stance seems to shift along with his height and center of gravity. After you’ve done that then you can tell me it’s always the same man under the hood and his name is Oliver Queen. ”

She gritted her teeth, “Now get your fucking hands off of me!”

His hand left her shoulder abruptly and he stepped back, “I still don’t believe you.”

She rubbed her shoulder, the ache of the blood rushing back into the area almost more painful than the grip itself was. “Why? Because I’m a woman?” She asked him sarcastically. “How very caveman of you.”

“Because the Felicity I knew wasn’t capable of murder!”

She winced and suddenly the memories she’d tried to bury for the last six months came to the forefront. She took a moment to center herself before answering him. “It’s…complicated. Any deaths that occurred were in self-defense.” That was true at least. Anything else was none of his business.

“Well, while you’re trying to uncomplicate it, mind telling me why you’re on Oliver Queen’s roof if he isn’t the Arrow?”

“I said he wasn’t the Arrow, I never said he wasn’t involved,” Felicity said coolly.

“So he knows about it?”

“No, he just funds it,” she said, drawing her words out and challenging him with a dirty look. “After the Glades fell, Verdant was damaged and Oliver dumped the details of the rebuilding into my lap because that’s what Executive Assistants are for; to assist the executive. I needed a new base of operations and, after the contractor I hired told me there was an unused basement that hadn’t been too badly compromised, I got an idea. Oliver never even bothered to look at any of the plans—hell, he didn’t even step foot on the property for six months after the attack—so I did some shuffling around and had the architect design a safe room/private gym space under the club. I told him that Oliver needed a secure area where he could hide out in case of another attack but, being a spoiled rich guy, he didn’t want to be bored if he had to be down there a while. He built it and I paid him extra to keep it off the filed plans because, hey, what’s the use of a safe room if people know where you keep it?”

His stance never wavered. “You expect me to just believe that?”

“Have Oracle track him down and he’ll confirm it. He’ll also tell you that I was in charge of the renovations. Then have her track Oliver’s travel history and you’ll see that he spent five months out of the country while the club was undergoing the overhaul and never came back at any point during that time period. Furthermore he had no cell service or computer access the entire time he was gone. Oh, and while she’s at it, have her look into Oliver’s personal accounts.” She flashed him a triumphant grin, “You’ll see that he transferred two million dollars into an off shore account used to buy weapons and gym equipment that were delivered to this address and installed in a, quote, ‘private gym space’ in the name of Joy Burns aka Felicity Smoak.”

“Assuming all of that checks out,” he rumbled under his cowl, “who’s the guy under the hood then, because it sure as hell isn’t a 5’5” blonde who weighs all of 110 pounds soaking wet?”

“Different men, all recruited by me to help protect the Glades,” she answered smoothly, not missing a beat.

“Murderers, you mean,” he said accusingly.

“Not murderers,” she shot back. “Men who are trained to return lethal attacks with equally lethal force. If we were murdering people left and right it would be one thing but we were defending this city. Any deaths were unfortunate but necessary. My men are mostly ex-military, cops, and former gang members who all have a vested interest in keeping this city safe but who don’t trust the system to make it happen and they aren’t used to pulling their punches. Whether it’s the military, the police academy, or the street the first thing you learn is that if a man fires his weapon at you, you empty your clip on him. There’s a reason the paper targets on the firing range have bull’s-eyes in the head and chest and not in the shoulder.”

He eyed her skeptically. “I see,” he said, his arms crossed over his impressively broad chest, “because recruiting mercs and gang members to play vigilante war games is something someone with your background does every day.”

“I worked for you, remember? Whether you wanted me to or not, I paid attention.” She lifted a superior eyebrow at him. “Right about now I suspect Oracle is whispering in your ear that every single thing I’ve told you checks out. She’s also probably figured out that the other money I diverted into the off shore account went to a man named John Diggle.” She had already planned this part out although she had hoped to avoid dragging Dig into it with her. Hopefully the other man would forgive her but she knew he’d rather she risk exposing him than Oliver. “Friend of a friend of mine, ex-Army Ranger Special Forces. All of this started when he asked me to look into a contract killer by the name of Floyd Lawton, codename Deadshot.”

His gaze sharpened and he seemed to zero in on her words, “I’m familiar with his work. What did this man Diggle want with him?”
“His brother was in private security and got shot on the job. Deadshot was at the other end of the bullet.”

“Deadshot doesn’t miss,” Batman growled.

“No, he does not,” Felicity confirmed. “His brother was the target although we haven’t worked it all out yet. All we could find was a dead end leading to a group calling themselves H.I.V.E. Dig was getting nowhere through official channels so I did him a solid and started looking. We still haven’t figured out Andrew Diggle’s connection but I followed the trail Deadshot left behind to some pretty powerful names. After investigating every lead we uncovered, among other things, a plot to destroy the Glades. You might have heard about it on the news a while back.”

“So this ‘Diggle’ is the Arrow and he just happens to be Queen’s bodyman?”

She knew then that Barbara was definitely on coms but was still giving her wiggle room with her story. “No coincidence to it. We needed him positioned where he could do the most good and that happened to be next to Oliver Queen. He’s my inside man, but no, still not the Arrow. Not exclusively,” she had to give him something and she had a hunch he’d go easier on a former military hero seeking vengeance for his family than a man he assumed was playing vigilante between Victoria’s Secret models. “Diggle is my second in command; I recruit and he trains our team, but ultimately he and every one of the men we use answer to me.”

“You expect me to believe that?” He challenged.

“You don’t have to take my word for it; have Oracle run it through Watchtower and then she’ll tell you whether I’m lying or not,” she reminded him.

A shadow of uncertainty crept into Bruce’s eyes, “Then who are the other ‘Arrow’s’ in that so-called team of yours?”

She snorted, crossing her arms over her chest, “No, there is no way I’m giving you any of their names. My men protect this city and I protect their anonymity. The Arrow operates like a deep cover terrorist cell; a few of the men work in teams but no one knows who’s who except me and only a few key players know who I am. Diggle is the face of our team so the men know him but they only know me by my codename. I do everything via computer and phone, all untraceable. The men even train in masks so not even Dig knows their names or faces. Diggle did three tours in Afghanistan specializing in hunting down and infiltrating terrorist cells so that was a deliberate choice on our part. If he’s captured, interrogated, or tortured he can’t reveal anything because he doesn’t know anything. You could stake Starling City out for months and, if you’re lucky, you might find one, maybe two names, but you’ll never find them all.” She took a breath, “However, in the spirit of friendship and to get you the hell out of my city sooner rather than later, I will give you the name of one of my contacts. He’s not the Arrow either but it should convince you, once and for all, that I’m telling the truth.”

“What’s the name?” Bruce growled.

“Detective Quentin Lance, SCPD” she told him calmly. “He’s my in with the police. Have a conversation with him about ‘our mutual friend’; that’s my codename. If he resists, which he will, drop my name. He’ll tell you that when the police have a problem they aren’t prepared to deal with he finds me and me alone.”

She could see his expression change as Barbara talked in his ear. She could practically hear her as she communicated the information she was recovering in real time: How Lance had investigated Oliver as the Arrow and came up empty only to turn his attention to Felicity, how he had put her name in the Arrow’s file as a person of interest after clearing Queen then deleted it along with any and all other records mentioning her name. Barbara would be able to do the back trace easily enough however since she made sure to replace it herself days ago knowing she’d need to leave a trail of breadcrumbs for her to follow. Next she’d read to Bruce from Lance’s IA file and relay to him how he’d been demoted then jailed on the suspicion that the Arrow had recruited him before getting his shield back in the wake of the Blood Army incident two years ago and that he had placed several calls from his personal phone to a cell she could trace to one of Felicity’s aliases, Joy Burns. She’d uncover CCTV footage of her and Lance speaking to one another in various locations as well. Felicity had even added in some video footage with clear audio showing Lance talking to her about the Arrow and setting up meets and drops for ‘our mutual friend’.

If it went far enough that he actually got in touch with Lance then hopefully he’d stick with the plan. Lance knew of her contingencies. He didn’t like them, but six months ago they came to an understanding and she knew he’d follow through. He owed her and he paid his debts, even if it meant throwing her under the bus at her request.

Suddenly Bruce’s face darkened and Felicity realized belatedly that Barbara might have been a bit too thorough with her search and uncovered the fact that Lance had recruited her to assist in an unsanctioned op to capture a serial killer and that it had nearly cost Felicity her life, because, in a flash, Batman went from ice cold furor to burning rage. He reached out and grabbed her shoulders, shaking her roughly, “Are you insane? Do you realize that you’re already in way over your head? That you’re going to get yourself killed?!” He roared in her face.

There was a noise, a rush of wind and the twang of a taut bow string snapping into place, and then an arrow lodged in the smoke stack behind them, the fletching still vibrating between them.

“Get away from her!” An unnaturally deep voice roared and they both separated as a figure in a green hood stood near the roof access, his bow cocked and pointed toward the man in the cowl and cape.
Chapter Ten

“What’s taking her so long?” Diggle muttered to himself, “How many places can her phone be? That damn car of hers is so small it could be mistaken for a wind-up toy.”

Oliver glanced over to him, his eyes reflecting his growing concern. “Call or text her, maybe the ringer will help her locate her phone.”

Diggle nodded, tapping a quick message then heaved a small sigh of relief. “She found it. Says she’s on her way back but that she needs another minute. Probably needs to make a pit stop.”

“The ‘tiny bladder’ thing?” Oliver chuckled, reciting the frequently used excuse.

“Yeah, like it isn’t because of the 19 cups of coffee that she drinks a day, right?” Diggle joined in. “Well, if she’s on her way I say we head out and let her catch up on coms.”

“Sounds good,” Oliver agreed, already heading to the stairs. “Call and let her know.”

Diggle was already dialing but then stopped and frowned at the phone in consternation. “It’s going to voicemail.”

“What?” Oliver said, immediately going on alert as he turned to his partner.

“Oliver…” Diggle’s expression froze. Felicity was nothing if not jeopardy friendly.

Oliver acted; he bounded up the stairs to the keypad. “Try to get her on surveillance!” He barked, “I’m going out to her car–!” He punched in the code but an error message popped up. “What?” He said out loud as he punched the code in a second time only to get the same result.

“Oliver.” Diggle’s voice held a note of shock and his sudden pallor was enough to send Oliver’s heart in his throat.

Not bothering to take the stairs one at a time, he swung himself over the metal guardrail and bounded over to the other man who was staring at the monitors in disbelief.
“Is that---?” Diggle breathed, slapping on Felicity’s headphones so he could hear the audio.

“Can’t be, why would he come here?” Oliver said in confusion. “And why would Felicity be meeting him alone on the roof without telling us?”

Diggle spun in his chair and locked eyes with the other man. “Oliver, she knows him.”

“Put it through the speakers,” he ordered.

The two men watched as the imposing figure of the Batman reached out and grabbed her roughly, getting in her face.

“Enough games, Felicity! Where is the Arrow?”

“Son of a bitch!” Oliver growled, pulling open the small tool chest Felicity kept near her workstation. “We need to get that door open, now!”

“Screw you!” Both men tensed as she let out a small gasp of pain, “Fine! Do you really want to know who the Arrow is?”

“You’re wrong! And if you want to know where the Arrow is so damn badly then I’ll tell you!”

“Why is she taunting this guy?” Diggle bit out in a mixture of concern, anger, and disbelief. “She’s going to get herself killed!”

“Tell me then!”

“Well, I can tell you one thing: He’s not downstairs, you arrogant son of a bitch, because SHE’S being forced to deal with you as she freezes her ass off on this damn roof! Happy now?!”

Both men froze, not even breathing. Oliver’s face paled as he realized just what Felicity had said.

Suddenly, Dig’s mind flashed back six months previously to a scene which still lived vividly in his nightmares.

It was raining that night; just pouring down hard and yet still hot and muggy. Hot rain, he remembered thinking. Hot rain that felt like blood pouring down his back; like God himself had been cut by those damn swords that were inches from her throat. It was late July and his clothes were sticking to his back from sweat, rain, and blood; so unlike the cold winter weather outside, but still somehow the same. All of them were down for the count; Roy was a bloody heap that barely even looked human anymore, Sara wasn’t moving, he was barely hanging on with two in the chest and one in the leg, and Oliver was screaming her name over and over again as she confronted the man they’d come to associate with Death Incarnate, alone.

He remembered the slick metallic sound as his sword left the sheath, “I know.”

“Oh shit,” Diggle breathed.

Oliver snatched the tool kit off the table and ran to the keypad, practically tearing the cover off in his haste.

“Be careful!” Diggle called after him, eyes fixed on the scene playing out on the monitors. “Don’t
“I know!” Oliver snapped back. “Felicity has gone over this with me a hundred times! Let me know what’s happening while I override the controls!”

Diggle watched as the scene played out before him, turning up the volume so Oliver was kept in the loop as he desperately attempted to override the door lock. He watched as she stood up to a man who even the most hardened criminals feared without so much as a stutter in her voice. He glanced over at Oliver, at the stiffening of his spine as she rattled off one perfectly constructed lie after another, and he knew that the other man was thinking the same thing he was: Not only did Felicity know the Batman, but she had known this confrontation was coming for a while, long enough to plan her strategy so that the truths and lies meshed perfectly. Another thing both men realized was this:

Felicity Smoak, a woman both men valued for her intelligence as well as her integrity and courage, was a very, very good liar.

Diggle’s attention flew back to the monitors as he heard his name. He listened as she diverted the Bat’s attention from Oliver by using him as a shield and instantly forgave her for it. Her strategy, while incredibly dangerous, was smart. He listened as she named him as her co-conspirator yet still managed to protect and shield him by downplaying his involvement with the Arrow as much as possible. When she made it clear that the ultimate responsibility was hers alone and began to rattle off hard evidence Oliver began cursing loudly.

“Motherfucker!” He roared, slamming his fist into the door.

Dig rubbed his hand over his mouth and his heart felt like it skipped a beat, “Shit. You know what this means, right?”

“She set herself up to take the fall for all of it!” He snapped.

He didn’t say it but he could hear it plain as day in his body language, in the anguish reflected in his expression.

She was going to sacrifice herself for them. Again.

He hit the door again, the steel bending from the force of his punch, “Why can’t I get this goddamn door open?!”

“Let me try again from this end! Do you think this is why she really quit?” Dig asked as he began to search through her files to force the door to reset on his end. “That she’d been planning for this the whole time? This stuff must have taken her months! And Lance? Did he know about this? He told us he scrubbed the files but she seemed pretty sure he’d back all of that up.”

“I don’t know! I don’t know what to think anymore but as soon as I get this fucking door open I’m getting some answers!”

“But--!”

“Just open the fucking door, Dig! Now!” He shouted.

If he hadn’t known the truth, even he would have been convinced that she was the mastermind behind a network of Arrows with Oliver Queen being no more than an unsuspecting skirt-chasing dupe. He’d always known she was a smart but, after listening to her play the Batman, he realized she was so far beyond anything he could have imagined. “Got it!” He shouted in triumph as the code reset.

Oliver was out the door the second it sprang open. “I’m going to the roof!”

“Oliver, wait!” Diggle tried to call out but the man was already rushing to the roof. He cocked his gun and chased after him, his senses vibrating with dread. He’d wanted to stop him, convince him to go in more stealthily, but it probably wouldn’t have done any good even if the other man had listened. Batman had laid hands on her and the Arrow was out for blood.

He got to the roof mere seconds after Oliver, just in time to watch as the Batman lunged toward Felicity and shook her shoulders roughly as he raged at her, “Are you insane?! Do you realize that you’re already in way over your head--that you’re going to get yourself killed?!”

In less time than it took to blink an eye, Oliver had notched his bow and let fly. The Batman released her, jumping back into a fighting stance as the arrow vibrated between them, and roared with a fury that Diggle had never seen from him before, “Get away from her!”

The Batman rounded on the Arrow and Felicity saw as his stance shifted, saw him palm a razor sharp throwing star to counter the arrow that Oliver had aimed at his lower face; the only exposed target under the cowl. Moving quickly before either man could shed blood, she stepped between them. “Stand down!” She commanded in a voice that would do a drill sergeant proud.

Oliver growled through the voice modulator, “Get out of the way! Now!”

“I told you to stand down!” Felicity snapped. Her eyes met Diggle’s, “Sergeant Diggle, control your man!”

He went with his gut. As soon as Felicity gave the order he flipped his Glock in his hand and came down on the back of Oliver’s head with the grip. Oliver crumpled to the ground before he could even register what had happened. He adjusted his grip on the gun, leaving it at his side as he stood at attention, his eyes never leaving the Batman as he addressed Felicity. “Do you require assistance, ma’am?”

“No,” Felicity said, her voice harsh as she struggled to keep her face free of any expression of concern for the crumpled figure in green leather. “Leave us and have someone see to your man’s injuries.”

“Yes, ma’am,” Diggle said, pulling Oliver up in a fireman’s carry, making sure to keep his face shielded from view.

“And Diggle?”

“Ma’am?” He turned to her, his demeanor calm and cool despite the fact that he knew there would be holy hell to pay later after Oliver came to.

“The Batman and I are not to be disturbed again no matter what,” Felicity said in a hard tone.

Images of watching her go into battle alone on another occasion came to mind and he remembered the sound Oliver made as she faced certain death in his place.

The words whispered in his mind again, words that still haunted him.

“Are you certain, ma’am?” Diggle’s eyes met hers, the unspoken plea hanging in the air between them. She nodded her head slightly and, although it took everything he had, he nodded in response and walked away without sparing her so much as a second glance.

After the two men left, Felicity walked over to pick up her phone that was still amazingly intact if not scraped and scratched. She slipped it into her pocket them reached for Oliver’s bow that had fallen to the ground after Diggle knocked him out. He’d never forgive her for this, she thought absently. She tested the weight of it in her hand, taking a moment to admire the weapon and realizing she would probably never see it again after that night. She sighed and looked up at the Bat who stood as silent as a statue, watching her. “You win,” Felicity told him, gripping the bow with one hand. “Whatever you want. Do you want me to quit? Done. You want me to--”

“You’re coming home with me,” he told her in a voice that would brook no arguments.

“No.”

“Yes,” he said, his eyes flashing with fire.

“I have conditions.” She watched as he said nothing, his cowl obscuring his face in shadow. “You will not compromise Diggle’s cover, this is not optional. It’s mutually guaranteed destruction. I hold your secrets, you hold his, understood?”

“Go on,” he growled.

“You will leave Starling City as soon as possible and you will not interfere further with the Arrow’s mission. Again, not up for debate. This is not your city.”

“And if my business should happen to intersect with that of the Arrow?” He bit out, taking a step toward her, his displeasure evident.

“You go through me and me alone,” she told him in a way that would brook no arguments. “Diggle will take over and I will forgo any future role in the team, but I will make myself available as an intermediary between both your team and his should the need arise.” She spoke clearly and with purpose, her shoulders back and her features devoid of any sign of deception. She no longer had to lie, it was the truth. She knew Bruce well enough to know that if he decided to put Oliver on his list of enemies that he would hunt him down to the ends of the Earth. Bruce might not necessarily win, but his pursuit would take them away from the mission. “Again, this is not your city. The Bat stays in Gotham and the Arrow will remain in Starling.”

He took another step forward, looming over her as his teeth gnashed together. Whether it was because she’d told him he was not welcome in Starling City or that she implied that the Arrow might decide turnabout was fair play, she didn’t know. If she had to guess she’d say it was both.

“You’re leaving Starling City.” It was a statement, not a question.
“Not until I settle my affairs here first,” she told him as she leaned the bow against the access door.

“You’re coming back to Gotham with me. Tomorrow.”

She shook her head, “Not going to happen.”

He grabbed her arm, hauling her closer to him and tilted her head upwards with his other gauntlet encased hand so she was looking him in the eye. It was a gesture meant to establish power, not enflame passion. “This is not up for debate. You’re coming back with me to Gotham, end of story.”

“As what?” She snorted despite the fact that her arm was beginning to ache under his iron grip. “Your prisoner? Are you going to keep me in chains inside the Batcave?”

“If need be.”

She rolled her eyes at him, “Forget it, I’m not going anywhere with you.”

He tugged her closer, his fingers digging into her arm even further and causing her to clench her jaw as pain radiated throughout her entire arm up to her shoulder. It was all she could do not to cry out and fall to her knees. Bruce could bench press 1000 lbs; she’d seen him do it. She’d never believe in a million years he’d ever hurt her physically on purpose but he was emotional and out of control, two things that didn’t even belong in the same universe as the Bat. Right now she had to admit there was a distinct possibility she’d be arriving to Gotham with a cast on her arm if he squeezed any harder. There would be bruises tomorrow. “Not. Up. For. Debate.”

“And what gives you the right to decide that, hmm?” She asked him, her eyes flashing with contempt despite the pain. “I don’t belong to you!”

“Yes, you do!” He thundered back.

“Screw you!” She lifted her free hand to slap him and he caught it in his own, squeezing it with a punishing grip as well and causing her knees to wobble slightly. Every fiber of her being told her to back down and beg for him to let go but pure stubbornness overrode self-preservation. She bit down and redirected the pain into anger.

His head dipped toward her until their noses were nearly touching. “You accepted responsibility for the actions committed by the Arrow; that means that every murder he committed is on your head!”

“Then turn me in, goddamn you!” Felicity shot back, wrenching her wrist from his grip despite the pain it caused. She felt the skin of her arm catch and slice on the metal of his gauntlet as the material ripped. Her eyes watered and tears began to roll down her cheeks but she didn’t back away. “I would rather serve a murder sentence in Starling City for the rest of my life than live in Gotham under your thumb!”

Their harsh breath mingled in puffs of white fog as the temperature outside continued to drop. Her body was shaking from the cold and adrenaline but she meant every word. If she had to throw herself on her own sword and spend the rest of her life in prison, she’d do it. It wasn’t something she wanted or looked forward to but she had come to terms with the possibility of prison a long time ago. It was the reason--one reason--she had drawn a firm line with the Arrow in those early days. The last thing she wanted to do was get involved with another handsome man on a mission.

Danger, adrenaline, close quarters, shared secrets; they pushed boundaries, made people act on emotion instead of logic. Felicity had learned a long time ago that men shaped by fire and purpose had no room in their lives for personal relationships. They were built for pain and sacrifice; it was all they knew, all they were. If you made the mistake of staying too long, getting too close, the fire that drove them would consume you body and soul as well.

From the moment she suspected Oliver was the Arrow to the second he confirmed it; she swore she would stay on the edges of the mission then get out with her heart and life intact. The problem was that the line she’d drawn kept moving further and further away until she finally reached the point of no return. Once that happened, and she committed herself to staying after they found Walter, she started planning her own set of contingency protocols. At least a third of them led to her eventual arrest and possible conviction for aiding and abetting the vigilante, but all of them were designed to protect the rest of her team. Oliver and Diggle’s mission was the list and Starling City, hers was keeping them free long enough to complete it even if the cost was her life or her freedom.

But not her heart or her self-respect; no one would ever have that piece of her again.

Not Oliver and not Bruce. They could take everything else, but not that.

Finally, after what seemed like an eternity, Batman released the grip on her other arm and turned away, moving silently to the edge of the roof. He pulled a grappling gun from his belt and launched it toward the warehouse next door. “You have a week and then I’m coming to get you. And you will be returning to Gotham.” He looked at her, his expression as hard as stone. “I’ll be keeping a close eye on you, understood?” Before she could answer he was already racing across the nearby rooftops and into the shadows.

She closed her eyes, her heart thumping painfully inside her chest. The cold air burned in her lungs and she was so tired, so fucking tired. Every muscle in her body ached as though she’d run for miles from holding herself ramrod straight. She could feel something cold on her arm and was fairly certain the cuts and scrapes left by his gauntlet were probably pretty nasty but not deep. The damn thing was made of Kevlar and specialized armor to maximize his grip while he was hanging from buildings and steel cabling so skin didn’t stand a chance but the textured surface on the grip wasn’t deep or sharp.
She’d be in a world of hurt once the adrenaline wore off but she wouldn’t need stitches.

The fingers on her right hand were numb and practically useless from lack of blood circulation but she managed to dig out some tissues from the pocket of her cardigan and stuff them into her sleeve to prevent the blood from seeping through. She could still move her fingers even if she could barely feel them so she didn’t think it was broken. She’d have to assess it herself later. She couldn’t show Dig or Oliver she was hurt or they’d go after Bruce and she would have gone through all of it for nothing.
She also couldn’t go to the emergency room so OTC pain meds, elastic bandages, and frozen peas would have to do.

Didn’t much matter though. At this point she could care less if her whole fucking arm fell off. In one day, one single day, she’d managed to destroy her entire life and in less than half an hour she managed to destroy the trust of the only men she’d ever cared about.
Chapter Eleven
Chapter Eleven

She walked down the stairs slowly, sore from the rough handling she’d endured and feeling as though she was marching towards her own execution. The door to the Lair was open. Felicity glanced at the mangled security panel and sighed but left it. She made her way down the stairs, Oliver’s eyes following her silently.

He sat in her computer chair, an ice pack pressed to the back of his head as he rested his elbows on his knees. The security footage from the roof was looped on playback and both men stared at her; one in shock, the other in anger.

“Leave us alone, Dig,” Oliver ordered him in a harsh tone.

“Oliver, just let Felicity—“ he began.

“Now, Dig!” Oliver growled.

The other man didn’t move. He turned to Felicity offering his silent support and she smiled in return, “It’s okay, you can go. We’ll be fine.”

“You shouldn’t do this with her now,” Diggle turned back to Oliver. “She’s been through a lot tonight.”

Oliver didn’t look at him or acknowledge his words in any way. Instead he continued to fix Felicity with an unblinking stare of raw fury.

“Go,” Felicity told the other man quietly.

Diggle seemed to struggle with some internal debate for a moment before snatching up his jacket and muttering a curse. As he passed Felicity, he paused to place a hand on her shoulder, “Hey, call me if you need me.” She nodded then he turned to Oliver, a chill in his voice when he addressed him, “Don’t hurt her.”

Oliver’s eyes flicked towards him at that. “I would never put my hands on Felicity and you know that.”

“There’s more than one way to hurt someone, Oliver,” Diggle sighed wearily, making his way to the door and giving Felicity one last quick look of support before he left.

Oliver sat back in the chair, the ice pack dropping to his feet. He flicked his head toward the monitors where the playback was paused. “Explain.”

She didn’t answer him, she just stood there and waited.

Oliver erupted from the chair and it flew backwards on its casters, bouncing hard against the desk causing Felicity to flinch. He pointed to the monitors, “Explain!”

“Explain what?” She asked quietly.

“Explain that!” Oliver thundered, his finger pointing at the security feed accusingly.

She didn’t react to his anger, she was too emotionally spent. “Let’s just skip to the end, okay? I can’t--I just can’t do anymore tonight. Just ask me what you want to know and get it over with.”

“You know him?” He spat out.

“Obviously.” She said wryly.

“You knew him before you even came to Starling City, before you met me or Diggle?”
“Yes.”

“You worked for him.”

It wasn’t phrased as a question but she nodded anyway.

“Were you working with him after you joined us?”

She snorted rudely. “No, of course not! What? You think I’m a plant or some kind of vigilante double agent or something?”

“Are you?” He was obviously not receptive to sarcasm at that moment.

She goggled at him in disbelief for a moment before answering sarcastically, “Yes, Oliver; I moved 3000 miles away from my home, waited a few months in the QC IT department for you to get rescued from the island, twiddled my thumbs until you brought a bullet ridden laptop into my office, waited several more weeks for Walter to get kidnapped, and then to complete my Machiavellian plan to infiltrate your ranks I had your mother shoot you, tricked you into hiding in my car, then proceeded to save your life!” She took a deep centering breath. “What can I say? I’m an evil fucking mastermind.”

“Don’t—“ Oliver leveled an accusing finger at her. “Don’t you dare make this about me! You lied to me! You’ve been lying to me from day one!”

“When?” She said, thoroughly exasperated. “Tell me, when did I lie to you?”

“It was a lie of omission and you know it!” He snapped. “You should have told me from the beginning that you worked for Batman!”

“First off,” she said, doing a slow burn, “I was never an official member of Batman’s team, I was a consultant. I only helped him in the periphery, never in the field, and in a limited capacity—not that it’s any of your damn business—and, how exactly was I supposed to tell you any of that? And when should I have told you, hmm? How was that conversation supposed to go? ‘Oh hi, Mr. Queen. Hey, yeah, bullet ridden laptop? No problem, I used to do this kind of thing for Batman all the time,’” she snorted. “Right.”

“What about when Walter was kidnapped? Or when we were tracking Deadshot? He said he knew him; you don’t think that you should have said something then? That having that knowledge could have helped us?” Oliver said, a vein in his temple throbbing madly.

“What are you saying? That had you known that I had Batman’s personal cell number you would have asked me to give him a ring and borrow a cup of vigilante justice?” She asked scathingly, “You and I both know that if I revealed that I had a history with him you would have frozen me out just to spite yourself and, not only would both of those devices have gone up in the Glades, but you’d be dead or in prison by now.”

“I had a right to know,” he bit out. “I had a right to know who it was that I was trusting with my life.”

“And now that you know, what’s changed? Hmm? Answer me that? Nothing,” She asked rhetorically. “I didn’t tell you about Batman the same way I refused to tell him about you.”

“Then why is he here?” He growled.

“Helena!” She answered sharply. She watched as his eyes flickered slightly in confusion before answering. “She decided to take her hunt to Gotham and they crossed paths. She decided to drop my name in the middle of their confrontation and it set him off. Unfortunately for her, he didn’t react well to hearing her threaten to put a crossbow bolt through my neck.”

“Did he—is she dead?”

Her face felt as though she had been slapped. Her eyes burned, her cheeks felt raw, and a wrenching pain in her gut nearly made her gag. She took a shaky breath and willed herself to speak, “Yeah, she’s alive.” She grabbed her bag and headed for the door.

“Where are you going?” He demanded.

“Home,” she answered tonelessly as she climbed the stairs.

He stood at the bottom of the stairs and glared after her, his face dark with anger. “When you come back here tomorrow you, me, and Diggle will be sitting down to discuss everything—and I mean everything, understood?”

She stopped and turned to face him, her face pale and her shoulders slumped. “I’m not coming back tomorrow, Oliver. Or the next day, or the day after that. I’m done; I’m going home to Gotham.”

“The hell you are!” He burst out.

She nodded, more to herself than to him. “Yes, I am.”

“You’re not going with him,” Oliver growled, one hand on the railing as though he were prepared to physically stop her if necessary.

“No, I’m not, but I am going home,” she said, her eyes red rimmed and reflecting both exhaustion and defeat. “And not because of him, or because of what he said, or because we got a little carried away on the conference table.” He flinched at that but she continued on. “I’m going home because I just can’t do this to myself anymore.” She tilted her head at him and, as she took a step toward him, he instinctively backed one step away, something in her tone and expression forcing him into retreat. She chuckled mirthlessly. “You don’t see it, do you? It just—it flew right over your head and you never even thought about it, did you?”

“What are you talking about?” He asked warily.

“I just told you that Batman, someone I haven’t so much as spoken to in four years, heard Helena Bertinelli threaten to kill me and, in response, traveled 3000 miles to find me. He may be a complete and utter bastard but he still cared enough to drop everything just to keep me safe whether I wanted him to or not. You heard the same thing and your first instinct was to ask if she was okay---if the woman who once held a weapon to my throat and who told Batman that she wanted to see me dead, was okay.” She shook her head and turned to ascend the stairs again. When she got to the door, she paused to give him one last glance, “For a man so preoccupied with the concepts of loyalty, trust, and friendship, you have a lot to learn.”

Felicity forced her eyes open as her alarm went off and looked at the clock, her eyes swollen and full of grit. The last thing she felt like doing was getting up to eat brunch all the way across town (even if it was with her dad), but she also knew there was no way around it. Feeling as though she had been run over by a very enthusiastically driven steamroller, she fumbled for the Aleve on her nightstand, popped three, and then headed for the tub.
The tub had been what sold the house for her. It was cast iron, scratched up and ancient, but it was huge. It was also cold as Isabel Rochev’s ass in the wintertime before it warmed up, but once the hot water started flowing it was like sinking into heaven. She was going to miss her tub, she thought, ducking under the water and holding her breath until her lungs protested before reaching for the soap and a wash cloth.

She bathed quickly but thoroughly, leaving long before her fingers and toes pruned (even though she really, really wanted to just soak for a few hours) then began to get dressed. She looked through her closet (which occupied an entire room next to hers) and decided on a lady-like Oscar de la Renta silk sundress she had bought at a high-end second hand shop in Coast City a few years back. It was a bit cold outside, although warmer than it had been lately, and the dress was sleeveless so she paired it with a matching white cashmere and silk cropped cardigan that would keep her warm while it hid the bandages on her arm and wrist.

She loved the A-Line silk chiffon dress with its modest sweetheart neckline and skirt that flared to just below her knees, but rarely got to wear it. It had probably been originally purchased by some bridesmaid for a summer wedding but their ‘never the bride’ angst was her gain and the pretty pink flowers and green ivy embroidery made her happy. She needed happy today. How she was going to tell her dad that somehow, between yesterday afternoon and brunch today, she’d decided to chuck it all and move back home she hadn’t a clue. She grabbed some underwear and stockings from her drawer and sighed; God, she felt like such a failure.

She finished dressing quickly, keeping her makeup light and her hair loose, then slipped on her glasses and a pair of rose colored Charlotte Olympia slipper flats designed with a smiling kitty face on the toe. Yes, she was dressed like a five year old going to her first princess party but she really, really needed to be daddy’s little girl today so Gloria Steinem could just shove it up her ass. Today she needed to hear how pretty she looked followed by a whole mess of ‘poor baby’s’. She’d be a strong and confident feminist who could stand on her own two feet tomorrow.

When she got to the restaurant at the Marchioness and saw her dad’s smile light up as he caught sight of her it was all she could do not to burst into tears and run into his arms. Taking a deep breath she fixed a smile to her face and hugged him tight, taking a few extra seconds to lean into his embrace and breathe in his scent: peppermint, cherry pipe tobacco, and Bay Rum aftershave.

“What’s wrong?” Her dad asked, pulling away so he could look at her carefully.

“Nothing’s wrong, Daddy. I’m fine,” she said easily.

“The only time you ever say ‘I’m fine’ is if you aren’t fine.” Her face crumpled a little and he sat her down, patting her hand gently and handing her a handkerchief. “It’s okay Baby, just take a breath and tell me what’s wrong.”

She wiped her eyes and nose (as if crying in public wasn’t humiliating enough, she had to add ‘snot machine’ into the mix) and forced a little laugh, “Daddy, stop being so nice to me. I really, really don’t deserve it, not today.”

“Tell me what happened,” he said gently, tipping her head up so he could look into her eyes.

It was all she could do not to start blubbering and wailing when he did that. “I quit my job,” she said with a hitch in her voice. “I’m sorry.”

Her dad’s lips twitched upwards and he rubbed her back soothingly. “Is that all that’s got you upset? You quit your job?”
“You’re not mad or disappointed in me?” She asked tremulously.

“Why would I be mad? Baby, do you know how many jobs I’ve left in my lifetime?” He asked her with a chuckle. “A lot more than just one, I’ll tell you that.”

“But—” she started, preparing to launch into a litany of self-recriminations using words like ‘failure’ and ‘disloyalty’ but he stopped her.

“You could never disappoint me, Baby,” he told her with the same gentle smile he’d used when wiping her tears as a child. “You are strong, smart, kind, and beautiful just like your mother was. I will always be proud of you, no matter what you do.”

“Can I come home?” She asked in a small voice, hating herself for the way she sounded but needing to hear the answer nonetheless.

“Of course you can,” her dad told her, looking slightly affronted. “You can always come home and you know that.”

“I want to come home,” she said in a steadier voice, the tightness in her chest loosening a bit.

“Baby, what happened?” He asked her, gesturing for the waiter that they needed to take another moment or two.

“Nothing,” she said quickly. “I mean, work was fine and all, I just—” she swallowed and struggled to find the correct balance between the truth and the lies she knew she would have to tell him. “I realized after the meeting that this just isn’t what I want to do anymore.”

He didn’t say anything at first; he just looked at her with his wise and clever dark eyes sweeping over her face. It was as though he could see through her, see every secret she had squirrelled away inside of her heart, and she felt her skin flush with embarrassment. He took a deep breath, folded his arms on the table, and frowned. “You know, when I heard you had taken that job upstairs with Oliver Queen I admit it threw me a bit,” he said slowly. “You’ve never been interested in that side of things and I worried that the best part of you, the creative part you got from your mother, would be crushed under all the corporate back-biting and politics. When I saw you looking so sharp and in control yesterday I almost didn’t recognize you. It actually made me a little sad.”

“Why?” She asked, taking off her glasses to put them aside as they began to fog up, wiping her nose again with the handkerchief.

“Because that woman didn’t look like my Felicity. She looked like a predator, someone out for blood, a dime a dozen corporate barracuda; that kind of thing might suit a woman like Isabel Rochev and her ilk but that’s not who you are. It worried me a lot. I was afraid that Starling City had changed you and I was losing my little girl.”

“You could never lose me, Daddy,” Felicity said, scooting over so she could lay her head against his shoulder.

He took her hand in his and rubbed her fingers which had gone cold from the emotional upheaval, “Do you remember why your mother named you ‘Felicity’?”

“She said it was because I was her happiness,” she said without having to think about it. Her dad loved telling her that whenever she got upset.

“You have to do what makes you happy, Baby, not what makes everyone else happy. You’ve always tried to make other people happy, fix everyone and everything, but that’s not how life works.
You can’t take that much responsibility onto yourself; not even the strongest of men could handle that much weight on their shoulders. The only way to change the world is to change you, fix you, and then everyone else can see that and follow suit.”

“I love you,” she said, pulling away and looking at her dad.

“I love you too, Happy,” he smiled and she grinned back at him, the tears finally clearing up once and for all.

“Thank you, Daddy,” she said smiling. The man was simply made out of magic. In two seconds flat he managed to turn 24 hours’ worth of shit into pure sunshine.

“Now,” he said, bussing her forehead with a tender kiss then scooting his chair back into place, “let’s have some breakfast.” He picked up the menu and motioned the waiter over. “My cholesterol came back last week and the doc said that horrible muck Peggy Ann calls oatmeal has been doing its job so today I’m going to splurge a little, what do you say?”

They ordered a huge spread (Felicity, in addition to being a stress eater, was also a brunch enthusiast) of whole wheat pancakes, fresh fruit salad, spinach and leek frittata, smoked turkey sausages, and tea. She always drank tea with her dad who claimed that coffee always smelled better than it tasted.

They had just tucked in and she was feeling better and more relaxed than she had in ages when the other shoe dropped.

“Mind if I join you two?”

“Bruce!” Lucius said as he rose up from his seat to offer the other man a hearty handshake. “Of course--sit, sit! We haven’t even started yet.”

“Good morning,” Bruce turned a sharp toothed smile in her direction, his eyes glittering dangerously as he took the chair that was open beside her. “You look very pretty today, Baby. I think I like that dress even more than the one you had on yesterday. It suits you,” he said, running his eyes over the sheer white chiffon and silk that seemed to make her already pale complexion appear even more translucent.

“Thank you,” Felicity responded in a manner that was less than enthusiastic. In fact it was probably downright morose but he was pissing on her parade just when she was starting to feel better. Asshole, she pouted internally as she poked her eggs with her fork, her appetite gone.

The waiter eased over and Bruce turned to him, “I’ll have the same thing my friends are having and coffee, please. Black.”

“I don’t see how you and Felicity drink that stuff,” Lucius said good naturedly as he dug into his frittata. “This is delicious,” he said enthusiastically. “Peggy Ann hasn’t let me have an egg in months!”

“It certainly looks good.” He turned to Felicity, “Something wrong with your frittata, Baby? You’re not eating,” Bruce asked her with a knowing undertone as he watched her shift her food around her plate.

“It’s fine, I’ve just lost my appetite all of the sudden,” Felicity said, not giving him the satisfaction of looking at him.

Her dad frowned at her and reached out to pat her shoulder briefly, “It’s going to be alright, Baby.”
“I’m sorry, is something wrong?” He asked innocently.

Her father gave her another supportive look before answering, “Felicity has decided to leave Queen Consolidated and come back home for a while.”

“Did something happen?” He asked in mock concern.

The flying-rat bastard, Felicity snarked internally.

Her father answered for her. “No, no—she just didn’t like the path her career there was taking and decided to take a break for a while until she figures out where she wants to go next.”

“Well, I think that’s a splendid idea!” Bruce said with a note of triumph. “After all, Felicity started college before most kids her age were even thinking about high school then came graduate school, then QC’s Tech Division, then straight up to the executive level—if you ask me it’s about time she took a break.”

“He’s got a point, Baby. Bruce, you went to—where was it; Nepal after Yale?” Lucius asked and Bruce nodded. “Maybe you could travel for a while like Tam and Luke did? Go see Europe—maybe see if Tam wants to go with you. I’m sure we could arrange for her to make it a working vacation, catch up on some of our European operations for a few months in between all the sightseeing.”

Before Felicity could answer, Bruce broke in. “I don’t think she’ll want to do that, Lucius. There’s been a lot of foreign unrest lately, plus the stress of all that travel; I think she’ll probably want to stay in Gotham—for a while at least.” His eyes met hers and she could see the shadow of the Bat creeping into them.

Lucius chuckled, “Listen to you, Bruce. You’re more protective of my daughter than I am!”

“I’ll think about it,” Felicity said, “the traveling. For now though, Bruce is right, I’d like to stay home for a while first.” Her napkin fell from her lap and she slowly bent in her chair to pick it up, her muscles still sore despite the OTC pain reliever she had taken that morning.

“Besides,” Bruce said confidently, “Noah Cedars is retiring from WayneTech in a couple of years. If Felicity wants to go back to that then I can give him a call when she’s ready and she can try working with him for a while. If it works out then—“ He stopped abruptly, his eyes locking on her shoulder as she reached under the table.

Felicity frowned then flicked her eyes toward what had his attention. The collar of her cardigan had slipped out of place exposing part of her shoulder and collarbone where dark finger-shaped bruises stood out against her pale flesh. She had barely given them a second thought that morning before she left. It wasn’t all that unusual seeing bruises on her skin given her training in the Foundry and the level of danger they faced on a regular basis.

She sat up, straightening her sweater as she settled back into her chair.

Lucius chuckled, apparently not noticing Bruce’s sudden discomfiture. “She just quit one executive assistant position and you’re already—“ His phone buzzed on the table in front of him. “It’s the QC Marketing people. I’m just going to step away and get this if that’s alright.”

Felicity squirmed and fidgeted by pushing up the sleeves of her sweater nervously under Bruce’s gaze as he answered for them both, “No, go ahead. I’m sure Felicity and I will be—“ He flinched, “fine.”

She looked down and noticed the bandage she’d wrapped around her arm and the bruises and contusions on her other wrist were visible. She licked her lips nervously and smoothed down the sleeves of her cardigan so her father wouldn’t see.

“I’ll be right back,” he told them before picking up and wandering away to the lounge to finish the call.

As soon as he was out of earshot Bruce asked her in a low voice, “Are you alright?”

She took a sip from her now cold tea before answering, “It’s just a few bruises. I’ve had worse. Try crash landing through two plate glass windows forty stories above the ground sometime.” He flinched again. “Yeah, well, look who I’m talking to, right?” She muttered as she reached for the teapot.

“How bad?”

“What?” She asked mid-pour.

“The bruising; how bad is it?”

She shrugged, “I don’t know, didn’t really bother looking this morning. Pretty decent; you had a good grip on me plus the shaking. I know it hurt like hell last night, I hardly slept a wink even with the heating pad.” She snorted, “Not that I have any room to complain. I mean, I guess I’m lucky when you think about it.” She mused on that for a minute as she sipped her tea, some of her frustration slipping through in her tone. “I should probably thank you for not hurting me worse seeing how you feel about people like me. You know, murderers and such.”

“But that’s what I am now, right Bruce?” Felicity said coolly, the fire in her belly returning. She knew she was being cruel but, damn it, she was tired of him invading her life. “I imagine Helena got a lot worse. Of course, her body count is a lot higher, so…”

“Stop it,” Bruce said tightly, his eyes burning into hers.

She took a deep breath and picked at her fruit salad. “Fine, I’ll stop.” She looked over to him and saw as his eyes traveled from her collarbone to her arm and back up again as though he could see her injuries through her clothes. “I’m okay, really. Just relax Bruce, you’re not the first person to slap me around or leave a few bruises since I’ve come to Starling City. It’s not a big deal.”

Bruce stood up abruptly, throwing down his napkin, and stalked out of the dining room without saying another word. Felicity kept her eyes firmly fixed on her plate, refusing to feel guilty about what she’d done to him. Yes, it was horribly bitchy, cruel, and passive aggressive but he was the one who stormed into her life, not the other way around. If he was going to ruin her life and leave a few bruises in his wake then he should expect payback.

She pushed her plate back and cradled her head in her hands. This was so fucking unfair! I should not be feeling guilty right now, she told herself. I should be happy I got to twist the knife a little, so why do I feel like complete shit? She just was not built for revenge at all. Felicity Smoak; doormat, punching bag, and wuss at your service.
Chapter Twelve

When her dad got back to the table and asked where Bruce had gone she told him that he’d gotten a phone call and had to leave unexpectedly. Lucius was used to Bruce’s sudden comings and goings so the vagaries didn’t even faze him. They finished their brunch and she rode with him in the limo to the airport. She hugged him goodbye and promised to call him later in the week after she’d taken care of packing up her house, talking to her landlord, and returning her car to the leasing company. Bruce hadn’t been there but she didn’t expect him to be either. She knew full well that, despite the few well-placed blows she’d landed at brunch, he wouldn’t leave town until she did.

The hotel limo drove her back to her car and she finally got around to buying those groceries she’d been promising herself. Ironic that I get around to filling my fridge as I’m about to move, she thought looking into the canvas tote ruefully.

Still it would be nice to not have to leave the house for a while. She could now gorge on ice cream as she packed up the broken remnants of her shattered life and career without having to wear her pajamas in public anymore.

She opened her door, tossing her purse into the chair by the small console table, only to freeze in her tracks. Her breath caught in her throat and she nearly dropped her groceries before she realized that the large figure staring out of her living room window was Bruce. She heaved a sigh of relief and irritation as she plopped the bag on her kitchen counter and rounded on him. “Damn it, Bruce! You can’t just break and enter any time you feel like it! And, by the way,” she said to his turned back, “if you had scared me into dropping the eggs, then you were getting on your knees and cleaning them up. Frankly, at this point, I could give a rat’s ass about your dry cleaning bill.”

She hauled out her Ben and Jerry’s (Cherry Garcia, Coffee Coffee Buzz Buzz Buzz, Late Night Snack, Phish Food, Mint Chocolate Cookie, and Karamel Sutra; a week was a long time and she did have a lot of packing to do) and stuck them in her fridge along with her other perishables before turning her attention back to her uninvited visitor. He hadn’t moved from where he had been standing, never acknowledged her or spoke, and it was really beginning to creep her out. Starling City was once home to serial killer who turned women into plastic dolls (she should know; she was almost made a permanent guest at his teddy bear tea party) and Bruce was looking a little too statue-like for her comfort.

She walked over to where he was standing and touched his shoulder warily, “Bruce?”

He turned to her, the deep grooves that framed his mouth standing out. Slowly, carefully, he reached out to her. His fingers lifted her sweater off her shoulders and it slid down her arms and onto the floor. She should have objected, backed away quickly, or at least protested the treatment of her very white, very expensive sweater being tossed on floors that hadn’t been swept or vacuumed for longer than she cared to admit, but she was frozen to the spot.

His eyes were haunted and waves of pain flowed from them. He focused on the black and blue marks covering her shoulder then the other injuries marring the fragile skin of her wrist. It looked much worse than it was. Her pale complexion and sensitive skin made the bruises stand out even in the low light. He then unwrapped the bandage on her right forearm, his jaw clenching as the dark mottled skin and broken capillaries came into view. Slowly and with infinite tenderness, his hand, the same one that had gripped her shoulder the night before, traced each of the impressions that he had left behind finally stilling over the worst one on her collar bone that was tinged red on the very edges, probing the bone carefully.

He took a shuddering breath and his eyes moved to her now exposed forearm. He lifted her arm and stoked along the dark and angry imprint his lack of control had caused before testing her elbow and wrist gently then probing both her radius and ulna as he watched her face for any sign of pain. She flinched when he squeezed the edge of the bruise and he froze. Bruce’s eyes left her face and focused back on her arm. He swallowed and licked his lips as he assessed the damage, seeing that it was bruised but not broken. His hand left her elbow and stroked down her other arm, careful not to brush against the scabbed and rough scrape from his gauntlet that ran almost to her wrist, as he took both her hands in his and squeezed lightly.

Her breath caught in her throat as she watched his face crumple and he tugged her close, burying his nose in her hair. “I’m sorry, Baby. I’m so, so sorry.”

She had a million reasons, good reasons, to push him away and rail at him for everything he had put her through but, instead, she put her arms around his shoulders and ran her fingers soothingly through his black hair as she laid her head on his chest. “It’s okay, we’re okay. I’m fine.”

They stood there for a long time in the dimming light of late afternoon. He began to sway them back and forth slightly as though they were dancing to some silent melody playing in his mind. Finally, reluctantly, he pulled away just enough so that he could meet her eyes. “I swear to you, on everything I am, I will never touch you like that ever again. Never again.” There was so much raw emotion in his face, a face that was usually so closed off and stoic, her eyes began to fill at the sight. His hand cupped her cheek as his thumb wiped away the gathering tears. “I’m so sorry; I swear to God I never meant to hurt you. I can’t…” His face paled and he hung his head in shame as he shook his head. “Please. I wouldn’t blame you if you hated me but, please…”

It was stupid, she was stupid. Later on she would call herself every kind of idiot for doing it but she couldn’t help it. Seeing the agony written on his expression and feeling the need to make it right again she lifted herself on her toes and kissed him softly.

He tightened his arms around her and kissed her back.

From there, well, everything was a bit of a blur. Looking back later Felicity honestly couldn’t even remember how they’d gotten to her bedroom. It was kind of like when you’re driving to work and one minute you’re in your driveway and the next thing you know you’re sitting at your desk. She didn’t know which one of them in the metaphor was the car and which one was the desk but it was definitely gearing up to be a ride to remember.

One minute she was fully clothed in front of her couch and the next thing she knew her glasses had disappeared and Bruce was kissing and sucking her neck as they were laying on her bed with her bra clutched in his fist. It wasn’t even a nice bra; it was an old t-shirt bra with some little strings of elastic threads hanging off it and a couple of bent clasps in the back. It didn’t even match her panties, the full brief kind that came up to her belly button. The part of her brain still somewhat aware of that sort of thing told her not to worry about it because those had mysteriously vanished as well along with the clothes he had been wearing because...

She gasped as he bit down on her nipple, her hands clutching at his bare shoulders. She could feel his hard shaft pressing against her as he continued to explore her with his mouth and fingers.

And then there were her pantyhose, she thought through her passion-filled fog. Not the sexy thigh high kind with the fancy lace garter belt; the ones from the plastic egg (the kind that you had to do the chicken dance just to haul up all the way). She was pretty sure that getting those off of her required the application of some kind of alien technology or Bat Disintegration Ray but her eyes had been closed so she couldn’t really say.

Must be something they learn in the Billionaire Playboy’s Club or in Vigilante Prep School, she thought muzzily as his fingers ran along her inner thigh until he was stroking her and ---oh, that’s nice. She cried out again and began to arch and squirm against him as he hummed against her throat in smug amusement.
His mouth trailed down to her breast once more where he alternated between licking, sucking, and lightly teasing her nipple with his teeth. She ran her fingers through his inky black hair, the clean scent of his spicy cologne making her head swim as his fingers and mouth made her pulse with want.

“Bruce,” she moaned, “Oh God, I’ve missed this,” she said then almost managed to fluster herself out of a good time when she realized she’d said it out loud. She sucked in a breath to launch into a ramble but then he lifted his head, pinning her with his hot gaze.

His lips captured hers in something that was less like a kiss and more like a brand of ownership. His mouth then left hers to find her earlobe and captured it between his teeth, sucking gently. His tongue began to stroke the sensitive flesh and she whimpered and squirmed against his fingers.

“Oh Baby,” he whispered against her ear, “You and I both have a lot of time to make up for.” He chuckled causing her to shiver with need.

Her fingers scraped his scalp as his mouth traveled down her throat again and then further on until he found her breast. He sucked one of her hard nipples into his mouth and captured it between his teeth as his tongue flicked back and forth causing a new flood of moisture between her thighs. “God, you are so wet,” he said in a near growl. When two of his fingers entered her she sucked in a slightly pained breath and he stilled. “How long, Baby?”

“How long is a while?” He asked, watching her carefully.

She knew what he was asking. She bit her lip, suddenly embarrassed. “A little over four years.”

She saw as the realization of what she was telling him registered. “Oh Baby,” he breathed; his voice heavily laden with lust and amusement, “only you would give someone your virginity twice.”

She frowned, “I don’t really think it counts the second time,” she said right before he slid up her body and captured her mouth in a deep kiss.

He sucked and nibbled her lips and she gasped against his mouth as his fingers made clever swirling motions that she swore meant he had to have three hands down there. She felt the pleasure in her build and build as his tongue curled around her earlobe just as his fingers curled inside of her and…

She…Was…Gone.

She screamed so loud the neighbors probably called the cops. Then, even before the echoes had faded away, he was pressing inside with a moan that sounded almost inhuman. She gasped at the initial burn but then he began to stroke inside of her, filling what had been empty for far too long. She looked at his face, at the exquisite look of pleasure and passion in his expression, and closed her eyes as he captured her lips again, his hips surging forward just as his tongue tangled with her own.

He was pushing, pushing, pushing; his fingers dug into her hips lifting her into the thrusts of his body. Deep, hard, long, and then he hit rock bottom and lightning struck her spine.

She nearly screamed again. Her toes curled and she couldn’t breathe and, fuck, it felt like pain and pleasure at the same time and she never wanted it to end. “Please, oh God! Don’t stop! Never stop! Please!” She sobbed in a ramble out loud and in her head. He growled and suddenly she knew it was her favorite sound in the whole world.

His thrusts began to jerk against her roughly, his rhythm becoming more and more irregular. It felt as though he was getting bigger somehow and then she made a sound that she didn’t even know a human being could make as her body shuddered and she fell over the edge. He thrust so hard inside her she slid up the bed a few inches and then he roared.

She shut her eyes tight as everything became about the moment. For one brief moment she was all sensation. Tremors ran down her body as she buried her face into his neck. He collapsed against her, breathing raggedly.

He rolled off her onto his back, his chest glistening and his dark hair damp with sweat. She curled up beside him and laid her head against his chest as he wrapped his arm around her back and traced lazy circles against her skin.

“Are you okay,” he asked a little breathlessly.

“I don’t know,” she panted, pressing her hand against her breastbone. “I think I might be having a heart attack.”

Bruce chuckled again and pulled her up his side so he could capture her mouth in a brief kiss. “Not bad for an old man then?” He asked her, his eyes sparkling with laughter. “After all, according to you I could be someone’s grandfather.”

“I think if you were any younger I’d be dead right now,” Felicity said honestly.

He kissed her temple then rolled onto his side so he could trace soft kisses over her cheek and across her throat. He nuzzled her ear and seemed to breathe her in. Her fingers moved upwards to card through his dark hair as he lifted his head to look her in the eyes, “I’m sorry. I never meant to hurt you.”

“I know,” she said quietly. “I told you, it’s just a bruise, it looks worse than it is. I’m fine.”

His finger stroked the tender skin of her shoulder, “Not just this; all of it.” He looked up at her again, his eyes heavy with emotion, “I’m sorry.”

Felicity closed her eyes, unable to speak as she felt the weight of his words. “Thank you,” she said last. Despite herself she heard her voice break as tears pricked her eyes.

“No,” he said quietly, brushing them from her cheeks. “No crying.” He made a soothing noise.

“No, it’s--” she hiccupped and looked at him with a wobbly smile, “They’re happy tears, Bruce. I’ve waited…a long time to hear you say that and now…”

“I’m sorry,” he breathed against her forehead as he laid a tender kiss there. “I’m so, so sorry, Baby. I never wanted to hurt you. Never you.”

“Don’t be sorry, Bruce,” she told him quietly as she stroked her fingers down his neck and across his cheeks. “Just don’t do it again, okay?”

“Okay.” He pulled away and smiled down at her, a soft smile that made her heart squeeze in her chest. Words she had no business speaking out loud nearly bubbled forth before he kissed her again, soft and sweet. “Close your eyes, Baby,” he told her as he pulled her to him a little closer, stroking her hair tenderly. He rolled onto his back, his arm wrapped around her as his fingers stroked down her side to rest on her bare hip. For a moment, for just the briefest of seconds, it almost felt like love.

She laid her head on his chest, took a deep breath, and faded away.
A few hours must have passed because the world outside her bedroom window was dark and still. There was a soreness and an unfamiliar stickiness between her thighs and she could smell his cologne on her sheets. She moved her fingers across the bed, blindly searching for Bruce only to find empty space. A noise from across the room made her sit up, sheets clutched to her naked breasts, her hair a riotous mass of curls.

Bruce was standing at the end of her footboard pulling the deep charcoal V-neck sweater he’d been wearing over his head. She looked at him blearily and tried to push the rat’s nest of blonde hair out of her face. She puffed a breath at the bits trying to worm their way up her nose then smiled softly, “Where are you going?”

He froze. For a second it tickled her that she had actually managed to get the drop on Batman in the dark but then something clicked and her brain came back online. “You’re leaving?” She asked in confusion, “You’re leaving and you weren’t even going to wake me up first? Why?”

His features shifted and settled into that grim countenance that rarely boded well for anyone. She knew that look.

She’d seen that look on his face before and under very similar circumstances.

“You’re leaving?” She asked incredulously.

Very similar circumstances.

“Felicity…” He began.

“Again?!” She yelled, her temper flaring to volcanic levels. “You have got to be kidding me! You said--!”

“Felicity, it’s just not---!”

She grabbed the first thing she could find which was, unfortunately, her cell, and threw it at his head as hard as she could. His reflexes, being what they were, allowed him to deflect it handily.

That was unfortunate as well because braining him with something hurled at great velocity would have felt pretty great. For her anyway. Suddenly she had a new goal in life: Bruce meet projectile. Projectile meet BatBrain.

“You bastard!” She growled, tumbling out of bed. Her feet tangled in the sheets and she took a nasty fall onto the floor. He bent as though to help her up but she began hitting at him with the fist that wasn’t clutching the bedding concealing her nakedness.

“Stop it! You’re going to hurt yourself!” He backed out and she struggled to her feet to chase him into the kitchen. “Felicity, stop!” He ordered as he batted away the various objects she was grabbing at random and hurling in his direction.

“Four years!” She yelled, ignoring him. “I haven’t been able to even think of allowing another man to touch me for four years because of you! It took me two years to get to the point where I could even consider going out on a date with someone after what you did to me, and that was a total disaster because you left me an emotional basket case! You come here, you apologize, you promise you won’t hurt me again and then you do this? Seriously?!” She snatched her favorite cereal bowl from the dish rack and threw it at him. “What was the point of all this? What did I ever do to you?”

She reached over and snatched a vase off the table and lobbed it in his direction. “First you take my self-esteem!” Coffee decanter. “Then you take my job!” Mug that says ‘Tech Girls Do It Beta’.
“Then you threaten me and force me from my home and my friends!” Mexican hand-painted platter.
“You stalk me when I’m trying to have brunch with my father!” Toaster. “And then — AND THEN —” Blender. “You have sex with me!” Ceramic TARDIS cookie jar. “Again!” Aloe Vera plant in a terra cotta pot. “After four years!” Bread box. “After promising not to hurt me ever again!” Ceramic frog soap dish. “Only to turn around!” Calphalon butcher block cutting board. “Just so you can sneak out on me!” Handfuls of fridge magnets because, by then, her counters were pretty much clear. “Like a fucking coward!”

“Felicity,” he said slowly, his hands stretched outward in a defensive posture just in case she started digging under the kitchen sink next, “my world is too dangerous—“

“Fuck you and your world you Bat-Eared Bastard!” She screamed so loud that her own ears began to ring. “Get out of my house and don’t you dare show your face around here ever again!”

“Felicity—” She reached behind her to the small wine cabinet and just grabbed and threw whatever was there. The bottle of expensive wine exploded near his head, splashes of the deep crimson liquid splattering and staining his clothes.

“OUT!” She screamed and, taking one last look at her he slipped silently out the door.

After he left she collapsed on the floor in a heap of bedding. She sobbed, great, messy, soul churning sobs that made her lungs ache and her throat hurt. By the time dawn began to peek over the horizon she was in misery. Her ankle was sore and swollen from where she had fallen, her face was hot and blotchy from crying, her nose felt like someone had chewed it up and spit it back on her face, her lungs hurt, her throat hurt, her eyes felt like they were sunburned, and her last bottle of wine was now just a stain on the carpet. And then it got worse.

Apparently her volley of the toaster went wide and knocked her purse on the floor because her new birth control was lying beside it.

She’d bought them on Thursday but in all the excitement she’d forgotten to actually start them.

They hadn’t used a condom.

“Fuck.”

“What’s the matter, honey? Flu’s pretty bad this year, you need some cold medicine? Aisle 2,” an older woman wearing a white lab coat with the name ‘ROZ’ embroidered on the pocket told her.

“No,” Felicity said hoarsely then cleared her throat as she limped up to the counter. She knew she looked like hell but this just confirmed it. She sniffled, wiping her nose with a tissue that should have been tossed two blows ago. “Do you sell Plan B?”

“Sure thing, my darling,” the woman reached behind her and placed the pastel box on the counter between them, “$49.99 plus tax.”

“For one pill?” Felicity asked incredulously.

“Like I tell my girls, honey; buy the condoms first and you’ll come out cheaper.”

Felicity blew out a breath and reached for her wallet, “Yeah well, don’t have to worry about that. I’m probably never having sex ever again.”
“That’s what they all say, bubeleh.” She eyed her reproachfully as she ran her card and put the emergency contraception in a white paper sack. “Take my advice and buy the condoms. Trust me, there’s worse things than catching babies.”

“Thanks but I can guarantee I won’t need them.”

“Uh huh, whatever you say, honey. You just take care of yourself and I hope you get to feeling better soon.”

“Thanks,” she said morosely. “But I doubt that’ll be happening either.”

She woke up Monday morning to the sound of her new phone ringing. It was yet another reminder of what had happened.

That and the fact that smartphones made expensive projectile weapons.

“Hello,” she croaked.

“Hello Ms. Smoak.”

Felicity buried her face under her pillow, phone and all. “Isabel? Why are you calling me at—” she glanced at her phone—“8am?”

“Because it’s Monday morning and I’m at work,” she said wryly.

“Yeah, well, good for you,” Felicity mumbled, “You must not have heard but I quit last week.”

“I did hear which is why I called you on your cellphone and not at your desk.”

“Okay,” Felicity whimpered as she pulled her head out from under the pillow and flopped over onto her back.

“I’m calling to make sure you haven’t forgotten that we were meeting for lunch later.”

She rubbed her forehead and squinted at her ceiling in confusion. “Um, can you repeat that because it’s really early for me and I haven’t had any coffee in two days because my pot is…broken.”

“Lunch. One o’clock at Leviathan; do you know how to get there or should I send a car?”

“Wait, you were serious about that?”

“Of course I was,” she said in a slightly bemused tone. “You are coming, aren’t you?”

“You want to have lunch with me?” Felicity asked, her mind still not grasping what was happening. “Just me or with other people and I happen to be in the room?”

“Just us.”

“Uh…” Felicity pinched the bridge of her nose as shook her head, willing herself to focus. “You know what? I don’t think I can make it. Kind of busy today; packing…cleaning out my refrigerator.”

Especially the freezer, she was down to one spoonful of Cherry Garcia and a pint of Karamel Sutra. It had been medicinal she told herself; she used the one packet of healing herbs she had gotten from Oliver and mixed them together. At least, that’s what she told herself in order to justify the first three pints she’d devoured; the last few were purely recreational. She would have eaten the last pint she had left but the name just struck her as being a little too ironic at the time.

“Felicity, I know there have been moments between us where I was less than kind—“ Felicity couldn’t help her snort but Isabel ignored it and moved on, “but I assure you that I will be respectful and polite and that I truly would like to start over with you.”

She took a deep breath, “I appreciate that, I do, and if this is about Wayne Enterprises or my dad I promise I would never do anything to hurt—“

“This isn’t about that, Felicity. Really. It’s about making amends. Please.”

“Excellent! I have a meeting right now but I’ll see you at 1:00, ciao!”

She stared at her phone in disbelief.

“Someday I have really got to start listening to that voice in my head.”
starling
Felicity approached the restaurant warily wondering for the umpteenth time what the hell she had been thinking. She smoothed her hands over her fitted black and white polka dot dress, straightened her smart looking tweed First Lady jacket, and went inside.

She decided when she left for their meeting that she was going to go for broke. She was gone, outta there, and Isabel would not get the last word in the bitch war. Bruce’s bullshit had primed her for a scrap and she didn’t believe for a second this was a ‘friendly’ lunch. Whatever it was though it had her curious so she said ‘What the hell?’ and decided, if nothing else, she’d enjoy a meal at a 5 star restaurant on Isabel’s dime.

Fire meet frying pan, she thought as she followed the waiter to a private dining room where Isabel was waiting for her.

“Alice+Olivia, actually,” she said, giving the waiter a smile as he poured her a water.

“Very cute but then you always did have such a lovely sense of style,” she said with a smile and, for a second, Felicity wondered if Isabel paying her a compliment was one of the signs of the Apocalypse.

They ate lunch quietly, spoke in a civilized manner, and Isabel acted as a perfectly composed if cool hostess. Just as their wineglasses had been filled for the last time and their meals all but eaten, Isabel made her move.

“No, I totally agree,” Isabel nodded. “Again I apologize for my unprofessional behavior toward you, but from the moment we met I could tell you weren’t comfortable in the position. There’s no excuse for what I said but when Oliver told me that he asked you to take it and you gave up your career path to follow him, well,” she twisted her lips in a disapproving moue, “I’ve seen a lot of otherwise smart women do foolish things just to follow a man and, I admit, I showed you a great deal of disrespect because I allowed my prejudice about that to inform my behavior.”

“You know,” Felicity leaned forward and folded her hands on the table top, “since we’re being entirely honest and getting everything cleared up between us, why were you so, what’s the word?”
She took a minute to ponder it, “Nope, no other way to say it: why were you such a bitch towards me when you slept with Oliver in Russia?”

Instead of appearing offended, Isabel seemed almost happy that she’d asked the question. “Several reasons actually, but none of them involved social climbing or selling my body so a man could take care of me. There’s a difference between a woman who sleeps with a man because she has no other means of acquiring what she wants and a woman to whom sex is but one of many tools in her arsenal.” She smiled, “I have no respect for women who don’t understand the difference.”

“So, again, why did you sleep with Oliver?” Felicity repeated.

“Why do you think I did?” She asked, a small spark of curiosity lighting her features.

“Well, he’s obviously attractive but I don’t think this was entirely about scratching an itch for you,” she theorized. “You’re not that kind of woman. For all your faults you seem genuinely invested in making QC a success. If I were to guess, I’d say it was some sort of scouting mission on your part; a kind of peek behind his…curtain.”

Her eyes brightened at that. “And what do you think I discovered?”

“Still?” She encouraged.

She debated answering her for a second but then decided to go all in, “Well, knowing what I do know about him, and other men like him,” Bruce, her brain supplied, “I’d say that you found out he isn’t as clueless as he sometimes appears. In fact I’d say you discovered he’s a bit of a control freak and far more intelligent than he portrays himself to be. He doesn’t mind giving others the illusion of his attention and is very in control and methodical but he never truly emotionally connects with the person he’s with. That said, he does have a bad habit of playing a little too close to the edge sometimes and never takes in to consideration how that may affect others around him.”

“And what kind of lover do you suppose he is?” Isabel asked, quirking an eyebrow upward.

“That’s a bit inappropriate,” Felicity demurred.

“We’re two women discussing the politics of sex, I’d say that it’s not only appropriate, but on topic. So, what kind of lover do you think he is?”

“He’s not,” Felicity answered simply.

Isabel seemed almost animated for once. “How so?”

“He’s not anyone’s ‘lover’, he doesn’t allow emotions to play into it. For men like Oliver sex is a means to an end and, if we’re being honest here, I’d say he was scouting you just as hard as you were scouting him. No pun intended,” she added.

“Brava,” Isabel said clapping her hands a few times. “I knew I saw something in you the other day and this,” she indicated the discourse between them, “just proved it. You were spot on, but I would have expected no less from you. I want you to know that I took your words to heart and did my own research on you.” Dark amusement glittered in the other woman’s eyes and Felicity sudden felt very uneasy. “I was impressed and I don’t impress easily.”

“Um, thank you,” Felicity tugged at her earring a bit nervously. “Isabel, while I appreciate the,” she waved her hand over the table, “all this, I get the feeling I’m here for something other than a friendly handshake.”

“You are,” Isabel said, wiping her mouth daintily.

There was a pregnant pause, “And?”

“I want to recruit you.”

Felicity’s mouth fell open, “You’re offering me a job?”

“I am,” Isabel said evenly.

“But I just quit QC last week, why would I go back?”

“Not for Queen Consolidated, for Stellmoor International.”

She leaned back in her chair and pondered that for a moment. “I don’t get it.”

“What don’t you get?” Isabel said easily. “You have all the qualities we look for: you’re intelligent, observant, you’re tech savvy, independent, loyal, trustworthy, discreet, and you don’t run from a challenge.”

“Thanks, but I don’t know about the last bit,” she said as picked at her Red Snapper with Citrus and Fennel salad. It might as well have been cardboard given the mood she was in. “I think there’s a few people who would tell you that I’ve made running away a habit lately.”

“They’d be wrong,” Isabel said confidently. “There’s a difference between making a strategic retreat and being a coward or a quitter. A simpering little doormat would have let Bruce Wayne back them into a corner at that meeting but you handled him perfectly. Every time he tried to make a power play you countered with one of your own. And, despite our less than, shall we say, ‘cordial relationship’, you instinctively sought out my assistance sensing that not only would I be receptive but that I would use it to our mutual benefit.”

“I don’t know if I was being quite that calculating—“

“Then you’d be selling yourself short,” Isabel broke in. “You planned every nuance of your interaction with Wayne. Don’t deny it; false modesty is for people who are too cowardly or too stupid to embrace their own power.” Isabel smiled again, it was that dead-eyed predator smile that always gave her the willies. “You came to that meeting prepared to do all-out battle. You had a strategy that worked perfectly. Every movement, every inflection, all of it was designed to be a crippling psychological attack against your opponent’s self-confidence. From the color and style of your dress to the perfume you wore, you had Bruce and Oliver thoroughly enthralled.”

“How did you know about the perfume?” Felicity asked in surprise.

Isabel’s smile grew wider, her eyes twinkling like a cat’s when it notices the canary cage door has been left wide open. “Please. There are only two fragrances that make every grown man over the age of thirty miss his mommy: L’Air du Temps and Chanel No. 5. You nailed it with Bruce but you had a 50/50 shot with Oliver and you lucked out. Had he been my target I would have gone with Chanel. Good thing the nanny had taste.” Felicity’s eyes widened slightly and Isabel twinkled again. “You and I both know that women like Moira Queen don’t wipe grubby faces or deal with runny noses, ergo it was the nanny’s favorite perfume.”

“Housekeeper,” Felicity said faintly, suddenly looking at Isabel with new eyes.
Isabel made a dismissive gesture. “Same difference; nanny, housekeeper, sweet maiden aunt, dearly departed granny who used to bake them cookies and sang to them at bedtime; all men, no matter how strong or powerful, miss the feeling of being that little boy in mommy’s arms. You waged psychological warfare against two of the most powerful men in the world and you won. You knew that if you gave Bruce the satisfaction of so much as a glance in his direction the game was lost so you kept his attention by subtly taunting Oliver. You played into his ego and his attraction to you. You made him play your game; ask the questions all men ask when they find a woman desirable: Is she mommy? Is she the sweet little virgin next door? Is she sex and dark desire? Or, is she a challenge? You hit all of those creating a situation where they were so confused and preoccupied with you that we were able to close the deal without either of them having the presence of mind to muck it up. You kept Oliver on point and Bruce on edge and, when he attempted to outmaneuver you, you feinted by drawing me in knowing that I would instinctively engage him. You, Felicity Smoak, are exactly what Stellmoor is looking for.”

Felicity chuckled a little. “I’m sorry, are you looking for a tech or for Mata Hari? Because it sounds like you’re recruiting me to be some kind of femme fatale who can work PowerPoint.”

“Who’s to say that one has to be mutually exclusive from the other?” Isabel countered. “What do you know about Stellmoor International?”

Felicity’s brow furrowed in thought, “Not much. It’s a Vulture Capitalist investment firm—again, no offense—”

Isabel waved her off, “A bit pejorative but somewhat accurate; continue.”

“It’s based out of Seattle but it has strong ties to Europe, Russia, Asia, and the Netherlands. There’s not a lot out there about it, not even that I could find. All I know is that your North American interests are all pretty straightforward; you buy up and dismantle failing companies and sell them for scrap. It’s when you get to your overseas holdings that things get a bit murky. There still seems to be a focus on corporate conquer and castrate but you also have a great many holdings in mining, manufacturing, and medical research.” She paused, “There’s something I need to ask you real quick.”

“Ask.”

“You don’t like me and, frankly, I’m not a big fan of yours either, so why do this? Why offer me a job?” Felicity asked.

“I don’t dislike you, Felicity.” The timbre of Isabel’s voice changed, lowered, and the look in her eyes changed from cool calculation to something considerably warmer. “In fact I’m beginning to enjoy your company immensely. I could easily see us becoming quite friendly with one another in the near future if you were open to it.”

“Huh,” Felicity did a mental double take. “Um…if I’m out of line here then I apologize but, I have to ask; are you…um, are you…?”

Isabel’s lips tipped upward in a sensual smirk, “Am I expressing interest in exploring a less professional and more personal relationship with you? One that I suspect would prove mutually satisfying to us both?”

Felicity’s jaw dropped, “So…wow. Okay, didn’t see that one coming. So that means that you…you want us to…?”

Isabel ran a crimson tipped fingernail over her lips before tapping her chin as though contemplating the question, “Perhaps, but that has nothing to do with my motivations for offering you the job nor is it a requirement. I’m merely making you aware of the possibilities.”

Holy crap, Xenia Onatopp just made a pass at me. “Huh. I have no idea what to say right now,” Her mind went completely blank for a minute before her brain cells clicked back on. “You—I—um, you should know that I like men. Not that there’s anything wrong with not. I mean, not liking men, that is. But I do. Like men. Not that I’m promiscuous or anything, it’s just my preference. Lesbians are great though; go lesbians!” She said weakly as the word vomit hangover began to cause her head to throb with humiliation.

“I like men,” Isabel said off-handedly. “I enjoy them immensely, in fact. I believe you referred to it earlier as ‘scratching an itch’. Men fulfill that requirement nicely but women…” Again she gave that low and slow smile that Felicity suddenly realized was probably Oliver’s undoing in Russia. “Women are more complex, more sensual.” Again she gave Felicity a once over, “Women speak to me in ways that are more intellectually and emotionally fulfilling. Men scratch the occasional itch but women…Women provide everything else a man can’t.”

“I can’t tell if I’m having a really bad week or a really good week anymore,” Felicity muttered to herself.

“From my perspective it’s getting better all the time,” the other woman said flirtatiously.

Oh boy. “Isabel, while I am incredibly flattered and truly appreciate the ego boost, you have no idea how much I really needed that actually, I’m afraid that we’re just not compatible in that way. Although, were I so inclined, I want you to know I would find you very attractive.”

“Well said,” Isabel said, seemingly not the least bit insulted or disappointed, “but should you ever change your mind…”

“If the bi-curious stage I skipped in college ever rears its head, I’ll be sure to give you a call.”

“And the job offer?”

She thought about it. “I’ll admit I’m curious. I have a lot of questions though. Also, you should know, I’m already committed to returning to Gotham and I don’t know if the offer would extend to the East Coast.”

“Perhaps I can help you with that,” Isabel smirked, some of the cat-ate-the-canary returning to her eyes. “Stellmoor has offices all over the world including Gotham. As for your questions; ask anything you like.”

“What would I be doing there? You started talking about that bit before we, um, got off topic,” Felicity couldn’t help but blush a little at that.

“Same thing you’re doing now only in a much larger capacity and in a way that better plays to your strengths. Stellmoor is run mostly by women, smart women, women who understand how to get what they want and how to be successful doing it. Most major corporations within the tech and weapons development world are run almost exclusively by men. A woman has to work twice as hard and be twice as successful to even be seen as half as worthy as a man within this elite little realm and, as much as one would like to believe that isn’t true, we both know it is. Most politicians and military higher-ups would prefer buying their tanks and tech from men while getting their coffee topped off by a woman. Case in point; Oliver claimed you were his friend, acknowledged your skills, and then proceeded to derail your career so you could be a well-paid secretary.”
She held up her hand to head off Felicity’s protests. “While I have no doubt his feelings toward you are of genuine friendship, I must ask; while you were supporting him in his career how was he supporting yours? Did he move you upstairs to head up the Applied Sciences division even though you are more than qualified? Did he move you into a position where you could eventually take over as his vice-chairman at the board if he was so worried about stacking the deck with ‘trusted friends’? Did he even value your friendship enough to take into consideration how the move from heading an IT team to executive assistant would affect your resume and how future employers might read into that? No.”

Felicity flushed, feeling frustrated because, really, Isabel wasn’t totally wrong. At least, not from an outsider’s point of view. She tried making the same arguments to Oliver herself but he wouldn’t listen to anything she had to say outside of the mission (and the mission was 24/6 with the rest reserved for QC and keeping his head above water). Oliver was always in the present, always on mission, survival taking up all his critical thinking and decision making, so long term planning fell entirely on her. If she were honest, the way Isabel described things was exactly how it would look to any future employers: Felicity the doormat gave up her career to follow her crush to the top only to be dumped in the high-end secretarial pool. What’s worse, she couldn’t defend against that without giving up the real truth. “It’s not that simple, he needed the support of people he trusted while he settled into his position as CEO—“

“And lucky him, he found it. But that’s over now; he settled in and you’re moving on. Now it’s time to figure out what you want and need. You have developed skill sets that would be wasted in most companies outside of Stellmoor, skill sets that you’d be hard-pressed to ever be able to exercise in the same way again.”

“Like what? The ability to schedule meetings and fix my own computer at the same time?” Felicity couldn’t help but quip before taking another swallow from her wine glass.

“I was thinking more along the lines of the type of tech support you give Oliver when he’s out on the streets being the Arrow.” Isabel said easily.

Felicity’s lungs filled with liquid as she choked on her wine. Coughing into her napkin she felt her eyes tear up as she desperately tried to find oxygen. Finally, after successfully gulping in some air, she was able to respond, “I’m sorry? I thought you just said—?”

“That Oliver is the Arrow?” Isabel nodded as though it were common knowledge. “I’ve known about that forever, before I even arrived in Starling City in fact.” She glanced at her through a fall of dark lashes, “No need to deny it, although I already know you’ll try; Stellmoor specifically chose to partner with Queen Consolidated for that very reason.”

“Okay,” Felicity said, wiping her eyes and then her nose with her napkin even though it wasn’t exactly proper etiquette. Inhaling wine, even a nice Riesling, hurt like a bitch and she had snot and tears dripping everywhere, “Okay, let’s pretend you’re right, which you aren’t, but if Oliver was playing Robin Hood after dark and if I were stupid enough to help him, how would Stellmoor even know about it and why would they care? And what kind of job at Stellmoor would require the skills someone providing tech support for a masked vigilante—which, again, is ridiculous because I am not doing that at all and neither is Oliver.”

“Stellmoor isn’t just corporate takeovers and tech, we provide financial and technical support to women who have the ability to change and defend the world around us. Women whose goals match our own, who seek to eliminate all that is evil and corrupt, and who have it within themselves to fight the problems that affect all of us but in the right way. The world needs more than just some masked men beating down thieves, mobsters, and murderers with their fists and arrows. The male vigilantes like the Arrow, Batman, or the new ones with the meta-abilities like the Flash and Superman, may be occupying the headlines now but there are female heroes as well. And just like in the business world, these women aren’t given the support or recognition they should. We hope to change that.”

“You make it sound like Stellmoor is run by a group of Corporate Raiding Amazons,” she snorted.

“The Themyscirians are a client in fact,” she answered taking her comment seriously.

“Themyscira? As in the mythological Greek city of the Amazons? You’re serious?”

It was a loaded question: Answer it and she’d be admitting that not only was she aware that Sara Lance was alive before her miraculous ‘home coming’ two years ago and that she was the Canary, it would mean that she was confirming Oliver’s identity as the Arrow. Don’t answer it and it does the same.

“I never met Sara Lance before the boating accident and all I know about her life before then is what I read in the paper. I admit that I do know her, that she and I struck up a friendship of sorts after she began working at Oliver’s club as a bartender on the swing shift, but we’re casual acquaintances at best. Our relationship consists of two mutual friends and her ability to make a mean Margarita. I don’t know where she is or what she’s doing but, I assure you, as far as I know she isn’t currently swinging across rooftops in Starling City.”

Isabel’s smile took on a shark quality again and she hummed in approval. “Stellmoor came to QC so that the Arrow would be free to do what needs to be done but we needed to provide a presence for our agents as well. The Canary considers this her home and, eventually, we hope to help her take on the role of this city’s protector. That said there are other cities that need our particular services as well, Gotham being one of them.” She sighed and folded her hands under her chin. “I’m not saying the Batman and Arrow aren’t doing a good job under the circumstances but, being men, they are limited. Both have repeatedly driven potential allies out of their cities due to some primitive sense of territorialism and it has cost lives and wasted resources. Our goal is to organize and provide support, not just to deliver rough justice in the form of mindless physical violence.” She leaned toward her. “You don’t have to answer this, because I already know you won’t, but how many times have you tried to stop the Arrow from going into a situation half-cocked by injecting some well thought out advise only to be shut out because it’s ‘his’ mission and not yours? Ten times? Twenty? How much easier would it have been to stop the Glades disaster had you had feet on the ground and a team that listened to you as you provided the support necessary to disarm both devices?”

Unable to stop herself, Felicity asked pale-faced, “How do you know there were two earthquake devices? The official reports say there was only one.”

“We have eyes everywhere, access to police and military records, spy satellites, a support network larger than you could ever imagine. We work, covertly of course, with various black ops and scientific research groups.” She looked at her steadily, “The world is even bigger than you ever thought it was Felicity Smoak; don’t let a misplaced sense of loyalty stop you from committing to an even greater mission.” Isabel arose from her chair indicating their meeting was over. Felicity joined suit, albeit on much shakier legs. “Think about my offer and get back to me. There is no deadline on this offer, it’s completely open-ended, so feel free to take all the time you need.”

She reached out for Felicity’s hand and she took it automatically, “I hope to hear from you soon so that we may embark on a new and hopefully successful chapter of our relationship.”

“Yeah,” Felicity responded, her mind blown and more than a little overwhelmed by all the twists and turns their ‘friendly little lunch’ had taken. “Hope you don’t mind me saying this but you’re even scarier than I thought you were and that’s really saying something.”

Isabelle gave her another enigmatic sphinxlike grin and said, “Don’t worry, I don’t bite. At least, not at lunch; dinner, however, is entirely another matter. Give me a call sometime and we can make arrangements for that as well.”

Two hours later Felicity was still in a fog as she indulged in some retail therapy. She was so far gone into shock and emotional upheaval from the past few days that things like budgets, savings accounts, and price tags didn’t even faze her. Every time she tried to wrap her brain around what was happening or figure out her next move she’d catch a glimpse of a Chado Ralph Rucci or Ellie Saab creation on the rack and head for the dressing room. Finally, after a painful moment at the checkout and with a stack of garment bags in her hand she knew what she had to do.

She dialed Oliver.
Chapter Fourteen

Not calling Oliver wasn’t an option but calling him wasn’t going to be pleasant. Their last meeting was fairly heated—hell, she practically ordered Diggle to pistol whip him! The man was unlikely to be in a receptive mood.

The phone picked up on the second ring. She held her breath.

“This is Oliver.”

“Hi,” she said. It was the first thing that came to mind.

“Can you hold for a moment?” His tone was cool and detached, almost robotic. She listened as he excused himself. After a moment he came back on, “Yes?”

“We need to talk,” she said.

“I’m a bit busy at the moment but I might be able to pencil you in later.”

“Oliver, it’s important. Very important. We need to talk as soon as possible and I can’t do it at the office.” She allowed a hint of irritability to enter her voice because she really didn’t want to deal with his hurt pride or his bullshit. “Is Isabel there because, whatever you do you can’t let her know I’m on the other end of this call. Say ‘I’ll try to get those documents to you later today’ if she’s there.”

He took a moment before answering, this time speaking in a clear and professional tone, “I’m so sorry about that, I'll try to get you those documents later today. Perhaps we can schedule a lunch to go over them sometime? Is tomorrow good for you, say around noon?”

“No, has to be tonight.” She tried to think fast, “Can you get out early and meet me in,” she glanced at her phone, “twenty minutes at the Foundry?”

“Can you make it forty-five?”
“Fine, meet you there.” She hung up without any of the usual niceties and headed for the club.

Verdant was closed on Mondays so the place was practically deserted. Still, she parked around the back and under the metal awning just in case Bruce decided to be a butthead again. She doubted he’d show after what happened two days previously but you could never tell with him. One thing she did know was that if he showed up today she was borrowing one of Oliver’s bows so he could try dodging arrows instead of toasters and cell phones.

She was still pissed about that. Her house was completely wrecked. She wasn’t up to cleaning it yesterday and today she’d been more concerned about getting ready to meet with Isabel so she’d either been avoiding the post-shag debris or just stepping over it. She was seriously considering sending him a bill because it was his fault she flipped her shit and destroyed all that crap while trying to brain him. The worst part was that her coffee mug had left a crack in the drywall. There was no way she was getting her security deposit back. “Ought to charge him for that too.”

She unlocked the doors and approached the keypad. She checked her text messages to see if Oliver had sent the new codes but nothing was there. She considered asking him but decided to flex her brain instead and try out the upgrades she had made to her new phone. Placing it near the pad with the key card device attached she activated the decryption app and waited for the click. “Too easy,” she said, shaking her head as the light turned green and the door unlocked after only a few seconds. She glanced at her phone and grimaced. She was early but not enough to ensure she had time to rework the system. She’d have to talk Diggle through it later.

She looked around the quiet space for a long moment before sitting down to her work station. For all she knew this was the last time she’d ever see this place again but she wasn’t going to dwell on it. She’d cried over too many pints of ice cream this week and it was only Monday. If she kept it up she’d only be miserable but forced to buy a new wardrobe in less than a month and for her that really meant something. Her bungalow had two fairly good sized bedrooms; one she slept in and one that now served as her closet. She used her actual closet space for shoes and even that was a large walk-in. Between all the take-out, gourmet ice cream, and retail therapy she had been indulging in she was not looking forward to getting her credit card statement at the end of the month.

“Too bad Ben and Jerry’s doesn’t have a line of fat-free sugar-free ice cream, even FroYo isn’t going to cut it for too long if this keeps up,” she muttered as she began her searches on Stellmoor International.

She’d researched Stellmoor before, of course. After they found Isabel’s name in the book she’d made it her personal mission but she never found much. She had a little more to go on now given Isabel’s revelations during lunch so she tried giving it a shot using some of the new information.

She lost time as she began to research everything from Stellmoor’s foreign assets to Black Canary and sightings of other female vigilantes. There weren’t many but there were more than there had been since last she checked. Most were normal humans, like Oliver, who merely wished to help their communities, but some were meta-human or alien.

Only in the last year or so had the general populace become aware of the existence of aliens or the mutated humans known as metas who, for no apparent reason, had taken an evolutionary leap causing them to exhibit abilities well above the norm. She knew about them because of her brief affiliation with Batman but she doubted Oliver or Diggle did before they started popping up in Starling just after Harrison Wells’ particle accelerator exploded during a freak storm.

Of course, there was a theory going around that it wasn’t the meltdown of Wells’ machine that caused the surge in metas, but alien manipulation. Granted, so far most scientists felt that the only people positing the alien theory were cranks and crackpots, but Felicity was one of the few people who knew for a fact that aliens existed. Bruce had run into a few here and there and she’d seen the files. Oliver knew about enhanced humans like those affected by the Mirakuru super-soldier serum but she doubted he’d be open to the idea of aliens. Diggle was a harder read. He was a skeptic in most things but he seemed to accept the idea of the super-soldier serum with little argument and he had more than a passing association with ARGUS. Then again, perhaps it was because he had seen the effects of the drug for himself and for him that still fell under science; fringe science, but science nonetheless.

Due to the surge in meta-human sightings, Bruce, not known as being the most tolerant person in the world, had taken a special interest in this phenomenon. He didn’t trust these super-powered beings and had started a database where he tracked each and every occurrence. It was not done out of blind prejudice but born from the fact that he had seen ‘normal’ humans commit such heinous crimes that the idea of an enhanced human capable of doing the same or worse filled him with dread. She tapped into the backdoor he didn’t know she’d left in the supercomputer she’d built for him and used his database as a jumping off point. Bruce wasn’t the only one studying these meta-humans and he had been tracking those for some time as well. Many scientific and government agencies had begun their own inquiries without the general public’s knowledge. Bruce would have been more than a little concerned if he heard what Isabel had told her during lunch. The idea of a private company building an army of modern Amazons would have sent him into a fit. To him the idea of power unchecked, whether it was held by man or government, was unacceptable even if the intentions were to protect the public good.

As she began to look into any groups who might be aligned with Stellmoor, many of her leads proved to be dead ends but some led to ARGUS, Diggle’s ex-wife’s employer. Supposedly they were some kind of scientific research think tank funded by the government but she knew they were more than that. ARGUS was a black hat government agency with strong connections to the military. They were so enigmatic in fact, that even though they had existed since the Revolutionary war under the banner Armed Revolutionaries Governing Under Secrecy then later during the Civil War as Anonymous Ranger Group of the United States, no one actually knew what their true charter was or how far their reach extended. Officially, the modern ARGUS stood for Advanced Research Group United Support, but it had other names including Advanced Research Group Uniting Super-Humans, although that last bit wasn’t common knowledge.

It appeared that they had some crossover with Stellmoor though and that worried her. Was Lyla their leak? Doubtful, she nearly died protecting their mission and she risked her life to come after them when Waller sent in drones to take out Slade and the entire city. Even though she and Dig broke up after she lost the baby, she was still a trusted team friendly. Was Waller? Oliver had never gone into details but he once worked for Amanda Waller and she was aware of the fact he was the Arrow. Could it have been ARGUS who told Stellmoor about Oliver? It was possible but he’d been the Arrow for over a year before she and Diggle met back up. Isabel could have been lying about knowing Oliver’s secret for that long though and she was with them in Russia. Funnily enough, she’d never even blinked or asked why an injured woman was coming back with them on the QC jet. At the time they’d just been relieved to be going back home so she hadn’t even thought to question it. Isabel had kept her so busy with paperwork and after hearing her bitch at Oliver for most of the flight home the only thing she’d wanted to do was get the hell away from her. Now though it was really giving her something to think about.

What if she didn’t just happen to show up for that flight? What if Amanda Waller, the head of ARGUS, had tipped her off so she could assess Oliver up close and in the field? What if his bedroom skills weren’t the only thing that had caught her interest that weekend? That might have been when Stellmoor caught their coms and realized her place within the team. Being in Russia Felicity had to work with limited tech and do things on the fly. Her encryptions might not have been her rock solid/steel trap usual. That would have made her the weak link, not Lyla or ARGUS.
A shiver ran down Felicity’s spine as she thought about that. What if she’d given Stellmoor a backdoor into everything? Not just the LAIR system and their coms, but the call she’d made to Barbara. That would give them an in to Watchtower—no, she decided quickly. Barbara was almost as fanatical about security as she was, and Bruce, no computer slouch himself, made them look sloppy in comparison. Watchtower was probably safe but it didn’t mean LAIR was.

She glanced at her phone to see if she had time to run a diagnostic and was surprised that she’d been there for well over an hour and he still hadn’t showed up. Concerned, she texted him.

//Are you okay?//

//Coming, just held up. Be there soon//

She rolled her eyes and sighed. She never in a million years thought that she’d wind up becoming yet another woman in Oliver Queen’s life that he ran from.

She ran the diagnostic program in the background and began upgrading the entrance security. By the time she was done another hour and 45 minutes had passed and still no Oliver.

“She said and grabbed her jacket and bag. He could sit and twist; she wasn’t about to wait on him forever.

She left the Lair and was half in her car when he pulled up.

“You’re leaving?” He asked coolly as he stepped off his motorcycle.

“You kept me waiting almost three hours, Oliver. I told you it was important,” she pointed out with a scowl.

“Sorry,” he said, not sounding sorry at all. “I had a tough day at work. My EA quit on me without notice last week and I’ve had to play catch up all day using a temp.”

If it wasn’t for the fact that she now knew his identity was compromised and that a bigger conspiracy was looming over all of their heads she would have flipped him the bird and let him figure it out for himself. “Fine,” she said, slamming the door to her Mini and stalking to the keypad.

“We changed the codes,” Oliver said casually from behind her. “I’ll have to open—“

She keyed in the new code and didn’t even bother turning around to see his expression. “I wrote the security encryptions, remember. By the way, check your phone. I sent both you and Dig the new door codes. The Lair should actually be secure now.”

She could practically hear him grinding his teeth into dust as he followed her down the stairs to her workstation. She immediately clicked on her diagnostics to check that everything was still secure and finished the security sweep that would alert her to the possibility of any bugs or locational listening devices within range.

“You’re the one who wanted to meet so are you going to tell me what you have to tell me or what? I cancelled a dinner meeting for this,” he said in his ‘I’m pissed off so obey and fear me’ voice.

She rolled her eyes and waited another second for the sweep to show an all clear before she turned to face him. “Your identity has been compromised. Isabel knows you’re the Arrow.”

“And how do you know that?” Oliver asked skeptically.
“I had lunch with her today and she told me.”

“She had lunch with you after you punched her in the face last week and told you, point blank, that I was the Arrow?” He said with a raised eyebrow. “No reason, she just blurted it out over appetizers?”

“She offered me a job at Stellmoor based on the fact that I was your tech for Team Arrow. She actually said the words, ‘I know that Oliver is the Arrow’. So yeah, she just blurted it out. But not over appetizers, she saved it for the end of the meal.” She added.

“She offered you a job? Isabel?” Oliver laughed. “Right.” He sighed and sat on the edge of her workstation, “She was obviously lying.”

“No, she wasn’t,” she said slowly. “Oliver, you have to believe me—“

“You should know better than to believe anything she said to you, Felicity,” Oliver said in a condescending manner. “It’s obvious that she was just playing a game of cat and mouse with you as payback for the other day.” He straightened his back and focused on her more alertly, “You didn’t accidently confirm anything she said did you?”

Felicity took a moment to remove her jacket and toss her bag into the chair in front of her monitoring post angrily before speaking. She turned to him and pushed her glasses off the bridge of her nose with her middle finger. And yes, she thought at him, that was deliberate. “I know better than to just blurt out your secrets, Oliver! I’m not an idiot.”

“I’m not saying you’re an idiot,” Oliver told her evenly. “However, you and I both know you have a tendency to babble a bit when you get nervous and Isabel tends to put you on edge.”

“I was not babbling and I was not on edge!” She said sharply before muttering to herself, “Until she hit on me and then I may have babbled a little bit.”

“She hit you?” Oliver asked, his face darkening slightly as he straightened his spine and seemed to zero on her face as though looking for injuries.

“No, she didn’t hit me,” she let out a noise of exasperation. “I said she hit on me; as in made a pass at me.”

Oliver’s face widened into a huge grin and he chuckled a bit as he relaxed. He ran his hand over his mouth and tilted his head toward the ceiling, scratching at his ever present stubble as he did so. “Diggle is going to be so disappointed that I gave him the night off when he hears about this.”

“This isn’t funny!” Felicity scowled at him, her temper quickly beginning to escalate.

He tilted his head and gave her another grin, “It’s a little funny.”

“Oliver, I’m serious,” she said insistently. “Isabel knows about you. She said that Stellmoor International is more than just some evil Vulture Capitalist Corporate Raider Conglomerate, it’s a worldwide organization that has a particular interest in people like you.” She frowned and shook her head, “She also said a few other things that struck me as odd—“

“Of course she said a few things that struck you as being odd, she was lying,” Oliver said wryly.

She threw her hands up in exasperation, waving them about in emphasis. “She wasn’t lying! She knew everything; she even knew about—”

He moved close to her, grabbed her hands, and held them still. “Felicity, she was lying,” he said calmly as he looked down at her. “She was just trying to play some kind of mind game, she’s good at that, but I know for a fact that she was lying to you.”

Felicity scowled, “How do you know?”

He released her hands and leaned against the desk again. “Well, for one thing, I definitely know she’s not a lesbian.”

“And why’s that? Because you slept with her once?” She asked, cocking a superior eyebrow in his direction.

He crossed his arms across his chest and continued to look smug. “As a matter of fact, yes; and, trust me, she’s definitely not gay.”

“Sara—“ she began.

“Sara had one serious girlfriend,” he broke in. “One. I’m not saying she never messed around with other women while we were together but, believe me, there’s a big difference between a woman who sometimes colors outside the lines but still genuinely enjoys sex with men and someone who’s putting on a show. Trust me, Isabel wasn’t faking it.”

Dumb ass! Felicity wanted to shout but instead she said, “First off, you might want to call Sara before you start spewing out numbers because, trust me, I’ve been there when she’s six shots into a bottle of the good stuff and it’s been waay more than just the one. As for Isabel and the gaydar detector in your pants; haven’t you ever heard of the Kinsey scale or is your he-man ‘I’m a stud’ ego just that big?” She pulled a disgusted face. “News flash, Romeo: Human sexuality is a sliding scale. Women can identify as lesbian and still find men attractive. From what she told me, I’d say Isabel’s a four; bisexual but with a strong preference for women.” She shot him a filthy look, “Believe it or not, Oliver; my time is still valuable and I don’t have time to sit here and stroke your ego all night long. I’m telling you the truth, make of it what you will; I don’t care anymore.”

“That’s right,” she told him.

“Well, my time is pretty valuable, too. Sorry if I kept you waiting but I still have a job; two of them in fact,” he said with a confident grin. “Speaking of which, if you want to hear my theory as to why you’re really here, it’s not because you think Isabel’s a threat; it’s because you want to come back but you’re too embarrassed to admit it.”

“You’re full of crap!” She snapped at him.

“Am I?” He asked, arching an eyebrow in her direction. “You quit just the other day and yet this is the second time you’ve shown up at the Lair under some pretense or another. And, FYI, if you’re that interested in what is or isn’t in my pants I can promise you it wasn’t just my ego you were stroking while we were in the conference room.”

She flushed hotly at the reminder of what had happened between them and glared, “While I hate to interrupt this commentary on your sexual prowess, were you even listening when I told you that she knows you’re the Arrow? That she probably has had you followed for some time? That there may be some sort of way for her to intercept our transmissions? No. You just focused on making fun of me and ignoring everything else.” She snatched her jacket and purse off the chair, “Look, if you don’t want to take me seriously, then fine! I’ll handle it on my own.”

She headed for the stairs with him trailing after her.
“Felicity, you know you can’t actually empty her bank accounts, right?” He said in a slightly bored yet indulgent tone. “She was just trying to get your goat.”

She whirled on him, her finger poking him in the chest. “First off, I most certainly could go all kinds of cyber-vigilante on her if I chose, but I won’t. For once she’s not the one being an ass; you are. Keep that in mind as you continue to piss me off!” She snapped.

He sighed in exasperation, “Look, I realized Isabel might have scared you with her little prank but you need to take a breath and think it through: Isabel has been with the company for two years now; why would she wait that long to reveal something like that and to you of all people?” He took a step towards her, “Felicity, if you want to come back we can work this out but Isabel isn’t a threat, I promise you.”

“I’m telling you the truth!” She said angrily. “She wasn’t just playing a prank, she was dead serious, but since you refuse to see it then I have no choice but to either handle this myself or go to an outside source for help. You’re not the only one who could be affected by this kind of security breech!”

That got his attention, “What ‘outside source’?”

“You know what Oliver, just don’t worry about it,” she said with a sigh, the fight leaving her. “I’m done. Sorry I wasted your time.”

She turned to walk away but he grabbed her arm and pulled her back, speaking in a low growl, “You are not to go to Batman with this, do you hear me?”

She snatched her arm back and glared up at him, “Don’t grab at me and don’t tell me what I can or can’t do, I don’t work for you anymore. That said, I wasn’t planning on going directly to him but to one of his associates. Believe it or not I do have other means at my disposal other than you.”

“No, you’re not going to go to anyone about this, do you hear me?” He said, getting very close and looming over her intimidatingly. “Especially not to someone associated with Batman. You may not work for me anymore but this is my city and my business.”

She shook her head at him and her eyes reflected the disappointment she was feeling at that moment, “You know, I would have gone to the ends of the Earth for you not so long ago. I did things for you that I never imagined I was even capable of doing—I jumped out of a plane and landed in a minefield just to convince you to come home so you could be the Arrow!” She dropped her eyes to the floor, no longer able to even look at him. “I’ve done and I’ve done and I never asked you for anything, not once, and the one time I do, the one time I ask you to show some faith in me, just hear me out, you can’t even do that. You don’t believe me, fine. Like I said, I’m a big girl; I’ll figure it out.” She headed up the stairs. “Goodbye Oliver.”

“Can you blame me, Felicity?” Oliver said angrily from the bottom of the stairs. “Why should I have faith in anything you have to say when I found out a few days ago that you’ve been lying to me this whole time?”

\?\?\?/\?\?\?

When Felicity got home the first thing she did after stepping over the remains of her toaster and the broken bottle of wine was head to her ‘closet’ and hang up her new outfits. She had to do a bit of shoving and rearranging to get them in there. For a split second she thought about heading out in the morning to the big hardware store downtown to pick up some more of the rolling garment racks that filled the entire room before she remembered she was supposed to be moving out that weekend.

She glanced around the space skeptically. There was no way she could do this by herself. Note to self, she thought, call around and see if any of the moving companies in the area offered packing services as well. It would cost more but it would be worth it.

She headed out of the ‘closet room’ and into her bedroom where she stripped down the bed to change her sheets that still smelled like Bruce and briefly considered tossing them in her fireplace. It was tempting but smashing a $40 bottle of wine and a coffee mug was one thing, setting her favorite 1500 tread-count Egyptian cotton sheets on fire was another. She shoved them down into the hamper, took off her dress and hung it to go with the rest of her dry cleaning in the morning, then headed for the tub.

She soaked until her fingers and toes got prune-y, refreshing the cooling water with hot as she went. Her little bungalow had its faults with the drafty walls and the huge windows that, while charming, let in all kinds of light at the butt crack of dawn (she had become a big fan of black-out curtains), but she’d miss this. Lucius lived in a penthouse at Wayne Towers and it was beautiful, modern, and comfortable, but it lacked the charm of her shabby-chic little house. There would be no pipes rattling in the middle of the night, no water spots on the ceiling marring the crown moldings and ornate plaster, no scarred claw-footed tubs. Not that she didn’t enjoy modern conveniences; she was a techie after all and loved her gadgets, but this had been her first place and she’d miss the freedom it provided.

She spent her tub time flitting between melancholy, regret, Isabel’s revelations, and the more practical concerns of moving before finally giving up and deciding it was time to get dressed in her warm and fuzzies and start putting her house to rights. She tugged on the thick chenille robe her dad had given her for her birthday and headed for her bedroom.

She loved the long fuzzy oversized robe that she could easily wrap around herself twice over with its embroidered polka-dot cats and steaming coffee mugs. She had a few of the whimsical plush robes. She’d been a big fan of The Nanny when she was younger, one of the few non-sci-fi shows she enjoyed, and she, Tam, and their dad would all sit in front of the television and laugh whenever it came on while Luke moaned and groaned even though he secretly enjoyed it as well. He made a point of getting her and her sister a new robe every year since they left home as a reminder of their nights spent watching movies or Nick at Nite, drinking hot cups of cocoa, and snacking from big bowls of popcorn on the coffee table. She stroked the soft material on her lapel with a little bit of melancholy and wondered briefly if she could catch an episode or two before bed.

She went straight to the old fashioned steam trunk style chest at the foot of her bed to pull out a fresh set of sheets then turned to her large ornate chest of drawers for some pajamas. As she turned she caught some movement from the corner of her eye and screamed, her heart thumping in her chest. As soon as she was able to focus she yelled, “Goddamn it, Oliver! What the hell??!”

“Sorry,” he said, although his relaxed pose in her bedroom doorway said different. “I wanted to talk to you some more and I knocked but you didn’t answer. I was just going to leave a note but then I saw the mess.” He frowned and hitched his thumb at the living room, “What happened out there? Did someone break in or something?”

“Sort of,” she scowled. “Speaking of breaking in, I have a security system on my door.”

“You’re not the only one who can hack a keypad,” he shot back a bit too smugly for her tastes. “I checked the other rooms just in case after I saw all the glass and broken stuff. By the way; your guestroom?” He moved into the room further, his hands in his trouser pockets as he arched an eyebrow at her. “Wow. And I thought Thea was a shop-a-holic.”
She gave him her best ‘go to hell’ look grabbing the pillows on her bed angrily as she shoved them into the fresh cases then tossed them on the overstuffed chaise lounge by the window. “Just say what you have to say and go, Oliver. It may seem pretty early to you but I’m tired and I still have a lot to do before I can go to bed tonight.”

She began to unfold the sheets and Oliver wandered over to the other side, his eyes downcast and looking a bit guilty. “Need help with that?”

“I didn’t think boys with trust funds the size of yours made beds,” Felicity said a bit facetiously.

He threw her an amused look, “So says the daughter of one of the greatest financial geniuses in the world? Are you telling me you don’t have a trust fund squirreled away somewhere--and before you answer that keep in mind I saw the guest bedroom.”

“Fine!” She pouted, tossing him the other corner of the sheets as they tucked them under the corners, working in tandem. “For the record though, I’ve never touched it—my trust. Everything I have I earned all on my own.”

“I didn’t realize QC paid that well,” Oliver snorted as he pulled the sheets tight before tucking the bottom corner.

She stopped and placed her hands on her hips. “For your information, I had a life before I came here. I sold some software I developed before I was hired on---it’s half of the reason I got the job to begin with.” She folded her arms over her chest with a frown, “Wait, have you ever even read my file?”

“Of course I did.” He paused, catching her expression of disbelief, “Well, no, I never actually got around to it.” Oliver said before grinning sheepishly at her disgruntled huff, “I already knew everything I needed to know about you, okay? I trusted you so I didn’t really care what some file said; I already knew all I needed to.”

She unfolded the top sheet and muttered, “Trust, right.”

He snagged the other corners of the sheet and pulled them over to his side. “Yeah, I actually came over tonight to apologize.” He tucked in the bottom of the sheets and looked up at her, his eyes filled with remorse. “I’m sorry for being an ass. I should have listened.”

She looked over at him, her anger deflating, and motioned toward the duvet. “Help me fluff the covers, okay?”

“Fluff?” He smiled, a genuine one and not one of the all too frequent practiced smiles he saved for the rest of the world. “That a technical term?”

“Just fluff,” she ordered. They snapped the duvet between them until it floated gracefully onto the sheets. It had always been her favorite part of making the bed, that magical little moment when the covers seemed to hang in the air like a parachute before covering the entire bed in a whisper soft puff of air. It was weird but it always made her smile. She looked over at Oliver and noticed he was staring at her, his eyes fixed on her chest. He quickly looked away and she blushed crimson when she realized why. Her robe had loosened and it was open almost to her navel.

She tightened it quickly as he cleared his throat. “So,” he said, “Um, software development, huh? I’m not exactly a fashion guy but even I could tell that you must have done pretty well for yourself.”

“It was just a few programs, nothing big,” she shrugged, willing her embarrassment away. “I mean, I was probably overpaid but Bruce has deep pockets, so—”
“Wait, Bruce?” He said cutting her off. “As in Bruce Wayne? You worked for WayneTech?”

“No, not exactly,” she said clearing her throat. “I just consulted for Bruce on a few private projects after MIT.”

“Is that all there was between you two?”

“What?” She looked up at him, her embarrassment giving way to anger once again.

His eyes were hooded and the lines around his mouth had deepened into the beginnings of a scowl. “Not that it’s any of my business or anything but I saw the way he acted toward you the other day, not to mention the way you kept trying to avoid him.” His eyes locked onto hers and something dark and deadly flitted across his eyes. “Wait, he didn’t do anything to you, did he? Harass you or hurt you?” He seemed to pause over the word ‘hurt’. “Is that why you moved here from Gotham?”

“No!” Felicity said quickly then paused, “Well, yes, but not in the way you’re implying.” She pushed her rapidly drying and slightly frizzy blonde hair from her eyes and sat on the bed heavily. “It’s a long story.”

“So tell it,” Oliver said in a far too casual to be believed tone.

“No, absolutely not,” Felicity said, playing with a loose thread on her robe.

“You’re the one who said I never ask you anything personal,” he pointed out.

Oliver moved closer to her to stand at the foot of the bed. He bumped her knees with his and offered a wry twitch of the corners of his mouth, hitching a thumb at his chest, “My longtime girlfriend asked me to move in and I responded by sleeping with her sister, and running away to China—or I intended to anyway; the whole five years spent on an island hell was kind of a karmic kick in the teeth, but still. The point is that you know all of my fucked up crap and I don’t know any of yours, so talk.”

“We really should be talking about Isabel,” she pointed out in an attempt to dodge the conversation.

“We will, but first I want to, I don’t know, establish a baseline or something.” He sighed, sitting down next to her. He reached for her hand and squeezed it reassuringly. “I trust you, I do, but you’ve got to show me you can let go of some of your secrets first. Not all of them, but something easy. Too many people in my life have kept secrets and I need to, I don’t know; get back to normal with you before I can relax again.”

Oliver was not a words kind of guy so, when he admitted that, it pretty much blew every argument she had out of the water. She shut her eyes, her cheeks already stained red, and dove right in. “Okay. Well,” she began as she struggled to figure out the best way to tell him without giving away too many of the more important details, “It was nothing really. I was barely 19 and I’d never even been out on a date much less kissed a guy or anything—“

“Wait,” he said stopping her, “How is that possible? You were 19 and had never gone out with anybody? By the time I was nineteen…” He let his voice trail off with a naughty gleam in his eye. “Let’s just say I was a very busy guy.”

She raised her eyes to his ruefully, “Not all of us were as precocious as you. Besides, I started college when I was barely thirteen years old and my brother and I shared an apartment because my dad didn’t want me staying by myself at MIT; especially after some creepy Lacrosse player decided to get all stalker-y my freshman year. And Luke, well, he can be a bit overprotective.”

“Lacrosse player?” Oliver asked, a hint of the Arrow coming through. “Why would a grown man stalk a thirteen year old girl?”

“I was fourteen by then,” she shrugged. “It was during the summer session so I had just had my birthday. Not that it matters to the story, but I wanted to graduate early so I was packing in the hours and, apparently, it was slim pickings on campus during that time of year, I guess.”

“Slim pickings?” He said with a deepening scowl.

“Yeah, it was some stupid frat game,” she said dismissively, although at the time it had scared her. “I don’t think he actually knew I was only fourteen at the time. I mean, I looked young, that was obvious, but I think he figured that just meant I’d be a pushover and he was trying to score as many points as he could.”

The truth was that her mother’s reputation had apparently followed her. Sebastian ‘Trip’ Hady III (otherwise known by the pithy frat name Trip ‘Get Laid-y’ Hady), the boy in question, had family in Gotham and he figured the apple didn’t fall far from the tree but she wasn’t going to tell him that. Some things were still too private.

“Points?” Oliver bit out.

“Yeah,” she said closing her eyes at the memory, “the frat had this thing called a ‘cherry picking’—“

“I’m familiar with the term,” Oliver said grimly. “What happened to the lacrosse player?”

“Well, let’s just say that after Luke got finished with him he wasn’t playing lacrosse anymore,” she said ruefully. ‘Also the frat got shut down as a result of their ‘game’. It…didn’t exactly make me popular with the Greeks. Nobody ever messed with me again though.”

“I think I like your brother,” Oliver said at last. “Is he your only sibling?”

“No,” she gave him an incredulous look. “You didn’t even look into Lucius’s background before the meeting either?”

He shrugged, “Didn’t have time.”

“You spend hours preparing for a mission and you can’t take five minutes to skim some research at work?”

He looked at her askance, “I dropped out of four different colleges; this surprises you?”

Felicity took a deep breath and sighed, “You drive me insane, you know that? Okay, so I have a brother and a sister; technically they’re my stepsiblings since they’re from his first marriage but Lucius helped raise me since I was just a few months old and adopted me before I was two so we’ve never split hairs. Luke used to be with the Peace Corps but now he works for The Wayne International Charity Foundation in Africa; he runs a program in Tinasha, that’s in the Congo, educating kids.”

“From MIT to the Peace Corps to the Congo running a charity? That’s admirable but a bit of an odd career trajectory isn’t it?”

“Yeah, well, Dad wasn’t all that happy with the idea at first. He graduated a year early from MIT with a job offer from Wayne Enterprises working directly with Dad but he turned it down. Sitting behind a desk or spending time in a lab just wasn’t his thing. He’s always been very physical and active, always more of an engineer than a software geek like me. As kids we’d design stuff and he’d put it together. He joined the Peace Corps because the idea of helping people appealed to him as well as the labor intensive stuff like building bridges and schools, he liked the hands-on thing and he apparently loves teaching. It’s weird because he was never the most patient guy in the world but he’s happy and he sends me updates every once in a while along with requests for treats to give to his students.” She smiled, “Hey, wait,” she reached over to her nightstand and showed him a picture of her brother in a silver frame surrounded by a bunch of barefoot and slightly dusty and sweaty kids who had obviously been playing a rousing game of soccer if the ball in Luke’s hand was any indication.

“That’s your brother?” Oliver said in surprise as he examined the picture before handing it back to her, “Pretty buff guy for a school teacher.”

She smiled and put it back on her nightstand, “Yeah, well, like I said; he’s always been a physical kind of person. He did a lot of kickboxing and mixed martial arts in college. It helps because he really got involved in helping the child soldiers down there, providing education and protection. He doesn’t say it but I know things can get pretty dangerous in that part of the world. Along with the basics he teaches the kids martial arts and self-defense. He says it helps them focus, teaches them discipline, and directs their aggression into something constructive. When David Zavimbe, the former Director, resigned from the Foundation Bruce offered the job to Luke. He been down there for a few years now and I really don’t think he’ll ever leave; he loves it too much.”

Oliver smiled at her, his eyes lighter and softer than they’ve been in a long time, “He sounds like a really great guy.”

“She is,” she said with a bright smile. “You know, growing up we never fought. He and Tam used to go at it like cats and dogs but…I don’t know, they were always my whole world. I was always especially close to Luke. I mean, Tam and I are close, don’t get me wrong, but Luke was my hero growing up. He still kind of is,” she said, glancing at the photo again.

“I wish I had that sometimes,” Oliver said with a contemplative look. “I always wished I had an older brother, someone to look up to. It would have been nice to have someone there to turn to or just to call me on my shit when I messed up, you know? Not like my parents, not in a judgmental ‘you’re screwing up and embarrassing the family name’ kind of way; just someone who had already been there and who could help me to get through it when I needed someone to rely on.”

“You had Tommy,” she pointed out.

“Not really,” he said with a slightly sheepish grin, “Tommy and I were like brothers, yeah, but he wasn’t my hero; we were more like partners in crime.”

She laughed, “Yeah, that’s me and Tam. Every adventurous thing I ever did was because of her. I mean everything. She’s a total instigator. She took me to get my ears pierced when I was twelve and my dad about had a fit when I came home with five holes in each ear.”

“I’ll bet!” He grinned, “Is she the one responsible for the tattoo?”

She lifted her foot and looked down at the girlish cursive along her instep that said ‘Dream Big’, “Yep; she took me to the tattoo parlor just before she left for La Fémis after Sarah Lawrence. She even got me my first fake ID so we could get in because I was underage. The place was a total hellhole smack dab in the middle of the worst part of town, and I’m lucky I didn’t contract Hepatitis from the tattoo needle, but at the time the only thing I was upset about was the fact that they didn’t even bother checking it. I spent two whole days watching Fargo and memorizing my fake birthday because of that stupid ID.”

“Fargo?” He asked in confusion.

“The movie,” she clarified. “For some reason the guy who made the fake ID gave us Minnesota driver’s licenses and I wanted to have the accent right, just in case.”

He laughed; one of his rare laughs that brightened his whole expression and shaved years of pain from his face. “Your sister sounds like a trip.”

Felicity smiled, “Tam? Oh man, Tam is the best. She’s the oldest so she’s always been leader of the pack and the rest of us just fall in line. She’s fantastic: smart, wicked sense of humor, fearless really. She speaks five languages fluently, is incredibly sharp, and can kick some serious butt if you piss her off. She works at Wayne Enterprises in the Entertainment Division and really seems to enjoy it.”

“So everyone but you works for Wayne in your family?” He asked.

“Yes.”

“Why didn’t Wayne offer you a job there as well?” He asked, his tone casual but his eyes were sharp.

“He did, so did Dad. I just wanted to do something on my own,” she said, not looking at him directly. The truth was she couldn’t have survived working day after day in the same building as Bruce after what had happened but she didn’t want to say that. He broke her heart and even though the job at QC was entry level, she was more concerned with distance than prestige or money when she accepted it.

Oliver gave her a puzzled look, “Can I ask you something before you tell me your undoubtedly tragic and humiliating Bruce Wayne story?”

“I love the way you phrased that,” she muttered. “Go ahead.” She prepared herself for one of a thousand questions he could ask her like, ‘Why did you say your dad abandoned your family if you consider Lucius to be your dad?’ ‘Why didn’t you wait for a position in Applied Sciences instead of taking the first thing available in IT?’ or ‘Why not accept a job closer to home at AmerTech or LexCorp in Metropolis?’.

“If Lucius is your dad and he raised you then how are you Jewish?”

That was a bit out of left field, she thought. She looked at him askance, “You do know that black people can be Jewish, right? Black people, Asian people, Latin people, Indian people, anyone can be Jewish; the twelve tribes are nothing if not diverse.” He squinted at her slightly in the same way he did at the office when he was pretending to understand something that was completely foreign to him like computers or pop culture references. She narrowed her eyes and gave him her best, ‘you’re not fooling me’ look. “Judaism isn’t just an ethnicity; it’s a religion, a nationality, and a culture as well and converts have the same standing within the mainstream Jewish community as someone who is considered an ‘ethnic’ Jew.” At his blank look she sighed, “Lenny Kravitz is Jewish, Oliver.”

“Um, sure. Yeah, I knew that,” Oliver said unconvincingly.

The corners of her lips quirked upwards as she noticed the slight flush on the usually unflappable man’s cheeks and decided to let him off the hook for once, “Lucius’s first wife was of mixed heritage and Jewish so he converted for her and then he met my mom who was Jewish as well. That said we weren’t very observant, just the High Holidays, and we had a Menorah and a Hanukah bush that tended to stay up until Christmas so there might have been a little wiggle room here and there. The Hanukah bush/Jewish Christmas thing started when Tam made the argument that since at least part of our heritage was Christian, even if Lucius had converted years ago, we should do both. Mostly though it was just because she liked getting presents and Lucius just went with it that way Tam and Luke could do Hanukah with his first wife’s family and Jewish Christmas with us,” she added. “Trust me, none of us were complaining.”

“Got it,” he nodded. “Okay, now that I’ve managed to completely embarrass myself by exposing my lack of cultural knowledge, it’s your turn. I’m ready for you to tell me all about your totally humiliating sexual awakening.”

“Oh God…” Felicity’s eyes practically bugged out of her skull and her tongue seemed to swell like she’d just pigged out on one of those monster tubs of peanut butter she saw at the Price Club last time she went shopping for supplies.

“Hey, I just put my foot in my mouth and practically admitted that the only thing I know about Jewish people is that they’re good with numbers and that Jerry Seinfeld is funny as hell,” he said blithely. “It’s the least you can do.”

“Really? Jewish accountant jokes?” Felicity asked, her jaw practically hitting the floor.

“Are we going for honesty or political correctness because you get one or the other but not both,” he drawled.

She closed her eyes and prayed for lightening to strike her. “I can’t believe I’m telling you this,” she muttered before taking a calming breath. “There’s really not much to it: I was 19, I was working on a special project for him, it was late, one thing led to another, blah blah blah.” She shrugged and played with the ends of the tie holding her robe together nervously as she avoided his gaze. “It was one weekend and then on Monday he basically said, ‘thanks for the sex, hope you enjoyed it, and here’s some cab fare’ and then I moved to Starling City a week later.”

“Cab fare, huh?” he said with a ghost of a smile. “I bet he just pulled out his wallet and asked ‘how much’ after he was done.”

“Better than that; he left it on the night stand after he got dressed.”

“Nice,” Oliver snickered.

“Really,” she agreed her cheeks almost the same shade of dark pink as her robe. “He even threw in a tip for the driver.”

“Ouch,” he winced with a grin then looked up at the ceiling scratching the stubble on his neck in a familiar gesture. “I can’t say much; I’ve done that and worse and didn’t even say ‘thanks’ or offer cab fare when I was done.”

“Well, since you two are charter members of The Billionaire Playboy Club, I’m not surprised,” she said ruefully.

“Hey, at least he didn’t knock you up, ruin your life, then have his mother pay you off, right?” He said. The words were said jokingly but she could hear the edge of self-hatred in his voice.

“It’s not too late to have a relationship with Connor, Oliver,” she reminded him for the umpteenth time. “Merlyn is dead. You could call Waller, have her send them a message…”

He sighed, running his fingers through his hair. “I can’t, not now. Maybe later when he’s older but right now he deserves to have an uncomplicated life, you know? It’s bad enough that he and Sandy had to leave their entire lives behind them because of Merlyn, I just want him to have a chance to be a kid and not have to deal with any of this.” He smiled tightly, “Besides, this is about you and me, remember? Connor…he’s a discussion for another day.”

“Fair enough,” she said dropping it, then looked over at him. “Is it my turn to ask questions now?”

He looked at her cautiously, “What do you want to ask?”

“Nothing bad,” she assured him. “It’s just that you’re always doing this,” she mimed the scratching of his stubble gesture, “thing; have you ever considered just shaving?”

“What? And shave off my manly stubble?” He asked in mock horror before shrugging, “I don’t know, I guess it’s my way of holding onto that little bit of the old Ollie. I mean, I’m running my dad’s company and I have to hide what I do as the Arrow from everyone, keeping the scruffy beard is my little way of thumbing my nose at the whole three piece suits and boardroom thing. Besides, the ladies dig it,” he grinned. “Makes me look like a bad boy who just needs the right woman to help him change his wicked ways.”

She couldn’t help but roll her eyes at that. “You know, I could go on and on about the psychological theories behind why most politicians and businessmen believe a clean-shaven look makes them appear to be more open and trustworthy whereas a beard implies they have something to hide and then go on this whole tangent about what your uncommitted beard thing says about you, but I won’t. Instead I’ll just clue you in on the fact that, FYI, most women don’t like getting beard burn when they kiss a guy so you might want to rethink that.”

“I don’t know,” he said softly as he looked into her eyes, “I’ve never gotten any complaints.” She shifted nervously and he cleared his throat. “So.”

“So,” she repeated.

“Well, at least Wayne is in your past and you’ve moved on since then, right? That’s something.”

She swallowed and stared down at her bare feet. “Right, yeah, totally.”

He frowned a little, an inquisitive look lighting up his expression once more, “Well, I mean, you’ve dated plenty of guys since then, I’m sure.”

She gave a bark of laughter at that, “What guys? How many ‘guys’ have you seen me date since you’ve known me?”

“Well,” he seemed to think about it carefully, “there was Barry.”

She nodded sadly, “Yeah, Barry; Barry who I shared all of one dance with and an exciting night of saving you from stroking out in the Lair.” She shook her head ruefully, “Some love affair; we never even held hands much less kissed. On our ‘second date’, the one where he had to shoot you full of rat poison, he told me we could ‘be friends’ then went home where he was hit by lightning and spent months in a coma. Then, after weeks of me going to visit his bedside, he woke up as the Flash, had a new girlfriend he got together with while he was still in the coma, said ‘thanks for being there’, and left to do the whole superhero thing in Central City.”

“Oh,” Oliver said uncomfortably.

“Yeah, ‘oh’,” she snorted.

“Daniel?” He said, although not enthusiastically.
“You mean the other billionaire vigilante who was using me just to get close to you?” She said dubiously.

“Yeah well, I never really thought that guy was good enough for you anyway,” Oliver muttered then paused. “Wait, what do you mean the ‘other’ billionaire vigilante?”

She froze, “Um, just that you’re a billionaire vigilante and Daniel was a billionaire vigilante so that means you’re, um, the other billionaire vigilante…” She let her voice trail off weakly.

“Okay, I guess so,” he shrugged then scowled again, “I hated that guy. He was such a—”

“Asshole,” she supplied then thought better of it, “No, actually he was a nice guy, he just had his own mission and went about things the wrong way.”

He smirked, “No, you were right the first time; Garret was an asshole for using you like that and, for the record, I never trusted him. I kept trying to tell you something was off with him but you wouldn’t listen.”

“And your point is?”

He smirked, “That, for once, I was right and you were wrong.”

“Really?” She said looking at him askance, “You’re choosing now to rub my nose in that?”

“You never apologized for calling me a territorial asshat after I followed you guys to the restaurant.”

“That’s because you were being a territorial asshat,” she said dryly.

“No, I was trying to protect you because I could tell that something was off about that guy and it turned out I was right,” he said defensively.

“He was a mask, not a creepy supervillain with a mind control cocktail in his pocket,” she said with a snort.

“But he could have been,” Oliver said with a scowl. “The chemicals did come from his labs after all; you just don’t want to admit that I was right when I said he was hiding something.”

“Okay, you were right,” Felicity told him in exasperation. “Happy now?”

“Yeah, pretty much,” Oliver said with a twinkle in his eyes.

She snorted, “God, you’ve been waiting a year just to hear me say that, haven’t you?”

“I have; yes,” he admitted. “I also never thought Barry was a right fit for you either. Don’t get me wrong, he’s a nice guy, but if he was really into you he wouldn’t have hooked up with Iris the first chance he got.”

“Yeah, well…” She said dourly.

He paused, “Plus, if you ask me, he’s also got a thing going on with that little lab assistant chick, what’s her name.”

“Caitlin?” She asked incredulously.

“Yeah; her,” he frowned. “Frankly something’s off with her, too. I can’t put my finger on it but—”—
“First off, Caitlin isn’t a ‘lab assistant’, she’s a biochemist. Secondly, there’s nothing going on between her and Barry,” she told him flatly.

“Yes, there is,” he said confidently.

“How do you know?” She asked in exasperation.

“Oh, I know,” he said with a slight upturning of his lips. “And, trust me, when that whole thing blows up in his face you don’t want to be anywhere near it.”

“They just work together,” she snorted.

“Yeah, like I said; complete disaster just waiting to happen,” he smirked. “I almost feel sorry for the poor bastard. Love triangles always end in disaster, especially when all of the parties involved are also teammates.”

“Kind of like when Laurel decided to try out Sara’s wig and go leaping from rooftop to rooftop with you guys as the new Canary and then when Sara came back you hooked up with her again leading to a huge catfight all because you couldn’t keep your Arrow in your pants?” She shot back.

“Yeah, like that,” he said looking at her with a pained grimace. “Ouch; talk about a low blow, but yeah, like that,” he said with a wince. “The point is, neither of those guys were good enough for you. You told me once that I deserve better, well; so do you.”

“Maybe,” she said quietly.

“No maybe about it,” he said, laying his hand on hers and squeezing slightly before pulling away. “You’re remarkable, remember? You deserve someone just as remarkable as you are.”

“Remarkable, right,” she scoffed, “because a guy who can travel at superhuman speeds is too humdrum for someone as utterly extraordinary as me.”

“Exactly,” Oliver said with firm assurance.

She sighed, “Look, I know that Barry and I might not have worked out and it wasn’t meant to be but, thing is, I liked him. He was funny, and he was safe, and we spoke the same language. He might not have been all that handsome or exciting compared to…” she glanced up at him before clearing her throat, “some people before the whole ‘Flash’ thing, but I liked having someone interested in me for a change. Of course, once he meta’d out, all that changed. Before it just felt like I was being left behind in a cloud of dust; then Barry got zapped and, well…” She expelled a discontented breath, “I don’t know; I guess I’m just cursed. I should just give up; it’s not like anyone’s interested in me anyway, right? Unless, of course, you count random psychopaths or masked vigilantes with intimacy issues and then, boy howdy, is my dance card full.”

“Plenty of people find you interesting,” he defended, ignoring the directed ‘intimacy issues’ remark.

“Then why was he was the first guy--the only guy--to ask me out in four years? And notice, I’m not including Daniel because he was a hell of a lot more interested in you than he was in me. Don’t think I’m ever getting over that one either; at least when Barry asked me out, he was actually interested in me and not in the Arrow. Well, he was interested in the Arrow, but he was more interested in me.” She frowned, “No wait, he didn’t ask me out; you asked him out for me, remember?” She reminded him. “Crap. Technically speaking he was the only guy I ever really dated at all and he dumped me less than twenty-four hours into our relationship, plus he was basically a...oh God, it was some kind of weird pity date by proxy, wasn’t it? How did I not notice that before?”
“A what?” Oliver asked in confusion.

She ignored him, “I don’t know; maybe I should just go the bad 80’s movie route and build my own man-bot. Of course, he’d probably just dump me for the toaster oven,” she added under her breath.

“Felicity, you’re gorgeous, you know that right?” He asked with a puzzled frown as though her beauty were merely a fact.

“I’m somewhat attractive in the sense that I have symmetrical features and clean up nice,” she corrected him. “At best I’m pretty, as in, sweet old fashioned girl next door pretty.”

“Yes, you are,” he told her. “Very pretty.”

She smiled, “Thanks, but my kind of pretty isn’t exactly what most guys are looking for these days. I mean, we live in the plastic surgery capital of the world where everyone expects you to be this statuesque epitome of female beauty with big fake boobs and I’m too…well, not perfect; like the complete opposite of perfect. Totally imperfect.”

“That’s not true,” he told her. “When have you ever seen me with a plasticized human bouncy house?”

“You have a point,” she admitted ruefully, “but trust me when I say that you’re the exception to the rule. Besides, you have your own weird thing going on with tall, willowy brunettes.”

“I do not,” He objected.

“You so do,” she snorted.

“Sara was blonde,” he pointed out in self-defense.

“She was the exception to the rule as well,” she said dryly. “Besides, you and Sara have that whole superhero thing going on and I’m just…” She sighed then shrugged, “I don’t know; girls like me just don’t inspire passion. I’m too short, too nerdy, too ‘cute’, too,” she looked down at her modestly proportioned chest and raised her eyebrows slightly, “you know. The first thing most people tell me, if they notice me at all, is ‘You’re cute’, or ‘Aren’t you just adorable?’ Newsflash; adorable is worlds away from sexy. Don’t ask me why, but I give off this vibe that reminds them of their little sisters—I know this because I get told that constantly.” She said with a resigned grimace.

“I don’t think of you as my little sister,” Oliver said with a deepening frown.

She gave him a dubious look, “Yeah, well, maybe not since ‘the dress thing’,” she emphasized by curling her fingers into air quotes, “but you kind of did before that.” He started to protest and she cut him off, “It’s okay, Diggle does the same thing; most people do. For some reason men take one look at me and assume I’m some fragile little thing and having any kind of romantic interest in me makes them into some kind of pervert. I’m pretty much used to it and on the rare occasion someone does decide to pay me any sort of ‘attention’ all I have to do is open my big mouth and they’re out of there.”

“That’s not true,” he said firmly. “I’ve seen plenty of men give you a second look, Felicity. You just haven’t noticed.”

“It is true; believe me, I’ve seen the skid marks on the floor when they make their escape after I go into full ramble mode.” Felicity shrugged half-heartedly. “Look, this whole ‘cheer up Felicity’ thing you’re trying to do is nice but it really doesn’t bother me,” she said with a stiff smile. “I’ve known for a very long time now that I just wasn’t meant to have something like that with another person. I have my work, the mission, you guys…” She closed her eyes with a wince, her chin dropping to her chest, “Oh yeah, almost forgot. Guess I don’t have any of that anymore,” she muttered.

“Felicity…” his voice was pained but she refused to look up at him.

She forced a smile on her face, her eyes still cast downwards, “‘Seriously, you don’t have to build up my self-esteem or worry about it. I’ll be fine. I’ll just finish packing up my house and go home to Gotham; find a job, get a condo and a couple of cats. Maybe I’ll take up knitting or something. I always wanted to learn how to do that and now that I won’t be hacking into the FBI database all night long I might actually have time for hobbies again.”

She thought he’d laugh and drop it but instead he tilted her head up so she was looking into his eyes as he spoke, “Don’t do that.”

“The knitting or the cats?” She asked jokingly.

“Don’t put yourself down; don’t try to convince yourself that you deserve less, or that you aren’t worthy of having something because you are the best, brightest, bravest person I know,” he said seriously. “And, for the record, you still have me and I think you’re beautiful. Or couldn’t you tell how I felt about you from the other day?”

She gave a slightly nervous chuckle, pointedly trying to ignore the last thing he said, “That’s a lot of ‘B’s’.”

“And I meant every single one of them,” he told her, his eyes fixed on her and his tone serious.

She blushed and dropped her eyes, “Yeah, well, it’s nice of you to say so but that was just the dress; that wasn’t me.”

“No, it wasn’t,” he said quietly, his fingers still on her chin, his thumb tracing the dimple on her cheek.

“Trust me, it was,” she scoffed, trying to move away to defuse the intimacy of moment but he held her fast, his eyes searching hers, and the air grew thin between them.

“It wasn’t just the dress,” he said before leaning down and brushing his lips against hers.
Chapter Fifteen

She gasped as his tongue swept across her lips and suddenly she was once again drawn into the sensation of kissing Oliver Queen.

His hand cupped her cheek, his thumb caressing her jawline, as his other hand wrapped around her waist to pull her closer. Her hands splayed against his chest before slowly, tentatively, wrapping around his shoulders until they were melting into one another. He moved her back until she was lying on the soft cloud of the duvet, his hand moving to her throat to caress a line to the V of her robe. His fingers slipped beneath the warm chenille until he was cupping the soft underside of her breast.

She moaned, not sure of where this was going but pretty much beyond caring. His mouth left hers and kissed across her cheek until his teeth and tongue found her unadorned earlobe and she inhaled sharply, desire pooling in her belly.

It was the ears. They always got her with the ears.

His free hand tangled in the silky strands of her hair as the other tugged her robe apart before cupping her waist and pulling her further up the bed. He stopped as he looked at the still livid bruises on her shoulder and collar bone. She’d taken some of the ‘Hell Island Magic Herbs’ but they were still rather dark even though the swelling was rapidly going down. Gently, tenderly, he kissed her there then used his teeth against her throat. She began to whimper as he gently pinched and pulled her nipple then nipped and sucked at the area between her shoulder and neck. Unconsciously she began to rub her thighs together, the slow heat rising from the juncture between her legs to throughout her body.

He pulled away from her long enough to slip his sweater over his head and then he was kissing her again, this time harder, deeper. His fingers slid to the back of her head and he ran his hand from her breast to her thigh. He pulled her leg to him until she was so snug against his body that she could feel his erection push at her through his trousers. She gasped as her uterus seemed to contract in response. She was on fire and her thighs were becoming almost embarrassingly slick with want.

His mouth left her lips to latch onto her breast. He ran his tongue against the delicate pale pink skin before scraping it with his teeth causing her to cry out and buck into his hips. He ground himself against her as he began a gentle suction interspaced with more tiny nips and the flicker of his tongue. His hand moved from her hip to her inner thighs, through the copious moisture gathering there, pausing long enough to make a gruff noise of approval against her breast, until he found the underside of her clit. Applying firm, steady pressure, he began to rub tiny circles into the nerve cluster, occasionally dipping into her heat for more lubrication. Her eyes rolled back as her entire attention zeroed in on what was happening between her thighs. It felt good, so good, but she needed more.

As though he were reading her mind, his fingers found her center and pushed inside as his thumb continued its slow torture of her clit. She moaned; a low wanton sound that she hardly recognized. He lifted his mouth from her breast to gaze intently at her expression of open want.

His hands left her and she protested with a whimper. He made a soothing noise, toeing off his shoes and pulling down his trousers and underwear before climbing back on the bed with her. He kissed her again; a long, slow, sensuous kiss that seemed to last forever. He kissed her like they had all the time in the world, like this night, this moment would last for all eternity and he refused to be rushed in his lovemaking. He kissed her until her head swam and she began to tremble. Had she been standing her knees would have failed her until she was a drained and insensible mass of flesh at his feet. He was addictive, intoxicating, and just when she thought she couldn’t take anymore he ended the kiss and moved his lips downward. He licked and sucked his way down her throat, between her breasts, down her stomach, then pulled her thighs apart and kissed her center. She started and tried to sit up but he pushed her down with a gentle but firm hand pressed to her abdomen as his tongue flicked out to find the swollen evidence of her arousal nestled above her folds.

She gasped and clutched at the sheets as his tongue swept across her moist flesh, teasing her clit, before he suckled it gently. His hand left her stomach and he gripped her thighs, pulling them further apart as he took his time exploring her. It was erotic torture; this lazy sensual creature between her thighs seemed determined to drive her insane as he performed some arcane tantra of tongue, teeth, and lips. She couldn’t breathe, the oxygen left her lungs as he teased her with unhurried swipes of his tongue. His fingers moved up her inner thighs and he gently inserted them inside of her; first one, then two. She gasped at the slight but pleasurable sting of being stretched and he looked up, a wicked smile shining toward her in the form of full, glistening lips. “Ms. Smoak,” he said huskily, trying to get her attention.

“What?” She said dumbly, the passion-fuelled fog rendering her brain useless.

“You’ve been lying to me.”

“What?” She said, suddenly snapping to attention.

He glanced down at the translucent curls at the apex of her thighs, “Natural blonde,” he enunciated carefully in a slow drawl, the syllables rolling off his talented tongue in an exaggerated feast of long vowels and sharp consonants.

“Oh, uh—OH!” She was rendered suddenly speechless as he dove between her thighs with renewed vigor, his lips, tongue, teeth, and fingers acting in concert to bring her to a babbling boneless mess within seconds.

She thrashed and shuddered, speaking in the unintelligible language of passion as he sucked and nibbled at her heated flesh until her muscles tightened and she began to tremble through her orgasm. He kissed her thighs, the scrape of his beard adding to her pleasure as his cheeks rubbed against the pale sensitive skin. He drew the moment out for as long as he could, the fingers of one hand soothing her goose pimpled flesh as the long, thick digits of the other danced and teased against her center. He watched her unravel with hooded eyes and no small measure of smug satisfaction then scooted up the bed to lie beside her. He kissed her again with slow assurance and she could taste herself on his lips and tongue, the combination of his languid seduction and her own pheromones pushing all remaining lucidity from her mind. His hands drew her toward him, pulling her against then over until she was straddling him. She pulled away from his lips and looked between them in mild confusion but he tugged her upward until she was above him, her breasts level with his mouth as he began to nip and suck at them once more. His hand reached down between them and he lined himself up to her entrance before gently easing her down.

Through the sharp pang of penetration and her own fogged senses she watched as his eyes shut, his features melting into an expression of ecstasy as velvet encased steel sheathed itself inside warm, wet heat. They both moaned as one as she slid down slowly until he was buried to the hilt. His hands slipped up her body, under her robe, and then over her shoulders so that the material slipped down her arms to pool around them. He gazed intently at her form, now completely unobscured by the thick robe, and ran both his hands over her outer thighs until he had a firm grip on her hips. He lifted her slightly and encouraged her to move her hips so she was grinding against him in small circles, teaching her through his firm but gentle touch how to set the rhythm of their lovemaking.

Her head fell back as she gasped and moaned with every thrust of his hips, continuing to grind down. His back arched off the bed as he thrust inside her, his hardness hitting a spot deep within her that caused her belly to tighten and spots appear behind her eyelids. As his rhythm deepened she began to breathe and pant heavily. His fingers found her clit and began to rub against her as she continued to swivel her hips against him and she faltered at the sharp, intensely pleasurable sensation that shot through her body.

He made an animalistic growl and then, in a skillful maneuver, he flipped them until he was once again in the dominant position. He grasped her thighs, hitching them over his waist, and roughly began to pound inside of her, slow seduction giving way to raw passion, as they raced toward completion. Every thrust of his hips sent a sweet, almost painful spark of energy through her entire body and all she could think of was the pleasure and sensation of being stretched, filled, and utterly possessed. Oliver’s mouth found her earlobe; his tongue curled as his teeth bit down and she cried out in pleasure, frantically clinging to him and mildly aware that she was now babbling nonsense. Words of want, need, and lust spilled forth in an almost unintelligible gibberish.

“Please,” she moaned. “Please, oh God, Oliver, I want—I want…!”

He looked down at her, his gaze dark and penetrating and it was all she could do not to open her mouth and confess every thought, every fantasy, every secret she’d ever had. Before she could speak words she would surely regret after their bodies had cooled, he found her mouth again, his tongue dueling with hers as he thrust his hips harder, faster, until she couldn’t stand up against the intensity of the onslaught of sensations any longer. Felicity’s mouth left his as she cried out, her back arched off the bed tight as a bowstring. She began to shiver and pulse, a rush of moist heat surrounding him, and heard the sharp intake of breath as he came, his body also shuddering in its release.

He leaned heavily against her, his weight offset by propping his elbows on either side of her. He buried his head in her neck, his breath coming in uneven pants as her heart raced so fast it felt as though her entire chest was vibrating. Her legs eased down off his hips and she curled her hands gently against his back, feeling the slick sweat on his skin.

I just had sex with Oliver, she thought as their bodies began to cool.

Holy crap.

He rolled over onto his back pulling her along with him, his hands gently rubbing her arm that was splayed over his chest, her head pillowed in the hollow of his shoulder. She stared at the watermark on her ceiling, her nose catching a faint whiff of the acrid scents of semen, sweat, and musk.

I, Felicity Smoak, just had sex with Oliver Queen.

She glanced at him, his eyes closed as his breathing began to calm. She looked down his torso at the many scars and tattoos that had become familiar over the last few years then lower to his softening but still engorged sex as it lay wet and glistening against his thigh.

I just had sex with Oliver in my bedroom. In my bed.

She shut her eyes and took a breath.

She glanced over at him again.

Yep, still there.

She eased out of bed conscious of the wetness between her thighs as she made her escape when he spoke.

“Where are you going?” He asked sleepily.
“Bathroom,” she said quickly. He hummed in response and she hurried over to her en suite, grabbing a wash cloth from the antique cabinet where she kept her towels and started to fill the tub. She eased into the warm water, wincing at the sting against her sex as she applied soap to the cloth and began to gently wash away the evidence of their lovemaking.

‘Well what do you expect, Felicity? You’ve had sex twice in two days after a four year long dry spell,’ came the voice in her head.

Suddenly all the air left her lungs and it felt as though she had been slammed face first into a wall of fire.

She had sex…

…with Bruce…

…and Oliver.

Panic, anxiety, and mortification all fought for dominance within her brain as a voice sounded from the doorway.

“Hey,” Oliver said as he leaned against the doorjamb.

“Hi,” she said feebly from the tub, holding the wash cloth against her chest in surprise before realizing how ridiculous that was.

“Nice tub but I’m more of a shower guy,” he hitched his head toward her walk-in glass enclosed shower. “Do you mind?”

“No, no of course not,” she said in a rush and pointed feebly at the chifforobe she used to store her linens. “There are towels and washcloths in there along with extra, um, robes.” Her eyes locked on his naked figure, so unashamedly displayed before her as though being naked together in the same room was a common occurrence. “They’re pretty big, one size fits all, so…” Then she heard the words coming out of her mouth and shut her eyes as she wondered if he’d show mercy and just let her drown in the tub.

“Thanks,” he said with a sexy half grin as he walked over to the old fashioned and purposefully shabby looking cabinet to pull out a large fluffy towel and a washcloth, “but I don’t think pink kitties and polka dots are a good look for me.”

“You can stay naked if you want to then, I don’t mind,” Felicity blurted out and then immediately covered her face with her hands, her humiliation reaching epic proportions but he just chuckled in response as he hung the bath sheet on a hook then entered the shower.

As soon as he was safely walled up within her shower she scrambled out of the bath and headed for her dresser pulling out the first thing she came across; a sleeveless long chemise in soft white cotton jersey that floated just above her ankles. It was one of her ‘summer’ nightgowns because the old house tended to be drafty and, while long, it was of a very thin, light material. This time of year she stuck mostly to fuzzy fleece lounge pants and camisoles or tees but she had a need to be not naked ASAP until she got her head on straight.

She looked around her bedroom feeling a bit shell-shocked. On her floor were Oliver’s clothes and she stooped to pick them up so they wouldn’t wrinkle, pausing briefly at his underwear before snagging them up and tossing them on top of the oversized chest of drawers where she kept her casual wear and lingerie. She then looked over at the bed and at the now rumpled duvet on top.
That comforter has seen a whole lot of action this week, came the stray thought. Her mind swirled; I slept with Oliver and Bruce. I slept with two different men in a week. No, I slept with two different men two days apart. They had talk shows about this sort of thing—and not the Oprah kind, trash talk shows like Maury and Jerry Springer; the kind where people booed and threw chairs at each other.

Holy Sally Jesse Raphael, what the hell was I thinking?

Fuck, fuck, fuck, what the fuck do I do now? I should call Tam, she thought. Tam would know what to do. She glanced at her smartphone on her nightstand. Shit, Gotham is three hours ahead so it’s too late at night to call her. She glanced at it again. Or maybe not. She started to go for her cell then stopped herself; if she called her sister then Oliver might walk in and overhear.

She stared off into space, frozen in place. Oh God, he’ll want to talk. How do I talk to him? What do we say? What do I say? Oh God, oh God, oh God…

I have to get out of here. She glanced at the window. I could escape through the neighbor’s yard, maybe catch a cab; the nightgown might be a problem…

“Hey,” Oliver said coming toward her with a frown, one of her extra-long bath sheets wrapped low on his hips, “You okay?” He asked, placing a hand on the center of her back.

“Uhhh, yeah. Why?” She said, turning toward him with a doe in headlights look on her face.

He smiled and gathered her up in his arms. “Shh, it’s okay,” he said softly, as he rubbed her back gently and tucked her head under his chin. “It’s okay to be a little freaked out. I’m a little freaked out myself.”

“Yeah?” She asked as she melted into his skin, still moist and warm from the shower.

“Of course,” he rumbled quietly against her, placing a kiss against her hair. “We’ve been friends for a long time and I never wanted to mess that up with sex. Besides, this is the first time you’ve had sex in four years and I’m only the second guy you’ve ever been with. I don’t blame you for being a little nervous.” She stiffened in his arms, her eyes going wide as he looked down at her and chuckled, “It’s okay, I’ve got you, alright?”

“Okay,” she said faintly as he led her back to the bed and pulled back the covers. Oh God, oh God, oh God…

He walked to the other side and tugged off the towel, letting it fall to the floor as he eased between the sheets and pulled her into his arms. With gentle pressure he urged her to lay her head on his chest as he rubbed her back soothingly. “By the way, I meant to tell you, other than all the broken glass and smashed up toasters this is a really nice place.”

“Thanks,” she breathed out, her voice trembling slightly as she tried to figure out just what the rules were when it came to this sort of thing. How do you tell the guy you just slept with that he’s not the first one you got naked with this week? She glanced at her phone again. What was the etiquette for a thing like that? Her vision dimmed for a moment and she felt almost faint with terror. I wonder if this is something they would cover in Miss Manners? And if she didn’t tell him was that the same as lying? And if she did tell him would he hate her and think she was some kind of slut? Her brain paused; can you be a slut if you’ve only had sex twice in four years? Was it based on how many times you had sex altogether or how many people you did it with because she was only up to two people and—wall, floor, shower back in Gotham then bed again the other night so that was 11 and Oliver in her bed made 12. Two people, twelve times, twice in four years, two days apart…

Fuck, this is too much math right now! It’s like some really twisted dirty dream where you’re naked and you forgot to study but with lots and lots of sex—I’ve got to call Tam.

“Laurel wanted to get a place in this part of the city. She liked the old houses and all the history in the area but I wanted something more modern then—” he sighed. “Well, the island happened and she wound up getting a place with Tommy closer to her job.” He looked down at her, his arm squeezing her in a half hug as he laid another kiss on her head. “I’m sorry, I probably shouldn’t be talking about my ex right after—“

“No!” Felicity said quickly. “No, it’s fine. Really. I mean, you shared a lot of history together and it’s natural that there would still be feelings there. You know, like, guilt or other…feelings; even if you shouldn’t feel guilty because you have absolutely no reason to. Really. I mean, she was the first person you ever really loved so it’s natural you would think about her right now, at this moment,” she swallowed. “Trust me, I’m not going to judge you for that. At all.”

He laid another kiss on the top of her head and hummed contentedly, “I know you wouldn’t but I still shouldn’t be talking about her right now. I mean, our relationship over the last several years has been pretty back and forth but I think really am over her. Romantically, anyway. I have been for a while but I’ll never be able to completely let go of the guilt, you know?”

I have been for a while but I’ll never be able to completely let go of the guilt, you know?”

“Yeah,” Felicity breathed. “I can understand guilt perfectly.” Tam, Tam, Tam, Tam…

“I just wanted you to know that even though Laurel has a tendency to throw me off my game, and believe me I know it can get irritating; it’s not love, not anymore. I care about her but we’re just not right together and I think we both finally realize that,” he told her softly. “Whatever this is between us I want you to know that the only person in my arms right now is you.” He tilted her chin up and kissed her mouth gently, “Okay?”

“Okay, but even if you weren’t I’d be fine with it,” Felicity told him, her heart thudding against her ribcage as she tried to control her oncoming panic attack. “I mean, these things just…happen sometimes, right?” She looked up at him pleadingly, “Seriously, even if you told me you slept with her, say, two or three days ago, I’d be fine with it. I mean, we weren’t, um, you know, and, uh, well, it would be none of my business. In fact, don’t tell me. Seriously, because you shouldn’t kiss and tell, right? Telling isn’t cool. Telling is bad. I mean it would be between the two of you just like what happens between us is our business. No matter what,” she let out a slightly strangled sound as she fought to find the right words, “either of us may have done before tonight, our, um, thing is new and completely, um, new. The point is that the past is in the past,” she said with just a hint of panic. “Completely in the past. Totally. Totally in the past…” she let her voice trail off as she swallowed hard.

“Felicity?”

“Yeah?” She breathed, looking up at him and praying that she would just shut up already.

“Just because we weren’t expecting this it doesn’t mean I think you’re easy,” he said with a gentle smile. “I know you aren’t. I know you don’t sleep around and, even if you did, it wouldn’t matter to me. Stop worrying about it and just relax, okay? We’re good.”

“Are you sure?” She asked in a wobbly voice.

He chuckled and tilted her head up to give her a sweet and lingering kiss, “You really are adorable, you know that? And not in a little sister way because, trust me, I’m not feeling the least bit familial right now. ‘Adorable’ is definitely a sexy look on you,” His lips found hers as he eased her head down to the pillow and deepened the kiss, his hand trailing down her flat stomach as he reached for the hem of her gown. “Adorable, smart, beautiful, passionate,” he said huskily against her lips and eased her gown up to her thighs as he drew circles on the inside of her knee with his thumb. His mouth moved to her cheek, kissing her gently, before he drew back to look at her with a tender expression, “and the most extraordinary lover I’ve ever had.”

“Really?” She asked in a small voice as her brain began to melt again.

“Yes,” he said before claiming her mouth in a deep kiss and moving his hand upwards until he was again brushing against her center.

Her brain snapped back into gear and she caught his hand, pulling away from his kiss, “Uh, Oliver, I…um…” She flushed, “See, the truth is that I, uh—it’s not that—I mean, I didn’t—oh God, this is embarrassing,” she breathed out in a nervous rush. “Oliver, I have to tell you something and--“

He kissed her into silence. “Hush, it’s okay, I understand. You don’t have to be embarrassed,” he said softly, his smile tender and more than a little filled with male pride. His fingers brushed a stray curl from her forehead, gently tucking it behind her ear before frowning in concern, “It’s just some soreness, right? Things got a little vigorous and I might have been a bit too rough--”

“No,” she said quickly, “I’m okay; you were fine—I mean it was great; perfect! Wonderful, in fact. It’s just…it’s just…I—I, um…”

“You?” He prompted. “It’s okay, you can tell me anything; I promise. Just talk to me, sweetheart.”

Sweetheart.

That…was not something she expected to hear; not from Oliver. It was, well, not bad per se, just highly unexpected. Of course, nothing that had happened in the last several days could be classified as ‘normal’, but sweetheart?

‘Baby’ she could handle obviously, ‘darling’, ‘love’, and its variables of ‘lover’ and ‘my love’ always made her feel a little squidgy ever since the weirdness with Slade, but ‘sweetheart’?

And it wasn’t the slightly patronizing kind of ‘sweetheart’ Lance sometimes used; it was ‘sweet’ pause ‘heart’.

Sweet Heart.

As in; ‘I think you have a sweet (pause) heart,’ which was only a hop, skip, and a jump away from saying some other really deep shit that she just could not handle at that moment.

Damn; he skipped ahead three or four heartfelt endearments and broke out the big guns.

She took a centering breath, “It’s just been a lot for one week, you know?” She said in a slightly pitchy way.

He chuckled then gave her another tender kiss on the lips, “Yeah, I know exactly what you mean.” He looked at her bruised shoulder that was already beginning to yellow on the edges thanks to the herbs and ran his hand over the healing blemish on her arm. “I…when he grabbed you, I--”

“No, it’s not nothing,” he said firmly, his eyes darkening in response to his own recollections of that night. “When you told him that you were the Arrow, I thought he was going to kill you and there was nothing I could do to stop him because I was trapped in that damn basement and I couldn’t get to you fast enough.” He closed his eyes, his face going still. “I kept thinking of… I kept thinking about that night; about seeing you and Slade and not being able to stop it from happening again.”

“No, Oliver,” she told him quietly, stroking a gentle hand over his hair. “It wasn’t the same. Batman isn’t anything like Slade.”

His eyes opened and she could see the lingering embers of fear within them, “It felt the same; like you were going to die and I was helpless to do anything but watch.”

“I was safe, I promise,” she told him carefully. “He doesn’t do that, he doesn’t kill people, and he’d never deliberately hurt me. It was just an accident. I know it looked bad from where you and Dig were sitting but I was never in any real danger from him and I knew that.”

“Why did you do it?” He asked, searching her eyes with his. “If he wanted to find me so badly why didn’t you let him? And why set yourself up like that? I could have handled it and you wouldn’t have had to get hurt.”

“I couldn’t risk that,” she told him, her heart, though still confused, shown in her eyes for a moment. “I was safe, but you… I was trying to protect you.”

“That’s not your job, that’s my job,” he said in a soft yet firm tone. “I’m the Arrow, it’s my responsibility. You should have never put yourself in that position. If something had happened to you…” His hand cupped her cheek as his thumb brushed her lips. “I couldn’t take it, Felicity; I couldn’t survive it. I’ve lost—” he paused as he took a shaky breath, “I’ve lost too much, I can’t lose you, too.”

“I’m fine,” she told him again. “It just looks nasty. I’ve had worse bruises coming off a case or sparring with Sara.”

“Felicity,” he said warningly, his eyes hard as he looked down at her.

She grimaced, “Okay, maybe it’s a little worse, but I know him and it really wasn’t intentional.”

He rubbed his fingers over the bruises gently, the muscles in his jaw tensing as he stared down at them before returning his eyes to hers. “Even if Batman doesn’t kill on purpose, even if you thought you were safe, accidents happen and sometimes we don’t get to walk away with just a scrape and a few bruises. Don’t ever do that to me again, okay? And you’re getting rid of those false trails you laid out. You will not sacrifice yourself, Felicity; understand? Never again, do you hear me? Not for me and not for Diggle. Get rid of them; all of them.”

“I—” she began.

“No,” he told her. “Diggle and I found the files. We know what you were planning; we saw all of the contingencies. If any of them lead to you being implicated in any of this I want them gone.”

“It was my choice,” Felicity said quietly. “When I decided to stay with you I knew what I was getting into, and if it comes down to a choice between my freedom and you and Dig continuing the mission, I—”

Oliver placed a finger against her lips then dipped his head and kissed the red and black bruise on her collarbone, “Never again, Felicity.” He lifted his head and looked her in the eye, “There is no choice to make; you will always come first. Before me, before Diggle, before the mission; before anyone you come first. Take them down and if he comes near you again you call me or Dig; preferably me, understood? You might have history with him but this is my city and I'm the one he needs to deal with, not you. He's not allowed to so much as touch you ever again."

"Okay," she said quietly, entranced by the shifting colors in his eyes.

"Promise me," he said softly, his fingers tracing the shape of her cheek bone as he held her spellbound.

"I promise," she whispered and he kissed her lips lovingly, his tongue tasting her mouth before moving to her cheek then to her ear.

He brushed her earlobe with his nose before nipping it gently and chuckling as she gasped, her flesh breaking out in goosebumps. "So sensitive..." he rumbled, "I love the way you make love, Felicity Smoak." He kissed her mouth gently once again then nuzzled her neck, "You have no idea what you do to me, do you? How many times I've wanted to just touch you and now it's like I can't stop. You're... intoxicating," he breathed against the shell of her ear causing her to shiver and whimper in pleasure. "I feel like I could make love to you forever and I don't think I'd ever get tired of it. Just the way you respond to being touched..." He watched her skin flush and her lips part as he gently stroked the back of her neck with his fingertips. "God, you're so beautiful when you do that. I can't believe you ever thought you weren't the kind of woman who inspired passion. Wayne is an idiot," he whispered against her lips.

Her eyes closed, "I... Oliver, I..."

"Shh," he told her. "We still have a lot to sort out, okay?" His lips brushed hers teasingly, less of a kiss and more of a caress of flesh against flesh that made her tingle from her head to her toes. He pulled away from her reluctantly, "We should talk but it's late; do you want to just sleep for now and we'll revisit this in the morning?"

Oh God, did he say morning? Felicity froze, her mind going from warm and fuzzy to ice cold panic instantly. He's spending the night? Here? What if Bruce shows up because that could happen? Bruce could even show up tonight, he hadn't left town otherwise Barbara would have told her. What if Bruce shows up as Batman and Oliver sees him? Shit! Shit, shit, shit; where the fuck is my phone?

"Actually, I'm not very tired right now—I mean, I am, I'm exhausted really. You really, uh, tuckered me out but my mind is a little, um, full of, uh, stuff, but if you are you can..." she started to get out of bed and grab her cellphone to call her sister or Barbara or anyone for that matter but he stopped her.

"Good, because I wanted to talk about what Isabel said to you again. If that's okay?" He added.

"Oh, Yeah." She eased back into his arms and nodded. "Sure, yeah."

He met her eyes before kissing her forehead and lingering there for a moment, his large hands cradling her face, "Hey, no need to be scared. It's still us, right?" She took a deep shuddering breath and nodded. He pulled back and brushed a wayward lock of hair behind her ear, "Good, and I want you to know that I'm ready to really listen to what you have to say this time, I promise. Now what exactly happened at this lunch you had with Isabel?"

Okay, she thought as she centered herself, this I can handle. She shut her eyes for a moment, willing all the stray emotions that were driving her into a frenzy back into their box, and focused. Three, two, one...

"This morning Isabel called me and asked me to meet her for lunch at Leviathan," she started slowly. "I wasn't going to go, the last thing I wanted to do was have lunch with that woman, but she was..."
pretty insistent and it made me curious so I went.”

“It started out fairly normal. We both had the fish, she ordered some pretty decent wine, and we had polite chitchat. Finally she asked me why I quit,” his face darkened and his lips tightened a bit but she continued. “I told her that I was just ready to move on and that seeing my dad reminded me that being your EA wasn’t what I set out to do. She told me she had done her research, apologized again for being so insulting to me, and offered me a job at Stellmoor.”

“What about the other stuff, the things she said about me being the Arrow?”

“That came a little later,” she told him. “First she started selling me on the idea of joining Stellmoor. She said, um…”

He looked at her intently, “She said what?”

God, this part was embarrassing. “She said, um, that she knew I had dressed and acted the way I had at the meeting because of Bruce.” She felt herself blush from head to toe.

“I see,” he said, pulling back slightly.

“No, wait; not like that,” she said quickly, placing her hand on his arm. “She meant that she saw what I was trying to do. I knew Bruce might show up and I didn’t want him to think I was still intimidated by him or that I was still ‘Baby’, the 19 year old girl who let him get in her pants because she’d had a crush on him since she was four and he only slept with because he was bored.” She almost felt like crying right then. “I wasn’t trying to get back with him or anything, or be a tease. Not really. I mean, I…I just didn’t want him to walk in that room and see me, the glasses and pencil skirt wearing nerd. I wanted to be someone strong and sexy who didn’t need him to swoop in and rescue her. I didn’t mean to use you or to----“ She stopped, rolling away from him to wrap her arms around her knees and tucked her head down so he wouldn’t see the stinging tears of embarrassment and guilt. “I’m sorry. It was my fault. I’m so sorry. This, all of it, I did this…I--”

She felt his hand on her back and he leaned in and told her, “It’s okay, I understand. He hurt you so you wanted to show him that you didn’t need him. I get that. I’ve been there, remember?” He said quietly. “If you think that running away from being ‘Baby’ is tough, try having everyone you love tell you that they want ‘Ollie’ back even though ‘Ollie’ was the world’s biggest asshat.”

“Newsflash; sometimes you’ve still got your head up your ass,” Felicity said, her nose running like a faucet as slow, traitorous tears flowed over her cheeks. She buried her face further in her arms.

“Yeah, and I’m really sorry about that,” Oliver told her. “Treating you the way I did, that was something ‘Ollie’ would have done. I shouldn’t have blown you off like that.”

She sniffled, wishing she had a tissue and looked up. “It’s okay, I’ve been acting more like a ‘Baby’ than a ‘Felicity’ myself. Case in point,” she said with a weak laugh as she gestured to her wet cheeks and runny nose.

He gave her a funny smile and reached across her to her nightstand for the box of Kleenex before dabbing at her cheeks then handing it to her so she could wipe her nose. “I’ll admit it; I was…shit, I was jealous and when I saw Wayne looking at you like that, it sort of brought out the worst in me. I could tell that there was something between you and that you were angry at him for something. Plus the dress,” he grinned, “It really was a great dress. You looked good in it. Actually, you looked better out of it.” He winked at her and she felt herself smile back in return. “You know,” he said as he reached for her hand and rubbed her knuckles gently with his thumb, “I said this before but it bears repeating now: I’ve wanted you for a long time; the real Felicity, not the one in the skin tight
He took a deep breath, “I don’t do relationships. I’m not that guy but you are that girl, the kind of woman a guy like me learns to keep their distance from because you aren’t…” He brushed his fingers across her cheek and she watched the shift of emotions across his face, “You aren’t the kind of girl you play games with, Felicity; you’re a forever kind of girl, the kind a man takes very seriously and I’ve never been good at that so I held back. I kept my distance and did what I thought was the right thing. I’ll admit that I probably never would have acted on my attraction towards you but when Wayne showed up I knew he would. I could see it in his eyes. That day, at the conference, he had this look in his eyes and I just knew. He looked at you like you weren’t just that girl, you were his girl, but…all I could think about was the fact that you once told me that you were my girl; you’re mine. It might have been pure selfishness on my part but I knew that he wouldn’t hesitate, he wouldn’t run, and even if you’d be better off with him I just needed to…I needed to kiss you at least once because,” he glanced away from her for a second then met her eyes again, his expression one of raw emotion, “because I’ve wanted to kiss you since the day I met you and I had to know how you tasted before you walked out of that door forever.”

Her heart skipped a beat and she fell. Throwing all good sense out of the window she leaned toward him and placed her lips against his. He made a deep rumbling sound of satisfaction, and pulled her toward him until they were lying on their sides, one of his hands tangled in her hair, and the other cupping her butt and squeezing possessively. She whimpered and pushed her hips against him, her leg thrown over his as he pressed into the cradle of her thighs through the thin, soft cotton of her gown. He was naked under the sheets and she could feel his interest stir as her hands traveled down the hard muscles of his back. Then, after another few seconds of kissing her until her toes curled, his lips firmed upon retreat and he leaned back slightly, his eyes dark and wild. He took a steadying breath and reluctantly moved his hand from her behind to her waist. “We’re never going to get through this if you keep tempting me, woman,” he said in a low tone that made her insides melt. He was right. They had to talk about this; they had to sort it all out. Just a few minutes ago she was in a panic about the fact that they had sex and…and…

Screw it.

“We can talk later,” she said, her lips trailing over his jaw line. Her mouth made it to his neck and she licked the corded muscles there, her teeth scraping against his flesh as she felt his hands tightening on her waist. He made an impatient noise and his mouth captured hers as he moved on top of her and grabbed her nightgown, pulling it up and off.

Her head fell back as he began to suck at her neck scraping the soft skin with his teeth before shrugging off the covers and sitting up on his knees. He pulled her legs over his hips rubbing his hard flesh up and down her center to gather the fluid needed for an easy penetration. Reaching between her legs he rubbed her clit as his erection teased her entrance.

“Don’t stop,” she whimpered, trying to pull him in.

“I’m not going to stop; I’m never going to stop,” he told her as he eased forward, his eyes filled with dark promise. Her head fell back as she arched off the bed to meet him. “Oh fuck, you feel so goddamn good,” he breathed as he watched their bodies join as one. “God, that’s beautiful.”

“Please,” Felicity begged as he moved inside of her with excruciating slowness.
“Tell me what you want,” he told her as his hips pulled back, his hands locked around her hips preventing her from moving as he continued his sensual torture. “Do you want me to touch you? Do you want my fingers back?”

“Oliver!” She begged, tightening her legs over his hips to try to force him inside of her.

“Say it; tell me.”

“Yes,” she said then cried out as his thumb found her clit.

“Now what do you want?” He asked her, thrusting slowly in and out. “Talk to me, sweetheart; what do you want, hmm?”

“You,” she moaned, reaching out to grab at his arms.

“And how do you want me?” He asked her. “Like this?” He thrust inside of her slowly. “Or like this?” He pulled her hard against him causing her to cry out sharply as he suddenly hit bottom.

He made love to her, his rhythm switching from slow and steady, to hard and deep. “Tell me what you want,” he whispered in her ear as he entered her over and over. “Tell me.”

“You! I just want you! Please!” She told him, her nails digging into his hips, the sweet friction of their bodies driving her past the point of control. He thrust inside of her harder and harder in an almost punishing rhythm. She heard the sounds of their bodies slapping together, the wet pull of flesh against flesh, and she began to whimper and tighten her body around him until she heard his breath catch. She pulled his neck down until his mouth was on hers causing him to sink even deeper. They both cried out in pleasure.

“How long?” He asked, his breath coming in pants. “Tell me how long; how long have you wanted this?”

“Always,” she gasped. “Always! Please!”

“I wish I had known that,” he said, jerking his hips into her roughly and causing her to cry out before changing his rhythm again into something slow and maddening. “I wish I had found you sooner, loved you sooner. You have no idea, do you?” He thrust inside her again and hissed in pleasure at her reaction, “Christ, you’re so…I’ve never had anyone respond to me like you do. I just want to lose myself in you and never stop,” he thrust inside her again and they both moaned and she began to whimper. “You’re so beautiful…the sounds you make.” He thrust again and then bent down to suck one of her nipples in his mouth and watched as she arched into him, chuckling darkly. “You have no idea how much I’ve been torturing myself.” He ground his hips into hers, filling her to her absolute limits and she shivered and clawed at him. “For days now I kept replaying what happened in my mind; the way you tasted, the way you looked and felt, how wet you were... I wanted you so much, wanted to feel you from the inside so badly it nearly drove me insane. Today, you were yelling at me and I just wanted to grab you and kiss you senseless, make love to you until we were both exhausted. I held back, I stopped myself from touching you but just barely. God, I wish I had just touched you. I wish we had done this years ago.” He thrust inside her in hard, rapid succession; one, two, three and she cried out again, her body stiffening, her toes curling, as her orgasm began to build.

“Tell me you belong with me, Felicity,” He whispered. “Tell me you’re mine. Tell me that this is what you want.”

“T-T-Tell me you are mine,” she gasped when he thrust harder, “Oliver, please!”

He made a low, dangerous sound deep in his throat and leveraged himself onto his knees, never stopping the slow grinding motion of his hips, until he was again looking between them. His thumb moved again to her center, giving her the friction she craved as he gave up on slow torture and pounded inside of her mercilessly. “Come for me,” he told her. “I want to see you come. I want to feel it.” His voice was deep, dark, and so reminiscent of the Arrow that she lost it.

“Oliver!” Her vision went dark and her body tightened as she clutched at him desperately. She screamed his name over and over again in a babbling tangent of need, want, and desire until all of it, every emotion, every fantasy, came down to just his name. He thrust deep inside her body and she felt her orgasm flood out of her. Their combined flesh grew slick and hot as a burst of moisture erupted from her center and surrounded him.

“God!” He shouted then gritted his teeth as though in pain. His eyes slammed shut and his arms pulled her tight against him as he unleashed himself inside of her. “Fuck!”

She sobbed in relief as they both shuddered into one another, her hands running over his hair comfortingly as his own paroxysms gradually calmed. He eased her legs down, their bodies still joined as he lay against her. She became aware of the wet trails of tears on her cheeks as she opened her heart to the moment even though she knew she was falling far too hard, far too fast.

He breathed harshly against her neck, his grip on her easing but not letting go. After a few seconds he raised his head and looked down at her, his thumb reaching up to wipe the tears from her cheeks.

“Hi,” he said breathlessly as he smiled down at her.

“Hi,” she smiled back wearily, her eyes feeling heavy with sated exhaustion.

“That was good,” he snorted into her neck.

“Very good,” Felicity agreed wearily, her fingers trailing over him soothingly.

“Amazing even,” he whispered against her temple. “You’re amazing.” He kissed her closed eyes softly; first one then the other before his lips rested once more against her temple, his body still cradled between her thighs as he softened inside of her but he made no move to extricate himself.

“We have a problem though,” he whispered against her.

“Mmm?” She murmured, sleep beginning to pull at her.

“You’re too amazing. So amazing that now you’re stuck with me. I don’t think I can let you go; not now.” He took a deep shuddering breath, “I don’t want to let you go.”

She opened her eyes, her exhaustion suddenly forgotten. “Are you sure?” She asked, feeling her heart constrict in her chest and hating how vulnerable she sounded.

He swallowed, his eyes trailing over her face as he ran his finger over her cheek, “I don’t know what this is but I’m in. I’m not letting go. Never again.” He kissed her cheek and then her mouth and she could taste the salt of her tears on them, “You’re mine now, okay? You’re mine and we’re going to figure this out together.”

“You don’t owe me anything, Oliver,” she said against his mouth. “Please, just tell me now and I’ll be fine, I promise, just don’t—“

He captured her lips again and his tongue swept inside her mouth, overwhelming her until her mind completely shut down. He pulled away and nuzzled her cheek, his lips so close to her ear she could feel the moist warmth of his breath on her skin, “I want you and I can’t see that changing any time soon.” He pulled back until he could look at her again, “We’ve wasted enough time as it is. I’m not doing that anymore; not with you. You belong to me and I…I like the way this feels.” He stroked his hand over her cheek. “You make me feel…good,” he said quietly, “and I haven’t felt good in a very long time. In fact, I don’t think it’s ever felt this good or this right before; not with anyone and not ever.”

She looked at him, her eyes feeling hot and she suddenly felt like weeping from the relief she felt at his words but part of her still held back. That little niggling voice of doubt that came from experience pulled at her. “I don’t expect anything from you, Oliver,” she said quietly. “Don’t tell me something like that because you think it’s what I want to hear. I don’t expect a happily ever after from you and I don’t need pretty words or false hope. It’s—this—is enough for me. Just…just don’t say anything you don’t mean, okay? Don’t do this if you’re just going to turn around and say it was a mistake later.”

“I’m not letting go,” he said firmly and kissed her again then pulled back so he could stroke her hair, brushing it off her forehead as his fingers traced the line of her eyebrow down to her cheek. “There will be problems, yes. I can’t even begin to think of the logistics of all of this but I only know that…” He laid his forehead against hers and shut his eyes, “This isn’t just sex. Any more than that I can’t promise but we’ll take it one day at a time,” he told her.

She couldn’t just accept that yet, though. Not quite yet, “I hear what you’re saying but a lot of things can change between now and tomorrow, or next week…I have to go to Gotham and—“ “You’re not going anywhere,” he told her.

“But I—“

“You’re staying with me,” he told her, the ring of finality in his tone as he lifted his head and his eyes caught hers. “Here; in Starling where you belong.”

“But he—“

“That son of a bitch does not get to come into my city and push me around,” he said with a hint of the Arrow’s darkness shining in his deep blue eyes. “You’re mine and I intend to keep you.”

“I’m not a bone you can bury in the backyard, you know?” She said without any heat.

“Maybe, but it doesn’t change how I feel,” he told her unapologetically. “If that makes me a territorial SOB then so be it, but Batman isn’t taking you away from me; not without a fight.”

“But how can you be sure that this is what you want?” She asked. “Maybe this is just, I don’t know; temporary insanity on your part due to heightened emotions and a post-coital endorphin rush?”

“Is that what this is for you?” He eased away, rolling onto his side and pulling her with him so they were resting their heads against the same pillow, his eyes boring into hers as though seeking out a deeper truth. He smoothed his hand down her back before letting it rest at her waist. “Temporary insanity?”

She opened her mouth to speak the words she almost said during the heat of passion but managed to somehow curb the impulse, saying instead, “Have you ever heard of a psychological tactic during police interrogation called ‘eliciting the need to confess’? It’s that urge most people have to just blurt out the truth; I have that in spades,” she told him and he smiled at her, his eyes dancing with loving amusement. “Yeah, well, it’s not exactly a well-kept secret,” she grimaced. “The thing is the need to confess cuts both ways. Sometimes people will admit to things just because they give in to that urge even when it might not be the truth. Right now all I need from you is the truth and if the truth is that this needs to end tomorrow then that’s what I want to hear. Don’t…don’t confess to feeling something or wanting something that isn’t there just to please me because that’s the last thing I would ever want from you. If you really want me to stay then I will, I will stay with you, Oliver; but don’t ask me just because you want to protect me or to spite him and if I do stay I still won’t come back to QC. I can’t; that’s over.”

He cupped her cheek with his hand, “I don’t want you to stay so you can be my EA. I don’t want you to stay to spite him or because I feel some kind of obligation towards you. I just want you,” He smiled at her. “I. Want. You. Does that clear things up for you?”

Unable to speak, she merely nodded in silent affirmation.

“Good,” he whispered against her lips, kissing her again. “Now,” he said, taking a deep breath and pulling away so he could shift onto his back. He adjusted the pillow under his head and eased her down so her head was nestled in the hollow of his shoulder then ran his fingers up and down her spine. “So Isabel brought up the meeting…?” He prompted, his voice a bit more husky than it had been.

“Seriously?” She chuckled. “How can you even remember what we were talking about after that?”

“Are you implying that I might have screwed your brains out just now?” He asked her, a hint of mischief coloring his tone.

“I’m not implying it; I’m stating it outright,” she told him enjoying the rumbling sound of his laughter against her ear as she laid her head on his chest. “Okay,” She took a shuddering breath and willed her brain cells to click back on. “So Isabel brought up the meeting but not in a ‘you’re the office whore’ kind of way. She was…how do I put this?” Felicity squinted slightly as if the words were right in front of her face, “It was like she was admiring the way I handled myself in there. She kept using words like ‘psychological attack’ and ‘strategy’ and dissected every nuance of what was said or how both of you reacted. She made it seem like I was some kind of femme fatale from a Bond movie or something and told me that I was exactly the kind of woman Stellmoor was looking for.”

“Hmm,” if Oliver seemed unsettled by any of what she said it didn’t show. “When did she start talking about the Arrow?”

“Not too long after that but first she started talking about some other stuff that was just weird. She started talking about women, about how we’re superior to men, and then she, uh,” she looked up at him a little sheepishly.

“Made a pass?” He said with a wry grin.

“Yeah,” she confirmed. “And before you say that I might have misconstrued anything, I specifically asked her if she was hitting on me and she said she was. I told her I liked men and she said that she did as well but only occasionally for ‘scratching the itch’ but that women were what really floated her boat and hinted that if I were interested we could come to some sort of arrangement.”

He frowned and bent his arm behind his head as he held her against him. His fingers stroked up and down her skin as he seemed to consider his words before speaking again. “A lot of people saw us after the meeting; the catering and maintenance staff at least. It was pretty obvious you were upset with me and that something happened in that room,” he rubbed his hand down her arm again as if to take away the sting of the memory for them both. “If you were after me like she thought you were you wouldn’t have gotten angry or upset. A mercenary or fortune-hunter would have ridden someone like me all the way to the bank. It wouldn’t surprise me if that information filtered up to her. The fact that you quit with no notice right afterwards didn’t get past her either. Bruce was obviously interested in you as well but you shut him down every chance you got. I mean, not to brag, but besides the whole billionaire thing I’m a pretty good looking guy and Wayne may be an ass but he’s a walking GQ ad and built like a friggin’ linebacker. Women notice guys like that and you had both of us running in circles and yet you didn’t seem to care. I wonder if she assumed you were gay?” He looked at her, “Look at it from her perspective; you have to admit Barry and Daniel are the only guys you’ve dated lately and all you and Barry shared was one dance at a work function while you and Daniel really only went out a couple of times at most.” He narrowed his eyes in concentration, “If I’m recalling it correctly, around the time Garret was in the picture, Isabel was overseas dealing with Stellmoor and our European subsidiaries so he would barely have registered as a blip on her radar and Barry wouldn’t even rate that much. Plus, we’re unusually close, almost too close to simply be coworkers, and we were very clear with everyone that we’re just friends. Best friends, in fact.”

“I’m your best friend?” She asked, suddenly feeling very touched.

“Shh, I’m thinking out loud,” he kissed the tip of her nose and smiled, “but yes. Now where was I? If I was Isabel it would be pretty obvious to me that you’re an attractive woman and we have chemistry, because you are and we do, and yet, from her limited perspective you seemed to have a strong negative reaction towards me when I finally made sexual advances. Maybe she added two plus two and got five and just didn’t realize it. Maybe making overtures was her way of testing her theory? If you weren’t gay she probably knew you’d tell her but if you were, well, we both know she isn’t above using sex to get what she wants.”

“So, back in Russia you knew she wasn’t…that she didn’t, um…?” Felicity stammered hesitantly.

He smiled in mild amusement and stroked his finger down the side of her face, “Not every woman is like you. There are a lot of women who think of sex as a commodity in my world. I knew she was trying to figure me out and she was willing to use sex to do it. It would have raised too many alarms if I turned her down. The Oliver Queen she thought she was in business with would never turn down sex with a beautiful woman if she offered it.”

She looked at him in surprise, “Wait, so you didn’t really want her then either? But how were you able to, um…” she allowed her voice to trail off suggestively. He chuckled and she smacked him. “It’s not funny!”

“I’m a man,” Oliver said wryly. “Emotions really didn’t have anything to do with it. It was just sex.”

“I don’t get that,” she said in disgust.

“Of course you don’t,” he said, giving her another look that made her insides melt. “You don’t do anything unless your whole heart is in it. That’s what makes you so dangerous.” He nuzzled her ear softly and whispered, “Finish telling me the story.”

She looked down at the sunflowers adorning the soft jersey cotton of her duvet cover and bit her lip, “Okay, well, like I was saying; she offered and I turned her down but only after babbling like an idiot for a few minutes,” he chuckled again and she shot him a dirty look without any heat behind it. “And then she started getting to the good part. I asked her why they wanted me of all people and she said it was because of my history with you, meaning the Arrow. I told her I didn’t know anything about that and she shrugged it off and started getting pretty specific about a few things. She said Stellmoor targeted QC because of the Arrow and that they recruited vigilantes of their own, female vigilantes. She said that they were basically trying to create their own army and support network of modern Amazon warriors to protect the Earth. When I started to blow her off she mentioned Sara and how she was the Black Canary.”

Oliver’s face grew stony, his gaze sharp and penetrating. “Did she say ‘Black Canary’ or did she call Sara by name?”
“Both,” Felicity answered. “She said Sara Lance was the Black Canary, that Stellmoor was the one bank rolling her, and that they eventually wanted to move her to Starling permanently as their own vigilante presence here in the city.” Felicity thought about that for a moment, “There’s no way Sara was the one who exposed you, right? It makes no sense.”

He paused as if to consider it, his face looking much more troubled than it had a few moments ago. “It’s possible but not likely. We have a…past; beyond the obvious.” He looked down at her, more Arrow than Oliver. “Sara and I both had to do things on that island we weren’t proud of. I’m not saying she wouldn’t betray me, she’s done it before, but that was then and we’ve both changed. We’re long past having to act out of survival and if she really wanted to expose me all she’d have to do is drop a dime and I’d be in cuffs by now.” He looked at her grimly, “What else did she say?”

“She said that she knew I had been acting as the tech for Team Arrow. She brought up the bombing in the Glades and asked me that if I hadn’t-,” she licked her lips nervously but pushed on, “If I hadn’t had to rely on you, Dig, and Lance; if I’d had a team of my own out there who listened to me when I gave orders and a real support system behind me if I could have saved more lives.”

She couldn’t read his expression anymore. He’d gone from the man who’d just made love with her to the hard faced and emotionless warrior under the hood. Finally he spoke, “She’s not entirely wrong. If I had listened to you when you wanted to go out in the field you might have been able to recruit Lance and find the second device in time to disarm it.” He looked at her, “That said if I knew then what I know now, it still wouldn’t have changed my decision. Had you gone out after the second device there is a very good chance that all those people and Tommy still would have died only you would have been killed as well. I’ll never regret that decision even if it did cost lives.”

“It’s in the past, Oliver. What’s done is done,” she said gently. He nodded brusquely and motioned for her to continue. “Anyway, she ended it by telling me there was no deadline to their offer and that as soon as I made a decision I should contact her.”

“Anything else?”

“Just that they’re everywhere. She said they have representatives in every major city and ties to the government and the military,” she looked to him again. “Oliver, I don’t think she was lying. I’ve only been investigating this a day and already I have enough to suspect that ARGUS is connected to them somehow.”

“ARGUS?” He repeated then nodded grimly. “Wish I could say I was surprised; anyone else?”

“She mentioned a group; The Themyscirians.”

He frowned. “The Themyscirians? Why does that sound familiar?”

“If you ever took Greek Mythology it would,” she said easily. “Themyscira is the ancient mythological lost city of the Amazons.”

“Huh,” he said tilting his head back, the shadow of the Arrow fading for a moment. “I must have caught the name off an old episode of Xena, Warrior Princess.”

“You watched Xena?” She snickered.

He gave her a curious look, “Is that supposed to be funny or something?”

“No, it’s just something I told someone once about your chiropractor.”

“My chiropractor?” He asked dubiously, “I don’t have a chiropractor.”
“It’s just—never mind,” she muttered, then smiled, “So, big fan of chicks in leather with subtextually Sapphic friendships, huh?”

He gave her a slightly sheepish look, “Yeah, well, Tommy was convinced that Xena and Gabrielle were going to go all out naked love-fest at any minute and he used to make me watch it with him just in case.”

“So it was all Tommy’s fault, huh?” Felicity said as she reached out to rub his chest playfully.

“One hundred percent,” he said, settling her against him and tucking her head under his chin.

They lay there quietly for a long moment before she spoke, “What are we going to do?”

He placed a light kiss on her hair, “I don’t know. I have to think about it, but for now we’ll go clean up, slip back under the covers, and sleep, okay? Everything will still be waiting for us in the morning.”

They got out of bed reluctantly but this time they shared the shower, each one taking turns touching, kissing, and exploring the other without feeling the need for more. It was more about discovering the boundaries of new intimacy than the rush of sex. They toweled one another dry then slipped under the sheets, him pulling her into his arms for one last kiss before he shut his eyes.

She looked at his features in the soft glow of her bedside lamp, so much more relaxed than she had ever seen him despite all that was going on in their lives. For a moment, for just a split second as she looked at him, she let herself believe that everything might actually work out as long as they could maintain the trust they had built together.

But in order for that to happen she had to tell him about the other night. Even though he said that everything before this was in the past she needed to tell him for her own peace of mind.

She frowned and looked down at the duvet nervously “Oliver?”

“Hmm?” He mumbled.

“I have to tell you something and, I know you said it wouldn’t matter, but it does because I don’t want it to seem like I’m trying to hide anything.”

He inhaled sharply and opened one bleary eye, “What’s wrong, Baby?”

Felicity blinked, suddenly caught off guard, “You called me ‘Baby’.”

“Sure did,” Oliver smiled softly, closing his eyes again. “That’s your nickname, right?”

“Yeah,” she said feeling bashful suddenly. “I thought you decided to start calling me ‘sweetheart’ now?” She joked, biting her lip

“Who says I can’t call you both? I plan to go through lots and lots of endearments with you; honey, baby, sweetheart… I might even take ‘darling’ and ‘dear’ out for a spin, I haven’t decided yet. You might have to remind me to pick up a thesaurus so I don’t accidentally miss any,” he told her with a sleepy half-grin then opened his eyes again. “Is that okay? I mean, is it okay if I call you ‘Baby’ when we’re alone or does it make you uncomfortable?”

“Yeah,” she said softly. “Yeah, it’s okay. I mean, as long as you know that I’m still the same person I’ve always been.”
“I’m not ever going to forget that,” he told her, a quiet intensity behind his words. “What about you? Do you want to start calling me ‘Ollie’ now?” He asked her. “One slightly embarrassing childhood name for another?”

“No, not really,” she told him after a moment’s consideration. “You’ve always just been Oliver to me. I’ve never met ‘Ollie’ and I happen to like the person you are now.”

He opened his eyes again and shifted slightly so he could look her directly in the eye. His hand stroked over the side of her face before cupping her cheek, “I like that I’m ‘Oliver’ for you, but I kind of wish ‘Ollie’ had met ‘Baby’ a long time ago.”

“Why?” She asked, nuzzling her cheek against his hand.

“I think it would have inspired me to become ‘Oliver’ a lot sooner than I did. If I had met you back then I think my whole life might have changed for the better,” he said, stroking her cheekbone with his thumb. “I would have buckled down, taken more responsibility, maybe even…” Regret suddenly flashed across his expression, “Maybe if I had met you sooner I would’ve been able to have a relationship with Connor or, better yet, never have been the kind of guy who would use a girl the way I used his mother to begin with.” He kissed her forehead softly, “You could have fixed me a long time ago and made me a better man.”

“You can’t know that for sure,” she said, blushing slightly at the compliment.

“I can and I do,” he said quietly.

“You have always been a good man, Oliver,” Felicity told him. “Everything you feel guilt for; Laurel, Sandra, Connor, Sara, your mom—none of that is your fault.”

“Yes, it is. I--”

“No,” she said firmly as she cupped his cheek and forced him to look her in the eye. “My dad told me something the other day. He told me that I wasn’t responsible for anyone’s happiness but my own. He said that, even though I may want to fix everyone I care about, that not even the strongest of men could handle that much weight on their shoulders.” She ran her fingers across his jawline, “Stop blaming yourself for the past and start seeing yourself as the man the rest of us love and care about because you are a good man, Oliver.” She smiled, “You’re probably one of the best men I have ever known.”

“And you have a sweet heart, Felicity Smoak,” he said, giving her a lingering kiss. He pulled away from her and blinked down at her sleepily, “Come on; let’s just sleep and we can talk more tomorrow, okay?”

“But…” Felicity stopped and licked her lips. “See, I just—“

“Tomorrow,” he told her firmly, kissing her again. “Sleep first, everything else can wait, okay?”

She exhaled the breath she had been holding and nodded. “Okay.”

“Turn the light off, Baby,” he told her, settling back down into the pillow.

She turned away from him long enough to switch off her bedside lamp then snuggled in beside him and slept.
She awoke sometime later to see Olivier kneeling beside her fully dressed, “Hey.”

“Hey, what time is it?” She mumbled, reaching over to gaze blearily at her phone.

“Not quite 3:00 am,” he said quietly. “I didn’t want to leave without talking to you first.”

“Oh. Okay, yeah.” She blinked her eyes and winced as she turned on the lamp and the whole room became visible. She pulled the blankets towards her chest for warmth and ran hand over her rat’s nest of curls, “Are you heading out?”

“Yeah, in a bit,” he said, straightening up so he could sit on the edge of the bed as she scooted up to lean against the headboard to give him room. He reached out to tuck a curl behind her ear gently. He then placed her leg that was outside the tangle of covers on his lap and ran his palm over her calf before settling his hand on her knee and squeezing it in an intimate gesture.

She reached out, placing her hand over his with a contented, if bleary, smile, “Are you coming back later? You know, if you come back tonight you could, um, bring a change of clothes with you,” she said quietly. “Not that I’m pressuring you or anything. I mean, I know this is new and I don’t want to seem—“

“Felicity,” he said, running his thumb across the back of her hand. He looked at her, his expression grim, “I won’t be coming back.”

For a second Felicity knew she couldn’t have heard right. She even had to blink her eyes a couple of times just to make sure she wasn’t still asleep, but then she looked at his expression and knew that this was not going to be a good day after all. She removed her hand from his light grasp.

“You don’t just mean tonight, do you?” She asked with a sinking feeling in her chest.

“No,” he confirmed.

“You said you were in,” she said, not accusingly, but with quiet confusion. “I repeatedly asked you not to say that if you weren’t sure and you told me we wouldn’t be having this conversation.”

“I was in,” he told her, shutting his eyes as if it pained him to admit it. “I’m sorry but I’ve been through it in my head and the only solution I can come up with is—“

“You’re going to tell me that you can’t come back because we can’t be together, aren’t you?” Felicity tilted her head slightly to the side. She felt numb but not surprised. “That it’s too dangerous for me, right?”

He nodded and they sat in silence for an extended moment…although for completely different reasons.

While Oliver was affixing his best ‘let them down easy’ face all Felicity could think is ‘Why does this keep happening to me?’ As subtlety as she could she slid her hand over to her other arm and gave herself a pinch.

Nope, I’m definitely awake.

She swept her eyes across the room.

And no hidden cameras either.

“Felicity, I didn’t want this for us. If I could, I’d ask you to stay; I’d try, but…I’m sorry, I can’t do this. We can’t do this.”

Un-fucking-believable. “Do I have bad breath?”

His mouth snapped shut and he looked at her. “No, why--?”

“Body odor?”

“What?” he asked, suddenly looking less grim and more confused.
“It’s the sex isn’t it?” She muttered to herself. “I should have bought a book or something—well, I did buy a book; a couple of books, but I don’t think they were very well written or accurate because this keeps happening to me and I know it’s not my personality. I have a great personality.”

“It’s not the sex, or body odor, or you,” Oliver said. “It’s—“

She held her hand up, stopping him mid-sentence. “I know this part, ‘It’s not you, Felicity, it’s me. The mission is too important and I can’t risk your safety by being with you’, right?”

“Yes!” He scowled in frustration, “I’ve spent all night thinking about it and if Isabel knows about the Arrow then it’s just a matter of time before she outs me or threatens to in order to get controlling interest in QC. I can’t risk you being here when that happens.”

She counted to five in her head because, well, frankly she didn’t feel like losing another phone by hurling it at someone’s head again. “Just so I’m clear; the reason we can’t be together is because of Isabel and for no other reason.”

He didn’t answer her right away, he just averted his eyes. After a second or two he took a breath and laid his hand back on her exposed knee and rubbed it in what she supposed was meant to be a comforting gesture but really, given the circumstances, came off more like he was trying to cop one last feel. As if he was saying, “Hey, yeah, I’m totally dumping you but I’m doing it nicely so that I might still be able to get back up in that later,” and, even though she knew he was feeling genuinely contrite, she really, really just wanted him to stop touching her right now.

Vigilantes, she thought, no sense of self-preservation at all.

“If it was just that…look, it’s not just Isabel; if what she told you is true then—“

“Then we’re blown,” she finished for him. Now get your hand off my knee, you mother…

She didn’t finish that thought because, even though she hadn’t been particularly fond of Oliver’s mother, she still believed in being honest and she doubted the affection Moira Queen had for her son ever ran in that particular direction.

Son of a bitch though? That worked.

“Exactly,” he said grimly. “Sooner or later they’re coming after us and you need to be as far away from the Arrow as possible when and if that happens. If you stay and Isabel sees that we’re involved then that will just motivate her to act even sooner.”

She resisted the urge to roll her eyes.

Barely.

“Which is something you knew about before we had sex,” Felicity said simply.

Yeah, I thought that would score a hit, she thought. “I said, you knew Isabel was gunning for us before we had sex just like you knew I was already leaving for Gotham when you showed up at my house last night.”

“What are you trying to say?” He asked angrily.
“Just what I said,” Felicity told him in a calm and reasonable tone. “None of this is news to either of us and yet you broke into my house last night, walked into my bedroom, staged a very effective seduction and consequently initiated the ubiquitous adult activities, gave me this heartfelt speech about how all the stuff you’re saying now was not going to be said even though—”

“Whoa! I did not set out to seduce you just so I could get laid and sneak off afterwards!” He said angrily getting up off the bed and facing her. “If that’s all it was I wouldn’t have even bothered to try to have this conversation with you to begin with!”

“Oliver, I’m not trying to accuse you of anything; I’m merely telling it like it is,” Felicity said simply.

“But that’s not how it is!” He told her. “Look, if you want to yell and scream at me then you can, I don’t blame you; but it doesn’t change anything!”

“I’m not yelling; you are. Which, when you think about it, is pretty shitty of you to do right now because I’m the one who’s being dumped,” she told him.

“I’m not dumping you!” He said, getting to his feet and pacing angrily. “Goddamn it, I did not set out to hurt you; that’s not what I wanted to do and you know that! At least you should know that!”

“Okay, but, once again, just to be clear; you want me to leave and not come back and you don’t want us to be together in a romantic or sexual way ever again,” she said slowly. “How is that not the same thing as being dumped?”

“It just isn’t!” He scrubbed his hand through his hair, “Dumping someone implies that your feelings about that person have changed and that’s not what’s happening here; nothing that’s happening right now is something I wanted to happen! But…” he pause with a grimace, his hands balled up at his sides angrily.

“But?” She prompted.

He shook his head once then looked at her, his eyes filled with regret, “But, yes; I’m ending this—now before we get in too deep. I’m sorry.”

There were so many things she could have said at that moment but her bladder just wasn’t up to it. Felicity swung her legs out of the bed and put on her nightgown that had fallen to the floor then stood up.

“Where are you going?” He asked.

“To the bathroom.”

“Why?” He asked trailing after her with a scowl.

“The same reason everyone else goes to the bathroom when they first wake up: I have to pee,” she said, shutting the door in his face and locking it behind her.

The minute she shut the door he tried the knob.

Oliver was nothing if not predictable.

“Open the door, Felicity,” he said in an aggrieved tone.

“Kind of busy,” she called out.

She could hear him as he leaned heavily against the door, “Please, just…open the door. I’m not doing this to upset you; the last thing I wanted to do was cause you pain, but I don’t see any other choice. It’s best to end this now so that you can be safe. The last thing I had intended to do when I came over here last night was to make love to you but it happened and...” he sighed, “Just...just don’t cry, Felicity. This is hard enough for me as it is.” He paused, “Felicity?” He tried the door again. “Are you okay?”

She flushed and rolled her eyes as she got up from the pot to wash her hands, “I’m not crying or committing Jigai, I told you I had to pee!” She soaped up her hands quickly, rinsing and drying them before she opened the door to see him standing there. “See? No tears.”

“I—“ He opened his mouth to speak but she cut him off.

“Stop apologizing;” she said, holding up her hand to stem the flow of crap that, frankly, she just wasn’t up to hearing him repeat over and over this early in the morning. “We’re good; I told you last night that if you didn’t want to do this that we could just let it go without making it into a big thing.”

“That’s not—“ he started but she cut him off again.

“Stop!” She told him. “You’re off the hook! I’m not mad at you, I’m not upset; if anything I’m just irritated about the fact that I asked you repeatedly if this was a one night stand and you—“

“This was not a one night stand!” He growled.

Felicity looked at him askance, “I’m sorry, are you planning on making this a two-night stand, because I thought you were pretty clear just now on that particular point.”

“It’s not—“ he grimaced again and his nostrils flared, “Calling it a ‘one night stand’ cheapens what we shared and you know it. It was not a one night stand.”

Felicity paused to consider that, “No, no I’m pretty sure a one and done is technically a one night stand.” She shrugged, “But, whatever; I apologize if I made it sound cheap, okay? Technically this was my first real one night—uh, whatever this was, so forgive me if I’m not familiar the etiquette for these sorts of situations,” she said as she moved past him towards the bed.

“Look, I don’t blame you for being mad at me—“ He said, still trailing after her as she snatched her robe from the bed and slipped it over her shoulders. She shivered and he pulled her into his arms, “Felicity, don’t…it’s going to be okay.”

But she was only half-listening as she took in the chill of the room. “What?” She asked, narrowing her gaze at him. “I’m not scared, I’m cold.” She shivered again, “Oh God, are you freezing or is it just me?” She extricated herself from his embrace and wandered into the living room, stepping over the broken glass and pottery carefully as she was in her bare feet. “How good are you at making fires?” She asked, tossing a starter brick and a few seasoned logs she’d bought from the hardware store in the grate. She looked at the splintered remains of her wooden cutting board askance. “Do cutting boards burn or is there some reason I shouldn’t toss that sucker in here, too?” She turned back to him but he didn’t answer so she shrugged and tossed that in as well. “Oh well, better there than in the landfill.” She looked at all the glass and shattered plastic littering the floor. “Too bad I can’t do the same with that,” she muttered.

“You’re making a fire?” Oliver asked blankly as he walked over to her with a frown. “Right now in the middle of everything?”

“Yeah, it’s drafty in here,” she told him as she snatched the long fireplace lighter off the mantle and held it to the starter log. “You know, they show you the real wood burning fireplace and ohh and ahh over it but what they don’t tell you is that it gets really fricking cold at night here and these things are not only drafty as hell but barely put out any heat. I thought about talking to the landlord and getting a ventless gas unit installed, but—“

“Felicity,” he said reaching for her shoulders and pulling her up so she was looking him in the eye. “It’s okay to be upset with me but ignoring it isn’t going to change anything.”

“I know,” she said wryly as he narrowed his eyes at her in disbelief. “Really Oliver, I’m fine.” She patted his chest in a comforting gesture, “I told you; we’re cool. You can go now, really. It’s not like I haven’t been in this situation before.”

He took his hands from her shoulders and jammed one in his pocket as he ran the other through his hair. He muttered something unintelligible under his breath as he took a few steps away from her, then rounded back, his expression a mixture of agitation, wounded pride, and confusion, “No, damn it! You do not get to play it like this; not with me! I did not set out to hurt you! This isn’t me thanking you for sex and leaving cash on the nightstand! I’m trying to protect you; I’m not Bruce!”

She snorted and laughed before slapping her hand over her mouth. She tried to get it under control but then she caught the look on his face. Anger, frustration, and comical confusion warred with each other to the point that she could almost picture a cartoon dialog bubble appearing mid-air with the word ‘D’OH’ coming out of his mouth.

And that was the straw that broke the camel’s back. She lost it.

She started laughing so hard tears ran out of the corners of her eyes and she literally had to grab her stomach.

His face turned red and he crossed his arms over his chest defensively until she had better control over herself before saying, “Are you done?”

She gave another short bark of laughter before finally wiping her eyes with her hands and working out the last of her giggles while he worked on destroying thousands of dollars’ worth of dental work by grinding his teeth into oblivion. “I’m good,” she said at last, her mouth still twitching. “It’s just if you knew why I was laughing…” she snickered.

“Want to explain to me why you find the idea of Isabel knowing our secret so damned funny? Or do you think that I’m exaggerating the danger you’re in just to; what? Get in your pants? I’m trying to save your life, goddamn it!” Oliver practically growled. “This isn’t fun for me! I didn’t orchestrate all of this just so I could get laid! She could send us all to prison if she’s got enough evidence—all of us, including you!”

“Sorry—sorry; you’re right.” She sobered up and heaved a sigh as she waved him off, “But, for the record, I made my peace with the possibility that I could wind up in handcuffs years ago. Hell, prison was actually the least of my worries compared to what went down when we faced Slade so forgive me if jail time doesn’t hold the same weight it used to.”

“Well it should!” He said forcefully as he towered above her. “And I haven’t forgotten what happened with Slade. I thought—“ he stopped, a shadow passing over his expression. “I think about what could have happened to you almost every single day. I remember watching you face down Slade knowing he was going to kill you and then when he put his hands on you…” He closed his eyes and swallowed convulsively. He rubbed a hand over his mouth before looking at her again, “For the last six months I’ve gone to bed every night thinking about the look on your face, seeing you stare him down and not being able to do a damn thing about it.” He shook his head, “I still don’t know how you survived that; you shouldn’t have survived it, but we—you got lucky.” His expression changed into that of the Arrow and his voice deepened. “Just because you came out of that alive doesn’t make you invulnerable, Felicity. I can’t face that again. I can’t stand by and see you destroyed by something that is my fault and I can’t protect you if this goes public; in fact, the worst thing I could do is be anywhere near you if that happens. This is about me, just me, and I won’t risk your life or your freedom ever again even if that means sending you away and not seeing you anymore. If you go to Gotham then maybe, just maybe, Isabel will forget about you.”

“Out of sight, out of mind?” Felicity asked wryly. “That’s your plan?”

“So far,” he said in a voice that was neither the Arrow nor Oliver but a mixture of the two.

She arched an amused eyebrow at his angry posturing, “It’s called ‘extradition’, Oliver. One call to Gotham PD and I’m in handcuffs either way.”

“It’s better than your odds would be if you stay here. If you are out of the picture then maybe Isabel will no longer see you as a threat or, at the very least, it will give you some plausible deniability if we do get caught.” He moved a little closer, his voice softening as he stroked her cheek with his hand. “In Gotham you have resources at your disposal I just can’t offer you anymore. Here you’re Felicity Smoak, Executive Assistant to a CEO who likes to arrow criminals; there you’re Felicity Fox, daughter of one of the most trusted men in the country. Your dad’s reputation might protect you or, if not, the distance might buy you enough time that you can get out of the country for a while; something, anything, just as long as you’re not here.”

There were all sorts of things she could have said to him at that moment. She considered all of them before deciding on just one, “Okay.”

“Okay?” He repeated with a frown.

“Yeah, I get it. Thanks,” she told him with a casual shrug. She pulled out of his grasp and headed for the kitchen. As she stepped over the remains of her coffee pot, she turned to him. “Pot’s broken but I might have tea if you want some.”

He looked at her, his hands still suspended in midair as he tracked her progress. “Felicity,” he said warily, “Are you…are we okay?”

“Yeah, why wouldn’t we be?” She asked with a frown as she turned on the kettle.

The look of wary confusion changed to one of suspicion. “Are you sure because you’re not taking this the way I expected you to,” he said as he approached her counter.

She raised a sardonic eyebrow, “Is this your way of asking me if I’ve flipped my lid because I’m not crying and wailing or throwing dishes at your head?”

“Frankly yes,” he said, eying her askance.

She yawned, leaning against the far counter, “Eh, been there, done that and frankly I’m out of tears and small appliances so I figured I’d give calm acceptance a shot instead.”

Oliver just looked more confused than ever, “I’m still not following.”

She smiled at him and tilted her head to the side, “Oliver, I knew when and if we ever slept together that there was a better than even chance you’d give me the ‘it’s the mission and I want you safe’ speech. You’re not my first vigilante, remember?” She turned and grabbed a mug from the cabinet muttering under her breath, “Already heard that one twice.”
“What?” He said, catching some but not all of what she said.

“Never mind,” she said with a sigh. “The point is,” she said as she dropped a teabag in her mug, “you’re a hero and heroes only care about the mission. All any of you have room for is the mission and the rest of us are just bit players in it,” she said drolly. “Like I said; not my first rodeo. I’ve been on this ride before—a few times, in fact. I already know all the speeches and the arguments and I’m just not up to dealing with it again at three in the morning.”

“What do you mean you’ve done this before?” He asked suspiciously.

She ignored him, “All you need to know is this: I’m good. I’m a big girl, Oliver. Got my big girl panties on and everything.” She paused and looked down at herself, “Well, no, no I don’t, but who wears panties under pajamas anyway? The whole point of pajamas is to be comfortable and not constricted yet in all the romance novels women always seem to go to bed in sexy lace thongs and underwire. How is that comfortable? Seriously?” She shook her head, “Anyway, my point is this: Angst is for tweens and Twi-hards and I’m not looking to make you into my one true sparkly vampire. We had sex and it was fantastic,” she said sincerely. “Seriously, you should bottle that stuff, but I’m not going to fall apart so,” she waved vaguely in the direction of her front door, “we’re cool.”

“Damn it, Felicity,” he yelled, losing his temper, “I didn’t decide this just to make you upset or to stroke my own ego!”

“I know that,” she replied in a reasonable tone. “I know you genuinely care about me and that all of this is horribly upsetting, it’s just not unexpected. You’d know that too if you weren’t being such a, well,” she scrunched her face as she searched for the right wording, “pardon the pun, but ‘drama queen’.”

“A what?” He asked, more than a little outraged.

“It’s true,” she shrugged. The kettle whistled so she turned off the burner and poured hot water over the leaves. “All of you vigilante types are,” she said scrunching up her nose and putting the kettle back down before turning back to him, “I mean, you take something tragic and horrible then use it as an excuse to put on costumes and masks so you can jump from rooftop to rooftop with bows and arrows or throwing stars in the shape of bats and push everyone away because, well, it’s for their own good. Normal people can just say, ‘Hey, I don’t do commitment’ and leave it at that, but you guys always have to be so melodramatic about it.”

“Melodramatic’?!” He repeated.

“Yes; melodramatic. In fact, some days it’s like living in a masked vigilante telenovela. All of it, soup to nuts, it’s just so over the top,” she confirmed. “I mean, I get that you’re doing good and that you’ve gone through stuff that would crush a lesser man; I’m not trying to lessen or diminish that at all, but still.” She paused, “All I’m trying to say is that I get it so you don’t have to pull out all the stops for me. I’d rather you just pull the Band-Aid off in one good rip than spend the entire morning drowning me in cruel kindnesses. I mean, no offence, but I have stuff to do and this,” she gestured between the two of them, “it’s kind of eating into my day. You can just tell me that, while you like me a lot, one good romp in the hay does not a forever make and trust me to handle that.”

“That’s not---!”

She held up one finger, cutting him off again, “I know, I understand: This is a serious situation and Isabel is evil and has it in for all of us. I got that, in fact I called that forever ago. You could have just listened to me in the first place and skipped all the drama but you didn’t. I asked you several times last night if this was how it was going to go specifically to avoid this whole scene but, no, it had to play out this way because that’s what you guys really get off on: the drama, the rush.” She took another sip before continuing, “Well, while I’m very grateful for the multiple orgasms, frankly I could have just as easily skipped it. I was already headed out of town before all of this.”

“So that’s it,” he said flatly, his expression livid. “You want to pretend like nothing I’ve said or done matters to you? You think I’m being a selfish prick because I’m trying to do the right thing by you even if it means hurting you in the short term? Sorry, but I’m not going to change my mind!”

“I’m not asking you to,” she told him.

“No, you’re just trying to manipulate me into doing it,” he said flatly.

“No, I’m not,” she said giving him a ‘go to hell’ look as she drank her tea.

“Yes, you are and I won’t allow it!”

She raised her lips from her mug, the burn of anger beginning to set in again. Allow; nothing burned her cookies worse than that particular word. She didn’t like it in a 404 screen and she certainly didn’t like it when it was applied to her personal decisions. “Listen, the only person in the room accusing anyone of anything right now is you. If you think my leaving is the best course of action then I’ll leave; I was already in the process of doing that and I can take care of myself. I’m not mad at you, I don’t blame you, and I don’t harbor any feelings of resentment towards you. That said, I won’t allow you to use me to fuel this angst ridden guilt-fest of yours because I own whatever happened here, just like I own everything that has happened since the minute you brought that laptop into my office. I’m not a victim. I’m not someone you’ve wronged. I’m not Laurel accusing you of whatever the hell she likes to accuse you of on any given day of the week, I’m not Sara, or Helena, or McKenna, or Sandra, or any of the other women you torture yourself over. You don’t get to add my name to that list because I’m the one who was in control of this the entire time, not you.”

“Meaning what?” Oliver bit out angrily.

“Meaning that, whether you like it or not, I’m not the helpless little blonde in the corner. I’m not crushed or devastated, and I’m not cringing and wailing over Isabel or whatever boogie monster is hiding under my bed because I’ve been doing this long enough to know better than to go off on a panic. I’ve been at this for almost five and a half years; while you were on Hell Island I was rocking coms with Batman, so excuse me if I come off as being flippant about the amount of danger I’m in since all this stuff has pretty much become routine for me.” She shook her head, “See? This is why I didn’t tell you about my past. Among other things, I didn’t want you to feel insecure.” she put down her mug and faced him.

“That’s a load of bullshit!” Oliver burst out, “No one said anything about you being a helpless little —“ He shook his head as words seemed to fail him and began to fidget and pace slightly, “Goddamn it! You—” he pointed his finger at her and growled, “And I’m not feeling insecure just because you were Batman’s weekend tech support! Where the hell are you even getting this shit?” He raged.

“Maybe I’m wrong then,” she shrugged.

“Yes, you are!” He told her hotly.

“The fact remains though that you aren’t sending Dig or Roy to Gotham and they’re just as much in the line of fire as I am, right?” She asked, “So…why am I the only one hearing this speech?”

“You know why!” He told her.
“Pretend I don’t,” she said easily. “Just give me a reason, any reason, since I’m wrong and our having sex last night obviously has nothing to do with why I’m hearing all of this right now.”

“You—I—stop doing that!” He growled.

“Doing what?” She asked innocently in a way that she knew would drive him out of his skull.

“You know what!” He snapped.

“I asked a simple question, that’s all.”

“No, you didn’t,” he shot back. “You want me to say that the reason I’m ending this and sending you away is because we slept together and now I’m running scared.”

“That’s a theory,” she admitted. “And you did happen to mention something along those lines last night as I recall.”

“Well if that’s the theory you’re operating under it’s the wrong one!”

“Okay then,” she said.

“Good!” He shot back. “And you know that this isn’t about me; this is about Isabel and the fact that she targeted you specifically; not Diggle and certainly not Roy!”

“So if Roy had been taken to lunch instead of me then he’d be going to Gotham instead?” She asked.

“No—I mean—Stop twisting everything because I’m not getting into this with you!” He said, his cheeks darkening with anger. “You’re going to Gotham and that’s it!

“Fine.”

“Fine!”

“I guess I’m going to Gotham, then,” she said easily.

“Yes, you are,” he told her. “Where you’ll be safe.”

“Huh, first time I’ve ever heard anyone refer to Gotham, crime capital of the world, as safe,” she said with a contemplative frown as his jaw clenched. “Oh well, I’m sure I’ll figure something out; maybe find a bodyguard or something.”

“Or something,” he repeated through gritted teeth.

“Maybe I’ll get my own Diggle,” she told him. “Or better yet, my own on-call vigilante to save me from the big bad since, you know, I’m incapable of taking care of myself without some costumed hero constantly coming to my rescue and telling me what’s best for me even if I don’t happen to agree.”

“Or maybe you’ll keep your head down and stay away from Isabel, Stellmoor, or anything related to Batman because, in this case, going to Gotham and keeping your head down is what’s best for you!” He said angrily.

“Hmm, maybe,” she shrugged watching his expression grow even more enraged. “Thanks for the lovely time and the chat but I’ve got a busy day ahead of me; you know, calling the movers, running errands, that sort of thing.” She moved around the counter and walked over to him, throwing her arms around his neck and placing a small kiss on his clenched jaw. “Good bye, Oliver, it was fun!
See you around some time.” She spun around and waved at him over her shoulder as she headed for her room. “Do me a favor and lock up on your way out since you obviously know the door codes.”

She kept walking until she heard him stomp out of her house, slamming the door behind him. She stopped then, placing her hand on the wall, and slowly fell to her knees as the anger and bravado suddenly dissipated leaving only the pain behind.

She leaned against the wall in the hallway for a while but she didn’t cry. Well, maybe a few tears escaped, but it wasn’t the gut wrenching sobs from the other day that had nearly made her sick, just a few bitter tears borne from frustration and stress.

It was like the air had been sucked out of her lungs and her legs wouldn’t work. She was numb. This had happened to her twice; three times actually, but twice in a matter of days. She felt her chest constrict and she whimpered before forcing herself to breathe.

In and out, inhale exhale. She staggered to her feet and made it to her bed, collapsing on it and trying to ignore the lingering smell of Oliver’s cologne. She reached for her phone and dialed the familiar digits without having to think about it.

“Felicity? What the hell time is it?”

“Tam,” she managed with a sob.

“What’s wrong?” Tam’s voice went from sleepy to instantly alert. “What happened? Are you okay? Do you need me to come out there?”

“Is that Felicity?” She heard a familiar male voice ask sleepily.

“Shut up, I’m trying to hear—Felicity, what’s wrong?”

“Is that Tim?” Felicity sniffled, suddenly distracted.

“Yes, but—never mind that now; what’s going on?”

“I thought you two broke up?” She asked in confusion, her voice hitching with unshed tears. “You guys are back together?”

“No, we’re not together! Tim just stopped by to borrow a cup of sex, okay?”

“Yeah, I did.” She heard Tim say in a sleepy yet still mockingly self-satisfied way.

“Shut up, you jack ass! Something’s wrong with Felicity!”

“What?” She heard a scramble for the phone and then it was Tim’s voice on the line, “Felicity, what’s wrong? Did another one of those earthquake machines go off or something? Do you need me and Tam to come to Starling City to get you? I can call Alfred and have the jet ready in less than thirty minutes.”

“No! No, please, I just—I just need to talk to Tam!” She said, her voice far more high pitched and whiny than she wanted it to be but the thought of being rescued by yet another vigilante, even if it was Tim, was too much to handle at the moment.

“Give me the phone!” She heard Tam say along with the sound of covers shifting in the background.

“I’m putting it on speakerphone.” She heard a click and then both their voices became clear. “What’s going on?”
“Tim, let me talk to her!” She heard her snap. “Baby, what’s wrong?” She asked in a purposefully calm and measured tone.

“I fucked up,” Felicity said, feeling shell-shocked. “I really fucked up and I don’t know what to do.”

“First things first; are you hurt?” Tam asked.

“Well, I’m not bleeding or anything if that’s what you’re asking,” Felicity said as she grabbed the box of tissues and blew her nose loudly.

“What happened?”

“Bruce showed up—“

“Yeah, now everything is beginning to make sense!” Tim said with a bitter edge.

“Tim, leave your own issues with Bruce out of this, it’s Felicity’s turn.”

She hiccupped and started again, “Bruce found out that I’ve been working with the Arrow and—“

Their voices erupted out of the receiver.

“Wait, you’re working with the Arrow?”

“Since when?”

“For a while now,” she said, reaching for her water bottle and taking a sip so she could wash away the salty taste in her mouth. “He showed up and things got bad. He made threats and, um, things might have gotten out of hand between us.”

“What do you mean?” Tim asked dangerously.

“Not—not like that,” Felicity said quickly then backtracked. “Well, maybe a little but it was nothing. That’s not the point—“

“Felicity, did Bruce hit you?” Tamara asked aghast.

“No, he didn’t hit me! He just left a few bruises when he grabbed me! He was upset—“

“What do you mean he grabbed you?”

“I’ll kill him,” she heard Tim hiss and then there was the sound of bedsprings as he presumably got out of bed to get dressed. “Is he still in Starling City?”

“No, stop! Wait!” She took a deep breath, “Just let me talk, okay? This is hard enough as it is.”

She heard Tam murmur something to Tim before speaking again, “It’s okay Baby, we’re listening. What happened?”

“Bruce came to Starling because he thought I was in danger and suspected I was working with The Arrow. He was on a tear about the whole thing and he wanted me to give up his identity so he could find him. It was stupid, like him beating the Arrow to a pulp would keep me safe or something,” she rolled her eyes, her nose still running like a faucet. “He confronted me and I tried talking to him but he wouldn’t listen so I told him I was the Arrow just to shut him up.”

Silence fell on the other end of the line.
“Um, Felicity? I could be wrong but last I heard the Arrow was a dude,” Tim said slowly.

“Yeah, well, I sort of told him that I was the actual brains behind everything and that the Arrow was just one of several men I had recruited.”

“Is that true?” Tam asked, sounding somewhat impressed.

“No, but the point is it could be! Then Bruce went all Bat and grabbed me and started yelling. Some of my team came up to stop him and I managed to defuse the situation before things went south but before Bruce left he threatened me.”

“What did he say?” A dangerous edge had crept back into Tim’s voice.

“He—uh, he said that unless I left Starling City and basically placed myself under his supervision back in Gotham that he would turn me in to the authorities,” she told them quietly.

“Asshole,” Tam swore. “Is that all of it?”

“No,” she said, clearing her throat. “The next day he showed up at my place to apologize for grabbing me so roughly and one thing led to another…” She couldn’t finish the sentence.

“And then what happened?”

“Dumb ass!” She heard the sound of a smack as Tam hissed again at Tim, “They obviously had sex!”

“You and Bruce had sex?” She could practically hear Tim’s jaw hit the floor.

“You and Bruce had sex before?” Tim asked incredulously, his voice squeaking like a thirteen year old boy.

“What did he do to mess it up this time?” She asked ignoring her (sort of) boyfriend.

“Same thing he did last time,” Felicity said miserably.

“Son of a bitch,” Tam growled. “Well, if Tim doesn’t kill him, I will.”

“What happened? What did he do last time?”

“Tim!” She snapped on the other end of the phone. “Either shut up and listen or go put on the coffee!”

“I’m shutting up now! Go on, Felicity,” Tim said quickly.

“Anyway, some other stuff happened and I had to get back in touch with,” she paused, “um, the Arrow about it even though he was upset with me too—“

“What does Oliver have to be mad about?”

Felicity started in surprise, “How did you--?!”

“Please, like you’re the only person in this family who’s slept with a billionaire vigilante; once you go Bat you never go back. Besides, Oliver is the only guy you ever seemed to talk about besides Bruce.”
“Wait, billionaire vigilante? Oliver, as in Oliver Queen? Oliver Queen is the Arrow?” The pitch in Tim’s voice rose excitedly.

“Tim,” her sister said warningly.

“Tim, you can’t tell Bruce, understood?” Felicity said sharply.

“I wouldn’t tell Bruce to go jump in the lake if his ass was on fire,” Tim said wryly.

“Anyway,” she sighed, suddenly exhausted, “turns out that Isabel Rochev—wait, you remember me telling you about her?”

“Yeah, you called her the ‘Cyrillic Succubus’ and said she put the ‘Puta’ in ‘Putin’, although you were really mixing your metaphors there.”

“Yeah, well, she invited me to lunch and told me that Stellmoor International knew about me and that Oliver was the Arrow and that they wanted to recruit me to lead a team of female vigilantes they were putting together.”

“Whoa,” Tam breathed from her end. “That’s actually kind of cool.”

“That’s not the point! The point is that she knows about Oliver and the Arrow!”

“Yeah, yeah, I got all that but think about it?” Tam said excitedly, brushing away Felicity’s concerns like they were nothing. “You leading a team of kick-ass girl masks? I would so love to help you with that. Think you could get them to offer me a spot, too?”

“Tam!” She growled in irritation, “She could expose us—me and Oliver both!”

“Yeah, but if she wanted to expose you wouldn’t she have just done that by now? I mean, why even bother offering you a job if that was her end game?” Tam pointed out in a reasonable tone. “I know you don’t like her but do you think her job offer is legitimate? Do you trust her?”

Felicity gave a humorless bark of laughter, “I definitely do not trust that woman but, to be honest, I have no idea if her offer was real or not.” She took a moment. “I don’t know what to think anymore. I guess I never stopped to think about it like that.” She snorted, “I have to give her credit though; at least if I had taken her up on her offer of sex I doubt she would have turned around the next day and given me the ‘it’s for your own good’ dump speech.”

Tim made a strangled sound, “This woman tried to get you to have sex with her?”

“She didn’t try, she just offered,” Felicity said, shutting her eyes as she rubbed the bridge of her nose.

“What are you doing with my tablet?” She heard Tam ask.

“Nothing.” Tim said quickly, “Just, uh, looking up Isabel Rochev.”

“Why?”

“I’m just trying to get a visual, y’know, so I can picture everything more clearly.”

“Give me that!” She heard Tam snatch her tablet away from him. “That’s my sister, you perv!”

“Well, she’s not my sister,” she heard him mumble.

She could practically hear the sound of her sister glaring at him. “Finish the story, Felicity.”
Felicity took another centering breath, “Oliver was angry because I never told him that I’d worked with Batman and we’d had an argument so I wasn’t keen on talking to him again but I knew I couldn’t just blow this off. I called him and told him we had to meet and he made an ass out of himself. He kept me waiting for almost three hours and when I finally told him what she said he laughed at me; told me I was imagining things.”

“What a dick!” Tam spat out. “I hope you showed him just where he could stuff those arrows of his.”

“Not in so many words but I let him know he could go straight to hell for all I cared and left. He showed up at my place a couple of hours later to apologize and offered to hear me out and, well…oh God!” She moaned.

“You didn’t,” Tam said.

“Didn’t what?”

“Felicity, tell me you didn’t.”

“Didn’t what?” Tim asked again in confusion.

“You did, didn’t you?” Tam breathed.

“What did she do?”

“Oh my God, you are such a slut!” Tam practically crowed.

“Oh my God, I am!” Felicity wailed.

“What? What did I miss?”

“When?” Tam gushed.

Felicity flopped face first in her pillow and groaned before lifting her head to answer weakly, “Bruce was Saturday and Oliver…a few hours ago.”

“Oh. My. God!” Tam howled, “I can’t believe my baby sister went from losing her virginity in the Batcave to practically having a threesome with Batman and the Arrow!”

“Felicity had sex for the first time with Bruce in the Batcave?” Tim asked scandalized. “Please tell me it was on a day I wasn’t there. Wait,” he paused, “did you say ‘threesome’?”

“How was it?” Tam asked excitedly, “I mean, this is the only other guy you’ve ever been with besides Bruce; was it good or are you still hung up on tall, dark, and grim?”

“I don’t know,” Felicity whined, “It was good but I don’t know what I feel anymore! Besides, it doesn’t really matter.”

“No.” Tam breathed. “Oh no.”

“Yeah,” she whimpered.

“Tell me he didn’t.”

“He did,” she confirmed morosely.
“What? What am I missing now?” Tim asked, completely lost in their conversation.

“Just that Oliver is as big a shit as Bruce is apparently,” Felicity heard a smack on the other end of the phone.

“Ow!” Tim yelped, “What the hell?! What did you hit me for? What did I do?”

“Because you’re a man and belong to the Dumbasses in Masks Club, that’s why!”

“Damn it, that really hurt,” he whined.

“It’s not Tim’s fault, it’s mine. Oh God, what am I going to do?” She wailed.

“Well, did you at least yell at him?”

“No.”

“Throw something at his head?”

“Tried that with Bruce and now I don’t have anything to make coffee in.”

“Well what did you do when he gave you his stupid little ‘I run around in a costume and can’t date you even though we just had sex’ speech?”

“T-I—“ She stuttered, “I laughed at him!” Then she completely lost it and the waterworks started in earnest.

As she sobbed into her pillow she heard Tim in the background ask in a sotto voice, “She laughed at him? I don’t get it.”

“Tim, go make the damn coffee!” Tam ordered him and Felicity could hear Tim grumble as he made his way out of the room. “Tim’s gone—finally. Are you okay, Baby?”

“No,” Felicity said in a wobbly voice. “You weren’t thinking.”

“No,” Felicity said in a wobbly voice. “I don’t know why I did that. I mean, I get that he was just trying to keep me safe but he said almost the same thing Bruce did and then when I told him that, he said that he was nothing like Bruce and I lost it because—because they’re practically the exact same person,” she began crying again. “Oh God, what does that make me? I had sex with two men who are exactly the same and yet I’m crying my eyes out because both of them dumped me right after having sex! What was I thinking?”

“You weren’t thinking,” Tam told her. “You were going with your heart. Unfortunately for you, Bruce and Oliver were going with their penises instead.”

“That’s not fair,” Felicity sniffled as she reached blindly for another tissue. “I know they care about me, it’s just that the mission always comes first for them—“

“Honey, please. Trust me; that’s not the mission that’s coming, not unless ‘mission’ is Vigilante code for ‘dick’.”

“Maybe—it’s just me?” Felicity moaned. “Maybe there’s just something about me that makes them think it’s okay to stomp my heart into a bloody pulp because, hey, I’m the one who keeps letting them in, right? No one forced me to drop my panties, I did that.” She sat up straight, “Oh God Tam, I am a slut, aren’t I? I’m a hero groupie; I’m just some easy lay for anyone in a mask.”

She heard Tim walk back into the room, “Brought the coffee, no need to thank me or anything.”
Tam ignored him, “You’re not a slut or a mask groupie. Two men in four years does not make you a slut. Trust me, I’ve slept with way more people than you have and I’m not a slut.”

“Wait, what?” She heard Tim say, “Who else have you slept with?”

“Seriously Tam, this is sick! It’s like the only people I seem to attract are people who think it’s okay to dress up in costumes and blow things up! Next thing you know I’ll be sleeping with Dick or, God forbid, Tim!”

“Hey! Since when is sleeping with me worse than sleeping with Bruce?” Tim asked in a mildly hurt tone.

“You’d never sleep with Dick because he has that weird fetish for tall redheads and, trust me; you do not want to sleep with Tim.”

“Why not?” Tim asked, obviously insulted.

“You talk too much and you’re selfish in bed.”

“I am not!” He said in an injured tone.

“The other day when we were in bed and you came first you said, ‘oops’, giggled like it was funny, then rolled over and started snoring.”

“I was tired and—and—and Felicity doesn’t need to hear about that stuff!” Tim blustered.

“Are you still coming home?” Tam asked, ignoring him.

“Yeah, don’t have much choice really,” Felicity said sadly.

“Some things are private, damn it,” Tim continued to mutter to himself. “And I made up for it last night, thank you very much! I’m like the king of foreplay now.”

“If you want to stay in Starling City then don’t let Bruce bully you into coming home.”

“That’s just it, I want to come home,” she said hollowly. “I’m just so sick and tired of all this crap. I need a break.”

“Then come home, screw the rest of them! You can stay with me until you get a place of your own. Or don’t, just stay here and Tim can sleep on the couch.”

“Hey!”

“Dad’s going to want me to stay with him for a while but thanks.” Felicity said, the tightness in her chest loosening a bit. “But hey, it’s okay, it’s not like my love life could possibly sink any further down the toilet, right?”

“Sure it could.”

“Shut up, Tim. You’re not helping.”

“I’m just saying. I mean have you seen daytime TV lately? Now those people have problems.” He snickered, “Oh man, can you imagine what would happen if Felicity got pregnant and had to wait to see if the baby came out in a green hood or a pair of bat ears?”

“That’s not funny! Besides, Felicity would never be stupid enough to let something like that happen.” Tam told him, “I gave her the whole banana and condom demo when she was twelve.”

Felicity slapped her hand over her mouth and moaned.

“Crap.”

The tinkling bell over the door to the pharmacy sounded and Felicity looked over to see the same older woman behind the counter that she had talked to the other day.

“Hi sweetie, you still feeling bad? Aisle 2.”

“No, um,” Felicity walked over to the counter, her cheeks flaming.

“Oh. Oh honey,” the older woman looked at her, shook her head, sighed then reached behind her for a familiar pastel box. Before she gave it to her though, she fixed her with a stern eye, “Okay my darling, not to make you feel bad or anything, but we’ve been down this road before. I think it’s time you and I got together and discussed a few other options, don’t you?”

“Yeah, okay, just—just give me a box of whatever,” Felicity said, resigning herself to fate.

“Good, I’m glad to hear it,” the woman said, smiling kindly. “And don’t you feel embarrassed about protecting yourself, not in this day and age. Now what kind do you want?”

“I don’t know,” Felicity said with a frown. “I’ve never actually bought any before.”

“Never?” The woman asked, her penciled-on eyebrows lifting in surprise.

“I’m not—I haven’t—” Felicity flushed crimson, “I’m not really used to this kind of thing. Believe it or not this has been a very unusual week for me...” She rolled her eyes, “Unusual; that’s putting it mildly,” she muttered. “I mean, I know how they work,” she said quickly. “It’s pretty obvious, right? Plus there was this whole demonstration my sister did with a banana...” She dropped her head into her hands, “Just shoot me and put me out of my misery already,” she groaned.

“Oh darling, don’t worry about it; I got a whole aisle full of baby formula and diapers that says you’re not the first good girl to ever get confused about how to disarm a schmeckle. The point is that you’re here now and we’re going to get you better prepared for the next time one of those little petselehs creep up on you, fishtais?” The woman nodded knowingly and stuck her head out so she could do a quick visual sweep of the store. “Okay bubeleh,” she said as she opened the little half door and stepped out onto the floor. “You follow me. There’s no other customers so you and I can have a nice little chat, okay? Just us girls.”

She led her down an aisle with a large locked hard plastic case. Inside was a huge selection of brightly colored packages, creams, liquids, and other items that were all dedicated to one thing.

“You bet; biggest selection in town!” She said proudly. “Now, do you have any allergies?”

“Um, nuts?” Then stopped to slap her hand over her mouth when the old woman began to snicker. “I didn’t mean it like that.”

“Of course not, bubeleh, but I’m still using that one tomorrow night. Jokes about der baitsen always go over big with the boys on the Pride planning committee. Now,” she said getting down to business, “do you have any latex allergies?”

“No. Well, my skin kind of gets red and irritated when I use adhesive latex bandages but I think that’s mostly because I have really sensitive skin.”

“Hmm,” the woman, Roz she reminded herself, seemed to ponder that for a moment. “Well, just to be safe let’s look at the non-latex ones first. I, personally, prefer those anyway. They’re thinner and they transfer body heat better.” She tapped at the plexi-glass, “Now this brand is made from natural lambskin which I never, ever recommend to anyone because it’s not good at preventing STDs or pregnancy but I keep it around because some people still prefer them. Yeder menst hot zein aigeneh meshugass; eh, but what are you going to do? For you I recommend either polyurethane or polyisoprene. What size do you need?”

They come in sizes? Felicity goggled. “Um, I don’t know. I’m not…I don’t…” She reluctantly held her hands apart in a rough estimation, her cheeks flaming. “About this…” her voice trailed off as she saw the look on the other woman’s face. “That’s not what you meant, is it?”

“No, but it’s handy knowledge to have and mazel tov, by the way!”

“Oh God,” she said hiding her face in her hands again and letting out a sob of humiliation.

She patted Felicity’s hand soothingly, “Don’t worry, my darling; you can’t shock me. I may look like an old lady to a young girl like you but back in the 60’s and 70’s this whole neighborhood was like one big orgy. There was so much tits and ass flying around my apartment it’s amazing I ever got anything done.”

Felicity buried her face in her hands. Trust her to find the world’s most inappropriate pharmacist.

“Okay,” she mumbled.

“Since you’ve got a big one on your hands we’ll go ahead and get these,” she flashed her the package as she unlocked the case. “They make it easier on the big fellas. And,” she said reaching for a bottle of viscous liquid, “you’ll need this.”

Felicity looked at the bottle of lube and swallowed. “Um, I don’t—I, um…”

“I know you probably don’t need it, darling, a nice healthy girl like you, but trust me when I say that some days it helps; especially when you’re taking down a Clydesdale. Besides,” she winked at her, “it’s my treat.”

“Thank you,” she said feebly as she followed the other woman back to the checkout.

Felicity got back to her bungalow a little after 11 am, her little white pharmacy bag in hand. As she pulled up the first thing she noticed was all the boxes stacked up on her porch and the moving van outside. She slowly made her way to her door where several men were packing up her things.

“What?” She goggled and instantly began dialing Diggle as she rushed inside. “Who are you people? What are you doing in my house? Get out, all of you!”

Someone snatched her phone from her hand and she spun around to see Bruce standing in the archway leading to her kitchen. “I don’t think that will be necessary, do you?”

She snatched her phone back and gave him the deadliest look in her arsenal. “What the hell are you doing in my house?! Get out!”

Bruce grimaced and turned to the six or so men who were standing in frozen shock as Felicity yelled at him. “Continue what you were doing,” he ordered.

“No, don’t!” Felicity said, turning to the workman who were now looking confused. “Out! All of you! Get out of my house right now!”

“Is there a problem here?” A rather nervous looking man with a clipboard came hurrying through the doorway toward them.

“You’re goddamn right there is!” Felicity turned to him, her blue eyes bright with anger. “This is my house and you people have no right to be here or to touch my things! Get out!”

“But—“ He turned to Bruce, “Mr. Wayne, what—?”

“Don’t talk to him!” Felicity snapped. “He doesn’t live here, I do! This is my house, my things, and if you and your men don’t put my stuff back in the next five minutes and leave I’m pressing charges!”

“But—but—“ the man stuttered, his eyes wide with fear and confusion.

She swung around to Bruce, “And that goes for you, too! You have no right to invade my life like this!”

Bruce looked at her steadily, seeming not the least bit perturbed by her outburst, “I think that I do have every right to be here or have you forgotten?”

She was beyond words at that point. Using everything John Diggle had ever taught her she hauled back and slapped him across the face as hard as she could.

Ow fuck, Felicity thought as pain radiated up her arm and her eyes began to water as she took in a shocked lungful of air. I think I broke something. Fuck fuck fuck oooow fuck!

Bruce didn’t move so much as an inch, his jaw as hard as granite. He turned calmly to the smaller man with the clipboard, “Leave us. Tell your men to take a break while I speak to Ms. Smoak in private.”

“Uh, yes sir,” he said quickly. “Everybody out! That’s lunch!”

Felicity turned on her heel; white pharmacy bag still clenched in her angry fist as she fled into her bedroom and slammed the door behind her, tossing the bag and her phone on the dresser. It was only then that she allowed the tears of pain to flood her eyes as she looked at the palm of her hand.

“Ooooow,” she moaned. “Ow ow ow ow ow…” she headed for her bathroom and held her burning hand under the cold water as she tentatively began feeling for broken bones.

“How badly did you hurt it?” Bruce asked from the doorway, his eyes glued to her hand under the faucet. A part of Felicity’s brain not completely overwhelmed by the stinging pain of her palm noted with some satisfaction the bright red outline of her hand on Bruce’s cheek.

“Get out!” She snapped at him.

He ignored her and walked into the room, his hand taking hers as he examined her rapidly purpling flesh. “I doubt you broke anything although you definitely bruised it. How’s your wrist?”
She pulled her hand away and shoved at his shoulder with the other one as hard as she could, “Get out! What part of ‘get out’ don’t you understand?!” She cried.

“Stop it!” He said angrily, holding her by the shoulders firmly but not with the same bruising pressure he’d used only a few nights previously.

“No!” She said, pushing past him and into her bedroom. She pointed to the door, “This is my house and you’re trespassing so get the hell out!”

“I have absolutely no intention of leaving until the workmen out there finish packing up this entire house and then you’re coming with me to the airport,” Bruce growled low in his throat.

“I’m not going anywhere with you!”

“Oh yes you are,” Bruce said as he advanced on her, a dangerous glint in his eye.

She glared at him, unwilling to give an inch, “You gave me a week!”

“Things change,” he shot back. “I have to be back in Gotham for business and I’m not leaving Starling City without you.”

“So you think that makes it okay for you to just go back on your word and bring strangers into my home without asking?” She asked, her eyes flashing with hellfire.

“If I hadn’t hired the movers you never would have and you know it,” he threw back.

“For your information I was planning on doing that today!”

He arched a superior eyebrow at her protestations, “You’ve known you were leaving since Friday and you still haven’t even told the landlord you were breaking the lease or called to arrange for a moving company to pack up the house.”

“How do you know?” She asked, eyeing him suspiciously. “Oh my God, did you bug my phones on top of everything else?”

“No, I merely had Barbara monitor all incoming and outgoing transmissions and I spoke to your landlord this morning when I was arranging for the movers. I paid the penalty and gave him the next two months’ rent to cover your leasing agreement until he finds new tenants and arranged for him to forward your mail. I also spoke to the car dealership and arranged to have your car returned later today,” he said in a perfectly composed manner, as though he’d every right to do so. “I went ahead and paid any penalties you incurred there as well, no need to thank me.”

“Thank you? Seriously? You expect me to thank you?” She asked incredulously.

“Expect it? No, I wouldn’t go that far,” he said in an almost amused fashion although his eyes still glittered dangerously reminding her that this was still the Batman whether he was in cape and cowl or not.

“You know what, Bruce? You’re a real son of a bitch!” She snapped at him.

“I’ve been told that before,” Bruce rumbled low in his throat. “Doesn’t matter, you’re still coming with me.”

“The hell I am!” She shot back. “You have no say in my life—none! So you can take your caveman bullshit and go straight to hell.”
He took a step closer, his face a hard mask of anger. “This is not a negotiation, remember?”

“You’ve got that right.” Felicity huffed as she folded her arms across her chest, managing not to wince as she put pressure on her hand. “I’m not afraid of you Batman so if you want to take me down then do it, but I’ll be damned if I’m going to spend the rest of my life with you treating me like some kind of—of—thing that you can bully into doing whatever you want and occasionally screw!”

“I’m trying to save your life!” He said angrily, the cold in his eyes replaced now by fire.

“Like I haven’t heard that one today!” She shot back, “I’m so sick and fucking tired of hearing that speech that I’d rather have one of the Huntress’s bolts in my neck than have to go through it again! Who in the hell do you think you are that you have the right to barge into my life and take over everything? Just go!”

“That’s not going to happen!” Bruce’s voice rose to match hers. “You’re the one who decided to play vigilante games, remember? Well this is the cost!”

“Turn me in then!” She returned. “Call the cops, I’ll even confess! Maybe they’ll put me in the cage next to the Joker and he can teach me a few dead baby jokes while I tell him my hard won theories about the intimacy issues of masked vigilantes! We’ll swap toilet wine recipes and take couples shiv carving lessons together!”

“You and I both know that’s not an option,” Bruce said, crowding into her personal space. “You’re my responsibility and I won’t allow anything to happen to you whether you like it or not!”

“I’m an adult, Bruce! I’m not a child and you aren’t my father or my husband! And even if you were you still wouldn’t have the right because I don’t belong to you!” She raged.

“Yes, you do,” he said, lowering his head until they were nearly nose to nose, his jaw clenched and a vein throbbing in his temple. “Whether either of us like it or not, you’ve always belonged to me and I won’t stand by and let you get hurt or killed just because you’re too damned stubborn to see reason!”

“It’s none of your business what I do anymore, Bruce. Or have you forgotten what happened the other day?” Her voice was cold. “I’m not some 19 year old virgin who’s too naïve to know any better. You left! You tried to sneak off like a coward then kicked me out of your life and made it very clear that you don’t give a damn about me, that I’m just a warm body you like to play cat and mouse with! Well, listen up; I’m done playing! I’ve let you have your way for far too long but that’s over now. Get out of my house, get out of my life, and if you ever show your face around me again I will rain hell down on you! Barbara may be good but we both know that I’m better and those threats you keep hurling at me cut both ways.”

“That’s an empty threat and you know it,” Bruce said in a cold but confident tenor. “You might hate me now but you’d never risk endangering the others or the mission.”

“Try me,” she shot back, her eyes hard and angry. “I am so done with you after all of this that any feelings I might have had are long gone! You can’t keep pushing everyone away and expect them not to push back, Bruce! The way I see it, if you have gotten so out of control that you’re able to justify stalking and harassing me like this after telling me twice how little I mean to you, then you’re no better than any of the men you’ve taken down. Did you hear that, Bruce? You’re no better than any of those sadistic creeps out there that you’ve spent most of your life fighting against! That’s what you’ve become! Are you happy now? Are you proud of yourself? You’ve finally become the monster that you set out to be!”

He was livid: his controlled demeanor shattered and he grabbed her arm, hauling her up against him, “That’s not true and you know it!”

She winced and looked first at his hand then into his eyes, not having to say a word.

He released her suddenly, gazing down at her, his eyes swirling with conflicting emotions, “Felicity, I—You know I—”

“You son of a bitch!” Was all she heard and then Bruce was sailing through the air and bouncing off the far wall of her bedroom, the cracked drywall raining plaster onto the floor. He quickly got his feet under him and adopted a defensive stance as he faced his attacker.

Felicity turned to the enraged man in her bedroom in shock and surprise. His chest was heaving, his eyes blazing, and his lips were curled over his teeth in a snarl. “Oliver? What the hell are you doing here?”

“Bad back, huh?” Bruce said, flicking his eyes toward Felicity before addressing Oliver. “Arrow.”

“Batman,” Oliver countered. “You’re trespassing. Starling is my city, not yours.”

“This may be your city but Felicity is my responsibility,” he said as the Bat emerged, his voice lowering to a chilling registry.

“Not anymore, she’s not,” Oliver said with matching intensity.

“I am so not in the mood for this crap,” she snapped at both of them. “If you two want to have a pissing contest then take it outside! Better yet, take it across state lines because I’m sick of the both of you!”

Ignoring her, both men sized each other up, Bruce having a slight height and muscle advantage but with Oliver not far behind.

“Oh shit,” Diggle said from behind Felicity as he jogged up to the doorway as they watched the two men eye one another.

“Felicity, go with Diggle,” Oliver ordered.

“I’m not going anywhere,” Felicity said irritably. “Both of you need to leave my house—now!”

“Felicity, go with Diggle,” Oliver ordered.

“She’s right,” Diggle addressed both men. “You both need to leave while Felicity and I sort out this mess. I was barely able to talk that moving guy out of calling the cops but if you keep this up someone is going to dial 911 and then what are you going to do?”

“I’m not going anywhere until Wayne and I have this out,” Oliver said, his eyes locked on the man in question.

“Agreed,” Bruce said low in his throat as the shadow of the Bat began to creep over his features.

“Well, I’m so glad the two of you can agree about something! Meanwhile how am I supposed to explain to the landlord how the holes got in the walls?” Felicity said to them as she pointed to the damaged drywall.

Bruce addressed Oliver, “Leave while you still can Queen and I won’t come after you.”

“You’d better bring it then because I will be coming after you,” Oliver shot back.

The two men came together in a clash of fists, each hit resounding loudly in the confined space.
There was a blur of punches and both men hit the bed causing the foundation to crack and break as the heavy wooden legs bit deeply into the hardwood and scraped along the floor.

“My bed!” Felicity cried out in distress.

“Step back,” Diggle ordered as he took her by the elbow and placed himself between her and the ensuing melee.

Oliver grabbed the lamp off her nightstand and brought it down hard on Bruce’s upper back causing the other man to grunt in pain before punching him in the jaw and causing the younger man to be thrown into the chaise that collapsed under his weight.

“That’s—that’s—“ she turned to Dig, her fingers pointing helplessly at the damage being done to her home. “Those were antiques! I reupholstered that chair myself!”

Diggle winced as Bruce got in a solid shot and blood from Oliver’s nose sprayed over the duvet and pillows. “Ooh! Uh, maybe your renter’s insurance will—“ Oliver rolled off the bed and grabbed a heavy silver picture frame off the other side table and smashed it against the side of Bruce’s face, “—cover it?” He said with a sympathetic cringe.

Bruce let fly with a power punch to Oliver’s midsection sending him careening into the other nightstand closest to the window causing both to shatter in a splinters of wood and glass. Oliver jumped to his feet and flung himself into Bruce causing the other man to slam into the dresser and forcing Diggle to push Felicity out into the hallway. Getting to his feet he snatched up one of the ornate drawer fronts that had become separated from the dovetailing and slammed it into Oliver’s shoulders causing the other man to grunt in pain as it cracked in two. He followed that by picking up her large antique etched glass jewelry box and threw it at him. Oliver shielded himself with his forearm causing glass and jewelry to scatter along the floor only to then be trampled underfoot as the men grappled with one another.

“Okay, we’re going to the living room,” Diggle said, half pushing, half dragging Felicity into safety.

“But—but—“ Felicity stuttered helplessly as she allowed herself to be removed from the line of fire.

“Trust me, just let them work this out,” he said just before a snow globe came flying toward them to shatter on the wall over their heads. Diggle moved Felicity into the kitchen so they could watch from a safer distance.

Bruce flew backwards out of the bedroom, crashing through the door and creating more cracks in the drywall as he slammed hard against it. Oliver stumbled after him and Bruce managed to deliver a solid kick that sent him careening through the door to the guest room before following him in with blood in his eye.

“Not my clothes! Not my clothes!” Felicity chanted as Diggle had to forcibly hold her back from rushing after them. They could hear the sounds of metal against metal and the sound of material ripping and tearing. “Not my clothes!!!”

Oliver stumbled out of the room with a metal rod in one hand, his face bloody and his clothes ripped as he wiped the blood from his eyes with the very expensive Chado Ralph Rucci dress she’d purchased just the day before. Bruce came stumbling after, one of the rods from her garment racks held aloft like a club, as he swept the scraps of lace, silk, and cotton off from where they had become entangled around him.

There was a clang of metal against metal as the men brought the fight into her living room. Oliver was shoved over the back of the leather couch where he landed on her coffee table causing the wood and glass to splinter and shatter all around him. Bruce vaulted over the couch toward him and Oliver used the end of the bar like a lance, missing the other man and causing the pipe to rip through the leather of her sofa and lodge out the back. Before he could tear it free Bruce used his rod like a bat catching him in the middle and sending him flying into her entertainment center. Her TV crackled and sparked as Oliver jumped away from the damaged electronics and slid toward the fireplace like he was stealing third. He grabbed the seasoned logs that had been stacked neatly in the grate and began hurling them at the Dark Knight.

Diggle shielded Felicity with his own body as Bruce batted the logs aside sending them careening over their heads and into the cabinets above them. The glass and wood cabinet doors shattered and the shelves collapsed causing her plates and glassware to pour out onto the countertop, sink, and floor.

“I can’t—I can’t—” Felicity stuttered wild eyed as she looked around her. She abruptly turned on her heel and headed toward her bedroom.

“Where are you—Felicity?” Dig winced as he kept one eye trained on the fight, trailing behind her.

When she got into the room she eyed the destruction all around her, a small sob escaping. Not one single stick of furniture had been spared. Not that she’d had a lot, but every piece had been bought and selected by her and most she’d refinshed herself before the mission took over her life. Her mind wandered back to the weekends spent at estate sales and antique marts, seminars on faux painting, refinishing, and decoupage at the local hardware store, hours spent on YouTube videos learning how to upholster and walking through fabric shops looking for just the right material to cover the chaise, not to mention the time she’d spent sanding and repairing each and every piece and ordering replacement hardware from reproduction specialists; all gone.

She took a moment to brace herself then stepped over the broken drawers and shattered memories into her walk-in closet to grab her suitcases. “Here!” She said, tossing one large case then another toward Diggle before reaching for a few smaller ones and hauling them out. “Start packing. Anything you can grab just shove in there,” she told him as she began grabbing shoes and stuffing as many of them as she could in a duffle bag. “Oh, and don’t forget my guns! My Glock is still in my purse from the last time we went to the range but the lockboxes and my shotgun are under the bed.”

“Since when do you keep a shotgun under your bed?” Diggle asked, doing a double take but the second he sees her expression, he nods. “Yeah, okay. Got it,” he said walking over to the bed and hauling the three small cases out from under the sagging mattress. He opened them all up to check them before looking back under the bed. “I found your guns and extra ammo but where’s the shotgun?”

“Hidden in between the frame and the mattress in a little cubby—you know what; just skip it,” she said, waving him off. “They can just pack that with my stuff. I’ll just take the Glock and the P99 If you don’t mind, hold on to the .38 I keep in the Lair for me, okay? You can send it on with the rest of my things later.”

“No problem,” he said, tucking the box for her revolver back under the bed and handing her the Walther case and the empty one for her Glock along with several boxes of shells. “You know, they’re lucky one of them didn’t get shot in the ass when they busted your bed. If I had known this is where you were storing your side arms, either Lance or I would have taken you to the sporting goods store for a gun safe.”

“I meant to get one but then I figured if I needed my weapon in the middle of the night…”
“True,” he shrugged as she accepted the cases and stuck them both in the nearest large suitcase, making a note to remove the other gun from her purse before the TSA did. “Can you get what’s in the dresser next?”

“Sure,” Diggle reached for one of the drawers and jumped back as the drawer handle separated from it causing it to slide out and fall to the floor with a bang. “Um,” he said helpfully as he eyed the colorful array of panties and bras spilling over his feet.

“Just start shoving,” she told him again doing her best not to look as she went into her bathroom with a cosmetics case and continued to shout out orders from the other room. “Panties, bras, socks, pajamas,” She stunk her head out of the doorway and tossed him her bathrobe. “This, too. Oh, and plenty of jeans and tee-shirts! They’re in the two bottom drawers.” As she slipped back into the en suite she called out, “How did you guys get here so fast anyway?” She peeked back out with a frown, “I mean I called but Bruce snatched the phone out of my hand and hung it up.”

“No quite,” Diggle said as he started shoving clothes into the bags quickly deciding that speed was more important than neatness. “The line was open so we heard everything. We were in the car headed over here anyway but when he heard you call Wayne ‘Batman’, well, let’s just say traffic laws were broken.”

“Wait, you were headed over here before I called?” Felicity asked as she emerged from the bathroom. “Why?”

“I don’t know,” he said with a snort. “Hell, I’ve given up on trying to figure out whatever this shit is that’s going on between you two. I mean—Hey!” He looked up from what he was doing when he saw her making her way to the door leading out into the hallway with several garment bags draped over one arm while she dragged the shoes and cosmetics cases behind her with the other. “Where are you going?”

“To see if I can salvage any of my other clothes,” she said over the cacophony of grunts, groans, slaps, and crashes that were still echoing within the small space.

“Wait!” He said, dumping an entire drawer into the last case and tossing it out of the way before quickly zipping it up and snatching up both bags to follow her.

Felicity stared at the chaos of her once orderly wardrobe room and it was all she could do not to burst into tears. Taking another deep breath she dropped the garment bags on the floor and waded in.

Diggle peeked inside and looked around, his eyes wide, “Whoa.”

“I’m not even going to bother wading through this stuff,” she said as she tossed him anything that was still hanging off the ground or at least still in its own garment bag. “Put as many sweaters and stuff as you can in the garment bags by your feet and the rest will just have to stay here.”

She gathered up as much as she could as Diggle quickly stuffed the sweaters and the odd dress inside the zippered bags then she began hauling her things out the door and into the hallway.

Another crash from the living room stopped Diggle in his tracks and he took Felicity by the arm, “Uh, why don’t we go back into the bedroom until the coast is clear.”

“Forget it,” Felicity said, steely determination written all over her face. “I’m done and I refuse to watch as they destroy everything I own.”

As she approached the living room she was forced to drop her bags and cover her eyes as one of her laptops bounced off the wall six inches from her face. She took a moment to center herself before picking up the bags and continuing on. “They just had to use my laptop,” she grumbled as she snatched her purse that was, incredibly enough, still on the console table which was, as of yet, intact.
She had very little faith that it would remain so for long however as both men seemed determined to thoroughly demolish the entire neighborhood starting with her once cozy bungalow. She’d caught glimpses of the chaos despite herself and she was pretty sure the owner was going to sue her for damages.

She and Diggle made it as far as the front porch when the nervous man with the clipboard stepped out, his eyes huge as he heard the noises coming from inside.

“Um, is everything alright? Should I call the police now?” Just as he asked the small spindly legged console table and one of her barstools flew out of the doorway and smashed on the stone walkway.
Although they were several feet away he held his clipboard in front of his face as a shield.

“No,” Felicity said in a resigned voice as she set down her bags. “They’ll work it out eventually.”
She turned to him, “You might have to tell your men to wait another forty-five minutes or so and, if they still aren’t done by then, leave Mr. Wayne a text and he’ll have to reschedule.”

“Um, but I still have his card,” he said holding out a shiny black credit card with the bust of a Centurion stamped in silver across the front.

“I’ll take that,” Felicity said, snatching it from his fingers and dropping it in her purse. “Is there anything that I need to sign before I leave?”

“Yes, ma’am,” he handed her the clipboard and the pen. “I just need you to, uh, sign and verify the work order and delivery address.”

She looked at the paperwork with an arched eyebrow as both Diggle and the foreman swiveled their heads toward yet another loud crashing sound. “This isn’t right; my things should be going to the Wayne Towers penthouse suite on the Upper West Side not The Wayne Foundation Building on the East End.”

“Um, Mr. Wayne gave us that address.”

Felicity thought about it a moment before smiling ruefully, “Oh, I just bet he did.” She scribbled out the address on the paperwork and wrote in her father’s address instead. “Please see to it that it’s delivered to the correct address. Also, some of the furnishings and such may have been damaged.”
At that moment a numbered print she had bought at a charity auction flew out of the door way to join the remains of the console table. “Please make a note of any and all damaged furnishings then have your men haul it off. Also try to,” she winced as a loud cracking sound and a flurry of curses reached them, “salvage as many of my clothes and things as you can. Anything torn beyond repair you can trash and anything that is dirty or just has minor tears pack them up and take them to Kurtzberg’s Dry Cleaners on the corner of Weisinger and Papp Street next to Goldstein’s Pharmacy. Tell them it’s a donation from Felicity Smoak. The couple there run a shelter and charity thrift shop in the Glades.”

“Um, are you—“ he winced as a loud grunt of pain echoed down toward them, “sure?”

She nodded, “Just…try to save what you can.” Another loud crash and a puff of dry wall dust blew out the door. “If there’s anything you can save. Thanks.” She picked up the bags again and paused, “Oh, when do you think they’ll arrive?”

“Mr. Wayne said to deliver your furnishings and things to the airport and Wayne Shipping would handle it from there. Depending on how long it takes us to get in there,” another crash and another pained look on his face, “A day? Maybe two?” He looked at her helplessly, “Listen, someone could really get hurt in there, we should really--!"

“It’s okay,” Dig said, cutting him off with a confident and laid back smile. “They’re old friends; you know how it is with guys. They’re just letting off some steam.”

“Letting off steam?” The guy said dubiously. They all stopped and looked as a kitchen knife flew out of the open door and lodged deeply into one of the posts on the porch.

Felicity sighed and opened her purse pulling out her wallet. “Great,” she said, looking at the forty bucks she had stashed in there. “Hang on for a second.” She put down the bags and headed back inside.

“Wait,” Dig said, catching her arm. “Don’t go in there.”

“I’ll be fine,” she said, taking a breath and stomping back into the once charming little house that was now a warzone.

She peered inside and winced. They had taken out the entire bar and one of her barstools was hanging from the ceiling fan and the other was lodged in a broken window. She looked toward the living room to see that Bruce had Oliver in a headlock then winced in sympathy as Oliver grabbed the other man’s nuts and twisted causing Bruce to cry out and send an elbow onto his back in response.

She grabbed Bruce’s coat off the shattered remains of the bar and dug into his pockets until she found his billfold. Opening it up she pulled out a large wad of bills and tossed the wallet on the floor before walking back out again. She didn’t bother counting; she just peeled off some of the bills and walked up to the man, shoving it at him. “Here.”

“Um,” the man looked at the hundred dollar bills dumbly.

“Take it,” she ordered. “That should buy them a couple of hours of playtime.”

“I don’t know…” he said slowly, looking at her in confusion.

She peeled off a few more bills and added it to the pile. “No cops,” she told him.

“Okay,” he said, taking the cash. “But what if—“

“If they get hurt then it’s on them,” she told him as she shoved the rest of the bills into her pocket.
“Are we done here?” She asked. He nodded in response staring at the money in his hand. “Great, and thank you,” Felicity said, picking up her bags and walking down the steps with Diggle beside her. “And make sure to charge Mr. Wayne for any clean-up costs or overtime.” She said with a smile as she walked to her car, the moving supervisor still gaping at her in shock, several one hundred dollar bills clutched in his hand.

“Where’d you get the wad?” Diggle asked in amusement. “You must have handed that guy at least a thousand dollars.”

“Stole it from Bruce’s wallet,” she told him before putting down the bags so she could reach into her pocket and pulled out the rest of the cash. She peeled off roughly half of the remaining bills for herself and handed the rest to Dig, “Here.”

“What’s this for?” He asked, taking the cash.

“Just in case you have to bribe the guy again,” she told him. “The rest I’m keeping for cab fare and aggravation.”

“Speaking of mugging Bruce Wayne,” Diggle glanced at her, “Was that an AmEx Black card you put in your purse?”

“Yup,” Felicity said as she unlocked her trunk. “Although, technically, it’s called a Centurion Card.”

“I always thought those things were an urban myth,” he said rocking back on his heels.

“Nope,” She said taking a minute to lean her hip against the car.

“So…what are you planning on doing with Batman’s unlimited credit card?” He asked with a slight upward twitch of the corners of his mouth.

“Bruce Wayne’s card then, sorry.”

“Not his either,” Felicity said with a wicked gleam in her eye. “The way I see it possession is 9/10 of the law and, what do you know, it’s in my possession. Hey Dig, how about I buy you an island if you help me get my bags in the car.”

“Damn girl,” he chuckled as he lifted the largest of the suitcases and maneuvered it into her tiny trunk, “I always knew you were something special but you are stone-cold fearless.” When the trunk was full he opened her car door and wedged the rest of them into her backseat, “So…where to now?”

“First I need to talk to my landlord down the street and then I would really appreciate it if you could follow me as I drop off my car,” she asked. “I’m going to need a ride to the airport after that but I’ll understand if you can’t do it.”

Diggle looked torn for a minute, “I really should get back in there and see how Oliver is doing…”

She smiled weakly and shrugged, “That’s okay, I understand. I can call a cab from the dealership.”

He glanced once more towards the tiny bungalow where the moving supervisor was staring inside the doorway with a worried expression on his face and sighed. “Fuck it,” Diggle said gruffly. “Their dumb asses can figure it out on their own. Do you already have a ticket and everything?”

“No—“ she shut her eyes in frustration, “Goddamn it, my phone!”

“Don’t sweat it,” he said, reaching into his jacket. “Take mine and I’ll ship yours to you if it survives the vigilante tornado.”

“Thanks but that’s okay,” she said with a wicked gleam in her eye. “I’ll just let Bruce buy me another phone later but first he’s buying me a plane ticket and then a whole new wardrobe when I land in Gotham. Sure you don’t want to come with?” She asked, reaching into her purse and flashing the black coated titanium card. “First class all the way.”

“Tempting, but I get the feeling that pissing off a guy like Bruce Wayne would be a bad idea. I’m not quite as pretty as you are so I doubt he’d be in a forgiving mood if I started jet-setting on his dime.” He grinned and nodded toward her Cooper. “You take care of your business and I’ll meet you at the BMW dealership. It’s the one on Lemire, right?”

“Right, thanks,” she smiled at him before getting in to drive over to Mr. Kreisberg’s house which was just down the road near the gate. She quickly explained that Mr. Wayne was doing a bit of remodeling that may have gotten somewhat messy. She told him that she was late for her flight and gave him Bruce’s credit card information to pay for any and all damages. She then gave him the correct address (and not the address to his penthouse in the Wayne Foundation Building) so that he could forward her mail.

A little less than an hour later she had a non-stop First Class ticket in her hand, courtesy of Bruce, and was saying goodbye to Diggle. She hugged and kissed him, promised to call him when she could, then handed him a card. “Look, I know Oliver isn’t going to want to use any resources affiliated with um, you know who,” she said mindful of the fact they were standing in the middle of a crowded airport, “but if I’m not going to be there then you need someone helping you.”

“What’s this?” He asked looking at a long string of letters and numbers printed on the card.

“Oracle, she’s a friend of mine. She’s my counterpart, you could say; she does for him what I do for you guys.” Felicity explained in a low tone. “If you need eyes you enter this passkey into the file labeled ‘Watchtower’ on the LAIR workstation. It will connect you to her. I’ll give her the heads up so she’ll know to expect you.”

“I don’t know about this, Felicity,” Dig said slowly. “Besides, she’s in Gotham, how can she possibly help us from 3000 miles away?”

Felicity took him by the arm and lead him to an area that offered a little more privacy. “I’m going to tell you a secret because, well, since the cat’s out of the bag it doesn’t matter anyway.” She took a deep breath, “The project I helped Bruce with, the one I consulted on—did Oliver tell you about it?”

“He mentioned something before everything hit the fan, yeah. He said something about how you developed some software for Wayne. I’m guessing it was for his other business though, right?” He looked at her curiously.

“I wrote an AI operating system known as ‘Watchtower’ for him. Because I developed both systems using the same base code, LAIR and Watchtower are compatible. With this key code,” she tapped the card Diggle was still holding in emphasis, “Oracle can tap into every system linked to LAIR which means she can hack every traffic cam, every police file, and every security and ATM cam that I was able to. It will be as though I’m sitting at my desk, same as always, chatting away in your ear only it will be Oracle instead.”

“Do you trust her?” Dig asked seriously.

She nodded, “With my life and you can as well, I promise.” She glanced up as the announcement for her flight echoed around them, “I’ll call you or you can call me when I get another phone. Don’t forget, Gotham is three hours ahead of us so just keep that in mind, okay? No disturbing my beauty sleep.”

“Got it, and here,” he said, handing her a small baggie of what looked like tea packets.

“They have tea in Gotham, but thanks,” Felicity said, taking the baggie from him with a frown.

“Not this brand,” he said. “Before we headed for your place I grabbed some of Oliver’s herbs from my emergency kit. He mentioned the bruises, so…”

“Thanks,” she said, touched. “They aren’t that bad but this will definitely help.” She looked at the tiny sachets one more time before slipping them into her purse. “It was pretty smart of you to disguise them as tea bags.”
“Well, it’s better than leaving them loose in a baggie then having to convince TSA that it isn’t dope and running the risk of a government issued enema.”

“True. Thanks John, I’ll call you soon. I promise.” They hugged and said their goodbyes then Felicity turned away from him and toward an uncertain future alone.
Chapter Eighteen

Bruce sat back on his haunches prepared to spring back into action. His ribs were on fire, his balls ached, and he was actually getting tired; a testament to the skill of his opponent. From across the room he watched as Queen wiped some blood out of his eyes, his own breathing rapid and pained although he looked more than willing to get back into the scrap if Bruce made so much as a move. Despite himself he had to give the man his due. Queen was no amateur, he could really fight. He’d also had League training; that much was clear from the fact that he was still holding his own.

“Ra’s taught you well or was it one of his minions who trained you on the island?” He heard himself ask.

Oliver squinted through a haze of blood and the ringing in his ears from one punch too many, “Ra’s?”

“Ra’s al Ghul. Don’t bother pretending, Queen. I know you trained with the League. The only question is if it was the League of Assassins or the League of Shadows because I know Lian Yu was a training ground for the Assassins but you fight using Shadow techniques.”

“I was on Lian Yu and I’m familiar with the League of Assassins and Ra’s al Ghul but I wasn’t trained by them nor was I ever a member unless you call spending five years dodging those bastards and their bullets training! I’ve been investigating links he has to Starling but he’s no friend of mine.” Oliver eyed him warily, “What’s your connection to the League?”

“What’s yours?” He shot back. “If all you were doing was dodging bullets then why did Nyssa bring her entire honor guard down here to help you with the Blood Army a couple of years back?”

Oliver’s jaw clenched and his fists balled at his sides again, “Someone I know was formerly associated with the League and called them in; I had no hand in it but I wasn’t about to turn down their help even if it meant leaping from the frying pan into the fire later.” He shot him a narrow look, “Speaking of which, if you’re so invested in Felicity’s safety then where the hell were you two years ago?”

Bruce ignored his question. “And Felicity never spoke to you about Ra’s al Ghul even though she knew about your time on the island?”

Oliver snorted humorlessly, sitting back a bit and seeming to relax his guard even though Bruce knew better. “There’s a lot of things Felicity hasn’t told me but, to be fair, I don’t talk about the island much.” His eyes took on a haunted quality, “It’s not exactly something I like to revisit.” His eyes met Bruce’s, “Who’s Ra’s al Ghul to you?”

“If you’re telling the truth then it shouldn’t really matter to you, should it?” Bruce shot back.

“Maybe, maybe not,” Oliver said in the same tone, “but I’ve got a mission of my own here in Starling that’s still somehow connected to what went down on that island and, like I said, Ra’s is a part of that. His name first came up in connection to Merlyn and the Glades disaster and keeps coming up time and time again. The fact that you’re so interested in this guy tells me that I should be as well and it would be nice to have some real answers for once.”

At that moment the movers began to walk back in led by the foreman who was still clutching his clipboard as they goggled at the mess the two men had made.

“Holy…” the clipboard guy said as he slipped on some of the rubble and had to rebalance himself. “Uh, Mr. Wayne, do you require,” he flinched as the one remaining unbroken cup in the cabinet gave it up and committed suicide by sink, “assistance?”

“No, we’re good,” Bruce sighed, getting up from the floor and stretching his muscles. “Don’t worry about finishing today but I’ll still pay you for your time. Come back tomorrow with a bigger crew and pack up what you can,” he surveyed the wreckage around him dubiously, “if anything’s left, and make a note of what was damaged and send me a list. I’ll call down to Wayne Shipping and have them send in a maintenance crew to clean up the worst of it and start on repairs to the walls and floors.” He looked around again and muttered under his breath, “Although it might be easier just to buy the damn place.”

“Yes sir, um, Ms. Smoak already told us that’s what you’d want to do.”

Bruce nodded, “She was right, she usually is.” He looked up at him as he rubbed his hand across the back of his neck, “Just put it all on my card. You still have it, right?”

Oliver snickered then got up to cross the room and dig around inside the freezer. He pulled out a bag of frozen peas for himself and tossed Bruce some corn as he pressed the plastic bag to the back of his neck, “You’re screwed now, Wayne. I know for a fact that Felicity knows how to spend a couple of million bucks when she’s feeling motivated.”

“That’s fine,” Bruce said with a pained look as he pressed the bag of corn to the goose-egg coming up on his temple. “You can go now,” he dismissed them and they filed out. “I guess I should talk to the landlord; convince him to settle now before someone decides to sue.” He looked around with a squint as his eye was quickly beginning to swell, “This shit is easier when you’re suited up; no one ever asks how you intend to fix everything before you leave the scene.”

“True,” Oliver said as he pulled out his cell and began dialing.

“Calling Felicity?” Bruce asked wearily as he reached down to pick up his billfold. He opened it and frowned, “I had a little over three thousand dollars in there.” He made an annoyed sound, “She left the rest of my cards but she took all the cash. She’s definitely pissed.”

“Yes, and I’ve got a feeling she’s not going to be all that happy with me either. Luckily I left my wallet in my back pocket,” he grinned then stopped. He reached into the back of his trousers and nodded. “Good,” Oliver said in relief as he pressed the phone to his ear. Both men looked up as the ringtone Felicity used for Oliver’s phone (Holding Out For A Hero by Bonnie Tyler) sounded from the bedroom. “I thought Dig took her out of here.”

They both headed back to the bedroom, working their way through the mess as they went. Oliver caught a glimpse of Felicity’s guestroom and shook his head, “Great, there goes my credit rating,” he winced before walking through the shattered remains of her bedroom door to find the source of the ring tone.

Bruce looked in the room as he came up behind him and his jaw tightened. “Yeah, well, I don’t know what she’s planning on doing to you but I have a sinking feeling that she’s going to be testing to see if my AmEx Black really does have an unlimited credit limit.”

Oliver grabbed her phone from on top of the dresser and tossed it to him. “She left it. It’s not really like her but I can see how it would get lost in the confusion.”

“That, or she didn’t want us tracking her,” Bruce said with an aggrieved tone as he looked around the room.

Oliver nodded and started dialing again, “I’ll call Dig and make sure she’s okay. She’s probably with him at Big Belly Burger or Mr. Chow’s eating her way through half the menu.”

Bruce arched his eyebrow and nodded as he reached for the white sack that had been sitting next to the phone on the dresser. “She does like to eat when she’s stressed.”

“Or pissed off, whatever the case may be. Hey Dig? Everything okay?” Oliver asked as he moved Bruce opened the sack and looked inside with a frown then pulled out the objects inside curiously. First the box of large sized condoms, a small bottle of Astroglide, and—he paused.

“What’s that?” Oliver asked looking up curiously then swore under his breath, “Um Dig, I’ll call you back.” He walked over to Bruce and looked down at the colorful box of emergency contraception as he rubbed his hand over his mouth. “Shit.”

Bruce closed his eyes as he cursed his own irresponsible behavior before something occurred to him. “What’s it got to do with you?”

Oliver scratched his beard ruefully, “Damn it, I wasn’t thinking and I should have. She told me that the last guy she’d been with was—” he glanced up at Bruce. “Well, anyway, I just assumed she was on the pill. I didn’t take into consideration that it’d been over four years for her.”

“When exactly did this happen?” Bruce asked in a dangerously low tone.

“Last night,” Oliver said, his own eyes narrowing. “Why, what’s it matter to you? She said you broke it off with her years ago.”

Bruce rubbed his hand across his forehead and moved to sit down on the corner of the mattress that was still being supported by the broken frame. He sat his elbows on his knees and hung his head, shaking it ruefully. “The first time, yeah.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” Oliver asked, a bit of the Arrow creeping into his tone. “When was the second time?”

“Saturday,” he said without looking at him.

“Wait,” Oliver frowned as though doing the math in his head, “But that means…” He closed his eyes and tilted his head back, “Now a lot of what she was trying to tell me is suddenly starting to make sense.” He looked over at Bruce appraisingly, “What now?”

Bruce picked up a small piece of glass off the ruined duvet and tossed it aside ruefully, “I don’t know.” He looked up at him, “Are you and she…together?”

Oliver leaned against the dresser and crossed his arms over his chest. “No, and I doubt she’ll ever want me back after the way I left things with her, not to mention the whole ‘destroying everything she owns’ thing. You?”

“I don’t know but I’d venture a guess that since she threatened to rain hell down on my head if I ever so much as looked at her again I’d say probably not,” he sighed and gestured toward the other objects on the dresser. “Given her other purchases I’m thinking she intends to stay here with you no matter how I feel about it.”

“She’s not,” Oliver said quietly and at his curious look he gestured with his cell. “Dig just told me. He took her to turn in her car at the dealership and then dropped her off at the airport. She’s on her way to Gotham.”

“Why would she still be going to Gotham if the two of you…?” He mused curiously.

“That would be me again,” Oliver said reluctantly. “You might be a world class asshole but you were right about one thing; I can’t keep her safe. Not anymore.”
Bruce looked up, his gaze sharp as the Batman began to creep back into his posture, “What do you mean?”

Oliver looked around the ruined flat and got to his feet. “Tell you what, let’s get out of here and take this conversation to my place.”

“Your office?”

“Not quite.”

“You call your HQ the Lair?”

“Felicity does,” Diggle told him. “She just started saying ‘the Lair’, as in, ‘I have to run it through the Lair workstation,’ and it just stuck.”

Oliver shook his head, “I know, sounds like a cheesy Bond villain hang-out. I kept telling her to stop but…”

“Lair or LAIR?” Bruce asked, looking at the servers and monitors at Felicity’s workstation.

“Is there a difference?” Diggle said in confusion.

“Possibly,” Bruce said noncommittally as he looked around the Arrow’s Lair in the Foundry carefully from his seat near the workstation. The design and layout felt…familiar. “Felicity designed this space along with your system, didn’t she?”

“Yeah,” Oliver said then smiled ruefully, “Let me guess; same as yours right?”

He shook his head, “Not quite. Mine’s bigger and has more bats and stalactites but the basic use of the space is similar only much more efficient. It’s very…” He tried to think of the right word but he could only come up with one, “Felicity.”

“Wait, did you say bats and stalactites; as in a Batcave?” Diggle grinned from his place at the arm of the large leather couch at Oliver who, in turn, shook his head as he made an aggravated sound deep in his throat.

“What?” Bruce asked, noticing their exchange.

“Just more Felicity-sized pieces falling into place,” Oliver said, running a hand through his short hair. “Felicity sometimes refers to the Lair as the ‘Arrow Cave’. We never got the joke until now.”

“I always assumed she meant it like ‘Man Cave’, but I guess not…” Diggle chuckled.

“So how did this happen?” Bruce asked, despite himself. “What Felicity said to me that night on the roof; she recruited you or vice versa?”

“Both,” Diggle answered before Oliver could.

“What does that mean?” He asked, steadily watching them for any sign of deception.

“You could say I sort-of recruited her,” Oliver said clearing his throat. “But after the Glades fell I gave up on the Arrow and she rebuilt the Lair then came after me.”

“You said you didn’t know of her connection to me and yet you recruited her for your mission?”
Bruce asked, still not sure if he could fully trust the other man. “That’s a bit of a coincidence, don’t you think?”

“Again, the pieces are slowly falling into place the more we learn about our girl.” Bruce wasn’t sure he liked the idea of Queen referring to her as ‘their girl’ but allowed him to continue. “After I got back from the island and began my mission, Diggle and I needed help retrieving some information from a laptop that had been shot up. I went to Walter Steele to ask if he knew someone I could show my laptop to that was trustworthy and discreet so he sent me to Felicity.” Oliver leaned back into the cushions of the plush leather couch that was nearly identical to the one they’d destroyed in her house. “At the time I didn’t question it, Walter’s word was enough, but now that I understand a bit more of Felicity’s past and Walter’s connection to her family I know why he sent me to her.”

Bruce frowned, something still didn’t make sense. “So you took a bullet-ridden laptop to a perfect stranger and you never questioned the fact that she didn’t even blink?”

“Worse than that,” Diggle snorted. “When she asked what happened he told her he spilled a latte on it.”

“And when she pointed out the bullet holes I told her the coffee shop was in a bad part of town,” Oliver said as he scratched his beard, color rising on his cheeks. “I was going for funny and charming but I don’t think she bought it.”

“And then you, what, recruited her just like that?” He asked, still frowning.

Oliver shifted uncomfortably, “No, uh…there was some other stuff.”

“Sports drinks in syringes, security key fobs and scavenger hunts; he was weaving so much bullshit his eyes were turning brown!” Diggle was snickering beside him on the couch, his grin splitting his face in two. “Every time he’d spout that shit she’d give him a look and I’d be sweating balls and thinking this motherfucker is going to get me thrown in jail! Oh man, you have no idea how good it feels to be able to tell this stuff to someone besides Felicity. The things I’ve had to put up with…”

Oliver cleared his throat and shot the bodyguard a dirty look, “Well, as I was saying, a few other things happened and we’d go to Felicity for tech support. She never questioned it, so it became a kind of game between us. A few times she’d balk or have questions but then she’d drop it and we’d be good again. Then she came to me one day with a book she’d been given by Walter and asked me for help.” He paused, “Well, she asked me to ask the Arrow for help to be precise. He’d been kidnapped and she’d been working on a private research project for him, something Walter warned her could be dangerous. I knew she suspected I was the Arrow, probably since day one, but she was still pretending and I was willing to go with it in order for her to have some room for plausible deniability.”

He shifted a bit in his chair before continuing, “I recognized the book she gave me. My father had given me a copy of it before he—” Oliver’s face darkened at the memory, “before he died. He’d told me that it was a book of sins he’d committed and asked me to right his wrongs. When I wondered how it made its way into Walter’s possession she told me that it was my mother’s. One night while I was investigating the book I confronted my mother in my Arrow gear and she shot me. It was my fault,” he said, looking up at Bruce. “Her husband had been kidnapped, her other husband murdered, and there had already been a kidnapping attempt against me. Also I had been making my way through the list and a few of my targets had lost their lives in the process and she didn’t know who I was under the hood. It was self-defense but I was still hurt pretty bad. I had no way of getting to Diggle or the Lair and I crawled into the back seat of Felicity’s car. She saved me by bringing me to the Lair and helping Diggle patch me up. Afterwards she agreed to help us until Walter was found but she wound up staying.”
Diggle, who had been nodding as he was talking, spoke up, “Back then we were so on mission, so focused, we never questioned it. She fit into the team so well I guess we didn’t want to. I should have caught on since I was Special Forces but she acted so much like a trained operator that it was like I was back in country and she was just another CIA handler or field support.”

“She has a tendency to get under your skin like that,” Oliver murmured under his breath and Bruce, despite himself, had to agree with the sentiment.

“So she wasn’t quite lying when she said she was at the center of your team,” Bruce said, as he thought back to their discussion on the roof. “I’m guessing you and Mr. Diggle both share the Arrow identity but are there others or was that an obfuscation on her part?”

“It’s just me and Diggle although we do have others on our team.” His eyes flickered towards Bruce. “Have you ever heard of a serum known as ‘Mirakuru’?”

“Can’t say I’m familiar.”

Oliver leaned back on the couch again, “On the island there was a stash of a super soldier serum known as ‘Mirakuru’. It’s Japanese meaning—“

“The Miracle,” Bruce supplied.

Oliver nodded, “My sister’s ex-boyfriend, Roy Harper, was exposed. He was a former street gang member the Arrow recruited as an informant. After things got dangerous I tried to wave him off because I didn’t want him in the line of fire but the kid is like a pit bull; once he latches on you can’t shake him off. After he was exposed he started exhibiting abilities like enhanced strength and rapid healing. We’ve been watching him since then, trying to decide if the Mirakuru only affected him physically or if there were other side effects.” He sighed and planted his elbows on his knees. “Other people who have used the Mirakuru have gone insane but, after some initial problems, he seems to be tolerating it well. Our only concern now is the fact that he’s still a stupid kid with a temper and the power to really hurt someone if he doesn’t watch it. We had a falling out a while back and he took off for almost a year to work through it on his own but it was more than he could handle by himself. About six months ago he came back so we could try training him again but...” Oliver’s face tightened and he grimaced, a dark look passing over his face.

“He, uh, got hurt pretty bad on a mission and he’s only just started training again,” Diggle finished grimly. “The kid’s strong but he’s a real pain in the ass who still thinks he knows something even though he’s still just a punk. He’s hardheaded, undisciplined, unfocused, lacks impulse control; Oliver and I have been trying to knock some sense into him but it’s kind of tough finding enough hours in the day.”

“We’re managing,” Oliver said, although the strain was still there in his voice. “This time he’s determined to stick it out so we can make sure he stays stable. If we can get him to control his anger and redirect it, then we can control the emotional instability caused by the Mirakuru.”

“Not a bad plan,” Bruce conceded. “And this Quentin Lance with the SCPD? He’s aware of your connection to the Arrow?”

“Yes,” Diggle said, eyeing Oliver. “For a while now.”

“How long is a while?”

Both men answered at the same time but gave two very different answers.

“Six months,” Oliver answered.
“At least a year; probably two,” Dig responded.

“Which is it; six months or two years?” Bruce asked as he watched both men’s expressions carefully.

“He knows now for sure but he’s not admitting to knowing it until we officially read him in six months ago so we’re not pushing it,” Oliver said leading Bruce to believe this was a matter frequently debated between the two. “Now he’s fully in the team although we still try to keep him in the periphery as much as we can since he’s already taken a few hits professionally because of his association with the Arrow. Still, he comes to the Foundry regularly and he knows all of us. Before six months ago he would just talk around the issue of who we were and keep it all indirect so that he wouldn’t have to commit perjury if worse came to worst, but he’s known about Felicity for years and he’s been sympathetic to our cause almost since the beginning although we had a bit of a rocky start. In the beginning, he and Felicity developed a kind of shorthand with each other where they’d refer to the Arrow as ‘our mutual friend’ just in case the line wasn’t secure.” He sighed, “He’s not a big fan of mine but he loves Felicity like she’s his own kid; they’ve developed a weird kind of bond over the last three years, in the last six months especially. He’d never do anything to jeopardize her. The man nearly lost his job and his freedom and still refused to give her up.”

Something about what he just said caught his attention, “What happened six months ago?” Queen’s expression froze and Bruce narrowed his gaze, “You said that their relationship has gotten closer especially in the last six months; why is that?”

“She saved his life,” the other man said shortly but refused to elaborate.

Diggle interceded before he could question him further, “Look, all you need to know is that if Lance thinks there’s even the possibility of Felicity getting arrested for this then he’d be taking her underground himself. We trust him and can guarantee you that she’s safe with him.”

“And yet you told me earlier that Felicity was no longer safe here; why?”

“We’ve been exposed,” Oliver told him, a hint of aggravation coloring his tone. “Isabel Rochev tried to recruit Felicity to join some kind of private vigilante army Stellmoor is putting together and she knew things about our mission she shouldn’t have including my role in it and that Felicity was our tech.”

“Who else knows about your identity other than the people you’ve already mentioned?”

“Too many,” Dig muttered.

“Not many,” Oliver said, his mouth tightening. “We have an association with another vigilante called ‘The Flash’ in Central City but we don’t cross paths often. Helena Bertinelli knows as does Black Canary but if Helena was going to expose me she would have done so before now.”

“What about this ‘Black Canary’?” Bruce asked. “She’s popped up on my radar but only on the periphery.”

“It’s possible that she’s the one who exposed us,” Oliver said in a low tone, his eyes hooded and dark. “However, that said, she’s still an asset until proven otherwise. She’s the one who mentioned the name ‘Ra’s al Ghul’ to me and she was not looking forward to running into him if he showed up. She was a member of the League but cut ties with them a while back and said there was reason to believe that Ra’s al Ghul would be interested in Merlyn and the Glades attempt. Felicity said Isabel talked about her specifically and said she was currently being bankrolled by Stellmoor but I can’t confirm or deny that.”
“Then there’s the ARGUS connection,” Diggle said slowly.

“ARGUS?” Bruce said sharply.

Diggle glanced at him, “You know them?”

“Amanda Waller and I are acquainted,” Bruce said grimly.

“Amanda does get around,” Oliver said dryly.

“I take it Waller and you have a personal history?” Bruce asked.

“We have history,” Oliver told him. “I wouldn’t go so far as to label it ‘personal’ but it’s close enough.”

“She’s a warm and sunny sweetheart, isn’t she?” Diggle said dryly.

“Felicity mentioned that there may be some crossover with ARGUS and Stellmoor. Waller first tried to recruit Diggle three years ago when his ex-wife who was one of their overt field agents got into some trouble during an assignment. She was tracking someone and got caught and thrown into a Russian gulag,” Oliver told him. “We managed to break her out with the help of some old friends.”

“Bratva friends?” Bruce asked casually.

“You’re aware of my connection to Bratva,” it wasn’t a question.

“I take a keen interest in organized crime and the Russian mob has been trying to make inroads into Gotham for a while now,” Bruce told them. “Believe me when I say that finding out you were a captain in good standing with the Bratva did not reassure me of Felicity’s safety.”

“Yes, well, sometimes the job requires that we dance with the devil,” Oliver said unapologetically. “Keeping a good name with the right people has saved more lives than I can count.”

“I’ve been known to do a bit of dancing on occasion myself,” Bruce conceded. “Continue your story.”

Oliver’s jaw tightened slightly at the imperious way Bruce was directing the conversation, or rather interrogation, but still he pushed on. “It was supposed to be just Dig, Felicity, and me on the plane but Isabel showed up at the last second and forced her way on the flight.”

“She never said jack about Lyla being on the return trip either,” Diggle said as he turned to Oliver. “I always figured you smoothed that out with her.”

Oliver shook his head, “She was so focused on torturing Felicity she never looked twice at her.”

“She did what to Felicity?” Bruce asked sharply.

“Not literally,” Diggle snorted. “She’s a stone cold bitch and she likes to take it out on Felicity.” He suddenly smiled, “Until recently that is.”

“What changed?” Bruce asked, watching the byplay between the men. Oliver looked almost chagrinned and Diggle looked almost giddy with amusement.

“She and Felicity…” Oliver’s voice trailed off as he ran a hand over his mouth.

“She laid the bitch out cold, that’s what,” Diggle laughed.
“Felicity physically attacked her?” Bruce asked, his eyebrows shooting up in undisguised shock.

“Isabel is…” Oliver cleared his throat, “somewhat territorial and baiting Felicity was a form of entertainment for her. She made some remarks that went too far and Felicity punched her.”

“A one/two combo punch just like I taught her,” Diggle grinned. “I still want a copy of the footage.”

“It’s still not funny, Dig,” Oliver said wearily.

“No, it’s not, but it’s about damn time someone put an end to the crap that woman has been pulling with her. You should have nipped that in the bud first thing. No one should have to deal with the bullshit Isabel kept saying to her; had it been anyone except Felicity they would have buried you up to your neck with workplace grievances and lawsuits,” Dig shot back, then muttered, “Besides, if you had kept it in your pants with that shark maybe she wouldn’t have had to.”

“Enough Diggle,” Oliver warned him.

“You and the Rochev woman were involved?” Bruce asked. “Any chance that you might have been the leak? That she might have drugged you before your encounter?”

“It was one time and I left as soon as it was over. I never lost consciousness,” Oliver told him. He then turned his eyes toward his partner, “And the only reason I had sex with her in the first place was to distract her from the mission. My sleeping with the ‘shark’ bought us a few hours to get done what we needed to do.”

Bruce nodded, “I’ve…been there.” His lips tightened into a grimace before he continued. “Did she try to recruit Felicity before or after their altercation?”

“After,” Oliver answered. “Struck me as strange, too. That’s why I didn’t take it seriously at first. I thought Isabel was baiting her and Felicity was just overreacting.”

“Felicity may ramble when she’s nervous but she doesn’t overreact to anything when it comes to the mission. If she comes to you with intel you can take it to the bank,” Bruce told him sharply.

“There were extenuating circumstances,” Oliver flushed and gritted his teeth angrily. “And while I appreciate the insight, I think I know Felicity pretty well after more than three and a half years of working together, thank you.”

“Do you?” Bruce asked, raising a questioning eyebrow in his direction.

“Yes,” he snapped.

“Then tell me; what do you know about Felicity?” Bruce asked. “Because, according to you, she didn’t even tell you her last name until a few days ago.”

“Look——” Oliver started to get up from his seat and Diggle put a calming hand on his shoulder.

“Hey, let’s just calm down,” he told both men sharply. “If you two mess up the Lair I’m not cleaning it up so let’s just chill out and get back to business.”

Both men eyed each other tensely before Bruce broke the standoff.

“You’re right; I…apologize,” Bruce said reluctantly. “It was a cheap shot.”

“Fine,” Oliver said, although his short tone implied it was anything but.
Diggle shifted on the couch, his hand still clasped to Oliver’s shoulder as if holding him down. “How did Felicity get involved in your mission?” Diggle asked him curiously as Oliver got his temper under control. “She was what? Eighteen, nineteen?”

Bruce flushed, “Nineteen. I recruited her when she was eighteen but she left when she was nineteen.”

“That’s kind of young, isn’t it? I know her dad’s the CEO of your company but, still, she was just a kid,” Diggle said with a frown.

“She wasn’t a kid,” Bruce said a little sharply then cleared his throat, averting his gaze to the floor. “Sorry, I didn’t mean to snap.” He ran his fingers through his hair and sighed, “Felicity started MIT when she was thirteen years old and had a doctorate under her belt by the time I recruited her. Her research into decryption protocols using AI theorem was and still is light years beyond anything anyone else is doing and I wanted her to rebuild Watchtower for me after I read an article she published based on her graduate thesis.”

“Felicity has a doctorate?” Diggle asked, looking mildly impressed. “She never told me she had a PhD.” He turned to Oliver with a slight upturn of his lips, “Damn, no wonder she was so pissed about being your secretary.”

“You didn’t know that?” Bruce frowned.

“I knew she went to MIT but she doesn’t talk about her past much,” Diggle told him. He looked at Oliver, “You knew though, right?”

He shot him a dirty look, refusing to answer the question. “So you just went up to a teenaged girl and asked her to be your tech?” Oliver drawled, obviously still a bit peeved.

“No,” Bruce said with a hint of irritation. “I asked her to consult on a project but I never intended to pull her in. I just explained what I needed using vague language and said it was a side project I was working on. I told her I wanted her to consult for WayneTech, I had no idea she’d be able to figure it out that quickly but she’s a genius and I shouldn’t have underestimated her. Thirty seconds into my spiel she just looked me straight in the eye, told me she knew I was Batman, and then offered to build the system for me.” He scowled, “I tried to dissuade her but she pretty much had me dead to rights so I just let her in.”

Diggle snorted and both men looked at him, “Oh come on, neither of you find it hilarious that you both approached her in nearly the same way and she was able to figure out what both of you were into in under a minute?” At the matching grimaces that appeared on both men’s faces he began to chuckle, “Damn, that girl; I swear if she wanted to she could be downright dangerous. Honest to God, there are days when I think it should be her under the hood!”

Ignoring the other man’s chuckles, Bruce eyed both men carefully for his next question. “Were you aware that someone was targeting Felicity? That she had a hit put out on her?”

Both men tensed, the moment of levity disappearing in a flash. “When?” Oliver demanded, his expression livid.

“Do you know who ordered it?” Diggle asked, his jaw clenched and his eyes showing his concern as well as anger.

“Is that why you came here? To investigate a contract on Felicity?” Oliver growled.
“Huntress told me that someone offered her a contract on Felicity but that she turned it down. We don’t know who contracted the hit but we investigated and it appears that it was canceled shortly after inquiries were made.” He eyeballed both men.

“When was it taken out?” Oliver asked again harshly.

“Roughly eighteen months ago. Someone sent out feelers but then a few days later the contract was pulled. They were specifically looking for an out of town independent contractor through a very high end broker. It’s hard to find a middleman at that level with no ties to the League but the fact that they managed to and your team’s recent brushes with Ra’s and his affiliates leads me to believe they were trying to keep things under their radar,” Bruce told them then watched as Diggle and Oliver both glanced at one another in a silent exchange.

“When did Felicity find out about this?” Oliver asked his tone calmer although there was still an angry edge to it.

“After we did; my tech called her and told her about it just prior to my arrival.” Again the men exchanged glances.

“That would be around the same time as the election campaign,” Diggle said softly.

“Don’t,” Oliver told him, a muscle in his jaw working.

“The one where your mother ran against Sebastian Blood for mayor?” Bruce asked, his focus narrowing on Oliver.

Bruce ignored him, “Is there something I need to know?”

“I said it’s handled,” Oliver said firmly.

“If it affects Felicity then I need to know,” Bruce said in a voice that had been known to make grown men lose bladder control.

“And I said it’s my city and if justice has to be meted out then it will be me who handles it.”

Bruce looked at him, the tense lines in his body, the corded muscles under his clothes ready to spring into action at any moment, and made the rare decision to back off. Whatever this was it was personal to Queen and he didn’t have time for a turf war. “Fine, but I’m keeping Felicity with me in Gotham while that happens and she doesn’t return until I know for sure she’s in the clear.”

“We can handle our own—” Dig began but Oliver cut him off.

“Agreed,” he said harshly. “Like I said, we can’t protect her anymore.”

“Oliver,” Diggle said with a growl as he turned on his partner.

Queen turned to his bodyman and another silent exchange took place until the other man finally jerked his head in a nod even though there was now an undeniable tension between them. Bruce took note of the fact that, though the former soldier didn’t like the idea of releasing Felicity into another person’s care, he wasn’t going to argue with Queen’s decision; not in front of an outsider. The fact that a decorated war hero with John Diggle’s reputation would follow the lead of a man Bruce had initially thought may have been just playing at vigilante brought his estimation of Queen up by several degrees.
Oliver looked over to Bruce, the mask of the Arrow creeping over his features as his jaw clenched. “We’ve been sharing a lot of information with you but so far we’ve gotten nothing back in return. Who is Ra’s al Ghul to you? What do you know that we don’t?”

“First you tell me who trained you,” Bruce told him. “That was League training; you don’t learn that just by dodging bullets.”

“You’re wrong,” Oliver told him, his jaw set. “The man who trained me was a prisoner on the island named Yao Fei. He and his daughter, Shado, were also on the run from the people who were trying to kill me.”

“General Yao Fei?” Bruce asked, considering that for a moment.

“You knew him?” Oliver asked in surprise.

“Only by reputation,” Bruce said quietly. “He was set up; he took the fall for the massacre of an entire village even though the evidence was thin at best and obviously trumped up, then disappeared before he was arrested for mass murder and treason. It was rumored that he was a member of the League of Shadows but that he had crossed Ra’s.” He nodded to himself, “Now things are starting to make a bit more sense. Given how you handled yourself when we went toe to toe and your connection to Lian Yu I’m fairly certain it’s the same man.”

“Your turn; who is Ra’s al Ghul to you and what is your connection to the League?” Oliver demanded.

Bruce studied both men carefully before deciding how to answer, “Ra’s al Ghul is the leader of The League of Shadows and The League of Assassins. In essence both Leagues are one and the same with the same goals and the same leadership. His name translates as ‘The Demon’s Head’ and he believes that the world is filled with corruption and that it must be cleansed of all evil. Some might classify him as an eco-terrorist but it goes much further than just some radical tree hugger looking to save the environment. He believes he can create a better world by targeting corruption like a cancer and destroying it, only he doesn’t just target individuals, he targets entire cities and governments. He believes that the evil of an individual is but a symptom of a greater wrong; evil to him is a cancer and to excise a cancer you have to cut away not just the diseased tissue but some of the healthy tissue as well. There are no innocents to him, no collateral damage; just the drive to cleanse the world and bring about his prophesy.”

“Not quite,” Bruce said grimly. “He’s not affiliated with any specific religious doctrine. He’s no longer sane and he suffered hallucinations that he interpreted as visions that spoke of a new world free of the evil of men which has become the driving force behind everything he does. He was behind different plots to take out Gotham the same way Malcolm Merlyn tried to take down the Glades. If what your friend, the Black Canary, said is correct then that’s not a coincidence.” He paused, “You said you were given a book; may I see it?”

Oliver got up and reached beside Bruce into the bottom drawer of Felicity’s workstation and handed it to him. “That one belonged to my father but we know that both my mother and Malcolm had a copy as well.”

Bruce looked at the leather bound journal carefully starting with the symbol on the front. “This is the symbol of the League of Shadows, a group of powerful people recruited or somehow associated with Ra’s al Ghul to bring about his perfect world. The League of Assassins is the, for lack of a better word, servant of the League of Shadows and carry out their orders but both groups are equally deadly in their own way and every single member of the League is willing to kill or die for Ra’s cause.”

“How are you connected?” Oliver asked.

There was a split second of debate in Bruce’s mind about how far he should trust Queen before he spoke, “It’s no secret that my parents were murdered. From the time I was a boy I was determined to avenge their deaths by learning all the skills necessary to accomplish my goal of ending the corruption in Gotham. I trained as much as I could with some of the greatest martial arts masters in secret, and when I left college I traveled the world, seeking out anyone who could help me.”

“I traveled to Nepal where I heard rumors of a man named Ra’s al Ghul. He was an almost god-like figure, revered and feared for his all-consuming mission to stamp out evil. I traveled all over that part of the world, tracking him, following lead after lead until I wound up in a village located between Pakistan and Tibet called Nanda Parbat. Don’t bother looking it up on a map, you won’t find it,” Bruce told them. “Another name for it is Shangri-La and the village was nestled in a hidden valley between the Kunlun Mountains, the Himalayas, and the Tibetan Plateau. I found him and, after he decided I was worthy, I became his student.”

Both Oliver and Diggle tensed but it was Queen who spoke, “You’re a member of this League of Shadows?”

“No,” Batman said evenly, for even without cape and cowl, it was Batman who was speaking and not Bruce. “I trained with him, learned his secrets, but when the time came to be initiated into the League I didn’t go through with it. Ra’s revealed to me his ultimate plan was to level Gotham and any other city he determined was a source of the cancer that was evil. He and the rest of the League had set themselves up as judge, jury, and executioner, and he was determined to bring about his new world without any regard to innocent lives. As I said before, in his opinion anyone touched by evil, however innocent, is therefore tainted by it. I fought my way out of Nanda Parbat thinking Ra’s was dead only to find out he survived.”

He shifted in the chair. “Over the years we’ve had many run-ins. Despite the fact that Ra’s seeks to stamp out anything he considers ‘evil’ he’s not above using those who commit evil acts to further his goals. His League of Assassins don’t just target the corrupt, they’re elite contract killers as well and the money they collect goes to fund his mission. The League of Shadows is even more pervasive and dangerous in a way because they believe he’s a hero, a visionary, and he recruits the rich and powerful; men and women who have the ability to open doors and fund plots to overthrow whole cities and countries and all in the name of Ra’s.” He looked from one man to the other, “Every member of the League has made a blood oath to the organization. They serve him with an almost fanatical devotion. If Ra’s al Ghul decides to come to Starling personally it will make the Glades disaster look like a fender bender in comparison.”

“Why didn’t Felicity tell me any of this?” Oliver asked in frustration. “I know she was trying to keep your identity a secret but she knew about the journal, about Ra’s al Ghul—why not give us some of the answers she already knew?”

“Felicity wouldn’t have known about this,” Bruce said as he flipped through the pages of the journal. “She’s heard of Ra’s al Ghul through her access to some of my files but I’ve kept most of what I know to myself. All she knows is that I consider him to be my enemy but she doesn’t know why. Not only that, but I always made sure Felicity’s role in my team was limited. I wanted to keep her safe. I never wanted her to share in this burden, become corrupted by it like others have been in the past.” He shut the journal in his fist, his jaw tight and a steady throb in his temple reminding him of the beating he’d taken earlier. “I thought that by pushing her away I was doing her a favor but now I see that was wrong. No matter what I did this was always going to follow her.”

“It’s my fault,” Oliver said quietly, a far off look in his eyes. “I put her out there, more than once. I’ve nearly gotten her killed on a few occasions. If I hadn’t…”

“You know what? You’re both acting like a couple of idiots!” Diggle burst out as he looked on them with disdain. Both men looked up in surprise. “Listen to you sad-sacks whine about that girl like she’s dead or like you forced her into something she didn’t choose for herself! Need I remind you that Felicity is a goddamn genius and she has more natural affinity for this stuff than anyone I’ve ever met, present company included. You two had to train for years to get to where you are and she just fell into it and can still run circles around any one of us!” He snorted, “You two might see those short skirts and glasses and think she’s some fragile little girlie-girl but I know better. I’ve seen what that girl can do both on the mat and behind a keyboard. I trained her; I’ve been training her on almost a daily basis for nearly two years now and she’s never backed down! She can fight and she’s a better shot than half the men I trained in the Army. Every time I’ve set a challenge in front of her she’s met it and then some! Hell, in a couple of years I’d be willing to bet she could give both of you a run for your money if she wanted to and I’d go to war with her in a goddamn heartbeat.” He looked from one man to the other. “If Felicity were here she’d slap both of you upside the head and tell you to get your heads out of your asses and get back in the game. We’ve got a problem so let’s concentrate on getting done what needs to be done and save the hearts and flowers bullshit for later.”

Bruce looked at the other man and gave him a respectful nod. “You’re right, Felicity is her own person and I think we’re both guilty of overlooking that.”

“True,” Oliver grudgingly agreed.

Diggle looked from one man to the other, “Now that you two have gotten your bitch and whine session out of the way, what are we going to do about all of this?”

Bruce sat back in the chair and rubbed his chin in quiet contemplation before speaking. “The way I see it our missions are not dissimilar. We both have common goals; a need to keep Felicity safe and to uncover whatever plans the League is making and why Ra’s al Ghul’s name keeps turning up here in Starling. I have a proposal I’d like to offer you both.”

“Go on,” Oliver said and Diggle nodded beside him.

“I’ve been able to develop a large network of operatives and trained associates. I’d like to send you some of my people to offer their assistance. I’ll have to coordinate with them first but with Felicity in Gotham you’re down a man and you’re stretched thin as it is. Also, and please don’t take offence at this, but you both could use some more feet on the ground as well as someone to take over the training of this new protégé of yours.” Bruce noted both men’s expressions of displeasure at that. “Not that I don’t feel you’re perfectly capable, but you need to concentrate on keeping eyes on the Rochev woman as well as protecting your city. The man I’m thinking of sending you, Tim, codename Red Robin, has experience dealing with the League and I trained him personally; he also happens to be my son. He can act as our official representative while he’s here. He’s in line to inherit Wayne Enterprises and is somewhat of a computer savant, although not quite as talented or experienced as Felicity. You shouldn’t have any problems explaining his presence to Isabel.” He took a breath as he considered his next move. It was risky because if Felicity didn’t agree to cooperate he’d be down, not one, but two valuable members of his team until this was done. “You made Felicity your EA; I’m assuming you did that because you weren’t sure if your offices had been infiltrated and you needed someone you trusted to be your gatekeeper?”
“Yeah, Felicity wasn’t happy about it but I couldn’t see any other way,” Oliver said ruefully.

Bruce nodded, “I would have done the same thing. Have you hired another assistant yet?”

“No, I’ve been making do with temps.”

“I have someone in mind. I’ll have to ask her first though,” Bruce said with a grimace. “Like Felicity, she’s not fond of me making decisions for her but she can be trusted and she has extensive administrative experience. In addition, she can act as your tech in your missions and has had hand to hand combat training so she can handle herself should the need arise.”

“Her handle wouldn’t be Oracle, would it?” Diggle asked curiously.

Bruce’s gaze fell on the other man searchingly, “Did Felicity tell you about her?”

“She just gave me a code key and told me to contact ‘Oracle’ in case we needed help. She said she was her counterpart in your organization.”

Bruce nodded. “That was smart of her but then Felicity always was thinking two steps ahead,” he admitted grudgingly. “Since Felicity will be with me in Gotham I can ask her to man Watchtower while Oracle takes her place here—that is if I can get both of them to agree to it. Before I ask though I should mention that Oracle is a paraplegic; she was injured by one of my enemies a few years back and is now in a wheelchair. Your Lair doesn’t appear to be wheelchair accessible.”

“A wheelchair?” Diggle asked dubiously. “Are you sure she’s capable of handling all of this? I mean, I know she’s good if you and Felicity both vouch for her but we’ve got to run on the assumption that we’ve been blown. If things go tits up and they storm the club or Oliver is attacked while she’s in his office it could get ugly.”

“Before Barbara--Barbara Gordon,” he clarified for them. “Before she was Oracle she was one of my protégés and fought under the codename ‘Batgirl’. She may not have the use of her legs but she was able to channel her skills into a type of sitting judo and she’s a master of eskrima with expertise in small firearms. Also, in addition to helping Felicity build the Watchtower system, she built and modified her own wheelchair and made it combat ready. Trust me when I say that no matter what happens she can handle herself.”

“Damn,” Diggle said, looking suitably impressed. “Even your IT girl is making me feel like an amateur. Talk about a blow to the ego.”

Oliver tapped his lips, his elbows still balanced on his knees, “We have a freight elevator she can use or I can help her set something up offsite.”

“I’ll speak to the owner of the house Felicity was living in and see if she can stay there after the repairs are complete. It’s one-story and already has a ramp on the side of the porch so it should do. According to the landlord several of the houses in the neighborhood have been on the market for well over a year. If I need to I’ll buy the damn thing.” Bruce said gruffly.

“I think that Bruce Wayne buying up quaint little bungalows in Starling may raise a few red flags,” Oliver said wryly. “Don’t worry about your associates, I’ll see to it they’re both kept comfortable while they’re here.”

“Thank you,” Bruce said.

“No thanks needed,” Oliver told him. “If that book is connected to the League and Ra’s al Ghul then that means Isabel may be an even bigger threat than we think. Her name is in that book and she knows too much about us which means others may as well. If they really are after Felicity and not just the Arrow then it will be up to you to keep her safe while we handle the rest of it from here.” His tone became grim, “If anything happens to us you can get her out of the country or help her go underground until things settle down. Isabel has always fixated on my friendship with Felicity but if I can give her reason to believe that’s over maybe she’ll move on.”

Bruce got up from his seat and offered Oliver then Diggle his handshake, “I promise you I won’t let anything happen to her.” He looked back to Oliver, “I’ll give you all the support I can. I’ll talk to Lucius and make sure your company gets the contract so that will be at least one less thing for you to worry about. I’ll also begin discreet inquiries into Rochev and Stellmoor and get back to you if I hear anything.” He frowned, “Have you thought about how taking down Rochev might affect QC?”

“This is more important,” Oliver said a bit gruffly. “If I lose the company, so be it.”

“Worse comes to worst, I’ll buy up her shares myself or give you whatever financial support I can so that you can do it,” Bruce told him.

“I…appreciate it,” he said with a nod. “I’ll walk you out,” Diggle moved off to give them some privacy as the two men ascended the staircase. As soon as they were past the door leading to the Lair Oliver turned to him, “Look, like I said, I appreciate you helping us but I should warn you that if I find out that you’ve hurt Felicity again I’m coming for you and it won’t be pretty.”

“Understood,” Bruce said in the low growl of the Bat. “And I hope you know that if she ever decides to return to Starling City I’ll expect the same from you.”

Oliver offered him his hand again and Bruce took it in a firm clasp. “Take care of her, Wayne.”

“I will and…thank you,” Bruce said quietly as he headed off toward his rental and back to Gotham.

Oliver made his way back down to the Lair, his countenance grim and his gait heavy. Diggle looked up from where he was preparing for their training session and snorted, “Hey man, I know this situation sucks but she’ll be fine. She’s got Batman and a whole slew of his people protecting her. If you want to worry about somebody, worry about us. We’re the ones with bull’s-eyes on our backs.”

“I’m just—” he stopped and scrubbed his hand through his hair, “Are we making a mistake trusting this guy? I mean, what do we really know about Batman anyway?”

Diggle sighed and leaned heavily against the weapons case, “Felicity worked for his organization before she came here and, even with the bad blood between them, I get the impression that the last thing he’d do is risk her safety. As long as our best interests and hers match up he’s not going to make a move against us. I think we can trust him.”

“Yeah,” Oliver said, his face still troubled as he grabbed the tape and began wrapping his knuckles.

Dig paused, his features stilling in quiet contemplation before he spoke, “Are we going to talk about the bomb Wayne dropped or what?”

“Which one?” Oliver said roughly.

“The hit,” Dig watched as Oliver tensed. “Oliver—“

“Don’t,” he told him.
“Do you think your mother put that contract on Felicity?” He asked, ignoring the set to the other man’s shoulders.

Oliver didn’t say anything but his movements became jerky and agitated.

“Timing makes sense,” Diggle said. “I doubt Blood would have ordered it and Slade was more into the direct approach. Of course, it also could have been Walter Steele; unlikely, but very possible.”

“I don’t know,” he said gruffly, “but I’m going to find out.”

“And worst case scenario?” Dig asked, watching his reaction carefully. “If you find out your mother ordered the hit, what then? Are we going to keep this from Thea or what?”

“I’ll take care of it,” he said, his face lost in shadows.

“Meaning?”

“Meaning I’ll take care of it,” Oliver bit out.

Diggle shifted uncomfortably, “You can’t keep this from your sister, Oliver. She’s part of the team now and it’s taken you guys a long time to get to a good place with everything your mother’s done to you both. I know it’s hard, but she needs to know.”

“Moira’s dead,” Oliver said flatly. “It doesn’t matter anymore. If we find out she ordered the hit then the danger is past and that’s one less thing to worry about. Everything else is irrelevant and Thea doesn’t need to know anything.”

“She won’t appreciate that logic is she finds out and you know that,” Dig pointed out gently.

“She still loves our mother, Dig,” he told him. “She should be able to have at least that.”

“She was your mother, too—”

“She gave birth to me,” Oliver clarified, “but that woman, the woman who conspired with Malcolm Merlyn, who hid my son from me, who could threaten to kill one of the only people I trust just because she dared to tell me the truth, the woman she became in the end; that was not my mother.”

“If it was her she canceled the hit,” he said quietly. “That means she changed her mind. She didn’t go through with it.”

Oliver turned to him slowly, his eyes more cold and hard than Diggle had ever seen them, “She threatened Felicity, used emotional blackmail to keep her quiet and arranged a hit to take care of loose ends. What she didn’t count on was Felicity’s loyalty to me. Once I knew what she had done I warned her that if she ever crossed me by going after Felicity I would send her straight to hell. I reconciled with her after that but part of me never forgave her, and she knew it.” He put on the sparring gloves and squeezed his hand into a fist causing the leather to whine in protest. “She didn’t cancel the contract in a fit on conscience; she canceled it because the damage was already done and she knew I would expose her if I thought for a second she had any hand in it. I’m not worried about my mother right now; she’d dead and buried. What I’m worried about now, besides Isabel and every other fucking thing we have to deal with, is who else knew about the hit and if she left any loose ends that might cause blowback onto Thea.”

“Do you think Mark Francis knew?” Dig asked curiously. “He was her campaign manager.”

Oliver shook his head, “Probably not,” he said. “Mark’s a political shark. Dirty politics is one thing, murder is another. If he found out Moira had skeletons in her closet he’d either spin it or dump her, he wouldn’t hire a hitman. If anyone knew anything, it’s Walter Steele.”

Dig stopped to consider that for a moment, “Do you think he would do something like that? He and Moira were divorced by then.”

“Doesn’t matter, he still loved her. Besides, if he did conspire with Moira or contract the hit himself, it wasn’t about Moira, it was business,” he said in a hard voice. “He had a lot riding on her winning that campaign and he was on the line for backing my bid to keep QC. A scandal wouldn’t have just ruined us but it would have ruined him as well.”

Dig seemed to contemplate that for a moment, “He did take over her campaign and the mayor’s office after Blood and his army tried to bring down the city and he’s been a friend to the Arrow. If you confront him there could be backlash.”

“The Arrow isn’t confronting him, I am,” he said firmly.

“Are you sure that’s wise?”

“No, but if Walter is a danger to my family and to Felicity then he needs to be dealt with,” Oliver said coldly.

Dig exhaled loudly in consternation, “Oliver, I agree something has to be done, but Thea loves him. He’s all she has left of your mother--”

“If he’s dirty then he’s going down,” Oliver told him in a voice that would brook no arguments.

“You shouldn’t be the one to do it.” Diggle said quietly, his face lost in the shadows. “It’s too much to ask of anyone, Oliver; even you. If anything permanent has to be done then I’ll take care of it.”

Oliver looked up at Diggle and snorted, “I won’t kill him, Diggle. It’s tempting but I wouldn’t give him the out.” He smiled coldly, “If he conspired with my mother to kill Felicity or if he planned it himself then he’s either going to jail or he’s leaving town permanently and he’ll give up all his interest in QC before he goes. I won’t have a ticking time bomb in our midst when we’ve already got enough on our plates with Isabel.”

“There will be fallout,” Dig warned. “Your sister, the company; everything you’ve worked for could come crashing down around you.”

“Like I told Wayne I’m beyond worrying about that now. Besides, my life is already a nuclear fucking winter, Dig,” He said, heading for the Muk Yan Jong training dummy and started punching out his frustrations, his fists flying between the wooden arms and slapping at the slats with lightning fast speed.

“Oliver, this thing you’re feeling; it isn’t just about your mom,” Diggle said with a superior air.

He looked up and clenched his jaw, “Just…drop it, Dig.” He engaged the hard teak dummy once again, his hands slapping it in a meditative rhythm.

“Why can’t you just admit you’re in love with that girl?” he said, ignoring him.

“Because that’s not what’s happening,” Oliver said stubbornly.

“Bullshit,” Dig snorted. “I don’t know what the hell has been going on over the last few days but this thing with you and Felicity has been brewing since day one. I thought for sure after Sara left that you’d see that and then six months ago…” he paused and shook his head. “I know…I know we touched on this a few days ago, but I still gotta ask; do you…do you still think about it?"

“Every fucking day,” he bit out roughly as he continued to slap at the wooden arms of the dummy.

“Yes,” Dig said quietly, his face lost in shadow. “I keep thinking about how she marched right up to Slade and got between the two of you. I was too far away to see it clearly and I thought…” He clenched his jaw. “You screamed her name over and over and I thought that if that girl died that there was no way you’d ever come back from it, that none of us would ever get past it without her to keep us together. You were screaming and then the explosion,” his jaw clenched and he closed his eyes. “That’s the last thing I remember before I woke up in the air ambulance. I thought she was dead. I asked and when they said the only female survivor they found at the site was Sara, I just knew. A couple of days later, I woke up,” he gave a brief chuckle, “and she was putting a coffee mug full of flowers on my nightstand and…fuck,” he took a moment to center himself with a deep breath. “All I could do is smile and thank God that she lived and Slade was dead. I thought then that you’d get your head out of your ass and tell that girl how you felt but you hooked back up with Sara again and we all had to sit back and watch that train wreck play out. Thank God Sara at least had enough sense to end it quick this time but then you had to go after Laurel again and…”

He shook his head and made a sound of disgust, “I wanted to kick your ass when I watched you do that to Felicity; every goddamn time you’d get close to showing that girl how you felt you’d use Sara, Connor, Laurel, the mission, work, or some other excuse to make some distance between you and it wasn’t fair to anyone. And the way you let her speak to Felicity after all she’d been through,” his lips thinned as he pinned the man with an angry glare. “If I didn’t have a broken femur at the time, I swear to God I would have shoved my foot up your ass for that shit.”

Oliver met his glare with one of his own, “I’ve heard this before; from you, from Roy…”

“Well maybe you should hear it again since you didn’t seem to learn your lesson the last time!” Diggle snapped back.

“I did, and I made it right!” He said with a scowl. “I broke it off with Laurel and I apologized, remember?”

“To me and Roy, but did you apologize to Felicity?” He asked in a hard tone. Oliver dropped his eyes and didn’t answer. Dig just shook his head, “I didn’t think so. You know, even Sara could see you were in love with Felicity, Laurel could obviously see it; everyone saw it except the two of you. That girl loves you Oliver; she marched into the jaws of death for you more than once. She faced down Slade and then spit in his eye for you. He had his hands on her and she—”

“I was there! I saw it, I heard it; I was right fucking there!” Oliver said angrily, finally breaking in the light of the other man’s punishing words and rounding on him with a fierce expression on his face. “I know what she said! I know everything that could have happened! I watched as Slade…” He clenched his jaw, “I hear him talking to her like that in my nightmares every single time I close my eyes. I spent days after that thinking about what could have happened if she had been in the blast radius, or worse, if she had actually gone with him what he would have done to her. I see her press that button every single day only she’s the one in bloody fucking chunks at the end of it, not Slade, and I know she did all of it for me! That’s the point! I can’t do this; why can’t you see that? I can’t let her do that again—not for me, not again! I don’t…” He grimaced and gripped the arms of the training dummy tightly as he avoided the other man’s gaze, “This, whatever it is, it isn’t love. I’ve been in love before, Dig, a few times. Not lust, not some kind of teenage hormone-fueled crap, but real love. Whatever this is between me and Felicity it’s different than that.”

“Are you trying to tell me that all this is just you wanting to get into Felicity’s pants?” Dig asked angrily. “Because if you can tell me that and keep a straight face then I’ll put my fist down your goddamn throat myself!”

“No!” He said testily. “It’s not sex either! It’s… it’s—-fuck! I don’t know what the hell it is!” He rubbed his hand over his mouth as though ill.

“So you say,” Diggle said sarcastically. “Me? I only know what I see, man, and that girl has you sprung.”

Oliver shook his head, refusing to hear it. “It can’t happen, not with her.” He began running through the empty hand techniques of Wing Chun, going through the alphabet of punches until his movements were a blur of motion, muscle memory, and meditation.

“Why not?” Diggle asked genuinely perplexed by his partner’s stubbornness. “She knows your secret, she’s a part of your life both in the hood and out of it, she’s smart, beautiful—-“

“That’s just it!” He growled grabbing the dummy, his meditation broken. “She’s everywhere— there’s no breathing room when she’s around, no escape! I can’t compartmentalize her like I can everything else. It’s just-—” He took a deep breath and set his jaw, “It’s too much with her, Dig. This thing between us is all encompassing and it makes my chest ache and all logic fly out of the window. She makes me lose focus and I can’t do that. If I lose sight of what we’re doing here then the results would be disastrous for all of us.” He looked off to the side, refusing to meet the other man’s eyes. “I can’t do what we do and be with her, Dig. I just can’t. And I can’t be with her knowing that eventually she’s going to jump in front of another bullet for me and I can’t stop her. There just isn’t enough of me left over for that.”

“What does that even mean?”

“It means that I’m barely hanging on as it is,” Oliver said angrily. “I’m trying to balance being the Arrow with being a CEO when I barely have a clue what I’m doing, plus I have to be there for my sister because I find myself, yet again, having to deal with the fact that our mother was apparently a fucking sociopath! Literally thousands of people are depending on me! It’s all on me!” He said, jabbing a thumb at his chest. “I have so much on me right now I can barely breathe and Felicity…” he shook his head, “She makes me want to just chuck it all and run, just grab her and hide until it all just goes away. I’ve never…” He dropped his chin and shut his eyes, “I… She scares the shit out of me, Dig.” He looked up at him, finally meeting his eyes again. “Do you know why I let Isabel treat her like crap for as long as I did? Or why I let Laurel spout off like that?”

“I assumed you either didn’t see it or you were afraid of rousing their suspicions,” Diggle said in a low tone, his eyes narrowing.

“No, I saw everything and I could have put a stop to it at any point but I chose not to.”

“Why would you do that?” Diggle asked angrily. “Laurel, okay, she was way the fuck out of line but she’s Sara’s sister and Lance’s daughter so I get cutting her some slack, but Isabel; some of that crap Isabel was saying about her—-“

“I did it to maintain some distance like you said!” Oliver shot back angrily. “I’m not blind, Dig! Felicity is the one person who has always been able to see right through me. I have no secrets from that girl, she just—she gets under my skin and lives there, you know? As long as Isabel kept her distracted, or Laurel kept her away from me, it made it easier for me to pretend that nothing was happening between us. I can’t do what I do and be with her, Dig. Whatever the hell this is that I’m feeling it just can’t happen, not now, maybe not ever.”
“You’re going to lose her, you know that, right?” Diggle asked him, his eyes hard. “Don’t make the same mistakes I did, man. I lost two women I loved because I ran. Don’t push her away because she might not come back.”

“Good,” he said resignedly. “Maybe she’ll be better off. At least he can keep her safe which is more than I can say. All I’ve done since I met her is put her in danger. No one’s luck lasts forever; how many more close calls do we have left before we reach one time too many? How many more times do I put her in the line of fire before I get her killed or crippled, Dig? Didn’t you hear what he said about that tech of his; Oracle? She’s in a wheelchair because of his mission, because one of his enemies put her there. Fuck!” He shoved the dummy in frustration, “I couldn’t even keep her safe from my own goddamn mother, how the hell am I supposed to keep her safe from everyone else?!”

Diggle clenched his jaw and glared at him, “That’s a load of crap! He can’t keep her any safer than we can and she doesn’t want that even if he could!” He pointed towards the door to the Lair, “And I’ll tell you something else, he’s full of shit too if he thinks that keeping her safe is what all this is about! He wants her, Oliver! He flew three thousand miles to get her back and you can’t be bothered to walk across the fucking room! You and I both know that the last thing you want is for her to wind up with Wayne and if you don’t stop all this self-recrimination and whiny bullshit he’s going to make his play and you’ll have fucked up your one shot at something real!”

“ Enough! What’s done is done; it’s over so just drop it!” Oliver said angrily, cutting through the air with his hands as he grabbed his hood and bow. “I’m not up for sparring tonight. I’m heading out on patrol.”

Diggle watched as the other man got into his leathers, shaking his head silently in defeat as he headed over to man the coms.

Bruce called Barbara from the jet to let her know that Felicity was headed back to Gotham on a commercial flight and told her to alert Alfred of her arrival time so she wouldn’t have to get a cab home. After all he’d put her through it was the least he could do.

Her phone sat in front of him along with the white pharmacy bag from her bedroom. The memories of the other night came to him then; the way she looked when he held her in his arms, the expression on her face when she woke up with her sweet lips still swollen from his kisses, the taste of her that lingered on his tongue—those images still haunted him. He’d rejected her for a second time out of fear, and not for her safety, but for his own. Barbara was right when she said he should have just called her or gotten in touch some other way. Hopping on the jet was a mistake as was every decision he’d made since. This whole sordid mess was entirely his fault. He should have left her alone and not interfered. He should have known better. He picked up the bag and considered it for a moment before shoving it into his briefcase. Out of sight was not out of mind, however.

Bruce was not a monk. Even as the Batman he enjoyed his fair share of women. To him it had always been a simple matter of release, a way to eliminate stress while satisfying a biological imperative, but no matter how caught up in the act he had become it was merely sex and he never lost control. The only biological child he’d ever fathered, Damian, was conceived against his will and his knowledge and he was never really a father to the boy. He’d tried to be, tried to curb the boy’s murderous rages, but Damian had been tainted by the darkness that drove him. As grieved as he was when the boy died he was almost grateful for it as well. He’d never willingly allowed himself to lose that control with any woman, never risked his seed taking root, except with Felicity.

He’d taken Felicity twice now without once considering her safety or his own; the first time was four years ago and the last was a few days ago. It wasn’t disease he was worried about, he was clean and he knew she was as well, but he could have easily left her pregnant with his child and that was unacceptable. Although a primitive part of himself could easily imagine holding a child that was part of both of them he also knew how unfair that would be to her. He wasn’t capable of being a husband or a father. He was too selfish, too obsessed with his mission, and he knew that his lack of loving care would have eventually destroyed her. As for a child…

Bruce had opened his home to many young men and women but he’d never been a father to any of them. He’d been a taskmaster, a teacher, but not a father. The best scenario to come out of giving Felicity his child through that one reckless act would be that he’d claim it and her only to watch it be turned into yet another warrior for the mission or a perversion of innocence and humanity like Damian. It would be inevitable and he could not stand the thought of hurting her like that.

Not that Felicity would have anything to do with him at this point anyway. He’d driven her into the arms of Queen and for all he knew that was where her heart now lay. After their fight, and subsequent talk, he now understood why she joined the Arrow’s mission. It wasn’t just that it was a worthy cause or that Oliver Queen was, like him, driven to seek justice for his city; it was that Queen needed her in a way Bruce never did.

She was central to their cause, an invaluable member of the Arrow’s team. Bruce had designed the Batman so that even he could be replaced. He could die and Batman would live on with Dick or Tim or even Luke behind the cape and cowl. Batman would be immortal but Oliver Queen was just one man whose only back up was his bodyguard and an IT specialist. He’d almost forgotten what it was like when it was just Alfred and himself in the Batcave. Of course she joined him, how could she not?

And now she’s slept with him, Bruce thought unhappily. He wasn’t jealous. No, that was a lie; he was jealous but he had no right to be. He’d taken everything she had to give and thrown it back in her face in the cruelest way possible--twice. Worse yet, he’d driven her into the arms of another man, one so much like himself that he even hurt her in the exact same way for the exact same reasons. She’d never forgive him for this last betrayal. It was done and she would never trust him with her heart again. Just the idea of living in a world without Felicity Smoak’s smile was nearly enough to send him to his knees.

Even as a child her smile could chase away the demons that haunted his nightmares. The first time they’d met she wasn’t even five years old and, even then, she had a hold on him he couldn’t explain. Lucius had invited him to his office before he left for his last year at Oxford to go over the terms of his allowance as provided by the trust left to him in his parent’s will. Evie had been dead less than six months and Lucius was only just beginning to return to the office full time. He’d been working from home for much of the previous year but Bruce remembered clearly walking into the office that had once belonged to his father to see this tiny little blonde haired creature sitting perched on Lucius’s lap coloring as he talked on the phone and waved him in to sit.

Bruce sat in the large leather armchair across from his desk and waited for Lucius to complete his call. The little girl on Lucius’s lap looked up at him curiously, her big blue eyes peering at him over pink framed glasses that kept slipping down her pert nose. She kept brushing back her wild white blonde curls that had escaped from a messy ponytail and he noted that her fingertips were painted bright pink with tiny sparkling stickers on each of her neatly trimmed fingernails. She looked up at him as he examined her curiously, offered him a sweet smile, then began to color in earnest once more without saying anything.
“Sorry about that Bruce,” Lucius said as he placed the phone back on the receiver. He pulled out a file and placed it in front of him on the desk. “I just need you to sign—“

“Mr. Fox,” Lucius’s secretary peered into the room. “Sorry to disturb you sir, but the meeting is just about to break up and you told me to let you know.”

“Oh, right. Yes. Tell them I’ll be along in a minute, thank you,” he sighed and turned to Bruce again. “Again, I’m sorry about that. It’s been a crazy day today. Peggy Ann fell and broke a tooth so she had to go to the dentist for an emergency root canal, Tanya is out of town on Foundation business, and so I had to take Baby with me to the office at the last second. I just need to step out for a minute while you can read those over and then I’ll be right back so we can go over any questions you might have.”

“That’s fine, sir,” Bruce said with a nod.

Lucius looked down at the little girl who was still coloring in his lap, “Baby, why don’t you go out and sit with Miss Betty while I go to my meeting?”

“I can watch her if you like, sir,” Bruce said before he could reconsider. ‘Where did that even come from?’ He’d wondered at the time. He’d never had any experience babysitting before and the last thing he wanted to do was be stuck taking care of a whiny four year old all afternoon.

“Are you sure?” Lucius asked uncertainly and then he knew exactly why he’d offered. It was the look on the other man’s face that had prompted him. Despite the warm smile on his face, Lucius’s eyes were filled with such loss and sorrow it was nearly palatable. The only time it ever seemed to lift was when his eyes fell on the little girl who was still silent, still scribbling away, as if completely undisturbed by the idea of being left with a virtual stranger. Bruce recognized that pain. It was the same pain he’d felt every day since his parents had been murdered. Some part of him wanted to relieve some of that burden, if only for a minute or two, from the one man his father had called ‘friend’ besides Alfred Pennyworth.

“Yeah, it’s fine. No sense in making her get up and have to drag all her stuff into reception,” Bruce told him with a passable imitation of casual indifference.

“That sound good to you?” Lucius asked uncertainly and then he knew exactly why he’d offered. It was the look on the other man’s face that had prompted him. Despite the warm smile on his face, Lucius’s eyes were filled with such loss and sorrow it was nearly palatable. The only time it ever seemed to lift was when his eyes fell on the little girl who was still silent, still scribbling away, as if completely undisturbed by the idea of being left with a virtual stranger. Bruce recognized that pain. It was the same pain he’d felt every day since his parents had been murdered. Some part of him wanted to relieve some of that burden, if only for a minute or two, from the one man his father had called ‘friend’ besides Alfred Pennyworth.

“Okay Daddy,” Felicity said kissing his cheek before allowing herself to be shifted from his lap then lowered back into the vacated chair.

After assuring Bruce he’d only be a minute Lucius hurried out of the room leaving Bruce alone with the little girl. He perused the papers quickly, initialing and signing where indicated while keeping one eye trained on Lucius’s step-daughter, unsure of what would happen if he let her out of his sight. ‘Did four year olds do things like stuff crayons in their mouths and choke to death?’ He’d wondered with some trepidation. Still, after a few minutes of silence broken only by the near hypnotic sound of the crayons scrubbing against the thick sketchpad, he nearly forgot she was even there and started reading through the papers more carefully.

“Daddy said you’re going to lawyer school,” she said without looking up from her drawing.

“Yeah, uh yes. I have one more year left at Oxford and then I’m going to Yale Law,” he said then cursed himself for being taken off guard by the little girl. “Why aren’t you in school?” “Did kids her age even go to school?” He mused. He vaguely recalled going to school at that age but the memories of his life before his parent’s deaths were hazy at best in comparison to every other memory that “My Mama died,” Felicity said in a casual tone.

“What does that have to do with going to school?” Bruce frowned then realized how callous that must have come across. He was about to apologize when she spoke.

“It just does. I can’t go to school because Mama is dead,” she explained, her eyes bright and sharp as they looked him over.

“My parents died and I still had to go to school,” Bruce shot back before he could stop himself. His cheeks colored as soon as he realized he was actually arguing with a little kid.

“That was different; both your mama and daddy died at the same time,” she said as though the reasoning behind it was perfectly logical.

“So?” He challenged, his eyebrows knitting together in consternation. The kid looked cute but she was kind of a brat.

“So they had each other and my Daddy only has me. If I go to school he’ll be all by himself and he needs me.”

“Oh,” Bruce said, suddenly feeling quite guilty for his unkind thoughts.

“He gets scared sometimes,” she continued, oblivious to his embarrassment. “He thinks I’ll go away too so I decided to stay home until he feels better.”

“Aren’t you scared?” Bruce asked, finally giving up on trying to figure out why this girl was able to get under his skin so quickly.

Instead of answering, she asked, “Were you scared when your mama died?”

He felt the air leave his lungs and for the first time in a long time he found himself wanting to answer that question. “Yeah. Yeah, I was,” he said in a near whisper, unable to even look at her as he spoke. Shame colored his cheeks and more than anything he wanted to run, run far away from this tiny little tow-headed tot armed only with crayons and big blue eyes that seemed to reach into his soul.

“It’s okay to be scared,” Felicity said as she hopped down from the large chair, oblivious to his shame. She grabbed her picture off the desk. “Here,” she said as she handed it to him.

“Thank you,” he said as he looked down at the surprisingly neat and composed picture. He saw two stick people, one small yellow-haired figure holding the hand of a larger dark-haired one. “Is this you and Lucius?”

“No silly, it’s me and you,” she said pointing to them. “So when you go away you can look at it and you won’t have to be scared anymore because I’ll be there to keep you happy just like with Daddy.”

He looked at her dressed in her bright pink dress with a tulle skirt that poofed out around her like a ballerina’s tutu, her untied sneakers with glitter and stickers on the toes, and into the impossibly large clear blue eyes that were framed by glasses that kept sliding down her nose, and then, despite himself, he asked, “Do you ever get scared, Baby?”

“Of course not!” She said, tilting her head slightly and revealing a gap-toothed grin.

“Why not?” He asked, the corners of his lips tilting upwards despite himself.
“I never got to be scared anymore ’cause you got my picture now.”

“What do you mean?” He asked with a confused frown.

She pointed to it, her little finger nails with the Hello Kitty stickers glittering under the florescent lighting, “This picture means you can’t forget about me. Long as you got it you’ll remember me and always keep me safe because that’s what big boys like you are supposed to do, right?” She smiled brightly into his eyes again.

“Yeah,” he said, nodding his head as he looked down at the picture once again. “Thank you, Baby. For the picture.”

From that moment on, for reasons even he never understood, keeping Felicity Smoak-Fox safe became a priority. As long as she was safe nothing else mattered. The pain, the fear, the loneliness; it all melted away. She and that drawing became a symbol to him that made his journey into becoming Batman bearable. For years he kept the paper folded and safe in his wallet until one day it was gone but the memory was still there. For the first time in his life he’d met someone who saw his fear and didn’t judge him for it or try to talk him out of it; she just accepted it because she understood.

From the moment he’d seen that gap-toothed smile to the first time he’d tasted the lips of the woman she would eventually become, Felicity had been as much a part of the Batman’s armor as his cape and cowl, whether she realized it or not.

Now that it was gone part of him wondered if he’d ever feel safe again.
Chapter Nineteen

Felicity got off the plane late in the afternoon expecting to pick up her bags and stop by the cab kiosk so she could get home to her dad’s place. Without her phone she hadn’t had a chance to call anyone to let them know she was down earlier than expected so she just assumed no one would be waiting for her.

Of course she was wrong.

“Miss Felicity!”

She looked up and smiled at the lined yet beatific face of Alfred Pennyworth, manservant and guardian to Bruce Wayne, aka the World’s Biggest Bat-hole. “Hi Alfred,” she said as she reached up to hug the much older man’s neck. “I suppose this means Bruce survived the war he started in my house?”

Alfred gave a disapproving cough although she doubted it was directed at her given his tone, “Yes, Master Bruce mentioned that there had been a spot of trouble as he was assisting you in your move back to Gotham.” Alfred offered her his arm and led her through the airport as he spoke. “He called to inform Miss Barbara and myself of your subsequent departure and she was able to trace his credit card and get your arrival information.”

“That reminds me…” Felicity said, digging through her bag with a frown.

“That’s quite alright, Miss,” Alfred said stopping her. “I already collected your bags and had them loaded into the car.”

“Thanks, but that wasn’t what I was looking for.” She fished out Bruce’s card and held it out to him. “I imagine he’ll probably be asking for that back.”

“Not at all, Miss,” Alfred said with just a hint of mischief in his wizened eye. “In fact, Master Bruce informed me of, ahem, the unfortunate circumstances that brought you home so early on a commercial flight,” the last part was said with a hint of disdain. To a great gentleman like Alfred Pennyworth the thought of Bruce allowing a respectable young lady under his care to mingle with the great unwashed in such a way was frightfully distasteful, “and encouraged me to let you know that you are welcome to use the card to replace anything that may have been lost or damaged.”

“Oh, he did, did he?” Felicity asked with a knowing nod.

“Oh yes, Miss,” Alfred said in a composed yet merry tone. “In fact, I took it upon myself to see that you were designated as an authorized user on the account in case you should run into any problems. I thought that perhaps you might like to stop off at one of the department stores near your father’s home before I drop you off. I also took the initiative and arranged for a car and driver to meet you in front of Wayne Towers promptly at nine to take you to Killinger’s Department Store where you will be greeted by a personal shopper that I have engaged for you on Master Bruce’s behalf.”

“Killinger’s, Alfred? Really?” She asked with an evil smirk. Killinger’s, the most exclusive department store in Gotham, it made Neiman Marcus look like Walmart, and if he had engaged a personal shopper then that meant she would be seated in one of the private viewing rooms to watch as models displayed the latest in haute couture. “I’m all for payback but, even for me, that’s pretty mean.”

“I seem to recall Master Bruce saying that he not only engaged in physical combat in your home and in your presence but that he somehow managed to destroy most of your furnishings and the bulk of your clothing.”

“You’re right, he deserves it,” Felicity chuckled and squeezed the older man’s arm affectionately as he led her to Bruce’s town car.

After a quick stop by Bergdorf’s (well, an hour, maybe two) with Alfred acting as her enabler, she managed to marathon shop her way through the women’s department. After spending more money than she earned in the last six months, she was headed up to her dad’s penthouse with no less than three security guards assisting her with her bags. She looked down at the garment bags labeled ‘Armani’ with a particularly fond eye. She’d probably never have a chance to wear them all but Alfred had been especially keen on the idea that she should stock her greatly diminished wardrobe with as many pieces from Bruce’s favorite designer as she possibly could. His exact words were, ‘May the punishment fit the crime.’ Personally she was more of an Oscar de la Renta girl but she was going to really enjoy all that lovely cashmere after what he’d put her through.

As soon as she got close to the door it swung open and her sister along with Peggy Ann rushed out to greet her with hugs and kisses.

“What took you so long?” The diminutive Asian woman demanded after squeezing her nearly in half. “Barbara called us hours ago and said you were on the way over!”

“You went to Bergdorf’s without me?” Tam said with a moue of disappointment. “Just for that I get to steal anything I that I help unpack!”

“Is dad home?” Felicity asked over the din as they walked into the penthouse.

“Baby!” He heard her dad call out from across the room as Peggy Ann directed the security guards to take her luggage into her old bedroom.

“Daddy!” Felicity said with a huge smile and practically flew into his arms.

“I missed you, Baby,” Lucius said as he enveloped her in a bear hug.

“Daddy, I saw you a few days ago!” She laughed even though she knew exactly what he meant. The minute she stepped into the place she grew up it felt as though she could finally breathe again.

“See? I always knew you were his favorite,” Tam said with a mock pout.

“Get over here!” Lucius ordered Tam as he held open his other arm and enveloped them both in a hug. “I can’t believe that both my girls are back home where they belong!”

“Where’s Mama T?” Felicity asked, looking around. “I figured you or Tam would have called her.”

“Mom’s in Amsterdam at the Hague for that women’s conference and then she has to go to Israel for the International Seminar on Human Trafficking at the MASHAV in Haifa,” Tam told her. “She should be back in time for the Children’s Charity Gala in a couple of weeks though.”

“Well, your mother might not be here but at least I still have my little girls; Peggy Ann!” He called out, releasing them from his embrace but still keeping his hands around them.

“What?” The older woman said walking back into the room, still keeping a sharp eye on the men as they exited the apartment.

“What?” Lucius snorted. “Woman, get over here and stop being so sour already!”

“I’m glad you’re back Baby because your father has been driving me insane!” Peggy stopped in front of them, hands on hips, and scowled. “What do you want now?”

“We’re going out to dinner tonight, all of us, you included!” Lucius shot back. “Get your coat and help pick out a restaurant.”

“No, no, no!” Peggy said, shaking her finger at him. “We’re eating right here! I have a roast chicken in the oven!”

“We can put it aside and have sandwiches later,” Lucius scoffed. “Baby’s home early and that calls for a celebration!”

“You can celebrate at home!” Peggy said sternly. “Baby doesn’t want to eat out, she wants a good home-cooked meal and you’re not supposed to be eating all that bad restaurant food anyway. The "Doctors!" He snorted. "I’m healthy as a horse!"

"They make glue out of horses your age!" She shot back. "You went off to that awful city of Baby’s and ate nothing but junk while you were gone!"

"I did not," Lucius said, taken aback. "Baby, tell her that—"

"Don’t you make Baby lie for you," Peggy said sternly. "You’re eating my food and that’s the end of it!"

"Just who exactly is in charge here; you or me?" Lucius asked in mock-frustration.

"Peggy Ann’s in charge, Dad. Everyone knows that," came a voice from the foyer.

"Luke?" Felicity turned in surprise to see her brother standing behind her, one arm in a sling and the other clutching a duffel bag.

"Luke!" Her dad said in surprise as they all rushed over to greet him.

"What happened to your arm?" Peggy Ann asked in dismay as he set his duffel on the floor to give her a one-armed hug.

"Oh, this?" Luke said dismissively. "Broke it, no big deal."

"It looks like a little more than a simple break, son," Lucius said worriedly as he took in the bandages and the pins sticking out of his wrist.

"Yeah, well, had to have a little surgery but I should be fine in a couple of more weeks," Luke shrugged nonchalantly. "I figured since Baby was coming home that I might come and visit since I’m pretty much useless back in Tinasha until the pins come out."

"And you didn’t call us and let us know you were hurt?" The small statured elderly woman asked in dismay before reaching up and smacking the much larger man on the back of the head hard enough that the sound echoed off the walls.

"OW!" Luke said, grabbing the back of his head. "Damn!"

"Next time you call home!" She told him sternly. "And I’m making you an appointment so you can have a real doctor look at that arm, you hear me?"

"They have real doctors in Africa," Luke told her, backing up slightly and straightening his spine to his full 6’1” so that he was out of her reach.

"They got witchdoctors who do surgery out of mud huts!" She scoffed. "I watch that Discovery channel! You’re going to see Dr. Schwartz tomorrow."

"Dr. Schwartz is a general practitioner," Luke said with a snort. "We’d need to see an orthopedic surgeon if you’re that worried about my arm."

"Of course he’s a general practitioner! He’s no stupid specialist who only knows how to do one thing; he knows everything about being a doctor! He’s the General of doctors; that’s the best kind of doctor!" Peggy told him in a tone that would brook no arguments about it.

Luke shared a long suffering look with his siblings but no one dared to say a word. They were pretty sure that Peggy Ann and her theories about medicine are what paid for Dr. Schwartz’s house.

“Wait, how did you know Baby was coming home?” Lucius asked in confusion. “We only found out a few hours ago.”

Luke turned to Tam who had affected a look of pure innocence. “What?” She asked meeting all their stares. “I didn’t call him.”

“Tim called me,” Luke said, grinning at his sister happy to redirect their focus on his older sibling. “He said that Tam told him that I should come home.”

“What?” Tam asked again then heaved a sigh of aggravation. “Tim just happened to be in the room when I was talking to Felicity on the phone and he heard me say how nice it would be if the whole family was together, that’s all. I didn’t tell him to do anything; Tim’s got a mind of his own.”

“Right,” Felicity said, eyeing her sister knowingly. “Like Tim does anything without you telling him first.”

“Wait,” Lucius said, turning first to the large grandfather clock on the wall then to Tam with a scowl. “The flight from the DRC to Gotham is fourteen hours long; what exactly was Bruce’s son doing in your condo at that hour?”

“Um,” Tam leaned back on her heels and offered him a toothy grin, “borrowing a cup of sugar?”

“Sugar, right,” Lucius said disapprovingly. “Just you make sure that boy keeps his fingers out of the sugar bowl while I’m around, understood?”

“Dad!” Tam blushed as both her siblings began snickering loudly.

“Don’t ‘Dad’ me, young lady,” Lucius told her. “Mr. Drake-Wayne and I will be having words! He wants to play house and shack up with my daughter in an apartment I paid for then he’d better man up and state his intentions, you’d best start believing that!”

“They do if they want to shack up with one of my girls!” He told her with a thunderous expression.

“Your Daddy is right!” Peggy Ann said, smacking Tam on the back of the head causing her to cry out with a muted ‘Ow’. “He needs to show respect to you and to this house! Your father and I are too old to be raising babies!”

“Babies? Who said anything about babies?” Tam asked, rubbing the back of her head with a wince.

“I know where babies come from!” Peggy said sternly. “Don’t think I don’t!”

“I raised you and Baby to be respectable young ladies and I expect Bruce Wayne’s boy to know better,” Lucius said in solidarity with the elderly woman.

“Daddy,” Tam said with a whine, “I’m a grown up! Besides, I’ve never heard you tell Luke that he had to ‘state his intentions’ to any of the fathers of the hussies he used to hang out with.”

“Luke is a grown man and therefore some other father’s nightmare, you, however, are mine.” Lucius stated with a set to his jaw.

“Luke’s a grown up but I’m not? I’m older than he is!” Tam burst out.

As her sister and father continued to argue with the occasional bit of input by Peggy Ann, Felicity stepped back and slipped her arm around her brother and whispered, “It’s good to be home, huh?”

Luke wrapped his good arm around her and kissed the top of her head, “Sure is. I missed you, kiddo.”

“Me, too.”

The next morning Felicity sat at the breakfast table as she waited for the driver to call up to the penthouse. At first she had balked at the idea of going on such an extravagant spending spree on Bruce’s dime but then she changed her mind. What the hell, she thought, after all she’d gone through that past week she’d earned it. Besides, looking was not the same thing as spending.

Since she was going to be looking at the latest in haute couture and high-end pret-a porter she decided to look the part by dressing in one of the new outfits Bruce had paid for. Although she had rarely worn Armani in the past (the designer’s color palate and severe tailoring didn’t usually appeal to her) the latest collection did have a few bright spots of color and some flirtier pieces that suited her. Today she was wearing a minty juniper colored crepe dress and matching long jacket that ended in a flirty ruffle just above her knees. With it she paired some suede low heeled pumps in nude by the same designer and a Balenciaga clutch she just couldn’t pass up despite the enormous price tag. She’s had about half a second’s worth of guilt about it before saying ‘fuck it’ and snatching that too. Weather in Gotham was much colder than Starling City so she picked up a few coats as well. She planned on pairing her outfit with a cute little cashmere Burberry trench in a shade of ivory that set the pale green of her dress off perfectly.

As she watched her brother murder a huge bowl of cereal, her dad came up behind her and kissed the top of her head. “Good morning Baby. You look awfully dressed up just to go with Peggy Ann to take your brother to the doctor.”

“You didn’t say anything about my outfit, Dad,” Luke garbled around a mouthful of cereal as he indicated the corduroy sports coat, striped navy hoodie, and tan khaki’s he had on.

“You look pretty too, son,” Lucius said as he sat down and opened his paper.

“I’m not going to the doctor, Daddy. Alfred arranged for me to sit in on a private showing at Killinger’s this morning. He said he’d send the car around nine.”

“Mr. Alfred is coming?” Peggy Ann asked, smoothing her hands down her ruffled pink flowered apron before patting her more salt than pepper bob nervously. “You didn’t tell me that he might be coming by this morning.”

Lucius and Luke shot each other grins as Felicity looked over at her foster-grandmother. “I don’t think he’s actually coming himself, he said he’d arrange for one of the staff drivers to take me.”

“Peggy Ann, why don’t you just give it up and ask the man out on a date if you’re interested in him?” Luke asked with a grin.
“Because that’s not how it’s done,” she told him sternly as she swatted him with a napkin. “Here! Stop dribbling milk all over your shirt.”

Luke reached for the napkin and wiped his mouth with it. “I don’t see what the big deal is; girls ask me out all the time.”

“Mr. Alfred is a proper gentleman and proper gentlemen expect ladies to behave in a certain way, that’s why. Humph!” She huffed as she set the bowls of oatmeal from the sideboard in front of Lucius and Felicity. “And don’t compare me to those loose women you go around with. If Mr. Alfred is interested in me then he’ll ask me out in his own time.”

“Bah, oatmeal,” Lucius muttered as he glared at the bowl over his paper. “I’m sick of oatmeal.”

“I like it,” Felicity shrugged as she dug into the warm bowl of homemade gooey brown sugar, raisins, dates, and cinnamon goodness.

“That’s because she at least gave you something to kill the taste,” her dad grumbled as he stared down into the plain bowl of oats. “It wouldn’t kill me to have some eggs and a couple of sausages or even just some sugar and a little pat of butter on this muck every once in a while, you know.”

“The doctor said—“ Peggy began.

“The doctor said, the doctor said—bah!” Lucius said dismissively.

“You’ve got to start watching your health,” Peggy fussed at him as she set the teapot down by his cup. “If I start feeding you eggs and sausages and you keel over dead from a heart attack then what will you say?”

“He won’t say anything; he’ll be dead,” Luke said baldly causing Felicity to snort with laughter beside him.

“You hush, you bad boy!” Peggy fussed at him. The doorbell sounded and Peggy brushed her hands down her apron. “Eat!” She ordered a grumbling Lucius as she went to answer the door.

“That’s my ride,” Felicity said as she took one last sip of her juice before getting up from the table and hurrying out of the kitchen.

“Luke,” her dad whispered causing the other man to look up. He pointed to Felicity’s abandoned bowl and held out his own in exchange. “Pass it over.”

“Oh uh,” Luke said getting up from the table to follow his sister. “You’re not getting me in trouble, no way.”

“Damn it,” Lucius grumbled as he shoveled a spoonful of the plain oats into his mouth. “Bah!” He said before getting back to his paper.

Felicity and Luke made it to the foyer just in time to see a flustered Peggy Ann open the door to invite Alfred inside.

“Oh, Mr. Alfred,” Peggy Ann said in a sweetly accented tone. “We weren’t expecting you. Forgive my appearance, I was just fixing the family breakfast.”
“Not at all, Mrs. Hu, you look very lovely today,” he said as he bent slightly at the waist and kissed the air above her hand gallantly.

“Oh my,” she blushed in a way that made her look twenty years younger. “And please Mr. Alfred, as I’ve told you before just call me Peggy Ann.”

Luke looked down at the floor and snorted as Felicity elbowed him warningly. “Alfred! I didn’t think you were coming.”

Alfred cleared his throat and straightened his posture. “Yes, I was planning on arranging for one of the drivers with the car service your father uses to escort you, but since Master Bruce is in meetings for the rest of the day I thought you wouldn’t mind if I saw to it personally.”

“You didn’t have to do that,” she objected. “I’m sure you have better things to do with your day. Besides, I could have just gotten a cab or something.”

“Nonsense,” Alfred said, waving her off. “I volunteered, and besides,” he looked at Peggy Ann with a twinkle in his eye, “it gave me an opportunity to check in with Mrs. Hu, forgive me, Ms. Peggy Ann.”

“Oh Mr. Alfred,” Peggy Ann giggled girlishly as Luke continued to snicker in the background.

Felicity just rolled her eyes and grabbed her jacket and bag. “I’m ready then, after you.”

“Madam,” Alfred said, tipping his hat to the other woman before offering Felicity his elbow as he escorted her to the elevator.

“When are you going to just ask her out already?” Felicity asked him as soon as the elevator doors closed.

“Pardon?” Alfred asked with feigned confusion.

“What is it with you hero types and your inability to make things easy on the women in your lives,” Felicity muttered.

“Master Bruce is the hero, not me. Besides, between caring for the Manor and assisting in Master Bruce’s extracurricular activities, I haven’t the time for anything else.”

“I’ve heard that before,” she snorted as the doors opened to the lobby and he led her out to the limousine that was parked just outside. He held the door for her and she stopped, catching his sleeve before stepping inside. “Seriously, why are you taking me today when you could have had one of the staff drivers take me shopping or I could have just caught a cab?”

Alfred stepped close and spoke into her ear quietly, “Master Bruce and your Mr. Queen are concerned that you may be in some danger so they requested you not be left alone until they can further assess the situation. Master Bruce asked that I handle your security this morning personally.”

“You do know that I’m a big girl and I can handle myself, right?” She asked him wryly. “Besides the threat was canceled ages ago and anything else that might be after me is 3000 miles away in Starling City.”

“Of course, Miss,” Alfred said cordially as he assisted her into the back of the car. “However if it keeps Master Bruce happy it is my pleasure to do so. Also it gives us the opportunity to enjoy this lovely day together, does it not?”
Felicity waited until Alfred slipped behind the wheel to speak. “I’ll say one thing for you, Mr. Pennyworth. You certainly do have style.”

“Indeed, Miss.”

Felicity was not a vain woman. She liked clothes, yes, but she wasn’t caught up in the whole fashionista heiress thing despite what Oliver had said when he saw her ‘closet’. She just liked quality and if she was going to spend money on clothes she liked knowing that she looked good in them.

And then she was introduced to the world of private showrooms and personal shoppers.

It was like fashion Disneyland.

They weren’t clothes, they were works of art. After a brief ‘interview’ where she was measured and asked to describe her personal style, Felicity was handed a glass filled with champagne and orange juice (the breakfast of champions) and seated in a comfy chair while women matching her general body type swept through the room wearing clothes that looked like they were made just for her. From artfully torn jeans to fabulous couture gowns, they swirled around her with big toothy smiles in a sea of color.

For the first half hour or so, Felicity’s inner cheapskate wanted to run as far and fast as she could to the nearest outlet store. Even though it was Bruce’s money paying for everything the mere fact that no one was mentioning how much anything actually cost was nerve wracking. She held out as long as she could but then the very nice lady who was helping her (and who worked on commission) would refill her glass and she’d see an elegantly draped bit of silk or a scrap of lace that was just too lovely to say no to and the word ‘yes’ would just appear out of midair. In fact, as the hours passed she forgot the word ‘no’ altogether.

Not that she was a pig about it, she told herself. As lovely as most of the couture gowns were she limited her purchases to only a chosen few. She knew she’d have a need for evening wear as long as she was in Gotham so she picked out some beautifully styled gowns that emphasized her figure while still appearing relatively conservative; her favorites being two gowns by Monique Lhuillier, a designer she dearly loved but rarely wore due to her strict budgeting.

Most of her purchases were selected from the ‘ready to wear’ designer collections. She managed to find quite a few pieces from several different designers (some she’d never worn before because she could never afford them on her budget) along with delicate looking lingerie and foundation garments, shoes, handbags, jewelry, and accessories.

Every time she said ‘yes’ to another bright and beautiful dress the woman directing the action made sure her Mimosa was topped off. By lunch time she wasn’t sure if she was tipsy on champagne or on a shop-a-holic high. She didn’t even want to know how much she spent by the end of the day, merely handing the personal shopper Bruce’s card and letting her take care of the details. The gowns and some of the jackets and things had to be altered due to her petite frame but the rest she scheduled to be delivered to her dad’s place.

As she left the private showroom a dark haired woman stopped her, “Excuse me, but aren’t you Felicity Smoak?”

“Yes, do I know you?” Felicity asked as she examined the woman’s face and tried to place her but couldn’t. If she had to choose two words to describe her, the first would be ‘exotic’ and the second would be ‘gorgeous’. With her inky black hair, dark heavily lashed eyes, delicate features, and bronzed complexion the woman in question was certainly unforgettable.

“No, but we do have some mutual acquaintances.” She handed her a card.

Felicity looked at the black card with the raised red lettering and the holographic ‘S’ curiously. She flipped it over, “Miranda Tate, CEO.” She looked up at her with a raised eyebrow. “You’re with Stellmoor International.”

“Yes, but I promise I’m not stalking you or anything,” Miranda laughed attractively. “Believe me, I’m just as surprised to see you as you probably are to see me. I’m just here for the new Dolce & Gabbana line. I saw it in Paris, of course, but what you see on the runway is never quite the same as what makes it to the stores.”

“No, of course,” Felicity said, suddenly feeling a bit exposed. She tried to hide her discomfort with a polite smile. “I bought a few pieces from their collection myself.”

“I saw that,” Miranda nodded. “The yellow A-line dress with the kimono and the beading?” Felicity nodded in mild surprise. “Yes, I thought it was adorable but, unfortunately, it’s just not my color,” she made a growly sound of disappointment and smiled so brightly that Felicity was temporarily blinded it. “Yellow has a bad habit of making me look green around the gills. Oh well.”

“I can’t believe you’d ever look bad in anything, you’re freaking gorgeous,” Felicity said then cringed. “Sorry! One too many Mimosas. Just ignore me, please!”

Miranda laughed, a high and tinkling sound that suited her. “No, it’s fine. Thanks, actually. After all the drudgery of going from meeting to meeting while trying to shake off jet lag, I’m glad someone thinks I still clean up nice.” She tilted her head and smiled at her curiously, “You know, since we’re both here, would you like to get some coffee or something?”

“I would, but I’m with someone,” Felicity’s eyes scanned the crowd behind Miranda until she spotted Alfred who had been examining a selection of umbrellas. She waved and the older man nodded and started toward them. “Rain check?”

“Of course,” Miranda said easily, seemingly unperturbed by given the brush-off. “Call me sometime and we’ll do lunch.”

“Sure, thanks. Nice meeting you,” she said, putting the card in her purse before setting off toward Alfred.

“You, too,” she said before heading off towards the escalators.

As soon as she approached Alfred he took her by the elbow and frowned as he watched the other woman fade into the crowd. “Who was that woman who was talking to you?” He asked quietly.

“Business contact,” she answered him. “Just someone I met briefly back in Starling City. She happened to recognize me and asked me out for coffee but I told her I already had plans.”

Alfred nodded, seemingly satisfied, and they continued on their way. She felt a moment’s worth of guilt for lying to the older man but she knew if she told him that she was from Stellmoor and why they were trying to hire her he’d go to Bruce and then she’d be lucky to ever see the light of day again. Bruce would overreact and have her under lock and key so fast her head would spin. Besides, there was no way they could have known she’d be here, Felicity argued to herself silently. Even she didn’t know she’d be here yesterday. Maybe it was really just a coincidence after all. Gotham was a big city but Killinger’s catered to a very affluent clientele and it would be quite easy to imagine running into someone like Miranda Tate here. She decided to forget the whole thing and just enjoy the rest of her day instead.

Afterwards she and Alfred had a long and pleasant lunch at Jean Georges where he insisted they order the tasting menu (on Bruce of course). The elegant atmosphere, the delicious food, and the pleasant company went a long way towards making her feel a lot better than she had in a long time. By the time they were done they were both stuffed and Alfred had managed to charm the recipe for the Parmesan Risotto and Caramelized Beef Tenderloin from the chef, promising to recreate it for her the next time she stopped by the manor.

He offered to continue their day with more shopping or a visit to one of the local galleries but her feet were positively aching by then. Marathon shopping was always best done in sneakers, not heels. Promising to do this with him again someday soon (specifically the next time Bruce needed a kick in the ass), she had him drop her by Wayne Enterprises so that she could stop and see her sister to make plans for the evening. After assuring him she would get a ride home with Tam, Felicity headed upstairs to her office.

“Felicity!” Ellen, Tam’s PA greeted her with a wide smile as she got off the elevator. “I didn’t know you had gotten back. Are you here for just a visit or are you back permanently?”

“Haven’t decided yet,” she hedged. “Is Tam in?”

“She’s just in a meeting with the other department heads and then she’ll be right out. If you like you can wait out here for her.” Ellen said, indicating one of the plush leather couches in the reception area. “Do you want anything? I was just heading out to make a quick coffee run for Tam.”

“That would be great. Latte?” She asked.

“Sure thing,” Ellen grinned.

Felicity sat on the couch and picked up a magazine, thumbing through it half-heartedly. She looked around the elegant offices and felt a twinge of homesickness all of the sudden. If she were back in Starling she’d be busy at her desk or ordering a late lunch for her, Oliver, and Diggle to eat in his office as they strategized for that evening’s activities. Today was fun and all but this wasn’t the kind of life she’d ever envisioned for herself. She wanted more out of life than marathon shopping and hanging with the ladies (and British gentlemen) who lunch set. She really needed to get back to work and soon.

“Felicity.”

She looked up to see Bruce standing across from her. She put down her magazine and stood to greet him so that his height advantage wasn’t so overwhelming, “Bruce.” Her eyes skimmed his face taking note of the slight swelling and darkening along his jawline and the small cut above his eyebrow, the only outward signs of his and Oliver’s clash from the day before.

“How was your flight?” He asked quietly, his hands shoved awkwardly in his pockets.

“Fine,” she said. “How’s your face?”

He reached up and rubbed his jaw with a slight grimace. “Sore.”

“Can’t exactly say I’m sorry about that,” she returned coolly.

“Felicity, about what happened yesterday, I—“

“Hey girl!” Tam greeted as she walked up to them both. “Bruce,” she said in a far less friendly tone as she arched a perfectly groomed eyebrow in his direction.

“Tam,” Bruce greeted, clearing his throat slightly. “I’ll talk to you later,” he said nodding at Felicity before heading off to the elevators.

Tam watched as he made his escape, her full lips pursed in thought, “I know that he can be an ass but, damn.” She looked over at her sister with a saucy wink. “Baby, you have got to start giving me details because that man has my imagination racing with the way he wears those suits of his.”

“Yeah,” Felicity agreed with a sigh. “I wish I could tell you it was just good tailoring but the truth is that the man could be wearing nothing but a wet paper sack and he’d still look good.”

“Ooh, wet Bruce Wayne,” Tam seemed to ponder that for a moment. And then another moment.

“Tam?” Felicity said trying to get her attention as the seconds began to tick by.

“Hush, I’m still thinking.” She said, waving her off.

“You’re impossible,” Felicity snorted. “What about Tim?”

“What about him?” Tam asked, brushing a lock of her artfully styled and highlighted dark caramel colored hair behind her ear. “First of all thinking isn’t cheating and secondly, Tim and I are officially unofficial.”

“You’re practically living together,” she pointed out.

“He happens to sleep over every once in a while, that’s all,” Tam dodged.

“How often is ‘every once in a while’?”

“Oh shut up,” Tam said, sticking her tongue out. She then took Felicity by the arm and led her to her office. As soon as the door closed behind them she pounced, “Okay Baby, now spill.”

“What?” Felicity asked innocently.

“Oh no, you don’t get to play that game with me. When I came up you and Bruce were talking like something happened between the two of you yesterday and I want all the sexy details,” she demanded playfully.

“There are no sexy details,” she huffed as she flopped down on one of the chairs across from her sister’s glass and chrome desk. She looked out of the large bank of windows that had gorgeous views of the Gotham skyline. “Nice office.”

“You’ve seen it before so stop hedging and get to talking,” Tam demanded.

“First you get to tell me why you called Luke,” Felicity said fixing her sister with a stern look.

“I didn’t,” Tam said innocently.

“You told Tim to call and you know it, my question is why? And another thing, calling our brother because Bruce is picking on me? Seriously?” Felicity asked dryly. “This isn’t kindergarten and no one is after my lunch money, Tamara.”

“I just thought Luke could talk to him, that’s all,” Tam shrugged, avoiding her eyes.

“And what was he going to do if talking didn’t work? Beat Bruce up for breaking his little sister’s “heart?” She asked sarcastically.

“You said he put his hands on you, okay? It pissed me off,” Tam said defiantly.

“He wasn’t trying to hurt me, Tam,” Felicity flushed. “It was…in the heat of the moment.”

“I don’t care! At the time I was angry and I hadn’t had my coffee yet so I acted, sue me. Besides, no man ever has the right to put his hands on you and you know it,” Tam shot back. “There is no excuse for it, period.”

“Look, Bruce is not on my list of favorite people right now and I know it sounds bad but he would never hurt me; not like that, and not on purpose. After it happened he apologized,” Felicity sighed. “He’s not a monster, he was just excited and he left a couple of bruises on my shoulder.”

“So said every victim of domestic abuse, ever,” Tam said with a scowl.

Felicity laughed, “Tam! I’m not a victim of ‘domestic abuse’, I swear!”

“Yeah, well, you might be right but he still needs his ass kicked,” Tam said stubbornly, crossing her arms over her chest. “I mean, who has sex with someone and then dumps them immediately afterwards twice? That was a shitty, shitty thing to do and he must be squished like a bug and taught the error of his ways. No one fucks with the Fox Sisters and gets away with it.”

“Why not? Luke can handle himself in a fight. He took all those martial arts classes and did that kickboxing stuff,” Tam said in a strangely furtive manner.

“What aren’t you telling me, Tam?” Felicity asked suspiciously.

Tam made a sound of dismay and clutched her chest protectively, “Moi? Hide something from my baby sister? Never!”

“You are so full of—“

“Hi, sorry to interrupt but I have your coffees,” Ellen said from the door as she carried in two large paper cups with the Wayne Enterprises logo on them.

“Thanks,” Tam said, taking the coffees from her assistant before practically shoving her out the door. “Now go away and hold all my calls!”

“B-but you have a meeting—“ Ellen stuttered and Felicity got up to follow her out, snatching her latte from Tam along the way.

“That’s okay,” Felicity said as she slipped outside. “Come over tonight and we’ll talk, okay?”

“But…aw,” Tam said before stomping her feet with a pout. “That’s not fair!”

“Tough,” she said, raising her latte and giving Ellen a grateful smile. She waved at her sister as she headed to the elevators. “Call me!”

“You don’t have your phone,” Tam protested from the door to her office.

“Oh yeah, right,” Felicity said with a tilt of her head before slipping into the elevator just before the doors closed.
Felicity chuckled as she sipped her coffee appreciatively on the way down to the lobby. From the corner of her eye she spotted a familiar face in a well-tailored suit talking to some of the uniformed security guards. “Hey Paul,” she said walking up to the security desk.

“Baby! I heard you were back,” the older man said with a wide grin. “Are you here for a visit or back to stay?”

“Haven’t quite decided yet,” she said, wondering how many more times she’d have to answer that particular question before the week was out.

“Wait a minute,” he said, holding her shoulder gently and waving over a few of the security personnel she didn’t recognize. As they neared he introduced her. “Boys, this is Miss Felicity Fox, Mr. Fox’s other daughter. Baby here used to come in with her daddy when she was just a tiny little bit of fluff and bring me cookies so I would take her into the security office. She used to love looking at all the computers and closed circuit surveillance equipment so much you’d have thought she was riding the elephants at the circus. You were always such a bright, inquisitive little thing,” he said, hugging her shoulder one-handed.

Oh, how little times have changed, Felicity thought to herself.

“Baby, this is David Fisk, Marvin Daily, and Jake Simmons. Fisk and Daily are with building security and Jake acts as your Dad’s daytime driver and private security when he’s in Gotham.” He waited until each man greeted her with a muted ‘Ma’am’ before continuing.

“Hi,” she said to all of them before turning to Paul. “What happened to Zeke and Mr. Monroe?”

“Old Zeke retired to Florida to be near his daughter about six months ago and Mr. Monroe had back surgery so he decided to take a leave of absence.” He turned to the younger man again. “Trust me, though; your Dad’s in good hands with Jake.”

“I’m sure he is,” Felicity said giving the man another smile before speaking again to Paul. “Paul, I lost my phone and Tam and Dad are in meetings. Would you mind calling me a cab?”

“No need for that, Jake can take you, right?” He asked, meeting the tall blond man’s deep brown eyes inquisitively.

“Certainly, ma’am,” Jake said with an easy grin. “Your dad won’t need me for at least another hour or so. Where did you need to go?”

“Just home, thanks,” she told him, returning his smile. “Are you sure I’m not taking you from something more important? I mean, a cab will do.”

“It’s fine, ma’am. Besides, I imagine that if you’re going to be staying here awhile Mr. DioGuardi will be assigning you your own security detail soon enough.”

“I don’t think that will be necessary,” she said quickly.

“No, Jake’s right, Baby,” Paul told her. “I’ll get with your dad today and talk over the logistics with him. Until then I’ll have Jake take you where you need to go and assign your dad another driver until we get you sorted.”

“Paul, no offense to Mr. Simmons, but I didn’t have a security detail before I left Gotham and I didn’t have one in Starling either. It’s really not necessary, I promise.”

“Times change, Baby,” Paul said, his features darkening slightly. “Gotham has gotten even more dangerous since you’ve been gone, if you can believe it. There have been a few threats against the company and your father personally.”

“Against Dad?” Felicity asked with a frown. “No one said anything to me about that.”

“He probably didn’t want to worry you but there has been an increase in crime and it’s better to be safe than sorry,” Paul said easily.

“Ask me it’s that Batman character’s fault,” the man Paul introduced as ‘David Fisk’ said harshly. “He’s the one who brought all those masked freaks into the city in the first place.”

Paul eyed the man sharply, “No one asked you, Fisk. Maybe you should get upstairs and go back over those reports again.”

“Yes, sir. Excuse me sir, ma’am,” Fisk said, all but snapping a salute as he and the other one, Daily, walked away.

“Aren’t you a former Marine?” Felicity asked with a half-smile although Fisk’s comments did put her off somewhat. Even though she knew the Batman and his crew operated under the cover of night for a reason it still bothered her when people dismissed all the sacrifices they had made only to lump them together with the very criminals they stopped on a daily basis.

“There’s a difference between a hard charger like me and a couple of ‘Semper, I’ blue falcons like Fisk and Daily,” Paul huffed. “Those particular Jarheads are just a couple of hotheads if you ask me. Less than six-months out and it’s like they’re back on the block. I keep having to break it down Barney style for ‘em! First chance I get, those two are getting shipped off and out of my hair. Now Jake here,” he slapped the other man on the shoulder, “He’s what you call a good piece of gear. He knows how to think things through while those guys would just storm in and blow shi—er, stuff up.” He cleared his throat and gave her a quick hug and a kiss on the cheek. “It was nice seeing you, Baby. Jake will take you wherever you need to go and I’ll tell your dad, okay?”

“Paul, I’m really not interested in a security detail,” she told him one last time. “Tam doesn’t have one, does she?”

Paul looked at her in consternation, “No, but not for lack of trying on my part.” He smiled slightly and winked at her, “Oh hell Baby, as far as me and your dad are concerned both you girls are too pretty to be set out on the streets of Gotham on your own.” He sighed, “You sure you want to turn it down?”

“I’m sure,” she said firmly. “I can take care of myself.”

“Baby, you’re making me old before my time,” Paul grumbled good naturedly. “Fine, I’ll let your dad know. Still, at least for today, take Jake with you, alright?”

“Thanks Paul,” Felicity said offering him a bright smile as Jake led her out.

“Come by sometime and see me,” he said as he waved goodbye. “Bring some of Peggy Ann’s cookies and I might even let you in the security office for old time’s sake.”

“I figured we could take the Mercedes instead of the limo,” Jake said as he opened the door for her and made sure she was safely seated inside before going around and slipping into the driver’s seat. “Your dad likes to use the limo so he can spread out his paperwork between meetings.”
“This is fine,” she said easily as she leaned back into the supple leather. “I’m not picky. Back in Starling City I usually just drove around in a Mini.”

“Cooper, huh?” Jake nodded while keeping his eyes on traffic. “Nice cars but a little cramped for me.”

“I’ve heard that before,” she chuckled. “I noticed you have an accent; where are you from?”

“Oh, so I take it I don’t sound like a Gotham City boy to you then?” He chuckled, allowing his drawl to deepen in response. “I’m originally from Mississippi, ma’am. I was in the Rangers until I completed my last tour and got a job with Wayne Security.”

“I had a friend who was with the Rangers back in Starling City; Sergeant Major John Diggle out of Afghanistan.”

“Airborne or Special Forces?” He asked.

“Special Forces, you?”

“Airborne, ma’am. 75th regiment. I served in Afghanistan myself. Do you know what company your friend was with? We might have crossed paths and not known it.”

“I’m not sure but he mentioned the Blackhawks.”

Jake’s eyes flicked upward to the rearview mirror in surprise. “Under Colonel Ted Gaynor, ma’am?”

“I think so, why?” Felicity asked curiously.

“Um, it’s just that the Blackhawks were legendary. How many tours did Sergeant Major Diggle serve for?”

“Three.”

Jake cleared his throat and shifted in his seat, “That’s, um, okay. Wow, your friend must be a pretty tough guy.”

“He doesn’t talk about it much, but yeah, he’s pretty tough,” she agreed. “If you were Airborne why are you driving my dad around Gotham and not flying a helicopter or something?”

“I manage to get up in a bird every once in a while,” Jake said easily. “When they hired me they wanted someone who could handle security in the air as well as on the ground. If your dad needs me to I can handle a stick on a bird or hop in the cockpit just as easily as I can thread a limo through midtown traffic during rush hour.”

“Wow, I feel honored having you around to act as my personal on-call hero then,” Felicity teased with a tongue touched smile.

The blond man grinned back at her sheepishly as a slight flush colored his cheeks. He cleared his throat as they pulled up to the front of Wayne Towers. “Here we are, Ma’am. Stay there and I’ll get your door for you.”

Jake walked around to her side and offered her his hand as he helped her out of the car. “Thank you,” she said as soon as she was on her feet. “And please, call me Felicity. I insist.”

“Felicity,” he repeated, his smile making his handsome features all the more attractive. “It suits you, but then again so does ‘Baby’.” He teased then apologized as he noticed her cheeks go bright pink.
His deep chocolate eyes filled with regret, “I’m sorry, I didn’t mean to embarrass you it’s just that me being a Southern boy I’m a bit used to young ladies being called by that particular nickname.”

“Yeah, my dad is from the South, as well.” Felicity said sheepishly. “It’s not entirely his fault though; my sister started calling me ‘Baby’ originally, he just made sure it stuck.”

“Pretty blue eyes like yours, I can see why,” he said teasingly in his honeyed whiskey drawl and grinned as she blushed again. “Here,” he said as he handed her a card. “I know what you told Mr. DioGuardi but, just in case you ever need an ‘on-call hero’ again,” she smiled and he winked at her, “you can just call me and I’ll come pick you up.”

“Thanks Jake,” she said, taking his card.

“And, um, if you find yourself needing company while you’re here visiting I don’t clean up half bad,” Jake said brushing his nails on the lapel of his jacket and blowing on them jokingly. “I reckon you know Gotham better than I do, being a native and all, but I might be able to reintroduce you to a few spots you might have forgotten.”

“Why Mr. Simmons, are you flirting with the boss’s daughter?” Felicity teased back.

“Could be,” he said with a shrug, then fixed her with a slightly more serious eye. “That is if you’re okay with it.”

“I’m okay with it,” Felicity said, feeling her Mimosa induced courage one more time before it completely left her bloodstream. “I’ll see you around Jake Simmons.”

“My pleasure, Miss Felicity. You have yourself a good night now,” he said with one last grin before slipping back behind the driver’s seat and heading off.

Felicity looked down at the card in her hand and smiled happily. Nothing like being flirted with by a good looking guy to give you a bit of an ego boost, she thought. She headed upstairs with a bit more of a spring to her step, her problems melting away. At least for the moment.
Chapter Twenty

After work Oliver immediately drove to Orchid Bay to confront Walter at his home in the Mayor’s Mansion. He understood Dig’s apprehension about him doing this. Walter was one of the last links his sister had to their mother, not to mention the fact that Walter was a friend of the Arrow and had saved their asses on more than one occasion either by bailing him out financially or by offering them political clout in order to keep the mission going. To be honest, he hoped Walter wasn’t part of this mess himself, but he had to know for sure. After that, he had no idea what he’d do.

It took him a long time to get over the deep feeling of betrayal he’d felt the first time he’d learned of his sister’s true parentage over two years ago. After months of giving his mother the cold shoulder, after almost hating her, they’d reconciled over her kidnapping and recovery. Then came that terrible night when Roy had a psychotic episode that had nearly killed all of them and his mother had been murdered by Slade. Their team, as well as his family, had taken several hits that day. Sara left him because she needed time to battle her demons in peace after trying to kill Roy, Roy was in a coma, Moira was dead, and Thea was a wreck. When Roy had finally stabilized it hadn’t gone well. Roy resented him, Thea was angry at both him and Roy and still grieving for their mother, and he was dealing with the fact that his mother’s lies ran deeper than any of them could have imagined when he found out that not only was Merlyn still alive and that she had known, but that she had paid the girl he had gotten pregnant when he was eighteen to go away and to lie about the miscarriage.

He sighed and raked his fingers through his dark blond hair. He lost her for a while after that. Not only couldn’t she forgive him for not taking out Slade the year before, she didn’t understand how he could walk away from his own child. That had been...hard. As much as he wanted to be a father to his son, he knew he would always be a target. He and Sandra agreed that it would be for the best if Oliver stayed away and that they go into Waller’s Witness Protection Program. He had a man in his life, one who wanted to adopt him, so Oliver signed away his parental rights with the understanding that if Connor needed him, or ever wanted to know him, he’d be available.

It wasn’t great, but it was the best he could do for him. In the end, it was Felicity who managed to get through to her. To this day he didn’t know what she did or said to bring her back, but it worked. He’d finished off two bottles of vodka and was working his way through a fifth of scotch when Felicity showed up with Thea close behind. They held him in their arms, and they cried it out together. Somehow, even after all they’d been through, she forgave him and they both forgave their mother with Felicity between them as the glue holding them together.
Making things right with Roy had taken even longer, the younger man only rejoining their team again after being on his own for almost a year. Again, that was Felicity. She’s the one who talked him into coming back, she got Sara and Roy together to talk it out, and she convinced him to give Thea the space she needed to mend her relationship with him even if it was a work in progress.

Felicity.

He tightened his hands on the steering wheel. It was all coming back together; just a few days ago everything was right in the world, his family was on solid ground, his business was succeeding and Felicity…

He could still taste her. He could still remember the noises she made when he held her, the look of wonder in her eyes when he brought her to orgasm. Sex was something he’d always enjoyed but never really wasted emotions on. It was an act, a fun act, but just a physical coupling of one body into another. At one point in his life fucking was as impersonal as a firm handshake. It hadn’t been like that with her and now she was gone because of Isabel and his mother—

His fists clenched again causing the leather on the steering wheel to squeal in protest as he gnashed his teeth together. She had never warmed up to Felicity even after they reconciled as mother and son. Felicity never said anything either before or after Moira’s death but he could always tell when she’d had contact with his mother from the expression on her face. Even two years later whenever Thea would mention their mother in front of her Felicity would shift uncomfortably and not say anything. He knew his mother was capable of a lot but if she had killed her…

He parked in front of the mansion and rested his head on the steering wheel as he shut his eyes. Felicity had been there from the very beginning, fixing all of them, making things better, saving them all, and how did he repay her? By sleeping with her then sending her away.

That had been a dick move on his part; it had been an Ollie move. She said she’d never met Ollie but she had that day. What’s worse is that he sent her away with him, that son of a bitch Wayne. He snorted. What right did he have to be jealous though? How could he possibly give her the life she deserved when he couldn’t even do that for Thea, or Connor, or anyone else for that matter? No, she was better off in Gotham even if it meant being with that bastard. It didn’t mean he had to like it, it just meant he had to endure it.

He might never be the man she thought he could be, he might never be able to be the man he wanted to be for her, but he could at least try to keep her safe even if that meant burying his mother and the last of her secrets once and for all.

He turned off the ignition and walked up to the mansion where he was greeted by a member of the house staff and immediately shown to Walter’s private study. The older man was on the phone and from the side of the conversation he could hear it he was probably talking to Mark Francis about the upcoming election against a corrupt financier by the name of John Deleon.

Deleon was crooked but he was also slick as goose shit, a true politician. Not surprising, he thought grimly. After all, what was politics but controlled manipulation and Deleon was a master at it. It was fairly obvious that he was dirty and had been accused of everything from laundering money for the mob to having connections to several drug kingpins but nothing ever stuck. Despite his less than stellar reputation, he was using every dirty trick he could to give Walter a hell even though the other man was still managing to pull ahead in the polls. If he had to take down Walter it would open up a whole other can of worms but it had to be done. If he was a part of this, he had to know.

He looked up in surprise as he glanced up from his call. “Mark, hold on a minute, will you? Oliver just walked in.” He placed his hand over the receiver and turned to him, “I’ll just be another minute and then we can talk.”

“No problem,” Oliver said with a hint of grim determination in his tone despite his casual cadence. “I just need to know if you hired a hitman to take out Felicity or if it was my mother who made the call instead.”

Shock flashed across the other man’s features and his grip loosened on the phone. He could hear Mark’s panicked voice demanding to know what the hell he was talking about. Walter quickly placed the phone up to his ear and adopted a smooth tone of feigned amusement, “He was just kidding, Mark; you know Oliver. Yes, I know. Mark, stop panicking; nothing is wrong. Yes, I’m sure. Now, if you don’t mind, I need to talk a little business with my step-son. Okay, I’ll call you tomorrow. Bye.” He put the phone back on its cradle and hurried to the office door to close it before giving Oliver a look of righteous indignation, “What on Earth were you thinking? You’re just lucky it was Mark on the other end of the phone and not a member of the press! If a member of the news corps ever got ahold of a sound byte like that it could ruin all of us!”

“Frankly Walter, I’m beyond giving a shit at this point,” he said tightly.

“Well, you should!” He told him forcefully. “Besides the company and your own future political career, you need to think of how a rumor like that would affect Thea! We’ve had to endure and survive a hell of a lot since your mother’s death, much of it her fault, but she would never try to kill anyone and the last thing we need is to have her name or ours further muddied in the press!”

“I don’t have a political career, Walter; not now and certainly not in the future.”

Walter’s features softened and he huffed out a breath even as Oliver looked on angrily, “Son, you’re not only a Queen but a Dearden and public service is part of your legacy.”

“Just because my grandfather was governor doesn’t mean that I’m ever going to run for office,” he said irritably.

“Not just your grandfather,” Walter pointed out. “Your great-grandfather was a senator, his brother was a congressman; the Dearden’s have been political royalty for generations and you’re just beginning to come into your own. By the time John Dearden was your age he was already campaigning to become lieutenant governor and within four years he was the governor of this state and maintained that office proudly until he ran for president. Had he not been killed in that plane crash during the campaign he would have won. And let’s not forget your mother—”

Oliver cut him off, “First off, I’ve heard this speech my entire life; there’s no need to rehash it now. Secondly, did you or my mother hire a contractor to take out Felicity after she told you both that Malcolm Merlyn was Thea’s biological father?”

Walter scowled at him, “You’re damn lucky I had this office swept for bugs this afternoon. We found three bugs in my office at City hall and several more at our campaign headquarters.”

“Your problem with Deleon and his dirty tricks will have to wait, Walter. Right now I need to know the truth,” he said firmly.

“Your mother was capable of a lot of things, Oliver, but murder wasn’t one of them,” he said firmly.

“Are you sure?” Oliver asked with a steady look. “She conspired with Merlyn, lied to us about Thea her entire life, hid my son from me, had you kidnapped—honestly I have to wonder if she didn’t have anything to do with the Queen’s Gambit going down in the first place much less that she put a hit on my assistant.”
“Your mother loved you,” Walter said steadily, his eyes beginning to burn with anger as well. “Yes, she made bad decisions and was way over her head because of it, but she would never hurt you deliberately. Every lie she ever told was to protect her family. She tried to hide the truth from Thea to protect you both, she lied to you about Connor to protect your future, she had me kidnapped to protect me from Merlyn—”

“At what point do we stop making excuses for everything she ever did to us?” Oliver burst out. “At what point do we stop trying to turn her into some goddamn plaster saint of charity and motherhood and call her out for what she was; a monster?”

Walter took two steps towards him, his fists clenched at his sides, and bit out, “Moira Queen was not a monster! She was your mother and she loved you! She was human, she made mistakes,” he ran a shaky hand over his bald pate and stalked towards the mini bar near the bookshelves and poured himself two generous fingers of scotch. He took a drink to steady himself before turning back to Oliver. He placed the rock glass down deliberately before speaking, “I left your mother because of her secrets, so I know better than anyone how you’re feeling right now. I wouldn’t reconcile with her when she asked because I couldn’t trust her anymore. Despite that, I know in my heart that your mother would never try to hurt you or me by going after Felicity like that.”

“And what about you, Walter?” Oliver asked coldly as he approached the man again. “Felicity said she went to you with that information before she went to my mother. You had a lot to lose if that information got out.”

“I would never--!” Walter’s mouth tightened into a grim line as he finally lost his temper. It took him several seconds to get his emotions under control before he could speak again, “Do you even know what Felicity means to me?”

“No, not really,” Oliver said, unimpressed by his outburst.

“I've known Felicity since she was a baby, Oliver,” he told him, his gaze clear and direct. “If Moira had tried to hurt that girl I would have turned her into the police myself. At the very least, I would have tried to stop her.”

He narrowed his eyes at the other man, “You’ve known Felicity that long?”

“Yes,” he bit out. “Lucius Fox was my friend, the best friend I ever had other than your father. He was my mentor, my teacher, and I respect him more than any other person on this Earth. When Felicity’s mother died, he practically kept that girl by his side 24/7. She went everywhere with him. He even kept her in his office while he was working. If she wasn’t at school, she was with Lucius and I watched that little girl grow up. I would never hurt Felicity, Oliver. Never!”

“So you knew all about Felicity’s past and you never told me?” Oliver asked, feeling a new kind of betrayal.

“Felicity didn’t want anyone to know about her association with the Fox name,” he said in a much calmer tone as he began to relax again. “She didn’t want to be shown any type of favoritism or have her presence within the company seen as a conflict of interest. Not that it would have been; Lucius kept her shares in Wayne Enterprises in a blind trust so she could work anywhere she wanted to without any sort of legal issues cropping up,” he added.

“So that’s why you hired her?” He asked, “Because of her father?”

“No, not at all,” he said quickly. “I hadn’t seen Felicity since she was ten years old and, other than the occasional business venture between QC and one of Wayne’s subsidiaries, I hadn’t kept in touch with Lucius either. When he called me four years ago and sent me her résumé I hired her, not because she was his daughter, but because she was brilliant,” he assured him. “Originally I had intended to put her in Applied Sciences where she could really shine, but she requested we place her into the first entry level position we had which was in IT even though she was grossly overqualified.”

“So you lied to me,” Oliver said slowly. “You knew who she was and you never told me.”

He sighed walked towards him, placing his hand on Oliver’s shoulder comfortingly, “I never lied, Oliver; I just kept her confidence and stayed out of it because that’s what she wanted. When I saw how close you two had gotten, I was truly overjoyed that she was helping you and that you were, in turn, helping her.” His lips tightened for a moment as he seemed to struggle with something, “Like I said, I watched her grow up but I never really had a large presence in her life. I can’t tell you much, it’s not my place, but one thing I can tell you is that she is truly Lucius Fox’s daughter. She has his integrity and sense of honor. I saw you get better and I had hoped your mother would see that as well, that she would recognize that Felicity had made an important impact upon your life. I thought about telling your mother who she was after their confrontation but I knew that if Felicity hadn’t yet shared that part of her life with you then it wasn’t my place.”

“Why didn’t she tell me?” Oliver said, his anger at his mother now turning into resentment toward Felicity and the pain of loss he now felt at her absence.

Walter dropped his hand from his shoulder and shook his head, “I can’t say.”

“Can’t or won’t?”

Walter’s lips thinned in contrition once again, “Things weren’t always easy for her, Oliver.” He walked away, turning his back on him as he rubbed the back of his neck in consternation. He glanced up at him, “Maybe you should be discussing this with her?”

“I can’t,” he bit out, averting his eyes. “Something…something happened and she left. She went back to Gotham and she’s not coming back.”

“This contract you were talking about?” Walter asked looking up sharply. “Is it related to…?” He let the question hang in the air between them.

“I don’t know,” Oliver said honestly. Walter rarely discussed his being the Arrow with him openly even though he was considered a team friendly. “All I know is that the Bat showed up and told us he had information that a contract had been placed on Felicity approximately eighteen months ago.”

“Batman was here?” Understanding lit up his eyes, “And thus you immediately thought of your mother and her campaign,” he nodded to himself. “Did you consider Slade or Blood?”

“If Slade or Blood wanted to kill Felicity, they would have done it themselves,” Oliver told him.

“What aren’t you telling me?” Walter asked, his eyes sharp.

Oliver debated revealing everything for a moment before deciding to go with his gut, “Isabel Rochev approached Felicity the other day and revealed that she knows who I am and the identities of some of our team members. Supposedly she tried to recruit her for some kind of private vigilante army being backed by Stellmoor.”

Again, Walter’s eyes opened wide in surprise, “Does she know about--?”

“No,” Oliver told him. “At least I don’t think so. The only other person on my team aware of the fact that you know my secret besides Diggle and myself, is Felicity, but you might want to be prepared just in case.”

He nodded solemnly, “So that’s why you sent Felicity away? To protect her?”

“Among other things,” he responded grimly.

“I’m sorry,” he said sincerely. “I know that must have been very hard for you.” He paused, “Any chance it was Isabel Rochev?”

“It’s possible, but again she’s had numerous opportunities to take her out and it just doesn’t make sense. Besides, if she had put a hit on Felicity, she would have followed through with the contract.” Walter nodded as he agreed with his logic. “What can you tell me about…about Felicity’s past?” He asked hesitantly. “I know you want to keep her confidence, and I appreciate that, but I need to know if this threat is on our end or if it started off in Gotham.”

Walter again seemed torn for a moment, “What did she tell you?”

“Not much,” Oliver admitted. “Just that she had a brother and a sister and that Lucius was her dad. She did mention that she was stalked by some frat kid in college when she was 14 but I doubt that has any bearing on anything other than the fact that the guy was a creep.”

“Sebastian Hady’s son,” Walter said grimly. “I remember that. The boy’s father is Gotham’s version of Deleon but you’re probably right about there being no connection. He died a few years ago in a drunken driving accident. Honestly, I can’t think of anyone who would target Felicity who isn’t connected with your extracurricular activities. She was…incredibly sheltered as a child. She literally spent every spare moment in Lucius’s office growing up. I doubt she even had any friends other than immediate family. I never saw her play with any children her own age other than Luke and Tam and, after reconnecting with her when she joined QC, I doubt much had changed for her since I left other than the fact that she spoke more. For a long time I knew that Tanya and Lucius were afraid she was autistic because she was so quiet.”

He couldn’t help but snort at that, “Felicity was quiet?”

Walter smiled and leaned against the corner of his desk, “Believe it or not, yes. She was so quiet that most of the time you’d forget she was even in the room. She’d just sit in the corner and read a book or draw while Lucius worked even as a toddler. Even before Evie died she practically lived in that little corner. Because she was so ill and her immune system was so badly compromised, Felicity had to be kept away from her so Lucius and his office became her whole world. I remember watching Lucius nearly break down once when she referred to it as ‘home’ because, for her, that’s what it had become. He wound up taking a partial leave of absence and started working primarily from their apartment shortly after that so they could all be together for the end. It was a bit sad really. After Evie died he came back to the office and brought her with him because she was all he had left and he was positively terrified of letting her out of his sight. Now I realize he probably wasn’t doing her any favors by keeping her from socializing with other children her own age. She became a very lonely child because of the fact that he wasn’t coping well with his loss, but I wasn’t a parent at the time, nor could I possibly understand what he was going through, so I didn’t want to interfere. Lucius was a good father and he was doing the best he could; she seemed happy so I kept my mouth shut.”

“Who’s Evie?” Oliver asked as he filed away all the other information he’d been given for later.

“Her mother.”

“I thought you said her mother’s name was Tanya?” He frowned.
“Tanya was Lucius’s first wife. She took an interest in Felicity after her mother died and helped out with her occasionally.”

“That’s …unusual,” Oliver said slowly.

“The Fox’s are an unusual family,” Walter said with a slight smile. “Lucius and Tanya have an unusually amicable relationship for a divorced couple. Their example is what made me want to maintain a friendship with your mother after our divorce.”

“How did she die?”

Walter looked at him sadly. “ALL; leukemia,” he clarified softly. “It was a highly aggressive form of the disease. As I understand it, it usually has a very high success rate of cure in young children but, because she was older when she was diagnosed, the rate of survival dropped dramatically and the disease progressed rapidly. She was nineteen when she was diagnosed but went into remission and they thought it was gone but then she got sick again when Felicity was three. Even with the finest medical advances available she died within months of its return. Lucius was, as I said, devastated,” Walter said forlornly, his face hidden in shadow. “He honestly thought she’d pull through, even until the very end. I don’t think he’s ever stopped loving her either. She was only twenty-three and she and Lucius had been married less than three years. It was quite tragic, for a lot of reasons really.”

“What do you mean?” Oliver asked curiously.

“I probably should stop here,” Walter said with a certain amount of reluctance. “I’ve said far too much as it is.”

“Please,” he asked him. “I’d really like to know.”

Walter sighed and looked down at the carpet, not meeting his eyes. “Tanya and Lucius had been married for over twenty years before he left her for Evie. She was less than half his age, a bit of a bohemian, she had an illegitimate daughter, and the rumor was that she had no idea who the father was. It was all nonsense, of course,” he added quickly. “It was just easier for the public to believe that a rich older man sought out a beautiful twenty year old girl for a midlife fling and dumped his wife and two children in the process rather than see the truth of the situation.”

“Which was?” Oliver asked.

“That he and Tanya hadn’t been happy for a while. She had left him a few months previously but the fact that Lucius and Evie fell in love so quickly made people suspicious. They moved in together less than a week after they met and he filed for divorce less than a month after that. People liked to say that she had some sort of hold on him, that she seduced him from his family somehow. The fact that they made such a strikingly unusual couple didn’t help.”

“Because of their differences in ages?” Oliver said with a furrowed brow. “Rich men marry much younger women all the time.”

“Gotham is different than Starling City,” he told him ruefully. “In many ways it’s far more conservative, but that’s not what I meant. Evie was very…unusual. She was strikingly beautiful but she was also…” he hesitated.

“Also?” Oliver prompted.

He grimaced, “She was…um, damn.” He sighed, “She had a genetic condition that added a bit to her overall mysterious allure. Because of that she made some people rather uncomfortable and she often got stares even from people who didn’t know the story behind their union.”
“What kind of ‘genetic condition’?” Oliver asked with a frown.

Walter shook his head as though debating something internally. “She was…she suffered from albinism.”

“Seriously?” Oliver said, taken aback.

Walter shut his eyes in mortification. “I don’t really know the politically correct term for it but she suffered from a mild form of albinism that left her with very pale hair, light skin, and very bright blue eyes; she was quite strikingly beautiful, hauntingly beautiful in fact but, at first glance, those unused to such things could easily confuse her unusual looks with deliberate artifice on her part. Albinos, and again I use that term because I don’t know how else to refer to her condition, are apparently quite familiar with a certain amount of prejudice due to their appearance although that doesn’t excuse it, of course. It was even worse in Evie’s case because not only was she unique in her appearance and personality, but she in an interracial relationship with a very high profile man. Lucius being black and her being so pale and young, in addition to the fact that she worked as a cocktail waitress in Las Vegas before her art career took off, seemed to fit into every ugly stereotype about successful black men choosing to leave their families for younger white women. Your mother and I occasionally experienced some prejudice but never to the extent Evie and Lucius had to endure. Her albinism was mild enough that she appeared to be merely very fair-skinned as long as she used cosmetics but her hair color and the fact that she had to wear very dark large framed prescription sunglasses most of the time due to her extreme sensitivity to light made it easy for the press to paint her as the stereotypical bleach blonde temptress who had snagged a rich black man to pull her and her daughter out of the gutter. It didn’t matter that she was a very successful artist or that Tanya had filed for separation before they’d even met; that didn’t sell papers.” He flushed and looked down at the carpet again, “For a while, Lucius’s reputation took a beating for it and people could be very cruel to Felicity in particular even after her mother’s death.”

“Why? She was just a kid,” Oliver said perturbed at the thought of adults picking on a child who had just lost her mother over the perceived sins of her parents.

“Prejudice never makes sense, Oliver,” Walter said kindly. “As I said before, Starling is a very liberal place compared to Gotham. If Thomas and Martha Wayne were the Kennedy’s of Gotham, Lucius and Tanya Fox were the Obama’s. Any woman Lucius chose after Tanya would have been vilified, but that a powerful black man of such standing would choose a teenaged white girl with no higher education and no social standing over someone as intelligent and accomplished as his first wife was seen as a scandal of epic proportions. Felicity, following her mother’s death, was often used as a scapegoat by others for that and many other reasons. Now people view blended families much differently than they did then, but even I would get looks and questions when I’d take Thea to the mall and she was a teenager when Moira and I married. A black man carrying a little white girl around who referred to him as ‘daddy’ upset people on many levels. She was a white child, a baby, being raised by a single black man and it raised people’s hackles. It made them think monstrously inappropriate thoughts and had Lucius not been who he was, I don’t doubt he would have had a harder time gaining and retaining custody of her despite the adoption.”

“That’s just wrong,” Oliver muttered.

Walter smiled, “And the fact that you and the young people of your generation recognize that is what gives me hope. There will always be thoughtless people in this world, Oliver. Your son, Connor, is of mixed race but, hopefully, he’ll never be made to feel any different because he was lucky enough to be born in a time of change. Even so, evil will always exist as will stupidity; as parents, it’s our job to teach our children differently and hope they pass it along to the next generation.”
Walter referring to him as a parent made him feel as though a hole was opening in his chest. Clearing his throat, he pressed on, “It just…Felicity has always been such a bright and happy person,” he said shaking his head. “I almost feel like I failed her somehow. I mean, she’s one of the people I trust most in this world—hell, she is the one person I trust most in this world…” He swallowed and looked up at the older man, his face a mask of pain and self-doubt, “I know you said she wanted to keep her identity under wraps for professional reasons but…do you think she thought I would have--?”

“No, not at all,” Walter said quickly. “Felicity and her mother have very similar personalities. Evie was very present and in the moment, a true optimist and child of today. She never dwelled in the past or worried about the future which made her very unusual and, quite frankly, a breath of fresh air to those who got to know her. If Felicity didn’t tell you any of this it wasn’t out of shame or fear, it was because she was more concerned with the present and her friendship with you now than sharing details about her past, that’s all. Felicity may appear very conservative but she often shows flashes of her mother’s bohemian spirit. She is very much her mother’s daughter in that regard.” He paused for a moment, “You know, the thing that struck me the most when I first saw her when she came to QC was how much she had changed but how she still looked so much like Evie at the same time.”

“Felicity’s not an albino,” Oliver pointed out dumbly, his mind reeling from the information he’d been given.

“No, not entirely,” Walter chuckled. “I remember Lucius having her tested for it though due to her eye problems along with her fair coloring.” At Oliver’s inquisitive look he expounded, “She had extremely pale blonde hair; it was nearly white as a child. She colors it to make it darker so as not to stand out. Still, even with her darker hair and glasses she looks almost exactly like Evie.”

It’s weird the things one remembers…

***

“I thought it would be helpful to track ARGUS’s manhunt for Floyd Lawton aka Deadshot. So I decrypted their communication logs. Which means, I just hacked a federal agency. Kind of makes me a cyber-terrorist, which is bad because I really don’t see myself fitting in well at Guantanamo Bay.”

“Don’t worry, Felicity. They don’t send blondes there,” He told her mockingly.

“I dye it actually…I keep your secret!”

So many secrets. So much time wasted. Oliver turned slightly as his heart clenched in his chest. More and more of what she’d told him over the years had begun to click into place. Her reluctance to discuss her family, her resentment of her mother, the little factoids she’d dropped about her being a cocktail waitress, her tolerance of the cruel remarks he’d seen her endure without complaint…

Thinking about her mother also brought another memory to the surface, one he didn’t care to think about but this might be the only chance he’d ever have to ask, “Did Felicity’s biological father ever come into the picture? Do you know anything about him or who he is?”
“Why?” Walter asked. “Do you think the threat against Felicity could be related to her biological father?”

“It’s very possible,” Oliver said vaguely. “She told us once that he abandoned their family when she was little and you said she looked strikingly similar to her mother. Someone might have recognized her and put the pieces together. During that period of time she was often seen in the press standing beside me. Someone who had a grudge against her father might have come after her to get to him.”

“It’s an interesting theory but I doubt she even knew his name and, from what little bit Lucius told me, I don’t believe her biological father even knew she existed,” Walter told him. “Lucius didn’t even know his name, I think. I remember him worrying about that after Evie died. He adopted Felicity when she was just over a year old but he was worried because he had no idea who her biological father was or if he’d ever come forth to try to establish paternity. That was a troubling loophole in the adoption because they’d never gotten him to sign a release of parental rights. Evie claimed not to know enough about him to even put his name on Felicity’s birth certificate so they couldn’t track him down. I didn’t have the whole story and I never pressed him for it but, according to Lucius, Evie met him shortly after she was initially diagnosed. She had a one night stand, understandable given the fact that she was nineteen and told she was terminally ill. She got pregnant and had the baby before going into a brief remission. The ALL returned about a year or so after she and Lucius were married and she died a little over a year after that. He hired private investigators, sought out her friends and business associates for information, he even went to Las Vegas and hired private investigators there as well, but none of them knew anything about the man. She’d always kept his identity secret from everyone.”

But she didn’t, Oliver thought. Somehow Felicity had heard his name and had said her mother had been the source of that information. Could she have told her as a child? Was it a real name or just something the dying woman had made up; a story of a handsome foreign prince, a fairy tale that Felicity’s young mind had confused with the truth perhaps? Mysteries leading to more mysteries and still no answers.

Fuck.

Oliver nodded, feeling more frustrated than ever, “Thank you. I appreciate you telling me.”

“I’m only sorry I couldn’t be more help,” he told him. “Oliver, if Felicity is in danger then I should call her father and let him know.”

“No need,” he told him. “Batman is on it plus Bruce Wayne is aware of the threat. He contacted him as soon as he found out and Wayne immediately hired movers and whisked her back to Gotham the same day.”

“That’s good,” Walter said, noticeably relieved. “The Wayne’s and the Fox’s are practically family. Lucius’s first wife was Bruce’s godmother and I believe that they were in Martha and Thomas’s wills as his secondary guardians next to Alfred Pennyworth.”

“I didn’t know that,” Oliver said grimly but Walter didn’t seem to notice the chill in his voice.

“That’s a weight off my mind, at least,” he said quietly. “I know that you’ll miss her terribly but at least you can rest easy knowing that Bruce is there to keep her safe; and your friend, Batman, of course.”

“Of course,” Oliver said with forced assurance. He approached Walter and held out his hand, “I’m sorry for coming at you like that but I had to know.”
He took his hand and shook it gratefully, “No need to apologize. I might have done the same were I you. Still,” he looked at him, his eyes pleading, “I want you to know that I don’t believe your mother did this, Oliver. I know she’s done a lot and her secrets have had far-reaching consequences in the past, but if Felicity was ever in danger, it wasn’t from Moira.” He paused for a moment as though pained, “The night she died we spoke on the phone. She mentioned Felicity specifically.”

“What?” Oliver looked up in surprise. “You never told me that.”

“I suppose I didn’t think it was important then, but now…” He shook his head. “Your mother told me that she had a lot of apologizing to do; to you, to Thea, and to Felicity.”

“Did she say what for?” He asked him.

“The way she’d treated her when she came to her about Thea,” he told him. “That was…that was my fault,” he said quietly. “The whole thing. Felicity came to me before she went to Moira. She asked me to speak to her, convince her to tell Thea the truth. I hesitated; I couldn’t think of a way to even begin to confront Moira about it and, I suppose, Felicity finally got tired of my procrastinating and took matters into her own hands.”

“Did my mother know Felicity was Lucius’s daughter?” He asked curiously.

“I doubt it,” he told him. “At least not before she confronted her that evening. I’m sure she had her investigated afterwards, but she never said anything to me about it.” He furrowed his brow, “Although, now that I think about it, it’s possible. Especially given what she said that night.”

“What did she say?”

“She said she should have known that given who Felicity was, she would show not only that much loyalty to you and your family, but that she would have both the intelligence and humility to save the company from Isabel without ever needing to take any credit. She went on to say that if it was the last thing she ever did, she’d find a way to make things right between all of you.”

Oliver frowned, “What does that mean; save our company from Isabel? When did Felicity do that?”

“Oliver,” Walter chuckled, “don’t you remember?” He let out a breath, “I suppose not; we were all a bit frayed around the edges. Do you remember the night Slade kidnapped your sister?”

“Vividly,” he said wryly.

“The board had appointed new officers but, because of the kidnapping, you had to put off the meeting,” Walter reminded him.

“And you came in as CEO pro tempore, what of it?” He asked.

He smirked, “Do you remember Isabel’s reaction to that?”

He shrugged, “Vaguely,” he said. “I kind of had my mind on other things.”

“Let me remind you then.”

Things were crazy, people were running around in a frenzy, Slade had just sent a video message of Thea tied to a chair looking terrified, and Isabel looked positively livid as she tore into a member of the political staff at Moira’s campaign headquarters.
“If I hear about one more invasive press inquiry being sent to Mr. Queen or to any member of the Queen family, I will hold you personally responsible,” she all but snarled at the poor man as he hurried away, her voice practically dripping with ice and venom.

“You're very scary,” Oliver said, his eyebrows shooting up in surprise. Isabel wasn’t usually this protective of anyone or anything except her own bottom line.

“Thank you,” she told him, her lips turning upwards in a cool but pleased smile. “My job is to take things off your plate, now more than ever.” She paused to offer him a pained grimace, “To that end, you remember how at today’s meeting, the board nominated new officers? Voting has to take place within 24 hours. It cannot be suspended. It's an SEC thing.”

“I can't think about this right now,” Oliver told her in a mixture of frustration and exhaustion.

She offered him a surprisingly sympathetic look, her tone soft and almost pleasant, “I know, and I'm sorry, but you have to. You're the CEO and you have responsibilities--!”

He cut her off, “Which you handle for me all the time.”

She looked at him in exasperation, “A board vote is several orders of magnitude different from covering a missed meeting.” She grimaced at his dark look before suggesting reluctantly, “You could appoint someone CEO pro tempore…”

He scowled. “Fine,” he bit out as he ran his fingers through his hair. He reached for a pad and a pen. “You do it.”

“That's not a good idea,” she told him as she watched him begin to write.

“She’s right,” Felicity said rushing over and snatching the pen from his hand.

“Damn it, Felicity,” he growled at her, reaching to take the pen back but she stepped back just as Walter stepped forward.

“I already spoke to Walter and he said he could do it,” she told him quickly. “I have the paperwork here; I just have to print it out and have you guys sign.”

“Why would you…?” Oliver said taken aback, “How?”

“Oliver, I’m your EA,” she said rolling her eyes at him. “I’ve been reminding you about this meeting for weeks now and, since you’ve blown off every single meeting you’ve had for the last month, I figured it was better to be safe than sorry. Besides, it’s a pretty standard form letter. You just have to sign and initial.”

“Felicity just told me about the meeting tonight,” Walter told him, coming to stand beside her. “If you like, I would be happy to act as CEO pro tempore and take over as your stand-in until Thea is back home where she belongs.”

“Are you sure?” Oliver asked him with a confused frown. “What about Starling National?”

“I can take a temporary leave of absence until this is settled,” he told him. “I’ve already spoken to the president of the bank and he’s agreed to act as both CEO and CFO until this is done.” He looked over towards Moira who was on the verge of collapsing under the weight of her grief. “Oliver, your family needs you. Let me worry about Queen Consolidated while you take care of your family.”

“This isn’t a good idea at all,” Isabel sputtered, her tone verging on strident. “The board could see awarding your proxy to Mr. Steele as a conflict of interest.”

“I don’t see how,” Walter said coolly. “I was both CEO and CFO at Queen Consolidated for years and I still have a substantial financial stake in the company through the bank.”

“Exactly,” she turned to Oliver, purposefully cutting Walter out of the conversation. “Oliver, handing the reins of power over to Walter could seriously erode your standing with the board. He sold all his voting shares back to you, remember? They could see this as him either making a power play or think that he’s trying to destabilize QC enough that you’ll default on your loan so the bank can take controlling interest in the company away from you.”

“I would never do that!” Walter said taking umbrage, “Nor would anyone on the board ever accuse me of such. I appointed most of them personally, for God’s sake.”

“Walter—” Oliver began.

“I can do it,” Felicity spoke up.

“What?” Oliver said in surprise, turning to her.

“Don’t be ridiculous,” Isabel said with a snort. “You’re just a secretary!”

“I’m a shareholder,” she returned. “SEC rules state that anyone can be named CEO pro tempore as long as they are both a shareholder and no conflict of interest exists. I can do it.”

Oliver took her by the elbow, speaking in low tones, “I need you with me, not at some meeting.”

“Oliver, if you don’t appoint someone right now, QC is facing major sanctions,” she told him. “Just pick; me or Walter, who’s it going to be?”

He looked between them, “I…”

“I’ll do it,” Isabel said firmly. “I’ve been handling most of the day to day operations anyway; you can appoint me CEO until you come back.”

“And how would that not be a conflict of interest, Ms. Rochev?” Walter asked her with a hard look. “You attempted a hostile takeover last year; if Oliver made you his proxy that would be like him signing over all of his stock leaving you with 100% of the voting rights.”

“You know what; I really don’t have time for this!” Oliver practically growled. He turned to Walter, “Are you sure you can handle it?”

“If someone questions my position, I’ll call Felicity and you can send her in instead,” Walter told him. He cut his eyes towards Isabel, “She was absolutely right in that as both a shareholder and your Executive Assistant she could easily handle this meeting in your place. It’s a bit unconventional but perfectly legal.”

Felicity already had her tablet out and walked over to one of the printers to collect several papers. “Here,” she said, handing them and his pen to him. “Sign and initial both copies and then pass them to Walter so he can sign as well.”

“Call me if you run into trouble,” Oliver told him shortly as he signed the first then the second set of papers.

“I will but, as I said, there shouldn’t be any problems,” he told him as he accepted the papers from Oliver and pulled a pen from the inner pocket of his jacket so he could sign as well.

“Fine!” Oliver said, handing the second copy over to Isabel. “Happy?” He asked her before turning to Walter, “Congratulations, you’re CEO again.”

“Hopefully not for long,” Walter told him.

“Don’t tempt me,” Oliver said grimly, grasping Felicity by the elbow again and hurrying out of the room.

“I don’t…” He grimaced, “I was so focused on Slade having Thea I suppose I never even thought about it.”

“When I told Moira that it was Felicity who stopped you from signing the company over to Isabel that day, she was so incredibly grateful to her.” Walter told him sincerely. “I assure you, your mother may have attempted to intimidate Felicity, but she’d never try to hurt her; not physically and she certainly wouldn’t try to have her killed.”

The blood in his veins ran cold as he thought about what could have happened if he had signed his proxy votes over to Isabel that day. In order to buy the remaining shares in QC he and his mother had to leverage everything; their homes, their other investment properties, even their trusts. He could have easily lost it all.

Even then Felicity was protecting him and he never even thought to thank her.

“Thanks,” he told the other man with quiet sincerity. “I mean it, Walter; thank you. For everything.”

“You’re welcome, son,” he said, clasping him warmly on the shoulder. “Just take care of yourself and keep Felicity safe.”

He nodded silently before making his way out.

As he made his way to his car, he let out a frustrated breath. He still wasn’t as sure as Walter that Moira was in the clear but it was looking less and less likely. He’d continue to investigate it, of course, but something told him it would be a dead end. A lot of what Walter had told him about Felicity’s past had resonated with him, and he now had a better picture of the woman he thought he knew inside and out over the last four years, but one thing in particular had snagged his attention:

“I doubt she even knew his name…”

But she did know his name; in fact she knew two of them.

And while he knew where one trail ended, his wasn’t the only name that had been spoken that night.

Felicity sat on the couch in the living room bundled up in her pink kitty and coffee cup robe and warm and fuzzy jimjams as she sipped the god-awful herbal tea Diggle had given her and looked at the two cards on her lap. One was from Jake and the other from Miranda Tate, one of them filling her with dread but not the one that probably should.

What if Tam was right and the Stellmoor offer was legitimate? She toyed with the idea for a moment. As of right now she didn’t have a job and the idea of working at Wayne Enterprises was out of the question as was anything to do with LexCorp. She could go back to being a consultant but the work would be inconsistent and she still wouldn’t be doing what she really loved. She liked being a member of Team Arrow, she liked making a difference in people’s lives. You could teach, came a thought from the back of her head. It’s not exactly the same as taking down drug dealers and Triad gang members but you’d be making a difference. The only problem was that it sounded as bland as the oatmeal her dad had been complaining about that morning.

She was doomed to live a plain oatmeal kind of life, unless…

She tilted the card under the light and watched as the design in the holographic ‘S’ shifted and changed. She put it down and picked up Jake’s card instead. He was sweet, she thought. He’d probably be a great boyfriend, too. Solid, dependable, the kind of guy who treated a girl like she was made of glass but still let her be herself. He’d never roll out of bed and hand her the ‘My life is too dangerous’ speech. He had a dangerous job plus he was ex-Army so he could probably understand all she’d been through without judging her for it. Plus, as an added bonus, he could appreciate her ‘I jumped out of a plane and landed on a landmine’ story better than most people ever could. He definitely seemed pretty sane and normal compared to the other men in her life. She didn’t know him well but she’d be willing to bet that he wouldn’t wake up one morning and decide to go swinging from rooftop to rooftop fighting crime. Call it a hunch but she couldn’t see a guy with teddy bear brown eyes who blushed the way he did hurling bat shaped throwing stars and arrowing people in the chest because they failed the city.

She sighed. If she left that life behind then her future would be filled with men like Jake Simmons; nice, polite young gentlemen who would treat her the way her dad expected a ‘respectable young lady’ to be treated. That card represented a life without masks. It would be a fulfilling life, it would get the job done just like her dad’s daily bowl of oatmeal, but something about it just made her want to say ‘bah’ and hide behind her paper as she dreamed of hacking into Federal databases.

Two choices in front of her and only one of them was the right one. She could spend the rest of her life being driven from one place to another as ‘Baby’ or she could be the kick-ass handler of a group of all-female vigilantes. If that was all there was to it then ‘kick-ass’ beat ‘Baby’ every time but it wasn’t. Isabel and Stellmoor knew about the Arrow, knew about Oliver. She could be walking right into a trap.

“Gotham has gotten even more dangerous since you’ve been gone.”

According to Paul DioGuardi there had been threats against her dad, enough that both the company’s head of security and Alfred were reluctant to even let her get a cab by herself. Maybe it was just them being overprotective but there had been something in Paul’s eyes when he spoke. Isabel had told her that they wanted to start a team in Gotham. She’d be able to make a difference, protect her family, and yes, show Bruce once and for all that she could take care of herself. Even if she went back to Starling City the relationship she had with Oliver had changed forever. She doubted she’d ever be allowed back with the team again. What if she split the difference and didn’t choose either one but struck out on her own instead? The story she’d handed Bruce on that rooftop wasn’t so far from the truth; she could have easily been the head of a secret organization of Arrows. She could do it. She could recruit ex-military like Dig or Jake and have them train people as she handled the tech and gave the orders. It wasn’t all that different than what she’d been doing for the last several years when you really thought about it. So, which was it going to be; Stellmoor, go independent and start from scratch, or spend the rest of her life as ‘Baby’? Risk Stellmoor, risk it all, or play it safe.

“Hey,” her brother said as he vaulted over the couch and sat down heavily beside her as he reached for the remote. “What’re those?”
“Nothing,” Felicity said, pocketing the cards. She looked over at her brother who was flipping through the channels. “How did the doctor’s appointment go?”

“Waste of time,” he shrugged. “Made Peggy Ann feel better though so it was worth it.” He looked at her fuzzy Sock Monkey pajama bottoms and matching purple tank top under her robe with a raised eyebrow, “I see someone has a thrilling night ahead of them, huh? Hot date?”

“Only if you count my love affair with Entenmann's and Ben and Jerry’s a hot date,” she said wryly.

“Ooh, we have cake?” Luke looked up eagerly.

“There’s always cake, we just have to find dad’s stash,” Tam said as she strolled into the room with Tim trailing behind her.

“Hey bud,” Luke said reaching for Tim’s hand with the one not in a sling and offering him a fist bump.

“Dude, check out the war wound on you, huh?” Tim said as he plopped down on the couch beside him.

“Got it wrestling with a guy who was transformed into a giant lion centaur by a radioactive meteorite,” Luke said off-handedly as he showed off his temporary cast.

“Nice,” Tim said bobbing his chin in approval.

“You are so frickin’ weird,” Felicity snorted missing the amused look her two siblings and Tim shared when she wasn’t looking.

“Baby, why are you in your PJ’s? It’s not even seven o’clock!” Tam said with a frown. “That’s so sad.”

Felicity turned to her sister, “What’s so sad about getting into your warm and fuzzies so you can relax in front of the TV?”

“Are you kidding? Just the fact that you still refer to your pajamas as your ‘warm and fuzzies’ is tragic,” Tam said with a wince.

“Leave Baby alone,” her dad said as he wandered into the room straightening the tie to his tux as he dropped a kiss on the top of Tam’s head. “I think she looks cute in her little monkey pants.”

“Gee, thanks Dad,” Felicity muttered as Luke snorted beside her repeating the words ‘monkey pants’ until she poked him in the ribs with her elbow.

“Timothy,” Lucius said coolly as he suddenly stopped short and greeted Tim.

“Mr. Fox,” Tim said clearing his throat as he scrambled off the couch and held out his hand in greeting.

Lucius glared at Tim’s hand without shaking it. “I understand that you were in my daughter’s apartment the other day at a very early hour borrowing, what was it again, ‘sugar’?”

“Sugar?” Tim asked in confusion then turned to Tam for help. At his girlfriend’s frantic gesturing he cleared his throat again and straightened his posture. “Oh, yes sir, I, uh, like putting it on my…cereal. For breakfast.”

“And you thought that the best time to borrow said sugar was sometime before dawn?” Lucius asked him imperiously.

“I’m an early riser?” Tim said weakly.

“And you had to go all the way to my daughter’s apartment to get it even though there are dozens of all night convenience stores open between here and Wayne Manor?”

Tim swallowed as he tried to come up with a logical answer, “Um, sir, the truth is that I spent the night in your daughter's apartment.” At Tam’s wide-eyed look and Lucius’s clenched jaw he quickly added, “On the couch, sir! All night. Nothing happened. It was totally innocent!”

“On the couch, huh?” Lucius repeated dubiously.

“Yes sir, on the couch,” he confirmed wide-eyed and nodding like a bobble-head. “Your daughter and I went out for dinner and got into a discussion, the time got away from us, and she kindly invited me to use her couch. Just her couch and nothing else.”

“How old are you now, Tim?” Lucius asked him after a long pause.

“Um, old enough to know better, sir?” He answered meekly.

“Son, the way I see it you can either learn to cover your tracks better or you can bite the bullet and take your chances with telling the truth because you can’t lie for shit,” he told him bluntly.

“Yes sir,” Tim agreed, his cheeks aflame with humiliation.

Luke started snickering loudly until Lucius smacked him in the back of the head. “Ow! Dad! What did you hit me for? Tam’s the one being all scandalous, not me.”

“I seem to recall you being involved in a scandalous situation or two,” Lucius told him without any heat. “Or have you forgotten the incident with you and the Ambassador’s daughter in the pool?”

“Oh yeah,” Luke said as he rubbed the back of his head. “I wonder if she’s still in town?”

“Keep it out of the pool. We had to drain it the last time you went bouncing your naked butt in there,” he told him.

“Where are you going all dressed up, Daddy?” Felicity asked in an attempt to change the subject before one of her siblings chose to bring up any of her scandalous behavior as of late.

“Fundraiser for the library,” he said looking around the room. “I don’t suppose any of you kids want to go throw something on and join me?”

They all spoke up at the same time:

“Already in my warm and fuzzies.”

“Library fundraiser? Snooze! Not.”

“Lion ate my tux, Dad. Sorry.”

“I barely talked my way out of going to that thing when Barbara handed me my invitation personally.”
Lucius turned to the last speaker with a hard eye. “I wasn’t actually speaking to you Tim but it’s nice to know that I’m not the only one you’ve tried that bull-malarkey on lately.”

“Peggy Ann has the night off so you kids order something in. She told me that if she finds her kitchen in a mess that she’s taking it out of your hides,” he took a moment to eye Luke. “Understood?”

“Why do I always get the dirty looks around here?” Luke asked with a hurt expression.

“Probably because Felicity and I don’t cook and you’re the one responsible for the Great Smoothie Catastrophe or have you forgotten why you decided to leave the country in the first place?” Tam said with a smirk.

“I don’t think that’s why he left the country, per se,” Felicity said. “It was a contributing factor, don’t get me wrong, but I also think he was trying to get away from the six girls he was dating simultaneously because cotillion season was coming and he’d promised he’d escort every one of them to the exact same country club dance.”

“It wasn’t six girls,” he objected, “it was only three and I can’t help it if I have a hard time saying no to a pretty girl, especially when they beg.” He batted his eyelashes exaggeratedly, “Don’t hate me because I’m beautiful.”

“You’re so full of it,” Tam snorted.

“You know, I’ve missed having all you kids back home,” Lucius said with a grin then added wryly, “Even if you all do devolve into a bunch of teenagers the first chance you get.” He reached over and tugged on Felicity’s ponytail, bussing a kiss on her forehead as she tipped her head back to look up at him. “Seeing you in your warm and fuzzies reminds me of when you kids would build forts out of sheets and spend half the night eating junk food and watching movies in here.”

“Ooh, we should have Bed Day like we used to!” Felicity said enthusiastically turning to her siblings and Tim. “Tam, you can borrow some of my pajamas and we can rent some movies and do up popcorn!”

“Great dad, thanks for planting that seed in their heads,” Luke said with a groan.

“Shut up!” Tam swatted at him with a throw pillow as she plopped down on the arm of the couch. “You know you used to love Bed Day as much as we did.”

“Maybe,” he said with a quirk of his lips. “But I’ll tell you one thing, I am not sitting through another Nick at Nite Marathon or a Julia Roberts film festival. I’ll hop a plane back to Africa before I’m forced to sit through Dying Young one more time, I swear to God.”

“You’re just saying that because you always cry like a baby throughout that whole movie,” Tam snorted.

“Dude, you cried? Over Campbell Scott?” Tim asked with a sneer of disgust.

“If you think that’s bad you should see him during Steel Magnolias,” Felicity chuckled.

“But, huh, she, huh, was, huh, so, huh, YOUNG!!!” Tam fake wailed as she leaned over his shoulder.
“It’s a sad movie,” Luke said in a slightly hurt tone. “Real men can express their emotions too, you know.”

“I do not know you, man. Seriously,” Tim said, shaking his head.

“Tam; mani/pedis and we can MST3K bad horror flicks?” Felicity suggested with a twinkle in her eye.

“Oh yeah, and we can send out for pizza and make hot cocoa!” Tam said enthusiastically as she turned toward her and grasped her hands excitedly.

“Cool with me,” Luke shrugged. “I could go for pizza and I don’t really feel like going out tonight. Tim?”

“Sure,” he shrugged. “I don’t have plans. Hey,” he said with a lopsided grin, “maybe I should run home and grab some pajamas, too.”

“No.” Lucius leveled a finger in his direction causing the smile to drop from the younger man’s expression. “You keep your clothes on in this house, understood.”

“Yes sir,” Tim said with a nod.

“I’m off, don’t make a mess and have fun.” Lucius looked to his son. “Watch him,” he said pointing to Tim before he left.

“Okay Dad, you got it,” Luke said giving him the thumbs up.

As soon as he left Tim sunk down in the couch with a groan. “Your dad hates me.”

“He doesn’t hate you, my sweet widdle honey-bunny,” Tam said in a pouty baby-talk as she plopped down beside him and wrapped him up in a hug.

“Oh no, he hates you, dude. Totally. Like loathes you,” Luke said dryly. “He looks at you and sees the little bastard who has had copious sex with his daughter. Your only options now are to leave the country or marry my sister and even then you’re screwed.”

“Marriage?” Tim repeated in a panicked tone as he suddenly sat up straight.

“Oh, but don’t you want to make an honest woman out of me, lovah?” Tam asked in an exaggerated drawl and she draped herself over his lap in a mock swoon. “Why whatevah will happen to our baby if you leave me in my time of need? Oh, the scandal!”

“Don’t-don’t-don’t even joke about that,” Tim stuttered. “T-that is not funny.”

“Yeah, knock her up, that’ll really make our dad see the light,” Luke snorted.

“Did you know that the morning after pill is $49.99 plus tax?” Felicity asked with a frown before turning to the others. “For one pill; that’s high, isn’t it?” At their blank stares she shrugged, “What? I was trying to add to the conversation plus I drank a whole lot of champagne before lunch.”

“Yeah,” Tam said slowly. “Um, Baby, now that it’s just us do you want to go ahead and talk about what happened with you and Bruce?”

“Or we could just make popcorn and order take-out?” She suggested helpfully.

“Who’s to say we can’t do both?” Luke added.
“I can go run down to Red Box,” Tim offered. “There’s one on the corner and I can pick up some snacks and a case of beer.”

“I could go for a brew,” Luke said, perking up.

“Yuck,” Tam said as she scrunched up her nose. “No beer, it stinks up the whole house and the last thing you need is to make my dad think you were trying to get me liquored up in the TV room.”

“Soda?” Tim said with a gulp.

“Diet, and Felicity and I will order the food.” She grinned, “We can do ‘around the world’ just like when we were kids!”

“Around the world?” Tim asked her in a low murmur.

“Get your mind out of the gutter,” she snorted.

“‘Around the world’ was when we would get a bunch of menus and order food from as many different take-out joints as we could,” Luke explained. “Chinese, pizza, burgers, Thai, sushi, barbecue, Indian food…”

“Evenings filled with world cuisine followed by epic heartburn,” Felicity said in a dreamy tone. “Oh how I have missed those glory days of old.”

“Man, you guys had a lot more fun growing up than I did,” Tim said with a hint of envy. “Bruce’s idea of family fun involved staking out the mob in the freezing rain on some random rooftop. Uh, by the way; spandex and Kevlar chafe when wet.”

“Tim,” Felicity hissed, shaking her head.

“What?” Tim asked with a frown.

She jerked her head toward Luke and shook her head.

“I don’t get it,” Tim said, looking from Tam to Luke. Meanwhile, Luke had his hand over his eyes and tilted his head back with a groan.

“Lucas Fox, I think you got some s’plainin’ to do,” Tam said in a sing-song.

“How did you manage to keep your cover as Red Robin secret for this long, dude? Seriously?” Luke asked shooting him a dirty look. “Dad was right, you do lie for shit.”

“Should I be offended by that?” He asked, turning to Tam.

“Okay, what’s going on?” Felicity asked looking between the three before settling her gaze on Luke. “You know about Tim and Bruce? What else do you know? What am I missing?”

“Okay,” Luke said clearing his throat as he turned to Felicity, taking her hand gently in his own. “First off, don’t panic.”

Felicity felt all the air leave her lungs. “Never, ever, ever begin a sentence with the words ‘don’t panic’ and expect a person not to panic. What is it? What don’t I know?”

Luke smiled calmly, “Do you remember when I joined the Peace Corps?”

“Yeah, dad hit the roof, why?”
“I didn’t actually join the Peace Corps,” Luke said in a measured tone.

“What do you mean?” Felicity said slowly.

“I didn’t join the Peace Corps, I went with Bruce and trained and then I went to Africa to become Batwing.”

“What?” Felicity said flatly.

“What the hell is a ‘Batwing’?” Felicity asked with a confused frown.

Tam clutched her stomach and began to laugh as Luke’s face fell, “Wait, you haven’t heard of ‘Batwing’?”

“No, what is it; some kind of experimental plane or something? Are you working for Wayne AeroTech now or is this one of Bruce’s ‘special projects’? I mean, that sounds cool; ‘Batwing’ sounds totally bad-ass in a geeky Star Wars kind of way, but if that’s all it is then I don’t see why you even bothered keeping it a secret.”

“Oh my God, this is so fucking hilarious!” Tam gasped, tears running down her face as she tried to catch her breath. Even Tim was turning purple as he tried to hold in his laughter.

“Dude,” Tim snickered, “maybe I should take lessons from you because you’re so good even your masked identity is a secret!”

“No, it’s not an experimental plane!” Luke said with a pitiful look. “I’m the Batman of Africa! There hasn’t been anything in the papers over here about it?”

“No,” Felicity said in consternation and looked over to the two other people in the room who had begun laughing even harder. “Wait, is this a joke? ‘Batwing; Batman of Africa’? Really? That doesn’t even make sense. How is that supposed to be funny?”

Tim and Tam began to howl with laughter as Luke sputtered, “B-but I’m Batwing! Batwing is a real thing,” Luke insisted. “Seriously! I fight bad guys and have my own weapons and everything.”

“You can’t be the African Batman!” Felicity said dizzily. “You once tried to blow up the kitchen with frozen fruit and yogurt!”

“I…can’t…breathe,” Tam said, falling onto her hands and knees as she shook with laughter.

“I broke my arm fighting an alien irradiated lion centaur!” Luke insisted.

“You were serious about that?” Felicity asked aghast.

“Oh shit!” Tim said falling off the couch as he began to laugh uproariously.

“Yes!” Luke burst out with a scowl. “I would have taken pictures but I was a little busy at the time!”

“So you’re Batwing?” She said slowly.

“Yes!” Luke said insistently.

“And you were never in the Peace Corps and you don’t really run a charity in Africa?”

“I sent you care packages!” Felicity said angrily. “I baked cookies for your entire fake classroom full of African orphans!”

“And I really enjoyed them!” Luke told her.

Tim used the bottom of his tee-shirt to wipe his eyes, “Oh God, I so want to be a member of this family.” He turned to Tam, “It would be worth marrying you and putting up with your dad’s dirty looks for the rest of my life if this is how you guys spend a Wednesday night.”

“Watch it,” Tam said smacking him on the arm. “When I marry you it better be because I was too cheap to spend $49.99 plus tax and not because my brother is an idiot!”

Tim sobered up quickly, “Okay, again; not funny. No more Baby Daddy jokes, okay? Every time you say something like that I keep imagining your dad standing over me with a bloody ax.”

“So wait,” Felicity said with a scowl, “Tam and I are the only people in the room who have never put on a costume and rumbled with bad guys?”

“Well, technically…” Tam said with an amused look.

Felicity’s face fell. “You too?”

“Once,” Tam said holding up a single finger. “One time but I was fabulous at it.”

“She went by the name ‘Foxy Lady’,,” Tim said with a snort. “The hair alone was worth it though.”

“Well, I was only a mask for, like, a day and you got to do something cool, too.” Tam said helpfully. “You got to work with Batman and the Arrow, right? That’s something.”

“Wait, you worked with the Arrow in Starling City?” Luke asked with a scowl. “Since when?”

“Isn’t that why you’re here?” Felicity asked. “Tam said she called you because of Bruce threatening me with jail after he found out I was working with the Arrow.”

“Uh, no. Tim called me and all he said was that you and Bruce hooked up and he got rough with you,” Luke turned to Tam and Tim. “Care to fill in the blanks or are you two still ROFLing all over the TV room?”

“I got this,” Tim said volunteering. “Felicity apparently lost her virginity in the Batcave and Bruce dumped her and then she moved to Starling City where she met this Arrow dude and went all Oracle. Bruce found out and went Vesuvius and confronted her, things got rough when Felicity told him she was the real Arrow, then he stalked her over brunch and they had sex again and then he dumped her, again. Oliver Queen is the real Arrow and he found out she worked for Batman so he got all pissed off and then they had sex and then he dumped her, too.” Tim paused to catch his breath and frowned, “Also there might have been something about a threesome but Tam made me go make the coffee so I missed it.”

“Threesome?” Luke said in a near shout, his café au lait complexion darkening with outrage. “Bruce made you have a threesome with him and some other guy?!”
“There was no threesome! A threesome did not happen!” Tam insisted slapping Tim on the arm again as Felicity hid her face in her hands in abject humiliation.

“Oh God,” Felicity moaned.

“They’re right, you really do suck at keeping secrets,” Tam hissed at her boyfriend who shrugged sheepishly.

“He asked,” Tim said defensively.

“Okay, someone better start explaining to me what exactly is going on and don’t skimp on the details,” Luke demanded in a low familiar growl and Felicity could see the shadow of the Bat creep over his features the same way it did with Bruce when he was under the cape and cowl. He turned to her and she could see cold hard anger reflected in the tawny gold eyes that she loved so much and her heart stopped as it hit her; it wasn’t a joke. This was real. Luke was…he was…

She couldn’t help it, it was just too much. In an ideal world she would have sucked it up and breezily let fly with every detail; cool and confident like Luke, strong and fearless like her sister, offhandedly with a tinge of smartass like Tim, but she wasn’t them. She was Felicity, just Felicity, and she was so fucking tired of being herself in a world where masks had taken over every person she’d ever loved; masks that rejected her with their secrets and duty and missions and who always seemed to be leaving her behind.

Shame, anger, hurt, exhaustion; all the emotions she’d been feeling for the last several days slammed into her chest and she couldn’t breathe. There was no more oxygen left, it was all gone. Up was down and down was up and there was no control left. She had no control over anything. Who was she kidding? There were no choices to make, not for her. She was adrift and everyone around her seemed to bat her about like she was just an insignificant piece of flotsam carried away with the tide. For a second, for just a moment in time, she had felt safe in her father’s home. She had been sitting happily in her father’s house in sock monkey pajamas attempting to get a grip on her life, feeling hopeful after days of hopelessness, and then it all came crashing back down around her.

The people she thought she knew were strangers.

Felicity began to shake. She drew her knees to her chest, placed her hands over her head and curled into the couch cushions like a turtle retreating into its shell. She needed a time out, she needed to process this and it was too much to take.

Too much.

Luke was…gone. He was gone.

He was there, she could hear him as he called out to her in the distance but it wasn’t him. Her brother was happy and lazy and lovely in the best sense of the word. When she was little he was her world and now he was some stranger who had been infected by the darkness that now surrounded her.

When she was very little she had a writing assignment that asked ‘If someone you loved was an animal what kind of animal would they be and why?’ She picked Luke but she got in trouble because instead of comparing him to a cat or a bird or a dog like the other kids did she compared him to an apple. The teacher said that she did it wrong but that’s what he was to her: Luke was an apple, a very special kind of apple. He didn’t live in a tree, or on a grocery shelf, or in a Farmer’s Market. Luke was an apple in an ice cold barrel at the carnival; the kind of apple they dipped in warm caramel and when you bit into him your senses exploded with the flavor of all that he was. On the outside his flesh was warm and golden and his eyes glittered like dark sugared candies but when you bit into him he was crisp and green and no matter how cold the world got he was a bite of springtime. Luke was fun and beautiful and a strange mixture of gooey decadence and wholesome purity that confused and delighted the senses. And he was gone. Luke was gone. The Bat had stolen him away from her.

Luke was gone and in his place was Batman Lite. Luke was Diet Batman. Batman Zero; all of the flavor and none of the calories.

She began to weep like her world was ending because it was. Her entire world had ended and she had no control over anything so she cried it all out even though she’d done little else but cry since the whole mess had begun to unfold. She was not this girl. She was not this cry-baby, weak-kneed, miserable sack of nothingness with no flavor or backbone but she could only take so much and she had reached her end.

Batwings and alien irradiated lion centaurs had stolen her caramel apple brother and her life was a fucking disaster.

From somewhere in the great distance she heard soothing words, felt tender hands reaching for her, the muttering of slightly panicked tones and self-recriminations, but this was her moment.

Her moment.

She heard her brother’s voice, felt soothing hands brush over her hair.

She heard Tim.

“I’m sorry. Oh God, is she okay? I was just joking! Felicity, are you okay?”

She heard Tam.

“Oh crap! What do we do? Should I call someone? Dad? No, don’t call Dad. Shit, shit, shit! Baby, it’s okay.”

She began to emerge from her cocoon of pain as her body was lifted and shifted onto her brother’s lap as he gathered her close to his chest and began to mutter something to the other two people in the room as he removed her glasses carefully and handed them to someone.

Suddenly she felt so hot and her whole body was covered in sticky warm sweat. She had to get air.
She began to struggle out of her robe and gasp, “Hot.” The air in her lungs was so hot and it felt like the heat was making it impossible to get enough oxygen.

“Tam, go get her some water or something,” Luke said.

“Okay,” Tam said quickly.

“No ice, not too cold,” Luke called after her.

“Hey Tim, help me untangle her.”

“Okay,” she felt as other hands gently tried to extricate her from the overly warm chenille of the robe. “It’s going to be okay, Felicity. Just breathe okay? Slow deep breaths. Tam,” Tim called out from beside her, “bring a paper bag! She’s hyperventilating!”

“Off!” She gasped as she pulled at the sleeves and heard a ripping noise.

“Crap,” she heard Tim say softly as her arms and shoulders freed themselves.

“I’ve got water and a paper bag,” Tam said in a rush as she jogged up to her side. “Oh. Oh no. Oh Baby, your shoulder…”

“It’s okay, it just looks bad because it’s healing. Give me the water,” Luke said, his voice deep and almost unrecognizable. “Drink Baby, little sips.” She began to drink greedily but he stopped her. “Slowly or you’ll make yourself sick.”

“Do you still need the bag?” Tam asked quietly.

“I think she’ll be okay. Keep taking little sips.”

Felicity took a shuddering breath as her lungs began to function again even though her heart still felt like it was trying to vibrate out of her ribcage. She leaned her face against her brother’s chest and took another deep sobbing breath before whispering, “I’m sorry.”

“For falling apart like this,” she managed through hiccups of breath. “I’m sorry.”

She stretched out her limbs and climbed up off his lap so she could stand on legs that felt like jelly. She stumbled a bit and Tim stepped forward to offer his support but she waved him off. She snatched a few tissues from the box on the end table and wiped her face and brow then pressed her hand to her chest as if to muffle her heartbeat. Felicity turned away from her companions and walked over to the bank of windows that over looked the city around them. She pressed her face to the cold glass and breathed it in, grateful for their silence as they watched her from the couch.

There were so many emotions under the surface of her skin (humiliation, confusion, guilt) but the worst of it was the overwhelming exhaustion. She just felt drained. She looked at the faces of her family and friend in the pale reflection of the glass and she knew that no matter how much she wanted to ignore it, she had to confront this now. She couldn’t run and hide, there were no more time outs left; she’d had her pity party and now she had no choice but to stiffen her spine and deal.

She cleared her throat and turned to them, an embarrassed little smile ghosting across her lips as she wiped her leaky nose. “Sorry about that,” she said in a hoarse voice. “Believe it or not I’m not this much of a basket case usually.” She tried to laugh and it came out as a strangled kind of hiccup instead. “Panic attack, that’s new. Let’s see, in the past three and a half years I’ve been held at knife point, gun point, arrow point, jumped out of a building and a plane, stepped on a landmine, I was interrogated by the police and threatened with prison, defused a few bombs including one that was wrapped around my neck, I was trapped in a collapsing building, kidnapped by a serial killer who tried to turn me into a plasticized corpse, shot in the shoulder by a mad computer genius with serious OCD, had some really fun times with mind control drugs, and had a contract taken out on my life but, believe it or not, this is my first panic attack.” She looked at the faces of the three people in front of her and watched the range of emotions flit across their faces as what she said filtered through; horror, disbelief, and burning rage. She turned to her brother, “Yeah, well, now you know how I felt when I heard ‘alien irradiated lion centaur’.”

“This coming from Bat-Tarzan,” Felicity said as she shut her eyes for a moment. She licked her lips and centered herself. “Okay. I can handle this.” She took a deep breath and looked at all three of them in turn. “I know I went Little Orphan Angsty for a second but I’m good now so let’s just get this over with because I would like to get back to that good day I was having before that damn straw wandered onto my camel’s back and all hell broke loose. I figure the quickest and easiest way to accomplish that would be if you all just asked me your questions and I answer them one at a time so I can fill in any blank spots as they come up, okay? So…” she focused her attention on her brother first. “Okay, first question goes to Batman II; the Legend of Greystoke; ready, aim, fire away.”

Luke got up from the couch, his golden eyes tracing over her as his one good hand fisted at his side. He opened his mouth to speak a few times but nothing came out until finally he crossed the room in two long strides and pulled her into his chest with his one good arm, holding her to him firmly. She heard Tam make a choking noise and sob then softly perfumed arms reached for her and she was trapped between them.

“Shit,” Tim said as he shifted his weight from one foot to the other as he pushed back the fall of inky black hair off his forehead. “Aw hell,” he said then suddenly his arms were wrapping around them as well.

As the ridiculousness of the entire situation hit her from within the safe and warm sanctuary of the impromptu group hug, she began to laugh. Rich tinkling chimes of relief and release burst forth from her lips and hit the air cascading over all of them like soap bubbles until they were all laughing as one.

They stayed like that for several minutes until the laughter died down to giddy little hiccups of sound and their hold on one another released. Luke looked down at her and smiled, the shadows leaving his face, “Man, I could eat a freakin’ horse right now, couldn’t you?”

“Oh yeah,” She agreed and it was like a thousand pound weight was lifted from her shoulders.

“I could go for, like, twenty pounds of fried shrimp,” Tam said in a rush.

“I could eat a whole cow,” Tim agreed. “This emotional catharsis shit requires copious amounts of red meat, preferably on a bun with monster amounts of cheese and bacon.”

“Oh man, bacon. Yes to bacon,” Luke said, walking over to the couch and plopping down. He reached for her abandoned cup of tea, “So how do you want to play this? I say we each get a menu and start calling around until—” He took a sip then spit it out in a gush of green-brown lukewarm sludge and gagged. “What the fuck is this shit?!?”

“Yeah,” Felicity said with a wince, “it’s a special blend of rare herbs that speeds up the healing process.” She offered her brother a sympathetic look as he began wiping off his tongue with the bottom of his shirt. “You know, if you give it a chance it could help with your arm. I’ve seen that stuff heal a broken bone in a matter of days and a bullet wound in, like, less than a week or two.”

“Bullet wound?” Tam repeated, looking a bit green around the gills.

“I’d rather keep the cast,” Luke choked out as he reached for her water glass and swished it around his mouth before swallowing. “Guh!”

“Damn Felicity, when did you become such a bad-ass?” Tim asked, his bright blue eyes looking at her with open admiration.

“Why? Because I can drink manky tea that my big bad bat-brother can’t even sip without doing an Old Faithful impersonation?” She asked with a chuckle.

“No, I mean the rest of it. What you said before, you did all that?” He asked.

Luke and Tam both turned to them, their faces betraying their own horror-laced curiosity. “Yeah, but you guys do stuff like that and more every day,” she answered, her cheeks flushing with color.

“We’ve also had training,” Tim told her. “Several years’ worth. I’ve been doing this since I was a kid and Luke studied martial arts most of his life but you’ve only been gone four years. How--?” He stopped, at a loss for words.

She thought about it, “I don’t know, I just did it. I didn’t have much of a choice with a lot of it, I just had to do it,” she said as she looked up at him. “And I have had some training.”

“Martial arts, stuff like that,” she shrugged.

“You?” Tam snorted.

“What’s that supposed to mean?” Felicity asked in consternation.

“It’s just—” Tam sighed apologetically and smiled, “C’mon Baby, for years our mom made Luke and me take self-defense classes. We were always involved in one sport or another but you were never interested in that stuff. Even when our mom offered to sign you up and take you with us you said no.”

“I guess I changed my mind,” Felicity told her.

Tam looked at her skeptically, “I once tried to get you a gym membership and you made me take it back and exchange it for a gift certificate to a day spa.”

“I don’t see what the big deal is,” Felicity said in exasperation. “Look, after you’ve been kidnapped a few times you start realizing that maybe it’s time to start getting better prepared so I asked some of the guys on Team Arrow to teach me.”

“What did they teach you?” Tim asked curiously.

“Specifically?” She frowned, “Well, a mixture of stuff really but mostly Jeet Kun Do, Krav Maga, and Jujitsu because my friend Sara thought those would work better for me since I’m so small statured and when I do have to fight it’s usually close-quarters combat. I’m trying to get into Wing Chun, and Oliver has a thing about us all learning archery even though I kind of suck at it. Diggle thought that since I was familiar with yoga techniques I would do better with Indian style martial archery disciplines like Dhanurveda rather than Kyudo but it’s been slow going. I’m also fair to middling with eskrima sticks and the Bo Staff but, believe it or not, guns are my wheelhouse. Lance, Dig, and I go to the range every weekend; it’s become kind of a thing. The first time I got all my shots center mass, Lance bought me lunch and stuck the target on his fridge; it was hilarious,” she said with a grin. “Dig even got me my own Glock with the extra extended clips afterwards then Lance got me the P99 after they got into this big debate over which one was better.”

“You own guns?” Tam asked, her jaw nearly hitting the floor.

She nodded, “A few. Like I said, I have two nine millimeters; the Baby Glock and a Walther P99, a .38 police special, and a shotgun but I left that and the revolver back in Starling,” she frowned. “I really need to call Dig and make sure he’s still sending them.”
“A Baby Glock…?” Tam repeated, looking dumbstruck.

“Yep,” she nodded again. “Although technically it’s called a Glock 26. Dig got me the Gen 4 because it came with three clips instead of two and I usually try to keep both a nine shot and a fifteen shot backup clip in my purse. Besides,” she said, wrinkling her nose slightly, “sometimes your pinky can get caught in the regular nine shot clip so it helps to use the extended one.”

“You keep it in your purse?” Tam asked her, eyebrows shooting upwards towards her hairline.

“Yeah,” she reached for her handbag and pulled it out, sliding her thumb on the release and popping out the clip before clearing the chamber and handing it to her sister. “It’s remarkably light and it fits in an evening bag like a dream even with the extra clips. Plus it has the double spring so there’s very little recoil and you can field strip it superfast. There’s not much to it, really.” She looked at it with a slight shrug. “The Glock has a lot more accessories available than the P99, but I kind of like the Walther a little more just because, well, the whole Daniel Craig/James Bond thing, y’know? Although technically he carries a PPK…”

Tam looked at the gun in her hand blankly before Tim reached over and took it away from her with a scowl, “How did you even get this on the plane?”

“Checked it with my luggage,” she told him rolling her eyes as he handed it back to her. She stuck it back in her purse and look at Tim’s expression of disapproval. “What; you thought I kept it in my purse while I was on the plane? Yeah, no. You can check it in an approved carry case but the TSA frowns on you actually keeping it on your person even with a concealed weapons permit which, by the way, I have in case you were wondering.”

“All that? Guns, martial arts…” Luke said, his eyebrows nearly raised to his hairline in surprise. “How often were you training?”

“I don’t know,” she scrunched her forehead as she thought about it. “The guys train between six to ten hours a day but since I’m on tech I only do about half that so I’d say between three and a half to four and a half hours a night during the week then more on the weekends, five to seven days a week for almost two years.” She grinned, “Plus I went from a size six to a four so, yeah for sample sales!”

“I thought you said you were just a tech,” Tam asked faintly, her jaw slack with surprise. “How often were you training?”

“Yeah, I am,” Felicity said slowly, “but I occasionally have to go in the field, too. Besides, it’s something to do between hacking into Federal databases, y’know? It’s really no big deal.” Tim and Luke exchanged looks and Tam rubbed her hand over her forehead as though she were trying to rub her brain clean.

“Baby is packing heat now,” Tim deadpanned. “Bruce is going to lose his shit when he finds out.”

“Am I the only one who feels like they just stepped through the looking glass?” Tam asked the other two stunned people in the room.

“You know, your family looks so nice and normal from the outside but you’re really not,” Tim mused aloud.

“I’m… I can’t process this on an empty stomach, so okay, food first and then interrogation,” Luke said at last.

“Agreed,” Tam said heaving a sigh as she went to retrieve the menus from the kitchen.
The four of them sat around the coffee table and began to order:

“Extra eggrolls! Oh, and those cream cheese crispy things, what are they called? Crab Rangoon!”

“Ooh, if you’re ordering sushi get a Candy Roll and extra Eel Sauce! And a Godzilla roll! Oh, and a Spicy Lover’s Roll! I love me some deep fried sushi; it’s like fancy fish sticks.”

“I don’t give a crap that it’s good for me, Tam; I’m not eating any more tofu!”

“Do they have any of those Blooming Onions?”

“Who orders Buffalo Wings and forgets to ask for Bleu cheese on the side?”

“Do they have any of those little wonton tacos? I love those things.”

“Don’t forget the slaw on the barbecue sandwiches!”

“Tell them no mayo on my burger! And no tomatoes; they’re all mushy and evil.”

“Pepperoni or veggie?”

“To cilantro or not to cilantro, that is the question.”

“Tiramisu or cheesecake? Screw it, we’ll just get both.”

“Oh my Alka-Seltzer, what have we done?” Felicity asked after they finished ordering from the last menu. “How are we going to eat all that food when it gets here?”

“I have no idea but I’m freaking starving,” Tim said, shaking his head. “Just ordering those burgers made my mouth water.”

“Would it be wrong to make a snack while we wait for the food?” Luke mused as he picked up the sushi menu again.

“I still think we should have ordered salads, too,” Tam said crinkling her nose. “Just for appearances sake; that way if anyone asks we can say we made the attempt to eat healthy.”

“There’s lettuce and tomatoes on the burgers, veggies on the pizza, and rice and seaweed with the sushi. There’s your salad right there,” Luke said wryly.

“I could go for some popcorn,” Tim offered.

“You know what I love?” Felicity said with a grin, “I love that I come from a family that eats their feelings. Go neurotic Jewish stereotypes!”

“Whoop! Whoop! Eating disorder meet high metabolism! Yeah!” Tam said giving her a high five.

“Okay, since I’m apparently banned from the kitchen you guys go get the popcorn while me and Tim wait for the food,” Luke said. “We playing for stakes or splitting the diff?”

“Okay, I’m lost,” Tim said with a confused look. “Explain please; what are we doing now?”

“Yeah, cheapskate over there came up with a spin on ‘Around The World’ a couple of years back,” Tam said, hitching a thumb at her brother.

“I’m not a cheapskate, merely a man who enjoys injecting a bit of Vegas into the evening’s festivities,” Luke said turning to Tim. “The game is this: First person to have their food delivered has to pay for everything, if two delivery guys show up at the same time then they split it, but if three or more show up then we call sudden death and whoever ordered the food that arrives last has to reimburse everyone plus tips.”

“And I somehow wind up paying every time,” Tam said sarcastically. “I wonder how that happens? Maybe because Luke always snatches up all the menus before anyone else can then picks the ones for the restaurants closest to our building first?”

“Hey, you’re the only one with a decent paying job,” Luke replied insouciantly. “Tim and I are superheroes and, while that is a freaking cool thing to put on a résumé, it doesn’t actually pay much and Felicity is unemployed due to her lousy taste in men.”

“I’m so glad you’re at the point that you can now joke about stuff like that,” Felicity said wryly as she got up from the couch. She went over to her purse and took out Bruce’s card and threw it on the coffee table. “Consider that me conceding defeat and put it on the card.”

“Whoa, is that--?” Tim picked it up and his eyebrows drew together in confusion. “Um, Felicity? How did you get Bruce’s credit card?”

“Same place I got the wad of hundreds just in case they don’t take plastic,” she said taking out a few hundred dollar bills and tossing them on the table as well. “Some helpful advice boys: If you should choose to screw with a girl’s emotions, make sure not to leave your wallet lying around where she can find it. I might work for the good guys but that doesn’t mean I’m not above a little fiscal payback,” she told them, the line falling easily from her lips as she breezed by them on the way to the kitchen with Tam chuckling beside her.
Chapter Twenty-One

Tim and Luke looked at each other then back to the card.

“Damn,” Tim said with a slow chuckle. “Your sister is a total bad-ass.”

“Felicity didn’t steal his card,” Luke said confidently as he tossed it back down on the table.
“Dude, it’s got his name on it,” Tim pointed out.

“I don’t care,” Luke said. “Felicity gets paranoid if you eat a grape in the supermarket before paying for it.”

Tim gave him a skeptical look, “How did she get the card then?”

Luke shrugged nonchalantly, “I have no idea.”

“I repeat; your sister has turned into a total bad-ass.”

“Lifting Bruce’s card makes her a bad-ass?” Luke asked drolly.

“No, lifting Batman’s AmEx Black makes her a bad-ass. Even I wouldn’t do that and technically I’m family.”

“You’re a dumb ass,” Luke said without heat. The doorbell rang and he looked up, “Huh? That was fast.”

“I wonder why security didn’t call upstairs first?” Tim asked with a frown.

“I don’t know, man. Who cares, I’m hungry.” He snatched the card and the cash off the table, shoved them in his pocket, and headed for the door.

“You’re really using it?” Tim chuckled as he followed him to the door.

“Hell, yeah; motherfucker slept with my sister, least he can do is buy her dinner,” Luke shot back before answering the door then froze, every muscle in his body going tense.

“Luke,” Bruce said as the two men faced each other.

“Oh, I just knew tonight was going to be chock full o’ fun,” Tim breathed as he looked from one man to the other.

“I didn’t know you were back in town.”

“Now you do.”

“Maybe we should take this outside?” Tim said quietly, glancing back towards the kitchen.

“I’m not here to cause trouble, I just want to speak to Felicity,” Bruce said, his expression never wavering despite the implied threat before him.

“See, you say you’re not here to cause trouble but you talking to my sister?” Luke thinned his lips and tilted his head slightly to the side. “Yeah, that’s going to be a problem because, as far as I’m concerned, that’s the definition of trouble.”

Tim cleared his throat and turned to Bruce. “Okay, before this escalates I think maybe it would be best if you just left.”

“I’m not after a fight,” Bruce returned with equal menace.
“Really? That why my little sister has bruises all over her?” Luke asked him. “Didn’t seem to have a problem using your hands on her, what makes me so special?”

Bruce’s eyes grew even colder and he tensed. “Do you really want to go there with one arm in a sling?”

“Oh, there’s plenty I can do with one hand tied behind my back,” Luke said, taking a half step forward.

The muscles in his jaw tensed but he didn’t yield. “I understand where you’re coming from Luke and, if I were you, I’d probably have the same reaction but—“

“But what, Bruce? Tell me, how should I be reacting right now?” Luke said, moving another step forward until he was in the hall. Tim followed him, closing the door behind him so that the girls couldn’t hear. “Explain to me how I should react to finding out that a guy I thought was my mentor and friend screwed my baby sister?”

“I didn’t screw Felicity,” Bruce bit out, getting in Luke’s face as his own temper began to come to a head. “The only reason I was even down there in the first place is because I was trying to keep her safe!”

“So I saw,” Luke said, his hand balling up into a fist at his side.

Bruce’s eyes flickered for a moment. “I didn’t mean to hurt her like that and I already apologized for it.”

“Before or after you fucked her?” Luke asked right before Bruce’s fist caught him in the jaw.

Luke rolled with the punch and went down to the floor, his legs kicking out in a sweep that sent Bruce down hard. Before the older man could regain his footing Luke was on top of him, his thick thighs straddling his chest and pinning his arms as he pounded into his face with his one good fist.

Bruce lifted his legs and wrapped his calves around Luke’s throat, jerking him backward until his arms were free then caught him in the solar plexus with a power punch that left him winded as he got back on his feet. “Don’t make me hurt you, Luke,” he gritted out as the other man sprang up into a battle stance, his bad arm held tight to his stomach.

“I’m just here to talk,” Bruce repeated, keeping his distance but still obviously prepared to defend himself if need be.

“Where did you guys go? Is the food—?” Tam popped her head out of the door and gawked at the sight of her brother and Bruce in a standoff.

“Go back inside, Tam,” Tim said tersely as he practically pushed her backwards.

“What’s going on?” Felicity asked walking over and peering out the door. “What the hell?”

“Felicity—” Bruce turned his head toward her and Luke acted, his fist cutting through in an upper cut before he spun his body into a roundhouse kick that sent the other man flying.

“Whoa!” Tam exclaimed, wide-eyed.

“Luke, stop!” Felicity rushed past Tim and stepped between Bruce and her brother.
“Go back inside, Felicity,” Luke said grimly as he stalked toward Bruce who was already getting back to his feet.

“No,” she said, her tone laced with steel as she planted her hands firmly on her brother’s chest. “I’ve already had one home destroyed in a bat-brawl this week, I’d rather not see this one trashed too!”

“I’m just here to talk to her,” Bruce said, stepping toward them warily.

“So talk!” He spat out.

“Alone,” said, the grim tone of the Bat coming to the foreground.

“I’m not leaving you alone with him!” Luke shot back.

“I can handle this myself,” she told him. “You too, Tim.” She looked over at the other man. “Take Luke inside and I’ll be there in a minute.”

“You sure?” Tim asked, looking from Luke to Bruce and back to her.

“Positive,” she said, feeling the tension leave the muscles in her brother’s chest despite the anger in his expression.

“I’ll be inside if you need me,” he said to her even though his eyes never left the other man.

“I’ll be fine,” she assured him. She waited until Luke walked inside with Tam. Tim offered her one last reassuring nod before shutting the door to give them at least the semblance of privacy. She eyed Bruce up and down for a moment before speaking. “It wasn’t enough that you destroyed my entire house in a brawl back in Starling City you had to start one here too? Is this going to be a new thing for you?”

“Sorry,” Bruce said, the anger leaving his expression although the tension he felt was still apparent in the way he held himself.

“Why are you here?” She asked him.

“I thought we should talk.”

“About what?” Felicity asked. “The weather? Our shared hopes and dreams? Whether or not the Gotham Rogues make it to the Superbowl; what?”

“No, I–I talked to Queen after you left.” Bruce cleared his throat, running his hand over his slightly mussed hair.

“Oh?” She asked coolly. “You two have a bonding moment after trashing everything I own? Nice to know some good came out of that, I suppose.”

“He told me the truth about the Arrow and about what you were doing out there,” Bruce said, not rising to the bait.

“And?”

Bruce’s eyes met hers, “I’m sorry.”
“For what?” Felicity asked facetiously. “Ruining my life, destroying my home, or sleeping with me and then dumping me for a second time?”

“All three,” he said, sincerity coloring his tone despite the tension in his expression. “Look, Queen explained all of it and I just wanted to tell you that had I known what was really going on—“

She held up her hand to cut him off. “You show up after four years, take apart my entire life in a matter of days, threaten me repeatedly, and what happens? Oliver tells you the exact same thing I’ve been telling you for days and suddenly everything’s cool? Nice to hear and, by the way, fuck you very much.”

“You lied to me Felicity, how was I supposed to react?” Bruce said with a grimace.

“You weren’t supposed to react, Bruce. You were supposed to mind your own goddamn business 3000 miles away on the other side of the country where you belong!” Felicity said, anger suffusing her face with color. “My life is none of your business!”

“Your life is my business!” He told her angrily.

“Why?” She asked, throwing up her hands in exasperation. “Just tell me that; why? Why me? Because of my dad? Because I once worked for you? What makes me so special, answer me that!”

“You know why,” Bruce said tersely.

“I really don’t,” she said shaking her head. “It can’t be because of the sex because I know for a fact that you’ve fucked half the East Coast Social Registry, so why?”

“Don’t,” Bruce told her.

“Don’t what?”

“Don’t call what we—it’s not just sex, Felicity.” Bruce said with quiet intensity. “It’s never been just ‘sex’ between us.”

“That’s not what you told me.”

“And I’m telling you now that no matter what I said it was never just sex,” Bruce said stepping into her personal space.

“So what are you saying, Bruce?” She asked with a mirthless laugh. “That you didn’t just screw me because I was a conveniently located warm body? That you’re in love with me? That all this was your version of sending a girl flowers?”

“I don’t know. I don’t know what I feel, all I know is that you’re the only person—“ He fixed his deep blue eyes to hers, his anger giving way to something else. “I don’t know what this is but it isn’t just sex for me.”

She closed her eyes, “I’m not inviting you in again, Bruce. Not again.”

“Please,” Bruce said quietly and she nearly broke but then she remembered what he had done to her and her resolve hardened.

“Please’ only works once and it’s too late,” Felicity said shaking her head, refusing to let him see her pain again. “I’m done, Bruce. I can’t do this with you, whatever this is. I can’t keep playing this stupid game of yours.”
“I understand.” He turned his head away, his hands shoved deep in his pockets, “Queen mentioned…”

“What?” She asked flatly.

“Are you and he…together?” Bruce asked quietly.

A pained laugh burst out of her throat and Felicity looked heavenward as if asking for strength, “Oh, I get it; you and Oliver shared some locker room talk after your little rendition of Fight Club and because he told you I let him into my bed during a moment of weakness now you want me again? Yeah, well, don’t bother,” she said with an edge of bitterness. “Oliver gave me the exact same speech you did after rolling out of bed so you can just move on, safe in the knowledge that apparently no one else wants me either.”

Bruce blanched, “I never said I didn’t want you.”

“I don’t care,” she said turning her back to him. “Just go.”

Bruce didn’t move. He closed his eyes and waited a moment before speaking again, this time in a far more cool and detached tone, “Queen and his associate are down a man so I’m sending Barbara there to take your spot and I’m going to ask Tim to volunteer to go with her. I need someone to run Watchtower in the meantime.”

Felicity turned and looked at him like he was crazy. “Do you honestly expect me to join you in the Batcave after all that’s happened?”

“No the Batcave, at least not the one at the Manor.” He said. “There’s a secondary Watchtower location under the Wayne Foundation Building. I rarely ever use it so it’s horribly out of date but you can upgrade the system in any way you see fit and stay in the penthouse for the duration.”

“You want to set me up in the place Page Six once referred to as ‘Bruce Wayne’s Pied a Terre of Passion’?” Felicity asked sarcastically. “And how do you suppose I explain that to my dad?”

“We’ll keep it professional,” Bruce said, his expression giving nothing away. “I’ll tell him you agreed to act as a paid consultant and that I offered you the penthouse because I never use it which, by the way, is the truth. Despite what the rags would like everyone to think, I rarely go there unless it’s an emergency. I’ll give you a generous salary and you can live there free of charge plus I’ll pay all of your expenses and supply you with any equipment you need. If we can’t get it or if you’d prefer to not go through me, you can keep the card and use that or I can have Alfred give you access to an off-shore account.”

“So let me get this straight: You want to pay me to live in your bachelor pad, take care of your ‘needs’, and you’ll give me shiny things and let me keep your credit card so I can stay occupied while you’re off doing other stuff.” She rolled her eyes, “Do you really think people won’t automatically leap to the conclusion that you’re my Sugar Daddy just because everything is, wink-wink nudge-nudge, strictly professional between us?” She asked in a voice heavily laden with sarcasm. “Why bother telling anyone I’m a ‘consultant’ when you can just say ‘hooker’ and get it over with?”

“I think the word you’re looking for is ‘mistress’; hookers get paid then leave, they don’t take up residence,” Bruce shot back dispassionately. “If you don’t want to man Watchtower, fine. I’ll just let your team know that they’re on their own.”

Guilt? He’s trying to guilt me into doing what he wants? The only reason the team is down a man in the first place is because-- Felicity gritted her teeth and counted to ten. Oh no, she thought. Now I’m pissed. Watch this, you emotional blackmailing Bat-bastard. “Fine, I’ll do it. But if I’m going to be living there then I want it understood right here and now that this is a professional relationship and that you will not enter my home uninvited, I don’t care if it’s an ‘emergency’ or not. Also, I will be paid generously, emphasis on generously. I’m talking the kind of numbers that hurt, not the little ones that just leave a tickle in the checkbook.”

“Anything else?” Bruce asked without blinking an eye.

“Yes,” Felicity said, thinking quickly. “My days are my own, sun up to sundown. I work when the Bat does and when Bruce Wayne trades in his Kevlar for a three piece suit our association ends. You have no right to ask me what I do with my time or with whom I choose to spend it.”

A vein in his forehead stood out as emotion in the form of extreme irritation returned to his expression, “Done.” It was close but not quite the reaction she was going for.

“Not yet,” Felicity said with a touch of triumph. “I saw the photo spread Gotham Living did on that little love nest of yours and there is no way in hell I’m living in some Art Deco meets black enamel and steel Modern nightmare. You’re paying to have the place redecorated, stem to stern, and if I decide to move I keep the furniture.”

“Why don’t I just sign over the deed to the building while I’m at it?” Bruce asked sarcastically. Bingo. “No, but the deed to the penthouse will do.”

He smirked at that, “You’re not serious.”

“Yeah, I think I am,” she said with a nod. “The way I see it, you owe me for forcing me to leave my home and to top it off you destroyed most of my furniture and clothes.”

“Between yesterday and today you spent over $126,000 on clothes, shoes, and handbags,” he said wryly. “I think my debt has been paid in full.”

“$126,000?” Felicity repeated, pursing her lips. “Got more bang for my buck than I thought. I should go back and get the really expensive stuff next time.” She looked him in the eye, poker face in full effect. “I want a contract and a deed drawn up that says I retain full property rights to the penthouse for the sum total of $1 and that, should I ever decide to move, you get first rights to buy back the property for full market value plus 25%.”

“I’ll give you a lease,” Bruce returned.

“Think of this as less of a negotiation and more like a divorce,” Felicity told him with a malicious twinkle in her eye. “I get the house and full custody of Watchtower Jr.”

“I’m not doing it,” Bruce snorted derisively. “I’ve been more than generous in my offer; take it or leave it.”

“Leaving it.” Without even a second’s hesitation Felicity turned to head back inside the apartment.

“There’s no way you’d risk leaving your team back in Starling a man down and without a tech,” Bruce said in an almost bored tone.

“You’re right,” Felicity said in an exaggerated manner as though finally realizing something. She tapped her finger to her chin. “I wouldn’t, would I? This is why I’m heading back inside to get dressed, call for a cab to the airport, and then heading back there; tonight.”
“Queen sent you to Gotham for a reason,” Bruce growled. “You’re blown, remember? You go back there and your freedom is forfeit.”

“I remember,” she nodded as she turned dramatically on her heel and faced him again. “The thing is, now that I’ve had time to think things through I’m not so sure he was right. In fact, I think that Isabel isn’t nearly the threat he thinks she is.”

“And if you’re wrong?” He asked, his voice dropping into a registry more in keeping with the Bat.

Bruce narrowed his eyes at her, “Queen won’t let you. If you show up on his doorstep he’ll just shut you out.”

She frowned, “Eh, I don’t think so. You see Bruce, your first mistake in coming here--besides thinking I would ever just cave and be grateful for your presence in my life because I’m just some pathetic former lay of yours,” at her words he started forward before clenching his teeth in a grimace, “was that we were in some sort of negotiation. We’re not. A negotiation occurs when one party has something the other one wants and vice versa. I know that there is no way in hell you would ever risk sending both Barbara and Tim to Starling unless there was something down there that you wanted. Since we both know it’s not me, that means that you’re betting that Ra’s al Ghul is going to show up on Oliver’s doorstep sooner or later and you want your people in the best position possible when that happens. What that means is that you’re the one down a tech, not Oliver, so you’re the one who needs me, not the other way around.”

“You think you’re so clever right now, don’t you?” Bruce said with a tinge of amusement despite the firm line of his jaw.

She clucked her tongue at him, “Oh Bruce, I know I am and, despite what you may think, you’re not that hard of a read.” She let that sink in before continuing. “As I was saying, your second mistake was in assuming that Oliver ran his team in the same way you run your little dictatorship; he doesn’t.” She took a bold step forward, taking a play from the Bat’s How to Influence and Intimidate Handbook, her expression one of deadly intent. “I only work for Oliver when I’m at QC, the rest of the time I’m his partner. He might wear the suit and provide the bankroll but there are three deciding members of Team Arrow and Oliver only accounts for one vote. He doesn’t get to shut me out unless Diggle goes along with it and that won’t happen. The only thing Oliver can do is put down the suit, in which case Diggle and I are perfectly capable of running the show without him which is something we’ve done before and can do again.” At that Bruce’s expression shifted, his eyes focusing on her with laser-like intensity.

That’s right, Felicity silently told him. Five months. Barbara would have confirmed that Oliver Queen was gone for five months but the Arrow was still hanging around Starling City on and off the entire time. Do the math.

“I wasn’t lying on that rooftop, Bruce; not entirely anyway. If you want to get down to brass tacks, I’m the one who runs the show down there,” her blue eyes flashed cold as ice. “Oliver and Dig are vital to the mission but not irreplaceable and if something happens to either one of them we can put a guy in the suit but finding a replacement for me is a whole different matter and they both know it. Even if I have to go completely underground I can do it. I can fake documentation in my sleep and I can get access to unlimited sources of cash and information anytime I need to, so going back to Starling isn’t really as big a hurdle for me as you’d suppose. You, on the other hand,” she tilted her head in quiet contemplation.

“The way I see it, my closing ranks with Team Arrow puts you out of the loop on the whole Ra’s al Ghul/Starling City angle and the last thing you want to do is start a turf war with Oliver while you’re up here in Gotham. You need his cooperation and if I’m there he has no reason to make nice with you. That means that, not only do you need my help, but you need my physical presence here in Gotham for as long as it takes for that to happen.” Her lips twitched into a confident expression of superiority as she watched him seethe with anger and frustration at being caught out so easily, “Bad guys aren’t trains Bruce; they don’t run on schedules. Ra’s could show up at any minute or it could take years before he puts in an appearance. If you want me to agree to stick around for that long, you need to make it worth my while. Owning real estate sounds like putting down some pretty significant roots to me, don’t you think?” She smiled, really smiled. Not a tight angry smile, but a big fat sunny shit-eating grin that matched his deepening glower in intensity. She had him and he knew it.

“You didn’t even want to stay at the penthouse, remember?” Bruce said, unwilling to concede defeat just yet.

“That was when you owned it,” she said serenely. “Now that I own it the idea is beginning to grow on me. After all, what kind of girl wouldn’t be interested in her very own penthouse in the heart of Gotham City?”

“There is no way I’m giving you that property,” Bruce told her. “If you want to go back to your boyfriend so badly then fine, I can’t stop you.”

“Okay then,” Felicity said easily.

“I can make do without a tech, even one as talented as yourself,” he told her, his face darkening in anger.

“Didn’t say you couldn’t,” she said, turning to go back into her dad’s apartment. “Goodnight Bruce.”

He held his stubborn stance until she had her hand on the doorknob, “Wait.”

She turned to him slowly, “I’m sorry, I thought we were done here; was there something else you needed?”

His eyes were closed and she could see the frustration written all over his face. “Are you enjoying yourself?” Bruce bit out.

“A little bit,” she said with a smile. She crossed her arms over her chest and leaned against the wall next to the door.

“What do you really want?” Bruce asked her.

“I just told you.”

“I want to know just how much your mission really means to you,” she told him. “I want you to show me just how far you’re willing to go.”

He took a step forward, his muscles tight and his countenance grim, “As far as it takes.”

“Apparently not,” she told him with a raised eyebrow then watched in amusement as he ran an agitated hand through his hair and began to pace as he pinned her with another silent glare. “Oh dear, is having to concede a significant portion of the Bat’s territory a problem for you? Doesn’t it just ping your little control freak nerves to have someone get the upper hand for once?” She clucked her tongue and gave him a sad little pout. “Poor baby.”

“This is a joke to you?” He growled menacingly. “What is this really about? Payback? Some petty little bid for revenge?”

“No, this is me teaching you a very important lesson,” Felicity explained. “If you screw with someone then you’d better be prepared to get screwed back. Don’t worry Bruce, it only really hurts the first time.”

He rubbed his hand over his mouth and shifted his stance slightly, “Your father is CEO of Wayne Enterprises; what do you suppose he’ll say when he finds out that I ‘sold’ you the penthouse suite in the Wayne Foundation Building for those terms?”

“Nice try,” she said easily. “The Wayne Foundation is completely separate from your Wayne Enterprise holdings with you as sole shareholder, owner, and deed holder for that property. My father would never have any reason to see or have knowledge of our business transaction unless you showed it to him. Also, since the penthouse is considered separate from the Foundation and is your private residence there would be no need to disclose the sale in a public declaration of charitable holdings. If my dad asks I’ll just tell him I leased it or I used my own private investments to purchase the property rights. He has no reason not to believe me.” She smiled again and leaned forward, her voice dropping to a near whisper, “I might not have liked being an Executive Assistant but that doesn’t mean I didn’t pay attention during all those business meetings and negotiations.”

“Fine, you want to go, we’ll go,” Bruce bit out. “If I agree to this then it will be quid pro quo; I want a contract,” he demanded. “You agree to work for me for no less than five years and any escape clause goes one way; mine. If I need you to consult for any projects at Wayne Enterprises or WayneTech you will do so as a paid consultant under exclusive contract and any tech, weapons, or other intellectual properties developed while under contract are to be retained solely by me. At no time may you accept an offer of employment by any company in direct or indirect competition with Wayne Enterprises or its subsidiaries nor can you fraternize with any competitors on your off hours of which there will be none. You will be available on-call 24/7. If I choose to retain you at the end of the original contract then it will be at my discretion. If you choose not to sign a new contract then you will sign a non-compete clause which says that you cannot work for anyone else for an additional five year term. You will sign a confidentiality agreement in addition to an employment contract and if you fail to meet your end, any and all property rights will revert back to me.”

“Nope,” Felicity said, stifling a yawn. “No contract, no trotting me out with the other worker bees, and no way in hell do you ever get to even have the illusion of power over me. You only get me when the Bat does and even then you will keep your little bat-toes on your side of the fence. If I want to work for someone else, I will. If I want to invite Lex Luthor to my place for a quickie and sell him a big ass smart gun that fires bat bullets, you can’t say ‘boo’. This is a straight trade and any time I want to leave, I leave. If that leaves you in the lurch then tough shit; not my problem.”

“You expect me to agree to that?” Bruce asked flatly.

“I don’t care if you do or not,” she replied. “Like I said, you’re the only one with your hand out here, remember?”

He stuck his hands deep inside his pockets and threw her a look that would have caused any other person to flee in the opposite direction while babbling in fear. “Fine, it’s yours! Tomorrow afternoon, five o’clock, my office,” Bruce said through gritted teeth. “I’ll have the paperwork ready for you to sign and then I’ll take you over to the penthouse to show you the set up.”

She looked at him for a few seconds before letting out a sigh. “I don’t want your penthouse, Bruce,” Felicity told him.

“What?” He asked, his expression livid.

She shrugged, “I was just messing with you.”

“You were what?” He asked in disbelief.

“Think about it,” she said with mischievous twinkle in her eye. “Why on Earth would I want a $50 million dollar penthouse? The property taxes on something like that would cripple me financially in no time.” A look flashed across his eyes and Felicity knew she had him. “The maintenance fees on it alone would be somewhere around $14,000 dollars a month.”

“Then why go through all of that then?” He burst out.

“Because you were being a dick,” she told him. “Lesson number two: Don’t be a dick.”

“Fine,” Bruce snarled. “We’ll just sign a lease then.”

“Eh, not really interested in it anymore,” Felicity said off-handedly.

“What does that mean?” He asked, looming like an avenging angel on a mission.

“Just what I said,” Felicity said absentmindedly as she turned to go back inside.

He placed a hand on her shoulder and spun her around, pinning her to the wall, “How do you expect to run Watchtower then? Unless, of course, you plan on moving into the manor or Barbara’s apartment.”

“I’m not going to work for you Bruce,” she told him. “Not from the penthouse, or the manor, or Barbara’s apartment.”

“Yes, you are!” He said through gritted teeth, “Stop. Playing. Games. I’m not in the mood.”

“Are you sure?” Felicity said languidly not the least bit intimidated.

His nostrils flared and he seemed to struggle with himself for a moment before he grabbed the back of her hair and pushed her into the wall, his mouth claiming hers in a hard, unrelenting kiss.

Her hands splayed over his broad chest as she allowed herself this one last moment of insanity. His tongue invaded her mouth as his hands travelled downwards to her hips. He gripped her backside and pulled her into his embrace so she could clearly feel him hard and ready against her.

There was a bump and a rattle of the doorknob along with the sound of raised voices in the penthouse and they broke apart, both of them turning toward the noise.

“I guess we have some eavesdroppers,” Felicity said in a surprisingly level tone even though her brain was filled with a lust induced fog.

Bruce quickly stepped away from her, obviously struggling for control. “We can’t do this here,” he said with some inscrutable emotion in his eyes. “Go get dressed and I’ll wait for you out here until Luke calms down.”

“Why?” She asked calmly, pretending as though she wasn’t just as affected by the kiss as he was.

“Because obviously we need to talk and I’d like to say what needs to be said in private,” he told her.
“I think we’ve already said everything that needs to be said, Bruce,” she told him.

“Obviously not, because you kissed me back just now and that wasn’t one-sided, Felicity.” Bruce turned away from her, rubbing the back of his neck in consternation, “You drive me—what’s wrong with you?” He rounded on her. “You agreed to run Watchtower if I conceded to your demands and I did; to all of them.” His lips tightened into a grimace, “I just don’t understand you. I know you want to do this with me, I know you want to be a part of the mission--!” his eyes narrowed on her and his focus shifted, “I told you that I wasn’t interested in a relationship so you’re trying to punish me, is that it? I never would have imagined you’d be so childish and desperate that you’d stoop so low as to pull a stunt like this.”

She arched an eyebrow at him, “Believe it or not Bruce, you’re not as great a catch as you seem to think you are. I was mad, yes, but not because of that. I was more upset by the tone than the content but that’s neither here nor there. The fact is that I’ve done the vigilante thing for years now and I’m ready to move on with my life. I actually have a few job prospects lined up and I’d like to pursue them. It’s a bit hard to hold down a full time job when you’re up all night hacking, running code, and monitoring communications for a bunch of masks. You and Oliver might be able to live off of catnaps and coffee but I’d like to avoid premature aging and insanity due to prolonged sleep debt.”

“You expect me to believe any of that?” He said, crossing his arms over his chest.

“I don’t care if you do or don’t, the fact is that I’m ready for a life away from all this.” She didn’t have to fake her sincerity on that one, it was true. “I already have a few prospects lined up, in fact.”

“With who? What companies?”

“Why would I tell you that?” She asked with a soft chuckle. “So you can sabotage any chance I might have? Not hardly.”

“I’ll double any salary they offer, I’ll even triple it if you like, but we both know that you’ll never settle for an ordinary life,” Bruce said confidently.

“It’s not about the money, Bruce,” Felicity said scrubbing her hands through her hair that had come loose from her messy ponytail and stretched. His eyes went straight to the neckline of her camisole and zoomed in on the fact that she didn’t bother with a bra. “It’s about quality of life.”

“Quality of life’, huh?’” Bruce repeated, his eyes following her as she moved to lean against the wall again and folded her hands over her chest to stave off the chill in the hallway. She watched as he observed the slight bounce of her unbound breasts under the thin material of her shirt. He cleared his throat and scowled, “Cut the crap, Felicity; just tell me what you want and let’s settle this.”

“Why do you need me to do it?” Felicity asked him with a curious tilt of her head. “Alfred can run Watchtower, can’t he?”

“No,” Bruce bit out losing his temper again, “but you already knew that plus you’re one of Watchtower’s programmers. You can keep up with the system, work code and hack as you go; at best Alfred can just monitor the coms but he can’t do what you and Barbara do. Look, what it comes down to is if you don’t agree to run Watchtower I can’t send Barbara to Starling, period. Ra’s and the League are coming for Queen and his crew and you need your people safe just as much as I need my people there. In the meantime though, I still need someone monitoring channels in Gotham.” His focus narrowed on her again, “Unless you really are still thinking about going back to Queen?”

She shook her head, “Like I said, I’m over the vigilante thing. I was over it before I even left Oliver which is one of the reasons I quit. All I want now is a career and a chance at a normal life.”
“A normal life?” He scoffed at the possibility of that being the truth again. “With marriage and babies and dinner by seven every night? I don’t think so.”

“Why not?” She challenged.

“Because it’s a load of bullshit and you know it!” He said with a short bark of laughter.

She frowned, “No, seriously, why can’t I meet someone and have all that? Not that I want that necessarily, nothing wrong with it either way, but why is that bullshit? Do you think I’m somehow defective or something?”

“You aren’t built for that life and even if you were you already know you won’t get it from me or anyone else you have your sights set on.” The timbre of his voice lowered to a darker and more seductive level and he stepped close enough to her that she could feel his body heat through her clothes. “And since Queen is out of the running we both know who that leaves, don’t we?”

Her lips quirked upwards, “I do but I have a feeling you don’t.”

“Meaning?” Bruce proffered.

She just smiled enigmatically knowing that it would bug the shit out of him later. “Fine, I will temporarily help you with Watchtower as long as Alfred agrees to start learning the system. You can teach him, I don’t expect to have that much time on my hands.”

“Alfred has his own duties to see to,” Bruce said shaking his head. “Other than the occasional shift he can’t man Watchtower every single night.”

“What a coincidence, neither can I,” Felicity said sarcastically.

“I don’t have all night, Felicity,” Bruce grimaced. “Out with it.”

“Fine Bruce, I’ll man Watchtower but there will be conditions.”

“Naturally,” he said sardonically, “What now? You want me to sign the manor over to you? Empty my bank accounts? I know,” he said, snapping his fingers, “you want me to give you your ‘normal life’ and get down on one knee after asking your father for your hand in marriage. We’ll have a spring wedding and make lots and lots of babies; twins, and we’ll give them cute little names like Chrysanthemum and Churchill.”

“That was a pretty detailed foray into the absurd, Bruce,” Felicity said with a superior lift of her brow. “Is there something you need to tell me?”

“Not hardly,” he threw back in an unamused tone.

“I won’t live under your roof, Bruce. This is a temporary arrangement so I’ll just commute for now.”

“I need you on-site,” he told her. “That means you stay at the manor, the penthouse, or Barbara’s place.”

She thought about it for a moment, “Fine, the penthouse, but you pay all my expenses plus everything else you offered,” she paused for drama. “No, I did not forget the offer you made to pay me a generous consultancy fee or the unlimited toy budget. I will, however, be accepting a job soon and I can’t be your 24/7 tech girl so there will be a schedule and you will adhere to it. Also, I need regular days off.”
“What for?” Bruce asked with a frown.

Felicity blinked at him, “Because I don’t intend to spend the rest of my life as a background character in Vigilante World, that’s why. I’d like to be able to let the person I’m seeing know that I can be available to go out on a date occasionally without running it past you first.”

“What person?” He snorted. “You’ve been back in town for all of two days.”

“Oh Bruce, you’d be surprised at what a girl can get up to in just a matter of days.”

That wiped the smug look off his face and his jaw clenched, “What kind of schedule?”

“I’ll give you prime hunting hours; 10 pm until 3 am Monday through Friday with weekends off.”

He shook his head, “Unacceptable; I work Gotham until close to dawn seven days a week. I need you on coms from at least 9 pm until 5 am, sometimes later.”

“Tell Alfred to work the swing shift then because I need at least five solid hours so I can function at a job and take care of sleep debt on the weekends.”

“Did Queen work those hours?” He demanded. “I doubt you complained about sleep debt with him.”

She fixed him with a hard eye, “I was his EA, I made his schedule for him. If I needed a nap then then I took it. Plus, you’re not him; any concessions I made in Oliver’s situation do not apply to you.”

“If you want a job I can get you a job; naps included,” he said, completely unmoved.

“Pass.” She said sweetly.

He tightened his mouth in frustration before answering, “Fine, I’ll try to accommodate you but, as someone once told me, bad guys don’t run on schedules. If I need you, you’re there, understood?”

“That’s reasonable,” Felicity said. “But if I think you don’t need me I’m logging off, understood? And when I tell you I’m down for the night or I need time you give it to me, no questions asked.”

“We’ll revisit it,” Bruce said stubbornly.

“Not negotiable.”

“Best I can do,” Bruce told her. “I’ll try but I can’t promise you something like that.” At her silence he sighed, “Ask me for something I can do and I’ll give you that but I can’t guarantee you a schedule.”

“Well,” she said, appearing to mull it over, “even though I’m really not excited about the idea of that penthouse of yours I suppose I could accept your offer of the decorator.”

“My offer?” He snorted. “Whatever, fine; I’ll even let you keep the furniture. I’d already planned on replacing your belongings and had your things delivered to the penthouse from your old place yesterday.”

“I told them to deliver them here,” Felicity said with a scowl.

“My company, my instructions,” he said unapologetically.
‘Whatever,’” Felicity rolled her eyes, uninterested in fighting over it. “There’s one more thing.”

“Name it,” he told her.

“Access to my bed is not a part of the deal,” she said with a confident bearing. “If I take money from you it’s because you’re paying me to be your tech, not a call girl, understood?”

His expression slammed shut and he surged forward, his mouth drawn into a grim line, “I’ve never treated you like a call girl and you know it.”

“And I’m telling you that I won’t be manhandled and your money doesn’t buy you those kinds of services,” she told him succinctly. “Even if I really do decide to hook up with Sexy Lexie, my personal life is my own and you are not a part of it.”

“Sexy Lexie?” He asked, a spark of amusement in his expression battling with the tense line of his jaw.

“You know what they say about bald men,” Felicity drawled. “I might have to find out if it’s true for myself.”

“You have a type, Baby, and Lex doesn’t fit the bill,” Bruce said in a sexy undertone.

“I don’t know; older billionaire with a dark side?” She pointed out. “Sounds about right.”

“I’m not worried,” he told her, stepping a bit closer.

“Oh?” She asked coolly.

“I don’t need to force my way into your bed, Baby,” Bruce rumbled in a low tone. “Whether you admit it or not, you want me just as much as I want you but I’m willing to play it your way for now.”

His voice took on a sensual timbre, “The next time I take you it will be at your invitation.”

“Consider yourself uninvited then,” she said laconically.

“Are you sure about that?” His voice took on a languorous quality as he moved closer, his eyes dipping to the thin material of her top and her unbound breasts, trailing up to her lips before ending their journey by catching her gaze with his own.

“Do you want to take me to bed, Bruce?” Felicity purred, a seductive smile on her lips.

“Always,” he said, his lips stopping just a hairsbreadth from hers, his arms leaning against the wall on either side of her.

“Good,” she breathed into his mouth. “You needed to learn how to deal with disappointment sometime.” She pushed him away with her fingertips and stepped out of the cage of his arms to touch the doorknob to the penthouse, “I’ll see you tomorrow at 9 am at the Wayne Foundation Building.”

“I have meetings scheduled in the morning,” he scowled, the Bat replacing the lover at breakneck speed.

“Cancel them,” she told him. “Consider it the first in a long line of concessions you’ll be making from here on out,” Felicity said imperiously.

“Fine, I’ll start making a few concessions if you will as well,” he told her.

“Like what?”
He looked down at her, his mouth drawn in a tight line, "Like the fact that I need to be able to trust you to act as a team out there. That means you have to get over your anger and stop treating me like the enemy."

"If I act like I can’t trust you it’s because you haven’t given me a reason to," she told him.

He nodded, "Okay, I’ll grant you that one. I guess a lot of this is my fault, most of it in fact." He looked at her again, his eyes softer and more sincere than she had seen in a long time. "I’m sorry for what…for what’s happened between us." He frowned and shifted his weight a little, "I’m not used to apologizing to anyone but I really am sorry. I never meant to hurt you and..” he took a breath, "I want this to work, Felicity. I want to work with you, share the mission. I don’t want to fight anymore."

Felicity felt her anger melt a little and grumbled, "If you can make the effort then so can I, I suppose." He grimaced and she sighed wearily, "Look, I’ll try, okay, but I need you to start listening to me. Really listen. I know that you’re used to being the boss but I’m used to being someone’s partner. My team trusts me and I trust them. If I tell you something then I need to know you won’t shut me out or make a power play to reassert your dominance or some other crap! I need to know that you can treat me like an equal. I don’t mind following your lead but if you want us to really work together you have to stop treating me like I can’t think for myself or that I’m incapable of taking care of myself."

"That’s not easy for me," Bruce said reluctantly.

“Learn,” she told him firmly. “Tomorrow I’ll do my best to make a fresh go of it but tonight I still need to process all of this. I’m still really, really pissed off about everything that’s happened. I still can’t believe that you and Luke—“ She stopped, took a moment to center herself, then exhaled. “Okay, I’m letting that go now. It’s done. If you can keep it in the past then I’ll try too, okay? Tomorrow though, today I get to be as pissy and vindictive as I want to be."

“Pissy and vindictive, huh?” Bruce asked, quirking a smile. “If you were really pissy and vindictive you would have nailed me at least a couple of times with those toasters and potted plants.”

“Almost got you with the wine bottle,” she pointed out with a raised eyebrow. “Probably ruined that sweater of yours too. Pretty pissy and vindictive of me, I’d say.”

“Guess I won’t push my luck then.” Bruce smiled a little and nodded as he made a move toward the elevators. “I’ll see you tomorrow. By the way,” he said, pulling something from his jacket pocket and tossing it to her. “Your phone and something for your good buddy, Lex.”

She caught the weighted bag handily, refusing to react to his pointed sarcasm since she knew exactly what was in the bag. Instead she reached into the sack and pulled out the lube. She tossed it to him and he caught it midair without even thinking about it. “That’s for you. Lex and I won’t need it but now that I’ve seen your negotiation skills in action I figure you could use the relief.”

At that moment the bell to the private elevator dinged and four delivery people emerged with several boxes of food between them. Bruce glanced over at them as they began to approach.

“Pissy and vindictive,” he said dryly as he pocketed the lube and headed for the elevator, his eyes still locked on hers as the doors shut. As soon as the doors to the elevator closed, the door to her dad’s penthouse opened and the three stunned and somewhat impressed expressions of her companions were revealed. Tim and Luke quickly paid the deliverymen and Tam pulled Felicity into the foyer while the men handled the multiple boxes and bags of food.
“Holy shit!” Tam breathed; eyes bright and face alight in stunned amazement.

“So I take it you were all listening in on that?” Felicity asked dryly.

“Dude!” Tim marveled as he stepped in behind them with a large box of food balanced in one arm and several bags dangling from the other. “Your sister really is a total—”

“Bad-ass,” Luke finished for him as he shook his head. “Damn Felicity, all I was planning on doing was roughing him up a little; you practically ripped his balls off and shoved them down his throat.”

“And then made him say ‘thank you and may I please have some more’!” Tim crowed.

“I can’t believe you just totally screwed Bruce like that and then literally tossed him a bottle of lube,” Tim said in amazement. “It was like the culmination of every fantasy I have ever had!”

She shook her head at them, “Not that I don’t appreciate your concern, but did you really have to watch us from the peephole?”

“Yup, plus we kept the door cracked so we could hear better,” he said with a weird expression on his face as he poked her on the shoulder with his finger.

“Stop it!” Felicity said, batting his hand away. “What are you doing?”

“I’m just checking to see if you’re real and not some kind of amazing dream I never want to wake up from.”

Felicity sighed, “You do realize that this means that you have to go help my team in Starling now, right?”

Tim shrugged, “That’s cool, doesn’t matter to me. I was planning on heading back to Bludhaven tomorrow anyway. One city is just as good as another.”

“Are you going to be okay with Tim being 3000 miles away?” She asked Tam.

She chuckled, “Girl, I work for Wayne Entertainment; I’m on the West Coast every other week! We’ll probably see each other a hell of a lot more now that he’ll be there and not in Bludhaven, the scum-sucking capital of the world.”

“Hey, I might actually be able to get a tan,” Tim said cheerfully.

“Look, can we talk and eat at the same time?” Luke asked, jostling some of the food.

“Let’s eat!” Tim said as they all filed into the TV room. “You can fill me in on the details of your team over heartburn.”

Later that night when she laid in her bed she finally got around to worrying about the logistics of everything.

As much as she’d like to pretend that Bruce no longer affected her, he did. She’d felt that kiss in her bones and she knew that he knew it, too. It was just a matter of time before close quarters and unresolved sexual tension came to a head and then she’d be in the same situation all over again.
“I am not a doormat,” Felicity told herself out loud as she stared up at the ceiling. “I will not have sex with that man no matter what.” She sighed and rolled onto her side, “Oh who am I trying to kid?”

She was going to ride that man like a mechanical bull the first chance she got. Speaking of which…

Felicity reached into the white paper sack on her bedside table, popped the Plan B in her mouth before tossing the packaging in her wastepaper basket and took a sip of water from her water bottle. She then tossed the bag and its contents back on top of the nightstand. “One less thing to worry about at least.”

She slumped back into her pillows and glanced at her clock. It was still pretty early. Tam, Luke, and Tim were still up and watching TV in the lounge but she just hadn’t been in a company kind of mood.

“Hey,” Tam said, opening her bedroom door a crack.

“Hey,” she said back.

Tam walked over to her bedside and fished the pastel colored packaging out of the trash. “$49.99 plus tax?”

“Yup,” Felicity said morosely. “And worth every penny.”

Tam tossed it back in the wastebasket with a frown, “Why did they decorate the package in pastels if it’s supposed to prevent pregnancy? Isn’t that like the worst marketing idea ever? Damn thing looks like it should come with a free pair of baby booties.”

“I don’t know,” Felicity said dryly. “Maybe because they think people with uteruses can’t handle primary colors?”

Tam seemed to consider that for a moment, “That or they thought a picture of a baby bump with a line drawn through it might be too obvious?” She snorted, “Personally I’d buy it but, hey.” She lay down beside her in the bed forcing Felicity to scoot over to give her room. She settled into the pillow and rolled over so she was facing her, “I meant to ask, can I move in with you?”

“Yes, you’ve already stolen my pillow and my side of the bed, why not?” Felicity snorted.

“No, I meant into the penthouse,” she said.

“You already have the condo Dad bought you,” Felicity frowned.

“So?” She asked, “That penthouse has like five or six bedrooms, what do you care? Plus my condo board doesn’t allow pets. If I move in we can get a tiny little doggie together! Maybe a Lhasa Apso, or a Yorkie, or one of those teeny tiny little poodles people stick in coffee mugs so they can post it on Facebook?” She made a little gesture with her hands, “We can dress it in cute little sweaters and do its hair and buy it tiny little accessories; a cute widdle puppy with a tiny widdle smooshy face. You know you’re dying for one, right?”

“Tiny what? And who’s going to housebreak it?” Felicity asked muzzily.

“Tim,” she said easily. “He’ll also walk it and do all the other gross poopie stuff we don’t want to do.”

“Tim’s not even housebroken! Besides, he’s going to be in Starling City, remember?”
“We’ll hire a maid and a dog walker, I’ll pay! Please! Pretty please! Please let me live in your penthouse!” Tam begged, her hands folded in supplication.

“Fine!” Felicity said wearily. “If you can figure out how I’m going to work with Bruce and not wind up in bed with him only to get my heart stomped for a third time then you can move in and get as many dogs as you like. Smoosh all the little widdle faces you want to all day long.”

“Can’t you just sleep with him and not get your heart broken?” Tam said easily.

“I doubt it,” Felicity said morosely.

Tam grabbed the paper sack off the vanity and peered inside before pulling out the XL labeled condoms and grinned at her, “Are you sure?” She teased, dangling the box between her fingers.

“I don’t think I can do this,” Felicity said, not even cracking a smile.

“Sure you can,” Tam told her. “It’s like riding a bike.” She winked, “A very well hung bike.”

She snorted, “Not that, I mean work with Bruce again and not get hurt.”

“God, you’re bringing me down,” Tam moaned dropping the condoms on the bed between them and burying her face in the pillow.

“I’m sorry if my life is making you upset,” Felicity said sarcastically.

“What’s the big deal?” She asked without looking up. “He wants you, you want him, I say hop on top and enjoy the moment.”

“I can’t, and I don’t think I can work with him without that happening again either,” Felicity said miserably.

“But you have to!” Tam said, lifting her head from the pillow.

Felicity sighed resignedly, “Because of the mission and the fact that it’s the right thing to do?”

“No, because I really want a dog.”

There was a knock at the bedroom door and Tim stuck his head inside with his eyes tightly shut, “Is everybody decent?”

“Unfortunately,” Tam said sulking.

“Damn,” Tim said in consternation as he opened the bedroom door the rest of the way.

“What are you doing in here anyway?” She asked, shaking her head at her boyfriend.

“Luke went to bed early and it felt weird being the only one in the TV lounge,” Tim told them. “Got room for another in there?”

Tim plopped down between them and Felicity huffed as she was forced to the outer edge of the bed. “You know, a few boundaries would be nice every once in a while,” she groused.

“What’s got you so crabby?” Tim asked. “You just handed Bruce his ass out there; you should be celebrating not holed up in here bringing down the mood.”

“Thank you!” Tam said, hugging him tightly and kissing his cheek. “I knew there was a reason I loved you; I told her almost the exact same thing just before you walked in here.”

“No you didn’t,” Felicity said with a frown. “You said I should sleep with Bruce and basically chuck my self-respect out the window.”

“What is--?” Tim squirmed on the bed and pulled the now crushed box of condoms out from behind him. “I really didn’t need to know this about Bruce,” he said reading the label.

“Felicity said she can’t be a kick-ass vigilante anymore and she wants to give Bruce back our penthouse,” Tam pouted, burying her head in his chest.

Tim wrapped his arm around her and turned to Felicity with a scowl. “No! No way! You can’t do that after you—” He paused, “Wait, did she say our penthouse?” He looked at Felicity hopefully.

“No.” Felicity told him.

“Damn,” he breathed, his brows drawing together in consternation.

“Tim,” Tam said in a whiny little girl voice. “Make her have sex with your dad again so I can live in his penthouse and get a little doggie!”

“I don’t even want to think about Bruce and---! Wait, we could get a dog, too?” Tim looked to her again.

“No!” She said, throwing her arms up in exasperation.

“Well, that sucks,” he said grumpily. “I always wanted a dog. All we had at the manor were stupid bats and you can’t pet those things without the risk of rabies.”

“Tim, the practical stuff, the logistics of me living there and working with Bruce just doesn’t add up!” She heaved an aggravated sigh. “Right about now Bruce is realizing he has me over the barrel and the minute I cave and give in to him he’s going to wind up stomping my heart all over again.”

“So don’t let him,” Tim said blithely. “Bruce bulldozes over everyone around him and we all cave because he’s so damn relentless it usually isn’t worth it, but you didn’t let him beat you out there. You won. You laid a smack-down on his ass and made him see what it’s like for the rest of us. You aren’t really going to give that up, are you? Because he wins whether you stay and cave or whether you run away and hide; either way, he knows he has that power over you.”

Tam plopped down beside Tim, “Ugh! Your life sucks and you’re dragging me down with you!”

Tim shook his head at the two of them. “The problem with the two of you is that you aren’t thinking this through.”

“No duh, how do you think I got into this mess to begin with?” Felicity said, lying back until she and her sister were side by side with Tim between them, their matching expressions a fitting representation of doom and gloom.

“What does Bruce hate more than anything?” Tim asked them, arching one eyebrow haughtily.

“Commitment,” Felicity said.

“Casual Friday,” Tam said at the same time.
“Not being in control,” Tim corrected them. He turned on his side, punching the pillow so that he was comfortable before speaking again, his mouth relaxed in a gentle smile. “Bruce hates not having control. He cares about you, probably a lot more than he wants to and it scares the crap out of him. It makes him feel out of control so he pushes you away because suddenly he doesn’t hold the power position, you do. He’s playing push me/pull me because a part of him thinks that if he keeps you off-balance then that means he’s in control and he won’t stop until you stop him and the only way to do that is to break him of the habit and show that, no matter what crap he pulls, you aren’t falling for it.”

“And how am I supposed to do that?” Felicity asked.

“You just did; out there just a while ago,” Tim told her. “You took control and he let you. He fought it but once he realized that you weren’t going to let him roll all over you he relented. Once you recognize that, you also begin to realize that the only thing that bothers him worse than when people don’t do what he wants is when they ignore him altogether.”

“What do you mean?” Felicity asked and both she and Tam looked at him with interest. “I tried ignoring him and it didn’t do any good. He just showed up and--”

“Kissed you so hard it made the doorknob sweat,” Tam finished for her.

“First off, I did not need that imagery; secondly, I don’t mean ‘ignore’ as in ‘not pay him attention’, I mean total apathy.” He told them. “You got him good tonight and it’s bugging the shit out of him right now. He’s out there on some rooftop deciding on strategies and formulating protocols even as we speak and tomorrow morning, bright and early, he’ll call his secretary and cancel every meeting he has just so he can be at the door to his penthouse waiting to spring a trap on you and show you that, even if you think you got one over on him, he’s still the one in control.”

“And?” Tam prompted him, lifting her head from the pillow and rolling onto her side to face him.

“Think about it,” he told them. “Bruce has been stewing over this all night long, he’s got plans within plans, he’s figured out every angle, he’s determined to regain control over the situation; what is the one thing you can do that will completely throw him off his game?”

“Hand me the phone,” Felicity said as she finally got it.

“What are you going to do?” Tam asked as Tim handed her the cell.

“Hold on,” Felicity said as she looked for the name she’d added to her contact list just before she decided to go to bed. The phone began to ring and she waited.

“Hello?”

“Hi, it’s Felicity. I’m not calling too late, am I?”

“No,” Jake said. “I’m usually up pretty late actually. You don’t need an on-call hero already do you?” He teased.

“Not exactly,” she said, “I, um, I was just wondering if you were serious about doing something later?”

“Yeah, absolutely,” Jake said brightly. “When?”

“Anytime really,” she said.

“How about lunch tomorrow? Your dad has meetings all afternoon so he won’t need me until he’s “ready to leave for the day barring any last minute change of plans.”

“Any time after 11:30 works for me.”

“I have to be in the area in the morning so why don’t I just swing by Wayne Enterprises around that time and we can take it from there?”

“Sounds like a plan,” he told her in his warm honey and whiskey drawl. “See you then Miss Felicity Fox.”

“See you, Jake. Goodnight.” She hung up the phone and Tam squealed in delight from her side of the bed.

“Oh my God!” Tam laughed. “I can’t believe you just did that!”

“Wait, did you just play Bruce?” Tim said in shock.

“No, I didn’t ‘play’ Bruce, I just made a lunch date with someone.” She arched her eyebrow at him, “Besides, isn’t that what you just told me to do? Throw him off his game by showing him that he can’t manipulate my emotions whenever it’s convenient.”

“So who’s Jake?” Tam asked.

“Dad’s security officer.”

“Oh yeah, he’s yummy!” Tam goggled. “Ooh, that’s going to drive Bruce out of his skull.”

“Yeah, but that’s beside the point,” Felicity said dismissively. “I need to break the pattern and going to lunch with a nice, normal guy is a good place to start, right Tim?”

“Hmm?” Tim responded faintly, his expression troubled, “Oh, uh, yeah sure.”

“What’s wrong with you,” Tam asked him.

“Nothing,” Tim said quickly, “It’s just…”

“Just what?” Felicity asked.

“Well,” Tim cleared his throat nervously, “Aren’t you, like, using this Jake guy?”

“No,” Tam said, smacking him on the arm.

“Ow!” He said, rubbing his bicep, “I just meant that it seems like you might be giving this guy the wrong impression.”

“What do you mean, ‘wrong impression’?” Felicity frowned again. “He asked me to call him if I ever wanted to do something and I did; how is that giving him the wrong impression? I’m having lunch with him, not making a life-long commitment under false pretenses.”

“Yeah,” Tam said, giving him a dirty look of her own. “And besides, it’s not like she’s dating Bruce; he dumped her remember? Twice; and then he showed up again right afterwards expecting to get into her cookie jar like that was okay or something. If some guy tried that shit with me his balls would be aching. You, yourself, basically told Felicity to move on. You said to show Bruce total apathy by not letting him have his way so isn’t going to stress-free lunch with a nice normal guy a good start in the right direction?”

“I said all that?” Tim asked then cleared his throat, “Oh yeah, I did. Sure. That was a…good plan of mine,” He said faintly before picking up the box of condoms holding up them to her gaze, “Well, since you aren’t going to use them mind if Tam and I take them home with us?”

“Tam honey, are you sleeping over tonight?” Lucius said as he opened the door then froze as he saw Tim holding a large box of condoms and in bed with both of his daughters.

“Hi Daddy!” Tam waved at him.

“Timothy,” Lucius intoned, his face a mask of disapproval.

“Mr. Fox,” Timothy said as he scrambled out of bed tossing the condoms behind him and quickly got to his feet. “Sir,” he added.

Lucius took a moment to look from both his daughters who were still lying on the bed to the nervous young man standing in front of him. “Tim, son, why don’t you say goodnight to the girls then come see me in my office,” he ordered with another hard look before he shut the door behind him.

“Um, yes (gulp) sir.”
Chapter Twenty-Two

With Bruce she always had to be on top of things, always thinking ahead and making strategies and the following morning was no exception. Waking early she dressed very carefully in something that was both acceptable for a lunch date and would fill her with confidence with Bruce. She’d decided to automatically discard anything she had bought with Bruce’s card from her wardrobe options. It just seemed fundamentally wrong to go on a date with someone in a dress another man paid for, sort of like putting bad juju on the date before it ever happened, so she had to make do with what she had from her own greatly diminished wardrobe. Looking through her garment bags she had found a pretty A-line floral print dress in pale silk georgette and paired it with a pink cardigan and a low pair of matching heels. The floral pattern was silkscreened giving it a Japanese watercolor look that was very feminine but not too dressy in case Jake wanted to go somewhere casual. She also liked the fact that while it showed some cleavage it was still very lady-like and ended just at her knees so she knew Peggy wouldn’t fuss when she saw her later.

She kept her makeup light and simple and put her hair up in a half ponytail so it was out of her face but the rest of it hung long and loose down her back. She debated leaving on the glasses. She had contacts and they were fine, but the glasses were her armor. Tam had gotten rid of hers as soon as she was old enough for Lasik and Lucius had offered to get her eyes done as well but she had refused. There was just something a little too Clockwork Orange about the whole process and she didn’t mind her glasses that much. They gave her something to fiddle with when she was nervous.

She stood in front of the mirror and played ‘leave them off or on’ for a few minutes until she just gave up and left them on her nose. She might need the reassurance today and the heavy frames were her security blanket.

Although they had agreed on a truce she knew she would still have to be on her toes with Bruce. He was like a puppy that you had to train to not keep peeing in the same corner and, no matter how often you put down papers and patted his nose; he’d keep coming until one of you gave up. Well, she was determined to housebreak the Dark Knight, no matter how many times she had to keep swatting him down, until he got the message. The best way she knew to do that was to keep him just a little off-balance by demonstrating some of the mad skills that made her an asset to Team Arrow until he finally figured it out for himself. Whenever Bruce was in the mix the best policy was to have as much prep time as possible so she caught a cab and arrived at the Wayne Foundation just after dawn. Luckily, as she was Lucius Fox’s daughter, the security guard didn’t argue with her when she asked to go up to the top floor and even used his code key to allow her to access it without her having to ask. When she got there she noticed the keypad and grinned before pulling out her handy card hacker app and opened the door in no time flat.

“One would think Batman would have better security,” she chuckled under her breath before stepping inside. Of course, that wasn’t entirely fair. The key pad was state of the art and required a seven digit access key; it just wasn’t good enough to stop her. Still, biometrics would have been better but probably harder to explain to whatever business associate or bimbo happened to stop by.

When she got inside the large penthouse the first thing she noticed were the huge banks of floor to ceiling windows and sliding glass doors to the large balcony and that over looked the Gotham skyline. The early morning sun peeked over the buildings in the distance, the light reflecting off the shiny gold-flecked artwork that was interspaced between more modernist black leather and steel furnishings. The focal point of the large reception room (other than the huge stone fireplace she could probably stand up in) was the elaborately carved and mirrored bar that was stocked with enough high-end liquor to fuel a millionaire’s St. Paddy’s Day parade.

As she walked inside she felt the hairs on the back of her neck begin to rise as though there were someone waiting in the shadows. Turning her head cautiously, she caught sight of an Egyptian bust of a male figure whose gold and turquoise painted eyes bored into her own. It was unnaturally life like despite the gold leaf and azure paint, the effect made even more chilling by the fact that it was basically a decapitated head on a mount. She stood in front of it and looked at it curiously. She moved around it, circling carefully, before leaning in until their noses almost touched. “Okay, I know how to fix you.” Felicity unbuttoned her olive-green military-style fitted coat and draped it over the bust. “Better.”

She walked more fully into the room and frowned because, as far as she could see, her stuff wasn’t there. “I distinctly heard Bruce say he had my stuff delivered here.” she told herself out loud, and shivered slightly as her voice echoed off the almost cavernous walls of the penthouse.

She turned her head and was nearly slapped silly by a large Max Le Verrier bronze of a walking panther. The animal’s mouth was open and the sunlight played over its sleek lines and created shadows on its face that made it look like it was stalking her. “Nice kitty,” she said to it. “Creepy kitty. Who did Bruce hire to decorate this place, Morticia Adams?” Seriously, if she was going to go Deco she would have done something in keeping with the Scottish Symbolists; bright colors and stained glass, not Scooby Doo-esque artwork with eyes that follow you and a theme straight out of Death on the Nile. She shivered and decided to get away from the dead people heads and man-eating bronzes for a while.

She headed back toward the bedrooms and opened the first door she came from. There, in the center of the room, were all her worldly possessions.

“You’ve got to be shitting me.”

Three racks of clothes, two large boxes marked ‘BOOKS’, three more marked ‘MISC’, and another marked ‘LINENS’, and the chifforobe from her bathroom.

“One piece of furniture. Seriously, one piece,” she shook her head and shut the door behind her in disgust.

“Oh, he’s going to pay for that one,” she muttered as she glared at the furnishings throughout the rest of the place as she explored her new living space. Art Deco Modern had its place and, while she wasn’t necessarily a fan, she could appreciate some of the artwork and furniture that cluttered the penthouse but the overall effect of The Great Gatsby meets The Adams Family was just too overwhelming. It looked like someone crammed every kind of 1920’s to 1940’s interwar period piece they could into every nook and cranny, the creepier the better, and figured that it would work together when all it did was give the place a high-end mausoleum vibe. She could definitely see why Bruce didn’t spend a lot of time there.

Finally she found the office and began to relax. “Now this is more like it,” she said. Although this room was done in Art Deco as well, it was much more understated. She paused to admire the large dark bured wood desk with its curved and sharp lines highlighted by subtle gold leaf along with the other oversized and heavy furniture scattered throughout the room. All were made from highly polished wood that smelled of beeswax and time and were an eclectic mix of intricately carved pieces with an Oriental feel to the stark, clean lines that defined the period. Elegant, classic, and masculine; one could almost see Agatha Christie’s pompous protagonist, Hercule Poirot, having his tea by the fire as he exercised his ‘little grey cells’ along with his appreciation for the finer things in life.

A quote from Poirot’s ‘The Affair at the Victory Ball’ popped in her head and it was so Bruce and so in keeping with the moment that she had to say it out loud, “Because the devil himself dances among us, but we do not see him.”

This was the one room she could see herself relaxing in. There were carved bookcases filled with leather bound volumes that reached from floor to ceiling and thick antique Oriental rugs piled one on top of the other. The effect was less cluttered and busy and more ‘something to keep your feet warm and toasty as you sat in front of the fireplace with a good book’.

“And speaking of the devil,” she murmured. The fireplace itself was small but cozy looking, surrounded by elegantly painted tiles and a dark mahogany mantle that was artfully cluttered with bits and bobs that she knew were less ‘decor friendly’ and more personal.

She picked up a silver framed photograph of a young Bruce at Manor with his mother in the rose garden and smiled before returning it to its place. There were other silver frames here and there, all of his parents, Alfred, or of him as a child but none after the age of eight. She knew that because in each and every picture he was smiling, a real genuine smile of childish joy and innocence. She’d seen Bruce smile, of course, but not like that. Not anymore.

She looked up at the portrait of Martha Wayne that hung above the mantle and sighed. “She was so young, wasn’t she? I always forget how young they were when you lost them.” She glanced back down at the photo of Bruce and his parents again. She knew he was around eight years old when he lost them. “She was, what, twenty-five? Twenty-six?”

Her own mother had only been twenty-three, the same age she was now, but she had been so young when Evie had died her memories of her were all but nonexistent. Perhaps that was a blessing though. She had Evie through Lucius and Peggy, all Bruce had was their ghosts and the demons that had chased him since that night in a dirty back alley.

She reached for the mantle again and pulled down a curved pipe. She brought it to her nose and inhaled. “Cherry pipe tobacco,” she said out loud. She touched the image of Thomas Wayne in another of the shiny silver frames. “You look like your dad.” She scrutinized the dark hair and chiseled features of the laughing man in the photo. “He couldn’t have been much older than you are now.”

He was dressed in his long white lab coat, smiling down at a young Martha, the bulge in his pocket probably hiding the very pipe she held in her hands. She placed it back on the stand. “I wonder if Martha fussed at him as much as Peggy fusses at Lucius when he comes home smelling of pipe smoke? I bet she said, ‘Thomas Wayne, a doctor should know better!’” She shook her head, “I bet he’s the reason Lucius still smokes, not often, but every once in a while. He probably wore Bay Rum aftershave too, didn’t he? And he ate peppermints to try to cover the smell but it never did. Do you still remember that? What he smelled like?” She couldn’t remember what scent her mother wore and Lucius never mentioned it. She looked up at Martha again. Bruce remembered. “And Martha smelled like L’Air Du Temps and baby powder too, I’ll bet, because she worked with kids.”

She looked around at all the personal treasures, laughing out loud as her eyes caught sight of the heavy looking statuette of a kestrel on a carved pedestal. She ran her fingers across the heavily carved feathers and whispered, “The stuff dreams are made of.”

She closed her eyes then opened them slowly, taking in the entire room with fresh eyes. This wasn’t like the rest of the penthouse, this room was personal; more real. This room contained the heart and mind of the real Bruce Wayne.

A thought suddenly occurred to her and she grinned mischievously, “Bruce, Bruce, Bruce,” she clucked her tongue, “shame on you. The least you could have done was make it a little bit of a challenge. Why, this is almost too easy.”

She glanced around the room again and breathed, “Okay Sam, let’s talk about the Black Bird, shall we? Where’s your MacGuffin?”

Her wandering eyes caught on the huge grandfather clock. It was more Art Nouveau than Art Deco but with some of the Egyptian influences that were common during that particular period. The dial looked hand painted with real gold and silver leaf on the sun and moon phases and carved aspects of the gods Ra and Khonsu bracketed the glass casing where swung a heavy brass pendulum with an amulet of Hathor carved into it.

Felicity looked at the image of the horned goddess carefully. She enjoyed reading books on mythology when she was a kid, especially Egyptian Mythology, and Hathor, goddess of fertility, music, romantic love, motherhood, feminine empowerment, along with a host of other great things, had been one of her favorites. Which is why she knew all of her other names including… “Bat.” She smirked, “Now that is what I call a MacGuffin.”

Felicity opened the case and inspected the pendulum, looking at the mechanism carefully. She stuck her head in the opening and looked up to where the chains disappeared into the casing. After a few seconds of poking and prodding she decided to take a chance and tugged at the pendulum holding the aspect of Hathor. There was a sharp click that made her jump back, scared for a second that she had broken the beautiful antique, but she relaxed as the entire clock swung outward along with part of the wall to reveal a cleverly disguised elevator with a biometric scanner in front of the metal doors.

“Okay, well, I see where you decided to put the security now but, seriously, ‘Bat’? You had to use a bad pun to hide your secret cave-thingy? She was the goddess of cows, not bats; that just happened to be her name.” Felicity looked at the biometric scanner carefully then dug in her purse for what she needed. She had come prepared for just about anything and luckily it was a regular handprint scanner and not an optic one. “He did say it was horribly outdated,” she muttered to herself.

Taking out a small spray can, she misted a fine coating of special filaments over the scanner surface then unrolled a magnetic sheet and placed it over the top. She carefully peeled the sheet back and looked at the residue on the surface to see if she had a viable print. Twisting it under the light she grinned and took out a different can to spray the surface so that it built up the filaments and made the print stand out in stark relief.

“See, the problem with scanners like this is that no one ever remembers to wipe them down afterwards and all those oils on the palm of your hand get left behind,” she spoke out loud as though someone were listening. Which they might have been; Bruce bugged everyone else, why not himself? “After a while, this makes the palm scanner look like a five year olds iPad after a PB&J. Bad for security but lucky for me…” She pressed the print to the glass surface and the doors slid open silently. With a triumphant grin she stepped inside and hit the button.

She stood inside the small elevator and hummed her own private version of muzak until the doors slid open again and she walked inside the large cavernous space of the alternate Batcave.

“Alternate Batcave?” She mused out loud as she looked around the room which appeared to be an abandoned subway tunnel with large tile pillars and carved arches near the ceiling. “Batcave the Sequel maybe? Ooh, the FelicityCave, that’s cool.”

She peered down the long dark tunnel in the distance and noticed the wide tire residue that marked the cement floor. Bruce must occasionally park the tumbler in here. “I think I’ll definitely have to start calling it the FelicityCave because the BabyCave just sounds horribly inappropriate.” She peered up at the ceiling. “No bats in here, right? Bat guano on this dress is a big no no and I don’t much care for having it all over my computers either, just for the record.”

Not seeing any of the furry little flying rodents Bruce was so apparently fond of, she walked up to the bank of monitors that made up the satellite cave’s (the FelicityCave she reminded herself) version of Watchtower and sighed. “Okay, let’s see what this baby can do.”

She brushed the light coating of dust off the large leather chair with a frown, wishing she had brought a Swiffer or at least her coat, and sat in front of the main monitor to play with her new toy. The computers weren’t quite as bad as she thought they’d be but they certainly could be improved upon. After digging for a few minutes she found the security cameras Bruce had hidden in the hallway in front of the penthouse’s door as well as the ones located throughout the interior of the space. She noticed he even had some in the bedrooms as well.

“Okay, that’s going away. I get that you need to be a little paranoid but to an outsider that just comes off as perverted and narcissistic.” She paused and opened a file with cached footage and peeked around. “Nothing. That’s actually a little disappointing really. I was kind of hoping I’d run into your super-secret private porn stash but you must erase those, huh? Oh please, like I don’t know you record that stuff. You probably treat it like a game film so you can improve on your performance. Can you say ‘anal retentive’?” She stopped. “Oh. Oh no. If anyone really is listening to this just forget I said anything. No. Ew. I did not mean that, no sirree! Not that there’s anything wrong with that, but—ah screw it. Moving on.”

She switched on all of the cameras and left the feeds open so she could see when Bruce showed up then got back to playing. She had just enough time to come up with a decent sized shopping list and download a bunch of patches and updates via his monstrously large direct line bandwidth that definitely was not being throttled to a crawl by some busybody governmental asshats with a fear of the ‘interwebs’ and the ‘associated dangers of the free exchange of information’ when, sure enough, at 8:30 on the dot, Bruce stepped out of the elevator doors and approached the keypad outside the penthouse. She zoomed in and smiled as she noticed his irritated expression. “Yeah, you were hoping to beat me here but someone must have told you I came early and now you’re realizing I hacked your keypad too, huh? So much for your big morning power play. Just wait, it gets better.”

Bruce entered the penthouse and noticed her coat hanging from the Egyptian bust first thing. “That’s right, Bruce; follow the bread crumbs.”

She turned up the volume and listened to the sharp report of his shoes against the polished marble floors as he snatched her coat off the sculpture and looked around.

“Felicity?” He called out, her coat clenched in his fist. She snickered evilly as she watched him move from room to room. She picked up the headphones and adjusted the mike then connected to his cell. He looked down at his phone and the look on his face was...

“Oh, if only Tim were here to appreciate this.” She thought about that and hit record then sent the feed to her phone. “Cheap birthday present,” she muttered.

Bruce picked up the phone, “I see you found the office.”

“Seriously Bruce, ‘Bat’?” She shook her head, “What is it with you masks and bad puns?”

“I’ll be right down,” he bit out before hanging up.

She took off the headphones, ran a quick hand over her hair to smooth it down, then crossed her legs at the knees and artfully arranged her skirt as she swung the chair toward the door. She folded her hands on her lap and waited, a triumphant smile playing around her lips. This was going to be so much fun.

The doors slid open silently and Bruce stepped out in all his well-tailored Armani glory. He fixed her with a glare then in a few long-legged strides he was right in front of her.

She smiled up at him sweetly, “Nice security system.”

“Did you enjoy your little foray into breaking and entering?” He asked with an edge of sarcasm.

“Not really,” she said with all the wide-eyed sincerity she could muster. “Usually, when I commit a felony, I prefer more of a challenge; makes it more fun that way.”

Bruce’s jaw clenched and he looked like he wanted to say something but then he just breathed out a frustrated sigh and looked over the multiple monitors that made up Watchtower. “I take it you’ve had time to come up with a few ideas on how to improve things down here?”

“I have,” she said with a nod.

He looked down at her, “Care to share?”

“Well, first off, I’m thinking…” she pointed to different areas near the workstation, “Coffee pot, mini-fridge, microwave.”

“Do you think you can try to at least make an effort to be serious?” Bruce said in an aggrieved tone.

“If you want me hanging out all night long in the Subway Tunnel of the Damned then there better be caffeine and snacks,” she said seriously. “Also you could hang meat down here; ever hear of space heaters?”

He unceremoniously dumped her coat in her lap and cut his eyes at her, “I was referring to the Watchtower system.”

Felicity laid her coat over her lap and swung her chair around to look at the monitors. “It definitely needs updating and I installed a slew of updates but there are a few things I want to add to it to bring it up to the level of my LAIR setup. Also I need to completely overhaul your security measures because,” she glanced up at him. “Does it need saying?”

“No,” Bruce growled.

“Wrong answer; every Doctor Who fan knows it always needs saying,” she told him with a raised eyebrow. “Altogether it took me, maybe, all of five minutes to break into here and that includes the guided tour and the ride on the elevator,” she told him in a deadpan.

He cut her another deadly glare, “And I suppose you did a lot of high-security break-ins with Queen?”

“Tons,” she said cheerfully.

“And you’re proud of that?” He asked in a disapproving way.

“Hell, yeah,” she snorted turning in her chair. “I wouldn’t have thought so once upon a time, but until you’ve hacked a computer network after jumping across an open elevator shaft, you haven’t lived,” she said as she typed. “It was almost as much fun as counting cards in a mob boss’s underground casino. Except the heels,” she frowned. “Those heels were a bitch. That and the fact that the guy next to me kept trying to stick poker chips into my cleavage…and the whole being threatened with physical violence thing afterwards. That part sucked.” She glanced up at him and paused at the unbridled fury displayed in his expression. “Sorry; TMI?”

He tightened his lips into a grim line, “There will be no more ‘fun’ as long as you’re working for me.”

“That’s a given,” she snorted.

“No field work, Felicity. I mean it,” he said stubbornly, swinging her around to look at him. He placed both his hands on the armrests as though he were caging her so she couldn’t escape from what he was telling her. “My team works the field; Me, Tim, Dick. You are on tech and coms. Don’t even try to ask for a field assignment because it will not be happening, understood?”

“Fine,” she sighed then swung around to face the monitors again when he released her. “Look, as soon as the renovations are done I’ll move in and make all of the necessary improvements. Until then I’ll look through whatever WayneTech has on hand and decide what I can and can’t use. I’d like to stop by there later today if that’s alright.”

Bruce frowned, “I have meetings most of the afternoon but I can make some time in my schedule for that tomorrow.”

“I think I can go tech gathering by myself,” Felicity told him dryly. At the stubborn set of his jaw, she sighed. “Fine; when do you want to meet tomorrow?”

“I’ll check my schedule and text you,” he said, a self-satisfied smirk playing at the corners of his mouth.

Smug bastard, she thought, “I’ll also want to make some improvements to the work area as well.”

“Coffee pots and space heaters?” He said drolly.

“Among other things.”

“Like what ‘other things’?” He asked suspiciously.

For the next hour or so she went through all of her ideas, some he shot down but most he agreed with. By the time they were done she was fairly certain that the new Watchtower would give Barbara and Bruce’s versions a run for their money. Of course, there were a few bits and pieces she didn’t mention but what he didn’t know wouldn’t hurt her. He might not want her doing field work but she still had her own investigation into Stellmoor she wanted to pursue. Before she called Miranda Tate or Isabel (which she was 99% sure was something she would do at some point within the next day or two) she wanted to be armed with as much information as possible and if either Bruce or Oliver found out about what she was planning they’d put the kybosh on it but quick.

After she finished debating tech she moved on to the rest of her plans for the FelictyCave. She considered just doing it and not telling him but, knowing Bruce, he’d be watching her like a hawk for a while. She didn’t want to arouse his suspicions too soon or he might start looking more closely at the stuff that was really worth hiding. “If I’m going to be down here all the time, or at least until I get another job,” that triggered yet another scowl from him, “I’d like the space to feel more familiar.
It wouldn’t hurt to set up a med bay and an exercise area as well as a lab space.”

“I already have all that at the Batcave,” Bruce said dismissively.

“I don’t,” Felicity retorted. “Look, I’m used to a routine and, whether you like it or not, I was an integral part of Team Arrow. You might do it all as Batman but I’m used to pursuing my own answers. I like having a lab space, I like knowing that if anything happens and a member of the team can’t make it to the Manor I can throw a few stitches or wrap some ribs. I’m also used to a certain amount of activity between assignments; it keeps me focused and frosty. I’m not asking for a personal gym but a few mats and some other stuff so I can practice my yoga and maybe a little strength training can’t hurt, right?”

“You don’t need all that stuff,” he pointed out. “All you’re supposed to be doing is manning Watchtower, remember?”

She rolled her eyes at him. She had no choice; he had on his stubborn face. She knew Bruce well enough to be able to manipulate him, at least a little. If she was going to get her way it was time to execute some well-placed babble, even though it pained her to have to do it on purpose. It was bad enough when she did it on accident but needs must.

“Look, either this is the FelicityCave or it isn’t.”

“The FelicityCave?” Bruce said with a snort.

“Well I couldn’t very well call it the ‘BabyCave’ because…” At his raised eyebrows and filthy grin Felicity blushed even though she had let that one slip on purpose. Bruce was a sucker for a dirty pun.
“Never mind. The point is it’s either my space or it isn’t and I’d feel better if I was prepared for any and all exigencies.” She looked up at him over her glasses and through her long sooty eyelashes then pushed them back up her nose in a way that made him look at her like she was still an adorable little five year old.

Sure enough, the corners of Bruce’s mouth quirked upwards and his eyes softened. “Fine, far be it from me to stop you from preparing for ‘exigencies’,” he drawled.

Yep, I still got it. “Glad you agree,” Felicity said smartly.

Bruce looked at his watch, “The decorator should be here any minute so we should go back upstairs.”

Felicity got up from the chair causing her coat to fall off her lap. She bent down and picked it up then noticed Bruce staring intently at her backside. She peered behind her and brushed off the back of her dress with a frown, “Did I get some dirt on me or something?”

“Nope,” he said with another slow grin and she rolled her eyes at him.

“A person could get whiplash trying to keep up with your moods,” she muttered as she shrugged on her coat.
“Oh Baby, I think you could manage keep up with my ‘moods’ if you applied yourself,” he said in an easy drawl.

“Cute,” Felicity said wryly as she headed for the elevator. “Just because we’re technically in your ‘bachelor pad’ that doesn’t mean I’m on the playbill for today’s entertainment, understood?”

“Don’t worry, I haven’t forgotten our deal.” Bruce waited for her to step into the elevator before he hit the button to send them upstairs then, as the doors shut, he leaned into her ear and spoke in a low voice, “Like I said before, I more than happy to bide my time until you’re ready to invite me into your bed. Again.” He said as though she had to be reminded of what they’d shared only a few short days ago.

“You’ll be waiting a long time before that ever happens,” she said tartly.

Bruce leaned back against the walls of the elevator and grinned, his reflection staring at her from the polished silver surface of the doors. “Don’t worry Baby, I’m nothing if not patient.”

When they stepped out of the clock Bruce turned to her, all business again, “I don’t care what you do with the place, gut it if you like, but this room remains untouched, got it? I don’t want any workmen accidently finding something they shouldn’t.”

“Wasn’t planning on it.” Felicity said, allowing her fingers to caress the small statuette of the Maltese Falcon. “This is actually the only room I happen to like.”

She caught him staring at her with a strange look on his face. She opened her mouth to ask him what was wrong but he cut her off with a nod toward the statuette. “That’s actually one of my favorite pieces,” Bruce said quietly as he folded his arms over his chest and leaned against the desk.

“Bogart fan, huh?” She asked him with a small smile.

“Dashiell Hammett fan actually but I liked the film too,” he nodded. “I don’t get to watch them a lot but I like the old detective movies from the 40’s and 50’s. The idea of a man battling against evil with nothing but his fists and his quick wits always appealed to me. That and the fact that they always got the sassy platinum blonde at the end,” he smirked lustily.

“Gee, you don’t say?” Felicity drawled, earning her yet another brief but genuine smile from the normally grim faced man. “Is it a replica you had made or did you buy it from a prop store?” She asked curiously.

“Wait, what?” She asked with a laugh. “I thought the original was sold years ago to some private collector for, like, $4,000,000 dollars?”

“Like I said, I liked the movie,” he said with a crooked grin.

Felicity looked at it one more time before shaking her head at Bruce, “So is this your version of showing a girl your etchings? Your go-to play is to take all those starlets and ersatz Page Six society bimbos in here to show them your big bird?”

“No,” he shook his head, seeming strangely bashful for a moment before adopting a more familiar sardonic manner. “Besides, most of the women I’ve dated to keep the press entertained would have taken one look at that and asked, ‘What is it?’” He shrugged, “Film Noir isn’t big with the society bimbo set.”
Felicity gave him a mischievous grin, “Would you have used the line on them at least? You know, after they asked?”

“What line?” He asked.

“You know; they ask ‘What is it?’ and you say it’s—“

“‘The stuff that dreams are made of,’” He finished for her.

Their eyes met for a moment, the air thickening around them. It was as though something clicked between them and Felicity felt her smile falter and drop as the breath in her lungs stilled. Bruce wasn’t smiling either and even though he was a few feet away it felt like he was standing right in front of her, like she could practically feel the heat of him on her skin. It was…electric. As cliché as it sounded, even in her head, there was no other word for it but electric; it was a shock to the system that made her skin buzz and scrambled her thoughts. It wasn’t sexual tension or any other familiar type of energy she usually got from him; this was something more.

The doorbell rang, breaking the strange mood that had passed between them. Felicity dropped her eyes from his and cleared her throat. “I guess that’s the interior design people.”

“I suppose it is,” Bruce said, the moment gone and his voice returning to the ever present tone of subdued annoyance she was used to.

She followed him out to the foyer and felt the first fluttering’s of excitement in her belly. Felicity was a girly-girl, always had been. Yeah, she was tough and she could hack and kick ass but she liked doing girly stuff, too. She considered herself a feminist but part of being a feminist was being proud of who you were and she liked herself the way she was. She didn’t make any excuses for it. She liked dresses that floated around her legs or tight skirts that showed off her frankly awesome butt (thank you John Diggle. The man could be the next Billy Banks or Jane Fonda if he ever decided to leave the vigilante business). She liked makeup and soft sweaters and animal themed footwear. She loved her quaint little bungalow and had enjoyed every minute she’d put into making it feel homey and comfortable. But as DIY as she was, she was really excited about having a real interior designer create the perfect space.

She thought her place had looked pretty good but every decision she’d made in decorating it was something she’d guessed at. For instance, faux painting wasn’t nearly as easy as it looked and, while the end result had been awesome, she vowed never, ever to do that by herself ever again. Four coats and a top coat followed by a God awful mess as she tried to apply the glaze; forget it! She wound up having four inches of split ends cut off because no amount of conditioner could counteract the damage the turpentine did on her hair. It would be nice to have someone who knew what they were doing listen to her and then make it happen. She’d never tell anyone, especially Bruce, but she hadn’t been this excited about something in a very long time.

So imagine her disappointment when she came face to face with Sabine Brandeis, aka Cruella De Vil.

She was every inch the overdone two-dimensional cliché of a serial divorcée with a successful hobby she managed to parlay into career. When she wasn’t busy snagging yet another in a long line of rich husbands, that is.

For nearly forty-five minutes the woman droned on and on about just how fabulous she was and how delicious Bruce was and, of course, how perfect the penthouse already looked since she was the one who designed the space to begin with.
Yes, she was the Morticia apparently. Dead animals and all.

“I decorate all of Bruce’s, I mean Mr. Wayne’s, buildings, don’t I, darling?” She purred, trailing her blood red nails over Bruce’s arm as she swept through the room.

Bruce cleared his throat looking strangely uncomfortable, “Yes, well, Sabine decorated the penthouse for the Gotham Living spread.”

“Yeah, I guessed that,” she said as she eyed the woman’s copious amounts of expensive jewelry and the fox stole she had draped across her shoulders. She’s wearing a dead animal, Felicity kept thinking. With a head. The head is still on her coat. The black marbles stuck inside the carcass’s skull kept staring at her and she had to prevent herself from shuddering in revulsion. She couldn’t even hear what anyone was saying because all she could think about was that scene in Ghostbusters when the fox stole came to life and ran away. The thing kept looking at her with its dead eyes like it was about to leap off Sabine and go straight for her throat. No wonder all the artwork in the room made you feel like you were being watched. Apparently it was her thing. “That’s just creepy,” she muttered under her breath.

“Did you say something, darling?” Sabine asked as she turned toward her and copped a feel of Bruce’s suit at the same time.

At least she’s capable of multi-tasking, Felicity thought. “The, um, statues and stuff. They’re a bit, uh, not me,” she said quietly. “I’d rather we did something simpler. I’m looking for something a little… Disturbing, morbid, downright ghoulish; her mind supplied as the dead animal head looked at her again. “Ornate?”

Sabine looked like she had something bad tasting in her mouth and sneered, “I suppose the elegance and grandeur of 1930’s Art Deco and modernist sensibilities would be a bit beyond someone of your,” she looked her up and down, “limited years. Tell me darling, what is it you had in mind for Bruce’s penthouse?”

“Actually Sabine, Felicity is the lease holder so technically it’s her penthouse,” Bruce said with an easy grin.

“Of course, darling,” Sabine purred, her talons caressing his ruggedly handsome cheek. “It’s so sweet that you would allow your,” she flicked eyes at Felicity again, “niece, was it? To live here.”

“Felicity isn’t my niece,” Bruce said with a slight growl of irritation before he cleared his throat and said in an only slightly less contrite manner, “She’s Lucius Fox’s daughter.”

“Oh yes, I’m familiar; the stepdaughter,” Sabine said with a calculated look. “The one from the second wife.”

Evie had been dead for almost twenty years and yet, every once in a while, Felicity would run into some member of Gotham society who loved nothing more than to put it out there that Evie Smoak was a husband stealing whore with a bastard for a child. Apparently it was their version of entertainment.

“Lucius is my father, not my stepfather,” Felicity corrected her, her own irritation bleeding through.

“Yes, well, I’m sure he cares for you very much too, dear,” the woman said off-handedly.

Okay Cruella, there goes your credit rating.

“Perhaps we should get back to what it was Felicity had in mind?” Bruce said, cutting her off before Felicity could strangle her with her own dead animal scarf.

“Yes darling, what is it you had in mind again?” The woman asked in a jaded tone. “Something about ‘simple’?”

Resisting the urge to lambast the bitch with a host of colorful swear words she’d learned listening to hardened vigilantes as they sparred with one another (Dig and Oliver had made a game of rapping each other on the knuckles with the White Wax Wood and steel reinforced Bo Staffs and, boy howdy, did that smart) Felicity walked over to the bedroom that held her belongings and waited for them to join her. When they were all in the room Felicity pointed to her old chifforobe. “That. Decorate the house around that.”

The decorator looked at her like she just took a dump on the floor and asked her to put it in a frame and call it the Mona Lisa. “I beg your pardon?”

“Ms. Brandeis, I think I get what she’s trying to say.” The decorator’s assistant, a nice looking man in a bright teal coat and grey Burberry suit turned to her, “You’re thinking of early American antiques or some kind of a rustic feel; lots of chenille and soft fabrics. Maybe a light terra cotta wash on the walls? I’m thinking Southern Elegance meets Tuscan perhaps? Call it Tuscan Eclectic!”

“Exactly,” Felicity said bestowing a sunny smile on the other man. “Rustic but elegant, comfortable, you know; homey. I want lots of warmth and—”

“Homey?” Sabine spat out in distaste. “You want me to dismantle an interior design masterpiece that was featured in a major magazine so I can redesign the space around a piece of garage sale trash? I have a Star Award from the IIDA and you want me to design a space in Flea Market Chic?” She turned to Bruce, “Darling, I realize you want to do this young girl a favor but you have your reputation to think of!”

“Sabine—“ Bruce said, his voice gaining an edge of irritation despite the laid-back expression on his face.

“But darling, really!” She tutted as she cut him off, “You can’t possibly expect me to tarnish my reputation like this. I just won’t do it!” She turned to Felicity, “Dear heart,” she said in a saccharine tone that was designed to set her teeth on edge, “I understand that at your age you have all these marvelous little ideas but this is not your dorm room and a man like Bruce Wayne can’t have his showplace decorated in the latest in Ikea home décor. While I know your dear Uncle Bruce thinks on you like the daughter he never had and doesn’t want to hurt your feelings because you appear to be a very sweet and lovely young girl, perhaps you should just let the, well, more experienced adults handle the details.” Her voice dropped to a more confidential level and she laid a crimson clawed hand on her arm, “Look, girls your age are eager to have a place to show off to their little friends so everyone can see how very grown up they are, but you have enough to worry about with all of your studies, chasing boys, and pledging at the sorority. Let Auntie Sabine take this off your plate, dear; please.”

At that pronouncement even Bruce’s face was showing signs of the Bat coming to bear but Felicity cut him off at the pass.

“You know what, you’re absolutely right,” Felicity said clicking her teeth together in a plastic grin and adopting the bubblegum tones of pure Barbie McSmartass as she went all out Legally Blonde on her ass. “As much as I’d like to show up the other girls at Alpha Nu, Uncle Brucie and I would never ask you to tarnish your reputation like this.” Bruce gave her a look of pure fury as she pointed to Cruella’s assistant. “However, I think his reputation could handle it. What’s your name?” She asked, turning to him.
“Zander. Zander Franklin,” he said in surprise.

“Well Zander Zander Franklin, do you have a Star Award from the IIDA?” She asked him in saccharine tones.

“Um, no,” he said, looking from her to the enraged expression on the face of his boss.

“There you go,” Felicity said clapping her hands together and smiling vacuously.

Sabine’s jaw practically hit the floor, “You want him to decorate the penthouse?”

“Don’t be ridiculous, he’s just an assistant!” Sabine said snappishly.

Straw meet camel’s back. “And on that note; you’re fired,” Felicity said in an almost gleeful tone. She met Bruce’s eyes and his lips quirked upwards in amusement.

“You can’t fire me,” the woman said, thoroughly scandalized. She turned to Bruce, “Bruce darling, what—?”

“I’m sorry, Sabine, but your services are no longer required,” he said in an almost bored tone. “I’ll call your firm and let them know that Felicity will be going with—“ he turned to the other man again. “What was your name again?”

“Zander,” he said quickly. “Franklin. Zander Franklin. One Zander; just…Zander, not Zander Zander…or not; you can call me whatever you want to, I don’t mind,” he chuckled nervously before clearing his throat and blushing crimson.

Bruce blinked at him for a moment before clearing his own throat and taking his phone out of his jacket, “Zander will be fine. Sorry Sabine but we’ll be going with your associate on this particular job instead.” He looked down at his phone to send a text then flicked his eyes toward the seething designer in the doggie coat. “You can go, I’m sure Zander has it all in hand,” he said with a tight smile.

“Yes sir, Mr. Wayne!” Zander said, eagerly.

“But—but—“ Sabine stomped her designer heels angrily then rushed out the door, “Well, I never!”

“Somehow I doubt that,” Felicity muttered and the slight twitch of Bruce’s lips let her know he’d caught it. She watched as she slammed the door with a bang and frowned, “Well, she’s pissed. If I was a Dalmatian I’d be hiding my spots right about now.”

Zander slapped a hand over his mouth and turned his back quickly, shoulders shaking with barely-contained laughter as Bruce looked up in confusion, “Dalmatian?”

“The coat?” Felicity said, gesturing around her neck. “You know; woof woof?” She mimed a dog barking with her hand.

Zander turned to her, still chuckling and wiping his eyes with a coordinating teal handkerchief, “Thank you; you don’t know how much I’ve always wanted to say that! There have been times when I swear that thing was looking at me.”

“Exactly!” Felicity said, wide-eyed. “It’s creepy, right?”

Bruce’s lips twitched before he cleared his throat, taking on a business-like demeanor. “How soon do you think you can get us some sketches?” He asked him.

“Is Tuesday soon enough?” Zander said, looking at them eagerly as he pulled out his card. “I need to coordinate with a few people tomorrow but I think I already have a pretty good idea of what you want. Take the weekend, look around, surf the web, and if you see something online or find a picture you like just email me by Monday and we’ll try to incorporate it in the final design proposal.”

Felicity nodded, “Sounds good. Can you meet me here at around the same time?”

“No problem! If it’s okay I can have some men in here this afternoon to take some measurements and we’ll go over everything.” Zander looked around the space again. “Are you just thinking of doing a straight decorating job or will we be doing some construction as well?”

“No construction,” Bruce told him.

“Not so fast,” Felicity told him.

They both looked at her. “Did you want us to throw up a few walls? Knock a few down?” Zander asked.

“No, nothing that complicated, I just want to get rid of that.” She pointed to the bar.

“You want to get rid of the bar?” Bruce asked in surprise. “Why?”

“You have to ask?”

“I wouldn’t have asked if I already knew,” Bruce shot back. “Why?”

“Frankly it’s because every time I look at it I feel like I’m trapped in an episode of MadMen,” she said dryly. “I keep expecting Jon Hamm to walk through the door and slap me on the ass before asking me to fix him a martini. It’s…” She struggled for the right word, “smarmy,” she said wrinkling her nose.

“Smarmy?” Bruce repeated, “That’s not even a real word.”

She turned to Zander, “It goes.”

“It stays,” Bruce said firmly. “If you don’t like it, don’t use it, but I still throw cocktail parties here for clients occasionally. It’s why I had it built in the first place.”

“So don’t look at it,” Bruce told her. “Besides, construction adds time to the job and I want you moved in as soon as possible.”

“Look, is this still your bachelor pad or is it my home? One or the other, which is it?” She challenged. “Because I seem to recall that when I agreed to do this, to move in here and become your partner, you promised me I could do whatever I wanted with the penthouse.”

“You’re not getting rid of the bar,” Bruce said firmly. “It would be a waste of time and money.”

“We’re getting rid of the bar,” she said, ignoring him and turning to Zander.

Zander smiled at them and held up his hands in submission, “Okay, let’s compromise: I’ll come up with a few designs both with and without the bar, maybe try to redesign it a little so it doesn’t overpower the room, and you can decide then.”
“Fine, but I still don’t know why you’re so adamant about keeping that thing,” she said to Bruce. “You don’t even drink.”

“You do,” he pointed out.

“I occasionally have a glass of red wine, that’s all.”

“I know,” he said with a dangerous look in his eyes. “The last glass we shared was fairly memorable.”

She blushed remembering exactly what he was referring to.

“You two are just adorable,” Zander gushed, looking between them. “You remind me so much of me and my husband when we first moved in together.”

“Oh, we’re not—“ Felicity began before Bruce cut her off.

“I’ll let security know your men will be coming by but no one goes into the study, alright. We don’t want that room touched.”

“No problem, Mr. Wayne, Miss Fox,” he said, shaking both their hands in turn. “And thank you again for this opportunity. I promise to do my best to give you the perfect home.”

“Thank you,” she said, not bothering to correct his assumption about her and Bruce being a couple. It would just embarrass the poor man and he seemed so sweet. His experience with having to work with someone like Sabine reminded her a lot of-- A thought suddenly occurred to her, “You’re not going to get in trouble because I fired Sabine, are you?” Felicity asked, suddenly worried for the likable young man.

“I wouldn’t worry about that,” Bruce answered for him. “I just sent a text to the CEO of Gotham Designs and I imagine that Sabine will be too busy answering her boss’s questions to worry about Mr. Franklin.”

“Thank you,” Zander said sincerely. “Until Tuesday then,” he said exiting the penthouse with a huge smile splitting his face.

After he left, Felicity turned her gaze toward Bruce, “You slept with Sabine, didn’t you?”

“Jealous?” He asked with a mischievous smile.

“Ew, no!” Felicity said in disgust. “I just can’t believe I gave my cookie away to a man who would sleep with Cruella De Vil.”

“Your what?” Bruce said, doing a double-take.

“I can’t believe you slept with that woman!” Felicity snorted. “She was wearing a coat that had a head attached—a head! All I could do is stare at that poor thing. It still had whiskers and teeth!” She shuddered, “Ugh! I mean I can understand leather, people eat cows, but I thought that coat was going to start barking at any second.”

“I never slept with Cruella,” Bruce said wryly then eyed her curiously. “Is that the reason you fired her? Because you thought we slept together?”

“No!” She snorted. “She just pissed me off.” She scowled and looked at the door, “Bitch called my chifforobe garage sale trash. FYI, I bought that at an estate sale, not a garage sale.”
Bruce shook his head with a slight grin and glanced at his watch, “I don’t have to be back at the office for another hour or so. Do you want to sign the lease and then we’ll grab a quick lunch before I take you home?”

“I already have lunch plans but I could use a ride to Wayne Enterprises if that’s where you’re heading.”

Something flashed across Bruce’s eyes but before she could catch it his expression closed up again. “Of course.”

They went through the lease agreement as well as the business contract which officially made her his tenant as well as a ‘consultant’ so everything looked nice and legitimate if anyone tried poking around. Afterwards they went downstairs so Bruce could inform security that the decorators were coming and that they had the run of the place with the exception of the study.

When they got outside Felicity looked up and down the street for the car that Alfred usually drove when shuttling Bruce around but it was nowhere to be seen. The 1925 Rolls Royce Phantom was a fairly conspicuous vehicle even in the more affluent parts of Gotham so she would have detected it were it in the vicinity.

“What are you looking for?” Bruce frowned at her.

“Where’s Alfred?” She asked. “I don’t see the car.”

“Alfred didn’t drive me today. I took the MacLaren instead.” He pulled a key fob from his pocket and the headlights blinked on a futuristic looking red and black sports car.

“Oh,” Felicity said, eyeing the car carefully before walking over to where Bruce was holding the door for her. She eyed the sleek black and red custom leather interior carefully. The car was so low slung to the ground it looked as though you practically had to crawl inside it and the seats were so intimately placed that just looking inside made her feel claustrophobic. “And I thought my Mini was a tight fit.”

“It’s a race car,” Bruce said with a hint of male pride. “It’s basically a motor and the rest is just an afterthought.”

“And you can get in that thing?” Felicity eyed his 6’ foot 2” inch frame and broad shoulders dubiously.

“Get in the car, Felicity,” he said with a hint of exasperation.

She gathered the skirt of her long fitted coat around her and eased inside, wincing a bit as her butt hit the rock hard seat of the sports car a bit harder than she had intended. “Cozy,” she said in a lackluster manner as she was forced to lean back in the seats as they tilted backwards at an odd angle she found to be weirdly disconcerting but that she imagined were designed so that the interior appeared to be more cockpit than car. She eyed the complex dashboard configuration and computerized center console with equal dubiousness. “Do you need a driver’s license or a pilot’s license for this thing?”

“Both.” Bruce slid into the driver’s seat with practiced ease and hit the start button causing the motor to roar to life. Felicity put on the rather complicated seatbelt and watched as Bruce did the same. They were seated so close together that their shoulders were nearly touching. He pulled away from the curb and headed towards midtown.

“So,” she said, squirming a bit in her seat. It felt like she was sitting on a rock and the large bolsters on either side of her made her feel like she was in a leather cocoon. “How much does one of these things cost? Probably more than a Cooper, huh?”

“Probably,” Bruce said with a smirk. “Let’s just say I doubt you’d be able to lease one of these on a budget.”

“The seats are a bit,” she squirmed again, “hard.”

“What’s the matter?” Bruce asked in a smooth tone, “Don’t you like sitting on something hard?”

She snorted, “Really? You went there?” She shook her head at him. “I’d be offended if that wasn’t such a bad line. Even Tim wouldn’t have pulled that one out of his ass.”

Bruce grinned, his face suddenly younger and more open than she’d seen it in a while, “That was pretty bad, huh? So I take it you don’t like my $1.15 million dollar car.”

“You paid $1.15 million dollars for this thing?” She gaped at him. “And they couldn’t even get you some seats with actual padding?!”

He quirked his lips upwards, “This is designed like an actual race car. The seats are hard and have bolsters to keep the driver and passenger safe in case of a crash.”

“Well, my ass is already killing me,” Felicity muttered.

“I can rub it for you later if you like.” She gave him a filthy look and he grinned again as his inner teenager came out to play, “You know, most women would be thrilled to be taxied around town by a billionaire bachelor in a million dollar sports car.”

“I’m not most women,” she told him.

Bruce looked straight ahead, the smile leaving his face all of the sudden as he grew contemplative. “No, no you aren’t, are you?”

Felicity glanced at him from the corner of her eye but didn’t respond. Other than some occasional grump, Bruce had actually been pretty pleasant. For whatever reason he had decided to stop being an ass, at least for the moment, and she was loath to mess that up by looking at it too closely.

After a few more minutes of companionable silence he pulled up to the curb in front of Wayne Enterprises and helped her out of the car. And she did need help, too. Even yoga didn’t help her with this one. After she got out and brushed the wrinkles from her coat she gave the car one last disgruntled look. “I don’t think I’m a sports car kind of person,” she said dourly.

“I’ll keep that in mind for next time,” Bruce said as he led her into the building.

She looked at him with an arched eyebrow but didn’t say anything. She really couldn’t imagine there’d be a next time. Other than monitoring coms chances are that she and Bruce would only see each other only on the rare occasions that she might stop by her dad’s or Tam’s offices.

“I’ll walk you up to Lucius’s office,” Bruce said turning towards her. “It’s been a while since we’ve had lunch together. You don’t mind if I tag along, do you?”

“Tag along?” She asked in confusion.

“Lunch,” Bruce said. He arched an inquisitive eyebrow at her, “You said you and your dad had lunch plans, remember?”

“Oh.” Felicity flushed, although for the life of her she didn’t know why. “No, you misunderstood. I wasn’t having lunch with—“

“Felicity!”

She looked up to see Jake heading toward her and she turned toward him with a smile, “Hi Jake.”

He smiled down at her, “You’re here early but, luckily for you, I just so happen to be free. Are you ready for lunch?”

She nodded, “Yup, and I should warn you; I’m a big eater so this won’t be cheap.”

He chuckled, “I think I can handle it.” He looked up at Bruce, noticing him staring at them intently.

“Oh hi Mr. Wayne, sorry if I was interrupting, it’s just that Felicity—“

“It’s no problem; Felicity and I were done anyway,” Bruce told him abruptly, his expression stiff as he eyeballed the younger man. “Enjoy your lunch.”

“Thank you, sir,” Jake said with a polite nod of his head before he offered his arm to Felicity.

“Ready to take care of that big appetite of yours?”

“Are you kidding? If it’s food, I’m there!” She said with a small laugh. She started to say goodbye to Bruce but he had already turned his back on them and was heading to the elevators.

She had the overwhelming urge to call out to him to apologize, but that was ridiculous, right?

Taking one last look at his stiff carriage as he entered the elevator, she bit her lip then turned to Jake again, forcing a smile. “Let’s go eat.”
Chapter Twenty-Three

Lunch with Jake was pleasant and fun, two words she hadn’t been able to use in conjunction to anything in her life for a while. Felicity looked around the kitschy 1950’s style diner with the chrome and red tables and fiddled with the mini jukebox at their table with a grin. “This is really cool,” she told him.

“Told you I would show you a good time,” he said, dropping a few coins in their jukebox and smiling at her reaction when Elvis’s ‘Blue Suede Shows’ was piped in over the speakers.

“Hah!” She laughed, “Oh man, my friends back in Starling would have loved this place. We used to hang out at this little burger joint Diggle’s family owned called ‘Big Belly Burger’ all the time. Best burgers ever.”

“You’re a burger girl?” Jake asked, eyes twinkling. “I’d have thought you’d be more into champagne and caviar than burgers and shakes.”

“Have you met me?” She snorted. “Just because my dad’s a CEO doesn’t mean we grew up all hoity toity.”

“I didn’t think so but I thought I’d better check just to be sure,” he told her teasingly. He picked up his menu and looked it over, “So, your friend Sergeant Major Diggle made the best burgers ever, huh?”

“Well, not him; his family. Why?” Felicity asked, picking up her menu as well.

“It’s just that I’m pretty sure your opinion about the superiority of your friend’s burgers is fixing to take a bit of a nosedive after today,” he said with quiet assurance.

“Oh, really?” She asked, “You’re pretty sure of that?”
“Oh yeah,” he said with a definite nod.

“Burgers are pretty good here then, huh?”

“Yep,” he said with a quirk of his mouth as he winked at her over his menu.

“We’ll see,” she said quietly.

“See, being a Southern boy I know the secret to a good burger and it’s something you won’t find out there on the West Coast where your friend Diggle is from,” he said with a hint of arrogance.

“And, pray tell, what would that be, hmm?” Felicity asked primly, pushing her glasses off her nose.

His face broke out in a handsome smile before he cleared his throat and affixed a very serious look on his face, his voice dropping to a somber tone. “You see, them hippy dippy burger joints over yonder in Starling City think that you can just slap a slice of avocado or stick some smelly French cheese on some meat and call that a burger. Now that ain’t a burger, that’s some perversion of good beef. Now the real secret to a good burger is all about the grease.”

She resisted the urge to snort with laughter as his ever-present drawl broadened and he puffed his chest out in exaggeration. “Really? The grease?”

“Yes ma’am, gotta have good grease to make a good burger,” he told her. “Back home in Carrolton, Mississippi we had this little joint called Dixie’s that wasn’t much bigger than three of these booths put together and that was including the grill. It was just some hole in the wall that had been there since Sherman rode through Atlanta but it had the best grease you ever ate in your life. The walls of the place were coated in it. You couldn’t even tell what color the wallpaper used to be there was so much of it.”

“That’s disgusting!” Felicity burst out in laughter.

“No ma’am, that was just part of the charm of the place! It added to the ambience.”

She began to laugh so hard she had to wipe her eyes with her napkin, “Ambience, huh?”

“Her grease was so good that she kept it on the corner of the grill in an old coffee can and folks would ask her to dip the buns in it before she slapped the meat on top.”

“You’re lying!” Felicity told him.

“If I’m lying, I’m dying!” He said leaning back in his chair and throwing up his hands in supplication.

“I suppose no one back in Carrolton, Mississippi ever heard about cholesterol?” She asked, feeling lighter than she had in days.

“Yes ma’am, we have,” he said solemnly. “But we’re pretty sure it’s just a dirty rumor y’all Yankees came up with so you could take all the fat out of our food and keep it all for yourselves.”

Felicity looked at him teasingly, “So there is a vast fat hording conspiracy at play?”

“Well, that’s the rumor anyway,” he said, flashing her that brilliant grin again.

“So, since you’re the expert, which burger should I order?” She asked him, tapping on her menu.

“Well, if it were me ordering it, I’d suggest the Cowpoke Special. Now that there is a burger; pepper jack, Monterey jack, and cheddar with bacon, bacon, and more bacon and topped off with—“ “Bacon?” She asked.

“Well, I was going to say Memphis style barbecue sauce but you can get them to add more bacon if you ask.”

“You can never have too much bacon, right?” She said with an assertive nod.

“You are a woman after my own heart, Felicity Fox,” he said flirtatiously.

“Sounds good,” she said closing her menu.

“Really?” He asked in surprise.

“Why? Don’t think I can handle the grease?”

“No, it’s just that it’s not exactly kosher. I figured you’d have some kind of dietary restrictions or something.”

“We don’t really keep kosher and the only dietary restriction I have is ‘nuts’.” She shrugged, “Allergic.”

“Good to know,” he nodded. “Guess that means on our next date I shouldn’t take you to this other place I like to go where they toss peanut shells on the floor.” He shook his head ruefully, “That’s a shame because the beers might be warm but they burn the steaks just right.”

“Planning a next date, are you?” She asked, feeling a little flirtatious herself.

“Well, this one seems to be going pretty good so far;” he said in a low rumble that made her face flush. He grinned at her, “Good Lord, but you are the sweetest thing I think I have ever seen. My mama would call you a ‘unicorn’.”

“Unicorn, huh? What’s that?” She asked, her cheeks still ablaze with color.

“A mythological beast,” he said and laughed at her expression. “My mama used to say that finding a good old-fashioned girl these days would be like finding a unicorn in the downtown supermarket: Highly unlikely.” He shook his head at her, “Yet here you are, Miss Felicity Fox, and smack dab in the middle of Gotham of all places.” His face took on a slightly forlorn expression, “Figures I’d meet a girl like you a couple of weeks before I’m fixing to head off to Central City.”

“Yeah, my dad mentioned that,” she said, with a more subdued curve of her lips. “Still, getting a job as a Security Consultant in Central City? You must be looking forward to that, right?”

“I was,” he said quietly, reaching for her hand across the table and running his thumb across her knuckles.

She bit her lip and blushed again before relaxing into the caress. This was okay, she told herself. She was allowed to enjoy herself, right? This is what she wanted; normal things like holding hands and eating burgers with a really great guy.

A sudden spurt of guilt from deep inside of her bubbled forth as she remembered Tim’s admonishment about using Jake to get back at Bruce. “Jake?”

“Yeah, darlin’?” He asked with a crooked grin.
She smiled and blushed slightly at the endearment but kept going, “Um, I should tell you that I’m not really in any position to be in a romantic relationship myself right now.”

“Why not?” He asked her quietly, but his expression was still soft and open.

“Lots of reasons,” she said, avoiding his eyes, “but mostly it boils down to the fact that I’m not really very good at dating.”

He chuckled, “What does that mean, ‘not very good at dating’?”

“Well,” she bit her lip and tilted her head slightly in embarrassment, “I have a tendency to get dumped one date in. My last real date consisted of one dance that was interrupted by a work emergency and ended with the words, ‘let’s just be friends’ and ‘I’ll call you’. Hint; if someone says that to you, it means that they won’t be calling.” He began to laugh and she offered him a disgruntled sigh, “If you think that’s funny, my only other two brushes with romance lasted barely a day and both of those ended with an almost identical set of dump speeches along the lines of ‘it’s not you, it’s me’.” She shrugged, “Really, it’s probably for the best that you’re leaving town that way we can just keep this to friendship.”

“I would love to be your friend, Miss Baby,” Jake said with a flirtatious grin as he leaned forward to squeeze her hand encouragingly. “And for the record, little darlin’; any man who’d run out on a pretty little thing like you is a damned fool. That said, my Mama didn’t raise no stupid children and I think you’re doin’ just fine. This here happens to be the best date I’ve been on all day.” She laughed and he smiled at her again. “By the way, since we’re such good friends now, I meant to ask if you ever wear blue jeans?”

“What?” She asked with a startled laugh.

Jake’s hand left hers and he sat back and tilted his head as he examined her pretty floral patterned dress and pink cashmere cardigan. “Every time I’ve seen you you’re wearing a dress. Do you even own a pair of jeans?”

“Oh course I do!” She chuckled in mild embarrassment. Dropping her eyes to the countertop she began to fiddle with her paper napkin. “I just don’t wear jeans much because I’m kind of short and dresses make my legs look longer.”

“I wasn’t complaining,” he drawled. “I meant to tell you that you look real pretty today, in fact.” His eyes scanned her from the top of her head to where her torso disappeared under the table top. “Like a little bit of springtime in the middle of winter.”

“Come on!” She laughed at him, “Is flirting a required class in high school where you’re from or what?”

“As a matter of fact, it is,” he said with a nod. “Along with Advanced Auto Mechanics and Football 101.”

“Car guy, huh?”

“I can find my way around an engine,” he admitted.

“You guys ready to order?” Their waitress asked, flashing them a friendly smile, her pen and pad at the ready.

They both ordered the Cowpoke Special, double fries, and sodas. Felicity waited until their poodle-skirted server left before picking up the conversation again. “I rode in a MacLaren today.”
“Bruce Wayne’s P1 Supercar?” He asked, his jaw dropping slightly.

“Supercar?” She repeated wrinkling her nose slightly. “Is that its real name or are you just that big of a fan?”

He chuckled, “Naw, that’s really what it’s called. Did you enjoy yourself?” He asked curiously.

“Not really,” she shrugged. “I guess I just don’t see what the big deal is,” she said wrinkling her nose.

His eyes widened in surprise, “You rode in a vehicle that costs over a million dollars and is one of the fastest street legal race cars ever made, topping out at 217 miles per hour, and you don’t see the big deal?”

“Eh, the seats were uncomfortable,” she said with a disgruntled look.

“The seats were uncomfortable?” He sputtered.

“Look if you’re going to pay a million dollars for a car then it shouldn’t have seats that make your butt go numb,” she said simply. “I mean, that’s just stupid. My Cooper was bigger on the inside than that thing and it had way better seats. Plus, who needs a car that goes that fast when you’re going to be stuck in Midtown traffic anyway? He should have saved his money and bought something more comfortable.”

“I sincerely hope you did not say that to Bruce Wayne,” he gaped at her.

“I did actually,” she admitted.

He shook his head in disbelief, “And what did he say?”

She pursed her lips, “He said something about how most girls would be impressed by a million dollar sports car and then got really quiet all of the sudden and didn’t speak to me for the rest of the ride.”

“No wonder! You don’t dis a man’s vehicle, woman! You probably hurt the poor man’s feelings!” He said, with a huge belly-laugh.

Their food came and they spent the next hour or so laughing and talking about any and everything. She conceded that the burger was probably one of the best she’d ever eaten but told him Big Belly still had it beat even though that was due less to the actual burger and more to the memories associated with the place. Afterwards he took her back to her dad’s building, insisting on driving her when she offered to just catch a cab from the restaurant.

As they pulled up he turned to her, “So, what did you really think? Good date or do I have to hang my head in shame?”

“I had a really good time,” she said easily. “Thank you for asking me, I really appreciate it. And thank you for staying for the entire date; that was a bonus.”

“Trust me when I say that the pleasure was all mine,” he said with the flirty wink she was quickly getting used to. “Would you like to go out with me again sometime then?”

“Really?” She asked in surprise.

“Well, I know we’re just keeping this to friendship given the fact that I’m heading across the country soon and you’re not really looking for anything serious but I figure we could make the most of what "Time we do have and break that streak of yours; what do you say?"

"Yeah, that would be nice," she said with another blush.

He chuckled, his eyes ghosting over her cheeks. "I happen to be free tomorrow night if you want to catch a movie."

Her face fell, "I would but I have dinner plans with friends."

"I'm workin' pretty much every night for the next few weeks but I'm off the Friday before the Foundation shindig so if you don't already have plans...?" He asked.

"No, Friday's okay," she said nodding, a smile playing around her lips. "Do you want to meet here in front of the building?"

"My mama would have my hide if I let a girl wait out front in the freezing cold," he said clucking his tongue. "I figured I'd do it proper and pick you up at your door."

She winced, "Are you sure you want to do that?"

"Why not?" He chuckled.

"It's just if you come up to the penthouse you might be expected to stay for dinner or something."

"I'm sure I can remember to use my napkin and keep my elbows of the table if you're worried about me embarrassing myself," he said teasingly.

"Yeah, but you'd have to meet my family," she said cringing a little.

"I like your daddy," he said with raised eyebrows. "Seems he likes me too from what I can tell."

"Not Dad," she said reluctantly.

"Your brother? Sister?"

"Well," she said, blushing again but for a completely different reason. "I know this is going to sound weird but if you came to the house I'd have to introduce you to my, well, kind of my Chinese grandmother."

He opened his mouth to say something then shut it again as he looked at her funny, "Your Chinese grandma? I sense that there may be a story there.

"She's not really my grandmother, of course," Felicity said quickly. "Well, she could be because Lucius is my dad and he's black so I suppose she could also be my—"

He took her hand gently and smiled at her, "Breathe."

She took a centering breath before speaking again, "It's a long story but, basically she raised my mom after my grandparents died and then stayed after my mom passed away to help Lucius. He wanted her to just live with us as a member of the family, which she is, but she didn't want to accept any money that she hadn't earned herself and he didn't want her to have to get a job outside of taking care of me and my mother so she compromised and accepted his offer to make her our housekeeper. It was just an empty title really, but he let her have her way because he insisted she take his money and she didn't want to look like she was accepting Lucius's charity even though he thought of her as his mother-in-law. She's nearly eighty...we think; she keeps changing her age on us," she frowned then shook her head. "Anyway, dad hired a maid service so she's actually retired...from her job that isn’t really a job. She just doesn’t know it yet.”

“She doesn’t know she’s retired?” Jake said slowly.

“Dad tried to tell her but she got mad so we decided it would be better if she just didn’t find out.”

He laughed out loud at that. “Well, I don’t a have a problem with meeting her. She sounds like a hoot!”

“Um,” Felicity bit her lip and squinted up towards the roof of the car as she thought about how she should phrase what she was going to say. “Have you...ever heard the term ‘Yenta’?”

“Yenta?” He repeated. “I may have but I’m not quite sure what it means.”

“Peggy Ann is a Yenta,” she told him. “Basically it means that she drives everyone in my family insane and tries to marry us off at every opportunity.”

“Sounds like my mama,” he said ruefully.

“Yeah, well, if I had told her I was going out with you she would have insisted on coming along.” Felicity shook her head, “I’m not even kidding.”

“Yep, that’s my mama all right,” he nodded. “I got to remember to call her and let her know I have another word besides ‘busy body’ to describe her with. Yenta,” he said, testing the word. “Kind of just rolls off the tongue, doesn’t it?” He nodded and flashed a quick grin before settling into a more subdued smile, “Look, if you don’t want me there, that’s okay, but I honestly wouldn’t mind meeting your family. Especially if I get to spend more time with you.”

Felicity shook her head in disbelief, “You’d really have dinner with my family on our second date?”

“That’s not so unusual where I’m from,” he said. “Your daddy will tell you that back home there’s just not a whole lot of places for folks to go, so our idea of fun is just visiting folks. Be a nice change of pace actually. Been a while since I’ve had a good home cooked meal.”

“Okay,” she said in amazement. “Wow. You’re sure? Peggy Ann can get pretty, um...” She bit her lip again, “Let’s just say she’s ‘unique’.”

He chuckled warmly, “I’m sure she is and I can’t wait to meet her.”

“Next Friday? Around seven?” She asked.

“Sounds good, I'll see if I can switch a few things around and give you a call so you know for sure,” he said then got out of the car to open her door for her. He walked her up to where the doorman was standing and squeezed her hand again. “Until next time, Miss Baby Blue-eyes.”

“Bye,” she waved at him and went into the building. She looked back and noticed that he stayed outside until she was at the elevator before turning around and driving off.

Felicity got into the elevator and looked at her reflection in the mirrored doors as they closed. Her cheeks were flushed, her eyes bright, and she was smiling; the first real smile she could remember seeing on her face in a long time.

“So this is what normal feels like,” she mused out loud.

She looked at her reflection again.
“Yeah, I could get used to this.”

Bruce stood in the middle of the Wayne Foundation Gallery peering up at a portrait of a toddler, no more than a year or two, standing in the middle of a lush green field surrounded by wildflowers. The artist had captured a perfect moment in time. Baby-fine wisps of white-blonde curls blew across full round cheeks as the child’s mouth was opened wide in a grin that showed off all her newly erupted baby teeth. Her cornflower blue eyes radiated pure joy and trust as she clutched a broken and bent handful of wildflowers and held them up to whoever had captured her attention.

It wasn’t a particularly unique subject. Portraiture of children gathering flowers in a pastoral setting were common, you could even call the subject matter of the entire composition derivative. Most of the paintings he’d seen of the genre had an almost paint by numbers feel or felt horribly dated like the ubiquitous Carolyn Blish or Myrle Medeiros prints of the sixties and seventies. This one though, this painting was special.

There was life to it. The child’s eyes danced with sun-touched joy, the white dress she wore showed the rumple of play and the discoloration of fresh grass stains. There was perfection in the imperfection of the crushed and broken petals and ragged stems that trailed dirt and roots over pudgy fingers. You could practically smell the green scents of spring in the air, the baby powder on her skin, and her hair was painted so realistically you could almost reach out and touch it allowing the fine silken curls to wind around your fingertips. It was like someone had captured a beautiful dream and framed it so the rest of the world could feel what the artist was feeling at that exact moment: love, serenity, happiness.

Bruce’s fingers reached out to trace the brass plaque mounted below the painting containing the name of the piece as well as the artist.

My Happiness
Evie Smoak-Fox

“I love that painting. It always brings back memories.”

Bruce turned his head and smiled, “What brings you to the Wayne Foundation, Lucius?”

“I like to eat my lunch with Evie sometimes,” he said with a gentle smile as he stared up at the painting. He pointed to it with the same hand that held a brown paper bag. “I remember that like it was yesterday. Baby was just shy of sixteen months old and she had started walking on her own maybe a couple of days before that. The adoption had been finalized only a week before. Evie wanted to do a portrait to commemorate the occasion so we went upstate to the lake house for a mini-break slash honeymoon.” He grinned at Bruce, “We’d only been married for a couple of months and hadn’t had a chance to get away yet but Evie insisted Baby stay with us. Most men might have balked at the idea of taking a young child along on their honeymoon but I didn’t mind.” He looked back up at the portrait and his eyes filled with a soft light. “That was my special baby.” He looked down for a moment and smiled ruefully, “Don’t get me wrong, I love all my children equally, but Felicity and I had a special connection from the moment I first saw her in Evie’s arms. She just had this way of looking at you that made everything fall away until all that was left was this feeling…” he stopped as though he couldn’t form the right words to express the emotion so Bruce did it for him.

“That everything would be okay,” Bruce said quietly. “Like as long as she was smiling you were invincible.”

“Exactly,” he smiled softly. “Even as a baby she never cried; never had a single temper tantrum. All she ever did was smile at you and the love just poured out of her.” Lucius pointed to the painting again. “I was standing beside her while Evie sketched. I was worried that she might run into an ant hill or hurt herself on some stickers but she was fearless. She must have fallen a dozen times, scared the hell out of me doing it and made a mess of that dress of hers, but she just kept laughing. Like falling down was the most hilarious thing in the world. Every time I’d hear her giggle it reminded me of soap bubbles popping in the wind, the sound just carried and you could feel it in your chest.” He sighed, his smile faltering as his eyes took on a look of melancholy, “That was the beginning of our one perfect year. By the next year the ALL was back and Evie became so fragile…and then she was gone.” He sighed and moved to sit on the bench near the painting as he opened his bagged lunch. “I still had Felicity though; my special baby. If it weren’t for her I don’t know how I would have gotten through it.” He held up half of a sandwich. “Have you had lunch?”

“I’m good,” Bruce said sitting next to him, still looking at the painting.

“What brings you down here to the gallery?” Lucius asked, taking a bite of his sandwich.

“They’re clearing out the penthouse and moving all the artwork downstairs,” He threw Lucius a rueful look. “I don’t know if she told you but I offered Felicity the penthouse to use while she was staying down here. She wasn’t a fan of the Art Deco stuff so I thought I’d look around and see if there might be something she would like instead.” He looked first at the painting and then at Lucius. “I thought about this one but I didn’t want to do anything without asking you first.”

“It’s your painting, Bruce,” Lucius said. “You’re the one who bought it at the Leukemia Research Foundation Charity auction, not me.”

“I might have bought it but it’s your painting,” he told him. “You just did me the honor of allowing me to bid on it.”

“I thought about keeping it,” Lucius said with another soft smile. “I’d probably horde all of Evie’s paintings if I could. After she died I started tracking them down, one by one, until I realized that’s not what she would have wanted. She wanted to share what she made with other people so, when the LRF approached me for some of her paintings, I knew that this was the one she would have given them. There’s just so much hope in that painting, so much promise of life and a future free of that damn disease.” He sniffed and cleared his throat, “Besides, I still have some of her sketches and my memories. And Baby, of course.” He turned to look at him again, “Speaking of which, I should say thank you; it was nice of you to offer the penthouse to her like that.”

Bruce shifted a little uncomfortably, “I probably should have run it past you first.”

“Probably,” Lucius said in a neutral tone. “I talked to her last night right before she went to bed and she may have mentioned doing some consulting work for you. That wouldn’t happen to be for one of your special projects, would it?”

“I’ll keep her safe, I promise,” Bruce said quietly.

“I know,” Lucius told him. “I’m not worried about that, Bruce. When it comes to Baby you’ve always taken a special interest, made sure she was safe. I can’t help but wonder though if there’s something else you need to tell me?”

He didn’t say anything, allowing the silence to fill the space between them.

Lucius reached into his briefcase and pulled out a thermos. He poured a measure of tea from it into the plastic cup that formed the lid and sipped carefully before speaking again, “I was more than twice Evie’s age when we met. She had just turned twenty with a child who was less than six months old.
She was still working part time as a cocktail waitress at a casino, her art just beginning to take off and, here I was, already in my forties and married longer than she’d been alive with two young children of my own. I had already run several companies, brought several more back from the brink of ruin, and my career was thriving. I was at the top of my game professionally speaking. My personal life was another matter.” He took another sip of tea. “I’d basically abandoned Tanya a long time ago and hardly knew what our kids even looked like. We kept putting off kids, and putting off kids, always thinking we’d have them when we slowed down but, little did we know, life never slows down.”

“We were getting older and that window was closing in on us so I broke down, even though I wasn’t really in a place for it, and agreed it was time to have the family I promised my wife I’d give her when we first met. Tanya was in her forties as well, healthy but still reaching a point when it was now or never, so first we had Tam and then Luke, one right after the other. It wasn’t the five that we’d talked about back when we were twenty and had a lifetime to get around to that sort of thing, but two was more than most could hope for without medical intervention at our age. When they were born she cut back dramatically on her workload and thought for sure I’d do like I always said I would and make time as well, but I didn’t. I couldn’t. Having a family just made me want to work even harder because that’s what a man does; he provides for his kids. I spent every waking minute at work thinking that the personal stuff would wait. I missed holidays, birthdays, anniversaries; I thought there’d be more to come so I’d write a check or have my assistant send Tanya some jewelry and figured she’d be happy with that. She wasn’t,” he said with a snort.

“One day I came back from a business trip to find that she and the kids had moved out a couple of weeks before and I just hadn’t noticed.” He looked at him, “I didn’t even notice, Bruce. I was so used to crawling into my bed long after she had gone to sleep and waking up before the crack of dawn that I never even noticed the bed was empty; that takes a special kind of selfish, let me tell you. One morning I happened to sleep in for once and finally noticed she was gone, the kids were gone, and sitting there on the breakfast table was a separation agreement, all I needed to do was sign on the dotted line.”

“I tried to change her mind but she’d heard it all before.” He looked at Bruce again, “I made some effort, of course. I was raised that a man had certain responsibilities to his family and I tried to slow down a little, saw my kids on the odd weekend, but it was too little too late for Tanya and I couldn’t blame her. Still, I tried. Or, at least, I thought I did. See, keeping my family on track was a matter of pride at that point. I vowed that I wouldn’t fail; that if I could succeed everywhere else that I could make my marriage work, too. It didn’t matter that Tanya wasn’t happy; she’d just have to deal with it like I did. No one ever guaranteed happiness, or so I’d always been told.”

“I married that woman when we were both still in college, when life was a clear path that stretched in front of us with no obstacles in sight. We’d both worked hard, both sacrificed our time and effort on building something together, but, somewhere along the way, we started growing apart. I grew apart from her, rather,” he said quietly. “The blame for the breakdown in our marriage lay solely at my feet. Tanya was still the same good and loving person she’d always been but success had gone to my head and I was caught in this selfish rich man’s world view; it wasn’t our lives, it was my life.

“At first I thought all they needed was a little more attention so I’d show up but I wasn’t there. Physical presence and being present are two different things. I’d make promises, break all of them. I never caught on to what Tanya was trying to tell me. I bulldozed over her, dismissed her concerns, her needs. I told her she needed to come home and stop her childishness. All this separation and marriage counselling stuff was just absurd. I didn’t need some stranger telling me how I felt about my wife! I’d been married to the woman for more than half my life at that point; I knew exactly what was wrong. The only problems we had were those damned charity board wives and shrinks down at the Foundation filling her head with nonsense.”
“I couldn’t for the life of me understand what was so wrong with the marriage we’d shared for so long. It was working fine for me so what was her problem all of the sudden? Didn’t she have everything she needed? Didn’t I keep her in pretty clothes and jewelry, and provide her with all the money she could want? Didn’t I let her have a career? It didn’t matter that she’d earned her doctorate or that her work changed lives, I was the ‘Businessman’s Businessman’ and my face was on the cover of Forbes and Newsweek so that made me the provider. I was Mr. Lucius Fox; the breadwinner, the man of the house, I was the one in charge and she needed to get over her little snit and come home because, really, what else could she possibly want, right? That’s what a man was supposed to do, wasn’t it? Provide for the family? She should be happy, not acting as though I’d done something wrong. But no, she wouldn’t budge; so I went home alone, night after night, until I started feeling as hollow and empty as that damn house.”

“One day I was meeting with a client in Vegas whose wife owned an art gallery and I saw this portrait of his in the office. It wasn’t the usual grim oil painting you usually see CEOs pose for; there was a light and life to it. I’d been thinking about having my portrait done for a while so I asked my client to get his wife to introduce me to the artist. She invited me to a gallery showing to meet her in person and I didn’t have anything better to do so I went.”

“I walked into this gallery, my mind more on the next day’s schedule than the paintings on the wall, when I look up and see the most hauntingly beautiful woman I have ever seen in my life. No, it was more than that; her beauty wasn’t just on the outside. No, it was like she glowed from the inside out. She smiled at me and everything just fell away; work, the stress, the loneliness, everything. One smile from her, a complete stranger, and it was the most profound thing I had ever experienced with the exception of holding my children for the first time. The minute I laid eyes on her I knew that I would do anything it took to have her smile at me like that for the rest of my life.”

“I pursued her like a man possessed. I tried to get her to come to Gotham to do my portrait but she refused. It was her first showing and she was still dependent on her waitressing to make ends meet so I offered her a ridiculously large commission right then and there to quit her job and come home with me. I know it sounds insane now, but all I knew was that I needed her to be with me and I was willing to do anything it took to make that happen. It was as though I was under some kind of spell, all logic flew out the window and I felt this overwhelming need to make this woman mine. No matter how much I offered her though, she still wouldn’t budge so I did. I asked her how long the portrait would take and I extended my trip so I could work around her schedule.” He smiled, guilt clouding his eyes, “After she died I had to apologize to Tanya for that. I think that’s one of the things that was hardest for her to accept in the beginning; that I couldn’t make time for my own family but I could change my whole life around for another woman. Of course, at the time, I didn’t see it that way; I could only see her. Within a day I was in her studio and the first thing I saw was that smile. She was dressed in some kind of paint splattered pair of overalls, not a stitch of makeup on her face, and holding the prettiest baby next to my own that I’d ever seen, and I was gone. Within a week I was watching Evie smile as she slept beside me in her bed and that separation agreement I’d been fighting tooth and nail was signed, sealed, and delivered by the next day. Within two weeks I had moved out of the home I shared with Tanya and she, Felicity, and Peggy had set up housekeeping in my new place here in the city. I had already asked her to marry me and told my attorney to give Tanya whatever it took to get it done as quickly and amicably as possible. Seven months later I was divorced, a day after that I was married again, and less than two months later I was officially Baby’s daddy even though I’d been ‘dada’ since the first time I’d held her in my arms.”

He smiled at Bruce then gazed back up at the child’s portrait, “Evie handed her to me so she could gather some supplies and she just looked up at me, calm as you please, and said it. It was her first word and I was the first person to hear it. I couldn’t say that about my own children, but I could with her. I looked up at Evie and she just smiled at me, tears in her eyes, and I knew they were my home. From that moment on I vowed that I was going to always be the first person she’d see in the morning. and the last person she’d see at night, and I was. I watched over them both. I became the husband I should have been to Tanya and the father I should have been to my own children. I taught her how to walk, I dried her tears when she was sad, I was the first person she’d ask for if she was sick; I was her daddy. Two years later Evie was gone and I wasn’t just a parent but the only parent that little girl had, but I was her father since the day I first set eyes on her. It was love at first sight just like it was with Evie.”

Lucius looked up at him, his face solemn. “Evie, in the short time we had together, taught me that time is fleeting. She showed me what it meant to be present. It was because of her that I was able to going back to Tanya and, not just apologize like I did a million times before, but truly understand what it was I was apologizing for. She also taught me that a man can have all the money in the world but it won’t buy him even one more minute of true happiness.” He sighed, “I have made a lot of mistakes in my life that I regret every single day but, even though the timing might not have been to everyone’s liking, the one thing I will never regret is loving that woman. Loving her taught me what it meant to be a husband, a father, a friend, and a man; not just a provider. We might have only had a handful of months together but I wouldn’t have missed a minute of it. Even though I lost her in the end, I’m glad I grabbed on and held tight to what little we did have while I could. Without Evie I wouldn’t have had Felicity; without Felicity I wouldn’t have Tam or Luke. Evie taught me how to be a better husband and Felicity taught me how to be a better father, not just for her, but for all of my children. I would have lost everything, Bruce, and I never would have known just what I had missed out on until it was too late.”

He screwed the cap back on his thermos and placed it back in his briefcase. He looked back at the portrait on the wall and smiled one last time as though saying a silent goodbye to a beloved ghost before getting up and putting his free hand in his pocket. “Well, back to the salt mines, I guess.” He tilted his chin toward the painting on the wall. “I don’t have a problem with Baby having the painting, Bruce. You should give it to her.”

“I will,” Bruce said quietly, his face engulfed in shadow.

He took his hand out of his pocket and placed it on Bruce’s shoulder, giving it a companionable squeeze. “You remind me of myself in a lot of ways, Bruce.”

“Thank you,” Bruce said, meeting the other man’s eyes. “That means a lot coming from you, Lucius.”

“Don’t thank me, son,” Lucius looked down at him, his expression as enigmatic as the words he spoke. “That wasn’t necessarily meant to be a compliment.”

Bruce looked up at him in wary confusion but Lucius just smiled and walked away.

Later that evening Felicity made four phone calls.

The first was to Diggle where she discussed everything under the sun with him except the one thing she wanted to.

Oliver.

She didn’t ask and he didn’t volunteer and it was just as well because she was so confused her brain would have turned to mush had she tried. He brought up Oliver’s name twice; the first was when he mentioned the big post-brawl wrap up in which he told them both off for being a couple of ‘dumbasses’. She appreciated that tidbit immensely and told him so. He shared a few other revelations as well, such as the fact that the book, aka Oliver’s list, was connected to the League and which meant that there was a good possibility that Isabel was a member since her name was in it. That was pretty handy information to have so she filed it away to trot out later. She then assured him she was fine, gave him a brief rundown on Tim and Barbara, and promised to speak to him again soon.

He ended the conversation with, “Call him.”

There was no need to ask who he was talking about; she already knew.

The next call was to Barbara, letting her know that John Diggle said he’d be in touch and to expect his call and also to finalize their dinner plans the next day. Bruce would begin his nighttime activities soon so she got off the phone quickly to allow Barbara to begin her prep.

She looked at her phone, noting the time, and before she could stop herself she had dialed his number.

There was a sharp inhalation of breath followed by a familiar sleep-laden voice, “Hello?”

For one panicky moment, Felicity considered going middle school and hanging up then and there. Instead she answered him, “Oliver?”

She heard the rustle of sheets, “Are you alright? What’s happening?” His voice went from sleepy to fully alert in an instant.

“Nothing,” she said quickly. “I—I’m sorry, I shouldn’t have—I, um, I didn’t realize you were asleep. It’s still pretty early so I thought you might be in the Lair or something.”

“No,” he said quietly. “Dig convinced me to lie low for a few days until Wayne’s people got here so I was just catching up on some sleep.”

“Is, um, how is everything?” She stammered nervously, suddenly not sure of what she should say at that moment.

“Felicity, just…why did you call me?” She heard the rustle of sheets as he sat up in bed.

“I, um, I talked to Bruce. He offered me the alternate Watchtower site but I don’t know if I’m taking it yet.”

“I know; he told me he was going to ask you.”

“Oh,” she said softly. “Um, what do you think?”

“Why ask me?” He said with an edge of annoyance then sighed, “Look, I’m not happy about you working with Wayne but if he needs you for his mission you should do it; you need to start moving on with your life even if that means moving on with him.”

Her jaw dropped slightly and her heart clenched at his cold tone as he spoke to her, “What is that supposed to mean?”

“Look, Felicity, I really don’t have time for—”

“I just—I need to know,” she paused, “are you….are we really over, Oliver?”

“Felicity…”

“I mean, I know it was just one night and I’m not asking for more than that. I’m not; I’m not calling about that but I just…” She tightened her grip on the phone. “It just feels like everything is moving too fast and suddenly I’m here and things keep moving forward and what if I just want to come home?” She said in a rush, “I don’t…” She bit her lip, “Yeah, I just want to come home. What if I don’t want to run Watchtower and live in Gotham for the rest of my life? What if I could figure out a way to fix this--?”

“You can’t; there isn’t a place for you here anymore,” Oliver said cutting her off. “Look, it was nice hearing from you but I should go—"

“Wait, Oliver!” she said quickly.

For a second she thought he might have hung up but then he began to speak again, “Felicity,” Oliver’s voice was tense, “I just think that it would be best if you…” He let out a breath, “I just think it would be best if you moved on and you calling me like this isn’t helping. You have to stop thinking that this is temporary and realize that you need to stop living in the past and move on; from me—us, from the team. Move on with your life away from Starling and the Arrow.”

“I can’t move on,” she told him.

“You have to.”

“But I’m coming back, Oliver. I mean, I have to eventually, right?”

“No.”

Her cheeks flushed as she heard the grim finality to his tone. She shook her head as if to clear it, “Listen, I get that whatever we had was a one-shot deal, okay? I get that it was just a one night stand; I can deal with that and I’ll never bring it up again if you don’t want me to but you need me there. The team needs me there.”

“We don’t! We don’t need you anymore; I’m sorry to be blunt but I don’t know how else to get that through your head,” Oliver said irritably.

“That’s not—damn you, Oliver!” She nearly shouted into the receiver. “You’re being a real asshole right now! Barbara and Tim are just coming down there until this blows over! Eventually I’m going to have to—"

“No,” he repeated.

“Oliver--!”

“Look, this is the way it is. I’m sorry but even if they go back...” He paused again, “When you found out a contract had been taken out on your life you didn’t tell me; why?”

“What?” She asked, taken aback by the sudden shift in the conversation.

“Why didn’t you tell us about the contract someone put on your life the minute you heard about it? Why did we have to hear it from Wayne days after you were told? You knew about it for almost a week and you didn’t say a goddamn word!”

She bit her lip, “I didn’t…I would have told you but Bruce—”

“No!” He said cutting her off, “It had nothing to do with Wayne or his mission. You could have told us, told me about the contract but you didn’t; why?”
“It had been canceled,” she said quietly. “It had been over and done with; it didn’t matter anymore.”

“It mattered!” He said angrily. “You knew it would matter! That’s not why you didn’t tell me. Why didn’t you share that knowledge with the team, Felicity?”

She didn’t say anything, couldn’t say anything.

“When you heard about the contract, checked the timeline, what was the first thing that went through your head?”

“Oliver…”

“You thought it was my mother, didn’t you?” He asked.

“Yes,” she said in an almost inaudible whisper of sound as the tears she had been holding back began to fall.

“So did I. So did Dig. The second we heard about it that’s exactly where our minds went and you didn’t tell me because you knew…” His voice faltered.

She bit her lip, “She’s dead, Oliver. I didn’t see the point of adding to everything else you and Thea have had to deal with.”

“That wasn’t your call to make!” He said angrily, “Goddamn it Felicity, you lied to me!”

“No, I didn’t,” she insisted.

“No, what you did was almost worse!” He told her. “You deliberately kept things from me just like she did.”

“I thought…I thought I was protecting you,” she said weakly.

“So did she,” he said coldly. “And you saw how well that worked out and yet you did it anyway.”

He made an irritated noise, “The worst part is that you were wrong; we were wrong. Moira didn’t arrange the hit which means someone else did and until we find out who that was you’re still in danger.”

“What?” Felicity asked in surprise, “Who else could it have been?”

“I don’t know; that’s the problem. After my mother, we investigated Walter next but he was a dead end as well.”

“Walter?” She asked faintly, “He never would have—"

“No,” Oliver told her, “Don’t confuse your loyalty with his. You happened to get lucky but it could have easily gone in the opposite direction. This isn’t a game, Felicity! You spent almost four years with us and you still haven’t gotten over that naïveté of yours! People who are desperate do desperate things and you didn’t give us the information we needed to keep you safe!”

“I’ve known Walter for most of my life—!” She started to object.

“But we didn’t know that, did we?” He shot back cuttingly. “It was a logical assumption for us to make since we didn’t have all the facts. You made sure of that! Either way, had you given us the information we could have eliminated him as a suspect much sooner and we might actually have had the answers we needed before Batman showed up!” Again his voice reverberated with anger.
Felicity swallowed, sensing he might have a point. That hurt though, the idea that someone she risked her life for would kill her over someone else’s secret. “Who took the contract out then?”

“No clue,” Oliver told her. “I even used my Bratva contacts but the client is a ghost.”

“Oh,” she said quietly. “So where do we go from here?”

“We don’t go anywhere,” he said harshly, “Dig and I will handle things on our end while Wayne does his thing. You’re out.”

“Oliver—!”

“No!” He said in a near shout. “You have too many secrets, Felicity. I learned more about you in a ten minute conversation with Walter than I learned from you in four fucking years thinking you were my partner; that you were one of the few people I could trust with my life and my secrets! Now I find out that I can’t trust you after all and that’s going to get you killed so you’re going to stay out of this.”

“That’s bullshit!” She told him. “I’ve never lied to you, Oliver! Not once; not even when lying to you was the smart move.” Her breath caught in a strangled sob, “If this is because of Bruce then you should just come out and say that instead of trying to make it about your mother or some stupid contract that doesn’t even exist anymore!”

“It’s not about Wayne,” he said raggedly, “Because of whatever this is between us, you never would have told us about that contract. You would have risked your life, denied us the opportunity to save you knowing your death would have crippled our mission, because you can’t function within the team anymore. This isn’t the first time you’ve done this either. You’re too emotionally invested to be trusted and that makes you dangerous.”

“And you aren’t?” She demanded. “Because if you weren’t emotionally invested then you wouldn’t be exiling me like this, would you? If it was just another one night stand and I was just another nameless, faceless lay then you wouldn’t be acting like this!”

“Fine, you want me to admit it? Okay then, you’re right; you have always been more, meant more, you’ve always gotten under my skin and affected me differently than anyone else which is why I stayed away as long as I did but that changed the minute we slept together! I would have put an arrow through Walter if I thought he tried to hurt you. Hell, if Moira was still alive I would have put one in my own mother’s chest for you, Felicity.” Her breath caught as she realized he was being completely serious. “I would have done that and more and I never would have looked back had she or anyone else tried to hurt you. The fact that you lied, the way I reacted when I found out…it just helped cement what I already knew, what I have known for a while now; I’m in too deep with you which is the biggest reason of all for not letting you back in.”

“But you wouldn’t have hurt Walter; it would never have gotten even as far as it did if I was there!” She insisted. “I would have stopped you!”

“No, you couldn’t have stopped me,” he said firmly, “because you’d be dead and I would have gone on a bloody rampage as a result.” He paused, “You used to tell me every time I let someone get under my skin to get my head out of my ass and get in the game. This is me getting back in the game and getting my head straight: You’re dangerous, Felicity, because you make me dangerous. I can’t trust myself around you and I can’t do what I have to do if you’re in my life. As long as you’re here you aren’t safe in Starling City and you never will be.”

“I’m fine though!” She said, sitting up in the bed. “Oliver—“
He cut her off, “No, Felicity, you’re done. We’re done. I’m sorry but there isn’t a place for you here anymore.”

Her breath caught in her throat as his words impacted on her like a closed fist to the gut, “What are you saying? That everything I’ve done for the past four years doesn’t mean anything? That what you told me that night…you said you were in, Oliver. You can’t tell me that you were lying because I saw the look in your eyes; it was real! And even if I’m wrong, even if it didn’t mean anything, you said we were a team; that I was your partner! You, me, Dig; we’re a team. I helped build the team with you Oliver; it’s mine just as much as it’s yours! More than that, you’re my home—the Lair, that basement, you guys…that’s my home,” she said the last of it with a pained sob.

He paused and she could hear him breathing heavily on the other end of the line. “We’re not your home, Felicity; you’re home now. Gotham, your family; that’s your home, not us!” He made an aggravated sound, “I can’t do this, I’m sorry. I can’t be with you and be the Arrow and frankly,” he paused. “I’m choosing the Arrow, not you; it’s too much. I’m telling you it’s over, that you need to find a life in Gotham. Wayne cares about you, and you…you love him. Find your place there.”

“So that night really didn’t mean anything after all?” Felicity asked quietly, hating herself for the tremble in her voice. “It really was just another night for you?”

“It meant…more than it should have but I have to move on and so do you.” His voice gained in strength, “You’re done here Felicity, it’s over. Don’t come back to Starling because if you do…” he paused, “If you do you won’t be welcomed back. I’m sorry but you’re out.”

“No!” She almost shouted at him through the phone, “You don’t get to make that decision for me!”

“I just did. Live your life, Felicity. Be happy.”

“Oliver—”

“Good bye.”

She stared down at the phone in her hands as she struggled to get her emotions under control. Pain, white-hot agony surged through her chest and she had to get out of the bed and wash her face in the bathroom sink before she could calm down enough to face what had to be done.

She looked at her pale features in the mirror, her eyes reflecting the pain she felt at Oliver’s rejection. He was right, she knew that. She shouldn’t have called; not if they were being targeted but…

She shook her head and dried her face with a towel before going back into her bedroom and shaking off her melancholy so she could make the last call on her list. Until that very moment she wasn’t sure if she’d have the strength to make the last call but her brief conversation with Oliver merely proved that she couldn’t afford to hold off on it any longer.

If this was ever going to end then she had no other choice.

“Miranda Tate.”

“Hi Miranda, it’s Felicity Smoak. We met the other day at Killinger’s.”

“Yes, of course!” She said in a bright tone, “I was hoping you’d call. Have you decided to join our organization after all?”

“I wouldn’t say that but I wouldn’t mind discussing it with you some more; at your office perhaps?” Felicity said cautiously.
“Sounds perfect,” Miranda said and paused as though looking through her schedule. “I think I can shift a few things around…can you be here at, say, 9:30?”

“Sure, where’s ‘here’?”

“The East End six blocks down from Park Row on the docks. We converted the old Axis Chemical Processing Plant and turned it into an office building.”

Felicity couldn’t help but chuckle a little, “Stellmoor set up their offices right behind Crime Alley?”

“Not Stellmoor; the Orbital Organization,” Miranda corrected her. “Stellmoor has offices uptown in a nice shiny skyscraper on 47th Street but I’m assuming you’re interviewing for the job Isabel told you about and not the one that involves pushing papers all day long.”

Felicity felt a bit gobsmacked for a moment. “The Orbital Organization? As in, um…”

“As in our charitable organization,” Miranda said with a certain emphasis. “I’d rather not discuss the details on the phone but I thought it would be best to cut through a lot of the dancing and hoopla and show you exactly what it is we’re doing. Still interested?”

“Yeah, uh yes! Absolutely! See you then,” Felicity said quickly before they both hung up. She let out a nervous breath and opened up her dad’s modified laptop and began a search. If she was going to meet the enemy on their home turf she was going to need to come prepared. At least now she had something to go on.

A name: The Orbital Organization.
Felicity took a cab to the East End and tipped her cabbie generously. Even in broad daylight there weren’t many people who liked to venture into this part of Gotham. When she told the Jamaican cab driver who picked her up in front of Wayne Tower where it was she was going he exclaimed in a strong patois, “A what you feel like, woman! Not even dah Babylon Boys go up dere effin’ dey call! Is your head be gone? Fancy nice white lady like you don’t belong in dah Crime Alley!”

After much convincing along with a large portion of her pilfered Bruce Wayne cab fund he finally took her but not without a lot of grumbling and complaining. When he did drop her off he looked at the seemingly abandoned entrance to the Axis Chemical Processing Plant dubiously.

“Look here, Missy,” he said shaking his head. “I don’ know you but you don’ belong in here. I tink maybe I should take you back to your fancy building, cha!”

“Thank you but this is where I’m supposed to be,” Felicity said as she got out of the nice safe Yellow Cab even though she secretly thought he might have a point.

“Ah, you be vexin’ me, woman!” He cursed pulling out a card and handing it to her. “Dis be mah cell phone. You call me when you ready to leave dis place, hear? You call me! Not many of dah brethren be wantin’ to come up chere, no.”

Felicity took the card gratefully, “Thank you,” she looked at it, “Mr. Mention?”

“Oh yeah, dat be me; Mr. Mention,” the cabbie said with a sly wink. “‘Cause all dah ladies be mentionin’ me, cha!”

Felicity smiled brightly and slipped the card in her purse then waved as the cabbie sped away leaving her alone. She smoothed her hands over her black wool trench coat one last time to make sure she looked alright, straightened the chocolate, black, and camel cashmere Burberry check scarf around her neck, and headed towards the gate.

She wanted to dress for success but she didn’t want to slip and crack her ass sideways on the slick asphalt either so she left the suicide heels in the closet and stuck to a simple pair of nude and black patent leather kitten heels instead. The wind whipped across her legs and she immediately wished she had worn trousers or at least a thick pair of wool tights but she needed to look sharp if she was going to leave an impression on a woman like Miranda Tate.

Under her coat she had on a Michael Kors black crepe wool dress with a high round neckline and nude contrasting ‘slits’ at the neck and torso that added an hourglass silhouette to the already form-fitting dress. It ended at the knee but was sleeveless (why designers never seemed to put sleeves on anything anymore was beyond her) so she paired it with a Balmain double breasted black wool jacket that nipped in at her waist and clung nicely to her curves as it ended just below her hips. Unfortunately the suit jacket hid the nude detailing on the torso but it did make the little peek-a-boo of color at her neckline pop and, besides, there was no way in hell she was going out in Gotham winter weather by the docks without plenty of layers.

Felicity walked up to the empty guard shack and frowned before approaching the seemingly broken and antiquated keypad at the gate that was perched atop a slightly bent and corroded steel pipe. She pushed her glasses up her nose and eyed it dubiously before raising one eyebrow in swift calculation. She then looked around her carefully. At first she thought she’d somehow gotten the address wrong but, as far as she knew, there was only one Axis Chemical Processing Plant on this side of town. At first glance the keypad looked like a piece of junk but to Felicity’s practiced eye it was readily recognizable as rather good tech that was merely disguised as a piece of dilapidated scrap iron. Once that became apparent, her eyes easily spied the no less than six micro-cams pointed straight at her, not to mention the high powered security cams on the rooftop, security light poles, and the chain fencing that was topped with more than just razor wire. She also caught sight of a few well-disguised rooftop sentry posts and a laser tracking system.

This was definitely the place.

There was a speaker and microphone on the keypad and the sentries had her in their sights. The lasers they were painting her with might be invisible but she could practically feel them burning into her. They knew she was here, that was obvious, but no one was acknowledging her presence. Taking barely a second to consider her actions she reached into her bag and pulled out her modified cell. She flipped open the small metal flap on the keypad that revealed a laser scanner and activated the card reader app on her smartphone. Within seconds she hacked the system and the gates opened smoothly, attesting to the fact that the mechanism was in deceptively good working order.

With a blank, almost bored expression, she turned to one of the hidden cameras and said, “Tell Ms. Tate I’m here and that I’d really prefer not to get shot today if at all possible so I’d appreciate it if you could ask the snipers along the roofline to stop targeting me now.”

A clear and professional feminine voice erupted from the speaker, “Yes Ms. Smoak, Ms. Tate is expecting you. Please enter the gate and wait by the guard shack as someone is coming to collect you shortly.”

“Thank you,” Felicity said before breaching the perimeter. She steeled her nerves and pretended not to care about the fact that the roof sentries were probably still targeting her. Through her eyelashes she watched as a brief flash of sunlight filtered through the dark overcast sky to glint off the scope of a high powered rifle. Yup, still feeling like a deer caught in the crosshairs, she thought with no little amount of trepidation.

For a split second she almost panicked and allowed herself to wonder if she should have told Bruce or Barbara what she was doing or, at the very least, Tim or Luke, but had she told anyone they would have instantly gone into ‘protect helpless little Baby’ mode and she’d be lucky to ever see daylight again. Also, if Bruce had any clue that a rival vigilante group had settled in his city, especially this close to Crime Alley and in a building that had a million miles of bad history associated with it, he would have launched an all-out assault on the place. She didn’t want that to happen yet, not until she had a chance to assess this ‘Orbital Organization’ for herself. She wasn’t suicidal and she wasn’t stupid, but she was intrigued. She wasn’t going in completely wide open and unprepared either. She had multiple safety plans in place including the shielded tracker Bruce had left in her car back in Starling City that was now cleverly tucked into the underwire of her bra, a computer notification set to go off by 1:30 pm if she doesn’t disable it which would alert Watchtower of her position and therefore get the attention of every single member of the Bat Family, and lastly her phone itself. Even if one or two of her preventatives failed, the notifications would go out and someone would come for her…hopefully she’d still be alive when they did and not full of 50 caliber holes shot from high powered sniper rifles. She justified her admittedly risky plan of action with the old adage that stated that while curiosity may have killed the cat, satisfaction brought it back.

A golf cart arrived with two security guards, both armed but their weapons tucked away, and she was instructed to climb aboard. Within moments she was driven through the doors to the plant. As they entered the immense building Felicity’s mind raced at what she might see, but whatever she had been expecting it wasn’t this…

…it was empty.

Completely empty.

The golf cart slowed to a halt as it approached the two women standing in the center of the empty floor. Miranda Tate stood beside a very well dressed and smirking Isabel as they waited for her to get off the cart and approach them on foot.

“Hello Felicity,” Isabel said with a slightly triumphant grin. “So what do you think of the place?”

Felicity, refusing to give in to the obvious, merely looked around coolly before saying, “I think that you must have a helluva set up downstairs otherwise all the security measures you’ve put in are overkill even for this part of town.”

Isabel turned to Miranda with a raised eyebrow, “I told you.”

“Yes, you did,” Miranda said with a slight nod, eyeing Felicity appreciatively.

“So have I passed the first part of your test, or what?” Felicity asked, knowing she’d need to put in a show of strength if she was going to make an impression.

“With flying colors,” Miranda said with a slow smile. “Your use of a cellphone to hack the keypad was impressive as was your ability to not only identify the hidden cameras but the sentries along the rooftop. Tell me, what other details were you able to discern?”

“Let’s see; M-82 sniper rifles with suppressors and Meslas Fire-Control riflescopes, top of the line micro cameras and keypads, a laser tracking system and net,” she pointed to the top of the factory ceiling and pointed out the tell-tale black splitters sitting atop the girders and rafters, “and, this is just a guess mind you because I haven’t checked the perimeter, but I’m thinking no less than…” she took a second to make the calculations in her head, “twelve sentries on the roof and premises plus the other two ‘visible’ security guards. Am I close?”

“Very.” Miranda said smiling broadly. “How did you know about the guns and scopes? You couldn’t have possibly seen them from that distance clearly.”

“M-82’s are some of the most accurate rifles ever made and I figured you’d be all about top of the line, suppressors because even in this neighborhood someone’s bound to respond to gunshots eventually, and the new Israeli scopes are invisible rangefinders that operate on an infrared spectrum because what’s the point of having a targeting system if the little red dot gives you away?” She said easily and without hesitation.

Miranda turned to Isabel slowly, “Expect an especially large bonus this year.”

Isabel’s eyes glittered with that strange light once more and she gestured towards the freight elevator, “Would you care to continue the rest of the tour?”

Felicity nodded and the women led her to the elevator that, despite the rusted and paint peeling exterior, opened to reveal a shiny stainless steel interior. As the doors closed a panel slid open and a computer generated voice stated woodenly, //Please stand by for entry code and scan.//

Miranda stood in front of the scanner and targeted a small dot with her eyes as she spoke, “Code Tiamat and two guests.”

//Identity Confirmed. Please stand by for scan.//

A red laser netting lit up the interior of the elevator followed by the voice of the computer once again. //Confirmed. Beginning descent.//

A few moments later the elevator stopped and the doors opened to a bustling control room that appeared to stretch for the entire length of the rather impressively large factory. One end of the room was filled with floor-to-ceiling walls of monitors and a dozen or so computer banks and workstations, each manned by its own operator. The other end of the room was covered in training mats, sparring rings, and exercise equipment where no less than two dozen men and women were training hard as technicians in white coats walked around making notations in their handheld tablets. Along the perimeter were wood and mirrored glass enclosed ‘cubicles’, some of which had their doors wide open so that the office personnel were clearly visible behind their desks working on their computers or speaking on the phone. There was also a large medical and sports medicine area where some of the men and women were receiving massages or having minor injuries examined and treated.

“Welcome to Project Leviathan, otherwise known as The Orbital Organization,” Miranda said, her exotic features beaming with pride. “So what do you think?”

Felicity took a deep breath, her eyes wide open as she tried to take it all in.

“Wow.”

Diggle glared at his partner from his spot near the workstation. Even though it was a weekday Oliver was working hard in the Lair. He’d taken a nasty beating the night before so he called in sick because even those miracle herbs of his took time to work. By Monday he’d be fine but today he was sporting a nasty bruise along his jaw line and a black eye, not to mention the bruised ribs he’d received when he’d gone in blind and tried to face down half a dozen heavily armed Triad members alone. Oliver looked more like a brawler than a CEO at the moment but it could have been worse; if he and Roy hadn’t gone in at the last minute he would have been dead.

Even so, here he was, preparing to begin the second part of his workout, bruised ribs or no. The CEO might have called in sick but the Arrow only did so if he were at Death’s door.

“We can’t keep going on like this. I thought you agreed to take the night off last night otherwise we would have been there to back you up a hell of a lot sooner! What the hell were you thinking?”

Oliver looked up at Diggle and sighed, “I just—I wasn’t exactly planning on running into a gang fight, Dig! I was just blowing off some steam and it happened, sorry.”

“That’s not all I’m talking about and you know it,” he said, throwing him a pointed look. “You’re tired, you’re slipping up—“

“I’m fine,” Oliver bit out. “We were doing this before Felicity and we’ll manage now that she’s gone.”

“You two are both full of shit,” the other man muttered as he turned away from him.

“What is that supposed to mean?” Oliver asked angrily.

Dig turned to face him again, his eyes narrowing. “She called me last night right before you nearly got killed by a bunch of pissed off gangbangers while ‘blowing off steam’, whatever the hell that means.”

Oliver didn’t say anything. Instead he began to remove his weapons and return them to the racks.

“She asked how the mission was going, if I was handling everything okay; you know what she didn’t ask?”

The question hung in the air and Oliver took off his gloves waiting for Diggle to continue, irritation at the other man pricking at him. Finally, sick of the silence that hung over him like a sharpened pendulum, he gave in. “Fine! She didn’t ask about me, right? And now you’re reading all kinds of shit into it! Well, just stop okay? She’s gone and life goes on.”

“Think so?” Dig asked him.

“Has to,” Oliver said quietly. He took off his gloves and slapped them on the metal table in front of him. “Fuck!” He nearly shouted in frustration.

“If you miss her so bad then help me, Dig!” Oliver yelled at him. “Help me get rid of the threat hanging over us and maybe that will change things but until then just get off my goddamned back!”

“You’re taking risks, you’re not sleeping, and you’re foul tempered and on edge! You’re going to blow everything we’ve worked for if you keep up this shit!” Diggle rose from the chair and confronted him, looking at him dead-on as he spoke. “You keep losing your temper at work, too. You’re going to tip Isabel off, Oliver.”

“She’s not even there,” he said as he jerkily took the tape off his knuckles. “She took off yesterday to meet with her bosses at Stellmoor. Besides, what the hell do you want me to do about it, Dig?” He growled in frustration. “I’m doing the best I can with what I’ve got!”

“Stop being the Arrow until we get some back up and mean it this time! No more of this going off on your own shit!” Dig said stubbornly. When Oliver opened his mouth to protest the other man stopped him, “It’s only for a few days, right? Just hang it up for a week, one week, and then we’ll be back up and running. Get some sleep, eat something, stop running yourself in the ground.”

“I have responsibilities; Roy, the city——“

“They can wait a week,” Dig told him. When he didn’t answer Dig shook his head and placed his hand on the other man’s shoulder, “At least call her.”

Oliver stiffened and shook his head, “No.”

“Why not?” He said dropping his hand and scowling at him.

Oliver ran a hand over his mouth, his eyes twin pools of pain as he spoke up, “Just no.”

“She wants to hear from you. She hasn’t said so but I can——“

“No!” Oliver said tightly, slamming his hand on the table hard enough to leave a dent. He turned his back on his partner, stepping away from the table as he got his emotions under control. “She called me,” he said quietly. “Last night, after she spoke to you.”

“What did she say?” Dig asked, his tone darkening as he easily guessed from Oliver’s tone and mannerisms that the story he told wouldn’t end well.

“She wants to come home; I told her no, that she had to move on with her life;” Oliver said in an almost dispassionate tone. “I also told her not to call me again unless it was an emergency.”

“What the fuck is wrong with you?” He thundered, incensed to the point that he seriously considered beating the man in front of him to a bloody pulp. “Call her back right now and--!”

“This is not a love story, Dig,” he growled, rounding on him. “There is no happily ever after, no whispered promises over a candlelit dinner! She can’t come back! Not now, not ever! Felicity is gone! Whether we fix this or not, she’s gone."

Dig shook his head, “She’s coming back as soon as this is over. She about hinted as much to me over the phone. She kept talking about her computers and some of the ideas she had to update the system—not Barbara, her. She even fucking told you she wanted to come back! You said so yourself; she called this place her home, Oliver! You, me, the mission—this is her home!”

“This isn’t her home,” Oliver said wearily. He sat down heavily in one of the chairs and scrubbed his hands over his scalp. “This is a basement; it’s not a home. She has a home in Gotham with a father and a brother and sister…and him.” He looked up at his friend, a weary smile on his face, “I sent her away, Diggle.”

“You were protecting her,” the other man said quietly. “You had no other choice.”

“I had a choice,” he snorted. “I chose to send her away with him though.”

“So he could protect her.”

Again Oliver shook his head, “He’ll never give her back and I knew that when I pushed her out. No matter what happens she’s gone. I blew it, Dig, and I have to live with that.”

“Felicity’s loved you for years, Oliver,” the older man said, breaking the unspoken rule between them that the words ‘love’ and ‘Felicity’ should never been spoken out loud in the same sentence.

“And she’s loved him even longer,” Oliver said making an exasperated noise deep in his throat. “I was his stand-in; that’s all. And Felicity,” he shook his head, “I don’t know; maybe it was just proximity or the fact that the tension just got to be too much to handle. Whatever we had it wasn’t love, Dig; it was never love. We’re not some destined to be bullshit romance novel. We had sex once and I immediately pushed her away. I told her to go away and there could never be a chance at a relationship with us and she accepted it. She didn’t yell or scream or cry; you know what she did?”

He looked up at him and smiled humorlessly, “She laughed. Thought it was hilarious because, come to find out later, Wayne told her the exact same goddamn thing.” He clenched his jaw, “She said I wasn’t her first rodeo, said that she’s heard all the speeches before. I didn’t understand then but I do now.”

“Enlighten me then,” Diggle said.

He eyed him sharply, “Batman has been doing this a hell of a lot longer and a hell of a lot more successfully than we have.” When Diggle looked like he was going to break in he cut him off, “We’re just beginning, sure, but he’s been doing this for as long as he has and he pushed her away because he knows from personal experience that you can’t do what we do and have that kind of life with someone. He even gave her the exact same goddamn thing. What does that tell you?”

“That Bruce Wayne is a fucking moron? That he blew it and thank God he did because now it’s your chance?” Diggle told him blithely. “I know where you’re going, man, but you’re wrong. You’re thinking that if he can’t have her and keep her then how could you ever manage to do it, right? How do you carve a life out of all this with a girl like Felicity and still be the Arrow? You know how you succeed where he failed?” Diggle leaned against the table heavily, looking at the younger man with a combination of pity and frustration. “You call her, you hop a plane, you go get her back. You tell her how you feel. You don’t fuck it up.”

“No.”
“Why the hell not?” Diggle growled.

Oliver leaned his head back and closed his eyes before answering. “I’ve ruined her life enough as it is, for one thing.”

“What the hell are you talking about now?” He asked irritably.

“She’s not the same person she was because of us, because of all this,” Oliver said, gesturing around the room. “We—I stole that from her; that lighthearted innocence she used to carry inside of her. She’s changed and I hate that it’s my fault; that I’m the reason that happened. I won’t be responsible for destroying her, Dig; not her. Sara, Laurel, Shado, Sandra—I’ve managed to ruin every single one of their lives just because they made the mistake of getting too close to me. I’m toxic; this mission, this life has devastated and destroyed every person I’ve ever tried to care about. I won’t do that to Felicity any more than I already have; she deserves better.”

“Just—people change, okay!” Dig burst out. “We grow older, we roll with the punches; everyone changes! You’re not the same person you were when you got on that damn boat, you aren’t the same man you were when you crawled into the backseat of her car; Felicity wasn’t forced into this, she chose it! Stop trying to turn back the clock on her life just because you feel guilty for something that wasn’t your fault!”

“But it was my fault!” He threw back, “All of this was my fault!” He said thumping himself on the chest. “She needs to go her way and I need to go mine because I can’t take one more…” He tightened his lips into a grimace, “Like I told you before; this isn’t a love story, Dig. I can’t do what I do, wear the masks I wear, and have that kind of relationship with anyone.” He sighed again and got up to unzip his jacket. “It’s better to just end it now before there’s no turning back.”

“Do you honestly think you can convince yourself that this hasn’t already taken over your life, man?” Diggle asked quietly. “You’re fooling yourself, you know that?”

“She deserves a life, Dig,” Oliver said with grim finality. “I can’t give that to her but, who knows, maybe someone else can. She deserves better than this.”

“And what do you deserve?” He asked.

“Nothing,” Oliver said. “Not a goddamn thing.”

Bruce sat in the satellite cave and played back the footage from the day before. He watched as her face broke out in a mischievous grin and listened as Felicity began her ramble outside of the penthouse doors. She pulled out her cell and swiped a card and in a matter of seconds the doors unlocked.

“One would think Batman would have better security.”

He grimaced and continued to watch as she stepped inside and peered around for a few moments, chuckling in spite of himself as she eyed the Egyptian bust suspiciously and removed her coat to cover it.

“Okay, I know how to fix you. Better.”

God, she was adorable, not to mention sexy as hell. One didn’t usually use those two words in the same sentence but that’s exactly what she was. His mind drifted back to the first time he’d seen her in QC wearing that red dress that looked like it had been painted on. She’d been sexy, yes, but sexy in a way any other woman would have been in the same outfit. Not that he wouldn’t have given anything to bend her over that conference room table and make love to her until they both passed out but that was all her, not what she was wearing. He much preferred her when she was being herself.

He watched as the dress floated around her legs, her golden hair shimmering in the low light. She wasn’t dressed in a particularly alluring way; on the contrary, she would have fit in perfectly at a church social in the demure silk dress and simple pink cardigan. She didn’t even have in her contacts, just her ordinary, everyday thick framed glasses, but she was 100% pure Felicity; no pretension and making no effort to be anyone else. Even so, when he saw her in that dress the morning before, it was all he could do not to pick her up and sit her down on the workstation desk so he could push inside of her until she was a babbling exhausted mess.

His attention turned back to the monitor as she spoke again.

“I distinctly heard Bruce say he had my stuff delivered here.”

Again he let out an involuntary snort of laughter as she nearly jumped out of her skin at the sight of the large bronze cat sculpture.

“Nice kitty. Creepy kitty. Who did Bruce hire to decorate this place, Morticia Adams?”

He rubbed his hand over his mouth and shook his head, then winced as he realized what she was about to see.

“You’ve got to be shitting me. One piece of furniture. Seriously, one piece? Oh, he’s going to pay for that one.”

He hadn’t been too happy himself when he realized how little the movers had been able to salvage. He’d nearly called the moving company to demand an explanation before he caught the note Felicity herself had left on the paperwork. Knowing that she’d donated the bulk of her belongings because of his thoughtless actions hadn’t relieved him of his guilt; on the contrary, it made him feel even worse. More so when he found out that everything he had assumed about her was completely wrong. She wasn’t in over her head; Queen was. She was the one who stepped in to rescue him, not vice versa.

Not to say what Queen and John Diggle had accomplished with their limited resources wasn’t impressive; it was. For a two man operation to come as far as they had and not get caught or killed was a damn miracle, but he knew that without Felicity they would have never pulled it off. When they told him the story of how he’d gone to his own IT department with a bullet-ridden laptop and happened to approach the only tech in the place that wouldn’t bat an eye, he’d been tempted to call bullshit. Things like that didn’t happen in real life. Of all the people to bring it to, he found Felicity. Bruce shook his head. What was it Alfred always said? “God has a special providence for fools and the foolishly brave.”

He watched as she entered his office and seemed to suddenly perk up, her full lips curving into a sweet smile.

“Now this is more like it.”

“Because the devil himself dances among us, but we do not see him.”

The words tickled at his memory but he couldn’t immediately place them. If he was to guess he’d say Agatha Christie; Felicity was a huge fan of her books and he’d often find her curled up in a corner somewhere with an afghan and a corpse or two for company. His instincts said that it sounded more like something you’d hear from Hercule Poirot than Miss Marple but he doubted the devil she was talking about now was a short, rotund Belgium detective with a waxed moustache, especially since she was looking directly at the silver framed pictures that crowded the mantle.

“And speaking of the devil.”

As she began to pick up and examine the framed photos of his childhood he averted his eyes, his mood turning grim. There was just something so intimate about that space, so…personal. She moved fluidly within it, picking up one frame after another, smiling softly at each and every one. He couldn’t do that; not anymore. They weren’t just memories in a frame for him, they were his ghosts. His reminder of all he couldn’t fix, all he had yet to do, and every past and future failure. In his mind’s eye he could still see his mother with crystal clear clarity; her pale gold hair, nearly the same shade as Felicity’s was now, coming undone from her once neat up-do because she’d nodded off in the theater, her long slender fingers as they gripped his hand lightly, her sweet smile as she looked into his father’s eyes--

“She was so young, wasn’t she? I always forget how young they were when you lost them.”

Bruce started slightly, his eyes locked on the image of Felicity as she seemed to speak directly to him through the monitor. It was almost as though she sensed exactly what it was he was feeling at this very moment.

“She was, what, twenty-five? Twenty-six?”

“Twenty-seven,” he found himself answering softly even though, logically, he knew that everything he was seeing happened the day before. Still, he answered her.

He watched as she picked up his father’s old pipe and inhaled then turned her eyes to his photograph.

“Cherry pipe tobacco. You look like your dad. He couldn’t have been much older than you are now.”

“Pretty close; he was just a few years older, forty-eight,” Bruce admitted. Had he gone through with his mad idea and actually married Felicity four years ago (assuming she would have had him), would they have a child of their own by now? It was possible.

His mother wasn’t even nineteen when he was born; slightly younger than Felicity had been when they made love for the first time. Still, it wouldn’t have worked out, he reminded himself. Damian had been out of control, almost impossible to deal with. It was bad enough when he targeted Tim because he saw him as a potential rival. Had he brought Felicity into his home and had they had a child…

He swallowed and quickly dismissed the darkness that threatened to overtake him. Damian was gone. Best to let sleeping dragons lie.

“I wonder if Martha fussed at him as much as Peggy fusses at Lucius when he comes home smelling of pipe smoke? I bet she said, ‘Thomas Wayne, a doctor should know better!’”

He nodded, more to himself than anything else, “She did, but then she’d get him a new Wemyss hand carved pipe every Christmas shipped all the way from Dunfermline, Scotland.”

“I bet he’s the reason Lucius still smokes, not often, but every once in a while. He probably wore Bay Rum aftershave too, didn’t he? And he ate peppermints to try to cover the smell but it never did. Do you still remember that? What he smelled like?”
He searched his memory, “Not Bay Rum; Old Spice and…lemon drops.” He hadn’t thought of that in years. His dad always had a bag of old fashioned lemon drops in his pocket.

It had been his father’s favorite candy.

“And Martha smelled like L’Air Du Temps and baby powder too, I’ll bet, because she worked with kids.”

He nodded again silently because she was right. That’s exactly what his mother smelled like.

He watched as she caught sight of the Maltese Falcon statuette and slowly ran her fingers over the deeply embellished feathers

“The stuff dreams are made of.”

Although she spoke in a soft whisper it was as though she was speaking directly in his ear. He felt a bolt of desire surge through his body, straight to his groin. There was nothing sexual about her words or her body language but somehow it was the most erotic, most intimate act he’d ever been witness to.

This woman knew him.

She knew him.

He watched as her face turned to the hidden camera and she stared straight through him, her lips curving upwards in a tongue-touched grin, “Bruce, Bruce, Bruce; shame on you.”

His heart nearly stopped.

“The least you could have done was make it a little bit of a challenge. Why, this is almost too easy.”

He stiffened in his chair.

“Okay Sam, let’s talk about the Black Bird, shall we? Where’s your MacGuffin?”

He blinked and began to breathe again as she reached inside the clock.

“Bat. Now that is what I call a MacGuffin.”

As the secret panel opened revealing the elevator and palm scanner he groaned, half in humiliation and half in frustration, listening as she berated him from the past.

“Okay, well, I see where you decided to put the security now but, seriously, ‘Bat’? You had to use a bad pun to hide your secret cave-thingy? She was the goddess of cows, not bats; that just happened to be her name.”

He switched it off, unable to take anymore.

He remembered her words:

“…despite what you may think, Bruce; you’re not that hard of a read.”

Apparently not.

He closed his eyes and rubbed his furrowed brow with his hand as he leaned back in the chair.
“Fuck,” he said out loud, enjoying the taste of the profanity as it rolled off his tongue.

Fuck, he thought. He was so …fucked.

It was like he couldn’t…compartmentalize his feelings where she was concerned. He could do that with everything and everyone else, but she hit him where he lived. He didn’t like it; he didn’t like the way he couldn’t control himself around her, couldn’t think clearly where she was concerned. He found himself acting out of character and behaving irrationally.

He was both more and less around her, if that made any sense. It was like there was some outside force, some energy surrounding her that affected his feelings and emotions, clouded his judgment, and made him behave in ways and feel things he’d never allowed himself to feel or act upon before. He didn’t like it; it was the reason he’d pushed her away twice, but it was also the reason he kept going back.

And Felicity…she was different now; stronger, harder, more mature and confident than she’d been before she left four years ago. It was as though there was something inside of her that had changed and it both intrigued and disturbed him. At the same time he could still see the girl she’d once been, but there was a different light around her now. She wasn’t as innocent as she’d once been. Her experiences with Queen and his mission had obviously had an effect on her and that hint of darkness that had taken hold worried him. He didn’t like not knowing and he didn’t like that she made him feel so off-balance all the time. It felt like every time she looked at him now there were secrets in her eyes, like she knew something he didn’t and he wasn’t used to feeling as though he were always two steps behind. He knew it was what made him keep lashing out and now...Christ, he was so goddamn confused it wasn’t even funny.

Barbara had called him every variation of ‘asshole’ there was throughout the years but he’d never felt like one until he saw the pain he caused Felicity reflected in her eyes. Other people’s feelings never mattered to him more than the job at hand, they could like it or lump it as far as he was concerned, but she was always the exception. Women...he enjoyed women but sex was what it was, take it or leave it. The closest he’d ever come to truly loving a woman before her was Selina and, like the cat she had stylized herself after, she had been highly independent and made it very clear that their relationship began and ended on her terms, not his. When he tried pushing those boundaries; she left, simple as that.

She never truly needed him and he never really needed her either. It was a comfortable relationship for him because it was less about need and more about want. They were basically the same person and, although that probably sounded like textbook narcissism on his part; that was also what made it work. Felicity though, she was…

He rubbed his hand over his mouth and exhaled. With Felicity there was no breathing room, no emotional distance. She had a disconcerting habit of challenging him effortlessly. He wasn’t himself around her and now that she both was and wasn’t behaving like the woman he remembered he found himself feeling more confused than ever before.

“Damn it, man,” he cursed himself. He needed to get ahold of himself and get his head out of his ass once and for all.

He had a mission, he had other things to worry about besides some twenty-three year old girl who wore flirty little dresses that floated around her legs. He didn’t have time for some awkwardly adorable siren that smelled like sunshine, flowers, and home. He was both Batman and Bruce Wayne; he had a city to save, a conglomerate consisting of seven major companies to run that brought in a combined income of more than $98.5 billion dollars annually, 15,000 employees and their families that depended on him---there just weren’t enough hours in the day for him to waste even one extra minute pursuing a girl almost eighteen years his junior!

But then, just when he thought he’d regained his footing and pushed her from his mind, she’d creep back inside his thoughts and slither her way underneath his skin.

Felicity had the uncanny ability to slip in under his radar. She could blend into the background so well that it was as though she were invisible…until she wasn’t. With just a pair of glasses and a ponytail she could hide herself in plain sight. Nothing about her ever changed; her personality remained the same, her speech never altered, but somehow…

…she could steal the breath from your lungs with just a glance…

…make you ache with need from a simple touch…

…and shatter your entire world by walking into the room.

And he was going to lose her—again—but damned if he knew what to do about it.

\?\?\?/

They had taken her on a tour of the facility. The scope and breadth of the organization set her mind on fire. It was, in a word, impressive.

It was as though the Orbital Organization had taken every innovation, every protocol and procedure employed by every covert government agency, military organization, and vigilante mission and combined them to create something even more magnificent but with none of the pitfalls or flaws.

They weren’t military or government so they didn’t have to worry about oversight, budget approval, or red tape.

They weren’t law enforcement so there were no concerns about warrants, diplomatic relations, or jurisdiction.

They were a vigilante group but they were better organized, better funded, and better connected than anything she had ever seen or even imagined.

This place was either Oliver and Bruce’s version of a Mask’s wet dream or their worst nightmare brought to life.

What really got her though was the computer network. She was in love.

Ass over teakettle in L-U-R-V-E.

The minute she saw what they were working with her fingers began to itch and half a dozen improvements they could employ ran through her mind. She wanted in, she wanted this so bad she could taste it…

…and if it weren’t for the fact that Isabel Rochev was a key member of the organization she would have leapt on it like a Silly Rabbit who couldn’t seem to remember that Trix was for kids.

Someone here was hiding a big old bowl of tricks…tricky, tricky, tricks; and not the kind that ended in a bowl with milk on top. She could smell it like that bunny could sniff out a fruity marshmallow; she just hadn’t found it yet.

She sat across from Miranda and Isabel in a private office, a steaming cup of coffee in her hand. The lower facility was kept at a comfortable ambient temperature so she had removed her coat and scarf and hung them on a coatrack at the door. If she hadn’t known she was underground the office would seem rather normal if a bit more comfortable than most corporate shows of power. There was a large ornately carved U-shaped desk in a rich cherry wood finish with several monitors currently in sleep mode and a plush high back leather desk chair at the end of the room. Behind it was a two way mirrored glass wall so the person occupying the office could easily work while observing the technicians in the control room beyond. The floors were covered in plush charcoal wall to wall wool carpeting with deep, rich oriental rugs breaking up the dark monotony of the space. At the far end of the room where they sat was a large oval coffee table/conference area with rich leather seating and a plush couch with comfortable throw pillows. Low bookshelves that did not obstruct the view of the training area which was visible through the two way mirrored windows that surrounded them lined the entire space. Even the door was made from the same mirrored glass that made up three of the walls. The person occupying this office would have both privacy and an unobstructed 270 degree view of the entire facility. The final wall was covered in a light butter yellow damask that brightened the room considerably and gave the place a strong yet feminine feel. There were two doors set in the wall in the same cherry stained wood as the desk and she assumed that one led to a washroom and the other one was, most likely, a closet of some kind. Between them was a built in alcove with a small sink, countertop, and cabinets featuring a top of the line coffee maker (the same Rube Goldberg looking one Oliver had), a mini-fridge, and a small microwave.

Swear to God, she could live here.

It was a gorgeous office, at least twice the size of Oliver’s and, despite the situation she found herself in, she felt oddly at home here.

She took a sip of her coffee and hummed. Goddamn, she thought, even the coffee is impressive.

Shit. It would almost be worth joining a potentially evil organization’s underground lair if this is what they served in the employee lounge. Maybe that’s the real reason Darth Vader crossed over to the dark side; they had the good coffee while the rebels had to get their fix at Starbucks.

“So, any questions?” Miranda asked as she took a sip from her own cup.

“You called this ‘Project Leviathan’; why ‘Leviathan’?” Felicity asked. There were a lot of other questions she could have started with (Are you an evil organization bent on world domination? Am I free to leave when we’re done or are you planning on locking me in a cage where I will spend the rest of my days chained to a wall and answering the phone with the words ‘have you tried rebooting the device’? Do you grind your own beans and where can I buy some?) but the question of why they would choose to name their supposedly good guy organization after notorious evil entity just begged to be asked. “Of all the names you could have chosen, why that one? Also why call it ‘project’ anything? Are you military, ARGUS, what?”

“We’re not ARGUS or military. As for ‘Leviathan’…” Miranda smiled, her eyes glinting in pure delight, and she began to quote, “Nothing on earth is its equal—a creature without fear. It looks down on all that are haughty; it is king over all that are proud.”

“The Book of Job,” Felicity said when she was done.

“Very good,” Miranda nodded. “Are you religious at all, Felicity?”

“Not particularly,” she said. “I’m Jewish and I have had some religious instruction, I was Bat Mitzvahed and we observed the High Holidays but, honestly, it was more about tradition than faith for us.” She shrugged, “I did always have an appreciation for the stories though, the elegance of the traditional language, so I recognized the passage.”
“What do you know about the Leviathan?”

She searched her memory, “It was a seven-headed serpent from mythology that originated with either the Sumatrans or the Babylonians and became synonymous with a great and terrible evil.”

“But do you know the original story?” She asked, then instead of waiting for her answer she continued. “In the beginning there were two Leviathans; a male, Abzu, and a female, Tiamat. Tiamat was the mother of the cosmos, the mother of everything. She was the supreme goddess who reigned over the salt of the oceans and her consort was the god of the fresh sweet waters. Of the two she was the most powerful so the other gods feared her, feared her feminine power and strength; especially after she looked upon them and realized they were a blight on the cosmos and decided to destroy them all in order to silence their pettiness. Marduk, a young but ambitious deity, decided to battle his ‘great mother’ so he could take the mantle of supreme god for himself. After a fearsome battle he defeated her but he used her body to create the world and her tears to create the great rivers.” She took a sip of her coffee before continuing. “Different religions took up the tale, changed it to fit their own views. The Jews and the Christians took the myth and changed it only slightly; still with two leviathans, only this time as beasts instead of gods, and the female was still slaughtered because God feared her power. Also, instead of turning her flesh into the world, she was made into a feast to be devoured at the end of days.” She smiled, “The irony hidden within the myth, whichever one you choose to believe, is that even in death she won. Tiamat became the mother of the world because, like all women, she adapted to her circumstances. Her strength was her ability to create and nurture whether it be as food for the gods or as the Earth Mother we stand upon. We chose the codename ‘Leviathan’ for this project, not because it represents some great evil or a goddess of chaos, but because it represents feminine power and strength. No matter how many times you strike us down, no matter what the odds against us may be, we will rise again and we will take our place as the true shapers of this world.”

Isabel nodded and took up where she left off, “Men have always led with their fists, always conquered rather than compromised, and they have always feared feminine strength because where they destroy a thing we create one.”

“Exactly,” Miranda enjoined. “We’re not man-haters, we’re not saying all men are evil, but in the world around us, the world of heroes, we’re seeing the emergence of these god-like beings and creatures of pure will and strength that, while doing good and necessary work, are all too often driven by testosterone and rage. There is no order to their efforts and no acknowledgement of the collateral damage that is left in their wake.”

Isabel’s lips curled in disdain, “What’s worse is that even when these so-called heroes do target wrongdoing they only seem to target what they consider to be the big bad, ignoring everything else around them or dismissing it as being ‘not their concern’.”

Felicity felt a pang at that. Yes, in the beginning Oliver had the list and nothing but, however after the Undertaking he began to take on more and Bruce had always served all of Gotham, not just Crime Alley even if the East End was where he spent much of his time. “I don’t think that’s being very fair,” she said, unable to keep silent. “These men and women sacrifice blood, time, and their own lives to do good wherever they can. There’s no way they can possibly do everything on their own.”

“You’re absolutely right,” Miranda said, her eyes lighting up again. “We first formed Leviathan and then the Orbital Organization specifically to help with that. Look out there, what do you see?” Felicity looked out onto the training area where men and women were busily lifting weights, practicing fighting stances and sparring, as well as practicing with various weapons. “There may be more women than men out there but there are men. We aren’t discriminating here. When we began the OO we recruited both men and women and 99% of the time the women we approached immediately saw the value of what we were doing. The male vigilantes—"

“We were lucky if a third of them showed any type of interest and those who did immediately wanted to make it a one man show and completely take over,” Isabel interrupted with an eye-roll.

“Unfortunately she’s right,” Miranda said in a disgruntled tone. “That or they wanted to pick and choose who they worked with and what battles they were willing to fight.”

Felicity flushed in embarrassment because, yeah, she could actually sympathize on that one. All the vigilantes she had known had one thing in common: They were all highly—“Territorial macho idiots!” Isabel spat out as though reading her mind.

“So what exactly is your mission statement? What do you do differently?” Felicity asked. “And which is it; Leviathan or The Orbital Organization?”

“Both,” Isabel told her. “Most of our assets and operators know us as Orbital; it’s also the name of our charitable front. ‘Leviathan’ is the codename reserved for our top operatives; the people in charge.”

“Like Tiamat, we have many minds working as one; many heads, one body, i.e. Leviathan. Think of it as the name of the secret organization within the secret organization. As for how we’re different; first off, we’re organized and we’re global,” Miranda said leaning forward slightly. “We treat our individual operators like independent contractors. We do send them out in teams when they’re needed but, most of the time; we let them do their own thing. Most of the men and women in this facility at the moment are ‘in house’ recruits who get sent in as back up when one of our operators needs assistance but some are independent operators who occasionally like to use our facility for training or to touch base on neutral ground. We don’t require our operators to headquarter from our facility; we just ask that they take on the occasional group assignment. Everything is voluntary and, to my knowledge, no one has ever refused an assignment. We’re not trying to ‘control’ anyone here. No one punches a clock; no one is being blackmailed, tracked, or chipped. We make contact, offer assistance, and if they take us up on our offer we bring them in and see to it they get what they need. If they refuse or appear unreceptive, we back off and keep out of their way.”

She put down her cup, “Let’s face it; each of them got involved in the fight for a reason and they’re all territorial to a certain extent. They each have families, homes, friends—there is a reason they choose to fight the way they do and we acknowledge that. We give them the financial and tech support they need to get it done the way they work best with minimal input and interference.”

Miranda paused for a moment. “My management philosophy has always been that a good manager isn’t a boss, they’re an assistant. It’s our job to guide and occasionally correct but, for the most part, our job should be to help our people shine by allowing them to play to their strengths.”

“So you’re basically applying a business philosophy to a paramilitary organization,” Felicity bit her bottom lip as she tried to find a flaw in her logic. “I have to say, I actually can see where you’re coming from.”

“Of course you do,” Miranda chuckled. “You’ve already been doing the exact same thing we’re doing here only on a smaller scale; first with Batman and later with Arrow.”

Felicity froze. She couldn’t have stopped the look of surprise that must’ve flashed across her expression if she tried.

“I’m sorry,” Miranda said with a wince. “I shouldn’t have just blundered into it like that but, yes, we do know about your involvement in both men’s missions as well as their identities. We’ve known about Oliver Queen’s role as the Arrow since the first month he returned from the island of Lian Yu and we’ve known about Bruce Wayne for years now.”

Felicity felt a little sick and suddenly the coffee that tasted so wonderful a few minutes ago was slowly inching its way back up her throat. “How?” She choked out, not even bothering to deny it. Everything from Miranda’s mannerisms to her matter of fact speech patterns declared that she wasn’t bluffing or taking a stab in the dark. They had her dead to rights.

“You aren’t the one responsible for the leak,” Miranda said kindly, placing a warm hand briefly on her own before sitting back with a sigh. “We already knew about both men long before you came on the scene. If anything they blew your cover, not the other way around.”

“For which we’re very grateful,” Isabel added dryly. She gave Felicity a level look, “You were good enough that I honestly never even looked twice at you the entire time I was observing Oliver. Until that morning that we came to our ‘understanding’ in Oliver’s office, I had completely overlooked you.”

“So you were spying on Oliver,” she said, pouncing on it.

Isabel shrugged, “Not spying as much as observing,” she corrected her. “We were aware that Starling had a problem and when the Arrow emerged we saw it as an opportunity to make contact but we were worried because of his rising body count and the fact that he seemed to be working through a list of specific targets. It was fairly obvious he was going after anyone connected to the League but to what end we couldn’t fathom.”

“The League?” Felicity repeated slowly. Throwing caution to the wind because, what the hell, if they wanted to kill her they probably would have by now, she asked, “Since we’re on the subject, why is your name listed as being a member of the League of Shadows?”

“So you were spying on Oliver,” she said, pouncing on it.

Isabel shrugged, “Not spying as much as observing,” she corrected her. “We were aware that Starling had a problem and when the Arrow emerged we saw it as an opportunity to make contact but we were worried because of his rising body count and the fact that he seemed to be working through a list of specific targets. It was fairly obvious he was going after anyone connected to the League but to what end we couldn’t fathom.”

“The League?” Felicity repeated slowly. Throwing caution to the wind because, what the hell, if they wanted to kill her they probably would have by now, she asked, “Since we’re on the subject, why is your name listed as being a member of the League of Shadows?”

“So you were spying on Oliver,” she said, pouncing on it.

Isabel shrugged, “Not spying as much as observing,” she corrected her. “We were aware that Starling had a problem and when the Arrow emerged we saw it as an opportunity to make contact but we were worried because of his rising body count and the fact that he seemed to be working through a list of specific targets. It was fairly obvious he was going after anyone connected to the League but to what end we couldn’t fathom.”

“The League?” Felicity repeated slowly. Throwing caution to the wind because, what the hell, if they wanted to kill her they probably would have by now, she asked, “Since we’re on the subject, why is your name listed as being a member of the League of Shadows?”

“You aren’t the one responsible for the leak,” Miranda said kindly, placing a warm hand briefly on her own before sitting back with a sigh. “We already knew about both men long before you came on the scene. If anything they blew your cover, not the other way around.”

“For which we’re very grateful,” Isabel added dryly. She gave Felicity a level look, “You were good enough that I honestly never even looked twice at you the entire time I was observing Oliver. Until that morning that we came to our ‘understanding’ in Oliver’s office, I had completely overlooked you.”

“So you were spying on Oliver,” she said, pouncing on it.

Isabel shrugged, “Not spying as much as observing,” she corrected her. “We were aware that Starling had a problem and when the Arrow emerged we saw it as an opportunity to make contact but we were worried because of his rising body count and the fact that he seemed to be working through a list of specific targets. It was fairly obvious he was going after anyone connected to the League but to what end we couldn’t fathom.”
And in that moment, we both desired the same thing—each other.

 Aren’t you a pretty little bird?

I was just a girl when Robert came to my village in Russia.

He came for business, but he stayed for pleasure. I proved to be of far more value to him than any diamond—his ultimate jewel.

Were it not for his death, we would have built a life together—despite what family trappings lingered here in America.

And so I did what I had to do on my own—to realize our shared vision—for me to rule over Queen Industries.
Chapter Twenty-Five

Felicity sat back into the cushions of the couch and wondered what she should say next. Really what could she say; Isabel just admitted she was a member of the League. That was pretty much game, set, and match; right? She glanced up at both women and made note of the smirk on Isabel’s face and the look of mild irritation on Miranda’s.

“Let me guess; I’m missing some minor little detail, right?” Felicity asked warily.

It was Miranda who spoke, “Isabel is a double agent. She works for us which is why she joined the League; to infiltrate their ranks.”

“Of course she did,” Felicity muttered reaching for her cup again. She looked down at the cold remains and frowned. “Look, I get the feeling that this is going to require some liquid fortification so do you mind if I help myself to another cup?” Miranda nodded and Felicity got up and went over to the sink to rinse out her cup.

She sighed and poured herself another cup then reached in the mini-fridge for a carton of cream. She looked at the box of creamer and shook her head, “You have no idea how much I want to believe you guys right now. Seriously,” she held up the heavy cream before adding some to her cup and sticking it back in the fridge, “I mean, you guys don’t even screw around with 2%, you go full out cream. Somehow a part of me always hoped bad guys would only drink the nasty powdered crap.”
She shrugged and reached for a stirrer, “Not that I haven’t used it myself, it’s just that evil should be all instant flavor crystals and lactose free non-fat powdered milk substitute, not freshly ground and chock full of yummy.” She walked over to the couch and leaned back, sipping her damn fine cup of Joe, and looked at both women carefully, “Please don’t break my heart and tell me that in order to fuel the good fight I have to spend the rest of my life waiting in line at Starbucks.”

Isabel eyed her much in the same way she had in the restaurant, “I can’t decide if I hate you or if I want to take you home with me and spend a great deal of time corrupting you.”

Miranda looked pained for a moment, “Isabel that is highly inappropriate.”

“Yes, it is,” Isabel practically purred as her eyes drifted over her slim figure.

Felicity cleared her throat and fought the urge to cover her vital bits with her hands. “Not to interrupt this moment you’re having, but while you’re busy undressing me with your eyes, would you mind explaining the whole ‘League’ thing and its connection to Stellmoor?”

“What do you know about the League?” Miranda asked.

“Not nearly enough,” Felicity answered honestly.

“Not surprising,” Miranda said. “They live in the shadows, they’re elusive, dangerous, and highly difficult to pin down. Ra’s al Ghul, the leader, is even worse. His core supporters practically worship him as a god, members of the League are indoctrinated into his service like it’s a cult…which, when you get right down to it, is exactly what it is.”

“And the Orbital Organization is targeting him?” Felicity asked.

“Oh yes,” Miranda said grimly, her featured tightening into a mask of anger. “If it’s the last thing I ever do I will see that man dead and scatter his bones to the end of the earth.”

“I appreciate the sentiment but that’s a bit extreme, don’t you think?” She quipped, noting the other woman’s expression. “Unless, of course, this is a personal vendetta.”

stopped—period. This world will not be safe until that man no longer lives.”
“Not to condone assassination but if all it took was a well-placed bullet to take down the League why hasn’t it been done yet?”

Miranda’s lips tilted upwards in a humorless smile, “Lots of reasons; the most pertinent being that he’s virtually immortal.”

Felicity put down her cup carefully and scooted forward, “I’m sorry, did you just say he’s immortal?”

“You’ve been around long enough to have seen things that defy explanation,” Miranda told her. “Aliens, meta-humans, super-soldiers…”

“I’ve…seen a few things,” Felicity hedged.

“Ra’s has access to something he calls the ‘Lazarus Pits’. It’s some kind of natural occurring chemical pool that has remarkable restorative powers. They can heal the sick and dying, restore the dead to life, and even act as a fountain of youth. Ra’s has used the pits for well over seven hundred years, possibly even longer.”

Felicity furrowed her brow skeptically, “And you expect me to believe that?”

“You don’t have to,” Miranda said confidently. “Ask your friend Batman, he’ll tell you the pits are real.”

Felicity looked at her askance, “And you’d be perfectly okay with me telling him that I was here today; even if I reveal everything you’d told me and everything I’ve seen?”

“I’m not going to offer you a cigarette and a firing squad if you turn down the job and, while I’d prefer to keep this confidential, I won’t stop you from telling either the Arrow or Batman what you’ve learned.” She gestured toward Isabel, “Had we thought either of them would be receptive to our offer to work together Isabel would have come forward ages ago.” She eyed Felicity curiously, “Do you think Batman or Arrow would welcome us to the neighborhood with open arms?”

They had her there, she thought disgruntledly. “Why did you infiltrate QC?” She asked Isabel, switching the subject.

“I had my reasons,” Isabel said enigmatically. “It’s a long story, quite involved, but the pertinent facts are these: Merlyn, Robert Queen, Moira Queen—all of them were League or League assets,” Isabel said easily. “Oliver ‘disappeared’ with his father and spent five years on an island that was a League of Assassins training ground. During those five years he was supposedly shipwrecked, we have intel that says he was also working with Bratva in Moscow and with Waller as a ARGUS asset. She may fancy herself a ‘patriot’ but Amanda Waller isn’t above assassination or dancing with the devil if it serves her own ends. He returns to Starling and, right about the same time Merlyn break with the League, the Arrow shows up and begins eliminating members and assets left and right.” She crossed her legs and smirked, “We weren’t sure if he was League, a vigilante, or one of Merlyn’s recruits. When QC got into financial hot water we stepped in with the idea that if he was an asset our financial support would keep him going and if he was a target we could cripple his money flow.”

The revelations about Oliver’s parents and Malcolm Merlyn weren’t all that shocking but the bit about her knowing about Russia and ARGUS was. He didn’t even share that information with them until a little over a year ago and even then it had been like pulling teeth to get him to talk. Even now she was positive he was leaving big chunks of the story in the shadows. He’d never said so but when he gave her the intel he’d gotten from ‘a source’ on Deathstroke a few years back she suspected his ‘source’ was ARGUS, especially when they found out later that he had been recruited as an agent while he was supposedly shipwrecked. The file practically had ‘government issue’ stamped all over it. At first she thought it had been from Lyla but she never asked. She figured he’d had his reasons for keeping it on the down low. Now she had to wonder. As for the story she was weaving it made sense but she wasn’t about to just accept them at their word.

“You had sex with him,” Felicity pointed out. “Was that before or after you knew what side he was on?”

“Does it matter?” Isabel scoffed. “If you must know I was convinced by then that he was a potential asset so I seduced him, or rather I let him seduce me, to see if he would be willing to let down some walls.” She smirked, “He wasn’t, so I decided to continue biding my time. Besides, as long as I’ve been there QC has continued to flourish. As long as Oliver has Arrow business to worry about someone needs to be at the helm.”

“What is the deal between you and Ra’s al Ghul?” Felicity asked turning to Miranda.

“He murdered my family,” Miranda said flatly. “My mother, my sisters, my brother…” she closed her eyes, “even my children.”

She looked at the woman sitting across from her and tried to get a read but her body language was completely closed off. Her tone however; there was some truth there. How much though remained to be seen, “I’m sorry.”

Miranda picked up her cup and took another sip before speaking again. “It wasn’t him personally of course, although it might as well have been. He ordered the murders and that’s good enough as far as I’m concerned.” She put the cup back down on the table, “Everyone comes into this for a reason; there’s a purpose that drives them. I could talk to you until I’m blue in the face about why you should join us but either you will or you won’t. If you want in we’ll be happy to have you. You’ll be doing good work, work you love, and you’ll change lives for the better doing it.”

“Plus, and not to be crass, there is a financial aspect to it as well,” Isabel inserted.

“Financial?” Felicity asked, furrowing her brow.

“You didn’t think we would just expect you to do this for free, did you?” Isabel asked her with glittering eyes.

Yeah, she kind of did.

“You pay your assets and team members?” Felicity asked instead. “Where do...I mean, I get that Stellmoor bankrolls you, but how do you manage to launder enough cash to float this big of an operation without raising flags?”

“Good question,” Miranda said, perking up. “Stellmoor is our main cash source but we do have others. This organization also has ‘legitimate’ business fronts through Stellmoor like restaurants, gyms, various real estate holdings, as well as R&D, but you probably figured that out already so what you’re really asking is are we guns for hire.”

“Are you?” Felicity asked.

“On occasion,” Miranda admitted. “We don’t do wet work or train hitmen here though. Most of our ‘shadow ventures’ involve the government and various private agencies.”

“The government?”
Miranda nodded, “Sometimes borders have to be crossed, deals have to be made, and critical situations crop up that can’t wait for approval by some subcommittee. We can get in and out without the red tape, we can be mobilized faster, and we don’t have to worry about potential political backlash for our actions.”

“You mentioned ARGUS; what’s your connection to them?” Felicity asked them both.

“Amanda Waller and I are old friends,” Isabel said with a slow smile. “Occasionally our paths cross as do our interests.”

“Meaning?”

“Meaning that ARGUS does what we do only not as nicely,” Miranda answered for her. “Still, we try not to burn our bridges and occasionally we do get ‘work’ sent our way through ARGUS but, more often than not, you could consider us competing agencies. Of course, they’re mostly interested in meta-humans and aliens, not vigilantes per se; the Arrow and Batman are more of an annoyance to Waller than anything else. The new vigilante in Metropolis however…”

“He’ll be lucky if she doesn’t stick pieces of him in a jar of formaldehyde and put it on her shelf,” Isabel smirked again.

“And how does the OO feel about enhanced humans?” She needed to know because if they were targeting Oliver they could also be targeting Roy.

“We have several metas as operators,” Miranda answered simply. “Like I said before, we’re equal opportunity.”

“And they’d rather work for us than ARGUS because, whereas we put them up in corporate apartments and safe houses, Amanda prefers prison cells and lab cages,” Isabel added facetiously.

She turned her attention towards Isabel, “You seem to be pretty familiar with how ARGUS operates; is that how you became involved with all of this? Forgive me for saying so Isabel, but you never struck me as a vigilante type.”

Isabel threw her another shark-like grin, “You don’t exactly fit the type either. Are you asking me to recite the epic journey that led me to become the woman I am today?”

Felicity met her hard gaze with one of her own, “Yes.”

Isabel laughed, “Fine by me; I have no secrets.”

“However I doubt that,” Felicity told her, keeping her expression blank.

Isabel looked up at her, her smile growing colder, “I was born in a small village in Siberia; I was a slave,” she said, her eyes locked unflinchingly on Felicity’s. “I worked the diamond mines; we all did. You worked the mines from the time you were old enough to carry a bucket and when you got old enough to capture the eye of whoever was in charge you worked on your back as well. There was no school, no comforts, nothing that wasn’t given to you by the overseers. The work was backbreaking; the conditions deplorable, and the only distraction from the monotony was vodka and sex. Most of the girls in my village were pregnant by the time they were sixteen, full blown alcoholics by the time they were twenty, old by thirty, and dead before they were forty. One day the man who owned the mine came. He was a wealthy American, handsome, powerful; he was also a member of the League of Shadows. I had just turned fifteen years old and was still a virgin when I was given to him as a gift. Most of the other girls in the mines had been passed around the camp from the time they hit puberty so it was just a matter of time before it was my turn. I waited in his bed for him to come at me with his fists and then rape me but he didn’t. He talked to me instead. He asked me about my family, my work, the conditions within the mine. He showed me pictures of his family; his son and daughter. He was quite kind to me. By the time he got around to having sex with me that night, I actually welcomed it.”

Felicity looked away from her, unable to prevent the horror she felt from crossing her expression. Isabel laughed at her, “It wasn’t as bad a fate as most girls from my village had to suffer their first time. Slow seduction on clean sheets and a soft bed is a far better way to lose one’s virginity than shoved against the side of a cart with your clothes torn away and taken from behind while a dozen men watch and wait their turn.” Her eyes glittered like black diamonds; cold and hard. “I was so grateful that I did my best to please him and, in return, when he left the next day he took me with him. When we traveled together I was his ‘ward’ and then, later, his ‘protégé’. He paid for my apartment, my education, opened doors for me and gave me a life I would never have known had I remained in that tiny village. In exchange, whenever he could escape the dreariness of his marriage to his cold society wife, he would find comfort in my bed. He groomed me to be his right hand, taught me to love him in every way he needed, and I, in turn, became everything he needed.”

“Unlike his cold fish of a wife, I indulged his every fantasy; whatever he wanted I gave him. There were no limits between us, no rules for us to follow. He could do whatever he liked and not feel ashamed afterwards. She had barred him from her bed years ago; called him a perversion of manhood and yet kept him trapped in a loveless, sexless marriage. What she denounced in him I celebrated. If he wanted to invite other men or women into our bed, I welcomed it. I did not damn him for his appetites and he, in turn, encouraged me to do the same. I made him feel more alive in our time together than he had ever felt in his entire life, until one day the wife found out about me and suddenly he was gone.”

She dropped her eyes for a moment, real emotion touching her expression for the first time. It was a mixture of pain, bitterness, and deep unrelenting sadness, “He was going to leave her,” she said confidently. “Finally, at last, he was going to be mine and I was going to be his true wife in name as well as spirit. We packed our bags, he’d called his lawyers, and we were going to leave. She’d found out about me, about our life together, and she was issuing threats as a result. She said she’d ruin him, take his company, take his children, but he was with me…until he wasn’t.” Her eyes met Felicity’s again and she could see the anger burning in the dark depths of her stare, “The daughter fell off her horse and broke her arm. She had to be rushed to hospital and he dropped everything to be by her side. I tried to remind him that she wasn’t his true daughter, that his wife had taken another man into her bed and that this child bore his name but not his blood. If he wanted a child I would give him as many as he wanted, but he loved her so he left. Just a few more days, he said. I waited, I went to the office, I went home; no word. A few days later his bitch wife confronted me at the office. She made a scene, fired me, and then had me escorted from the building. I went home and my things had been packed and removed and there were men to see that I was escorted from the property there as well. I was angry, hurt, filled with rage. He didn’t call me, didn’t say goodbye; nothing.” She paused, “For a long time I thought I hated him, but I didn’t. I loved him and he loved me. When he died just a few weeks later it was because he was looking for me, he was coming for me, and his death was her fault. Had she just let him go we could have had the rest of our lives together, but she was selfish and greedy, and could not allow him his happiness. Still, she may have taken him from me but she would never have him. He went back to her but still, he loved me. And it was love, you know,” she said to her. “On the last night he shared my bed; Robert Queen called me his one true wife and meant it.”

Felicity’s jaw dropped and she looked at her in shock, “Oliver’s father?”

Isabel almost looked amused, “Why else do you think I would have saved his company or put up with that bitch, Moira Queen, for as long as I did?”
“Moira…” Felicity frowned as she thought back to everything Oliver had shared with them in regards to the connection between Isabel and Moira. All the insults she’d spat out about Isabel over the years, all the warnings; all vague and bitter but definitely personal. As much as she hated to admit it, what Isabel was saying held within it the ring of truth. Moira was good at keeping secrets and delivering bombshells. In fact, compared to some of the stuff she’d kept from Oliver, this wasn’t even all that shocking. Unfortunately there was no way she could confirm any of it. She couldn’t tell Oliver without revealing where it had come from and she couldn’t exactly call him and ask, ‘Was your dead dad into slavery and keeping underage teenage mistresses while he indulged in bisexual orgies and was one of his playmates Isabel Rochev by any chance?’

Yeah, that would win her a few points, wouldn’t it? Oliver was already pissed at her and the last thing he needed to hear is that his mother had been keeping more secrets than they originally thought.

“She knew you were Robert’s, um,” she tried to come up with a more diplomatic word than ‘mistress’ and failed so she reworded her question, “She knew about your relationship with Robert and yet she didn’t tell Oliver; why?”

“And what would she tell him?” Isabel asked her archly. “That his father wasn’t the respectable family man that he presented to the rest of the world and risk being shamed? Not hardly. It was the same reason she wouldn’t give Robert a divorce. Oh, it was fine for her to share her marriage bed with Malcolm Merlyn and give birth to his daughter but when it came to Robert’s proclivities; varied and adventurous though they may be?” She offered her another cold smile, “No, she preferred to maintain the illusion of respectability even if it was a lie. The night his boat was lost at sea he called me. He told me he was coming to be with me. He told me that he had told her he was leaving and he meant it. He was done with her but he died before we could find each other again. Moira pretended to be the grieving widow but she knew that I knew and, every time she’d cut her eyes at me or utter an insult in my direction, I’d look her in the eye and think of all the times her husband shared my bed, how the last words on his lips were of his love for me. He was more married to me than he was to her, I promise,” She chuckled, “Every time she’d call me an evil whore I’d look her in the eye and think, I may be a whore but I’m the one Robert really loved.”

Holy Susan Lucci, she thought. Tim was right; this whole thing does sound like some kind of superhero soap opera. Next thing you know Oliver’s evil twin brother will show up out of nowhere for Sweeps Week. “So why save QC?” She asked. “Seems to me that after all you’ve been through the last thing you’d want to do is save Moira Queen and her children from financial and personal ruin.”

“I thought about letting it crumble at her feet,” she admitted. “I was still not convinced that she didn’t have something to do with his death. She was League and ruthless; murdering him was not beyond her capabilities.”

Felicity had to admit, she did have a point. “So did she kill him?”

Isabel’s lips quirked upwards, “No, someone else did. She may have contributed to his downfall but I could never prove she had a hand in it; all I ever had was my suspicions but she died before I could prove anything. I take it you have also felt the wrath of the late Mrs. Queen?”

“I wasn’t her favorite person,” Felicity admitted warily. “If Moira didn’t kill him, who did? And why save his company if you thought Moira was a killer?”

“The League killed him,” she told her. “When he left Moira he also left them and you don’t leave the League. As for why I stepped in to save QC, although I still suspected that she was the one to get in contact with them to let them know of his intentions, it was still Robert’s company and I am still Robert Queen’s true widow, whether she liked it or not. Had she not threatened to ruin him and take away his children he would have remained with me for the rest of his life. Robert is the one who first introduced me to the League which allowed me to gain access. When they killed him for betraying his oath, I joined the League and Leviathan to see to it that his death was avenged and attached myself to QC to get the answers I needed to bring his killers to justice. I protected his company, his legacy, his son; you may have thought that I was the villain this entire time, but you were wrong. This whole time I’ve actually been doing the same thing you have; protecting Oliver from himself by protecting Robert’s legacy and seeking justice for the wrongs done to him.”

It made sense. All of it, all the pieces fit together seamlessly. Felicity’s mind swirled dizzingly as she took in everything Isabel had told her. There was a ring of truth in everything she was saying, perhaps not the whole truth, but close. “Say I did agree to work with you; what exactly would you want me to do?” She asked at last.

“What you’re doing right now only on a larger scale,” Miranda said, echoing what Isabel had told her in the restaurant. “We need someone who can lead a team, train new techs, coordinate from a secure location, and anticipate our operator’s needs. In short, we need you.”

“And where would I work? Out there in the control room?”

Miranda smiled, “There, the training area, even the field on occasion if you like. After all, it’s your show.”

“Wait…” She looked from one woman to the other, “What do you mean it’s my show?”

“We want you to run the facility,” Miranda told her.

Felicity felt her jaw drop, “But I thought you did that.”

“This location hasn’t been open long so you’re right, I have, but I’m also the CEO of Stellmoor and I have twelve other facilities besides this one to coordinate with. The OO is a global operation and I have to be on the move constantly.” She sat forward in her chair and laid a hand on top of Felicity’s and squeezed. “I know it seems a bit overwhelming and we weren’t planning on just dumping it on you all at once, I promise. I’m out of the country more often than not these days so I was hoping Isabel could act as your handler and advisor until you feel like you have a handle on everything.”

She glanced up at Isabel then back to her, “I understand you and Isabel have a rough history but I assure you that was more about her maintaining her cover than about you.”

“Don’t lie to her; I’m a bitch,” Isabel said without a hint of shame. “But I get the job done and that’s what counts.”

Miranda shot the other woman a slightly disgruntled look, “Isabel is going to have to return to Starling from time to time but she’ll be back in town at least a few times a month until you’re settled. Until then I’ll continue to run the facility from a distance and delegate.”

Felicity suddenly found herself launching into a rapid fire babble of questions, “When would you need me to start? And what are the hours? Can I have time to think about it first?”

“Slow down,” Miranda said with an amused grin. “First off, take all the time you need although sooner is always better than later. Second, expect the hours to be grueling hence the couch and dorm room set up in the corner.”

“Wait, this would be my office?” Felicity asked wide-eyed.

“Your office and your show,” Miranda nodded.
Felicity sat back on the couch in stunned silence.

“Aren’t you going to even ask about the salary?” Miranda asked her after a few seconds of intense silence.

“Uh, right, salary,” she said forcing herself back into the present. “So, how much?”

Then Miranda named a figure that had little flashing lights bursting behind her eyelids for a few seconds. She had to stop from shaking the ringing from her ears as Miranda continued to speak.

“…of course, that doesn’t include your interest as a shareholder in Stellmoor as well as bonuses and, believe me, you’ll earn them,” Miranda assured her. “This job doesn’t quit at five o’clock or come with weekends off. Of course, there are other perks as well like use of our corporate apartments, private jet, a very generous expense account, a choice of a car service or your own leased vehicle—”

Felicity stopped her, “Wait, back up; I had a mini-fugue after hearing all those zeroes you were throwing my way earlier. You mentioned that I’d be a shareholder?”

“The board is made up of myself, Isabel, and the thirteen directors of our Orbital facilities, one of which we hope will be you,” Miranda explained. “I, of course, maintain a majority shareholder status but you would have a significant voice in how things are run as a voting member of the board.”

“And it wouldn’t just be about our ‘charity’,” Isabel added. “Stellmoor and Orbital also have legitimate business interests that make all this possible like, for example, Queen Consolidated. You could still help Oliver, even if you aren’t acting as his tech or his EA, by being his advocate on the board of directors.”

She was right. If this was the real deal then she could ensure that Stellmoor doesn’t pull its financial assistance until QC could stand on its own and then, when Oliver was ready to buy back the shares, she could help make that possible.

“This…is a lot to take in,” Felicity swallowed. “It’s just so surreal.”

“Take your time,” Miranda urged her. “As long as you need. We don’t need an answer today or even next week. If I were you I’d take at least a few weeks to decide if you’re willing to take this on. If you decide it’s too much but want to contribute then we’d just be happy to have you as support staff.”

“Could I, um, try that first and see how it goes?” Felicity asked tentatively. “I already told my family I was going on a job interview so I could spare a few hours a day getting to know the setup, meeting the people here before I decide on anything permanent.”

Isabel looked to Miranda and the other woman nodded. “We have people set up twenty-four seven so you could start by just taking a shift or two during the week, and if you think it works for you, we’d be happy to welcome you on board.”

“I’m already committed to something right now but I could start next week; would that be acceptable?” She asked.

“Are you sure you don’t want to think about it a bit more first?” Miranda asked her.

“I think I need to see what it is that you do here before I can commit to anything,” Felicity told her, “but yeah, definitely.”

“Next week then,” Miranda agreed. She looked to Isabel, “I have that meeting in Spain; can you move some things around?”

“I’m sure I can arrange that,” Isabel nodded. “Besides, the Wayne Foundation is having a charity gala that week, correct?”

“Saturday,” Felicity nodded.

“Need a plus one?” Isabel asked, that strange fire lighting up her eyes again.

Oh, what the hell? Felicity thought. She needed to keep an eye on her anyway and as long as Isabel was here she wouldn’t be causing potential problems for Oliver. “Sure, I’ll even buy you a corsage. Hope you like orchids.”

“Excellent,” Miranda said getting up from her chair and reaching out to shake her hand. “I have a lunch meeting to get to so I’ll be leaving the two of you here.”

Felicity glanced at her watch and winced, “Yeah, I need to be somewhere myself actually.” If she didn’t get out of here soon and disable that Watchtower alert she’d be dealing with a very pissed off Bat.

“I’ll walk you out,” Miranda told her as they shuffled out of the office. “Are you coming Isabel?”

“I have a few things to get done here first and then I’ll meet you at the restaurant,” she told her. Isabel placed her hand on Felicity’s arm and leaned in slightly, “I look forward to working more closely with you in the future,” she said in a professional tone but the slightly heated look she gave her was anything but.

Two can play that game. “For the record I don’t put out on the first date so watch it or be prepared to spring for lobster first,” Felicity shot back.

“Feisty,” Isabel said appreciatively and sighed, “Oh why couldn’t I have found out you were this much fun ages ago? I’m going to so enjoy getting to know you better. Much better.” She gave her one last look before heading back into the office.

Miranda watched as Isabel flounced off and shook her head as she led Felicity to the elevator. “Isabel is very good at what she does but she can be…”

“Yeah, I worked with her, remember?” Felicity said ruefully. “Eh, at least this time around the sexual harassment isn’t nearly as offensive. Before she accused me of being the office slut, this time around she’s trying to get in my pants. It’s quite refreshing actually.”

“Like I said, the job comes with a few perks,” Miranda joked back.

Miranda offered her a ride but she declined politely. She needed to disable the alarm and she didn’t want to do that under her watchful gaze. Instead she called the cabbie and waited in the guard shack until he arrived so she could do what needed to be done.

“So Missy, do you find what it is you be lookin’ for?” Mr. Mention asked in his strong patois as he pulled up.

She slipped into the back seat and smiled at him through the rearview mirror, “I’m not sure yet but it’s a distinct possibility.”

\****
Felicity gave the cabbie another hefty tip when he dropped her off at the WayneTech building and he, in turn, told her that he had a regular DJ gig spinning at the Irie Club located in Little Jamaica in the Lower East Side, one of the many ethnic enclaves in Gotham. He told her to drop the name ‘Mr. Mention’ at the door and flash his card to the bouncer and they would let her in with no problems.

Waving goodbye she walked into the building, her step a bit lighter even if her thoughts were more than a bit tumultuous. A large part of her wanted to pack it up and go running back to Oliver and Diggle and hide in the basement again but the rest of her knew this was her chance to actually do something real for once and she wasn’t going to blow it. She didn’t believe for a second that the OO was as above board as they seemed. Something was off there but she couldn’t put her finger on it. Maybe it was the fact that the job and everything attached to it came gift wrapped with a big old bow on top.

She could do the job, she had no doubts about that. The last couple of years in particular had changed her. When Sara returned from the ‘dead’, Felicity had been…not jealous exactly, it was more like she felt displaced. After she took a bullet for her, Sara, in gratitude, took her under her wing and began to bond with her. She trained her, convinced Diggle to do the same, and taught her the value of becoming self-empowered.

Sara.

She had to confront that issue and soon. Oliver wouldn’t do it; he was even better at running away from his emotions than she was. Felicity had a lot of mixed feelings about the other woman. On one hand, she was her friend and mentor. Sara was one of only three women she trusted implicitly (the other two being Tam and Barbara), so the idea that she could have exposed them was a particularly painful possibility. On the other hand she felt immense guilt for sleeping with Oliver knowing how the two of them felt about one another. Even though Oliver had acted like a complete utter asshole the last time they spoke and their one and done was probably all they’d ever have, she owed Sara an explanation. Yes, both of them claimed to be ‘sex friends’ and that they didn’t need monogamy to love one another but she also knew that they were so much alike it was ridiculous. If there wasn’t so much ‘bad road’ between them (to quote Oliver) they could be epic, but it just wasn’t in the cards for them right now. Sara was a free-spirit and she needed to roam and Oliver was stuck in one place, both mentally and emotionally.

She thought about her conversation with Oliver again. As hurt as she had felt at the time she knew he was just lashing out and that he didn’t mean any of it. Oh, he was definitely pissed, but she knew it was less about her keeping the contract a secret and more about the fact that she was again in the line of fire. Ever since Slade came back into their lives six months ago their relationship had changed. He was pushing her away because that’s what Oliver did when he got scared. This time though, this time was different. This time there had been a note of finality to his tone. What that meant for them she didn’t know, but right now all she could do was deal with Leviathan, or the OO or whatever they called themselves, and figure out what was really going on. Until then the question of whether or not she could ever go home again, much less what her relationship would be with Oliver once she got there, was moot.

She walked up to the reception desk and told them who she was and that she was expected. The receptionist made a phone call and confirmed her appointment then handed her a visitor’s badge.
When she emerged from the elevator Bruce was there to greet her, his dark blue eyes running over her figure and the fake playboy smile firmly in place.

She looked around to make sure they were alone before speaking, “You know, you look creepy when you do that.”

“Do what?” He asked with a frown, the fake smile immediately disappearing.

“The whole ‘fake Bruce Wayne face’,” she told him. “It messes with my digestion so knock it off.” His eyes narrowed and his features darkened with annoyance, “Better.”

He rolled his eyes, “Let’s go, I do have more important things to do than take you tech shopping.”

“Then go do them,” she told him easily. “You’re probably more of a hindrance than a help anyway. I can scrounge for computer parts on my own, you know?”

“Not a chance,” Bruce said dryly. “Giving you free reign in a tech lab is like giving a kid the keys to the candy shop.”

“Yeah, well, it’s for your ‘candy store’ so why you’re complaining I have no idea,” Felicity said smartly.

He led her into a large open lab space on the top floor where a tall thin man was hunched over a table full of components with a pair of microscopic lenses on his face. He looked up, the visor making his eyes almost comically large, “Mr. Wayne! Hello, hello! And who is this?” He asked, removing the headgear.

Bruce pasted on his polite but fake smile again and placed his hand on the center of her back as he led her up to the man in the lab coat. “Felicity Fox, I’d like to introduce Dr. Greg Snyder, head of our experimental division here at WayneTech.”

“Or, as I like to call it, the Booby Hatch,” Dr. Snyder said with a smile as he extended his hand to her. “Ms. Fox,” the doctor said suavely as he took her hand, kissing the back of it in a gallant gesture as he wiggled his eyebrows in a frankly hysterical expression.

Felicity couldn’t help but laugh. Dr. Snyder was a relatively young man, no more than 35 or so with a lantern jaw, permanent grin, and reddish chestnut hair that seemed to curl in every direction. The sparkle in his green eyes paired with his neatly trimmed goatee made him look like a cross between a pirate and a leprechaun. “Call me Felicity,” she told him, immediately falling into instant like with the man.

“And you can call me Greg,” he told her with a flirtatious grin. At Bruce’s dark look Greg reluctantly released her hand and took a step back. “Wait, you’re Lucius’s daughter, right? You wrote that article on AI Decryption Applications that was published a few years back in Scientific American.” His smile, if possible, grew even brighter. “I’m a huge fan!”

Felicity blushed delicately, “Thank you, I appreciate that. It’s actually been a while since anyone mentioned that article. I only published the one.”

“It was revolutionary!” Greg gushed. “Where are you now? Back at MIT teaching? Research?”

Anxiety suddenly stabbed through her, “No, I’m not really doing much of anything at the moment. Just…freelancing, I suppose.” This was what she hated most about her new life as a vigilante sidekick; how to explain to another professional in the hard sciences that you deliberately tanked a promising career to become a secretary.
Instead of looking chagrined or judgmental, Greg immediately turned an eager eye toward Bruce, “Perhaps Mr. Wayne could find a place for you here then? We could use a programmer of your amazing intellect and skills in the experimental division.”

Bruce looked down at her with a curious lift of his eyebrow, “I’ve suggested that several times but she keeps turning me down. Perhaps you’ll have better luck convincing her than I have.”

“Dr. Fox—Felicity, perhaps if I showed you some of what we’re working on you might be kind enough to offer some input,” Greg said excitedly as he gave her a quick tour of the lab.

As Dr. Snyder showed her around his lab she marveled at his inventiveness and sheer genius that fell somewhere between revolutionary upstart and mad scientist. As he gave her a tour of the place she discovered that only about 5% of the tech and software applications his division developed were ever put in production but those that were put WayneTech on the map as the premier Tech Industry Giant. As she looked through his previous ‘experiments’ she couldn’t help but shooting a look towards Bruce. Whether the man realized it or not he was Batman’s personal pet scientist. She recognized many of the Bat’s gizmos as belonging to Greg Snyder and, of course, her father. One in particular caught her eye and she couldn’t help but point it out, “This looks rather familiar.” She pointed to the image of a more angular and camouflaged tumbler on the computer screen.

“Yes, well, um…” Greg glanced over at Bruce nervously before continuing. “That project was scrapped several years ago. The military felt it wasn’t very cost effective.”

“Hmm,” Felicity said non-committedly. If she was reading his body language correctly then Greg Snyder either strongly suspected Bruce of being the Bat or thought he was funding him. In any case, he wasn’t saying anything which gave her the impression that he was either very loyal or he just liked the idea of his inventions being used by someone who was, in turn, protecting the city.

They spent an hour looking around and touring the facility during which Felicity gave Greg a ‘shopping list’ of components she needed and that Bruce would have delivered to his private ‘lab space’.

As they were about to leave, Greg took her hand in his and told her, “I sincerely hope you take Mr. Wayne up on his offer, Felicity. Not only would you be given the chance to work on whatever you like here but you’d also have me as a lab partner,” he said, giving her another beaming grin. “Now how can you possibly turn all that down?”

She chuckled, “As tempting as that is Greg, I’m afraid I already have another offer I’m considering right now, but thanks.”

“What?” Bruce said, looking at her and scowling darkly.

Shit, Felicity thought silently as she caught the look on his face. Great, there goes my blabber mouth again.

“Greg, if you’ll excuse us Felicity and I have a meeting we’re running late for,” Bruce said smoothly as he took her by the arm and led her out of the lab doors toward the elevator.

“Bye,” Felicity said, turning back towards the other man as Bruce practically dragged her away. “That was kind of rude,” she told him as he pulled her onto the elevator and pressed the button to the executive floor.

“He’ll get over it,” he said darkly. “What did you mean by that remark back there?”

“What remark?” She asked innocently. He gave her his best ‘I am not amused’ look and she sighed, “I got a pretty tempting offer today that I’m seriously considering.”

As the doors opened he took her by the elbow again and led her towards his office.

“I can walk without being dragged around by my arm, you know,” she said quietly, pulling her elbow from his grip.

He stopped and smiled for the group of people who were passing them before leaning in and speaking into her ear, “In my office; now.”

“Fine,” Felicity grumbled as she followed him but still kept a slight distance so he couldn’t latch back onto her elbow.

Because Bruce rarely used his office he didn’t have a permanent secretary on staff. Ms. Wells, his Vice President of Finance and his most trusted employee at WE besides Lucius, usually had one of her EA’s handle most of his workload at Wayne Enterprises unless she needed her elsewhere. He quickly swiped the door with his ID badge and led her past the reception area into his darkened office. As soon as they entered the lights came up illuminating the space.

She looked around the large space and the sweeping views of the Gotham skyline admiringly. WayneTech was one of the tallest buildings in Gotham, dwarfed only by Wayne Towers and, of course, The Wayne Foundation Building so the view was, simply stated, breathtaking. “You know, it’s a shame you don’t use this office more often. It’s a waste of a perfectly good view.”

“Cut the crap, Felicity,” Bruce told her walking around and forcing her to meet him face to face. “Did you really get another job offer today?”

“I told you I was going for interviews,” she reminded him.

“I didn’t think you were serious about that,” he practically growled.

“Why would I make that up?” She asked incredulously.

“What’s the offer and who’s it from; which company?” He demanded. “And don’t say LexCorp because there is no way in hell you’re taking a job there.”

“Excuse me?” Felicity said, taken aback. “Who the hell are you to tell me who I can and can’t work for?”

“So it is LexCorp?” Bruce asked, looming above her. “And just how do you think it will look to have the daughter of Wayne Enterprise’s CEO working for their biggest competitor?”

“First off, it isn’t LexCorp,” she told him, taking off her coat and draping it over one of the chairs in front of the large desk as it was a bit warm and her anger wasn’t helping matters any. “Secondly, if my dad has a problem with my working for another company he should be the one to tell me, not you. And third, even if it were LexCorp it wouldn’t be any of your damn business.”

“And how do you figure that?” Bruce asked, intruding on her personal space.

“Because, last I looked, I didn’t have your name stamped on my ass,” she told him bluntly.

“How much?” Bruce asked her, his lips tightened in a grim line.

Felicity blinked, “Excuse me?”

“How much are they offering?” He demanded.
Her first instinct was to tell him to fuck off but then she thought ‘what the hell?’ ”Seven figures plus perks, stock options, and a voting seat on the board.”

He looked at her in irritation, “Seriously, how much?”

She smiled slowly, “I am being serious.”

His eyes narrowed on her and he shook his head in disbelief, “Bullshit.”

“Not bullshit,” she told him as she leaned her hip against his desk and crossed her arms in front of her chest. “And the first digit on that salary isn’t a one either. We’re talking high seven figures.”

“And let me guess, Ed McMahon is planning on delivering you your first paycheck personally?” Bruce said sarcastically.

“Ed McMahon has been dead a while now, Bruce,” she pointed out. “You’re kind of dating yourself with those antique pop culture references.”

“And your last job was working as Oliver Queen’s executive assistant,” he pointed out in the same tone. “What exactly do they want you to do that would warrant that kind of money?”

“They want me to be the director; run the entire facility,” she told him.

“Based on what qualifications?”

“I don’t know, Bruce; maybe they just liked my outfit,” she said, starting to get pissed.

His eyes ran down her trim figure in the body hugging dress and tailored jacket. “It’s a nice dress but it’s not worth seven figures,” he said dismissively.

“I was one of the youngest doctoral candidates in MIT history,” she pointed out. “Also, if you’ll recall, both you and Oliver seem to think my skillset is pretty invaluable yourselves.”

“MIT was almost six years ago and the only ‘skillsets’ you have on paper is a stint as an IT manager at QC and a couple of years as someone’s gatekeeper; who exactly is offering you that kind of money and why?”

“I’m not having this discussion with you,” Felicity said, completely fed up at that point. “Look, chances are I’m taking the job so I’ll happily stay long enough to upgrade Watchtower for you but that’s it. You can call the decorator and let them know I won’t be taking the penthouse after all.” She reached for her coat but before her fingers touched the cloth he reached out and spun her around, pulling her into his chest as he gripped her elbows tightly.

“No,” he said looking down on her. “We had a deal.”

“We did,” she agreed, not flinching from his hard gaze. “And I told you up front that I was looking at different job offers and that if I took one that I wouldn’t be able to help you.”

“What company?” Bruce demanded. “Because Wayne and LexCorp are the only major players in town and no one else has the kind of deep pockets you’re describing. We bought up Holt and Kord years ago and if you’re lying and Luthor is the one offering you that deal then I guarantee you he’s not interested in your doctorate from MIT.”

“What’s that supposed to mean?” Felicity asked, trying to pull away from his grip and failing.

He stepped closer until she was pressed against the desk, the entire concept of personal space completely forsaken, “Meaning that someone is using you to get to me.”

She chuckled humorlessly, “God, do you ever listen to yourself? Believe it or not some people actually see me as more than just Lucius’s daughter or your occasional booty call.” She shot him a ‘go to hell’ look and tried to pull away again, “Let me go.”

“No,” he growled his gaze dark and heated.

“Goddamn it, Bruce!” She snapped and the next thing she knew his mouth was on hers in a punishing kiss that had her toes curling and her brain going offline for the duration.
Chapter Twenty-Six
Chapter Twenty-Six

Bruce’s arms wrapped around her tightly as his lips slanted over hers. She whimpered under his passionate assault as his tongue traced the seam of her lips and she opened to him involuntarily. He plunged inside, tasting and caressing her, his hands slipping down to her thighs. He lifted her effortlessly and placed her on his desk as he moved between her legs, his hands pushing her hemline up so that they were no longer constrained by the tight material.

His mouth left hers and found her earlobe, biting and teasing the flesh with his tongue and causing her to shudder and moan before she could stop herself.

Damn it, whispered the last bit of sanity left in her quickly melting brain, I should have worn ear muffs or some kind of protective head gear.

As his lips moved down to kiss and taste the curve of her neck his fingers quickly undid the buttons on her jacket and slipped it off her shoulders before undoing his own and allowing it to fall on the floor. He nipped at the hollow of her throat and all conscious thought left her as their mouths met again in a heated kiss.

Her fingers began to tug and pull at his tie and undo the buttons of his shirt until they met the bare skin of his chest. He, in turn, eased the zipper down her back and was pulling away so he could slip it off her shoulders. As soon as her bra was exposed to his gaze he crouched down to cup one satin encased breast with his hand while his teeth began to nibble and tease the other through the material. Her head fell back and she carded his thick inky black hair through her fingers as she felt the heat of her want flow and pulse through her center. His mouth left her chest and traveled upwards, his tongue and lips stroking the flesh of her throat before capturing her mouth in another kiss.

Part of her brain acknowledged the fact that his hands had left her to undo the clasp of his belt and trousers then reach behind her to unsnap her bra, allowing it to join the other clothes on the floor. He removed her glasses, dropping them with a clatter onto his desk. That woke her up.

“Wait,” she said breathlessly. “We shouldn’t—“

He kissed her again, cutting off her protests. He placed her arms around his neck, lifting her slightly as he reached under her dress and grasped the tops of her pantyhose and underwear, pulling them down her legs. “We should,” he said, placing her back on the desk then removing them and her shoes quickly. “And we will.” He tugged his shirt completely off and pulled down his underwear and trousers before tugging her toward him, capturing her lips again, and entered her in one smooth move.

She cried out at the unexpected invasion. His mouth caught her moans and whimpers as his tongue swept across hers and he pulled her to the very edge of the desk as he pushed inside in a rhythm as ancient as time itself. Her legs locked around his hips as his hand palmed her breast and his thumb teased at her nipple. As good as it was, there was something missing. She whimpered in need against his mouth as she sought more friction but their angle was off. She moved to reach between them, seeking to give herself the relief she needed, but he caught her hand as it left his neck. “Bruce, please,” she pleaded against his mouth.

Bruce pulled away from the kiss, his eyes sweeping over her before looking around the room. His eyes lit up then and he pulled away from her, silencing her protests with a quick kiss before kicking away his pants then pulling her dress over her head, leaving her completely exposed, and then lifted her off the desk. Her arms and legs wrapped around him as he walked them over to the banks of floor to ceiling windows with the view that she had been admiring just a few moments before. Felicity gasped in shock as he pressed her back against the icy cold glass and entered her again, thrusting deep inside, his mouth sucking and biting at her throat as her head fell against the window.

There was something so incredibly erotic about being pressed against the cold, cold glass that added to everything she was feeling. Her head swam and she felt powerful yet so out of control, she wanted to scream and say filthy things that she would never say in a million years because she didn’t feel like Felicity at that moment. She was someone else, someone amazing, and he was thrusting inside of her as she clawed at his back, her teeth scraping against his shoulder like an animal. It had never felt like this between them before and, as though he could hear her thoughts, he groaned then thrust deeper, harder. He took her mouth again and whispered against her lips, “Mine, Baby, you’re mine. You’ll always be mine…”

Every other time he’d taken her they’d been so hidden, so removed from the real world, but this was different. This was primal, forbidden, and raw; he wasn’t making love to her, he was claiming her.

The sensations flowed over her and through her at the same time; the icy cold of the window and the heat of his body all around her, the power of his muscles bunching under her fingers as he held her, and the feeling of being so exposed as he slipped in and out of her, their bodies making wet slapping noises that were almost obscenely loud in the silence of the office.

This was her doing this, she thought as she arched her back away from him so he could capture her nipple with his mouth. She was powerful; a goddess made flesh. He was making love to her and she was making him moan and whisper words of erotic symmetry as he worked his way deeper and deeper inside of her. She tightened her legs around his hips and ground her sex into him as he made a low animalistic sound and bit her nipple a little too hard, the slight pain causing her to gasp only to then moan in pleasure as he soothed her with his tongue.

Logically, in the tiny part of her brain not completely occupied with what was happening to her, she knew that the glass was mirrored and no one could actually see anything. At best, all anyone would be able to see was their faint outline and probably not even that at their height but she could see the entire city of Gotham as he pounded inside of her. An exhibitionist thrill ran through her causing her channel to clench around him. He hit something inside of her, some secret place deep within that sent pleasure zinging through her spine. Her juices began to flow and she felt her thighs go wet as she dripped around him but she felt no shame or embarrassment, only the overwhelming need to have more of him.

“God, I can feel you…” he groaned then scraped his teeth against her neck. “You’re so wet for me, Baby…”

Her mouth opened and formed the words, “More, more, more, more…”

He groaned again, as her fingers dug even deeper into his back. He growled a filthy curse of erotic intent which she began to repeat over and over like a mantra; words that had never come out of her before.

She couldn’t even tell what she was saying, her own words streaming out of her as though she were speaking in tongues but obviously he was paying attention as her erotic babble seemed to spur him on, causing him to let loose with a primal sound and pound even harder against her.

Outside the doors to his office and across the open expanse into the other buildings around them men and women went along with their workday, below them cars clogged the streets and pedestrians hurried along the crowded sidewalks, the images distorting as the steam rose from their warm flesh heating up the glass. It was like they were all watching her, watching them, and she cried out, sobbing in ecstasy as his teeth found her neck again and bit down.
He shifted his angle slightly and she felt a spike of pleasure as he pounded into her g-spot. She moaned and shivered; he shut his eyes tight then took her mouth in another kiss that she could feel down to her bones. He broke away from the kiss and buried his head in her neck, hitching her higher up as he uttered another muffled, “Fuck!”

Something about him saying that word in that tone of voice just did it for her. With a loud cry she came, her entire body tight and quivering as he drove into her like a man possessed. Within seconds of her climax he came with a roar as though her orgasm was the trigger he had been waiting for. She clutched her arms against him tight as he leaned into her, both his hands slapping flat against the glass, his body shuddering into her own.

He dropped his mouth to her shoulder in an open-mouthed kiss as he carried her over to the long leather couch on the other end of the room and laid her down. He knelt beside her on the couch, his eyes seeking hers as he reached out to stroke her cheek softly, his expression shifting from darkness to light. He kissed her again then got up to pad nakedly into his private washroom. As she watched him walk away, admiring the play of muscles across his broad shoulders that were marked by the fine pink lines of shallow scratches she had left behind (not to mention his frankly magnificent ass), she had to stop herself from laughing out loud at the sight of his black sock covered feet. Bruce Wayne might be able to strip a woman faster and with more skill than any other man she’d ever heard of but even he couldn’t do it all.

She heard the sound of water and a few seconds later Bruce emerged with a towel and a damp washcloth in hand. He knelt down beside her and quickly cleaned her thighs and genitals gently and with no hint of embarrassment. He then handed her the towel and she sat up, wrapping it around her nakedness, the room she had once thought of as warm now much chillier given her lack of clothing.

He sat beside her and pulled her into his arms, his hands rubbing warmth into her chilled flesh, “What are we doing?” He said out loud, his chin propped on top of her head as she buried her face in his chest soaking up his heat. Whether he was asking her or himself she didn’t know.

She shut her eyes, preparing for what was coming next. She didn’t bother with the usual self-reprisals or panicky revelations. They had sex, it felt good, she was a willing participant, and she was so over post-coital drama it wasn’t even funny.

She waited for the next volley of words to come but they never did. He stayed silent, his fingers trailing up and down her spine as he breathed her in deeply, his eyes closed and his heart beat slowing. She could hear the whooshing sound of his blood pumping inside of his chest and closed her eyes even tighter so she could keep this moment forever. It would be her new memory and it would have to sustain her for a long time to come.

Her fingers pressed against the hard flesh of his chest, the delicate pads tracing the faint outlines of scars from countless battles fought and won trailing lightly across a flat brown nipple that was hard from cold and across his flat, muscled abdomen to rest upon his thigh. She tilted her head slightly, her lips just touching the hollow of his throat as she breathed in his smell. It was heady and deep, spice and clean sweat. There was the acrid scent of sex in the air and it warred with the other smells within the room; leather, furniture oil, and just a hint of dust and damp as the rugs were probably in need of a cleaning.

As much as she wanted to stay within his arms and pretend, just for a moment, that she would be safe there, that this moment was real and could last, she also knew all good things must end. She allowed herself a few more seconds of his warmth in the silent stillness then got up without speaking and walked into the washroom, immediately hanging the towel on the hook and stepping inside his shower. She let the warm water pound against her chest as she reached behind her and twisted her hair up, relocating a bobby pin to try to keep her hair as dry as possible. Bruce climbed into the shower behind her, washcloth in hand as he reached for the soap and turned her toward him. Her eyes met his. His expression was intense, focused entirely upon her, and she felt almost mesmerized by those dark blue orbs.

He began to bathe her, his eyes tracing the path of the soapy cloth down her throat, across her breasts, then between her legs. As he cleaned her gently his lips found hers, kissing her deeply, the heat of his mouth rivaling the steam of the shower. The washcloth fell to the floor and then it was just his fingers touching and stroking the folds of her sex. She gasped against him as two of his fingers entered her in a ‘come hither’ motion that had her squirming and moaning within seconds. She felt his cock begin to stir again as he pressed against her.

He pushed her backwards gently until her back was against the marble wall of the shower then dropped to his knees, pulling her hips toward him as he kissed her pubic mound. His tongue eased between her folds, causing her to gasp and clutch at his shoulders for balance. He used his hands to urge her to open her thighs and widen her stance and then inserted his fingers inside of her again as he licked and sucked at her clit.

It was almost too much. The heat of the shower became almost stifling as she fought to get air in her lungs. As good as it felt she couldn’t take any more and she pulled at him, urging him back to his feet before claiming his mouth with her own. She could taste her faint musk on his lips, smell the clean spicy scent of the soap he had used on both of them, and dropped her hand to stroke the hard flesh poking into her abdomen.

He turned her around, her back to him. He ran his large hand down her back and she arched into his touch as he stroked up and down, his thumbs massaging and caressing her skin, before placing her hands on the wall of the shower until she was leaning against it. He pulled the tie and pins from her hair and ran his fingers through the tangled and curled mass, the water pounding over both of them.
He turned another tap and the water began to flow from multiple shower heads, the steam of the blessedly hot water rising between them. He reached for the soap and rubbed his long, thick fingers over it, creating a thick rich foam. He ran his soapy hands over the back of her neck causing her to shiver then across her shoulder blades and down her spine. She felt as his hands encircled her waist and he pulled her bottom against his groin. He was hard, so hard, and she leaned into him in anticipation.

They didn’t say anything, they didn’t have to. There wasn’t much left to say. He adjusted himself against her, then entered her once more. The sting of his penetration was sharp as her sex was still swollen from his earlier intrusion but it was a good pain. She rose up on her tiptoes to improve the angle as he moved inside of her even deeper than before. It was good, almost better than it had been against the glass. She opened her mouth and began to pant, the water running over her lips and face as his large hands pulled her hair slightly, the sensation adding to the exquisite agony between her thighs. She heard his own low moan as he was squeezed by her tight passage and rocked his hips against her harder.

His fingers dug into her hip and her toes ached but it felt so good. His hand left her hair to run down her back, tracing her spine, before sliding over her waist then up to capture her breast. He pulled and pinched her nipple until her knees began to shake then he abandoned her breast to slide down her stomach until his fingers slipped between her legs. She felt him stroke her to the same rhythm of their lovemaking and she came loudly, unable to stop herself or muffle the sound. As she came both of his hands encircled her waist and he pulled her into him with a hard jerk, the rough motion causing her breath to stutter as he thrust inside of her even harder. By the time he came she was well on her way to another orgasm, their cries mingling in the small space like a cacophony of ecstasy.
She straightened, leaning hard against his heaving chest as he slipped out of her, feeling both tired and strangely energized by the whole experience. Her lips curled into a satisfied smile as she felt his heart beat out a manic tattoo against her back. He turned her toward him and kissed her deeply, her arms wrapping around his neck as her fingers ran through his slick wet hair.

Without speaking he pulled away and turned her into the spray as he reached for the shampoo on the shelf, his fingers sliding in and out of her hair gently as she allowed him to administer to her. It felt so good, almost better than the sex. His fingers scraped and pulled at her scalp gently before rinsing out her hair and combing through the tangles.

“I always loved your hair,” he said in a near whisper as he pulled her back against his chest. He dropped a kiss on her shoulder before reaching down for the washcloth at their feet.

He handed her the washcloth and she bathed his fluids from her body as he soaped and scrubbed himself before they exited the shower together. He handed her the large fluffy white towel she had hung on the hook earlier before wrapping one around his own hips. She tucked it around her body and glanced at her reflection in the mirror with an inward groan.

The herbs had done their job and the bruises she’d received in Starling were all but gone. The only one left was a faint shadow on her collarbone that would probably be completely gone within another day or two. Even so, with her makeup washed away, the flesh of her throat pink and slightly irritated from the bites and sucking kisses of their making, and her hair a tangled wet mess against her shoulders, she looked less like the confident professional that had left her dad’s apartment that morning and more like a drowned cat.

She left the bathroom to retrieve her purse and returned with it, placing it on the counter top as she pulled out what few cosmetics she had taken with her that morning. She snatched another towel off the shelf and scrubbed her hair vigorously before glancing at Bruce’s reflection in the mirror. “You wouldn’t happen to have a hair dryer, would you?”

He nodded and reached into the drawer under the sink for the small compact hair dryer. “Here,” he said handing it to her, watching as she plugged it in and ran her fingers through her loose curls as she moved the hair drier over her scalp.

After running a comb through his own hair he went back into the office to retrieve their clothes, returning fully dressed with only his tie hanging loose around his neck and his jacket still in the other room as he placed her clothing on the counter next to her. He stood in silent vigil as she brushed her hair into a gleaming golden cloud then applied her mascara and lipstick. As she reached for her underwear he stopped her by tracing a faint scar on her shoulder. “What’s this?”

The herbs she had taken after her run-in with the Clock King had healed the wound so well that the scar was barely visible to most people but, then again, Bruce wasn’t ‘most people’. She was only surprised that he hadn’t noticed it before now.

She stopped, watching his reflection carefully in the mirror, “What does it look like?”

“It looks like a scar; one I don’t remember ever seeing before,” he said gazing intently at it then focused his eyes on the entry wound reflected in the mirror. “Small caliber bullet wound; through and through.” It wasn’t a question. “When did you get shot?”

“A while back,” she said evasively as she pulled on her panties then tugged off the towel so she could put on her bra.

His face darkened in anger and his jaw clenched, “And how long ago is ‘a while back’? Six months ago?"

Her heart stopped beating for a second but she tried to play it off, “No, it was over a year ago, almost two,” she said off-handedly as she walked over to the toilet and put down the lid so she could pull on her stockings while putting some distance between them. “What made you think it happened six months ago?”

He followed her, watching her with his hawk-like gaze. “Something Queen said. What did happen to you six months ago?”

She shrugged and looked up at him, schooling her features into an expression of blithe sincerity, “Nothing much. We caught a hard case and the team took a few lumps but I stayed out of the line of fire. Why? What did Oliver say exactly?”

He ignored her question, “Lucius never mentioned that you were in the hospital recovering from a bullet to the shoulder and if he knew you had been hurt he would have told me. He would have rushed down there the first chance he got, in fact.”

“He didn’t know about it because I didn’t tell anyone and I didn’t go to the hospital,” she said standing up and tugging the pantyhose the rest of the way up. There really was no elegant way to put pantyhose on, she thought disgustedly.

“What the hell do you mean you didn’t go to the hospital?” He asked angrily, trailing her as she pulled her dress over her head and pulled her hair out of the neckline.

“Like you go to the hospital every time you get shot?” She snorted, turning her back to him. “Zip me up.”

As if he was working on autopilot he did as she asked even though he was still in full rant mode.
“There’s a difference Felicity and you know it!” He told her before spinning her around to face him.
“Who shot you? Give me their name!”

She scowled at him and shrugged off his grip before answering, “William Tockman; he called himself the Clock King. He was a master hacker we—meaning I—went up against and put away twice.” She leaned against the counter and tilted her head up at his scowling face, “If you insist on going all revenge-y over it though, I should warn you that he has a bad habit of escaping from prison. He disappeared from lock up several months ago and if I can’t find him then I know you can’t either.”

“We’ll see,” he said grimly in a way that translated to the fact that, yes, he would be going all revenge-y and the Clock King would not be getting out of prison a third time. “So not only did he fail to see to it that this ‘Tockman’ was kept in a secure facility, but Queen also let you get shot?”

“He didn’t let me do anything,” she told him. “Also, for the record, Tockman wasn’t aiming for me; I got in the way of the bullet when he was trying to shoot someone else.”

Bruce’s expression twisted into a furious look of rage, “You took a bullet for Queen?”

“Not for Oliver, for someone else,” she sighed, walking around him into the office.

“Why didn’t he take you to the hospital afterwards?” He demanded as he continued to chase after her.

“He offered and I refused.”
“Why the hell would you do that?” He demanded angrily. “Do you know how dangerous a bullet to the shoulder can be? This isn’t the goddamn movies, Felicity! People don’t just jump up after getting a bullet to the fucking shoulder!”

“Well, I did,” she told him with an edge of irritation. “It was no big deal and I had not one, but two, field medics who saw to my injuries right then and there.”

“No big deal? No big deal?! Why would you do something that stupid?” He demanded. “Any bullet, even a .22, can kill you, Felicity! Shoulder wounds kill people every day! You have the brachial artery, the subclavian artery, not to mention blood clots, infection--!”

“Look, if you want the full ballistics report it was a .22 caliber bullet with a Teflon jacket fired at midrange and the wound was a through and through. It didn’t hit any bones or arteries and, as you could see, it was high up in the shoulder just short of being a graze. The bullet didn’t even deform on impact because I was standing in the sweet spot and had on a heavy leather jacket when it hit so the bullet was significantly slowed with a very small exit wound. There was little tissue damage and no burns. A friend of mine stitched me up right there in the Lair.” She sighed and looked up at him, “They gave me some oxy and some herbs, I took the weekend to rest up with a pint of ice cream and a heating pad, and I was back at my desk on Monday,” she shrugged on her jacket before reaching for her coat and pulling that on as well. She picked up her glasses and examined them carefully before putting them on. Swear to God, if he broke her glasses she would have been pissed. She’d already broken her back ups and getting a last minute emergency appointment to the ophthalmologist was a pain in the ass. The last time she broke her glasses she’d had to hack their computer system to avoid a three week long wait.

“I just…” he tightened his jaw in anger. “There are no words to describe just how completely pissed off I am right now.”

“Get over it, Bruce; it was almost two years ago!” She buttoned her coat and tied her scarf around her neck, “And for your information, I happen to be pretty proud of that scar. I got it saving my friend’s life, not to mention the fact that I not only stopped the bad guy but I prevented him from causing a gas explosion that would have taken out three city blocks and I did it mostly on my own.
Besides, I do a lot of stupid stuff, or have you already forgotten about the sex we just had all over your office?”

“I haven’t forgotten. Believe me, every second of it is burned in my brain,” he told her as he looked her in the eye. “It’s just one of many reasons I’m--,” His mouth tightened into a grimace as his hands encircled her waist, “Where is this going, Felicity? And what’s going on with you? You’re not thinking clearly, you’re being evasive; and now I find out that while you were in Starling, Queen allowed you to nearly get yourself killed and you act as though it’s no big deal! You got shot!
Someone shot you and you didn’t even call your family to let them know? Had I heard that you were hurt…” He shut his eyes, his jaw clenching as he gnashed his teeth together. “Not only that, but Queen didn’t even care enough about you to see that you got medical attention.”

She started to object but he pinned her with a steely gaze and shook his head, “Back alley stitches in a basement chased by a couple of Oxycodeone and some homeopathic bullshit is not medical attention!” He dropped his hands from her waist and plunged his fingers through the still slightly damp hair that fell over his forehead as he ran his other hand over his mouth turning away from her for a moment before suddenly swinging back around, his anger building by the second. “You need to wake up and start paying attention! I don’t know what the hell Queen was thinking or how the he runs his team but, believe you me, the next time I see him I’m going to ram my fist down his goddamn throat!” By now a vein was throbbing in his temple, his face dark mask of rage, “This life isn’t a game; I don’t do what I do because it’s fun and you…I’m worried about you and…Damn it Felicity, you aren’t acting like the person I know; the smart, sensible, intelligent woman who thinks things through! You’re keeping secrets from me and I don’t like it—you and Queen both! Something is going on with you and you need to tell me what it is right fucking now!” He slammed his palm down on the desk, the loud slap echoing throughout the room. He turned his back to her and began to pace back and forth like a caged animal, his agitation palatable. “Goddamn it!”

“Calm down!” She snapped, getting sick of his crap. “First off, I am an adult and I make my own choices! You have absolutely no right to lecture me about anything, Mr. I Wear a Fucking Costume with a Cape and Pointy Ears and Regularly Get Shot at by Machine Guns! I don’t get all pissed off about Alfred stitching you up in a cave full of flying rodents, rats, and bat guano so don’t you criticize my nice clean basement! Second, you need to check your attitude because I am not your child or your property, Bruce! You don’t get to ground me or dictate what I do or when I do it! Our relationship begins and ends when one of us comes and don’t even try to pretend it’s more than that!”

“That’s a load of bullshit and you know it!” Bruce roared at her. “I happen to care about you, damn it, and apparently I’m the only person that does! If this is the way you’ve been living your life the last couple of years then maybe I should start treating you like a child because you’re behaving like one; like some stupid kid who doesn’t realize that she isn’t immortal! I have no intentions of calming down as long as you keep putting yourself in these kinds of situations! You’re hiding things from me, things I need to know!” He stepped forward, pointing an accusing finger at her, “You’re the only one who needs to get their head in the game here! I’m the only person in this room who’s making sense!”

“Excuse me?” Felicity said taken aback. “Let me get this straight; you jump me in your office twice and I’m the one who needs to check their mental status?” She jabbed her finger into his chest, “You’re the one who goes from screaming at the top of his lungs to screwing someone against the wall at the turn of a dime then back again so check yourself, Mr. Wayne!”

She spun around and headed toward the door as he called after her, tying his tie quickly as he grabbed his own coat and jacket and tucked them into the crook of his arm, “Felicity! Goddamn it! Slow down! Where the hell are you going?” He demanded, chasing after her at a jog. “We’re not done!”

She headed to the elevator, hitching her purse higher on her shoulder as she hit the down button, “First off I’m going to get something to eat because I’m starving and I skipped lunch because of you.” The doors opened and she got in the elevator. She pressed the floor button and Bruce hurried inside before the doors shut, quickly buttoning his collar and straightening his tie before pulling on his jacket then his coat. “After that I’m going to call Dr. Schwartz for an appointment and, if he can’t see me today, I’m going to the pharmacy and then home.”

“How do you need to go to the doctor?” He asked sharply.

“None of your business,” she grumbled. I ought to make him cough up the $49.99 plus tax, she thought, but shades of cab fares and night stands stopped her. Goddamn it, I’m going to have to start keeping condoms in my purse if I’m going to keep slutting it up all over town like this.

Why was it that in romance novels, no matter where the protagonists find themselves when the flush of lust hits them, there’s always a handy stash of condoms just waiting at their fingertips? Caught up in playing patty cake on the kitchen counter? No problem; we keep rubbers next to the garbage ties in the junk drawer. Getting lucky in the Outback? No worries mate, check under the rock next to the wallaby.

Apparently in soft-core paperback porn the Trojan Man is some kind of perverted omnipresent Easter Bunny leaving little latex presents in every nook and cranny.

Felicity paused and mentally added, ‘so to speak,’ at the end of that sentence.

Damn, even in her own head she made inappropriate Freudian slips. Of course, she was thinking about sex, so…

“Are you hurt? Did I hurt you?” He asked with a frown, reaching for her waist and turning her toward him so he could sweep his eyes over her from top to bottom as though he had some kind of x-ray vision.

X-ray vision, Felicity thought to herself. That would be a really stupid superpower. You’d constantly be walking into walls you couldn’t see or, worse, you’d have to see everybody naked all the time. Let’s face it; the world was not exactly chock full of supermodels.

Again; totally inappropriate thought.

She slapped his hands away, “I’m fine,” she told him, straightening her scarf. “It’s…something else —something that, again, is none of your business!”

“Fine, we’ll grab a late lunch and then I’ll drive you to the doctor myself,” Bruce told her.

“I’m not going anywhere with you,” Felicity snorted derisively.

“Yes, you are,” he shot back.

“Why should I go to lunch with you?” She asked him.

“Because the last time we had sex you said I treated you like a cheap date!” He told her. “Well, I’m getting pretty damn sick of that shit so this time I refuse to give you the satisfaction.” He looked down at her, a determined set to his mouth, “If you want lunch then I will buy you lunch, understood? And we’re not taking separate vehicles either; you’re staying with me until the end of this ‘date’.”

“‘Date’?” She repeated derisively, “I think it’s more like closing the barn door after the cow gets out than a date.” Her voice was laced with sarcasm. “Dating is supposed to come before sex, not almost four years and more than a dozen times after the fact.”

He glowered at her, “I’m taking you to lunch so you can just deal with it and call it whatever the hell you want to.”

“Fine,” Felicity grumbled.

“Good!” He shot back in the same tone.

“Just for the record though, I’m not riding in that stupid car of yours,” she told him as the doors opened to the lobby. “I’ll catch a cab before I subject my ass to those seats again.”

“I took the Jag today already knowing how you feel about the MacLaren,” he told her, a small triumphant smirk playing over his lips as he placed his hand on the small of her back.

“Whatever,” she said, ignoring the heat of his large hand through her clothes.

He walked her to his car and opened the door for her before moving into the driver’s side. As soon as she sat down she pulled out her cell and dialed her family physician to request a walk-in appointment.
“Dr. Schwartz’s office, Caity speaking. How may I help you?”

“Hi Caity, this is Felicity Smoa—er, Fox. I know I haven’t been there in a while but I was wondering if you had time to squeeze me in this afternoon.”

“One moment, Ms. Fox,” Caity said as she paused to look up her records. Suddenly her voice warmed up considerably. “Of course we can fit you in! When can you get here? We close at five o’clock but we can keep the office open if that’s more convenient for you?”

Since Peggy practically had them on speed dial she wasn’t all that surprised by her offer. “What time is it now?” She looked at the display on her phone. “Can you fit me in around four? I was just on my way to get something to eat first.”

“That’s fine. Can I ask why you need to see Dr. Schwartz today so I can make a note of it in your chart?”

Felicity glanced over at Bruce who was listening in shamelessly. She sighed, “I know Dr. Schwartz isn’t an OB/GYN but I was wondering if he could give me a Depo-Provera shot or at least refer me to a doctor who can? I had a pap recently but I just moved back to Gotham and I don’t have my prescription with me plus I haven’t had a chance to look around yet for another doctor.” She noted how Bruce’s hands tightened on the steering wheel and his jaw clenched as if he were biting back some commentary.

“The doctor can do that for you today, no problem. He’ll probably also set you up with one of his partners, Dr. Tambala, here in our building. If you like I can call her office and see if she could see you instead if that would make you more comfortable?”

“Yes, please,” Felicity said gratefully.

“Hold please,” Caity said and bad elevator muzak pumped in over the phone as she placed her on hold.

Felicity put it on speakerphone and laid the phone in her lap as a midi file of ‘Close to You’ by the Carpenters filled the Jag.

“I’m sorry,” Bruce said quietly avoiding her gaze. “I wasn’t thinking and I should have been.”

“It takes two to tango,” she told him, not even bothering to pretend not to know what he was referring to. “Although, seriously, if this is a habit of yours you might want to ask your tailor to put a special condom pocket in those suits or consider seeing your urologist for a consult; I hear vasectomies are an outpatient procedure these days.”

“I’m not getting a—!” He began with a scowl.

“Ms. Fox?”

Felicity turned off the speaker and brought the phone to her ear, “Yes?”

“Dr. Tambala said she’d be happy to see you at four o’clock. We’ll forward your records to her so you won’t have to worry about filling anything out when you get there in order to save time.”

She gave her the name of the doctor she saw in Starling and got off the call before sinking deep into the soft rich caramel leather of the antique 1966 Jaguar E-type convertible. Even though she was not a car person she did have a fondness for this particular one. Bruce had driven it for years and whenever Tim would get his hands on it he’d take her and Tam for a ride through the park with the top down. It was a deep cherry red that had been lovingly restored and gleamed in the sunlight with its chrome embellishments, sexy curves, and deep set headlights.

“What do you want?” Bruce asked at last.

“Anything’s good for me,” she told him assuming he was referring to food. At least she was going to pretend it was about food for as long as she could. “The burger I had the other day was actually pretty good if you want to go there.”

“I’m not buying you a hamburger; this is a date, remember?” Bruce said with a grin, some animation returning to his expression. “Italian?”

“That’s fine.”

He wound up taking her to Scalini Fedeli and, despite the restaurant being very popular with the financial district’s denizens who frequented the place for power lunches, they were seated right away. For once she wasn’t even tempted to roll her eyes and make a remark about the perks of being Bruce Wayne especially when, after explaining that they were in a bit of a rush, their food came out remarkably quickly.

They ate their lunch in companionable silence, both just concentrating on the food in front of them. She had the roasted beet and fennel salad with goat cheese and apple followed by an entrée of the soft egg yolk and spinach ravioli and a nice glass of Chianti. Meanwhile Bruce, ever the well-disciplined eater and teetotaler, had the bibb lettuce and Sangiovese poached Forelle pear salad with the butternut agnolotti for his entrée. He also turned down the Chianti in favor of a tall glass of unsweetened iced tea. When they were done and the dessert cart came around Bruce refused his dessert and, as tempting as the warm apple tart with brown sugar crumble looked and smelled, she was too stuffed and in too big a rush to make her appointment as it was.

She offered to take a cab to the doctor’s but he insisted on going with her, much to her surprise. He even followed her up and waited in the lobby as she was ushered into a room without waiting and seen immediately by the doctor. After a quick explanation of her unexpected move which led to her forgetting to retrieve her birth control from the medicine cabinet, along with her apparent inability to remember to take the pill in the morning even when she did have it, as well as her scandalous lack of condom use, the doctor gave her the Depo shot. Even though she immediately copped to playing fast and loose with her reproductive fate she gave her a quick safe sex lecture (lovely) and administered a pregnancy test (negative, naturally. It had literally only been a couple of hours since they had sex but the nurse insisted, so she went ahead and peed in the stupid little cup because it’s always fun times at the gyno) then told her to come back if her period was late to be tested again. She was in and out in less than twenty minutes, and reminded herself to thank Peggy Ann for the use of the frequent flyer cache she apparently had with Dr. Schwartz and Associates.

She stopped by the reception desk and noticed a very tense Bruce watching her from where he was seated in the waiting area. As soon as she emerged from the back he got to his feet and began to gather their things.

“I set you up with an appointment in three months, Ms. Fox,” the receptionist told her. “And Caity at Dr. Schwartz’s office said to call her to set up a checkup when you get a chance.”

“Thanks,” Felicity told her, taking the appointment card from her and dropping it in her purse.

“Everything okay?” Bruce asked quietly as she approached, holding her coat out for her.

“Yep,” she said, allowing him to help her put it on before walking out of the office. He followed her out and into the elevator wordlessly, his countenance once again grim and thoughtful. “What?” She asked at last once they were seated back in his car.

He turned over the motor and the heater came on, quickly cutting through the chill that had settled in the enclosed vehicle. “What did the doctor say about…” his voice trailed off as he looked at her from the corner of his eye.

“About what?” She asked again.

“Well, we didn’t use any protection,” he said so quietly she almost had to strain to hear him. “I mean, I’m clean; I get tested regularly, but um…” He glanced at her furtively.

“So am I,” she told him with raised eyebrows. “I had a blood test before I left Starling and, well, not to set you off again, but I know Oliver tests clean because I make all his appointments and take his messages plus I’m his medical proxy so…”

“Not—” he shook his head, “I’m not worried about that,” he said with a puff of breath. “I meant… other possibilities that can come from what we just did.”

Other possibilities? It was too tempting to resist.

“Oh that,” she said. “Oh, you totally knocked me up. I’m as pregnant as a penguin! Don’t worry about it though, I intend to move to Europe for the next nine months just like Loretta Young did and then ‘adopt’ the baby myself to avoid the scandal of giving birth to your love child.” For a split-second Bruce looked so stricken with panic she had to chuckle, “Relax Bruce, I’m kidding. Chances are you’re in the clear.”

“Chances?” He repeated flatly. “What exactly does that mean?”

She sighed, “Look, we’re good, okay? Seriously though, if you’re going to freak out this bad then I only have two words for you: Outpatient Procedure.”

He, however, wasn’t laughing. “We need to talk about what it is we’re doing here.”

“We’re not doing anything. We had sex, it was a one-time thing, we’re done; end of story.”

“But it’s not a one-time thing and we’re not done.” He turned off the motor and turned to her. “This —” He gestured between them, “Us; it isn’t going away and, frankly, I don’t want it to.”

“Then what do you want, Bruce?” She asked him. “A relationship?”

“Maybe,” he said, glancing away from her with an inscrutable expression.

“It wasn’t that long ago when you were trying to sneak out of my house in the middle of the night and now you want me to make an honest man out of you?” She asked with an edge of incredulity.

“I was…look, there’s no excuse for my behavior but that was then and this is now,” his tone was firm and he got over his sudden bout of shyness enough to look her in the eye as he spoke. “I’m not saying I want anything official, I’m just saying that I’m too damn old to go sneaking around in shadowy corners and pretend like this doesn’t mean anything.”

“You’re not that old,” she told him dryly.

“I’m 41; that’s old enough,” he said.

“Not until February 19th,” she told him without even having to think about it.
His smirked slightly, “You remembered my birthday?”

“Yeah,” she frowned. “So? I’m good at remembering numbers and dates; it’s no big deal.”

“July 24th,” Bruce said, apropos to nothing.

“What about it?” She said despite knowing exactly what the significance of that date was.

Actually, although Bruce didn’t know it, that date had become significant for a lot of reasons.

“It’s your birthday,” he said in the same even tone.

Among other things. “I know that; so?”

“So I guess I must be good at memorizing dates myself,” he told her. “Here’s another one: September 23rd four years ago; remember that one?”

She flushed. Yes, she did in fact remember that date and she would for the rest of her life. “What do you want, Bruce?”

He took a moment and looked at the burled wood of the steering wheel before answering her. “I want…I want us to be together.”

His lips curled in disgust. “God no; I refuse to be referred to as someone’s ‘boyfriend’. That’s absurd. It makes me sound like a spotty faced teenager asking you to the prom.” He turned his dark blue eyes to her again, “Why do we have to label it anyway? Can’t we just agree that this is happening and just go with that?”

“Well, I don’t like being called anyone’s ‘boyfriend’. I’m sorry but I am neither a ‘boy’ nor your ‘friend’. I’m a grown man in an adult sexual relationship with a woman, not a ‘girl’ and I also don’t like being referred to as a ‘partner’, ‘lover’, or any of the other insipid euphemisms people use to indicate a significant other while in public,” he stated emphatically.

She snorted. “Well, sorry Charlie but you’re stuck with ‘boyfriend’ since ‘male sexual affiliate’ is a bit cumbersome to the tongue and ‘fuck muffin’ doesn’t really fly in polite society,” she shot back in the same tone. He gave her a dirty look and she took a centering breath, “Fine, let’s skip the labels, oh ambassador of orgasms.” Another nasty glare followed, “How do you see this non-relationship relationship working? Are you planning on knocking on my dad’s door and taking me home for the occasional sleepover at random intervals or what?”

“I thought you could move in---with me, at the manor,” he answered brusquely. At her look of surprise he quickly spoke, “You said you didn’t want to live at the penthouse and, frankly, I wasn’t too happy with that idea either. The Batcave Watchtower needs upgrading as well and you’d have free reign there. You already mentioned redoing the alternate Watchtower location with a lab and such; I already have all that. You could move in and handle coms at night and when I’m at the office you could work on upgrades. Then, a few months down the line, if you still want to work you could help out at WayneTech or you could pick someplace else to go. Wayne Enterprises is huge; between that and all the different charitable foundations you could do whatever you wanted to.”
Felicity couldn’t decide whether to laugh at him or sock him in the jaw. “Let me get this straight, and stop me if I get something wrong,” she said slowly. “You want a relationship but you don’t want to label it?”

“Yes,” he said firmly.

“And you want me to live in your home as your non-girlfriend, take care of your coms at night, and work for you during the day at one of your companies while all this undefined sex is going on in the background?”

“Yes—no,” he said quickly. “I mean yes but--!” He scowled at her, “You’re making it sound bad and that’s not what I meant at all!”

“Then how did you mean it, Bruce?” She asked calmly. “Will this be a monogamous relationship or will we be free to see other people? Or will you be free to date while I stay at home? Will I get a paycheck for working at Wayne Enterprises or will I just be paying for my room and board with sex and unpaid labor? Do you intend to take our ‘non-relationship relationship’ public or should I hide in the back bedroom whenever people come around? What if we have kids? Is that the reason you’re so attached to keeping your vasa deferentia intact; you want to make babies with me? Because, sorry to tell you Mr. I Don’t Do Commitment, if we keep this up without you either getting snipped or one of us getting better at remembering to use birth control, I’m going to be up the duff in no time. Will I be shuffled off in my ‘confinement’ and raise our children in secret as we take up residence as flowers in your attic? And what happens when you get tired of me, Bruce? Will I get a pension and a pat on the head like some pre-revolutionary French concubine or do you expect me to just slink off into the shadows like some miserable discarded thing who didn’t even rate high enough to be called your ‘girlfriend’?”

“No! I would never--I just meant that…” he stopped and glared. “Damn it, what do you want me to say?”

“I don’t want you to say anything,” she told him. “I don’t need a relationship--or a non-relationship for that matter, I don’t want to be your girlfriend any more than you want to be my boyfriend, and I’m not moving into your house nor do I intend to work for one of your companies. We had sex, it was nice, and I don’t expect you to apologize for it or make a declaration of your intentions afterwards. I’m a big girl and I can take care of myself. Now, if you don’t mind, I have phone calls to make and I’m meeting Barbara and Tim for dinner later so I need to get home and change.”

“You’re mad?” Bruce asked incredulously.

“No,” she told him. “I just need to get home. This wasn’t exactly where I planned to be today.”

“No, you are; you’re mad at me because I’m actually trying to do the stand-up thing and be honest about how I feel,” he said with a slight edge to his voice. “Fine, you want to go home, I’ll take you home.” He turned over the motor and pulled back into traffic.

“Wait,” Felicity said, going from slow simmer to full boil. “Let me clarify something for you real quick; you might want to pretend that you were being my knight in shining armor just now but the truth is that you weren’t trying to do me any favors with that half-assed bullshit offer to shack up, Bruce. The fact that you even thought for a second that I’d go for something like that proves just how little you know me. I don’t need a definition of what we are to one another to make my life complete but I’m also not willing to play house as your all-but-wife; if and when I decide to cohabitate with anyone it won’t be as the live-in entertainment.”

“What do you want then?” He asked angrily, his grip tightening on the steering wheel as he wove through traffic.

“Nothing,” she said simply. “I don’t want anything from you.”

“Bullshit,” he snorted.

“Why is that bullshit?” She asked him.

“Because you might pretend to be a modern woman but, at heart, you’re still an old fashioned girl, Felicity,” he told her.

Son of a-- “Meaning what exactly?”

He smirked at her with a superior lift of his lips before turning his attention back to the traffic all around them. “Meaning that you might pretend to not want the titles and definitions but we both know, deep down, that’s exactly what you want. You’re the kind of girl who expects to have a ring placed on her finger and I’m the kind of guy who will never give you that, so you need to know exactly what you’re in for as things between us continue to progress. And don’t even bother to deny it or screech about how it will never happen again because we both know it will.” He shot her a heated look. “I’ve been inside of you too often for you to say otherwise and I don’t intend to waste any more of my precious time on this wounded virgin routine you have down pat. Hate to break it to you Baby, but virgins don’t scream ‘fuck me harder’ when they’ve got their legs wrapped around you and their claws in your back.”

‘Pissed’ didn’t even come close to describing what she was feeling at that moment. “You don’t know anything about what I want or how I feel!”

“Don’t I?” He asked with a superior lift of his eyebrow. “I had you first, Baby, and we both know I’ll have you last. You didn’t take any other men into your bed until I left you for the second time and the only reason you went there with Queen was because you were hurt and confused. If I hadn’t walked away you’d already be in my home and in my bed and all of this nonsense about you working for some made up company would be over and done with.”

“God, you are so full of yourself!” She burst out, her patience at an end as she turned in her seat towards him. “Do you even listen to the words that come out of your mouth or are you really so far gone in this little fantasy of yours that you can’t even see how full of shit you are?”

He chuckled as though her outburst was somehow meant to be amusing, “I’m just being honest, Felicity. Sex means something to you; you know it and I know it. You can pretend that today didn’t mean anything or that, deep down inside, you aren’t hoping that I’ll break down and tell you what you want to hear, but the fact that you let me make love to you at all tells me everything I need to know.”

She was so angry, so furious, that words escaped her. Just the gross arrogance of how he was speaking to her---her face turned beet red and she felt angry tears prick her eyes as she fought against the impulse to ram her fist into his big stupid face!

Traffic slowed just then and as soon as Bruce came to a complete stop Felicity immediately jumped out of the car and slammed the door behind her as she hurried over to the sidewalk and away from traffic.

“Goddamn it, Felicity! Get back in the car!” He yelled as he rolled the window down.

She didn’t say a word; instead she let her finger do the talking for her and jogged up the sidewalk until she found a cab that would take her home.
Chapter Twenty-Seven
Chapter Twenty-Seven

“So how’s the love triangle going,” Barbara asked, popping a piece of sushi into her mouth as she grinned at Felicity over the coffee table. “Or is it a square since you had that lunch date with Yummy McDriver the other day?”

“Technically he’s not a driver, he’s a security consultant who is temporarily assigned to my dad’s detail,” Felicity said from the couch as she shoveled some soba noodles into her mouth with a pair of chopsticks.

Barbara turned to Tim, “Notice that she didn’t comment on the rest of what I said; what does that tell you Red Robin?”

“Sounds like she’s deflecting to me, Batgirl,” Tim said as he quickly snatched a piece of Felicity’s Candy roll off her plate before she could stab his hand with her chopsticks.

“I’m not deflecting,” Felicity said with a snort.

“Did Yummy ask you on a second date yet?” She asked.

“Yes, he’s having dinner with my family at the penthouse in a couple of weeks.” She shrugged, "We were going to do it this Friday but something came up and I had to reschedule, so..."

Tim choked slightly on his ramen, “Seriously? This guy wants to have dinner with your family? On your second date?” He asked incredulously, “Does he have a death wish or something?”

“And what is that supposed to mean?” She asked throwing him a dangerous look.

“Have you met your dad?” Tim shot back.

“Oh Timmy-Tim-Tim, he doesn’t hate all the men his daughters date, just you,” Barbara said with a toothy grin. “Right Baby?”

“Pretty much,” Felicity said ruefully.

“Really?” Tim said in a hurt tone. “Just me?”
“Well, no,” Felicity said correcting herself. “I think he actually might have hated that guy Tam met while she was in Europe more. What was his name?” She paused for a moment. “Antonio? No. Alphonso?” She sighed and took a sip from her teacup. “Whatever his name was, every time Tam would call home he’d go to the phone muttering, ‘Please don’t be pregnant, please don’t be pregnant,’ under his breath before he picked up.”

“Wait, she never told me about some Italian guy,” Tim said with a frown.

Barbara snorted, “Like you’ve told her about every girl you’ve ever dated?”

“Yeah, I have actually,” Tim said.

“Really? All of them?”

Tim scowled, “Yeah, all of them. Why wouldn’t I?”

“Ariana?”

“Yeah.”

“Zoanne?”

“Yes.”

“Stephanie?”

Tim snorted, “Of course!”

“Darla?”

“Yeah,” Tim said a little reluctantly then turned to Felicity as she made a face. “What?”

“It’s just…” she wrinkled her nose, “Wasn’t she technically dead; like reanimated corpse dead?”

“No!” Tim said, taking umbrage.

“Moving on from the slut-zombie and Tim’s brush with necrophilia,” Barbara continued ignoring Tim’s angry exclamation of ‘Watch it’, “Kara?”

“She knows about Kara,” Tim grumbled.

“That weird chick; Rose?”

“I never slept with Rose,” Tim said carefully.

“Didn’t you tell me she jumped on top of you naked and basically asked you if she could take you into adulthood?” Barbara asked with a superior lift of an eyebrow.

“Um…” Tim shifted his eyes and bit his lip as he considered his words carefully.

“Yes?” Barbara prompted.

“That’s merely a technicality,” he said, grasping for straws. “I didn’t actually have sex with her.”

“Technicality?” Felicity repeated dubiously.

“Translation: She played intern in the blue dress to his cigar smoking leader of the free world but didn’t actually take it in the downtown dry cleaners,” Barbara supplied.

“Say what now?” Tim said in confusion.

“She popped your cork and gave you a happy ending without the free eggroll,” Barbara told him.

“What?” Tim asked her with flushed cheeks.

“Come on and keep up, Tim; that one was too easy,” Barbara snorted.

Tim began to sputter in embarrassment, “I—what—you—!”

“And, by the way, despite certain rumors to the contrary, oral does count,” Barbara said matter-of-factly. “If two people are in the same room, in physical contact, and one of them comes because of something the other one is doing to them, that’s sex.”

“What about the dom/sub stuff with the leather and spanking where no one ever gets naked?” Felicity asked curiously.

“Good question!” Barbara praised enthusiastically. “Rose was really into leather too, wasn’t she? So what’s the story, Tim? Did she lube you up with a stick of butter and introduce you to the joys of pony play?”

“I did not have sex with that woman!” Tim insisted.

“And there’s the historically accurate quote I was looking for. I rest my case,” Barbara said offhandedly.

“I hate you both so much right now,” Tim grumbled.

“Is it weird that I feel strangely flattered to be included in that?” Felicity asked, turning to Barbara.

“I always do,” she responded. “What about that Lynx chick?”

“What is it with you Bats and Cats?” Felicity pondered out loud.

“Pussy and alliteration,” Barbara answered in a deadpan.

“Hey!” Tim said, looking offended.

“Am I wrong?” Barbara asked him.

Tim looked at her uncertainly then cleared his throat, “Moving on; the answer is yes, Tam knows about all of the women in my past, happy?”

“Did you sleep with all of them?” Barbara asked.

“Getting a little personal, don’t you think?” Tim asked defensively.

“Like she wasn’t before with the stick of butter thing?” Felicity pointed out.

“And what the hell is ‘pony play’ anyway?” Tim asked as he blushed again.

“Google it and I’ll take that as a no,” she said with a smirk.
“For your information, including Tam, I’ve slept with four girls, okay?” Tim said, digging into his ramen again.

“Well, it’s not like that’s a lot,” Barbara shrugged. “Even at your age four partners altogether isn’t really a big deal.”

“What do you mean?” Tim asked slowly.

“It’s just that the average number of sexual partners for an adult male is between nine and twenty so you’re actually on the low end of the spectrum.”

“Twenty? That many?” Tim asked faintly.

Barbara nodded, popping another piece of sushi in her mouth and chewing. “Yeah, and the average number of men an adult woman sleeps with during her lifetime is between four and fifteen.”

“How do you even know this stuff?” Tim asked with a grimace.

“I’m a woman; this is what women talk about,” she said giving him a look that screamed ‘doh’.

“Well, in that case I’m definitely doomed to lifetime of being below average,” Felicity said with a sigh.

Barbara gave her a sympathetic pout, “What about Yummy? Not feeling it?”

“No, he’s great, but he’s also moving in a few weeks to Central City and…let’s just say that I’m not really ready to be serious about anyone at the moment so it’s doomed from the start,” she said with a wry quirk of her lips. “Still he does give good date, I’ll grant you that.”

“Can we stop referring to this guy as ‘Yummy’ and start calling him ‘Jake’ or ‘Security Boy’ or something?” Tim groused. “It’s bad enough that I always get roped into these ‘Sex and the City’ moments with you guys without having to run into this dude someday and being forced to call him ‘Yummy’ in my head.” He huffed out an exasperated breath, “You guys have a way of really screwing with my manhood.”

“I’m sorry Timmy, I didn’t mean to bring out your inner vajayjay,” Barbara said with false sympathy.

“I really hope Queen got me my own place,” Tim muttered.

“I spoke to that guy Diggle and he said he got us both houses in Felicity’s old neighborhood and that he arranged for them to come fully furnished.” She turned to Felicity, “By the by, John Diggle? Holy hawtness, Baby-girl! What the hell?” She whipped her napkin at her, “Why didn’t you tell me there were two hotties on Team Arrow?”

“Sorry,” Felicity said with a shrug. “I would have mentioned my friend’s hotness quotient had I realized that it was vital to the mission.”

“Oh, it was definitely vital,” Barbara said, fanning herself. “Trust me, I was thinking of writing a thank you letter to the inventors of Skype by the time I logged off. That body and a voice to match—woof!”

Felicity smiled, “Dig’s a sweetie and he’s tough as nails; very on mission but a great guy. He’s an expert in several different forms of martial arts, hand to hand combat, weapons, and firearms, and he acts as the team medic as well as support in the field.”
“Former military, right?” Tim asked and Felicity nodded. “What about Queen?”

Felicity furrowed her brow as she thought of how to answer that one. “He started out as a little punk Richie-rich kid so he plays that up to a certain extent for outsiders but to his friendlies, when he’s hot on mission, he can come across as being downright grim. Not a whole lot of laughs in the Lair so he might get easily irritated by the patter you’ve developed over the years but he’ll loosen up. Not much, but some. He has been known to toss a zinger or two if he’s in the mood. Same with Dig. When he’s out of the hood and he’s playing at normal he does Bruce’s playboy routine but less intense because he’s trying to build his company so he’s walking a finer line with it.”

“What else?” Barbara prompted.

“He has this responsibility complex going on and lots of guilt over his past. Before he wound up on that island he had basically run away from committing to his longtime girlfriend, Laurel, by sneaking off with her sister to China. I don’t have a lot of details but I know he thought Sara had died before she resurfaced in Starling.” She grimaced, “There’s still a lot of messed up guilt going on there. Sara Lance, his ex-girlfriend’s sister, is a mask working under the code name ‘Black Canary’. She used to be a League assassin and she sometimes acts as a member of the team but…” She paused, “Look, I like Sara, last week I would have said I trusted her implicitly, but you should still tread carefully because of the possible Stellmoor connection until I can get together with her and find out for myself what the hell’s going on. I need to set up a meet with her after I leave here and I’ll call and let you guys know what happened.”

“Can’t you just call her?” Tim asked.

“Finally, one Bat that knows how to use a phone,” Barbara snorted. “He’s got a point; why not just call her?”

“She’s a trained operator and I need more than just her voice to go on to get an accurate read. I know her well enough by now I’m pretty sure I can spot the signs if she’s hiding anything but she can disguise her vocal stress patterns over the phone,” Felicity told them. “And also, the truth is, I really need to talk to her about some other personal stuff and I owe it to her to say what I have to say face to face.” She sighed, “She’s my friend; I like her. She helped me out a few times, trained me; she even spent a couple of nights on my couch. I should have already called her by now but I’ll get in touch with her ASAP and let you know what I find out. My gut tells me she’s not a part of this. I don’t know,” she said, running her hand over her smoothed back hair and fiddling with her sleek ponytail. “I’ll let you guys know if I get vibe from her but I’m going to call it and say that, whatever is going on, Sara is still on the side of the angels. If she wanted to screw us over she could have done it years ago so it wouldn’t make sense to wait until now to do it.”

“You said she and Queen were running hot and cold; could it be a lover’s quarrel thing? A woman scorned and all that?” Barbara suggested.

She shook her head, “They aren’t like that with each other. No matter what goes down between them they’re beyond all that crap. Their relationship is complicated and more than a little bizarre, but they don’t play games with each other. We’ve all gone through too much for her to do that to him or to me.”

Barbara offered her a sympathetic smile, “Understood. What about Oliver; how does he feel about her?” She asked. “Friend? Foe? Undecided? Or is she a shadow shag?”

“A what?” Tim sputtered.

“It’s what I call the ‘frenemies’ you Bat-boys go ‘bump in the night’ with,” Barbara explained, eyes twinkling in amusement.

“Noted and stored for future usage,” Felicity snorted. “They hook up but he says it’s casually casual, I think it’s more. Sara is somewhat adventurous in regards to personal relationships and she assures me she feels the same way as he does so it’s possible. She and Oliver are very similar people and he is definitely commitment-phobic but, like I said before, they’re weird with each other. He cares about her and she cares about him but…there’s something off about them. It’s like this weird magnetic thing that pulls them together but the minute they touch the polarity shifts. Lots of angsty guilt between them.” She paused, “Speaking of angst, I should mention that Sara was in a relationship with a fellow assassin named Nyssa for a long time. The first time she left it was pretty intense. I don’t know what happened the last time they split but I think it was a bit more mutual this last go ‘round. Still, if Nyssa shows up you can expect a lot of angsty goodness to follow.”

“Because everyone knows that women only have sex with each other in the hopes that a man will someday come and join them or at least watch, right Timmy?” Barbara asked mockingly.

“Well, that’s what happens in all those movies Tam won’t let me watch in her apartment anyway,” Tim answered earnestly. “Besides, Sara’s bi,” he said with a huge grin.

“Moving on,” Barbara said, rolling her eyes at him.

Felicity shook her head before continuing, “Sara’s sister, Laurel, also had a relationship with Oliver and it tends to bleed over into Arrow business so you should be aware of what to expect,” she said with a disgruntled sigh. “They had this big push me/pull me thing before the island and afterwards he ruined his relationship with his best friend over her then his friend died and she blamed the Arrow. Afterwards she joined the DA’s office and led a capture and contain with extreme prejudice taskforce to go after him; ‘him’ being the Arrow, not Oliver. She was still in the dark back then,” she clarified. “While she was playing whack-a-mole with the Arrow, she was tearing herself up about Tommy—that’s the dead boyfriend slash Oliver’s best friend—and developed a drug and alcohol problem.”

“Holy fuck, it’s like ‘As the Mask Turns’ down there!” Tim said, riveted, “Then what happened?”

Barbara snapped her napkin at him. “You really are such a girl, Timmy!” She snorted as he defended himself by tossing a piece of edamame at her.

“What happened was she lost her job, almost got disbarred, nearly got killed by the Huntress when she was dropped in the shit by her ex-boss who was too much of a pussy to risk his own neck, got her job back after he got fired, went through a whole lot of other shit, decided to become the next Black Canary which led to even more shit, before having a nervous breakdown a few months ago and is trying to regroup and heal but she’s still a definite a pressure point with Oliver. Her breakdown and Oliver’s constant back and forth between her and her sister has led to a few nasty confrontations so try not to engage her if at all possible.”

“What do you mean?” Tim asked. “You just said she was a mask at some point; is she one of the team friends or is she an outsider?”

“She’s kind of a mask, but is more of a part-time mask-slash-bounty hunter. Think of it as less of an ‘operates under the cover of night’ thing and more of a ‘semi-legitimate law enforcement but in tight leather pants’ kind of thing. She operates under the handle ‘Manhunter’ now and she sometimes works with the Arrow, but I’d keep her as far outside as you can. Like I said, she’s in a fragile place with her recovery and getting involved with Arrow business full-tilt this soon after her breakdown would just push her back over the edge. As it is, she already tends to brush up a little too close for comfort and Oliver has a bad habit of dropping his frosty around her.” She looked at Barbara apologetically, “Unfortunately when she’s spiraling she also has a tendency to get bitchy with any woman Oliver spends time with so you might want to curb your red-headedness just in case she starts her snark.”

“One of those, huh?” Barbara said wearily. “I never could understand women who get all tangled up in toxic relationships then spend the rest of their lives targeting the ex’s currents. I mean, I bitch about Dick and his obsession to mount anything with red hair that’s taller than he is, but I’m not going to seek out Princess Fire Crotch to give her a piece of my mind. If she can cure him of his shit then more power to her! Hell, I’ll buy her a toaster oven if she can drag him to the altar and get him to stick it out to the finish.”

“Princess Fire Crotch!” Tim snickered. “God, I love girl talk; the food, the cattiness, the interesting additions to my ever-growing vocabulary…”

Both women cut their eyes at Tim before Felicity spoke again. “To be fair it’s not entirely her fault. Besides having to deal with her bipolar and addiction issues, Oliver is bad with endings so he keeps closing the door while leaving the window cracked and I can only imagine that has to be confusing for her. Plus,” she added ruefully, “he did cheat on her a bazillion times, and with her sister to boot, so you can see why seeing him with other women would be a trigger for her.” She sighed, “I should mention a related pressure point while we’re on the subject: Oliver has a son.”

“Seriously?” Tim asked in surprise. “Since when?”

“Apparently since he was eighteen,” she told them reluctantly. “He got a girl pregnant and his mom paid her off to pretend she had a miscarriage and to have the baby out of town.”

“Yeesh,” Barbara cringed. “Granny sounds like a peach.”

“Moira was a very interesting character, let me tell you,” Felicity said ruefully. “He reconnected with Sandra Hawke and his son, Connor, last year under less than optimal circumstances. He doesn’t have contact with them as they were forced to go underground for their own safety but they’re on his pressure point list for sure. Plus, I should mention this; he got her pregnant while he was dating Laurel pre-island and when she found out that led to a lot of friction.”

Barbara turned to Tim. “How attached are you to ‘As the Mask Turns’? Because I’m thinking ‘All My Vigilantes’ or ‘One Mask to Live’ instead.”

“Yeah, I’ll be the first to admit it; things get pretty One Tree Hill fairly quickly in Starling, so that’s something for you guys to look forward to,” Felicity said with a cringe, “I mean, first he was with her and Sara, then he was with her, then he was with Sara, then her, then Sara, then her again…”

She grimaced, “He hasn’t cheated on her since college, every time he’s been with someone since getting back from the island he’s been pretty good about only being with one woman at a time, but I understand why she’s gun-shy. I mean, it’s weird dating sisters; I know that. It’s gross, bizarre, and definitely unhealthy, but it’s not all on him. Sara and Oliver share a traumatic history together and Laurel was his first love so that’s why he keeps getting drawn back to them but they keep letting him in, so what do I know? At least Sara has moved on, I think. Even when they were together, their relationship was never as intense as the one he has with her sister.”

“Yeah, no, no guy is that hot,” Barbara told her flatly. She turned to Tim and smacked his leg as he was messing with his phone.
“Ow! Shit!” He yelped.

“Pay attention!” She told him. “Felicity is telling us about all the incredibly stupid women who live in Starling. You might actually have a shot at adding to your numbers.”

“Funny,” he said with a grimace then looked at his phone, “What the--!” He looked up at her with an expression of pure disgust, “How the hell do you know about this shit?”

“What’s that?” Barbara asked, craning her head to look then grinned, “You’re still on the pony play thing?”

“Why would someone do that?” Tim asked flashing the screen towards Felicity.

Felicity tilted her head sideways as she tried to see what he was talking about. “Um…someone who really liked My Pretty Pony as a kid maybe?”

Tim shook his head, “Seriously, how is that sexy? Instead of ‘pony play’ they should just call it ‘ass flags’ and get it over with.”

“Hee!” Barbara snickered and snatched Tim’s phone from him, “Ride ‘em cowboy! Can you imagine what it’s like around the ranch after a nice big bowl of beans around the campfire? Talk about letting your freak flag fly.”

“Or flutter,” Felicity suggested.

“Give me back my phone!” Tim said snatching it back and exiting off the screen. He glared at Barbara then Felicity, “You both look like these sweet, innocent brainy type chicks but in truth you’re both a couple of sicko perverts, you know that?”

“So says the guy who wears a codpiece and has nipples built into his armor,” Felicity shot back.

“Good one!” Barbara said giving her a high five. “Man, I miss having you around Gotham. Damn Baby, you can still hang with the cool kids.”

“Thanks!” She said with a wide grin.

Tim’s eyebrows shot up to his hairline, “So, wait; I’m one of the cool kids?”

Felicity’s face fell, “Damn.”

Barbara looked over at her, “What?”

“I broke that mug you gave me.”

“How?”

Her lips twisted into a grimace, “I threw it at Bruce’s head.”

Tim and Barbara both looked at her and grinned.

“In that case, Chickie; it died an honorable death,” she said with a chuckle.

“Hell, if you promise to do it again I’ll buy you ten mugs,” Tim promised.
“Finish telling us about Ollie’s magic wand and how it turns otherwise smart women stupid,” Barbara told her.

“It’s not--!” Felicity furrowed her brow in consternation then sighed, “Okay, so I don’t get it myself but I’m not exactly in the best position to judge, you know? At least she’s only slept with one masked vigilante to my knowledge.” She frowned, “Well, one vigilante and one psychopathic politician turned leader of an army of super soldiers bent on controlling the city.”

“Say what now?” Tim said, as he looked up from his phone.

“Sebastian Blood,” she said. “They kind of had a thing but I don’t know how far it got. Anyway, that’s water under the bridge,” she said dismissively.

“Is it me or does this Laurel chick seem to have a lot of water under her bridges?” Tim asked Barbara in a sotto voice.

“Bitch is going to have to build an ark if she keeps it up,” Barbara agreed.

Well, they weren’t wrong, Felicity thought ruefully. “I mean, a woman like Laurel…you’d think a strong, intelligent woman like her would have moved on a long time ago but she’s stuck. She’s very Type A and part of her still thinks they need to be together because that was the plan since they were in high school. I don’t even think it’s about Oliver as much as it’s about crossing something off a list. That combined with their shitty coping skills and his weirdness with her sister… Honestly, I think she just needs to stay the hell away from him for her own sake. She’s just one of those people with a very rigid world view and she doesn’t process things well.”

“Don’t defend that shit,” Barbara said scornfully. “I don’t care what ‘issues’ she has going on, if a man fucks around on me with my own sister and fathers a kid while I’m dating him, I’m not going to be hanging on in the fringes and looking for a way back in unless it’s to cut his dick off and show it to him.”

“Ouch,” Tim breathed.

“Yeah, well, it’s not all on Oliver, not that I’m defending him,” she said quickly. “I’ve had to go toe to toe with him on more than one occasion to remind him to get his head out of his ass, but a lot of Laurel’s issues begin and end with Laurel. Then again, I’ll admit I’m not fond of her so take that with a grain of salt. I feel for her, don’t get me wrong, but I am not a fan,” Felicity said with a grimace. “She got a little too liberal with the scathing remarks about my dubious status as Oliver’s ‘secretary’ a few times and, I’m not sure because the club was a little loud and she was pretty drunk, but I believe she suggested he fire me and there may have been some reference to my hair color but I can’t be sure.”

“What did you do?” Tim snorted, “Because if she pulled that shit with Tam, I’d have to bail her out of jail or drag her out of there while she still had clumps of bloody hair clutched in her fists.”

“Yeah, no. No, I didn’t go there,”” Felicity said, shaking her head ruefully. “I wanted to but, needless to say, I had to bite my tongue because, as I may have mentioned, Oliver goes mushy in the brain when it comes to her. You cannot, under any circumstances, talk shit about her in any way, shape, or form around him.” She looked at Barbara. “Seriously Babs, it’s a thing with him so I’m giving you the straight skinny just in case. If you do run into her and he goes stupid, pull him out, but resist slapping him into a triple digit IQ. If she engages you just take it out on a pint of Ben and Jerry’s. Oliver freezes up around her and he cannot function, even when she goes straight for his balls.”

“Charming; who else has Mr. Happy Pants been sinking his arrows into that we need to look out “Isabel,” Felicity admitted reluctantly, “but you knew that. When you go in as his EA you will more than likely become a target for her ‘office whore’ shtick so be prepared for comments about him switching a blonde for a redhead or something along those lines.”

“Timothy!” Barbara barked.

“What? What did I do now?” Tim jumped.

“Nothing,” Barbara told him, “but as your mentor and un-official big sister you need to listen and pay very close attention to what I’m about to tell you.” She paused for dramatic effect. “First; never be the kind of man who dates crazy bitches. The sex may be hot but it’s not worth it, especially if it means waking up and finding a big pot of bunny soup on the stove.”

“Bunny soup?” Tim asked, confused.

“Fatal Attraction,” Felicity clarified in a low tone.

“And number two,” Barbara continued, ignoring their aside, “while we are down there you will be on Bitch-Slap Patrol, meaning you will keep me from slapping a bitch and that includes Oliver Queen.”

“Duly noted,” Tim said.

Felicity sighed at their antics, “The last inside/outside member of the team is Quentin Lance, father of the Lance sisters and a cop with the SCPD.”

“Friendly or outsider?” Barbara asked.

Felicity wrinkled her nose, “Eh, that’s complicated.”

“So what else is new with the cast of this soap opera?” Barbara asked dryly.

She pressed her lips together and gave them a funny look, “Okay, here’s the thing; as far as Oliver and Dig know, Lance was not aware of the fact that Oliver is the Arrow until roughly six months ago.”

“I love the way you just worded that,” Barbara told her with a raised eyebrow.

“So….” Tim prompted.

“He’s known for almost two years,” Felicity told them. “Well, probably over two years. Actually he’s a pretty good cop so he was pretty sure he was the Arrow after the first week.”

“How do you know that if they don’t?” Tim asked her slowly.

“It’s…it’s a long story,” Felicity said at last. “Needless to say, Lance and I used to have an agreement where we’d pretend that he didn’t know when Oliver was within earshot but, when it was just us, we could talk freely.”

“So what changed?” Tim asked. “How was he officially read in?”

Images of a night filled with blood, hot rain, and Slade flooded her mind.
Detective…” The gun was heavy and slick from the rain and blood that caked her hands.

“Take it,” he told her as he panted breathlessly. He looked down at his pants leg that was soaked in blood and pointed to his feet. “Reach into my boot and give me my back up piece.” She did as he asked and he thumbed off the safety. “Okay, sweetheart, you still have that detonator?”

She nodded, the rain getting in her eyes and fogging her glasses. “I’ve got it.”

He looked at her steadily and licked his lips, his face strained from pain and stress. “Are you sure about this?”

“It’s the only way,” she told him faintly. “Can you manage?”

He nodded sharply, “You keep him distracted and I’ll plant the charge.” He laid his hand on her cheek and she found herself leaning into his calloused palm. “You listen to me; you do whatever you have to do to stay alive.”

“I--”

“Felicity!” He said sharply and she looked into his deep brown eyes that somehow reminded her of Lucius. “Whatever it takes, sweetheart. Kill them before they can kill you, do you hear me? Promise me…”

“I promise…”

She fidgeted in her chair and forced herself into the present. “It’s…a long story. We were running an op and the rest of the team got in trouble so I had no choice but to call Lance and we had to go in after them. After that the cat was pretty much out of the bag.” She forced a smile, “I’ll call him before you get to Starling and give him your contact information. You’ll like him; sometimes he’d even drop by my place to cook dinner when Sara would stay with me,” she told them with a shrug.

“Wait…” Tim narrowed his eyes at her, “Why didn’t he want Oliver to know he knew?”

Barbara gave him a look, “Seriously? Oliver slept with not one, but two of his daughters, turned one into a vigilante ex-assassin, turned the other into a vengeful alcoholic bipolar DA turned vigilante who got sent to the nut-hatch last time he played ‘hide-the-pickle’ with her, and runs around the city shooting arrows into people and, meanwhile, he’s the cop helping him do it.”

“Yeah, okay,” Tim said slowly. “I kind of get it now.”

“My question is what’s your connection to Lance?” Barbara asked her.

Again her mind flashed back.
“Here,” she said handing him her glasses.

“Don’t you need these?” He asked her as he stuffed them in the pocket of his tee shirt.

“No,” she said quietly. “Not anymore.”

She turned to go but he reached for her hand.

He looked at her for an extended moment before speaking, “In case I don’t get to say it again…” he fell silent but the look he gave her told her all she needed to know.

***

“Like I said, we’ve shared a lot of history and more than a few close calls together,” she said and, despite her best efforts, the darkness she kept hidden most of the time made its way into her tone. “Let’s just say that we’re foxhole buddies.”

“I’d love to hear some of those foxhole stories sometime,” Tim said as he locked onto her expression.

She forced a smile, “Not a chance, Timmy,” she said borrowing Barbara’s teasing nickname for him. “I tell you, you tell Tam, and then she tells the world, and the next thing you know I’m dealing with Bruce and his pissy ass mood swings; no thanks.”

“Now that we’re more familiar with the seedier side fill us in on the quirks of the man himself as well as the rest of them,” Barbara said, changing the subject.

“Oliver: Loyal, fierce, dedicated, bit of a control freak; he’s basically Bruce but with the complications of a personal life,” she told them. “The downside is guilt, guilt, guilt. Tons of guilt.”

“Not the noble yet damaged hero shtick, I want details on the soft underbelly,” she told her. “If Tim and I are going in we have to know his team’s weaknesses so we can be ready for them.”

“Look, this is all interesting but isn’t all this gossipy information and hunting out soft spots in their personalities a little bit like something Bruce would do?” Tim asked askance. “It feels like we’re asking Felicity to write protocols for her own team or something.”

“That’s exactly it,” Barbara said to him, her expression devoid of any kind of playfulness. “I’m not worried about these guys holding up their end when it comes to the physical stuff but, nine times out of ten, it’s the personal shit that gets you killed. A man can be a stone-cold warrior but if he has a drinking problem, or difficulty keeping his pants on, or if he tends to go rogue, that directly impacts the mission. You never know how his reflexes will be, if he’ll drop the ball to feed the monkey on his back, or if he’s vulnerable to honey-traps.”

“Barbara’s right,” Felicity said quietly. She looked Tim in the eye, her jaw set. “As much as I’d like to say that none of that stuff should matter, it does. I love those guys but when they’re engaged in a mission and I’m running coms, I need to know I can count on them to do what I tell them to do and be where I send them. Part of that means knowing their weaknesses and compensating for them.”
She gestured between Barbara and herself, “Barbara and I learned that lesson a long time ago the hard way. People can get hurt or killed if we can’t control the flow of information accurately. If we expect you to be at point A and you go off the reservation due to some other crap we haven’t compensated for, everything falls apart. As the techies when you guys are in the field we don’t just direct you to the action, we control you. If you guys are the id, all instinct, muscle memory, and split second reflexes, then our job is to act as ego and super-ego. We have to be the voice of reason, the brain to your brawn, and sometimes that means having to know how to manipulate you as well.”

“So we’re just puppets dancing on the end of your string?” Tim asked slowly.

“Dance, my pretties, dance,” Barbara said wiggling her fingers in pantomime.

“Damn,” Tim said, looking slightly taken aback by the idea. “I kind of feel used right now.”

“Be flattered instead that we’re showing you what’s behind the curtain,” Barbara told him matter of factly. “When we’re down there I’ll be handling Oliver and Diggle but you’ll be handling this Roy guy. You might not be on tech but you will have to be on your game when it comes to risk assessment. You’re down there to train him and that also means having to learn to handle him.”

“Look, I appreciate that you guys are way smarter than any of us are but I’m not stupid and I’m willing to bet the rest of those guys are pretty quick on the uptake as well. Don’t you think that we can handle the truth?” He shook his head, “I just don’t see how manipulating your own team is justifiable.”

“Okay Tim-Tim, let’s see if you’re right.” She clapped her hands and rubbed them together, “I’m about to give you your first lesson as a handler, ready?” Barbara waited for him to nod affirmatively, “You’re handling your man in the field and he has three objectives: disable a bomb, free a hundred hostages locked in a room next to the bomb, and engage the enemy. Are you following me so far?”

“Bomb, hostages, bad guys,” he said with a nod.

“There are two buildings several hundred yards apart. The bomb and hostages are in Building A, bad guys are in Building B. Which building do you tell your guy to go to first?”

“Building A,” Tim said automatically.

“Why?”

“That’s easy; preventing the loss of innocent lives always trumps the takedown,” he said as though it was a no-brainer.

“First rule; it’s never that easy,” Barbara said drolly. “Here’s the twist: The bad guys have a hostage in Building B as insurance. If your guy defuses the bomb and frees the hostages they kill the single hostage in their custody. The bomb is counting down and he only has time to do one or the other; how does that impact your original decision?”

“It doesn’t,” Tim frowned. “It’s not pretty but it comes down to a numbers game; one hostage isn’t worth the loss of a hundred lives.”

Felicity tensed, sensing what Barbara was about to say. Once upon a time she sat where Tim was sitting now and received the exact same ‘life lesson’. She also knew that she’d failed to use the lessons Barbara was trying to teach Tim and it led to the deaths of 503 people including Oliver’s best friend.

“The mask in the field is Batman and the hostage is Felicity,” Barbara told him, her voice cool and composed. “Handle it.”

Tim paled and swallowed as he looked from her to Barbara, uncertainty written all over his face. “I, uh…”

“No time to hem and haw, Timmy,” Barbara told him. “The bomb is counting down, Bruce is engaged, where do you direct him?”

“Do I tell him Felicity is the hostage?” He asked confused.

“Up to you, you’re the handler,” Barbara said, her tone sharp. “Counting down, Tim! Move your ass, your man is in the field; what do you do?” He looked at Felicity again without speaking. “Tim! Focus! What do you do?”

Tim looked down at his feet and sighed, “If I tell Bruce that Felicity is the hostage then he’ll go for Building B and the hostages will die.”

“So what do you do?” She asked, “Tell him or save the hostages?”

“I’m one person, Tim,” Felicity broke in quietly. “You said it yourself; it’s a numbers game.”

“If I did that Bruce would never forgive me,” Tim said, shaking his head.

“That’s the kind of choices you make when you’re a handler, Tim,” Barbara said, her voice softening. “Whether you realize it or not you profiled Bruce just now; you just wrote his protocol. You knew had that been any other hostage he would have gone for the bomb first; you, me, Dick, even Alfred. You know he would have been tempted but there is a 99% chance he would have taken the risk and gone for the bomb first. Felicity is his pressure point; the one variable that changes the game. Once she became the hostage you could no longer count on Bruce fulfilling his prime objective; why?”

“He doesn’t have to answer that,” Felicity said quietly.

Barbara shot her a hard look, “I love you Chickie but this is my Padawan. Butt out.” She looked at Tim again, her voice hard and demanding. “Why?”

“She makes Bruce act unpredictably,” Tim said dully.

“So what do you do?”

“This isn’t fun anymore,” Tim said with an irritated exhalation of breath.

“Not meant to be,” she told him.

“I tell him to disable the bomb and I don’t reveal the identity of the hostage until it’s done,” He said at last.

“End of lesson,” Barbara told him. “Remember it.”

Felicity reached out and placed her hand on Tim’s knee to get his attention, “I’m partially responsible for the deaths of 503 people, including Oliver’s best friend, because I made the mistake of not compensating for his pressure points. I should have gone into the field to disarm the Markov device and I allowed him to direct me from the field to send in a proxy. I should have gone in myself and not told him and had Quentin Lance act as my backup. If I had, we could have stopped both devices. Furthermore Laurel was at her office in the Glades and he went off course before I could pull him back. If I had kept quiet or lied to him, Laurel might have survived anyway. Tommy lost his life saving her and Oliver got there just in time to see him die. Had I not told him I could have controlled his movements better.”

“You would have taken the chance that she could die knowing how much she means to him?” Tim asked. “You could live with that?”

“I live everyday knowing that 503 people are dead because I didn’t control the flow of information,” she told him.

“This job isn’t fun,” Barbara told him. “I’ve worked both sides of the game. When you’re in the mask it’s all adrenaline and glory. You get to be the hero, rescue the hostages, get to trounce the baddies and drop bad puns, but as the guy holding the wall you never get to do any of that and, even though you did your part to save lives, your team will never know half of what you did in order to accomplish that. They can’t know. We keep as many secrets as we reveal, we stand apart from the action so they can do their jobs. You’re going to be handling a guy who has some serum in his veins that ramps him up to a hundred. He’s already unpredictable and dangerous; your job is to reel that in and redirect it. You won’t be there as Red Robin, this isn’t the Tim Drake show; you’re there to get this guy to the point where he can function as a member of a team. Lives will be saved or lost because of you and what you can teach this guy. Your job is to housebreak him, not outshine him.”

“But they’re also going to need me in the field, right?” Tim said with a frown. “Am I going on patrols or just hanging around the basement with this guy?”

Barbara sat back and looked at Felicity, “What do you think?”

Felicity thought about it. “At first I think you should stick to straight training but Roy isn’t exactly a patient student. Oliver tried training him that way in the beginning and it was a complete bust.” She sighed and ran her hand over her hair to smooth it back, “It’s up to you on how you train him, but yeah, if Oliver wants you in the field then do it but don’t get caught up in field work. If it looks like he’s getting territorial with Roy by dragging you out on missions as a distraction then remind him of why you’re there in the first place. And don’t pussyfoot around it; he’s just as pigheaded as Bruce ever was so be firm.”

“Handling a man in the field as opposed to on coms is more difficult in a lot of ways but the same rules apply,” Barbara told him. “You’re doing double duty so you need to let him have his lead but when shit gets real you have to maintain control and know when to pull him back. Break him in training so when you’re in the field he listens to you. That means you need to gain his respect early on, Tim. Bust his ass, teach him quick that being stronger doesn’t make him better. He’ll try to show you he’s an alpha right from the get go but if you lose your temper you won’t be doing anyone any favors. He’ll be looking for a fight so don’t give it to him. Make it look effortless and kick his ass until he figures out that you’re the guy he wants to follow then maintain that respect. That’s the name of the game: control, control, control. I can’t interfere too much in your thing because you’re his trainer, not me. If I step in every time he shows his teeth it will eat away at your credibility. Same goes for my end; if someone challenges me then you need to step back and let me take care of myself. Chances are they’ll see the chair or my tits and assume I’m the weak link.” He snorted and she tossed him a wink before continuing, “Establish a rapport but don’t ever let him forget you’re the Jedi, he’s the Padawan, got it?”

“I got it,” Tim said after taking a minute to let it sink in. “Okay, tell me about Roy.”

Felicity centered herself, “Roy is a former gang member and thief who was involved with Thea, Oliver’s sister. He’s been exposed to Mirakuru which, as you know, gives him super-strength but it also makes him susceptible to bouts of rage that can lead to a psychotic break.” She took a breath.
This next bit would hit on events that she really would rather not talk about but needs must.

“About two years ago we ran into some trouble,” she said quietly. “It was a man by the name of Slade Wilson; have you heard of him?”

“Can’t say I have,” Tim said with a frown, then his memory seemed to click, “Wait, isn’t that the dude who kidnapped Thea Queen and murdered Moira a few years ago?”

“Yeah,” Felicity breathed, squirming in her seat. Her stomach began to twist and she was starting to regret the choice of sushi for dinner.

“What’s his handle?” Barbara asked, eyes sharp.

Of course Barb would ask that, Felicity thought. “Deathstroke.”

They both spoke at the same time.

“Holy shit!” Tim exclaimed.

“You ran into this guy two years ago and you didn’t check in?” Barbara asked angrily.

“Big ass meta motherfucker; fond of swords and can rip through a steel door like it’s toilet paper?” Tim tacked on.

“He wasn’t a meta-human,” she said. “He was injected with the Mirakuru serum.” She sighed, “I take it that you’ve run into him before.”

“Bruce and Dick have; a few times,” Tim told her.

“And they barely came out of it intact,” the other woman said, eyeing Felicity with a hint of irritation. “What’s your team’s connection to him?”

“And why did he go after the Queens?” Tim added.

“It’s…complicated,” she said hesitantly. “He and Oliver have a history. Had a history,” she corrected. “He’s dead now.”

“Are you sure?” Barbara asked. “The first time Bruce ran up against him, the only reason he got away was by knocking him off a twenty story building. He thought he was dead for sure until he couldn’t find the body and then he showed up again a few months later still pissed off about it. Even working as a team he got in several good shots and barely broke a sweat doing it.”

“I’m sure,” she said in a muted tone. “Not even Slade can come back from that.”

“What’s the history between them?” Tim asked. “You do know that Deathstroke used to freelance for the League right?”

“Doesn’t surprise me,” Felicity said, shaking her head. “Back when Slade was a member of the Australian Secret Intelligence Service’s special ops Team 7, he was sent in to investigate suspected terrorist movements along the rescue and recovery of General Yao Fei who was purposely shipwrecked on the island of Lian Yu. Yao Fei was falsely accused of the massacre of an entire village and the Australian government sent Slade and his partner in to recover him so that he could testify in front of the United Nations War Crimes Commission so that the true perpetrators could be made to answer for the deaths. They were captured and his partner, Billy Wintergreen, turned against him and allied himself with the enemy, and tried to kill him in order to save his own skin. A lot of other stuff happened, most of which I don’t really know, but basically Slade and Oliver teamed up on the island and helped each other survive. Wintergreen captured Oliver and was going to execute him when Slade stepped in and killed Wintergreen by stabbing him through the eye with a sword.”

“That’s…intense,” Tim said with a sharp exhalation of air.

Felicity nodded, “Yeah, well, they became friends and Slade trained Oliver, taking up where Yao Fei left off along with Yao Fei’s daughter, Shado. Shado and Oliver fell in love and Slade stood back and let them have their thing even though he was also in love with her.”

“More soap opera drama,” Barb said with a grimace.

“Wait, this is getting good,” Tim said leaning forward.

Felicity rolled her eyes at him despite the heaviness in the pit of her stomach, “A mad scientist type named Anthony Ivo was searching for the Mirakuru,” she paused, emotion welling up within her but she forced it back down so she could finish. “He was, um…anyway, Slade was hurt; he was going to die, so Shado, Slade, Sara, and Oliver found this Japanese sub with the serum and, in order to save him, they injected him with it.”

“So you’re saying that it’s Queen’s fault that psycho was created?” Tim asked with a scowl.

“No!” Felicity said emphatically. “He was trying to save his life. They had no idea what would happen. It was a total Hail Mary pass.”

“Hey, glass houses, Timmy,” Barbara reminded him cuttingly.

“Sorry,” he said contritely. “Go on with the story.”

“Anyway, Ivo showed up and captured all of them except Slade because they thought he was dead, then he took them all outside and held a gun to Sara and Shado’s heads. He ordered Oliver to choose, Oliver refused, he pointed his gun at Sara, and when Oliver tried to take the bullet for Sara, he turned the gun on Shado and killed her.” She let that sink in before continuing. “Slade showed up supercharged and wiped the floor with them. Afterwards he began to show signs of psychosis and, when he found out that Oliver ‘chose’ Sara over Shado, he lost his shit and went totally Cuckoo for Cocoa Puffs. From that moment on, he decided that Oliver had to pay for her death. He tortured him, stalked him, kidnapped his sister, murdered his mom…” She shook her head again, “Oliver isn’t the most forthcoming guy when it comes to the island stuff but my theory is that the Mirakuru caused Slade to confuse his ex-partner Billy Wintergreen with Oliver. Oliver and Slade got into some kind of epic battle before he left the island and Oliver took out his eye with an arrow, thinking he’d killed him. The whole ‘eye for an eye’ thing only served to reinforce Slade’s delusions instead.”

“So Slade went after Moira Queen because of Shado?” Tim’s brow furrowed in confusion.

“He went after everyone and everything Oliver held dear,” she corrected him. “His mother, his sister, everyone and everything including the entire city.”

“How did Queen manage to take him down if even an arrow to the eye couldn’t do it?” Tim asked.

“According to Bruce and Dick, they threw everything they had at him. Hell, the batarangs bounced off of him so Bruce had no choice but to aim his grappling gun at him and he bent the hook!”

“And what about the Army of super-soldiers?” Barbara asked. “One Slade had to be hard enough, but a whole army of super-powered psychos?”

“We managed to drive the Blood Cult back out when Sara contacted Nyssa and she brought League reinforcements to repel the Army of Blood while Diggle recruited the Suicide Squad to help stop Waller from wiping the entire city out with a drone strike. While we were busy with all that, Merlyn showed up to protect Thea and whisked her out of town. As for how Oliver took out Slade; he didn’t,” she said dully, unable to meet their eyes.

“Wait; the League, Merlyn, and The Suicide Squad rescued you guys?” Tim asked incredulously before his voice deepened in anger, “Why the hell didn’t you call us? I was ready to come get you! The airports were all shut down but I was going to take the jet there anyway, screw the FAA and Homeland! I mean, what the fuck, Felicity? I was in the air—hell, we were halfway there until Tam called and said she talked to you and you said you were at an out of town conference in Vegas that weekend!”

“Listen, I can tell you about Roy or you can yell at me, Tim; you choose,” Felicity told him, her gaze unwavering even as the other man’s expression hardened in anger.

“I’m thinking,” Tim bit out.

She grimaced, “Look, I tried to call you guys; I did! I was going to say ‘fuck it’ and do the big reveal to Dig and Oliver because, by that time, it didn’t matter anymore. We had several groups, all of whom had tried to kill us at one time or another, calling a temporary truce but I wasn’t about to relax my guard around them for a second, believe me! The last thing I wanted was to be in the middle of some Tolkien-esque Battle of the Five Kingdoms but unfortunately, we weren’t in a position to turn down help from anyone. I wanted you guys there; even Bruce by that point! I did everything I could to make that happen but things were a bit hectic since communications were down, Blood’s people and ARGUS completely shut down the grid, Waller had a Reaper coming at us with a full payload ready to take out the entire city; by the time I got through to Watchtower, no one was answering so I had to just make do.”

“Shit,” Tim said, rubbing his hand over his eyes wearily. “I’m… I’m sorry, Baby. I just…we…if we had known…”

“Yeah, me too…” Barbara cleared her throat guiltily. “We had our own crisis around that time and ours was League related as well only they weren’t exactly being helpful.”

“We were…out of the country,” Tim said grimly. “It wasn’t until we were on our way back that I finally got Tam’s voicemails about Starling. I guess, by then, it was all over.” His jaw clenched and he fixed her with a narrowed gaze, “Still, you should have told me the truth when I asked if you were okay. Were you okay?”

“It was as okay as it ever gets,” Felicity said casting her eyes towards the floor. “When I called Tam after we were out of crisis-mode she said….she… she told me about Damian,” she took a breath. “I just figured you guys had enough on your plates and, besides, there was nothing left for you to do.”

“We could have come anyway,” Tim said with a black look. “You still--!”

“Tim!” Barbara barked at him. “Cool it with the Bruce impersonation and let her talk! Just…tell the story, Chickie,” Barbara told her, again giving Tim a warning look. “It sounds like you guys had a shit storm and a half on your hands and I think we can all sympathize with that, can’t we?” She asked Tim pointedly.

“ Doesn’t matter,” she said finally meeting their gazes, a certain hardness that hadn’t been present before six months ago creeping into her tone. “It’s done. The only reason I’m even telling you about him is because of Roy.”

Tim opened his mouth to speak but Barbara, her expression deepening with understanding, placed a warning hand on his arm. “Tell us about Roy,” she told her. Tim gave Barbara a sharp look but stayed silent.

Ever the obedient Padawan, Felicity thought, “Two years ago, Slade Wilson came to Starling to wage war on Oliver, his family, and the entire city. Like Tim mentioned, he murdered Moira right in front of Thea and Oliver. He murdered a lot of people,” she murmured before her voice rose again. “He wanted to build an army of super-soldiers with the Mirakuru and, knowing that Roy had it in his system, he nearly drained him dry by transfusing his blood into his men.”

“That’s how he created the Army of Blood? Roy?” Tim asked, his gaze narrowing on her.

“Again, it wasn’t exactly by choice,” Felicity said with an edge to her tone. “They bled him dry to the point that, had he not had the Mirakuru, he would have been dead. Luckily, along with the healing factor, it ramps up red blood cell production which kept him alive but just barely. We transfused new blood into him but at full strength the Mirakuru bonds at a cellular level. He went into a healing coma but, when he woke up, he was in a psychotic rage. He was delusional, out of control, and violent. It wasn’t his fault but…” her voice trailed off.

“But what?” The other woman prompted.

“There were casualties,” Felicity said at last. “Oliver and Sara managed to take him down with a massive dose of Pit Viper venom but not before taking a few lumps. Sara fractured her arm and Oliver got out of it with some torn ligaments, cartilage damage, and a fracture to his kneecap.”

“How did he snap out of it?” Tim asked, his expression still thunderous.

“It took a while but we put him in a coma again using the venom and he eventually woke up and was in control again after we injected him with some anti-serum,” she told them. “It was…rough for the team in the meantime though. He attacked Sin, that’s Sara’s foster daughter of sorts,” she explained, “and he also went after Thea. He could have easily killed them, he was that far gone. Sara wanted to put him down. She thought it was the most humane option. After he killed someone while on a rampage she felt he was too dangerous to live, especially since he was showing signs of brain damage due to blood loss, but Oliver wouldn’t allow it. It caused a rift between them for a while and he took off after the Blood Army thing to find Thea.”

She took a centering breath, “The reason you need to know this is because, even though he eventually recovered from the brain damage, when he gets angry his control falters and he can become very, very dangerous. Part of the problem with the Mirakuru is that it affects the entire endocrine system and, when I say it ‘affects’ it, I mean at levels that are almost impossible to conceive of outside of science fiction. According to some buddies of mine at Star Labs who got to conduct some tests a few years back, the Adrenal medulla goes into overload causing a massive rush of adrenaline, noradrenaline, dopamine, and enkephalin which puts him in the fight end of fight or flight and deadens his pain response to almost nil. Serotonin levels go off the charts causing exceptionally vivid auditory and visual hallucinations which, combined with the dumping of testosterone and the electrical storm going off in the hypothalamus, causes extreme aggression. His healing factor is equally off the charts. Bullet wounds heal in a matter of minutes and I mentioned the blood cell thing earlier. It binds to thrombopoietin in the bone marrow, stimulating megakaryocytes to produce platelets at an exponential rate making him damn near invulnerable.” She looked Tim dead in the eye, “Roy has worked hard to get his aggression under control but….” she grimaced. “Your only warning will be his hands shaking when the adrenaline hits his bloodstream and then “You’d better calm him down or get out of his way.”

“Dude sounds like a barrel of laughs,” Tim murmured.

“It’s not his fault,” Felicity told him. “Roy didn’t ask for this; Slade and Blood did this to him. He was just a normal kid, a good kid, before all this happened. He still is.”

“And there’s nothing anyone can do?” Barbara asked, her brow furrowing in sympathy. “You mentioned an anti-serum.”

“STAR Labs came up with a ‘cure’ a few years back; the problem is that it caused a potentially fatal adrenal collapse by shutting down the adrenaline production caused by the Mirakuru instantly. The effects were similar to something you’d see with patients suffering from Addison’s or Sheehan’s syndrome only much, much worse and all at once; shock, hypoglycemia, dehydration, disorientation, profound weakness, orthostatic hypotension, all leading to cardiac ischemia and cardiovascular collapse. Some of them died when their heart’s stopped and others survived with long-term aftereffects like arrhythmia, hyperthyroidism, and diabetes. In some of the others the serum attacked the Mirakuru’s healing factor causing a cytokine cascade consisting of a positive feedback loop between cytokines and immune cells.” She swallowed as she remembered that nightmarish event and the screams of those exposed to the ‘cure’. “It worked insomuch as they were no longer practically invulnerable but their bodies basically attacked themselves. It was…horrifying. At first, they just lost consciousness like the rest of them and the doctors at ARGUS thought they’d recover after receiving the same treatments of steroids, intravenous saline, and plasma infusions. It wasn’t until a few days later that their joints began to swell and they developed autoimmune encephalitis in their brains…it was incredibly painful and terminal. No one, no one, deserves to die like that,” she said emphatically.

She took a deep breath before continuing, “Roy and Slade were the only exceptions. In them the serum was only partially successful. It lessened their strength and helped with the rages but it wasn’t a complete cure because, by then, the Mirakuru serum had altered their DNA. The other patients had been turned via a blood transfusion so they were never exposed to the pure Mirakuru unlike Slade and Roy. After he became aware of what he had done during his psychotic break, Roy lobbied to have us inject him with a second dose but we couldn’t risk him having a bad reaction like some of the others did; a hollow-point bullet to the brain stem would have been kinder. He actually begged us to do that at one point but Oliver…” she closed her eyes, “Thea loved him and, even though he knew it was probably a mistake, he didn’t want to take him away from her. Roy was angry and resentful for a long time over that. Thea had taken off and he left for a while but they both came back eventually. Thea showed back up a year ago and Roy came back about six months ago when Slade returned to Starling in order to protect her and help us.”

“Is that how you guys took Deathstroke down?” Tim asked. “A second dose of this ‘cure’?”

“We tried,” she said quietly. “By then he was expecting it though so, no; that’s not how…” She took a sharp breath, and raised her eyes to look at them both pleadingly, “Look, I just…I can’t,” she said licking her lips. “I can’t talk about that, okay?” Tim opened his mouth to speak but, again, Barbara cut him off at the pass with another squeeze of her hand.

you are ready to talk, we’ll be here.”

“Thanks,” Felicity told her.

Tim seemed to struggle internally for a moment before he gave in with a small growl of resignation, “Okay, fine. Moving on; you said he was a thief? What’s his skillset; are we talking burglar or what?”
Felicity pursed her lips, grateful to have the subject dropped at last. “Purse snatcher and typical street punk but teaching him some lock picking and stuff might help with the control issues. It takes a steady hand and a clear mind. What do you think, Barb?”

“Couldn’t hurt,” she shrugged. “Start off slow though. Get him in line and then move on to the other stuff but picking locks is definitely a handy skill to have. You also might want to educate him on the electronic picks as well. Use something that appears sophisticated to a guy like him, help him understand it, and it will build both his trust and his self-confidence.”

Tim nodded, “Selina taught me a few things I might want to try with him. If he has as much trouble controlling his strength as you said then it might help with that.” He sighed, “I have to be honest with you guys, it’s kind of weird being the one in charge for once. Having that much responsibility…” He pulled a face.

Felicity laid a gentle hand on his shoulder and smiled softly, “You’ll be great. Roy’s not so bad once you get used to him and you’ve got the field stuff down pat. Just concentrate on getting to know him. Learn his behavior patterns, let him talk. Learning as much as you can about him and being able to handle him by building a profile might be the only thing that saves his life and yours.”

Tim shot them a dubious look, “So, I shouldn’t feel like I’ve been an unwitting pawn in your secret techie chess game for all these years but instead I should be grateful to be welcomed into the Batman Sex in the City Squad?”

“Congratulations Charlotte, you just popped your cherry,” Barbara told him, the grim mood that had been cast over them lifting.

“Wait, why am I Charlotte?” Tim asked, obviously offended by the idea. “I should be Carrie!”

Barbara shook her head, “Felicity’s Carrie because it’s her team, I’m Miranda—obviously,” she preened and fluffed her red locks, “Beauty and brains; and you’re innocent Charlotte and we’re educating you on how to be a bad-ass bitch.”

“So who’s Samantha?” He frowned.

“Tam,” they both said simultaneously.

“Why Tam?”

Felicity and Barbara exchanged looks before Barbara spoke up, “She fits the character’s profile a little better than either of us do.”

“Combined,” Felicity admitted reluctantly.

“By the power of ten,” Barbara snorted.

“Not that many!” Felicity rolled her eyes heavenward and began to count before stopping suddenly, “Huh, wow that was a busy summer abroad after all.”

“Wait, what?” Tim asked in confusion. He narrowed his eyes at them, “What don’t I know?”

“Just that your girlfriend is definitely above average,” Barbara said with an evil smirk.

“Thanks—hey, wait a minute!” Tim said, doing a spit-take.

“Tim, since when are you so into Sex in the City?” Felicity asked, distracting him.
Tim flushed, suddenly embarrassed. He cleared his throat, “Uh, Tam made me watch all of the DVDs with her?”

“Nice try, Tam hated that show,” Felicity said with a knowing smirk.

He fidgeted in his seat a bit, “Well, I work nights, okay? Daytime TV sucks so when I saw it in the video store I picked it up,” he blushed. “I, um, well, I was kind of expecting it to be a different kind of show, if you know what I mean.”

“How many seasons did you watch?” Felicity asked as Barbara snickered at him.

“All of them,” he admitted, his eyes downcast in embarrassment, “And both the movies.”

“Oh Timothy, the shame,” Barbara tutted.

He turned to Felicity with pleading eyes, “Just don’t tell Luke, okay?”

“I won’t tell him if you promise to stop calling him ‘Weezer’ and quit quoting lines from ‘Steel Magnolias’,” she told him.

“Yeah, but when I do that stuff it’s funny,” he said defensively then wavered, “When he does it it’s just demeaning and potentially hurtful.”

“Oh Timothy,” Barbara sighed, “Watching you crash and burn is more entertaining than the cat video compilations on YouTube.” She looked at Felicity again, “Okay, break’s over, Blondie. Soft underbelly; go.”

“For Oliver it’s guilt and his women and for Diggle it’s Deadshot, Amanda Waller, and ARGUS. On the off chance Floyd Lawton or the Suicide Squad shows up, be aware of the fact he might go off the reservation.” She paused, “Look, things have been strained between ARGUS and the team ever since Dig’s ex-wife, Lyla, almost died last year. She was the Suicide Squad’s handler and, even though she was supposed to be on leave from field assignments because she was pregnant, Waller sent her in and she was nearly killed and lost the baby along with an eye.”

“Did Lawton try to kill her?” Tim asked with a sympathetic look.

“No, supposedly it was a group called HIVE but Dig still blames Waller for it. They had been fighting over her association with ARGUS and we were looking into why HIVE hired Lawton to kill his brother, Andy, a few years back. Lawton and Dig actually formed a kind of uneasy alliance after he revealed who hired him but even he could never tell him what it was all about other than the name of the group. About a year ago, we ran into the Suicide Squad and Lawton slipped Dig a message saying he found a link between ARGUS and HIVE and that he was in danger because of it. Lyla went into ARGUS to find out what he knew even though Dig told her to stay out of it. She tracked HIVE to a remote location and somehow woke up in a warehouse in the middle of nowhere looking like she’d been through a warzone, shot full of holes, and missing an eye. He was convinced for a while that Waller either tipped HIVE off or was covering something up and had Lyla retconned which is why she can’t remember anything.”

“So did Waller do it?” Tim asked.

“No, according to Colonel Trevor. ARGUS supposedly conducted its own in house investigation and cleared her, but who knows?” She shrugged. “Dig still thinks Waller knows more than she’s saying which isn’t exactly beyond the realm of possibility. The last time he got close enough to Deadshot to get more information, he claimed he didn’t know what he was talking about and we found out that, like Lyla, he’d had his memories erased. Even so, Dig thinks if he can figure out a way to get Lawton out of ARGUS and have his implant removed that we can figure out how to get his memories back so he can lead him to the information he needs.”

“What happened to Lyla?” Tim asked.

Felicity shrugged, “Took off. She broke up with Diggle because she needed to get away and…I don’t know,” she said sadly. “He was pretty broken up about it for a long time but I think he’s doing better now. In the beginning, though, it was rough. He blamed himself because if he hadn’t pursued the link between Hive and Waller she never would have gotten hurt in the first place.”

“Waller,” Barbara said with a note of pure loathing. “One of these days I’m going to pop that bitch a good one, swear to God.”

“Get in line,” Tim said wryly. “Tell you what; after we get a handle on this whole Ra’s and Stellmoor thing, we’ll help your buddy take down Waller. Trust me, it’ll be a pleasure.”

“Seconded,” Barbara said with a snort.

“Speaking of the Isabel thing, there might be some bleed-over between ARGUS and Stellmoor so keep an eye on that,” she warned them.

“Duly noted,” Barbara said. “Tim, you’re up.”

“Huh?” Tim said, his mouth full of cooling ramen. “Oh,” he swallowed and wiped his mouth with his napkin before clearing his throat. “Okay, what else do I need to know about Roy that you might have left out?”

“Watch for wild punches, he’s a righty, and keep your pants up around Thea because they are technically on the outs but they’ve still got this whole Rich Girl meets Bad Boy love angst thing going and she’s matured a lot but she might be tempted to use you to get a rise out of him. She also runs the club upstairs so try not to get noticed too much even though she’s in the loop.”

“Good to know,” Tim said.

“Do you guys have any advice for me before you leave?” She asked.

“Nope,” Barbara said, popping her ’p’.

“Nothing? Nothing at all?” She raised an eyebrow at that.

Barbara shook her head, “There’s nothing about Bruce I can tell you that you don’t already know. You already have the long and short on all the good, bad, and ugly that is tall, dark, and grim. Welcome to the Batcave.”

“Abandon hope all ye who enter here,” Felicity muttered.

“Well Baby-Girl, in the words of Mark Twain, ‘Go to Heaven for the climate, Hell for the company,’” she said with a grin.

\?\/?\?\?\?\?\?

When Felicity got home that evening there was a heavy weight in her chest. Barbara and Tim were both packed and ready to head to Starling the day after the next, ready to fill her empty spot on Team Arrow, and she didn’t know how to feel about that. She was grateful, of course. Barbara and Tim were more than just backup; they were both experienced field operators, highly skilled and combat proven. Even in a wheelchair Barbara Gordon could take down a foe with lethal efficiency. Oliver, Diggle, and Roy would go from a two man crew and a raw recruit to a five man team. She was glad they were getting the manpower they needed but…

Felicity rolled over in her bed and rubbed her cheek into her pillow. She glanced at the clock on her bedside table and sighed. It was so late. Even with the three hour time difference it would still be the middle of the night in Starling City. They could be in the field or in bed…she shouldn’t call.

Not before she spoke to Sara first, then she’d talk to Oliver.

Felicity reached for her cell and dialed.

Sara picked up right away. “Hey Cutie, everything okay?”

“I’m good; where are you?”

“Somewhere over the Atlantic right now; why? Do you need me in Starling?”

“I’m, um, I’m not in Starling anymore,” she said slowly.

“Why not? What happened?” She could hear the genuine concern in the other woman’s voice.

“It’s a long story,” she said at last. “I’m staying with my family in Gotham but I have some time free. I’d love to meet you someplace and I can come to you. Where are you planning to be for the next few days?”

“No place, really,” she said. “In fact I can be in Gotham in,” she heard her mutter something and another voice answered in the background. “A couple of hours. The people I work for keep corporate digs all over the place so I can meet you tomorrow after I get some shut eye, say for lunch maybe?”

Felicity immediately thought of the diner Jake had taken her to, “Do you know where Slim’s Starlight Diner is in Midtown?”

“The one with the chrome and the waitresses in poodle skirts? Yeah.”

“I can meet you there at, say, noon? Or is that too early for you?”

“No, that’s perfect,” she said easily. “Hey, did something happen between you and Oliver? Did you guys have a fight or something?”

“Or something,” she muttered then sighed, “Look, I want to tell you everything but I’d rather do it in person.”

“Got it. Just…is something wrong?”

“Not…no.”

“Not no?” Sara repeated with a hint of amusement in her tone. “Double negative there, Cutie. ‘Not no’ means ‘yes’.”

“Let’s just say that I’m really looking forward to seeing you tomorrow,” she said sincerely.

“Okay, I’m looking forward to seeing you, too,” She paused again, “Hey Felicity?”

“Yeah?”
“Do yourself a favor and call Ollie.”

“That’s not a very—” she began.

“Look, I don’t know what’s going on but I know that if you’re in Gotham it can’t be good. Just call him and we’ll talk tomorrow, okay?”

“Yeah, I’ll… I’ll call after we hang up,” she agreed quietly.

“Bye girl, get some sleep. I’m going to try to catch a couple of hours before we land myself.”

“Night,” Felicity told her before hanging up.

She thought back to her conversation with Barbara and Tim and all the things she’d said about Oliver and his tendency to revisit relationships that never seemed to work. Wasn’t that what she was doing every time she allowed herself to think about going home? She and Oliver couldn’t be together and yet she was consumed with guilt for sleeping with Bruce. It felt like she was cheating on Oliver because, even though they weren’t together, it felt like they hadn’t ended it either.

She’d been so scathing in her remarks about Laurel. Oh, she tried playing it off like she was full of sympathy for the other woman, but the truth was that she was being a complete and utter bitch. She hated it when women allowed themselves to behave so nasty and bitter toward one another and yet that was what she was allowing herself to become; a nasty embittered bitch who couldn’t let go of the past. Five years from now where would she be? Would she have moved on with a life of her own or would she be like Laurel, drawn into a relationship so toxic that it ended in a nervous breakdown? No, either she was with Oliver or Bruce, but she couldn’t be with both of them. She couldn’t do the back and forth thing, she couldn’t live with the guilt. She’d seen how that had worked for Sara, Laurel, and Oliver and she didn’t want to repeat their mistakes.

They needed to talk, to get everything out in the open once and for all. The last time they spoke he’d been angry and pushed her away but she knew he had acted out of fear for her safety more than anything else. She’s known him long enough to know that by now he was probably beating himself up for having spoken to her like that. She needed to hear him say they were done in a way that she could let him go and he needed her to forgive him. She didn’t want to live her life knowing that she had added to the overwhelming guilt Oliver carried on his shoulders. No matter how this turned out, a part of her would always love him and she couldn’t do that to either of them.

She dialed Oliver’s number before she could talk herself out of it. After all, their last phone call didn’t exactly go well but that didn’t stop her fingers from hitting the familiar numbers.

“Felicity.” Oliver’s voice held a slight chill but, even so, she felt her heart beat a little faster at the sound of her name on his lips.

“Hi,” she said quietly.

“You shouldn’t be calling me; it’s not safe,” he told her. “Not unless something… has anything happened? Are you alright?” His tone going from irritation to concern.

“No, no, I’m fine; I just…” she paused, her breath stilling in her chest.

“What is it?” He asked, sounding even more irritated than before. “I really don’t have time to—”

“I’m sorry, I probably shouldn’t have called,” she said, swallowing down her pain and tears.

“I can’t—we can’t do this, Felicity,” he told her wearily.
“I know,” she breathed.

“What do you want?”

“I want to talk,” she said quietly.

“No.” It was said with such bitter finality that she had to bite her bottom lip to hold in her noise of pain. It didn’t matter, he heard it anyway. “Felicity, stop it! Just…stop,” he took a deep breath.

“Don’t make this any harder than it has to be. Start trying to make a life there, go out, get a job, meet someone; find a way to be happy. You have to move on; the team has to move on without you.”

“Oliver—” Even she had to cringe as she heard the pleading note in her tone.

“Don’t; just don’t.” She could hear the pain she felt reflected in his voice. “We’re done—you’re done here. I’m sorry but…don’t call me again unless…just don’t call me again.”

“Wait, Oliver—!”

“What?” He bit out.

“What?” He bit out.

“I miss you,” she told him.

She heard him make a pained noise and when he spoke she could hear the strain in his voice, “Don’t do this to me, Felicity. I can’t—”

“I’m sorry,” she whispered sniffing. “You were right; that morning when you left and…I lied when I said I didn’t care. I was…I was hurt and angry and I didn’t mean…I just needed to tell you that I’m sorry for how I left things. Please Oliver? Just—I just need you to know,” she swallowed and gritted her teeth as she fought back her tears, “If this really is goodbye then I need you to know that I’m sorry.”

“You’re killing me right now.” He paused, “I know,” he said quietly. “I know you’re sorry; I’m sorry, too, and I forgive you. That’s not what this is about though. God, why…?” He took a deep breath then exhaled and she could hear the draw of it against the receiver. “I didn’t want to have to hurt you but I…you’re making this impossible.”

“If you don’t want to hurt me, then don’t;” she told him. “Oliver, I know you told me to move on and I’m trying, I am, but I can’t move on until I put what this is between us to rights, even if that means saying goodbye. And if…if you tell me that you don’t want that, that if you don’t want to say goodbye, then I swear to you that I will find a way to come home even if that means that we just go back to being friends because…” she sniffled, “I miss my friend. You’re my best friend, Oliver.”

“Damn it,” he muttered and she could hear the catch in his voice. There was a sound on the other end of the phone like cloth rubbing against the receiver and she imagined for a moment him dropping the phone to his chest as he gathered his wits about him. “I really…I really hate that I spoke to you the way I did the other day. It killed me to do it but you called and said…said we were your home,” he told her and she could hear the tears forming in his throat. “Goddamn you, I really hate that you said that to me because I’m trying my best here and you’re making this so fucking hard on me.” He paused and she could hear him clear his throat. “You always did see more of me than anyone else, so why is it you can’t see this? Why can’t you see what I’m trying to tell you now?”

“Just…just tell me then,” she said quietly. “It’s okay this time; I promise this time I’ll listen and I won’t interrupt anymore but I just need to hear it. If you really want me to move on, really move on, then I need to hear it.”
“I can’t love you,” he told her simply. “I can’t be in love with you. I wish I could but I can’t. I want to; God, I want to tell you that more than anything. I want to say to hell with it and just tell you to come home to me, but this thing, whatever it is between us, it’s destructive and dangerous and it’s going to get you killed and I can’t take your death on my conscience. The truth is that I should have sent you away six months ago. That day…” he paused. “The island, everything since; nothing else compares to the terror I felt that day. The only thing that came close to it was when he had his sword pressed to your neck a year before that. At least then I was able to distract him, talk him down, but this was different. Before he was just focused on me, this time he was so focused on you that there was nothing I could do.”

He took a breath, “Slade was standing over me and I was bleeding out. I remember thinking that we were all dead; me, Dig, Sara, Roy. We were all dead or dying but you were safe and that was enough and then…” He cleared his throat again. “I don’t know what happened, it’s like my mind blanked out for a minute. I don’t know if I lost consciousness or what, but one minute it was just me and Slade and then you were there in front of me. It was like you appeared out of thin air or something, and Slade was just staring at you. You were talking and I couldn’t move; I couldn’t get up. I kept trying to get to you, I tried dragging myself over to you, I was screaming your name, but you wouldn’t look at me, you wouldn’t budge even when he took stepped towards you and started…” He paused, the words seemingly caught in his throat.

“He put his hands on you and started talking about…God, I wanted to fucking kill him. I wanted to kill him for touching you, for talking to you like that. It was like watching my mother die all over again but worse. I knew he was going to…” again, he paused. “You went with him, and I saw the detonator in your pocket. I couldn’t even hear what Slade was telling you over the rain and my own heartbeat and then you disappeared behind the truck. I remember screaming your name over and over and then the explosion—” He made a pained noise. “I don’t know how you survived the blast. You shouldn’t have; at the very least, you should have been hit by shrapnel, concussive injuries, something, but you didn’t even have a scratch. All of us were affected by the explosion; Lance was the closest one to you and he was several hundred yards away. He was hiding behind a cover, had on a vest, and still he took on injuries, but you were right there, in the center of the blast radius, and nothing. I woke up and there you were; a little dirty, a little pale, but otherwise fine. I thought you were a ghost or a hallucination but then you put your hand on my cheek and I could feel you. I should have sent you home to your family then but I was so fucking grateful to still have you that I didn’t want to let you go even though I knew it was a mistake. That’s…that’s what our night was, Felicity; it was me trying to keep you because you were trying to sacrifice yourself all over again for me and I couldn’t stand to see you do it. I saw you slipping away from me and I just wanted to hold on. I reached out for you because I’m a selfish prick and I needed to make love to you in order to prove to myself that you were still alive; still mine. That said, even though I know our night together was a mistake, I don’t regret it. I can…I can still remember how you taste.”

Her heart beat out of rhythm as she heard his words and she squeezed her lips together tightly so he wouldn’t hear her tears.

“After you went to sleep that night, I shut my eyes and listened to you breathe next to me and I kept thinking of all the possibilities in front of us. I wrapped my arms around you and thought, ‘At last; this is how it’s going to be for the rest of my life. This is my moment of happiness.’ I tried to think of all the nights where you’d share my bed, mornings where I’d wake up to your smile. I thought about things I had no business thinking about, like…like building a life together, watching you walk down the aisle towards me, making a home for Connor to visit and holding our children for the first time, growing old with you; but in the end I realized that none of those things could ever happen. It was a dream.”

She could hear as he took a deep shuddering breath, “This thing I’m doing, the Arrow, it has a limited run at best. I’m surprised I’ve lived this long and I never, ever thought we’d survive Slade. That night when we left you in the Lair; that was supposed to be goodbye. You weren’t supposed to be there but you came anyway. You faced down Slade for me, you faced Batman because you didn’t want to see me get hurt, you…” He took a breath, “you slept with me that night because you loved me. I didn’t let you say it then, just like I don’t want you to say it now, because this, us… I can’t keep hurting you. I can’t be what destroys you, Felicity. Being the Arrow ends in one of two ways; death or prison. All I can do is keep fighting for as long as I can until one or the other catches up to me, that’s all I can do. How can I have a life with you while that’s hanging over our heads? How can I love you and let you love me if it means getting you killed or leaving you to pick up the pieces when I’m gone?”

“Shouldn’t that be my choice?” Felicity asked painfully. “Shouldn’t I have the right to take that risk with you?”

“No,” he told her, “because I already know what you’d choose and it would be a mistake. I can’t be a boyfriend; not and be the Arrow. I can’t be a husband, I can’t have children with you, I can never build a life with you because eventually the Arrow, his enemies, his deeds will catch up to me and I can’t risk having that destroy the people I love. You’d sacrifice your life, your happiness, the possibilities of creating a home and a family of your own in a heartbeat and I can’t keep letting you do that to yourself so I have to let you go. I have to push you away in order to save you so I can do what I need to do to be the Arrow. I’m sorry, but you can’t ever come home again. I might not have the strength to send you away twice and if you got hurt…I wouldn’t survive it. You’d be my death sentence, Felicity; I’m sorry.”

Silent tears poured over her cheeks and she nodded silently even though he couldn’t see it. “Okay,” she said at last. “That’s all I wanted; just the truth. Thank you.”

“How are things going with Wayne?”

She chuckled through her tears and grabbed a tissue off her nightstand to wipe her nose, “Hate you? Never,” she said with a broken sob. “You’re still my best friend, remember?”

“You’re…you’re still mine, too.”

“Guess that means we’re pretty screwed, huh?” She said with a sniffle.

“Yeah, guess it does,” he said with a chuckle, his voice congested with tears of his own. He took another deep breath and cleared his throat again, his voice growing stronger, “How are things going with Wayne?”

Her heart clenched, “I don’t…I don’t know.”

There was a pause on the other end of the line. “Is he...are you together now?”

“I don’t know,” she said honestly. “He, uh, said something to me today and I think he might want that but…”

“I can’t…” He stopped.

“I know,” she said quietly.

“I hate that it’s him,” Oliver said quietly. “I hate that it has to be anyone else but me, but if he’s what makes you happy then you should be with him,” he said softly. “I don’t like the guy and I probably never will, but I want you to be happy. You deserve to be loved, Felicity. You deserve to feel someone’s arms around you…I just wish they could be mine.”
She gave a short bark of laughter as the tears rolled down her cheeks, “I don’t think any of us are allowed to be happy, Oliver,” she told him.

“That’s not true,” he said told her. “Maybe not for all of us, but you deserve to be happy. You have to be happy.”

“And why do I have to be happy, Oliver? Why?” She asked, her voice cracking slightly.

“You have to be happy for me; because the idea of you being happy is the only thing that’s keeping me going right now, sweetheart.”

“If that was true then I’d still be in Starling with you and Dig where I was happy!” She said with a sob before she could stop herself.

“You don’t think I wish you could be here?” He said, his voice tinged with anger though it wasn’t directed at her. “If I could, I’d hop a jet and drag you home myself, but I can’t. I just can’t, Baby,” he said brokenly. “God knows I want to, but I can’t. You have to move on; just please, for me, you have to move on so that I can start moving on. You have to stop calling me and try, please.”

“I don’t want to do this,” Felicity whispered brokenly. “I don’t want to move on.”

“I know.” He said, his voice cracking as well. “I don’t want that either but—” He made a rough sort of growl deep in his throat. “Fuck, this isn’t fair. None of this is fair!” He took a breath, “If I could, I would, but I can’t. And even if you were here and Isabel wasn’t a problem anymore, there’d still be the mission and everything else going against us. I couldn’t…I couldn’t make it work with Sara because of the mission, I couldn’t make it work with anyone, and as much as I’d like to think I could make it work with the two of us, I know…I don’t want you to hate me, Felicity, and I don’t want to lose you, but I just can’t.”

“I just need to know something before I let this go,” she told him. “Are you…are you angry about Bruce? If I decide to be with Bruce will you hate me?”

“I can’t say that I like the idea but I could never hate you,” he said quietly. “Do you want that? To be with him?”

“I don’t know if what I want matters anymore,” she said in a defeated tone.

“It matters,” Oliver said sincerely. “I meant what I said, Felicity; move on and be happy. You deserve to be happy,” he said just before he ended the call.

She sat on her bed and stared at down at her phone and all she could think about was how he hung up without telling her goodbye.
Chapter Twenty-Eight
She sat on her bed as she dressed feeling completely wrung out and emotionally exhausted. She didn’t bother with makeup or dressing up that day. It was Sara and she was the kind of person who preferred to stay dressed down and ready for action unless the occasion called for it and the last thing she wanted to do was flash labels at her given what they were going to be talking about. She decided to wear a pair of dark denim skinny jeans and a gray silk jersey long sleeved pullover. She pulled her hair back in its usual ponytail but decided to wear her contacts. She wanted to have nothing between them while they talked, not even the thick framed comfort of her glasses. It was important that Sara saw her just as it was for her to see the other woman’s reactions.

Talking to Oliver the night before had given her some closure but had also ripped her heart apart at the same time. She was more confused than ever. She replayed his words over and over in her head until she was a wrung-out mess. He was clear on the fact that they couldn’t be together and she should give the thing with Bruce a shot, but he also all but said he loved her. Actually, what he said was ‘I can’t be in love with you’, which basically meant he was in love with her. And she…she was…

Fuck. The truth was that she was in love with Bruce just as much as she was in love with Oliver. It was sick and insane but it was the truth. As much as she had wanted to avoid it, she was a total Laurel right now. She called him wanting to get some closure but now she just felt raw. She had more history with Bruce but Oliver had always needed her more. He was always more tangible for some reason. Even though Oliver had always been a bit more out of reach in a lot of ways he had always felt more like hers. With Bruce there had almost been too much history whereas with Oliver there had been nothing but possibilities which is why his rejection had cut so much deeper than anything she’d ever felt before.

Her whole life she’d been Felicity Fox, daughter of Lucius and the other woman. Luke and Tam always assumed she didn’t go to all the activities and functions they had attended as kids because she wasn’t interested but, the real truth was, she didn’t go because she didn’t want them to have to defend her to their friends. She didn’t want them to grow resentful of her presence in their lives or have to justify her right to the name ‘Fox’. She always stayed with their father because he needed her there and because he never made her feel like she didn’t belong. Even then she always felt a bit overshadowed by the ghost of Evie. He clung to her because of her mother and sometimes, in her darkest thoughts, she wondered if he ever really saw her for who she was and not just as his last tangible connection to a woman who had lied to him throughout their entire marriage whether he knew it or not.

As a child she always worried that he’d leave her behind eventually because she wasn’t really his. Everyone was always saying she wasn’t really his daughter and part of her wondered if someday he’d realize that as well. She also felt some measure of guilt because Lucius’s first wife, Tanya, had always been so kind and loving towards her to the point of allowing her to call her ‘Mama T’ and treating her like one of her own. She could have chosen to reject her or ignore her entirely but she never did. She longed for a mother, fantasized about a life where they could be a regular family and not just a patchwork built out of odd weekends and holidays, only to come to the eventual conclusion that she was the reason for all of it. If she had not existed Tanya and Lucius would have been able to salvage their relationship and their family would have been made whole again.

She never told Lucius about that but she knew he sensed that there was something there. She always got very quiet whenever Tam and Luke went ‘home’ with Mama T. He always thought she was just lonely for children her own age and he’d offer to send her to camp or arrange playdates but she’d just smile and tell him she’d rather go to work with him or stay home with Peggy.

Felicity spent much of her early childhood sitting in the corner of Lucius’s office coloring or reading a book. She was so quiet and so well-behaved that most people never even noticed her after a while. In fact, she became so good at being quiet that Lucius and Mama T got into a rare fight over it. One night, unbeknownst to them, she overheard Lucius and Tanya arguing in low tones about how Tam and Luke had been so rambunctious and loud and how she was always so silent and still in comparison. She remembered Tanya urging Lucius to let her take her to one of the Foundation’s clinics and Lucius adamant that nothing was wrong; that’s when she learned the art of babbling. She’d smile and ramble a bit and they’d all relax and leave her alone, no one ever seeming to notice that although she always seemed to say a lot, in reality, she’d never really say anything at all.

She learned to hide in plain sight that way. As long as she pretended she was happy, her family was happy, so she hid. When people made cruel remarks or left her out she just pretended not to care.
She’d find Lucius and be happy for him because he needed her. When he expected her to go to parties and travel like Tam and Luke did with their friends she pretended not to want to go because she didn’t want to hurt him by admitting that she didn’t get invited to those parties and she never told her siblings about the cruel little asides their ‘friends’ made when they weren’t around. She just learned not to be there when they were or to fade so far in the background no one ever noticed she was there in the first place. If they did notice her, she’d just smile and ramble until they got bored enough to move on.

At home though, home was different; she had Lucius and she had Tam, Luke, Peggy, and even Mama T. It was enough for her; they were her world and if Evie’s ghost was a burden she had to bear then she could pretend for as long as she had to in order to keep them. Then, after Peggy told her the truth about her mother, she hid that from him because she wondered if he found out the truth…if he stopped loving Evie, would that mean he’d stop loving her as well?

When she was eighteen her world changed all because of that secret and yet no one ever noticed. By then she’d learned to hide far too well for anyone to see her pain. The feeling of displacement she’d always felt, the disconnect, increased a thousand fold. To everyone looking from the outside in she appeared to excel at everything; she was at the top of her class, wealthy, attractive, and living a perfect life. In truth she was beyond lost. She had no purpose, no direction. Her entire life felt like one huge lie and she had no one to talk to; no one who could understand what it was like to live a half-life.

Whenever Oliver or Sara would talk about their past, the sex, drug, and alcohol fueled haze of one party after the other, she would merely listen and nod without saying a word. They’d both get this look in their eyes when she just listened to them talk without offering any platitudes or looks heavy with pious judgment. It was like they couldn’t believe that she could be so accepting of their mistakes but that was because they had no idea just how close she came to becoming them once upon a time. How easy would it have been to lose herself in a bottle or in the bed of some random stranger? At her lowest point that could have been her.

When Luke left for Africa and she was all but done with MIT she would sit in her apartment alone, the silence almost deafening. How easy would it have been to sneak into one of the parties raging around the campus and lose herself for a few hours? After the incident in her freshman year she’d avoided Greek Row as much as possible (even though Sebastian had long since been expelled) but loneliness and boredom had inspired her to see what the big deal was. Within ten minutes she was in an ambulance because she’d made the mistake of eating a pot brownie laced with nuts. She’d made it a joke, even fudged the truth a little and claimed it happened her freshman year instead so they’d assume it was something she’d quickly gotten over, but the truth was that several students at that party had been expelled or put on academic suspension earning her the title of the Kraken of Greek Row since it was the second frat she’d managed to nearly destroy just from her presence alone. After that, and the ensuing crackdown by the administration when her father found out, she was pretty much persona non grata at MIT. Even some of the professors began treating her with a cold shoulder or were outright hostile toward her. Suddenly her work on LAIR and her article in Scientific American took a second place to the scandal she’d left in her wake and she was done. Luckily, she was past all her exams so the backlash was more social than academic but still; continuing at the University as a member of the faculty someday was definitely off her list of career opportunities. The damage was done.

She returned home after defending her thesis a shell of her former self. The weight of her secret married with her feelings of isolation weighed heavily upon her. Luke was gone, Tam was in Europe, and she could barely look her father in the eye. The job offers were coming in steadily after she published but still she felt lost. She was eighteen years old, just a few months shy of her nineteenth birthday, and she felt like her life was over already. She could see her future completely mapped out plain as day; she’d take some job, get her own place, work hard, keep to herself, and go through the motions of having a real life but it would be a lie. She’d see her family on the odd holiday, send emails, and talk to them on the phone, but she’d just be babbling about everything and nothing at all the same as she always had. The idea of ever having a romantic relationship with another person never even occurred to her; not because she thought she was unattractive or because she had a lack of self-esteem, but because she just couldn’t see the point. Besides, she’d never developed any social skills and the idea of even trying to connect to another human being on any level of intimacy just seemed too exhausting. No one ever wanted to see beyond the façade and maintaining it took effort. It was just easier to put up the walls and be alone.

Then, just as she had pretty much resigned herself to a life of limitations, Bruce was asking about her article in Scientific American and everything clicked into place. She saw his secret plain as day, saw his pain just as raw and hidden as her own, and she knew she had a purpose. Even if her whole world fell apart as a result, she had a purpose.

Bruce became her safe haven because, for the first time in her life, she found a place where she belonged.

Even though he was the Bat and lived his life half in shadow, she understood him. No one ever got to see the real Bruce Wayne just like no one ever saw the real her. She’d learned a long time ago not to stand out. When you stand out people notice you and that invited more problems, more negativity. She learned to stay quiet, to blend into the background from a very early age. Bruce did that only instead of being quiet he was loud and visible but somehow just as hidden as she was. Where she used a smile and a string of babble, he used the playboy persona. As soon as she saw that, made that connection, she was gone; their age gap, his scars, the darkness within his heart, none of it mattered to her. He was a kindred spirit and she had finally made a human connection. She didn’t fall in love with the Bat, she fell in love with the man in the shadows. Unfortunately for her, the man in the shadows had been the Bat for so long he no longer thought of himself as a man at all.

She miscalculated and dropped her shields to let him in and he, in turn, did the same. For one lost weekend she finally understood what it meant to be touched and touch in return. It was like the fog lifted and everything began to make sense. Her world went from a dull haze to HD clarity in an instant.

Felicity stared down at her hands. They were good hands; small but with elegantly tapered fingers and well-manicured nails. She could type over 145 words a minute, break into almost any encrypted system, write code at the drop of a hat, and save lives with those hands. Still, how often do people get the chance to just touch another human being with any level of intimacy beyond a brisk handshake? Other than her immediate family she’d never touched anyone. Yes, she received the odd hug from friends of her father or one of his employees but it wasn’t the same as intimate contact. For one weekend she’d had that.

Not only could she say the words that had been trapped inside her heart for far too long but she could chase the feelings with touch. He allowed her to reach out to him in not just a sexual way but an intimate one. Her fingers had traced his cheek, smoothed the fine lines at the corners of his eyes, scraped against the morning stubble of his beard, wandered across the planes of his chest, and explored the textures of his bronzed skin. He, in turn, had introduced her to a world of sensations she had never known existed; the feel of his fingers as they tangled in her hair then slid down her sensitive neck causing her to break out in goosebumps, his lips and teeth tugging on her earlobe and causing her mind to explode in pleasure, the jolt that came when he ran his fingertips across the swell of her throat and the hollow of her collarbone, the simple feeling of his hand clasping hers as he pulled her onto his chest and closed his eyes. The sound of his breathing became the sweetest lullaby she had ever heard and, although she would never admit it to him now, she did dream of a life at his
With his heart beating a steady tattoo under her ear she dreamed of silly girlish things. Not of weddings or children, that was too much to ask for even in her wildest imagination; no, she dreamt of belonging to him and of him belonging to her in return. She wanted to crawl inside his chest and stay there. She imagined a life where she would always feel his arms around her, his heartbeat in time with hers, a place where she could exist in peace and contentment and she did for three nights and two days during one all too brief autumn weekend. She wasn’t afraid of guns or madmen, she wasn’t afraid of the darkness, she was afraid of being alone. With Bruce she didn’t feel alone...until she was.

She wanted to stay in that moment forever even though a part of her knew it couldn’t last. Even so, when his rejection finally came, it was as though she had been plunged into darkness once again. Her only solace had been her memories of that one moment in time. Nothing could ever take that away from her. She had touched and been touched in return and it was enough.

After the pain had lessened she’d turn on the television and watch as couples kissed and thought, ‘I remember what that felt like’. She’d walk down the street and see people holding hands and flex her own as she remembered the feel of large strong hands and rough calluses. She’d listen as the other techs gossiped and chatted, always keeping to the periphery with a soft smile as they talked of the most mundane aspects of their lives. They used such exotic words as they spoke: boyfriend, husband, kids, home.

Home; a place where you belonged, a place with no secrets and no fear. Home was where the walls came down and life happened. She started going out to estate sales and antique malls, scouring Craig’s List and EBay for the perfect little addition to the home she was creating for herself. She painted and built, she bought books on decorating and sewing; she was alone but maybe, just maybe, she could still have a home and it kept her mind off the loneliness for a little while. That lasted for a few months until the final pillow had been placed and the paint on the walls had set and then she sat back on her heels and realized…

…what good was home if there was no one to share it with.

She walked into QC that morning a little dimmer than she had been. She tossed the magazines in the trash and picked up her phone intending to get to work and then Oliver entered her life and the darkness began to lift once more. One look at that laptop and she was going to send him on his way, she really was, but…

It was fun and the cobwebs began to clear and then he smiled at her…

Still, she was determined to do things differently with him. No matter how much she wanted that human connection she could survive without it as long as she had the rest. She spent her days waiting for the next assignment then after he’d sweep out of her tiny office she’d laugh at the ridiculous excuses he’d come up with as she solved his problems one right after the other—but always with one eye on the Arrow and the other on herself, the mantra ‘I will not get involved’ playing in her mind. After a while it became almost like flirting and she responded to it but never let it get under her skin. She kept her distance even if she was skirting the edge. Again, it might not have been everything, but it was enough. Then Walter was kidnapped, Oliver was shot, and distance became harder to come by.

She didn’t have to hide when they were in the basement of Verdant; in that dark and dank space she could finally be herself. Even though she seemed to hide her past, the truth was that Oliver got to see more of her than anyone else ever had. She dyed her hair and changed her name but beyond that she was pure Felicity. For him she was herself; only he and Diggle ever saw it though. When they were alone she could be smart and funny and sassy and she never had to bear the burden of being Felicity.
Fox; she was simply Felicity Smoak, tech wizard and woman without a past. They didn’t seem to notice her darkness because, compared to their own, it seemed almost nonexistent. If she hid it wasn’t because she was trying to deceive them, not on purpose. It wasn’t about hiding her past from them; it was about creating a future with them.

She left Evie’s ghost in Starling City and it was all because of them and they never knew. They always wondered why she stayed with them; she could see that question in their eyes when things would get bad. Diggle would give her a supportive look every time another one of Oliver’s women would sweep in and treat her like she was somehow less and he, in response, would allow it. She’d catch the other man’s looks of well-intentioned pity and then his disbelief as she assured him that her feelings for Oliver weren’t romantic and that it was okay. He never believed her but it was true. She wasn’t as bothered by the thought of another woman capturing Oliver’s attention and affections as she was by the fact that when Oliver found a connection he tended to shut everything and everyone else out.

That part always scared her; the thought that she would become redundant and unnecessary, but she’d put her head down and dig in even harder every time. At her lowest point, when it felt like she was a ghost and they all seemed to look through her too focused on each other to even notice she was in the room, she endured. She put aside her pain and her need for that connection to be the tool they couldn’t do without even if it meant sacrificing her own feelings. She kept it about the mission even when it got personal. It was just like any other mask she’d learned to wear; put up another wall, shake it off, and keep going forward because they were worth it. Every time Oliver would go too far, ask too much, overstep some invisible boundary she’d see the fear in his eyes; the little shadow that she knew meant that he was waiting for her to leave but she never did. She could never leave because that basement was her home. It was more her home in many ways than this one was.

And now it was gone.

At times, yes, it could be frustrating playing the role of Felicity Smoak. Sometimes when Laurel, or Moira, or even Thea back before they had actually become friends seemed to look through her like she was a nothing little nobody she wondered that if they knew she was Felicity Fox, daughter of one of the richest and most successful businessmen in the world, would they treat her the same way? It seemed so easy at first to play at being the poor worker bee that didn’t touch the trust fund that rivaled Oliver’s. It had begun as a grand social experiment on her part; a way to prove to herself and the world that she was more than just the daughter of the social climbing husband stealer. She could become self-made like her father had been and, at first, she thought she had really done something, but she learned very quickly that she had been laboring under a hubris. She scrimped and saved and clipped coupons like a ‘normal’ person and shopped at outlet malls only to discover that the true sacrifice wasn’t the lack of money, it was the lack of privilege. Money in and of itself can buy you many things but it can’t buy respect. As Felicity Fox she’d had that, or at least the illusion of it. People could be unpleasant but their cruelty never got beyond a whisper or a left handed compliment when she had her father’s claim on her through the name ‘Fox’. Felicity Smoak though; she was a nobody. Finding out just how much she’d come to depend on her father’s name had been a shock.

She was taken aback when she’d discovered that truth about herself. Felicity had always shied away from the spotlight, she was always determined to make her own way, but in her weakest moments the questions would pour out of the darkness in her heart until she felt suffocated by them: Would Laurel have snidely referred to her as Oliver’s ‘secretary’, implying that she took his dictation on her knees, if she had known that she grew up in just as rarefied a world as Oliver? Would Moira have stared her down like a bug if she had been introduced to her by Lucius instead of Oliver? Would that woman have dared to dismiss her with haughty superiority if the Felicity who had confronted her had been more than just an employee? Would Thea have snapped ‘Who are you?’ when she brought flowers to Walter’s hospital room if she had known that her stepfather had trained under Lucius and thought of her father as a mentor and friend?

And what about Walter? Had Oliver been correct; had her life been meaningless to a man she had risked her life for? Did he see her as Felicity Fox, daughter of his mentor? Felicity Smoak, loyal employee? Or was she just the daughter of the other woman and therefore expendable? As hurtful as all of that was, as long as Oliver saw her for who she really was, it was enough. The temptation was always there but he never seemed to need to know the details of her life in order to appreciate what she was capable of. That made hiding and enduring easier even when it seemed to cut to the bone some days.

At least, that’s how she used to think. Now she had to wonder.

If Oliver had known her as Felicity Fox would he have pushed her deep inside the shadows and pretended not to see her as he slept with one woman after the other? Or would he have pursued her then dumped her with the same casual cruelty he had been famous for before his experience on the island? He told her the past didn’t matter but it did. It mattered to him whether he admitted it or not. He told her that he had wanted her for a long time before they’d finally slept together but he only acted on those feelings after he found out who she was. Maybe the truth was that until she’d been revealed to be his social ‘equal’ he just didn’t think she was worth his attentions? Maybe as a tech girl she’d been beneath him but as an heiress with a trust fund she was fair game? Maybe she really was all too replaceable after all.

She shook her head. That wasn’t true, she knew that wasn’t true. That was just the darkness talking.

When Sara had come back from the ‘dead’ and joined the team and she saw how Oliver seemed to blossom around her she’d been devastated. It wasn’t that they were sexually involved, not really. She’d come to accept that Oliver would never see her as anything other than what she was a long time ago. What bothered her was the sudden realization that she didn’t really belong there; Sara did, she’d just been unknowingly keeping her seat warm. Dig and Oliver tried to reassure her that she was important but they thought she was merely jealous. They didn’t get it; they couldn’t understand that it wasn’t about some silly crush for her. It was about being alone again.

She liked Sara, even then, but in the beginning it was hard for her to accept the fact that the other woman could just step inside the life she had built and own it completely and without effort. She knew it wasn’t that easy, of course. Sara had just as much baggage as Oliver did; their darkness was one and the same. In her lowest moments she found herself even coveting that. Sara thought of herself as broken but she couldn’t see what Felicity saw: strength, resilience, intelligence, and sexual empowerment. Even as her affection toward the other woman grew so did her envy in many ways. Many a bottle of wine, and even a few bottles of tequila, had been emptied with the other woman telling Felicity about her trials and tribulations. Sara had become her mentor and she her sounding board. She would drink and listen as Sara talked about her past, her present, her family, her fears, and she absorbed it all in a mixture of empathy and envy. The empathy came from her understanding what it was like to feel just a touch out of step with the rest of her family. The envy….that was harder to explain.

She listened as Sara told her stories about the mistakes she’d made, the reputation she’d acquired in her adolescence as a ‘boyfriend predator’ and later as a party girl. She spoke of her bisexuality and the lovers she had left in her wake. She talked about the overwhelming guilt she felt for hurting her sister by sleeping with Oliver but that she couldn’t regret it either. She talked about becoming an assassin and the lives she had destroyed, one after the other. All that guilt, all that pain, and yet all she could see was the fact that Sara had actually lived while Felicity had merely existed; a shadow on the periphery, a fleeting image at the corner of your eye easily dismissed and then forgotten. Sara was a constant reminder of the fact that Felicity had wasted so much of her life but she was also her inspiration to do more with what time she had left. Sara had given her so much, taught her so much, and in repayment she…

Felicity closed her eyes against the pained expression being reflected back at her from the vanity mirror. “I’m not doing this,” she muttered as she pulled on a thick pair of socks and reached for a short pair of studded cowboy boots. Whinging about the past was a waste of time. She wasn’t some teenage girl who Facebooked her depression with quotes about broken-winged doves; she was a grown woman and she would deal with this like an adult. She had to in order to make it through today.

She stared sadly down at her boots. They weren’t her usual style; they were an impulse buy but something about them had appealed to her. They were intentionally distressed with scuffs on the heels and toe and decorated with copper, silver, and black studs on the shaft of the boot with a large studded star design on the toe. They were funky and a little tacky but they looked cool with jeans and she never got to wear them in Starling City because it was always either too hot or she never had time to dress down enough to wear them.

Her entire existence for the last two years had been spent in pencil skirts playing Oliver’s Girl Wednesday but the first thing she thought about when she saw them on sale several months ago was how much Sara would like them. Maybe it was a sister thing, or maybe it’s just something she learned from living with Tam, but she had fallen into the habit of buying clothes and shoes knowing they’d wind up in someone else’s wardrobe eventually; the boots for example. Unlike Tam however, Sara actually had some moral objections to outright wardrobe theft so Felicity would often buy clothes for ‘herself’ then give them to her because she ‘changed her mind’. Sara never completely bought the lies but nine times out of ten she took the clothes anyway.

Sara and Laurel’s relationship had never been stellar and, although they had somewhat reconciled briefly after her return almost two years ago, it was far from warm and fuzzy. Again, the words ‘too much bad road’ came to mind. In the world of vigilantes relationships often burned hot and cold. With her and Sara it started out a bit tense and awkward but, after a couple of weeks when she finally decided to get her own head out of her ass, Felicity got with the program and started warming up to her. It helped that Sara actually treated her like more than just office furniture, especially after Felicity had taken a bullet for her. In a lot of ways Sara reminded her of Tam; they had the same joy for life although Sara’s had been dimmed by pain and experience. The odd nap on her couch turned into her regularly crashing at her place and, once they established they wore the same size, the friendship was set in stone. In the months that followed they became more than friends, more than teammates; they became sisters.

It sounded weird that she could consider a woman who had at one time been an assassin for the League akin to a sister, but she did. They had nothing in common really, other than Team Arrow and a similar body type, but she trusted her; she even loved her. Sara was the only person on Team Arrow she’d ever talked to about her family even though it was just the basics. Not only that but Sara had kept her confidences just as surely as Felicity had kept her own. They had a bond built on spilt blood, tequila, and the fact that they both wore a size six shoe. According to Tam it was basic girl law: A friend will help you move, a best friend will help you move the body, and a sister will pull the trigger for you. Add in the mix the possibility of doubling your wardrobe and you’re set for life.

She looked down at the boots again and glanced at her reflection in the mirror. Not bad, she decided at last. Plus they were low heeled and she could wear her thick wool socks so her toes didn’t freeze.

Gotham winter weather was getting really old really fast.
She pulled out the black zip up wool jacket and long wine-colored scarf she planned on wearing today and took them out with her as she headed to breakfast even though the last thing she wanted right now was food. The noise was nice though, she thought. She could already hear her family arguing around the table.

Hearing Peggy and her dad argue soothed her in the same way listening to the hollow metallic sounds of the eskrima sticks clacking together while Dig and Oliver sparred in the basement did. There was a rhythm and a life to it.

“Damn it, Peggy! It’s Saturday! I deserve a real breakfast on the weekends!”

Felicity looked down at her father’s plate with a frown after she hung her coat and scarf on the coat tree closest to the entrance to the TV lounge. “What is that?” There was some kind of white omelet with an off colored piece of cheese on top and two links of what kind of looked like oddly pale sausage along with his usual beige glob of unadorned oatmeal in a bowl next to his plate.

“Exactly!” Lucius crowed in triumph. “Even Baby knows that this isn’t right! I told you I wanted eggs and sausage for breakfast—the doctor even said I could have a decent breakfast every once in a while—and you give me this—this—what the hell is this?”

“Thanks Peggy!” Luke said with a grin as he began digging in.

“No, that’s breakfast!” Lucius practically shouted as he pointed accusingly at the towering platter of food in front of her brother. On his plate was a stack of fluffy whole wheat pancakes, several links of sausage, crispy bacon, a cheese omelet, and a steaming bowl of oatmeal with chunky pieces of raisins, dates, dried cranberries, brown sugar, and cinnamon. He already had a foamy mustache from the huge mug of hot cocoa he had been drinking.

Even Felicity had to admit that making her dad watch Luke eat all that was akin to torture, especially given how he was enthusiastically pouring warm maple syrup all over the entire thing.

“Do you want some breakfast, Baby?” Peggy asked her, ignoring her father.

“Just coffee,” Felicity said, sitting next to her brother. “I’m not really hungry.”

“Are you feeling alright?” Peggy asked, narrowing her eyes at her suspiciously. “You don’t look like your usual self today.”

“She probably took one look at this glop and it turned her stomach,” Lucius muttered as he tasted his eggs. “Ugh!” He dropped his fork with a clatter and pushed his plate away. “What kind of cheese is that? It tastes like plastic!”

“It’s tofu cheese; Tam told me all about it,” Peggy said, pointing to the various components of his breakfast. “The whole thing is vegan, which means it has no bad cholesterols in it. See? Tofu cheese, egg substitute, tofu sausage, and oatmeal.”

Lucius stared at his plate in horror. “That’s it; Tam is out of my will and you’re going to the damn nursing home.”

“Try it!” She snapped at him, swatting him with a dish cloth. “How do you know you don’t like it unless you eat it first?”

“It’s tofu! Of course I won’t like it!” He said stubbornly.
“Morning,” Luke garbled at her through a mouthful of pancakes.

“Morning,” she muttered back as she sipped the coffee Peggy handed her.

Peggy walked over to the counter and brought back a bright yellow box, “See; it says chicken-free eggs. No cholesterol, no gluten, no fat, no sugar—"

“No flavor!” He threw down his napkin. “Look here woman; there is no such thing as a chicken-free egg unless it’s laid by something other than a chicken! I don’t know what the hell a tofu is but I do know it doesn’t lay eggs!”

“You just shut up and eat!” Peggy ordered as she stomped away, muttering curses under her breath the whole time in Mandarin.

The Central Plains or Zhongyuan Mandarin Peggy spoke was slightly different from the more formal and standardized Beijing Mandarin Oliver was fluent in but hearing the soft curses, so similar to the ones he would mutter and spit whenever he was in a particularly bad mood just brought the memories back to the surface and she gazed into her cup morosely.

“What’s the matter, Baby? Peggy’s right, your color is off,” her dad said pulling her out of her depressing reverie.

“Nothing,” she said, stifling a yawn. “Just didn’t sleep very well, I guess.”

Peggy came up beside her and placed her hand across her forehead as she examined her tired eyes and sallow cheeks carefully. “I think you are getting sick. You should get back in the bed and I’ll bring you something for it.”

“I can’t,” Felicity told her. “I’m meeting a friend from Starling City for lunch today. Besides, I’m fine. Like I said I’m just a little tired.”

“Hmph!” Peggy crossed her arms stubbornly, “You shouldn’t go out in this weather if you are sick! You’ll catch the pneumonia.” She nodded firmly, “I’m calling Dr. Schwartz. He gave me his home number for emergencies.”

“I don’t need to go to the doctor,” she said wearily. “Besides, I already went yesterday.” As soon as the words left her mouth Felicity closed her eyes and prayed for a swift and painless death.

“You went to the doctor and you didn’t tell me?” Peggy asked in her Loud Voice.

“I just went to get a…B-12 shot,” Felicity told her quickly. “For energy since I’ve been a bit run down. By the way, Caity at Dr. Schwartz’s office told me to say hi.”

“You saw Dr. Schwartz? Without me?” Peggy asked sounding almost hurt.

“Actually I saw one of the other doctors at his medical practice and, anyway, it was a last minute thing,” she said quickly. “I promise if I still don’t feel well by Monday you can take me back, okay?”

“No! No one will be sick!” Peggy said, perking up. “We’re having my special chicken soup for dinner tonight. You bring that friend of yours and I’ll call Tam so she and that bad boy can eat too. He probably has all kinds of bad germs that need killing.”

“The soup with the garlic and the ginger?” Lucius asked quickly, his scowl disappearing in an instant.
Luke looked up eagerly, his mouth filled with maple syrup drenched decadence, “And you’ll make those little ginger snaps and spiced almond cookies?”

“Yes,” Peggy told him then pointed a withered finger in Lucius’s direction, “but no cookies for you. You can’t have any sugar; the doctor said.”

“Damn it, he said my sugar was borderline and that was months ago!” Lucius said angrily, the scowl now firmly back in place.

“Dr. Schwartz told me that being borderline diabetic is like being a little bit pregnant; there’s no such thing! Either you are or you aren’t!”

“I am so sick of hearing that man’s name every five minutes,” Lucius grumbled as he poked at his non-eggs. “You should just marry the man and move into his house if he’s such a paragon of medical knowledge!”

Peggy stopped suddenly and patted her hair thoughtfully. “Well, he is a widower…” She cleared her throat then smoothed her hands over her apron, “Who is this friend of yours, Baby? You should have him meet you here so I can cook you both lunch instead of eating bad restaurant food.”

“It’s not a him, it’s a her,” Felicity said quickly disarming Peggy before she launched into full Yenta mode. “Her name is Sara and I already made plans to meet her in Midtown but I’ll ask her if she wants to come to supper tonight, okay?”

“Sara?” Peggy asked, her eyes lighting up. “And this friend is your age?”

“A little older; she’s actually closer to Luke’s age.” As soon as she recognized the light in Peggy’s eyes she bit her lips and glanced over at her brother. Luckily he had on his ear buds and was rocking out to his iPod as he studiously ignored the usual breakfast antics between Peggy and their dad.

Oh well, she thought, better him than me.

“And is Sara married or does she have a boyfriend?” Peggy asked, pouring herself a cup of tea and sitting between Felicity and Luke.

It really was like watching a mongoose track a cobra, Felicity took a slow sip of her coffee as she watched her dad take advantage of Peggy’s inattentiveness to reach out and snatch a piece of bacon off Luke’s plate. Luke looked up at their dad with his mouth open to say something but Lucius gave him a dangerous glare and the other man closed his mouth with an almost audible pop.

“She’s not married and I don’t think she’s seeing anyone in particular,” Felicity answered her although she really felt horrible for throwing her brother under the bus like this.

Then again…alien irradiated lion centaur.

Eh, he could handle it.

“Good! Good!” Peggy reached over and snatched the ear buds out of Luke’s ears.

“Hey!” Luke protested only to wince as Peggy smacked him in the back of the head.

“Pay attention! Your sister is talking about her friend Sara who is coming to have dinner with us tonight!”

“So what does Sara do?” Peggy asked sweetly as she turned to Felicity once again.

“She, um, works for an international charity kind of like Luke,” Felicity said honestly.

Okay, honest adjacent. ‘Charity’, like ‘special project’, was mask-code for mission. After she figured that one out she couldn’t help but giggle every time she threw a quarter in the fundraiser jar at her corner bodega. It definitely put a new spin on telethons. Every time PBS had a fundraiser weekend she’d imagine Maggie Smith kicking ass in a cape then sitting down to afternoon tea afterwards.

“What kind of charity?” Luke asked, his attention suddenly fixed on his sister. So much so he missed the look of triumph on the elderly woman’s face next to him as she mistook his Bat-ness for curiosity about a potential love match.

“Mostly women’s issues, kids, stuff like that,” Felicity said vaguely. “She sometimes helps with Oliver’s missions…overseas.” She and Luke shared a significant look. She felt a little twinge of anxiety at revealing the Canary’s identity to her brother but it was Luke and he needed to know that if she was going to be in the company of a Mask today that it was a friendly or she’d risk having him follow her all day; or worse, alert the rest of the Bats.

Even if he was still a little ticked at Bruce she knew Luke well enough to know his protective instincts would always override everything else.

“Wait, what?” Luke’s focus suddenly switched back to Peggy.

“Is she Jewish?” Peggy asked ignoring him.

“Peggy, no!” Lucius said at the same time Luke began sputtering. “Luke is a grown man and he can meet a girl on his own! Besides, it doesn’t matter if she’s Jewish as long as they love each other.” He added in a way that he probably thought was helping but really, really didn’t help at all.

“That’s true,” Peggy said with a sage nod of her head. She turned to Felicity again, “Do you think she would convert?”

“I’m not getting married to anyone!” Luke burst out.

Waving a dismissive hand toward him Peggy asked, “Is she pretty?”

“I don’t care what she looks like; I refuse to get set up with some random friend of Felicity’s!” Luke said stubbornly.

“Gorgeous,” Felicity answered her without hesitation. “Petite, blonde, incredible figure—she could be a model if she wanted to.”

“I don’t—” Luke paused then turned to his sister, “Got a picture?”
Chapter Twenty-Nine

Sara walked into the diner just before noon dressed in her usual slim fitting jeans and black sweater; her black leather biker jacket a bit more worn than she last remembered but Sara’s smile was just as bright as it had always been. The jacket was a bit of a good luck charm and she wore it constantly despite the fact that she knew the woman had accrued a fairly decent wardrobe since more than half of it had been provided by Felicity herself.

Sara was almost as big a wardrobe thief as Tam although, again, not nearly as obnoxious about it.
“Hey Cutie,” Sara said, kissing her cheek briefly before slipping into the booth across from her. She snatched up a menu and scanned it quickly, “Have you ordered yet? I’m starving. All I’ve had to eat in the last twenty-four hours are airline pretzels and some suspect falafels.”

“I’m good with coffee; I’m not really all that hungry,” Felicity told her.

Sara slowly lowered her menu and looked at Felicity dubiously. She sighed and folded the menu, placing it on the table in front of her. “Okay, what’s going on? And since when aren’t you hungry? You eat more than anyone I know and yet you still weigh like two pounds. Spill.”

“I slept with Oliver,” Felicity said quickly then cringed. “Sorry, I wasn’t intending to just blurt that out but—“

“You and Ollie finally had sex?” Sara asked quickly, a smile playing around her lips.

“You’re not mad?” Felicity asked, surprised.

“Mad?” She snorted, “Hell no, you just made me fifty bucks! I had a bet with Roy that the two of you would get together after I left Starling and now the little bugger owes me. I might have to swing by and collect.”

Her jaw dropped, “How—?”

“Oh please,” Sara said, rolling her eyes. “There was so much UST between you and Oliver it was ridiculous. Even when Ollie and I were together I could tell something was there within five minutes of entering the Lair.” She picked up her menu again, “I don’t mind telling you that after you and he would get into one of your Loud Voice episodes where you would wind up calling him on his shit, I usually ended up with an orgasm that had your name written all over it.”

Felicity gaped at her, “What?”

Sara waved her hand dismissively, “Not like that…” She paused, “Well, no, actually I wouldn’t mind that but you’re straight so—anyway, I just meant that fighting with you always seemed to rev Ollie’s engine, if you know what I mean. For a while there I didn’t know whether to hate you or thank you. I was even a little worried that I was stepping on your toes by being with Oliver. Shades of Laurel and all that.” She frowned suddenly, “If you finally got Ollie to make his move then why the hell are you in Gotham and not Starling City?”

“Yeah, um, that’s a long story,” Felicity said licking her lips nervously. “I’ll tell you everything but first I need to ask you a few questions and I need you to tell me the absolute truth, okay?”

Sara’s gaze sharpened and she slowly put her menu down again. “Although I might not have always told you everything, I’ve never lied to you outright, Cutie. Shoot.”

“Did you tell the Orbital Organization about Oliver and the mission?”

Sara blinked in surprise, “No, they never even asked about him. How do you know about the OO?”

“Before I tell you that, I need to know how well you know a woman named Isabel Rochev.”

“I don’t,” Sara said with a frown. “Wait, isn’t that the bitch who keeps riding your ass at QC; the one you called the Trans-Siberian Tramp?”

“That’s the one,” Felicity nodded. “So you didn’t know that she was high up in the organization’s chain of command or that Stellmoor bankrolled their operation?”
“Stellmoor? No,” Sara’s mouth tightened. “Look, I would never compromise Oliver or the team, you should know that. I do work for the OO sometimes but as an independent operator. They send me out on a few missions, bankroll some of my operations, but I don’t really know much about their set up; plausible deniability and all that good shit. All I know is that they do good work.” Her face was open and her voice dropped to a confidential level, “Listen, I don’t know this Isabel person but the mission I just finished was an OO job. I was sent out with a team to Paris where we broke up a human trafficking ring. It was a coordinated effort by six different teams spanning three continents and we saved kids as young as six from being sold as sex slaves on the black market. I don’t know what’s going on but whatever else happens I do know that those kids are safe tonight because of what we did.” She sighed and sat back in her seat, “Now, why don’t you start talking and tell me what exactly has been going on with you and Oliver since I took off and what the Orbital Organization has to do with it.”

Their waitress stopped by at that moment and she and Sara quickly gave her their orders. Sara wound up ordering something called the ‘Kitchen Sink Burger with extra Sink’. It was so huge it took up an entire platter as an open-faced monstrosity that had to be eaten with a knife and fork and consisted of a pretzel bread sub roll with four thick patties of well-seasoned angus beef, six slices of cheddar, smoked provolone, Colby Jack, Swiss, fresh Mozzarella, and smoked gouda and then topped with just about every conceivable topping you could think of including their ‘World Famous’ smoked barbecue chili with beans, coleslaw, grilled onions, bacon, jalapenos, double-fried French fries, and then topped off with four huge onion rings.

It had to be at least 50,000 calories, 10,000 fat grams, a million carbs, and was the most obscene thing Felicity had ever seen in her entire life.

Luckily her appetite had returned once Sara had given her some of the answers she needed so she turned around and ordered the same thing but she made sure to get it with a diet coke as to assuage her food guilt.

As soon as the waitress left she began to tell her story, sparing few, if any, details and pausing only when their food got there. She didn’t see the point of holding back as Sara had told her early on into her rambling confession that she intended to go to Starling to offer her support to the team in the wake of her absence and also to assure Oliver that she had not betrayed them. After a moment’s debate she even told her about her relationship with Bruce and his identity as the Bat. After all, even if Dig or Oliver managed to keep his identity under wraps she’d eventually meet Tim and Barbara and figure it out for herself. Either that or Roy would blab it out the second she popped her head into the Lair. Besides, telling her established not just trust but friendship and she needed to keep Sara as an ally.

Also it nice to be able to shock her adventurous friend with tales of her own sexual exploits for once.

“Holy shit! You fucked Batman!” Sara hissed quietly. “Batman? And you didn’t tell me?”

“To be fair it isn’t that easy to work something like that into a conversation,” Felicity shrugged.

“Bullshit!” Sara snorted, “Sometime between that bottle of Patron and the Grey Goose we liberated from the bar when I was telling you about the time I had a foursome with Oliver and a couple of female exchange students from Sweden you could have worked in ‘By the way, Batman busted my cherry in his Batcave,’ and, I promise you, I would have paid attention.”

“Well, the whole thing’s a mess now,” Felicity said ruefully. “Oliver can’t be around me without turning into a maniac apparently, Bruce is an ass, Isabel has gone from being the Boss from Hell to the Handler from Hell, and I don’t know what I’m going to do about any of it. I mean, do I feel bad for sleeping with Bruce even though Oliver basically kicked me out of his life right after having sex with me and basically gave us his blessing? Should I slink back to Starling with my tail between my legs or should I try this thing out with Bruce even though it has ‘mistake’ written all over it? Do I continue to see Jake or do I break it off because, yeah, we just had lunch one time so far and I made it clear that I wasn’t on the pull, but it’s still a little skeevy to introduce a guy to your family after you’ve had naked-funtimes up against a window by the man you’ve been lusting after since you thought Barney was the shit, right? And what about the Orbital Organization? So far they seem legit but I still have serious vibe ping-ling left and right and I think I should keep pursuing it but if I tell Oliver or Bruce they’ll put me under house arrest and storm the gates.” She sighed, “If they really are legit then I could do so much good in the world and, if they aren’t, then I’m the best shot we have to get the answers we need. I’d be on the inside, up close and personal. How do I turn that kind of opportunity down?”

“Wow, that was one full tilt ramble there, Cute-stuff,” Sara said looking impressed. “You didn’t even stop for air once that time. First things first: You should definitely take the job at the OO. Worst case scenario is that you uncover some dirt and then call in the troops to bust it up. Best case, you finally get to do what you do best and save lives using that huge brain of yours.” She gave her a reassuring smile, “I know the boys all think you’re this blonde ball of fluff but I know better and I’m on your side here. If you want me in Starling to touch base with Ollie and Dig then that’s where I’ll be but I’m going to check in with you every chance I get and as soon as your friends are settled I’m coming back to Gotham to spend some time in your new Orbital digs. I’m already under contract and I’ve been steadily taking more and more assignments from them, plus they obviously know that we’re connected so it shouldn’t raise too many red flags if I decide to stick around for a while as your back up.”

“What about Oliver though?” Felicity asked tentatively. “Can you keep this a secret from him? Because if he finds out—“

“Look, I’m not saying I agree with how you went in there with no back up and no exit strategy but I understand why you did what you did and I also get why you want to keep the testosterone patrol out of the loop for a while,” she said ruefully. “I won’t tell Oliver until I have to, but for now it’s just us chicks so relax, Cutie; I’m here now and I’ve got your back.”

Felicity took a deep breath, “Thanks. Until now I didn’t realize just how scared I was at the thought of doing this all on my own.”

“Yeah, well, that was stupid,” she said flatly. “As far as I’m concerned you should have called me the minute this shit started coming together.”

“I know, I’m sorry,” Felicity said quietly. “The truth is that I was ashamed of sleeping with Oliver when I knew things were still on and off with the two of you and I was afraid to tell you about it.”

“You have nothing to be ashamed of,” Sara reassured her then sighed. “Hey, I won’t lie to you and say it doesn’t sting a little. The truth is that part of me still hopes that someday Oliver and I will manage to get it together but, right now, we are both way too damaged to be in anything approaching a healthy relationship. Besides, Oliver is…” she made a frustrated noise, “He’s stuck. His whole life he’s been stuck in that house and in that life and he doesn’t know how to get unstuck and I, well, I’ve been running away for so long I don’t even know if I can stop. Together we’re just one big mess but with you he…you made him smile, Felicity.” She gave her a tender look. “I never made him smile the way you could just by walking in the room.”

“He doesn’t want me,” Felicity reminded her. “He said it was for my own good but he literally exiled me. He even told me I wasn’t allowed to return to Starling City. I honestly think he might have my picture posted at the border.”
“I never said he wasn’t an idiot,” she said disparagingly. “Besides, he practically ordered you to go be with Bruce so the last thing you should do is feel guilty. That’s bullshit and, if he ever did do that, he’d be a hypocrite! He may have changed since the island but he’s still the same guy who would talk about moving in with my sister while he had his hand buried in my crotch. I guarantee that if he felt guilty about cheating on Laurel it went away the second he saw a nice pair of tits jiggling in front of his face. I wasn’t the first girl he slept with when they were together—hell, I wasn’t even the last.” She gave her another assessing look. “What do you want? If it’s Oliver then you should just ignore his crap and hop the plane to Starling to hammer this out once and for all, but if it’s Bruce then you need to move on and make the most of it. Trust me, angsty love triangles aren’t all they’re cracked up to be.”

“It’s not that simple,” Felicity said morosely. She looked up, “Is it possible to love two people at the same time?”

“Yep,” Sara told her, “but you always wind up loving one of them just a little more or you find yourself drawn to the one who needs you just a little more than the other. Sometimes it’s a matter of choosing the person who chooses you, you know? Sometimes it simply comes down to self-preservation.”

“What do you mean?” She asked quietly.

She took a centering breath and Felicity could see an old and all too familiar pain in her eyes, “Sometimes, no matter how much you love someone, you come to a point where you realize that no matter how either of you feel they just aren’t a priority. They’re important, yes, but they aren’t as important as they should be. I loved Nyssa, I did, but I knew I needed to be with my family more. When I found out Slade was coming back after everyone I loved I had no choice. I know that’s not the same thing as loving two people but Nyssa had become my family. In some ways she was…she was home but you guys were my family, you know?” she paused, her brow furrowed in pain.

“I know what you mean,” Felicity said quietly. “I know you and I haven’t really talked about what happened when you left with Nyssa after the Blood Army thing or how she took it when you came back to help with Slade, but I wanted to tell you I’m sorry. I might not fully get it, but I could tell that you both really cared about each other.” She quirked a smile at her, “Nyssa was actually pretty nice to me when we met. I kind of liked her.”

“She liked you, too,” Sara said with a snort. “She said she appreciated your ‘light’, whatever that means. Before I left she even mentioned you specifically; did I tell you about that?”

“No,” she said furrowing her brow. “Should I be flattered or scared that a general in the League of Assassins remembered my name?”

“Flattered,” she said with a chuckle. “When I told her Slade was back and that I had to leave because Oliver felt like he might be targeting you specifically, she said that I should stay close to you; that you had obviously been ‘touched by the gods’ and if my journey led me to your side that I should accept my fate and act as your protector.”

“Wow,” she said, her eyebrows shooting up in surprise. “I had like a five word conversation with the woman; I had no idea I made that big of an impression. So I take it that your second break up wasn’t as traumatic as the first one? You didn’t say anything so I just assumed…”

“It was good,” she said. “Honestly, our last break up was very amicable compared to the first one. No kidnappings, no poison, just a kiss and a hug between friends. She even released me with her blessings and said that to serve as protector to Starling would be the same as showing my loyalty to Ra’s
“That was…nice of her,” Felicity said stunned.

“Nyssa was like that; she was mercurial at times, but she had a way of seeing inside of people. It was like she could see right into the heart of things. She knew I had to go so she released me. I mean, yeah, she had her faults but she was also brave, loyal, fearless; I’ve never loved anyone as much as I loved her, not even Ollie. She became my entire world but it was too much, she was too much. There was no wiggle room, no shades of grey; it was her or nothing and I can’t live like that. I tried; twice, it just didn’t work. My family needed me, the team needed me, so I left. Every day I think about going back to her. I don’t,” she said firmly, “and I won’t, but I want to some days. I don’t know if that’s love or some kind of remnant of an unhealthy addiction like a smoker who quit twenty years ago but still wakes up wanting a cigarette. I guess I miss the intimacy we shared,” she said wistfully. “It’s the little things I miss; the way she’d hold me or how we’d soak in the tub together after a hard day, laughing with her while we prepared dinner or just seeing her smile. Yeah, she was a deadly assassin who poisoned my sister and kidnapped my mom but she had her moments,” she said wryly but the pain was still there, just under the surface.

She knew that pain. For once she didn’t have to covet Sara’s; she had plenty of her own to spare.

“That’s just it; I don’t have that with either of them,” she told her, before adding, “Not that I want Bruce or Oliver to kidnap my dad but, anyway,” she shrugged. “The truth is that despite what you guys thought you saw, Oliver and I never shared any kind of intimacy until we did and that consisted of an aborted grope on a conference room table followed by a night of sex a few days later that ended with him giving me the same blow-off speech Bruce handed me. With Bruce it’s worse because sometimes I think it’s more than just sex but I don’t know if I can ever trust him enough again to find out. Besides, he’s pretty adamant about the whole ‘undefined relationship’ thing. I’m not saying I want to get married and have a bunch of kids someday but I’d like to know the possibility was there, you know? With Bruce it just feels like all give and no take and with Oliver it’s all take and no give.”

“Well, if it would help I could give Bats a test drive that way I could offer you an informed opinion,” Sara said with a naughty smirk. “After all, you slept with both of them; I figure I should get at least one good roll in the hay out of it.”

“Funny,” Felicity said flatly as she sipped her Diet Coke.

“Oh, do I detect a hint of someone being territorial?” Sara asked.

“I don’t know,” Felicity whined and pushed her plate away from her as she folded her arms and laid her head on the table. “This isn’t going to end well, is it?” She asked, her voice slightly muffled.

Sara reached out and stroked her hand over Felicity’s hair comfortably, “I don’t know, Cutie Patootie; it could go either way. I don’t know your Bat but I can tell you that Ollie’s definitely too broken for a picket fence life and he probably won’t get there for a while so if you stick with him it’s going to be a long time getting there. You might want to consider freezing your eggs kind of long, if you know what I mean. As for Juicy Brucie,” she sighed dreamily, “the thing you told me about with the office; that was hot. Of course, the thing in the car where he basically offered you the opportunity to be his on-call sex buddy proved he was a total ass…albeit a totally fuckable ass,” she winked. ”Are you sure I can’t take him out for just a little test drive?” She asked then added another naughty wink. “No need to be jealous, hot stuff; you could watch and then maybe engage in some audience participation.”

Felicity gave her a crooked smile and propped her head on her hand, “What are you going to do if one day I actually take you up on your offer?”
Sara arched an eyebrow and gave her a slow grin, “Oh, I have an entire list of things planned for that day, Cutie; don’t you worry.”

“You’re impossible,” she snorted.

“I have been told that before,” Sara said with a filthy grin. “Seriously, you should give the velvet underground a try. The best thing with girl on girl is that you don’t have to spend $49.99 plus tax afterwards.”

“That is a definite selling point I will admit,” she said dryly. She took another bite and moaned in appreciation. “Maybe it’s for the best that I’m doomed to be alone forever. I can eat all the chili and onions I want and never have to worry about death breath while kissing someone.”

“I’d still kiss you,” she told her as she took another bite of her own.

“You know, of all the women to sexually harass me lately, I like the way you do it the best,” Felicity told her sincerely.

She chuckled, “Tell you what, if Isabel hits on you while I’m in the room I’ll grab your ass and tell her you’re my bitch, okay?”

“That is, seriously, the nicest thing anyone has said to me in a long time,” she told her, laying a hand over her heart.

“Oh honey,” Sara said shaking her head, “you have been having a bad couple of weeks, haven’t you?”

“Try years,” Felicity said dropping her fork on her plate. “Wouldn’t it be great if I could wave a magic wand and get them to both date me at the same time?” She paused then added, “While simultaneously getting over their stupid vigilante man-pain angst and stop being total buttheads.”

“Oooh,” Sara breathed. “Better yet, get them to ‘date’ each other, too. I’d pay good money to sit in on that action. If you’re lucky it could end in a devil’s three-way and, boy howdy, talk about a good time had by all,” she said as she took another bite of the mess on her plate. “Oh man, I am stuffed.”

She looked at the remnants of her lunch. “I don’t think I’ll be able to eat for days after this but it was delicious. I’m definitely going to need a workout later if I’m ever going to fit in my leathers though.”

She looked at her plate as well, noting that although she had somehow eaten more than the other woman she could actually still go for some cheesecake. She shrugged mentally, “That reminds me, you’re invited to dinner tonight for some Chinese chicken penicillin and matchmaking.”

“Say what now?” Sara said, the fork laden with chili and fries paused halfway between the plate and her mouth.

“Remember me telling you about Peggy Ann?” Felicity reminded her.

“Your foster grandma, yeah,” she nodded.

“She told me to invite you for dinner tonight so she can set you up with my brother, Luke.”

“The one who works with kids in Africa?” Sara said wrinkling her nose a little. “I don’t know. I mean, I’m sure he’s a great guy and everything but an ex-assassin dating a guy running a foundation for former child soldiers in the Congo? I don’t think we’d have a whole lot in common.”
“You’d be surprised,” Felicity said dryly. “Besides, it’s a free meal and you’d be the only member of Team Arrow to get to meet my family, not counting Oliver because a business proposal isn’t the same thing as watching my dad and Peggy yell at each other over the dinner table.”

“Okay,” Sara said with a shrug. “What time do you want me to come over?”

“It’s the weekend so we tend to have dinner early so everybody can do other stuff. Peggy usually has mahjong with all the other yentas and my dad is constantly going to one fundraiser or another but he likes to eat first because he has about as much patience for tiny food as I do. I’d say around five or so?” She asked. “In fact, if you don’t have any plans I thought we could just hang out after. I met a guy who DJs at a reggae club if you want to check it out and blow off some steam.”

Her eyebrows shot up, “Sounds cool. I only brought a small duffle bag with me though. All I have is a few pairs of jeans and my leathers.”

“Come on,” Felicity said as she took a few bills out of her wallet and threw them on the table. “Hey, you don’t have to get that; I should at least pay half,” Sara objected.

“It’s my treat; besides, you may be an international woman of mystery but I have a trust fund,” Felicity pointed out archly. “Anyway, I stole the cash out of Bruce’s wallet so lunch was really on him.”

“True,” she conceded as she put her jacket back on. “Where are we going?” She asked as she followed her out of the diner.

“My place. Oliver and Bruce destroyed most of my clothes but I’m sure we can find you something. If not, we’ll grab Tam and go on a shopping spree. If you thought I was good at bargain hunting you should meet my sister.”

“Yeah, I had to sleep on your couch because you turned your guest room into a closet, remember? I don’t even think that’s possible,” Sara said wryly.

“Felicity Smoak; Bargain Ninja,” she deadpanned. “Hey, if we go shopping maybe we can find a nice sporting goods store or a gunsmith. I need to pick up a new cleaning kit and I’d really like to find a .41 short; you know, something I can keep tucked under an evening gown.”

“Yeah, Derringers are pretty cute. I have a double tap I can give you but it’s a .45; I even have a great thigh holster for it that pairs nicely with a garter belt.”

“Really? Yeah, thanks; a .45 is fine,” Felicity said with a happy grin. “That’s so sweet!”

“No problem. I would like to go shopping though; I need to pick up some more throwing knives and some ammo plus I really need to go shoe shopping. By the way, nice kicks,” Sara said, easing beside her and looking down at her boots as they headed down the sidewalk.

“Thanks,” Felicity said looking down. “They’re really comfortable but not my thing. I’m probably never going to get around to wearing them again but if you like them you can have them.”

“Yeah, definitely; besides, we both know you bought them for me in the first place,” Sara said.

“No, I didn’t,” Felicity said quickly.

“Bull crap, you’re constantly trying to turn me into your little paper doll. Not that I’m complaining,” Sara said with a smirk. “I hate to shop and with my schedule your closet is about as close as I get to “Busted,” Felicity shrugged. “My only defense is that I come by it naturally. Tam has conditioned me to over shop. She’s already torn through my wardrobe to the point that I need to go shopping again before I’m down to pajamas and the clothes on my back.”

Sara looked at her curiously, “You said she has a one bedroom condo on the Upper West Side?”

“Yes.”

“Where does she put all of those clothes?” Sara asked in amazement.

She shook her head. “I have no idea. I’m pretty sure she eats them.” Felicity turned to her, “I meant to ask if you wanted to stay with us at my dad’s place? He wouldn’t mind and the penthouse has tons of room even with me and Luke there. I guarantee it’s nicer than a hotel room in Midtown.”

“Yeah, maybe, we’ll see how it goes,” she said taking her arm before her voice dropped into a more confidential whisper, “Stay calm and keep talking. We’re being followed.”

“How many?” Felicity asked, forcing her lips to curve in a bright smile just in case there were cameras or surveillance equipment pointed their way.

“Just one,” she said in a cheery tone. “He’s a big mother though.” Her eyes scanned the crowd. “Let’s not do this out in the open. We’re going to duck into the alley and then you just follow my lead, okay?”

“Got it,” Felicity breathed.

They walked arm and arm, Sara occasionally pointing to something or stopping to look at one of the buskers on the sidewalk before ducking into one of the alleys. They walked a bit until they were far enough from the crowd not to be immediately noticed. One second they were having a pleasant stroll and the next she was wheeling on their stalker in a fury of kicks and punches.

Felicity ducked into a shadowy alcove, reaching into her purse for her weapon, and peeked out to see their pursuer handily blocking all of the other woman’s punches and kicks one handed.

One—“Sara, stop! That’s my brother!”

“Wha--?” Sara asked, her attention broken for just a split second but it was just enough to give Luke the advantage.

He swept her legs out from under her and grabbed her, causing her to spin until her back was pressed hard against his chest, his cast-free arm across her throat. “Nice moves,” he growled against her ear before releasing her.

“You too,” Sara said a little breathlessly as she moved slowly out of his reach. She stepped back, her eyes trailing down his form before the corners of her lips quirked upwards in a saucy grin. “Not something I expected from a school teacher or are Wing Chun and Aikido a part of the curriculum down in the Congo?”

“Sometimes,” Luke said in a deep voice that made Felicity want to give the two of them a lot of privacy while she washed her brain out with bleach.

Instead she just sighed and made introductions, “Luke, this is my friend Sara. She’s also known in the mask community as ‘Black Canary’. Sara, this is my brother Luke, aka WingBat.”
“Batwing,” Luke said with a scowl as he turned his attention to his sister. “And since when is it cool to go spouting out secret identities like that?”

“What’s a ‘Batwing’?” Sara asked with a frown. “I thought he ran a charity?”

“Seriously?” Sara asked dubiously. “That’s a thing?”

“Yeah, I didn’t believe it at first either,” Felicity said in sympathy.

“What the—” Luke glared at both of them. “I’m Batwing! It’s a real thing!”

Luke’s expression changed from anger to outrage and both women began to snicker.

“I’m just kidding,” Sara told him at last. “I have actually heard of Batwing, believe it or not. I just didn’t expect him to be Felicity’s brother or to engage in combat with him in an alley in the middle of Gotham.”

“You have?” Luke asked before schooling his features into a look of cool indifference. “I mean, of course you have and, uh, sorry about the whole pinning you thing.”

“No problem,” Sara said her eyes sweeping over his tall form once again. “It’s been a while since I had a good pinning.”

Ignoring her friend’s innuendo, Felicity spoke up, “Well, I’d never heard of him so you’re one up on me. I didn’t even know about Luke’s Bat-thing until a few days ago.”

“Well, that makes me feel a little better at least, but seriously; what is it with you and masks?” She asked. “Ollie, Bruce, and now your brother?”

“You tell me and we’ll both find out,” Felicity said with a wry expression.

“I’m still here,” Luke said, waving his good arm to get their attention.

“Like I could ever forget about you, handsome. After all, it’s not every day that a girl finds herself literally swept off her feet only to fall into the arms of an honest to goodness heroic bit of hunkishness like yourself,” Sara said looking at Luke’s bandaged arm curiously. “How’d you break the batwing anyway?”

“No, seriously; how’d you break your arm?” She repeated.

“No shit?” Sara said, looking from one to the other with raised eyebrows. “Wow, and I thought the Sewer King was a pot full of crazy.”

“Speaking of crap excuses; why are you following me?” Felicity asked, walking up so she could thump him on the edge of his ear.

“Ow! Damn it!” He yelped, clutching at his ear protectively. “I was trying to make sure you were okay! Next time I won’t even bother!”

“That’s so sweet!” Sara said with a flirty grin as she sidled up to him.

“Yeah?” Luke’s eyes locked onto the deep ‘V’ of Sara’s sweater before grinning back at her. “Well, she is my little sister after all.”

“Hmm,” Sara practically purred as she ran her hand up Luke’s heavily muscled arm. “You know, Felicity invited me over to your dad’s house for dinner tonight. Maybe we’ll see you there.”

“Definitely,” Luke said, flashing his pearly whites. “And maybe later you and I can hang out; maybe talk some shop?”

“Always good to hear from a fellow mask,” Sara said, returning his toothy grin.

“Should I just leave you two alone so you can get a room someplace?” Felicity asked sarcastically.

“I already have a room,” Sara said, not taking her eyes off of Luke. “A nice one with a king-sized bed.”

“Maybe you can show it to me sometime,” Luke said with an interested glint in his eye.

“Ew,” Felicity breathed.

Luke threw his sister an irritated look but Sara just smiled. “Your sister invited me to a club later tonight; feel like joining us?” She asked. “You could…keep an eye on us and make sure we don’t get into any trouble if you aren’t busy.”

“Keeping an eye on you sounds like a good idea. After all, a guy can’t be too careful when it comes to his little sister’s safety,” Luke said huskily, patently ignoring Felicity who was rolling her eyes at him. “For all I know you could be a bad influence.”

“The worst,” Sara said with a teasing glint in her eye. “And I’m way overdue for a good spanking.”

Luke’s jaw practically hit the floor before he got it together again. In a suave tone he puffed out his chest and said, “I’m getting the pins out later this afternoon so it would be nice to give my arm a workout.”

“And who knows, maybe we’ll get to work out a few of your other parts while we’re at it,” Sara said in sensual challenge.

“I’m out of here,” Felicity said, turning on her heel and heading out of the alley. She waved behind her, “You two have fun and make sure not to give me any of the details.”

“So Sara, what do your parents do for a living?” Lucius asked reaching for the crackers at the center of the table.

The entire family was seated around the large kitchen table eating bowls of Peggy Ann’s miracle cure soup. They had a formal dining room but rarely used it, preferring the intimate seating around the butcher block table in the breakfast nook. Tam had come to dinner as well although Tim was conspicuously silent as he sat next to Lucius, looking as though he’d rather be doing anything else, up to and including giving the Joker a bikini wax.

“Well, my dad—“ Sara began.

“No crackers!” Peggy said, snatching the plate out of his reach and placing it between Sara and Luke who she made sure were sitting next to one another.

“Then at least let me have a sandwich!” Lucius scowled in her direction.

“What happened between Dad and Tim the other night anyway?” Felicity whispered.

“He won’t say but every time I ask he gets this scared look in his eyes and finds a reason to leave the condo,” Tam snickered. “I think Dad is trying to get him to make an honest woman out of me or something.”

“Well, if he asked would you say yes?”

Tam seemed to mull that over, “Eh, probably, but can you really see Tim as a husband right now? Please. And even if I did say yes it would be a long engagement, I’m not ready to be spitting out little Fox-Drake-Wayne Juniors.” She paused, “Damn, that’s a long last name. Yeah, no, no hyphenating for me, that’s for sure.”

“You eat the soup as it is!” Peggy was lecturing their father. “Always with the more salt, more sugar! I should let you have all you want and then you’ll be sorry!”

“Damn it, Peggy, all I’m asking for is a sandwich and some saltines,” Lucius grumbled. “A cracker won’t kill me, woman! A man should be able to enjoy a meal in his own home without everything being an argument.”

“Don’t you argue with me,” Peggy told him. “I know what’s best! Dr. Schwartz even says so. I fixed the bad cholesterol, didn’t I?”

“The oatmeal fixed the bad cholesterol along with the fact that I started using the treadmill again,” he said stubbornly.

“And who made you eat the oatmeal? And who made you stop eating the bad restaurant food and start taking bagged lunches to work?” Peggy threw back. “I keep this family healthy. All of you would be sick if not for me. Look at Luke; he leaves home for Africa and comes back with a broken arm! If I hadn’t taken him to the doctor who knows what would have happened; his arm might have fallen off if not for me and now it’s practically all better.”

“Um, I already went to the doctor before I came home,” Luke spoke up between mouthfuls of grilled cheese.

“You shut up,” Peggy told him. “African witchdoctors don’t count! And Baby; look at Baby! The doctor gave her a shot and now she’s all better. If she hadn’t listened to me she’d have pneumonia by now.” She harrumphed. “Eat the soup, no crackers for you. I have to go check my cookies. And stop arguing with me in front of Baby’s friend!” She offered the younger woman a beatific smile, “Are you enjoying the soup, dear?”

“Yes ma’am, it’s delicious,” Sara said with an amused grin.

“Do you think it needs more salt?” Peggy asked sweetly.

“No ma’am, it’s perfect,” Sara told her.
“See?” Peggy told him gruffly.

“I like the soup, too,” Tim spoke up from beside Lucius.

“Shut up, Tim,” Lucius ordered.

“Yes, sir,” Tim said quickly, his attention going back to his plate of sandwiches.

“Excuse the rudeness of certain members of our family…and guests,” Peggy said giving Lucius and Tim a scathing look before turning back towards Sara. “Now, if you’ll excuse me I made my special cookies just for you.”

“Thank you, that sounds lovely; I would love to try some of your cookies, Mrs. Hu,” Sara said returning her smile with one of her own.

“See? ‘Some’ people have manners,” Peggy said tartly as she passed Lucius on the way to the kitchen.

“You’re not actually my mother you know,” Lucius called after her. “I’m a grown man, damn it!”

She spun on her heel, “You better be glad I’m not your mother! I’d have drowned you at birth and saved myself a lot of trouble! Nǐ mà lǎo shì rè wǒ…” she muttered under her breath as she headed towards the stove.

“You know you love me!” Lucius grinned at her making her grumble and stomp her feet as she threw open the oven door. “Luke,” he whispered to his son, “hand me a sandwich.”

“No way Dad, Peggy will get mad,” Luke said, pulling his plate that was stacked high with sandwiches closer.

“Boy, you give me a sandwich or I’ll break your other arm,” Lucius threatened in low tones.

“No way,” Luke shook his head.

“And here I thought you were supposed to be some kind of tough guy,” Sara said teasingly as she turned in his direction.

“Not when it comes to Peggy Ann, I’m not,” he said honestly.

Lucius grumbled unintelligibly turning towards Tim who had just taken one of the sandwiches off his own plate then snatched the other one before Peggy could catch him. The young man opened his mouth but shut it the second he caught the expression on the older man’s face, “You’re welcome,” he muttered under his breath.

“What was that?” Lucius asked with a dark look as he took an angry bite out of his pilfered grilled cheese.

“Nothing, sir,” Tim said quickly and handed him a cracker. “Saltine?”

“That’s what I thought,” Lucius said taking the offered cracker and putting it in his soup while hiding the sandwich in his napkin, one eye fixed on the elderly Chinese woman across the room. He looked back at Sara and fixed a pleasant smile upon his face, “I do hope you’ll excuse our bickering, Sara. We’re not usually like this.”

“You aren’t?” Tim asked with a frown, backtracking as soon as Lucius looked back at him. “I mean, no, no you aren’t, sir.”
“That’s okay,” Sara chuckled. “As far as I’m concerned it wouldn’t be a home cooked meal without a couple of good natured arguments thrown into the mix. Seriously, this is downright calm compared to dinner at our house.”

“In that case you’ll fit in fine,” Tim said ruefully then grinned brightly at his girlfriend’s father, “Because everyone is always so good natured here! Salt of the earth! Speaking of salt,” he said quietly handing Lucius the salt shaker under the table.

“Are you buttering me up, young man, or trying to kill me?” Lucius asked, taking the salt from him.

“Why? Did you want some butter?” He asked earnestly.

Tam waited until everyone was distracted and whispered, “Why’d you get a shot?”

“Depo-Provera,” Felicity said in a wry undertone. “Apparently I have lost the ability to remember to take a pill once a day.”

“$49.99 plus tax would add up after a while,” Tam mused. “Man, if I had to do that every single time…? Why this month alone…” She thought about it, “Yeah, that’s a lot.”

“Yeah, well, not that I’m planning on needing it but stuff happens,” she whispered back. “Especially when certain people are around. In addition to forgetting how to take a pill I’ve also forgotten how to keep my legs closed.”

“I better be hearing some details later,” Tam told her.

“Let’s just say that I’m lucky it was the window washer’s day off,” she said wryly.

“So Sara, you were saying about your parents?” Lucius asked in between taking bites out of the sandwich in his lap.

“Um, my mom teaches Greek and Medieval History at Central City University and my dad’s a detective with the SCPD,” she answered looking upon their antics with amusement.

“That’s wonderful,” Peggy said, bringing over a couple of platters of warm cookies, making sure to set the ginger cookies near Tam and Felicity and the spice cookies on the far end of the table closer to Luke and Sara. “Isn’t that—” she glared down at Lucius at then then narrowed her eyes in suspicion. “What is that on your face?”

Lucius cleared his throat and quickly wiped the smear of cheese off the corner of his mouth, “Now Peggy, we don’t want to argue in front of Baby’s friend, remember?”

“Humph!” Peggy gave him a dirty look, before turning a gentle smile back towards Sara. “So Baby says you work for a charity like Luke?”

“Yes ma’am,” Sara said with twinkling eyes, as she glanced at Felicity from across the table.

“Mask?” Tam whispered.

“That’s lovely, just lovely,” Peggy said, sitting next to her. “And are your parents religious by any chance?”

“Peggy Ann,” Lucius said warningly. “Sara might not be comfortable with those sorts of questions.”
“No, it’s fine,” Sara told him. “My dad is Catholic, although he rarely attends mass, and my mom’s family is Anglican and Jewish on my grandfather’s side.”

“Jewish?” Peggy’s eyes lit up and practically everyone at the table with the exception of Sara groaned. “Baby, you didn’t tell us Sara was Jewish!”

“That’s because it never came up in conversation,” she said as Tam snickered into her napkin beside her.

“And Baby said you work with women and children?” Peggy asked her quickly. “You know, Luke likes children.”

Lucius cleared his throat, “Speaking of Baby, I ran into Bruce the other day and he mentioned he was redoing the penthouse so you could move in. How’s that going?”

Luke turned to her, a fierce expression on his face, “Wait, you’re---” He stopped and cleared his throat, “I mean, are you sure that’s a good idea? The Wayne Foundation Building is in a rough part of town.”

“Thanks for your concern Luke,” Felicity said, shooting her brother a dirty look, “but it’s not that bad. It’s closer to Midtown than the East End and the building is probably one of the safest in the city. Besides, I might not be taking the penthouse after all.”

“What? Why not?” Tim asked before noticing the dirty looks Luke was shooting at him, “Not that it’s any of my business…”

“Part of the reason Bruce offered me the penthouse was so that I could work for him as a consultant on some special projects he had going. I got a pretty nice job offer yesterday and I might not be available to do a whole lot of consultant work if I take it,” she hedged.

“Oh? What company?” Lucius asked curiously.

“Mine,” Sara spoke up quickly, an easy going smile upon her lips. “That’s the reason I’m in town actually. Felicity wanted to ask me if she should take it and I told her she’d be crazy not to.”

“A charity?” Lucius seemed to mull that over. “That’s wonderful, Baby.”

“Yeah, wonderful,” Luke said in a less than enthusiastic tone. “And what is the name of this charity; you never said.”

“The Orbital Organization,” Sara answered for her smoothly, something she was very grateful for because she totally blanked the minute Luke asked. The last thing she wanted to do is give Luke too many clues; Tim she’d have to work on later, “We work with victims of human trafficking and abuse.”

“Very admirable,” Lucius said approvingly. “And what would you be doing exactly?”

“I’d actually be working at one of the IT support facilities,” Felicity answered although not with the same level of confidence as Sara. “Running it actually; developing software to track down suspected human rights violations and assisting in, um…”

“We do a lot of work not only with victims but with law enforcement as well,” Sara said, coming in for the save. “Felicity’s knowledge of coding and software development would save countless lives and the Organization donates both manpower and tech to assist law enforcement agencies such as Interpol in taking down offenders much like the Wayne Foundation does.”
“And where is this job?” Peggy asked.

“Here in Gotham,” Felicity told her.

“Me neither,” Tim said with a frown pointed squarely at Felicity. “And it’s based here in Gotham?

“Yes,” Felicity said, trying to control the urge to kick her brother under the table and toss something at Tim’s head.

“You’re welcome to look it up,” Sara said smoothly. “We’re actually listed alongside ABC Nepal, Alliance, and the Wayne Foundation as one of the top anti-trafficking charities in the world.”

Tim slipped his phone out of his pocket and began a search as she spoke before finally raising his eyebrows. “I’ll be darned,” he said looking up with narrowed eyes. “I wonder why I’ve never heard of them? I thought the Wayne Foundation had ties to just about every major ‘charitable’ organization in the country.”

“They just opened an office here which is why they were looking for someone to run it,” Felicity said quickly. “They’re actually based out of Seattle but have facilities all over the world.” She hoped. She glanced over at Sara and caught her slight nod.

Good, that means their cover was based on Stellmoor’s.

“Well, that’s good,” Peggy said. “That means you can live here with us.”

“I said I might not take the penthouse but I still want my own place,” Felicity told her. “My hours are going to be pretty crazy and I wouldn’t want to have to come and go at all hours of the day and night.”

“Why not take Bruce up on his offer then?” Lucius asked curiously. “Even if you might not be able to do a lot of consulting I’m sure he wouldn’t mind you still taking the penthouse. After all, it’s just sitting there empty.”

“The last thing she needs to do is move into Bruce Wayne’s bachelor pad,” Luke broke out in a huff then cleared his throat as everyone stopped to stare at him. “Because, you know, it wouldn’t look right,” he said looking pointedly towards Peggy.

“Luke has a point,” Peggy nodded stubbornly. “Listen to your son! Men who have no experience with proper ladies might try to take advantage of a young unmarried girl like our Felicity and I don’t like this ‘bachelor pad’ business one bit!”

“Now see here; Bruce is a good and honorable man,” Lucius told her.

Luke made a noise in his throat then grumbled, “I suppose that’s why he’s always in the gossip columns with some Victoria’s Secret model or bleached blonde floozy on his arm.”

“Aha! Listen to Luke! Luke knows!” Peggy said, pointing toward him in triumph, “If Baby wants an apartment then she can get a condo like Tam but she does not belong in the home of a man like that Bruce Wayne,” Peggy said stubbornly. “It’s not proper.”

“Since when is Luke an expert on proper behavior?” Tam asked wryly. “He does have plenty of experience with floozies though.”
“Not in front of Sara!” Peggy hissed at her before turning a bright smile toward the blonde girl at her side and speaking in an almost musical tone, “She was only joking. Luke appreciates respectable young ladies from good families like yourself; he’s a fine young man.”

“Very fine from what I can see,” Sara said, looking Luke up and down.

“That’s settled then! Baby will stay here with us and not with that bachelor.” Peggy spat out the word as though it were an insult.

“There’s nothing wrong with being an unmarried man,” Lucius told her.

“Of course there is!” Peggy looked at him as though he’d just uttered some form of blasphemy. “A man needs a wife to take care of him and children to carry on his name!”

“Hi, Mrs. Hu?” Tim said, holding up his finger as though requesting a point of order. “Timothy Drake-‘Wayne’; remember me? Yeah, I’m still here.”

“I know that,” Peggy said in a disgruntled tone.

“You know, most people like me,” Tim muttered as he rolled his eyes heavenward. “I happen to very likeable…”

“I still like you, Bunny,” Tam told him with a sympathetic pout.

“I do too but I’m not calling you ‘Bunny’,” Luke told him.

“Mr. Fox?” Tim said, turning towards Lucius hopefully.

Lucius looked at him flatly, “Are you still borrowing my daughter’s sugar?”

“Uh, I’ll just…finish my soup in silence…sir,” Tim said slowly as he turned his attention back to the bowl in front of him.

“See that you do,” Lucius told him in a deadpan before turning back to Peggy, “As for Bruce, despite what the papers may say, he’s a very nice man and I’m sure he has no ulterior motives. He’s just trying to do Baby a favor.”

Tam snorted and Felicity had to nudge her sister with her elbow to get her to shut up.

Peggy scowled at him, “Still, what about the floozies in the paper that Luke mentioned? Do you really think Baby belongs in the home of a man who keeps company with women such as that?”

“That’s right,” Luke said darkly. “You wouldn’t want Baby to be around a man who objectifies women, would you?”

“Because, as everyone knows, you’re an authority when it comes to behaving like a gentleman around respectable young ladies, right Pool Boy?” Tam said pointedly towards her brother.

“Alright enough!” Lucius said, putting his foot down. “I know Bruce well enough to say with confidence that he would never try anything with one of my girls without coming to me like a man and telling me first.” All three siblings and their friends shot each other looks. “Secondly, he doesn’t even use that penthouse; it’s been empty for who knows how long. The only time I’ve ever seen him use it is during the odd business ‘do or to catch a shower and a nap between trips. I doubt he’s stepped foot in it in over a year.” He looked around the table before speaking to the elderly woman again, “Now Peggy, as much as I would love to have Baby here, she’s a grown woman and she should be allowed to have her own space.”

“Fine, but she still doesn’t need to stay there,” Peggy argued, unwilling to back down quite yet. “That place is too big for her to take care of by herself and it’s in a dangerous part of town. She wouldn’t even know what to do with it.”

“I did have my own place back in Starling City, you know,” Felicity pointed out. “I managed that pretty well and at least with the penthouse I won’t even have to worry about rent or a long commute to work. The offices are located right there in the East End.” It was the truth…sort of. “I’d be safe as houses.” Again, sort of.

“I know for a fact that Bruce has a cleaning service to take care of the whole building including the penthouse,” Lucius told her. “If Baby needs more than that I’ll hire her a housekeeper myself.”

“Dad, I think I can make my own bed and vacuum the floor without help.” Okay, so she didn’t even know where her vacuum was anymore but he didn’t need to know that.

“It’s no problem,” Lucius told her. “I have a contract with a cleaning company who helps out Tam and Peggy Ann. It wouldn’t be that hard to arrange for them to go over a few days a week to your place.”

“Harrumph!” Peggy’s face grew stormy. “I don’t like that service! I can still take care of this apartment without their help! Those maids they send here move things around and try to get into my kitchen! I have to watch all of them like a hawk.”

“Woman, you are pushing eighty; stop giving me a hard time about getting you some help,” Lucius sighed, used to hearing that particular argument. “Whether you like it or not, sooner or later, you are going to have to slow down.”

“I don’t have to slow down,” she said, properly insulted. “I am healthy as a horse! I will outlive you! You’re the one who needs to slow down.”

“Fine, we’ll both retire to Florida and you can nag me to death in the old folk’s home! Now can we get back to Baby?” Lucius said, “If she wants to take Bruce up on his offer I don’t have a problem with it. She’s a grown woman and I trust her to make the right choices.”

“I know that!” Peggy said in a huff, “I raised her and her mother before her and I helped raise Tam and Luke, too! This is my family and I brought them up in a good home. I taught all of them to be kind, smart, and respectable people!”

“And I suppose I had nothing to do with it,” Lucius asked dryly.

“I did not say that,” she said, smoothing her wrinkled hands down her apron. “I just did more.”

“I swear before God, if you look up the word ‘cantankerous’ in the dictionary your picture is right there next to it, you know that?” Lucius grumbled, “Stubborn as an old mule,” he told her as he reached for the plate of cookies.

Peggy smacked him on the back of the hand and at his muffled ‘ow’ she moved the cookies closer to Luke. “No sugar!” She smiled at Sara serenely, “Would you like one of my five spice almond cookies? I make them with artificial almond extract because Baby has allergies but they’re quite good.”

“Thank you,” Sara said, obviously struggling to keep a straight face as she accepted a cookie and bit into it making an appreciative noise.

“Damn it, I run a multi-billion dollar corporation!” Lucius growled, rubbing his hand.

“No sugar!” She shot back, going from sweet to sour in an instant. “And I still don’t like Baby living in that-that ‘bachelor pad’ by herself.”

“If Felicity needs a roommate I could move in with her,” Tam said brightly. “I could be like her chaperone.”

Luke snorted as he tossed an almond cookie into his mouth, “Yeah, but who’d chaperone you? You’re being all scandalous with Wayne’s son over there, remember?”

“Dude! Respect the Bro Code!” Tim said with a scowl from beside Lucius who suddenly turned a jaundiced eye in his direction at the reminder of his daughter’s nocturnal activities. “Um, Luke’s just kidding…sir.”

“I have an idea,” Tam said with false gaiety, her hazel eyes flashing in her brother’s direction. “If Luke is so worried about Felicity’s reputation and safety then maybe he should move back to Gotham permanently?”

Luke’s jaw dropped in surprise but before he could gather his wits about him Peggy leapt on the opening she’d been given. “Yes! Luke should come back home!” She said, her wizened eyes lighting up again. “He should live with Felicity just like he did in college. They can take care of each other and he can make sure Baby is safe.”

“That’s uh, that’s—“ Luke stuttered.

“And you and Sara could see each other more often,” she smiled at the pretty blonde girl again. “Do you come to Gotham often for your work?”

“I do actually,” Sara said with a bemused grin.

“Don’t you want to see Sara again?” Peggy asked him. “She’s a beautiful girl; very smart, from a good family, and she likes children. You did say you liked children, yes?”

“Sure, love ‘em. Especially with ketchup,” Sara said, obviously just going with the flow at that point.

“Luke has the Foundation to think of,” Lucius broke in smoothly. “As lovely as Sara is,” he smiled at her briefly, “and as much as we are all enjoying her company, Luke has a responsibility to all those African orphans to return to Tinasha after his arm has fully healed.”

“That’s right!” Luke said, “The African orphans! You wouldn’t want me to abandon them, would you, Peggy Ann?”

Her face fell and she sniffed, “I suppose not.”

“Besides, my work takes me down to that part of the world occasionally,” Sara said, throwing Luke a flirty grin. “I’m sure we’ll run into each other sometime. Be nice to have a friendly face down there.”
“Really?” Luke asked brightening up considerably.

“Yeah,” Sara said. “I might just have to look you up sometime, Mr. Fox.”

“Sounds good,” Luke said smoothly. “Maybe I can show you the sights.”

“I hear the local wildlife can be pretty interesting,” Sara said, her eyes darting down to his arm that was now in a temporary brace since his pins had been removed.

“Living down there has its moments,” he agreed.

“That’s wonderful,” Peggy said clapping her hands together before looking crestfallen for a moment. “But who’ll take care of Baby if she lives in that penthouse all by herself?”

“Peggy, it has a doorman and 24/7 security,” Felicity pointed out in exasperation. “I don’t need anyone to take care of me.”

“And besides, if you’re so worried about the girls maybe you should just marry them off or something,” Luke joked as he exchanged flirty glances with Sara.

Felicity kicked Luke hard under the table and he winced. Tam, unable to reach him, threw a murderous glare in his direction. “What did I ever do to you?” Felicity mouthed in his direction.

“Mrs. Iberman’s grandson is a doctor,” Peggy said to Felicity, her expression going from disappointed to inspired. “He’s a gynecologist.”

“That’s handy,” Tam muttered.

“I can talk to her and maybe she can invite him and his roommate to mahjong. You and Tam can come meet them.”

“Wait, what?” Tim asked, looking up.

“What kind of doctor needs a roommate?” Tam asked wrinkling her nose in confusion.

“They’re just good friends!” Peggy said with a pleased look. “They’ve lived together since college. They have a beautiful home together, too. Nice brownstone. Mrs. Iberman says his roommate’s name is Marc and he makes a very good living as a fashion designer. Tam, you like nice designer clothes; maybe if you go out with him he’ll make you something?”

Luke started making a choking sound and hid his face behind his napkin as Lucius rubbed the bridge of his nose tiredly and avoided looking at her. Sara looked up towards the ceiling as she nudged Luke warningly with her elbow, Tim just looked mildly outraged at being completely overlooked as a potential suitor, and Tam’s lips quirked upwards as she cleared her throat before answering, “Um, thanks but I think I’m happy with Tim.”

“Damn straight,” Tim muttered. “Besides; son of a billionaire over here. I think I rate better than some fashion designer with a boyfriend and a brownstone.”

“Son?” Lucius said.

“Yes, sir?” Tim asked.

“I’m just starting to like you; don’t push it.”

“Yes, sir.”
“Felicity?” Peggy asked hopefully.

“I don’t really think I’m his type,” she said in a pained voice causing more snickers to erupt from around the table and even causing her father to bite his lip and snort out a quickly extinguished chuckle. “Besides I already met someone I’m thinking of going out with.”

“Who?” Peggy asked.

“Yeah, who?” Luke asked, the amusement leaving his expression.

“Jake Simmons.”

“Who?” Tam asked.

“Yummy McDriver,” Tim reminded her.

“Oh yeah, I almost forgot about him,” Tam said musingly.

“Dude!” Luke said in disgust as he looked at Tim. “‘Yummy McDriver’; really?”

“Hey, no! They’re the ones who came up with the name, not me!” Tim said defensively.

“No, see, it’s this whole Sex and the City thing they do,” Tim said quickly. “You know how Carrie calls JJ Preston ‘Mr. Big’? Well, Barb started calling this Jake dude ‘Yummy McDriver’ and it stuck; I had nothing to do with it, I was just there for the sushi.”

“You watch Sex in the City?” Sara asked slowly and all eyes turned to Tim.

“Um,” Tim froze like a deer in the headlights. “Nooooo comment.”

“I am so embarrassed for you right now,” Tam said flatly.

“Hey, I’m not the one who cried over Campbell Scott,” Tim shot back.

“It was a sad movie,” Luke said tersely.

“Dying Young?” Sara asked him.

“Yeah,” he said reluctantly.

“I love that movie,” she told him, her eyes lit up in sincerity and open admiration. “It’s one of my favorites; I even keep it on my tablet during long flights. I must have watched it a hundred times with my sister. I even read the book.”

“Really?” Luke ducked his head shyly. “I guess it is a pretty good movie...”

“How come he gets points for being sensitive because Campbell Scott regrew hair and I get nothing for Sex and the City?” Tim complained to Tam.

“Tragic love story versus shopping and promiscuous career women.” Tam raised a sardonic eyebrow and gestured as though weighing one against the other and finding his argument severely lacking. “You do the math.”
“If we can get back to the subject at hand,” Lucius looked around the table sternly. “I assume you’re talking about Jake Simmons with Wayne Security?”

“I met him the other day at Wayne Enterprises and he gave me a ride home,” Felicity said, suddenly feeling a little shy for some reason. “He gave me his card and offered to take me around the city, maybe see a few museums or something so we had lunch. That’s okay, right?” She asked him hoping she didn’t just get Jake in trouble. For all she knew there might be some kind of fraternization clause to his contract she wasn’t aware of.

“No, no, that’s fine!” Lucius said quickly. “Jake’s a fine young man.” He turned to Peggy, “Very polite and hard working. He just got out of the military and is already going places. Right now he’s part of my regular security detail until Monroe comes back but then he’s taking a job at our Central City branch as a security consultant.”

“Oh, that sounds good,” Peggy said wide-eyed. “Felicity, you should invite this young man to dinner. Ask him what kinds of food he likes and I’ll cook for him. He and your father can talk about business.”

“I already did. I meant to tell you but I forgot; I invited him to dinner on Friday at seven. I hope you don’t mind but when I talked about you he said he was really looking forward to meeting you and having a home cooked meal for once,” she told Peggy.

“Me? Really?” Peggy said with a delighted expression that took ten years off her face.

“After I told him about you he insisted on it,” Felicity told her, laying it on a little thick but it was working so she kept going. “When I told him about you he said you reminded him of his mother.”

“I like this boy.” She turned her attention to Tam with a scowl, “Why don’t you ever bring home any nice boys like that to dinner?”

“I’m right here!” Tim said throwing his hands up in exasperation.

“You don’t count since you made her get all dirty, remember?” Luke snorted.

“Hey, she was dirty long before…” Tim’s voice trailed off as he turned to look at Lucius who was once again giving him the evil eye. “I meant to say that I respect your daughter very much and would never do anything untoward or toward or forward to her, um, person; basically anything ending in ‘ward’ would be out of the question, sir.”

“See to it you don’t,” Lucius muttered darkly.

“That’s settled then! Having dinner with a young lady’s family sounds like a very nice date, very proper. Afterwards he could take you to the movies. Mr. Hu did that when we were courting. Your father and I could even come along for that. I like the movies.”

“Now you’ve done it. Talk about an epic fail,” Tam said under her breath from beside her.

“Crap,” Felicity breathed.

Even her father shot her a sympathetic wince. “Peggy, I think Felicity will be okay going out with this young man by herself. You and I can go to the movies over the weekend, if you want.” He glanced over at his cookie hoarding son and shot him a glare, “Better yet, you should take Luke! It’s been a while since you and Peggy Ann had a day out all on your own, son!”

“Yes, that would be so nice, Luke,” Peggy said happily. “And Sara, too! We can all go to mahjong.
We could go tonight!” She glanced up at the clock. “It’s still early. All of us can go—even Tim.”

“Thanks,” Tim said in a disgruntled tone. “Now she notices me.”

“Mahjong?” Luke looked from his dad to Peggy Ann’s eager expression and forced an apologetic smile, “Yeah, that sounds great but unfortunately we were all planning on going to a club after dinner.”

“We were?” Tim asked only to wince when Tam kicked him under the table. “Ow, jeez your family is violent,” he muttered.

“Shut up,” she hissed at him. “Or do you want to go to mahjong?”

“I like mahjong,” Tim mumbled rubbing his shin under the table. “I made Imperial Emperor as my high score last time I played it on my tablet.”

“What kind of club?” Peggy asked with a frown.

“Reggae,” Felicity told her. “I know one of the DJs and I thought we could all go out and support him. You know, as a gesture.”

Peggy seemed to waver slightly, “Well, that sounds very nice but all of you used to love mahjong, remember? Luke especially,” she turned to him. “You used to talk about it for days and days afterward.”

“That’s true,” Tam said with an evil grin as she turned to her brother, “Remember how Mrs. Horowitz used to pinch your cheeks and call you her little smushy mouth? Does she still play with the ladies group at the Kaifeng Steles Senior Center, Peggy Ann?”

“Oh yes!” Peggy said happily, turning to Luke and Sara. “I think you’ll enjoy it very much; I know Luke always did. I told the ladies how our Luke came back for a visit and all she could talk about is how much she was looking forward to seeing him again.” She looked over to the man in question, “She said she’s going to get her pinching fingers all ready for her little smushy!”

“Yeah, I remember her,” Luke said, rubbing his cheek as if anticipating the pain to come. “She’s the one who told me what a Sitz bath was. I could have gone my entire life without ever learning what that was,” he muttered.

“What’s a—“ Tim began.

“Don’t,” Luke shook his head. “Seriously dude, just don’t.”

“Do you like mahjong, Sara?” She asked, her eyes lighting up with matchmaking mania. “You can come along if you like.”

“I would love to go to mahjong,” Sara said with as much sincerity as she could muster. “However, Felicity already promised her friend we’d be there and Luke offered to take us just to make sure we arrived safe and sound; isn’t that right, Luke?”

“Oh, uh, yeah,” Luke said quickly. “After all; it’s a dangerous city and the girls need all the protection they can get.”

“That’s true,” Peggy said with a nod. “And Luke is very strong. He does all those fancy martial arts, you know.”
“So I hear,” Sara said with twinkling eyes.

“Tim and Tam could go,” Luke said, throwing his sister under the bus.

“Uh, no.” Tam said flatly. “We’re going with you to the club.”

“Nobody ever asks me what I want to do,” Tim muttered then caught his girlfriend’s glare, “Which is to join the rest of you at the club and listen to reggae music."

“So no one wants to go to mahjong?” Peggy said with a hurt expression.

Lucius sighed as he got up from the table, “Let me go get my coat.” He paused to point a stern finger at the elderly woman as he helped gather dishes to take over to the dishwasher, “But I’m telling you right now; you keep that Mrs. Horowitz away from me. Last time I went with you that woman pinched my cheek and not the one on my face!”

“That was just her medication,” Peggy said happily as she gathered up the dirty dishes. “Her aim is much better now.”

“Oh,” Tim said as he stared down at his phone that he had again taken out of his pocket. “Oh no.”

“What?” Tam asked.

“I just googled ‘Sitz Bath’,” Tim said staring down at his phone in disgust.

“I will never doubt you again,” Tim said, turning off his phone and throwing his napkin on top of it.

Sara turned to Luke, “I have to say; between dinner and the show you really know how to show a girl a good time.”

Luke turned to her with a rueful expression, “Yeah well, if you think that was fun you should stick around for breakfast sometime.”

“That an invitation?” She asked in low, husky tones.

Luke offered her a slow, wicked grin in response.

“You kids have fun tonight,” Lucius said after all the dishes had been cleared and he had put on his jacket. “Don’t stay out too late and be careful if you’re going to be out in Midtown traffic. Take a cab or get security to arrange for a town car,” he told all of them but fixed his gaze on Tam in particular.

“I’ll have you know I’m an excellent driver,” she objected.

“For NASCAR maybe,” Tim grumbled.

“Watch it,” she shot back.

“And no messes!” Peggy said sternly at Luke.

“Hey, the smoothie thing was almost five years ago,” he objected.

“Yes, and it was so bad your father had to have the kitchen ceiling repainted,” she told him as Lucius helped her on with her jacket.
“I left the room for like a minute,” Luke objected. “How was I to know the lid would come off like that?”

“Just stay out of the kitchen, son,” Lucius sighed.

“You’re so cute when you pout,” Sara whispered in his ear.

He looked up at her, his expression brightening considerably, and whispered back, “First off, I’m not pouting. And secondly, I’m this cute all the time.”

“Cocky, huh?” Sara asked under breath.

“Let’s not get ahead of ourselves,” he told her with a confident gleam in his eye.

Peggy put her purse over her arm then turned back to smile benevolently at them, watching their byplay with interest, “Sara dear, are you spending the night tonight? The guest room is all ready for you just in case.”

“Thank you, Mrs. Hu,” Sara told her. “I’ll probably be going back to my hotel though.” She looked at Luke from the corner of her eye and he returned her look with interest.

“Night kids,” Lucius called out as they left.

“See? I told you I know what I’m doing but you never believe me,” Peggy lectured him on the way to the foyer. “You always say I should leave things alone but I’m always right.”

“Woman, I swear…” Lucius said, shaking his head in resigned aggravation as he shut the door behind them.

“So, now that you’re moving into the penthouse can I be your roomie?” Tam asked as soon as Lucius and Peggy left the room. “Please?” She begged pitifully.

Felicity looked at her in confusion, “Wait; what? I told you, I’m not moving into Bruce’s place.”

“Are you sure about that? Because that’s not what it sounded like at dinner,” Tim said moving closer to the two of them now that their dad had left the table.

“No, I said I wasn’t taking Bruce up on his offer. I distinctly remember that Dad asked and I said I wasn’t taking it,” Felicity said slowly.

Tam gave her a knowing look, “Baby, you just told Dad and Peggy you were moving into Bruce’s place.”

“I didn’t—did I?” Felicity asked with a frown.

“That’s what I heard,” Sara said as she leaned over her chair and put her hand on her shoulder. “Hey, if you’re getting a penthouse does that mean I might actually have a bed to sleep on when I visit or are you turning the whole thing into one big closet like you did your last place? Because if that’s the case then I’m telling you right now I’m not sleeping on your couch. That last place you had was so drafty I might as well have been sleeping on the porch and if this place is as Zsa Zsa as I think it is then you better do better than pullout couches and futons.”

“She’s right,” Tam said, quickly deciding to cast her lot with Sara. “If Sara and I are both going to be practically living with you then we should get to have a say on which bedrooms we get and how we
“No pink,” Tim said quickly. “And no dust ruffles.”

“Tim, what is it with you and dust ruffles?” Tam asked in exasperation.

“I don’t know,” Tim said, scratching behind his ear apprehensively. “They’re just kind of bizarre and a little creepy to me for some reason.”

“You’re like Baby and the stupid kangaroos!” She told him.

“Kangaroos are dangerous and weird looking,” Tim told her.

“Thank you!” Felicity said nodding at Tim. “Now about these bedrooms, I told you I’m not—“

“I vote king-sized beds,” Sara said, glancing over at Luke. “You never know when you might need the extra room.” She grinned before continuing, “Also Sin might want to come visit along with Thea and Roy so we’ll need a guest room or two.”

“That place is huge! I mean, we’re talking at least five or six bedrooms; we’ll be fine,” Tam said airily.

Felicity looked around at the people crowded around her as she tried to figure out just when the penthouse she thought she had turned down suddenly became a group home for wayward vigilantes, “Wait, what are you--? Since when is everybody--?”

“And we’re still getting a dog, right?” Tim asked. “I distinctly remember someone saying we were getting a dog.”

“We’re definitely getting a dog,” Tam told him.

“Dogs are okay but I like cats,” Sara said musingly.

“We can get both,” Tam shrugged. “But I’m not changing the litter box.”

“Felicity is not moving into the penthouse,” Luke said stubbornly as he joined them but paused to give Sara a hooded look, “Although, if you were, the king-sized bed thing sounds like a good idea.”

She shot her brother a dirty look, “No, I’m not, and not because yet another man in my life thinks he can dictate what I can and can’t do, but because I don’t feel like giving Bruce any more encouragement.” She looked at all of them, “Things are complicated enough between us without me living in his apartment.”

“If you aren’t taking the penthouse then what was all that about at the dinner table?” Tim asked in confusion.

“He’s got a point,” Tam said with a smirk.

“That wasn’t me! Dad was just—just…” Felicity’s voice trailed off as she replayed the entire dinner conversation in her head.

“Crap.”
“Your boss owns his own nightclub; why are all of your clothes so boring?” Tam complained as she rooted through her closet.

“Now my clothes are boring? If my taste is so bad then why is half of what I own in your closet?” Felicity asked peevishly.

Tam peeked her head out to look at her with a frown, “Yeah well, for work it’s fine but this is a club. Where is all your leather and sexy short stuff?”

“The only leather I own is my shoes.” She frowned, “Although I might have a jacket or two in there. I still haven’t gone through everything.”

“They really destroyed your house?” Sara asked as she lay beside her on the bed.

“They left the chifforobe from my bathroom, six boxes of crap, and three racks of clothes. Other than what Diggle and I were able to sneak past them it’s all I have left,” she told her. “I did have a shopping spree on Bruce’s dime but most of that stuff is back at the penthouse.”

“We could go to Bruce’s penthouse and look through that stuff,” Tam said quickly as her head emerged from her closet again.

“You just want to do another closet raid,” Felicity snorted. “Besides, most of what I bought isn’t exactly club wear.”

“Okay, well, this is hopeless. Let’s go into my old room and see what’s in there,” Tam said, walking out of the closet with three garment bags and a pair of sling backs in her hand.
“What’s that?” Felicity asked gesturing towards the clothes slung over her sister’s arm. “I thought you couldn’t find anything?”

“I couldn’t,” Tam shrugged. “This is some stuff I meant to borrow the other day.”

“You know, I always thought you were kidding about your sister but now I totally get it,” Sara whispered in her ear.

“I’m going to have to go shopping again,” Felicity said morosely.

“Come on; let’s go see what’s left in my room,” Tam said motioning for them to join her.

Felicity and Sara got off the bed and followed her out. “I doubt you’ll have anything,” Felicity told her. “After all, you moved out like…” Felicity stopped at the open door to Tam’s old room, her mouth open in surprise.

“I think I know where your sister keeps her clothes overflow,” Sara said faintly.

“Yeah,” Tam said wrinkling her nose, “Dad made me get a storage unit for most of it but this is the stuff that wouldn’t fit.”

“Wow,” Sara said, peering in between the racks and racks of clothes and boxes. “Is there even any furniture in there?”

“Somewhere,” Tam said happily. “You guys wait out there and I’ll see what I can find.”

“Why are you stealing my clothes all of the time if you have all this?” Felicity demanded.

“I already wore all that stuff,” Tam shrugged. “You’re welcome to go through it if you want. I keep meaning to donate it to the Foundation Charity Drive but I never seem to have time to go through it all.”

“This is like a high fashion version of Hoarders,” Sara said in awe and she pulled out a gorgeous evening gown in a deep plum color. “Thea would go nuts in here.”

“Okay, no more ‘borrowing’ any more of my clothes until we go through all of this stuff,” Felicity said in her best Executive Babysitter voice. “Whatever you, Sara, or I don’t want goes to the Foundation, understood?”

“Whatever,” came Tam’s voice from the depths of the room. “We might as well go through the storage unit, too. Or, I should say, ‘units’.”

“You rent out more than one storage unit just for your clothes?” Sara asked her, shock written all over her face. “How big are they?”

“Just 10’ by 20’, and I only have two for the clothes,” came her muffled reply. “There’s also one for shoes and accessories and don’t even get me started on furniture. Ooh! We should get some of that stuff out of storage for our penthouse!”

Sara shook her head and looked at Felicity, “I will never again give you shit about your guest bedroom/closet. At least you actually had room to walk between the racks.”

“The bad thing is that I’m pretty sure that at least half of the stuff in there used to be mine,” Felicity said with a frown as she pulled a sweater dress out of the rack closest to the door. “Hey, I never even got to wear this! I looked high and low for this outfit and you swore you didn’t know where it was!”
“That’s because I probably forgot where I left it. What is it anyway?” Tam called out from the depths of her personal fabric jungle.

“That Kay Unger color block sweater dress!” Felicity told her.

“The brown and tan one with the cowl neck?” Came her muffled reply.

“Yes!”

“Oh. Well it wasn’t your color anyway but it looked great on me. In fact, leave it; I’ll probably wear it to the office.” She emerged from the closet and took one look at the dress in Felicity’s hand. “Yup,” she said, snatching it away from her. “That’s a keeper. Okay, here we go,” Tam said as she handled an armful of garment bags while juggling several pairs of shoes and her re-stolen dress. “We’ll have to change in Felicity’s room though,” she said, catching her breath as she attempted to blow a lock of dark caramel highlighted hair off her nose. Sara reached over helpfully and brushed the hair off of the other girl’s face before helping her with some of the bags. “Thanks,” Tam said cheerfully. “You know, I’m due some va-cay time since we’re between projects so I think I’ll take a few days off next week and we can go through all the units. If you’re still in town and don’t have any plans on Monday you can help me and Felicity and take whatever you want. We’re all the same size or close enough, right?”

“Sure. Besides, if nothing else good comes from this trip then at least I may never have to shop again,” Sara said with a grin. “One problem though: If it’s as bad as I think it is we might have to rent a cargo plane just to haul this load back to Starling City.”

“When I get a place I’ll make sure you have your own permanent guest room and you can leave some there and take the rest to Starling; I’m sure we can find you some luggage, too,” Felicity told her.

“Oh yeah,” Tam snorted. “I think I have a whole set of Tumi luggage you can have that I never even got around to using. We’re talking three big heavy duty cases and a couple of carry-ons so you’re set. Plus, between me and Baby, I’m willing to bet we have a butt-load of garment bags you can have.”

“Why do you have luggage that you don’t even use?” Sara asked, her expression one of awe.

“I work for Wayne Entertainment,” Tam told her. “I’m constantly traveling and scouting film locations or hopping the jet to go to one meeting or another so the production companies occasionally give me ‘gifts’. Between them, the red carpet gift bags, the fashion design houses sending me ‘samples’, and Baby, I never have to actually buy anything,” she told her.

“I am so glad to be a part of the machine that keeps you in freebies,” Felicity said dryly.

“Okay, you know what I don’t get?” Sara asked. “You guys are rich; I mean stinking, filthy, Ollie-rich, and you get more free stuff than you know what to do with; why is that?”

Tam threw an arm over Sara’s shoulders and leaned in confidentially (a move made all the more bold considering that Sara was one of the deadliest women in the world and that they had only just met one another, but Tam had the uncanny ability to make lifelong friends almost instantly. It was but one of the many qualities she’d always admired and envied about her sister), “The thing about rich people, the stinking filthy rich kind of rich people, is that we’re all complete cheapskates at heart.”

“Wait, I know plenty of rich people and they spend a lot of money,” Sara told her.

“Well, that’s because you’re from the West Coast,” Tam told her. “This is Gotham; we’re talking
New England Old Money; you’re from the land of the nouveau riche. New money and old money are from completely different worlds.”

Sara looked from one of the sisters to the other, “Seriously?”

At Sara’s raised eyebrows, Felicity nodded, “It’s weird but true. The nouveau riche spend and the old money saves.”

“Moira Queen seemed like pretty old money to me,” Sara told them, genuine curiosity lighting her features. Felicity didn’t really blame her. Sara came from an upper class mother but a working class dad and together they had raised their kids somewhere in the middle. Given her upper middle class sensibilities the idea of asking about money was considered the height of rudeness and it was always challenging dealing with those issues while maneuvering within the realms of the uber-rich.

One of the lesser reasons Sara and Oliver hadn’t made it was that discrepancy in ‘class’. While Oliver had no problem with Sara’s humbler roots, Sara had never been comfortable mixing in the same circles her sister, Laurel, aspired to. Middle class pride gave her an actual work-ethic and she believed in paying her own way. It was difficult being the girlfriend of Oliver Queen and be expected to wear ten thousand dollar gowns to a charity gala when you worked as a part-time bartender (and a non-paid mask) and not have to accept the occasional hand out. Even though Oliver didn’t get it, Felicity did. Every time Oliver expected his sometimes girlfriend to show up on his arm and handed her his card to go buy something appropriate, it felt less like the gift it was intended to be and more like an imbalance of power to someone like Sara who valued her hard-won independence above all else.

Their dissonance sprang from far deeper roots but that was a contributing factor. The fact that Sara felt comfortable enough to even expose herself to ask those kinds of questions was not lost on Felicity. She trusted them, she trusted her, enough to expose a bit of vulnerability and, weirdly enough, that was what finally helped to release her from some of the guilt she had been feeling since Oliver and she had their moment together.

Unaware of what was going on in Felicity’s head, the other two women continued their conversation without her.

“No, see, Moira Queen was old political money which is actually lower on the rich pecking order than even nouveau riche. It doesn’t matter how old their money is they will always be considered nouveau riche by the old money crowd because politicians are all show and no go, and the nouveau riche don’t respect them because they’re for sale even though they’re the ones usually picking up the check,” Tam told her.

“Are you saying Moira Queen was a ho?” Sara snorted.

“I can think of a few other things to call her,” Felicity muttered then started as both women started laughing at her. “Sorry-sorry, totally didn’t mean to say that out loud!”

“Do I detect a note of bitterness there?” Tam grinned at her sister. “What? Did Moira Queen once call you a secretary and asked you to fetch her coffee or something?”

“You didn’t tell Tam?” Sara asked with a frown then paused as Tam’s smile dropped and she looked at both women with a concerned expression on her face. “Sorry,” she told Felicity with a grimace.

“It’s okay,” Felicity said, reaching out to touch Sara’s arm comfortingly. “Let’s go into my bedroom and talk, okay?”
“So talk,” Tam ordered her the minute they walked into the room. Felicity sat on the bed with Sara as her sister stood in front of them, tapping her toe impatiently as she tossed the armful of clothes and shoes on the chair and vanity.

So Felicity talked. Sara already knew about Malcom Merlyn’s relationship with Moira and that Thea was his biological daughter so that came as no surprise to anyone except Tam. The thing that made both of them sit up and pay attention is when Felicity began to talk about the abandoned contract on her life that had brought Bruce to Starling city to begin with and how she thought that Moira may have had something to do with it.

The truth was, even though Oliver had all but eliminated his mother as a suspect, she still had her doubts. The timing was just too suspicious and Oliver, even though he knew what she was capable of, had a blind spot when it came to the women in his life. For the time being she had too much on her plate to chase down ghosts but, when all this was said and done, she was putting the hunt for whoever was targeting her on her to do list.

“Oliver thought Moira put a hit on you before she died?” Sara asked sharply, the laidback and soft spoken Sara fading into the background as Canary took center stage.

“He says he suspected her but they couldn’t find any proof and Walter denied it when he confronted him,” she told her.

“And that’s why,” Tam glanced over at Sara, “you-know-who brought you home?”

“So she knows about Bruce,” Felicity told Tam. “In fact, I should probably formally introduce the two of you: Sara, aka Black Canary, I’d like to introduce you to my sister, Tamara Fox aka…” Felicity narrowed her eyes at her sister, “What did Tim say you called yourself again?”

Tam blushed; an honest to goodness blush. It was enough to make Felicity believe in miracles, “Foxy Lady,” she admitted bashfully.

“You’re a mask, too?” Sara asked in something bordering delight.

“I was, but only one time,” Tam said holding up an elegantly manicured finger, her cheeks pinking up charmingly.

“And she was awesome,” Felicity said. “Or so I hear.”

“I really was,” Tam said, her confidence returning. “Plus I’m dating a mask, so…”

“Wait; I thought you were dating Tim,” Sara said hitching her thumb at the door.

“Tim’s Red Robin,” she told her.

“Really?” Sara goggled in surprise. “But he seems so…”

“Yeah!” She exclaimed. “How’d that happen?”

Tam shrugged, “I have no idea but, trust me, it wasn’t easy. Keeping him humble is a full time job.”

“So, wait,” she turned to Felicity, “your dad is one of the richest guys in the world next to Bruce Wayne, Lex Luthor, and the Queens, you lost your virginity to Batman in the Batcave, your brother is Batwing, your sister was a mask called Foxy Lady and is dating Red Robin, and yet you somehow managed to hide all of that from the rest of us for years?” She shook her head in wonder, “This explains a lot.”

“Like what?” Tam asked eagerly, sensing there was a story in the making.

“Like how she managed to take out Slade by herself when the rest of us were down for the count,” Sara snorted.

“Who’s Slade?” Tam asked with a surprised look as her head swiveled back to her sister.

“It’s…nothing,” Felicity said quickly.

“Deathstroke was nothing?” Sara said in disbelief. “Your sister saved all of us; she didn’t tell you about that?”

“Deathstroke?” Tam repeated, her eyes wide with shock. “Who the hell is Deathstroke and what happened?”

“She’s exaggerating,” Felicity said off-handedly while shooting Sara a look. Some things were still best kept under wraps for the time being. “Just some crazy guy we went up against a while back. It was no big deal; I just got lucky.” Sara looked at her sharply from the corner of her eye but thankfully played along.

“It kind of sounds like a big deal,” Tam scowled, not buying it for a second. “I mean, even his name sounds scary; Deathstroke.” She shuddered. “It’s like something out of a horror movie.”

“He was Australian and you know how dramatic they can be,” Felicity said, waving her off. “He had this whole…Pirates of the Caribbean thing going on and he had a penchant for constructing these elaborate revenge scenarios that never seemed to go anywhere because he was way over-juicing on super-steroids to the point that he was all ‘roid rage and a couple of dried cranberries away from a fruitcake. I happened to catch him by surprise one day when he was near a truck full of explosives and, well, let’s just say he got distracted at a very inopportune moment. Trust me; you’re better off not hearing the details of that. Besides, he’s gone now so there’s really nothing to tell.”

“That sound icky; I’m picturing this whole Taz meets a falling anvil thing now,” Tam said wrinkling her nose. “Okay yuck, moving on. Hey, I have to go pee; don’t get dressed until I get back, okay?” She told them before heading into Felicity’s bathroom and shutting the door behind her.

“Slade was ‘no big deal’? And, by the way, it was more like an armored tank filled with explosives than a truck, and you didn’t mention the fact that it blew up because you took him out while the rest of us were practically at death’s door. Hell, Roy was dead there for a minute,” Sara said quietly as she turned to her with an expression of incredulity. “I still don’t know how you survived that and one day soon you’re going to have to break down and give with the details once and for all. All I remember is waking up for a few seconds to the sound of Ollie screaming at the top of his lungs, and then the explosion. The next thing I knew I was waking up in the hospital next to Dad and no one was talking about it.”

Felicity grimaced, “I just…I don’t like thinking about it. It was pretty confusing for me, too. I could try to tell you what happened but even I can’t make sense of most of it. One second I was with your dad tying my bandanna around his leg and he was handing me his gun and the next thing I knew I was standing in front of Slade. I don’t even know how I got there. We were surrounded by those guys and then they were down and…” She took a deep breath, “I don’t know. I can’t explain it.”

“PTSD,” she said knowingly. “Talking helps, believe it or not. I know you don’t want to, none of us do, but it might help you get all of it straight in your head. Don’t think that talking about this stuff makes you weak just because we don’t. We’re all just so damn numb from everything we’ve been through that it’s just another log on the fire for us. That doesn’t mean we aren’t affected; I know Ollie still has nightmares. So do I for that matter,” Sara said quietly. “Still, it might help to talk to someone.”

“That’s not it, besides who would I talk to?” Felicity asked her quietly as she felt her stomach drop. “My family? Bruce? And what would I say; Oh, by the way, in addition to being a vigilante’s sidekick slash executive assistant, I also killed a bunch of people six months ago?” She closed her eyes, “If Bruce ever found out…”

“Hey, you did what you had to do and none of us ever judged you for that,” Sara said, reaching over to squeeze her hand. “Those guys would have killed you and dad if you hadn’t taken his gun and protected yourself; they weren’t innocents, Felicity. The Mirakuru had turned them into monsters and they healed so damn fast that you had no choice but to put them down. If you hadn’t taken your shots then my dad would be in the ground and us along with him.”

“He’d still say I was a murderer,” she said quietly.

“Then he’s a fucking moron,” Sara said flatly. “It’s one thing for a guy who’s what; 6’2”-6’3” and around 200 pounds of pure muscle to go the two fisted route against a bunch of trained killers raging on super-soldier serum, but it’s quite another thing to expect the same from you. You were on your own, Felicity. You had a gun with a half spent clip and no support because the rest of us were just fighting to stay alive.” She gave her a steady look, “We all broke our vows that day. All of us spilled blood; all of us killed. There was no other choice. It was kill or be killed and we’re all still alive because of everything you did; that’s a win in my book and I won’t make any apologies for that and neither should you.”

“Look, I hear what you’re saying but I’ve freaked out my family and Bruce enough in the last couple of weeks without them finding out about Slade,” Felicity told her. “Once all this other crap is settled me, you, and Tam will have a girl’s night in and we’ll celebrate by reliving the most horrible moment of my life over a Sandra Bullock movie marathon and s’mores. Well, one of the most horrible moments anyway,” she said quickly. “It’s weird how less than six months ago I was pretty much resigned to the fact that Slade was going to cut me in half with a sword right before I blew us both up and now that’s only one of the top five worst things I’ve had to go through in the last four years.” She tilted her head and shrugged, “Maybe the top ten. The thing with the sewer still sticks in my mind as probably the worst thing. Oliver and Dig probably wouldn’t agree but, at least with Slade, the dying part would have been quick and relatively painless and I didn’t have to wade through a river of poo in a pencil skirt first.”

“Yeah, I’ll have to agree with you there; river of poo definitely beats out enraged army of enhanced mercenaries in sucky-ness points for sure. Glad I was out of town for that one,” Sara said easily. “Change of subject?”

“Change of subject,” Felicity agreed.

Sara nodded in understanding, “Gotta. Okay, then; what’s with Tam and the Australian thing? The minute she heard ‘Australia’ she rolled her eyes.”

She sighed, “Tam once dated this really hot Australian guy named Manu who was all hunky muscles and into saving trees, eating tofu, and wearing hemp. For, like, six months she was so into this guy that she stopped wearing deodorant, went totally vegan, and chained herself to a bulldozer in order to stop a blood sucking corporation from leveling a park because they were hell bent on destroying the world by building one strip mall at a time.”
“What happened?” Sara asked, strangely enthralled by the idea that a woman with multiple storage units filled with haute couture and designer labels ever chained herself to anything.

“He left her for the lawyer representing the blood sucking corporate guys who owned the bulldozers,” she told her. “Last we heard, he moved to Malibu with the lawyer to open his own yoga studio and juice bar in one of the evil strip malls.”

“Oh, Sara winced sympathetically.

Felicity shrugged, “It was doomed from the start. She wouldn’t admit it but I know for a fact that she had a stash of beef jerky hidden under her bed the entire time they were dating.”

“So that’s why she dropped the subject so fast?” Sara asked. “Because of her ex?”

She nodded, “I knew the minute I told her Slade was Australian she’d drop it. Ever since they broke up she can’t even stand hearing the accent. Something about how when they were in bed together he would always begin their lovemaking by saying, ‘Oi Sheila, yah sexy thing yah!’” She said, mimicking the rough accent as best she could.

Sara snorted rudely, “That’s hilarious but I still don’t get what that has to do with his accent.”

“Well, it turns out that ‘Sheila’ was the lawyer’s name.”

Sara clapped her hand over her mouth and began to shake with laughter.

“I’m not wearing this,” Felicity said flatly.

“Looks cute to me,” Sara said, admiring her outfit in the large floor to ceiling mirror inside the back of her deep walk-in closet, which, while smaller than the ‘guest room’ had been in her little bungalow, was still the size of a small room unto itself.

Tam should have been a personal shopper, Felicity thought as she looked at Sara’s outfit. It was a butterfly sleeved silk shift mini-dress in a rich cobalt blue with a pair of delicate looking crystal embellished Rene Caovilla strappy heels. It was very 1960’s mod and looked perfect on her. The micro-mini hemline made her legs look sky high while covering her arms and back, skirting the line between sexy and modest, and made her pale blue eyes pop.

Too bad the same couldn’t be said for her outfit.

“This isn’t a dress,” Felicity said shaking the hanger in emphasis. “It’s a jacket.”

“It’s a tuxedo dress,” Tam said, checking the hemline of her silver beaded Naeem Khan cocktail dress that hit her well above the knee with a low cut neckline and shimmered in the light. She paired it with a silver pair of Jimmy Choo’s that Felicity was pretty sure once belonged to her.

“Where’s the rest of it?” Felicity demanded.

“Just try it on,” Tam sighed. “Oh, wait!” She said, rushing out into Felicity’s bedroom.

“I’m not wearing this,” Felicity muttered even though she was already taking off her clothes to try it on.

“I think it’s sexy,” Sara said with a naughty glint in her eye. “It’s got this whole Liza slash Marlena Dietrich vibe.
“Says the only bisexual woman currently in the room,” Felicity huffed as she sat down on the low slipper chair to remove her socks after stripping off her shirt and jeans.

“Wait; currently? Is Tam…?” Sara let her question hang in the air.

“Oh my God, I am in queer girl heaven,” Sara said, turning to her all agog. “It’s like your whole family is one big sexual smorgasbord. I don’t know who I want to jump more right now; your brother, your sister, or you.”

“Eh,” Felicity shrugged, “On occasion, but she avoids labels. She prefers to just think of herself as a ‘people person’. She had this whole Women’s Studies phase when she was at Sarah Lawrence.” She shook her head, “Dad was so confused.”

“Well, I like you but my sex life has too many masks in it as it is, Tam’s with Tim…although Tim would probably jump for joy if you tried; he’s got this whole fantasy life you don’t even want to know about—“

“All men have that fantasy,” she said wryly. “What they don’t get is that when two women get together, even if they’re both okay with men, the last thing they’re thinking about when they’re together is a guy. I mean, why would we?” Sara said with a slow smile, “Just look at all the fun bits we have to play with and no refractory period; we get to go nonstop for as long as we want. Women are the Energizer Bunnies of sex; we keep going and going…unless there are toys involved, in which case we stop to put in a new set of batteries and then we go some more.”

“I never did that,” Felicity said, wrinkling her nose.

“Never?” Sara asked in surprise. “I thought every single girl kept a couple of toys in her nightstand for occasional stress relief these days, especially a techie like you. I’d have thought you’d have one that worked over Wi-Fi and lighted your cigarette afterwards.”

“I’m just not into the whole mechanical love thing,” she told her. “It’s not a matter of prudishness as much as it’s laziness on my part. I’d rather just lay back and let someone else do all the work.”

Sara laughed just as Tam walked into the room with some lingerie in her hand. “What did I miss?” She asked.

“We were just talking about your interesting dating history in college,” Sara said with something bordering on a leer as she gave Tam’s long toned legs a second look.

“Oh yeah, Felicity mentioned you walked on both sides of the fence. Yup, I’m in the club, too. Of course, I haven’t been with a woman since my whirlwind tour through Europe where I shagged more carpet than a rug merchant. Since then I’ve been strictly deep pile.” Sara began laughing so hard tears ran down her cheeks while Felicity merely shook her head.

“I love your family,” Sara said to Felicity as soon as her laughter was under control.

“We’re a scandal,” Tam told her with a wink before handing Felicity the lingerie in her hands, “Here.”

“No,” Felicity said, looking at the garter belt, black French lace panties, matching low cut push up bra, and sheer black thigh highs in her sister’s hand.

“Well, what were you planning on wearing then?” Tam huffed in irritation.

“Pants but, barring that, tights,” she said indicating the silver plastic container beside her.
“No way,” Tam said, snatching it away.

“Hey, leggo my egg-hose!” Felicity snapped.

“You did not just say that,” Sara snorted.

“The whole point is to have fun and look sexy!” Tam told her.

“For who?” Felicity asked.

“For yourself,” she told her. “Just get out of your rut and have fun for once. Be scandalous,” she said with a wicked grin and a wink. “Join the rest of us sinners down in the club and shake your fine ass.”

“It is a nice ass,” Sara nodded sagely.

“It’s a freaking awesome ass,” Tam agreed, “and it deserves a night out on the town where it can be fully appreciated by other fun-loving asses.”

“If I go out in that,” she said indicating the outfit and lingerie, “my freaking awesome ass will get frostbite,” Felicity shot back.

“At least it’ll be bitten by someone other than Bruce or Ollie for once,” Sara told her.

“Funny,” Felicity said flatly.

“Too soon?” She said with a mischievous pout.

“The dress has long sleeves,” Tam pointed out.

“And that’s it! I have shorts longer than that ‘dress’—a lot longer; like six inches longer and those are my short-shorts!”

“How is it that Luke and I are both a couple of sexual deviants and our baby sister turned out to be such a prude?” Tam tutted.

“I’m not a prude,” Felicity scowled. “I’m just not willing to get frostbite over a fashion statement.

“Come on, Felicity,” Sara said sitting next to her and putting her arm around her shoulders. “You know how they say the best revenge is living well? Well, the best way to fix a little heartbreak is to strut out of a rut.”

“She’s absolutely right,” Tam told her. “The best way to build your confidence back up is to walk out of here looking supermodel tight so you can remind the world that you aren’t just ‘Felicity Smoak’ overpaid secretary—”

“I was not a secretary!” Felicity said indignantly.

“—but ‘Baby Fox’; sexy bitch!” Tam finished gleefully.

“Three sexy bitches,” Sara grinned. “We are going to own this town by the time we’re done.”

Felicity glowered at both of them, her lips pooched out in a moue of displeasure, “And I wasn’t overpaid; I was grossly underpaid. How many personal assistants regularly deal with armed gunman and bombs? Not many let me tell you. That is a unique skillset,” she grumbled. “Try putting that on a résumé some time.”
“C’mon Baby,” Tam said holding up the garter belt teasingly. “You know you’re dying to get all scandalous; why should we have all the fun?”

“This is peer pressure, you know that?” She said weakly as she looked from one woman to the other. “I feel like I’m trapped in a slutty after school special.”

“Come on Cutie, slut up or shut up,” Sara joked.

“It’s so short,” Felicity muttered as she reluctantly took the lingerie from her sister. “I mean, I wear short skirts but there’s short and then there’s short.”

“It will hit about mid-thigh which isn’t that short, trust me,” Tam waved her off.

“Well, upper mid-thigh,” Sara said, holding it up and examining it more closely. “It’ll still cover your cookie though.”

“It’s not that short,” Tam repeated. “It’s a perfectly acceptable length, trust me.”

“For a stripper maybe. And speaking of strippers,” Felicity picked up the garter and stockings again and pointed at the leopard print suede Manolo Blahnik’s Tam had set on the floor. “Are you turning me out or are we all going on the pole tonight?”

“I’m definitely considering it,” Sara mused aloud then caught the expression on Felicity’s face. “What? Your brother is hot.”

“Ew,” Felicity breathed.

Tam stuck her hands on her hips and went into her stubborn face mode, “First off; pole dancing should be an Olympic sport.” She and Sara took a second to high five each other over that one. “I took a class last year at my gym and it paid off in spades; Tim and my ass were both happy with the results. Secondly, just put the damn outfit on so we can get out of here!”

A little while later Felicity was dressed, albeit reluctantly. Even so, as she looked at her reflection in the mirror, she had to admit she looked damn good. The tuxedo ‘dress’ (she still thought it was just a jacket) hit her high on her mid-thigh, just under the lace band at the top of her stockings. The dress was styled like a double breasted men’s tuxedo jacket that nipped in at the waist emphasizing her hourglass figure with satin lapels, covered buttons, and had a low neckline that almost, but not quite, exposed the lace push-up bra. On her feet were the leopard suede Bridget Bardot pumps that were at least comfortable and did, she had to admit, give the outfit a funky edge.

She had on minimal makeup, just some mascara and eyeliner and a sheer gloss, hoping to downplay the look but it just seemed to accentuate the sexiness of the whole ensemble even more. Tam had fluffed and fussed her golden curls into a messy bedhead look that tumbled down her shoulders. With her contacts in and the sheer silk stockings making her legs look impossibly long she had to admit, she felt a little better already.

She still looked like a stripper though; albeit a classy one. That or a really successful magician’s assistant.

The women walked into the TV lounge where the guys were watching a ball game still sitting around in what they were wearing at dinner. Apparently jeans and pullover sweaters were acceptable club wear for men. They did look good though: Luke’s Burberry London cable knit sweater was a deep chocolate that looked all the more rich against his tawny eyes and café au lait complexion and stretched over his muscular chest emphasizing his build while Tim’s navy Alexander McQueen skull sweater (obviously a gift from Tam) matched his eyes and brought out the highlights in his inky black hair perfectly.

“Holy…” Tim said, turning to whistle appreciatively at his girlfriend’s sparkling silver mini-dress. “Wow.”

Luke stood up and walked over to Sara, his eyes fixed on the richly colored cobalt silk as he looked at her from head to toe. “You look gorgeous,” he told her.

“Thanks handsome,” she said, linking her arm through his. “You’re not so bad yourself.”

“Are we ready to go?” Felicity asked reaching for her coat.

“Wait—what?” Tim goggled at Felicity’s outfit. “You can’t go out like that!”

“Damn right she can’t!” Luke said, suddenly noticing his little sister.

“Okay, that settles it; I’m putting on some jeans,” Felicity said, turning on her heel to leave only to be stopped by Tam when she grabbed her arm and pulled her back.

“What’s wrong with her outfit?” Tam demanded, looking from her boyfriend to her brother as she moved to stand beside Felicity.

“There’s no bottom part for one,” Luke said, pointing to her legs.

“So?” Tam said. “Her dress is the same length as mine.”

“Yeah, but you’re you and she’s…Felicity,” Tim stuttered.

“Wait; I’m ‘Felicity’?” The woman in question asked, suddenly feeling a bit perturbed. “What’s that supposed to mean?”

“He means that—” Luke pointed out her outfit with a grimace, “that doesn’t look right on Baby, that’s what! She looks too—too—”

“Sexy,” Tim said with a frown that was decidedly less than appreciative.

“Yeah!” Luke said.

“And what’s wrong with her looking sexy?” Tam asked with a scowl.

“Yeah?” Felicity asked.

“It just is!” Luke insisted.

“Exactly,” Tim nodded.

“You don’t have any objections to me looking sexy,” Tam frowned at her boyfriend.

“It just…it just isn’t the same thing,” Tim said gruffly, his arms crossing in front of his chest in such a way that, for a second there, made him look so much like Bruce that Felicity almost questioned the fact that he was his adopted son and not his biological one.

“How about we do this then?” Sara asked, stepping forward to join the ladies before smiling sweetly at the boys. “If what she has on bothers you both so much, why don’t Felicity and I just switch outfits?”

Sara narrowed her eyes at him, “So…you’re okay if I wear that dress but not if your sister does?”

“Um…” Luke said helplessly.

“Maybe we should…go,” Tim said, obviously deciding it was best to make a strategic retreat.

“That’s what I thought,” Tam said, linking her arms with those of her companions, “Shall we go break a few hearts, ladies?”

“Might as well,” Felicity said, reaching for her coat again but this time with a touch more strut.

The Irie Club was hopping as music from Sean Paul, Jah Vinci, Mark Balet, Sean Kingston, and old school Ziggy Marley filled the air. The strong thumping bass and island funk had bodies bouncing to the rhythm as their combined body heat made the atmosphere feel less like a Gotham winter and more like a Jamaican summer fantasy.

True to his word, dropping Mr. Mention’s name at the door had gotten them through the velvet rope. Her companions barely took a single sip of their drinks before they hit the floor. She watched as Luke and Sara danced, their bodies rubbing against one another to a remix of Sean Paul’s Temperature. Looking at them from where she was sitting she doubted a sheet of paper would fit between them. Tim and Tam were having an equally intimate session on the crowded dance floor as he ground his hips into hers, his head dipping to kiss the arch of her neck as his arm snaked across her abdomen, his hand dangerously close to the swell of her breast. Yep, they were having a fine old time.

Meanwhile Felicity, aka the Fifth Wheel, was sitting at their table nursing the same fruity cocktail she ordered almost an hour and a half ago and had yet to take off her coat even though it was actually getting pretty hot in there.

Way to get scandalous, she told herself.

She managed to keep her strut up until they actually walked into the club and she sat down at their booth. As soon as her strut stopped all she felt was tired and depressed, her sleepless night finally taking its toll.

Every once in a while someone would come over and ask her to dance but she just wasn’t in the mood. The music was great and the atmosphere was fun but she was exhausted. So much so she just didn’t have the energy to get out there dressed like one of the back-up dancers at Cher’s Vegas show and pull it off with confidence.

What’s worse was that as tired as she was she couldn’t get her brain to shut up. She kept going back to her conversation with Oliver over and over, questioning the exact same things until she was sick to her stomach. She’d given so much to the team and to Oliver personally and yet it felt like she had failed him somehow. It wasn’t just about the sex; they weren’t dating, no commitments had been made, no promises exchanged. It had been sex, just sex. Good sex but other than some vague promises to see how it went followed by it hitting a brick wall there was nothing there. Not really.
And still she felt like she had failed.

Okay, she was lying to herself; it was about the sex. She slept with Bruce and now she felt like she should go around with a scarlet A on her chest. Sure, technically when she slept with Oliver that could be considered cheating on Bruce since she’d slept with him first, right? She’d spent almost four years with Oliver and he barely spoke to her then Bruce shows up and suddenly he’s all over her and promising her a future together…wait, come to think of it…

She went back over their post-coital discussion in her head.

Nope, nothing. The closest he ever came to telling her he loved her was when he announced he was in and that she belonged to him but that wasn’t even close to the same thing. And what was he ‘in’ exactly? Besides her that is? And as soon as he was ‘in’ he got the hell back ‘out’. And what the fuck does ‘I wish I could love you’ mean? Does it mean I do love you or does it mean I like you but I don’t love you?

And then there was Bruce…

Bruce.

He wanted something approaching a commitment. Sort of.

Who was she trying to kid? She thought as she sipped her drink through a straw. He wanted a commitment as long as she was the one doing all the committing and he never had to admit he was her boyfriend publicly.

She narrowed her eyes and rolled all that over in her head. Both men kissed her, both men had sex with her, both men dumped her, and then both men gave her ambiguous speeches about how they were but weren’t into her in order to string her along.

Well, Oliver kind of told her that it was over and to move on. He did say ‘move on’, it was just the way that he said it that was the problem. He said it in a ‘move on because we can’t be together but I want to be with you but I can’t be with you’ sort of angsty circuitous kind of way. It was like he released her but then he sort of didn’t; he released her but with emotional strings attached. One tug and she’d be back in his arms, even though they’d probably wind up going through this whole thing all over again. If this is how he broke up with all his exes no wonder they kept coming back for more.

“Huh,” she frowned as she tilted her head and thought about that.

Laurel, Sara, Helena…

Hang on a second.

“Son of a bitch.”

She was now officially a member of Oliver’s rotating playlist of angst-filled relationships.

“My life fucking sucks,” she muttered as she took another sip of her frozen daiquiri which ceased to be frozen an hour ago. “Plus I can’t be bitchy about Laurel anymore since I am Laurel now.” She dropped her head on the table and whined, “Oh God, I’m Laurel! Oliver is Tommy and Bruce is Oliver.” She lifted her head in confusion, “Or is Oliver Oliver and it’s Bruce that’s Tommy? Okay, if I’m Laurel…” she frowned, “I’m so confused; now I’m thinking I should have just dated Tommy to begin with and avoided all this crap even though he never talked to me or even noticed me for that matter. Actually he kind of looked through me just like the rest of Oliver’s friends and family did.
Actually, come to think of it, Tommy was kind of an asshole, too. Plus, you know, he’s dead so that would have been a stumbling block in regards to the whole dating thing…” She took another sip of her drink.

So was she with Oliver or Bruce? Or both of them? Or neither of them? Bruce wanted her but didn’t, and Oliver wanted her but couldn’t, so what did she want?

“An uncomplicated relationship for once?” She muttered out loud then snorted.

Why do I keep falling for this crap? Ask them a simple yes or no question and get a three page treatise on life, love, and everything else except the answer to the original question.

Bastards.

“I need to get out of here,” Felicity muttered to herself.

She got up, dropping some bills on the table and headed out the door of the club into the street. She stopped outside to text Sara and let her know where she was heading.

//Tired; going home in a cab. You guys stay and enjoy.//

Sara texted back almost instantly.

//K. Luke & I are heading back to my hotel. Later Cutie.//

//TMI// She typed quickly with a note of disgust. She so didn’t need that visual this close to bedtime.

Felicity tried to wave down a cab but the minute one pulled up some drunk girls pushed past her and jumped inside giggling rudely before it pulled away.

Screw it, she thought as she looked around to get her bearings.

She slung her bag across her chest and stuffed her hands in her pockets as she trudged toward the subway station. Technically she could walk all the way to the Wayne Foundation building and crash; after all, she had clothes there and she could work on Watchtower if for no other reason than to distract herself from the mess her life had become. Even though it was located in Midtown it wasn’t that far away and with enough shortcuts through alleyways she could walk there in forty-five minutes or less. Driving in traffic took longer than just walking it but it was fucking cold. A couple of blocks in and she wished she had put her foot down about the stupid mini-dress and dug out her jeans and long johns. Sexy it might be but her garter belt was growing icicles. She’d gotten far too used to living in a city where ‘winter’ translated to sweater weather. Not even her trench was keeping out the wind and, while the heavily ribbed silk/wool blend coat she was wearing was pretty, she was kind of wishing she had bought a parka instead. She passed the park and noted ruefully that even the muggers were smart enough to stay out of this weather before slipping into the subway station and hopping on the red line. She sat down in the car that was nearly empty except for a few late night commuters and some teenagers who looked like they’d been out to the clubs and stewed in her own misery until her stop several minutes later.

She got off at the 52nd Street stop near the MoMA and decided to walk the rest of the way to the Wayne Foundation rather then head home to the Upper West Side in a cab. As tired as she was her mind was still too full and she needed to do something constructive. The tech she’d ordered the other day should have been delivered and she wanted to at least look through it. All she had to do was cut through a few alleys and she’d be there. She hurried out of the subway and practically ran up the stairs leading above ground hoping to generate some heat. She jogged up the sidewalk, more worried about keeping warm than busting her ass in high heels, and cut through a narrow alleyway.
...and that’s when she heard it.

“Give us your bag, bitch!”

“I guess all the muggers weren’t smart enough to stay inside, after all.” Felicity turned with a sigh and faced two pimply faced teenagers, one Latino and one Caucasian. It was the same two teenage boys she’d clocked on the subway. They were both dressed in ripped jeans, graphic tees, and leather jackets that didn’t do crap for keeping out the weather. The dark haired Caucasian boy was holding a knife out toward her with a trembling hand although she doubted it was from the cold. Both of them had blown pupils and a sickly pallor that screamed ‘habitual drug user’. They were coming off a high and probably decided she looked like she was good for a fix.

“I said give me the bag, you stupid cunt!” The boy shouted at her and her brain quickly assessed the situation.

Although bigger than she was, each one of the boys was half the body mass of John Diggle and he’d taught her to toss him around like a sack of flour. The knife was a little troublesome, as was the fact that there were two of them, but she’d been trained for this type of situation on an almost daily basis for nearly two years now. She had her Glock in her purse but she didn’t try to reach for it. She was pretty confident that she could take them down without it.

She arched an unconcerned eyebrow at them and crossed her hands over her chest, setting her stance, “You know what, I would have gladly given you boys a couple of bucks had you asked nicely but you picked the wrong moment and the wrong damn word.”

“Give him the fucking bag, bitch!” The Latino boy said, rushing her and snatching at her bag. As soon as he rushed her she swiveled her hips and brought her leg up, twisting around him and catching him in the ribs. His body, already off balance from the clumsy attack, was propelled into the brick wall with an audible smack, the stiletto heel of her Manolo’s cutting across his abdomen and leaving a bloody rip in the fabric of his thin t-shirt. As soon as the other boy saw his friend go down he charged her, the knife held low but on an upward sweep as he lunged for her.

Felicity’s arms crossed as she arched her back, leaning her torso away from the knife. She slammed her crossed arms on his wrist, her top hand grasping his elbow as she blocked and twisted his arm behind him. Without thinking twice she allowed the blade to sink deep into his lower back as she brought up her knee and smashed it into his face. The boy screamed and went down. The Latino boy struggled up from where he was laying, his face a bloody mess from where it had hit and scraped against the brick and asphalt. He reached behind his back and pulled out a gun holding it gangster style in a move that made her want to roll her eyes.

Faster than the boy could blink Felicity again brought up both her crossed hands and slammed them into his wrist below the gun. As her forearm hit his wrist he reflexively loosened his grip and, using the hand on top of her block, she jerked the gun sideways as her other arm locked against him. With a sickening crunch his trigger finger was pulled backwards at an unnatural angle and he jerked away with a cry, the bone protruding from the damaged digit.

She turned the gun on them, her grip and stance in perfect military combat form; one hand on the grip and one to steady her aim. “Here’s a hint boys; holding your gun like that looks good on TV but it doesn’t do much in real life except give you cruddy aim and burn the crap out of your hand after it expels the spent cartridge.” She glanced at it, noting the discoloration on the metal caused by finger oils, “Plus, this thing is a piece of junk. The sights are off, the metal looks cheap, and when is the last time you even cleaned this thing? What is that?” She scratched at something red that was stuck on the sight notch, “Gummy bears? Seriously? If you’re going to go around robbing people at gunpoint you should at least invest in a decent weapon and not store it with your fruit snacks.”

“Aw fuck, Julio, I’m fuckin’ dyin’, man!” The boy groaned from the ground, his hand reaching behind him to touch the knife that was protruding from near his kidney. “That fucking bitch stabbed me!”

“You know, I am holding a gun even if it is a piece of shit,” Felicity pointed out calmly. “You might want to go easy with the ‘bitch’ comments.”

The Hispanic boy took one look at her and the gun and one at his fallen friend as he clutched his ruined hand to his chest before scrambling to his feet to run. Unfortunately for him he didn’t get very far before he ran into a big wall of flesh that was dressed in black armor from head to toe.

Batman clocked him in the jaw and the boy crumpled to the ground in a soundless heap. Reaching into his belt he pulled out a pair of zip tie cuffs and secured his hands behind him. He then walked over to the bleeding and moaning boy who was shouting, “We didn’t do shit, man! That crazy fuckin’ bitch attacked us!”

“Shut up,” he growled, kicking him with his boot in the face causing the boy to go unconscious. He zip tied his hands behind him as well then reached into his belt for a small canister. He sprayed foam over the knife to stabilize it. “Oracle,” he said over his coms although his eyes were locked on Felicity who was still holding the gun, albeit now at her side rather than trained on the muggers.

“Call the police and tell them to send a bus. Two suspects are down, one with a stab wound below the kidney and one with a compound fracture to the hand.” He paused as though listening to something before gritting out, “No, it was Felicity. Yes, I said Felicity. Batman out.”

“Why hello Batman, fancy meeting you out here; out for a stroll, I see?” Felicity asked brightly with an unnaturally cheery grin.

“What the hell are you doing out in the East End in the middle of the night?” Bruce growled deep in his throat as he stalked toward her until he was deep inside her personal space.

“Picking up teenage boys, what the hell do you think?” Felicity said, dropping all pretense of good humor. “Here,” she shoved the gun at him and he took it, stripping it down without even looking, the metal components hitting the broken asphalt with a hollow sound. She turned on her heel to march back down the alley where she was originally headed but he caught her by the elbow and spun her around.

“You aren’t going anywhere,” he growled again, his teeth bared in anger.

She looked pointedly at the gauntleted hand gripping her elbow then back up to Bruce, “I’m sorry, but didn’t you just call the cops? Unless you want me to stick around and give a statement I was on my way somewhere, thanks.”

As soon as she said the words the sounds of sirens broke through in the distance and Batman tugged her closer, wrapping his arm around her waist as his other hand reached for and deployed the grappling gun at his belt. A split second after shooting the grappling hook into the air they began a swift ascent upwards into the night. Felicity automatically reached her arms around Bruce and held on until he kicked out with his legs and landed them lightly on the rooftop of the building.

She shivered and moved closer to his body so that his leather-like reinforced Kevlar cape shielded her from the wind. “God, it’s cold up here,” she said, teeth chattering.

“What the hell were you thinking?” He asked, his hands gripping her shoulders firmly. “You could have been killed!”

She put her hands on her hips and glared up at him (even though all she really wanted to do was snatch the cape off his back and wrap it around her like a blanket), “I’m sorry, but in case you didn’t notice, I had both those guys on the ground and disarmed before you even showed up!”

“Goddamn it, Felicity!” Bruce ground out, releasing her shoulders and walking away from her a few steps, “Are you trying to get yourself killed? Do you have some kind of death wish or something?”

“So says the man dressed like a flying rat who leaps from rooftop to rooftop like he’s a five year old playing hopscotch!” She snapped before throwing her hands up in defeat, “I give up; it’s too fucking cold up here to do this with you,” she looked around for the roof access. “Figures. I just wanted one night, just one night out and, of course! Not only do I get mugged but you show up. My life sucks. How the hell do I get off this—ah!” She stomped across the gravel and tar roof towards the locked and chained roof access door. She looked at it and cursed, “Damn it! Freaking padlock; of course it couldn’t be a keypad, could it?” She rifled through her purse then sighed, “Left my lock picks in my other purse; great!” She looked around for a fire escape.

“What are you doing out here in the middle of the night?” He demanded, watching her as she looked around.

“Couldn’t sleep so I thought I’d go for a stroll, not that it’s any of your business.” She stomped her feet and wrapped her arms around herself, “Goddamn it, where are all the fire escapes? And who chains a roof access door anyway? Isn’t that like a fire hazard?”

“Not my business?” Bruce bit out, stalking toward her again. He pointed in the direction of the alley, “Everything you do is my business!”

Felicity did a double take and laughed, “Excuse me? Say what now? I thought you were the one lobbying for an uncommitted non-relationship the other day. Taking a personal interest in what I do outside of your bedroom is a touch relationship-y, don’t you think?”

His jaw clenched, “There were two perps with a knife and a gun and you were unarmed! Also, what if the cops came on that scene and saw what you did? You could have been charged with felony assault!”

“First off, nice to see you’re finally using that fancy law degree for something—even though you are completely wrong! In what universe would an unarmed woman who defended herself against two armed attackers who were high as kites get charged with assault?” She asked with an eye roll. “Also, I’m not as fragile as I appear which kind of explains the fact that they’re both on the ground bleeding and I’m up on the roof freezing my ass off talking to you! What is it with you and dragging me around rooftops in the middle of winter anyway? Look, I know you want to stand out here and holler at me all night long but I need off this building so unless you want me to take my chances and jump, you’d better get me down from here!”

“You aren’t going anywhere until we have this out,” he told her stubbornly.

“Okay, fine; have it your way,” she said stepping to the edge of the building and looking down. “Won’t be the first time I’ve had to jump off a building, let’s just hope I land somewhere soft.”

Before she could blink Bruce had her in his arms and they were repelling off the other side of the building. Just as they hit the ground the tumbler came roaring up, the door flying open. “Get in,” he ordered moving over to the driver’s side.
“I’ll catch a cab, thanks.”

“Get in the car now!” Bruce growled at her.

Felicity considered arguing with him but then she felt the heat pouring out of the interior of the tumbler and pride went out the window. She slipped inside the warm car, grimacing as her butt hit the seat, “What is it with you and cars that have hard seats?”

“Well it does explain a lot,” Felicity said with a sigh. At his dark look she shot him a withering glare, “The reason the Bat is always in such a foul mood; his ass is sore.”

At that moment the small screen on the dash lit up and she could see Alfred looking back at them from the Watchtower monitors. “Sir, will you be coming back to the manor early tonight?”

“Yes,” he bit out.

“Um, no,” Felicity said quickly. “You’re dropping me off at the Wayne Foundation or, barring that, Wayne Tower.” She looked at Alfred and smiled, “Hello Alfred.”

“Hello Miss Felicity, Miss Barbara mentioned you found a bit of trouble. Do you require any medical attention?” He asked in concern.

“Nope,” she said cheerily. “I was safe as houses; Bruce is just in a tizzy because I beat up the bad guys before he had a chance to.”

Bruce’s jaw clenched, “We’re coming in. Both of us,” he said for her benefit.

“No, I’m not. I’m going to the penthouse,” she told him stubbornly. “My clothes are there and I’d like to change into something warmer.”

“Fine,” Bruce spat out through clenched teeth. “Never mind Alfred, we’ll be at the penthouse so Felicity can change her outfit.”

“You don’t have to make it sound like I’m planning on putting on a floorshow or something,” she shot back.

“Do you require anything before I retire then, sir?”

“No.” Bruce said tightly.

“Miss?”

Felicity resisted snickering at the flash of annoyance on Bruce’s expression as Alfred addressed her, “No, thank you. Bruce made me stand on a roof top as he dressed me down for stealing his thunder so I’m a bit chilled but otherwise I’m fine.”

“Are you sure you wouldn’t rather come to the manor, Miss?” Alfred asked with a frown. “Mrs. Hu led me to believe that you were quite susceptible to the cold during our previous conversations. Have you had breakfast?”

Felicity opened her mouth to answer him when Bruce cut him off, “She’s fine, Alfred! Just go to bed.” He shot her a dark look as his hands tightened on the steering wheel.

“Very well, sir. Miss Felicity,” Alfred said before logging off.
“You and I are going to talk, starting with you jumping out of my car the other day in the middle of traffic and ending with you taking down two armed punks in the middle of a dark alley!” He spat out.

“Better yet, why don’t you just drop me off at a diner somewhere and I’ll find my own way home. I actually wouldn’t mind a little breakfast,” Felicity said, perversely deciding to poke the bear a little. “A couple of Alfred’s scones would have really hit the spot come to think about it.”

“What the hell was that back there?” Bruce asked angrily as he ignored her sarcasm.

She raised a superior eyebrow in his direction, “Krav Maga; why, was my form off?”

“Is that what Queen let you do in Starling City?” He asked her, “Run around in the middle of the night baiting muggers and drug addicts?”

“No, actually this was my first mugging. The only thing he ever let me be bait for is the occasional serial killer, drug kingpin, and mob thug.” At the thunderous look on his face Felicity leaned back against the headrest and rolled her eyes, “Seriously Bruce; lighten up. I would just like to go one day without you getting your panties in a twist over every little thing.”

“Every little thing?” He thundered. “Two armed drug addicts just attacked you!”

“So?” She snorted. “I handled it.”

“You handled it?” He asked sarcastically. “You call stabbing a man handling it?”

“Well, he called me some very nasty things,” she said easily. “Besides, it wasn’t like it was a life threatening wound or anything. He’ll be out of County General and in lock up within a couple of hours.”

“Is this who Queen turned you into? Someone who can use a knife or a gun and not think twice about it?”

That hit a little too close to home but she shrugged it off and kept her tone light, “No, this is who Diggle and Canary turned me into,” she answered him. “And, if you want to get technical about it, this is who you turned me into first.”

“I never intended you to be out in the streets and you know it,” he told her. “If your father ever found out—“

“Found out what? That you had sex with me? That you broke my heart twice? That you introduced me to a life of vigilantes and street thugs?” Her eyes flashed with newly awakened anger. “Pick one, but remember that ‘sorry’ means you regret the actions you’ve taken and you don’t regret a goddamn thing about any of it!”

“I regret a lot when it comes to you, Felicity,” Bruce said in a low tone, his eyes firmly fixed to the road as they entered the tree lined drive to the secret entrance to the alternate Batcave.

“Do you regret turning Luke into a Batman knockoff and shipping him to Africa?” She asked him. “Or letting Tam play Tim’s costumed sidekick?”

“Tam did what?” Bruce asked in confusion before shaking his head, “Luke came to me asking to be trained, I didn’t recruit him.”

“And what about Barbara, or Cassie, or Selina, or any of the other women you’ve trained? What makes me any different from any of them, huh?” She challenged. “I know you don’t have a problem with sending a woman out into the field so why am I the exception?”

“You just are!” He burst out before slamming on the brakes and pulling into a shadowed copse of trees then rounding on her. “You were never supposed to be a part of this world, Felicity! The rest of them, fine, but not you—never you!”

“Why not?” She asked, “What makes me so special? Tell me Bruce, because I’d really like to know!”

He looked at her, opening his mouth to speak, but said nothing. Instead he reached for her, unsnapping her seat belt before pulling her into his arms and kissing her.

His mouth was warm against hers and, despite the fact that she had a million and one reasons to pull away from him, she melted into the kiss. Her fingers wrapped around his cowl and she felt the cold metal of his armor against her fingertips as his warm tongue invaded her. The taste of him made her moan and gasp. His gauntleted hand clutched the back of her head and he practically hauled her into his lap, his other hand hitting a button causing the steering wheel to pull away.

She sat sideways in his lap, her feet lying in her now abandoned seat as the kiss softened and he cressed her cheek with his gloved hand. She shivered at the feeling of the cold leather and metal gauntlet against her rapidly warming skin. He made a growling noise deep in his throat before pulling away from the kiss, his eyes searching hers.

“Invoke me in, Felicity,” he told her, his breath hot against her lips.

It was tempting, so very tempting. The scents of them surrounded her, nearly suffocating her in the small space; his sweat, the scent of leather and gun oil, their pheromones and the wet heat of them that steamed up the interior glass. She just wanted to forget her pain, just get lost in the moment. She was so confused about what she felt for Oliver, what she felt for him...

Was it possible to love two men equally? Was it possible to want them both, need them both, even though both men hurt and rejected her? Was it possible to crave someone so much and not trust them with your heart?

Could she spend her life trapped between two worlds and remain intact?

His mouth, Bruce’s mouth, trailed down her throat as he sucked and nipped lightly at the sensitive flesh. He brought his mouth close to her ear and whispered, “Just tell me you want this, want me.
Stop playing games and just give in to it.”

When she left Bruce four years ago she thought she had left all of it behind … and then she met Oliver.

She swore she wouldn’t get involved
… until she did.

She swore she would only remain on the periphery
…and then she was the one who drew him back into the fight.

She swore she would never make the same mistakes with Oliver that she made with Bruce …and then she took both men into her bed.

And now Bruce was kissing her and all she wanted to do was take him inside of her again, to feel wanted again. She wanted to feel loved even if it was a lie. Oliver had utterly rejected her and any chance they might have had. Even Bruce had offered her the chance to remain on his team but Oliver had exiled her from everything she had built over the last four years. He let her go, told her to move on.

Oliver told her to move on with Bruce.

His words echoed in her mind:

“I hate that it’s him. I hate that it has to be anyone else but me, but if he’s what makes you happy then you should be with him. I don’t like the guy and I probably never will, but I want you to be happy. You deserve to be loved, Felicity. You deserve to feel someone’s arms around you…I just wish they could be mine.”

She was in love with both men but only one of them was kissing her now.

Bruce.

It would always come back to Bruce.

“Tell me you want me,” Bruce whispered against her ear. “Come home with me and end this.”

Come home with me.

Home.

Home meant you were safe; home was where your heart was safe. Home was a place where you were loved unconditionally, where no ghosts and no secrets stood between you.

She wanted him but he wasn’t home. She didn’t have a home anymore.

She never did.

All she had were secrets, shadows, and ghosts.

It took everything she had to place her hands on his chest and pull away. “No,” she whispered raggedly.

“Why not?” He asked her, not releasing his hold. He kissed her again, briefly and tenderly. “Let me love you, Felicity.”

“That’s just it, Bruce,” she said, hating the catch in her voice. “You don’t love me and you never will. I’m just a challenge for you right now but the minute I let you in you’ll just push me away again.” She shook her head, “I deserve better than that and I’ll never get it from you.”

“Who then?” He asked in a hard tone, the tenderness leaving his voice as he let go of her, “Queen? That security agent?”

“Oliver doesn’t want me like that anymore,” Felicity dropped her gaze from his, unwilling to allow him to see her pain. “As for Jake, I don’t know but for the first time in my life someone…” She took another shaky breath and moved away from him until she was back in her own seat. She licked her lips, the taste of him lingering on them, and steadied herself as she used her bare hand to wipe the condensation from the glass of the passenger side window. “I deserve to be more than just some warm body for you to get lost in, Bruce.”

“What exactly is it you want then?” He asked her, “What is it that you think this ‘Jake’ person can give you?”

“Nothing, that’s not the point!” She said, shutting her eyes tight, unwilling to shed even one more tear in front of this man. She turned and looked at him, “Do you know what happened when he took me to lunch? He talked to me, Bruce. He asked me questions and it wasn’t like an interrogation or feigned interest on his part, he wanted to know who I was; me,” she pointed her finger to her chest. “He learned more about me in twenty minutes than most people who’ve known me for years ever tried to learn. He didn’t force himself on me or treat me like I was a temporary diversion, he never even tried to do more than touch my hand, but he showed more interest in me than you or anyone else ever has.” She looked away from him again, “I don’t know if I’m built for normal or not but I know that when a stranger shows more interest in who you are as a person than someone who has…” She shook her head and pressed her forehead to the cold glass. “I don’t want to talk about this anymore. Just take me to the penthouse so I can call a cab.”

Bruce didn’t say anything and she didn’t turn to look at him again. He started the engine and they took off into the shadows once more.
Chapter Thirty-One

The tumbler roared through the old steel factory tunnels before arriving at the abandoned rail station under the Wayne Foundation Building. They’d spent the entire ride in tense silence and Felicity closed her eyes and allowed the rumble of the motor and the vibrations of the rough ride sooth her shattered nerves. The tumbler was remarkably quiet. It was soundproofed and warm so that all she could hear was the faint thrum of the motor. She shut her eyes and allowed herself to drift into a hazy space between dreams and reality, rocked to sleep by the uneven ground beneath the wheels.

She didn’t even notice they had stopped until she felt something touch her hair. She opened her eyes and looked over to Bruce whose expression was blank, his hands on the steering wheel. “We’re here,” he said, opening the doors. “Give me a few minutes to take a shower and change and then I’ll take you home.”

“I was going to work on Watchtower for a while first,” she said warily as she climbed out of the tumbler and scrubbed her hands over her arms. It was almost as cold down there as it had been on the rooftop; the only difference was there wasn’t any wind to cut through her meager layers down here. “It’s the reason I was headed this way to begin with.”

He walked over to the work area and had already taken off his cape and cowl when he gave her an assessing look, “You’re dead on your feet.”
“I’ll be fine,” she said although she really wished he had a coffee maker down there. A sudden image of them going through the drive-through at Starbucks in the tumbler popped into her head and she sighed. She walked over towards the workstation and looked at all the boxes neatly stacked to the side. “I need to get a move on installing this stuff before I start my new job on Wednesday.”

A flash of annoyance crossed his face when she mentioned the job but he didn’t make any comments about it. “It’ll be there tomorrow,” he told her as he quickly stripped off his armor and placed it on the mannequin on the far side of the work area. “You shouldn’t push yourself if you’re tired.”

“The great Bruce Wayne, a man famous for his ability to get by with less than a couple of hours of sleep a day, is telling me to not push myself just because I’m sleepy?” Felicity chuckled tiredly.

“You’re not me,” he told her as he stripped off the last of his armor and reached into a drawer near the cases for a soft pair of sweats. He put them on, not bothering with a shirt or shoes and motioned for her to follow. “Come on, let’s go upstairs so I can take a shower and you can warm up. We’ll catch a nap and then I’ll help you.”

“We’ll catch a nap?” She asked him askance.

He shot her a disparaging look, “You’re tired and I’m not going out again tonight so we might as well get some sleep. I am capable of sleeping beside someone without having sex with them or you can pick your own room, I don’t really care. I should warn you that most of the furniture has already been removed because of the decorators coming in on Tuesday so it’s my bed or the sofa in the office.”

“You didn’t cancel the decorators after I told you I couldn’t take the job?” She asked.

“You’re here to work on updating Watchtower in the middle of the night,” he pointed out. “That’s what I asked you to do, isn’t it?”

“Yeah, but I told you I wasn’t going to be living here,” she said.

“The place needed updating anyway,” he told her. “It was…getting old.”

“Oh, okay,” she said uneasily. “Um, that reminds me; I had something to ask you…”

“Ask,” he told her.

Um,” she bit her lip. “You know what? Never mind, it’s not important.”

“Ask,” he ordered her.

“I was, um, wondering if you might consider letting me have the penthouse anyway?” She spat out quickly. “I’ll pay rent or you can just not pay me for the work on Watchtower in exchange since I can’t take Barbara’s spot—”

“Keep the apartment,” he told her gruffly.

“Really?” She asked uncertainly.

“I don’t care; I don’t really use it anyway,” he said in a casual, almost bored tone.

“Okay; good, that’s good. And I don’t suppose you’d be willing to do the gentlemanly thing and take the sofa?” She asked hopefully. The look he shot her told her all she needed to know on that subject. “ Didn’t think so.” She looked at the stack of boxes, her fingers itching to get into them despite her exhaustion, but the words ‘warm’ and ‘nap’ were just a bit more tempting. “Screw it, let’s go,” she told him as she followed him into the elevator.

She let him place his hand on the small of her back as he led her into the elevator and didn’t even object when he tucked her into his side, allowing her to lean against him as she absorbed his body heat. She closed her eyes; now that the adrenalin from the alley had worn off she was quickly shutting down. By the time the lift slowed to a stop at the penthouse she was practically asleep on her feet.

“Come on,” he said in a surprisingly gentle tone as he led her out into his office and shut the hidden entrance to the alternate Batcave behind the false wall.

She moved to stand near the statuette of the Maltese Falcon and allowed her fingers to trail lovingly over the textured feathers as she stifled a yawn. She glanced over at Bruce and frowned as she noticed him staring at her with a strange look on his face, “What?”

“Nothing,” he grumbled then frowned. “What were you doing in the East End in the middle of the night when you’re practically swaying on your feet from exhaustion? Why weren’t you in bed?” He asked. “And don’t say it was just to work on Watchtower.”

“Tam, Tim, Luke, and my friend Sara all wanted to go to a club and I tagged along but it just wasn’t my thing,” she told him. “I figured since I was close to the penthouse anyway I might as well stop by and do some tinkering.”

“Sara?” He asked. “By Sara do you mean Black Canary?”

“Did Oliver tell you about her?” Felicity frowned.

“He told me about the Canary but he didn’t tell me her name; since she was the only other survivor from Queen’s boating accident I put two and two together.”

“And I just confirmed it,” Felicity sighed. “Oh well, it’s not like you wouldn’t have met her eventually anyway.”

“Are you sure you should be associating with her given that she could be the leak that exposed Queen’s entire operation?” He asked, his expression pure Bat for a moment even though he was naked except for a well washed pair of dark sweats.

“She’s not the leak,” Felicity said confidently.

He raised a questioning eyebrow slightly, “How do you know?”

“I asked her.”

“And you believe her?” He said skeptically.

“Yup,” she said, not willing to give any more details than that.

“I want to speak to her myself,” he told her.

“Go ahead,” she told him. “I’d hold off until tomorrow or Monday though. Right now she and Luke are probably testing the limits of the mattress springs in her hotel room and I’m pretty sure they won’t be up for an early morning interrogation.”

“She and Luke are involved?” Bruce scowled. “Queen didn’t mention that.”
“That’s because it’s a recent development; like today recent. She had dinner with my family and they hit it off big time.” Before he could interrupt with more scowls and Bat-ness she cut him off at the pass, “Look, Sara isn’t a part of this, okay? Besides, she’s going to Starling to meet with Oliver and he’ll handle it. This is Oliver’s business so just let it go.”

“She’s a mask in my city,” he told her with a stubborn set to his jaw. “I need to meet with her and find out what she’s doing here.”

“Visiting me,” she told him.

“Why?”

“Because she’s my friend! I am allowed to have at least one friend, you know.” She said with an eye roll. “Seriously Bruce, lighten up.”

“The Rochev woman threatened you and she’s connected,” he stated flatly.

“Isabel didn’t threaten me,” she said stifling another yawn. “All she did was offer me a job and then try to get in my pants.”

“Queen said she—” Bruce stopped abruptly and looked at her, “Did you just say that Isabel Rochev asked you to…?”

“Join the all-girls softball team? Yeah,” she said wryly. “Don’t worry, I let her down easy; she’s not really my type. Besides, I already promised Sara that if I ever decided to come up to bat then she’d be the first one on the pitcher’s mound.”

Bruce cleared his throat and ran his hand over his mouth as he gave her an uncertain look, “Still, I’d like to speak to Canary before she leaves town.”

“Sure, I’ll bring her by,” Felicity told him. “Now can we get out of here? I’d really like to change into something warmer and catch a nap.”

“Of course,” Bruce said, still looking strangely discomfited.

He led her into the master bedroom where a few racks of clothes were set aside neatly at the far end of the room along with several boxes and bags labeled ‘Killinger’s Department Store’ in bold blue and gold script. She walked over and started going through them. “I know I bought some nightgowns,” she muttered.

Bruce headed towards the master bath, “If you need something to wear there’s probably something of mine you can use in the drawers,” before disappearing into the en suite.

As she searched through the numerous bags and boxes she started to become more and more frustrated. Where were the jeans and sweaters she bought? The jackets? The camisoles and the rest of her lingerie? Although a lot of what she had purchased was there, none of the less formal wear was anywhere to be found. She’d have to call the personal shopper on Monday and find out what happened.

It was just frustrating, she thought miserably. Tomorrow she’d either have to trudge back home in her slutty magician’s assistant get up, in a borrowed pair of Bruce’s overly large sweats, or an evening gown; any of which would end with her being interrogated by her dad and Peggy Ann for God knows how long.

And this is why I definitely need my own place, she thought miserably.
With a sigh she turned to sort through Bruce’s things to find a shirt to borrow when she glanced around and noted the difference in the room now that all of the art had been removed in anticipation of the remodel. She’d been too tired to pay attention to it before but, without the influence of Sabine cluttering up the room; it was now much closer to her own tastes. The room now reminded her more of the Bruce she knew and not the playboy persona it had been intended for. There were some art deco and art nouveau pieces here and there but instead of the black enamel and steel she had found so objectionable in the rest of the rooms, this one reminded her more of the office.

That made sense, she thought. The only two rooms Bruce spent any real time in were that office and his bedroom so he would want to feel comfortable. That said, the furnishings were still very masculine and on a larger scale than most; the bed especially.

It was older than the rest of the furniture, obviously a family heirloom, and big. She’d be willing to bet it was even bigger than a king. Apparently the Wayne men all shared a large physique and she imagined Bruce had to have the mattress and sheets custom made to accommodate the intricately carved yet boldly masculine four poster bed of dark mahogany and burled wood. She recognized the Wayne family crest carved into the center of a large oval medallion in both the headboard and the footboard and saw the same symbol carved in a smaller medallion on both the large armoire and chest of drawers across the room. All the rest of the furniture was much newer, though still antique, and had been chosen to go with those three pieces.

As interesting as the antiques were, she was more interested in sleeping in the bed at that moment than she was in staring at it. She knew Bruce well enough to know that, although he was a tough guy, he wasn’t a martyr or a monk. He liked comfort. He wasn’t a slave to excess but if he had the sheets and bed custom made then they would be soft and of the highest quality possible. She looked at the thick mattress longingly and hoped the sheets had been recently changed because she was going to collapse into it the first chance she got. She yawned again and decided to abandon her clothes search until she made sure there were sheets on the bed. She pulled back the thick, dark navy and gold brocade duvet and was relieved to see that the sheets did, in fact, appear to be fresh.

“I have the maid service change the sheets every couple of days, whether they’ve been used or not, just in case I need to crash here,” Bruce said from the doorway of the bathroom. She turned to him and her eyes wandered over the tanned and scarred skin of his well-defined chest and abs, past the towel wrapped loosely and low around his hips to his rock hard thighs and calves, all the way to his large bare feet, then back up again. “Like what you see, Baby?” He asked with a smirk as her eyes met his on the way back up.

“Fishing for compliments?” She shot back.

His grin deepened, “Should I be?”

She shook her head in exasperation, “You’re a Greek god Bruce, but right now the only thing I’d like to see is the back of my eyelids,” she told him.

“Scottish actually, with a smidgen of French and German, but the compliment is still appreciated.” His lips curled upwards slightly and he padded over to the large armoire. “I’ll look and see what I have since you don’t appear to have found anything yet.”

“Yeah, it’s weird,” she said. “I could have sworn I bought twice that many clothes. I know I bought some jeans and sweaters. Plus I had lingerie…”

Bruce reached into the drawer and held out a delicate lace bra for her inspection.

“Isn’t that a little small for you?” She asked with a raised eyebrow. “No offence, but your boobs are much bigger than that.”

“Funny. I think I found your missing clothes,” Bruce said putting it back. “Apparently one of the maids must have started to unpack. Why they didn’t get to the rest of it I don’t know.”

“I do,” she said feeling stupid. “That’s the stuff that I had to have altered. The rest of it must have come in earlier in the day when housekeeping was here.” She moved over to the chest of drawers and took out a long jersey knit nightgown. “Thank God, I will be so glad to get out of this outfit; you have no idea.” She muttered as she tossed the gown on the bed and began to take off her coat to hang it up before she went into the bathroom. As she shrugged the bright red wool trench off her shoulders she noticed a dark splatter of blood near the hem. “Great! I have junkie blood all over my new coat,” she scowled. “Do you have any soda water or peroxide?” She asked, looking up at him.

Bruce stood next to the oversized armoire, a soft pair of flannel pajama bottoms in his hand as he stared at her, “What are you wearing?”

She flushed and glanced down at her dress, “Yeah, I know. Believe me, it was all Tam’s idea. I look like I should be serving drinks at the Magic Castle. Personally, I wanted to wear—” Her sentence was cut off abruptly as Bruce crossed the room in less than a blink of an eye and began kissing her.

She dropped the coat on the floor as her hands wrapped around his neck, reveling in the feel of his warm moist flesh. Despite what she had told him in the tumbler she felt herself responding to his kisses. Her exhaustion disappeared as her hands traced the hard muscles of his back and suddenly she wanted to get out of her clothes for a completely different reason.

It was crazy, this was getting ridiculous, she thought; but that didn’t stop her from going along with it. Had she the ability to think logically she might have reminded herself that this sort of thing had happened to her repeatedly and had yet to end on a positive note…unless orgasms counted as a ‘positive note’, in which case there had been multiple positives, all of which had been highly satisfying thus far. While the toe-curling endorphin rush of such activities buttered her muffin quite thoroughly, it was enduring the angst and arrogance that followed the multiple positives that tended to suck. Still, had she been in charge of her wits, she would have probably taken herself out of that room and camped out in front of the fireplace in the office or called a cab. Or, on the other hand, she might have gone the other direction and said ‘screw it’. She might have thought, ‘Hey, Tam and Sara are right; why shouldn’t I strut out of my rut? Who’s to say I’m not the one using Bruce for a quickie right now? Why shouldn’t she, quote, ‘Hop on top and enjoy the moment,’ while getting a little scandal of her own going for a change?’

Had she been capable of rational thought, any and all of those points might have filtered through her consciousness but, at that moment, all she could think about was the look on Bruce’s face, the sheer need displayed so openly in an expression of want, on a countenance that was normally so stoic and grim that he was now almost unrecognizable as the man most people except her ever got to see.

His hand slipped between them and pulled at her buttons, undoing them quickly before slipping the dress over her shoulders and onto the floor. He looked down at her and his eyes grew even darker. Taking a small step back, he looked her up and down slowly, his hand reaching out to tenderly trace the path his eyes had taken.

His fingers gently drew over her collar bones, lingering just for a moment over the small faint scar on her shoulder, across the swell of her modestly proportioned but shapely breasts made prominent by the black lace push up bra, down her stomach, skimming over the depression of her navel to her garter belt before his eyes met hers again.

Reaching out with his other hand he cupped her cheek and pulled her closer, kissing her softly. As his kiss deepened, his arms wrapped around her, drawing her into his embrace. His fingers found the clasp of her bra and unsnapped it, tugging the straps down her arms and allowing it to join the rest of her clothes. He walked them backwards until he was sitting on the bed, his towel having been tossed aside when she wasn’t paying attention to anything but the feel of his mouth on hers.

She looked between them at the evidence of his desire and her breath caught as heat rose from her center. His mouth latched onto one of her breasts as she stood between his thighs, his tongue and teeth teasing her nipple as he sought out the tabs on her garter and unsnapped them. His fingers teased the skin on her thighs, brushing across the swell of her bottom through the lace panties, before he undid the garter belt and let that drop as well. He stood up and reversed their position until she was the one on the bed and laid her backwards until she was looking up at him. He picked up one silk covered leg and placed it on his chest, his eyes never leaving hers even when he paused to kiss the inside of her ankle gently before removing her shoe and dropping it to the floor. His fingers ran down both sides of her leg, teasing the sensitive skin and causing her to jump slightly. He grinned at her before hooking his fingers under the lace at the top of her thigh and easing the delicate netting down until her leg was bare. He repeated the process with her other leg, this time leaning in to kiss the inside of her knee when he was done, leaving her clad only in the black lace panties.

He leaned over her and kissed her again, easing her up the bed until they were both fully off the floor and her head was resting against one of the pillows. He settled over her and kissed down the side of her neck pausing to breathe in her perfume sharply, then down to her breasts where he kissed her nipple, his lips just skimming the tight peak in a kiss that was simultaneously chaste and erotic, down to her stomach where he placed a sucking kiss just under her navel, and then he settled himself between her thighs and ran his tongue over the sheer lace of her panties. She shut her eyes and moaned as she felt his tongue trace over the floral pattern on her underwear, skimming over the sensitive flesh before tugging them off and casting the tiny scrap of material aside.

He looked down at her, his face still, his eyes dark, before settling back between her thighs and placing his mouth on her center. She arched into his questing tongue, her fingers carding through his damp, dark hair as she squirmed under his loving ministrations. He took his time, his hands holding her thighs apart as he licked, sucked, and nibbled at her until she was nearly sobbing with need. Just when she thought she would go insane with pleasure he stopped and moved up the bed to kiss her deeply. She whimpered as his tongue swept through her mouth, his hard flesh nudging at her sex but he didn’t enter. Instead, he continued to kiss her before leaving her lips to kiss along her cheek and then took her earlobe between his teeth and began to suck and worry it with his teeth. She cried out and shivered, her legs coming around him as her hands pulled at his back urging him to come inside of her but still he held back.

“Bruce, please!” She begged.

“Please what?” He said softly against her ear, the warmth of his breath causing her to shiver again. “Tell me what you want, Baby.”

“I want you,” she said with a stuttering breath.

He entered her slowly and she moaned as he filled her, stretched her. He took her mouth in a deep kiss as he pushed forward then fell into a slow, languid rhythm. “Tell me you want this; that you’re mine,” he said softly against her lips.

The minute she heard the words through the fog of desire that had her under its spell she’d felt it begin; the panic, the knowledge of what came next. She moved to silence his demands with a kiss but he jerked his hips sharply inside of her causing her to cry out, her head pressing hard into the pillow as he nipped at the line of her exposed throat.
“Say it, Baby,” he told her. “Tell me you belong with me.”

She stiffened despite the pleasure she had been feeling and her blood ran cold as she felt the panic again begin to rise in her chest and pull her away from whatever momentum she had been building toward orgasm.

_Tell me you belong with me._

I can’t do this, she thought. It’s too soon; I can’t go through this again, not again.

“I—” Her breath hiccupped and she shut her eyes tight then pushed against his chest with a sob. “No!”

She couldn’t do this anymore; she couldn’t do this. Those words cut through her like a knife; words that had been spoken before. It was like they were following a script or something and her mind, so tired and stressed by everything that had happened since all of this had begun, just couldn’t ignore them this time. That Albert Einstein quote “Insanity was doing the same thing over and over again and expecting different results,” sprang to mind and she realized that’s what she had been doing this entire time. She knew exactly how this ended, how it would end...

Oh God, she was such a fool, such a complete and total idiot! No wonder they kept playing cat and mouse with her.

“Felicity, what’s wrong?” He asked with a frown as she covered her face with her hands and began to tremble.

She rolled onto her side as he moved his weight off of her and buried her face in the pillow under her head. She felt him as he pressed against her from behind, his hand rubbing her shoulder soothingly as she continued to shake. “Felicity, what’s wrong?” He repeated in a sharper tone. “Tell me what’s the matter.”

She couldn’t answer him as the exhaustion and stress finally caught up with her. Six months of sleepless nights, of nightmares that had her waking up in a sweat, of this ‘thing’, of Oliver and Bruce and those damn words that seemed to follow her everywhere she turned; all of it, all at once, it all seemed to tear through her like a knife.

She heard the words spoken in different voices echoing in her head:

_You belong to me._

How many times would she put herself through this? How many times could her heart take this much pain before it destroyed her?

This many times, she thought. This was it, she’d reached the end. She couldn’t do this again; not again. Not anymore, not like this!

“Baby, are you hurt?” He asked her, his voice gaining in volume as her trembling increased. He rolled her back over and pulled her hands from her face, looking at her ashen features and tear filled eyes with a hint of panic in his expression. “Did those punks hurt you?” He looked down her body, his hands casting over her flesh in a way that was more clinical than loving. “I don’t see any marks; did they have a syringe? Were you injected with something? Baby, answer me! Did they have a needle?!”

“No,” she said in a harsh half-sob as she shook her head jerkily, hot tears tracking down her face. She tried to cover her face with her hands again but he wouldn’t let her.
His hands cupped her cheeks and he forced her to look at him. She closed her eyes tight and he stroked her temples with his fingertips, “It’s okay, Baby; it’s just the stress catching up to you. Just breathe, okay?”

“It’s not—it’s not that,” she hiccupped as she tried to control her breathing.

“What then, Baby; what’s wrong?”

She opened her eyes to look at him. He stared down at her, his brow furrowed and his panicked gaze filled with confusion and concern. She felt her face crumple as more tears clogged her throat. She was so tired; God, she was tired.

Why did she keep letting him in? Why?

Because you’re in love with him, came the traitorous voice in her head. You’re in love with a man who will never love you back. Neither of them will ever love you back.

She’d allowed herself to become the woman Isabel Rochev once accused her of being: A weak-willed pushover who knowingly gave her body and her power to a man who was only using her as a toy. She had become the kind of woman she, herself, had nothing but contempt for.

What was it Barbara said about Laurel when she’d relayed her and Oliver’s history?

“I never could understand women who get all tangled up in toxic relationships…”

Talk about karma kicking you in the teeth.

Shame suffused her entire being. Oliver had rejected her and Bruce only wanted her for what was between her legs. This is what she had become. She wasn’t a victim. No one made her this; it was all on her. She let them in.

She let them in. She did this to herself.

“What happened? Just tell me what happened,” he said softly.

Why did he keep coming back? If he didn’t want her then why wouldn’t he just leave her alone? Why did she keep letting him in knowing how this always ended?

“Why?” She asked him, hating how pathetic she sounded but needing to know the truth.

“Why what?” He asked her as he stroked her hair.

“Why are you doing this? Why me?” She asked him tremulously. “Why do you keep…” she covered her face with her hands and this time he let her. “Why do you keep making me fall in love with you and then hu-hurt me? Why do this; why ask me if I belong with you when you always l-leave? Why do you keep coming back? Why can’t you just leave me alone?” She sobbed pitifully. The room grew silent and she felt his hands still against her hair.

“Baby,” he said at last, his voice thick with emotion. “Open your eyes and look at me.” She felt him tug gently at her hands. “Please.”

Reluctantly she allowed him to pull her hands away and she looked up at him, her cheeks red with humiliation. “I’m sorry,” she whispered. “I’m just…I’m just tired. I’m so sorry. I-I haven’t been sleeping well…I can go; I should go. I’m sorry, I j-just need to go.” She tried to get up but he held her tight and she felt more tears escape the corners of her eyes. “Please let me go, Bruce. Please,” she begged. “Don’t—don’t make me…” she couldn’t look at him. Her stomach burned and her nose began to run. She wiped at it with her hand and wished she had a tissue. “Just let me go, okay? Please, I just need to go.”

“I don’t want you to go, Baby.” He used his used his thumb to wipe her tears away before speaking, “Don’t leave, and don’t apologize,” he said, his lips pressing against her temple. “I’m the one who owes you an apology,” He leaned his forehead against hers and took a deep breath. “I’m so sorry for hurting you and I promise, I swear to you, I’m not going to leave you again. I’m here, Baby; I’m not leaving you again.”

“Don’t—just please don’t…” She started to pull away again but he held her firmly, his head still touching hers.

He shut his eyes tight, “I’m not leaving,” he told her again. “This doesn’t end when the sun comes up this time, I swear.”

“Don’t say that,” she said pleadingly and shut her eyes against the tears which kept falling as she prayed for the world to open up and swallow her whole. “You’re going to leave; you always leave.”

He lifted his head and looked down at her, “Baby, I’m not leaving, I promise. I should have never left the first time. I should have followed my instincts and come after you four years ago. I made so many mistakes Baby, too many, but I swear to you I won’t be repeating them; not this time.”

“You don’t mean it,” she told him weakly. “You say that now and then tomorrow you’ll tell me we can’t be together and—and—“ she took a sobbing breath. “I’m just so tired of this!” She cried. “I’m just so tired of being left behind; I’m tired of being alone!”

She began to cry in earnest then and he gathered her into his arms and began to rub her back as he made soothing noises, “You’re not alone, Baby. I’m here and I’m not leaving; not anymore.” He kissed her through her tears, his mouth clinging to hers as he rolled her onto her back and settled between her thighs once more.

“I’m not leaving,” he told her as he slowly pressed inside. “I’m not going to leave,” he repeated as she clung to him.

He made love to her slowly, tenderly; his lips kissing away her tears and his voice soothing her with sweet promises as he moved inside of her until the overwhelming misery she had felt was replaced by the first stirrings of pleasure. Over and over he thrust slowly inside, each time with a promise on his lips, until they both shuddered into one another.

When they were done she shut her eyes, vaguely aware of his getting out of bed to retrieve a warm washcloth for her. She watched sleepily as he bathed her thighs and sex gently before climbing into the bed with her, enfolding her into his arms, and whispering, “Go to sleep, Baby; I’m here and everything’s going to be okay.”

She shut her eyes and drifted and as her dreams began to flash before her she heard a soft voice far in the distance say, “I love you.”

She awoke the next day feeling groggy and achy, not to mention a bit hung over. Crying always did that to her. She pressed her face into her warm firm pillow and realized that it was Bruce’s chest. She looked up blearily to see him smiling down at her.

“Good morning,” he said quietly.
She flushed as memories of what had happened between them returned with full force and not the good ones either. She sat up in bed abruptly and immediately regretted it as her brain felt like it sprang a leak. “Morning,” she mumbled pressing the heel of her hand against the throbbing ache in her forehead. “Um, do you have any aspirin?”

“In the bathroom,” he told her. “Wait here,” he got out of bed and walked naked into the bathroom without a hint of shame. Even through the haze of pain Felicity couldn’t help but admire the play of muscles across his shoulders not to mention the rest of him.

Damn. That man’s ass really did belong in a museum.

She groaned in pain and embarrassment as she remembered breaking down like an idiot the night before. She was pretty sure she dripped snot and drool all over him to boot.

Kill. Me. Now, she thought. Maybe she’d get lucky and the headache was an aneurism or some kind of fast acting tumor brought on by too much cell phone use.

“You’re not dying,” he told her wryly as he held out a glass of water and a large tablet.

“Sorry, sometimes I speak what I’m thinking out loud without realizing it,” she muttered.

“I know,” he told her. “We’ve met, remember?”

“Funny.” She took the water and the pill and frowned, “One? Are you kidding? This is at least a three tablet headache.”

“It’s eight hundred milligram prescription strength Ibuprofen,” he told her. “Besides, at your body weight you shouldn’t be ODing on over the counter pain meds anyway.” She swallowed the pill downed the water quickly, finishing the entire glass in a few swallows, “Are you okay?”

“Just dehydrated,” she told him. She barely had half a glass of a fruity cocktail with an umbrella in it and she wound up hung-over because of a crying jag. How much suck could one person take? She cleared the hoarseness from her throat and glanced over at him, her cheeks on fire. “Bruce, about last night…”

“I told you, you have nothing to be embarrassed about,” he said firmly as he sat next to her on bed, climbing back under the covers so he could face her while leaning against the headboard. “We do need to talk though. I think we need to clarify a few things between us, don’t you?”

She licked her lips and spoke quickly, “Bruce, you don’t have to say anything. I was just really tired and I haven’t been sleeping well so if you just want to forget about it, I understand. I—” She closed her eyes and grimaced, “Just—look, I know that I said some stuff and you said some stuff but it’s okay; it’s just,” she rubbed her hand over her eyes wearily and drew her knees protectively up to her chest, “it’s been a very bad couple of days and I guess it all just caught up to me and…God, I wish I could just curl up and fucking die right now.”

“Stop,” he told her as he reached for her hand. “I don’t want to forget about last night and, like I told you, you have nothing to be ashamed of.”

“I, um, I wish that was true,” she chuckled nervously. She ran her free hand through her tangled air and looked at him sheepishly, “Listen, I know you don’t do,” she held her breath and blew it out sharply as she gestured at their hands that were clasped together, “this, and that’s fine. I’m not pushing for anything, honestly, and we can just get dressed and have a do-over, okay?”

“What if I’m the one pushing and the last thing I want is a do-over?” He asked quietly.
She turned to him with a wry grimace, “Bruce…you’re just feeling guilty and while I appreciate it —”

“I don’t do guilt,” he told her firmly.

“Please,” she said sardonically, “all of you masks use guilt like a SUV drinks gas; it’s what you run on.”

“I don’t do guilt; I do anger.” Leaning forward, he narrowed his eyes at her. “And since you aren’t hearing me, let me be very clear: I do not regret last night and I don’t intend to give you any more speeches about how much danger you’d be in if we were together. Trouble follows you whether I’m there or not so you might as well stick around where I can, at the very least, keep an eye on you. As for us, I want us to be in a committed monogamous relationship, hopefully one that involves you waking up in my bed from here on out; does that clear things up for you?”

She raised a skeptical eyebrow, “The other day you said—”

“I know what I said,” he told her. He scrubbed his hand through his hair and released her hand as he propped himself against the headboard and pillows again and gave her an almost sheepish look, “I’m…look, the truth is that I’ve been the Bat for almost half my life and I’ve run Wayne Enterprises for just as long and I tend to think and act like…”

“An ass?” She supplied helpfully.

“I was going to say like a ‘businessman or a vigilante in my personal life as well’ but ‘ass’ sums it up nicely,” he grimaced. “I’m used to getting things my own way and, if that doesn’t happen, I either force my opponent to bend to my will or I negotiate for the best deal.”

“So, when you told me that you didn’t want a relationship you were negotiating with me?” She asked scratching behind her ear and wrinkling her nose in confusion.

“You’re not the only one who feels socially awkward in certain situations,” he said as he cleared his throat. He looked down at the deep blue duvet cover and scowled, “I’m not very good at this sort of thing. I’ve been in relationships before but I’ve never actually been in this kind of…situation. I mean, I’ve been with plenty of women; dozens in fact—”

“Yeah, you really are bad at this,” Felicity said under her breath.

He gave her a sharp look, “Can we just get through this please without the running commentary?”

“Sorry,” she told him. “Carry on.”

“Thank you. As I was saying,” he shot her a look, “the closest thing I’ve ever had to a…long-term relationship was with Selina and, well, she…”

“Was a part-time bad guy?” Felicity offered.

“She was never bad, per se; she wasn’t exactly on the side of the angels but she didn’t…”

“Kill people?” She finished for him.

He closed his eyes and rubbed the bridge of his nose tiredly, “Would you please stop doing that?”

“Just trying to help,” she muttered.

His lips tightened and he grimaced, “You can be absolutely exasperating, you know that?”
She shrugged, “I’ve heard worse.” His lips twitched and he pulled her over to him and kissed her deeply. When he finally surfaced for air she blinked at him muzzily and whispered, “What was that for?”

“I was hoping it would shut you up,” he told her with a smirk.

“Shutting up now,” she said breathlessly.

He tucked her into his side and laid back with her head on his bare chest and his lips nuzzling the top of her hair. His arm was around her, holding her in a half-embrace, as his fingers danced over her side. “Selina and I were never…it wasn’t like this,” he said at last. “I think we were both far too independent for anything more and, when I pushed it, she left. I don’t really blame her; I kept trying to change her, save her, but she didn’t need saving. She kept warning me to back off and I screwed up. Looking back, I can’t really blame her. I wanted her to accept my rules and way of doing things but I wasn’t willing to compromise in return. She left and, after a while, I stopped looking. Besides, I had the mission and I didn’t have time to chase down someone who didn’t want to be found.”

“Is that why you didn’t come after me?” Felicity asked. His arm tightened around her and she looked up at him, “Last night…you said you thought about it but…”

“No.” There was a grim edge to his tone, one different from that of the Bat. She looked at him and saw the pain etched in the deep grooves beside his mouth. He glanced down at her and smiled softly but it didn’t reach his eyes. They were so filled with suffering and pain she knew exactly who he was thinking about.

Bruce was a man driven by grim purpose, and while he was not a happy-go-lucky kind of guy, only one thing ever had the power to bring him low.

Family.

“Damian,” she supplied gently.

He nodded slightly, “Barbara told you?” He asked in a deceptively neutral tone.

“A bit,” she said. “Not a lot, but enough to know that Damian was, um, difficult.”

He snorted, “Damian was a sociopath,” he said humorlessly. “Ten years old and he had already murdered who knows how many people. Talia,” he spat her name out like a curse, “raised him to be a killer, a monster, and then unleashed him on me and my team like a gift wrapped bomb left on the doorstep just waiting to be opened.”

“Talia was the woman who…” she hesitated, “She was his mother?”

Bruce took a pained breath, “If you can call what she was a mother, then yes.”

“And you were, um, romantically involved?” She asked hesitantly.

“No,” he said flatly. “Oh, we had sex a few times but that was years before Damian was conceived and romance was never part of the equation.”

She frowned, “Then how?” At his pained and angry expression she laid her hand on his chest gently.

“Bruce, we don’t have to talk about this if you don’t want to.”

“No, I need to tell you,” he said, placing his hand over hers and squeezing it reassuringly. “It’s important you know all of it before we go any further, okay?”
Despite the subject matter at hand part of her couldn’t help but feel hopeful by the way he’d phrased that. “Okay.”

“Talia was Ra’s al Ghul’s daughter.”

“Another one?” Felicity asked. At Bruce’s curious look she said, “We met Nyssa a couple of years ago down in Starling City.”

“In connection with Canary?” Bruce asked. “Queen mentioned she was once a member of the League.”

“Yeah,” Felicity said slowly. “Sort of, yeah, you could say that.”

“Felicity,” he said in the rumble of the Bat despite the fact that he was still running his fingers gently along her bare hip under the covers.

“She and Nyssa were…together.”

“They were lovers?” He asked but she could tell he was a bit caught off guard by that revelation.

“A bit more than that,” she told him. “What they shared was closer to a marriage actually. Sara and Nyssa were bound together both as assassins and as a couple; they made vows to one another. It was, quite literally, ‘til death do us part and Sara couldn’t take the killing anymore so she tried to kill herself using venom so that Nyssa wouldn’t go after her family in retaliation. Nyssa released her from her vows and allowed Oliver to administer an antidote in order to save her life and freed her from her service to the League. She went back to her after the Blood Army thing a couple of years ago but she returned to Starling when…” She stopped abruptly.

“When what?” Bruce asked with a frown.

Felicity shrugged, “It, um, it was just a case. Something came up and we needed help so she came back.”

“Six months ago?” Bruce asked her.

“Yeah,” Felicity shivered, speaking quietly but didn’t expand on it.

“What happened?” He asked her in a hushed tone.

“Lots of stuff,” she told him. “I don’t want to talk about it.”

“Baby…”

“Please?” She pleaded, her eyes catching his. “Don’t…I’m just not ready to talk about it, okay? Someday I will, just…just not now.”

His muscles tensed and he swallowed as he looked down at her, his mind obviously playing through all of the possibilities. “Did you…did anyone hurt you?”

She buried her face in his neck and breathed in the scent of his aftershave, “I don’t want to talk about it. I can’t…I can’t talk about it yet,” she said, trembling with the aftershocks of fear from that night as she heard the voice of Slade in the back of her mind:

***

“All you have now is me; I’m all you’ve ever had, love.”
“If someone hurt you then I need to know.” He waited for her to speak for several beats but she didn’t say anything. “Baby, please; just talk to me. What happened six months ago?”

She took a shaky breath and he felt another shiver go through her, “It was a case; just a bad case. It’s over now and it…it’s done. That’s all you need to know.”

“Felicity,” he bit out harshly.

“Please,” she said pleadingly, her arms tightening around him.

His jaw clenched and he ran his hand over her silken curls, “Did anyone hurt you? Just tell me that much and I promise I’ll drop it; at least for now.”

“I want you to know that I would have never laid so much as a harsh finger on your beautiful skin…”

“…From this moment on, you will always be safe, love; you will be cherished, protected, and you will always belong to me.”

She squeezed her eyes shut and tried to calm her fast beating heart, “No, no one…I wasn’t hurt.”

“But they tried?” She pulled away from him slightly and he tightened his arms around her, “Please Baby, I need to know if you could still be in danger.”

Again, she took a moment to gather her thoughts, “No one is coming for me.”

“How do you know?” He asked, his eyes searching her face.

“You’re all alone in this world, sweet. The only person who will ever come for you is me.”

“He’s dead.” The words were spoken so faintly he could barely hear her. “He’s never coming back.”

Bruce took a deep breath and seemed to struggle with himself for a moment before finally allowing the tension to ease from his muscles, “Fine, but when you’re ready to talk about it then I’m ready to listen, okay?” She nodded against him silently and he pressed a kiss to her forehead, “Has Sara told you anything about Ra’s?” He said as he mentally filed that information away.

“No,” she said honestly. “I learned some things about him through my work on Team Arrow but even Sara didn’t know much before that. I do know that he’s kind of a misogynist, which is weird when you consider the fact that he named his daughter as his heir.”

“Nyssa named herself heir,” he said contemptuously, “and calling Ra’s a misogynist is an understatement. He tried to use his own daughters as brood mares to bring about the coming of his male successor.”

Her expression twisted in a mixture of horror and disgust, “You don’t mean he—”
“No,” Bruce said. “Ra’s is many things but he’s not a pedophile nor is he into incest. In fact, to many people he’s a visionary; a savior. That’s what makes him so dangerous. In the beginning he was a good man but the years and his use of the Lazarus Pits have eroded his sanity and created an evil within him that rivals the corruption he believes he’s fighting against.”

“Lazarus Pits?” She asked, keeping her expression neutral.

Bruce leaned his head back and bumped it softly against the headboard, “It’s…a very long story.”
He sighed, “The Lazarus Pits are these natural occurring chemical pools that appear to be located along ley lines all over the world, the waters of which have the ability to heal and rejuvenate any injury up to, and including, death as long as you get the person to them fast enough. They also have the ability to turn back the hands of time and restore youth to the bather depending on how long they’re submerged.”

“The Fountain of Youth?” Felicity said skeptically even though she had already heard a similar story from Miranda. At least she knew the other woman was at least telling the truth about that now that she had confirmation from Bruce. “And let me guess; Ra’s real name is Ponce de Leon or, better yet, Herodotus.”

“He’s not quite old enough to be Herodotus but, from what we’ve been able to ascertain, Ra’s is between 450 and 700 years old,” Bruce said without a hint of humor in his tone.

“Oh-kay,” Felicity said slowly. She sat back at examined his expression carefully, “And you believe that? You know for sure that this isn’t just crazy talk; you have proof?”

He nodded, “I…used the waters myself,” he told her at last.

“What?” Felicity said in surprise, “But you don’t—” She stopped and looked at him carefully.

They had made love on three separate occasions since he’d come back into her life but, each time they’d come together, it had been in a rush and there had been no time for tenderness or slow exploration. Now that she had the opportunity to, she examined him carefully. She straightened up and sat on her knees facing him, not caring as the covers fell away revealing her naked flesh, and began to trace the many wounds and scars time had left on his chest, arms, and torso. Unlike Oliver, Bruce rarely trained shirtless (caves weren’t conducive to that sort of thing and he preferred to train suited up or in workout gear) so all her memories of his body came from their one weekend four years previously. It was enough that she knew many of the scars he bore were new and the ones that weren’t were significantly muted or gone altogether.

The tips of her breasts, hard from the chill of the room, brushed against him as she leaned forward, placing one hand flat on his chest for balance so she could look at the back of his upper arm.
Carefully, she ran the fingers of her other hand along where the scar from the wound he’d received the night he took her for the first time should be. His mouth dipped to kiss her shoulder as his hands ran down her spine to gently rest on her bottom but she was too distracted by what she found to appreciate it.

Or rather, what she didn’t find.

“It’s gone,” she said quietly, a strange sadness filling her heart.

He nodded against the curve of her neck, the stubble on his cheeks causing her skin to erupt in goosebumps, “It happened after you left.”

She sat back and looked at his face, her eyes searching it for any changes. Despite the fact that Bruce was far too ruggedly handsome to ever be considered a ‘pretty boy’, he was always remarkably fit and well preserved due to clean living and a strict regimen of diet and exercise. He didn’t smoke, rarely drank, eschewed drugs unless absolutely necessary, and avoided foods that would slow him down or were overly rich. When they were together the first time he barely looked thirty despite the fact that he was seventeen years older than she was. Even though he was almost forty-one he still looked at least a decade younger than his actual age. She hadn’t noticed it until she had a chance to really look at him but…

Taking his face in her hands, she ran her fingertips over the corners of his eyes and frowned softly, “I remember when we were together tracing the lines here. They were barely there but I remember thinking how handsome they made you look. Laugh lines,” she smiled at him as she caressed the delicate skin there gently. “I knew they were probably from stress or from squinting too much while you were in the cowl but I wanted them to be laugh lines anyway.” Her fingers moved his cheek to trace the lines around his mouth, still deep and defined, but less so then she remembered and her eyes threatened to fill with tears. “They’re gone,” she sniffled sadly.

He pulled her into his embrace and kissed her tenderly, “Since you’ve been gone I haven’t had a lot of opportunities to laugh or smile,” he said against her lips. He pulled her towards him until she was sitting across his lap and curled up onto his chest, then pulled the covers back around her to keep her warm as he held her gently. “If you had been around then maybe there would have been laugh lines on my face by now; that or worry lines,” he joked lightly then kissed her forehead. He rubbed his chin against her hair and she hummed happily.

He took a deep breath, his voice going from soft and loving to a familiar grim cadence, “After my experience with the Lazarus Pits I had some equipment from Wayne BioTech sent to the Batcave to see what had happened. Near as Alfred and I can figure, I’ve lost, or gained rather, ten to fifteen years give or take. There’s no way of being sure exactly how many years of damage have been reversed or if there are side effects related to the process that will manifest later, but all the injuries and scar tissue I’ve received within the last ten years or so are gone and many of my older scars have either faded or disappeared altogether. We took x-rays and found that even my internal surgical scars have disappeared from when Bane broke my back. It’s as though it had never happened. Also the blood test showed that, not only was my blood stream free of toxins, but it was as though I had been through some kind of hemoperfusion. My blood was better oxygenated, my reflexes and strength improved, and my stamina increased. I was…fine, more than fine; physically at least. On the bright side the cartilage in my knees, hips, and shoulders grew back, but for a while I was…less than stable. Luckily I snapped out of it but, for a while, I was,” he exhaled a pent up breath, “the only word that fits is ‘dangerous’. My aggression, my rage, it increased ten-fold; I was out of control. When I found the Heretic,” a darkness came over him and he met her eyes briefly, “that’s the…he’s the one who killed Damian. When I found him, I very nearly killed him with my bare hands.”

“Are you sure that wasn’t just grief?” She asked him as she wrapped her arm around his shoulder and played idly with his dark hair, rumpled from sleep.

“Part of it was,” he admitted, “but the waters had a significant role in my mental instability. I was driven nearly insane and that was after being submerged for only a few minutes. Ra’s has been using the Pits for centuries and the effect it’s had on his thought processes is substantial.”

“How did you…” she began, allowing her voice to trail off.

“I was injured; a potentially fatal wound through my chest,” he told her. “Ra’s didn’t want me to die so he placed me in the Pit to heal my injuries.”

Her brow furrowed in confusion as she laid her hand over his heart as though to reassure herself that “Not that I’m not grateful, but if the two of you are enemies; why would he do that?”

“That’s what I was building up to,” he said a bit uncomfortably. “There’s a lot we don’t know about Ra’s, but here’s what we do know: Ra’s is obsessed with creating a perfect world; a world without the evil of men. He believes the best way to bring about the new world is to eliminate the corrupt by razing entire cities like burning a cornfield to rid it of rats all in one go. The Pits induce hallucinations and Ra’s has come to believe them to be visions; prophesies. In one of his early ‘visions’ he saw a world free of the evil around him and he dedicated himself to that cause. As the years passed and he began to find and use more of the Pits, the visions changed and expanded to show that he was destined to produce a male heir who would one day inherit and rule this new world.”

He ran his nails gently down her back and she shivered closer into his chest, “He gathered his followers around him, an army of men dedicated to the idea of a world without evil, and he began to pull down cities, wipe out entire civilizations he felt were corrupt, and seek out the most beautiful, the most unique women he could find to give him the heir promised to him by the gods.”

“Sounds like a fairy tale,” she mused.

“It wasn’t,” he said flatly. “All of the women he took as his ‘consorts’ produced female children which he found unacceptable. Despite having advanced medical knowledge, he thought the women were at fault, not him. In the beginning he’d rid himself of his ‘mistakes’ only to move on from woman to woman in search of his true heir.”

“Wait; he’d murder his own children?” She asked in horror.

“We don’t know,” he admitted. “Possibly; in fact it’s probable in the case of deformity or birth defects. That’s just supposition based on the actions of others, and not his own. From what our research could uncover, the few children born to him that we could track down, besides Nyssa and Talia, appear to have been stillborn or to have died shortly after birth. His repeated usage of the pits seemed to affect his offspring in devastating ways, something chromosomal most likely and, in Ra’s case, most of the mothers all died in childbirth.”

“Wait; you’re okay, right?” Felicity asked worriedly. “Did you think to check out…? I mean, I know you don’t want any kids but, um…” She bit her lip and looked downwards pointedly, “still.”

He gave her an amused look, “I’m fine, luckily. We ran tests on that as well, trust me. I’m willing to sacrifice a lot for the mission but I’m still a man and there are some things even I’m not willing to put on the chopping block; my balls chiefly among them. We sent samples off to the lab just to make sure. Sperm count is fine as is my entire reproductive system and no chromosomal irregularities that they could see. I was only exposed to the Pits for a few minutes; any more than that I may not have been.”

He grew introspective again and his voice deepened, “Like I said, it may have something to do with his repeated exposure to the Pits, but there is something intrinsically wrong with that entire bloodline; with their souls or lack thereof. The only word for it is twisted. Whether that’s nature, nurture, or a byproduct of Pit Madness, who knows? We do know that Talia and Nyssa are his only surviving children that he openly acknowledges. We also know that they each tried to secure a place in their father’s affections by eliminating anyone they saw as a potential rival for his favor, including each other for a time; Talia especially. She would kill any woman she even suspected was carrying her father’s potential heir.”

“That’s sick,” she said with a furrowed brow. “The whole thing is sickening. So these ‘pits’; what else do you know about them?”
He shrugged slightly, “Well, we do know that each Pit can only be used once and only if the bather is gravely injured or ill. If a healthy person enters the waters they die instantly. Ra’s, when he reaches the end of his life cycle or when he’s injured, travels from Pit to Pit in order to rejuvenate himself. Nyssa is rumored to have discovered a way around that but we don’t know if she uses it herself as the side effects increase exponentially with her method and can literally turn the bather into an insane monster. Nyssa appears sane, she’s actually the most mentally stable of them all even if she is a sociopath, so I have my doubts.”

“So is that why Ra’s healed you? He wanted to drive you insane or turn you into a monster?” She asked worrying her lip again in a concerned gesture.

He smiled softly down at her and rubbed his thumb over her full bottom lip freeing it from her teeth, “I don’t think so.” He dipped his head and brushed her lips with his before raising his head and continuing his story. “The ‘prophesy’ Ra’s al Ghul believes in changes slightly every time he enters a Pit. Although he had Talia and Nyssa he still tried to produce a son until he had another vision that said that his ‘heir’ would actually be the child of one of his daughters and his greatest and most worthy adversary.”

“You,” she supplied.

Again he inclined his head slightly, “That’s what he believes anyway. Before that he encouraged both Nyssa and Talia to mate with whomever he chose so he could produce an heir.”

“He forced them—!” She started in disgust.

“No, not exactly; more like he actively attempted to indoctrinate or brainwash them,” he told her. “Ra’s may not have much use for women but he still believes he is a force of good and hand-chosen by the gods as their prophet to rid the world of corruption. In his delusions he also believes that his daughter, whichever one gives birth to his heir, will carry within her special gifts from the ‘pure gods’ that will be passed along to her child and that they will have the honor of becoming the mother of a new world. Nyssa balked; as you know her…interests run in other directions. As a result, she chose to interpret the prophesy differently. She believes it’s symbolic and that the daughter who proves herself to be most worthy of leading his army should be his heir; that the men who follow him are the children of the prophesy and, as their general, that she stands symbolically in the role of mother to his new world order. This led to an acrimonious feud between the two of them for several years until they reconciled. Nyssa calls herself the ‘Heir’ not because Ra’s named her as such, but because of her interpretation of his prophesy and the fact that she’s currently the last one standing.”

“Talia’s dead?”

“For a few years now,” he said grimly. “Talia was the opposite of her sister in just about every way. Not only did she buy into her father’s version of the prophesy wholesale, but she was determined to become the mother of a god and she was willing to eliminate the competition to do it. From time to time they were allies but, as I said, for a while they tried to actively destroy each other. Plus, and I don’t know if it’s true, but Talia once claimed to have given birth more than a dozen times; each child ‘rejected’ for being imperfect for reasons ranging from their sex to various birth defects.”

“What happened to them?” She asked and at his dark look and tense features she flinched. “Really? But she was their mother.”

“She was a killer,” he said flatly. “A sick, twisted monster.”

She felt sick to her stomach just thinking about it. “But you two…”
“I didn’t know what she was then,” he told her in a voice that reflected his own disgust at his unknowing actions.

“But what about Damian?” She asked quietly.

“In the end she killed him as well,” Bruce said, his voice growing cold as his deep blue eyes darkened to near black.

“What happened?” She said in a near whisper, her hand ghosting over his heart in sympathy.

He took a deep breath before continuing, “Ra’s basically disowned Talia for some reason and decided to show favor to Nyssa instead. Nyssa isn’t much better than her sister but, like I said, of all of them she’s the most rational and sane. It doesn’t make her any less of a killer; it just means that she was never blind to either of their faults. When Ra’s disowned Talia, Nyssa turned her back as well. She let it be known that Talia had betrayed them and that she and her assassins would support Ra’s and his goals without question, even if it meant destroying her sister who she felt had become corrupted by her ambition to become the mother of the new world. In retaliation, Talia redoubled her efforts to produce the true heir so she…” his jaw clenched, “drugged me and stole my DNA.”

Felicity felt as though she had been slammed face first into a brick wall. Basically, if what he was saying was true (and she had no reason to doubt it wasn’t), this woman had basically raped him. She didn’t say anything; there was nothing she could say. No mere words were enough so, instead, she laid her head on his chest and listened to the thrum of his heartbeat as he spoke.

“Although she was still fertile, she had no desire to carry any more children plus she thought of it as inefficient, so she used advanced medical technology and cloned a child using a combination of our DNA. Damian was an experiment; the first in an army of clones she planned to produce. Her goal was to produce warriors, fully grown and able to serve her from the moment they were ‘born’, but as he was her ‘prototype’ he was an infant and had to be raised. Unwilling to deal with the tedium of raising a child, she handed him off to be trained as an assassin from the moment he emerged from the artificial womb she had developed using a bio-engineered whale carcass.”

“A bio-engineered whale carcass?” She repeated in disbelief, unable to stop herself.

He drew a face in agreement, “I know, but remember; Talia and her father aren’t just assassins, they’re scientists but the ‘science’ they practice is entwined with mysticism. The whale carcass wasn’t just meant to be a vessel of bioengineering, it’s symbolic.”

“Of what?” She asked.

“Throughout history there have been myths linking whales to the gods; Jonah, Jason, Gilgamesh. Talia has a fascination with the Primordial beings within the Mesopotamian mythologies; monstrous beings that eventually gave birth to the gods. She was specifically fixated on the concept of primordial chaos giving birth to order since they were supposedly destroying and then recreating the world. Have you ever heard of Oannes?”

“No,” Felicity said. “I always stuck with reading mostly Greek, Roman, Norse, and Egyptian mythologies when I was a kid; basically anything that would get me a trip to the museum with Lucius. Apparently the Gotham Museum of Natural History is a bit limited in its scope. Now, if we should meet up with a guy who thinks he’s Zeus then I’ve got you covered.”

“Remind me to take you on a tour of Arkham sometime,” Bruce said ruefully. “As for Oannes, apparently in Sumerian-Babylonian mythology he’s a god who is both man and fish and he bestowed upon mankind the gift of wisdom. The use of the whale carcass was probably a nod to
As for Damian, By the time Talia had anything to do with him he was violent and undisciplined; he had never been shown a single bit of true affection and was both feared and revered as the chosen one by people who taught him that human life had no intrinsic value. Rather than kill him as she had her other imperfect offspring, she took him in hand and began to teach him about me. She called him Ibn al Xu’ffasch, which translates to ‘Son of the Bat’, and taught him to believe that, as my son, he would one day inherit the world. She then unleashed him on us knowing how much chaos he would cause in his wake while she perfected the cloning process.”

“You said she killed him and mentioned someone called ‘The Heretic’,” Felicity said quietly. “How…?”

His jaw clenched and he unconsciously drew her a bit closer, his arms squeezing her tight against his chest as he rubbed his stubbled cheek against the top of her head. To comfort her or himself she didn’t know, “We don’t know everything but Ra’s was unhappy with Talia for trying to corrupt his prophesy by producing ‘unnatural’ offspring. He saw Damian as an abomination.”

“Because he was a clone?” She asked quietly.

“Partly,” Bruce nodded. “Ra’s visions were pretty specific about the fact that the child would be born, not grown. Talia was trying to ‘cheat the gods’ which was the main reason why he rejected Damian as a potential heir, but it also had to do with the mythology she was working from. Remember I mentioned Oannes?” She nodded, “While many ancient Babylonians worshipped him as the bringer of wisdom, Ra’s chose to see him as ‘Musaras’ which translated to ‘repulsive abomination’ and he declared Talia to be ‘the mother of monsters’, not only because she sought to pervert his prophesy but because she had taken to destroying the Lazarus Pits in an effort to prevent her father from healing so that he would die and she and her ‘children’ could ascend without his interference. Ra’s was beginning to grow frail and had already used all of the Pits available to him that Talia hadn’t yet corrupted so one of his followers suggested he could use Damian as a vessel for his consciousness.”

“Wait, like switch bodies?” Felicity’s mouth fell open. “He can do that?”

Bruce inclined his head slightly, “Ra’s is powerful and that’s not the strangest thing I’ve ever seen from him or at all. As I said before, he’s more than just a master of assassins; he’s somewhat of a mystic as well. He realized that, as distasteful as he found the idea of Damian to be, by using his body as a vessel he could again use the Pits and therefore find immortality again. Talia, whether it was to punish Damian for slowly rejecting all of her teachings or to prevent Ra’s from getting the vessel he wanted, first placed a bounty on his head then sent a fully grown clone of Damian’s she called ‘The Heretic’ after him.” His eyes grew dark and haunted, “He cut Damian down in seconds. After the funeral I went after The Heretic with Dick and Tim. I was going to kill him,” he said without hesitation. “I nearly did. Dick could have stopped me but he didn’t even try; he had formed a bond of sorts with Damian and if it hadn’t been my hands on The Heretic, it would have been his. I had him on the ground and I was going to snap his neck when I looked at his face and realized that I was looking at Damian. This was Damian’s clone; as such, he was also my son. I couldn’t do it so I walked away and just… let him go.” He exhaled harshly, “Talia…Talia killed him later as well. She beheaded him for failing to defeat me.”

“I’m so sorry,” she whispered.

He kissed her hair in acknowledgement and rubbed his hand over her arm, “Damian was a monster, an amoral murdering sociopath, but he was changing,” he told her earnestly. “I was getting through to him, I know it. He…he redeemed himself at the end; he died a hero. I tried to save him but he was dead before his little body hit the ground.” Felicity felt her tears flow freely both for Bruce and for the poor boy who never even had a chance at happiness. “I never thought of him as a child until he was there in my arms bleeding out.” He closed his eyes, “It was the first time I had ever had the chance to hold my own son.”

She wrapped her arms around him and stroked his hair as she buried her face in his neck. He pulled her close, one hand running up and down her bare back as the other embraced her around the waist, and kissed her shoulder. They held one another until the moment of grief had passed and Bruce began to speak again.

“I didn’t…” He shook his head, “I was a blind idiot four years ago, Felicity. I was arrogant and stubborn and I…” He looked down at her and brushed her hair behind her ear, “After you left I thought about coming after you a lot. Something held me back though, my own cowardice maybe, but then Damian showed back up shortly after you left town and I realized I couldn’t bring you back into my life as long as he was there.”

“You had to be there for your son,” she told him gently. “I would have understood.” She bit her lip again and laid her head on his chest, “Can I…ask you something about Damian?”

“Ask,” he told her.

“I only met him that one time but he seemed like an okay kid,” she said, listening to the steady beat of his heart under her ear. “He was a bit of a brat but he was smart and polite. Later when…” she paused.

“When Barbara and the others told you what a monster he was?” He supplied in a voice devoid of emotion.

“Yeah, sorry,” she said contritely.

“It’s nothing I haven’t said or thought myself,” he told her. “Go on.”

“It just didn’t gel with the kid I met. I didn’t think they were lying but it just didn’t make a lot of sense to me,” she said quietly. “I mean, I only was with him maybe an hour or two but he seemed fine.”

“That’s because,” Bruce hesitated a beat, “That’s because he was targeting you. He was planning on killing you, Baby—he was going to kill you but I stopped him.”

“What?” She said in surprise, her head coming off his chest so she could look at him incredulously. “Why? That makes no sense! What did I do?”

“Nothing,” he assured her. “He targeted you for the same reason he targeted Tim; he saw that I…cared deeply for you and you were just another rival to be eliminated.”

“But he never did anything,” she told him. “He just sat there and asked questions; he never came near me.”

“Yes, he did,” he told her.

“No, he didn’t,” she insisted. “I might not be clear on all of the details but I remember that much.”

“The cocoa.”

“What?” She asked in confusion.
“He offered you a cup of cocoa,” he told her grimly.

“I don’t…” she squinted her eyes as she thought back to that day as though literally looking into the past and remembered. “Oh. It was…?”

He nodded, not needing to say the words.

“You called me over and we talked about the upgrades or something then you sent me home,” she said quietly. “I thought you were mad at me at first because of the way you were trying to get rid of me.”

He pressed his lips to her forehead and smoothed his hand over her hair, “I walked in just a few seconds before you took that cup from him. Neither of you noticed at first and I could tell he was up to something; the minute he handed you the cup, I knew.” He tucked her head under his chin and wrapped his arms around her tightly, “I confronted him afterwards and he didn’t even bother to deny it. By then he was so used to killing on a whim that the idea that I would be angry never occurred to him. It was the only time I ever laid hands on him,” he told her. “I didn’t hit him but…I almost did.”

His lips tightened into a grim line, “He disappeared the next day and, I’ll admit, I was relieved. A large part of me hoped he would never return.” He turned his head to stare blankly at the wall, “I suppose that makes me the monster; wishing my own son would go away and never come back.”

“It makes you human,” she corrected him. “I wish I had known what you were going through. I would have come back; I could have helped—”

“No,” he said firmly, looking down at her. “If I had brought you back here and Damian returned he would have eventually killed you and then I would have had no choice but to have him committed or worse. He was so malicious and cruel in the beginning,” he said, his expression pained and brooding. “I failed Tim so much when Damian came into our lives. He was fine with Dick, but he despised Tim. I think it was because, until Damian arrived, Tim was the only one of my adopted ‘children’ to actually refer to himself as my son. I was still in my early twenties when I took Dick in and we always related to one another more like brothers than father and son, but by the time Tim came into my life... Well, anyway, Tim was always…special to me. I saw how Damian tortured him but I…Jesus, I was so damn numb and in shock from the whole thing I could barely keep it together. He nearly killed Tim on more than one occasion; had you been there you would have been targeted and—” His jaw tightened. “If anything had happened to you I don’t know what I would have done. I thought you were safe in Starling, safer than you’d be here anyway. That’s why when I found out you were working with the Arrow I—”

“Came to my rescue by behaving like a bull in a china shop with his head stuck up his ass?” She said with an impish grin. “I can take care of myself, you know.”

“You got shot,” he told her. “And don’t think I’ve forgotten my promise; I fully intend to break Queen’s teeth with my fist the next time I see him,” he told her grimly.

“It was almost two years ago,” she said with an exasperated sigh.

“And what other sorts of messes besides jumping off buildings and getting shot in the shoulder has he gotten you into since then, hmm?” He asked her with a narrowed eye.

“Do you really want to know?” Felicity asked him.

“Yes,” Bruce bit out sharply.

“I assume you want everything from the beginning, so; there’s the bomb collar around my neck—”
“Someone put a bomb around your neck?” Bruce asked in a near shout, his face suffused with angry color.

“Yeah, but that happened way before I got shot,” she told him airily. “Heck, I hadn’t even crashed through my first window at that point, I don’t think. It’s hard putting it all in chronological sequence, y’know?” She squinted towards the ceiling, “Bomb collar, mob casino, jumping off a building, crossbow to the neck, elevator shaft…wait, was it elevator shaft and then crossbow?” She squinted up at the ceiling then shrugged, “Serial killer, crazed drug lord, nearly crushed to death in a basement, jumping out of a plane onto a landmine, facing down the Bratva, nearly blown up by exploding computers, then getting shot. A couple more bombs, some, I’ll admit, I set myself,” she said sheepishly. “More killers, more bullets, Brother Blood and his community organizing/wholesale campaign of destruction,” she paused and threw him a rueful look. “Yeah, Starling gets its fair share of the crazies, too. The sniper again, the Dark Archer again, crossbow to the neck again, yet more bombs; that year was chock full of repeats. The return of the Clock King who was pretty pissed at me, let me tell you, the weird ninja bakeneko chick with the poisoned fingernails and the knives, lots of escapades with meta-humans, the guy with the mind control drug-thing which was, let me tell you, a whole barrel of laughs, the creepy guy with the puppets who got a little too handsy; yeah, now he pissed me off,” she said with a scowl. “He tried to treat me like one of his puppets by sticking his hand where it didn’t belong, if you know what I mean. I hauled off and smacked the shit out of him and, by the time I was done, he practically begged Oliver and Lance to take him to jail. I was actually kind of proud of that one and afterwards Lance took me out for Thai food to celebrate the effectiveness of my right hook. A bunch of other crazy stuff I really don’t want to get into right now, some guy calling himself the Sewer King who kept alligators as pets and a river of poo—Eh, everything after that is pretty much a blur, really.”

His face was a mask of shock and anger as he listened without interrupting until she was done, “I can’t believe you can be so casual about nearly losing your life like this,” he glowered. “At some point didn’t you think, ‘maybe I should go home’? Or ‘maybe I should call Bruce, Dick, or Tim’ when things began to get out of hand down there? ‘Maybe this whole situation is more than I should be handling alone’!”

“I wasn’t alone; I had my team. Besides,” she grimaced, “if I had called any of you guys, you would have been down there in a heartbeat and—”

“You’re goddamn right I would have!” He growled holding her a little tighter against his chest as though somehow protecting her from the past. “I would have been down there in a fucking minute and I definitely wouldn’t have been happy with your friend Queen when I got there!”

“I know and I appreciate that,” she said easily, patting his chest with a gentle hand, “However, after you’ve been doing this stuff for a while there isn’t a whole lot left to be scared of, really,” she shrugged. “It kind of raises the bar on fear. I even started killing my own spiders after that, although the river of poo thing…” She made a face, “Yeah, I’m never going into another sewer again. The next time a baddie wants to turn himself into the underground king of the post-flush, I’m going on vacation. At the very least I’m investing in a good pair of hip waders and a rebreather. I had to buy a special shampoo and throw away a nice pair of shoes and my favorite loofa after that one.”

“The fact that you came so close to losing your life and seeing how you’re so casually dismissing it terrifies me, you know that? On second thought, I don’t want to hear this,” Bruce muttered. “Not until later after I’ve had coffee and calmed down somewhat.”

She stroked his cheek softly until he focused on her again, “You really planned on coming after me?” She asked, with a hint of vulnerability.
He leaned his head back against the headboard and let out a harsh breath, “Not for a few days. It took me a while to get my head out of my ass,” his lips quirked upwards slightly and she smiled back to acknowledge her frequently used chastisement. “After a few days of stewing over the whole thing, I decided to ask your father…” he exhaled roughly.

“What?” She prodded.

“I was…going to ask him for permission to ask you to marry me,” he admitted reluctantly.

“Seriously?” She squeaked. “Wait, you were going to ask my dad before you even talked to me? Who are you; Mr. Darcy?”

He squirmed uncomfortably and his lips firmed into a hard line, “It was…stupid. I was so confused about my feelings, plus Damian had thrown me off my game; I convinced myself that marrying you made sense and I wanted your dad’s approval, plus…”

“Plus?” She prompted.

He sighed, “You weren’t answering my messages or picking up on my calls so I figured that once I talked to him then maybe that would go a long way towards getting you to forgive me.” He shrugged ruefully, “My only defense is that I was confused and completely out of my element with the whole situation. You weren’t some random one night stand or a sophisticated seductress; you were the little girl I watched grow up and you were a virgin when we…when I seduced you in the Batcave.” He grimaced, “On one hand, I was feeling incredibly guilty, not just for treating you the way I had, but for seducing you to begin with. On the other hand I still wanted you so I tried to justify my feelings, my confusion, my wanting to keep you by my side, by turning you into another protocol. You were smart, beautiful, we were sexually compatible, you could be an asset both in the boardroom and in the Batcave,” he shook his head. “At the time, and in the state I was in, it made sense. Had I not been in denial, I would have realized right away that, not only was I being incredibly selfish and an even bigger ass than usual, but that you would have turned me down flat. You would have been right to do it too had I approached you with my plan but you were already gone and Damian returned a few days later. After that I knew I needed to concentrate on him and let you go.”

“I wouldn’t have said no,” she said quietly as she looked down at the covers.

He stiffened in surprise and placed his fingers on her chin to turn her face toward his, “Why? I was too old for you, broken; I would have wound up using you like just another asset or protocol. You wouldn’t have been happy with the man I was then and I wouldn’t have ever noticed because I was too caught up in my own selfishness.”

“I was in love with you, Bruce,” she said sadly, a hint of unshed tears in her voice. “Had you offered me the chance to be with you forever, even if my marrying you was just another way of securing the mission, I would have said yes. I was…it took me a long time to come into my own and at nineteen I had no idea who I was yet or what I was capable of doing.”

“And now?” He asked her.

“Are you asking me to be Batman’s beard?” She joked lightly.

“I’m asking if, in spite of all the mistakes I’ve made, you still love me?” He asked, his eyes completely focused on her.

The temptation to deflect and run was strong but she chose to ignore it and tell the truth, “Bruce, even though at times I wished I wasn’t, I’ve never not been in love with you,” she told him honestly.
She cupped his cheek and let her fingertips rasp against his stubble. “I’m in love with you now, or can’t you tell?”

“And Queen?” He asked, his expression guarded even as his hand came up to caress the one that held his cheek.

She bit her lip and thought about what she should say before answering, “I won’t lie to you; I love him, too. I’ve been in love with him for…” she shrugged, “A while now. I don’t know when it became real love but he never acted on it until after you and I happened again. I don’t know if it’s because he genuinely cares about me or because he was feeling territorial but I also know that I can’t be with him and he can’t be with me.” She looked him in the eye bravely, “Even if I left here and returned to Starling City there just isn’t a future for me and Oliver; not now and probably not ever. I know…I know that’s probably not what you wanted to hear but I didn’t sleep with Oliver because I was feeling vulnerable, although that was probably a contributing factor. I allowed it to happen because I loved him; I will probably always love him just like I’ve always loved you and, right or wrong, I don’t regret our night together,” she looked at him apologetically, “I’m sorry but I don’t.”

“How do you feel about me? What does that mean for us?” Bruce asked in a rare display of vulnerability.

“I don’t know. I mean, I know how I feel; I told you, but what it means…?” She shook her head slightly, allowing the pain to wash over her for a moment, “I spoke to Oliver the other day and a lot was said that was long overdue and necessary for both of us to find closure...or as close to closure as we’ll probably ever get,” she grimaced. “We talked about us, about you and me, I mean; and Oliver basically told me that I should move on from my life there, even if it meant being with you. He told me he would try to do the same and asked if I would stay away and allow him the opportunity to heal as well. It was all very civilized and actually very… ‘precious’ is the only word I can think of to describe it.” She closed her eyes, “As much as it hurt to hear and as painful as it was, I just realized, just this very moment, that maybe it was a gift. He acknowledged his feelings for me and mine for him; that’s…enough I guess. It’s more than what I had before, at least.” She took a deep breath, licked her lips that had suddenly gone dry, and opened her eyes to look at him again, “He asked me if I wanted to be with you and I told him the truth, I didn’t lie; I told him I didn’t know but that there was something between us and that…” she paused. “It was right after we made love that day in your office and I told him that you talked to me about being together. He said that since he couldn’t be with me then I should try to be with you if that’s what I really wanted.”

“Is that what you want?” Bruce asked quietly, “Do you want to be with me or do you want to go back to him?”

She sighed, “The truth is that Oliver is just beginning his mission and he can’t be distracted by a relationship right now and I don’t want to spend the rest of my life waiting for him to notice me again.” She stroked the corners of his eyes where the lines she once loved used to be and she imagined what it would be like to do this again when they reemerged in a few years’ time. “I love Oliver and I always will, but I’m not what he needs right now and he’s not ready to be what I need either.” The minute she said it she realized it was the truth. She loved Oliver but, at the moment, she couldn’t imagine a future with him. If she were honest, she probably never had.

She’d been his friend and companion long enough to be used to the way he could so easily overlook her when it suited him or when he became distracted by some new love interest. When Sara first joined the team, even though their romance had quickly fizzled out, he stopped seeing her altogether. Despite his assurances that she had always come first, Oliver became so distant and distracted he barely acknowledged her. Diggle had to take over her protection detail because he was busy with other things and, while she thought she understood that, now she had to wonder if she hadn’t been unconsciously harboring some resentment over it this entire time.

If Bruce had been the one facing Deathstroke she never would have been left in a position where she had to face him on her own and certainly not twice. Not that it had been Oliver’s fault; it’s not that she resented him, she didn’t. It had been her idea after all, but the fact that he kept disregarding her advice and help until that became their only option did serve as a reminder of how he thought of her and of her place in his life. Even when she managed to take out Deathstroke and survive, he just gave her a pat on the head and a quick thanks then completely ignored her until Sara broke it off a few weeks later. Then, not even a week after that, he began seeing Laurel again and she was pushed even further out of his life.

That had been rough. It was bad enough when he hooked up with Sara but that she could understand, plus Sara was a member of the team. Laurel though… Even though she knew his secret and was sharing in the mission, it just seemed wrong; especially since they started up right on the coattails of her sister leaving. Felicity had been disgusted with him for that on Sara’s behalf and made no secret of it, but he barely acknowledged her or her many pointed jabs. Even when he and Laurel had their final confrontation that she’d been a reluctant witness to, he never apologized for pulling an emotional disappearing act.

Following the second confrontation with Slade six months ago, Laurel came back into town after visiting her mother to find everyone critically injured and that no one had even thought to call her until her father phoned from the hospital after coming out of surgery. After that, the discomfort and tension that had always existed between the two of them grew to be palatable. Felicity was given the impression that Laurel resented the hell out of the fact that she had been the last to know and that she blamed her personally for being left out of the loop even though it had been Oliver’s call. In fact, truth be told, she had been left out of the loop as well; if it weren’t for Thea’s knack for snooping she wouldn’t have known something was up until it was too late herself. Still, Laurel didn’t see it that way and the fact that Thea had taken to telling her off over it in the Lair, leaving Oliver to constantly act as referee between his sister and his lover, hadn’t helped matters either. The two women had nearly come to blows when Thea basically told Laurel to stop being a, quote, ‘whiny ass bratty bitch’ because she was mad that she hadn’t had the opportunity to get blown up like the rest of them and that she needed to get over herself; a statement that Laurel did not appreciate in the least.

Felicity, doing what she had always done, sank into the shadows and watched in dismay as everything she’d built seemed to fall apart around her. Her home had been invaded by darkness and there was nothing she could do to fix it. Perhaps it was her strategic retreat inside of herself that was one of the reasons why Laurel had grown to resent her presence even more than Thea’s or Sara’s. It was a lot of things actually; Oliver’s reliance on her skills compared to his reliance on Laurel’s, his utter passiveness when it came to resolving the tensions between her and his sister, Felicity’s bond with Sara and Thea growing stronger as her relationship with them seemed to be quickly breaking down, even the way Lance seemed to take her side the one time Laurel had made the mistake of snapping at her in front of him. Laurel felt left out and no one understood that feeling more than Felicity, but there wasn’t anything she could do about it but sink further into the shadows that surrounded them, make herself as small a target as possible, and wait for the storm to pass.

Tensions were running high and the entire team was in chaos. Sara, unable to deal with it, left town to stay with her mother during her recuperation. She used it as an opportunity to break things off with Oliver and escape the love triangle that was quickly developing between the three of them; a move Felicity couldn’t blame her for. In fact, she’d been tempted to ask her if she could tag along. Thea was acting out more and more, Laurel was angry because she felt undervalued even though the two of them had rekindled their relationship. Instead of addressing that with Oliver, Felicity became the convenient scapegoat for all her resentment. As all of this was happening, she returned to her addictive behavior and had been hiding her fall off the wagon fairly effectively until one night, drunk and high on pills, she followed Oliver to Verdant. She was spiraling; while deep into a hypomanic state and intoxicated, she convinced herself that he was sneaking off to meet another girl. She walked in and saw him talking with her, his hand resting on her shoulder before leaning in to hug her, just before they headed down into the basement. Laurel, seeing what had been a completely innocent gesture on Oliver’s part, misinterpreted it and reacted badly. She attacked her verbally and with malicious precision. Felicity, although taken completely taken off guard by the viciousness of the confrontation, wisely said nothing.

Since learning Oliver was the Arrow, Laurel had been, if not friendly, at least cordial and respectful towards her even though she had always sensed an edge of barely concealed distrust on the other woman’s part. Plus, unlike Sara, from the moment Laurel joined Team Arrow, she seemed to go out of her way to make Felicity feel like an outsider by not-so-subtly comparing her role as the interim Canary and later as Manhunter with Felicity’s tech skills and finding her contribution to the cause somewhat lacking. Sara had attempted to mitigate that by telling her Laurel had always been competitive, especially with other women, and not to take it personally. Still, despite Sara’s reassurances and Thea taking up the cause as her unsolicited champion, it had been difficult not to feel the sting of the other woman’s pointed barbs from time to time. Even if Oliver was being utterly oblivious to them, at least Dig saw early on what was happening and, as a result, would often take the time to pull her aside to let her know that just because she fought her battles in pencil skirts and glasses instead of with her fists, it didn’t make her less a part of the team.

She supposed that the other thing that had been a major contributor to the other woman’s insecurities came from the fact that she had been with the mission since the beginning and that, even though Laurel had known him longer, she was suddenly relegated to the role of newcomer. There was an intimacy between her and Oliver as a result, and it had been hard for Laurel to understand Felicity’s place in his life. Sara she could handle, but Felicity’s role within the team dynamic had always eluded her. Laurel confronted them in a rage; she even went so far as to accuse her of betraying her friendship with Sara even though she was the one sleeping with Oliver. The things she said…

After she snapped out of her fugue, (even though the rational part of her brain recognized the fact that Laurel wasn’t thinking clearly and probably would have never talked to her like that had she been sober) she had so wanted to let fly with her own volley of cutting remarks. For weeks she’d had to put up with this stupid melodrama in the Lair and she was just as sick of it as Thea was, but she wasn’t Thea and she didn’t have the luxury of being able to lend a voice to her anger. She was just Oliver’s EA and partner, and Laurel was the woman he loved; if she wanted to maintain a place in his life then she would have to keep silent until the woman had said her fill or risk having him be forced to choose sides. If that happened, she knew she’d lose every time. That simple realization wasn’t due to poor self-esteem; it was merely a fact. Time and time again Oliver had proven that no matter how far she went, the guilt he felt would never allow him to choose her or anyone else over Laurel.

It took everything she had to keep her mouth shut and the whole time Laurel was shouting at her she just stood there and stared at Oliver, waiting for him to step in. She didn’t care if he didn’t stand up for her, just as long as he stopped it so she could leave. The woman had her cornered, literally cornered, and she had nowhere to physically go except through her so she had to just stand there and take it. He never said a word though, just looked on sadly until Laurel stepped forward, hand raised as though preparing to strike her. That’s when he snapped out of his guilt-fueled trance; but whether it was to protect her or to protect Laurel, she didn’t know. He grabbed Laurel’s arm and asked her to excuse them for a minute, so she did. That was it.

She never heard what they said but he stopped seeing Laurel after that and the other woman finally went to rehab and therapy after she figured out that AA wasn’t enough. Laurel had Lance deliver a letter of apology to her afterwards as a part of her twelve steps and he let her know that she’d been diagnosed with a milder form of bipolar called cyclothymic disorder. Apparently she’d been struggling with it for a while and the addictive behavior was her way of self-medicating. He said that the new meds helped a lot, along with the psychotherapy and going to AA meetings. As sympathetic as she tried to be given that Laurel was Lance’s daughter, after he left she tossed the unopened letter in her desk without reading it. Maybe it was petty, but she just wasn’t in a very forgiving mood after everything she’d been through. Later, when she looked for it, it was gone. She figured that someone, probably Roy, had disposed of it for her. Normally she would have been pissed at the highhandedness of something like that but instead she’d just been grateful not to have to deal with whatever Laurel had written; it probably would have just led to her tossing one more angst-filled log on the fire anyway.

Dig had tried to talk to her about it; the other man was extremely upset by the whole situation. Roy had overheard the whole thing over the security feed when Laurel verbally attacked her and had relayed it to him verbatim, especially the really mean personal stuff, along with the fact that Oliver had just stood there and let it happen. Ever since the thing with Slade, the younger man had become particularly protective toward her and offered to beat some sense into Oliver but she’d waved him off. Outwardly she’d kept a stiff upper lip about the whole thing, pretended it didn’t matter, but when she got home she burst into tears and didn’t stop until the three pints of ice cream in her freezer were gone. After another nearly sleepless night, one of many spent tossing and turning between the nightmares that would always leave her in a cold sweat, she’d no choice but to call in sick as a result of the migraine brought on from a combination of her binging on three cartons of Ben and Jerry’s, two entire boxes of Entenmann’s Marshmallow Iced Devil’s Food Cake, and the entire bottle of Clos de los Siete she’d chased them down with.

The weird thing was that it wasn’t what Laurel had said to her, not really, or the fact that Oliver didn’t do anything to stop it that upset her. Laurel was sick, she knew that and, even though it didn’t excuse her behavior, she didn’t really take it personally; not even when she taunted her over the whole Daniel thing, (although that had been a pretty low blow) and Oliver, well, that stung but he’d always been useless when it came to confronting the women in his life so she wasn’t surprised by his reaction at all. What had upset her was the feeling that she was alone and then hearing Laurel confirm it.

For one brief moment it seemed like life was good again and that everything was going to be fine. She allowed herself to forget about the tension they’d been under as Oliver leaned in to apologize and to thank her for saving his sister, and the next she was being reminded at the top of Laurel’s lungs that she didn’t fit in and that she was utterly forgettable. In fact, the only thing she’d said that really hurt were the words, ‘you will always be alone’.

She almost allowed herself to cry at that point and it took everything she had not to. It hurt because those were the words she often tortured herself with. It was like Laurel knew that for most of her life she’d felt like a ghost. It was like she was wearing a perception filter or something; like she was the TARDIS and, even though she was this big blue box in the middle of everything, people’s eyes would just skitter over her. They’d know she was there; they just couldn’t seem to remember to care about it. It had always been that way, ever since she was little.

She could be standing right in front of people and it was as though she were invisible. The only people who ever seemed to really see her were her immediate family and Bruce. In fact, Bruce was probably the first person outside of her family who ever really noticed her; that was what made her fall in love with him to begin with. Even at work people looked through her. After working at QC for years, she still had to remind Gloria in HR what her name was every time they ran into each other and that woman knew everybody. Not that her reaction was that unusual; no one ever seemed to remember her name even though ‘Felicity’ wasn’t exactly common. At least at work she could wear a name badge so that helped cut down on the reintroductions somewhat.
She still knew though. Whenever they’d give her that weirded out smile and their eyes would drop to her chest, she knew they were desperately trying to find her ID badge because, let’s face it, her boobs weren’t big enough to command that much attention. The real fun came when she’d either leave it off or it would accidently flip around, obscuring her name. That was always good for a laugh. There were the Friendly Fakers who covered it up with pet names like ‘hon’, ‘sweetie’, and ‘cookie’, the Formal Fakers with ‘ma’am’, and ‘miss’, and the Fumbling Fakers who just randomly guessed at it. Most got close with a ‘Felicia’, ‘Phoebe’, or a ‘Fiona’, but her favorite had been the one guy who sprang ‘Fifi’ on her; Elijah Dennison, a junior executive with Marketing. He tried that one out during a meeting and it made Oliver actually do a spit-take then glare in his direction until he practically ran out of the room with his tail between his legs.

Oliver was one of the few people who she ever felt really saw her other than Bruce; that’s why whenever he seemed to push her aside it always hurt more than it did with anyone else. Sad to say, but Oliver was actually one of the first people to even talk to her when she came to work there. She’d been in the IT department for a couple of months and the only people who even spoke to her up till then were Walter, Gloria, and her immediate supervisor, Dennis Dearborn; the one who kept calling her ‘Felicia’ and asking if she was new. She even got stuck using a cubicle space in the server room because he kept assigning her office to other people thinking that it was empty. God, he was an idiot. It was one of the main reasons she liked computers actually; no human contact to deal with. People might never see her, but they did at least check their e-mail occasionally.

Oliver never forgot her name; he never tried giving her a nickname or fumbled around her. He did, however, have a nasty habit of shuffling her aside. While she knew that he cared about her, his allowing Laurel to speak to her in that manner meant that he just didn’t care enough. That was what hurt the most.

She stood there and watched as Oliver stood frozen, pain and guilt etched on his face as filth spewed from Laurel’s mouth and realized that she was right. She was both easily forgettable and alone; what’s more is that she always had been. At that moment she felt all of it; all the insecurities that had haunted her since childhood, all the insecurities that had haunted her since childhood, all the cruel asides about her and her mother she had heard spoken so casually as though they didn’t care that she was standing right there in front of them as they said it; like they didn’t know or didn’t care that she was even in the room. It hurt; it felt like a betrayal when Oliver didn’t immediately step in, so she allowed herself a single night of depression before getting back up on the horse and moving on with her life and the mission because that was what she had always done. She put on her happy face and kept going.

That was a few months ago and she thought she was over it, but maybe she wasn’t. Maybe she was thinking about it now because it just served as a clear reminder of the different ways both men had treated her in the past. She loved Oliver, and she was pretty sure he loved her, but he was, in a word, damaged. His women were his biggest weakness and she didn’t want to become yet another brick in the wall of guilt he’d built around himself. Not only that, but Oliver tended to be capricious in matters of the heart. He just didn’t have the emotional stability necessary to maintain a healthy relationship with anyone. Even if he had been inclined to try, with everything else he had going on in his life, she just would never be seen as a priority; she would never come first. Bruce was an ass at times, yes, but she never questioned the fact that she had always come first with him and always would.

There was more to it, of course, and maybe it was unfair of her to compare the two men but Bruce, even before they had been involved, would have always protected and supported her. She had no doubts that Oliver would take a bullet for her in a heartbeat but would he ever put her emotional needs first? No. Someone or something else would always come before her; his mission, his sister, his exes, himself. She wasn’t angry or resentful towards him for it either, that was the sad part. After all, it was her fault for not demanding his respect, right? He treated her like a piece of equipment for years before they finally came together because she allowed him to and that made it her fault, not his.

Still…

Without summoning it, her conversation with Sara the day before came to mind:

“Is it possible to love two people at the same time?”

“Yes, but you always wind up loving one of them just a little more or you find yourself drawn to the one who needs you just a little more than the other. Sometimes it’s a matter of choosing the person who chooses you, you know? Sometimes it simply comes down to self-preservation.”

She took a centering breath before speaking. “If Oliver ever needs me, I’ll go; I won’t abandon his mission, but I won’t go back to what we had.” She shook her head, “Oliver isn’t in love with me; he loves me but not enough to make it work, and I deserve more. I guess all I needed to do was put some space between us in order to remember that.”

“So where does that leave us,” he asked, his expression guarded and tense.

She tilted her head and looked at him with a sad half-smile, “I don’t know. I do know that I’ve loved you my entire life. I was in love with you the first time we slept together and every time since even when I probably should have hated you.” He blanched and she soothed the sting of her words by running her fingertips over the delicate skin at the corners of his eyes and smiling up at him gently, “Even when I knew we were making a mistake, I loved you. I’ve never said the words ‘I love you’ to any other man, not even Oliver, and I probably never will. That said, I don’t expect you to feel the same way about me; that’s not why I’m telling you this. I know you care about me and, for now that’s enough, but love; I accepted the fact that love just isn’t something you can give me a very long time ago.” She swallowed the lump in her throat and looked away from him, “It took me a while but I think I’ve finally figured it out. I love you but I know myself enough to know that I deserve better than half a relationship. I won’t ask you for more than what you’re willing to give, but I won’t accept less than what I deserve anymore either.”

“Meaning what?” He asked, his eyes searching hers.

“Meaning that I will be your lover but not your mistress,” she told him lightly. “I’ll sleep with you but I won’t live with you. I’ll love you but I won’t lose myself to you. I’ll work with you but not for you. And when the time comes, if I do decide I want more or if I think I’m getting in the way of your happiness, I’ll leave before you have to ask me to. Conversely, I won’t stay where I’m not welcome or wanted, I won’t be objectified or put on a shelf, I won’t chase after you, I won’t try to cage you, but I won’t be caged either,” she rubbed her fingertips along his jawline, her fingertips playing with the cleft in his chin as she rested her head against the warm skin of his throat. “I love you enough to let you go and not try to keep you, Bruce. I already know this, us, comes with an expiration date. You don’t need to give me any speeches or worry about hurting me; I’m going in with eyes wide open this time. For now, this is enough for me but, if it’s too much for you, then we can just leave it in this room and walk away with no hard feelings as long as we’re clear that this is it. We enjoy today and then you let me go. I’m not asking for a relationship or a commitment but I can’t keep doing this back and forth with you. I just won’t. If this is where we end then I’m done and you need to respect that and stay away. It may not be perfect but I can deal with keeping it casual, temporary, and just between us; I can be okay with not being public or official. If you’re not okay with even that, then we need to end it once and for all. Either way it goes, I deserve to be happy and so do you.”

“My Happiness,” he whispered.

“Your happiness will always be a priority to me,” she told him quietly. “Just like you’ve always made my safety a priority; I care about you.”

“No,” he shook his head, “Not my happiness, ‘My Happiness’,“ he emphasized. “The painting your mother did of you when you were little; remember it?”

“Of course,” she said taken slightly off-guard by the change in subject. “What about it?”

“I bought it; a couple of years ago at a fundraiser,” he told her. “At the time I said it was so that I could keep it at the Foundation in memory of your mother and for Lucius but, the truth was, I bought it because,” he paused. “You’re my happiness, Felicity; you’re it. Ever since you were a little girl you could always make me smile and, as you got older, I kept an eye on you but that summer—” He shook his head ruefully, “I took one look at you and realized that I was in trouble. I was a grown man and you were this little girl I watched grow up and I was suddenly thinking things that made me feel like a goddamned pervert. I just…I couldn’t control myself around you and it was driving me insane. I’d been fascinated by other women, I’d even loved a few, but I had never fallen in love with anyone before. Between my confusion over that, and the insecurities I had concerning our age gap, I didn’t know what to do, I felt completely helpless and lost. It was like I was under some kind of spell or something, like I was just drawn to you against my will and I didn’t know how to deal with it. I tried avoiding you, pushing you away…” He scowled, “After we made love I thought what I had been feeling would just go away, but it didn’t. It never has, and every time we’ve been together since it’s just gotten stronger,” he said quietly.

They sat in silence until a scowl appeared on his face. “Well?” He prompted, looking more than a little put out.

“Well, what?” Felicity asked him.

He glowered at her, “I just told you I’m in love with you.”

She blinked at him in surprise, “You did?”

“You’re…” He made an impatient noise in his throat, “You drive me absolutely insane, you know that? Damn it, what do you think I’ve been—? Fine! If you still don’t get what I’ve been trying to tell you this entire time then let me just spell it out for you once and for all!” He hauled her toward him, kissing her hard. When they broke apart he grasped her chin in his hand and eyed her angrily, “I love you! I’m in love with you! I don’t want you to be my mistress, or my lover, or just shack up or share space, I don’t want to sneak around in dark corners and not acknowledge how I feel about you publicly, and I don’t want you to leave; I love you, understand? I. Love. You.” He said firmly.

“Okay, so we won’t do any of that stuff,” she said dizzily.

“Damn it, woman! I’m telling you that you are my happiness! You! You’re it! I love you and I—I--” he pressed his forehead against hers and shut his eyes tight. “I don’t want this to be casual or temporary, I don’t want this to be ‘undefined’, and I don’t want to walk into this with an out clause or an expiration date attached. I may not be able to give you everything you deserve but I want the chance to try. I want to be allowed the right to make that happen and I don’t want the feelings I have for you to be publicly relegated to labels as ridiculously inadequate as ‘boyfriend’ and ‘girlfriend’!”

“Okay, I could be down with that. So what do you want, Bruce?”

“I want more,” he said quietly. “I want something better than that.”

“They’re just words, Bruce…” she began.

“No, they’re not,” he told her. “They imply that what I feel for you can go away; that what we have is some kind of childish little game we’re playing and this is never going away. I need to be able to call us something more permanent than that.”

She bit her bottom lip. The expression on his face wasn’t one she’d ever seen before and it was making her very nervous, “Okay,” she said, deciding to play it off with a nervous chuckle, “but unless we can come up with a new word what you’re implying kind of sounds a little close to, well, the whole Chrysanthemum and Churchill and dinner by seven every night kind of deal.”

He paused as though considering it, “Well, I think we should reconsider the names, at least, and I might not always make it to dinner by seven but…” he let his voice trail off expectantly.

Seconds ticked slowly by as she stared at him, her ears ringing slightly as she tried to sort through what seemed to be hinting at. “Um, I’m sorry, I’m still a little fuzzy here; did you just ask me to marry you? Because…”

“I didn’t ask,” Bruce told her, his expression still and serious. “Asking implies that I’m giving you a choice in the matter and there isn’t one. I want this; I want you and you want me. I don’t want there to be any ambiguities or equivocations between us and the best way I know of to do that is to give you my name. You, this finger,” he lifted her left hand and kissed her empty ring finger softly then gave her a pointed look, “has always belonged to me. I should have put my ring on that finger four years ago and the first chance I get I’m correcting that mistake. We’ve wasted too many years as it is; I’m not wasting any more.” He offered her a triumphant look, “So, any other questions?”

“What other names did you have in mind?” She said dumbly, her brain having gone completely offline at that point.

His lips quirked upwards in a slight smile, “Well, I’m kind of torn on the issue of children to begin with and I don’t necessarily think we should have kids right away if we do have them but, if and when we decide to, I’d prefer we use family names,” he said in an almost casual tone as though he’d already put a great deal of thought into it. “I’ve never been fond of trendy names that are purposefully misspelled or sound like you’re being read law office letterhead. I prefer strong, simple names with a lot of history behind them: Thomas for my dad or Patrick for my grandfather then there’s my mother’s name, Martha, or my grandmother, Betsy. Your dad already has a namesake in Luke but we could add Evie and Peggy Ann to the list as well.”

“Betsy?” She asked dizzily. “And how many kids are we talking about? That’s,” she shook her head, “Six names.”

Her discombobulated senses flashed on the image of a dark haired little girl with deep blue eyes holding her hand while she stood in the middle of a park wearing mom jeans:

“Hi, I’m Felicity; Betsy’s mom. And Patrick’s mom, and Thomas’s mom, and Martha’s mom, oh and that’s Evie over there, and Peggy Ann…”

Weird and more than a little terrifying.

“As many as you want I guess; we could have one or ten or a dozen, I don’t care, but if you want to use up all the names on the list Betsy is short for Elizabeth Helena so that would bring us up to seven,” he grinned. “On second thought, keeping you barefoot and pregnant might not be such a bad idea after all. Not only would it be both fun and challenging but you’d be so busy running after kids that it might actually keep you out of trouble.”

Helena.
Same scene with a twist. This time she was in the same park only holding the hand of a leather clad Huntress:

“Okay Helena, be good for mommy and don’t skewer any of the other kids with a crossbow bolt or you won’t get a cookie afterwards.”

“If those are the only options out there then I’d rather have a ‘Betsy’ than a ‘Helena’,” she said faintly.

“Like I said, I don’t really care,” he told her. “Name them whatever you want; now does that mean you’ll marry me, or what?”

“Marriage, right,” She said snapping back to reality. “Bruce, we’ve spent the last several weeks having sex then yelling at each other afterwards. Don’t you think we should, I don’t know, date first?” She asked.

“I apologized for that and we’re already sleeping together; what would be the point of dating? It would just be a waste of time as far as I’m concerned,” he said grumpily.

“Really?” She said looking at him askance.

“Yes, really,” he said dryly. “Dating implies courtship and, frankly, we don’t need to go through all of that rigmarole so we might as well just get this show on the road, don’t you think? We already know all we need to know about each other so I say we quit wasting time and just get it over with.”

_Rigmarole._

Huh, that’s…different.

She gave him an incredulous look, “Get it over with?”

“Exactly; why can’t you just marry me without us having to go through the rest of that crap?” he said flatly. “We should just get this over with and move on.”

“I don’t know,” she said slowly, “maybe because that’s just how most normal people do things?”

“We’re not most people and I don’t have time to waste on that kind of thing.”

She looked at him closely and, yep, he was serious.

“You know, that’s not exactly the kind of proposal I was expecting,” Felicity told him

He raised a superior eyebrow at her, “Again, I wasn’t proposing. Proposing implies--”

She gave him a quelling glare, “Yeah, I heard you the first time; ‘not a negotiation’. Still, even if I did agree to do it your way, which for the record I’m not going to; my dad would probably be a little put out when I show up to dinner married to you without any kind of explanation, so a little bit of lead time would be nice.”

“Shit,” he swore rubbing his hand over his mouth. “I’ll have to talk to Lucius about us. That’s not going to be pleasant,” he grumbled.

“No, it’s not; just ask Tim. He’s an old fashioned guy, particularly when it comes to me and Tam,” she said with very little sympathy. “I know you’re into expediency and dislike mincing words, especially when it comes to ‘getting this show on the road’, but I suggest you don’t lead with, ‘but Lucius, we’re already sleeping together…’ and ending with ‘who has time for all that rigmarole and
He grimaced, “Fine,” he said at last, “We’ll…‘date’.”

“Thank you,” she said dryly.

He frowned and reached for a tablet that was sitting in its docking station on the nightstand then turned it on and cued up his schedule. “How long do you think it will take before your dad gets used to the idea and we can get married because I’d like to go ahead and clear some time for the wedding,” he asked her as he scrolled through it. “I figure, what, a couple of weeks? Three tops? I figure we could go for late March; sometime around the first day of spring so we can have a token engagement as well. That would give us…” he checked the calendar, “around six weeks or so to get everything done. That’ll work out perfectly; Dick’s birthday is the 21st so he’ll be in town and we can do it that Saturday. I have to be in the UK on business the following week so we can have a quick honeymoon in Scotland afterwards at Waynemoor Castle; I can call Harold and have him open a wing and make sure everything’s ready for us. We’ll call the first three weeks ‘dating’ and the last three our ‘engagement’…unless, of course, you’re planning on doing some overdone society thing?” He eyed her dubiously, “You aren’t are you? Because I was hoping we could just do something simple at the manor, maybe a justice of the peace and some cake, but if you want to do something else it’s up to you as long as we can get it done before the end of March. Moving this meeting would be a real pain in the ass and I need to be there.” He said, putting the tablet back on his nightstand.

“Um…” She squinted at him and tried curb the impulse to either laugh out loud or smack him upside the head, “Simple…simple is good—if we were going to get married, but I don’t know about that timeline. I’m not really sure, I’ve never really been in this situation before, but I think it might take a little longer than that to get through the whole dating-engagement-wedding thing.”

“What; a month? Two? I’ve got the big shareholder’s meeting in April and waiting until May just seems like we’re drawing it out, don’t you think?” He said pulling a face. “I know weddings are supposed to be a big deal but how long does it take to just buy a dress and order a cake?” He asked then made a noise of exasperation. “Fine, we’ll put a pin on it. I’m sure Alfred will have an idea; I’ll just have him handle all the details. However, just to be clear, we are getting married after we get finished with the whole courtship song and dance for Lucius, right?”

“Maybe,” she told him carefully.

“Maybe?” He repeated with a hint of outrage.

“Depends, I don’t know; probably,” she conceded. “If the dating thing works out then, sure. Why not?”

“Probably?” He spat the word out distastefully. “What the hell kind of answer is ‘probably’?”

“I don’t know, Bruce; what the hell kind of proposal is ‘we might as well just get this show on the road,’ followed by ‘Why can’t you just marry me without us having to go through the rest of that crap?’” She shot back.

“You…might have a point;” he conceded reluctantly. “I suppose I’m not very good at this whole ‘romance’ thing.”

“What about all those pictures in the gossip rags of you romancing starlets and supermodels over candlelit dinners?” She asked. “You looked pretty good at it from what I could see. Trust me; I’m not above a good bottle of wine and some candlelight, I promise. Try starting there and see what happens.”
“That was my cover,” he told her. “I was just pretending to be the playboy for the cameras because it was what the public expected to see. I don’t have to do that with you.”

He gave her an amused look, “First off, I don’t have to romance you to get your pants off,” he slid his hand up her bare thigh under the covers and squeezed her bottom suggestively, “But what I was referring to was the ‘pretending’ part.” His voice took on a tender quality. Looking deeply into her eyes he said, “I may not be the most romantic guy in the world but that’s because I don’t have to pretend with you.” He stroked his finger down her cheek and smoothed it across her bottom lip where she had been unconsciously biting it. “I don’t have to put on a show with you because you already know me just like I know you. You’re where I live; you’re home.”

She blinked at him; the breath leaving her lungs, then grabbed his shoulders and hauled him against her in a passionate kiss. He followed her lead, lifting her from his lap then laying her on her back and maneuvering himself until he was cradled between her thighs, his hardening sex nudging at her center.

He ended the kiss and looked down at her tenderly, “Not that I’m complaining, but what was that for?”

“For saying something incredibly romantic,” she told him before pulling his mouth back down to hers.

It was quite some time before they were able to finish their conversation.
Chapter Thirty-Two
Chapter Thirty-Two

Around mid-morning, after another vigorous round of lovemaking and a long shower filled with a lot of suggestive scrubbing, they reentered the bedroom to hear Felicity’s cell buzzing angrily on the nightstand.

Wrapped in an oversized towel she walked over to her cell to read her texts. “Crap,” she grimaced. “What is it?” Bruce asked from across the room where he was picking them both out some underwear in a somewhat self-satisfied way. He’d begun acting differently ever since she had tentatively agreed to try to go the distance with their relationship. It wasn’t a bad thing, just a little disconcerting. For example, when they heard her phone go off the first time after they stepped out of the shower, she’d noticed that he’d started using some very different possessive pronouns like:

“Go check your messages and I’ll pick you out something from our dresser so we can get dressed and then we’ll get something to eat.”

Something told her that Bruce’s idea of going slow and hers were two very different things.

“It’s Tam,” she told him. “Dad called her and asked her if I spent the night at her place.”

“And?” He asked as he tossed a bra and a pair of panties on the bed for her before pulling on a pair of boxer briefs and an undershirt then grabbing a pair of socks and sitting on the bed beside her to put them on.

“She covered for me but now she wants details,” she grimaced.

“Details, huh?” He grinned at her naughtily. “Be sure to paint me in a flattering light. I’m going into the closet; I’m pretty sure they hung the rest of your clothes in there as well but I’ll let you know,” he said as he gave her a quick peck on the lips before getting up and heading towards the large walk-in.

“Hey, bring me out an outfit if you find something. I don’t care what it is as long as it’s warm,” she told him as she texted Tam back.

“Should I feel flattered that you trust me enough to pick out your clothes for you or is this some kind of relationship test?” Bruce asked her with a raised eyebrow.

“You spend your life in Armani; I have a feeling that you have better taste than I do,” she said distractedly.
“That or I’m just not interested enough in clothes to hire a different tailor,” he told her. “Jeans and a sweater okay?”

“Yeah, and boots,” she called out as he left the room. “God, I hope they delivered the shoes, too. I really don’t want to have to wear heels today,” she muttered as she sent the text.

Her phone rang a split second later.

“You slept with Bruce again?” Tam screeched in her ear so loud that she had to hold the phone away from her ear.

“And good morning to you,” Felicity said to her sister with an aggrieved sigh.

“What? How? Was it a booty call? Did you actually booty call Bruce?” Tam asked excitedly. “Was it good? I bet it was good; it was good wasn’t it?”

“No, I did not ‘booty call’ Bruce,” she told her. “We ran into each other when he was on patrol and…stuff happened. As for the rest of it; no comment.”

“Is that Felicity?” Came Tim’s voice. “What am I saying? Of course it’s Felicity. Who else would be booty calling Bruce?” He made a noise of disgust, “Oh God, I really hate that I just said that out loud.”

“It was not a booty call,” Felicity repeated.

“Felicity said to tell you it wasn’t a booty call,” Tam told him.

“Good to know,” came Tim’s muted reply. “Hearing that your sister can still respect Bruce the morning after she has sex with him is what I live for. By the way, have I mentioned how much I really hate hearing this crap yet? Do I have conversations with Dick over your dad’s sex life where you have to hear about it?” He paused, “Great, now I have to brush my teeth; just saying that made my mouth feel dirty. Saying ‘your dad’ and ‘sex’ in the same sentence tastes like dirty sweat socks.”

“Shut up, Tim!” She shot back, “What kind of sex was it?”

“What; like positions and stuff?” Felicity sputtered.

“Oh yeah, positions! Does he only do missionary or did he go all Snoop Doggie Bruce on you? Hey, has he tried to cross into the dark side yet because you did give him that bottle of lube--?”

“I don’t want to hear this!” Tim yelled from the other end of the line. “Putting my fingers in my ears; la lala la la!”

“I’m not talking about this with you right now, Tam! Bruce is in the next room!” Felicity told her then lowered her voice, “But, for the record, he’s very, um, versatile.”

“Oooh!” She squealed. “How versatile? Are we talking full Kama Sutra? Is he like Sting? Not bald Sting who looks like somebody’s grumpy old grandfather but like late 80’s, early 90’s totally pretentious but still hot Sting with the 24 hour boner and the tantric sex? He looks like he could be all into that tantric stuff. Is it all yoga and clean living or does he have to pop a pill for that?”

“Just kill me,” Tim moaned piteously.

“And what kind of sex was it? I mean like was it all tender and loving or was it dirty and wha-pow ‘who’s your daddy’? OOOH! Does he like it when you call him ‘daddy’ in the sack? Like ‘Oh, do me Daddy Bruce!” because that could actually be kind of sexy in a slightly wrong but really hot and kinky kind of way.”

“I will sign over my entire trust fund and every share of stock in my portfolio if you will Just. Stop. Talking,” Tim told her. “Please, for the love of God, just stop!” Came the muffled pleas.

“Oh, was it angry revenge sex? Tell me it was angry revenge sex! Angry revenge sex is HOT! I bet Bruce just gets all up in there and--”

“That’s it!” Tim shouted and she could hear the sound of the mattress springs as he got out of the bed. “I’m going to take a shower and scrub every inch of my body now! I might even have to use the Comet under the sink!”

“You big baby! Save me some hot water!” Tam called after him. “But seriously, it was angry revenge sex, wasn’t it?”

“It was not angry revenge sex!” Felicity told her. “Where do you get this stuff? And, by the way, Sting never really said that; it’s an urban myth.”

Bruce walked back into the room with some of her clothes on a hanger and an amused look on his face, “Angry revenge sex, huh? Your sister definitely has a way with words.”

“Tell me about it,” she muttered. “Look, Bruce just walked into the room. Let me get dressed and I’ll call you back,” she told her.

“No, don’t hang up!” Tam shouted over the receiver, “I want details! How naked is he right now?”

Felicity rolled her eyes and hit ‘end call’ as she admired Bruce’s outfit; a Caspian blue traditional Irish cable knit sweater, a pair of dark denim boot cut jeans, black boots, and a black leather jacket. It was rare that she got to see him dressed so casually but it suited him.

He caught her appreciative gaze and grinned, “Hope you like what I picked out. I figured you might want to pick the shoes though.”

“If I must,” she sighed mockingly. She snatched up the clothes and underwear he laid out for her and headed out of the room to change.

“You don’t have to leave on my account,” he told her.

“Right, so you can jump me the minute the towel comes off?” She tossed out over her shoulder. “Not likely. I’m hungry and there’s no food here.”

“Not even officially engaged yet and you’re already cutting me off?” He called out after her.

“Suck it up, Bruce,” she retorted before heading into the bathroom.

“Guess that means the honeymoon’s over,” he said just before she shut the door between them.

A few minutes later she was brushing her hair into a shimmering golden fall of loose curls and examining herself in the mirror. She didn’t have many cosmetics with her but she managed to find some lip gloss and a tube of mascara in her purse. Bruce had picked out a pair of artfully faded medium wash jeans and a cream colored Burberry Brit V-neck cardigan among the things she’d purchased the other day. While the sweater looked deceptively modest on the hanger, the fine wool clung to her curves and the low neckline plunged to dangerous depths. She admired her reflection in the mirror and grinned; her smallish bosom was proudly displayed by the cream silk push up bra.
Bruce had unwittingly chosen. Her ‘32B’ girls were feeling more like perky ‘32C’s’ today.

She padded out of the room barefoot and walked over to his dresser, fully aware of how the body conscious True Religion jeans hugged her form in all the right places. “Mind if I borrow a pair of wool socks? All I have is stockings,” she called out to him. He was lying back on the bed with his tablet, probably checking his email.

“Sure, no—” He paused suddenly and she turned toward him so he could get the full effect, “problem.”

“Thanks for picking out the outfit, Bruce,” she told him as she headed towards the closet with a pair of his wool boot socks in her hand. “You really do have excellent taste.”

“Yeah, apparently I do,” he said in a dangerously low tone as he tossed aside his tablet and followed her into the closet.

She sat down on the padded leather bench in the large walk-in closet that was almost the size of her old living room and put on the socks before reaching for a pair of low-heeled chestnut brown riding boots. He watched her with hooded eyes, his arms crossed over his chest as he leaned carelessly against the doorframe. His gaze fixed on the glimpse of skin that was exposed when she bent over and her sweater rode up, then down the curve of her derriere which was emphasized by the designer jeans.

“I could get used to this,” he told her with a naughty glint in his eye as she stood up to face him.

“Used to what?” She asked as she reached into one of the zippered garment bags for a wool and silk blend charcoal grey Armani pea coat since her other coat was currently stained with blood.

She was still pissed about that; she really liked that coat.

“Sharing closet space, lending you my socks; being domestic. Watching you bend over in those jeans;” he added with a muted leer.

“This is domestic to you?” She laughed as she walked into his embrace and he kissed her softly.

“Well, it’s the closest to it I’ve ever come,” he told her with another kiss.

“Domestic isn’t borrowing a pair of socks; domestic is when someone tells you to pick up diapers and milk over the coms and you have to walk into the corner bodega suited up,” she teased.

“Diapers, huh?” He said, “That reminds me; you and I still have a few things to discuss, don’t we?”

“It was just a joke, Bruce,” she said with a snort. “I like kids but I know how you feel about them so right now it’s not an issue for me. Especially since we’re not even up to our second date yet.”

“I know that, but…” His eyes took on a cast of vulnerability, “Look, I don’t want you to get the wrong idea and have this become a big issue between us later. We were joking earlier, but I meant it when I said I would consider having kids with you if that’s what you wanted. I realize looking back on it that I might have seemed flippant or unenthusiastic about it but that’s because…” He ran his fingers through his hair and frowned, “It’s not that I don’t like children or that I don’t want to give you the opportunity to have a child of your own; I just don’t think I’d be a very good father. I’m not sure I’m even capable of it.”

“Because of Damian?” She asked him.
“And Dick, Tim, Jason, Cassie; I was never a father to any of them, really,” he told her. “On paper I was their legal guardian but I didn’t actually raise any of them. I didn’t do Christmas morning or birthday parties, I didn’t go to school plays, or engage in any sort of normal family activities with them. Anything like that was taken care of by Alfred. On holidays he had to remind me what day it was half the time and, even then, I barely paused long enough to acknowledge it. I can’t even use the excuse that they were too old for that sort of thing. Dick and Tim were both pretty young when I adopted them; not even teenagers yet, Jason was just slightly older than that at thirteen, Cassie was seventeen when I took her in but she was still a child in many ways.” He shook his head, his mood going grim. “I think I failed all of them really. Instead of acting like a father I was just a team leader and trainer; a taskmaster. I’m just worried that if we had children that I’d wind up hurting them and disappointing you.”

She stroked his cheek softly, “I appreciate you being so honest with me but we can hold off this discussion for a while, Bruce. We have time. And, when the time comes; if and when we both decide to have kids, I promise I won’t let you fall short, okay? Seriously though, it’s way too soon to start talking about children.”

“It’s not though; not really,” he told her. He took her by the hand and led her back to the bedroom where he sat them both back onto the bed. He turned to her slightly and caressed the back of her hand with his thumb, his eyes seeking out hers, “We’re kind of on a roll with this ‘talking things through first’ thing and I want to make sure we have it all out there before I take it to Lucius. I know him well enough to know he’s going to expect answers to any and every question and I want to make sure I go in prepared.”

She looked at him, “So, what you’re really saying is, you want me to help you formulate a ‘marriage protocol’ for my dad even though we’re not even close to the point where getting married is an actual thing yet?”

He actually had the decency to look slightly discomfited, “Basically, yes.”

“And why exactly do we have to do this right now?”

“You have met Lucius, right?” He said dryly.

“What is it with the Wayne men and my dad?” She said with a puzzled grin. “You guys act like he’s the Big Bad or something.”

Bruce rubbed the back of his neck ruefully, “Well, in this particular situation, he pretty much is.”

She rolled her eyes at him, “Fine. What do you want to talk about—and keep in mind, I’m hungry and that can be a dangerous thing.”

“I swear we’ll go eat in a minute but there are some things I just don’t want to talk about in public. Too many cellphone cameras and eavesdroppers in this part of town and Bruce Wayne is pretty high profile.”

“What is it with you masks and referring to yourselves in the third person?” Felicity asked in bemusement.

“I’m being serious,” he told her. “One hint of Bruce Wayne talking about marriage and kids with a mystery blonde and we won’t have to tell your dad anything.”

“You have a point,” she said faintly as she absorbed that. “Ask.”

“Do you want to get married eventually?” He asked then added quickly, “I know we already talked about this but you kind of left it hanging and I want to make sure we’re on the same page. I don’t want there to be any room for misunderstandings between us so, at the risk of repeating myself, for the record that’s where I see this going. I know I come off as old-fashioned and unromantic but the fact is that I’m not 23 anymore and if we’re going to do this I’d rather we do it sooner rather than later. As it is people are going to take one look at our age gap and think, ‘midlife crisis’. I’d rather not wait until things get too obvious between us.” The corner of his lips quirked upwards, “That and I’d like to have a proper honeymoon without having to rely on pharmacological assistance.”

“You could hear Tam from inside the closet?” She asked him in surprise. “I guess those ears on your costume aren’t just for show then, huh?”

He looked at her in amusement, “Well, her voice does carry but I pretty much guessed that’s what she was referring to after I heard you talking about Sting and urban myths,” he told her before offering her a sensuous smirk. “And, for the record, tantric sex isn’t all it’s cracked up to be.”

“Really?” She asked, quirking an eyebrow at him. “And you would know that how exactly?”

He shrugged, “Simple logic; if it takes you that many hours to get the job done then you’re obviously not doing something right.”

“God, you’re an ass,” she snorted. “First off, technically there is hardly any age gap between us at all thanks to your leap into the Fountain of Youth, but I get what you’re saying. Secondly, if you get any more help in that regard I’m going to need pharmacological assistance,” she told him with a reassuring pat then paused to gather her thoughts. “I don’t want to jump into anything this big too quickly. If life has taught me anything it’s that I need to be more cautious about making big decisions but,” she looked at him, “if I was ever going to do this with anyone it would probably be with you.”

He started to lean toward her and she held out her hand to stop him, “That’s not to say we should pop off to do some ring shopping later; it means that I’m willing to try this with you and that I’m serious enough to go public with it. I think that’s a big enough step for both of us; for now, at least.”

“I was actually going to give you my mother’s ring; save a few bucks,” Bruce told her then grinned at her look of annoyance. “Understood, and I agree; reluctantly, but I can wait until you’re ready. Of course, I reserve the right to try to change your mind on the timeline so we can speed things up a bit,” he said with a mischievous quirk of his lips. “Now, about kids; how big an issue is this? And don’t say we’ll talk later because that’s one of the first questions your father will ask and I’d rather not have everyone at our child’s first school play ask me if I’m there for my grandchildren. Even if we got started within the next five years I’d be,” he paused to do the math, “sixty-four by the time they were ready for college.” He winced and rubbed his hand across his mouth. “Shit. That kind of puts things into perspective, doesn’t it?”

“You’d be a good looking sixty-four,” she said lightly as she offered him a supportive smile. “Technically, you’d be more like a young looking fifty; fifty-four tops. Plus you’d be married to a hot forty-six year old MILF.”

He wasn’t buying it though. He looked at her, his eyes dark with apprehension, “Time is not on our side, Felicity. Even with a ten year free pass, doing what I do…”

“Okay, then…yes,” she said, making up her mind. “I’ll call it and say that eventually I would like children but it isn’t a take it or leave it thing. If you don’t want kids then I can live without them. I mean, given what we do and the danger associated with it, having a kid is kind of crazy to begin with. The possibility of one of us becoming a single parent is pretty high and, whether you like it or not, as your wife and Batman’s partner I’m going to have a target on my back. Even if I stick to coms there is a possibility that the job of being the sole parent could fall to you. If you aren’t all in then it isn’t worth it.”
“I get what you’re saying,” he said in a subdued and thoughtful tone. “Look, I’ve…I’ve been giving this some thought but now that it’s a definite thing between us, or near enough anyway, I think I should probably start planning to hand the cowl over to Dick and take a less physical role in the team.”

“Really?” She said, blinking in surprise.

“Yes, really,” he nodded solemnly. “Before the ‘dip in the Fountain of Youth’ as you called it, I was looking at a double knee replacement and surgery on my rotator cuff so I was probably going to have to hand it off anyway. When I got back the ten years that changed and Dick wasn’t very happy about it but Damian was gone and I had nothing else but the Bat to keep me going so I kept the cowl. Now though,” he took her hand in his own and squeezed, “I don’t want to throw that time away when I could be spending it with you. If you want kids then we’ll have kids,” as she opened her mouth he cut her off, “and I will be a willing parent to them. I might need help and I can’t promise I won’t screw it up, but I’ll do it as long as it’s with you.”

“What about adoption?” She asked him.

“Obviously I’m good with that,” he told her dryly. “But if you’re asking if I’m hung up on the idea of having a biological child or an infant the answer is no. If you want to adopt I’m fine with it. Do you want to adopt?”

“Maybe,” Felicity told him. “I could see adopting a child. I was adopted and you kind of were so, yeah. Still, if we do eventually decide to have any biological children we need to have a genetic screening done.”

“Because of the Lazarus Pits?” He asked her. “Like I told you, I already had all that done and I’m fine but if you’re worried about it…”

“No, it’s for me actually,” she told him. “I don’t know much about my genetic history, so…”

“Okay,” he nodded. “We’ll get tested together and if there’s a problem we’ll just adopt. If we’re both healthy and there are no problems then we can still adopt; whatever you want to do is fine by me.”

“And you’re sure about that? You’d be happy doing all of it?” She asked him. “Not just kids but giving up the Bat?”

He gave a noncommittal grimace, “It’s not a matter of my happiness as much as it is a fact of life. I’m not a metahuman; I’m a normal man. All the skills I have come from training and effort. My experience in the Pit gave me back a lot of my stamina and fixed several issues that I had been putting off surgery for, but this life is hard on a person physically. In a lot of ways the Pit gave me a second chance and I would like to retire before I’m forced to. I don’t want to find myself in a wheelchair again; this time permanently.” He looked away and appeared to gather his thoughts, “Okay.”

“Okay what?” She asked.

“Okay to kids,” he said although there was still a bit of tension in his voice. “Okay to retiring; all of it, but not in five years. I don’t want to wait that long. If we do this then I want to ramp up the timeline. I know you want to take it slow for Lucius but…look, let’s just do it. I’ll talk to Lucius, try to convince him to see it our way, and then we’ll get married. If you’re serious about kids then I’d like not to have to wait on that either. I agree we should give ourselves time to settle into being married but I don’t want to put it off longer than a year, two tops, before we start trying. I’d rather be fifty-nine than sixty-four when our kid gets his or her diploma, so even though I’m still probably going to be the oldest dad at kindergarten, if we can shave at least a few years off then I’m down.”

“Bruce, I’m not going to force you to have children if you don’t want them,” she told him plainly.

“I want them,” he told her as he leaned forward to catch her lips in a brief kiss. He leaned his forehead against hers, “I want this. Like I said, I can’t promise I won’t make mistakes but if anyone is going to be fathering your children it had better be me. Who knows; if we start trying on our honeymoon maybe our kid will be in kindergarten before I get my AARP membership card,” he said drolly.

“Oh,” she said, sitting back suddenly.

“What?” He asked with a frown before realization dawned in his expression. “We didn’t use a condom. Damn it,” he swore. “I swear, I have never in my life been this careless. I devolve into an irresponsible teenager around you for some reason! What the hell is wrong with me all of the sudden?” He reached over into the nightstand and grimaced as he looked inside. “It doesn’t matter because apparently, even if I had been thinking with the right head last night, we didn’t have any condoms.”

“No condoms in the bachelor pad?” She smirked, momentarily distracted. “That’s both surprising and disappointing. I just figured that since you make a point of keeping the bed ready for action, you’d have the maid service replenish those as well.”

“It’s not really a bachelor pad,” he told her, still sounding disgusted with himself. “Plus, it’s been a while for me so I haven’t bought them in a very long time.” he looked up at her with a tinge of embarrassment.

“Really?” Felicity asked in surprise. “How long? Not since we…?”

“No,” he sighed. “I wish I could tell you that there hasn’t been anyone else since you and I were together but I can’t. I didn’t exactly go out and find someone right away but I wasn’t celibate. Mostly one night stands but I did date a few people. My last ‘relationship’ was about ten months ago, give or take. I had a brief romance with a journalist named Charlotte Rivers. It wasn’t even a ‘romance’. Charlotte was,” he curled his lips into a rueful grimace, “expedient with her affairs; she wasn’t exactly a cuddly type of girl. She was more of an ‘I’ve got fifteen minutes so take off your pants’ kind of girl, but I wasn’t in the right headspace for more than that and it scratched an itch. She took a job in Paris and that was that,” he told her then exhaled roughly. “Is there a chance that you might be…”

“No,” she said quickly. “I had a depo shot; remember? Although, yeah, now that you mention it we weren’t exactly playing by the modern rules of safe sex so…”

“So there’s a chance that you’re…?” He let his voice trail off.

“There’s always a slight chance,” she told him ruefully, “but between the shot and the multiple doses of Plan B I’ve had to spend a fortune on lately I think it’s highly unlikely.”

“If you do get pregnant then all bets are off,” he said seriously. “No dating, no waiting, we get married, period. Right away and no more delays even if that means pissing off your family.”

“Are you sure you’re not trying to knock me up just to get out of dating?” Felicity asked him half-seriously because, he had a point, this was getting a bit ridiculous. Hell, she used to stuff rubbers in Oliver’s suit on the sly when he was dating Sara and Laurel and yet she was still stuck shelling out $49.99 plus tax every time she opened her legs. Thank God she’d been smart enough to get the shot;
if she had kept this up for much longer she’d either be pregnant or broke.

“Don’t even joke about that.” He shot her a withering look, “Listen, I may be a pretty modern guy in most areas but I’m telling you right now if and when we do have kids, we’re getting married before they’re born. That’s not something I’m willing to compromise on.”

“I’m not arguing with you, but why?” Felicity asked him. “I mean, I never thought you were all that religious so…?”

“I’m not,” he told her. “I’m not an atheist but I’m not a bible thumper either. I just believe that if a man decides to have children with a woman then he should at least prove and protect that commitment by marrying her. I’m a grown up, not some kid who thinks getting a woman pregnant is something you can walk away from. I take responsibility for my actions. It’s a question of honor and respect to me and I know your father wouldn’t be happy if I started making babies with his daughter without taking accountability for that and stepping up to the plate like a real man.”

“You know, it’s times like these when I’m reminded of just how old you really are,” she mused.
He eyed her cuttingly, obviously unamused by her wisecrack, “Look, there’s nothing wrong with being a single mother raising children alone. I’m not making sweeping moral judgments or casting aspersions on your mother for having you out of wedlock but, if you and I have a baby, I want to be married to you. I’m sorry, but that’s just the way it is,” he told her. “Family is one thing I don’t mess around with. My children will have my name and I want to be married to their mother when that happens.”

“That’s…reasonable,” she conceded. “Okay, if I do get pregnant; and I have absolutely no intentions of doing so, we’ll go to the closest all night wedding chapel and Elvis can make our little Chrysanthemum or Churchill legitimate. Happy?”

“Betsy or Thomas,” he reminded her.

“Betsy or Thomas,” she agreed. “Unless it’s twins and then Churchill and Chrysanthemum are back on the table because that is just too big of a coincidence to ignore.”

“No,” he told her with a note of finality.

“You came up with the names,” she reminded him.

He crossed his arms stubbornly and glowered at her.

“For a guy who was so opposed to marriage and kids not too long ago you’ve really gotten ridiculous with this stuff, you know that? No sense of humor whatsoever; I’m seriously wondering if you haven’t been taken over by bodysnatchers,” she said with a smirk. “Fine; Chrys and Church are off the table.”

His features softened in contemplation, “Chrys and Church don’t sound that bad, I suppose. On second thought…”

“I’m going to punch you in the face if you keep it up,” she told him flatly.

“Okay, subject closed,” he told her with a small upturn of his lips to let her know he was having her on. “So what was the ‘Oh’ about then?”

“I just remembered I have a date with Jake this Friday,” she told him.
“No, you don’t,” he told her firmly.

“He’s leaving in a couple of weeks anyway—”

“No,” he told her again, this time with a tinge of anger in his voice.

“So the whole ‘exclusive’ thing starts now?” She asked dryly.

“The exclusive thing started the minute you returned to Gotham,” he told her. “He’s lucky he even got the one lunch date as far as I’m concerned and he’s even luckier he just got a hamburger out of the deal. More than that and I would have opened an office in Antarctica just so I could transfer him to it.”

“I guess I’ll have to call him then,” she sighed.

“Do that, and don’t bother letting him down easy,” he told her. “If you don’t think you can manage it, I’ll place a call and have someone from the planning division start buying up real estate around the polar icecaps.”

“Stop it; he’s a really nice guy,” she told him.

“I don’t care,” he shot back. “He’s sniffing around my woman and I’m not okay with that.”

“‘Your woman’, huh?” She snorted. “I’ve only been ‘your woman’ for a few hours and you’re already getting territorial?”

He reached out and pulled her across his lap, dipping her low and causing her to squeak in surprise, before capturing her lips in a Hollywood style kiss. When they came up for air he gave her a triumphant grin, “You’ve always been mine, Baby; or do you still need convincing?”

“I got it, thanks,” she said breathlessly as he tugged her upright and sat her back down again. She smoothed her hands over her stomach and caught her breath. “Okay, so I guess I’m calling Jake then.”

“I guess you are,” he said with an arrogant upturn of his lips.

“So when are you planning on breaking the news to my dad?” She asked and watched as his arrogance immediately deflated.

He rubbed his hand over his mouth and gave her an uncertain look, “I suppose I had better get this over with sooner rather than later, huh?”

“I’ll call Jake tomorrow if you’ll come to my dad’s place for dinner on Tuesday,” she told him. “I know you guys have board meetings on Mondays so that’ll give you a couple of days to prepare, make out a will, whatever.”

“Funny,” He said unenthusiastically. “Fine; dinner on Tuesday with the future father-in-law for meatloaf and interrogation.”

“Peggy won’t make Dad meatloaf anymore unless it’s got tofu in it. It’ll probably be roast chicken or fish. Oh, that reminds me, don’t forget about Peggy Ann,” she told him. “She’s going to have more questions than Dad and a big one is going to be whether or not you intend to convert.”

“I didn’t think you and Lucius were all that religious,” he said with a frown.

“We’re not, and neither is Peggy Ann really, but it’s still a thing with her,” Felicity shrugged.
“How do you feel about it?” Bruce asked cautiously.

“I say we tell them that if we have children we’ll just be a multi-cultural family and raise our kids in the traditions of both families then leave it as is. You have to admit, if anyone can understand that one it’s my family,” she told him.

“What about christening?” He asked.

“Is that important to you?” She asked with a raised eyebrow.

“Kind of,” he said reluctantly. “Not for religious reasons though; more for the sake of tradition. The Wayne Family has always had christenings at First Episcopal; we even have a plaque on the baptismal font.”

“Did any of your other kids get christened?”

“They were all teenagers or near enough when I adopted them,” he said dryly. “Christening is something you only do with babies. I’m pretty sure Dick was christened because his family was Romani and Catholic, Tim’s family has been a fixture in Gotham for almost as long as the Wayne’s and the Kane’s so he was probably christened at St. Luke’s or Gotham Cathedral, and I have no idea if Jason or Cassie were but I doubt it.”

“Okay, fair enough.” She looked at him quizzically, “Just out of curiosity, when was the last time you actually went to church? And, before you answer that, funerals and weddings don’t count.”

Bruce pulled a face, “It’s been a while.”

“How many decades is ‘a while’?” She asked him.

“A little over three,” he admitted.

“I don’t think this is going to be an issue,” she said dryly. “Look, if you want to have our unborn theoretical children christened in a church that you don’t actually attend, then that’s fine by me. That said however, I don’t intend to take up religion. If you want to go, fine; I’ll show up for the big things and help decorate the tree, but I consider myself an agnostic at best. I get tradition though; it’s why I still celebrate Hanukah even if I don’t necessarily buy into the rest of it. Frankly, if I was so concerned with that kind of stuff I wouldn’t be discussing this with a turtleneck versus crew neck kind of guy.”

“A what?” He looked at her in confusion until she stared pointedly at his lap, “Ah, right; turtleneck. Understood; yet another reason why I’m not enthusiastic about the prospect of converting to Judaism.” He took a deep breath, “Okay, marriage, mission, kids, religion; I think that’s everything, the big stuff anyway. When should we start this whole dating thing?”

“I don’t know; whenever you want to, I guess.” She got up from the bed and reached for her purse, “We could call brunch ‘Official Date Number Two’,” she suggested.

“I meant officially so the papers can report that Bruce Wayne is off the market,” he told her.

“Off the market?” She repeated, “And again with the creepy third person; what is it with you guys?” She muttered. “I don’t know; just pick something and let me know if I have to wear an evening gown.”

“The Charity Gala at the Wayne Foundation?” He asked as he got up to follow her out. “Everyone in Gotham society and all the papers will be there so it’s perfect.”
She flinched and turned to him slowly, a pained expression on her face, “Yeah, um, I kind of already have plans.”

“What do you mean?” He asked, his good humor quickly fading.

“I was sort of already going with someone,” she told him reluctantly.

“You know, I was kidding earlier but if you tell me you intend to go to the fundraiser with Jake after all this, then I’m really going to start to get pissed,” he told her.

“It’s not with Jake; it’s with someone else,” she said vaguely.

He scowled, “How many men have you met since coming back to Gotham?”

“It’s not with a man,” she said rolling her eyes.

“Is it your friend, Sara? Can’t Luke take her if they’re together?”

“It’s not Sara,” she said.

“I see. You, um, hit on that earlier but I wasn’t… I didn’t think you were…” He cleared his throat and looked at her uncertainly, “Listen Baby, while I realize that the idea of watching two women together or having multiple partners simultaneously is a common fantasy among men, that sort of thing has never really interested me. I’ve had plenty of opportunities to indulge in threesomes in the past and, while I don’t have a problem with what other people do behind closed doors, I don’t like sharing and I certainly don’t like an audience. I’m a one woman at a time kind of guy and, whether it’s with a man or a woman, I’m not really okay with you seeing someone else if we’re going to move forward with this relationship.”

“I’m not--!” She shot him a dirty look, “You can be a real ass, you know that?” She scowled. “It’s not a date-date and, even if it were, what makes you think you’d be invited along as an active participant?”

“If you’re having sex with anybody I’m at least going to be in the same room,” he told her.

“I hate you so much right now,” she told him. “And, by the way, are you sure Tim isn’t your biological son? Because between the physical resemblance and the way your minds just automatically seem to go there, I’m starting to wonder if you and Janet Drake were more than just next door neighbors.”

He quirked his lips wryly and tilted his head noncommittally.

“Seriously?” She blinked, her jaw dropping in surprise.

“Let’s just say that Jack was often away for business and Janet was both a very friendly neighbor and a lovely hostess,” he told her.

“I can’t decide if you’re kidding right now and that’s scaring me,” she said slowly.

“Who exactly is this person you’re taking to the Gala?” He asked her, evading the question.

“It’s…my supervisor from my new job,” she said cagily.

“The job for which you have yet to share any details about,” he stated.

“That would be the one,” she said pursing her lips.
“Don’t you think now would be a good time to start?” He asked her.

“Do I have to?” She asked him hopefully.

“I think if we’re going to be officially dating that people might wonder how it is that I don’t know where my girlfriend works,” he told her.

“I thought you didn’t like using terms like ‘girlfriend’ and ‘boyfriend’?” She pointed out.

“I wanted to use the term fiancée but someone insisted we ‘date’ first,” he shot her a look of annoyance, “Just tell me already; I promise I won’t try to interfere with your career.”

“It’s, um, called the Orbital Organization,” she told him using the cover Sara had provided the night before.

He frowned, “The Orbital Organization? What is that; a new software start-up?”

“Sort of,” she said quickly. “Hey listen, it’s getting late and if we don’t leave soon it’s going to be lunch time and you know how much I like brunch—”

“Felicity,” he said warningly.

“Fine,” she told him with an uncaring shrug. “It’s a charity, okay?”

He looked at her impassively, “A charity that can pay the numbers you told me the other day?”

“I may have exaggerated the numbers a bit,” she lied.

He crossed his arms and glowered at her as though he were dressed in head to toe black armor instead of a very expensive hand-knit sweater and jeans, “Is this a charity or is it a ‘charity’?” He asked her.

She squeezed her eyes shut, “Is there a difference?”

“You’re working for a vigilante op?” He said accusingly in the voice of the Bat. “Who’s running it and how did they recruit you?”

“I don’t suppose we could table this discussion until after we eat?” She asked hopelessly.

“Talk!” He growled.

“You’re not going to like it,” she told him.

“That’s a given,” he bit out. “Is it Stellmoor? Tell me you aren’t running your own op and engaging Isabel Rochev. Tell me you aren’t being that stupid!”

Now he was pissing her off. ‘Stupid’ in any of its forms was a trigger for her Loud Voice to come out to play. “It isn’t stupid! It makes perfect sense!”

“So it is Stellmoor?” Bruce said in a Loud Voice of his own, his face darkening in anger. “You are going to drop this immediately, do you hear me? This ends now!”

“Excuse me?” She said, dropping her purse and narrowing her eyes at him. She stepped forward, not the least bit intimidated by the growing shadow of the Bat, her voice falling to an icy registry, “You just listen up and you listen good, I may be in love with you Bruce, but you do not get to tell me what to do; not now and not ever. That’s not how this works, so you had better get used to that right now. If you want someone who obeys you then get a dog because if you think that I will ever allow you to push me around then you have another thing coming.”

“I’m trying to keep you safe,” he bit out.

“Well, you can’t,” she told him.

“The hell I can’t!” He exploded.

“No, you can’t!” She shot back, “And if you would just shut the hell up and stop posturing like some kind of chauvinistic macho schmuck and actually listen to me then you’d understand what it is I’m doing and why!”

“So talk!” He ordered as he loomed above her, his arms crossed in front of his puffed out chest.

“Stellmoor is a front for a worldwide vigilante group of mostly female operators. The set up is… impressive doesn’t even begin to cover it,” she shook her head in emphasis. “It blows anything I’ve ever seen out of the water. We’re talking independent satellite access, free access to international military and law enforcement servers, fully equipped bases of operation all over the globe with advanced training facilities, medical, Cyber-ops control rooms with top of the line tech, the works. They fund themselves through a series of shell corps, legitimate businesses, and independent contracts; the funds from which they can launder themselves and not have to go through an intermediary. These people have obviously studied every kind of group from military to shadow op to vigilante setup, weeded out the weaknesses of each, and it’s left them with a system that makes the Batcave and ARGUS look like something you’d find digging around a box of Cracker Jacks,” she let that sink in for a minute as she looked him in the eye. “Their security is equally impressive; twelve man sniper teams plus perimeter guards working in rotating shifts, top of the line infra-red range finders and sniper rifles, laser netting and sensors, shielded equipment, and more tech than you can shake a stick at. In a word; it’s a vigilante tech nerd’s wet dream.”

“And how do you know all this?” He asked, his voice still tinged with anger but his eyes sharp as he listened intently.

“I was inside; they gave me the nickel tour.”

He stepped forward until he was in her space, “You went inside there without a backup?” He said menacingly. “When?”

“Last week,” she told him, not giving an inch. “And before you pop your cork, I knew it was risky as hell when I did it but I didn’t have any other choice.”

“That’s bullshit!” He exploded. “You should have told me and--!”

“And what? Let you bench me so you could strong-arm your way inside and go all Bat on them?” She shot back.

“Yes!” He told her.

“Why?”

“Because you aren’t---!” He grimaced and turned his back on her as he wiped his hand over his mouth. He seemed to take a moment to get his thoughts in order before he faced her again, “You’re not a field operator, Felicity; you’re a tech. You belong in front of a monitor, not mixing it up with unknown enemy combatants!”
“I’m not an operator?” She repeated coolly.

“No, you aren’t,” he told her with equal iciness.

She nodded, “Okay,” she said as she picked up her purse and headed for the door.

“Fine,” Bruce said with a frown as he followed her out. “Let’s go eat.”

She stopped and turned to him slowly, “No, no I think you’ll go eat; I have other plans.”

“And what plans are those?” He asked, his brows drawing together as his temper began to build once more.

“Mine,” she told him.

“You’re not doing this,” Bruce told her quietly.

“Doing what?” She asked, her face devoid of emotion.

He pointed back to the bed they had shared just a short while ago, the covers still rumpled from sleep and passion, “I told you I loved you; I told you I wanted to marry you and have a life together! You are not going to run off in a snit and throw all of that away just because you’re pissed that I’m trying to keep you safe!”

She took a step toward him, her eyes sharp and cold, “It’s not about how much you love me, Bruce, and it’s not about keeping me safe.”

“Then what is it about then?” He asked angrily.

“Respect,” she told him.

“What the hell does respect have to do with anything? How is me trying to protect you from getting yourself killed the same as disrespecting you?” He demanded forcefully.

“Who do you see when you look at me, Bruce?” She asked him.

“What?” He narrowed his eyes at her.

“Who do you see?” She asked him again.

“Who do you see?” She asked him again.

“You,” he scowled. “Who the hell else would I be looking at?”

She shook her head, “No, you don’t. You see ‘Baby’; you see the girl I used to be, but you don’t see me.” She advanced another step until they were nearly toe to toe, “The girl you knew has been gone a long time; she died in a basement along with five hundred and three other people over three and a half years ago.”

“What are you talking about?” He asked, searching her face. “The Glades terrorist attack? What does that have to do with anything?”

“Five hundred and three people died that day because of me,” she said with quiet anger. “I did that; every life lost that day is on me.”

“Malcolm Merlyn killed those people,” he said, his voice going from anger to confused concern. “It wasn’t your fault.”
She shook her head, “It was my fault and do you know why? Because I was so busy running away from the life I’d left behind, so busy hiding in plain sight, that instead of telling my team who I was and what I was capable of doing, I allowed Oliver to talk me out of leaving the Foundry and disabling the earthquake device like I had planned. Instead of doing what I should of done, I let him lead; I let him tell me to stay put and ‘be safe’. I knew it was a bad call, I knew it the minute he told me to stay it was a mistake and that I should have done it anyway, but I caved; I worked against my instincts. I wasted precious time recruiting Quentin Lance to go after the device in my place. I had to slow talk him through deactivating it when I could have done it in less than half the time. By the time he was done, the second device activated and those people died.” She tapped her chest twice, “I did that; that was on me, and Oliver still to this day thinks it was the right call because he doesn’t know any better. Even now, even though he knows who I am and what I did before I joined the team, he thinks it was better to save my life than the lives of five hundred and three other people including a man he thought of as a brother.”

“And, for once, he’s right,” Bruce said quietly, his hands coming up to rub her arms gently as he looked down at her. “I understand what you’re feeling—”

“Do you?” She asked.

He squeezed her arms, “Yes,” he told her firmly.

She shook her head again, “You’re wrong.”

“I understand survivor’s guilt, Felicity; probably more than anyone else on the planet,” he told her as he fixed her with his penetrating gaze. “The adult me understands that I was only eight years old and that there was nothing I could do to save my parents that night in the alley, but that guilt and anger is what created the Bat.” He pulled her closer to him, his head dipping close to he could look her directly in the eye, “You don’t have anything to prove; you didn’t do anything wrong.”

“It’s not survivor’s guilt, Bruce,” she told him. “This is about me learning a hard lesson; it’s about me learning to stand on my own two feet and doing what needs to be done.” She pulled away from him, her eyes searching his face, “I let someone convince me to go against my better judgment because I had no faith in myself and, as a result, there are now children out there without parents, husbands without wives, and families who are now devastated. I don’t feel guilty, Bruce; it’s not about guilt. It’s about moving forward and not needing anyone to save me because I am fully capable of doing that for myself. It’s about trusting my instincts and following through.”

“It’s about you thinking that you have to prove yourself or make up for something that wasn’t your fault!” He said insistently. “Listen to me; you aren’t responsible for that. Malcolm Merlyn killed those people; not you. You’re not a killer.”

She smiled; a small ironic smile that failed to reach her eyes, “Sara told me something her sister shared with her a few years back. It was something Helena Bertinelli told her and, given the subject matter, I’m pretty sure she knew what she was talking about. She said that once you let the darkness in, it consumes you.”

“Meaning?” He asked.

“Meaning that even if I’m not responsible for the deaths of the first five hundred and three people on my list, I’m still, by your definition, a killer. I’ve taken lives, Bruce; more than once.”

“What are you talking about?” He asked, his face darkening with anger.
She ignored the question, “This isn’t about you or Oliver; it’s about me. Not only did they know Oliver’s setup but they knew yours; your cover, your ops, everything. They’d known it for years.”

“They said that?” He asked in the low timbre of the Bat.

She nodded, “They even said they tried sending out feelers to you but that you have a habit of driving out anyone you feel is intruding on your territory.”

“That never happened,” he told her. “No one from Stellmoor has ever approached me!”

“How would you know, Bruce?” She asked him. “You shut everyone out, push everyone away, and for what? What has all that negativity and isolation done for you?” She looked on him sadly, “They weren’t trying to get to you or Oliver; this was all about me.”

“If that’s true then the last thing you need to do is walk right into their hands!” He insisted. “You’re a goddamn genius, Felicity; why can’t you see what’s right in front of your face?”

“What I see is, whether I’m being singled out as a potential asset or as a target, either way; I’m the only person who can find out what’s really going on.”

He reacted strongly to that, “Wrong! My team--!”

“Couldn’t get inside that facility with a tank and a full battalion of masks behind you, whereas I can walk through the front door,” she told him coldly. “Either you respect my abilities and my intelligence enough to know that what I’m doing is the right call or you don’t. If you don’t then this conversation is over.”

“And if I say that I think you’re wrong?” He threw back.

“Then we have nothing more to say to one another,” she told him, her eyes flashing dangerously.
“I’m doing this.”

“And whether you like it or not, I’m not letting you get yourself killed!” He said loudly, his frustration reaching a fiery peak. “You can try to kick me out of your life all you want but I’m not letting you go in there again!”

“And I’m not asking for your permission and the only person kicking you out of my life is yourself,” she told him. “I’m going to work for Stellmoor so you can either get behind me or get out of the way.
Goodbye Bruce,” she said before turning on her heel and heading out.

“You aren’t doing this,” he called out after her.

“Watch me,” she said before shutting the door behind her.
Chapter Thirty-Three

Felicity rang Tam’s doorbell, her defiance giving way to depression the second she hit the sidewalk in front of the Wayne Foundation Building after leaving Bruce. From there it was a brief taxi ride to Tam’s condo filled with doubt and self-recrimination.

Tim opened the door suddenly and looked at her in surprise, “Hey.”

“Hey, Tam in?”

“She ran out to brunch with some of her friends,” he told her.

“Oh,” Felicity said morosely. “Okay then…” she started to leave.

“Where are you going?” Tim asked with a frown.

Felicity gestured towards the elevator, “You said Tam was…”

“So what am I, chopped liver?” He asked in a hurt tone.

“No, but--”

“Get in here,” he told her, holding the door open.

“You sure?” Felicity asked uncertainly.

“Yeah,” Tim snorted. “I was just making a sandwich; want one?” He said, walking away from the open door obviously intending her to follow.

She bit her lip and walked inside, shutting the door behind her. She looked around curiously. It had been a few years since she’d been inside Tam’s condo and her sister redecorated like some people changed their shoes. The last time she’d been home was three years ago following the Glades disaster when Oliver had taken his five month long ‘tropical vacation’. She’d given herself all of two weeks to rest and regroup before going back to Starling to rebuild. A lot had changed since then, both in the apartment and in her. Since the last thing she wanted to do was indulge in yet another round of self-torment however, she decided to concentrate on looking around the condo instead.
The last time she’d visited, Tam had been into Moroccan design; lots of orange and deep reds, rich colors that reminded you of exotic spice markets and heat. It had been cozy and comfortable with throw rugs and pillows everywhere, and low to the floor furnishings with punched tin lamps and star shaped black metal chandeliers. This time however, she had gone more modern contemporary.

Although her condo was a one bedroom it was still fairly large by Gotham standards and she lived in a very nice building in the Upper West Side just a hop, skip, and a jump from their father. Since Wayne Enterprises got its start in real estate and owned a huge chunk of the Gotham skyline (including the building they now occupied), she was able to secure an apartment close to the top floor. The large banks of windows in her living room looked out over the Gotham skyline and were framed by a white set of floor to ceiling vertical blinds which were currently open to let in the mid-morning sun. She had traded in the burnt orange from three years ago for deep aqua, lime green, and brilliant white walls. She’d replaced the low to the ground Moroccan style seating with a large white leather sectional with clean, blocky lines and tons of throw pillows in varying patterns of stripes, dots, solids, paisley, and exaggerated hound’s-tooth, all in coordinating shades of black, white, aqua, and lime green.

The rest of the furniture followed the same theme: modern aluminum floor lamps, funky shaped armless chairs, sleek dark wood tables, and deep shag cream and lime colored throw rugs. She had some art on the walls, mostly modern and abstract, but a few photos as well and all in oversized boxy black frames with wide white on white matting. All in all it was colorful, cozy, yet clean and modern: in a word, it was very Tam.

She followed Tim into the kitchen which, since the apartment was an open floor plan, basically meant that one second you were in the living room and the next you were in the kitchen with no real dividing line between the two. The same pale bamboo flooring in the living room continued unbroken into the kitchen which was done in a galley layout with a wall of cabinets alongside the far wall in sleek, shiny gloss white with blocky square drawer pulls and knobs, and a bright lime green backsplash that helped keep the flow of the house consistent. There was another free standing ‘wall’ of cabinets in front of the windows to add storage but it was open, on movable casters to make space for dinner parties, and didn’t really obstruct the view that much at all. The appliances were all brushed aluminum and, instead of an island or a bar, they had a freeform thick glass and chrome table with four chairs covered in white muslin fabric. Felicity glanced at the front of the large French door refrigerator that was wide open as Tim gathered up an armload of deli meats, cheeses, veggies, and condiments to spread along the counter. All over the front were dozens of photos, mostly of Tam and Tim, held in place by colorful button like magnets in the same aqua, lime green, and cream. They looked so happy and carefree it nearly brought her to her knees with longing.

“You two look so happy,” she said out loud as she walked up to get a better look. She ran her finger down a strip of photos of them laughing and kissing. “Did you take this in one of those booths like at the carnival?”

He looked over to the fridge and nodded, “Oh yeah, we went down to the Boardwalk last time she came to visit me in Bludhaven and must have taken a hundred of those things.” He shot her a naughty grin, “That was the only one we could risk putting on the fridge though. We’re lucky I had plenty of quarters and that it was the kind with a door instead of a curtain otherwise we might have gotten arrested.” He picked up a knife and gestured towards the sandwich fixings, “What do you want? I have Virginia baked ham, turkey, roast beef, salami, and bologna and then we’ve got Swiss, American, smoked Gouda, and provolone, plus the usual.” He said indicating the various jars of pickles, mayo, and brown mustard, plus lettuce and tomato.

“I’ll just have what you’re having,” she told him, not really interested in food at the moment but accepting it anyway.
“Okay, you asked for it,” he told her. “There’s soda and water in the fridge; help yourself.”

She went over to the fridge and pulled out a large bottle of Smart Water and offered one silently to Tim who nodded. She sat down at the glass table and opened her water as she watched him prepare their sandwiches. “Why didn’t you go with Tam to brunch?”

“She’s hanging with her friends,” he told her.

“Yeah,” Felicity said slowly. “And?”

He looked at her pointedly, “Have you met her friends?”

“You have a valid point,” Felicity said dryly.

“Why aren’t you at brunch?” Tim asked her as he sliced a tomato. “I figured you would have gone with Tam. Didn’t she invite you along?”

“Why would she?” Felicity asked, taking a sip from her water bottle.

He shrugged as he spread the mayo on the pumpernickel, “I don’t know; she said they were friends of you guys from prep. I think she said their names were Aubrey and Paisley something or other?”

“Yeah,” she said knowing exactly who he was referring to, “They weren’t my friends. Actually they aren’t really Tam’s ‘friends’, they’re more like ‘frenemies’ and Tam knows better than to invite me along to the bitchy version of the Ladies Who Brunch Hunger Games.”

“The what?” Tim snorted.

“Have you ever seen a member of the Gotham debutante society set eat?” She asked him.

He paused and frowned, “No.”

“Exactly,” she told him. “If I’m going to shell out $75 for a Sunday brunch prix fixe I’m going to eat and it would probably cause a riot or something so, no; no brunch for me.”

He put down the knife and shot her an incredulous look, “Then why go there?” He asked, honestly perplexed.

“Where did she say they were going?” She asked him.

“Uh, some place in the Village called The Laundry.”

“Yeah, you’re right, $75 was too low; try $140 bucks.”

He blinked at her, “Per person? For brunch?” He asked.

“Yup.”

“Brunch,” he repeated. “Basically a late breakfast with booze.”

“Uh huh,” she said taking another sip of water.

He shook his head, “Is the food good at least?” He asked.

“Did you miss the part where I said no one actually eats?” She asked slowly.

“Then why go there?” He asked, honestly perplexed.
“Obviously it’s so the right people can see you not eat brunch,” she told him blithely.

He blinked, “Women confuse the shit out of me,” he muttered turning back to the sandwiches and grabbing a couple of plates from the cabinet then brought them over to the table.

Felicity eyed her towering sandwich warily, “Um, what’s on it?”

“Everything,” he said, picking up half of his Dagwood Special and stuffing it into his mouth. “Now this is what I call brunch,” he garbled around a mouthful of food.

“Looks good,” Felicity said, picking at the top of her bread without eating.

“What’s wrong with you?” He asked around mouthfuls of sandwich.

“What do you think?” She asked morosely, popping a pickle slice in her mouth and crunching it loudly.

“What did Bruce do this time?” He asked with a sigh as he put down his sandwich, wiped his mouth with a paper napkin, and folded his arms on the top of the table.

“You don’t want to hear it,” she said, picking at her crust with her fingernails.

He rolled his eyes at her, “Just tell me. As long as you keep the naked details to a minimum I’m cool. What did Bruce do?”

“Lots of stuff,” she said with a pout.

“Give me the highlights,” he told her as he picked up his sandwich and began chewing again.

“Are you sure?” She asked again.

“Shoot,” he said, his mouth full.

“Okay, well, for one thing he asked me to marry him,” She said with a sigh as she continued to stare down at her sandwich sadly. “And to make matters worse he offered to retire the cowl so we could have kids; kids! He even named them, can you believe it? Betsy and Thomas…I’m still not sure about the whole ‘Betsy’ thing but…” she looked up as she heard the sound of half of the contents of Tim’s sandwich slide out from between the slices of bread and fall onto his plate with a mayonnaise lubricated plop. “Are you okay?”

“Uh…” He put down his sandwich and blinked. “I think so. Maybe.” He gestured towards her in confusion, “Did you just say that Bruce asked you to marry him and named your kids; as in kids that are both his and yours together?”

“That’s crazy, isn’t it?” She asked, wrinkling her nose.

“No, no, not at all,” Tim said shaking his head and speaking in a higher than normal pitch. “Um, by the way, on a totally unrelated subject; Bruce wasn’t bleeding from a recent blow to the head or anything, was he?”

Felicity sighed, “Yeah, no. No head wound.”

“That’s good,” Tim nodded. “Okay, wow; guess that’s good news then, huh? So what’s the problem?”

“What’s the problem?” Felicity repeated slowly. “I don’t know, Tim; what do you think the problem could be?"

“I don’t know,” he answered with honest confusion. “He asked you to marry him, named your imaginary kids; don’t all chicks dig that kind of romantic stuff? As far as I know that’s the kind of ‘happily ever after’ you girls dream of.”

“First off, hanging around with a group of confirmed bachelors has truly warped your sense of what women want. So no FYI; no, it’s not the kind of romantic stuff ‘us girls’ dream of,” she said giving him a nasty look. “Chicks don’t ‘dig it’ when a guy basically tells you that you have no choice but to marry them right before they order you to obey them. While I have no doubt that Bruce thinks he loves me, the fact is that he doesn’t respect me and what happened this morning proved it,” she said with an indignant huff.

“Well, I’m going to have to call bullshit on that one,” he snorted.

“Tim, he doesn’t trust me and he won’t accept the fact that I’m not the same person I was four years ago! He refuses to listen to anything I say and thinks he can just steamroll over me and force me to do whatever he tells me to!”

“Again; that’s crap,” he told her point blank. “You’re probably the only person other than Alfred that he does trust. He asked you to marry him; he named your kids.” He said in amazement. “Yeah, he’s an ass, but how does that translate to him not respecting you?”

“When I told him I had been running my own op with Stellmoor he refused to listen to me! I tried to tell him that—”

“Back up,” he told him, all good humor leaving his expression. “Repeat that last part again and go really slow with it this time.”

“I decided to go into Stellmoor’s op and check things out for myself,” she told him.

“When?” He asked harshly.

“Last week.”

“This is that Orbital Organization thing you and Sara were talking about last night,” he said, not waiting for her to confirm it. “Son of a—I knew the minute you said ‘charity’ that something was up. Does Luke know?”

“Are you kidding?” She said with a note of derision. “He’s worse than Bruce, believe it or not.”

“And Sara; she’s running this with you?” He asked.

“Obviously,” she told him. “Who else would I go to? She’s already on the inside and I trust her.”

His jaw clenched and he ran his hand over his mouth in agitation, “No.”

“No?” She asked, taken aback by his tone.

“No,” he said firmly. “You’re not doing this.”

“I’m not doing this?” She repeated.

“No, you aren’t. You aren’t going anywhere near that place again, understood?” He said harshly. Felicity blinked at him, “What’s your blood type, Tim?”
“What?” He scowled in confusion.

“Your blood type?” She repeated.

“A positive, why?” He asked her dubiously.

“Bruce is AB positive,” she muttered under her breath. “Do you know your parents’ blood types? Your mom wasn’t O positive, was she?”

“Bruce isn’t my biological dad,” he told her flatly.

“Are you sure? Because it’s your face but his words keep coming out of it,” she said sarcastically.

“Maybe that’s because he’s right,” he tossed back then winced, “Crap, I hate that I just said that out loud.”

“I’m the target, Tim. Stellmoor came to me for a reason,” she told him.

“Exactly, which means you need to stay as far away from them as possible,” he told her. “And you definitely shouldn’t be running ops all by yourself with no back up!”

“I have back up,” she told him.

“Sara?” He said in derision.

“Yeah, Sara,” Felicity scowled. “You have a problem with that?”

“A problem with you going on an op with only a former member of the League as backup who happens to already work for the people you’re trying to investigate? Why would I?” He asked her acerbically.

“I trust Sara,” she told him angrily.

He glared at her, “Fine, you trust her; that’s good enough for me.”

“So glad you approve,” she snapped back.

“So, was she the one backing you up when you went in last week? Because, as far as I know, she only got into town yesterday.”

Now it was her turn to cringe. She shifted uncomfortably in her chair, “Okay, so…maybe I shouldn’t have jumped the gun and gone in without back up the first time.”

“You think?” He asked facetiously.

She narrowed her eyes at him, “The point is nothing happened, and if we’re going to figure out what’s going on then I need to go in and see what’s happening for myself.”

“No, no way,” he said stubbornly.

“I wasn’t asking for permission, Tim. Whether you or Bruce like it or not, I’m doing this.”

His lips thinned in aggravation, “You’re not a field operator, Felicity.”

“Again with Bruce’s voice coming out of your mouth,” she burst out. “Seriously, have you ever considered getting a DNA test?”
“I’m already in the will, what difference would it make?” He returned.

“I have field experience,” she told him.

“Not enough,” he said stubbornly.

“How do you know? You were, what, barely in your teens when you became Robin? How old were you when you took your first bullet; sixteen, seventeen?” She asked him. “You don’t know what I can do or what I have been doing for the last four years. For your information I took down two armed thugs by myself after I left the club last night.”

“What?” Tim said in a near shout. “When—what—where the hell did this happen?”

“I was walking around the East End near the MoMA heading for the Wayne Foundation—”

“What the hell were you doing walking around the East End by yourself in the middle of the night?” He demanded. She reached over suddenly and plucked a few hairs from his scalp causing him to yelp in pain before rubbing his head, “What the hell was that for?”

She wound the hairs into a ball and stuck them in her pocket, “For my own peace of mind.”

He gave her a nasty look, “Sara told Tam you caught a cab back to your dad’s place. You said you were going straight home otherwise I wouldn’t have let you leave the club by yourself!”

“Well, you already knew I was with Bruce last night; or did you forget about your girlfriend screaming ‘booty call’ this morning?” She asked him blithely. “What? Did you think Bruce and I were having a slumber party at my Dad’s place?”

He scowled muttering, “I was trying to forget about that, thank you.” He made a disgruntled sound, “So that’s how you and Bruce hooked up last night? He saved you from some muggers?”

“Why would Bruce have to—!” She closed her eyes and did a slow count, “No. Were you not paying attention when I told you that I took down the muggers by myself?”

“Seriously?” Tim asked questioningly.

She narrowed her eyes, “Yes; seriously. In fact, Bruce was kind of put out by the fact that he had to call an ambulance for them.”

“An ambulance,” he repeated.

“Well, they pretty much needed it after I stabbed the first guy with his own knife then broke the other punk’s hand when I took away his gun, not to mention the fact that they both had broken noses and various other cuts and bruises. He was worried that the cops would charge me with felony assault once they got there because the guy with the knife in his lower back was screaming that they were the victims while I didn’t have a mark on me,” she said with an edge of sarcasm.

Tim blinked in surprise, “You…did that?”

“Yes, I did that,” she said disgustedly. “Call Barbara if you don’t believe me.” She shook her head and made to get up from the table, “Look, thanks for the sandwich but—”

“Hey,” he said quickly latching on to her arm to stop her. “Look, don’t—don’t go, okay?” He asked, his expression contrite, “I’m sorry, just, please, talk to me.”

“Fine,” she grumbled, sitting back down reluctantly.
“You said the two guys were armed?” He asked her once she settled back into her chair.

“A knife and a gun, yeah,” she supplied.

He nodded slowly although his eyes were bugging out slightly, “And you took them out?” He asked. “How?”

“It wasn’t that hard,” she shrugged. “The first guy did a clumsy lunge and tried to snatch my purse so I kicked him in the ribs and sent him bouncing off the wall. When the guy holding the knife came at me I went into a cross block and held maneuver and used his momentum against him so he stabbed himself in the back then I used the same maneuver when the other punk got up and took out his gun. I wound up breaking his finger pretty badly. Bruce showed up just as he took a runner and clocked him then kicked the other one in the face right before he called the cops.” She smirked, “I think half the reason he was so pissed is because I stole his thunder. The guy with the knife in his back was trying to get him to save them from me.”

“Seriously?” He said chuckling. “Oh man, I wish I had been there. He was holding it ‘gangsta style’ wasn’t he?” He asked. When she nodded he chuckled again, “Amateurs. I just love it when they do that shit. And Bruce was totally pissed?”

“He was not happy,” she admitted.

“Classic,” he sighed. “Gotta love the East End on a Saturday night. Okay, so you can trounce a couple of wanna-be thugs; I believe you and, yes, you do have skills. Still, it doesn’t make you a field operator.” At her raised eyebrow he frowned, “I guess Bruce said that, too, huh? Crap,” he pulled a face. “As much as I’m loathe to admit it though, he’s not wrong. I mean, like I said, I don’t doubt that you have skills; Tam has skills, but it doesn’t mean that you won’t get hurt if you go in blind like this.”

“So what?” She asked him. “If I get hurt or killed whose business is it but mine?”

“So what?” He sputtered with no small amount of outrage. “What the hell is that supposed to mean? Of course it’s our business!”

“Why? I’m not asking you or Bruce to help me; I’m running this on my own. Tim, believe it or not, I’ve faced a lot worse than a bunch of tech-nerds in a Cyber-ops control room and I did it pretty much by myself,” she told him. “The only danger I faced when I was there was the fact that they were using real cream in the coffee and I’m pretty sure my cholesterol can withstand the hit.”

“Yeah, but you had no way of knowing that at the time,” he said insistently.

“And I admitted that it was a bonehead move, but it had to be done,” she told him without apology. “Just like I know what needs to be done now.”

“Fine,” he said at last. “If this is what has to happen then I’m staying in Gotham to help.”

“You can’t,” she told him.

“Are you going to let Bruce in?” He asked her.

“No! Bruce isn’t going to follow my lead and you know that,” she said in exasperation. “He’d just try to push me aside and rush in because he thinks I can’t take care of myself.”

“Then I’m staying,” he told her. “Luke can handle Starling. He’s just got to train this Roy guy, right? He can do that with one arm and I can take his place when he goes back to Africa once this is settled.”

“It won’t work,” Felicity told him. “The reason you’re being sent in is because you’re Bruce’s son. That’s the whole point, remember? It makes more sense to have you there overseeing the project at QC than it would to send in Luke.”

“Luke is a MIT grad, an engineer, and the son of Wayne Enterprises’ CEO,” he argued. “He can handle it.”

“Luke is supposedly a schoolteacher and a charity-aid worker, you’re a voting member of the board and in line to one day control 70% of the company’s common stock along with Dick,” she told him. “Big difference.”

“Yeah, like I ever go to those things,” he snorted. “I’m a board member in name only. Bruce has our proxy and does all the voting on our behalf. I’m hardly ever there and Dick has no intentions of ever joining Wayne Enterprises. He’s got his own investments thanks to your dad managing his portfolio for him. Besides the high end apartment complex in Bludhaven, he’s got a bunch of other investment properties, the circus, and he got in on the ground floor of some software start-ups Lucius steered him towards. He’s nowhere near Bruce’s level but he’s still pretty much set for life.”

“Which is why he isn’t sending in Dick,” she pointed out reasonably. “Whether you’re there full-time or not, you actually do work for Wayne Enterprises and you’re the one who’s going to take over for Bruce eventually. He knows it, you know it and, more importantly, everyone else in the company knows it which is all the more reason for you to be in Starling,” she told him. “And even if she thinks you’re just a figurehead, Isabel knows enough about Bruce to know that he keeps a tight rein on who he lets have voting shares in his companies and, as his heir, that gives you a whole lot of power.”

“How do you figure?” He asked her. “Luke has stock in Wayne.”

“It’s not the same,” she said wryly. “Isabel knows that Wayne Enterprises’ common stock is completely held in private hands and it wouldn’t be hard for her to figure out who owns what. Bruce has 51% in his name, 19% is split between you and Dick, and my dad, Miss Wells, and Alfred own the other 30% some of which is held by my dad for me, Tam, and Luke in a blind trust; emphasis on blind, meaning that we can’t touch our stock or make any decisions regarding our investments without approval from Lucius. He set it up that way so we could all get jobs wherever we wanted to without having to worry about legalities like conflict of interest. None of us can touch our trusts until we’re thirty-five or he dies, whichever comes first, and then we have the option of breaking the trust or appointing another fiduciary.”

“How do you know this stuff,” he said shaking his head. “Seriously, you should be the one taking over for Bruce and Lucius eventually, not me.”

“It’s not that hard, Tim. My shares might be locked up in a trust but I still read the stockholder’s reports on the sly,” she said rolling her eyes. “You should try it some time. The point is that you being there makes sense. Of course, it doesn’t matter anyway because they already know all about Bruce being the Batman so they probably know about you too.”

“Whoa, hold up,” he said quickly. “When did this happen?”

“Didn’t I mention that part?” She said with a quirk as she backtracked through her recent conversations revolving around that particular subject.

“No, no you didn’t,” Tim said with a grimace. “Does Bruce know?”
“Yep,” she confirmed. “He still wasn’t going for it though.”

“Fuck-a-duck.” He rubbed the bridge of his nose wearily, “Now I really, really don’t like the idea of you doing this. Look, I’m staying and that’s final. If you’re going back in then I’m going with you because that’s the only way I can see this playing out.”

“As what? My secretary?” She asked him.

“I prefer executive assistant,” he shot back with a hint of cheek.

She rolled her eyes at him, “Tim, what is it that you think you can accomplish by staying here?”

“I can be your back up!” He scowled in frustration, “I might not be able to walk through the front door but I can run coms, work the perimeter, come after you if the tangy butt nuggets hit the fan, the usual vigilante hero shit, what else?”

Felicity grinned, “Nice turn of phrase but here’s the problem: The building is shielded from outside coms except the ones coming from their servers, the perimeter is guarded by rooftop snipers and ground forces, and they’ve got cameras, laser sensors, razor wire, electrified fencing, plus state of the art biometric locks and safeguards.”

His face fell, “Seriously?”

“Yep,” she nodded.

“The fuck?” He burst out. “Where are they holed up; Fort Knox?”

“My point exactly,” she told him. “Look, I can get in no problem. In fact, they want me to run the joint so I have full access. If I come in with you then all hell is going to break loose. I can handle this on my own, trust me. Just let me run recon and you go handle your end in Starling with Oliver then, if everything checks out, I can invite you in for a cup of coffee and you can check it out for yourself.”

“A cup of coffee?” He said slowly. “That’s different; I don’t think I’ve ever been invited inside a villainous lair for coffee before.” He paused, “Well, Hatter invited me inside his place for tea once but his shit tends to be heavily spiked with hallucinogenics so I never took him up on it. Plus it’s that nasty Celestial Seasonings crap that tastes like dryer sheets and potpourri. Anybody who thinks that’s what tea is supposed to taste like is just wrong in the head; Sleepytime and Orange Zinger my ass.”

“I don’t know if it’s a villainous lair or not; that’s the point,” Felicity said with a snort. “I mean, there’s a vibe that’s pinging my radar hard, yeah, but they already said I could invite Bruce if I wanted to as long as he didn’t try to piddle on the carpets. Once my ping is satisfied and I decide for myself that they’re legit I really don’t think they’d mind if I brought you in. In fact, they’ll probably try to recruit you which, if they are the good guys, would mean we could work together again. Plus, the coffee is really, really good there,” she said with all the sincerity her inner caffeine-fiend could muster. “They grind their own beans, Tim; and did I mention the cream?”

“I still don’t like this,” he said stubbornly. “It’s just…it’s too dangerous.”

“It’s an impressive setup and I’m not saying I buy it yet, but if they were going to hurt me they could have done so last week instead of treating me to a cup of freshly ground yumminess and conversation after giving me the full tour. I’m handling it, Tim. I’ll be fine and, if not, like I said before, it’s my life and my call. You can come to my funeral and yell at my pretty corpse if I’m wrong.”
He scowled, “I really wish you’d quit saying that. Every time you say ‘it’s my life’ and then talk about dying, my ass starts to itch!” He rubbed his hand over his eyes and made a noise of frustration, “Goddamn it,” he grumbled, “Luke is going to kick my ass if anything happens to you, you realize that right? Not to mention what Bruce will do to me.”

“I’ve got this, Tim,” she repeated for the umpteenth time. “Why the rest of you can’t see that, I don’t know.”

“Look, it’s not…it’s not that we don’t think you can’t handle it,” he told her, “it’s just that it’s you and we don’t think of you that way.”

She blinked at him, “It’s ‘me’? Uh, okay.”

“Look, don’t…” He sighed and rubbed his hands on his thighs in agitation, “Okay; how long have we known each other?”

She frowned, “What do you mean; like altogether?”

“Yeah, how long?”

She thought about it, “I don’t know; since elementary school? Maybe longer. Since before Bruce adopted you for sure because your mom was on the Foundation committee and we all went to Brentwood until Luke and I left for MIT plus you and he were constantly hanging out together even before you started lusting after Tam.”

“No,” he told her. “We’ve known of each other for that long, but we’ve only known each other five and a half years. This is going to sound weird, but here it goes. Just—just bear with me,” he took a centering breath. “Okay, if you asked me how long I’ve known Tam and Luke then you would be right and I would say ‘forever’. Even before I came to live with Bruce, my parents and Lucius ran in the same social circle. I’ve been friends with Luke since kindergarten and, the minute my hormones kicked in, yup, I noticed Tam. The thing is, I should have noticed you but I didn’t; not until Bruce brought you into the cave. Until then I knew of you—sort of--but for the life of me, I probably couldn’t pick you out in a crowd and if anyone asked me what your name was my best answer would be ‘Baby’ because that’s all I could remember Luke and Tam ever calling you. Still, point is, you and I never hung out before then and we definitely weren’t friends.”

Felicity tried to ignore the small prick of hurt she felt from his words and shrugged it off, “Yeah, well, that’s not the first time I’ve heard that. I didn’t exactly run in the same social circles as Tam and Luke; what’s your point?”

“Don’t get upset,” he told her, looking pained.

“I’m not upset,” she said, only lying a little bit.

“Yes, you are; I may not have been your friend then, but I am now, and I know you well enough to know when you’re upset. I didn’t tell you that to hurt your feelings, I told you that because I should have noticed you; you and I should have been friends long before I even met Tam and Luke,” he told her, his voice laden with sincerity and sympathy. “Tam is a couple of years older than me and, even though I’ve had a thing for her since I was thirteen, she didn’t notice me until she came home that first summer from college. Luke though, I hung out with him constantly. Well, more than I hung out with anyone else, anyway. I wasn’t exactly a social butterfly either, remember? Bruce kept us pretty busy in the cave but when I could hang, he was my partner in crime. If I wasn’t in school, on patrol, or in the cave, I was with Luke, and yet we never spoke. I can’t remember ever having a single conversation with you until Bruce brought you downstairs and that makes absolutely no sense whateverssoever if you stop to think about it. Even though you were kind of shy and spent most of your time with your dad at Wayne Enterprises or at home, you and I, we’re the same age. I saw you around, we went to school together, you’d come over with your dad or I’d see you when I’d be with Bruce in his office, and we’re both computer geeks. You’d think your dad or Bruce would have encouraged us to hang out because I have a hell of a lot more in common with you than I do with Tam yet we never got together; why?”

“I don’t know; maybe because that would be gross and unnatural?” She said giving him a look of disgust.

“Yeah, I agree,” he told her. “And yet, even though I’m technically older than you by like five days, the idea of you marrying Bruce and basically becoming my stepmother doesn’t bother me in the slightest, know why?”

“No, but I’m sure you’re going to tell me,” she said with a sigh.

“Because even though you might not have been on my radar, you were always important to Bruce,” he told her. “For the rest of us, Bruce was always the center of the universe. He was always this stoic guy, always on point, always driven by the mission, a hero. He was what we revolved around, but you; you were what he revolved around.”

“I don’t think that’s true,” she said quietly.

“It is totally true,” he told her. “You’re the only person he ever smiled for. Not the polite bullshit smile he flashes for the cameras, but a real genuine smile. Other than the ones he had busting their asses in the Batcave, he avoided kids like the plague, but he always made time for you and not because of Lucius. In fact, I can’t even remember him having a single conversation with Luke before he joined up and he barely noticed Tam until she started working for Wayne Enterprises, but he always took time out for you.”

He scratched the back of his head sheepishly, “I should probably be a little creeped out about the fact that he’s been like that with you since you were a little kid but I’m not because it wasn’t like that. He was never inappropriate or anything, at least I don’t think so, not until you came downstairs and started working in the cave and then, pow! It’s like a switch got flipped and he started seeing you in a whole other way. Seeing how he was around you then…” he shook his head, “it made us see him as human for the first time. It’s weird but it’s like you and Bruce were meant to be and when he read you in, the rest of us saw that instantly. You walked in the cave and it’s like we saw you for the first time because we finally saw what Bruce saw. I mean, we knew you were there but, until that moment, it didn’t register with us just how important you were. Bruce saw it though; he always saw it. You were always right there in front of him and once we saw that, everything came together for the rest of us.”

“I didn’t do much,” she said in quiet confusion. “I just helped with Watchtower a little.”

“You did more than you know,” he told her. “Things in the Batcave could get pretty grim, especially after Jason and Stephanie…” he let his voice trail off. “The thing is, you made Bruce better and that made the rest of us better. One minute you were Luke and Tam’s shy little sister none of us knew much about and then one day you showed up out of the blue and we couldn’t ever remember a time when you weren’t there. You just appeared out of nowhere and all of us felt this overwhelming need to protect you because of how Bruce acted when he was around you. Not—not that Bruce was the one you needed protecting from,” he said quickly. “I know I keep making him sound like a character straight out of a Nabokov novel or something, but that’s not what I’m saying at all.”

“And I appreciate that,” she said drily. “I never really thought of myself as the Lolita type.”
“Of course, technically, he is old enough to be your dad, so at first this whole thing between you was pretty confusing to the rest of us,” he told her.

“Only if he got started in high school,” she told him with a scowl. “A seventeen year age gap isn’t that bad, you know. I mean, it’s a lot but my mom was barely twenty when she met Lucius and he was already in his forties. Bruce’s parents had an even bigger age gap than he and I do; his dad was almost forty and his mom was barely eighteen when he was born.”

“Whatever, I happen to dig older women myself so no judgments,” he said holding up his hands in a gesture of capitulation. “I’m just saying that when you were around he was happier for some reason and, at first, we thought maybe it was because he thought of you like his kid but that wasn’t it. Remember when I pointed out that you and I should have been pushed together by fate or whatever?”

She scrunched up her nose again, “I’ve been trying to scrub it from my memory banks unsuccessfully, so yeah.”

“Bruce really didn’t like me hanging out with Stephanie back when we were in prep. It’s not that he didn’t like her; it’s that she came with a lot of complications attached. You’d think he would have jumped at the chance to push us together as a healthy alternative but he didn’t. In fact, even though I was with Tam by the time you were read in, I remember seeing him tense up a little whenever he caught us hanging out like he was afraid I was…you know,” he smirked. “And it wasn’t just me; he was that way with you and Dick after he and Barb started having problems. Every time Dick would laugh at something you said or touch your shoulder, Bruce would freeze and find somewhere else for him to be. I still remember when you asked Dick about training you to do stuff and the look on Bruce’s face when he found out about it. Dick approached him and asked if he thought you’d be a good candidate to take Cassie’s spot on the team and he just turned on him. He was…” he sighed, “more than livid; he was terrified. It was like even the idea of you getting hurt could end his whole world. He forbade any of us from even discussing it with you from then on out. I could tell that Dick wanted to go toe to toe with him but then he caught the look on his face and dropped it without saying another word. I think that’s what brought it home for the rest of us. In that moment, Bruce showed us exactly how important you were to him. With the rest of us, even though deep down he loved us…even if he couldn’t say it,” he shrugged, “he let us take those risks every day. You though? No way. He didn’t have to say it out loud for us to know that, no matter what else happened, keeping you safe would always come first and that the best way for us to protect him would be to protect you.”

“Look, I already know that Bruce cares about me and that he’s a territorial butthead,” she said, looking away. “That’s not the point.”

“It’s not just Bruce who cares about you,” he told her. “All of us care about you and you’ve always brought out our most protective instincts for some reason. I don’t know why, but you do. Yeah, it has a lot to do with how Bruce is with you but that’s not all of it. It was like the rest of us were lost in the dark from spending so much time in the cave then, one day, you showed up and brought the sunlight in. I remember hearing Bruce laughing in the Batcave at something you said and all of us just froze. I’d never heard him laugh before and you made that happen—in the cave!” He exclaimed in wide-eyed emphasis. “Things started getting better for all of us when you were around. Everyone felt it but Bruce most of all. When you left,” he took a shuddering breath, “It nearly killed him. He was pretty bad off when Jason and Stephanie died and when Cassie left; when Damian died he was out of control, but with you?” He shook his head, “I can’t even imagine how bad it would get if anything ever happened to you. If he even survived it, I think he wouldn’t be able to stop until he tore the entire world apart with his bare hands.”
“You say that now but it took him four years to come after me, Tim,” she pointed out. “I didn’t leave, he rejected me. He told me he didn’t want me, not the other way around.”

“Yeah, and you didn’t see him for those four years so you don’t know how bad it got, I do,” he said seriously. “Remember the Army of Blood thing?”

“Kind of hard to forget it,” Felicity said ruefully.

“The reason it took us so long to get the story about what was happening down there is because we were all dealing with Talia and Ra’s. Damian was dead, Bruce was a wreck, but the minute he heard me and Dick telling the pilot to head your way he shook all of it off and was on full alert; the pain left his face. For those brief few minutes before Tam was able to tell us it was over, he came alive again; for you. When he found out that you were okay and that the danger had passed, the mask slipped back into place. According to Barb it was like that the night he met Huntress. The second he found out you were in danger he was ready to hop a jet and drag you back home. That alone should tell you something.”

“So what? Sorry to sound callous but what am I supposed to do? I can’t wrap myself in cotton wool for the rest of my life to make him feel better; I’m sorry, I just can’t,” she said in frustration. “I can’t give up my independence just because he wants me to be less than what I am.”

“No, you can’t. I’m not telling you to play the weak kneed damsel in distress, but you can and should at least give the guy a break,” he told her. “He knows you’re good and, if it was anyone else but you, he’d probably be okay with you running this op, but it is you, Baby. As long as it’s you in the line of fire he isn’t going to want to give in. Try to convince him, give him another chance and see what happens. Give him a chance to see things your way before you write him off completely.”

“I’m not backing down,” she told him stubbornly. “I’m seeing this through to the end.”

“Are you sure Sara has your back?” He asked, his resolve visibly weakening.

“I’m sure,” she told him. “She’s heading out to Starling for a day or two and then she’s coming back on Wednesday to help me with the Stellmoor thing.”

“Fine,” he said. “But you have to promise me that you won’t do anything until then,” he told her. “Give Bruce until Wednesday to cave.”

“He’s not going to cave,” she snorted.

“Probably not,” he agreed. “Just promise me anyway that you won’t go in without back up.”

“I promise I won’t go in without back up,” she said, although she didn’t specify what kind of back up or who would be the one to provide it.

Luckily he didn’t seem to notice. “Good, okay, that’s one thing out of the way,” he said, breathing a sigh of relief.

They sat in silence for a few minutes before she finally got up the courage to bring up the next subject weighing on her mind.

“He told me about Damian and Talia,” Felicity said quietly and as he looked at her sharply she added, “Last night; he told me about what happened.”

“What else did he tell you?” He asked guardedly.
“All of it, I think,” she told him. “He told me about Damian, that he apparently tried to poison me once and that he tried to kill you on numerous occasions as well.”

“Damian went after you?” He asked sharply then scowled. “Doesn’t surprise me. That little psycho shit probably tried to kill all of us at least once with the exception of Bruce and Dick. I’m just surprised Bruce let him get close enough to you to try something.”

“He didn’t; that’s why Damian never gave me the poison,” she told him. “Bruce stopped him before it ever got that far. He didn’t tell you about it?”

“No,” Tim said menacingly. “If Bruce had told me it wouldn’t have gone well for Damian and he knows it. He tried talking some shit about you once and let’s just say the little punk learned to keep his mouth shut around me after that.”

“He talked about me?” Felicity said in surprise. “I only met him once! What did he say?”

Tim shook his head with an air of disgust, “You don’t want to know.”

“No, I kind of do,” she told him.

Tim shifted uncomfortably on the chair, “First off, it wasn’t about you; it was about me. He started taunting me by accusing me of being ‘less than a man’. Not only was the kid a psycho but he was also a homophobe. That stuff doesn’t bother me though; I’m secure enough in who I am not to take shit like that seriously and, even if I was gay, so freakin’ what? I mean, how stupid and pathetic would someone have to be to let that shit get to them anyway?” His lips curled in an expression of disgust, “I’m like, ‘Yeah, okay, enjoy your Tea Party rally then go watch some 700 Club while the rest of us actually get a fucking life.’ He started talking about me wearing a dress and being the next Batgirl but I laughed it off. I told him he was an idiot and, until his testicles finished descending, he should just shut the hell up about things he didn’t even understand yet. I mean, shit, the kid was ten years old. I didn’t react the way he wanted me to until…” His voice trailed off.

“Until?” She prompted.

“It’s just…” he made a disgusted sound in his throat. “He started talking crazy shit about how I was so pathetic that I couldn’t even worm my way into the bed of a whore like—” He glanced up at her guiltily. “He said that fate had placed him there as Enkidu, whatever the hell that meant, and that he had rid Bruce of the ‘spawn of the divine whore’ and now he would rid him of his ‘false child’ as well by slitting my throat like a sacrificial bull and that he’d burn my ‘ill-formed testicles’ at the altar of the gods and throw my ‘insignificant manhood’ in your face when his mother made her triumphant return.”

“He called my mom a whore?” Felicity asked, feeling genuinely hurt despite knowing that the boy was obviously mentally ill.

“Look, the kid was looney-tunes, okay,” Tim told her with a snort. “Really, had I been thinking more clearly I would have laughed it off but I was just so sick of his shit, you know? I just…I really wanted to beat the crap out of that kid so I did. I pummeled the living shit out of him until he literally pissed himself and it felt really, really good.” He chuckled ruefully, “Do yourself a favor and forget about the rest of that crap; he didn’t know you or your family and it wasn’t about you as much as it was about me and the crazy shit Talia had been teaching him. That kid was a lost cause from day one if you ask me. Bruce should have just put him in Arkham the minute he showed up on his doorstep.”

“But Bruce said that Damian redeemed himself in the end; that he died a hero,” she told him. “He said that, in the end, he was finally getting through to him.”

Tim’s eyes darkened, “Bruce is wrong. Oh, Damian saved Dick all right. Dick was down for the count and the Heretic was coming in for the kill when Damian jumped in front of his sword, but he didn’t redeem shit.”

Felicity frowned in confusion, “What do you mean? If he did like you said and saved Dick…?”

Tim shook his head, “He didn’t care about saving Dick,” he snorted. “The little fucker was a killer and that’s what drove him to attack the Heretic. Plus, he was the target to begin with; Dick just got in the way. If he had any kind of genuine feelings towards Dick it was because he was wearing the cowl at one point while Bruce…um, took some time off,” he said, shooting her a strange look then continued. “Dick and Bruce thought he was getting better because they wanted to think that. It’s kind of like when people convince themselves that the tiger they’re keeping on a leash loves them when, the truth is, they just haven’t gotten around to having them for dinner yet.”

“Wait, go back,” she narrowed her eyes at him suspiciously, “What does that mean; ‘Bruce took some time off’? When? Why? Did he have surgery or something? Why didn’t anyone call me?”

“It’s a long story,” he muttered. “The point is that Bruce didn’t see what I saw. If Damian was changing it only meant he was getting more dangerous, not less.”

“How so?” She asked, dropping the other thing for the time being.

“What I mean is that he wasn’t killing for the sake of killing anymore, sure, but he was still a deadly little psycho fuck; Bruce and Dick just changed his focus. After they worked on him a while, instead of killing anything that annoyed him, he directed his rage towards anyone he thought was his father’s enemy. It was like a jihad kind of thing. Did Bruce tell you what Damian did to the Joker?”

“No,” she said quietly.

“He tied him to a chair and nearly beat him to death just for the hell of it,” he said without emotion. “He heard about what the Joker did to Jason and he figured it was a case of let the punishment fit the crime. He even used the same tire iron. If he hadn’t gotten cocky and the Joker hadn’t managed to get him with some toxin, he might have killed him.”

Try as she might, she couldn’t really feel a whole lot of outrage over that. “I’m sorry, I get what you’re saying but when it comes to Joker…” she sighed. “I know how Bruce is about using lethal force but some people need to die in order to save lives.” She saw the surprise in Tim’s eyes as the words left her mouth but she didn’t give him a chance to object.

For better or worse, she had changed and they needed to start realizing that.

She gave him a hard look, a look she had acquired six months ago. It was the look of someone who knew what it was like to have blood on her hands but who had paid that price for the greater good. She may have never served in the military but she was a soldier now and she dropped her shields just enough to allow Tim to finally see that. “As far as I’m concerned, the Joker’s one of them. Granted, it should be after the courts render their decision and in a humane setting, but I certainly wouldn’t shed a tear if someone clubbed him to death with a tire iron or just put a bullet in his brain. No offense, but Bruce or someone else should have put him down ages ago. I get that all life is sacred but at what point do you draw the line? How many people died because of Joker? Sometimes mercy does more harm than good.”

She knew that better than anyone. She was the one who convinced Oliver to spare Slade’s life when Sara, Nyssa, Lance, and even Dig encouraged him to pull the trigger. She was the one to lay her life on the line to keep Slade alive, who helped put him in ARGUS’s prison on Lian Yu, and therefore it was her fault when Slade escaped and nearly took out the entire city with the Omega Device. All the people who fell at his feet, his swords having ended their existence; their blood was on her hands just as much as they were on his.

Her mercy, her naïve belief that all life held value, wound up costing lives in the end. That was on her. She still believed that killing wasn’t always the answer; but sometimes pulling the trigger saved more lives than it took.

Tim stared at her, shock etched on his features, then ran his hand over his mouth in agitation, “Maybe…maybe you’re right, I don’t know anymore, but the point is that Damian was so out of control that he managed to scare the shit out of the Joker. The Joker, Felicity. Bruce would have a cow if he heard me say this but, to be honest, if he had killed him, I could give a shit. Then again, I didn’t exactly shed tears over Damian either.” His eyes took on a haunted cast. “A few years ago I never would have thought I would or could ever say that but, knowing what Damian was capable of at ten years old, can you imagine what he would have become as he got older and stronger? If he was that monstrous as a little kid, what would he be like at twenty? Thirty?” He shook his head, “Like I said, I wouldn’t want Bruce to ever hear me say this, but the fact is that Damian’s death was a blessing in disguise. It sounds bad but all I could think when I first saw his body was ‘good’.”

Felicity felt her face suffuse with color as she looked into the face of the man she had thought of as the most well-adjusted and sweetest member of the Bat family and realized that, perhaps the darkness that languished in her own heart had made its way into his as well. This was a side to Tim she’d never seen before, “You don’t mean that, do you?”

“I do,” he said without a hint of emotion. “Don’t get me wrong, I didn’t want him to die like that but I knew that eventually we’d have to take him down, it was just a matter of time. I knew that eventually Damian would become so out of control that Bruce would have no choice but to put him away and that would have destroyed him. At least, this way, his death was quick and nearly painless. It definitely beat spending the rest of his life in Arkham or in solitary at Blackgate Prison.” He rubbed his hand on his chin and leaned forward, elbows on the table as he looked her in the eye, his voice dropping to a near hush as though he was afraid to speak them too loud for fear of being heard even though they were the only two people there, “Ra’s, Talia, Damian, even Nyssa; there’s something twisted up inside of all of them. I don’t even believe in God or an afterlife but that whole bloodline, all of them, it’s like they were born without souls or something. Part of me thinks we should just wipe them all off the face of the earth and be done with this whole thing once and for all. I’m not proud of it but it’s there and I know that Bruce feels the same way... he just can’t bring himself to admit it.”

He was right, that’s exactly how Bruce felt. Whether he knew it or not, he managed to parrot back what Bruce had told her almost word for word. “That doesn’t sound like you, Tim,” she said quietly. “The person I once knew would never have said any of that.”

“I would have said the same thing about you when you said that some people had to die in order to save lives but, you said it yourself, four years is a long time. A lot can change and a lot did,” he told her then leaned back and shut his eyes. “Lately I’ve been asking myself what it would have been like if you stayed and I wondered why Bruce waited so long to go after you. I keep thinking that if you had just stayed and you guys had worked it out, then you and Bruce could have gotten married and had kids of your own by now. He would have been happier and everyone’s life would have changed for the better. I think that and then I remember what Damian was like, and I know exactly why Bruce left you in Starling City,” he told her, his gaze fixed on hers. “Damian would have killed you in a heartbeat, even Bruce said so. If you guys had tried to get married and have kids of your own…”
he closed his eyes. “You were better off back in Starling City. Even now, knowing how much you went through, you were safer where you were, trust me.”

“I don’t know about that but, as hard as it got sometimes, I needed this time away,” she told him. “At times it was...it was bad, more dangerous than you could possibly ever imagine, but I grew up a lot. I’m not a rookie, Tim. I’ve gotten my hands dirty more than once and, if you knew what I had to do, you might even be tempted to call me a monster, too.”

“No,” he said, shaking his head. “No, you could never be a monster.”

“Why not?” she asked.

He gave her a sad half-smile, “Because Bruce loves you too much to ever let that happen.”

“It’s too late, I already am one,” she said softly, not even realizing she had spoken out loud until he answered her.

“No, you’re not,” he said adamantly.

She smiled but inside she felt the chill that had been left there by Slade settle deep in her heart, “I wish that was true but what’s done is done and not even Bruce can go back in time to fix it.”

Time took a deep breath and let it out slowly, “What happened six months ago? What is it that you don’t want to talk about?”

Felicity offered him a bitter smile and shrugged, “Let’s just say that I made an error in judgment; I naively thought I was...helping someone I care about do the right thing and other people had to pay the price for my short-sightedness as a result. Six months ago I corrected that mistake but at a cost.”

“What the hell does that mean?” He asked her with a frown.

“It means that I finally learned what it meant to let the darkness in.”
Chapter Thirty-Four
Chapter Thirty-Four

The next day she found herself with Tam and Sara going through one of her sister’s storage units as she shared with them the details of her latest Bruce adventure.

“And then what happened?” Tam asked, completely enraptured.

“I said ‘watch me’ and I left,” she said as she sorted through the rack of jackets. “Hey Sara, this looks like your kind of thing.”

“Ooh, mine!” Sara said, snatching the black zip trimmed motorcycle jacket from her hand, “Are you sure I can have this?”

Tam looked over at what she was holding and shrugged, “Yeah, I’ve got so many leather jackets it’s ridiculous. Besides, I stole that one out of the wardrobe trailer when we wrapped up filming ‘The Blue Beetle’ last month up in Vancouver.” She shook her head, “If you thought Gotham winters were cold…” She paused and turned to her sister, “You know, I could get a couple of extra tickets to the premier if you guys want to go.”

“No,” Felicity said succinctly causing Sara to snicker.

“Why not?” Tam asked. “It’s a great movie; I got to see the rushes and, I’m telling you, we’re talking Oscar gold. It’s about this guy named Daniel Garret who loses his fiancée tragically in a—”

Sara began to snort behind her jacket as Felicity shot her a dirty look, “Yeah, I’m aware of the plotline, but no thanks.”

“Seriously Baby, it’s a Hollywood premier,” Tam said in a tone meant to tantalize. “We’re talking seats right smack dab between Brangelina and Clooney. Since I’m in charge of all the PR I totally have the hook up! I can even introduce you to Garret if you want.”

“Yeah, Cutie, don’t you want to meet the guy who inspired the movie? I hear he has some brainy blonde bombshell playing his secretary-slash-love interest. The actress even kind of looks a little like you; maybe you’re his type,” Sara said roundly, ducking as Felicity tossed a hanger at her head.

“No.” She said firmly then turned to Tam, “Thanks but no thanks.”
“Okay, you don’t want the tickets then I’ll just give them to somebody else,” Tam said with a indignant sniff. “I mean, the guy is just a world class athlete who happens to also be a genius billionaire, an archeologist, single, runs his own tech and pharmaceutical companies, and looks like Ryan Gosling, but fine.”

“Let’s just say I’m not that big a fan of the genre or the subject matter,” Felicity said darkly.

“Since when?”

“Since she became a magnet for brooding men in masks who all have tragic pasts and their heads up their asses,” Sara said, tongue in cheek. She held up the jacket again, “So they just let you have this?” Sara asked, impressed.

“You didn’t just catch the part where she said she stole it?” Felicity asked.

“That’s just a figure of speech,” Tam said dismissively. “Besides, if I didn’t take it then someone else would have.”

“Seriously though, if I was going to buy this in the store how much would it cost?” Sara asked.

Tam wrinkled her nose and thought about it, “Saint Laurent, right?”

Sara checked the label, “Yeah.”

“Eh, I don’t know?” She said, thumbing through the racks, “Five, maybe?”

“Five hundred dollars? Really?” Sara goggled, looking at the jacket again.

“Five thousand,” Tam corrected her then looked at it again, “More or less.”

“Are you shitting me?” Sara burst out. She stared at Tam, her jaw hanging open, “I paid less than that for my first car and you just stole this?”

“I didn’t actually steal it,” Tam said again. “Besides, it only costs that much if you were to buy it in the store. Half the time the designers just give us the clothes for free as advertising or they come from one of our in-house costumers.”

“They just gave you a five thousand dollar jacket for free?” Sara asked skeptically.

“How do you think I got all these clothes?” Tam said off-handedly. “I told you I’m cheap and I hate to shop. In my humble opinion, retail should be outlawed altogether.”

“That’s true,” Felicity said wryly. “Stealing, on the other hand, should be legalized along with breaking and entering.”

“I couldn’t find my key, okay,” Tam told her. “Besides, it’s still my storage unit; it’s only breaking and entering if it’s someone else’s unit.”

“Well, you’re buying me a new set of picks,” Felicity told her then groused, “I can’t believe you broke my half-diamond and the torsion wrench.”

“Invest in a better set and that wouldn’t happen,” Tam told her with an air of superiority. “I’ll just give you one of Tim’s spare sets in exchange, alright? Happy now?”

“Fine,” she grumbled. “You still owe me an apology though.”
“I’m sorry I broke your obviously inferior quality lock picks,” Tam told her.

“Thank you, even though the qualifier was a bit uncalled for.”

“One of these days you need to tell me how both of you learned to pick locks like that,” Sara told her before looking at the jacket again. “Meanwhile, I am definitely in the wrong business,” Sara muttered as she hung the jacket on her quickly growing ‘keep’ rack.

“It pays the bills,” Tam said tossing a garment bag towards Felicity. “Here.”

“What is it?” She unzipped the bag and looked at the sequined silk and satin pantsuit. “Why are you giving me this?”

“It’ll look cute on you,” she said.

“What is with you and trying to dress me like I’m about to pull a rabbit out of a top hat?” Felicity asked her.

“It’s Akris and it’s sexy; trust me. If you’re going to drive Bruce insane then you need to up your game,” Tam told her. “I was right about the dress the other night, wasn’t I?”

“That’s not really the best example to use right now,” Felicity said slowly.

“He actually told you he loved you and wanted to marry you so you could make babies together?” Sara asked her. “Picture it: You, Felicity Smoak, as Mrs. Batman walking down the street with a whole litter of mini-Bats in tow. How fucking weird is that?” she said shaking her head and chuckling.

“He even told me what he wanted to name our kids,” she said in a disgruntled tone. “All seven of them.”

“Seven?” Sara said dubiously.

“Bruce told you he wants you to shoot out seven of his evil little Bat-spawn and you didn’t offer him a do-it-yourself vasectomy in exchange?” Tam asked incredulously.

“Well, technically he said we could have anywhere from one up to a dozen if I wanted but he already had seven names picked out right off the top of his head.” She frowned in contemplation, “Betsy; eh, still not sure about that one.”

Sara wrinkled her nose, “It’s not bad, kind of sweet and old-fashioned I guess, but the first time the kid has an accident she’d wind up being stuck with ‘Betsy Wetsy’ forever.”

Felicity shrugged, “Still better than Helena though; that kid would probably come out of the womb with a hate-on for Organized Crime Barbie complete with a black leather diaper and sparkly pink mini-crossbow.”

“What is it with masks and the whole hot and cold thing?” Tam asked in disgust. “You know, seriously; What. The. Hell? I mean, first Bruce is pushing you away and the next thing you know he’s offering to knock you up and stick a ring on it like that solves everything? Please.”

“I know,” Felicity said wearily, “Maybe I should consider joining the Sapphic Sisterhood after all; women have got to be easier than men because, God knows, they certainly can’t be worse.”

“That’s true,” Sara agreed. “I mean, don’t get me wrong; with women you sleep together once, then the next day you’re signing a lease and buying a dog, but it’s still pretty straight forward. There isn’t this whole element of angst and ‘I don’t know if I can commit’ crap to it. Trying to get a guy to commit is hard; trying to get two women in a lesbian relationship not to commit is practically impossible. I mean, I still like men but, nine times out of ten, women are just so much easier to deal with, trust me.”

“She’s right,” Tam agreed. “With women it’s just random spurts of bitchiness once a month and the occasional Indigo Girls or Ani DiFranco concert,” Tam said distractedly. She tossed another garment bag towards Sara. “Matching leather pants incoming!”

“Cool!” Sara said, unzipping it and looking inside. “Yay! I’ve needed a new set of leathers. Oh, and you need to update your Sapphic playlist; you’ve been out of the dug out for too long. Now it’s Mary Lambert and Icona Pop.”

“Oh I love them! ‘All I need in this life of sin is me and my girlfriend! Me and my girlfriend!’” She sang as she wiggled her butt around the storage space. “How do you feel about corsets?” Tam asked her holding up a black leather corset style bustier with a zip front and a crisscrossing of ribbons on the side that went with the jacket perfectly.

“What the hell kind of movie did that come from?” Felicity looked over as Sara held the corset up to her chest. “When did Wayne Entertainment start producing and distributing leather fetish porn?”

“When didn’t we?” Tam shot back.

“Really?” Sara asked in surprise.

“No,” Tam snorted, “but I would love to see the look on Bruce’s face if we suggested it during the next production meeting. For a supposed playboy he’s actually kind of a prude.”

“Bruce is many things but he’s not a prude,” Felicity told her.

“You’re a prude,” Tam retorted, “of course you’d think the guy you’re schtupping isn’t a prude.”

“He’s not a prude,” Sara said supportively.

“And for the record, neither am I,” Felicity added.

“How do you know?” Tam asked ignoring her sister’s protests.

“Because all masks are sexual deviants, present company included,” she said as she picked out several pairs of artfully frayed and torn pairs of designer jeans and placed them on her rack. “It goes along with the whole adrenaline junkie thing.”

“That’s true. You know, I should go back to being a mask,” Tam said with a contemplative look. She grabbed another leather corset and matching leather pants from the rack nearest her and held it against her body for inspection. “Seriously, I have skills and I would look totally bad-ass fighting crime in this.”

Sara and Felicity both looked at the golden tan leathers she was holding up. The rich honey gold leather and slightly darker cheetah print accents made her skin glow and her tawny eyes seem to glitter dangerously.
“Oh, that’s hot,” Sara breathed in a tone that was almost too appreciative.

“How is it you can wear stuff like that and not look like a part time dominatrix slash animal trainer?” Felicity asked in disbelief.

“It’s all in the attitude,” she said, wiggling her pert behind. “Seriously, should I join the family business and hit the streets of Gotham in this or what?”

“As ‘Foxy Lady’?” Felicity snorted.

Felicity shot her a look. “You’re already sleeping with one of my siblings and now you want to go after the other?” She whispered as Tam wandered over to the full length mirror that was leaning somewhat haphazardly against the wall.

“Wouldn’t be the first time I’ve had a brother/sister combo,” Sara told her unrepentantly. “Did I ever tell you the one about me and the Russian assassins?”

“Yes, and I would really like to avoid hearing it again, thanks,” she told her with a note of disgust. “That’s just icky. I mean, twins? And they…with each other?” She said wrinkling her nose and shuddering slightly.

“What can I say; they liked to do everything together,” Sara shrugged.

“That’s just so wrong,” Felicity muttered.

“That’s it, I’m definitely going back to being a mask,” Tam announced walking back towards them. “I look too good in this outfit not to fight crime. You know, Luke gave me a necklace for my birthday a few years ago that might work as well. He said one of the village elders told him it was some kind of ‘Tantu Totem’, whatever the hell that is. I bet I could wear that and a funky belt and totally accessorize this bitch runway style.”

“That gold animal head thing with the teeth?” Felicity asked scrunching her nose in distaste. “Don’t you think it’s kind of tacky?”

“A little, which is why it’s still sitting at the bottom of my jewelry box; still, it’s all in the attitude, you know? I’ve never had anything to wear it with before which is why I haven’t even tried it on yet, but it would go with the whole wild woman theme,” she said looking at the aforementioned suit again. “Kind of a statement necklace to set the whole thing off. I mean, it’s so ugly and tacky that it kind of circles back; like how those dogs with the pug noses and bug eyes are so ugly they’re cute.”

“And you said it was a totem?” Sara asked curiously. “Isn’t that some kind of religious object?”

“Not this thing, trust me. He probably just picked it up from the bazaar or something,” Felicity said dismissively. “Seriously, you should see that thing. It’s got this primitive dog or wolf head in the middle and is surrounded by stylized gold animal teeth. I don’t even think it’s real; it looks like something Elvis might have worn back in his jumpsuit days. It is so totally polyester and black velvet chic that you can practically smell the 1970’s wafting out of it.”

“Luke’s such a cheapskate I doubt he even bought it to begin with,” Tam snorted. “It’s probably just some piece of junk jewelry he found after he moved into David’s old place but it would look pretty cool with this outfit, don’t you think?” She shrugged, “If I can pull it off maybe people will think I’m wearing it ironically.”
“Yeah, if it doesn’t turn your neck green or give you heavy metal poisoning first,” Felicity rolled her eyes at her. “You seriously want to run along rooftops with Tim as ‘Foxy Lady’ again?”

“Well, I’d change the name, but sure; why not?” She shrugged. “Back when Luke and I first began studying martial arts I could kick his ass and now he’s Batwing. Why can’t I be…?” She paused, “What would be a good handle for me?”

“Vixen,” Sara said, grinning lasciviously.

“That’s perfect!” Tam squealed. “Vixen,” she tested it on her tongue. “Tam Fox aka Vixen; I love it!”

“That is kind of clever,” Felicity said reluctantly. “After all, ‘Vixen’ is another word for a female fox.”

“Among other things,” Sara said lowly.

Tam grinned excitedly, “And it would go with the animal necklace; tie it all together! That dog head thing looks kind of like a fox, right?”

“I’ve never seen it but I think it would have to be a fox,” Sara said slowly. “Do they even have wolves in Africa?”

“I think they do, I don’t know,” Felicity shrugged. “I know they have something called a Bat-eared Fennec Fox though.” She looked at them, “Animal Planet is my jam.”

“Bat ears; perfect!” Tam said with a toothy grin. “Oh, just love it when a plan comes together! Makes me want to totally squee!”

“If you want to make high pitched noises of pleasure, I have a few ideas,” Sara said with another appreciative look.

Felicity shot her a dirty look, “Seriously, you’re squidding me out here.”

“You’re just jealous because you’re no longer the only girl in your family I want to sleep with,” Sara told her, sticking out her tongue childishly.

“You want to sleep with me?” Tam asked with a wide grin. “Thank you; that’s so sweet! If it wasn’t for Tim, I’d so go there. The first time I set eyes on you I thought, ‘Man, I would totally do her’. ” She grinned, “I always had a thing for petite blondes.”

“That’s me; sweet and then some,” Sara told her with a toothy grin. “If you and Tim should ever break up, call me. Or even if you don’t, I’m good with the three’s company thing if you are.”

Tam raised one eyebrow, her eyes wandering over Sara’s figure playfully, “Well, I have been wondering what to get him for his birthday… Tell you what, if by July he hasn’t pissed me off and you and Luke aren’t still knocking boots, I’ll give you a call.” She winked at her then went back to the racks.

She turned to Felicity and mouthed ‘Two down; one to go.’

Felicity just rolled her eyes and snuck some Monique Lhuillier into her rack while Tam’s attention was elsewhere.

Hey, all’s far in war and clothes.
“You should get a codename, too,” Tam told Felicity just as she managed to bury the garment bags in between some Calvin Klein.

“Field operators get handles and, according to Bruce at least, I’m ‘only’ a tech, remember?” Felicity said with an edge of resentment in her tone.

“Barbara has a handle,” Tam said ignoring her sarcasm.

“She’s right, you do need a handle,” Sara told her. “All joking aside you should have had one for a while now.”

“Why do I need a handle?” Felicity asked as she looked at a raspberry colored Gucci cocktail dress carefully before sticking it in her ‘keep’ pile. “Seriously, all I do half the time is monitor coms and I’m not even doing that right now.”

“Still, you should get one just to have it,” Tam told her. “Bruce accused you of basically not being a real vigilante, right?”

“Yeah, and so did Ollie even though he should know better. How many times you have to prove it by pulling our asses out of the fire before he sees that is beyond me,” Sara said chiming in as she tossed a cream colored one shoulder Lanvin jumpsuit on her pile along with a couple of pairs of miniskirts and some blouses.

“It might not change their minds but if you had an identity of your own then maybe it will help you feel, I don’t know, more confident?” She suggested.

“Tam’s right,” Sara told her. “When I’m me I just feel like ‘Sara’ but when the Canary comes out it’s like she’s a completely different person.”

Tam frowned, “So is that why all you masks talk about yourselves in the third person?”

“First off, thank you for mentioning the weird third person thing!” Felicity said to her sister. “Glad to know I wasn’t the only one thinking it. As for the handle; fine. What do you suggest?”

Both women looked at each other before turning to her.

“We really shouldn’t be the ones to pick your handle,” Sara said, scratching behind her ear. “I mean, it’s going to be your identity; it should be personal to you.”

“If it’s personal to me then I’m going with ‘Felicity’,” she told them. “It’s worked for me so far.”

“You can’t use your own name,” Tam gave her a wilting glare. “Besides, there aren’t a whole lot of ‘Felicity’s’ around. If someone calls your name out over the coms wouldn’t that be bad?”

“Very bad,” Sara said, eyeballing Felicity pointedly.

“Fine,” she sighed. “Any suggestions at least?”

Tam tapped her finger against her lips as she thought out loud, “It should be something clever, something that you identify personally with but isn’t obvious…”

“What? Like Vixen?” Felicity asked dryly.

“Or Black Canary,” Sara told her. “I picked it because it kind of helped me keep my focus, you know?”
Tam’s eyes lit up with curiosity, “What do you mean?”

“When you join the League of Assassins you have to give up your old identity completely and choose a new name.” Sara’s gaze grew distant and her voice muted as it always did when she thought about her past, “Nyssa used to call me ‘Ta-er al-Asfer’, which means ‘yellow bird’ in Arabic because of the color of my hair. When I took that as my new name she thought it was because of her but, the truth was, it reminded me of my dad.” She smiled slightly, her focus returning as she spoke, “He got me a canary when I was ten and every time I’d hear my new name it was like I still had a piece of my family with me.”

“That’s nice,” Tam said with a compassionate look. “Why ‘Black Canary’ and not just ‘Canary’ then.”

“Well, to be honest it just sounded kind of bad-ass,” Sara joked even though there was still a shadow behind her eyes.

Felicity knew the truth about why Sara chose the handle she did. One night over alcohol fueled revelations she had confessed that the name ‘Black Canary’ was chosen as a form of punishment. It was a reminder, not only of the family she had left behind, but also of the fact that the girl she had been when she boarded the Queen’s Gambit was dead and in her place stood a killer, a woman who was the exact opposite of the innocent young girl she had once been. After she reconnected with her family she began to refer to herself as just ‘Canary’ instead. Felicity had taken it to mean that she was, at long last, finally beginning to heal and let go of the past.

If anyone deserved a clean slate, it was Sara.

“I don’t know if I can think of anything meaningful to base a codename on,” Felicity said drawing Tam’s attention back to her so Sara would have time recover from the invading memories. “Until I got involved with Bruce and Oliver I never really did anything; my life was fairly boring.”

“I know that can’t be true,” Sara snorted.

“No, she was really boring. Seriously,” Tam said flatly.

“Thank you,” Felicity shot back.

“Sorry Baby, but it’s true,” Tam said pertly. “I thought for sure you’d wind up as a crazy cat lady if you didn’t break out of the rut you were in.”

“What rut?” Sara asked.

Before Felicity could object Tam answered, “Baby has always been kind of a social disaster area. Seriously; I used to have to drag her from the house kicking and screaming. She never went to any parties, never dated anybody; I’m telling you, if Bruce hadn’t taken the initiative in the Batcave she’d still be a hopeless virgin trapped in a love triangle with Ben and Jerry.”

“It can’t have been that bad,” Sara said shaking her head.

“I was a late bloomer,” Felicity muttered.

“Late bloomer my ass,” Tam shot back before turning again to Sara. “It’s like she’d go out of her way to make herself invisible. Half the time when the papers would run a profile on Dad she wouldn’t even be in the picture and, if she did stick around long enough for the photographers, they’d run our names and list her as the ‘unknown friend of the family’.”
“You’re kidding, right?” Sara said, her brow furrowed in consternation. She turned to Felicity, “Is she serious?”

“It’s no big deal,” Felicity said lightly as she adopted a good natured grin. “We used to make a game of it.”

“It’s true,” Tam said as she grabbed a load of Carolina Herrera gowns and skirts off the rack and added all of them onto Felicity’s pile. “These are more your style than mine.”

“Thanks,” Felicity said absentmindedly as she sorted through them.

“What kind of game?” Sara asked.

Tam grinned, “From the time Luke and I hit puberty we were constantly getting into one scandal or another in the press but no one ever seemed to notice Baby.”

“To be fair, you guys were kind of begging for it. Ask Luke about the Ambassador’s daughter some time,” Felicity said ruefully.

“Okay, I mean we were both a little wild,” she conceded, “but the press seemed to be obsessed with everything we did during that whole ‘celebutante’ fad, but Baby was completely off the grid. She was always the well-behaved kid, you know, but it was absolutely ridiculous how she could be standing in the same room with us, sometimes in the same picture, and somehow everyone but us would completely forget she was even there.”

“Was it a race thing?” Sara asked carefully. “You guys are a pretty unusual family; maybe it was a case of indirect racism?”

“We’re not as liberal on the East Coast as the West Coast but that wasn’t it; not all of it anyway,” Tam told her. “Stupid people exist here, yeah, but this is Gotham; one of the most culturally diverse cities in the world. We know a lot of racially blended families and they have no problems getting the names right when they do stories on them. Heck, Noah Cedars, head of WayneTech, is Jewish, gay, married to a black guy from the Netherlands who is half is age, and they adopted two Chinese girls and a little boy from Haiti; talk about diversity! No, it was all Baby. She has a magic power like Harry Potter and his invisibility cloak only it’s Felicity Fox and her uncanny ability to turn into a wallflower.”

“I wouldn’t go that far,” Felicity objected.

“It’s true,” Tam said, ignoring her. “Dad used to point to Baby and say, ‘Why can’t you two keep out of trouble like your little sister does?’ and Luke and I would argue that if Baby had her own paparazzi she’d get in trouble all the time, too.”

Felicity sighed, “So it became a standing gag after that.” She shook her head and muttered, “The two of them just love making up these completely off the wall games. They can’t pick anything normal to amuse themselves with like Monopoly; no, it has to be this elaborate points system crap no one else but them can even understand much less win.”

Her sister grinned evilly. “We had a paparazzi points system for one entire summer and the person with the lowest points had to buy the other two take out for a whole month,” Tam told her.

“And considering how much Luke eats, that can quickly add up to a small fortune, let me tell you,” Felicity grumbled.

“What kind of points system?” Sara asked.
Tam smiled brightly, “Every time they brought up Luke’s scandal with the Ambassador’s daughter or the time he beat up that lacrosse player he’d get a hundred points, two hundred if they used the phrase ‘Bad Boy of Gotham, Lusty Luke Fox’, and a thousand points if they brought up the fact that he was graduating early from MIT with honors.”

Felicity tilted her head towards her sister, “Every time they’d mention the name of some former child star or rock musician Tam was supposedly dating she’d get a hundred points, two hundred if they speculated on any tattoos or piercings in, shall we say, intimate areas, and a thousand points if they brought up the fact that she spoke five languages, graduated at the top of her class at Sarah Lawrence with degrees in Public Relations and Marketing, and received a masters in Film from La Fémis in Paris.”

“And anytime they even mentioned Felicity’s name, even if it was just to list her as a member of the family, she got 10,000 points,” Tam said. “Guess how many points she ended up with by the end of the summer?”

“How many?” Sara asked.

“Zero,” Felicity sighed.

“Really?” Sara frowned.

“No big deal,” she said lightly. “Trust me; I had no desire to be followed around by a mob of reporters with flash bulbs going off in my face all the time.”

But Sara wasn’t laughing, “That’s not funny. Why didn’t your dad say anything to the reporters doing the articles?”

“He did,” Tam told her. “He used to get mad as a hornet whenever it would happen and demand a retraction. When Newsweek ran that whole ‘Businessman’s Businessman’ thing again a few years ago and said that dad had two children instead of three, he about lost his shit over it. He called Jim Impoco personally and threatened to pull all of Wayne Enterprises and their subsidiaries advertising because of it.”

“What happened?” Sara asked.

Tam shrugged, “Baby told him to let it go.”

“Why?”

“It wasn’t worth it,” Felicity answered. “Besides, if I had grown up splashed all over Page Six there’s no way I could have ever stayed under the radar. I wouldn’t have been able to work for Bruce or Oliver’s missions because everyone would be too busy reporting my every movement and how the ‘other’ Fox heiress was spotted hanging around the ‘Bad Boy Billionaires’. Not to mention the fact that she’d be hounded with the whole ‘daughter of the bleach blonde husband stealing Vegas cocktail waitress’ shtick, something that was always bound to come up eventually.

“I suppose that makes sense,” Sara said doubtfully. “Is that why you never told the rest of the team who your family was?”
“Wait, you didn’t even mention me?” Tam swung around with a hurt expression on her face.

“Only to Sara and her father but I did tell Oliver about you guys after dad showed up,” Felicity told her. “And, to be honest, I didn’t intentionally hide anything to begin with, I just never brought it up and no one ever asked.”

“Really?” Sara and Tam both looked at her.

“Ollie never asked about your family at all?” Sara said disbelievingly. “Not once?”

“Why would he?” Felicity snorted.

“Because even when we were together he seemed to have such a soft spot for you,” Sara told her. “To tell you the truth, I was kind of jealous for a while there.”

“Yeah well, other than our one utter disaster of a night together there was never anything personal between me and Oliver,” she assured her. “I was just another piece of equipment lying around the Lair for the most part.”

Sara looked like she was about to object when Tam broke in, “Speaking of stupid men in masks; so is it over between you and Bruce or are you just punishing him a little?”

Felicity sat heavily on top of a large steamer trunk and shrugged half-heartedly, “I don’t know. On one hand, he had a real breakthrough and actually admitted how he felt for once but, on the other hand, he still thinks of me as this helpless little doll he has to pack in cotton wool, you know? It’s like he doesn’t respect my skills or acknowledge the fact that I’ve grown since the last time we were together. He wants me to just fall in line and blindly obey him like a good little wifey-poo.” She scowled, “I’m just not willing to do that, sorry.”

“He’s an ass,” Tam said dismissively. “All masks are asses—present company excluded.” Tam held out a hanger with an unstructured tan suede jacket, white open necked shirt, and olive slacks. “How do you feel about Brunello Cucinelli again?”

Felicity pulled a face, “I like his cashmere but hate everything else. Some people can wear it but I always wind up looking like a Scottish bag lady in his clothes.”

“Sara?” She offered.

The other woman looked at it speculatively, “Eh, okay. I can always give it to Sin. She’s a couple of sizes larger than I am but that looks like it’s on the baggy side.”

“I don’t even know why I stole that outfit to begin with,” Tam said handing it over. “I think it just got swept up in the rush.” She picked another labeled garment bag and held it up, “Burberry?”

Felicity immediately held up her hand then paused, “Wait; Prorsum, London, or Brit?”

Tam unzipped the bag and peeked inside, “Prorsum.”

“Give it to Sara,” she told her.

“Hey, unlike you I’m not that picky,” Sara said reaching for it. “Nice,” she nodded.

“I’m just more into their coats than the clothes,” Felicity told her. “Although their sweaters are nice, too.”

“You and your freaking sweaters; I wonder if there’s a rehab for people who have an addiction to designer cashmere and Donna Karan? What about this Alice+Olivia dress?” She held up the deep green sixties style sheath dress for her inspection.

“No green,” Felicity said looking at it regrettfully. “At least not that shade of green.”

“Why not?” Tam asked with a frown as she looked at it again. “This is totally your thing and it would go great with your coloring.”

“I can’t,” Felicity said uncomfortably.

“Oliver,” Sara said, recognizing the similarity between the color of the dress and the Arrow’s leathers.

“So?” Tam said with a snort. “A) He’s not here and B) you could wear it as a sort of homage to Team Arrow.”

“Yeah, that’s nice in theory but Oliver doesn’t exactly wear green because he likes that color,” Felicity said quietly, busying herself by sorting through another rack of clothes and pulling out a couple of nice Gucci pantsuits. She really needed to start wearing pants, especially if this weather didn’t let up soon. It was nineteen degrees that morning and, thanks to an arctic air mass sweeping down from Canada, it felt like minus ten degrees Fahrenheit instead.

God, she missed summer.

“Come to think of it, I’ve never once seen you wear green,” Sara said thoughtfully.

“I figured it would be too much like rubbing salt in old wounds,” she shrugged. “Maybe that’s just stupid, I don’t know. I doubt Oliver would have noticed if I wore it or not. I sincerely doubt he’s ever noticed anything I wore; I probably could’ve walked into the Lair naked some days and he wouldn’t have batted an eyelash.”

“I sincerely doubt that,” Sara said wryly. “Still, for the record, whether or not Ollie ever got his head out of his butt long enough to notice your deliciously naked bootyliciousness, I would have noticed big time.”

“You’re just going for the Fox Family Naked Scrabble Triple Word Score,” she snorted.

“Oh, I’m gonna get there, don’t you worry,” Sara said with a toothy grin. “Speaking of which, just to put it out there, I can trace the entire Russian alphabet backwards with my tongue.”

Tam smirked at her coquettishly, “Tak mozhet ya. Only I can do it in five languages,” she leaned in slightly, “fluently.”

Sara blinked at her, her mouth parted slightly, “I’m so moving here.”

She winked at her then turned back to her sister, “Sure? Last chance?” Felicity waved her off and Tam rolled her eyes at her, “Well, whatever,” Tam said, putting it on her rack. “I don’t give a crap about stupid Oliver and his hang-ups so I’m keeping it.” She grabbed a few more garment bags, “More Diane Von Furstenberg for Sara and some Lela Rose for Felicity,” Tam said tossing yet more bags their way.

“Wait,” Sara said, holding out her hand in a gesture of defeat. “There is no way I can take all this with me back to Starling. I mean, I don’t even have enough shoes for all this stuff!”

“That’s in the next unit across the hall,” Tam said distractedly as she looked over an entire rack of Stella McCartney. “I can’t believe I forgot I had this.”

Felicity peeked over her own rack to see what she was looking at, “Ooh, can I have--?”

“No,” Tam told her. “All for me.”

“Greedy,” she muttered.

“Vince?” Tam called out.

“Sara,” Felicity told her.

“Wait, I...ooh, more leather?” Sara said reaching to take it before she stopped herself. “No, seriously, what am I going to do with all of this?”

“Rent a storage unit?” Felicity said under her breath.

“Baby already said you could leave some of it at the penthouse,” Tam told her. “Hey, Valentino?”

Felicity shook her head, “Too fussy for me. All the beading weighs a ton and it looks like a tablecloth after a bunch of kindergarteners finish with their arts and crafts projects.”

“You have no taste,” Tam said placing it on the charity pile. “I swear I don’t know where I ever went wrong with you but at least the Foundation will appreciate it.”

“I thought we were being anti-Bat; how can you still move in if you’re giving him the cold shoulder?” Sara said with a frown.

“We are but I’m keeping the penthouse this time,” Felicity said as she looked over a colorful chiffon halter top maxi dress and added it to her ever-growing pile. “I need it as my base of operations if I’m going to be handling this alone while you’re away and, besides, he pissed me off.”

“He actually told you that you weren’t allowed to pursue this even though they’ve been operating under his nose for how long?” Tam said pulling a face.

“Wait; was that an Emilio Pucci?” Tam said catching sight of the chiffon on top of Felicity’s stack. “I call dibs!”

“Too late,” she told her.

“There’s no way you’ll ever wear that,” Tam said with a stubborn set to her jaw. “You hate maxi-dresses; you keep saying they make you look like Dumpy the Eighth Dwarf.”

“Fine,” she told her, “but in exchange I get some of that Stella McCartney, all of the Oscar de la Renta, the Michael Kors, and the Ralph Lauren and you can have the Emilio Pucci, the Naeem Khan, the Chloe, and the Christian Siriano.”

“You can have the Stella blazers and one dress but yes to everything else except the Siriano,” Tam said with a shudder. “What is with that guy and ruffles anyway? There’s only like one decent dress in his whole collection. Put all that stuff in the section for the Foundation people.”

“Project Runway was a blight on the universe,” Felicity said in agreement.

“Is Bruce going to be okay with you keeping the apartment?” Sara asked.
“If I know Bruce, and I do,” Felicity said slowly, “he’ll insist on it. Having me in his penthouse will make him feel as though I’m still under his protection and that he’s keeping an eye on me when, in reality, we’re going to stage a coup and take over the alternate Batcave for our own purposes.”

“We?” Tam said perking up. “Me too?”

“All of us,” Felicity told her. “Me, you, Sara, and Barbara and, if he can be turned, Tim. I think I made some pretty good headway with that yesterday.”

“Tim’s not a problem,” Tam said dryly. “I’ll just tell him to do it and he’ll fall in line. What’s the plan? After all, Tim and Barbara are already on their way to Starling; how much help can they be?”

“Luke said he’s going down there as well just for a day or two,” Sara spoke up. “He said he wants to check out the situation down there before he leaves for Africa in a couple more weeks but I have a feeling he’s sticking around for me,” she said with a satisfied grin. “The minute I told him I was heading down there he said he could use a few days of sunny Starling Weather so he hopped the jet with them this morning.”

“Tell me about it; sunshine isn’t exactly easy to come by these days. I swear I saw a pigeon frozen to the sidewalk on the way over here,” she grumbled. “They offered to take you, too right?” Felicity asked.

“Yeah, but I wanted to help you guys go through all this stuff first. Plus, I wanted the scoop on your angry revenge sex with Batman.”

Felicity shot Tam a look, “Really?”

“What? I called her after you so rudely hung up on me yesterday,” she said with a shrug. “Who else am I going to talk about this stuff? Tim was pouting and hiding in the bathroom, Barbara is good for a gossip but I figured she’d be busy getting ready to leave, and I felt the need for girl talk. Speaking of which, hey Sara; I’ll trade you that Versace for some Ralph Rucci.”

“I’m keeping the Versace,” Sara told her. “This is totally me; just look at it.” She held it against herself. “Crop tops, black leather, and lots of hardware? Totally mine.”

“We’ve created a monster,” Tam told Felicity in mock dismay.

“This one is strong with the Force,” Felicity agreed. “If you want Versace you can have this one as long as I can have those two L’Wren Scott dresses you have on your rack over there.”

“All of the clothes you like look the same,” Tam chided her even as she handed over the armload of clothes. “By the way, there’s some more non-green Alice+Olivia and a few Dolce & Gabbana’s in that pile because I know how much you love your A-line skirts and sweater sets.”

“You make fun but I have a style that works for me,” Felicity sniffed in mock disdain.

“More like classic and feminine,” she retorted.

“So what would you call my style?” Sara asked them.

“Butch,” they both said at the same time.

“Really?” Sara said with a squeak. “You think I’m butch?”
“Not really,” Felicity conceded. “More like um…”

“Lipstick Leather Princess,” Tam finished for her.

“I guess that’s better than butch,” Sara shrugged. “So what exactly did happen with you and Bruce, what’s our game plan, and what the hell is wrong with this coat?” She said holding out a shaggy cream colored Lanvin fake fur at arm’s length as though it could attack at any moment.

“Oh no,” Felicity said looking at it and immediately waving her off. “Not it.”

“Yeah,” Tam said cringing. “At the time I thought it looked kind of interesting and 70’s kitschy but now it just looks a little too abominable snowman; on a positive note though it is fake fur.”

“Of course it’s fake; it looks like you skinned a muppet,” Felicity snorted.

“Stick it in the Foundation pile,” Tam told her. “Okay, back to the game plan.”

“Tomorrow morning the decorator is coming by the penthouse to present the designs. I want you,” she turned to Tam, “to take over that for me while I stop by Orbital and make friends.”

“I get to be in charge of the decorating?” Tam asked wide-eyed. “Oh thank GOD! Now maybe the place will actually be livable; what else?”

Felicity gave her a nasty look, “Okay, thanks for that, by the way. I do have taste you know.”

“Bruce is paying for this right?” Tam said in a superior tone.

She scowled, “Yeah, so?”

“He’s like the seventh richest guy in the world and I bet you picked some kind of shabby chic ‘decorate on the cheap’ theme using recycled materials and front porch antiques because you didn’t want to spend too much,” she said knowingly.

Felicity’s lips tightened in consternation, “Actually, as of last year he’s the fourth richest guy in the world and shabby chic is very in right now.”

“So you say,” she snorted.

Felicity gave her sister a withering glare, “As I was saying, Bruce will undoubtedly show up and try to intimidate you into revealing my location but you won’t because the Fox sisters have a natural immunity against all things grim and Bat. Oh, and don’t go overboard with the decorating thing despite the fact that a billionaire is footing the bill,” she said shooting her another dirty look. “If you don’t like my ideas, fine; but I want to get moved in as soon as the paint dries. In fact, I’m moving in tonight, at least for a while, so try to get them to use something low-odor on the walls, okay? And try to get it done fast; that means no customized furniture or anything that will keep us out of there for months—and no modern! You already know how much I hate that crap so don’t even try to convince me that modern contemporary doesn’t count. You can have full reign except in the master bedroom and the office. At the very least, I want to keep the bed, chest, and armoire in the master suite and no going into the office period since that’s the secret entrance to the Felicity Cave.”

“The Felicity Cave?” Sara repeated slowly.

“Barbara has a cool clock tower inside the original Wayne Building in Old Gotham so I get a Felicity Cave,” she told her.
“Barbara lives in a clock tower, too?” Sara said with a bemused grin. “Woman after my own heart. Clock towers aren’t exactly easy to come by, you know,” she frowned. “Stupid ARGUS blew mine up, damn it.”

“Since Lyla blew it up in order to save my ass as I was being chased by a mob of enraged supersoldiers, I’m not complaining,” Felicity told her.

“Hey wait, why do you get the master suite?” Tam objected, completely ignoring the ‘enraged mob’ comment as it had nothing to do with her. “Shouldn’t we flip for it or draw straws?”

“I get the master because A) I’m sleeping with Bruce and it’s his penthouse B) My stuff is already in there and C) We both know that I can’t keep my legs closed around him for more than a couple of days at a time and he’s going to want to do it in his own bed,” she said rolling her eyes. “Zander, that’s the decorator, can add a few pieces or take some away but leave those three pieces alone. And no touching any of the clothes in there until we’ve sorted out all of these storage units once and for all!” She sighed and looked around at the mess they had barely even touched even though they’d been in there most of the morning already. It was going to take several days of going back and forth before they would be ready to call Mama T’s assistant and have her send another van to pick up the rest for the charity drive.

“Fine; besides, now that we’re going to be living together your closet is my closet anyway. Anything specific you want other than the bed and dressers or can I really go hog wild as long as I keep them on schedule?” She asked.

Felicity thought about what her sister’s version of ‘hog wild’ might entail and a chill ran down her spine. “No, forget I said anything about you having free reign. That’s too much power for you to hold over the rest of us. Zander mentioned a kind of eclectic blend of Tuscan and Southern Elegance; do that,” she told her. “On your bedroom though, go wild.”

“I don’t care what you do to my bedroom as long as I have a place to lay my head and my own bathroom,” Sara told her when Tam turned inquisitively in her direction. “I’m easy,” she added with a flirtatious wink.

“Good to know,” Tam said, returning the flirt. “Tuscan eclectic, huh?” She wrinkled her nose at the idea, “Eh, I guess I can work with that. We’ll see, but I’m not promising anything,” she said then cut Felicity off before she could argue. “What do you want me to tell Bruce specifically?”

“Just tell him I had another appointment somewhere and leave it at that. If he asks for an address tell him you don’t know where it’s located or what I’m doing exactly, only that I asked you to do me a favor.”

“But I don’t know where it’s located or what you’re doing there,” she blinked.

“Exactly, so it shouldn’t be all that hard to pull it off,” Felicity said wryly.

“Are you going to be okay going in alone?” Sara asked, her expression going from casual to all business.

“I can’t take tech in there but I’ll set up an alert on Watchtower if I don’t check in within a certain time period. It’ll have my location and all the specifics attached and it’ll go straight to Bruce and ping the rest of your phones plus the LAIR.”

“We’ll be in Starling though,” Sara frowned. “I won’t be able to get to you if something goes wrong and, even if Ollie can scramble a jet, we’re still talking five or six hours at least.”
“I have backups to my backups,” Felicity waved her concerns away with a note of resignation. “If you get the alert and I can’t be reached then call Barry in Central City and have him go all Flash, but only as a last resort. He has his own deal and Bruce will not be happy to have yet another mask on his turf but needs must and all that. He can be in Gotham in a matter of minutes if he puts on the speed.”

“Barry?” Tam asked, perking up suddenly.

“The Flash,” Sara answered for her. “He’s a sort of ex of your sister’s from Central City.”

“The meta guy who runs fast?” Tam asked in high-pitched surprise.

“He’s not an ex,” Felicity clarified. “We danced one time at a party of Oliver’s and he didn’t even ask me out; Oliver asked him out for me and we just both happened to be there.”

“How many masked heroes do you know anyway?” Tam snorted.

“I don’t know,” she sighed. “They just keep popping up out of the woodwork. I think I’m cursed or something.”

“You know, seriously though, that thing you told Bruce about how you were really the Arrow and you recruited all these vigilantes into some kind of super hero team? You could really do that; like for real,” Tam said in earnest.

“That’s…not a bad idea,” Sara said slowly. “Kind of like the League of Assassins only with vigilantes.”

“Yeah right,” Felicity snorted. “I could call it the Super Friends or, better yet, The Justice League, and we could get Tam to do all of our PR when she isn’t running around in her Vixen costume. We could fund it all by marketing the team’s likenesses on lunch boxes, action figures, and Saturday morning cartoon shows for the kiddies because what cop is going to arrest the hero his kid dressed like for Halloween?”

Tam and Sara stared at her then at each other.

“I know she was just joking but, is it just me, or did that sound like a really good idea?” Sara asked quietly.

“A way to network all the known vigilantes together while generating income and positive press in support of their missions? In addition to everything else I’m pretty sure Felicity is a marketing savant,” Tam agreed.

“Can we please get back to the subject at hand?” Felicity told them. She turned to Sara, “Can you be back by Wednesday?”

“Barring any complications, sure,” Sara agreed.

“Starting Wednesday you’re going in with me to the OO facility and act as my back up. On the off-chance Bruce hunts you down and confronts you, just be honest with him even if it burns me; he’s a living lie detector and he doesn’t react well to people outside his circle of trust to begin with. I’d rather have you lay it all on the line than risk you getting hurt or placed permanently on his shit list. As for tomorrow, try to give me at least a day to gather intel and then I’ll go back to Bruce with what I have and, in case I do miss my check-in, tell Barb to call in the Calvary. After I text you the all clear then you can tell Tim.” She sighed, “Tim knows about all of this but I told him I wouldn’t go in without back up. What I didn’t tell him was my backup is Tam.”
“Hey, I kick major butt as back up,” Tam said confidently. “I’ve saved Tim’s bacon a few times, thank you.”

Sara nodded, “What about Luke and the rest?”

“Luke is almost as overprotective as Bruce,” Felicity agreed. “Let me gather my intel and work on Bruce and then we’ll deal with the rest of them. Meantime I’m going to teach Tam how to operate Watchtower as my alternate.”

“You know computers, too?” Sara asked in surprise.

“Well, I am a Fox and I’m sleeping with a computer prodigy/mask who happens to also be the son of Batman,” Tam shrugged. “I was never as into tech as Luke and Felicity but I can do what needs to be done. I’m no hacker but I can read a computer screen and use a headset at least. It’s just making phone calls, right; kind of like a superhero switchboard operator or Skype?”

“I’ll work on making the alternate Watchtower as user friendly as I can,” Felicity said to avoid directly commenting on her sister’s computer savvy or lack thereof. “After the decorators leave she’ll patch into Watchtower and connect with Barb; that will be your signal. Hopefully I’ll be with her, if not then you guys need to scramble.”

“I still don’t know if I like this plan,” Sara said grimly.

“It’s just recon,” Felicity told her. “Besides, if they were going to do anything to me they would have done it last week when I was completely alone in this.”

“Again, that was a bonehead move, by the way,” Sara reiterated.

“I lived and it’s done; now we just need to keep Bruce off my ass long enough for me to get inside,” Felicity told her.

“Fine,” Sara said but she could tell she wasn’t happy about it.

“I’ll be okay, Sara,” Felicity repeated confidently. “I’ve got this.”

“If you say so,” she sighed.

Tam chose that moment to decide it was time for a change of subject, “Now that the hero stuff is out of the way I want some sexy details on Bruce. We all got to hear what an asshat he can be, so when do we get to hear about the neck down?”

Sara held up her hand, suddenly perking up, “Seconded!”

Felicity flushed, “The last thing I want to do right now is discuss Bruce; especially a naked Bruce.”

“Details! Details! Details!” Both women began to chant together.

“Oh my God, it’s like you’re both still in high school or something,” Felicity said shaking her head.

“Come on, let’s go look through the next unit for shoes and accessories and then we’ll get the scoop on the Bat,” Tam said, “And the rest of Bruce too for that matter.”

“Good one,” Sara snorted giving her a high five as she followed them out dragging her own two full racks of clothes behind her.
“I hate you,” Felicity said as she struggled to drag her booty into the corridor as well. “Both of you.”

Several minutes later all three women were on their hands and knees rooting around several sealed plastic containers filled to the brim with designer footwear, scarves, and even more clothing.

“You could open your own store, I swear,” Sara said shaking her head as she looked around the unit.

“The opening my own store thing is a good idea; the only problem is that all the clothes are fours and the shoes are all a size six,” Tam said with a crooked smile. “Talk about a limited consumer base.”

“Do I even want to know how much these cost or should I just throw them in my pile and live in blissful ignorance?” Sara asked she looked down at the Valentino studded boots she was wearing.

“Don’t ask,” Felicity advised her. “Just keep telling yourself it was free.”

“That’s what I do,” Tam said as she slipped on a strappy pair of Prada’s. “Okay Baby, now talk.”

“Fine, what do you want to know?” She grumbled.

“Oh, I know!” Sara piped up. “Who’s better in the sack; Ollie or Bruce?”

“Yes!” Tam squealed. “Talk!”

Felicity flushed a deep crimson and looked from one woman to the other before settling her gaze on her sister, “Why do you care; you’ve never even met Oliver!”

“But I’ve seen pictures!” She told her, “Plus, I’m heading down there sooner or later and it would be nice to get a feel for the lay of the land, if you know what I mean.”

“What about Tim?” Felicity pointed out archly.

“Buzzkil,” Tam said sticking out her tongue. “Besides I didn’t say I’d do anything,” Tam grumbled, “I just have a very fertile imagination.”

“Well, I have slept with Ollie, a lot, and I want to know if I should be giving my girl here some friendly competition when it comes to Mr. Tall, Dark, and Nocturnal,” Sara said with a grin.

“If you want Bruce, go for it,” Felicity said off-handedly as she was obviously just kidding.

“You are so full of shit!” Sara snorted, not buying it for a second. “Now tell; who’s better?”

Felicity closed her eyes and sighed heavily, her cheeks burning like she had a third degree sunburn, “I can’t believe I’m doing this,” she muttered. “Okay, well, where should I start?”

“I vote we start with size and move on from there,” Tam said with a smarmy grin.

“Oh hell yes!” Sara laughed. “Which flies straighter; Bruce’s Bat or Ollie’s Arrow?”

“God!” Felicity whined as she rubbed her cheeks in mortification. “Actually, they’re pretty much the same size, you know, down there.”

“Really?” Sara said her grin getting even wider if that was even possible.

“Is that good?” Tam asked Sara.

Sara bit her lip and nodded, “Oh yeah.”
“Really?” Tam said roundly as she gave her sister a tongue touched smile. “Baby, you’ve been holding out. So are they completely alike or are there subtle differences?”

“Well,” she cleared her throat nervously, “Um, you know how Bruce was born at his family’s home in Scotland?”

“Bruce is Scottish?” Sara asked in surprise. “I always thought he was American.”

“She goes from talking about his dick to Scotland and that’s the first question you ask?” Tam said, throwing Sara an incredulous look before turning back to her sister. “Are you trying to throw us off with a ramble or is there a point to that non sequitur you just threw out there?”

“There’s a point,” Felicity said, her face flaming. She turned to Sara, “He is American but his mom went into early labor while they were at his great-uncle’s funeral which was in Scotland. Anyway, you know how in the UK they generally don’t, um…” she bit her lip and looked downwards pointedly.

“Don’t what?” Tam asked in confusion.

“Oh, I get it,” Sara said with a slow, filthy grin.

“Get what?” Tam repeated.

“The pig is still in the blanket,” Sara told her.

“Oh. Oh!” Tam said with a toothy grin. “Oh, those are fun! I always did like a guy with a little extra. So I take it that Oliver…?”

“The weenie is out of the bun,” Sara answered.

“What else is different?” Tam asked eager for more details.

“I don’t know! It’s not like I spent a lot of time looking at that stuff,” Felicity told her. “I mean, I’ve obviously looked at their…stuff, but I was a little too busy to notice a whole lot of details and I wasn’t exactly carrying a tape measure at the time. Besides, I was only with Oliver one night and I’ve only been with Bruce a few times since I’ve been back, so…”

“Wait, what do you mean you haven’t spent a lot of time looking at that stuff?” Sara asked in confusion. “Didn’t you, you know, take a trip down town?”

Before Felicity could answer Tam butted in, “She hasn’t done that yet.”

“Never?” Sara asked, her jaw dropping in surprise.

“Nope,” Tam said shaking her head.

“I haven’t exactly gotten around to it yet, that’s all,” Felicity said defensively. “It’s just that every time I’ve, you know, been with someone I haven’t had a chance to go there.”

“But they went down on you, right?” Sara asked with raised eyebrows.

“Yes,” Felicity breathed as she busied herself by rooting through another box of shoes.

“Then what’s the hold up?” She asked. “I mean, if there is one thing Ollie makes time for it’s getting head.”
“I just...it’s just...” she stammered.

“She’s scared,” Tam said as she tossed Sara a pair of spiked Christian Louboutins.

“I’m not scared,” Felicity said quickly, “it’s just that there’s a lot of...technical things to work through and I just haven’t had a chance to put any of them into practice yet.”

“Technical things?” Sara asked in bemusement. “There’s nothing really all that technical about it, Cutie. You just open wide and in goes the choo choo.”

Tam began to snort from her corner and Felicity flushed an even angrier shade of red. “It’s just, I read this book—”

“Oh God, I wish I had never given you that thing,” Tam muttered under her breath ruefully.

She glared at her sister as she continued, “And it talked about how you’re supposed to do all of this stuff simultaneously with your mouth, your tongue, and your hands and it’s just...”

“Just?” Sara prompted.

“You know how when you’re a kid there’s this thing you do where you pat your head and rub your tummy at the same time?” Felicity asked her. “I could never figure out how to do that.”

For two whole beats there was absolute silence and then both Sara and Tam began to laugh so hard their eyes were watering.

“It’s not funny,” Felicity whined. “It’s just—I’ve never really been all that coordinated...”

After the hilarity had died down to a few stray snickers and chuckles Sara asked, her mascara running slightly as she wiped her eyes with her hands, “Okay, I can see that. Fine,” she snickered again then got herself back under control. “So it’s just a matter of timing it right and then psyching yourself up, right?”

“Well...” Felicity started then cringed.

“Well what?” She asked her, eyes sparkling with barely contained amusement.

“I read this other book...”

“Oh God,” Tam groaned, hiding her head in her hands.

Again Felicity glared at her sister, “And in it they mentioned the, um, taste.”

“The taste?” Sara repeated with great effort.

“They kept saying it tasted like bitter almonds,” she said reluctantly.

“And?” Sara prompted.

“Don’t say it, don’t say it, don’t say it,” Tam muttered under her breath as she held her hand over her eyes.

“I’m allergic to nuts.”

Sara nearly fell over and Tam began to gasp for air as they both howled with great sobs of laughter.
Felicity just shook her head and grimaced at both of them, “I mean, logically I know it’s not really, you know, nuts,” the two women’s laughter reached heretofore unknown peaks of ensuing hilarity, “but part of me is scared it might trigger something anyway. After all, I didn’t know about the nut allergy until the thing with the pot brownie and then that happened as soon as I put it in my mouth-.” At this point the two women were both on the floor and beating the ground with their fists or clutching at their clothes for air.

“Stop talking!” Sara gasped out. “Please stop! I can’t take anymore!”

“Oh my God!” Tam was wailing.

“I hate you both,” Felicity said with a pout.

It took several more minutes to calm down before either Tam or Sara could speak again. “Okay,” Sara said, obviously more in control then she had been the first time, “Let’s just skip that part and move on.”

“Yeah,” Tam said wiping her eyes with a silk scarf, “Here’s a good one: Who gives better Cookie Monster; Oliver or Bruce?”

“Oliver,” Sara said before Felicity could answer.

“How do you know?” Tam asked her.

“I know,” Sara said roundly. “Oliver Queen is a lesbian trapped in a man’s body. He not only can find the little man in the boat, but he can steer into the rapids faster than anyone I have ever known; man or woman, with the exception of Nyssa.” She sighed, “Talk about the cat that ate the Canary; that woman was magic in the sack.”

“Is she right?” Tam asked.

“I never had sex with Nyssa,” she hedged.

“No doh! I meant about Oliver,” Tam snorted.

Felicity’s mouth fell open as she looked from one woman to another but no sound came out.

“You’re kidding,” Sara breathed. “Really?”

Felicity cringed slightly under her intense scrutiny.

“Bruce?” Tam said all agog. “Seriously?”

“Well,” Felicity said clearing her throat, “not that it wasn’t good with Oliver! It was very, very good with both of them! I just… I mean with him it was just the one time and Bruce, um… he’s done it… more.”

“More?” Tam repeated. “What do you mean, ‘more’?”

“I just mean that Bruce, um,” she blushed crimson, “I guess you could say that since he’s had more time to map things out since we’ve been together more often that he already knows which, um, buttons to push… so to speak.”

“She does have a point,” Tam said with a frown. “Sure, I sometimes miss the thrill of a quickie with a stranger but at least with Tim he already knows exactly what curls my toes. It saves time so you can just get your cookie, clean up, and go to sleep afterwards; easy peasy, slick and sleazy, you
“I still can’t believe someone out there has dethroned Oliver ‘Cunnilingus’ Queen,” Sara said shaking her head in amazement. “I’ve been with women who know less about female anatomy than that man. I mean, it’s not just technical skill; he also gets major points for style as well.”

“What do you mean?” Tam asked eagerly.

Sara’s voice dropped to a confidential level as she turned to Tam, “He does this thing where he just takes his time. I mean, he can spend hours just going down on someone and never come up for air. I swear to God, it’s just this slow, unrelenting oral assault.”

“Huh,” Felicity said, thinking back to her own all too similar experience.

“But he gives good cookie, right?” Tam asked. “I mean, it’s not all corn on the cob down there. You know, all teeth and rawr rawr rawr!” She said holding her hands up like claws and gnashing her teeth.

“No,” she said firmly. “I’ve been with some real weed whackers in my time but that man knows how to trim a bush the right way. He has this thing where he starts off slow, I mean really slow; like this almost maddening pace then, just when you think you’re going to scream, he gets down and dirty with it.”

“How dirty?” Tam said, scooting closer.

“Nasty dirty,” she told her. “He likes to switch it up and just talk, I mean talk, as he goes from laid back to all dominant.”

“Ooh, he likes to talk dirty? I love dirty talk,” Tam said eagerly as she bit her lip. “Is he all ‘Say my name!’ and ‘Who’s the dirty girl?’ or what?”

“More like he wants to hear you tell him what he’s doing to you. Not like feedback or anything; he doesn’t make you feel like you have to fill out a survey card afterwards. It’s more like ‘tell me what I’m doing; say it’ and ‘tell me what you want’; that kind of thing. He loves hearing the person he’s with talk dirty and if you stop he kind of holds out until you give him what he wants. It’s actually pretty kinky the way he does it,” she hummed happily. “It always curls my toes, let me tell you.”

“That’s so weird,” Felicity said looking at Sara with a mixture of fascination and, not jealousy, but some other strange emotion she didn’t yet have a word for. “What you just described is exactly what he did with me.”

“Yeah, Ollie has his routine pretty much down pat,” she told her. “I mean, don’t get me wrong, it works, but when the man finds something he likes and does well he doesn’t mess with it. What about Bruce; is he a creature of habit or does he go with the flow so to speak?” Sara asked.

Felicity cleared her throat, “Well,” she took a centering breath, “he’s…intense, I suppose you could say.”

“Oh yeah, I can totally see that,” Tam said roundly.

“It’s never really the same way twice with him and he’s really rough and forceful most of the time, but in a good way. Oliver kisses a lot more and takes more time than Bruce does but with Bruce the sex is…” She wrinkled her nose, “more intimate, I guess; which is weird because Oliver talks more and cuddled afterwards but Bruce…I don’t know how to put it. With Oliver it was intense but it was like he was totally in control the whole time. With Bruce it’s the complete opposite. He’s always so in control everywhere else but when we’re together it’s like I get to finally see what’s going on underneath the surface. He’s just so raw and open and it feels like… for that one moment in time, for just an instant, it’s like he lets go and the walls come tumbling down.” She looked down at her feet as she struggled to find the right words, her brow furrowed in thought, “It’s like he’s trying to find something; like he’s looking for a safe place and you’re it. I don’t know, I bet that sounds stupid, huh?” She looked up at both women expecting more teasing but instead they were both looking at her with something akin to awe on their faces.

“Wow,” Tam said at last.

“Okay, now I’m totally jealous,” Sara said without so much as a flicker of sarcasm.

“Baby, I hate to tell you this but we’re going to have to go shopping,” Tam said suddenly.

“What?” Both Felicity and Sara looked at her like she was crazy.

“What? I never got around to stealing any wedding dresses,” Tam said easily.

“Wedding dresses?” Felicity said in confusion as Sara began to chuckle softly as she got it.

“She’s saying that not only is that man completely in love with you but you are totally over the moon for him,” Sara said dryly. “Just now, the expression on your face, it was like watching a goddamn epic love story play out in real life.”

“That’s not going to happen,” Felicity denied adamantly.

“Keep telling yourself that, Baby,” Tam said as she leaned forward and patted her arm in sympathy. “Meanwhile, I’m going to start meeting with wedding planners.” She frowned, “Too bad Tim is in Starling; seeing his face later when I walk in with an armload of bridal magazines would have been hilarious.”

“Can I be a bridesmaid?” Sara asked only half-kidding.

“Of course you’re going to be a bridesmaid!” Tam answered for her. “Me, you and Barbara are the bridesmaids and Tim, Dick, and Luke will be the groomsmen. I’ve had this whole thing planned out since the minute she said he asked her to marry him. I already have everything from the colors to the cake picked out in my head.”

Sara and Felicity glanced at each other then back at Tam.

“Not that I’m actually going to marry Bruce, but if it’s my wedding shouldn’t I have some say in it?” Felicity asked.

“No,” Tam told her.

“No?” She asked incredulously.

“No one ever gets the wedding they want,” Tam said seriously. “It’s never about the bride; it’s about the mother of the bride.”

“But you’re her sister,” Sara said dumbly.

“I know that,” Tam said, “but since Baby was my Hanukah gift, that makes me her mom by proxy in this case.”

“Hanukah gift?” Sara asked with a growing grin.
“Please don’t tell this story,” Felicity muttered under her breath.

“Didn’t Baby ever tell you how she got her name?” Tam asked then threw her sister a disgruntled look. “Of course, you never mentioned us.”

“Well, she definitely has the Jewish mom guilt down pat,” Felicity muttered.

“Please tell me the story,” Sara said with a huge evil grin. “Oh pretty please with sugar on top.”

Felicity fixed her with a hard eye, “I hate you; so, so much.”

“I’ll be happy to,” Tam said triumphantly. “When I was four I wanted a baby doll that could walk and talk and do everything a real baby did. Our dad worked with robots and tech stuff so I asked him to build me one. He just laughed at me and said he’d try but that he didn’t think it was possible. Still, he was our dad and I thought he could do anything so I just knew he was going to build me my very own baby. Mom kept telling me that you couldn’t build real babies in a lab and got me a ton of dolls that year hoping I’d let it go but I was convinced that when Dad told us he had a surprise for us and that he wanted us to meet someone special, that he finally built me my baby after all. Well, it was our first Hanukah after our parents split and Luke and I were spending part of the holiday with Dad and Evie, Felicity’s mom. We hadn’t met them yet so when Dad answered the door holding Baby I decided that she was my present right then and there. The minute I saw her I ran up to him and took her out of his arms and told them that she was mine. I wouldn’t even open any of my other presents because I already had my Baby.” She batted her eyes in Felicity’s direction with a toothy grin. “I spent the whole weekend cuddling with her, dressing her up, and playing with her hair and when it came time to go back to Mom’s I threw a fit because they wouldn’t let me take her home with me. It was a total meltdown in the making until Dad promised that ‘Baby’ would be waiting for me when I came back and she’s been stuck with the name ever since, isn’t that right, Baby?”

“And that’s why they call you ‘Baby’?” Sara snickered. “Oh my God, just when I thought you couldn’t get any cuter!”

“I’m happy you find it so amusing; meanwhile I’m the one who had to live with it my entire life. I was almost five before I realized it wasn’t even my real name. My kindergarten teacher kept insisting I write ‘Felicity’ on all of my work and I nearly got expelled because I wrote ‘Baby’ instead of my real name like she told me to.”

“Why would they expel you for that?” Sara asked.

“It wasn’t because she wrote ‘Baby’ on her paper,” Tam told her. “It was what happened after she wrote it that nearly got her expelled.”

“What happened?” Sara asked, intrigued.

Felicity cleared her throat, “I kicked her in the shins, pushed her to the ground, then told her Luke was going to beat her up before stomping out of the classroom so I could go find him. She was kind of mean and a really shitty teacher anyway.” Felicity grumbled. Both women began to laugh at her and she rolled her eyes at them. “You both suck,” she announced flatly.

“Only because we didn’t read the same books you did apparently,” Sara retorted.

Tam snickered as Felicity responded with a rather rude single digit salute.

A couple of hours later, Felicity was dropping off Sara at the private Wayne terminal with a brand new set of luggage in tow.

“Thank your dad again for arranging all of this,” Sara said for like the hundredth time since she and Tam had revealed that Lucius had arranged for Sara to return to Starling City on one of the Wayne Gulfstreams.

“Yeah well, when Tam told him that you were helping us finally clean out her clothes collection he pretty much knew that flying commercial was out of the question,” Felicity said ruefully.

“You know, on one hand I’m sorry that Tam couldn’t come and see me off but I’m kind of glad it’s just us right now,” Sara said, her tone serious as she faced her. “There’s something that’s been bothering me all afternoon and I wanted to say something to you about it but not in front of your sister.”

“What is it?” Felicity asked taking in her friend’s expression.

“Nothing bad,” she assured her. “It’s just that when Tam was telling that story about you disappearing in plain sight and how you had a habit of making people not see you, it really bothered me.”

Felicity smiled, “Tam didn’t mean—”

“Yeah, I know,” she said quickly. “I’m not upset at Tam.”

She frowned, “Who then?”

“You.”

“Me?” Felicity asked in surprise.

Sara nodded, “Do you remember the first time I left Nyssa and joined the team full time?”

“Yeah,” she said carefully.

“You were a little uncomfortable at first because of how much time I was spending with Ollie.” Felicity started to object but Sara held up her hand to stop her, “I know you weren’t jealous of my romantic relationship with Ollie but when Roy and I joined the team it changed the whole dynamic for a while and you started to fade into the background.”

She shrugged half-heartedly, “Oliver was busy and preoccupied with Slade…”

“No, I don’t mean that Ollie pushed you out; I meant that you purposefully took yourself out of the game for a while,” Sara told her. “At the time I was actually a little grateful for that because things between Ollie and I were breaking down fairly quickly and you gave us plenty of room to work through it. The thing is you also…I don’t know how to put it,” she muttered before meeting her gaze fully. “You made yourself disappear. You were still in the room but you felt like a ghost for a while, so much so that we’d forget you were even there when things got crazy. There were even days when the only person you even spoke to was Diggle. Then when things got really bad and Ollie was stressing over Slade and his family you suddenly appeared again. It was like you were a ghost one minute, and in the next you became his light in the darkness; you stepped out of the shadows, took charge, and woke him up.”

She thought back to that dark period when Thea had been kidnapped by Slade and the entire team was under stress and at each other’s throats. “I didn’t do anything; I just told him what he needed to hear to get the job done.”
“No,” she said firmly. “I’m telling you, it was like you weren’t even there and then you seemed to appear out of thin air. Me, Dig, Ollie, and Roy were all going at it and you just faded away from our line of sight. I think we all forgot you were even in the room. Ollie couldn’t see you because he was so focused on the rest of us and on his family, QC, himself, and then you just shrugged off whatever that thing was you cloaked yourself with and stepped out into the light. You spoke and we all just went silent. It was…” she shook her head, “weird. I’m an assassin; I’m trained to know my surroundings at all times, but you nearly made me jump out of my skin. You didn’t yell, you didn’t scream, but Oliver seemed to laser in on you until you were all he could see. I remember seeing that happen; the look on his face. He went from frantic and angry to intense, calm, and focused. It was instantaneous and you did that.” She smiled sadly, “I knew at that moment that Ollie and I were done because, as much as I loved him and even with all the history we shared, I couldn’t give him what you could just by saying a few words and stepping into his line of sight.”

“It wasn’t like that between us,” Felicity objected.

“I know you weren’t involved, but it was like that,” she told her matter-of-factly. “That’s not my point though. You have a habit of camouflaging yourself to the point that you disappear and it bothers me because sometimes I think you’re losing yourself in the process.”

“I’m not losing myself,” Felicity said quietly.

“Sometimes I think you…” She took a deep breath, “What do you know about starlings?”

“Um,” Felicity frowned, the sudden shift in topic catching her off guard, “unless you’re talking about the city or the cross platform game engine, not much; why?”

“When I was a kid I had a thing for birds.” She gave a wry grimace, “Yeah, ‘Canary’; pretty obvious, right? Still, I liked birds and my mom would take me to the Starling City Zoo’s aviary on the weekends. Since it was the ‘Starling City’ Zoo they had a special exhibit all dedicated to starlings. It was this huge enclosure filled with all different species of these tiny little birds and it was so loud,” she furrowed her brow as though hearing the echoes of it in her memory. “They were all different colors, and had all different kinds of songs, but the two that caught my attention the most were the Common European Starlings and Hildebrandt’s Starlings. Have you ever seen them? The Hildebrandt’s Starlings I mean.”

Felicity shook her head, “Maybe but I’m not sure.” She squinted slightly as she searched her memory, “I think they’re from Africa, right?”

“Tanzania, Kenya, Somalia; basically they’re all over West Africa,” she nodded. “The point is that they’re beautiful. They have this bright iridescent plumage in cobalt blue, rich purple, bright green; they look like tiny little rainbows,” she smiled. “I wanted one so bad. I started reading up on starlings after that and do you know what I found out?” Felicity shook her head in the negative, “As beautiful as that breed of starling is, they have really boring songs compared to Common Starlings. Common Starlings are, well, common. They’re everywhere. They don’t seem all that special at first and no one ever notices them because they’re these really dull feathered, mostly brown, little birds that are so small and so well camouflaged that they blend into the trees and surrounding foliage to the point that they’re almost invisible. The thing is that, as easy as it would be to dismiss this tiny little bird for being dull and plain looking, they’re smart; incredibly smart. They can mimic just about any songbird’s song, car alarms, they can even learn tunes from the radio or copy human speech. Mozart even had a pet starling that learned his Piano Concerto in G Major and he composed a piece called ‘A Musical Joke’ based on one of its songs after it died.”

Felicity frowned in confusion, “That’s cool but what’s your point?”
“My point is that the little brown starlings might not be as brassy, or bold, or as exciting as the other birds, but when they choose to open their mouths and sing they become something absolutely incredible and utterly inspiring,” she told her. “Felicity, sometimes I think you spend too much of your time hiding and not enough time singing. You put up walls and melt into the background but when you open up and let us see you, it brings the light back into the room.” She reached out and cupped her cheek lovingly, “You need to sing, Cutie. Stop hiding and just start singing.” She bent towards her and kissed her on the lips softly. It wasn’t inappropriate in any way, other than the fact that it was still a kiss, but it seemed to be meant as more of a benediction than a vehicle of arousal.

Sara looked at her and smiled again, “I love you, little bird. Be safe and I’ll be back soon, okay?”

The two women embraced and then parted. Felicity watched as Sara made her way up the walkway then remained until the doors closed and the plane took off down the runway and up into the sky until it disappeared from sight.
Chapter Thirty-Five

Dig waited on the private tarmac and watched with a bright grin as a strikingly beautiful woman emerged from the plane in an elaborate electric wheelchair and drove down the specially designed ramp, her deep auburn hair catching the last of the sun’s rays. She was followed immediately by two men; a dark haired Caucasian man in his early twenties, and another man of mixed race who was taller and quite a bit broader in the chest. He recognized the dark haired kid as Tim Drake-Wayne, Batman’s son, but the other guy he’d never seen before.

“Mr. Diggle, I presume,” Barbara smiled engagingly as she drove her wheelchair towards him until they were facing one another.

“Ms. Gordon,” he said with a slight bow and a toothy grin. “You’re even more beautiful in person.

“Flattery will get you everywhere, I assure you,” she said returning his flirt with one of her own. Her companions joined her at the base of the ramp and she turned to introduce both of them, “Dig; I can call you Dig, right?”

He flashed her another grin, “I believe we had this discussion the other day.”

To his delight she blushed at the reminder of their extended conversation via Watchtower where he told her she could call him whatever she wanted as long as she did it frequently.

The dark haired young man shook his head and groaned under his breath, “I swear to God, I’m stuck in a frigging Super Hero Soap Opera. Every damn place I go…”

Barbara shot her young charge a quelling look and cleared her throat, “Dig, this is Timothy Drake-Wayne and Luke Fox. Guys, this is John Diggle.”

“Fox,” Dig said in surprise then looked at Luke closely. “You’re Felicity’s brother?”
“Sure am,” he said and extended his hand towards the older man. “Baby talks about you all the time. Nice to finally put a face to the name.”

“Baby?” Dig asked in confusion.

“Felicity’s nickname,” Tim explained as he shook his hand as well. “She’s said a lot of good things about you. In fact, I believe her words were ‘be nice to Dig or I’ll kill you.’”

“Yeah, well, that’s my girl.” Dig chuckled slightly, “Baby, huh? I guess I just never thought of Felicity as having a nickname for some reason. I think if I ever tried to ‘Baby’ her she’d probably kick my ass.”

“Yeah, she mentioned she always had to kick butt and take names to get the team going in the right direction. The impression I got was that it wasn’t always easy keeping you guys in line,” Barbara said with a smirk. “I suppose that after having her act as your drill sergeant and den mother for all these years it would be weird hearing someone call that little pistol ‘Baby’.”

“To say the least,” he said good naturedly. “Okay then, now that introductions are out of the way, do you guys want to see where you’ll be staying while you’re here or do you want to just go straight to the club?” He asked then turned to Luke, “Sorry man, we didn’t know you were coming but maybe you can bunk with one of your friends until we get you a place of your own or we can put you up at one of the corporate digs. I’d be happy to drop you off before I take your friends to where they need to go.”

“No problem,” Luke said easily as he adjusted the strap on his duffle bag. “I’m just here for a couple of days and then I’m heading back. No need to go out of your way or anything either, I’ll just hang out with my friends until I get to meet this ‘Oliver’ guy for myself,” he said, his tawny eyes glittering dangerously. “I would have thought he’d be here.”

“Uh no,” Dig said as he eyed the younger man warily. He recognized the stance of a fellow warrior and the way he’d said Oliver’s name did not bode well. “He’s at the office but he should be at the club when we get there.”

“You keep saying ‘the club’ but I thought you guys called your HQ the ‘Lair’?” Luke asked in confusion. “That’s where Felicity said she set up her Watchtower.”

Dig looked at him in surprise, “You…?” He turned to Barbara for confirmation.

She smirked, “Hey Luke, I think Mr. Diggle is asking if you’re aware of the fact that you’re in the company of several dangerous vigilante types of the Bat and Arrow variety.”

“Yeah, I think I might have a rough idea,” Luke said dryly. “So you were saying about Watchtower?”

“Uh, yeah, only we don’t have anything called ‘Watchtower’. Felicity just calls her workstation setup ‘the Lair console’,” Dig said slowly as he looked the newcomer up and down again but with new eyes.

“Lair or LAIR?” Barbara and Tim asked simultaneously.

Dig’s eyebrows drew together in surprise, “Wayne asked us the same thing when he was here but I still don’t understand what you guys are talking about.”

Tim and Barbara looked at each other knowingly.
“She wasn’t kidding when she said that before she joined up with these guys they were running searches off a computer from Walmart, was she?” Tim asked dubiously.

Barbara shook her head, “Oh my stars and garters, do I have a challenge in front of me or what?”

“In our defense, Felicity has us pretty well trained at this point,” Dig said apologetically. “We just stand back and do what she says while she does her thing.”

“I like a man who knows his place,” Barbara said with another smirk. “Okay, where’s our ride? I want to check out my girl’s setup for myself.”

“I knew you had the chair so I didn’t want to take the limo and I thought you guys could use a ride of your own, so Oliver arranged for a handicap accessible van.” He told them as he hit the key fob and the doors slid open on a customized black Mercedes-Benz Diesel Sprinter conversion mobility van. A mobility lift extended down automatically for Barbara to drive up on. “The driver’s seat comes out if you want to anchor your wheelchair in that spot instead of parking it in the back and it comes equipped with hand controls plus it gets really decent mileage which is always an added bonus.” He turned to Tim, “We figured you’d want a ride of your own so we leased you a company car and left it parked at your place.”

“Nice,” Barbara said with a grin as she admired her new ride. “Keep this up, John Diggle, and I just might have to keep you.”

“I aim to please,” he replied smoothly. “Do you guys have any luggage you want loaded up?”

Tim hitched his thumb towards the ground crew. “No, Bruce made sure Wayne Shipping would deliver our stuff and Barbara’s equipment to the addresses Queen sent him. We’ll be fine.”

“Some of the stuff we brought goes in the, uh, Lair,” Barbara smirked. “God, I love saying that,” she grinned. “Anyway, I figured that since Baby is going to be upgrading Watchtower that I would fix you guys up in exchange.”

“Thanks,” Dig said sincerely. “It’s been rough without Felicity here and we can use all the help we can get.” He looked over towards the ground crew who were unloading bags and equipment into separate vans. “I’ll let Thea know we’re expecting some deliveries so she can sign for them in case we’re out patrolling later.”

“Always,” he said, hefting his large duffel bag.

“You’re a…” Dig let his voice trail off but the meaning was clear.

“Unbelievable,” Dig said shaking his head. “Not only did Felicity work with Batman but her brother’s a mask, too? I swear that girl…”

“To be fair Felicity didn’t even know until recently,” Luke said wryly.

“She didn’t even know after he told her,” Tim muttered then smirked as Luke shot him a dirty look.

“Well, that’s something at least,” Dig said, seeing their byplay and filing it away for later. “What’s your handle, by the way?”
“Batwing.”

Dig looked at him for a long moment, “Batwing.”

“Here it comes,” Tim snorted. “It’s okay if you haven’t heard of him, no one else has.”

“I thought so,” Tim agreed.

“Batwing; as in the Batman of Africa?” Dig said in surprise. “Damn man,” he said extending his hand again. “I’m a big admirer of what you’ve been doing down there. I really appreciate you taking the time to give us a hand, especially since you’ve got your hands full with stopping the mining of blood diamonds down there along with fighting the Marabunta.”

Luke took his hand in a warm clasp again and shot Tim a triumphant look before addressing Dig. “I don’t know how much help I’ll be, I’m only here for a day or so, but I’ll pitch in where I can. Felicity mentioned you were Special Forces and you seem pretty current on the local wildlife so I take it then that you were in the DRC on business and not as a tourist?”

“You could say that,” he agreed. “I got sent in for a mission down there when I was with the Rangers and ran into some of your little Warlord buddies,” he told him. “Beautiful country but a rough place to work; going back to Afghanistan almost seemed like a cakewalk afterwards.”

“It can get tough,” he agreed. “If you’re ever down that way again, feel free to look me up. According to Baby, you’d be a good man to have on my side.”

“Oliver and I have enough on our hands for the moment, but thanks.” Dig grinned. “Damn, Felicity’s brother is Batwing. Oliver’s going to love this.”

“Cool! Glad you guys are bonding but it’s time to get this show on the road,” Barbara said clapping her hands together then headed towards the van, “Load up boys! I’m driving.”

“In that case,” Dig handed her the keys and walked alongside her chair. “Let me help you get the driver’s seat stowed away and show you how to anchor the chair.”

“Dude, does Barbara even have a license?” Luke asked quietly, leaning towards Tim.

“I don’t know,” Tim said with no small amount of trepidation. “I guess we’ll find out, won’t we?”

\?\?\?\?\?

Oliver turned towards the sound of the freight elevator as it rumbled to a stop and the doors opened. He and Dig hadn’t been able to hire anyone to check out the mechanism out but it seemed to be working fine for the time being despite being loud and somewhat temperamental. He turned and faced the group exiting the elevator then frowned as someone unexpected stepped off.

“That trip down the elevator was almost as dangerous as the ride over here was,” Luke said as he glared at it.

“So fix it, Mr. Engineer,” Barbara said snappily. “And no criticizing my driving. I drive fine; it’s everyone else on the road that can’t drive. Everyone knows that it’s just common courtesy to drive a minimum of five to ten miles above the speed limit; it’s called keeping up with the flow of traffic. And what the hell is with all those people stopping at the yellow lights? You don’t stop at the yellow; you go faster to avoid the red! Idiots.”
“I think that answers the question of whether or not Barbara has a license,” Tim said dryly as he stepped into the Lair.

“Not to mention road rage,” Luke agreed.

“Watch it,” Barbara said without heat. “I can’t help it if these West Coasters can’t drive for shit. Sunshine and avocados apparently turn people into morons. Try driving like that in Gotham and you’ll get a foot up your ass.”

“I can’t believe you actually gave a nun the finger,” Luke said shaking his head.

“Bitch was hogging the road,” Barbara grumbled.

Luke stopped in his tracks and turned to her, ‘You leaned out of the window and shouted ‘Be the Bride of Christ on your own fuckin’ time and get that piece of shit Jesus Freak bus out of my way.’”

“She moved, didn’t she?” Barbara said, shooting him a look.

“And then when the nun flipped her back? Dude, seriously, that was just wrong,” Tim said with a chuckle. He held out his phone, “Look; I uploaded it to YouTube.”

Dig shook his head and looked down at Barbara with a bemused expression on his face, “Has anyone ever told you that for such a beautiful woman you have quite a mouth on you?”

“Yes,” Barbara said with a naughty twinkle. “But probably not in the same context you’re thinking of.”

“Good to know,” Diggle said, rocking back on his heels.

“Man, I already have like a thousand hits! Sister Mary Middle Finger is going to have a lot of explaining to do once this thing starts trending. Talk about giving someone the bible bird,” He chuckled again and looked up. “Barbara, exactly how many tickets has your dad fixed for you through the years?”

“Not nearly enough,” she told him.

“Or too many, depending on your point of view,” Luke mumbled.

Barbara ignored him, still speaking to Tim, “Why do you think I had to resort to hacking? I’ll be damned if I was going to waste my time going to Traffic Court for every little thing. Hey, I missed a lot more stuff than I hit and besides, those big blue mailbox things are a menace just sitting out on the side of the road like that.” She snorted, “No wonder the Postal Service is going belly up.”

As they approached, Dig caught the look on his partner’s face and hurried to explain, “Oliver, this is-”

“You’re Felicity’s brother, Luke. The schoolteacher from Africa,” he looked from the man in question to Dig. “Why is he here?”

Luke put down his duffle bag and stepped up to the other man, giving him a cool smile, “You must be Queen.”

“Oh, this isn’t going to end well. I suggest you stay out of range; Luke has quite a reach on him,” Tim told Diggle with quiet eagerness as he moved toward the two men but slightly off to the side to avoid any stray blows.
“Great,” Dig muttered but didn’t make a move to stop him.

“Yeah,” Oliver said, eyeing him warily. He extended his hand toward him, “Call me Oliver. Felicity told me about the work you’ve been doing in the Congo.”

Luke eyed his hand but didn’t move to accept it. “Yeah, she told me about the work you guys do here as well,” he said in a low, dangerous timbre. “What exactly did Baby tell you I did in Africa?”

Oliver dropped his hand and shifted his stance as he dropped his friendly demeanor. “She said you ran a Foundation and that you worked with kids but since you’re here and you’re with two of Batman’s associates I’m assuming there’s more to the story than she shared with us.”

“Probably,” Luke said slowly as he pinned the other man with a hard stare.

“If you want to defend your little sister’s honor then take it to the mats, Batwing,” Barbara called out over her shoulder as she checked out Felicity’s setup with Diggle who was watching them intently but keeping his distance for the moment. “I’m not in the mood to be mopping up blood and picking little pieces of bone out of my new sandbox. Fuck with my Feng Shui and it’s your ass, got it?”

“Batwing?” Oliver said looking at him askance.

“That’s right,” Luke told him, his stance stiff and foreboding.

Dig cleared his throat, “He’s Batwing,” he said pointing to Luke. “You know, the Batman of Africa.”

Tim started sniggering even louder causing Luke to break his gaze in order to turn to him with a grimace, “Dude, do you mind?”

Diggle shifted his stance uncomfortably, “Batwing is Batman’s counterpart in Africa. He deals mostly with protecting the locals from invading warlords and battling human trafficking down there.” He stepped forward and said in a lower tone, “He’s one of the good guys, Oliver; plus he’s Felicity’s brother.”

Oliver tensed, his warrior instincts battling with the knowledge of how Felicity would react if he got into a brawl with her brother, before relaxing his stance and giving him a look of wary respect, “I apologize for not recognizing your handle. Felicity mentioned you worked with former-child soldiers but she didn’t tell us her brother was a vigilante as well.” He grimaced, “She didn’t share a lot of things with us apparently.”

“She didn’t know,” Dig interjected before Luke could say anything and he quickly added, “I said the same thing when I found out and they said she didn’t know about him being Batwing until recently.”

“That’s true,” Tim said with a grin. “Then again, it’s ‘Batwing’. Now Batman, Red Robin, Nightwing; those are names people recognize, but—”

“Am I wrong?” Tim shot back.

“Yes,” he told him. “Diggle—”

“Yeah, the one black guy in this whole outfit knew who you were,” Tim snorted then held up his hands in supplication as both Luke and Dig shot him a hard look. “Hey, just saying.”

“Yeah?”

“Shut it.”

“Shutting it now.”

Luke stepped up to Oliver, aggression evident in the line of his heavily muscled physique as he eyed him up and down. “Who I am and what I do doesn’t matter. The only thing you need to be concerned with right now is that fact that Felicity is my little sister and as far as I’m concerned you and I need to have a conversation about just what it is she’s been doing for the last four years since she left home.”

“You’re fucking with my Zen, Luke,” Barbara said waringly as she continued to tap on the keyboard in front of the workstation.

“Mats; got it,” Luke said without taking his eyes off of Oliver as he clenched his hand into a fist at his side.

Oliver stepped up to him, completely unintimidated as he sized his opponent up and down. “Your sister has been instrumental in keeping this city and the people in it safe. She’s proud of the work we’ve done and we’ve been lucky to have her on our side. She’s saved all of our lives on more than one occasion and, while I might not have always been successful in keeping her safe, I’ve always tried to keep her out of the line of fire whenever possible. I consider Felicity to be one of only two people I trust more than anyone else in the entire world and I would never do anything to hurt her.”

“Then you heard wrong,” he told him, the Arrow’s voice coming to the forefront. “I care deeply for your sister, but if you want to take this to the mats we can. However, I’m warning you right now that I won’t pull my punches just because you’re her brother.”

“Did you care about her when you slept with her then dumped her as soon as you pulled your pants back up?” Luke asked him, his own voice dropping into a deep rumble. “Because she was crying so hard the morning you left her that Tim here had to call me to tell me what happened. She was so upset in fact, that I hopped the first flight out and flew over sixty-four hundred miles to get to her only to find out, not only did you and Bruce take turns breaking her heart, but he left her covered in bruises like some goddamn punching bag! And then, when I finally got her calmed down enough that she could speak, she told us that, in addition to you using her, you had her dismantling bombs, jumping out of buildings, and being shot at for the last four years; care to explain that seeing as you care for her so deeply and all?”

Oliver flinched at the realization that Felicity had been so broken by what had happened and his face darkened in a mixture of anguish and anger, “Like you said; the bruises were courtesy of your friend, Wayne, and I settled my own objections over that by giving him a few bruises of his own. As for the rest of it,” he took a breath and cast his eyes downward for a moment. “I didn’t use your sister for sex. Whether you choose to believe me or not, I care for Felicity more than you can ever know. Breaking her heart was never my intention. If you need to take a shot at me over it then I understand, I won’t even fight back,” he added quietly, “but just know that sending her away was probably the hardest thing I’ve ever done in my entire life. That said, it was the right choice, the only choice, I could make at the time. If I had to do it again, if in order to save her life I had to hurt her, I would. In a heartbeat. Take from that what you will; like I said, I won’t stop you.”

Luke looked at him steadily for a long moment, absorbing his words, before relaxing his stance, “Fine, I believe you,” he said at last. “Just be glad you said the right thing because if I thought for one minute you were lying or that you had taken advantage of Felicity then I would have kicked your ass.”

Oliver eyed him for a moment before relaxing as well. “Understood, I have a sister of my own, so I get it. Are we good?”

“We’re good,” Luke said holding out his hand in a gesture of peace which Oliver readily accepted. “For the record I did kick Bruce’s ass about two minutes after I saw Baby’s shoulder so at least we have that in common.”

Dig laughed, “You kicked Batman’s ass?”

Tim cleared his throat, “Well, I wouldn’t say you kicked his ass,” he said slowly. “More like you were in the middle of potentially kicking his ass before Felicity stepped in and nearly ripped both of you a new one.”

“I kicked his ass,” Luke said confidently. “Plus I still had the pins in my arm so I kicked his ass with basically one hand tied behind my back,” he said lifting the temporary brace on his wrist in emphasis. “No one messes with my baby sister and gets away with it. He’s just lucky she accepted his apology otherwise I would have put him through the friggin’ wall.”

“I kind of wish I had been there for that,” Oliver said grimly. “Like I said, Wayne and I got into a scrap as well. He’s a tough son of a bitch, that’s for sure.”

“I heard about that,” Luke said with a slight upturn of his lips. “Before you said anything, that is. Felicity is still kind of pissed at both of you for that, by the way.”

Oliver winced, “She told you…?”

“About how you and Bruce destroyed her house and practically everything she owned?” He asked off-handedly.

“Of course, she did steal Bruce’s wallet during your little scuffle. Just be glad she didn’t get ahold of your credit card, too,” Tim snorted as he leaned against the workstation with an air of casual indifference. “The only thing better than watching Luke deck Bruce followed by Felicity completely decimating him afterwards was finding how much she spent during her revenge shopping spree.”

Oliver turned his attention to the other man who was leaning against the workstation, arms crossed over his chest in a deceptively casual pose, “Yeah, I was there. He’s just lucky she didn’t decide to empty his bank accounts. I’m still kind of worried that my credit rating is going to take a sudden unexplained dive at any moment.”

“Yeah, Baby’s a pistol, all right. The Fox sisters are nothing if not creative in their revenge. By the way, I’m Tim; son of the tough son of a bitch in question,” he said giving him a brief wave, his dark blue eyes hard and uncompromising despite his relaxed pose. “Not that I’m defending what he did; I was standing on the sidelines ready to take over for Luke just in case he needed back-up during the whole one-handed ass kicking.” He smiled toothily, his eyes glittering dangerously, “Just so you know, Baby is probably my favorite person in the entire universe next to her sister and Barbara, and the closest thing I have to a little sister of my own. If Luke hadn’t won the coin flip on the plane ride over here, it might have been me doing the threatening just now and, just so you know, I’m not nearly as laid back as I appear to be. Plus,” he uncrossed his arms and waved both hands, “I’ve got both arms and nothing holding me back except the desire not to piss off Oracle.”

“And believe me when I say that it is appreciated,” Barbara said distractedly as she kept her eyes glued to the monitors. “Blood stains are a bitch to get out and this is a new outfit.”

“Good to know,” Oliver said guardedly. He turned from one man to the other, “Are we still good or do we still need to move this to the other side of the room?”

Luke waved him off, “Like I said man, we’re cool. I can’t speak for my boy over there but, as far as I’m concerned, Felicity forgave you and if she doesn’t have a problem with you then neither do I. Speaking of Bruce though, he did want me to give you a message.”

“What is it?” Oliver said carefully.

“This,” He said then clocked him with a strong left hook that sent him sprawling onto the floor.

“Hey!” Barbara called out from across the room as she and Diggle both turned to watch the action. “The mats are over there damn it!”

“We’re cool,” Luke told her with a smirk. “Bruce just sent the one message; I promise.”

“Good, because the next message will be attached to my foot and delivered up your ass!” Barbara told him with a scowl.

“God, I love this kind of human interaction, don’t you?” Tim asked, the grin on his face never wavering as he turned to Diggle.

“It has its moments,” Diggle agreed with a note of resignation.

Oliver grimaced and wiped the blood from his mouth before he got to his feet and faced him again, “That was from Wayne, huh? And what did he say it was for specifically?”

“He mentioned that when my sister apparently took a bullet to the shoulder that you fixed her up in your lovely basement instead of taking her to the hospital and calling her family to let them know she was hurt,” Luke said, his lips twitching upward into a smile. “He also wanted me to tell you that he was just sorry he couldn’t deliver it in person.”

“Fair enough,” Oliver said. “Any other messages from friends or family members I should be on the lookout for or are we really done this time?”

“Like I said, we’re cool,” Luke said lightly. “Tim, you got any messages for Oliver here?”

“Nope,” Tim said shaking his head. “I was going to take a shot but you summed it up pretty nicely so I’m good.”

“See?” Luke grinned. “Besides, if I was really pissed I wouldn’t have held back the way I did.”

“That was holding back?” Oliver asked, rubbing his jaw.
“See this?” He said holding up his temporary brace. “I got it fighting an alien irradiated lion centaur; I was holding back, trust me.”

“I’m so sick of hearing about the freaky lion-dude,” Tim snorted. “Hey, I took on an entire army of assassins single-handedly and won yet you don’t hear me still bragging about it.”

“Dude, lion centaur,” Luke said as he turned to him with a superior air.

“One lion centaur versus at least a dozen trained assassins,” he reminded him. “Meanwhile Ra’s al Ghul looked me right in the eye afterwards and had no choice but to give me mad props while your guy had to go use a big litter box.”

“You went up against Ra’s al Ghul?” Dig asked, looking somewhat impressed.

“Sure did,” Tim grinned.

“Right before he tossed your sorry ass out of a window,” the other man added.

“And yet, not a scratch on me,” Tim said holding out his arms with a triumphant grin. “You’re just jealous because your biggest fight was against a dude who can be easily distracted by a piece of yarn.”

“Whatever,” Luke said rolling his eyes. He clapped Oliver on the shoulder in a friendly manner, “Seriously man, we’re cool. You can relax; we’re done.”

He nodded, still rubbing his quickly swelling jaw. “I guess I should just be grateful Felicity has people that care enough about her to fly three thousand miles just to punch me in the mouth,” Oliver said at last.

“Hey, I flew over six thousand miles to deck Bruce; what’s another three thousand or so?” Luke said with a shrug.

Tim wandered over and gave Oliver another easy going smile, “Just so you know, we’re good, too. Of course, if Baby changes her mind and decides to be mad at you again or if Tam tells me to kick the living shit out of you then I’ll have no choice but to beat you into a puddle of bloody goo.”

“Good to know,” Oliver said evenly.

“If you boys are done playing you might want to come over here and check out what Baby’s been doing with all of her free time,” Barbara called out and the two men turned and headed towards the console.

Oliver rubbed his jaw ruefully as he and Dig exchanged looks before joining their new companions at the workstation.

“Holy shit, Baby really did it, didn’t she?” Luke said with a wide smile as he leaned over and looked down at the code scrolling across Barbara’s screen.

“Damn, that’s beautiful,” Tim breathed as he looked at it. “You know what this means right?”

“Oh yeah,” Barbara looked at both of them. “Let’s hope Baby gets over being pissed at Bruce long enough to upgrade the Watchtower setup in the Batcave and in the clock tower.” She shook her head as she marveled at the coding in front of her then tapped a few keys, “Would you look at that? Oh, I am in love.”
“What are you guys looking at?” Dig asked in confusion.

Three sets of eyes swiveled in his direction as Tim pointed at the setup, “Dude, this is an actual working LAIR system.”

“Yeah, we know that,” Dig said with a frown.

Tim shook his head, “No, this is a LAIR—”

“Forget it, man,” Luke said cutting him off then turned to the other two men with a lopsided grin. “Have you guys ever heard of AI programming?”

“Artificial Intelligence?” Dig said tentatively. “Like in science fiction?”

“It’s not science fiction,” Barbara said as she turned her chair towards them. “Artificial Intelligence is real science and computer programmers have been trying for years to develop true AI programming. In fact, MIT, OSU, and several other cutting edge Computer Science and Robotics labs have been studying AI research since the 1970’s. LAIR traditionally stands for Laboratory for Artificial Intelligence Research.”

Luke saw the confusion in both men’s expressions and sighed, “When Baby was at MIT she worked on the LAIR project. In fact, she was a true prodigy. She started off as this spindly legged thirteen year old genius who could run circles around some of the most brilliant minds in the country and, by the time she was eighteen, she was published and defending her doctorate. In her thesis she posited that she could build and develop a coding language for a supercomputer that, while using a type of AI programming, could not only hack and decrypt virtually any system but could be condensed into a mobile app. Not only that, but it could ‘think ahead’ of the programmer and ‘learn’ pattern recognition so it could predict events and track them in real time.”

“What he means is that Felicity basically reinvented the wheel by creating a ‘smart’ computer that was essentially a vigilante in a can,” Tim said, then shrugged, “Or, in this case, a smart phone, tablet, or any other handheld smart device.”

“She called it List processor Autonomic programming within an Interleaved memory Rulebend system,” Luke added.

“And that means?” Oliver said slowly.

“It’s a bullshit name,” Barbara said with a smirk. “She was just trying to fuck around with the whole LAIR thing but the theories behind it were an evolutionary leap in cryptography and computer programming.”

“If she could prove it,” Luke added. “It got her a PhD and an article in Scientific American but writing about it and putting it into practice are two different things.”

“Wait, you mean the stuff she does with her tablet and her phone?” Diggle asked with a frown.

Barbara grinned, “Look, according to most mainstream programmers out there, the ‘stuff’ Felicity does with her tablet and her phone is technically impossible.”

“No more like beyond the scope of current technology;” Luke corrected.

“But Felicity does stuff with just her phone or her tablet all the time,” Dig said with a frown. “Most of the time she works from the Lair but I’ve seen her hack into computer networks and keypads with just her phone a million times.”
“Which is impossible,” Barbara said with an amused look. “Or should be impossible. It’s the kind of thing people show on TV or in the movies but that has no basis in reality. We already knew she was on the right path back when she helped program Watchtower, but this is…” Barbara gave a low whistle as she turned back to the monitor for a second.

“So what are you saying?” Oliver asked again.

“Come on Queen, you own a tech company,” Barbara snorted.

“Just because I own it doesn’t mean I know how everything we produce works,” he told her blithely.

“At least he’s honest,” Barbara said turning to her companions.

He sighed at her faint praise and ran his hand through his short hair, “Okay, here’s what I do know: We ran into a programmer who called himself the Clock King a few years ago,” Oliver said slowly. “He’s the guy responsible for the bullet to the shoulder, by the way. Felicity stopped him with a computer virus that sent a massive power surge to his phone causing it to overload and electrocute him, knocking him unconscious.”

“I love it,” Tim chuckled and shook his head ruefully. “Cellphone Taser; if that doesn’t scream Felicity I don’t know what does.” He and his two companions all exchanged amused looks.

Oliver couldn’t help but twitch his lips at that as well, “He came up with a program he called ‘the Skeleton Key’ that could hack virtually any lock. Felicity was pretty excited about it and spent every spare second she could taking it apart and studying it. I remember the day she finally figured it out and began making upgrades to our system but she never explained what she was doing exactly. We’d…well; we were forced to rebuild the Lair for the second time in a year, so she had to replace everything anyway. All I know is that as she rebuilt the system she started adding monitors and her hacks got a lot faster and more efficient.”

“I’ll say,” Barbara muttered as she turned to tap a few keys, “Look at this baby go!”

Luke gestured to his companions, “What Barbara and Tim are trying to say, is that if Baby ever showed this to the world, she’d probably wind up with a Nobel Prize,” Luke said as he peeked over Barbara’s shoulder again. “She took Watchtower and combined it with this Clock guy’s skeleton key and her own research into mobile application technology and created LAIR. This is her vindication and proof that her theories were correct.”

“A Nobel Prize?” Dig asked as he gave the familiar workstation a second look. “Really?”

“She could write her own ticket,” Barbara told him. “She’d be on the cover of every major scientific publication, not to mention Time, Newsweek…”

“That or she’d wind up chained to the wall in some underground NSA super-max prison,” Tim said with a snort. He looked at the two of them, “You guys really didn’t know how big a deal this was? Felicity never explained it to you? I mean, seriously, this setup is the Holy Grail for computer geeks. I can’t believe she didn’t tell us about this,” Tim said in amazement. “How could she just…I mean, she didn’t say a word to anyone. If I had programmed something like this I’d be crowing from the rooftops about it.”

“I can,” Barbara said still tapping away at the keyboard. “If she told us about LAIR then Bruce would have immediately come down here to secure the technology for our mission.” She smiled mischievously, “I can’t wait to see his face when she springs this on him.”

“Well, we knew she was smart but…” Dig said faintly. “Nobel prize, huh?” He turned to smirk at his partner, “And you had her getting coffee and doing your schedule for the last three years. You deserved that punch big time.”

Guilt flooded Oliver’s expression as he rubbed his hand over his jaw again, “Yeah, probably more than just the one.”

“I’d hit you again but then I’d run the risk of pissing off Baby and then she’d sic Peggy Ann on me,” Luke said distractedly as he watched as Barbara raced through every CCTV camera in the city in a matter of seconds.

“Who’s Peggy Ann?” Dig asked and all three of them turned to him in surprise.

Tim gave him a skeptical look, “Peggy Ann; Peggy Ann Hu?” He looked at both of them then frowned when they didn’t react, “Felicity’s foster-grandmother, how do you guys not know that?”

“Who?” Diggle asked in consternation.

Tim shook his head, “No, Hu; H-U. She’s Chinese. She was Felicity’s grandparent’s friend and after they died she became her mom’s foster-mother. She came to live with Felicity’s parents after their dad married her mom and when Evie died she basically took over.”

“That she does,” Tim said slowly. “Hates me—like hate hates me. I honestly think your dad is more fond of me than she is.”

“And if you had any idea of how much dad doesn’t like Tim, you’d understand how serious that really is,” Luke snorted.

“Okay, hang on: Felicity’s dad is the CEO of Wayne Enterprises and black, her brother is Batwing, she used to work for Batman, and she has a Chinese grandmother?” Dig said slowly.

“Trust me, it gets worse,” Tim said easily. “Peggy Ann is a Kaifeng Jew and she brings new meaning to the term ‘yenta’. Plus, like I said, she hates me and I’m normally a very likeable guy.”

“You really are,” Luke said fondly.

Tim smiled at him, “Thanks bro.”

“No problem.”

“A Jewish Chinese foster-grandparent,” he turned to Oliver. “Did you know that?”

“No, but I did know about the Kaifeng Jew thing,” Oliver said schooling his features into an even expression. “After all, anyone can be Jewish; it’s not just an ethnic identity but a religious and cultural one that is inclusive to people of many races.”

“Seriously?” Diggle asked him incredulously.

“I’m not completely culturally ignorant you know,” Oliver said blithely. “My knowledge of the Jewish culture does extend beyond Seinfeld references and accountant jokes.”

Diggle merely shot him a look that told him he wasn’t buying it.

“So let me get this straight; you guys worked with Baby for nearly four years and you know absolutely nothing about her?” Luke asked eyeing both men curiously.
“No, of course not!” Dig turned to Oliver then back to the three strangers who were somehow more in tune with the space they had occupied for the last four years than they were. “We know stuff, right Oliver?” He said a bit obviously.

Oliver sighed and rubbed the back of his neck with a scowl, “I probably know a lot more about her background than Dig does, but most of what I know I found out either right before or right after she left. Felicity has always been very reticent about sharing any information about her past with us. The most she ever told us was that her biological father abandoned her and that she had some kind of issues concerning her mother but we didn’t even know both her biological parents were dead until after your father and Wayne came down here a few weeks ago. She said that she never told us about your dad because she didn’t want to risk the professional backlash or the even the appearance of some sort of conflict of interest. She also didn’t tell us about Wayne’s mission because she didn’t want to risk exposing his identity. What did she tell you about us?”

“Not much,” Luke admitted. “Then again Baby has always had a way of making it seem like she says a lot without saying anything at all.”

As soon as the words left Luke’s mouth, Oliver felt himself nodding to himself as he acknowledged the truth in those words. What did he know about Felicity really? Four years of ramblings ran through his brain, little snippets of information that he was surprised to find out that he had clung to. He knew she graduated from MIT but he didn’t know she was a prodigy or that she had a doctorate. He knew she was Jewish but he didn’t know about her unique family history. And then there was the time she said she dyed her hair and he assumed she was a brunette but…

And suddenly he was there again, laying between her thighs and seeing the sparse, almost nonexistent white-blonde curls, slick with dew, as he bent to taste her. Memories of her taste, the way her breathing sounded in the quiet of the room as he loved her, the sweet sounds that erupted from her as he entered her for the first time flooded his mind and he swallowed.

“Oliver, are you okay?” Diggle said, startling him from his reverie.

He looked up in confusion as he schooled his features into an expression of normalcy, “What?”

“I was just telling them some of the stuff Felicity would say mid-ramble,” he said, a bemused expression on his face.

“Yeah,” he said shaking off the odd mood that had caused his brain to short circuit. “I was just…thinking about something else, sorry.” He turned to the rest of his companions and gave them a forced smile, “Felicity…yeah, her rambles are pretty much the only thing that kept us going some days. That is, when she wasn’t screaming at me to get my head out of my ass.”

Diggle offered them a smile of his own, “I’ll say. She had a hell of a temper on her once you got her wound up! That girl could be scary when she wanted to. Hey, remember the thing with the Sewer King?” He asked, grinning at Oliver.

“The Sewer King?” Barbara said dubiously.

“That sounds…unpleasant,” Tim said with a disgusted expression.

“Oh, this I have to hear,” Luke snorted as he shook his head ruefully.

“What I want to know is how the hell did you get Baby anywhere near a guy calling himself the Sewer anything in the first place?” Barbara said with a grin.

“It’s a long story,” Oliver said ruefully.
“So what’s this Sewer King’s deal?” Tim asked.

He sighed, “The Sewer King was this modern day Fagin who used street kids as everything from pickpockets to drug runners in this ‘underworld empire’ he had built.”

“Real underworld empire,” Dig snorted.

“You’re saying this guy really lived in the sewer?” Tim asked in disbelief. “It’s not just some kind of really unfortunate nickname he picked up because he was into directing scat porn or used to collect Garbage Pail Kids trading cards?”

“Yep,” Diggle said with a mischievous grin. “He came by his handle honestly, although Felicity likes to refer to him as the ‘River of Poo Guy’ or just ‘Stinky’.”

“I don’t know whether to be pissed that you let my sister anywhere near that freak or impressed that you were able to convince her to go down there in the first place.” Luke said in amazement.

“Well, to be honest it wasn’t Oliver who got her involved in all of that,” Diggle told him, his dark eyes dancing with laughter.

“There is no way you’re ever going to convince me that going down into the sewers was my sister’s idea,” Luke told them flatly. “She throws away the plunger after using it one time because she has a thing about the ‘poo germs’ getting all over the floor.”

“Really?” Dig asked with a chuckle.

“Really,” Luke nodded. “Believe me; I shared an off-campus apartment with her that had lousy plumbing and toilets that were constantly overflowing. We went through at least six plungers a week and she used to buy bleach by the cart load. After a month of that she couldn’t take it anymore and made us move.”

“He’s right,” Tim said with a shrug. “Baby isn’t exactly a sewer type of girl.”

“It was actually my sister’s fault,” Oliver said with a grimace.

“Do tell, Sparky,” Barbara said, bringing her wheelchair in closer. “This story is starting to get interesting.

Oliver closed his eyes and sighed, “First off, you should know my sister, Thea, runs the club upstairs and is a member of our team, albeit not an active one at the moment. We already told her you guys were coming so you’ll meet her later. Anyway, she’s had some training and ever since she found out about my being the Arrow, she’s wanted to…”

“Make it a family business,” Dig finished for him with no small amount of delight.

“Yeah, well, it doesn’t help that her ex-boyfriend is always encouraging that sort of thing,” He said with an air of exasperation. “Thea, during the months she was gone, trained and operated as a mask under the handle ‘Artemis’, but I wouldn’t allow her to actively join our mission until I felt she was ready. She...didn’t agree with my decision.”

“So…” Tim said, drawing out his vowels.

Oliver made a disgruntled noise, “One day Thea was shopping and she happened to notice these kids behaving strangely so she decided to go on her own little ‘stake out’ by following and photographing these kids doing everything from picking pockets to running drugs.”
“Drug dealers use kids as runners all the time,” Tim said with a frown.

“And your point is?” Luke asked his friend, his ire apparent although it wasn’t directed at him as much as it was the situation itself.

Understandable, given that he worked with children who were taught to do a lot more than just lift wallets, Oliver thought.

“I’m just wondering why that would catch her attention,” Tim said. “Starling is a pretty big city and, no offense, but from what I read your sister wasn’t all that unfamiliar with scoring dope a few years back. What about the situation caught her attention?”

“Two things,” Diggle interjected, “the fact that the kids were so well trained and coordinated, and the ages of the kids. Most were young; very young. The oldest kid was barely eight years old and the youngest wasn’t even five.”

“That, and the fact that when she followed them ‘home’ they all went into the park and crawled into a concrete culvert only to disappear into a storm drain,” Oliver finished. “Although she had been pursuing it on her own, once she realized that kids were involved she decided to go for backup. She wasn’t afraid of the kids but she didn’t want any of them getting hurt and she’d never run her own op before.”

“So she went to Felicity with it?” Tim asked quizzically. “Why not you guys?”

Oliver’s mouth thinned into a tight grimace, “We had…come off a tough case and the rest of us weren’t really up for taking on any new missions at the time.”

“This was six months ago, wasn’t it?” Tim asked, his expression serious as he looked from one man to the other.

“Not quite, but close enough that most of us were still hobbling around on crutches,” Oliver said, his expression guarded. “Did she tell you about that case?”

Tim’s expression darkened, “Only that everyone on the team was pretty badly injured. We tried getting some of the details from her but she didn’t want to talk about it.”

“No,” Dig said quickly. His expression became a bit haunted, “No, she didn’t have so much as a scratch on her.” As Luke’s expression continued to darken, Diggle continued on with a slightly forced smile, “The point is that Thea went to her, not just because the rest of us were still looking all beat to hell and back, but because she knew Oliver would hit the roof if he found out what she’d done, Sara and I would have told Oliver, Lance would have gone all ‘fatherly protector’, and Roy would have had a complete meltdown at the thought of her risking her safety, so that left Felicity.”

“So why didn’t Felicity tell you guys and what did Thea say to get her to go down into the sewers?” Tim asked obviously sensing that they were as reluctant to talk about the source of their injuries as Felicity had been.

“I think that Felicity just figured Thea was seeing things that weren’t there and just wanted to keep her out of trouble,” Oliver said smoothly but that wasn’t it at all.

The real reason Felicity didn’t tell them was because, at the time, he was involved with Laurel again and the other woman had begun to display very aggressive and abusive behavior in her presence while managing to hide that side of herself from the rest of them for the most part. Still, it was obvious that tensions were rising within the team but, rather than handle the situation, he’d chosen to ignore it figuring wrongly that it would resolve itself in time. It didn’t.

The one time she did try to approach him about the possibility that Laurel was spiraling he’d basically accused her of being jealous as he was in denial himself. Upset at his attitude, Felicity had begun to actively avoid him for a while and helping Thea gave her an excuse to stay out of the Lair.

He walked in to see Laurel staring daggers at Felicity whose cheeks were burning with either anger or embarrassment.

“Is there a problem here?” He asked, looking from one woman to the other.

“No problem,” Laurel said lightly, her face relaxing into an easygoing smile as she turned to greet him.

“Are you sure?” He was asking both of them but his eyes were locked on his tech as she swiveled away from him in her chair and began to tap on the keys to her workstation in silence.

“It was nothing,” Laurel said with a roll of her eyes. He voice dropped to a more confidential level, “I think we might have accidently embarrassed her when she caught us last night, that’s all. She was just apologizing again.”

He felt himself flush at that. The evening before Felicity had gone upstairs to help Thea with something. Even though Laurel knew she was coming right back down she’d basically jumped him. He’d protested but she began talking in low dirty tones, reminding him that they hadn’t made love in a couple of months, not since Merlyn had taken Connor in retaliation for Thea leaving him and returning home.

Not that it had been his fault that they hadn’t been intimate. Laurel, when she found out that he’d gotten Sandra pregnant while sleeping with both her and her sister, had broken up with him, not the other way around. She left him and the mantle of Canary behind to take up a solo mission as ‘Manhunter’ while he regrouped and tried to make amends to his remaining team members. Truthfully, if he was being honest, her absence came as something of a blessing as it gave him a chance to reconnect with Thea. He didn’t even have time to miss her between training his sister to eventually take over the spot she had vacated and dealing with the whole Cheshire debacle.

A few weeks later when Slade reentered their lives after escaping from ARGUS’s super-max, he’d gotten back with Sara for a brief period of time; very brief, but long enough to know that it was really over between them. After a heartfelt talk, Sara ended it in the hospital and told him that he needed to be with the woman he really loved once and for all.

Instead he did the next best thing and went back to Laurel.

Before he knew it her hand was down his pants, her fingers wrapped around him as she whispered deliciously filthy things in his ear like how the possibility of getting caught always used to be a turn on for him in the past. Like usual, he let himself be led by his dick and caved. Felicity walked in to find Laurel’s tongue down his throat, straddling his lap and grinding on him as they sat on the couch in the Lair, his hand up her blouse.

He heard her make a small strangled gasp as she stammered out a quick apology. He untangled himself from Laurel’s embrace just in time to see the expression on her face before she turned and practically ran back up the stairs. Mortification burned on her cheeks as her eyes filled with pain. It tore at him and, for a second there, he’d almost felt as though he’d been caught cheating on her even though Laurel was supposed to be his girlfriend.

Unable to cope with the tangle of emotions he’d felt, he told Laurel that he needed to be somewhere and avoided her for the rest of the day.

“I don’t think Felicity is used to seeing that kind of thing,” she said to him in a near whisper. “She practically admitted to me that she’s never had a real boyfriend before. Plus, she still has a little bit of a crush on you so I think she’s taking our getting back together a little hard, if you know what I mean. I think after you broke up with Sara and Garret dumped her, she kind of got her hopes up.”

He glanced away, unable to speak.

“Look at you,” Laurel said with an amused purr in a voice that was unnecessarily loud. “You’d think Felicity’s shyness was contagious the way you’re blushing right now. Since when is Ollie Queen embarrassed about getting caught having sex?”

“Laurel…” he growled in a warning.

“Oh please!” She snorted, “She has eyes! She knows exactly what we were doing and she’s fine with it; aren’t you Felicity?” The last bit was spoken to the other woman’s turned back. She didn’t respond but Laurel chose to take her silence as such, “See?”

He cleared his throat, glancing down at his watch, “Weren’t you supposed to join your dad for dinner before going to your meeting?”

A look of annoyance crossed her face briefly before she smiled again, “I was just about to head out now. I don’t suppose you’d like to join us?”

“Not tonight,” he told her shortly, his irritation with her growing with every passing second.

“Okay, we’ll just meet up later,” she told him, seemingly oblivious to it. “Are you spending the night at my place again? We never did get to finish, remember?” Her voice lowered but he knew Felicity could still hear every word.

“Fine, I’ll see you later,” he told her quickly just to get her out of the foundry and away from him.

“See you,” she purred, kissing him softly before grabbing her bag and heading out. She paused near Felicity’s chair, “Bye Felicity.”

“Bye,” Felicity said shortly, her eyes never leaving the monitor.

“And, like I said earlier, you have nothing to apologize for,” she told her, looking over her shoulder towards him with a wink. “I’m just sorry if we made you uncomfortable.”

“I’m fine, thanks,” she said in a subdued tone.

He watched as Laurel practically skipped up the stairs, tossing one last flirtatious look over her shoulder before heading off to meet her dad. Taking a deep breath he leaned heavily on his crutches as he tried to think of what to say to his EA but words failed him.

“Oliver, can we talk?”

He looked up at Felicity who was speaking quietly, one eye on the retreating back of his girlfriend as the door shut behind her. “Yeah, sure; what is it?”
She bit her lip, “I think something’s going on with Laurel.”

“What do you mean?” He asked her, his muscles tensing.

“You haven’t noticed?” She said in a voice that was just north of a whisper.

“Noticed what?” He asked with an angry edge.

She hesitated for a second before speaking, “She’s behaving erratically, she’s becoming paranoid, aggressive—”

“Aggressive to whom?”

She met his perturbed gaze steadily, “To me, for one, and also to Thea.”

“Thea’s the one who keeps engaging her, not the other way around,” he said shortly. “What is it you’re trying to say?”

She looked down at her feet, “I think she…I think she might be using again.”

“She’s not,” he bit out, his own embarrassment and irritation causing his response to sound harsher than he had intended.

“Oliver…”

“I practically live with her, Felicity. She’s my girlfriend,” he told her. “I’d know if she were doing drugs.”

Her eyes skittered away from his as she wrung her hands nervously, “Maybe or maybe you’re just too close to see it.”

“Or maybe she’s not the one with the problem?” The minute he said it he wished he could take it back.

Her eyes snapped up as she looked at him incredulously, “What?”

“It’s not the first time you’ve been jealous over having another woman on the team,” he told her, trying to cover for his mistake as he attempted to rein in his temper. “You were jealous of Sara at first…”

“I was not jealous of Sara!” She said hotly.

“Felicity,” he said in a softer tone, “you went after Tockman and nearly got yourself killed when Sara first joined the team because you felt insecure about your place within the team. That and,” he gave her a sympathetic look, “well, Sara and I were involved and I think that was hard on you for a lot of reasons. Look, you and Sara became friends once you got over it; I know Laurel can be a bit difficult at times, but maybe if you try harder you’ll eventually learn to like her just as much as you like Sara.”

“You want me to try harder?” She said incredulously.

He sighed impatiently, the irritation he felt at Laurel’s antics earlier creeping back into his tone, “Laurel has been working with us for over a year now; she’s not going anywhere. You need to accept that and try to get along.”

“I’m not the one with the problem, Oliver; she is!” She flushed a deep red, “Okay, fine; back when Sara first joined I admit that I felt a little insecure at first but I was never jealous of her! You make it sound like…”

“Like what?” He prompted.

She pressed her lips together angrily then got up from her chair to plant her finger in the center of his chest, “I am not jealous of Laurel!”

“Yes sure?” He asked her, his own anger bubbling forth.

“Why would I be jealous of her?” She demanded. “What is it you think she has that I would want?”

He took a deep breath and placed his hand on her shoulder tentatively, “Felicity, you know that I care for you as a friend—”

“Oh my God!” She said, pushing away from him, a livid expression on her face. “Why would you—I’m going home!” She said, snatching up her bag and heading for the door.

“Felicity,” he said, blocking her way. “I’m not trying to upset you but we never did talk about the thing with Slade. We hit on it a little but we never really discussed it.”

She froze, “What thing with Slade?”

“The first time,” he told her in a more subdued tone. “When I told you I--”

“Don’t!” She warned him.

“I’m not trying to embarrass you,” he told her.

“No, right now you’re embarrassing yourself!” She shot back. “That was my plan, remember? I’m the one who said you should take Slade’s attention away from Laurel by pretending that I was the one he should have targeted instead! I was trying to help you save her just like I am trying to do right now! You know what?” She said, shaking her head, “I don’t want to talk to you anymore tonight. Between that overinflated ego of yours and the fact that your head is perpetually stuck up your own ass, trying to talk sense into you is just a waste of time!” She stomped up the stairs, her face beet red and, although she tried to hide them, he could see the tears tracking down her cheeks as she slammed the foundry door behind her.

Rubbing his hand across his mouth he closed his eyes and cursed himself for causing her further pain. He knew she was right; Laurel had been acting erratically and he’d seen for himself how she’d been increasingly abusive towards Felicity but he hadn’t said anything because he knew something she didn’t.

If Laurel was suspicious of his feelings towards Felicity it was because she had every right to be.

Long after she stomped out of the Lair, he fought the urge to go after her and apologize. He couldn’t though and he wouldn’t. It was better if she stayed angry at him, at least until he got his head straight, because the whole time she was yelling at him all he could think about was how beautiful she looked when she was angry and how much he had wanted to kiss her.

It took them a while to get to a good place again after that. Even after Laurel moved to Central City to be near her mom after rehab, there was still a hint of hurt in her eyes whenever they were alone.
He hadn’t been lying when he told her that what happened between them in the conference room had been a long time coming. Seeing her anger that day, the tears coursing down her cheeks, the way she looked with her hair down around her shoulders and that damn dress clinging to every curve…

She was even more beautiful just a few days later when he woke her up after spending the entire night making love to her, her hair in tangles and her lips swollen from his kisses. It took everything he had not to crawl back into her bed and say to hell with it.

Instead, he broke her heart and sent her running into the arms of someone else….and it was all his fault for telling her to move on.

He resisted the urge to brood as he pretended to listen to Diggle’s story.

“…So I pick up my phone and it’s Felicity. I answer it thinking she’s calling to ask for our lunch order and she starts screaming about how alligators in the sewer weren’t an urban myth after all, poo pirates, and the fact that Thea now owes her a new pair of shoes!”

They all began to laugh like it was a big joke but it wasn’t. Dig could laugh about it now; hell, all of them thought it was hilarious now, but it wasn’t then. When he thought of the Sewer King he didn’t think about the funny bits or the relief he’d felt when he realized Thea and Felicity were safe, he thought about the parts of the story Diggle wasn’t telling.

Dig had called him in a panic and told him that Felicity and Thea were in trouble and he hadn’t hesitated. He’d still been on crutches, his arm in a sling and still practically useless, but he also knew he had no choice but to go down there after her—not just Thea, her.

It was later in the evening after their argument in the Lair. He’d been with Laurel; still upset at her earlier behavior but not upset enough to resist her as she sank to her knees in front of him. The phone rang just as she was telling him in a low purr that she wanted to suck him off and then she wanted him to fuck her like they’d started to in the foundry.

He should have known something was very wrong with Laurel then. While they’d always had a good sex life, she had never been into talking dirty before. She’d never liked using words like ‘fucking’ to describe the act for one; for her it was always ‘making love’. Suddenly though, she was sexting him, crawling all over him every chance she got, engaging in PDA, and acting unusually possessive. Later when he’d read up on her disease it all made sense (the aggression, erratic behavior, impulsiveness, her reckless risk-taking and dangerous behavior in the field, her willingness to blow off work, her sudden streak of uninhibited sexual behavior) but, at the time, he’d chalked it all up to what had happened with Slade; that she was still reeling from the fact that she’d almost lost her family again and that they deliberately cut her out of the loop for her own good. It wasn’t unusual for someone to use sex as stress relief or to reaffirm that they were still alive after a close call. The erratic behavior and sudden disinterest in her career could be explained away as well. She was just healing, that’s all he thought it was…at first. They were all still recovering, and not just from the physical scars his return had left behind.

She was starting to unzip his fly when he placed his hand over hers so he could grab the phone off the coffee table. She pouted angrily beside him as Dig told him what was going on. As soon as he hung up he tried to explain to her that he had to leave, that they (meaning Felicity and Thea) were in danger, she completely lost it. She accused him of cheating on her and that Dig was just covering for him, hurled insults at him about his inability to perform because she wasn’t some ‘pathetic little blonde virgin who fawned all over him’. It was at that moment he realized it was over. Unable to deal with her shit, he walked out without saying another word.

Whatever love he felt for Laurel, or thought he felt, began to die at that moment. It certainly died less than twenty-four hours later when she confronted them at the club, obviously drunk and stoned, and hurled insult after insult at Felicity while he just stood there in shock and let it happen. Felicity’s eyes, normally so bright and animated, were almost dead as she stared at him, not even acknowledging Laurel’s insults, just him. She just stood there, Laurel spewing one filthy accusation after another in her face, staring into his soul and begging him silently to do something. He couldn’t though; it was like he was frozen in place. He couldn’t move, couldn’t speak, until Laurel rushed towards her with her hand raised in a slap and then he acted.

In a voice that was as cold and dead as his feelings for the woman whose arm he held, he asked Felicity to leave them. He couldn’t even bear to watch as she walked away because he knew what he’d see reflected in her eyes if he did. Even so, the pain and anger he knew she felt towards him was nothing compared to the self-loathing he had for himself. He knew why he froze up, why he couldn’t even bear to look at her for days afterwards. It was because when Laurel had walked into the room and saw his hand on her shoulder, saw him embrace her then apologize for their earlier argument…

…when he pulled away and looked down at her, that was the moment he decided to finally kiss her. He had nearly lost her again and he wanted to kiss her so he could prove to himself she was real and that she was safe. He wanted to take her in his arms and taste her so badly it hurt. Their eyes locked and his head dipped towards hers but then Laurel began to yell at them and he froze. That’s what Laurel saw even if Felicity didn’t. She saw the look on his face, the irrefutable proof in his expression that told her he had fallen in love with another woman.

He should have done like Dig had advised and apologized to her later but he didn’t. He could never bring himself to apologize to her because, as contrite as he felt over the whole situation with Laurel, he was also still angry with her and at himself. When he discovered she’d been taken by the Sewer King, it brought back memories of the night she almost died at her own hand.

For him.

She almost killed herself for him just like she almost got herself killed chasing after Thea into the goddamn sewer.

Dig and Lance could laugh about it but every time he pictured that day, every time he saw her, all he could think about was that explosive device in her pocket and how she’d reached for the detonator as Slade dragged her away. How she booby-trapped herself again in order to take him down; only this time it wasn’t a syringe filled with Mirakuru antiserum in her pocket, it was a fucking bomb.

From the first time he opened his eyes in the hospital to the moment he finally broke in the conference room, all he could think about was that he was going to lose her. All he could see was some madman’s gun in her side or Slade’s blade at her throat. There was no respite from his thoughts, not even when he slept. Every dream was filled with memories of hot July rain, the way her hair whipped around her head as she reached inside her pocket for that damn detonator, and the look in her eyes as she walked away with him.

In every single dream she was always walking away and he was always watching her go.

In response, he kept pushing her further away emotionally; struggling with the anger he felt towards her for nearly getting herself killed and the confusion over the feelings she inspired within him. It had been getting harder and harder to deny the attraction he’d felt for her when Garret blew into their lives but when Slade...

He swallowed, he knew he should have sent her away a long time ago but he couldn’t bring himself to release her; he was far too selfish for that. He needed her then and, God help him, part of him always would.

As Diggle continued telling the story with animated gestures and a huge grin on his face, Oliver allowed his thoughts to return to that night; the night they confronted Slade and almost lost.

The night he almost lost her forever:

“It’s my birthday.”

“I know.”

“This was fun, kid, but it’s time to end it,” Slade said in an almost bored tone as he stood over him to deliver the coup de grace.

Oliver hung his head, ready for it. He was so tired, just so fucking tired. His team was either dead or dying. Roy had been beaten to the point that his face looked like chopped meat and his chest was still; if he wasn’t dead yet, he soon would be. Sara was unconscious and bleeding out. She’d come at him with deadly intent and accuracy but Slade had run her through with one of his blades without even sparing her a second glance. Dig was barely hanging on, his femur shattered by a bullet and two more in his chest, blood bubbling out of his mouth as he struggled to maintain consciousness. He’d be dead only minutes after Slade was done with him. As for his fate…

Oliver watched as Slade casually reached into the quiver of arrows that were lying in the dirt and mud. The belt had broken and he’d been disarmed of his weapons of choice after Slade had sliced him across the chest and through the thick military issue Kevlar vest he wore like it was nothing. He’d then tossed him a sword of his own just to stretch out the torture a bit longer. He was good with a sword, almost as good as he was with a bow, but Slade was better.

First he’d sliced into his right thigh, then left a nasty but relatively shallow cut on his left bicep, then he’d pierced his right shoulder. When the blade fell from his grip, Slade suspended the fight so that Oliver could pick it up and carry on left handed. He was bleeding fairly heavily by then and blood was running down that arm and making the hilt slick in his grip but it didn’t matter; a few seconds later he’d stabbed him through the thigh of his left leg, sending him to his knees. He then pieced his side, sending him to the ground, writing in pain. Even though Slade had strategically avoided any arteries, he was losing blood quickly. Already he could feel himself becoming light headed. He struggled to get back up and Slade pinned him to the ground like an insect to a collection board, his blade entering his left shoulder and digging deep into the ground before he pulled it out again.

From within a hidden pocket in his armor, Slade pulled out a pristine white handkerchief and wiped the blood from the steel then tossed it on Oliver’s bruised and battered body contemptuously before retrieving the fallen sword and sheathing both weapons behind his back.

Just before he reached for the arrow, he took off his mask and tossed it on the ground, then bent down with his head toward him so that Oliver had no choice but to look into the face of the man he once called ‘brother’, the man who’d killed his mother right in front of him, who’d kidnapped his sister, who’d terrorized them for years, and who was now about to kill him. He’d cast off his eye patch so Oliver could see the gruesome evidence of his betrayal all those years ago and offered him an almost pitying smile. “Goodbye, kid,” Slade said as he examined the arrow in his hands, twirling it a bit in his grip. “Believe it or not, I’m going to miss you.”

Time slowed, the air grew thick, and a weight seemed to lift from his chest as he calmly accepted that his journey had come to an end. As he waited for the final blow, a single thought came to him.
It wasn’t about his friends or his family, it wasn’t flashes of his life, it wasn’t regret or prayers to a god he didn’t believe in; it was of her.

Felicity.

She was safe, he thought. Slade couldn’t go after her now. By now ARGUS would have gotten in touch with her and Thea and Trevor’s assistant would have arranged for them to be taken into protective custody. This had always been about him and Slade; despite her being the one to dose him with the antiserum, Felicity was an innocent. She shouldn’t have to pay for his sins. Even if this was the end he knew he could die with the knowledge that Slade would never be able to touch her ever again.

He closed his eyes and remembered her smile, her scent, and the sweet sound of her voice one last time before facing his killer, and then...

Something happened; something he didn’t understand. Maybe it had been a trick of the light or blood loss, but one minute it was just him and Slade and the next thing he knew there she was, standing between them. It was as though his mind had summoned her forth so that she could whisk him into the afterlife.

That’s what he thought she was, at first; a hallucination. He was even grateful that his sanity had snapped so that his last moments could be with her before realizing that all was not right. If she was his hallucination then why did she have her back to him? He could see her features in profile, trace the curves of her face with his eyes, but her focus was completely on Slade instead of him. In his state of pain and blood loss he found himself more than a little put out about that. It was then that he caught the look of shock on the other man’s face and realized he could see her as well. In fact, the other man was so caught off guard by her presence that he actually fell back several steps to openly gape at her before regaining his composure.

“Hello, lovely one,” he greeted her with an almost questioning inflection as his one good eye locked on her form, “Where did you pop in from?”

As soon as the words left the other man’s mouth, Oliver reacted. He began screaming at her to run, get away, but she ignored him to the point that Oliver almost felt as though he were locked in a nightmare. It was as though neither of them could hear him.

It was as though their focus was completely on one another and the rest of the world had faded away. Including him.

Especially him.

“It’s been a while hasn’t it?” He asked her.

“A little over a year, almost a year and a half, since you kidnapped me,” she said.

“Kidnapped is such an ugly word for it, darling. I thought you enjoyed our little talk that night; I know I did. I’ve replayed it in my mind a thousand times since then,” his eye traced her features. “Couldn’t stay away, could you? Did you miss me? I know I’ve missed you.”

“It’s my birthday,” she said, apropos to nothing, her tone calm and composed as she looked up into the face of the man whose name had become synonymous with their deaths.

“I know,” he said quietly, his one good eye still trained on her, his voice equally measured and calm. He reached behind his back and drew one of his swords, the slick sound of metal against metal causing bile to rise in his throat. Oliver continued to scream as he struggled to drag himself over to them but it was useless. He made a show of checking his wrist which was absent of any sort of timepiece mockingly, “But wait, not quite midnight yet though, love. We still have a few minutes until your birthday proper.”

“That’s good, maybe I’ll get to have cake after all,” she said, her voice surprisingly strong and unafraid.

“If you want a cake, I’ll get you a cake,” he told her with a slight uplifting of the corners of his mouth even as his grip tightened on the hilt of the sword that hung at his side. “I’ll even help you blow out the candles.”

“I can blow out my own candles, thanks,” she told him.

“Are you sure, love?” He asked, his voice dark and silky as he took a step toward her. “Twenty-three is a lot of candles to blow out for such a biddy wee thing as you.”

Something about his tone, the way he was looking at her, filled Oliver with an unspeakable rage. He began to scream and claw the ground in frustration as he tried to get the bastard’s attention off of Felicity but his struggles were opening his wounds further and he was bleeding more profusely now.
As the blood flowed from him so did his strength.

“And I suppose you were planning on bringing me a present later as well; maybe to pay me back for injecting you with the anti-serum?”

A strange quote popped in his mind then.

The anticipation of death brings fear but with the surety of death comes acceptance.

It was her lack of fear, her lack of any emotion really, that had scared him the most. He recognized that look. He’d worn it himself on more than one occasion. The look she gave him belonged on the face of someone resigned to their fate; it was an acknowledgement of the fact that she was about to die.

“I was actually, but not because of that bit of unpleasantness,” he said as though amused by her show of bravado. “Honestly, I wouldn’t have missed meeting you for the world even if I knew that I would wind up living in a hole on Lian Yu for several months afterwards. Thank goodness Malcolm decided to come pay me a visit; it was getting a bit lonely with just the rats and my ARGUS jailers tossing food into my cell twice a day. The first thing I thought about when I got out, was how much I wanted to see you again. After all, Oliver so rudely interrupted us the last time.”

“Listen Slade, as much as I appreciate conversations filled with veiled threats and light banter, if you’re going to kill me then you might as well do it now,” she told him and Oliver gave a strangled sound of agony although it wasn’t due to his injuries. Just like his mother had, she was offering her life to Slade on a silver platter. He was going to murder her right in front of his eyes and there was nothing he could do about it.

“You want to die, love?” He asked her curiously as he juggled his grip on the sword as though weighing it.

“Not particularly,” she told him dispassionately. “But I won’t live my life looking over my shoulder either. If you want to kill me, Slade; just do it. My only request is that you don’t make a spectacle of it.”

“What’s the fun in that?” Slade asked her. “Making him watch as you die is the whole point, after all.
Without that, it’s just wasted effort on my part.”
Oliver began screaming again and Felicity glanced over at him as though begging him to quiet down. She sighed and turned her attention back to Slade, “He’s already dying, Slade,” she said evenly. “Plus, it’s my birthday or near enough; call it a last request. I don’t care if you kill me just that I go with my dignity intact. I know what happens to bodies when they die and, without going into the gross details, I’d rather not have anyone see me like that. I won’t fight you, I won’t cry; just take me somewhere off in the distance behind a rock or something where no one can see and do it, then burn my body or toss me in a truck and haul me off somewhere.”

“Haul you off?” Slade repeated with a smirk. Felicity speaking to him as though they were in the Lair and he was a member of their intimate circle seemed to amuse him greatly. “That’s a bit undignified as well, don’t you think? Just out of curiosity, how is my treating you like a bin full of rubbish any better than killing you here?”

“Simple; I have this kind of phobia about morgues,” she said, scrunching up her nose.

“Morgues?” He repeated with a twitch of his lips.

“Specifically about being naked and dead in one.” Again his lips twitched and she sighed in exasperation, “Have you ever seen the kinds of guys who work in those places? They’re creepy. Plus, they take off your clothes in the morgue. I read this article once about necrophilia and the fact that it occurs a lot more than people think and—” She stopped and took a breath, “The point is that, even if I’m dead, I still have a problem with…fluids and having some creepy guy looking up my skirt, okay?”

He leveled his weapon at her, allowing it to rest lightly on her shoulder near her throat, “While I can appreciate your reasoning, love, flawed though it may be, I didn’t do that for Moira Queen; why should I grant you your request even if it is your birthday?”

Felicity placed her hands in her pockets just as lightning lit up the sky drawing his attention to the fact that, from the knees down, the legs of her jeans were drenched in blood; far too much blood for a simple wound. His chest began to spasm in a fresh fit of coughing as waves of panic seized him. She shivered as though she was cold before stepping forward, the razor sharp blade brushing against her hair and causing a few golden strands to float away on the wind. She looked up into his one good eye and spoke, “Because I’m not Moira, that’s why, nor am I Sara or Laurel or any other woman in Oliver’s harem. We both know that I don’t really mean anything to him, I just work for him. I was just the designated bait. I’m not the woman he loves; he tricked you into believing that to save Laurel the last time. I’m expendable which is why he set me up to take the risk when he needed to inject you with the cure. You can kill me in front of him but the only one who’ll care about it is me.”

Oliver’s heart caught in his throat as she spoke. The way she said it was so matter of factly, as if she were reading him her laundry list. She couldn’t really believe that, could she; that her death would mean nothing to him?

He raised a sardonic eyebrow, “Are you telling me this so I’ll have pity on you because you’re some poor little orphan whose heart Oliver Queen left out in the cold?”

She offered him a humorless smile, “No. I’m not asking for pity or for mercy, Slade; you wouldn’t offer it if I did. I didn’t tell you that because I’m some depressed teenager with a crush quoting Sylvia Plath on my twitter feed; it’s just the truth. I am not now, nor have I ever been, Oliver’s girl.”

Oliver’s jaw clenched and he pawed at the wet earth under him as he tried to stand and failed.

“And how is this not suicide, darling?” Slade asked her, rubbing the flat of his blade on her cheek.
“You knew coming here would mean your death and yet, here you are. Why did you come? Is it because you couldn’t bear to live without your dear Oliver or is it because you just couldn’t wait to see me?” He asked with cruel sarcasm.

“I don’t know why; Call Dr. Horder,” she quipped as though his blade wasn’t mere centimeters from slicing open her carotid.

“Call who?” He asked with a frown.

“Dr. Horder…you know, from Sylvia Plath’s suicide note. She changed her mind at the last minute?” She prompted hopefully. At his blank expression she sighed, “Look, I can see how a guy who carries around swords and goes all stab-y with people might not be into feminist poetry but you didn’t even watch the movie with Gwyneth Paltrow? No? Seriously? I mean, you’re supposed to be British-adjacent; I always thought you people had a thing for her.” She wrinkled her nose then made a dismissive hand gesture, ignoring the fact that her jerky movements put her so close to the edge of his blade that even Slade looked somewhat discomfited for a moment and backed off slightly, “You know what, never mind.”

“Look, I can see how a guy who carries around swords and goes all stab-y with people might not be into feminist poetry but you didn’t even watch the movie with Gwyneth Paltrow? No? Seriously? “If I’ve always been so important, then why didn’t you come for me like you did everybody else the first time around? I mean, you didn’t even notice me until the very end. I waited, for months I waited, but you never showed. It's a shame too because I bought tea and the really fancy cookies that come in the tin. I even bought you your own cup.” Her mouth curved into a grim smile, “It was black and had a little gold skull and crossbones on it and everything. I was going to get it personalized but I wasn’t sure if you’d prefer ‘Slade’ or ‘Deathstroke’ on your mug instead.”

“You’re just adorable, aren’t you, darling?” The other man’s lips twitched upwards again and he stepped forward even closer still, his eye taking on a strange cast that sent bolts of fear down Oliver’s spine. It was a smoldering look, a look of keen interest towards an attractive woman. “I bet you did it too, didn’t you? Bought me bikkies and tea and sat down in your little basement just waiting for me to come ‘round? Oh, I have missed you.”

Even though he could only see her profile, even with her hair loose and dripping wet, the wind causing it to whip heavily around her, he knew more than anyone how beautiful she was; how she sometimes glowed with an inner light that seemed to draw you in until everything else fell away.
Lightning struck and the ground seemed to shake as thunder echoed around them. The entire sky lit up and, for a split second, the world was as bright as day. The smile on Slade’s face broadened as his eye swept over her sweet face. “I wasn’t being neglectful back then, I assure you. I was merely saving the best for last just as I was planning to do this time.”

“And I’m the best?” Felicity asked with a skeptical note. “What did I do to rate such high praise? I’m just the executive assistant to a vigilante; a tech. I’m not a very good one either apparently. After all, I don’t get coffee and you broke into my basement a couple of times at least despite my encryptions.
There’s absolutely nothing special about me. I’m nobody.”

“Not true,” Slade practically purred as he stepped even closer but Felicity never wavered, never showed the slightest fear, and Oliver could sense the other man’s admiration for her increase. “I actually think you’re quite extraordinary despite reports to the contrary.”

“Maybe you should fire your researcher then,” she suggested.

“Oh, I intend to; with prejudice, dear heart,” he said with an edge of darkness although his tone and expression remained pleasant. “I always make a point of paying back those who betray me. Oliver can attest to that.”

Felicity took a deep breath and he could see her square her shoulders as she centered herself. “You do realize that you’re sick, right? The Mirakuru has made you insane. The anti-serum might have lessened it, but you’re still delusional.”

“Why would you say that, love?” He asked her, again stepping forward until he was well into her personal space. His hand reached out and he brushed a wet tendril of hair off her forehead, tucking it behind her ear in an intimate gesture that sent Oliver into a rage. He began to scream obscenities at the other man, saying anything and everything he could to take his attention off of Felicity but neither of them seemed to notice.

“We can help you, Slade. We can find a cure and not the one we tried last time; the scientists at STAR Labs are close to finding a real solution, we just need you to cooperate. We can cure you and you can go back to being the man you once were. Oliver said you were once a good man, that you loved Shado,” she told him, still calm and not reacting to either his overwhelming presence or his touch, instead looking him in the eye and speaking with a quiet intensity as though her words could somehow break through his madness. “You’ve done terrible things, monstrous things, but it’s still not too late. None of this was your fault; not Moira, not any of it. The Mirakuru made you do those things. Shado loved both of you. She wouldn’t want you to do this. Please, let us help you.”

“I appreciate the kind offer, sweet, but you’re wrong,” he told her, the darkness again passing over his expression. “I’m perfectly sane. The ‘cure’ you injected me with cleared all that up entirely. I’m fully aware of what I’m doing and why. Shado would want to be avenged. She deserves to be avenged for his betrayal and he deserves to die.” He smiled coldly, “Besides, what terrible things have I done either before or since you injected me with the ‘cure’? I took Thea but did I hurt her?
No. I kept her comfortable and safe then let her go without so much as a hair out of place. Oliver; well, Oliver earned his punishment. Roy Harper and Moira Queen? It was unfortunate that Blood chose to dose him with the serum but he did, and afterwards I needed the boy in order to transfuse the Mirakuru into my soldiers. I’m not going to apologize for it; he was a common street thug and a criminal before receiving the dark gift, not an innocent and Moira certainly wasn’t. She was as cold-blooded as they come and a well-connected member of the League; her hands weren’t clean. As for the rest of Oliver’s little troop; Sara, his man, Diggle, your little bronze bullyman, Detective Lance?
They stood by him, they made that choice, came here, and I did what needed to be done. There is no innocent blood on my hands.”

“What about the device, Slade?” She asked him. “Isn’t setting off an Omega Device in the middle of Starling the same as killing innocents?”

“That’s simply business; nothing personal,” he told her. “I’m a businessman first and if the client says deliver the device then I deliver the device. I always keep my word. What Merlyn wants done with it is on him.”

“Merlyn’s dead! I killed him; he’s dead!” Oliver shouted. “Now let her go, you son of a bitch!”

“He might be dead, but he’s still the client. Besides, he’s died before and found his way back,” Slade said, acknowledging him at last. “Even so, the deal was stuck; he got me out of Lian Yu on the condition I help him and I always fulfill my contracts. The fact that I got to mix business with pleasure by watching you bleed out while I destroy everyone and everything you care about is merely a bonus,” he told Oliver darkly.

Felicity reached out, placing a trembling hand on Slade’s chest and causing the man to place his entire focus back on her and away from him, “Please just stop,” she begged him. “Please, don’t do this. Don’t hurt thousands of people because of this thing between you and Oliver.”

“Too late, pet; what’s done is done,” he told her sadly, covering her hand with his and sighed. “You have such a tender heart; I really wish you’d stayed in your basement, darling. I never intended for you to be part of this and I certainly didn’t want to break your heart any more than I had to by killing all your little friends in front of you like this. I was going to swing by and pick you up when all of this was done, get you to safety.” He smiled at her again moving her trembling hand so it rested above his heart, “Believe it or not, I’m not the devil you think I am. I thought about killing you, yes,” he stroked her fingers with his own causing her to jump slightly, “especially after I found out who your father was, but it was easy to see that you were merely an innocent in all this so I let you be. Now does that sound like the act of a villain or a madman?”

“What are you talking about?” She asked jerking her hand away in alarm, a great gust of wind drowning out her words, “…have to do with this?”

“Not him, love; your biological father,” he told her. “Anthony Ivo.”

His screams cut off then and he stared at Slade in shock.

No, he thought, that wasn’t true. That was a lie. Because if it was true then…

“My biological father’s name wasn’t ‘Anthony’, it was ‘Henri’.” Oliver could hear the confusion in her voice even as his heart stopped. “Why would you think Ivo was my father?”

He was going to kill her, he thought. Despite his teasing smile and kindly tone, whether it was true or not, whether Felicity was Ivo’s daughter or if it was just another one of his delusions, Slade believed it and he was going to tear her apart with his bare hands because of it.

Slade’s smile took on a cruel twist and his eye left her to rest on Oliver’s shocked expression. “Your father’s name was Anthony Ivo but I can understand why you’d want to deny it. He was, after all, a bit of a mad scientist in addition to being a sadist. He came to Lian Yu to seek a cure for your mother’s illness; specifically Mirakuru. Ivo killed Shado because of him and he, your precious Oliver,” he nodded in his direction, “he killed your father.”

“What are you talking about? I--!” She turned her head to glance at Oliver as if to confirm what he was saying but all the breath had left his lungs. “Oliver?”

“He won’t deny it, love. He knows it’s too late for that,” Slade said with a cruel smirk. “Besides, your father had it coming. Ivo was a monster. His obsession with finding the serum turned him into a sadistic madman. He owned a ship, the Amazo, and filled it with men he’d bought or captured then experimented on them as he sent mercenaries to the island to seek out the Mirakuru. He was being backed by the League, by Ra’s al Ghul himself, in search of this ‘miracle’ that could cure any illness and grant remarkable strength and healing abilities to anyone who was injected.” His eye fell on her again, “After Oliver injected me with the serum he supposedly destroyed it and, in revenge, Ivo killed Shado. Because of him,” he turned his attention back to Oliver, his pleasant expression gone as hatred raged in his dark eye. “He chose to save his little blonde girlfriend and he let him shoot Shado. Ivo killed her because he chose to let her die!”

“You’re wrong,” Felicity said quietly, her voice wavering for the first time. “I don’t know who told you that man was my father, but they were lying.”

“He was, love,” he said almost gently as he turned his attention to her again. “See, I didn’t get to where I am by leaving all of the details to my subordinates. After my ‘researcher’ told me how insignificant you were, I took it upon myself to dig deeper. As lovely as you are,” his gaze skimmed over her appreciatively again, “I knew Oliver didn’t just keep you around to warm his bed like they had suggested. I had you watched, followed, and despite what my source claimed, it was obvious that you were not intimately involved with him and yet you were in the inner circle as it were. I dug deep until I discovered your connection to Ivo. At first I assumed Oliver was planning his own revenge by destroying the daughter of the man who’d captured and tortured us, but that didn’t make a lot of sense as he’d already killed your father years before.”

Oliver felt his eyes close briefly and his heart clenched. This was worse than death, he thought. If Ivo was her father then she would hate him for the rest of her life, however brief that was. It didn’t matter that Ivo was a monster, that he begged him to end his life; he would have to die knowing she hated him and she would die thinking he’d murdered her father in cold blood.

Felicity turned to look at Oliver again, her eyes wide and unblinking. “It’s not true…” she said but Oliver could only look on in horror as his worst fears were brought to light.

“Imagine my amusement when I discovered that he didn’t have a clue as to who you really were,” Slade said with a dark chuckle. “But then again, neither did you. He’d left before you were even born and his name wasn’t on your birth certificate.” His fingers grasped her chin and forced her to turn to him, one of his hands cupping her cheek in a gentle caress. “I watched you very carefully after that, not that I needed a reason to watch you.”

His hand slid from her cheek to her neck, wrapping his fingers around it lightly and stroking the hollow of her throat and her collarbone with his thumb. His touch was gentle but the threat was obvious. Oliver found his voice and began to yell again but they both continued to ignore him.

“I confess that at one point I thought about killing you, of wrapping my fingers around your delicate throat and squeezing the breath from your lungs.” His tilted his head, bringing his mouth and nose to the curve of her neck and inhaled her perfume deeply. “Or, better yet, slicing through your flesh and watching Oliver’s face as you bled out.” He brought his head up, his eyes gazing deeply into hers until they were nearly nose to nose, their lips nearly touching. “But then, as I watched you and later after we had our little moment together, I realized two things: One, that it would be better to let you live so that right before I killed Oliver I could tell him that the woman he trusted above all others was the daughter of the man who tortured him and murdered Shado. And two, it was obvious that you were an innocent and, like I said before, I still have some standards, love. Besides, killing you would be a sin,” he said with another tender look his lips skating across her cheek. “Something as precious as you is meant to be appreciated.”

“It’s a bit late to be worrying about your eternal soul, don’t you think?” She said defiantly, but a tinge of nervousness had begun to creep into her tone now.

“It’s never too late, love. Perhaps you could be my redeemer? In fact, isn’t that what you offered me just moments ago; the opportunity to be better if I allowed you to ‘cure’ me of my sins?” He reached up and brushed more of her hair off her forehead, his eye again tracing the contours of her face, “You’re an unusual girl for this day and age, you know. I knew it from the very first time I saw you. So sweet, so pure...so beautiful,” his finger lightly traced her lips and Oliver began to drag himself over with his one good arm, rage boiling within him as he continued to threaten and curse the other man with every foul obscenity he knew. “A true lady; ‘an old-fashioned girl’ as my dear old mum would say. Shado was like that at the heart of it. Oh, she wasn’t as innocent or as pure in body or deed as you, love, but she was in spirit. You remind me of her for some reason. You’re both so different and yet there’s something about you...” He pulled back slightly, his brow furrowed in chagrin. “Still, had I been faced with no other choice, as much as it would have pained me, I would have done what needed doing. Luckily for us both, that didn’t happen because an old friend reached out to me recently and requested that I allow you to live, not that I needed much convincing. He just gave me a convenient excuse to hand to Merlyn as to why you should be spared.”

“An important friend and a dangerous enemy for a man in my particular line of business, love; and someone neither I nor Malcolm Merlyn wanted to make an enemy of again if we could help it.” He smiled enigmatically, “The devil himself.”

Movement caught the edge of Oliver’s vision and he looked past Slade to the truck with the device in the back. He watched as Lance, his leg stiff and wrapped in a dark colored tourniquet limped towards the device using a branch as a makeshift crutch and placed a circular magnetic object in the wheel well under the gas tank, the pale blue LED lights cutting through the darkness for a second to show it had been activated before dimming.

Lance looked over to Felicity as he hurried away from the truck as best he could after planting a second charge on the crate holding the device itself. He eased off the back of the truck, their eyes meeting for a split second before his gaze caught Oliver’s. The older man seemed to age in that moment as he gave him a pitying look before continuing to limp towards cover. With a sinking feeling Oliver realized what was happening, why Felicity had been so calm, why she stood there talking to Slade for so long with that look on her face, why she kept encouraging him to take her with him. His eyes scanned her figure and he saw it at last, just barely hidden by her untucked tee shirt, there was the tell-tale bulge of a detonator in one pocket and the curve of an explosive device in the other.

He began to shout even more frantically, his words carried away by the wind and rendered ineffectual by the howl of the storm and his own declining physical state. He struggled to get to his feet but blood loss had left him weak. He began to sob in frustration as Felicity continued to bait the beast in order to give Lance the time he needed to get to safety and then she was going to set off the charges he’d planted on the truck and the one in her pocket.

They were already dead or dying, the whole team. She was the last one left standing.

They had failed to stop Slade from getting the weapon and now she was going to complete their mission even though it meant sacrificing herself. She was going to die one way or the other, by his hand or her own, and there was nothing he could do about it.
This wasn’t the plan. She was never supposed to be involved. They all agreed; all of them. Felicity wasn’t supposed to be in the line of fire. She wasn’t supposed to die. He’d placed her in this position once before and he vowed to never do it again. Yes, it had been her plan and, yes, Laurel’s life had been on the line as well as the rest of the city, but after they defeated Slade the last time he swore he would never allow that bastard anywhere near her ever again no matter what the cost.

“He--!” He coughed, a spray of blood coloring the ground in front of him. Must have nicked a lung; his breathing became labored. “Felicity!” He cried out hoarsely.

He should have kissed her.

The odd thought brushed across his mind; he should have kissed her. When he told her he loved her in order to bait the trap for Slade, when Helena came back after escaping from prison and threatened her a second time, when he let go of Connor and she held his head on her lap, stroking his hair gently as he cried behind the bar; he should have kissed her.

That moment would never happen if he couldn’t get up, not if he let her go with Slade this time. Lightning wouldn’t strike twice; this time he really would kill her.

“Felicity,” he breathed, his voice failing him. “Please don’t…” But she either couldn’t hear him or she was ignoring him entirely.

“What devil? What are you talking about?” She asked in confusion.

“A powerful man who has become somewhat of a benefactor to us both it seems; Mephistopheles, old dag, the cruel brute himself. He has a thousand names rumored to be lost throughout the centuries but, in this game, love; all roads lead to him. Enough of all that; business talk can wait,” he looked down at her affectionately. “Now, I know you’re feeling a mite bit cross with me but I do hope that in time you’ll forgive me for all this unpleasantness.” He smiled at her, a tender curving of his lips that seemed even more frightening for some reason than the mask of rage he normally wore. Lightning struck again, illuminating her features and his smile broadened, “By God, you’re a beauty, aren’t you? No picture, no mere sketch, not even a memory could compare to seeing you like this; true flesh and blood,” his hand reached out and skimmed her waist, testing her ribcage and stopping just short of her breast. Felicity stiffened, tilting her body slightly to the side so his fingers missed the bulge in her pockets as she shoved her trembling hands inside them. “I was right the last time; you are absolutely lovely to behold and far stronger than I had initially given you credit for.” He moved slightly closer to her, his eyes dropping to trace the line of her body as his hand pulled her closer, drawing slowly down her spine and pulling her toward him gently as the lightning crashed around them. “I confess, back when we first met I began to develop a bit of a crush on you,” he said in a low intimate tone. Oliver somehow leveraged himself up on his forearms and began to inch toward them. He screamed in pain and fury as the other man’s hand dipped down to the curve of her denim-clad behind. “I’ve never stopped feeling tender towards you either. Struth but my little crush has become a full blown swell of emotions that the months away have deepened considerably.” His nose nuzzled into her wet curls and he inhaled deeply once again.

His head bent towards her, his mouth so close to her ear that Oliver could see her tremble at his proximity. “You’re so like her, you know. You wouldn’t think so; you’re the sun where she was the moon, but you share a spirit. So courageous, so beautiful; how lucky am I to have met not one, but two such women in my lifetime? Seeing your eyes spark with righteous indignation as they caught the flash of the lightning,” he straightened, his hands drawing upwards to cup her elbows and grinned down at her, “magnificent. I couldn’t kill you after that; no, you’re too rare a bird. Why would I ever have cause to hurt you, love? I want you to know that I would have never laid so much as a harsh finger on your beautiful skin even without the terrible ghost himself stepping in at the eleventh hour as he did. From this moment on, you will always be safe, love; you will be cherished, protected, and you will always belong to me.” He swallowed as his finger brushed the line of her throat, traced the deep V of her neckline, and stopped just above where her dark tee-shirt clung to her breasts, the impression of her lace bra and tight nipples visible through the thin wet fabric. His eye took on a strange light, as if the reflective flash of the storm raging around them was caught in its dark depths. His hand brushed her wet hair from her cheek before cupping it tenderly, “I won’t make the same mistakes with you that I made with her, sweet. You’re coming with me where I’ll see to it that you’re kept far away from the likes of Oliver Queen.”

“You’re going to kill him,” she reminded him. “Do you honestly think I could ever feel anything for you after that?”

“Perhaps not,” He said with a smirk. “Tell you what, in the spirit of your birthday that will be my gift to you: Oliver Queen will live.” Finally, he turned his eye toward his bloody and battered form and chuckled, “He’ll live knowing what it was that he lost and you’ll live a long and comfortable life with me just like Shado should have. You’ll want for nothing and, in time, you’ll forget this life; forget him.” Again, he smiled, the strange light in his eye tinged with madness, “You’ll even want to thank me for this someday, but no need. It is my honor to take you under my protection. My former companion was so disappointing. She failed me twice, but you…” he gave another soft laugh. “That would be just too perfect; a fitting replacement for so many reasons. After all, Ivo took Shado from me; it’s only fitting that I take his daughter as my new companion in exchange.” He ran his finger across her cheek again and smiled benevolently. “I will give you such a good life, I promise you,” he breathed against her lips, “A life filled with untold pleasures,” his other hand skimmed her abdomen and moved upwards to brush against her nipple causing her to jerk away and Oliver to scream and toss one of the arrows he found on the ground toward him ineffectually, the tip landing just short of the other man's ankle.

“So, instead of killing me you want to force me to become your companion?” She made no attempt to hide her disgust even though she was now clearly terrified. “I thought you said you were an honorable man,” Felicity spat out. “How is taking a woman against her will honorable?” At her words, Oliver again mustered up the last of his strength and began to drag his bloody body through the dirt and mud again in desperation. He found another arrow, the shaft broken in half from being trampled under Slade’s foot, but the tip was still sharp enough to penetrate flesh. He wouldn’t touch her again, he vowed. He’d drive his arrow through the bastard’s skull for touching her like that! Somehow he had to save her but he was so weak…so weak…

He collapsed and the light began to fade as his blood pressure dropped. He stopped calling out to her and attempted to catch his breath in order to muster his strength.

“I won’t have to force you; I promise, love,” he told her with a slow grin. “You’ll come along willingly because I’ll let him live and even see to it he gets proper medical attention before we go. Even then I won’t lay a finger on you until you’re ready for me. I actually had a slow seduction in mind already. You deserve to be loved with the utmost care and patience, after all; just like she should have been.” He ran his thumb just under her full bottom lip, “I wanted to take my time, bring you to the point that when I do have you in my bed you’ll be a willing participant. It’s better that way, you see; more satisfying for us both and you are worth the extra effort, that’s obvious.” His mouth dipped towards hers again in a near kiss, “I have so much to teach you,” he whispered, then covered the last few millimeters of distance that separated them, tasting her at last. It was just a fleeting caress of his lips on hers before she again jerked away, her absolute terror now painfully obvious.

“Oh my, you’re positively covered in goosebumps.” He chuckled as he straightened, lifting her hand and bringing it out of her pocket. He kissed the back of it gently as her spine stiffened but she didn’t snatch it away. “Such cold hands and you’re shaking like a leaf. Let me warm them for you.” He brought the second one up and rubbed them between his own, blowing on them as she seemed to vibrate with fear and cold even though the air around them was almost sweltering despite the storm.

“You’ve such thin blood, love; we should get you out of this weather before you catch your death.” Her breath hitched as tears mixed with the rain on her cheeks and he chuckled again. “Now, now,” he grinned in triumph, “no arguing with me and no pouting. We can’t have you getting sick; we have a long journey ahead of us.” He dropped her hands gently and ran the back of his knuckles along her cheek bone again, “Oh my sweet darling girl, I know you’re scared; I know all these,” he took a breath, his eyes skimming her form again, “passionate urges you’re experiencing must seem so confusing to someone who’s been as sheltered as you, but I promise to make our eventual coming together as precious a memory as I can. You’ll come to see that in time. I only hate that we had to start off on such bad footing. If only you were just the little mouse of a secretary I was told you were when all this began and had never been touched by this ugliness, I would have been able to woo you with flowers and chaste kisses; I would have had the honor of treating you like the lady you are. Unfortunately, you’ve fallen into the same trap as my Shado did. He seduced you, love; perhaps not in the carnal sense, but he convinced you of his loyalty and honor when he has none. It will take a bit more effort on my part now, but it will be worth it in the end, I think.”

“That will never happen in a million years,” she assured him, her voice filled with disgust. “Even if you take me with you, even if I go along willingly, the Arrow has friends, I have friends; friends who will stop at nothing to get to me and they will hunt you down to the ends of the Earth if that’s what it takes!”

“You have no friends, love; only me,” he said with a surprising amount of compassion. “I’m your only true friend left. I’ve been watching you, remember? You’re all alone in this world, sweet. The only person who will ever come for you is me. You go home alone, you eat alone, you wake up alone; every hour you are not with him and his little gang, you’re bundled up in your tiny little house all by yourself. I’ve had eyes on you for a while now and not one man has ever knocked upon your door save the copper and he wasn’t even there to see you; he was there for his murdering whore daughter. You, my sweet, are inconsequential both to him and to her.”

He moved closer to her, his lips thinning apologetically as his brow furrowed in something approaching sympathy, “No one else cares about you but me. Oliver used you and your feelings for him as he took one woman after the other into his bed and treated you like you didn’t even exist. He set you up as a sacrificial goat and called you his ‘friend’, but was he yours?” He looked over at Oliver and sneered, “Did he ever once check on you? Did he try to protect you? No. I doubt he’s ever even bothered to find out where you lay your head at night once he’s done with you. The first time he was so vigilant, but this time?” He shook his head, “I’ve been gone from Lian Yu for weeks and he never once came to your door in all that time. Oliver had his women, his man, Diggle, had his own concerns, and, once again, you were left all alone. Were you mine I would have had an entire squad of men guarding your doorstep but he couldn’t even be bothered to pop by; even after I took you the last time he ignored you. I could have killed you a thousand times over if I wanted to because he was so negligent. I even snuck into your little house one day on a lark to watch you sleep while he ran from the bed of one sister to another just to see if he’d notice.”

“What?” She asked, suddenly going pale with shock.

“Hmm,” he said with a low purr. “How sweet you were in your cozy little bed with the flowery sheets, curled around your pillow, and dressed in a pretty pink nightgown with your painted toes peeking out from under the covers. You almost looked like a child; you slept as only the truly innocent can. I was sorely tempted to crawl into bed beside you and hold you in my arms but I didn’t want to disturb your sleep so I gave you a bit of a kiss instead,” he smiled, the madness shining out of his eye then. “You made such a sweet noise at that and snuggled closer to me as if you knew I was there and you were finally safe. I tucked you in before heading into your kitchen. I was there so long that I was able to have a look around and tidy up a bit.” His smile broadened, “I found that lovely white lace summer frock on the back of your door and put it away for you. I had hoped to see you in it someday but we’ll buy you another soon enough.”

Felicity shook her head in denial, “No…”

He tutted, “Hush, it’s no bother; it will be my pleasure to spoil you in the days to come. I’ll buy you dresses and jewelry; anything that catches your fancy is yours for the asking.” He paused, “You know, many women these days feel they must expose themselves in order to attract attention, but what I adore about you is that you don’t feel the need to create such an obvious spectacle of yourself. You are always so modestly attired and ladylike; like a princess. My princess; saving all your hidden treasures for my eyes only,” he said, drawing his finger down her arm and causing her to shudder and him to grin possessively. “I put it away, tucked your glasses back into their case so they wouldn’t get scratched, and then made sure all your windows and doors were locked up tight so that no one could get to you.” He tilted his head closer, “I even fixed myself a sandwich and started your dishwasher before I left. Never let it be said that I don’t pull my own weight around the house, love.”

“No…” she breathed. “I thought-- I didn’t-- but--!” Her breath began to hitch again and she started to hyperventilate as her eyes grew large.

He made a soothing noise, “Yes, love. I could have killed you just that easily but I didn’t. I protected you, in fact, so no need to fret. I kept you safe then and I promise no one will ever hurt you. You’re my woman now and I keep what’s mine,” he told her, the darkness creeping into his tone as his eye lit up with that unholy fire once again. “My former companion wanted to have you killed out of, what I suspect, was jealousy on her part, but I wouldn’t allow it. No, you were mine and I wouldn’t let anyone hurt you, not even her. I knew I’d be taking you long before I saw the little play the two of you staged for me. Unlike Oliver, I was always your champion and you’ll see that in time.”

“You’re lying,” she told him. “That never happened! None of that ever happened,” she nearly shouted in denial, her shoulders shaking as she began to cry in earnest.

He shook his head, “But it did. Don’t cry, darling; there’s no need for all that fuss now. I don’t wish to upset you; I just need you to finally realize the truth: Oliver Queen does not love you, his man, Diggle, cannot protect you and neither can he. Neither of them care enough about you to even try. All you have now is me; I’m all you’ve ever had, love. There is no other man to warm your bed and treat you the way you deserve, no friends or family who knock upon your door except the ones who are tainted by his deceit. I’ve never lied to you; unlike him. Saving you from this empty existence would be a blessing and part of you knows that; it’s why you came to me before I came looking for you. Your presence here just proves what I already know; you belong to me.”

Somewhere deep inside him something broke when he heard those words. Using the last of the air in his lungs he screamed, the blood spraying out of his mouth like spittle, “Get away from her, you motherfucker!”

He laughed and glanced over at his bleeding and broken body dismissively before turning his attentions back to Felicity, “Besides darling, you should know by now that I’m a patient man and I always get what I want eventually,” he said with another amused chuckle. “Even if it takes years, sooner or later I’ll have you just like I should have had her; body and soul.”

“You’ll never own me, Slade,” she promised him brokenly. “Whatever it takes, no matter what I have to do, that will never happen.”

“You’re absolutely brilliant, love; so full of passion and fire. You’re so much like her in spirit.” His voice grew intimate and seductive, “She haunted me, you know; her ghost. She would whisper in my ear, drive me mad with lust and vengeance, but she was all that I had left so I clung to her just like you’re trying to cling to him now. Even when I took another woman into my bed, it was her I felt wrapped around me, but then I saw you.” That strange light glinted in the dark depths of his gaze once more. “Ever since that first time I looked into your beautiful blue eyes, so different from hers, so different from anyone’s, she began to fade away and I could feel her soul enter you. That’s why I let him take you back, it’s why I couldn’t so much as mark your precious flesh; I saw it, the light that seemed to shine around you, and I couldn’t hurt you. Not even to punish him. Shado had that same light. It’s strange,” he mused. “I didn’t even notice you at first, not even when I was watching all of them. I saw you, of course, but until I spent time with you, until we had our little conversation, I never knew just how special you were. It was as though…” He frowned suddenly, “It was as though you were hidden from me and then, one day, you just suddenly appeared. Just like when you--” The light began to die as he seemed to come to his senses. He shook his head in confusion. “How did you do that? Why didn’t I notice that until now? You just appeared to me; came out of nowhere…
how?”

“You’re insane,” she said scornfully. “Listen to what you’re saying, Slade! You’re talking gibberish!
There are no ghosts! I’m not Shado! There is no you and me! Ivo killed Shado, not Oliver, and he wasn’t my father! My father’s name was Henri! My mother said so!” She stepped towards him, “Listen to me! I’m trying to help you, Slade! The Mirakuru has affected your mind but it’s not too late! Take this chance I’m trying to give you; give us both! You can snap out of it if you try, really try!”

The confusion left his expression as the glint of obsession returned. He gave her a superior yet pitying look, “I’m sorry, sweet, but your father was Anthony Ivo. I have it on the highest authority; the best information broker money can buy.”

“Well, you need to ask for a refund then because they’re wrong!”

“Am I? Are you so sure of that? Anthony, Henri,” he said both names teasingly. “They sound very similar, love. Perhaps it’s you who’s confused?”

“I’m not confused, you are!” She nearly shouted in frustration. “His name was Henri; Henri Ducard, not Anthony Ivo!” She said insistently.

Oliver was distracted by his own sense of growing panic but, even so, he could have sworn he saw Slade grow pale as his face froze in shock. The man actually turned away from Felicity and took several steps towards the truck as though suddenly agitated by something she had revealed. He was so distracted that he didn’t catch the shadowy figure of Lance as he ducked behind a large rock some distance away from them. To Oliver’s unending horror, she trailed behind him, the distance between them growing further than he could ever hope to cross in his weakened condition.

Slade turned to her, his eye narrowing as the expression of blithe amusement made way for shrewd calculation. His lips twitched upwards slightly but it was a different sort of humor that lit up his expression this time. “When you said you had friends, love, you weren’t kidding. This explains why he went after Savant, why he contacted me out of the blue; the olive branch the demon extended to both myself and Merlyn on the condition you be kept alive... It explains a lot actually.”

“Who?” Felicity asked in frustration. “Who are these people you keep talking about? More ghosts?
Devils? What? Are you having conversations with Lucifer now?”

For a minute there Slade almost looked frightened, “Not Lucifer or Satan; the Demon, love, and like the devil from whom he takes his name, he’s someone you don’t want to deal with unless you’re willing to trade away your soul,” he told her, his voice growing more authoritative. “However, now that I have you it does change things up a bit.”

“Changes what?” Felicity asked him, walking toward him and, to Oliver’s dismay, her hand reached into her pocket again as she kept her body between him and Slade.

“Nothing to worry about, darling,” he assured her. “It just means that you and I will be taking a bit of a detour while I sort out a few details with our friend. Now that I realize why he wanted me to spare you, we’ll have to come to some sort of understanding, that’s all. I had plans for us that have, apparently, become a bit more complicated and I need to make sure not to step on any toes,” he told her distractedly right before the mad gleam reentered his expression. “In fact, if we play this right it could...” He stopped and gave a bark of laughter, his smile splitting his face in two. “Bloody hell, love, I knew you were special but I had no idea how much!” He ran his hand across his beard before turning his eye toward her again, pacing back and forth and speaking rapidly as though caught in some type of manic episode. “I was never one for transcendence or philosophical debate but I knew there was something there; something profound within you. I felt it! I saw it in your eyes! I never believed before but this--this proves that our meeting is more than just some random coincidence, its fate! He’ll appreciate that knowing him. In fact, he’ll damn near insist upon it! Hah!”

“Who?” She demanded, “Ghosts, savants, demons; what are you talking about!? Who is this ‘devil’?”

“Oh, I don’t want to spoil the surprise.” He glanced up at the moon which was barely visible through the haze of clouds then smiled down at her, “Midnight, love; Happy Birthday! Tell you what; because you’ve been such a good girl, I’m going to get you something extra special just to celebrate.”

She shook her head at him, “What the hell are you talking about?”

“On our way to meet our friend I think we’re going to have to stop by the jewelers and get you a ring then find you another pretty white dress to wear. I do believe I’ve suddenly grown weary of this bachelor’s life,” he shouted, crowing with laughter as he spun around, the storm now whipping around them in a fury. “It’s the married life for me, Missus; just you wait! Hah!”

Lightning struck one of the electrical poles nearby, causing it to fall with a crack. As the sky lit up with fire, thunder shook the ground and the wind tore at the surrounding buildings with such frighteningly destructive power that it felt as though the gods themselves were expressing their fury at Slade’s sudden declaration.

“If you think I’m going to marry you then you really are nuts!” Felicity sputtered in shock.

“Oh, you will, and we’ll live happily ever after; just you, me, and baby makes three! Or four, or even ten! Why stop with one when we could have an army of the wee bitty ankle biters! If you’re willing Missus, then we’ll have you in the pudding club as often as you like! You’ll be mummy and I’ll play doting dad and we’ll rule the world alongside our little prince together!” He laughed again and the sound of metal filled the air as the squall tore a large sheet of aluminum off the roof of one of surrounding barracks. Slade appeared not to even notice as the winds began to spiral and form a funnel, quickly escalating from a tempest into a tornado. “Lots of changes coming, love.” He approached her again, his palm caressing her cheek gently as she stumbled against the grip of the storm, her hand still clenched around the small detonator she had palmed when he wasn’t looking, “You and I are going to take a bit of a ‘round the world honeymoon; now doesn’t that sound lovely?”

“I don’t think so,” she spat out, her calm demeanor finally cracking as she lurched away from him as if to flee.
He stopped her instantly and without any visible effort. “Sorry Missus, but I’m afraid that you’re coming with me, whether you like it or not,” he said. He reached out and lifted her up and over his shoulder like a sack of potatoes with his arm wrapped tightly around her legs, her head and torso hanging upside down behind his back. He gave her a sharp pat on the butt causing her to yell at him in outrage as he stomped towards the truck containing the device. They continued to speak but Oliver could no longer hear them as the wind and rain drowned out their voices, the weather growing ever more violent the closer they got to the truck. He watched in horror as Felicity squirmed in his grasp, reaching into her other pocket and, unbeknownst to Slade, and took out the round LED charge before fixing it to the metal of his armor. He watched in horror as a flash of blue cut through the dark indicating she had activated it just before they disappeared behind the armored truck.

“Felicity, no!” He screamed her name just as the world exploded around him.

And then darkness descended at last.

Oliver swallowed down the bile that threatened to spill from his throat and tried to concentrate on the story his partner was sharing with their new associates. He forced a smile to his face as he tried to hide both the effect the memories had caused and his exasperation for the other man’s enthusiastic rehashing of one of their less than dignified missions.

He couldn’t fault him though; despite it dredging up memories best left in the past, they’d had so little joy in the foundry since Felicity left. He heard the laughter around him ring out again and he moved his focus back to his partner and the people around him.

“…and she is already pissed over her shoes, let me tell you!” Diggle turned to their new acquaintances, his smile widening as he continued his story. “Picture this; it was me, Oliver, and Lance down there, all of us hobbling around on crutches looking like hell and smelling even worse with about a dozen or more alligators and crocodiles hissing all around us that this freaking nutcase stole from the zoo. Meanwhile Thea is doing all of the heavy lifting and saving our asses by holding them off with some kind of electric cattle prod while we’re whacking them with our crutches and trying to get to Felicity. The Sewer King, who, by the way, is dressed like Captain Hook from Peter Pan, has this huge ass albino alligator on a leash in one hand and an antique flintlock pistol in the other. He starts rambling on about how he’ll make Felicity his ‘Queen of the Underworld’ until she just stops him mid-ramble and says, ‘Sorry Captain Flushles, but if I’m hooking up with any pirates it’ll either be Johnny Depp or that guy from ‘Once Upon a Time’, not the King of the Royal Post-Flush Gang. That said, I might have some of those little pine thingies in my car if you need to freshen up the joint.’”

“Oh my God!” Barbara said gasping for air.

“Then what happened?” Tim said with a snicker.

“He was so surprised he drops the nose of his pistol and she comes up with a cross block, disarms him, then hauls off and punches him in the nose! Knocks him right on his pirate costumed ass!”

They all started guffawing loudly but Oliver just shook his head ruefully, “Yeah, that was… unpleasant.”

“Why? Seems to me that the asshole deserved it,” Luke said.

“That wasn’t what he was referring to,” Diggle said, his dark eyes still glittering with merriment.

“When he went down…well, let’s just say we all got a firsthand demonstration of why sewer alligators are highly unlikely to replace the Golden Retriever as the world’s most trusted family pet.”

They all began to laugh uproariously, even Luke although he still appeared a bit peeved about the fact that his sister was held at both gunpoint and hostage to a sewer dwelling pirate.

“I am really going to have to start getting that girl to call me more often,” Barbara said as she wiped her eyes under her glasses. “She needs to start giving with the details!”

“Tell me about it,” Luke said ruefully. “Apparently I’m even more out of the loop than you are. I didn’t even know she had left IT much less the rest of all this.”

“Is it just me or is it weird that Baby’s life is more exciting and fraught with danger than ours now?” Barbara asked, still shaking her head. “I mean, I remember when her idea of exciting was talking about upgrades to Watchtower with her feet propped up on the console and now she’s this bad-ass action hero in a pencil skirt and sensible heels.”

“I don’t understand why she didn’t tell me any of this stuff,” Luke grumbled in frustration. “I didn’t know any of this stuff much less that she was dating---!” He gestured towards Oliver then grimaced, “No offence.”

Diggle shot him a rather displeased look himself and Oliver cleared his throat, biting down the urge to correct him in that they never actually ‘dated’, merely slept together, “None taken.”

“You’re lucky, I already got to hear about this stuff and then some a while back,” Tim snorted. At their curious looks he hitched his thumb towards Luke. “I’m dating his other sister and they talk about everything, and I mean everything. I now know way more about Bruce’s sex life than I ever wanted to.” He stopped short, eyes growing wide as he realized what he just said and Oliver’s mouth tightened into a grim line.

“Smooth Timmy, very smooth,” Barbara told him under her breath as the pleasant atmosphere suddenly grew extremely awkward and uncomfortable.

Luke shook his head and gave both men a pitying look, “Damn, now I really am feeling bad about punching you. That was cold.”

Tim winced, “I wasn’t thinking and it just slipped out! I’m really...”

“It’s...fine,” Oliver said tightly. “Felicity and I spoke recently and she told me everything about her relationship with Wayne and that they were together. You didn’t say anything I didn’t already know.”

“Really?” Tim asked in surprise.

“Yeah, we’re good; it’s fine,” Oliver assured him despite the fact that his stomach had begun to tangle into knots.

“Oh good,” Tim breathed a sigh of relief. “I was kind of worried that I’d accidently blurt something out and that it would lead to all kinds of problems and so when that just popped out...”

“No,” Oliver said with a humorless smile. “We actually talked about it for a while and I gave her my blessing. We ended it on a positive note.”

“That’s good to hear,” Tim said sincerely. “That’s...man, you have my undying respect for handling it this well. If it were me, I doubt I could be as cool as all that, and I definitely wouldn’t be able to offer my blessings if I found out that Tam was getting married to another guy this soon after ending it with me.”

Everyone in the room stopped and stared at Tim in shock.

Tim’s jaw snapped shut as he looked over all of their expressions which ranged from genuine shock to barely contained rage. “Shit,” he hissed through clenched teeth.

“Nope,” Tim said without hesitation.

“Timothy, did Bruce ask Baby to marry him?” Barbara asked slowly.

Tim shifted uncomfortably, “Um, no comment?”

“When the hell did this happen and how in the hell did you find out about it before me?” Luke growled.

“More importantly, did she say yes?” Barbara added eagerly.

“Are you okay?” Diggle asked quietly as he stepped next to Oliver. The other man didn’t say anything; he just gave a curt nod, the veins in his temple standing out angrily as he clenched his teeth together.

“Why don’t we show you the set up and then we’ll introduce you to the rest of the team?” Oliver said evenly as he stepped forward, changing the subject.

“Good idea; excellent in fact,” Tim said quickly as he stepped forward, avoiding the glares of his companions. “So when do I get to meet Roy?”

“Soon,” Oliver said as he led them over to the workout area, his body language still stiff but his expression devoid of emotion. “He works upstairs with Thea so they should both be down to introduce themselves before the club opens.”

“That’s great; looking forward to it!” Tim said a little overenthusiastically.

Luke gave him a hard look as he leaned close to him, “And, by the way, we will be talking about this later on, I promise you.”

“Fantastic,” Tim said morosely.

Sometime later Oliver stood on the sidelines with Barbara and Luke as Diggle and Tim sparred together using the eskrima sticks. The younger man’s skills were impressive to say the least. Diggle was far from a slouch but, even so, he was having a hard time keeping up with the younger man’s speed and punishing accuracy.

With a move that was so fast it was almost impossible to track, Tim stepped forward and disarmed the other man with seemingly little effort causing the other man to raise his hands in surrender. “Okay, I’m tapping out,” he said panting. “And I thought Oliver gave me a workout. Man kid, you’re good.”

“Thanks,” Tim said, twirling his batons with a flourish. “Of course, the sticks and the Bo Staff are my go-to weapons. I’m kind of looking forward to seeing just how good Oliver is with a bow. I wouldn’t mind picking up some skills in that particular area.”
“I think we could arrange that,” Oliver said as he stepped forward to take the sticks from Diggle. “But first I wouldn’t mind going toe to toe with you myself on these.”

“This is going to be fun,” Luke told Dig as he settled back to watch the show.

“I have to tell you, my boy is pretty good,” Dig warned.

“He’s not as good as Tim,” Luke said confidently.

“I don’t know,” Dig said doubtfully.

“I’ve been known to make a bet or two,” Dig said with a spark of interest. “Any particular stakes in mind?”

“Loser buys dinner?” He suggested.

Dig grinned, “You’ve got a deal. If Tim takes down Oliver then I’ll spring for dinner; if Oliver takes down your guy then you get to make the run to Big Belly.”

“Is that the burger joint Baby keeps talking about?” Luke said with an eager glint in his eye. “I do love a good cheeseburger or six. You’ve got a deal, my man,” he said shaking his hand.

Oliver stripped off his shirt, revealing his scarred and tattooed flesh. He watched the expressions on his young companions as they took in the testimony of the other man’s trial by fire that was etched upon his skin. They weren’t as hard struck or horrified as most people were the first time they saw the evidence of his torture and survival, but there were traces of surprise; less so from Tim and Barbara than Luke he noted. Perhaps it was because Felicity had told them what to expect but they didn’t seem shocked to see that the scars existed, it was merely the extent of them that seemed to take them aback. Tim quickly schooled his features into a look of casual indifference as the two men squared off and then came at each other in a blur of motion and noise as the steel sticks clashed together with a metallic clang.

Diggle watched from the sidelines with professional interest as Tim employed a Shaolin Stick Fighting technique by beginning with Yin Shou, or a palms facing down grip, as opposed to Oliver who used the Sinawali double stick weaving form which was more traditional with the Filipino fighting sticks, and paired that with a Redonda fan strike allowing for extremely fast strikes that were hardly visible to the naked eye.

It made sense to him that Tim would choose to use Shaolin techniques as well as Bojutsu given that his weapon of choice was first and foremost a staff. Although Oliver was an expert at the less rigid, though no less effective, types of melee attacks used with traditional eskrima, Tim’s technique was far more refined. He could see the skill and intelligence in the younger man’s attacks, the elegance and precision in his movements, but that type of rigid discipline could sometimes be a double-edged sword.

From the corner of his eye he watched as Luke smiled; his expression confident. He glanced over to Barbara who had left her place at the workstation to wander close. Her eyes told a different story. She saw what he did; Luke was about to be very disappointed.

Wayne had said Barbara was an expert at eskrima and he could see that as he looked at her now. Even without ever seeing her hold a stick or engage in battle, he knew, because she was a survivor, like Oliver, and eskrima itself was a story of survival. Created by the uneducated peasant class in response to subjugation by their European conquerors who took from them their blades and swords, eskrima was a martial art born out of desperation and ingenuity.

Clack-clack-clack; the sticks came together over and over, their movements so quick the air currents swirled around them like a mini windstorm. Both men were art in motion but where Tim held his sticks with a refined grip, brandishing them like brushes as he wrote through the air like a calligraphy master, Oliver was efficient, savage, and he moved without thought. He was pure muscle memory, his entire focus on his opponent because he no longer had to think about the sticks; they were now merely an extension of his body. The shorthand of death had become so ingrained within his movements that his mind was completely free to observe his opponent. Both techniques were remarkably effective but Oliver, being older and more battle worn, seemed to have a slight edge over the younger man. That wasn’t to say Tim wasn’t more than holding his own. His skills and speed were almost preternaturally fast and accurate and he moved with an almost fluid grace, but Oliver was all anger and directed rage at the moment as he exercised his demons over the recent revelations about Felicity the younger man had accidently allowed to slip and Dig could see him forcing the other man backwards with every punishing strike.

As elegant and refined as Tim’s techniques were, and as effective as he undoubtedly was against 99% of his opponents, this was not merely a sparring session for Oliver. Oliver did not ever merely ‘spar’. He was first and foremost a survivor and that instinct never went away. Diggle squeezed his hand into a fist, feeling the skin pull tight over his scarred knuckles where Oliver had split the skin the first time they had ever ‘sparred’ together. He’d learned early on that Oliver was not afraid to spill blood on the mats. There were no bamboo sparring sticks in the foundry, no blunted weapons, or ‘practice’ swords. If you got hit, you bled, just like in real life. The only rule they had was no killing blows; everything else that stopped short of permanent incapacitation was allowed. The reason for that was Oliver; it was the only way he knew. He didn’t learn the Art of War in a dojo, he learned it on a godforsaken beach in the middle of nowhere and his reward for a job well done wasn’t a colored belt or a trophy, it was survival.

It was for that reason that Barbara, like Diggle, could see what Luke and Tim could not; Oliver had already won. The only reason the fight was still waging is because Oliver was testing him. He could have taken him down at any time.

As Tim slipped into a Praying Mantis blocking stance to lower his center of gravity and throw Oliver’s strikes off, Oliver countered with a powerful fan strike, causing one of Tim’s weapons to fly out of his hands followed by several low groupings of a block, a V-strike, and finishing with a drop strike as he swept his opponent’s legs from under him while causing the other stick to leave his hand and clatter on the floor. Tim hit the ground hard, the thick pad saving him from damage but the speed and skill behind the attack still causing him to have the wind knocked from his lungs.

“Shit,” Luke said as he flinched in sympathy. For his friend or for himself for having to pick up the tab for dinner Dig didn’t know.

Oliver tucked the sticks under his arm in one fluid movement and reached down to help the other man off the floor, “You alright?” He asked him. Oddly enough, Oliver appeared more relaxed now than he had at the beginning of the match. For some reason intense sparring always had an almost meditative effect on him as though attacking a problem with his fists somehow put things into perspective.

“Yeah,” Tim said breathlessly as he accepted the other man’s hand up. “Wow, you’re almost as good as Bruce.”
“Almost?” Oliver asked with an amused lift of his eyebrow.

He shrugged, “Well, to be fair, I’ve never actually seen you in action other than our sparring match so I have to give Bruce the benefit of the doubt but I’d love to see the two of you go at it one on one just to be sure.”

“Hopefully I’ll be able to make that happen,” Oliver said with a slightly more serious expression. “After all, I do owe him a response for the message he sent me. Plus I should really give him my congratulations on his upcoming nuptials in person.”

Chapter Thirty-Six
Chapter Thirty-Six

After Felicity dropped Sara off at the airport and stopped by the grocery store for some supplies she had the driver take her back to the penthouse, otherwise known as the ‘scene of the crime’.

She sighed as she slung her purse, laptop bag, and overnight bag over her shoulders then loaded her arms with the three full bags of groceries she picked up before exiting the cab and heading inside the building. She told her dad that she wanted to get a head start on Bruce’s ‘special project’ and, given that she had to be at the penthouse first thing anyway, she decided to spend a few nights there. Peggy hadn’t been happy about it but, luckily, her dad understood. Since she told Tam not to mess with the office or the master bedroom she was hoping that she could just live in the mess of the remodel until it was all sorted; if not then she’d find a hotel or something. As long as she was dealing with all of this, she wanted to at least put a little space between her and her dad’s place.

Of course, it’s not like they couldn’t find them if things did go pear shaped but, chances are, she’d be the target, not Lucius or Peggy Ann. Not that she was really worried about that. If the OO wanted to kill her she’d already be dead. No, it was simply being done as a precaution so she could focus on her mission and not them while having the freedom to come and go as she needed without having to juggle the truth. Another reason she wanted to be there wasn’t just the access to Watchtower, but because the Wayne Foundation penthouse was practically a fortress. Bruce had made sure to build all his buildings to withstand earthquakes of at least 8.5 on the Richter magnitude scale with top of the line security measures especially when it came to the top floor.

The Wayne Foundation Building was a Gotham landmark, noted for its unique design with a large open atrium in the center representing life, growth, and renewal, a revolving restaurant called The Carousel that was fully encased in glass to provide the best views of Gotham to its patrons (while hiding a secret elevator shaft to the alternate Batcave in the center turning mechanism) and, of course, the penthouse which was located on the very top. Bruce designed it himself and it had a definite Frank Lloyd Wright vibe with a modern design, a waterfall pool, and a roofline garden with dwarf fruit and flowering trees and shrubbery that enhanced, rather than obscured, the sweeping views of the city skyline and the river.

Even though it was located in a part of the city known more for its rundown factories and warehouses, the Wayne Foundation rose above it all like a beacon of hope with three towering sculptures of the gods Hermes, Nike, and Asclepius in the center of The Thomas Wayne Memorial Fountain keeping vigil out front and surrounded by the lush bounty of Martha Wayne’s favorite roses. In addition to headquartering the many executive offices of the various Wayne Charitable Foundations it also had a well-equipped gym, a museum, a shopping mall, various other rented and leased offices, daycares, educational centers, clinics, and an underground parking garage.

While all the other floors were accessible to the public, the penthouse had its own private elevator requiring a numerical code and a key card to enter. In addition to that, the windows of the penthouse were all made of bullet-proof earthquake glass and there were hidden 'panic buttons' throughout completely locking everything down just in case the building’s security was breached. Knowing that she was in a secured location made it easier to think and plan and she had a pretty good idea that she’d need that extra little confidence boost in the days to come.

The minute she stepped through the doors, security informed her that the clothes and boxes they’d retrieved from Tam’s storage units that morning had arrived then issued her a security key for the elevator as per Bruce’s instructions. The guard also offered to help her with her bags and, since it saved her from having to go through the trouble of dealing with the elevator panel and swiping her card while juggling groceries and her overnight bag, she accepted his help gratefully.

After she thanked him for his help and put everything away in the kitchen, she dragged herself into the master bedroom and tossed her overnight bag on the dresser, stripping off her clothes as she went. She was tired, bone tired, and as nice a day as it had been, she was far too exhausted to worry about being neat. Security had left all the clothing racks in the foyer and, even though she knew she should probably start putting them away before taking her bath, she just wasn’t in the mood.

She dug out her cosmetics case along with her favorite shampoo, conditioner, and soap before heading into the large en suite to draw a bath. More like a swimming pool, Felicity thought, looking at the huge whirlpool tub with a covetous sigh as she put her things away while she waited for it to fill. Luckily, even though the custom sized tub was far larger than the old claw-footed one she’d left behind in Starling, the high flow taps filled it in half the time. As soon as the water level had risen high enough, Felicity turned on the heater and the jets before easing into the bath, humming with pleasure as the water pulsed all around her. She took a moment to look around the richly appointed master bath before dunking her head under the water, pouring some of her favorite shampoo in her hands, and scrubbing the dust and sweat from her hair as she lost herself in the clean summery notes of honey, melon, citrus, and sharply scented green herbs.

Her stomach rumbled and she grimaced. You know you’re hungry when the smell of your shampoo makes your stomach growl.

Between the lack of sleep and her appetite that was either on or off, she was a mess. She hadn’t been sleeping well at all and she’d racked up almost as much sleep debt as she would have working both her jobs back in Starling if not more. Plus, the stress was messing with her blood sugar. She really needed to get it together and start maintaining a regular eating and sleeping schedule because she was beginning to lose weight. She wasn’t exactly wasting away or anything, it couldn’t have been a loss of more than five pounds or so, but it was enough that her clothes were getting a bit loose. This morning she skipped breakfast because she’d been too depressed to eat, skipped lunch because of Tam, and now she was seriously contemplating skipping dinner because she was exhausted and, as hungry as she was, even the thought of walking to the kitchen seemed like too much trouble.

She blinked blearily. Screw it; she could go one day without eating.

Her stomach churned again in protest.

Or not.

Luckily, Tim and an entire day of fasting had inspired her to buy a ton of deli meats and cheeses along with a crudités tray, the ingredients for a hearty soup she intended to toss into the slow cooker she’d uncovered in the kitchen tomorrow, and lots of nibbles and necessities like coffee, Diet Coke, and tea.

Caffeine was not optional if she was going to make it through the night.

Cleaning out Tam’s storage units turned into a bigger workout than she’d imagined it would be. Not to mention the fact that, once again, she’d gotten almost no sleep the night before because of her fight with Bruce. All she wanted to do was get clean, make a sandwich, and hit the sheets before she had to man Watchtower that night. Hopefully Bruce would keep it professional and call it a day early enough so that she could get in a couple of hours’ worth of sleep before she had to head to the OO facility in the morning.

Not that he knew that’s what she was planning; as far as he knew she was just meeting with the decorators. Tam was planning on being there first thing in the morning which meant that she needed to be out and about before dawn in order to avoid Bruce. Hopefully he wasn’t planning on being there, but she wasn’t taking any chances.

She did her best to make it hard on him though. She chose to go to Orbital a day earlier than planned for a lot of reasons, not least of which was the fact that he and Lucius usually scheduled their meetings with the various department heads on Tuesdays. His schedule was bound to be packed tomorrow until late afternoon but that didn’t mean he wouldn’t blow it off just so he could try to catch her off guard. If she was lucky (and she so very rarely was these days) he’d still be in the middle of his sulk and choose to remain at the office all day, never knowing she sent Tam to meet the decorators in her place. If his Bat-Butt did show up then all hell was going to break loose but, hopefully, she’d have the information she needed by this time tomorrow and that made putting up with the ubiquitous hissy fit he was bound to pull all worth it.

She rinsed out her hair and applied the conditioner, enjoying the unique combination of scents as they teased her senses. Where the shampoo was fruity and green, the conditioner was a light floral scent that made her think of summer picnics surrounded by wildflowers at her family’s lake house.

God, she missed summer; warm weather, cool breezes off the lake, and definitely no dirty gray snow and ice. She was so over freezing her ass off it wasn’t even funny. When all this was over she was definitely taking a vacation; a very warm vacation. Piling her golden locks on top of her head, she began scrubbing her body with the delicately scented goat’s milk herbal soap she got from Tam for Hanukah.

At least the tub was nice, she thought as steam rose from the water. Rinsing off her arms and torso, she looked around the bathroom again. It definitely wasn’t her quaint little bungalow though, that’s for sure. Not to say it wasn’t wonderful; it was just overwhelmingly Bruce.
It was a beautiful room, but definitely a masculine one. The shower and tub were both the height of luxury and built for a man of Bruce’s size in mind. The shower alone was nearly the size of her old bedroom. Okay, that was an exaggeration, she thought, but you could easily fit a queen sized bed and a couple of nightstands in there. The steam shower was completely done in a deep gray and white marble with a long stone bench and multiple taps. Floor to ceiling clear glass separated it from the rest of the room but the same gray marble made up the steps and surrounding frame of the custom built whirlpool tub. It was wide enough for two people to sit side by side and long enough to easily accommodate Bruce’s 6'2” frame even if he was fully extended.

After a few minutes she rinsed the conditioner out of her hair and settled back to enjoy a well-deserved soak after her long and exhausting day chasing after her sister and her obsession with clothes.

“Sara was right,” she muttered out loud to herself. “Tam could totally star in a reality show called ‘Celebrity Hoarders’.” They were there for hours and they still barely made a dent in it. “Guess I know what I’m doing next weekend.” Fun.

Felicity leaned back against the contoured headrest and closed her eyes as the heat of the tub seeped into her bones, chasing away the Gotham winter as the pulsing water jets soothed her tired muscles. She must have drifted off because the next thing she knew the jets abruptly shut off and there was a splash of water as someone pulled the plug. She inhaled sharply in an aborted yawn as she blinked her eyes open to see Bruce’s perturbed countenance glaring down at her.

“You do know that falling asleep in the tub is dangerous, right? Unless, of course, you want to drown?” He asked her with a scowl, his jacket tossed on the countertop near the sink and his shirt sleeves rolled up to the elbows.

“You have to die of something, right?” She said wearily as she yawned and sat upright, exposing her breasts to his gaze. “Not funny,” he told her sharply even though his eyes immediately locked onto her naked form which was still pink from the bath.

“Have you ever noticed that nothing is ever funny to you?” She said testily. It’s just as well, she thought, the water, despite the built in heater, had started to cool and her fingers were beyond prune- y. “Can you at least pass me a towel while you loom above me with that sour look on your face?” He reached over to the towel warmer and held it out as she stood up and wrapped it around her, humming in pleasure despite her irritation and exhaustion as warm and fuzzy rocked her world. “What time is it anyway? And why the hell are you here?”

His eyes were still wandering up and down her form, darkening slightly as she wrapped the towel around her breasts. He extended his hand to help her out of the tub, his eyes locking on her upper thighs where the towel parted as she stepped onto the floor, “Nearly 7:30,” he told her. “And I’m here because I had no idea where you were.”

She let go of his hand and stretched, arching her back and causing his eyes to leap from her legs back to her chest. “That late? Wow, I was in the tub for a while, huh?” She mused. “Guess I was past due for a nap after all.”

He ignored her comment, his jaw firming as he forced his eyes upwards, “I’ve been calling and texting you all afternoon. Where were you?”

“Helping Tam go through her storage units; why, what business is it of yours?” She asked tiredly as she walked into the bedroom and rummaged through the large dresser for a nightgown.
“Damn it,” he muttered, walking over to her and spinning her around to face him. “Everything you do is my business, Felicity. I was worried about you and I wanted to talk about what happened yesterday.”

“Whatever.” She disengaged her arms from his grip and reached for a long jersey cotton peignoir set then marched past him to the bathroom without saying a word.

“Where are you--?” She shut the door in his face and locked it, causing him to utter a filthy curse as he tried the knob. “Damn it, Felicity! You don’t get to shut me out just because you’re having a little snit, do you hear me?”

“‘Little snit’ my ass,” she muttered as she slipped the simple and plainly styled floor length cotton jersey chemise over her head and shimmied it into place until it floated around her ankles before slipping the matching robe over her shoulders. It wasn’t her warm and fuzzies but the penthouse was a lot warmer than her bungalow and, despite her sister’s cutting remarks about Donna Karan, the woman knew her way around a nightgown. Soft and silky with a modest V-neck, when paired with the matching robe it, like most of the designer’s lounge wear, felt like a soft warm hug against her skin. She walked over to the sink and grabbed the toothbrush she had used the night before to brush her teeth as she drowned out Bruce’s bitch and whine session from the other side of the door. When she was done, she wiped her mouth with the towel, tossed it into the hamper, before brushing her nearly dry hair into something that didn’t look like a rat’s nest, then made her way back to the bedroom.

Might as well get it over with, she thought to herself with a grimace.

“Goddamn it!” He cursed at the closed door, “I’m trying to have an adult--!” She opened the door and he stopped mid-sentence to stare at her.

“Do you mind?” She asked, indicating she’d like to move past him.

“Actually I do,” he scowled, finding his voice again but still stepping aside as she made her way back to the dresser. “We need to talk.”

Felicity grabbed a pair of thick black and gray boot socks from the drawer, “I’d really rather not,” she said as she walked over to sit on the bed so she could tug them on.

“What are you doing?” He asked her.

“Putting on socks.”

“Why?”

She let out an exasperated breath and glared up at him, “Because you apparently destroyed my favorite slippers when you trashed my house, my feet are cold, and I didn’t buy any to replace them, that’s why. So, unless you want to run out and buy me some, I’m stealing your socks; deal with it,” she said sarcastically. “Seriously, how the hell do you kill a pair of bunny slippers? Who breaks slippers?” She muttered. “Did you guys actually pull out the Holy Hand Grenade of Antioch, or was it just pure dumb luck on your part?”

“The holy what?” Bruce asked in confusion.

“Oh come on!” She said in outrage. “You went to Oxford—in England! Monty Python and the Holy Grail, Bruce; get some pop culture already!”

“I mean, why are you dressed like that?” He asked, indicating her nightgown.
“Because I’m tired and I intend to take a nap if I’m going to be manning your coms tonight,” she told him with an edge of acerbity. “But first, I’m going to go into the kitchen to make a sandwich because I’m hungry; any more questions?” She rolled on the other sock, “The man has an Ivy League education, runs a multi-billion dollar corporation, hunts bad guys under the cover of darkness, and yet he can’t figure out why a person is wearing pajamas at night,” she muttered under her breath. “Oh, and he killed the Killer Bunnies and didn’t get the joke. I’m not getting over that shit anytime soon. Those were collectables, thank you very much.”

“I bought groceries,” she said testily as she wiggled her now toasty toes in her socks. His socks, she corrected herself mentally. Doesn’t matter, they were hers now. She decided to lay claim to them and anything else comfy looking in the drawers and closet including, but not limited to, his undershirts, boxers, thick wool boot socks, and dress shirts. “I figured I needed coffee and snacks if I’m going to have to deal with having you snarling in my ear all night long.”

“You’re still manning Watchtower tonight?” He asked in surprise.

“I just told you I was; why wouldn’t I?” She asked him with a frown.

He ignored the question. “If you’re hungry we can go out,” he offered, his expression softening slightly. “If you’re in the mood for French we can go downstairs to The Carousel; they always save me a table just in case.”

“I don’t want to go out and I’m not a big fan of eating and spinning at the same time even if I did want to go. I just want to eat something here and catch a few hours of sleep before I have to head down to the cave,” she told him.

“We can order in then. What do you want?” He asked her, pulling out his phone. “I’ll order for us both.”

“I already have a ton of stuff in the fridge; I bought enough groceries to last for a few days at least. Besides, don’t you have to go home to the manor and get some sleep before you go on patrol?” She asked him irritably.

“I have a spare suit of armor downstairs,” he told her, his eyes narrowing. “Why? Did you want me to leave?”

“Yes, actually I do.”

“You said you were helping me on coms tonight,” he said with a scowl as he put his phone back in his pocket.

“That doesn’t mean that I intend to have dinner with you or invite you to sleep with me,” she shot back.

“Who said I intended to sleep with you?” Bruce asked innocently.

“Please,” she snorted.

“Fine,” he said with a smirk. “And I suppose you put on that nightgown because it was the least sexiest piece of lingerie you could find.”

She looked down at her plain pink nightgown incredulously. She had tee-shirts that showed more skin. “Actually, yes,” she told him in a deadpan. “Everything else I bought is either crotchless or see-“If you feel like modeling some of it, I have time,” he said with an amused grin.

She ignored him, “It’s a nightgown, Bruce; not an invitation, and a pretty plain one at that. I bought it because it was comfortable and long enough to keep my legs covered, not because it was sexy.”

“It’s not not sexy,” he said with a heated look as he stepped closer.

“You’d think an old flannel granny gown was sexy,” she said with an eye roll.

“True, especially if you were the one wearing it.” His gaze warmed up considerably as it roamed over her figure once again, “Or not wearing it; whatever the case may be. Doesn’t matter to me though, I’m easy; sexy or not, it all winds up on the floor eventually.”

“Not tonight it won’t,” she muttered as she tried to move past him towards the kitchen but he stopped her by taking her wrist and pulling her towards him. She glared at him, “I believe we’ve already had the manhandling discussion, have we not?”

“We have,” he tugged her until she was leaning against his chest, his hands moving to clasp her waist firmly as he looked down at her. “Unfortunately, I’m not a very good listener.” His hands slid from her waist to cup her backside through the thin robe, “I’m more of an actions speak louder than words kind of guy.”

“Well, until you improve in that particular area I suggest you let go of my ass and toddle along your merry way,” she told him crossly.

He smirked again, completely unaffected by her growing irritation with him. He brought his lips to her ear, the slight scruff of his five o’clock shadow causing her to shiver as it rubbed against her cheek, “Have I ever told you that there is nothing I find sexier than a woman, all warm and pink from the tub?” He breathed her in and growled, “By the way, you smell very nice, Baby.” He kissed the tender skin under her ear and nuzzled against her, his teeth grazing her neck and causing her to shiver again, “Practically edible in fact. What do you say we skip the sandwiches and just…” He nipped at her earlobe causing her to gasp involuntarily.

Despite her annoyance with him she found herself beginning to respond so she decided to fight fire with fire. She wrapped her arms around his neck and placed her own lips so close to his that there was barely a hairsbreadth between them. She allowed her eyelids to drop half-mast and lowered her voice to a sexy purr, “And have I ever told you…” her hands slid down and she gripped his loosened tie with her right hand as her left eased down his other arm to grip his elbow, her eyes traveling down his broad chest as she slowly licked her lips, “how very, very…good…” He inhaled sharply and she could feel his interest stir as his eyes darkened. She stepped even closer to him until their bodies were plastered against each other, her left leg moving between his as her right hooked behind his knee, “I’ve gotten at jujitsu?” And with that she thrust and spun his upper body away as her leg hit him at the back of the knee using his own body weight against him and forcing him to the ground.

Only two things prevented it from being a picture perfect takedown:

1. He still had his hands firmly on her ass.
2. He was, after all, Batman.

He went down hard but he took her down with him. She landed sprawled against his chest, her thighs straddling his as he hit the bedroom floor. He immediately rolled them over until he was on top cradled between her thighs as the hem of her gown rode up her legs, his hands pinning hers through.”
above her head. He grinned, grinding his now very firm erection against her center and causing her to gasp despite herself, “I was actually planning on talking a bit but if you want to skip that part it’s fine by me.”

“Not everything can be solved by sex, Bruce,” she told him despite the fact that she could feel her body responding to him.

“No, it can’t,” he said, releasing her wrists, one hand tugging open her robe so he could slide his other one down her arm cup her breast. His eyes locked onto her hardened nipples that were obvious through the thin material and his thumb teased the stiffened peak as he bent his head to brush his lips against hers, “but it is good at releasing tension.”

She whimpered as his lips slanted against hers, his tongue tasting her deeply. The hand not occupied with her breast reached down to grasp her nightgown and haul it further upwards leaving her thighs bare. His lips left hers and trailed kisses along her cheekbone until he captured her earlobe between his teeth and teased her with his tongue and mouth. She cried out and arched against him causing him to chuckle darkly.

His lips blazed a fiery trail downwards to lick and suck at her neck, causing her to gasp. He lifted his head to gaze down at her face now flushed with passion, “The bed’s right there but if you’re good with the floor then so am I,” he said in a low rumble.

“I’m still mad at you,” she told him with a huff of frustration.

“I’m still pretty pissed at you myself; doesn’t mean we can’t have—what did your sister call it?” He quirked a smile, “Oh yes, angry revenge sex.”

“No condoms, remember?” She pointed out.

“Depo shot,” he threw back, his lips tasting hers again before pulling back slightly, “Besides, we’re getting married anyway and I thought we agreed that kids were a sooner rather than later thing?”

She snorted, “So you are trying to knock me up just so I’ll marry you.”

“Is that what it would take to get us to that point?” He asked her lightly but there was a hint of uneasiness in his gaze as he looked at her.

“Bruce…” she exhaled.

“I love you,” he told her, the humor fading from his expression and he cupped her cheek, his other hand brushing the mess of curls from her face. “I’m in love with you. I want to marry you but I also want to keep you safe. Why can’t you see that?”

“If you love me then you have to start believing that I can take care of myself,” she told him with a grimace. “That I not only know what I’m doing, but that this is something I have to do, with or without your help.”

His jaw squared stubbornly, “I’m not going to apologize for wanting to keep you safe;”

“And I’m not going to apologize for doing what needs to be done,” she shot back.

He scowled, “Fine.”

“Fine,” she agreed.
He looked down at her, his jaw set, “Angry revenge sex it is then.” His mouth crashed down on hers as he sank his fingers into her hair. His tongue swept through her mouth as he tasted her before pulling away to get to his feet and hauling her upright. Before she could protest he swept her up in a bridal carry then tossed her onto the bed causing her to bounce with an undignified squeak. He chuckled as he began to tug off his clothes, allowing them to fall to the floor.

“Damn it!” She scowled as she watched him quickly shed his clothing. “First off, I am not having sex with you; angry or otherwise! Secondly, I’m starving. I haven’t eaten all day.”

“If you’re hungry I have something you can put in your mouth,” he said with a filthy grin.

She looked at him, her jaw dropping in shock. “Um…huh?”

His smile broadened, “Unless, of course, you aren’t up to the challenge?” He teased as he tugged off his pants and underwear before stripping off his socks and climbing into the bed beside her.

“I’ve never…um,” she looked down at his very happy soldier and swallowed nervously.

He looked at her, amusement dancing in his eyes, “Like I said, if you’re not up to the challenge, that’s fine.”

“Challenge my ass,” she scoffed huffily while eyeing his erection apprehensively.

“Scared?” He asked with a smirk as he cupped her cheek in his palm and began kissing her deeply. “That’s okay, Baby; I’m sure we can make do.”

“I’m not scared,” she said weakly as he lowered her head onto the pillow, licking and sucking his way down her neck while reaching down to tug his socks off her feet and toss them on the floor.

“Sure you aren’t,” he teased as he moved on top of her to grind himself into her center.

“You think you know everything but you don’t, you know; you’re not nearly as impressive as you think you are,” she complained, biting her bottom lip as he palmed her breast and began to tug at her nipple. “Plus, now my feet are cold again!”

“Hmm, I’ll keep you warm,” he promised as he sucked and nibbled his way down her neck. “As for me being impressive, I don’t know about that, but I always was a bit precocious. Case in point,” he said, grinding his hips into hers again and causing her to gasp.

“I can see that,” she said breathlessly. “You know, most men need a pill for that sort of thing at your age.”

He stopped and pulled away slightly so he could look at her, his eyebrow raised, “Is that so?”

She glanced around the room, “Of course, since we’re not soaking in a couple of tubs in the middle of a field watching the sunset I’ll give you the benefit of the doubt.”

“I may not be some fresh-faced boy but I’m sure you’ll find me more than adequate,” he told her as he removed her robe, slipping it off her shoulders, then hauled her gown over her head to toss it away carelessly. “See, like I said; it all winds up on the floor eventually.” His hand moved between her thighs to cup her sex. She gasped and his mouth covered hers, swallowing her moan as his fingers dipped inside of her center. His thumb rubbed at the sensitive bundle of nerves as his fingers curled inside her. He pulled away from the kiss and watched as her eyes fluttered closed, her cheeks now flushed with passion rather than anger. “You’re wet for me, Felicity.” His fingers moved deeper inside of her causing her to bite her lip and squirm in pleasure, “Last chance to prove me wrong; are you up for the challenge or not?”

Goddamn it! Her eyes opened at that and she pushed him off of her and onto his back, “You want angry revenge sex; I’ll show you angry revenge sex!”

“Do your worst, Baby,” he invited with a chuckle. He lay back, getting himself comfortable against the pillows, as he waited to see what she’d do.

Giving him one last defiant look she gathered her robe and tossed it onto the end of the bed then brought her mouth to his chest and ran her tongue over his nipple before tugging it gently with her teeth, one hand curling around his shoulder and the other wrapping around his rock hard erection. He inhaled sharply and thrust up in her hand, his eyes closing as her mouth wandered down his chest. Determined to regain the upper hand, she worked her way down to his abs, her tongue running over his stomach before going even lower, enjoying the sounds he made as she stroked her fingers up and down his shaft. Her body slid down his until she was face to face with his erection and then she stopped.

He glanced down to see her pausing at his erection uncertainly. “Well,” he prompted.

“I’m thinking,” she muttered, looking at it a bit askance.

“What’s the problem exactly; maybe I can offer a few helpful hints?” he said, his voice a mixture of husky arousal and laughter.

He was kidding but…“I read a book about this once—well, twice; two books. Tam gave me one and I bought the other one on Amazon. Anyway,” she swallowed, staring at his twitching cock, “reading is one thing and actually putting it into practice is another,” she said ruefully. “Up until this point it’s all been academic and, it’s not that I’m scared or anything, it’s just a…logistics thing…” She took another second’s pause.

“Logistics?” He repeated, his dark blue eyes twinkling with merriment.

She looked up at him, “You’d be surprised. There’s this whole coordinated hand to mouth…” His lips twitched upwards in amusement and she grimaced, “Okay, fine; I realize you’ve probably done this lots of times but being the person on the receiving end of things is a lot different than being the person on this end!”

“I think you might be overthinking it,” he told her with a poorly concealed smirk.

“Hey, this stuff is pretty complicated, okay? There’s lots of…things going on and—” She scowled. “Look, have you ever given one of these before?”

“Can’t say that I have,” he said honestly.

“Right, then just give me a minute to come up with a game plan here,” she told him gruffly.

“Baby, if you don’t want to do it, that’s fine,” he told her with another sexy chuckle. “I was just teasing you. It’s not really that important to me. We can just skip it and move on to other things,” he said with another devilish look.

“No, I can do it,” she said determinately. At this point it really was a challenge; there’s no way she was going to wuss out now. She took another centering breath and began to mutter, “Okay, hands, mouth, tongue, and watch the teeth…”

“Please; especially the last part,” Bruce told her, folding his hands behind his head and laughing quietly as he looked down at her antics.

“I’ve got this; I can do it,” she told herself ignoring him. She squared her shoulders, dug deep and, taking him firmly in hand, gently pulled down his foreskin and placed her tongue on the underside of his glans, licking hesitantly before taking him into her mouth.

Bruce’s hands left the pillow and clutched the sheets beside him as he let out a low moan, a look of intense pleasure filling his expression as the heat of her mouth surrounded him and pulled him inside. She licked and sucked at him, her tongue playing with the various textures and slipping around his glans and between his shaft and foreskin, her small hands running up and down his shaft in varying rhythms, squeezing and pulling as her mouth bobbed up and down.

She pulled away with a gasp, catching her breath, “That’s a lot harder than I thought it would be.” He began to snicker again despite his highly aroused state and she muttered, “Oh, shut up,” before taking him in her mouth again and redoubling her efforts.

A not unpleasant but wholly unexpected salty taste hit her tongue as he began to grow larger in her mouth. She pulled away, watching in fascination as a pearly drop of pre-ejaculate appeared at the tip of his erection. She tentatively tasted it then hummed in pleasure before going down on him again with renewed vigor, her own excitement growing as she heard him groan and pant due to her efforts. As she worked on him, her hands began pulling at his shaft in a slightly twisting motion that had him clenching his jaw within minutes as he fisted the sheets violently to stop himself from grabbing her head and pulling her against him. “Felicity,” he gasped.

“Oh no, you don’t,” he said. “My turn,” he hauled her up his body and kissed her deeply before flipping her onto her back and moved downwards, taking a moment to suck one of her nipples into his mouth, then further down until he was between her thighs. He buried his face in her lap, his mouth finding her center and began licking and sucking at the sensitive nub of her clit as his fingers entered and stretched her.

She cried out as he flicked his tongue against her, feeling her flesh grow hot and fragrant as a result of his ministrations. She panted and wiggled against him as his fingers began to saw in and out of her rapidly. She felt herself grow wet and slick as he took the tiny ball of flesh in his mouth and sucked gently, keeping up a gentle friction with his fingers and tongue. She began to babble incoherently with words of passion and pleasure, her body taut, then shuddered and cried out, her entire body flushing pink. He wiped his mouth on the bunched up sheets that surrounded them then moved up her body until he was between her thighs, thrusting inside of her as he took her mouth again in a kiss.

She gasped sharply at his sudden intrusion and began to whimper as his hips drove into her faster and faster. “God,” he whispered in a prayer as he felt her tighten around him. He pulled her thighs up around his hips and pushed as deep inside her as he could go. Over and over he surged inside of her, his belly tightening as he desperately held off his orgasm even though he was more than halfway there before entering her. He felt his desire mount and build and he dug his toes into the mattress. She shifted her hips unexpectedly, changing the angle slightly, and causing them both to moan in sensual gratification. Her back arched off the bed, driving him further inside her, as she began to quiver through her second orgasm, her nails digging into his back as warm wet heat surrounded him. She cried out again and began to sob in pleasure as he finally allowed himself to let go, spilling his seed inside of her with another call to the heavens. His eyes shut tight, the exaltation of their union causing his head to swim as he finally gave in to his own body’s demands for release.

He shuddered in the aftermath, warm lethargy seeping into his muscles as he leaned heavily against her. He lifted his head to pull her into a tender kiss when he heard her mutter against his lips, “I’m still hungry.”

He laughed breathlessly against the soft skin of her neck and shoulder, his lungs still struggling slightly for breath, “Baby, whatever happens; never change.”

“I wasn’t planning on it,” she told him as she ran her hands down his back. “Now are you going to let me eat something or what?”

He rolled off of her and fell against the mattress bonelessly, “I could say so many things right now.” He tugged her into his arms and kissed her tenderly before settling her into his side.

She gave him a disgruntled look as she tugged on his chest hair, “Three words, Bruce: low blood sugar.”

He covered her hand with his own and gave her a crooked smile, “We could go into the kitchen and see what you bought or…”

“Or?” She asked. “And, by the way, ‘or’ better have something to do with food.”

“I could order us something in and we could take a nap until it gets here,” he suggested.

She rolled her eyes at him and slipped out of bed to pad towards the bathroom, “Fine, but no sushi; I’ve had that twice already this week. And nothing from Carousel! I hate to break it to you but, while the view is great, the food in that restaurant of yours doesn’t live up to the hype.”

“For your information, Carousel just got its third Michelin star but if you don’t want French then what are you in the mood for?” He asked as he reached for his pants so he could retrieve his phone. “Other than the obvious of course,” he said with a hint of smug satisfaction.

“Conceited much?” She turned on the taps to the tub and grabbed a washcloth before climbing inside and washing herself, “I don’t know; something different.”

“Something different,” she heard him mutter as he walked into the bathroom in all his naked glory. “El Salvadorian or Georgian?”

“El Salvadorian is just Mexican with more beef dishes and higher prices,” she told him as he sat on the edge of the tub.

“ODA House it is then,” he said dialing. “What do you want?”

“Everything but the liver and onions and no lamb,” she said.

“Okay,” he said with a bemused look. “Good thing I’m rich or I have a feeling you’d eat me out of house and home in no time.”

“Are you complaining?” She asked with an arched eyebrow as she lay back in the steaming water, her nakedness on full display. She put aside the washcloth to trail her fingers from between her thighs to across her stomach before ghosting over her breasts.

“Nope,” he said with glittering eyes before hanging up the phone abruptly, casting it aside, and climbing in behind her. “In fact, seeing how you look with your mouth full is my new favorite pastime.”

It took a while before they were able to place their order and, while they didn’t quite order the entire menu, they did order a lot. Of course, by then they’d both worked up a healthy appetite. After snoozing for an hour or so, security called up to let them know their food had arrived. Bruce slipped on a pair of soft flannel lounge pants and a tee shirt to answer the door as Felicity put her nightgown back on and helped him take the food into the kitchen after he paid the delivery guy who had been escorted up.

He ordered them two appetizers, one hot and one cold. The first was a cold salad called Pkhali, a traditional Georgian dish consisting of chopped and minced vegetables including eggplant, spinach, leeks, beans, and beets dressed with vinegar, onions, garlic, and herbs then sprinkled with pomegranate seeds. The hot appetizer was called Tolma which was basically spicy meatballs made from ground beef and pork, wrapped then cooked in grape leaves, and served with a yogurt sauce that was flavored with garlic, tarragon, and mint. He also ordered them three types of Mtsvadi, or shish kebob, an assortment of Georgian cheeses, and homemade bread called Shoti with Napoleoni puffed pastries for dessert.

They sat around the kitchen table laughing and feeding each other while exchanging intimate touches and stealing the odd kiss. It was the happiest she’d been in a while even though it was fairly obvious that they were both avoiding the subject that had started the fight to begin with. She was pretty sure Bruce thought she had given up on her idea to work for the OO but, the truth was, she was more determined than ever to get this done so she could know, once and for all, if her world was going to come crashing down around her.

Despite herself, she found herself wanting this kind of domestic bliss with him. The penthouse, even though it was half empty and knowing that they still had a long way to go before she could ever see settling down with him, had started to feel like a home; a real home. She wanted that; more than anything, and she’d do whatever she had to do to make that happen even if it meant angering Bruce in the short term or risking her life by going ahead with her plans.

Later, after the food had been eaten and the leftovers cleared away, she snuggled up against him with his arm wrapped around her side and slept in the bed he referred to as ‘theirs’, desperately trying not to worry about the storm yet to come.
“Are you sure you know what you’re doing?” Diggle called up to Luke through the access panel of the freight elevator, passing him another box of tools. “You’ve been up there a while now; need some help?”

“Thanks man, but I got it,” Luke told him. “I’m an engineer; if it’s mechanical, I can fix it. Besides, stuff like this bugs me; at this point it’s a grudge match between me and this piece of shit death trap of yours.”

“I hear you,” Dig said. “Felicity’s the same way whenever she sees someone banging on the keyboard or whacking it because they can’t get it to do right.”

“Hurts her soul, right?”

“You got it,” Dig grinned. “Just let me know if you need anything, okay?”

“I’m good!”

He wandered over to where Oliver was supervising Roy and Tim’s sparring session.

“How are our other guests doing?” Oliver asked him quietly as he walked up, his eyes never leaving the action on the mats.

“Luke says he’s got the elevator repairs almost wrapped up and, according to Barbara, she’s in ‘Baby Heaven’ right now.” He dipped his head towards Oliver’s ear with a grin, “I’ve got to say that, despite the bumpy start, I kind of like having other masks in the foundry. Shit’s getting done.”

“I know what you mean,” Oliver told him with a slightly amused quirk of his lips.

After a quick introduction followed by some posturing on the part of Roy, the two men had decided to test each other on the mats. At first, despite the other man’s extensive experience, Dig had been a bit nervous by the idea of him getting physical with Roy. Even after he’d been given the Mirakuru anti-serum, it was still difficult for him to control his sudden rages. He’d hurt both of them a few times while sparring and he wasn’t sure if Tim really understood what he was in for.

That is until he watched them go at it.

Roy had yet to land a single blow while Tim was wiping the floor with him. Dig watched as Roy lunged only to have Tim flip into the air in an impressive act of acrobatics to land softly on the mats behind him. He immediately used his Bo Staff to sweep his opponent’s legs out from under him, causing Roy to land hard on his side with a grunt.

“You okay, man?” He asked as he circled him, his expression still as untroubled as always. “We can stop if you’re tired.”

“I’m not tired,” Roy growled before casting off his staff, leaping to his feet, and rushing Tim like a bull to a matador’s cape.

Tim just stood there, seemingly unconcerned, until the very last second when he nimbly stepped aside and landed a hard knock with his staff to the back of Roy’s head causing him to flounder and sprawl face first onto the mat.

“Ouch,” Tim said shaking his head as he circled him again. “That looked kind of painful; are you sure you don’t need a break?”

“I’ll break you, you mother--!” Roy wiped the blood out from under his nose with his hand and turned on Tim with a nearly feral growl, his whole body trembling with rage. He dove at Tim again only to land with another painful, “Oomph!”

“Like I said, dude; it’s just the first day. We have time,” Tim said with a yawn as he spun his bo between his fingers like a majorette spinning a baton. “Besides, I’m only up to half speed myself. We should try this again tomorrow when I’m fresher and can really kick your ass into shape.”

“If anyone is kicking anybody’s ass, it’ll be me!” Roy said emphatically even as blood and sweat rolled off his face to drip on the mats while Tim still had yet to break a sweat.

“You know, I like you Roy; you never say die even when it’s pretty obvious that you’re completely outclassed,” Tim said with a grin. “Guess that either makes you persistent or really, really stupid.”

“Think it’s about time we put a stop to this for tonight or what?” Dig asked just as Roy made another inhuman growl and lunged for Tim’s throat only to have the other man whack him hard on the backside causing him to yelp in pain.

“Are you kidding?” Oliver said, his lips upturned in a look of amusement. “This is the most fun I’ve had in months.”

“This is so unfair, man; seriously,” Tim said shaking his head as Roy struggled to his feet. “You’re really making me feel bad now. Baby told us you were some kind of bad-ass tough guy so I was expecting a challenge but now I’m starting to feel like a schoolyard bully beating up on the poor runty kid. If I had known you were an amateur with virtually no training…”

“If you want to see what I can do then throw down that staff of yours and come at me with your fists!” Roy spat out, the adrenaline causing his hands to shake even more now, a fact that was beginning to really worry Dig.

“Okay,” Tim said tossing away his staff and standing in front of him, a curious expression on his face. “Show me what you got, tough guy.”

Roy sprang into action, his powerful legs propelling him toward Tim like a rocket, but the other man merely stepped slightly again to the side and clocked him with his fist before grabbing his wrist and, in a text book example of kotegaeshi, locked onto it while executing a block, then leapt to Roy’s other side, pulling him along and twirling as though they were dancing partners, then twisted his arm behind his back taking him down, all the while using the other man’s own momentum and strength against him. As Roy landed hard face first on the mat, Tim pinned his arm behind him painfully and stuck a hard knee in his back.

“Are you going to tap out, or what?” Tim asked him, “Don’t make me have to break your arm, bro.” He twisted his arm further in emphasis causing Roy to cry out in pain.

A thunderous look stole over Roy’s face before he slapped the mat forcefully three times signaling he was done.

Despite his tap out, Tim didn’t release his hold, “Now, I’m willing to let you go, Roy, but if you try to land a cheap shot on me I’m going to have to stop playing with you and start taking this fight seriously. I’ve been really patient so far, but if you piss me off we’re going to have a problem. Are we going to have a problem?” He twisted his arm again and jammed his thumb in the middle of his hand to put pressure on a nerve cluster that Dig knew from experience would make Roy feel like he was being jolted by a Taser as pain shot up from his arm to deep into the sympathetic nerves of his thoracic spine.
Roy gritted his teeth and grunted, his eyes watering slightly, “We’re good! I quit!”

Tim released him and quickly stepped back, crossing his arms over his chest in a seemingly casual pose as he watched Roy struggle back to his feet, rubbing his arm and hand as he did so, “You want to grab something to drink before we begin round two?”

Roy let out a frustrated breath before looking up at Tim, a grudging look of respect crossing his features, “Yeah.” He followed him over to where Dig and Oliver were standing and handily caught the bottle of water Tim tossed his way. “Thanks.”

“No problem,” Tim said, grinning at him like they were just a couple of guy’s hanging out much to Diggle’s amusement.

“That was a nice move out there,” he told him.

“Yeah, learned it when I was ten my first week in the Batcave,” Tim told him, twisting off the cap to his water and taking a drink.

“Wayne had you learning Aikido at ten years old?” Dig asked in surprise.

“ Heck, he had Dick learning it even younger than that, right Barbara?” He called out.

“Yeah, but Dick had a bit of a head start on you since he came from circus folk and you grew up a rich snot from Gotham Heights,” she said from where she was at the LAIR terminal.

“Who’s Dick?” Roy asked a little breathlessly as he sat down on the mats in front of them.

“Dick Grayson, right? Wayne’s other kid?” Dig asked.

Tim nodded and Roy frowned, “If you guys are brothers then why isn’t he a Wayne, too?”

“Long story,” Tim said.

“I’ll say,” Barbara snorted from across the room.

Tim smirked in her direction before turning to his companions, “Bruce adopted Dick when he was in his early twenties so their relationship was always more of a brother thing and Dick wanted to keep his last name to honor his parents.”

“What about you?” Roy asked curiously.

“What about me?” Tim asked.

“I mean, are you Bruce’s real kid or what?”

Barbara flinched and turned her wheelchair to face them, “Nice. Queen, what the hell have you been teaching this street rat of yours? Obviously it wasn’t manners.”

Oliver actually looked pained at that, “Roy…” he said warningly.

“What?” Roy asked. “I just meant that he looks like he could be his real kid, is all.”

“I think the word you’re looking for is ‘biological’ not ‘real’, Roy,” Dig told him while shaking his head in exasperation.

“Sorry,” he said in consternation. “No offense.”
“None taken,” Tim told him. “The answer is no, Bruce isn’t my ‘real’ bio-dad. He adopted me after my parent’s died just like he did with all the rest of his kids. You’re not the first person to make that comment though; we do look a bit alike but that’s because, according to Alfred, my mom and Bruce were like fifth cousins once removed or something.”

“How many kids does he have?” Roy asked.

“Right now? Just me and Dick,” Tim said, his voice taking on a slightly hollow note.

“I’d heard something about Wayne losing a child a few years ago,” Oliver said quietly. “Damian? I’m sorry for your loss.”

Tim’s lips quirked upwards in a humorless smile, his eyes flat and cool, “Yeah, well, we’ve taken on a lot of losses the last few years.”

“Shit, man; we know what that’s like for sure,” Roy snorted.

Tim looked at him curiously but before he could say anything Luke called out from the elevator shaft, “Finally!” The other man exclaimed as he jumped down out of the top of the elevator, tool box in hand. “Now you guys have an elevator that actually works.” He wandered over to where the rest of them were standing after putting the toolbox back near the workstation. “Hey, bro! Toss me a water.”

“Here,” Tim said, reaching into the cooler and throwing it to him.

“Thanks for fixing that for us; I appreciate it,” Oliver said, giving him the nod.

Oliver nodded, “You feel like coming along?”

“Depends on whether or not you can make it interesting for me,” Luke grinned, flexing his fingers in the temporary brace. “I could use a little physical therapy.”

Dig looked at his injured appendage doubtfully, “You sure your arm can handle it?”

“My armor has an interior ‘skin’ that not only keeps track of my vital signs but acts as a compression brace if I break a bone. It’ll be just like wearing a cast but I’ll have full movement,” he told him. “Hell, it even injects a pain reliever if it senses an injury.”

“Really?” Oliver asked, his interest peaked, “What else can it do?”

Luke opened his mouth to speak but this time Tim cut him off. “Dude, if you get him started on that armor of his, we’ll be here all night.”

“You’re just jealous because my armor actually does shit and all yours does is make you look like you’re hung which we all know is a lie,” Luke shot back.

“That’s not what your sister told me last night,” Tim returned.

“To be fair, Tam tells that to a lot of people,” Barbara called out from the workstation.

Everyone looked over at Barbara and Roy grinned, “Damn; triple burn!” He crowed, “She just insulted your girlfriend, his sister, and your dick in one go!”

“What can I say, I’m talented,” Barbara said as she tapped away. She wheeled around until she was facing all of them. “You ladies can compare the size of your codpieces later; right now I have Triad activity on the docks. You want to go handle it or should I just throw the cops a bone?”

“How much activity?” Oliver asked, striding over to join her at the workstation followed by the rest of them.

“A lot,” Barbara said, turning around to bring up CCTV footage on the monitors. “Baby’s system has me patched into the security feeds in the warehouse district. I’m counting at least a couple of dozen inside and movement around the harbor; maybe thirty to thirty-five heavily armed gangbangers altogether.”

“That looks like a major deal going down,” Dig said, observing the feeds with a practiced eye.

“That looks like China White and Alberto Vargas,” Oliver said, pointing them out.

“The Peruvians are working with the Triads?” Dig said, looking at him sharply. “That could be where the sudden influx of cocaine Lance was talking about is coming from. Now that the Italians are out, they need someone to move their product.”

“Let’s suit up,” Oliver said, “Barbara, did Felicity give you the 411 on Lance?”

“I already have a direct patch into his smartphone,” she told him. “You want me to give him a heads up?”

“Tell him what we have and make sure he knows we’re going in. Tell him to have his guys standing by but give us time to do some recon before he sends in SWAT then patch him in on our coms. Felicity gave him his own earpiece a while back. We don’t want our guys caught in a gunfight and we certainly don’t want any of his men getting hurt,” He turned to the rest of the men, “If you guys want to come, we could use the help.”

“I’m with you, man,” Luke said, already reaching for his duffle to take out his armor.

“Sounds like fun; you coming Roy?” Tim asked, already pulling his shirt over his head and heading for his own bag.

“Is that cool?” He asked Oliver hesitantly.

Oliver sighed and glanced over at Tim, “He’s the guy training you so if he thinks you can handle it, fine. We’ll need as many feet on the ground as we can get.”

“We got this,” Tim said confidently as he unzipped his jeans, tossing them in a pile on the mats as he pulled on his armor. “Just follow my lead and we’ll be fine.”

“You know, we do have a changing area in the back,” Dig said, glancing at Barbara uncomfortably as the men stripped down to their underwear.

“Oh please,” Barbara snorted as she glanced over at them. “I appreciate the gentleman routine but I’ve been sharing space with these two for so long that I’ve seen everything they’ve got and then some. I even shared a bathroom with that one over there,” she hitched a thumb at Tim. “Trust me, after seeing what he gets up to in the shower, nothing shocks me.”

“Hey!” Tim said, looking up from where he was zipping up his pants. “If you knocked once in a while you wouldn’t have caught me during my, um, private business in the first place!” Roy looked at him askance and Tim flushed, “Tam was out of town and I was lonely.”
“Whatever, dude,” Roy said, getting up to grab his own red leathers and heading to the bathroom, obviously not as willing to give Barbara a free show.

“Tim and Luke have комs systems already built into their armor but I’ve patched the frequency into LAIR so you guys will be connected.” She pulled the ear buds out of their case and handed them to Dig and Oliver who were already suited up and ready for business. “Before Luke heads out of town you might want to get together with him and see if he can come up with some mock ups for new suits for you guys.” She looked over Oliver’s green leather and Diggle’s tactical gear, both of which emphasized their heavily muscled physiques. “Not that you two aren’t yummy with a spoon as it is, but I’m pretty sure Bruce’s gadget hook up could get you something that might help keep any new scars and bullet holes to a minimum.”

“Thanks, we might have to do that,” Oliver said, eyeing Luke and Tim’s suits. Roy emerged in the red version of Oliver’s hood and he tossed him his ear bud. “Follow Tim’s lead but if I tell you to fall back you fall back, got it?”

“Got it,” Roy said, putting it in his ear.

At that moment the door to the Foundry opened and Sara walked in, her own duffle slung over one arm, “Hey handsome!” She said as she headed down the stairs and walked towards the group. “You sure do know how to fill out that suit of yours!”

“Sara…?” Oliver said, looking up in surprise at her intimate tone. He moved to intercept her but, to his and Diggle’s surprise, she walked past them and right up to Luke before laying a very enthusiastic lip lock on him…

…that he, in turn, responded to with equal enthusiasm.

“Damn girl,” Luke said appreciatively when they broke apart, his large hands cupping her waist possessively. “You sure do know how to make an entrance.”

“Miss me?” She grinned.

“You know it,” he smiled back.

She loosened her hold on him and glanced around the room. “Looks like you guys are gearing up for some action,” she said eyeing all of them. “Mind if I tag along?”

“Sure,” Luke said, not even waiting for Oliver to speak. Although, to be fair, he didn’t look like he was quite capable of it at the moment, Dig thought as he observed his partner’s shocked countenance. “I’m looking forward to seeing you in action,” Luke continued in an intimate timbre.

“Sweetie, I thought you saw plenty of action from me last night,” she winked at him before heading for the bathroom. “Hey guys!” She said waving at the rest of them. “Be ready in a sec; you can brief me on the way.”

Roy turned to Oliver with a pitying look, “Dude, I thought my love life was in the crapper but, damn; that was harsh.”

“Shut up, Roy,” Oliver growled right before heading out, bow in hand.

She took a sip of her coffee as she watched Bruce quickly put on his armor from her place behind the workstation, “Barring any unforeseen baddies, is it okay if we try to make an early night of it tonight? Tomorrow’s going to be a long day and I didn’t exactly get the nap I’d planned on earlier.”

“I seem to recall that you enjoyed that little interruption in sleep just as much as I did,” he said with an erotic overtone, now fully dressed in his armor with the exception of his cape and cowl.

“Hey, no flirting in the FelicityCave,” she told him.

“Since when?” He asked as he put on his cape and adjusted the cowl before coming up to her and leaning down so their mouths were nearly touching. “I don’t recall that particular rule.”

She snorted at him then reached up to kiss him gently. When she pulled away she fixed him with a stern eye, “I mean it, Bruce; barring any unforeseen crap-storms, we cut this off by three, four at the latest.”

“Fine,” he said, although he didn’t sound overly enthusiastic about the idea. “We can catch a few more hours of sleep and then go out to breakfast before Zander and his crew get here in the morning.”

“You’re coming back here?” She said, feigning surprise.

“Of course I am,” his eyes narrowed on her in suspicion. “Why? Is there some reason you don’t want me here?”

“No, I’m just surprised that you’d rather spend all morning here looking at fabric swatches when I know you’ve probably got back to back meetings scheduled. I always thought you and Dad had department head meetings on Tuesdays.”

“I think I can spare a few hours,” he said, his voice still laden with doubt. “You don’t mind me being here, do you?”

“No,” she said off-handedly, stifling a feigned yawn that became real about halfway through. She blinked her eyes fuzzily, “I just kind of wish I’d known you were going to be here. Tam’s coming over and she’s basically going to spend the entire day steamrolling over absolutely everyone. I could have spared myself the aggravation and not invited her if I had known you’d be here as backup in case Sabine shows up again.”

“You invited Tam over?” He asked, his mouth turning down in confusion.

“Why wouldn’t I? She speaks fluent decorator,” she told him. “The woman redecorates her entire apartment every other week so I figured that if Cruella De Vil came back for the sequel she could bitch slap her down with attitude instead of the way I had planned to which would have involved you bailing me out of jail later. I hope you’re not mad that I invited her to spend time with us, are you?”

“No, of course not,” Bruce said quickly, the confusion in his expression obvious even under his cowl. “That was actually pretty good thinking on your part.”

Time to go in for the kill, she thought. She hated to do it but she needed him to want to stay away today and not arouse any more suspicion. “By the way,” she said slowly, making sure to cringe a bit. “There’s something I need to tell you and there’s a good chance you’re not going to like it.”

His jaw squared and his eyes glittered as he sensed his suspicions were about to be justified, “What?”

She sighed and pulled a face as though struggling with her words, “Okay, here’s the thing; yesterday I might have let slip that you asked me to marry you and now Tam has decided that she’s in charge of the entire thing.” She looked up quickly, “I’m sorry! I know you haven’t even talked to my dad yet and that we were still just in the ‘what if’ stage, but…” She bit her lip, “Okay, I screwed up, I know, and I really tried to fix it, I did, but…um, there’s more.”

“More?” He repeated in disbelief.

“Yeah,” she cringed again. “In order to get her to agree to keep everything quiet I might have agreed to let her drag me to meet a wedding planner later—not in a serious way! Just, you know, in a casual kind of ‘I might be getting married but I don’t want to put down any deposits quite yet’ way.” She looked at him through a cascade of dark eyelashes, “Are you mad? You’re mad; I can cancel it, no problem! I told her it was a bad idea anyway.”

“You told your sister we’re getting married?” He asked in astonishment as if that was the last thing he expected her to say.

“She dragged it out of me, okay?” She said in contrived consternation. “When I left her yesterday she was going to the store to buy up every bridal magazine she could get ahold of and all Sara could talk about on the way to the airport was that she, Barbara, and Tam were going to be bridesmaids…” She blanched again, “Oh yeah, Barbara probably knows too since Sara is already in Starling and has probably told her by now.” She bit her lip, “Oh, and I also might have told Tim.”

“You told Tim, Barbara, Tam, and Sara that we were getting married?” He echoed incredulously.

“I did, yeah,” she said apologetically. “It just kind of…popped out…at various intervals…repeatedly and apparently indiscriminately. Wow, I really suck at keeping things quiet, huh?”

He stood there in silence, not saying a word, his gaze slightly vacant as he seemed to consider this new turn of events carefully.

“At least I haven’t told Luke, Dad, or Peggy,” she said with forced cheer then allowed her face to fall. “Although, chances are, Luke probably knows by now, too, so…” She cleared her throat, “Say something, okay? You’re kind of freaking me out here.” She took a steadying breath, “Look, if you want to back out of it, I understand. I’ll just call Tam, Sara and Tim and tell them to forget I said anything. I mean, really, it’s too soon to even be talking about--”

“No,” Bruce said quickly. He took off his cowl, tossing it on the desk, and knelt by her chair, turning her to face him. He looked her in the eyes searchingly, “I’m just surprised; you seemed a bit reluctant and… I just wasn’t expecting you to still be on board with this after our fight the other day.”

God, she was starting to feel really guilty for this but it had to be done. She laid her hand on his cheek softly, “It was just a fight, Bruce. People have fights; it doesn’t mean they stop loving each other. If you want to know the truth, then, yeah, you’re right; I still am a little unsure about all this. I mean, marriage is a big step and I don’t think we should rush in and head to Vegas tomorrow, and I definitely know that I shouldn’t have blurted it out like that. But things with Tam tend to snowball, you know? Plus, Sara was in the room so it’s not like I was flitting around like a bee and pollinating our mutual social circle with hot gossip; it just happened. Well, Tim was, you know, a little gossipy but I was mad at you and…” she grimaced. She didn’t have to pretend this next part because it was true, “Yesterday Tam asked me if I loved you and then she asked me if you felt the same way so I told her about what we talked about; marriage, kids, the whole nine yards. I couldn’t help it. And Tim, well, I thought he was going to try to talk me out of it but then he basically gave us his blessing and said that we’ve always belonged to each other. He even said he was happy that I was going to be his step-mom, which is really weird because if he marries Tam then our family tree is going to look totally screwed up.” His lips twitched upwards in response and she offered him a tender look, “Even though I was still mad at you I guess… I don’t know.” She gave him a half-smile and scrunch her nose, “It was a pretty stupid slip, huh?”

“No,” he said quietly, leaning in to kiss her before rubbing his forehead on hers and closing his eyes. “No, Tim was absolutely right; we do belong together. We’ve always belonged together and the only thing I’m upset about is the fact that we should have done this a lot sooner.”

“Are you sure?” She asked quietly. “I know we were planning on waiting a while, try dating first, but now that Tim knows it’s just a matter of time before he slips up and says something to Luke, and if Luke finds out then he’ll spill the beans to dad just to be an ass, and you just know my dad is going to hit the roof, not to mention what Peggy Ann will do.”

“Shit.” He leaned back and grimaced. “You’re right, Luke is going to call Lucius the minute he finds out. Damn it.”

She pushed back her chair and grabbed her phone, “Wait, let me call Tim and--!”

He placed his hand over the phone and took it away from her, setting it back down on the workstation, “No, what’s done is done.” He looked at her and smiled softly before kissing her tenderly, his gauntleted hand caressing her cheek. When he pulled back his expression changed to one of grim determination, “You’re right though; this changes our timeline a bit.” He got up and paced for a moment in thought before turning to face her again, “Do you really need me here tomorrow or are you going to be okay with just your sister?”

“Tam and I have it covered and if not I can text or call you; why?” Felicity asked him even though inside she was totally doing a fist pump.

He let out a breath, “I’m going to have to try to get to your dad before Luke does and discuss all this with him. Hopefully he’ll be okay but, in any case, the last thing I should do is blow off my entire day and compound things by aggravating him further.”

“I’ll be fine,” she assured him. “Are you still coming here or are you going to the manor before you leave for work? You know, I could probably come with you today to help you talk to Dad. Tam can handle things here…of course, God only knows what she’d pick out but I’m really not looking forward to seeing all my ideas shot down followed by having her drag me from one bridal boutique to another afterwards. I would much rather be in the hot seat with you, trust me.”

“No, if I know Lucius then he’ll expect us to talk this out man to man. I know it sounds sexist as hell, but your father is old school that way. Plus, chances are, he’s going to want to say a few things that will probably upset you so it might be best if you aren’t there.” He rubbed his hand over his mouth, “I should probably go home after I patrol and let you get your rest,” he said at last. “Lucius always schedules an early breakfast meeting on Tuesdays so I want to try to beat him to the office.”

“You know, you don’t have to do this,” she told him, feeling another twinge of guilt. She got up and walked up to him, placing her arms around his waist as she laid her head on his chest. She felt his arms go around her and she made a contented noise before continuing, “Really. If you don’t want to tell Dad, I can call down to Starling and ask Luke not to say anything. For all we know he might not have even found out about it yet.”

“Between Barbara, your sister, Canary, and Tim it’s just a matter of time before someone says something,” he said in an aggrieved manner even as he laid a tender kiss on top of her hair. “No, might as well get it over with.”

“‘Might as well get it over with’,,” she said with a wry expression. “Wow, you do know how to lay the romance on thick, huh?”
He tilted her chin up and kissed her deeply until her knees nearly gave out, his hand moving from her waist to cup her bottom through her thin leggings and sweater. When he broke from the kiss he offered her a lusty smirk, “Is that romantic enough for you?”

“What; you kissing me until my knees wobble or grabbing my ass?”

“The kiss; grabbing your ass was purely for my benefit alone,” he told her.

She smirked, “I see, so the Bat is an ass man, huh?”

“Actually, I’m a fan of the whole package; your ass was just the first thing my hand happened to land on,” he told her with a grin.

“Look at you getting all sappy in your old age,” she teased huskily. He smacked her bottom playfully causing her to squeal in surprise and him to grin even wider. “What was that for?”

“Spur of the moment impulse but given your reaction I think we’ll have to revisit it again later,” he rumbled before capturing her lips again.

She laughed quietly against his lips, “Dirty old man.”

“Watch it or this dirty old man will be tempted to say to hell with patrolling tonight, take you over his knee, and teach you a lesson, young lady,” he promised in a low sexy timbre as he bent down to scrape his teeth on her neck causing her to shiver.

“Pervert. Get out of here before I’m tempted to hold you to that,” she said pushing him away playfully.

He pulled back but didn’t remove his hands from her waist. Instead he stared down at her for a moment before saying, “Move in with me.”

“What?” She said, her eyes widening in surprise.

“After I talk to Lucius I want you to move in with me,” he told her, the teasing gone from his tone to be replaced by something deeper. “I want you to move into the manor. Now, before we get married.”

“Bruce…” she breathed.

“I like this; I want to have this with you every day and I don’t want to have to wait,” he told her. “I want to go to bed with you and wake up together, I want to walk down to the cave with you beside me and put on my armor while you sit at your workstation and talk about your sister or whatever’s on your mind. I don’t want to have to leave our bed here then go back to the manor every night and I just… Look, we’re already living together or will be,” he told her seriously. “If you say you don’t want to live out there, fine; I’m still going to be sharing your bed every night until we’re married no matter what but with the renovations going on it’s going to be a mess and a half up there. Besides, the main Batcave has better equipment and more privacy. I agree that you absolutely should update this system but the Batcave under the manor should take precedence.”

“Bruce…” She began reluctantly.

“If you’re worried about keeping up appearances then I’ll happily stay with you at the penthouse but after I talk to your dad, it won’t really matter anymore,” he said, cutting off her argument. “We’re adults, he knows that, and he’ll rightly assume that if we’re serious enough to consider marriage that we’ve already had sex. Lucius might be old school but he’s not naïve. He knows that you’re probably not a virgin, not at your age, and given the hints he’s been dropping lately I suspect he already knows how I feel about you.” He paused for a second, “I’m not trying to pressure you, I’ll play this any way you want, I just want you to consider moving in with me at the manor now because, like I said, the Batcave there is better equipped, that’s all; plus the renovation mess.”

“Because it makes sense, right?” She teased. “Purely from a logical standpoint, of course.”

“Of course,” he said, his lips twitching slightly before his expression turned serious. “Here or there; six of one, a half dozen of the other, it makes no difference to me.” He gave her a heated look, “And…I want you in my home, by my side, as my wife and partner. It’s where you belong and I don’t want to spend even one more day without you there.”

She stared at him for an extended moment. Put up or shut up, she told herself. Did she really want this? Putting everything else aside, Orbital, Isabel, everything else; did she want this?

She looked at Bruce as he stood there in his armor, his expression open and loving in a way that she knew was reserved only for her.

Still, she needed to hear him say it one more time. “Do you love me, Bruce? Do you really want to marry me?” She asked him. “Because you don’t have to; we can pretend the ‘M’ word never even crossed your mind. You won’t hurt my feelings or scare me away if you take it back; I’ll be here for you even if we keep what we have between us. If you don’t want this then I’m not going to make you do anything you don’t want to do.”

He nodded, “I want this; more than anything. I’m ready for this, Baby; are you?”

Was she?

Marrying Bruce would mean making him her home. That meant no more secrets. She loved him, she did, but if he found out what she was planning to do (and he would knowing him) he was going to be all kinds of pissed; probably pissed enough that he might never forgive her. That meant that if this was the last chance she had, she needed to make sure he knew exactly how she felt. Later on when he was full-on Bat and she was the one in his crosshairs, she needed to know that she said her piece.

She took a deep breath, “Did I ever tell you that Peggy Ann and her husband, Chao, had an arranged marriage?” He shook his head in the negative. “Well, sort of arranged; they met through a marriage broker but it all comes down to the same thing. Anyway, she would tell us stories about how she and Chao would go on group ‘dates’ with her family, how they never so much as held hands until they were married, but how happy they were together until he died in an accident just a few years later. Tam would ask her how it was that she knew she would be happy married to someone she’d never even kissed and she would say, ‘Love is easy, passion is easy; but marriage is serious business.’” She paused, “She told us that too many people enter into marriage riding a wave of lust and passion but those feelings are fleeting. She said that the problem with today’s society is that people have forgotten that marriage is supposed to be something binding and solemn, that you don’t play with it; if you make that commitment then you’d better be willing to honor it as best you can. The best marriages are the ones built on the understanding that there is no easy out and if you marry someone it’s because you want to create something larger than just the two of you, that you’re contributing to the community and creating a legacy that binds all of us together.”

She met his gaze with her own, “Marriage is serious business, Bruce. If all you want to do is stake a claim then fine; you can do that without putting a ring on my finger. I love you, I’ve always loved you, but marriage is on a whole other level. There are no takesies backies in marriage. I’m not always going to do what you want, I’m going to disappoint you and frustrate you and I guarantee that you’re going to piss me off royally from time to time. Marriage means working through that anger and still loving that person even when they screw up or things get scary. I need to know that you won’t run or reject me; I need to know that I can screw up or disappoint you without worrying about losing you every time you get mad at me for something. I won’t lose myself to you, Bruce; I need you to respect the fact that I can think for myself and not try to steamroll me or dismiss what I have to say just because you think you’re protecting me or that you disagree with my decisions. If you can’t handle that then we need to drop this and save the declarations of intent for a time when you can.”

Okay, it was kind of cheating since he didn’t know he was about to be mad at her, but still…

“I’m not going to run.” He picked up her left hand and, repeating a gesture he’d made just a few days before, he kissed her ring finger. “Mine,” he told her. “This is my claim and, you’re right; it is serious business. I keep accusing you of being an old fashioned girl but, the truth is; I’m an old fashioned guy in a lot of ways. When I do something, it’s 100% or nothing. I know all of this seems fast, I know all the arguments your dad is going to make about how you’ve only been back for a few weeks and how we should get to know each other better first, but I already know everything I need to know. I’ve known you most of your life and I’ve been in love with you since you were eighteen years old. I love you and I want this. I’m ready.”

“I was nineteen, not eighteen,” she told him with a smile. “It still makes you a dirty old man, but…”

He popped her playfully on the butt again causing her to yelp more in surprise than pain, “Keep it up and you’ll be bent over my knee in no time. That or the workstation; I’m not picky.”

“Ow,” she grinned at him as she rubbed her cheek lightly. “Who are you supposed to be all of the sudden; Christian Grey?”

“Who?” He asked in amusement.

“Fifty Shades of Grey,” she told him. “It’s this pulp novel about bondage and spanking someone at work left in the ladies room at QC once and, let me tell you, the bathroom is exactly where it belonged. Talk about a piece of crap; I got three paragraphs in before I said ‘no’, and the last two paragraphs were a courtesy read.”

He smiled at her then ran his gloved hand over her hair lightly, “You were nineteen when we made love for the first time, but I was in love with you long before that. I should have realized it sooner but I was just too scared to acknowledge it at the time,” he told her solemnly. “I started falling in love with you the second I realized that you saw me for who I was under all the subterfuge and pretense. You’ve never seen me as Bruce or the Bat; you see the man who exists somewhere in between.” His lips turned upwards, his eyes dancing in amusement, “And yes, I’m speaking in the creepy third person again but I don’t know how else to say it. All I know is when I finally made my move it wasn’t a spur of the moment thing, not really; I’d been in love with you for months and that night I just so happened to reach my breaking point. Still, whether it happened then or a year later or yesterday or tomorrow, we were always going to be together. I wouldn’t have asked you in the first place if I had any doubts. Once I put my ring on this finger,” he kissed it again, “it’s never coming off. No matter what happens, you’re mine and I’m yours. You’re basherte to my basherter.”

“Yiddish, really?” She asked, utterly charmed by hearing the words leave his lips. “Do you even know what that means?”

“Bashert; one’s divinely foreordained spouse or soul mate, used to express the seeming fate or destiny of an auspicious or important event, friendship, or happening,” he recited. “I looked it up.” He looked down at her, the humor leaving his expression and replaced by something far more intense. “I know what I want, Baby; I know exactly how I feel and what this means to me. Now, the real question is, what do you want?”
She bit her bottom lip and considered that for a moment, “If I do this can we talk—really talk later?”
She asked him. “Not…not right away but soon? There are…things I need to tell you and I need to know that you’ll listen to me, really listen without going all Bat on me.”

“I’ll do my best, that’s all I can promise. As for the rest…whenever you’re ready to talk, I’m here,” he told her, reaching up to caress her cheek again. “Always.”

She took a deep breath, and leapt. “Okay, but my dad isn’t going to like it,” she warned him, her nerves jangling but a huge weight lifting from her chest at the same time. “And Peggy is really not going to like it. She already refers to you as ‘the bachelor’ like you have a disease or something. If I move in before the wedding it’s going to be days and days’ worth of lectures beginning with the words, ‘why should he buy the cow if he can get the milk for free?’ Of course Tam always came back with ‘why sell the cow to buy the pig if you’re already getting the sausage’, so…”

His lips twitched upwards despite the dire note in her tone, relief casting over his expression as well, “I’m fairly sure Lucius is going to be pissed at me no matter what, so we may as well go for broke.”
He rubbed his thumb against the dimple in her cheek, “As for Peggy Ann, I’ll get Alfred to sweet talk her into it. If that fails, well, she can only refer to me as ‘the bachelor’ until I marry you and I’ll be sure to make it very clear to her that I don’t believe in long engagements. So does that mean you’re definitely saying yes? And by ‘yes’ I mean all of it; moving in, dinner by seven, the whole nine yards.”

She blew out a puff of air and scowled. “Fine, moving in and dinner by seven it is, but you’re helping me move my stuff, you know that right?” She told him. “And now I should tell you that I already promised Tam and Sara they could stay here in the penthouse. I was planning on teaching Tam to run the alternate Watchtower site and introducing you to Sara to see how you got along before asking her if she wanted to join the team on a contingency basis since she’s been thinking of making a move to Gotham anyway.”

He looked down at her, a hint of the Bat stealing over his features, “You invited the Canary onto my team without consulting me first?”

“The way I see it the team is now half mine so she’d be joining my half, not yours,” she told him.

Despite his obvious aggravation with her his lips tugged upwards, “This isn’t a community property state.”

“No, it’s an equitable property state which means that all marital properties are divided under a concept of ‘fairness and equitability’. Something you should already know since, technically, you did pass the bar but, just in case, what that means is that since I will be handling the coms I should have a fair and equal voice in who joins the team.”

He looked down at her with a raised eyebrow, “Should I be worried about the fact that we aren’t even married yet and you’ve already read up on divorce laws in this state?”

“Probably,” she told him. “Oh, and I should warn you that she also asked for my permission to sleep with you and I told her she could try but I doubted you’d go for it.”

“I see,” he said, a hint of amusement filtering through his tone. “I thought you said she wanted to sleep with you.”

“Sara is into fairness and equability as well,” she said in a deadpan.

“Two beautiful blondes at the same time; tempting,” he said with a smirk.
“Thought you said you weren’t into having an audience and sharing,” she reminded him.

“Well, a man can change his mind, can’t he?”

“No,” she told him flatly. “No, he can’t.”

“Damn, there goes that fantasy blown all to hell,” he tossed back. He straightened his spine then told her in a more serious voice. “Fine, I’ll meet with her but if I decide I can’t trust her then she doesn’t come anywhere near the Batcave; either of them, understood?”

“Agreed,” she told him, giving him one last quick peck on the lips before grabbing his cowl off her workstation and handing it to him. “Now go to work, Batman; it’s hero time.”

“Uh uh,” he said shaking his head then bent her over his arm in a Hollywood style kiss and proceeded to snog the hell out of her. When he broke free he looked down at her dizzy expression in smug amusement, “That’s how we start our day from now on, Mrs. Wayne, understood?” He gave her one last smirk before putting her back on her feet, tugging on his cowl, then headed for the tumbler. “Keep all the channels open but I’m going to start at the docks tonight so pay special attention to any chatter coming from the warehouse district.”

She touched her fingers to her lips and smiled, “I’m not new, you know,” she tossed back before sitting down and putting on the Bluetooth headset. “Love you; be safe and come home!”

“Always,” he told her before slipping behind the wheel and heading out into the night.
Chapter Thirty-Seven

Just before nine am, the cab dropped Felicity off at the gate to the Old Axis Chemical Processing Plant. She meant to be there earlier but, unfortunately, things hadn’t gone to plan the night before—at
At first they’d been on a roll; just a few drug dealers, a mugging or two, a couple of random convenience store robberies, and some morons who were off high off their asses trying to break into a pawn shop by tossing a brick through the window because they wanted to prove who could play the long guitar solo to ‘Stairway to Heaven’ better. (That one had her making ‘this is your brain on drugs’ jokes for twenty minutes straight until Bruce put the kibosh on it.) It wasn’t until four am, right in the middle of Bruce telling her to call it a night that everything went tits up.

A total whack-a-doo by the name of Julian Day speciously decided that she, and the rest of Gotham for that matter, didn’t need to sleep after all and instead thought that four am was the perfect time for a parade of Mardi Gras Madness and Mayhem...with Monkeys.

Monkeys.

One more time: M-O-N-K-E-Y-S.

Only.

In.

Gotham.

Apparently Mr. Day’s major damage was that he liked to play dress up and commit holiday related crimes. As such, Mr. Day aka ‘The Calendar Man’, who looked like a flamboyant cross between Truman Capote and an over-plucked and manscaped drag queen, decided to mark the celestial fusion of Chinese New Year and Mardi Gras by giving them their own theme crime.

And how does one combine those two holidays into a theme crime you might ask? Felicity sighed wearily: With monkeys.

Apparently this was the year of the monkey, therefore Mr. Day decided to unleash a horde of trained monkeys dressed in green, purple, and glittery gold tuxedos complete with tiny top hats on the Diamond District and then rode through town in a Fu Manchu and brightly colored zhiju robes tossing them from a parade float like Mardi Gras beads.

The fact that a monkey was behind the wheel just added to the crazy.

Well, ape. Chimpanzees were technically apes, but they were close enough to ‘monkeys’ to suit Day and ‘Mad Mardi Gras Monkeys’ seemed to roll off the tongue a bit better than ‘Mad Mardi Gras Apes’ did.

Another thing she learned last night, besides the ‘apes’ thing and Julian Day’s willingness to forego accuracy for alliteration, was that chimpanzees, no matter how well trained or intelligent they may be, weren’t the best drivers. Of course, it could also be because their little top hats kept falling into their eyes.

Only in Gotham, she thought once more while shaking her head. Tim was going to hate that he missed this one. Or not...she thought with a grimace. Plus she was pretty sure it was just a matter of time before someone posted it to YouTube anyway; he could catch it on the replay.

She winced, poor Bruce; he was not having a good day at all and it was about to be immortalized in internet history. This one would be playing on late night talk shows and Animal Planet for weeks, possibly years.
While Bruce was tossing nets over chimpanzees who were getting on their ‘Laissez les bons temps rouler,’ and trying to slow Calendar Man’s crazy roll, she was stuck humping and hacking, monitoring CCTV feeds, directing traffic by patching into the traffic lights, and desperately trying not to add to Bruce’s night by expressing her disgust as the monkey’s fought back by using their own naturally excreted ‘arsenal’ in self-defense.

Yeah, chimps might be cute but they were really gross and apparently as casual about personal hygiene as they were about traffic laws. If there was ever a night to be an out of town member of the Bat Family, that was the one.

It was chaos. The chimps were driving the on the wrong side of the road, running over newsstands and mail boxes and, even before dawn, Gotham still had plenty of traffic so cars were being run off the road and crashing into each other as they desperately tried to avoid the colorfully decorated flatbed truck hurtling toward them. Everything from Louis Armstrong singing ‘When the Saints Go Marching In’ to Benny Grunch’s ‘Ain’t No Place to Pee on Mardi Gras Day’ was blasted at window shaking levels from the sound system connected to the Rex Krewe float and Day, dressed as the King of the Carnival with a decidedly Asian twist, added to the noise and chaos by greeting early morning commuters and people coming off the graveyard shift with a hearty rendition of ‘If I Ever Cease To Love’ as he tossed diamonds onto the crowded roadways.

People were jumping in front of cars or outside of them to scoop up the diamonds, fist fights were breaking out, monkey poop was flying through the air like really smelly Mardi Gras confetti—by the time everything was sorted Julian Day was in Arkham on a psych hold, the chimps were rounded up and taken safely to an animal rescue, and, luckily, there were a lot of minor injuries and some property damage, but no fatalities. The ironic thing was that the diamonds were all of inferior quality. Day, having had more interest in creating chaos than profit, had chosen to rob the easiest mark he could which was an industrial diamond supplier. While they were still diamonds, they were the type they ground into dust to make cutting tools and high end knife sharpeners rather than the finer quality of stones used to make jewelry.

Needless to say, she didn’t get her nap and Bruce was most definitely not feeling the party atmosphere when all was said and done. He really didn’t appreciate it when she signed off by expressing her condolences on the fact that he’d had such a shitty night.

Honestly, she didn’t even mean it that way; it was a completely accidental pun. Besides, technically it was a shitty night. A very, very shitty night.
